Q: What should I do immediately after an intersection accident?

A: Get medical attention first, even if you feel okay. Then document the scene with photos of vehicle damage, the intersection, traffic signals, and any visible cameras. Collect contact information from witnesses.

Q: Should I talk to the other driver's insurance company?

A: Do not give a recorded statement to the other driver's insurance company. They may try to use your words against you.

Q: What kind of evidence should I document at the scene?

A: Take photos of vehicle damage, the intersection itself, traffic signals, and any visible cameras. Also, collect contact information from any witnesses present.

Q: Why is it important to preserve evidence quickly?

A: Evidence like traffic camera footage can be overwritten or lost if not preserved promptly. Acting fast is crucial for your case.

Q: How can a lawyer help after an intersection accident?

A: A lawyer can help preserve crucial evidence, protect you from insurance company tactics, and build a strong case for compensation.

Q: What if I don't feel injured immediately after the crash?

A: It's still essential to seek medical attention. Some injuries, like whiplash, may not show symptoms right away but can be serious.

Q: What are common causes of intersection accidents?

A: Common causes include failure to yield, running red lights or stop signs, distracted driving, and improper turns.

Q: What information should I get from witnesses?

A: Collect their names and contact information. Their testimony can be vital in determining fault.

Q: When should I contact an attorney?

A: Contact an attorney as soon as possible after the accident to begin preserving evidence and protecting your rights.

Q: What is the role of traffic cameras in accident investigations?

A: Traffic cameras can record events leading up to and during an accident, providing valuable evidence. It's important to request this footage quickly before it's deleted.

Q: What if the other driver was clearly at fault?

A: Even if fault seems obvious, the other driver's insurance company will likely investigate thoroughly. Having legal representation ensures your side is properly presented.
