Grand Rapids Herald-Review, Oct. 9, 1940: Craigville. There is no longer a postoffice at Craigville, the frontier village in Koochiching county a few miles north of Effie. On orders from Washington, the office was discontinued on October first. Organized about 1912, the Craig postoffice, as it was then known, was in charge of Mrs. Barton at the Sam McAfee store. This was just inside the Itasca county line. As the settlement half a mile further north, on the banks of the Bigfork river, was developed, the postoffice was moved there.... Residents of Craigville are now served by the mail route from Northome to Effie, which goes north to Craigville, and north and west to Highway No. 6, and back to Northome.

Reports on the geology of the parts of Canada and Minnesota surrounding Rainy lake, published in 1889-1901, give this name to a large series of Archaean mica schists, outcropping in this county on Rainy lake, around Black bay, and southward on the

Little and Big forks and at and near Net lake.
(Geology of Minnesota, Final Report, VOL. IV, 1899, chapter VIII, pages 166-211, with maps and sections; VOL. VI, 1901, plate LXV.)

This name is a variant form of the Cree and Ojib-way name of Rainy lake and river, which is applied to this county and a township, the pronunciation in the two forms being alike.

Description &
Name Origin •

The descent of the river here, in broken rapids on irregularly jutting ledges of granitoid gneiss, was 23 feet mainly within a distance of about 300 feet; but a dam close above the falls completed in 1908, increased their head to 26 ft., raising the river to the level of Rainy lake and permitting the lake

• Steamboats to come to International Falls. Before the stream was used for its water-power, operating the great paper mills at International Falls, the plentiful mists and spray of the falls, which nearly always formed a rainbow in the sunshine, well accounted for the aboriginal origin of the names of Rainy lake and river.

The name 'Koochiching' ^{city of} ~~for International Falls~~ [for the falls in Rainy River] was suggested by H. V. Winchell and was formally adopted by Mr. Winchell, Mr. Fletcher and myself at a conference in our office in Minneapolis in April, 1894 (C. J. Rockwood, secy. of the Koochiching Company, quoted in International Falls Press, Nov. 27, 1941)

Description &
Name Origin

The Ojibway name was written ASUBIX ONE by Gilfillan. Meaning "taken or entangled in the net." Its origin as told by the Bois Fort Ojibways: In the treaty at Washington April 7, 1866, providing the Bois Fort or Net Lake Indian

• Reservation, the name given to Net Lake by the Ojibways was spelled AS-SAG-A-CO-NA. Albert B. Reagan, who was the U.S. Agent here in 1909-14, writes the traditional origin of this name, received as a myth of the Bois Fort Medicine Men. The Ojibways, coming first by the route of Vermilion and Pelican lakes, are said to have found on the little island of Net Lake many strange beasts, "half sea-lion and half fish," who fled westward by swimming and wading thru the shallows and mostly rice-filled lake. "On coming to the island the canoe man paddled around it, and by the track of the muddied water pursued the beasts across the lake and up a creek till they found where the earth had swallowed them, as if they had been caught in a net." (by S.)
The myth is thought to refer to the flight + escape of a party of their enemies, the Sioux, whom the Ojibways by manupraids and ~~latter~~ drove away from in common Ojibway use, it does not strictly belong to that language. Jacques de Noyon, a French Canadian voyageur, who was probably the first white man to traverse any part of the northern boundary of Minnesota, about the year 1688, passed through Rainy lake. Another early narrative of travel 1740-42 by a French and Ojibway half breed named Joseph La France, containing a description of the Rainy lake is given in a book published by Arthur Dobbs in London in 1744, entitled "an account of the countries adjoining to Hudson's Bay." La France passed through Rainy lake in the later part of April and early May, 1740.

Description &

Name Origin

The descent of the river at International falls, in broken 4/19 rapids on irregularly jutting ledges of granitoid gneiss, was 23 feet, mainly within a distance of 300 feet, but a ^{dam} Rock 40 dam built ^{close} above the falls raised their head to 26 feet;
 over

raising the river to the level of Rainy lake and permitting the lake steamers to come to this city. Before the stream was thus used for its water power, operating the great paper mills of International Falls, the plentiful mists and spray of the falls, which nearly always formed a rainbow in the sunshine, well accounted for the aboriginal origin of the names of Rainy lake and river.

Jacques de Noyon, a French Canadian voyageur, who was probably the first white man to traverse any part of the northern boundary of Minnesota, about the year 1688

found the name Koochiching used for Rainy river in the Cree language. A perpendicular Water-fall of Rainy lake, by which the water falls into a river South-west of it, which raises a Mist-like Rain. This refers to the outflowing Rainy river in its formerly mist-covered falls, since 1908 dammed and supplying water-power in the city of International Falls for the largest paper-

This County bears the Cree name, applied by the Ojibways to Rainy Lake and Rainy River and to its great falls and rapids at International Falls. It is translated by J. A. Giffillan as Neighbor Lake and River. He remarked that this word is of difficult or uncertain meaning, and that altho in common Ojibway use, does not strictly belong to that language.

4/19/40

Morse

Jaques de Noyon, a French Canadian voyageur, who was probably the first white man to traverse any part of the northern boundary of Minnesota about the year 1688, found this name used in the Cree language for the Rainy river.

As narrated by the Intendant Begon, written at Quebec 11/12/1716 published in the Margry Papers (vol VI, pages 495-8) de Noyon, about 28 years earlier had set out from Lake Superior by the canoe route of the Kaminstiquia river, in the hope of coming to the sea of the West. He passed through Rainy lake, called the lake of the Crees and wintered on its outflowing river, the Takamanicouen, "otherwise called Ouekicig by the Crees", evidently the Koochiching or Rainy river and falls, from which this county is called or named.
