I have a program that needs to read keyboard input from the user, and run time, from multiple threads (as the keyboard input is invalid for more than one thread at once). I want to prevent a thread from reading something else before it has the chance to read the invalid key. How can I do that? Do I need to use lock all over the place? A: Use a read-write lock. Each thread that wants to get keyboard input will create a lock object (say, lockObj), then execute this block of code: // this block gets executed by each thread at least once { // lock the requested object

A: it seems that you downloaded the version that has your own malware on it. it might be the program that you saw was not the original one you downloaded. as long as you got the program from here, there is no malware. source: if you got a program that is not the one that you got a problem with, you probably got a program that was "hacked" by someone. Q: How to restrict to a single file in a class with glob in python? I'm attempting to restrict the list within my class. I found this code below and tried to use it to restrict to a single file. However, it doesn't restrict to a single file. How can I fix this to restrict the variables to a single file? #Pull in relevant globals import glob class MainGlobals: @classmethod
