ALICE and COVID-19

ALICE households are especially vulnerable to national economic disruptions. The number of ALICE households in New York increased substantially through the Great Recession (2007–2010) then continued to increase gradually afterward, never returning to pre-Recession levels. By 2019, that number had just started to fall — and then the pandemic hit. From 2019 to 2021, both the number of ALICE households and the number of households in poverty increased slightly. Together, the number of households below the ALICE Threshold increased by 5%, while total households in the state increased by 3%. During this period, the share of households below the Threshold grew slightly, from 43% to 44%.
