Ethical Dilemmas on a University Campus

1. Your classmate tells you that she "obtained" a copy of a very difficult final (i.e. Organic Chemistry) and she is willing to share. Do you report her? Do you make a copy of the final for yourself? Do you just ignore the offer?
2. You find that throughout the past few weeks, money has been "disappearing" from your wallet. Your roommate suddenly has a lot of spending cash at her disposal. Every time that you leave her alone in the room, you find that money is missing. Should you confront her about it? Do you speak to a resident assistant or the residence supervisor?
3. You find that when you talk to your professor about schoolwork, he begins to discuss other students and faculty members. He tells you the marks of other students from tests and comments about their papers. During the course of conversation, he mentions that he has a personal aversion to a particular student. Despite the fact that she is an A student, he will lower her grade. Do you report him to the academic Dean? Do you tell the student? Should you talk to the faculty member directly about his conduct?
4. You are standing in the lobby and your friend has just told you a racist joke. While laughing, you realize that a security guard has been behind you the whole time and has overheard the conversation! Do you apologize? Do you avoid the guard from now on? Is the above an example of Chilul Hashem?
