IN IT TOGETHER

Technical glitches, floods, overruns and a bitter legal battle between Rand Merchant Bank (RMB) and farmers have changed into a model for public-private partnerships (PPP). A 155 km pipeline provides export fruit farmers in this fertile but drought-prone region between Blyde River Canyon and the Kruger National Park with an efficient and reliable water supply for the first time. This has boosted exports, attracted new farming ventures, including one of two R1 billion biofuel plants developed by the IDC. This will lead to substantial water savings that will be allocated to black farmers. Wildlife estates worth hundreds of millions of rand have also been developed. The total revenue from this scheme rose from R38 million in 1995 to R840 million in 2005.

It has demonstrated how private-sector investment and expertise can generate infrastructure that drives the economy of a region. In 1998 the National Water Act (36 of 1998) came into force, requiring redistribution of South Africa's water resources from white commercial to black emerging farmers. The so-called Blyde 800 was thus intended as a flagship agricultural empowerment project and its share of pipeline costs, running at R2,3 million per year, is covered by government. Problems occurred in the production of the pipeline, and RMB opted to take ownership and complete it with additional finance.
