(valid outside marked and open slopes)

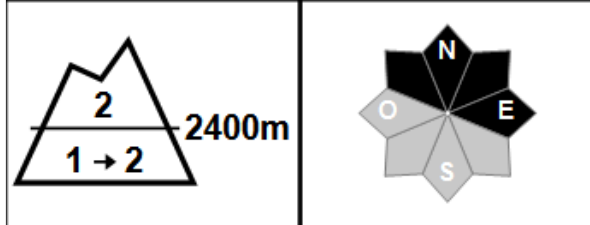

MASSIVE:CHABLAIS

written on Wednesday, March 24, 2021 at 4 p.m.

Risk estimate until Thursday, March 25, 2021 in the evening

Above 2400 m: Limited risk. Below: Low risk evolving into Limited risk.

Spontaneous departures: a few laps in the sun.

Triggers skiers: slabs formed by the north to northeast wind.

Risk indices: 5 very strong - 4 strong - 3 marked - 2 limited - 1 weak - In black: the most dangerous slopes

Snowpack stability

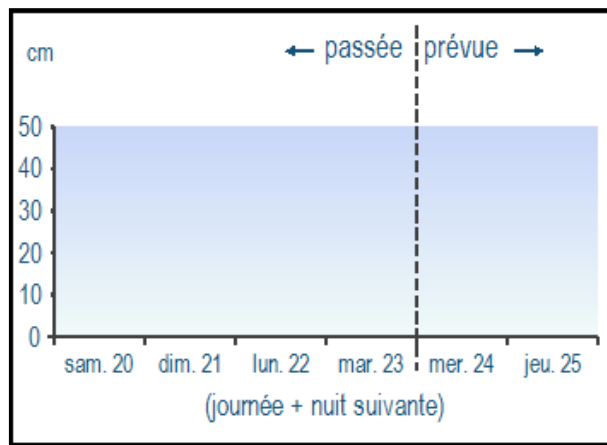

Bulletin written from reduced information.

Typical avalanche situation: windy snow, wet snow in the sun.

Spontaneous departures: some heavy snow surface flows possible Thursday when the sun has sufficiently humidified the snowpack, more rarely a larger avalanche carrying the snow to the ground.

Accidental triggering: a few slabs formed under the action of the North-East to North Bise, especially above 2400 m. Triggering by a skier seems quite difficult, but risks throwing off all the snow located above the layer of sand, which can represent breaks of 50/80 cm.

Fresh snow at 1800 m

Snow quality

Good snowfall for the season. You can put on the skis around 1200 m in the north and 1400 m in the south.

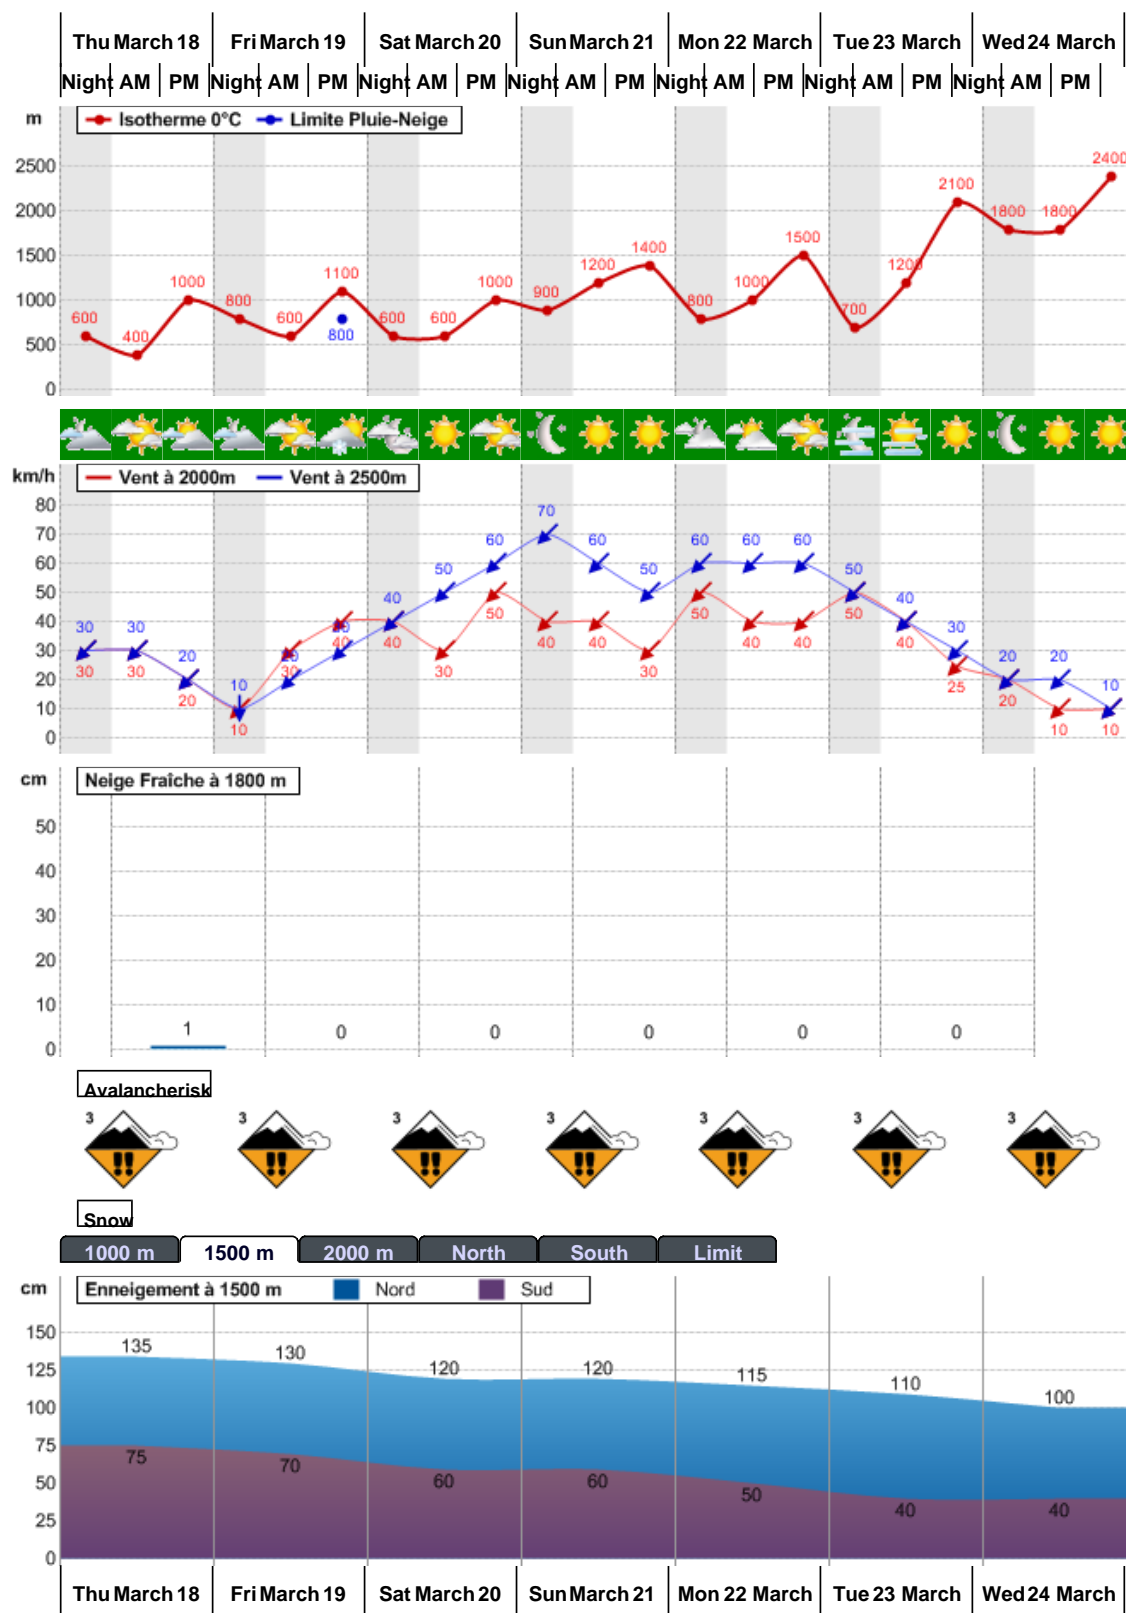

In the adrets, the snow is crusted on the surface and becomes humid during the day.

On the slopes in the shade, slightly crusted snow below 1500/1800 m. At higher altitudes, the snow is either more or less dense powdery, or compacted by the north to northeast wind.
