Today is Groundhog Day. Groundhogs aren't the only animals believed to predict the weather. Wolves are said to howl before a storm. And an old proverb says, "If a cow attempts to scratch its ears, a rain shower is very near."

Who Am I?

As a child, I did not have a stuffed teddy bear but a toy chimpanzee. I went to Africa in 1957 to visit the farm of a family friend. Enthralled by the landscape and the animals, I wanted to stay, so a friend suggested I contact the famous scientist Louis Leakey. He took me under his wing, and I went to work as a field assistant. Finally, in 1960, I went to Gombe National Park in Tanzania, where I studied wild chimpanzees and their extraordinary behavior. Who am I?

Some of the world's largest cities, like New York and London, harbor little secrets. Fake building facades line city streets and mask unsightly infrastructure. What looks like a picturesque Greek revival townhouse in Brooklyn is actually a subway ventilator and emergency passageway between stations. A New York building labeled the "Strecker Memorial Laboratory" is a power substation for underground trains. The stately homes of 23–24 Leinster Garden in London are not inhabited at all; they are a façade that shields train tracks hidden behind.
