A Cowboy's Poem

He's saddled up his horse now,
Hitched the team and checked the load,
A craftsman's hands at rest at last
From a long and honest road.

He learned his trade from his old man –
Hard work, done honest, done right!
He never chased a pocket full of gold,
Just homes meant to hold both love and light.

Quick with wit and kind of heart,
Steady when things went wrong,
His wisdom came in steady words,
Faithful, true, and strong.

He fixed old wagons in his spare time,
Kept good books close at hand,
Walked his faith the cowboy way –
Quiet, firm and planned.

Beside him rode his bride always,
Fifty years, steady and true,
Through dusty roads and horse-show days,
Where quilts were stitched anew.

He'd stop for every quilt shop sign,
Old antiques worn just right –
He knew the worth of what she loved,
Saw beauty in their light.

Now the sun dips low and golden,
And the long day's work is done,
He's riding toward a promised rest
Beneath a setting sun.

Now he's headed west at sundown,
Where the trail runs wide and free.
Riding home to meet his bride,
The way it's meant to be.
