Rutgers head football coach being investigated

Rutgers University's office of ethics and compliance are currently investigating communications between Rutgers head football coach, Kyle Flood, and an academic faculty member.

Coach Flood is accused of using a personal email account to contact a faculty member in regards to the academic status of cornerback, Nadir Barnwell. The severity of punishment depends on the content of the email according to Rutgers University officials.

It's not clear whether Flood could be in violation of the NCAA or the Big Ten just by reaching out to the professor of one of his players. A university official overseeing the investigation said the university's compliance department prohibits coaches from communicating with instructors.

A similar situation occurred in 2014. The NCAA penalized the University of Georgia head swimming coach for a similar matter and the NCAA ruled the case a level two violation. The Georgia coach was suspended from 50 percent of regular season competition during that season and was stripped from all recruiting duties for one year.

Coach Flood could see a similar situation for himself in the near future.

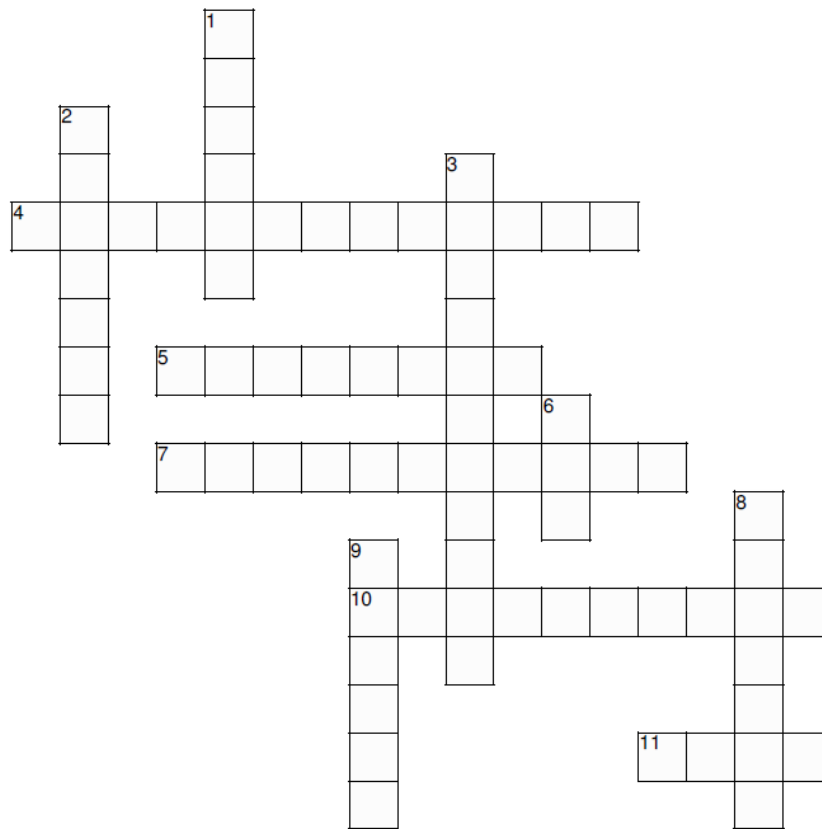

Update on Illinois head football coach Tim Beckman

Illinois has fired head football coach Tim Beckman following allegations of player mistreatment. The allegations against Beckman first originated on May 10, when former lineman Simon Cyjanovic said in a series of messages that coach Beckman and some other staff members had tried to convince him into playing hurt and gave him false information about his injury on his knee. The University of Illinois said Friday that the investigation found indication of "efforts to deter injury reporting," along with attempts to force medical decisions "that pressured players to avoid or postpone medical treatment and continue playing." Tim Beckman will not collect the $3.1 million remaining on the final two years of his contract and Bill Cubit was named interim head coach for the upcoming season.
