

Resveratrol: Discovered in nature, backed by science

Resveratrol is a polyphenol that is naturally produced by grapes, blueberries and other plants as a defense against harsh growth conditions and pathogens.

With more than 12,000 studies published and over 170 human clinical studies, resveratrol is considered one of the most studied compounds since its discovery. Resveratrol was discovered in wine as a result of the health benefits observed in the French diet associated with the "French Paradox."

Beyond being a powerful antioxidant and scavenger of free radicals, resveratrol can potentially help restore the body's balance through multiple mechanisms of action based on its molecular structure, cellular and systemic effects. This versatile ingredient has been shown to have potential benefits in the areas of cardiovascular health, attention and concentration, healthy gut microbiome, blood glucose maintenance, skin health, and bone and joint health.
