Dear fin Walter:

Democrats throughout the country are looking forward to the next eighty days with a renewed sense of optimism and purpose. And that, in no small part, is due to the strong and clear message which was delivered by our party at the convention.

Speaker after speaker articulated a vision for our country which, in the best tradition of our party, demanded change and proposed a new vision for our nation--one which puts people first, which links growth with fairness, and which combines opportunity with responsibility.

As one of the surrogate speakers during convention week, you should take great pride in the role you played in developing and delivering this message. Our challenge now is to continue to fight for what hard-working families deserve--good jobs, world-class education, quality health care, and safe neighborhoods.

If we manage to keep this campaign on the issues that matter most to the American people, we will bring about the change this country desperately needs.

I will always be grateful for your help in defining the central ideas of this presidential campaign. These ideas will carry us to victory in November.

Sincerely,

Bill

Bill Clinton
