What is Direct Instruction?

Direct Instruction (DI) is a model for explicit teaching that emphasises well-developed and carefully planned lessons designed around small learning increments and clearly defined and prescribed teaching tasks. It is based on the theory that clear instruction eliminating misinterpretations can greatly improve and accelerate learning.

Its creators, Siegfried Engelmann and Dr. Wesley Becker, and their colleagues believe, and have proved, that correctly applied DI can improve academic performance as well as certain affective behaviours. It is currently in use in thousands of schools globally including the US, Canada, the UK and Australia. Schools using DI accept a vision that actually delivers many outcomes only promised by other models.

DI Programs – Over 40 Years of Research

DI Programs are based on years of research on how children learn and the most effective ways to teach. Project Follow Through, the largest educational experiment ever conducted, was the first large-scale documentation of DI's superiority. Since that time many studies in a wide variety of settings have shown that children who receive Direct Instruction have significantly higher achievement, make more rapid educational progress, and have higher levels of self-esteem than students in other programs. Studies also show that as their students' achievement increases, teachers who use Direct Instruction become more self-confident and assured of their professional abilities.

Studies involving DI curricula and its implementation have been conducted with a wide variety of populations, in different settings and within all subject areas related to the programs. As such, the volume of research on DI is expansive. The National Institute for Direct Instruction (NIFDI) makes this extensive research base more accessible to educators and researchers through a free online database of over 200 entries.
