

Jordyn Morgan was born a perfectly healthy baby on July 17, 2014 to her parents, Mike and Nichole Morgan. She was the fourth of four children and the whole family was so happy to have another baby sister.

On November 3, 2014, the life of Jordyn Morgan and her whole family changed forever. The previously perfect three-month old would suffer a heart disease that forced her to be rushed to St. Louis Children's Hospital. Later that night Jordyn was placed on a life-saving machine called ECMO that was used to give her heart a "rest" and try to recover. After five days of being on the machine the strong little girl survived as heart recovered.

It seemed like Jordyn was better and would become a perfectly normal little girl again. But unfortunately for her that was not the case. Jordyn would develop feeding issues and eventually breathing issues.

In July of 2015 Jordyn underwent a tracheostomy to help her breath and stay alive. That day once again would change her and the whole family's life. But maybe the most important aspect of this all no one knew what was causing these issues. Over the next 12 months, Jordyn would undergo many procedures and tests to see what was wrong. No doctor could ever diagnose her illness.

On November 21, 2018 Jordyn gained her angel wings with her mom and dad by her side. Some people would say she lost her battle but she didn't lose at all. She fought every day all the way to her last breath.

Jordyn was a very special little girl who was an inspiration for so many people. Though her time on this earth was short, she managed to touch the hearts of so many people. For more than four years, this powerful little girl fought for her life every single day. Though she never spoke a word, she spoke through her fight.
