To Whom It May Concern

Bringing about the end of live export is an overdue expectation which needs no further delay than has already been experienced. Discussed for years on the political field with no eventuation, it is time to stand by the word of countless politicians and speak for those who cannot speak. The industry has had decades to prepare with years of warning and incriminating expose's on national television. You're government has the opportunity now to end what should have ended after the abhorrent conditions in which thousands of sheep died on the Awassi Express in 2018. Live animal export should be phased out in as timely a manner as possible as every day of delay is more animals subjected to inhumane levels of suffering to which they were born to endure. The inability of sellers to ensure humane slaughtering practices alone should be enough to end the practice, let alone the suffering experienced during transport. Australia should follow the example of our neighbours to the south who banned live export with legislation coming into effect on 30/4/23.
