I studied Photography at college, to the level of Higher National Diploma and have, ever since, been trying to find and capture interesting perspectives on my surroundings – whatever they may be.

My principal subjects have been landscape (both rural and urban) and nature in their various forms. I have always been fascinated by their different moods and the ability of the photograph to capture them with such vivid clarity – the light and the dark – the changing of the weather and the seasons and the peaceful, reassuring serenity that masks a fearsome power and complexity. The urban environment also holds a great interest, both aesthetically and in terms of how it relates to the wider landscape and our relationship with it.

Through it all, I have attempted to capture what were often fleeting moments that would create images that could reflect some of the intricacy and ever-shifting ambience of the world around us.

I present to you here, a small selection of those images. I hope you enjoy them.
