Verizon Wireless Small Cells in the Right-of-Way

Dear Councilmembers:

We write on behalf of Verizon Wireless to appeal the Planning Commission's decision of January 23, 2020, to apply two problematic conditions of approval to the above-referenced approved use permits. For each permit, Condition 1 would, in part, require Verizon Wireless to place a single radio in an underground vault instead of mounting it to a pole as proposed. Condition 16 would require a use permit modification if Verizon Wireless uses new technology to increase effective radiating power greater than 25 percent.

Verizon Wireless appeals Condition 1 because it violates the federal Telecommunications Act in two ways. First, the decision to require the radio underground is not supported by substantial evidence, in violation of 47 U.S.C. Section 332(c)(7)(B)(iii). The Commission imposed undergrounding in reliance on staff's photographs of nearby underground vault covers. Those vaults are for other types of utilities, not wireless infrastructure, and their presence does not prove that undergrounding is feasible for radios, which contain sensitive computer equipment.

The Commission disregarded Verizon Wireless's evidence in the record that undergrounding is infeasible.¹ With a sleek, narrow profile and all cables hidden, the radio is designed for attachment to a street light pole, but not for underground conditions. The radio is designed to be passively cooled when pole-mounted, but if underground, it requires a cooling fan and vents, plus a sump pump to remove stormwater. Excavation for a vault of the size required for all of this equipment may be impeded by limited sidewalk space and existing underground utilities. Undergrounding also presents operational challenges. For example, when sump pumps have stopped during a power outage, underground radios failed due to stormwater intrusion. When cooling fans could not operate continuously, radios overheated. Such damage disables a small cell for an extended period of time, compromising network reliability. Verizon Wireless's field experience has been that undergrounding small cell radios is unreliable due to water intrusion, overheating, and noise, and it is not technically feasible for these reasons. Verizon Wireless reminded the Commission of the infeasibility of undergrounding radios on January 23, 2020, in a letter and during hearing testimony.

The City's 1996 telecommunications ordinance, applicable at the time Verizon Wireless filed for permits, requires that "telecommunication support facilities (i.e., vaults, equipment rooms, utilities, and equipment enclosures)...shall be placed in underground vaults to the extent possible." Sonoma Municipal Code § 5.32.110(B)(4). At the Commission's January 23, 2020 hearing, City Attorney John Abaci interpreted "possible" to mean "feasible, and without there being any practical constraints."² The Commission provided no evidence to contradict the conclusion that undergrounding the radio is infeasible, let alone the substantial evidence required by federal law. An aesthetic preference for undergrounding does not trump its infeasibility. Because Verizon Wireless provided evidence confirming that it is impossible, the relevant code does not require undergrounding.

We note that the City's new wireless facilities ordinance requires that accessory equipment be placed underground unless there are infeasible constraints, or "except as may be determined by the reviewing authority." Sonoma Municipal Code § 5.30.080(H). The new ordinance also allows up to six cubic feet of pole-mounted equipment. Code § 5.30.080(D)(2)(c). Verizon Wireless's antenna, radio and disconnect switch total under three cubic feet—less than half the volume allowed.

The undergrounding condition violates a second Telecommunications Act provision because it is prohibitive. The Federal Communications Commission (the "FCC") has ruled that for small cells, technically infeasible requirements lead to a prohibition of service in violation of 47 U.S.C. Sections 253(a) and 332(c)(7)(B)(i)(II). This is because technically infeasible aesthetic requirements, including those regarding undergrounding, are unreasonable, and by materially inhibiting wireless service, they have the effect of prohibiting of service. See Accelerating Wireless Broadband Deployment by Removing Barriers to Infrastructure Investment, Declaratory Ruling and Third Report and Order, FCC 18-133 (September 27, 2018), ¶¶ 37, 86-87, 90.

Even if feasible, undergrounding would pose considerably more impact. Excavation and subsequent construction would take 30 to 45 days, with considerable noise and long sidewalk and street closures. In contrast, if simply affixing the radio to the pole, construction would take three to five days.

Verizon Wireless originally proposed a design with two or three radios on wood utility poles, and now proposes one narrow radio on new street light pole as a compromise to avoid infeasible undergrounding requirements. At the January 23, 2020 hearing, Commission Vice Chair Ron Wellander commented on the lesser impact of a pole-mounted radio, saying “I do not think that vaulting this radio makes a significant aesthetic improvement.” To mandate undergrounding would disincentivize the aesthetically-preferred street light design, and Verizon Wireless would instead pursue the original utility pole design. Because it is excessive and would violate federal law, Verizon Wireless asks the Council to modify Condition 1 to eliminate the undergrounding requirement.

Condition 16 also violates the Telecommunications Act because it regulates based on radio frequency emissions. However, the City cannot regulate based on emissions if a facility is shown to comply with the FCC’s radio frequency exposure guidelines. 47 U.S.C. § 332(c)(7)(B)(iv). If Verizon Wireless submits an engineer’s radio frequency exposure report confirming that a proposed modification complies, the City cannot impose any requirement (such as a more onerous permit process) based on a change in emissions. Further, the City cannot regulate based on the technical and operational aspects of wireless technology, as that is the FCC’s exclusive jurisdiction. See New York SMSA Ltd. Partnership v. Town of Clarkstown, 612 F.3d 97, 105-106 (2nd Cir. 2010). As it exceeds the City’s authority, Verizon Wireless asks the Council to strike Condition 16.

Verizon Wireless reserves the right to supplement these grounds for appeal. This letter accompanies the City of Sonoma Appeal Application Form and a check for the required appeal filing fee. At your convenience, please confirm the timely receipt of this appeal to the above email address.

Very truly yours,

Paul B. Albritton
