want to go back to the days when Christmas trees made their way into the landscape after Thanksgiving. We hardly get out of Halloween costumes before the major retailers don twinkly lights and plastic pines and start pushing the holiday guilt upon all of us. I heard Target for the first time is opening its doors Thanksgiving at midnight, instead of waiting for what I always thought was the excruciating hour of 6am on "Black Friday."

All I can say is, consider going back to the basics and shop the Mom and Pop stores in our own neighborhoods. Small retailers are the backbone of this country and need your support. They all have families to support and rent and insurance to pay, and want to give you special prices and excellent service in ways the big box stores simply cannot.

And let's remember to give thanks this month too. I'd like to share heartfelt gratitude to Becky Arnold, who lost her battle to cancer this past October. She was a dear friend to me and to Zebra, and since our inception, was a monthly advertiser and contributor who shared the Home Sales of every month with you. She will be sorely missed by us and by the whole community.

And my thanks to all of you who continue to support us through advertising and readership.

SUCCESS HAS A NAME – HADEED

BY CHUCK HAGEE

heir slogan is "If you stand on it, Joe Hadeed stands behind it." That now resonates from the Washington/Baltimore Metropolitan Area to Richmond and the Tidewater area of Virginia Beach.

As of last December, the Hadeed Rug Cleaning Restoration And Repair firm owns plants in Alexandria and Richmond, Virginia, when Joe Hadeed became the owner of the Mercer and Victory rug cleaning enterprises as the winning bidder at an auction. His bid of $1,250,000 not only acquired the two firms but also three buildings comprising an area of 30,000 square feet.

"Our trucks now cover the entire length of Virginia and westward as far as Charlottesville," Joe Hadeed stated. The business, which was started by his father, Michael Hadeed, in 1955 in his driveway in Alexandria's Del Ray section now serves eight regions stretching from Baltimore, MD, to Virginia's Tidewater area.

Joe went to work for his father when he was 19 and bought the business in 1990. His younger brother Michael, a lawyer, joined him in the business three years ago after practicing law for 25 years.

The firms recently purchased in Richmond were owned and operated by George Mercer who died at the age of 92 last year, according to Hadeed. "He went to work at his plants everyday until the week before he died," Hadeed said.

Mercer was an insurance salesman in the 1920's who worked part-time for Victory Rug Cleaners plant in Alexandria where everything is done by hand. That's the only way to really clean oriental rugs properly and our customers know it," Joe emphasized.

"Machines pump the rugs through in about 30 minutes, but there is no way to tell if they are absolutely clean. Our quality cleaning process, done by hand and thoroughly inspected before they go back to the customer, is one hundred percent better. Only about two percent of the rug cleaning companies in the country do it the way we do it," he declared.

Since Hadeed took over in April 2012 he has moved the former Mercer employees to administrative positions, operating the phones, and handling pick up and deliveries. He also offered

They are screened as to their eligibility to legally work in this country, any criminal background, and tested for any drug use. We are part of EVarify, a computer network connected to the federal government," Hadeed stated.

In order to increase overall revenues, Hadeed Oriental Rug Cleaning has also re-entered the retail rug sale business, which they closed in 2006, with the opening two months ago of a new 2,000 square foot showroom/sales office at 535 West Maple Ave. in Vienna, VA. It has a $3 million inventory of exquisite oriental rugs, some of which are "embassy size" and displayed by hanging from the building's 30 foot ceiling.

Hadeed Oriental Rug Cleaning Restoration and Repair has shown spectacular growth during the past 18 months, a time when many business enterprises have experienced a significant downturn, with some even vanishing from the landscape. In recognition of this accomplishment the Alexandria Chamber of Commerce last year named the firm its Overall Business of the Year.

Dorothy Turner and Gwen Menefee-Smith helped found the Alexandria Tenants Council more than forty years ago with the primary goal of working with City officials and the Alexandria Redevelopment and Housing Authority to establish nondiscriminatory and fair regulations regarding housing policies.

sserting that Alexandria public housing tenants have basic rights too, community activists Dorothy Turner and Gwen Menefee-Smith embarked on a mission to assure that their peers would be treated fairly and with respect. In their decades-long journey for justice, each woman felt the pain imposed on unpopular crusaders, but were ultimately uplifted as those who struggled to do good for others.

The two women, both public housing tenants themselves earlier in life, worked tirelessly to improve the quality of living for Alexandria low income and minority residents. In the 1960s and 1970s, Alexandria was not in compliance with federal Housing and Urban Development guidelines and there was a pervasive attitude of disrespect, intimidation and unfair practices against people of color, Menefee-Smith says.

Similar to many communities at the height of nationwide racial unrest, though Alexandria public housing had just been integrated, African American tenants were not treated equally. A subjective high moral standard was imposed as a condition of residency, Turner said, especially upon ingle mothers or mothers of multiple children the two helped found the Alexandria Tenants Council more than forty years ago. Their primary goal was to work with City officials and the Alexandria Redevelopment and Housing Authority to establish non-discriminatory and fair regulations regarding housing policies. They also sought to provide legal, economic, social and educational support for tenants, and for the preservation of allotted numbers of public housing units in the city after some apartments were demolished.

Turner and Menefee-Smith broadened their efforts to organize voter registration drives and non-partisan grassroots support of city, state and federal candidates for office. "We had to get tenants out to vote. We looked at politicians who didn't respect us and worked for their opposition. We can't blame people for needing the services. Politicians are supposed to do the right thing." Menefee-Smith recalls.

Dorothy Turner was born and raised in Del Ray and is a descendant of one of the oldest African American families in the city. She attended St. Joseph's Elementary School and Parker -Gray High School. In 1968, she moved into the John Roberts public housing complex, where she lived for 13 years with her husband and children. She recalls that public housing had just been integrated and that an African American, Nelson Greene, was on the City Council. At the time, housing officials tried to deny unwed mothers space in public housing, a major point of contention within the black community. It was a burning source of her discontent and therefore time, she said, to "fight for something due to us." Turner said she was also inspired by her brother, one of five young men who had been arrested for protesting separate, but unequal public library facilities. In addition to improving housing conditions and policies, she, Menefee-Smith and others pushed for increased black representation on City Council, commissions, and on the housing authority board. They worked the polls and picketed Yellow Cab, which would not hire black drivers. They also saw a newly established community center on Wythe Street become a meeting space, wedding venue

"The administrators were so disrespectful and rude and intrusive in your personal life when people just needed a safe, decent place to live," agreed Menefee-Smith. The feelings of oppression extended beyond housing issues, she asserted. There was no encouragement for higher education, job training or civic involvement. "One administrator said to me, 'Your course has already been charted. You have made your bed now and you have to lie in it."

"Just because you're in public housing, it does not need to be a death sentence. We were taxpayers, law-abiding decent citizens and we had a right to have voices in how and where we lived." Turner and Menefee-Smith joined with other tenants to bring about change. Working with the Urban League, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, churches, local civil rights attorneys and advocacy organizations, and gathering place for teenagers. Soon sewing, typing and preparation classes for the Civil Service exam were offered. "We just did a lot of things and other people started helping us," said Turner.

One of her proudest moments, she reflected, was the successful sit-in campaign to offer black history classes at T.C. Williams High School.

Although not a native of Alexandria, Menefee-Smith became acquainted with the town at an early age. Her grandfather worked in Alexandria, and during summers she stayed in the house he purchased. In the early 1960s, she moved to Alexandria with her military husband and reared three children. The marriage didn't last, the couple separated, then divorced, and she wanted to stay in the area to be close to family. As a single mother Menefee-Smith had limited resources after leaving her husband and eventually ended up in a public housing apartment. She felt the scorn of housing officials due to her divorced and single mother status, she recalls. By knocking on neighbors' doors, Menefee-Smith confirmed they felt the same intimidation and fear of being ejected from their apartments for unfair moral standards imposed upon them. "They were traumatized and scared to death," she asserted. It was at a meeting organized by the Urban League that she met Dorothy Turner, who had just moved into public housing herself. "Word got arranged that local lawyers and the NAACP were interested in what was going on. The church was filled and it became a time of personal growth. It led me to get involved with other tenants."

Meanwhile, Menefee-Smith had other personal obstacles to overcome. She bristled when a housing administrator denigrated her educational goals and career potential. "Your chances are very slim and you need to come to terms with that," she was told. Instead, she attended Northern Virginia Community College, then George Mason University to get her undergraduate degree in Social Welfare, using a patchwork of scholarship, daycare and transportation assistance. She attended Howard University for her master's degree with scholarship help, to remove her from her job. Menefee-Smith was fingerprinted, and the case went to hearings, and then the grand jury before she was cleared. Public housing tenants picketed the police chief's house and one "alleged witness who gave false testimony" committed suicide. The FBI was called in to investigate. Despite her eventual vindication, Menefee-Smith switched to a job in Washington, DC to provide health care for the elderly. "That did not stop me from being involved with Alexandria tenants."

Menefee-Smith and Turner expanded their crusade for the disadvantaged and working 20 hours a week while attending classes.

"I've lived a full life and am blessed the Lord let me live so long to help people."

However, her path was still not cleared for easy success. She, Turner and others were very concerned when the Housing Authority proposed destruction of blocks of public housing units without provision for displaced families. More than 30 years later, Menefee-Smith recounted how her increased activism led to false criminal charges that she had stolen money from an elderly resident. As a Housing Authority employee at the time, the action was prompted, she asserted, elderly by advocating for senior citizens, especially in the arenas of affordable health care and affordable housing. The women are currently working to improve the well-being of mentally challenged persons, especially African American and Hispanic at- risk special education students.

Turner explained that some parents need guidance to navigate the complex rules surrounding individualized education plans for special education students. It is especially true when English may not be their first language or if they have had limited schooling themselves. Education will always be the best means for a person to improve him or herself, Turner said, so it is critical that poor families get the support they need from the community. Menefee-Smith added that it is their continuing concern that Alexandria is losing young people – potential community leaders – who can't afford to live in here. Education makes the different in getting better paying jobs.

"I will always be an advocate for poor people," says Menefee-Smith. She repeated her intent to keep working for the dignity and rights of minorities and the economically challenged. "You just can't walk away from them."

> Turner agrees. At 83, she uses a walker and does not have the physical vigor she once had, but she still campaigns for disadvantaged families. "I've lived a full life and am blessed the Lord let me live so long to help people."

UPDATE:

City Retains Wales Alley in case against Old Dominion Boat Club

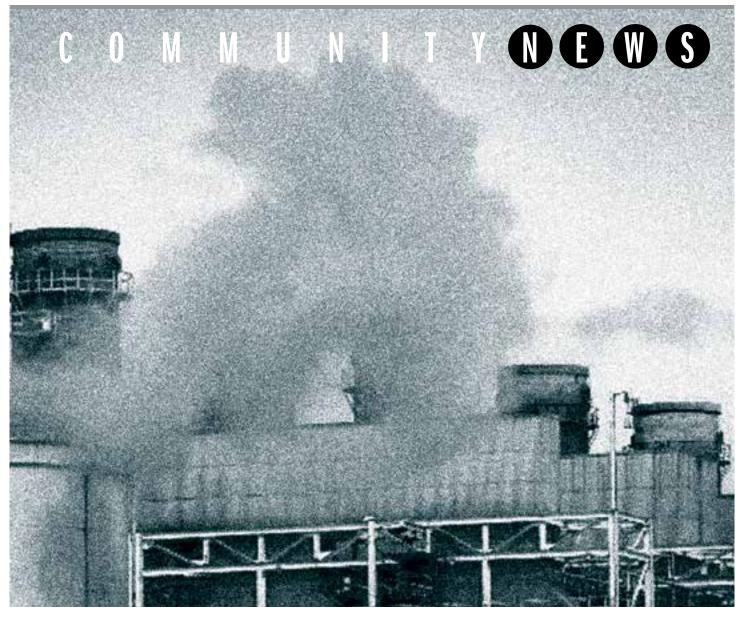

The Circuit Court for the City of Alexandria has ruled in the City's favor in the case between Alexandria and the Old Dominion Boat Club involving Wales Alley. The case had been remanded back to the Circuit Court for further proceedings after the City and the owner of 106 South Union Street had successfully appealed an earlier ruling to the Supreme Court of Virginia.

The court's order finds that when the alley was implicitly dedicated and accepted by the City as a public way, whatever residual interest or easement the Boat Club may have had was extinguished.

The order has been posted on the City's website, alexandriva.gov.

New Left Turn Restrictions on Washington Street

As the result of a 2011 safety study of the Washington Street corridor, which was approved by the City's Traffic and Parking Board on November 28, 2011, it was found there was an elevated accident rate for vehicles making left turns during HOV hours, in the morning from 7 a.m. - 9 a.m., and in the evening from 4 p.m. to 6 p.m. Protected left turns, where vehicles can turn left on a green traffic signal arrow, have been added for southbound left turning vehicles at Washington Street at Wythe Street, as well as Washington Street at Princess Street from 7 a.m. to 9 a.m. Similarly, in the afternoon, protected left turns have been added to northbound Washington Street at Wythe Street, as well as Washington Street at Queen Street, from 4 p.m. to 6 p.m. The implementation of the left turn restrictions and protected left turns is an important recommendation of the safety study, and will assist in decreasing the number of left turn accidents on Washington Street. All other existing regulatory restrictions remain in effect.

Press Conference Heralds Plant's Closing

BY CHUCK HAGEE

or the first time in 63 years Alexandrians awoke Monday morning, October 1, with no air pollutants emanating from the stacks at the Potomac River Generating Station at the north end of Old Town. The GenOn Power plant had officially shut down at 12:01 A.M.

That long awaited event was marked by a press conference headed by Alexandria Mayor William "Bill" Euille just outside the plant's main entrance at the intersection of North Royal Street and Bashford Lane. A large crowd of elected officials, city employees and involved citizens applauded as Euille announced, "Today marks the permanent closing of GenOn. For decades this has been the single most polluter in Northern Virginia. That ends today."

Among the crowd were two people to which this event culminated more than a decade's work, perseverance, dedication, and fact/statistical driven tenacity that often pitted them against a combined corporate/ governmental bulwark that was determined to break their spirit. Elizabeth Chimento and Poul Hertel commenced their crusade against Pepco, owner of the PRGS, in the spring of 2001 after noticing a grey soot residue on their homes and vehicles. But, their greatest fear was that the residue was probably also creeping into their lungs and those of their neighbors with every breath they took as North Old Town residents. Those fears were confirmed by several studies undertaken by scientists retained by them and eventually Alexandria City government. "For the first time since the late 1940's the people in these adjacent neighborhoods can now breath without downwash (a term for airborne pollutants sinking instead of rising). This plant has long been a mistake that needed to be corrected," Hertel said following the press conference.

Old Town Alexandria residents Poul Hertel (rt) and Elizabeth Chimento received special praise for their leadership in initiating the efforts to bring about the closure of the GenOn power plant during a press conference called by Alexandria Mayor William Euille to mark the historic event. PHOTO BY CHUCK HAGEE

"This has been a long time coming. But, in the end we prevailed. The job is done. There were many issues in this process that few people are fully aware of. And, there was no way of avoiding the politics, particularly at the state level," Chimento said. Euille praised the pair's initiative in his opening remarks noting, "They came to us and said "This needs to happen," referring to the closing of this plant. "Today is a great example of the community and local government working together," Euille stated. He was followed by U.S.Representative James Moran (D-8) who gave a full litany of all the various air pollutants that have been spewing from GenOn stacks over the past six plus decades. "This is a hard fought and well-earned victory for this community. This event is due to citizen involvement," Moran said.

place. The example of what Alexandria has accomplished should be used by communities all over this nation that are suffering from coal fired power plants," he emphasized.

"Power plants rarely get along with their surrounding communities but Mirant had particular problems. Overall there are 264 power plants nationally that are presently exempt from the Clean Air Act. Those communities need to do what Alexandria has done. There have been 95 votes in the House of Representatives in the last year alone to weaken the Clean Air Act," Moran told the audience assembled on the parking lot facing the antiquated power plant.

"The future of this site will be a community process. The city is presently in discussions with GenOn as to the various phases of the decommissioning process," said City Councilman Paul Smedberg (D) who, along with City Councilwoman Redella "Del" Pepper (D), co-chairs The Mirant Community Monitoring Group.

Pepper summed up the overall reaction to plant's closing with her declaration, "It's over. It's closed. We can now all take a deep breath."

Although the plant is now silent it is not quite over. There is the decommissioning process and the removal of the large coal pile that covers the ground just beyond the railroad tracks coming into the 25 acre site. The Monitoring Group along with the Virginia Department of Environmental Quality and citizen activists such as Chimento and Hertel will continue to oversee this process. As an element of the formal shut down the City will return to GenOn the $34 million it has held in escrow as part of the 2008 agreement for pollution control efforts.

Samuel Ndereba and Fernando Cabada ran head-to-head for much of the third edition of the Woodrow Wilson Bridge Half Marathon on October 7. As all of their battles have ended, it was Ndereba who got the best of Cabada on a cool drizzling day.

It took Ndereba, a staple on the U.S. road race circuit, 65 minutes and 15 seconds to win the point-to-point 13.1-mile race which begins at the Mount Vernon home of George Washington, crosses the famous Woodrow Wilson Bridge and concludes at this modern resort called National Harbor. Cabada trailed by 45 seconds.

Kellyn Johnson, on the other hand, made quick work out of the women's race, becoming the first American woman to triumph here. She took a commanding lead from the start and earned her victory by a margin of exactly two minutes in 1:13:24. For the 26-year-old from the adidas-McMillan Elite training group in Flagstaff, the $5,400 in prize money was her largest payday by far.

"I was definitely excited to win," said Johnson, who broke the tape just 13 seconds off her personal best from the Houston Half in January and 40 seconds off the course record set last year by Bekelech Bedada of Ethiopia."I haven't won a race in a long time, granted I've been running in mostly big races. I was hoping to run faster, to break that course record."

UPDATE from page 8

President & CEO. Washington's start date is November 13, 2012. She is the third person to lead ACVA since its inception 16 years ago.

Washington currently serves as the Vice President of Cultural Tourism

at the Greater Philadelphia Tourism Marketing Corporation (GPTMC). Washington brings a wealth of experience in cultural tourism, marketing, arts management, fundraising and grant making. She has demonstrated savvy in orchestrating cross-sector collaboration to execute an impressive roster of large-scale initiatives that promote economic growth.

"We are so pleased to welcome such a dynamic and innovative leader," said Jody Manor, chair of the ACVA Board of Governors. "Patricia is joining a strong organization and a booming tourism economy - Alexandria has seen a 22 percent growth in visitor spending in the last five years. We know it will take a truly exceptional candidate to take the power of the ACVA to the next level, and Patricia showed us she has the fire to do it."

"Patricia impressed us with her energy, creativity, and knack for tourism development," said Mayor William D. Euille. "Her deep understanding of the role of culture and heritage in a tourism brand and her track record of leveraging collaborations will benefit Alexandria."

"I am thrilled to be joining the ACVA as its new President & CEO," said Washington. "The ACVA has a built a strong foundation of sustained economic growth promoting the city as a stellar cultural destination. I look forward to working collaboratively with the city and other stakeholders to continue that great work."

The Alexandria Convention & Visitors Association recently announced an 8.1 increase visitor spending for 2011, to total $711 million, generating city tax revenue of $23.1 million. Alexandria's 22 percent increase in five years dramatically outpaced increases for Virginia and Northern Virginia, both at 9 percent.

New West End Fire Station Breaks Ground

The project is part of the City's Capital Improvement Program. The new fire station, which was approved by City Council in 2008, will provide enhanced emergency response time to Alexandria's West End. The station will provide additional Fire Department classroom and training facilities, and community meeting space. Funding for this $16 million project also supports the improvement of the City Impound Lot located at Eisenhower Avenue and the addition of a new impound lot at 3000 Business Center Drive. Construction of Fire Station 210 is estimated to be completed in the winter of 2013-2014.

OK - here's an insane concept:

et's take the biggest, most visible thing in our home; the WALLS and let's not only paint them, but paint them a solid color and (here's the insane part)... let's make-believe that we're going to be able to keep them clean !

Why do we do this to ourselves when any fool would know that the slightest peanut butter smear, wet dog shake, vacuum cleaner crash, or insect squash is going to result in a mark, print, or splatter? You might as well upholster the TV room sofa in a Vera Wang Bridal silk and insist that it has to be kept immaculate.

It ain't gonna' happen !

Let's get real, and admit to ourselves that :

A: the walls are going to take a lot of punishment and

B: we have better things to do with our lives than scrub walls.

So, what's the solution? Well, my friends... I'll tell you !

One solution is something you may not know exists: washable vinyl wall paper ! It's almost like plasticizing your walls! I can hear you now:

"Vinyl wallpaper... it must look tacky."

Oh no it does not ! It is not shiny, looks just like the standard paper wallpapers, and is available in a vast variety of patterns and colors.

"I'd be afraid to try to hang wall paper!"

Oh no you wouldn't! Look for choices like WallSmart, who's new generation of kid friendly wallpaper is designed for easier hanging with the paste going on the wall, not on the paper.

"Where I would need it is in the bathroom and it will peel-off in there !"

Oh no it won't ! Today's wall coverings are much more advanced that they used to be; apply it according to directions and it will do fine – even around steam. Try a bold, beachy stripe in the bathroom to add the impression of height, and you'll have a great new, easy-care look.

Washable wallpaper is ordinary wallpaper that is coated with a thin glaze of polyvinyl acetate (PVA), or is printed with water resistant inks. It gives an easy to wipe surface and is particularly suitable for high-mess areas and is long-lasting if applied correctly.

I don't know about you, but my kid is not going to stop smudging anytime soon, the dogs are not going to stop mud-slinging, but I'm not going to mind. An effortless swipe of a damp sponge will maintain my walls in a state of constant perfection!

War-Weary Warriors

ctober 50 years ago was the coldest month in the Cold War. Many of you reading this have absolutely no concept of what the Cuban Missile Crisis was but to characterize it -- we were 'at war' with what was then called the Soviet Union. You are fortunate that you'll never have to endure the anxiety of those thirteen dangerous days when the world virtually stood at the brink of annihilation.

Since the end of World War II the US and the USSR could best be described as two angry boys on the playground about to duke it out. The USSR flexed its' muscles threatening to cut-off Berlin from the rest of the free world on three separate occasions. It kept pushing our buttons by supporting Communist uprisings in Europe, South America, Asia, and Africa and in late October 1962, the USSR installed inter-continental ballistic missiles on the island nation of Cuba. Today, that may seem insignificant, but in 1962 those warheads could have hit targets in virtually any major metropolitan area east of the Mississippi River. Had that happened, the 9/11 attacks on New York and Washington DC would have paled in comparison.

I was an eight year old kid then living at FT. Bragg, NC, where my Dad served with the 7th Special Forces Group. One day after work I remember him hurrying home, packing uniforms and other gear into a duffle bag, and then after a quick dinner, we turned on the television to watch President Kennedy address the nation on what would become known as the Cuban Missile Crisis.

In those days many homes across the US had bomb shelters in the backyard filled with supplies in the event of an 'atomic attack' and we practiced 'duck-and-cover' drills at school in the event of Vietnam. His generation had endured the Depression and a World War so the concept of duty was in the DNA of his generation. He retired in 1976 with 26 years of service; and all of it on active duty as a Reservist. In 1986 I had grown weary of boating around the world in the Navy so I decided to give the civilian world a try. I transferred to the Navy Reserve and figured that in the event of anything really rotten happening in the world, they could give me a call and I would show up. Dutifully, once a month I would muster at a Reserve Center and train with my unit. Once a year I would do my 'Annual Training' and I'd get to sink my teeth into some real-world operational stuff. Operation Desert Storm changed all that. Analysts, stock brokers, construction workers, HVAC technicians, school teachers, bank Presidents, and a book store owner, the guys in my unit -- we were the second string - the Minor Leagues. But in January 1991 when the call came, we all showed up ready to go to 'the Show.' We were in the Major Leagues now and we made sure we didn't disappoint. At the end of Desert Storm we knew we would be sent back to the Minors where we would stay until the call came again for us to pitch, field, or pinch hit.

In 2003, I watched my brother Nelson, a Marine Reservist leave his civilian job on Wall Street, kiss his bride and nine-month old daughter good-bye, and head off to Iraq-Iran border. I followed suit and spent a year in Iraq through February 2007. This past May my nephew Rawley, a Navy Corpsman with the Marines, returned from a nine-month deployment to Afghanistan. Must be in that DNA!

In October 1962 people stood on street corners, in restaurants and in taverns all across the country watching TV to see the latest news of the potential nuclear holocaust. Reservists left their jobs, their homes, their families, and mustered at their respective Reserve Centers, ready to go to the 'Show' once again, to help out the team. Winston Churchill once referred to a Reservist as being 'twice a citizen' - someone who has a career but also wears the cloth of the nation as a Reservist - ready to answer the call. Nearly 50 years after those bleak October days of the Cold War we are again at war, this time in Afghanistan. It has become our Longest War. Let's hope that both the Majors and the Minors soon get to enjoy a well-deserved off season.

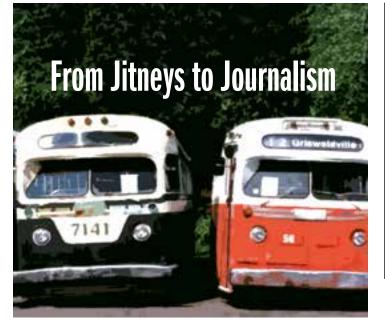

an incoming Soviet missile. Kennedy's address appeared to be the real deal and later that evening my Dad headed off down to his Group HQ. He disappeared for about a week and it was only after the Crisis was averted and he came home did we learn he was in a staging area in Florida for an invasion of Cuba had that been necessary. It was that event in October 1962 that changed my appreciation of what my Dad did for a living; I finally understood just how serious his 'job' really was.

Our fathers were members of the 'Greatest Generation.' Dad had quit High School and joined the Navy in WWII just like so many of his peers. After the war, he finished high school and college on the GI Bill, taught High School for a semester and then went into the Army Reserve as a Second Lieutenant. He spent the next 20 years on active duty pulling duty in Laos, Germany, Thailand, and ack in the gentle days of my childhood it was fun riding the city bus, from the stop near my house to the end of the route and back. Gosh, it was a joy and, no kidding, the five year old wasn't in danger of being attacked or abused by the friendly driver.

In those formative years the dream was to be a bus driver, wearing the blue-grey uniform and cap and carrying a silver change carrier which I have to this day and transfers. It was pleasant practicing driving using an upside-down piano bench as a steering wheel and blissfully weaving down the route.

Mr. Brackett, the driver, let me ride the last few miles of his course at least once a week and we remained friends through my teen years. A recent suggestion to use public transportation for schools recalled my love for the buses. It also is proof that the way to kill a proposal is to study it to death and it seems that this style isn't lost on local officials.

As it was previously mentioned I was blessed to grow up when students attended their neighborhood schools, walked to schools and weren't fearful of being assault by unkempt, unruly and unschooled brats. I never rode a yellow school bus in my life and I'm glad.

It's not unreasonable for school boards or city and county leaders to think about using public transportation. The local governments have already invested millions in the buses, the routes and the ancillary requisites to operate. Bureaucracy is at its best when it can make fun or criticize suggestions to use existing facilities.

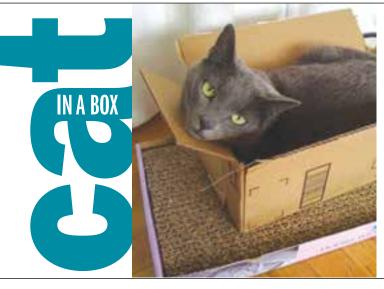

good and is harmful. School superintendents and school boards should answer to boards of supervisors, city councils, and, not to the courts.

Taxing powers belong to city and county governments which provide funds for schools, administrators and teachers and the responsibility for local education should lie with them. I know, I know, a lone voice in the wilderness on this matter.

The old GMC buses were beautiful vehicles. Nowadays they are built to kneel with all sorts of other modern amenities – air conditioning, wireless availability and cords to buzz when riders arrive at stops. I've never cared for the yellow Blue Bird buses probably because I'm a traditionalist.

To help defray the costs of the buses, local businesses could sponsor them. Use salesmanship to sell rights to city and county buses and transport the boys and girls to schools.

Opportunities to enter the bus driving business sort of faded for me as the lure of newspapers got stronger. Our city's bus drivers organized a union after several of them were shot during their working hours. They threatened to strike, an unheard of thing in those days and finally drivers were given permission to carry side arms and given raises. Our paper was having

Why duplicate services?

The question is why not consolidate similar services? City buses could certainly be utilized for public schools. Bus drivers, if need be, could be sworn as special police officers to maintain discipline on the jitneys if and when any of the student riders decided to be bullies and pains in the posterior. I was reminded that Alexandria schools used Metrobuses in the 1970s before Metro was finished.

I admit society has changed in these days and governments must be careful in dealing with social matters. It's a little late for this idea but I've never thought school boards should be elected. Politicizing education is not difficulty getting the "inside" facts on the problem.

Just so happened that Mr. Bracket, my early mentor, remembered me after reading some sports stories carrying my byline (his grandson had done well in a little league baseball game). It was smooth sailing after that and my hopes for a career jumped from jitneys to journalism.

One day recently I figured it would be fun to do a part-time effort maybe as a tour bus driver. While I may still think I'm a late teenager, the facts are the superannuated stage is not a good time to pretend on city and county streets.

The Forgotten Battle

BY CHUCK HAGEE

ctober 1862 found both the Union and Confederate armies exhausted and somewhat disheartened following the devastating battle at Antietam --the bloodiest single day in American military history. 23,000 dead and wounded with no clear victor.

Although the north claimed victory because the Confederate army withdrew to the south following the slaughter, that claim was more for political than military purposes. It enabled President Abraham Lincoln to issue his Emancipation Proclamation under the aegis of a Union victory, as advised by Congress and members of his cabinet.

Conversely, issuing that proclamation also served to strengthen the resolve of those sympathetic to the Confederate cause. In their eyes, the proclamation was proof that the war was being waged to end slavery and not to preserve the Union. This point of view was exacerbated by the fact that the emancipation was not to take effect until January 1, 1863 and would only apply to those states or portions of states still in rebellion against the United States at that time. However, this did not mean that October 1862 saw no battlefield action or bloodshed. It was just that the battles fought were less costly to both sides and were more localized skirmishes than major forces coming face-to-face. The most costly were in Kentucky and Tennessee. One of the most significant of the socalled "skirmishes" came to be known as "The Forgotten Battle of Unison," a small northern Virginia village in Loudoun County. It also proved to be another glaring example of Union General George McClellan's ability to thwart Lincoln's military or vote.

By the time the Civil War came to Unison the Quaker population had diminished considerably. But, those that remained played an active role in the underground railroad helping slaves escape to the north.

In the late 1700's new settlers in Unison were primarily Methodists. They built their first church there in 1785 -- an oak log structure. It was replaced in 1832 by a brick church using slave labor. It was around this structure and throughout the small village beginning on October 31, 1862, that Confederate General Robert E. Lee bought the time to thwart Lincoln's plan to bring the war to an early conclusion.

Following Antietam, McClellan had most of his army encamped near Harper's Ferry strategically positioned between Lee's Army and the nation's capital. This positioning gave Lincoln the idea of having McClellan use his strategic location, of being closer to Richmond than Lee and having nearly double the fighting force, coupled with the exhaustion of Lee's troops, to make a push toward Richmond cutting off Lee's retreat to the Confederate capital and thus, hopefully, bringing an early end to the conflict. On October 4 Lincoln visited McClellan at his headquarters in Maryland to brief him. The President followed up this faceto-face with an October 13 communique detailing his plan. But, as usual it took McClellan another week to finally acquiesce to Lincoln's proposal. On October 24 McClellan gave the march order to get his army across the Potomac into eastern Loudoun County. When Lee got word of the Union troop movement he immediately figured out plans to end the war through his overly cautious attitude. Ultimately, this proved to be his military career death knell.

When the 20 acre village was established by the Virginia General Assembly in 1813 in was known as "Union." Then it was discovered that there was another Virginia settlement known as Union so the name was changed to Unison in 1829. In the interim it had also been known locally as Greenville and Butterland.

Ironically, the first settlers of Unison were Quakers who settled in the area between Leesburg and the Blue Ridge Mountains in the early 1700's. As pacifists, the Quakers would not participate in the what they planned and began to move his troops. He also knew he needed to buy some time. He counted on McClellan's hyper cautiousness to acquire that precious battle commodity.

On October 28 Lee dispatched Confederate General J.E.B. "Jeb" Stuart with 1,000 troops and horse artillery to the village of Unison to delay the Union forces. Stuart set up his artillery near and around the Methodist church.

The morning of October 31, Stuart sent his artillery officer, John Pelham, with a small troop contingent to seek out the Union forces. They did so when they encountered about 100 Union advance pickets just ahead of an estimated 90,000 Union troops and firepower.

They harassed them to Aldie, VA, and then broke off contact. The next morning, November 1, Stuart was ready. He engaged the Union forces with artillery fire and a few small ground skirmishes -- just enough to give the impression of a much larger Confederate force.

General Alfred Pleasanton, commanding the Union forces, took the bait and relayed a request to McClellan for reinforcements. McClellan obliged with cavalry, infantry and a full artillery battery. Awaiting these reinforcements put a hold on the Union advancement.

At dawn on November 2 a Union force of more than 2500 marched toward Unison behind a brass band. When they got within a mile of the village they spread out for battle.

But, by this time Stuart had already positioned his troops to protect his flanks and moved Pelham's artillery to a dead-on position against the advancing Union forces. Then he slowly withdrew southward drawing Pleasanton in pursuit. The assault on Unison was underway with bombardments from Union artillery answered in-turn by Pelham's Confederate guns. This was accompanied by cavalry and infantry engagement by both sides. The village itself became an inferno. The battle went on until November 5 when Stuart's vastly outnumbered force retreated in earnest while still harassing the opposition as McClellan's entire army advanced. Confederate long range rifles fired down on advancing Union cavalry from the hillsides causing them to proceed with excessive caution allowing Stuart and his troops to make it safely through Ashby's Gap.

McClellan was now in a position to continue to Richmond but the tactical advantage envisioned by Lincoln had been lost. Stuart had achieved his goal and Lee's army was now in Culpeper preparing for the Battle of Fredricksburg.

November 5, 1862, proved to be the day of McClellan's final undoing as a military commander. Lincoln, infuriated by his Commanding General's timidity and blown opportunities to end the war, signed the order reliving him of command. McClellan received the official word on November 7 that General Ambrose Burnside was his replacement. As a result, Lincoln had two and one half more years of bloody combat to face during his presidency.

General J.E.B. Stuart, prior to his display of superior military cat and mouse at Unison, had proven his audacity and cunning on October 10, 1862 by breaching Union lines with a raid in Pennsylvania at Chambersburg, the first such attack north of Maryland. He arrived with his cavalry and brought forth a bloodless surrender of the town since no one had expected it and there were no defending Union forces. The people of Chambersburg found it useless to resist Stuart's incursion.

At the time it was described, and even heralded by the press, north and south alike, as "the most daring adventure of the war" up to that point. It was not just a show of bravado however, Stuart had a very serious mission -- to gather intelligence as well as supplies and horses for the Confederacy. Upon exiting Chambersburg the next day Stuart made sure the Union would know he had been there. His "Raiders," as they came to be known for their hit and run tactics, burned warehouses containing Federal government supplies and ammunition. Union forces were dispatched to capture the Raiders but to no avail. Stuart and his men made it safely back to Virginia totally evading their Union pursuers with their cache of both goods and intelligence which would serve them well just three weeks later in a Virginia Quaker village known as Unison.

The Miraculous, Migratory Monarchs

BY GLENDA C. BOOTH

JP150 is now zigging and zagging south for the winter. Weighing 598 milligrams or one-fifth the weight of a penny, he is fluttering to central Mexico's trans-volcanic mountains, to the states of Michoacan and the state of Mexico, to join millions more kindred monarch butterflies (Danaus plexippus), some that flew 2,000 miles from Canada to cluster like gravish beards on oyamel fir trees at nine to 11,000 feet for the winter. "This is one of the most extraordinary annual migrations on our planet," says monarch expert Dr. Lincoln Brower of Sweet Briar College. "This amazing migration eludes explanation."

RJP150 is a bright orange and black male monarch butterfly with a polypropylene tag weighing .01 of a gram affixed to his left hind wing, a tissue-thin membrane measuring 54.5 millimeters. The tag was placed on the underside of his hind wing in the Occoquan Bay National Wildlife Refuge in northern Prince William County on September 6.

Burke resident Larry Brindza spends several hours daily in the refuge scanning the goldenrod, tickweed sunflowers, snake root and Joe Pye weed in September and October and tagging monarchs, an insect that he sees as "one of the most fascinating critters." They peak in Virginia in September and October when huge flocks traverse North America. Destination: Mexico by November.

English colonists named this featherweight creature a "monarch" in the 17th century after British royalty After the egg hatches, the larva or tiny caterpillar eats the egg shell and begins to fatten up by eating milkweed leaves. "Their job is to eat," said Brindza, "and that's all they do – eat, eat, eat." The monarch caterpillar, sporting bright yellow, black and white stripes, outgrows its outer skin or exoskeleton several times and if not eaten by a predator, attaches itself to a support by a silky adhesive substance and becomes a pupa, a green, bag-like

Troubling Signs

What Brower calls "one of the most extraordinary annual migrations on our planet," he also calls an "endangered phenomenon." Several serious threats bode ill for the monarch:

Pesticides, herbicides and development are destroying breeding habitat and milkweed plants. Chip Taylor, Director of the University of Kansas-based Monarch Watch, says, "Monarch butterfly populations are declining due to loss of habitat." He estimates that monarch habitat is vanishing at 6,000 acres a day and that the overuse of herbicides along highways and elsewhere is creating grassy areas that support few species. Conservation and restoration of milkweeds needs to become a national priority," stresses Taylor.

Locals value Mexico's oyamel trees for lumber. Clear-cutting of trees destroys the butterflies' roosts and removes protection and warmth. "The Mexican government has made strides in stopping the massive illegal logging," says Brower, "but there is still substantial and damaging logging occurring on a smaller scale that must be stopped."

The future of the monarch butterfly is especially precarious because of two factors: First, common milkweed is the primary and, in most cases, only food of the larvae. Less milkweed means less food. Second, each wintering site in Mexico is a few hectares in size. Millions of monarchs are hard wired to go there and only there in the winter, to cling to the trees and survive the winter huddled together. This high concentration of butterflies in a few small sites means that any adversity, like serious cold or a severe storm there or on the way, can have a large impact. Millions overwinter in Mexico, but counting individuals is nearly impossible because they clump together so closely. Scientists estimate the size of the monarch population each winter by measuring the area of the forest occupied by overwintering monarchs. Wintering monarch butterflies in 1996-1997 covered over 20 hectares (a hectare is 2.47 acres) in Mexico. In the winter of 2011-2012, they covered only 2.89 hectares. According to Brower, "The 2011-2012 overwintering season in Mexico had the third lowest numbers over 18 years. The best estimate is that this is about 40 million monarchs."

because the tiger-like orange and black colors reminded them of the of the prince of Orange, later King William III. Males have two black spots on their hind wings; females do not. The monarch is the only butterfly that regularly has a two-way migration.

Monarchs east of the Rocky Mountains are known as the eastern population and winter in Mexico. The western population winters in California.

Life Cycle

Butterflies have four life stages. A female monarch lays one egg the size of a period (.) on the underside of one leaf. In the spring, each female can lay 500 to 700 eggs under optimal conditions. Then the parents die.

chrysalis. Then it delicately dangles. As it transforms to a butterfly, the chrysalis becomes increasingly transparent. When the adult butterfly inside is fully formed, the chrysalis splits open, the butterfly pumps fluid into its wing veins, basks in the sun to dry, hardens its wings and takes flight.

Critical Milkweed

Monarch larvae or caterpillars appear to exclusively eat milkweed. There are over 100 species of milkweed in North America. Sixty to 70 percent of all monarchs feed on common milkweed (Asclepias syriaca), says Brindza. The female lays eggs, she lives only around 30 days. The eggs become adults and this new generation flies north, mating along the way. The next generation does the same. During warm years, a few of the migrants from the mid-latitudes of the U.S. are fifth generation monarchs. The monarchs that make the fall migration live the longest, nine months. They return to the same place their ancestors overwintered.

Dr. David Gibo, a Toronto zoologist, estimates that if a six-foot human made the equivalent transcontinental odyssey as the monarch, it would be 11 times around the world. "Not bad for a bug weighing about half a gram," he commented.

This year has been particularly harsh for monarchs. The drought, especially in the Midwest, has hammered milkweed plants and wildflowers on which they nectar. Brower says the "prognosis for 2012-2013 is not good."

"Monarchs deserve everyone's attention," says Alexandria naturalist Jim Waggener. "In addition to their striking appearance in all phases of the metamorphosis from egg, colorful caterpillar, jewel-like chrysalis and conspicuous adult, there is the nearly unbelievable story of their life cycle. Then, there's the very real concern that environmental changes are putting the very future of this extraordinary species at risk." Waggener has conducted butterfly surveys in northern Virginia for 15 years.

The Precision of a Surgeon

Brindza hones in on a black-orange flutter among the flowers and grasses. He squishes through shoulder-high vegetation, swishes his net and presto! swoops up an unsuspecting monarch. To avoid injury, he only snags them when they are nectaring, not flying. (His butterfly net is made of aircraft aluminum.)

He gently removes the insect and puts it in a glassine envelope, like those used by stamp collectors. He measures the left forewing and weighs the butterfly on a scale.

Then, with surgical forceps, he meticulously attaches a tiny, round sticker to the underside of the left hind wing, and always there, only there on every butterfly he tags. The polypropylene plastic tag, nine millimeters in diameter, weighs one onehundreth of a gram and is a self-adhesive made by 3M especially for Monarch Watch. "The tags have been wind tunnel tested," Brindza explains. "They will not harm the butterfly." He limits his processing time to ten minutes.

Brindza has been measuring and weighing monarchs since 2002 and tagging since 1996 from the back of his carefully packed Volvo, his "laboratory." When monarchs are abundant, he can catch 10 in five to 10 minutes. He has tagged 4,169 in 16 years and weighed, measured and tagged 1,894 since 2002. He consistently follows the same methodical process with each capture, always measuring at precisely the same spots on the body to eliminate any possibility of bias.

In Mexico, the reserves' guards earn $5 for each tagged butterfly "recovered." His recovery rate of monarchs tagged at the Occoquan Bay refuge and found in Mexico is .002 percent. He works also on the Eastern Shore and had ten recoveries between 2004 and 2012 or a recovery rate of .003 percent.

Why care about monarch butterfly tagging and recoveries? "Recoveries tell us the geographic distribution, where they go," explains Brindza, "and how long it takes them to get to a destination." With such a low recovery rate, how can he keep going? "The first one recovered was like winning the lottery. I was tickled pink," he enthused.

From Fat-Burning Belts To Fat-Burning Exercise Help Or Hype?

It is fairly obvious from the non-stop advertisements for fat burning pills, fat burning waist belts, and the myriad of other "instant miracle" products promising a leaner, more muscular you, that fat burning is the newest health rage. But what's fact and what's hype?

Can muscle building and fat burning occur at the same time? You probably have seen ads for various fat burning waist belts and wondered if they really worked. It just seems so easy, doesn't it? Strap on a belt, forget about fat burning exercise, and watch those firm, beautiful muscles magically appear. Unfortunately, when it comes to fat burning and basic good health, there is just no substitute for a good exercise program.

If the great outdoors is just not your thing, many exercise machines can provide excellent an fat burning workout. Stair climbers offer great resistance training, burning calories while toning up your leg and butt muscles. However, for lower impact and less stress on your knees and ankles, a good treadmill machine may be your best choice. You can set your own pace, burn those pesky calories and fat, and still get a great aerobic workout.

Get Hot With a Warm-Up Routine

So, how should you get started on a leaner, healthier you? Your fat burning workout should always start with some basic warm-up exercise routines. Be very cautious about aggressive stretching, though. Those wonderfully limber runners pulling their legs impossibly up against their backs are probably doing more harm than good. Why? Because muscles need to warm up before they are pliable enough to be safely stretched. Try something simple, like an arm circle or leg swing. You will find your muscles respond better and faster to any exercise, including fat burning, when you start with this type of dynamic stretching.

Your next step in burning fat is consistency. The old saying "no pain, no gain" should actually be "with pain, there is no gain". You really do your body more harm than good when your workout is so intense that you become a stiff, sore couch potato for days at a time. The key is to listen to your body. Don't push through the pain, asking your body to do something akin to torture.

Ladies, Tap Into Your Hidden Strength

When it comes to weight and resistance training, men definitely do not have a corner on the market. Women may have smaller body structures than men, but strength is not defined by gender. While most women do not want to look like musclebound bodybuilders, the female physique can realize a great deal of benefit in moderate weight and resistance training. Not only does this type of fat burning exercise help your body burn calories and fat, it also is fantastic for healthy bones. Osteoporosis is a very real threat to women, and weight and resistance training effectively fights this crippling disease, keeping you youthful and energetic with healthy, strong bones.

So are you ready for a brand new you? With a little bit of willpower and persistence, a beautiful new world of good health, increased energy, and of course, a fantastic, trim body, is within your grasp. So get up, get active, and get ready to be amazed!

t may be known as a seaport town, but Alexandria also enjoys a long history with the primary mass transportation means that joined this nation from the Atlantic to the Pacific -- the railroad. Well before the Civil War Alexandria was known as an important rail center. In 2005 the city's Union Station at 110 Callahan St. marked its 100th birthday.

When it was opened in 1905 by the Richmond-Washington Company, Union Station was actually located in Fairfax County, on the outskirts of what was then the city limits. It was part of a large railroad complex that encompassed a roundhouse at Duke and Henry streets and one of the largest switching yards in the nation -- Potomac Yards.

"Union station has played a very important part in this city's history, both socially and economically. As someone who has lived her all my life I have both played at the station as a child and used it for transportation as an adult. It remains a very important spoke in the city's continued development," Alexandria Mayor William D. Euille said at that 100th birthday celebration.

However, there was a time when some wanted to replace it with nothing more application to the Virginia Department of Transportation for enhancement funds to renovate and restore the station to its original glory under the federal Intermodal Surface Transportation Efficiency Act.

The application received approval for 80 percent funding of the $840,000 budget estimate. The remaining 20 percent came from the RF&P Corporation and Amtrack with each providing 10 percent.

The proposed scope of work to restore Union Station to its heyday elegance included the following:

. Complete functional and aesthetic restoration/renovation of both the interior and exterior of the main building includi the glass enclosure connecting the lob with the adjacent storage building.

. Rehabilitation of the passenger at ticket sales areas as well as construction of new restrooms to bring them compliance with ADA requirements.

. Replacement or updating of all existi mechanical, electrical and plumbi components.

. All architectural elements were to be restored to their original appearance and materials.

. Restoration of the original portico, removed in 1982, which covered the front of the building and stairway leading to the pedestrian tunnel to the east of the platform for the Virginia Railway Express. . Planting additional native landscaping to screen service areas and adding historically appropriate site lighting. . Construction of a new parking lot and other improvements to bring the entire station area into compliance with ADA guidelines. All of this has made Alexandria's Union Station not only a tribute to the city's railroad past but also a present day symbol of its role as a continuing hub of 21st century rail travel. Through all the trials and tribulations of both the 20th century and the beginning of the 21st century, Union Station stands as symbol of continuity in a social landscape that, all too often, seems to react more than act to challenges and opportunities.

than an historic marker. But their efforts were stymied by then City Manager Vola Lawson. It was during her tenure than the combined efforts of the City, railroad, and developers came together to restore and preserve the historic structure.

When it was originally built it served as a full service passenger station for the area. At that time Alexandria's West End was just beginning to develop, but there was already an extensive railroad complex all along Duke street.

It was in that complex that President Abraham Lincoln's private railcar was built. However, he only got to use it once, when it carried his body back to Illinois for burial after his assassination.

During the anniversary celebration City Architect Al Cox, AIA, described the building's history and architectural significance as "The most visible example of the dominant passenger and freight transportation system in the city between 1851 and the 1930's."

But, as noted in a 1996 article published in the Historic Alexandria Quarterly, "Physical evidence of the railroad's influence on the growth and development of Alexandria is rapidly disappearing. Although the Wilkes Street tunnel and Hoof's Run bridge are protected, very soon none of the railroad roundhouses or switching yards will remain to illustrate Alexandria's 18th and 19th century history as Northern Virginia's industrial and transportation center." Unfortunately, that has come to pass.

One of the primary contributors to Alexandria's demise as a rail passenger center was the development of the George Washington Memorial Parkway which heralded the rise of the automobile as THE primary means of passenger transportation. This demise was further exacerbated by the modernization of switching yard technology and freight route changes that lead to the obsolescence of Potomac Yard.

But, then, in the spirit of "all things old are new again," came the rise in computer rail. It has reinvigorated Union Station as well as the rail lines that it serves.

In 1992 Union Station was nominated by the City to the National Register of Historic Places. That was followed by an already achieved your goal. For example, if your goal would be to fit into a smaller clothing size, go buy something in that size, and hang it somewhere at home where you will see it every day. You could use an item you already own, though the action step of buying something new and meaningful helps to solidify the goal as something real.

Eating for many has become a subconscious mind activity. They "zone out" while watching TV, reading a book, or playing on their smartphones. Consider instituting a new rule of eating slowly and consciously. Enjoy every mouthful of food, putting down your knife and fork between mouthfuls, and chewing slowly. Turn off the electronics, and focus fully on your food. This increased awareness of the foods you consume may surprise you as you discover yourself feeling satisfied with the proper sized portion.

Many of my clients also report that by turning their eating into a conscious mind activity their choice of foods improve. Perhaps you may find yourself choosing healthier whole foods as you put more thought in the foods you eat.

Research also supports the use of profound relaxation to assist the metabolic processes of the body when releasing unwanted fat. Consider the animal in the wild eating grass. A predatory creature approaches, and the possible prey goes into its natural fight-or-flight response and flees the scene. In this moment of escape, the internal digestive systems actually slow down to direct more energy to the extremities. When the animal is safe, it does something rather profound: it goes back to eating grass. A human in a similar experience has the tendency to remain in a stressed or anxious state. Learning better stress relief strategies has been linked to a properly functioning metabolism.

When we relax, daydream, meditate, or practice hypnosis, our brainwave frequencies ease down from Beta waking state into Alpha and Theta frequencies. Dr. Bruce Lipton, a professor at the University of Wisconsin and Stanford Schools of Medicine was one of the first to write about the power of positive suggestion toward behavior change while the mind and body are relaxed.

BI Students Earn AP Scholar Honors

Sixty-eight students at Bishop Ireton High School have earned AP Scholar Awards in recognition of their exceptional achievement on AP Exams.

The College Board's Advanced Placement Program (AP) provides willing and academically prepared students with the opportunity to take rigorous college-level courses while still in high school, and to earn college credit, advanced placement, or both for successful performance on the AP Exams. About 18 percent of the more than 1.9 million students worldwide who took AP Exams performed at a sufficiently high level to also earn an AP Scholar Award.

The College Board recognizes several levels of achievement based on students' performance on AP Exams.

At Bishop Ireton High School seventeen students qualified for the AP Scholar with Distinction Award by earning an average score of at least 3.5 on all AP Exams taken, and scores of 3 or higher on five or more of these exams.

These students are Catherin Addington '12, Helena Barber '12, Noah Brooksher '12, Alexander Caraballo '13, Matthew Dubow '12, Mia Finley '12, James Fonda '12, Brittany Harris '12, Stephanie Heredia '12, Robert LaRose '12, Nicholas Manzek '12, Tamra Nebabu '13, Liam O'Connor '12, Ciana Puglise '12, Jacob Ramey '12, Christine Snyder '12 and Stephen Washington '12.

Eleven students qualified for the AP Scholar with Honor Award by earning an average score of at least 3.25 on all AP Exams taken, and scores of 3 or higher on four or more of these exams.

These students are Catherine Babiec '13, Jacob Bisnett '13, Melanie Blower '12, Catherine Burgin '12, Madeline Caballero '12, Jessica Mairena '13, Emily Masi '13, Matthew McShea '12, Katie Necochea '13, Jessica Taylor '12 and Kaitlyn Wagner '12.

Forty students qualified for the AP Scholar

Award by completing three or more AP Exams with scores of 3 or higher.

The AP Scholars are Patrizia Adriazola '13, Celina Amados '13, Andrew Baehre '12, Andrew Bladen '12, Clara Bouquet '13, Brendan Bowe '12, Aberdeen Bowman '12, Sara Brisson '12, Daniel Burns '12, Fiona Carroll '12, Dylan Connor '12, Carlos Daing '12, Aida-Stephanie Dohou '12, Kateri Donovan '12, Justin Estevez '12, Katherine Fogarty '12, Paige Foley '12, Devon Gaffey '12, Nicholas Galdos '12, Gabrielle Gonzalez '12, Suzanne Johnson '13, Stephanie Kapllani '13, Matthew Krause '12, Michael Ly '12, Allyn Melliza '13, Edmond Moreno '12, Michaela Mulokey '13, Veronique Nguyen '13, Sandie Nunez '13, Bryan Phan '13, Karla Ponciano '12, Elizabeth Schaefermeier '12, Karen Shufflebarger '12, Carl Shumate '12, Courtney Skolnick '13, Elisabeth-Rose Smith '12, Nicholas Warner '12, Ronald Wiltsie '13, Makeda Yohannes '13 and Madelyn Zeigler '12.

Through 34 different college-level courses and exams, AP provides willing and academically prepared students with the opportunity to earn college credit or advanced placement and stand out in the college admission process. Each exam is developed by a committee of college and university faculty and AP teachers, ensuring that AP Exams are aligned with the same high standards expected by college faculty at some of the nation's leading liberal arts and research institutions. More than 3,800 colleges and universities annually receive AP scores. Most four-year colleges in the United States provide credit and/or advanced placement for qualifying exam scores. Research consistently shows that AP students who score a 3 or higher on AP Exams (based on a scale from 1 to 5, with 5 being the highest) typically experience greater academic success in college and have higher college graduation rates than students who do not participate in AP.

St. Stephen's & St. Agnes School Host "Students for Sustainability" Conference

Approximately 100 high school and middle school students from the Greater Washington area, along with 30 students visiting from Asia, joined forces to make their schools a "greener" place at the fifth-annual students for Sustainability Conference (S4S), hosted by St. Stephen's & St. Agnes School. The conference was a day of education, discussion, and planning where students learned to make a difference for environmental sustainability in their schools and communities. During the day, students experienced 12 breakout sessions where they could: explore two kinds of electric cars; observe live birds of prey and learn why they're important to the environment; learn how their classrooms can become 100% paperless; and much more. The conference was also joined

She is not only an exceptional teammate, but clearly a tremendous representative of our school and her family. They are proud of her on her club team, and we are very proud of her as well."

BY DENNIS WHITESTONE

ave you included a new car into the budget? No? Then don't ignore the timing belt. If it goes you could be looking at repair bills that would make replacing the car a more viable option.

The timing belt is one of the most essential items in a vehicle's operation. It keeps the camshaft and crankshaft in sync with one another. If they go out of sync it could damage both the pistons and valves which could mean a large repair bill.

Unfortunately, there is no forewarning to when a timing belt is nearing the end of its life. It's not like the commercials on television where customers offer their animated versions of weird noises being made by their cars. There is no noise, no weird sensations, no visible loss of fluids -- it just breaks.

When it goes the car stops. That is followed by the delay, frustration, and expense of being towed to the repair garage. But, that could only be the beginning of the ultimate cost.

An engine fires several thousand times a minute with the valves and pistons operating in perfect sequence to keep them from striking one another. That is the primary job of the timing belt.

However, because the engine is firing so rapidly, when the timing belt goes several firing sequences could still occur before shut down allowing the piston and value to strike one another. This can result in bent valves and/or a punctured piston or both. And, that means a major engine rebuilding or replacement.

There are two types of internal combustion engines on the market today -- interference engines and non-interference engines. Your local garage or auto dealership can tell you which type of engine is in coolant, etc. But, it's safer not to push it right to that outside limit.

A non-interference engine normally calls for the timing belt change at approximately 90,000 mile. But with the interference engine, in my opinion, that milepost is reached at 75,000 miles.

There are basically two choices to be made when replacing a timing belt. One is to replace the belt only. However, most garages will not guarantee a belt replacement only. There are just too many other things that can go wrong that have not been addressed by this limited repair.

The second approach will normally result in a guarantee of the work completed. It calls for not only replacing the timing belt but also the crankshaft and camshaft seals as well as any belt tensioners that are worn. It is also wise to replace the water pump at the same time -- if it is driven by the timing belt. This second approach will "guarantee" the mechanical long life of the vehicle.

Some cars might have a timing chain as opposed to a timing belt.

The difference being that a timing chain is similar to the mechanism of a bicycle -- there is a chain that interacts with a set of gears. The replacement of a timing chain on pre-1995 cars is an estimated 125,000 miles. On newer cars replacement is usually "as needed," according to the owner's manual. Most vehicles with timing chains instead of belts have non-interference engines -- thus the longer milage advisory.

As for cost, that differs from garage to garage or dealership to dealership. But, it is one of the more expensive maintenance items to keep your car running. It is also definitely one of the more essential elements of responsible maintenance.

Unfortunately, there is no way to check on the need for replacement without doing it. By the time the effort is invested in checking on the timing belt the major cost, labor, has been incurred because of were it is located within the engine. Therefore, it is essential to adhere to the mileage replacement recommendation and even have the work done before that recommended mileage limit is reached. The old adage "a stitch in time saves nine" was never more appropriate to the care and maintenance of your vehicle than in the case of the timing belt. This stitch in time could save you many times over a multiplier of nine in either repair bills or adding a new car to the budget.

You must be very careful with the interference engine because it is this type engine where the pistons and valves occupy the same space micro seconds apart during the firing sequence. With the noninterference engine that is not the case. The pistons and valves are in separate enclosures. If the timing belt breaks in a non-interference engine its not as big a deal -- other than the inconvenience of taking an unwanted tow truck ride.

The service manual for each vehicle usually states a suggested milage for replacement of the timing belt just as it does for all other service items such as oil changes, transmission fluid, brakes, ormerly with Catena Zapata for thirty years (the Robert Mondavi of Argentine wines), Winemaker Jose Galante has now aligned his talents with distant Mendoza neighbor, Bodegas Salentein. The Vixen raises a glass or two with don Jose and chats about his first Salentein vintage and finds a few Vino Vixen Values worthy of their Argentine Pesos...

A Chat with Argentine Wine Maker Jose Galante

Argentina and Her Wines – In Argentina, Mendoza means wine. Producing over 70% of her grapes, 370,000 acres of vineyards, and hosting over 1000 wineries, Mendoza is the most influential and important wine region in Argentina. 700 hundred miles west of Buenos Aires lies the Andes, with Mendoza and her five wine subregions nestled next to the mountain range. The highest of these subregions is Uco Valley and home to Bodegas Salentein.

Serendipity Salentein – As much good fortune in life often is, Salentein was founded by unfortunate accident. Dutch entrepreneur, tycoon, and avid sailor, Mijndert Pon was stranded in the Caribbean while his vessel was being serviced during a sailing jaunt in the region. At an invitation of an Argentine friend, Pon bided his time down in Mendoza enjoying the time as bon vivant millionaires are apt to do – sipping wine and living the good life. Pon fell in love with Argentina, Mendoza, and the Uco Valley. And when a millionaire falls in love, money shall be spent on that object of affection. Hiring one of the most innovative architecutal firms in Argentina, Bormido and Yanzon (see the beautiful coffee table book Adventurous Wine Architecture By Michael Webb,) Pon built a "field of dreams"

2011 KILLKA

Torrontes Uco Valley, Mendoza

SRP- $15

I'm a huge fan of Torrontes. I think of it as the Pinot Grigio killer - if you're a fan of a fresh, lighter style, fruit forward wine, try this one. The nose is floral and feminine. On the palate, taste light white pear and a hint of grapefruit. Because of the altitude of these grapes, you won't get the very extracted fruit flavors inherent in many Mendoza Torrontes. And I like that - it's a softer and more sophisticated Torrontes. Check out the label..."Gente a La Espera de Una Cita de Amor or "People Searching for a Love Tryst" by Argentinean artist Antonio Segui (1934). It's a hookup scene! I think it would make a perfect pattern for an Hermes tie... the palate, the Cabernet Sauvignon seems to overtake the Malbec just a hint more than it should, because that Malbec is amazing. The Cabernet Sauvignon is a bit herbaceous and needs to settle down. I expect some bottle aging will do just that. Interesting wine with excellent layers and complexity. It was hard to put this down, as it changed in the glass with each sip. Try this one if you can find it under $37 – it's worth the peso.

Notes of vanilla and hints of caramel. Through using only a partial malolactic fermentation, Gallante controlled the overt butter, which is a good thing. But, the wine lacks the depth and nuances I've found in other $20 Chardonnays. I'd buy this at $15, but underwhelmed at $20.

2010 SALENTEIN NUMINA

Clearly, Gallante enjoys working with his reds. The color is deep and dark – beautiful in the glass. On but Galante really tamed the acidity and combined it with very soft tannins. And the result is simply stellar. Fruit is intense (I thought he may have had a late harvest) and rich with black cherry, ripe raspberry. Aged 18 months in French oak, giving it some nice non-fruit lovelies like tobacco. This is a winner at any price and a VVV at $20.

2010 SALENTEIN PRIMUM

Malbec Uco Valley, Mendoza SRP- $65

My first sip's reaction "Where are the tannins?" This wine is so soft and mellow that it's lacking the umph and textures I expect at this price. It's lovely and very drinkable filled with juicy cherry fruit and violet nose that fills the room. But, at $65 I need more. I was happy, very happy, drinking the $20 Malbec Reserve next to this.

winery, restaurant, hotel, gallery, and even a chapel in the remote slopes of the Andes – over an hour from the bustle of Mendoza.

The Acquisition – Pon acquired beautiful art for his Salentein's Killka Gallery, filling it with paintings from the 19th and 20th century Dutch Masters and contemporary Argentine artists. He acquired additional vineyards from three distinct valley fincas of varying altitudes. And finally Pon acquired Jose Pepe Galante, one of Argentina's most notable winemakers.

With over thirty years with experience as head winemaker of Bodega Catena and working with wine legend Nicolas Catena, Jose Galante has what it takes to be Pon's number one draft pick and bring Salentein wines to new international heights. Currently Salentein is the 46th largest exporter of Argentine wines, and Catena is number 4, so you may not be so familiar with Salentein. However, as Galante was an instrumental force behind Catena's ascent in exports and understands well the "Robert Parker-esque" international winemaking style, you may start noticing Salentein in more wine shops and on more wine lists. So let's get ready for them...

Salentein Wine Line-Up – Like many wineries now, Salentein has their consumer-friendly brand (inexpensive- usually fun looking labels), premium brand (mid-expensive – usually serious looking labels with winery image of logo) and icon brand (crazy expensive, heavy bottles, embossed labels). I tasted and reviewed a selection from Salenteins consumer-friendly and premium wines. (Galante is working on his icon brand now – the juice is still in the barrel and is expected to be over $100/bottle).

Killka – Andean word that means "entry or gateway", which is a (probably unintentionally) appropriate name for their entry wine. The labels are all images from their modern art collection of Argentinian artists hanging in the winery's art collection – the Killka Gallery.

As I mentioned, Gallante is working on his icon wine now, which will be a blend of Malbec and Cabernet Sauvignon. He has a reputation riding on this one, as well as the pressure of first release Icon Wine. I think I would prefer to save back the $65 Primum ticket price and put it towards his new Icon.

- Cheers, VV

Living Legend Bill Kehoe.

Living Legends 2012 at City Hall

BY TRUDI VAN DYKE

I have a digital camera...it's easy to take pictures... I set it on "idiot proof" and shoot portraits to capture special people in my life. Some end up in "the cloud"; lots still live on my camera.

But, somewhere along the line I've missed the talent gene and its even more obvious that years of study and hard work marks the huge difference between what I produce and true photographic art.

There is a timely opportunity to visit the Alexandria City Town Hall to view the photographic portraits of the 2012 Living Legends. The foyer space is aligned now with the exceptional black and white portraits of the honorees. Choosing the format of black and white challenges the photographer to find ways to bring forth the personality of the subject without relying on color. Professional art photographer Nina Tisara whose poignant portrait work is well known and widely exhibited and collected has shot the majority of the work.

The continuing concept of Living Legends is to photograph each awardee in their own environment. Tisara feels that finding a comfortable place for her subjects will enhance their relaxation and help provide the natural quality and personality that she wants to evoke. Indeed her hours of planning, shooting, and choreographing each shoot has again created a panoply of artistic excellence.

so that the flawless composition swirls around the subject and the viewer is inadvertently drawn into the pride and genuine quality of the subject.

Bud Hart's portrait is more casual. A man in the midst of his sharing what he loves. His hands-on work in the community is taken at face value as his hands are reflected in the hands reaching out to him.

Steven Halperson, also a talented artist, provided back up to Tisara as he has done in previous years and photographed Joe Shumard. In addition it needs to be noted that Halperson's contribution of flawless matting and framing lends a flow to the exhibition. Individual remarks about each legend are placed within the double mat and artfully manages to enhance the work without distraction for those who take the time to read them. However, the quality of the beautiful art stands on its own without need of verbiage.

Always giving back to the community itself, founder Nina Tisara and Steven Halperson worked closely to incorporate the opportunity for NOVA student Joe Bleach to be mentored in the project. Bleach's work on two of the thirteen legends is included in the well-lit and presented exhibition.

Alexandria citizens should take the opportunity to go to town hall for more than paying their taxes. Plan on spending a few extra minutes perusing this art exhibition. You don't have to know the subjects when you arrive but the artistic quality of the photographs will make you feel like they are old friends when you leave.
