

You may only vote for candidates of one party in the primary

Unlike most other states, Wisconsin law gives voters the freedom to choose which political party's primary they wish to vote in without having to register to vote with a party affiliation or designation. However, they may only vote within one party's primary on the August ballot.

If you vote for candidates in more than one party, your votes will not be counted. If you make a mistake, like voting for candidates in more than one party, when voting, you may ask for a new paper ballot, up to a total of three.

There is a party preference safeguard at the top of your ballot. Selecting a party preference is not required, but if you select a party preference, it ensures that your votes are counted for that party's candidates if you accidentally vote for a candidate in another party.
