Al Gore: Hello everyone, I'm Al Gore, founder and chairman of the Climate Reality Project. This extraordinary moment of great challenge and great loss is obviously also a moment of great awakening and a great opportunity. The global pandemic, structural and institutional racism, with its horrific violence, the worsening impacts of the climate crisis -- all of these have accelerated the emergence of a new and widespread collective understanding of our connection to the natural world, the consequences of ignoring science and our sacred obligation to build a just society for all. The Climate Reality Project trains thousands of climate leaders around the world, in all 195 nations, to advocate for a future humanity deserves. You're about to hear from four very different people who've gone through this week-long training and hear how they've been inspired to act. I want to let them speak for themselves, beginning with Ximena Loría. Ximena is working in Central America to influence public policy and develop young leaders. She has given presentations on climate to thousands of people and has now created her own NGO.

Ximena Loría: My name is Ximena Loría. I'm from Costa Rica, and I attended the 2016 training in Houston, Texas. After the training, my life changed completely. I founded an NGO called Misión 2 Grados. My job has been focused on four main important topics: people's sensitization on climate change, supporting the B Corp movement, incidence in public policy and development of young leaders in environmental matters. I'm proud of having more than 150 presentations on the climate crisis and solutions, reaching personally more than 7,500 people. And I am also proud of being part of the Costa Rica delegation to COP25 in Spain last December.
