

Live export is really cruel and causes a lot of suffering to the animals throughout the whole journey. It needs to be got rid of as soon as possible. None of this 'Oh we'll get rid of it in two or three years.' The government needs to stop it right now. The animals go through a bunch of problems that affect their well-being, like being in bad conditions during transportation, many of them dying, and getting mistreated in the countries they're sent to.

Some of the terrible issues with live export are that the animals aren't treated well before they start their journey. They have to be in cramped spaces where they can't rest or get enough food and water. The ships they're on have really rough conditions, which makes them sick and causes lots of them to die. They also have to deal with big changes in weather during the trip. Sometimes they even get rejected at the ports. And when they arrive in the other countries, they're treated badly and killed in a really inhumane way.

Once the animals get to where they're going, our government can't control what happens to them. We can't make sure they're killed in a humane way because the other countries don't follow our rules. They don't even stun the animals before they kill them, which is really bad. There's proof that they treat the animals in a really cruel way in those countries.

It's not just the animals that suffer from live export. It also harms the environment, makes the water dirty, and the people who work with the animals have bad conditions. Plus, it can make the people in the other countries sick.

If we have to export our meat, it would be better to kill the animals close to where they come from. That way, they won't have to go through a long journey and suffer so much. We should also focus on selling chilled and frozen meat instead of live animals. That would get rid of live export and save a bunch of animals from the awful fate they face now.
