Text of submission	Unfortunately in the modern era the most likely access to immediate employment is via an employment agency. My current employer accessed my service initially via aforementioned. Some of my colleagues who started prior to and following my casual engagements are still progressing their employment through a protracted and timely direct casual status with the company some as much as 5 years plus total casual status with both the agency and the company! I was fortunate having more skills and experience (middle aged) I genuinely feel for the hard work and seemingly NO end in sight for those workmates who have the same financial obligations and moreover the lack of financial stimulus to our overall economy as these many are unable to enter the opportunity of first home ownership and the related pleasure of overall financial opportunities and security that I enjoy. At the very least give them annual leave sick leave benefits that sustain the employee and their family. Finally I'm very disappointed that politicians, Employers and unions need to address this most disturbing trend. The answers don't seem that difficult to me? Regards Steve Maloney
