How dunking on Dawn Staley might win South Carolina a national championship even if she blocked it

Evan Gerike, Greenville News
March 23, 2024

COLUMBIA – Ashlyn Watkins probably isn't used to having her dunks blocked.

The sophomore forward went viral for a dunk earlier this season against Kentucky, but her attempt Saturday to dunk a balloon on South Carolina women's basketball coach Dawn Staley didn't quite go down before popping against a light.

Ahead of the No. 1 seed Gamecocks' second round NCAA Tournament matchup with No. 8 seed North Carolina (20-12) on Sunday (1 p.m., ABC) in Colonial Life Arena, South Carolina's locker room was loose, loud and full of balloons.

"It's who they are," Staley said. "A team will take on its own personality, and as much as coaches want to change that, that's who they're going to be. I didn't spend a whole lot of time trying to change that."

That's the type of environment the Gamecocks (33-0) have upheld all season, which led to Staley calling the locker room "day care" after they capped off a 29-0 regular season by beating Tennessee on March 3.

The Gamecocks messed around with balloons for most of the open locker room period in South Carolina's practice day between games on Saturday. Junior guard Bree Hall accidentally bought happy birthday balloons for South Carolina's senior day, so the Gamecocks didn't use them to decorate lockers. They blew them up Saturday instead to mess around.

The players tried to dunk on Staley, who said she blocked the shot.

"They try to get me to be the brunt of the joke, but not I," Staley said.

Staley said coaching a team as loose as this one is both refreshing and frustrating. The coaching staff tried to focus the players earlier in the season but stopped when they recognized it was the team's personality.

"They don't know when they're coming or going," Staley said. "For us, as a staff, we want them to just go, to be focused on the task at hand. The way they get to that point is hilarious to them and frustrating to us. Eventually they get to where we need them to be, they just take a longer route."

Staley said South Carolina doesn't lock in until the ball is tipped to start the game.

Despite any mounting outside pressure as a perfect season gets closer and closer, the loose environment shows the pressure inside the locker room hasn't built up.

"We just go out there and play our game knowing who we are and that we're going to get the dub at the end of the day," guard Te-Hina Paopao said after beating Tennessee to end the regular season. "It's no pressure at all. We just love to play with each other."

The Gamecocks will get senior center Kamilla Cardoso back for Sunday's game after she served a one-game suspension and are expected to return Hall, who missed Friday's game for precautionary reasons.

Cardoso said she watched South Carolina's win Friday against Presbyterian alone in the locker room, which was tough. The Gamecocks played two games this season while Cardoso was with Team Brazil in an Olympic qualifying event and two more while she rested in February.

"It was a little weird because I'm used to being out there with them," Cardoso said. "I was happy watching them because I think some players did some great things. ... We worked hard in case one player is missing, somebody else can step up, and that's what they did."

Women's March Madness favorite South Carolina eyes third title

Michael Voepel, ESPN.com
March 18, 2024

Now this feels familiar.

Dawn Staley and the South Carolina Gamecocks are the No. 1 overall seed heading into the women's NCAA tournament for the second consecutive season. They enter March Madness undefeated -- for the second year in a row -- and at 32-0 are the only remaining unbeaten Division I team in men's or women's college hoops. They are once again the betting favorite to win the championship.

How they got here is a different story entirely, and it just might help the Gamecocks win their third title in seven NCAA tournaments.

Several women's teams have been championship contenders in successive seasons, with star players leading the way. Think Chamique Holdsclaw (Tennessee Lady Vols, 1996-1998), Diana Taurasi (UConn Huskies 2002-2004), Candace Parker (Tennessee 2007-08), Maya Moore and Tina Charles (UConn 2009-10) and Breanna Stewart (UConn 2013-2016).

South Carolina is back on top this season after losing five starters, including 2023 WNBA No. 1 draft pick Aliyah Boston, and a top reserve from last year's team. How did the Gamecocks reload? Call it strategic planning by Staley, along with her ability to convince players to buy into future roles. That's harder to do in today's transfer portal world, where many players seek immediate individual success.

But Staley did it, and several players who accepted taking a back seat last season, are now driving the Gamecocks.

"This whole season has been learning lessons through winning," Staley said at the SEC tournament, where South Carolina won its eighth title. "We won a lot of basketball games, but there were a lot of things that we need to work on. This team has responded time in and time out."

The roadmap to getting a No. 1 seed for the fourth season in a row started well before South Carolina fell to Iowa in last season's national semifinals. That was an emotionally difficult loss for a program that had seemed so likely to repeat its 2022 national championship. With players such as Boston, Zia Cooke, Brea Beal, Victoria Saxton, Kierra Fletcher and Laeticia Amihere moving on, the Gamecocks lost the majority of their of experience and leadership.

Staley recruited in preparation for this. She knew there were talented younger players in place for 2023-24. She also got the perfect fit that South Carolina needed from the transfer portal: Guard Te-Hina Paopao added more 3-point shooting consistency, which had been an Achilles' heel in the loss to Iowa.

Yet even with so many of the correct pieces, South Carolina still had to live up to the challenge of being the powerhouse everyone expects. Over the summer, Staley had moments of doubt.

"Considering what it looked like in June ... like, early retirement," Staley said during College GameDay's visit to South Carolina on Feb. 18. "I was considering it. Seriously. Our team, where they were ... they really weren't in a good place. We lacked leadership. We lacked conditioning. We lacked discipline. But once you start forming your habits, they picked up on them fairly quickly.

"For the returners, they understood, but they were in a new situation themselves because they were the ones that were the examples for others. Now, they're the leaders."

Among South Carolina's top eight scorers this season, only three were in that position last year. The 2022-23 roles were much smaller for center Kamilla Cardoso, forward Ashlyn Watkins and guard Bree Hall: None of them started or averaged more than 19 minutes a game last season.

Now, Cardoso (14.0 PPG) and Hall (9.7 PPG) are starters, and Watkins (9.7 PPG) plays the most minutes among the reserves. Guard Raven Johnson (8.1 PPG, 4.9 APG) and forward Chloe Kitts (9.2 PPG, 6.0 RPG), both sophomores, have moved into starting roles. Paopao, who spent the previous three years at Oregon, came in as a starter.

Led by Paopao's 73 3-pointers as part of her 11.1 PPG average, the Gamecocks have made 207 shots from behind the arc thus far, vs. 163 last year.

The Gamecocks -- who were sixth in the AP preseason Top 25 but took over No. 1 by the season's second poll -- also have a strong freshmen class led by guards Milaysia Fulwiley (11.8 PPG) and Tessa Johnson (5.9 PPG).

"I'm super proud of our youngsters," Staley said after the SEC tournament final victory over LSU. "Their experience is a little bit different than when some of our experienced players were youngsters. They have to play for us.

"If you asked them if they saw themselves playing how they're playing today like three or four months ago, before the season, I'm sure they would say no. Their heads were spinning about the pace of play, about how we implement offenses and defenses, just the pace of what we need to learn. It took them a while to actually acclimate to that. They put in a lot of work to get to where they are."

The Gamecocks haven't lost a home game at Colonial Life Arena, where they will play the NCAA tournament early rounds, since December 2020. They haven't lost before the Sweet 16 of the NCAA tournament since 2013.

The closest they've come to losing this season came in the SEC tournament semifinals, when Cardoso's last-second, banked-in 3-pointer beat Tennessee 74-73. But even in that pressure-cooker, Staley was calm. The Gamecocks have proven themselves to their toughest critic.

"I felt it took a little longer than we wanted," Staley said about the concern she had during the off-season. "But if I knew it was going to turn out like this, I probably wouldn't have been as mad."

Does the 2023 Final Four loss to Iowa still haunt the Gamecocks? Not as much as it seems to motivate those who experienced it.

For the Gamecocks who didn't play in that game, they are totally in the moment in 2024. For the Gamecocks who did experience that heartbreak, this season has been about seeking a kind of redemption.

"I think all of us have flashbacks of last year," Johnson said. "We definitely don't want to lose. We want to keep winning."

MiLaysia Fulwiley and Tessa Johnson raised the bar for the Gamecocks

Chris Wellbaum, GamecockCentral.com
March 14, 2024

This season of women's basketball has been dubbed the "Year of the Freshman." For South Carolina, the SEC Tournament was the "Weekend of the Freshman."

MiLaysia Fulwiley has been grabbing headlines since her breathtaking debut in Paris and is usually included in discussions of this season's elite freshmen, but in Greenville, she proved she is more than just viral moments.

Tessa Johnson isn't a household name like Fulwiley and she is far less likely to go viral, but she proved last weekend that she can be the perfect glue player.

Let's rewind to late October.

Fulwiley was already making breathtaking plays and showing glimpses of Dawn Staley's hype that she is a generational talent. But she was also wildly inconsistent and a disinterested defender.

Johnson was struggling with the adjustment to college. She could shoot, though, and that was enough to get her playing time, even if Staley said Johnson's best defense was her offense (meaning she would have to outscore her opponent).

They went through growing pains. Johnson suffered a sprained ankle that set her back, and both had games in which they barely played. But they learned, and the most important lesson was about defense.

"If you would have saw (Fulwiley) two months ago, she really didn't get back in transition. She really got lost in half-court defense. She didn't put pressure on the ball," Staley said. "She can be an elite defender. At times she's an elite defender."

Fulwiley got a crucial steal and layup against Tennessee, and then successfully harassed LSU's Haily Van Lith in the championship game.

"Tessa is a big guard. I would say she probably lacked confidence in defense before she got here, especially when we started practicing. The emphasis that we put on it, she lacked confidence in it," Staley said. "The more and more she plays, the more and more she sees herself doing some great things out there on that side of the basketball, the more confidence she's gaining and the more times she's putting herself into position."

As a defender, Fulwiley is spectacularly quick and physical. Johnson relies on her size, wingspan, and footwork to be disruptive. But they both get steals – Fulwiley finished second on the team with 56 steals and Johnson was fifth with 21.

They also block shots. Fulwiley had 22, third on the team. Johnson got her first block against Tennessee. The block got lots of attention, but Staley wanted to talk about the rest of Johnson's game.

"Not only get a block, but she gets deflections, she's in great defensive position," Staley said. "I'd rather take all the other stuff in and around the blocked shot because that's going to be probably 95% of who she'll be on the defensive side of the ball."

"All the other stuff" included Johnson guarding Tennessee's Rickea Jackson, a likely top-five pick in the WNBA Draft. Johnson didn't just hold her own, she shut down Jackson in the first half. It was a huge confidence boost for Johnson.

"It means everything because I like to be challenged and the fact that I have her trust behind me, that's all I need," Johnson said. "I need her trust."

What Johnson and Fulwiley did on defense rounded out their performances. When South Carolina, including Fulwiley, had a poor first quarter against Texas A&M, Johnson steadied the ship. And when the Aggies made a third-quarter run, again it was Johnson who ended the threat.

Johnson scored 13 points against Texas A&M and averaged 8.3 points for the tournament. She showed she is more than a shooter, scoring on all three levels.

"I was just playing the game. My teammates did what they had to do," Johnson said. "The ball found me. I just shot it."

After a shaky quarterfinal performance where Fulwiley admitted she was nervous, she adopted the same mindset. She went from six points on 1-6 shooting on Friday to 13 points on 5-11 shooting on Saturday.

"I feel like I was just giving what the defense gave me, staying poised throughout the whole game," Fulwiley said. "I usually get speed up, so I just told myself that I was going to stay calm and stay poised today, and it worked out in my favor."

With her confidence back, Fulwiley exploded on Sunday. She had a career-high 24 points on 8-12 shooting, two assists, and two steals. It was the entire package, and it won her Tournament MVP honors.

"I feel like basketball is a confidence, that's the key to basketball," Fulwiley said. "I feel like my confidence is out the roof when I step on the court. Nobody can guard me, check me. It's really a mind thing. I just told myself that I have to lock in and play better."

The continued improvement from Fulwiley and Johnson makes South Carolina even more dangerous going into the NCAA Tournament.

"Our youngsters are doing a really great job," Staley said. "They give us a totally different look. They can attack the basket. They're floor spacers. Not a whole lot of people are probably putting them on their scouting report, so it gives us an opportunity to utilize them in a way which frees them up to do some things."

New-look, new-approach Gamecocks just keep winning

David Cloninger, Post & Courier
March 8, 2024

COLUMBIA — She tried to fight it. That's how she's built this program into one of the nation's elite, by doing things her way and never backing down.

But when it came to this edition of her South Carolina basketball team, she had to compromise. Dawn Staley couldn't ominously intone for her players to "learn a lesson from this". Where can a lesson be found when the Gamecocks are 29-0?

"A doctorate program ..." she began in describing the differences from last year's workmanlike locker room to this one, "and daycare. Our locker room sounds like daycare. It's so much talking, about nothing."

The laughs that erupted could have been silenced with one steely glare from the head woman in charge, but she let it go, much as she has with her team this season. They aren't bad kids; don't get the idea that the 10 ladies who play are malcontents or rebellious or anything other than a tremendously talented basketball team that likes to do things its way.

That's all fine, until the moment arrives when that way doesn't win, and that's when Staley can really implement her I-told-you-so routine. That's the way it's worked through 23 previous years as a head coach; sometimes it's early in the year, sometimes late, but it's always been there.

As win after win mounted this year, it became apparent that no matter how lousy the previous practice, no matter how many times the staff told the players that weren't on the floor to quit chattering on the sideline, that moment was getting further away.

"In the beginning of the season, we would just say, 'Be quiet!' Now it's just who they are," Staley said. "It's their identity. We really don't fight that battle. We just put our earplugs in."

Summertime blues

They came together for workouts in June knowing just how spoiled they were the last four years. Another tremendously talented group that never had to be told twice to do anything had piloted the Gamecocks to an immensely successful four-year period and they expected the same from the holdovers.

Yeah, no.

"We had some days, some practices, oh my God," recollected assistant coach Jolette Law. "As a staff, we'd come back upstairs and watch film to see what we can do better. Dawn was so frustrated, but as she said, 'We still got to coach them up. They do not know what they don't know.'"

The staff knew the team would be young and inexperienced, but talented. They recruited them. And the kids did listen and try to do what they were told.

But ... ugh.

"There were a lot of times we thought we could do some things, like add a different zone or a press, and ... no. We figured out that we just needed to simplify some things, to find out what we're good at," Law said. "This season has taught all of us: The word is, 'Simplify.'"

November got closer and Law was shaking her head. "I had to say, 'Coach, whose idea was it to start the season playing Notre Dame? And then we got Maryland?'" Law said. "Where we were, we had to pull each kid to the side and coach them individually."

Then came the epic trip to Paris to start the season against the Fighting Irish, Staley with a subtle warning to the public that this team was not last year's team. It wasn't going to show up and win on the strength of its name.

The Gamecocks won by 29.

Maryland and onward

USC trounced the Terrapins by 38. The blowouts kept coming, and between them, back-to-back road wins against North Carolina and Duke. The coaches were as pleased as they were befuddled.

How? How, with such inconsistency in practice?

"We've had a couple of those," guard Te-Hina Paopao said through a mischievous grin. "Those practices actually help us, because we know we didn't perform up to par. We know that we're gamers. We may not know how to practice or have a good practice, but we all know that we're going to lock in the game and know that we're going to help each other win."

It's the kind of thing that drives a coach crazy. You're trying to teach the kids something and they just can't quite get it ... and it doesn't matter.

"It was every day, we were concentrating on our defense. Dawn was all about, 'We got to stand on something.' Our defense has been a staple for years," Law said. "It was, 'We might need to continue to add ball-screen D. Add more help-zone. We tried a 2-3 zone for about a week and a half and then Dawn said, 'I don't like it. Let's scrap it.'"

That's been the season's story. Lots of trial, lots of error, but on the most important platform there is — the games — the Gamecocks are undefeated.

"I'm going to go with the flow. I'll fight it for a while, but when it's who they are, it's who they are," Staley said. "You have to figure out what we can actually integrate, what they're going to give us."

2023-24 SOUTH CAROLINA ATHLETICS - PRESS CLIPS

On mute

The national reaction to the Gamecocks' unbeaten regular season, for the second straight year despite a completely new starting five, has mostly been crickets. Staley has drawn recognition for at least one national coach of the year award, but major stories from national outlets have mostly gone unwritten.

"We're sort of used to it. I guess they'd say it's expected," said Law, who broke out one of Staley's favorite phrases — "South Carolina fatigue."

"If we do what we're continuing to do, they'll have to talk about us one day," she said.

Staley doesn't let the team run amok in practice, but it's been a daily process of finding out what she can do. She praised her team for always finding a way.

"We force them to play the way we need to play. It's just a constant talking. And I don't really think they can control themselves," Staley said. "But then they go out and perform. It's the craziest thing."

Raven Johnson has said that this year is "revenge season," to get back to the Final Four and take the two steps USC didn't last season. MiLaysia Fulwiley kept it as simple as the coaches' directions every day — "We just want to win," she said.

They have, playing 29 games and winning all. This weekend's SEC Tournament provides the chance to keep winning, and the last chance, if there should be one, to stub their toe and be able to make it up.

They're young. They talk about nothing so much, it's like a reboot of "Seinfeld." They win.

Can it last?

"They don't like to look bad. We don't let our foot off the gas when it comes to good habits," Staley said. "They find a way to win."

Sabreena Merchant, The Athletic
March 1, 2024

At the start of the season, South Carolina's coaching staff had some questions about the potential of their roster.

The preseason had been "a mess," in the words of coach Dawn Staley, and there was an internal feeling, at least according to newcomer Te-Hina Paopao, that being ranked sixth in the country was generous. It wasn't that the Gamecocks weren't talented enough, but rather that the roster was so new. No one knew what to expect, especially in the short term.

The defense wasn't the main concern. Players don't usually make it to South Carolina unless they can defend, and they certainly don't get minutes unless they're guarding. As associate coach Lisa Boyer says, "You've got to be able to make stops out there, you've got to be able to rebound, you've got to be able to put pressure on the ball for us." The high expectations are warranted: Per Her Hoop Stats, the Gamecocks have had a top-three defense each of the last five seasons.

It was the other end of the floor that prompted some doubt. South Carolina had four returners from the 2022-23 rotation, all of whom came off the bench. There were few certainties they could rely on, and that meant the coaching staff had to be open-minded about the direction of their new-look squad.

Four months later, with another SEC regular-season title in the books and an undefeated record still intact, those questions have been definitively answered. Through internal development, some changes in mentality and the arrival of one perfect transfer, the Gamecocks' offense has become a significant advantage for the best team in the country.

From the start of the season, when South Carolina dropped 100 points on Notre Dame, it's been apparent that these Gamecocks have firepower unlike that of previous iterations. They scored 100-plus in back-to-back games to start for the first time in program history and have reached triple digits six times. They've improved their overall offensive efficiency from a year ago while simultaneously improving the defense — again, when the baseline was already a team that finished the regular season undefeated.

One of the foundations of South Carolina's offense is speed. The coaches knew they'd have pace this season; that's a given at this program, where quickness often goes hand-in-hand with the defensive toolkit they look for in recruits. It was especially true with the returning trio of Kamilla Cardoso, Bree Hall and Raven Johnson and newcomer MiLaysia Fulwiley. All have the lateral mobility to cover ground on defense but are also fast end-to-end relative to their positions, enabling South Carolina to turn that defense into offense. The Gamecocks play about a quarter of their possessions in transition and unsurprisingly lead the country with 19.9 fast-break points per game.

South Carolina's pace doesn't just manifest itself in the open floor but also in half-court situations. Players are quick coming off ball screens and handoffs and cutting off the ball, which makes the defense have to work harder.

Another key ball mover is Cardoso, who is singularly another foundational offensive presence. South Carolina's cutting and screening wouldn't be nearly as impactful if the only players capable of delivering passes out of those actions were on the perimeter. Cardoso is a hub inside who can find her teammates from the paint. At 6-foot-7, she naturally draws defenses and creates openings all around her.

The threat of Cardoso's passing is amplified by her scoring ability. In her first two seasons in Columbia, she hadn't consistently demonstrated that scoring instinct, but flipping the switch was a point of emphasis during the offseason. "The first year came, we were screaming at her to stop passing because she was getting to the rim and she was just automatically passing it out," Boyer says. "That's been the transition with her with us because we want her to be more assertive scoring, and she's coming around with that."

Cardoso is now taking the most field-goal attempts per 40 minutes of her career — which has led to her highest scoring total — while also averaging her most assists. Opponents have to double her in the post, which leads to kick-outs for 3-pointers and dishes to cutters. They also stay attached to her in the high post, so she can find her teammates underneath the basket for high-low passes. Boyer credits Cardoso's time with the Brazilian national team for encouraging her to look for her shot, but whatever the cause, Cardoso's increased aggressiveness as a scorer has worked in concert with her intrinsic passing ability to produce a more complete offensive player.

The combination of speed and a dominant post isn't new to South Carolina, though; those elements have marked their rosters for years. To take the offense to another level, to make a team that already led the country in offensive rating (117.4 points per 100 possessions) become unguardable, the Gamecocks needed a knockdown shooter, ideally a movement shooter, one who could mimic Cardoso's gravitational pull on the perimeter.

South Carolina already was bringing in Tessa Johnson, a four-star freshman guard who has shot 43.8 percent on 3-pointers this season, albeit on two attempts per game. The Gamecocks also expected Raven Johnson, the new starting point guard, to take a step forward. After infamously being left open in the 2023 NCAA Tournament — the memory of Caitlin Clark waving her off on defense is hard to shake — Johnson was determined to enact "Raven's Revenge" this season. The redshirt sophomore worked on her shot tirelessly during the offseason, both with the Gamecocks and USA Basketball as a member of the 2023 AmeriCup team, and has elevated her 3-point percentage from 24.1 last season to 34.6 this season.

In time, one or both of the Johnsons could become that knockdown shooter. But neither was ready for the role this season. To fill that slot, the Gamecocks turned to Paopao. The senior guard was ready to join former Oregon assistant Mark Campbell at TCU out of the transfer portal when Staley interrupted those plans. Instead, her path took her farther east, where she has been the missing piece for the presumptive national title favorites.

"To be able to get Paopao was huge," Boyer says. "We really haven't had a shooter like that ever, really. We've had good shooters, but she's exceptional."

Not only did Paopao bring elite shooting ability to South Carolina but also experience. A three-year starter for the Ducks, Paopao had more starts in her career than the rest of the Gamecocks' starting lineup combined. In 2022, she had a game-tying 3-pointer at the end of regulation in the first round of the NCAA Tournament, a moment that was emblematic of everything South Carolina needed — on a big stage, one most of her teammates hadn't experienced personally, she made a critical 3-pointer, off of movement no less.

It's hard to imagine last season's Gamecocks ever losing if they had Paopao to pair with Aliyah Boston, and she's a critical part of this season's undefeated streak. When she's on the court, South Carolina's effective field-goal percentage improves by 3.3 percent. She can put up points in a flurry, like the consecutive 3s she hit (off screens) against North Carolina to take the lead in the SEC-ACC Challenge matchup, or scoring 10 in the third quarter to break open the game at Duke later that week. Against Kentucky on Sunday, she had a personal 9-0 run in less than a minute coming out of halftime.

Paopao leads all Power 5 conferences in 3-point shooting percentage (among players shooting at least three per game), demanding a defender at all times, just like Cardoso. With how well South Carolina moves the rock, there are too many holes to plug, and it's more often that the defense is actually springing leaks.

2023-24 SOUTH CAROLINA ATHLETICS - PRESS CLIPS

“It just opens up the floor really well for our posts, especially when we have a post player like Kamilla,” Paopao says about her shooting. “It just also gives the other guards an ability to shoot the ball with confidence, knowing that anyone can shoot the ball.”

Paopao’s influence on the other guards has been an unexpected benefit of her arrival. Boyer says her guard teammates have attempted to replicate Paopao’s work ethic and form, in the same way Chloe Kitts and Ashlyn Watkins have mimicked Cardoso’s passing inside. Having multiple threats encourages the Gamecocks to make the extra pass. They have posted their highest assist percentage since the 2014-15 season and their best assist-turnover ratio of the last 15 years.

“When you have a shooter like that, you have to put a defender on her, and when you put a defender on her, it pulls defenders off of other people,” Boyer says. “They’re really good at seeing each other on the perimeter. ... They’re keenly aware of where they are on the floor and they make the extra pass, and hopefully the extra pass gives them the extra time they need to get an efficient shot off. But (Paopao)’s work ethic is what I think she’s brought to the team. I think that she’s been a great role model that way.”

No matter South Carolina coaches’ questions about their roster when the team first assembled, the main characteristic shining through is its competitiveness when the ball is tipped. The new Gamecocks had big shoes to fill from the Freshies, and even if they fell short of that standard early in the process, they’ve met it consistently on game days. With the way they’re playing on both ends of the floor, they might be setting a new bar for future generations at South Carolina.

South Carolina Women's Basketball "Made It Clear" In Latest SEC Title Win

Alan Cole, GamecockScoop.com
February 22, 2024

Call it a way to save space or a coincidence, but there is one distinct pattern in the banners hanging from the rafters above the side of Colonial Life Arena opposite the benches.

You see eight lined up in a row. Seven commemorating SEC regular season championships — one for each — and then one banner tacked on the end with all the SEC Tournament titles crammed into one piece of cloth.

Make some more room.

No. 1 South Carolina women's basketball wrapped up its eighth regular season conference championship in 11 years with a 72-44 victory over Alabama. It is a staggering stat, even with how normal the celebrations have become in Columbia.

A program with zero conference titles prior to the 2013-14 season now has more than every other team in the league except Tennessee.

National Championships are the goal, and one South Carolina (26-0, 13-0 SEC) is more than within its rights to expect this year. Final Fours are program markers, status symbols of excellence and consistency to reach the ending destination of any given season. Conference tournament titles are unique. You cut a net, you get another ring, you get a taste of postseason action before the real thing.

But lost in the shuffle of everything a college basketball team can accomplish, there is the regular season title. The one which takes the longest to win, and requires the steadiest hand to attain. Even an NCAA Tournament run is only six games. A regular season title means coming out on top over 16 contests, finishing at the front of a 14-team pack.

There is a reason South Carolina chooses to mark each one individually, unlike its conference tournament triumphs.

"If there's a championship out there, we want to win," Staley said. "It's great, it really is great that this team has put us in this position this early. And I say early into the regular season, because it usually takes probably the last game. You're jockeying for position; you're looking over your shoulder. And they made it clear."

These Gamecocks — actually picked to finish second place pre-season, strange as it is to remember now — accepted a trophy from league commissioner Greg Sankey with three games to spare.

It is easy to feel like this is old news, played out or a "bigger fish to fry" type of night. Staley herself, even through the excitement, did not wear her championship hat into the post-game press conference like her players.

But for the "old" guard, this was new. Te-Hina Paopao is the most experienced player on the roster as a senior transfer from Oregon, but got her first taste of what a championship celebration can feel like as a senior. Sakima Walker had to play increased minutes with Kamilla Cardoso taking the night off, and she also won her first team accolade as a Gamecock.

Bree Hall has been a part of three regular season titles, but never one where she started every single game on the way. She scored the first two buckets of a sloppy first quarter and finished her night 6-of-9 shooting with 13 points.

"It's honestly a little different this time just knowing that I am more of a factor to it," Hall said. "I feel like previous years I wasn't really that main factor, so I didn't really feel like, 'Oh, I'm really getting this.' But now to go out there, and starting and really being a factor to the team, it just helps a lot."

She has done this before, but she also has not. Same for Cardoso, Ashlyn Watkins, Raven Johnson and Chloe Kitts, all bench players on last season's team who have soaked up starting minutes for the latest championship team. Taking what they learned from the most successful recruiting class in program history and adapting it into their own futures, something even they will admit took some soul-searching over the summer.

It is easy to become desensitized to it.

Until you remember five SEC programs have never won a regular season title, and two more have only done it once, and it opens a new perspective.

Half of the league has spent the better part of 40 years chasing or only winning one of what South Carolina now has eight of. The Gamecocks have long since graduated from any kind of underdog or surprise status, but the scale of this feat stands up.

A team of five new starters, five new players overall and two new assistant coaches did it again. Did it with almost a quarter of the conference schedule in their back pockets. Did it two games faster than even last year's team.

Did it with conviction.

"It was a new team," Watkins said. "Of course you expect the unexpected. We lost seven people, that's a lot of people to lose especially off a good team that we had. We didn't expect to be this good, but once we saw we were this good, we never looked back."

It will be number eight in the rafters, but the first one quite like this.

The driving force behind No. 1 Gamecocks' surprise success? 'Freedom,' Dawn Staley says

Payton Titus, The State
January 6, 2024

This South Carolina team is unlike any other in the Dawn Staley era.

High-powered offense, speed and perimeter shooting have propelled the Gamecocks to a perfect record through non-conference play (plus their SEC debut against Florida Thursday) and quelled concerns about their lack of experience.

The key to such success: freedom.

"They're creating something that we really haven't had because they've got the freedom to do what they want," Staley told The State. "They still have the knowledge of discipline and how we want to play, but they've got the creativeness to play how it makes them feel good in a certain style."

That certain style seems to be dominating. Through its first 13 games, the 2023-24 Gamecocks squad has assembled a net rating of 51.2 (which HerHoopStats defines as margin of victory per 100 possessions) — the best of any USC team under Staley's tutelage since HHS began tracking in 2009.

Losing "The Freshies" — two-time National Player of the Year Aliyah Boston, Zia Cooke, Brea Beal, Laeticia Amihere and Olivia Thompson (plus the graduation of 2022-23 starters Victaria Saxton and Kierra Fletcher) created a level of roster turnover unlike any Staley had experienced before.

She takes some of the blame for putting the program in that situation. Her staff brought in such a large, highly touted class with three Day 1 starters (Boston, Beal and Cooke) that managed to stay together for four years. It's an unheard of feat in the age of the transfer portal and one the sport won't likely witness again — at least any time soon.

SUCCESS WITH A NEW-LOOK ROSTER

When the 2023-24 team first came together in the summer, Staley felt transported back to 2008 — her first season as head coach of South Carolina women's basketball (which posted a 10-18 record). There was just so much newness, especially with the addition of three freshmen and two transfers. She didn't know where to start.

"You started with a blank canvas and allowed the players to shape it," Staley said. "(But) it was an odd shape. Then, same thing as Year 1 here, you had to start seeing what people are bringing to the table. And then you start molding and forming the shape of what you want.

"I do think we're still shaping it."

Staley is putting on a sculpting masterclass this season. While she has remained adamant that this is not a "rebuild year," the Gamecocks returned just 33.8% of minutes played and 33.5% of scoring from their 2022-23 roster. Contrary to most outsiders', and even Staley's expectations, USC is posting all-time scoring totals and margins of victory.

Through 13 games, the 2023-24 team ranks first among the last 15 South Carolina squads in points per game (90.8), margin of victory per game (39.8), offensive rating (117.6; defined as points scored per 100 possessions), net rating (51.2), pace (77; defined as possessions for each team per 40 minutes), rebounds per game (50.7), assists per game (20.3), steals per game (9.5), blocks per game (9.5), 3-point shooting percentage (41.4%) and made 3s per game (7.1).

Notre Dame coach Niele Ivey didn't hesitate to call South Carolina a Final Four team after their season opener in Paris. Maryland coach Brenda Frese went as far as to say this USC team is better than last year's, which played an undefeated regular season and fell 77-73 to Iowa in one of the NCAA Tournament national semifinals.

South Carolina maintained a perfect record through the non-conference schedule, including four victories against ranked opponents (then-No. 10 Notre Dame, then-No. 14 Maryland, No. 24 North Carolina and then-No. 11 Utah), which leads the country alongside No. 2 UCLA and No. 12 UConn. The Gamecocks have two more ranked teams on their schedule, as of the Week 9 AP Top 25 Poll: No. 7 LSU (Jan. 25 in Baton Rouge, Louisiana) and UConn (Feb. 11).

USC's 2018-19 team, the first after South Carolina legend A'ja Wilson graduated, went 24-10 and ended its season in the Sweet 16. The 2023-24 team has greater aspirations.

"My team goal is to win a national championship," junior guard Bree Hall said at SEC Media Day. "Get that getback."

SEC play begins Thursday night at Florida. After USC won its non-conference finale at East Carolina 73-36 Saturday, Staley said she believes her team's novelty has worn off.

Everyone knows the Gamecocks can play. Now it's about how they'll respond to their immediate success.

"Just keep living up to the challenge of who we're facing," Staley said post game. "Because we're facing people who are ready to play against us. They get amped up."

THESE GAMECOCKS ARE LEARNING BY DOING

The "Freshies" era USC teams knew exactly what Staley wanted them to do, how to do it and when to do it. Whatever she asked of them, she knew they could and would deliver. This year's team: "They're trying," Staley said, "but they're different."

Sophomore point guard Raven Johnson started three games last season — more than any other player on the current roster. Some athletes — like freshmen MiLaysia Fulwiley, Tessa Johnson and Sahnja Jah — are adjusting to college basketball in general. Others — like Oregon transfer Te-Hina Paopao, junior college transfer Sakima Walker and returners Johnson, Hall, Kamilla Cardoso, Ashlyn Watkins, Chloe Kitts and Sania Feagin — are adjusting to new roles with loftier expectations.

But they're all learning by doing. And Staley is giving them the space to do so — to a point.

"I like new mistakes," she said. "Old mistakes, they bother me. They eat at me."

Fulwiley embodies that mindset. The freshman played just three minutes (compared to her then-23.5 average) in USC's gritty 65-58 win Nov. 30 over No. 24 UNC because she kept losing her player on defense. But a few days later against Duke, Fulwiley finished the game for South Carolina, punctuating her impressive performance with a kickout pass to guard Hall for a 3-pointer to secure the 77-61 win.

“She really understands the process,” Staley said. “But when she’s complete, like, you think she’s pretty good right now. I think she’s pretty good right now. But when she’s able to play in between those magical moments that she makes in the game, that’s the meat and potatoes of basketball. It ain’t you wow us here, you wow us there. It’s in between those moments. When she’s able to play between those things, she’s gonna be a heck of a player.”

Kitts, too, has grown a lot since she enrolled early at South Carolina in December 2022. Staley hoped Kitts would be more game-ready when she got to Columbia, but two factors have contributed to her success over the last 12 months: being immersed in college basketball and her gold-medal performance with USA Basketball at the 2023 FIBA U19 Women’s World Cup over the summer. In December, Kitts led the team with 9.3 rebounds per game and averaged 11.8 points on 52.9% shooting.

Watkins is another example. She played 32 games last season averaging 10.7 minutes, 4.9 points, 3.1 rebounds, 0.8 blocks and 0.7 steals per game. This season she’s averaging 17.5 minutes, 9.1 points, 6.8 rebounds, three blocks and one steal per game.

“Complete 180,” Staley said, “but she hasn’t really scratched the surface in how good she’s going to be.”

“Greatness happens gradually,” Staley added. “Sometimes we don’t have the patience for it. You can’t see it as you’re going through it. But once you get there, you look back and you’re thinking, ‘I shouldn’t have complained so much through the process.’”

Staley’s players came to campus over the summer so out of shape that the staff couldn’t delve into refining their skillsets until trainers Molly Binetti and Craig Oates helped strengthen them. Staley also found she had a group of “gamers” on her hands, meaning these Gamecocks don’t practice like they play — a less-than-glowing review from a coach who takes pride in preparation and multi-page scouting reports for every opponent.

But, “they’ve conditioned us to say, ‘Tomorrow will be better,’” Staley said.

As one phase of the 2023-24 season fades into the next, Staley has finally reached her “happy place.” This team is not without flaws, but it has managed to cover them up well and proven itself capable of greatness.

Even with South Carolina's back against the wall, it doesn't sweat. It just wins ... and dances

Chantel Jennings, The Athletic
March 29, 2024

ALBANY, N.Y. — South Carolina was up 17, but it probably wouldn't have changed anything even if the Gamecocks had been up by only 2, because the “Macarena” was blaring through the arena's stereo system and center Kamilla Cardoso just couldn't help herself.

She put her right hand out and her left hand out, flipped each upside down and started the dance while laughing and making eye contact with guard Raven Johnson. Before long, Johnson and junior guard Bree Hall had joined the pseudo-dance party while the South Carolina players waited for the second half of their Sweet 16 game to start.

If there were ever a capsule of this team, perhaps this was it: joyful and loose, skilled and disciplined, driven and ... dancing?

At the beginning of March, weeks before the Gamecocks punched their ticket to the Elite Eight with a 79-75 win over Indiana, coach Dawn Staley had lightheartedly contrasted the differences between her current undefeated team's vibe and the squad that played the majority of minutes for South Carolina for the previous four years. That class, known best as “The Freshies,” went 129-9 over four years in Columbia, advanced to three Final Fours and won one national title. But, Staley explained, that group was a good bit different from her current team.

“I would probably equate it to a doctorate program, and they're going to get me for saying this,” Staley said with a chuckle, “and daycare.”

But even so, this group — daycare or not — has largely gotten the same results that have become the standard in Columbia. The Gamecocks ended the 2023-24 regular season undefeated for the second straight season. They won the SEC regular-season title for the third consecutive year and then marched to the conference tournament title for the second year in a row. They earned the No. 1 overall seed in the NCAA Tournament as the overwhelming favorite.

The results have remained the same, but everyone inside the program will acknowledge that the results are the only thing that hasn't changed.

“The shift has been something else,” Hall said. “It has been a lot more (relaxed). It's very youthful. ... You don't always have to have your white coat on and be in the graduate program all the time. You can just joke around all day with our team. However, when it is time to play, we are super locked in.”

The Gamecocks' opponents wouldn't disagree. Throughout the season, there has been a lurking inevitability about them. They're too good on both ends of the floor. They have too many weapons, too much depth. Their legs are too fresh. They've become a pick-your-poison problem between their inside game and perimeter shooters.

But even with all those qualities and attributes, it's this ability to stay loose and focused that has helped them weather the hardest parts of the season. In their top-10 matchup in Baton Rouge, La., the first time the Gamecocks were truly tested during the SEC slate, no one flinched when the Tigers controlled the first half. During the SEC tournament semifinals when South Carolina trailed Tennessee by 2 with a second remaining, no one stressed when the ball ultimately landed in the hands of Cardoso for a 3-point attempt.

And Friday night, when the Hoosiers just refused to go away in the Sweet 16 and kept making runs, South Carolina's steadiness never wavered. In the first quarter when the Gamecocks endured a three-minute stretch of going 0-for-5 from the floor and turned the ball over three times, they were relaxed. In the second quarter when they strung together multiple empty offensive possessions, they were loose. In the second half, as Indiana kept knocking down 3s and cut South Carolina's 22-point lead to just 4 points, Staley wasn't thrilled, but there wasn't a callback to the doctoral era of this program.

There was just a reminder of who this team is now. It is elite on its own terms, undefeated in its own right. What the Gamecocks have made of this season is uniquely theirs largely because of the personalities in their locker room.

Thursday, Staley had said that this season's team has made her “uncomfortably comfortable with how they approach the game,” but there was nothing about her or the coaching staff or the bench that looked uncomfortable as the minutes ticked down Friday and their season hung in the balance. When South Carolina was faced with an inbounds possession that could have been the separator between itself and Indiana, Staley felt at ease as the ball ended up in the hands of Johnson (even though she wasn't the first option).

From the right 3-point wing, and with the Gamecocks up just 2 points with under a minute remaining, Johnson lined up for a triple to give South Carolina a two-possession lead.

“I saw Raven's eyes when it was coming down the stretch,” Staley said. “I knew she wasn't going to let us lose.”

But for anyone watching South Carolina, its inevitability is as much in its eyes as in its demeanor. It's in the Gamecocks' dance moves, in their bench celebrations.

Call it a daycare, but if it is one, it's a daycare where the waitlist is years long because everyone wants their kid to attend, wants their kids to know whatever those kids know.

This season, South Carolina's offense rivals its long-established defensive identity. There is no easy way to beat the Gamecocks, and potentially, no way at all. But their secret is pretty obvious: South Carolina is loose. It's playing free. The basketball is beautiful, and the players are so clearly having a ball — and a dance party.

South Carolina's Final Four run continues, but this one feels different

Ben Pickman, The Athletic
March 31, 2024

ALBANY, N.Y. — Dawn Staley began her familiar ascent up the ladder positioned under the basket nearest to South Carolina's bench 30 minutes after the final buzzer sounded. She had hugged her assistant coaches in the waning moments of the Gamecocks' 70-58 win over Oregon State, then embarked on a celebration of a fourth consecutive Final Four. As she climbed, left foot, then right, she fist-pumped, danced, posed for pictures and eventually put a snipped net around her neck. Before touching back on the ground, she joked to the crowd around her, "Turn the cameras off before I fall."

Of course, she didn't stumble Sunday. Nor did her team. Not against the Beavers. And not against any of the 35 opponents the Gamecocks had faced before the Elite Eight. But just because South Carolina remains undefeated doesn't mean its victory was assumed. For those at its center, this year is different. In many ways, it's all new.

As Staley instructed, Sania Feagin held the Albany 1 Regional championship trophy as the Gamecocks posed for their team picture. "It was amazing to pick it up and know what it feels like," Feagin said. Through her first two seasons, the junior forward averaged less than eight minutes a game. Though still a role player, she is now a key contributor averaging 15 minutes a game off South Carolina's bench — the best reserves among tournament teams with 33.8 points per game.

Freshman star MiLaysia Fulwiley was the first South Carolina player up the ladder. Freshman guard Tessa Johnson, who scored a team-high 15 points, followed. When it was first-year Gamecocks assistant coach Winston Gandy's turn to collect his piece of twine, fellow assistant Khadijah Sessions yelled out, "Yeah, Winston. He's a winner now."

They all were; some crowned for the first time.

"I want their experience to be as special as the very first time that we've been able to cut down the nets to go to our first Final Four," Staley said. She's now heading to her sixth as a coach.

Staley, of course, didn't think that last year's Final Four run would be her program's final shot. Still, she said the loss to Iowa in the national semifinal shook her. "It rocked me because we had a team full of players who did all the right things," she said. "All the right things. Gave us no issues for four years."

That group was led by its seniors — namely Aliyah Boston, Laeticia Amihire, Zia Cooke and Brea Beal, who finished their careers 129-9 and each got selected in last year's WNBA Draft. Staley, who won the national title in 2022, reflected that last season's seniors carried a heavy load trying to repeat. The Gamecocks' victory over the Beavers won't make those former players feel any better about the legacy they left, of course. "But I know they're happy-proud of this group, and they're happy-proud of South Carolina," she said. They're also not strangers.

Bree Hall, a junior guard who started her first game this season, said she received advice from Boston the morning of the Elite Eight. The former Naismith Player of the Year told Hall to pray and encouraged Hall to not get flustered and to penetrate if her shot wasn't falling. Hall said she was antsy during South Carolina's Sweet 16 win over Indiana. Against Oregon State, she said, she felt calmer.

There were tense moments nevertheless. South Carolina led by only 4 points at halftime. And despite stretching its lead to 14 points with 1:43 to play in the third quarter, Oregon State had closed the gap to 4 with only 3:55 remaining. Still, the Gamecocks never crumbled. They've been prepared not to.

South Carolina ranked sixth in the preseason AP poll. And at halftime of its first game against Notre Dame, players had an epiphany in the locker room. Leading Notre Dame 49-32, "We looked at each other and were like, we can really do something with this team," said senior guard Te-Hina Paopao, who was playing in the WNIT with Oregon a year ago.

But the path to Cleveland involved overcoming stellar individual performances by opponents (such as Utah's Alissa Pili scoring 37 points on Dec. 10) and miracle heroics (senior Kamilla Cardoso making her first-career 3-pointer to prevail over Tennessee in the SEC semifinal). In the locker room after South Carolina's conference title game, Staley reminded players about the upcoming practice week.

During the second workout back, she got on them for being lackadaisical. For parts of two sessions, there had been sloppy passes and box-outs. Lots of laughter and not enough focus. Staley made them run. A lot. Baseline to baseline. "It was like a racetrack in there," redshirt sophomore guard Raven Johnson said. "We needed that because it's preparing us for these games."

Added Staley earlier this week: "They probably thought I was a little tight. It's not that I was tight, it was more so that I knew what was coming down the pipeline."

What followed were tough tests. South Carolina's average margin of victory is a nation-best 29.6. It beat Indiana by only 4 points, and its 12-point win over Oregon State was more competitive than the final score suggests.

Which is why she soaked in Sunday's celebration, inviting player families into the team picture, then taking photos with them separately. Signing towels, T-shirts and even a fan's pair of sneakers, rejoicing with the dozens who rushed to the lowest rows of MVP Arena. Forty-five minutes after the win, Staley was still taking selfies with fans, as the lone player or coach in the stadium bowl. She had taken so many that multiple team staffers started reminding fans: "Have your phones ready." The net was around Staley's neck throughout.

"Each time we get an opportunity to knock down some nets to go to the Final Four is really special," Staley said. "Because you don't know when it's going to be the last time that you'll do it."

Cardoso and Raven Johnson were part of South Carolina's two prior Final Four appearances. But both are now stars. They weren't newcomers but had moved into new roles. They were familiar with how to celebrate a regional title. Yet Cardoso said it still felt different. "Like we were able to do something and win," she said.

She and Johnson were the last two Gamecocks to bask under the court lights. They took selfies together. Johnson did confetti angels with the trophy on her stomach, savoring it all.

Payton Titus, The State
March 31, 2024

ALBANY, NY – Red, blue, orange, white and navy confetti fell on coach Dawn Staley’s head then spilled onto the floor.

Players crouched down, scooped up the excess pieces and threw them back in the air again, watching the colorful flecks of tissue paper float in the air through widened eyes. They made confetti angels and stored handfuls of it into their “Final Four” ball caps. They posed for photos, filmed TikTok dances and hugged just about every person inside the yellow security rope on the court at MVP Arena.

The Gamecocks celebrated with family, chosen and otherwise, after a 70-58 victory over Oregon State in the NCAA Tournament’s Elite Eight game. Behind their wide smiles and bright eyes, though, they’re already thinking about the task ahead. Yes, they’re Final Four bound again (for the fourth year in a row), but they didn’t come this far just to come this far.

They came here to win it all.

Two. More. Games.

“We don’t wanna get too excited, because last year we got too excited, and look what happened. Somebody hit us in the hole,” Raven Johnson, the nomenclator of this South Carolina team’s “revenge season,” said after Sunday’s regional finals game. “So we have unfinished business.”

“We’re trying to savor it,” sophomore Chloe Kitts said, “but we’re just so excited for the next step.”

They seemed to revel in the moment immediately after the buzzer sounded. After the players and assistant coaches finished cutting off their own pieces of the net, Staley climbed the ladder for her second “netlace” of the 2023-24 postseason. After pulling it off the orange hoop, she swung it in the air, with pieces of nylon flying around her like snow.

Most fans exited the arena after a while, but a dedicated, chosen few trickled down to the first rows of the lower bowl. They clamored South Carolina players for autographs and pictures, shouting for Te-Hina Paopao and MiLaysia Fulwiley by nickname. “Lay!” they cried. “Pao!”

Little girls in eclectic women’s basketball garb (one had a green Sue Bird Seattle Storm jersey on, while another wore a T-shirt she bought here in Albany for the regional) smiled as they looked on at the Gamecocks. But so did grown women, equally inspired, if not more, by the young women before them, regardless of stature or age.

Fulwiley gave her game shoes — “They were low-top Curry Flows,” Fulwiley said. “They were tough, though. They were brand new. Fresh and white and clean.” — to a young girl in the stands.

“That’s my dream,” Fulwiley said. “For people I look up to to just be nice. It doesn’t hurt us to be nice or to give it away. I just try to do what I can do. And it just makes their day because they probably paid a lot of money to go to the games.”

For first-year assistant coach Khadijah Sessions, who was part of South Carolina’s first Final Four team in 2015, Sunday was surreal. Reaching this threshold as a coach, she said, is sweeter. Knowing she played an instrumental role in pushing these players through to this point.

But she can recall, vividly, what it was like as a player to leave the Final Four without the national championship trophy.

“I don’t want to feel that way no more,” Sessions said. “So I’m gonna still be locked in, more than ever now. It’s a blessing. We’re gonna enjoy it. Twenty-four-hour rule coach Staley does, and we’re gonna get right back to work.”

Junior forward Sania Feagin has an 8:30 a.m. class Monday. In the throes of a regional finals celebration, she had trouble remembering the class’ name. She’s not sure where she’ll find the time to celebrate this win in the next 24 hours, in accordance with Staley’s rule. There’s her “student” responsibilities (“I mean, ‘student athlete,’ ‘student first,’ ” she said, smiling and shaking her head) — practice, laundry, packing for Cleveland, and then lift-off.

Center Kamilla Cardoso made the All-Regional Team with her best friend and point guard Raven Johnson. Cardoso earned the additional distinction of Most Outstanding Player. Ask her if that means anything, though, and she’ll shrug.

Four down. Two to go.

What's it like to be recruited by Dawn Staley? Brazilian steaks, samba dancing and stardom

Grace Raynor and Ben Pickman, The Athletic
March 22, 2024

Te-Hina Paopao's heart was set on transferring to TCU.

After Oregon missed the 2023 NCAA Tournament, she entered the transfer portal as a junior seeking change. Mark Campbell, a former Ducks assistant and the new Horned Frogs coach, had recruited Paopao to Oregon years earlier, and they thrived together before he left for another job after her freshman season. She thought she had a plan. A reunion was forthcoming.

But as Paopao was driving to an early morning class last spring, she received a call from her high school coach, Terri Bamford. "Hey, South Carolina wants to talk to you," Bamford told Paopao. "Dawn Staley wants to call you — like right now."

Paopao pulled over immediately to focus. "South Carolina? South Carolina? Dawn Staley? The best program in the nation wants to hit me up?" she replied. "Absolutely give them my number. You can tell them to call me right now."

For hundreds of recruits around the country, that's what happens when Staley reaches out. You stop what you're doing. You hit your car brakes and veer to the roadside. "I couldn't believe that I was on the phone with Dawn," Paopao said. "Dawn Staley of all people."

There is Dawn Staley, the South Carolina women's basketball head coach and winner of two national championships. The Naismith Hall of Fame player. The teacher, the leading advocate for Black women, the dancer (play Mary J. Blige and see what happens), the trash-talker. The fashionista whose sideline outfits — Louis Vuitton, Gucci, Balenciaga — are headlines in blog posts. The star in commercials for major brands.

But before her players experience the many facets of Staley, they first commit to learning from her (and her staff's) tutelage.

Her blueprint looks foolproof as top-rated high school recruits such A'ja Wilson (No. 1, 2014) and Aliyah Boston (No. 3, 2019) come to South Carolina, win national championships and graduate to become WNBA stars. Unsurprisingly, many of the most sought-after recruits (four of the top 11 in the 2019 class, three of the top four in the 2021 class) make their way to Columbia, where Staley has signed every top-35 rated in-state recruit since 2014. That includes incoming No. 2 recruit Joyce Edwards.

Ty Harris became an All-American and won a national championship at South Carolina (2016-2020). She committed to the Gamecocks largely because she was drawn to Staley's authenticity. Alisha Gray transferred to South Carolina before the 2015 season believing — knowing, really — that playing for Staley was her best chance to win a title. (She won one.) "I committed right away. I didn't even have to think about it," Gray said. Others join the Gamecocks for pro preparation, to learn from a former player and a Black female coach, or to build a culture. "She's a truth-teller," longtime Staley assistant coach Lisa Boyer said. "We are who we are, and you either like it or you don't."

Staley's approach is often central to players committing to her. The Staley recruiting experience, however, can be more involved than the mere phone call that sent Paopao and her family into ecstasy. Players for this season's top-seeded Gamecocks, who begin their NCAA Tournament quest to complete an undefeated season on Friday at 2 p.m. ET, know that. So do her former players at South Carolina and Temple, where Staley coached from 2000-2008.

"It's like winning the lottery," said Keisha Hunt, who coached Gamecocks center Kamilla Cardoso in high school and on the grassroots circuit. "It's a dream."

Consider the following tales from Staley's recruiting trail to explore how and why so many join Staley.

Steakhouses, jollof rice and samba dancing

So much has changed in the landscape of college recruiting since Staley arrived at South Carolina in 2008, but the official visit remains a crucial part of the experience for most top prospects. In addition to X's and O's, all successful coaches must know how to entertain in some capacity.

"You know when a school is really interested in you," Gray said. "If a school will go ... out of their way to do things for you, that just shows, they really want you."

Staley has that down.

She knew Zia Cooke's family was tight-knit and Cooke might be homesick if she chose to play so far from Toledo, Ohio. So on her official visit, Staley hosted an intimate cookout at her house for Cooke, who would return there many times as a player for Staley's signature burgers and salmon.

On Harris' visit, Staley took her and her family to Ruth's Chris Steak House. When Ashlyn Watkins, a McDonald's All-American and Columbia native, visited the Gamecocks on her official visit as the nation's No. 12 prospect in the Class of 2022, it didn't matter that she grew up as a local and had been familiar with the program since attending camps as a girl. Staley still pulled out all the stops — complete with laser tag and any type of food Watkins wanted. She picked Chinese.

Laeticia Amihere, a '23 South Carolina graduate and current forward with the Atlanta Dream, grew up in Canada but remembers Staley and her staff bringing in catering from a local African restaurant for her official visit as a nod to her father's Ghanaian and mother's Ivorian roots. They dined on jollof rice — a popular West African dish — as well as chicken, fish and plantains. "When you go away from home, it's kind of hard to get that homey feeling, whether it's food or even the people," Amihere said. "(It was) just a lot of stuff that my mom cooks, so I was definitely very happy."

And when Cardoso, who grew up in Brazil, visited South Carolina after transferring from Syracuse, Staley went even further.

In addition to serving Brazilian steaks, rice, beans and french fries, the Gamecocks had one more surprise for their future 6-foot-7 center. "We had a line-dancing day," Cardoso said, explaining that Staley brought in a samba teacher to dance the traditional Brazilian number with her. "It was really fun."

'Yeah, Mom. She's a pretty big deal'

Dee Alexander, ESPN's top recruit in the Class of 2025 and a two-time Ohio Ms. Basketball winner, is naturally reserved. Purcell Marian (Ohio) High School coach Jamar Mosley said she doesn't tell him every time she receives a call from a college coach.

2023-24 SOUTH CAROLINA ATHLETICS - PRESS CLIPS

“But when Dawn called her phone,” Mosley said, “she was pretty ecstatic about that phone call.”

Cooke, now a guard with the Los Angeles Sparks, remembers meeting Staley. She was playing in a grassroots tournament and had performed well, but didn't know that Staley would be sitting courtside. After the game, Cooke was telling her dad how much it would mean to her if South Carolina recruited her. That's when Staley tracked her down.

“When we were walking out, (Staley) was like, ‘You will be getting a call from me,’” Cooke said. “That was by far one of the best moments. ... A lot of people look up to her in so many different ways.”

When Amihere arrived on campus for her official visit, Staley took her and her family to Soda City Market — a staple in Columbia with food trucks and local goods. It didn't take long for fans to swarm Staley.

“I don't even know how she steps outside. ... It was hard to walk through (the market),” Amihere said, recalling that her parents were struck by how famous Staley was. “And I'm like, ... ‘Yeah, Mom. She's a pretty big deal.’”

It's a similar scene when Staley walks into a high school gym to watch a recruit play.

Will Eudy is the athletic director at Cardinal Newman School in Columbia, where Watkins played. He remembers coaches from nearly every major program walking through the doors to see her games — Notre Dame, Duke, Baylor, Texas, North Carolina and more. But when Staley and her assistants came through?

“Everybody understood when she was in the gym. It was another level,” he said. “It's a vibe when they walk in. It's totally different.”

“People were cheering, trying to take pictures,” Watkins said, “trying to come up to her.”

Staley sat in the front row to watch Watkins and was happy to sign every poster and smile for every photo asked of her, Eudy said.

Her star power helps others at South Carolina, too. In spring 2022, the Gamecocks football team needed help at wide receiver. When one of their targets, Corey Rucker, visited campus, coach Shane Beamer's recruiting department asked if it could do anything to make his visit more memorable. The one thing Rucker mentioned was meeting Staley. She invited him to her home and introduced her to her almost-as-famous pup, Champ.

“Whether it was Dawn Staley or Champ, people turned heads,” Amihere said. “Just to see her stardom and how much she means to South Carolina is insane.”

But even as her fame has grown, those who know Staley insist her humility hasn't changed. Eudy watched Staley sit through more than one Cardinal Newman blowout victory, just to show face with Watkins.

“How do you tell her no when she's sitting front row at a SCISA (South Carolina Independent School Association) high school basketball game and they're winning by 60?” he said. “This is what she's doing on Tuesday night.”

“It's kind of like getting an offer from (Steve) Spurrier or getting an offer from Dabo (Swinney) or getting an offer from (Nick) Saban. That's gonna be something cool when they come into your school.”

The ‘awe factor’

Staley was 29 years old in April 2000, when Temple hired the Philadelphia native as its head coach. Squarely in the prime of her playing career, that summer the Charlotte Sting's point guard was preparing for her second of three Olympics. Prior to her coaching debut that fall, Staley told the Philadelphia Daily News that the toughest part of coaching was “having to talk so much.” “I'm better at accomplishing things on my own instead of telling others how to do it,” she said. “But I'm getting better.”

Staley's accomplishments — two national Player of the Year honors at Virginia, three trips to the Final Four, an Olympic appearance and a budding WNBA career — were appealing to recruits, even if she was still finding her voice on the sideline. “I was very aware of who Coach was as a player,” said Cynthia Jordan, a member of Staley's first recruiting class. Jordan wanted to play in a city and help build a budding program, but learning from a pro like Staley was a draw, too. “This is the best point guard in the country,” she said. “There was an awe factor.”

As both a head coach and active WNBA player, Staley was different from most other coaches recruiting players. “There was a connectivity there, because the player is seeing their coach play,” said Boyer, who joined Staley's staff in 2002. “I think on the floor, when she was with Temple, she was a player's coach.” Or sometimes more literally a playing coach. Jordan recalls Staley competing against Temple players in a series of one-on-one games. “I'm not going on record to say how it all went down,” Jordan said when asked who won those contests.

Even after Staley's professional playing days ended in 2006, her credibility remained. When Staley arrived at South Carolina, she again needed to convince recruits to buy in to the change she sought to create. The Gamecocks had missed the NCAA Tournament five consecutive years (and made the field just twice since 1991). Tiffany Mitchell, a Charlotte native, grew up idolizing Staley from her time with the Sting. She later committed to South Carolina, helping lay the groundwork from 2012-2016.

Staley's on-court success still matters, even though fewer current players are as aware of her resumé specifics. When Amihere received her scholarship offer, she immediately researched more about Staley, diving into her playing career. “She's just an icon in women's sports, and in sports in general, because of her advocacy,” Amihere said.

‘She challenged me’

Paopao knew she would fit into South Carolina's offense. The Gamecocks needed a 3-point threat after shooting just 31 percent from beyond the arc last season, and Paopao, a 42.4-percent shooter from deep at Oregon in 2022-23, could certainly help.

Still, at the end of Paopao's visit to Columbia, Staley made no promises.

“She said, ‘You're gonna come in and compete. I'm not gonna give you any favors or none of that. You've just gotta come in here and compete for what you want to work for and become the player that you want. And if you're not on the court — that's your fault,’” Paopao recalled. “I thought that was so real. That resonated with me so much.”

She is a go-to deep threat, knocking down a career-high 47.1 percent of her 3-pointers this season, as South Carolina's overall long-range accuracy has risen nearly 9 percentage points.

2023-24 SOUTH CAROLINA ATHLETICS - PRESS CLIPS

It stands to reason that, of course, Staley knew Paopao could come in and make a significant impact. But playing at South Carolina is different than playing elsewhere, said Hunt, who coached Cardoso. Staley's recruits cannot fear competition.

"There's two types of athletes," Hunt said. "There's the ones that, they might be really, really great basketball players, but they don't want to go where there's seven, eight, nine really great basketball players."

And there's the ones who go to South Carolina.

"You're not gonna get the experience that those girls who choose to go to South Carolina are gonna get," Hunt said.

Like Paopao, Amihere remembers a blunt discussion with Staley during the recruiting process about expectations. During one phone conversation, Staley asked her "What can you do for us?" Amihere thought about her response for a second, then replied: "I want to attack the rim."

Staley went on to explain what they needed from Amihere and described what she thought Amihere could add to her game. "She challenged me," Amihere said. That appealed to the former five-star forward.

Staley doesn't hold back in practices when recruits are around, either. Harris remembers a session when Staley wasn't pleased with players. "She got so mad at us. She started yelling at us, saying stuff," Harris recalled. "(I was thinking), 'Hold on. We've got a recruit (here) now.' But they need to see that."

Her honesty is refreshing. Her standards remain high.

"When you hear South Carolina, it's like, 'Whoa. You play for the Gamecocks,'" Paopao said. "'You play for Dawn Staley.'"

Anonymous women's college basketball coaches dish on who's the best at in-game adjustments, game planning

The Athletic
March 19, 2024

NOTE: Below is the portions of the piece that featured South Carolina head coach Dawn Staley, not the entire piece. Full piece can be found at: <https://theathletic.com/5350753/2024/03/19/womens-college-basketball-best-game-plan-anonymous-poll/>

Over the last month, The Athletic connected with more than 35 head coaches across women's basketball to get their candid opinions on an array of topics from the changing tides in the sport to the best coaches in the game to the greatest women's college basketball player of all time. These coaches, who hail from power conferences and high mid-majors, were granted anonymity so they could speak openly without fear of retribution from their own programs or the NCAA. Throughout the week, we're sharing coaches' thoughts on the most pressing issues in their sport.

Head coaches' jobs are all-encompassing in college basketball. They have to recruit, and in the age of the portal, re-recruit. They have to scour opposing rosters to find players who would be suitable transfers. They work with athletic departments for appropriate facilities and accommodations. There's an entire ecosystem under their purview.

Of course, the most important part of their role is putting together the product that shows up on the court. That job is multi-faceted in and of itself. Beyond spearheading player development, coaches design the offensive schemes, the defensive game plans and make adjustments when necessary. This is the part that's easiest for their peers to evaluate because the results speak for themselves in games. It's hard to know what goes on behind the scenes at any program; within those 94 feet, everything is visible. These coaches will be leading their teams into the NCAA Tournament this week, where these points will be illustrated.

In the first of our series of polls, we wanted to get a sense of what coaches think of their colleagues' game-planning.

Which coach would you pick to design an offensive game plan for you?

Geno Auriemma, UConn – 4 votes
Jennie Baranczyk Oklahoma – 4 votes
Lisa Bluder, Iowa – 3 votes
Karl Smesko FGCU – 3 votes
Tara VanDerveer, Stanford – 3 votes

Which coach would you pick to design a defensive game plan for you?

Dawn Staley, South Carolina – 14 votes
Vic Schaefer, Texas – 5 votes
Scott Rueck, Oregon State – 3 votes
Jeff Walz, Louisville – 3 votes

As opposed to the offense, where there was minimal consensus, Staley ran away with the vote for best defensive coach. South Carolina has had the nation's best defensive rating each of the last three years, per Her Hoop Stats, and Staley's ability to coax that performance out of an entirely new rotation in 2023-24 is the latest feather in her cap. No matter who takes the court for the Gamecocks, the standard is established on defense: Either you defend your matchup, or you don't play.

In their words

"The intensity they play with — that's the foundation of their program and it comes from her."

"It's a mentality. She maximizes those student-athletes. You don't always have offense to lean on, but you always have defense to lean on, and she does a good job of game-planning and making adjustments with her defense. She uses everything she has. And she has an incredible basketball mind."

"Year in and year out, they have a high performing defensive team. I just think they know how to prepare for a team."

"Dawn Staley did a heck of a job with her defensive group this year. Even the time when Cardoso went out and they had all those other girls step in, I thought their system and their discipline of who they were didn't change a lot."

Which coach makes the best in-game adjustments?

Dawn Staley, South Carolina – 7 votes
Tara VanDerveer, Stanford – 4 votes
Jeff Walz, Louisville – 4 votes
Scott Rueck, Oregon State – 3 votes

The Gamecocks had the nation's best net rating – plus 40.9 points per 100 possessions, per CBB Analytics – but they weren't at their best at the start of the games. Their two best quarters were the second (plus-47.6) and the third (plus-40.6) during the regular season, as they showed an ability to adjust as the game progressed before letting go of the gas in the fourth.

Contests against North Carolina, Georgia, and LSU, among others, stand out as examples of South Carolina taking an early punch but battling back. A common fix is Te-Hina Paopao getting more involved on offense, but Staley has a variety of other tools to slow down opposing offenses and help her Gamecocks regain control. Each of the four times South Carolina has trailed at halftime, it has won the second half by double digits.

In their words

"Even though she has a lot of talented kids, she's not afraid to change based on who she's playing or within a game offense, defense, style of play."

"(When) they're down, or it's close at half a lot of times, and they just come back and come back and come back consistently. And that has to be some type of locker room conversation, some type of, hey, we need to make this tweak or this adjustment, or you need to do this based on how they're guarding, or you need to be ready to hit this play or hit this shot."

"The South Carolina machine is a whole different level than everybody right now. But do you know how hard it is to get a bunch of All-Americans to be team players and play elite defense and compete? It's incredible what she's doing. Very few people have the gift to attract that level of talent, and then also get them to play hard and buy-in and be a machine."

Presbyterian coach shouts out USC's Dawn Staley for classy pregame gesture

Chapel Fowler, The State
March 23, 2024

Dawn Staley could have said no.

That's what Presbyterian coach Alaura Sharp kept reiterating to her team Tuesday night after Staley — the two-time national champion coach of the undefeated South Carolina women's basketball team — took time out of her schedule to help make Presbyterian's 2024 NCAA Tournament stay a little more unforgettable.

Three days before No. 1 overall seed USC cruised past No. 16 Presbyterian, 91-39, in a first-round NCAA Tournament game, Staley surprised the Blue Hose by meeting them at their team hotel and spending time with them ahead of their First Four game Wednesday in Columbia.

She did so at the request of Sharp, whose team was making its first NCAA Tournament appearance after winning the Big South championship.

And after the Gamecocks routed the Blue Hose by 52 points Friday, Sharp praised Staley for what she described as a classy — and certainly not required — pregame gesture for her squad, which entered the game as a 54.5-point betting underdog.

"I made sure to tell them she didn't have to come by," Sharp said. "She didn't have to do that. But she knows that she has a platform and how people feel about her. I just think that shows why she is who she is. She's a good person. And I appreciate her investing in our program."

Presbyterian College, a small private school in Clinton, South Carolina, roughly an hour west of Columbia, is one of the smallest Division I schools in the country, with an enrollment of just under 1,000 students. The Blue Hose lost a game to USC by 70 points earlier this year.

But PC made its way into the Big Dance by winning three straight games in the Big South conference tournament two weekends ago and scored a spot in the NCAA women's First Four against Sacred Heart, another No. 16 seed and automatic bid, at Colonial Life Arena.

Once the field was set, Sharp and her staff reached out to gauge Staley's willingness and availability to meet with the team ahead of their First Four game Wednesday.

Staley — who's often gone viral for her displays of sportsmanship and kindness toward opponents, including footing a $5,000 dinner tab for Norfolk State during last year's tournament and calling a timeout to assist an injured UCLA player — was happy to oblige.

"They requested it ... and if they want to meet me, I'm gonna make it possible for them to meet me," Staley said postgame, acknowledging it could have felt like a big (or slightly awkward) ask for PC. "I think it's important for us, even if they just know some of the history of our game. I think that was really important. And I'm all for making sure our history is in a great place."

A 'REALLY COOL' MEETING

Once Staley's visit was confirmed, Sharp said she and her staff started teasing a surprise visitor to the team hotel Tuesday night. The coach got a kick out of her players' guesses: Someone said former President Barack Obama, since he'd picked the Blue Hose to win their First Four game in his annual women's bracket, and another guessed it was North Carolina rap legend J. Cole.

And when Staley ultimately popped up?

"I watched the video of their reaction when she walked in probably 12 times because I wanted to see each person and how they reacted," Sharp said, laughing. "I mean, their faces, it just shows what she means to everyone that's either coaching or involved in the women's game. Our players were excited."

Asked about Staley's surprise visit, Presbyterian center Bryanna Brady was honest. The team wasn't just excited. They were starstruck.

"She was like, 'Hi guys,' and we were like, 'Uhhhh,'" Brady said, imitating a deadpan, nervously excited face at the podium. "We were stuck. And she said hi again, and then we kind of broke that barrier that we were stuck in. But it was so cool."

Brady, a senior forward from Arizona, said Staley congratulated the Presbyterian team on its record-breaking season and let the team pick her brain on various topics.

"I appreciate her taking her time to come out there," Brady said. "It was really cool for me. I mean, you look up to people like her as you go through this process. ... We're all in the basketball world and the women's basketball world, and it's really exciting to meet somebody who's doing such great things on that side." A dded PC's Tilda Sjökvist, a sophomore guard from Sweden: "She's changing women's basketball. And like we've said before, women's basketball is growing. She's definitely one of (the people) who make women's basketball grow."

Staley — who told the Dan Patrick Show she had a similar meeting with the Sacred Heart team staying in Columbia ahead of the First Four — said it was a pleasant visit and a laid-back conversation.

"We talked more about me being on 'The Martin Show' than actually basketball," Staley said, laughing.

Presbyterian ended up winning its first NCAA Tournament game in program history the next night, beating Sacred Heart 49-42 in the First Four.

The Blue Hose didn't have nearly as much luck in Friday's 91-39 loss, which was more or less an expected result for USC, which moved to 33-0 and into a second-round matchup Sunday against No. 8 seed North Carolina.

But after Staley's classy gesture, the Gamecocks have a new group of fans in nearby Clinton as they continue a journey they hope ends with a 2024 national championship.

"I'm rooting for South Carolina this tournament," Sjökvist said.

For Her Players, Dawn Staley Is a Basketball Coach and Much More

Liz Robbins, New York Times
March 6, 2024

As coach of the University of South Carolina women's top-ranked basketball team, Dawn Staley is a dynamic leader at a time of surging global popularity in women's sports. At 53, she is a Hall of Fame point guard who guided the United States to three Olympic gold medals as a player and one as a coach. And in her 16th year at South Carolina, Coach Staley just led the team to its second straight undefeated regular season. Now she seeks her third national collegiate title. A proud Philadelphia native, Coach Staley is an outspoken advocate for gender and racial equity in sports and beyond.

Her secret to guiding young people today? Honesty and discipline, lessons she learned from her mother.

You make statements with your coaching wardrobe, and a hoodie you recently wore declared, "Everyone watches women's sports." What's different now?

I just feel like there's more access to our game. There's more demand. I think it's OK to tell the stories of our game and people in our game. I hope it's not a fad. I don't think it is. Because the fabric of our game is strong. It's bursting at the seams right now on all levels, not just collegiately, but the W.N.B.A., even high school. Younger girls have grown up on the W.N.B.A., and during my time in college, we didn't have that. We'll get a big bump when the Olympics roll around.

For the first time, there's going to be the same number of female athletes as male athletes at the Olympics. Are you amazed it took that long?

No. I'm not. I think we have been held back, intentionally, and the numbers and the demand today prove that.

Have you ever caught yourself saying "back in my day" to your players?

No! They had no idea what my day looked like.

Do they care?

No. This is all about them. It really is OK; I get it. I'm so used to it. So this is all about me meeting them where they are. It changes every day.

The best leaders are the best communicators. How have you adapted your communication style over the decades?

I think I'm very consistent with who I am. As a young person, I didn't really talk. I was the youngest of five kids, so I sat back and observed. Once I got older, I started figuring out the things that have to be said. I govern my life, being a leader, a coach, a colleague, on how something looks, feels and sounds. If something looks or sounds or feels wrong, I'm going to say something. I can't not say anything. And then the same, if something looks, sounds or feels great, like, I give it the same energy the other way.

Enforcing discipline is central to your leadership. Did you get that from your mother, Estelle?

Absolutely. I am more like my mother. As a youngster, I loved her, but I didn't like her because she was very strict. And it's hard for young people to see what your parents are trying to shield you from.

How do you approach your leadership beyond the basketball court?

If young people come to play for you, you have to give them your all, give them their wants and needs. One of my former players, when she was on her official visit here, her mother was a little skeptical about South Carolina. If you look at the history books, you get a not-so-pleasant picture. Until you come visit. And then at the end of her visit, the mother actually said something that no other parent has said to me. But it's the very thing that guides me, that allows me to have the stamina, that allows me to meet young people where they are and try to take them where they want to go. She said to me, "I give you my child."

Whether I have to love them or show them a little bit of tough love along the journey, ultimately I keep that line in perspective.

You are always generous in sharing credit. After your two national championships, you mailed snippets of the net to other young Black coaches. Why?

I feel like I've been put in the position where I owe basketball. So I'm really trying to repay my debt. I want people to feel what I feel about basketball. The people that I meet in men's and women's basketball, they tell me what I mean to them and what I mean to the game. I'm inspired by their aspirations.

Besides winning another championship, what aspirations do you have left?

I want to be the best dream merchant I can be. That's it, simply. I want all my players to check off all of their goals. I want our assistant coaches, if they want to be head coaches, to check off their goals. I don't have a want for anything. Well, actually, I've got one want. I want to go in the Hall of Fame as a coach.

Why is that so important to you?

Because you're amongst the best. And that means you've impacted lives.

The Phoenix Club of Philadelphia sponsors the annual Dawn Staley Award for the best female guard in Division I. Caitlin Clark, who just passed Pete Maravich to set the N.C.A.A. career scoring record, has won it three years in a row. How do you feel about that, especially after Clark's Iowa team eliminated yours last year?

Well, I get a vote! In her first year, nobody was giving her the credit. But Caitlin was throwing these numbers from year one. And you know, I like to do things differently. I almost like to go against the mainstream and find young people who are doing things quietly and aren't getting the publicity that they deserve.

So you knew. You had it first.

Absolutely. It's not hard to see. She's a generational talent.

How Dawn Staley built a pipeline from South Carolina women’s basketball to WNBA success

Emily Adams, Greenville News
August 17, 2023

COLUMBIA — Zia Cooke will always think of the 2023 WNBA Draft as the best day of her life.

When the future All-American signed with South Carolina women’s basketball in 2019, getting to the WNBA was her singular focus. Coach Dawn Staley knew it, and she immediately began to leverage that ultimate goal in Cooke’s training.

“You utilize the fact that they want to be pros, and well, if you want to be a pro then these habits are the ones your need to develop really quickly,” Staley said. “They don’t get it the first or second year, but they usually get it ... and now it’s just a matter of letting their habits do their thing.”

Hardly a month after she was drafted by the Los Angeles Sparks, Cooke had a career performance in her first WNBA game against the Phoenix Mercury. She scored 14 points in 15 minutes off the bench, shooting 83% from the field and a perfect 2-of-2 from 3-point range. Staley sat courtside at that game to celebrate the return of Brittney Griner after her detention in Russia, and getting to share in Cooke’s shining pro debut was a pleasant bonus.

“It was amazing to have her there, and to able to put on a performance the way I did with her in the building felt even better,” Cooke said. “Since then I’ve had my times where I’ve been down, and she was the person I call to lift me up ... She has a whole team that she can worry about, but anytime I call (she’s) there for me and I appreciate it.”

Dawn Staley players on WNBA rosters

There are 55 NCAA institutions represented across the 144 athletes on WNBA rosters, but only three schools have at least 10 active players in the league. Unsurprisingly, Geno Auriemma and UConn lead the way with 16, while South Carolina is tied with Notre Dame for second place with 10.

What stands out about Staley’s group is its recent growth. Of Auriemma’s 16 alumni, four entered the league in the last three seasons, and the group averages four years of experience. None of Notre Dame’s players have less than four years of experience, and they average nearly six years in the league.

Four of South Carolina’s 10 alumni are rookies, and three others have entered the league in the last four years. Only two, Tiffany Mitchell and Allisha Gray, have played more than five seasons — seven and six, respectively.

The Gamecocks are outpacing the rest of the SEC in producing WNBA players — though it’s notable that LSU coach Kim Mulkey has seven from her 21 years at Baylor. The second highest-producing program is Tennessee with six active players, followed by Mississippi State with two and Auburn, Kentucky, Missouri, Ole Miss and Texas A&M at one apiece.

Dawn Staley got A’ja Wilson, Aliyah Boston ready for instant WNBA impact

Cooke vividly remembers a meeting with Staley and her father Stratman during her sophomore season at South Carolina. At the time, the topic surprised Cooke: Staley thought she was working too hard.

“When my shots weren’t going in or I felt like I was having bad games, I would just go to the gym and pound it, and that ended up hurting me instead of helping me,” Cooke said. “She sat me and my dad down and was telling us both ... she’s in the gym when she should have been relaxing or watching film. At the pro level, listening to your body is one of the most important things you have to do, especially if you want to play for a long time.”

Of the five South Carolina players selected in the 2023 WNBA Draft, four made rosters and two have already earned multiple starts. Aliyah Boston, the overwhelming favorite to win Rookie of the Year, is the only player in the league shooting above 60% from the field and is averaging a near double-double for the Indiana Fever at 14.8 points and 8.2 rebounds per game.

For Staley, WNBA readiness is all about preparing players for the challenges of the professional level beyond the actual competition.

“The things that most young people are worried about going into training camp, our players aren’t worried about,” Staley said. “They’re not worried about conditioning. They’re not worried about nutrition. They’re only worried about, conceptually, what are they running? So they’re just in the process of ‘its basketball’ at that point.”

2023-24 SOUTH CAROLINA ATHLETICS - PRESS CLIPS

A smooth transition is nothing new for Staley-coached players. Las Vegas Aces star A'ja Wilson, the No. 1 overall pick in the 2018 draft, was Rookie of the Year and named an All-Star in her first season. Gray also won Rookie of the Year in 2017, and Mitchell was an All-Rookie selection in 2016.

"I remember when when I scored my first legit basket (in the WNBA), I was like ooh, OK I can still get to the basket. It was pretty cool to see that I could translate well ... and I think that preparation came from Coach Staley," Wilson said. "Maybe not necessarily what she walks us through with X's and O's, but more so about the mentality of how to approach the league and just how to just go out there and do exactly your job."

Fever coach Christie Sides, who drafted both Boston and South Carolina teammate Victoria Saxton in 2023, said she saw firsthand the way Staley prepared her athletes while scouting the draft class at Gamecocks practices.

"I've seen a couple of their practices over the last couple of years, and it looks like a pro practice at times the way they're moving," Sides said. "(Boston and Saxton) play at a level, if I'm asking them to go at a 10 they're giving me a 10 or right under because that's just something that's been instilled in them ... It's really incredible their competitiveness, how they can turn it on when they're supposed to and turn it off to be great teammates right after."

Dawn Staley has WNBA advantage as South Carolina coach

Across 69 Power Five programs, only eight coaches played in the WNBA, and Staley was by far the most successful of the group. She was a six-time WNBA All-Star over her 12 seasons in the league, tied with Duke coach Kara Lawson for the longest professional career. Lawson is the only other active coach who earned All-Star honors in the WNBA, once in 2007.

When Cooke went through the recruiting process as the No. 4 prospect in the class of 2019, Staley's own success as a professional was a huge point in the Gamecocks' favor.

"When I got to South Carolina, a lot of people talked about how close Coach Staley was connected with the WNBA and knew a lot of people, but I didn't worry too much about that," Cooke said. "With her already playing in the W, being the USA coach and a USA player, all the accomplishments she had ... I just felt like it was only right to start my college career with her."

Though it's been nearly two decades since Staley's playing days, she still has a unique understanding of the demands that players face in the WNBA. She also spends plenty of time around the league: Staley is a season-ticket holder for the Atlanta Dream, and the WNBA annually presents the Dawn Staley Community Leadership Award in her honor.

"I texted her a few days into training camp and I was like thank you so much for preparing me," Cooke said. "Usually the rookie is the person holding up drills and making things go slower, but that wasn't the case because a lot of the things I was learning I already knew. They put their own spin on things, but the concept is the same, and I wouldn't be able to learn as fast if it wasn't for what I was taught in college."

Dawn Staley's impact at South Carolina goes beyond wins and SEC championships

Payton Titus, The State
February 22, 2024

As the game clock trickled down toward double zeroes Thursday night, coach Dawn Staley and her Gamecocks inched toward history.

South Carolina's 72-44 victory over Alabama marked Staley's 600th career win and clinched the Gamecocks' eighth regular-season SEC title under her tutelage. Only Tennessee (18) has more.

"People picked us second, and that was a generous second just from our past success," Staley said last Sunday about preseason SEC predictions while reflecting on what winning the league with her 2023-24 squad would mean. "But this team has done some great things. And they're young, they're still figuring it out. But they're finding a way to win.

"... I'm proud of them."

When Staley came to South Carolina 16 years ago, she too was "young" and "still figuring it out."

Naively, she thought she could find success by approaching her new Power Five job the same way as her mid-major coaching assignment at Temple: foster intensity with intensity. When met with resistance, Staley had to pivot.

With more power, a bigger budget and recruiting trail respect came more nuanced responsibility.

Staley won 10 regular-season (including two SEC) games her first season at USC. Her team went 14-15 in Year 2. The Gamecocks got over the .500 hump in Year 3, finishing with a 18-15 record. Year 4 marked the first NCAA Tournament appearance of her tenure, fighting all the way to the Sweet 16. The Gamecocks have made every NCAA Tournament since, including five Final Fours and two national championships.

Even in light of her latest milestone, Staley is far from nostalgic. So much so that she flubbed the year of her first SEC regular-season championship during the trophy presentation Thursday at Colonial Life Arena (mistakenly saying 2013 instead of 2014, prompting a few of her players to point to the corresponding banner in front of them for reference). She doesn't have time for nostalgia, not with this team.

"This team keeps me present," Staley said. "Like, how do we as coaches not get in the way but also continue to coach them up so they could play the right way? I think we're always in the way, honestly. I think we're always in the way because we really can't take our foot off the gas with them.

"They're so young, they're so free. They're free, and sometimes free is wrong. ... Sometimes it looks great and other times it's just flat-out wrong. And the wrong part is what keeps us up. It keeps us always on edge to see if this is going to be the team that we started out being in June. We're still trying to look for that June team. And they find a way to the play above that time and time again."

When USC set a record for consecutive SEC regular-season wins (43) last Sunday with a 70-56 victory over Georgia, Bulldogs coach Katie Abrahamson-Henderson spoke kindly of the dynasty Staley has created in Columbia.

"She's built it the right way," Abrahamson-Henderson said, "kind of the old school way where you recruit, and you build players, and people stay for years. She has kids staying for four years. Nowadays it's the portal. Now us new coaches, we're gonna have to recruit like that to even catch up with her. ... The atmosphere is wonderful, and she's doing wonders for women's basketball.

"So hopefully she'll stay in it for a long time because she'll break a lot more records than what she's done today."

South Carolina (26-0, 13-0 SEC) is the only remaining undefeated team in all of college basketball. In a season of unexpected but undeniable success (after losing all five 2022-23 starters), opposing coaches have taken the opportunity to give Staley kudos.

Mississippi State's Sam Purcell called South Carolina women's basketball "the bar." He said his aim is to build something of the like in Starkville.

Vanderbilt coach Shea Ralph said she wishes to do the same in Nashville, explaining how Staley has inspired her in her basketball pursuits for decades.

"I just, from a young age, really respected her approach to basketball," Ralph said, reminiscing on watching Staley since her college point guard days at Virginia. "She was representation for me. ... She's a representation, as is her team and her program, of what you can accomplish if you work really hard, if you do the right things."

Ralph's 5-year-old daughter, Maysen, traveled with her parents to Colonial Life Arena for the game, which was sold out. The environment inspired her so much that she said, "Mommy, I want to play for the Cockadoodles!" Ralph chuckled as she remembered their conversation.

Staley has cultivated a world for little girls to see themselves in and strive toward greatness.

"Dawn has defined what is possible in our sport," Ralph added, "both as a player and a coach."

How Winston Gandy's love for basketball and authentic people led him to South Carolina

Payton Titus, The State
August 5, 2023

Shatori Walker-Kimbrough “would take a bullet” for Winston Gandy.

“I am nowhere near a professional or even the person I am today without him,” she said. “I want to start with that.”

Walker-Kimbrough plays for the Washington Mystics of the WNBA. Before winning a championship in D.C. or being named to the league's All-Rookie team in 2017, she was a 2013 summer enrollee at Maryland, and Gandy was the Terrapins' director of recruiting development.

By investing so much of his time, Gandy got to know Shatori the person and basketball player. He challenged her, pushing past her youthful hubris and hardheadedness. He taught Walker-Kimbrough how to break down film, guiding her along the path from talented young guard to an educated basketball mind.

Gandy has since served as coordinator of player development with the NBA's Washington Wizards (2014-17) followed by stints as an assistant coach at Rice (2017-20) and Duke (2020-23). South Carolina announced him as an addition to Dawn Staley's staff in April.

Gandy's entire coaching career has been guided by his love for basketball — and people. Surrounding himself with genuine people and helping to develop those around him has always been his motivation.

“I don't think I've ever looked at a job of, ‘Oh, I can get here,’ or, ‘I can get there.’ I don't look at it like that,” Gandy told The State. “Just try to continue to grow and try to leave places better than when you got there.”

LASTING FRIENDSHIPS FROM MARYLAND TO THE NBA

Walker-Kimbrough didn't think she was a highly touted recruit, though her four-star ESPN ranking says otherwise. But Maryland was the only “big-time school,” she said, that showed interest. So the first thing Walker-Kimbrough sought out when she got to campus in 2013 was the gym.

She reached out to then-Maryland assistant coach David Adkins on her second day in College Park and asked if they could meet up to get some extra work in. Adkins directed Walker-Kimbrough to Gandy, as other coaches were off campus for the summer.

“From Day 1 I loved it,” Walker-Kimbrough said. “I loved always being in the gym, but then he made me love the process.”

Even after he left the Terrapins to work for Adkins in the NBA, Gandy met Walker-Kimbrough at Maryland for early-morning workouts before reporting to the Wizards' facility. Whether he'd just flown back from an away game in Portland or Miami the night before, Walker-Kimbrough can't remember a single morning he said, “no.”

Gandy became one of her best friends in college. They don't speak as often now, but when they do it's like they never stopped.

Adkins shares this sentiment. He first met Gandy while he was a practice squad player for the women's basketball team at Maryland in 2009. Adkins said he was instantly taken aback by Gandy's strength of character and basketball skills, saying he thought Gandy could have been a Division II or lower-Division I player. Once Gandy graduated and joined the Maryland staff, Adkins taught him how to develop, coach and work out players.

NBA players like Kevin Durant, Michael Beasley and Victor Oladipo and WNBA players Kristi Toliver, Marissa Coleman and Crystal Langhorne would come to Maryland in the summer for early-morning workouts with Adkins. Gandy became part of that.

“I think that's where he caught the bug,” said Adkins, who made Gandy his first hire upon joining the Wizards' staff.

Gandy's strength lies in his ability to earn people's trust. Walker-Kimbrough is living proof, as are many of Washington's alumni. Adkins described Bradley Beal as the most distraught member of the Wizards organization when Gandy took his first assistant coaching gig at Rice in 2017.

That impact reached beyond the players.

“He's made me a better coach,” Adkins said. “He's made me a better man, a better father. Just being around him. I'm very, very thankful for that.”

PASSION AND SELFLESSNESS

Maryland head coach Brenda Frese first met Gandy in 2009. After he spent all four years of college on the scout team, Frese viewed hiring him as a “no-brainer.”

“He was always in the gym,” she told The State. “He was always wanting to be involved. Whether that was rebounding extra shots for our players or watching an assistant coach putting a player through. ... He's really passionate about basketball and wanting to learn from others and also was just a really ... selfless person.”

The passion and selflessness shows in the way Gandy carries himself, the way he talks — always smiling and laughing. When asked about himself, Gandy is quick to deflect, instead musing over the greatness of those around him: Staley, his fellow assistant coaches, the players that make South Carolina basketball and other folks he's worked with previously. They are the driving force behind the career he's built.

Though he'd never met Staley before she called him about the USC job, Gandy said he was drawn to her authentic character.

“The coolest thing about her is, I think, when I first spoke on the phone with her till now, she's the exact same,” Gandy said. “How she engages people, recruits, fans, donors, alumni, people she knows ... A lot of people have different sides that you see depending on their environment, and she's been the exact same.”

South Carolina hired Gandy away from Duke to replace Fred Chmiel, who is now head coach at Bowling Green State University. Gandy became Staley's first new assistant coach since Jollette Law in 2017.

2023-24 SOUTH CAROLINA ATHLETICS - PRESS CLIPS

Gandy's responsibilities include a little bit of everything: recruiting, player development and "just impacting young women that we have here," he said. Everyone on the coaching staff works with everyone on the team.

His main job, though, is to make Staley's life easier.

At Maryland, Gandy always made himself available to everyone, Frese said. Sometimes he would hop on a golf cart to drive a player to class. Whenever Frese's young twin boys Markus William and Tyler Joseph would visit the facilities, Gandy would be the first to throw a football or play basketball with them.

"He really had a phenomenal understanding of just making people feel really comfortable, really happy," Frese said.

Those skills translate to Gandy's ability to recruit and form lasting relationships with athletes.

FOSTERING GREATNESS

Recruiting is a never-ending, ever-evolving job. What appeals to folks one year may not the next. The talent hotbeds aren't always in quite the same place. Numbers next to names don't always indicate the best fit.

As for this year's freshman class and the transfers Gandy helped bring in, he hopes for continual growth — from July to November and November to March.

Premier Basketball ranked South Carolina's 2023 recruiting class second in the nation behind LSU. South Carolina had the No. 1-ranked recruiting class in 2021.

They'll all be needed in 2023.

South Carolina had five players selected in the 2023 WNBA Draft and only six players from last year's roster are back — most notably guard Raven Johnson, center Kamilla Cardoso and wing Bree Hall — along with five new faces. As a result, expectations are tempered — compared to recent years — for this Gamecocks squad seemingly everywhere other than Columbia.

Count Gandy among those expecting greatness.

"Everybody one through 11 were all highly touted," he said. "When you're as highly touted as all the individuals were coming out of high school, I don't think anybody will — you could say you'd be surprised, but they're all really good players."

Gandy has spent time as a step-in practice player this summer — a callback to his time as a student at Maryland. He's found that when players see an assistant coach subject themselves to parts of workouts, it humanizes them. It also motivates the athletes to push themselves further.

"Whether that makes them run a little bit harder or set screens with a little bit more force or — if nothing else — just have a little bit more fun," Gandy said. "I think I'm a big proponent of you gotta be able to laugh at yourself and understand that, 'Hey, they're really good at what they do, too.' ... I mean, all of us coaches, whether it's jump-roping with them or stretching with them, whatever it is, it does give you the ability to kind of relate with them."

Outside of basketball, Gandy enjoys playing golf. It's not an in-season activity, but during the off months it's something that gets him outside. He also uses it as a space to knock out the occasional recruiting call. Columbia Country Club is his favorite course in town, and he typically shoots around the mid-70s.

"It humbles me," Gandy said. "... I gotta remind myself it's not my day job."

Golf isn't Gandy's day job. Coaching basketball is. Luckily for him and USC, he found and ran toward that passion. Walker-Kimbrough said she felt like he could succeed in any basketball environment, but she projected the Staley-Gandy tandem as "a force to be reckoned with."

"As much as I love the University of Maryland, and I'm a Terp till I die, wherever he goes I'm always cheering him on," Walker-Kimbrough said. "What did you guys say? 'Go Cocks?' 'Go Gamecocks?' I guess I'll be saying that, under my breath of course."

How Khadijah Sessions is uplifting South Carolina WBB in her new role

Payton Titus, The State
March 20, 2024

Sania Feagin's favorite memory of Khadijah Sessions came before her first season on South Carolina's coaching staff started.

Just after USC announced Sessions' hiring in July, Feagin made her Atlanta Entertainment Basketball League debut for team B.A.N.S. Across the court was Sessions with team Lady Fire. While both were part of the Gamecocks women's basketball sorority, they were opponents that day.

That was until Feagin went down with a cramp. Sessions rushed over to check on the rising junior, refusing to leave her side until Feagin walked off the court of her own volition.

That is who Sessions is. Fiercely loyal. Sincerely invested in the success of those she loves. And that includes the women on South Carolina's current roster.

She is often the first person off USC's bench, sometimes to applaud the Gamecocks' hustle, sometimes to advocate for a more favorable whistle. But always with unbridled effervescence. Her passion for basketball and compassion for the players have helped make way for one of the most impressive seasons in program history.

Originally, though, Sessions had no interest in coaching women's basketball.

Sure, she played at South Carolina (2013-16), helping guide the Gamecocks to three SEC regular-season championships, two SEC tournament titles and their first-ever NCAA Final Four in 2015. But she saw herself involved in the men's game. She thought her in-your-face, self-described "aggressor" approach to training young hoopers would work better there. And infiltrating the men's ranks would put her in the trailblazing company of women such as Becky Hammon, Kristi Toliver and Candice Dupree.

But then Dawn Staley called.

Sessions' former college coach had reached out to her before last summer about joining South Carolina's coaching staff (since Sessions graduated in 2016, Staley has added Jolette Law in 2017, Mary Wooley in 2022 and Winston Gandy in 2023). But Sessions declined with a polite, "Thanks for thinking of me," and returned to training. When Staley called again (after the NCAA passed legislation in January to increase college basketball coaching staffs), Sessions took 2 and a half weeks to think about it.

It would have been an automatic "no" had the offer come from anyone else in the women's game. Only Staley was worth veering off the path Sessions had determined for herself, believing at that point that training was her true calling.

But there was the homecoming aspect. The otherwise hard-to-come-by learning opportunity. And the ability to say she was part of Staley's coaching tree — an entry in Sessions' resume that would jump off the page.

"I was just like, 'You know what, I think this right here may be the best opportunity for me if I want to get to the next step,'" Sessions told The State. "It's levels to it. Just being under her alone can get you to a lot of places. I'm just like, 'Why not?'"

When Sessions graduated with a bachelor's degree in hospitality, restaurant and tourism management in 2016, she was desperate to stay connected to the game she loved. She had a short professional hoops career, playing a partial season in Finland until a knee injury brought her back to the United States for rehab. She went on to call some games with the SEC Network and even thought about becoming a referee.

While she's now part of USC's program in a different capacity than she was eight years ago, her energy in practice and on the bench in games is the same. And that's how the players like it.

"When she's on, she's on," Feagin said, smiling so hard you could hear it in her voice. "She pushes us. When we're down, she brings our energy up. She's a lovable person. She's good to be around."

Sessions can't be low-key. Even if she wanted to. The team won't let her.

"Because we know she can bring the energy," Feagin said. "We know she has good energy. Like, 'All right, Khadijah! Let me hear your energy. You low. What's going on? You OK?' We bring her back up so she can be on us."

The very thing Sessions thought made her ill-equipped to coach women's basketball is exactly what's made her so good for USC. And so loved by women's basketball fans.

Sessions went viral during the SEC Tournament for her reaction to center Kamilla Cardoso's last-second game-winner (and first career 3-pointer) against Tennessee in the semifinals. While the rest of the team swarmed Cardoso in celebration, Sessions sprinted past everyone across the court, unable to contain her excitement.

A'ja Wilson — South Carolina legend and Sessions' former teammate — commented under a post about her viral moment on Instagram: "If you know her fr you know this is so Khadijah," with three laughing face emojis.

Sessions began training players as a college sophomore, helping with Gamecocks basketball summer camps. After leaving South Carolina, she began hosting her own clinics. She also coached AAU basketball and the boys team at Ridge View High School (serving as JV head coach and varsity assistant coach from 2020-22). Her proteges include USC star freshman Collin Murray-Boyles and Memphis Grizzlies rookie GG Jackson. She has also worked out A'ja Wilson when she was in Columbia.

Whenever they have big performances, Sessions is quick to repost their highlights and stat lines on X (formerly Twitter). Sometimes just a repost will do. Other times she adds her own commentary, usually in all caps, but a few standalone emojis will often suffice. She does the same for the South Carolina players she coaches now.

USC's other five coaches have a combined century's worth of experience. What Sessions lacks in this area, she makes up for in basketball knowledge and her ability to connect with athletes in a unique way. She describes herself as their Dawn Staley translator. (The key, Sessions said, is to listen to Staley's words, not the tone with which she says them.)

"She's awesome," Staley said of Sessions' impact. "She was a coach when she was here. Her energy, her intellect, IQ for the game has been unmatched. Her ability to reach young people, unmatched. And she's a lot different. She's got a younger, louder, more energized look to our staff. ... And she's done a great job."

2023-24 SOUTH CAROLINA ATHLETICS - PRESS CLIPS

When Sessions played high school basketball, she made a conscious effort to get her teammates involved, her mom, Michelle Sessions, remembered. When Sessions' team created a comfortable lead, she would turn down open layup opportunities in favor of getting the ball to someone else who would otherwise have a hard time scoring. The leadership and compassion it took to be a basketball coach has always been in her.

"I think it came natural," Michelle said. "And I really think she loves it."

Khadijah Sessions' impact already being felt

Chris Wellbaum, GamecockCentral.com
October 2, 2023

The branches of Dawn Staley's coaching tree are starting to grow, with former players popping up on coaching staffs around the country. This season, for the first time, that includes bringing a former player, Khadijah Sessions, back into the fold as an assistant coach.

Sessions was a three-year starter for the Gamecocks and played from 2012-2016, the beginning of South Carolina's glory years. She led them to their first SEC titles and first Final Four.

Sessions is one of two new Gamecock assistants. The other is Winston Gandy, a former Duke assistant who replaced Fred Chmiel. The NCAA passed legislation that allowed programs to add a fourth assistant coach. When the legislation took effect on July 1, Staley quickly brought back Sessions.

"Khadijah is a coach," Staley said. "She's a point guard. When you play the point guard position. That's what you do. You're a point guard for life. And it's been seamless with her. I was thinking about Khadijah well before we had an opening. And when we had an opening an opportunity, I'm like let's go."

Sessions has hit the ground running. Her playing experience means she already understands what Staley expects. Sessions also stayed around the program following her playing days, so she is familiar with the players she's now coaching.

"She's like boom. It's been great," Staley said. "You don't have to teach her anything. You don't have to guide her. Maybe we have to guide her with some other stuff, doing scouting reports the way we like to do them, but as far as basketball, top tier."

Sessions averaged a modest 5.9 points during her career, with a high of 7.2 as a sophomore. But she finished her career among the top ten in career starts (she has been bumped out of the top ten since then) because of her defense.

I once wrote that Sessions played point guard like a middle linebacker. She has carried that intensity into coaching, where she is the ideal tutor for South Carolina's likely starting backcourt of Raven Johnson and Te-Hina Paopao.

"Khadijah is like the energy source," Raven Johnson said. "She's a fireball. She just be running up and down the sideline, like just screaming, and we need that. She loves defense. So it gets us amped up. I'm glad she's on the staff."

Paopao was never known for her defense at Oregon, but she knows she needs to improve on that side of the ball if she wants to play in the WNBA. Being mentored by Sessions is the perfect situation.

"Oh, I love her," Paopao said. "She's a defensive specialist so I've been working on defense. She's been very helpful in that way and just getting me better as a defensive player."

After her South Carolina playing career ended, Sessions played in Finland and then was a scrimmage player with Staley's 2019 AmeriCup team. She can still hold her own against the current Gamecocks, whether she's going one-on-one in drills or in scrimmages with the Highlighters, South Carolina's male practice players.

"When they have class, she and Winston will step in and run the highlighter team," Staley said.

She didn't say if Sessions still plays like a linebacker.

Gamecocks' Lisa Boyer the right-hand woman for Dawn Staley

David Cloninger, Post & Courier
March 31, 2024

ALBANY, N.Y. — Scout the opponent? Boyer. Work with MiLaysia on her free throws? Boyer. Along for every step of the way, and just as responsible as nearly anyone else for South Carolina's tremendous success over the past 16 years?

Boyer.

"I think we were at Auburn. We were going over the scout, and we play around a lot. I think (Fulwiley) had shot the ball and one of our teammates had blocked it," forward Sania Feagin said. "Boyer was like, 'Listen! We need to stop doing that! We're trying to work on something!'"

"Whatever you need, you go to Boyer. She's easy to talk to, and she just knows everything."

Sixteen seasons with Dawn Staley at South Carolina. Twenty-two seasons with Staley in college (six at Temple). South Carolina Associate Head Coach Lisa Boyer coached Staley for a season with the Philadelphia Rage of the defunct American Basketball League and when each moved on, it wasn't long before Staley, as a first-time college head coach, was needling her former big whistle about helping out.

"She asked me to come, and I had just gotten a job. I was like, 'Hell no. I'm not doing that.' I didn't have any desire to go back to college basketball," Boyer said. "She was at a point where she didn't need me for coaching, she needed me for all the other stuff — the recruiting, the organization, keeping the stuff going while she was away, because she was still playing (in the WNBA while being Temple's head coach). She was gone all summer. So she wore me down."

You hear all that, and it isn't surprising to hear the rest.

"Boyer and I are an old couple. Seriously. We've definitely taken years off our lives. I've taken some off hers and she's taken some off mine," Staley says. "But at the end of the day, there is not a coach that works harder. Not one coach that works harder than I know."

"Dawn doesn't want a lot of yes-people around. I know her really well, and she knows me," Boyer said. "She depends on me for certain things and I hope to come through as much as possible."

Even clearing 10 minutes to talk is tough. Boyer — never "Lisa," always "Boyer" — has to cut up the film of the next opponent, prepare her ever-meticulous keys to the game, and Ash needs some help after a rotten game against Indiana.

"She helped me by watching previous games with me," forward Ashlyn Watkins says. "She says, 'Explain to me what you could have done better. Explain to me what you should have done. Explain to me why this worked.' And it all sinks in to make me better."

Home turf

Boyer wasn't going to wax poetic this week about being on her home turf. She's from Ogdensburg, N.Y., right on the Canadian border about four hours northwest from Albany; she played at Ithaca College, three hours west.

Should the Gamecocks beat Oregon State on Sunday and advance to the Final Four, she'll be back in Cleveland, where she received the biggest professional push of her career and made her the answer to a trivia question.

All of it is on the periphery. There is always more work to do, another drill to perfect, another aspect of the game to learn and conquer.

"When I want to not think about basketball, she's always thinking about basketball, things that I'm not particularly thinking about," Staley said. "I don't think — well, I know — that I would not have been as successful without her expertise, her tirelessness, her ... I mean, she thinks about every single thing."

John Lucas saw that, in the early days of his tenure as coach of the Cleveland Cavaliers. He was struck by the coaching prowess of the Cavs' WNBA "sister" team, the Cleveland Rockers.

A Rockers assistant was commanding the huddle, and every time she pulled a player aside, that player attentively listened and then did her best to do whatever she had just been told.

"I just thought, her presence, her loyalty, her knowledge of the game was impressive," Lucas said. "Trust overcomes gender. I felt like I could really trust Lisa."

The Rockers' head coach, Dan Hughes, was also going to Cavs practices to watch Lucas work, and when Boyer asked if she could come too, Hughes asked Lucas and Lucas said sure.

But that wasn't enough. Lucas wanted Boyer to help him.

Then he immediately went to work helping her. The Cavs' transition defense was not good. Boyer was telling him how it could be repaired.

Lucas said, "Don't tell me, tell them."

"I put her in front of the team several times. I wanted to see her, see the reaction of the guys and the other staff," Lucas said. "She commanded the room."

She didn't introduce herself, she didn't offer a quick rehash of her career, she just went right into it. "Guys, our transition can be so much better. Here's how."

"And she had the film work to support it," Lucas said. "She did all of our transition work and prep."

2023-24 SOUTH CAROLINA ATHLETICS - PRESS CLIPS

A pioneer

That's the trivia question. "Who was the first female NBA assistant coach?"

Semantics and details get in the way, because many would answer Becky Hammon, who was hired by San Antonio in 2014. Hammon was the first female full-time paid assistant coach, but Boyer beat her onto an NBA staff by 13 years.

Boyer was considered a volunteer assistant coach for the 2001 Cavaliers, because her salary was being paid by the WNBA's Rockers. Since the NBA at the time had a rule about only three assistant coaches on the bench during games, not four, Boyer sat behind the team during games, and only home games (she did not travel).

She didn't even get a mention in the team media guide that year. But she was the pioneer.

"It is what it is. The opportunity he gave me was priceless," Boyer dismisses. "The bigger thing was I got to be friends with John."

When Staley was finally convinced to start coaching (while still playing), she immediately wanted Boyer as an assistant. Boyer said no. But Staley chipped and chipped until she said OK.

"The deal when I came was, 'We're going to try for a national championship, right?'" Boyer said, making it clear that neither she nor Staley were interested in just becoming a good team. "And that was always the case, because (as a player) Dawn went to three Final Fours and never won one, so that was always sticking in her craw."

Temple was a success but each knew they needed more. When South Carolina beckoned, each knew it was the right move to make, although it would take time to win.

"It was a build, and it can be tough. You look back, there were 500 people at a game, and that was a lot," Boyer said. "But I know I absolutely had her back."

That commitment has helped Staley's program become one of the best in the country, one that stands a win away from its fourth straight Final Four. There was a lot to work on after the Gamecocks narrowly avoided giving away a Sweet 16 contest to Indiana and then to prepare for Oregon State's bounty of monstrous forwards.

Boyer was quickly on the case.

"It's really satisfying and comforting to know that Boyer is right by my side. If anybody says or does anything to me, watch out," Staley said. "I don't have to say a word. Boyer will."

"She's my rider. She's my rider all the way through."

Gamecocks' Paopao rediscovers joy of game at South Carolina

David Cloninger, Post & Courier
March 23, 2024

COLUMBIA — The game has always been her sanctuary, her rock.

The hours of repetitive practice, the relentless offseason workouts — Te-Hina Paopao cheerfully went through all of it, so in love with basketball that she came back from two ACL tears in high school and a severe ankle injury as a college freshman. Nobody was going to tell her that maybe it would be best to untie her sneakers for the last time.

When she found herself questioning that, when playing began to feel like a burden instead of a release, she had to ask herself if she really wanted to keep doing this. And that by itself rang an alarm bell she never thought existed.

Ever the steady point guard, the one who always knew what to do regardless of the circumstance, Paopao was at a crossroads.

Then the phone rang.

Ups and downs

It started out perfectly. Paopao rose past her prep injuries and became a top recruit, choosing the University of Oregon. It was far enough away from her California home so her parents wouldn't be underfoot, but close enough so they could come to her, or her to them, for a weekend. Brother Israel went with her, family the strongest tie that binds the Paopaos.

She played well as a freshman and better as a sophomore, but a first-round loss in the NCAA Tournament caused an upheaval. Teammates Sydney Parrish, Kylee Watson and Maddie Scherr all hit the transfer portal soon after, but Paopao never thought of that as an alternative.

"I knew that I wanted to stay another year," she said. "I wanted to see if it would get better."

It didn't. Oregon suffered through a 17-14 season (a fierce WNIT run pushed the Ducks' record to 20-15). And the malaise was widespread.

"I wasn't content with how I was performing. Didn't really help that as a team, a lot of people didn't feel like they were playing their best," she said. "The overall team wasn't really as fun, just because of how people were feeling."

Paopao owed Oregon a lot. Today, she still declares her undying gratitude for the institution and how it molded her into the player that she is now.

But losing wasn't fun. A personal shooting slump wasn't fun. The light-bulb moment came when she had to stop the one thing she knew could work — extra shooting before and after practice, remaining in the gym — because it wasn't working.

"One day, I had the realization, 'I got to step back, maybe just chill. Just let the game come to me,'" Paopao said. "I found my jumper again, that's when I was shooting my best percentages at Oregon. I had to pick myself up and get that balance back."

She played very well down the stretch, but the dissatisfaction lingered. Basketball had always equaled happiness. Now it seemed a chore.

"Knowing your kid and how they operate and knowing how their personality is, and seeing her love for the game all these years fall back a little bit ... it was a little concerning. We held her up, supported her, but by the end of her last season, I kind of knew she was going to make a move," said her father, Paul Paopao. "In our discussions as a family, it was evident it was time for her to go. She'd lost the passion for the game."

Paul faced the same conundrum as Te-Hina. She'd rehabbed and worked so hard to get past her injuries, and never complained. She was healthy, but a slump and the team's performance was hurting her mind.

"Perseverance wasn't going to be an issue. But would she feel it was worth it?" Paul said. "Did she love it at this phase of her career?"

Then the phone rang.

New horizons

Paopao quietly placed her name in the NCAA transfer portal and didn't announce it on social media. She wanted to let the coaches come to her.

Mark Campbell, head man at TCU after serving as an Oregon assistant, made sense. She says now that her mind was set on the Horned Frogs and Paul confirms, if the phone didn't ring, she's wearing purple today.

A former coach let her know that Dawn Staley was looking for her. Paopao couldn't believe what she was hearing.

Paul had the same reaction. It had only been in April when, watching on TV as Iowa beat the Gamecocks in the 2023 Final Four, he turned to his daughter and said, "You could have helped that squad."

"My son texted me that Dawn called and I said, 'Dawn who? The break of Dawn?'" Paul remembered. "Once we got in touch, I told her, 'How do I know this is the real Dawn Staley? I don't need to be pranked right now.'"

It was Staley all right, seeking the outside shooter she didn't have in an amazing 36-1 season that felt like a disappointment, because the "1" came in the national semifinals. She could have had almost anybody, but she wanted Te-Hina.

For Paopao, it had nothing to do with leaving Oregon and everything to do with playing for the Gamecocks. She had yet to visit, meet her potential teammates, see Columbia, but the bell was ringing again.

2023-24 SOUTH CAROLINA ATHLETICS - PRESS CLIPS

This time in a good way.

“I think from that day I knew I was going to go to South Carolina,” Paopao said. “There’s no way you can not go to South Carolina. That’s weird!”

She immediately found her smile again, of all places during the drudgery of offseason conditioning. Paopao stepped into a leadership role despite being a first-year player, making such an impression that Staley chose her as one of two player representatives for SEC Media Days.

Saying then she had never had two lead guards with this kind of experience, leadership and skill (Raven Johnson is the other), Staley cautioned that her team would be young. They promptly rolled to 33 straight wins this year without a loss.

Paopao has been right in the middle of it, ranking third in the country in 3-point percentage and seeing her name on all-conference and All-American lists. She went ahead and said it before the postseason, so as not to have any distractions — she’d known personally for a month, but announced to the world that she will return to the Gamecocks next year.

As her father said in the video, she found her love for the game again. And that phone call was to thank.

Most of her family is in Columbia to watch the Gamecocks this weekend, a surprise visit. Paopao lost control for just a bit when they popped in, but was quickly back to work.

She’s back in point-guard mode, big-shot mode. The player Staley needed to complete this puzzle.

All because that phone rang.

How Te-Hina Paopao's Family-First Culture Helped in her Journey to South Carolina

Payton Titus, The State
November 20, 2023

Workouts as early as 4 and 5 a.m. have been part of Te-Hina Paopao's life since she was a kindergartner.

At first she watched her brother Israel as he trained to advance his football career. She joined in around middle school when she became fully immersed in basketball. In order to make the most of what people first saw in her around the age of 8, Te-Hina's father Paul told her, she'd have to make sacrifices.

Te-Hina never flinched.

"There was no fear," Paul Paopao told The State. "She actually embraced it. That was learned through her brothers."

That kind of commitment was part of being a Paopao. Te-Hina (21) grew up in a sports-oriented household with four siblings: older brothers Israel (28) and Isaia (25); older sister Tiare (27); and younger brother Iosefa Paopao Meinke-Aviu (19). The boys played football, while Tiare played softball.

And no one let Te-Hina have anything without a fight.

That fight and that drive are what brought her to South Carolina for her senior season. She braved early-morning workouts, two ACL tears in high school and the college transfer portal to be here for this very moment. To lead a legendary team through the dog days of March Madness and come out with all the wins.

FAMILY AND BASKETBALL

One of Te-Hina's earliest introductions to basketball came at age 6 or 7, Israel remembered. She passed the time during his football practices by shooting hoops under their father's supervision.

At 8 or 9, Te-Hina caught the eye of Dominique Conners — Oceanside High School (California) alum and San Diego Toreros (2008-12) all-time leading scorer — who shepherded Te-Hina into the game she now has great command over. By age 10, Te-Hina earned a spot on a 16U girls basketball team coached by Terri Bamford.

That's when Te-Hina crossed up Kelsey Plum, who was eight years older. This was before Plum became women's college basketball's all-time leading scorer, the No. 1 pick in the WNBA Draft and a two-time WNBA champion. But it was after Plum graduated from La Jolla Country Day School, where she cemented herself as the No. 26 overall recruit in the Class of 2013.

The two were participating in a drill together after Coach Bamford assigned Plum to be Te-Hina's partner. Plum hadn't even bothered to lace up her shoes. But Te-Hina, with the kind of pure self-confidence only a 10-year-old girl could have, blew past Plum using an in-and-out move and crossed over to her left hand as she made her way to the basket for the unlikely of scores.

The gym erupted. Te-Hina wasn't afraid of taking Plum on. After all, the 10-year-old had been taking on her older siblings all her life.

Over the years they've coached each other, trained each other and broken bread with each other. Maintaining a healthy balance between family and sports is just something they're able to do. Te-Hina says it's who they are.

"It's very big in our (Samoan) culture that we have to do everything together, and love doing it and genuine care for each other," Te-Hina said.

"We're a really close-knit family. I love them to death."

Te-Hina's sister named her daughter after her. Baby Te-Hina is about 7 months old. They FaceTime often, which 21-year-old Te-Hina says brings her home.

When Te-Hina moved to Eugene, Oregon for college, Israel moved too. When she moved to Columbia, Israel followed. So did Isaia, who's training here in hopes of making an NFL or NFL roster in the region. The three of them try to meet for dinner at least once a week, which usually serves as Isaia's "cheat" meal.

"We keep that family bond tight," Israel said. "We're so used to being together at home at nighttime that those little dinners, they keep us together."

FROM CALIFORNIA TO OREGON TO SOUTH CAROLINA

Part of what appealed to Te-Hina about Oregon was how close it was to home — Oceanside, California.

Her trajectory was a little unorthodox. She went from young basketball prodigy to sidelined for much of the beginning of her high school career after two ACL tears. The first came her freshman year of high school, and the second came as a sophomore.

"The first one happened, and it'll show how much you wanna get back," her father said. "The second tear was all about, 'OK, this is gonna show how much you love this game.'"

So she battled through four hours of physical therapy per day, six days a week, until she recovered. Finally able to get on the court her junior year, Te-Hina went from flying under the radar to flying high through the national recruiting rankings. She solidified herself as a five-star prospect — one of five in Oregon's 2020 class.

After starting three years for the Ducks, Te-Hina entered the transfer portal seeking a new, challenging environment to further her basketball career. She considered following longtime Oregon assistant Mark Campbell (who brought that No. 1 ranked 2020 class to Eugene) to TCU after he became the Horned Frogs' head coach in March.

But Staley called right before Easter. The Paopaos were surprised. They didn't think Te-Hina was on South Carolina's radar. She was.

Staley called Te-Hina while she was on her way to an 8:30 a.m. sociology class. She pulled over, chatted with Staley for a few minutes, and made it to class on time. Te-Hina shared the news with Israel and Paul via text — they recalled being practically in disbelief.

2023-24 SOUTH CAROLINA ATHLETICS - PRESS CLIPS

“We were like, ‘No way,’” Israel remembered. “Then my dad got the call, and from then on, we were just like, ‘Wow.’”

When Paul was on the phone with Staley, he had to confirm who he was talking to: “Coach, I just need to make sure this is really you. This the real Coach Dawn Staley?”

Staley liked what she saw in Paopao: a veteran guard who could shoot the basketball and fill a leadership void left by the Class of 2019’s departure. Staley wanted her to work on her defense, which she embraced by sticking her nose in and taking charges during preseason practices.

“She’s a willing participant in giving it up on the defensive side of the ball,” Staley said.

“What we recruited her for and to be, she’s been that. She’s got a great voice. She’s got a great command of our basketball team.”

Paopao committed to Staley and the Gamecocks in April. The move has been good for her. She’s lost about 15 or 16 pounds training with Molly Binetti and earned a host of accolades, earning spots on the Wooden Award (for the best player in college basketball) and Nancy Lieberman Award (for the best point guard in college basketball) watch lists.

And in the early going of a new season, she’s a starter who’s averaging 14 points per game and leading the Gamecocks in 3-pointers made.

‘SHE BRINGS LIFE TO WHEREVER SHE GOES’

One can’t help but smile watching Te-Hina play basketball. Look up and see her locked in, dribbling through traffic and shouting directions to her teammates. Look again and see that intensity melt away, exposing a shameless grin.

It’s contagious. And genuine. Which makes it even more contagious.

“There’s no facade with Te-Hina,” Paul said. “She brings life to wherever she goes.”

Staley and the Gamecocks have raved about Te-Hina’s leadership during her short time with the team. Developing that voice has been a process.

Israel said his experience playing quarterback helped him guide her along considering how a point guard is like a quarterback on the basketball court. Paul said he used to do mock interviews with her, which she giggled her way through most of the time.

Her penchant for leadership started at home. As silly as it sounds, Te-Hina was the only Paopao child Paul never had to get on to for not doing her chores. She took out the trash, did the dishes and laundry, kept her room clean — all without being asked.

“That’s taking initiative,” Paul said. “...You have a gift that’s not on the basketball court. You’re doing everything like I taught you to do so well.”

But, alas, “somewhere along the line your siblings missed that speech,” he said with a hearty laugh.

Te-Hina’s family does their best to make it to her games. Her uncle Niel Otineru, aunt Chantel and her husband Tony along with siblings Tiare (who brought baby Te-Hina), Israel and Isaia attend the home opener against Maryland.

When they’re gone, though, Te-Hina is not alone. She has family here, too, in the Gamecocks.

To show her coaches, teammates and trainers how much their embrace meant to her, Te-Hina brought them all garnet and black kukui nut necklaces when they returned from summer break. In Samoan culture they’re often given out at graduations, weddings and other special celebrations to represent respect, unity and family.

“To be accepted by them is a great blessing to have and dear to my heart,” Te-Hina said. “And it’s just been really fun to have more sisters added to my family.”

'Tears of joy' for Kamilla Cardoso in what could be final South Carolina home game

Payton Tirus, The State
March 24, 2024

From there she watched her teammates warm up on their home court for the final time this season. She wore a stoic expression on her face, careful to conceal her emotions from the attentive eyes of media and fans surrounding her. But one could conclude she was deep in thought.

A few moments later she stood up and rejoined her team on the floor. If she had taken that time to soak in the sights, sounds and energy of a USC women's basketball home game one last time, she wasn't going to let herself be sentimental for too long — that is, until she was introduced as a starter over the arena's PA system.

The announced crowd of 14,266 gave her an impassioned ovation. She smiled, waved and wiped tears from her face in the pregame huddle. But by the time she jumped up for the opening tip, she had regained her composure, ready for the task ahead:

Take down No. 8 North Carolina for a trip to the Sweet 16.

Sunday's second-round NCAA Tournament game — an 88-41 USC win — could have been Cardoso's final time playing at Colonial Life Arena. The senior is projected as a top-four WNBA Draft pick but is also part of the final class of players able to use the NCAA's Covid-19 waiver for an extra year of eligibility.

She has yet to formally announce her decision.

"Even though I'm undecided, it was like, 'Wow, what if this is my last game?'" Cardoso said. "It was just emotional."

"I felt bad for her because I don't like to see her cry," Raven Johnson said after the game, "but it's tears of joy."

"I was just like, 'Aww,'" Chloe Kitts said. "It was so sad she was crying because we don't want her to leave. But at the end of the day, she has to do what's best for her. ... We have no idea what's gonna happen."

Cardoso started playing basketball because of her older sister Jessica Silva. Silva picked the sport up at age 7, dragging the younger Cardoso along to every practice while their mom, Janete Soares, worked. Cardoso wasn't a fan of basketball at first, but onlookers saw her potential and encouraged her to begin a playing career of her own.

"I fell in love with it," Cardoso said.

At the age of 15, she moved from Brazil to Chattanooga, Tennessee, to play at Hamilton Heights Christian Academy. The only English she knew was "yes," "no," "bye" and "hello."

During that first year of high school Cardoso met Johnson. They played exhibition games together in Atlanta, where Johnson is from — just under two hours from Cardoso's host family in Chattanooga. Johnson would type plays in English on Google Translate, then click the audio button to relay the information to Cardoso in Portuguese.

Cardoso had a year-long stint at Syracuse after a stellar high school career, where she was ranked the No. 1 center and No. 5 overall player in the class of 2020 and was named a McDonald's All-American her senior year. When she entered the transfer portal and committed to South Carolina, it helped Johnson decide on the Gamecocks for her collegiate career. She couldn't and wouldn't turn down the chance of a reunion. The two became teammates, roommates, classmates and best friends.

"We have so many memories together," Johnson said. "We do so much together. We eat together, we dang near sleep together. We have the same classes. I see her every second."

Since arriving in Columbia, Cardoso has won the SEC's Sixth Woman of the Year Award (2023), been named an All-American by the Associated Press and United States Basketball Writers Association (2024) and chosen as a finalist for the Naismith Player of the Year and Defensive Player of the Year Awards (2024).

If Sunday was Cardoso's last game at Colonial Life Arena, Johnson will relish the rest of the playing time she has with her friend, refusing to let the gravity of her (possibly) impending absence hit her until they suit up together for the final time.

Gamecocks coach Dawn Staley reflected on Cardoso's career and impact at South Carolina after the game. USC encountered a similar situation last year as the Freshies wrestled with whether to stay or go on to professional basketball careers. Regardless of what Cardoso decides to do, Staley knows the South Carolina basketball community will stand beside her.

"Kamilla could have gone anywhere in the country, but she chose to come here," Staley said. "... She trusted us enough to come here and to continue her career. It means the world, because if it was her last game in Colonial Life Arena, we're sending her off well, both on the court and the FAMS right before the game. That kind of ovation that they gave her meant that we love her deeply for choosing us.

"Whatever she decides, we're going to cheer as hard, whether it's here or whether it's in the WNBA."

Kamilla Cardoso's "Spontaneous" Personality And The Journey To Unlocking It

Alan Cole, Gamecock Scoop
January 24, 2024

It was almost over before it even started for Kamilla Cardoso.

She knew she had something. Everyone did. Cardoso was 6-foot-5 by age 12 and gifted well beyond anyone else on a basketball court in Montes Claros, Brazil.

Half a world away in Chattanooga, Tenn., Hamilton Heights Academy girls' basketball coach Kiki Hunt got a call from a college assistant.

There was a middle school prospect searching for her next move. A quick pop of the tape was enough.

"She had recommended that she [Cardoso] come to Chattanooga to play for me," Hunt told GamecockScoop. "So I looked at her video. She was running up and down the floor as fast as a guard. She was dribbling the ball, rebounding well —and I mean going and getting the ball, not just standing there."

No-brainer, right?

To Hunt, for sure. But she still had to clear it with the school's headmaster, a far trickier hurdle than anticipated. The question — unbelievably, as Hunt remembers — was about why she even wanted Cardoso.

"He was one of those admins who was only into boys' sports," Hunt said. "He said, 'Maybe I just don't know about women's basketball.' And I said, 'Maybe you don't!' I had to argue with him to get her, because he had to approve her scholarship and get her I-20 paperwork done and all that."

Hunt won the argument, and Cardoso won an opportunity to play abroad.

Ever since her career in America almost stalled on the launching pad, she has added enough tangible titles to her name to fill a scroll. McDonald's All-American. All-conference player in both the ACC and SEC. FIBA AmeriCup MVP and gold medalist with the Brazilian national team. National Champion at South Carolina. She will likely be a first-round pick in the 2024 WNBA Draft.

None of them scratch the surface of her achievements.

The Smile

The smile appears out of nowhere, like a basketball Jack In The Box.

It is common to see Cardoso draw a foul, then chuckle at the free throw line a few seconds later. Over what? Who knows. Show up early to a game and you will see her take a turn in a pre-game layup line, immediately followed by some laughter at something in the stands or from the player behind her.

There is no such thing as the wrong place to start dancing. The spirit sticks out everywhere and to everyone; even Dawn Staley had to take notice during the season-opening Paris trip.

"I see Kamilla taking a lot of selfies in the background," Staley said when asked who was having the most fun. "I think she's enjoying it."

Cardoso looks comfortable everywhere, a natural in any room. It is a testament to her work, and the people who surrounded her over the last eight years.

'We became a family'

This personality always existed, but the early Chattanooga days buried it. Fighting homesickness, a language barrier and desperation to prove her value on the court closed the lid on her eccentric side, at least temporarily.

"She was very shy and timid," Hunt said. "And she actually had been made fun of most of her life for her height. I think that was why she was shy and timid. And as she started to blossom over here, she got over that."

"Even in class to present something, she would rather take a bad grade than get up and present. And she had done the work, she just didn't want to get up there and talk."

Ironically, one of those obstacles turned her tide.

Back to the headmaster at Hamilton Heights with more litigation beyond the scope of a teenager in a foreign country. This time surrounding Cardoso's — among others — living situation. He allowed the boys' team to rent apartments with RAs, but not the girls.

Coaching a roster full of international talent with few other options, Hunt took matters into her own hands. Her home became a team space, regularly housing players throughout her tenure.

"Counting my daughters, I always had at least seven kids living there," Hunt remembered. "We became a family."

Family. The one thing Cardoso needed most of all.

Kamilla being Kamilla

There was no choice but to bond with her teammates. Every high school team shares practices, games and study halls. Few toss in weekends, offseasons and downtime.

It flipped the switch. The radiant personality she regularly displays for South Carolina fans took its American origins within those Chattanooga walls.

2023-24 SOUTH CAROLINA ATHLETICS - PRESS CLIPS

“Spontaneous,” teammate Ruth Balogun told GamecockScoop is her word to describe Cardoso. “Basically, you don’t know what she’s going to do next. She just does stuff out of impulse.”

The hilarity of warm-ups at Colonial Life Arena with her teammates? Call them an extension of constant pranks on Balogun.

Unrelenting motivation and fire made her a spark plug every time she checked into a game, a natural winner for last season’s SEC Sixth Woman of the Year award winner, given to the league’s top bench player. It comes from a high school player who loved to “spread the energy” wherever possible.

If you think her hair looks slightly different every time you turn on the Gamecocks, your television pigment is fine. It was a regular occurrence in high school, and still is.

“I was laying in my room,” Balogun remembered. “And she came to me and was like, ‘I want to do something with my hair.’ And she walked into my room with a bob and bangs, like the old woman in The Incredibles.”

“I was like, ‘Bro, these are the worst bangs ever.’”

That’s just Kamilla being Kamilla.

‘A one in a million player’

Basketball looks simple after you conquer the English language and life on another continent.

Everything else fell into place once she was comfortable enough in her skin to let the personality out. The size alone made her a nightmare for any opposing frontcourt, but her skill garnered national attention. She blocked shots for fun — including once on a PE teacher who thought he could score on her during an exhibition at an elementary school — and scored just as easily.

Hunt’s vision of a 12-year-old on film who could grow into an elite high school and eventually college player materialized.

“At first I didn’t know how good of a player she was,” Balogun said. “She made basketball really easy for me. After leaving high school and stuff, I was literally playing with a one in a million player.”

This was always how it was supposed to go when Cardoso bet on herself. She spent her freshman season at Syracuse before transferring to South Carolina, reuniting with her former AAU teammate Raven Johnson.

Yet another member of what is now an extensive American family to go with her Brazilian one.

“She’s just very dominant,” Johnson said. “She’s the best big in the country. If she brings her A game every game, who’s beating us?”

If nothing else, nobody was going to beat Cardoso. Internal stressors went by the boards, giving way to a clear-headed, confident star with a Hallmark smile and a cheerful personality.

“I’m just so proud of her because it was hard to get her here,” Hunt said. “I had to go to bat for someone I didn’t really know yet.”

A cantankerous headmaster had his shot blocked, and she has been doing the same ever since.

Gamecocks' Raven Johnson leading the charge during "revenge season"

David Cloninger, Post & Courier
February 4, 2024

COLUMBIA—Raven Johnson doesn't watch it. She saw it happen in real time and once more on replay, and that was enough.

There's more nuance to it than to merely say that Iowa superstar Caitlin Clark disrespected her during the Final Four, shooting away the chance to guard Johnson beyond the 3-point line.

The scouting report said that Johnson was not a good 3-point shooter (24 percent) and that Iowa needed to crowd around Aliyah Boston in the paint, so that's what Clark and the Hawkeyes did. Johnson knew that she wasn't there to shoot 3s; she was there to distribute, which is why she didn't shoot the 3 that was wide-open and instead passed the ball.

But of course with social media being what it is, and research is never a consideration when one can simply hit the "like" button, it became what it became. Clark waved, South Carolina lost in the Final Four to end an undefeated season, case closed.

Really, it is.

Johnson spoke about it in the preseason. Anybody wanting to bring it up — and if Iowa and the Gamecocks wind up again clashing in the NCAA Tournament, many will bring it up — gets met with the same reply.

"I think that put fuel to the fire and I said this was revenge season and I got something for everybody, every team that comes up," Johnson said.

Note: When Johnson said that, she later said in the same answer that it's "revenge season" for the team, not only for her. Nothing changes what happened in Dallas in April, but something can happen — and certainly seems to be in the process of happening, with the Gamecocks again undefeated after 20 games and ranked first in the country — this April in Cleveland.

But of course Johnson is the focus. Because of that video.

"After she made that comment, it blew up. If you notice, ESPN does a little snippet of something every two-to-three weeks. The first week was her averages, another was how she's shooting the ball, building the narrative going into March Madness. Just in case these two teams meet again," Johnson's mother, Shekia Johnson, said. "It stood out for Raven because of the Caitlin thing."

"I do think she's letting her play speak for itself," coach Dawn Staley said. "She's a lot more aggressive offensively. I think she's coming into her own."

Overtime

"It's called poetry in motion. You find the person that's open, they hit the shot," Johnson explained after the team's demolition of archrival Clemson. "An assist is like a point, that's how I think of it."

Johnson had 17 assists that day, one off the school record and the most any SEC player has had in a game since 2005. She leads the SEC in assist-turnover ratio (101 to 31) and has also raised her 3-point shooting to 39 percent.

It's the product of the work. It started soon after the clip.

"It bothered her, because she didn't come home. Her goal was, 'I'm staying here the whole summer to work,'" Shekia said. "The best revenge is to get better."

Mother talks with daughter every day and the constant message is, "Gotta go, going to the gym." That's after the team has already practiced, where assistant coach Winston Gandy is waiting. Johnson chose him shortly after he was hired as her designated out-of-practice helper.

"Raven is her own harshest critic. I told her, 'It doesn't start when the season starts, it starts with your last game,'" Gandy said. "She's a volunteer, she's not a hostage. She puts in the time."

Whether that's shooting, working on her handles or conditioning, there's never a time where she's done.

"The whole season, I feel like everybody was riding our coattails just hyping us up, but as soon as we lost, we got all these hate comments," she said. "I got bashed from a video that went so viral and people don't know behind the scenes how I felt and what I went through. So I think that was the best thing that ever happened to me."

Gandy hasn't heard one mention of the video. Nobody has, after the mention in the preseason and then the Clemson game.

"She has not, but I think she obviously realizes how last season ended, and she doesn't want a repeat," Gandy said. "I think she shows it day-in and day-out and the way she plays, she wants to end it on a different note this year."

The new style

"If I'm on the floor with her, I'm running, because she's going to find you in stride. I think Raven's been trying to play this fast pace for a long time," Staley said. "She really just didn't have the personnel to do it, or we did not push for her to do that."

Staley reminds all that Johnson is still very young for college basketball, to not just look at her academic status as a redshirt sophomore. This is her third year at USC, but her first season was cut short after two games due to a torn ACL. In her second season, last year, she was still finding her way into the college game and splitting reps with Kierra Fletcher, a veteran point guard imported specifically because Staley didn't know how settled her point guard position would be.

2023-24 SOUTH CAROLINA ATHLETICS - PRESS CLIPS

This is Johnson's first year when she's established, healthy and knows what she can do and what Staley wants/allows her to do. Getting up and down the floor is something that drew in transfer Te-Hina Paopao, the outside shooter Staley coveted who can also run point.

"I love playing with Ray. She gives me the ball sometimes, I give her the ball," Paopao said. "We just play off each other really well. I thought it was a perfect match for us to play together."

That's part of what has made this team so surprising. There was going to have to be a different way to play when Boston and "The Freshies" departed. There is no star to gear everything around this season, as every player could be a star on any given night.

"This year, the team plays for 40 full minutes, not 37, 38 ... the full 40," Shekia said. "They just keep coming."

Rematch?

She brings up a lot in practice. "Raven is very, very funny," Staley said. Just not that.

Daughter talks with mom about everything. Just not that.

"She tried to hide it," Shekia said. "Some of it was just criticism, not trashing her. A lot of people were on there defending her for following the game protocol."

It could happen again, a Hawkeyes-Gamecocks matchup with some kind of eventual crown riding on the outcome. "The country wants to see it, 100 percent," Shekia claims. "We're going to get back to where we should have got last year."

No use talking about it now. It could just as easily not happen, too, as the 2022 NCAA Tournament proved. Everybody salivated over that potential Iowa-USC matchup in Greensboro, but Iowa never got there.

"Revenge" would be defined by many as the Gamecocks beating Iowa and Johnson sticking a 3-pointer over Clark when Clark didn't guard her. It's unlikely that exact scenario would happen, and it isn't what Johnson defines anyway.

It's about her getting better and leading her team back to where it was, to take those final two steps it seemed assured of taking last year before stumbling. Of course, if it has to go through Iowa to happen, so be it.

And if she's asked to recall that moment this year, she'll have the same answer as she's had since that moment last year, the same answer she would tell herself if the in-game scene does repeat and she wonders if she's in line for the same result.

Quoth Raven: "Nevermore."

How Raven Johnson met the moment in South Carolina WBB's win over UConn

Payton Titus, The State
February 12, 2024

Raven Johnson is always on a mission.

The way she charges down court to take advantage of fast-break opportunities. The way she crowds opposing players on defense, crouched low with her eyes darting from theirs to the ball and back again. The way she changes the trajectory of a game with her contagious energy.

It's her superpower, South Carolina coach Dawn Staley said. The Gamecocks are playing with faster pace than any USC team in the Staley era since HerHoopStats started tracking in 2010. This works in Johnson's and South Carolina's favor, especially on defense (she leads the Gamecocks in steals by nearly double digits with 48 on the season).

But on offense, that fast pace can sometimes become the team's Kryptonite.

Those who watched No. 1 USC's 83-65 drubbing of No. 11 UConn saw a little bit of both. When asked after the game how her speed helped South Carolina maintain wire-to-wire control of the game, Johnson said Staley actually advised her to slow down a little bit.

"I didn't think she was aware of our shooters on the wing," Staley said. "She wasn't aware of Ashlyn (Watkins) streaking down behind her. It's those types of things that she needed to slow down and get herself options just in case the ball isn't going in."

After scoring two points in the first half, the third quarter went more Johnson's way, as she scored eight points and snagged two steals. By game's end, Johnson achieved her first career double-double against the Huskies with 10 points and a career- and team-high 12 rebounds. She also had five assists and two steals.

She proved why she deserves to be included on national award watch lists with the best guards in college basketball, as her coach has campaigned for.

"She's coming into her own," Staley said ahead of South Carolina's game against Auburn last week. "I think a lot of people don't realize Raven's really young. She's young in college basketball terms. ... For as young as she is, the impact that she's made. I will say this, I do think her name should be on some of these national lists."

To think this season of watching Johnson almost never happened is a travesty. After a video of Iowa guard Caitlin Clark waving Johnson off beyond the 3-point line at the Final Four went viral, she spent a lot of days crying. She admitted to Andscape last month that the ordeal made her want to quit basketball.

"I was like, 'Dang, is this game for me?'" Johnson said.

She has proven to herself and the world that this sport is for her and that she's for this sport. Watching Johnson play basketball is an exercise in joy.

Her mindset for 2023-24 has been all about making it a "revenge season." Back in September she said the mantra was like an apology to herself for falling short of expectations last year.

But there seems to be no remorse in her game this season. Only action. Fast and unflinching.

How Bree Hall got her groove back with South Carolina Women's Basketball

Payton Titus, The State
January 23, 2024

The gym lights dimmed. A single spotlight hit her like a semi truck. And everyone in the room started to whisper.

"Look at you," the voices would say.

"Oh my God, you're such a loser."

Welcome inside the mind of Bree Hall, into the scene her brain used to show her when she made a mistake on the basketball court. No amount of reassurance seemed to boost her self-confidence.

"I just lacked it so badly," Hall told The State.

"I didn't feel like I was a factor. For some reason, in my own self, I didn't feel like I was an asset to the team."

But ever since South Carolina's 65-58 victory Nov. 30 over North Carolina, where the junior starting guard sank a game-cementing bucket in the final two minutes, she's had a different air about her. Through the 12-game stretch, Hall has stood taller, smiled wider and led the Gamecocks as their most accurate shooter.

She found a way out of her head. Now she's helping No. 1 South Carolina find itself.

Transitioning to college from high school basketball, where she finished as the all-time leading scorer at Wayne High School in Huber Heights, Ohio, was a challenge. She went to USC because she wanted to be part of a team. Eager to make an impact, she also went with the goal of starting right away.

Then came her first on-court workout.

Brea Beal — a junior at the time — did a crossover and hit Hall in the chest. The contact knocked her on the ground. So much for snagging somebody's spot.

"That was the most eye-opening moment ever," Hall said.

"I realized, maybe we need to go a different direction, because it's just not that easy. And there was a lot of tears, and a lot of upset moments."

Fear found its way into Hall's mind. The packed-out crowds, the possibility of making a mistake — both overwhelmed her to the point of inaction. Perhaps it was better to do nothing than to do something wrong.

"She wouldn't say it," Hall's mother, LaShauna Hall, told The State, "but subconsciously what she's telling her body to do, nothing was happening. She's just passing the ball out there because she's like, 'What if I miss? What if I get blocked? What if this happens? What if that happens?'"

"It consumed her."

Previously undefeated South Carolina fell 77-73 to Iowa in the NCAA Final Four. It marked the end of the beloved "Freshies" careers. Beal, Aliyah Boston, Zia Cooke, Laeticia Amihere and Olivia Thompson would graduate from USC, leaving the team largely in Hall's hands.

Afterward, Hall and coach Dawn Staley shared an intense moment.

"She looked me dead in my face and said, 'Get us back here, Breezy.'" Bree said.

No pressure.

Hall was one of three returning upperclassmen for the Gamecocks in 2023-24. Her new veteran status thrust her into a leadership — and starting — role for the first time since her senior year of high school. Boston, Hall's best friend and former teammate, worked with her throughout the 2022-23 season to prepare for that moment.

"I remember constantly being in Breezy's ear like, 'You're gonna have to make sure you're talking. You're gonna have to make sure you're doing the little things.' I would drop those nuggets here," Boston told The State. "Sometimes she would get so annoyed at me like, 'Aliyah, I get it.' I'm like, 'I'm just gonna keep going.' Because being a leader, especially on a top team for Coach Staley, is something that takes a lot, because you know the standard of South Carolina."

But when her time came, Hall still struggled with self-doubt. She called her mom during the beginning of this season to unload the thoughts she was harboring deep down.

"I'm terrible at this," LaShauna Hall remembers Bree telling her. "I don't know what it is. I'm just terrible."

LaShauna and Bree's dad, Bryan Hall, encouraged their daughter to talk with Staley, but Bree had a hard time being vulnerable with her head coach.

"It's your mom, and then it's Coach," Bree said. "So I would tell my mom everything. Every thought that comes to my head. Coach, I just felt like I couldn't tell her the things that I was talking about with my mom."

Not long before South Carolina's UNC game, one of LaShauna's friends, whose daughter plays basketball at Princeton, encouraged LaShauna to connect with Staley. Staley does a good job of checking in every once in a while, reaching out around birthdays, holidays and various other occasions. But this phone call would allow LaShauna to facilitate a conversation that needed to happen between Staley and her daughter.

The two women talked, and Staley seemed surprised to hear the extent to which Bree was struggling. Staley told LaShauna her daughter was in good shape, always showing up to practice prepared and never causing any problems.

LaShauna again encouraged Bree to talk to Staley, who now knew exactly what was going on: Bree had created a monster in her head. With Staley's help, they could slay it together.

"She is your boss, but she also is your confidant," LaShauna said to Bree. "She is your soft place to land."

Bree and Staley finally had their conversation. Staley told Bree she understood what she was going through, reassuring her that it was a normal and temporary feeling.

Bree might have had her doubts, but Staley had none.

"I think that definitely flipped the script in my head," Bree said.

When the Gamecocks arrived in Chapel Hill, Hall felt different. She played with ease, scoring 15 points in South Carolina's hardest-fought victory of the season. Her final three points came from the left wing at 2:08 left in the game, giving USC its largest lead, 60-52.

Usually, Hall overthought during games. She got caught up in stats and what everyone else on the court was doing. Against UNC, her mind was empty — and that was a good thing.

"I didn't feel like, 'Oh, my team doesn't need me. They can do it,'" Hall said. "I felt like they needed me. And I had this confidence and this just winning mentality going into that game."

She found her voice in the huddle that night.

"Who cares?" Hall told center Kamilla Cardoso after she missed a bucket.

"We're good," she assured sophomore guard Raven Johnson.

"Keep shooting," she urged senior guard Te-Hina Paopao.

From then on, Hall has averaged 11.9 points per game on a team-best 60.5% clip, including 60.9% from 3. She tied her career high of 18 points at Bowling Green and set a new personal record with 21 at Missouri.

"She's confident. She's level-headed, and she's playing her best basketball," Boston said.

And she's having fun. Her parents see it.

"I can look at her and just tell that she's happy out there, that she's comfortable," LaShauna Hall said. "She's found her space."

Bree's energy seems contagious. When she and Paopao are shooting, Bree said, it emboldens their teammates to shoot as well, turning what had been a weak point for the Gamecocks into one of their most deadly weapons.

The spotlight is on Hall, but not in the way she thought it was before. It doesn't emphasize her mistakes, but highlights her persistence, and she is making the most of her moment.

"She's finding herself," Staley said. "...I think her experience here at South Carolina, and all the things that created mental strength, is going to carry her throughout the rest of her life."

Local Heroes MiLaysia Fulwiley and Ashlyn Watkins are the present and future

*Chris Wellbaum, Gamecock Central
February 6, 2024*

If you want to slow down MiLaysia Fulwiley and Ashlyn Watkins, ask them how long they've known each other.

They played together on travel teams. Before high school. Maybe eighth grade? Middle school? Elementary school?

They finally agree that Watkins was in sixth grade and Fulwiley was in fifth grade when they first met. It doesn't sound like they are totally convinced that's accurate, but it's fair to say it's been a long time.

About seven miles separate Cardinal Newman, where Watkins played, and WJ Keenan, where Fulwiley played. They were highly sought-after recruits who chose to stay home and play about 11 miles away at Colonial Life Arena.

Now, Watkins, a sophomore, and Fulwiley, a freshman, are both the present and the future of South Carolina basketball.

"We worked really hard recruiting both of them," Dawn Staley said. "All of our local talent, we want them to stay here so we forge relationships with them. We envision the two of them playing together, playing a lot of minutes together, playing their entire careers here."

Keeping local talent home has long been the cornerstone of Staley's program, from Aleighsa Welch to Alaina Coates to A'ja Wilson, and many others. Next season the Gamecocks will add another local start in Camden's Joyce Edwards, currently the second-ranked prospect in her class.

Watkins (12) and Fulwiley (13) weren't as highly rated by recruiting services, but Staley saw the cornerstones of South Carolina's future. She described Fulwiley as a "generational talent" and Watkins might be the most athletic player in program history.

Each started her Gamecock career with a bang. Watkins won the McDonald's All-America slam dunk contest and then needed just three games to throw down her first collegiate dunk. Fulwiley became a viral sensation following her behind-the-back, no-look, reverse layup in her debut this season.

The highlights haven't gone away, but over the past couple of weeks, Watkins and Fulwiley have started to round out their play. For Watkins, that means being more assertive on offense. For Fulwiley, it's the defensive end.

"I feel like I'm actually looking to score now," Watkins said. "I used to get it and just pass it. I feel like now I'm looking to score."

"I feel like I just took a little bit more pride in my defense," Fulwiley said. "I just always wanted to get the ball and score and go straight to the rim and not defend. It's two sides to basketball. You can't score if you don't defend. Once I picked up my defense and started playing up to my expectations and defending well it worked out good for me."

The notion that they are just starting to figure things out is a scary prospect for opponents.

Watkins has notched consecutive double-doubles in the last two games as a fill-in starter for Chloe Kitts. Now that Kamilla Cardoso is out for the next two games to play for the Brazilian national team, Watkins could stay in the starting lineup as Cardoso's fill-in.

"Ashlyn's been coming," Staley said. "I think Ashlyn can provide that no matter where she is in the lineup. She makes it really hard. We see her contributions and we see her elevated play with more minutes. It's really encouraging."

Watkins doesn't care whether she starts or returns to her role off the bench. She said after the Ole Miss game that her approach stayed the same.

"I really wouldn't say that there was an adjustment," Watkins said. "I just played to my full potential and showed what I can do. I knew that my team needed me to get rebounds and stuff so I made an effort to play my best."

On or off the court, Watkins is soft-spoken and reserved by nature. Fulwiley and Staley both talk about pushing Watkins to reach her full potential. Staley said they try to force Watkins to be great.

"We want her to score," she said. "There's no question that she rebounds the basketball, she defends like no other. I think the one element that's missing in her game is consistently scoring. We are being very calculating in giving her the ball and seeing what she does with it. She's got to familiarize herself with spots on the floor where she can be effective offensively."

Fulwiley is fully aware of how good Watkins can be.

"I knew she was capable, so when Coach told her she was going to start I feel we all knew she was going to go out there and do what she does best," Fulwiley said. "She's brave. She's not afraid of anything."

Fulwiley and Watkins have strong chemistry on the court that comes from years of playing together. They always know where the other is, especially in transition, even if they aren't always on the same page.

It happened against Ole Miss. Fulwiley attacked the rim, and at the last moment tried to drop off a pass to Watkins. Except Watkins was already boxing out for the rebound. Fulwiley wasn't amused, but Staley was.

"They're doing a great job with feeling each other out," Staley said. "I know Lay catches Ashlyn off guard a lot, to the point where Ashlyn should stay ready. I think they had a little argument out there on the floor, but that's to be expected. Lay expects her to catch all of her passes and Ashlyn expects Lay to shoot them so she can get the rebound if she misses."

That pass aside, are they ever surprised by what the other can do? That's a matter of opinion

"Sometimes Lay surprises me because her bag is so deep," Watkins said. "I'm pretty sure it surprises everybody. Sometimes she does it in practice (where) she brings out different

Fulwiley said it was unexpected when Watkins started scoring more and creating for others, “But it’s not surprising.”

“She never surprises me. When she dunked, I knew she was going to dunk. When you watch the video I’m all the way at the end of the court knowing that she’s about to dunk,” Fulwiley said. “She can get a bucket any time.”

Payton Titus, The State
January 16, 2024

On Sunday, South Carolina coach Dawn Staley said Ashlyn Watkins had found her superpower.

On Monday, she flew.

Watkins recorded the second dunk of her career in the first quarter of USC's 62-point rout of Kentucky. Her — and the program's — first came last season at Clemson. But this one felt different.

"This one was better," Watkins said with a shy smile.

"It means a lot that I'm getting to actually show who I am."

Watkins stole the ball with wide open court in front of her. She stockpiled strength as she dribbled down the court, leaping up and dunking in the hoop in front of The Cockpit student section. The garnet-clad crowd at Colonial Life Arena roared and flew to its feet.

But the dunk, which Kentucky coach Kyra Elzy said contributed to the growth of women's basketball, was simply a public display of something larger Watkins has been cultivating behind the scenes. Her superpower, as Staley referenced Sunday, is Watkins' confidence and understanding of how she can best contribute to her team's success on both sides of the basketball.

She played 32 games last season and averaged 10.7 minutes, 4.9 points, 3.1 rebounds, 0.8 blocks and 0.7 steals each time out. This season she's averaging 19 minutes, 9.1 points, seven rebounds, 2.9 blocks and one steal per game.

"I think her defense is probably much more advanced than her offense at this point, but her offense is coming," Staley said Sunday. "And you can just see the progression to it. It's in practice. Now she's got to transition that to the game. And she will."

Defensively, Staley said Sunday, Watkins can be utilized all over the court. She can defend guards and switch. After USC's 81-57 victory Thursday over Missouri, Staley said she thought Tigers guard Hayley Frank could've easily scored 32 points rather than the 16 she actually netted had Watkins not guarded her with such effort.

Monday night, Watkins had 10 points (on 4 of 6 shooting), eight rebounds, three assists, two blocks and two steals. She attributed her growth this season to strides she's made on defense, while acknowledging she needs to work on looking to score more often.

Her dunk Monday night felt like a symbol of her growing confidence on the offensive end of the court. But ask Staley about the viral slam and she'll say Watkins dunks too often in practice for it to faze her. Staley jokingly challenged the 6-foot-3 forward to do it from halfcourt if she wanted to impress her coach.

Still, one wouldn't know Watkins' dunks were a regular occurrence by the way South Carolina's bench reacted to her emphatic slam. Watkins' teammates jumped from their seats, as did a majority of Gamecocks fans in attendance, and applauded her high-flying feat.

"It meant a lot to me, especially doing it here in Columbia," Watkins said. "I'm from Columbia, so just doing it for the FAMs and doing it for my family and my friends, everybody that came to support me at this game."

Fulwiley Says Getting Benched Helped Elevate Her Game

Kari Anderson, The Messenger
January 10, 2024

South Carolina freshman MiLaysia Fulwiley has quickly become one of the most exciting players on the No. 1 women's basketball team in the country. As a freshman, Fulwiley has started two games for the Gamecocks and is third on the team in total points, with 164, averaging 11.7 per game.

But the transition from high school to college basketball has been far from easy, especially when playing for Gamecocks head coach Dawn Staley and for a program that has exceptionally high expectations.

Fulwiley, who grew up in Columbia, South Carolina, told The Messenger that the first few days of Gamecocks practice were especially "tough" for her, noting that the biggest difference between high school and college basketball is the importance of small details.

"At the college level, you have to do all of these specific things. You have to pay attention and watch the details. It's just nothing like high school," the freshman guard said in a Q&A.

In one instance, she said, she went on the court without paying attention to instructions, and got confused about what she was supposed to do.

"And Coach Staley was like, 'This is not what we do here, I'm not tolerating this.' She didn't take nothing from none of us freshmen," Fulwiley said, adding that she and her teammates had to run as a result.

"I was like, 'I'm sorry guys.' So after that, I just had to lock in."

Fulwiley also shared her experience of getting benched earlier this season. When South Carolina played North Carolina on Nov. 30, Fulwiley played just three minutes before getting subbed off.

"My defense wasn't up to par so I sat out a game and I watched my team fight for a win and they won," Fulwiley said. "At first I was confused because I was actually doing good in practice, but then, when she (Coach Staley) broke it down for me, I came to the realization like, 'You're right, I don't do that as well on defense.'"

Fulwiley took Staley's feedback and feels like she's made some improvements since. (Her next step, she said, is to focus on turnovers and her help side defense.)

But sitting out a game also helped remind Fulwiley of South Carolina's collective goals. "If you have a big ego, you're just not gonna work here. You're just not going to fit in because everyone is just all in for each other," she said.

"We're trying to win a championship, at the end of the day. So whatever the coaches need us to do, that's what we're supposed to go out there and do. And it shows in practice: we go hard in practice, we compete."

South Carolina is one of only three remaining undefeated teams, along with No. 2 UCLA and No. 4 Baylor. The Gamecocks' next matchup is this Thursday, against Missouri, while the team's next ranked matchup is on January 25 against the defending national champions, No. 7 LSU.

Why South Carolina's freshman sensation is wowing Magic Johnson, the NBA and college basketball

Ben Pickman, The Athletics
January 25, 2024

Let's begin with the play, because what else initially comes to mind when thinking of South Carolina star freshman MiLaysia Fulwiley?

You know the one. Against No. 10 Notre Dame, in the season opener, in Paris. Fulwiley receives an inbound pass with just over two minutes to go until halftime and begins galloping up the floor. By the time she reaches the 3-point line, three defenders are inside the arc, but nothing is stopping her. Fulwiley picks up her dribble, goes behind the back with the ball and elevates. For a brief second, it looks as if she will attempt a scoop layup on the basket's right side. But then, in an instant, she cradles the ball to the left and uses her right hand to flip it up with the perfect amount of spin so it falls through the hoop. "The Eiffel Tower is shaking," ESPN's Ryan Ruocco says on the broadcast.

The razzle-dazzle electrifies the 3,200 spectators in attendance and hundreds of thousands watching on TV. Kevin Durant, amazed by the string of moves, tweets about it. Magic Johnson tweets it's "the best move in all of basketball including the pros like LeBron, Steph, KD, Victor, and Jokic" and urges his 5 million followers to seek out the replay. It's undeniably eye-popping. But to those who know Fulwiley best, the sequence isn't surprising.

"That play, we've seen it 1,000 times," her high school coach, Reggie McLain, says.

"She's just special. I have not seen a kid play the game the way she plays it," adds Ashley Rivens, her grassroots coach at Team Curry.

Although she's only a freshman, Fulwiley has been making on-court magic in Columbia, S.C., for as long as she can remember. She grew up a 13-minute drive from the university's campus. Long before she made Colonial Life Arena her stage, she created, and re-created, highlights in the driveway of her family's three-bedroom home and at nearby Crane Forest Park. She'd watch YouTube videos — often of LeBron James, Columbia native Seventh Woods or other mixtape stars — grab a ball and experiment for herself. She'd tell her sisters, Zyana and Jayla, to sit on the porch and count down from five. "One day, the camera is gonna be on me and I'm gonna be like everybody else I see on YouTube," Fulwiley says she would think to herself.

In daylight and darkness, on a strip of concrete or surrounding grass, in front of the house or at the goal in the back, she imagined nailing buzzer-beaters. She played in the park until she could no longer see the hoop. She practiced crossover combinations and spin moves. Eventually, in high school, the 5-foot-10 guard worked on dunking. (Yes, she can throw it down.) "You are gonna be somebody special," her mother, Phea Mixon, told her.

Fulwiley's highlights are a reminder, however, that just because something is routine for one person doesn't mean it's replicable for others. By the end of her seventh-grade season, McLain invited Fulwiley to join W.J. Keenan High's varsity playoff run. South Carolina and Ole Miss offered her scholarships before the school year ended. As an eighth-grader, she played high school varsity full-time. Keenan won four state titles and played in five championship games with her on the roster.

Immense talent hasn't led to immense ego, say those who know her best. Mixon describes her daughter as humble. Staley calls Fulwiley low-key and sometimes shy. "We have to teach her that you're not an ordinary young person," Staley says. Fulwiley, 18, knows she has much to learn. And though she's comfortable skying above defenders, she reminds herself to stay steady. To remain grounded, even when her aerial acrobatics go viral. "I'm in control of how I want to feel," she says. "My mom did a great job telling me, 'Don't get the big head because you can lose everything just how you got it.'"

As Fulwiley surged up ranking lists — eventually making her way to No. 13 in ESPN's Class of 2023 — and past her defenders, Mixon often put her daughter's opportunities over her own career in customer service. She prioritized attending Fulwiley's tournaments and college visits. "I really wanted MiLaysia to secure her future, because once I saw how special she was, I knew that things can change," Mixon says. Through hard work, she told her daughter, Fulwiley could accomplish what she aspired to achieve.

Fulwiley noticed her mother's efforts. "It means a lot to me," she says, "just knowing that my mom cares about me enough to stop things that's going on in her life (and) sacrifice." Mixon can count on one hand the number of times she's missed Fulwiley's games in high school or college.

Though she's competitive off the court — McLain says Fulwiley didn't even like to lose in PE kickball — she has largely maintained a singular focus. "Basketball has been my one and only love," she says. In elementary school, her answer to "What do you want to be when you grow up?" questions was always a professional basketball player. She stood out in youth events. Fulwiley recalls attempting a 3-pointer in a boys' church league game when she was only 6 or 7 and wondering if she was dreaming because she had tried a shot that even she thought was audacious. In the sixth grade, she scored 60 points in a game, but her team lost 71-70. She now calls her 60-piece "a waste" because of the result. Nevertheless, it brought more attention to her.

When McLain first watched Fulwiley play, as a seventh-grader, he saw a player who stood out among her peers. He observed her elite athleticism, prodigious basketball IQ and competitiveness. A motor Fulwiley describes as "go-go-go."

That spring, McLain added her to the high school's playoff roster, and she immediately dominated practices, taking over in one-on-one drills. Still, McLain adds, she was "extremely quiet." She didn't get fazed by the teachers, trainers and other coaches poking their heads in the gym to see her play.

Staley says the success of her program is "based on the kids in our area." A'ja Wilson is from Columbia. Alaina Coates is from a nearby suburb. "No one leaves the state," Staley says, "without them making it really hard for us to say no." The Gamecocks made it hard for Fulwiley to say no.

As she flourished in high school and on her grassroots team, her family kept envisioning her wearing garnet and black. It was initially only a lofty aspiration, but one they hoped could be a key step to reaching the WNBA. Mixon says Staley promised to hold Fulwiley accountable and help her reach the next level. The idea of staying home in Columbia also brought added excitement because her friends and family could easily see her play. Fulwiley's now-deceased grandfather, Charles, was a longtime Gamecocks fan. He wore the school's apparel and had school stickers on his car. He told Fulwiley he could see her suiting up there one day. She wears No. 12 in his honor; it was his favorite number.

One morning during Fulwiley's second week of summer classes at South Carolina, she arrived late for a team breakfast. She says she was only two minutes behind schedule. She thought nothing would come of it. But tardiness in college, she quickly learned, was different from being late in high school. Staley told her she would sit out of a practice.

The discipline resonated. "Stuff like that made me lock in," Fulwiley says. She told her mother: "Dawn does not play."

In the weeks and months that followed, Staley has continued emphasizing the team rules. She stresses to Fulwiley the importance of being on time to class and weight training and creating pro-ready habits. Even in moments of tension, Staley reminds Fulwiley of her potential.

“She’ll ooh and ahh us,” Staley says. “She’ll make me turn away from her because of a move she’ll make. I gotta walk away from it because it was so very good. And then she also has some things that she needs to work on that will make me scream at her. And I don’t like screaming at her because she’s got an angelic look to her. She doesn’t like to be screamed at, but certain things will hit me differently.”

In those instances, Staley will correct her, often prefacing the feedback by saying, “This doesn’t mean that you’re not a generational talent.”

In high school, Fulwiley was Keenan’s star. In college, she has starred at times, like in her 17-point, six-assist, six-steal outing against Notre Dame or in an 18-point, nine-rebound showing against Clemson. However, there have also been games when Fulwiley watched idly from the bench. She saw the floor for only three minutes in a 7-point win over North Carolina, with Staley saying Fulwiley lost her opponent a few times on defense. She played a mere 10 minutes in South Carolina’s 24-point victory over Missouri and missed all five of her field goal attempts. Yet it is then when coaches see Fulwiley’s trust in their decisions. “She really embraces the process, and I love that about her,” Staley says.

Against Texas A&M on Sunday, Fulwiley put on perhaps her best showing. She scored 21 points in 20 minutes, exploding past defenders in the pick-and-roll on multiple occasions. Staley said Fulwiley’s confidence translated to magic. The top-ranked Gamecocks matchup against No. 9 LSU on Thursday night provides another opportunity to unearth something amazing. But Staley also stresses that “the stuff in between the spectacular plays is where (her) greatness is really going to come.” In other words, how she makes the ordinary extraordinary.

Fulwiley says she has plenty to learn — too many things to rattle off. Staley notes Fulwiley can sometimes be unselfish to a fault and that she has room to “be in the gym a little bit more.” Fulwiley has nearly as many assists (40) as turnovers (34). Nevertheless, she takes feedback well. Coaches demonstrate something once, Staley says, and Fulwiley can execute it immediately. “She wants to be great,” Staley says. “And wanting to be great takes listening. It takes doing. It takes vulnerability.”

Fulwiley feels grateful to be at South Carolina, soaking up knowledge from the veterans. And although her stage has changed, she has stayed attached to her roots. She has returned to Keenan three times this season to watch the Raiders play. Once, she sat on the end of their bench, and she has spoken to the players at halftime. Sure, her sister Jayla is still playing there. However, Fulwiley goes back for more than that. “They played a big part as to why I’m here today,” she says. “I owe them my support and my dedication.”

Even with an arsenal of aerial attacks, she’s stayed tied to the ground. To her past. To her family. To Columbia. Mixon says, “I can’t tell you how many times I cried” seeing people scream her daughter’s name in Colonial Life Arena. She thinks about the sacrifices and how her father would say, “Whatever you do, you need to make time so that your daughter can follow her dreams.”

“I’ve prayed for times like this,” Fulwiley says. And in her driveway, she prepared for times like this, too.

9 to 3: Gamecock freshman Tessa Johnson's 3-pointer, explained

David Cloninger, Post & Courier
March 29, 2024

ALBANY, N.Y. — They all think the same the first time they see it.

“Oh my God,” teammate Chloe Kitts said. “She shoots so high.”

Tessa Johnson rolls to the wing or corner, gets the pass and lets the ball fly. Yet it's no ordinary 3-pointer.

Imagine holding that protractor you despised throughout high-school geometry at arm's length whenever Johnson sets up. Her feet are at zero, the basket is at 180 and the ball hits 90 degrees as its apex before gently descending toward the rim. That's how half-moon perfect the arc is.

If there was a timekeeper tracking release to splashdown, he'd wonder if the watch was broken. Yet in the greatest case of, “It doesn't matter how it gets there, it only matters that it does,” those 3-pointers that tickle clouds while they're sailing toward the promised land almost always land ... or land often enough so that in basketball, Johnson gets the kind of five-starred opponents' scout line that reads, “Do NOT leave her open from 3.”

They've gone in 43 percent of the time, second on the team to deadeye Te-Hina Paopao's nation-leading 47.6. Johnson would be 11th in the country in 3-point percentage if she had enough attempts to qualify.

She splashed three in the first half of South Carolina's 88-41 evisceration of North Carolina, soothing personal relief after putting up a goose egg in the Gamecocks' NCAA Tournament opener against Presbyterian, something she pinned on nerves. Those disappeared against the Tar Heels.

“Usually I'm pretty confident in my 3s,” she said. “I was open so I shot it.”

And like the others, they were so unique one just couldn't help but stare. Every coach she's ever had has seen it the first time and thought, “We got to fix that,” before it nestles home and they switch to, “If it ain't broke ...” It works for Johnson, and that's the only person for which it needs to work.

“I talked to her about it. ‘Have you always shot like that?’” recalled Paopao. “She says, ‘Yeah. My brother shoots higher.’”

Paopao chewed on that for a while, imagining the (im)possibility. “How much higher can you go from that?” she wondered. “But hey, it works for her.”

Family matters

Jemel Johnson isn't a man of science. He's a regular guy, devoted family man, basketball coach.

“I like to study things that I'm doing, to get better at them. I'm in the field of natural,” he chuckles. “It resorts to everything in life, especially sports. Kids are always better when they do things naturally, rather than if somebody trained them.

“They do what they feel, and your job is to teach them how to do it better.”

It's why he feels all the instructional “perfect form” and “the ‘right’ way to shoot” programs are hogwash. The only correct way is the way that makes the most sense for each individual.

Jemel taught all of his children how to shoot. Rae played at Iowa State, Tessa's at USC, Jeremiah is in the 11th grade and re-finding his basketball genes after an injury cost him his football career.

He got them to love the gym first, then taught them about the mechanics. When you're learning, don't aim at the rim.

Concentrate on form. The net?

Call it the “rainbow effect.” It's lifting, the legs supplying the power but the palm cradling the ball as the arm elevates.

“No force on your wrist. The wrist is relaxed, your arm pushes it out of your palm so all your wrist does is follow natural motion. Your wrist goes 1 to 9,” Jemel said. “Kind of like the rainbow. Let it go up to its peak, and let it fall.”

“He is very, very detailed about how to shoot. Obviously everyone's bodies are different, so form is a little different. But it's the same concept,” Tessa explains. “It's going straight up. A lot of people focus on going to the basket, we focus on going straight up on line.”

Perfect that motion and release, the ball hits the apex and begins to fall. Long as you lined up correctly when you shot, it's easy — equal distance from shot to landing, just make sure the highest point of the ball is the center of the journey.

“The J-Ball”

“He called me because his daughter plays for (Minnesota),” Hamre said. “It was the halftime entertainment where some of the young local kids got to play. He said, ‘Man, you got a fourth-grader out here hitting step-back 3s!”

“Actually,” Hamre snickered, “she’s a third-grader.”

Hamre, coach at St. Michael-Albertville in St. Michael, Minn., (about 35 miles from where another sweet-shooting prodigy, Paige Bueckers, grew up), knew what he had coming. He coached Tessa’s sisters.

“She’s always worked with her dad. He’s the one who taught her how to shoot that way,” Hamre said. “I know she’s had coaches that have said, ‘As well as it’s working, she’s got too much arc.’

As a sophomore, Johnson broke her leg. As soon as she could, she was on a rolling office chair with the back removed so she could attend practice.

Standing out of bounds in the corner, she started launching shots over the top corner of the backboard, keeping her rhythm while she couldn’t play. Hamre hollered that the team was going to do what it was doing until she missed.

“She made 12 in a row,” Hamre said. “Finally to help the team, I said, ‘OK, she has to switch to left-handed.’ She made three more in a row.”

State runner-up as a junior, Johnson was at Target Center to watch USC beat Louisville in the 2022 Final Four, two nights before they knocked out Bueckers and Connecticut to win the national championship. She committed to Dawn Staley that fall, won a state championship as a senior and then won the McDonald’s All-American 3-point shooting contest.

“I was like, ‘Wow, how come they don’t block it?’ Because she shoots kind of slow. I always tell her that,” Kitts said. “But it’s just so high, it’s beautiful. I want her to teach me how to shoot it but she won’t.”

What’s it called? The great ones have nicknames, like Kareem’s Skyhook and Larry Bird’s jumper, apparently so feared in Detroit that Isiah Thomas’ mother-in-law named it “Silent Death.”

USC radio broadcaster Brad Muller doesn’t have a set name for it, although he’s brushed off “Rainmaker” a few times. Another feeble suggestion from press row draws on Johnson’s Minnesota upbringing: “The Northern Light.”

“Dad thinks he’s funny and cool and calls it “The J-Ball” or something because our last name is Johnson and it’s a ‘J’ for ‘Jumper,’” Johnson says. “It’s not.”

She doesn’t call it anything. Her teammates haven’t chimed in, either.

“Tessa’s 3-point high-arching shot looks pretty when it goes in, and it looks like it’s going to go in every time when she shoots the basketball,” Staley said. “Didn’t try to change it. She scored a lot of points in the state of Minnesota.”

Wait. That’s it. You’ve heard of a 12-to-6 curve in baseball? Take that same clock and use it to replace the protractor when watching Tessa shoot.

She starts at 9. It lands at 3.

The “9 to 3.”

South Carolina star Kamilla Cardoso's 4,000-mile journey to the top

Grace Raynor, The Athletic
March 29, 2024

Kamilla Cardoso arrived at the airport about three days after her 15th birthday.

All of her friends from her hometown in Brazil had come with her for a makeshift sendoff party. So had her former basketball coaches, along with, of course, her mother, Janete Soares, and her older sister, Jessica Silva.

When it came time to say goodbye, Cardoso knew that if she bid farewell to everyone in her circle individually, she'd start crying. So she said an all-encompassing group goodbye to her friends and coaches — 'Bye everybody! I love y'all,' she sang in Portuguese. She saved the final minutes before boarding for her mother and sister.

The three of them had always been so close in Montes Claros. Like most younger sisters, Cardoso enjoyed tagging along to Silva's various sports practices. And like any parent, Soares had questions galore when her baby floated the idea of moving 4,000-plus miles away — solo — to play high school basketball in Tennessee with hopes of eventually pursuing a WNBA career. Would Cardoso be secure and cared for? Would she have people to support her? Was this plan trustworthy?

"OK," an emotional Cardoso told Soares and Silva on that 2016 day, bracing herself to board. "I've gotta go. Otherwise, I won't be able to get on this plane."

As Cardoso found her seat for the flight from Montes Claros to her connection in San Paulo, she did not know when she might see her family again. She was headed to Chattanooga, Tenn., to play for coach Keisha Hunt at Hamilton Heights Christian Academy, where Hunt had a reputation of developing top grassroots and high school talent, eventually including Cardoso's now-teammate at South Carolina, guard Raven Johnson. It was the right call, Cardoso knew — but heart-wrenching, nonetheless.

On the second leg of her trip, a 10-hour flight from Sao Paulo to Atlanta, Cardoso cried again. She fretted about knowing only three words in English: "Hi," "Yes" and "Bye." Four, if she counted "McDonald's." She worried about how homesick she knew she'd be.

"Now look at her," Hunt said earlier this month, about eight years later. "I'm just so proud of her."

On Friday, South Carolina, the best team in women's basketball, will meet Indiana in the Albany Regional for a Sweet 16 showdown as Dawn Staley's undefeated juggernaut seeks a third national title since 2017. Cardoso is arguably the heart and soul of the Gamecocks — at 6-foot-7, their leading scorer and rebounder, and the SEC's most dominant defender. Maybe the best defender in the country.

But it hasn't been easy to get to this point — now doing what she's always dreamed of.

"It means a lot," she said. "It just makes me feel like all the sacrifice was worth it, I didn't do it for nothing."

— A —

It is no secret that Cardoso — for both better and for worse — has been a trending topic.

Tensions had been brewing with Cardoso and LSU star Angel Reese throughout the SEC tournament championship, jockeying for position in the post. Reese had yanked Cardoso's hair, and the broadcast showed the two stars jawing throughout the game. With two minutes remaining, Flau'jae Johnson shoved South Carolina's Ashlyn Watkins. Cardoso flew in and pushed Johnson, who fell to the ground.

The act lit a match with both teams — nearly the entirety of both benches came onto the court as officials and coaches worked to separate the teams from fighting. The scene, which included Greenville, S.C., police arresting Johnson's brother who had jumped over the scorer's table and entered the court to apparently confront Cardoso, drew national attention for days.

South Carolina coach Dawn Staley immediately apologized to the basketball community on national television after the game. An embarrassed Cardoso released a statement on X to express her remorse.

She was the only player to receive a post-game consequence with a suspension for the first round of the NCAA Tournament against Presbyterian.

"I cannot change the past, but I can learn from it," Cardoso said last week. "And I'm a human. I'm going to make mistakes each and every day. I feel like I just let my emotions get the best of me at that moment, and from now on, I'll just learn to control that and just let the referees do their job.”

NCAA rules prohibited Cardoso from being on South Carolina's bench for the first-round game against Presbyterian. She told local reporters before the game that she planned to watch the game from the locker room and lounge area inside of the team's facility. It wasn't so much that she worried about the Gamecocks getting the job done. They'd already played four games without her this season when she briefly left the U.S. to play for Brazil's national team. Even though the Gamecocks went on to dominate Presbyterian 91-39, the idea of missing time on the court with her teammates stung.

By the time the Gamecocks moved on to their second-round matchup against North Carolina, Cardoso was emotional. She wiped away tears when the hometown crowd gave her a thundering ovation during the starting lineup introductions at Colonial Life Arena. This was possibly her last game there before the WNBA Draft, although she could come back for one more season. Against North Carolina, she scored 12 points with 10 rebounds as the Gamecocks waxed the Tar Heels by nearly 50 points.

Heading into the Sweet 16 matchup with the Hoosiers, Cardoso is one of the biggest matchup problems in college basketball — a force with a rare combination of size and speed — who can punish anyone on any given day.

She wasn't always a threat down low, though.

The first time she suited up for Hamilton Heights High in Chattanooga, the level of physicality stunned her.

“The difference from playing basketball in Brazil and playing basketball here, in Brazil, we do it for fun. ... A whole bunch of kids running up and down,” she said. “So when I first got to the United States, I had to play my first game. All I had — I was tall and I could make the layups. But besides that, I didn't have any other skills.

Hunt knew she had to get Cardoso on her roster from the first time she heard about this 6-foot-5 teenager.

Cardoso grew up enjoying soccer, volleyball, and swimming and diving more than basketball, but decided to give the sport a whirl after her sister's coach saw her watching practices from the bleachers and recommended she try it. Cardoso obliged. Turns out, she loved it. She started playing middle school ball in Brazil, then got a scholarship to a private school as she developed into a better player. From there, she began competing in tournaments, which helped her grow her name.

“We had this one big tournament and this (agent) came up to me and he was like, ‘Well, I think you've got potential to go play in another big city or another country. You're really good,’” Cardoso said.

Cardoso's original plan was to play in Portugal — still on another continent, but at least somewhere where she could still speak her native Portuguese.

“Then this agent came along again and he was like, well, I don't think Portugal is the best fit for you. You're 6-5. You're 14 years old. You should go play in the United States. You have the potential to do so over there,” Cardoso recalled.

Hunt first got word of Cardoso when an assistant coach at the collegiate level sent her a message about a player in Brazil who was headed to the U.S., most likely somewhere in Florida, with WNBA aspirations. Hunt had a keen eye for identifying talent, and the college coach felt that Cardoso would be better served playing for her in Tennessee. The assistant coach sent a video of Cardoso from three years earlier — when she was about 12 years old — for Hunt to review.

“The first thing I noticed was how fast she was running up and down the floor. She was probably 6-foot-5 at that age,” said Hunt, who no longer coaches at Hamilton Heights. “She missed a few shots, but she was hustling all over the place, getting rebounds. She just didn't have the touch on her shot yet.”

Cardoso enrolled at Hamilton Heights, a small, private Christian school, in 2016 after the agent in Brazil came to her house and walked her and her mother through her options. “We really had to work on my defense. We really had to work on dribbling and stuff like that,” Cardoso said. “I was getting pushed around in practice. Everybody was so physical. In Brazil, we didn't have any of that.”

It took Cardoso about five months to get settled, Hunt said. On the court, Hunt and Cardoso's teammates regularly called plays in Portuguese so she could understand her job — something Staley and the Gamecocks also did in her early years with the program. It wasn't until last year, Cardoso said, that she felt fully comfortable in English.

Off the court, Cardoso still regularly yearned for home. She called home daily to fill her mother and sister in on her new experiences. But about four months in, she noticed she had started to feel less sad. She lived with Hunt, her daughter, Treasure — currently a guard at Arizona State — and three teammates from Nigeria, all of whom communicated with her through Google Translate and helped her with her homework.

“I felt like, oh, they're wrapping their arms around me. They want to help me,” Cardoso said. “I got really close with the girls who lived with me so it was just like I had a second family, a family away from home. It was amazing. I learned a lot of different cultures. They're the reason I know English today.”

It didn't take long for college coaches to take note of Cardoso — both on Hunt's high school team and on the grassroots circuit. Even when NCAA rules prohibited coaches from speaking to Cardoso as a freshman, they made sure Hunt knew how interested they were.

“She was special. I could tell,” Hunt said. “Right away, as soon as they saw her, they knew too.”

Cardoso blossomed into a five-star recruit in the Class of 2020 and the nation's No. 5 prospect, per ESPN recruiting rankings. She initially signed with Syracuse out of high school, in part because of a connection to the coaching staff through one of her contacts in Brazil, Hunt said. But she transferred to South Carolina — one of her original finalists in the recruiting process the first time — ahead of the 2021-22 season to play for Staley, whose reputation of developing post players and, generally being considered one of the coolest coaches in college basketball, drew her to the program.

“Kamilla could have gone anywhere in the country, but she chose to come here,” Staley told reporters recently. “She trusted us enough to come here and continue her career. It means the world.”

At the end of a routine practice in Columbia earlier this month, Cardoso approached a few of her teammates in the locker room with a request.

Senior Day was coming on Sunday, March 3, for the No. 1 Gamecocks at Colonial Life Arena. Soares and Silva had been unsuccessful in obtaining visas in each of their last four attempts and Cardoso had accepted her family wouldn't be able to be there for her special day. Cardoso wondered, then, if teammates Raven Johnson, Bree Hall and Sania Feagin would escort her to center court for the traditional festivities. All four players had come into Staley's program at the same time. It felt right.

Behind the scenes, though, Staley had made other plans.

Cardoso had visited home for summers and holidays, most recently spending three days in Brazil around Christmas. But Soares and Silva had never seen her play basketball in the United States. Staley and South Carolina administrators quietly enlisted the help of U.S. Rep. James Clyburn (D-S.C.) to get the visas approved as they orchestrated a Senior Day surprise.

At the end of practice on March 2, Staley started to give a speech about Cardoso and all of the sacrifices she'd made to play basketball so far from home.

"When she started talking, I was crying and I was like, I don't even want to listen anymore because I'm going to cry even more. I looked to the door. And there was my mom and my sister," Cardoso said.

Underneath a hot pink headband, she buried her face into her hands and wept again as she approached them for a family embrace. The next day, she dropped 18 points and hauled in 14 rebounds in 24 minutes en route to a 76-68 victory over Tennessee as South Carolina finished the regular season a perfect 29-0. They celebrated later that week with a steak dinner, a trip to the zoo and runs to Walmart and Target, which Silva had only seen on TikTok.

"That's a dream come true," Cardoso said of her time with them.

Cardoso has one more year of eligibility if she wants it. Still, she's a projected first-round pick in the upcoming WNBA Draft with her best basketball still ahead of her, Hunt believes.

"She's not a one-dimensional player," Hunt said. "She really can play basketball. And I think, as much as she's improved in college, she has not reached her ceiling."

Said one WNBA GM in The Athletic's anonymous draft scout: "If I had to rank the top bigs in the draft, she'd probably be one."

If Cardoso has indeed played her final game at Colonial Life Arena, she feels good about what might be next.

She's come a long way from the terrified 15-year-old, missing home and needing Google Translate for everyday life. Soares and Silva could be seeing more of her games, too. Both of their visas were extended for 10 years, so they can come to the U.S. and stay for three months at a time, Cardoso said.

"How I feel about being here right now, I've just gotta keep working hard and hopefully I can make it to the WNBA," she said. "If not, just go play overseas and just keep taking care of my family. ... I do think I have much more in my bag. I've just got to stay confident and believe more in myself."

Raven Johnson finding her comfort zone while South Carolina tries to finish off perfect season

Eden Laase, Yahoo! Sports
March 29, 2024

ALBANY, N.Y. — It's Raven Johnson's 21st birthday. The South Carolina point guard is mid-glam session, on FaceTime with her coach, Dawn Staley. Johnson's lips are lined with chocolate brown, topped with gloss. Her hair is long and blonde, curled perfectly at the ends. She's wearing a silver varsity-inspired jacket, dark denim mini-skirt, black platform boots and her signature "R" necklace.

On the other side of the phone, Staley hypes her up. But Johnson doesn't need it. The birthday girl is radiating confidence, and not just because it's her special day. Johnson exudes self-love and belief. She looks good, and she knows it.

You see Johnson's confidence on the court, too. The way she commands South Carolina's offense, how she directs her teammates, setting them up to score. But that wasn't always there. Certainly not last year, Johnson says. But with Staley's guidance, and the guard's persistence, it is now.

"You don't have to be the best player out there," Johnson said a few weeks after her birthday. "As long as you have confidence, that can take you a long way. If you believe in yourself, no one else can stop you."

After an injury sidelined her in the 2021-22 season, Johnson came off the bench in 2022-23. This year, she's stepped into a starting role, and her stats have doubled across the board. She's averaging eight points, 5.3 rebounds, 4.8 assists and 2.1 steals per game. Johnson has also increased her 3-point shooting percentage from 24.1% to 32.3%.

The sophomore is better in every way, but her assist-to-turnover ratio is what stands out. At 2.84, it's the seventh-best mark in the country, and the best of anyone left in the tournament.

That starts with Kamilla Cardoso, who Johnson says is her "favorite target." The two have played together since AAU.

"Passing to Kamilla is my bread and butter," Johnson said.

The rest of the connections took time, but now Johnson knows where her shooters like to catch the ball, which block the South Carolina posts favor, and how to play in tandem with guards like Te-Hina Paopao and MiLaysia Fulwiley.

"It's all about going from fast to slow and slow to fast," Johnson said. "That and knowing my personnel, building a connection and chemistry with all of my teammates."

Johnson also knows she doesn't have to be a star. College basketball is littered with scoring point guards, players who look for a bucket first and a pass second. But that's not what South Carolina needs. Six Gamecocks average more than nine points a game — Cardoso, Fulwiley, Paopao, Ashlyn Watkins, Chloe Kitts and Bree Hall. They need someone to set them up. They need a traditional point guard, and that's Johnson.

"A true point guard is rare to find these days," Johnson said. "But I think a point guard is someone who can set up others. You look out for your teammates and put them in good positions. Then, you shoot when your time comes, when it's open for you."

In her team's Sweet 16 win over Indiana on Friday, it came with three minutes left.

The Hoosiers cut what was once a 22-point lead down to five. Johnson scored six points in 2:51, and had a key assist to Cardoso to help close out the game.

Three of those points came on a long-range bucket with 53 seconds left. A year ago she might not have had the confidence to even take the shot. But on Saturday, she swished it.

"I'm really proud of her," Paopao said. "It's a confidence thing with her, and I'm so happy she had the confidence to shoot that. When she's in rhythm, she's lights out."

Johnson has always been a willing passer, but she didn't know what kind of point guard she was until meeting Staley during the recruiting process. Even before Johnson signed with the Gamecocks, the coach started filling her with confidence.

It was around that time that the comparisons started coming. Between the two, Johnson started to believe she could be an elite college point guard.

"Coach Staley always used to tell me that I was a great point guard," Johnson said. "And then people would tell me that I reminded them of Chelsea Gray. And I was like, 'Are you serious?' Like, she's elite."

After the season-ending injury early in the 2021-22 season, and last year's tournament run that ended in the Final Four, Johnson's confidence dipped. She remembers the hype South Carolina had heading into its matchup with Iowa, and how those compliments turned to hate once the Gamecocks were eliminated.

This season, she said in November, would be "revenge season." And so far, the point guard has made good on that declaration.

With the 79-75 win over Indiana on Friday, the Gamecocks are one victory away from the Final Four. Two victories away from Johnson erasing the memories from last year. And three games away from South Carolina claiming the program's third title.

Johnson's role is important to reaching that goal.

"If you look at a lot of teams that win a national championship, or teams that have a lot of success, they do it with a true point guard," Johnson said.

And that's what Johnson wants more than anything.

2023-24 SOUTH CAROLINA ATHLETICS - PRESS CLIPS

"I'll do anything it takes to win," Johnson said. "I'll play the five, I'll get down and dirty on defense, guard the best player, whatever it takes."

Sometimes that means facilitating. And other times, it means hitting a big 3 to send South Carolina to the Elite Eight.

South Carolina guard MiLaysia Fulwiley has skills you haven't even seen yet

Jannelle Moore, Andscape
April 1, 2024

It's not enough for South Carolina guard MiLaysia Fulwiley to push the tempo in transition. She blows by two Clemson defenders, fakes a pass and finishes the layup. A few sequences later, she crosses up a defender and drops a no-look dime to forward Ashlyn Watkins.

Too skilled. Too fast. Too good.

Many plays for Fulwiley have been identical to this in her freshman season, and she continues to amaze as the Gamecocks prepare for their national semifinal game against NC State at the women's Final Four in Cleveland. The Columbia, South Carolina, native reflected on the season, her impact on the game, NIL deals and more.

There are moments of realization for everyone, an "a-ha" moment. What was yours in terms of knowing that 'I'm a hooper and on top of that, I'm nice with it.' When did that come into play for you?

It came into play in my younger days when I first started playing basketball and I hit a 3-pointer. My first 3-pointer was when I realized 'I'm actually tough' because I used to play with the boys. When I finally scored, I was like 'OK, I might actually be good.' Then the next year, I started to lead the team and that's when I realized that I'm a hooper for real, this is the sport I want to play and have fun playing it.

As a seventh grader, you moved up to varsity, won a championship, and you were recruited by South Carolina. What was that like as a seventh grader?

I didn't understand what was really going on. I was just playing basketball, but I think [South Carolina coach] Dawn [Staley] heard about me. She heard about one of my games when I was in seventh grade, and I got moved up from middle school. I was just playing just to win a championship, but I was opening eyes for not only Dawn but other coaches. So, I was very happy and excited. I thought my offers would come in high school but to get them in seventh grade, I was just blessed. It changed my whole life. It changed my whole perspective of things. Everyone was cheering and rooting for me ever since I got my offer from Dawn. It just made everything brighter, and it turned my life up a little bit.

Where did you get your handles from and who did you pattern your game after?

My handles, I think they came naturally for me. Just dribbling the ball each and every day. I used to play basketball on my porch with no goals, so I just dribbled a lot. As far as my style of play, I used to watch a whole lot of videos on YouTube, mixtapes and I'd just try to re-create the moves on the court. The behind-the-back move I do a lot, I got that from [Los Angeles Lakers forward] LeBron [James] and watching highlights when I was younger. I'd watch basketball a lot and then try to re-create it in my yard.

You mentioned LeBron. Is there anyone else in these tapes that you shape your game after or looked up to?

The behind-the-back moves is what I got from LeBron but as far as looking up to any NBA athlete, I'll say Stephen Curry the most. Considering the fact that I'm signed under him and he does some great things not only with the basketball but within the basketball community. I played for him and got to know him a lot while going to his camp. Just being signed to him means a lot to me just knowing he chose me to be the first Curry Brand girl.

You mentioned Steph's camp and his work ethic. What else have you learned from him during this experience?

I learned a lot. The camp was very amazing. I was kind of nervous to talk to him. I remember watching him practice and making all of his shots. I remember him telling us it's not about how long you practice, it's about what you do in those practices and how efficient you are. I just took that away from the experience.

When I go inside the gym and work out, I make sure I'm actually going in there and putting in the work, and not being in there for a whole lot of hours, because 30 minutes is the same as two hours if you're not really doing anything. That's one thing I remember him saying. When you get in the gym, use your time wisely. Go strong, go fast, and go hard.

In addition to Curry Brand, you are also signed with Red Bull. What's drawing these brands to you?

I think it's just me being myself. Ever since I started being on social media and started playing basketball, I've always been myself. I've never portrayed to be anything but myself. I think they like how authentic I am, how real and how cool I am. I think I'm a good partner to partner with, and I'm so grateful that all these companies are giving me the opportunity to sign under them. I think me and Red Bull just clicked as soon as I talked to them. My sports management team gave them ideas and Red Bull accepted me, and I'm just blessed to see what we have in store.

Coming out of high school, top prospects are expected to start. How did you process coming off the bench?

I knew what we had before I got here. I just stayed the course, listened and just did anything my team needed me to do. When I knew I wasn't starting — which I already assumed I wasn't starting — it gave more fuel to my gas tank and made me work a little bit harder. Being a top player in high school and coming into college is humbling. I feel like I got very humbled and just understanding that playing with other great players would not go exactly how you want, but take your time and your time will come.

You won a lot in high school, but what is it like in terms of the pressure and the lights being brighter in your first March Madness appearance?

It's totally different from high school, I can say that. Getting ready for a state championship is totally different from getting ready for a national championship. I feel like the lights are very bright. Everyone around the world is watching. So, you have that feeling that you want to do whatever possible to help your team win. The individual performances will come. If they don't and you win, it doesn't matter. I go out there and try to win and I think I've been doing a good job of that. Going out there and doing whatever my team needs me to do has been my mindset since March started.

You are a one-woman highlight reel. What goes through your mind when you make these incredible plays? Is it instinct? How deep does your bag go?

If I ever do a move, it's because I have to. I got away from doing moves for no reason. Now, I think all the moves I do I have to use them. They [defenses] force me to dig inside my bag. That's when I realized that my bag is really deep.

When I get cut off, I do another move. When a big comes and helps, I do another move. As far as how deep my bag gets, I think it's gets very deep. I have tricks I haven't even pulled out yet. I play smart and I go off of my instincts, and I have my best highlights in the world when I don't think about them.

The Gamecocks could be the ninth team in NCAA women's basketball history to run the table and be an undefeated champion. What will it take to get it done?

I feel like we need to do the same thing we've been doing. Don't jinx ourselves and look ahead. Just take it game by game and day by day. I think that's what we've been doing a good job with. We're trying to get through each game and we don't downplay any team. If we follow Coach Staley's lead and do everything she wants us to do, we might have a chance to make history for South Carolina. We have a chance to do it and I've very excited for that.

2023-24 SOUTH CAROLINA ATHLETICS - PRESS CLIPS

What is your biggest takeaway from your freshman season and what have you learned under Coach Staley about yourself?

My biggest takeaway from this season so far is probably just being poised at all times because I tend to get rattled up, get angry, and mad at the refs. It throws my game off. This team and this coach taught me how to stay poised and calm.

Off the court, she taught me how to be a better woman and just handle my business. She emphasizes that a lot. Handle your business. Get your business done, so you won't have to worry about it when you step on the court. I've been doing good with that and I'm just blessed to have a coach like her.

The women's game as a whole is growing on the collegiate level and the WNBA. New fans are starting to tap in. What do you wish people knew about the women's game?

That it just didn't get to where it is over a year and we've been working hard for it to get where it is. I feel like people should stop downplaying it like last year was the only reason we're succeeding and our numbers are going up, and all of us is playing a big role in the numbers. I want people to know that we still want more and we're coming.
