Cassie enjoys cafting stories that leave just enough to the imagination. Her fictional stories contain relatable, lovable characters and are written in a tasteful style.

What People Are Saying About Man-Made - Three out of Four

Funny, well plotted, and full of surprises; an entertaining ride from start to finish.

In Cluster's electrifying conclusion to the Man-Made trilogy, the boundaries between humanity, identity, and survival are pushed to their limits. Now in witness protection, Betty and Mack Schwartz face an uncertain future as a looming tribunal threatens their fate. Meanwhile, their twins, Moshe and Malka, develop uncanny abilities and a cryptic shared language, intensifying the tension and hinting at forces beyond their control. Cluster's sharp prose effortlessly balances moments of lightness with weighty themes. The plot twists briskly through societal pressures and ethical dilemmas surrounding artificial intelligence, keeping readers hooked as tension builds with every turn. Mack's emotional arc—grappling with grief, love, and a world that may never fully understand him—feels raw and authentic. Family dynamics shine, especially between Mack and the twins, blending warmth with humor to ease the intensity without losing focus. Amidst the suspense, Cluster's subtle humor and clever dialogue offer moments of reprieve, while the deeper themes of belonging and acceptance hit hard.

Betty's search for her place in a world that views her with suspicion resonates powerfully, making this finale not only thrilling but deeply reflective. A thought-provoking and delightful conclusion to an enthralling SF series.
