

8 June 2005

To whom it may concern:

It is without hindrance and full contention that I take this opportunity to address you on behalf of Claire Campbell. Rare are the instances when one is graced with the opportunity to meet and interact with a character of such magnanimous and unique caliber; as is the character of Miss Campbell. It is her qualities of individuality, perceptiveness, and assiduousness to which I refer herein.

During the tenure of Claire's enrollment in my American Literature course at Princeton High School, NJ she has exhibited nothing short of outstanding and commendable effort as well as performance. Miss Campbell immediately struck me as an independent thinker who was not afraid to proclaim her ideas however equivocal they may be. Often she was a leader of class discussion, offering original thought as though it came to her at no price as well as delving into new subject matter or wherever her curiosity for deliberation directed the dialogue. This intellectual fecundity also presents itself within the expositions and narratives composed by Miss Campbell. Often Claire and I have worked together in concerns for her writing. Her personal honesty and conscientiousness have led her to search enlightenment both in the art of composition as well as the art of living. Her personal determination is an invaluable character trait that I have observed in Claire both via the setting of my classroom and through personal conversation. For this I admire her.

Claire Campbell demonstrates a determined, adept, and judicial nature that affords her ascendancy in her social, extracurricular, and academic spheres. I am confident that she will find, or rather create, success in all endeavors to which she may pursue, however challenging the enterprise may be. It is with great enthusiasm and esteem that I offer my word and my recommendation in regards to Miss Claire Campbell.

Respectfully,

William X. Braitsch
Teacher of English