A translation from the Ojibway name, referring to a grave, given by Gilfillan as Tchibequmigo, House of the Dead, from the custom of the Indians to build the resemblance of a little house over a grave. About 1843, beside the eastern part of the lake, some 30 or 40 Ojibways, comprising only old men, women, and children, were killed by a war party of Sioux, whence the lake and river were named. Upham, 404,405: Leaf Mountains. A range 5 to 3 miles wide, composed of very irregular, roughly outlined hills, 100 to 300 feet high. The name is a translation from the Ojibway, given by Gilfillan as Gaskibugwudjiwe, translated as Rustling Leaf Mountain. (Upham,396). The common designation as mountain has currency because they are the only hills in this part of Minnesota which are conspicuously seen at any great distance.

Description & Name Origin A long and narrow sand bar, having an outline suggestive of an otter, formed very long ago and now covered with large woods, which extends curvingly southeast and South between the last mile of the inflowing Otter Tail or Red river and the lake..... The late Hon. J.V. Brower, who visited the locality three times, in 1863, 1882, and 1899, on the latter occasion giving it a careful examination as a part of his archaeologic survey of the region, stated..... that it appears to have been amassed by wave and ice action of the lake. It was probably built by the waves during storms, nearly to its present extent and form, within the first few centuries after the lake began its existence, which was at the time of uncovering this region from the receding ice-sheet at the close of the Glacial period.

Description & Name Origin This county, established March 18, 1858, and organized September 12, 1868, received its name from the Otter Tail lake and river. The lake, from which the river was named, derived its peculiar Ojibway designation, thus translated, from a long and narrow sand bar, having an outline suggestive of the tail of an otter, formed very long ago and now covered with large woods, which extends curvingly southeast and south between the last mileof the inflowing Otter Tail or Red river and the lake, at its eastern end, in section 10 of Otter Tail township. At its northwestern base the bar is connected with the main shore by a gradually widening higher tract between the river and lake, to which, with the prolonged bar, the Indians very fittingly, in view of their geographic outlines, gave this name. Its Ojibway form is given by the late Rev. J. A. Gilfillan as Nigigwanowe, that is, Otter Tail, both for the lake and for the outflowing river to its junction with the Bois ded Sioux river. The otter was formerly frequent or common in and near the rivers and lakes of all parts of this state, but is now rare. It subsists on fish, capturing them by rapid and expert swimming.

The late Hon. J. V. Brower, who visited the locality three times, in 1863, 1882, and 1899, on the latter occasion giving it a careful examination as a part of his archae ologic survey of the region, stated that the height of the bar varies from 10 to 25 feet above the lake; that its length slightly exceeds a mile, while its width, somewhat uniform, is only about 50 to 75 feet; and that it appears to have been amassed by wave and ice action of the lake. It was probably built by the waves during storms, nearly to its present extent and form, within the first few centuries after the lake began its existence, which was at the time of uncovering this region from the receding ice-sheet at the close of the Glacial period.

Otter Tail City, which about the years 1850 to 1860 was an important trading post on the route from the then flourishing town of Crow Wing to Pembina and the Selkirk settlements, stood on the main shore at the northeastern end of Otter Tail lake, adjoining the mouth of the river and the end of the Otter Tail bar. The U. S. Land Office for this district was located there during several years, and was thence removed to Alexandria in 1862. But all the buildings of the "city" were long since removed or destroyed, and only the cellar holes now remain.

The Red river was known to the Ojibways at the time of Owen's geological exploration, in 1848, as the Otter Tail river from this lake to its junction with the Red Lake river at Grand Forks. Present usage by many of the older white people retains the name Otter Tail for the river above the lake of this name (though other names, derived from successive lakes, are used there by the Ojibways); and indeed occasionally it is still called otter Tail river along its portion continuing below this lake to the axis of the Red River Valley at Breckenridge and Wahpeton, where it receives the Bois des Sioux river and turns from west to a northward course.

Description & Name Origin While only a relatively small portion of the lakes in this County are named and here listed, it is evident that if we could narrat the stories of pioneers by whom or for whom they were named, with origins also of the many inpersonal names, the interesting information so to be recorded would require a long search to gather it somewhat fully, and would fill many printed pages. In general, only the rivers and a few large lakes retain names used by the Indians, or translations from them. Nearly all the other names, of townships, villages, and lakes, numbering hundreds in this very large county, were selected or invented by the incoming white agricultural settlers.
