- Q. Mr Patarkatsishvili told Mr Berezovsky's lawyers in 2005 that some time after this meeting he had a further personal conversation with you at which you also promised that Mr Glushkov would be released. I'm not going to show you that, but in your witness statement you refer to an interview which Mr Patarkatsishvili gave to Kommersant Daily on 4 July 2001.

I wonder if I can show you that document. H(A)37 at page 4 in the English H(A)37/4 and 4R in the Russian H(A)37/4R. If you go to -- make sure you recognise the document and you know what it is, you can see it's an interview with Kommersant Daily on 4 July 2001. If you go to page 6 of the document, perhaps we can pick it up at page 5, Gevorkian says to Mr Patarkatsishvili:

"In actual fact, they dealt a blow to Glushkov."

Mr Patarkatsishvili says:

"The Kremlin decided to ostracise Berezovsky by pressuring his close associates. That is why they picked out Nikolai Glushkov, the former deputy director general of Aeroflot and close friend of Berezovsky's and mine. He was arrested December 7, 2000. It became clear some time later that the organisers had failed to attain a resounding effect, and the Aeroflot case began falling to pieces. The charges against Glushkov kept changing at an astonishing pace. One might wonder, why all that fuss if you claim to have reliable evidence, gentlemen."

Then Gevorkian said:

"You mentioned attempts to pressure Berezovsky.

What could the actual motif behind it be?

"Boris Abramovich and I underwent all sorts of pressure, before and after Glushkov's arrest. They tried to bargain the Aeroflot case closure for the shares of ORT television. We agreed to it when Glushkov was arrested. We sold our shares. Alexander Voloshin promised that Glushkov would be released, but he cheated us."

I suggest to you, Mr Voloshin, that what Mr Patarkatsishvili said here, and indeed to his lawyers, was correct, that there was a conversation between you and him after Mr Glushkov's arrest during which you promised that Mr Glushkov would be released, and that is true, is it not?

A. This is untrue for one simple reason, actually two simple reasons. (a), I couldn't promise to anyone that Mr Glushkov would be released because I had nothing to do with it, and I myself sincerely believed that it would be better if people were put behind bars for economic crimes less. So I had nothing to do with this case or any other similar cases, I couldn't promise anything of that sort to anyone.

And secondly, never in my life I met one-to-one or communicated in any way with Mr Patarkatsishvili. I saw him several times in the company of Mr Berezovsky but I never -- we didn't have that sort of relationship that we would meet one to one. I cannot recall a single case of that. And I cannot recall a single telephone conversation. Maybe he might have passed some request via third parties to myself, or maybe he meant something of that sort, but we never communicated with him directly. It's very easy for me to disprove it -- this.

MR RABINOWITZ: Thank you, Mr Voloshin, I don't have any further questions for you.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Malek?

MR MALEK: No questions, my Lady.

MR ADKIN: No questions, my Lady.

MR SUMPTION: No re-examination.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much indeed,

Mr Voloshin, for coming along to give your evidence.

You may be released. Thank you.

(The witness withdrew)

Very well, I'll sit at 2.10.

(1.05 pm)

(The short adjournment)

(2.10 pm)

MS DAVIES: My Lady, I call Mr Kapkov.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, very well.

MR SERGEY KAPKOV (affirmed)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Please sit down if you'd like to.

Examination-in-chief by MS DAVIES

MS DAVIES: Mr Kapkov, could you be given bundle E8 at tab 10, please.

You should find there your witness statement in this action, do you see that? The Russian version starts at page 38 E8/10/38. If you turn forward to page 140, do you see your signature?

A. Yes.

Q. There are two corrections you wish to make to that statement, there should be a sheet on the table in front of you with the corrections in English and in Russian.
Could you have a look at that.

Firstly at paragraph 4 there's a correction underlined in blue. And also then at paragraph 8, there's a correction to a date, again underlined in blue.

Can you confirm that they're corrections you wish to make to your witness statement?

A. Yes, these are the corrections that I would like to make.

Q. Subject to those corrections, is your witness statement true?

A. Yes, they are.

MS DAVIES: Could you wait there, please. There will be some questions on behalf of Mr Berezovsky.

Cross-examination by MR GILLIS

MR GILLIS: Good afternoon, Mr Kapkov.

A. Good afternoon.

Q. You have indicated in your witness statement that in December 2000 you'd been living in Moscow for just over a year, is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And that you were working for a company called UPI which provided campaign advice to a number of Russian politicians. Is that correct?

A. That is correct.

Q. And that you had met Mr Abramovich the year before at the end of 1999, is that correct?

A. Yes, that is true.

- Q. And that in the corrections we see, you say that you were asked to help him to campaign to become a member of the Duma and to organise the Chukotka part of his electoral campaign to run for the governor of Chukotka?
- A. Well, first I worked for Mr Abramovich when he was running for the State Duma, then when the gubernatorial campaign started I was head of his campaign in Chukotka.
- Q. Later on you state that you were formally appointed to assist Mr Abramovich who was then a member of the Duma. Can you recall on what date you were appointed as his assistant?
- A. I believe that it was in the spring 2000, I think I was appointed assistant of the MP for Chukotka, I worked with the local community, local population, and I answered the letters that MP Abramovich received from the local population, from people living in that community.
- Q. So is it correct that you became one of Mr Abramovich's deputies in Chukotka?
- A. No. Under Russian law an MP has the right to have five assistants, five aides, whose salaries are paid by the local budget, by the budget, two working for the Duma and three working in the region for which he was elected, and I worked as his assistant in that region. And I was paid, my salary was paid by the local government, by the government of the okrug or region of Chukotka, out of the Chukotka budget, out of the coffers of the Chukotka okrug.

Q. Can I just get this clear, are you saying that you did or you did not act as a deputy to Mr Abramovich in Chukotka?

A. In the year 2000, until such time as Roman Abramovich became governor, I was his assistant in the State Duma. And then, when he was elected, I no longer worked for him. And in 2001 I wanted to work for him and he offered me a position of the assistant to the governor in charge of the press relations. And when I started working in Chukotka, I made a career and I became head of the culture, sport, tourism and youth policies department of Chukotka. But by that time, he had already been elected governor of Chukotka.

Q. So you say you were not one of his deputies?

A. You see, the structure of the government of the autonomous okrug of Chukotka is such that a governor has deputies and has heads of department. I was head of the department and member of parliament of the Chukotka Autonomous Okrug or region.

Q. So is this fair, that you were working closely with Mr Abramovich in Chukotka?

A. Yes.

Q. Is it right to say that you could be fairly described as an ally of Mr Abramovich or a close associate of Mr Abramovich? Would you agree with those descriptions?

A. So far as the tasks were concerned that we were in charge of in Chukotka, that was the case. My remit was to develop culture, sports and tourism in the Chukotka Autonomous Okrug.

Q. And more generally, moving from Chukotka, would you describe yourself as being an ally or a close associate of Mr Abramovich?

A. I would agree with this statement within the framework of the Chukotka okrug only. We had a large team of new people who worked there, who developed the region, who lived there, and I lived there at that time as well.

Q. Could I ask that a newspaper, the Moscow News article dated 16 March 2011 be provided. (Handed)

THE INTERPRETER: Excuse me, does the article give a Russian translation?

MR GILLIS: I'm afraid we only have it in the English but there are just one or two passages I would ask you to look at.

This is a Moscow News article dated 16 March 2011 and the headline describes you as an ally of Mr Abramovich, do you see that?

The title indicates:

"Abramovich ally becomes Gorky Park director."

Then if I could take you to the first paragraph, it says:

"Run-down Gorky Park has a new boss and the appointment of Sergey Kapkov as director could add weight to rumours that Roman Abramovich is ready to bankroll planned refurbishment."

Would you disagree with that description of yourself as being an "ally" of Mr Abramovich?

- A. I think that the word "ally" has a broad range of meanings, and if you look at this word from a broad range of perspectives then I would agree with this.
- Q. I'm just trying to understand the nature of your relationship with Mr Abramovich. Could I ask you to look at another newspaper article and, again, I'm afraid this is just in English, and this is a Daily Telegraph article, dated 31 March 2011. (Handed)

Mr Kapkov, if I could again just indicate that this is an article which is headlined:

"Roman Abramovich to help turn Gorky Park into Moscow version of Hyde Park."

If I could take you to the top of the second page, maybe the translator could show you the top of the second page. At the top of that second page, you are quoted as saying:

"'What is there in Hyde Park that we cannot have in Gorky Park?' Sergey Kapkov, the park's general director and a close associate of the oligarch's, told the Gazeta.Ru online."

Again, would you accept that as being an accurate description of your relationship with Mr Abramovich, "a close associate"?

- A. No, this is not a fair characterisation because I worked in Chukotka for three years, I spent three years in the administration of the okrug, then I was elected to the State Duma from the Mardovi(?) and Samara region, not from Chukotka mind you.

And after that, for a second time I was elected to the State Duma, and when the new Mayor of Moscow was appointed he invited me to become head of the Gorky Park, being aware of the -- my track record and my successes in the field of culture in Chukotka.

Throughout all that time, during ten years, my salary was paid in the State Duma, in the administration of the Chukotka okrug, and I had an income from my investment activity during ten years -- for a period of ten years I was a state employee, state official.

- Q. Just sticking with your relationship with Mr Abramovich, is it not the case that he also put you in charge of the National Football Academy which he had set up and which he was very proud of?

A. Well, because under Russian law an MP, a deputy member of the State Duma, cannot carry on any activity in the National Football Academy. I worked for free, it was volunteering work for me, and my task was to work on the policy of the development of football in the country because I am the vice president of the Russian Football Union, which basically is the Russian football association for all practical purposes.

Q. Putting aside the question of whether you were being paid, is it the case that Mr Abramovich was involved in putting you in charge of the National Football Academy of which he is proud?

A. Well, the National Football Academy was put together by myself, together with my like-minded colleagues and comrades, and the trusteeship council of the academy was indeed headed by Roman Arkadievich Abramovich.

Q. Can I just ask you to go back to the first newspaper article I handed up, the Moscow News, dated 16 March 2001 (sic).

Looking at the third paragraph, that reads in relation to you:

"More recently he has been in charge of Russia's National Football Academy set up and funded by the soccer-loving tycoon."

That's referring to Mr Abramovich. Now, do you accept that Mr Abramovich set up the National Football Academy?

A. I agree with the statement that Mr Abramovich, acting through the National Football Academy, did help the Russian national football association.

Q. And is it the case that you have continued dealings with Mr Abramovich through the National Football Academy?

A. The objective of the National Football Academy was to decide on the strategy for Russian football and for the strategy for developing youth football, and we worked on this together with the Russian Football Union.

Part of the money was provided by Mr Abramovich, part of the money was funded by the local authorities in the various regions, and part of the funds came from other private sponsors.

Q. But my question was whether you continued to have dealings with Mr Abramovich through the National Football Academy. Do you?

A. Once a year I made a presentation to Mr Abramovich, the whole team, a large team of our people came to him and made a presentation of our plans for the next year, how many fields we're going to build for the youngsters and what programmes we would be putting in place for youngsters, and we presented a budget for him, and a part of this was funded by Mr Abramovich.

Q. Well, Mr Kapkov, you've been described as Mr Abramovich's closest ally in Russian football. Would you agree with that description?

A. I would be prepared to agree with the statement that we shared the same views with Mr Abramovich with respect to the strategy for the development of Russian football.

Q. Can I please just pass up another newspaper article, this time from the Daily Mail, dated 14 January 2010.

(Handed). This is dealing with the position of Mr Hiddink, who was the manager of the Russian national football team. If I can just read to you the third and fourth paragraphs:

"It last night emerged that the agreement came to an end at the turn of the year, and NAS [that's the National Football Academy] boss Sergey Kapkov said he was relaxed about reports that Hiddink was being lined up to take over at Juventus. 'He is free to take any decision', said Abramovich's closest ally in Russian football."

I put to you that's a fair description of the nature of your relationship, in relation to football, that you are closest allies.

A. Roman Arkadievich Abramovich, and this is not a secret, did fund the arrival of Guus Hiddink to Russia, and he paid his salary, after the president of the Russian Football Union was replaced by someone else, and the new person believed that Hiddink should no longer be working in Russia and that he would be bringing in someone else, and that explains this comment.

Q. So are you agreeing or disagreeing with the suggestion that you can be regarded as Mr Abramovich's closest ally in Russian football?

A. One can consider me as a like-minded person with Mr Roman Abramovich insofar as the development of Russian football is concerned, and when we, together, invited a foreign trainer to become the head trainer of the Russian national team, in that sense, we were like-minded individuals.

Q. You say in your witness statement at paragraph 3 that you're the deputy director of the Moscow city government department of culture. Do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. And it's right, isn't it, that that department appointed you as a director of the project to regenerate Moscow's Gorky Park, is that correct?

A. Yes, I was appointed director of Gorky Park, I was appointed by the director of the culture department of the city of Moscow, and now I am director of the department of culture of the city of Moscow. And Gorky Park is a cultural establishment of Moscow, it's owned by the government, it's owned by the state, and therefore I, according to the charter of the city, I am appointed by the director of the culture department of the city.

Q. And it's been reported that Mr Abramovich is helping to bankroll the regeneration of Gorky Park, is that correct?

A. Mr Abramovich showed his interest in restoring a cultural monument, an exhibition pavilion called the Hexagon in Gorky Park. All the rest is funded out of the budget of the city of Moscow.

Q. Do you have continuing relationships with Mr Abramovich in relation to the Gorky Park development?

A. Well, over the past month and a half I'm no longer director of Gorky Park. I was appointed deputy director of the department of culture, and I'm now director head of the department of culture of the city of Moscow. Therefore Gorky Park is one of the 917 establishments or agencies that I govern.

Q. So I ask again, do you have a continuing relationship with Mr Abramovich in relation to the Gorky Park development?

A. Well, as of today, at the time of speaking, Park Gorky is funded by the city of Moscow budget.

Roman Abramovich did have an idea to restore a monument, an exhibition pavilion called Hexagon, on the territory of Gorky Park. That idea has not thus far been implemented.

- Q. Mr Kapkov, would you agree with me that your witness statement gives no indication that at the present time you have a continuing relationship with Mr Abramovich and it creates the impression that, from December 2000, really your paths separated?
- A. It's not entirely the case. I think until December 2003 I was head of the culture department of the Chukotka okrug, then I was -- then I had a second baby, a new baby, it was difficult for me to work there and so I came to Roman and I told him that, for family reasons, I can no longer keep up with the speed and I asked for his indulgence, and I ran for -- I stood for the Duma and so I moved, or basically I came back to Moscow.
- Q. I suggest to you, Mr Kapkov, that you had a continuing relationship through Chukotka, you have a continuing relationship with Mr Abramovich now through football, and equally so through the Gorky Park development. Is that correct?
- A. No.
- Q. Would you describe Mr Abramovich as a friend?
- A. I believe that Roman is my friend, yes. I consider him as a friend.

Q. You socialise with him?

A. From time to time, yes, definitely.

Q. And Mr Kapkov, do you not think it would have been relevant to tell this court of your continuing relationship with Mr Abramovich?

A. I have an ongoing relationship with Mr Abramovich and I'm his friend, and the various stories in the press basically say that if he goes to a football match, because he is a high profile individual and his appearance draws a lot of attention, and when he goes there I'm there as well because I'm vice president of the national football union. And if he goes to an exhibition, a high profile exhibition in Moscow, I'm also present there in my capacity as director of the culture department of the city of Moscow.

It's simply that every time, every time he appears in public means additional work for me because he comes to an exhibition as a member of the public and I in my capacity as director of the department, or if he goes to see a football match, he goes there to root for a team and then I come there in my capacity as head of the football union.

Q. All right, well, let me move on.

As you are aware, the question of Mr Abramovich's whereabouts in December 2000 is an important issue in these proceedings. You're aware of that, aren't you?

A. Yes.

Q. And it's in relation to that issue that you have given evidence on Mr Abramovich's behalf, so I'd like to go back to December 2000, when you were helping to organise Mr Abramovich's campaign for the governorship of Chukotka. In that role, did you keep diaries of your meetings in connection with the campaign, or was one kept for you?

A. Well, we definitely did have an election campaign plan because in the course of the elections every day is precious, and because this was a very high profile election campaign, and the first election campaign where I was head of the campaign staff, I definitely remember that campaign very well. And also after that campaign I have never done anything remotely related to elections because, after that, I became a government official.

Q. My question was in relation to whether there were any diaries that were being kept.

A. Yes, things were recorded but I have not retained any of those documents.

Q. Did you look for them?

A. Well, I did look for some of the things, but then there were others that I knew that it made no sense to look for them because we did not retain past electoral campaign plans, for instance, because after the election they make no sense, they're not important, because either the candidate has been elected or they have not been elected. It's either/or.

Q. You said in your witness statement that the campaign was being led by Ms Russova, and that you reported to Ms Russova at a company called UPI which provided campaign advice to a number of Russian politicians, do you recall that?

A. Yes. Yes, that is the case.

Q. Do you know whether UPI still exists?

A. No, due to the tragic death, passing away of Julia Russova, the company was wound up.

Q. So is this right, you have not been able to obtain any documents from UPI in relation to meetings that were taking place in December 2000?

A. I did not even look for those because, first of all, certain things I remembered, and then there were others that I knew that I could no longer locate.

Q. So is this right, there is no documentary evidence that supports your dating of the meetings that you say took place 11 years ago?

A. Well, I have my recollections, I have my memory, and I remember those things because those dates were very important to me, so there is just me.

Q. So I think you're agreeing with me, then, are you, that there's no documentary evidence?

A. I have no documentary evidence. All I have is, well, my words.

Q. Now, is this right, that during the gubernatorial campaign in relation to Chukotka, that was originally due to start in the first week of December but was delayed, is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. In the progress of that campaign, is it right that you would have had fairly frequent meetings with Mr Abramovich?

A. Well, I don't know how many times a day I met with Abramovich, it's hard to recall now, but I do know that every day, at least several times a day, I spoke with him on the phone because it was our tradition and it was extremely important for the election campaign.

Q. And you suggest that you have a clear and distinct recollection of each of those meetings, even though they were 11 years ago?

A. Yes.

Q. You say you have a clear recollection of all those meetings, even though they were 11 years ago and even though there are no documents?

- A. Well, first of all, those meetings were extremely important and also we met to discuss business and that's why I remember them all.
- Q. You remember all the meetings? Not just the meeting that you've referred to on 9 December, but you say you recall all of the meetings?
- A. I remember the -- how the election process in Chukotka was structured while I was there and while I was in Moscow. Roman was a very systematic, very focused person, more than any other candidate in my life, and I was greatly impressed by that, and I can tell you how that system worked. I may not recall all the discussions that we had about the elections and how that was structured and the principles of our work with him, the way he explained it to me I remember vividly and I still remember them now.
- Q. You say in your witness statement that you do not remember seeing Mr Abramovich on 8 December but you say you believe he was in Moscow because you were trying to arrange a campaign meeting with him, is that right?
- A. Yes.
- Q. Now, I think you indicated that you've got no documentary evidence to aid your memory, is that correct?
- A. Yes, but I do remember exactly the 9th and the 10th because, on the 10th, we were leaving for Chukotka and 10 December is my birthday, and it was my first birthday that I celebrated in Moscow and I was quite nervous as to whether I should be leaving or whether I should be celebrating my birthday and seeing friends and booking a restaurant and things like that in Moscow, so I was really on tenterhooks.

Q. Mr Kapkov, I'll come to the 9th in a moment, but can I just ask you about the 8th, because you say you remember trying to arrange meetings with Mr Abramovich on the 8th and I suggest to you that it's unrealistic to suggest that you would have memories 11 years after the event of having tried to arrange a meeting with Mr Abramovich. Do you wish to comment?

A. Yes. Well, as a matter of fact, the way elections, an electoral campaign works is that the early period, which can be 30 to 45 days, you work actually with the press, you give out fliers, booklets, and for the last two weeks you only have personal meetings with -- between the candidate and other people. And the more meetings he has, the more hands he shakes, the better for him.

So I do know exactly that I was in Chukotka until the end of November, then I came back and he was still not coming back, and I went there to tell him that we are way past our schedule, we have to organise meetings with electorers(?), and the problem was that PR and advertisements are one thing, and personal meetings in such a large region as Chukotka is really the most important thing. So I tried to explain to him that unless he meets with people and presses flesh the chances are we will lose the election.

So I came there and every day I spoke to him, I told him that we need to go -- I had to approve the final specimens of the various hand-out materials. So we had to hop on the plane. Time was for us to hop on the plane.

Q. Mr Kapkov, I'm asking you about on what basis you can possibly suggest that you can date a failed attempt to arrange a meeting as being 8 December. Now, do you wish to reply to that question or not?

A. Well, I do know that on the 9th we did have a meeting, that's for certain, because on the 9th the situation was that I think Mr Abramovich was sick and tired of my telephone calls and so he told me, okay, all right, so tomorrow morning -- we spoke on the 8th -- so tomorrow morning let's have a meeting at my place.

And it was important for me to have a meeting with the candidate and with my official boss, and on the 9th we came to his office, but in the office the bodyguards told me that Roman was not there, so we crossed the street to Baltshug(?) Hotel to wait -- to have some coffee and wait for Roman to arrive. It was not -- it was only an hour after that that he called Julia and he said, "Where are you? I'm waiting for you." And apparently he was waiting for us at his dacha, at his countryside home outside of Moscow. And we got on the car and went to see him at his place, and that was my first time where I saw him, where I was meeting with Roman at his place.

Q. Well, I've tried asking you about the 8th so I'll ask you about the 9th.

You say that you attended a meeting with Mr Abramovich on the Saturday, the 9th, to discuss last-minute campaign issues. Is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And, again, do you say that you can actually recall even now the issues that you were discussing?

A. Yes. As a matter of fact these were standard issues, the number of meetings, the number of flashpoints, the sociological reviews, TV programmes and discussions with the people. And I also remember that we discussed the new anthem, I think that on the 8th the Duma was voting for the new anthem because at that time the country only had the music and had no lyrics of the national anthem, and it was an important period of time for the country because, at the end of the day, the country did have an anthem, a national anthem with actually the lyrics in it.

Q. I don't think you refer to any of that in your witness statement, do you?

A. I did not know that I had to go into all those details. I just have a vivid recollection of all that, I did not know that I need to drill down to that extent of detail in my witness statement.

Q. Mr Kapkov, would you not agree with me that trying to identify what happened on exact dates 11 years ago, without any documentary evidence to assist memory, is an exceedingly difficult task?

A. Yes. I do not have any documents. Having said that, I do have my memory, and I was a young person at that time. I remember the impression that Roman's house made on me, and I remember how important it was for me to make sure that on the 10th we go back, and that I would be able to gather my friends in Moscow and celebrate my birthday, because we were leaving before the date of election so we needed to celebrate my birthday.

It was a vivid memory, it was my first time, my first year in Moscow where I had friends, where I had company.

Q. Mr Kapkov, I can understand that that may assist you in remembering that the departure was delayed. I put it to you that it does not assist in dating the meeting.

A. Sorry, when you say dating, which date do you mean?

Q. 9 December.

A. On 9 December, I had a meeting with Roman Abramovich at his home in Sareevo.

Q. Can you be clear it was not on 10 December, the day you left for Chukotka?

A. I'm certain because on 10 December we met on the plane, on board the plane. Roman congratulated me, wished me happy birthday and gave me a present, it was a watch, and that I remember vividly, and then we left. It was a very dear present for me, both in terms of money and in terms of his personal attitude towards me, because at that time we were not friends yet, I was just one of the people who worked in the organisation which was working on his election campaign.

Q. And can you be clear that the meeting did not take place the previous weekend?

A. I am certain about that.

Q. Mr Kapkov, I suggest to you that the reason that you are not willing to admit to any doubt as to when this meeting took place is because of the relationship that you still have with Mr Abramovich and your desire to assist his case.

A. I am not prepared to acknowledge this. This was a very dramatic event in my life, a gubernatorial campaign, because my personal career started when he became governor. I remember I was 25 years old at that time and I remember what impression that election campaign made on me, and also the scale of the things that we were doing in Chukotka, it was a very important and a very responsible thing for me to do. It was the first election campaign that I was charged with from A to Z, to be in charge of.

MR GILLIS: Thank you. I have no further questions.

MR MALEK: No questions, my Lady.

MR ADKIN: No questions, my Lady.

Re-examination by MS DAVIES

MS DAVIES: Mr Kapkov, just one small matter of clarification. You told us that in September 2003 you went to Mr Abramovich and asked for his indulgence and then moved back to Moscow. Did you continue to be an employee of Mr Abramovich after that time?

A. When I was asking for his indulgence I was still his employee, but I got on the party list, and in December I became deputy or a member of the State Duma, so I ceased to be his employee and I became a member of parliament.

Q. And have you been an employee of Mr Abramovich since December 2003 at any stage?

A. No.

MS DAVIES: Thank you very much, Mr Kapkov.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much indeed for coming along to give your evidence. You may be released.

Thank you.

(The witness withdrew)

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, our next witness will be Mr Shvidler.

Would your Ladyship like to break now --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Unless you want to take him through his statements in-chief.

MR SUMPTION: I can do that and that might be more sensible.

Why don't we do that.

Mr Shvidler.

MR EUGENE SHVIDLER (affirmed)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Do sit down, Mr Shvidler, if you would like to.

Examination-in-chief by MR SUMPTION

MR SUMPTION: Mr Shvidler, you have made four witness statements, I believe, for the purposes of this action or this trial. I'm going to ask you to identify each of them.

Would you take first of all bundle E3 at flag 10, please E3/10/1. Is this your third witness statement, the first one prepared for the trial?

A. That's right.

Q. Would you please confirm that your signature appears at the end of it on page 64?

A. Yes.

Q. And is that statement true?

A. It is.

Q. Now, could you please now turn to bundle E4 at flag 10 E4/10/160. Is this your fourth witness statement?

A. That's right.

Q. And is that signed by you on page 198?

A. Yes.

Q. Is that statement true?

A. It is.

Q. Bundle E5 is next. Flag 14, is this your fifth witness statement, Mr Shvidler?

A. It is.

Q. Signed by you on page 179.

A. That's right.

Q. Is that statement true?

A. It's true.

Q. Finally, in bundle E8, would you turn to flag 16, please E8/16/192. Is that your sixth witness statement?

A. Yes.

Q. Signed on page 197 of the bundle?

A. That's right.

Q. And is that statement true?

A. Yes.

MR SUMPTION: Thank you very much, Mr Shvidler.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Rabinowitz, shall I take the break now?

MR RABINOWITZ: That may be sensible, my Lady. I'm in your hands, I don't mind. We can either start and carry on for a while.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Why don't we start.

Cross-examination by MR RABINOWITZ

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Shvidler, just so you understand the context of the questions which I'm going to be asking you, I should make it clear I'm not going to be asking you questions in relation to matters that we have already questioned Mr Abramovich about unless it appears that you have some separate independent knowledge of questions in issue. I'm also not going to be asking you questions about your belief as to the correctness or otherwise of Mr Abramovich's case or Mr Berezovsky's case. You make clear that you always tend to regard Mr Abramovich's case as more credible. And I'm also not going to ask you questions about your criticism of the evidence of Mr Berezovsky's witnesses. Your counsel has had or will have the opportunity to put these to the witnesses in question and I'm not going to take up the court time with that. Do you understand?

A. Yes.

Q. All right. You, Mr Shvidler, I think in 1986, graduated from the IM Gubkin Moscow Institute of Oil and Gas with a masters degree in applied mathematics, is that right?

A. That's right.

Q. By 1991 you had obtained an MBA in financial accounting, and another masters in taxation from Fordham University in New York, is that correct?

A. It is correct.

Q. Following that you spent two years in the New York office of Deloitte & Touche?

A. Correct.

Q. And at Deloittes, you were a member of Deloittes international tax group, is that correct?

A. It is correct.

Q. Can you briefly describe the sort of work which you did in the international tax group?

A. It was an entry level job, I was an associate, it was called associate. I didn't bring coffee to senior partners, no, but it was a mostly menial job. I did participate in preparation of individual tax returns for wealthy individuals, international clients, and generally I was assisting others.

Q. And from your education, your work at Deloitte, you would have gained an understanding of different tax regimes in different jurisdictions, is that right?

A. To the extent I could, yes.

Q. And you would have understood and given advice on different mechanisms for reducing tax exposure of international businesses?

A. In general, yes. Tax regimes were -- tax rules were changing very quickly all over the world, so I wouldn't consider myself to be a specialist.

Q. And you would have learnt about tax minimisation schemes using offshore structures including trusts and the like?

A. Not really, I had nothing to do with that.

Q. You are, I think, a US citizen, is that right?

A. That's right.

Q. And for how long have you been a US citizen?

A. Since 94, so whatever that was.

Q. And as such you're obliged to declare each year your worldwide income, is that right?

A. Correct.

Q. And this includes both earned income, salary and the like, and unearned income from interests, dividends and the like, is that right?

A. Correct.

Q. Can you tell me this: in your annual declarations, have you ever identified yourself as receiving any income through owning any stake, whether directly or indirectly, of any Runicom company, or Sibneft or Rusal?

A. No.

Q. So if it were to turn out that you did in fact own a stake in the Runicom company, Sibneft or Rusal, then this might amount to an admission of tax evasion, is that right?

A. That's right.

Q. So we can be confident, I suppose, that this is not something you will be confessing to today, is that right?

A. Correct.

Q. Now, Mr Abramovich told the court that you and he had discussed the evidence you were each going to give prior to making your witness statements, and I don't suppose you dispute that?

A. No dispute.

Q. And he also explained that before finalising your witness statements, you discussed the situation so you each knew what each other would be saying in your witness statements, is that right?

A. Not in details.

Q. But in general terms, correct?

A. It's not a yes or no answer.

Q. What sort of answer is it? I'm not asking you for each specific detail.

You accept that you discuss the evidence that you were both going to give in your witness statements before you made them.

- A. It's more like we discussed the situation, like we're going back in time, so that sort of thing. What he's going to put in his statement, what I'm going to put in my statement, we never discussed that.
- Q. What, so you compared recollections before you made your witness statements, is that right?
- A. You could say so, yes.
- Q. And so you discussed, what, the dates when things happened or what each of you remembered and were going to say about particular events?
- A. Again, not the last caveat, not what we're going to say. That we didn't discuss and we didn't decide. As for dates, I don't remember if we discussed the dates.
- Q. Can you tell us what you do remember discussing?
- A. Particular discussions I don't remember but, in general, that during this time we spend a lot of time together discussing case, yes.
- Q. And it's right, isn't it, that you've been involved in assisting with the conduct of this litigation?
- A. If I understand what that means exactly, I'll answer yes or no.

Q. Well, your counsel had previously told the court that you were someone who had been involved in assisting with the conduct of the litigation, perhaps ensuring that there were witnesses available who would be giving evidence, ensuring that when the counsel team asked for documents they could get it, that sort of thing?

A. Nothing of the above, no.

Q. So when your counsel told the court --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I don't think it's his counsel, it's Mr Abramovich's counsel.

MR RABINOWITZ: Sorry, absolutely.

When Mr Abramovich's counsel told the court that you were involved in assisting with the conduct of this litigation, can you assist us as to what it is they might have had in mind?

A. I think the main point was that I'm going to be a witness and, again I'm guessing here, I think my recollection would have been relevant, he thought, as to who else was involved in those events. But again, at this point I'm guessing.

Q. Now, you have worked with Mr Abramovich on and off since 1987, is that right?

A. Correct.

Q. And you have also been his friend since around then?

A. Correct.

- Q. And the two of you are very close?
- A. Yes.
- Q. You -- I think one of you says in your evidence that whenever you're in the same city together you have lunch and dinner together every day?
- A. More or less, yes.
- Q. And your evidence I think is that since 1994 your relationship with Mr Abramovich, in addition to being that of a close friend, has been that of a business partner with day-to-day supervision of certain of his business interests, is that right?
- A. Right.
- Q. It's your evidence, isn't it, that since the end of 1999 Mr Abramovich has had no involvement in management of any of his businesses as he has been holding various public offices in Chukotka?
- A. Correct.
- Q. Mr Abramovich told the court that you are much better at finances than he is. Would you agree with that assessment?
- A. If he says so, yes.
- Q. What if he'd said something different and it was the truth?
- A. I wouldn't agree.
- Q. But in this particular case you would agree?

A. Yes.

Q. Thank you. He said that he had never made a big acquisition, apart from real estate, without your advice and your opinion, and you wouldn't disagree with that either I suppose?

A. I agree. I think he meant personal real estate.

Q. Yes. Your evidence I think is that you and Mr Abramovich have had different arrangements for different businesses depending on the nature of the project and your role?

A. Correct.

Q. Mr Abramovich told the court that you had only been partners in terms of each having an equity stake in a business since about 2003 with the Pharmstandard transaction, is that your evidence too?

A. Plus/minus. I think it started in around 2002, this transaction he is talking about.

Q. That's fine, but my question to you was that Mr Abramovich's evidence was that you had only been partners in terms of having an equity stake in a business since about 2003, and he identified the Pharmstandard transaction.

A. That is correct. In general what I'm trying to say, that I think the transaction started in 2002, or our conversation about the pharma industry.

In general the answer is yes, I agree.

Q. Thank you. And can you clarify, then, what was the arrangement between you and Mr Abramovich in relation to the Runicom companies?

A. There was no arrangement. It was his company, I was the one who incorporated it.

Q. You effectively ran the Runicom companies, didn't you?

A. I would say financial part of it, yes, and organisational part; I was not a trader. Traders were different people.

Q. So the financial part of it, yes, and the organisational part of it, yes as well?

A. Correct.

Q. In relation to the other companies that you refer to as the trading companies, and just so that we're clear which companies we are talking about, you identify what you mean in your witness statement: Sibreal, OilImpex, Servet, Branco, Forneft, Petroltrans, Ellipse, CJSC Oil Trading, AOZT Mikom. In relation to those trading companies, what were the arrangements there? Were they other companies where you effectively ran the company?

A. More or less, yes.

Q. But do you say you had absolutely no equity stake in any of those companies?

A. Correct.

- Q. In relation to Sibneft what do you say was the arrangement? Did you run the company there?
- A. From some point onwards, yes.
- Q. But you say that there too, although you ran the company, you never had any interest at all in any Sibneft shares, is that your evidence?
- A. Correct, except for maybe ten shares which every employee had, for some reason I forgot what it was.
- Q. And what do you say was the arrangement between you and Mr Abramovich in relation to Rusal, Mr Shvidler? Do you say there that again you had absolutely no equity interest at all?
- A. Correct.
- Q. So, Mr Shvidler, let's just see if we understand this. Although you are the financial expert and you are the one who has day-to-day supervision of all of these businesses of Mr Abramovich, you had to make do with a salary but no ownership stake in any of Mr Abramovich's major businesses. Is that your evidence?
- A. That is my evidence. On top of that, for a long time, I think about five/six years, Roman basically paid for my lifestyle; not just mine, some other managers as well.
- Q. He basically paid for your lifestyle. This is, what, not a salary?

- A. I'm trying to say nicely that he paid for vacations. I lived in the house from about '98 which was a gift from Abramovich family, himself and his wife, when our family had no(?) kids. All the vacations, like those boat trips, were paid by him.
- Q. This was as a result of the work you were doing for him, was it?
- A. As a result.
- Q. Did you declare on your tax returns that you were getting these payments from Mr Abramovich?
- A. No, and I didn't have to, being a tax expert as you say.
- Q. It's a most extraordinary story, Mr Shvidler, is it not?
- A. No, it's not. When I was in school -- okay... I'm not going there. I had a case on this at school, what is benefit in kind and what is not, and that was not because it was provided at the workplace. It's like meals at work.
- Q. No, the extraordinary story is not whether you declared this for your tax or not; it's the fact that you, being the financial expert and the one who ran all these businesses, made do with a salary and never got any equity stake at all.
- A. That was the arrangement, not just for me, for the whole group of us. And Roman actually did live the same life, same lifestyle.

Q. Can you help me with this: what arrangement do you have with Mr Abramovich concerning this litigation?

A. Financially?

Q. Financially.

A. No arrangement at all.

Q. Would you accept that you cannot really be described as an independent witness in this litigation?

A. I would say I am.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It depends how you define independent, and I think that's a matter for me at the end of the day. I mean, he's obviously a friend and a close associate, over many years, of Mr Abramovich, and he's not denying that.

MR RABINOWITZ: I know he's not denying that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Whether one defines independence as equivalent to a witness of integrity et cetera et cetera, that's a matter for me.

A. May I comment on this as well?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, please do.

A. I thought about it a little bit while Mr Kapkov was answering, and I think the fact that I have some money makes me independent.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can I just ask one question.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, please do.

MR RABINOWITZ: You think the fact that you have some money makes you independent and therefore not someone who, for example, would much prefer Mr Abramovich to succeed in this litigation than Mr Berezovsky?

A. As a matter of preference, you guessed right. As a matter of my independence as to what I'm saying now to the court, I am right.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, shall I take the break? Ten minutes.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, you don't need your headphones.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, you're quite right.

(3.19 pm)

(A short break)

(3.36 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Shvidler, just going back to an answer that you gave shortly before we broke, I think you said you were living, I think in 1998, in a house which was a gift from Mr Abramovich. Is that right?

A. From the end of 98, that's right.

Q. Is it right that you were also given a yacht, Le Grand Bleu, by Mr Abramovich?

A. That's right, much later.

Q. So in effect what was happening was that he was making very substantial distributions to you either of cash or benefits in kind, gifts, and that was in respect of the work that you were doing for him in these companies?

A. Total mischaracterisation.

Q. How would you characterise it then?

A. Gifts.

Q. Gifts?

A. Okay, if the court is interested we can go in detail.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, I'm not sure I'm interested in whether or not, for the purposes of US Revenue law, the benefits he provided you with should be characterised as gifts or not. I don't really want to go into all that.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm also not interested in that.

You see, Mr Shvidler, what I suggest to you is that what you and Mr -- the nature of the relationship between you and Mr Abramovich really was a sort of partnership where you in effect ran his businesses, that's right, is it not?

A. If you refer to legal partnership then it's not correct. If he considered me as his business partner, associate, colleague, close one, yes. And vice versa.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Could I be clear. To start with, was your relationship one of employer on his part and employee on yours?

A. Correct.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Would you have regarded yourself in a junior position to him, as it were?

A. Correct.

MR RABINOWITZ: And at what point did that change then?

A. Unfortunately it never changed.

Q. But you say, if I refer -- in answer to my question as to whether you were in a sort of partnership with him, you said:

"If you refer to legal partnership then it's not correct. If he considered me as his business partner, associate, colleague, close one, yes."

So as a business partner you would say that you could be referred to as his business partner?

A. That's right. We don't have a partnership agreement and never had anything like that. That's what I mean.

Q. Can I ask you just to look at paragraph 12 of your third witness statement, please. That's at bundle E3, which is in front of you, tab 10 on page 3 E3/10/3. It's paragraph 12 we're looking for.

A. Right.

Q. You were talking about Runicom there and you say this, it's about four lines down:

"Valmet promoted itself as an intermediary with the Swiss banks, saying that the banks will deal only with the Swiss, not the Russians. Valmet charged Runicom SA very high fees. I was not happy about this so, sometime in 1996, one of Mr Michel's colleagues at Valmet, Mr Felix Poole, helped us incorporate a new company, Runicom Limited, in Gibraltar."

Now, this is not entirely accurate, is it, in terms of what happened between yourselves and Valmet?

A. It's absolutely accurate. It could be elaborated upon.

Q. Can I ask you, please, to go to bundle H(C)2 at page 84 H(C)2/84. Now, at H(C)2, page 84, you should see a letter from Mr Patrick Gnos of Valmet sent in February 1996. Do you see that?

A. I see that.

Q. It includes some provisional accounts for Runicom SA for 1995, although, as the letter notes, a great deal of the necessary accounting information was missing.

Can I just ask you to glance at that letter and remind yourself about it. Obviously you're fairly familiar with it?

A. Mm-hm, yes.

Q. You see it says:

"The P&L accounts ... are not complying with any reality ..."

This is just one letter, is it not, in a long line of correspondence by which Valmet sought accounting information from you at this time?

- A. It's a question?
- Q. Well, what's the answer to the question?
- A. No, no, what's the question? Is it --
- Q. This is just one letter, is it not, in a long line of correspondence by which Valmet sought accounting information from you at this time?
- A. That's correct if you delete the word "accounting". All kinds of information, that's right.
- Q. But it had to do with trying to complete your accounts, didn't it?
- A. With the attempt to do that, yes.
- Q. I'm not going to go through all of that, but can I ask you to go to page 124 in this volume H(C)2/124. It's an internal email from Christian Michel to others within Valmet dated 26 (sic) June 1996. It says:

"Shvidler was in our office this afternoon to discuss the future of our relationship. The essence of a long argument is that he expected Valmet to act as a bookkeeper, putting into Swiss GAAP the accounts prepared by Moscow. We told him this function was of no interest to us. Patrick made the point that even if we wanted to, we could not do what he asks if we cannot check independently the information provided by his people, if we do not receive the statements of accounts from the banks, copies of the contracts, etc. We need background information to answer questions raised by the auditors. Shvidler said that if the auditors have such questions, he will give them himself the information, we do not need to have it. At that point, I showed Shvidler the door. I told him he will have our resignation and that of the Swiss directors delivered to his hotel by tomorrow morning."

Then he says that you were taken aback.

So the dispute between you and Valmet was that you expected them to act as mere bookkeeper, reformatting accounts prepared by you, while Valmet wanted to independently confirm the data that you were providing, that's right, is it not?

A. No, it's not correct.

Q. So you were being secretive and not wishing to give them all the accounting information?

A. Absolutely not correct, and if the court think it's important, it can be much better assisted by Mr Michel's answers to French prosecutor, or maybe it was Swiss and French prosecution or investigation, where Mr Michel describes the relationship with Runicom, Roman, myself in details, and I would say I would agree with the picture he gives.

In essence of it, he says that he sold us a Swiss company where we didn't need it. I'm not sure how important that issue is.

- Q. Well, whatever Mr Michel may have said, the correspondence produced at the time shows Valmet chasing you for information, and it also shows that by 30 August 1996 Valmet had plainly had enough, and they wrote to Runicom's auditors explaining that they must be given access to all bank accounts, nor even to your major contracts. We can see that letter if we go to page 136T in this volume.

This was the letter from Valmet to Arthur Andersen explaining that they had had enough. Read this to yourself, if you would. (Pause)

- A. Mm-hm.

- Q. What happens next is that on 30 September 1996, Mr Michel also wrote to Mr Abramovich. You'll find that at H(C)3 page 5 H(C)3/5.

- A. Before we go there, do we need to discuss this letter?

- Q. If you have a comment you want to make on it, do please make a comment on it.

- A. Yes, I'm reading the very first paragraph:

"It has become apparent ...", and so on, that there is a difference of opinion between myself and Mr Michel. I don't see the word they had enough or anything dramatic like that. And the facts, by this time, operations of Runicom SA were moved almost completely to Runicom Limited in Gibraltar, which was a sister company where the same Mr Michel owned 30 per cent of the shares. So they just moved us to a different jurisdiction as a business.

As for the company called Runicom SA, they helped us to move it to Fribourg so it could be liquidated there later, which is what happened basically. So they didn't want to deal with it themselves.

This is a letter to auditors Arthur Andersen which remained auditors of Runicom SA later in Fribourg and which were also auditors of Runicom Limited.

Q. Why don't we see what Mr Michel then writes to Mr Abramovich. If you can go to the next letter which I asked you to go to. It's at bundle H(C)3 at page 5 H(C)3/5.

Do you recall Mr Abramovich's response to this letter?

A. Not necessarily, no.

Q. It would be fair to say that whatever the response was, it wasn't satisfactory, because on 8 October 1996 Mr Michel resigned as a director. You see that if you go to page 17 of this bundle.

You see, Mr Shvidler, the evidence in your witness statement suggesting that it was just a question of fees which led to moving administrators was somewhat misleading, was it not?

- A. No, it was not, it was the core of the problem, and if you want to go -- if the court is interested, we can go in detail on this letter.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just tell me in headline terms what the real problem was.

- A. Money. They wanted to insert themselves as an intermediary where they were not needed basically. And as Mr Felix Poole explained, who was the original gentleman who introduced us, that they sold us the wrong company. And Michel, he agreed with that, that's why they moved us to --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What, you didn't need a Swiss-domiciled company?

- A. For starters we didn't need that. Then we didn't need their services because we just didn't need them. And I think he explains it in his own letter, in his own evidence to the French investigation, that they couldn't run a Russian company out of Geneva, just couldn't. They didn't have personnel, there was no need for that. The whole business took place in Moscow. So originally they just -- what this is, I think, it's first of all about the thing where Mr Michel says "He showed me the door", I'm sure I would have remembered that, if that happened ever. And we had an okay relationship, not in those terms that he could show me the door out of his office.

This one looks to me, first of all it was done long after the fact. By this time Runicom moved already.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What, to Gibraltar?

A. To Gibraltar. And operations --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Which was a tax-efficient place --

A. That's right.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: -- for you, was it?

A. We needed an offshore company for Russian operations.

It had to be based somewhere. And Gibraltar was much better, much more convenient than Switzerland, and it was of course much cheaper, and we never had any problems, even though it was the same organisation, Valmet, just different people.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Valmet was running it out of Gibraltar?

A. That's right. It was the same group. I would say they were brother/sister companies because the shareholding was the same more or less.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What, they didn't have to be quite so hands-on in the actual management of the companies, is that the difference?

A. That's right. Even here, again, that's a difference of opinion. My opinion was they didn't need to do anything, they were two and a half people literally, two employees and one part-time girl, who were doing stuff for us. We didn't need them.

As for auditors, of course we were communicating directly. Those auditors, Arthur Andersen, were the same auditors as Sibneft had and, again, I think he describes it, Mr Michel, very adequately.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, well no doubt someone will give me the reference to that and I'll go away and read it.

MR SUMPTION: Would your Ladyship like that now?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, please.

MR SUMPTION: It's bundle H(C)7/63T, is the beginning of the document H(C)7/63T. The operative part of it is 65T to 66T.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much.

MR RABINOWITZ: Now, I want to ask you about something else. You and Mr Abramovich have given the occasional press interview over the years relating to Sibneft ownership in particular, and I just want to ask you about some of those. Can we begin by going to H(A) bundle 10, page 29, please H(A)10/29. This is in fact an interview which Mikhail Khodorkovsky gave, and this appeared in Kommersant on 20 January 1998. This is in the context of the first attempted merger of Yukos and Sibneft, I think it was to be known as Yuksi.

You'll see the opening lines of the interview, after the first paragraph he says -- the question is:

"Are you in the process of signing an agreement for YUKOS and Sibneft to merge with the owners of the Sibneft controlling stake?"

He says:

"Yes.

"That is with ... FNK?"

"We are signing the agreement with Sibneft group, we also call ourselves UKOS group, without listing all the owners, we regard ourselves a single team; and they talk about themselves as of Sibneft group, meaning a team of those people and companies, who jointly own the stake.

"But one of these companies owns a 51% interest and as far as I know it is [FNK] which bought this stake in the auction last May."

It then says:

"Frankly speaking I have not studied it in detail. This is simply not my problem. This is for the lawyers to deal with, and the lawyers confirmed that the people we are negotiating [with] now, including the First Vice President for Finances of Sibneft Mr Shvidler, (who together with me will sign the agreement today) are the people who legally represent the Sibneft controlling stake."

Is it right that you were negotiating the Yuksi merger on behalf of Sibneft?

A. That's right.

Q. If I can ask you then to look at the bottom of the page, to the last question and answer on that page, the question is:

"You said that you did not give a thought to the list of shareholders. But have you discussed this merge[r] with Mr Berezovsky?"

Mr Khodorkovsky says:

"Yes. We have discussed this deal. And with Mr Berezovsky also, though he is not a direct Sibneft shareholder. Five and not two companies are involved in this deal. Two main companies and three supporting ones. Mr Berezovsky indeed is not a Sibneft shareholder, but he is part of the group and obviously will be one of the shareholders of the new company."

That suggests, Mr Shvidler, that Mr Khodorkovsky had been told that Mr Berezovsky did have an indirect shareholding in Sibneft. Isn't that right?

A. No, it's not right.

Q. What do you say he was told which made him think that Mr Berezovsky would be a shareholder in the new company?

A. I could just guess, but I think Roman told him the exact arrangement he had with Mr Berezovsky. I wasn't there.

Mr Khodorkovsky knew what the shareholding companies were, FNK and others.

- Q. But he -- his understanding is that Mr Berezovsky would be a shareholder in the new company.
- A. The way he says it here is -- honestly doesn't make sense in Russian. It says that he was not an owner but he is an owner, or something like this.
- Q. Well, that may be consistent with him having an indirect ownership interest in Sibneft, may it not?
- A. I cannot think clearly what Mr Khodorkovsky thought when he said this, but if you read it again, it doesn't make much sense, what he says in answer to this question.
- Q. Can I ask you -- you can put that away. Can you go next to bundle H(A)15, page 2, please H(A)15/2. I think this is one of the few recorded interviews that Mr Abramovich has given, and it's published -- it's an interview published in Vedomosti on 1 December 1999 and then I think republished on the Sibneft or Gazprom website.

If you go to page 3 of the bundle, just below halfway down the page, Mr Abramovich is asked:

"Can you say something about your stake in Sibneft?"

He says:

"I can, I control at least half of the company."

Then:

"Do you plan to shift Sibneft assets abroad in the near future?"

"I do not plan to. But this does not depend only on me."

"On who else? Who else beside yourself owns the company?"

"The company management."

Can you say to whom in the company's management Mr Abramovich was referring to here?

A. Honestly I don't see what you're reading from even though I know this interview.

Q. All right. If you go, with the hole-punch, about three or four lines above the hole-punch.

A. Ah yes, got it.

Q. Then the precise quote:

"On who else? Who else beside yourself owns the company?"

"The company management."

Is about six lines from the bottom.

A. Yes, I've got it.

Q. So can you tell us to whom in the company's management you say Mr Abramovich is referring to here?

A. Directly, I think he means me as a controller of the arrangement, of the trust, which ultimately votes the shares.

Q. He described you as an owner of the company then?

A. No. Do I describe myself? No. Roman was always a little confused about the definitions.

As for the arrangement, he knew exactly the -- in the end of the day he is the owner, him and his family, they are the owner.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But was there actually some sort of management trust as one might have under English law?

A. No.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I mean, there wasn't a document that set out you holding as a management trustee or anything of that sort?

A. Originally it was a Liechtenstein arrangement where there was a stiftung, then anstalt behind -- I mean below it, and then the actual companies which were shareholdings on the register. I was the protector of this top one.

Did we have an arrangement with Roman where he told me how to vote? No.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, and how long did that Liechtenstein structure continue?

A. I would say less than a year. We didn't like the arrangement there so we moved the whole thing to Cyprus and there was a Cypriot trust where, again, I was a protector. I'm not giving any secrets away. And some others were trustees, and the beneficiaries were Roman and his children.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

A. But -- that's it.

MR RABINOWITZ: Do you say, you can answer it separately in relation to the Liechtenstein structure and then in relation to the Cypriot structure if you want, do you say that in accordance with the structure only half of Mr Abramovich's shares were held this way or did it hold all of his shares this way?

A. In the end, all of the shares were beneficially owned by him and his family.

Q. In this structure?

A. I don't understand the...

Q. The Cypriot structure, trust structure that was used, was that the way in which all of his shares were held?

A. Yes.

Q. I'd like to ask you about an interview which you gave. Can you go to H(A)20, page 52, please H(A)20/52. This is an interview which you gave to Vedomosti on 11 July 2000 and this was, again, republished on the Gazprom or Sibneft website. It is an interview largely about the acquisition of aluminium companies and the creation of Russian Aluminium by Sibneft shareholders, but I don't want to ask you about this just yet. What

I would like to do, if I may, is ask you to turn to page 56.

If you are at page 56, you will see that the second question on this page says:

"Boris Berezovsky said recently that he did not have any Sibneft shares any longer. Has he really sold them?"

Your response to that is:

"Or given them away. And long ago. We constantly try to convince everyone of this, but nobody believes us."

Now, would you agree, Mr Shvidler, that your answer makes clear your view that, at the least, Mr Berezovsky once owned shares in Sibneft?

A. No. Can I elaborate on this?

Q. Please do.

A. Without trying to be smart, again, I didn't take this "bon sang" course at the time so I didn't know that -- sarcasm doesn't look good in print. If you look at the Russian version, you will see what I was trying to say. I was trying to make sort of a sarcastic joke. So the response was exactly to the question. Recently; I said a long time ago. Sold; and I said gifted. That's what I was trying to say here. If you can now read it differently, I'm sorry.

Q. No, do finish your answer. I didn't mean to interrupt, I thought you were finished.

A. Okay.

Q. Is there anything else you want to say about this?

A. It's ...

Q. You see, I have to suggest to you that that really doesn't explain the fact that what you are saying here appears to suggest that, at the very least, Mr Berezovsky once owned shares in Sibneft. Whether he gave them away recently or long ago, the whole premise of what you are saying is that he did own shares in Sibneft?

A. No, it's my interview and I remember giving this interview and it's not what I'm saying. If I wanted to say it, it was no problem to say it.

In a way it's a little bit of frustration because the journalist came to ask about something else and it was aluminium deal which we were discussing.

Q. But you could have just said, "Mr Berezovsky has never had shares in Sibneft" if that was the true position?

A. I regret I didn't do it much clearer.

Q. Well, I'm sure now that we have this open you do regret not saying that, but what you have said here is consistent only with Mr Berezovsky once having shares, and that is impossible to reconcile with your evidence in this case.

A. Not correct at all.

Q. Very well. Can I ask you to go to bundle H(A)23 at page 67, please H(A)23/67.

This is another interview of yours republished on the Sibneft website, this one given to the Petroleum Intelligence Weekly and originally published on 13 November 2000. If I can ask you to turn to page 69, at the bottom of the page, we see a question which begins on the last line:

"Unclear shareholding structures remain a worrying aspect of many Russian oil companies. Can you reveal who the principal shareholders are in Sibneft?"

I'm going to ask you, if I may, Mr Shvidler, to keep open page 70 and also put a finger at page 70.001R because -- just keep that open, but you need to see the Russian as well because, as I understand, there's a mistranslation of this passage. We can just look at what your answer is. You say:

"First, I would like to say that Sibneft is a separate oil company not mixed up with the aluminium interests of our shareholders. As for the list of shareholders, [I think what this should say is] Roman Abramovich [owns] about a 40% stake, a similar amount is controlled by the company's top management [and] the rest is in free float. I would also like to underline that the Chorny brothers ... have never been and are not represented in Sibneft."

Am I right about what this should say, having a look at the Russian version?

- A. I'm trying to recall the original language of the interview. I think it was done in English, I think.
- Q. Well, if you look at page 70.001R, so you're suggesting that the translation goes from the English to the Russian, are you?
- A. They are two different words, you're right, one is "control" one is "own". I'm trying to remember which one was the original.
- Q. All right. But can you just confirm this for me, that in the Russian version it reads:
- "As for the list of shareholders, Roman Abramovich owns about a 40% stake, a similar amount is controlled by the company's top management..."
- A. That's right.
- Q. How do you explain this statement to the press, Mr Shvidler? Is it not your evidence that in fact Mr Abramovich owns more than 80 per cent of the company?
- A. It is my evidence. I think Roman was trying to explain that we have an official position on this. The major concern of his was security, he didn't want to be singled out as an owner of such a big company, and that was the fact since, I don't know, 86 I would say.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: By this time, 2005, was the structure the Cypriot structure?

A. 2005, yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And --

MR SUMPTION: This is 2000, my Lady. It was republished in 2005. The original interview was 2000.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. I'm sorry, I'm looking at the date at the bottom of the page.

A. Nevertheless --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: 2000, sorry.

A. Still it was a Cypriot structure in 2000.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It had become a Cypriot structure from the Liechtenstein structure?

A. Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: By 1999 I think the evidence is.

A. Mm-hm.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: The structure in Cyprus was that the shares in the top companies were owned by trustees, or by Mr Abramovich personally, or what?

A. By the trust itself as an entity, and then Roman and his children, they were beneficiaries of the trust.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, and were you a protector of that?

A. Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I see.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can you just explain this about

Mr Abramovich's story in relation to why this was done. Sibneft was a very substantial company, that's right, isn't it?

A. Correct.

Q. Owning a 40 per cent or 44 per cent stake would, in any event, have marked Mr Abramovich out as a very wealthy man, wouldn't it?

A. Wealthy, yes. Security-wise a completely different level, completely. And to understand that, you really have to be in that ambience, and I understand I cannot bring it here adequately.

Q. You see, being a 40 per cent owner of a very substantial company would mark him out as someone who would need security anyway?

A. Again, we're talking about different kinds of security. I'm not talking about security from the thugs on the street. It's not that.

Q. Well, what are you talking about, Mr Shvidler?

A. I'm trying to find an adequate English word for this.

Bad competitors of the same level of magnitude, okay?

Q. Bad competitors of the same level of magnitude.

A. Okay, one of the peer groups if that's -- I understand

I'm not conveying the idea.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, I just need to understand precisely what you're saying. Are you making the point that there is a difference between Mr Abramovich being known to be a 40 per cent owner of a particular stake and a 100 per cent owner of a particular stake?

A. Mm-hm. If he's a single owner then there's a single person and a single problem. So in other words -- again I'm trying not to sound dramatic. If somebody wants the asset, he is the only problem.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

A. If it's spread, then it's like small fish trying to...

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Are you talking threats of physical violence?

A. Part of it, yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: So you are talking about thugs then?

A. Different kind of thugs, not the street ones.

Q. But a concentration of 40 per cent in the hands of one person would, in any event, mark him out as someone to be targeted?

A. That's correct.

Q. So how then does it make such a difference whether he's shown as the holder or owner of 40 per cent or 80 per cent?

A. If you are known to be a wealthy person or if you drive a nice car, then the criminal audience which is interested in you, it's one group of people, one --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What, there's a risk of kidnapping and ransom?

A. Something like that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Demands for ransom?

A. If you are known to be an owner of -- single owner of a huge asset, it's a completely different level of security you're looking for.

And -- you want me to elaborate or it's clear?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, are you saying that competitors might find it more difficult to dispose of three or four owners of a particular asset than they would -- or they might think it was in relation to just disposing of one owner, is that --

A. Exactly what I'm trying to say.

MR RABINOWITZ: All right. Can I just perhaps look at one more interview. Can you go, please, to bundle G(C)7/3.09 at page 167 G(C)7/3.09/167.

So you have in front of you, Mr Shvidler, a Sibneft press release of 20 May 2002.

A. Mm-hm.

Q. It reports you announcing that:

"... Sibneft's core shareholders intend to place ...
1 per cent of the company's shares ..."

And it gives a market value of around $100 million for this 1 per cent. Do you see that?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. Just pausing there, you would accept mathematically that if 1 per cent of a company is worth $100 million, then the whole company would be worth at least 100 times that or at least $10 billion?

A. Mathematically, yes. I'm not sure we're able to achieve the price, but maybe yes.

Q. Okay. And in the third paragraph --

A. That's right, intend to place. We were looking for 100.

Q. Absolutely right. In the third paragraph, you are quoted as saying:

"The core shareholders' decision to reduce their stake has been guided by strong investor demand for more liquidity in the company's stock and more influence for minority shareholders over the management of the company..."

Now, your use of the phrase "core shareholders" suggests that there was more than one main shareholder. Can you explain how you say this is consistent with the evidence you are giving to the court about who owned these shares?

A. I keep repeating the same thing and it's consistent with what I'm trying to say. We are always saying "we",

"us", shareholders, beneficiaries. We never said anything else.

Q. All right. Can I take you to one more interview before I think we may stop for the day and your answer to this one may be the same.

You can put away bundle G(C)7. Can you go to bundle H(A)60 at page 221, please H(A)60/221. This is another interview of yours on Sibneft's website, originally published by Vedomosti on 30 June 2003. You are here in the main discussing another attempted merger with Yukos. If you go to the second page of this interview, page 222, in the middle of the page -- it's not really in the middle, it's about a third of the way down. Question:

"Is it true that Roman Abramovich owns over half of the Sibneft shares and the company managers own the rest?"

Your answer here is:

"On the whole this is true."

So this is no longer saying he owns half, the other half are controlled. Here you say he owns half and the company managers own the rest.

Do you say that this is just another attempt on your part to mislead people as to what the true position was?

A. We never misled anybody, especially intentionally. I'm trying to see what I said in Russian but I don't think it will make a difference in my answer.

Q. Well, you say you've never misled anybody intentionally. Presumably your objective was to mislead people intentionally because of what you say were your concerns about security?

A. I wouldn't call it misleading though.

Q. If the true position, as you say it, is that Mr Abramovich owned over 80 per cent of the shares, and you were telling everybody that he only owned half of those shares, that was an attempt to, if you are right, mislead people as to how many of the shares he owned?

A. Mislead, it's too strong a word for me. Every one of these interviews was given for a specific purpose. Like the one before that was giving as an answer to the question: are Chorny brothers shareholders of Sibneft now because of the aluminium deal, for example? The whole interview was the answer to that.

This one, the reason for this interview is the super-deal with Yukos, the second merger. It was about everything else. So this was one of the questions, and I repeated the standard line. You cannot call it misleading.

Q. You didn't repeat the standard line because elsewhere we've seen you say Abramovich owns half and the other half are controlled by management. Somewhere else we've seen you say that Mr Berezovsky used to own shares and has given them away. Here you're saying Abramovich owns half and the company managers own the rest.

A. For an English lawyer all of this looks different. For the purposes of those interviews, it's all the same. That's my statement. I stand behind it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can I ask you this: the trusts that ultimately held the shares in the Cyprus companies, were they discretionary trusts or were there interests in possession, as we call it, that had been appointed to particular beneficiaries? Or don't you know?

A. I don't know this interest in possession. What is it? It was one trust first of all, not many trusts.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: There's one trust with a number of beneficiaries. Did the trustees, with perhaps the assistance of the protector or with the consent of the protector, have power to appoint specific shares to any one of the class of beneficiaries?

A. No, there was not even different -- there were no different classes of beneficiary. There was one beneficiary, Roman, and his children.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So they were held on trust for -- it's difficult to explain.

A. No, try, and I'll try.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Did the trustees have a discretion as to whether, for example, they said the income from these particular shares are going to be held on trust for a particular child or for Mr Abramovich?

A. No. As I remember, he had a list of wishes like in case. Something goes for -- a certain amount goes for their education, then when they are a certain age something can be spent differently. That was it. It's for the trustees to make a discretionary ...

So that they could take the dividends, for example, from Sibneft and distribute those to different people?

No, they could not.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see. Thank you.

A. Ah, that's what is discretionary trust? No, it was not.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

Is that a convenient moment, Mr Rabinowitz?

MR RABINOWITZ: That is a convenient moment.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Shvidler, you know, because you've been sitting here, that you're not to talk about your evidence or the case to anybody, okay?

A. That's right.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, 10.15 tomorrow or 10.30?

MR SUMPTION: Would your Ladyship be assisted by knowing who the next few witnesses were?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I would actually. Just a second.

MR SUMPTION: They are thought to be likely to be short.

After Mr Shvidler we will be hearing from Mr Sponring, Ms Panchenko, Ms Popenkova, Ms Goncharova and Ms Khudyk.
I understand there's a question mark about Ms Popenkova which we're in the process of resolving, a question mark about whether she'll be required.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I thought Mr Sponring wasn't coming but he is now?

MR SUMPTION: He is coming.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Oh, it's Mamut who isn't coming.

MR SUMPTION: Mamut we have dropped.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. 10.15 tomorrow.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: Good morning, Mr Shvidler.

A. Good morning.

Q. Mr Shvidler, in the course of your evidence yesterday, you referred to the fact that prior to the Cypriot offshore structure that was used in connection with Mr Abramovich's Sibneft shares, there had been a Liechtenstein arrangement, and you explained that you were the protector on top of that arrangement. And you explained that that arrangement lasted less than a year.

Presumably there would have been documentation relating to the Liechtenstein trust structure, would there?

A. There was documentation definitely.

Q. There would have been a trust deed?

A. I'm sure there was a full package, yes.

Q. A letter of wishes?

A. Most probably, yes.

Q. Correspondence with the trustees?

A. No, I don't think so.

Q. Can you tell us who the trustees were?

- A. I have a question: is it like privileged information or not?
- Q. No, I don't think it would be privileged information but if someone thinks I'm wrong about that they'll tell me.
- A. Okay. Mr Tenenbaum was a trustee, Ms Panchenko was a trustee as well.
- Q. And that would be the case also with the Cyprus trust arrangements, would it?
- A. Yes.
- Q. There would be a trust deed, letter of wishes, correct?
- A. Correct.
- Q. And did you say that the trustees had a discretion about how they exercised their powers in respect of distributions under the trust?
- A. I said exactly the opposite. They did not.
- Q. No discretion at all?
- A. No discretion at all.
- Q. Was this trust arrangement over the whole of Mr Abramovich's holding or only over half of the holding?
- A. Over the whole.
- Q. Over the whole of the holding. Do you know what has happened to these documents, both in relation to the Cypriot trust and the Liechtenstein trust?
- A. Honestly I don't know. Since the company was sold,

I didn't think about it. I don't know.

Q. No one has asked you to look for them?

A. Myself, no.

Q. Did the trust cover just Sibneft or did it also cover Mr Abramovich's Rusal interests?

A. There was a special trust for Sibneft. I don't think Rusal was in there.

Q. And when the Rusal interests were sold, what happened to the proceeds? Did they go into trust?

A. They were used.

Q. They were used, but did they go into a trust or were they just used --

A. To that trust, no, I don't think so.

Q. Can you tell us what did happen with the proceeds?

A. I'm recalling as we speak, though, so it's not that precise. We arranged the funds of hedge funds based on that amount of money, then a piece of it was loaned to somebody. A lot of it was used on football players, a lot, like a big piece.

Q. I'm not going to ask you which ones, presumably some who have never scored a goal, but ...

A. It was before that.

Q. Can you identify the name of the trust? Was the trust given a name, the trust in respect of the Sibneft shares?

A. Sarah Trust, like Abraham's wife.

Q. Okay. Now I want to ask you some questions in relation to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Abramovich's dealings in the mid-1990s and, as I indicated earlier, I'm not going to cover matters that I've already covered with Mr Abramovich but there are some features of your evidence that I do need to ask you about.

Can I begin by asking you, please, to go to paragraph 21 of your third witness statement at E3, tab 10, at page 6 E3/10/6.

Now, at paragraph 21, you say in the third sentence here:

"Through his car trading activities, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili also had connections with various people from the Caucasus, including Mr Magomed Ismailov who was known to be one of Mr Berezovsky's partners in LogoVAZ. The Caucasus connection carried connotations of gangsterism..."

You will recall that Mr Abramovich told the court in terms that Mr Ismailov was not a gangster. This is Day 17, page 76. And indeed, as you will recall, we even saw a photo of your wife and child, I think at a child's birthday party, hosted by Mr Ismailov, do you remember that?

A. I do remember that.

Q. So this suggestion or hint in your witness statement of gangster connections on the part of Mr Berezovsky was purely malicious, that's right, isn't it?

A. No, it's not right. Should I illustrate what I was trying to say?

Q. Do you say Mr Ismailov is a gangster?

A. No. Should I --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, you may elaborate.

A. What I was trying to say here is, if I said that my brother was a boxing champion I don't think he would have messed with me, he would have thought twice. So that's the kind of analogy I was trying to make here.

MR RABINOWITZ: I suggest it goes a little bit further than that because you're not talking about boxing champions here, you're talking about gangsters and you're plainly suggesting that people with links to the Caucasus are people with links to gangsters, Mr Shvidler, and that's not the same as saying your brother is a boxing champion, is it?

A. It's not the same, I give you a different example then. What if I told you that my cousin was John Gotti, and you knew that, then it's closer to this kind of thing.

Q. And if your cousin was a person who had nothing to do with being a gangster but the suggestion that you make is that he was a gangster, again that's going further than just identifying someone who is a gangster and making it clear that you then need to be respected, which is what you've done here.

A. It's too complex a sentence for me.

Q. All right, well, we've got your evidence on that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Could you just explain why you mention Mr Magomed Ismailov here?

A. I was trying to deliver this idea which I was trying to illustrate before. Mr Ismailov I don't think was a gangster, I met him, I knew him, he was my almost immediate neighbour. What I was trying to say, that he was connected to these people which are protecting car business, Logovaz. I'm not saying he was a gangster, I'm saying he knew people.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can I then ask you this, I think you agree that during the spring and early summer of 1995 there was regular contact between Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky?

A. Yes.

Q. And you suggest in your evidence, this is at paragraph 46 of your witness statement, page 13 and on to page 14, you say, last sentence on the page at page 13 E3/10/13:

"It is true that there was regular contact between Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky during this period ..."

And the period you're talking about is the spring and summer of 1995. You say:

"... but I understood this related to politics, not the issue of having Sibneft included in the loans-for-shares programme."

So your suggestion is that it's politics rather than business that they'd have been talking about.

I suggest, Mr Shvidler, that that cannot be right.

Mr Abramovich told the court that certainly in 1994, going into 1995, he was not yet a politician?

A. What I'm trying to say, he is not what you just said.

It's politics as opposed to discussion of loans-for-shares scheme or privatisation programme. That's what I'm trying to say. As for discussing politics being just a privilege of politicians, I would disagree.

Q. What I suggest to you is that you just wanted to give the impression that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Abramovich did not talk business together at this time, that's right, isn't it? So you came up with this suggestion that they would have been talking about politics?

A. Absolutely not correct. What I'm trying to say here is exactly what I said.

Q. Now, moving on to the question of funding for the loans-for-shares auction, can I ask you to look at paragraph 65 of this statement, you'll find it at page 20 E3/10/20.

So you're talking here about the funding arrangements and you say:

"It was Mr Abramovich who was able to use his personal relationship with Omsk ... and Noyabrskneftegaz management in order to arrange the trade finance."

Then you say:

"Regarding SBS Bank, Mr Abramovich already knew Mr Smolensky, and I had also met him."

Now, you were in court when Mr Abramovich gave his evidence and you'll know that Mr Abramovich's evidence, I suggest contrary to this, is that it was Mr Berezovsky who introduced Mr Abramovich to Mr Smolensky, in other words that Mr Abramovich did not already know Mr Smolensky. Do you remember that?

A. I remember that. I don't see what I said wrong.

I don't say that it was not Mr Berezovsky who introduced Mr Abramovich to Mr Smolensky. I agree with that.

Q. What was the point here of saying Mr Abramovich already knew Mr Smolensky, what point were you trying to make by that?

A. The point -- one of the points is very simple, that introduction is not -- it's important, it's not everything. Then Mr Aven should take a credit for introducing Mr Berezovsky to Mr Abramovich.

Q. You see the point, I suggest to you, is that you were trying to suggest that Mr Smolensky already knew Mr Abramovich and vice versa in order to minimise the role that Mr Berezovsky had in a successful loans-for-shares auction. That's the truth, isn't it?

A. No, it's not. Here we're talking about funding, when we -- trying to -- we didn't talk about it. The loans-for-shares auction itself, Mr Berezovsky's role was crucial. No dispute about that. Here we're talking about only funding and what I'm saying is that funding was provided or organised by us.

Q. Now, as for the loans-for-shares auction itself, can I ask you, please, to go to paragraph 68, which is just over the page E3/10/21. You explain at paragraph 68, quite fairly, that unlike Mr Berezovsky and indeed Mr Patarkatsishvili you were not present at the auction.

Can I ask you this then, do you say that at the time of the loans-for-shares auction Mr Berezovsky was chairman of NFK?

A. He was called chairman of NFK, yes. He was not chairman of NFK.

Q. Sorry, you say he was called chairman of NFK but he was not chairman of NFK; are you saying he was or he wasn't chairman?

A. For the purposes. For the purposes of the auction that was his title.

Q. You say for the purposes of the auction that was his title?

A. That's right.

Q. Can I ask you, please, to go to paragraph 49 of this statement, it's at page 14 E3/10/14. You see the second line, you say:

"Mr Berezovsky was on one occasion called Chairman of NFK solely to justify his position on the board of Sibneft."

Now, Mr Berezovsky was appointed to the board of Sibneft some months after the loans-for-shares auction in late September 1996. That's right?

A. Apologies, twice. Not once, twice. And Mr Patarkatsishvili once.

Q. So now you're changing your evidence again, you're saying he was called the chairman or was the chairman on two occasions, one for the purposes of the auction and two for the purposes of justifying his position on the board of Sibneft. Is that now your evidence?

A. My evidence is that he was called chairman of NFK twice. I thought it was once, sorry.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Why wasn't he appointed the chairman of NFK?

- A. There was no board. Okay, it was a Russian company, the director is like COO(?), it's not chairman of the board like here.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But under the constitution of this particular Russian company there didn't have to be a chairman or there didn't have to be a board? You tell me.

- A. There -- yes, you're right, on constitution of this company. There was a general director and a chief accountant, those were the two persons which had to be there by law and they were there.

So general director was Mr Kulakov and Mr Gubinets(?) was chief accountant.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Presumably the shareholders could, if they agreed, appoint a board with a chairman?

- A. Russian companies were not constituted like this. There was no board of directors. The general director has all the powers except for second signature, so in other words at the bank there had to be two signatures, but otherwise he had -- the COO, which is called director in Russian, has full power.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So who takes the chair at shareholders' meetings?

- A. The shareholders.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So the shareholder with the biggest amount of shares.

A. There were not shareholders' meetings as such. Again, the operation and the constitution of those companies was completely different, not to mention that this one was created just for this particular purpose. When the purpose was served, it disappeared. Just for the auction and for holding the shares afterwards.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But this was a particular sort of Russian company, was it? I mean, are you telling me that even today Russian companies don't have boards of directors with a chairman?

A. Now the situation is different. This is -- I have to -- okay, in Russian, it's OOO, ZAO, OAO.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, ZAO or OOO, is it? Oh, three you're telling me?

A. OOO did not exist at the time, it was called ZAO I think, but now I'm not 100 per cent sure but I think that's what it was. So it was not OAO. OAO is what is called Plc here.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So your evidence is relating to a ZAO at that particular --

A. Right, what's called L -- I guess it's the analogue of LLC, LLC here.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

MR RABINOWITZ: So Mr Shvidler, having said in your witness statement that he was called chairman of NFK solely to justify his position on the board of Sibneft, you've changed your evidence to say that not only was he called chairman of NFK then, but he was also called chairman of NFK in the context of the loans-for-shares auction, but you are careful to say that he was not in fact chairman of NFK.

A. I agree with you.

Q. Can I ask you, please, to go to bundle H(A)07 and turn to page 34 H(A)07/34. Now, you will recognise this, Mr Shvidler, it's an extract from the Eurobond circular in 1997, and your evidence in your fourth witness statement is that you were closely involved in the supervision of the Eurobond documentation. That's right, isn't it?

A. Right.

Q. We see in this Eurobond circular in the passage that has been underlined in the manuscript that Mr Berezovsky was chairman of NFK when it won the right to manage 51 per cent of Sibneft's shares in the loans-for-shares programme. Do you say you allowed a false statement to be submitted in the Eurobond circular?

A. No.

Q. Can you explain why this statement doesn't say he was called chairman, it says he was chairman of NFK, which appears to be a point you are being very careful to say is not right.

A. For -- nothing to add here. It's a completely true statement.

Q. What is a completely true statement?

A. What it says here.

Q. That he was chairman of NFK?

A. He was chairman of NFK.

Q. But you've just been telling my Lady that he wasn't in fact chairman of NFK, he was just called the chairman of NFK.

A. Right. If you explain me the difference I'll try to comment.

He had to be called something associated with the company. We thought that the best position would be chairman of the company, which has no legal role by the way, in a company of this constitution.

Q. So you're saying he was chairman?

A. He was honorary chairman, if that helps.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So, as I understand it, you're saying constitutionally that under the memo and arts of the company, or whatever the organisational document was, there was no actual constitutional position of chairman, but he was de facto chairman, called chairman, treated as chairman for these purposes?

A. He was not a de facto chairman. He needed to be called something.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

A. He's a prominent figure, a distinguished gentleman, so what's the best we could call him? Chairman.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I see.

MR RABINOWITZ: Now, moving on from the events of 1995, I think you support Mr Abramovich's case by denying ever being present during discussions leading to what Mr Berezovsky says was the 1996 agreement?

A. That's right.

Q. You see, I suggest that Mr Berezovsky agreed to distance himself from the ownership of Sibneft at the request of both Mr Abramovich and yourself, you deny that, do you?

A. I deny that, yes.

Q. Can we turn next, please, to the question of payments supposedly made in 1995 to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili. I've already asked Mr Abramovich about most of these, but you mention in paragraph 129 of your third witness statement, this is at page 38 E3/10/38, going on to page 39, the payment on 6 December 1995 for $1 million paid to Atrium Consolidated Ltd. Do you see that?

A. I see that.

- Q. You assert there that Atrium is an offshore subsidiary of Alfa-Bank, but you do not identify any documentary evidence to support this assertion, do you?
- A. The assertion that Atrium is related to Alfa-Bank?
- Q. Yes.
- A. That's the one? I don't have any documents, but to be absolutely sure when the question arised, because I remember the payment very well, it was part of a bigger payment. About a week before we started here, I called Mr Aven specifically to double and triple check what I was saying here. He confirmed the whole thing and he said he was comfortable for me mentioning it here.
- Q. You see, here you don't say by whom the debt was owed or why, do you?
- A. In my statement?
- Q. In your statement.
- A. I think out of the context of 129 it's clear.
- Q. It's also right, is it not, that you had no memory of this payment during the strike-out application. We know that because Mr Mitchard interviewed you for the purpose of the strike-out application and no mention was made of this payment, indeed no mention was made of any pre-1996 payments in Mr Mitchard's witness statement, that's right, is it not?

- A. It's not right at all. I remember the payment very well, it was the first time Mr Aven, whom I knew from before, was shouting at me for somebody else's debt. And I remember it vividly.
- Q. So the only reference to any payments at all made in the context of Mr Mitchard's statement was in respect of payments made in respect of ORT. You're not suggesting this is a payment made in respect of ORT, are you?
- A. It was Mr Berezovsky debt to Alfa-Bank or to Mr Aven or to the group. Was the money used for ORT? I don't know.
- Q. Can I ask you, please, to go to bundle H(A)03 and turn to page 1 H(A)03/1.
- A. Should I add something about Mr Mitchard and strike-out?
- Q. If you think it will help.
- A. I think it will help. The purpose of the application, as I understand it, was a specific purpose and it was not a full statement.
- Q. Well, the purpose of the application was to stop Mr Berezovsky being able to bring his case to trial, and Mr Mitchard was purporting to set out the facts which he said related to the agreements made between Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky. There would be no reason for him in that context not to tell the full truth about what the payments were for, would there?

A. No reason at all. I think what he did was right.

Q. And what he said in that statement, I'm not going to turn it up, was that the agreement was that payments would be made in relation to ORT. He didn't suggest that there would be any other payments that it was agreed Mr Abramovich would make?

A. Whatever the definition of ORT payments were.

Q. What, you're suggesting there should be a wide definition of ORT payments. "Whatever the definition of ORT payments were", what do you mean by that?

A. I mean what Mr Mitchard understood by ORT payments.

Q. What could he have understood other than that these were payments in respect of funding of ORT?

A. I think whatever Mr Berezovsky says was ORT was ORT.

Q. You have the document at H(A)03, page 1 H(A)03/1, this is a document that Mr Berezovsky disclosed in these proceedings. I suggest that it is obvious that it was only when Mr Berezovsky disclosed this document that you came up with this story about a payment to Atrium Consolidated, that's right, isn't it?

A. Wrong suggestion, and I was trying to explain.

Q. I suggest --

A. And I can say even who Mr Lippitt is -- was, if that will help.

Q. Why don't you say who Mr Lippitt is or was?

- A. He was a manager of that account in that bank, that's why his name is mentioned here. And I agree with Mr Berezovsky that he didn't know who Mr Lippitt was, for that reason.
- Q. You see, I suggest that although you claim you have a recollection of this, what is happening is you are simply reconstructing on the basis of a document that Mr Berezovsky has disclosed.
- A. I could have reconstructed the date of the payment but that's about it. I do remember the payment itself.
- Q. I'd like to, if I may, just go back to the Eurobond circular. It is at, again, H(A)07, I think starting at page 34 H(A)07/34. You tell us that you were closely involved in the supervision of this document. That's right, isn't it?
- A. Yes.
- Q. Mr Abramovich has told the court that the description of his education in this document, and I have in particular the reference on page 38 to him having graduated in 1987 from the Moscow Road Engineering Institute was not accurate, but he suggested that he didn't pick up the error because the circular was prepared in English only. Is it true that this circular was prepared in English only?
- A. As far as I remember, yes.

- Q. So unless someone was an English-speaking person they would not have picked up any errors, that would follow, would it not?
- A. No. If somebody was interested in translation, translation would have been provided.
- Q. So Mr Abramovich didn't ask for a translation?
- A. I guess he did not.
- Q. Well, if he had asked for a translation, then his suggested reason as to why he didn't pick up this error would fall away, wouldn't it?
- A. No, he wouldn't be able to pick it up, and I can explain what happened here.
- Q. All right.
- A. In Soviet system, which was the system at the time, you can graduate with a diploma, so to finish the institute or university, or you can graduate with what's called literally unfinished higher education. In this case you get spravka or certificate of unfinished higher education. It's a little bit like bachelor and masters but not exactly.
- So what Roman got here was this certificate of unfinished higher education. In English, I guess, Cleary's, who was writing this circular, memorandum, didn't find a better word.
- Q. Mr Shvidler, Mr Abramovich's evidence about this was that he spent four years from 1987 in a part-time course at the Moscow Road Engineering Institute. It doesn't seem to have anything to do with certificates of unfinished education.

A. I think it was lost in translation. If we want to go into his education, we can do it in two minutes. He went to school in Ukhta for a year and a half, so there was two courses. Then after army he came to Moscow, went to this school here, whatever we call it, in Russian it was Madi. And after the fourth year he got the certificate and didn't go back to that school. Years later, when he became governor and he needed to finish his higher education, he took another year and graduated, if you follow me. Or I can repeat it again.

Q. Well, I don't want to spend too much time on this.

A. Right, but whatever is written here, it's true and it just got lost somehow.

Q. Well, it must have got lost. I'm not altogether satisfied that it's been found --

A. We can do it again.

Q. But I'm not going to spend time on that.

A. Okay.

Q. You see, I suggest to you that what has happened here -- can I just ask you this. Again, I don't want to spend too long on this, but are you suggesting that Mr Abramovich was given a translation of this document at the time that it was being finalised?

A. I don't know.

Q. You don't know. When you talked about things being lost in translation, at what point in time? Are you saying it was lost in translation in court?

A. In court.

Q. Or lost in translation before court?

A. In court, definitely.

Q. You see, I suggest to you that that is an inaccuracy that you did not pick up because it suited you to say Mr Abramovich had this degree when in fact he didn't.

But I'm more interested in another point in this circular. Can you go to page 34 H(A)07/34.

A. So I should leave it unanswered, right?

Q. Well, if you want to add to anything you have already said, please do.

A. I want to add it's not true, about his education.

Whatever is written here is true and there was no reason to put it otherwise.

Q. Can you go to page 34, please, Mr Shvidler.

A. Yes.

Q. At page 34, you allowed a statement to go into the offering circular that:

"Mr Berezovsky does not own or control, or any have any other interest in any shares in Sibneft, directly or indirectly."

That also was simply untrue, wasn't it?

A. It was absolutely true.

Q. I suggest to you that it wasn't. Can you put that away.

I want to move on to another topic, can you please go to bundle H(A)11 at page 101 H(A)11/101. Now, at H(A)11, page 101, you should have an internal note within Andava SA from a Mr William Ferrero to Mr Berezovsky. It's dated 15 July 1998. It records a visit by Mr Ferrero to see you on 9 July 1998, that's six days earlier than the memo.

Can I ask you, please, to read the memo to yourself.

(Pause)

Now, can you just tell me this, presumably you saw this document before you prepared your witness statements for trial, is that right?

A. I honestly don't remember.

Q. All right. Can I ask you to go to another document at page 113 in the same bundle, it's a further memo from Mr Ferrero H(A)11/113.

A. I'm sorry, which --

Q. Page 113. This time it's a memo from Mr Ferrero to Mr Patarkatsishvili dated 14 August 1998, and it records a meeting again with you of just three days earlier. We can see that, if you look at point 1:

"I have met Eugene Shvidler on 11 August 1998."

Can I ask you to read the first page and a half of the note, down to -- if you go on to the second page, you'll see point 4 is "Auditors", you don't have to read beyond that. If you want to, you can. (Pause)

A. Mm-hm. Yes.

Q. So we see this in the first -- perhaps I can just check this, presumably you would have seen this document before you prepared your witness statements for trial?

A. No.

Q. You cannot remember?

A. I cannot remember.

Q. We see from the first paragraph of the note that you appear to have instructed Mr Ferrero to cause Andava to make a loan to Runicom Limited in the amount of 20 million Swiss Francs?

A. Yes.

Q. That's right, isn't it?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. This arose out of a proposal by Mr Abramovich to Mr Berezovsky that all of the companies owned by both of them should be brought under your financial supervision, is that right?

A. No, it's not right.

- Q. You told Mr Ferrero that you thought Runicom Limited had paid too much to Mr Berezovsky, and so you felt that Mr Berezovsky owed Runicom Limited money and you thought Andava could pay, is that right?
- A. No, it's not right. It would be very strange for me to discuss anything like this with Mr Ferrero whom I don't remember what he looks like, I think I saw him twice.
- Q. As stated in Mr Ferrero's contemporaneous note, your intention was to use the money to purchase shares in Aeroflot, that's right?
- A. Could be, at the request of Badri.
- Q. Well, I don't know about that, but it's clear that he says you wanted to buy shares in Aeroflot --
- A. That's why I'm trying to comment on what you say.
- Q. Can I ask you, please, to go to your witness statement, your third witness statement, at paragraph 149 at page 42 of E3, tab 10 E3/10/42. Can you read, please, paragraphs 149 and 150 to yourself. (Pause)
- A. Just those two?
- Q. Just those two. You make clear here that your meetings with Mr Ferrero, you say, had nothing to do with Sibneft, and that is borne out by the contemporaneous notes we've just seen. You make no reference, in this description of your dealings, to your request for money, do you?

A. No.

Q. Can we turn to your next witness statement, which is your fourth witness statement, E4, tab 10, and I want to look at paragraph 69 which is at page 183, please E4/10/183. Can I ask you, please, to read paragraph 69 to yourself. (Pause)

You see, Mr Shvidler, whereas previously you'd said that your discussions had nothing to do with Sibneft, now in this paragraph you're saying that the proposal was that they render the same, you're talking about Andava, render the same cash management services for Sibneft as they had done for Aeroflot. Would you care to explain why your story has changed in relation to this?

A. My story hasn't changed. It was the sales pitch for the company to do something for us. Did they want to acquire Sibneft as their so-called client? I'm sure they did but that was about it. There was no discussion of Sibneft, or there was no discussion, period.

Q. I'm afraid I don't understand that. In your earlier statement you went out of your way to say the meeting had nothing to do with Sibneft. In your more recent statement you say that this was a proposal that they render cash management services for Sibneft. So whereas previously you said it had nothing to do with Sibneft, now you're saying it was in connection with Sibneft.

- A. The meeting was connected to Switzerland, the same way it was connected to Sibneft. Again, they wanted to introduce the company, which they did. Were they interested in Sibneft being a client? I'm sure they did. That's it, Sibneft had nothing to do with it, Sibneft itself.
- Q. You say nothing to do with Sibneft or any future business proposal, but it's plain that there was a business proposal being made to you there, and indeed it had to do with Sibneft. That's what you said in your first statement and that's plainly wrong, according to your second statement.
- A. If you start playing with words, you win.
- Q. You see, you also suggest that your request for money, which you didn't mention in your previous statement, so I'm talking about your later statement, you said that the request for money was possibly suggested in a light-hearted way.
- A. That's right.
- Q. We can see from the contemporaneous note that that does not appear to be right, Mr Shvidler. It seemed to be a serious instruction, seriously received and seriously considered.
- MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What transfer is this?

MR RABINOWITZ: If my Ladyship goes back to the note.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, which one?

MR RABINOWITZ: Which one were you talking about here,
Mr Shvidler?

You say:

"I was not at all interested in their proposed services and I do recall thinking that we had our own financial expertise. It is therefore quite possible that I suggested in a light hearted way that Andava should transfer monies to Runicom Limited..."

In the note there are two references to a transfer, one is the 20 million Swiss francs transfer, and then, if you look at point 2 -- you don't have it anymore -- there's a reference to $33.8 million of Swiss francs being transferred.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Swiss francs?

MR RABINOWITZ: CHF.

Which of these transfers do you suggest was made in a light-hearted way?

A. I think I'll explain the situation maybe in two words and all the questions will fall out hopefully.

I visited the company at the request of Mr Berezovsky, or Mr Patarkatsishvili, I'm not sure which one. The company, Andava, and I think Andava and Forus was basically the same group of people, they made a pitch for us to -- they explained who they are, what they did, and I'm sure what Mr Ferrero is saying here about the presentation is correct.

I told him -- them that we're not interested and instead we can manage this money. That was the light-hearted part.

Another thing was that Badri and Mr Fomichev, they were trying to buy shares of Aeroflot at around that time. So this money could be used for those shares. That's the second part of the story.

And the main part of the story is this, that this group of people, they had business, apparently good life, they didn't want to lose it, and that's what Mr Ferrero is trying to explain here, that if -- he got scared a little bit because he didn't understand what's going on in Moscow, and he was scared, I guess, that all the money would be gone and that's what he's trying to explain in these two memos, referring to auditors, to other shareholders and so on.

Q. Mr Shvidler, while we have these Andava documents open --

A. I don't have it open.

Q. Can he have back -- I'm not sure you need it. Actually can you bring it back, please. H(A)11.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Page?

MR RABINOWITZ: It's page 113 H(A)11/113.

I want to ask you about something in your witness statement but you may want to refer back to that and that's why you should have it available.

In your fourth witness statement, can you go in your fourth witness statement, E4, tab 10, page 184, at paragraph 73 E4/10/184, you see that you're responding to the suggestion that Mr Abramovich may have caused Mr Glushkov's legal troubles relating to Aeroflot. In connection with this, at paragraph 73, you say the following in the third line:

"My recollection is that Laren Trading, a company controlled by Mr Abramovich, did acquire a small (approximately 2 per cent) shareholding in Aeroflot from Consolidated Bank in late 1997. I recall that Mr Fomichev, who had acquired the interest on behalf of Consolidated Bank at the request of Mr Patarkatsishvili, asked us to buy it from Consolidated Bank because Mr Patarkatsishvili had not provided him funds for the purchase."

Then you go on to say:

"Only much later, I recall in 2001, did we become interested in Aeroflot and acquired a more significant stake by buying shares in the market."

That's not quite right, is it, Mr Shvidler? As we've seen, already in 1998 you were planning to spend 20 million Swiss francs on shares in Aeroflot?

- A. It's absolutely right, and these two things have nothing to do with each other. In 1997, Mr Abramovich bought the shares for himself and this situation is described here. 20 million was Badri's money, or Badri's and his partners', whoever they were, money. They were trying to buy shares for themselves. They didn't do it, by the way.

In 2001, Mr Abramovich bought -- I mean, I did it for him -- shares from the market, and that's a completely different situation. So this 20 million was a use of their money for themselves.

I don't know if I'm --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: The 20 million Swiss francs?

- A. Yes, potentially, but again it was not done. They understood that they have 20 million or whatever, 33, whatever the number is here, in Andava. They wanted to use the money.

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Shvidler, one of the things you say here is that Consolidated Bank, Mr Abramovich acquired 2 per cent of shares in Aeroflot from Consolidated Bank in late 1997. Mr Glushkov told the court that Consolidated Bank only had 0.107 per cent of Aeroflot in 1997; that's right, isn't it?

A. That he said so? I guess it's right if --

Q. Or both that he said so and that what he said was right.

A. I don't have a knowledge about that. What I'm saying here, that Consolidated Bank was an agent basically who bought the shares, didn't have the money, and Mr Abramovich paid for it and took the shares.

As for the extra shareholding of Consolidated Bank itself, I have no knowledge.

Q. So you seem to be suggesting here that Mr Abramovich acquired shares from Consolidated Bank, that's to say that Consolidated Bank had 2 per cent and that Mr Abramovich bought its 2 per cent. Consolidated Bank never did have 2 per cent, Mr Shvidler.

A. Again, they did buy the shares, didn't have the money to pay. That's why we took it off their hands.

Q. So you're saying they had 2 per cent of the shares?

A. As an agent for us if you want to be technically correct.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, that may be a convenient moment.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, I'm not sure I'm understanding this.

Could you go back, please, Mr Shvidler, to H(A)11, page 113 H(A)11/113, which is Mr Ferrero's memo of 14 August, referring to a meeting with you on 11 August. Do you have that?

A. Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Ferrero is reporting about a proposal or an instruction that he says you've given him to make a loan of 20 million Swiss francs to Runicom.

A. Mm-hm.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And I don't quite understand what this was about. Why was money being lent from Andava to Runicom?

A. With a little possibility of being repaid afterwards.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. What was this all about? Just tell me now.

A. Okay, I was trying to explain.

I couldn't give him instructions, who am I to him?

Where do I start? Mr Ferrero was, as I understand, the main manager of this Andava enterprise, Andava business, which held --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, he was trying to sell you Andava as a service provider.

A. Right.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But what I don't understand --

I understand that because you've told me that already.

A. Right.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What I don't understand is the proposal that he seems to be reporting to Mr Patarkatsishvili here that Andava is going to be lending 20 million Swiss francs to Runicom.

- A. Okay. When I got back to Moscow, I guess, or on the phone, I'm not sure about that, I explained to Mr Patarkatsishvili that: we're not interested but they have the money which you should use, you, Mr Patarkatsishvili, should use.

At the time they were interested in buying shares in Aeroflot.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Badri was?

- A. Badri, maybe Mr Berezovsky but Badri.

So I guess he asked how much money that was, and here Mr Ferrero is saying that it was this amount of money.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So why is it going anywhere near Runicom if Mr Patarkatsishvili wants to buy shares in Aeroflot?

- A. Then -- it's difficult to explain the mechanics.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, have a go.

- A. Right, he would tell me: why don't you buy the shares? Because he didn't have hands, one of the hands was Mr Fomichev who could physically do it, go buy it. It's not like to go buy potatoes in the store, you have to be broker and stuff like that. So Runicom was one of the possibilities. He treated me in the same way more or less. So he asked me to buy it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: The shares in Aeroflot?

A. Right.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Through Runicom, yes, I see.

A. He didn't care through what. So he and Mr Ferrero got scared and he's writing back to Badri that: this is all our money, if you are saying you have to do it we'll do it, but this will destroy our business, and all these people will not be happy, auditors and shareholders --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see all that.

A. I understand it's hard to follow but --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, I follow now.

So the proposal was that you, as a nominee, would buy shares for Mr Patarkatsishvili--

A. Not even nominee, as a broker, just hands, that's all.

That's why I'm saying that we'll never repay because we're just --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I see.

A. The same is true for the situation we discussed like a minute ago, when Obedinyonniy Bank, which was bank presumably with the money, bought the shares of Aeroflot on the same instructions but didn't have funds.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

A. So we had to take them off the hands. Years later, I mean three or four years later, when the situation changed in the market, and also -- I mean, I saw on our balance, or whatever you call it, that we had those shares, this idea came to increase our stake.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, thank you.

Right. I'll take a ten minute break.

(11.23 am)

(A short break)

(11.43 am)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Shvidler, I'd like to move on to the 2001 sale of Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili's interests in Sibneft. You explained fairly in your witness statements that you were not present at the key meeting so there is little which I need to ask you about.

Can I ask you please to go to paragraph 203 of your third witness statement, E3, tab 10, page 58 E3/10/58.

You say at paragraph 203, or what you seem to suggest, is that you thought that the figure of $1.3 billion was, if anything, an excessive amount to pay Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili because, so you say, $1.3 billion was close to 100 per cent of the value of Sibneft market capitalisation as at January 2001. Okay?

Is it seriously your evidence, Mr Shvidler, that the value of Sibneft in May 2001 can be accurately ascertained simply by scaling up the market price of the 12 per cent or so of Sibneft which was then free-floating?

A. Can we start from the beginning of your statement?

Q. Well, do you want to -- if you need to, in order to answer my question, you can start wherever you like.

A. Right, okay, we'll start from the end.

Yes, I can seriously say so. One of the approaches to valuation would be to take market price of the shares traded. That is to answer the second part of your question.

As for why this whole thing about valuation is even here in this paragraph, it's not because what I was telling Roman at the time. I'm trying to say it now.

Q. Well, I want to ask you about your suggestion that 1.3 billion was close to 100 per cent of the value of the Sibneft market capitalisation and that you can seriously suggest there's a valuation method that you can scale up the market price of 12 per cent or so of Sibneft, which was free-floating, in order to reach that valuation, because I suggest to you that was a ridiculous position for you to adopt. Do you dispute that?

A. I dispute that.

- Q. Would you accept that the 88 per cent of the shares held by Mr Abramovich would have had an enormous premium for a majority control compared to the stock market price for the minority of shares in free-float?
- A. All theoretical conversation. In other words, if there was a willing buyer and a willing seller the price could be anything. What I'm trying to say here is the willing buyers and willing sellers were only with reference to the free-float, and the free-float was what it was and the start price was what it was. So that's the only market indication at the time.
- Q. You were trying to suggest that $1.3 billion would be a ridiculous figure because it was close to 100 per cent of the value of Sibneft.
- A. Correct.
- Q. Is it not right that just a couple of months later Sibneft decided to distribute dividends totalling some $612 million?
- A. Timing-wise I'm not sure, but probably, yes.
- Q. Let me show you --
- A. I agree with you, let's save time.
- Q. So on 17 August 2001 Sibneft distribute dividends of $612 million, and your suggestion, is it, is that the company which can pay out a dividend at that level could be worth only $1.3 billion a couple of months earlier?

A. That's right. We're talking about the first major dividend out of the whole Russian industry, not just oil industry. Was it sustainable? Who knew? And continue longer.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I don't understand. When you say:

"We're talking about the first major dividend out of the whole Russian industry, not just oil industry."

You're saying there that this was the first major dividend declared anywhere across Russia?

A. That's right.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: As against any industry?

A. Correct.

MR RABINOWITZ: Not only did it declare a dividend which is approximately half what you say is the value of the company in one year, it's also right, isn't it, that just ten months or so later you were announcing the sale of 1 per cent of the company for $100 million, giving the company an implied value in excess of $10 billion?

A. That's right, and I think we covered it yesterday. We were trying to sell it at this price, we wanted to sell at this price. That was our intention. That's one thing.

The second thing is that it was later. And at that time every half a year did count.

Q. You see, Mr Shvidler, I suggest to you that the evidence that you give at paragraph 203 of your witness statement is a good example of how you're willing to give wholly unrealistic evidence if you think it will help Mr Abramovich to win the case; that is right, isn't it?

A. It's not right at all.

Q. Now, I'd like to ask you next a few questions about Rusal, if I may.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just before we leave paragraph 203, the last sentence before the parenthetical:

"US$1.3 billion ... was close to 100%...", et cetera.

Is that something that entered your mind at the time, that comparison?

A. I don't remember. I think so. I mean, I was -- following(?) capitalisation of Sibneft, I did. To answer you right now, I don't remember.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think you said earlier that wasn't something you discussed with Mr Abramovich?

A. Was not or was?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, you tell me?

A. Did we discuss the number? Absolutely we did discuss the number, and it was a staggering number, just in cash terms. I saw an article recently with an illustration, "What could have been bought using this amount of money". You could buy the whole Sberbank, which is the Russian bank. You could buy, I forgot, 10 per cent of Gazprom. It was the amount which was held by Russian pension fund, 100 per cent of it, and so on. And what that would have been in today's dollars, if this money was invested in different Russian shares.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But when you discussed with Mr Abramovich your views that you thought the figure was crazy, did you make a comparison at that time with the market cap value as at January 2001, in your discussions with him?

A. I don't think so. The physical amount of money, that was the shock.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

A. And that was the key thing.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

Yes, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: Now, I want to ask you about Rusal, if I may, Mr Shvidler. Before I do, can I ask you this: do you agree that it is wrong to put one's name to a false document?

A. Yes, I agree with that.

Q. And can we take it that you do not generally execute contracts which contain statements which you know to be untrue?

A. Yes.

Q. Can we just look at some of the contractual documents that you executed, Mr Shvidler. Can you begin, please, by going to bundle H(A)17, and go to page 33 H(A)17/33.

A. Mm-hm.

Q. I don't know, do you prefer the English or the Russian?

A. Russian.

Q. All right, there's a Russian version at page 38

H(A)17/38.

Now, as you see, this is the master agreement of 10 February 2000 in accordance with which the aluminium assets were acquired which were subsequently merged with Mr Deripaska's aluminium assets to form Rusal, correct?

Can you say "yes" rather than nod if you agree.

A. Yes.

Q. Thank you. If you can just look at the end of the Russian version, page 43 H(A)17/43.

A. Mm-hm.

Q. That's before you get to 38T. Can you confirm that it's you who have signed this document?

A. Yes.

Q. And that it's your signature which appears as the second signature under party 1 --

A. That's right.

Q. -- on that page.

Just turning back, still in the Russian version, to page 38, you can see that someone has penned the initials "ES" on the bottom of each page, and can you confirm that those initials and the handwriting is yours?

A. That's right.

Q. Can you confirm that the reason you were initialling each page of this contract was to indicate your agreement to the terms recorded on each page?

A. Correct.

Q. Now, I take it you would have read this contract before you signed it, Mr Shvidler?

A. I did.

Q. You see clauses 4 and 5, which is page 33 in the English H(A)17/33.

A. Yes.

Q. So "Parties 1 shall acquire from parties 2 and 3 all their shares and interests in business of Bratsk of 300 additional units".

Clause 5:

"Party 1 shall acquire from Parties 2, 3, 4 and 5 all their shares and interests in business of KrAZ and other Siberian Complex industries for 250 [conditional units] ..."

So according to this document, Mr Shvidler, party 1 is the purchase of the aluminium assets, that's right, isn't it?

A. A small comment.

Q. Sorry?

A. A small comment: in English translation, "party", it's better translated as "side", it says "storona odin, storona dva" and so on. It's "side". It's a subtle difference but still there is a difference.

Q. But can you confirm that party 1, or side 1 if you prefer, is the purchaser of the aluminium assets according to this agreement?

A. That's right.

Q. And parties 2 to 5 are the sellers, are they not?

A. They are.

Q. And if you go back up to the top of page 33, do you see party 1, or side 1, is defined:

"Roman Abramovich, Evgeniy Shvidler, Badri Patarkatsishvili and companies represented by them
(hereinafter, 'Party 1') ..."

So you would agree with this, I take it, that on the face of this document, which you have signed and initialled, you are described as one of the purchasers of the aluminium assets, aren't you, Mr Shvidler?

A. I'm described as a representative of the side which bought the assets, that's correct.

Q. Well, you're described as one of the parties who bought the assets.

A. As a representative. I don't want to argue but it's really a difference.

Q. You see, what the document says on its face, Mr Shvidler, is that you are part of party 1, and party 1 is the group that have bought these assets.

A. Correct.

Q. Is that statement true or is it false?

A. The statement is true.

Q. Okay. So can I then ask you to have a look at paragraph 158 of your third witness statement, page 45 of E3, tab 10 E3/10/45. You see at paragraph 158, you say:

"Mr Patarkatsishvili signed the 10 February agreement along with Mr Abramovich and me. Neither Mr Patarkatsishvili nor I were the actual purchasers."

Can you explain, in light of that, why you say the contract, which suggests that you were the purchaser along with Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich, was true?

A. By definition that it was not false.

Q. That's your answer, is it?

A. No, and now we can go into details, if the court is interested.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, go on.

A. Okay. Three of us represented the purchasing side. The other gentleman here represented the sellers. Not all of them were actual sellers. I mean, they were sellers but not all of them had the assets. I'm referring to Mr Bosov. This is an agreement between the people sitting round the table. Whatever these people, this group of people wanted to put on paper, they did, and it was true and clear for all the parties, what was going on, and what we wanted to put on paper and perform. And it was -- all that was done in the future.

I don't know if I make myself clear.

MR RABINOWITZ: So you are saying not only were all the people identified as purchasers, purchasers, but not all the people identified as sellers were sellers?

A. All the people identified here had something to do and a lot to do with the situation described in this agreement. So none of this is false. I mean, whatever we wanted to say and whatever we wanted to put on paper is here, and we can go line by line.

Q. So where it says in the contract about Mr Bosov, who you said was not a seller, that he controls about 25 per cent of the shares and interests in the Siberian Complex, are you saying that is false?

A. I didn't say he was not a seller. He was a seller but he didn't have those assets.

Q. So you're saying he was a seller now?

A. And before as well. He was a seller, he didn't have the assets. His assets were part owned -- he was a partial owner but the assets owned by party 4 -- no -- whatever. By Trans-World Group.

Q. You see, I had thought that you'd said that not all the people who were identified as sellers were sellers, but I think you're now saying that they are all sellers, is that right?

If that's always been your evidence, just say so, I'm not trying to catch you out, Mr Shvidler.

A. That's the impression I have.

Q. I really am not. I had understood that that's what your evidence was.

So all the sellers were sellers, but you're saying that the people identified as purchasers were not all purchasers?

A. The people who were identified as purchasers were not all purchasers. The people who are identified here as sellers are all sellers, but the assets, for example, held by each one of them are not necessarily owned by them.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Are you saying there's a contractual obligation on anybody identified as a seller to sell, irrespective of whether they actually own the particular shares?

A. I would say yes.

Can you go to court with this paper? I have no opinion about that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

A. But did each one of the present people feel responsible for performing? Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

MR RABINOWITZ: Now, in your witness statement, in your third witness statement, you say that the reason that you wanted Mr Patarkatsishvili to sign a contract was because, you say:

"... it was a signal to the market that this was 'his' deal."

This is at paragraph 158 of your statement E3/10/45.

A. Mm-hm.

Q. So:

"... it was a signal to the market that this was 'his' deal. He was the 'enabler' and everyone needed to know that he was protecting the assets."

When you talk about the market, who are you talking about here?

A. The small group of people present and people around them who were in immediate vicinity.

Q. Why would it have been necessary for these people to know that Mr Patarkatsishvili was involved with the deal by him signing the contract, Mr Shvidler? All of these people were already well aware that Mr Patarkatsishvili was, if you want to put it this way, your man.

A. Mm-hm.

Q. That's right, isn't it?

A. That's right, and that's exactly why, if he was sitting there and all of a sudden didn't sign or refused to sign, that would be a very bad signal, and would look strange.

Q. You see, I suggest to you there was no need for these people to be told that Mr Patarkatsishvili was your man. Everyone knew that already, did they not?

A. Again, they knew it. I thought the question was why did he actually sign? Everybody present signed.

Q. And why was it necessary for you to sign the contract, Mr Shvidler?

A. Same reason basically. I was the one negotiating with all this -- I mean, I was the one almost done -- who almost done all the talking. So if all of a sudden I said, "And now I'm not signing", that would have been very bad.

Q. As long as Mr Abramovich signed it that wouldn't have mattered?

A. It would have.

Q. So the signal, you say, you were trying to send to the market by your signing this was to say that this agreement which Mr Abramovich could have signed was one that you agreed with as well?

A. You are mixing up two different situations.

Q. Okay.

A. We're sitting around the table, the document is prepared as we discussed it, and it was prepared right away or almost right away, and all of a sudden I refused to sign, that's one situation. It would have been very bad for people across the table.

If we're talking about the market, wider market, if I didn't sign it, it wouldn't matter. You're right.

Q. But both you and Mr Patarkatsishvili could have signed the contract without being described as buyers under the contract; that would have made it clear that you supported what was contained in the contract, would it not?

A. You might be right, but we have chosen this particular way of putting it on paper.

Q. You've chosen a way which suggests that you and Mr Patarkatsishvili were purchasers, that's right, isn't it?

- A. We've chosen the way which was suitable at the moment.
And I don't think it was any misunderstanding on anybody's part what we were doing.
- Q. You see, I suggest to you that the reason that you and Mr Patarkatsishvili have signed, or have been described as purchasers in this contract, is that is precisely what the position was. You were partners with Mr Abramovich in this deal, together with Mr Berezovsky, and that is right, is it not?
- A. Mr Berezovsky?
- Q. Correct.
- A. No, it's not correct. Neither Mr Patarkatsishvili nor myself paid anything for those assets. We're talking about buy and sell contract basically. We didn't pay anything, we didn't participate in the deal.
- Q. Let's look at another contract that you have executed, Mr Shvidler. You can put bundle H(A)17 away for the moment. Can you go, please, to bundle H(A)16 and go to page 47T H(A)16/47T. Now, you should have at page 47T an English translation of the preliminary agreement. If you would prefer to look at the Russian version, it's at page 47.
- A. I got it.
- Q. You're okay with that, thank you.

Although this is an agreement, as we can see from the front page, between Mr Abramovich and Mr Deripaska, if you look at the signature on the Russian version at page 50 --

A. It's my signature.

Q. It's your signature. Can you help the court then with this, Mr Shvidler: why did you execute this preliminary agreement if you were not a party to it?

A. A couple of words on this. It was basically the first time we've met and had a major deal with Mr Deripaska and Mr Bulygin. We never dealt with them. There was no trust between us and I would say they were more suspicious than we were. But the situation had to be resolved very quickly because Roman was trying to explain the assets were in a very bad shape. We sat down for the whole night and part of the day so this is the fruit of these negotiations.

Roman was a member of the Duma, of the Parliament at the time, and when he was about to sign it, I don't remember which one, or maybe both of them, Mr Deripaska and Mr Bulygin, they asked me to sign it, because they thought, as they explained later, that if Roman signs it, it would have been illegal and it would have been a way for us to get out of this agreement. If I'm making it clear.

So in other words, they thought that it could have been a way out for us, out of this agreement, if we did not -- if we didn't want to perform it. So I signed with no problem.

Q. Sorry, I didn't want to interrupt. Are you finished?

A. Yes.

Q. The agreement is still one which says it's between Mr Abramovich and Mr Deripaska.

A. That's right.

Q. But you're suggesting that it was thought that if someone other than Mr Abramovich signed it, that would in some way prevent an illegality which might otherwise be there, is that right?

A. No, not illegality. That our colleagues were satisfied that my signature was as good as his and it didn't have this negative property of him being a member of the Parliament.

Q. The reason they thought your signature was as good as his is because they understood, did they not, that you were one of his business partners?

A. They could, yes. We didn't discuss that.

Q. You didn't discuss it, but do you think they thought you were one of his business partners?

A. I'm sure they thought I was important, if I was there.

And again, during these negotiations, I think I did majority of the talking on our side.

Q. You see, Mr Bulygin, who drew up this document and has also signed it, says that he assumed you were Mr Abramovich's partner on this merger deal. Are you aware of that?

A. Yes.

Q. For my Ladyship's note, the reference is to Mr Bulygin's evidence at paragraph 13, at E4, tab 1, page 7 E4/01/7.

Mr Bulygin was right about that, wasn't he, Mr Shvidler?

A. No, he --

Q. You were one of the purchasers of the original aluminium assets, and you were one of Mr Abramovich's partners on the merger deal with Mr Deripaska?

A. No, he was not right.

Q. And that is the reason that they were comfortable with you signing rather than Mr Abramovich. That's right, isn't it?

A. No, it's not correct.

Q. Now, just looking at the preliminary agreement which you hopefully still have open, page 16, presumably you read the agreement through before you signed it?

A. Yes.

Q. Can I ask you to look at clause 4.1, Mr Shvidler, it's page 48T.

A. Mm-hm.

Q. And by this clause, both Mr Abramovich and Mr Deripaska warranted that they owned the aluminium assets that would be merged:

"... together with their partners (not including TWG or any other companies and/or individuals related thereto or affiliated therewith), they own the assets and that the stated assets have not been pledged as security for the obligations of parties 1 and 2 and are not subject to any third party rights, disputes or attachments."

Clause 4.2, just look at that:

"Party 1 ..."

That's you, Mr Abramovich:

"... warrants its and its partners' concerted will to sign the agreement [and you're talking about the agreement to be entered into] on the terms determined herein, and shall be fully liable to Party 2 for any action (omission) by its partners associated with the performance hereof."

How can these clauses be reconciled with your evidence, Mr Shvidler, that Mr Abramovich and Mr Abramovich alone was the party to this contract and therefore the only person who was a partner in relation to the aluminium business?

A. He was party 1, that's for starters, not party 2.

Q. Sorry, I said "the party to" rather than "the party 2".

A. My English, sorry.

Q. Don't worry, but can you answer my question.

A. Yes. Mr Abramovich was the only person who was party 1 and Mr Deripaska was the only person who was party 2.

I think during his evidence he was trying to explain to the court that the assets being sold and brought into this partnership or situation, the company was not registered yet, were not owned solely by Mr Abramovich nor by Mr Deripaska.

On top of that, there were other parties or sides or stakeholders, as Mr Deripaska called them, which had some interest in the situation.

In order to describe all of them, and in order to fulfil the purpose of this agreement, we put these two clauses in the contract, in the agreement.

As an example, I think Roman gave you the example of NkAZ, which is one of the assets being brought into this agreement or into this merger. NkAZ was -- we just had an agreement with NkAZ owners which was not fulfilled at the moment.

Just one example.

Q. All right, but the way that would have been fulfilled, presumably, is that NkAZ, or whatever it is, were going to be selling the assets to Mr Abramovich, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. And Mr Abramovich would then be putting the assets into the merged entity, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. But it then doesn't make sense, Mr Shvidler, if you look at clause 4.2, for Mr Abramovich to be warranting its partners' concerted will to sign the agreement.

The agreement was a merger agreement, was it not?

A. Sale and purchase, yes.

Q. Right. You see, NkAZ wouldn't be a party to that contract, would they?

A. NkAZ owners, you mean?

Q. Yes.

A. Of course they wouldn't be. That's why they are not mentioned here. What it says here is it's Roman's responsibility to make sure that the deal is not dependent on them. That's basically what it says. Or anybody else. That he takes responsibility on himself to do whatever needs to be done to perform under this agreement.

It's the same Mr Deripaska.

Q. This is talking about it being Mr Abramovich's partners':

"... concerted will to sign the agreement ... on the terms determined herein ..."

A. Right.

Q. We're not talking about a party who is not going to be a party to the agreement, that is to say the sale and purchase or merger agreement. That is not what clause 4.2 is relating to.

A. Again I'm confused in what you're saying. What I'm trying to say is these two clauses, the whole point 4 actually, describe this exactly situation, that we don't want to know what Mr Deripaska has to do in order to fulfil his part of the agreement. He doesn't want to know what our problems are. The only thing he insisted on, that Trans-World Group is out of the picture as of the date of this agreement. In other words, he doesn't want to see them later holding this deal or participating in the deal in any form or shape.

Q. You see, I suggest to you, Mr Shvidler, that the truth is a lot simpler than that. The partners that you were being referred to at clauses 4.1, 4.2 of the preliminary agreement included the names that we've already seen on the 10 February master agreement, namely yourself and Mr Patarkatsishvili together with Mr Berezovsky.

You deny that, do you?

A. I deny this completely.

Q. You see, I suggest that that is why, within a few days of signing this preliminary agreement and shortly before executing the formal share purchase and sale agreement of 15 March 2000, you all met up at the Dorchester Hotel. Do you recall who was present on that occasion?

A. Do I recall who was present?

Q. At the Dorchester Hotel meeting.

A. Do I recall who was present at the meeting?

Q. Yes.

A. Yes, I do recall who was present at the meeting.

Q. Who do you say was present?

A. Mr Berezovsky, Mr Patarkatsishvili, Mr Deripaska, Mr Abramovich and myself.

Q. The reason why you all got together at the Dorchester Hotel on 13 March was so that Mr Deripaska could meet with all of his new partners in Rusal, namely yourself, Mr Abramovich, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili. That's the truth of it, isn't it?

A. I was told not to make jokes, but if Mr Deripaska understood that he is meeting his future partners he would have a heart attack, seriously. So the answer is it's not correct.

Q. Now, you tell us, Mr Shvidler, that you don't recall much about the Dorchester Hotel meeting itself. Can we look at paragraph 177 of your third witness statement, it's page 50 E3/10/50.

You say here, this is just over the page on to page 51, remind yourself of the whole paragraph if you would like:

"All of the conversations, naturally, were in the Russian language. I stayed there throughout. I do not recall much about the meeting itself as it was all about status and not a meeting of substance but I would expect that we discussed in general the impact that the merger would have on the aluminium industry. I believe that there was also an element of Mr Abramovich wanting to show Mr Berezovsky that he had achieved something which might be regarded as historic, namely ending the aluminium wars. Mr Abramovich was not and is not someone who ever brags about his achievements but I believe he was proud to be able to show Mr Berezovsky, who in some ways, was a father like figure for Mr Abramovich, that he continued to be successful."

So you're saying here that you do not recall much about the meeting itself, and you're indicating that you're doing your best to reconstruct what might have happened when you say:

"... I would expect that we discussed in general the impact that the merger would have on the aluminium industry."

Is that right?

A. No, it's not right. What I'm saying, I don't remember much about the meeting. I mean, there was -- I was trying politely to say that there was nothing to remember.

As for the second part, it's my impression, so Roman didn't tell me that he thought Mr Berezovsky, and so on, was his father.

Q. Mr Shvidler, you say here that this isn't reconstruction and it's not a question of you not remembering about the meeting, you're just trying to say politely there was nothing to remember. That's not what you say. You say:

"I stayed there throughout. I do not recall much about the meeting itself ..."

You also say:

"... I would expect that we discussed ..."

Now, if you remembered what it was you did and didn't discuss, that is the way you would have put it.

A. Again, don't blame lawyers, but those are -- some of those words are not my words. "I would have", I never say "I would have", but what I'm trying to say here is exactly what I'm saying now.

The meeting had basically no substance. That's point number 1. Do I remember that Oleg wanted his money back? Of course I do remember it. Do I remember where Mr Berezovsky came from? I do remember that. Do

I remember the plane? Of course I do. I remember --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What, Mr Patarkatsishvili's plane?

A. That's right.

I do remember what the room looked like, the suite I mean. And what more details can I provide?

Business-wise there was nothing to discuss.

MR RABINOWITZ: You see, Mr Shvidler, I suggest to you that given what you say at paragraph 177 about not recalling much about the meeting, and the way you put it about what you would expect that you discussed, how can you be so emphatic about the matters that you identify at paragraphs 181 and 182 as things that you didn't discuss at the meeting?

A. Should I read them?

Q. Please do. (Pause)

A. I've read it.

Q. You see, just looking at the last line of paragraph 180 you say, about the agreement that was made as to the arrangements in respect of Rusal:

"There was no such discussion or agreement reached at the meeting or in my presence at any other time."

If you were being candid and accurate in your evidence, the most you could say is "I do not recall any such discussion". Wouldn't that have been a fairer way of putting it?

A. No. If I heard anything like that, like what I'm trying to describe here, British law trust or stuff like that, coming out of any of these people present, I would remember it for sure. That's what I'm trying to say here.

Q. I suggest to you that the details of the Rusal merger were discussed at the Dorchester Hotel, indeed Mr Abramovich tells us that on 12 March 2000, Mr Patarkatsishvili had phoned him and called him for the meeting so that Mr Berezovsky could hear from Mr Abramovich directly about the merger.

A. I heard what he was saying, yes -- I mean, what Mr Abramovich was saying.

Q. So the whole purpose, so far as Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich were concerned, was so that Mr Berezovsky could hear about the merger. But your evidence is, is it, that it wasn't discussed?

A. I'm saying that no details were discussed, no negotiations took place, no deal, nothing of that kind. Was the end of aluminium wars mentioned? Yes, it was.

Q. You are saying that no details were discussed. You fly all the way over with Mr Deripaska, because Mr Berezovsky wants to hear about the merger, and your evidence is that they simply didn't discuss any details to do with the merger?

A. Correct, and it wouldn't be the first time I flew with Mr Berezovsky or to see Mr Berezovsky with no substance to this flight at all.

I can give you examples if the court is interested.

Q. You say [in the draft]:

"... it would have been the first time I flew ..."

A. It would not be.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: There was a mistranscription.

MR RABINOWITZ: You see, I suggest that's an extraordinary story that you're telling here.

A. It was extraordinary time, extraordinary people, and from perspective of today and this audience, some of it looks strange.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just tell me in your own words why Mr -- and I've read what you said here. Just tell me in your own words, rather than in lawyer's words, why Mr Abramovich would have bothered to have flown back from Moscow to England to involve Mr Berezovsky in the party, as it were, in relation to the Rusal merger?

A. It will sound strange, but he always did, and Badri insisted that Boris wanted to see him. As you know, we were there day before for the whole week, and Mr Berezovsky was there as well, I mean there, here, in London. We were all here, and if he did want to see him, or either one wanted to see each other and thought it was relevant, why didn't they?

When Mr Berezovsky heard about this merger from Mr Patarkatsishvili, who was told by Mr Abramovich, he decided that the meeting was necessary and Mr Abramovich went along.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But why was it necessary in relation to Mr Berezovsky's future role or future expectation?

A. Mr Berezovsky liked to be associated with big deals and small deals as well. So what was the motive from his side? I guess that nothing --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, what did you perceive to be the motive at that time?

A. What did I think?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

A. I didn't think anything, and it was usual thing, and Roman just asked me to go. It was no problem.

I'll give you an example: Mr Berezovsky asked me to go with him to see Mr Soros -- I'm trying to, I did put(?) it here. It was not the only example. That was in the evening. He said "In the morning we're going to New York to see Mr Soros, you'll stick around, you might help me." I didn't think for a second, I just went with him. What was the purpose for me? Zero.

I mean, the same thing happened. Badri said "Boris is going to see Mr Kuchma," who was the president of Ukraine, "you come along, stick around." I did. Did I see Mr Kuchma? No, I didn't. Why did I go there? I don't know. Just to be on hand.

That's the kind of relationship we had, yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I see. Thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Shvidler, you said in your evidence a moment ago, "It will sound strange", but Mr Abramovich -- I think you were saying he would have bothered to fly back. You say:

"As you know, we were there day before for the whole week, and Mr Berezovsky was there as well, I mean there, here, in London."

You flew back on 12 March, correct?

A. Back?

Q. From London to Moscow.

A. From London to Moscow. Can I take it from you? I will agree.

Q. Mr Berezovsky only arrived in Moscow on 12 March so he wasn't there -- sorry, in London, I'm sorry.

Mr Berezovsky only arrived in London on 12 March and therefore he was not there in the week that you were there with Mr Deripaska's people.

A. That was my understanding. I thought he was -- as I remember from that time, that he was going to this court hearing against Forbes, same Forbes, same hearing, and that's why he had to spend time there. Did he arrive on that day or we missed each other? I don't know.

Q. You see, I suggest you are just making this up as you go along, Mr Shvidler.

A. (inaudible).

Q. Because the truth is that you did fly to the Dorchester meeting on the 13th in order that Mr Deripaska could meet Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili who were Mr Abramovich's partners in the Rusal deal. That's right, isn't it?

A. Not right at all.

Q. Now, Mr Berezovsky's case is that, on 13 March 2000, he was at a hearing in the House of Lords, and you've just commented on that, and that he was there in the morning. So he would have come to this meeting from the House of Lords.

The meeting was in Mr Patarkatsishvili's suite at the Dorchester Hotel. That's right, isn't it?

A. I think so, yes.

Q. We've made enquiries and we understand from the Dorchester Hotel that there is no record of Mr Berezovsky having had a room at the hotel on that day.

What is your recollection of how Mr Berezovsky was attired? Do you say he returned from the House of Lords in a dressing gown?

A. You asked for it. He didn't come to the room from outside, he was in this suite already and he came from the other room, from inside, and he was attired exactly like Roman described him. So he was there already.

Q. I suggest to you that that is simply untrue, Mr Shvidler.

A. It is true and --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What, with a dressing gown over his shirt and trousers, or a dressing gown with nothing on underneath? What are you saying?

A. Closer to the second one.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

MR RABINOWITZ: Now, you tell us -- I just want to move on to the Rusal sales beginning in September 2003. You tell us that you were not involved with the details of the sale of Mr Abramovich's 50 per cent share of Rusal to Mr Deripaska in September 2003, is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And you also tell us that the arrangement was that Mr Deripaska would buy the entire 50 per cent stake in Rusal for more than $2 billion but that he did not have the cash available to do the purchase in a single transaction, is that right?

A. Correct.

Q. And you tell us therefore that Mr Deripaska formally agreed to buy the first 25 per cent tranche with a right of first refusal for the second tranche, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. We've already seen that Mr Deripaska's recollection of this is rather different. Mr Deripaska's recollection set out in a formal witness statement sworn in court proceedings in England, in February 2008, was that he made an offer for the full 50 per cent of Rusal in 2003 but was told that only 25 per cent was available.

I've explored that with Mr Abramovich, we've looked at the legal documents that were in fact executed around that time which support Mr Deripaska's recollection and which I would suggest are inconsistent with your and Mr Abramovich's version of events.

I don't propose going through all that again with you, particularly as you say you weren't involved in the details of the sale, but can I just ask you this: do you accept that your recollection of these matters now in 2011 may be wrong and that Mr Deripaska's recollection of these matters back in 2008 is more likely to be right?

A. No, both of us remember the same thing, and both of us are saying the same thing.

Q. Can you explain why you say you're saying the same thing as Mr Deripaska then?

A. When he's saying that not the whole -- whatever he's saying -- not the whole stake was available, the reason is because he didn't have money to buy it, otherwise it was available.

Q. I suggest to you that that is not what he was saying but I'm not going to go through that with you.

A. Okay.

MR RABINOWITZ: Thank you very much, Mr Shvidler. No more questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Malek?

MR MALEK: No questions, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Adkin?

MR ADKIN: My Lady, no.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Sumption?

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, I have no re-examination.

May I however draw your Ladyship's attention to the fact that the question of the translation of Mr Abramovich's evidence about his graduation from the engineering institute has been taken up with the translators. At the moment there is a backlog of translation queries which is before them, one of those relates to this question of the certificate of unfinished higher education. That, as the Russian speakers behind me say, was in fact referred to by Mr Abramovich in his evidence, and we have, about a week ago, invited the translators to verify that from the tape.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Well, I'll wait and see what submissions are made to me about that.

MR SUMPTION: I don't think it's going to be a matter of critical importance, but the matter having been taken up with this witness and this not being an aspect of things that he would know about, I thought I should tell your Ladyship that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

Yes, thank you very much indeed, Mr Shvidler.

A. Thank you.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I have no further questions. Thank you for coming to give your evidence.

(The witness withdrew)

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, I call Mr Sponring.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR CHRISTIAN SPONRING (affirmed)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Please sit down.

THE WITNESS: Thank you.

Examination-in-chief by MR SUMPTION

MR SUMPTION: Mr Sponring, you are the first witness to give evidence who has not been specifically asked by my instructing solicitors whether you have any mobile phones or other electronic apparatus on you so I'm going to ask you now. Do you?

A. No, I don't.

Q. Thank you. Could you please take bundle E1, flag 2 E1/02/27.

A. Thank you.

Q. Is this your first and only witness statement in these proceedings, Mr Sponring?

A. That is correct.

Q. And is that your signature at the end of the statement on page 30 of the bundle?

A. That is right.

Q. Is this statement true?

A. Yes, it is.

MR SUMPTION: Thank you.

Cross-examination by MR GILLIS

MR GILLIS: Mr Sponring, good morning.

A. Good morning, Mr Gillis.

Q. Your statement indicates that you began to work for Mr Abramovich in December 1997, is that right?

A. Correct.

Q. And I think at that time you were aged 25?

A. Correct.

Q. And could I just ask you this: before that, what were you doing?

A. I worked as a professional chef, well, trained in Austria, and then worked for ten years in the best restaurants in Austria, London and various places.

Q. Now, you're Austrian and I assume you speak German?

A. I do indeed.

Q. And you obviously speak very good English.

A. Thank you.

Q. But you don't have a Russian background, do you?

A. Not at all. Not since I started to work for Mr Abramovich.

Q. And do you speak any Russian?

A. Yes, I do. Very basic but I am able to communicate.

Q. So looking at the position in 2001, what was the standard of your Russian then?

A. Almost non-existing, completely non-Russian.

Q. So would you have difficulty following a conversation between Russians?

A. Yes, of course. I wouldn't understand.

Q. Between 1997 and 2005 or thereabouts, you describe yourself as working for Mr Abramovich as his private personal live-in chef, that's your evidence?

A. That's correct.

Q. And throughout that period of eight years, you say that you constantly travelled with Mr Abramovich and his family providing your services as a private chef? Is that correct?

A. Correct.

Q. So you went with them, did you, when they stayed in French villas?

A. Yes, I did.

Q. And you went to stay with them on yachts?

A. Only later but also on yachts, yes.

Q. And accompanying them on their skiing holidays?

A. Yes, correct.

Q. Do you recall where they spent the summer in 1998?

A. 1998, it was the Clocher de la Garoupe in Antibes. I was there.

Q. In 1998 you say that, do you?

A. Yes, correct. Must be, because that's the following summer, when I started to work for them in the winter, following summer I was there in south of France.

Q. Are you sure it wasn't on a yacht called the Southern Cross?

A. Not at all. Not at all.

Q. And in the summer of 2000, do you recall where the Abramovich family stayed during the summer?

A. Also in the south of France, in a villa in -- just tell(?) you I don't -- '98 it was at Clocher, '99 it was at a villa in Saint-Jean-Cap-Ferrat.

Q. Can you recall specifically where that was?

A. I would believe it was a villa called Villa Serena, I think. Yes, correct. In Cap Ferrat.

Q. Now, as Mr Abramovich's private personal live-in chef, would it be right to assume that you provided all of your services at Mr Abramovich's homes or at the yachts and the villas and the chalets where he and his family were staying?

A. That is correct. Although there was a period of time when I mainly worked in Moscow, at the Moscow offices, and I didn't -- and really only for Mr Abramovich rather than for his family. If they went somewhere else then there were also different chefs.

Q. Now, you say, and I think this is paragraph 9 of your statement, that you knew Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, and you're talking about the position in January 2001. You say --

A. That is correct.

Q. You say you knew them from the previous time that you had -- the previous occasions when they had spent time with Mr Abramovich. Is that correct?

A. That is right.

Q. Now, can you recall when and where you saw them together?

A. Well, definitely at '98, summer, which was the Clocher de la Garoupe, next to Mr Berezovsky's chateau in Cap d'Antibes. And Mr Badri Patarkatsishvili -- sorry for that -- I definitely saw in the Moscow offices. I wouldn't remember exactly which time it was.

Q. So in relation to Mr Berezovsky, you saw him, is this right, when he came to visit Mr Abramovich at the homes and the yachts and the villas where Mr Abramovich was staying?

A. It wasn't that many times. It was particular in '98, and also I believe in the Moscow house for Mr Abramovich.

Q. And on the occasions you saw Mr Abramovich with Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, I think you indicate that from what you saw you regarded their relationship as being a friendly one, is that correct?

A. Yes, a very polite friendly one, as someone would expect.

Q. Thank you. Now, you also indicate in your statement that from 2005 or thereabouts you started to act as project manager and personal assistant for Mr Abramovich, is that correct?

A. That is correct.

Q. Could you identify the sorts of projects that you have been managing for Mr Abramovich?

A. Project, I mean this is obviously a very wide description, but it can be from several events which appear, or whether it's party arrangements. Anything which involves food obviously would be my responsibility, as well as all staff matters, and everything amongst the houses I'm involved and in charge as well.

Q. You give your address as being in Austria, in your witness statement.

A. That is correct.

Q. Where do you spend most of your working time?

A. Alongside Mr Abramovich.

Q. So you spend a long time travelling with Mr Abramovich?

A. Yes, I do, sir, indeed.

Q. As his project manager and his personal assistant --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm not sure it is personal, it says "personnel assistant", if you look at paragraph 2 of your witness statement.

A. That may be a mistake in my English spelling, could be, I'm not sure.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: If it's personnel assistant, does that mean you're assisting in the arrangements for his staff and his employees, or does it mean you're his personal assistant in the sense of secretary --

A. I would say both of it. This is completely right.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So you do organise his personnel to a certain --

A. Yes, I do. Since then, definitely yes.

MR GILLIS: And as his project manager, and assisting

Mr Abramovich in this way, would you accept that you are somebody who is greatly trusted by Mr Abramovich?

A. I would hope so.

Q. And in return you're loyal to him?

A. Yes, I've been working for him for a long time. I would consider myself loyal to him.

Q. In fact I think you've now been working for him for about 14 years, haven't you?

A. That is just about, if December is coming.

Q. Would you agree with this, that you would be concerned to do anything that might imperil your 14-year relationship with Mr Abramovich?

A. No, I wouldn't know what you mean by that but I don't think so.

Q. You would not be concerned to give evidence which would damage his claim in this action, are you suggesting that you would not be concerned to do that?

A. Not at all, I wouldn't be concerned. I have not much to say but I know what I'm giving evidence for and that's what happened.

Q. All right. Now, as his personal assistant, you have been aware of this litigation for some time, have you?

A. That is correct.

Q. And have you read the defence which was pleaded on Mr Abramovich's behalf?

A. Only bits and pieces, parts of it.

Q. So when -- can you recall when you first read the defence that had been served on his behalf?

A. Completely. I read it after I was asked if I remember what happened in 2001, and after that I've read -- I think Mr Abramovich's witness statements I read in full but that's about it.

Q. So did you read the defence before you had signed your witness statement?

A. No, I didn't.

Q. All right. Can I just ask you about the evidence that you have prepared to give in this case. You discussed your evidence regarding the alleged Megeve meeting with Mr Abramovich, that's correct, isn't it?

A. Well, I wouldn't say discussed. We obviously spoke about it, it came out of a conversation coincidentally rather than on purpose.

Q. And did Mr Abramovich discuss with you what he remembered about the Megeve meeting?

A. Well, again, only afterwards I found out that this was different from what I've remembered.

Q. When do you think you first had these discussions?

A. Well, knowing that my witness statement was signed on 29 May this year, it must have been a week before only.

Q. And having had these discussions, would you accept that it is difficult to differentiate between what you actually remember as opposed to what Mr Abramovich may have told you he recalled?

A. Could you repeat your word, what you mentioned, because I didn't really understand what the difference is, or differentiate, what do you mean by that? Sorry for that.

Q. Would you accept, since you discussed what you thought you recalled and what Mr Abramovich thought he recalled, that there is a risk of confusion and that what he recalled infects your memory and what you say you recall infects Mr Abramovich's memory?

A. No, I wouldn't think so and I wouldn't say so at all. It was, I mean, fairly -- almost the same, it's just that the location has been different.

Q. You say the recollection was almost the same, do you?

A. I would believe so. This is what I've read of his side, yes.

Q. All right. And were you in court when Mr Abramovich gave his evidence in relation to the Megeve meeting?

A. Yes, I was in court.

Q. And would you accept that that further increases the difficulty of differentiating what you actually remember as opposed to what you have heard others saying about the meeting?

A. No, I don't think so at all. Again, I know what I remember, I know what happened there, and that -- it's not changeable, I could say, and that's what happened.

Q. Now, when you first discussed the Megeve meeting with Mr Abramovich, is it your recollection that Mr Abramovich remembered that Mr Berezovsky had attended the meeting?

A. Yes, definitely. I mean, it was more that I refreshed his memory rather the other way around. It was -- coincidentally again, as I mentioned before, it turned out that I have been at the meeting which all other people didn't know or didn't remember about, and I said -- and then I said: well, this happened, and this, we flew from Courcheval to Megeve and (inaudible). So Mr Abramovich was listening but, again, I -- it came even clearer to his mind what actually was.

Q. Mr Sponring, what I suggest to you is that when you first talked to Mr Abramovich about the Megeve meeting he had no recollection of Mr Berezovsky being there. And that's right, isn't it?

A. I wouldn't know such detail.

Q. Well, with respect, you would because you spoke to Mr Abramovich, as you've indicated, and what I'm putting to you is that when you first began to discuss the Megeve meeting with Mr Abramovich he had no recollection of Mr Berezovsky having attended that meeting.

A. Well, I -- as I said, I didn't know about this. I only said that I was at this meeting or I was at this helicopter flight, described it, where we landed, described how long we stayed there, (inaudible), and it was clear that Mr Abramovich, well, confirmed, "Ah, yes, that's exactly what it was." He was rather surprised that I was there.

Q. So are you willing to accept that what you said prompted a memory --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, that's a matter for me, isn't it, Mr Gillis? I'm not sure that he can speculate on that.

MR GILLIS: All right.

Mr Sponring, is it fair to say that over the eight years that you were constantly travelling with Mr Abramovich and his family you have been to many remarkable and memorable places?

A. Definitely.

Q. In that sense, in a sense, you've almost lived the oligarch's lifestyle of seeing many wonderful and remarkable places?

- A. I have seen incredible places and had fantastic trips with Mr Abramovich, that's correct.
- Q. Do you really suggest that you are able to remember who attended meetings 11 years ago even if they were in memorable settings?
- A. Definitely. I mean, this was a very clear recollection I have, that's the only one I have, and yes, definitely, I can suggest it.
- Q. Mr Sponring, I suggest to you that you may well have a vivid memory of a particular place or an event but still have very great difficulty in remembering who actually attended on those occasions. Would you agree with that?
- A. No, I wouldn't agree with that. Why? I know exactly who was there, and that was at the -- I mean, that's what happened.
- Q. All right. Can I move on to the meeting which you claim you recall in Megeve.
- It's right, is it not, that you had previously been with the Abramovich family in Courcheval on their skiing holiday?
- A. That is correct.
- Q. Can you recall where the Abramovich family stayed in Courcheval?
- A. Are we talking about now in the first year they stayed there or the second year?

Q. I should have been clear, in 2001.

A. In 2001 it was a villa called, a chalet called Chalet Seban(?).

Q. As their live-in chef, did you live-in at the villa as well?

A. At this particular year I did live in the house as well. I know that Mr Abramovich said I didn't, but I lived in this year because it was -- every year it was different, either there was too much staff, nannies, teachers, whoever travelled, and guests, and then it was always somehow allocated who stayed where.

Q. So you think Mr Abramovich's memory in that respect is wrong?

A. Well, I don't know, but in this respect, that he said I didn't stay in the house, is not right because I stayed in the house.

Q. Now, were you aware -- I'm still in January 2001 -- were you aware whether or not Mr Abramovich had met Mr Patarkatsishvili when he was in Courchevel?

A. No, I was not aware. I was spending a lot of time in the kitchen.

Q. Understandably so.

Can you recall whether Mr Abramovich had any security guards with him in Courchevel?

A. There was rather drivers, but security guards, I wouldn't recall. Drivers, there were two drivers, as well as -- they are considering them security or drivers, but there were -- two gentlemen from the south of France were also in Courchevel.

Q. Would it be usual for Mr Abramovich at that time when he was in Europe to have security guards with him?

A. It depended on the different location. It depended where he went. But in general I think at that time in Europe, no, there wasn't security round him.

Q. Focusing then on the helicopter flight from Courchevel to Megeve, to the best of your recollection, who was on that helicopter flight?

A. Well, Mr Abramovich; his wife Irina; I think one or two kids, I really can't remember that, definitely one of the kids; and myself.

Q. So no one else?

A. No. The pilot, I believe.

Q. Obviously.

When you took off from the heliport in Courchevel, did you know that you were stopping in Megeve?

A. I think I did because even then I was informed before, where are we going, what is happening and I would also pass this information on to -- with flight arrangements or travel arrangement, when is the car meeting, where, those information, that kind of thing, to Mr Abramovich as well.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Were you in charge of making the car --

A. No, I wasn't in charge at all of this arrangement. I was just -- I would get a phone call, they would tell me "This and this is happening, we go from there to Megeve and then further to Moscow". Because also I would have been informed that, when I arrive in Moscow, who is going to meet me, who is going to bring me, in Moscow I stayed in a flat in the centre of town so that I -- that, well, those proceedings are all in place.

Q. Had you been told that Mr Abramovich was planning a meeting in Megeve?

A. No, I wouldn't have been told that.

Q. Now, when you got to the Megeve heliport I understand you did not sit at the same table as Mr Abramovich and whoever he was meeting, is that right?

A. That is correct.

Q. And I think you indicate that you sat with Mr Abramovich's family at another table?

A. That is correct.

Q. And I think you've also indicated that at that time you did not understand Russian conversation?

A. No. I wouldn't have understood the Russian conversation at all, no.

Q. So is this the case, that you are unaware of what was being discussed between Mr Abramovich and whoever he was speaking to?

A. Yes, that's correct. And it was also too far away. I couldn't even hear what they were talking about.

Q. So how far away was he?

A. I would think like Mr Berezovsky sits now to me, in this distance I would say.

Q. But you were able to observe the meeting taking place?

A. Yes, of course, that was the purpose we landed there.

Q. Would Irina Abramovich also have been able to have seen the meeting taking place?

A. Yes, definitely.

Q. And do you know why she is not giving evidence in relation to this meeting?

A. That I don't know.

Q. Could I ask you to look at Mr Abramovich's third witness statement and that's bundle E1 at tab 3. If I could ask you to go to paragraph 271 E1/03/117, and I assume you're familiar with these paragraphs, are you?

A. Well, not entirely but I have certainly read them at one time.

Q. Could I just ask you to read to yourself the first two sentences in paragraph 271?

A. Yes. (Pause)

I've read this.

Q. Can I ask, does that accord with your recollection of the meeting?

A. Well, it here says:

"[We had] a short meeting ..."

I know that I've indicated it must have been up to an hour. Well, that's...

Q. And the second sentence where he indicates that he does not recall Mr Berezovsky saying anything. Does that accord with your recollection of the meeting?

A. Well, I wouldn't know that and I wouldn't have noticed that. How much or who spoke at the meeting, I would not know that.

Q. So you say that you were not even looking across to see who was speaking?

A. I might have been looking across but I was not staring at them and not -- for sure, I wouldn't know who was part and leading the conversation and what was part of the conversation, not at all.

Q. So are you able to assist whether, so far as you are concerned, Mr Berezovsky was saying anything?

A. No, I'm not able to assist on that.

- Q. Now, Mr Sponring, by the time of the Megeve meeting, you'd been working with Mr Abramovich for over three years, is that right?
- A. That is correct.
- Q. And over that time, you must have seen numerous Russian men hugging and embracing each other when they say goodbye, is that correct?
- A. Well, I've seen it, yes, several times.
- Q. And I suggest to you that that would have been, for you, something that would be relatively commonplace, to see Russian men linking arms when they talk or by hugging each other when they greet or when they depart, would you agree?
- A. Well, I wouldn't agree because it doesn't happen all the time. It rather indicates if someone know each other very well or not. It's -- for Mr Abramovich, for example, he doesn't do it to so many people.
- Q. Mr Sponring, what I suggest to you is that at paragraph 11 of your witness statement, when you say that you particularly remember --
- MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It's tab 2.
- MR GILLIS: That's tab 2. Where you say that you particularly remember Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky saying goodbye to each other because they hugged each other, I suggest to you that's simply not credible.

- A. I don't know why you think it's not credible but that's definitely what happened there.
- Q. What I would suggest to you is that, having worked for Mr Abramovich for over three years, I suggest hugging and embracing when people leave would not be something that would be memorable at all.
- A. Well, I may remind you that I wasn't there all the time when Mr Abramovich greeted people or said goodbye to people. I was -- again, I was in the kitchen so there was not that I've seen that all the time but definitely, until today, it is not something he will do to a lot of people.
- Q. But having lived in Russia for three years and being with Mr Abramovich, I put to you it would be commonplace.
- A. I've lived in Russia, I travelled back and forth but it's -- yes, even now, I think out of Mr Abramovich's friends, I know them very well, there are two people who would maybe do that, to myself even, and I find it rather extraordinary than something, well, common.
- Q. Mr Sponring, I suggest to you that your evidence as regards Mr Berezovsky's alleged presence at the Megeve heliport is based either on false recollection or misplaced loyalty and that, 11 years after the event, you have no real memory of Mr Berezovsky being there, because he wasn't.

A. That is completely not correct.

MR GILLIS: Thank you. I have no further questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well timed, Mr Gillis.

Do you have any re-examination?

MR MALEK: No, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Sorry, any further cross-examination?

MR ADKIN: No.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Any re-examination?

MR SUMPTION: No, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much indeed ,

Mr Sponring, for coming to give your evidence. You may be released.

THE WITNESS: Thank you.

(The witness withdrew)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. 2.05.

(1.03 pm)

(The short adjournment)

(2.05 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Sumption.

MR SUMPTION: Before the next witness is called, can I just give your Ladyship an update on forthcoming witnesses.

Mr Smolensky is a witness who we have decided is too marginal to warrant pulling him out of retirement to come over here so we will not be calling him. Given that that is our decision, the appropriate course is I think for us to withdraw his statement rather than seek to rely on it as hearsay evidence.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

MR SUMPTION: So I would invite your Ladyship to treat that as withdrawn.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you just tell me where it is?

MR SUMPTION: It is at E8, flag 11 E8/11/142.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It's easier if I simply, as it were, cross it out so that I know.

Right.

MR SUMPTION: Secondly, Ms Popenkova gave evidence primarily about the position of PK-Trast. We have been told by my learned friends that they do not need to cross-examine her so the position is that her witness statement goes in as unchallenged evidence.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR SUMPTION: Thirdly, Mr Deripaska, we are at the moment uncertain whether we will be able to have him here in person, which we would prefer, or --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Because he's the subject of a hearsay notice?

MR SUMPTION: Well, no -- or else by video-link. Your Ladyship has made a video order in relation to him. If he has to give evidence by video-link, we propose that that should be done at 2.00 pm on Friday. He's in New York and that therefore allows for the time difference and gives a fixed date.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. Yes, I see. Right. So is Ms Goncharova unchallenged?

MR SUMPTION: No, it's Ms Popenkova. She is unchallenged.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: She is unchallenged. Right. Thank you.

MR SUMPTION: Ms Davies will be calling the next witness.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, before Ms Davies does call the next witness, there is one other witness whose status, certainly so far as we're concerned, is uncertain and that's Mr Bulygin. As I understand it, we have written to find out whether -- my understanding is Mr Bulygin was at some point ill and we didn't know whether he was coming or not. We've written to find out whether he is coming.

MR SUMPTION: We are trying to find out. I'm not yet in a position to give your Ladyship accurate information.

MS DAVIES: My Lady, then I call Ms Panchenko.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

MS IRINA PANCHENKO (affirmed)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Please sit down.

Examination-in-chief by MS DAVIES

MS DAVIES: Ms Panchenko, can you be given bundles E2 and E4, please. If you could take bundle E2 at flag 7 E2/07/160, do you see your second witness statement in these proceedings, which starts in the Russian version at page 202 E2/07/202?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. Could you turn to page 240 in the Russian version. Is that your signature?

A. Yes, it is my signature.

Q. I understand there are two corrections you wish to make to this witness statement which should be on a separate sheet of paper, firstly at paragraph 55, and secondly at paragraph 91.

Does my Lady --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I've got the corrections.

MS DAVIES: -- have those?

Are those the two corrections you wish to make to your second witness statement, Ms Panchenko?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. Then if you could go in bundle E4 to tab 3 E4/03/31, you should find your third witness statement in these proceedings starting in the Russian version at page 36 E4/03/36. Do you have that?

A. Yes, I can, yes.

Q. If you look at page 39 in the Russian version, is that your signature?

A. Yes, this is my signature.

Q. Paragraph 8 of this witness statement clarifies one matter in the English version of your second witness statement, is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Subject to those corrections and that clarification, is the evidence in your second and third witness statements true?

A. Yes, they are indeed.

MS DAVIES: Thank you very much. There will be some questions for you, Ms Panchenko.

Cross-examination by MR RABINOWITZ

MR RABINOWITZ: Good afternoon, Ms Panchenko.

Ms Panchenko, you worked for Mr Abramovich since December 1996, that's right, isn't it?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. Initially you supervised the accounts of Mr Abramovich's companies, is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And this included Runicom SA, the Swiss company, and Runicom Limited, the Gibraltar company?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. And you also supervised the accounts of Mr Abramovich's Russian trading companies, is that right?

A. Not right away. In a staged manner, little by little.

Yes, that's correct.

Q. And then in January 1997, you were appointed chief accountant of Sibneft, is that right?

A. Yes.

Q. And you rose to the position of vice president for finance at Sibneft in July 1999?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. And then you left Sibneft in March 2001 in order to take up the position of deputy governor of Chukotka for financial and economic issues, you were also head of the department for finance, economy and property relations of Chukotka, is that right?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. But you say that you continued to supervise Sibneft and OAO Russkiy Alyuminiy Management, which is not Rusal, until Mr Abramovich sold his interests in them, is that right?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. And since the beginning of July 2008, you've been the financial director of Millhouse LLC?

A. Yes, and I still occupy this position, yes.

Q. So is this right: having begun work for Mr Abramovich in December 1996, you've worked for him in a succession of very senior positions for nearly 15 years?

THE INTERPRETER: My apologies, it's the interpreter's mistake, I said Berezovsky, and Mrs Panchenko corrected me. It is definitely Mr Abramovich.

A. I worked with him for 15 years, that's correct.

THE INTERPRETER: My apologies, my Lady.

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Abramovich told the court that he trusts and relies upon you, would you agree with that?

A. Yes, I agree with that.

Q. And you are a friend of Mr Abramovich's?

A. Yes, I am indeed.

Q. And you have helped and advised Mr Abramovich in relation to a range of matters over the years, is that right?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. And are you a partner with Mr Abramovich in any of his businesses?

A. I think I am. The very same deal with Pharmstandard and Highland Gold.

Q. So you're a partner with him in two companies, is that right, or two ventures? Or are there more?

A. I think it was those two.

Q. Do you not know what ventures you're a partner with Mr Abramovich in?

A. For the time being it's only Highland Gold. I was just trying to recall what happened in the past.

Q. Are you saying that in the past you have been a partner with him in other ventures?

A. My share was so insignificant. But for the time being, as of the time of speaking, I think it's Highland Gold and Pharmstandard.

Q. You say your share was so insignificant, your share in which companies was so insignificant?

A. Both in Highland Gold and in Pharmstandard.

Q. Are you saying that those are the only companies in which you had a share?

A. Yes, that is the case.

Q. Would it be fair to say that you feel a great sense of loyalty to Mr Abramovich?

A. Yes, I do feel loyalty to him in my capacity as one of his employees.

Q. You are, I think, or have been also a trustee of some of Mr Abramovich's trusts, is that right?

A. Yes. That is correct.

Q. And in relation to which trusts?

Let me be more specific. Were you a trustee in relation to the trust which was set up with regard to Sibneft shares?

A. I am the trustee in one trust.

Q. Well, is that the trust in respect of the shares held in Sibneft or is that another trust?

A. It is the trust that used to have Sibneft shares.

- Q. And was that a trust which was set up above the Cypriot companies? Or was that the trust which was set up above the Liechtenstein companies? Or was it the same trust?
- A. I am the trust -- trustee in a Cyprus trust. There are many different companies from many different jurisdictions there.
- Q. Can you recall whether this trust was a discretionary trust?
- A. Well, for me, this is a rather complex legal concept and if you would care to explain this to me.
- Q. Were you entitled in relation to -- let me try this a different way. Where decisions had to be made about trust assets, were you yourself able to make those decisions or were you told what decisions you had to make?
- A. I think that there were meetings of trustees, and in our capacity as trustee we adopted those decisions ourselves.
- Q. Now, before you made your witness statement, did you discuss the evidence you were going to give with any other witness?
- A. We recollected for a long time the events that occurred ten years ago, so I did spend a considerable amount of time to recollect that and I reviewed documentation and I communicated with those people who took part in those events.

Q. You say:

"We recollected for a long time the events that occurred ten years ago ..."

With whom did you try and recollect those events?

A. Would you like me to give you a list?

Q. I would like to know of the witnesses who Mr Abramovich is calling, I don't want to know about lawyers involved, but of the witnesses who Mr Abramovich is calling, with whom you say you together recollected -- tried to recollect the events that occurred?

A. With Mr Abramovich himself, with Mr Tenenbaum, with Mr De Cort, Mrs Khudyk, Mr Gorodilov, Mr Shvidler. Someone else there?

Q. I don't know, it's your evidence. I can't tell you who you discussed your evidence with, Ms Panchenko. If those are the only ones, then just say so.

A. I think that Mr Streshinsky was also there.

Q. And did you compare recollections?

A. When you discuss things, everyone has his own view of what happened ten years ago and sometimes they are the same, sometimes there are differences. So everyone has his own evidence.

Q. And what happens when they were different?

A. Everyone decides for themselves. What I do is I record my recollections.

Q. Now, can I just go back to the question of trustees.

You said you were a trustee and you talked about meetings at which your fellow trustees made decisions.

Can you tell us who else were trustees?

A. Do I have to answer that question?

Q. Well, I'd appreciate it if you would.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, in the absence of any objection from counsel I don't see why she shouldn't answer that question.

MS DAVIES: My Lady, the concern is obviously that many of these arrangements are extremely confidential and I'm sure that's what Ms Panchenko is worried about. It's very difficult also to see how the identity of the trustees for the trust could be relevant to issues in this dispute.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, Ms Davies, as I see it, the relevance of this is to whether, if there are trusts above the shares in the relevant companies, or in certain of the Cypriot companies, what are the beneficial provisions in those trusts? It's whether or not they recognise the possibility of the claimant being potentially a beneficiary.

MS DAVIES: Well, my Lady, if that's the issue, that's of course not affected by who are the trustees of the trust, which was the question --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, it may or may not be. The problem is we know there are trusts above the various shares through various companies, and in the absence of a trust deed which contemplates the possibility, let us assume, of additional people being added to the beneficiary pool it's a bit difficult for one to make any conclusions about what the ultimate -- well, a bit difficult -- it could be said that in the absence of the trust deeds the court could possibly take the view that there was a potential for an additional beneficiary, whether the claimant or someone else, to be added to the pool.

We've all seen these sort of trust deeds where the protector has power to add beneficiaries or doesn't, or where the beneficiary pool is defined so widely as to include pretty well anyone.

MS DAVIES: My Lady, that, as it were, is a separate issue about the trust deeds which are not in the court bundle. Ms Panchenko is being asked about the identity of the trustees and details about the trusts and obviously feels some difficulty in dealing with matters that are very confidential to Mr Abramovich.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Are these current trustees or past trustees?

MS DAVIES: Well, I obviously can't answer for Ms Panchenko in terms of --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No. Well, I think the question was probably directed at past trustees.

MR RABINOWITZ: It was.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think one needs to take it in steps, or Mr Rabinowitz may need to take it in steps. If there's any problem about confidentiality, the witness can simply write down the necessary name and I can make an appropriate order to ensure that the name does not become public beyond counsel.

MS DAVIES: Well, that may make it easier for Ms Panchenko to answer.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

Mr Rabinowitz, first of all, explain to me what you say the relevance of knowing the names of the trustees is. Make it clear to me what you say the relevance is in relation to the current position where --

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm not interested in the current position.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: -- where I can't see that, speaking for myself, you need to know anything about it.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm not interested in the current position, my Lady. My question was: who are the other trustees?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Then I think you need to identify which trusts you are referring to and up to what period in time.

MR RABINOWITZ: It would be the trusts which sat above the Sibneft holdings.

Now, we know the Sibneft holdings were sold in 2003, I have no idea what happened to the proceeds of that --

MR SUMPTION: 2005.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: 2005.

MR RABINOWITZ: 2005, sorry. But what I'm interested in is the position certainly up to 2001. We know that the Cypriot structure was put in place in 1999.

I'm interested, at least in part, my Lady, because we have other witnesses who may also be trustees and who I may also be able to ask questions of in order to try and ascertain precisely what it is that was in these trust deeds.

Now, it may be that the way to deal with this is to identify, insofar as another trustee is a witness, that could be stated publicly. Insofar as Ms Panchenko has a problem with someone who is not a witness, I don't mind if that's written down and not said publicly.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, let's take it in stages. Ask your question in relation to the trusts above the Cypriot companies in relation to holdings exclusively of Sibneft shares up until 2001.

MR RABINOWITZ: Very well.

Ms Panchenko, in terms of the trusts which sat above the Cypriot companies, which sat above the holdings of Sibneft shares up to 2001, can you say who of the other trustees are or have been witnesses in this case for Mr Abramovich?

A. I was appointed a trustee in March 2001. Prior to that I do not know the structure of the trust.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And that was a trust which sat above the Sibneft shares?

A. The Cyprus trust.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Through Cypriot companies.

A. So it was Russia, Cyprus companies, then some other jurisdictions and the Cyprus trust.

MR RABINOWITZ: Well, can you tell us in March 2001 which of the other trustees are witnesses being called by Mr Abramovich?

A. Mr Tenenbaum.

Q. Prior to March 2001 can you tell us who the trustees were, insofar as there are witnesses?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: She said she can't say who the trustees were prior to 2001, I think.

Oh, she said she didn't know about the structure.

A. I do not know.

MR RABINOWITZ: And what was it that prompted your appointment in March 2001 as a trustee? Was there anything which occurred which led to this?

A. Why I was elected?

Q. In March 2001, did something happen in the period leading up to March 2001 that prompted your appointment as a trustee?

A. I do not have any ideas on this. A new trust was put in place, it was necessary to have a certain number of trustees and one of the candidates was myself. I was one of the candidates.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Were there any other trustees apart from Mr Tenenbaum in the period up until 2001 that you know the names of?

A. Not from amongst the trustees. I don't know what the structure of the previous trust was.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. But of the trustees, apart from people who are giving evidence on behalf of Mr Abramovich, were there other trustees whose names you know in the period up until 2001?

A. Even the previous trust, in the previous trust?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, in the Cyprus trust.

A. The Cyprus trust was established in March 2001.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

A. And I immediately became the trustee, together with Mr Tenenbaum, as of the time of the establishment, of the setting-up of the trust.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: In 2001, after its establishment, apart from Mr Tenenbaum was there another trustee?

A. Yes. There were three trustees in the trust.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And do you have any issues of confidentiality in giving the name of the third trustee?

A. I don't know what his wish is. He has nothing to do with these proceedings, so if you tell me that I need to do this -- but I'd rather write it down.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Well, write it down in the first instance and show it to me, please.

A. Would that be in Russian?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I can't read Russian, I'm afraid.

MR RABINOWITZ: It will have to be translated, I suppose.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Perhaps the translator could write it in English for me.

MS DAVIES: You need to be careful because the microphone is picking...

(Handed)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, what I'm going to do is I'm going to pass it to Ms Davies. It doesn't seem to me that there's any objection but, if there is, she can take instructions on it. (Handed)

MS DAVIES: My Lady, there's no objection.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. You can pass it back to the witness. (Handed)

MR RABINOWITZ: I just want to be clear, does that mean
I can ask the name?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

Could you read out the name, please, Ms Panchenko, now? Read out the name, yes. Say the same in open court.

MR RABINOWITZ: What is the name you've written down,
please?

A. Dimitrius Ionidis.

Q. Ms Panchenko, can you tell us about the trust deed. Who were the beneficiaries of the trust?

A. Roman Abramovich.

Q. And Mr Abramovich alone?

A. And later on his children.

Q. Can you tell us whether there was a provision in the trust deed -- I think it probably follows from what you've said. There was a provision in this trust deed, was there, which enabled further beneficiaries to be added?

A. I apologise, I'm not a lawyer and it was Mr Tenenbaum who was much more in charge of this.

So far as I can recall originally, the trust was created only to encompass Mr Abramovich and then his children were added. Now, whether that was done with the agreement of the protector, I cannot tell you with certainty. I realise that at some point in time Mr Abramovich's children were added.

Q. And who was the protector of the trust, please?

A. It was Mr Shvidler.

Q. And does it follow from your previous answer that beneficiaries could be added either by the trustees alone or with the permission of the protector, Mr Shvidler?

A. I cannot answer this question with certainty. Maybe the children were added in case something happened to Mr Abramovich. I mean, I am not sure about the sequence. In case he disappears, then...

Q. I'm not so much interested in the reasons why they were added, I'm interested in the ability to add beneficiaries, and does it follow from your previous answer that additional beneficiaries could either be added by decision of the trustees alone or with the consent of the protector?

A. I'm not sure that I -- the information that I'm imparting to you is correct because, as a rule, this was handled by Mr Tenenbaum who agreed with me on those things. Now, what the legal procedure was I will not be able, unfortunately, to give you that information with certainty.

Q. Very well. Perhaps we'll ask Mr Tenenbaum.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: When did you cease to be a trustee of the Cypriot trust, or are you still a trustee of the Cypriot trust?

A. Yes, I still am.

MR RABINOWITZ: Does that mean there are still documents relating to this trust which are available?

A. Yes, there are.

Q. Have you been asked to produce these documents for the purpose of this litigation?

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, can I, I hope genuinely to help my learned friend --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, please do.

MR SUMPTION: -- say something about this.

As a matter of principle the decision was made some time ago that these trust documents were irrelevant. In light of the point that your Ladyship has made in the course of this --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That was just my impression, Mr Sumption, I haven't heard submissions about the point, it just struck me that it might --

MR SUMPTION: Well obviously my learned friend regards them as relevant. At any rate, I have asked my instructing solicitors to check what the position is about their availability and we will try and ensure that information in some shape or form is available as soon as possible, ideally before Mr Tenenbaum gives evidence.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can I make it clear that it doesn't seem to me, on the basis of my present view, that the current arrangements have any relevance at all. But I can see that it's arguable that what the position was in the period 2000 to 2005 or even earlier might be relevant.

MR SUMPTION: Yes. Well, it's the same trust, as I understand it, and we will look into the position, and bearing in mind that only part of the chronological period is relevant we will ensure that the court is as well informed as it can be.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay. That might also apply in the light of the allegations in the claim in relation to the Liechtenstein trust.

MR SUMPTION: Yes. I will need to check the precise period of time covered by that. The evidence was that it wasn't in existence for very long.

MR RABINOWITZ: The evidence was that it was in existence for a year.

MR SUMPTION: That it was not in existence for very long.

MR RABINOWITZ: I think for a year between 1998 and 1999.

MR SUMPTION: Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: The only point is if one has one of those sweep-up trusts --

MR SUMPTION: I understand the point and we will, in the light of that point having arisen, make sure that if there are further documents to be disclosed they will be disclosed, and we will make sure that that happens before Mr Tenenbaum gives evidence.

MR RABINOWITZ: Sorry, before we leave documents and disclosure, insofar as there were trusts relating to the Rusal interests as well, we would be grateful if someone could look out for those as well.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, I quite understand that. My present understanding is that in fact it's the same trust but I will have to check that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, let's take it in stages. Very well. Thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: Ms Panchenko, I want to go back to an answer you gave earlier about the people with whom you had jointly sought to establish your recollections, and one of the people you mentioned was a Mr Streshinsky. Is that right?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. Now, Mr Streshinsky is a witness who is being called by the family defendants in this litigation.

MS DAVIES: Anisimov defendants.

MR RABINOWITZ: Sorry, the Anisimov defendants, I apologise. Did you meet to discuss recollections with any other witnesses who were, in a sense, not Abramovich witnesses? Mr Anisimov, for example?

A. I've met here with Mr Anisimov, Mr Anisimov himself, and I spoke with Mr Streshinsky over the phone. I did not have a meeting with him.

Q. I'm not interested in whether you have ever met these people in court, what I'm interested in is the people with whom you discussed your evidence before you made your witness statement.

A. I wrote the witness statement on 30 May and I communicated with Mr Streshinsky I think after that.

Q. But you had no conversation with him before you made your witness statement?

A. Most probably not, not before that. Once again I do not recall the date, the exact date, when I was communicating with him but that did not have any impact on my witness statement, that's for sure.

Q. Because in evidence you gave earlier, this is I think at [draft] page 98, line 22, you mention Mr Streshinsky also being present where the evidence was discussed?

A. Sorry, which page is that?

Q. Well, you won't have it, but on the transcript.

A. Sorry, you asked me whom I was trying to recollect the events that happened ten years ago, and I listed Mr Streshinsky as one of the people with whom I did discuss that.

Q. Yes, that's at [draft] page 98, line 16 to 18. Sorry, just below that.

So was he a person with whom you sought to discuss recollections before you produced your evidence?

A. I'm not sure that it was prior to 30 May, most probably it was some time in June. I do not recall exactly.

Q. So perhaps between witness statements, because you've produced more than one witness statement, haven't you?

A. One could say that it happened in between.

Q. I think your first --

A. Between the second and the third statement.

Q. That's right, because your second statement is on 30 May and your third statement is on 4 July. Okay.

Now, one matter which you cover at length in your evidence, Ms Panchenko, is the question of payments made to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili. You make clear, though, that you had limited personal involvement in the making of these payments, is that right?

A. Well, define limited. I did not make decisions with respect to those payments so it's hard to be more specific. Could you specify your question, please?

Q. Let me ask you this. The one exception that you make to being personally involved or not being personally involved in this relates to payments to the account of Tiberius Limited and Pennand Limited.

If you go to paragraph 35 of your second witness statement, it's page 212 in the Russian E2/07/212, and page 171 in the English E2/07/171.

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. You see, the reason I suggested to you that you didn't have personal involvement in payments apart from this one is because you begin paragraph 35 by saying:

"Apart from the payments made to the accounts of Tiberius Limited ... and Pennand Inc ... I believe that all [the] other payments in the Fomichev table were handled by Ms Nickoulina as directed by Mr Shvidler."

Then you go on to deal with Pennand and Tiberius and the payments to them. Okay?

A. Mrs Goncharova was also handling part of those payments.

Q. Now, from paragraph 36 and onwards you explain how, in broad terms, promissory notes were used to effect the payment or the payments to Tiberius and Pennand. Can we just look at what you say about the payments to Tiberius and Pennand at paragraph 39 of this statement which should be just over the page you're on.

You say about these payments:

"... it was agreed that companies identified by Mr Fomichev would purchase promissory notes of Sibneft from the companies we specified for the lowest possible price (virtually at zero price), with subsequent repurchases for full value by companies associated with the banks with which we worked."

Just turning back to paragraph 36, you identify two documents in the footnotes, footnotes 5 and 6, which support your recollection, and these are the agreements of the 2 October 2000 and 29 September 2000, do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. If I'm going too fast, just tell me too slow down.

A. (Not interpreted) No, it's okay.

Q. Can I ask you to please be given bundle J2/2 and open at tab 18, please J2/2.18/238.

So you recognise this, this is your first --

A. This is my first witness statement.

Q. Correct.

And in this very short statement, you confirmed that you had read a Russian translation of the signed third witness statement of Mr Mitchard QC dated 19 June 2009, and you confirmed that insofar as that statement referred to matters that were within your knowledge and to the best of your knowledge and belief, that that statement contained an accurate account of affairs.

Was that true? Did you read the Russian translation of Mr Mitchard's statement at the time?

A. I -- to be honest, I do not recall if I read the Russian translation, but what Mr Mitchard wrote, he understood that from me, and this is something that I can confirm.

Q. But when it says here that you have read a Russian translation of the statement --

A. Yes, then my apologies, then I did read the Russian translation.

Q. Thank you. In the same bundle, can you please go to tab 11 which is earlier in the bundle where you will find the third witness statement of Mr Mitchard J2/2.11/171. I don't know if there is a Russian version that has been included. Has it?

MS DAVIES: It's in my bundle at page 172R, if that assists J2/2.11/172R.

MR RABINOWITZ: You may want to go to the Russian version of that, I don't seem to have it in my bundle.

At paragraph 9 of that statement, page 173 of the bundle in English, and I have a reference to say it's at 175R for the Russian.

Mr Mitchard says:

"I have personally interviewed Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler, Mr Tenenbaum, Ms Goncharova, Mr De Cort, Ms Panchenko and Ms Khudyk. The references below to their evidence are to information I was given during those interviews and subsequently confirmed to me by them."

Can I then ask you, please, to go in the Russian version to page 187R J2/2.11/187R, in the English version page 182 J2/2.11/182, and to look at paragraph 18, please. You see at paragraph 18 Mr Mitchard is saying that Mr Shvidler had confirmed to him that:

"... credit agreements were also used at one stage in order to fund cashflow payments to ORT as part of the funding agreement referred to above."

Then in footnote 30, it says:

"Mr Shvidler and Ms Panchenko have confirmed to me that Bournemouth and Laren (as well as Runicom Limited) ... were Abramovich group companies. No one I have interviewed has, however, any knowledge of the use of Sibneft promissory notes to equivalent effect."

Just carrying on with the footnote:

"Mr Shvidler and Ms Panchenko confirm that Sibneft actively issued promissory notes for very substantial sums of money in its business activities, which were then traded in the market, in accordance with what had become usual for Russian companies at a time when barter had become normal practice."

Then it's this sentence I'm particularly interested in:

"But they are not aware of the use of promissory notes as an additional means of providing funding for ORT in accordance with Mr Abramovich's agreement with Mr Berezovsky ..."

It appears from this, Ms Panchenko, that you had told Mr Mitchard that you had no knowledge at all about the use of promissory notes in this way, is that right?

- A. At that time I indeed did not know about the use of promissory notes -- I did not know about the use of promissory notes, promissory notes as a mechanism to make settlements between Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky.
- Q. Perhaps we can just see the evidence to which you were responding here. If you go in the same bundle to tab 9, please, which is where you'll find the statement that Mr Marino made on behalf of Mr Berezovsky, and turn to page 83 within tab 9 J2/2.09/83.

Between paragraphs -- do you have the right page?

- A. Yes, in English, yes.
- Q. I'm not sure that there is a Russian version, but between paragraphs 212 and 214 of this statement, Mr Marino specifically alleged in this evidence that Mr Fomichev had discussed with you the use of Pennand and Tiberius to receive funds. And it was also specifically alleged here that the agreement had been that Sibneft would issue promissory notes which would be sold for less than their commercial value and then bought back by companies controlled by Mr Abramovich at a higher price.

If you look at footnote 131 on page 84, you see -- if you need a translator for this then tell me -- Mr Marino is in fact identifying the documents which support his evidence about how promissory notes were used, and those are in fact the same documents that you have referred to in your witness statement at footnotes 5 and 6 to paragraph 6. Is that right?

A. Could I explain to you how that happened?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, please do.

MS DAVIES: My Lady, I believe there is a Russian version of this which it's being attempted to hand to the witness which might assist.

MR RABINOWITZ: Thank you very much.

Do have a look at footnote 131, Ms Panchenko.

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. Those are the same contracts, I think, that you have subsequently referred to in your witness statement, aren't they, footnote 131?

A. Now I do understand that most probably those were the same, the very same contracts. However, at that time, when Mr Mitchard showed me the contracts with the names of Tiberius and Pennand, and the sale and purchase of promissory notes, they did not say to me that somehow it was related to Mr Berezovsky or with the mutual settlements with Mr Abramovich.

I could perhaps clarify why I now remember this, why -- or it's rather a reconstruction on my part.

- Q. Can we just take this in stages because the first stage is this: having been shown what was being said on behalf of Mr Berezovsky in the witness statement that Mr Marino made, it appears that -- and indeed having been shown the contracts -- it appears that you told Mr Mitchard that you had no knowledge at all about these matters. Is that right? It seems to be the effect of what he says at footnote 30.
- A. I am not sure that I actually read Mr Marino's witness statement, but I did see the promissory note sale and purchase contract, that is true, just by way of example.
- Q. Whether you read it or not, Mr Mitchard must have put to you what it was that Mr Marino was saying had been agreed between yourself and Mr Fomichev in relation to these payments?
- A. I think that Mr Mitchard was asking me whether promissory notes had been used or were being used as a mechanism for mutual settlements between Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky.

When I was reviewing those specific promissory notes on purchase agreements the names of the companies did not mean anything to me, neither Tiberius nor Pennand, or any other companies, Broad... something.

Q. But it goes further than that, Ms Panchenko, because the name Mr Fomichev would have meant something to you, correct?

A. Yes, Mr Fomichev's name was known to me at that time.

Q. And the process of selling Sibneft's promissory notes for near zero and then arranging for them to be bought back at a very much more substantial amount would have meant something to you, correct?

A. It was not cast in stone: buy for this and sell for this, or the whole list. These were bits and pieces of sale and purchase agreements which were very -- it was very hard to collate them between themselves from what was made available.

Q. Do you recall, Ms Panchenko, that at the time this witness statement was made by Mr Mitchard it was Mr Abramovich's case that the only payments he had agreed to make to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili related to the funding of the cash requirements of ORT? Shall I show you something to remind you of that?

A. Would you mind showing this to me? Thank you.

Q. In the English version of Mr Mitchard's statement it's at paragraph 12(b) on page 177 J2/2.11/177. You see he says -- he's disputing Mr Berezovsky's version of what was agreed in 1995, and what he says in fact Mr Abramovich says, that his agreement with Mr Berezovsky was that in exchange for the political assistance:

"... Mr Berezovsky had provided in respect of the creation of Sibneft, Mr Abramovich would fund certain ... cash requirements of ... ORT ..."

Do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. But the promissory notes were not, or certainly not necessarily, to fund the cash requirements of ORT, were they?

A. Most probably that is the case. They were not necessarily needed for that specific purpose.

Q. And you knew, didn't you, that payments had been made to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, or other payments had been made to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, that also did not appear to be payments to ORT; that's right, isn't it?

Shall I give you an example, would that help?

A. To be honest, I did not care about the nature of those relationships. When Paul Mitchard was giving his evidence he was speaking with different people, and obviously I paid attention to the information which he received from me, and if Mr Abramovich thought that that was the case well, then, this is what he thought.

- Q. You see, other payments that you knew about which had been made to Mr Berezovsky, which couldn't have related to ORT, were the credit card payments with Most Bank that had been paid in early 1999.

Isn't it right that you liaised with Mr Pavel Ivlev in relation to payment of Mr Berezovsky's credit card bills with Most Bank?

- A. I did liaise with Mr Ivlev but I wrote in my statement that I do not recall what the outcome of that was, whether real payments had been actually made. Having reviewed the documents, I recall that there had been discussions at some point in time. You see, I handle finances and there were quite a lot of payment documents that go through my hands, and if I look at the documents then I can tell exactly whether I had seen them or I had not seen them.

Now, once -- immediately after I saw the documents with respect to the individual debt to Most Bank on the part of various individuals, members of Mr Berezovsky's family, I do not recall whether we paid those debts for them or not, I do not remember that, but what I do recall is that, in order to make a payment on behalf of a Russian citizen, in order to pay his debt, you need a contract. So you need to have some grounds to be able to make that payment, so that individual must have had some relationship with the payor, and you definitely need a contract for that.

Q. I suggest that you were aware in 2009, when Mr Mitchard was making his statement, that there were payments made to Mr Berezovsky which would show that the suggestion that the agreement was only in respect of funding to ORT could not be right. And that is why you were not willing to say at that stage that you were aware of the promissory notes discounting scheme that you had agreed with Mr Fomichev. That's right, isn't it?

A. I'm afraid it was too long, I'm not sure I understood the sequence of your reasoning.

Whether I knew about the payments that were made to Mr Berezovsky by that time? Yes, I did know about that. Whether I paid attention to what Paul Mitchard said about the fact that it was only ORT exclusively? Well, the answer is most probably not because once again I'd like to clarify, if I may, that after the lawyer interviewed several people he then makes one general statement. I was mainly looking at the information that he'd received from me, that was the focus of my attention.

- Q. I thought you had actually made a witness statement in which you confirmed that you had read his statement in a Russian translation.
- A. Yes, that is true, and I know how to read and now I'm much better at that. You need some experience to draw distinctions between "I can" or "I may", but you really need some time to develop a knack for that.
- Q. And when you saw that Mr Mitchard was saying that Mr Abramovich's case was that the agreement simply involved payments of funding for ORT, you would have known that that was incorrect, wouldn't you, given what you knew about payments?
- A. I can only speak as of today. As of today, I know it was not the case, I just did not pay attention, to be honest with you I did not pay attention at that time to the limited nature of this.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, that may be a convenient moment.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

Don't talk to anybody about your evidence.

Right, ten minutes.

(3.15 pm)

(A short break)

(3.33 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: Ms Panchenko, I would like to ask you next some questions about the bolshoi balance. You say in your evidence at paragraph 31 E2/07/170 that the bolshoi balance:

"... contains details of all the payments made to Mr Berezovsky and/or Mr Patarkatsishvili in 2000."

It's the second sentence of paragraph 31. You also say at paragraph 28 that the bolshoi balance was prepared by:

"... employees of Mr Abramovich's companies who were subordinates of yours."

Is that right?

A. Yes, this is correct.

Q. In fact, we had a look at the metadata for the file which shows that the author is "Irina P", which must be you, is that right?

A. Most likely it would be me.

Q. So is the position that you perhaps created the structure of the spreadsheet and then asked the subordinate to enter the relevant data, or did they pass you the relevant data and you entered it?

A. I think that most likely I was trying to create the structure. It's quite an unusual form. It does not correspond with accounting standards, and that form was created only following request from Mr Shvidler, and possibly in order to explain to the employees what they have to do I could have created the form as I think, and then would fill it with content -- they would fill it with the facts.

Q. Did you look at the bolshoi balance when first assisting Mr Abramovich with the strike-out application?

A. No, I didn't look at it. The Excel spreadsheet that is called "Bolshoi Balance" was found as a result of electronic search for documents and the search was organised by the lawyers in November of last year.

Q. The search was organised in November last year, so that's November 2010 and, what, it was produced -- what, discovered in November of last year?

A. Yes. This Excel spreadsheet, this table was found as a result of electronic search done by the lawyers. We have received it and we started looking at it, and only after having seen in the table the name "FOM", which I think means Fomichev, I saw the names of companies Tiberius and Pennand and only then I put these facts together.

Q. You see, Ms Panchenko, this document was only disclosed in these proceedings on 27 May 2011, just three days before you signed this witness statement. Are you aware of that?

A. I do not know when specifically the document was disclosed, but our discussion, the disclosure of this document, has taken a fairly long while as far as I recall.

Q. So you say you discussed this document for a fairly long while after it was discovered. Are you able to assist us as to why it was only disclosed it looks like six months after you discovered this document?

A. Why did it take a long while?

Q. Six months.

A. Okay, I can hear that.

To start, we have received electronic information, volume of information, and then after a while the lawyers sent us this document. That took a while as well. That is, first they sent the translation because they're English-speaking lawyers and they had to understand -- it had to be translated for them in English and they had to understand whether it was relevant for the case or not.

And then we received that document, we looked at it, we were trying to recall and to reflect properly whether this is pertinent to the case or not. It contains a lot of information that is not pertinent to the case and it took us quite a fair while and discussion as to whether to present -- in what form to present it, to redact something or not to redact it, and, in the end, we have decided to produce it, to provide it just the way it is now. And it's quite a lengthy process and one has to take this into account, never mind the holidays, the New Year, et cetera, and work between Moscow and London.

I don't know.

Q. It's fairly obvious, Ms Panchenko, that you spent a lot of time looking at this document for the purposes of preparing your witness statement since your witness statement is full of references to this document.

That's right, isn't it, you spent a lot of time looking at this document for the purposes of your witness statement?

A. For the most part, I looked at the "FOM" table, at the Fomichev table, and I was trying to recollect, and I recollected that this is to do with mutual settlements with Mr Berezovsky and/or Mr Badri. And I was trying to recollect why there was a special table below that is breaking the payments down, including the Tiberius and Pennand promissory notes, 100 million, 207 million. And the reconstruction took some time.

Q. Well, it would have been obvious to you, and indeed to everyone, when you were working on the Fomichev -- on this table for the purpose of your witness statement, that it was a document which needed to be disclosed, Ms Panchenko. That's obvious, isn't it?

A. Whether we knew about the existence of this document, about the found document, I can assure you we did not. That is, that document indeed was found during the electronic search, and then it was only CD Rom, it was discovered at Natalia Khudyk's computer, he (sic) was working using one Russian disc, and those who know about computers, who deal with the computer without her knowledge, they created another copy on another hard drive. I don't recall the name of it.

And on the result of information search, we saw that that information was preserved, that survives. That is, the lawyers discovered that information has survived. And, for us, I would say that was quite unusual, quite unexpected.

Q. But that was six months before it was disclosed.

A. I don't know when exactly the document was disclosed. I can only take your word for it.

Q. It was disclosed three days before you produced your second witness statement -- three days before you signed your witness statement on 27 May 2011.

You say it was discovered on Ms Khudyk's computer?

A. Yes, this is correct.

Q. And Ms Khudyk would have been using that computer, would she, I take it?

A. This is her computer. You may like -- you would like to ask her. As I understand, she didn't use a hard drive and she didn't know about the existence of an archive copy of the old documents.

Q. No one had previously searched the archives of her computer prior to November 2010, or can you not help us with that?

A. I am not able to answer that. I understood from Natalia that she worked with a different hard drive and she didn't know about the existence of this archive copy, and that was done without her knowledge within the period when she was on leave by the department that is responsible for IT or computers, for computer support.

Q. We'll come back to the bolshoi balance. Can I first --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: When you're referring to the bolshoi balance, you mean the entire spreadsheets? I mean, there are a number of spreadsheets.

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: For 2000 and 2001 or just for 2000?

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm referring to what was disclosed to us as the bolshoi balance that your Ladyship has I think on your computer separately, not part of Magnum.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I'm looking at it, but in paragraph 28 of Ms Panchenko's statement E2/07/170 she refers to:

"... a cash flow spreadsheet (the '2000 Bolshoi Balance') ..."

MR RABINOWITZ: I understand that to be the whole of this document.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, I don't understand that, because if you look at the tabs in the bottom of the document it refers to 2001. And what I'm not clear about is whether all the sheets are the bolshoi balance or just --

MR RABINOWITZ: Perhaps I can ask Ms Panchenko what she understands by that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: Ms Panchenko, when you refer to the bolshoi balance, you say:

"... a cash flow spreadsheet ... was prepared by employees of Mr Abramovich's companies who were my subordinates."

You see at paragraph 29 E2/07/170, between paragraphs 29 and 31 you then describe it. In paragraph 31 you refer to that part of it which is called the Fomichev table.

When you are referring to the bolshoi balance, are you referring to the whole of this document? That's to say, more than just what are called the Fomichev tables?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Perhaps it would be easier if she had the Russian version of the tables up on the screen, of the Excel tables up on the screen.

MR RABINOWITZ: I think we have that up on the screen.

MR SUMPTION: Right. Does she have it in Russian?

A. Yes, thank you very much, I have it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: If you look at the bottom -- that's in the Russian -- if you look at the bottom I can click any tab and, running along the bottom, starting with "2000 total", then going along to "total" and then we have "2001 total" and then we have "FOM" and then we have "distribution".

Can you just identify for me what 2001 is dealing with and whether I need to look at that.

A. In this file I have looked only at the main -- at the first tab and the total. Usually it's only the total and the "FOM" table, the rest of them are auxiliary, and the year 2001 is not complete, these are some work in progress tables done by employees, ie they're not complete, they do not encompass the whole year, they were ongoing.

The first one -- sorry, I can't operate the screen.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I don't think you can do it.

If I look at the first one, "2000 total, cash incl., annual", is that of any relevance to payments made to Mr Berezovsky or Mr Patarkatsishvili or their companies?

A. Below that table, if I could scroll down, if someone could help me to the total.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What, the "ORT cash"?

A. "ORT cash", it's already -- Mr Berezovsky 461, the abbreviation of "BRB" (sic) and "BRBR" (sic), the same part is highlighted in the "FOM" table, this is purely copied in the "FOM" table, these two lines, these two sections.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So I can work from the "FOM" table, can I, as the total of payments made to Mr Berezovsky or Mr Patarkatsishvili or their companies?

A. Yes, that's correct.

MS DAVIES: My Lady, the transcript just picked up "BRB" when I believe it should be "PRB".

THE INTERPRETER: Sorry, the interpreter apologises because I haven't got the document in front of me and I might have misheard.

MS DAVIES: The two relevant entries are "PRB" and "PRBR" and they came up on the transcript as "BRB" and "BRBR".

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Then for 2001, are any of the spreadsheets relevant so far as payments to Mr Berezovsky or Mr Patarkatsishvili or their companies are concerned?

A. Not in this file, no. I think so, I think they're not relevant. That is, they are the payments for year 2000, and where "Fomichev" is reflecting the total amount of payments made.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: If you could flag up "distribution" in the bottom tab, after "FOM", are "PRB" or "PRBR" entries there relevant to Mr Berezovsky?

A. I think they are partial -- parts of the total table.

Usually the employees are collating a large file together and I usually only look at the totals, at the totals in the tables.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. Thank you very much.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can I just follow my Lady's question on that.

There are, are there not, totals in the tables for PRB and PRBR?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, I think you should make it clear, Mr Rabinowitz, which year you're referring to because there are sheets dealing with different years.

MR RABINOWITZ: Doesn't it stop before you get to 2001, Ms Panchenko? Does this stop before it gets to 2001, the table that you're looking at at the moment?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: "FOM" does but we're not looking at "FOM". I was looking at "2001 total".

MR RABINOWITZ: We'll come back to that insofar as I need to ask you questions about it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. It's just I need to be clear, and if I've got Ms Panchenko here, she's the one who can explain it to me.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, if there's anything else you'd like

Ms Panchenko to explain to you about this it's certainly not for me to tell your Ladyship not to ask questions about it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Well, Ms Panchenko, can we have up the "2001 total" tab, please. It's a bit difficult for me to check that the right one is on the screen. Yes, that's the right one on the screen now.

Do any of these payments relate to payments to Mr Berezovsky or Mr Patarkatsishvili in the year 2001?

A. I do apologise, it's hard for me without being able to scroll up or down to view the whole table. I think is --

MS DAVIES: My Lady, perhaps it might help if lines 120 and below were on the screen for Ms Panchenko.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, lines 120 and below, which refer to PRB and PRBR in relation to 2001. Can we have those there at the bottom?

A. Yes, I think that these payments are relevant to the mutual settlement with Mr Berezovsky, but I beg for your attention that this is only including August, up to August, it does not include the whole year. So, so to speak, one cannot conclude that these are annual payments, payments for the whole year.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay, thank you very much indeed.

Yes, thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: We will come back to that later, but for the moment can I just ask you this, Ms Panchenko. I want to ask you about the meeting between Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich at Cologne airport which was probably on 29 May 2001. You refer to this at paragraph 91 of your statement, that's page 187 in the English E2/07/187, 229 in the Russian E2/07/229.

As I understand your evidence, it is that you attended part of this meeting to present the payment options to Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich. Is that correct? It seems to be what you say at paragraph 92.

A. Yes, this is correct.

Q. And after you had presented those payment options to Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich, Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich -- I think something went wrong with the channels there.

THE INTERPRETER: Interpreter apologises, switched channels.

MR RABINOWITZ: Shall we take that again?

After you had presented the payment options to Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich, Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich then carried on their discussion in private. That's right, isn't it?

A. Yes, this is correct. I wasn't present for the whole of the meeting.

- Q. So after they had that private discussion Mr Abramovich told you how much it was agreed should be paid, and also what had been agreed in terms of the payment mechanics, is that right?
- A. They returned together. Ruslan Fomichev and myself were there and it was discussed, it was told to us that, yes, it will be done, and the mechanism was the only mechanism. The whole question was whether we pay in cash or whether we ought to buy securities and pay their remuneration in securities. And they returned together and told us about the decision, that the payment will be made in cash, and the first payment -- and it has to be started ASAP, basically tomorrow, almost tomorrow.
- Q. You don't, I think, claim to have a very good recollection of this meeting. You say:
- "I do not remember all the details of the meeting."
- Is that right?
- A. I remember why I was present there, why I was present in that meeting. I remember that Mr Fomichev and I, having discussed between ourselves, we needed the decision, we ourselves could not decide anything else other than receive confirmation from the principals. I recall that we were not in the territory, ie were flying en route somewhere, I remember that was Germany. Therefore in the first witness statement Mr Berezovsky said it was Munich Airport. For me, since we didn't leave the airport and go to town, and it was a business lounge for private flights where one could hold negotiations, for me it wasn't of high importance what city it was because we didn't leave and see the city.

I remember it was somewhere en route to another country.

- Q. That's very well, Ms Panchenko, but other than those details -- that there was this meeting, where you were on your way to, who was there -- you don't have a very clear recollection of all the details of the meeting. That's right, isn't it?
- A. Depending on which details, do you mean?
- Q. Well, let me be very clear. You say -- one of the things you say you do recall is that Mr Patarkatsishvili was very happy, and I suggest to you that you don't actually have any clear recollection of that at all.
- A. Mr Badri was quite a character, an unusual figure, and I didn't have much communication with him, and I would rather, probably, remember if he were not happy.
- Q. When you say here you have a recollection of him being happy, is this your conclusion from the fact that you don't remember him being not happy?
- MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think --
- A. It's quite difficult to judge the emotions of another person, but the fact that everyone parted on friendly terms, and we all understood that we have to continue work, and parties have come to an understanding that everything was quite friendly, that was for sure.

MR RABINOWITZ: You see, I suggest to you that the evidence that you give at paragraph 93, where you say Mr Patarkatsishvili was happy, is not really a recollection at all and this is just you trying to assist Mr Abramovich's case, is it not?

A. I am relaying my feelings and then I'm afraid this is your call.

Q. Now, at paragraph 49 of your witness statement, Ms Panchenko, you're dealing with aluminium assets. You'll find this at page 216 in the Russian E2/07/216, page 175 in the English E2/07/175. You are dealing here with aluminium assets, and you say here that at some point you received:

"... instructions from Mr Abramovich to prepare the necessary documentation to pay Mr Patarkatsishvili his commission for [assisting in the aluminium acquisitions]."

Now, we've looked at these commission agreements already with Mr Abramovich, Ms Panchenko, and I wasn't proposing to go through them once again with you. Presumably you don't dispute Mr Abramovich's evidence that those were produced, I think he said on 15 March 2000?

A. No. My feeling is that they were produced in February 2000. Yes, February 2000.

Q. So when Mr Abramovich said that he has a clear recollection of them being produced in -- sorry, you're quite right, in February 2000. I think Mr Abramovich's evidence was that they were produced on 15 February 2000, and that's your evidence as well, is it? That's to say after the master agreement was concluded?

A. I do not recall the exact date, I indeed have no recollection of the exact date, it's not linked to anything, but the fact that that was produced immediately after concluding the main agreement, ie on 14 February, we have known the final price in the additional agreement. And if to look at the commission, the formula of calculating the commission was produced by me and Natalie Khudyk, my employee, at my instruction.

So basically then you can work it back to the date.

Q. So at the time you produced these agreements, you knew the final price of the acquisition of these aluminium assets, is that right?

A. Yes, I did know the final price. The final price was in the memorandum of 14 February, in the appendix.

Q. Can you explain why you say these commission agreements were produced in a way which suggested that the final price was not known at the time these agreements were drawn up?

A. Even to make a bank transfer on that commission agreement, one cannot just write down: I, Mr So-and-so, or a company, I owe to a private individual $115 million.

Basically not a single bank would execute such a bank transfer. There was a specific deal.

Mr Abramovich explained to me that this is commission under the deal, and I called my employee Natalie Khudyk and we attempted to put that in writing, the subject of their agreement. And the objective was to pay, pay commission under these contracts, under these agreements.

Q. But those commission agreements, Ms Panchenko, contained provisions which were intended to give the impression, and did give the impression, that at the time those agreements were made you didn't know what the final price for the aluminium assets would be. That's right, isn't it?

A. There are such provisions in the agreements. I cannot say, for sure, whether I've met with Badri. That was the subject of my agreement with him, these complicated provisions. I think it's at the 4th -- sorry, I haven't got the document in front of me, I think it's the 4th and the 5th where he was -- he had to compensate the losses, if these are the ones you mean, the provisions you mean.

That was agreed with Badri but it was simply complicating the formula of the commission agreement.

Q. Why would you do that? Why was it necessary to do any of that given that you actually knew what the price was?

A. It wasn't for us, it was for him. He wanted it.

Q. Now, you tell us that you do not recall being told by Mr Abramovich or Mr Shvidler about the meeting at the Dorchester Hotel on 13 March 2000. Is that right?

A. I do not recall that meeting, only within the framework of this agreement. Now I know about it.

Q. I think it's common ground that you were not present at the Dorchester Hotel meeting yourself, that's right, isn't it?

A. Yes, that's correct. I was not present there.

Q. So you're not in a position to give any evidence really as to what happened at the Dorchester Hotel meeting, are you, Ms Panchenko?

A. No, I cannot give any evidence about the Dorchester meeting.

Q. At paragraph 63 of your witness statement E2/07/179, you say that it has been pointed out to you that some of the agreements under which the share transfers took place for the purposes of the merger with Mr Deripaska were governed by English law. And you tell us that you did not pay attention to applicable law, and that this was not the kind of provision that you would normally pay attention to. You say that this is the sort of matter you normally left to Mr Tenenbaum.

Can I just ask you to confirm this, Ms Panchenko. It's right, isn't it, that in the autumn of 1999, both you and Mr Tenenbaum travelled to Cyprus to discuss matters regarding the creation of an offshore structure and indeed trusts to hold Mr Abramovich's ownership interests in Sibneft?

A. Yes, this is correct. In autumn of 1999 we went to Cyprus with Mr Tenenbaum.

Q. You say:

"... we went to Cyprus with Mr Tenenbaum."

Who went to Cyprus with Mr Tenenbaum?

A. It was myself and Mr Tenenbaum.

Q. Right. We can see from documents that have been disclosed that shortly after that trip, in the autumn of 1999, the Sibneft shareholding was restructured so it was held by six offshore Cypriot companies, do you recall that, Ms Panchenko?

A. Yes, I remember that. I remember that there were Cyprriot companies.

Q. We've also seen from the documents that the restructuring was carried out by way of a number of contracts, I think there were 12, with six offshore Cyprriot companies, each of which was expressly governed by English law. Is that something that you recall being involved with, Ms Panchenko?

A. I was involved with this because a decision was made in the capacity -- because a decision was made to transfer shares into Cyprriot companies. Whether I paid any attention to English law? To be honest, I did not.

Q. Is that something that Mr Tenenbaum would have been more closely involved with than yourself?

A. Yes, Mr Tenenbaum dealt with lawyers more. Whether he dealt with this specifically, you could ask him perhaps.

Q. Now, it's common ground that two matters that were agreed at the Dorchester Hotel meeting were that Mr Abramovich would buy a plane for Mr Patarkatsishvili and that he would also arrange for the discharge of the $16 million or so debt that Mr Berezovsky owed to Mr Deripaska.

Just on this, can I ask you, please, to go back to the bolshoi balance and, in particular, the "FOM" table.

If someone could get it onscreen for you.

A. Okay.

Q. On this table, if you have it, under the month of June we can see towards the bottom of the table that a payment of $25 million appears to have been made. Do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see this.

Q. And if you look across to the left-hand column you can see that this is identified as "program F-ev". Would that be programme Fomichev, Ms Panchenko?

A. I could only make a guess, a supposition. That looks like -- the first letter looks like an F, and that's the first letter of the Fomichev name, and the two final letters of the same name. And I would not be able to assert this.

Q. But you see that it is -- that payment is coded as "PRB(A1)".

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What line are you on, please?

MR RABINOWITZ: Your Ladyship sees -- does your Ladyship have June, going down, June at the top, if your Ladyship goes down to below --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I see, I've got it.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm told it's cell 21. I'm looking at it in hard copy.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I've got it.

MR RABINOWITZ: Do you see that it's coded as "PRB(Al)",
Ms Panchenko?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. So it would appear that the payment had something to do with aluminium, is that right?

A. Maybe. All these payments that were not clear to me, all the abbreviations, I usually discussed with Mr Shvidler and he was abbreviating this. I would not be able to clarify what these letters would mean.
I could only hazard a guess that it was for the plane but I cannot confirm this.

Q. Would you accept that it is at least reasonably likely that where it says "Al", that is because it's to do with aluminium?

A. One could make such a supposition.

Q. And I think you have accepted that it's certainly possible that this payment was related to the plane for Mr Patarkatsishvili, is that right?

A. That could have had a relation to payment for the plane but I cannot assert with 100 per cent certainty having seen this information. This information is not sufficient.

Q. I follow.

I can tell you that it would appear from documents that have been disclosed that this did indeed relate to the acquisition by Mr Patarkatsishvili, through a company called Bili SA, of a plane from a company called TAG Aviation. I'm not going to take you through the documents relating to that, but you can, I think, see from the Fomichev table that we were looking at, if you go to the box at the bottom right-hand corner, cell R42, you see a reference there to a Bili plane?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. And that may assist on that.

Now, whilst we have this open, Ms Panchenko, do you see that on the Fomichev table there's another payment here that has a reference to "Al", aluminium, against it, and that's the entry for May 2000.

If you go down just before the green line representing the balance for PRB, so it's in cell number 17 below "May". Do you see that, $16,271,000, or 16.2 million?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. You tell us in your evidence that this payment was to discharge a debt owed by a Mr Berezovsky to Mr Deripaska. That's right, isn't it?

A. Yes, this is correct.

Q. And if we follow -- if you follow that line to the extreme left-hand side, do you see that it says "Payments set off against Al", do you see that,

Ms Panchenko?

Let me see it, cell A17. Can we get someone to scroll across? We need to get to A rather than C, to the left.

A. Yes, to the left. It starts from C on my screen, if someone could possibly scroll it to the left, if you could, please.

MAGNUM OPERATOR: It starts from C on ours also.

MR RABINOWITZ: That's because we need to scroll it across.

A. Okay.

Q. "Payments set off against A1".

A. Yes, I can see the Russian letters A1 and, as far as I recall, I looked at the table and it's quite likely the first sheet where mutual settlements with Mr Deripaska are discussed one can see the same amount. But he will not pay us that amount under the deal towards the mutual settlements.

Q. You're suggesting that the set-off here was a set-off in respect of amounts that Mr Deripaska would pay you?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. Can I suggest to you, Ms Panchenko, that this may be a payment that you're setting off against amounts that you would otherwise be paying to Mr Berezovsky?

A. Sorry, I did not understand the question, I beg your pardon.

Q. Isn't the Fomichev table intended to represent payments to and from, or at least to, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili?

A. Yes, this is the mutual settlement with them, settlements with them.

Q. And where you have the 16.271 item, which you say is going to be set off against A1, isn't that in fact a reference to the fact that you are going to set off against what you would otherwise pay Mr Berezovsky the sum of $16 million that you had paid to Mr Deripaska?

A. Mr Deripaska owed us money under a deal. Mr Deripaska paid less under the deal and this is the amount that was the shortfall because these expenses were pertaining to Mr Berezovsky, therefore they got into this table.

So, as one can see from these proceedings, Mr Berezovsky owed Mr Deripaska and, therefore, Mr Deripaska got his -- the money he was owed, he got the money he was owed back, the money that was owed to him by Mr Berezovsky.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, that may be a convenient moment.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. Do you want to start tomorrow at 10.15?

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm very happy to start at 10.15.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is that all right for you, Mr Sumption?

MR SUMPTION: Entirely.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Ms Panchenko, do you understand you mustn't talk about the case or your evidence with anybody, do you understand that?

A. Yes, I do.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. 10.15.

(10.15 am)

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, can I give your Ladyship an update on Mr Bulygin's position that your Ladyship asked for.

Mr Bulygin is having significant surgery next week and is not in a position to travel in advance of the surgery. After the operation, he will need a period of recuperation. His present view is that he should be able to give evidence in person on 15 December. That, of course, is not written in stone and if it turns out to involve wasting considerable time waiting for him before we get on to the next stage of the trial, we will obviously have to review the possibility of putting in his evidence as a hearsay statement in the light of his state of health. But that's the present position.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. So basically playing it by ear?

MR SUMPTION: Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well.

MS IRENA PANCHENKO (continued)

MR RABINOWITZ: Good morning, Ms Panchenko.

A. Good morning.

Q. Can I ask you, please, to go back to the bolshoi balance again. If it can be opened for you, I want to look at the "FOM" tab. Can I just ask you to help me with this, please, the first green row, row 19, gives the sub-total for payments described as "PRB", is that right?

A. Yes, yes, I can see that.

Q. And then the second green row, row 24, gives the sub-total for payments described as "PRBR", do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. If I can ask you then to look at the bottom right of the table, it's in cell R31, do you see the total appears to be made up of three sub-totals: "PRB", "PRBR" plus "EL"?

A. Are you speaking about the 490 million amount?

Q. 490 million, yes. Do you see the reference to "EL" there?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. Can you explain, please, what EL is?

A. Unfortunately, I cannot assist you in this. All the acronyms, the abbreviations, were provided to me by Mr Shvidler and I have no ideas about that.

Q. Are you able to explain why the "EL" sub-total has been apparently removed from this "FOM" tab?

A. What I can see is that "FOM" only repeats the two sub-totals, subsections from the "Total" table, on the first page of this file.

Q. But it does look as if at some stage there was included in this something for EL, that's why one gets the total "PRB + PRBR + EL", correct?

A. I'm afraid I cannot assist you on this because I can see what you can see in this spreadsheet and that's all.

I work with finance, there are thousands of tables and spreadsheets that I handle, and I cannot affirm that it had been taken out, or something had been taken out or withdrawn by some employees.

Q. And can you answer this: would it be reasonable to assume that this was a modification made after you looked at this document in November 2010 or can you not say?

A. This is excluded, this cannot be. So far as I understand, so far as the procedure is concerned, once electronic copies have been found they are handed over to the lawyers and they are what they are and they are in the condition in which they are -- in which they are.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is the metadata agreed in relation to this document?

THE INTERPRETER: I'm so sorry, my Lady, I could not hear you, unfortunately.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is the metadata agreed in relation to this document?

MR RABINOWITZ: The metadata suggests, I think, that it was produced on 4 July 2000 -- created on 4 July 2000.

There is a curious entry which I think suggests it was last opened or modified in 2011 -- sorry, saved in 2011, but that may well be the lawyers trying to work out what it was. So we're not taking a point on that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Fine, okay. Thank you.

MS DAVIES: My Lady, that has been explained in correspondence. The date in 2011 is when it was opened by Skadden.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, okay. Metadata can be confusing and is not necessarily always telling the story as one might think it, that's all. As long as there's no dispute about what the document shows.

MR RABINOWITZ: No.

Now, Ms Panchenko, I want to just briefly deal with the Rusal sales with you.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Sorry, just before you leave the document, is Bili a shortening for Mr Patarkatsishvili?

It's a question for you.

MR RABINOWITZ: Do you know the answer to that?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: If you look at the box in row R at line 42, it says "Bili (Plane)".

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady --

A. I am afraid I do not know exactly what company that was but yesterday I think it was explained that it was Mr Badri's company and it had something to do with air planes. There may well be some documents on that.

Mr Rabinowitz yesterday I think mentioned there were some documents to that effect but I cannot affirm this with certainty.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, I can tell you that Bili is short for Badri --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Patarkatsishvili?

MR RABINOWITZ: Well, I think it's got his wife and children's names in it. But Bili SA is a company which was obviously used by Mr Patarkatsishvili for the purposes of acquiring the plane, and there are documents to that effect.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: Again, just back to the Rusal sales, and you tell us in your witness statement, I think this is at paragraph 111 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just remind me which bundle, please?

MR RABINOWITZ: Sorry, it's E2, tab 7, paragraph 111. Your Ladyship will find at page 194 in the English E2/07/194. Ms Panchenko, you'll find it at 235 in the Russian E2/07/235.

You explain at paragraph 111 that you don't recall the details of the first Rusal sale agreement in September 2003, and your evidence in effect involves going through the documents and commenting on the documents. Is that right?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. Since I have been through that with Mr Abramovich, and can go through it again with Mr Tenenbaum who I think you say was more directly involved with this, I'm not proposing to ask you detailed questions about it.

You do say at paragraph 119 though, at page 196 of the English E2/07/196, 219 of the Russian E2/07/219, that you are:

"... not aware that Mr Abramovich or anyone in his team consulted Mr Berezovsky or Mr Patarkatsishvili over these transactions."

That's common ground. And you say:

"As [you] have already indicated, as far as [you were] aware there was no agreement requiring him to do so."

Of course, we've already established that you were not in fact at the Dorchester Hotel meeting on 13 March 2000, were you, Ms Panchenko?

A. That is correct. I did not attend, I was not in attendance.

Q. And as far as you recall, you were not told by Mr Abramovich or Mr Shvidler about the Dorchester Hotel meeting, were you? That's what you tell us at paragraph 59 of your witness statement.

A. That is correct, yes.

Q. Very well. What I want then to do is to move on to the second Rusal sale which took place the following year. Again, as I understand it, although you were part of a working group involved with this, you say that the legal issues were primarily dealt with by Mr De Cort and by Mr Tenenbaum, is that right?

A. Yes, mainly. So far as legal matters are concerned, I did take part in the parties' discussions, but all the legal matters were being handled by Mr De Cort and Mr Tenenbaum.

Q. Well, I've been through the parties' discussions with Mr Abramovich and I'm not going to go through them again with you.

Can I just ask you about this. Can you please go to bundle H(A)76, page 57 in the English H(A)76/57 or 51 in the Russian H(A)76/51.

You should see there a draft letter which we can see from the following pages was drafted by lawyers in order for it to be sent by Mr Streshinsky, I think it is, "IS", do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. We know that this letter was sent via email by Mr Streshinsky to Ms Khudyk on 17 June 2004. That's Mr Streshinsky's evidence at paragraph 86. I'm not asking you to turn to that up.

But just looking at this letter, Ms Panchenko, we can see that Mr Streshinsky wrote to Ms Khudyk:

"Dear Sirs,

"As discussed over the phone, in order to meet the representations that you previously made to the banks, please find below an alternative structure."

This suggests, does it not, that there had been a telephone conversation at around this time and that someone had said that because of representations previously made to banks, the structure of the transaction would have to change? Do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. I wonder if you can help us with this, Ms Panchenko, was it you with whom the telephone conversation had taken place?

A. I do not recall exactly that the telephone conversation had taken place but, having reviewed these documents, I do believe that most probably that was me.

Q. And can you tell us what it was you had said about representations previously made to banks then?

A. I believe that -- and again I'm reconstructing on the basis of documents -- I believe that 16 June I met most probably or maybe spoke over the phone with Mr Streshinsky and I explained that I had been instructed by Mr Abramovich to make a payment to Badri in a specific amount, and this is a financial liability, it's a financial obligation. In the morning of the 17th, Ivan Streshinsky, so far as I can judge from the document, sent his understanding of the structure of the transaction. And after I read it, together with Mrs Khudyk -- I cannot tell you now, I think I read it or maybe I read it -- most probably I called, I called Mr Streshinsky on the phone and I told him that he had misunderstood all our conversations, we only had financial obligations.

After that conversation with me, as one of the arguments, because I was the financial director of Rusal, or Russkiy Alyuminiy Management later on, I said even if we had wanted to give them a helping hand, the outside world, all the banks -- including the banks, do know after all that we do own 25 per cent.

- Q. Well, you say that in the conversation you said to Mr Streshinsky that he had misunderstood the position, and the reason you're saying that is because Mr Streshinsky was proceeding on the basis that Mr Patarkatsishvili and indeed Mr Berezovsky had a beneficial interest in these shares. Is that right?
- A. I really do not know what Mr Streshinsky proceeded on. At that time he was Mr Anisimov's employee and I was explaining our side's position.

Q. But so far as Mr Streshinsky is recorded as saying anything, it is not that you told him he had misunderstood the position but rather that you had told him that, as a result of representations you had previously made to banks, the structure of the transaction needed to change. That's what he records in the first part of this letter, Ms Panchenko.

A. I beg to differ. I disagree with your statement. The reference to the banks, most probably, was just one of the arguments.

Q. You beg to differ, but I would suggest it's clear from this that that's certainly how Mr Streshinsky understood you. Would you accept that at least?

A. Well, I read this phrase the way everyone reads this phrase and I can only see what this sentence says.

Q. Very well. Can we just look at what else Mr Streshinsky is saying in this letter, following the conversation with you, you think. Look at part 1 of this:

"BP ..."

Presumably that's Badri Patarkatsishvili, is it?

A. Well, these two letters are most likely the initials, Badri Patarkatsishvili.

Q. "... and B (a company with B as the sole shareholder)..."

That would be Mr Berezovsky, would it not?

- A. Well, the way I understand it, on a review of the documents, this company most probably was Mr Badri's company, the way I understand it.
- Q. If "BP" is Mr Patarkatsishvili, then "B" must be someone other than Mr Patarkatsishvili, B being the sole shareholder of a company, B.
- A. Well, the way I understand it, it's not the way it is, because Mr Anisimov's party, be it an individual or be it a company with Badri as the beneficiary, my understanding is that it means the same thing. Because I have never seen any documents that would say that this was Mr Berezovsky.
- Q. Well, Ms Panchenko, it looks as if BP and B are two different people because it says:

"BP (an individual) and B (a company with B as the sole shareholder) ..."

But can I ask you this: look at point 1, just below that then, what Mr Streshinsky is envisaging, following this conversation with you, is that there would be a document in which:

"The parties acknowledge that according to the agreements dated 10 February 2000 and 15 March 2000..."

And the 10 February agreement is the master agreement by which the aluminium assets were originally acquired, the 15 March agreement is obviously the agreement that was made with Mr Deripaska.

"The parties acknowledge that according to the agreements dated 10 February 2000 and 15 March 2000 and oral and other arrangements, BP and B participated in the sale of shares of KrAZ, BAZ, Krasnoyarsk Hydroelectric Power Station and Achinsk Alumina Refinery and also in the establishment and capitalisation of R Holding [and that would be a reference to Rusal Holding] and at the time of the establishment of R Holding, M undertook to pay to BP and B the amounts equal to those received as income on 25% of shares in [Rusal Holdings], including dividends payable on such 25% of shares [and/or] amounts/assets received from any sale of ... 25% of shares ..."

The point which is being stressed here is that it was:

"... solely a right in personam rather than a trust or a right in rem -- a lawyer's comments."

Now, that appears to be what Mr Streshinsky has taken away from a conversation that you say he had with you. Is that right?

- A. Well, I can only conclude that, if this is what Mr Streshinsky wrote down, this is the way he understood it. But I do recall that, in the course of our conversation, I made it very clear I understood that we only have financial liabilities, financial obligations vis-a-vis Badri that we have to make a payment, and this is related to this whole aluminium deal, and because we discussed with him that the whole amount could not be -- I mean 450 million was in excess of the amount of the compensation that had -- we discussed in principle that the balance would most probably be paid and described or called a dividend because there was no other way in which they could receive those funds otherwise.

- Q. You see, what it appears Mr Streshinsky has understood you to be saying in this conversation is that: whatever you do, do not create a document which suggests these people have an in personam, a right in the shares themselves, 25 per cent of the shares, because that would be inconsistent with representations made to banks, but there should be an acknowledgement that they should be treated effectively as if they were in the same financial position as if they had a right in those 25 per cent of the shares, both to dividends in relation to those shares and indeed to any proceeds of the sale of those shares.

I suggest to you that that can only have been because of what you said to Mr Streshinsky.

- A. It's really very long and I'm not sure what specifically question I'm expected to answer.

I can only reaffirm again that Mr Streshinsky could have only understood from me, and that was the case, in actual fact, that we had $585 million worth of financial obligations vis-a-vis Badri and that was with respect to the role that he had played in the acquisition of the aluminium assets.

- Q. Well, just on that 585 million worth of financial obligations, Ms Panchenko, we know because we talked about it yesterday that the commission agreements, assuming for the moment that these were genuine agreements, provided only that Mr Patarkatsishvili would get $115 million, did they not?
- A. The commission contract executed in February 2000 did provide for about $115 million worth of compensation.
- Q. And that certainly doesn't get you to what you say were 585 million worth of financial obligations. It's about $470 million out, is it not?
- A. Yes, it's a different amount, but that was Mr Abramovich's personal matter and it was a question of his relationships, it was a question of his money, and I do not have any comments that I could make on my own on this.
- Q. Well, I've already suggested to Mr Abramovich that the suggestion that, following commission agreements of $115 million, he agreed to pay commission of $585 million was simply untrue, but I have to suggest the same point to you, Ms Panchenko. Do you want to comment on that?

A. No, I have no comment. There is nothing for me to comment on.

MR RABINOWITZ: Thank you, Ms Panchenko. I've got no further questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

Cross-examination by MR MALEK

MR MALEK: My Lady, I've got one question arising out of what we've just heard.

Ms Panchenko, could you please turn to F1, tab 2 at page 87. Sorry, it's F1, tab 2, at page 77 F1/02/77, and I'd like you to look at paragraph 87.

Now, unfortunately we do not have the Russian text but you will see above in English an extract from the document that you've just been looking at with Mr Rabinowitz.

Do you have the passage in front of you? It's at H(A), volume 76, at page 57 H(A)/76/57.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Whose witness statement are we looking at?

MR MALEK: Mr Streshinsky's, my Lady.

I wonder, since we do not have the Russian text, whether somebody could give Ms Panchenko a translation of paragraph 87 which starts "My reference to BP". If we're looking at the numbering, it's F1/02, page 77, and you should have paragraph 87.

What I've requested is a translation to Ms Panchenko of paragraph 87.

THE INTERPRETER: My Lady, what Ms Panchenko is saying to the other interpreter is that she would like to see the Russian text of the previous document to which paragraph 87 is making reference.

A. I was shown a document in Russian, it used to be in Russian, and then it was taken away. So I'd like to have sight of this again -- thank you very much, I now have it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Good.

(Pause)

A. Right.

MR MALEK: My question, Ms Panchenko, is this,

Mr Streshinsky in the penultimate sentence says:

"The reference to the 'sole shareholder B', of Company B in my email is a typographical error."

Do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. And it was suggested to you by Mr Rabinowitz that the reference to "sole shareholder B" was Mr Berezovsky, do you recall that?

A. Yes, I recall what Mr Rabinowitz said.

Q. Was there any discussion in your conversation to Mr Berezovsky in this document that you were looking at a moment ago?

THE INTERPRETER: I'm so sorry, Mr Malek, could you kindly repeat your question. This is the interpreter speaking. My apologies.

MR MALEK: My question is, in the telephone conversation that we've just been discussing, or rather you've been discussing with Mr Rabinowitz, was there any reference to Mr Berezovsky, as far as you can recall?

A. No, he was never referenced, he was never mentioned.

Q. And do you have any observation on whether or not the reference to the sole shareholder of B was in fact a typographical error?

A. I have no ideas about that, no observations. My understanding was that Mr Anisimov and Mr Streshinsky, who was his employee, represented Badri, and at that time, or now for that matter, I did not have any other understanding of that.

MR MALEK: I've no further questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, thank you.

MR ADKIN: No questions, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Ms Davies?

Re-examination by MS DAVIES

MS DAVIES: My Lady, just one matter for which it would be useful for you to have the transcript from yesterday afternoon, Day 26, which I understand is available in Russian.

Put the other files away. If you could turn to page 120 in the transcript from yesterday afternoon, Day 26. Just to explain the context, Ms Panchenko, this was in the course of your cross-examination by Mr Rabinowitz when he was asking you about the contracts by which the promissory notes were sold to Pennand and Tiberius.

MR RABINOWITZ: I hesitate to rise but we don't have a copy of the Russian language transcript. I wonder if we could be given a copy.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can the page be given, please?

MS DAVIES: I'm just trying to ascertain whether we have a Russian copy. It's page 120 in the English transcript.

MR RABINOWITZ: I follow, but if it's going to be a point which depends on the Russian --

MS DAVIES: No, this doesn't.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, we can always come back to it if necessary.

MS DAVIES: You were being asked about the contracts by which the promissory notes were sold to Pennand and Tiberius and what had been said in Mr Mitchard's third witness statement on that issue following conversations with you; you recall that exchange, those exchanges you had?

A. (Untranslated).

Q. If you look at the bottom of page 120, you see a question from Mr Rabinowitz starting.

"Those are the same contracts ..."

And he's there referring to contracts referred to by Mr Marino in his witness statement. Do you see that question:

"Those are the same contracts, I think, that you've subsequently referred to in your witness statement ..."

Can you find that on page 120, Ms Panchenko?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. If you read on in your answer, you say:

"Now I do understand that most probably those were the same, the very same contracts. However, at that time, when Mr Mitchard showed me the contracts with the names of Tiberius and Pennand, and the sale and purchase of promissory notes, they did not say to me that somehow it was related to Mr Berezovsky or with the mutual settlements with Mr Abramovich.

"I could perhaps clarify why I now remember this, why -- or it's rather a reconstruction on my part."

And then Mr Rabinowitz went off on another issue.

Could you please explain why you now remember this or why it's a reconstruction on your part?

- A. When the so-called bolshoi balance document was found, in the Fomichev table I found the names of those companies and -- because, based on the reconstruction of -- from that table, it was clear that those were payments to Mr Berezovsky.

Then in line number 8 of the "FOM" table, I saw the names of those companies, so I collated, I compared those two facts and only then did I establish that these two were somehow related.

- Q. Roughly how many companies in total did you use for the purposes of making payments using promissory notes over the years?

- A. On the whole, totally, with -- in terms of all the mutual settlements, or with Mr Berezovsky only?

- Q. In total, whole.

- A. Very many really and, unfortunately -- I don't know really. Well, very many, very many.

MS DAVIES: Thank you very much, Ms Panchenko.

My Lady, there is one other matter arising out of the cross-examination which isn't a matter for re-examination. If I could just raise it very quickly in relation to the "FOM" schedule.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MS DAVIES: My learned friend put a series of questions to Ms Panchenko based on the premise that some information had been removed from the "FOM" schedule, and indeed at one point suggested it had been removed since the document had been harvested in November. It's not entirely clear to us on what basis those questions were put.

Two points I would just like to make in relation to that. Firstly, the totals in line 31, if my Lady looks at them, are in each case a total of the figures that one sees at lines 19 and 24. And secondly, the metadata that came to light last week for the clean form of this document, and the form of the document that was disclosed with the clean metadata, is an identical -- produces a "FOM" schedule that is in identical terms to the "FOM" schedule that we have on the screen.

So we would -- if that line is to be pursued, we would like it clarified in terms of on what basis it is suggested material has been removed.

MR RABINOWITZ: I thought I was very clear about this.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I thought you had made it clear, that you're not suggesting there's been any tinkering about.

MR RABINOWITZ: It was a question -- I have to say, we don't have the date for the last modification of the

"FOM" schedule so that is outstanding. But the point -- in fact I put it on the basis of a question because your Ladyship sees -- I think it's line 31, I don't have the cells here -- there is a reference to "+ EL", your Ladyship sees, it's "PRB + PRBR + EL". One doesn't find "EL" in the table, and that was the basis of the question, to ask whether this had been removed, because it's neither apparent to us what EL is or whether it did originally exist here.

Now, it wasn't an assumption made, it was a question arising from the fact that there is an "EL" here but you don't find it in the "FOM" table, and I'm sorry if I wasn't clear in my question.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What, you don't find it in the --

MR RABINOWITZ: I think there is a reference to EL somewhere else but not in the "FOM" table, and as I understood what was being said, the figures here were figures dealing with the "FOM" table, the totals that one was getting on this page.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But if you look, for example, in R, "Total PRB + PRBR + EL", the totals that then follow after that are just adding the columns, vertical columns, in U and V, aren't they?

MR RABINOWITZ: You get -- that still leaves unexplained what the reference to EL is though, or whether there was an amount for EL and what has become of it and whether it was part of this "FOM" table.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, EL has got to be some sort of product, hasn't it, of columns U and V?

MR RABINOWITZ: Well, I can only say I don't know, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Where is EL elsewhere in these various spreadsheets?

MR RABINOWITZ: If your Ladyship goes to the "payments" tab.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: "Payments", not "summary payments".

MR RABINOWITZ: "Payments". And if your Ladyship goes to row 43, there's a total of 26,892,802 for EL. Then it pops up again on the -- I don't know whether your Ladyship has that?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I've got "EL" in line 43.

MR RABINOWITZ: Then one sees it again on the "FOM" table --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: In cell C.

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed. And your Ladyship sees a total going across with two figures for it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, so your question to Ms Panchenko is what is EL?

MR RABINOWITZ: What is EL? Was it part of the "FOM" table? Why don't we see a figure for EL on the "FOM" table? It really was a question because we do not know.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That's got nothing to do with later annotations to the document, has it?

MR RABINOWITZ: Well, I don't know because it may have been that there was something for EL on the "FOM" table and the cell was removed.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, but if you look at the "FOM" table, the description for "+ EL total" is looking -- it's just adding up 273 and 27 million, isn't it?

I mean, I haven't done the arithmetic, but that's what I'm assuming, and likewise it's adding up 354 plus 382.

MR RABINOWITZ: I think what we will do, my Lady, rather than take up time now, is do the maths and see if it is just the total of those figures, or whether --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, or maybe it's -- I don't know.

But Ms Panchenko, having now looked at the reference to EL in the payment schedule, can you shed any light on what EL is referring to?

A. I'm afraid I have no recollection with respect to this. I just explained that the acronyms were provided by Mr Shvidler and, I'm so sorry, I cannot be of any assistance on this.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can I put a specific question so that your Ladyship knows what we think it might be?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

Further cross-examination by MR RABINOWITZ

MR RABINOWITZ: Might this has been a reference to election expenses?

A. Is this a question for me?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, it is.

A. I don't know.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, you can't help us.

Mr Rabinowitz, if it is important, Mr Shvidler is around and no doubt he can be asked.

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed, or perhaps someone could just write us and tell us what they say it is and we can see on the basis of that whether we think anyone needs to be recalled to deal with it. I'd hoped Ms Panchenko would deal with it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Ms Davies, can we deal with it on that basis?

MS DAVIES: Of course, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. I have no further questions.

Thank you very much indeed, Ms Panchenko, for coming along to give your evidence.

A. Thank you.

(The witness withdrew)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Sumption.

MR SUMPTION: Ms Davies will call the next witness.

Sorry, I've got my witnesses in the wrong order.

I call Ms Goncharova.

MS MARINA GONCHAROVA (affirmed)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Please sit down, Ms Goncharova.

Examination-in-chief by MR SUMPTION

MR SUMPTION: Ms Goncharova, you've made two witness statements for use in this trial and I'd like you to be given, please, bundles E2 and E4. E2, flag 5 should be your first statement, is that right E2/05/87?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. And have you got in front of you, or can you be given, a list of corrections that you wish to make to that statement?

Does your Ladyship have this?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No. (Handed)

Thanks very much.

MR SUMPTION: Now, are these corrections and additions that you wish to make to your first statement?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. Subject to those corrections and additions, is your first statement true?

A. Yes, they are.

Q. Could I please ask you, in bundle E4, to turn to flag 2 E4/02/16. Is this your second statement, Ms Goncharova? You find your signature I think --

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. Is that your signature on page 28 of the Russian version?

A. Yes, this is my signature.

Q. And is that statement also true?

A. Yes, certainly.

MR SUMPTION: Thank you very much. If you would wait, some questions will be asked of you.

Cross-examination by MR GILLIS

MR GILLIS: Good morning, Ms Goncharova.

A. Good morning.

Q. I understand you have worked with Mr Abramovich since 1988, is that correct?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. And from May 1991 until May 1993 you worked as an accountant for Mr Abramovich's company AVK, is that correct?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. And then from 1997 until 2006 you worked for Sibneft?

A. Yes, not for Sibneft though but for the Moscow branch. Sibneft was in Omsk and the rep office, the Moscow branch of the company, was in Moscow.

Q. I think you describe that at paragraph 6, that you were in charge of the Moscow office?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. If I could ask you to look at paragraph 12 of your witness statement, which we have in the Russian at E2, tab 5 at page 100 E2/05/100 and in the English at page 90 E2/05/90, do you have paragraph 12?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. You say there that:

"Mr Abramovich passed ... invoices to [you], and not directly to the accountants in the Russian trading companies [and that that was] for a number of reasons."

Can you see that?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. And the first reason you give is that Mr Abramovich and you had been working together for a long time and you were his trusted person who reported directly to him, is that correct?

A. Yes. That is so.

Q. And would it be fair to assume that, 15 years later, the trust which Mr Abramovich has in you has not diminished?

A. Well, I believe that that question should be asked to Mr Abramovich, not of me. I don't think it has diminished.

Q. And would you say that Mr Abramovich has treated you well over the years?

A. I think so, yes.

Q. And I think you've indicated you're now the deputy general director of Millhouse LLC, is that correct?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. And would you say that you are loyal to Mr Abramovich?

A. I think it would be wrong to say that I'm disloyal.

I do work together with Mr Abramovich, I've worked with him since 1988. We have enjoyed a proper relationship and I think that, yes, I'm loyal.

Q. Thank you. Could I ask you now to look at paragraph 8 of your first witness statement which we have in the English at page 89 and in the Russian at 99. You explain there in the first sentence that you have been asked to comment on payments that you say you arranged for Mr Abramovich's companies to make to third parties between 1995 and 2000. Do you see that?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. And then if I can ask you to look at paragraph 19 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That's in the new, isn't it?

MR GILLIS: This is one of the paragraphs that's been corrected, yes, my Lady.

Is this correct, you originally said that you dealt with these payments from late -- sorry, you have the correction, do you? In the original version you said that you had dealt with these payments from late 1995 until early 2000, but by the corrections and the additions you've now changed that so that it reads from early 1995 until late 2000. Is that correct?

A. No, this is not correct. The first time we met with Paul in 2009, my evidence said the same thing, that I had been handling those payments from early 1995 until late 2000 and here, in the course of translation, maybe some mistake was made. And when I signed my statement, I did not pay attention to that and it was only later that I actually saw this.

- Q. But I'll come to the specific dates in a moment, but just to clarify, the change that you have made to paragraph 19 is to change from late 1995 to early 1995. Do you agree you've made that change?
- A. Yes, the correct date is early 1995 and the major part -- maybe not until the end of the year 2000, but the major part of 2000, maybe until October, I would say. After that, Mr (sic) Panchenko started handling those payments.
- Q. You've changed the witness statement, that's correct, isn't it? You say it's justified but just at this stage you've changed the witness statement?
- A. I did not make changes to my witness statement. Let me reiterate that. In 2009, when I was meeting with Paul and I was giving him my first evidence, that what clearly said that I had been handling those payments since early 1995.
- Q. All right. Can we just look at the payments you say you've made and we'll come back to the question of dates in a little while.

At paragraph 20 of your witness statement you indicated initially that you -- and we have this at page 93 E2/05/93 in the English and page 103 E2/05/103 in the Russian. At paragraph 20 you said that you kept lists of the payments approved and made. Is that correct?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. And in your latest corrections and additions, you've now added that these were kept in a bound notebook. Is that correct?

A. That is correct. That was the way it was originally. So when Skadden lawyers asked me how this was being done, I explained to them in a very detailed manner that Roman Arkadievich gave me the documents with all the details and they were stored in the accounting department of the trading companies, and I made entries in the ledgers that on such and such date I made such and such payments.

Q. When do you say you first remembered you kept these lists in bound notebooks?

THE INTERPRETER: I'm so sorry, Mr Gillis, could you kindly repeat that?

MR GILLIS: When you do you say you first remembered that you kept these lists in bound notebooks?

- A. I did not recall that. I had always had them in that form and I could not but remember that.
- Q. Is there any good reason why you did not refer to this when you first made your statement in these proceedings for the trial on 30 May 2011?
- A. There were no reasons for that. As I mentioned, I don't know why the lawyers did not record what I had been telling them, but from the very start this is something that I had been mentioning to them, that this was the way it was. All the documents were kept, the records were kept in the trading companies that were making those payments, and I had a ledger, a book, where I recorded all those items.
- Q. When you saw that your statement made no reference to these notebooks, why did you not correct it if you say that you had told the lawyers that that is how it was done?
- A. Well, I did not believe it was a material -- it was of material importance.
- Q. You didn't regard it as material how records were kept in relation to the payments that were being made to Mr Berezovsky?
- A. Well, let me reiterate if I may, the records were kept by the account departments of the trading companies, and for my purposes and for those of Mr Abramovich I was --

I had a book, a ledger, where I recorded the dates and the amounts in terms of the payments that we had made to people or we had handed over in the form of hard cash.

Q. All right. Now, you say -- and we're still looking at paragraph 20 E2/05/93.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: In the corrected version?

MR GILLIS: In the corrected version. You say you kept the lists as manuscripts, and then you go on to say:

"... I did not use a computer at work during this period."

And again you've now added "for these purposes". Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. So can you help me with this: were you instructed not to use a computer to record these payments? Or was that your own decision?

A. It was my own decision because it was not my main job and main principal work. Of course I did use computers throughout the time. Because Roman Arkadievich did not know how long those payments were going to continue and how important it was, I decided that at a certain point in time, when Roman asks me about that, I will simply show him that book and I will show him those payments. I did not enter that into any computers, nor did I create any spreadsheets or tables.

- Q. But we can see from what you say in paragraph 19 that these payments became very substantial indeed, is that correct?
- A. For me, they had even originally been quite substantial but, as time went by, I sort of got used to that.
- Q. And yet, despite the fact that they were substantial payments, are you really saying that you by yourself and without any instruction from anybody else decided that you would not make computer records of these payments?
- A. Absolutely, that is correct.
- Q. Can you explain to me again what you say was the justification for not making computer records of these payments which were running to many, many millions of dollars?
- A. My Lady, no one asked me to keep those records. Roman Arkadievich told me what the objective of the payment was and I had passed it on to the trading companies for payment. If I had been told originally that this is something that needed to be done then I would have certainly created a table and I would have been keeping records in a table.
- Q. But would it not have been standard form to keep computer records of the payments that you were instructing the accountants of the trading companies to make so that you could explain to Mr Abramovich exactly what the payments were?

- A. Yes, of course, it was recorded because there were several, more than one trading companies, and, of course, it did go to the accounting department because those payments were --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Slow down, slow down.

- A. -- made officially, they went through banks, and all the payments obviously were kept in the accounting department and, if need be, in case Roman Arkadievich wanted that or someone asked him about that, at any point in time, that could be seen in the accounting department of the trading company that was actually handling and making the payment.

MR GILLIS: So are you saying that the accountants who were making the payments were keeping computer records?

- A. Yes, of course.

Q. Now, when you passed invoices or requests for payments to the accountants of the Russian companies, did you tell them how they should enter these payments into the companies' accounts?

- A. Of course not, and I could not tell them how to do that. I gave them the payments, including the objective, the purpose of the payment, and they made the payment in the form which was most appropriate to them and more comfortable for them.

Q. You said just a moment ago that Roman told you what were the objects of the payments that were being made. What did he say were the objects of the payments?

A. I did not say "object" because the -- there were different objectives for different payment instructions, and so what Roman Arkadievich gave me were requests for payment, and it said -- and the objective of the payment each time was different.

Q. But when you described the objective of a cash payment, what description were you being given?

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, I think that the word in Russian may have been "addressee", not "object".

THE INTERPRETER: Can I -- my Lady, can I ask for clarification because it may or may not be the case.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

Can we have the page number, please, Mr Gillis, that you're referring to.

MR GILLIS: I think it's [draft] page 33 at lines 18 to 21.

A. What the objective of the payment is --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just a second. Be quiet, please.

MR GILLIS: So the transcript reads at [draft] line 18:

"My Lady, no one asked me to keep those records. Roman [Abramovich] told me what the object of the payment was and I had passed it on to the trading companies for payment."

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Could we have a translation please, Mr Translator, if you've got the audio recording of what was said at page 18. If you haven't, I'll ask Mr Gillis to ask the question again.

THE INTERPRETER: My Lady, with your indulgence, the problem is that this term is a very specific term of art and it may have several different meanings and, with your permission, I would just like to ask a question of the witness to clarify exactly what she meant in Russian, because it's a rather -- it's a rather vague term, it may have several meanings.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay.

THE INTERPRETER: It may mean the person or it may mean an activity that the payment is being made in consideration of, if you see what I mean.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think that would be sensible, Mr Gillis.

MR GILLIS: Certainly. I'm content with that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: If you could ask the question.

THE INTERPRETER: I can ask the question. (Pause)

My Lady, what I have asked the witness is: could you kindly clarify what the word "purpose" or "objective" of the payment means, does this mean a person or does this mean an activity or an action or a thing?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

Yes, give your answer, please.

- A. Well, the purpose, the objective of the payment is that if we made a payment for ORT to a third party because there had been ...

THE INTERPRETER: I'm sorry, this is a very important matter and I'm asking the witness to be very, very slow and very, very precise.

- A. So as a rule, so far as ORT was concerned, we made payments to third parties, ie for instance to VID, it's a television company. We made payments for various TV services and that was called the objective of the payment or the purpose of the payment. Or another example, we made payments to Mosenergo, it's a utility company, for the electricity, for power supply. So that was the objective, the purpose, of making the payment.

MR GILLIS: Can I ask you this: when you say you were making a cash payment to, for instance, Club Logovaz, what do you say was the object of that payment?

- A. Well, you know, I myself did not deal with this. This was something that was handled by the accounting department, by the accountant of the specific trading company. What I only did was that I set them an objective; for instance, today, for Club Logovaz, for ORT or some other entities, we have to pay this or this or this. Or, for instance, I need such and such an amount of money for such and such specific date.

So that was the bulk of the principal work that I did.

- Q. But did the accountants in the Russian companies never ask you what these payments were in relation to?
- A. No, the accountants for those companies never asked me questions. They knew that these were not my payments, that they come from above. They knew that I was a person of trust of Roman Arkadievich and that I was in charge of the general administration of all the companies, and so they never asked that kind of question. Such questions never arose.
- Q. If you were simply telling the accountants for the Russian companies that they were to make a cash payment to, for instance, the Logovaz Club, do you know how they would have then entered that in the companies' accounts?
- A. I'm afraid I cannot answer that question, I simply do not know. Maybe for some other needs they received those funds, that money in the bank for their needs.
- Q. Now, I think you indicate in your statement that, having passed the invoices, where there were invoices, to the accountants for payment, I'd like to ask what happened then. Did you then take the invoices back when they had been paid?
- A. Yes, I took a copy of the payment instruction and I filed them in my folder, and also I made a record in the ledger that on such and such date payment was made for, say, Logovaz or ORT. Or we made some cash available at Badri's instruction and made it available to such and such entity or individual.

Q. So are you saying the original invoice would have been left with the accountants from the trading companies?

A. Yes, that is correct.

MR GILLIS: My Lady, I think I'll be about another 15 minutes if that would be a convenient moment?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. I'll take the break.

You're not to speak to anybody about your evidence over the break or about the case, do you understand?

A. Certainly, my Lady.

(11.30 am)

(A short break)

(11.47 am)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Gillis.

MR GILLIS: Ms Goncharova, in paragraph 20 of your corrected statement, you indicate that after a search conducted by law enforcement agencies in the Sibneft offices in February 1999 you started to get rid of paper records when there was no longer any business need to keep them. Is that correct?

A. Yes, this is correct. The copies that I stored on paper media, indeed after the search part of the documents -- actually the search in our offices was made only with regard to the case of Boris Abramovich to do with his Atoll company, private enterprise. And part of the documents were found in my office, were of interest to them, and they took them away. And with regard to the other part, I asked Roman Arkadievich whether there is any need to keep these paper for longer and he said "No, I don't need them". So part of the documents were shredded by me and I kept the books for longer than that.

Q. But is this right, that you were in part destroying documents so as to possibly hinder enquiries or investigations into Mr Abramovich's companies? Is that right?

A. Certainly not, no, it just cannot be.

Q. Well, what you say in paragraph 20 of your statement E2/05/93 is it that you refer to the search conducted by the law enforcement agencies in the Sibneft office in February 1999 and some of the documents were taken. Then you say:

"After that I started to get rid of paper records where there was no longer any business [reason]."

Are you saying there was no causal connection between the search and the decision that you subsequently took to start to destroy documents?

A. Yes, this is indeed so. I did ask Mr Abramovich whether he would ever need these documents or may I shred them, may I destroy them? He said "I do not need these documents." I have shown him the register, the ledger that I kept, and indeed we have decided that, in part, these documents are not required, and these documents are also stored at the accounting departments of the trading companies, I mean the original documents, so I thought that these copies could be deleted from my office.

Q. So when you say that you showed him the register and the ledgers and that Mr Abramovich indicated that they were not required, which register and ledgers are those? Are those the registers and ledgers recording the payments to Mr Berezovsky?

A. Yes, this is correct. I have shown not just the registers but I also brought a folder with copies of payment orders that I have been keeping for myself, showing the purpose, the objective of the payment, and these payment orders. After the search was conducted at Sibneft offices, I started destroying these payment orders because there was no need to keep copies of these documents.

Q. And were you the only person who was destroying documents or were other people within the organisation destroying documents as well?

- A. I think we have done that together with my secretary that worked for me at the time.
- Q. But what about the documentation that was held by the accountants for the Russian trading companies, were they destroying documents as well?
- A. Certainly not. How could they do that? I was only destroying the copies which were given to me by them. They could not destroy the originals, that was the official accounting, official payment order, and they had to show it on the balance. They could not possibly destroy this.
- Q. Can I ask you this: what would be the purpose of destroying just a copy if the original was still being held?
- A. The point, the only point is to reduce paperwork and reduce amount of paper in my office. I knew very well that in the trading companies they would have the originals showing the purpose of payment and it wasn't the need for me to keep the copies because the same information was also doubled up in my ledger book.
- Q. Ms Goncharova, how would the accountants in the trading companies know the purposes of the payments, because I thought you indicated that you had not given them that information?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm not sure that's right, Mr Gillis. She's given an explanation as to what she did give them, as to the purpose or objective of the payment.

MR GILLIS: Well, exactly so. I understood that she was indicating that she had indicated who the payee was to be but in a sense nothing further.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, if it's a utility bill, that indicates the purpose of the payment, doesn't it?

MR GILLIS: It does, but then we have the cash payments to Logovaz.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, okay. Well...

MR GILLIS: All right, I'll move on.

At paragraph 20 of your statement E2/05/93, you now give more detail, by way of addition, as to how the records were being kept and the process of destruction. Now, is it right that, as I think you've already indicated, you now explain that the records were kept in bound notebooks, and you say the process of destruction began and then continued through to September -- to 2002 and 2003?

Again, I'd like to ask you, is there any reason why any of this detail was not included in your statement as you originally signed it in May 2011?

A. The question was such a long-winded one I didn't quite understand. If it's about when I started destroying them, I could clarify on that. But if the question is about why I didn't state it in my witness statement, I didn't think that such details would be required to do with proceedings in this case.

Q. Did you not appreciate that the reason why there was no documentation to prove the payments that had been made may be a significant issue?

A. I beg your pardon, could you please repeat your question?

Q. I was asking you: did you not appreciate, it may not be relevant -- I'll start again.

Did you not appreciate that it may be relevant to explain to the court why there was no documentation evidencing the payments that you say had been made?

A. Your Ladyship, I didn't know that we'll ever come to court with regard to these payments, and I also knew that the trading companies, all the originals of these documents still survived, and I simply cannot explain why I would ever need these folders. I'm not saying that I destroyed them right on the day of hearing or prior to the hearing, I'm just saying that I stopped being involved in this in year 2000. And from then on, I just didn't consider them to be ever necessary or that they would ever be needed in court.

Q. I understand you're saying that. What I'm asking about is why this information was not included in your witness statement when you signed it in May 2011?

A. I could not say. I think that question is more towards the lawyers. But just to say, when I met Paul in June 2009 I stated the very same thing to him, the way things were going. And if the lawyer that was putting together my statement deemed it necessary to put it down this way, perhaps this question should not be directed at me. I simply cannot clarify on this.

Q. Can I take you back to paragraph 20 where you say you kept the notebooks -- so you've explained that you started to get rid of paper where there was no longer any business need to keep them:

"I kept the notebooks of ongoing payments and a summary of annual totals but the older books and boxes of supporting documents were destroyed."

Then:

"Some time around 2002 to 2003, the last of the notebooks was destroyed."

Do you see that in your statement?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. You refer there to a summary of the annual totals, can you see that?

A. Yes, I can see that.

- Q. Can I ask, was that a separate document or was this part of the notebook?
- A. That was part of my notebook. It's simply every time by the year, when I was adding up the total and showing how much we've paid per year to the companies of Boris Abramovich and Badri Shalvovich, to ORT. And you could see that as of '95, 30 million, as of '96, such and such amount has been paid. As a result, in 2002 or 2003 these documents were in my office, no one used them anymore and asked for them any longer. I just thought that I didn't need that, I didn't need them, and was just trying to record the amounts, record the amounts for myself. I've written them down on a piece of paper so as -- if Roman Arkadievich would ever ask me about these amounts. So I did it just in case. And this piece of paper stayed in my office for quite a while. I'm not sure what happened to it but I vividly recall the amounts.
- Q. So, I'm trying to understand, did you destroy that summary at the same time as you destroyed the notebooks?
- A. Not at all. That happened later. When we destroyed the paper I simply wrote down year '95, such and such amount, year '96, such and such amount, year 1997 et cetera, such and such amount. And that somehow stuck in my memory because Roman Arkadievich could have asked me, put me on the spot any time, "Do you recall, what was it?" And so I've written down these amounts on a piece of paper with regard to payment.

- Q. Ms Goncharova, is that not the very reason why it's surprising that you destroyed this summary? Because is it not the case that at any time Mr Abramovich could have asked you, "What payments have we made"?
- A. I have destroyed them definitely not with this objective. It is very simply the thing that there was no business need for them, and how to store these documents when no one needs them, no one looked in them ever; after I've sent a copy of payment order to Badri Shalvovich, not another person ever paid attention to them.
- Q. When do you say you destroyed this last summary of the total payments?
- A. After -- I don't remember whether it was 2002 or 2003, after these books were destroyed I made a note on a piece of paper in my office, it was just one single piece of paper, totals per year, and that piece of paper was always stored in my desk for quite a while.
- Q. Did you ask Mr Abramovich whether you could destroy that final record before you did so?
- A. No, I did not. I didn't ask him.
- Q. Were you aware that payments were still being made to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili at the time you destroyed that record?

A. Yes, I did know that in year 2001 the payment was still being made and, as of 2001, that information was still being kept in my office.

Q. And were you aware that subsequently Ms Panchenko was handling further payments?

A. Yes, I did. I was aware of it.

Q. But despite that, you say you destroyed the final summary of the payments that you had made?

A. Yes, this is correct. I thought there was no need, there was no business need to keep them for any longer.

Q. The end result is that there is no documentation which records the payments that you made on behalf of Mr Abramovich, is that correct?

A. At this point of time, this is correct. When we were doing that, that was all kept at the trading companies. As trading companies were being wound up and the liquidation balance was passed on to the tax inspectorate, these documents again were liquidated together with the companies and they were not stored anywhere.

Q. Could I move then to what you say are the 1995 payments and ask you to take bundle J2/2, tab 11 J2/2.11/171.

This is the third witness statement of Mr Mitchard of Skaddens, Mr Abramovich's solicitors. This is dated 19 June 2009. We have the English version starting at page 171 and the Russian version I think starting at page 172R J2/2.11/172R.

Now, I think you've already indicated that you recall speaking to Mr Mitchard in 2009, is that correct?

A. Yes, that's correct, I have met with him.

Q. And could I ask you to look at paragraph 17 in Mr Mitchard's statement which we have in the Russian at 187R J2/2.11/187R, and at page 182 in the English J2/2.11/182.

Do you have paragraph 17?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. If you can just read that to yourself.

A. Yes, I have read it.

Q. Is it right that in 2009 your only recollection was of payments in relation to -- I'm sorry, shall I start again?

THE INTERPRETER: Yes, please, sir.

MR GILLIS: Is it right that in 2009 your only recollection was of payments in relation to ORT?

A. Sorry, I remember the payments made to Logovaz Club and personal amounts that we've brought to Mr Berezovsky.

Q. Well, Ms Goncharova, you will agree with me that this paragraph 17 only refers to payment in relation to ORT.

That's correct, isn't it?

A. Yes, indeed, it says so, but it's not the way it was.

Apart from ORT payments there were also cash payments that we were bringing to Logovaz Club for Mr Berezovsky, there were also some requests from Badri Shalvovich, and his drivers were arriving, or else we were sending these sums of money to him, to Ostankino.

Q. Can I ask you to turn back to tab 10 in the bundle that you've got in front of you, J2/2. This is your statement that you signed in June 2009, and we have the English at page 168 J2/2.10/168, and the Russian at page 169R J2/2.10/169R. Now, it's a short statement and, again, could I ask you to read that. (Pause)

A. Yes, I have read it.

Q. Ms Goncharova, again, it only refers to payments in relation to ORT, doesn't it?

A. No, this is not correct.

Q. Well, what other payments does it refer to?

A. It says in the text that her responsibilities included payment of funds. So that would include cash and noncash payments.

Q. It says:

"... was responsible for payments to ORT from about the beginning of 1995. Her recollection is that, in the early days, Mr Abramovich would come to her with invoices billed to ORT, typically for operational expenses."

It makes no references to other types of payments, does it?

A. No, this is not correct. I remember it was a completely different way. The first payment that Mr Abramovich tasked me with in '95, in February, that was for 5 million in cash, and for us, that was something surreal for us. First, I couldn't believe that this is indeed -- that we have to find 5 million in cash, and then in March, further on, or thereabouts, I think it was end of March, we started payments by bank transfer.

Q. Ms Goncharova, I'm just asking you about the statement that you made in June 2009. And the statement that you made in June 2009, I put to you, makes no reference to any payments other than in relation to ORT. Is that correct?

A. I see it and read it in a different way.

Q. Well, we can see what the words say.

Ms Goncharova, I put to you that it's not just coincidence that your only purported recollection of payment was in relation to ORT.

Can I ask you to go back to Mr Mitchard's statement which we have at tab 11 of that bundle, so for the record that's J2/2 at tab 11, and ask you to look at paragraph 12(b), which we have at 180R in the Russian J2/2.11/180R, and page 177 in the English J2/2.11/177.

Could I ask you to read paragraph 12(b), which is setting out what it is said Mr Abramovich agreed with Mr Berezovsky.

- A. Yes, I have read it.
- Q. And I put to you that what's being said there is that it was Mr Abramovich's case at that time that the payments that he had agreed to make were in relation to ORT, and I suggest that's why your evidence in 2009 was limited to ORT. Do you agree?
- A. I disagree. If Paul would ask me specifically, if Paul would ask me specific questions I was replying to his questions, and I was telling him the whole truth, just as I am telling the truth now, and I told everything the way it was.
- Q. Ms Goncharova, what I put to you is that just as your evidence in 2009 was tailored to fit Mr Abramovich's then case, your evidence in 2011, and even the corrections you're making today, are tailored to try and fit with Mr Abramovich's case that he now seeks to run. Do you wish to comment?
- A. Yes, certainly.

Your Ladyship, that could not be the truth, possibly. I do recall that that indeed is what happened, and I can tell more. What was asked of me, I was asked about specific comments -- payments. I have examples, for example, of my memories, how I brought the first amount of money to Logovaz. I remember exactly how I met Mr Patarkatsishvili, how Mr Patarkatsishvili called me, how we discussed specific payments with him, the way it would be made, that he called me, that Boris Abramovich had a secretary -- an assistant, Irina Pozhedaeva, that he had a assistant, Ivan, in Logovaz Club, and I was bringing cash to them. And what the counsel is trying to put to me now, this is not the way it was.

And I can bring more specific examples: there was the first time when I brought $1 million in the Logovaz Club, I could not give it to Ivan because I didn't know him at all, I didn't know who that was. I was told that an assistant of Boris Abramovich called Ivan will meet me, indeed he meet me. And imagine me with that heavy bag, I'm walking into Logovaz Club, and that was indeed a very heavy bag to carry. And Ivan asked me, "What do you want?" and I said "I've got a bag that I need to pass on to Mr Berezovsky." He said "Okay, let me do it." I said, "No, no, I have to transfer this bag, I have to pass on this bag, namely specifically to Boris Abramovich."

At that point I've never met him, I didn't know what he looked like, and when he walked into his office he was speaking on the phone, and it looked -- he looked very displeased that we just walked in but we had no other way out, so we didn't walk out with that bag and we stayed, remained in his office, and waited for him to finish his phone conversation. When he finished his phone conversation, he just threw that phone into his assistant, Ivan.

And at some point in time I remember Badri Shalvovich in the club, and I didn't know who he was at that time. At some point, when I was bringing the next million, Badri --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Sorry, just stopping there. When you say you brought the cash to Mr Berezovsky in the Logovaz Club, was it dollars, rubles, some other currency? American dollars?

A. Yes, in dollars, American dollars.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Had you gone to the bank to get the cash out?

A. No, it was brought to our offices, the people from Chasprombank were bringing the cash to our offices.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Did you walk through the streets of Moscow with a million dollars in a bag?

A. Certainly not. Do I look like a mad woman? And I don't think I was one at the time.

I had a car, we had office security, and from our office to Logovaz Club certainly we would bring it by car.

MR GILLIS: Ms Goncharova, you say that you didn't know who Mr Berezovsky was. Is that what you've just said, when you delivered the cash?

A. Yes, indeed, that was the case. I knew that there is such a politician, Mr Berezovsky, but I've never ever met him in my life before and I didn't see him.

Q. Mr Berezovsky by 1995 was very famous in Russia, wasn't he?

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. Are you saying you really didn't know what he looked like?

A. I knew what he looked like, I knew who he was, but I never ever met him. I never ever saw him in person.

Q. Can we just step back. Can I just take you back to paragraph 8 of your statement, which we have at bundle E2, at tab 5. It's page 90 in the English E2/05/90 and page 99 in the Russian E2/05/99.

At paragraph 8 of your statement we can see that in contrast to the 2009 statement, where you only referred to payments to ORT, you are now saying that payments to ORT were only one of the types of payment that you were making, and that you were making payments directly to Mr Berezovsky, Mr Patarkatsishvili and to Club Logovaz.

Now, again, can I ask you, why did you make no reference to this at all in your 2009 statement?

A. I think in the text of my statement, it does say that we were paying not just to ORT but we also made other payments.

Q. We've looked at the text of your statement and I suggest to you it gives no indication of that at all, it only refers to ORT. Is there any other reason why you say you made no reference to these other categories of payments when you were asked in 2009?

A. No, there is no reason. It seems to me that I was telling everything and that should have been reflected there somewhere.

Q. Now, we can see from your witness statement that even though you have no written records now, you say that you can recall how much was paid in each of the years from 1995 to 2000.

Given that your initial recollection in 2009 seems to have been payments in relation to ORT, can you indicate how much was paid for ORT bills in each of those years?

A. I certainly can. In '95, as I said in my previous statement, it said 20-30 million, and then, when I started being prepared to this trial in more detail, I know for sure that in '95 the amount was not 20 to 30 million, it was exactly 30 to 31 million -- 31 million exactly. Because I'm just trying to picture that last piece of paper that I had and I remember the payment, '95, that was round about 31 million, '96, that was 86 -- 85/86 million, and in subsequent years, that was 50 million. Year 2000, there were lots of bank transfers to Obedinyonniy Bank, Consolidated Bank, and the amount that passed through my hands was round about 70/80 million.

Q. That wasn't my question. I was asking you what payments were in relation to ORT in relation to these years, can you recall that?

A. Yes, I can. We've paid in '95, as far as I understand, that was -- in March ORT only started, came into being as a company, and we bought lots of equipment. We bought some optical discs, we bought some software programmes or shows, we've paid some airtime as far as I recall. We were buying a camera for leading journalists, including Mr Dorenko, Mr Pozner, Mr Nevzorov, we always paid some money to him. We also paid for -- I don't think it was linked to Triumph -- we also paid for Triumph Logovaz but I'm not sure whether it was linked to ORT or not.

Q. Again, Ms Goncharova, that was not an answer to my question.

I am asking you -- you have said that you can recall without documentation the annual payments that were made. I'm asking you, can you tell us from those annual payments how much related to ORT?

A. I cannot say specifically how much related to ORT since I had this general programme and I did not separate these payments out into a pile for ORT, and the one for the club, and the one for Badri Shalvovich. That was all in the general ledger, in the general list. So I cannot say what percentage pertained to ORT, I cannot say for sure.

Q. Ms Goncharova, I suggest that without documentation to remind you of payments being made in cases up to 15 years ago, inevitably your recollection of dates of payments or amounts of payments or the purpose of payments is going to be vague, and that's right, isn't it?

A. I agree to a part. In some extent they could be vague, but otherwise I disagree. I remember that very well.

Q. Can I ask you just about some answers you gave in relation to Mr Berezovsky and the cash that you say you delivered to him. At [draft] page 53 of the transcript, line 22, you say:

"... I didn't know what he looked like ..."

I'm sorry, if someone could help with the transcript. At [draft] page 53 at line 22, which is referring to taking the cash to Mr Berezovsky's office, you say at line 22:

"At that point I'd never met him, I didn't know what he looked like ..."

Do you see that?

A. Hm-mm.

Q. Then if we can scroll down to [draft] page 55, at line 9 there you say:

"I knew what he looked like ..."

What is your evidence, Ms Goncharova?

A. Your Ladyship, I certainly knew that there was such a politician, Mr Berezovsky, but I've never seen him live, face to face. And the first time when I arrived with that huge sum of money, and for me it was something out of fantasy, I've never seen such amount of money before.

When I arrived to Logovaz Club and saw Boris Abramovich face to face I had such a, so to speak, not a very pleasant impression. I've never seen him face to face. Obviously I've seen him on TV, he was much discussed, there was much about him in the media.

Q. Well, can I ask you specifically then about the $5 million that you say you delivered in cash, and this is looking at paragraph 9 of your witness statement which we have at page 99 in the Russian E2/05/99 and page 90 in the English E2/05/90.

Now, you will accept, I assume, that in your evidence in 2009 you made no mention of this cash payment, did you?

A. I'm not sure why it's not described, but all my statements were started with a talk about 5 million cash payment. Because, for me, I simply cannot -- that was more impressive for me because that was the first payment, and it was such an amount that I've never ever seen in my life. I couldn't imagine that I would ever see such an amount of money, especially in cash.

Q. Well, Ms Goncharova, I suggest to you that if this incident had ever taken place you would inevitably have told Mr Mitchard about it when you gave your evidence to him in 2009 and he would inevitably have recorded it. Would you disagree with that?

A. I would disagree with this because I was telling Paul, everyone, I always told that episode. That was the first that I remember from that payment programme that was linked, as I learnt later, with Mr Berezovsky. That was the first thing that was imprinted in my memory.

Q. Mr Goncharova, what I suggest to you is that you made no mention of it in 2009 because that was not the case that Mr Abramovich was seeking to run at that time, which was solely in relation to ORT payments. And I suggest to you now that the only reason you are suggesting this event took place is to support Mr Abramovich's changed case.

A. No, your Ladyship, this is not so. All conversations with the counsel, all conversations with our lawyers, started with talking about that amount. I said that we had such payments, that we bought lots of other things, that for Mr Berezovsky's family we have bought cars, we serviced, we brought cash for maintenance of the Logovaz Club. I recall it as vividly as if it were today.

In '96, Yekaterina was bought Volvo car, Galina -- BMW was bought for Galina. I even remember driver Mr Ivanov that would come to me on a monthly basis and I was paying his salary. I remember in 1996 we have paid for Spanish holiday of Mr Berezovsky and his family, and that was round about, as it seems to me now, I think it was about $140 million. For me, such amounts were quite memorable. And in 1997, in December, we have paid for his cruise, I remember that well as well, because an amount there was also round about $150,000.

I'm not sure, maybe it was a fantastical sum for me at the time so I really do recall them.

THE INTERPRETER: I do apologise, did the interpreter say million dollars in the previous amount? It might have been a thousand, I might have misspoke.

A. We also rented an apartment for Mr Berezovsky at Ryleev Street and I rented it in my name and we rented it for two years, and Mr Berezovsky used that apartment. And on a monthly basement (sic), Blakewater (sic) company was bringing that cash payment, I recall that as well.

Q. Ms Goncharova, I suggest to you that, absent written records, you cannot be clear about the dates that payments were being made, that's right, isn't it?

A. Specific dates? I do not recall the specific dates, but the fact of these payments being made in such and such a year and in such and such a month, I do recall that. I do not recall all the payments that have been made because there were so many and, in one day, there could be 20 payment orders if not more. But specific large payments, I do recall them very well.

MR GILLIS: Thank you, I have no further questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you. Mr Malek?

MR MALEK: No questions, my Lady.

MR ADKIN: No questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Sumption.

Re-examination by MR SUMPTION

MR SUMPTION: Ms Goncharova, I wonder if you could be given some assistance with scrolling back on the transcript.

Could we scroll back, please, to [draft] page 39 of this morning's transcript. I'll refer you to the details of your answers when I need to, but this is basically to enable my Lady to follow the question.

You said at this point in your evidence that you made some cash available on Badri's instructions. Do you remember referring to Badri giving you instructions to make payments? Do you remember giving some evidence about that?

A. Yes, I do. For all payments I communicated only with Badri Shalvovich. Boris Abramovich did not give me instructions. Roman Arkadievich was giving me the papers, and while Roman Arkadievich was not in Moscow Badri Shalvovich called me on a daily basis. And I was informed that this payment is of the primary importance, these payments can wait a bit, but we always communicated in this regard with Badri Shalvovich.

Q. And how did you communicate? Was it in person, by phone, by letter, by fax, how did you do it? With Badri this is.

A. Certainly it was by phone. I have seen Badri twice or thrice, once in the Logovaz Club, again when I was bringing that payment in, and he helped me with carrying it. I didn't know that was Badri Shalvovich but one could infer by his voice and his accent that that must have been him.

Then he started calling me, and Mr Roman Arkadievich's office, receptionist, has connected me. I didn't know who he was. And I certainly said, "We've met before at the club," and I reminded him about that episode when I was carrying this massive sum of money and the bag was very heavy and he helped me with the bag. And he immediately recalled and we had a laugh on the phone, and then a fax machine was installed in my office and every morning, when I arrived to work, there were some instructions from him. I would go through his instructions and give him a call and then I would approve and agree these instructions with Mr Abramovich.

Q. Thank you. Could we turn to [draft] page 40 of the transcript, please, where at line 6, if the interpreter could assist, just starting before line 6, you're talking here about a search in your offices with regard to the case of Boris Abramovich, that's Mr Berezovsky I think:

"... to do with his [Atoll] company, private enterprise. And part of the documents were found in my office..."

Now, what the [draft] transcript says is "atrial company", what were you saying there, what company is this?

A. The company was called Private Security Enterprise Job Atoll S, they were providing security services to Boris Abramovich, and we also paid their salaries and they would come to me on a monthly basis and they would pay their salaries in cash. They were protecting Boris Abramovich Berezovsky and, as I understand, they protected (sic) private security services for all his summer houses, dachas, Zhukovka, Archangelskoye and Sosny complex. It was called the presidential administration complex, Sosny -- pine trees in English. I don't know who lived there, but Boris Abramovich lived in Archangelskoye and we paid for Sosny and for Zhukovka. I'm not sure who lived there. I think that some summer house was used by the daughter of Boris Abramovich.

Q. Do you know whose company Atoll Security was, who owned that company?

A. No, I do not. I know that Mr Sukalov(?) saw me on a monthly basis, and I would give him the amount that was approved with Badri, and that was going on for many years.

Q. Can you tell us, why was a search being made for documents concerning Atoll Security?

A. I'm not sure. I think it was such a publicised case in Moscow, lots of compromising documents were confiscated, they found some listening devices in their office, and another thing was confiscated from them, there was a number of documents, maybe something was found that was linked with us, Sibneft. I'm not sure that was linked to but I know that in 1999, yes, we did have a search linked to Atoll company.

Q. Who was investigating the affairs of Atoll?

A. I think that was the General Prosecutor's Office.

Q. Now, I want to ask you about the piece of paper on which you wrote the annual totals of the amounts paid to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili. Do you remember giving some evidence about that?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. You described how the last of the notebooks was destroyed, in your witness statement, (inaudible) around 2002 to 2003, but for some time after that you kept a piece of paper with the totals. What I want to ask you is this: what happened to that piece of paper, can you help us on that?

A. I cannot say. I do know indeed that it was in the top drawer of my office desk, and when the whole preparation for the trial started I was trying to find it, I was trying -- where I recorded this. I unfortunately cannot tell where it disappeared to. Maybe I've accidentally thrown it away together with some documents, maybe something else happened to be on this. I cannot help on this, I'm sorry.

Q. Now, could we scroll down to [draft] page 54, please, of the transcript. There's a long answer from you in which you describe the delivery of the bag with the money in it.

A. Okay.

Q. Now, you tell us -- do ask the interpreter for help if you need it. On [draft] page 54, at line 3, you describe how you're standing there with the bag of money, and when Mr Berezovsky finished his phone conversation he just threw the phone into his assistant, Ivan.

Now, can you tell us what then happened to the bag? What did you do with the bag of money?

A. I've introduced myself to Boris Abramovich, "I'm such and such, I'm from Mr Abramovich, I brought this money to you," and I left. I left the money in the club, I left it in the office.

Q. Now, if you look at the very end of that answer, at [draft] page 54, lines 6 and 7, what you say here is:

"I remember Badri Shalvovich in the club and I didn't know who he was at that point in time. At some point, when I was bringing the next million, Badri --"

And then you stopped. Would you like to continue with what you were intending to say immediately after that? At some point when you were bringing the next million, what happened?

A. Your Ladyship, I don't know whether you can imagine what $1 million is, but it was indeed very hard to lift it, very heavy. And when you enter Logovaz Club, there was such a very steep flight of stairs, you had to go to the very top and, indeed, carrying that bag, it was very hard, it was very hard to walk up with such a bag, and it seemed like Badri Shalvovich was saying goodbye to some of his visitors, he saw me, I introduced myself, and he said -- he asked something, I do not recall exactly what he asked me. I said that "I'm going to see assistant, Ivan. I'm so and so," and he did help me to bring that amount of money to Ivan's office.

Q. Now, the 5 million in --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Sorry, just a second. In your earlier answer, before I interrupted you, when you were being cross-examined, you said:

"At some point, when I was bringing the next million..."

Were you referring to another occasion or the same occasion?

- A. 5 million was not passed to the club as a lump sum, they were brought several times. I think it was three times 1 million each, and then it was on average 500,000. So on one of these occasions, on one of these trips, these stories that I'm telling about did happen.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So just to recap, the first time you remember was when Badri helped you, when you brought the first million dollars in cash; that's your evidence, is it?

- A. No, Badri helped me on the second -- no, definitely not on the second, on the third or fourth time, when I arrived at the club on the third or fourth time.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay, there's a translation mix-up here.

On the first occasion you say you took the cash to Logovaz Club, did Badri help you on that occasion or was it on a subsequent occasion?

- A. That happened on the subsequent occasion, but now we're speaking about the amount of 5 million that I was tasked with, to bring on the first occasion. It was not brought to the club as a lump sum, it was broken down into instalments.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, I'm afraid I've confused the position, Mr Sumption --

MR SUMPTION: I think it's now clear.

Ms Goncharova, over what period of time did the various instalments of the 5 million in cash get taken to the Logovaz Club?

A. I think it was between February and March.

Q. And what is it that enables you to recall that it was in February and March? Which year are we talking about?

A. That was 1995, 1995. What enables me to recall is the following: perhaps I recalled it, I remembered it, due to the fact that in January 95 we were moving to our very own new offices, and before that we were renting offices, we were renting buildings. And in 1995, although we had to do it in 1994, end of year 1994, but because the builders did not sign off the property on time we could not move offices in the end of '94, so we were moving straight after the New Year.

Again, it wasn't the whole office taken up and moving in January because the first floor was ready, the first floor was ready in January '95, so part of the employees from one street moved to Bolshaya Kommunisticheskaya Street, and Roman Arkadievich had to come back from holiday in that year, and we really wanted, by the time he comes back, our new offices will be in full flow, would be fully in operation.

So my recollections were linked to that, that in that year we moved to our very own new offices at Bolshaya Kommunisticheskaya Street, at number 38.

Q. Was that before or after these cash deliveries to the Logovaz Club began that you moved into your new offices?

A. We've moved to our new offices, the main bulk of the employees definitely moved in January. Some people were moved in February but that was not important. But the main part of us started working in the offices in January '95, and Roman Arkadievich came back from his holiday at the end of January and then started somewhere around about February of '95.

Q. What started around about February '95?

A. These first payments that Roman Arkadievich tasked me with bringing to Logovaz Club.

Q. Thank you.

One further point, Ms Goncharova, could we scroll down to [draft] page 61 of the transcript at line 8. Now, you'll need the assistance of the interpreter for this. There was an intervention from the interpreter shortly after this evidence about a possible confusion between thousands and millions. Do you see this at line 8, you refer to a sum of $140 million in relation to a --

A. Certainly not. Of course it was thousands.

THE INTERPRETER: This is from the interpreter, the interpreter apologises. I thought I made a slip.

A. One could have bought the whole of Spain for that amount of money.

MR SUMPTION: Well, possibly now.

Thank you very much, Ms Goncharova.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much, Ms Goncharova for coming to give your evidence. You may be released.

(The witness withdrew)

MS DAVIES: My Lady, the next witness is Ms Khudyk.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well.

MS NATALIA KHUDYK (affirmed)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Please sit down.

Examination-in-chief by MS DAVIES

MS DAVIES: Ms Khudyk, could you be given bundle E2, and also we're just handing round one very small correction we wish to make. Bundle E2, tab 6, at page 107 E2/06/107 you see the English version of your third witness statement, the Russian version starts at page 131 E2/06/131.

Do you now have -- there's a sheet indicating a small correction you wish to make to paragraph 29 of that statement. Is that right?

A. Yes, that's right.

Q. And if you could turn to page 155 in the bundle, is that your signature?

A. Yes, that is my signature.

Q. And subject to the correction to paragraph 29, is your statement true?

A. Yes, they are.

MS DAVIES: There will be some questions for you, Ms Khudyk.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Rabinowitz.

Cross-examination by MR RABINOWITZ

MR RABINOWITZ: Good afternoon, Ms Khudyk. You've worked for Mr Abramovich since January 1997, that's right, isn't it?

A. It's not quite right. From February 1997.

Q. Okay. And you still work for Mr Abramovich as head of the planning, finance and accounts department of Millhouse LLC in Moscow, correct?

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. Now, Mr Abramovich, in his evidence, told the court that he definitely trusts you and you are loyal to Mr Abramovich, is that fair?

A. Yes, certainly. I'm loyal to my employer to the extent that is not contradict my personal beliefs and doesn't force me to do something unlawful.

Q. More than that, you are dependent on him as your employer, is that right?

A. I would disagree here. My qualifications and my work experience are quite called for in the labour force market so I do not consider myself being dependent.

Q. But you wouldn't want to lose your job with Mr Abramovich?

A. Perhaps not.

Q. Now, from the time you started working for Mr Abramovich in February 1997 until at least July 2001, you reported directly to Ms Panchenko and through her to Mr Shvidler.
That's right, isn't it?

A. Yes, that's right.

Q. Can I ask you, please, to go to paragraph 69 of your third statement, that's the one in E2, tab 6, page 127 in the English E2/06/127 and 153 in the Russian E2/06/153. Do look at paragraph 69 if you would.

A. I can see that.

Q. You say here that in 2006, Mr Fomichev asked you whether certain payments from Cherrylane Group Corp and Cremona Financial Corp were made on behalf of Mr Abramovich, and you say that you knew nothing about these agreements and you forwarded them to -- sorry, payments, and you forwarded them to Ms Panchenko to deal with. Is that right?

A. Yes, this is exactly the way it was.

Q. Then if you look at paragraph 70, you say that:

"Later I found out that these payments had been made as part of purchases at a discount and subsequent settlement of Sibneft promissory notes at face value."

Can you tell us who you found out from, please?

- A. I found it from the case materials that these payments that were transferred -- pardon, that were in the list sent by Mr Fomichev, they pertained to payments by way of promissory notes of certain amounts to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili.
- Q. And can you tell us roughly when you found out what you say at paragraph 70?
- A. I found out, I found this out from the lawyers, and I think I found out in early 2011 or perhaps at the end of 2010. Now I cannot be certain.
- Q. Now, Ms Khudyk, you have assisted with the disclosure in relation to this litigation, haven't you?
- A. Certainly.
- Q. And is it right that you assisted Yulia Lebedina in identifying potentially relevant documents from among the documents of non-Russian companies?
- A. And including Yulia Lebedina, she was one of the lawyers who helped us in preparation of disclosure for the documents, but she was far from being the only one. There were also lawyers from Skadden Arps, and I would say for the main part they were Skadden Arps lawyers.
- Q. So Yulia Lebedina is not a lawyer from Skadden Arps, is that right? Is that what you're saying?

A. She is a lawyer at Millhouse.

Q. And I'm not sure that you answered my question: you assisted Yulia Lebedina in identifying potentially relevant documents from among the documents of nonRussian companies, is that right?

A. If Yulia Lebedina asked me specific questions, in particular whether such and such document is pertinent to the case materials, then certainly I would answer and give my comments to her. But to say that Julia only based her actions on my opinion, that would not be correct.

Q. I'm not asking you that, Ms Khudyk, I'm trying to understand the scope of where you gave your assistance to Yulia Lebedina.

Is it right that it was in relation to documents for nonRussian companies?

A. To be honest, I do not quite understand how pertinent is Yulia Lebedina. What does she have to do with this?

With regard to disclosure of documents to do with these proceedings, each of us had a task to recall, to remember, and to see which documents are still there, which documents have survived, and that task was put by me not to Yulia Lebedina, but also because Yulia Lebedina was helping to find documents and from time to time she was asking me some questions, then certainly I did give her -- did provide answers to her.

Simply perhaps I do not quite understand your question.

Q. I think that's possible. Put Yulia Lebedina to one side, in the nicest possible way. I'm not interested in Yulia Lebedina, I've never met her. I'm interested in what you were doing and where you were providing your assistance, and that is in relation to documents of non-Russian companies and the disclosure of those documents. Is that correct or not?

A. Yes, my assistance was mainly connected to the documents of non-Russian companies.

Q. Can you tell us which those companies were, please?

A. The Roman Arkadievich Abramovich group included, at various points in time, various nonresident companies. In particular there were Runicom companies, then when I joined the group of Roman Arkadievich, when I joined it as an employee, at that point in time I was only concerned with Runicom companies. It was Runicom SA then Runicom Limited, and later on a much greater number of companies has appeared. So, I don't know, would you -- I don't think you would require me to recite a list of these companies. It is a long list.

Q. Well, let's see if we can go further than Runicom SA and Runicom Co. Can you give me any other companies that you were involved with the disclosure for?

A. Yes, certainly. It would be the Cypriot companies, the Cypriot companies in particular, that held the Sibneft shares. That's MPG, YPL companies, Jimenson company.

Q. You don't have to worry with all the names, we know which the Cypriot companies are.

Any others?

A. NonCypriot companies, certainly Madison company, for example, that was the BVI company and I was a director of that company, and certainly I knew well which documents were pertinent to this specific company in particular and to the case proceedings.

Q. And the documents for all of these companies would have been in English, wouldn't they? These were all companies which were located in jurisdictions where they spoke English?

A. If they were official documents then the answer is yes, the documents would have been in English.

With regard to any internal documents, it would have been completely, entirely possible that the documents could have been in Russian.

Q. And were you helping with the disclosure of documents which were in English in these companies?

A. Yes. In particular there were documents that were in English. To put it this way, to the point, to the extent that I could provide my assistance with, for example, some legal documents to do with the articles of the company or documents that the company may have, when a company is being registered, I would probably not be able to help with that because I'm not a lawyer.

I cannot interpret a company's articles of association of a BVI company, I would never have undertaken such a task.

Q. But in order to assist in this disclosure exercise you must have been familiar with the legal issues in the case, is that right?

A. I do apologise, I do not quite understand your question that I must have been familiar with some legal issues. I knew the case, the essence of the case, and I imagined that.

Q. That's fine.

And in order to appreciate whether any particular document that you were looking at was relevant to the issues in the case you would have had to understand the document, correct?

A. Yes, certainly.

Q. And these documents would have been in English?

A. Often, yes.

Q. Do you in fact understand English fairly well,

Ms Khudyk?

A. Unfortunately, at the current point in time, this is not so anymore. I have graduated from a school with extensive study of English, and at some point I could indeed say that I spoke English well. But, unfortunately, language skills go without practice and it was a fair while, and I did not use the language, unfortunately. So at this point in time it's not quite the same amount of English.

Q. But it was good enough, whenever you did the disclosure exercise, to be able to read a document and know whether the document was relevant to an issue in the case?

A. No, I'm comparing the level of my English as compared to, say, 2003, round about from 2004, 2005.

To put it this way, my language practices disappeared and I started forgetting the language bit by bit, so when lately I had to provide assistance in disclosure of the documents, so yes, I would say that was quite a hard exercise for me and quite often I had to consult a dictionary, unfortunately.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Would that be a convenient moment?

MR RABINOWITZ: It would be.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. Two o'clock.

(1.02 pm)

(The short adjournment)

(2.00 pm)

MR RABINOWITZ: Ms Khudyk, before we broke, I had asked you in relation to paragraph 70 of your witness statement E2/06/127 about the Cherrylane Group Corp and Cremona Financial Corp payments and when you had first discovered them and that they related to the discounting of the promissory notes. And you explained at [draft] page 74, line 5, that you had found it from the case materials, I think you said, in 2010 or 2011. You said:

"I found it from the case materials that these payments ... that are in the list sent by Mr Fomichev..."

Then you said they related to the payment of the promissory notes.

I just want to ask you about the list that was sent to you by Mr Fomichev. Can I ask that you be given, please, bundle H(A)93, page 191 H(A)93/191.

Now, you should have that at page 191, it's in English and I hope you will, even if your English is not as good as it once was, be able to follow these emails. You can see it's an exchange between yourself and Mr Fomichev where he says, taking it from the bottom up:

"What is the best way to send a info to you?"

You say:

"It's okay to send it by e-mail. If you prefer fax..."

And you give him the number. He sends something to you, and he says:

"[For your information] call me when you will read it."

And if you just page back, Ms Khudyk, to page 188, 189 and 190, you see a list with Cremona and Cherrylane.

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. Is this the list that you were referring to in your answer?

A. Most likely, yes, that is the one. The one which was an attachment to this Ruslan Fomichev's message.

Q. Can I just ask you this. It looks as if, looking at the emails on page 191, that you and Mr Fomichev had had a discussion which led to this exchange of emails. Is that right?

A. Yes, your understanding is correct. Mr Fomichev called me on the phone and asked me questions regarding Cremona and Cherrylane payments because the names of those companies did not mean anything to me. I did not even pick it up when I was listening to him speak, I did not understand what he meant, so I asked him to send me some information so that I could review it more attentively.

Q. Are you able to help us as to why, in 2006, you were having this conversation or this exchange with Mr Fomichev?

A. Unfortunately I cannot assist you in this. I do not know what the reason was for Mr Fomichev's calling me in 2006. I was quite surprised myself because by that time I had already not been in communication with Mr Fomichev for a few years, for a long period of time so I was surprised myself.

Q. Very well. You can put away bundle H(A)93.

Now, I'd like to next ask you some questions relating to the arrangements for the payment of the $1.3 billion to Mr Berezovsky which you deal with at paragraph 25 of your third witness statement. That is, if you don't have it, page 137 in the Russian E2/06/137 and page 112 in the English E2/06/112.

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. And you explain here at paragraph 25 that at some point Ms Panchenko asked you to arrange the payment of approximately $1 billion, you say in the second line. Do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. And just looking at the next sentence, you say you found a document dated 14 May 2001 which showed a payment of $1 billion in dividends. Just pausing there, there is no dispute, I think, that the amount finally agreed upon was 1.3 billion, okay? If you're right about the date of this document, this would suggest, would it not, that the $1.3 billion figure was arrived at after 14 May?

A. So far as I know, the 1.3 figure was conveyed to me, was brought to my attention, after the 14 May. That is true.

Q. And if you have a document which is still talking about $1 billion, that would suggest that the figure of $1.3 billion would have only been agreed after 14 May 2001?

A. I can only speculate with regard to that. What I do know is that actually it's a reconstruction of my recollections. The metadata of the document shows that I created this document on -- it was created on 14 May 2001, I'm sorry. And in that document I am writing about the amount of $1 billion, and that means that on 14 May 2001 what had been brought to me, to my attention, was the amount of around $1 billion give or take a few. It could have been a little bit more, a little bit less than that. At that time I was not aware of the amount of 1.3 billion.

Q. Thank you for that.

If I can ask you then to go to paragraph 27 of your statement E2/06/113, you refer at paragraph 27 of your statement to a document entitled "Payment Schemes", which you created and which you say sets out the various iterations of the scheme for the payment to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, is that right?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. Perhaps we could just very quickly have a look at that document. This is bundle H(A)103 at page 109 H(A)103/109. Now, am I right that the document starts on page 109 and it continues for quite a few pages to page 119 or 120?

A. Yes, that is true. It unfortunately was not formatted properly. The idea had been that there will be one page on each separate page only.

Q. Just going to page 111, this is right, isn't it, this is what you were considering as the way in which the payments were going to get to Devonian Investments Limited, one sees in the box on the right-hand side?

A. This chart does not refer to payments. What I can see here is pay-outs with respect to Devonian, in this chart, are provided for in the form of securities.

Q. Okay. If you go to page 115, this is payments through to Devonian Investments Limited.

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. So it would be fair to say that, certainly by May 2001, you were aware of the existence of Devonian Investments Limited?

A. At a certain point in time, during the month of May 2001, the name of the company was conveyed to me but that does not mean that I had known the name of that company right away, immediately after I started creating this document. The document, the file was being adjusted ever since it was created and until the end of May, until the payments themselves, and it was adjusted, corrections were introduced into that file, on numerous occasions.

Q. I'm just not completely clear about the answer.

You say this document was -- you were working on it from time to time, correct? Is that what you're saying?

A. Yes. That is correct. I worked with that document from time to time, depending on the situation and depending on any new information that came, something was either changed or added.

Q. But by the end of May 2001 you were aware of the information which we see on these documents and, in particular, the existence of Devonia Investments Limited. That's right, isn't it?

A. In practical terms, yes. At the end of May, I learned the name Devonia.

Q. And presumably after May 2001 you had no reason to look back at this document because the way in which the payments were going to be routed to Devonia had been decided, is that right?

A. Most likely, from the point of view of making payments, there was no need for me to go back to this document.

- Q. And when do you think, in the context of this litigation, you first went back and looked at this document?
- A. I believe it was maybe in 2007. I believe that when Paul Mitchard was for the first time asking this question I tried to recollect, and chances are it is quite possible that I may have opened this document then.
- Q. So you think you went back to this document in 2007.
- Ms Khudyk, are you aware --
- A. It is a possibility.
- Q. Okay. Are you aware that this "Payment Schemes" document was not disclosed until 27 May this year, just four days before the deadline for witness statements?
- A. No, I'm not aware of that.
- Q. Well, you can take it from me that that is the position. If you think it is likely, or there's a possibility even, that you went back and saw this document as early as 2007, can you provide any explanation at all, from your point of view, as to why this document was not disclosed until May of this year?
- A. I can only speculate, I can only make assumptions. The thing is that a large, a significant amount of information was received and it was difficult to go through this information to understand whether or not it is material, whether it is related to the matter at hand or not. But this is just the way I think of this. This is just my view.

Q. Can I just ask you about that view. Are you suggesting that there would have been any doubt at all that a document you produced in May 2001, which showed the way in which payments were being made to Devonia, was a material document in the context of this litigation?

A. No, I do not believe so. As soon as this document was shown to me by the lawyers, and I think it was in the spring this year that they asked me whether or not this is related to the matter or not, I immediately said "Yes, it is related to the matter." And apparently at that time the decision must have been taken, I believe, that it would be disclosed.

Q. But I thought in answer to an earlier question you said that you were aware of this document in 2007?

A. Well, you see, my work -- in the course of my work I deal with a lot of paperwork, lots of documents, and I cannot remember all the documents that I see during a day, let alone many years ago. Chances are that when Paul Mitchard was, for the first time, asking me about this, I was trying to refresh my memory and I was trying to recollect and I went through the documents that were in the files, in the paper form and also on my computer, and it is possible, it is possible, that I might have seen this file at that point in time. However, I would not be able to tell you that with certainty.

Q. And Mr Mitchard would have been dealing with these issues in the context of the strike-out which was -- well, his witness statement was made in 2009. So are you saying that it's in the period around 2009, at the very latest, you would have been looking at this document to refresh your memory?

A. Yes, it is possible that it was in 2009. It is possible.

Q. And in answer to an earlier question as to the process in which this came to be disclosed, you said:

"As soon as this document was shown to me by the lawyers ... "

You immediately said that it related to the matter.

Which lawyers are you talking about? Was it Mr De Cort or some other lawyer?

A. I cannot recall with certainty. It might have been Andre De Cort, it might have been Skadden Arps solicitors. Unfortunately I'm afraid I cannot recall now.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: One lawyer is very much like another, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: Not if you're a lawyer, my Lady, and certainly not if you're married to one.

Ms Panchenko yesterday explained that the bolshoi balance was discovered in your computer in an archive file in November 2010. Where was this document stored, can you help us with that?

A. Well, you know, as I understood later on from the explanations that were given by the IT service, on the employees' computers there are certain sub-directories that were created for the purpose of archiving documents.

I did not know, I was not aware that this sub-directory had been created because it was -- it was something that had been done by the technical support services and, unfortunately, this sub-directory was not even something that I, in my capacity as a computer user, could see because it required -- in order to gain access to it, it required that a certain password had to be introduced before one could gain access to that archive directory.

So, therefore, at some point in time that archive directory was created, it had been created on my computer, and that document was in that directory.

Q. And when you refer to IT services here, which IT services are you referring to? Is it Millhouse's IT services?

A. Yes, Millhouse IT services.

Q. Okay. Now, it's right, I think, that in the course of your work setting up the mechanism for the payment of the $1.3 billion you were in contact with a Mr James Jacobson?

A. No, this is not entirely correct. I was in contact with Mr Fomichev.

Q. All right, let's just see if that's right.

Can I ask you, please, to be given bundle H(A)31 at page 164, please HA(31)/164. This appears to be a fax, Ms Khudyk, from you to Mr James Jacobson. Correct?

A. Yes, that is correct. That is correct.

Q. So when I asked whether, in the course of your work setting up a mechanism for the payment of the 1.3 billion, you were in contact with Mr James Jacobson, why did you say that you were not?

A. Because it was a one-off occurrence, it only happened once I would say, and it was not a two-way street, it was not a bilateral contact.

What happened was that Mr Fomichev, who was indicated to me as the contact person and someone to whom I had sent the documents, told me that "I don't know the first thing about these legal documents, please send this to our lawyers," and he gave me the details of Mr Jacobson.

So as a matter of fact this is the background behind this fax.

- Q. So you knew Mr Jacobson was a lawyer, is that right?
- A. Yes, Mr Fomichev told me that he was a lawyer.
- Q. And you knew he was dealing with this transaction, correct?
- A. No, I did not know which transaction he was dealing with. I thought that he was a group lawyer, for instance someone who dealt with general legal matters.
- Q. Ms Khudyk, are you seriously suggesting that you did not know Mr Jacobson was dealing with the Devonia transaction that you had been busy dealing with yourself, in that document we looked at earlier where you were tracking through payment options?
- A. Of course I did not know that.
- Q. All right, let's just see if that's correct. Let's first look at the document we have open at H(A)31, page 164 H(A)31/164. You say:

"Dear James. Please find attached the draft of the Minutes of the meeting of the Board of Directors of the Company with regard to the profit distribution."

And you sign it and you give him your email address.

It's obvious that, certainly at this stage, your

English was good enough to write emails and faxes in English and obviously to understand what was said to you when you got them back, correct?

A. Well, quite often, yes. Depending on what the feedback said, what the answer said.

Q. And you address Mr Jacobson as "James" rather than "Mr Jacobson". That suggests, does it not, that you had already had some contact with Mr Jacobson prior to sending this email?

A. Well, you know, I was a young naive person at that time and I thought that it was a respectful form of address, I thought that was part of normal practice, and part of normal practice was to write, in the address line, to write "Dear James". Actually in Russian it's "Esteemed James". But that was the first time that I was writing or communicating with Mr Jacobson.

Q. In answer to an earlier question from me, this is at [draft] page 91, line 10, you said, in relation to Mr Jacobson, that you thought he was a group lawyer. Which group do you say you thought Mr Jacobson belonged to? Are you suggesting he was part of Mr Abramovich's group?

A. No, the group which was represented by Mr Fomichev.

Q. Now, can I ask that you next go to page 254 of the same bundle H(A)31/254. This is the next recorded contact that we -- sorry, the next contact that we have on the documents. It's an email from you, again to Mr Jacobson, and you have got his email address there, james@stephen-curtis.co.uk, do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. What you say in this email to Mr Jacobson, what you give to Mr Jacobson in this email, is a list of the documents required by the bank to open a safe custody account, and the bank was the Latvian Trade Bank, that's right, isn't it?

A. Yes, the Latvian Trade Bank.

Q. Now, we know that this email has been disclosed by Mr Abramovich from his disclosure, you can see that from the number on the bottom left-hand corner. So presumably this email came from your computer, did it?

A. Well, either from my computer or it was retained in hard copy. So it definitely came from somewhere.

Q. Did you retain copies of all the emails that you had with Mr Jacobson in hard copy?

A. No, I did not retain copies of faxes or emails, practically -- virtually never did I do so. But I do not rule out the possibility that, with respect to that particular email, that particular email for some reason was printed off.

Q. And by the time of this email, you had had a conversation with Mr Jacobson, that's right, isn't it?

A. To be honest, I do not recollect a conversation with Mr Jacobson.

Q. You're saying you don't recollect any conversation with Mr Jacobson at all?

A. No, I do not recollect any conversations with Mr Jacobson.

Q. You see, if you look at your email to him, Ms Khudyk, just below the list that you have produced to him, points 1 to 9, you then say:

"All above mentioned documents should be certified by solicitor and authorised with the apostile. As I understood from our telephone conversation..."

That suggests, does it not, that you had indeed had a conversation with Mr Jacobson?

A. Yes, I would agree with you. Yes. That assumes that there had been a conversation, but I do not recollect a conversation, and I presume that the conversation was with respect to these documents judging from the fact that I'm saying here that from our telephone conversation I had understood something with respect to copies of passports. Obviously, we had -- most probably we had been discussing copies of documents.

Q. And you could see from the email address, if you didn't get it from his accent, that Mr Jacobson was an English-based lawyer, or certainly was in England?

- A. From the email address, what you can see is that the company is based in England but that does not necessarily mean that he is an Englishman or based in England. The way I see it, that does not have -- necessarily have to be the case.
- Q. All right. So let's just break that down then, Ms Khudyk. You knew he was a lawyer, correct?
- A. Yes.
- Q. And you knew --
- A. That's what Mr Fomichev had told me.
- Q. And you knew he had an English email address, correct?
- A. Yes, it was given to me by Mr Fomichev.
- Q. But you're saying that it doesn't follow from that that you knew he was an English lawyer or a lawyer based in England, is that right?
- A. Your understanding is correct. I knew that he was working for a company, most probably an English company, and he was a lawyer, judging from what Mr Fomichev had said.
- Q. You see, I suggest to you that you knew full well he was an English lawyer working on this transaction, Ms Khudyk. Do you dispute that?
- A. I do, absolutely. I knew he was a lawyer as Mr Fomichev had told me. I knew that he was related to the group which Mr Fomichev represented. Now, the specific focus -- purpose of my communication with him related to the documents for this transaction. Now, whether he knew knowledge or information generally with respect to that connection, I never had the slightest idea about that.

Q. Again, let's just see where we are. You knew he was English, you knew he was a lawyer, and you were communicating with him with regard to documents relating to the transaction, correct?

A. Which were related -- which had some bearing on the transaction.

Q. But you're saying you didn't know he was a lawyer working or related -- working on matters related to this transaction?

A. I did not know to what extent he was up to speed on what was going to be done to -- to what extent he was deeply involved in the nuances of the transaction, how much he knew about that. I knew that, for instance, for the purpose of opening a bank account, it had been recommended to me to communicate with him or that person.

Now, for the purposes of obtaining legal documents with respect to the company that was supposed to have become the payee, it had been recommended to me that

I request those documents from him. Therefore, I understood that at a minimum he was the lawyer who knew or who had the constitutional documents of the company that was and supposed to become the payee, the recipient of the payment.

Q. Can I just -- on an earlier answer you gave, where you said, and I was trying to get you to agree that Mr Jacobson was based in England, a lawyer based in England, and you quibbled with that. Can you go back to page 164, please, in the bundle you're in HA(31/164. This is a fax you've seen, I took you to this earlier, from Mr Jacobson to you. Do you see the fax number on the top of the right-hand corner?

A. Yes, you are right, I can see the country code here, yes.

Q. So you did know he was based in England, didn't you?

A. Most likely, yes, but I don't believe that it was -- it had any importance for me.

Q. What I don't understand, Ms Khudyk, is why you are struggling to dispute being aware of any connection between Mr Jacobson and England. Can you comment on why that is?

A. I'm not trying to dispute this. What I'm trying to say is that it was not important to me. I did not attach any importance to this and therefore there was no imprint of this left in my memory.

- Q. You can put away I think or put to one side bundle H(A)31. Can you go to bundle H(A)33 and open it at page 256, please H(A)33/256.

You see, Ms Khudyk, this is another email we have from you to Mr Jacobson. You will remember, when I first asked you whether you'd had any contact with Mr Jacobson in relation to this transaction, you said that you hadn't. When I said, well, why do you say that you hadn't? When I showed you the first fax, you said it was a one-off, it didn't happen again.

But we're now on the third exchange between yourself and Mr Jacobson, and it's a fax from you or an email from you dated 30 May 2001, and you're attaching for Mr Jacobson, you copy it to Mr Fomichev, documents required by the bank to open an account.

You say:

"Please send the a.m. [which I think is above-mentioned] documents (duly signed and sealed) firstly by fax ... and then the originals by courier to Latvian Trade Bank."

Can I ask you this: this document was not disclosed by Mr Abramovich, Ms Khudyk, it has only emerged because it has been disclosed by Mr Berezovsky. Are you able to assist as to what might have happened to this document on your computer, explain why it wasn't disclosed?

- A. My Lady, first of all, please allow me to draw your attention to the fact that it was not the only case, what I said was one-off. One-off, what I meant was that he was not a contact person to me in the broad sense of the word. I did not handle all the issues with him related to this payment. I did not mean that there was only one fax and then nothing else. I'm not trying to mislead anyone.

So far as the reason why the document was not disclosed, I really don't know. Maybe it had not been retained. I'm afraid I cannot comment on that.

- Q. Can you go back, please, to page 248 in the same bundle H(A)33/248. You see, here we see that you also faxed the same document to Mr Jacobson, again copying in Mr Fomichev, on 30 May 2001, and you say:

"Dear James."

Later on you say:

"These documents were sent to you by e-mail. As I'm not sure that you'll receive it I made up my mind to duplicate the information by fax."

There were three documents attached to this fax, and indeed to the email, and can we just quickly just identify what they are. If you go to page 249 H(A)33/249, do you see there an agreement with Latvian Trade Bank for the opening of an account? Do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. If you go to page 253 H(A)33/253, do you see there a request for a bank account form?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. Thank you. If you go to page 254, you should see there a sample signature form, correct?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. You can put bundle H(A)33 to one side.

Can you please be given bundle H(A)34, opened at page 45 H(A)34/45. Ms Khudyk, this is another fax to you on the very next day from --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: From her.

MR RABINOWITZ: Sorry, from you, to Mr Jacobson the very next day.

You'll see, looking at the line about four lines from the top, that there were six pages including the cover page sent with this fax. Do you see that? Do you see where it says "Pages: 6" at the top, Ms Khudyk, just staying with page 45, do you see that?

Ms Khudyk, you have to say "da" or "yes".

A. Yes. Yes, I can see that.

Q. Thank you. Then if you move to page 50 H(A)34/50, you'll see what the documents were that you had -- sorry, you see a document headed "List of the documents" which were prepared for the transaction, do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. If you then go back to page 45 H(A)/34/45, what we see is that you've attached documents to be signed and sent back to you, and you ask for an address to send the further documents to, do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see that. But my understanding is that I'm asking him for the address where these documents should be sent, not any other documents.

Q. That's fine, I just want to look at the documents you did send.

The first document is, as you see, you've produced a document headed "Devonia Investments Limited" to be signed by Matar Mohd Saeed Ali Al Neyadi, do you see that?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What page is that?

MR RABINOWITZ: Sorry, page 46 H(A)34/46.

A. (Not interpreted) I see.

I can see that.

Q. Thank you. This document was the acknowledgement by Devonia Investments Limited of a transfer to it of shares in Pex Trade Corporation, correct? That's what it says?

A. Yes, it's a certificate, it's a receipt of shares, a certificate certifying that they have received the shares.

Q. And you have backdated this document back to 14 May 2001, correct?

A. Yes, unfortunately I did that, and I would like to comment if I may.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, you may.

A. May I just mention that backdating documents was not normal, standard operating procedure in our company. Yes, I did do this and I was not delighted that I had done this, first of all, because I was misleading the bank with which we had a very good business relationship. However, I had no other option, I had no choice. I needed to have a document that would serve as the basis for payment. I could not bring a payment order to the bank for $1.3 billion and have nothing to support it.

So I did need to have some documents, and I was not thinking that the bank would regard the documents that confirmed the declaration of dividends, the exchange of letters between the companies that existed in different jurisdictions. I mean, it would have been not serious if they had all been dated by the same date, 30th May. And unfortunately the decision that this mechanism was going to be the one that would be accepted and adopted to make this payment of that amount was made very late, and it was brought to my attention literally on the eve of the date of the first payment, when the first payment had to be made. And, therefore, unfortunately I did backdate the documents.

MR RABINOWITZ: But it's not just the backdating, is it, Ms Khudyk? What you have produced here is a receipt which says:

"Hereby we acknowledge the receipt of the share(s) shown in the schedule hereto in the undertaking called Pex Trade Corporation."

But you're aware that there never was any transfer of shares in connection with this, aren't you?

A. Well, the thing is that in parallel, concurrently with this document, another document was prepared under which Devonian, slightly later than this, was returning the shares and therefore there was no need to actually transfer the shares. A similar receipt said that Devonian had, by that time, returned the shares.

Q. Can we then look at the second document that you sent to Mr Jacobson which is over the page H(A)34/47.

This is the instructions of Devonian Investments Limited to Pex to pay the dividend into its account with Latvian Trade Bank, and this is another document that you backdated, isn't it, Ms Khudyk?

A. Yes, your understanding is correct.

Q. Now, you didn't backdate the next two documents because they don't have dates. Can we just look at them. At page 48 H(A)34/48, we have a document which purports to be an assignment of the shares in Pex to Devonian, correct?

A. Yes, correct.

Q. But we know again that no shares were actually transferred from Pex to Devonian?

A. Because based on the documentation literally two days later they came back to Pex -- well, not really Pex, to the Abramovich group of companies.

Q. And the next document is an identical document, it's an assignment of another share in Pex to Devonian and, presumably, your answer to the question of whether shares were actually transferred is the same?

A. Yes, the situation was similar here, it was the same situation. The shares based on the documents that were dated a couple of days after that were returned to the Abramovich group of companies and, therefore, there was no physical transfer of shares.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Who was responsible for thinking up this scheme? Was that you, the details of this, or was it someone else?

A. Well, the scheme itself, my Lady, had been created in May and I was preparing the documents. Whereas, originally, the scheme was something -- the input was something that I received from my boss, Mrs Panchenko. After that, some adjustments were made to the scheme because different options, different possibilities of paying out the distribution, paying the profit was different.

I mean, the basic idea was still the same, unchanged. The amount had to be declared in the form of dividend. Now, in what form it would be paid, ie in cash or as securities, that kept changing, adjustments were made to that.

Now, the documents themselves that needed to be prepared to support that scheme were the documents that I was in charge of. I was preparing those documents. And so -- well, so, that's it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But on your side, the Abramovich side of this exercise, who was responsible for thinking up the mechanism for payment? Was it your idea? Was it Ms Panchenko's? Was it Mr Abramovich's? Was it Mr Tenenbaum's? Whose was it?

A. I'm not aware whose idea that originally was. It was my boss, Mrs Panchenko, who brought this idea to my attention.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

MR RABINOWITZ: Sorry, just to follow that, who is Ms Panchenko's boss? It's Mr Shvidler, isn't it?

A. I think so, yes.

Q. Now, can you go next, please, to bundle H(A)31 opened at page 122 H(A)31/122. Ms Khudyk, this is, as you see, a signed copy of the payment instruction document dated 22 May 2001.

Just to follow this, you send an unsigned copy, you get a signed copy -- or the copy is then signed. Do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. And do you recall that Mr Jacobson told you that he could not deal with this and that you should deal directly with Dr Jumean in relation to this?

A. No, nothing of the kind has been said to me either by Jacobson nor Mr Fomichev. Mr Fomichev asked me to send the documents that required to be signed to Mr Jacobson, and then what happened afterwards with those documents is beyond my knowledge.

Q. You see, I suggest that you did in fact send the unsigned copy to Dr Jumean, and Dr Jumean returned the signed version to you. That's right, isn't it?

A. No, this is not the way it was.

Q. Let me just show you a document, if I may, in bundle H(A)34 at page 10 H(A)34/10. So Ms Khudyk, this is a copy of your 31 May 2001 fax to Mr Jacobson, and at the bottom of the page there is a note from Mr Jacobson to Mr Curtis which reads:

"Told Natalia/Ruslan to send directly to Eyhab [and Eyhab is Dr Jumean]. Also told Eyhab to expect documents. However, Ruslan [that's Mr Fomichev] directed that docs should be sent here. Do not know what this relates to in respect of the whole transaction so have not done anything."

Do you see that? That's Mr Jacobson's note.

- A. Yes, I can see that something is written here, and it's rather difficult for me to understand what a handwritten text in a foreign language actually says.
- Q. And that's why I've read it to you and had it translated for you, Ms Khudyk.

Now, what we then see is Mr Curtis's note responding to what Mr Jacobson has said, and that's just above what Mr Jacobson has written. Again I'll read it to you so that it can be translated:

"James -- I have told Ehab we cannot act on this -- he is to refer to his AD [which is Abu Dhabi] lawyers -- he confirms that he has already received these direct from (Sibneft?) and is dealing with Sibneft/Natalia direct -- do not send."

Now, the "Natalia", I suggest, the reference to "Sibneft/Natalia" is a reference to you, is it not?

- A. Well, you know, may I draw attention to the fact that there is a question mark after the word "Sibneft". I'm afraid that the person, the gentleman who was writing this, did not know very clearly from whom he received this, but judging from everything, he received this from Mr Fomichev, from Ruslan, because I was not in contact with Mr Eyhab.
- Q. Were you at the time working at the Sibneft office, Ms Khudyk?
- A. I was not working in Sibneft as a company but I was physically in the offices of Sibneft in Sadovnicheskaya Street.
- Q. And you had moved there from April 2001, correct?
- A. Yes, that is correct, in late April 2001.
- Q. So I suggest to you that this note indicates that you were having direct dealings with Dr Jumean in relation to this. Do you dispute that?
- A. No doubt about it, I never communicated with Dr Jumean.
- Q. And you were plainly in direct contact with Mr Jacobson at Curtis & Co, presumably you accept that?
- A. On a narrow matter related to the signing of the documents, yes, I was in communication with Mr Jacobson.
- Q. You see, I have to suggest to you, Ms Khudyk, that although you were in direct contact with Mr Jumean, or Dr Jumean, you have produced no documents relating to any contact you have had with Dr Jumean. That's right, isn't it?

A. I had never had any contacts and, therefore, there was nothing to be created.

Q. Just in terms of whether you were at the time either at Sibneft or working for Sibneft, can I just ask you to go back to the document, you have the bundle in front of you, H(A)31 at page 164 H(A)31/164.

We see that your email address is given as a Sibneft email address.

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. Now, I'm going to move on, although there may be one point I need to come back to on that.

Perhaps I can just ask you this. In your second witness statement at J2/3, tab 31 at page 47, do you have that J2/3.31/47?

A. Yes, I have that.

Q. Do you see in paragraph 13 you say -- this is at page 47:

"Although I cannot recall doing so, it is possible that I did speak to Dr Jumean..."

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. Now, given that is what you were saying, Ms Khudyk, in October 2009, how is it that, two years later, when I say to you that you had contact with Dr Jumean, your answer is:

"No doubt about it, I never communicated with Dr Jumean"?

A. I believe that I had never had contact with Dr Jumean. I had spent a lot of time thinking, and I'm trying to recollect the circumstances that obtained at that time, and I came to the conclusion that this had not been the case. I cannot recollect any such contact.

Q. I want to then move on and ask you a few questions related to Rusal, if I may.

As regards the acquisition of the aluminium assets in February 2000 and the subsequent merger in March 2000, your evidence is that, although you assisted with some of the technical work, you do not now recall any of the details, is that right?

A. Yes. I did provide some assistance but I do not recall any major details.

Q. Very well. I won't ask you questions about the contractual documents related to that. I've put those to other witnesses already.

Also though, as regards Rusal, you were involved in some of the payments that were made via Madison and Espat to Blue Waters and Rich Brown in 2002 to 2005, were you not, Ms Khudyk?

A. Yes, I did take part in some of the payments that went through Madison, Espat, towards Rich Brown and Blue Waters, yes.

Q. As regards the Rich Brown payment, you tell us -- this is at paragraph 56 of your third witness statement, page 149 of the Russian and 123 of the English -- you tell us in relation to the Rich Brown payment that Ms Panchenko did not explain to you the reasons for that payment, is that right?

A. That is absolutely correct.

Q. And indeed Ms Panchenko has told us that she did not know the reason for this payment of -- you're talking here about the $127.5 million payment to Rich Brown, or the earlier payment of $50 million to Blue Waters.

Can I take it that, since Ms Panchenko did not know the reason for either of those payments, nor did you, Ms Khudyk?

A. There was no one that I could even ask the question of. If my direct boss does not tell me, then, of course, definitely I do not know that.

Q. And you say that no one explained to you the reasons for either of these payments?

A. No. No one explained to me the reasons why those payments were being made, and so far as those payments were concerned, on our side, I only dealt with Mrs Panchenko.

Q. Now, we do have, in relation to the $50 million payment to Blue Waters, an attendance note made by Mr Keeling of Denton Wilde Sapte of a conference call in which you participated.

I wonder if I can just show that to you. You're obviously aware of it because you refer to it at paragraphs 51 and 52 of your statement. Perhaps, rather than looking at it, I can just ask you about that E2/06/122.

You tell us, I think at paragraph 51, that you don't remember that particular conference call. I should have let you just familiarise yourself with what you say at paragraph 51 and then let me ask you that question.

(Pause)

Is that right? You don't remember that particular conference call?

A. Yes, that is correct. I do not recall that, that call.

Q. And then I think you say at paragraph 52, since you don't remember the call, you suggest that it was Mr De Cort who would have explained the structure of the funds because the conversation was among English-speaking persons. Is that right?

A. Yes, this is absolutely right.

Q. In that case, I can ask Mr De Cort about that rather than you.

My Lady, I can try -- I've got a little bit more --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Why don't we keep going for a bit.

MR RABINOWITZ: Just looking at paragraph 60 of your statement, page 151 of the Russian E2/06/151, 124 of the English E2/06/124, you tell us that you were a member of the working group that was involved in the sale in 2003 of 25 per cent of Rusal to Mr Deripaska, is that right?

A. Yes, this is correct.

Q. But you don't provide any independent details of the first Rusal sale other than information that can be derived from contractual sales documents. Is that because you don't have any clear independent recollection of the first Rusal sale, Ms Khudyk?

A. I'm sorry, I'm not sure I understand. Are you talking about the first sale or the second sale?

Q. At this stage I'm talking about the first sale.

A. Well, it's not that I don't have any recollection at all. The thing is that my role was so insignificant that there is really, really nothing to describe.

Q. On that basis I'm not going to ask you to describe insignificant things. Presumably the person who would have been centrally involved in dealing with the legal issues that were arising, was that Mr De Cort or Mr Tenenbaum?

A. Well, once again, are we talking -- my apologies, are we talking about 2003 or 2004?

Q. 2003.

A. Well, I believe -- it seems to me that back in 2003 Mr De Cort was not yet dealing with those matters. I am not totally certain, but I believe that at that time there was another lawyer in the group and it was not Mr De Cort and therefore I cannot really tell you.

Q. In terms of the 2004 transaction, would it have been Mr De Cort or Mr Tenenbaum who were involved, or both of them, who were involved in dealing with the legal issues?

A. My Lady, so far as I know, the direct boss of Mr De Cort was Mr Tenenbaum. I communicated with Mr De Cort so really -- now, to what extent Mr De Cort communicated with his boss, I cannot tell you.

MR RABINOWITZ: Thank you very much, Ms Khudyk. I don't have any more questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well, thank you.

MR MALEK: No questions, my Lady.

Re-examination by MS DAVIES

MS DAVIES: My Lady, there's one matter by way of re-examination for which Ms Khudyk will require some assistance with the transcript.

If you could please scroll back to [draft] page 90.

There may have been a translation issue here which is what I just want to clarify, Ms Khudyk. If you can look at [draft] page 90, at line 16, there's a question:

"So when I asked whether, in the course of your work setting up a mechanism for the payment of the 1.3 billion, you were in contact with Mr James Jacobson, why did you say that you were not?"

And your answer:

"Because it was a one-off occurrence ..."

Perhaps the translator could just translate those three lines.

- A. I gave this answer because my main contact, so far as the mechanism, and the implementation of the payment mechanism was concerned with respect to that amount, was Mr Fomichev, whereas Mr Jacobson had been indicated to me by Mr Fomichev for one single, narrow person only to communicate with him with respect to documents only.

And so what I meant was that he was not my contact on the recipient's, on the payee's side, in the broad sense of the word.

- Q. And can you recall over what period of time you understood you were being asked you were in contact with Mr Jacobson when you gave the answer that you did?

A. It was literally maybe one, two weeks in May, not more than that. I'd rather even say one week in May 2001.

MS DAVIES: Thank you very much, Ms Khudyk.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much. I have no questions. Thank you for coming to give your evidence.

(The witness withdrew)

Right, I'll take the break now. Ten minutes.

(3.13 pm)

(A short break)

(3.36 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Sumption, before you start, it's been brought to my attention -- could this be translated into Russian please. It's been brought to my attention that somebody during the course of this afternoon took a picture in court. That person has been removed from court and the pictures are in the process of being deleted.

Can I remind everybody in court that taking photographs in court is a contempt of court and in some cases is regarded as a serious contempt of court possibly leading to imprisonment. Can I make it absolutely clear that nobody is to take a photograph in court. Thank you very much.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, I call Mr Grigoriev.

MR ALEXEI GRIGORIEV (affirmed)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Please sit down.

Examination-in-chief by MR SUMPTION

MR SUMPTION: Mr Grigoriev, could you please be given bundles E4 and E8. You have made I think two witness statements for this trial, the first of which is at bundle E4, flag 6 E4/06/89. Is this your first witness statement?

A. Yes, it is.

Q. And if you look at page 112, is that your signature?

A. Yes, it is my signature.

Q. And is that statement true?

A. Yes, I consider this statement to be true.

Q. Now, would you turn to bundle E8, please, flag 12 E8/12/152. Is this your second witness statement?

A. Yes, this is my second witness statement.

Q. And is it your signature that we see on page 166?

A. Yes, this is my signature.

Q. And is that statement also true?

A. Yes, this statement is also true.

MR SUMPTION: Thank you very much. If you wait there, some questions will be asked of you.

Cross-examination by MR COLTON

MR COLTON: Mr Grigoriev, you live in Russia, that's right?

A. Yes, I do live in Russia and I've been born there as well.

- Q. And as for your background, you graduated from the Moscow Institute for Energy, is that right?
- A. In Russian, the correct expression is Moskovsky Energetichesky Institute, the Moscow Institute for Energy, the Moscow Energy Institute.
- Q. And then you served in the Russian armed forces, is that correct?
- A. Yes, this is correct.
- Q. You then worked in a series of senior positions in SBS Bank, later SBS-Agro, is that correct?
- A. It didn't -- it wasn't called SBS from the start, but if to omit the host of renamings of the banks, then this is correct.
- Q. In 2007, you then became chairman of the management board of Dvizheniye Bank, that's right, isn't it?
- A. Are you saying year 2007? Yes, this is correct.
- Q. And following a merger, you then became chairman of the board of directors of Vostochny Bank, is that also correct?
- A. Yes, this is correct, and I remain in this position as of today.
- Q. And so it's right, is it, that your entire business career has been in Russia?
- A. Yes, this is true. One could even be more specific: all of my work activity has been spent in banking.

- Q. And your personal ties, your family live in Russia as well, is that correct?
- A. Yes.
- Q. You have no connections to England, is that right?
- A. No, I've visited here only once, even with touristy purposes, as a tourist.
- Q. Thank you. Would you please be given bundle H(C)8 and would you turn in that bundle to page 1 in the Russian H(C)8/1 or 1T in the English version H(C)8/1T. This is a document which is described as a "Record of witness interview", it's dated 5 March 2009, and the witness in question is yourself. Do you see that?
- A. Yes, I do.
- Q. This is a document to which you refer in your second statement as a copy of the official transcript of the interview on that date. Is that correct?
- A. I do not refer to that document. I am simply clarifying, I am explaining what I have read in that document.
- Q. But you accept, I think, that this is the document which records the interview which you had on that date?
- A. Yes, this is a record of witness interview that happened with me on 5 March 2009 to do with the criminal case against Mr Berezovsky that was initiated in Russian Federation.

- Q. Now, just to understand the process by which this transcript came into existence, we see at page 1, or 1T in the English, at the top, that the interview began at 2.35 pm and was completed by 4.52 pm. Do you see that?
- A. Yes, I do.
- Q. So the interview took a little over two hours, two hours and 17 minutes I think?
- A. I would like to draw the court's attention that this interrogation was made using an audio recording. This is not the formation of a document, this is only done using an audio recording. So I was speaking over two -- two hours and 17 minutes. And then the investigator was taking the notes down on paper in the course of several dates -- days.
- Q. You've mentioned an audio recording. What you don't mention in your witness statement, however, is that you were played this audio recording at the end of your interview on 5 March. But that's correct, isn't it?
- A. There is a document like this, this is correct. But the fact that the audio recording was played to me, that is slightly untrue. In actuality, neither myself nor the investigator were listening to another two hours of the audio recording, but there is such a document and I admit this.

Q. Would you please turn then in the English to 47T H(C)8/47T or in Russian to page 46 H(C)8/46. You will see at the bottom of this page that there are two statements by the investigator followed by a statement by yourself, and it reads:

"Investigator: I understand. In connection with the end of the tape on the audio cassette, the interview of the 5th of March 2009 will now end. The audio recording will be played back to the witness. The time is [4.52]."

Do you see that?

A. Yes, I do. I do see that.

Q. And then it says:

"After the end of the witness interview of Grigoriev, the audio recording on the two audio cassettes of the brand Sony MC30 and the brand TDK MC90 was played back to him. Do you wish to make any declaration?"

And you reply:

"No, I have no declaration."

Do you see that?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. And you have signed under that statement, do you see that?

A. Yes, this is true.

- Q. If you now turn on in the Russian to page 49 H(C)8/49 and in the English to 49.001T H(C)8/49.001T, would you just read the short paragraph on that page to yourself, please. (Pause)
- A. I have read it.
- Q. So again we see that you have signed to confirm that you listened to the interview record on 5 March, isn't that correct?
- A. Yes, I agree.
- Q. So do you now accept that you did in fact listen to the audio recording at the end of the interview on 5 March?
- A. I would agree that I have signed this document, and if you are interested in the way it really happened in actuality, then you would have to accept that there was no real listening through. The investigator suggested not to do it, or to leave me there for another four hours to wait because he had other business to attend to, and of course I went down the road of his suggestion because, after all, it's the General Prosecutor's Office and one doesn't wish to argue in that place.

And it was quite late in the day, and maybe in four hours he might have forgotten that I was sitting there and he would have come back to the office in the morning. So I decided not to take that risk, and I decided that it would be more acceptable for me to leave, since such an option was offered to me, and to leave without listening through this audio recording.

However, that does not change the essence of the fact that indeed I did sign this document, and I bear responsibility by way of my signature for the information that was provided by me.

Q. So you preferred to sign a document knowing it to be untrue rather than waiting around for another couple of hours, is that the evidence you're giving today?

A. No, my evidence is that I have heard this audio recording, and the audio recording was made using my own voice, me speaking. It's just the rechecking. It's not that someone is speaking in my place and I then confirmed that that was true. This is indeed the conversation I had with the investigator, it is indeed recorded in the audio recording.

Indeed I could have listened through it and, based on the voice recording, to make some corrections, but to be honest I do not take the information in using my hearing, I'm a visual -- my memory is visual. I like to read the documents in writing and the -- perhaps it wouldn't be very helpful for me to listen to the audio recording at that point in time.

And then again, my own voice recorded -- usually, for example, I don't like hearing myself being recorded, myself speaking. Sorry, this is a joke, I do apologise.

- Q. You began that answer by saying that you did in fact listen to the audio recording. Just to be clear, on what date do you say you listened to the audio recording?
- A. I didn't say I did listen through it. Perhaps something was incorrectly translated. I am saying that I have signed a document supporting, confirming, that this audio recording was listened to by myself, but in actuality this situation was such that I did not listen to this audio recording.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think what he meant was he heard himself speaking, Mr Colton, so I don't think it's worth spending too much time on that particular point.

MR COLTON: Very well. You then went away and came back five days later, is that correct?

- A. According to the summons, I did come back in order to give repeat evidence, and at the same time to sign an interview record in writing.
- Q. So you had five days to consider the evidence which you had given in order to consider whether any of the answers you had given were misleading or inaccurate in any way, is that right?
- A. I had five days, yes, that's true. But I didn't see great pressing need to think over some answers.

Everything is quite clear there without double meaning, and I have provided the correct information in a correct way.

Q. And then, when you returned, you had a further opportunity to review the transcript, is that correct?

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. In fact, we can see at page 49T H(C)8/49T, or page 48 in the Russian H(C)8/48, that between 5.50 pm and 7.50 pm on the 10th you came back to review the evidence, is that correct?

A. At the same time an additional witness statement was provided and additional interview protocol was drawn up. That wasn't a time for familiarisation. This is a time for the interview, that was interview time, and you do have the materials about that interview as well.

That interview was not done using an audio recording, that was done in a, so to speak, classic way, ie there was a question, then there was a recording of the answer, given an option of that answer, approving, agreeing that answer, and the final agreement.

If you look at it, the text of these interviews, they are quite distinctly different. And if you look at the interview protocol that was used, using the audio recording, if it had some rough bits, there aren't any rough bits, any strange bits in the second interview.

It's all quite succinct and presented in, I would say, a legal language.

Q. Would you please turn to page 3 in the Russian H(C)8/3 or 3T in the English version H(C)8/3T.

MR SUMPTION: The [draft] transcript has come up with "presented in illegal language".

THE INTERPRETER: I do apologise, "in a legal language". This is the interpreter speaking.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR COLTON: On page 3 or 3T, towards the bottom, you will see that there is a declaration which you have made that you have been warned of criminal liability for refusing to give evidence or for giving evidence known to be false. Do you see that?

A. I can see it on the second page.

Q. Page 2 H(C)8/2. I'm sorry, thank you.

In 2009, you didn't have a criminal record, did you?

A. Yes, I did not have a criminal record, neither in 2009 nor in 2011. I do not have a criminal record.

Q. And you would not have wanted to get a criminal record for giving false testimony, one imagines. Is that fair?

A. I think so, yes. I have no doubts about that.

Q. If we look in the Russian version only, behind pages 2, 3 and 4, for example, we see that you signed, at the bottom of each page of the transcript, do you see that?

A. Yes, I do. Yes, I do see that.

Q. And again if we turn to page 47 in the Russian H(C)8/47, or 48T in the English H(C)8/48T, you were given the opportunity to comment but had no comments to make. Is that correct?

A. Yes, I had no comments.

Q. Nonetheless, Mr Grigoriev, you will be aware I think that there are some inconsistencies between the evidence which you gave in 2009 to the Russian authorities and the evidence which you are now asking this court to accept as true. You are aware of that?

A. Yes, I am. It's to my great regret I've found these inconsistencies within these proceedings when the materials of this interview were presented because I had no other access and this criminal case was not closed, and within the Russian legislation access to these materials is not possible.

So the only time when I saw these materials was at the point in time when I was signing them and, to my great regret, I have seen that these insignificant details from the points of the matter of this interview. But the details that turned out significant within these proceedings, yes, indeed, there were these inconsistencies and discrepancies, and I do regret profusely, and I would like to inform you, that I have taken my initiative and tried to get in touch with Mr Lomovtsov, the investigator, with this regard, if he were to consider this information to be important, to make these corrections.

So far it didn't work out and I'm not quite sure that that investigator continues to work on this criminal case. I wasn't given another contact but I do have this intention and, if my Lady may allow me, I could clarify later the reason for why these inconsistencies have arisen, but I do admit that they do exist there and I do regret about that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you be a bit slower in your evidence, please, because the translator is a bit behind you.

When you speak, can you speak more slowly.

A. I shall do my best.

MR COLTON: Mr Grigoriev, would you please take up page 13 in the Russian H(C)8/13 or 15T in English H(C)8/15T. You'll see towards the top of the page that you are asked if you are acquainted with Hans-Peter Jenni, and you say not. Then you are asked about a series of other individuals, ending with Roman Arkadievich Abramovich, do you see that?

A. Yes, I do see that.

Q. And you respond to that question:

"Just as I said before, sometimes I read the newspapers, but I myself have never seen him or met him."

Do you see that?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Would you now please look at paragraph 14 of your first witness statement. It's in bundle E4 behind tab 6, at page 106 E4/06/106 in the Russian, or 94 in the English E4/06/94.

A. Yes, I have opened the page.

Q. Perhaps you would just read paragraph 14 to yourself, just to refresh your memory of that. (Pause)

A. I've read it.

Q. Here in paragraph 14 you claim to recall meeting Mr Abramovich for the first time in 1995. Do you see that?

A. Yes, I do see that.

Q. So it is clear, I suggest, that either paragraph 14 of your witness statement, or the evidence which you gave to the Russian prosecutor, which we have just looked at, was untrue. Is that right?

A. I do admit that the interview materials do not correspond to the materials or to the information that I have provided in my witness statements. I do admit this. And I have an explanation to this.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. What's the explanation, please?

A. Thank you very much for that opportunity because it was important for me to say that as well.

There are two points that I would like to draw the court's attention to, the first one is that we have touched upon already, that's the form of interrogation, that was done by audio recording.

And I could assure that over the two and a half hours, over two and a half hours that I have spent in that audio recording I have talked unfortunately a lot more than was finally captured in this interview, in these interrogation or interview materials.

So the investigator was quite selective with regard to the information that he received from me, and on the matters that were of interest to him, you can find more detailed information in that interview. Where the questions were not significant for him, there are certain omissions. That's the first point I was going to make.

And the second point is, it's on the matter of the interview. From the very beginning, the interrogation, the investigator said that he is interested only in one loan received by Runicom company. There were many such loans and he said he won't discuss any other loans apart from this one, and the information with regard to any other matters was not of interest to him on principle.

If we were to look at the interview materials, it starts from Hans-Peter Jenni. I am asked whether I knew such and such individuals. And Mr Abramovich, as far as I understand, is number five in that list.

If I wanted to say that I did not know him and never met him, perhaps I would give similar information in a similar form as I've done with the previous four gentlemen. But with regard to Mr Abramovich I have started answering this question in a broader manner, and here there is a reference to my previous answers. And my previous answers were as follows, that most likely I do know these people but they don't know me because my meetings with them had a fleeting, insignificant technical nature and it's very likely that they would not remember these meetings.

And within this detailed answer the investigator asked me the question: so did you meet with regard to this loan? And I said no, I had no meetings with regard to that loan, I had no interviews, I had no conversation with regard to these loans.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay.

A. And basically -- and there is a sub-question under these two phrases.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Well, let's leave it there.

Mr Colton, you go on, please.

MR COLTON: Mr Grigoriev, the first attempt to explain away this inconsistency which you just gave was you said that there was a lack of detail.

I suggest to you, though, that your answer is entirely clear and isn't lacking in detail. You said in terms, "I have never seen him or met him."

That was simply a lie, is that what you're now telling the court?

A. I never met and had no meetings with regard to Runicom loan. In that part of my answer, the answer is complete and it is true.

Q. Do you say that you knew that this statement made here was incorrect but decided to leave it incorrect? Or do you say that you didn't realise that it was incorrect at all?

A. When I was answering, when I was giving my answer, I was answering in more detail, and not all of that information was recorded in this interview, and my fault is that I did not pay attention to this when I was signing this interview. I indeed did focus on other issues that were of a more complicated nature.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Grigoriev, it may be that you're speaking too close to the microphone.

AUDIO EQUIPMENT OPERATOR: Sorry, it's that his headphones are too high.

If you could just lower the volume of his headphones down a touch on the unit. The volume of his headphones is too high. (Pause)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is that better? Okay, let's try.

MR COLTON: Mr Grigoriev, in an answer you gave a moment ago, you said that:

"When I was answering, when I was giving my answer, I was answering in more detail, and not all of that information was recorded in this interview, and my fault is that I did not pay attention to this when I was signing this interview."

Would you please, though, take up your second witness statement, that's in bundle E8.

(Pause to rectify audio problem)

Mr Grigoriev, I was asking you to take up bundle E8, tab 12 at page 164 in the Russian E8/12/164 or 156 in the English E8/12/156 and read to yourself paragraph 7, please.

THE INTERPRETER: Now the witness cannot hear anything.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you hear anything? (Pause)

Right, Mr Colton, start again, put the question again, please.

MR COLTON: Would you read to yourself paragraph 7 on that page, please. You should have page 164 in the Russian, 156 in the English.

Do you see that?

A. Yes, I have read it.

Q. You see, the evidence which you gave in your second statement is that you took, or you believe it most likely that you took a deliberate decision to leave this error in your interview transcript because you wished to leave as quickly as possible.

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. Which is different to the evidence you've just given to this court, where you suggested you hadn't actually noticed that there was a problem with the evidence at all. Do you wish to comment on that?

A. Yes, certainly, I would like to comment. What I wanted to say is that I did not notice that error as an error. I perhaps have read it and didn't pay due attention to this. But here, in my witness statement, I'm saying that it's quite possible that even if I did notice and pay attention to this, then it's absolutely definite that I would ask for that to be corrected because that would have caused a significant loss of time and there wasn't much point from the point of the essence of that interrogation. There wasn't much significance. It wasn't a separate issue that they wanted to study during that interview.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think something may be lost in translation.

I'm going to put the question to you, Mr Grigoriev. Are you saying in your witness statement that it's quite possible that, even if you did notice and paid attention to the error, that you would have asked for it to have been corrected, or that you might not have asked for it to be corrected?

A. At that point in time, it seemed to me that this issue had nothing to do with the essence of the interview, with the point of the interview. And just to remind you that I came to draw up the prepared protocol, the prepared interview. It wasn't done during the interview, it was done over several days, and I was suggested -- it was put to me to sign it in the ready format. And if I were to make any corrections, that would lead to a complete redrawing of these materials, a complete redrafting, and that would again cause a significant loss of time.

And certainly, looking at orthographical errors, typos, some separate words, it wouldn't be much point to do that, it would be not rational on my part, and I thought that -- at that point in time I didn't give due attention to this issue because it seemed to me that it was not significant. It didn't affect the issues that I was interviewed on in the first interview and in the second interview and on which I am giving my evidence.

So my fault is that I did not pay due importance to this. Now I do understand this but then I thought it was a minor issue, a very minor issue. Maybe I was wrong, and I do regret about this, but at that point in time, that seemed to me to be the case.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR COLTON: So you are saying, are you, Mr Grigoriev, that you took a decision yourself as to on which issues it was important to tell the truth and on which issues it was all right to leave the investigator with false evidence. Is that your evidence?

A. I make my decisions myself. This is a true statement and what's important or not important for the investigation, that was certainly down to the investigator. And for the matters that were of interest to him -- and he didn't ask simple questions, he didn't ask questions, for example: do you know him? Do you not know him? He was asking detailed questions, he was asking various questions to study the matter that he was interested in, and that question was of an interjectory nature and that can be seen from the materials.

Q. Just to be clear, Mr Grigoriev, you have referred now on more than one occasion to your subsequent interview.

I think you suggested that that subsequent interview was on 10 March 2009, the same time as you were reviewing the transcript, but the interview actually took place on 23 March, isn't that correct?

A. I do not remember the dates. They can be seen from the document.

Q. Well, let me show you then in this same --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, just a second, how much longer are you going to be with this witness?

MR COLTON: A little while, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Then I think I'm going to rise now.

Mr Grigoriev, it's important that you don't speak to anybody about your evidence or the answers you've given this afternoon or about the case. Do you understand that?

THE WITNESS: Yes, I do understand that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay. 10.15 tomorrow morning.

(4.16 pm)

(10.15 am)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Colton.

MR COLTON: Mr Grigoriev, at the end of yesterday, I was dealing with your suggestion that you did not have the opportunity to read the transcript of 5 March 2009 interview when you returned to the General Prosecutor's Office on 10 March 2009 because, you said, you were instead subjected to a second interview. You pointed out that the second interview transcript is also in the bundle.

Would you please take up bundle H(C)8 again. Would you please turn in this bundle to 95 H(C)8/95 in the Russian or 95T in English H(C)8/95T. This is the transcript of the second interview to which you referred. That's right, isn't it?

A. Well, it is the second one in your sequence of documents, the way you count the documents. I must say that I've had more than two meetings with that investigator and, my Lady, I would need your assistance here, if I may, because I've not been able to consult with anyone on this.

Every interview like this is covered by my obligation not to disclose the contents and the two interviews here have been disclosed within the framework of the French investigation, someone has done that. Disclosure, I do not know to what extent that was done in an appropriate way, but this has been done. Now, the interviews which are not here I believe have not been disclosed, and do I understand correctly that they are still covered by my obligation not to disclose, because the investigation is still going on, the matter has not been closed, the materials have not been forwarded to any court for a hearing yet and, therefore, I really do not know what my line of conduct should be in this respect.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay. These are interviews which you gave in Russia, yes, to the investigating authorities in Russia?

A. Yes, that is correct, and the criminal case was open in Russia, it's a Russian criminal case, not a French criminal case.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. And under Russian law, you think you have obligations of confidentiality in relation to those, do you?

A. Well, maybe even in these materials there are some documents which I have signed which say that I have an obligation not to disclose. I do not know whether it was scheduled as an exhibit here, but it was part of the investigation.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay. How many more interviews are there which are not covered by the transcripts which we've seen already?

A. Well, I would not be able to give you the exact figure, but on the whole I think it was approximately four interviews, maybe five or maybe three, I may be confused a little bit but I think, I think, I believe there were four interviews.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Four interviews in total?

A. About four interviews within the -- conducted by this specific investigator. There have been other investigators, but this particular investigator, with him I think I've had about four meetings with that particular investigator.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay. Of which only two are in the documents that you've been taken to?

A. These two interviews I can see bring -- one common feature is that they focused on the Runicom loan. Other interviews focused on other things, they had other objectives.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Well, until counsel for either side make an application to me for sight of those further transcripts, you can regard yourself as bound by your obligations under Russian law of confidentiality.

A. Thank you. Thank you very much.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You understand? So until I make a specific ruling on the application of counsel for either side, you can regard yourself as not under an obligation to disclose what was said in those interviews.

A. I have understood. Thank you very much, my Lady.

MR COLTON: Mr Grigoriev, in your answer yesterday, you said of the second interview:

"At the same time an additional witness statement was provided and additional interview protocol was drawn up."

My Lady, this is Day 27, page 127, lines 11 to 15:

"That wasn't a time for familiarisation. This is a time for the interview, that was interview time, and you do have the materials about that interview ..."

So yesterday, when you were trying to explain that you hadn't read the transcripts, you relied upon the interview for which you said we had the materials.

Do you understand?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, I don't understand the question. I think you're going to have to put it more simply or take him to the transcript because it's too difficult for him to understand that.

MR COLTON: Yesterday, Mr Grigoriev, you told us that you didn't have the opportunity on 10 March 2009 to read the transcript of the 5 March meeting. Do you recall that?

A. Well, maybe I misspoke or you misunderstood me. What I was saying was that I had not listened to the tape recording, to the audio recording, that's number one. The minutes itself, the text of the interview, when it was offered to me that I should read it, I did read it but I did not focus on the issues that we discussed, you and I discussed yesterday: have or have not there been those meetings?

What I focused on were the questions that were the basis, the reason for that particular interview, and that was the loan that had been provided by Runicom. Some matters related to the way that loan was recorded and so on and so forth. So those were the details that I focused on and read very attentively before signing off on that.

Now, so far as my acquaintance or lack of acquaintance with those people who were not related to that loan are concerned, well, obviously, I did not pay attention to those, and I'm really sorry now I did not pay attention to them then. And, as I mentioned yesterday, it is my intention now to make adjustments to correct that, and because the materials, the case materials, have not yet gone to court I do hope that these inaccuracies will not result in any serious consequences, because the way I see it they do not have any -- they did not have any serious importance.

Q. Are you saying, Mr Grigoriev, that you didn't realise in 2009 that Mr Abramovich was in any way connected with Runicom?

A. No. What I meant both then and now is that the signing and the performance of this contract with Runicom was something that Mr Abramovich definitely did not have anything to do with.

It was an absolutely standard operation for the bank. It was one of many similar operations, it was not conspicuous in any way, it was not different. It only became different, it was distinguished in -- within the framework of that criminal case and now within the framework of these hearings. At that point in time it was not distinguishable and it was not conspicuous in any way, it was not different from the many others.

Q. So you did know that Mr Abramovich was connected with Runicom when you denied having met him, is that right?

A. I did know that Runicom, the company, and we knew that it was part of Sibneft group of companies, and Mr Abramovich did have a direct relationship with and a direct link to that group of companies. That I knew.

Q. Could we then move on to another inconsistency in your evidence. Would you please go in H(C)8 to page 13T in English H(C)8/13T or page 11 in Russian H(C)8/11.

Now, the second question on that page, it says:

"Investigator: Then let us go into this in detail. What were the relations between SBS-Agro Bank and the Joint-Stock Company Sibneft in the 1990s? Did SBS-Agro Bank take part in financing the acquisition of shares in Sibneft when that company was formed?"

Do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see this question.

Q. And then you provide an answer:

"The bank took part in this operation."

And you explain about the financing of the operation.

The investigator then asks:

"The client -- whom do you mean? By the word client."

You explain that:

"There were several companies there, organised by Sibneft ... to take part in that auction."

The investigator then asks:

"How could Sibneft itself have been able to form companies to take part in the pledge auction [the loans-for-shares auction]."

And your answer is that you don't remember the names of the companies that had participated.

Then we have this:

"Investigator: These companies, did they represent somebody's interests?

"Witness: Mr Gorodilov discussed this question with us.

"Investigator: Which one?"

And you say:

"Andrei."

Over the page, the investigator clarifies:

"That is, the son."

And you say:

"It was only Andrei with whom we spoke. Just at that time the elder [Gorodilov] came and signed deposit contracts. But again, this was not negotiation, but the execution of contracts."

Do you see that?

- A. Yes, I can see that.
- Q. Would you now please be given bundle E4 at tab 06 again, this is your first witness statement in these proceedings. Paragraph 14 is at page 94 in English E4/06/94 or page 106 in Russian E4/06/106. We looked at paragraph 14 yesterday but you might want to just refresh your memory of it again now. (Pause)

A. Which paragraph is that?

Q. It's paragraph 14. Paragraph 14.

A. Yes, I have read this.

Q. So we see that here and indeed in the following paragraphs you claim that Mr Gorodilov senior, Viktor Gorodilov, was at a meeting devoted to the potential involvement of SBS in the deal. Do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. And if you look on to the end of paragraph 15, we see that you refer there to Mr Abramovich and Mr Viktor Gorodilov deciding or having decided to approach SBS. Do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. If you turn on a couple of pages E4/06/97 you will see paragraph 21 of your statement. In the first line you see there reference to an agreement or having agreed with Mr Abramovich and again Mr Viktor Gorodilov. Do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. So while in the Russian investigation you said very clearly that there was no negotiation with Mr Viktor Gorodilov in respect of the loans-for-shares auction, in these English proceedings you're saying that there was negotiation. Do you wish to comment on that?

A. Yes, I'm happy to -- I'm ready to comment on that. One really needs to have a huge wish to find a disconnect here and I'm sure that you have that wish. Even though I'm following your logic very closely, I did not see any disconnect here. The questions which the investigator was asking were of a purely technical nature, he was not asking about any specific things.

On the whole, he was asking about the interaction during a long period of time. He's not referring to specifically November '95 or -- November '95, but he is in general speaking about the dealings with the group of companies Sibneft. And I am more than happy to confirm that during a protracted period of time of our dealings with that group of companies the main contact person was Andrey Gorodilov, while Viktor Andreyevich Gorodilov did visit the bank several times, at least I can recall two such visits by Viktor Gorodilov. We did have an original, initial meeting and I have a very clear recollection of that and I can explain why.

And then at least there was another -- a further, more technical meeting in order to draft some contracts, some documents. On the whole, other documents that he signed on did not require his visit, but they were signed while he did not visit the bank, but he -- but after that a large number of documents that were signed by Viktor Andreyevich Gorodilov, they were signed without him actually visiting the bank, but at least two meetings I do remember vividly.

Q. Mr Grigoriev, you began that answer by claiming that you were being asked about the interaction over a long period of time. If you turn back again to the Russian interview which I took you to H(C)8/13T, the section which we went through began with a very specific question about financing the acquisition of shares in Sibneft and went on to ask about the loans-for-shares auction. You were clearly being asked about your dealings with Mr Viktor Gorodilov in late 1995, isn't that the truth?

A. Well, you have just referred to the purchase yourself. The purchase of the shares took over a year, you have just said this yourself. You've pronounced this word yourself.

Q. I must suggest to you, Mr Grigoriev, that the evidence which you gave in the Russian investigation is inconsistent with the evidence which you give now and that it shows on your part a willingness to lie if it suits you. Do you wish to comment on that?

A. Well, I categorically disagree with this, and this only means that there are different forms in which this information is being received, which you are trying to compare. And these two forms are incomparable. One thing is an investigation in the General Prosecutor's Office and the questions are being asked of you spontaneously, and you're not prepared, and they ask you about things that had happened ten years prior to that or more than that, and you have to answer immediately, right away, and sometimes those questions are not that important for that particular interview.

And then, on the other hand, it's a totally different situation where you can prepare yourself, you can refresh your recollections and you can set out the information that you have in appropriate manner.

You are now comparing these two different approaches. And when you make a selection, you make a selection in favour of the document that was based on this quick unthought-through provision of information as opposed to a thought-through and well-weighed-up provision of information. This is your judgment call and you're free to make it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, at the end of the day it's my judgment call. I think we've been round this buoy, Mr Colton.

MR COLTON: Yes, my Lady.

Mr Grigoriev, I now want to ask you about SBS's decision to fund NFK's bid in the auction for the right to manage 51 per cent of Sibneft at the end of 1995.

You are aware, I think, that there were a number of meetings during 1995 between Mr Smolensky, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili. Is that right?

- A. Well, I know nothing about meetings with respect to the shares for auctions -- auction that you've just referred to. The meetings were between Mr Berezovsky and Mr Smolensky, they communicated very closely, and they may well have discussed lots of different questions. I usually did not attend those meetings and therefore I don't have any comment on that.

The shares for auctions theme at that time was being widely discussed and debated, and definitely most probably in the course of their meetings they did address that, they did discuss that. And I mean I do not believe that this statement is in contradiction with anything else.

Now, whether Mr Patarkatsishvili took part in that I do not know but, once again, there is nothing that would induce me to say anything to the contrary. No such meetings were held in the bank. One thing that I can assert and I can affirm is that no such meetings have ever been held in the bank.

- Q. So you accept then that there were meetings in 1995 between Mr Berezovsky and Mr Smolensky, is that right?

- A. They did happen regularly, they were meetings of a regular nature, it was a club-type kind of communication. There were both bilateral meetings but then there were other meetings as well, not only with Mr Berezovsky but also with other members of the business community, with other bankers, including such people as Mr Khodorkovsky, Mr Fridman and so on.
- Q. And you believe that Mr Patarkatsishvili also attended some of those meetings, is that correct?
- A. I believe that that is a distinct possibility, this is not inconsistent with my understanding of what was happening at that time.
- Q. Well, not only is it not inconsistent with your understanding, this is exactly what you say in your witness statement.

If you look at paragraph 11 of your first statement, it's in page 93 in English E4/06/93, 105 in Russian E4/06/105, in the last sentence you say:

"I believe that Mr Patarkatsishvili, who I understand to be Mr Berezovsky's right-hand man and who in 1996 became the Chairman of the Board of Directors of Consolidated Bank, also attended some of these meetings."

So that was your belief at the time you wrote this statement, is that right?

A. Well, I think what I'm saying now is approximately the same thing.

Q. When you then go on in paragraph 14 of your statement E4/06/94 to say that:

"... the initial approach to SBS in relation to the Sibneft 1995 auction was made by Mr Abramovich and Mr Viktor ... Gorodilov."

You cannot honestly say that, because you don't know what discussions there had been with Mr Smolensky, isn't that right?

A. No. What I'm saying here is that that meeting was conducted in my presence and I took an active part in that meeting.

Q. That meeting, the meeting to which you refer, may have been in your presence, but the point I'm putting to you is that you do not know that that was the first meeting involving Mr Smolensky and someone asking for SBS's assistance on behalf -- in the 1995 auction. Isn't that correct?

A. Well, I may have not known this. I agree with your logic, I agree with your assumption, but I know this from Mr Smolensky, if this is of any relevance at all. Because at that time we worked very closely with him and we would still communicate quite closely with him. And his view of all the matters that might have been of interest to me is, in principle, well known to me. I know what his opinion is. Now, whether this additional information is relevant or not I do not know, but I do have information, I do know that that meeting was the very first meeting at which the dynamics, the techniques of that particular transaction that, at the end of the day, was implemented, was being first discussed.

Because that information was being discussed initially, no party was prepared, none of them had come to that meeting with a prepared solution. The solution was -- the decision was worked out at that meeting. It was a very simple solution, a very simple decision, therefore they only needed one meeting to arrive at that.

- Q. So the proposal for SBS's involvement pre-dated the meeting but it was at that meeting that the dynamics or the techniques were discussed, is that the evidence you're giving?
- A. I believe that this meeting was the initial, the first meeting at which that proposal was raised, discussed, and a solution was found which, mind you, was a very simple solution, and later on that solution was actually realised, it was implemented. And I have mentioned that I remember that meeting quite well, but I remember this as a meeting with Viktor Andreyevich Gorodilov, not a meeting with Mr Abramovich whom, prior to that meeting or immediately after that meeting, I did not even know who he was.

But Viktor Andreyevich Gorodilov, he -- well, actually there is this term red director, which is used in the case materials, and many people believe that this is a derogatory, negative term. To me, this was the person who was the depository of a lot of knowledge of fantastic expertise, who was running a huge enterprise. He had put that enterprise in place, he was managing a town which was a one-company town at that time. This was a man with whom, when you have meetings, you remember those meetings. I have a lot of respect for those kind of people, and that meeting was a meeting with Gorodilov specifically.

And in order to agree on that meeting, he did not need anyone's protection. That person could have walked into any bank, and everyone, any banker, would have had a meeting with him with great pleasure because you could predict what kind of interest you might have there. You did not need anyone's requests or recommendations, you could do it like that, walk into the bank, and any head of the bank, any chief executive, could have had a meeting with that person. And I recall that meeting very well because that was the only significant meeting with that kind of person, with that specific individual.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Grigoriev, can you keep your answers a bit shorter please. You've made the point but you've made it about three times.

A. I beg your indulgence. I'm very sorry, my Lady.

MR COLTON: Mr Grigoriev, Mr Abramovich has told this court that Mr Berezovsky introduced him to Mr Smolensky, and that Mr Berezovsky helped Mr Smolensky develop the wish and desire to act in the 1995 Sibneft auction. Were you aware that this was evidence which Mr Abramovich had given?

A. Yes, I do know that.

Q. And so, if Mr Abramovich is telling the truth on this point, then it was Mr Berezovsky who introduced him to Mr Smolensky, and this was not the first meeting; the meeting to which you refer was not the first meeting which raised the issue of involvement in Sibneft.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, the implication that that was Mr Abramovich's evidence is mistaken and it shouldn't be put to the witness in those terms. It can be put as a suggestion of counsel but not on the basis that that is what Mr Abramovich said.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

Well, I'm not going to go back to the transcripts,

Mr Colton, to see what Mr Abramovich said. So please put it on the basis that it is your client's case that that was the position.

MR COLTON: My Lady, yes. If later we do seek the transcript reference, it's Day 17, page 100, lines 10 and following.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Well, there is a limited utility in putting to witness B what witness A has said in certain circumstances. I think it's better you just put the proposition to him and the witness can deal with it on the basis of his own knowledge.

MR COLTON: Yes, my Lady.

Do you accept, Mr Grigoriev, that Mr Berezovsky introduced Mr Abramovich to Mr Smolensky?

A. I think that this was indeed the case. There is no way I can know that with certainty, but I believe that that was the case.

Q. And could you accept that Mr Berezovsky assisted in persuading Mr Smolensky to agree to the involvement of SBS in the 1995 Sibneft auction?

A. Well, if we make the proviso that the format of participation kept changing and originally something much more sophisticated was being thought about, then that might well have been the case. But the way this particular option was realised, that particular option was raised at that particular meeting and it was not a very sophisticated thing, something that might have required the involvement of Mr Smolensky or Mr Berezovsky. This was a very simple thing, and it was realised in a very simple way and it required the authority of myself or maybe even the authority of my employees only.

Q. So if I've understood you correctly, Mr Grigoriev, your evidence is now that this meeting which you describe in paragraph 14 E4/06/94 was not the first discussion relating to SBS's involvement in the Sibneft auction --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I don't think he's put it quite like that. I think he said he didn't know but it could have been. I don't think he's giving evidence from his actual knowledge as to whether there was a prior meeting.

Do you know from your own knowledge whether or not there was a prior meeting?

A. I have no knowledge of that.

MR COLTON: I shall move on to another point then.

Would you please read to yourself paragraph 23 of your first witness statement. It's at page 98 in English E4/06/98 and 110 in Russian E4/06/110.

(Pause)

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. Now, you're here responding to the evidence of Dr Dubov which, for my Lady's note only, is at paragraphs 66 to 72 of Mr Dubov's first statement D1/12/275. And Dr Dubov's evidence, and I don't think you dispute this in your witness statement, is that Dr Dubov attended SBS with the Logovaz seal towards the end of 1995 having been told by Mr Patarkatsishvili that a guarantee from Logovaz might be required.

Now, I know we'll have a disagreement perhaps on the nature or the purpose of that guarantee, but I don't think you dispute that part of the events at least, is that right?

A. Well, I will just try to reiterate what I attempted to set out in my witness statement. I do not recall ever having seen Mr Dubov or Mrs Nosova. To be honest, I do not recall that. Having said that, it may well be that such meetings have taken place, I just do not recall those.

So far as Mr Dubov's witness statement is concerned, to the effect that he came to the office with a seal it is a possibility, but I never discussed that with him and I never met with him. Once again, as an assumption, as an assumption, as to why he went there with a seal, if he did go there with a seal, what I can only say is that it might have been related to the ORT loan which was being processed in December '95, and some serious money in December had been provided by the bank, and in that sense the bank did need some security, did need some additional guarantees because that particular loan was not processed properly in terms of credit risks.

So far as the Sibneft loan was concerned, there was no credit risk, we did not need any security, we did not need any additional guarantees, much less from Logovaz whose financial capabilities were not big ones so far as I was concerned. I did not know what Logovaz guarantee was worth in '95, and I was not -- I did not know whether or not they were actually capable of providing a security or a guarantee to the extent of $100 million. I do have serious questions about that.

Q. Now, in fairness to you, Mr Grigoriev, Dr Dubov doesn't specifically say that you were at the meeting which he recalls attending. He says it could have been you or it could have been Mr Raskazov, another senior employee of the bank. So I'm not suggesting to you that you were necessarily at the meeting.

But you accept that a guarantee of an amount close to $100 million in favour of SBS by Logovaz might have been prepared, you can't dispute that I think?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I don't think he accepts it. I think you must put your questions a bit more specifically,

Mr Colton.

MR COLTON: My Lady, I'm reading from his witness statement.

It's in paragraph 23, in the fourth line:

"I can only comment that such guarantee might have been prepared ..."

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: "... might have been prepared ..."

Anyway put the question again.

MR COLTON: From your witness statement, Mr Grigoriev, you accept I think that a guarantee for an amount close to $100 million in favour of SBS by Logovaz might have been prepared, is that right?

A. Well, this was up to Logovaz, and within Logovaz any kind of activity may have been conducted and that was probably something that I had no knowledge of. But what I do know is that neither with respect to the Ministry of Finance loan, nor unfortunately with respect to ORT loan, no guarantees were provided to the bank. And so far as I understand, we are now speaking about a properly legally processed document with the signatures, with all the seals attached, ie those documents that would have been properly recorded.

And I can tell you with certainty, and responsibly, that no such documents were ever received by the bank. The ORT loan in terms of the amount, when we're talking about $100 million, the final payable by ORT with respect to the bank by the time when it matured was about $55 million. So we were talking serious liabilities and then a serious guarantee.

So even in terms of the timeline and in terms of the amounts there is some crossover here. So it is possible that that kind of security was being discussed, but that was discussed with respect to the ORT loan because, for the Sibneft loan, there was simply no need for that.

Q. You say in your witness statement, and you've said again now, that the ORT loan was only in the region of about $55 million. Is that right?

A. In February, March 1997 I believe that loan was repaid and the total outstanding amount at that time was about $55 million. But in December 1995, that outstanding amount was probably about 20 million, maybe a little bit less than that.

Q. Because in fact the first tranche of the loan was only made in December '95, is that right?

A. That is correct.

Q. And as for this loan, you've explained in paragraph 13 of your first witness statement, which is at page 94 E4/06/94, or 106 in Russian E4/06/106, that this was a political project rather than a matter of business. That's in the opening few lines, do you see that?

A. Yes.

- Q. And that being so, I suggest it was extremely unlikely that there would have been discussion of a guarantee in the order of $100 million in support of such political project at a time in particular when the first tranche of $20 million or less was being paid.
- A. I'm not sure I got the gist of your question. Could you kindly repeat?
- Q. You have accepted that the ORT loan was a political project rather than a business matter. As such, I suggest to you that it is extremely unlikely that there would have been discussion of a $100 million guarantee to support it. That is what I'm asking you to comment upon.
- A. Well, if I understood you correctly, the question is whether or not a $100 million guarantee, and you are focusing on that particular amount, could it be discussed at that time with respect to the ORT loan?

Once again, I believe that that is not very likely, and I do not recall any discussion of such a guarantee with respect to either the ORT or the Sibneft loan, as I have already mentioned.

I'm simply responding to what Mr Dubov has said who has alleged that he was sitting there, with a seal there, and was prepared to record that guarantee. But the ORT loan guarantee was never recorded even though

I did believe that it was a difficult loan, a complicated and rather risky loan, and we were all delighted when that loan was repaid in early 1997.

- Q. Do you recall that the bid in the Sibneft loans-for-shares auction in December 1995 by NFK was for $100.3 million?
- A. Yes, I know that the transaction was executed to that -- rather, the transaction was performed to that amount, to the extent of that amount.
- Q. And do you recall also that there had been a $3 million deposit paid in advance?
- A. Yes, that was one of the terms and conditions of that particular auction, but we refused to make that money available because it was not refundable. And if the company lost the bid, lost the auction, the money would not have been refunded, from what I understand, and therefore the company had to find and raise that money on its own, and we did not assist the company in that.
- Q. SBS did assist in the remaining $97.3 million even if it had in fact received the money from elsewhere in advance, is that right?
- A. SBS was acting at the instruction of a client of the bank. The group of companies placed a deposit to the relevant amount. We recorded security documents whereby those deposits became pledged -- they were pledged as collateral under the Ministry of Finance, under the Ministry of Finance loan which was provided to the extent of the same amount.

Q. I suggest to you, Mr Grigoriev, that if there was a guarantee being discussed for close to $100 million, it is much more likely to have been in relation to the Sibneft auction than any ORT loan. Do you wish to comment on that?

A. Yes, I would like to comment. If I have money to that amount, what kind of guarantee do I need? And also, excuse me, there's a rhetorical question but I would like to ask it anyway. To what amount could Logovaz provide a guarantee at all? Are you saying it was solvable, it was credible to the amount of $100 million? I don't think so.

If they had had such money themselves then why are we altogether collecting $5 million in order to pay ORT salaries? Because chances were that people would go off on a New Year's vacation without receiving their salaries. Now, if they did have that possibility available to them, why didn't they avail themselves of that possibility? I believe that Logovaz did not have that ability to provide guarantees to the extent of $100 million. They simply were not able to do that.

MR COLTON: My Lady, I have no further questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much, Mr Colton.

Mr Malek?

MR MALEK: No questions, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Adkin.

MR ADKIN: No questions, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Sumption.

MR SUMPTION: No re-examination.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much indeed,

Mr Grigoriev, for coming along to give your evidence.

(The witness withdrew)

I propose to start the next witness before the break.

MR SUMPTION: Before the break.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, before we do that, the next witness is Mr Tenenbaum but before he takes the stand can I just raise with your Ladyship the question of the trust deeds which arose in the course of Mr Shvidler's evidence.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR SUMPTION: Your Ladyship raised with me the possibility that the trust deeds might permit the addition of further beneficiaries. Can I, in the hope of defusing this situation, say what the situation is and how we propose it should be dealt with.

There were two successive trusts, there was a Liechtenstein trust which was operative between 1999 and 2001, and there was a Cyprus trust which was operative from 1 March 2001 and still is. The beneficiaries under the Liechtenstein trust were Mr Abramovich and, on his death, his children.

The foundation, essentially the equivalent of the trustees, had a power to add relatives of Mr Abramovich to the beneficiaries with the consent of the protector, Mr Shvidler. There was also a power to alter the whole of the regulations which could, in principle, have been used to alter the beneficiaries but only with the consent of Mr Abramovich himself.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So, theoretically, it was one of those trusts where they could have put in anybody but only with the consent of the protector?

MR SUMPTION: Well, no, it would have to be a relative if they added beneficiaries.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Oh, I see.

MR SUMPTION: But they could have altered the whole regulations, thereby reframing the provisions about extra beneficiaries with the consent of Mr Abramovich. So by that route it could have been done.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR SUMPTION: The position in relation to Cyprus is very slightly different. The beneficiaries there were

Mr Abramovich and, after his death, his children. The trustees had a power, in very common form, to add anybody as a beneficiary with the consent of the protector who was, again, Mr Shvidler. The position in relation to that trust is that Sibneft was among the assets but Rusal was not. That may well make the point that there were possibilities under both of those deeds for adding beneficiaries, which I think was the point that was of interest to your Ladyship when this last came up.

What we have done about this, and as your Ladyship will appreciate, this is extremely sensitive --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I can appreciate that.

MR SUMPTION: -- not just for personal reasons but for the security implications.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, certainly the Cyprus trust provisions are. The Liechtenstein I question, but I can see that in relation --

MR SUMPTION: That may well be right.

We are also slightly concerned because, and I'm certainly not levelling accusations against anyone at the moment, but documents from our disclosure have, as I understand it, been offered for sale in Moscow, which is a source of some concern for us and we would not like to see this category of documents joining those which have been treated in that way.

Now, what we have done --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, I can't deal with that unless a specific application is made to me from either side.

MR SUMPTION: No, I am only explaining to your Ladyship why this is a matter of sensitivity.

At any rate, what we have done, we have supplied to Mr Rabinowitz for his eyes only the Cyprus deed, and we will, as soon as it arrives, which we expect to be some time today, supply him, for his eyes only, with the Liechtenstein deed so as to verify what I have just told your Ladyship.

We hope that that will be enough, but at any rate we don't accept that the matter can be relevant to any greater extent, and if my learned friend wishes to make further use of them, then it will need to be the subject of an application. But we hope that that will effectively defuse the matter.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, thank you.

Mr Rabinowitz, I'll wait, and if you wish to make an application for anything further I will entertain it, obviously.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm grateful for that, my Lady. And indeed what my learned friend says reflects upon the conversation we had, save for this, I think my learned friend was content for me to show it also to my solicitor, Mr Hastings.

MR SUMPTION: That has, as I understand it, been agreed also.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. If you want to take it further, Mr Rabinowitz --

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm grateful, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, then I will take the break now.
Ten minutes.

(11.13 am)

(A short break)

(11.29 am)

MR SUMPTION: I call Mr Tenenbaum. He will be giving his evidence in English.

MR EUGENE TENENBAUM (affirmed)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Do sit down, Mr Tenenbaum.

THE WITNESS: Thank you.

Examination-in-chief by MR SUMPTION

MR SUMPTION: Mr Tenenbaum, could I ask that you be given bundles E3, E4 and E8. In bundle E3, would you turn to flag 11 E3/11/71.

A. I have.

Q. Now, you made three witness statements for the purposes of this trial, I think five altogether, and this is the third witness statement, the first for the purpose of the trial. Is that right?

A. Yes.

Q. It's your signature that we see on the last page, page 113 of the bundle?

A. It is my signature.

Q. Now, there are some corrections which you wish to make to this which I think you probably have in front of you on a separate piece of paper. Is that right?

Does your Ladyship have that?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I have two copies, thank you.

MR SUMPTION: Are those corrections you wish to make to your third witness statement, the first for the purpose of the trial?

A. Yes, it's true.

Q. Subject to those corrections, is this witness statement true?

A. Yes, it is.

Q. Now, could I ask you to turn, please, to bundle E4 at flag 9 E4/09/155.

A. Yes.

Q. Is this your fourth witness statement?

A. Yes.

Q. And is that signed by you on the final page, page 158 of the bundle?

A. Yes, it is.

Q. Is that also true?

A. Yes, it is.

Q. Could we please now turn to bundle E8 at flag 1
E8/01/1. Is this your fifth witness statement?

A. Yes, it is.

Q. Signed by you on page 12 of the bundle?

A. Yes, it is.

Q. Is that true?

A. Yes, it is.

MR SUMPTION: Thank you very much.

Cross-examination by MR RABINOWITZ

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Tenenbaum, your evidence is that in -- this is what you say E8/01/10:

"In Russia management is key and every significant appointee at Sibneft from its creation in 1995 was Mr Abramovich's."

Is that right?

A. Yes, I believe so.

Q. And the result, you say, in your evidence, is that:

"People loyal to him were embedded deeply across the organisation..."

Is that correct?

A. Yes, it is.

Q. And you were appointed to Sibneft in 1998 as head of corporate finance, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. This would have been a significant appointment for Sibneft, I suppose, so you would have been appointed by Mr Abramovich?

A. Correct, with Mr Shvidler.

Q. And you explain that it followed several meetings with Mr Abramovich and Mr Shvidler, and you also say this E3/11/78, that having met Mr Abramovich and Mr Shvidler you agreed to join Sibneft because of your "belief in Mr Abramovich's business acumen and personal integrity."

Did you not feel the same way about Mr Shvidler?

A. On the contrary, Mr Shvidler was the one that hired me so I felt that way as well, of course, about him.

Q. Prior to joining Sibneft, you were a director of Salomon Brothers in London?

A. Correct.

Q. In 1997, when you were part of the team working on the offering circular for Sibneft's Eurobond issue, you tell us you were a relatively senior vice president at Salomon, is that right?

A. I was a vice president, yes.

Q. A relatively senior vice president?

A. I was made director when I left the following year, yes, so I was senior.

Q. You also tell us that you had been given to understand that you had a promising future within the ranks of the company, is that right?

A. Correct.

Q. Can one therefore assume that you were offered a very attractive remuneration package in order to move to Sibneft?

A. Correct.

Q. Were you offered any shares or interest in shares in Sibneft?

A. No, I wasn't.

Q. You continue to work for Mr Abramovich today as managing director of MHC Services, is that right?

A. Correct.

Q. And you're also a director of Chelsea Football Club Limited?

A. Correct.

Q. You have now been working for Mr Abramovich's company for well over ten years?

A. Yes. More than that even.

Q. And you're a member of the team of people that Mr Abramovich trusts and relies upon, aren't you?

A. I hope so. Yes. Sorry.

Q. And you are in fact a close friend of Mr Abramovich's?

- A. I think so, yes.
- Q. And Mr Abramovich tells us that you work together, relax together and generally spend time together, is that right?
- A. Relax? Yes. He's not very relaxed, but yes, we spend time together.
- Q. All right. He also told the court that you assisted him in the preparation of his witness statements in these proceedings.
- A. I primarily helped Roman in this process, yes.
- Q. Can you tell us how you helped Mr Abramovich in that process?
- A. Well, I coordinated with the lawyers, with Skadden, to ensure that a lot of the witnesses were on time and -- because they were in Russia, but primarily I was helping Roman understand the issues in this case.
- Q. Well, I put to you that Mr Abramovich told the court that you assisted him in the preparation of his witness statement in these proceedings.
- A. Preparation of the witness statement itself?
- Q. I think his witness statements.
- A. Okay.
- Q. And that's right, isn't it? Because the answer you gave --
- A. Yes, okay, fine, yes, I assisted him, correct.

- Q. -- seemed to relate to coordinating when other witnesses would be at various places, but it obviously went beyond that?
- A. Sorry, sorry, I helped Roman understand the issues in the case, yes.
- Q. Ms Panchenko tells us that you were one of a group of people who got together before producing witness statements to see if you could together recollect events, is that right?
- A. That is correct, yes.
- Q. Now, could I ask you, please, to go to paragraph 8 of your third witness statement, that's bundle E3, tab 11, you'll find it at page 73 E3/11/73. This is where you set out your commentary on the Sibneft Eurobond issue in 1997. You've explained that at this time you were working for Salomon Brothers, correct?
- A. Correct.
- Q. You also tell us that although you were relatively senior you didn't have overall responsibility for the offering. Overall responsibility for the offering was the role of Mr Cormack Lynch, an oil and gas expert?
- A. Correct, because it was an oil and gas deal.
- Q. Nonetheless, you did participate at some of the meetings at which the drafting of the offering circular was discussed, correct?

A. On the key issues, yes.

Q. And you discussed key due diligence issues with Mr Lynch?

A. Primarily with respect to the ownership.

Q. Yes, indeed.

In your witness statement at paragraph 9 you refer to, and indeed cite, page 16 of the offering circular, which we can look at in a moment. But just to clarify this, your evidence is that this statement reflected the understanding of Cleary Gottlieb, the lawyers who performed due diligence on the question of share ownership?

A. Correct.

Q. And the statement would also have reflected your understanding, is that right?

A. At that time, after their work, yes.

Q. And then let us look at the statement, and we can take it from paragraph 9 of your witness statement E3/11/73. It's the first two sentences which I'd like to focus on. These say that the companies owning 97 per cent of Sibneft, FNK, Firma Sins, Refine Oil and Runicom:

... 'are all privately held companies and have close connections with the current management of Sibneft. As such, more than 97% of the Company is currently controlled by the Company's managers and a small group of private Russian investors.'"

Can you help me with this, please, who was the small group of private Russian investors?

- A. I understand that it was the management of the trading company, so we couldn't explain that it was the management of Sibneft so we had to explain it in such a form that it was employees of the trading companies, but were all connected to Mr Abramovich.
- Q. Can you be a little more specific. Who do you say were the individuals making up that small group of Russian investors?
- A. They were individuals that worked for the trading companies that were alongside Sibneft. Again, this was I guess 14 years ago, I don't remember the names.
- Q. You don't remember the names?
- A. No, but they were employees, I remember that it wasn't -- they were employees of those trading companies, my understanding.
- Q. If you go, Mr Tenenbaum, to paragraph 16 of your witness statement E3/11/77.

You say:

"I was aware of who the major shareholders were as a result of the work done in the Offering Circular ..."

- A. Correct.

- Q. So who were the major shareholders?
- A. They were the managers -- well, primarily they were the managers of Sibneft at that time and the employees of the trading companies. But at that stage you could only see the four companies, and I think that what Cleary's did was went up all the way to who the registered shareholders were in Russia, but I'm reconstructing right now.
- Q. Are you seriously saying that you do not know now, cannot remember now who were the major shareholders of Sibneft?
- A. The major shareholders were the four companies, those were the shareholders. But in a Russian context, those companies were controlled by employees of the trading companies. So they were individuals in those trading companies. The names I don't remember, unfortunately.
- Q. Now, just going to paragraph 20 of your statement, that's at page 79 E3/11/79, you say at paragraph 20 that after you joined Sibneft you:
- "... explained to investors, when asked ... that the management were the main shareholders and that they controlled Sibneft."
- A. Correct.
- Q. And you worked in Sibneft until September 2001 when you moved to work for Millhouse, now MHC Services Limited, in London?

A. Correct.

Q. So these were statements, we can assume, that you made on occasions between 1998 and 2001?

A. There were statements that I made until 1999 when I found out that Mr Abramovich was the only shareholder. Until then, I didn't know that.

Q. You're saying that, until 1999, you did not know that Mr Abramovich was the only shareholder. Wasn't that something --

A. No, I -- I thought it was the management.

Q. Wasn't that something that you would have wanted to find out when you joined the company?

A. I did, and I was told that it was the management.

Q. So it took a year, do you say, before --

A. It took, yes, about a year, when we set up the trust.

Q. And that was the first time that you say you were told the truth?

A. No, when I understood that he was the only shareholder. Again, in Russia, you don't ask those kind of questions. You assume that things are what they are, and then when I found out, I found out.

Q. Mr Tenenbaum, you tell us that you had left a relatively senior position at Salomon Brothers, correct?

A. Correct.

- Q. And that you were happy to join Mr Abramovich and Mr Shvidler because you trusted in their integrity.
- A. Correct.
- Q. But you felt unable, is this your evidence, to ask them who owned Sibneft at that time?
- A. At that time, the only interest I had was whether Mr Berezovsky was a shareholder. And I understood that the management controlled the company, and that was important for me, because the management that I met was Mr Shvidler, Mr Oiff, Mr Gorodilov, Ms Panchenko, and at that time it wasn't explained to me who the actual shareholders were but I understood it to be the management of Sibneft.
- Q. You were appointed head of corporate finance for Sibneft?
- A. Correct.
- Q. And you say you had no interest in knowing who in fact the owners of the company were?
- A. I'm not saying I had no interest. I had an interest, the interest that I asked. I was explained that it was the management. And when I got to know Mr Abramovich much more I understood the security reasons why he was saying those things. And in '99, when I think he had more confidence in me, I understood the full ownership structure of the company when I became the trustee.

Q. So you're suggesting that this person, whose integrity so attracted you that you wanted to join the company, in fact misled you when you first joined as to who the owners of the company were?

A. That's not correct, it's not misleading, because the management did control the company and did control the shares.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Are you making a distinction between ownership and control?

A. Correct, and that was very important for investors as well.

MR RABINOWITZ: All right. Are you suggesting that you didn't ask who owned the shares?

A. Well, during the due diligence on the Eurobond I knew who the registered shareholders were. Again, this is 13 years ago. Mr Abramovich was the founder of all those companies that were above the four companies, but at a certain point in time his employees became registered holders of those, controlled those shares. So I knew that he was the main shareholder, but the management was also involved in controlling those shares.

Q. And you didn't bother to ask who the other shareholders were? And I'm using that in reference to owners rather than controlling.

A. Again in the '97 due diligence it was seen who the registered shareholders were, so I understood that. It was the management of the company, so I saw that.

But in 1999, when we did the trust, Mr Abramovich was the only beneficial shareholder of all those structures.

Q. Can I just ask you this, when you use the word "control" in those answers, are you in fact talking about who the registered owners of the shares were? Is that what you're suggesting?

A. Well, the control point -- when the trust was set up, the management of the company were the trustees and the protector. So, to me, they controlled. So when we told the market that the management and Mr Abramovich controlled the full, let's say, 90 per cent block, that was what we communicated to the market place, and that was important that we communicated the full transparency of what was happening.

Q. I'll come back to that.

Can I just ask you this. You deal in your evidence with some valuation issues relating to Russian companies and, as you are aware, both companies -- both parties have filed a considerable amount of expert valuation evidence in relation to the valuation of Sibneft and Rusal. You, of course, are being called as a witness of fact and are not called to give independent expert opinion and, in general, I won't be asking you about your opinion. But there are some matters that you deal with in your witness statement relating to valuation that I do want to ask you about.

Now, you produced a fifth witness statement dated 21 August 2011. It's in bundle E8, tab 1 E8/01/1. That was one day before Mr Bezant, who is Mr Abramovich's expert, produced a report served by Mr Abramovich. That report was served on 22 August, you're aware of that?

A. Yes.

Q. Mr Bezant refers to your witness statement in his report of 22 August. If you want to have a look at that, can you go to bundle G(C), volume 20/2, page 107
G(C)20/2.01/107

A. Which clause?

Q. If you look at paragraph 8.49, for example, you'll see that he refers to your witness statement, your fifth witness statement, which was served one day before this report. So presumably you had discussed your evidence with Mr Bezant before he served his report, and indeed before you served your witness statement, is that right?

A. No, that's not correct. I didn't discuss with Mr Bezant.

Q. Can you explain how it is that he was able to refer to your fifth witness statement the day before -- which was just produced the day before when he served his report?

A. Well, I gave my witness statement to Skadden and they coordinated with him. I was not allowed to speak to him.

Q. Can you turn, please, in your fifth witness statement to paragraph 25, it's at page 8. So E8, tab 1 E8/01/8.

A. Which clause, sir?

Q. Paragraph 25. You say here:

"For the reasons that I have set out above (predominantly the medium and long-term risk), no Russian businessman would have relied upon or used the DCF approach adopted by Mr Allen. His use of 'comparable multiples' also indicates some ignorance of the market as it stood. Mr Allen treats emerging market and Western companies as comparators, but completely disregards Russian market [comparators]."

So you rely upon what you describe as Mr Allen's complete disregard of Russian market comparators and use of emerging market and western companies as comparators as indicating ignorance on his part. Do you see that?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Can you go to bundle G(C)2/01. It's G(C)2.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What page, please?

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm going to go to page 94 of the bundle
G(C)2/01.00/94.

Mr Tenenbaum, just so you know, you can see this on the opening page, page 1, this is Mr Allen's report of 25 July 2011.

A. Mm-hm.

Q. Now, if you're at page 94 of the bundle, about halfway down the page, do you see the heading "Comparable Trading Multiples"? Just above paragraph 7.2.20.

A. Mm-hm.

Q. You see that Mr Allen explains the comparable companies he has identified for the purposes of cross-checking his DCF valuation, do you see that?

A. I don't see his multiples.

Q. You need to go over the page.

A. I don't see his comparable multiples.

Q. I said his comparable companies.

If you go over the page, you see he explains that he's looked at comparable companies in Russia and other emerging markets.

A. Mm-hm.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Would you give me the paragraph number, please?

MR RABINOWITZ: If your Ladyship looks at paragraph 7.2.22, at the top of page 95 G(C)2/01.00/95. Do you see that, Mr Allen says:

"I ... identified comparable companies with Sibneft based on geographic location, under the following categories ... Russian oil and gas companies ... Oil and gas companies in Russian [sic] and other Emerging Markets ..."

Do you see that?

A. Well, in 7.2.22 he takes capital IQ, which has multiples ranging from -- over 150 times, so I don't see how he's looking at comparables.

Q. Well, let's go over to page 99 --

A. Where in Russia at that time it was two times.

Q. Go to page 99 if you would G(C)2/01.00/99.

A. 99?

Q. Page 99. Do you see the figure 16 at page 99, below paragraph 7.2.37?

A. Yes.

Q. You see that the red triangle shows the implied EBITDA multiple for Sibneft using the valuation from the discounted cashflow method.

A. But I don't agree with that, so...

Q. Right, but I'm just dealing with this, Mr Tenenbaum.

A. Okay, fine, that's fine.

Q. Do you see the grey squares in this figure?

A. Yes, I do.

- Q. Those represent Russian market comparators, do they not?
- A. Correct.
- Q. Comparators which you say were completely disregarded?
- A. Well, because Mr Allen used a -- I think he used many other companies in his analysis, so the average became very high, even if he used the Russian.
- Q. Well, he didn't ignore them.
- A. Well, you don't ignore them, but if you have, you know, 100 companies and only four of them are Russian then the average becomes very high, as you can see. 6 -- 4.7 multiple for emerging markets, EBITDA(?) of 4.7, Russia, at that time, the comparables for us was about 1.5 so that's a major, major difference.
- Q. Well, your evidence was that he completely disregarded this. Can you also look on the graph --
- A. Sorry, can I just comment, he disregarded it in his conclusions.
- Q. Okay. But look at the graph, page 99 G(C)2/01.00/99.
- A. I am.
- Q. That marks the -- by reference to the blue circles -- companies which are from emerging markets. The group which we've seen includes Russian companies as well. And there is no comparison with western companies here, is there?
- A. This is an emerging market comparison. But Russia was an emerging emerging market.

- Q. So when you in your evidence suggested that he treats emerging markets and western companies as comparators, that was wrong?
- A. No, it's not wrong, because he is treating them as comparators, and he should be looking at Russian comparators primarily, because Russia at that time was very unique. Even today, Russia is the cheapest trading emerging market in the world. So it's interesting to look at other emerging markets, but if you're looking at a Russian valuation you must look at Russian companies.
- Q. Can I ask you, please, to go to paragraph 22 of your fifth witness statement, so that's the one at E8, you'll find it at page 7 of that bundle E8/01/7. You say here:

"Absent individual buyers' considerations, in my opinion the price at which the free float of Sibneft shares traded in June 2001 is a reasonable indicator of its value then."

By "its value" you're obviously meaning Sibneft's value?

- A. Correct.
- Q. Now, I made the point to Mr Shvidler when he gave evidence that there were a number of reasons why the price of free-floating Sibneft shares was not a useful indicator of the value of the shares in which Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili had an interest, and that included that scaling up the share price, which suggests a value for the company of only a little over $1 billion, which I suggest is a ridiculous proposition, when this company was able to pay a dividend of $612 million just a few months later. Do you want to comment on that?

- A. Yes, please. I think the whole approach is a little bit skewed because I think taking hindsight valuation approach is very misleading. At that moment in time, that was the value of the company in Russia. And to look at value even in a year's time and compare it at that time is completely misleading.

So when you look at multiple analysis and the other analysis of value in Sibneft at that time, that was what the market was prepared to pay, and we were trading, compared to other companies like Yukos, Tatneft, Surgut, we were in line with those companies. So that was the value that the market placed on our company.

When you say that when the company paid 600 million next year, that was next year, Mr --

- Q. It was in fact just a few months later, wasn't it?

A. Yes.

- Q. So one isn't applying hindsight there, the company was obviously in a position where it was preparing to pay a dividend of half of what you say was its total value.

- A. Correct, but it was paying most of its net earnings. And if you look at valuations at that time, they were about one and a half times earnings. So when it was paying out all of its earnings in dividends, it was actually valuing itself at one and a half times of that dividend.

So in fact 600 million in dividends was valuing the company at 1 billion, because the market was valuing the company at that time based on those multiples, so you cannot say that it's a ridiculous value, that's actually a market value. The market was placing its value on the company at that time.

- Q. Well, we'll have to disagree about that.

I also suggest to you -- to Mr Shvidler, and I'll suggest the same thing to you, that the foolishness of this proposition was also shown by the fact that just a year later Mr Shvidler was announcing the sale of 1 per cent of the company for $100 million which gave an implied value for the company of $10 billion. But you say that that also is to be ignored in valuing Sibneft?

- A. As I said, first of all, that transaction happened at $6 billion valuation. The 10 billion, I don't know where that's coming from. The actual transaction that happened, implied value was 6 billion, but again that was much later. And in Russia every month counted, and you cannot just look at it today, looking at that time, and say that that company was undervalued. You cannot say that. It's impossible to say that.

- Q. You say it was much later. It was just a year later.
- A. And a year in Russia is a lifetime, because a year before that Sibneft was worth $600 million.
- Q. You see, Mr Tenenbaum, just as with Mr Shvidler, I suggest that your statement at paragraph 22 E8/01/7 is a good example of how you're willing to give wholly unrealistic evidence if you think it will help Mr Abramovich to win this case. That's true, isn't it?
- A. I disagree with you 100 per cent. And if my Lady would like I can explain more if it's interesting.

It's a very interesting subject to understand how companies were valued in Russia at that time, and hindsight valuation, what Mr Allen is using and Mr Rabinowitz is using, is completely inappropriate because at that time that was an incredible amount of money. And dependent who was on the table at that time, there was nobody at that time that could actually afford to pay that kind of money.

So you cannot just look at it today at that time and say that company was undervalued. It is really back-seat valuation.

If I ask you right now, Mr Rabinowitz, what is the right company to buy today, I don't think you can tell me because the market knows what the value of the companies are today. You don't know what is undervalued or overvalued because today investors know and place value on the company.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What about the other point that Mr Rabinowitz made to Mr Shvidler, I don't know whether you were in court.

A. Which one?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: The point that you couldn't actually get anything from a market cap because that was based on the relatively few shares that were trading, and what one was looking at here in reality was a huge majority interest.

A. I'll come down a bit, I'll breathe.

You can manipulate a share price in a short term depending on liquidity, you can manipulate the share price of Exxon at the end of the day, but over a long term you cannot manipulate a share price. So even though it was illiquid relative, let's say, to Lukoil, the investors that bought Sibneft shares were investing lower amounts, smaller tickets, let's say, as opposed to the investors that were investing in Lukoil or Exxon for example.

But the value that they placed on that stock was what it was worth. They wouldn't invest, let's say, $100 million in a block of shares in Sibneft because they couldn't sell it, but they could invest a million dollars, and it would still reflect the value of Sibneft at that time, because if you compare Sibneft to Lukoil or to Surgut or to Tatneft or to others, they were in comparison. Because you would have an investor who was interested in Sibneft, if it was cheap he would buy it and the price would go up.

You cannot say just because it was illiquid that it wasn't reflecting market. On the contrary, it's just certain investors wouldn't invest. Like Fidelity, for example, wouldn't invest in Sibneft because they would need, let's say, a ticket of $10 million to buy. But a small hedge fund who saw value would invest and would see value, and the price of Sibneft would reflect their view of what Sibneft was worth.

So you cannot say that liquidity affects value. It affects short-term, potentially, size of investments that somebody will make, but it doesn't affect value at all, I disagree completely. And in fact --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay, I think you've given me --

A. Okay, I'm sorry.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can I just pick up on that, I'm sorry, my Lady. Your Ladyship may have had enough of this but there's one thing arising from it.

Are you seriously suggesting, Mr Tenenbaum, it sounds like you are, that you can extrapolate up from the value of a stake within a 12 per cent free float in order to ascertain a value for a 44 per cent or a majority or a substantial majority block?

A. I would even say you have a discount at 44 per cent at that time, because if you're selling large minority blocks, and that's statistics, you actually approach -- you get a discount on the block. And 12 per cent at that time had a representation of the minority value of the company. And again, from history, my Lady, you have premiums of maybe 20 to 30 per cent when companies buy other companies, but historically 90 per cent of those investments don't pan out because you overpay.

Because what does it mean to pay for control? You think you can run the company better so you overpay a little bit than what the company is valued at but at the end it doesn't come out because you're not going to be managing the company better than the current management is managing.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I see.

MR RABINOWITZ: Sorry, Mr Tenenbaum, are you suggesting that the notion of a premium for control is a delusion and that there should be no premium for control?

- A. I think 80 to 90 per cent of mergers and acquisitions show that they don't bring value. When you buy a company at a premium you're assuming that you can manage it at a better return, and what history has shown is you don't because you usually buy at a market that is high, because you can raise money on the market, and therefore you overpay than what the market is trading at, and in reality you don't realise that return for your investors.

So usually when companies buy majority of other companies they pay, let's say, 30 per cent premium. If you look at historically, that premium is never realised to shareholders because they overpay.

So your --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: We've got the point.

A. Okay, sorry.

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Tenenbaum, can I ask you, please, to go to paragraphs 63 and 64 of your third witness statement at E3, tab 11, page 96 E3/11/96. Can you ask you to read paragraphs 63 and 64 to yourself, please. (Pause)

Just 63 and 64. (Pause)

A. Okay.

Q. What you seem to be saying here is that you concluded at that time that the $1.3 billion payment was to disassociate Mr Berezovsky from Sibneft. That's what you seem to say at paragraph 64, correct?

A. At the time of the payment, yes, that's what I -- that's what I assumed, yes.

Q. All right. Let's look, if we can, at evidence you have previously given. Can you go, please, to bundle J2/3 and go to tab 32, and page 55 J2/3.32/55. Look at what you were saying at paragraph 24.

A. Mm-hm.

Q. "I also knew about the payment of US$1.3 billion connected with a settlement with [Mr Berezovsky], which I understood from Mr Abramovich to have been to compensate Mr Berezovsky for the fact that he was no longer getting the originally-anticipated payments to help fund ORT."

Now, has your memory improved over time in relation to this point, Mr Tenenbaum?

A. No, because what I'm saying in my third witness statement is that at the time of the payment, this is talking about 2003, and at some point in time that's what Mr Abramovich explained to me. But at that time he did not explain it to me when the payment was made in 2000. Yes, 2000. So it was three years -- it was between 2000 and 2003 that Mr Abramovich had, I guess, communicated that point to me, so it's nothing -- it's nothing to do with memory, it's just the time of dates.

Q. Sorry, can we just understand that.

You say in paragraph 64 that you "ultimately concluded" that this was the reason for the payment. That's what you say at paragraph 64.

A. Where is it?

Q. Paragraph 64, page 96 of E3, tab 11 E3/11/96.

What is the date of that "ultimately" that you have there, because it doesn't seem to be that that would have stopped before 2003?

A. No, that's my ultimate understanding. What I'm saying here is what Mr Abramovich told me.

So my ultimate understanding was that it was to finish association with Sibneft, but on paragraph 24 I talk about what Mr Abramovich told me. It's my understanding eventually of what the payment was for.

Q. So your evidence is that, two years later, Mr Abramovich told you a story about why he made this payment in 2003, but that subsequently, after that, you came to a different conclusion. Is that right?

A. That's not what I'm saying.

Q. All right. What are you saying?

A. What I'm saying is that I'm not saying it happened two years later or it happened before that. That's what

Mr Abramovich told me at 2003 was my reference point, so I don't know whether he's told me that when the payment was -- after it was made or at 2003.

- Q. But it hadn't changed by 2003, seems to be the implication of paragraph 24.
- A. What he told me?
- Q. Well, your understanding.
- A. No. What he told me was this, and my understanding was that it was to disassociate ourselves from Mr Berezovsky. So, to me, these statements are consistent. This is what Mr Abramovich told me, and my ultimate understanding was that he stopped associating with Sibneft. To me it's consistent.
- Q. And when do you say Mr Abramovich told you that the $1.3 billion payment was to compensate Mr Berezovsky for the fact that he was not getting payments to help fund ORT? When do you say that would have been?
- A. It was before 2003, between 2000 and 2003. I cannot remember the date.
- Q. You see, Mr Tenenbaum, I suggest that this inconsistency, and I suggest there is an inconsistency in your statement, reveals the fact that you are not telling the truth about this.
- A. I disagree with you. It's consistent to me because I wrote this.

Q. Can I move on then to consider with you your evidence in relation to Rusal. Now, you tell us in your third witness statement that you were involved in the acquisition of the aluminium assets by Mr Abramovich in early 2000 although you say you recall being on the periphery of those transactions.

A. Correct.

Q. And perhaps we can just consider together the nature of your involvement with this transaction.

A. Okay.

Q. You say, looking at paragraph 34 of your third witness statement, it's page 84 E3/11/84.

If you're there, you say here that you recall Mr Shvidler calling you into meetings a few times to explain particular points relating to the aluminium acquisitions. Is that right?

A. That's my recollection, yes.

Q. And you say that, again, still at paragraph 34, although you cannot recall precisely what was discussed, you can remember the general topics of discussion and that they included the overall transaction structure, correct?

A. It was primarily to do with share transfers, that was what people were concerned with.

Q. Well, you say "overall transaction structure". We know that the aluminium acquisitions were structured offshore using four offshore companies, and you would have known that presumably?

A. Yes.

Q. And you would have known also that those four offshore companies included two BVI companies, a Gibraltar company and a Panamanian company?

A. I would have known at that time? No, I don't remember.

Q. And you would have known also that there were, in all, ten contracts?

A. Again, this is now, looking at it, I don't know if I saw those contracts. I can't recall seeing those contracts.

Q. Well, you think you were dealing with overall transaction structure and you didn't see the contracts?

A. My involvement was primarily to assist Mr Shvidler in areas that he wanted me to assist him with. I had a team that was dealing with it, that were much more capable of doing the actual documentation and the administration of it. I was not doing that.

Q. But if you were dealing with the overall transaction structure, surely you would have not only known that there was a use of offshore companies but also that those contracts were all expressly subject to English law?

A. I would have seen it at that time, yes.

Q. But you say now that you cannot recall the detail of those discussions other than that they were about the overall transaction structure, and I think that reflects something you've repeated now.

Then you also say, still at paragraph 34 E3/11/84, that you recall attending some meetings with Mr Shvidler where Mr Chernoi and Mr Bosov were present. Correct?

A. Correct.

Q. And Mr Chernoi and Mr Bosov were, of course, two of the four sellers of the aluminium assets, weren't they, Mr Tenenbaum?

A. They were in the agreement of February 10th, I think, yes.

Q. So these meetings with them, which you attended with Mr Shvidler, were presumably part of the negotiations which led up to the ultimate sale and purchase of the aluminium assets in mid-February 2000, it would seem logical, would it not?

A. It's not a correct misrepresentation -- mis -- representation that I was participating in the meetings. Mr Shvidler would call me, I would come in, he would ask me a question, and I would leave. I never was participating in those discussions, those were not discussions that I would participate in.

Q. So are you saying that when you say in your evidence you recall attending some meetings, what you're saying is you walked in, gave an answer and walked out?

A. Well, if you read what I say, I say:

"... Shvidler calling me into meetings a few times ..."

I went in, he asked me a question, if I had an answer I answered, if not I left. I researched it, I came back, and I gave him an answer and I left.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What sort of points were you being asked to assist with?

A. I think the primary issue was because the shares were under -- problematic shares, they were issuing -- I think they were concerned how to ensure that title was clean. I'm just reconstructing that, looking at the documents, because there weren't any other substantive issues that were in those agreements, reading them right now. The only issue that I can see myself participating in is -- with my staff, was to look at the share transfer issues, to make sure that the shares were clean, or as clean as we could get them.

MR RABINOWITZ: What were the problems -- what was problematic about the shares which made this an issue in which your assistance was sought?

A. Again, I can't remember what exactly we were doing, particularly to these shares, but some of them were in bankruptcy proceedings so there were certain legal issues that Mr Shvidler would ask me and that I would have to go and research with my staff.

But I can -- I would like to say that I was not in those meetings negotiating with those individuals.

Q. Okay, so that's the position in February 2000. Let's just look then at the position in relation to March 2000, turning to the formation of Rusal.

You tell us at paragraph 35 of your witness statement that you were told at some point, and this must be in early March 2000, about the merger discussions that had taken place between Mr Abramovich and Mr Deripaska at the White House, followed by the Kempinski Hotel, and the meeting in Mr Abramovich's dacha in Sareevo Village, correct?

A. I probably was told that by Mr Shvidler.

Q. You also tell us, this is at paragraph 38 of your statement E3/11/85, that you were involved in some of the meetings in London attended by Ms Panchenko, Mr Hauser, his partner Mr White, and Mr Deripaska's man, Mr Mishakov, during the period 10 to 12 March 2000, is that right?

A. Again this is a reconstruction, I don't really remember those meetings.

Q. Well, Ms Panchenko says that you were at these meetings. You don't dispute that, do you?

- A. Well, as I say, I probably was.
- Q. Okay. You also tell us that, having returned to Moscow on 12 March 2000, you also have some recollection of meetings with representatives of Mr Deripaska at the Sibneft building during the week of 12 March 2000.
- A. Yes, I remember it was long nights in the Sibneft building. We were downstairs, and I think the full night we were drafting documents. My team was drafting, I was there helping in whichever way I can.
- Q. And these discussions would have taken place, what, in the days immediately prior to the execution of this share purchase and sale agreement. That is right, I think, given what you've just said and given that we know the document was executed on 15 March 2000?
- A. Correct.
- Q. So these discussions in Moscow, which you were involved in with Mr Deripaska's representatives, would have been to do with the finalisation of the 15 March 2000 agreement?
- A. It's logical to assume, I guess.
- Q. And you also say in relation to these discussions that you recall some discussion with Mr Mishakov over the share transfer issues?
- A. What stays in my mind is the discussions and meeting with Mishakov, yes.

- Q. Now, you say that although you were clearly involved in the 15 March 2000 agreement, because it was in English, and dealt with shareholder arrangements, you were not responsible for the details of the agreement and that you delegated those to Mr Osipov and Mr Schneider, correct?
- A. Correct.
- Q. Can you just tell us who Mr Osipov and Mr Schneider are?
- A. Mr Osipov worked in my department, he was very -- you know, he was my right-hand man and I delegated a lot of things to him, that's my style of management, I delegate. And Mr Schneider was a lawyer that we used for consulting reasons. He was an outside lawyer that we sometimes used.
- Q. Presumably, I think it reflects in the answer that you've just given, you delegated this task of dealing with the detail of the transaction to them because you regarded them as people you could trust?
- A. I could trust and they could do it much better than I can. I could deal with some of the issues of the shareholder agreement which I thought we were going to be doing, which potentially required my input, but they were much smarter than I was in dealing with the things that they were dealing with, and I was really helping them at that time.

- Q. And so while they would have been involved in the detailed work of getting the agreement set down in writing, it was you who was overseeing their work, was it not, that was your principal task?
- A. My principal task was responsibility to Mr Shvidler, and Mr Shvidler asked me to make sure it happened and -- the people that were really doing it was Mr Osipov and Ms Khudyk, and they were the real sort of brains behind getting it done. I was just there to make sure that things worked efficiently and to make sure that things happened on time, because there was such a time constraint.
- Q. So you were, as I suggested, overseeing their work, correct?
- A. I was responsible ultimately, yes.
- Q. And you were also reporting back to Mr Shvidler, presumably both with information and for instructions, correct?
- A. Correct, if there were any issues.
- Q. Now, I don't think you suggest in your evidence that Mr Osipov or Mr Schneider didn't properly carry out their task, or that you in your oversight role allowed anything to go wrong with the recording of the 15 March 2000 agreement, do you, Mr Tenenbaum?
- A. In the time that we had, which were a few days, no diligence, doing it overnight, we did the best we could. And if you look at these documents, I would call them a hybrid between Russian documents and English documents because there was a semblance of representation of warranties but there weren't any. There was a semblance of a shareholders agreement but there wasn't, clearly, because we didn't have time. And the primary focus was really the share transfer which then I left to Mr Osipov and Ms Khudyk, who were much more competent dealing with those issues so I relied on them, and I took their competent that they would do it right -- the right job.

Ultimately I was responsible, of course, for it, but the provisions there are very broad and very general and, in my experience of negotiating contracts, you sit down and you negotiate and you flash out issues and you identify due diligence points. But in this instance there wasn't that, so it was a very, very rough and ready agreement. And so my involvement actually was very limited.

Q. Now, you tell us in your evidence, Mr Tenenbaum, that you are in general terms a cautious man and are known to be so, is what you say. Is that right?

A. I think so, yes.

Q. And although that is evidence that you give in the context of talking about the position in 2004, presumably that is also true of the position in 2000, that you were still then a cautious man?

A. The 2004 refers to, I'm sorry?

Q. Well, you don't need to know why you were saying that in 2004 --

A. Ah, I'm cautious from my birth, yes.

Q. All right.

You also tell us, this is paragraph 46 of your third witness statement E3/11/89, that the 15 March agreement was signed by Mr Deripaska of GSA (Cyprus) Limited and Mr Andrey Tschirikov for Runicom Limited, and that you initialled each page of the 15 March agreement, is that correct?

A. Correct.

Q. And you say, this is again at paragraph 46 of your statement, that you signed each page because you were the senior person there and spoke fluent English. Yes?

A. Correct.

Q. And, as we have just heard, you also had overseen the preparation of the 15 March 2000 agreement, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. And indeed you'd been involved in discussions with Mr Deripaska's representatives both in Moscow and in London during the previous ten days, correct?

A. It appears so, yes.

- Q. Just so that we're not at cross-purposes, the 15 March 2000 agreement was the agreement pursuant to which it was agreed to pool various offshore companies and the underlying aluminium assets and ultimately to form Rusal, correct?
- A. It was the first stage, yes.
- Q. And it was one of the principal agreements that ultimately led to the formation of Rusal?
- A. Correct.
- Q. Given what you say about you being a cautious man, I take it that before initialling each page of this document, you would have ensured that you were at least generally familiar with what the agreement provided for?
- A. I was looking at risk factors, and so from a risk factor point of view I was happy with it, I wasn't necessarily reading every word because every word was broad, so I was focusing on the risk factors.
- Q. Can we just please have a look at the agreement. Can you go, please, to bundle H(A)18, page 124 H(A)18/124?
- So this is the share purchase and sale agreement which you -- we see you initial each page and, as you can see, it's the contract under which Mr Deripaska's company, GSA (Cyprus) Limited, acquired 50 per cent of the shares in the four companies that had been used by Mr Abramovich's side to purchase interest in the aluminium assets at KrAZ, Bratsk and Achinsk. You'll have to forgive my pronunciation.

Can I ask you please to go to page 138 where you'll see schedule 1 H(A)18/138.

A. Yes.

Q. You see there's a reference there to the companies, and under that one has listed Runicom Fort Limited, Galinton Associated Limited, Palmtex Limited SA and Dilcor International Limited. Those were the companies that had been used by Mr Abramovich to purchase -- or Mr Abramovich's side, to purchase interests in the aluminium assets in February 2000, that's correct, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. And just if you look then at page 124 of the document H(A)18/124, you will see that the contract says:

"'Companies' [as defined] means those companies more particularly described in Schedule 1, Part I."

So that's the four companies that we've just seen, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. Can I then just ask you to go to clause 2.7, page 127 H(A)18/127, and just read it:

"The Vendor acknowledges and confirms that the Transfer Price has been calculated on the basis of the Companies being the beneficial owners of the Securities as at the Transfer Date..."

Then it goes on with some detail.

The transfer price we know was, certainly at this stage, $400 million. That's right, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. And that was calculated on the basis of the companies, which are here referred to, having the interests set out and referred to at paragraph 2.7. Take that from me.

A. Okay.

Q. Now, again, there is no dispute that Runicom Limited, the vendor company in this contract, is an Abramovich-controlled entity?

A. Correct.

Q. Can I ask you, please, to look at clause 2.1 at page 126 H(A)18/126. 2.1 says this:

"Subject to the terms and conditions of this Agreement, including but not limited to Clause 2.8, the Vendor [and that's obviously Runicom Limited] shall sell the Shares to the Purchaser [that's Mr Deripaska's company] on its behalf and on behalf of the Other Selling Shareholders with full title guarantee, and the Purchaser shall [pay the purchaser price]."

So you see there a reference to the sale being on behalf both of Runicom Limited and on behalf of the other selling shareholders?

A. Right.

Q. Then if I can ask you just to go back a page to page 125

H(A)18/125, do you see the definition of "Other Selling Shareholders"?

A. Yes.

Q. "'Other Selling Shareholders' [are defined to mean] those other persons who together with the Vendor are the legal and beneficial owners ... of the shares (both in registered and bearer form) of the Companies..."

A. I see that, yes.

Q. Then just one final provision if I can ask you about, can you go to clause 6.1.1, you'll find that at page 131

H(A)18/131. "The Vendor", that's Runicom Limited -- sorry, are you there?

A. Yes.

Q. "The Vendor represents and warrants to [Mr Deripaska's company] that as at the Completion Date:

"The Vendor and the Other Selling Shareholders are together the legal and beneficial owners of 100 per cent of the shares [in] the Companies ..."

And we know the companies are the four companies listed in schedule 1, Okay?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. So it would appear that Runicom Limited did not own the companies outright but only with the unidentified other selling shareholders, do you agree?

A. No, it's not correct. You can interpret it that way but that was what the other side drafted.

Q. Sorry, Mr Tenenbaum --

A. Can I explain?

Q. Do you agree that that is what the provision suggests?

A. Well --

Q. You can say that someone else drafted it but do you agree that that is what the provision suggests?

A. Can you repeat that again, please, sir?

Q. It would appear that Runicom Limited did not own the companies outright but only with these unidentified other selling shareholders?

A. Well, I need to explain then because I can't agree or disagree then.

Q. All right.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, explain.

A. The other companies, the four companies that owned the assets were bearer companies. Runicom was a registered company of which Mr Abramovich was the owner. So the other side would need a warranty from Mr Abramovich if I were to confirm that he was the only owner because these are bearer companies. You cannot confirm with the four days that we had to -- or two/three days that we had to draft these documents to completely fulfil their obligations to confirm that there was only one shareholder. So this is a very broad and encompassing provision on their side which takes into account that there is no personal guarantees in this and there's really no representation of warranties in this document. So in a sense, this is a provision from the other side to capture any issues with respect to the bearer company shares and no ability to do any diligence on those shares.

MR RABINOWITZ: And it's a provision in a contract to which you agreed?

A. Correct.

Q. And it suggests, does it not, that certainly so far as the other side were concerned, there was at the very least a possibility of other selling shareholders?

A. As I said, we never -- I never discussed that with the other lawyers with the other side. We were drafting these documents over the last three/four days. This was not an issue that I focused on because there was a very broad provision which they asked for and I agreed. There was no risk to us. If I was to challenge this provision and to try to explain there's only one shareholder, I wouldn't be able to actually guarantee it because these are bearer company shares and they would not be able to do any diligence on those companies. So I would have to have Mr Abramovich give a warranty and a guarantee and I did not want to do that, so I agreed with this broad provision.

Q. Is it not more likely, Mr Tenenbaum, that the reason that this contract provided for the possibility of other selling shareholders reflected the fact that in the preliminary agreement -- you know what I mean when I refer to the preliminary agreement?

A. Yes, yes.

Q. -- that referred to Mr Abramovich as having partners?

A. Again, I understood that there was a party and the partners were to do with the companies. Again, at that stage I didn't understand that point but I saw the party's definition and, to me, it made sense that it was the companies that were together with our companies coming into the venture.

Q. I'm not going to ask you about that.

Why did you not want Mr Abramovich to give a guarantee of his sole ownership?

A. There was no need for it. They didn't ask for it.

Q. I thought you were saying that this was the alternative to doing that?

A. That was in my -- my reconstruction of this alternative. I didn't do that because there was no need for it.

Q. Very well. We have your evidence about that then.

So that's the share purchase and sale agreement with which you were involved.

Then there were some other agreements that also related to the formation of Rusal, weren't there, which you mention in your witness statement? Can you go to paragraph 47 of your witness statement E3/11/89. One of the other agreements that you mentioned to do with the formation of Rusal here is the amended and restated share purchase and sale agreement dated 15 May 2000?

A. Yes.

Q. And that is again an agreement in relation to which you say you had some involvement, that's right, isn't it? Although again I think you say that was primarily limited to overseeing the work of Mr Osipov and Mr Schneider?

A. Correct.

Q. Just before I move off the last agreement that we're talking about, it would have been very easy to prove ownership of bearer share companies, would it not? You could have just produced the bearer shares?

A. But how can you prove who is the owner of those bearer shares?

Q. You establish that they're in your possession.

A. I suppose so, yes, but how could you give a warranty on that?

Q. Okay. Now, that's then the amended and restated share purchase and sale agreement. You also tell us that, as with the previous 15 March 2000 agreement, you again initialled each page of the amended and restated share purchase and sale agreement, correct?

A. Correct. Yes.

Q. And again, you being a naturally cautious person and known by all to be so, you would have ensured that you were broadly familiar and comfortable with the detail of what was contained in this contract?

A. You can say that, yes.

Q. And in addition to that agreement which you initialled, there were also two protocols to the share purchase and sale agreement of 15 May 2000 which you also initialled, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. Again, can we take it, you being a cautious person, that you would have ensured that you were broadly familiar and comfortable with those agreements before you initialled them?

A. I didn't see any issues in those agreements, so yes.

Q. And can we just look at paragraph 50 of your witness statement, please E3/11/90. You also say here that you can recall providing general advice about what investors would expect if Rusal was later listed on an international stock exchange. Is that right?

A. Yes.

Q. And you say that because of your involvement at that stage, that may be why you recall the names of the four BVI companies: David Worldwide, Kadex, Valeford and Foreshore which, together with Dilcor and Galinton, owned the entire share capital of Rusal in December 2000, is that correct?

A. That's correct, yes.

Q. You also tell us -- and this is still in paragraph 50 -- that you can also recall that the six BVI companies which owned Rusal all had bearer shares which you advised would not be suitable if Rusal was ever listed, correct?

A. Yes. I explained it to Mr Shvidler that that wasn't the right strategy to take if you were going to list the company.

Q. And still at paragraph 50, you also tell us that, although you had not been closely involved in the registration of Rusal on 25 December 2000, you were involved in the negotiations which eventually led to the signing of the Rusal shareholders agreement on 9 February 2001, is that right?

A. That's the only document or the only sort of participation or involvement that I recollect with any significance because it required my input, direct input.

Q. We'll come back to that, Mr Tenenbaum.

A. Mm-hm.

Q. Going forward in time, if you look at paragraph 79 of your third witness statement, that's at page 102 E3/11/102, you also tell us that you were also aware of the establishment and subsequent registration on 7 May 2003 of Rusal Holdings Limited, correct?

A. Yes. My recollection is that I think I spoke either to Mr Shvidler or actually he asked me to go to see -- to present to the board because I thought that the BVI -- even the registered form wasn't acceptable for an international listing. But my advice wasn't followed, as the BVI -- bearer companies weren't followed so... That's why I remember that, because I either -- I don't remember whether I actually went to the board meeting but I recommended to Mr Shvidler that it shouldn't be a BVI company.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What, because that wasn't acceptable on an international placing?

A. You couldn't list it, no.

MR RABINOWITZ: And this is right, isn't it, you were also aware that there was an internal restructuring of the Rusal group ownership later in 2003 although you say that you are not now familiar with the details, is that right?

- A. My understanding that after May 2003 the structure -- the holdings were restructured to put it into a registered form, because Mr Deripaska wanted to do a listing, eventual(?) listing, but again I didn't understand how they could do that with a BVI company, but I'm just reconstructing now. I think the primary driver for them was tax as opposed to listing, which eventually they did many years later without our involvement.
- Q. Just to be clear, Mr Tenenbaum, your evidence is that you were aware that there was this internal restructuring of the Rusal group ownership in 2003 --
- A. Yes, I just --
- Q. -- although you are not now able to recollect the details?
- A. Correct, I was just not participating in the restructuring itself, but I knew that it would be restructured, yes.
- Q. Okay. Now, in addition to all of this, you also had some involvement, did you not, in both the first and second Rusal sales, and let us just see if we can be clear about what you say your involvement was in those transactions.

So far as concerns the first Rusal sale, that's the one in September 2003, you say that although you were not significantly involved in this transaction, you did provide some valuation guidance about it?

- A. My recollection, I may have -- Mr Shvidler may have asked me to help him to get some analysis done and I would have done that.
- Q. And so far as concerns the second Rusal sale in 2004, as I understand your evidence, you acknowledge that you were involved in this, and indeed you say that you were a conduit between the lawyers and Mr Abramovich and Mr Shvidler, but you say that you recall very little of the matters referred to regarding the documentation because they were largely technical and did not call for any particular expertise. Is that right?
- A. It's correct, but if I can comment, I mean, I only remember the warranties that we were asked to give and Mr Shvidler -- and Mr Abramovich had to sign, and that's why I was asked, maybe by Ms Panchenko, maybe by Mr Shvidler, to assist in that. But I was already living in London dealing with Chelsea so I wasn't necessarily dealing -- on that particular point I remember assisting, yes.
- Q. Very well.
- A. Because it had to do with Mr Abramovich signing so they asked me to help.

- Q. Now, I want next to ask you a few questions relating to the Curtis notes, Mr Tenenbaum, by which I mean the notes apparently taken by Mr Curtis of a meeting which you are recorded as having attended and which you will find the notes for at bundle H(A)59, page 110.001 H(A)59/110.001. We also have a typed-up version of those at 110.005 H(A)59/110.005.

Now, I'm not going to ask you to read them just yet but it is worth having them available.

- A. Mm-hm.

- Q. Perhaps we can begin by just seeing what is common ground between us in relation to these notes. You accept, I think, that you visited Mr Patarkatsishvili in Georgia in the summer of 2003, you say on 25 August 2003, is that right?

- A. Correct.

- Q. And we also now know that Mr Curtis was also in Georgia at that time -- perhaps I can just show you this. If you go to bundle H(A)62, page 234.003 H(A)62/234.003, this is an extract from Mr Curtis's diary and you can see, if you look on the left-hand column, 21 August, that he flew out to Georgia on that day. It looks like he flew from Ibiza on Mr Berezovsky's plane, do you see that?

A. I see it.

Q. You can then see from the entry on 22 August H(A)62/234.002 that Mr Fomichev, certainly according to Mr Curtis's diary, also appears to have been in Georgia at that time, you see the reference to Ruslan?

A. Yes.

Q. And indeed Mr Curtis's diary keeper has made a note:

"Meeting Ruslan ..."

That's Mr Fomichev.

And I think it says "Padre" but it presumably is Badri, that would be Mr Patarkatsishvili. Do you see that?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. That was going to be on 22 August. You can see from this that Mr Curtis was due to stay in Georgia over that weekend and to fly back on 26 August again on Mr Berezovsky's plane. Do you see that?

A. I don't see the 26th.

Yes, I see.

Q. All right. In fact, if you go over the page again to H(A)62/234.005, we in fact have a ticket stub from Mr Curtis's boarding ticket for the BA flight from Pisa to London.

A. Mm-hm.

Q. As you can see, it appears that Mr Berezovsky's plane was going to take him to Pisa. Okay? Your evidence, tell me if this is right, is that you recall meeting an English or perhaps an American person at Mr Patarkatsishvili's house on 25 August 2003 who you accept could have been Mr Curtis, correct?

A. Yes, it was an English-speaking person, yes.

Q. And that's at paragraph 89 of your witness statement E3/11/105. You also say, and again this is at paragraph 89 of your witness statement, that you recall that Mr Fomichev was present when you were there, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. You explain at paragraph 89 that you had met Mr Fomichev before and that you knew him slightly, correct?

A. I knew how he looked, yes. I never had dealings with him.

Q. And you obviously also knew Mr Patarkatsishvili at that stage, didn't you, Mr Tenenbaum? You'd first met him around the time you joined Sibneft in the late 1990s?

A. I met him later when I joined, but yes, I knew who he was of course.

Q. You can put bundle 62 away -- I think someone has taken it away for you, very efficient.

Can we then just look at the handwritten notes from Mr Curtis, they're at 001 of H(A)59 H(A)59/110.001.

Now, you can see at page 001 that someone has put a post-it note on the handwritten notes in the middle of the page and that says:

"Bardrey [that's Mr Patarkatsishvili], Ruslan [that's obviously Mr Fomichev] + Abramovich's man meeting notes (vitally important)."

I don't think there's any doubt that the reference to "Abramovich's man" is a reference to you, Mr Tenenbaum. And I say that because if you look at the card at the top left-hand corner, the top left-hand side, you can see that someone has written your name "Eugene Tenenbaum" there, do you see that?

A. I see it, yes.

Q. And the fact that Mr Curtis -- never mind that.

So I think we can agree that there was a meeting or a gathering, if you prefer, in Georgia on 25 August 2003 at which you were present, Mr Patarkatsishvili was present, Mr Fomichev was present and that certainly it's likely that it was Mr Curtis who was present?

A. Looks like, yes.

Q. This is right, isn't it, while you had already known Mr Patarkatsishvili for a while, and indeed you had known Mr Fomichev, you had not previously met with Mr Curtis?

A. No, never met him.

Q. Therefore to the extent that the Curtis notes suggest that the four of you were in Georgia, I'm not getting into what you discussed at the moment yet, that appears to be accurate, doesn't it, Mr Tenenbaum?

A. That we were there? Yes, it's accurate.

Q. And so the only real dispute is really whether a conversation that Mr Curtis has recorded as taking place on these cards really did take place. Is that right?

A. Correct. A serious dispute.

Q. Now, Mr Tenenbaum, you have also dealt with this meeting with Mr Curtis in Georgia in your second witness statement in these proceedings?

A. Yes.

Q. And I wonder if we can just turn that up?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just before we go there, where do I see the June date on the handwritten notes?

MR RABINOWITZ: You don't see a June date, my Lady. There is no date saying that this meeting was in June written on the notes. Someone who has put this file together has put "June 2003" there. But I think it's common ground that this meeting would have been in August.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Because of the travel documents --

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: -- of Mr Curtis.

MR SUMPTION: And indeed Mr Tenenbaum's own travel documents.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, absolutely.

MR RABINOWITZ: Now, can I ask you, Mr Tenenbaum, please, to go to your second witness statement in these proceedings. Do keep your third witness statement available. That's at bundle J2/3, and you should go to tab 32, please J2/3.32/49.

A. Yes.

Q. You should have there a copy of your second witness statement. You'll see it's dated 28 October 2009.

Just to put this into context, Mr Tenenbaum, this was the witness statement that you swore in support of Mr Abramovich's application to strike out Mr Berezovsky's case. Do you remember that?

A. Correct.

Q. And you made this statement after the Curtis notes had been produced in the context of that application?

A. Correct.

Q. And can I ask you, please, to go to paragraph 15 of this statement which you'll find at page 53 J2/3.32/53.

Now, you say at paragraph 15:

"When I read what are said to be Mr Curtis's notes of a meeting that I am supposed to have attended, not in August but in early June that year, frankly I was stunned. At no time did I take part in any such discussion. As I have mentioned, barring [a] short tour of the house, I spent my time outside where I had some food and the usual small talk with some of the guests."

You then go on in paragraphs 16 to 22 J2/3.32/53 of the statement to make four points in addition to the fact that you have no recollection of the discussion as to why you think it unlikely that there was such a discussion. Do read, if you would like, paragraphs 16 to 22, you're probably familiar with them, but perhaps I can just summarise for you what are the four points that you make.

You say first that, given your experience and involvement in the Rusal transaction, you had no expertise nor any great familiarity with the subject matter of the conversation. That's the first ground you give and that you will see at paragraphs 16 to 19.

A. Yes, I do.

Q. You say, secondly, and this is at paragraph 20 J2/3.32/54, that you would not discuss Mr Abramovich's private affairs in front of people you had not met before.

A. Correct.

Q. And then the third reason you give, this is at paragraph 21 J2/3.32/54, you say that you do not understand the context in which this meeting is meant to have taken place.

A. Correct.

Q. And fourth, this is at paragraph 22 J2/3.32/54, you say there would have been a language barrier, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. And perhaps we can just consider each of these points in a little further detail.

A. Okay.

Q. Can we start with your first point, that the conversation regarding Sibneft and Rusal was not your area of expertise and you didn't have any great familiarity with that.

A. Can we read what I said, please? Which sections are you referring to?

Q. Paragraphs 16 to 19 J2/3.32/53.

A. I know but which particular points are you saying? I'd just like to make sure that I'm getting the language right.

Q. Read paragraphs 16 to 19 which I've tried to summarise for you as suggesting you were saying you did not have any expertise nor any great familiarity with the Rusal transaction which was the subject matter of the discussion.

A. What I say is:

"I [didn't perform a] direct role in relation to the acquisition or establishment..."

Q. Indeed, that is what you say.

A. Correct so I never had a role with -- at the level of Mr Patarkatsishvili, that is correct. And what else --

Q. Let's just look at what your role was. You say there that you didn't have any direct role and you give this as a reason why this conversation could not have taken place.

A. Correct.

Q. Now, to be fair to you, Mr Tenenbaum, you've rowed back slightly from that in your third witness statement.

That's right, isn't it?

A. No, I haven't.

Q. All right. Well, let's just have a look at that. If you go to paragraph 95 of your third witness statement, that's at page 107, bundle E3 E3/11/107.

A. Yes.

Q. You see, whereas previously you'd said:

"I have not performed any direct role in relation to the acquisition or establishment of either Rusal or Sibneft."

What you're now saying is:

"As noted above, I did not perform any role in relation to the acquisition or establishment of Sibneft, and my role in relation to Rusal was very limited."

A. Correct.

Q. So you now at least accept this, as you indeed have to in light of the evidence we've just looked at, that you did have a role in relation to the acquisition or establishment of Rusal, that you were indeed involved in those transactions although you now try to say that it was very limited. Is that right?

A. Can I explain, please? What I meant to say in paragraph 9 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, please do.

A. This was in the context of the meeting that I was -- that I had with Mr Patarkatsishvili. So when I say I had no direct role, the one, I guess, word that is potentially missing to make it very clear is that I had no direct senior role because I never met with, for example, Mr Patarkatsishvili when the acquisition was done. So my involvement was not at the high level. My involvement was at the back office so to speak. So when I'm explaining the context of this meeting, I'm saying I had no role in relation to that acquisition.

So it's clear to me that, if I'm supposed to be discussing these kind of issues with Mr Patarkatsishvili, I am certainly not the right person to go to Georgia to discuss these issues with Mr Patarkatsishvili. That to me is very clear, what I'm saying here.

MR RABINOWITZ: In fact what you say, as is clear from paragraph 95, is that your involvement with Rusal had been limited to some aspects of the shareholders agreements.

A. Correct.

Q. Between Mr Abramovich. But is that right? The shareholders agreement was the one signed in 2001, you weren't just involved in that, Mr Tenenbaum?

A. When I say involvement, I mean when I have some form of input. So when I'm going to be discussing with people issues, I need to have a context of those discussions and the only context of the discussion that I could have had with respect to Rusal was the shareholders agreement because that was the only thing that I was in substance involved in.

Q. Mr Tenenbaum, you say that is the only thing you were in substance involved in, but you've already told us in your evidence that you were called into meetings in relation to the February 2000 meetings; we have seen that you oversaw -- you were involved in the negotiations in respect of the March 2000 agreement with Mr Deripaska; you were involved in indeed the drafting of the agreement, albeit you say in an oversight role in relation to that. That's all right, isn't it?

A. But for me to have a substantive discussion with somebody at this level of Mr Patarkatsishvili, I have to be knowing -- I have to know what I'm talking about. I'm not just going to go talk about things that I have no direct involvement or knowledge, and when I say involvement, the drafting of these agreements were not by me and they were not substantive issues anyway. The only substantive issue that I was ever involved with respect to Rusal, I was responsible for my team but what I was involved with personally was the shareholder agreement. So if I were to go and discuss Rusal with Mr Patarkatsishvili, I would be the last person that Mr Abramovich would send. He would have sent Ms Panchenko, he would have sent Mr Gorodilov, Mr Davidovich, Mr Shvidler, but not me to discuss what is being reflected in these notes.

Q. Mr Tenenbaum, we have seen that you were in fact involved, you may say that your involvement wasn't central but you were in fact involved in every single stage of the aluminium acquisition and its passing into Rusal. You were involved in the February 2000 discussions, albeit you say in a limited respect, and you were involved in the March 2000 negotiations and you were involved in the signing of both the main agreements and you were involved in the shareholders agreement. You obviously had a great deal of knowledge about the aluminium interests which had been acquired. That's right, isn't it?

- A. I had certain knowledge, I agree with you, yes.
- Q. And to the extent that you didn't have the sufficient knowledge, are you saying that you couldn't have asked Mr Abramovich to tell you what you needed to know?
- A. With respect to what, I'm sorry?
- Q. Well, with respect to your ability to go and discuss this matter with Mr Patarkatsishvili?
- A. But, as I say in my statement, I don't understand reading these notes what am I supposed to be discussing there? I really don't understand and we can go through them and I can show you what doesn't make sense at all.
- Q. We will go through them.
- A. Okay.
- Q. But for the moment I'm trying to understand the first of the reasons that you give as to why you say this really just couldn't have been a discussion that you were a party to, and the suggestion you appear to try and make is to say that you really were not involved in Rusal and, therefore, you wouldn't have been the person who was sent for this?
- A. When I'm saying involved, at that level to discuss things with Mr Patarkatsishvili, that is correct. I'm not the person to discuss issues with Mr Patarkatsishvili, absolutely not.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, this will go on for a while so this may be a convenient moment.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. Was this the only time you met Mr Patarkatsishvili?

A. That I actually had a meeting with him?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

A. The only time.

MR RABINOWITZ: But you had met him previously, I think you already accepted that?

A. I met him in Logovaz when I was dealing with Mr Berezovsky, when we were about to fly to New York to meet with Mr Murdoch. I didn't know Mr Patarkatsishvili. He was a scary person, I'm sorry to say, but I would never deal with Mr Patarkatsishvili or have meetings with him.

Q. But you were one of Mr Abramovich's trusted advisers?

A. With respect to certain issues, yes, of course. Issues that I had competence in. He wouldn't -- he's a very successful person, he doesn't send a person that cannot discuss these issues with somebody at the level of Mr Patarkatsishvili, it's just not -- it's not plausible, to me, to me, sorry.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And who is Igor at this meeting?

A. A question to me?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, do you know?

A. No, I don't know.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Rabinowitz, what's your case?

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, we're also uncertain as to who Igor is. We can hazard a guess.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Apart from Mr Curtis's documents and the reference to Eugene Tenenbaum, why is there -- I'm asking you, Mr Rabinowitz, why isn't there a possibility that this was a meeting with Mr Shvidler?

MR RABINOWITZ: Because -- well, your Ladyship says apart from the fact that it says Eugene Tenenbaum on the top of the first card --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, just that's on the top of the note, isn't it?

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Or the bottom of the note, bottom of the bit of --

MR RABINOWITZ: And the fact that it appears that these were the four people who were in Georgia in August 2003.

That is what makes it likely that it was Mr Tenenbaum.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Is there any dispute as to who Igor is?

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm not sure anyone is particularly clear who he is.

MR SUMPTION: From our side, we haven't the faintest idea.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

Okay. You're not to speak to anybody about your evidence or the case over lunch, okay?

THE WITNESS: Understood.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: 2.05.

(1.03 pm)

(The short adjournment)

(2.05 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Tenenbaum, can I just look next at the second of the points you made at the time of the strike-out application as to why you say he couldn't have had this conversation. Again if you just look at bundle J2/3, which I hope you still have in front of you.

A. Yes.

Q. At page 54, paragraph 20 J2/3.32/54, you say this:

"Second, there was simply --"

Sorry, are you there?

"Second, there was simply no way that I would discuss Mr Abramovich's private affairs with or in front of people I had not met before, such as the English/American person (even if it was Mr Curtis), not at least because these affairs were not something I had been directly involved [with]."

I'm not going over the second part of that again where you say you haven't been directly involved with it. But just in terms of your point about discussing Mr Abramovich's private affairs, it's right, is it not, that you had, of course, met Mr Fomichev before?

- A. I met him, yes, I knew who he was. I'd never had meetings with him in terms of meetings, I just met him.
- Q. And Mr Patarkatsishvili I think the same?
- A. I met him but never had meetings with him before.
- Q. And if Mr Abramovich had instructed you to go out and discuss these matters with these people, that could have given you no problem at all with following his instructions and having this conversation with them?
- A. It would give me a major problem because I wouldn't want to go by myself at least, because I wouldn't be the right person to go.
- Q. Well, it all depends on what you were going to achieve, Mr Tenenbaum, if the object of the exercise was to go and meet with Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Fomichev, with Mr Abramovich saying to you, "Well, go and find out what it is that they want, you can have a discussion, don't commit to anything," there would have been no difficulty at all for you in going and discussing these, even though they were Mr Abramovich's private affairs, as you put it?

A. I knew why I went there, I explained why I went there, there was a very specific reason why I went there.

Q. Yes, but I'm trying to address the reason you give as to why you say you couldn't have had this conversation which is, as you've said in your witness statement, that you would not have been willing to discuss Mr Abramovich's private affairs in front of these people.

A. Correct, and I can go through the issues in the notes, we can discuss why it doesn't make sense that I would be discussing these issues with these people.

Q. We will go through those issues shortly.

If Mr Abramovich had said to you, "Mr Tenenbaum, you're my head of corporate finance, you certainly understand a fair amount about Rusal from your involvement with that, Mr Patarkatsishvili wants to talk about selling his Rusal interests, please go and talk to him about it." The fact that, as you put it, these were Mr Abramovich's private affairs would not have been an obstacle to you being able to do so, would it?

A. I think it would be because we're talking about selling something that I have no knowledge of him selling. So I wouldn't be the right person to go because I have no knowledge of that, and I wouldn't be the one to be discussing price et cetera.

I've never done this before, negotiating a -- so why would he send me? He sent me for a very specific purpose.

- Q. Mr Tenenbaum, you were head of corporate finance at Sibneft, correct?
- A. At Sibneft, correct.
- Q. So you would have had a fair amount of experience of the buying and selling of assets and companies and the like?
- A. Acquisitions, yes.
- Q. And if you had been told to go and have a discussion with someone about buying and selling of their 25 per cent interest in a company, you could certainly have had that discussion and not have been concerned about doing so?
- A. I would be very concerned about talking to Mr Patarkatsishvili about it. I wouldn't go to talk -- I didn't want to go actually, I told Mr Abramovich I didn't want to go.
- Q. But you did go, in fact, Mr Tenenbaum. We know that because you accept you were in Georgia.
- A. Yes. I did go, contrary to Mr Shvidler's advice, but yes, I did go.
- Q. Then this point about you not wanting to go really goes nowhere, does it?

A. I'm sorry?

Q. The point about you not wanting to go, or being nervous about going, goes nowhere. Because whatever the purpose of your trip was, you were in the end willing to go, and you did go?

A. I did go to discuss a very specific issue which I have a strong recollection about, which I had knowledge of and I could actually talk about it. These other issues I couldn't, and I can go through why it doesn't make any sense that I would be talking about these things.

Q. Let's look at the third of the reasons that you gave at the time of the strike-out, if we can. That's at paragraph 21 of your statement J2/3.32/54. You say:

"Thirdly, I do not understand what the context of the 'meeting' is supposed to have been."

A. Correct.

Q. "As I say, I have never been involved in discussions about the acquisition or disposal of Rusal before, nor have been since."

That's not quite correct, is it, Mr Tenenbaum, that you had never been involved in discussions about the acquisition or disposal of Rusal before?

A. No, it is correct. At this level I have never been involved. I was always in the back office. I mean,

I was supporting, I wasn't even actually doing the documents, I was supporting my staff.

So, no, I was not involved in a direct role at this level of Mr Patarkatsishvili.

Q. Well, did you not tell us earlier that you had participated, for example, in the negotiations both in Moscow and in London in March?

A. It wasn't negotiations, it was supporting Ms Panchenko because she didn't speak English very well, and she asked me to be there because she was really able to do -- which was the share transfer points. These were the main points, everything else wasn't key. Because if you look at the documents, there are no key points in there for me to be involved in. I couldn't add value. I'm not saying I'm better or worse, I'm just saying there were better people who could do those things, not me.

The shareholder agreement I accept I did because I could add value, because it was to understand the business, to understand the risks, to understand each side's weaknesses and strengths, and that was my ability to participate, and that's what I did, and I'm negotiating as (sic) Mr Mishakov. That was my role.

Q. And in fact you've rather changed your evidence about this third point.

Can I ask you, please, to look at paragraph 98 of your third witness statement at page 108 E3/11/108. Whereas previously you have been saying you had never been involved in discussions about the acquisition or disposal of Rusal before, nor have been since. If you look at paragraph 98, what you now say is that you had never been involved in discussions with Mr Patarkatsishvili about the acquisition or disposal of Rusal before, nor have you since. And that's rather different, isn't it?

A. No, it's not, it's exactly what I was saying, I never discussed it with Mr Patarkatsishvili. And the second witness statement simply assumes, because it only talks about the meeting in Georgia, so therefore it's clear that I'm talking about my meeting with Mr Patarkatsishvili. This is a much more general witness statement about everything so here I have to be specific, I suppose, and so I was specific --

Q. Well, is your --

A. -- there.

Q. Sorry, Mr Tenenbaum, I really don't want to interrupt you, and if I do, please tell me.

A. No, no, I'm sorry, go ahead.

Q. Is your evidence now that you want us to say that your evidence is that you had never been involved in discussions about the acquisition or disposal of Rusal before, nor have since; or do you want us to record your evidence now as being that you'd never been involved in discussions with Mr Patarkatsishvili about the acquisition or disposal of Rusal before, nor have you since?

- A. There are two points that I would like to make. First, I have never been involved in direct discussions with Mr Patarkatsishvili. And the second point, what these notes discuss is share transfers, structuring, cashflows, bank accounts. I was never involved with things like that. That is not my expertise. I had people in my department that dealt with that, but the right person, if anybody was here, was Ms Panchenko and Ms Khudyk who deal with those things.

I have no knowledge -- it would be like a mute talking about things, that's not what I do, that's not what I did. If it was to talk about buying an aluminium company, yes, I would be discussing it, but certainly not with Mr Patarkatsishvili.

- Q. Why does the fact that you had never previously been involved in discussion with Mr Patarkatsishvili about acquisition or disposal of Rusal mean that you couldn't have been involved in a discussion with him now, at this point?

- A. Because (a) I would have remembered these notes, if I had discussed these things, and secondly, Mr Patarkatsishvili wouldn't be talking to me. I mean, it is inconceivable for him to talk to me. It just doesn't make any sense to me. And, again, I can go through the notes, we can go line by line, and I can show you why it doesn't make any economic sense to me.
- Q. We know that it was Mr Abramovich who was supposed to go and Mr Abramovich sent you instead?
- A. Correct.
- Q. If Mr Abramovich sent you instead when Mr Patarkatsishvili had asked for Mr Abramovich to come, then you would have been the only person on hand for Mr Patarkatsishvili to talk with about these things.
- A. There were many other people that could have gone. I went specifically with respect to football. Because in July 1st we buy Chelsea, I spend 24 hours a day, seven days a week on Chelsea. That's all I do. That's all I did for the last eight years. I didn't do anything else.

So yes, I went to discuss football because Mr Patarkatsishvili was very excited about -- this I do remember -- he was very excited about Mr Abramovich, the positive reaction he had when he bought it. And, to him, because he couldn't travel anywhere, it was important to discuss how we did it, because he didn't believe that Roman just bought it because he loved football. He thought he did it for improving his image, and he wanted to do the same thing in Brazil, and that's what we discussed, that's what stayed in my mind.

Q. All right, well, we'll come to that if we may in a moment.

Now, just in terms of what it was that the meeting, sorry, the notes record you as doing. This was in fact only a first discussion meeting, it wasn't a meeting to close the deal, even on the terms of the notes.

A. To close which deal, I'm sorry?

Q. To close a deal to acquire or buy the Rusal shares.

A. The problem is that, in August 25th, I knew that we already sold the shares to Mr Deripaska, so what am I discussing with him? I still don't understand from these notes, what would I be discussing then? Because in August 25th, Mr Abramovich has done a deal with Mr Deripaska.

Q. He's in fact done a deal with Mr Deripaska for only 25 per cent of the shares.

A. Okay.

Q. Isn't it right that the deal that Mr Abramovich does with Mr Deripaska is in September 2003?

A. No, but they started discussing it in the summer.

- Q. But the fact that they were discussing it, and they were discussing 25 per cent, doesn't mean that you couldn't have gone to have a conversation with Mr Patarkatsishvili about the 25 per cent of the shares that Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky owned?
- A. Again, I couldn't have discussed it because that's not -- first of all, I wasn't involved in the sale of Rusal. First of all, it was 50 per cent that was sold. The deal was -- I knew that that was the deal because when we bought Chelsea, Roman was not involved any longer in those transactions in Russia. We were only looking at Yukos Sibneft, and I participated a little bit in that, but primarily my time was in Chelsea. So I knew that he sold everything, we were out, out of Rusal. I understood that at that time. So when I'm discussing these things with him, I don't really understand what I'm supposed to be discussing with him.
- Q. You say that he'd sold 50 per cent, that's not what the documentation shows in relation to the Rusal transaction, but I'm not going to go through that with you now, Mr Tenenbaum.

Can I just ask you about the fourth reason that you give as to why you say this couldn't have been a genuine note made of a meeting which you attended, and that is the language barrier point. You make this point at paragraph 22 of the witness statement that you made in the context of the strike-out J2/3.32/54. At paragraph 22, page 54, you said this:

"As I mentioned, I may have had had some exchanges in English with the English/American gentleman by way of polite discussion, but I do not believe that Mr Patarkatsishvili spoke English (I certainly never recollect him speaking English or any occasion where I had met him previously) ..."

Are you sure about that, Mr Tenenbaum, that you do not recall Mr Patarkatsishvili speaking any English?

- A. I've never -- I mean, I met him two/three times in my life. He's never spoken English to me.
- Q. You see, Mr Reuben has given evidence that in late 1999 Mr Patarkatsishvili's English was good enough for him to act as a translator for Mr Anisimov on the course of a plane journey.

For your Ladyship's note, that is Day 15, page 16 at line 19, on to page 17.

And it's not only Mr Reuben who has given evidence of Mr Patarkatsishvili's ability to speak English, Mr Tenenbaum, but all of the English solicitors who interviewed Mr Patarkatsishvili later on in time have testified to him having at least a reasonable grasp of English.

Now, can we be clear, is it your evidence that he could not speak English or that you had not previously spoken with him in English?

A. I've never previously spoken to him in English.

Q. So you're not suggesting that you couldn't at this stage have had a conversation with him in English?

A. It's theoretical because I never spoke to him in English.

Q. Well, that's not what the note records.

Now, even assuming that Mr Patarkatsishvili's English was not fluent in 2003, which I have to say we do not accept for a moment, the fact is that you are fluent in both English and Russian, are you not, Mr Tenenbaum?

A. Yes.

Q. And so is Mr Fomichev?

A. I don't know.

Q. Well, Mr Fomichev claims to be a native Russian speaker with fluent written and spoken English. If Mr Patarkatsishvili's English had been a little rusty, both of you could have translated for Mr Curtis on this occasion if the need arose, couldn't you?

A. In theory, yes.

Q. What you have said in your witness statement, and you've repeated it here, is that you say that the reason you went to speak to Mr Patarkatsishvili in Georgia was because you wanted to discuss football with him and that all you can remember discussing was the recent Chelsea acquisition. That's what you say at paragraph 90 of your witness statement E3/11/106.

A. Correct. Well, I understand that he wanted to talk to Mr Abramovich about football, and so that's why I went, because I had just recently -- we just recently acquired Chelsea and the transfer window was in August so that's why I went.

Q. So let's just be clear about this, and there is another reference to football in case my learned friend wants to jump up about it because I'll come to it. You are suggesting, are you, that the reason Mr Abramovich got you to fly all the way to Georgia was to talk about football with Mr Patarkatsishvili?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you think that's very likely to be a reason why you would fly all that way?

A. Yes. You don't know Mr Abramovich. Absolutely.

At that moment in time, my Lady, that's all we did, was football, and for the next seven years. That's all Mr Abramovich talks about.

Q. And just looking at paragraph 90 of your third witness statement, Mr Tenenbaum, you say this in the fourth line

E3/11/106.

Are you there?

A. 90, yes.

Q. "Mr Patarkatsishvili raised the fact that he had some contacts in Brazilian football and enquired whether Mr Abramovich had any interest in making an investment along with him."

A. Correct.

Q. You go on to say that Mr Patarkatsishvili was hoping that this would enable him to travel to Brazil and gain "positive publicity"?

A. Correct, exactly.

Q. And you also say this, this is about six lines up from the end of paragraph 90, that you assured Mr Patarkatsishvili that you would speak to Mr Abramovich about this Brazilian football proposal.

A. Correct.

Q. Then just looking at paragraph 91 E3/11/106, you say you then flew on to Nice where Mr Abramovich was staying, and that you passed on the detail of this conversation, and indeed the question of investing in Brazilian football clubs, I take it, to Mr Abramovich, is that right?

A. Correct.

Q. And then you also note, this is paragraph 91, you say that:

"The following year Mr Patarkatsishvili did [indeed] invest in the Brazilian club Corinthians along with [his Iranian] partner, [Mr] Kia Joorabchian."

A. Correct.

Q. I don't think you need to turn it up, but that reflects the evidence which you had given in your second witness statement, that was at paragraphs 12 and 13 of your previous statement J2/3.32/52.

Let me ask you this, Mr Tenenbaum, how clear is your recollection of this conversation with Mr Patarkatsishvili in August 2003 about his Brazilian football contacts?

A. The Brazilian football is clear. His excitement that he could also gain positive publicity if he invested somewhere else and could travel freely is clear. The flight in is clear, the helicopter flight is clear. The ambience of the environment is a bit clear, because it was very weird, the house was finished but not really.

It was a very weird setting for me personally. People that I don't really know, I'm there. And so for me that moment is quite clear, that I arrive, I talk to Mr Patarkatsishvili, which is not normal a situation for me, and so that aspect of the trip is very, very clear to me.

Q. You see, Mr Tenenbaum, we have scoured the commercial database of the disclosed documents in this case and we have found that the Brazilian football investment which Mr Patarkatsishvili made has in fact been the subject of a pretty thorough Brazilian criminal investigation, and it appears that this resulted in a Brazilian criminal prosecution being launched in July 2007. Are you aware of that, Mr Tenenbaum?

A. Yes, of course.

Q. There is a document which I would like to take you to. It's to be found at HG, tab 28 at page 214 H(G)28/214.

A. Yes.

Q. You see, what this appears to suggest, Mr Tenenbaum, and you can see it in particular if you go to page 5 of the documents, page 218 within the file H(G)28/218, and if you look at heading 2, is that the first steps that Mr Joorabchian, I'm sure I'm mispronouncing his name, took in Brazil only occurred in mid-2004.

A. Correct.

Q. And indeed that pre-contractual negotiations only started in August 2004. You can see that if you look over the page, look under heading 4 H(G)28/219.

A. Yes.

Q. One also sees under heading 4 that offshore companies were only set up in August 2004.

A. Mm-hm.

Q. And indeed that the investments only started in December 2004.

A. Correct.

Q. I have to tell you that despite making a thorough -- what I hope was a thorough search of the commercial disclosure database, and indeed the extensive materials relating to this Brazilian football club investment, we have been unable to find a single document suggesting that Mr Patarkatsishvili or Mr Joorabchian had any Brazilian football contacts prior to August 2004.

Now, if that is right, I suggest to you that that would indicate that it is unlikely that in August 2003, about a year prior to Mr Joorabchian apparently getting involved there, Mr Patarkatsishvili was talking to you about his contacts in Brazilian football?

A. He was talking about his contacts, of his desire to go to Brazil. Before you make an investment you have to actually analyse where you're going. The fact that he makes an investment in 2004 does not imply that he didn't actually think about the investment in 2003.

Q. You see, even if the evidence set out in the Brazilian criminal complaint is wrong and Mr Patarkatsishvili did already know some Brazilian football contacts as at August 2003, given the chronology, and that no contract was concluded or investment made for over a year, the Brazilian football project could have been no more than a twinkle in Mr Patarkatsishvili's eye in the summer of 2003, couldn't it, Mr Tenenbaum?

A. It was absolutely just a twinkle, that's what I'm trying to explain. He was excited about Roman doing it and he decided to do it himself because of his relationships, I suppose, in Brazil and in Brazilian football. So the fact that he doesn't make an investment in a year's time doesn't mean that Roman buying Chelsea gives him the impetus I think to look at Brazil. That actually is very logical in my mind.

Q. The fact that, as you accept, it was no more than a twinkle in his eye, I'm sure that's a mangling of metaphors, but the fact that it was no more than a twinkle in Mr Patarkatsishvili's eye at that stage, you say was sufficiently important for you to break your journey from Georgia to London by stopping at Nice and reporting immediately and directly to Mr Abramovich about it, do you?

A. Yes, because I explained to Mr Abramovich my meeting with Mr Patarkatsishvili.

Q. You wouldn't have to divert to Nice to tell Mr Abramovich that Mr Patarkatsishvili had this dream or future idea, no more than a twinkle in his eye, that he wanted to get involved in Brazilian football?

- A. First of all, you don't know Mr Abramovich, and at that time football was the only thing he was thinking about. And the second thing that we discussed, as I know it, is the Tbilisi football club which Mr Patarkatsishvili did own since 2001. So the discussion about football makes absolute sense because he was interested in football, he had an investment in Tbilisi in football since 2001. And the investment that Mr Abramovich made in Chelsea made him realise that he could potentially be free because he couldn't travel at that time.

So that makes perfect sense to me why, and why Mr Abramovich wants to know about things like that.

- Q. Why couldn't you just have spoken to Mr Abramovich about the Brazilian football project or Tbilisi football project on the phone? Why did you have to divert to Nice and see Mr Abramovich in person about that?
- A. That's the way Mr Abramovich is. I mean, he likes to talk to me, he likes to see me, it wasn't a major event. I stopped over and I sent (sic) over to see him.
- Q. You see, I have to suggest to you that your evidence about this is not truthful, Mr Tenenbaum, and that at this meeting, which you accept took place in August 2003, the matters that we see Mr Curtis recording in his handwritten note were discussed with yourself and Mr Patarkatsishvili?

A. My Lady, I will explain why that is not the case. If we can go through the notes --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Explain.

A. We have to go through the notes and we have to go in detail why it's logically impossible for me to be at that meeting.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'll take you through the notes in a minute, Mr Tenenbaum, but I'd better put my case --

A. Go ahead.

Q. -- lest I later be criticised for not doing so.

Mr Abramovich asked you to attend in his place because you were one of his senior management team who was already familiar with the Rusal Holding structures and could advise on how to structure an offshore sale of Mr Berezovsky's and Mr Patarkatsishvili's stake. And following the meeting with Mr Patarkatsishvili, Mr Curtis and Mr Fomichev in Georgia you reported back directly to Mr Abramovich in Nice because the matter was sufficiently important for you to need to report to him in person. And that's the truth of it, isn't it?

A. No, it's not.

Q. Okay, well, can we just then look at the notes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Are we looking at them in the manuscript or --

MR RABINOWITZ: I think if your Ladyship looks at them in the typed version.

Just picking it up at 005 H(A)59/110.005, you see that Mr Curtis has recorded the following, that Badri explained that:

"Few years ago several people owned several plants -- willing to sell shares. At that point shareholders of Sibneft bought most of these plants.

"Shareholders of [Sibneft] -- [Boris, Badri and Roman].

"We sold Sibneft so far no problems with deal.

"Remained partners with [Roman] in [aluminium]. Now have another partner who holds remainder of shares.

"Agreed with [Roman and] partner in Russian Aluminium -- shareholders 50/50.

"We agree 25 [Boris and Badri], 25 [Roman].

"We are passive shareholder[s] so [Roman] operating partner and every year we get dividends from [aluminium] activities."

That's what was discussed there, was it not?

A. Not in front of me. It's impossible to have discussed that the shareholders of "S" were Boris, Badri and Roman.

Q. You say it's impossible to discuss --

A. In front of me, I would have remembered that. I was a trustee of Mr Abramovich's trust, I knew that he was the only beneficial shareholder. It is absolutely impossible for me to be at that meeting, to listen to these people talk about these things, and for me (a) not to remember something about this.

Q. That of course assumes that what you are saying about who is the only beneficial shareholder of Sibneft is correct. But on the basis that that is not correct, and that Mr Berezovsky's case is correct, that is precisely the sort of conversation that might have taken place, is it not?

A. Well, definitely not with me.

Q. All right.

A. Because I was on the opposite side of that knowledge, complete opposite side of that knowledge, so why would they discuss that with me if they believe that, for one instance.

Q. Well, they may have believed it and understood that you would have known about the true position as well, Mr Tenenbaum.

A. And why would I explain that I know something else?

Q. You see, Mr Tenenbaum, in a sense you are trying to answer that question by assuming the answer to the very question my Lady has to decide.

A. I see, okay, I'm sorry.

Q. Now, just looking at "Side 2" H(A)59/110.005:

"Because of difficulties of being partner of B [and I think that would be Boris] Badre agreed to sell both parts to [Roman].

"Now have to discuss key issues relating to transaction and all related issues -- price/structure -- our partners must feel comfortable as well."

Then two issues are identified with price and structure:

"Price not complicated we have mutual understanding of what involved -- in any event we will find right price.

"At this meeting just stipulate basic understanding of price from both sides to find middle grounds."

And then it says:

"[Roman and Badri] are eager to find solutions for both partners. Structure we have ideas to discuss."

And then:

"[Badri] asked [Mr Tenenbaum] if he understood [and Mr Tenenbaum] confirmed."

Again, Mr Tenenbaum, I have to suggest to you that this is what you discussed with Mr Patarkatsishvili and indeed Mr Fomichev and Mr Curtis?

A. It is impossible that I discussed it, because if you look at the next point H(A)59/110.005:

"B-T discussed structure. B said we need to participate in upside ..."

I knew that the Rusal stake was sold already. What could I be discussing with them?

- Q. Well, again, Mr Tenenbaum, that assumes that Mr Abramovich's evidence about having sold the 50 per cent to Mr Deripaska is right when the document suggests that he had only sold 25 per cent. That's right, isn't it?
- A. The documents showed only 25 per cent, correct.
- Q. Yes. And if the documents are to be believed, there was no reason at all why you couldn't have been discussing the other 25 per cent?
- A. I wouldn't be discussing with them.
- Q. Now, if you look then at card 2, side 3 H(A)59/110.006. I have to pick it up from the previous page:

"B-T discussed structure. B said we need to participate in upside -- need to have option to buy back and sell if sold to third parties or company go to public market -- or holding cos sold."

Then Mr Curtis looks as if he's unclear as to who said this, you or Mr Patarkatsishvili:

"Do we need option or can we go another way."

Mr Patarkatsishvili:

"Just a method. If offer is high enough we drop option -- all about figure."

You are then recorded as saying:

"What is [the] period/what triggers (what is event) or is it just call."

Then this is recorded:

"Eugene was asking if liked structure for [Sibneft]. [Mr Patarkatsishvili says] yes, problem complicated and costly."

And Mr Patarkatsishvili then says:

"Proposed structure that we now become registered shareholders and then sell back to R."

And you then say:

"Problem is existing shares are bearer company with bearer shares."

Just pausing there, the line from

Mr Patarkatsishvili:

"Proposed structure that we now become registered shareholders and then sell back to R."

That is not dissimilar to what in fact happened in July 2004 where Mr Patarkatsishvili was identified as being the beneficial shareholder of the Rusal shares in order that he sell to Mr Deripaska, do you remember that?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. And what Mr Patarkatsishvili was saying here was that -- or reflected the fact that until this point Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky had not been reflected as being the owners, and what he was suggesting needed to happen was that the shares should be put in their name first so that they could then sell them to Mr Abramovich.

That's right, isn't it? That's what he was suggesting?

A. I'm sorry, what's the question?

Q. That is what he was suggesting?

A. To whom?

Q. To you.

A. Oh, no.

Q. Okay.

Just looking at the line immediately below that, Mr Tenenbaum, you are recorded as saying:

"Problem is existing shares are bearer company with bearer shares."

Now, you knew as at August 2003, didn't you, Mr Tenenbaum, that the BVI shares were bearer company shares?

A. Well, the fact is I actually knew the opposite because I thought in May 2003 it was registered already as Rusal Holding. That was my knowledge in May 2003.

Q. Can you look, please, at paragraph 50 of your third witness statement, page 91 E3/11/90?

A. Yes.

Q. At paragraph 50 you say:

"I was ... not involved with the registration of ... Rusal ... although I recall that at some stage I provided general advice about what investors would expect if the company was later listed on an international stock exchange. This may be why I have some recollection of the names of four BVI registered companies ..."

You recall that those companies had bearer shares?

A. Correct.

Q. And you say something similar, if you go to paragraph 103 at page 110 E3/11/110. If you look at -- it's in the middle of paragraph 103, and you're talking here -- in fact you're talking here about the cards themselves, and you say:

"As regards Rusal, I was aware at the time that the shares in the BVI company, through which Mr Abramovich's interests in Rusal were held, were bearer shares."

A. Correct. The point -- yes, go ahead.

Q. So in fact what is said in this note, in the card, about the bearer shares, BVI company and bearer shares, was something that you knew about?

A. I knew that originally they were in bearer form, but as of May 2003 I understood that the restructuring was taking place so I would have -- if it's me in this meeting, I would have communicated that information if I was talking, and I don't understand why is it a problem to actually -- why is there a problem in existing shares being bearer? On the contrary, I think it makes sense that it's actually easier.

Q. I don't think that's right, actually. If you look -- sorry, I'm not sure, I don't want to be at cross-purposes with you, but if you look at card 2, side 3, do you see that immediately after you are recorded as saying:

"Problem is existing shares are bearer company with bearer shares."

Mr Curtis is recorded as saying:

"Changing B shares now BVI -- so do have to be registered anyway -- can transfer shares in BVI."

The reference to changing bearer shares now in BVI reflects the fact, does it not, and this may be a point that you were making as well, that in May 2003 an act was passed in the BVI which changed the law in the BVI relating to bearer share companies and required them in the future to be held by custodians and registered?

A. What is the question, I'm sorry.

- Q. Well, are you aware of that?
- A. I'm not aware.
- Q. Okay. Now, just your point about why was the problem that the existing shares were bearer companies with bearer shares, the point that Mr Patarkatsishvili was making was about becoming registered shareholders, and the point that you made in response to that was that the shares were bearer shares.
- A. Okay, but I knew that they weren't actually registered already, so why would I say it's a problem if I know that the company is changing structure? I guess that's what's not clear to me.
- Q. Isn't that precisely the point that Mr Curtis is making, that the structure is going to have to change because of the position in the BVI?
- A. But he didn't know about the May 2003 registration. I knew that.
- Q. He knew about the law which had just been passed in May 2003, and isn't that the reason why there was a change in the position of the BVI companies in May to reflect the change in the law?
- A. No, the change -- the bearer shares remained in existence for a while in Rusal, is my understanding. Madison remained as a bearer company because we were still paying them, as I understand, until 2005 through those structures.

So the bearer structure actually didn't change how the payments were made. The ownership was changed, how the assets owned, the actual operating assets, not the trading company from which they were being paid. So the operating assets were changing to bearer form -- into registered form, so that's the key point here.

Q. Can we just look a little further down on "Side 4"

H(A)59/110.006. You then say:

"Problem -- shareholders of [Rusal Aluminium] -- all of shareholders in holding co we are partners of third party -- BVIs held 50/50, not RA."

That was right as well in terms of the way in which the BVI holdings were structured?

A. Correct, it was 50/50.

Q. And you would obviously have been aware of that, Mr Tenenbaum?

A. Yes, and so was Mr Fomichev.

Q. Why would Mr Fomichev have been aware of that?

A. Because since 2001 that's how they were being paid, through bearer form, and they knew that the 50/50 of Rual was owned by Mr Deripaska.

Q. Why would they have needed to know that the 50/50 of Rual was owned by Mr Deripaska in order for them to be paid?

A. Because my understanding from the structure that was done with them, they would have seen the flow of dividends, as I understand.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: When you say that's how they were being paid, who is "they"?

A. Well, Mr Berezovsky, the 1.3 billion I guess I'm talking about, I'm sorry. When the 1.3 billion was agreed and paid to them, to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, it was structured through the dividends of Rual and Pex and it went to, I guess, Devonia.

So they would have known, Mr Fomichev and, I only can assume, Mr Curtis, I don't know, would have known how the structure of Rusal was structured. Bearer form, 50/50 with Deripaska.

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Tenenbaum, what they would have known was that Devonia was receiving dividends from Pex. They didn't need to know anything at all below that.

A. My understanding --

Q. About Rual or Rusal or anything else.

A. My understanding, they did, from Ms Panchenko.

Q. That's certainly not what she has said.

Let's look further along this note. Mr Curtis is then recorded as saying:

"We need to create proof of ownership to show were/why proceeds of sale are derived."

Then Mr Curtis also says:

"If shareholding already at BVI level it is easier to transfer ownership once we have established ownership route to RA -- no need to show changed in Russia just in BVI ... as going to have to change because of law -- good reason to show real. No need to show sale -- just say this was the true position -- reflecting actual position."

What Mr Curtis is suggesting there --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Why is Curtis "S"?

MR RABINOWITZ: Stephen.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, sorry, thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: What Mr Curtis is suggesting there is if you have a document which identifies that Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky were the owners of 25 per cent of the Rusal shares, that would actually reflect the actual real position, and that is what he said to you at the time, did he not?

A. No.

Q. We then have the note Mr Curtis made saying this:

"We have already made certain disclosures in market we will have to consider what we have said -- not to public but to banks/insurance co [etc]."

Now, you have been --

A. Sorry, it doesn't say "banks, insurance companies".

Q. "Not to public but to banks --"

A. Where's banks, sorry?

Q. Over the page, I'm sorry.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Which card are we on?

MR RABINOWITZ: It goes from the bottom of card 2, side 4 on to card 3, side 5.

Does your Ladyship have that?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I have that.

MR RABINOWITZ: Now, this comment about representation or disclosures made to banks/insurance companies, can I ask you, Mr Tenenbaum, to be given bundle H(A)76 at page 57 H(A)76/57.

I've asked Ms Panchenko about this document. It's a letter that was produced by Mr Streshinsky following a conversation that he had with Ms Panchenko in the context of the second Rusal sale. But do you see the first sentence:

"As discussed over the phone, in order to meet the representations that you previously made to the banks, please find below an alternative structure."

And I suggest to you, Mr Tenenbaum, that this concern within Mr Abramovich's companies or team about representations previously made to banks and insurance companies is precisely the point which is reflected in Mr Curtis's note of his conversation with you, is it not?

A. It's not with me, sir.

Q. There is then the following exchange H(A)59/110.007.

Mr Tenenbaum:

"Do you have cos to be shareholders either by sale or by reflecting annual."

Mr Curtis says:

"Yes and they are all BVI."

There is then a discussion about whether they have banks which can be used. There is then this exchange, we're still on card 3, side 5. You say:

"Are you happy to show B/Bors."

Which presumably is Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky.

And Mr Curtis says:

"Yes or just Badre if this is easier for you."

Again, Mr Tenenbaum, you will recall that in the context of the 2004 Rusal sale, the second tranche, what happened in the end was that only Mr Patarkatsishvili was shown as the owner of the Rusal shares and, again, I suggest to you that this again reflects a consistent concern by all of the parties involved as to whether documentation should show Mr Berezovsky as well as Mr Patarkatsishvili. Would you agree with that?

A. I'm sorry?

Q. Would you agree that there was a consistent concern reflected in the end in the -- let me ask that separately.

Would you agree there was a consistent concern about whether documentation should show Mr Berezovsky as well as Mr Patarkatsishvili as an owner of the Rusal shares?

A. The concern is that they weren't shareholders so I don't know how to answer that question.

Q. Well, we know that in the July 2004 sale documentation, the contract that was produced and the deed which was produced and signed by Mr Abramovich did say that Mr Patarkatsishvili had been a beneficial owner of the Rusal shares since March 2000. You're aware of that?

A. I'm aware, but it's not a correct interpretation. What Mr Abramovich signed was a deed acknowledging that Mr Patarkatsishvili is a shareholder, and what we agreed to was that he was a shareholder at the moment of the transfer of shares, to assist Mr Patarkatsishvili. We did not agree and we never -- Mr Abramovich never signed an acknowledgement that said Mr Patarkatsishvili was a shareholder from March 2000.

Q. I've shown you this note, Mr Tenenbaum. Is there anything else in this note that you would like to comment on that I haven't allowed you the opportunity to comment on?

A. I think the key points have been raised.

MR RABINOWITZ: Thank you very much, Mr Tenenbaum. I don't have any more questions.

MR MALEK: No questions, my Lady.

MR ADKIN: No questions.

Re-examination by MR SUMPTION

MR SUMPTION: Mr Tenenbaum, what was the reason why you went to Georgia?

A. I went because Roman asked me to go and to meet with Mr Patarkatsishvili about football.

Q. And precisely what were you supposed to discuss about football with Mr Patarkatsishvili so far as you were aware before the meeting started?

A. He wanted to find out about Chelsea Football Club, what we did, how we did it, as I understood from Roman at that time.

Q. What, Mr Patarkatsishvili wanted to do that?

A. As I understood it, yes.

Q. So did you -- you understood that you were going to be giving information to Mr Patarkatsishvili, did you?

A. Yes, because I was the one that actually purchased Chelsea, I was the one that actually did the transaction, so Mr Abramovich asked me to go and discuss that.

Q. Who did you expect to be present at that meeting before you got there?

A. I understood I was only going to see
Mr Patarkatsishvili.

Q. Mr Rabinowitz said to you: if Mr Abramovich had told you to go and discuss aluminium or Rusal, you would have done so. Did Mr Abramovich say anything of that kind?

A. He did not, and if he would have said I would never have gone.

Q. Now, the question of language, what is your first language? You are fluent in both English and Russian.
Which is your first language?

A. I feel more comfortable in English but my first language of course is Russian, but I left when I was 10 -- 11 years old, so I think in English.

Q. What was Mr Patarkatsishvili's Russian like?

A. I thought it was okay, it was very good.

Q. What language do you usually speak when you are speaking to other fluent Russian speakers?

A. I only speak Russian. They would take offence if I spoke anything else.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is Georgian a different language from Russian?

A. Very different.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Forgive my --

A. He had an accent, of course, he had a very particular accent, it was very interesting.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But Georgian is not similar to Russian --

A. No, no, it's completely different. But he spoke Russian from what I understand. I'm sure he -- I remember him having an accent in Russian, not a Moscow accent.

MR SUMPTION: He spoke Russian like a Yorkshireman.

A. I guess, yes. Actually true. When I married my wife and I went to Yorkshire I didn't understand anything people were saying to me.

Q. Now, do you remember whether anyone was making a note at this meeting?

A. There was no note being taken, I'm certain of that.

Q. What enables you to be certain that no note was being taken at the meeting?

A. Because Mr Fomichev told Mr Shvidler and others that the note was taken after I left, whether at the same time or maybe much later, but he told them that it was taken later, and it was -- I think it was dictated by Mr Patarkatsishvili. He told him some other things as well, that the Devonia agreement was actually a sham and that there was no on-sale.

Q. Mr Tenenbaum, how do you know that the note was dictated in the way that you've described?

A. Mr Fomichev told Mr Shvidler.

Q. Now, if you had seen Mr Curtis at the time making a note, what would you have done differently, if anything?

A. I think if he was taking a note and it was a real business meeting, I would have asked to see the note after to check the note, what was said -- to confirm what I was saying.

If I was saying these things, my experience of anybody taking a note, I would want to review that note, and I would remember if somebody is actually taking a note outside as we're having lunch.

Q. Now, in August 2003, what did you understand to be the form of the BVI shares? Did you understand them at that stage to be bearer shares or registered shares?

A. My understanding of my involvement in May 2003, that it was all changed, it was all restructured, that was my understanding.

Q. So if somebody had asked you in August 2003: what is the current status of these shares, are they presently, as we speak, bearer shares or registered shares? What would your answer have been?

A. My answer would have been that they were registered shares, the assets owning shares, not the trading, because that was what's being restructured as well.

Q. Could you please scroll back, or you may need some assistance for this, scroll back in the transcript to [draft] page 125 of the transcript, please.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: When you say the BVI shares, could you just clarify for the transcript, BVI shares in which company?

A. The way it was structured, it was really a tolling(?) structure as I understand. I think it was the four companies that --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can I just be clear on the dates here?

A. Sure.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: We're looking at August 2003?

A. Before August 2003.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Before August 2003.

MR SUMPTION: The restructuring he said was in May.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

A. Sorry, before May 2003, yes.

I'm sorry, what's the question?

MR SUMPTION: Now, just pursuing that, just to make sure we've got it clear on the transcript, when you said that you would have answered that they were registered shares, which companies were you referring to when you said you would have answered that they were registered shares?

A. Well, I would have answered that the asset owning companies that owned the actual assets, the operating assets, because it was structured as trading, and then the assets -- the companies that owned the assets, originally they were bearer and then it was restructured into registered form.

Q. Right. So when you gave your answer about being registered shares, you were talking about the asset-owning companies?

A. Correct.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can I have the names of those, please?

A. From me? I don't remember.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You don't remember.

A. No.

MR SUMPTION: Have you got [draft] page 125 of the transcript on the screen? If we could just scroll down a little bit further to line 23, do you see the answer that you gave at lines 23 to 25? Which companies are you talking about there?

A. The asset-owning companies.

Q. Well hang on. When you say:

"Okay, but I knew that they weren't actually registered already, so why would I say it's a problem if I know that the company is changing structure?"

What you say there is:

"... I knew that they weren't actually registered already --"

A. Sorry, I mean to say that if I understood them to be registered at that moment in time, in August 2003, I wouldn't be saying that they were in bearer form.

I guess that's what I'm saying.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay, just let me be absolutely clear in this.

A. Okay.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: As at August 2003, the reconstruction had taken place as of May?

A. I don't know. My knowledge was the restructuring was happening from May 2003, whether at that moment in time the restructuring happened I had no knowledge. So it may have been happening or it may have not happened yet. But my knowledge was from May 2003 that the structure had changed or changing. So in August 2005, my only knowledge was that they were registered already. Whether in fact in August 2003 they were, I don't know, I don't have knowledge of that.

MR SUMPTION: But your belief --

A. But my belief was, yes, correct.

Q. -- whatever the facts may have been, is what you're talking about, is that right?

A. My belief was that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You've mentioned August 2005, is that a mistake?

A. Sorry, August 2003.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: August 2003.

MR SUMPTION: Now, you were asked about the knowledge of Mr Fomichev of the bearer shares, and you gave some evidence about the knowledge that they would have derived from the way in which money was paid to them, the 1.3 billion.

A. Correct.

Q. Could you please be given bundle H(A)62, at page 26 H(A)62/26. This is a letter addressed to Curtis & Co by Mr De Cort, which was written on 8 August 2003, about a fortnight before the Georgia meeting.

Would you just like to read through it and tell us whether it assists you in saying what knowledge they had about the status of the shares?

A. Well, they would have had knowledge of the trading company, Rual Trading.

Q. Of the trading company?

A. Correct. And they would have also seen the 50 per cent interest in it.

Q. Where do we see the 50 per cent?

A. We see it in the third paragraph.

Q. And what conclusion does one derive from that?

A. That our side -- that Mr Abramovich held 50 per cent in the Rual trade.

Q. Does that assist one, one way or the other, on the question of whether they were bearer shares or registered shares, or of what knowledge Mr Curtis might have had on that subject?

A. I don't see "bearer" or "registered" here.

MR SUMPTION: Understood.

Okay, thank you very much, Mr Tenenbaum, I have no further questions.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, I have a question arising out of that evidence.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, fine.

Further cross-examination by MR RABINOWITZ

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Tenenbaum, for the very first time in re-examination you have suggested that there has been a conversation between Mr Fomichev and Mr Shvidler in which Mr Shvidler was told by Mr Fomichev that this was a fabricated note.

A. Correct.

Q. You have made five witness statements, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. And Mr Shvidler has made six witness statements, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. And it's right, isn't it, that at no stage in any of those witness statements has there ever been this suggestion made before?

A. Correct.

Q. Thank you very much --

A. No, can I say something?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You may.

A. We explained this to the lawyers and we were thinking about calling Mr Fomichev, but Mr Fomichev showed Mr Shvidler a text from Mr Berezovsky in which Mr Fomichev thought -- well, thought -- it was stated to him that because he was helping us, Mr Berezovsky threatened him, and it was clearly something that he was concerned about and clearly he was scared for his safety.

And so, therefore, together with the lawyers, we decided that we couldn't call him, because he was scared. He showed the note, it referred to Mr Berezovsky as "Dr Evil", and so -- we wanted to call Mr Fomichev but he didn't want to come. And I don't understand why it didn't come out before but clearly this is an important piece of information.

MR RABINOWITZ: Who saw the text message, Mr Tenenbaum?

A. I did, with Mr Shvidler. Mr Shvidler showed it to me.

Q. I suggest to you that this is completely untrue?

A. Well, you should ask Mr Fomichev --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Rabinowitz, I'm going to take the break now for ten minutes. Very well.

You're not to talk to anyone about your evidence.

(3.09 pm)

(A short break)

(3.30 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Tenenbaum, I just want to ask you a few questions about your last answer, if I may. You said that Mr Fomichev showed Mr Shvidler a text from Mr Berezovsky. Can you tell me when you say that occurred?

A. A few months ago.

Q. Can you try to be more specific, please?

A. I'll have to come back to you on that, I don't remember. I'll have to ask Mr Shvidler as well what he recalls, I don't remember. A few months ago. It was communicated to the lawyers. They may have a record of that.

Q. You say it was a text, so it follows that there would have been, what, a telephone call -- sorry, a text on a mobile phone?

A. Correct.

Q. Are you suggesting it was sent by Mr Berezovsky?

A. That's what Mr Fomichev told us.

Q. Well, you say that Mr Shvidler saw it --

A. I saw it as well.

Q. Right. So who do you say it was from?

A. Mr Fomichev showed us, and he said it's from Mr Berezovsky.

Q. You also say that:

"... it was stated to him that because he was helping us, Mr Berezovsky threatened him ..."

Can you be very clear as to what you say this text said, please?

A. Okay, I'll try. I don't remember verbatim. The thought was he knew he was helping us.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you be clear when you say --

A. Sorry, Mr -- well, he didn't -- it said that, "I know you're helping them. I'm watching you. I'm listening to your phone calls. I'm controlling your Skype." And I think he referred to Dr Evil, "I'm Dr Evil," something to that effect.

Q. So you say Mr Berezovsky signed himself off as "Dr Evil" in this?

A. Correct.

Q. You also say he showed the note, you say:

"He showed the note ..."

Is that because he'd printed something off?

A. No, he forwarded it to Mr Shvidler's phone?

Q. So Mr Shvidler has a copy of this on his phone, does he?

A. I have no idea.

- Q. But you're saying he must have had a copy of it on his phone at some point?
- A. Correct.
- Q. Do you know if Mr Shvidler still has a copy of this?
- A. I've no idea.
- Q. I take it you have never had a copy of this?
- A. I have not, no.
- Q. Can you explain why you've never referred to this previously in your witness statements?
- A. I spoke to my lawyers and what was I going to say? That he was threatened?
- Q. And Mr Shvidler also says nothing about this in any of his witness statements, does he?
- A. Correct, because he was scared, so how could we say it? We couldn't refer to him.
- Q. According to you, one of the things that Mr Fomichev said was that Badri had dictated the note after the meeting. Why couldn't you have said that in your witness statement, if that was the position?
- A. The lawyers were aware of it.
- Q. Well, that's not an answer to my question, Mr Tenenbaum. It's your evidence --
- A. I actually wanted to say it.
- Q. Are you saying that Mr Shvidler gave a copy of the text to Skaddens, the lawyers?

A. I'm not sure. I don't believe so.

Q. Mr Tenenbaum, I have to suggest to you that you are making all of this up and it's completely untrue.

A. The fact that he confirmed that the Devonia was a sham was done with the lawyers. The fact that the notes were fabricated after the meeting was done in front of the lawyers. The threat was communicated --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Sorry, just stopping there.

A. Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: When you say "was done with the lawyers," are you saying that Fomichev told --

A. Our lawyers.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: -- your lawyers that?

A. Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And when you say "the notes were fabricated after the meeting was done in front of the lawyers" --

A. Sorry, it was explained to the lawyers how the notes were fabricated, after I left Batumi.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: When you say "it was explained", you mean Mr Fomichev explained?

A. Yes, sorry, Mr Fomichev explained.

MR RABINOWITZ: Just to be clear, Mr Tenenbaum, you're suggesting, are you, that no one referred to this because of a concern about Mr Fomichev?

A. Correct.

Q. And that's why he hasn't been called as a witness?

A. Correct.

Q. Again, I suggest to you that is completely untrue.

A. It is true.

MR RABINOWITZ: Thank you very much.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Mr Sumption, any further re-examination after that?

MR SUMPTION: There's no further re-examination, but your Ladyship should know that these were one --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, just a second, if there's no further re-examination --

MR SUMPTION: There is no further re-examination, no.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is anything you're about to say likely to lead to a request by Mr Rabinowitz that he further cross-examines this witness?

MR SUMPTION: I doubt it, but I would not wish to deprive Mr Rabinowitz of the option if he thinks differently.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Well stay where you are, please, Mr Tenenbaum.

MR SUMPTION: The three statements attributed to Mr Fomichev, which your Ladyship has just heard, are three of a number of hearsay statements by Mr Fomichev which we did not allow to be included in witness statements because we were not prepared to call

Mr Fomichev for a number of reasons which I don't propose to go into.

It was quite a complicated matter. The matter came out in re-examination not intentionally. I asked Mr Tenenbaum, as your Ladyship will recall, to say whether he was able to say whether a note was being taken in his presence. That was not designed to elicit his knowledge of how the note was in fact taken although the result was that Mr Tenenbaum did give evidence to that effect, so I followed up his answer in order to clarify what the source of his information was, so far as it wasn't clear, which it pretty well was, in answer to my earlier question. So it came out very largely accidentally and it is there on the record. This happens from time to time.

But the reason why, and I think that I'm in a position to say this myself, why none of the witness statements deal with any hearsay statements from Mr Fomichev was our concern that we should not be leading such information if we were not in fact prepared to call him.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

Mr Rabinowitz, you may wish to consider your position in the light of what Mr Sumption has said and in the light of the evidence but that's a matter for you.

MR RABINOWITZ: Thank you, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm not saying that in any threatening way, I'm simply saying that if you wish to make any application --

MR RABINOWITZ: Well if something arises out of that, and I suspect one of the things Mr Sumption is concerned about, and it's a thought, if it is, that's crossed my mind as well, is whether there has been a waiver of privilege here, and that is something we will have to look at carefully.

I entirely understand what Mr Sumption has said about it, and we will look at the transcript and come to a conclusion about that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What I'm saying is I don't expect you to make any application now, if indeed you're going to make any application.

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed, I'm grateful for that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Think about it.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, the position on the evidence is that the next witness is Mr De Cort but my learned friend has indicated to us that, given the speed at which witnesses have succeeded each other, he would prefer Mr De Cort's evidence to be deferred I think until Monday. We are quite happy with that if your Ladyship is. Obviously it isn't at all easy to deal with one witness after another, particularly when they're all relatively --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Absolutely, so what are we doing tomorrow then? Mr Deripaska?

MR SUMPTION: Mr Deripaska is giving evidence at 2.00.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is that by video-link?

MR SUMPTION: Yes, it is, it's by video-link from New York and therefore 2.00 is very much a fixture.

I should tell your Ladyship that in relation to both Mr Deripaska and Mr Hauser, who is expected to give evidence early next week, we have been asked to make it clear to all those concerned, but obviously particularly to your Ladyship, that Mr Deripaska's privilege in relation to material in the bundles or evidence that he may give, so far as it exists, is not waived. They are anxious that your Ladyship should know that. And Mr Deripaska will be represented by his own counsel while he gives evidence. He is also expected to be here when Mr Hauser gives evidence.

We understand that it may be intended to put in a written statement of what points they may wish to take on privilege, and, if that happens --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I would quite like to have that now if that were possible.

MR SUMPTION: Well, we don't have it. They say that they may do that. Now, if they do that it may be sensible -- obviously your Ladyship must have it as soon as anyone does -- it may be sensible, given that we only have tomorrow afternoon for Mr Deripaska's evidence, for your Ladyship to be prepared to sit in the morning in order to deal with any issues of principle that arise on privilege.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, well, there's not much point me being given the note at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

MR SUMPTION: Yes, that's very much what we want to avoid.

We have made it clear that we would like to have the note as soon as possible and we will let your Ladyship have it at the very earliest moment that we can.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can I make it clear, and obviously I don't know who counsel or solicitors are, that I require it by tomorrow morning so that I can consider it.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, yes.

I should say that the issues of privilege, although they potentially arise in relation to both Mr Deripaska and Mr Hauser, are primarily, so far as they're problems at all, they're much more likely to be problems in relation to Mr Hauser, the reason being that Mr Deripaska can give evidence of facts within his own knowledge but it may be said that Mr Hauser, as his lawyer, cannot be required to give evidence of knowledge that Mr Deripaska conveyed to him as part of his instructions in his capacity as a lawyer.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR SUMPTION: So the two of them are in a somewhat different position, and for that reason we anticipate, though we haven't seen the memorandum yet, that any difficulties that do arise are much more likely to arise in relation to Mr Hauser. Having said that --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What, next week?

MR SUMPTION: Yes. Having said that, we will try and defuse the position as far as we can by simply seeking to avoid areas which cause them concern, if we can consistently with our own client's interest.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, okay. So does that mean we don't have a witness for tomorrow morning?

MR SUMPTION: It means we haven't got any business for tomorrow morning unless this business surfaces and needs to be dealt with by your Ladyship tomorrow morning.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay.

MR SUMPTION: There are scheduling issues which we will need to raise with your Ladyship at some stage, but at the moment it's not possible to do so because instructions are still in the process of being taken.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, okay, but we're up to speed on the timetable?

MR RABINOWITZ: We're very much up to speed, and my learned friend has lost or withdrawn a few witnesses as well so we're certainly not falling behind the timetable.

I think there is an issue -- or perhaps I shouldn't get into it -- with Mr Malek's witnesses and when they can come. I think the parties between us are content with an arrangement. Mr Streshinsky I think can only come next -- not this following Monday but the Monday after, and that's one of the scheduling issues which is going to arise, but rather than take up your Ladyship's --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, if you can't sort it out I'll have to make a ruling, but hopefully you can sort it out.

MR SUMPTION: We will try to sort this out between ourselves as far as we can without troubling your Ladyship. If we need to do so we will do it tomorrow.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. I'm fairly relaxed about interposing witnesses amongst the expert witnesses.

MR SUMPTION: That may be necessary.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can I just -- sorry, I hope my learned friend was finished.

In terms of Mr Deripaska, we are doing our best to accommodate him and he will be giving evidence from 2 o'clock tomorrow. I cannot say that I am completely confident that in a two and a quarter hour slot I will finish all my questions with Mr Deripaska. To some extent that depends upon the points of privilege which I haven't been told about yet, because it may be that I'm not allowed to ask him a number of the questions I was proposing to ask him, I don't think that is the case, but there is that risk, my Lady, because it is impossible, as your Ladyship knows, to know exactly how long any witness is going to be.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is he being cross-examined through translators?

MR RABINOWITZ: I hope and pray not. His witness statement is in English --

MR SUMPTION: I regret to say that he is.

MR RABINOWITZ: He has sworn a witness statement in English.

MR SUMPTION: Mr Deripaska speaks perfectly good English but obviously Russian is his principle language. Rather like the position of Mr Nevzlin, one understands that a witness may be able to speak perfectly good conversational or business English but not be willing to try his luck under pressure of cross-examination, and that seems an entirely legitimate position to take.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I can understand that.

MR RABINOWITZ: Then all the more so, my Lady, I cannot, standing here, tell your Ladyship that we'll definitely finish.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I can sit until about 5.00 but it would be a bit of a problem if I have to sit very much after 5.00.

MR RABINOWITZ: We will do our best.

I don't know to what extent Mr Deripaska is willing to be flexible about when we start. I don't know whether your Ladyship would be willing to start at 1.30, for example?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'll start whenever you want me to start.

MR SUMPTION: Can we investigate that and keep your Ladyship informed?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, certainly. I'll start at 1 o'clock or whenever.

MR RABINOWITZ: If he's in New York I don't want to impose a time which is unreasonable for him, although no doubt Mr Deripaska will do his best to assist the court. We are happy to start whenever Mr Deripaska is ready.

MR SUMPTION: We will find out how early he can reasonably be asked to start.

We're told that the bridge, which presumably has to be booked, will start at 1.30, so that may be the earliest practical time. But we'll try --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Anyway, I'll leave you to sort that.

MR SUMPTION: We will see what we can organise, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: If you could tell my clerk whenever, either later this evening, send him an email, or tomorrow morning, as to when you want to start I will be there.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm grateful, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much indeed.

Mr Tenenbaum, thank you for coming along to give your evidence.

(1.30 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, three short procedural points. First of all, Mr Stanley is here on behalf of Mr Deripaska, sitting behind me, primarily as I understand it with a view to protecting his interests on privilege.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

MR SUMPTION: It is common ground, as I understand it, that the matters ventilated in the two memoranda that your Ladyship has received will not need to be attended to this afternoon.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No.

MR SUMPTION: Secondly, your Ladyship has I think been given the letter from Quinn Emanuel explaining why it is that Mr Deripaska has had to give evidence by video-link. Plainly if he had been able to he would have preferred to be here, but these things happen.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. I've got that, but I've not got it with me, I've just left it on my desk. I don't think I need it. I've read it.

MR SUMPTION: I don't think the details matter. It was a matter of courtesy for your Ladyship.

There is, or there has been, a question about one of the translators who apparently has some involvement as an expert in other litigation in which Mr Deripaska is engaged. We don't want to have an argument about that. The simplest approach seemed to be to approach Mr Prokofiev, the other translator, and to ask him whether it was feasible for him to do the whole of the translation for Mr Deripaska. He has said that it is but on the understanding that, if he feels that he is getting, in his own word, overheated, he will be at liberty to signal the fact to your Ladyship and we will have a break.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, you can certainly do that,

Mr Prokofiev, thank you. Thank you for your assistance.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, I call at a distance of 3,000 miles Mr Deripaska.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, before we take Mr Deripaska, can I just deal with an issue that arose yesterday in the context of Mr Sumption's re-examination of Mr Tenenbaum. Your Ladyship will recall that there was some question about the date upon which Rusal Holding was incorporated and the bearer shares in the BVI companies transferred into the new holding structure. Your Ladyship may recall that you asked to be clear on the dates, that was Day 28, page 140, line 9.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I remember that.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, this is in fact dealt with in some detail in Ms Panchenko's second witness statement, I don't propose to turn it up now. The references are at paragraphs 111 to 113, E2, tab 7, page 194

E2/07/194.

In summary, Ms Panchenko confirms that although Rusal Holding Limited was incorporated on 7 May 2003, it wasn't until 29 September 2003 that the relevant share transfers took place, and it follows that, as at 25 August 2003, the date of the meeting recorded in the Curtis notes, the shares in Rusal were still held by the six BVI bearer share companies. Your Ladyship can see that in her evidence.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, thank you. That's helpful.

Right, is the video-link on or is it muted?

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm told he doesn't want to see me, he only wants to see your Ladyship. I don't mind that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. It's been ascertained that the witness can hear the court, has it?

MR SUMPTION: Perhaps we can confirm that.

Mr Deripaska, can you hear us?

MR DERIPASKA: Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Let the witness be sworn then, please.

MR OLEG DERIPASKA (affirmed)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Sumption.

Examination-in-chief by MR SUMPTION

MR SUMPTION: Good afternoon, Mr Deripaska, or good morning where you are. My name is Jonathan Sumption and I appear for Mr Abramovich.

I wonder if you can -- do you have your witness statement there?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. Is that a witness statement dated 8 July 2011 which is signed by you on the fourth page of the statement?

A. It is indeed.

Q. Is that statement true, Mr Deripaska?

A. It does -- it is.

MR SUMPTION: Thank you. There will now be some questions.

Cross-examination by MR MALEK

MR MALEK: Mr Deripaska, my name is Ali Malek, I appear on behalf of Mr Anisimov. I've got one question for you, or a couple of questions in fact.

Could you please be provided with bundle F1. Do you have bundle F1 in front of you?

A. I can see it on the screen but it would be much better to have it in hard copy.

Q. I'm sorry, Mr Deripaska, I thought that a hard copy was available.

A. What I'm saying is I can see it on the screen but it would be much better for me to have the hard copy.

Q. I don't know whether one is available. Apparently it's not, and so could I ask you then to turn on screen to bundle F1, 01, at 47 F1/01/47. Please tell me once that passage appears in front of you.

The English equivalent, for those following in the English, is at F1/01/19.

Mr Deripaska, is it in front of you now?

A. Yes, I have some text now.

Q. Thank you. This is part of the witness statement of Mr Anisimov in these proceedings, and what I'd like you to do, Mr Deripaska, is read paragraph 71 to yourself and, when you've done that, please tell us. (Pause)

A. Yes, I have read this.

Q. Mr Anisimov refers to a couple of discussions with you. The first one is in which you asked whether Badri, Mr Patarkatsishvili was the only principal involved.

Can you tell us whether you agree or disagree that you had a discussion with Mr Anisimov on this matter?

A. I have no recollection of that.

Q. And then the second point that he makes in his witness statement, which you will see in paragraph 71, where he says:

"I recall that I told Mr Deripaska that I would confirm the position with Mr Patarkatsishvili who assured me that Berezovsky was not anywhere near the deal, and I duly informed Mr Deripaska of this fact."

My question, Mr Deripaska, is do you recall having a discussion with Mr Anisimov to that effect?

A. I have already answered that question.

Q. And the answer is that you do not recall having a discussion?

A. That is correct.

MR MALEK: I've no further questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Rabinowitz.

Cross-examination by MR RABINOWITZ

MR RABINOWITZ: Good morning, Mr Deripaska. My name is Laurence Rabinowitz and I'm counsel for Mr Berezovsky in this case.

A. Good morning.

Q. Mr Deripaska, in paragraph 1 of your witness statement 04/08/150, you indicate that you became the first CEO of Rusal in accordance with the preliminary agreement of February 2000, that you agreed with Mr Abramovich, is that right?

A. Yes, together with Mr --

THE INTERPRETER: I'm so sorry, my Lady, I was telling Mr Deripaska that I can hardly hear him.

A. I, together with Mr Abramovich, put together -- I created Rusal together with him and I became the first general director of that company.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can Mr Deripaska please be given bundle H(A)16 opened at page 47 in the Russian H(A)16/47, 47T in the English H(A)16/47T.

Do you have that document in front of you,
Mr Deripaska?

THE INTERPRETER: I'm afraid I cannot hear Mr Deripaska.

MR RABINOWITZ: He said "da".

THE INTERPRETER: He said "da", but I could hear it from the room, not from the feed. I cannot hear him.

A. Yes, I can see that document.

MR RABINOWITZ: Now, you see that this document is described as a preliminary agreement but it is undated,
Mr Deripaska?

Can you confirm that this is the agreement that you have referred to as the preliminary agreement of February 2000?

A. Yes, it is.

Q. Mr Abramovich's evidence is that this agreement was concluded in early March 2000. What is your best recollection of when this agreement was signed and concluded?

A. It was in early March.

Q. So the agreement that you call the preliminary agreement of February 2000 is in fact a March 2000 agreement, is that right?

A. This document was signed in early March.

Q. Now, I want to ask you first about your relationship with Mr Abramovich. You became business partners with Mr Abramovich in March 2000 in relation to Rusal, that is correct, is it not?

A. Not, it is not. Not entirely, not exactly.

Q. That is what you say at paragraph 6 of your own witness statement, Mr Deripaska E4/08/151.

THE INTERPRETER: I'm so sorry.

A. You're not entirely correct in the sense that Rusal was incorporated a little bit later.

Q. You also went into other business ventures with Mr Abramovich, did you not?

A. Yes, later we incorporated several joint businesses. We created them.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Deripaska, it would assist me if you could look at me when you're giving your answers. If that means you have to move your chair, please do so. Thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can you identify for us, please, the several joint businesses that you say you created with Mr Abramovich, please.

A. My apologies, my Lady, but I need to speak much closer to the microphone so I will need to lean towards the microphone.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That's fine.

A. Those were an energy joint business and in automobile construction.

MR RABINOWITZ: And in the process, did you become friends with Mr Abramovich?

A. Yes.

Q. Would you regard Mr Abramovich as a friend now?

A. Yes.

Q. Turning to Mr Berezovsky then, is it correct that by March 2000, you disliked him?

A. Mr Berezovsky owed me a large amount of money for a sufficiently long period of time and he was in no hurry to repay, and also he did not fulfil or perform the obligations that, by that time, he had assumed, and he had not fully performed those.

Q. Is the answer to my question, Mr Deripaska, that by March 2000 you therefore disliked Mr Berezovsky?

A. I have answered your question in the way in which I answered it.

Q. Can you answer it in the way in which I've asked it, please.

Is it fair to say that by March 2000 you disliked Mr Berezovsky?

A. Yes.

Q. And is that still your attitude to Mr Berezovsky?

A. At this point in time, he's absolutely indifferent to me.

- Q. Now, at paragraph 4 of your witness statement, Mr Deripaska, that's at page 151 for those here E4/08/151, you refer to the claim that Mr Chernoi has brought against you, and I understand your sensitivity about not wanting this trial to trespass on matters in dispute in that claim, and to the extent that I can avoid doing so, I will avoid doing so. But I would like to ask just a few questions about the nature of the claim being made in that action, Mr Deripaska.

Mr Deripaska, it is correct, is it not, that in that action Mr Chernoi claims that he was your partner in SibAl, the Russian aluminium company? That is the allegation, is it not?

- A. I would like to ask my Lady whether or not -- I would like to ask my Lady whether I have to answer these questions because this question will be addressed in court a little bit later.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You have to answer questions that are in the public domain. I will take each question one by one and decide whether you have to answer it, okay?

In this question, you're just being asked about whether, in general terms, that is the allegation that Mr Chernoi is making against you. Russian aluminium

- A. Thank you, my Lady. Then, with your permission, I would like to ask for the question to be repeated.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. Put the question again,
Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: It is correct, is it not, Mr Deripaska, that in that action, Mr Chernoi claims that he was your partner in SibAl, the Russian aluminium company? That is what he alleges, is it not?

A. Yes, he's trying to portray the matter in exactly that way.

Q. Does he also claim that, upon the merger of SibAl's assets, with those that he says were contributed by Mr Abramovich, Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky to create Rusal, he became entitled to 40 per cent of your 50 per cent interest in Rusal?

A. I do not believe that he really understands what he's talking about, but he is attempting to bring the matter around to exactly that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Deripaska, if your barrister objects to any of the questions that Mr Rabinowitz is putting to you, he will get up and object. Okay?

MR RABINOWITZ: And is it right that Mr Chernoi's claim is for around $4.35 billion?

A. I've not seen that.

Q. Well, according to a judgment produced by Mr Justice Christopher Clarke, that is what he has described as being the value of the claim, Mr Deripaska.

It is correct, is it not, that the meeting at the Dorchester Hotel on 13 March 2000 features in the claim that Mr Chernoi brings against you?

MR STANLEY: My Lady, I only rise to say --

A. I do not recall that --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just a second.

MR STANLEY: When we get to this point of detail, unless Mr Rabinowitz has a document to show Mr Deripaska about it, he should bear in mind Mr Deripaska may not have that sort of detail at his fingertips.

MR RABINOWITZ: It's a central part of the claim but let's just see if he remembers it, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Rabinowitz, again, I don't want to go into the detail of the claim by Mr Chernoi against Mr Deripaska because I can't see its relevance, but if you're referring to a particular paragraph in a particular pleading or case statement, then put it by all means.

MR RABINOWITZ: Well, this is a part of that claim, my Lady, and what I'd like to do is to see whether Mr Deripaska acknowledges that this is part of the claim.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is it part of the evidence supporting the claim?

MR RABINOWITZ: It's part of Mr Justice Christopher Clarke's judgment where he describes this and explains its relevance.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Do you have a copy of that?

MR RABINOWITZ: We've all got a copy of that. That's at bundle O2/5, tab 79, at paragraph 82 O2/5.079/20. It's page 20 of the bundle, internal page 352.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: When you say internal page 352, do you mean 352 in the printed copy of the --

MR RABINOWITZ: In the printed copy. I think it's page 20 of Magnum.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What is the context of this judgment, Mr Rabinowitz, please?

MR RABINOWITZ: This is the jurisdiction judgment.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Continue.

MR RABINOWITZ: It is correct, is it not, Mr Deripaska, that the meeting at the Dorchester Hotel on 13 March features in the claim Mr Chernoi brings against you?

A. I do not recall that.

Q. Well, I can tell you, Mr Deripaska, and perhaps you remember this, that it's right, is it not, that in the course of Mr Chernoi's application to serve his claim against you out of the jurisdiction, Mr Berezovsky gave evidence on behalf of Mr Chernoi? That's right, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. And Mr Berezovsky's evidence, served on behalf of Mr Chernoi, was that at the Dorchester meeting and thereafter you did not hide the fact that Mr Chernoi was your partner. That's correct, is it not?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, I think you've got to be clear that what you're putting to the witness is that that was the evidence given by Mr Berezovsky rather than suggesting to the witness that that is the case, ie that Mr Deripaska did not hide the fact that Mr Chernoi was your partner.

MR RABINOWITZ: I thought I had, my Lady, but I'll try to rephrase it.

Mr Berezovsky's evidence is that, at the Dorchester Hotel meeting and thereafter, you did not hide the fact that Mr Chernoi was your partner. That is his evidence, is it not?

A. Mr Rabinowitz is counsel for Mr Berezovsky and I'm sure he understands correctly that this is his evidence. Now, so far as I'm concerned, this is totally untrue. Emphatically untrue.

Q. We understand that that is what you say, Mr Deripaska.

It is also the case, is it not, that Mr Berezovsky has been named by Mr Chernoi as one of the ten witnesses that he intends to call in his litigation early next year, one of the witnesses to give evidence at that trial?

- A. It's difficult for me to comment in any way because, to be honest, it appeared to me that I would be providing evidence with respect to the Abramovich proceedings, and I did not really prepare for such a wide-ranging consideration of matters, to be honest with you.

But I want to say that I do not know who and how will be summoned by the court within the framework of the proceedings that will take place in April.

- Q. On the basis of the fact that Mr Berezovsky has already given evidence in your proceedings, Mr Deripaska, you would anticipate, would you not, that Mr Berezovsky will be giving evidence for Mr Chernoi at this trial in which the Dorchester Hotel meeting is likely, once again, to feature?

- A. I would not like to speculate.

- Q. You see, I suggest that you are well aware, Mr Deripaska, that Mr Berezovsky is to be one of Mr Chernoi's witnesses and that, unless he goes back on his earlier evidence, he will be referring to the Dorchester Hotel meeting at which you and he were both present, and he will be giving evidence which will be supportive of Mr Chernoi. That is right, is it not?

- A. My answer remains unchanged.

- Q. You see, Mr Deripaska, even though you say at paragraph 4 of your witness statement E4/08/151 that Mr Chernoi's claim against you is not relevant to this case, I suggest it is really rather clear that you have a real personal financial interest in seeking to show that Mr Berezovsky's account of the Dorchester Hotel meeting is wrong. That is right, is it not?

A. At this point in time, my position is to speak the truth and only the truth.

Q. You see, I suggest, Mr Deripaska, that you obviously understand that your position in your own litigation, that is your litigation with Mr Chernoi, would be strengthened if Mr Berezovsky's evidence as regards the Dorchester Hotel meeting were rejected and his credibility impugned. That is right, is it not?

A. I believe that if someone does not say the truth, that will remain untrue no matter how much fancy verbal footwork that person uses for that.

Q. Mr Deripaska, I want to ask you some questions about the events leading up to the Dorchester Hotel meeting on 13 March 2000, but before I do that, can I just make sure I understand your evidence as to what you say was or was not discussed at the Dorchester Hotel meeting.

Now, do I understand it to be your evidence that at the meeting at the Dorchester Hotel there was no discussion by Mr Abramovich and you of the merger of the aluminium assets that you had agreed about in the preliminary agreement?

A. Could you kindly repeat your question?

Q. Do I understand it to be your evidence that at the meeting at the Dorchester Hotel there was no discussion by Mr Abramovich and you of the merger of the aluminium assets that you had agreed in the preliminary agreement?

A. My agreements with Mr Abramovich were reached more than a week prior to that.

Q. Can you answer my question, Mr Deripaska.

Do I understand it to be your evidence that at the meeting at the Dorchester Hotel there was no discussion by Mr Abramovich and you of the merger of the aluminium assets that you had agreed in the preliminary agreement?

A. Would you like to read out my evidence to me and I will repeat my evidence.

Q. Do you have any recollection of this at all, Mr Deripaska?

A. I do recall that we did not discuss the matters related to the merger of the assets in the course of the Dorchester Hotel meeting.

Q. And you are sure about that, are you?

A. I'm sure, based on the fact that all the main matters related to the merger of the assets had been discussed and agreed upon one week prior to that.

Q. Very well.

Now, Mr Deripaska, I want to go back in time a little bit to ask you a few questions about the events prior to the Dorchester Hotel meeting. Can you tell me, to the best of your recollection, when did you first learn that Mr Abramovich was purchasing the aluminium assets at KrAZ, Bratsk and Achinsk?

A. Most likely in the first half of February.

Q. Can I ask that you please be provided with bundle H(A)17, opened at page 33, please H(A)17/33. There is a Russian version of this at page 38, Mr Deripaska H(A)17/38.

Do you have that document, Mr Deripaska?

A. What I can see is the 10 February 2000 contract.

Q. Although it is dated 10 February, Mr Abramovich says that it was backdated from 15 February. And under this contract, Mr Deripaska, Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler and Mr Patarkatsishvili, if you look at the first line, are described as "Party 1", do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. They are said to acquire, from the persons described as parties 2 to 5, various interests in KrAZ, Bratsk and Achinsk.

Can I ask you to look at clauses 4 and 5 of this contract, please. (Pause)

Have you read clauses 4 and 5?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, have you seen this agreement before, Mr Deripaska?

A. I saw -- I first saw this contract about two weeks ago.

Q. In what context were you shown this contract two weeks ago, Mr Deripaska?

A. My lawyers gave them to me as a bundle of materials in the run-up to my witness statement today.

MR STANLEY: My Lady, it might be desirable to remind

Mr Deripaska that he doesn't have to provide evidence as to --

THE INTERPRETER: I'm so sorry, my Lady, I can't hear the counsel.

MR STANLEY: I'm sorry, that he doesn't have to discuss anything that he's discussed with his lawyers. It didn't stop at that point, and I don't think it's gone too far so far, but he's not obliged to give evidence as to what he's discussed with his lawyers.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I will remind him.

Mr Deripaska, you are not obliged to give any evidence relating to discussions which you have had with your lawyers. It was legitimate for Mr Rabinowitz to ask what the context was in which you first saw this document, but you don't have to give any evidence about what you discussed with your lawyers or what advice or information they gave you.

Yes, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: Thank you.

In the discussions you had with Mr Abramovich leading up to the merger of your aluminium assets in March 2000, I take it that Mr Abramovich would have told you about this agreement even if he did not show it to you, is that right?

A. Mr Abramovich assured me that he had purchased those assets.

Q. Now, you tell us that you first learnt of the acquisition of these aluminium assets some time in February, is that right?

A. Yes.

Q. And the acquisition or the proposed acquisition of these assets was a matter also widely reported in the newspapers in February 2000, do you remember that?

A. It's hard for me to recollect what took place ten years ago.

Q. Very well. Well, I'll show you one or two of those newspaper reports about this, Mr Deripaska.

Can you go to bundle H(A)18 at page 14, please H(A)18/14.

Have you been given that, Mr Deripaska?

A. There is material from The Moscow Times.com here.

Q. Thank you.

It's an article dated 12 February, and can you see that the title of the article is:

"Berezovsky & Co Buy Up 3 Smelters", Mr Deripaska?

A. Yes.

Q. And do you see the first paragraph which says:

"In what looks to be a power play to buy a large slice of Russia's aluminium industry, it was announced Friday that three major aluminium producers have been snapped up by companies with firm ties to tycoon Boris Berezovsky."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. And you would have been aware of reports such as this at the time, in February 2000?

A. It's difficult to recollect what happened ten years ago and, therefore, my answer remains unchanged. I do not remember.

Q. I'm going to show you, if I may, just one or two short articles, Mr Deripaska, in the hope that it will trigger some recollection for you.

Can you go next, please, in the same bundle to page 36 H(A)18/36.

Do you have that yet, Mr Deripaska?

A. (Untranslated).

Q. It sounds like you have the right one. It's an article from Vedomosti on 17 February 2000.

THE INTERPRETER: I'm so sorry, my Lady, I think I just pressed the wrong button and I missed it, I did not translate what Mr Deripaska said.

A. It says -- it says that -- what it says here is:

"Aluminium for half a billion.

"Abramovich is buying the company as well, creating a gigantic holding company."

And this is what I see [said Mr Deripaska. My apologies].

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

Ask the question again, please, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: It's an article from Vedomosti dated 17 February 2000 and, Mr Deripaska, the first bold paragraph says this:

"'Vedomosti' has managed to break through the information blockade surrounding the change of ownership at the Bratsk Aluminium Factory and the whole aluminium complex of the Krasnoyarsk Territory. Yesterday direct participants in the negotiations with the shareholders of 'Sibneft' Oil Company, the purchasers of these enterprises, talked about some of the details of the transaction."

Then just following that, the journalist,

Ms Rozhkova says:

"We have managed to find out that Roman Abramovich and his partners are planning to build a gigantic vertically integrated [plant]."

Do you see, Mr Deripaska, that Ms Rozhkova is reporting this as an acquisition by Mr Abramovich and his partners?

A. So what's your question?

Q. Do you see that?

A. What I can see is the article and I see what it says.

I do not recall what it writes about, I do not recall that information and, for me, it really seems a little bit laughable, you know, all the information that is described here.

Q. Okay. I'm going to show you one last article, Mr Deripaska, in the hope that this will assist your recollection. Can you go, please, to page 51 H(A)18/51. This is another article which appeared at the time, this one in the American Metal Market journal. Can I ask you to look at the first three paragraphs.

Would it help if I read it out or do you want to read it to yourself?

A. Please read it out.

Q. Very well.

"Three major Russian aluminium producers have been bought up in less than a week by oil giant Sibneft in what looks like another major power play involving two of the country's most powerful businessmen -- oil tycoon Boris Berezovsky and State Duma Deputy Roman Abramovich.

"A Sibneft spokesman announced that Sibneft had acquired controlling stakes in the Krasnoyarsk KrAZ) and Bratsk aluminium plants from British metals trader Trans World Group. The two smelters, along with the Sayansk smelter, produce 70 per cent of Russia's aluminium.

"Dmitry Bosov, spokesman for Lev and Mikhail Chyorny, major shareholders in Bratsk and until recently leading figures at Trans World Group, confirmed that TWG had transferred its controlling stakes in the Krasnoyarsk and Bratsk aluminium plants to Sibneft shareholders."

A. I do not recall that article.

Q. Mr Deripaska, you were really steeped in the Russian aluminium business at the time, were you not?

I'll put that slightly differently. You were deeply involved in the Russian aluminium industry at the time, were you not?

A. Well, I can help you by saying that, by that time, I had created a rather successful group, Sibirsky Alyuminiy, which employed over 17,000 people.

Q. You were one of the leading players in the Russian aluminium industry at that time, were you not?

A. Yes, I was the person who had created and was managing the company that was at the cutting edge of the Russian aluminium industry.

Q. Do you seriously say that you were unaware of all the newspaper and industry reports suggesting that Mr Berezovsky had acquired these aluminium industry interests with Mr Abramovich?

Or do you say you really can't recall.

A. What I want to say is that out of the three materials that have been referenced, two are in rather a cul de sac kind of situation. It's really different to find them unless you really scour the internet.

Vedomosti, as a press outlet, is something that I do not trust in terms of the quality of its materials even today, and therefore I would have hardly been reviewing those materials even in those days.

Q. Would you have been reviewing the Financial Times, Mr Deripaska, or would you say that is also something which would not attract your attention?

A. Financial Times at that time was not received by us at regular intervals. We did not have regular sight of that newspaper in those years.

Q. You see, Mr Deripaska, what I would suggest to you is that you were fully aware at this time that Mr Abramovich had acquired the aluminium assets with partners and that those partners included Mr Berezovsky. And that is right, is it not?

A. You are mistaken.

Q. Very well.

Can I then move on to the meetings that you had with Mr Abramovich which led to what you have called the preliminary agreement of February 2000. Can you recall the first occasion on which you and Mr Abramovich met, when you discussed a possible merger of your aluminium assets?

A. The meeting -- could you be more specific, please, because I believe there is one inaccuracy in your question. Would you mind repeating, please?

Q. If you identify for me the inaccuracy I can eliminate it when I ask you the question again.

What do you say was inaccurate?

A. I'm just asking you to repeat the question, please.

Q. Very well.

I want to ask you whether you recall the first occasion on which you and Mr Abramovich met to discuss a possible merger of the aluminium assets?

A. Yes.

Q. And can you tell me where that was?

- A. We were meeting in order to discuss the merger of aluminium assets, which were problem assets, and which, in that problem condition, had been purchased by Mr Abramovich at the Baltschug Kempinski Hotel.
- Q. Can you tell me who was involved in those talks? Was it just you and Mr Abramovich or were other people involved as well?
- A. Mr Bulygin was there with me and, on Mr Abramovich's side, there was Mr Shvidler.
- Q. And in the course of the meetings that you had with Mr Bulygin, Mr Shvidler and Mr Abramovich, did you agree the key terms of the merger that you were discussing?
- A. In the course of which meetings?
- Q. Well, you have described a meeting in the Kempinski Hotel. Mr Abramovich's evidence is that --
- A. I was speaking about the meeting, not numerous meetings in the plural. It was -- the meeting to which I was making reference did take place at the Baltschug Hotel.
- You're asking me about meetings in the plural and that's why I'm trying to be clear. I'm asking you to confirm what meetings you are referring to.
- Q. And I will do that for you, Mr Deripaska.
- Mr Abramovich's evidence is that, after you met at the --
- A. And also, if I may, I would like to correct the transcript that I can see here.

Q. Is that a transcript in English, Mr Deripaska?

A. Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, you may correct the transcript.

A. The name of the hotel is Baltshug Kempinski.

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Deripaska, thank you. Things like that will be picked up by the transcript writers so don't worry about that sort of point.

You asked me to clarify the meetings.

Mr Abramovich's evidence is that the meeting started at the Baltshug Hotel, Kempinski Hotel, and then carried on at his house, Mr Abramovich's house, at Sareevo Village in Moscow, straight after the Baltshug Hotel meeting. Is that your evidence as well?

A. Our meeting at the Baltshug Hotel finished in the early hours of the morning so I went to get some sleep, and it was not before late in the afternoon of the next day that we met with Mr Abramovich at his place in order to sign our agreement.

Q. I follow. So is it your evidence that the meeting at the Baltshug Hotel broke up late at night and then the meeting reconvened during the day the following day?

A. Well, if this is your understanding in English then that's right. But for me it was a different meeting, a distinct meeting.

Q. I'm grateful for that, Mr Deripaska.

And is it right then that Mr Bulygin also left the Baltschug Kempinski Hotel and reconvened the following day at Mr Abramovich's home in Sareevo Village?

A. Yes. The meeting finished, Mr Bulygin and myself and also Shvidler and Abramovich left Kempinski and went our separate ways.

Q. And then reconvened the following day at Mr Abramovich's home, correct?

A. Correct, outside of the city, in the suburbs.

Q. And by the end of the reconvened meeting at Mr Abramovich's home, do you agree that the key terms of the merger had been agreed?

A. Well, I believe that you are mistaken in the sense that it was agreed the next day. I tried to finalise all the negotiations while we were still meeting at the Baltschug, and next day we reconvened to sign the document that had been prepared by Alexander Bulygin.

Q. And is it the case that the key terms, which you say you'd agreed at the Baltschug Hotel -- sorry, that you were keen to have those key terms put into a written document straightaway?

A. Could you kindly repeat your question?

Q. Is it the case that the key terms having been agreed, you were keen to have those terms put into a written document straightaway?

- A. Well, if it's not inconsistent with what I have just said, I would like to repeat that we agreed on the merger of part of the assets that had been declared by Abramovich as the assets that he had purchased in order to create a joint business, and that was in the Baltschug -- at the Baltschug.
- Q. Yes, but that's not the question I asked you, Mr Deripaska. My question to you was: is it the case that you were keen to have those terms put into a written document as soon as possible?
- A. In principle, yes.
- Q. Well, was it not because you were keen to have the written documents -- sorry, you were keen to have these terms put into a written document as soon as possible that Mr Bulygin prepared the document on his laptop while you were at the meeting?
- A. This is not the case.
- Q. Can you tell me what you say the case is then, please?
- A. Bulygin prepared the document the next day.
- Q. Are you saying he prepared it between the Kempinski Hotel meeting and meeting again at Mr Abramovich's house the following day?
- A. I believe that now you're right. You are now referring to two meetings.

- Q. Very well. And Mr Bulygin tells us that the parties discussed each of the terms of the preliminary agreement, is that correct?
- A. I really do not know what Bulygin has conveyed.
- Q. What's your recollection? Do you think the parties discussed all of the terms?
- A. I believe that we agreed on everything at the Baltschug, everything that was necessary in order to put in place the joint business.
- Q. Can I ask you, please, if you still have bundle H(A)16 at page 47 in the Russian H(A)16/47, 47T in the English H(A)16/47T, to go back to the agreement that you made on that occasion.

I'd like you to look at page 48 H(A)16/48, 48T in the English H(A)16/48T.

I want you to look in particular, Mr Deripaska, at clause 4.1 of the agreement.

You see it reads:

"Parties 1 [that's Mr Abramovich] and 2 [that's you] warrant that, together with their partners (not including TWG or any companies and/or individuals related thereto or affiliated therewith), they own the assets and that the stated assets have not been pledged as security for the obligations of Parties 1 and 2 and are not subject to any third party rights, disputes or attachments."

Now, I do not want to trespass on your action with Mr Chernoi by asking you about the reference here to your partners, I just want to ask you about the position of Mr Abramovich. Do you agree, Mr Deripaska, that by clause 4.1 Mr Abramovich is indicating that he does have partners which do not include the TWG group?

A. No.

Q. Is that not what the clause says, Mr Deripaska?

A. Bulygin was drafting this document in a hurry and I believe that it would have been much more appropriate to say "interested parties or stakeholders", judging from the context of this paragraph.

Q. You see, Mr Deripaska, I suggest to you that this clause was of particular importance to you because you wanted to ensure that you would not end up in a merger deal with your rival Trans-World Group, that is right, is it not?

A. I want to thank you very much for your concern but I would ask you to allow me to be what I am and to remain what I am, and to recall what I did and what I'm doing.

Q. You see, Mr Deripaska, Mr Bulygin's recollection is that each term was discussed. Are you saying that he is wrong about that?

A. Would you mind showing me the witness evidence that you are now referring to?

Q. Yes, it's at bundle E4, tab 1, page 5, paragraph 11 E4/01/5.

A. Would you like to read this out to me or shall I read it to myself?

Q. Well, why don't I read you what Mr Bulygin says here, Mr Deripaska. He says:

"The discussions [and he's talking about the Kempinski Hotel discussions] concluded by around 4.00 am or 5.00 am. Mr Abramovich then proposed that we should all travel to his home in Sareevo Village to celebrate the merger. I very much had the impression that, so far as Mr Abramovich was concerned, the deal had now been reached and there was no need to document our agreement straightaway. He seemed to think that a handshake was enough. Throughout the discussions he appeared calm and relaxed, despite the intensity of the discussions.

I drove with Mr Deripaska to Mr Abramovich's house where Mr Deripaska made it clear to me that, in view of its significance, he wanted to have the agreement we had just reached memorialised immediately in writing.

Accordingly, at Mr Abramovich's house we went back over the terms of the agreement, and, as we discussed each term, I typed in my laptop computer in Russian the various provisions of the document which I titled the 'Preliminary Agreement'."

He then explains that he doesn't have the computer or the original version of that.

Does that help your recollection, Mr Deripaska?

A. Today I would be hard put to recall that Bulygin was typing away something on his computer.

Q. Very well.

Can I ask you, please, to look at clause 4.2 of the preliminary agreement H(A)16/48T.

"Party 1 [that's Mr Abramovich] --"

Sorry, I'll wait for you to get that.

"Party 1 [Mr Abramovich] warrants its and its partners' concerted will to sign the Agreement on the terms determined herein, and shall be fully liable to Party 2 for any action (omission) by its partners associated with the performance hereof."

Is it right that you were most anxious to ensure that Mr Abramovich warranted that his partners would consent to the transaction, Mr Deripaska?

A. No, and I can explain that in greater detail if that is of interest.

Q. Please do.

A. You see, the assets that Abramovich had acquired at that time were in a rather complex -- complicated condition.

All those factories were on the brink of bankruptcy, including the Achinsk plant, which had already been put under external management, was in administration. And unless swift action had been started, almost immediately, in order to achieve a recovery from the crisis -- and this is a production that cannot be stopped, this is a continuous production -- even if for one day they had fallen short of feedstock the assets would have been greatly damaged and harmed.

I was interested, I had a vested interest in making sure that everything that we had agreed upon be implemented very, very accurately and clearly in order to save those plants. Now, for that, all the interested persons had to act together, and that means the suppliers, the managers of those plants, those people who had trade relations with those plants. And this is exactly what I asked Mr Abramovich to ensure that it happened, to the extent that that was under his influence.

- Q. Mr Deripaska, none of those people were going to sign the merger agreement with you, that's right, isn't it?
- A. Well, if you allow me, I'd like to read the translation of what I've just said into English to make sure it was properly translated and then we can continue our discussion, with your permission.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, please do. (Pause)

A. Thank you, thank you.

Would you mind repeating your question, please?

MR RABINOWITZ: Very well.

None of those people were going to sign the merger agreement with you and Mr Abramovich, that's right, is it not?

A. There was no need for this. Mr Abramovich assured me that he had total control of those assets, I mean with those people who were related to that.

Q. You see, Mr Deripaska, clause 4.2 H(A)16/48T is a clause directed to ensuring that it was Mr Abramovich and his partners' concerted will to sign the agreements on the terms set out herein.

But none of the people supplying feedstock and the like would have been party to this agreement at all, would they?

A. Could you ask a specific focused question?

Q. I thought I had, Mr Deripaska, and I'm not going to repeat it.

I'm going to ask you a different question.

Mr Shvidler signed this agreement and Mr Bulygin tells us that he assumed that Mr Shvidler was Mr Abramovich's partner in this enterprise. Did you also understand Mr Shvidler to be Mr Abramovich's partner?

A. It's difficult for me to comment on what Mr Bulygin has said.

Q. That isn't what I asked you, Mr Deripaska. I asked you whether you understood Mr Shvidler to be Mr Abramovich's partner?

A. May I just comment again? You have asked me about what Bulygin knew, and my answer was that it's difficult for me to comment on what Bulygin knew.

So far as Mr Shvidler is concerned, it was probably the first time in my life that I had seen him at the Baltschug.

Q. Well, did you understand him to be Mr Abramovich's partner for the purpose of this transaction?

A. Mr Shvidler was very businesslike, very sure of himself, very tough.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: The question is: did you think that Mr Shvidler, who signed the agreement, was a partner of Mr Abramovich at that time?

A. At that point in time it was very difficult for me to make any judgment. It was the first time that I was seeing the person. But he was very sure of himself. The way he conducted himself was very, very self-assured.

MR RABINOWITZ: Very well, I'm going to ask you a different question then, Mr Deripaska.

It's right, is it not, that Mr Paul Hauser of the solicitors Bryan Cave assisted you between 11 March 2000 and 15 March 2000 in connection with the merger of your and Mr Abramovich's aluminium interests into what subsequently became Rusal?

A. Can I ask you two questions?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. Put them, Mr Deripaska.

A. Number 1, what do you mean when you refer to Rusal?

Because there were very many legal entities at that time and it's important for me to make sure that we're talking about the same legal person, legal entity.

MR RABINOWITZ: I follow your concern, and let me slightly rephrase the question so we don't get hung up on the definition of Rusal or Rusal Holdings.

Is it right that Mr Paul Hauser of the solicitors Bryan Cave assisted you with your negotiations with Mr Abramovich in the period between 11 March 2000 and 15 March 2000? That is the period leading up to your merger agreement, sale and purchase agreement with Mr Abramovich. So I'm asking you about Mr Paul Hauser.

A. I was negotiating with Abramovich, one on one. It was between me and him. He was assisted by Mr Shvidler, I was assisted by Mr Bulygin.

Sorry, can I just adjust the translation. I did not mean one on one, I meant on my own. I was negotiating with him on my own.

- Q. You see, according to Mr Hauser, he has acted for you for many years and he was involved in assisting you in the merger of your aluminium interests with Mr Abramovich in what was later to become the Russian aluminium company, Rusal. That is what he says in his evidence, Mr Deripaska --

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, that has been put to Mr Deripaska as a statement by Mr Hauser. It's in fact taken from our witness summary of what we expect Mr Hauser to say. It really shouldn't be put as something that Mr Hauser has attached his own authority to.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Deripaska, just to cut through this, what was Mr Hauser's role in this period so far as you were concerned? In what capacity was he acting for you, if he was?

- A. Mr Hauser -- so far as I can recall, Mr Hauser was a legal adviser for my people in the sense that at that time I had a large corporate department of Sibirski Aluminium and he was one of the lawyers who was assisting them with legal matters.

MR RABINOWITZ: And he was assisting them with legal matters in relation to the transaction which took place in March 2000, correct?

A. Well, to be exact, I do not recall exactly what his role was. The person who was in charge of my corporate department was Stalbek Mishakov, and it was he who decided who would take part in the preparation of the documents and to what extent and how.

Q. Right. And Mr Mishakov, was he a lawyer? What was he?

A. He was head of the corporate department.

Q. And was he a qualified lawyer?

A. I think he was.

Q. And for how long had he been acting for you as at March 2000?

A. I have no exact recollection but at that time he was responsible for corporate matters.

Q. Very well.

Now, can I ask you next, please, to go to bundle H(A)83 at page 236 H(A)83/236.

Mr Deripaska, do you recognise this agreement?

A. No, I do not.

Q. Right. Well, it's a sale and purchase agreement, as you can see, dated 20 July 2004. If you go to page 244 H(A)83/244, you can see who the vendor and purchaser companies are.

So the vendor company is Cliren Investments Ltd and the purchaser company is Eagle Capital Group, formerly Baufinanz. Baufinanz or Eagle Capital Group is one of your companies, is it not?

A. Yes, I recall there was such a company, Eagle, yes.

Q. And this is the agreement, Mr Deripaska, by which your company, Eagle Capital Group, acquired the outstanding 25 per cent of shares in Rusal Holding Limited that it did not already own in July 2004 for $450 million. Do you remember this now?

A. What I'd like to say is that I get the feeling that I have never seen this agreement.

Could you formulate your question, please?

Q. Well, as I say, this was the agreement by which your company acquired the outstanding 25 per cent of shares in Rusal Holding Limited that it did not already own. But if you don't remember this agreement, I'm not going to take you to any particular provision.

Do you recall, Mr Deripaska, that before this acquisition by Eagle of the shares from Cliren, there was a document by which Mr Abramovich's company, Madison, transferred these 25 per cent of shares to Cliren so that they could be sold on to your company, or do you not recall that either?

I can show you the document but I don't expect it's going to help you very much.

A. What is your question?

Q. Well, do you recall that other transaction by which

Mr Abramovich's company, Madison, transferred the shares to Cliren so that they could be transferred by Cliren to your company?

A. Which shares? What is Cliren company?

Q. I can see I'm not going to get much assistance from you with these documents.

Can I ask you, please -- you can put that away -- to go to a document at H(A)76, page 106 H(A)76/106. Do you have that document in front of you, Mr Deripaska?

You should have in front of you, Mr Deripaska, a memorandum from Mr Hauser to Mr Mishakov, Stalbek Mishakov, dated 18 June 2004, in other words shortly before your purchase of the second tranche of Rusal shares, the second 25 per cent tranche.

Now, these were your two lawyers, Mr Mishakov was your corporate lawyer and Mr Hauser was the person that he had engaged. You probably have not seen this before, and I'm not suggesting you have, but as you can see Mr Hauser has produced this memo shortly after a telephone conversation he's had with Mr Mishakov, and he says:

"As I understand the position, Madison is today holding the 25%... in [Rusal Holding Limited] ... on behalf of B Company or that company's ultimate owners ('B')."

Read that first paragraph, if you would, to yourself, Mr Deripaska, unless you want me to read it to you?

A. Well, if you read it out to me, it will be easier for me to understand because the interpreter will translate it.

Q. He says:

"As I understand the position ..."

So this is Mr Hauser to Mr Mishakov obviously.

"... further to our telephone conversations ... today.

"As I understand the position, Madison [that's Mr Abramovich's company] is today holding the 25% shareholding in [Rusal Holdings Limited] (the 'Shares') on behalf of B Company or that company's ultimate owners ('B'). Madison (and perhaps thus [Mr Abramovich] himself) is therefore a trustee for B with respect to the Shares. As a trustee, Madison (and [Mr Abramovich]) are subject to the highest standards of responsibility and conduct which the law imposes (so-called 'fiduciary obligations'). Relations between [Mr Abramovich] and B have apparently broken down, and [Mr Abramovich] no longer wishes to deal directly with B. It also is assumed that [Mr Abramovich] would prefer to discontinue serving as B's trustee and so wishes to divest Madison of the Shares."

I'm not going to read the whole memo to you, Mr Deripaska, because what I want to ask you is this: are you able to offer an explanation as to how both Mr Hauser and Mr Mishakov, the lawyers who were working for you on this transaction --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just a second, Mr Stanley, let him ask the question.

Don't answer the question until I've ruled on it, okay?

Right, please put the question again.

MR RABINOWITZ: Lots of people are going to jump up but I'll put the question anyway.

Are you able to offer an explanation, Mr Deripaska, as to how it is that both Mr Hauser and Mr Mishakov, two lawyers acting for you in this transaction, could have reached that understanding of the position as Mr Hauser refers to it?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Do you want to object to that?

MR STANLEY: Yes, I do, my Lady. I'll object on the basis of privilege though there might be other objections that one can make to it. It is asking this witness to speculate about how his lawyers could have reached a conclusion without -- if one wants to ask whether he had information which was relevant to that, that's a legitimate question. But to ask a witness how his lawyers have reached a conclusion must, quite apart from the problems of speculation that it involves, and quite apart from the problems of asking him about someone else's document, it must involve asking, if it's to serve any purpose, prying into matters which are privileged.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, he can say he doesn't know, and if he says he doesn't know, I can move on.

I can put the question differently, I can put the question in this way, I can ask him whether this information came from him.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, why don't you start --

MR STANLEY: No, my Lady. With respect, my learned friend cannot ask whether information to lawyers came from the client. That is absolutely a privileged matter. That is precisely the question that my learned friend cannot ask.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Mr Rabinowitz, ask the witness whether he's seen the document before.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'll ask him that.

Have you seen this document before, Mr Deripaska?

A. No.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You can ask him, I think, Mr Rabinowitz, whether he had any knowledge about the contents of what is in this document, and I'm going to allow you to explore that with him.

MR RABINOWITZ: Thank you.

Mr Deripaska, can you tell us whether you had any knowledge about the matters which Mr Mishakov and Mr Hauser are referring to here, or Mr Hauser is referring to here?

A. As I've already said, I've not seen this document.

Q. I'm going to move on, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What's the answer?

MR RABINOWITZ: His answer to the second question was that he hadn't seen the document, which of course was the answer to the first question as well.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Deripaska, in this first paragraph the suggestion is made that Madison, that's Mr Abramovich's company, is holding the 25 per cent shareholding in Rusal Holdings Limited on behalf of another company, called B Company, or that company's ultimate owners, B.

Is that something, or is that issue something that you knew anything about at that time?

A. No, I was not aware of that in any way.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is that something you discussed at any time with Mr Abramovich, that his company, Madison, was holding the 25 per cent in Rusal Holdings Limited on behalf of a B Company or the company's ultimate owners,

B?

A. Could you assume who is meant here, whom they're talking about?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Do you assume that anyone is meant here as a result of your knowledge now or at the time?

A. My objective, my purposes, my objective was to do business with Mr Abramovich, and Mr Abramovich was -- and it was one of my conditions that we discussed at the meeting at the Baltschug, and I believe, and it appears to me, that it would be difficult for Mr Abramovich some time after that to start telling me that he might be having some other position with respect to those assets.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Well, Mr Rabinowitz, I'm going to allow you to continue on the basis of what knowledge this witness had, if any, of these matters at the time. I'm permitting you to ask questions along that line but that's a matter for you, not the court, to do.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, I am really reticent to get into matters where someone is going to claim privilege. We've got other witnesses we can ask about this.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay. All I'm saying is I'm permitting you, if you wish to do so, to continue cross-examining along those lines.

MR RABINOWITZ: He's answered your question, and I am actually concerned about the time because we're going incredibly, incredibly slowly.

On that, I don't know whether your Ladyship is content to move on without a break. It is incredibly hot in here.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Prokofiev, the interpreter, are you able to continue? You would like ten minutes?

THE INTERPRETER: If at all possible, my Lady, ten minutes would be helpful.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Ten minutes I'm going to take for the break.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, he should probably be told --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Deripaska, don't discuss your evidence with anybody, do you understand? And no telephone calls or anything of that sort, or texting.

Okay.

(3.12 pm)

(A short break)

(3.27 pm)

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Deripaska, can I now ask you, please, about the meeting at the Dorchester Hotel on 13 March 2000. As I understand it, you were in London on 10 March 2000, is that correct?

A. I was in London in early May.

Q. But you were also in London on 10 March 2000, were you not?

- A. It's difficult for me to recall the dates, but in early May, at the beginning of May, I was in London, yes.
- Q. You see, according to evidence that Mr Abramovich's solicitors have been told Mr Hauser will give, you were in London at a meeting to discuss the merger with Mr Abramovich in the week including 10 March. Do you not recall that?
- A. Could I review the document that you're referring to?
- Q. You can certainly have a look at what I was referring to. That's at bundle E3, tab 15 at page 128 E3/15/128.

Mr Hauser, who is one of the lawyers who was working for you on this transaction, says this -- or has said that he's going to say this:

"On Saturday 11 March 2000 Mr Hauser attended a meeting at the Four Seasons Hotel on Park Lane with one of his partners [that's Mr Walter White], Mr Stalbek Mishakov ... Mr Eugene Tenenbaum ... Mr Hauser was informed that Mr Mishakov had attended meetings in London on the previous day, attended by Mr Deripaska, Mr Tenenbaum and Mr Abramovich..."

Do you see that?

- A. Which paragraph is this?
- Q. It's paragraph 2, Mr Deripaska.

A. And so what's the question?

Q. Well, I've asked whether you were in London on 10 March.

Perhaps I can help you in this way --

A. I was in London at the beginning of May, I have answered that question.

Q. It may be a translation problem. Can we be clear that Mr Deripaska understands the difference between March and May because he keeps answering my question about March by talking about being in London in May, Mr Translator.

A. You may have misheard. I was saying that I was in early March -- I was in London in early March, that's the third month of the year. May is the fifth month of the year.

Q. In fact, Mr Deripaska, you were in London on 10 March or are you disagreeing with that?

A. Once again, I recall that I was there at the beginning of March.

Q. You see, Mr Deripaska, in evidence that you have given in the proceedings that you have with Mr Chernoi, you have told the court that on 10 March you flew to London in a chartered plane from Moscow -- and that's, for anyone who wants to find this reference, at paragraph 95 of Mr Justice Christopher Clarke's judgment O2/5.079/23 -- and that you attended a meeting at the Lanesborough Hotel that day.

MR STANLEY: No, my Lady, that's 2001. That's a completely different period. That's a crucial meeting for the Chernoi case, nothing to do with this case at all, and I think that is May 2001 -- March 2001, sorry.

MR RABINOWITZ: Thank you.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Forget that question, Mr Deripaska.

MR RABINOWITZ: Forget that question.

So you think you were there in early March. Do you say that you didn't attend meetings to discuss your merger with Mr Abramovich at the beginning of March in London?

A. You have confused me a little bit. Could you kindly focus on this and ask your question in specific terms and ask me -- and tell me what is it exactly that I have to forget from what you have been saying prior to this point in time?

Q. You have to forget nothing at all, Mr Deripaska. I'm asking you to remember.

Do you remember whether you were at a meeting in London in early March 2000 to discuss your merger with Mr Abramovich?

A. In early March I do recall being in London in order to realise and implement what we had agreed upon at the Baltschug Hotel.

Q. And then you fly back to Moscow and you tell us that you -- when you were back in Moscow -- were asked by Mr Abramovich to accompany him to London to meet Mr Berezovsky, correct?

A. You're referring to my witness evidence or to something else?

Q. I'm referring to your evidence, Mr Deripaska. Do you not remember this?

A. I do remember this, I'm just trying to understand because you keep jumping back and forth between various documents and I would like to hear a more specific question from you.

Q. Well, I'm trying my very hardest, Mr Deripaska. I'll ask the question again.

You were asked by Mr Abramovich to accompany him to London to meet Mr Berezovsky, is that correct?

A. When? When was that?

Q. Well, can you tell me whether you have ever been asked by Mr Abramovich to fly to London to meet Mr Berezovsky?

A. Yes, he did ask me to meet with him.

Q. And you tell me, please --

THE INTERPRETER: I'm so sorry, I'm not sure I understood whether it was the 12th or the 13th.

Mr Deripaska has just repeated it. It's 13 March.

MR RABINOWITZ: You say that on 13 March he asked you, or that you flew back with him on 13 March? When do you say he asked you to fly back?

A. On the 13th. I believe that he asked me on the eve.

Q. So that would be 12 March because you flew on the 13th?

A. On the 11th or on the 12th, on the eve -- in Russian it means prior to that.

Q. So that would have been on the 12th because you flew on the 13th, okay?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, is that right, Mr Deripaska?

I mean, maybe you can't remember, but did Mr Abramovich ask you the 12th, the day before you flew on the 13th?

A. I do remember that he asked me prior to that. Whether it was in the evening of the 11th or on the 12th, I am afraid I cannot recollect now.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay.

MR RABINOWITZ: Now, can you recall what Mr Abramovich said to you when he asked you whether you would fly back with him to London to meet Mr Berezovsky?

A. He asked me to fly to London in order to meet with Berezovsky and with him.

Q. And that's all he said, is it, or did he say something else?

A. I am afraid I remember the principal theme.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What was the reason why he wanted you to fly back to London to meet Mr Berezovsky?

A. He asked me to do him a favour.

MR RABINOWITZ: Did Mr Abramovich tell you, when asking you to fly to meet Mr Berezovsky, that he had spoken to Mr Patarkatsishvili, and that it was Mr Patarkatsishvili who had asked him to fly to London to meet Mr Berezovsky?

A. I do not recall that, but it's hardly possible that he would have told me about Patarkatsishvili.

Q. Sorry, Mr Deripaska, can you just be clear in what you're saying. You say it's hardly possible that he would have told you about Mr Patarkatsishvili. Are you saying he didn't tell you that he'd had in fact two conversations with Mr Patarkatsishvili and that is why he was going back to London to meet Mr Berezovsky?

A. I have no recollection of that.

Q. And, again, just to be clear about this, are you saying you simply do not recall clearly, or are you saying you do recall clearly and Mr Abramovich did not tell you about his conversations with Mr Patarkatsishvili?

A. Once again, I apologise, it's very difficult for me to recollect such specific details ten years on, ten years after the events.

Q. Well, are you saying then that you don't have a clear recollection of this, but he might have mentioned Mr Patarkatsishvili?

A. If I may, I'd like to say what I want to say.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, go on.

A. And I would like to say that I do not recall Abramovich saying anything about Patarkatsishvili.

MR RABINOWITZ: You see, Mr Deripaska, Mr Abramovich's evidence is that he called you after having two telephone conversations with Mr Patarkatsishvili, the first one in which he told Mr Patarkatsishvili about the merger agreement that he was making with you, and the second one in which Mr Patarkatsishvili told Mr Abramovich that Mr Berezovsky wanted to see him in London.

Are you saying that none of that was passed on to you by Mr Abramovich?

A. Most likely, yes.

Q. Most likely, yes, none of that was passed on to you?

A. What I want to say is that that kind of details would have been hardly appropriate for discussion at that time, and much less today, particularly today I cannot recollect those details.

Q. Well, you say those kind of details would have been hardly appropriate for discussion at that time. Which kind of details do you say would have been hardly appropriate for discussion at that time?

A. Why speculate? Please move on to the question.

Q. That was the question, Mr Deripaska. Tell me which details you say would have been hardly appropriate for discussion at that time?

A. The details of what, could you be more specific? The details of what?

Q. Mr Deripaska, in your answer to my question, earlier question, you said:

"What I want to say is that that kind of details would have been hardly appropriate for discussion at that time, and much less today..."

What I'm asking you is which details do you say would have been hardly appropriate for discussion at that time or today?

A. Well, maybe this was not entirely properly translated but I'll try to explain.

I believe that it stands to reason that the person who had been doing something prior to making calls to someone, he had had lunch or breakfast, went for a walk, he would not have been -- he would not be sharing that with the other person, the more so since the substance of the matter under discussion was entirely different, was something entirely different.

Q. Well, Mr Deripaska, your agreement with Mr Abramovich was subject to a confidentiality agreement, do you remember that?

A. Which one of the agreements?

Q. The preliminary agreement that you'd made with Mr Abramovich at the Baltshug Hotel, Kempinski Hotel, and at his house contained a confidentiality agreement, do you recall that?

A. If you don't mind, could I have sight of the agreement?

Q. It's at bundle H(A)16 at page 49 in the Russian H(A)16/49 and 49T in the English H(A)16/49T.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It is clause 13.

A. Yes, there is a provision to that effect there.

MR RABINOWITZ: And Mr Abramovich's evidence was that you were very concerned to keep this confidential. Was that right?

A. At that time I believed that the less information there is about my agreements with Abramovich with respect to those assets that were proposed to become part of the partnership, the better would it be for me to achieve a recovery from the crisis for those assets.

Q. You see, if Mr Abramovich was going to tell --

A. I would suggest that the interpreter uses the term "turnaround".

THE INTERPRETER: It's a very good term, we can use that. That's the interpreter's comment.

MR RABINOWITZ: If Mr Abramovich was going to tell Mr Patarkatsishvili and indeed Mr Berezovsky about your agreement, he could not do so under this contract without your permission. Do you see?

A. Well, it's hard to speculate.

Q. Well, it may be hard to speculate but these were not inappropriate matters for Mr Abramovich to mention to you as to why you were going to London if, as he says, he had told Mr Patarkatsishvili about the merger agreement and Mr Berezovsky wanted to meet to hear about it in person. That must be right, must it not?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think that's too long a question, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: Do you agree that if Mr Abramovich was going to tell Mr Patarkatsishvili about your preliminary agreement, and that the reason he was flying to London to see Mr Berezovsky was to tell him about the agreement, then that was something that he would need to tell you about because of clause 13.

A. It's hard to speculate at this point in time.

Q. All right.

Now, on the next day, that's the 13th, because your conversation, you tell us, with Mr Abramovich was on the 12th, you got on a plane to see Mr Berezovsky in London. Did Mr Abramovich give you any explanation as to why the meeting with Mr Berezovsky was one which needed to be done at that time in London?

A. I do not recall that.

Q. Mr Berezovsky at that time lived in Moscow but Mr Abramovich was, having just returned from London, flying back to London to see Mr Berezovsky. But you say he didn't tell you why it was necessary to make that flight in a hurry in that way?

A. Could I (sic) repeat your question?

Q. I'm just asking you whether you understood from Mr Abramovich why it was necessary to fly to London to see Mr Berezovsky on the 13th when Mr Berezovsky lived in Moscow and would be returning to Moscow?

A. I do not recall where Berezovsky was living at that point in time.

Q. Is not the obvious reason why you were flying to London then because you needed to talk to your fellow merger partners, including Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, before 15 March when you hoped to complete the merger?

A. Ah, this is wrong.

Q. Mr Deripaska, can I consider with you the reasons that you give as to why you say you agreed to meet Mr Berezovsky by taking this 12- or 13-hour round trip to London, please.

The first reason you give, this is at paragraph 6 in your witness statement E4/08/151, is that you say you were:

"... keen to build [up] a good relationship with Mr Abramovich ..."

And you thought that this would be:

"... a good opportunity to get to know Mr Abramovich and Mr Shvidler better."

Is that right?

A. Yes, that was one of the reasons.

Q. But, of course, you could always spend time with Mr Abramovich and Mr Shvidler in Moscow rather than having to fly all the way back to London to attend a meeting with people who you did not like. That's right, isn't it?

A. Well, number one, number one, I had not been informed about the fact that apart from Berezovsky there was going to be anyone else there.

Number two, Abramovich and Shvidler were very busy people, and I want to tell you that very often we met during nighttime because they had their own large chunk of business and they were dealing -- they were working in the oil business.

Number three, we had by that time spent a week working very diligently with respect to the merger of the assets, and it was necessary for me to spend some time with Abramovich because we had agreed that we would be resolving all the matters that arose one on one, and he had an opportunity to influence the resolution of various matters, and I had to explain to him what the conditions were, how I had resolved the issue of the supply of feedstock, what we were going to do with respect to the outstanding debt, the payables of those plants, what we will be doing with respect to the marketing and distribution of the products produced by those plants. So I needed to spend some time with him because, after that, it would have been much easier for me to implement the things that we had been planning to implement.

Q. However busy they were, Mr --

A. Would you allow me to read the translation first, if I may?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, please do. (Pause)

A. (Not interpreted) Number three, after number three.

(Interpreted) "We" refers to me and my people, my managers.

(Not interpreted) Supply not "feedstock", supply raw material.

(Interpreted) And in the last line, "I had been planning to implement", not "we".

Thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: Thank you, Mr Deripaska.

If you and Mr Abramovich and Mr Shvidler needed to spend time together, you were both in London the previous week, were you not, the week including the day of 10 March?

- A. If I recall correctly, that visit, the time that I had spent in London before the 13th, I had spent a lot of time speaking with the suppliers of raw materials, with world traders, who worked on marketing matters. And if we had been discussing anything between Abramovich and myself then we definitely had not had enough time to take all the significantly important decisions.

But I would like to emphasise once again that the trip to London on the 13th was, let's say, a favour I was doing to Mr Abramovich at his personal request.

- Q. Well, you give a second reason in your witness statement as to why you say you wanted to -- or why you were willing to take this 13-hour round trip to meet someone who you didn't like, and that, you say, is because you were owed money by Mr Berezovsky. You say that was £8.5 million together with interest, is that right?
- A. What I want to say is that the party that you act for had been shirking from any conversation for over a year about how and when he would be repaying his debt.
- Q. Are you saying, Mr Deripaska, that you had previously asked Mr Berezovsky to repay this money and that he'd failed to do so?

- A. What I want to say is that he had been trying to avoid a repayment of the debt for a long time. He knew that under the contract he had to repay the debt and when he had to repay the debt.
- Q. Are you saying you had asked him to repay the debt, on which you were getting interest, and that he had failed to do so?
- A. What I want to say is that he had been avoiding to have a meeting with me. How could I have asked him?
- Q. Well, Mr Deripaska, I'm sure that you had a fax, a telephone, even perhaps an email through which you could have contacted Mr Berezovsky. Isn't that right?
- A. I'm not sure that Mr Berezovsky knows how to use email.
- Q. Well, whether or not Mr Berezovsky knows how to use email, assuming you do, Mr Deripaska, you could have contacted one of his people, could you not?
- A. You may not be aware, but the person you act for did not have employees or people who worked for him. He was solo, he was a loner.
- Q. You see, Mr Deripaska, for all you knew, all it would have taken to sort out repayment was a phone call to Mr Berezovsky asking him to repay you. You didn't have to do anything as dramatic as to fly back to London on this 12-hour round trip to ask him for the money, did you?

- A. I believe that when a borrower borrows money he is perfectly aware that there is a date of maturity, the time by which he has to repay the debt. All it takes is read the contract for that. And if that person is aware of what he's doing, he must be acting in accordance with that, he must be acting accordingly.

This is all I want to say.

- Q. Well, can I ask you this then. You see, Mr Berezovsky's evidence about this debt is that he was surprised that it hadn't been repaid. And your own evidence, this is at paragraph 9 E4/08/152, is that the question of your debt was only discussed very briefly and it was agreed that Mr Abramovich would take care of the debt, is that correct?

- A. I am not sure I understand what you mean when you say "surprised".

- Q. He was surprised that it hadn't been repaid. That is what his evidence is. Your evidence is that it was discussed --

- A. I would like to reiterate once again that the person had borrowed money from me several years prior to that, he had had to -- he should have repaid the money for a long time prior to that, and you believe he was surprised? It's not a small amount of money, it's not 10p.

- Q. No, it isn't, Mr Deripaska, nor would you have needed 10p, you had just done a transaction with Mr Abramovich which involved you agreeing to pay him around half a billion dollars, that's right, isn't it?
- A. I'd like to remind you that he had borrowed the money in 1997 and he should have repaid the money much earlier than this accidental meeting that took place at the Dorchester, and this is all I want to say.
- Q. What I have to suggest to you, Mr Deripaska, is that this question of the debt was a matter that was easily resolved and it was certainly not something that would have required a short notice flight by you back to London in order to deal with it. That is right, is it not?
- A. I believe that Berezovsky has a track record, a practice of forgetting about his personal liabilities and commitments and obligations. And I would like to call your attention to the fact that he -- when he was borrowing the money, he knew that he had to repay the money and he had to pay the interest. He was doing neither of those two.
- Q. Can we --
- A. And also when he had asked me about that, when he was asking me to lend him money, he was pleading with me because he needed that for his personal objectives. He needed to buy some property, some real estate, and that was really touching, it was quite touching.

Q. Can we --

A. Just for the interpreter, once again the word was "pleading".

Q. Can we please look at your travel arrangements --

THE INTERPRETER: Mr Deripaska agrees with that term.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can you go to bundle H(A)18 at page 113, please H(A)18/113.

This is the itinerary which was prepared for this trip by Global Jet, and just taking you through this, it suggests that you took off from Moscow at around 11.00 am local time and that the flight would be for three and a half hours. Is that your recollection, Mr Deripaska?

A. I do not recall exactly when the departure time was.

Q. Right. And you see that you were flying on a Gulfstream V jet. Mr Abramovich tells us it's a very comfortable plane.

You were flying over lunchtime, were you served lunch on the plane?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What's the relevance of that,

Mr Rabinowitz?

MR RABINOWITZ: Your Ladyship will see in due course, I hope.

A. I would like to clarify that this is a draft, this is not a flight report from what I can see here. The date is 12 March.

Q. Do you recall whether you were served lunch on the plane? You may not recall it. And if you don't recall it just say so, please.

A. I -- unfortunately I'm afraid I cannot recall.

Q. According to this itinerary, you can tell us if this isn't your recollection, after arriving at Luton you then got a helicopter from Luton to Battersea in order to arrive there at 12 noon, is that your recollection? You may not have a precise recollection.

A. I'm afraid I cannot recall those details at this point in time.

Q. Well, we can pick up some of these details if you go to paragraph 7 of your witness statement E4/08/152.

You see at paragraph 7 you say that you travelled to London on Mr Abramovich's plane along with Mr Abramovich and Mr Shvidler on the morning of Monday 13 March 2000.

You then say this:

"We then went in separate cars to the Dorchester Hotel in Park Lane, where we were due to meet Mr Berezovsky some time in the early afternoon."

Is that right? You were due to meet him in the early afternoon?

A. Possibly.

Q. Well, that's what you say here.

According to that itinerary, you would have arrived at the Dorchester Hotel at around 12.30, possibly a little later, if you were coming from Battersea. Can you recall?

A. Unfortunately it's very difficult for me to recall the exact time. I apologise. I beg your indulgence.

Q. Don't apologise. If you can't remember, you can't remember.

Do you remember this, when you arrived at the lobby of the hotel, that's the Dorchester Hotel, did Mr Abramovich call up to the suite where Mr Patarkatsishvili was staying?

If you don't remember, just say so, Mr Deripaska.

A. I'm not sure that I will be able to recollect now. And, so far as I can remember, we used different cars.

Q. That's what you said in your witness statement and I'm content to accept that.

A. Maybe, possibly he arrived -- he and Shvidler arrived a little bit earlier.

Q. And Mr Patarkatsishvili was obviously content that you should go up to his suite, is that right, when you arrived?

A. I have no recollection of any of what you're referring to.

Q. All right. Now, you tell us that the meeting took place in the early afternoon at Mr Patarkatsishvili's suite, that's what you say at paragraph 7. Does it follow that that meeting would have been, what, around 1.30/2 o'clock?

A. I will not speculate. I do not have a specific recollection but it was in the afternoon.

Q. Well, in the early afternoon you tell us.

When you arrived at the suite, you tell us that you found Mr Patarkatsishvili was there but that Mr Berezovsky turned up an hour or so late, is that right?

A. Yes, he appeared in a hour.

Q. And can you just tell us this, did you know that Mr Patarkatsishvili was going to be at the meeting with Mr Berezovsky or not?

A. I did not know that.

Q. So is the position this, that you flew with Mr Abramovich in the hope that you were going to build a relationship with him and that you arrived at the hotel to be met by someone who you did not like?

A. Can I let you know what I was thinking at that time?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, please do.

MR RABINOWITZ: Please do.

A. I thought that I could use that time in order to resolve some issues which, as partners, we needed to discuss with Mr Abramovich, and I was thinking that I was doing him a favour which he asked me to do him by meeting with Berezovsky, and that I was doing -- I was trying to accommodate him.

Patarkatsishvili, whom I saw in the room, for me really he was a surprise.

Q. And how do you say you reacted when you arrived to find Mr Patarkatsishvili there, Mr Deripaska?

A. I do not recall myself reacting in any way.

Q. Now, I think you and Mr Abramovich both say Mr Berezovsky arrived an hour late. How do you say that Mr Berezovsky was dressed when he came into the part of Mr Patarkatsishvili's suite where you were waiting, Mr Deripaska?

A. Well, once again, I'd like to remind you of what I have already said.

I had been invited by Abramovich to attend a meeting with Berezovsky. I had had to spend an hour, almost an hour, waiting in that suite, and obviously I was speaking on the phone and doing other things with a person who was not very pleasant to me. I'm talking about Badri.

Now, an hour later Berezovsky, somewhat ruffled and a little bit confused, turned up. When I say ruffled, I mean he was panting, his hair was not properly done. That's what I meant.

Q. My question to you was how do you say Mr Berezovsky was dressed, Mr Deripaska?

A. What do you mean?

Q. Well, was he wearing clothes?

A. Well, he was not naked.

Q. Was there anything about what he was wearing which was particularly striking to you?

A. I don't think he was wearing a tie, and I think there was a shirt, and above the shirt there was like a dressing gown or something like that.

Q. So you think he was wearing a shirt, what, trousers?

A. To be honest, I do not recall those details.

And I'm looking at the translation here. I'd like to ask the translator, what is a dressing gown?

THE INTERPRETER: My Lady, I've been explaining to Mr Deripaska what exactly a dressing gown is and he now agrees with my translation and my description. Thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: Do you say that Mr Berezovsky was wearing trousers, Mr Deripaska?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: If you don't remember, say so.

A. I do not remember.

MR RABINOWITZ: You see, Mr Deripaska, I have to suggest to you that all of this is just absurd and that you are making it up. Is that right?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think you've got to be specific, what you're alleging he's making up.

MR RABINOWITZ: That he was wearing a dressing gown.

The suggestion that Mr Berezovsky was wearing a dressing gown is just nonsense, isn't it?

A. Well, I think that I know the person that you act for sufficiently well, and if he wants to portray himself as a businessman now is really overstating what the actual position was in the 1990s. He might have turned up in any form, even in the nude. That would have been quite in his character.

Q. You see, Mr Deripaska, you say nothing at all about this in your witness statement, do you?

A. My witness statement is the resume of what I have been telling my lawyers.

Q. You see, we know Mr Berezovsky's movements on the morning of 13 March 2000 and they are fully accounted for. Mr Berezovsky had come straight from the House of Lords and was running late for this meeting.

Did he tell you when he came in that he'd been in the House of Lords that morning?

A. No, nothing of the kind was said. More than that,

I think the fact that he was confused, and also what Badri said, to the best of my recollection, to the effect that "Boris is here, he's a little bit busy," and there was a snicker on his face.

- Q. You said earlier that it would have been in Mr Berezovsky's character to turn up in the nude. Did you ever see him in the nude, Mr Deripaska, or is this just an attempt on your part to smear Mr Berezovsky?
- A. It's a Russian figure of speech.
- Q. You see, I suggest to you, Mr Deripaska, that what you're saying is not true and you are simply saying this in order to try and smear Mr Berezovsky. Do you want to comment on that?
- A. You are not right. Berezovsky has done enough smearing himself.
- Q. Now, I want to move on from the more sensational aspects of your evidence to focus on the more substantial question that the court has to decide, namely what you say was discussed at the Dorchester Hotel.
- THE INTERPRETER: I'm so sorry, I will repeat that in Russian. My apologies, my Lady.
- MR RABINOWITZ: Now, you describe what you say was discussed during the meeting at paragraph 9 of your witness statement. Can you have a look at that? E4/08/152
- You say that the meeting was very general, it lasted less than an hour, and that you were content to say very little. Is that correct?

A. Yes, the meeting involving Berezovsky was also not a long one.

Q. Then if you go to paragraph 10 of your witness statement E4/08153, you say there that:

"We did not discuss the combining by Mr Abramovich and me of various of our aluminium assets ..."

Is that true?

A. Yes, this had all been resolved prior to that, one week -- more than a week prior to that meeting.

Q. Mr Deripaska, I have to suggest to you that that is simply not true.

Can I ask you, please, to go to bundle E1, tab 3 at page 85 E1/03/85. If you would prefer to read it in Russian, it's at page 186 E1/03/186.

We're looking at paragraph 166 of Mr Abramovich's statement. Do you have that, Mr Deripaska? Has someone given you that?

A. Yes, I have a document in front of me. If you don't mind I will read it. Is it 166? Prior to that there is a subheading "Meeting", "Dorchester Hotel Meeting", right?

Q. What I'm particularly interested in, Mr Deripaska, about nine lines down is Mr Abramovich's evidence was that his understanding from Mr Patarkatsishvili was that:

"... Mr Berezovsky wanted to hear from me [that is Mr Abramovich] directly about the merger."

That is the reason Mr Abramovich explained he was flying back to London to see Mr Berezovsky, because Mr Berezovsky wanted to hear directly from him about the merger. Do you see that?

A. Yes, I have read this.

Q. And if the very purpose of the meeting, and the reason Mr Abramovich was flying back to London, was so that Mr Abramovich could tell Mr Berezovsky about the merger. It was inevitable, was it not, that the merger would be discussed, contrary to what you say in your witness statement?

A. I cannot comment on another person's witness statement. He writes what he -- the way he wants to write it. If you're interested, I'd like to recall once again that we had spent six or seven hours, about six or seven hours over the previous eight or nine days discussing all the necessary things and acts that we, and I mean myself and Abramovich, we had to undertake in order to put in place the partnership. And I think that I've done a good job explaining to Abramovich what aluminium business is all about, because neither himself nor Shvidler had had any profound understanding of that at the time we were meeting, about the difficulties that might arise, that the plants can stop unless the raw materials are supplied regularly and unless all the other necessary materials are procured.

Therefore, your assumption that over 30 minutes one can discuss anything seriously I think, as of today, seems naive. And when you keep saying to me that I'm wrong or I am misled, you do it wittingly, you do it on purpose.

Q. Very well. You see, Mr Deripaska, I suggest to you that that was why you attended the meeting at short notice, not as a favour to Mr Abramovich or as a debt collector but to talk to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili about the merger. That is correct, is it not?

A. You are mistaken.

Q. Well, can I ask you, still looking at Mr Abramovich's witness statement, to go to paragraph 170, so it's just a page on in the English E1/03/86. Do you see at paragraph 170, Mr Abramovich says that:

"Once Mr Berezovsky arrived, it was a an informal meeting --"

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think you should read the previous sentence as well, the previous clause.

MR RABINOWITZ: "We met with Mr Patarkatsishvili in his hotel suite --"

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Sorry, I mean all of paragraph 170,
Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: "Once Mr Berezovsky arrived, it was an informal meeting, and did not involve business negotiations. We talked about the completed merger and our hopes that this would see an end to the bloody aluminium wars."

So Mr Abramovich says that you talked about the merger, but you say that's wrong, do you?

A. Well, maybe we're reading the -- we're reading different paragraphs. I see that Abramovich says here that it was awkward because we had spent one hour waiting, and it was awkward vis-a-vis myself, and I'm glad that ten years on this is the way he sees that situation.

Are we talking about the same paragraph?

Q. The next paragraph, paragraph 170, Mr Deripaska.

A. Oh, my apologies.

I do not recall that.

Q. Mr Deripaska, I have to suggest to you that the meeting at the Dorchester Hotel was a meeting of principals involved in the aluminium merger at which the topic of each side's respective partners was discussed. That is the truth, is it not?

A. You're profoundly, deeply wrong. Or you are deliberately saying something which is wrong.

Q. And what happened at that meeting, Mr Deripaska, was this. It was agreed that Mr Abramovich would hold 50 per cent of his interest in what was to become Rusal on trust for Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili. Do you agree with that?

A. No.

Q. And it was also agreed that the trust under which Mr Abramovich would hold these shares or these interests would be governed by English law, the same law that you had agreed should govern the Rusal merger relationship? Do you agree with that?

A. No.

Q. And it was also agreed that none of the parties would sell their interests without the consent of the other parties, that is right, is it not?

A. Can I ask you?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, do you want elucidation of the question, because otherwise --

A. Yes, I just want to say who was it who could have formulated those assertions, the way you see it?

MR RABINOWITZ: This was agreed at that meeting, Mr Deripaska, between you, Mr Berezovsky, Mr Abramovich and Mr Patarkatsishvili, that none of you would sell without the consent of the others?

A. You know, when there is a business meeting, someone offers something or makes an assertion, makes an affirmation.

Now, in your question I would like to be more clear about who you are saying could have offered something or who could have spoken about this in those terms or in the form in which you are now setting it out.

Q. Is that going to affect your answer to my question, Mr Deripaska? If I were to say Mr Abramovich formulated it in those terms, would you say "Yes, I remember it was agreed"?

A. No, it would have been clear that it just doesn't make any sense at all and it's totally absurd.

Q. So your question to me is a rhetorical one, is that right?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Don't let's go into that.

Put the question again if you want to,
Mr Rabinowitz.

A. No, in this case --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just put the question again,
Mr Rabinowitz, and let the witness answer it.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm going to ask the question once more,
Mr Deripaska. See if you can answer it.

Do you accept that at this meeting it was agreed that none of the parties who were there would sell their interests in Rusal without the consent of the others?

A. That meeting did not discuss -- those matters were not even discussed at that meeting, and that's why I'm asking you who, in your opinion, could have submitted those proposals?

Q. My opinion doesn't matter, Mr Deripaska, it's your evidence which matters.

I'm going to move on --

A. Well, I think it does matter because this will immediately show you how absurd your position is and I just want to help you.

Q. That's very kind of you, Mr Deripaska.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Deripaska, he's not asking you whether or not Mr Abramovich or you or Mr Patarkatsishvili or Mr Berezovsky put forward this proposal. His only question to you is, was it agreed? You've answered that question. Okay.

MR RABINOWITZ: There's just one other matter I would like to ask you about and that is your purchase from Mr Abramovich of a 25 per cent interest in Rusal on 17 September 2003 for $1.568 billion. Do you recall that, Mr Deripaska?

A. Well, that was part of a large transaction which saw the end of our partnership with Roman.

Q. So you do recall it, do you?

A. I do recall that that was part of a larger -- a large transaction which put an end to my partnership with Abramovich.

- Q. Can I ask you just to look at a document, it's at bundle H(A)64, page 27, please H(A)64/27. This is one of the share purchase agreements dated 17 September 2003 under which you acquired the 25 per cent interest from Mr Abramovich at that time.

If you go to page 35 H(A)64/35, you can see at the bottom of the page the purchase price of 1.568 billion that you were paying for those interests. Do you see that?

- A. I do not recall this document, and the amount is probably the one that we had agreed upon with Roman, give or take a few. But I do not recall, do not remember this document.

- Q. I want to show you another document if I may. Can you be given bundle H(A)65 and go to page 172, please H(A)65/172. Now, if you have page 172 it's called a "Deed of Pre-Emption and Option", and the purpose of this agreement --

THE INTERPRETER: I'm so sorry, Mr Rabinowitz, could you give me a second, please, I need to open -- which page did you say it was?

MR RABINOWITZ: H(A)65, page 172.

THE INTERPRETER: 172, thank you very much.

Thank you very much, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: If you look at the recitals to this agreement, Mr Deripaska, you can see the purpose of this deed had been:

"... agreed by the Parties [the parties were Mr Abramovich's corporation Madison and your corporation Baufinanz] as of the Effective Date that the Grantor [that's Mr Abramovich's company] granted to [your company] a right of first refusal to purchase the entirety of the business interests [that was the remaining 25 per cent of Rusal] in the event that the Grantor proposes any transfer of [those interests] to any other Person."

Do you remember agreeing that?

A. I do not recall that document.

Q. I'll just show you one other provision, which is the second recital:

"It was further agreed by the Parties as of the Effective Date that in the event of a contemplated change of Ownership Rights, [your company] should be entitled to purchase the entirety of the Business Interests --"

A. I'm sorry, which paragraph are you referring to now?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Recital B, under "Whereas".

A. Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: Do you want me to read that again,

Mr Deripaska?

"It was further agreed by the Parties as of the Effective Date that in the event of a contemplated change of Ownership Rights, the Option Holder should be entitled to purchase the entirety of the Business Interests in accordance with the terms of this Deed."

So the other thing that this agreement was doing was giving your company the right to acquire the remaining 25 per cent interest in Rusal if there was a change in the ownership rights in respect of the 25 per cent that Madison still held, do you understand that?

A. I can hear you reading it out.

Q. So this deed of pre-emption did not in fact grant you, Mr Deripaska, or your companies, an unrestricted option to purchase the remaining 25 per cent. It merely granted you a right of pre-emption or a right to acquire that arose in certain limited circumstances. That's correct, is it not?

A. Once again, I'd like to remind you that I did not remember this document and the chances are I've never seen it.

Could you be more specific in your question based on my position?

Q. Well, if you don't remember this document all I can do is show you the provisions and ask you whether you remember them. But let me put this question to you, Mr Deripaska. This is the agreement -- this is one of the agreements that you entered into with Mr Abramovich in September 2003, okay? You can take that from me, please.

- A. Well, it is probably part of the large transaction that was implemented by my employees.
- Q. Very well. And what this agreement provides is that you have an option or a right of pre-emption that arises in limited circumstances, but what you do not have here is an unrestricted option to acquire these 25 per cent of shares at a fixed price. That is what this agreement provides? Do you recall this at all?
- A. It's very difficult for me to comment. I've already told you that I most probably have never seen this document, and I can see that it's signed by my employees, not even by myself.
- Q. You see, Mr Deripaska, what this document shows is that in September 2003 you had certainly not entered into any agreement with Mr Abramovich under which you were entitled to purchase the full 50 per cent of Rusal shares that he held at a fixed price. And that reflects the agreement you made with Mr Abramovich, does it not?
- A. I think that you are deliberately confusing the situation. Could you simplify the question based on the understanding that, as I said to you, I've not seen this document. And please can you explain to me, on the whole, in general, what is it exactly that you want me -- what you want to find out from me.

Q. In September 2003, you had simply acquired from Mr Abramovich 25 per cent of the Rusal shares at a fixed price of around $1.5 billion together with a right of pre-emption, which may or may not have arisen, to purchase the other 25 per cent of the shares at a price that had not been fixed. Is that correct?

A. I believe that it would be wrong to pluck just part of a transaction out of a larger transaction, the general transaction. If you want I can give you some comment on what happened and how it happened when we decided to put an end to our joint business between myself and Mr Abramovich.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, tell me in headline terms what the deal was.

A. In about the middle of 2003, Roman said that he would like to focus only on the oil business because there was a major transaction that he was working on at that time. And, in general, he suggested to me that we should put an end to our partnership. We spent a long time discussing what the price might be based on the understanding that at that time we had three partnered businesses: we had one joint production of automobiles, of cars, car manufacturing business; we had a joint business in energy, power business; and we had a joint aluminium business.

The price that he wanted to get was quite high. I spoke with him and we discussed that and I took some time out in order to be able for me to discuss with the banks the possibility of raising finance for that.

These were amongst the largest of the transactions that were being implemented at that time in Russia and I decided on the amount which, in principle, I could raise with the banks. And I got back to him, I reverted to him, and it all happened in the second half of the summer 2003.

And after that, we came to an agreement as to how and in what way we were going to terminate that partnership. Now, after that, I instructed my people to draft those contracts that Mr Rabinowitz is referring to.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Thank you.

A. So this is the description in headline -- in a headline form.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Deripaska, I suggest to you that that's not quite right and that you did not agree to sell the full -- sorry, you did not seek to -- you did not at that stage enter into an agreement with respect to the full 50 per cent of the shares that Mr Abramovich held.

Do you dispute that?

A. Well, once again I'd like to remind you, if I may, that I went to talk to the banks and I realised, after that, that I can raise 1.9 -- about $1.9 billion.

Q. I suggest to you also that the reason that you only acquired 25 --

A. Sorry, and the total amount, the total price of the transaction, if I remember correctly, for all the businesses was about $2.3 billion, a little bit more than that, a little bit more than $2.3 billion.

And so, therefore, those were difficult negotiations in terms of what assets will be bought out by myself at the initial stage and that's why it was structured the way it was done.

Q. Mr Deripaska, I suggest to you the reason that at that stage you did not acquire a full 50 per cent from Mr Abramovich was because you were told that only 25 per cent was available. Do you dispute that?

A. No, the reason is that I simply did not have sufficient funds available to me, I did not find sufficient funds immediately, and I can say that because I was actually handling that transaction.

Q. All right. Can you go, please, to HG, tab 17 at page 158 H(G)17/158.

A. Would you allow me to suggest to the translator that he uses "deal" instead of "transaction". "Transaction" is usually something that you do in furtherance of the main deal. If the translator uses the word "deal" that will be more clearly understood.

THE INTERPRETER: That's his suggestion to the interpreter.

I fully agree, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. What paragraph?

MR RABINOWITZ: Paragraph 52.

Just so you know what this is, Mr Deripaska, it's your own evidence contained in a witness statement that you yourself have made for the English court in your litigation dated 15 February 2008. Do you want to look at what you say at paragraph 52 in relation to the deal that was done in September 2003?

"Originally I made an offer in 2003 for Mr Abramovich's full 50 per cent interest, but I was told that only 25 per cent was available."

Was that true, Mr Deripaska?

A. Could you formulate your question again, please?

Q. I'm asking you whether the evidence that you gave to the English court in this witness statement was true?

- A. This witness statement definitely was true. I would just like to say that that statement, with respect to the jurisdiction matter only, and all the other events here, are described in the form of a resume only. What I'm giving you now is giving you a fuller explanation in response to your question.
- Q. However full your explanation may be now, Mr Deripaska, the reason you didn't buy the full 50 per cent was because you were told that only 25 per cent was available. That is right, is it not?
- A. Well, what I can do is only reiterate that, for me, the negotiations with banks were very difficult and, as a result of that, I was able to raise about 1.9 -- almost $1.9 billion, and Abramovich then asked me to first put an end to our relationship with respect to the power business and the car manufacturing business because they were highly politically sensitive businesses and plants, if I can put it that way. And when he entered that complex oil-related deal he did not want to have any conflict of interest with the authorities.
- Q. Mr Deripaska, if that was the case, why did you not take an unrestricted option in respect of the 25 per cent remaining shares that Mr Abramovich held at a fixed price?

A. Which option?

Q. The option to acquire the remaining 25 per cent of shares from Mr Abramovich at a fixed price.

Let me start that somewhere else.

If the deal was that you were going to buy or that you agreed to buy the full 50 per cent of shares from Mr Abramovich in September 2003 at a fixed price, why did you not, in respect of the 25 per cent of shares that you were not buying at that time, take an unrestricted option to acquire those other shares at a fixed price at a time when you could afford to pay for those shares?

A. Well, first of all, you have to realise that this deal, and I'm reiterating that, that agreement between us was not just the sale and purchase of shares by some companies, we were putting an end to the partnership. And, in that case, when I received the full rider, the full freedom of action to build my business, it was very important for me at that time, and that, at the end of the day, resulted in the creation of the global company Rusal. The beginning was -- the beginning for that was the putting an end to the partnership with Roman. And, for me, it was sufficient to get those promises which he was giving to me.

MR RABINOWITZ: Thank you very much, Mr Deripaska. I don't have any more questions for you.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR ADKIN: No questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Sumption.

MR SUMPTION: No re-examination.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much, Mr Deripaska, for giving your evidence by video-link. Thank you very much. You may be released.

THE WITNESS: Thank you.

(The witness withdrew)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, Mr Rabinowitz, Mr Sumption, Monday the witness will be? So I can read the statements.

MR SUMPTION: The next witness is Mr De Cort.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, and he'll take all Monday, will he?

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, he certainly would have. My learned friend told me about five minutes ago, well, before we started the afternoon session, that some further disclosure has to be made in relation to Mr De Cort and that I'm likely to get those documents later today.

That may affect both the amount of time we need for Mr De Cort and indeed precisely when we can start because, at the moment, no one is very clear how many documents there are or how significant they are. Now,

I will start as soon on Monday as I can --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, you've got the weekend,

Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: Well your Ladyship says that, and your Ladyship can tell my wife that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think I'd rather leave that to you.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'd rather you did than I did.

MR SUMPTION: My learned friend can show his wife the transcript.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Anyway see how you go.

I would quite like to know for various reasons how you see the timetable panning out in the light of the recent letter that you gave me, the parties sent me.

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed. What the parties had hoped, my Lady, is that at the end of Monday we would be able to have a fully informed discussion about it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: About scheduling?

MR RABINOWITZ: About scheduling.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Fine.

MR SUMPTION: Your Ladyship, will your Ladyship say 10.15

unless my learned friend asks for a slightly later start?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, very well. 10.15 unless

Mr Rabinowitz asks for a later start. Very well.

(10.35 am)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm sorry to have kept you waiting gentlemen, I had a meeting in the building which I had to go to.

Discussion re Timetable

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, can we start, before we call the next witness, Mr De Cort, with a discussion about the timetable.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR SUMPTION: We have produced, and Ladyship may have had a chance to look at it --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've had a quick look at it.

MR SUMPTION: This is our draft timetable. The witnesses of fact and the expert witnesses are substantially agreed. The timetable follows upon consultation with others, and I think all of us think that that is feasible, and particularly with a day for expert overflow on 5 December.

As regards witnesses of fact, I must ask your Ladyship for leave to rely on the witness statement of Mr Bulygin as hearsay evidence since the earliest he can be available is the 15th and even that is contingent on the state of his health after his really quite serious operation. So it seems the sensible thing is to rely on that as hearsay evidence.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is that opposed?

MR SUMPTION: It is not as I understand it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But obviously any questions as to weight will be left until submissions.

MR SUMPTION: Of course.

There are two other witness statements which your Ladyship may not be conscious of; one, they both relate to what one might call the costume issue. Mr Berezovsky has put in a seventh witness statement, or seeks to put in a seventh witness statement on that --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've read that de bene esse.

MR SUMPTION: There is also a witness statement from a Mrs Gill about Mr Berezovsky's movements in the morning and at lunchtime.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've read that too.

MR SUMPTION: As regards Mrs Gill, we are happy that that should go in as unchallenged evidence, it seems uncontroversial.

As regards Mr Berezovsky, I have floated this with my learned friend, although I don't know what his position on it is. What I suggest is that rather than putting my learned friend to the trouble of recalling

Mr Berezovsky so that I can simply formally put to him that his evidence is wrong because it is countered by three other witnesses who were present, that your Ladyship should, by agreement, deem that evidence to be challenged. There would be no substantial cross-examination other than putting it to him that the recollection of others is different. So that we suggest that it be dealt with in that way.

Now, the one area of substantial dispute on this timetable concerns closing speeches.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just before you get to that. The accountancy valuation evidence, for reasons that I know about, has gone and is being held over potentially to another day.

MR SUMPTION: Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: The only issue I had on that, and it's because I haven't yet read the accountancy valuation evidence, is whether there's anything in that evidence that goes to the issue as to whether the payments that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili did receive relate in any way to the actual revenues or profits, however you define it, of Sibneft or Rusal.

MR SUMPTION: We have considered that. It's certainly our position, and I don't think that this is disputed but Mr Rabinowitz will say if it is, we don't think that there is an overlap because nobody suggests, whether the 1.3 billion be regarded as a purchase price for shares or as a pay-off of final payment of krysha, we don't believe that anybody suggests that it was a scientifically calculated figure or that anybody did, even informally, a DCF calculation in relation to it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So nobody is going to be saying: oh, look at the EBITDA in that accountant's report. That relates percentage-wise to what Mr Berezovsky was receiving, or wasn't.

MR SUMPTION: They clearly by definition aren't going to be saying that because they say it's a huge undervalue, so the question is are we going to be saying it, and the answer is --

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, my learned friend may be at cross-purposes with your question.

The valuation report simply relates to the value of Sibneft and indeed Rusal, so it won't touch on the question that your Ladyship asked about whether the payments that they received relate to profits made in any particular --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm happy, if everybody is agreed that that's so --

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm just informing your Ladyship that the reports are simply about the value of Sibneft as at 2001 and as at other periods, and indeed the value of Rusal, so it does not touch on the point that your Ladyship raises and therefore won't assist your Ladyship on that point.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: As long as nobody is going to be asking me to look at any of the contents of the accountancy reports in relation to issues of liability, that's fine. But I wouldn't want there to be, as it were, some sort of mix-up here and suddenly I was being invited to look at them.

MR RABINOWITZ: No, your Ladyship will not be asked to look at aspects of that.

MR SUMPTION: Nor by us.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Fine.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, that leaves, as the one issue of principle, the question whether final speeches should be heard this term. Now, in our submission, there is no reason, now that the valuation side has gone for the moment, to defer any final speeches beyond the end of this term.

If I can just make three short points on that --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Were you still proposing to go first?

MR SUMPTION: If all final speeches are done before Christmas then I would suggest that we use the usual order with my learned friend going first. But if my learned friend's final speech is deferred until next term then I would ask to go first as had been informally discussed earlier.

The present point that I am making is that I suggest that all final speeches should be dealt with in this term, and I make that suggestion for essentially these reasons. First of all, it seems perfectly feasible, we are quite satisfied that we will be able to do it, including producing a full document with evidence references in advance of the final speeches actually being delivered. We in fact have a running draft at the moment. But in any event, even on the footing that Mr Rabinowitz may not have started his, I don't know what the position is, he has three weeks and a team of nine counsel in which to do that and we submit that it is entirely feasible to do it if one prioritises one's work properly.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: The problem about that is, up until today or yesterday, he's been operating -- or up until whenever you raised this point, he's been operating in the happy belief that he's going to have the Christmas break to prepare them, so maybe he hasn't been doing a running draft. Isn't that the problem?

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, we have never conceded that position because we have always reserved the possibility of all the final speeches being delivered this term if the timetable worked out that way, and indeed the original purpose of your Ladyship sitting on Fridays, for example, was to leave that possibility open.

Now, I wouldn't have been pressing this point if the valuation evidence, which would have been quite time-consuming to cross-examine on, both in terms of preparation and court time, was still going to be dealt with this term, but that's not now the position. And, in our submission, it has always been a distinct possibility that the timetable might permit final speeches to be made this term.

One also needs, in my submission, to bear in mind both the expense to the parties of keeping their team on foot, particularly when some of them come from Russia, over a significant period in January in order to deal with this, and indeed the implicit expense to the court and other litigants in taking up the timetable for any longer than is really necessary on the assumption of efficient management of litigation.

My learned friend has three weeks from now in which to deal with this on the timetable that we have proposed and a very large team for that purpose.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR SUMPTION: My Ladyship those are my points.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, first on the question of Mr Berezovsky and Ms Gill's evidence about the Dorchester Hotel, your Ladyship has read it and I don't need to tell your Ladyship what it says. I have indicated to my learned friend that Mr Berezovsky obviously disputes this completely, and your Ladyship has seen that, and he's absolutely willing to go and give evidence to this effect. If my learned friend wants to deal with him in the way he has suggested, I'm content that that's the way it should be done.

On the timetable, my learned friend says it's perfectly feasible that we can be in a position to put in written closings and orally close before the end of the term, and he does that in part on the basis that he is in a position to do it.

The point that your Ladyship made to my learned friend about Mr Sumption, really from the outset, your Ladyship knows that the first discussions we had about this were on the basis that Mr Sumption would, for perfectly understandable reasons, want to close this term and that we would not.

Now, the consequence of that has been that we have not, as Mr Sumption has been, preparing on ongoing draft. And, indeed, however big the team is they have been occupied on other things, and fully occupied. We are simply not in a position where we will be able to produce a written document. My learned friend wants it to be done by 9 December, that is I think three days after we finish with evidence, on the basis that we then have oral closings thereafter. That, I have to say, is just something we cannot do.

In my respectful submission, the earliest that we're likely to be able to produce something in writing is very much later in December.

Now, I say that, my Lady, in the context of what is, as your Ladyship knows, an absolutely huge claim where there has been a great deal of evidence which needs to be analysed, facts have moved on very substantially since the written opening, and your Ladyship will be greatly assisted by a written document which properly does that rather than having, as my learned friend seems to suggest, seven days of oral closing. That can only be on the basis that he understands that, certainly on our part, we will not be able to produce a written document which properly assists your Ladyship.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: If Mr Sumption were to make his oral closings before you did, what would be the position in relation to the Chancery defendants? Would they follow you or would they follow Mr Sumption?

MR RABINOWITZ: They want to go after me.

Now, one possibility -- sorry, just to go to another point. The first time that my learned friend has raised this possibility with me was this morning, I think, and I think it does follow from the fact that the valuation evidence has gone, it may have been Friday, but it's really a consequence of the valuation evidence going. And indeed, until your Ladyship had received the letter explaining the circumstances, and dealt with it, we were not in a position where we would know one way or the other whether this was at all possible.

I am not suggesting that we could not get in written closings before the end of the term but, in my respectful submission, we would not be in a position, with the best will in the world, to be able to do that until very shortly before the end of this term. In my respectful submission, if my learned friend, as he needs to, wants to close his case and do an oral submission at the end of this term, then so be it.

But given the stakes, my Lady, and given the complications in this case, we respectfully submit that we should not be rushed on this. My learned friend makes some point about the fact that there is a Russian angle and people might have to arrange to come from Russia; given the costs already incurred and the amounts at stake, in my respectful submission, that really doesn't carry much weight. Your Ladyship will be much better assisted if the parties are given a proper length of time to produce written closings, and then indeed a proper length of time to read them before we come back to address your Ladyship on the oral submissions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

Do you want to say anything else, Mr Sumption?

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, I would just say this. If your Ladyship is minded to accede to Mr Rabinowitz's suggestion that his closing speech should be deferred until next term, we would wish to take him up on the suggestion that he made a moment ago, that his written closing could at least be in, and to suggest that if your Ladyship is attracted by that idea, then if his written closing -- we would produce our written closing rather earlier than that, we would produce our written closing probably around the 12th.

If his written closing were to be available by the 16th, the Friday, and I were to deliver my oral closing in the following week, the last three days of term, though I will actually only be a day to a day and a half, then we would at least have the ability to take into account his points when delivering our oral submissions, albeit not our written ones.

I put that forward as a compromise solution if your Ladyship is not minded to have all closing speeches this term.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

Do the Chancery defendants want to make any submissions?

MR MALEK: Just this, my Lady, that as Mr Rabinowitz mentioned a moment ago, as far as we're concerned, we would prefer the usual order so that our submissions will come at the same time as Mr Rabinowitz's, and our oral submissions will come after Mr Rabinowitz's oral submissions.

But as to the question as to whether all the submissions can be done before the end of term, it's easy for us to say yes because we've got less issues to deal with. Our preference would be if that's possible, but if that's not possible then we would suggest that our submissions go in the usual order as I've just indicated.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What, with you after the claimants?

MR MALEK: Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Adkin?

MR ADKIN: My Lady, our position is exactly the same as that outlined by Mr Malek.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Rabinowitz, I'm not going to require you to make your oral closings before the end of this term because I think that would put unfair pressure on you in circumstances where your team has been conducting cross-examination.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm grateful, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I also think that it's important that the court has as much assistance as possible and therefore, as it were, in the court's own interest I think it's preferable I give you the time you say you need.

Having said that, I think I would be assisted to have your written closings prior to hearing from Mr Sumption in closing, so would it be feasible to have yours served by, say the 16th?

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, again in the spirit of compromise, can I go for the Monday which at least gives us the extra weekend, so you'll --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That doesn't give them much time to take it on board, that's the problem.

MR RABINOWITZ: Well my learned friend was perfectly happy to do this on the basis of not seeing anything. The submissions are for your Ladyship rather than for my learned friend. My learned friend's original proposal, indeed his proposal until this morning, was that he would make submissions in a sense blind as to what we were going to say.

MR SUMPTION: Well, no, because my original proposal was that all submissions in writing should be served by the 9th so that I would have had the weekend to study my learned friend's.

MR RABINOWITZ: When I say original proposal, I mean proposal up until today.

As your Ladyship knows, a weekend can make a huge difference to the quality of the submissions, particularly -- in a sense we're only getting two weeks from the end of evidence to do this. Now, I'm not saying that we can't make a start on it, but the timetable -- we're still going for quite a tight timetable here, sitting on Fridays, and really belting on so that we can finish.

This is in part obviously because we want to be as efficient as possible, but, in my respectful submission, your Ladyship will be assisted rather than the other way around by allowing that extra weekend so that we can make sure it's as good as we can hope to make it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, you will obviously have the ability to put in post-hearing submissions in the sense of post-Mr Sumption, both sides will have that, because it's unrealistic to assume that you will have, I would have thought, taken on everything that he's served by the 12th if you're being required to serve by the 16th.

So, as it were, the story book isn't closed on the 16th if you're required time to serve your written submissions by then.

MR RABINOWITZ: In a sense, what will happen is if he puts in something on whenever he says he's going to put it in --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: He's suggesting the Monday.

MR RABINOWITZ: That will serve as a distraction rather than anything else for us because your Ladyship, I suspect, will expect us to take on board those points.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, not necessarily.

MR RABINOWITZ: All right.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think it is important to me that the defendant responds to your written case in the three days that are available for Mr Sumption to make his closing submissions, so I think that I am going to require you to serve your written closings by say 4 o'clock on the 16th, but I obviously will, if you wish to do so, allow you to serve a further document that deals with anything you feel you haven't had time to deal with. And that would be on the basis that the claimants serve theirs by -- can you serve yours by the 9th, Mr Sumption, or are you looking --

MR SUMPTION: Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You can serve yours by the 9th, so that does give ...

Right, 4.00 pm for the defendants on the 9th; 4.00 pm for yours on the 16th.

Can I say something, please, and it's this, it would assist me if the evidence and the closing submissions is structured by reference to the list of issues so that I'm not -- obviously you can analyse the evidence referentially, I don't need it repeated each time, but I don't really want to go, as it were, picking up through other bits of evidence which aren't pegged to the particular issue.

In other words, if you want me to look at something in another part of the document, I need to be told that it also relates in your view to issue A1(b) or whatever it is.

MR RABINOWITZ: Very good.

Your Ladyship hasn't fixed a time for the evidence from Mr Malek's client or the other Chancery defendants. Mr Malek has indicated to me that he would be content to put in his document on the 16th as well.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. I think the Chancery defendants and the claimant's written closings by 4.00 pm on the 16th, Mr Abramovich's by 4.00 pm on the 9th.

MR RABINOWITZ: In terms of setting a time for next term, does your Ladyship intend to --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: For next term?

MR RABINOWITZ: In a sense for oral closings, if we're going to put in a written document on the 16th --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, for your oral closings, the first day of term is the 11th, I think, isn't it?

The first day of term is I think Wednesday, the 11th. I'm off on compensatory leave on the 12th and 13th so I suggest that we start on the Monday if that suits.

MR RABINOWITZ: That suits. I'm grateful, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That's the 16th.

MR RABINOWITZ: My learned friend, Mr Malek, is asking how many days. Neither your Ladyship nor ourselves are in a position to say with certainty. If your Ladyship has had a long written document, I don't suspect your Ladyship will want very long oral closings.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I will fix the number of days but I need to do it on an informed basis, and if you can't tell me I'm certainly not going to lay down times at this stage as to what the timetable should be.

I mean, I'm either going to be listening to this case or I'm going to be writing the judgment so it's no problem so far as I'm concerned, although I know I've got one day when I'm doing another case which my clerk will inform you of the date.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm grateful, my Lady.

MR ADKIN: My Lady, the only point I think that was left out of that was the order of closings on the 16th. Is your Ladyship content with what was suggested by Mr Malek?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I was. I thought Mr Rabinowitz was not opposing that.

MR RABINOWITZ: On the 16th, I think Mr Malek was suggesting that we all give --

MR ADKIN: Sorry, of January?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No. So far as order of closings is concerned, you're going first and the others are following.

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed.

MR ADKIN: My Lady, I'm grateful.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And then Ms Davies will have an opportunity to reply. Well, we'll see how we go after that.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, just on that, I think what has been agreed is that the opportunity to reply will have to be limited to new points. That's what we agreed on the basis of Mr Sumption going first. Obviously there will be a potential for disagreement as to what is a new point given that we are serving our document early.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I don't think I'm going to lay down precisely what the protocol --

MR SUMPTION: It depends how much we've been able to take in of their document over that weekend but we will obviously do our best.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think in a big case like this, we will just see how we go, and obviously none of you are going to be unnecessarily prolix, I'm sure.

MR SUMPTION: I'm sure that's right, my Lady. I have no doubt that it's right that Mr Rabinowitz should have the last word, whatever happens, but we would welcome the opportunity, ideally in writing in the case of detailed points, to respond to things that have not been sufficiently dealt with before.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. Thank you.

MS DAVIES: My Lady, our next witness is Mr De Cort. Before I call him, can I just pick up on a point that arose at the end of Friday in relation to the further disclosure that we made on Friday night.

Just to explain the genesis of that, because there's a privilege point connected, if I can just hand up the letter that we sent with the further disclosure.

(Handed)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Do you want me to read this now?

MS DAVIES: Yes, my Lady. (Pause)

Essentially, when we call Mr De Cort, we accept there will be a limited waiver of privilege in relation to the instructions that he received but that waiver of privilege does not go further, and in particular does not cover the legal advice that he provided.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Well if an issue arises on privilege I will deal with it, as it were, as and when it arises.

MS DAVIES: My Lady, I'm grateful. Then I will call Mr De Cort.

MR ANDRE DE CORT (affirmed)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Please sit down.

Examination-in-chief by MS DAVIES

MS DAVIES: Mr De Cort, could you be provided with bundle E2, open at tab 9, please E2/09/269. You should find there your second witness statement in these proceedings which is your only witness statement for this trial. Is that correct?

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. And if you turn to page 294 E2/09/294, is that your signature?

A. That is my signature.

Q. Now, you should find on the table in front of you a few pages headed "Corrections to the Second Witness Statement of Andre De Cort", and you should find there that you wish to make corrections to paragraphs 29, 33, 38, 39, 41, 49, 50 and 52, is that correct?

A. Yes, it is correct.

Q. Subject to those corrections, is your witness statement true?

A. Yes, it's true.

MS DAVIES: There will be some questions. Thank you.

Cross-examination by MR RABINOWITZ

MR RABINOWITZ: Good morning, Mr De Cort.

A. Good morning.

Q. Mr De Cort, you are a lawyer by training, aren't you?

A. Yes, I am.

Q. And you were admitted to the Brussels bar in 1986?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. And between 1990 and 2002, you worked for Skadden Arps, firstly in Brussels, and then from 1993 onwards in Moscow?

A. That is correct.

Q. You joined the Moscow office of Mr Abramovich's company, Millhouse Capital UK, in December 2002 as head of the international legal department, is that correct?

A. That is correct.

Q. And then in January 2004, you moved to Millhouse Capital's London office where you held, and indeed still hold, the position of legal counsel, correct?

A. That is correct.

Q. Presumably you would not wish to be involved, given your background as a lawyer, with creating false or misleading contractual documents, would you, Mr De Cort?

A. That is correct.

Q. And you would not knowingly want to misrepresent the true position to banks or financial institutions or other third parties?

A. That is correct.

Q. Now, I'd like to ask you some questions about your involvement in confirmations of certain dividend payments totalling $177.5 million to Blue Waters and Rich Brown, and you deal with these matters -- you don't need to turn it up -- but you deal with these matters in paragraphs 6 to 14 of your witness statement E2/09/270.

In your witness statement, certainly prior to the amendment that you made very late last night, you had accepted that the entities to which these dividends were being paid, $177.5 million dividends, Blue Waters and Rich Brown, were entities associated with Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili. Correct?

Do you want to remind yourself of what you had said at paragraph 38 of your witness statement? You'll find this if you go to page 282 E2/09/282].

A. At the time I made this declaration I wasn't aware who those entities belonged to.

Q. Well, shall we just look at what you said, Mr De Cort, and that will help you answer the question I asked.

You are dealing here, and that's in paragraph 38, with concerns you had about giving a warranty later on. Mr De Cort, I'm taking you to your original witness statement, not your correction. And what you say there is:

"An additional concern in regard to warranting the beneficial ownership of shares held by Madison in particular, given that based on my own involvement with the source of funds letter for Blue Waters (described above) I understood that Madison had been involved in previous payment arrangements involving dividends declared for the benefit of entities associated with Mr Berezovsky and ... Mr Patarkatsishvili."

So you were making it very clear in your witness statement that you did understand that Madison had been involved in previous payment arrangements involving dividends declared for the benefit of entities associated with Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili. That's right, isn't it?

A. No, that's not correct. When I was reviewing my witness statement in preparation for giving evidence today,

I discovered that it could be misread that way and that's why I've made the clarification.

- Q. I suggest to you it's not a question of misreading it that way, that is what you were saying?
- A. That is not what I meant to say.
- Q. All right. We'll come back to it because I suggest you were very well aware of the fact that Blue Waters and Rich Brown were entities associated with Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky.
- A. That is not correct.
- Q. All right. Now, you also, just staying with the payment of these dividends, tell us -- this is at paragraph 9 of your witness statement -- that you were at no time told of the reason for the payment of the $50 million which was paid to Blue Waters, is that right?
- A. That is right.
- Q. Did you ask anyone what the reason for the Blue Waters payment was, Mr De Cort?
- A. No, I did not. The reason for that is I was only asked for a very limited reason to give a letter clarifying what the source of funds was.
- Q. You see, Mr De Cort, I suggest to you that's a little bit surprising. Did you not want to know why one of Mr Abramovich's companies, Madison, was making this dividend payment to companies associated with an entity that you would have understood had nothing to do with Mr Abramovich's companies?

- A. I was at this point in time very new at the company. I was only there for about six months, and people said that they were making a payment to someone and they need to provide a source of funds letter. I think it is important to go probably to the instruction that I received from Denton Wilde Sapte as the purpose of this letter.
- Q. I'll ask my question again. Did you not want to know why Mr Abramovich's company, Madison, was making this dividend payment to companies associated with this entity that you would, at the very least, have understood was not owned by Mr Abramovich?
- A. I didn't see the need to know that for purposes of the request that I received to make the source of funds letter.
- Q. Was it not a matter of some concern to you, Mr De Cort, as the newly appointed head of the international legal department of Millhouse Capital, that these dividend payments were made to companies that you would have known had nothing to do with Mr Abramovich's companies?
- A. There was no question to me that there was an honourable reason why this payment was being made.
- Q. So we can take it that nobody in Mr Abramovich's team ever suggested to you at this time that the reason for the payment of the $50 million to Blue Waters was to do with an earlier transaction that had been concluded between Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili?

A. No one ever mentioned it to me at the time.

Q. And no one would have -- no one mentioned it to you at that time, that it was a part payment to compensate Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili for commission that they had had to pay in order to get their money into the west?

A. That is correct.

Q. And presumably you would have had no reason to suspect that this payment of the $50 million to Blue Waters was anything other than what it purported to be, namely a dividend payment paid via Madison and Espat to Blue Waters, ultimately deriving from Madison's own entitlement to profit distributions from Rual Trade Limited, the trading arm of Rusal group, is that right?

A. I was asked to describe the source of funds, and I described the source of funds accurately in my letter.

Q. And presumably -- I'm going to repeat the question -- you would have had no reason to suspect this payment of the $50 million to Blue Waters was anything other than what it purported to be, namely a dividend payment via Madison and Espat to Blue Waters, ultimately deriving from Madison's own entitlement to profit distribution from Rual Trade Limited, the trading arm of Rusal group, correct?

A. I was only told that we had to make a payment to a third party and that it would be structured this way.

Q. I've asked the question twice, I'm not going to ask it again.

Can you go, please, to bundle H(A)62 and turn up page 19 H(A)62/19. Do you see there an attendance note dated 16 July 2003 made by Mr Nick Keeling of Denton Wilde Sapte, Mr De Cort?

A. No, that's not this document.

Q. Are you at H(A)62, page 19?

A. Oh, 19?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I am, and it's not the document.

A. 19 or 90?

MR RABINOWITZ: Page 19 H(A)62/19.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: The [draft] transcript had said 90.

A. Yes, that is the attendance note.

MR RABINOWITZ: Does your Ladyship have it?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I've got it now.

MR RABINOWITZ: Ms Khudyk in her evidence accepts that she took part in a conference call with you and Mr Keeling at around this time and so I take it you don't dispute having taken part in this conference call, Mr De Cort?

A. I do not dispute this, I don't know the exact date, but given that I sent a letter afterwards, on 8 August, I assume that might have very well been in mid-July.

Q. We can see from this attendance note that it starts, this is the first paragraph, by recording that:

"NK [that's Mr Keeling of Denton Wilde Sapte] attending SLC [that's Mr Curtis] in Gibraltar and discussing the proposed arrangements for payment of a dividend out of Russian Aluminium."

That's Rusal, is it not, Mr De Cort? You may not know but --

A. Russian Aluminium is abbreviated often as Rusal, but the dividend payment eventually was sourced from Rual which is a trading arm.

Q. A trading arm of Rusal, correct?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. Thank you.

So Mr Keeling and Mr Curtis appear to have been under the impression that the reason for the payment that was the subject matter of discussion here was the payment of a dividend out of Russian Aluminium, correct?

A. I don't know whether it derives from this document. I know that it was being structured as a payment of a dividend out of Rual. And actually I describe the structure, if you look at the attendance note on the third paragraph or fourth, depending on how you count the paragraphs, it says that I explained the structure for the payment.

Q. We'll come to that, Mr De Cort. I'm just asking for your evidence as to whether you accept that their understanding, as reflected in this document, was that the reason for the payment that they were discussing was the payment of a dividend out of Russian Aluminium?

A. Can you point me to the paragraph where their understanding is reflected?

Q. Well, look at the first line:

"NK attending SLC in Gibraltar and discussing the proposed arrangements for payment of a dividend out of Russian Aluminium."

A. That's what it says indeed, yes.

Q. And we can see from the next paragraph that the conference call had been set up by RF, which is Mr Fomichev, with yourself, do you see that?

A. I did not know Mr Fomichev at the time and the phone number that is listed is not my phone number. It's the phone number of Ms Panchenko.

Q. All right. Presumably Ms Panchenko could have brought you into the phone call?

A. I would have assumed that her secretary might have organised it, yes.

Q. Since you don't dispute you were involved in this phone call, that really doesn't take matters very much further, does it? It was a conference call set up by --

A. Yes, it was a conference call set up. I remember there was at least -- there was more than one person at the other side of the telephone line. I don't remember particularly the names of who was there, but I do remember that it was with the office of Denton Wilde Sapte.

Q. Presumably Mr Fomichev would have said something about who Mr Keeling and Mr Curtis were and why they were calling you, Mr De Cort?

A. I don't recall it, I don't recall Mr Fomichev's name. I didn't remember that there were three people at the other side of the phone call, I know there was more than one, I had an impression it was two but there might have been a third one as well.

Q. Although your name is spelt incorrectly because Mr Keeling doesn't appear to have met you, I think that's your evidence as well, you are correctly described as in-house counsel for Millhouse, yes?

A. That is correct.

Q. I think it's common ground that it appears as if Mr Keeling was labouring under a misapprehension that Millhouse held Mr Abramovich's ownership interests in Rusal, you can see that recorded in the second para of this memo.

A. Yes, that is definitely a misapprehension.

Q. In fact the true position as at July 2003 was that Madison, Madison Equities Corp, a bearer share BVI company, was used as the holding company of 50 per cent of the interests in the Rusal group, that's right, isn't it?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. Can I just ask you this: who did you understand at the time of this conversation in July 2003 physically held the bearer shares in Madison?

A. Mrs Khudyk.

Q. Mrs Khudyk?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. Thank you.

A. It was not confirmed to me but I assumed that based on the fact that she was dealing with the shares.

Q. Just then going back to Mr Keeling's memorandum --

A. And I was referring there to the physical holding of the certificate.

Q. Who did you understand Mr Curtis, Mr Keeling and Mr Fomichev to be representing on this call with you, Mr De Cort?

- A. The other party that was supposed to receive the payment.
- Q. The other party that was supposed to receive the payment? Were you not interested to know who they represented, the individuals who they represented, Mr De Cort?
- A. No. My involvement, as I said, was very limited. I was at the time in the midst of the Yukos/Sibneft merger, the second one, that is, and the only involvement I had with this payment was for the source of funds letter which had to come from the in-house legal counsel.
- Q. You were discussing with them a payment of $50 million, and your evidence is, is it, that you were not interested at all in who the individuals were lying behind these entities, or this entity, to whom the payment was made, is that your evidence?
- A. That is correct.
- Q. I suggest to you that that is very unlikely to be the truth, Mr De Cort.
- A. I disagree with that. It is the entire truth.
- Q. Now, just going back to the memo, do you see that there is a portion of the memorandum which has been indented and that appears, does it not, to be the part of the memo that Mr Keeling attributes to information provided by you?

- A. From Mr -- from the way Mr Keeling has prepared this attendance note, it is very clear that it contains a lot of information that isn't properly attributed. It is indeed -- visually it looks like all of this is information from me, but there is again clearly information that I have not provided to him.
- Q. Mr De Cort, when you were having this discussion, were you not concerned to know that the payment that was being made was at least a payment which was being made for a lawful and not an unlawful purpose?
- A. I was asked to comment on the source of funds, where these funds came from, and that is what I wrote the letter about.
- Q. So is the answer to my question that you were not concerned to know whether the payment was being made for a lawful or unlawful purpose?
- A. I was not paying attention to that.
- Q. Now, just looking at the points, the four paragraphs which Mr Keeling attributes to you, can I invite you to read those for yourself, or have you recently reminded yourself of this and don't need to re-read it? (Pause)
- A. I have read it.
- Q. I think it's common ground that there is a mistake in the third paragraph similar to the mistake we've already seen Mr Keeling made at the start of the memorandum, where he says:

"Millhouse may sit between Rusal and Rual Trade. We are awaiting clarification from Curtis & Co (James Jacobson) as to Millhouse's position in this structure."

You point out, that's at paragraph 13 of your statement E2/09/272, that Mr Keeling's supposition regarding Millhouse had no foundation, and you say it is odd that he should have thought that Curtis & Co or Mr Jacobson could shed light on that matter, and that if any such suggestion had been made in the call you would have corrected it; that's correct, isn't it?

A. That is correct. It clearly indicates that note doesn't correctly reflect the discussions, and it attributes words to me which I have not said.

Q. Well, it contains one or two mistakes, Mr De Cort. Indeed, apart from that, just focusing if you would on the first two paragraphs, you do not suggest, do you, Mr De Cort, that the structure which Mr Keeling has noted you as describing there is wrong?

A. No, that is indeed correct. I'm not disputing everything that is in his memo, I am just pointing out that there are a number of mistakes and a number of attributions made that are clearly not correct.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So the first two paragraphs are correct, are they?

A. Indeed, yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: And again, although there are errors,

Mr De Cort, I think you've confirmed more than once that you don't dispute that you did take part in this telephone conversation?

A. Yes, indeed I took part in this telephone conversation.

Q. Do you recall explaining this structure, at least as reflected in the first two paragraphs, to Mr Keeling and Mr Curtis in the course of the telephone conversation?

A. I do have a vague recollection of that, yes.

Q. And just going to the fourth paragraph, what about this fourth indented paragraph, Mr De Cort? Did you not explain the dividend routing to Mr Keeling on this occasion? Wasn't that the purpose of the call?

A. Yes, I would assume I had explained it to him.

Q. And then just looking down at the bottom of the page, Mr De Cort, the final paragraph on page 19 we can see says this H(A)62/19:

"[Nick Keeling] and [Mr Curtis] emphasised in the conference call the legal requirements as to due diligence in relation to the proposed transactions. In particular this would involve identifying the various parties involved and also identifying the source of funds and receiving acceptable confirmation that they are of non-criminal [origin]."

Do you see that, Mr De Cort?

A. Yes. And actually the second sentence very clearly identifies what it is that they were looking for: identifying the parties involved, identifying the source of funds, and confirmation that the funds are from non-criminal origin, and that is exactly what my letter confirms. And that was my limited involvement in this conversation.

Q. Indeed. And it's right, isn't it, that you were subsequently asked to provide a source of funds letter confirming these matters, do you recall that?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. We'll turn that up in a moment, but before we leave this document we can see that in the last paragraph, just after the passage we've been looking at, Mr Keeling says this:

"Mr De Cort confirmed that the funds in question constituted properly earned profits arising from trading activities on behalf of Rusal."

Do you see that?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. And you've said, at paragraph 13 of your witness statement E2/09/272, that you regard this as incorrect, because as you confirmed in your final source letter, the source of funds were Rual's trading activities?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. Mr De Cort, is that really a fair criticism of this part of Mr Keeling's note? Don't you explain at paragraph 8 of your witness statement that Rual was the trading arm of Rusal group?

A. I'm not trying to create a false impression that Rual and Rusal are significantly different, they are two separate legal entities, and so if someone asks me to confirm the source, where the funds come from, I want to identify the correct legal entity.

Q. All right. So if Mr Keeling had --

A. Overall it relates to the Rusal business in the broad sense of the word.

Q. Indeed, so if Mr Keeling had recorded you as saying that these funds were properly earned profits arising from trading activities on behalf of the Rusal group, you would not have objected to that?

A. With the words "on behalf of the Rusal group", you could indeed say that that includes Rual, yes.

Q. And I think we can agree on this: what you are certainly not recorded as saying anywhere in this memorandum is that the $50 million payment to Blue Waters was all to do with an earlier transaction between the parties and was to compensate Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili for commission that they had to pay to a third party for getting the money into the western banking system?

A. I had no knowledge of that at the time. I was not enquiring about that because, as I said, my role was quite limited.

Q. Now, can I ask you now, please, to turn on in this bundle to page 26, H(A)62/26.

A. Yes, I have it.

Q. This is the letter written by you about three weeks after your conference call with Mr Curtis and Mr Keeling, dated 8 August 2003, correct?

A. That is correct.

Q. And it's a letter that was signed, as one sees, by you, Mr De Cort, on Millhouse Capital paper, correct?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. And we see also you've signed as head of the international legal department, correct?

A. That is correct.

Q. And you see the heading "Re: Espat Ventures Limited -- Declaration of Dividend", and you've addressed it to Curtis & Co, that's right, isn't it?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. Do you want an opportunity just to remind yourself of what this letter said by reading it to yourself,

Mr De Cort?

A. Yes, please. (Pause)

I have read it.

Q. And we can see from the second paragraph of this letter, can't we, Mr De Cort, that you were representing to Curtis & Co that Blue Waters held 50,000 shares in Espat representing the entire shareholding of Espat, yes?

A. Yes indeed.

Q. And Bluewater, certainly in terms of what you had been saying at paragraph 38 before your correction, was an entity which you understood to be associated with Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili?

A. No, I did not understand that at the time. I had no knowledge of that.

Q. Now, as we've already discussed, Espat is of course the company that sat atop of Madison, and Madison was, of course, the company that sat atop and held 50 per cent of the Rusal group, including both Rusal and Rual Trade Limited, correct?

A. Espat was temporarily interposed as parent of Madison, and the reference to Madison holding both Rual and Rusal at that point in time was only focused on Rual Trade.

Q. Sorry, but Madison did hold both Rual and Rusal, correct?

A. I didn't know about Rusal.

Q. Okay. Now, we can see from the third paragraph of this letter that you were also representing to Curtis & Co that Espot would:

"... fund this dividend payment from a dividend entitlement from its 100 per cent owned subsidiary Madison ..."

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. And you can see from the third paragraph of the letter that you were also representing to Curtis & Co that Madison would in turn fund this dividend payment from a dividend entitlement arising from its 50 per cent shareholding in Rual Trade, a company which you describe as the trading arm of Rusal group?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. Now, can we just have a look at paragraph 8 of your witness statement where you explain how this is going to work.

A. Coming back on an earlier question, I would like to point out that the reference to "entities associated with Mr Patarkatsishvili and ... Mr Berezovsky", in paragraph 38 E2/09/282, is all in connection with a discussion of a transaction in 2004, while the dividend declaration that I'm referring to earlier in my witness statement happens in 2003, so there was no intention whatsoever to associate one with the other.

Q. Well, I understand that, Mr De Cort, and I understand why it gave rise to sensitivities in 2004. But just looking at paragraph 38 again E2/09/283, and I don't for a moment dispute that that is the context in which you mention it.

What you say, and it's about being concerned about warranting the beneficial ownership of shares held by Madison, was that you had a concern about it because you understood -- you say:

"... given that based on my own involvement with the source of funds letter for Blue Waters ... I understood that Madison had been involved in previous payment arrangements involving dividends declared for the benefit of entities associated with Mr Berezovsky and ... Mr Patarkatsishvili."

You see, that is why you say you have a sensitivity about making this representation about beneficial ownership, because you understood these entities were associated --

A. No, the sensitivity was -- results from the fact that the shareholding had been transferred to a third party outside Mr Abramovich's control.

Q. All right, we will come back to that in detail, but can we just have a look at paragraph 8 for the moment E2/09/271. You see, in paragraph 8, you're talking about how -- what you were describing in the letter of 8 August 2003 was to operate, just going about eight lines down. You say that you recall specifically having it explained to you that:

"... temporary transfers of ownership would be involved such that Espat was to be appointed on a temporary basis as the 100% owner of Madison to receive the dividends, and that Blue Waters would in turn become the temporary shareholder of Espat which would declare a dividend to Blue Waters."

Do you see that?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. And then you go on to say that:

"In order to achieve this, Espat's 50,000 bearer shares would be transferred into the ownership of Blue Waters on a temporary basis and then re-transferred once the dividend had been declared."

A. Yes, indeed, I see that.

Q. Do you say that the same was to be done with regard to Madison, Mr De Cort; were the bearer shares that had been transferred on a temporary basis to Espat going to be retransferred once the dividend had been declared?

A. That was my understanding, yes.

Q. And to whom were the bearer shares in Madison going to be retransferred, Mr De Cort?

A. I had at that point in time no understanding of that but I assumed it was Mr Abramovich.

Q. Is that how it worked in practice, Mr De Cort, to the best of your knowledge? Presumably these share transfers did take place?

A. These share transfers were actually documented, yes.

Q. So you say they did take place because, if they didn't, otherwise the representations you were making to Curtis & Co in the source of funds letter would have been false, would they not?

A. That is correct.

Q. And so you knew, did you not, Mr De Cort, as a result of the Blue Waters dividend transaction and your involvement in it that you could not subsequently provide any warranty to the effect that Mr Abramovich had, since 15 March 2000, been the sole ultimate beneficial owner of Madison or, through Madison, the Rusal group?

A. That was indeed a concern.

Q. And that is what you say at paragraph 38 of your witness statement E2/09/282. We've just had a look at that, haven't we, Mr De Cort?

A. Yes, indeed.

MR RABINOWITZ: I don't know whether your Ladyship was proposing to take --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'll go on for another quarter of an hour just because we were late in starting.

MR RABINOWITZ: All right.

Now we will come and deal in due course with the warranty position, but before we do can we just identify the context in which this question of providing a warranty about Mr Abramovich's ownership of Madison or the Rusal group arose.

I'm right, am I not, that you're talking here about the second Rusal sale in June and July 2004, and Mr Hauser's insistence that his principal, Mr Deripaska, should have confirmation of the ultimate beneficial ownership of Rusal Holdings Limited from March 2000 up to the date of transfer?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. Just for the record, Rusal Holding Limited had by this time come to replace Madison, and Mr Deripaska's company Eagle Capital Group, as the intermediate holder of the six BVI companies through which the Russian Aluminium interests were held, is that right?

A. I'm sorry. (Pause)

I understood Rusal Holding at that point in time to be the entity that overall owned the aluminium assets. I didn't do any particular diligence as to how the restructuring took place.

Q. Let's just go then if we can to paragraph 38 of your witness statement, page 282 E2/09/282, it's five lines up from the bottom. Again:

"An additional concern was in regard to warranting the beneficial ownership of shares held by Madison in particular, given that based on my own involvement with the source of funds letter for Blue Waters ..."

Just pausing there, the source of funds letter is the one we've just looked at, isn't it, the 8 August letter?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. Then we have the bit that you've corrected:

"I understood that Madison had been involved in previous payment arrangements involving dividends declared for the benefit of entities associated with Mr Berezovsky and/or Mr Patarkatsishvili."

Then you say this:

"Although I was not involved in the specific mechanics concerning those payments, I was generally aware of them from my participation in providing the source of funds letter described above and thus had to tread carefully with regard to any requested warranty concerning [the] beneficial ownership of shares held by Madison. For [this reason], in a follow-up email sent to Mr Hauser --"

A. I'm sorry, I have to correct you, it says "for these reasons".

Q. I do apologise.

"For these reasons, in a follow-up email sent to Mr Hauser on 17 June 2004, I stated that there would be no warranties about beneficial ownership."

Okay?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. Let's just see if we have understood this correctly.

Your point here is that you were concerned in 2004 about providing historical warranties of ownership of Madison, in particular from 15 March 2000, correct?

A. I generally had an adverse reaction to giving a historic warranty. In all my years of practice, I've never seen anyone ask for a warranty of title historically in connection with a transfer of shares.

Q. Just see if I can get my question answered: your point here is that you were concerned in 2004 about providing historical warranties of ownership of Madison, in particular from 15 March 2000, is that correct?

A. Actually we're not referring to beneficial ownership of Madison, we're talking about beneficial ownership of the Rusal shares.

Q. All right, but subject to that?

A. Subject to that it's correct, yes.

Q. Thank you. And that concern you say arose in part out of your involvement in the 8 August 2003 source of funds letter, correct?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. And in particular, it arose out of the fact that you had been involved in producing a letter which concerned the payment of dividends declared for benefits plainly not associated with Mr Abramovich, leave aside whether you knew that they were for Mr Berezovsky or Mr Patarkatsishvili. Is that correct?

A. Yes, that was one of the concerns.

Q. And those --

A. Although, as I've indicated in my witness statement, it was an additional concern.

Q. Yes. I think what you're saying here is that because of this you were concerned in 2004 about providing Mr Hauser with confirmation that his client Mr Deripaska was looking for, namely that since 15 March 2000, Mr Abramovich had at all times been the ultimate beneficial owner of the remaining 25 per cent stake in the Rusal group, because you would have known that that would have been --

A. Yes, that was one of the additional concerns, indeed.

Q. Because you would have known that would have been a false representation, given what you knew about what had happened in August 2003?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. At the very least.

Now, the other difficulty which you refer to at paragraph 38 of your witness statement E2/09/282 was compounded, was it not, by another difficulty which arose at the time, Mr De Cort, and that's the Rich Brown correspondence, do you recall that?

A. The Rich Brown correspondence, I only vaguely recall it, but, yes, I do -- I think you remember -- do you mean to the other letter that you --

Q. Indeed.

A. I only vaguely recall it. I didn't -- it was only in the disclosure here that I -- my attention was drawn. I didn't have any particular recollection of it without having seen the documents.

Q. But you were involved in that?

A. I had -- it is obvious that I might have looked at that, or that I probably looked at that at the time, yes.

Q. That was, of course, an attempt by Mr Jacobson of Curtis & Co to get you to produce another letter similar to the one that you had produced for Blue Waters?

A. As far as it can derive from the documents disclosed, yes, indeed.

Q. Now, can we then just look -- my Lady, I'm going to move on to a slightly different part of the story. I'm very happy to keep going but --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay, I'll take a break now. Ten minutes.

(11.40 am)

(A short break)

(11.57 am)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr De Cort, just one last point in relation to the Rich Brown correspondence that arrived, I think, at the very same time as you were engaged in drafting the second Rusal sales transaction, and Mr Hauser was pressing you for warranties concerning the beneficial ownership of the Rusal group since 15 March 2000. Do you recall that Mr Jacobson of Curtis & Co was writing, chasing for the letter, the source of funds letter?

A. I don't think he was writing to me but, as I said, until I see the -- saw the disclosure here I've not entirely remembered this second request for a letter for Rich Brown.

Q. Ms Khudyk in her evidence says that she passed the correspondence on to you to deal with?

A. That is very well possible.

Q. Do you recall that the amounts that were involved in the Rich Brown source of funds letter was -- I think it was $127.5 million?

A. I don't recall but I'm not disputing that.

Q. My question is really this: would you not have been concerned to know who was behind that transaction, given again the amount of money involved?

A. As I said, I had no recollection from that except for the correspondence that's been disclosed, and I don't deny that I might have looked at that at the time, but I have no recollection about it.

Q. Very well. Let's move then to 2004 and your involvement with the second Rusal sale.

Can I perhaps begin by just asking you to look at a couple of newspaper articles which appeared in the Russian press just before you became involved in the second Rusal sale, and about which you say you have a vague recollection.

Can you go, please, to bundle H(A)74 at page 127 H(A)74/127.

Now, you should have in front of you an article from Vedomosti dated 2 June 2004. Do you have that?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. You can see that the article is entitled:

"Berezovsky does not agree with the sale of shares [in] Russkiy Aluminiiy."

Do you see that?

A. I see that.

Q. Then if you look at the first paragraph, below the italicised introduction, we can see that the article starts by saying:

"As the Vedomosty has learnt Roman Abramovich, Chukotka Governor, is going to sell his remaining shares in RusAl to his partner Oleg Deripaska. However for the deal to be successful Abramovich has reached an agreement with the oligarch in disgrace Boris Berezovsky. The negotiations will be difficult: the partners have clash of opinions on the number of RusAl shares belonging to Berezovsky."

You see that?

A. I see that.

Q. Then if you look at the next paragraph, we can see what the clash of opinions was:

"As the Vedomosty has learnt Oleg Deripaska can become a sole owner of RusAl within this month. A source close to Abramovich says that the sale to Deripaska of 25% RusAl shares remaining under control of Millhouse Capital has been practically decided and the deal can be closed within a month. However the source has specified that Abramovich does not control the entire 25% holding, the final beneficiaries of its 15% are the disgraced oligarch Boris Berezovsky and his friend and old business partner Badry Patarkatsishvili that is why the deal conditions should be agreed... with them as well."

I take it you're not able to shed any light on whom the source close to Mr Abramovich might have been, are you, Mr De Cort?

A. No, I have not seen this article until it was produced in these proceedings.

Q. So this is not one of the articles you have a vague recollection of seeing?

A. No, it was an English language article, and I understand there is an article in the Moscow Times that's in these proceedings and I assume, but I'm not 100 per cent sure, but I assume it would have been that article.

Q. We'll have a look at that shortly.

Just skipping over the next paragraph which deals with the first Rusal sale and Mr Deripaska's pre-emptive rights, you see that Vedomosti claims to have spoken to another source. The article continues:

"One more source ..."

Do you see that paragraph?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. "One more source close to the shareholders of this company confirmed to the Vedomosty the information that Berezovsky is the owner of 15% RusAl shares. For a long time Berezovsky kept claiming that he had a stake in Rusal, without specifying its amount. Rusal and Base Element emphatically deny any connection with Berezovsky."

Again, I take it you don't know -- you can't shed any light on who that source is?

A. No, not at all.

Q. Just looking at the next paragraph, we can see what Mr Berezovsky's response is:

"Yesterday the disgraced oligarch said to the Vedomosty that Badry Patarkatsishvili and he owned not only 15% but all 25% [of] RusAl shares [remaining] under Millhouse management and he had no intentions to sell them."

Then in the next paragraph, various quotes from Mr Berezovsky, he says:

"'Nobody has talked to me, I have received no offers from Abramovich and Deripaska' ..."

Then:

"'Though the shares belonged to him (Abramovich) and he independently conducted negotiations I believe it incorrect. It destroyed the balance (between the shareholders) and allowed Deripaska to form a controlling stake'."

The article then notes that Mr Berezovsky said that he:

"... reserved [the right] to challenge the deal in Court."

Do you see that?

A. I see that.

Q. You had as of 2 June 2004 moved to Millhouse's London office and taken up your position as legal counsel to Millhouse. That's correct, isn't it?

A. That is correct.

Q. And this article surely would have been brought to your attention, wouldn't it, Mr De Cort?

A. No, this article was not brought to my attention.

Q. A possible threat of legal proceedings had been made by Mr Berezovsky arising out of the way in which the first Rusal sale had been handled, and you say that it wouldn't have been brought to your attention?

A. No, this has not been brought to my attention.

Q. Another article, I think you say, was brought to your attention, or at least other articles were brought to your attention, I think that's what you say at paragraph 29 E2/09/279, is that right?

A. My meeting with Mr Hauser, yes, he referred me to an article, an English language article, which I believe might very well have been the article that was published in the Moscow Times.

Q. You say at paragraph 29, on page 279 E2/09/279:

"I have a vague recollection from that period of press reports referring to claims by Mr Berezovsky to a share in Rusal."

You say:

"One of [the] reports may ... have been the Moscow Times report ... which has recently been drawn to my attention."

A. Yes, "recently", just meaning like I didn't remember it was the Moscow Times, so...

Q. Now, if you still have the article in front of you, the Vedomosti one, you see there's a quote from Millhouse.

It says:

"Millhouse manages 25 per cent of RusAl shares as before. We cannot disclose who the beneficiaries of this holding are, though [they're] neither Berezovsky, nor Patarkatsishviliy among them."

Do you see that?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. You see, Mr De Cort, whatever was being said here, you knew because of your involvement in the source of funds letter in August 2003 that there was some connection between Madison and the Rusal group and Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, did you not?

A. No, I did not.

Q. I suggest that that is the position because you knew, as you had been saying at paragraph 38 E2/09/282, that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were connected to Blue Waters?

A. No, that is a misconstruction of my words.

Q. Now, the other newspaper report that you referred to, Moscow Times, of 3 June 2004, you can see at bundle H(A)74 at page 129. H(A)74/129

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. And just remind yourself of it, Mr De Cort.

This is the article, is it, that you recall seeing?

It's the one you refer to at paragraph 29 E2/09/278?

A. I assume that that might have been the article, yes.

Q. And, again, you can see in the article that Mr Berezovsky is indicating not only that he had 25 per cent but that he's reserving -- he's making it clear that he might challenge the Rusal transaction in court, isn't he, Mr De Cort? Fourth paragraph from the end he says that. He says he could appeal the transaction in court?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. As the head of Millhouse's international legal department that would have been a matter of some concern to you, wouldn't it?

A. Yes, as I say, this -- that article was drawn to my attention during my meeting with Paul Hauser on 15 June, yes, and it was a matter of concern.

Q. Did you speak to anyone at Millhouse about it?

Mr Tenenbaum or Ms Panchenko or Ms Khudyk?

A. From what I've been able to reconstruct, I know that I had discussions internally. From what I've been able to reconstruct, we had discussions internally, and it's also clear from the correspondence, including the correspondence that had been disclosed on Friday.

Q. Yes, because we know that you did subsequently ask Mr Tenenbaum whether Mr Abramovich could give a warranty to Mr Deripaska that these claims which Mr Berezovsky had advanced in the press in relation to Rusal were baseless, do you recall that, Mr De Cort?

A. Can you point me to the document, please?

Q. Can you go, please, to bundle H(I) tab 10, page 39.

My Lady it's a new bundle which has been added to Magnum. These are the documents which were disclosed very late on Friday night. H(I)/10/39.

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. This is an email from yourself to Mr Tenenbaum dated 12 July 2004, and you say this towards the end of your email:

"... are we willing to state that the claims in the public domain to our knowledge have no basis?"

And that is obviously a reference, is it not, to the claims that we've seen in the press about Mr Berezovsky having 25 per cent?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. If you then turn to the next tab, tab 11, page 42 H(I)/11/42, again this is one of the documents we received on Friday night.

A. Yes, and I think Mr Tenenbaum's answer is quite unequivocal, it says:

"It has no basis."

Q. I think he says:

"I don't think we should say that it has no basis."

A. No, you are misreading it. My email has two paragraphs, the first paragraph doesn't request a comment, the second paragraph has two prongs to it, and Mr Tenenbaum responds to both prongs of the second paragraph of my email:

"... are we willing to give it ..."

His answer is:

"I don't think we should say that."

Full stop.

"... are we willing to state that the claims in the public domain to our knowledge have no basis?"

He says:

"It has no basis."

Q. I suggest to you that what you are asking him here is:

"... are we willing to state that the claims in the public domain to our knowledge have no basis?"

And he is saying:

"I don't think we should say that it has no basis."

And that the full stop is a typo.

A. No, that is not what it says, you are misreading the punctuation.

Q. All right. Well, I don't want to debate that with you.

A. I think it is very important.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: There is a full stop, is there?

A. There is indeed a full stop, my Lady. I think Mr Rabinowitz is entirely misconstruing this correspondence.

MR RABINOWITZ: You see, I suggest to you that if he meant what you say he meant it's difficult to see why he should have started the email by saying:

"I don't think we should say that."

A. It is very clear, I think, what it says.

I am asking, as regards the second paragraph, two questions:

"... are we willing to give it ..."

And he says:

"I don't think we should say that."

And:

"... are we willing to state that the claims ... have no basis?"

And he says:

"It has no basis."

These are two separate questions -- two separate answers, separated by a full stop. How much clearer can it be?

Q. I'll tell you why I disagree with you, Mr De Cort, for what it's worth. The "I don't think we should say that" responds to what you asked him about saying. And what you've asked him about saying is to state that the claims in the public domain have no basis.

Otherwise he would have said, "I don't think we should give it," not "I don't think we should say it."
But again that's a matter of interpretation and I don't want to spend any more time with you on this.

A. I definitely disagree with your interpretation. That's not the way I understood it.

Q. All right. Can we at least agree on this, that ultimately you did not give any warranty or acknowledgement to Mr Deripaska that the claims in the public domain had no basis, did you, Mr De Cort?

A. No, because they had no basis we didn't want to give them any credibility by even referring to them.

Q. Well, it doesn't give them credibility by referring to them and saying "it has no basis," in fact it removes --

A. Actually we need to go back, we need to go back to when I was writing to Mr Tenenbaum.

Q. Well, it's set out at the bottom of the email that you have at tab 11, isn't it?

A. No, it's the attachment to tab 10, second paragraph, starting at the end of the second line H(I)10/40:

"... other than any that are in the public domain, no Claims were properly asserted in respect of the [Rusal] shares ..."

So I make a carve-out regarding -- I propose a carve-out regarding the claims in the public domain, and he says they have no basis, we shouldn't even say that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I don't think we've got the attachment, have we?

A. Yes, it is at tab 10, the second page. It's H(I)10/40.

Q. Can you just repeat that answer, Mr De Cort? I think we're all struggling to see where you're referring to.

A. The second paragraph of the attachment, at the end of the second line -- there's two elements to this thing:

"To [my best] knowledge and belief ..."

And then he talks first about encumbrances on the first line and the beginning of the second line, then he goes on in the end of second line and in the third line about claims. As regards claims, what we're saying is that:

"To the best of my knowledge and belief ... other than [those] that are in the public domain, no Claims were properly asserted ..."

That was the proposed language. And the response of Mr Tenenbaum is that the claims have no basis and we should not say that.

- Q. But Mr Berezovsky's claims were in the public domain, were they not?
- A. Yes.
- Q. So you seem to be saying, other than those in the public domain there were no claims which were properly asserted? Isn't that suggesting that you were accepting that Mr Berezovsky's claims were properly asserted?
- A. That was my proposal to limit the liability of Mr Abramovich in respect to the warranty he gives. And the response, the instructions, this is the conservative approach of me as a lawyer, the instructions that I get from Mr Tenenbaum is that those claims have no basis whatsoever so we should not make that carve-out.
- Q. But we can agree with this, that ultimately you did not give any warranty or acknowledgement to Mr Deripaska that the claims in the public domain had no basis, did you, Mr De Cort?

A. We need to go back then to the final documentation.

This was not to Mr Deripaska, this was to Eagle Capital, I believe. I need to go back which document. But the claim -- sorry, excuse me, the warranty regarding encumbrances and claims was not in the document -- in the deed of acknowledgement, it was in other documents. And indeed there is no carve-out for claims in the public domain.

Q. Indeed. So you did not give --

A. No, we gave actually a full warranty about no claims.

Q. The claims in the public domain having no basis?

A. No, if you read it correctly what I was proposing is we were asked for a warranty that there were no claims. I wanted to carve out from that warranty the claims in the public domain so that we would not give a warranty about those.

Mr Tenenbaum says we should not carve that out and we should give a flat no claims warranty, which is eventually what happened. And the reason he said that is that the claims in the public domain, my wording that I had proposed gave them some credibility while his position was they have no basis whatsoever, therefore we should not carve them out from our warranty.

Q. You see, I suggest that you were well aware, and indeed

Mr Tenenbaum was well aware, that there was a basis to these claims and that is what explains why Mr Tenenbaum is telling you, as I suggest he is, that we should not say that it has no basis, but you disagree with that, do you?

A. I disagree with that because, eventually, we did give a warranty that there are no claims.

Q. Very well.

Now, you tell us, this is at paragraph 23 of your statement, three lines down E2/09/277, that on 11 June 2004 you received two documents via email from Mr Mishakov who, as you explain, led Mr Deripaska's team and worked closely with Mr Deripaska, correct?

A. I don't -- yes, indeed.

Q. Can we just have a look at H(A)74, page 223, which is one of the two documents that you received H(A)74/223.

A. Yes, I'm there.

Q. Can you confirm that this is one of the two documents that you received from Mr Mishakov?

A. It looks like it, yes.

Q. This is a transaction chart that Mr Mishakov, Mr Deripaska's lawyer, the lawyer leading his team, had produced, and you can see that the top half of the page shows the transaction structures, a series of boxes and numbered steps, do you see that?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. And the numbered steps are then explained in the bottom half of the page, do you see that?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. And just can you help me with this, can we just identify which companies are named in the boxes on the page? RH Limited at the bottom, that's a reference to Rusal Holding Limited, is it not?

A. Yes, it is.

Q. And again you'll tell me if I'm wrong, but Rusal Holding Limited was the holding company which since September 2003 held 100 per cent of the stake in the Rusal group, that is both Rusal itself and its trading arm Rual?

A. I don't know these details, but it is in my view the top holding company of whatever the Rusal group is, yes.

Q. All right. And as a result of the first Rusal sale, 75 per cent of Rusal Holdings was by the summer of 2004 held by Mr Deripaska's company, Eagle Capital Group, that's right, isn't it?

A. I assume so, yes.

Q. And ECG on the left-hand side is a reference to Eagle Capital Group?

A. That is correct, although the chart doesn't indicate that it owns the other 75 per cent, but yes.

Q. No, that's right. Now, the remaining 25 per cent, that's to say the 25 per cent not held by ECG, was held in the summer of 2004 by M, that's the bearer share BVI company that we saw featured in the source of funds letter; that's right, is it not?

A. That is Madison, yes, indeed.

Q. And M is Madison, thank you very much for that.

In broad terms, the purpose of the second Rusal sale was ultimately to transfer the remaining 25 per cent stake which Madison held in Rusal Holdings Limited to ECG, Mr Deripaska's company, Eagle Capital Group, that's right, isn't it?

A. That is correct, yes.

Q. But the shares were not to pass directly from Madison to Eagle Capital Group, were they, Mr De Cort, just looking at this chart? You can see that they were first to pass through two other companies identified as P and Beneficiaries' Company, correct?

A. That is correct.

Q. And that was so, was it not, Mr De Cort, even though Eagle Capital Group had a right of pre-emption under the deed of pre-emption of 2003?

A. That is correct. This is all part of an arrangement between the three parties.

Q. And that is why there had to be a waiver by ECG of its pre-emption rights which we see in this diagram is the arrow identified as step three in the process. You can follow that point if you look at note 3.

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. The point is also picked up at note 3 at the bottom, is it not?

A. Yes, that's correct. If I'm not mistaken, the waiver was conditional or it was drafted in such a way that the shares couldn't actually leave. They would eventually end up with ECG. I forget the exact wording but that was the concept at least.

Q. Now, P -- again, tell me if I'm wrong -- that was to be a parent company which sat above Madison, something like Espat?

A. Yes, a temporarily appointed parent company, indeed.

Q. So step one involved the stake in Rusal being passed by Madison to its parent, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And then at the second stage, P Company, was to pass the 25 per cent stake in Rusal Holding on to the Beneficiaries' Company, correct?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. And this is not in Mr Mishakov's note but can you just confirm that, initially, the Beneficiaries' Company was intended to be a company called Finance & Investors or

F&I?

- A. It was not identified at this stage, it was much later that it was identified as Finance & Investors, yes, initially.
- Q. And in fact because of problems I think with F&I's holding structure in the Marshall Islands, a different company called Cliren came to be used?
- A. I don't know what the reason was but indeed a different company called Cliren came to be used.
- Q. And in due course, in the draft sale documentation which we're about to look at, what is referred to here as the Beneficiaries' Company was often simply referred to as B, was it not, Mr De Cort?
- A. I believe that's correct, yes.
- Q. So just again looking at this, steps one and two are the transfer of the 25 per cent stake in Rusal Holding from Madison via the parent company to the Beneficiaries' Company, that's right?
- A. That is correct.
- Q. And then step three was to be the waiver of Eagle Capital Group's pre-emption rights?
- A. That is correct.
- Q. And then step four, which we can see is what Mr Mishakov wanted as explained in the numbering below, was a guarantee from RA -- that's Mr Abramovich, isn't it,

Mr De Cort?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. We can see that the guarantee that Mr Abramovich was to provide was a representation and warranty that the beneficiaries -- and I'm looking now at note 4 -- the beneficiaries, B&B, are the ultimate beneficiaries of 25 per cent of Rusal Holding's shares. Do you see that, note 4?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. I'll come back to that in a moment, Mr De Cort. But working through the diagram, the next step, step five, was to be the share purchase agreement between Eagle Capital Group and the Beneficiaries' Company, correct?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. And by this, the Beneficiaries' Company would sell the 25 per cent stake in Rusal Holdings to Eagle Capital Group, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. And by that way the Eagle Capital Group, owned by Mr Deripaska, would ultimately end up with 100 per cent of the ownership of Rusal Holding?

A. That is correct.

Q. And then, just looking at the sixth and final step, this, as we see if we look at the notes, point 6, was for a release to be executed by the Beneficiaries'

Company jointly with the beneficiaries B&B, in which they would warrant that they were the beneficiaries of 25 per cent of Rusal Holdings and by which they would release Eagle Capital Group, Rusal Holding and Mr Deripaska from any claims relating to the establishment and management of Rusal Holdings?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. And you received this memorandum, you tell us, via email from Mr Mishakov on 11 June 2004. That's right, isn't it?

A. I believe that to be correct, yes, together with the memorandum of Paul Hauser dated 9 June, also addressed to Mr Mishakov.

Q. We can see that second document, Mr Hauser's memorandum, if you go to page 219 H(A)74/219 and just briefly look at that.

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. That is, as you see, the memorandum dated 9 June 2004 which was sent by Mr Hauser to Mr Mishakov, correct?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. This is what Mr Mishakov then sends on to you and we can see from the first paragraph that Mr Hauser says that this memorandum summarises the procedure by which the 25 per cent stake of "Rual Holdings" and I think that's a typo for Rusal Holdings because there was no Rual

Holding Company.

"... owned ... Madison ... would be sold to Eagle Capital Group..."

That's right, isn't it?

A. I can see that about the typo. I leave it up to you but it's probably likely a typo, yes.

Q. Mr Hauser says that his memorandum is intended to supplement Mr Mishakov's transaction diagram that we've just been looking at, which Mr Mishakov had sent to Mr Hauser earlier in the day. Do you see that?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. That's why I suggest it's pretty clear that the reference to Rual should have been a reference to Rusal.

A. Yes, it's very likely, yes.

Q. Then just looking at what Mr Hauser says in bullet point 1, he says:

"We are advised [Mr Hauser and Mr Mishakov have taken instructions from someone] that Madison ... has bearer shares, all of which are currently in the possession of its parent [company] ('P'). The shares of P would be transferred to a company ('B') which is owned by ... ultimate beneficiaries ..."

Who Mr Hauser refers to as "BB", do you see that?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. And I don't want to spend time going through this whole document with you, Mr De Cort, but we can see --

A. I am broadly familiar with it.

Q. All right. We can see that there are further references by Mr Hauser in this memorandum to "BB". For example, if you look at bullet point 5 over the page H(A)74/220, you see towards the end that he's talking about a guarantee to be given by "each of BB", do you see that? "... on the part of B, the selling company", the penultimate line of point 5?

A. Yes, and so BB refers to the beneficiaries of company B.

Q. Yes. But there's plainly more than one that he has in mind?

A. Yes, he uses a plural.

Q. Yes. You see it again at bullet point 6, there's a reference to "any of BB", "it is expected that each of BB". He says --

A. Yes, he used the plural tense.

Q. And just looking at the italicised bit below point 6, bullet point 6, Mr Hauser says:

"We would expect to prepare Deeds of Release and Indemnity to be executed by each of BB [et cetera] ... to include an assurance that BB were the only persons who have ever been beneficially entitled to the Shares."

Now, it's fairly clear that when Mr Hauser is referring in his memorandum to the persons he refers to as BB, those are the same persons which Mr Mishakov identifies on his diagram as the beneficiaries B&B. I think that reflects your own evidence?

A. It looks like that, yes. I just would like to note that this memorandum and the structure chart does not include any input from anyone on our side. This was purely done on Mr Deripaska's side.

Q. I was going to just check that with you. When Mr Hauser says at the start of his memorandum "We are advised", that advice hadn't come from you; that's what you're saying, is it?

A. That did not come from me, no.

Q. All right.

A. I had not spoken with Mr Hauser at that point in time, I believe.

Q. All right but you would have received this document from Mr Hauser?

A. No, I didn't receive it from Mr Hauser, I received it from Mr Mishakov.

Q. Indeed but you would have received Mr Hauser's document --

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. And when you received this document from Mr Mishakov, who did you believe Mr Mishakov and Mr Hauser were referring to when they referred to B&B or BB as the ultimate beneficial owners?

- A. I don't think I paid particular attention at that point in time to this aspect of the transaction. I was focusing on how the shares moved around.
- Q. Are you really saying that you gave no thought at all to who it was they were saying were the beneficial --
- A. The very first time that I received this memorandum I did not pay any attention to this at all. I think I probably at first might have paid attention to this after my meeting with Mr Paul Hauser.
- Q. So you'd previously seen newspaper reports which suggested that --
- A. No, I had not seen previously newspaper reports. The newspaper reports were presented to me by Mr Hauser during our meeting.
- Q. Mr De Cort, I had understood from your evidence that you had seen the Moscow report, Moscow Times report of 3 June?
- A. No, it was Mr Hauser that brought it to my attention.
- Q. And when that had been brought to your attention, you understood that the reference to B&B were to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili?
- A. I now don't have any particular recollection but it is very possible that I could have understood it that way, yes.

- Q. It's fairly obvious that you would have understood it that way, isn't it?
- A. Yes, I said it's very likely that I would have understood it that way.
- Q. And what did you do at that stage to find out more about the position in relation to B&B as beneficiaries of this 25 per cent of Rusal, Mr De Cort?
- A. We had some internal discussions and I was told at some point in time clearly that the Rusal shares belonged to Mr Abramovich. They were being passed along to Mr Patarkatsishvili to compensate him for his involvement and that there was no truth to Mr Berezovsky's claims.
- Q. Mr De Cort, if you really had had those discussions and you really had been told by someone internally that there was no truth to the claims and therefore no basis for any reference to B&B as being the beneficiaries of these shares, can you explain why it was that you did not immediately go back to Mr Mishakov or Mr Hauser and explain that the memoranda that they had produced were just completely wrong?
- A. I'm sure that I addressed the issue of the ownership of the shares with Mr Hauser at some point and then the discussion all turned around to warranties that would be given.

Q. You see, Mr De Cort, it's absolutely plain from the documentation that you do not at this stage go back, either to Mr Mishakov or to Mr Hauser, and say: you have completely misunderstood, there are no beneficiaries sitting behind this 25 per cent stake, it is all owned by Mr Abramovich. But we find nothing at all from you passing at this stage to either Mr Mishakov or Mr Hauser to that effect.

A. I'm sure that I've passed the information on to them and that it was made clear, but the focus of our attention was on the warranties that were going to be given in this transaction.

Q. You see, there is no correspondence saying -- no documentation at all saying that that is what you have told them.

A. I disagree with that.

Q. All right. Can we next then, please, go to bundle H(A)75 and turn to page 37 to see what happens next H(A)75/37.

Now, you should, I hope, have at H(A)75, page 37 a document headed "Document Diary for Documentary Closing". Do you have that, Mr De Cort?

A. Yes, I have that.

Q. Were you the author of this document or do you think it was more likely produced by Bryan Cave, Mr Hauser?

- A. I was definitely not the author of this document. I'm not even sure I saw it at the time.
- Q. It has come from your disclosure though, do you see that?
- A. Yes, but I believe that that might have been provided to us at some point in time by people acting on behalf of Mr Patarkatsishvili, in connection with these proceedings. By the -- on the side of Mr Anisimov, I'm sorry.
- Q. I think if that were so, it would have a reference to the Anisimov defendants in the disclosure --
- A. No, what I'm saying, that it was provided at some point in time to us as a courtesy and eventually then ended up in our disclosure.
- Q. Now, we can see that as at 10 June 2004, when this document diary was produced, it was envisaged that a number of documents would have to be drawn up. Do you see that?
- A. Yes, I see that.
- Q. The purpose of this document diary appears to have been to identify those documents which needed to be produced and to assign the initial drafting of them to a particular party. Do you see that? That's correct, isn't it?
- A. That is obvious from the document, but I just want to clarify that prior to these proceedings I had not seen this document.

Q. All right. But just see if you can help us with some things which arise out of this document. If you look down the right-hand column, headed "Responsible Party", you can see that the task of drawing up the document has been allocated to various people. Can you help us with this, Mr De Cort? "MH", that's likely to be a reference to Millhouse, is it not?

A. Yes, it is.

Q. And that is obviously an indication that your team -- it was envisaged that your team would have the task of drawing up that particular document, you would agree with that presumably?

A. By whoever was preparing the document, yes.

Q. And "Basel", you see that in the fourth box down, that is likely to be a reference to Basic Element, that's Mr Deripaska's company, correct?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. And "Salford", they were assisting on Mr Patarkatsishvili's side at this time with the documentation of the transaction, were they not, Mr De Cort?

A. I was never aware of any involvement by Salford.

Q. Okay.

Now, again, just looking at the diary, still on page 37, you can see that it was envisaged that a number of parties would be required to enter into the contract. "RA", that's obviously a reference to Mr Abramovich, is it not?

A. I assume so, yes.

Q. And you see references to "B Co[mpany]" under "Sale of RH Shares to ECG," that would obviously be a reference to the Beneficiaries' Company that we saw on Mr Mishakov's chart, correct?

A. That is likely, yes.

Q. And "M" again would be Madison.

A. I would assume so, yes.

Q. And "P" would be Madison's parent, it's the same as the chart --

A. I assume so, yes.

Q. And "OD", which I'm not sure appeared on the chart, that is obviously a reference to Mr Deripaska?

A. That would be logical indeed, yes.

Q. Then do you see there are also references to "B1" and "B2", for example towards the -- the third or fourth last boxes on the page. B1 gives a guarantee, B2 gives a deed of guarantee, do you see that?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. You see it again in box --

- A. I don't think I had seen the references to B1 and B2 before these proceedings.
- Q. Again one sees references to B1 and B2 on the following page, box 8.
- A. Yes.
- Q. And again, under "Delegation of Authorities" there's a reference to B2 authorising B1 to enter into the negotiations and agreement on his behalf, do you see that?
- A. I see that, yes.
- Q. Again, would you accept that it is reasonable to assume that B1 and B2 here were the same B&B, or BB, that we've seen identified in the other documents produced by Mr Mishakov and Mr Hauser?
- A. That is possible. As I said, I had not seen this document before these proceedings.
- Q. If you go to document number 11 H(A)75/38.
- A. Yes.
- Q. You see it says:
- "RA Deed or Release and Indemnity in favour of RH and its affiliates including an assurance that B1 and B2 are the only persons who have ever been beneficially entitled to RH shares."
- A. I see that.
- Q. Again that strongly suggests that that would be the BB or the B&B because we saw from Mr Mishakov's --

A. Yes, it is likely that.

Q. And just looking at the last box, page 38, you can see that it was envisaged that a general power of attorney would be issued by B2 in favour of B1 authorising him to act on B2's behalf and to execute any agreements, do you see that?

A. I see that, yes.

Q. And you can see why that is needed if, for example, just looking back up the chart at box -- sorry, at document 8, page 38, you see that B1 is identified in the second box as being the signature person. In order to see what I mean by signature person you have to go back to page 37. The second box along identifies the signature person. And if you look at box 8, you will see that B1 is signing for B2.

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. So would you agree at least with this, that it's plain at this stage that it was envisaged by the author of the document that two ultimate beneficiaries were involved although one would be executing documents for and on behalf of the other, correct?

A. That is correct.

Q. Although I think we know that in fact no power of attorney was ever procured from Mr Berezovsky authorising Mr Patarkatsishvili to execute deeds in relation to this transaction for or on his behalf, that's right, isn't it?

A. Not that I know of, yes.

Q. Can we just perhaps look at another document that was circulating at around this time, Mr De Cort, one with your mark-up on it. Can you go please in the same bundle to --

Q. -- 155, very good. You've done your homework H(A)75/155.

You see that this document had been headed up "Deed of Guarantee" and was to be a guarantee provided by Mr Abramovich, but you, it appears, have changed that language and you've replaced it with the words "Deed of Warranty and Indemnity", and indeed it's no longer to be executed by Mr Abramovich but rather by Madison and Madison's parent, whoever that might be. Correct?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. And then just looking at footnote 1, at the bottom of the page, which is an added amendment, it's right, is it not, that that indicates to us that this is your amendment. You put a note to yourself:

"ADC to discuss with [I think it must be Ms Khudyk]."

Is that right?

- A. Yes, all those amendments in this document are my amendments. It's a marked-up version of the document that I sent back.
- Q. Thank you. And if you just look, still on this page, to clause --
- A. Excuse me, the reason for the footnote is at that point in time we were at the very beginning stages of the transaction. I had no information, I had received a memorandum from Mr Hauser and Mr Mishakov, the transaction chart, and then I received this document. So I was really -- I was looking what was going on and where shares would pass, but that's the extent of my information at that point in time.
- Q. Just looking at clause 1.1(a), which is really where you put this footnote to speak to Ms Khudyk, you were saying there:

"In consideration of [Eagle] consenting to the disposal of the shares [that's the 25 per cent stake in Rusal Holdings] by Madison and the subsequent disposal of the shares by P, M&P [that's Madison and its parent] irrevocably warrants ... to ECG that.

"(a) during the period from 15 March 2000 up to and including the B Transfer, the ultimate beneficial owners of the Business Interests (as defined in the DPO)

[that's the 25 per cent stake in the Rusal group] represented by the shares..."

And then you have this:

"... are X and Y and that X and Y have been the beneficial owners since 15 March 2000."

Do you see that, Mr De Cort?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. Of course we have seen from the source of funds letters and the Denton Wilde Sapte attendance note that you and Ms Khudyk were both involved in the Blue Waters transaction; you had been, hadn't you?

A. If Blue Waters is the one in 2003, yes, then I was -- I mean, involved in the transaction, I provided a source of funds letter.

Q. And you understood, as you tell us at paragraph 8 of your witness statement E2/09/271, you were told at the time of that transaction that it involved a temporary transfer of the ultimate beneficial ownership of Madison, through Madison of the Rusal group to Blue Waters, that's right, isn't it?

A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. And I suggest to you that that is a company that you knew to be associated with Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili but you deny that?

A. Yes, I deny that. I didn't know that at the time,

I only found it out through these proceedings.

Q. You see, I suggest that is why you're putting down a marker here, as footnote 1, to discuss this warranty further with Ms Khudyk, to check with her that the Blue Waters transaction really had just been a temporary transfer of ownership, or whether it was the case that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili had always, since 15 March 2000, been the ultimate owners of the 25 per cent of Rusal as per this warranty?

A. No, the reason I put the footnote, as I just explained to my Lady, is that I was at that point in time just getting involved in the transaction, I did not have any information at all, to check on what basis we could give such a warranty.

Q. You tell us, Mr De Cort, at paragraph 33 of your witness statement, it's at page 281 E2/09/281.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That's in the new version.

A. No, I don't think I made any changes to paragraph 33.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, only a very small one.

MR RABINOWITZ: Looking at the second last sentence here, you say you cannot recall whether or not you discussed this matter with Ms Khudyk or what her response was.

A. Yes.

Q. You must surely have sought instructions from her, mustn't you, Mr De Cort, given the size of the transaction?

- A. Eventually, after my meeting with Paul Hauser, yes, I had extensive internal discussions, as is now also evident from the correspondence -- the additional correspondence that was disclosed on last Friday.
- Q. Now, just looking at paragraph 33 again of your statement E2/09/280, you say you sent these revised drafts back to Mr Mishakov on 11 June 2004.
- A. Yes.
- Q. Can we just look at the covering email of 11 June and H(A)75, page 205 H(A)75/205.
- A. Yes, I'm there.
- Q. And again, it's clear from this that when you sent this back to Mr Mishakov you didn't suggest to him that there was a complete misunderstanding, that there were in fact not any two ultimate beneficial owners separate from Mr Abramovich who had owned the 25 per cent stake in Rusal; that's right, isn't it?
- A. That's correct. As I've said, at that point in time I had no information about that whatsoever.
- Q. So Mr Mishakov would, when he received this draft back from you, naturally have assumed that your understanding was the same as his understanding, namely that there were two ultimate beneficial owners, B&B, or X and Y, as they appeared in your draft, or B1 and B2, who had been owners of the 25 per cent of the Rusal group since 15 March 2000. It's obvious, isn't it, Mr De Cort?

A. I don't think that's obvious. He had sent me a memorandum that indicates that. I had not denied it nor affirmed it and the warranty, I just briefly changed some language, some wording of the warranty but I made a footnote saying that I have to discuss this further. So from that you can very well imply that I'm not comfortable yet with this position.

Q. In fact what you had done was to change his B&B to X and Y?

A. No, actually I did not change B&B to X and Y. X and Y was in the original draft that Mr Mishakov sent to me.

Q. All right, but you didn't take X and Y out, did you?

A. No, because I had no information about it.

Q. We can at least agree about this, that when you sent this revised document back to Mr Mishakov, no one had told you that the purpose of the transaction was simply to compensate Mr Patarkatsishvili for his services and pay him outstanding commission?

A. I don't know exactly at what time I was told about that. It was relatively early on but I was -- I assume at the very latest it must have been around 15/16 June when we had the internal discussions following my meeting with Paul Hauser.

- Q. But I think you're accepting that, when you sent this back, no one had told you that the purpose of the transaction --
- A. So at that point in time indeed --
- Q. -- was simply to compensate Mr Patarkatsishvili for his services and to pay him outstanding commission?
- A. As I -- my evidence was that at the very latest, around the 15th/16th, I would have been told. It is clear from my correspondence that I did not yet know anything about the beneficial ownership of the companies. I don't know what was mentioned about the purpose of the transaction at that time.
- Q. You see, Mr De Cort, it's obvious because if you had been told that the only purpose of this transaction was to compensate Mr Patarkatsishvili for his services and pay him outstanding commission, there is no way you would have sent the document back in this format, unless that is you were happy to be involved in drawing up entirely fictitious paperwork. That is right, is it not?
- A. Logically that is correct, yes. I just -- I cannot tell you at what time I was told. That is correct.
- Q. Well, I think -- I mean, it's not only logically correct, it must be correct.

Anyway, let's see what happened next, Mr De Cort.

You tell us at paragraph 37 of your witness statement E2/09/282 that you recall going to Mr Hauser's office in London for a meeting or perhaps two meetings in mid-June 2004. It's page 282.

A. Yes, I see that that's correct.

Q. And there is correspondence in the files, I don't think we need to turn it up, which suggests that the meetings were on 15 or 16 June or 15 and 16 June in fact?

A. No, I think it is now clear from the additional correspondence that it was on the 15th.

Q. Right, so you think it was just on the 15th and not on the 16th?

A. Yes, I think if you turn to H(I), flag 1 H(I)/01/1, that is my email from 15 June to Mrs Panchenko and Mrs Khudyk in which I say, I had a meeting today with Mr Paul Hauser.

Q. Indeed. I'm not disputing you had a meeting on the 15th. It's really as to whether there was also a meeting on the 16th but you think there was only one meeting?

A. I think there was only one meeting. There's further reference to a meeting on the 16th apparently but it was a meeting in Moscow in which I didn't participate.

Q. All right. Now, you also tell us, this is paragraph 37, still in paragraph 37, about five lines in, that you can recall that one of the main issues discussed was Mr Deripaska's need for confirmation of the ultimate beneficial ownership of the Rusal Holding shares from 15 March 2000 up to the date of transfer, correct?

A. Yes, indeed. Mr Hauser referred me to the -- to an article which I believe to be the article of the Moscow Times where these claims were being made by Mr Berezovsky and he said that, as a result of that, given that he was on notice, he had to seek confirmation about the beneficial ownership from the start-up of the operations.

Q. If you can go to a document, still in bundle 75, that you will see at page 228.001 H(A)75/228.001, that sheds some light on what it was --

A. It's H(A)75?

Q. Still in H(A)75, page 228.001, it's a very bright orangey colour.

A. Why are those in orange, if I may ask?

Q. They were added in after the trial bundle was put together I think, so that people could recognise that they had been added in late but that may not be right.

A. I don't think I've seen this document ever before.

Q. Well, can I just show you the document and you can --

A. Sure.

Q. It's a document headed "Madison Representations and Warranties". If you go to page 004 H(A)75/228.004, you will see that it appears to have been produced by Bryan Cave, so that would be Mr Hauser --

A. Yes. I'm quite sure I've never seen this document before.

Q. -- on 14 June 2004. So that was a day before you say you met him?

A. Yes, it looks like.

Q. Can I just ask you then to go back to page 228.001 H(A)75/228.001?

A. Yes.

Q. You see, because if you look at the table at 228.001, we can see the warranties that Mr Deripaska was looking to receive both from RA, Mr Abramovich, and from the beneficial owners in the second and third columns. Do you see that?

A. I see that, yes.

Q. And then there is a column 4 for comments next to it. Do you see that?

A. I see the column, the "Comments" column, yes.

Q. Are you sure that Mr Hauser would not have shown you this document which he'd obviously just produced prior to meeting with you on the 15th?

A. I'm almost 100 per cent certain, yes.

Q. You see, you have said that the main item discussed at the meeting was warranties in respect of beneficial ownership interests and here we have a document produced by Mr Hauser covering exactly that ground just before the meeting. I suggest to you it is likely that he would have shown you the document.

- A. No, it is highly unlikely that I've seen it. We had a discussion, he showed me a newspaper article and we had an overall discussion but I don't think he had produced any document particularly for the meeting.
- Q. I suggest that at the very least he would have raised with you the matters that he had set out in this document, which I'll show you.
- A. I think I've set out in my email what I -- in my witness statement what I believe the three main matters were that he wanted to cover, one of which was clearly the warranties regarding beneficial ownership from 15 March.
- Q. Let me show you what the document says because this may help trigger a recollection as to whether, even if he didn't show you the document, he would have raised with you the matters that the document sets out.

If you look at the first column, do you see the heading "Objective"?

- A. Yes.
- Q. And then under that Mr Hauser sets out his objective which is the:

"Need to confirm ultimate beneficial interest of shares from date of first agreement establishing Rusal to the date Shares acquired by Eagle Capital."

Do you see that?

A. I see that. That definitely does not ring a bell.

Q. Although you acknowledge that that was the main matter that you were there to discuss?

A. No. I mean, the first agreement that's referred to is not something I was aware of. I just was aware of the date 15 March 2000.

Q. All right. If you look at the next column, you can see that the warranty that was being sought by Bryan Cave was a warranty from Mr Abramovich that:

"During the period from 15 March 2000 up to and including the Final Transfer, the ultimate beneficial owners of the Business Interests (as defined in the [deed of pre-emption and option]) represented by the Shares were the Beneficial Owners."

Do you see that?

A. I see that.

Q. If you look to the next column, headed "Coverage from [the] Beneficial Owners", you can see that the corresponding warranties were also going to be sought by Mr Deripaska from the beneficial owners. Do you see that? Just have a read of that.

A. Yes, I see that, although I find it quite surprising that the people that are represented to be the beneficial owners would only give such warranty with respect to their knowledge. If they really are the beneficial owners, then it's a bit surprising.

Q. Well, if you look at the comments, you may have some insight into that. If you look at the comments in the fourth column, it says:

"We need to know ultimate beneficial ownership because if we do not know precisely who the beneficial owners are:

"(1) the buyer cannot be sure he is getting comprehensive releases from everyone with an interest in Russian Aluminium; and

"(2) the buyer cannot be sure that he is getting representations and warranties as to share ownership from the people who can give them.

"RA should be able to give unqualified assurance as to ultimate beneficial ownership because he was the trustee holding the Business Interests. Trustees can hold only for known, not for unknown beneficiaries.

"X and Y can give only a 'knowledge and belief' assurance as to ultimate beneficial ownership because they cannot know whether RA might have held the Business Interests for someone else. While trustees have to know who their beneficiaries are, beneficiaries do not necessarily need to know that the trustee is holding something on their behalf (indeed, it is not uncommon for beneficiaries not to know that a trustee is holding assets in trust for them).

"It is possible in theory for X and Y to have held their beneficial interests for someone else or to have encumbered their beneficial [interest] without telling the RA that this was the case. In such a case, RA would hold the interest as trustee for X and Y who in turn would hold the interest as trustee for someone else. We need to know that this was not the case here and the only persons who can give such assurances are X and Y, not RA. However, this can be covered by a 'knowledge and belief' standard as X and Y will know whether they have been holding interests for a third party."

A. We had no discussion whatsoever about trusts or trustees. The word "trusts" and "trustees" was not used at all during our meeting, I'm quite certain about that.

Q. But what is clear from this, Mr De Cort, is that Mr Hauser went into your meeting on 15 June at which you recall the question of warranties as to beneficial ownership being discussed under the clear impression that Mr Abramovich was holding the 25 per cent stake in Rusal on trust for X and Y. That's right, isn't it?

- A. That looks like it from the document but we had no discussion whatsoever about trusts or trustees.
- Q. And presumably these matters would have been discussed between you and Mr Hauser, Mr De Cort?
- A. We had no discussion about trusts or trustees. We discussed beneficial ownership, that is correct, the warranties relating to beneficial ownership.
- Q. You say that notwithstanding what you say in paragraph 37, that one of the main issues discussed was Mr Deripaska's need for confirmation of the ultimate beneficial ownership of Rusal?
- A. Yes, as I say, we discussed ultimate beneficial ownership and warranties regarding ultimate beneficial ownership. We did not discuss any type of trust or trustees.
- Q. If you're talking about ultimate beneficial ownership of Rusal, doesn't that almost inevitably raise issues of trusts and trustees?
- A. We were discussing the type of warranty that was required. Ultimate beneficial ownership can take many forms.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, that may be a convenient moment.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well.

Mr De Cort, you understand that you're not to talk to anybody about the evidence?

THE WITNESS: Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Your evidence or about the case generally.

Very well. 2 o'clock.

(1.00 pm)

(The short adjournment)

(2.00 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: Just before we broke, Mr De Cort, I had asked you about the meeting you had with Mr Hauser on 15 June at which you discussed the question of warranties in respect of beneficial ownership going back to 15 March 2000. But you tell us, this is at paragraph 38 E2/09/282 of your witness statement, that you were reluctant to give the warranties that Mr Hauser was seeking, and do have paragraph 38 open, but you mention two concerns there, don't you, Mr De Cort?

The first concern that you mention was Mr Hauser's reference to the press reports which we've looked at in which Mr Berezovsky was alleging that he had an interest in Rusal, and you say you were concerned that anything Mr Abramovich might say about beneficial ownership might come back to haunt him, is that right?

A. Yes, it's correct, it's what I say.

Q. You give as an example a situation in which there was an IPO of Rusal in a few years' time and Mr Berezovsky would halt the process, making a claim on some or all of the assets, correct?

A. Yes, that's what I say.

Q. Just pausing there, the warranty that Mr Hauser was looking for at this stage was a warranty from Mr Abramovich that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili would have been the ultimate beneficial owners of 25 per cent of Rusal since 15 March 2000, that's right, isn't it?

A. That is correct.

Q. And if Mr Abramovich had given that warranty to Mr Deripaska, and it was mirrored by similar warranties from Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, which is what we've seen Mr Hauser was looking for in his 14 June warranties chart, then there would have been no prospect of Mr Berezovsky sticking a spanner in the works at a subsequent IPO, would there? You would have given Mr Deripaska his own warranty about beneficial ownership and entered into a release?

A. I don't understand the last sentence of your question.

Q. Well, if you had given the warranty that Mr Hauser was looking for --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Which page are we looking at in terms of the warranty that Hauser is looking for?

MR RABINOWITZ: If your Ladyship goes back to his warranty chart?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, that's where I am.

MR RABINOWITZ: It's 001 H(A)75/228.001.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I'm there. Whereabouts? It's "Coverage from Beneficial Owners"?

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed. Effectively saying that they were the only -- sorry, H(A)75.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I mean, it's "Coverage from Beneficial Owners", you're looking at that column?

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed.

So in effect if you had a warranty from Mr Abramovich saying that the owners of the shares were the beneficial owners, and the beneficial owners said they were the only beneficial owners, then you couldn't have Mr Berezovsky throwing a spanner in the works because accompanied by those warranties, and we saw this from Mr Mishakov's structure chart, would have been a release.

A. But that would not have represented the true position.

Q. Well, I suggest to you, Mr De Cort, that it would have represented the true position.

A. No, what I was told, following my meeting with Hauser, we had internal discussions and I was told in no uncertain terms that these shares belonged to Mr Abramovich and only to Mr Abramovich, that there was no truth to the claims of Mr Berezovsky, and that Mr Abramovich ever had any dealings with Mr Patarkatsishvili in connection with the aluminium assets.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Rabinowitz, can I be clear, are you putting the suggestion that the problem would have been removed if a warranty had been given by Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili? Is that the suggestion you're making to the witness, that they should have asked Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili to come up with some sort of warranty?

MR RABINOWITZ: The main warranty would be a warranty by Mr Abramovich saying that Mr Berezovsky -- that the beneficial owners were the beneficial owners. If you had that and you then had Mr Berezovsky also saying that, to their knowledge, they were the only beneficial owners, accompanied by a release given to Mr Deripaska and indeed to Mr Abramovich, it's difficult to see how Mr Berezovsky could later come along and disrupt events because he would have been brought into the transaction, which is what Mr Hauser was envisaging --

A. There is now a very nice theoretical construct from Mr Abramovich. If you go back and look at H(A)75/196, that is an email from Mr Streshinsky -- from Mr Mishakov to me in which he very clearly indicates that Mr Streshinsky was not ready to give any type of warranties whatsoever about the shares, except from the day that company B would take ownership over the shares.

We can discuss many theoretical constructs here today. We need to look at the facts, and the facts are what they are.

Q. Well, let's just look at what you say at paragraph 38 E2/09/282, because that's the first of the grounds that you give, concern that Mr Berezovsky could throw a spanner in the works.

The second of the grounds that you identify in your witness statement is the one we've already touched upon which is the concern you had arising out of your own involvement in the source of funds letter for Blue Waters as a result of which you knew that on a temporary basis, at the very least, Blue Waters had been the ultimate beneficial owner of Madison, and through Madison the Rusal group, correct?

A. Not fully correct. It would have been the beneficial owner of Madison but probably not the ultimate beneficial owner, and ultimate beneficial ownership typically goes to an individual.

Q. All right. And I've already suggest to you that you knew that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were associated with that entity and I know that you deny that?

A. I did not know that at the time.

Q. But we now know, do we not, Mr De Cort, in light of the documents that were disclosed for the very first time on Friday, that there was in fact another reason, indeed I suggest to you this was the real reason, why you were not prepared to give Mr Hauser the warranties on beneficial ownership that he was seeking.

Can I ask you, please, to go in bundle H(I) to tab 4, page 17-18 H(I)/04/17.

A. Before we turn there, maybe I can just clarify 38 and the two reasons I give, if I may.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, go ahead.

A. I was told, as I've already explained, in no uncertain terms that these shares only belonged to Mr Abramovich. There was no truth to the claims being made by Mr Berezovsky. At the same point in time, I knew that the shares had temporarily transferred and therefore we could not cover that period definitely. In addition, given that the claims were being made by Berezovsky, I did not want to expose Mr Abramovich to any liability and, therefore, for those purposes did we not give a warranty as to historical ownership which, in addition, as I've explained before, is an extremely unusual warranty to ever give in a corporate transaction.

Eventually, this was resolved as a matter of risk allocation between the parties in the deeds of acknowledgement which we at some point in time probably will turn to.

MR RABINOWITZ: Yes, we will get to that, Mr De Cort. Can you in the meantime, please, go to bundle H(I) tab 4, page 17 where I suggest we will see the real reason that you did not want to give the warranty H(I)/04/17.

Do you see at page 17 an email from yourself to Ms Panchenko dated 16 June 2004, also copied to Mr Tenenbaum at a couple of addresses; do you have that?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. This would have been just after your meeting with Mr Hauser at which the warranties were discussed, correct?

A. After my meeting with Mr Hauser and after our internal discussions.

Q. All right. Let's just look at what you say. You say:

"Dear Irina [that's Ms Panchenko].

"Following our conversation earlier this afternoon, I enclose a draft reply to the Bazel's ..."

That's Mr Deripaska's counsel, Base Elements. And then you carry on with the email:

"You will note that I have left two variants with respect to the 1st item regarding beneficial ownership. Having discussed this further with Eugene, we feel that we would rather not give this warranty as we would not want to further document BB's beneficial ownership."

Do you see that, Mr De Cort?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. If you then look over the page H(I)/04/18, you see at the first numbered item, we see the two variants of the beneficial ownership since 15 March that you were considering warranting, variant A and variant B. And:

"Variant A -- Madison can warrant to the best of its knowledge regarding its ultimate beneficial owner being [BB]."

Then:

"Variant B -- Madison will not give any warranties regarding its ultimate beneficial owner."

So just looking back at the first page, the covering email, it looks as if, having spoken with Ms Panchenko and then more recently with Mr Tenenbaum, Mr Tenenbaum's preference was that there should be no warranties on beneficial ownership, that's to say variant B. And that, as you document here, is because you do not want to further document BB's ownership. Is that what Mr Tenenbaum told you, Mr De Cort?

A. No, this is the conclusion that I came to based on our discussion. As I've explained, I was told in no uncertain terms that those shares solely belong to Mr Abramovich. The reference to further documenting is a reference to the document that you find at H(A)75/155, which is a draft of deed of guarantee and indemnity that we've looked at earlier in which the other sides, without our initial participation, made such a warranty.

And I, coming to the conclusion -- having the information I then had, I said there is no reason that we would want to say anything that any third party could misconstrue, even if that was possibly to assist banks, as we now know the -- Mr Anisimov and his colleague Mr Streshinsky were dealing with banks and trying to pass information to banks, and I did not want there to be any ambiguity that there was any truth to such a statement.

Q. You see, Mr De Cort, I suggest your concern about not further documenting the beneficial ownership of BB is not to do with a draft that you had produced, but it has to do with the source of funds letter that you had drafted in August 2003 and your knowledge that those entities were related to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili. That is right, isn't it?

- A. That is not correct at all. I only understood Blue Waters to be associated with Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili as a result of those proceedings here.
- Q. Can you explain, please, why at paragraph 38 of your witness statement E2/09/282 you nowhere mentioned this reason about not wanting to further document the beneficial ownership of Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili?
- A. Because I did not -- obviously those documents were harvested from our computers, from our PCs, but in preparing my witness statement these documents were not particularly drawn to my attention, probably as a result of the fact that they were initially considered privileged, and I've probably not considered them fully at the time, otherwise I would have gladly included it in my witness statement.
- Q. You see, you must have been conscious that this document existed at the time you were drafting your two reasons, Mr De Cort? I suggest to you that you have deliberately not referred to this, which I suggest is the real reason?
- A. No, that is not correct. That is not correct.
- Q. You see, Mr De Cort, what I suggest is that the email that you have disclosed in fact gives us an insight as to what the internal thinking within Millhouse was, and that is this: that you never wanted to document Mr Berezovsky's beneficial ownership in relation to Rusal, just as in relation to Sibneft, not because that did not accord with the true position but because you were concerned that Mr Berezovsky would use any such documentation as a basis to bring claims which you knew were fully justified against Mr Abramovich both in relation to Sibneft and Rusal. That's right, isn't it?

A. That is wrong. As we've previously also discussed this morning, the BB reference here is not a reference to Mr Berezovsky, it is a reference to the beneficiaries, the B company.

Q. B&B, Mr De Cort, as I thought you had accepted already, was very likely to have been a reference to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, and you knew that, did you not?

A. That is correct, but in your question at [draft] page 104, line 3 of the transcript, you said:

"... [not want] to document Mr Berezovsky's beneficial ownership ..."

Q. Yes, but it would have been obvious, Mr De Cort, that when you came to produce the final documentation, that would have been a reference to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili?

A. Yes, and there was no truth to that.

Q. Well --

A. And that's the reason why it was not to be documented.

Q. Can we then just have a look at another document that you have only just disclosed, and that is at bundle H1 (sic), tab 1, page 1 H(I)/01/1.

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. This is an email from yourself to Ms Panchenko and Ms Khudyk referring to your meeting with Mr Hauser on the 15th. You say:

"I had a meeting today with Paul Hauser... counsel to Base Element, to discuss the principal outstanding issues."

Then you explain that at your meeting with Mr Hauser he wanted to lay out what his client was looking to receive, and the first item that Mr Hauser was looking for was confirmation of the ultimate beneficial ownership of the Rusal shareholding from 15 March 2000, you can see that in your first point there.

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. Then if we look further down the page, below the redaction, the first big redaction and before you get to the second redaction, we can see what you say in relation to item 1. You say that you've discussed the matter with Natalia, that's presumably Ms Khudyk, isn't it, Mr De Cort?

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. And she says that as the matter "is not known to P", that's Madison's parent, isn't it, Mr De Cort?

A. Yes, it's a temporary company with nominee director, employee directors who don't have any knowledge of this information.

Q. She's saying, Ms Khudyk, that P would not want to make any statement; that's correct, isn't it?

A. That is correct, as I explained, because P is a temporary company with either nominee directors or employee directors who have no involvement with these matters, so they would not have any knowledge to make such statements.

Q. Then look at the second point, you say:

"I have already indicated to the other side that if we were to make any statement in this respect, such statement would be limited to 'the best of our knowledge' as we don't know whether B Company (BB) is maybe acting as a front for other ... beneficial owners."

Do you see that?

A. I see that, and I can explain if you'd like.

Q. Now, do you see, Mr De Cort, that what you are saying in this email to Ms Panchenko, in terms of the issues that you discussed with Mr Hauser, very largely corresponds to what Mr Hauser had identified as being the matters to be discussed with you in the document that we looked at earlier, Madison representations and warranty documents.

- A. Yes, and I confirm categorically that I have not seen this document.
- Q. Do you not think that, in light of the fact that you are responding in a way which corresponds with the issues that Mr Hauser raised with you, you may well have seen the document, or at least that he put these points to you from that document?
- A. He put those points to me but he did not show me any document, and I have not seen this document until this morning actually.
- Q. All right, but let's just go then back to what you say --
- A. And in my witness statement, the way I have put those points, I have actually derived that from my email of 17 June that is also in the disclosure, it's referenced in my witness statement. That's the basis on which I made the statement in paragraph 37 E2/09/282, I believe, where I identify the matters we most likely discussed.

I, at that point in time, had not seen this email that we are now looking at.

Q. Just looking at what you say, just above the larger redaction towards the bottom of the page:

"I have already indicated to the other side that if we were to make any statement in this respect, such statement would be limited to 'the best of our knowledge' as we don't know whether B Company (BB) is maybe acting as a front for other ultimate beneficial [shareholders]."

What is at least clear from this email, Mr De Cort, is that when you had your discussion with Mr Hauser on the 15th you did not say to him: what are you talking about? There are no ultimate beneficial owners called BB or represented by BB. This stake just belongs to Mr Abramovich?

A. Indeed I didn't tell him that. As I've already explained a few times today, when I went -- the first time that Mr Berezovsky's name in connection with Rusal was mentioned to me was in that meeting. I went into that meeting blind, I had no information. It's after that meeting that we started internally discussing the situation.

Q. Are you really saying that you went to this meeting blind without having taken any instructions from anyone in Millhouse as to what the position was?

A. Yes.

- Q. I suggest to you that is simply --
- A. That is entirely the truth.
- Q. Right. I suggest to you that is not the truth.
- A. That is the truth. I disagree with you.
- Q. Can we at least agree on this, that what this document indicates, at least at this point, is that your understanding was that there were other ultimate beneficial owners, referred to as BB, who owned the 25 per cent stake of Rusal, and the only thing you were not sure about is whether they were acting as a front for other beneficial owners?
- A. I at that point in time had no information whatsoever, but indeed I made that statement, I write it here. But I had no information at all what the position was.
- Q. Well, your understanding at least was that there were other beneficial owners, referred to as BB, who owned the 25 per cent stake of Rusal, and the only thing that you were not sure about, on the base of your understanding, is whether they were acting as a front for other beneficial owners.
- I'm just asking you about your understanding,
Mr De Cort.
- A. This is a reflection of what I said to Mr Hauser, yes, that's correct.
- Q. And what was your understanding at that time?

A. I had basically no information, I was just commenting on a warranty that he was asking me to make, and I commented just as a draftsman would comment on a warranty without having any information, saying: there's probably carve-outs that are needed, et cetera.

I was working in a vacuum at that point.

Q. You say you were working in a vacuum and that you had received -- not bothered to get any information at all?

A. No, because this transaction started for me as a transaction just to transfer ownership of the shares. I did not consider -- I had not assumed when we started this transaction there would be requests for ultimate beneficial ownership et cetera, and eventually we'd have to do the due diligence on that to determine what the situation is.

As a draftsman, a corporate draftsman, not every draft is like a signed witness statement. These are drafts based on the information, the best information at that point in time you have, and that information may be very little.

Q. If this was your understanding at the time, can you tell us what your understanding was based on?

A. I had basically no understanding about the ownership structure of Rusal, I was just looking at the drafted warranty, and where probably there would be limitations, such as saying something should only be to our knowledge et cetera. It's just a pure drafting exercise.

But it became clear from the meeting that there were issues based on the article that Mr Hauser referred me to, and after that we had an internal discussion, which then led to my email of 17 June to Mr Hauser.

Q. Now, I want to ask you next, if I may, about the revised structure of the Rusal sale transaction which arose on 17 June 2000 which you refer to in paragraph 39 of your witness statement, that's page 283 E2/09/283.

We saw, Mr De Cort, from Mr Mishakov's transaction chart, we looked at that this morning, that the second Rusal sale was originally going to be structured with a transfer from Madison via its parent company, P, to the Beneficiaries' Company, B. Do you remember that, Mr De Cort?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. But we know that on 17 June 2004, Mr Streshinsky, who was instructed on Mr Patarkatsishvili's side of the transaction, sent two emails to Ms Khudyk suggesting a revised transaction structure, is that correct? Do you remember that?

A. Yes.

Q. I wonder if we could just turn to the first email that Mr Streshinsky sent to Ms Khudyk, bundle H(A)76, page 54

H(A)76/54.

A. It's also in the H(I) bundle, I think.

Q. All right. Well, H(A)76, page 54.

A. Yes, I'm there.

Q. Now, we can see there that Mr Streshinsky was proposing a simplified structure split into two parts, relating to dividends and shares. Under the first paragraph, Mr Streshinsky says:

"BP (an individual) and B (a company with B as the sole shareholder) on the one hand, and M on the other hand, shall conclude the Deed of Accounting and Release, which would approximately state the following."

Just pausing there, we know that Mr Streshinsky's evidence is that the reference to B in the parenthesis he is going to say was a typo; that's not something that we accept, but that's a matter I'll have to take up with Mr Streshinsky and not let that detain us with you, Mr De Cort.

A. Mm-hm.

Q. What we then see Mr Streshinsky proposing was that the parties, including Madison, should provide the following acknowledgement, that:

"... according to the agreements dated 10 February 2000 and 15 March 2000 and oral and other arrangements, BP and B participated in the sale of shares of KrAZ, BAZ, Krasnoyarsk Hydroelectric Power Station and Achinsk Alumina Refinery and also in the establishment and capitalisation of R Holding, and at the time of the establishment of R Holding they became and still are [the] beneficiary owners of 25% of shares of R Holding, who, among other things, have the right to receive all dividends payable on the above 25% of shares in R Holding and the right to receive such shares, whereas M was and still is the nominal holder and the trustee in respect of such shares, and holds them for the benefit of B/BP."

Do you see that?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. So Mr Streshinsky, like Mr Hauser, was also suggesting that there should be a warranty, or a reference at least, to the historic beneficial title, wasn't he, Mr De Cort?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. Mr Streshinsky, like Mr Hauser, was also suggesting that there was a trust relationship, and that B/BP, whoever those persons or entities might be, were the ultimate beneficial owners of 25 per cent of Rusal, and indeed had been since 15 March 2000; that's right, isn't it?

A. That is what's written here, yes, but we will have to discuss this when we look at the next document.

- Q. Mr Streshinsky's email, to which this letter was attached in Russian, was sent to Ms Khudyk at 10.05 on Thursday morning. You can see that if you go to page 23 of the same bundle H(A)76/23.
- A. I think 1.05 on Thursday afternoon but -- which page?
- Q. Page 23. You see it says 10.05 BST?
- A. Yes, British time, that time, yes. 10.05 British time, 1.05 Moscow time.
- Q. All right. We now know from Ms Panchenko's evidence that Ms Khudyk must have shown Mr Streshinsky's email to her because Ms Panchenko has acknowledged that it was she who had a telephone conversation with Mr Streshinsky that day. Just for the transcript, that is at Day 27, page 8, line 2.

Following the telephone conversation with Ms Panchenko, Mr Streshinsky then sent through, later on 17 June 2004, a revised version of the simplified structure. You can see that if you go to page 65 H(A)76/65. That's the covering email. We have the text itself at page 57, a few pages back H(A)/76/57.

- A. Yes, I see that.
- Q. And if you have page 57, we can see that Mr Streshinsky starts this letter by saying:

"As discussed over the phone [and that's obviously a reference to the conversation with Ms Panchenko], in order to meet the representations that you previously made to the banks, please find below an alternative structure."

Do you see that, Mr De Cort?

A. I see that.

Q. And then if you go down below to paragraph 1, we can see how this has now changed. The first five lines about the agreement of the 10 and 15 March 2000 and oral and other arrangements have stayed the same. But whereas before the parties were to expressly acknowledge a trust relationship and beneficial ownership in favour of B/BP, we now see that the acknowledgement is to be this:

"M undertook to pay [to] BP and B the amounts equal to those received as income on 25 per cent of shares in R Holding, including dividends payable on such 25 per cent of shares and amounts/assets received from any sale of such 25 per cent of shares ..."

Then in brackets, one for the lawyers:

"Therefore, it was solely a right in personam rather than a trust or a right in rem -- a lawyer's comments."

Do you see that, Mr De Cort?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. So Ms Panchenko seems to have told Mr Streshinsky that the deal should be structured differently, and in particular we can see that it appeared she was unhappy with the first proposal that Mr Streshinsky was making which would have involved a formal acknowledgement of a trust relationship between Madison and B and BP, that's correct, isn't it?

A. I disagree with that.

Q. Right, can you tell me why you disagree with that?

A. Yes, I can, because you're missing one piece of the puzzle. And the piece of the puzzle you're missing is the first email that Mr Streshinsky sent to Ms Khudyk.

It is clear from the cover email, it is at H(I)6/21, it is clear from that email that the first proposal that Mr Streshinsky sent was a proposal he sent after a meeting the preceding day with people on our side, most likely Ms Panchenko and possibly also Ms Khudyk. So the very first proposal that Mr Streshinsky sent was following a discussion with our side.

Now, it is extremely unlikely that Ms Panchenko would have said on one day, "Yes, there is a trust," and then the next day called back saying, "Oh no, there is not a trust." So the more likely version of events here is that Ms Panchenko described exactly what is described in the second version of the Coalco letter, namely that there was an entitlement to get the proceeds of those shares, there was no trust, and that the lawyers on the side of Mr Streshinsky had misunderstood this.

I think that is a much more likely event -- events that took place.

Q. Well, I suggest that, in fact, what has happened is that Mr Streshinsky did understand there to be a trust arrangement but, as a result -- and I accept that it's as a result of what Ms Panchenko said to him at some point, presumably during the telephone conversation -- he has redrafted the scheme so as to suggest that the 25 per cent entitlement to which B/BP should have in the Rusal shares should be in personam and not in rem?

A. He indeed corrected it after the telephone call because Ms Panchenko called him saying, "This is not what we discussed yesterday. There is no trust. You are entitled to receive the proceeds of those shares."

Q. Do you see --

A. Otherwise Ms Panchenko would have said one day that there is a trust and the next day there is no trust. I think that is extremely unlikely.

Q. Well, if you look at the top of the letter, do you see that Mr Streshinsky says:

"As discussed over the phone, in order to meet the representations that you previously made to the banks, please find... an alternative structure."

That suggests that the reason Mr Streshinsky was given by Ms Panchenko for the change in structure was because of representations that Millhouse or Madison had previously made to banks, correct?

A. And those representations to banks represented the truth, there was never any trust, and so when Mr Streshinsky wrote it in the form of a trust, Ms Panchenko said: sorry, we can't say that because that is not a truth. The representations have also been made in line with those -- with the facts as they are, namely that these are Mr Abramovich's shares, and Mr Patarkatsishvili is only entitled to the economic benefit that he will now receive by means of those shares.

Q. If what Ms Panchenko was saying to Mr Streshinsky was, "Look, you got it wrong, what you have put down in your structure doesn't represent the true position," that is what she would have said to him. But what she has instead said to him is, "Because of representations we have made to banks we need to change the structure."

A. No, she probably said "It's entirely wrong. We amongst others have made representation to banks that contradict this".

Q. Well, I suggest the position is --

A. You're not saying that these two lines are exact -- the literal transcription of the telephone conversation between Mr Streshinsky and Ms Panchenko I would assume?

- Q. I suggest the position is perfectly clear from what Mr Streshinsky says in his letter, Mr De Cort?
- A. I disagree with that.
- Q. Can I ask you this, Mr De Cort, can you tell me, was the concern that Ms Panchenko mentioned to Mr Streshinsky the real concern, that any representations would conflict with representations previously made to banks, or was the real concern the one that we've seen recorded in your email to Ms Panchenko, following your conversation with Mr Tenenbaum, namely that you should not make any representations that would further document BB's beneficial ownership?
- A. No, we didn't want to mislead anyone. The shares were Mr Abramovich's shares, and we did not want to create any documents that would show anything different because there was no basis for that.
- Q. Can I ask you next, Mr De Cort, please, to go to page 69 in bundle H(A)76 H(A)76/69.
- A. Yes, I'm there, sorry.
- Q. It's an email from yourself to Mr Hauser timed at 19.50 hours CEST. CEST stands for what?
- A. I think it's Central European Standard Time, that's Paris, Brussels time basically.
- Q. Thank you. And you are sending this email after

Mr Streshinsky's revised letter and the telephone conversation to which it refers. We can see, looking at your email to Mr Hauser on the evening of 17 June, that you say this:

"Dear Paul.

"I tried to call you but did not get an answer at the Basic Element [office] and your mobile was answered but then shut off.

"This is where we are on the issues we discussed.

"1. There would be no personal undertakings/guarantees. Only Madison (and, if relevant, P) would warrant/undertake.

"2. There would be no warranties about beneficial ownership."

Just pausing there, up until this point, the transaction as we've seen had been proceeding happily on the basis that there were to be warranties to the effect that X and Y or BB had been the ultimate beneficial owner since 15 March 2000, that's right, isn't it?

A. No, that's not right, the transaction wasn't proceeding happily. There was barely any process. It had just started.

Q. All right. We've certainly seen that Mr Hauser was looking for that sort of warranty, that's right, isn't it?

- A. That is correct.
- Q. And we saw that your amended deed, which you sent back to Mr Mishakov on 11 June, contained a warranty about X and Y being beneficial owners, correct?
- A. In absence of information, I was just amending briefly the wording, but I had no base -- no information to know whether or not this is something we would eventually be able to give.

In a corporate transaction things are often drafted and negotiated and in the process, in parallel, or subsequently, before they get signed, people do the due diligence to make sure that the warranty can be given.

- Q. So on this day, 17 June, when Ms Panchenko, having understood what warranties were to be given, telephoned Mr Streshinsky telling him that those warranties could not be given because of representations made to the banks, you on that same day then email Mr Hauser and, certainly for the first time in any written communication that we have seen, you tell him that, contrary to the drafts which have passed between you, there are now going to be no warranties about beneficial ownership?
- A. Yes, indeed. Following our internal discussion it became clear that these were Mr Abramovich's shares. We could not give anyone the impression that they belonged to anyone else. At the same point in time, given the claims being made, I advised that we better do not give any warranties so we don't expose ourselves.

There's a number of reasons for that. Warranties about the historical beneficial ownership I've never seen in any other transaction, they were quite unusual, particularly also about the ultimate beneficial ownership. Furthermore typically warranties are limited to the amount of the purchase price to be received. Here the purchase price on Mr Abramovich's side was zero, so we wanted zero exposure. We were willing to assist, to pass(?) the shares along, but we were not going to take on additional liabilities.

- Q. Would it be right to assume, Mr De Cort, that what has happened here is that Ms Panchenko, as well as speaking to Mr Streshinsky on 17 June and telling him that the beneficial ownership warranties would not be given, also speaks to you on 17 June and told you that you were to make it clear that no beneficial ownership warranties would be given?
- A. I think it follows from my email on 16 June that I wrote to her and that we've looked at previously that, yes, we did have a discussion. I don't think that she specifically told me not to give the warranties, that was something that more likely is a decision that I took as the lawyer -- or not more likely, I'm quite certain about that. But yes, we had a discussion overall about the transaction.

- Q. Can we then go back to the document at H(I) tab 4, please H(I)/04/17. This is where you set out variants A and B. She obviously has come back to you and said, "Go with variant B." That's right, isn't it?
- A. No. If you see from the cover email, it's very clear that I indicate my preference to go for variant B, and then as a project manager of course I discuss that with her and that's the way we proceed.
- Q. Of course, from this point on, it is fair to say, is it not, that any possibility of Mr Berezovsky being mentioned in any contractual document simply disappears?
- A. There was no basis for that.
- Q. Okay.
- A. And actually, as we've seen before, when we looked at a document at H(I), tab 11, I at some point in time suggested to make a reference to the press reports but eventually that got taken out.

And for reference, for the transcript, the document, the deed of settlement, is at H(A)86/53, that's where Madison gives the warranty about no claims.

- Q. Now, the position as to what could be said about beneficial ownership remained an issue between you and the people acting for Mr Deripaska for a little while after that, didn't it, Mr De Cort?

A. Yes, because we had to deal with the allocation of risk. Warranties are ultimately an allocation of risk between parties to a transaction.

Q. They, in general terms, wanted some sort of representation or statement about beneficial ownership and were not content for nothing at all to be said, that's right, isn't it?

A. Yes, but we made sure that in no document there was a document that could possibly be shown to banks or elsewhere, there would be any reference -- that there would be anything included that was untrue. Therefore this was done in separate documents, the deed of acknowledgement only between the three principals who knew with their eyes wide open that this was solely for purposes of risk allocation.

Q. Do you recall, Mr De Cort, that the position regarding the beneficial ownership warranty started to be resolved following a telephone call between yourself and Mr Mishakov which took place on 2 July 2004? You refer to this very briefly in footnote 46, page --

A. I recall that there was somewhere a reference to a phone call, yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What paragraph?

A. I don't recall that particular phone call but --

MR RABINOWITZ: It's footnote 46 on page 288, my Lady
E2/09/288.

A. This phone call is purely a reconstruction.

Q. Okay. We can turn up the email that I think you're reconstructing from, if you go to bundle H(A)79 at 139, please H(A)79/139.

A. Can I put this back?

Q. Yes, you can, sorry.

So this is an email from yourself to Mr Mishakov dated 6 July 2004. Can I ask you just to read that email briefly to yourself, please. (Pause)

A. Yes, I've read it.

Q. Thank you. So what we can see you saying here, on the second paragraph, is that on Friday, that is 2 July 2004, the issue which was identified was that Mr Mishakov was concerned that Millhouse would say one thing now but subsequently say another. Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. And in order to address that concern, you explained that, while you were not prepared to make any statement about beneficial ownership for the past and in particular you were not ready to make any representation or warranty, you were willing to sign a document, deposition, which would freeze the position and not allow Mr Abramovich subsequently to say something inconsistent; that's right, isn't it?

A. That is correct, and that shows exactly how open we were about this.

Q. If you then look at paragraph 47 of your witness statement, page 288 E2/09/288, you tell us, this is five lines from the end, that this was a matter that you may have discussed -- or that you believe you discussed with Mr Tenenbaum and had agreed with him as an appropriate way forward. Correct?

A. Yes.

Q. In this email to Mr Mishakov at page 139 H(A)79/139, you tell him that you can live with him turning the deposition into a deed of acknowledgement but that you don't want to include any reliance language because you were concerned that, by doing so, this might effectively turn it into a warranty which is what you wanted to avoid, correct?

A. Yes. As I said before, my purpose was, although I knew exactly well that these were the shares belonging to Mr Abramovich, my purpose was to avoid any type of liability.

Q. Then with regard to content --

A. But at the same point in time, to make it clear what the facts were, I was willing to enter into a deed of acknowledgement to explain what the facts were.

Q. Then with regard to content, you say that you had indicated that you could state only that you had dealt with one person, and who that person was, and you set out a sample statement, correct?

A. That's correct.

Q. We can see from that sample statement that you were proposing -- just looking at the last few lines of it, at this stage it simply said that it should say that:

"... [Mr Abramovich] only dealt and interacted with..."

And then you were going to give a name, in connection with the 25 per cent stake of Rusal. That's the last two lines on page 139.

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. And the name that I think you were contemplating was Mr Patarkatsishvili's name at this stage, correct?

A. Yes, indeed. I was told at some point in time, mid-June probably, that the transaction was to compensate him for his involvement in the original Rusal acquisition -- aluminium acquisition.

Q. Well, I suggest to you that that's not true but that's a matter that I've already taken up with Mr Abramovich.

Just again staying with this document, what you were offering of course did not touch at all on the question of beneficial ownership. The statement that you were proposing at this stage did not include, you will see that this comes in later, into the final version of the deed of acknowledgement, a statement that whoever the name says is the beneficial owner of the shares, is the beneficial owner of the shares.

That was not at this stage something that you were offering, do you see that?

A. That is correct, yes.

Q. If you then go to page 140, the following page H(A)79/140, we can see what Mr Mishakov's reaction was to your suggestion, Mr De Cort. His email back to you later that day, as you see, says:

"Dear Andre.

"I have taken out any statements concerning the transfer of the Shares. The only thing which is left is the confirmation of the beneficial ownership. Andre, we have not talked about the confirmation of whom [Mr Abramovich] was dealing with, we are not interested in his statement of his interactions. We need the confirmation of beneficial ownership. We cannot take anything else, otherwise the whole matter becomes useless. Please contact your principal to discuss my proposal. I hope that my approach toward compromise will be met from your side. If you want I can talk to Eugene or Irina myself."

So Mr Mishakov was saying that your statement about Mr Abramovich's interactions did not go far enough, it needed also to go on to say something about beneficial ownership, correct?

A. That is correct.

Q. And Mr Mishakov was suggesting that, if necessary, he could talk to Eugene, presumably that's Mr Tenenbaum?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. Or -- Ms Panchenko would be Irina, wouldn't it?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. Can we just see then what happens next. Can you go next please to bundle H(A)81 at page 145, please H(A)81/145.

A. Can I put this bundle away?

Q. Yes, I think so. If you get rid of everything but your witness statement and H(A)81 you'll be fine.

A. H(I) also?

Q. You can put that to one side.

So at H(A)81, page 145, we have an email chain. Can we focus on the first in time email, which is the one that starts towards the bottom of the page, and that's an email which you sent to Mr Hauser on 9 July 2004.

A. Yes, indeed. Yes, I see that.

- Q. We can see that you say to Mr Hauser, who is acting for Mr Deripaska of course, that you have been trying to come up with something that would be acceptable both to Mr Deripaska and to Mr Abramovich. You then set out your proposed wording, correct?
- A. Yes.
- Q. What you then suggest is that Mr Abramovich should state and acknowledge that he has reviewed the warranties and representations in clause 3.1.1 of the deed of release. That was of course a reference to the warranties and representations that were to be made by Mr Patarkatsishvili in the deed of release, correct?
- A. Yes.
- Q. And what you indicate that you will consider Mr Abramovich saying about this, this is at clause 2.1, or point 2.1, is that, to the best of Mr Abramovich's knowledge and belief such warranties and representations are true and correct in all material respects, correct?
- A. Correct.
- Q. This was the genesis, was it not, of the acknowledgement that we ultimately see whereby Mr Abramovich acknowledges that whomever Mr Patarkatsishvili says is the beneficial owner of the 25 per cent stake in the Rusal shares, that person is indeed the beneficial owner of those shares, and indeed had been since March 2000?

A. This was my proposal that had not yet been reviewed internally, but he was trying between the lawyers to see whether he could come to some compromise that at the lawyers' level we could possibly find agreement with an intention then to submit it to the principals, yes.

Q. I follow that, Mr De Cort, but this was, was it not, the genesis of what eventually became the acknowledgement that we ultimately see?

A. The second part of that acknowledgement, yes.

Q. Then if we just look at the top of page 146 H(A)81/146, we can see that you also wanted to add, so that's over the page, you wanted to add in this language after Mr Abramovich's acknowledgement:

"For the avoidance of doubt the statements and acknowledgements in this Clause 2 do not constitute a representation or warranties by [Mr Abramovich], but are given as part of a due diligence investigation into historic dealings with the Business Interests referred to in said Clause 3.1.1 of the Deed of Release."

Again this reflects, does it not, your anxiety that this acknowledgement should not have the status of a warranty and be actionable at Mr Deripaska's behest?

A. Yes, that's correct. As I've explained to you, we were engaging in a risk allocation exercise here.

Q. And then if we look back to page 145, just to see

Mr Hauser's response, page 145, he makes it clear in fact in an email which he is sending to Mr Mishakov, you see it says "Dear Stalbek", it's obviously gone to you by accident. He says:

"The avoidance of doubt stuff is not acceptable. If Andre deletes that, I think we can live with the rest of it."

A. I see that.

Q. If you then go to page 147, same bundle H(A)81/147, you then very politely, if you look right at the bottom of the page, the first email in the chain, you wrote back to Mr Hauser and you pointed out his mistake.

A. Sorry, where is that?

Q. If you look right at the bottom of page 147, you say:

"It seems you have replied this to me rather than forwarding [it] to Stalbek."

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. Then you say:

"I'm not sure why we can't express what we've been discussing since the beginning, [that is] that these are not representations and warranties."

This then leads to Mr Hauser sending directly to you, the same day, a further email, which is the one we see at the top of page 147, in which he explains why he's not happy with the avoidance of doubt language that you wanted to include.

Can you read that to yourself, please, Mr De Cort?

A. The whole email, you mean?

Q. There are only three points. It's just points 1 to 3 at 147. I can take you through it if you prefer.

A. No, I'll read it, thank you. (Pause)

Yes, I've read it.

Q. So Mr Hauser's first point was that the statement you were proposing was not entirely accurate, the information is not being sought just for due diligence purposes but to nail down Mr Abramovich's position in the event of a subsequent dispute. Correct? That's what his first point says, is it not?

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. Then his second point is that, as soon as you started putting in the document what the statement was not, he would have to start by specifying what it positively was. By way of example, he suggests that he would want to include an estoppel, possibly liability for any tortious misrepresentation in the event that Mr Abramovich was found to have told a deliberate untruth, and Mr Hauser says that he doesn't want to go round the houses with you on that one, correct?

A. That is correct.

Q. Then Mr Hauser's third point was that the principals had not agreed to put any gloss on the statement, in his view for good reason, given the "can of worms" that would otherwise be opened up as per his first and second points. Do you see that?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. We can see what happens next if you go to page 150 of the same bundle, please H(A)81/150.

Again, just starting with the email towards the bottom of the page, we see that you again reply to Mr Hauser's email and you suggest an alternative acknowledgement which would be made on behalf of Mr Abramovich.

What you suggest that Mr Abramovich might acknowledge instead is that -- "BP" is obviously Mr Patarkatsishvili, so:

"[Mr Patarkatsishvili] and his Affiliates and Associated Persons were the only persons (other than [Rusal Holdings, Mr Deripaska] and their respective Affiliates and Associated Persons) with whom he and his Affiliates and Associated Persons had any dealings, arrangements or understandings with respect to the [Rusal Holding] Shares (including predecessor shares) and the interests and business represented thereby."

Do you see that?

A. Yes, I see that.

- Q. The reason you proposed that alternative wording for the acknowledgement, Mr De Cort, was that you knew that this was in fact closer to the truth, because you knew or at least very strongly suspected, as a result of your involvement in the source of funds letter that we saw earlier, that Mr Abramovich had not only had dealings and arrangements with Mr Patarkatsishvili in respect of the 25 per cent stake in the Rusal group, but that he had also had dealings and arrangements with companies associated with Mr Berezovsky; that's right, isn't it?
- A. No, I did not know that at all at the time.
- Q. And indeed you understood that the parties that had earlier been identified as BB were the ultimate beneficial owners of the 25 per cent stake in Rusal although you did not know if they might also turn out to be fronting for someone else. We saw that, you will recall, in the document you disclosed on Friday, the document at H(I)/01/1.
- A. I was just in abstracto, in a vacuum, making some comments on the language of a warranty. I had no knowledge at that point in time.
- Q. And that is why you were trying to propose, or you were proposing, this alternative wording for the deed of acknowledgement?
- A. No, that is not correct. This alternative wording was basically based on what I was told internally that the only people Mr Abramovich ever dealt with was Mr Patarkatsishvili.

Q. Or his affiliates and associated persons?

A. No, he dealt with Mr Patarkatsishvili, but we made eventually the language broader, yes, that's correct.

Q. We can see how Mr Hauser reacted when you tried to explain the scope of Mr Abramovich's acknowledgement to people other than Mr Patarkatsishvili. If you look at page 150 H(A)81/150, he writes back and he says:

"Dear Andre.

"Thanks. The problem with this is the use of the term 'Affiliates' and 'Associated Persons' which raises again the relationship between BP and B2."

Of course, you understood that Mr Hauser, referring to B2, was very likely referring to Mr Berezovsky, correct?

A. That is correct.

Q. Mr Hauser then goes on:

"For example, might B2 [Mr Berezovsky] argue that he was a 'predecessor' or a 'successor' to BP. Might it be argued that the Business Interest was held on behalf of some other company of which BP and B2 were joint shareholders, and that the company was thus an 'Affiliate' of BP as being under BP's control due to an 'agreement with any other Person'; eg, B2

[Mr Berezovsky]?"

And that was true of Blue Waters, was it not?

A. Until this date they still don't know who actually owns Blue Waters, I know it's been disclosed but I just don't have any focus. I know it was one or the other, I don't know.

Q. And it was true of Rich Brown which was the other company in respect of which a source of funds letter was sent?

A. I didn't know at the time, I didn't recall the Rich Brown letter, but eventually I -- I've apparently looked at it at the time, but I had no knowledge whatsoever who was associated with that company.

Q. Just looking at the final paragraph, he says:

"You appreciate my problem; I'm not trying to be paranoid about the world at large nor am I raising theoretical issues about things that are unlikely ever to occur. I have a specific issue that I need to address, which is [Mr Berezovsky]."

So Mr Hauser was adamant, wasn't he, that he was not now going to allow you or Mr Abramovich to row back on the acknowledgement you'd previously suggested which involved saying that Mr Patarkatsishvili was the only person with whom Mr Abramovich had dealt and had understandings?

- A. Mr Hauser has made it clear from 15 June that he, as a result of the press articles, he had an issue, he was on notice of certain claims that were being made in the press, and we were all in a vacuum about that. We had never received any type of letter or clarification whatsoever from Mr Berezovsky saying that he had a claim, he just made some allegations in a newspaper. It's a form of blackmail.
- Q. Mr Hauser was resisting -- you're now putting forward a different acknowledgement on behalf of Mr Abramovich whereby Mr Abramovich acknowledged that he had dealings not just with Mr Patarkatsishvili, but also that he had dealings with Mr Patarkatsishvili's affiliates and associates, correct?
- A. Yes, he seemed to have problems with that.
- Q. And you would obviously have preferred to use this "affiliates and associates" language, and I suggest that that was because of your involvement with the source of funds letters; you dispute that?
- A. I dispute that. At that point in time I was not at all thinking about a source of funds letter. I did not associate one with the other.
- Q. In fact, Mr De Cort, although you say you were not thinking of the source of funds letter, the source of funds letter in relation to Rich Brown was happening at around the same time as you were trying to deal with the beneficial ownership warranties, was it not?

A. That might be correct but I was not associating one with the other.

Q. Well, Ms Khudyk tells us that she referred that correspondence to you to deal with.

A. As I said, I might very well have dealt with that at that point in time, but I was not putting one and one together. Rich Brown is not an entity that is ever mentioned in connection with Rusal group transaction. I didn't know who was the owner or were the owners of Rich Brown, and I didn't put that together with Rusal at all.

Q. They were being paid with the Rusal dividends, were they not?

A. Yes, that was a payment mechanism.

Q. From Rusal, or Rual --

A. From Rual I believe.

Q. Which is the trading arm of Rusal, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. But you didn't put two and two together?

A. One and one together, yes. I don't know; my involvement with the Rich Brown letter was very limited, I think there may be only one email or something. Really this letter didn't go anywhere. I might have at some point in time shown a draft, made an initial round of comments on it, and that was it.

Q. Well, there's more than one email, Mr De Cort, but I'm not going to take you through all of those.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Choose your moment for the break, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, now is as good a time as any.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well, ten minutes.

(3.14 pm)

(A short break)

(3.30 pm)

MR RABINOWITZ: Now, in paragraph 53 of your statement E2/09/291, Mr De Cort, you tell us that before you signed off on the final wording for Mr Abramovich's statement in the deed of acknowledgement you had to get the approval of Ms Panchenko, who was the project manager; is that right?

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. And you also explain, still at paragraph 53, that Ms Panchenko also made it clear that you would also need to get Mr Tenenbaum's approval before she could sign off as project manager, is that correct?

A. That is correct.

Q. Did you, so far as you can recall, seek Mr Tenenbaum and Ms Panchenko's approval?

A. I'm sure I did, yes.

Q. Can we just have a look at the final wording for the deed of acknowledgement. You set it out at paragraph 54 and we can take it from there:

"[Mr Abramovich] states and acknowledges to [Mr Deripaska] that with respect to the Shares (including predecessor shares) and the Business Interests represented thereby (as defined in the Deed of Release) (other than [Mr Deripaska], the Company and their respective Affiliates and Associated Persons), he had only had discussions, arrangements and understandings with, and he only interacted and [dealt] with [Mr Patarkatsishvili]."

Of course Mr De Cort, as a result of the Blue Waters transaction and the source of funds letter, you were aware that Mr Abramovich's company, Madison, through which the interests in Rusal were held, had been involved in arrangements involving dividends declared for the benefit of entities, and I suggest you knew that those were entities associated with Mr Berezovsky as well as Mr Patarkatsishvili?

A. No, I did not know that at the time.

Q. I suggest also, as we've seen from the document disclosed late last week, that you understood that Millhouse's understanding was that BB, which you knew to be a reference to Mr Berezovsky, was indeed the ultimate beneficial owner and had been that since 15 March 2000, but that nothing should be done to further document that beneficial ownership?

A. No. As we've discussed this morning, BB stood for the beneficiaries of B company, and the further documentation refers just to the fact that drafts had been prepared without our involvement, referring to beneficial ownership interests of various people. After my internal discussion it became clear what the real situation was, and then indeed there was no reason, no justification, no basis on which we would further document that.

Q. I suggest that you were in fact aware of the arrangements and understandings relating to the Rusal shares which involved not just Mr Patarkatsishvili but companies which you either knew or strongly suspected to be associated with Mr Berezovsky?

A. No, that is not correct. Mr Berezovsky's first association with Rusal was from the press article that Mr Hauser showed me.

Q. Well, I suggest that what happened is that you agreed on this occasion to be overruled by your superior, Mr Tenenbaum, didn't you, Mr De Cort? You felt you were not in any position to question his judgment as to what should be said here? And that you let the deed of acknowledgement go through in its final form even though you knew that it did not accurately state the position?

A. No, I was told that Mr Abramovich only ever had dealings with Mr Patarkatsishvili in respect of the aluminium assets.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, I have no further questions for Mr De Cort.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR MALEK: I have no questions, my Lady.

MR ADKIN: I have no questions, my Lady.

Re-examination by MS DAVIES

MS DAVIES: Mr De Cort, just two matters. First of all, you were asked this morning about your email exchange with Mr Tenenbaum on 12 July in relation to the warranty about the basis of claims in the public domain. You said that eventually a warranty that there are no such claims was given?

A. Yes.

Q. And this afternoon, you referred to a document, I just want to check that we've all seen it and that it's the right document. It's H(A)86/53, if you could be given that. H(A)86/53.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is this the reference made at [draft]

T30/62 by the witness, because I have a question like that?

MS DAVIES: Yes, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It's [draft] page 62 of the transcript, that's where I picked up the point.

MS DAVIES: That's right, my Lady. Then this afternoon, during the course of his evidence, Mr De Cort came back to this issue and -- I'll just find the reference -- made a reference to the document at H(A)86/53 in this context.

I can't find the reference to where it is -- [draft] page 123 I'm being told.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I remember it.

MS DAVIES: So if we could just look at H(A)86, page 53, which is the document you referred to this afternoon where you said:

"... that's where Madison gives the warranty about ... claims."

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. Could you just --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Hang on, can I just get there, please.

MS DAVIES: I do apologise, my Lady.

MR RABINOWITZ: Just before one goes off on a false premise, Mr De Cort's evidence, as I understood it, was about giving that warranty to Eagle Capital, whereas these seem to be to a different company.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, you tell us, please, Mr De Cort.

If you want to scroll back through the transcript, the first page where I certainly had a note to ask you about it, if counsel didn't, was at [draft] page 62.

Have you scrolled back on the screen? You have to press the stop button.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, go back to [draft] page 62, just the last few lines of page 61, Mr Rabinowitz says at line 24 on [draft] page 61:

"You see, I suggest that you were well aware, and indeed Mr Tenenbaum was well aware, that there was a basis to these claims and that is what explains why Mr Tenenbaum is telling you, as I suggest he is, that we should not say that it has no basis, but you disagree with that, do you?"

You say:

"I disagree with that because, eventually, we did give a warranty that there are no claims."

I'm just interested in which document you were referring to when you said that?

A. I thought it was in the deed of settlement but, of course, yes indeed there is a contract with the Cliren party on behalf of Mr Patarkatsishvili, and I'm just trying to recollect whether there was another document that we signed with a deed of release of some sort that we signed with the Deripaska side but I'm not sure.

Maybe I was mistaken.

MS DAVIES: Can I take this in stages, Mr De Cort. Can you first of all point us, in the deed of settlement, to the clause you had in mind when you referred to it this afternoon.

A. The clause I was referring to is clause 3.

Q. Any particular part of clause 3?

A. Clause 3, sub-clause (iii), where I refer in the third to last line, "rights and claims of third parties".

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Sub-clause 3?

A. Clause 3, sub-clause (iii).

MS DAVIES: And that we can see from the beginning of clause 3 is a representation and warranty provided by M, who is?

A. Madison.

Q. To B, who is B?

A. B is Cliren, Mr Patarkatsishvili's company. And the representation is made to the best of the knowledge of Madison and Madison's affiliates and associated persons, and that includes Mr Abramovich. Because the affiliates or associated persons definition includes the ultimate beneficial owners. The associated persons definition on page 2, top of page 2, means a party's ultimate beneficial owners. So it basically says that to the best of Madison and Mr Abramovich's knowledge there are no rights and claims of third parties.

Q. And then if you could look at --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So are you referring to 3(i), are you?

A. No, 3(iii).

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: 3(iii), thank you.

A. At the end of the third line:

"... to the best of [Madison's] and [Madison's] Affiliates' and Associated Persons' knowledge [which includes Mr Abramovich], rights and claims of third parties ..."

Q. If you could now be given bundle H(A)77, at page 109, you should find an email from Mr Streshinsky to Mr Hauser and yourself H(A)77/109.

Do you have that?

A. Yes, I have that.

Q. And it says:

"In the meantime please see attached summary of open points drafted by Artem."

And refers to an attached file, "Table of Warranty Issues Eng.doc".

If you turn forward to page 110 H(A)77/110.

A. Yes.

Q. You see a heading "Issue 1: Scope of warranty of title"?

A. Yes.

Q. And three columns, and there's a column headed "M". Who does M represent in this document?

A. Madison.

Q. And could you read that? (Pause)

A. Aloud?

Q. Now, can you recall whether or not this statement of Madison's position was accurate as at 23 June 2004?

A. Yes, eventually I think there is a further version of this document that was circulated after our conference call in which the square brackets were removed from the position of Madison, and that I'd signed off on that.

Q. Thank you.

Just one other matter, Mr De Cort, you were just asked some questions this afternoon about the payments to Blue Waters and Rich Brown which you had some involvement in, the source of funds letters.

A. Yes.

Q. Can you just clarify for us whether those payments to Blue Waters or Rich Brown involved payments of dividends by Rusal or Rusal Holding Limited so far as you are aware?

A. The one to Blue Waters, which was in 2003, was from Rual Trade. The one in 2004 I really have no recollection.

I mean, it never got off the ground so I really didn't go into the details of who was making which payments, or would have been making which payments.

Q. And can you help us with the question of whether there was a corporate relationship, and if so what, as between Rusal and Rual?

A. I know that Rual was a trading arm and I think that eventually it was incorporated into Rusal Holding but I don't know exactly the form of that restructuring.

MS DAVIES: Thank you very much, Mr De Cort.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I have no questions. Thank you very much indeed for coming along to give your evidence.

THE WITNESS: Thank you.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You may be released.

(The witness withdrew)

Are you going to start with the next witness tomorrow?

MR SUMPTION: Yes, tomorrow we are. He is appearing under a witness summons and he will be here for a clean start at 10.15.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. Apart from Mr Bulygin who, as you've indicated, you will be applying for leave to serve as a hearsay notice, that is the end of the evidence, is it?

MR SUMPTION: That is right. I had taken it from this morning that in the absence of opposition from my learned friend your Ladyship was giving me leave to rely on that as a hearsay statement.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is that right, Mr Rabinowitz?

MR RABINOWITZ: That is right.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well, fine.

Okay, so it's not anticipated that I'll be sitting this Friday, is that right?

MR SUMPTION: That is right.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm doing another case on Monday, 16 January, which has been in the diary, it's a criminal case, for some time so I won't start on the Monday.

I think my clerk has sent an email.

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Tomorrow, do we need to start at 10.15? I'm in your hands if you'd like to --

MR RABINOWITZ: I don't think we need to. 10.30 would be adequate.

MR SUMPTION: I'm sure that's fine.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: 10.30.

(10.30 am)

MS DAVIES: My Lady, our next witness is Mr Hauser.

Mr Hauser, my Lady, you will recall, was the subject of Mr Stanley's memorandum last week.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I have it here.

MS DAVIES: Mr Stanley is here again today to represent Mr Deripaska's interests. We have had a discussion since the exchange of memoranda, as a result of which we don't think there's an issue that we need to trouble my Lady with and we believe that the matters we indicated we wished to be carved out are agreed, and we will obviously just have to see how we proceed.

Of course there has been no waiver of privilege and Mr Hauser is not authorised to waive privilege in his evidence, and I certainly am very conscious of that in the questions I will be asking.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay, if an issue arises I'll have to deal with it, but it's very difficult to deal with these kind of issues, as it were, of high principle rather than dealing with a specific question, so we'll just wait and see where we get to.

MS DAVIES: Absolutely, my Lady. Mr Hauser is responding to a summons both from my clients and from the Anisimov defendants, Freshfields, but it's been agreed that I should take him first and we'll see where we get to.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You're taking him in-chief?

MS DAVIES: I am, my Lady. There is no witness statement.

So I will call, if it's convenient, Mr Hauser.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. Very well.

MR PAUL HAUSER (sworn)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Please sit down, Mr Hauser, if you'd like to.

Examination-in-chief by MS DAVIES

MS DAVIES: Good morning, Mr Hauser.

A. Good morning.

Q. Could you please state your full name?

A. Paul Edward Hauser.

Q. And your address?

A. 88 Wood Street, London.

Q. And your occupation?

A. Solicitor.

Q. Which firm do you practise with currently?

A. Bryan Cave.

Q. And how long have you been with that firm?

A. Since 1982.

Q. In 2000, was one of your clients Mr Oleg Deripaska?

A. Yes, it was.

Q. And did he remain one of your clients subsequently?

A. Yes, he did. He's my client to this day.

- Q. If you can be given bundle H(A)18 at page 124 H(A)18/124, you should see there a document headed "Share Purchase and Sale Agreement SA/SN-01..." dated 15 March 2000. Do you have that document?
- A. I have that.
- Q. Have you seen that document before?
- A. Yes.
- Q. Were you involved in the negotiation of this document?
- A. Yes.
- Q. Looking at the document, you can see that the two parties are, firstly, Runicom Limited and, secondly, GSA (Cyprus) Limited. Can you recall whose company GSA (Cyprus) Limited was?
- A. That was Mr Deripaska's company.
- Q. And Runicom Limited?
- A. Was Mr Abramovich's company.
- Q. On whose behalf were you involved in these negotiations?
- A. Mr Deripaska.
- Q. Can you recall when you first became involved in the negotiations of this agreement?
- A. That would have been on the Saturday prior to the date on which this agreement was signed. I think 15 March was probably the following Wednesday so I would have been involved from the Saturday morning.
- Q. Did you attend any meetings in London as part of negotiations of this agreement?

A. Yes, I attended a meeting in the morning of Saturday at the Four Seasons Hotel with Stalbek Mishakov and Mr Tenenbaum.

Q. Who was Mr Mishakov?

A. Mr Mishakov is, or was at the time, Mr Deripaska's in-house Russian lawyer.

Q. And who did you understand Mr Tenenbaum to be?

A. I understood him to be a representative of Mr Abramovich.

Q. Was there anyone else present at that meeting?

A. Yes, I have -- had at the time a partner, Walter White, who accompanied me to the meeting, so there were four of us present.

Q. Staying with this agreement, the 15 March agreement, did you subsequently attend any further meetings for the purposes of negotiating its terms?

A. Insofar as you're asking about meetings that I may have attended involving Mr Abramovich's representatives, the answer to that is yes. I attended a quite lengthy meeting in Moscow on the Tuesday afternoon following the meeting in London, which meeting lasted well into the evening and into the small hours of the morning.

Q. Who was present at that meeting?

A. Well, it was Mr Mishakov and me on behalf of Mr Deripaska, and it was Mr Tenenbaum, Andrey Osipov and Ken Schneider on behalf of Mr Abramovich.

- Q. And that, you say, was on the Tuesday afternoon following the meeting in London. Would that have been the 13th or 14th --
- A. I don't have a calendar so I remember by days of the week. It was the Tuesday afternoon, the meeting would have started I think round about 4 o'clock.
- Q. And it lasted for approximately how long?
- A. Twelve or 13 hours, I think we finished about 5.00 am on the Wednesday morning.
- Q. Can you recall whether or not during that meeting you discussed anything about where your respective principals were?
- A. Yes, I was told that Mr Deripaska was -- well, I should stop for a minute. The meeting on Tuesday was held in the Sibneft offices in Moscow in a conference room on the ground floor, actually on a mezzanine floor in the offices. I was told that Mr Deripaska and Eugene Shvidler were upstairs in Mr Shvidler's office although I didn't see them during the course of the negotiations.

The reason that I knew that to be the case was because, as we negotiated during the night and into the morning, as issues arose respecting the agreement, deal points, then either Mr Mishakov or Mr Tenenbaum or both of them would go upstairs and would get the principals, in this case Mr Deripaska and Mr Shvidler, to reach agreement on whatever the point was, and then they would come downstairs, tell Mr Schneider and me, we would incorporate it into the document and we would continue our negotiations.

- Q. I've just been told the Tuesday was the 14 March in fact. So you had a meeting overnight on the Tuesday?
- A. Yes, the meeting was on the Tuesday, starting at about 4 o'clock, and it ran into the final small hours of the morning on the Wednesday when this agreement was finalised and was taken off to be signed.
- Q. Were you involved in any other meetings prior to this agreement being signed with representatives of Runicom?
- A. Not with representatives of Runicom, no.
- Q. Focusing solely on your communications with representatives of Runicom or Mr Abramovich, prior to the signing of this agreement, the 15 March agreement, can you recall whether or not any mention was made in those communications of Mr Berezovsky?
- A. No. No mention was made.
- Q. And the same question about Mr Patarkatsishvili?
- A. No. No mention was made of Mr Patarkatsishvili.
- Q. Could you now be given bundle H(A)19.

A. Can I put this away?

Q. Yes, of course. And go to page 22 H(A)19/22. You should see there an amended and restated share purchase and sale agreement dated 15 May 2000. Do you have that document?

A. I do.

Q. Do you recognise this agreement?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you involved in the negotiations that led to this agreement?

A. Yes.

Q. On whose behalf were you involved in those negotiations?

A. Mr Deripaska.

Q. Who did you deal with as a counterparty for the purposes of those negotiations?

A. At this stage it was almost entirely Mr Schneider on behalf of Mr Abramovich.

Q. Now, focusing solely on your communications with Mr Schneider or any other representative of Mr Abramovich in the context of negotiating this agreement, can you recall whether or not any mention was made in those communications of Mr Berezovsky?

A. No mention was ever made of Mr Berezovsky.

Q. And the same question about Mr Patarkatsishvili?

A. No mention was ever made of Mr Patarkatsishvili.

Q. Could you put that away and now be given bundle H(A)64 at page 18 H(A)64/18.

You should have a share purchase and sale agreement, this time dated 17 September 2003.

A. Yes, I have it.

Q. If you see in paragraph 1, this refers to the vendor and the purchaser being identified in schedule 1, which you'll find at page 25 H(A)64/25. And we see reference to two companies, Madison Equities Corporation and Baufinanz Limited, page 25.

A. Sorry, are you sure? I don't think it's on -- we're talking about -- this first one, I think the reference is actually on page 8 -- oh, you're looking at the document --

Q. Schedule 1.

A. You're looking at the document numbering on the bottom right-hand side?

Q. Yes, I am. Sorry, Mr Hauser.

A. Yes, okay. Page 8 of the agreement.

Q. Schedule 1: vendor, party 1, Madison Equities. Purchaser, party 2, Baufinanz.

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. Do you recognise this agreement?

A. Yes.

Q. Can you recall whose company Madison Equities

Corporation was?

A. Yes, it was Mr Abramovich's company.

Q. And Baufinanz Limited?

A. Was Mr Deripaska's company.

Q. Were you involved in the negotiation of this agreement?

A. Yes.

Q. On whose behalf were you involved in those negotiations?

A. Mr Deripaska.

Q. Can you recall who your counterparty was for the purposes of negotiating this agreement?

A. Yes. It was again Mr Schneider as Mr Abramovich's lawyer. He was -- the person who dealt with the deal points was Andrey Osipov on behalf of Mr Abramovich.

Q. Again, focusing solely on your communications with Mr Schneider, Osipov or any other representative of Mr Abramovich, for the purposes of negotiating this agreement, can you recall whether or not any mention was made in those communications of Mr Berezovsky?

A. No mention was ever made of Mr Berezovsky.

Q. And again the same question about Mr Patarkatsishvili?

A. No. No mention was ever made of Mr Patarkatsishvili.

Q. Right, you can put that one away.

If we go to bundle H(A)85 at page 8 H(A)85/8. You should find another share purchase and sale agreement, this one dated 20 July 2004 between, again, a vendor and purchaser identified in schedule 1, and schedule 1 is at page 16.

A. Yes, I have it.

Q. It's not very clear, but the vendor is identified as Cliren Investments Ltd and the purchaser Eagle Capital Group?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. Do you recognise this agreement?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you involved in the negotiations that led to this agreement?

A. Yes.

Q. If you could just leave that one open and could also be given bundle H(A)84 at page 64 H(A)84/64.

You should here have a document entitled "Beneficial Owner Deed of Release DR/BP", again dated 20 July 2004?

A. Yes, I have that.

Q. Do you recognise that agreement?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you involved in the negotiations that led to this agreement?

A. Yes.

Q. If you could turn in this bundle to page 206 H(A)84/206 you should have another agreement dated 20 July 2004 at page 206?

A. A deed of acknowledgement I think.

Q. Yes, a deed of acknowledgement between Mr Abramovich and Mr Deripaska. Do you recognise that agreement?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you involved in the negotiation of that agreement?

A. Yes.

Q. Can you recall when you first became involved in the negotiations that led to the three agreements dated 20 July 2004 that we've just looked at?

A. In September of 2004. Oh, I'm sorry, no, this is --

Q. These are dated July --

A. These are July 2004. No, I first became involved in this -- I was first instructed, I should say, on 31 May 2004.

The first negotiations was in respect of a meeting that was held in Moscow, I believe the following Friday. Again, I don't know the exact date, I only remember by dates of the week -- days of the week.

Q. I have a calendar for 2004 which has the days of the week --

A. That might be helpful if you could show that to me.

Q. -- if that might assist, if I could hand that up.

(Handed)

A. Yes. The -- I was first instructed on 31 May, which was a Bank Holiday, I remember that, and the first meeting

I held with -- in terms of negotiations or representatives of anyone from the other side was on Friday 11 June.

Q. Okay. I'll come to that meeting in a minute, if I may, but just to establish certain other things first.

As part of the negotiations that you undertook in relation to these three agreements dated 20 July 2004, did you personally have contact with anyone who you understood to be representing Mr Abramovich?

A. Yes.

Q. Who was that?

A. Mr De Cort.

Q. Anyone else?

A. From Mr Abramovich, no.

Q. If you could please be given bundle H(A)74.

A. Shall I leave these open?

Q. I think you -- actually if you just put them to one side.

A. Okay.

Q. H(A)74, page 129 H(A)74/129. You should have in front of you an article published in the Moscow Times on June 3 2004?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. Do you recognise this article?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. When do you think you first saw this article?

A. It would have been early in the week that I went to Moscow, so I believe it was about Tuesday, 8 June.

Q. Do you recall whether or not you read it at that time?

A. Yes, I did.

Q. If you go forward in bundle H(A)74 to page 219 H(A)74/219, you should find a memorandum to Mr Mishakov described as emanating from you, Mr Hauser, "Paul Hauser".

A. I see that.

Q. Do you recognise that memorandum?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Were you the author of that memorandum?

A. Yes, I was.

Q. Now, I understand that this memorandum would once have been a privileged document and I want to make clear I do not want to pry into any privileged matters, but I do wish to ask you a few questions about any communications you had with Mr Abramovich's representatives about the matters covered in the memo. I just make that clear at the outset.

If you could read the first two paragraphs of the memorandum. (Pause)

A. Yes.

Q. Can you recall whether or not prior to preparing this memorandum you had had any discussions with Mr De Cort about the matters covered in the first two paragraphs of it?

A. I had no discussions with him prior to 9 June.

Q. Now, the first paragraph refers to a diagram of the transaction. If you could turn to bundle H(A)74, page 223 H(A)/74/223, do you see a document which has got a lot of arrows and boxes at the top and then numbered paragraphs 1 to 6?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Is that the diagram of the transaction to which you were referring in your 9 June memorandum, or were you referring to a different document?

A. No, this is the diagram.

Q. Now, if you look at this document and the explanation below, at paragraph 4 it states that:

"RA provides guarantee with regard to the representation and warranty that the Beneficiaries (B&B) are the ultimate beneficiaries of 25% of RH's shares."

Do you see that line?

A. Yes.

Q. Again, can you recall whether or not, at the time you prepared your 9 June memorandum, you had had any discussion with Mr De Cort, or any other representative of Mr Abramovich, about the terms of the assurances or other terms that might be provided by Mr Abramovich?

A. I had had no discussions with him at all. I hadn't had any discussions with him about the transaction at all. So the answer to the question is no, I had no such discussions.

Q. Now, you told us a moment ago that the first negotiation meeting you went to was on 11 June, a couple of days after this memorandum. Who did you meet with on 11 June?

A. I met with Stalbek Mishakov, the meeting was in Mr Mishakov's office in Moscow, and then I met with Ms Arbatova and with Mr Streshinsky.

Q. Did either Mr Streshinsky or Ms Arbatova explain to you at the meeting who they were representing?

A. Yes, they said that they were representing Mr Patarkatsishvili.

Q. Did they explain why they were representing Mr Patarkatsishvili at this meeting?

A. Yes, they said that he had a beneficial interest in the shares and that he was the person who would be selling them to Mr Deripaska.

Q. Which shares did they say he had a beneficial interest in?

A. The shares that were the subject of the 2004 transaction, the 25 per cent of the shareholding in Rusal Holding.

- Q. Can you recall whether or not either of them explained to you how Mr Patarkatsishvili had acquired that beneficial interest?
- A. No, they didn't. They simply indicated that they were acting for him, that he would be the seller, that he had a beneficial interest, and we then had a general discussion as to how we would move the transaction forward.
- Q. Can you recall whether or not any reference was made to Mr Berezovsky at this meeting with Mr Streshinsky and Ms Arbatova?
- A. Yes, there was a reference to Mr Berezovsky, because I took the Moscow Times article with me. So in terms of talking about the beneficial owner of the shares I was told that Mr Patarkatsishvili was the beneficial owner and I raised with them the statement that was in the Moscow Times article.
- Q. And what was their response?
- A. That Mr Berezovsky did not have an interest, that Mr Patarkatsishvili was the sole beneficial owner of the 25 per cent of the shares to be acquired by Mr Deripaska.
- Q. Now, was Mr De Cort present at this meeting?

- A. No, he was not able to attend because his mother was ill.
- Q. Did you subsequently have any discussions or meetings with Mr De Cort about this transaction?
- A. Yes, I had a meeting with him when I returned from Moscow to London on the following Tuesday which was the -- looking at your calendar -- 15 June.
- Q. Was anyone else present at that meeting, or was it just --
- A. No, it was just the two of us.
- Q. And can you recall whether or not Mr Berezovsky's name came up during the course of your discussions with Mr De Cort on that occasion?
- A. Yes, because I showed Mr De Cort the Moscow Times article.
- Q. And what did you say to Mr De Cort?
- A. Well, the -- to kind of go back a little bit, the purpose of the meeting with Mr De Cort was to follow up on the meeting in Moscow of the Friday that he was not able to attend, because it was pretty clear from the meeting on Friday, as we went through the documents that would be required, that a number of documents would be required from Mr Abramovich. And so we needed -- I needed Mr De Cort to know that because it was now a transaction involving three parties rather than two.

So the principal purpose of the meeting was to coordinate the preparation of documents and execution of them.

The second principal purpose of the meeting was to discuss with Mr De Cort the fact that I had been told on Friday that Mr Patarkatsishvili was the beneficial owner of the 25 per cent of the shares that were being sold to my client. There was then a third issue which was more, I suppose, in the way of an aside than anything else, in which I also brought Mr De Cort's attention to the Moscow Times article and said effectively, "By the way, Mr Berezovsky is also claiming an interest in these shares. Do you know anything about it?"

Q. Can you recall what Mr De Cort's response at this meeting was?

A. Mr De Cort told me that he would have to take instructions, that he had had no instructions coming to the meeting, and that he heard what I said but he would need to get back to me.

Q. Could you please go to bundle H(A)75, page 228.001 H(A)75/228.001?

A. Do I need these bundles anymore? Can they all be closed?

Q. You can put away bundle H(A)74.

You should at page 228.001 have a document entitled

"Madison Representations and Warranties", and if you turn forward to page .004 H(A)75/228.004 you should see that the document is identified as a Bryan Cave document dated 14 June 2004.

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. Do you recognise this document?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you know who prepared this document?

A. Yes, I did.

Q. Now, 14 June 2004 was the day before your meeting with Mr De Cort? You've just told us --

A. Yes, that would be the Monday.

Q. Can you recall whether or not you took a copy of this document to your meeting with Mr De Cort?

A. No, I didn't. I didn't take a copy of the -- I can recall I didn't take a copy of the document with me to the meeting with Mr De Cort.

Q. Do you recall whether or not you provided Mr De Cort with a copy of this document on any other occasion?

A. Well, that requires a bit of an explanation as to what happened to this document and what had occurred.

As far as the Monday was concerned, I had simply come back from Moscow. I had been told something by Mr Patarkatsishvili's representatives, and this would have represented my initial thinking as to how we might cover the representations and warranties. I would not, on the Tuesday, have presented this to Mr De Cort because I had not spoken to Mr De Cort and I had no idea what his client's position was as to who was the owner of the shares. So there would have been no point in presenting this document to Mr De Cort on the Tuesday.

Thereafter what happened was we had a series of negotiations which ultimately led to the documents that you brought my attention to at the start of this line of questioning. In the middle of those negotiations, there was a subsequent version of this document which was produced by Mr Faekov, Artem Faekov, who was the lawyer acting for Mr Patarkatsishvili. He took this initial draft, changed it to reflect what we had discussed in the meantime, and sent it back to me and Mr De Cort for our approval before the revised document was sent to the principals for their discussion and agreement.

So that Mr De Cort did see a version of this document, I don't think he ever saw this document, but he would have seen the version that Mr Faekov produced which was based upon this document.

- Q. Thank you. If you could now -- you can put that away and now turn to bundle H(A)76 at page 106 H(A)76/106. You should here find another Bryan Cave memorandum, this time dated 18 June 2004.

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. Do you recognise this document?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Who was the author of this document?

A. I was.

Q. Now, again, I understand that this is a document which it is said was originally privileged, and I do not want to pry into any privileged issues, I only want to ask you about any communications you've had with representatives of Mr Abramovich about the contents of this document. I just want to make that clear.

Could you please read the first paragraph, not the "I write", but the paragraph starting "As I understand the position." (Pause)

A. Yes.

Q. Can you recall whether or not this paragraph reflects matters that had been explained to you by Mr De Cort prior to preparing this memorandum?

A. It did not. None of this was discussed with Mr De Cort or explained by him.

Q. In the first paragraph, we can see a reference to Madison being "a trustee for B with respect to the Shares." Do you see that?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Can you recall whether or not at the time you prepared this memorandum you had had any discussion with Mr De Cort about whether or not Madison was holding 25 per cent of the Rusal shares on trust for any other party?

A. Well, the answer in -- if you're asking did I -- did we discuss the possibility that Madison was a trustee or held the shares in trust, the answer to that is no. On the other hand, had I raised with Mr De Cort on the meeting on 15 June the claim that Mr Patarkatsishvili was the beneficial owner of the shares, the answer to that is yes. There would have then, if that was true, have been various consequences because, of course, Mr Patarkatsishvili did not appear to be the owner of Madison. But did we during the course of that discussion use the words "trust" or "trustee"? No we didn't.

Q. Had there been any discussion between you and Mr De Cort between your meeting on 15 June and the preparation of this memorandum on 18 June?

A. Well, I believe that in the meantime I had received an email from Mr De Cort. As I recall, it was the previous day. This was issued on the Friday. I think on the Thursday I had received an email from Mr De Cort that had responded to my requests for representations and warranties from Mr Abramovich, so I had received a communication from Mr De Cort, but we had not discussed it, I had simply received the email.

The only discussion, to be clear, that I had had with Mr De Cort was the meeting on 15 June.

Q. In the last two sentences of the first paragraph, there's a reference to:

"Relations between RA ..."

That's presumably Mr Abramovich?

A. Yes, it is.

Q. "... and B have apparently broken down, and RA no longer wishes to deal... with B. It also is assumed that RA would prefer to discontinue serving as B's trustee and so wishes to divest Madison of the Shares."

Can you recall whether or not the content of those two sentences was based on any information that had been provided to you by Mr De Cort?

A. No, it was not based on information that was provided to me by Mr De Cort in terms of the -- not in terms of what he told me. The first sentence you've referred me to:

"Relations between RA and B ..."

B referring to, at that stage, Mr Patarkatsishvili:

"... [had] apparently broken down ..."

The reason why I had reached that conclusion was because of the way that, on the one hand, Mr Patarkatsishvili's representatives were dealing with the matter and, on the other, the way that Mr De Cort apparently was dealing with the matter, and that is that each were content to deal with me but I didn't see very much communication. In fact, I saw no communication running between Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich's people. So, as a consequence, I had the strong impression that they were communicating, to the extent that they were, they were communicating with each other through me rather than directly with one another.

Q. You can put that bundle away. If you could now be given bundle H(A)80 at page 86 H(A)80/86. You should find an email dated 8 July 2004 from your email address to Mr Faekov?

A. Yes, I have that.

Q. Do you recognise that document?

A. Yes.

Q. Who was the author of that document?

A. I was.

Q. If you could look at paragraph 1(a) of this document, you see that it refers to:

"The principal is entering into this transaction on the express understanding that matters have been resolved with B2."

A. Yes.

Q. Who was B2 a reference to in this document?

A. Mr Berezovsky.

Q. It goes on in the third sentence to refer:

"Instead, my principal is taking the word of BP..."

A. Yes.

Q. Who was BP referring to in this document?

A. Mr Patarkatsishvili.

Q. If you could now take bundle H(A)81.

A. I can put this away?

Q. Yes, thank you. At page 150 H(A)81/150, you should see another email, this time dated 9 July 2004 from your email address. Do you recognise this document?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Who was the author of this document?

A. I was.

Q. It's sent to Andre De Cort.

A. That's correct.

Q. If you could just read the email to remind yourself of its content. (Pause)

A. Yes.

Q. Could you explain who the acronym B2 is referring to in this email?

A. Mr Berezovsky.

Q. And the acronym BP?

A. Mr Patarkatsishvili.

Q. Now, in the final paragraph of your email, you say:

"You appreciate my problem; I'm not trying to be paranoid about the world at large nor am I raising theoretical issues about things that are unlikely ever to occur. I have a specific issue that I need to address which is B2."

You see that paragraph?

A. Yes.

Q. Can you recall whether or not you explained to Mr De Cort what the specific issue with B2 was that you needed to address?

A. Yes, it was Mr Berezovsky's claim to be an owner of the shares as reflected in the Moscow Times article.

MS DAVIES: Thank you very much, Mr Hauser. There will be some questions.

Cross-examination by MR MALEK

MR MALEK: Mr Hauser, could you turn, please, to your memorandum of advice of 9 June, which you will find in the bundle at H(A) volume 74 at page 219 H(A)74/219.

A. Yes, Mr Malek.

Q. You were asked by my learned friend Ms Davies as to whether or not anything said in this memorandum of advice was based on anything said to you by Mr De Cort. My question is, is anything in this memorandum based on anything said by Mr Streshinsky?

A. No, in fact I hadn't met Mr Streshinsky at the time

I wrote this memorandum.

Q. Or Mr Faekov?

A. Or Mr Faekov. I had not met him at the time I wrote the memorandum.

Q. Could you now be -- there are no other questions on that memorandum, could you now be provided with the other memorandum of advice dated 18 June, which is at H(A)76 at page 106 H(A)76/106.

Again you were asked questions about to what extent this was based on information provided by Mr De Cort, looking at the first couple of paragraphs.

Again, was anything in this memorandum, in the first couple of paragraphs that we looked at -- in fact the first -- the second paragraph, based on anything said by Mr Streshinsky or Mr Faekov?

A. No. I think the answer to your question is the same that I gave to Ms Davies, and that is that this is not based upon anything they told me. But the sentence that begins:

"Relations between RA and B have apparently broken down ..."

Was based upon my experience of dealing with all of them. And just as Mr De Cort didn't seem to be communicating with Mr Patarkatsishvili's representatives, so too Mr Streshinsky and Ms Arbatova did not seem to be communicating with Mr De Cort.

MR MALEK: I have no further questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Masefield.

Cross-examination by MR MASEFIELD

MR MASEFIELD: Mr Hauser, I'm Mr Masefield and I'm one of the counsel instructed by Mr Berezovsky.

Can I make it clear at the outset that I'm conscious of the fact you're here under compulsion and that you've been told by Mr Deripaska you're not at liberty to waive any privileged information. You can rest assured I have no intention of trying to trick you or trap you into an inadvertent waiver of privilege in relation to any of the matters upon which you are instructed and are now being asked to give evidence. That's not my purpose.

I've tried to formulate my questions with some care so as to avoid straying into those areas, and no doubt Mr Stanley QC, one of Mr Deripaska's counsel who is here in court, will correct me if I go wrong. But if at any stage you feel that I've overstepped the mark, or have any concern about whether or not you are free to answer, feel free to raise that concern and to say that you're not sure that you can answer the question without disclosing privileged information and we will then try to resolve the matter. Do you understand?

A. I do. Mr Masefield, if I can just make two points of my own in respect of all that. The first one is that, insofar as just as you are constrained in your questions, there may be occasions when I am constrained in my answers and I give answers which are less than complete and, dare I say, may on occasion even seem to be evasive.

Q. I fully understand.

A. If and to the extent that occurs, the only reason why it occurs is because, as you say, just as you are conscious of Mr Deripaska's privilege, so too am I. Mr Stanley is here in a sense to police me, to make sure that I don't go over the boundary, but I'm Mr Deripaska's solicitor and in the first instance it is my responsibility to him as his solicitor to make sure that I don't overstray the bounds of privilege.

The second point that I would make relates to actually a personal point, and that is that I was given Mr Rabinowitz's opening day submissions when it was suggested that somehow or other I connived in, I believe the phrase was "air-brushing" Mr Berezovsky out of the various purchase and sale documents.

I would ordinarily, in circumstances like that, want to give a complete response to those sorts of allegations. I think those allegations in the first instance suggest that I may have done something improper, dare I say even dishonest. I think second of all that a solicitor who engages in air-brushing someone out of documents, if anything else can be said about him, he is an incompetent solicitor, because the documents then do not do what it is that they purport to do.

In these circumstances, as I say, I would ordinarily want to make a complete response to those sorts of allegations, I'm not in a position to do so because I am constrained by privilege, but I would like to at least put it on the record that insofar as those allegations are made, I completely and most emphatically deny them.

Q. Thank you for that, Mr Hauser. That is now on the record and I understand your position.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, Mr Masefield, can we get on with the questions, please.

MR MASEFIELD: Yes.

Now, Mr Hauser, you've said that you're a partner in the law firm Bryan Cave and you practise out of its London office, is that correct?

A. That's correct.

Q. You first came to London to practise law in 1980, didn't you?

A. I did.

Q. And you've been admitted as a solicitor in England and Wales?

A. I have.

Q. You've also been admitted as an attorney at law in the courts of New York State, the Federal Court for the Southern District of New York, correct?

A. That's correct.

Q. And your practice with Bryan Cave covers both corporate and tax planning?

A. It does that. In more recent years, it has covered a fair amount of litigation, but yes.

Q. Tax disputes and also commercial litigation?

A. And also commercial litigation, yes.

Q. We know from the documents that have been disclosed in these proceedings that both you and your firm Bryan Cave have acted for Mr Deripaska and his associated companies since at the very least March 2000, correct?

A. We've acted for Mr Deripaska since October 1999.

Q. I'm grateful. And presumably, as a corporate lawyer with many years of commercial experience, you would regard yourself as a reasonably prudent and careful --

A. Sorry, someone coughed. I didn't catch the last part.

Q. I'll repeat the question. Presumably as a corporate lawyer with many years of commercial experience, you would regard yourself as a reasonably prudent and careful man?

A. Yes.

Q. We can see from the documents that have been disclosed that you're a man who pays considerable attention to detail when you become engaged on behalf of clients in corporate transactions?

A. Yes.

Q. And in particular, where M&A work is concerned, can I take it you're someone who pays a lot of attention to due diligence?

A. Yes.

Q. And in the absence of satisfactory answers, to ensuring that adequate warranties and the like are in place to protect your client's interests?

A. Well, I would say that -- the way you phrased the question was: in the absence of satisfactory answers, that I would ensure that adequate warranties and the like are in place, I would say that I would ensure it as a general matter, whether I had received adequate answers or not.

Q. I'm grateful. So just to state the obvious, and without wishing to trespass on any privileged material, whenever you're instructed on a merger and acquisition transaction where you're acting for the purchaser, you would want to ensure that you got proper warranties of title, would you not, Mr Hauser?

A. Yes.

Q. Speaking in entirely general terms, when you're instructed in a substantial transaction, presumably you'll do your best to understand the context in which that transaction has arisen?

A. Yes.

Q. The relevant background against which the transaction is being conducted?

A. To the extent I can determine that, yes.

Q. And in order to understand that background matrix of fact, and again speaking in entirely general terms, your first and most obvious port of call would be your client, would it not?

A. No, I wouldn't necessarily say -- well, in terms of obtaining instructions, yes, I would, in the first instance, look to my client. Whether my client is in the best position to give me the background information depends on the transaction and depends on the client.

Q. It may do, but your client will be one of the people whom you would want to try to find out more information about the background to the transaction?

A. Yes.

Q. Other people would be the other parties, your counterparties?

A. Yes.

Q. And it would be a rare case, would it not, where you had no real information relating to the transaction and had to proceed merely by speculation or solely by relying on information in the public domain, such as newspaper reports?

A. Well, I think the question is seeking a particular conclusion. You say it would be a rare case where I would have no information, no real information, relating to the transaction? That's true. On the other hand, as you go through transactions, depending upon the specific transaction you may have a greater or lesser amount of information with which to work.

I think the way you put it, to have a transaction in which there is no real information, no information, yes, that would be a rare case.

Q. And all the more so when the transaction in question is a transaction worth hundreds of millions of dollars, it would be madness to become engaged in such a transaction without first seeking proper instructions from your client, would it not?

A. I think that the way in which I would approach a transaction frankly doesn't depend upon the value. I think I would approach all transactions equally.

Q. And would your approach be in relation to all transactions to seek proper instructions from your client?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, I want to ask you some questions about your involvement in March 2000 in one of the merger transactions that led to the formation of Rusal, okay? I don't want to ask you about the content of your instructions, Mr Hauser, but can you please confirm that you were in fact instructed in early March 2000 to represent Mr Deripaska's interests in a proposed merger transaction which ultimately led to the formation of Rusal?

A. I was instructed to represent Mr Deripaska's interests. I wouldn't necessarily describe the initial transaction as a merger transaction. But I was instructed to represent Mr Deripaska in the negotiations which led to the 15 March 2000 agreement.

Q. That's fine, I don't want to debate the nature of that agreement, that's going to be a matter of submission in due course.

Without referring to the content of anyone's instructions, Mr Hauser, please can you also confirm that Mr Mishakov was also instructed to represent Mr Deripaska's interests in relation to that transaction?

A. Yes, he was.

Q. And that Mr Mishakov was also a lawyer by training?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, I understand that you attended a meeting in London on 11 March 2000 with Mr Alexander Bulygin. I don't want to ask you questions about the instructions he gave you, but is that fact correct, Mr Hauser?

A. Yes, it is.

Q. I don't want to, as I say, get into the instructions which Mr Bulygin may have given you on behalf of Mr Deripaska, Mr Hauser, and nor do I need to, because we know from Mr Bulygin's own evidence that his understanding as a result of the preliminary agreement of 5 March 2000 was as follows: firstly, that Mr Abramovich was not entering into the merger transaction with Mr Deripaska on his own; secondly, that on the contrary Mr Bulygin understood that Mr Abramovich was acting together with partners; thirdly, that those partners did not include anyone within the Trans-World Group; and fourthly, that Mr Bulygin made the assumption that one of Mr Abramovich's partners was Mr Shvidler, although he was not clear who the other partners were.

And for the record, the reference to that is Mr Bulygin's witness statement, paragraph 13, at E4, tab 1, page 7 E4/01/7.

Following your meeting with Mr Bulygin on 11 March 2000, Mr Hauser, you've told us that between 13 March and 15 March 2000 you took part in negotiations in Moscow with Mr Abramovich's representatives concerning the details of the merger process?

A. No, I told you that I did that on the 14th and the 15th. I didn't participate in negotiations with Mr Abramovich's representatives on the 13th.

Q. I understand. So were you travelling out on the 13th, or you arrived on the 14th and went straight into negotiations --

A. No, I travelled out on the morning of the 13th and arrived in Moscow later in the afternoon that day.

Q. Understood. Ultimately, those negotiations led to the share purchase and sale agreement which was drawn up and executed on 15 March 2000?

A. Yes.

Q. Can we have a brief look at that, Mr Hauser. Can you please be given -- you can put away the bundles that you've already got, and can you please be given bundle H(A)18 and turn within that to page 124 H(A)18/124.

A. Before we go on to that, you have made a number of submissions about what Mr Bulygin is said to have said. Is there a question for me in relation to any of that?

Q. There isn't, because --

MR STANLEY: My Lady, there shouldn't be a question about whether Mr Bulygin said that to Mr Hauser, that's for sure.

MR MASEFIELD: Exactly. I cannot put that question to you, Mr Hauser. I am under a constraint as well.

A. Just asking.

Q. Now, you should have at H(A)18, page 124 H(A)18/124, a copy of the share purchase and sale agreement dated 15 March 2000, Mr Hauser.

A. I do.

Q. As we can see, the parties to that agreement are Runicom Limited, who is described as the vendor, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. And GSA (Cyprus) Limited, who is described as the purchaser, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. And what is being sold pursuant to the contract we can see from the definition of "Shares" on page 125 H(A)18/125, if you turn over the page, and that is 50 per cent of the shares in the companies, with a capital C, which are named in the schedule 1 to this agreement. I don't think we need to turn that up, it's page 138. But those shares comprise shares in the companies Runicom Fort Limited, Galinton Associated Limited, Palmtex Limited and Dilcor International Limited.

It's those companies, Mr Hauser, you can take this from me, that as at the time held the shares in the underlying aluminium assets such as Krasnoyarsk, Achinsk and Bratsk, do you follow?

A. Yes. Well, since I negotiated the agreement I don't need to take it from you, I do recall this.

Q. You do recall that. If we turn within the agreement to clause 6, Mr Hauser, at page 131 H(A)18/131, do you see there a heading, "Vendor's and Purchaser's Representations and Warranties"?

A. Yes.

Q. Below that are set out the warranties of title and the like which Runicom was making to your client, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. And looking at clause 6.1.1 of this agreement, we can see that it provides:

"The Vendor and the Other Selling Shareholders are together the legal and beneficial owners of 100 per cent of the shares of the Companies, which shares are owned free from all encumbrances, charges and liens..."

Do you see that, Mr Hauser?

A. I do indeed.

Q. If we look back at the definition of "Other Selling Shareholders", which we have at page 125 H(A)18/125, we can see that the contract provides that "Other Selling Shareholders" means:

"... those other persons who together with the Vendor are the legal and beneficial owners and holders of 100 per cent of the shares (both in registered and bearer form) of the Companies as at the Completion Date."

Do you see that, Mr Hauser?

A. I do.

Q. So to summarise, there is a warranty that Runicom Limited, together with other selling shareholders, are the legal and beneficial owners of 100 per cent of the four offshore companies, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. But when you turn to look to see who the other selling shareholders are, they're not named, are they?

A. That's right, they're not.

Q. Instead you are simply told that those are the persons who, together with Runicom, are the legal and beneficial owners of 100 per cent of the four offshore companies, correct?

A. That's what the agreement says.

Q. But what both clause 6.1.1 and the definition do suggest is that there are a number of other selling shareholders with proprietary interests in the four offshore companies in addition to Runicom Limited?

- A. No, they raise the possibility that there are other selling shareholders, they don't suggest anything.
- Q. The use of the plural is more than a possibility, isn't it, Mr Hauser?
- A. No, in terms of drafting the document they raise the possibility. I can give you a more complete explanation if you want to formulate a question.
- Q. Let me formulate this question, Mr Hauser. It follows from this definition, does it not, that during the course of the negotiations leading up to the conclusion of this agreement, you were most probably not told by any of Mr Abramovich's representatives that Mr Abramovich was the only legal and beneficial owner of the four offshore companies in addition to Runicom?
- A. No, because you've misinterpreted the agreement. If you start with the agreement: if the agreement had said the vendor was Mr Abramovich personally then the analysis that you'd given was correct. But the agreement doesn't say that. What the agreement says is a particular company, Runicom Limited, is the vendor.

Now, if we can spend a couple of minutes just to explain how this clause was developed and why we did what we did, you had suggested to me about five or ten minutes ago that ordinarily doing a transaction of this sort I would want to conduct as much due diligence as I could before we proceeded with the transaction. It is apparent, given the time constraints that we were under, that we didn't have time to construct -- to conduct the due diligence. It was also the case that Mr Schneider, who had just then been brought in to act for Mr Abramovich, had limited information as to the structure of the deal and the companies that were being acquired.

During the course of the negotiations, on the Tuesday night and the Wednesday morning, we had to consider a number of possibilities. Possibility 1, that with respect to the companies that Mr Deripaska was acquiring an interest in, we were not certain that the interests that Mr Abramovich held in those companies was in each case owned via Runicom. It was possible that there were other companies within the Abramovich group that had interests in some of these companies. And so the first reason we had to refer to "other selling shareholders" was to take account of the possibility that there were companies, Abramovich companies, other than Runicom that held some of the shares.

The second reason we needed to do this was because it was not entirely clear at the time we negotiated this transaction that in fact Mr Abramovich or Runicom had completed the acquisition of all of the shares of the companies, the underlying companies, that Mr Deripaska was buying an interest in. We had to take account of the possibility that there were still interests that were being held outside of Mr Abramovich's group that he was still in the process of completing purchases from. So that was the second possibility we had.

The third problem we had, and we discussed this expressly, was the ongoing suspicion on the part of my client that perhaps Trans-World still had an interest in some of the assets that Mr Abramovich had said he had acquired. One of the things that we were most insistent upon was to ensure that this share purchase and sale agreement was in all respects enforceable, even if it transpired that Trans-World still had some sort of an interest.

There was then the fourth possibility, which is in fact something that again Mr Schneider and I discussed, which was dealing with Mr Abramovich himself. It was possible that he had one or more other partners that had interests of one sort or another in the company, but the person that we actually were focused upon was Mr Shvidler, and the question was whether Mr Shvidler had an interest in these companies. I asked Mr Schneider whether he knew whether that was or was not the case, Mr Schneider did not, and it seemed that Mr Shvidler was actually running the deal negotiations on that evening, sitting with Mr Deripaska, so we took account of that possibility as well.

So that's why the phrase "other selling shareholders" was inserted into the purchase and sale documentation.

Q. I'm very grateful for that explanation, Mr Hauser, because possibilities 3 and 4 that you just enumerated contemplate, do they not, that there may have been other persons who were involved in addition to Mr Abramovich?

A. Correct, but there's a difference between what you're now saying, contemplating the possibility that there may have been, and the way that you originally phrased the question, which was suggesting that there were.

I would accept your analysis, it contemplated the possibility that there would be other shareholders, but I don't accept your analysis or your conclusion that, in fact, it suggested that there would be.

Q. And you didn't get to the bottom of it, you say, before the share purchase and sale agreement was concluded on 15 March 2000?

A. Well, I suspect that this particular clause was probably negotiated about 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning, and we finalised the document about 5.00 am. I think we were probably the only people who were up in Moscow at that time. It would have been rather difficult for me to have come to the bottom of it.

Q. Indeed that's rather reflected, isn't it, in the somewhat circular definition that you see here, because if you had got to the bottom of it and you'd found out who particular partners were, if there were indeed particular partners, one could have named them in the agreement, yes?

A. We could have. We could have, yes.

Q. It contained a confidentiality provision so there would have been no problem with that.

A. I'm sorry, I don't know why the confidentiality provision would have affected whether we could have named the partners.

Q. Well, there might have been sensitivity about documenting the existence of other people's ownership interests in these assets, Mr Hauser.

A. Oh, if your question -- let's cut to the chase on this one. If your question is: during the course of the negotiations was there any sensitivity raised about naming other partners, and was that part of the motivation for including, as you describe it, a somewhat ambiguous clause, "other selling shareholders"? No, that was not anything of what we discussed that evening.

There was no issue about that, or sensitivities.

- Q. And were you reassured at least of this from Mr Abramovich's representatives, that the Trans-World Group were not in fact included within the definition of "other selling shareholders"?
- A. Well, insofar as the definition itself is concerned, on the face of it "other selling shareholders" could have taken account of the Trans-World Group. If you're asking me, was I told during the course of the negotiations that Trans-World didn't have an interest in any of the assets that Mr Deripaska was buying into? The answer to that is yes, I was told that.
- Q. You were told that expressly?
- A. Yes.
- Q. But you weren't told who the other selling shareholders might be, expressly?
- A. No, but I've told you how it was -- how the phrase was drafted.

It also is the case that, frankly, whatever I had been told in the course of negotiations, yes, that's fine as far as it goes. But at the end of the day, the legal obligations and responsibilities are based upon the terms of the purchase and sale agreement. If in fact, having been told that Trans-World was not -- no longer had an interest in these shares, if subsequently it had transpired that Trans-World did have an interest, and somehow or other that interest had affected the value of whatever it was Mr Deripaska had been buying into, the fact that at 2 o'clock in the morning Mr Schneider had told me, or had reassured me "No, Trans-World doesn't have an interest in this" wouldn't have helped my client at all.

So the fact of the matter is, "other selling shareholders", the definition was drafted in the widest possible way to make absolutely certain that Mr Deripaska got what it was he thought he was buying, and that's the reason we drafted it that way.

MR MASEFIELD: My Lady, that might be a convenient moment if you wanted to rise.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, certainly.

You mustn't talk to anybody about your evidence or about the case.

THE WITNESS: Of course.

(11.29 am)

(A short break)

(11.40 am)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Masefield.

MR MASEFIELD: Thank you. Now, the share purchase and sale agreement of 15 March 2000 was subsequently amended and restated on 15 May 2000.

A. That's correct.

Q. And we have a copy of the amended and restated agreement in bundle H(A)19. I wonder if we can turn that up, it's page H(A)19, page 22 H(A)19/22.

A. Can I put this away?

Q. You can, thank you.

What I hope you have there, Mr Hauser, is a copy of the agreement I was referring to, the amended and restated agreement of 15 May 2000. Do you have that?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Obviously, if anyone had wanted to make corrections to the earlier agreement to tighten up warranties or to pick up on any errors that had crept into the drafting there had now been two months in which to do so, yes?

A. Yes, that's right.

Q. And you've told us that you're involved in negotiating the terms of this amended and restated agreement, that's correct?

A. Sorry, before we just continue with that, page 2, there seems to be something blacked out in relation to AGK Securities. I don't know if there's anything else in here which has been blacked out. Obviously that is not in the original of the document.

Q. That's fine. You don't need to worry about that, Mr Hauser.

- A. All right, then to go back to your question, yes, I was involved in negotiating the terms of this agreement.
- Q. And the main change between the earlier 15 March 2000 agreement and this amended and restated agreement was that the Bratsk assets were now being brought into the merger, do you recall that?
- A. That was one of the main changes, there were a number of other substantial changes too, but that was one of the main changes, yes.
- Q. Previously they were going to be spun off but now they are going to be included as part of the deal, correct?
- A. I have no idea what the original deal was because the original 15 March 2000 agreement made no reference to the Bratsk assets.
- Q. Well, they did make a reference --
- A. Did they?
- Q. It said they were going to be spun off. Shall we have a look at that?
- A. All right, we should probably have a look at that.
- Q. If you go back to H(A)18, if you turn within that to page 141 H(A)18/141, you will see there's a schedule 2 there which dealt with the shares and the aluminium assets that were going to be brought within the merger.
- It's page 141, Mr Hauser.
- A. Yes, I do, but this is -- no, I think --

Q. Wait for my question, Mr Hauser. Part III says

"Spin-Off Shares:

"Any and all shares held by the Companies in Open Joint Stock Company 'Bratsky Aluminium Plant'."

A. Yes, that's right.

Q. So the Bratsk shares were going to have been spun off under the original agreement, that's correct, isn't it?

A. There were Bratsk shares that were being spun off under the original agreement, but when you refer to "the Bratsk shares", what the 15 May agreement refers to is the fact that Mr Abramovich at that stage had acquired a substantial interest, I think about two-thirds of the shareholding in Bratsk. And on the basis of that, the original deal was renegotiated.

What had happened on 15 May, and the reference to spin-off shares, was frankly, as I recall, to deal with miscellaneous small holdings of Bratsk shares that may have been caught up in these companies. But there was a fundamental difference between what had happened between 15 May and 15 -- and the earlier period, 15 March, and that is that Mr Abramovich in the meantime had acquired a substantial interest in the Bratsk smelter.

Q. That may have been what you were told at the time, Mr Hauser, but in fact Mr Abramovich acquired his interests in the Bratsk smelter under the 10 February agreement in 2000. So he had already acquired those interests by the time of the 15 March 2000 agreement. But I'm not sure we need to trouble ourselves about this.

A. Fine.

Q. A direct consequence of the Bratsk assets being brought into the merger was that the purchase price which Mr Deripaska was due to pay had been increased from 400 million, which was to have been paid under the 15 March 2000 agreement, to $575 million, which was to be paid under this agreement. Do you recall that?

A. That was one of the consequences, yes.

Q. And we can see the 575 million is referred to in the fourth recital of the later agreement which we have in bundle 19 at page 22 H(A)19/22. If you look down the page to the fourth recital, do you have that?

A. Yes.

Q. We see the figure there that is now due to be paid by Mr Deripaska to Runicom Limited, yes?

A. It also is referred to in the definition of "Net Transfer Price" on page 2.

Q. I'm coming on to that.

This was something you were probably not aware of at the time, Mr Hauser, but this net transfer price of 575 million in fact exactly equalled the sum which Mr Abramovich, and we say his partners, were due to pay to Mr Reuben, Mr Chernoi, Mr Bosov and Mr Anisimov for the aluminium assets. Was that in fact something you were told about at the time, Mr Hauser?

A. No.

Q. And we know from Ms Panchenko and Mr Shvidler's evidence in these proceedings that this 575 million, which was due from Mr Deripaska, was in fact used to discharge the debt due to Mr Reuben and others under the February aluminium acquisition agreement. But, again, presumably that was not something that you were told about at the time?

A. I was not.

Q. Now, if we look a little bit further down the page on page 23 H(A)19/23, you've referred to the "Net Transfer Price" provision on that page. We can see further down that there is -- rather than a reference to "other selling shareholders", there's now a new defined term, which is "Other P1 Shareholders"; do you see that, Mr Hauser?

A. Yes.

Q. Is this a term which you recall was the subject of discussion with Mr Abramovich's representatives?

A. Yes.

Q. They clearly accepted this term because it's in the final form of the executed agreement, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And we can see that the definition provides that:

"Other P1 Shareholders [are] those other persons and/or entities (whether legal or natural) who together with Party 1 [that's Runicom Limited] are the legal and/or beneficial owners and/or holders of 100 per cent of the shares (both in registered and bearer form) of the P1 Companies..."

Do you see that?

A. Yes I do.

Q. Then turning forward in the agreement to page 33

H(A)19/33, Mr Hauser, we have at clause 7 the relevant representations and warranties, do you have that?

A. I do indeed.

Q. Now, clause 7.1(a) is similar to the warranty in the 15 March 2000 agreement, it's the warranty of title by which Runicom Limited warrants that it, together with the other P1 shareholders, are:

"... the legal and beneficial owners of 100 per cent of the shares of the P1 Companies ..."

Do you see that?

A. I do.

Q. And so it's reasonable for us to conclude, is it not,

Mr Hauser, that none of Mr Abramovich's representatives had told you in the two intervening months since the share purchase agreement that the reference to "other selling shareholders" in the plural was wrong, and that there should instead be a reference simply to one other P1 shareholder, or even just to Mr Abramovich?

- A. Well, whether they had told me that or not I would have insisted on this language anyway, for all of the reasons that I had indicated that we needed a definition of "other selling shareholders".

Nothing had changed between 15 March and 15 May. My objective was to make sure that this transaction, just as the previous agreement, was not torpedoed or in any way affected by someone showing up, or claiming an interest, or it subsequently being determined that some other group company in the Abramovich group had an interest in, or held shares, or that in some respect the purchase of some of these underlying assets hadn't yet completed.

So the same considerations applied for March -- for May 15 as applied for March 15.

- Q. And those considerations, you told us earlier, included as points 3 and 4 the possibility that Mr Abramovich had partners and the possibility that Mr Shvidler was a partner?

A. Yes.

Q. And those possibilities you had still not resolved one way or the other?

A. Well, frankly, had I resolved them or not I still would have drafted the document as I had. Because as I said to you, if on 15 March at 2 o'clock in the morning, if I had been told by Mr Shvidler -- I'm sorry, by Mr Schneider, that Trans-World didn't have an interest, then that wouldn't have taken me very far in terms of giving protection to my client. Similarly, if I had been told that on 10 May, in the middle of the day, it still wouldn't have given me the protection that I needed.

I needed to ensure that this document was legally enforceable whatever happened, and if someone climbed out of the woodwork, or Mr Abramovich came back and said, "Actually, terribly sorry, it wasn't Runicom that owned these shares, it was someone else," then that was not going to affect the legal effectiveness of this agreement.

Bear in mind as well that a number of the underlying companies were bearer share companies.

Q. Correct.

A. So the ownership of the underlying companies, although I was told that it was Runicom, how did I know that it was Runicom? What was I going to do? Was I going to go sit in Mr Abramovich's office and see the share certificates and sit there until we completed the deal? It wouldn't have made any sense.

So as a consequence I needed to have that language included in the agreement to make sure that no matter what had happened, no matter what the underlying position was, no matter how the shares of the underlying companies were owned, this document remained effective.

Q. Let's look further down the page that we are on, page 33 H(A)19/33, the representation and warranty at clause 7.1(d). We see a further representation of warranty there which says:

"Party 1 has the power and authority to act in the name of and to represent any and all of the Other P1 Shareholders in respect of the sale of the P1 Shares, and to receive their portions of the Net Transfer Price on their behalf."

Do you see that provision, Mr Hauser?

A. I do.

Q. So what this demonstrates, Mr Hauser, is the parties' agreement and understanding was that the 575 million purchase money was due not just to Runicom Limited, correct?

A. No, what it indicates is -- and let's actually read the document. It says:

"Party 1 has the power and authority to act in the name of and to represent any and all of the Other P1 Shareholders ..."

Well, if you take out "all"; "to represent any of the Other P1 Shareholders". That is, if there are any.

So this isn't an affirmative declaration that the other P1 shareholders exist, it simply covers the possibility that they might exist. And if they did exist, then what this clause says is that the purchase price is $575 million and not a penny more.

Q. Let's look at the last part of the clause though, Mr Hauser:

"... and to receive their portions of the Net Transfer Price..."

That suggests the transfer sum is going to be apportioned between parties?

A. No, it suggests that if there were other P1 shareholders, then obviously they would be entitled to some of the purchase and sale consideration. And to the extent that was the case, that whatever was paid to Runicom would represent -- would be a complete discharge of whatever would be due to these other shareholders if they existed.

Q. Mr Hauser, I'm not going to debate the provision with you because it's going to be a matter of submission as to how it should be construed. But what we can say --

A. I can only tell you what I did --

Q. I appreciate that.

A. -- and why I negotiated it and how the negotiations transpired.

Q. What we can see from this agreement is that the 575 million which was due to Runicom and all the other P1 shareholders, that was the sum that was in fact used to discharge the debt of the aluminium assets that Mr Abramovich, and we say his partners, had acquired back in February 2000. But you say you weren't told about that at the time, were you, Mr Hauser?

A. Well, your initial question started with: what we can see from this agreement is that the 575 million was used to discharge Mr Abramovich's debt.

You can't see that from this agreement at all, and to be clear, no, I didn't know any of that.

Q. We are at cross-purposes.

What we can see from this agreement is that the sum was due to be paid to Runicom and all the other P1 shareholders, that's what it says.

A. Yes.

Q. And it was that sum --

A. If any.

- Q. -- that was due to Runicom and all the other P1 shareholders that was used to discharge the debt to Mr Chernoi, Mr Reuben, Mr Anisimov, and Mr Bosov, but you didn't know about that?
- A. Well, to go back to the beginning of your question: what we can see from this agreement is that the sum was due to be paid to Runicom and all the other P1 shareholders, if any. That's what it says.
- With respect to how the money was then used, there is nothing in the agreement that gives any indication at all.
- Q. You say "if any", but it doesn't actually say "if any" at all, Mr Hauser.
- A. It does. It says no person -- it says:
- "P1 has the power and authority to act in the name of and to represent any and all of the other P1 shareholders ..."
- The word "any" is there.
- Q. It says "any", not "if any".
- MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: At the end of the day, the document and its interpretation is a matter for me.
- MR MASEFIELD: I agree, my Lady.
- Let's move on, Mr Hauser, to September 2003, to the time of the first Rusal sale transaction?
- A. Can I put these away?

Q. You can put away bundle 18 and bundle 19.

Once again, without waiving privilege as to the contents of any instructions, can you confirm that you were in fact instructed on behalf of Mr Deripaska in relation to the September 2003 transaction?

A. Yes, I was.

Q. And as well as the various share purchase and sale agreements which were executed at that time, which related to a first 25 per cent tranche of Rusal, the parties also entered into a deed of pre-emption and option agreement relating to the last 25 per cent tranche of Rusal not owned by Mr Deripaska?

A. They did.

Q. Were you involved with that, Mr Hauser?

A. Yes, I was.

Q. Could we turn the document up, please. It's bundle H(A)65, page 172 H(A)65/172.

What I hope you have there, Mr Hauser, is an agreement entitled "Deed of Pre-emption and Option", do you have that?

A. I do.

Q. And it's dated the 30th day of September 2003, do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. You say you were involved in the drafting of this document, were you, Mr Hauser?

A. Yes, I was.

Q. And if we look at the first page of the agreement, page 172, which we're on, recital A, we can see that it says:

"Whereas:

"It had been agreed by the Parties as of the Effective Date that the Grantor granted to the Option Holder a right of first refusal to purchase the entirety of the Business Interests in the event the Grantor proposes any transfer of the Business Interests to any other Person."

Do you see that provision, Mr Hauser?

A. Yes.

Q. Then at recital B we can see it says:

"Whereas:

"It was further agreed by the Parties as of the Effective Date that in the event of a contemplated change of Ownership Rights, the Option Holder should be entitled to purchase the entirety of the Business Interests in accordance with the terms of this Deed."

Just pausing there, what the contract clearly contemplates are two potential triggers, yes? Recital A is the situation where Madison, the grantor, is contemplating a sale to a third party, correct?

- A. Correct.
- Q. And recital B is the situation where a change in ownership structure of Madison is contemplated, correct?
- A. Correct.
- Q. And if either of those events arose then Mr Deripaska's company, Baufinanz, the option holder, has a right of first refusal to purchase the entirety of the business interests?
- A. Correct.
- Q. That's the last 25 per cent stake in Rusal, that's recital C, isn't it?
- A. Yes. When you say the last 25 per cent stake in Rusal, at that point, Rusal still referred to the conglomeration of interests rather than Rusal Holding, which is why we used the phrase "business interests".
- Q. I agree with you, Mr Hauser and I don't think we need to debate that point.
- The price that Mr Deripaska's company, Baufinanz, would have had to pay under this contract is dealt with slightly differently depending on which of the two triggers has been activated, do you recall that?
- A. Yes, I do.
- Q. If you turn to page 175 H(A)65/175 and look at section 2, we can see what was to happen in the event of a contemplated sale to a third party.

Looking at clause 2.3, we can see that on receipt of a bona fide offer from a third party, Madison had to send a written pre-emption notice to Baufinanz, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And the pre-emption notice was to set out, amongst other things, the proposed price to be paid for the business interests? That's 2.3.2.

A. Yes, that's right.

Q. Looking at clause 2.4, Baufinanz had to then, within the next 30 days, deliver to Madison a written notice either offering to match the third party price, or tabling a different price in terms, or saying that it was not interested; do you see those provisions?

A. I do.

Q. And finally, looking at clause 2.6, if Baufinanz had tabled different terms and prices Madison and Baufinanz had to negotiate in good faith for a period of 30 days, and if no agreement could be reached then Baufinanz could deliver an election notice offering to match the terms of the price offered by the third party?

A. Yes.

Q. So that was what was to happen in the event of a third party offer. But if the triggering event was not a third party offer but a change in control or ownership rather different rights arose, and those are set out in section 3 which we have at page 177. I don't think we need to work through all the detail of it, Mr Hauser, but you can take it from me that the way the price was then to be calculated was that the parties were to negotiate in good faith, and if no agreement was reached after 30 days, Baufinanz could serve a nomination notice on Madison which would require the matter to go off to an expert determination at which the expert would fix the price?

A. That's correct.

Q. Now, do you have recollection of those provisions, Mr Hauser?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. And would you at the very least agree with me that if in September 2003 Mr Abramovich's representatives had told you that Mr Deripaska had an unrestricted option to buy the remaining 25 per cent of Rusal at a fixed price of 450 million, you would have drawn up a rather different contract to this one?

A. Now you're asking me if Mr Abramovich's representatives had told me, would I have drawn up a different contract? Yes, I would have.

Q. Thank you, Mr Hauser.

And can we therefore take it that Mr Abramovich's representatives did not tell you in September 2003 that Mr Deripaska had an unrestricted option to buy the remaining 25 per cent of Rusal at a fixed price of $450 million?

A. Yes.

Q. Thank you, Mr Hauser. We can put away bundle H(A)65.

Finally I would like to ask you a few questions, Mr Hauser, about your involvement in the second Rusal sale. I'm very conscious of privilege issues that have arisen and for the need for us to proceed carefully here.

The second Rusal sale documentation really kicks off at the start of June 2004 and the deal was concluded on 20 July 2004. Do you remember that?

A. Yes, the deal was concluded on 20 July, that's correct.

Q. And you've confirmed already that you were in fact instructed in relation to that transaction on Mr Deripaska's behalf?

A. Yes.

Q. And you may or may not recall this, but it's fairly clear from the documents and communications passing between yourself and the other parties that the second Rusal sale transaction developed in the course of three different stages, and let me just summarise those stages for you as it may make things a bit easier as we work through the documents.

Stage one was the initial period from 9 June 2004 up until 17 June 2004. Now, during that period, drafts were passing backwards and forwards between the parties which contemplated that Mr Abramovich or his companies would warrant that there were two ultimate beneficial owners, X and Y, who had (sic) beneficial owners of a 25 per cent stake in Rusal since 15 March 2000; do you understand?

A. Well, I understand what you're saying, yes.

Q. Then there's a second stage which starts on 17 June 2004 when Mr De Cort sent you an email stating that there were going to be no warranties from Mr Abramovich's side regarding beneficial ownership. And stage two was then a period of impasse where the parties were trying to reach a compromise on the warranty relating to beneficial ownership, do you remember that?

A. Well, again, I understand what you're saying, yes.

Q. And that impasse lasted up until the beginning of July 2004. And then, in early July 2004, the impasse was resolved and the solution, which was then fine-tuned in the course of stage three up until closing on 20 July 2004, was this: firstly, Mr Abramovich would acknowledge but not warrant that he had only ever had dealings with Mr Patarkatsishvili, and that whoever Mr Patarkatsishvili said was the beneficial owner must be the beneficial owner.

Alongside that acknowledgement --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, do you accept that, Mr Hauser?

A. Well, I don't think I've accepted anything, my Lady, yet. All I've done is acknowledged that I've heard what I've been told. I would not have characterised the negotiations in this way.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: All right.

MR MASEFIELD: We'll come on to the documents in a moment, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, I'm not sure where it's getting you if all you're doing is putting your version of events and the witness is saying "Well, I wouldn't have characterised it in that way.

MR MASEFIELD: My Lady, why don't we go straight to the documents.

Could we start with your 9 June memorandum, which we have at bundle H(A)74, page 219 H(A)74/219. This is the memorandum that we've looked at already this morning, Mr Hauser, and you've confirmed that you were the author of it.

I don't want to go through the memorandum at length with you, Mr Hauser, because we can all see what it says and because, to some extent, I'm constrained by questions of privilege. But focusing on the first numbered paragraph that we have at page 219, we can see that the paragraph starts:

"We are advised ..."

And the same is also true of the second numbered paragraph, do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, I don't want to stray into privileged areas, Mr Hauser, and I don't want to ask you about any advice that you received from your client, but can you tell me this. I think you may have given these answers already or at least the first two. Did Mr Abramovich's representatives provide you with the advice that you're referring to here?

A. No.

Q. Did Mr Patarkatsishvili's representatives provide you with the advice that you're referring to here?

A. No.

Q. And when you refer to "advice", you are not referring simply to the newspaper reports or information in the public domain, were you, Mr Hauser? That would be an odd use of language, would it not?

MR STANLEY: My Lady, I think that is going too far. He's going beyond asking whether there was information from particular people and he's asking: what did you mean by "you were advised"? If you ask -- your Ladyship can see where the question is going, you eliminate all possibilities and whatever remains is that this must have come from your client.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, I don't see why he shouldn't ask whether the information that is in that paragraph came from what he'd seen in the newspapers.

MR STANLEY: Yes, very well my Lady.

MR MASEFIELD: Would you answer the question, please, Mr Hauser. Would you like me to put it to you again?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think you should put it in the way I've just formulated it, please, Mr Masefield. Did you get what you've seen in paragraph 1 --

MR MASEFIELD: Was the information that we see in that paragraph, did that come from what you had seen in the newspapers, Mr Hauser?

A. The specific information, no. The only newspaper account I had was the Moscow Times article, and you can see what's in the Moscow Times article.

Is it the case that the memorandum in part took account of what was in the Moscow Times article? Yes, it did.

Q. I'm grateful for that answer, Mr Hauser, and in particular the word "in part".

Can we turn next to bundle H(A)75, we can put away bundle H(A)74, and turn within bundle H(A)75 to page 228.001 H(A)75/228.001.

This is the table headed "Madison Representations and Warranties", Mr Hauser, that we've looked at already and which was drawn up by Bryan Cave on 14 June 2004.

Do you remember that?

A. Yes.

Q. And this therefore followed the meeting that I think you have already explained to the court that you had with representatives of Mr Patarkatsishvili on 12 June 2004?

A. On the 11th.

Q. On the 11th.

A. Yes.

Q. I'm grateful. This was a document which was produced not just for Bryan Cave's or your client's internal purposes, Mr Hauser, we know that it was sent to Mr Patarkatsishvili's representatives, do you remember that?

A. Yes, eventually it was sent to them, yes.

Q. I think you've said that you don't recall tabling this document at the meeting which had with Mr De Cort on 15 June 2004, but would you accept that you were likely, at the very least, to have raised at that meeting with Mr De Cort the matters that have been carefully set out by you in the schedule the day before the meeting?

A. No. I don't accept that. First, I think the question was: I don't recall tabling the document at the meeting I had with Mr De Cort? No, I think my evidence is I didn't table it at the meeting with Mr De Cort.

With respect to discussing what was laid out in this note, no, Mr De Cort told me he didn't know anything -- he had no instructions from his client, and so there was no point in having any more specific discussion with Mr De Cort as to how, for example, representations and warranties as to title might be divided up between Mr Abramovich on the one hand and Mr Patarkatsishvili on the other, because Mr De Cort had no instructions one way or the other.

- Q. Mr Hauser, what was Mr De Cort doing arriving at this meeting with no instructions from his client? What was the purpose of him meeting with you?
- A. I think he was meeting with me in order to be briefed as to what had been discussed on the previous Friday, and that was the principal function of the meeting, for me to tell him what we had discussed --
- Q. For you to update him with what you had heard from Mr Patarkatsishvili's representatives?
- A. Yes.
- Q. Once again, Mr Hauser, I'm not going to ask you detailed questions about what this document says because we can all see what it says, and, in particular, we can see in the "Comments" section on the second page over, the references to X and Y.

But can I ask you this: in the "Comments" column on that right-hand side of the document, various factual propositions are set out, including the statement that Mr Abramovich was a trustee holding the stake in Rusal on trust for known beneficiaries described as X and Y. Can you tell me this, did Mr Abramovich's representatives provide you with that factual information?

A. No.

Q. Did Mr Patarkatsishvili's representatives provide you with that factual information?

A. Well, no, the answer is no. I think -- I'm trying to see what you're referring to, I think you're starting with the last full paragraph on page 2?

Q. And higher up the page:

"X and Y can give only a 'knowledge and belief' assurance..."

A. I think the reference you quoted was:

"In such a case, RA would hold the interest as trustee for X and Y who in turn would hold the interest as trustee for someone else."

Q. And there's a reference to trust back on the first page as well.

- A. Yes, all right. All I'm -- I'm looking at this particular paragraph. The opening sentence says:
- "It is possible in theory..."
- And then it indicates "In such a case". It seems to me that on the face of it, the paragraph makes it clear that there is a certain degree of speculation that's going on at that point.
- Q. And the speculation involved in that paragraph is the question of whether X and Y are fronting for further individuals, but it's not speculation about whether X or Y existed, or whether Mr Abramovich was holding on trust --
- A. In respect of that paragraph, yes, you're right.
- Q. Now, I was asking you whether Mr Patarkatsishvili's representatives had provided you with that factual information, Mr Hauser, and I think your answer is no, but can you confirm that?
- A. Sorry, which -- I'm beginning to get a little lost. Which factual information are you asking me they did not confirm?
- Q. Did they provide you with the information that Mr Abramovich was holding on trust for X and Y?
- A. No.
- Q. I'm grateful. And can you confirm to the best of your recollection that that was not information that was based solely on newspaper reports?

MR STANLEY: Well, my Lady, it's the same question, the same problem again; "not ... based solely on" is an attempt to discover whether it came from the client. It's the only purpose that question can serve.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You can ask the question.

MR MASEFIELD: I'm grateful, my Lady.

Can you confirm to the best of your recollection that that was not information that was based solely on newspaper reports?

A. The issue I think is -- the question, to go back to it, is did they provide me with the information that Mr Abramovich was holding on trust for X and Y, is that the question?

Q. That is the question.

A. The answer to that is, in the course of the meeting we had on the Friday, Mr Patarkatsishvili's representatives said that Mr Patarkatsishvili was the beneficial owner of the shares.

Q. Yes.

A. Now, if that was the case, and if Mr Abramovich or one of Mr Abramovich's companies was actually the legal owner of the shares, then it would logically follow that that company was holding either as nominee or perhaps as trustee for Mr Patarkatsishvili.

Now, with respect to whether there was a Y issue, then we, as I think I previously said, did discuss in the Friday meeting the Moscow Times article and the possibility that Mr Berezovsky may have an interest as well. Now, Mr Patarkatsishvili's representatives told me on the Friday that Mr Berezovsky did not have such an interest, but on the other hand, as I think we started this cross-examination, and you asked me if I'm a careful lawyer, and the answer is yes, and I don't always believe everything that I've been told.

Q. I'm very grateful for that answer, Mr Hauser.

Now, moving on to the second stage in the Rusal sale transaction, do you recall that on 17 June 2004 Mr De Cort sent you an email stating, for the first time so far as we're aware, that his client would not be making any warranties regarding beneficial ownership?

A. Well, in answer to the second part of the question, do I recall that Mr De Cort sent me an email, yes, I do. Do I accept that in fact the negotiations could be divided up into three stages, no.

Q. I'm not worried about that. Can we turn the email up briefly, Mr Hauser, it's bundle H(A)76/69 H(A)76/69. You can put away bundle 75. Perhaps you would like to read the email quickly to yourself, Mr Hauser. (Pause)

A. Yes.

Q. We can see that in the second numbered item here, Mr De Cort has told you that there would be no warranties about beneficial ownership. Do you see that?

A. I do.

Q. Do you recall whether Mr De Cort explained the reason why there would be no warranties about beneficial ownership, Mr Hauser?

A. No, I think the email speaks for itself. That was what I received, was the email.

Q. There was no follow-up discussion between you and Mr De Cort explaining why he could not provide any warranties about beneficial ownership?

A. Yes, there were discussions with Mr De Cort as to why his client didn't want to provide warranties about beneficial ownership and what they all had to do with was his understanding, which was something that we discussed openly, that following the acquisition of the shares, in the following years, it was likely that Mr Deripaska would attempt to list Rusal. There would be an IPO, and Mr De Cort made it very clear that he didn't want Mr Abramovich to have to assume liabilities in connection with the listing.

Of course, as far as I was concerned, the arguments as to why Mr De Cort didn't want Mr Abramovich to give warranties as to ownership were precisely the reasons why I wanted Mr Abramovich to give warranties or someone to give warranties as to beneficial ownership.

Q. Indeed. And if matters had proceeded as had originally been envisaged where there were warranties of beneficial ownership in favour of X and Y, and X and Y were also involved in documentation including releases, that would have meant that there would be no prospect of the IPO subsequently being derailed by X and Y coming forward. That logically follows, doesn't it?

A. I think this goes to the issue of your dividing the negotiations up into different phases. I don't accept --

Q. I'm not sure that it does, Mr Hauser, don't worry about the phases.

A. No, but let me answer your question.

Q. Yes, please do.

A. The position was, from the beginning of June up to and into the beginning of July, I had asked repeatedly from both Mr De Cort as well as from Mr Patarkatsishvili's representatives as to the nature of the beneficial interests and when the beneficial interests had arisen.

That was -- as far as I was concerned, it was a single continuum of negotiations, there was no break, there was no first stage, there was no second stage. The only stage was me asking the questions. Up until the beginning of July, I didn't get an answer to those questions and that was the principal focus. And it struck me that in terms of, for example, this answer, this answer didn't take us any further because this answer simply said there would be no warranties about beneficial ownership with no explanation as to what the underlying beneficial ownership was.

Q. So up until the beginning of July, you were not getting clear answers from Mr De Cort about who, if anyone, the beneficial owners were, is that correct?

A. Or from the representatives of Mr Patarkatsishvili as to the nature of his interest and in particular when it arose. So, yes, it's the case that Mr De Cort was not giving me clear answers but let's not single him out as an individual, I also wasn't getting clear answers from Mr Patarkatsishvili's representatives either.

Q. I'm grateful for that too.

Now, can we turn to bundle H(A)76, page 106 H(A)76/106, which is your memorandum dated 18 June 2004 which you drew up the day after the email that we've just looked at, the email in which Mr De Cort said there would be no warranties regarding beneficial ownership. Do you see that memorandum?

A. I do.

Q. Again, to set your mind at rest, Mr Hauser, this is a memorandum that we know was sent by Mr Mishakov to Mr Patarkatsishvili's representatives so it's a communication that crossed the line and is no longer privileged. But tell me this, do you recall whether it was also sent to Mr Abramovich's representatives, Mr Hauser?

A. No. In fact, I should say with respect to both of these memoranda, until the commencement of this action, I was not aware that either of these documents had been sent by Mr Mishakov or anyone else, either to Mr Abramovich's representatives or to Mr Patarkatsishvili's representatives.

Q. Because it was Mr Mishakov who had sent on the 9 June memorandum to Mr Patarkatsishvili's representatives and to Mr De Cort.

A. Well, if you say that's the case, that's the case.

Q. You were unaware of it?

A. I frankly don't know. I was not aware of it. And it also -- the conclusion or the further conclusion from all of that is that, during the course of these negotiations in 2004, I never had any discussions either with Mr Patarkatsishvili's representatives or Mr Abramovich's representative as to anything to do with either of these memoranda.

Q. That's fine and I accept that.

Now, this memorandum refers to a telephone conversation that you had with Mr Mishakov and I don't want to go into the contents of that telephone conversation because that may be privileged, but the second paragraph commences by saying "As I understand the position..." Do you see that, Mr Hauser?

A. I do.

Q. Again, without wishing to stray into any areas of privilege, Mr Hauser, and without referring to any information that you received from Mr Mishakov or your client, can you tell me whether your understanding was based on what Mr Abramovich's representatives had told you?

A. I think I previously indicated that this second paragraph is not drafted on the basis of any information I obtained from Mr Abramovich's representatives.

Q. Nor indeed from Mr Patarkatsishvili's representatives?

A. Nor indeed from Mr Patarkatsishvili's representatives.

Q. And nor was it derived solely from information that was available in the newspapers?

A. Well, this was not derived from -- I think the newspaper article that I referred to speaks for itself.

Q. I'm grateful, Mr Hauser.

Now, we know that your proposal in this memorandum which was to transfer the trust relationship was not in fact taken up and that, until early July 2004, a table entitled "Key Issues" passed backwards and forwards. That's Mr Faekov's table that you've referred to earlier in your evidence. Do you remember that table that Mr Faekov had drawn up?

- A. Yes, if we start with your comment, my proposal in the memorandum was not in fact taken up. The answer is that I was not aware that this memorandum had ever been even sent to Mr Patarkatsishvili's representatives or Mr Abramovich's representatives so it follows from that that we never negotiated the proposals that were set out in the memoranda because I didn't even know they had it.

With respect to the second point, there was a table entitled "Key Issues" that Mr Faekov revised based upon the draft that I had previously produced, I think on 14 June, and, yes, that Mr Faekov, having revised it, sent it to me and sent it to Mr De Cort for us to sign off on in order that it could then be put to the principals.

- Q. Just in relation to the first part of your answer, Mr Hauser, Mr Mishakov certainly didn't pick up your proposal and carry it forward to the other parties because we don't see any communications to that effect. That may not be something you were aware of at the time though?

A. I'm not aware of that at the time. I am aware of the fact that, if this proposal had been followed through, then I would have expected to have known about it since I was principally responsible for the negotiations.

Q. Absolutely.

And then in early July 2004, you began to get answers, as I think you indicated earlier, about beneficial ownership and we can see that if we take up bundle H(A)79 and turn to page 139 H(A)79/139. Do you see there an email from Mr De Cort dated 6 July 2004 to Mr Stalbek and copied to yourself?

A. Yes, to Mr Mishakov, yes.

Q. Sorry, Mr Mishakov, my mistake. Could you just briefly read the email to yourself, to remind yourself about what it says. (Pause)

We'll come on to the response in a moment. If you want to look at that, by all means do, but I was just going to focus firstly on Mr De Cort's email to you -- which was copied to you.

A. Well, I'm just wondering if -- because Mr De Cort's email starts by saying:

"We also want to resolve this as soon as possible..."

Is he referring or is he responding to the email from Mr Mishakov which is on the next page?

Q. No, I think that is the response from Mr Mishakov on the next page that we have, given the timings. It's 13.18.55 CEST that Mr Mishakov responds to the Andre De Cort email.

A. Then presumably there is an earlier email from Mr Mishakov to which this is responding?

Q. There is but I don't think we need to go to that for the moment, Mr Hauser.

What we see being proposed by Mr De Cort in this email of 6 July 2000 to resolve the impasse in relation to beneficial ownership warranties was that, although his client would not make any warranty or representation about beneficial ownership, he was prepared to sign a document that would freeze the position and prevent Mr Abramovich saying something else subsequently which was inconsistent with it, yes?

A. Well, that's what the email says.

Q. And we can see the acknowledgement that Mr De Cort was proposing in the prepenultimate paragraph of this email, can't we, Mr Hauser?

A. Yes.

Q. And that acknowledgement which Mr De Cort was proposing did not, it seems, go far enough and we can see that if we turn over the page to page 140 where we have Mr Mishakov's response to Mr De Cort later the same day

H(A)79/140. Could you read that to yourself?

A. Yes.

Q. What he says is that they are not interested in a statement of Mr Abramovich's interactions; what they are looking for -- what you are looking for is confirmation of beneficial ownership. Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. And so to avoid having to follow all this through, you can take it from me that what ultimately happens is a compromise. It was agreed that Mr Abramovich would acknowledge that the only person he had dealt with was Mr Patarkatsishvili and that whomever Mr Patarkatsishvili said was the beneficial owner was the beneficial owner. Do you recall that?

A. Yes.

Q. And at the same time Mr Patarkatsishvili would warrant that at all times since 15 March 2000 he had been the ultimate beneficial owner and was acting solely on his own account, do you recall?

A. That's correct. In fact that was contained in a separate agreement that was between Mr Patarkatsishvili as an individual and Mr Deripaska as an individual.

Q. That is also correct.

A. So it was not simply reflected in the corporate documents but there was also an individual undertaking.

Q. That is correct, Mr Hauser.

As a result your client no longer had the benefit of a direct representation or warranty from Mr Abramovich but you did have the benefit of a direct representation or warranty from Mr Patarkatsishvili. Do you recall that?

A. Well, that's right although we did have the benefit of Mr Abramovich's acknowledgement.

Q. You did, and there was some debate between the parties, which I don't think we need to go into, about quite what that acknowledgement constituted. Do you recall that?

A. Yes, there was a debate. As far as I was concerned, the acknowledgement was frankly as good as a representation because it was -- an acknowledgement was given knowing that Mr Deripaska would be relying upon it.

I was never really quite sure why Mr De Cort tried to draw a distinction between a deed of acknowledgement and a representation, but since it seemed to make him happy, then I was prepared to go along with it.

Q. Well, we can see the consequence of the representation from Patarkatsishvili, but only the acknowledgement from Mr Abramovich, reflected in an email which you sent to Mr Faekov on 8 July 2004. Can we just turn that up? It's bundle 80, you can put away bundle 79 and go to bundle H(A)80/86.

Do you have there an email that you sent, Mr Hauser, to Mr Faekov and copied to Mr Streshinsky on 8 July 2004?

A. Yes, and copied to Mr Mishakov as well.

Q. You're correct. You say at bullet point 1:

"My principal is not prepared to cap liability equal to the value of the purchase consideration received."

The liability that you're talking about capping or not capping, because you don't want to cap it, was Mr Patarkatsishvili's liability, wasn't it?

A. That's correct.

Q. The reason that you state, the first reason, we can see in paragraph (a), and we can pick it up in the third sentence:

"Instead, my principal is taking the word of [Mr Patarkatsishvili] (and indirectly [Mr Abramovich]) that this has been sorted [out] one way or the other."

A. Yes.

Q. So you were now looking primarily to Mr Patarkatsishvili and his representation and only indirectly to Mr Abramovich?

A. That's correct.

Q. I'm grateful. Now, I'd like to look briefly with you, if I may, Mr Hauser, at an email that you sent to Mr De Cort on 9 July 2004. Can we turn that up in bundle H(A)81, page 150 H(A)81/150.

If we could start by looking at the second email on this page which is the email which Mr De Cort sent to you on 9 July. Do you see that halfway down, Mr Hauser?

A. I do.

Q. You'll see if you read it to yourself that Mr De Cort was now proposing a slightly different acknowledgement that would be made by his client.

Do you want to just read it to yourself? (Pause)

A. Yes.

Q. And then if you look back up the page, we can see that you replied via email to Mr De Cort the same day explaining that you thought that there was a problem with his proposed wording.

Do you want to read that email to yourself? (Pause)

A. Yes.

Q. And in the light of that email, Mr De Cort ultimately backed down, didn't he, Mr Hauser? He agreed a final form of wording for the deed of acknowledgement in which Mr Abramovich acknowledged to your client that the only person he had ever dealt with or had understandings or arrangements with was Mr Patarkatsishvili, and that final acknowledgement made no reference to Mr Patarkatsishvili's affiliates and associated persons?

A. That's correct.

Q. We can see that -- we can put bundle H(A)81 away -- if we go to bundle H(A)84/82. Do you see there the deed of acknowledgement that is dated 20 July 2004 that was to be executed, and was in fact executed, by Mr Abramovich and Mr Deripaska?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. If we turn within the document to page 83, we can see that at the bottom of the page the final form of the acknowledgement that Mr Abramovich was prepared to make to Mr Deripaska is set out.

Would you like to read that to yourself, Mr Hauser?

(Pause)

A. Yes.

Q. That acknowledgement in its final form makes no reference to the beneficial owners of affiliates and associated persons also being interested in the 25 per cent Rusal shareholding, does it, Mr Hauser?

A. No, it doesn't. It says what it says.

Q. What you never got, Mr Hauser, was a deep pocket warranty from Mr Abramovich to Mr Deripaska or to Eagle Capital to the effect that Mr Berezovsky's claims that he had made in the press in early June 2004 were baseless?

A. No, I got a deep pocket warranty from Mr Patarkatsishvili that that was the case.

Q. You did, but not from Mr Abramovich, correct?

A. That's correct.

Q. And none of the other documents that were executed by Mr Abramovich's company, Madison, included a warranty or representation or acknowledgement by Mr Madison (sic) to Mr Deripaska or Eagle Capital that Mr Berezovsky's claims were baseless; that's right, isn't it?

A. Well, none of the documents referred to Mr Berezovsky's claims in any respect. As far as I recall, I don't recall off the top of my head exactly what each and every one of the other documents said, but I think, broadly speaking, you're right. I don't think that we obtained a title warranty from any of Mr Abramovich's companies.

Q. And indeed, if you had got such a warranty or an indemnity from Mr Abramovich, is it fair to say that you would have been less concerned about getting warranties of historic beneficial ownership, Mr Hauser?

A. No. No, absolutely not.

Q. You see, if you had the benefit of a warranty that third party claims to the Rusal shares were baseless, or an indemnity against such third party claims, a warranty relating to present beneficial ownership of the 25 per cent stake in Rusal would most probably have been sufficient for your purposes?

A. Absolutely not. Absolutely not.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Why do you say that?

MR MASEFIELD: Why do you say that?

A. We have to go back to what had happened in 2003 and 2004. Insofar as 2003 was concerned, my client had agreed to pay a substantial amount of money to Mr Abramovich in respect of half of the Rusal shares. The parties had been parties to a shareholders agreement and other arrangements that since 15 March 2000 had governed the way in which Rusal, however it was constituted, had been managed.

Most of the management responsibilities had fallen upon Mr Deripaska and Mr Deripaska's colleagues. It was Mr Deripaska who had managed Rusal from 15 March 2000 to the purchase of the first 25 per cent in the fall of 2003, and it was Mr Deripaska who thereafter continued to manage Rusal into June and July of 2004.

At the time we did the first deal in 2003, I was insistent that I wanted a release of all claims from Mr Abramovich based upon the previous management of Rusal. It was important that I had that because effectively we wanted to draw a line beyond which there would be no further claims. Once Mr Abramovich had sold his shares to Mr Deripaska, that was the end of it.

What had happened between 2003 and 2004 was that when we got into 2004, I was then told by Mr Patarkatsishvili's representatives for the first time that he was in fact a beneficial shareholder of Rusal. That raised the possibility that, as a beneficial owner, Mr Patarkatsishvili might have made claims relating to Mr Deripaska's management of Rusal all the way back to 15 March 2000.

So as far as I was concerned, the fact that I wanted a title representation and warranty back to 15 March 2000 was because I needed that in order to buttress the release that I had gotten in the first instance from Mr Abramovich in 2003, and then, critically, the second release that I received from Mr Patarkatsishvili in 2004.

If I hadn't had the representation and warranty as to beneficial ownership back to 15 March 2000 then it always raised the possibility that some third party might show up, claim to have had an interest some time during that period, and then had asserted a claim against Mr Deripaska relating to the management of Rusal at that time.

Q. But if you had a warranty or release in respect of third party claims that would have been sufficient for the purposes of title, and you could have had releases as against management claims dealt with separately?

A. I did have releases -- I did have a separate document that released Mr Deripaska and all of his affiliates from management, and frankly any other claim at all. I got one of those in 2003 and another one in 2004. But in order for those releases to be regarded as comprehensive, I needed to have strong title representations and warranties back to 15 March 2000. If I didn't have that, then there was always the possibility that the releases that I had were not sufficiently comprehensive and there was someone else that was out there who hadn't released and who might then assert a claim against Mr Deripaska.

Q. But what I think we can agree, can we not, Mr Hauser, is that you did not get any warranty or representation from Mr Abramovich or his company, Madison, that Mr Berezovsky's claims were baseless?

A. No, I got that representation and warranty effectively from Mr Patarkatsishvili.

Q. You say effectively, but it was from a different --

A. Well, it was effectively in the sense it did not refer to Mr Berezovsky by name. It was couched in universal language so that it would, by definition, have included such claims.

MR MASEFIELD: My Lady, I've got no further questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much, Mr Masefield.

Yes, Ms Davies.

Re-examination by MS DAVIES

MS DAVIES: Mr Hauser, just a few questions, if I may.

At the outset of his cross-examination, Mr Masefield asked you a few questions about your general approach in relation to agreements of the nature that we've been looking at today, and I'm not asking you in the questions that I'm about to ask you anything other than your general approach to negotiating these kinds of agreements. I make that clear.

But as a matter of your general approach to agreements, selling shares or merging business interests, would you be happy to allow your client to enter into an agreement which you believed to be factually inaccurate?

A. No.

Q. If you could take bundle H(A)18, at page 124 H(A)18/124, you should find the share purchase and sale agreement dated 15 March which both I and Mr Masefield asked you some questions about.

A. Yes.

Q. Now, Mr Masefield took you to clause 6.1.1 on page 131 of this agreement and specifically to the reference to "Other Selling Shareholders" in that clause.

For my Lady's reference, at [draft] page 42 of the transcript you referred to discussions that you had had with Mr Schneider in relation to other selling shareholders and to the possibility that Mr Abramovich had one or other parties that had interests of one sort or another, and said that you were focused -- the person you were focused on was Mr Shvidler.

A. Yes.

Q. Did you discuss with Mr Schneider the names of any other individuals in the context of your discussions about other selling shareholders?

A. No.

Q. You can put away bundle H(A)18. If you could be given bundle H(A)19 at page 22 H(A)19/22. This is the amended and restated share purchase and sale agreement dated 15 May 2000 which both I and Mr Masefield asked you some questions about, and in particular Mr Masefield asked you some questions about the definition of "Other P1 Shareholders" that we see on page 23.

He asked you, and for my Lady's reference, this is page 51 of the draft transcript anyway, whether that was the subject of discussion with Mr Abramovich's representatives and you said that it was.

A. Yes.

Q. Do you recall that evidence?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, in that context of your discussions with Mr Abramovich's representatives about other P1 shareholders --

A. I should say it was Mr Schneider that I talked to about this. It's maybe just easier to refer to him by name.

Q. In your discussions with Mr Schneider about the term "Other P1 Shareholders" were the names of any individuals discussed?

A. No.

The discussion at that stage was frankly simply to carry over the definition with I think some slight modifications of "Other Selling Shareholders" and rephrase it as "Other P1 Shareholders".

Q. Put that bundle away and be given bundle H(A)75 at page 228.001 H(A)75/228.001.

A. Yes.

Q. You should have the memorandum dated 14 June 2004 that both Mr Masefield and I asked you some questions about.

A. Yes.

Q. Again the reference for my Lady is page 73 of the draft transcript.

You were being referred to this memorandum, and in particular the references to X and Y that we see in this memorandum, and you explain that you'd been told by Mr Streshinsky or Ms Arbatova at the meeting on 11 June that Mr Berezovsky did not have a beneficial interest in Rusal but you did not always believe what you were told.

A. Correct.

Q. Can you recall whether or not either Mr Abramovich's representatives or Mr Patarkatsishvili's representatives ever indicated to you, in the context of the 2004 transaction, that Mr Berezovsky had a beneficial interest in Rusal?

A. No. They didn't do that at all.

MS DAVIES: Thank you very much, Mr Hauser.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much, Mr Hauser, for coming to give your evidence. You may be released.

(The witness withdrew)

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, that concludes the evidence on behalf of Mr Abramovich apart from Mr Bulygin's witness statement which your Ladyship will have read which I would ask to be treated as part of the record.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. Thank you very much.

Yes, Mr Malek.

MR MALEK: My Lady, the next witness is Mr Anisimov and he will be giving evidence in Russian.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Fine.

What bundle is it for his --

MR MALEK: F1, my Lady. F1, tab 1.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just a second, please.

MR VASILIIY ANISIMOV (sworn)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Please sit down if you would like to.

THE WITNESS: (Not interpreted) Thank you.

Examination-in-chief by MR MALEK

MR MALEK: Mr Anisimov, can you hear us? Can you tell the court your full name, please.

A. Anisimov Vasiliy Vyacheslav.

Q. And it's right to say that you do not speak English?

A. I do not speak English, no.

Q. And it's also right that you do not read English?

A. No, I don't read English.

Q. Could Mr Anisimov be provided with his witness statement.

While that's being turned up, could you confirm that you do not have a mobile phone on you?

A. I have nothing on me, neither a mobile phone nor any other device, no other technical equipment.

Q. Could you please turn to your statement, which you will find in the Russian text at F1/01 at page 26 F1/01/26.

Do you have that in front of you?

A. Yes.

Q. And is that the first page of your statement?

A. Yes, that is the first page of my statement.

Q. And could you now turn to the end of that statement which is F1/01 at page 52 F1/01/52.

Do you have that in front of you?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, the signed version is not I think in this bundle, but if you look on the screen next to you, you should see -- is your signature there?

A. No, it's not my signature on the screen, but in fact I have a hard copy with my signature in front of me.

Q. Can you confirm that that is your signature?

A. Yes, it's my signature right here on page 52 in the hard copy.

Q. Can you confirm that your witness statement is true?

A. My witness statement is true.

MR MALEK: Thank you.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, I think it's convenient --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Sorry, I couldn't hear.

MR SUMPTION: I think it's convenient that I should ask any questions on behalf of Mr Abramovich before Mr Anisimov --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You're content with that, Mr Rabinowitz?

MR RABINOWITZ: I am.

Cross-examination by MR SUMPTION

MR SUMPTION: Mr Anisimov, do you know how relations were between Mr Abramovich and Mr Patarkatsishvili between 2000 and 2008? How did they get on?

A. Well, during the time that I was friends with Badri we often discussed Mr Abramovich and, as far as I remember, he always spoke very nicely, very kindly and favourably about Mr Abramovich. He liked him. He liked him, to be concise, until the very end, until a month before his death. We discussed it, I don't know why, but it sort of turned out that we discussed Abramovich, and Badri always had very nice memories, and he always spoke very nicely about Roman Abramovich.

Q. You said this is during the period that you knew Mr Patarkatsishvili. When did that period begin?

A. I met Badri in 1999 in the summer of '99.

MR SUMPTION: Thank you.

A. You're welcome.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, who is going next?

Mr Rabinowitz.

Cross-examination by MR RABINOWITZ

MR RABINOWITZ: Good afternoon, Mr Anisimov.

A. Good afternoon.

Q. You tell us you're a Russian businessman based in Moscow, is that right?

A. Yes, I mainly live in Moscow but very often I am in Switzerland and in Italy and occasionally I come to England.

Q. And I think that you say in your witness statement, and you have just said again -- perhaps I'll put the question this way.

Since 2000 you have been on good terms with Mr Abramovich, both from a personal and a business perspective, is that right?

A. Well, not quite so. I am on good terms with him but we don't have any joint business, and practically we've never had any business relationship with Abramovich. But we're on good terms, yes.

Q. Can you look, please, at paragraph 56 of your witness statement, you will find it in the Russian at page 42 F1/01/42 and in the English at page 15 F1/01/15.

A. I'm looking at it.

Q. You see here you are talking about Mr Abramovich, and around the third or fourth sentence you say that you tended not to discuss business with Mr Abramovich:

"... although I was (and still am) on good terms with him from both a personal and a business perspective."

So when I asked you whether you had been since 2000 on good terms with Mr Abramovich from both a personal and a business perspective, the answer to that was --

A. Okay, I got the question, I understand it. May I answer?

Q. Yes, please do.

A. Thank you. The thing is that when we talk about in terms of business, that doesn't mean we have joint business, that means you can come to a person and you can ask for his advice, and he was always very friendly, he'd always answer. He had good opportunities, he would recommend where I might turn, to which people I might turn who could assist me.

So that's not joint business that we would undertake together, because after the sale of my share in Krasnoyarsk assets we've never had any joint business, but that's what I meant.

Q. Okay. Are you still on good terms with Mr Abramovich?

A. Yes. Normal good terms. We don't often meet or see each other but we're on good terms, yes.

Q. Do I understand from your previous answer that you have never had any joint business interests with Mr Abramovich, is that what you're saying?

A. Well, I've already said that -- is this a question? This is a question, is it?

Q. It is a question.

A. Thank you. Well, we only had one joint business when we were selling Krasnoyarsk assets to Mr Abramovich, and the second time we met when 25 per cent of Rusal was sold off on behalf and on request of Badri. And

I don't -- didn't have any other business with him,
I just can't remember anything else.

Q. Now, Mr Abramovich is obviously an extremely influential businessman in Russia, isn't he, Mr Anisimov?

A. Perhaps he is influential, I suppose. I suppose he is influential, yes, you could say so. What do I understand by the word "influential"? I know that he's on good terms with people in business, he is on good terms with state authorities. But I have never seen any influence. I mean, the word "influence" in Russian, it has a connotation, it has a slightly ambiguous connotation. I think he is an honest businessman, that's what I think.

Q. And no doubt you would want to preserve good business -- good relations with Mr Abramovich, Mr Anisimov, because that might be useful to you in the future, correct?

A. You know, I am 60 years old and my relations are important to me when I have comfortable relations with people just as people, and I'm not seeking people with influence. At my age, you are seeking warmth from people --

Q. At my age as well.

A. -- you are not seeking influence et cetera.

Q. You also tell us at paragraph 67 of your witness statement, you'll find that at page 46 in the Russian

F1/01/46 and page 18 in the English version

F1/01/18, that you were in 2004 on good terms with Mr Deripaska, is that right?

A. Yes. Yes, that is so. I've known Deripaska for a long time. I met him before I met anyone else. I'd known him since '92/'93 I think. We didn't meet often, not at all, and in fact we have met very few times, but there's always been some respect. He was the most -- the youngest person in aluminium business, and I was the veteran, I suppose, in aluminium business, so we had good relationship. It's not a friendship but healthy, normal, good relationship as between people who are not military.

Q. Are you still on good terms with Mr Deripaska, Mr Anisimov?

A. You know, we're of different age, we're people of different age, and watching the process or the proceedings that Mr Deripaska has burdened himself with, nobody can be close to him.

The business that -- I mean, I fly a lot, but he must fly all the time, he must live in the aircraft. His business is huge and this life must be so hard, totally unrealistic. So we hardly ever meet, there's no friendship, we meet hardly ever, for a couple of minutes, each of us flies on our own plane, so it's very, very infrequent. For a year or 18 months we may never meet.

Q. When you do meet you're still on good terms with him, is that right?

A. Yes, I'm on good terms with everyone who is present here. What do you mean? We don't visit each other in our homes, our families are not friends, I am not interested in his marital status or anything like that, just ordinary relationship between people. He hasn't done anything wrong, I've never done anything wrong vis-a-vis him, so, yes, a normal relationship.

Q. You see, at the same time as explaining your friendship and good relations with Mr Abramovich and Mr Deripaska, you also tell us, this is at paragraph 19 of your witness statement, you appear to be talking about some time in the mid-2000s --

A. (Untranslated).

Q. Sorry, paragraph 19, page 32 of the Russian F1/01/32, page 6 in the English F1/01/6.

So you've told us you have good relations with Mr Deripaska and good relations with Mr Abramovich. And you explain here, and I think you're talking about a period in mid-2000, you say you did not like or trust Mr Berezovsky, is that statement correct?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. Is it still the case that you do not like Mr Berezovsky?

A. I don't like him.

Q. Despite your age. Forget about that one.

My Lady, that's probably...

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Anisimov, you mustn't talk to anyone about your evidence or about the case over the lunch break, do you understand?

A. Yes, I do understand. Thank you very much.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Two o'clock.

(1.00 pm)

(The short adjournment)

(2.00 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Rabinowitz, I've just been given a bundle with the chronology and dramatis personae. You might not know, has it changed since the last version?

MR RABINOWITZ: I don't think so, my Lady. I don't know what bundle your Ladyship has been given and I haven't seen it so I'm slightly loathe to say anything about it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It's just that I've been annotating my original one which I just put in a file, and if this is an up-to-date version or a different --

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm not conscious of it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Perhaps somebody could tell me.

MR RABINOWITZ: I see Ms Davies is shaking her head.

MR SUMPTION: I think your Ladyship has just been given it in a fancy bundle.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, okay. Then I will transfer it.

It's just that if it was updated -- perhaps somebody more junior than all of you here can let me know whether it has been updated.

MR SUMPTION: It's confirmed from behind me that it's the same document.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well, thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: Just the fancy bundle then.

Mr Anisimov, you tell us at paragraph 2 of your witness statement, that's on page 27 of the Russian F1/01/27 and page 1 of the English version F1/01/1, that in the late 1990s you were heavily involved in the aluminium industry, that's correct, is it?

A. Yes.

Q. And you had a significant stake in the Krasnoyarsk Aluminium Plant and the Krasnoyarsk Hydroelectric Power Station, correct?

A. Yes, absolutely right.

Q. You had no interest in the Bratsk assets, or at least none that was sold to Mr Abramovich in February 2000, correct?

A. No, I never had anything to do with Bratsk.

Q. Okay. And you also tell us that you divested yourself of your aluminium assets and began to invest in the real estate market in Moscow and New York in 2000, is that right?

A. Not quite, not quite.

Q. Do you want to explain why that is not quite right?

A. If necessary, yes, I can explain. I did not divest from Krasnoyarsk but the situation was such that other people created conditions for us that forced us out of this business and therefore we were forced to sell our assets, because the situation in Krasnoyarsk was very complex from all points of view. From the point of view of Governor Lebed and the authorities of Krasnoyarsk region there was pressure and there was a very difficult situation with the criminal gangs that were very strong in Krasnoyarsk. I would say that unbridled criminality reigned from '94 to '97. Seventy people were murdered in Krasnoyarsk.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Could I just understand, how did that impact on the production of aluminium, and how did it interfere with the business?

A. Well, I'll give you a couple of examples so it will be clearer. We had a case when my staff, they came to Krasnoyarsk, they were met in the airport, they boarded a bus, clearly these were criminal gang people. They were brought to a cemetery and they were shown the graves and said, "If you continue working in Krasnoyarsk this is the fate that awaits you." And of course it impacts the psychology of normal people that are not connected with the criminal gangs.

And then another side was even sadder for us, because the governor, the governor ordered law enforcement authorities to come with raids to the plant wearing masks, and particularly when our main raw material, alumina, that was supplied by our enterprises, this alumina would stay at railway junctions for weeks and weeks and weeks, and they would find all kinds of pretexts why we couldn't unload it, they said that there would be bombs there or something, and the situation didn't allow us to operate.

We also worried about our personal safety, we worried for our lives, and that had a very negative effect on myself and the people who worked in our company, and this carried on for a long time.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see, thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: You mentioned the governor ordering law enforcement authorities to come with raids to the plant wearing masks, that was Lebed, was it?

A. Yes, it was General Lebed.

Q. Now, in fact I think we were at cross-purposes. I used the word you "divested" yourself of your aluminium business, because that's the word that in the English translation of your witness statement is used. I didn't mean to suggest it had any connotations as to why you sold your interests, I just wanted to confirm with you that that is when you sold your interests?

A. Yes, naturally, I was forced to sell my shares.

Q. All right. Now, in addition to investing in the real estate market -- let me ask it this way: you did however with the money you received, part of the money, invest in the real estate market in Moscow and New York, is that right?

A. Yes, I was involved in real estate, and naturally I was looking for quieter spheres of investing my money, so we invested in New York and in Moscow and in Moscow region, invested in real estate, yes.

Q. But you also made a substantial investment in the Russian metals company MGOK, didn't you, Mr Anisimov, in 2004?

A. This was a while later when, in my view, Russia was more stable, the situation was more stable. And when we saw that there were some limits to criminality, limits to what was being done, then Mr Usmanov suggested I acquire Mikhailovsky GOK, or MGOK as you call it, and I took part, personally took part in acquiring Mikhailovsky GOK.

Q. And that was in 2004?

- A. Yes, it was 2004, you are right.
- Q. And is this right, MGOK subsequently emerged with Metalloinvest, is that right?
- A. Yes. I don't remember exactly, but I think a couple of years later, with another group, we managed to merge these assets and a group called Metalloinvest was born.
- Q. I think you tell us at paragraph 78 of your witness statement that that was in 2006 F1/01/21?
- A. Yes.
- Q. Now, following the merger between MGOK and Metalloinvest, you have held a 20 per cent stake in Metalloinvest, is that right?
- A. Absolutely right.
- Q. Are you aware that in October 2010 Reuters issued a report suggesting that a 20 per cent stake in Metalloinvest was worth about $4 billion? If you're not aware of that, just say so.
- A. No, I didn't read the article, because the prices in metals business have a tendency of volatility, of jumping up and down. So there's no point in paying attention to any of these reports because nobody was about to sell anything, so no, I didn't read it.
- Q. Thank you.

You would presumably accept that your 20 per cent stake in -- the 20 per cent stake in Metalloinvest is worth a very substantial amount of money, is that right?

A. I would very much like to think so.

Q. And you are currently in litigation with Mr Berezovsky in the English courts in the Chancery Division, that is right, isn't it?

A. Yes, well, I'm here so it must be right.

Q. I'm not going to trespass on the merits of that dispute and, in particular, whilst I do not accept the truth of your evidence on these matters, I'm not going to cross-examine you on evidence you have given in this case which is relevant only to that dispute. Do you understand?

A. Well, I don't understand it in great detail but I'm listening to you very attentively. You have your own opinion and naturally you are perfectly entitled to your opinion, although that is not so.

Q. I haven't expressed an opinion, Mr Anisimov, I'm just trying to explain to you about the things I'm not going to ask you about. I'm not going to ask you about evidence you have given which is relevant to that action but not this action.

A. That's your right.

Q. So I'm not going to get into the detail and the merits of either side's position in Metalloinvest, but can I just see if we can agree what in summary the dispute there is about.

Let me put a proposition to you and then you can agree with it or not.

For those who want to follow this, this is all taken from the pleadings in that action, Mr Berezovsky's claim and Mr Anisimov's defence.

Now, in the Metalloinvest claim, Mr Berezovsky is saying that of your 20 per cent stake in Metalloinvest a quarter of that, or 5 per cent of Metalloinvest as a whole, belongs to him. Now, I know you don't agree with that but it's right, isn't it, that that is what he's claiming? Is that correct?

- A. I've read the documents, yes, and I can see that it is right.
- Q. And it's common ground in that action between you and Mr Berezovsky that the MGOK acquisition was made in part using monies received by Cliren, that's the company that was set up for Mr Patarkatsishvili, and derived from the proceeds of the second Rusal sale, that's the sale of the Rusal shares in 2004. Do you agree with that?
- A. I didn't quite understand the question because it was a bit long so I'd like to really, really understand what it is that you're aiming at.
- Q. Let me see if I can break it down.

In the Metalloinvest action --

- A. Yes, be so kind.
- Q. In the Metalloinvest action you and Mr Berezovsky both say that the acquisition of the MGOK shares was made using money received by Cliren, the company set up for Mr Patarkatsishvili, and derived from money obtained out of the sale of the 25 per cent of Rusal shares in July 2004.
- A. Yes, indeed. The funds came from the 25 per cent sale of Rusal shares which we, with my friend, agreed to split 50/50. Indeed 250 were then used to acquire Mikhailovsky GOK although the price was 1.65 billion on the whole.
- Q. Now, I'm not going to get into the two sides of the story, I just want to make sure that we agree about what is in dispute and not in dispute in that case.
- In that case Mr Berezovsky is saying, and again I know you don't agree with this, but what he is saying is that you agreed in 2004 to reinvest the proceeds of that Rusal sale in MGOK for and on behalf of both Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky. I know you don't agree with what he is saying, but that is what he is saying, correct?
- A. Yes. I did not agree -- I do not agree with that but that's what he is saying.
- Q. Mr Berezovsky also says that you knew in 2004 and after that that he, Mr Berezovsky, had a 50 per cent interest in the Rusal proceeds. Now, again, I know you don't agree with that but that is what he is saying in that claim. Is that right?

A. Well, I read it, I read it, and this is what I read. But clearly I don't agree with it.

Q. No. In that action you are saying this: first you say that Mr Berezovsky never had an interest in Rusal or the Rusal proceeds, is that right?

A. I claim that I have never seen or heard him to take part in any negotiations, he was never at any meetings, and these things were never discussed.

Q. So you say in that litigation that Mr Berezovsky never had any interest in Rusal or the Rusal proceeds?

A. Yes, that's what I say. I say that he didn't.

Q. And in that litigation you also say that even if Mr Berezovsky did have an interest either in Rusal or the Rusal proceeds, you were not aware of it, is that right?

A. It's all correct, but may I ask you a question? I don't quite understand what other -- what other court proceedings are you talking about? This is my first ever appearance in any court.

Q. I'm not talking about a court --

A. What kind of proceedings are we discussing? We're discussing some other proceedings, and this is my first ever appearance in any proceedings.

Q. I'm just discussing that --

A. Maybe I'm just not understanding what you mean.

Q. No, Mr Anisimov, don't worry. What I'm saying is not that you've appeared in court and you have given evidence in any proceedings, I'm simply trying to identify the dispute between yourself and Mr Berezovsky and what is at the centre of it. Okay?

A. Okay.

Q. Given that this is what you and Mr Berezovsky are in dispute about, would you accept, Mr Anisimov, that you have a very real financial incentive in seeking to deny that Mr Berezovsky had any interest whatsoever in Rusal?

A. I don't quite understand the question. I never have any motives or -- to deny anything. I just know that Mr Berezovsky was not present in this process. I'm not denying anything, I'm just stating the fact.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think you had better put the question again.

A. And I'm here in these proceedings because -- to deny this.

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Anisimov, I'll ask the question again, and it's not your fault, there is obviously a language barrier between us.

What I'm asking you is this: in light of the fact that you and Mr Berezovsky are in a dispute about the MGOK shares, which turns on whether or not --

A. Oh, you mean future hearings? Because it's not quite clear. Now I understand.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: In the Chancery actions.

A. Right, now I understand, because it's not happening yet. Thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: Because of your involvement in those Chancery actions with this dispute, which turns on whether -- which depends on whether Mr Berezovsky had an interest in Rusal and whether you knew he had an interest in Rusal, do you accept that you have a very real financial incentive in seeking to deny that Mr Berezovsky did have any interest whatever in Rusal?

A. Once again, I repeat I have no interest or no motives to deny anything had I known it. Naturally I would not deny it if I knew it. But the thing is that I know that in the course of all the negotiations, and in the course of all my conversations with my close friend, Berezovsky's surname was never mentioned.

Q. Well, let's see if that's the case, Mr Anisimov, but I'm going to move on.

I want to ask you about the sale of the KrAZ assets in February 2000 and the second Rusal sale in June and July 2004.

A. Go ahead.

Q. While you were involved in both transactions, you've explained in your witness statement -- this is at paragraph 9, page 27 of the Russian F1/01/27 and page 3 in the English F1/01/3 -- that your involvement was at a fairly high level, and that you delegated much of the detailed work to your assistants, Mr Mark Buzuk and Mr Ivan Streshinsky, is that right?

A. Absolutely correct.

Q. And both Mr --

A. On the first deal the main person, my main adviser, was Mr Buzuk, and Mr Streshinsky assisted him. As far as the second deal is concerned, only Mr Streshinsky was assisting me because Mr Buzuk by that time was not employed in the company any more.

Q. You tell us that you had full faith in both Mr Buzuk's and Mr Streshinsky's ability and that you trusted them to get the details right, is that correct?

A. Absolutely correct, because those people were very professional, and I think that at that time I had the strongest teams of advisers in Russia in this business.

Q. And it's also clear from the evidence you give about the second Rusal sale in June/July 2004 that although you had delegated the detail of that transaction to Mr Streshinsky, he kept you updated on progress of the transaction on an almost daily basis, is that right?

- A. Yes, with a small explanation: I was involved in business and generally I'm a very active person. By that time we have -- had been working together with Mr Streshinsky for a long time and naturally I fully trusted him, and, yes indeed, he just showed me some documents and I just asked him, "Is everything okay?" He said, "Everything okay." So I trusted him completely. He went away and continued working.
- Q. You tell us at paragraph 73 of your witness statement, that's at page 20 in the English F1/01/20 and page 48 of the Russian F1/01/48, that you would ask him --
- A. (Untranslated).
- Q. Page 48 of the Russian. So you say this, that you would ask him from time to time if there were any important developments or problems with the deal that you needed to know and, if there were, presumably he would tell you?
- A. Yes. I confirm that.
- Q. Is that the way your relationship with Mr Streshinsky normally worked, Mr Anisimov, that you would delegate the detail to him, but he would then proceed to keep you updated of important developments?
- A. Yes, absolutely.

- Q. And you trusted that Mr Streshinsky would bring important matters to your attention, is that right?
- A. Yes, I think so, yes.
- Q. And I think you may already have given a partial, at least, answer to this, Mr Anisimov, but would you say having employed Mr Streshinsky over a number of years that he is a careful and diligent lawyer?
- A. Well, I wouldn't characterise him like that. He's not a lawyer.
- Q. Sorry, a careful man?
- A. Yes, he is, indeed he is careful, professional, that's the most important thing, and he understands what he's dealing with and what he's doing.
- Q. And he's fluent in Russian and he has a reasonably good grasp of English and western business concepts, is that right?
- A. Yes, he had worked for many years with my company in Switzerland. I think he's not fluent but he speaks English well, he speaks Russian, and he's worked a lot in contact with western companies.
- Q. Now, I'd like to move on to consider with you the sale of your KrAZ assets in February 2000. You tell us at paragraph 37 of your witness statement, that's at page 37 in the Russian F1/01/37 and page 11 in the English F1/01/11, that when you came to consider divesting yourself of the KrAZ assets in the course of 1999 you got in contact with Mr Patarkatsishvili, correct?

A. Yes, that's true.

Q. And you say it was Mr Patarkatsishvili who suggested that you should approach Mr Abramovich to see if he would be interested in buying, is that right?

A. Yes. Yes, it did happen.

Q. And you also say that you did then make contact with Mr Abramovich, and that Mr Abramovich appeared reluctant at first to make the acquisition, correct?

A. Yes, absolutely right.

Q. But you say that subsequently Mr Abramovich agreed to enter into negotiations in which you recall yourself and your representatives, Mr Abramovich and his representatives and Mr Patarkatsishvili all being involved, along with Mr Chernoi and Mr Reuben, is that right?

A. You know, that was quite a while ago, but approximately what you are saying reflects the truth. Badri and Mr Chernoi and Mr Reuben, although we discussed different aspects with different people, because Chernoi and Reuben also owned Bratsk assets, so often we talked -- the negotiations on Bratsk enterprise did not involve us very often.

- Q. And that reflects your witness statement where you very fairly say you were not present at all the negotiations, and in particular you weren't present at the negotiations that focused on the sale of the Bratsk assets in which you had no interest, is that right?
- A. Yes, that's correct. Completely correct.
- Q. It's obviously likely that Mr Chernoi and Mr Reuben, or their representatives like Mr Bosov, would have been present at those meetings involving Bratsk, is that right?
- A. In Krasnoyarsk and in Bratsk the shareholders counted Chernoi and Reuben. And their share, if I remember correctly, Mr Bosov was simply managing those assets, or maybe perhaps just on Krasnoyarsk. I don't remember correctly.
- Q. So you accept that there would have been meetings which you did not attend?
- A. Perhaps yes, I suppose so, yes.
- Q. Now, can I ask you then to look at paragraph 43 of your witness statement, page 38 of the Russian F1/01/38, page 12 of the English F1/01/12. You explain there that in February 2000 the sale of the KrAZ assets was agreed, and that you also say the agreement dated 10 February was drafted, so far as you're aware, by your in-house team and Mr Abramovich's in-house team, is that right?

A. Yes, all correct.

Q. And from your side, again, that would have included Mr Streshinsky and Mr Buzuk?

A. Most likely Mr Buzuk was involved, because Mr Streshinsky reported to Mr Buzuk and I would imagine it was Mr Buzuk. I can't be completely certain but I think it must have been Mr Buzuk.

Q. But Mr Streshinsky was, I think you already told us, involved in the February 2000 sale?

A. He was involved, but once again the director general of my company was Mr Buzuk. Mr Streshinsky dealt with the financial aspects and he reported to Mr Buzuk. Although further on I had closer relationship with Mr Streshinsky, but at that time the most important person for the business was Mr Buzuk.

Q. I don't think we're disagreeing about this but your own evidence, Mr Anisimov, is that Mr Streshinsky was involved in the KrAZ assets, that's what you say at paragraph 9.

A. Yes, yes, yes, he was involved, he was involved. I'm not denying it. I'm just saying that Mr Streshinsky was less involved than Mr Buzuk in this deal because Mr Streshinsky was a deputy for Mr Buzuk.

Q. Now, can we just look, please, at the agreement that was made at that time. It's in bundle H(A)70, and you will be given this Mr Anisimov. Bundle H(A)17, page 38 H(A)17/38 for the Russian and page 38T in the English H(A)17/38T. You will be given, I'm sure, the Russian.

A. Thank you. Yes, I can see it now.

Q. Thank you, Mr Anisimov. If you go to page 43, this is only in the Russian, there's a signature page with signatures, and can you confirm that your signature is the signature under "Party 5", please?

A. Yes, this is my signature.

Q. And just looking at the signatures under "Party 1", there are three signatures there, and you may not be able to say, but insofar as you are aware can you confirm that those are the signatures of Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler and Mr Patarkatsishvili, please?

A. Honestly, it was a long time ago, but I think these are their signatures. I don't remember where we were signing this document, whether we -- this document was bought to each one of us in turn. But I knew, and I know, that these signatures existed.

We concluded this agreement, it's like a protocol of intent, that people would like to sell their assets, no more than that.

Q. You say in your witness statement, Mr Anisimov, this is at paragraph 44, page 12 of the English F1/01/12, page 39 of the Russian F1/01/39. Don't put that away, but if you take your witness statement, in the Russian page 39 and in the English page 12, paragraph 44, do you see that you say there that party 1 and each of Mr Abramovich, Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Shvidler is defined in this agreement as the purchasers.

And then you say:

"As far as [you were] concerned at the time, as a result of their signature on this document, and as a consequence of the way they acted at the meetings which I attended, there was no reason for me not to believe that they had each acquired some form of interest in the KrAZ assets as a result of the sale."

Is that right?

- A. Well, it's just a small part of my explanation because, in fact, yes I confirm it, but at the same time I never knew what share, how much and what agreements existed between Abramovich and Shvidler and my friend Patarkatsishvili.
- Q. Now, just focusing on the part of that statement where you explain that, in part as a result of the signature but also as a consequence of the way they acted at the meetings you attended, there was no reason for you to believe that they had -- for you not to believe that they had each acquired some interest.

Presumably you formed this view as a result of the way in which they did act at those meetings, and what I wanted to ask you was this. What was it about the way that they acted at these meetings that made you consider that they were the acquirers of these interests?

- A. You know, honestly speaking, regarding their behaviour, they behaved like normal people. They were given the documents, they signed them, they confirmed that yes, this document exists. And for me the most important thing was not this. For me the most important thing was to get my money, because I had other plant in the Urals and I didn't really pay much attention to their behaviour, everything was very calm.

I knew Mr Shvidler, I knew my friend Badri, they nicely, calmly signed the documents, the documents on the table, we signed the document. I just don't remember where it took place. It's a long time ago.

- Q. Never mind about where it took place, that probably doesn't matter very much. What I was asking you about is this. First, I understand that the important thing for you was getting your money and selling the shares, but in your witness statement you have explained that as a result of their signature on the document, but also as a consequence of the way they acted at the meetings that you attended, you formed the impression that they were the acquirers of the assets.

What I want to ask you again is what was it about the way that they conducted themselves at these meetings that led to you forming the impression that they were the acquirers of the assets?

- A. You know, I of course can't remember the details, but on the whole I think I understand what was going on. The times were hard, we had little time left. My friend Badri and Mr Shvidler were confident people, self-assured people. So to read more into this, to try and read into this that there were some kind of actions, no, there weren't any specific behavioural actions. They just calmly signed these documents and that's it. And indeed I didn't quite know what kind of arrangements might have existed between Abramovich, Shvidler and Badri, and to be honest I wasn't all that bothered at that time.
- Q. Now, just looking at the agreement itself, Mr Anisimov, which you have in bundle H(A)17, which is purple -- that's the one.

If you look at the -- yes, on that page, if you stay on that page, if you look at the opening words of the agreement H(A)17/38T, do you see that it says that Roman Abramovich, Eugene Shvidler, Badri Patarkatsishvili and the companies represented by them are to be called party 1? Do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. Do you recall that there were four such companies which were in fact party to the various underlying sale and purchase agreements that acquired the aluminium assets?

A. No, I don't remember the details.

Q. Let me mention the names and see if you remember them. Runicom Fort Limited, Palmtex, Galinton and Dilcor, do you remember any of those companies?

A. Runicom I remember but I don't remember any of the others.

Q. Did you or do you now or did you at the time -- let me ask that question first. Did you at the time know which of those companies Mr Abramovich was representing?

A. No. I wasn't getting involved in these details, no. I didn't know.

Q. So I take it you didn't know --

A. When you see a person in front of you and you know he's Abramovich, he is a reasonably well-known figure, this is a deal, assets are being acquired, I wasn't really bothered which companies would eventually own the shares.

Moreover, this was the first part of our agreement with no legal force. This was just a -- we could have actually agreed all that orally and then go on with the contract. But because there were -- because Bratsk was involved we drew up a document, Buzuk from our part, Mr Streshinsky must have been helping him. And from their side I don't even remember who was dealing with drawing up this document.

Q. I take it that your answer is the same in relation to which of the companies Mr Shvidler or Mr Patarkatsishvili was representing of the four companies I've identified?

A. Absolutely, I've no idea. You're quite right, I just don't remember. Eleven years ago.

Q. No, I understand, Mr Anisimov.

Is it also the case, Mr Anisimov, that you would not know who was behind any of these companies in the sense of being the ultimate owner of those companies?

A. Naturally I didn't.

Q. Now, I want to move on to a slightly different topic. You say at paragraph 10 of your statement that you established a very close relationship with Mr Patarkatsishvili and that you were like family to each other and that you trusted each other completely. Paragraph 10 you'll find at page 29 of the Russian F1/01/29, page 4 of the English F1/01/4. Is that right?

A. Yes, I remember it even without referring to the page.

Q. Do you recall advising Mr Patarkatsishvili in the spring of 2000, following the KrAZ assets sale, about moving his assets offshore and setting up a Liechtenstein anstalt?

A. No, I don't remember this.

Q. Okay, let me see if I can show you a document which will assist your recollection. Can you please go to --

A. It's all possible. It was all 11 years ago.

Q. No, absolutely.

Can you please be given bundle H(A)18, opened at page 200.001 H(A)18/200.001.

A. This is in English, isn't it?

Q. It is in English and there isn't a translation of this. It may be that I need to ask --

A. Sadly I don't read English.

Q. No, I understand. The translator will help you with any assistance that you need in understanding what the document says, Mr Anisimov.

What you have in front of you, Mr Anisimov, is a fax addressed to Mr Streshinsky, who was your person, employee, from a company called Syndikus Treuhandalstalt, and it's dated 27 March 2000. If you look at the bottom of the page you will see that this is from -- sorry, the company has a Liechtenstein address, okay? The translator can help you with that if you need help.

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. Thank you.

A. I mean, I know English letters.

Q. Okay. Are you aware of the services that Syndikus Treuhandalstalt provides, Mr Anisimov?

A. No.

Q. Well, would it surprise you to learn, given Mr Streshinsky's involvement, that it's a company which specialises in private client advice and offshore structures?

A. Well, nothing can surprise me because this is what Liechtenstein was created for, to set up various offshore structures, surely?

Q. I'm sure they'll be pleased to hear that, Mr Anisimov.

A. I think they know it all without us.

Q. If you look -- well, I'm going to tell you what the beginning of the fax says, and the translator will help you with this, but I will read out what it says and the translator will then translate it for you. It says:

"Dear Mr Streshinsky.

"Reference is made to our meeting of last Thursday and to our telephone conversation on Saturday. We may inform you that we have already ordered all companies, and most of them have just arrived. In the meantime, we have examined all documents given to us."

Just pausing there, Mr Anisimov, what Syndikus, I'm not going to try the second name again, what Syndikus appear to have been doing is setting up companies at Mr Streshinsky's request, okay?

A. Well, I suppose so. I cannot comment it really.

Q. The fax then goes on as follows:

"As you know, we have our due diligence, and we would like to have the following additional documents or inquiries."

So they seem to be carrying out some sort of money-laundering checks, would you agree, Mr Anisimov? That's what they seem to be doing?

A. Well, I suppose so. All banks are meant to do this because money-laundering is not good.

Q. No. If you then look at the first item they have asked for, what they've asked for is this:

"Valuation Report of Bratsk Aluminium Plant ..."

And they say this:

"... (same as we have got from KRAZ and KrGES)."

And they ask this question:

"Who has originally established these reports?"

In other words, who has made these reports?

So it looks as if this is in some way connected with the aluminium assets, correct, with aluminium acquisitions?

A. I don't really understand. I have never seen this document before, I don't even understand what we're talking about.

Q. Well, you may not have seen it before, Mr Anisimov --

A. I have never seen it.

Q. -- but even without seeing it you could answer the question that I asked.

Given the reference to KrAZ and KrGES, and indeed a reference to Bratsk Aluminium Plant, would you accept that what they are looking at has got something to do with the assets that you sold or you were part selling in February 2000?

A. I can agree or disagree, but the point is that I have never seen this document. Moreover, it's addressed to Streshinsky. It deals with Bratsk and KrAZ. I simply cannot comment on this document because I don't really understand what it's all about. Perhaps they heard about something and they wrote a letter to Streshinsky. Maybe they wanted to create another stiftung of theirs. I just don't know. I don't understand the questions.

Q. Well you have already explained that you haven't seen the document before, and we can all see that it's written to Mr Streshinsky, Mr Anisimov. And if you are unable to answer the questions I ask you by reference to this document because you simply are unable to answer them, that is fine.

But you can plainly answer the question I just asked you about KrAZ and KrGES, those were part of the assets that you had sold, that's the Krasnoyarsk plant and the Krasnoyarsk hydroelectric power station, is it not?

A. I did indeed sell them, and I don't quite understand -- I don't quite understand what you're aiming at. Can you formulate your question more specifically?

Q. Mr Anisimov, it doesn't really matter what I'm aiming at. If you're able to answer the question that I'm asking you then it would be helpful if you did that. Don't worry about what I'm aiming at, please.

Anyway --

A. Could you please formulate the question again.

Q. All right.

The references to KrAZ and KrGES are a reference to the Krasnoyarsk Plant and the Krasnoyarsk Hydroelectric Power Station?

A. Yes. I confirm that when I read KrAZ and KrGES, yes, this is a reference to these two enterprises.

Q. Mr Anisimov, I'm not trying to trick you, I'm just trying to get your assistance on something, and --

A. I'm not afraid of being trapped, and I'm very grateful, and I confirm that, yes, I'm reading here KrAZ, this is KrAZ, and I'm reading Krasnoyarsk GES, and yes, these are those plant that you referred to. I don't think there are other companies called KrAZ and KrGES in the world.

Q. No. Well, that does help us, thank you.

Could I ask, please, don't put bundle H(A)18 away, but could you also be given bundle H(E)2 opened at tab 21 H(E)2/21/1.

My Lady, there is an English translation of this document right at the back of H(E)2 file, the reference is H(E)2/21/1T.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: Do you have there, Mr Anisimov, a document, it's in Russian obviously, the one you're looking at, entitled "Krasnoyarsk GES"?

A. Yes, yes, I can see it.

Q. And it's also entitled "Explanatory note to the analytical materials regarding financial and business activities", correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Have you seen this document before, Mr Anisimov?

A. Never.

Q. Do you want to just have a look at it, just page through it, because you may not be able to tell that just by looking at the first page.

- A. Just to leaf through it? Please tell me what I'm looking for, it's quite a hefty document.
- Q. Well, just to see if you recognise -- I don't want you to give an answer on the basis of whether you've seen a document just by looking at the front page.
- A. There are so many documents of this nature in our company that it's absolutely unrealistic for me to answer whether I'd seen one or not.
- What should I look at specifically? Lots of pages here.
- Q. Let me ask you this: do you think this did come from your company or from someone within your company?
- A. I can't tell you.
- Q. Can you answer this: do you think Mr Streshinsky might have authored this document?
- A. Unlikely. I think it's unlikely, I'm not sure, but I think it's unlikely, because Krasnoyarsk power station -- I mean, we had few shares, a small share in Krasnoyarsk GES. Perhaps we took part in preparation, but we asked someone to deal with it, but I'm not sure at all.
- Q. You say you had a small share in Krasnoyarsk GES --
- A. In the hydroelectric power station, yes.
- Q. Are you able to identify who else, other than Mr Streshinsky, might have been able to produce this sort of report in your company?

- A. In my company? I don't know, I can't tell you. I'm looking at surnames, I don't see a single surname of our staff, and I don't quite understand the point of this document, to be honest.

It's an analytical note. Well, that's perfectly normal. Many, many documents like that are drawn up for each enterprise. There's nothing -- I don't understand the point of it. Maybe you would explain it to me and then I could explain in greater detail.

- Q. Mr Anisimov, you can put that to one side. We'll get to the point about this in a moment.

Can you please be given another document which you'll find at H(E)3, tab 22, please H(E)3/22/1.

Again your Ladyship will find the translation of this document in the very last document of the bundle at H(E)3/22/1T.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, I only seem to have the first page of it.

MR RABINOWITZ: That's all your Ladyship needs to have.

- A. Thank you.

- Q. Now, again, Mr Anisimov, this is as you see entitled "Krasnoyarsk Aluminium Plant", and it's an explanatory note to the analytical materials regarding financial and business activities, dated 1999. Can you tell us whether you've seen this document before, Mr Anisimov?

A. No, I don't remember. I don't remember. I'm looking through it and I think it's more to do with some kind of arbitration proceedings perhaps, perhaps somebody was undertaking an analysis.

I can see the document. I've never seen it before.

Q. And you can't help us with who might have authored it, is that right, whether it was Mr Streshinsky or someone else?

A. Sadly, no. Sadly, I can't. Unlikely -- I think unlikely that it was Mr Streshinsky, in my opinion. But I think we should ask him, we should ask Mr Streshinsky, I think he might come after all. He is having a visa problem but hopefully it will be sorted out.

Q. Very well. You can put -- thank you for that. You can put away H(E)3, thank you, and can you go back then to the document we were looking at, H(A)18 at page 200.001 H(A)18/200.001.

A. So we're coming back to the same document, right?

Q. I'm afraid so.

A. Why? Why are you afraid? Why unfortunately?

Q. Never mind.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It's not for you to ask the questions, Mr Anisimov.

MR RABINOWITZ: The document that you have at 200.001 refers to valuation reports from KrAZ and KrGES, and the question which was asked is: who has originally established these reports? You're not able to assist us as to whether that reference might be a reference to the two documents we've just looked at, Mr Anisimov, or are you?

A. No, I don't know.

Q. All right. If we look at the next bullet point in this document, and again you may need assistance from the translator, I will read it to you and it will be translated for you.

A. I'd be grateful.

Q. "We need the enclosed declaration signed by the client (Mr P), that he executes the business for himself and that no members of the government, parliament, or any politician people are involved."

Now, as to whether -- as to who Mr P is, Mr Anisimov, if you go over the page you can see there was a second page of this document from Syndikus Treuhandalstalt, and it's a declaration to be signed by a Mr AP. That, would you accept, is very likely to have been Mr Patarkatsishvili?

A. Well, to be honest, I can't speculate. I can see that it says "AP", I can see the document, but I had never seen this document before, and I don't quite understand what I have to do with it. I can't comment.

Q. Mr Anisimov, all you actually have to do is to answer my questions if you can. Okay? If you can't then you should just say so, please.

A. In which case, can I hear the question, please.

Q. All right. My question I think to you was whether you thought -- sorry, let me just see what the question was.

Would you accept that the reference to AP is very likely to have been a reference to Mr Patarkatsishvili?

A. Possibly. Possibly.

Q. Well, who else who had a connection to the KRAZ assets in March 2000 do you think that might have been a reference to if it wasn't to Mr Patarkatsishvili?

A. Well, I'm saying possibly. I can't speculate so I think I've assisted you and I answered, I think, that possibly, yes, it might have been Badri.

Q. Thank you for that. Then if you skip down to the next bullet point H(A)18/200.001, you see -- well, you won't see, I'll tell you what it says. It says:

"How is the relation between Sibneft and the four intermediary companies (subsidiaries or affiliated companies)?"

So would you accept that what appears to have happened is that they've been provided with something that has meant that they understand that there's a link between Sibneft and what they refer to as "the four intermediary companies"?

A. I cannot speculate so I can't answer, can't comment.

Q. Okay. Do keep that open but can I ask you, please, to be given bundle H(A)17, opened at page 37.002 H(A)17/37.002.

This is a diagram -- do you have it?

A. (Untranslated).

Q. This is a diagram, Mr Anisimov, showing the February 2000 aluminium acquisition. And do you see in the middle of the page there is a circle called "Sibneft"? It's not really, but it's a sort of circle.

A. Yes.

Q. Below that there is a further circle called "Intermediary" in which there are four companies?

A. Yes. Yes, I can see.

Q. And would you accept that it may be that what Syndikus Treuhandalstalt have is this diagram, and that is what has given rise to the question they're asking Mr Streshinsky?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, isn't that speculation, Mr Rabinowitz?

MR RABINOWITZ: It is.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I mean, from what Mr Streshinsky was doing at the time, are you in a position to comment?

A. I can't comment because I didn't know about it.

MR RABINOWITZ: All right.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Did you know Mr Streshinsky was dealing with Treuhandalstalt, whatever they were called?

A. No, we did work, we did work with Liechtenstein, had been for a while, but to a limited extent.

On this subject I cannot comment. My private life has nothing to do with this so it's very difficult for me to comment because it's all mixed up in here, Sibneft, KrAZ, KrGES, all mixed in, I just don't understand it.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can I ask you this, Mr Anisimov, have you seen this diagram before?

A. No.

Q. So you don't know who would have authored it?

A. I don't know.

Q. All right.

A. If I had known I would have told you. I can't see any great mystery here or any need to keep a secret.

Q. And you can't help us as to whether Mr Streshinsky was in fact assisting Mr Patarkatsishvili with Syndikus Treuhandalstalt at this time?

A. I simply don't know. I would be delighted to help but I just don't know. The only thing I know is that Streshinsky knew that Badri was my friend, and if Badri had asked Streshinsky for any assistance, Streshinsky would have assisted him.

Do I still need this folder?

Q. You can put that folder away I think.

A. Thank you.

Q. Let me ask you this, Mr Anisimov, do you recall in March 2000 offering to help Mr Patarkatsishvili to get certain agreements notarised relating to commission that he was to be paid, arising out of the aluminium transactions?

A. No, I don't remember.

Q. Let me again show you a document and see if you can help us with this.

A. Please.

Q. H(A)18, page 155 in Russian H(A)18/155, and 161 in English H(A)18/161.

A. 155?

Q. 155 in Russian.

Now, you should have there a document entitled in Russian "Material Evidence Examination Protocol", do you have that?

A. What I see is the protocol of 3 February 2000.

Q. Right, sounds like...

A. Well, I'm looking at what I've been given.

Q. Above that, is the heading of the document "Material Evidence Examination Protocol"? No?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Do you want me to take the break,

Mr Rabinowitz, so you can find the document?

A. It's 0017 but it's a different document.

MR RABINOWITZ: That might be wise.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, I'll take the break for ten minutes so that you can find the document.

(3.08 pm)

(A short break)

(3.25 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Anisimov, I hope you now have the correct document in front of you. Is it headed "Examination Protocol" and then below it, it says "Moscow, 16 March"?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, just so you know what it is, this is the Russian public notary's document which formally notarised one of four commission agreements that Ms Panchenko, who is one of Mr Abramovich's people, drew up for Mr Patarkatsishvili in the year 2000.

What I wanted to ask you was this, Mr Anisimov. If you look down the document, you I think on the Russian version will see a signature for someone called Ms Tatyana Vladimirovna Zaitseva?

A. Yes, I can see that.

- Q. Ms Zaitseva, we know from documents you have disclosed, was an employee of Coalco, your company, is that right?
- A. Absolutely right.
- Q. Can I ask you about this, Mr Anisimov: Dr Nosova, who works with Mr Berezovsky, has given evidence in which she says she remembers you providing advice to Mr Patarkatsishvili at around this time. She thinks that the meeting that she was aware of happened in the late spring of 2000. Do you have any recollection of that?
- A. No.
- Q. If I can just show you what Dr Nosova says and then ask you to comment on it. It's at bundle D1. In the Russian you'll find it at D1R, tab 9. Page 158 of the English D1/09/158 and page 135R in the Russian D1R/09/135R. Paragraph 249.
- Can I ask you to read that to yourself, please, Mr Anisimov.
- A. I've read it.
- Q. Thank you. Now, although I think Dr Nosova's timing may be a little out, do you remember now a meeting with Mr Patarkatsishvili in the early part of 2000 in which you offered to advise him with regard to establishing offshore structures in Liechtenstein?
- A. No, I don't remember it.

- Q. Can I just show you a document and ask you whether you've seen this before. Can you please be given bundle H(A)18 at page 221.003 in the Russian H(A)18/221.003, 221.003T in the English H(A)18/221.003T.
- A. I have it in front of me.
- Q. Can you say whether you recall seeing this document before?
- A. No. I've never seen it before.
- Q. Very well. You can put that away then, Mr Anisimov.
- A. Thank you.
- Q. Now, you tell us at paragraph 48 -- let's just wait for you to get rid of some of these documents.
- You tell us at paragraph 48 of your witness statement that Mr Patarkatsishvili and his family had a holiday home in Baden Baden and that you recall visiting Baden Baden on occasions, is that right?
- A. I've never been to their house but I have been to Baden Baden. I stayed in a hotel.
- Q. I would like to take you to an attendance note made by a solicitor, Mr Moss of Reid Minty, in 2001, of the meeting he attended with Mr Patarkatsishvili in Baden Baden at which he recalls you being present, Mr Anisimov. Before I show you that note, can I just put the meeting into context for you and tell you -- you probably know this -- Stephen Moss, Mr Moss and his colleague Christine Minty were instructed -- they were English solicitors, and they were instructed on behalf of Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili in the summer of 2001 to represent their interests in a transaction which we have been calling the Devonian transaction.

Mr Berezovsky's case is that the Devonian transaction involved the sale by Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili of their shares in Sibneft to a company called Devonian which was owned and controlled by Sheikh Sultan, okay?

- A. I am not reading anything, I'm just listening to you, and I'm listening very attentively.
- Q. Thank you very much. Mr Berezovsky's case is that there was also a back-to-back transaction between the sheikh and Mr Abramovich under which the sheikh would sell these Sibneft interests on to Mr Abramovich, okay? I'm not asking you to agree with whether that is right or wrong, I just want you to understand the context in which this meeting took place.
- A. Thank you very much.
- Q. And then Mr Moss of Reid Minty had come into the transaction to act for Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili after Mr Curtis, who was the solicitor who had been acting for them, had said he couldn't continue to act for them because he was acting for the sheikh in the transaction, okay?

A. Right.

Q. Can I then just show you the attendance note that I mentioned, it's at bundle H(A)35, page 70 H(A)35/70. You have there in fact at H(A)35 an email to which the attendance note was attached.

A. It's in English, isn't it?

Q. It is.

A. There is no Russian, or is there?

Q. No, there isn't Russian.

Now, it's an email from Ms Minty to Mr Jacobson who was the lawyer from Curtis & Co, and it was sent on 5 June 2001. You can see the date next to the name "Christine", do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see "5.6.01".

Q. Thank you. What Ms Minty is saying in this email to Mr Jacobson is that -- she's talking about the warranties in the Devonian agreement that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were signing or making with the sheikh. And she says that she doesn't understand why Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili should be giving any warranties. She says:

"... because your client [that's the sheikh] will already have received the money for the beneficial interests and will not therefore be at risk and the ultimate purchaser knows the full circumstances and should not require warranties."

So she's making a legal point, you don't have to be worried about the legal point she's making, about whether or not Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili should be giving warranties.

Then she also makes the point that what she is saying is subject to discussions between Mr Curtis and Mr Stephen Moss. She makes the point that she will not have the opportunity to go through the agreement with Mr Moss until tomorrow when he gets back from Germany.

Now, what she's referring to is the fact that Mr Moss, her partner, was visiting Germany on 5 June 2001 to see Mr Patarkatsishvili, okay?

A. Right.

Q. Thank you. Now, can I ask you next, please, to go to page 161 where you will find --

A. Of the same document?

Q. Of the same file H(A)35/161. Because what we have at page 161 is an attendance note made by Mr Moss from Reid Minty of his trip to Baden Baden to see Mr Patarkatsishvili. I will read parts of it to you so that it can be translated to you. He starts by saying:

"SM [that's Mr Moss] meeting Joseph Kay at [London Heathrow] and starting analysis of the retainer letter the PoA and then the draft sale agreement emailed to me last night."

There's then a discussion about Mr Kay reading the retainer letter, and Mr Moss says he explained to Mr Kay why that was done. We don't need to be concerned about this.

What Mr Moss then says is this:

"We landed at Stuttgart and then drove to Baden Baden, where we met Badri [Patarkatsishvili] and Vassili Asinov [he says], who [Mr Kay] explained --"

A. It must have been me.

Q. It must have been you, indeed. I'm sure we all get more used to Russian names the longer we are involved.

He met you and Mr Patarkatsishvili:

"... who [Mr Kay] explained was [Mr Patarkatsishvili's] oldest friend and advisor."

I think you accept that that is clearly a reference to you, Mr Anisimov?

A. Well, I can't speak for him. Maybe it's a reference to me, I don't know.

Q. But the fact that you are introduced, the person was introduced as Mr Patarkatsishvili's "oldest friend and advisor", suggests that it's very likely to have been you, correct?

- A. Well, I was his friend. I wasn't his adviser. We talked and asked each other's advice, but it can't be said that I was his adviser.
- Q. All right. Now, you say in your witness statement that you have no recollection of this meeting but I don't think anyone is suggesting that Mr Moss has deliberately created a false document and made this meeting up, so I suggest that it does look as if you were in Baden Baden on this occasion and that you were assisting Mr Patarkatsishvili, even though you cannot at this distance in time remember the meeting. Would that be fair?
- A. Not quite fair, because I went there on holiday mainly. It's a beautiful place. This is an ancient playground of the Russians, the Russians have always liked going there, we love going there. There's a lovely spa, I remember the hotel very well, we had lunch there. We spent time there with Badri and we've(?) had any meetings.

But I really don't remember what they talked about, especially as I don't speak English, it would have been difficult for me to remember. They might have asked me something, I might have answered something, but I don't remember any details at all, because Badri was a very -- a real friend, a real friend, and he -- and when you were with him he made you derive pleasure from contacts with him, and I just don't remember any details about Baden Baden.

Q. Right, well maybe we can recollect some of the details when we read through the note.

Mr Moss records --

A. With pleasure.

Q. Thank you. Mr Moss records that:

"Numerous discussions then took place throughout the meeting relating to the trust arrangement, the involvement of Roman A [who is Mr Abramovich] and Sheikh S[ultan]."

But again you say you have no recollection of that?

A. First of all, I didn't see Roman A there, nor did I see the sheikh in Baden Baden. I have seen Roman with my own eyes several times but I have never seen the sheikh. I had many visits to Abu Dhabi and to Oman, and I know many sheikhs, but I don't know which sheikh you're talking about here.

Q. No, Mr Anisimov, Mr Moss is not suggesting that they were there, either Roman or any sheikh at all. He is simply recording the fact that there was a discussion which involved references to Mr Abramovich and the sheikh, okay?

A. I can't -- I can't say that. It must have taken place,

Mr Moss is a lawyer, it must have taken place.

Q. We can skip a couple of paragraphs. I just want to pick up the note about five lines down from the first break.

I'm going to read an extract. If you find it easier, Mr Anisimov, to have this translated for you by the translator rather than just getting the translation of my reading it, then do please say so.

A. So far I'm happy with the interpreting and the translation so thank you.

Q. That's very kind, thank you.

What Mr Moss goes on to record is this. He says this about the meeting:

"We then moved to the structure of the agreement [and he's talking about the Devonia agreement] and the warranties, which I read out, and [Joseph Kay] translated to [Mr Patarkatsishvili] and VA [Mr Anisimov]. They questioned me on why [Mr Abramovich] was not a party to the agreement, as the recitals stated that there was a selling on of the interests, and I said that as far as I knew, [Sheikh Sultan] would have his own agreement with [Mr Abramovich]."

Again that's what Mr Moss records but you say you have no recollection of that?

A. I really don't remember anything because Sibneft was of no interest to me in any shape or form. Well I just don't remember, I can't invent, can I, so I have to say that I don't remember. I'm not inventing anything, I'm telling you the truth. They must have been saying, they must have been discussing, they must have been using these words, but I don't remember.

Q. All right. Mr Moss's attendance note then goes on and he says this:

"As I explained the effect of the warranties, and [the sheikh's] entitlements, [Mr Anisimov] posed a series of questions about hypothetical agreements to work as a partner with [Sheikh Sultan] in buying shares in Sibneft, and also on verbal call options given to [Mr Abramovich] to sell at a price... agreed."

That's what Mr Moss records, that you were indeed involved in the discussion, but you say you have no recollection of this?

A. Absolutely don't remember anything, and I'm absolutely convinced of one thing only, that I could not have been saying these things, especially about shares of a company I had nothing to do with.

Q. Well, no one else has suggested Mr Moss's note is fabricated, but let me just carry on and see what he says, carry on with the note.

A. I'm not saying it's been fabricated. It must have happened, they must have been talking.

Q. And if his note is right, you must have been involved in these discussions, Mr Anisimov. That's what he records, is it not?

A. You know, I am often present at discussions with which I have nothing to do, and if I have nothing to do with the subject, and it must have taken place as far as I understand in a restaurant, it wouldn't have been official negotiation. One is eating, the other one is talking, and I don't speak English so I'm not sure that anybody was interpreting it for me. They might have asked me questions, I don't want to contest that, but on Sibneft subject I don't remember anything, I had nothing to do with it.

Q. Well, Mr Moss records that Mr Kay was translating for you, and indeed for Mr Patarkatsishvili, so --

A. Maybe he was translating, but it's probably not quite right or ethical to insist that he was interpreting for me and for Badri. Maybe, as Badri wasn't completely fluent in English, he was interpreting for Badri, but it wasn't interesting for me so I wasn't listening. I have enough -- I have enough subjects to mull over in my mind and to think about. I just wasn't listening. I mean, this subject really cannot be developed much further because I really don't remember. If I could remember

I would have told you what happened because there's nothing here that I would not have told you. If they were discussing it, I would have said, yes, I remember.

I mean, we can twist and turn it, and I listen to you with pleasure, I have no opposition to this. And it must have happened, I just don't remember their faces. I remember Badri, because I will never be able to forget Badri, but I don't remember who Mr Moss was. I can't put a face to a name. If he was there, well, he must have been there.

Q. I just want to read what else Mr Moss has recorded. He says this:

"Before I could answer either of these [and he's talking about your questions] however, after heated discussion between all 3 [and he's referring there to yourself and Mr Kay and Mr Patarkatsishvili], we went back to a line by line analysis of the warranties schedule. I explained the effect of each one, indicating the liability if [Mr Patarkatsishvili] didn't have good title, if there were ... encumbrances, how [Sheikh Sultan] could claim damages if any lien had been created over the beneficial interest etc, how [Sheikh Sultan] could sue if any claims were made, and reading [out] each warranty ... and explaining each one. [Joseph Kay] would translate, there would then be a discussion in Russian, [Joseph Kay] would explain that [Mr Patarkatsishvili] was satisfied of its effect, and we would move on."

A. Well, maybe I misheard you. It says "between [the] 3", now I was number four. I was not part of the discussion.

Q. In fact you were number three, or one or two, Mr Anisimov, because Mr Moss was number four.

A. I won't argue, I'm just saying that I did not take any part in this process of negotiations.

Q. You see, if Mr Moss's note is accurate then you appear to have attended this meeting at which the Devonia agreement was gone through line by line, translated for the benefit of you and Mr Patarkatsishvili, with Mr Patarkatsishvili agreeing to particular warranties. But you now say you have no recollection of it, Mr Anisimov?

A. Well, I have a request. If I don't remember, why should I agree with your statement that this was like that? Badri knew English to some extent, they must have been talking in English, I just don't remember.

Moreover, the subject matter was of no interest to me at all, at all.

Q. Was the fact that your friend, or old friend, Mr Patarkatsishvili, was to receive a very, very substantial sum of no interest to you, Mr Anisimov?

A. I would have been delighted and -- I would have been delighted for him to receive money, to be content, but if I -- but I can't advise if I am not aware of these matters, if I don't know this subject. How can I advise? If at that time I was asked, I would have brought my team, my advisers, they would have taken part in this -- in these negotiations. Moreover, there's a sheikh involved. For me, a sheikh is a sheikh and we are separate entities, it's a different life, different life.

Q. Would Mr Patarkatsishvili not have told you that he was going to receive a large sum in respect of his Sibneft interests given that you were his close friend?

A. On the whole I knew that he was receiving some kind of money, but if somebody is not telling you something perhaps it's not terribly ethical to enquire.

I just don't remember this meeting, that's the problem.

Q. All right. I'm going to show you the Devonian agreement, which is what Mr Moss records was discussed there, but you presumably will say it's in English and you don't recognise it, is that right?

A. Well, I think you shouldn't answer for me. If you ask me a question and show me the document, I'll answer.

- Q. All right, I will show you the document. Go, if you would, to bundle H(A)35 at page 88 H(A)35/88.
- A. Yes, I can see it.
- Q. So this is a version of the agreement that Mr Moss says he went through with you and Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Kay at the meeting in Baden Baden. You can see from the front page that it is an agreement between Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili and Devonia Investments Limited and Sheikh Sultan. Do you see that?
- A. Yes, I can see the page.
- Q. And the agreement --
- A. I can see all the pages.
- Q. And the agreement, as the front sheet makes clear, relates to the:
- "... sale and purchase of beneficial interests in part of the issued share capital of Sibneft."
- Do you see that?
- A. Yes, I can see that.
- Q. If you go to page 106 H(A)35/106.
- A. 106, just a minute. We're almost there. Right, we're there.
- Q. Thank you. You see these are a list of the warranties that Mr Moss, in his attendance note, says he went through individually and had translated for the benefit of the others at the meeting, you and Mr Patarkatsishvili. I can take you through these warranties if you think that may help with your memory, Mr Anisimov.

- A. Well, after all the documents I've seen today, that you've just shown me, I can be perfectly convinced that I have never seen these documents before and it's useless to discuss them, because it is impossible at a table in a restaurant you discuss anything of this nature. And that's not even the point. The point is I had never seen them. This is a serious document and notwithstanding anything, Badri was my closest friend. He might have drawn up this document somehow differently. I just don't remember them.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: When you say you were having lunch in the restaurant, you positively remember that, or you're speculating that you were having lunch?

- A. I'm speculating, trying to remember or reconstruct. When we met in Baden Baden what we did is we took walks, went to restaurants and we slept. That's all we did. We walked, ate and slept. Each of us had our own apartments and we could actually negotiate in our apartments, but for a detailed discussion like this, to take this in a restaurant. Well, I remember, I remember that we went to restaurants, I remember that we went to our apartments, but now that I've seen the documents of this nature, and naturally, naturally they couldn't have happened. I would not have forgotten a meeting like this.

If I had been asked about large amounts of money, about Sibneft, if I had been asked to give my advice by Badri, I could not have forgotten.

I could have given my advice if I had seen the documents. I just simply hadn't seen them.

MR RABINOWITZ: You see, Mr Anisimov, I have to suggest to you that you did see this document and there was such a meeting because that is what Mr Moss has recorded in his note as having happened. Do you want to comment on that?

A. Well, I am not -- I cannot argue with Mr Moss. I'm saying, yes, I was in Baden Baden, yes, I did meet with Badri, we spent time together, but I don't remember Mr Moss, and that is the main problem.

It's a good thing that I'm so impressive that he remembered me but I don't remember him.

Q. Well, the difference between you and him, in that regard, Mr Anisimov, is that he made this note at the time, whereas you are now having to recollect it some ten years later. Okay?

A. So quite right, quite right, that's the whole point. I'm just saying one thing: if this amount of documents that you're showing me was there, it's a serious job. It's not -- I mean, it doesn't matter whether a person is your friend or not, if the business is as serious as this, I just don't remember this document. There were some conversations, he had several meetings, he is a very gregarious person. But I don't remember a lawyer and I don't discuss -- remember discussing this subject.

Most likely it did not happen. I'm convinced I did not discuss this subject. There might have been other discussions on other subjects but I don't remember which.

- Q. You see, don't be put off by the number of pages, Mr Anisimov. What Mr Moss says --
- A. I'm not put off.
- Q. -- is that he took you through the warranties, which are the ones we see on page 106 H(A)35/106, and he had them translated for you, and that's only just over a page that he would have had translated for you. So --
- A. I don't think that's right. They might have been translating for Badri, yes, I can't contest that, but for me what's the point? What have I got to do with this? Nothing.
- Q. Well, you were at this meeting, as Mr Moss records. Just let me tell you what the warranties say, Mr Anisimov, because the warranties at schedule 3 make it clear that both Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were involved in this transaction to sell interests in Sibneft, and at warranty 3, there is a warranty that they were entitled to sell and transfer their beneficial interests in these shares in Sibneft to Devonian.

Okay? Now, my question to you is this --

A. Yes, I'm awaiting your question.

Q. If you did attend this meeting in Baden Baden on 5 June 2001, as Mr Moss's attendance note suggests, and if, as Mr Moss's note suggests, you did go through these warranties with Mr Patarkatsishvili you would have understood that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were warranting that they had ownership interests in Sibneft as at June 2001. That's to say, that they had an interest in Sibneft as at that time. Do you understand?

A. Well, I understand what you've just said and I understand what you mean but, unfortunately, I can't help you with this because I was not involved, I don't remember the subject, I didn't hear it.

I was exercising my memory because in the course of the proceedings I was told that I was in Baden Baden, and yes, indeed, I looked at the documents and I had visited Baden Baden several times. I went there alone, and also I met Badri there, but I -- for a detailed discussion like this to happen and for me not to remember it, this is unlikely. My memory is not ideal but things like this are not forgettable.

So, I don't know, maybe he was translating for Badri, maybe they were scribbling something, although I don't remember that either. To be honest, you know, money likes silence or quiet, maybe they were discussing it quietly. At some point I might have been sitting there. But there's no point in trying to get something out of me, I simply don't remember it. I mean, I'm saying to try and get it out of me in a good sense, you know.

Q. That's very kind, Mr Anisimov, and generous. But you see, if Mr Moss's note is correct in recording what he does record then it would not be true to say that you do not know and have never known what arrangement Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky had regarding Sibneft; that is right, is it not?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, there's quite a lot of hypothesis there, is there not, Mr Rabinowitz?

A. Please could you put your question again. We cannot speculate. We're in court, aren't we?

MR RABINOWITZ: You see, Mr Anisimov, at paragraph 48 of your witness statement you suggest in the context of this meeting that you do not know and have never known what arrangements Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky have had regarding Sibneft. I suggest to you that that is simply not true.

A. Sorry, I got a bit mixed up. Is that in my own witness statement? What should I read? Just refer me to something.

Q. Yes, it is. If you go to page 40 on the Russian version F1/01/40, page 13 in the English version F1/01/13.

A. I beg your pardon, I'm just trying to find the page. So paragraph 48, right, okay.

Q. You suggest there, in the context of this meeting, that you do not know, and have never known, what arrangements Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky have had regarding Sibneft. And I suggest to you, in light of what Mr Moss has recorded, that what you say there is not true.

A. Well, I don't agree with you because I'm telling you things as they are. I'm not giving you any hypothetical suggestions that I'm hearing from you today.

I beg your pardon, perhaps you are not happy with my answer but this is as it is.

Q. It doesn't matter whether I'm happy or not, Mr Anisimov.

Can I ask you, please, to go to bundle H(A)39 at page 38, please H(A)39/38.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can we put H(A)35 away now?

MR RABINOWITZ: You can, my Lady.

A. Page?

Q. 38. It's a document in English.

A. Thank you.

Q. Now, this, in case you don't recognise it, it contains your signature at the bottom. It's a declaration --

A. My signature? I don't see my signature, maybe I'm looking at the wrong page.

Q. Page 38, volume 39. You've been given the wrong bundle I think.

A. It happens. This one I don't need.

I can see it now.

Q. This is a declaration that you made for the US visa immigration authorities four months after your meeting in Baden Baden, as recorded by Mr Moss.

A. This must be linked with visa application, yes?

Q. No, I'm just trying to place it in time, Mr Anisimov. It's October 25, 2001.

Do you remember making this declaration at all?

A. I don't remember the details of course, but I understand that the American Embassy asks us to prepare these documents and we provide them. At that time not everybody was granted US visas so they were asking more details, detailed disclosure, about oneself.

Q. And you declare and warrant the following things to be true and correct, the things which are set out in this statement, and one of the things that you say here is that you state categorically that last year I have sold all my shares in Krasnoyarsk Aluminium Plant and Krasnoyarsk Power Station, and you say that you sold them to the shareholders of Sibneft in February 2000.

A. All -- all correct. That's exactly what I wrote, and that's exactly how it is. I sold everything and I wrote the whole truth here.

Q. The people you were referring to as the persons to whom you'd sold the shares in Sibneft were Mr Berezovsky, Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich, correct?

A. No, I'll try to explain if I may. I'll explain -- I'll try to explain how we fill in these forms, if I may.

Thank you.

The thing is that when we make references to shareholders in Russian practice, until '99 I was always a single owner, a single shareholder everywhere. But at that time it was all a bit worrisome, and my company always wanted to show that I was not the only shareholder of my company, and there were many -- very often people wrote "shareholders of Sibneft" et cetera, and I never knew who were the shareholders of Sibneft.

But to a greater extent that had to do with our personal safety and security. I truly didn't know whether there were any shareholders of Sibneft there or not. I just wrote it as we wrote in contracts,

"shareholders in Sibneft," and that's it.

Q. What I would suggest to you, Mr Anisimov, is that following your involvement in the meeting at Baden Baden in July 2001 you knew that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili had been shareholders in Sibneft but had now sold their shares to Mr Abramovich?

A. I don't agree with you. I didn't know it, and to be honest I wasn't interested in it.

Q. And that is why, when you referred just four months later in your visa declaration to the US immigration authorities, to a sale in February 2000 to the Sibneft shareholders, the people you had in mind were Mr Berezovsky, Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich. That's right, isn't it?

A. No, that's not right. I would have written it, "I sold them to Abramovich, Berezovsky and Badri." But because I didn't know who was who I just wrote "shareholders of Sibneft".

Q. All right, you can put this away.

I have one more document to take this witness to, my Lady, and I can try to finish, if that is --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can I ask you, Mr Anisimov, to go to --

A. This one I can put away, yes?

Q. -- the document that your Ladyship will find on Magnum at H(A)92 at 42.001 H(A)92/42.001. I don't know if there's yet been a hard copy put in the bundles but if there hasn't we can hand one up.

It looks like there has been.

This is an email from a Mr Sergey Gorin at Coalco, so he's one of your employees, is he not, Mr Anisimov?

A. Yes, he's one of the employees that reported to Mr Streshinsky.

Q. And can you tell us what is his position in Coalco in -- at least what was his position in 2005, do you remember that?

A. I think that it was not a very important position at that point in time, because at that time I've never even had any dealings with him.

Q. What Mr Gorin is doing is he's sending this email to various people at an organisation called MeesPierson Intertrust regarding the subject of "Completed Clients' Forms."

He explains in his covering email that the client form had been completed by Coalco, your company, and pre-approved, he says, by the UBO. Now, the UBO is short for ultimate beneficial owner. If you go to page 42.003 in the document which is attached to this email H(A)92/42.003, you can see the second shaded block says "UBO", and then above it, it says:

"UBO is the Ultimate Beneficial Owner of the structure."

The ultimate beneficial owner here is Mr Patarkatsishvili, your friend, okay?

A. I can see it.

Q. The document that Mr Gorin has completed and Mr Patarkatsishvili has approved is -- it's a source of wealth check. You can see that if you go to page 42.002, okay?

A. Yes, I can see it.

Q. Can I ask you, please, to go to 42.003 where we can see what Mr Gorin and Mr Patarkatsishvili have put in here.

If you look -- sorry, if you go -- sorry, could you go to page 42.005 H(A)92/42.005?

MR MALEK: I wonder if we can have a copy of that because it's not on Magnum as far as we can see.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I can't find it. It's on the screen but --

MR RABINOWITZ: Can we hand up a hard copy, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It's fine for me because I can read it on the screen here but I'd be grateful if it could go into the Magnum.

MR RABINOWITZ: We had been told that it had gone into Magnum but we will ensure that it does do so. (Handed)

So are you at page 42.005?

A. Yes.

Q. Okay. If you look under the second shaded box, you see box 3, "Source of Wealth/Source of Funds," do you see that? The compliance questionnaire is in effect asking what is the source of wealth?

And if you go over to page 42.006 H(A)92/42.006 you can see that Mr Gorin with Mr Patarkatsishvili has ticked "Other", and what they have put there as being the source of Mr Patarkatsishvili's wealth is:

"Sale of various oil and metals assets in Russia, including shares in... Sibneft, a major Russian oil-producing company, and... Rusal, the biggest Russian aluminium producer."

Now, can I ask you this, Mr Anisimov, were you aware that Mr Gorin was assisting Mr Patarkatsishvili in relation to the completion of these forms?

A. No, I wasn't.

Q. So no one reported back to you on what was being put in this document?

A. No, nobody reported to me. This is the first time I see this document.

Q. You see, Mr Anisimov, I have to suggest to you that both you and indeed everyone in your organisation -- not everyone but certainly Mr Gorin and Mr Streshinsky, understood both in 2001 and indeed in 2005 that Mr Patarkatsishvili, like Mr Berezovsky, had sold an interest in Sibneft. Do you dispute that?

A. I don't dispute it, I just don't know it. I don't know who wrote what, and I don't know why they wrote it, and who was telling them to write it. But I think Mr Streshinsky will be able to give evidence and he'll explain.

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Anisimov, thank you very much. I don't have any more questions for you. Thank you.

A. I'm very grateful to you too. Thank you.

MR MALEK: No re-examination, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much indeed for coming to give your evidence.

A. Thank you. It was a pleasure.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Mr Malek?

MR MALEK: As far as the timetable, Mr Buzuk will be giving evidence tomorrow morning. I've spoken to my learned friends and they've indicated that the cross-examination is going to be fairly short, in the region of about 20 minutes to 30 minutes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR MALEK: And then there's nothing else for the rest of the week.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: We're not having Mr Streshinsky this week then?

MR MALEK: It's on Monday, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That will be on Monday. So I won't be sitting in this case basically Wednesday afternoon -- you may leave the witness box if you wish to.

THE WITNESS: Thank you.

(The witness withdrew)

MR MALEK: That's correct, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Streshinsky isn't available this week?

MR MALEK: No. He had meetings, it's always been like that, so it's Monday, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Very well. Well thank you very much.

10.30 tomorrow morning? 10.30.

(10.30 am)

MR MALEK: My Lady, the next witness is Mr Buzuk. You will find his statement at F1, at tab 3 F1/03/95.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR MALEK: Can I call Mr Buzuk.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

Is Mr Buzuk giving evidence in Russian?

MR MALEK: Yes, he is, my Lady.

MR MARK BUZUK (affirmed)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Please sit down if you would like to.

Examination-in-chief by MR MALEK

MR MALEK: Mr Buzuk, could you give the court your full name, please?

A. (Not interpreted) Just a second, I change the channel.

Q. Can you give the court your full name, please?

A. (Interpreted) Mark Buzuk.

Q. Can you confirm that you do not have a mobile phone on you?

A. I do not have a mobile phone on me.

Q. I understand that you wish to give your evidence in Russian although you have a good understanding of English, is that correct?

A. Yes, I would like to give evidence in Russian.

Q. Could Mr Buzuk please be provided with volume 1, tab 3, opened up at page F1/03/95.

Do you have that in front of you, Mr Buzuk?

A. Yes, I can see the document.

Q. I understand there's one correction that you would like to make which you will find at F1/03 at page 131 F1/03/131, is that correct?

A. Yes, I cannot find this page. One second, please.

Yes, this amendment is correct.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can we have the English, please?

MR MALEK: It's F1/03/131.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That's in Russian.

MR MALEK: Ah, the one I have is in --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: My F1 only goes to 103 in the hard copy and I don't have a corrected version.

MR MALEK: Could I hand up my version?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, please do.

(Handed)

Thank you.

MR MALEK: Mr Buzuk, could you now turn to F1/03/103.

A. Sorry, what page was that? 103?

Q. F1/03 at 103, do you have that in front of you?

A. Yes. Yes, this is correct.

Q. Can you confirm that that is your signature?

A. Yes, that is my signature, this is correct.

Q. Can you also confirm that you believe the facts stated in your statement are true?

- A. I confirm that the facts stated in my statement are true.

Cross-examination by MR MASEFIELD

MR MASEFIELD: Good morning, Mr Buzuk. My name is

Mr Masefield and I'm one of the counsel instructed by Mr Berezovsky.

Mr Buzuk, you tell us that you were closely involved in Mr Anisimov's aluminium business between 1997 and 2000, correct?

- A. Yes, this is correct.

Q. And you say you were closely involved in the sale of Mr Anisimov's aluminium assets in February 2000, yes?

- A. Yes, I had direct involvement in the sale of all of Mr Anisimov's aluminium assets.

Q. I'm sorry, I didn't hear that response.

THE INTERPRETER: "Yes, I had a direct involvement in Mr Anisimov's sale of all of his aluminium assets."

Q. I'm grateful.

Mr Anisimov's aluminium interests, which were sold in February 2000, were the KrAZ asset interests, that is to say Krasnoyarsk Aluminium Plant, Krasnoyarsk Smelter, Krasnoyarsk Hydroelectric Plant and the Achinsk Alumina Refinery, is that correct?

- A. Yes, this is correct.

Q. Mr Anisimov did not have any interests in the Bratsk aluminium plants, or at least none that were included in the February 2000 sale?

A. Mr Anisimov did not have a share in the Bratsk plant which all these shares were included in the sale -- well, it was a different seller that was selling Bratsk Aluminium Plant. That was not Mr Anisimov.

Q. I'm grateful.

And the people who held the interests in the Bratsk Aluminium Plant at that time, and who were also involved in the sale in February 2000, were essentially the Trans-World Group, weren't they, Mr Buzuk? That's to say the Reuben brothers and their partners?

A. Trans-World was selling their own share in Krasnoyarsk assets at the same time with us.

Q. And they were also the owners of the Bratsk Aluminium Plant at that time?

A. Yes, they were the owners of the plant.

Q. Now, at paragraphs 35 to 36 of your witness statement F1/03/103, Mr Buzuk, you explain why, in your view, the sale price of 125 million which Mr Anisimov received for his one third share of the KrAZ assets was a significant undervalue, and you also say what Mr Anisimov told you about his understanding with Mr Patarkatsishvili. Now, those issues arise in relation to the Metalloinvest action which is going to be heard next year, Mr Buzuk. They are not, however, issues which the court needs to resolve in relation to the Abramovich action, which is why I'm not going to ask you any questions about that today. Do you understand?

A. Yes, I understand what you said.

Q. Now, at paragraphs 13 to 15 of your witness statement F1/03/97, Mr Buzuk, you explain how it was that the KrAZ assets had come under pressure in the late 1990s as various groups tried to obtain control of the KrAZ assets effectively by means of extortion. Is that right?

A. Sorry, could you please explain your question? How do you mean?

Q. At paragraphs 13 to 15 of your witness statement F1/03/97 you say that the KrAZ assets had come under pressure in the late 1990s, that's correct, isn't it?

A. KrAZ's business in the period before our sale indeed was under external pressure, this is correct.

Q. And you say as well that there were six different groups that were interested in the KrAZ assets, is that correct?

A. If I recall correctly, I am saying that there were at least six various groups that were interested in purchasing KrAZ assets.

Q. And you tell us that those groups tried to obtain control of the KrAZ assets effectively by means of extortion, is that also correct?

A. No, I'm saying there that also in some cases there were situations that were of criminal nature. That doesn't mean that all the groups that took part were involved in extortion.

Q. But some of them were; I think that's your evidence in the first sentence of paragraph 14 F1/03/98?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Buzuk, could you face me, please, when you're giving your answers, not counsel.

A. I beg your pardon, I shall do.

MR MASEFIELD: I'm grateful. And the question I asked you -- I think actually we have the answer to that.

You explain at paragraph 15 of your witness statement F1/03/98 that aluminium production is a continuous process and that:

"... once ... production is stopped at [a] ... plant, it cannot be started again without incurring vast expense."

Is that correct?

A. Yes, this is correct and I'm saying that in paragraph 15.

Q. And you also tell us at paragraph 14 F1/03/98 that as a result in part of the actions of the local governor in the Krasnoyarsk region, the supply of alumina to the Krasnoyarsk Aluminium Plant was put at risk, as was the supply of electricity, is that correct?

A. The situation with alumina supply and electricity supply was more complicated than simply the decisions of the local government, but certainly part of the decision of the local government, and Governor Mr Lebed, did -- were conducive to serious risk being posed for the KrAZ business.

Q. And you've just said in your answer that the local governor, who you're referring to in paragraph 14 at the time, was General Lebed, that's correct, isn't it?

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. And the evidence that you give at paragraph 14 of your witness statement provides a clear example, does it not, Mr Buzuk, of why it was important to have good relations with the local governor, and the sort of spanner that could be thrown in the works if you were not in favour with the local governor, yes?

A. Sorry, could you please clarify the question? I do not quite understand how you mean.

Q. It was important to have good relations with the local governor, that's right, isn't it? Because otherwise the local governor could cause the sort of disruption that you have set out in paragraph 14?

- A. I'm not saying that it's important to have a good relationship.
- Q. Well, if you didn't have good relations with the local governor then, as we can see from paragraph 14, pressure could be brought to bear upon the plant?
- A. Yes, it could have been, but it doesn't have a direct causal -- cause and effect link. I simply cannot understand your assertion. From my point of view one does not follow from the other.
- Q. Let me ask you this, Mr Buzuk, were you aware at the time -- I'm talking about 1999 -- you may not have been aware, but were you aware at the time that Mr Berezovsky enjoyed good political relations with General Lebed?
- A. At that point in time I did not know that and I did not place any importance in that. I didn't know that he had some special good relationships with General Lebed.
- Q. Well, if you didn't know it you couldn't have placed any importance on it, but I think I can move on.

Now, at paragraphs 18 to 34 of your witness statement F1/03/99, Mr Buzuk, you deal with your recollection of the February 2000 sale of the aluminium assets, and you very fairly say at paragraph 20 of your witness statement that, as the events in question happened 11 years ago, you cannot recall precisely how many meetings took place and who attended each meeting.

Is that correct?

A. Yes, this is correct.

Q. And you also say at paragraph 7 of your witness statement F1/03/96 that at this distance in time you cannot remember all the details of the sale. Is that also correct?

A. Yes, I do say in paragraph 7 that I do not recall all the details of the sale.

MR MASEFIELD: Sorry, for some reason Madam Translator's answer isn't coming through. I can see it on the screen.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Are you on the right --

THE INTERPRETER: Sorry, yes. Can you hear me now? This is the interpreter.

MR MASEFIELD: Yes, I've got that now, thank you.

Would you also accept, Mr Buzuk, that you may not have been present at each and every single one of the meetings which culminated in the sale of the aluminium assets in February 2000?

A. Possibly I was not present at every meeting that led to the sale.

Q. I'm grateful for that. And to take an obvious example, you were more closely involved in the sale of Mr Anisimov's KrAZ assets, and you probably had little, if no, involvement with the sale of the Bratsk aluminium assets that were being conducted by the Trans-World Group?

A. I was not involved with Bratsk sale because I had nothing to do with Bratsk and with Trans-World.

Q. And therefore you wouldn't have attended the meetings at which the sale of those assets were discussed?

A. Is that a supposition? I don't know what meetings they had. Did they have any other meetings? What is the question?

Q. I think we can move on.

Mr Buzuk, you tell us that you do recall a particular meeting which took place over dinner in the canteen at Sibneft, and you deal with this at paragraph 23 of your witness statement F1/03/100. You tell us there that you have a clear recollection of the meeting at which a number of people were present, including Mr Abramovich and Mr Patarkatsishvili as well as yourself. Is that right?

A. Yes, I am saying this in 23rd paragraph.

Q. And you say you:

"... clearly recall that after dinner Mr Abramovich asked Mr Patarkatsishvili why he should purchase the KrAZ assets and ... Mr Patarkatsishvili said something like 'I want you to buy'."

You clearly recall that, do you, Mr Buzuk?

- A. Yes, I recall that there was such a conversation after dinner.
- Q. And you also tell us that, following that meeting, yourself and Mr Streshinsky and Mr Abramovich's representatives worked around the clock and finalised the documentation for the sale of the KrAZ assets within around 48 hours, correct?
- A. Yes, that was, yes, about like this. We were working quite fast and we were preparing documentation quite fast.
- Q. Did you get the impression from that incident, Mr Buzuk, that it was Mr Patarkatsishvili rather than Mr Abramovich who was more eager to drive this deal forward?
- A. Well, whether he was eager more or less, I don't know about that. I knew that he wanted for the deal to happen and Abramovich first was -- had doubts, but then he made a decision and everything was propelled forward.
- Q. I'm grateful.

Now the main documentation in relation to the sale of the KrAZ assets was an agreement dated 10 February 2000, which you refer to in paragraph 26 of your witness statement F1/03100, and you refer to it as "the KrAZ Agreement".

Can we briefly turn that document up. Please can you be given bundle H(A)17 and turn within that to page 38 if you want the Russian H(A)17/38, and page 33 if you want to see the translation in English H(A)17/33.

Do you have there the agreement of 10 February 2000 that you are referring to in paragraph 26 of your witness statement, Mr Buzuk?

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. And you tell us that this document was a joint collaborative effort between Mr Anisimov's team and Mr Abramovich's team, is that correct?

A. Yes, this is correct.

Q. And you tell us that from your side the documentation was drafted by Mr Streshinsky and Mr Anisimov's in-house counsel, and then you reviewed it and provided comments on it, correct?

A. Yes, this is correct.

Q. And you say that you cannot now recall whether or not you were present at the final signing of this document, is that also correct?

A. I do not recall that. Yes, that's right, I do not recall that.

Q. And you say -- this is paragraph 33 of your witness statement, Mr Buzuk, if you want to look at it F1/03/102 -- that because you are aware of the involvement of Mr Patarkatsishvili in the negotiations, and because Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler and Mr Patarkatsishvili were all recorded in this agreement as purchasers, you assumed that they were purchasing the KrAZ assets together. Is that right?

A. May I read paragraph 33?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, please.

A. I'm not sure I am saying this the way it was spoken to me. (Pause)

MR MASEFIELD: What you say at paragraph 33, picking it up seven lines from the end of the paragraph:

"Consequently, I was aware that Mr Patarkatsishvili was involved with the sale of the KrAZ assets and, because Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler and Mr Patarkatsishvili were all recorded in the KrAZ Agreement as purchasers, I assumed that they were purchasing the KrAZ assets together."

A. Yes, this is correct. This is what I say in point 33.

Q. And you then go on to say:

"However, I did not know and was not provided with details of Mr Patarkatsishvili's role in relation to the sale of the KrAZ assets or details of the relationship between Mr Abramovich and Mr Patarkatsishvili."

It follows logically from that, does it not, Mr Buzuk, that none of Mr Abramovich's representatives ever told you that Mr Patarkatsishvili was not in fact one of the purchasers?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, rather than asking him some question of logic -- just a second -- why don't you just put the question directly to him?

MR MASEFIELD: Yes.

None of Mr Abramovich's representatives ever told you that Mr Patarkatsishvili was not in fact one of the purchasers?

A. I never discussed with representatives of Mr Abramovich who physically and personally is the purchaser.

Q. So there was no discussion about Mr Patarkatsishvili's position, and there was no discussion also, do I take it, about Mr Shvidler's position?

A. Sorry, could you please clarify the question? Did I speak with Abramovich's people, who is the purchaser, who is purchasing?

Q. The question I had was: did they tell you that Mr Patarkatsishvili or Mr Shvidler were not in fact purchasers?

A. No, no one told me that, that someone was in fact a purchaser or was not in fact a purchaser. This was never discussed.

Q. I'm grateful.

Looking at the agreement that we have in bundle H(A)17, you have the Russian at page 38 H(A)17/38 and the English at page 33 H(A)17/33, and focusing on the opening words, Mr Buzuk, do you see that it says:

"Roman Abramovich, Evgeniy Shvidler, Badri Patarkatsishvili and companies represented by them (hereinafter, 'Party 1') ..."

Do you see that wording?

- A. Yes, I can see that.
- Q. So certain companies were also included within the scope of party 1, that's what the definition says, correct?
- A. It rather says "represented by them". I am not sure that they were included within party 1.
- Q. That may be a matter of submission for her Ladyship, but let me ask you some questions about those companies, Mr Buzuk.

We know from the related share purchase and sale agreements that were also dated February 2000 that there were four such companies who we say were included within the scope of party 1 and who were the purchasers of the aluminium assets. Do you remember that there were four companies, Mr Buzuk? It may be that you don't at this distance in time.

- A. I do not recall the exact number of companies, but if you would show me some documents I will be able to tell you whether it's the same share sale and purchase agreements or if there are any different sale and purchase agreements.

Q. I'm not sure we need go to the documents, but let me just tell you the company names, Mr Buzuk. The names of the companies that appear on the share purchase and sale agreements are Runicom Fort Limited, Palmtex Limited, Galinton Associated Limited and Dilcor International.

Do those names help trigger any recollection, Mr Buzuk?

A. Runicom certainly associates with Mr Abramovich, but with regard to any other company names I simply do not recall.

Q. And do you recall whether it was ever explained to you at the time which of the four companies Mr Abramovich was representing?

A. Sorry, could you please ask the question again?

Q. Do you recall --

A. We were given -- let me explain. This is a term sheet, this agreement is a term sheet. Based on the term sheet we have prepared agreements, and the practice that the sellers and the purchasers had several companies, it's a fairly standard practice, especially taking into account the details of anti-monopoly law of Russian Federation of that time not to get lots of licences and to be able to split the share packages down and to be able to work further. This is how the process operated.

- Q. I'm not suggesting, Mr Buzuk, that it may have been unusual. I'm simply asking you a factual question, which is whether it was ever explained to you at the time which of the four companies Mr Abramovich was representing. If you can't recall or you don't know, you can say so.
- A. How do you mean Mr Abramovich represented? Maybe it's a matter of interpretation, because a director or a solicitor or a lawyer can represent a company. How do you mean Mr Abramovich represented a company?
- Q. I'm asking you quite a straightforward question. I'm not worried about the capacity in which he was representing them. Did you ever find out from Mr Abramovich's representatives which of the four companies he was representing? If you don't know, you can say so.
- A. (Not interpreted) Sorry, maybe a problem with translation. To own or to represent, what verb use?
- Q. To represent. I'm talking about control rather than ownership for the moment.
- A. (Interpreted) Could we please go back to Russian. Thank you.

In my understanding they have provided a set of company -- as I understand, they have given their companies for the deal. I have never discussed with them the nature of relationship between us -- between them, between the companies, et cetera, and so on and so forth.

Q. Thank you for that answer, Mr Buzuk.

Were you ever told the identity of the ultimate beneficial owner or owners behind the four companies?

A. No.

MR MASEFIELD: Thank you very much, Mr Buzuk.

My Lady, I have no further questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much.

MR MALEK: No re-examination, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No one else has any questions?

MR SUMPTION: No.

MR ADKIN: No, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. Thank you very much, Mr Buzuk, for coming to give your evidence. You may be released.

THE WITNESS: (Not interpreted) I can go?

(The witness withdrew)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, Mr Malek?

MR MALEK: The next witness is going to be on Monday, Mr Streshinsky.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR MALEK: Your Ladyship will find his statement at F1, tab 2 F1/02/55.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR MALEK: We notice that there were a number of cross-references to the bundles that were omitted so we're loading it on to Magnum at the moment and we'll get an updated --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you let me have a hard copy, because with statements I do like to use them in hard copy.

MR MALEK: Yes, we'll get that to your Ladyship today.

The other matter I should mention in relation to Mr Streshinsky is that there is a visa problem and it seems likely to us that he will be giving his evidence from Moscow on Monday. That means, of course, that we have to make an application to your Ladyship on paper, which we will do today.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can I not dispense with that or does there need to be some record? It's not enough if I just say in the transcript, provided there are no objections?

MR MALEK: There are some requirements so I think it's probably necessary for us to do so, but if we can check, but if we can satisfy --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What are the requirements, and you can tell me and I can decide whether they're satisfied or not.

MR MALEK: If --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've got a White Book here.

MR MALEK: Yes, if your Ladyship turns to the Commercial Court Guide, which is probably the best way to find the relevant passage. It's in --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Volume 2, page?

MR MALEK: It's H3, which deals with evidence by video-link, which is at page, bottom numbering of part 2 at 349.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So where do I find --

MR MALEK: H3.2 requires us to prepare a memorandum dealing with matters set out in the video conferencing guidance.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Let's look at annex --

MR MALEK: Then if we go to appendix 14 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, where's that?

Yes, I have it. It reproduces the annex 3, see volume 1, blah blah.

It just struck me that if you tell me why I can make an order now and you can simply draw it up.

MR MALEK: My Lady, I don't know whether -- I've actually got a hard copy of the Commercial Court Guide so I haven't got appendix -- the reference there. Has your Ladyship --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I'm just looking at -- it's sending me to 32PD.33, and if somebody will tell me where that is.

MR MALEK: That would be in volume 1 at --

MR ADKIN: Page 974, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

Well, there's a whole lot of stuff here. What do I need to look at?

MR MALEK: The one that really matters is paragraph 4 which requires us to check that there can be no objection to evidence being taken from Russia in this way, and that's a point that we're checking at the moment. But subject to that point, in my respectful submission, your Ladyship can dispense -- we've had video conferencing here, it works very well. My understanding is that there is a bridge and we will work with the solicitors on this matter to deal with it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And there's no objection?

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, if Mr Streshinsky can't get a visa then there's no objection. I should just mention this: it would be very helpful to know as soon as possible if this is going to happen because obviously we would need someone to go there and we would have to apply for a visa, but we will probably do it anyway just in case, but it would be helpful to know one way or the other as soon as possible.

MR MALEK: The latest indication we got this morning was that we couldn't be given a guarantee that it would be done in time, so we're proceeding on the basis that on Monday it will be by video conference. If the position changes we will of course notify the court and the parties.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, well, if Mr Rabinowitz's side has got to make arrangements for someone to be there ...

MR RABINOWITZ: I think we should do it in any event, just in case, on the same basis.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay, I will leave you to liaise about that. But in principle, the reason he can't obtain a visa is a time issue, there's no other reason?

MR MALEK: Yes, that's correct.

He's applied -- part of the process has been completed but there is a further part that needs to be done, and there is no guarantee that that will be done on Monday.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay. Well, subject to your being satisfied that there's no problem, so far as Russia is concerned, in having evidence taken on video-link for a foreign court I'm content to make an order.

MR MALEK: We're obliged to your Ladyship.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: When your Ladyship rises, since we're not going to be here I think until Monday, we probably need to fix a time for Monday, for Mr Streshinsky.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Oh, for Mr Streshinsky, yes.

MR MALEK: 10.15, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And then thereafter on Monday?

MR SUMPTION: It's experts, my Lady, starting with the Russian law experts.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, and we're starting with Dr Rachkov straightaway?

MR SUMPTION: Yes, and then Mr Rozenberg and then Professor Maggs. I understand that Professor Maggs is likely to be relatively short because my learned friend's understandable line is that he's not going to repeat to each witness, who says much the same thing, exactly the same as he said to the last one.

MR RABINOWITZ: My learned friend asked me this yesterday, and I can confirm it to your Ladyship, Dr Rachkov's evidence will be given in English, he's content to give his evidence in English. He does want and indeed he will have a transcript so he can just be sure that he understands things before he answers them. Again, as I understand, the same is true for Dr Rozenberg?

MR SUMPTION: Yes, it is.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So far I have looked at the experts, to the extent that I have looked at them, on Magnum.

MR RABINOWITZ: Bundle G.

MR SUMPTION: It's G(A)1, G(A)3 and G(A)6 that your Ladyship will need for the actual reports.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm just wondering whether I want them in hard copy. I don't think I've been given them in hard copy.

MR SUMPTION: Would your Ladyship like to be given them in hard copy?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think probably I would actually. I just find working on the witness statements easier in the hard copy as compared to the documents.

MR SUMPTION: There are very voluminous exhibits, which are essentially authorities legislative and judicial. Does your Ladyship wish to have those in hard copy?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, I would rather have those on Magnum.

MR SUMPTION: Very well. In that case your Ladyship will get G(A)1, G(A)3, G(A)5 and G(A)6, which are respectively Rachkov, Rozenberg, Maggs and joint memorandum.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, that would be very helpful. The only thing that is sometimes difficult to look at on Magnum is where there are schedules in A3, or tables that are very extensive, and you have to scroll --

MR SUMPTION: From recollection, I don't think there are any of those.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay, if I could just have the witness statements in hard copy that would be very helpful.

MR SUMPTION: Yes.

MR ADKIN: My Lady you mentioned there was a question mark next to Maggs.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, because I am very conscious that I haven't actually given you permission to call him yet.

MR ADKIN: I think you gave us permission, my Lady, subject to Mr Rabinowitz's right to object on grounds of admissibility or irrelevance or so on.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Or duplication.

MR ADKIN: Or duplication, possibly. He does not object so we do propose to call him, but we understand that your Ladyship is not going to want to hear any duplicative material.

There is one further point I should make about Professor Maggs which is that, as a result of the expansion of the overlap issues, your Ladyship will recall there's a new overlap issue, we have put in a second report of Professor Maggs which deals with that expanded -- the Russian law topics that arise out of that expanded overlap issue, and that is at G(A)5/2, and we'll make sure that your Ladyship has both of Professor Maggs' reports.

Going forward, there was also a question mark over

Professor Bean, who is our Russian contemporary history expert, for the same reasons. I also understand, again along the same lines, from Mr Rabinowitz, that that question mark can now be removed.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, on the historical evidence, your Ladyship left that on the footing that the evidence could in principle be called without prejudice to the right of any party to say that it was inadmissible. We do believe that very large parts of it are in fact irrelevant and inadmissible, but it will take less time to deal with that by way of cross-examination than to make formal submissions on the point so that we --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. I don't want to be burdened by what I regard, or what either of the parties or any of the parties regard as irrelevant material, because I then waste my time reading it.

MR SUMPTION: Quite. I have to say we're going to be extremely selective in which parts we deal with. We're not going to cross-examine at length, or in most cases at all, on things that we regard as not mattering a row of beans. But it's only going to extend things unnecessarily if we start having an argument about admissibility and principle before the evidence as opposed to in final submissions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Fine.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, we are content with that approach.

We are also going to be selective. We are conscious of the fact that your Ladyship does not want to be burdened with things that don't or no longer matter.

MR ADKIN: My Lady, we take the same position as Mr Sumption.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. Okay, well you'll let me have the statements but not the exhibits.

MR RABINOWITZ: Just on that, we talked, I think, your Ladyship, about the Russian law bundles. Your Ladyship's comment goes equally, presumably, for the history bundles, then, does it? You would like those in hard copy?

MR SUMPTION: Those exhibits are even more oppressive.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I don't need the exhibits to the history, thank you very much. Unless they're pictures of course.

MR RABINOWITZ: We can manage some pictures, we can even draw some pictures for your Ladyship.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. 10.15 on Monday then. Thank you very much.

INDEX

MR MARK BUZUK (affirmed) .....	1
Examination-in-chief by MR MALEK .....	1
Cross-examination by MR MASEFIELD .....	3

Monday, 28 November 2011

(10.15 am)

MR MALEK: My Lady, it's Mr Streshinsky next.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR VLADIMIR STRESHINSKY (sworn)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Please sit down, if you would like to.

Examination-in-chief by MR MALEK

MR MALEK: Can you give the court your full name, please?

A. My name is Vladimir Streshinsky, I'm known as Ivan Streshinsky.

Q. As I understand it, you're happy giving evidence in English but you would like to have the ability to use a translator if there's any difficulty, is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Could you please be provided with bundle F1, tab 2, opened at page 55 F1/02/55.

Do you have that in front of you?

A. Yes.

Q. Is that the first page of your statement?

A. That's right.

Q. Could you now turn to page 93, which is the last page, and confirm that that is your signature?

A. Yes, that's my signature.

Q. And do you confirm the facts stated in your statement to be true?

A. Yes.

Q. And you confirm that you do not have a mobile phone on you?

A. Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Who is going first?

Mr Sumption, you're not cross-examining?

MR SUMPTION: I'm not cross-examining or doing anything for the moment.

Cross-examination by MR MASEFIELD

MR MASEFIELD: Good morning, Mr Streshinsky. My name is Mr Masefield and I'm going to be asking you some questions today on behalf of Mr Berezovsky.

I'm not going to be asking you about matters which relate solely to the Metalloinvest action, Mr Streshinsky, for example whether you're aware of an agreement between Mr Anisimov and Mr Patarkatsishvili in the summer of 2004 to split the Rusal proceeds between themselves on a 50/50 basis. And I'm not going to be asking you whether the sale of the KrAZ assets by Mr Anisimov in February 2000 was at a significant undervalue.

Indeed, I'm not going to be asking you any questions about your involvement in the 10 February 2000 sale of the KrAZ assets at all because we've already covered that ground quite extensively with some of the other witnesses, including Mr Anisimov and Mr Buzuk. What I want mainly to focus on with you is your involvement in the second Rusal sale transaction which took place in the summer of 2004, and in particular I'd like to ask you some questions about the events of June and July of 2004, okay?

Before I do that, I want to ask you a few questions about your personal career and your present relationship with certain people connected to the litigation. Now, you tell us you were introduced to Mr Anisimov and joined his company, Coalco International, in about 1994, is that right?

A. That's right.

Q. And you continued to work for Coalco and Mr Anisimov up until quite recently, until 2009?

A. That's right.

Q. And so you worked for Mr Anisimov and Coalco for a period of about 15 years, didn't you, Mr Streshinsky?

A. That's right.

Q. You say that during your time with Coalco you worked closely with Mr Anisimov and became one of his most senior advisers?

A. That's correct.

Q. You tell us that you developed a good working relationship with Mr Anisimov, that's that, is it?

A. That's right.

Q. You may want to give your answers to her Lady.

Presumably Mr Anisimov came to regard you as someone he could trust, a faithful and loyal employee?

A. That's right.

Q. And although you're no longer employed by Coalco, it's right to say, isn't it, Mr Streshinsky, that you still enjoy a good business relationship with Mr Anisimov?

A. I do not have business relationship with Mr Anisimov.

Q. Well is that right, Mr Streshinsky? You're a director of his two Russian real estate companies, Riniole Investments and Coleridge Trading Ltd?

A. That's not true any longer.

Q. That's not true any longer. When did you cease to be a director?

A. I think I ceased to be a director last year.

Q. Because looking at paragraph 8 of your statement, Mr Streshinsky, you say that at Mr Anisimov's request you were a director of two of his Russian real estate companies F1/02/55.

A. Okay, I'm sorry, I was director of these two companies because these two companies were holding a piece of real estate in the centre of Moscow, so when this piece of real estate was sold, I don't know exactly, I believe maybe in the course of this year, I ceased to be a director of this these two companies.

Q. And that was earlier this year, was it, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Probably in the summer.

Q. Thank you. And you tell us that in terms of your current business affairs you're the chief executive officer of the Russian telecoms company, OJSC Telecominvest, is that right?

A. That's correct.

Q. Can you confirm that Mr Usmanov has a substantial interest in OJSC Telecominvest?

A. That's correct.

Q. And Mr Usmanov is also Mr Anisimov's partner in Metalloinvest, isn't he, Mr Streshinsky?

A. That's correct.

Q. Mr Usmanov has a 50 per cent stake in Metalloinvest and Mr Anisimov has a 20 per cent stake in Metalloinvest?

A. That's correct.

Q. And indeed, until recently, you served as a director of Metalloinvest, did you not, Mr Streshinsky?

A. I think I served as a director in Metalloinvest maybe up until 2009.

Q. I'm grateful. Would you say that you still enjoy good business relationships with Mr Anisimov and Mr Usmanov, Mr Streshinsky?

A. I enjoy a good business relationship with Mr Usmanov and

I have no business relationship with Mr Anisimov.

Q. What relations do you currently enjoy with Mr Abramovich, Mr Streshinsky?

A. None whatsoever.

Q. You see, one of Mr Abramovich's most senior assistants,

Ms Panchenko, has already told the court that she discussed her evidence with you, Mr Streshinsky, in a telephone conversation which took place earlier this year. Is that right, Mr Streshinsky?

A. That's correct. I spoke to Irina Panchenko some time in summer this year.

Q. When in the summer did that conversation take place,

Mr Streshinsky?

A. I don't remember exactly, probably June or July.

Q. Do you recall who else participated in that telephone call, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Nobody else.

Q. Just yourself and Ms Panchenko?

A. That's correct.

Q. And who had asked you to participate in that telephone call?

A. She called me.

Q. She called you out of the blue with no warning?

A. Yes.

Q. What was the purpose of the telephone call,

Mr Streshinsky?

A. She wanted to reconcile the events of summer 2004 with me because I believe my evidence has become available in the internet or, you know, in the court filings.

Q. So you discussed your evidence and her evidence on that occasion?

A. I did not read her evidence so I discussed only my recollections of the events.

Q. And were there other occasions, apart from that particular telephone call, where you discussed your evidence with any other witness in this case,

Mr Streshinsky?

A. Witnesses? Well, I discussed my evidence with Mr Anisimov, probably last time it was at the beginning of 2010.

Q. And anybody else apart from Mr Anisimov? Have you spoken to Mr De Cort?

A. No, I have not spoken to Mr De Cort.

Q. Have you spoken to Mr Tenenbaum?

A. No.

Q. Mr Hauser?

A. No.

Q. Very well.

I would like to move on, if I may, to the sale of the 25 per cent shares in Rusal which took place in the summer of 2004. Now, you were involved in that transaction, weren't you, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. You tell us that in early June 2004, Mr Anisimov instructed you to assist in the structuring and documenting of the sale of a 25 per cent interest in Rusal from Mr Patarkatsishvili to Mr Deripaska, is that correct?

A. Yes, it was either end of May or beginning of June.

Q. You were also told by Mr Anisimov that Salford Capital Partners Inc would be assisting you in preparing the transaction documents?

A. That's correct.

Q. And you therefore made contact with Salford in the first week of June 2004, and in particular you got in touch with Mr Vladimir Ashurov and Ms Ksenia Arbatova?

A. That's right.

Q. You tell us that Mr Ashurov attended a meeting with Mr Deripaska's representatives on Friday 4 June 2004?

A. That's correct.

Q. Following this meeting with Mr Deripaska's representatives, which took place on that Friday, on Wednesday 9 June 2004 you received an email from Mr Mishakov attaching a schematic diagram of the transaction, together with a Bryan Cave memorandum of the same date which had been prepared by Mr Hauser, do you remember that?

A. Well, it must have been the case, yes.

Q. Please could you be given bundle H(A)74 and we can look at the document at page 218 H(A)74/218. Do you see there a covering email to yourself, Mr Streshinsky?

A. That's right. Yes, I see.

Q. From Mr Mishakov?

A. Yes.

Q. We can see from the attachments that it included Mr Hauser's memorandum of 9 June and Mr Anisimov's schematic diagram also of 9 June, do you see that? We have the attachments on the next few pages, but just looking back at the email, do you see the attachments?

A. Yes.

Q. And if we turn on to page 219 H(A)/74/219, we can see Mr Hauser's memorandum of 9 June 2004, do you have that document?

A. Which page?

Q. 219, you're on the right page.

A. Yes, yes, I'm on that page.

Q. We've looked at this document already with some of the other witnesses, Mr Streshinsky, and I'm not going to take up further time by going through it all with you, but we can see from the memorandum that Mr Hauser talks in a number of places about ultimate beneficiaries, in the plural, who he refers to as BB.

A. Mm-hm.

Q. We can see that for example in bullet point 1 on page 219, do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. If we turn over the page, to page 220 H(A)74/220, just below bullet point 6, the italicised portion, there's a reference there again to each of BB, and to include an insurance that:

"... BB were the only persons who have ever been beneficially entitled to the Shares."

Do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Which point?

Q. It's just below point 6, the italicised passage?

A. It's a release, yes?

Q. Yes. And you see a reference there to:

"... BB were the only persons who have ever been beneficially entitled to the Shares."

A. Yes.

Q. If we turn on in the bundle to page 223 H(A)74/223, we can see Mr Anisimov's schematic diagram which you were also sent. Do you have that? That's the right page, Mr Streshinsky. We can see that Mr Anisimov refers in his diagram to the "Beneficiaries' Company", do you see that at the top of the page?

A. Yes.

Q. Looking down at the notes, for example note number 6, Mr Mishakov makes reference to the beneficiaries B&B, do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. So when you received this memorandum, this schematic diagram, Mr Streshinsky, you would have seen that Mr Deripaska's representatives understood that there were two ultimate beneficial owners of the 25 per cent stake in Rusal, correct?

A. Yes, that might be the case that there were two beneficiaries.

Q. And you forwarded this memorandum and the schematic diagram the same day to Yuri Fartashnyak, do you remember that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. I don't remember that but I know the name.

Q. Who was Mr Fartashnyak?

A. He was a consultant lawyer who consulted us on a number of transactions.

Q. He was an internal lawyer or external lawyer?

A. External.

Q. Who was he a lawyer with, which firm?

A. He didn't work in any firm.

Q. He was an independent --

A. Moscow, independent.

Q. If you put away bundle H(A)74 and take up bundle H(A)75, and turn within H(A)75 to page 99T H(A)75/99T, do you see there a page with a string of emails, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. I'm afraid it's a little bit hard to read the text but bear with me. If you look at the very bottom of the page, it stems -- on page 99T, right at the bottom, about seven lines up from the bottom, we can see an email from Ksenia Arbatova with a subject "Document Diary for Documentary Closing", do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. I don't think we need to turn that document diary up, Mr Streshinsky. It's at H(A)75/37 and we've looked at it with other witnesses. But you can take it from me that the document diary that Ms Arbatova prepared also made reference to two ultimate beneficiaries who she refers to in that document diary as B1 and B2, do you remember that?

A. Can I see that?

Q. If you want to have a look at it briefly, it's back at page 37 in this bundle H(A)75/37.

A. Page 37?

Q. Correct.

A. This one, yes, the document diary.

Q. Do you have there the document diary?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. We can see, if you look at the column "Parties", there is reference in the second column to various parties who are going to be executing the documents.

If we look down to the third box to item 3, there's going to be a personal guarantee to be executed by B1, and then there's going to be another guarantee to be executed by B2; do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. Over the page, in the last box, we can see that it was envisaged by Ms Arbatova that a general power of attorney would be issued by B2 in favour of B1, do you see that?

A. I see that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Did you see this document at the time?

A. I don't remember seeing this particular document but I've seen it during the preparation for my witness statement.

MR MASEFIELD: If we turn back to 99T, to the email string, Mr Streshinsky, we can see that Ms Arbatova forwarded the document diary to you, that's the email right at the bottom of page 99T, so it seems that you were sent the document diary on 10 June 2004.

A. Okay. I don't deny it.

Q. If we look at the next email up on page 99T, we can see that there is an email from Mr Mishakov to you of 9 June 2004, attaching the Bryan Cave memorandum and the schematic diagram that we've just looked at, do you see that? It's the one immediately above Ms Arbatova's email on page 99T H(A)75/99T.

A. Mm-hm. Okay.

Q. Then immediately above that we can see that you forwarded those documents to Yuri Fartushnyak at 8.59 pm on Thursday 10 June 2004, and immediately above that forwarding email we have Mr Fartushnyak's response, and we can see that Mr Fartushnyak says he's read through the documents that you've forwarded, and he then goes on to make a number of short points. His third point is this:

"Thirdly, it seemed to me that X and Y must provide a joint and several guarantee on behalf of the seller. But will they be willing to do that?"

Do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. So Mr Fartushnyak was clearly under the impression that there were two ultimate beneficiaries, wasn't he?

A. Well, he was based on the documents which he was presented.

Q. Indeed, and those documents refer to X and Y and B&B and B1 and B2?

A. That's correct.

Q. And then Mr Fartushnyak says:

"Finally I recommend consulting with an English lawyer as there might be some 'sticking points' related to this."

Do you see that?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. We can see that you then forwarded Mr Fartushnyak's recommendation on to Ms Ksenia Arbatova the same day, that's the email at the top of the page?

A. That's correct.

Q. And Ms Arbatova, we know, lost no time in taking up Mr Fartushnyak's advice and instructing an English lawyer. We can see that if we turn on in the bundle to page 228.023 H(A)75/228.023. I'm afraid the numbering is a little complicated.

Do you see there an email starting about halfway down the page from Ms Arbatova to Lynn McCaw of Leboeuf, Lamb, Greene & McRae, dated 11 June 2004?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. And we can see that Ms Arbatova says:

"Following our telephone conference, attached please find the drafts of the transaction documents. I also attached the transaction description and documents diary for your convenience."

Do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. We'll turn to look at Ms Arbatova's transaction description in a moment, Mr Streshinsky, but before we do please can you confirm that you were aware of the fact that Salford had instructed Leboeufts around this time?

A. Yes.

Q. And we know that you were aware of that because you sent an email in Russian to Mr Ashurov on Sunday 13 June in which you approved the instruction of Leboeufts, do you remember that?

A. Yes.

Q. We have Ms Arbatova's transaction description in this bundle at page 228.071 H(A)75/228.071, if we could turn that up. Although this document appears on its face to be dated 28 March 2011, that is in fact due to the automatic date insertion in the document and merely reflects the date when this document was printed, okay?

But it's pretty clear from the email I've taken you to and to Leboeuf's response, which I'm coming on to, that this is the transaction description document which was sent by Ms Arbatova to Leboeufts on 11 June 2004. So at the time when Ms Arbatova sent this, it was one week after your initial meeting with Mr Deripaska's people on 4 June 2004?

A. It was, what, 11th?

Q. 11 June, and indeed it was the same day as a second meeting that you had with Mr Deripaska's people which also took place on 11 June 2004. Do you remember that second meeting on 11 June?

A. Yes, there was a meeting on 11 June.

Q. Do you recognise this memorandum which Ms Arbatova prepared, Mr Streshinsky?

A. No, I don't think I've seen this memorandum.

Q. You don't think that Salford provided you with a copy of it at the time, even though you were endorsing their instruction of Leboeuufs?

A. I don't think I've seen this memorandum.

Q. Can we just look at it very briefly. If we look in particular at the second paragraph of this memorandum, we can see what Ms Arbatova's and Salford's understanding was at the time. Ms Arbatova says this:

"The current situation is as follows: the Shares are held by [Roman Abramovich] who holds them (through the structure where [Roman Abramovich] is a beneficiary or a shareholder of P that owns M which owns the Shares), in favour, under informal agreements and arrangements, of BB (please see below), who are the final and ultimate beneficial owners of the Shares."

Do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. The reference in parenthesis to "please see below" appears to be a reference to the first numbered paragraph where BB are identified as the ultimate beneficiaries of company B. Do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, did this understanding which Salford clearly had of the situation as at 11 June 2004 also reflect your understanding at that date? Did you also understand at 11 June 2004 that the shares were held by Mr Abramovich in favour of BB as a result of informal agreements and arrangements?

A. At that moment I simply had no information about the particulars of the holding of the shares, so I need to turn your attention to the fact that on the -- we had a first, initial meeting on 4 June, that was with Ms Arbatova, possibly Mr Ashurov and Mr Mishakov. On 3 June, there was an article in Moscow newspaper saying that Mr Berezovsky is involved with the Russkiy Aluminium.

So when we came to the meeting on 4 June, we were -- so Mr Mishakov said that, if that is the case, we have to basically use two beneficiaries in these documents. So we were all attempting to meet with Mr Abramovich's party because they were the ones who knew the exact details of how the shares were held.

Q. Mr Streshinsky, we will come on to other documents in a moment which show that your information about Mr Berezovsky and his interest went much further than what was being said in the newspaper articles, but you say you had no information?

A. I had no information about Mr Berezovsky holding the shares of Rusal.

Q. Is that really your evidence to the court, Mr Streshinsky, you had no background information?

A. I had no background information that Mr Berezovsky was the owner of --

Q. We'll come on to those documents in a moment.

MR MALEK: I think it's fair for the witness to be able to finish his answer before another question is asked.

MR MASEFIELD: Sorry, Mr Malek.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, can you finish your answer, please, Mr Streshinsky.

A. To finish my answer, we were trying to get the information from Mr Abramovich's party, because this was the party who was holding the shares, and they knew the details of how the shares were held. At that moment in time, I was trying to progress the deal as much as possible, so we were proceeding with the transaction documents without having full details of the ownership.

MR MASEFIELD: You see, Mr Streshinsky, you'd been working on this transaction alongside Salford for over a week by this point, hadn't you?

A. Yes.

Q. You'd also been liaising with Mr Deripaska's representatives, you'd met them twice?

A. Yes, I met Mr Mishakov.

Q. And Salford's understanding, as we see reflected in this memorandum, was that Mr Abramovich was holding shares for and on behalf of BB. We see that in the second paragraph, don't we?

A. That's right.

Q. And the understanding of Mr Deripaska's representatives, Mr Hauser and Mr Mishakov, was also that Mr Abramovich was holding the shares for and on behalf of BB, or B&B?

A. That's correct at that point in time, yes.

Q. Was that not also your understanding at this time, Mr Streshinsky, that Mr Abramovich was holding the shares for and on behalf of BB?

A. I have no -- I didn't have any specific knowledge of that but I could assume that.

Q. We don't see you writing to Mr Deripaska's representatives or to Salford correcting their understanding that there are two beneficiaries?

A. Yes, because I didn't know. I --

Q. We don't see you writing back to Mr Fartushnyak following the receipt of the email we've just looked at, telling him that he's got it wrong and there are not in fact two beneficiaries, X and Y?

A. Yes, I didn't know at that point in time.

Q. Well, let's have a look at a few more documents, Mr Streshinsky.

Now do you recall that Ms Arbatova's email of 11 June 2004, which attached this transaction description document, also referred to a telephone conference which Ms Arbatova had had with Ms Lynn McCaw of Leboeufts?

A. No, I don't recall.

Q. If we go back to the document, it's page 228.023
H(A)75/228.023.

Do you see the email starts halfway down the page:
"Following our teleconference ..."

We can see what Ms Arbatova had explained to Ms Lynn McCaw of Leboeufts during that telephone conference if we turn on in the bundle to page 228.021, sorry, it's back two pages, H(A)75/228.021. You need to go back two pages, Mr Streshinsky, my apologies.

Do you see there, Mr Streshinsky, an attendance note that's been drawn up by Ms Lynn McCaw and dated 14 June 2004, do you have that document?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. We can see just below the list of attendees that the purpose of the attendance note is said to be:

"Report to D Waldron (Money Laundering Reporting Officer at [Leboeufs] regarding money-laundering issues."

Do you see that? It's in the top half of the document, just before the bold line --

A. Oh, yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Did you see that document at the time?

A. No.

MR MASEFIELD: We can see, just below the list, we can see that Ms McCaw's note starts by saying:

"[Lynn McCaw] was called on Friday 11 June by Oleg Berger (OB) from [Leboeufs] Moscow to act on this matter. She also had a conversation with Vladimir Ashurov ... and Ksenia Arbatova ... of Salford. She received eight documents from [Ksenia Arbatova], but the identity of the parties to these agreements are not clear from these documents."

Then we can see what Ms McCaw appears to have been told by Mr Ashurov and Ms Arbatova, she explains:

"Bryan Cave, the law firm acting for the purchaser (i.e. Oleg Deripaska...) set up for Roman Abramovich ... and [Oleg Deripaska] a company called Rusal. Apparently, [Oleg Deripaska] understood that he was dealing with [Roman Abramovich], but ... Berezovsky ... was behind [Roman Abramovich]. 25% of [the Rusal Aluminium] shares was sold to [Oleg Deripaska] in 2003. The remaining 25% is to be sold to OD. The share sale is supposed to end up with all the shares to be owned by OD through a holding company."

Now, does that passage also reflect your understanding at the time, Mr Streshinsky --

A. No.

Q. So you do not recall being told by --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Sorry, I didn't hear your answer.

A. No.

MR MASEFIELD: You don't recall being told by Mr Deripaska's representatives that Mr Deripaska understood that he was dealing with Mr Abramovich but that Mr Berezovsky was behind Mr Abramovich?

A. I do not recall that Mr Berezovsky -- I was told that Mr Berezovsky was behind Mr Abramovich.

Q. Are you able to explain where this information -- which Lynn McCaw of Leboeufs -- has come from if not from Salford and from the meetings that you had just both attended with Mr Deripaska's representatives?

A. I have no idea. I was assisting Mr -- I was assisting Mr Patarkatsishvili in selling the 25 per cent of Rusal.

Q. And you attended two meetings on 4 June and 11 June with Ms Arbatova and Mr Deripaska's representatives, correct?

A. Yes. So, at least we knew that Mr Patarkatsishvili was involved, he was there, but we didn't know exactly whether Mr Berezovsky was there. So he might have been a partner of Mr Patarkatsishvili, he might have -- Mr Patarkatsishvili might have held the shares of beneficial interest in trust for Mr Berezovsky, but we didn't have any information on that.

Q. You say that, but what Ms Arbatova appears to have information on is that Deripaska understood he was dealing with Mr Abramovich but Berezovsky was behind Mr Abramovich. You say you weren't aware of that?

A. No, I was not aware of that.

Q. And we can see further down this attendance note that Lynn McCaw is asking the money-laundering officer, David Waldron, how much investigation they need to do on where the shares come from and who the client is, do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. We can see over the page David Waldron's advice

H(A)75/228/022. He says that:

"Salford is an investment fund set up by BB and someone else."

Do you see that?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. He said that he thought Leboeuvs needed to be careful. He goes on to say that he thinks due diligence needs to be done, he does not think that Leboeuf should simply rely on Bryan Cave, Mr Hauser's firm, for their money-laundering due diligence, do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you recall being made aware at the time that Leboeuvs had raised money-laundering concerns and wanted to conduct proper due diligence of their own before proceeding with the transaction?

A. No.

Q. I'll come on to that in a moment, Mr Streshinsky.

Now Ms McCaw of Leboeuvs issued a memorandum setting out her initial advice to Salford on 14 June 2004, and we have that advice earlier in the bundle at page 214 H(A)75/214. Please could you turn that up.

Do you have there a memorandum of advice from Lynn McCaw dated 14 June 2004?

A. Yes.

Q. You tell us that you received this memorandum of advice from Leboeufts via an email from Ms Arbatova on 15 June 2004?

A. Yes.

Q. And presumably you would have read this memorandum of advice from Leboeufts at the time?

A. Yes.

Q. We can see from her memorandum that Ms McCaw says that she's received the eight documents she's been sent, those were the draft agreements, together with Ms Arbatova's "most helpful diagram and document diary",
do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. It's the opening paragraph.

Then Ms McCaw says:

"My understanding is -- and please advise if this is incorrect -- that [Leboeufts] is solely advising Salford in this transaction and that Salford is acting as financial advisor to BB. I understand that Salford is not advising Eagle, Deripaska, Abramovich or Madison.
Nor is Salford advising Rusal Holdings or OJSC Russian Aluminium. However, Salford regards itself as 'honest broker' in that it would like to achieve a position which is satisfactory to all concerned.

"Despite Ksenia's extremely helpful memorandum, I have found it extremely difficult to follow the documentation since it is frequently unclear who is being referred to and there are many blank spaces where parties have not been identified.

"However, for the purposes of this summary, I have assumed that X, Y, 'Vendor', and 'B' are in some way related to BB."

Do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. That's right, yes.

Q. Then if we jump over the page we can see halfway down, about three paragraphs up from the heading --

A. Next page?

Q. It's the second page, about three paragraphs up from the heading "Document No" we can see this H(A)75/215:

"As you know [Leboeuufs] is required by money-laundering prevention laws to follow an extensive checking procedure on a transaction by transaction basis even when existing clients such as Salford are involved. This will take some time."

Do you see that passage, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. So it looks like you would have realised, if you read through this memorandum at the time, that Leboeuufs were going to have to carry out money-laundering checks?

A. That must have been the case at the time.

Q. I'm grateful.

Then the remainder of Ms McCaw's memorandum proceeds to work through the various drafts of the transaction documentation which she describes variously, and we can see this on page 216 H(A)75/216, as seriously inadequate, circular, complex and opaque. They are some of the adjectives that you have picked out and refer to in your witness statement.

A. That's right.

Q. She concludes by saying on page 222 H(A)75/222 that she hopes her advice is of use to Salford in its further advice to BB. Do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, matters didn't rest there, did they, Mr Streshinsky? Leboeuufs, as Ms McCaw had mentioned, were now obliged to carry out their money-laundering checks, do you remember that?

A. Yes, I've seen this in this memorandum. I don't remember focusing on that at the time.

Q. Well, let's come on to some more documents in a moment.

If we turn on in the bundle to page 293.001 H(A)293.001 you can see there there's a further memorandum that one of Ms McCaw's colleagues, James Morgan, sent to Ms Arbatova of Salford on 15 June 2004; do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. I see that.

Q. We can see that various client identification documents are being sought both in relation to Salford Continental and in relation to Mr Berezovsky, do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. Then over the page at 293.002 H(A)75/293/002, we can see that Leboeuvs, quite properly, were also seeking various bits of transaction information, do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. And if we drop down to the penultimate bullet point, we can see that the information which Leboeuvs were asking for included information concerning the connection between Mr Abramovich and Boris Berezovsky, BB:

"... including why and how the 25 per cent indirect holding in [Rusal Holding] is held by [Mr Abramovich] for [Mr Berezovsky], and why transfer of shares is to be for nominal value ..."

Do you see that?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. Do you think that Salford passed on these requests for further information to you, Mr Streshinsky?

A. No, I have never seen this document.

Q. Surely you would have been told about these requests that Leboeuvs had raised and asked to assist in answering them?

A. No, I haven't been asked.

Q. So you didn't receive these requests?

A. No, I didn't.

Q. And you didn't inform Mr Anisimov that Leboeufs and Salford had raised these money-laundering requests?

A. No.

Q. You see, the day after Leboeufs had raised these requests for further information regarding Mr Berezovsky and the relationship with Mr Abramovich, we know that on 16 June 2004 you gave an instruction to Salford on behalf of your principal asking them to suspend work on the transaction?

A. That's right.

Q. Do you recall that?

A. That's right, that's correct.

Q. Let's turn up the document. If you put bundle H(A)75 away and please could you be given bundle H(A)76 and turn within that to page 13 H(A)76/13. Now, this is a memorandum that was drawn up by Salford and sent to you on about 17 June 2004. There is a Russian version which we have as well in the bundle starting on page 42 H(A)76/42. I don't know which version you would prefer to work from, but if you're happy with the English, why don't we stick with the English at page 13.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Are you happy to work with the English, Mr Streshinsky?

A. I just don't remember seeing this one so maybe I need to look at the Russian one.

MR MASEFIELD: It's a document that's come from Mr Anisimov's disclosure, Mr Streshinsky, and we'll see that matters are addressed there closely on the transaction.

A. The document in Russian is where?

Q. It's at page 42 in the bundle.

A. The same bundle?

Q. Yes.

A. Mm-hm.

Q. Do you recall receiving this memorandum from Salford at the time, Mr Streshinsky?

A. No, I don't, but I must have received it.

Q. Are you happy to work from the English version, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Okay.

Q. If we turn back to page 13 H(A)76/13, we can pick it up in the third paragraph, just before the heading, Mr Streshinsky.

A. Okay.

Q. The third paragraph down, we can see that Salford write:

"At present the process of negotiating the transaction is haphazard, chaotic and uncoordinated which may lead to goals entirely different from those initially attended being obtained. The poor organisation of the process may excessively complicate the transaction structure and make a 'Western-style transaction' impossible. There is a significant risk of a 'Russian-style transaction' being carried out, which does not provide the seller with adequate guarantees that the funds are legitimate and that payment will be made in full."

Then dropping down the page to the section headed "Process and Results. Negotiations". We can see that it says:

"The first negotiations on the transaction were conducted with Coalco representatives on 2 June 2004. At that time Salford's role in the transaction was not clearly defined and amounted to providing assistance to Coalco, as the representative of the Beneficiary, in the technical structuring of the transaction and support for its infrastructure (the setting-up of companies, etc).

"The transaction has evolved significantly from the time of the first round of negotiations to the present day. The transaction structure has been modified during the negotiations. Two meetings were held with the representative of the buyer, and the second of these meetings, attended by the buyer's external consultants, determined the final structure of the transaction (to date, at least).

"At the 11 June meeting, the buyer's legal adviser (the international law firm Bryan Cave) provided drafts of eight transaction-related documents, which we and our legal advisers [Leboeuvs] have analysed. The main results of this analysis is set forth in this memorandum and [Leboeuvs'] memorandum dated 14 June."

Then we see this:

"On 16 June we were given the principal's instruction to suspend negotiations and work on the transaction. At the time of the suspension, we had held intensive consultation with Leboeuf ([Leboeuf's] participation in the transaction depends on the successful completion of due diligence in respect of the transaction participants) and the intermediary bank supporting the creation of the technical infrastructure for the transaction."

Do you see that passage, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. Was it you that gave Salford the instruction to suspend negotiations and the work on the transaction?

A. Yes.

Q. And who was the principal on whose behalf you gave that instruction to Salford, Mr Streshinsky?

A. It was by instruction of Mr Anisimov.

Q. Do you say that it was just a coincidence,

Mr Streshinsky, that the instruction to Salford and Leboeufs to suspend their work on the transaction came the very day after Leboeufs had started to raise requests for further information about Mr Berezovsky?

A. Since I have not seen the request for information about Mr Berezovsky I cannot say anything about this.

Q. Well, you say you haven't seen it, but I suggest to you that Salford passed on the requests that had been raised by Leboeufs with them, passed them on to you, and you then spoke to Mr Anisimov and he told you that they should down tools.

A. No. In fact, this was a different -- the motivation to stop cooperating with Leboeuf and Salford was entirely different. I considered this was my initiative, my personal initiative because --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What, to suspend instructions?

A. To suspend Salford and Leboeuf, because I considered that Mr Patarkatsishvili had too many advisers acting, and this was really a chaotic moment at that time so -- I also found the memorandum which Leboeuf wrote on 14 June very lengthy and unhelpful because it was focusing on the matters which I didn't consider to be important at that time, so I told Mr Anisimov that either I will be running the transaction and I will be responsible that this transaction is going to be closed, or Salford. He probably spoke to Mr Patarkatsishvili and that was their joint decision.

MR MASEFIELD: Why did you decide that you would go with the services of Akin Gump and Mr Faekov, who appear to have done little or no work on the transaction at this stage, and to stop the work that Leboeuufs had been doing which was much more substantial?

A. Because I know Mr Faekov is very able lawyer, he was both Russian lawyer and English lawyer, so it was -- we made number of deals with Mr Faekov together in the past so it was very comfortable for me to work with Mr Faekov.

Q. Are you aware that Ms Lynn McCaw is a very senior partner at Leboeuufs, she has over 30 years' experience in M&A, she is thought to be one of the best M&A lawyers in England?

A. I don't know her.

Q. We can see that in fact set out by Salford in the memorandum a bit further on. They go on to say this:

"The suspension of work may have an adverse effect on the quality of the services we provide and on the motivation of our employees ([Leboeuufs] has currently put at our disposal the services of one of the best M&A lawyers in England, and the intermediary bank has demonstrated its readiness to provide the required services in an extraordinarily short timeframe)."

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Where are you reading from?

MR MASEFIELD: It's the second paragraph from the end of page 13, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR MASEFIELD: "Nonetheless, we hope that it will be possible to resume the work."

Then the paragraph at the bottom of the page:

"On 17 June we received proposals from [Leboeuvs] on simplifying the document structure of the transaction. These proposals basically boil down to the possibility of drawing up all the current arrangements regarding the mutual obligations of the parties by preparing three documents (including the sale and purchase agreement) instead of eight."

So Leboeuvs had in fact proposed something that would cut through the opaque, circular and complex transaction and reduce it just down to three documents, that's right, isn't it, Mr Streshinsky?

A. I don't know what Leboeuf proposed.

Q. Well, you do, because we've seen the memorandum of advice that they sent to you on 14 June.

A. Yes --

Q. Which you said you had seen?

A. Yes, I had seen that, and I've seen that they've characterised the documents as ambiguous, circular, unclear, et cetera, but I have not -- I don't remember there were any proposals in that memorandum of how to overcome that.

Q. I'm not sure we need to pursue that for the time being.

Can we turn on in this Salford memorandum to page 4 on the internal numbering, which we have at page 16 of the Magnum system H(A)76/16.

A. Okay, 4.

Q. We can see at the top of the page Salford say this:

"According to the information at our disposal, the buyer's external consultants have held preliminary consultations with representatives of the nominee shareholder ..."

So that would appear to be a reference to Bryan Cave, the buyer's external consultants, talking with Mr Abramovich's representatives, the representatives of the nominee shareholder, is that right?

A. Well, I see what's written here.

Q. And Salford go on:

"... and based on the results of these consultations, the risks should be distributed between the beneficiary and the nominee shareholder as follows ..."

We can see that Salford then set out the representation sought. The first bullet point deals with the representations and warranties to be provided by the nominee holder, that is to say Mr Abramovich, of which the first, we can see, is:

"During the period from March 2000 up to the transfer of the shares to the beneficiary, the beneficiaries were the owners of the beneficiary interests in the shares."

Do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. I see that.

Q. Then if we drop down to the next rounded bullet point that deals with the representations and warranties to be provided by the beneficiaries. Do you see that?

"Coverage of risk by the beneficiaries"?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. Of which the first is:

"As far as the beneficiaries are aware, during the period from March 2000 up to the transfer of the shares to the beneficiaries, the beneficiaries were the sole owners of the beneficiary interests in the shares."

Do you see that passage, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. So as at 17 June 2004, when this memorandum appears to have been written by Salford, Salford appears still to have been under the impression that there were two beneficiaries who were interested in the 25 per cent stake in Rusal, correct?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, he can't give his evidence as to what Salford thought or didn't think unless he knew that from his own knowledge.

MR MASEFIELD: My Lady, I'll move on.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: We can all read what the document says and you can make such submissions as you wish in due course about it.

MR MASEFIELD: We can, my Lady.

Was that still your understanding at the time, Mr Streshinsky, that there was more than one beneficiary involved in the transaction? Was that your understanding at 17 June 2004?

A. Up until the meeting with Mr Abramovich's side, yes, I assumed that this could be the case.

Q. I'm grateful for that, and we'll come on that meeting in a moment.

Then if we look over the page H(A)76/17.

A. 76/17, yes.

Q. We can see a heading about halfway down which is called

"5. Status", do you see that?

A. 76/17?

Q. There's a heading "5. Status". The first heading below that is "Engagement of [Leboeuufs]".

A. Yes.

Q. We can see that Salford say:

"In connection with the complex nature of the transaction, its risk, specific aspects to the participants to the transaction, the lack of clear economic grounds for the price and the political risks, we think it is absolutely essential that our client be represented in further negotiations on the transaction by an international law firm.

"Recognising this necessity but at the same time playing a fairly limited role in the transaction, Salford, not having any other opportunity on the part of the seller of the former shareholders of the holding company, was forced to use the services of its standing external consultant. Due to the general tightening of control rules and the political risks determined by the personal histories of the participants, [Leboeuufs] was forced to commence a review of the lawfulness of the transaction and the origin of the funds, as a part of which [Leboeuufs] submitted a query to which Salford must respond."

Do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. So Salford is saying here that it's going to be necessary to respond to the money-laundering queries that Leboeuvs have raised, yes? That's what they're saying?

A. Yes, they said that they were:

"... forced to commence a review of the lawfulness of the transaction and the origin of the funds ..."

Yes.

Q. Then if we look over the page to page 6 on the internal numbering, page 76/18 H(A)76/18, we can see that about halfway down and just before a number of bullet points Salford say this:

"At this stage to successfully complete the transaction we believe that the following steps must be taken ..."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. And if we drop down to the fifth bullet point we can see that it's recommended by Salford that there be completion of the Leboeuvs money-laundering review, do you see that?

A. "Completion of the LLGM review."

Yes.

Q. So even though their activities have been suspended, Mr Streshinsky, we can see that Salford were recommending that they be reinstated and, amongst other things, that Leboeuks should be allowed to complete its money-laundering due diligence, that's what this document shows?

A. Okay.

Q. We can see what the outcome of that was, Mr Streshinsky, if we turn on in bundle H(A)76 to page 61 for the Russian H(A)76/61 or 61T for the English H(A)76/61T.

Do you see there an email from yourself, Mr Streshinsky, to Mr Mishakov, Mr Deripaska's representative, dated 17 June 2004?

A. Right.

Q. We can see you've written to Mr Mishakov:

"Stalbek, following our phone conversation today I am confirming in writing that the decision has been taken to refuse from the services of Lebeff and that all information is to be directed via me."

Do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. Now tell me this, why had you been involved in a telephone conversation with Mr Deripaska's legal representatives regarding whether or not Leboeuks should be taken off the transaction?

A. I do not recall this telephone conversation, but I assume that I told Mr Mishakov that if we want to continue to put the transaction forward and actually execute it quickly, the company Leboeuf should be off the, you know, should go outside of the transaction. So I should be responsible for the transaction.

Q. And was the reason for that you were concerned that the money-laundering queries that Leboeuvs had raised would drag out the process?

A. No, I did not focus on money-laundering queries at all at that time.

Q. You say that, but I suggest that is in fact the reason why Leboeuvs were sacked?

A. I disagree.

Q. Well, let's come on to see what happened next when you speak with Mr Abramovich's representatives and then your communications with the First Zurich Bank, Mr Streshinsky.

On 17 June 2004, you sent two emails to Ms Khudyk suggesting ways in which it might be possible to restructure the transaction, do you remember that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. If we could turn those emails up. The first email you sent to Ms Khudyk we have in Russian at page 23 within this bundle, if you could turn that up, please

H(A)/76/23.

A. In this, the same bundle?

Q. Yes.

A. Yes.

Q. Do you see there an email from yourself to Ms Khudyk on 17 June 2004 timed at 10.05BST, do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. We can see that it attaches a document called "Coalco Letter 17 June 04". It's not over the page in the bundle, I'm afraid the bundle is not very well ordered.
But do you see the reference to the attachment, "Coalco Letter 17 June 04"?

A. What?

Q. If you look in the email heading, Mr Streshinsky, underneath the subject "Letter" it says "attachments",
do you see that?

A. "Coalco Letter", okay, yes.

Q. As regards the text of the email which we have in Russian, I believe we have the translation of that at page 53 in the bundle H(A)76/53, but could you please confirm that for me, Mr Streshinsky.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: The translation bundle or --

A. Do you want me to translate this?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, just a second.

Could you tell me, is it in the T bundle on Magnum or in the ordinary bundle?

MR MASEFIELD: It's in the ordinary bundle, my Lady. If you turn on in the bundle to page 53, H(A)76/53, we have a text of email.

And looking back at the Russian, which you have at 23, is that a translation of the email that you have at page 23?

A. Okay.

Q. It is a translation --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you confirm it is, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes, one second.

Okay, yes.

MR MASEFIELD: So you can confirm that that is the translation of the document we have at page 23?

A. That is the translation, yes, that's right.

Q. I'm grateful.

And as regards the attachment, we have that at page 38 in the Russian H(A)76/38 and 38T in the English H(A)76/38T. If you could turn that up. If you're happy working from the English, I suggest we work from the purple page 38T.

A. Yes, I see this, yes.

Q. Can you confirm that you were the author of the Russian document which we have at page 38 of the Russian text?

A. We were drafting it together with Mr Faekov.

Q. I'm grateful.

We can see from the first paragraph of your letter that you are proposing to simplify the transaction, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. And that you then deal with dividends and shares separately under parts A and parts B, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. And under the heading "Dividends" we can see that you've written:

"BP (an individual) and B (a company with B as the sole shareholder) on the one hand, and M on the other hand, shall conclude the Deed of Accounting and Release which would approximately state the following ..."

Pausing there, BP was clearly a reference to Mr Patarkatsishvili, wasn't it, Mr Streshinsky?

A. That's right.

Q. And B company, that was a reference to a company which ultimately became Cliren?

A. That's correct.

Q. You tell us as much at paragraph 87 of your witness statement F1/02/77. The reference to the sole shareholder of B company, which you describe in parenthesis simply as B, you say, do you, that that reference was a typo?

A. That's correct.

Q. And you say that you understood that Mr Patarkatsishvili was the sole shareholder of B company and this therefore should have been a reference to BP rather than to B?

A. That's correct.

Q. Is that really your evidence, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes. Yes.

Q. You see, Mr Streshinsky, I suggest to you that the reference to B in parenthesis was not a typo at all. It was a reference by you to Mr Berezovsky, was it not?

A. No. No.

Q. Let's go on to have a look at what you say in this document, Mr Streshinsky. Have a look at what you say in paragraph 1, you say this:

"The parties acknowledge that according to the agreements dated 10 December 2000 and 15 March 2000 and oral and other arrangements, BP and B participated in the sale of shares of KrAZ, BAZ, Krasnoyarsk Hydroelectric Power Station and Achinsk Alumina Refinery..."

Do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. We know for a fact that B company, Cliren, did not participate in the sale of the shares for those plants on 10 February, or in the establishment and capitalisation of Rusal; that's right, isn't it?

A. That's correct.

Q. And you knew that full well, didn't you, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. That Cliren didn't participate?

A. I knew, of course.

Q. You had been involved yourself in the February 2000 sale, and you also knew that Cliren was, until very shortly before this second Rusal sale transaction, a Coalco company?

A. That's correct.

Q. So when you say in paragraph 1 that BP and B participated in the sale of KrAZ shares and in the formation and capitalisation of Rusal, you were not referring to Cliren, were you, Mr Streshinsky?

A. No, I was not. But when we were talking on 17 June about the structure of the transaction, there was no decision that company Cliren would be participating in the transaction. So that was only subsequently when we have chosen company Cliren to participate.

Q. The timing when you decide Cliren does not matter, Mr Streshinsky, because you say that BP and B participated in the sale of KrAZ shares, and you weren't referring to a company at all there, were you, Mr Streshinsky?

A. I was referring to the company. The idea was that Mr Patarkatsishvili and his company would be the parties to this transaction.

Q. In paragraph 1 you're referring to the historical participation of BP and B on the sale of the KrAZ shares. Which company do you say you were referring to at paragraph 1, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Well, the idea was that Mr Patarkatsishvili would be represented in the agreements by a company, because that is an additional layer of protection for any individual against liabilities.

Q. You see, the people you are referring to in paragraph 1 was not a company at all, Mr Streshinsky, it was a reference to Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky, that's the truth of the matter?

A. No. No.

Q. And that shows that the reference to B as the sole shareholder, in the immediately preceding paragraph, is not, as you now seek to suggest, a typo but it was also a reference to Mr Berezovsky.

A. Okay, can I explain the reasons --

Q. Please.

A. -- why I believe this was a typo?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, you may.

MR MASEFIELD: Please do.

A. If Mr Berezovsky would be involved, it would be clear that he should have been involved on the same basis as Mr Patarkatsishvili, so Mr Patarkatsishvili here as a physical person, and it's called here B as a company. So either Mr Patarkatsishvili would be a shareholder of B together with Mr Berezovsky, if that would be the case, or Mr Patarkatsishvili would be participating in this deal, Mr B, Berezovsky, would be participating in this deal, and their company would be participating in this deal.

So because -- as the structure of transaction assumed that Mr Patarkatsishvili had to guarantee the obligations for the company, it would be inconceivable to think that Mr Patarkatsishvili would be guaranteeing the obligations of company B, which was owned by Mr Berezovsky. And also it would be inconceivable to think that the buyers of the shares would want just the guarantee from Mr Patarkatsishvili and wouldn't want the guarantee from Mr Berezovsky.

Q. Mr Streshinsky, that's entirely right, and that is why Ms Arbatova in her document diary had suggested that it was going to be necessary to obtain a power of attorney from Mr Berezovsky so that Mr Patarkatsishvili could execute documents on Mr Berezovsky's behalf; do you remember that?

- A. Yes, I remember the diary, you showed that to me.
- Q. You see, what I suggest you were in fact proposing in this document, Mr Streshinsky, was that the identity of the second beneficiary, Mr Berezovsky, should be obscured by naming Mr Patarkatsishvili as one of the beneficiaries in the transaction and then interposing a shelf company, B company, as the other beneficiary in the transaction behind which would stand Mr Berezovsky. That, I suggest to you, is the much more natural reading of what we have at page 38T H(A)76/38T.
- A. That's not correct, because the buyers requested personal guarantees from the beneficiary so we would not be able to shelter anyone in this transaction.
- Q. Well, we'll come on to a number of other documents in a moment, Mr Streshinsky, which make it plain that even after this you were aware of Mr Berezovsky's interest in Rusal. But let's stay with this letter for the time being.

You then go on in paragraph 1 to say this, I'm reading from about five lines from the end:

"... and at the time of the establishment of [Rusal Holding] they became and still are beneficiary owners of 25 per cent of shares in [Rusal Holding] who, among other things, have the right to receive all dividends payable on the above 25 per cent shares in [Rusal Holding] and the right to receive such shares, whereas [Madison] was and still is the nominal holder and trustee of such shares, and holds them for the benefit of B/BP."

A. That's correct.

Q. So your understanding at this stage was clearly that there was a trust relationship between Mr Abramovich and whom ever "B/BP" might be?

A. Yes, that was our understanding.

Q. And that was also the understanding of Salford and Leboeuufs and Mr Deripaska's representatives, wasn't it, Mr Streshinsky?

A. That was.

Q. In the documents we've just looked at, yes?

A. Yes, that was.

Q. But Mr Abramovich's representatives were not happy about the trust description and structuring the transaction in this way, do you recall that?

A. Yes -- well, I mean, not that they were unhappy. They said that this was not correct.

Q. Well, let's come on to the document. Can we turn on in the bundle to H(A)76/65.

A. Yes.

Q. You should have there an email from yourself to Ms Khudyk of Millhouse Capital, do you see that?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. We can see that this is a further email that you've sent on 17 June 2004 attaching a second version of your 17 June 2004 letter?

A. Yes.

Q. You see the attachment line "Coalco Letter 2"?

A. Yes.

Q. And we have the attachment a little earlier in the bundle, Mr Streshinsky. We have the Russian version at 51 H(A)76/51 and the English version at page 51T H(A)76/51T.

A. Yes.

Q. Can you confirm that you are the author of the Russian document that we have at page 51, Mr Streshinsky?

A. I confirm that we were drafting it together with Mr Faekov.

Q. And we can see the document starts by saying:

"As we discussed on the telephone, in order to abide by the assurance to banks that you made previously, we attach the following alternative structure ..."

A. That's correct.

Q. So it looks from this document as though you've had a telephone conversation with somebody on 17 June 2004?

A. That's right.

Q. Do you remember that telephone conversation,

Mr Streshinsky?

A. I don't clearly remember the conversation.

I remember --

Q. Do you recall whether it was Ms Panchenko that you spoke to?

A. I think it was either Panchenko or Khudyk.

Q. And in the course of preparing your evidence and coming here today, Mr Streshinsky, have you talked to anyone else about that telephone conversation?

A. No.

Q. I'm grateful.

Now, do you recall, Mr Streshinsky, being told what we can see you recorded here, that you needed to draw up an alternative transaction structure which would be consistent with the assurances or representations that Mr Abramovich's people had previously made to banks?

A. Well, I assume that -- when we sent this first letter to Ms Khudyk, they called us and they told us that we did not understand them, and that they did not have any relationship of trust. They explained to us that when opening the account of the company, like Rusal, or companies which they were holding, you have to put in the bank a certain form A, which is identification of beneficial owner, and no matter whether there's a trust behind or a physical person behind, you would have to disclose that whoever is beneficial owner would be the beneficial owner, so for the bank documentation.

So they told us that there was no trust relationship between Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich.

Q. You see, that is not reflected in what we see in the opening words of this letter, Mr Streshinsky. What is reflected is that you've had a conversation with Mr Abramovich's representatives in which they have said that it needs to be reorganised to abide by the assurances to the banks. So they are proposing a different structure which will be consistent with what has previously been said to the banks.

A. Well, they were -- Mr Abramovich's side was the only party who knew what was the real ownership structure. So they told us that there was no trust arrangement, that the shares were not held in trust for Mr Patarkatsishvili.

Q. You see, Ms Panchenko believes that it was most probably her that you spoke to on 17 June 2004, and for the record we have Ms Panchenko's evidence in relation to this at Day 27, page 8, line 14 to page 10, line 16, but I don't think we need to turn it up.

What Ms Panchenko says is that it was most probably her that called you on the 17th, and that during the conversation which she had with you, Mr Streshinsky, one of the arguments that she used was that in her capacity as financial director of Rusal she had made various statements to the outside world, including to the banks, to the effect that Mr Abramovich was the owner of the 25 per cent shareholding.

Now, do you recall a conversation with Ms Panchenko along those lines, Mr Streshinsky?

A. I don't recall it particularly but I think it's possible that she told me that. And I would like just to reiterate that even more so, that Ms Panchenko was the financial director of Rusal so she was responsible for the account opening for Rusal, and she had to declare in the forms A who was the beneficial owner of Rusal.

Q. She was also the person who, as financial director of Rusal, would have been making statements to the outside world, including banks, and she says that was one of the arguments that she used when she spoke to you as to why the transaction structure should be changed.

A. So?

Q. You don't have any clear recollection of this conversation?

A. No, I don't have a clear recollection of this conversation.

Q. There is certainly no suggestion in the letter that you had misunderstood the position. You don't say "We understand we've got it completely wrong." You don't write that, do you, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes, there was nothing in this letter like that.

Q. And do you recall Ms Panchenko telling you a further reason why the transaction should be structured differently, namely that Mr Abramovich did not want further to document the existence of Mr Berezovsky or Mr Patarkatsishvili's beneficial ownership; do you recall that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. I don't recall that but that might have been the case.

Q. It might have been the case. You see, very shortly after this, on 17 June 2004, in compliance information that you were providing to First Zurich Bank, you said that you had been told by Mr Abramovich's people that they did not want to document the existence of the beneficial ownership relationship with Mr Patarkatsishvili, do you remember that?

A. Yes.

Q. So do you think you might have been told on this occasion by Mr Abramovich's people that they didn't want to document the existence of beneficial ownership?

A. Well, that was -- our position was always, and we always thought, that Mr Patarkatsishvili was the beneficial owner of this 25 per cent during this transaction. And in the compliance memo which you referred to, we wrote that the position of Mr Abramovich was different.

- Q. And it was different because they had made it clear to you that they did not want to document the existence of Mr Patarkatsishvili's beneficial ownership; do you remember that?
- A. I do not remember whether they had made clear to me or it was -- I concluded this on the basis of all the discussions which I had, the information.
- Q. Well, we'll come on to the document in a moment, Mr Streshinsky. But sticking with the document which we have at bundle H(A)76/51T for the time being, Mr Streshinsky, if we look down to "Part A. Dividends", we can see that you have left unchanged the opening words which state:
- "BP (an individual) and B (a company with sole shareholder B) ..."
- Do you see that?
- A. Yes, it was the same typo. We just changed the first paragraph, I think, the point 1.
- Q. So you say that despite going back to this document and substantially rewriting various parts of it, you had not picked up and corrected what you say was an obvious error in this passage?
- A. I don't think we have substantially rewrote the document, we just -- I think we just rewrote the point 1 in this document.

MR MASEFIELD: My Lady, that might be a convenient moment.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, I'm going on for a few minutes.

MR MASEFIELD: I'm grateful.

If we then look further down at bullet point 1, we can see that the first four lines of this document have not changed. You still refer to BP and B participating in the sale of the shares of KrAZ, don't you?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. We can see that following your conversation with Ms Panchenko about the representations made to banks, the last five lines of paragraph 1 have changed. And what you now propose is that the parties acknowledge not the existence of any trust relationship but that:

"... in creating [Rusal Holding] [Madison] undertook to pay to BP and B sums equal to the sums received as income from the 25 per cent of shares in [Rusal Holding], including dividends from said 25 per cent of the shares, and sums/property received upon any sale of such 25 per cent of shares."

Then in parenthesis:

"(Thus, this was exclusively a liability right, rather than a trust or proprietary right -- attorney's comment.)"

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. When you refer there to an attorney's comment, whose comment was it that you were referring to, Mr Streshinsky?

A. That was explanation of Mr Faekov.

Q. That was Mr Faekov of Akin Gump who had suggested that, was it?

A. Yes.

Q. I'm grateful.

Now, you tell us that one of your responsibilities in relation to the second Rusal sale transaction was to ensure that Cliren, the party that was to be a party to this transaction, had a bank account into which the monies due from Eagle and Madison could be paid, do you remember that?

A. Yes.

Q. You tell us F1/02/81 that you liaised with both First Zurich Bank and Parex Bank, and originally you had hoped that First Zurich would hold the bank account, but that due to difficulties with First Zurich getting comfortable with the transaction you ultimately used Parex Bank, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. I would like to look with you at some of the communications that you had with Zurich Bank and its lawyers, Secretan Tryanov, around this time, Mr Streshinsky. You can put away bundle 76 but please can you be given bundle 77.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What paragraph of his witness statement are you dealing with at the moment?

MR MASEFIELD: My Lady, it's paragraph 96, which we have at F1/02, page 81 F1/02/81. Does your Ladyship have that?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, go on.

MR MASEFIELD: You can put away bundle 76, and if we turn in bundle H(A)77 to page 97, please H(A)77/97.

Do you see there an email, Mr Streshinsky, from yourself to Mr Escher dated 23 June 2004?

A. Yes.

Q. And can you confirm that Mr Escher was your contact at First Zurich Bank whom you had known for a number of years?

A. Yes.

Q. We can see that you've filled in the subject line "For Your Info", and you've attached a document called "RH Transaction History", do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. If we turn back in the bundle to page 95 H(A)77/95, do you see there the document which I think is the attachment. It's a draft document dated 23 June 2004, we see that in the top right corner; yes?

A. Yes.

Q. And it's stated to be "Highly confidential. Not to be disclosed externally"?

A. Yes.

Q. And called "Rusal Holdings Share Sale Compliance Information -- Transaction Structure and Background".

Do you have that document?

A. Yes.

Q. And you tell us that you prepared this draft memorandum and sent it to Mr Escher on 23 June 2004, is that right?

A. No, that was done by Mr Faekov.

Q. It was done by Mr Faekov?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you assist him in the drafting of it, Mr Streshinsky?

A. I don't think so but I probably read it.

Q. Where would Mr Faekov have got the information which is contained within this memorandum, apart from you, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Because of his involvement in the process.

Q. Would his involvement and instructions have come primarily from you, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. I'm grateful. The draft memorandum starts by saying:

"This note is prepared by [B corp] ('Seller') to [name of bank] ('Bank') in connection with the Seller's request to open an account for receipt of funds due to the seller in respect of:

"(i) the settlement of certain disputes with ... ('Madison') ... and

"(ii) the sale of 25 per cent of [Rusal Holding] to Eagle ...

"The contemplated transaction and the information herein are highly confidential and are provided to the Bank for compliance purposes only on the condition and understanding that the Bank will keep all the details herein strictly confidential."

Do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. Then you go on in section 1 briefly to outline the transaction structure, but then dropping down to section 2, entitled "Background", you say this:

"Ownership and Control.

"The Seller is own by [BP] ('BP') as the direct 100 per cent shareholder.

"Madison is indirectly owned and controlled by M ... Capital, the ultimate beneficial shareholder of which is R... A. A ...

"ECG is indirectly owned and controlled by Bas ...

the ultimate beneficial shareholder of which is owned and controlled by bass, the ultimate beneficial shareholder of which is O... V.D ..."

Pausing there and filling in the blanks, "BP" was a reference to Mr Patarkatsishvili?

A. That's correct.

Q. "M Capital" was meant to be a reference to Millhouse Capital?

A. "M" -- I think it --

Q. "Madison is indirectly owned and controlled by M ... Capital ..."

A. It's possible, yes. Yes.

Q. "RAA" was meant to be a reference to Mr Abramovich?

A. Yes.

Q. "Bas" was meant to be a reference to Basic Element, Mr Deripaska's group, correct?

A. Yes, I think so.

Q. And "OVD" was meant to be a reference to Mr Deripaska?

A. That's correct.

Q. Then if we turn over the page to page 96 H(A)77/96, you say this:

"2000 Purchase and Negotiations.

"Under an agreement dated 10 February 2000 between BP, RA and others (the '2000 Agreement', the original of which can be presented), BP, jointly with RA and [blank] agreed to purchase from a number of sellers shares of..."

And then you list out the KrAZ, Bratsk and Achinsk assets, do you see that?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. When you referred in the first line to BP, RA and others, Mr Streshinsky, who do you say were the others to whom you were referring?

A. Mr Shvidler.

Q. Mr Shvidler is one of the others to whom you were referring but who was the other person included within the definition of "others", Mr Streshinsky?

A. It's written here, "BP jointly with RA" and in brackets --

Q. In the line above, Mr Streshinsky, it says "BP, RA and others" in the plural.

A. It doesn't say others, it's a bracket with --

Q. No, if you look at the line above, Mr Streshinsky:

"Under an agreement dated 10 February between BP, RA and others ..."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. So who were the others that you were referring to? You've named Mr Streshinsky. Who was the other person?

A. That was Mr Shvidler.

- Q. And who was the other person?
- A. There was no other person.
- Q. Let me ask you this, Mr Streshinsky, why was there any sensitivity about naming Mr Shvidler in this highly confidential memorandum? Can you explain that to the court?
- A. Because Mr Shvidler was not mentioned in this. So the way I think this draft was done is that Mr Faekov was -- drafted the paper, and I removed the names, so -- and since Mr Shvidler was never mentioned previously in this paper so I just crossed him out because he was not defined as a person.
- Q. You see, you were prepared to indicate, at least by way of their initials, that Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich had been involved as purchasers.
- A. Yes, I knew that Mr Patarkatsishvili, Abramovich and Shvidler were involved in the purchase.
- Q. And we also know from other documents that we're coming on to that you in fact sent the 10 February 2000 master agreement to Mr Escher at First Zurich Bank, and the 10 February master agreement expressly identifies Mr Patarkatsishvili, Mr Abramovich and Mr Shvidler as the purchasers of the KrAZ assets?
- A. Yes.
- Q. So that suggests the fact that there was in fact no real sensitivity about identifying Mr Shvidler as one of the purchasers?

A. Well, I mean, there was no real sensitivity about (inaudible). It was just for convenience sake, I put his name away I think.

Q. I agree with you there wasn't sensitivity about naming Shvidler as one of the purchasers. You see, what I suggest to you is that one of the other purchasers whom you had in mind, and in relation to whom there was real sensitivity, was Mr Berezovsky and indeed that's plain from documents that we'll come to in a moment, but you deny that, do you?

A. I disagree with you.

Q. You disagree with me?

A. Yes.

MR MASEFIELD: My Lady, do you want to pause there or shall we go on?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, I'm going on. I will decide when I am going to pause, Mr Masefield.

MR MASEFIELD: I am grateful.

Then you go on to say that at the time of the 2000 acquisition, the aluminium assets were transferred to Mr Abramovich and his companies on the understanding that a prorata portion was being held for the benefit of Mr Patarkatsishvili, the legal form of the shareholding to be agreed. Do you see that?

It's the second paragraph down H(A)77/96:

"... they were transferred to RA and his companies, on the understanding that a pro-rata portion is being held for the benefit [of Mr Patarkatsishvili], the legal form of the holding to be agreed."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Then you say:

"In March 2000 [Mr Abramovich] has agreed with [Mr Deripaska] to form [Rusal] ..."

And Madison subsequently became a 50 per cent shareholder of Rusal Holding. Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Then we see that you say this:

"At the same time, BP, Madison and RA negotiated as to the exact portion of the shares due to BP and as to BP's legal rights to such shares. The position of BP is that BP, being one of the purchasers, is the beneficial owner of 25% of shares of the Producer Shares (and/or of the respective portion of RH), whereas the position of RA was unclear: RA admitted that BP does have some sort of rights or entitlement in relation to the purchase of the Producer Shares (for example, on more than one occasion RA and his companies paid over to BP a pro-rata portion of dividends on the Producer Shares), but at the same time did not want to document BP's beneficial ownership."

Do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. That last comment, that Mr Abramovich's representatives did not want to document BP's beneficial ownership, was that something that you'd been told by Ms Panchenko in her conversation on 17 June, Mr Streshinsky?

A. I do not remember precisely what was told. That was my understanding of the situation. I thought that Mr Patarkatsishvili, by virtue of participating in the 10 February agreement, 10 February 2000 agreement, was beneficial owner of certain portion of shares of Rusal, but I didn't have any exact information.

Q. Well, I think you've said earlier that your recollection of that 17 June conversation isn't perfect.

A. Isn't perfect.

Q. It isn't perfect?

A. No.

Q. And we've now had disclosure, just ten days ago, of some further documents from Mr Abramovich which shows that on 16 June, so the day before your conversation with Ms Panchenko, there were internal discussions in which Ms Panchenko was told there should be no warranties about beneficial ownership because Mr Tenenbaum did not want to further document BB's beneficial ownership.

I don't think we need to turn that up but the reference for the record is H(I) tab 4, page 17 H(I)/04/17. What I suggest to you happened -- and see if this jogs your memory, Mr Streshinsky -- was that in the telephone conversation with Ms Panchenko on 17 June 2004, she explained to you that they did not want to further document BB's beneficial ownership and that is what we therefore see reflected here in your compliance information to the Zurich bank. Is that possible?

A. That's possible.

Q. You go on in your memorandum to say this, I'm looking down towards the bottom of the page H(A)77/96, just before numbers (i) and (ii):

"In 2003-2004, the parties reached agreement (to be recorded in the Deed of Settlement), that as settlement for BP's participation in the acquisition of the Producer Shares, Madison will:

"(i) pay to the Seller a cash consideration (being accumulated dividends not yet paid over to BP); and

"(ii) transfer to the Seller 25% of the shares of RH (certain waivers of pre-emptive rights will be obtained by Madison in order to effect this).

"Since BP is unwilling to remain a minority shareholder of RH, he has simultaneously agreed with ECG (a majority shareholder of RH) that after he acquires the RH Shares, he will sell them to ECG, and the benefit of warranties of title to the RH Shares will flow from Madison directly to ECG. The purchase price is $ [blank]."

You subsequently filled in some of these blanks with your friend Mr Escher of First Zurich Bank over the telephone, didn't you, Mr Streshinsky?

A. I don't remember that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Are you going to go to another document?

MR MASEFIELD: We are, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, I'll take the break now.

MR MASEFIELD: I'm grateful.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Ten minutes.

You're not to talk to anybody about your evidence, please.

THE WITNESS: Okay, thank you.

(11.45 am)

(A short break)

(11.57 am)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Masefield.

MR MASEFIELD: Mr Streshinsky, First Zurich Bank had to conduct their own money-laundering checks and due diligence, and to that end Mr Escher engaged the professional services of a well-known and highly respected Swiss firm of avocats called Secretan Tryanov.

Do you remember that?

A. I didn't know about the involvement until I get the memo from this Secretan Tryanov.

Q. You got the memo from Secretan Tryanov around 24 June 2004?

A. Yes.

Q. We have Secretan Troyanov's advice, the memo that you're referring to, at page 75 in the bundle H(A)77/75.

A. 75, yes?

Q. Yes, please, if you could turn that up. We have for the record Mr Escher sending this document to you under a covering email on 24 June which is at page 133 but I don't think we need to turn that up.

A. Yes.

Q. Looking at page 75, we can see that the report is dated 23 June 2004 and is entitled "Re: Anti-Money Laundering Due Diligence" do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. It's addressed to Mr Escher of First Zurich Bank.

If we glance on to page 82 H(A)77/82, we can see that it's been compiled by Mr Eric W Fiechter who is one of the managing partners and the counsel at Secretan Troyanov. Do you see his signature on page 82?

A. Yes.

Q. Then turning back to page 75 H(A)77/75, we can see that Mr Fiechter says that on 17 June 2004, this is the first paragraph, he was requested by Mr Escher to review the possibility of First Zurich Bank opening a bank account, the beneficial owner of the funds to be deposited on the account being Mr Patarkatsishvili. Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Mr Fiechter says:

"You provided us with a brief description of the involved persons/background and of the transaction which would generate the funds that would be wired on to the account that the Bank may accept to open."

Do you see that?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. So it's clear from that, is it not, Mr Streshinsky, that Mr Escher and Mr Fiechter have been in communication with each other and Mr Escher has provided Mr Fiechter with a brief description of the people involved, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. And I suggest that Mr Escher's brief description which he supplied to Mr Fiechter came from the conversations that Mr Escher had previously had with you filling in the blanks on your compliance information memorandum.

That's right, isn't it?

A. That was one of the documents which I provided to Mr Escher.

Q. And the document which we saw you had provided included a number of blanks and you filled in those blanks with Mr Escher?

A. Well, can we go back to this document?

Q. We can. The document is page --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Where is the page where the blanks are filled in?

MR MASEFIELD: Page 95 H(A)77/95.

We don't have the blanks filled in in manuscript, my Lady. What I'm suggesting to the witness is that he explained to Mr Escher who the various parties involved were.

Because if we look at page 95, the compliance document you had prepared, that refers to people -- do you have page 95?

A. Yes.

Q. That refers to the people at the bottom of the page by way of initial only so there's reference to "BP", "RAA", "OVD". We've looked at that.

A. As you can see, this paper was provided when Mr Fiechter's memorandum was already done.

Q. I'm not sure that's right, Mr Streshinsky, because --

A. Well, it says "draft 23 June" --

Q. It does.

A. -- and the opinion of Secretan Troyanov was June 23.

Q. Yes, and if you look over the page in Mr Fiechter's opinion to page 76 H(A)77/76, do you see he's referring to a second batch of documents?

A. Okay, yes.

Q. If you look down at the last bullet point, we see:

"Rusal Holdings Share Sale -- Compliance
Information -- Transaction Structure ...
(draft June 23...)."

So Mr Fiechter has seen --

A. Okay, so he included it.

Q. It has been included.

A. Yes, okay.

Q. What I'm suggesting to you, Mr Streshinsky, is that you filled in the blanks to Mr Escher over the telephone and Mr Escher then provided a brief description of the persons involved to Mr Fiechter, and that is what Mr Fiechter is referring to in the second paragraph on page 75 H(A)77/75. Do you think that is possible?

A. Second paragraph, it's "You provided us with a brief description...", yes. Well, it's possible that I have filled the blanks for Mr Escher and he has provided that to Mr Fiechter.

Q. I'm grateful for that. In fact we'll come on to some email exchanges in a moment, Mr Streshinsky, which make it in fact perfectly plain that that is what happened, but let's stay with this memorandum for the moment. If we look further down this page, we can see that a list of documents has been provided to First Zurich including Mr Mishakov's diagram of the transaction and Mr Hauser's memorandum. Those are the first two bullet points in the first batch. Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. If we turn over the page to page 76 H(A)77/76, we can see that Secretan Troyanov have been also supplied with the second batch of documents including the contract dated 10 February 2000 and your compliance information. Do you see those documents?

A. Yes.

Q. Then in item 2, the heading "Results of our own factual research", we can see that Secretan Troyanov have commissioned their own factual research from a confidential source which they've attached as annex 1 to their opinion. Do you see that heading?

A. Yes.

Q. We have annex 1 to this report at pages 83 to 94 of the bundle H(A)77/83.

A. Yes.

Q. We can see that First Zurich Bank have commissioned due diligence researches in relation to both Mr Patarkatsishvili, that's pages 84 to 92 H(A)77/84, and also in relation to Mr Berezovsky which we have at pages 93 to 94 H(A)77/93.

A. Yes.

Q. Do you see that?

Then turning back to the body of Mr Fiechter's opinion on page 76 where we were at H(A)77/76, we can see that in section 3 of his advice, Mr Fiechter has set out the general regulatory framework concerning Switzerland's effort to combat money-laundering. Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. And the legal analysis then runs through until page 80 of the bundle and we can then pick it up on page 80, page 6 in the internal numbering H(A)77/80.

A. Which page?

Q. Page 80 of the bundle, 77/80.

A. Yes.

Q. And there's a section 5 headed "Analysis". Do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. We can see that Mr Fiechter says that:

"The first step of the analysis is to determine if you [by which he means Mr Escher of First Zurich Bank] may enter into business relations with Mr Patarkatsishvili."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Then dropping down to the next paragraph, we can see that Mr Fiechter says:

"Based on the Annex 1 it would appear that the accusations directed against Mr Patarkatsishvili originate from Russia, and that they could be politically motivated. Based on this report it would also appear that Mr Patarkatsishvili would typically enter into the definition of the 'oligarch'.

"The initial phases of Mr Patarkatsishvili successful business career may raise uncomfortable questions. This however does not yet mean that Mr Patarkatsishvili was is linked to organised crime as defined by Swiss law. Under the Section entitled 'Alleged links to organised crime' of Annex 1 (points 2.12 and following) it would appear that certain allegations have been made concerning Mr Patarkatsishvili's links to organised criminal activities. It must be however noted that these allegations either come from Russia (whose bias against Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili is recognised by the Federal Research Division, Library of Congress) or are not documented.

"Another element that would tend to dismiss the allegation of links to criminal organisations is the fact that based on Annex 1, we are not aware of any freezing orders of Mr Patarkatsishvili's assets.

"It would appear based on our preliminary factual research, that you may wish to complete by interrogating alternative sources, that it is unlikely that Mr Patarkatsishvili is linked to criminal organisation within the meaning of [Article] 260 ... of the Swiss Criminal Code.

"Based on the foregoing, we do not believe that the general ban on certain clients would apply to Mr Patarkatsishvili."

Do you see all that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. Then we can see that Mr Fiechter goes on to say that the second step is to determine the degree of risk applicable to the transaction, and Mr Fiechter, as we can see, concludes that the risk should be considered as high. Do you see that, the last paragraph on the page?

A. Yes.

Q. Then over the page H(A)77/81, we can see that

Mr Fiechter says that:

"The third and final step, which is ... as important as the previous steps ... is to conduct the enhanced transaction due diligence..."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Mr Fiechter then proceeds to analyse the transaction from what he calls a "helicopter view basis" to see whether the entire picture passes the plausibility test. Do you see that in the second paragraph?

A. Yes.

Q. Mr Fiechter also says that the entire transaction should be x-rayed. He then says:

"It must be pointed out that it seems that Mr Patarkatsishvili has been extremely helpful in providing complete available documentation. These transparency efforts are a factor when conducting a due diligence."

Do you see that passage?

A. Yes.

Q. Mr Fiechter then proceeds to analyse the various contractual documents with which he's been provided and we can see that Mr Fiechter starts by analysing the 2000 agreement and noting that party 1 of the agreement was said to comprise Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler and Mr Patarkatsishvili, and he notes the 550 million sale price. Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Mr Fiechter then turns on to consider the compliance information which you've provided and notes that Mr Patarkatsishvili participated in the purchase of the shares but that the agreement did not clearly define how the shares were to be allocated as between the purchasers.

Mr Fiechter says that:

"As a result none of the ... Shares were fully transferred to Mr Patarkatsishvili but were held by Mr ... Abramovich and his companies, on the understanding that a pro-rata portion is being held for the benefit of Mr Patarkatsishvili."

Do you see that?

A. Yes, I see it.

Q. Then Mr Fiechter notes that:

"In March 2000, Mr Abramovich... agreed with Mr... Deripaska to form Rusal..."

And that the producer shares were reorganised and consolidated into Rusal.

Mr Fiechter notes that they don't have any documentary evidence of that Rusal merger and the restructuring of the shareholding.

A. Mm-hm.

Q. Then he says:

"It also appears that Mr Abramovich and Mr Patarkatsishvili have now agreed to settle the question of the ownership of the shares by transferring the shares representing 25% of Rusal Holdings.

"Based on the explanations provided to us this would mean that Mr Patarkatsishvili was entitled to half (50%) of Mr Abramovich's share in Rusal Holdings and therefore also half of the value of the 'Producer Shares'.

"This, in turn, would value Mr Patarkatsishvili initial contribution to the acquisition of the Producer Shares at 50% of the acquisition price, or USD 275,000,000 (50% of 550,000,000)."

Then turning over the page to page 8 of the internal numbering, page 82 of the bundle H(A)77/82, we can see Mr Fiechter says this:

"Upon receipt of the shares representing 25% of [Rusal Holding], Mr Patarkatsishvili intends to sell such shares to [Eagle Capital] for a consideration of USD 467,000,000.

"It must finally be noted that half of Mr Patarkatsishvili stake is held on a fiduciary basis in favour of Mr Berezovsky. The fiduciary agreement is apparently not documented.

"Based on the foregoing Mr Patarkatsishvili's personal initial investment would therefore be USD 137,500,000 ... [and he does the maths] and his capital gain USD 104,000,000 ... [and again he does the maths]."

Do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. I see that.

Q. So what Mr Fiechter is saying on page 8 of his opinion is that First Zurich Bank should only accept about half of the Rusal sale proceeds by way of Mr Patarkatsishvili's personal initial investment because the other half, he understands, belongs to Mr Berezovsky. That's what he's saying here, isn't it, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Apparently so.

Q. Let me ask you this, did you provide Mr Escher with the information that we see on the second paragraph of this page, namely that it must finally be noted that half of Mr Patarkatsishvili's stake is held on a fiduciary basis in favour of Mr Berezovsky?

A. No. All I have provided Mr Escher with is the batch of the documents which is listed here. It was the first batch and the second batch. So first batch included the memorandum of Paul Hauser and the original transaction documents which included parties B1, B2, and then the second batch as well.

Q. So you never had a conversation, you say, with Mr Escher in which you explained that half of the funds were going to flow through to Mr Berezovsky?

A. I don't remember that.

Q. Well, we'll come on to the documents in a moment, Mr Streshinsky. You see the information that is referred to in Mr Fiechter's advice is not contained in either of the annexes which is attached to his advice. We've been through it very carefully and there's no mention of that information there.

A. Excuse me?

Q. The information that we see in the second paragraph of page 8 relating to Mr Berezovsky and the fiduciary arrangement in his favour is not contained in either of the annexes that were attached to Mr Fiechter's advice, the confidential information that Mr Fiechter had commissioned.

A. Well, you know, I did not know Mr Fiechter, I did not know that Mr Escher would talk to Mr Fiechter, and I didn't know what information Mr Escher gave to Mr Fiechter.

Q. Well, we'll see what you did say to Mr Escher and what he passed on to Mr Fiechter in a moment.

Can you turn on, please, within bundle H(A)77 to page 201 H(A)77/201. We can see here a string of three emails passing between yourself and Mr Escher of First Zurich Bank on 24 and 25 June 2004. I'd like to pick it up with the email which is first in time, which we have at the bottom of page 202 H(A)77/202. If you turn to that, do you see an email towards the bottom of the page which was sent by Mr Escher to you on 24 June 2004?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. We can see Mr Escher writes:

"Dear Ivan, I am very glad to be approached with your transactions and I am ready to also make the appropriate investment i.e.hiring the best lawyer(s) in order to properly structure the transactions within the frame of our rules and regulations. I am also bound to create innovative solutions on this basis.

"It is on the other hand also important that we know the true story from the very beginning in order to be efficient. The lawyers should not get suspicious, we need them on our side. I think there is still a chance to fix the transaction but please be prepared to put everything on the table when we meet on Tuesday at 9 am in our offices."

A. Mm-hm.

Q. Can I ask you this, Mr Streshinsky, why was it that the lawyers were getting suspicious? Do you remember that?

A. I did not know about the involvement of the lawyers until I get the memorandum.

Q. Well, you got the memorandum we've seen on 24 June 2004.

A. Yes.

Q. What Mr Escher is telling you here is that the lawyers are getting suspicious. Do you recall why the lawyers were getting suspicious, Mr Streshinsky?

A. No.

Q. Was it because you were now telling them, contrary to what they had been told previously, that Mr Berezovsky in fact had no interest in this transaction?

A. Well, maybe it was because they received first batch of documents with two beneficiaries, then the second batch of documents with the one beneficiary.

Q. Let's follow this email chain through a little further, Mr Streshinsky. If we turn back to page 201 H(A)77/201, we can see that you wrote back to Mr Escher the same day saying that you had been very open from the beginning and that you had told Mr Escher the whole story and sent him all the documents you had available. Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. So you had spoken to Mr Escher and you had told him the whole story, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. Then if we go over the page to the top of page 202 we can see you say this:

"You on the other hand have confirmed to me that the transaction can be effected by the Bank for the full amount, including the flow-through funds after I have specifically explained you the consequences for me of the unjustified answer."

Now, just pausing there, Mr Streshinsky, the problem that you mention here arises out of the point which we've just seen Mr Fiechter was making on page 8 of his opinion, namely that Mr Fiechter had said, given the fiduciary arrangement with Mr Berezovsky, Mr Patarkatsishvili's initial investment could only be for about half the Rusal sale proceeds. Do you remember that point, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes, I remember that point from the -- yes.

Q. We have it back on page 82 of the bundle.

A. Yes.

Q. What you are referring to in your email which we have at page 202 H(A)77/202 is the fact that you had understood that First Zurich Bank could receive the full amount including the flow-through funds, and by flow-through funds you meant the 50 per cent of the Rusal proceeds that you understood would then flow through Mr Patarkatsishvili's account to Mr Berezovsky.

A. I didn't understand that. I think that I was making reference to the full amount, so which -- and part of this amount Mr Fiechter called as flow-through funds.

Q. Can you please explain to the court what the flow-through funds were, Mr Streshinsky, that you were referring to in this email?

A. Mr Fiechter referred to the flow-through funds probably as the funds which have to be transferred by -- from Mr Patarkatsishvili to somebody else, so -- and I --

Q. I don't think Mr Fiechter --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Let him finish his answer, please.

MR MASEFIELD: Sorry.

A. So I was insisting that the -- that we need to talk about the ability to hold the full amount on the account of Mr Patarkatsishvili.

Q. If we turn back to page 82 in the bundle, Mr Streshinsky H(A)77/82.

A. Yes, I am on page 82.

Q. Mr Fiechter doesn't in fact refer to the flow-through funds at all. What he talks about is the fact that:

"Mr Patarkatsishvili's personal initial investment would therefore be ..."

And then he does two sums which broadly add up to about half of the Rusal sale proceeds. The reference to the flow-through funds comes for the first time in your email that we have at page 202.

A. Well, we must have discussed with Mr Escher about this and I told him that the full amount should be on the account of Mr Patarkatsishvili.

Q. And what did you tell Mr Escher about the flow-through funds, Mr Streshinsky?

A. I -- actually I told to Mr Escher that Mr Patarkatsishvili is the beneficiary and he is to receive full amount. So this approach which Mr Fiechter was using was incorrect.

Q. You say at the top of page 202 H(A)77/202 that you had understood from Mr Escher that the transaction could be effected by the bank for the full amount including the flow-through funds. For the last time, what were the flow-through funds that you were referring to, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Look, I -- that happened a long time ago so I assume that Mr Escher and I discussed this approach, that part of the amount should be -- should stay on the account and part of the amount should go to Mr Berezovsky as alleged here in the -- Fiechter's memo. I told Mr Escher that this flow-through fund should not be a flow-through fund, it should be a full amount set on the account of Mr Patarkatsishvili.

- Q. So you are saying that you believed that you had a conversation with Mr Escher, you discussed the approach, and that part of the money should go to Mr Berezovsky, as alleged here in Mr Fiechter's memo?
- A. Well, I disagreed with that. That's why I was so unhappy with Mr Escher and Mr Fiechter.
- Q. What you are referring to in the email which you've just looked at is the fact that you had understood that First Zurich Bank could receive the full amount, including the flow-through funds, and your understanding was, as you just confirmed, that 50 per cent would flow through from Mr Patarkatsishvili's account to Mr Berezovsky?
- A. No, that was not my understanding, sorry.
- Q. Whose understanding about flow-through do you say that was?
- A. That was the understanding of Mr Fiechter, that 50 per cent of the amount which would go on the account would be for the benefit of Mr Berezovsky.
- Q. You don't correct that. What you say is -- do you say that's a misunderstanding, Mr Streshinsky?
- A. That was a misunderstanding by Mr Fiechter.
- Q. Well, you don't try and correct that, do you, at page 202? You're not saying he's got the wrong end of the picture, there are no flow-through funds. On the contrary, what you are saying at the top of page 202 is that the transaction can be effected for the full amount including the flow-through funds?

A. Well, that probably must have been the term which we used when we have discussed it with Mr Escher, because he was under the impression that there is a flow-through fund.

Q. Let's look to see what happens next. You go on to say in your email H(A)77/202:

"On this basis I have confirmed to Mr A that the transaction can be done. He has confirmed it to B and started active negotiations with RA and OD. As you can imagine these gentlemen are not the least influential people in Russia."

Do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. The reference to Mr A was a reference to Mr Anisimov, wasn't it, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. And the reference to RA was a reference to Mr Abramovich, wasn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. The reference to OD was a reference to Mr Deripaska?

A. Yes.

Q. And it is Mr Abramovich and Mr Deripaska whom you are describing as "not the least influential people in Russia", yes?

A. Yes.

Q. You then go on to say:

"So now I am personally in a disastrous situation as a person who has given untrue information. Do you think I can explain to these most powerful people about the capital gains or that signed by them agreements are not a proof of legitimacy of the transaction?"

Now, what consequences were there that you feared might follow, Mr Streshinsky, if you acted in a way which displeased these powerful people, Mr Abramovich and Mr Deripaska? What was the purpose of --

A. Well, that was a way to push Mr Escher to actually approve the transaction. I had no responsibility towards Mr A, Mr Abramovich, or Mr Deripaska. Mr Abramovich or Mr Deripaska.

Q. So the personally disastrous situation that you were contemplating here, you say that was just padding in your email?

A. It was exaggeration.

Q. Looking back at your email, we can see that you go on to say this:

"Cyrill, I do not like allegation that the transaction fails because I have not disclosed to you all the information -- I have put everything [on] the table and explained everything to the lawyer when I had chance to."

So it appears that you had spoken to Mr Fiechter as well?

A. That's possible, yes.

Q. "I have told you that we have no influence over these people and we do not know what documents they will give."

And you had put everything on the table with Mr Escher and Mr Fiechter, hadn't you, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Well everything that was related to the transaction, yes.

Q. And as part of putting everything on the table with Mr Escher, you had told him about the fact that Mr Berezovsky also had a 50 per cent interest in the Rusal proceeds?

A. No.

Q. Well, let's come back to that in a moment.

A. I might have told him initially when I sent the first batch that Mr Berezovsky was involved, because the first batch of documents included Mr Berezovsky as B1 or B2.

Q. So you think you might have told Mr Fiechter then that Mr Berezovsky was involved?

A. Then, yes, I might have told him, yes.

- Q. And on 24 June when you sent this email, you appear still to be saying that the funds would flow through from Mr Patarkatsishvili's account to someone else, you're not correcting that impression, are you?
- A. Well, I thought it was enough to send a full description of the deal and, you know, all the documents which we had at the time.
- Q. Let's come on to the next email in a moment, but just finishing this email off, you say:
- "So I think it is your turn to be consistent and put everything in front of me: is this transaction approved or not?"
- "I am ready to meet any time, but I just don't see how with this approach of the lawyer and given situation we can satisfy his requests.
- "Please give me the answer in writing."
- A. Yes, I must comment that the approach which lawyer has taken was the initial -- you know, initial investment and split of proceeds I thought was totally irrelevant in that case.
- Q. Well, if we turn back to page 201 H(A)77/201, we can see the response that you get back later the same day from Mr Escher.
- A. Yes.
- Q. He writes to you and he says:

"Dear Ivan, in Fiechter's analysis ([page number] 8) it is clearly stated which part of the amount can be held with us."

Do you see that?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. That is clearly a reference to internal page 8 of Mr Fiechter's analysis which we have back on page 82 H(A)77/82, isn't it, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. It's the reference to Mr Fiechter advising that Mr Patarkatsishvili's initial investment could only be for 50 per cent of the funds received, yes?

A. Well not only 50 per cent but the capital gain.

Q. Yes. And then looking back at the --

A. It's much less than 50 per cent.

Q. Well, when you add the capital gain and the initial investment together, it comes to about 50 per cent of the Rusal proceeds.

But looking back at the email which we have at page 201 H(A)77/201, Mr Streshinsky, we can see that Mr Escher says immediately afterwards:

"I have given the same explanations to Fiechter as I have received from you. As far as the flow through is concerned Fiechter was not absolutely saying that we should not handle it but that it was rather better to settle it outside the bank."

A. Where is it?

Q. It's in the email from Mr Escher to yourself, the second sentence.

A. "I suggest we are sitting together ..."

Yes?

Q. No, I'm in the first paragraph still. He refers firstly to Mr Fiechter's analysis, page 8, and then he says:

"I have given the same explanations to Fiechter as I have received from you."

And he goes on to talk about the flow-through funds.

So what Mr Escher is saying here, Mr Streshinsky, in black and white, is that he has given the same explanations to Mr Fiechter as he received from you.

Correct?

A. Mm-hm. Oh, he's saying that, yes.

Q. And the explanations he's referring to are the explanations that we see on page 8 of Mr Fiechter's analysis H(A)77/82, namely the explanation in the second paragraph that half of Mr Patarkatsishvili's stake is held on a fiduciary basis in favour of Mr Berezovsky?

A. Yes.

Q. And you had provided that explanation to Mr Escher, and what he is saying in his email is he has provided that same explanation to Mr Fiechter.

A. Well, that's Mr Escher saying what he provided to Mr Fiechter, Escher saying what he provided to Mr Fiechter. I don't know what he provided to Mr Fiechter.

Q. You don't? But what he is saying, we can all see it, is that the explanation came from you. Do you dispute that?

A. Yes, he is saying that.

Q. Do you dispute that?

A. I don't dispute that.

Q. You don't. So you did provide the explanation to Mr Fiechter that there was a fiduciary relationship with Mr Berezovsky and that half of the funds would flow through?

A. No, I did not provide this explanation. I might have initially provided this explanation when the full set of documents included B1 and B2, but not at the stage where, you know, where I knew exactly how the deal was structured.

Q. Well, you provided the information to Mr Fiechter and Mr Escher after the conversation you're referring to because the information that you provided was on 23 June 2004, whereas the conversation with Mr Abramovich's representatives was on 17 June 2004.

A. Yes.

Q. You see, Mr Streshinsky, what you were saying to -- what you had said to Mr Escher and what you had said to Mr Fiechter was that there was a fiduciary relationship with Mr Berezovsky and that only half of the funds could flow -- sorry, that the full amount should be paid into Mr Patarkatsishvili's account but then half would be paid on to Mr Berezovsky, and that's what you had told them, yes?

A. Well, that is possible, yes. That is possible.

Q. Well it's not possible; it's what these documents strongly suggest.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, that's a matter for me, isn't it?

MR MASEFIELD: It is, my Lady.

What we certainly don't see in these documents is your ever correcting that information, saying there was no flow-through funds?

A. Well, I think it's important to understand that I was, ever since 3 June when I saw the articles, and when we started to discuss this transaction, I thought that it might be possible that Mr Berezovsky is either a beneficiary or behind Mr Patarkatsishvili, and I --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Did you discuss that concern with Escher?

A. I might have discussed it. I don't remember it.

I might have discussed it, but that's likely, that I discussed it.

I did not know the complete truth until I spoke to Mr Patarkatsishvili himself.

MR MASEFIELD: I'll come on to your conversation with Mr Patarkatsishvili in a moment, Mr Streshinsky, but as at 25 June when you are communicating with Mr Escher in this email string, it's quite clear that your understanding was that 50 per cent of the funds would flow through to Mr Berezovsky. Do you accept that?

A. That's possible.

Q. And you were now, as you put it, in a personally disastrous situation where you had told Mr Anisimov and others that the First Zurich Bank would accept the entire Rusal sale proceeds, but now, because of the concerns that Mr Fiechter had raised about the funds flowing through to Mr Berezovsky, it looked as if the Zurich Bank would only receive half of the Rusal sale proceeds, correct?

A. No, I said that, you know, I was concerned that Mr -- so we did not have an account for Mr Patarkatsishvili to receive money in, so it was important for me to have an account. So when I referred to a personally disastrous situation, I said that I promised that we will open an account for Mr Patarkatsishvili in First Zurich Bank, and now it turns out that that's a problem.

Q. And what happened next, Mr Streshinsky, is that you tried to go through the whole story again but this time you air-brushed Mr Berezovsky completely out of the picture in the hope that the First Zurich Bank could be persuaded to accept the entire Rusal proceeds, do you remember that?

A. Well, I think we need to take it in connection with the negotiations we had with Mr -- with Rusal people and Abramovich people about the documents.

Q. You'd had that meeting with the Abramovich people back on 17 June 2004, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And this correspondence is 25 June 2004?

A. That's right. Well, there were some drafts circling around so we need to look at that.

Q. Let's come on to see the compliance information that you then provided to the First Zurich Bank.

Can you turn on in the bundle to page 178.

A. That was -- okay.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can we put this page away now or are you coming back to it?

MR MASEFIELD: We can, my Lady, the string of emails, unless your Lady had further questions.

A. 178?

Q. 178 H(A)77/178. You should see there an email that you sent to Mr Escher later on 25 June, and it says:

"Dear Cyrill.

"Pls find attached statement of facts and our analysis re the transaction.

Pls decide whether you want to send this to the lawyer."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. And we have the revised version of compliance information at page 204 in the bundle, if you want to turn that up (H(A)77/204.

A. Page 204.

Q. Do you there a document headed "RH Share Transaction -- Summary of Background and Compliance Position 025 June 2004"?

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. In the first paragraph, we can see that you say this:

"In connection with our recent discussions, we would like to attempt to explain the background to the transaction and our position regarding compliance in more detail."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. And then in section 1, you purport to set out the factual background, and you say this, in the third paragraph down:

"Then, at a meeting between BP and Vasiliy Anisimov, BP suggested that shareholders of Sibneft could also be potential buyers, and that the sellers should also open discussions and seek offers from them."

A. Yes.

Q. "Negotiations were commenced and were conducted with the active support and intermediation of BP. As a result, the shareholders of Sibneft were able to make a better offer than SUAL, and the sellers decided to sell to the shareholders of Sibneft. The shareholders of KrAZ have decided that, together with this sale, it would also make business sense to sell their shares of ... Bratsk...

"As a result, on 10 February 2000, the parties signed an Agreement (original available) by which the shareholders of Sibneft -- RAA, BP and ESh, agreed to purchase shares of the aforementioned companies at a price specified in that agreement."

Do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. So whereas in your first compliance information sheet which we have at pages 95 and 96, you had said that the KrAZ assets were acquired by BP, RA and others, you have now identified only one such other, namely Eugene Shvidler, and you have omitted to mention anybody else.

A. Yes.

Q. Do you have any explanation for that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Because there were no one else -- there was no one else.

Q. And you say that despite what we see had been said about the flow-through funds and the fiduciary arrangement with Mr Berezovsky?

A. Well, look, I think that the personal relationship between Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky had nothing to do with the acquisition of Sibneft -- sorry, acquisition of Krasnoyarsk assets. So that would mean that even if Mr Berezovsky had an agreement with Mr Patarkatsishvili that they share the profit from certain ventures, you know, he was -- doesn't mean that he was the purchaser.

Q. You say the personal relationship between Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky; were you aware of a personal relationship between Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky relating to the aluminium assets?

A. It was publicly available information that they were friends.

Q. Friends or partners?

A. And partners in some ventures.

Q. And partners, I'm grateful.

You say you were aware of that, were you?

MR MALEK: Let him finish his answer, it's overtalking the whole time.

MR MASEFIELD: Sorry, Mr Malek.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Do you want to add anything else to your answer?

A. I mean, I was aware from the public sources that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were associated persons, so they dealt with each other, they were friends, as far as I was aware.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And what, were involved together in certain business ventures? Were you aware of that?

A. Yes, I knew that, for example, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were the shareholders of ORT, and Mr Patarkatsishvili was the -- held executive position in the television. I was also aware of their relationship in Logovaz, I knew that they were partners, or I heard that they were partners.

MR MASEFIELD: We'll come on to some documents related to that in a moment, Mr Streshinsky. But you're also aware, I think it follows from your previous answer, that they were partners in relation to the aluminium assets as well?

A. I was not aware of that. I suspected that, that Mr Berezovsky might have been behind Mr Patarkatsishvili.

Q. You say you suspected it, but we'll come on to some documents that demonstrate that you were in fact aware of it.

Now, the others that you had previously referred to you've now identified as just Mr Shvidler. Let me ask you once again, why was there so much sensitivity in revealing Mr Shvidler's identity?

A. There was no sensitivity.

Q. You see, it makes no sense, Mr Streshinsky, that there had been concerns about naming Mr Shvidler in your earlier memorandum. What would make sense, however, would be a reluctance on your part to name Mr Berezovsky as one of the purchasers, particularly when you had been told by Mr Abramovich's representatives that they did not want to do anything to further document Mr Berezovsky's beneficial interest. That's right, isn't it?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, there are a lot of questions there. Can you just put one question at a time, Mr Masefield.

MR MASEFIELD: My Lady, it's more by way of a proposition actually than a question so why don't I move on to --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, you're here to cross-examine, not to put propositions. Can you put the question in a simple form so that he can answer it, please.

MR MASEFIELD: The reason why you were reluctant, Mr Streshinsky, to name the others in the earlier compliance document was because the others that you had in mind included Mr Berezovsky?

A. I disagree with that. I had -- I've seen the agreement of 10 February, there were only three names in this agreement: Abramovich, Patarkatsishvili and Shvidler.

Q. I don't think we need to work our way through the entirety of this further memorandum that you produced, but we can pick it up on page 205, Mr Streshinsky, in the third paragraph H(A)77/205. We can see you say this:

"Since BP was subject to political persecution, the parties could not document this deal at an earlier date, whereas RA's wish remains to fully and finally settle his relationship with BP and not to continue having a joint business, so as not to create political risks in RA's Russian business dealings. This is also a factor causing the difficulties of obtaining documents from RA's companies, since these documents partly do not exist, and partly are held by RA and his companies who are refusing to provide copies."

- A. Mm-hm.
- Q. Now, where had that information come from, Mr Streshinsky?
- A. Well, I mean, this was very close group, they didn't disclose any documents unless they had to.
- Q. Who was it that had explained to you that the reason why Mr Abramovich was reluctant to document his relationship with Mr Patarkatsishvili was due to Mr Patarkatsishvili's political persecution?
- A. That was my assumption at the time.
- Q. So that hadn't been explained to you, it was just an assumption?
- A. Yes.
- Q. But you felt it appropriate to put that assumption into compliance information, did you?
- A. Yes -- well, because that was based on the factual information around Mr Patarkatsishvili's status --
- Q. Are you sure --
- A. That was the case.
- Q. Are you sure that Ms Panchenko had not explained that to you in her telephone conversation of 17 June 2004?
- A. I told you, I don't remember the conversation.
- Q. Do you know whether Mr Escher did in fact provide this updated compliance information to his lawyers?
- A. I don't know.

Q. You see, what we do know, Mr Streshinsky, whether they received this updated compliance information from you or not, is that Secretan Troyanov were by now deeply suspicious of the transaction and they wanted a deposition from Mr Anisimov setting out the full factual background.

A. Mm-hm.

Q. Do you remember that?

A. I don't remember that.

Q. Perhaps we could just turn that up, Mr Streshinsky. You can put bundle H(A)77 away and please could you now turn up bundle H(A)78. If you turn in that bundle to page 147 H(A)78/147.

A. Which page, please?

Q. Page 147.

A. Yes.

Q. Do you see there an email at the top of the page from yourself to Mr Fiechter?

A. Yes.

Q. Dated 1 July 2004, yes?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. We can see that you're now in direct contact with Mr Fiechter and you write to him saying:

"Dear Mr Fiechter.

"The draft of Mr A's deposition is not urgent as we discussed it yesterday. I have prepared it and able to send it to you in Russian. However since our translators have been translating all transaction docs yesterday and today I was not able to send you the translation. If it is ok to send it in Russian -- please advise, I'll do it immediately."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Can you confirm that the reference to Mr A was a reference to Mr Anisimov?

A. That's very likely, yes.

Q. And please can you confirm that what Mr Fiechter was looking for from Mr Anisimov was a deposition confirming the factual background to the transaction?

A. That is possible.

Q. We know that around this time you had Mr Fiechter's 8-page opinion, together with its annexes on Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky, translated into Russian. Do you remember that?

A. That's possible, yes.

Q. I don't think we need to turn those up but for the record those documents are to be found at H(A)77, pages 181 to page 200 H(A)77/181.

A. Mm-hm.

Q. The reason I suggest, Mr Streshinsky, but tell me if I'm wrong, that you had Mr Fiechter's advice translated into Russian was so that you could provide it to Mr Anisimov and explain to him why it was necessary for him to make a deposition?

A. That's possible, yes. That's possible.

Q. Do you recall providing Mr Fiechter's advice to Mr Anisimov around this time, Mr Streshinsky?

A. No, I don't.

Q. Do you recall speaking to him about the concerns that had been raised by First Zurich Bank?

A. I might have spoken to him --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Do you think you could possibly turn around and face me? I know it's difficult for you. It's just that I get a better reaction to your answers if I can see you face to face.

MR MASEFIELD: You must have raised these matters with Mr Anisimov, mustn't you, Mr Streshinsky, not least so that you could work with him on his draft deposition?

A. Yes, I possibly raised this. I just don't remember.

Q. I'm grateful.

Then if we turn on in the bundle to page 169

H(A)78/169.

A. 169, yes.

Q. We can see there are two further emails which passed between you and Mr Fiechter, do you see those,

Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. And looking at the bottom of the page, we can see that late on 1 July 2004 Mr Fiechter sent you a further email chasing for the documents as soon as possible in English to allow him to make a final evaluation, do you see that?

Bottom of page 169.

A. 169.

Q. "... would help if we had all documents as soon as possible in English to make the final evaluation. Will we get something from the auditors? If [so] what?"

A. What page, please?

Q. 169. You should have an email at the bottom from yourself.

A. Yes.

Q. To yourself, sorry, from Mr Fiechter?

A. Yes.

Q. Saying:

"... would help if we had all documents as soon as possible in English to make the final evaluation."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Then if we look back up the page, Mr Streshinsky, we can see you've written back saying:

"Dear Mr Fiechter. Unfortunately, we have no news regarding the documents from auditors.

"The deposition of Mr A is being translated."

A. Yes.

Q. But we don't know what Mr Anisimov's deposition was or was not going to say because no drafts of it, or even a Russian version, have been disclosed. What we do know, Mr Streshinsky, is that about this time you took the decision to switch the transaction from the First Zurich Bank to the Parex Bank in Latvia. Indeed we can see that from the next document in the bundle, page 170, which is an email from yourself to Alexander Kay at Parex Bank forwarding him a draft fiduciary agreement.

Who was Alexander Kay, Mr Streshinsky, at Parex Bank?

A. I don't remember.

Q. Please can you explain to the court exactly why the switch was made to the Parex Bank at around this time, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Well, I was responsible for the completion of the transaction so I had to open the account. I've seen that the approach which Mr Fiechter and Mr Escher took was very conservative and it required a lot of documents. For instance, it required documents from Mr Deripaska about the source of funds, the audited documents about the companies, the Rusal and the holding companies. It required the documents which would explain the initial amounts which were invested by Mr Abramovich to buy KrAZ. And I just thought that it was simply impossible to get all these documents.

I tried but I could not get them. So -- and I decided that, you know, with this approach we will not be able to complete the transaction and open the account, so I had to switch to another bank.

Q. Did you ever finalise Mr Anisimov's written deposition?

A. Unfortunately I don't remember that.

Q. I'm grateful.

Now, you tell us, Mr Streshinsky, that in early July 2004, yourself and Mr Faekov travelled to Georgia to meet with Mr Patarkatsishvili and to discuss the transaction with him and to take him through the draft transaction documents, correct?

A. That's correct.

Q. And you also tell us, Mr Streshinsky, that it was around this time that the draft transaction documents were being amended. Do you remember that?

A. Yes.

Q. They were being amended so as to include a warranty from Mr Patarkatsishvili that he was the only ultimate beneficial owner of the 25 per cent stake in Rusal?

A. Yes.

Q. Together with a warranty that he was not holding for the benefit of anyone else?

A. That's correct.

Q. And you tell us that it was clear to you that you needed to obtain direct confirmation from Mr Patarkatsishvili that what he was being asked to warrant was correct?

A. Exactly. I thought that it was important to talk to Mr Patarkatsishvili about that because if that was untrue, then his liability could exceed the amount of consideration.

Q. I'm grateful.

And you say that both yourself and Mr Faekov saw Mr Patarkatsishvili in Georgia on Friday 9 July 2004?

A. That's correct.

Q. You say that you and Mr Faekov flew from Moscow to Tbilisi, then from Tbilisi to Batumi, and then you travelled by Mr Patarkatsishvili's helicopter to Ureki, to Mr Patarkatsishvili's private dacha. That's paragraph 129 of your statement F1/02/89.

A. That's correct.

Q. You say that once there you had a meeting with Mr Patarkatsishvili "underneath a covered area on the seashore", on which you sat down with him and went through the draft documents?

A. That's correct.

Q. You say that you were alone when you had this meeting with Mr Patarkatsishvili?

A. Yes.

Q. So Mr Faekov was not present at this particular meeting on the seashore?

A. He was sitting separately.

Q. Could he hear what you were saying?

A. I don't think so.

Q. And you say that during the course of this meeting with Mr Patarkatsishvili, he confirmed to you that he was the sole beneficial owner of the shares and had been since March 2000?

A. That's correct.

Q. And you say you also remember explaining to Mr Patarkatsishvili that "he could have potential liability if Mr Berezovsky brought a claim"?

A. Exactly, yes.

Q. And then you say that following this meeting and the dinner with Mr Patarkatsishvili, both you and Mr Faekov flew back to Moscow overnight and you then believe you updated Mr Anisimov on the position?

A. Yes.

Q. You see, the oddity about what you're telling us, Mr Streshinsky, is this: according to you, this was a vitally important meeting, you needed direct confirmation from Mr Patarkatsishvili that he was indeed the sole beneficial owner of the Rusal shares, yes?

A. That's correct.

Q. And you had travelled all the way out to Georgia with Mr Faekov to get this confirmation from Mr Patarkatsishvili, yes?

A. Not only.

Q. Sorry?

A. Not only.

You see that this was the only time I saw Mr Patarkatsishvili prior to the transaction so I had to have a chance to explain to him how the transaction is structured and what risks he had.

Q. I understand. And Mr Faekov had travelled with you from Moscow to Tbilisi to Batumi, and from Batumi via helicopter to Mr Patarkatsishvili's private dacha?

A. Yes, we worked -- I believe we worked on 8 July in some office which was given to us by Mr Patarkatsishvili's assistant.

Q. And despite travelling all this way with you, and despite the obvious importance of this meeting, you tell us that Mr Faekov was not present, within earshot, when you had this critical discussion with Mr Patarkatsishvili?

A. Yes.

Q. And indeed you say this important discussion with Mr Patarkatsishvili took place with you alone?

A. Yes.

Q. My question for you is this, Mr Streshinsky: why, having travelled all this way with you for this vitally important meeting, why was it that Mr Faekov was not present during the meeting?

A. Well, Mr Faekov worked with me on 7 and 8 July in Georgia, he worked on the drafts, and he travelled with me to Patarkatsishvili in case some legal explanations would be required.

Q. Why, if this meeting was so important, Mr Streshinsky, did you not seek to document it then and there or report it to Mr Faekov and get him to draw up an attendance note?

A. Well, we don't usually draw up attendance notes.

Q. Why was it when you reported back on the matter to Mr Anisimov the following day you did so verbally, Mr Streshinsky, not by way of an email or an attendance note or a letter to Mr Anisimov?

A. I never sent emails to Mr Anisimov.

Q. Surely, given the importance of this meeting, Mr Streshinsky, you would have wanted Mr Faekov to be present as a witness, and you would have wanted to document it by way of an attendance note or in subsequent correspondence?

A. Well, I have documented it by way of sending to Mr Patarkatsishvili the simplified structure of the deal and the risk memo which he has signed.

Q. We're coming on to that, but you didn't document what actually was said on this occasion in the course of your meeting with Mr Patarkatsishvili, did you?

A. I did not.

Q. You see, the further oddity, Mr Streshinsky, is this: just over a year later, in July 2005, in interviews held with Mr Berezovsky's lawyers, Mr Patarkatsishvili made it plain that in relation to the 25 per cent stake in Rusal he was not acting alone, and that Mr Berezovsky was also a beneficial shareholder?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, was Mr Streshinsky present at those meetings?

MR MASEFIELD: He wasn't, my Lady. But what I'm seeking to -- well, let me put this to the witness.

You say that on the occasion when you met him alone in the beach in Georgia, Mr Patarkatsishvili happily confirmed to you that he was the sole beneficial owner of the 25 per cent stake in Rusal?

A. Yes.

Q. That's really your evidence?

- A. That is.
- Q. You see, I have to say you're not telling the truth on this, Mr Streshinsky. And what Mr Patarkatsishvili in fact confirmed to you on this occasion in private was that he was prepared to warrant that he was acting alone if that meant that the Rusal sale transaction would go through, even though it did not reflect the true position.
- A. That is not correct. I disagree with you.
- Q. That was why, Mr Streshinsky, following this meeting with Mr Patarkatsishvili, you asked Mr Faekov of Akin Gump to draw up a risk analysis document explaining to Mr Patarkatsishvili the consequences for him if his warranty, that he was acting alone in relation to Rusal, turned out to be false.
- A. Well, I think the draft of this document was prepared during our stay in Georgia, prior to our visit to Mr Patarkatsishvili.
- Q. But it wasn't produced and it wasn't signed by Mr Patarkatsishvili then and there, it was worked upon and it was only sent to Mr Patarkatsishvili for his signature following this meeting in Georgia, correct?
- A. Yes, correct.
- Q. If you could please be given bundle H(A)81 and turn within it to page 195T H(A)81/195T.

A. Which page, please?

Q. 195T. You see here, Mr Streshinsky, an email from yourself to Mr Patarkatsishvili's administrative assistant, Paata, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. We can see that you're attaching various documents from Mr Patarkatsishvili to read and approve, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. In particular, you say in your covering email that it is most important to get Mr Patarkatsishvili to sign the document, transaction approval, 12 July 2004. Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. This was the document, wasn't it, Mr Streshinsky, in which Mr Faekov and yourself explained to Mr Patarkatsishvili what his exposure might be, amongst other things, in the event that his warranty that he was acting alone was false?

A. Yes.

Q. Let's turn that document up, if we go back in the bundle to page 181 for the English version. There's a Russian version which Mr Patarkatsishvili signed at 185, but if you're happy to work from the English, let's work from that H(A)81/181.

A. Yes.

- Q. This is the document that you were attaching to your email and you were asking for Mr Patarkatsishvili to sign and approve?
- A. Yes.
- Q. The first two pages describe the deal structure and outline the effect of the main contractual documents, correct?
- A. Correct.
- Q. Then over the page H(A)81/182 and just above the space for Mr Patarkatsishvili's signature, we can see this:
- "The basic risks associated with the given transaction are adduced as Appendix 1."
- Do you see that?
- A. Yes.
- Q. You wanted Mr Patarkatsishvili to sign off on this because Mr Patarkatsishvili had indicated to you that the warranty that he was being asked to sign in relation to Mr Berezovsky was false and you therefore wanted to ensure that Mr Patarkatsishvili understood the risk he was running?
- A. No.
- Q. Well, let's have a look at the document.
- A. Maybe I should explain why I asked him to sign that.
- Q. Please do.
- A. I wanted basically to be sure that Mr Patarkatsishvili understands the deal structure because he was not reading the full set of documents, and that he also understands the risks involved with these transactions. I was basically covering my position so that, later on, nobody comes to me and says to me that I did not explain that, and that's why there is a problem.

Q. You were covering your position, and that is exactly what this document was designed to do.

Let's look at the document on page 183 H(A)81/183. The first risk that you and Mr Faekov identify is the risk of Madison not paying and the lack of any guarantee of payment of dividends. I don't think we need to worry about that.

The second risk that you and Mr Faekov identify is the risk arising from the fact that Mr Abramovich was not providing any guarantee about historical ownership rights to the shares.

A. Yes.

Q. Again I don't think we need to worry about that.

But then over the page at item 3 H(A)81/184, you identify as a risk for Mr Patarkatsishvili "Risk of demands by BB", do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. The reference there to BB was clearly meant to be a reference to Mr Berezovsky, wasn't it, Mr Streshinsky?

A. That is correct.

Q. And if we look under "Nature of the risk" we can see that Mr Faekov -- this was drafted by Mr Faekov, wasn't it?

A. Largely, yes.

Q. We can see that Mr Faekov has written:

"BB may declare that sale of the shares infringed certain of his rights.

"For instance, BB might attempt to demand the [Rusal Holding] shares (see above), or seek the annulment of the sale of these shares, or make demand for damages allegedly suffered to them (say, as a result of the consolidation of 2002-2003, or the poor conduct of the business of [Rusal Holding] in 2000-2003, or the nonpayment to him of dividends, or the sale to [Eagle Capital Group] without his knowledge), or a share of the share sale proceeds.

"If this demand is presented to [Mr Patarkatsishvili] or to [Eagle Capital], or is based upon the actions of [Mr Patarkatsishvili], then [Mr Patarkatsishvili] will primarily bear the risk.

"If the demand is only based on the actions of [Mr Abramovich], then the above mentioned statement by [Mr Abramovich] may provide some protection, but it does not cover all situations and is also weaker than a guarantee agreement -- it is always harder to win a case with a statement of facts than with a guarantee. In addition, it would be necessary to prove that [Mr Abramovich] actually knew of defects and recognised the existence of [Mr Berezovsky's] legal rights or dealt directly with [Mr Berezovsky].

"That aside, in the event that the court found in [Mr Berezovsky's] favour, [Mr Patarkatsishvili's] financial liability would be unlimited and could exceed the sum received for the shares.

"We are unaware of facts upon which [Mr Berezovsky] could rely."

We will come back in a moment to the facts which you, as opposed to Mr Faekov, were aware of, Mr Streshinsky.

But looking to the right-hand column, do you see that it's headed "Methods of elimination and assessment of the risk", yes?

A. Mm-hmm.

Q. We can see Mr Faekov has written this:

"The given risk could only be removed by way of receipt from [Mr Berezovsky] of a statement of release from obligations. As far as we understand it will not be possible to receive such a release."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, that suggests there had been some discussion about obtaining a formal statement of release from Mr Berezovsky and that you had been told that it would not be possible to obtain such a release, do you recall that discussion with Mr Patarkatsishvili?

A. No, I don't. We assumed that this was not possible because Mr Berezovsky was openly and through mass media saying that he has a claim, so he would not be signing anything.

Q. But you say:

"As far as we understand it will not be possible to receive such a release."

You say that was just based on press reports?

A. Yes.

Q. You had had no discussion with Mr Patarkatsishvili about that?

A. No.

Q. And in any event we know that ultimately Mr Berezovsky was not asked to sign, and did not sign, a formal release as regards any claims that he might have in relation to the 25 per cent stake in Rusal; that's right, isn't it, Mr Streshinsky?

A. I think so.

Q. Then looking a little further down the right-hand column, we see this, "Assessment of the risk":

"The risk may be real if [Mr Berezovsky] issues proceedings and wins a case against one of the parties. If [Mr Berezovsky] doesn't have any documents and witnesses confirming his participation in the deal, then court recognition of his rights is unlikely. All the same, the court process could be long, expensive and be discussed in the press."

Do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. Was that one of the reasons why Mr Abramovich's representatives had told you they did not want to further document Mr Berezovsky's beneficial interest?

A. Well, they never said that they -- that Mr Berezovsky had any beneficial interest.

Q. Well, I disagree about that, because we've seen the correspondence you've had with them earlier about representations to the banks, and we've discussed that, but I don't think we're going to go back over the ground.

A. No, no, excuse me. With regards to representations to the banks, they only said that the compliance information that they were giving to the bank was that Mr Abramovich was the beneficial owner and was the owner of the shares.

Q. They were saying that was the information they had already given to the banks?

A. Yes.

Q. And that therefore, going forward, you had to make sure the document was structured in a way that was not inconsistent with what had previously been said to the banks?

A. Yes, but that involved Mr Patarkatsishvili, not Mr Berezovsky.

Q. Correct.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Would that be a convenient moment?

MR MASEFIELD: It might be, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can I just raise with you, Mr Rabinowitz and Mr Sumption, Wednesday when there's going to be a strike. Can we still have Mr Rozenberg on Wednesday?

MR SUMPTION: Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: There's no problem about --

MR RABINOWITZ: There shouldn't be. I will be here. If Mr Rozenberg is here and your Ladyship is here we can no doubt carry on.

MR SUMPTION: The four of us can sort it out.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It's just translators and --

MR RABINOWITZ: We need to speak to the transcribers. He speaks English so it will all be done in English, my lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: If there are any problems about Wednesday -- well, perhaps you could ascertain whether there are going to be any and let me know if there is going to be a problem.

Very well. How much longer are you going to be, Mr Masefield?

MR MASEFIELD: My Lady, I think I'm probably going to be another half an hour, maybe three quarters.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Two o'clock.

(1.00 pm)

(The short adjournment)

(2.00 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Masefield.

MR MASEFIELD: We looked this morning, Mr Streshinsky, at the compliance documents that you completed for First Zurich Bank, do you remember that? And we saw that you'd been able to set out a detailed history of the KrAZ assets sale and the purchases involved in the aluminium acquisition, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. I'd now like to go back very briefly with you, Mr Streshinsky, to the events of early 2000 to see what you in fact knew about Mr Berezovsky's interests in the aluminium acquisitions?

A. Yes.

Q. You see, you were not just involved in the KrAZ assets sale in the spring of 2000, were you, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you remember also being involved on behalf of Mr Anisimov, and providing advice to Mr Patarkatsishvili as to how he should structure his assets offshore?

A. Mr Anisimov, from time to time, asked me to organise for Mr Patarkatsishvili a relationship with either lawyers or fiduciaries or the banks.

Q. I'm grateful.

You can put away bundle H(A)81 which I think you still have. Please could you be given bundle H(A)18 and if we could turn within H(A)18 to page 200.001 H(A)18/200.001. Do you see there a telefax addressed to yourself and dated 27 March 2000 from Mr Hans-Peter Stager of Syndikus Treuhandalstalt?

A. Yes.

Q. Syndikus Treuhandalstalt is a Lichtenstein company which specialises in private client advice and off-shore structures; are you aware of that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. We can see the fax commences:

"Dear Mr Streshinsky.

"Reference is made to our meeting of last Thursday and to our telephone conversation on Saturday. We may inform you that we have already ordered all [the] company, and most of them have just arrived. In the meantime, we have examined all documents given to us."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. So Syndikus Treuhandalstalt appear to have been ordering or setting up companies at your request around this time, is that correct?

A. Yes, they were intended to do that.

Q. They were intended to do that. The fax goes on, we can see this in the second paragraph:

"As you know, we have our due diligence, and we would like to have the following additional documents or inquiries."

And they set out various items that they would like by way of additional information, and if you look at the first item they've asked for, we see it's this:

"Valuation Report of Bratsk Aluminium Plant (as we have got from KrAZ and KrGES). Who has originally established these reports?"

Do you see that?

A. I see that.

Q. So you appear previously to have provided Syndikus Treuhandalstalt with some background financial information in relation to KrAZ and KrGES, but not in relation to Bratsk; do you remember doing that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. I don't remember doing that. I've seen this letter -- well, I've seen this letter in the course of preparation. I don't remember this letter but it obviously was addressed to me.

Q. I'm grateful, and we'll come on to the significance of that in a moment. But sticking with the document for the time being and looking at the next bullet point we can see that they say:

"We need the enclosed declaration signed by the client (Mr P), that he executes the business for himself and that no members of the government, parliament, or any politician people are involved."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. If we look over the page H(A)18/200.002 we have the draft declaration to be signed by Mr AP, and would you agree with me that this was very likely to have been a reference to Mr Patarkatsishvili?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you remember being instructed by Mr Anisimov around this time to assist Mr Patarkatsishvili in setting up various offshore companies?

A. I don't remember that particular episode but that must have been the case.

Q. I'm grateful.

Looking back at page 200.001 H(A)18/200/001, we can see, skipping down to the fourth bullet point, this question:

"How is the relation between Sibneft and the four intermediary companies (subsidiaries or affiliated companies)?"

Do you see that?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. Syndikus Treuhandalstalt had obviously previously been provided by you with something which meant that they understood there was a link between Sibneft and what they refer to as "four intermediary companies".

If you keep bundle H(A)18 open, please could you also be given H(E)1, tab 4, page 7 H(E)1/04/7. Do you see there a diagram showing the February 2000 aluminium acquisition transactions, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you recall seeing this document before, Mr Streshinsky?

A. I might have seen it -- I've seen it in the course of preparation but I might have seen it before.

Q. At the time.

A. Yes.

Q. You see, we know from another document that Mr Anisimov has disclosed in this action, an index, that you do indeed appear to have had a diagrammatic schema of the aluminium transaction in your possession around this time. Do you think you did see a diagram similar to this one around the time of the KrAZ asset sale?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you recall whether or not you might have sent this diagram or a similar diagram to Syndikus Treuhandalstalt?

A. I might have done, yes.

Q. I am grateful. We see, looking in the diagram, in the middle of the page, there is a faint circle around the four companies with the writing "Sibneft" do you see that? The four pages (sic): Runicom Fort, Galinton, Palmtex, Dilcor, are all included within an ellipse with Sibneft, do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. And immediately below that there's a further ellipse called "Intermediary" with four companies indicated?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. And the arrows pointing from the Sibneft circle to the intermediary circle, do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. What I suggest is that you had indeed supplied a copy of this diagram, or something very similar to it, to the Syndikus Treuhandalstalt people and they, having seen it, were querying the nature of the relationship between Sibneft and the four intermediary companies. Do you have any recollection of that?

A. No, I don't have a precise recollection of that.

Q. Let me ask you this, Mr Streshinsky: what other document or information apart from this diagram do you think that you might have supplied to Syndikus Treuhandalstalt which would cause them to ask the question that we see in the fourth bullet point? Is there any other document that you can think of?

A. Well, I think I've given them the KrAZ and Krasnoyarsk GES relation(?) report because I have had that in my possession.

Q. But those don't refer to Sibneft and the four intermediary companies. So is there anything else apart from something similar to this diagram that you think you could have supplied?

A. Yes, I might have given this diagram.

Q. I'm grateful.

Looking back at the Syndikus Treuhandalstalt fax, and skipping down to the last bullet point, we can see it says this H(A)18/200.001:

"Please confirm the Austrian Banks with addresses, which will transfer the money to the new accounts."

Do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you recall that around this time Mr Patarkatsishvili had indeed set up a bank account with an Austrian bank called Kathrein & Co?

A. No, I didn't know that.

Q. The name doesn't ring any bells?

A. No.

Q. Mr Patarkatsishvili also incorporated around this time two companies, Bili Holdings and Bili SA. And Bili SA then opened an account with Austrian bank Kathrein & Co. Do you remember any of that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. No, I don't know these names.

Q. During the year from March 2000 to March 2001, substantial sums of over 50 million were then paid into Bili SA's account with Kathrein & Co from companies that were associated with Mr Abramovich, which Mr Patarkatsishvili then used to purchase, fit out and maintain an aeroplane. Do you remember any of that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. I don't know that.

Q. Now, in order to open Bili SA's bank account with Kathrein & Co and purchase his aeroplane,

Mr Patarkatsishvili needed to have his commission agreements relating to the aluminium acquisition transactions formally notarised. That happened on 16 March 2000, 11 days before this fax was sent, and the commission agreements were notarised in Moscow before a public notary and witnessed by Ms Tatyana Zaitseva. And Ms Tatyana Zaitseva was a Coalco employee, wasn't she?

A. She was a secretary of Mr Anisimov.

Q. I'm grateful. Do you recall arranging to help Mr Patarkatsishvili get his commission agreements notarised around this time?

A. No.

Q. You have no recollection of that?

A. No, I haven't.

Q. Let me show you one final document, Mr Streshinsky, to see if we can help jog your memory. If you keep H(A)18 open, but turn back in bundle H(E)1 to tab 3, page 4, for the Russian H(E)1/03/4, and 4T --

A. Which bundle, 18?

Q. It's the one with the diagram in it, if you turn back in that to tab 3.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: H(E)1, tab 4?

MR MASEFIELD: We were in tab 4, my Lady, I'm turning back to tab 3.

The start of tab 3 is a Russian document, and we have the translation on page 4T and following H(E)1/03/4T.

A. I see the Russian document.

Q. Looking at the Russian, do you recognise this document, Mr Streshinsky?

A. I haven't seen this document before. Well, I've seen it during the preparation to the witness statement but I haven't seen it at the time.

Q. Now, we know that this explanatory note was drawn up around the same time as the Syndikus fax, that is to say, March 2000, for reasons that I don't need to go into for the time being. But looking at the explanatory note, Mr Streshinsky, do you see that stage 1 is entitled "Initial. Opening accounts, transfer of funds", do you see that?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. There is then a reference to:

"... intermediary services for the arrangement of redistribution of shares in the aluminium complex ..."

Do you see that, on the right-hand side?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. Then a bit further down it says:

"Amount of the Intermediaries' Compensation: About 100 million USD."

Do you see that?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. That is a reference to the sums due under the commissions agreements which Mr Patarkatsishvili had notarised on 16 March, were witnessed by Ms Zaitseva, okay?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. Then we can see there's a short underlying passage which says this:

"In order to carry out the intermediary transaction and also the first stage of the Programme, it is assumed that it will be necessary to perform the following actions."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Then it says:

"1. Providing interested parties (lawyers, the persons conducting the companies' business, the bank) with the set of documents constituting the Transaction, including:

"Diagrams of the transaction;

"Cash flow tables;

"Agreements (protocols) between the purchasers and the client -- the intermediaries' representative;

"Copies of the share sale and purchase agreements of the factories;

"Background, financial and other information about the subjects of the transaction (KrAZ, GES)."

Do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. A lot of that ties in with the Syndikus fax of 27 March that we were just looking at.

A. Yes.

Q. For example, do you recall the Syndikus Anstalt people had received financial information for KrAZ and KrAZ GES from you, but they were asking for similar background information for BrAZ; do you recall that?

A. Yes.

Q. So what you appear to have sent the Syndikus people by way of background financial information is precisely the background financial information that it was envisaged by the author of the explanatory note would be sent to interested parties, lawyers and so on, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. Do you recall the Syndikus Anstalt people appear to have received a diagram of the transaction structure that we've just looked at, and were querying the relationship?

A. I don't remember but I think they've received it.

Q. And that would appear to tie in with the information that it was envisaged would be sent to interested parties, the first bullet point in this explanatory note, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you recall that the Syndikus Anstalt people had also in their fax used similar language to what we see employed here, the language of "intermediary client", and they had referred to four intermediary companies. We can see four intermediary companies being referred to here, can't we, Mr Streshinsky? If you look about halfway down on the page to the word "Intermediaries", where it's capitalised --

A. It's on the Syndikus letter?

Q. No, on the explanatory note that we have at page 4T H(E)1/03/4T, about halfway down we have in capitalised words:

"Intermediaries: Companies belonging to BAB (2 companies) and BShP (2 companies)."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Then if we look down to the bottom of the first page of this explanatory note, Mr Streshinsky, and in particular if we look at bullet points 2, 3 and 4, we can see that what is proposed is the acquisition of the intermediary companies on behalf of clients, opening bank accounts for the intermediary companies and the official transfer of commission fees into the bank accounts. Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. And that also ties in with the Syndikus fax of 27 March, because do you remember Syndikus Anstalt people talked about ordering offshore companies, and they talked about transferring monies into the new Austrian bank accounts?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. You see, what I suggest to you, Mr Streshinsky, is that you were the author of this explanatory note?

A. No.

Q. You deny that, do you?

A. I deny that.

Q. And the fax that we have from the Syndikus Treuhandanstalt people to you on 27 March is evidence of your involvement in what we see described as stage 1 of this note.

A. Well, I did not see this note, I was not author of this note, I was simply asked to provide certain information to Syndikus and communicate with them.

Q. You say it's just a coincidence, do you, Mr Streshinsky, that around the very time when this note appears to have been drawn up you were liaising with Syndikus people and carrying out the tasks that appear to have been envisaged at stage 1?

A. I'm sure it's not a coincidence, I was just asked by Mr Anisimov to assist and I had to send certain information.

Q. You see, what's significant about the explanatory note, Mr Streshinsky, is this: the explanatory note was not just written for the benefit of Mr Patarkatsishvili because although it contains some references to the client in the singular, it also contains references to the clients in the plural.

We can see that from the opening words of the explanatory note. If you look up at the top of the page, do you see it says:

"In connection with the Clients' proposed visit to Europe..."

Do you see that?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. If we look at that, about halfway down, where it says "Intermediaries" in capitalised terms, it's fairly clear that the clients who are being referred to are BAB and BShP, that is to say Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. And then if we go on over the page H(E)1/03/5T and look at stage 2 of this explanatory note, stage 2 is entitled "The Main Stage. Structuring of the Assets", do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. We can see the author of the explanatory note says:

"The second stage of the Programme consists of two parts:

"Distribution of the assets between the partners in proportion to their interests.

"Creation of a single company, determination of the rules for its functioning, transfer of the assets to the single company's ownership."

Do you see that?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. Then it says:

"It is proposed first of all to distribute the assets belonging to the partners in the main business projects, including the following."

There then follows a list of assets, yes?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. Those assets include a reference to Sibneft at item 3?

A. Mm-hm.

Q. And those assets also include a reference to the aluminium complex at item 2, do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. That reference to the aluminium complex was a reference to the KrAZ, BrAZ and Achinsk assets which you knew, as a result of your involvement in the February 2000 sale, both Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili had acquired ownership interests in?

- A. Well, I knew that Mr Patarkatsishvili acquired the ownership interest because I've seen the documents. I didn't know anything about Mr Berezovsky.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you speak up a bit, please?

- A. I knew -- excuse me. I knew that Mr Patarkatsishvili was involved because he was one of the purchasers in this agreement of 10 February but I didn't know about any involvement of Mr Berezovsky.

MR MASEFIELD: You say that, Mr Streshinsky. But if you were the author of this document, or you were involved in implementing the stages that are described here, what it demonstrates is that you would have known at March 2000 that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were partners and, secondly, you would have known that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili had ownership interests in the aluminium complex that would come to form part of Rusal. But you deny any such knowledge, do you, Mr Streshinsky?

- A. Yes. This is the way you put it. I put it very simply: I was assisting Mr Patarkatsishvili in opening the account and establishing the relationship with the banks.

- Q. We say that this was knowledge which was not just personal to you, Mr Streshinsky. You've told us in paragraph 17 of your witness statement F1/02/59 that whenever you did work for Mr Patarkatsishvili it was always at the instruction of Mr Anisimov. Do you remember that?
- A. That's correct.
- Q. And you would therefore have shared with Mr Anisimov the information that you acquired in the course of providing these services to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili?
- A. I did not provide any services to Mr Berezovsky.
- Q. You see, both you and Mr Anisimov have to deny that knowledge, don't you, Mr Streshinsky, because otherwise it fatally undermines not only your case on the overlap issues in these proceedings but also Mr Anisimov's defence in Metalloinvest?
- A. Well, that's your opinion. What can I say?
- Q. You see, there's one final thing, Mr Streshinsky, that's striking about this explanatory note and it's this. Do you see towards the bottom of the page, just before the last five numbered paragraphs, there's a short paragraph which says this:

"This stage concludes in the creation of a single company and the transfer of all the assets of the partners into its ownership. This company's founding documents must provide the legal rules of the game, including ..."

And then various matters are set out, including mechanisms for protecting minority shareholders, how to resolve deadlocks and the procedure on termination by one partner. Do you see that?

A. Yes, I see.

Q. Then turning over the page H(E)1/03/6T, under the heading "Stage 3. The Final Stage. The Procedure and the Results of Joint Work", do you see that heading?

A. Yes.

Q. It says:

"All the legal activities of the joint company and the businesses controlled by it must be carried out by Western lawyers."

Then in the next paragraph:

"Once a year the joint company's activities and its financial results will be confirmed by one of the major international audit companies."

Do you see that, Mr Streshinsky?

A. Yes.

Q. And that advice ties in directly, Mr Streshinsky, with Mr Berezovsky's evidence given in these proceedings, and long before --

A. Was what?

Q. It ties in with Mr Berezovsky's evidence given in these proceedings, long before this explanatory note was disclosed, that he remembers Mr Anisimov advising both himself and Mr Patarkatsishvili around the time of the Dorchester Hotel meeting in March 2000 that they should structure their assets offshore in a very precise legal way, and subject to western as opposed to Russian law.

That was the advice I suggest to you that both you and Mr Anisimov were giving to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili around this time?

A. Well, I did not speak to Mr Berezovsky, I did not speak to Mr Patarkatsishvili. I only spoke to Mr Anisimov, and if Mr Anisimov advised something to Mr Patarkatsishvili, I don't know what he advised.

MR MASEFIELD: My Lady, I have no further questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR MALEK: No re-examination.

MR ADKIN: No questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much indeed for coming along.

THE WITNESS: Thank you.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Particularly given your visa difficulties.

THE WITNESS: Thank you.

(The witness withdrew)

MR MALEK: My Lady, that concludes the evidence on behalf of the Anisimov defendants, and I think that concludes all the factual evidence in this case.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: We're on to Russian law experts and, my Lady, we call Dr Rachkov.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've read Dr Rachkov's expert statement.

DR ILIA RACHKOV (sworn)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Do sit down, Dr Rachkov, if you'd like to.

THE WITNESS: Thank you.

Examination-in-chief by MR RABINOWITZ

MR RABINOWITZ: Good afternoon, Dr Rachkov.

A. Good afternoon.

Q. Can Dr Rachkov be given bundle G(A)1/1 and also G(A)6/1, please.

While those are being brought, Dr Rachkov, can you just confirm that you don't have any mobile phone or other electronic device with you in the witness box?

A. My Lady, I don't have any electronic devices with me.

Q. Dr Rachkov, if you take bundle G(A)1 and you go to tab 1, you should see a document headed "Fourth Expert Report of Ilia Vitalievich Rachkov", do you see that

G(A)1/1.01/1?

A. Yes, my Lady, I do see that.

Q. If you go to the end of that tab, it's at page 108
G(A)1/1.01/108. It's right at the end of the tab.

Can you confirm that that is your signature?

A. Yes, my Lady, I confirm this is my signature.

Q. And that this is your fourth report in these proceedings?

A. I confirm.

Q. Thank you. And can you just go over to the next tab
G(A)1/1.02/109, you should see a document headed "Fifth Expert Report of Ilia Vitalievich Rachkov", do you have that?

A. Yes, my Lady, I do.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You don't have to call me "my Lady" every answer.

MR RABINOWITZ: And if you go to the end of that tab, page 177 G(A)1/1.02/177, again you should see a signature. Can you confirm that that is your signature?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. And that this is your fifth report in these proceedings?

A. Yes, this is my fifth report in these proceedings.

Q. Thank you. And then if you go over the tab, to tab 3

G(A)1/1.03/178, you should see a document headed
"Sixth Expert Report of Ilia Vitalievich Rachkov"?

A. Yes, I confirm this, I see this.

Q. Thank you. And then if you go right to the end of that bundle, it's page 217 G(A)1/1.03/217, again can you confirm that that is your signature?

A. Yes, this is my signature.

Q. Thank you, and that this is your sixth report?

A. Yes, this is my sixth report.

Q. Thank you. Can you confirm that the contents of these reports are all true to the best of your knowledge and belief?

A. Yes, I confirm this.

Q. Thank you very much.

Now, can you take up, please, bundle G(A)6/1, which is the joint expert memorandum, do you have that
G(A)6/1.01/1?

A. I do.

Q. Now, it's, as you know, a document which contains statements both of yourself and Mr Rozenberg and Professor Maggs. Can you first just go to page 41, again it's the end of the tab, on the left-hand side,
can you confirm that that is your signature
G(A)6/1.01/41?

A. Yes, this is my signature.

Q. Can you confirm that insofar as the joint memorandum contains or reflects statements attributable to you, that those statements are true to the best of your knowledge and belief?

A. Yes, I confirm.

MR RABINOWITZ: Thank you. Can you wait there, please, Mr Sumption is going to have some questions for you.

Cross-examination by MR SUMPTION

MR SUMPTION: Good afternoon, Dr Rachkov.

A. Good afternoon.

Q. Can you assume that it was agreed at the Dorchester Hotel in March 2000 that Mr Abramovich would legally own Rusal while Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili would beneficially own part of the holding? Do you follow the assumption that I'm asking you to make?

A. I do follow.

Q. Now, you accept, as I understand it, that that would not be a valid agreement as a matter of Russian law, is that right?

A. That is right.

Q. Now, am I right in thinking that that is because, in Russian law, the ownership of property is unitary; that's to say you can't split ownership into different kinds of right?

A. What I said in my report is that the ownership cannot be split into legal and beneficial ownership --

Q. Yes.

A. -- between different persons.

Q. Very well. Even by express agreement? The concept doesn't exist, in other words?

A. Such concept does not exist in Russian law.

Q. Now, I think your evidence is that the draftsman of the Civil Code considered borrowing the concept of trusts from English law but it was deliberately decided not to do that, is that right?

A. This is correct.

Q. Now, can we just look at some special situations. First of all, is it right that an article of property can be in the common ownership of more than one person?

A. Yes, some things can be in common ownership of more than one person.

Q. If we can just establish this, and I don't think there's any dispute about it, by reference to the relevant provisions of the Code. Could you be given bundle G(A)2/1. I'd like you to turn to flag 6 here which is one of a number of places in these bundles where we find extracts from the Code. They're not the same extracts which is why we're going to have to move about a bit.

If you turn to page 131 in the bundle numbering G(A)2/1.06/131, you should find Article 244 in a parallel Russian and English text. Sub-article 1 says:

"Property that is owned by two or more persons belongs to them by right of common ownership."

And that's the proposition that you confirmed a moment ago. That's right, isn't it?

A. Yes, that's right.

Q. I think the rest of the article explains that common ownership may be of two kinds. There is joint ownership and what is called share ownership in the English.

A. Yes, this is correct.

Q. Now, I'm anxious to labour this point slightly because we use very similar terms in English to describe something different. So in order to avoid confusion, am I right in thinking that joint ownership -- and this I think is the same in English and Russian law -- refers to the ownership of an asset by two or more persons in undivided shares?

A. I'm afraid I can only refer to what Russian Civil Code says.

Q. Yes. If you have two joint owners of an asset, is the position that they jointly own the whole of that asset? It's not divided into so much belonging to one person and so much belonging to the other; is that right?

A. Yes, that is correct. For instance, the husband and the wife have such type of ownership.

Q. Yes, and each of them owns the whole of the asset jointly?

A. Yes, unless they decided to divide it.

Q. Now, the other sort of common ownership which is referred to in Article 244, sub-article 2, is called share ownership. It may be that a less confusing English term would be ownership of a share, and that refers to the fact that property may be in common ownership with a definition of the share of each of its owners in the right of ownership. I'm reading from the English translation of Article 244.2.

Now, is it right then that if you have share ownership, or ownership of a share, in contradistinction to the case of joint ownership, this is a case where two or more people own an asset with each of them owning a defined proportion of that asset; that is correct?

A. That is in principle correct.

Q. Now, that of course is not splitting ownership into different kinds of right, is it? Because in either case each owner will have the same kind of right, is that correct?

A. Can you please specify your question?

- Q. Well, common ownership in either of its two forms is not an example of splitting ownership into different kinds of ownership right, is it? Because in each case common owners have the same kind of right over the asset, is that correct?
- A. That is correct.
- Q. Now, can we look at a second special situation. Is it right that an owner of property can enter into a contract of entrusted management, which I think is a technical term, at least that's the way it's translated into English, the effect of which is that he entrusts the property in question to the management of another person. Is that correct?
- A. The question -- I need to specify your question, or please give me the example whether you refer to the joint ownership or to the shared ownership?
- Q. Well, I'm not now talking about common ownership. I've moved on to a different topic I want to ask you about which is concerned with a kind of contract which is referred to in English as a contract of entrusted management. Now, is that an expression that you are familiar with?
- A. No, I am not familiar with that expression.
- Q. Right.
- A. I am familiar with the expression which is used in Russian law for an appropriate contract on entrusted management.

Q. Well, let me see if I can refer you to the relevant provision of the Code. Would you look at Article 101.2 of the Code which I think you'll find in the same flag. If you look at Article 1012, sub-article 1, this is under the heading "The Contract of Entrusted Management of Property", do you see?

A. Yes.

Q. I'm for obvious reasons using the English term and it may not be an expression that you would use --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Would you give me the page, please, Mr Sumption?

MR SUMPTION: It's at page 165 G(A)2/1.06/165.

When I refer to a contract of entrusted management, what I'm talking about is the sort of contract that is mentioned in the heading of Article 1012. There is, no doubt, a more exact Russian term in the parallel column.

Now, is that a kind of contract by which the owner of property entrusts that property to the management of another person?

A. Yes, this is such a contract.

Q. Now, under such a contract, am I right in thinking that the manager has no ownership interest at all? He is simply an agent for the purpose of managing it?

- A. That is correct.
- Q. Now, if I can turn to a third particular situation, you can also, as I understand it, have a custody or depo agreement for shares in companies with a professional securities depository, is that right?
- A. Yes, this is right.
- Q. Is it a feature of that contract that the depository exercises the rights of the owner but he does so only as the owner's agent and subject to the owner's instructions?
- A. In general it is possible, but it depends on what exactly is said in the contract between the owner and the service provider, who is the holder of the depo account.
- Q. But would you accept that it is a feature of custody or depo agreements that the depository or custodian will not have any ownership interest in the shares, he is simply performing services in relation to them to the true owner?
- A. This is correct.
- Q. So that none of the three special situations which I've identified infringe the basic principle that ownership rights in property can't be split into different kinds of ownership, would you agree?
- A. Maybe you can specify once again what you wanted me to answer.

- Q. Am I right in thinking that none of the three special situations that I've asked you about, namely common ownership, contract of entrusted management and custody or depo agreements, none of those three arrangements are inconsistent with the basic rule of Russian law that the ownership of property can't be split into a legal and a beneficial interest?
- A. Yes, I think none of these legal structures contradicts Russian law.
- Q. Yes. Well now, as I understand it, although two people cannot contract to split ownership into, for example, a legal and a beneficial interest, you say that an asset owner can contract with another person to give him a contractual benefit which is derived from ownership, for example I promise to pay you half the dividends that I receive from my shares in the XYZ company; that is your position, isn't it?
- A. That is my position, that such result can be achieved through a contract.
- Q. Now, is that on the basis that, if you enter into a contract of that kind, you are not agreeing to give the other party to the contract any ownership interests in the shares, it's a purely personal obligation; is that right?

- A. Yes, this is a contractual obligation. It is not a right in rem.
- Q. Right. Now, can I turn, please, to the question of rights in registered shares in a Russian company. Do you agree that shares in Russian joint stock companies are issued in what is called non-documentary form?
- A. Yes, this is correct. Starting from 2001, all shares in Russian joint stock companies must be issued in non-documentary form.
- Q. Is it right that there were non-documentary shares before 2001?
- A. Before 2001 there were non-documentary or documentary form, depending on what the joint stock company prefers.
- Q. So is it right then that the change that occurred in 2001 was that whereas previously a joint stock company could choose either to have documentary or non-documentary shares, after 2001 they had to be non-documentary? Is that correct?
- A. Yes, this is correct.
- Q. Can I next just ask you to confirm that Sibneft was an open joint stock company, wasn't it?
- A. To the best of my knowledge, it was.
- Q. Now, would you accept that the rights of shareholders in a Russian company are governed primarily by the Securities Law of 1996 and the charter of the company?

- A. Yes, this is correct, plus regulations enacted by the Federal Commission of Securities Market or, as it is called now, the Federal Service for Financial Markets.
- Q. Yes. Now could you please be given bundle G(A)4/6. I'd like you to turn to flag 85 in this bundle, which is the 1996 Securities Law G(A)4/6.85/208. Now, Article 2, which is the first article in the extract, provides:
- "Non-documentary form of securities is a form of securities in which the titled holder is to be established on the basis of the record in the system of the register of holders of securities or in the event of accounting the rights to securities and the depository -- by records in the depo account."
- Now, leaving aside depo accounts, which you've given some evidence about, do you accept that title to non-documentary shares is registered in a register kept either by the company itself or by a professional registrar?
- A. Yes, I agree, with one small explanation, that if the number of shareholders in a company exceeds 50 then the register must be held by an independent external registrar and not by the company itself.
- Q. I understand. But in either case, title to non-documentary shares is registered in the relevant register?

- A. Yes.
- Q. Would you agree that a company is not required to recognise the title of anybody who claims to hold shares but isn't registered?
- A. The company is not entitled to do so if the company is provided with all the documents which evidence that the person is the owner or is entitled to be registered in the register of shareholders.
- Q. Yes. Well, I will come to that. But if a shareholder, let us call him X, is registered in the register of shares the company is entitled to regard X and no one else as the owner. But if Y comes along and says "Here is a transfer executed in my favour by X, you must register me now as the shareholder", the company may be obliged to do that, is that correct?
- A. Yes, this is correct.
- Q. Now, would you agree that a person has title to shares only from the moment that he is registered as the shareholder in the company's share register?
- A. The registration is only a prima facie argument to say that a person is an owner. Therefore it really depends on the case we are speaking about. For sure, if the person is registered in the shareholder register, prima facie, as long as nothing to the contrary is evidenced, such person is the owner.

- Q. Right. But if somebody else is going to assert, as against a company, title to the shares he has got to demonstrate that he has a better right to the shares than the person who is registered, is that correct?
- A. What do you mean by "better right"? Can you explain, please?
- Q. Well, suppose that you have a parcel of 100 shares which are registered in the name of X. Now, Y can, as I understand your evidence, come along and say "I ought to be registered as the owner of these shares because, for example, X has sold them to me and here is the evidence". Is that correct?
- A. Yes, if there is a contract between these two persons, the previous and the current shareholder, and this contract can be enforced, that's what the new shareholder may request.
- Q. Yes. So what he has to produce is something which demonstrates that X, the registered shareholder, has transferred or surrendered his interests in those shares to Y, is that correct?
- A. Yes, there is a very clear indication in Russian law which type of documents must be provided to the holder of the register of shareholders to effectuate such transfer.
- Q. Yes. And can you tell us what those documents are,

please?

A. It depends on the specific circumstances of the case but, in general, leaving aside the circumstances of this particular case, there should be a contract between the seller and the purchaser; there should be a transfer order, in Russian called "peredatochnoye rasporyazhenie"; there should be an evidence that the payment occurred, otherwise the shares are deemed pledged. Based on these documents, the registrar effectuates the operation.

Q. And those are all -- the contract that you refer to is a contract in writing?

A. It is usually a contract in writing but, as I said, everything depends on the case by case situation.

If I take another situation, we have a husband who is registered in the register of shareholders as the owner of the shares, but later on, in the course of the divorce, it appears that his wife was also entitled to be registered, then the wife can request the separation of the property and be registered without any contract.

Q. Yes. Well, there are no doubt special situations like that one where presumably what you produce is the order of the court which directs that the wife is to have that right, is that correct?

A. Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I mean, she couldn't just turn up at a shareholders meeting and vote without getting herself on the register?

A. Correct. She cannot approach the general meeting of shareholders because nobody knows whether she is the wife and how shall this be evidenced.

MR SUMPTION: So there are various situations in which you can call upon the company to register you as a shareholder, but it is the register that is conclusive of the identity of the person who has the existing interest in the shares, is it not?

A. No, it is not. In Russian law, we distinguish between constitutive registration which is, for instance, so-called state registration, and the registration which is just the completion of the whole procedure. So in Russian law there can well be cases where there is a contract but for some reason the person is not entered in the register of shareholders, for instance because the seller prevents the purchaser from being registered because the seller does not deliver appropriate documents.

Q. Well, in that situation, suppose that the person who claims that there is a contract to transfer the shares to him turns up without previously getting himself registered as the shareholder at the general meeting and tries to vote. Now, the company will be under no obligation, will it, to recognise his right to vote?

A. Yes. The company can rely on the entries in the register of shareholders.

Q. Indeed. And if you look back at Article 2 G(A)4/6.85/208, that is providing, is it not, that where you have non-documentary securities:

"... the titled holder is to be established on the basis of the record in the system of the register of the holders of the securities ..."

Now, that is a mandatory provision, isn't it? The title of a shareholder must be established on the basis of an entry in the register, is that not right?

A. I cannot deny what the literal wording of the law is but, on the basis of the Russian court practice, I can say that the cases when the person is entitled to be registered, but is not registered for several reasons, are numerous. And, in this event, on a case by case basis, Russian court or another competent court must decide whether such person must be entered into the register.

There were cases which are also numerous in Russia that registrars were so-called pocket registrars. For instance, a major Russian group of companies creates, through a chain of companies, quasi-independent registrars which run the registers of shareholders of this company, and there were cases when registrars were engaged in corporate wars and conflicts and where they did not comply with the requirements of Russian law.

That's why I think it is to simplify things if we simply say or repeat the wording of Article 2.

- Q. Well the wording of Article 2, as I think you've acknowledged, appears to be mandatory. That's what the language says?
- A. It is mandatory for the registrars to register the holders of securities if they provide the registrars with the documents which are, in terms of their composition, their form and their contents, in line with the requirements of Russian law.
- Q. Well, what is said to be mandatory, I would suggest, in Article 2, is that the title holder is to be established on the basis of the record and the register, that's the mandatory principle, isn't it?
- A. I disagree.
- Q. Well, I quite understand and do not for one moment dispute that there may be many circumstances in which a person is entitled to be registered. But until he is registered the company is entitled to disregard his claim, isn't that right? The company is not entitled to treat him as the owner of the shares until he is registered even though he may have a right to be registered?

A. That is correct.

Q. And the register is therefore conclusive unless and until a court decides otherwise. That is ultimately the position, isn't it?

A. As I said before, it is not the position. We distinguish between constitutive operation of the law where the registration triggers the right of ownership, and the superficial, if you want, or external situation that the right is registered.

Q. Would you agree that when a person acquires or disposes of shares in a company, what he is acquiring or disposing of is an intangible legal right against that company?

A. I cannot follow what intangible means. I can only say that, indeed, the property which was disposed of are obligatory rights.

Q. Against the company?

A. Against the company.

Q. Now, if the company has no legal obligation to recognise his title, because he isn't yet registered, then there is nothing for that person to acquire or dispose of, is there?

A. Yes, you can say this way.

Q. Now, in English law, which recognises a difference between legal and beneficial ownership, a person who is not registered as a shareholder may nevertheless be entitled to require the registered shareholder to treat him as the real owner, but that's not a solution that Russian law acknowledges, is it? Because Russian law doesn't allow a distinction between legal and beneficial ownership?

A. No, I don't think so. I think the Russian law permits to achieve exactly the same economic result as the English law delivers, as you described it.

Q. But what it will not achieve is a situation in which any form of ownership is vested in the unregistered person. He may have a personal contractual right according to your evidence but not a right in rem; I think you confirmed that earlier?

A. That is correct.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So if I buy shares off you, and you remain the registered shareholder, and I've paid the price for the shares, can I contractually require you to vote in accordance with my directions?

A. Yes, and there is a direct indication to that effect in the federal law on joint stock companies.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

A. You can request me to deliver you a power of attorney or to vote in accordance with your instructions, my Lady.

MR SUMPTION: In the case of a power of attorney, you would be exercising somebody else's right to vote as an agent?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you agree?

A. Yes.

Q. And the same would be true if you were voting on the directions of somebody else. You would be exercising his voting rights but, by contract, you would be doing so according to his wishes, is that right?

A. Yes, and there is nothing surprising in it. Imagine a shareholder is holding shares, he knows that the annual general meeting of shareholders will take place soon, he knows what the recommendations of the supervisory board of the Russian company, in terms of dividends, are. He knows that the recommendation is not to pay the dividends. Still he needs money. He sells his shares to a purchaser, and the purchaser does not have enough time to get registered in the register of shareholders. In Russian law we have a deadline by which the list of persons entitled to vote in the general meeting of shareholders must be compiled.

So that's how it works in practice.

Q. Yes, and in that situation the registered shareholder is still treated, as against the company, as being the owner, but he has contracted to exercise his vote on the directions of the person who has bought the shares, is that right?

- A. Not necessarily. It depends on whether or not the seller is still registered in the register of shareholders or, although the purchaser is already registered in the register of shareholders, but is not included in the list of those who are entitled to vote in the general meeting of shareholders.
- Q. My question assumed, and I'm sorry I didn't make this clear, my question assumed that the seller was still registered as the owner. On that footing, is my proposition right?
- A. And what exactly is your proposition?
- Q. What I asked you was: in that situation, ie the situation where there hadn't been time to complete the formalities, the registered shareholder is still treated as the owner, but he is contracted to exercise his vote on the directions of the person who has bought the shares.
- Now, I was asking you that on the footing that the seller is still the registered owner.
- A. Yes, the seller is still the registered owner.
- Q. Now, would you accept that it follows from the provisions of the Securities Law about registered title to non-documentary shares that if two people have common ownership of shares in a company then they must all be registered, they must both be registered as shareholders?

A. In an ideal world, yes. In the real world, no.

Q. If they both want their rights as common owners to be recognised by the company that's what they've got to do, isn't it?

A. Yes, but -- unless they agree it among themselves that they do not want to show that they are owners, and they agree to split the dividends obtained by one of them between themselves without sharing it to the public. And this is exactly what happens between husband and wife as well.

Q. In that event, the company will have no obligation to recognise the person who is not on the register, will it?

A. No, it will not.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And in those circumstances, does the person who is not on the register have a right in rem or just a personal right?

A. Just a personal, ie a contractual, right. And such situations are very widespread. For instance, many foreign companies are not registered in the registers of shareholders of Russian companies but they entrust professional trustees to be registered in registers of Russian companies as the owners, but still they have contractual rights against these legal owners who are registered --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What happens if the professional trustee becomes insolvent? Where is the ownership of the share in that circumstance?

A. That's a big problem from the point of view of Russian law. There were cases where, for instance, Bank of New York was registered as the owner of shares in Gazprom, and Bank of New York issued on these shares depository receipts in the United States, and a claimant in Russia, being an individual, filed a claim against Bank of New York with one of the courts of common jurisdiction in Moscow claiming that Bank of New York owed something to that claimant, and actually the shares in Gazprom owned legally by Bank of New York were seized.

So such situations happen and --

MR SUMPTION: When you say seized, do you mean seized in execution of the claimant's debt?

A. Arrested. Well, not yet. It's just -- all operations with these shares were frozen, and the Bank of New York was prohibited from doing anything with these shares, to dispose of them. So its rights as the owner were limited to only what was absolutely necessary, so to say, to receive dividends for instance but not to vote for instance.

- Q. That result was the consequence, was it, of the fact that the only person recognised as having ownership rights was the registered shareholder and no one else had rights in rem?
- A. Yes. That's correct.
- Q. Now, I wonder if I could ask you to turn in the same bundle to flag 91, which is a decision of the Supreme Arbitrazh Court of the Russian Federation in 2011 about another form of registered title namely title to property, land.

Now, one of the issues considered in this case, as I understand the judgment, was the moment at which a real right came into being, and this case arose out of a partnership agreement. And I think you will get the essence of the issue from paragraph 7 on page 248 G(A)4/6.91/248, and in particular over the page at page 249 G(A)4/6.91/249.

This is dealing with a situation where you have common ownership, in this case arising out of a partnership agreement, but the property, the title to the property has not been registered as being in the common ownership of the partners. You can see that from the first full paragraph on page 249.

Obviously, Dr Rachkov, if I'm overlooking some other relevant part of this judgment you must point that out to me.

A. Maybe you can refer to specific number, is it number 7?

Q. Well, it's part of number 7. If you look at number 7, that's where the analysis begins.

A. Mm-hm.

Q. And if you turn over to page 249 in the English translation, at the first break in the page it says:

"Therefore, if a real property has been created on a land plot that has not been registered as common ownership of the partners... then the ownership right to the newly created... property may on the basis of... the Civil Code only belong to the partner having rights to the said land plot."

As I understand, what's being said there in the context of land is that the land only belongs to the partner whose title has been registered, notwithstanding that there exists a partnership agreement between him and someone else under which this is intended to be common property.

Is that what it is saying?

A. Maybe I can give my own explanation of how I understand this paragraph?

- Q. Yes, by all means.
- A. It looks like there was a simple partnership agreement where one of the partners was the owner of a plot of land. He failed to transfer this plot of land to the common ownership of the partners. The building was erected on this plot of land, and because Russian law requires in principle that the ownership to land and the house are not split, therefore, the owner of this house is that partner.
- Q. If you look at the next paragraph, you will see that:

"If, despite the terms of an agreement [and that's a reference I think to the partnership agreement], a partner that is obligated to contribute leasehold rights to a land plot to the agreement, or to transfer the land plot into the common ownership ... refuses to do so, other parties to such simple partnership agreements may apply to a court demanding enforcement of the said agreement as provided for by... Article 551 of the Civil Code. Courts shall qualify partners' claims worded as claims to recognise ownership rights to a share in the created real property, the creation of which was [the] common goal..."

The next paragraph says:

"In all such cases, [the] courts must proceed from the fact that the ownership right of a partner making a relevant claim shall arise not earlier than the moment of state registration of such right on the basis of a judicial act satisfying such claim..."

Now, as I understand what is being said here, it is that the law is that if you have a right, for example, under a partnership agreement to be registered as the owner of some land, you are not treated as having any right in rem until the moment when that registration occurs. And I think that's very consistent with your previous analysis.

Have I correctly understood what the judgment is saying?

- A. I think you did, and I said before in this court that real estate and transactions with real estate are subject to so-called state registration, whereas shares are subject to private registration, and the state registration is indeed constitutive. You cannot say you are an owner of real estate unless you are registered in the register of real estate by the state authority, not by a private registrar.
- Q. Yes. Well, I understand that the person who keeps the relevant register is the state in the case of land, and a corporate or professional registrar in the case of companies. But the common factor in both situations, surely, is this, which is that there is a law which provides that registration is to be conclusive. In the case of securities, it was Article 2 of the Securities Law of 1996, would you accept that?

A. No.

Q. In spite of the terms of Article 2 of the Law of 1996?

A. Yes.

Q. And in spite of your own evidence that, pending registration, there is no right in rem?

A. I would distinguish between the terms "a right in rem" and the question whether the registration is conclusive or, as I say, constitutive or not. The registration of real estate is constitutive. The right of the owner emerges only with the state registration in the register of real estate.

Q. Dr Rachkov, if you were not the registered owner of shares but claimed to have a legal right to become the registered owner of shares, a situation that we have been discussing over the last half hour or so.

You would ultimately have to produce evidence satisfactory to a Russian court to establish your right, wouldn't you?

A. Yes.

Q. And the evidence satisfactory to a Russian court would, provided that it was a transaction exceeding the relevant value threshold, be written evidence of a right to those shares, wouldn't it? You would have to establish your right by written evidence in a Russian court.

- A. There is no requirement that you must evidence your right to shares only by written evidence. All other types of evidence are taken into account.
- Q. Well, we'll come in due course to Article 161 of the Civil Code, but do you agree that if you were claiming a right to be registered as a shareholder by virtue of a contract, that contract would be governed by Article 161 of the Civil Code provided that it exceeded the minimum value limit specified in that Article; is that correct?
- A. If you refer to the contract, yes, there should be a contract --
- Q. Yes.
- A. -- which can be --
- Q. Ie, a written contract?
- A. The question is whether there must be a written contract or that it is better that there is a written contract. I think that it is better that there is a written contract, but you can -- actually the triggering event to effectuate the registration is not the written contract, it's the transfer order, and a transfer order is a unilateral act which is done by the seller and not a contract.

Q. But to establish your right to make the seller give you a transfer order, you may have to demonstrate that he has contracted to give you or sell you the shares?

A. No.

Q. Well, let us suppose that your right to be registered as the owner of shares is a contractual right, it derives from a contract that you've made with the person who is currently the registered owner. Can we suppose that for a moment. Now, if on that basis you say you are entitled to be registered, then you ask the seller to give you a transfer, and if he says no, you go with your contract to the Russian court, do you not?

A. Yes.

Q. And the Russian court, provided that the value limits exceed the minimum specified in Article 161, will, among other things, apply Article 161 to that contract, will they not?

A. Yes.

Q. I'll come back to Article 161 when I come to deal with that.

Can I, before getting there, ask you to help us on the application of some of the principles you've been giving evidence about to other agreements in issue in this case.

Now, you've acknowledged that the alleged Dorchester House (sic) agreement, which involves a split between legal and beneficial interests, would not be regarded as a valid agreement in Russian law. Could I please ask you to be given bundle K2 and turn to flag 3 at page 8 K2/03/8.

What you're looking at now is the original particulars of claim by which this action was begun. What I want you to look at is page 8, a heading two-thirds of the way down the page, "The claim in relation to Sibneft".

Now, you'll see that in this paragraph Mr Berezovsky's lawyers say:

"At that time [and that's referring to May 2001], the Defendant [Mr Abramovich], through corporate nominees, was the beneficial owner of 43% of the shares in an oil company... Sibneft. In addition, the Defendant, through corporate nominees, was the legal owner of a further 43% of the shares held in Sibneft. Those further shares were held by the Defendant as nominee for and on trust for the Claimant and Mr Patarkatsishvili, each of whom was individually the beneficial owner of 50% of that 43% shareholding."

Now, this situation, the situation that is described in the two sentences which begin "In addition, the Defendant", that is, as I understand your evidence, also a situation which is not conceptually possible in Russian law? Do you agree?

A. I agree.

Q. Now, could you please turn to the next flag, flag 4, which is the next edition of the particulars of claim served by Mr Berezovsky's lawyers.

Paragraph 36 on page 26 K2/04/26 alleges:

"Initially, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili legally owned or controlled companies which controlled and legally owned their proportions of the Sibneft shares. However, as Mr Berezovsky became more heavily involved in politics and while Mr Patarkatsishvili continued to manage ORT, it was decided and agreed between Mr Berezovsky, Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili would be distanced from the... business. Mr Abramovich proposed that all the shares held by Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili should be transferred legally to him or to entities under his ownership or control."

Then in the next paragraph K2/04/27, it is said that it was orally agreed between the three of them by 1996 that:

"Such a transfer would take place."

And, 2:

"Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili would continue beneficially to own the shares so transferred, which would be held on trust for them by Mr Abramovich."

I think it follows from your evidence that that also is a situation which is not conceptually possible in Russian law?

A. I don't know. So maybe some other than Russian companies are referred to?

Q. No, this is Sibneft. This is Sibneft.

A. Yes, I understand, but what is the chain of control between each of these individuals and Sibneft? Were there any offshore, ie non-Russian companies?

Q. What is being said here is that the shares in Sibneft -- just assume what is being said here is that the shares in Sibneft were to be transferred legally -- I'm reading from the top of page 27 of the bundle numbering K2/04/27 -- to Mr Abramovich "or to entities under his ownership or control". These are shares in a Russian company. And that it was agreed that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, see 37(2):

"... would continue beneficially to own the shares so transferred [assume that's shares in Sibneft], which would be held on trust for them by Mr Abramovich."

I think it must follow from your evidence to date that that is also a situation which conceptually Russian law does not countenance?

A. I mean, I can read only what is actually said here, I don't see any reference to, or any contradiction in what is said here and what Russian law says. It might well be that, as I said, there was a long chain of companies, not necessarily Russian ones, between each of these individuals and Sibneft, which I don't know, whereas -- and this may say to me that each of Mr Berezovsky and Patarkatsishvili assumed the obligation to make sure that the shares in companies which control directly or indirectly their shares in Sibneft are transferred under Mr Abramovich's control. It can be both.

Q. I quite understand your point, that it's perfectly possible in Russian law to have a trust of a non-Russian asset, a share in a BVI company, for example. That's not what I'm asking -- I think that's the sort of situation you have in mind and the answer you've just given, isn't it?

A. No. It can be well that the owner of Sibneft shares remained the same throughout all these years, but the shares in that owner belonged to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili before and were transferred under Mr Abramovich's control later on. This is a widespread situation in Russian economy.

Q. Just assume, Dr Rachkov, that under a contract governed by Russian law it is agreed that shares in a Russian company are to be legally transferred to Mr Abramovich but on the basis that they will be held in trust by Mr Abramovich for Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili. Just assume that that is what these paragraphs mean.

On that assumption, which I'm not asking you to confirm because it's quite unfair to ask you to do that, on that assumption, would you agree that that's a situation for which Russian law does not make provision because it's a trust?

A. Well, Russian law is very flexible. If -- the Russian law does not know the word "trust" as such, therefore we need to figure out what exactly the parties may have meant. And if the literal wording of the contract does not allow us to derive the intention of the parties we shall look more intensively on the specific performance of the contract later on, on the correspondence which may or may not have been exchanged between the parties, on the payment orders, if any, on explanations of the parties.

Q. Well, I'll come to the whole subject of explanations, but I thought that one thing we'd established right at the outset of your evidence this afternoon, Dr Rachkov, is that the one thing you can't do in Russian law, even by agreement, is to create legal and beneficial interests, separate legal and beneficial interests in the same property; you agree with that, don't you? You did before.

A. Yes, I agree.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: As I understand it, what you're saying is: if I agree with you that I will hold shares in a Russian company for you, that can be done through a holding company offshore, but not through just holding those shares in the Russian company on trust for the other person; is that what you're saying?

A. I think the situation is very widespread where whilst individuals do not hold shares in Russian companies directly, moreover legally speaking there is nothing which connects them with these companies. There are only trust agreements with some offshore companies, which in turn hold shares in some intermediate sub-holding companies, which in turn hold shares in Russian companies.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, the question that Mr Sumption is putting to you is: forget the structure whereby you've got an offshore company on top of the Russian company, just look at the situation in relation to shares in the Russian company. It couldn't be done, a warehousing type operation of this sort; what is being put to you is that it couldn't be done directly in relation to shares in a Russian company?

- A. I'm afraid I need some further explanation from Mr Sumption on this.

MR SUMPTION: Well, I'm simply applying the logic of the answer that you gave to the very first question that I asked you, Dr Rachkov, which involved drawing your attention to the Dorchester Hotel agreement as alleged by Mr Berezovsky, under which Mr Berezovsky says that there was an agreement under which Mr Abramovich would hold shares in trust for him, for Mr Berezovsky, and Mr Berezovsky would have a beneficial interest in those shares.

You confirmed, it's in your report, that that was conceptually not possible in Russian law. Now, this pleading, which is the original form or an early form of Mr Berezovsky's alleged 1996 agreement, is subject to exactly the same objection, isn't it? It's an allegation that there was an agreement under which Mr Abramovich would legally hold shares but in trust for Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili as beneficial owners.

Now, if that is the allegation, then surely exactly the same applies to this agreement as applies in your evidence to the Dorchester House (sic) agreement, isn't that right?

A. As I understood the documents I was provided with, ie the particulars of claim, as they developed over time, there is a difference between Dorchester agreement and 1996 agreement which is actually --

Q. What you are referring to, Dr Rachkov, is the manner in which Mr Berezovsky amended his case about the 1996 agreement in response to your original report at the time of the striking out application when you pointed out the difficulties that Russian law put in the way of the agreement that he had originally alleged.

Now, I am asking you about this allegation, and this allegation, on the footing that it refers to Sibneft and not to an offshore company, is conceptually just as impossible in Russian law as the Dorchester Hotel agreement alleged by Mr Berezovsky, isn't it?

A. As I said before, since we don't have any written contract in front of us it is difficult for me to say what the parties could have meant when using such words as "trust" and the like.

Indeed, if things are as put by Mr Sumption, it looks like such an agreement wouldn't make sense under Russian law. Under Russian law, you can't split the beneficial and the legal ownership.

MR SUMPTION: Thank you.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Would that be a convenient moment?

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

Don't talk to anybody about your evidence or the case.

Ten minutes.

(3.30 pm)

(A short break)

(3.45 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Sumption.

MR SUMPTION: Dr Rachkov, I want to turn to the so-called 1995 agreement which you have categorised as a joint activity agreement or simple partnership agreement. I think it's common ground that those are two expressions for the same thing, aren't they; joint activity agreement and simple partnership agreement are the same thing?

A. Yes, I prefer to use the term simple partnership contract.

Q. Very well.

Now, when we ask ourselves whether a simple partnership agreement was paid in 1995, can I just confirm with you -- and I don't think there's any dispute about this -- what the legal source material is that is relevant.

Am I right in thinking that part 1 of the Civil Code was in force from 1 January 1995 but part 2 only from 1 January 1996?

A. Yes, this is correct.

Q. Part 1 means Articles 1 to 453?

A. Excuse me, I need to correct myself. You said from 1 January 1996?

Q. Sorry, 1 March. You're the witness, Dr Rachkov. I'm told from my right I should have said 1 March.

A. Excuse me, 1 March 1996.

Q. I'm grateful.

Now, part 1 means Articles 1 to 453, doesn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. And the rest is all part 2?

A. There are more, there are part 3, part 4, but part 1 is 1 through to 453.

Q. Okay. Well now, in relation to an agreement said to have been made in 1995 then, can I just list the legal sources that seem to be relevant. First of all, part 1 of the Civil Code is relevant, is that right?

A. That is correct.

Q. Secondly, the Fundamentals of the Civil Code of 1991 is relevant so far as the matter is not dealt with in part 1 of the Civil Code, is that correct?

A. The Fundamentals of the Civil Legislation of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, yes.

- Q. Yes. That's a 1991 document, isn't it?
- A. This is the document of 31 May 1991.
- Q. Yes, and was that a sort of provisional Civil Code which was in due course intended to be superseded by parts 1, 2 and 3 and so on?
- A. Not really. This was the document which was elaborated by the Soviet Union parliament, and this was a kind of umbrella law for civil codes which were to be elaborated by 15 Soviet republics.
- Q. Right. But as I understand it, if some aspect of a legal right was not dealt with in part 1 of the Civil Code which came into force in 1995, one would refer to the Fundamentals of 1991 to see if you could get an answer from that, is that correct?
- A. That is correct. Plus the old Civil Code of the Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic of 1964 applied to the extent it did not contradict the constitution of the Russian Federation and other laws including Fundamentals of 1991 and the Civil Code of 1994.
- Q. I understand. So, so far as some matter was not dealt with either by part 1 of the Civil Code or by the Fundamentals, and was not contradicted by the constitution or another law, you could refer to the old Civil Code of 1964?

- A. Yes. To the extent it did not contradict the laws, yes.
- Q. Yes. Now, am I right therefore in thinking that part 2 of the Civil Code is irrelevant to an agreement said to have been made in 1995?
- A. Yes, this is correct.
- Q. Now, is it right that in 1995 the general definition of a simple partnership agreement was to be found in Article 122 of the Fundamentals?
- A. Yes, this is correct.
- Q. Can we have a look at that? It's in bundle G(A)2/1, tab 5 G(A)2/1.05/96.
- A. Can I ask someone to bring me the folder?
- Q. This is extracts from the Fundamentals first in Russian and then in English starting at page 96 in the English. Article 122 is at page 96, and that's the article which I referred to a moment ago in my question, and you in your answer, is it not, the general definition that was in force in '95?
- A. Yes.
- Q. As I understand it, this provision was later superseded, but after 1995, by Article 1041 of part 2 of the Civil Code, is that correct?
- A. Yes, this is correct.
- Q. Now, is it right that the classic business partnership as described in, for example, Article 122 of the Fundamentals is an arrangement under which people combine their capital or their business skills to achieve some common business objective?

A. It's not 100 per cent the literal wording. The literal wording is that property and efforts are combined, yes.

Q. The Code, if we look at Article 122 of the Fundamentals, deals with the position of people who act jointly, and I quote, "without the formation of a legal person", ie without the formation of an artificial legal person such as a company, is that right?

A. Yes, this is correct.

Q. Would you agree that the alleged agreement of 1995 in this case was an agreement which did involve the formation and exploitation of a company, Sibneft, which would be owned and controlled according to Mr Berezovsky's allegation by Mr Abramovich, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili; that's the alleged agreement made in 1995, or part of it?

A. I cannot subscribe to that. I understand the particulars of claim in a different way to that.

Q. Well, I'm not going to argue with you about what the particulars of claim say, Dr Rachkov, because that will be a matter for my Lady in due course.

Would you agree that an arrangement to operate a business through a joint stock company is governed not by the law relating to simple partnership agreements but by company law?

A. No, I do not agree. The company law governs the activity of the company itself, it governs to some extent the relations between the company and its shareholders, but it does not govern the relations between the shareholders.

Q. In some respects surely it does, because company law, for example, would determine what constituted a majority decision at a shareholders meeting, wouldn't it?

A. Yes, here I agree.

Q. If we look back at Article 122 of the Fundamentals:

"Joint activity without formation of a legal person may be carried out on the basis of a contract between the participants in such [an] activity."

Now, that's a reference to a simple partnership agreement, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. That excludes, does it not, from the scope of simple partnership agreements, cases in which parties agree to join together to control and invest in the company?

A. What is your question, Mr Sumption, which I need to answer?

Q. What I'm suggesting to you, Dr Rachkov, is that what Article 122 is saying is that simple partnership agreements do not include cases where the parties have come together to form and exploit a business through a company. Would you not agree with that?

- A. I do not agree with that. There is abundant Russian court practice which says that agreements on the formation of legal entities and, more specifically, joint stock companies and limited liability companies are simple partnership agreements.
- Q. What, that every company is a simple partnership agreement? Surely not.
- A. No. Under Russian law, until recently, there was a requirement for the participants in a limited liability company to enter into a so-called foundation agreement. The foundation agreement was one of the two foundation documents, in addition to the charter, and the foundation agreement is an example of a joint activity or a simple partnership agreement. The same is true for joint stock companies.
- Q. If you agree to operate an oil refining business, for example, and three people come together and agree to operate it jointly, pooling their capital and their business skills, that would be a good example of a simple partnership agreement, wouldn't it, or it could be?
- A. Yes, could be.

- Q. If instead of that they agree to incorporate a company which will own the refinery, and simply to participate as shareholders in that company, that's not a simple partnership agreement, is it, because of the express words of Article 122, "without formation of a legal person"?
- A. No, it is not true. The Russian law says only that the simple partners should have a goal which should be lawful, it can be also an economic goal. And in your case I can imagine that the goal is to create the company, maybe also to manage it, maybe also to control, to vote in a specific manner. All this is covered by the simple partnership contract.
- Q. What do the words of Article 122, "without formation of a legal person" mean? What effect do they achieve in your view?
- A. There are two situations in Russian law and practice. The individuals can either engage in economic activity by creating a joint company, a joint venture, which is a legal person, or they can refrain from creating a legal entity and perform the economic activity themselves. If they do create a legal entity then the economic activity is carried out by such legal entity.
- Q. Well, just looking at Article 122, "joint activity" under this article means joint activity without formation of a legal person, doesn't it? If it doesn't mean that, then what limitation is being introduced into Article 122 by the words "without formation of a legal person"?

- A. To answer your question I need to get back to the archives of the Russian Parliament.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can I ask you this question: if you and I agree to go into business and we buy a company off the shelf, and we're 50/50 shareholders, and our relations contractually are governed by the constitution of the company, we haven't got a joint activity contract in those circumstances, have we? We've just agreed to put our business through a company, we're regulating our affairs by virtue of the memorandum of association and the articles of association of the company. You wouldn't say, would you, there was a joint activity contract, a simple partnership agreement in those circumstances, would you?

- A. If we create a company, the company does not exist yet. We enter into a contract with a purpose to create the company. We enter into a so-called foundation agreement. This foundation is recognised by Russian court practice and also legal literature as a simple partnership agreement. Once the company is established, it may happen that our joint venture or joint activity was completed by this so we are now shareholders in that company and --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And thereafter there's no joint activity agreement?

A. Well it depends on the provisions of the contract, what exactly is said there.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay. Say you and I don't agree to form a company but you already own a company 100 per cent and I buy in, or you sell me 50 per cent of the company, and we enter into a shareholders agreement as to how we shall vote and how we will appoint directors as between us. Is the shareholders agreement, whereby you and I contractually agree how we're going to vote directors, what transactions the company will and won't do, is that a joint activity contract?

A. It's a very good example of a joint activity agreement.

MR SUMPTION: Well, I'm puzzled by that, Dr Rachkov, because I thought this was common ground.

Would you take your fourth report, please, in bundle G(A)1/1, you may still have it in front of you, and turn to paragraph 164. This is G(A)1/1.01/57.

A. Can you repeat the number of the paragraph, please?

Q. It's bundle G(A)1/1, flag 1, page 57 in the bundle numbering.

You see, I would suggest to you that a foundation agreement governing the creation or operation of a company is not an example of a simple partnership agreement, and I had thought that this is something that you were pointing out at paragraph 164. Would you like to look at paragraph 164 of your fourth report, have you got that?

A. Yes.

Q. What you seem to say here is that:

"Where the parties agree to combine their contributions by forming a legal entity (such as joint stock company or a full partnership), they make a different type of contract."

Now, a simple partnership is not a legal entity, is it?

A. A simple partnership is not a legal entity.

Q. No. So:

You quote Professors Braginsky and Vitriansky in their leading textbook on contract law where they describe the subject of a partnership contract as follows:

"Article 276 of the 1922 Civil Code and Article 1041 of the current Civil Code ..."

Now 1041 I think you've confirmed is the current version of what was in 122 of the Fundamentals, and has the same reference to not including a legal entity, doesn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. And the citation you have in your paragraph:

"Article 276 of the 1922 Civil Code and Article 1041 of the current Civil Code confirm the characteristic features of a simple partnership contract: in the 1922 Code, the combining of contributions, and in the current Code, the combining of contributions and the fact that the joint activity is carried out without forming a legal person. The absence of either of these indicators prevents the parties' contract from being deemed to be a simple partnership contract."

Now, what that textbook extract is saying, surely, is that if you don't have a situation where there is no legal person, ie if you do have a legal person, you haven't got a simple partnership contract; isn't that what it's saying?

A. Indeed at the first glance you can come to this conclusion, but as a matter of law and practice it is not correct.

- Q. Well, the governing principles of law in Russia, as in I think all civil law countries, are to be found in the various codes, are they not? And it's the duty of the courts to apply the codes?

Now, you say "at the first glance" my interpretation of Article 122 and this textbook is correct. Is the position any different at second or third glance?

If you look at what the Code actually says, and what authoritative textbook writers have said about its meaning, you have to conclude that if the activity is carried out through a legal entity it's not a simple partnership agreement, don't you?

- A. No. If the activity is carried out in order to form or to manage or to control a legal entity, for instance a limited liability company of Russian law or joint stock company of Russian law, this is a simple partnership contract.

- Q. When you said that at first glance this textbook is indicating the opposite, how are we to read it at second glance?

- A. Probably taking a look at the context in which these words are said.

- Q. Well, I'm just looking at what appears to be a proposition of law derived from Article 1041 of the current Civil Code, which is the equivalent of Article 122 of the Fundamentals. What's wrong with the statement of the law that we see in the textbook that you have quoted?

A. The fact that the parties to a simple partnership contract are shareholders of a legal entity which is formed as a result of such joint activity does not mean that there is no simple partnership contract. The creation of a legal entity is the result of the joint activity.

Q. So do you say that the law formulated in this extract from the textbook is wrong?

A. The textbook is not a source of the law. The textbook is only an interpretation of what the law says.

Q. Do you say that the interpretation is wrong?

A. The interpretation is contained in the context and, as I said, from the context of this textbook it follows that the authors of this textbook means exactly what I said.

Q. Are you distinguishing, Dr Rachkov, between an agreement to form a company and an agreement to operate a business owned by a company? Are you making that distinction?

A. No, not really.

Q. I see. So if two parties come together and say: we will acquire half each of an existing company that owns a refinery and we will cause the company to operate that refinery and to make profits which we will then declare in dividends and distribute 50/50 between each of us, are you saying that's a simple partnership agreement?

- A. It all depends on the details which are contained in the contract. If the parties combined their efforts, their skills, their reputation, if they acted together to achieve this goal, if this goal was lawful, if this goal was finally achieved, that is a simple partnership contract.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay, well, take the example

Mr Sumption has just put to you, because I'm not understanding this, just take the simple example there. As I understand your evidence, you're saying that until the company has been acquired or until the company has been formed there is a joint activity agreement. But what about once the company has been acquired, so the two parties have acted together, they've acquired the company, from there on in the activity is generating the profits of the business through the company. At that stage in time is there still a joint activity agreement?

- A. There can well be a joint activity agreement.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, not whether there can well be. Is there, just in the simple example that you've been given, where parties agree together that they will combine together to acquire a company, they acquire the company, no more agreement because they've acquired it; in those circumstances is there, going forward, a joint activity agreement?

A. Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Why?

A. Because the parties combined their efforts to achieve a lawful goal, and they did so.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Even in circumstances where there's no agreement going forward governing their relations together?

A. The goal can be just acquisition of control or a certain stake in the company. It can also be acquisition of a certain stake in the company plus management of some business of the company afterwards.

MR SUMPTION: Well, Dr Rachkov --

A. Russian law is very flexible in terms of what the parties can agree on.

Q. Doctor Rachkov, I'm bound to suggest to you that this view is not consistent with Article 122 of the Fundamentals; it's not consistent with the textbook which you've quoted in your report; and it's not consistent with your own gloss in paragraphs 164 and 165 where the absence of a legal person, in all three places, is treated as a critical indication of whether there is a joint activity agreement or not.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You're being asked about the first sentence of paragraph 164.

A. Yes.

MR SUMPTION: And the first sentence of 165.

A. The first sentence reads:

"Where the parties agree to combine their contributions by forming a legal entity (such as joint stock company or a full partnership), they make a different type of contract."

As I said, if the parties intend to achieve a lawful goal, ie a goal which is not contrary to the law, and if they combine their efforts, and if they achieve this goal, this is a simple partnership agreement.

The first paragraph, or first sentence of 165 reads:

"As I have explained, if the parties' agreement does not match these characteristics, they have not concluded a partnership [agreement]."

Q. One of the characteristics you are referring to there is that the activity is carried on without forming a legal person. Isn't that right?

A. No, it is not correct.

Q. We may have to study that for ourselves.

I'd like to turn to the question of certainty. The first head which I'd like to ask you about is the requirements for a valid agreement as to the partnership share, by which I mean the share that each party has in a simple partnership agreement if they intend to form one. That's the subject I'm going to ask you about now.

Now, I think you agree, don't you, that for a simple partnership agreement to be valid the essential terms have got to be agreed?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, I think you also agree with the other two experts that these essential terms include the predmet or subject matter of the contract, is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, your evidence is, and this is recorded in the joint memorandum, and you agree with the other experts on this, that the predmet means the obligations flowing from the contract, is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. As I understand it, correct me if I'm wrong, the principle is that those obligations have got to be agreed with sufficient precision to enable a court to enforce the obligations in question. That's the essential test, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. We have seen earlier, when we looked at the question of common ownership, that it can be of two kinds: common ownership in defined shares, or joint ownership. Do you remember we discussed that a while ago?

A. I remember.

Q. Now, is it right that in Russian law you cannot have joint ownership except in cases where specific provision is made for joint ownership by legislation?

A. Yes.

Q. And does it follow therefore that, except in cases specifically provided for by legislation, the only possible form of common ownership involves defined shares?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, I understand that you accept that there is no relevant legislation providing for joint ownership in this case?

A. I agree.

Q. And can we take it, therefore, that partnerships involve a form of common ownership characterised by defined shares?

A. Yes.

Q. Would you agree that the proportionate shares that each partner is to have in a proposed simple partnership agreement is one of the matters that has got to be agreed if that agreement is to be validly concluded?

A. Not necessarily.

Q. When you say not necessarily, one would have thought that whether you have to agree the size of each party's proportionate share is a question that should be answered either yes or no. But your answer is maybe?

A. My answer is no.

Q. Your answer is no. I see.

Now, if there is no agreement about what the partnership shares are to be, how does the court enforce the distribution of partnership profits?

A. The term which must be defined is what shall be contributed. On the basis of this term, as well as on the basis of the performance, the court is in a position to identify the shares in the joint ownership.

Q. Well, I will come to the question of looking at the contributions.

As I understand it, there are circumstances in which you can infer from the parties' contributions what the agreement as to their respective shares was. Is that correct?

A. This is correct.

Q. And that's what you're talking about, isn't it, when you talk about the contributions?

A. Yes, because, as I said, the simple partnership contract presumes that the partners combine their efforts, for instance.

Q. Well now, let me put a hypothetical case to you.

Suppose that the parties intend to enter into a simple partnership agreement to operate a business but they do not reach agreement about what their respective partnership shares are to be. A year after they have begun this business, before any distributions have been made, there is an argument about what the distributed shares are to be.

Now, you say that the court in that situation would look at what they each contributed, is that right?

A. Yes.

Q. If they each contributed things of indeterminate value, such as business skills, how does the court set about doing that?

A. This is the question which should be assessed by appraisers, not by lawyers.

Q. I see. So you put a monetary value on their respective contributions, do you?

A. If these efforts do have such value, yes.

Q. I see. Does it follow from this that if you have a simple partnership agreement to acquire and exploit shares in a company, and one of the partners pays 100 per cent of the cost of acquiring those shares, he will be treated as having a 100 per cent share?

A. No, I don't think so.

Q. Why doesn't that follow from what you've just told us?

Let us suppose that you have a simple partnership agreement to acquire and exploit shares in a company, something which you, contrary to our position, say is perfectly possible. Now, if one of the partners is the only person who puts up the money and the only person who acquires the shares, then when the court comes to look at the value of their respective contributions, will it not decide that that partner is alone entitled to 100 per cent?

A. No, the court must decide what the other party contributed.

Q. Well, I'm asking you to assume they contributed nothing.

A. Then the other partner who contributed something is entitled to request that the other party contributes something which that party was obliged to contribute.

Q. Well, if they haven't reached an agreement about that, what does he ask him to contribute?

A. As I said, the contributions must be agreed upon, and on the basis of the contributions you distinguish or determine the shares which each of the partners have in their common ownership, in shared ownership.

Q. Would you look in your fourth report, please, at paragraph 167. This is under the heading which we see at page 57 of the bundle numbering, "Essential terms for a partnership contract" G(A)1/1.01/58. Now, you quote here Professor Sukhanov, the author of a textbook who "confirms that the essential terms for a partnership contract are those that I have described above".

Above in the previous paragraph, I think you're referring to the concept of contributions, joint activity and, 4:

"... if the agreement is to be a partnership contract, it is essential that the parties should combine their contributions."

Sukhanov says:

"The essential terms of a simple partnership contract are those on:

"Joining of contributions;

"Joint activity of the partners;

"A common goal, at whose achievement these actions are directed."

You say it's quite unnecessary for the parties to have agreed in what shares they are to own the resultant common assets, is that right?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, could you please take bundle G(A)4/6.

My Lady, is your Ladyship willing to go on until 4.30?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I was going to go on until 4.30 or a suitable break thereafter.

MR SUMPTION: I will be guided by that.

If you could just take bundle G(A)4/6 and turn to flag 63, Dr Rachkov, which is an extract from Professor Sukhanov's textbook, and the bit that you have quoted in your report is the part immediately under the heading "Terms of a simple partnership agreement" G(A)4/6.63/69. That's right, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, if you just turn over the page G(A)4/6.63/70:

"The term on unification of the contributions must contain information about [the] type of proprietary or other benefit, comprising the contribution of a participant, as well as [the] amount and monetary evaluation of contribution with determination of share of each participant in common property."

Now, Professor Sukhanov is pointing out, isn't he, that you not only have to agree the contribution that you're going to make in property or effort but you have got to agree the amount and monetary evaluation of that contribution and to determine the share of each participant in the resultant common property. Is that not what he is saying?

A. This is what Professor Sukhanov believes.

Q. Yes. Now, Professor Sukhanov is a well-known authority on this area, is he not?

A. He is.

Q. Yes, and you have quoted him in your report for that reason. But it's not right, is it, that Professor Sukhanov thinks that the only things that need to be agreed for a valid simple partnership agreement are the three matters which are identified in your report and in the first paragraph on page 69 G(A)4/6.63/69? Hence the paragraph I've just referred you to.

A. Yes.

Q. You agree?

A. Excuse me, with what?

Q. It is not right, is it -- if you look at the first paragraph under the heading "Terms of a simple partnership", the one that you quote in your report, it's not right that Professor Sukhanov thinks that the three things referred to here: merging of contributions, joint actions of the partners and the general purpose, are all that have to be agreed in order to make a valid simple partnership agreement. As you've just confirmed, Professor Sukhanov's view is that you must also agree the amount and monetary evaluation of the contributions and determine the share of the resultant common property?

A. I explained in one of my reports that this is a so-called "nice-to-have" provision. It is not a "must" provision because Professor Sukhanov clearly distinguishes between material terms or substantial essential terms of the simple partnership contract which are listed in an exhaustive way in the beginning of this quotation, and he does not say that the condition on the appraisal of the shares is an essential term. So therefore I disagree with your opinion.

Q. The word "must" is his word. If you look at that final paragraph in the section which has been translated here:

"The term on unification of the contributions must contain information about type of proprietary or other benefit, comprising the contribution of a participant, as well as [the] amount and monetary evaluation of [the] contribution with determination of share of each participant in common property."

All of that is mandatory in Professor Sukhanov's view, isn't it?

A. No, it is not. It sounds like this but it is not and, besides, there is court practice to which I refer in my reports and Professor Sukhanov is not a judge which says that if the condition on the appraisal of the shares is missing, it does not necessarily mean that the simple partnership agreement was not concluded or is invalid or has another error or mistake in it. And, besides, I would like to draw the attention of my Lady to a citation in Sukhanov and this is right after the beginning of this three essential terms where Sukhanov says G(A)4/6.63/69:

"For certain kinds of simple partnership agreements, the list of material terms may be expanded by law. For instance, under Article 98 of the Civil Code and Article 9 of the Law on Joint-Stock Companies, a joint venture agreement on the formation of a joint-stock company must specify terms regarding..."

And then there is a continuation of what Professor Sukhanov thinks, so that's the example which shows to you that agreements on formation of legal entities are simple partnership contracts. Sorry for getting back to this topic again but I think it was quite important for Mr Sumption.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Which you say illustrates the point you were making earlier?

A. Yes, correct.

MR SUMPTION: Professor Sukhanov obviously considers that there are also, in addition to mandatory requirements, there are "nice-to-have" requirements but the requirements that he summarises at page 70 of the bundle G(A)4/6.63/70, this is a paragraph in which he is summarising what the term on unification of the contributions must contain. The term on unification of the contributions is the first of the three essential terms that he refers to right up in the first paragraph, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. The merging of contributions is the first absolute requirement and, in the last paragraph of the extract, what he is doing is explaining what the term on the merging of contributions, an essential term, has got to contain, isn't he?

A. Yes, but what is the purpose of this regulation? The purpose is to make sure that the parties know what they must perform. If the parties already performed their obligations, there is no dispute any longer about what they were obliged to contribute. Therefore, this case to which you and Professor Sukhanov refer is different from the case at hand.

Q. But if you make a simple partnership agreement and before you've started to perform it you go to a lawyer and say, "Is this a valid agreement?", the lawyer will say, "Well, unless you have specified the shares of the resultant common property and agreed a monetary evaluation of your contributions, no, it's not a valid agreement". Isn't that right?

A. No, it is not right. It is important to identify the contributions, not the shares -- not the appraisal of the shares, not the appraisal of the contributions because they can be derived on the basis of default rules contained in the Civil Code and regulating simple partnership contracts.

Q. Well, we'll come to the default rules in a moment.

Now, suppose that the agreement which the parties made in 1995 was that the partnership shares should be 50 per cent for Mr Abramovich and 50 per cent for Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili jointly. Just suppose that that was what was agreed, okay?

A. Okay.

Q. Now, I think you accept, don't you, given your earlier answers, that Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky could not validly have agreed to hold their partnership share jointly, because this isn't a case which is provided for by legislation?

A. I agree.

Q. Now, would you accept therefore that, if the parties have expressly agreed that the interest of two out of three partners is to be joint, then there is no basis on which it can be treated in Russian law as an agreement for defined shares?

A. It's --

- Q. If they've expressly agreed that the interests of the two of them in a partnership is to be joint, they've simply entered into an ineffective agreement, haven't they?
- A. I do not agree with that.
- Q. Do you say that if they have expressly agreed that their interest is to be joint, nevertheless by law it can be treated as a share agreement in the language of Article 244, a defined share agreement?
- A. As I understood the particulars of claims --
- Q. I'm not asking you to express an opinion on the particulars of claim, I'm putting to you a hypothesis, okay? And the hypothesis I'm putting to you is that these three people have expressly agreed that Mr Abramovich is to have a 50 per cent interest in a partnership agreement and that the other 50 per cent interest is to be held by Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili jointly.
- Now, if my Lady were to find that that is what had been expressly agreed, do you accept that that is an ineffective agreement?
- A. It depends on the parties' intention. If the parties intended to have common and not shared ownership, then indeed this is an invalid agreement.
- Q. Thank you.

My Lady, I suspect that rather than embarking on the next question, your Ladyship might wish to rise now.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well.

Wednesday, Mr Rabinowitz, arrangements can be made, as far as I understand it, to sit.

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed, and I understand the transcript writers can be here as well, my Lady. So Mr Sumption is here, your Ladyship is here, Mr Rozenberg and myself are here.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That's subject to any wider considerations of whether the courts will be open but as I understand at present -- but I'll let you know tomorrow.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm grateful, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But you should work on the basis that the court will be sitting. Very well.

You understand that you're not to talk about your evidence or the answers you've given or the case overnight.

THE WITNESS: Yes, my Lady, I do.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You understand that. Very well.

Thank you very much. 10.15 tomorrow.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Sumption.

DR ILIA RACHKOV (continued)

MR SUMPTION: Good morning, Dr Rachkov.

When we broke yesterday, I was asking you about the implications for simple partnership agreements of the rules about common ownership. I think we'd established that if one is going to have a simple partnership agreement, that could only validly be achieved by doing it in defined shares. You can't have joint ownership. That's right, isn't it?

A. We discussed what are the essential terms of the simple partnership contract, and I confirmed that it is important to make a concluded simple partnership contract to agree on the contribution which are aimed at achievement of a lawful goal.

Q. Yes. But I think you also accept, don't you, that joint ownership of assets is possible only in cases where it's provided for by legislation which do not include partnership cases?

A. That is correct.

Q. So that if you have a simple partnership agreement, the partnership assets have got to be held in defined shares, not jointly; the other form of common ownership?

A. The shares must not be defined from the very beginning but they can be defined by application of Russian law.

Q. Well --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: When you say "must", you mean do not need to be, do you?

A. Do not need to be.

MR SUMPTION: So you're suggesting, are you, that it's possible for the parties to make an agreement that they will have defined shares but without saying what those shares are?

A. No, I'm not saying this.

Q. In that case I don't quite follow what you are saying.

Suppose that three parties come together and decide to have a simple partnership agreement. Now, their shares in the partnership assets can't be joint, I think we've established that; they have got to be what in Article 244 is called share ownership, ie ownership of a share, isn't that right?

A. Yes, the property which the parties contribute or which arises as a result of their joint activity must be their shared ownership.

Q. Now, for that purpose surely the parties have got to agree what their shares are going to be?

A. I disagree with that statement.

- Q. Well now, let's suppose that three parties come together and make an agreement to have a partnership but they do not agree what their shares are going to be, okay? And let's suppose that before they've done anything else, they come to you as their legal advisers and say, "Is this a valid agreement?" What's your advice?
- A. I will ask them whether or not they defined the contributions, not the shares.
- Q. All right.
- A. Is what is the property, or are there efforts which they would like to unify to pursue their joint activity?
- Q. And suppose they tell you that the answer to that question is that they're not contributing anything in money, they are simply contributing their various skills, and they don't yet know what the value of those skills will be, it will all depend on how the business turns out. What advice do you give them?
- A. I will ask what the goal of their joint activity is, and, if they do not contribute any money or other tangible assets, that this is the goal which governs what they must do. If they are professionals, they do well understand what must be done, what is necessary and sufficient, to achieve this goal.
- Q. Well, that's not always the case, is it? Let's take the facts as alleged in this particular dispute, Dr Rachkov.

You have an agreement, according to Mr Berezovsky, that his contribution is going to be in the form of lobbying and raising money, but you have no agreement about how much lobbying is going to be required, how much money is going to be raised, how long it's going to take and so on.

So in that situation, how do the parties establish what the relative value of their contributions is?

- A. The old Roman said "sapienti sat". This means that those who are professionals, they do understand well, they do it not for the first time, I guess, what should be done to achieve the goal.

In this particular case I think the goal was quite clear, this was establishment of Sibneft as a legal entity and privatisation of its shares with a particular result, and the result is that the control over Sibneft is jointly held by those two or three persons who are the partners to the joint activity contract. This means that each of them was under the obligation to do whatever is objectively necessary and sufficient, as I said, to achieve this particular goal.

And this is the case with all contracts which deal with nontangible assets or nontangible property, if you wish, which are not things or money. You cannot predict from the very beginning what each of the parties shall do each single day. There are virtually no self-executing agreements, neither in Russian law nor in English law. That's why a reference must be made to performance on the one hand and to default rules of Russian law on the other hand.

Q. I will come to the question of default rules in a moment, but if you cannot predict how much work and how much skill and effort will be required of each of the partners, you cannot, I suggest, know what their shares will be if you are allowed to have a valid partnership agreement in which the shares depend entirely on what's going to be put into the enterprise. Do you follow my question?

A. I do follow your question, Mr Sumption. I insist that there is a big difference between the terms "contributions" and "shares", and the cases on which I base my opinion, which we can have a look at if you wish, they say that in many cases the parties unified their efforts without saying for sure what exactly must be done.

Whatever is necessary and sufficient to achieve a proper, lawful, economic goal must be done by each of the partners. That's my opinion.

Q. If the position is that the parties do not agree their respective shares in the common property and cannot predict in advance how much work will be required of each of them, I suggest that there is no way in which you could advise them, the day after they had made their agreement, whether it was valid or not. What do you say?

- A. If your question is about how I would advise the simple partners or the future simple partners, of course I, as a practising lawyer, would prepare a written agreement which spells out as many details as possible, which is very clear and very detailed and spelled out so that everybody knows what exactly must be performed.

However, if the performance shows what exactly they did, and nobody objected against, what is the problem?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can I just be clear. Is this a summary of your propositions: there's no necessity to quantify the contributions from the start because the parties or the partners have got to do whatever is necessary to achieve the economic goal. And there's no necessity to fix the shares in the partnership assets from the start?

- A. Correct, my Lady, with one small caveat. If the partners agreed to unify money or maybe other tangible property, maybe this is important to say, at least either what is the total amount of the money which is necessary to run the joint activity, for instance, they agree that the total fund available to the joint activity must be 100 rubles, and there are only two partners, then default rules of Russian law allow to determine that each of them must contribute 50 rubles.

The other possibility is that they agree that the funds available must be 100 rubles but they do not agree -- sorry, the amount, they did not agree on the total amount, but there are two partners and the share of one partner or the contribution of one partner is clearly defined, 50 rubles. This means that the other party must also contribute 50 rubles. That's how Russian law operates.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, my question to you was, am I to record your first proposition as being that there is no necessity to quantify the contributions from the start?

A. In this particular case, it is not necessary.

MR SUMPTION: Dr Rachkov, what I suggest to you is that, if you do not sufficiently define in advance either your shares in the common property or the amount that each party is going to put in, you do not have a valid partnership agreement. I think you reject that proposition, do you?

A. Having regard to what I said before, I only agree that the contributions must be not defined, but the parties must agree to contribute something. In this particular case they contributed their efforts, their business skills, business reputation rather than money. This means that each party was under the obligation to do whatever is necessary and required objectively to achieve this lawful economic goal.

- Q. Now, you mentioned default provisions and there is a default provision of the Civil Code, is there not, providing that in the absence of agreement shares are treated as equal?
- A. Yes, not only shares but also contributions are treated equal. "Contributions" is translated into Russian as "vznosy". Before you have a share, you have to have the contributions.
- Q. Contributions; which article of the Civil Code are you thinking of, 1041?
- A. I refer more to the Russian legal literature to which I referred in my reports, which indicates that, in accordance with the Civil Code of 1964 and in accordance with the fundamentals, unless the parties otherwise agreed, their contributions were to be equal.
- Q. I'll go back to that issue because I certainly can't find that in those parts of the Civil Code but we'll come back to it.

Can I ask you to look at Article 245, which is at G(A)4/4.02/45. Now, is sub-article 1 the relevant default provision regarding the parties' respective shares in the common property?

A. Correct.

Q. That provides that:

Now, do you agree that the default provision, that default provision, cannot apply where the parties have expressly agreed that their shares in the common property are not to be equal?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, if there is an agreement between all the partners that the partnership shares are not to be equal, but no agreement between all the partners about what their unequal shares are to be, would you agree that the default provision cannot help?

A. I would not agree. I would like to refer to the information letter of the Presidium of the highest arbitrazh court, or Supreme Arbitrazh Court, as you may call it, of the Russian Federation, which I used in my report. It says -- actually it deals with the following case --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Hang on, can I just have the paragraph in your report?

A. I need then my reports, please.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just because I would like to --

MR SUMPTION: Yes, I think it would be helpful if you kept the volume with your reports open in front of you so you can refer to it whenever you need to.

A. Thank you for your recommendation.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Are we in your fourth report?

A. I am now looking at my reports just to make sure that I find the proper information letter.

(Pause)

This is my fourth report, paragraph 178

G(A)1/1.01/61.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

A. And there, in paragraph 2 of the information letter, the Presidium of the Supreme Arbitrazh Court of the Russian Federation had to do with the case where two parties allegedly agreed on their shares in the shared property. Later on they contributed maybe the property, which deviated from this initial agreement, and the court had difficulties with defining the shares. And the court of the first instance said, based on especially Article 245 of the Civil Code, the shares are equal.

The court of the upper instance, however, indicated that the court of the lower instance must determine what exactly was contributed, what is the valuation of this, and only if it is impossible to define it then the shares are deemed equal. That's shortly what the court says.

MR SUMPTION: Well, Dr Rachkov, I was trying to establish with your assistance how helpful Article 245.1 is in a situation where the parties have expressly agreed that the shares are not to be equal.

Now, do you agree that if the parties have expressly agreed that the shares are not to be equal then you cannot apply a default rule which says that they are to be equal?

A. No, I do not agree. In the case to which I refer, the parties also argued before the court that their shares were unequal.

Q. Well, would you please look at the provisions of the Code which you quote in the previous paragraph of your report, paragraph 177 G(A)1/1.01/61. Do you see the reference to Article 1042 which in fact came into force in the following year?

"The contributions of partners shall be assumed equal in value unless otherwise follows from the contract of simple partnership or the circumstances of the case."

Now, do you agree that under Article 1042, if the terms of the parties' agreement or the circumstances of the case show that the contributions here are not to be equal, then the result is that the default rule does not apply?

A. I think the wording of Article 1042 is self-explanatory and says just what it says.

Q. Well, that's not terribly helpful of you, Dr Rachkov, I want to understand whether you say, in the case of contributions and a contract governed by Article 1042, if the parties or the circumstances show -- sorry, if the agreement or the circumstances show that the parties intended that the contributions should not be equal, then the default rule doesn't apply.

On the face of it, that's what Article 1042 says, do you disagree?

A. No, I cannot deny what Article 1042.2 says. You are right, if the parties agreed from the very beginning that their shares must be unequal, their shares must be unequal, and they must contribute the property which is in accordance with this agreement.

Q. And would you accept that that is a feature of all of these default terms relating to partnership terms: default terms are terms that apply in the absence of agreement on something else, isn't that right?

A. In principle that's correct, yes.

- Q. So if the parties have agreed that their shares in the common property are not to be equal, you can't apply a default term which says that they are; that must follow surely?
- A. If the parties said that their shares are not equal but did not agree what exactly their shares are, then the default rules apply.
- Q. Well, let's have a look at the information letter which you referred to a moment ago and which you refer to in your report. You'll find it in bundle G(A)2/1 at flag 19 G(A)2/1.19/239.
- Now, is this the case that you were referring to, or the information letter you were referring to?
- A. Yes, this is the information letter I'm referring to.
- Q. Do you accept that this information letter was not dealing with a case where the parties had agreed or the circumstances showed that the shares in the common property were not to be equal? That's not the situation that was being considered?
- A. It can be both. The description of the case does not say it correctly. The description says, however, that both parties insisted in the first instance that the shares are not equal. This may be an index to the fact that they agreed that the shares should be not equal.
- Q. That's a reference to the submission that they were making to the court, isn't it? It's not a reference to the terms that they had originally agreed?

A. Since I didn't see the contract, I cannot insist that they agreed for sure that their shares must be equal or not equal.

Q. Now, if you look at the reasoning, and I'm looking at the English text on page 241 G(A)2/1.19/241, you will see that they refer to 1042 of the Civil Code, which was the relevant provision at that time, and to 245.1 as well, that is about a third of the way down on page 241; do you see that?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. They then say in the paragraph that immediately follows that reference:

"The cassation court overruled this decision and sent the case back for reconsideration by the lower court to determine the amounts of [the] contributions ... The court stated that in accordance with Article 1043 of the Civil Code, the property contributed by [the] participants of the contract, and [the] products resulting from the joint activity, are treated as shared property unless otherwise stipulated by the law or the joint activity contract or unless otherwise follows from the nature of the obligation."

So are they saying that if the agreement or the circumstances show that the shares were not to be equal then 1043 would not apply? That's what they're saying, isn't it?

A. No, I think that one paragraph below you will see that -- this is just -- well, I need to refer to English translation, sorry:

"The court lawfully decided that the transformation station is an object of common shared property of the parties, and the shares of the parties shall be determined with reference to Article 245 of the Civil Code."

Q. Yes, well, that was what they decided in that case, but the general principle is set out in the previous paragraph, which is that you apply 1043 unless the parties have agreed otherwise or the circumstances show that it was not intended that they should be equal. That's the principle that's being applied, isn't it? And in this case, they were equal because the parties in the circumstances didn't suggest otherwise?

A. Pardon me, can you please repeat the question?

Q. If you look at the paragraph immediately under the reference to Articles 245.1 and 1042 --

A. Yes.

Q. -- that is setting out the principle, isn't it, namely that 1043, which is one of the default provisions, applies:

"... unless otherwise stipulated by the law or the joint activity contract or unless otherwise follows from the nature of the obligation."

So the principle that is being applied here, surely, is you apply the default provision unless the terms of the agreement or the circumstances show it was not intended that they should be equal. That's what's being said, do you agree?

A. I think I agree, yes.

Q. Right. If you look at the final paragraph on this page:

"Where monetary assessment of contributions of the parties is impossible, and the parties did not reach ... agreement on this issue, it is to be assumed ... in accordance with Article 1042 and Article 245... the contributions of the participants and the shares in ownership of common shared property are deemed equal."

That again is qualified by saying "where the parties did not reach an agreement on this issue", isn't it?

A. Yes. And in this particular case, if you have a look at the paragraph which is at -- third paragraph from the bottom, there is an indication that in this particular case the parties did not agree on how to determine their shares. That's why --

Q. Yes.

- A. -- the court must apply in this case 245 and 1042.
- Q. Now, if you take a case different from the one referred to in this information letter, where the parties have agreed that the partnership shares are not to be equal but haven't agreed on what their unequal shares are to be, one thing seems clear, and that's that you can't apply the default provision, isn't that right?
- A. It depends on the specific situation we are speaking about. I cannot answer your question with "yes" or "no".
- Q. Well now, suppose that Mr Abramovich, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili had agreed in 1995 that Mr Abramovich was to have 50 per cent and that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were to have 50 per cent between them held in common, but with no agreement about how Mr Berezovsky's and Mr Patarkatsishvili's 50 per cent was to be divided up between the two of them.
- Do you follow what I'm asking you to assume?
- A. I do follow.
- Q. Right. Now, do you agree that in that situation there would be no agreement about the partnership shares of anybody other than Mr Abramovich?
- A. Yes, Mr Abramovich's shares would be defined.
- Q. And do you agree that the default provision could not be applied in that situation because the parties would have expressly agreed upon an unequal share since each of Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky would necessarily have less than Mr Abramovich; do you agree?

A. No, I don't agree, I think here the default rule applies. Unless you can prove that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili agreed on other distribution of their shares than 25/25 per cent, the rule is that their shares are equal, based on Article 1042 and 245 of the Civil Code.

Q. That would mean, would it not, that each of the three of them was to have 33 and a third per cent of the common property, that would be the effect of the default rule, wouldn't it?

A. If the parties did not agree on their shares then indeed each participant or each partner would have one third in that shared property.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think you're at cross-purposes.

MR SUMPTION: I think I may be.

Let us go back to my hypothesis. The hypothesis I'm asking you to assume is that Mr Abramovich was going to have by agreement 50 per cent, and Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were going to have 50 per cent between them but with no agreement about how much each of Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were going to have individually. Do you understand?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Now, in that situation, do you say that the default rule would apply so that they each get a third or not?

A. No.

Q. No. So what do you say the default rule means in that situation?

A. The default rule is that, if we have three simple partners out of which the share of only one partner is defined, and this share is 50 per cent, then the remaining 50 per cent are allocated to each of the two remaining partners in equal shares.

Q. Well, that is not what Article 245, the relevant default rule, appears to say, does it?

A. I think it does.

Q. What it says is that:

"Shares shall be considered equal if the shares of the participants in share ownership cannot be determined on the basis of a statute and have not been established by agreement of all its participants."

If you have a single agreement between three people, and that agreement provides that two of them are to get less than the third, but it doesn't say how much, you can't apply the default rule just to the two whose shares are not defined, can you?

- A. I think I can.
- Q. Well, do you accept, I think you do, that a partnership, a simple partnership, is not a legal entity?
- A. A simple partnership is not a legal entity.
- Q. Does it follow from that that a partnership as such cannot be a partner in another partnership?
- A. Say it again, please.
- Q. A partnership as such cannot be a partner in another partnership?
- A. I'm not sure, I did not check this question. I don't see any reason why it should not.
- Q. Well, if Mr Abramovich, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili entered into a simple partnership agreement, wouldn't it have to be on the basis that the partnership comprised the three of them individually, because any partnership that might exist between Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili would not itself be a legal entity?
- A. The question consists of two parts. Maybe you can split it and then I can answer each of them.
- Q. Well, if Mr Abramovich, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili entered into a simple partnership agreement, would it not have to be on the basis that the partnership comprised the three of them individually?
- A. That's the most logical answer, yes.

- Q. Well, is there any other answer?
- A. There can be also other answers.
- Q. What other answers that are at least arguably relevant to this case?
- A. It can -- I can imagine, but this is also a more hypothetical idea of me, that a simple partnership which is not disclosed to a third partner enters into such an agreement.
- Q. You see, Dr Rachkov, if you have a single partnership agreement between three individuals, Mr Abramovich, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, and the individual shares of only one of them is defined, then I would suggest that there is no agreement about the shares of all three partners, and no default rule that is capable of being applied unless you treat as the other partner to Mr Abramovich a separate partnership comprising Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky.
- A. Is this a question?
- Q. Yes, that's what I am suggesting to you. What is your comment on that?
- A. My comment is that if three individuals entered into simple partnership contract and, in this simple partnership contract, the share of only one of them is defined, this is sufficient to have a valid and concluded simple partnership contract because the undefined shares of two other partners can be defined by reference to Articles 1042 and 245 of the Russian Civil Code.

Q. Well, in 1995 it would have to be 245, wouldn't it?

A. Indeed.

Q. Now, what I suggest to you is that you could only apply the default rule to equalise the shares of Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili if you treated them as being parties to a separate partnership agreement, and if you said that the partners themselves -- the partnership itself then contracted with a separate partnership agreement with Mr Abramovich.

Sorry, that's rather involved. Would you like me to say it again?

A. No.

I think you are wrong in saying this because the law does not say this. The law does not require that a simple partnership between Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili shall be a party to another simple partnership agreement with Mr Abramovich. It can be, but there is absolutely no must in that.

Q. Can we return to the question of contributions. I think you've agreed in your evidence, and indeed in the joint memorandum, that the contributions of partners to a common goal may consist of either property or services. That's common ground between the experts, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, am I right in thinking that in accordance with the general principle that we discussed yesterday afternoon, whether it consists of property or services, the agreement has got to sufficiently define the contribution to make it possible for the court to enforce it?

A. Primarily the parties should make a contract which allows them to perform the contract properly. And, as a secondary task, indeed to allow the court to enforce the contract.

Q. So that if one of the parties complains to a court that one of the other parties has not contributed what he ought to have contributed, the court has got to be presented with terms sufficiently clear to see what the other party should have done. Is that right?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, you do not accept, as you have told us this morning, that agreement on the amount or value as opposed to the nature of each partner's contribution is an essential term of the agreement. You don't accept that, do you?

A. The amount is not necessary.

Q. Or the value?

A. The value neither.

Q. Now, you cite various decisions in support of this view at paragraph 219 of your fourth report, if I'm not mistaken G(A)1/1.01/74.

Would you agree that of the three cases which you cite in this paragraph, the first and third are cases in which it was held unnecessary for the parties to agree the amount of their contributions because, in the absence of agreement, of contrary agreements, the default rule applied; was that what was decided in those two cases?

A. Yes, we can say that way.

Q. Right. In the second case I don't think it is clear whether that was so or not, the case seems to have been decided on the facts, and it doesn't seem to answer the point one way or the other, would you agree?

A. No, I think all these cases dealt with an argument either from the claimant's side or from the defendant's side that a simple partnership agreement shall be declared by the court non-concluded because the parties failed to agree on certain essential terms. So the court's task was to identify what the essential terms of a simple partnership contract are. And in all these three cases, the court came to the conclusion that the amount, and as well the valuation, the contribution, is not important to be an essential term and to make a concluded contract.

Q. In the first and third cases that was explicitly on the basis that the default rule applied, was it not?

A. I think it was on the basis of the default rules.

Q. Now, if you turn on in your sixth report to paragraph 90 G(A)1/1.03/201, you cite a number of other cases between paragraphs 90 and 93, and later in that report between paragraphs 107 and 109, where you deal with textbook authority.

Can you confirm that in paragraphs 90 to 93 and 107 to 109 you are dealing with cases in which the default rule applies, specifically Article 1042?

A. In 90 to 93, yes, I refer to the cases which dealt with the default rule of 1042 --

Q. And is the same true of the reference that you offer at 107 to 109 to scholarly opinion G(A)1/1.03/206?

That's also dealing, isn't it, with the application of the default rule?

A. I think that's correct.

Q. Specifically Article 1042?

A. Article 1042, correct.

Q. Yes. Now, Article 1042, if we can just remind ourselves of its terms, if you go back to G(A)4/4 at flag 2, which

I think you probably still have on your table, you will find Article 1042 at page 73 of the bundle numbering G(A)4/4.02/73. Now, that's the article that came into force in March 1996, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. That deals specifically with the default rule relating to contributions?

A. Yes.

Q. And that was enacted, wasn't it, in order to ensure that contracts where the parties failed to agree contributions would not be treated as non-concluded?

A. Correct, because in the '90s you can imagine that many people had many needs and unified their property to achieve certain goals, to construct something or to engage in entrepreneurial activity. So the simple partnership contracts were very widespread but, of course, sometimes people are negligent to spell out many provisions in their contracts.

Q. Does that suggest that in the absence of the default rule, when parties failed to agree the value of their contributions, their agreement would have been treated as non-concluded?

A. Not necessarily. If the parties performed the agreement, the performance improves the defaults or the errors which were committed before when the parties failed to agree on certain essential terms.

Q. So subject to your argument about performance, which I'm going to come to in due course, you agree with the proposition but you reserve the point about performance?

A. If there were no default rules and if the parties failed to agree it on the essential terms, provided these terms were actually essential, yes, the contract is not concluded, and if -- the contract was not performed, of course.

Q. Before part 2 of the Civil Code came into force in March 1996, was there a default rule equivalent to Article 1042 relating to contributions?

A. There was at least a scholarly opinion that the Civil Code of 1964 of the Russian Federation and the Fundamentals of 1991 proceed from the assumption that if parties did not define their contributions, the contributions are equal.

Q. There is in fact no provision, is there, in the Fundamentals or the Civil Code of 1964 to that effect?

A. Well, I need to get back to the Code of 1964 and the Fundamentals of 1991.

Q. Yes, of course, by all means do that. You'll find the relevant provision of the Code of 1964 -- well, let's go to the Fundamentals first. If you take G(A)7/3 you'll find I think the whole of the Fundamentals behind flag 4

G(A)7/3.4/227.

I think you will need to go to Article 122 and thereabouts; I'm actually saying that for the benefit of my Lady since I'm sure you know already.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've got it.

MR SUMPTION: Now, can you point us in the Fundamentals to a default provision equivalent to 1042, ie relating to contributions?

A. No, I cannot point at such a provision in chapter 18 of the Fundamentals of 1991.

Q. That's the relevant chapter, isn't it?

A. It should be the relevant chapter, yes.

Q. Would you like to turn back in the same bundle to flag 2 where you'll find the 1964 Civil Code. I think if you go to Article 38 you will find a provision relating to joint activity agreements, although of course I don't want to -- sorry, chapter 38, Article 434, which is at page 157 G(A)7/3.02/157.

Chapter 38 comprises Articles 434 to 438. Is this the relevant part of the 1964 Civil Code dealing with simple partnership agreements?

A. Yes, this is the relevant chapter.

Q. Can you point us to a default provision equivalent to 1042, ie dealing with contributions, in chapter 38?

A. Excuse me, did you say I did point you at the relevant default rule?

- Q. No, can I ask you, please, to tell us whether we find, in chapter 38 of the 1964 Code, a provision equivalent to 1042 of the current Civil Code, namely a default rule relating to contributions?
- A. I don't see such a provision.
- Q. No. In fact, before March 1996, when part 2 of the Civil Code came into force, there wasn't a default rule relating to contributions, was there?
- A. It looks like there was not.
- Q. And if the default rule didn't exist at the relevant time for the purposes of the contract, then the law does require the parties to have agreed the value of their respective contributions, doesn't it, in the absence of a default rule?
- A. No, I don't think so.
- Q. Why not?
- A. Because you cannot point at any article which requires so.
- Q. Well, we've seen the analysis that you have offered us in your report of the reasons why, in your view, one does not need to have an agreement on the value or amount of the contributions. Your analysis is critically dependent on the existence of a default rule, and the authorities you refer to refer to Article 1042.

That's correct, isn't it?

- A. It is not fully correct. My analysis is dependent not only on the absence or presence of default rules. My analysis is also primarily dependent on the performance.

Besides, as well as I cannot show you neither in the Fundamentals of 1991 or the Civil Code of the Russian Soviet Socialist Federative Republic any default rule which I can find in the Civil Code of 1994 (sic) et cetera, you cannot point at any provision which requires the valuation of the property. However, I can point at the commentaries of authoritative authors of the 1960s which are contained in the supplemental bundle which say that the contributions of the parties are presumed equal.

- Q. That isn't however a provision, as you've accepted, that one finds in the relevant parts of the Code?

A. No.

- Q. Now, the contributions of the parties to the acquisition of control over Sibneft, according to Mr Berezovsky's evidence, are set out at paragraph 97 of his witness statement, his principal witness statement, and I wonder if you could be given bundle D2, flag 17, paragraph 97, where Mr Berezovsky sets out what he says were the agreed roles of each of the parties, okay D2/17/217?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, point (a) in that paragraph says that Mr Berezovsky was going to be responsible for:

"... lobbying for the assets to be included as part of the 'loans for shares' programme."

Do you see that?

A. I do.

Q. Now, can you help us on how a Russian court would set about enforcing that?

A. Indeed, and I recognise that in my reports the Russian courts may have problems with specific performance of this provision and may not be in a position to render an order "You, Mr Berezovsky, must lobby," if there are no other evidence which indicate what exactly -- or what, as milestones at least, he must done.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Could you tell me which paragraph of your report, please, Dr Rachkov?

A. I need to find it, my Lady.

MR SUMPTION: I think it's in your fourth report.

Which paragraph did you have in mind, Dr Rachkov?

A. I'm looking.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you help, Mr Rabinowitz?

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, we're also looking.

MR SUMPTION: I'm being told it may be --

A. I don't think it's in the fourth report.

MR RABINOWITZ: The sixth report.

MR SUMPTION: I see, in that case I apologise for...

If you want to have a look at your sixth report, which is the other place where you deal with this general area, I mean, I wondered whether you had in mind paragraph 217 of your fourth report, Dr Rachkov, but you'll have to tell us G(A)1/1.01/73.

A. Yes, this is the correct paragraph, and I repeated this idea also in my sixth report, that what Mr Abramovich would be entitled to if he fails to request a specific performance from Mr Berezovsky to claim for losses on the basis of Article 15 of the Civil Code.

Q. Well, what you say here is that if Mr Berezovsky:

"... did nothing at all, he would be in breach of contract, and would be liable to compensate Mr Abramovich ..."

But your evidence a moment ago was that the Russian courts might have problems with specific performance of Mr Berezovsky's obligation to lobby and might not be in a position to render an order, "You, Mr Berezovsky, must lobby"; that is your evidence, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, if you have a partnership agreement in which the whole contribution of one party is to engage in lobbying and there is nothing that the other parties can do to get an order requiring him to lobby, then how does the partnership work? Do you say that the other partners go ahead and do the lobbying themselves and then claim damages for the cost of doing it; is that your evidence?

- A. No, my evidence is that each partner must act in good faith and reasonably and in the interest of the partnership. As I said before, each partner must do whatever he is capable to do in accordance with the distribution of the roles to achieve the goal which is set before this simple partnership. This means that if he does not fully understand what he shall done, he must consult with the other partners and they may meet another additional agreement. However, I think here the parties well understood who shall do what.

And because Mr Berezovsky was apparently not for the first day in the business, he did understand what he must do in terms of lobbying.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Let's leave aside the facts, what I'm interested in is the law.

Can you explain to me, if the contract is simply that B would lobby at the highest political level and seek finance for the project, that's the terms of these obligations. How -- and I'm looking at paragraph 217 of your fourth report G(A)1/1.01/73 -- how does the court identify, if that is simply the obligation on B, whether or not he is in breach of contract if he does a bit of political lobbying but A says you've not done enough of it?

- A. Then this is clearly a violation of his contractual obligations and Mr Abramovich is entitled to sue Mr Berezovsky.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, I'm not talking about the facts of this case. I'm just talking about a simple case where there is an agreement on the part of B to lobby at the highest political level but no agreement in the terms of the contract, let's assume it's a written agreement, but no definition in the written agreement as to what the lobbying is going to involve, how much lobbying, of which people. How does the court identify in circumstances where B has done a bit of political lobbying, but A contends that B has not done enough, how in those circumstances does the court identify whether B is in breach of his obligations?

- A. It's a difficult question, and also for a Russian --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What's the answer to it?

- A. The answer is that indeed the court must look at all the evidence and say what, in a comparable situation, is done. For instance, if I'm going to a restaurant I order for some food, I have no clue what exactly must be done to prepare this food. However, I would like to have this, to be served with this particular food. So this situation can be compared with this hypothetical case of lobbying.

So we have a particular goal which must be achieved, this means that Mr Berezovsky, or this hypothetical Mr B, must do whatever is objectively required to achieve this particular goal, for instance, meet with those people and not with some other people; highest political level means of course the president, prime minister, and not for instance --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So am I right, is your proposition that the court itself would look at all the facts and determine the obligations of B under the political lobbying contract?

A. I would say so.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And wouldn't say "This contract is uncertain"; the court would actually identify for itself the obligations of the party simply by reference to the goal, is that right?

A. Yes, I think so. The court is not -- I mean, if we are speaking about the Russian court, the court is in a temptation, if you want, to decline the cases just because they are uncertain. But this does not mean that -- this is not what the Russian law says. The Russian law says contracts must be upheld and contracts must be -- there is a principle of stability of contracts. Therefore, to me, the first thing the court in Russia, applying Russian law, must do is try to identify whether all the essential terms were agreed upon. If they were, then there is no question about non-concluded contract.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You've said that, but what I'm interested in, is the simple hypothetical example of an unspecified political lobbying obligation, your evidence seems to be, or your view seems to be, that the court itself will define the obligation by reference to the goal.

A. Yes, that's what I'm saying.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see. Thank you.

MR SUMPTION: Another possibility, Dr Rachkov, is that there are some obligations which are so uncertain in their scope that it is impossible for the court to know how far the relevant partner had to go in order to attain the goal; that's another possibility, isn't it? Russian law accepts that that may be the case, doesn't it?

A. Can you explain your proposition, please?

Q. Let me put it again. Russian law does acknowledge the possibility, doesn't it, that some obligations may be assumed in such vague and uncertain terms that they are incapable of being enforced; there are such obligations in Russian law, are there not?

A. I think so, yes.

Q. Right. Now, what I suggest to you is that an obligation to lobby for the assets to be included as part of the loans-for-shares programme is exactly that sort of obligation. It is so vague that it is impossible for a court to decide how diligent Mr Berezovsky needed to be and whether what he did was actually sufficient.

What do you say?

A. I can only repeat what I've said before. So if the goal is clear enough, and the goal is clear enough here in this particular case, besides there is a certain deadline by which the parties want to have this company established and to get control over it, there is a certain way in which this control might be obtained, ie through loans-for-shares programme. There were precedents before so many Russian oligarchs were lobbying with exactly the same results. So there was a certain market, if you wish, for these lobbying services. Why should this contract be not clear enough?

Q. You see, you agree, Dr Rachkov, don't you, that the simple partnership agreement must define the obligation with sufficient certainty such that it is objectively ascertainable and a court can adjudicate whether the obligation has been complied with; you agree with that, don't you?

A. I agree with that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Where do we find that?

MR SUMPTION: We find that in paragraph 21, subparagraph 4 of the joint memorandum at 61 D2/17/217.

Can we turn to point (b):

"Badri and I would raise funds for the project."

There's a similar problem about this, isn't there?

There's no agreement about what sort of funds, whether bank loans, whether equity, how much, none of that is agreed. How does a court enforce (b)?

A. Here again, apparently it doesn't mean that these particular persons will obtain money from banks as loans, so I can suppose that neither of them was a party to a loan contract, or even gave some personal guarantees. I can only imagine that the actions of each of Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili will be driven by this ultimate goal to make sure that the state gets the money which it wants to get in exchange for the pledge over the shares.

Q. Well, let's have a look at (c):

"Badri would lead commercial negotiations with key business counterparties."

Does the court have to decide who the relevant counterparties are and which of them are key?

A. I think the court must ask of course both parties what they think about who key business counterparties is. However, if these are just business counterparties, that's quite clear. So each of the companies which were merged into Sibneft had a certain number of suppliers and a certain number of customers. Besides, there were groups which might have been interested in getting control over Sibneft too. I can imagine that these all are the groups which are described with a very brief sentence:

"Badri would lead commercial negotiations with key business counterparties."

Q. You see, Dr Rachkov, no agreement is alleged in this case that any of the partners would make any personal financial contribution. What I suggest to you is if the parties are not promising to contribute money or assets, and their sole contribution is services, they must, to make a valid agreement, define their obligations more precisely than anything one sees in paragraph 97. What do you say?

A. In an ideal world I would agree with you, it is very good to have a determined obligation. But, in reality, their life is richer than our imagination. Therefore I think the parties, it is sufficient to agree that efforts will be combined and, as I said before and can repeat again and again, the efforts are driven by the goal. The professionals do understand what they must have done to achieve a particular goal.

- Q. Well, they may understand, may they not? Or they may not?
- A. I think if they are professionals they do understand. If the client comes to me and asks for some legal services, I do understand what I shall do. Then I can offer to the client a kind of menu, if you wish, and the client says, "Okay, I want the soup and the starter but not, for instance, the dessert." That's how it works in the life.
- Q. Mr Rozenberg gives an example of a contract which is too vague to be enforced. He says take the example of a contract to build a two-storey building, just that. "I will build for you a two-storey building," with no further definition of the building.
- Do you agree that if the parties agreed no more than that the contract would not be sufficiently defined?
- A. That contract would not be sufficiently defined unless the parties performed it and I can derive from the performance what kind of storey was -- sorry, what kind of two-storey building was constructed.
- Q. And that would be so, notwithstanding that it might be a contract between professional builders?
- A. It might be so because -- even in that case, yes.

Q. Now, I want to turn from the terms relating to contributions towards the acquisition of control over Sibneft, which is what Mr Berezovsky is dealing with in paragraph 97, to a slightly different subject, namely the contributions required of these parties to the acquisition of ownership of Sibneft shares thereafter. Do you follow the difference?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Now, I'm therefore addressing any possible acquisition of Sibneft shares when the 49 per cent of Sibneft was privatised or when the 51 per cent retained by the state was sold after the loan default.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Would that be a convenient moment if you're going on to another topic?

MR SUMPTION: Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. Ten minutes.

(11.30 am)

(A short break)

(11.45 am)

MR SUMPTION: Dr Rachkov, I'm now dealing with the question of contributions to the acquisition of shares, rather than the acquisition of control through the loan-for-shares auction.

I think you agree, don't you, that the parties to a simple partnership agreement must have agreed upon the common goal?

A. Yes.

Q. And also that the common goal must be sufficiently defined in the agreement to enable the court to know what the subject matter of that agreement is; you agree with that too, don't you?

A. I do.

Q. Therefore the simple partnership agreement would not extend beyond the common goal that had been agreed? Would you agree with that?

A. I would agree with that, maybe with a small reservation that the performance may of course extend this goal beyond what was agreed initially.

Q. I see. In other words, it might be implicit, if the parties all got together and did something else, that they were doing it on the same terms as the originally agreed goal, is that right?

A. Depending on the specific circumstances of the case, it may be that.

Q. But what we're dealing with is effectively an amendment of the scope of the partnership agreement by conduct?

A. You can say this way. I think especially when legal entities are created it is natural that the persons who entered into a simple partnership contract to create such legal entity do not stop their joint activity once the legal entity is created but continue to pursue this goal in its extended version.

Q. Well now, suppose that there was no agreement at all between these individuals about whether or not to acquire ownership of shares in Sibneft, okay? That's what I'm asking you to assume. Would you agree that in that case the acquisition of shares in Sibneft could not be regarded as part of the common goal?

A. It may be so, but you said what was not agreed, you didn't say what was agreed.

Q. Well let us suppose that there was an agreement that the parties would do the things described in paragraph 97 of Mr Berezovsky's witness statement that you saw earlier this morning, okay, that they would do those things for the purpose of acquiring control over the state's 51 per cent retained share in Sibneft in the loans-for-shares auction. Let us suppose that the parties agreed that, okay?

A. Okay.

Q. Now suppose, as well, that they agreed absolutely nothing about whether or not to acquire ownership of shares in Sibneft if and when the state actually sold its shares; do you follow me?

A. I do.

Q. Now, on that hypothesis, would you agree that the acquisition of shares in Sibneft could not be regarded as part of the common goal?

- A. I think the broader definition is acquisition of control. If the parties acquired shares directly, this is the most classical way of acquiring control.
- Q. Well, in 1995, at any rate in the later part of 1995, it was appreciated that there was going to be a loans-for-shares auction which would not itself involve the sale of any shares to anybody, okay?
- A. Yes.
- Q. You know that, don't you?
- A. Yes.
- Q. Right. Now, let us suppose that the parties agreed that they would exercise their skills in order to ensure that there was a loans-for-shares auction, right, and that they would exercise their skills in order to win the loans-for-shares auction to acquire control of the state's shares as pledgees and security for a loan, right? Let's suppose that was the deal, all right?
- A. All right.
- Q. And let's suppose that there was absolutely no agreement about what was to be done if and when the state subsequently sold its shares, okay?
- A. Okay.
- Q. Now, what I would suggest to you, for you to comment on, is that in that situation the acquisition of shares in Sibneft could not be regarded as part of the common goal because there would have been no agreement about it at all.

- A. I don't know. In accordance with Article 431 of the Russian Civil Code, the court must look not only on the literal wording of the contract but also at what the parties actually intended; and it may well be that the parties, because they are accustomed to use some words without understanding the meaning of these words -- as we learned in the past, the parties used the word "trust" without fully understanding what it actually means and without having the same word in the Russian legal language, so the court must identify what the real intention was.

Because a reasonable human being would never participate in any auctions for the right to be the pledgee of shares without having some further and forward-looking goals.

- Q. Well, that's a question of fact, isn't it? It depends on the facts of each case.
- A. Absolutely.
- Q. I'm not asking you about the facts, that's why I'm putting these hypotheses to you, to find out your opinions on the relevant law.

Now, 431, which you referred to, is the general article of the Civil Code which deals with the interpretation of contracts, doesn't it?

A. Correct.

Q. You'll find that in bundle G(A)4/4, flag 2, page 63 in the bundle numbering G(A)4/4.02/63.

A. Can you please repeat the flag?

Q. Flag 2.

A. Thank you.

Q. Page 63 in the bundle numbering on the bottom right. 431, that's the article you were referring to a moment ago I think?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, am I right in thinking that the basic rule, the primary rule of interpretation is that the:

"... court [is to] take into account the literal meaning of the words and expressions contained in it, the literal meaning of a term of a contract, in case the term is not clear, shall be established by comparison with the other terms and the sense of [a] contract as a whole.

So that first paragraph of 431 is the basic rule, isn't it?

A. It is the basic rule.

Q. The second paragraph deals with what happens if the application of the first paragraph does not enable the court to decide the contents of the contract, okay?

A. Yes.

Q. The reference you gave us a moment ago to the real common will of the parties, that is something that only arises for consideration so far as the literal meaning of the words, read in their context of the agreement as a whole, doesn't give you the answer?

A. Yes, the purpose of this second paragraph of Article 431 is to replenish the gaps in regulation which necessarily occur because you cannot predict 100 per cent, well, what shall happen in the next few months, for instance. The cases where it is possible to make such a contract are very, very rare.

Q. If the parties have agreed that their goal is to have a loans-for-shares auction, and to succeed in that auction, there is no basis, is there, on which the court could say that their goal was actually wider than that and extended to buying shares subsequently unless the parties had subsequently agreed to broaden the goal. Would you not agree with that?

A. I can agree with you to some extent, but I also can stress that the court will ask why the parties intended to participate in such a loans-for-shares auction. The pledgee is just a provisional position, and it was commonplace in Russia that to acquire shares in exchange of loans granted to the state was a way to circumvent, if you want, the regular privatisation rules.

- Q. Well, there was a privatisation in this case of 49 per cent anyway.
- A. I agree, yes.
- Q. So there was no need for circumventing anything.
- A. Yes, but the position of the pledgee secured that you were managing the company over time, and to get a kind of informal priority to acquire the shares, because you were then in charge of running the auction to sell the shares.
- Q. The court might enquire whether it was rational for the parties to limit their objective to acquiring control in the loans-for-shares auction, but if the court received a rational explanation of why that served the parties' purposes, then it would not look for some wider goal that the parties hadn't agreed, would it?
- A. It's just our speculation whether the court will or will not. I insist that the court will of course ask the court and the parties what is the real intention of participating in this procedure.
- Q. Only if the meaning of their words doesn't give you the answer to that question. I think you've agreed that.
- A. Yes. If the -- correct. If the wording, the literal wording and the systematic interpretation or construction of the contract does not allow to find out the real will of the parties.

Q. And when you refer to the systematic interpretation of the contract, do you mean by that the interpretation of the words in the context of the contract as a whole?

A. Yes.

Q. In accordance with what the first paragraph says?

A. I do.

Q. Thank you. Now, suppose, to put another hypothesis to you, that the only agreement that the parties made about acquiring ownership in Sibneft shares was that it would be left to Mr Abramovich to decide whether or not to acquire them, at what price and on what terms, okay? That's what I'm asking you to assume the parties agreed, right?

A. Right.

Q. Would that constitute -- would that be enough to make the acquisition of Sibneft shares part of the common goal of the partnership?

A. It may be enough. I don't know what else the parties agreed. Maybe they --

Q. Well, I'm asking you to assume they agreed nothing else about the acquisition of shares other than that Mr Abramovich would decide whether to acquire the shares and on what terms and at what price.

- A. This means that the parties believed in Mr Abramovich's professionalism, that anyway he must act in good faith and in the interest of the simple partnership. So if after -- or when making the decision on whether or not to acquire the Sibneft shares, and by which particular way, Mr Abramovich acted not in the interests of the simple partnership, or not in good faith or both, then it will be a clear violation of the simple partnership contract.
- Q. If Mr Abramovich had no obligation to acquire ownership of any shares in Sibneft under the terms of the agreement, but decided to do it anyway, how would the court decide whether he had bought them for himself, or bought them for himself and his partners together?
- A. I think the court will be driven by what was the common interest of the partners. If the partners -- and clearly the interest of the parties was to -- the partners was to acquire control of whatever kind over Sibneft, and Mr Abramovich acquired the shares in his own name, that would be a violation of the simple partnership contract.
- Q. Dr Rachkov, I think you agreed yesterday that you have to have sufficient certainty about the predmet, or subject matter, of the contract, and that the predmet of the contract was the sum total of the obligations under it, okay?

A. What kind of obligations, excuse me?

Q. Well, you I think agreed yesterday, and I'm virtually quoting from the joint memorandum, that the predmet or I think subject matter of a contract must be agreed with sufficient definition and certainty, that's true, isn't it?

A. The predmet or the subject matter or the subject or object of the contract must be determined or determinable.

Q. Yes. I think your definition of the predmet, as I think you confirmed yesterday, is that it is the obligations that flow from the contract?

A. Yes.

Q. Now --

A. It's the actions of the parties to the contract, described in a way which allows them to start performing.

Q. The actions which they are obliged to perform.

A. The actions which they are obliged to perform. As I said, the predmet and other essential terms of the contract are there to allow the parties to understand what they must do, when, vis-a-vis which persons.

Q. Right. Now, I'm going to ask you to assume that Mr Abramovich had no obligation under this agreement to acquire ownership in any shares in Sibneft, okay?

A. Okay.

Q. And I'm going to ask you to assume that there was no agreement about what contribution, either in services or in money, would be made by anyone else, okay?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, are you suggesting that if that is the situation then the acquisition of shares in the company can be regarded as part of the goal of the partnership?

A. You said about what was agreed -- what was not agreed, but again you didn't say what was agreed. Therefore I --

Q. Let me help you. I am assuming that there was an agreement of the kind described in paragraph 97 D2/17/217 of Mr Berezovsky's witness statement relating to the loans-for-shares auction, okay? So let's assume there was an agreement about that.

The point of these questions is I want to discover what your views are about the application of Russian law principles to a subsequent acquisition of shares in Sibneft, so the assumption I'm going to ask you to make is this: assume there is an agreement to procure the loans-for-shares auction to happen and to do one's best to succeed in the loans-for-shares auction, but assume that under the terms of that agreement Mr Abramovich has no obligation to acquire ownership of shares in Sibneft, and Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili have not agreed anything about contributing to the cost, okay? That's what I'm asking you to assume.

Now, you wouldn't suggest, would you, that in that situation the acquisition of shares in Sibneft was part of the common goal of the partnership?

- A. I need again to refer to Article 431, what was the real intention and the real common will of the parties? Because, to me, being a reasonable man, it would be just nonsense why the parties should enter into such a contract.
- Q. That depends on the facts, doesn't it?
- A. What is the economic benefit for them to enter into such a contract, especially for business purposes?
- Q. Mr Rachkov, I could answer that question but I'm not going to ask you questions about the facts, nor are you giving evidence about the facts, or what would be reasonable business. I simply want to understand your evidence about Russian law.
- A. But Russian law is not unreasonable either. Russian law is very logical and very reasonable.
- Q. We all understand that, and my Lady in due course will apply the rules of Russian law as established by expert evidence to the facts that she determines. That's why I'm not asking you to deal with it, okay?

A. Sure. I don't.

Q. Now, just assume that the result of applying the proper processes of interpretation is that the court concludes that there was an agreement to participate in the loans-for-shares auction, but Mr Abramovich had no obligation to acquire any subsequent shares, and there was no agreement about the other two making any contribution to the cost of acquiring subsequent shares, okay? That's what I'm asking you to assume.

Now, if you make that assumption, then do you agree that the acquisition of shares in Sibneft cannot be regarded as part of the goal of the partnership?

A. I cannot agree with that because I know too small information about what else happened. I can only say that what the parties contributed to the joint activity, and what they -- each of them acquired as a result of joint activity, is their joint property.

Q. Dr Rachkov, what you appear to be doing is trying to argue out of the hypothesis which I'm asking you to assume.

It should be a very simple matter. If Mr Abramovich had no obligation to buy these shares, and Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili agreed nothing whatever about contributing to the cost, it must stand to reason that the acquisition of shares cannot be treated as part of their common goal because there were no obligations of anybody in relation to the acquisition of shares. You must agree that, surely?

A. Yes, and I agree with that.

Q. Now, suppose that the agreement was that none of the partners, except for Mr Abramovich, was going to participate in the management of Sibneft, okay? This is another hypothesis I'm putting to you about a different aspect of the agreement. Now, do you say that that would constitute a partnership for the joint exploitation of Sibneft's business if it was all being done by Mr Abramovich?

A. If that is how the roles were divided, if the partners believed that only one of them, and especially Mr Abramovich, is the most suited person to run the business, to manage the company, that's fine. So that's his contribution to this simple partnership.

Q. But if only one person was going to run Sibneft, then the exploitation of Sibneft surely cannot be regarded as a partnership obligation?

A. Can you explain, please, what you mean by exploitation of Sibneft.

Q. Well, the exploitation of Sibneft's business for the purpose of generating profits. If that was all going to be done by Mr Abramovich, is there any contribution, any relevant contribution, involved from the other two?

A. Can you please formulate your question?

Q. I thought I'd done so but I'll try again.

Let us suppose that in relation to the exploitation of Sibneft's business, after control of it has been acquired, the agreement is simply that Mr Abramovich is going to get on with it, and neither Mr Patarkatsishvili nor Mr Berezovsky is going to do anything about the subsequent exploitation of Sibneft's business. If those are the facts, is it your position that the exploitation of Sibneft's business after the loans-for-shares agreement could be part of the scope of the partnership agreement?

A. Excuse me, I do not fully understand the term "exploitation". Maybe I need to ask Russian interpreter to say it to me in Russian.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just before you go there.

Mr Sumption, does this hypothesis include the factors in paragraph 97?

MR SUMPTION: Yes, it does.

Did you follow the question and answer that I gave to my Lady? Take that into account.

A. The problem is that I do not understand the term "exploitation".

Q. Yes, what I mean by exploitation --

A. In Russian, exploitation has a very bad meaning, exploitation of a human being by a human being, that's what the Communists said, excuse me for this.

Q. I understand. It sometimes has that meaning in English as well.

What I mean by exploitation is the running of the business so as to generate profits.

A. As I said, if the roles are distributed in a way that one party undertakes efforts to achieve a specific goal which is assuming -- or acquisition of control over Sibneft, and the other party's role is more active after the acquisition has been done, because that party is a professional in the oil sector, knows how to extract oil, how to refine it, how to sell it, how to structure the transactions, I don't see any problem why such a simple partnership agreement would fail.

Q. Would you agree at any rate with this much, that if there was a dispute between the parties as to whether the partnership agreement, whether the goals of the partnership agreement included running the business for profit after the loans-for-shares agreement, it would be some indication that it did not include it that the whole of the job was being done by one party, wouldn't it?

- A. I'm afraid I cannot answer this question. It's really up to the parties to agree what the distribution of the roles is, how big or how small the efforts of either of them is.

The simple partnership contract is a contract which is called "fidutsiarnyj doveritelnyj", fiduciary in Russian. This means that of course you can never have fully equal shares because one partner undertakes maybe more efforts today, the other undertakes more efforts tomorrow. That's just human, to have a contract where the roles are distributed in a way that the person who is more suitable to do the strategic decisions is responsible for those, and the person who is more, how to say, able to run the daily business is engaged in daily business. It's how law firms as well run.

I can be a partner in charge of business development because I'm not in a position to sit down for more than one hour and to write some papers, but I can be not able and incapable to do any business development. It's better to advise clients instead.

- Q. My question was directed to ascertaining the relevance of different functions when you have an issue as to how wide the goal was, but I've asked my question and we've got your answer.

Now, you may recall that earlier this morning I asked you about whether an obligation to engage in political lobbying was sufficiently certain. I want now to ask you about a different aspect of that obligation, namely whether it is consistent with Russian legal public policy. Do you understand the subject that I'm moving on to?

A. I think I do understand.

Q. Now, do you regard political lobbying as a valid and lawful contribution to a simple partnership agreement?

A. If the political lobbying constitutes efforts, business skills, business reputation and other types of contribution which are described in Article 1042 of the Russian Civil Code, yes.

Q. I mean, it's not actually business skills one is talking about, is it? It's political skills?

A. Connections.

Q. Right. Well now, can I ask you to look at a case which both you and Mr Rozenberg comment on, the Makayev case at G(A)4/7, flag 93 G(A)4/7.093/1.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Sumption, it would help me if you could identify the paragraph in the report where Dr Rachkov deals with this case.

MR SUMPTION: Deals with?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: This particular case you're going to now.

MR SUMPTION: Yes, I will -- Mr Henshaw will produce that in a moment.

MR RABINOWITZ: It's paragraph 129 in his sixth report, it's behind tab 3 G(A)1/1.03/211.

MR SUMPTION: Have you got bundle G(A)4/7, Dr Rachkov?

A. Yes.

Q. You should turn to flag 93 if you haven't already done so. Now, this is a decision of the constitutional court of the Russian Federation, and that is a court of the highest possible authority in Russia, isn't it?

A. It's -- well, Russian court system is three-fold. It consists of the Constitutional Court, the whole system of arbitrazh courts and courts of common jurisdiction. So I wouldn't say the Constitutional Court is somewhere on top of the Russian court system, it is only in charge of comparing laws with the constitution and saying whether or not these laws are constitutional.

Q. Yes. There are, in other words, a number of separate hierarchies, each with their own highest court, and the Constitutional Court is the whole system, is that the point you're making? It's the only court -- it doesn't have subordinate courts, or does it?

A. It does not have subordinate courts, and there were cases when the arbitrazh court, the highest arbitrazh court, or the Supreme Arbitrazh Court, rendered judgments which were not fully in line with the opinions expressed in the resolution of the Constitutional Court.

- Q. But the decisions of the Constitutional Court are regarded as carrying very considerable authority, are they not?
- A. Yes, but this is a very general statement. The Constitutional Court deals, as other courts do, with specific cases. So in the specific case we are speaking about, the question is whether or not specific articles of the Civil Code of the Russian Federation are in line with the Russian constitution.
- Q. Yes. Well now, would you agree -- first of all, this case is about lawyer's contingency fees, isn't it?
- A. Yes.
- Q. And it was held, was it not, that a regulation which forbade contingency fees for lawyers representing clients in court was consistent with the constitution? That was the decision, wasn't it?
- A. No, it was not that decision. The decision was that Articles 779 and 781 of the Civil Code are consistent with the constitution.
- Q. What did those articles say?
- A. Perhaps we shall have a look at these articles. I don't know whether they are reproduced in the bundle.

Q. Well, the point is very simple, isn't it? There was a provision of the Civil Code which said you couldn't charge contingency fees for representing clients in court. And the lawyer, Mr Makayev, was saying that's unconstitutional. That was what the argument was about, wasn't it?

A. Not really. No article of the Civil Code says you cannot as a lawyer charge a contingency fee to your clients.

Q. Well, let's have a look at the text. The opening paragraph at the bottom of page 1 of the bundle numbering G(A)4/7.093/1, a commercial services agreement:

"Under a commercial services agreement the contractor as instructed by the customer undertakes to render services to take certain action while the customer undertakes to pay for services."

If you look at the top of page 3 of the report G(A)4/7.093/3, the effect of the relevant provisions of the Civil Code is summarised in the first full paragraph on the page. If you look at the first paragraph beginning:

"Therefore, in this case the issue under review by the Constitutional Court... is the provisions of... 779... and 781..."

If you look at the last words of that paragraph:

"... the point hereby contested is that in light of their interpretation in current judicial practices these provisions do not allow for awarding the contractor's claim for payment should this payment be made conditional [on] a future decision by a court."

Okay?

A. Yes.

Q. So what was being said in this case was that there was a rule in the Civil Code which had been interpreted as meaning that a lawyer couldn't charge a fee conditionally on the outcome of the case. That was the way the Civil Code had been interpreted, wasn't it?

A. One can say this way, yes. I interpret it in a bit different way.

Q. That's certainly the point that's being made in this judgment of the constitutional court. And the issue in this case was whether a rule that prevented a lawyer from charging conditionally on the outcome of the case was consistent with the constitution. That was the question the court posed itself, wasn't it?

A. Excuse me, the court does not evaluate the provisions of private contracts. The court only says this is the rule of the Civil Code. I was asked to compare this provision with the Russian constitution, that's all.

The court did not --

Q. That's exactly what I thought I was putting to you.

Dr Rachkov, would you agree that the question at issue in this case was whether a rule of civil law preventing lawyers from charging fees conditional on the outcome of the case was consistent with the constitution. That was the issue, wasn't it?

A. You can make that way, yes.

Q. Thank you. Now, can we look at the reasoning of the court in holding that it was consistent with the constitution.

If you look at paragraph -- there are a number of reasons given, but if you look at paragraph 2.1 at the bottom of page 3, you will see:

"Public relations arises in the process of providing legal services are interconnected with the discharge by appropriate government bodies or officials of their constitutional obligation to ensure that every individual may have access to legal services and be able to retain competent legal counsel for the purpose of taking legal action..."

Now, with that introduction, if you turn over the page to paragraph 2.2 on page 4 G(A)4/7.093/4, do you have a highlighted version?

A. Yes.

Q. Right. The first bit of highlighted text at the beginning of 2.2 sets out, does it not, the general rule:

"At the same time, due to the permissive nature of civil regulations, persons who wish to obtain legal counsel may use their own discretion when deciding whether entering into a commercial service agreement may be desirable or necessary, to use the most suitable way of receiving such help and since the Constitution of the Russian Federation and the law do not stipulate the contrary, agree on mutually acceptable ... terms."

So the general rule, is this right, is you can reach agreement on the terms on which a service is obtained as you like, that's the starting point?

A. Yes.

Q. They then consider what limitations may be justifiable on that right. If you look at the next chunk of highlighted text starting "At the same time" you have the proviso, don't you?

"At the same time the Constitutional Court of the Russian Federation emphasised that the freedom of contract that is protected under the Constitution must not negate or diminish other recognised human or civil rights or freedoms; it is not absolute and may be restricted; however, imposition of such restriction and the nature thereof must be based upon the Constitution of the Russian Federation that stipulates that federal law may restrict human law, civil rights or freedoms only to the extent that such restrictions may be necessary in order to protect pillars of constitutional order, morality, health, rights and lawful interests of other parties, as well as ensure proper defence and security of the country ..."

Now, you then have what I would suggest is the critical part of the reasoning on this:

"The freedom of contract also has objective limits that are determined by the fundamentals of constitutional order and public policy. In particular, it concerns the inadmissibility of expansion of contractual relations and the principles underlying them on those areas of social activity that are related to the realisation of governmental power. Since the governmental authorities and their officials ensure realisation by the people of its power, their activity (both of itself and [in] its results) may not be subject to private civil law regulation, as well as the realisation of civil law rights and obligations may not predetermine specific decisions and actions of the governmental authorities and their officials."

Now, would you agree that the particular public policy which is being referred to in that paragraph, and which contingency fees would have contravened, was the public policy against allowing private persons to make contracts whose subject matter is the activity of a court or of some other organ of the state; would you agree with that proposition?

A. I think it's a very generic statement.

Q. Yes.

A. The purpose of this resolution of the Constitutional Court was this: you may know that the mass media report a lot about corruption in Russian courts, and you may know that corruption is also contained in such contracts which provide for contingency fees. This means that a Russian judge may agree with an advocate of the claimant or of the defendant to get paid in a sum of X, and, of course, the services of the Russian lawyers must also be remunerated. To fight against the corruption, the Constitutional Court rendered this decision. That's the background.

Q. Yes.

A. I think -- I do not fully understand how it is related to our case but I'm happy to discuss this case to you.

Q. Well, I'm going to ask you some further questions about this case. It is for my Lady to decide how the principles are to be applied to our particular facts, but I would just like to understand the legal principle.

Now, the legal principle is, and I quite see your point that this is designed to ensure that contracts are not entered into which are liable to be used for corrupt purposes; that's your point, isn't it?

A. Yes. But, excuse me, in this particular case where I speak about corruption in the courts, the Constitutional Court learned how corruption actually lives in Russian courts and built an obstacle to that.

Q. Except it's not limited to the courts, is it? Because if you look in the paragraph that I've just referred you to, what it is saying is that their activity -- well, let's look at the whole of the last sentence:

"Since the governmental authorities and their officials ensure realisation by the people of its power, their activity [that is to say the activity of governmental authorities and their officials] may not be [the] subject [of] private civil law regulation, as well as the realisation of civil law rights and obligations may not predetermine specific decisions and actions of the governmental authorities and their officials."

MR RABINOWITZ: It says:

"... may not be subject to private law," not "of".

MR SUMPTION: All right, fine:

"... may not be subject to private civil law regulation, as well as the realisation of civil law rights and obligations may not predetermine specific decisions and actions of the governmental authorities and their officials."

The point I'm putting to you, Dr Rachkov, is that this principle is explicitly not confined to contracts which have as their subject matter, or which depend upon, decisions of the courts; it also extends to contracts which have as their subject matter, or are subject to, decisions of other governmental authorities. That's right, isn't it?

A. No, it is not right, and I can explain why.

There are law firms in Russia which render services in connection with the public sector. For instance, a company wants to get a licence, there are clear rules on what type of documents must be provided, what is the contents of these documents, what is the form? Must it be -- you don't listen to me, do you?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm listening, that's what matters.

MR SUMPTION: I am too, forgive me.

A. The legal services are aimed at getting a licence, the documents are prepared without any corruption and, of course, the agreement is if the state authority delivers the licence to carry out certain business activity, which is subject to licence of course, then the law firm gets paid. Or, as another alternative, if the state authority delivers the licence with a delay, the firm gets paid in a lesser amount, ie the law firm is penalised for the behaviour of a third party.

There is nothing about corruption. And I disagree with Mr Sumption's proposition that this extends to all types of contracts which involves any public service. If there is nothing wrong, nothing illegal about -- to have contracts which deal with the public services but still provide either for a contingency fee or a cap fee or a premium if the work resulted -- of a law firm, for instance, resulted in getting a licence on time, because it is important for the business and crucial to get the licence as soon as possible, without any corruption though.

- Q. Dr Rachkov, would you agree that this case applies to any payment obligation to a service provider which is expressed to turn on the outcome of a specific decision by a judge or a state official?
- A. By a judge, yes; by state official, no.
- Q. What I've just said to you is read out from your sixth report. Would you like to have a look at paragraph 132 G(A)1/1.03/212?
- A. Yes.
- Q. What you wrote here was:

"More generally, Makayev only applies where a payment obligation to a service provider is expressed to turn on the outcome of a specific decision by a judge or state official."

A. Okay, Mr Sumption, I agree, you caught me.

What I meant I just explained. It presumes that the contingency fees do not or may not be used to pay bribes to officials, whether it is the judge or other state officer.

Q. Now, what you summarise here in that paragraph is in fact exactly what is being said, isn't it, in the last paragraph which is highlighted on page 4 of the bundle G(A)4/7.093/4, namely that this rule applies to the decisions and actions of governmental authorities and their officials?

A. I'm afraid I have nothing to add to my explanations before. As I said, the questions or the situations where legal services are rendered in connection with the behaviour of the state officials are very widespread.

What -- the aim and the background of this resolution of the Constitutional Court is to try to exclude the situations where bribes are paid to judges. The court said, basically, that if you have such a contract it is unconstitutional. What does it mean? A law firm may well enter into such a contract but this contract will not have any protection in court. It's like gambling.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just a second, can I understand this.

Did this case on your evidence deal exclusively with the issue where the contingency fee agreement with the lawyer envisaged a payment being made to a judge, or was it simply dealing with the issue in isolation, namely contingency fees for lawyers are illegal?

A. Yes, my Lady, the resolution of the Constitutional Court deals with a very specific situation where a law firm says to the client, "Look, I will work for free for you. If the judgment is rendered in your favour then I will get X." That's what the Constitutional Court wants to prohibit because -- but the real background is, as I said, to fight against corruption. In many --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is judicial corruption something that's referred to in this judgment?

A. I need to look again at it. Maybe it is not, because maybe in this particular case there was no corruption because the names of the firms which are involved and the lawyers who were acting do not give an idea of whether or not there was any situation of corruption. But I can refer to the Russian press which commented on this decision --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, I'm just asking in the actual judgment itself whether there's any reference to what you -- I mean it's obvious, one would have thought, that any contractual provision that includes payment to a judge is a corrupt unenforceable agreement. But just looking at the principle, it seems to be stated more widely, that is to say any contingency fee.

- A. Of course, any resolution of the Constitutional Court on the merits deals with more reasons than just one, or at least these cases are very rare when only one situation is addressed.

The other situations are, for instance, the Constitutional Court does not want lawyers to invite clients to litigate just as gambling, you know. You do litigate, if you win, that's my legal fee, and this is what you get out of this case.

Because you may know that Russian courts are overloaded, if we have a look at the arbitrazh court of the city of Moscow --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: There are two views, aren't there, on whether contingency views are a good idea, one is access to justice, the other is the gambling or other downsides of contingency fees.

But I'm not, as it were, focusing on that. I just want to know whether in this particular case there's any reference to judicial corruption or not?

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, I can tell your Ladyship that on the text there is not.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: On the text there isn't.

MR SUMPTION: But we accept that part of the mischief of it was judicial corruption.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR SUMPTION: So that on that particular point there is nothing between Dr Rachkov and myself.

Dr Rachkov, to clear this up --

A. Can I ask you a question, Mr Sumption, because it looks just ridiculous(?).

You said there is no mention of corruption. Do we need a mention of corruption? Is it not enough that it said independence of justice? The independence of justice means, among other things, that no corruption must be there in Russian courts.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, well you're agreed on that so we can move on.

MR SUMPTION: Dr Rachkov, as I understand your evidence, and I think this may resolve my Lady's question as well, at least I hope so, the point about contingency fee agreements, they weren't considering an agreement between the parties which expressly said "I will pay you if you win and you will pay part of that to the judge"; their point was that you cannot have agreements which have the potential to operate in that way even if the actual term doesn't say so, is that right?

A. Yes, that's right.

Q. Now, would you agree that this public policy against agreements which have the potential to operate in a corrupt way is just as significant when talking about other state officials as when talking about judges?

A. If it involves corruption, yes.

Q. That is why the principle, as expressed in the last highlighted block on page 4, is expressed to apply, just as your paragraph 132 is, not just to judges but also to state officials.

A. Yes, I can't deny that the Constitutional Court itself refers to governmental authorities and their officials.

Q. Now, you refer in your report, Dr Rachkov, to the dissenting judgments which accompanied this majority judgment of the Constitutional Court. The reference is paragraph 130 of your report, your sixth report G(A)1/1.03/212.

A. Yes.

Q. Now, I'm going to ask you to look at a couple of those judgments. First of all, these are what are called side opinions, is that right?

A. A dissenting opinion, yes.

Q. Yes. A side opinion is given by a judge who differs from the majority either as to the result or as to the reasoning, is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. But the dissents do not affect the authority of the majority decision, do they? They are still the decision of the court?

A. Of course, the decisions are taken by majority.

However, this dissenting opinion is quite important because it derives -- if you speak about judges, Kononov's opinion, he rendered many dissenting opinions in the past, and besides in this particular case he was the so-called reporting judge, that means that he was more in a position than other judges to evaluate all aspects of this case. And he actually came to the conclusion that it really depends on the specific situation whether or not the contingency fee can be admitted or must be prohibited.

Q. I understand that he differed from the majority. There are in fact three side opinions or dissenting -- well, there are three side opinions, and I think I'm right in saying, but correct me if I'm wrong, that two of them disagree with the result and one of them agrees with the result for additional reasons, is that correct?

A. Do you mean all three opinions or only one of them?

Q. No, sorry. Two of them concur with the result but give additional reasons and one of them, Kononov, disagrees with the result, is that correct?

A. Yes, but --

Q. Let's just deal with one thing at a time.

Judge NS Bondar whose side opinion starts at page 8 G(A)4/7.093/8, he agreed with the result and added observations of his own, is that correct?

A. Yes, and we must look at what exactly or what observation exactly he was meaning here.

Q. Judge Gadzhiyev, who starts on page 13 G(A)4/7.093/13, also agreed with the result but added observations of his own?

A. Yes.

Q. Judge Kononov, who starts at page 15 G(A)4/7.093/15, disagreed with the result and the reasoning?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, if we can just look, for example, at the side opinion of Judge Gadzhiyev who agreed with the result but added further observations. On page 14 G(A)4/7.093/14, just below halfway down the page, you will see a paragraph which begins:

"This conclusion is also corroborated in para[graph] 2.2 of the Resolution where it is stipulated that the freedom of contract may have its natural limits set by the basic premises of constitutional order and public peace."

And he is referring to 2.2 of the majority judgment, isn't he?

A. Yes, maybe he does. Let me have a look at the Russian wording of the separate opinion of Judge Gadzhiyev.

Q. Of course. (Pause)

A. Yes.

Q. Now, in the paragraph that I just referred to, which in English starts just below halfway down page 14, Judge Gadzhiyev seems to be pointing out that the rationale of the rule set out in paragraph 2.2 of the majority judgment must apply not just to for-profit agreements for legal services but to all civil agreements, because that's what he says, isn't it?

"In this case, using this public law argument, the Constitutional Court of the Russian Federation means all civil agreements in their entirety rather than just for-profit agreements for legal services."

That's the point he's making, isn't it?

A. Yes, and this confirms what I've said before. Sometimes agreements between law firms or other alone-standing lawyers and their clients are abused to pay bribes to officials and that's why Judge Gadzhiyev, who comes from Caucasus -- you may know that Caucasus is especially vulnerable to corruption out of other Russian regions -- he knows this from his personal life maybe, how it worked, because his relatives are also in Caucasus. He heard these stories. That's why he want to expand this reasoning for other situations, and quite right from my opinion.

Q. Now, if we look at the side opinion of Judge Kononov --

A. Are we through with Judge Gadzhiyev's separate opinion?

Q. Sorry?

A. Are we through with Judge Gadzhiyev?

Q. Yes, we are, but I don't want to stop you referring to some other passage in it if you think it relevant.

A. I think there is an interesting statement in item 2 which is on page 14 G(A)4/7.093/14, English text:

"To conclude, I believe it would be prudent to note that the issue at hand has no perfect solution, since any of the potential ways to resolve the problem would still be rife with serious social disadvantages.

"Prohibiting the use of contingency fees in agreements for legal services would have the following draw-backs."

He lists the draw-backs:

"One criterion less for assessing the quality of legal services rendered."

This means that sometimes the case is so difficult but on the other hand it is so interesting for the lawyers but yet the claimant has no funds to pay the lawyers, then the lawyer says, "Okay, I agree to work with you for free provided that, depending on the result, I get certain percentage", and there is nothing wrong about this.

Second:

"No additional remuneration for the service provider, which would promote equal pay for unequal effort."

I think that's a statement which supports that really you need to differentiate between various agreements for legal services.

Third:

"The parties would have an incentive to keep the transaction 'under the table'."

So I think it's just a simplification to say that either all agreements on provision of legal services in courts or, more broadly, as you do, all agreements on rendering legal services or even more broadly, which you still do, all agreements which involve public services are illegal because they contain some type of contingency or success fee.

Q. Dr Rachkov, what Judge Gadzhiyev is saying in that second paragraph of his side opinion is simply that this is a difficult question on which there are policy arguments for both possible answers, but he considers that the balance of policy advantages lie in preventing success fees. That's what he is saying, isn't it?

A. I don't know whether he actually says this. He says that if there is a contingency fee in a legal service contract for provision of services in court, then such contract may be unenforceable, like gambling.

Q. Well, if you look, what he says is -- he begins paragraph 2 by saying that there is no perfect answer. He then lists, as you've pointed out, three disadvantages -- or three advantages of contingency fees. He then says:

"On the other hand should the use of 'success fees' in agreements be allowed, this may give the service provider an incentive to try to obtain a favourable decision for the service recipient by any means whatsoever."

That, no doubt, is a veiled reference to corruption?

A. It's an allusion to corruption.

Q. Yes. So what he is saying is that, in spite of the fact that from some points of view contingency fees may be okay, nevertheless the balance of advantage and disadvantage suggests that they should not be allowed. That's what he is saying, isn't it?

A. Yes, but he says at the end of his opinion that the same economic result may be achieved by other means which are not contrary to the Russian constitution or the Civil Code. And actually, by doing so, he gave a kind of recommendation to the Russian legal community and also its clients explaining how they can, if you want, circumvent this prohibition of success fees in legal services contracts for representation in courts.

I don't know whether the Constitutional Court played a very positive role by doing so because if a sophisticated law firm has a look at Judge Gadzhiyev's opinion, I think this statement seriously undermines the stability and the credibility of what the court as a whole said.

Q. Dr Rachkov, what Judge Gadzhiyev is pointing out is that it would be possible to regulate fees in such a way that they would not have the vice of giving opportunities for corruption. That's what he is saying, isn't it?

A. You can construe that way. I construe it in a way that Judge Gadzhiyev gave a recommendation on how you can be compliant with the law on the one hand but still achieve the same economic result on the other hand. I don't speak about corruption though.

Q. Now, Dr Rachkov, you suggest, I think, in your sixth report at paragraph 135 G(A)1/1.03/212, that the Makayev decision should be read in the light of the informational letter of the Supreme Arbitrazh Court. Would you like to turn to paragraph 135 of your sixth report, you refer to information letter 121 of the Supreme Arbitrazh Court.

Now, I would just like to understand what you are saying about this letter. As I understand it, and you must correct me if I'm wrong, what this informational letter says is simply that if a lawyer has entered into a contingency fee arrangement which is unenforceable because of the Makayev principle, that lawyer can still recover a reasonable fee for his time and trouble even if he can't recover the contingency fee; is that what it's saying?

- A. It is difficult to say that way, because you see that information letter does not refer at all to the resolution of the Constitutional Court.

I think if you have a contract on provision of legal services in court containing a contingency fee, and if this particular provision is unenforceable, then indeed the default rule applies, which is the market value of the services is the indication for the remuneration.

- Q. Well, we can see what it says, can't we, in the first paragraph which you quote in paragraph 135

G(A)1/1.03/212.

"Where the amount of remuneration to be paid to a representative, and the obligation to pay that remuneration was dependent on the results of the court proceeding, the claim on compensation of trial costs shall be granted subject to a valuation of its reasonable limits."

Then there's a reference in the subsequent parts to hourly rates, user charges and so on. All that this information letter is saying is that if you do enter into a contingency fee agreement, that won't stop you from recovering your fees on an acceptable non-contingency basis. That's right, isn't it?

A. No, not really.

The case was about the following: the law firm got paid by its client. The client is entitled, if the decision is rendered in favour of the client, to get these costs reimbursed upon the court's judgment from the losing party, in accordance with the Arbitrazh Procedural Code of the Russian Federation --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Why is this issue relevant to anything I've got to decide in relation to Russian law, this particular addition?

MR SUMPTION: I believe not, but since Dr Rachkov --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What's the relevance of what you're saying in paragraph 135 to the issues of Russian law that I've got to decide?

A. It really depends on what Mr Sumption wants to say on the Constitutional Court resolution.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, you tell me why you think it's relevant for me to look at this case so that I can understand what the point is, because I don't at the moment.

A. I only wanted to say that if a condition, an essential term or an allegedly essential term is missing from the contract, ie the contingency fee cannot be agreed, this means that it deems nonwritten in that contract, then the services are paid by reference to the market value of these services, ie by reference to the effort --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I see, you're saying it doesn't affect certainty or enforceability of the contract, because you just have a quantum meruit substitute.

A. That's what I wanted to say, yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I understand.

MR SUMPTION: Now, let us assume that you have a contract with a politician, okay? The contract says -- the politician is a personal friend of the president and of some of the president's closest advisers, let's just assume that, shall we? And assume that a contract is made with that politician under which he agrees to persuade the president and his advisers to issue decrees which will give him and his business associates an opportunity to make large sums of money out of state assets. Now, would you agree that that is a contract with a potential for corruption?

A. I would agree with that.

Q. Would you agree therefore that such a contract is likely to be directly contrary to the principle of public policy identified in Makayev, by the majority?

A. If the -- yes. I mean, if the characteristic features of the crime, corruption, are combined, yes, this is a crime.

Q. Now, I want to turn, if I may, to the subject of the rules of Russian law about the circumstances in which an agreement must be recorded in writing. Now, I think you acknowledge in your report, don't you, that the parties may intend an agreement or arrangement, which they make, not to be legally binding? That is a possible situation in Russian law, is it not?

A. It is a possible situation.

Q. They don't have to expressly agree, do they, that their arrangement will not be legally binding; it's enough if the circumstances objectively show that they didn't intend it to be legally binding, would you agree?

A. Yes, besides such contract must have no pecuniary character, ie if no property is transferred between them or to a third party, if this is for instance an invitation to have a joint walk, then this is definitely not a civil law contract which is enforceable.

Q. An invitation to have a joint, and I missed the next word?

A. Walk. To walk outside.

Q. I see, right.

Well, the parties can surely agree to have an arrangement under which a contract, or an arrangement under which significant financial consequences follow but which they don't intend to be legally binding, can they not?

A. Yes, at the end of the day everything depends on what the parties intended and what they actually did afterwards.

Q. Of course. Now, would you agree that one circumstance which would tend to suggest, and I'm not saying it would be conclusive, but one circumstance which would tend to suggest that the parties didn't intend an arrangement to be legally binding is that they did not record it in writing?

A. No, I disagree with that.

Q. Now, I'm not suggesting to you that all contracts which are not made in writing are not intended to be legally binding, all I'm suggesting to you is that when the court comes to look at what the objective circumstances are, the fact that the parties did not reduce their agreement to writing may be one of them.

A. May be, excuse me?

Q. The fact that the parties did not reduce their agreement to writing may be one of the circumstances which the court would consider in deciding whether they intended it to be legally binding?

A. Yes, the court may consider this as one of the other circumstances.

Q. Now, I want, against that background, to turn to the effect of Articles 161 and 162 of the Civil Code, which you'll find at G(A)4/4, flag 2, pages 29 and 30 G(A)4/4.02/29.

Before I ask you about the details of these provisions, I'm right, am I not, in thinking that the Civil Code is a code of substantive law? It's not a code of procedure?

A. In principle the Civil Code is a code of substantive law, but Russian doctrine and also court judgments do recognise that some provisions are of procedural character and nature.

Q. Well, what they recognise is that some provisions of the Civil Code may have procedural consequences, that's right, isn't it?

A. No, they say explicitly these are procedural rules.

Q. Can you look at 161, please.

A. Yes.

Q. "The following must be made in simple written form, with the exception of transactions requiring notarial certification ..."

That's a reference to transactions which are dealt with separately in Article 165, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. So leaving aside contracts requiring notarial certification, there are categories of contracts listed here which require written form. The second of them is:

"Transactions of citizens with one another for a sum over ten times the minimum monthly wage established by a statute and, in cases provided by a statute, regardless of the sum of the transaction."

Okay?

A. Okay.

Q. Now, would you agree that the transaction alleged by Mr Berezovsky to have been made in this case is a transaction of citizens with one another for a sum over ten times the minimum monthly wage established by statute?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, this is a provision that deals with the circumstances in which an agreement must mandatorily be in writing, is it not?

A. Although the word "must" is used in Article 161, it does not mean that this is a real must, because it is not sanctioned by negative -- or by heavy negative legal consequences if the form is not complied with.

Q. Well, that's dealt with by 162, isn't it, "Consequences of Nonobservance of the Simple Written Form of a Transaction"?

A. Exactly.

Q. "Nonobservance of the simple written form of a transaction shall deprive the parties of the right, in case of a dispute, to rely for confirmation of the transaction and its terms upon the testimony of witnesses, but shall not deprive them of the right to adduce written and other evidence."

Okay? That's the consequence of noncompliance, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. Am I right in thinking that the object of this provision is to protect people against being held bound by high value transactions without some indisputable acknowledgement that they are bound, such for example as their signature on a written agreement? It's a protective provision, isn't it?

A. It is a protective provision. Russia is, at least in accordance with its constitution if not in the reality yet, a state of law insofar -- a state of rule of law, insofar as the main goal of the law is to give certainty and stability to the civil relations. Therefore clearly to have a stability you need to -- better to have a written contract than oral one.

Q. Yes, but this is a provision which has a social purpose, it's not just a rule for the efficient conduct of court proceedings?

A. What do you mean by this?

Q. What I'm suggesting to you, and what I think you've acknowledged, is that this is a provision -- let me break it up. This is a provision which has a social purpose?

A. Yes.

Q. In other words, it isn't a rule which is designed simply for the efficient conduct of disputes in court?

A. Yes, it has a broader role.

Q. Now, the consequence of noncompliance with 161 is that you can't prove the agreement by the evidence of witnesses. We've agreed to that?

A. Yes, we agreed -- you mean -- well, two things cannot be proven by witness statements. It's the mere fact that the transaction was entered into and its conditions. But, for instance, you can prove by witness statements the subsequent performance of the transaction.

Q. Well, what I think you say in your fourth report, and I've got in mind paragraph 151, is, as I understand it, your evidence is that although a party cannot produce witness evidence, he can produce "explanations", and I'll ask you in a moment to expand on what "explanations" are. That's right, that's what you're saying at 151, isn't it G(A)1/1.01/54?

A. Yes.

Q. Is it right that explanations are essentially submissions made by or on behalf of a party to a court? They're not evidence of witnesses, they are arguments and submissions made to a court, is that correct?

A. It is correct in a way that we have an umbrella notion of evidence in Russian procedural law which encompasses written evidence, oral evidence, statements of witnesses who are not parties to the trial nor third parties, so it's a separate role. And we have oral or written explanations of the parties which may be contained in the statement of claims or other documents or oral statements submitted to the court.

Q. Now, are explanations governed by the Arbitrazh Procedural Code, Article 81?

I'm not trying to test your memory, Dr Rachkov. If you turn to G(A)2/1, flag 8, you'll find the arbitrage Civil Code. Sorry, the Arbitrazh Procedural Code.

A. Thank you, it is not necessary. I frequently -- I am in arbitrazh courts.

Q. Well, I would like to ask you to look at it anyway so as to give my Lady the opportunity to do so.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You've got it at paragraph -- it's Article 81 we're looking at, is it?

A. Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You've got it at paragraph 150.

MR SUMPTION: There's also Article 88 which I wanted to compare with it.

If you just look at G(A)2/1, flag 8, we can see both articles together. Article 81 deals with explanations by a party of the circumstances known to him which may have significance, and is that contrasted with what we see on the following page, Article 88, "witness evidence", just as you described G(A)2/1.08/194?

A. Yes.

Q. And these are the two procedural code provisions which identify the two types of material?

A. Yes.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, there's not going to be a convenient moment.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No. Very well.

Dr Rachkov, I told you yesterday evening, but you mustn't discuss your evidence with anybody or the case over the luncheon break, okay.

THE WITNESS: Okay.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thanks very much. 2.05.

(1.02 pm)

(The short adjournment)

(2.05 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Sumption.

MR SUMPTION: Dr Rachkov, I was asking you when we broke to look at Articles 81 and 88 of the Arbitrazh Procedural Code, which identify and describe witness evidence and explanations. The witness evidence is dealt with by Article 88, and can you confirm, I think it's in sub-article 3, that witness evidence is, in principle, to be given orally but the court may propose that the witness set out his evidence in writing
G(A)2/1.08/194.

A. This is correct.

Q. The evidence that he has given orally, in writing, when he has already given his evidence, is that right?

A. This is correct.

Q. In that case, is it right that both the oral evidence and the written version are witness evidence, as the term is understood in Russian law?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, could you please take bundle G(A)4/4 at flag 5. You won't need for the moment bundle G(A)2/1, so if you want to get rid of some of the stuff on your desk, feel free.

If you would like to get rid of G(A)2/1 and turn to G(A)4/4, which I think you may have from an earlier stage of the evidence. In flag 5 of 4/4 if you've got that.

A. No, not yet. Oh, 4/4, excuse me.

Q. It's 4/4, flag 5. This is the Code of Civil Procedure.

I'm referring you to this because it contains provisions about explanations by parties and third parties in section 68, page 98 of the volume G(A)4/4.05/98.

That provides, in subsection 1:

"Explanations by parties and third parties of facts known to them that are significant for proper consideration of the case are subject to verification and evaluation together with other evidence."

Now, is the effect of that that if you make a point by way of explanation, it's got to be verified before the court can treat it as a statement of fact that it can rely on, is that right?

A. If there are other evidences, then indeed the oral explanations must be compared with those, and the judge comes to the conclusion whether or not it is true what is said in oral explanations.

Q. Yes, but isn't the effect of section 68.1 that if a party gives an explanation, in the technical sense of the word, if he wants that taken into account by the judge in deciding what the facts are, he's got to verify it by producing evidence to support it?

A. It depends on the contents of explanations. If explanations relate to notorious facts which are known to everybody, then of course the judge does not need to double-check it.

The other situation is, for instance, if the defendant being in court does not object, which means that he accepted this explanation.

Q. But if a party wishes to give evidence of facts known particularly to him, and not notorious, then unless the other side don't object the rule is that he has got to verify his explanations by evidence, isn't it?

A. If there are such evidences, yes, of course.

Q. Well, if there aren't, then he can't verify it at all, isn't that right?

A. It really depends on the specific case, what exactly is explained.

Q. Isn't the rule very simple: an explanation is basically a submission, it's not evidence. If you make an explanation to the court which involves asserting some fact, you've got to prove it by producing some evidence; it's as simple as that, isn't it?

A. No. In accordance with Russian classification of evidences, oral explanations are evidences.

Q. Well --

A. However, of course, the judge in every particular case needs to weigh it and to identify what is the weight of such evidence as explanation.

Q. Well, oral explanations, Dr Rachkov, are not evidence, are they? That's why in the Arbitrazh Procedural Code they are dealt with separately in distinct Articles, 81 and 88, and why in the Civil Procedure Code there's a provision saying that explanations have got to be verified by evidence.

MR RABINOWITZ: Before the witness answers this, my learned friend may not have this to his mind, but, in fact, the experts have agreed in the joint memorandum that they are evidence. This is at paragraph 12.4, page 5 of bundle 6/1 G(A)6/1.01/5.

MR SUMPTION: Well, my learned friend is quite right to say that I don't have that to my mind but let me have a look.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What paragraph?

MR SUMPTION: It's paragraph 12, sub-4.

MR RABINOWITZ: Page 5.

MR SUMPTION: I'm not sure that my learned friend's point is right, with respect, because what is said here is that:

"Such explanations are a type of evidence, but they are not ... 'witness evidence', and ... are not precluded by Article 162.1."

Then the next sentence says:

"As noted below, however, it is disputed whether the parties' explanations have any independent weight (absent any documentary or physical proof)."

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It's as clear as mud to me.

Perhaps you can help me, Dr Rachkov. Just explain to me what an explanation is.

A. It can be any statement concerning the factual circumstances surrounding either the situation, how the parties came to a contract. It can be an explanation on what the contract says in the -- to the best of the parties' knowledge and belief.

For instance, if the parties use the word "trust" in their contract, it may be that one party understands this word in one way and the other party understands it in another way. But it may also well be that both parties did figure out something common under the word "trust", although this word is not used in the Russian law, in the written law adopted by the parliament.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But is it a submission -- Mr Sumption, I think is suggesting to you that it could be a submission.

A. Unfortunately I'm not familiar with the rules of procedure in England so I cannot --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Forget English law. There is a contract which says A trusts B to pay some money into C's bank account. Is an explanation something that A gives as to why he entered into that agreement?

A. For instance, yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Which is his reasons for entering into the agreement.

A. Correct.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is a proposition put by A's lawyer as to what, as a matter of law, is meant by that provision, an explanation?

A. It can be anything. It can be any explanation of whatever kind --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So it can be a legal explanation as well as --

A. It can be a legal explanation. It can be a legal --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So a legal argument put forward by A's lawyer as to what those words mean, a contract which says A trusts B to pay some money into C's bank account --

A. Correct.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: -- is an explanation?

A. It is an explanation. It can also be an explanation to the effect that the parties did not conclude a contract because such and such essential terms were not agreed upon. It can be an explanation to the effect that one party believes that the contract was concluded but is invalid. It can be an explanation that the contract was concluded, is valid, but was not performed, or was not duly performed.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So it can mean an explanation of a factual matter as well as the statement of a legal proposition?

A. Yes.

MR SUMPTION: Suppose we have --

A. I can maybe, just to give an idea of what explanations are: an explanation is there to help the court understand the factual background on the one hand, but on the other hand identify the legal provisions which are applicable to construe the legal provisions, to apply them to the facts as described by the parties.

Q. Suppose you have a pure question of fact, there is an issue in the case, let's suppose, about whether an agreement was made between A and B as to whether A would sell B his car, all right? One party says this agreement was made orally on such and such a day.

I said "Will you sell me your car for $1,000," and he said "Yes," right? The other party says, "I wasn't there at all and I've never made an agreement like that."

So you have a pure question of fact, right? Now, can a party address the court without witness evidence by way of explanation and say, "I made this agreement on such and such a day", can he do that?

- A. The court will not agree with this position so -- of course, anyone can do anything, but clearly if there is no performance, and the court cannot understand whether or not the contract was concluded or was not concluded, the explanation is meaningless in this particular case.
- Q. Yes. So if you have an issue about whether an agreement was ever made and, if it was made, what the parties agreed, what they said, you can't just give an explanation without evidence, can you? You've got to produce evidence to support it?
- A. Yes, you must evidence as a claimant everything which you say, whether as a matter of fact or as a matter of law, unless the burden of proof is imposed on the other party.
- Q. And if you have an agreement which is not in writing and of which there is no documentary evidence, then the only way that you can do that, surely, is to produce witness evidence?

A. It may well be if the agreement, as concluded orally, presumed or provided for certain payments. You can also produce the payment order, an excerpt from the bank account, which indicates that the payment was actually credited to the bank account of the recipient party.

Q. Yes, I can see that sometimes you may have an oral agreement of which there is documentary evidence. But if we suppose that there is an oral agreement, and there is no documentary evidence of the agreement, then the only way you're going to be able to prove it is by witness evidence; that's right, isn't it?

A. Not necessarily. I have a very interesting case in front of me, maybe you can have a look at bundle G(A)7/1, and there is a last flag, which is 23. It's G(A)7/1 G(A)7/1.23/248.

Q. Right, where should we be looking? Which flag is this?

A. It's 23. I'm not sure whether I shall give a brief description of this case?

Q. Yes, if you want to rely on it.

A. Well, the claimant was layering flooring in a private flat of a customer without having entered into a written agreement before. The claimant said that the agreement was that he gets paid 200 rubles a square metre, whereas the defendant said she wants to pay only 50 rubles per square metre. Besides, there was apparently an argument about whether or not an agreement at all was entered into.

The claimant tried to produce an audio record in the court of the first instance. However, the court of the first instance decline to listen to this audio record. That's why the court of the upper instance decided that, on the one -- well, the court of the upper instance decided to return the case for re-examination to the very low level because this was the third instance already.

The case went through the justice of the peace, which is the lowest level of the Russian justice of the common jurisdiction, and then went on to Chkalovsky district court of Nizhny Novgorod region, and landed at the end of the day with the Nizhny Novgorod oblast or region court.

So I think this gives a clear indication that the explanations of the parties may well serve as an evidence which is taken into account together with other evidences, and is not less valuable than another type of evidence, namely a written one.

Q. Well, what this decided was that under two specific provisions of the Civil Code, I'm looking at page 252 of the bundle numbering G(A)7/1.23/252, an audio recording of the alleged agreement was regarded as evidence?

A. Yes, by the court of the final appeal instance though.

Q. Yes. Well, it was regarded as evidence equivalent to written evidence, wasn't it?

A. I'm not sure it was regarded as equal to the written evidence. Believe it or not, there is no hierarchy of evidences in Russian law. It may well be that a claimant files a claim to the court and the defendant does not appear and then, of course, the claimant -- the court can only rely on the evidences, including written ones, including explanations, provided by the claimant.

Q. Well, what this appears to have decided is that there was a specific provision for the admission of evidence on such an issue contained in two articles of the Civil Code, namely 55, part 2, and 77. That's what it actually decided, isn't it?

A. No. I think the court tried to figure out whether there is anything else than simply an oral contract plus controversial statements from both parties whether or not the oral agreement was made; and, second, what the price of the services was, of the works was. So that's why the court -- it was important for the court to listen to the audio record which was provided by the claimant actually.

- Q. Now, that is effectively a form of witness evidence, isn't it? What you are doing is proving an audio recording of somebody speaking? That's the basis on which this was admitted?
- A. Unfortunately not. The written evidence is something else than audio or video record.
- Q. Well, this wasn't written evidence --
- A. In accordance with the Russian civil procedure and arbitrage procedure.
- Q. This wasn't written evidence, was it? It was an audio recording?
- A. It was not written evidence.
- Q. No. You, as I understand it, suggest that any document can provide documentary evidence of an agreement and be admissible, notwithstanding 161 and 162.
- For example, you give the example in your sixth report, paragraph 59 G(A)1/192. You say that because a newspaper is a document, a newspaper report may provide documentary evidence of an agreement, is that your evidence?
- A. It can be in evidence if it contains facts which are not a lie, for instance --
- Q. Which are not?
- A. Which are not a lie, so --

Q. Which are not untrue?

A. Yes, which are not untrue, correct.

Q. How do you establish whether they are untrue?

A. The court evaluates the evidence based on its internal perception, on its experience, on whether or not the documents are related to the case. For instance it may well be that -- and happens actually in court -- claimants or defendants try to provide the court with completely unrelated documents, then the court says, "Okay, I think this is not related to this case, it's not important for me to decide".

There can also be documents which are obtained by many undue methods, then this evidence can not be used either. But in general, the purpose of Russian legal provisions regulating the evidence is to make sure that the court has a very clear picture on what happened and what kind of law must be applied and how.

Q. You see, pursuing your newspaper example, suppose that a person wishes to give -- a party to an action wishes to give his own witness evidence to say there was an oral agreement, and the court says, under 161.2, "I'm sorry, you can't give evidence of this agreement because the value exceeds ten times the statutory minimum wage."

Now you're not suggesting, are you, that if the party is told that, he can go away and give an interview to a newspaper, and then produce the newspaper as a documentary record of the agreement, or are you suggesting that?

A. No, no, I'm not suggesting that.

Q. You say that Article 161 is classified, as a matter of Russian law, as procedural?

A. Yes.

Q. That is part of your evidence, is it not?

A. Correct.

Q. Now, I've put it to you, and you've answered this, that it is part of a code of substantive law, to which your answer is "In principle, yes, but there are some things in the Civil Code that would be counted as procedural," and I've also put it to you, and I think you agreed, that this one has a social and not just a procedural purpose?

A. Definitely. The requirement to enter into a written contract has many purposes. One of them is that the state knows what its citizens agreed upon, that the citizens pay taxes, and how shall the state understand what was agreed, which money was transferred where, if there is no written contract?

Q. Now, you're not, as I understand it, or perhaps you are, suggesting that you can get round the social purpose of 161.2 simply by tendering your account of the facts by way of submission; you're not suggesting that, are you?

A. I'm afraid I don't fully understand your question.

Q. Perhaps I shouldn't have used the word "submission".

You're not suggesting, as I understand your evidence, that you can get round Article 161, sub-article 2, of the Civil Code simply by giving your account of the facts by way of explanations instead of by way of witness evidence?

A. Maybe not, but I can give you an example, which is not produced as a judgment here but I can easily produce this judgment to the court.

We as a law firm entered in July 2008 into an agreement for provision of legal services with a major Russian development company whose shares were traded at that time at the stock exchange. I was commanded to attend the premises of that, of the management of that company in Moscow, and they pushed me a lot under time pressure to render the legal advice as soon as possible. I did so. We generated appropriate legal fees. However, we did not enter into a written contract because of lack of time.

Later on, when we issued an invoice, the client said there was no oral agreement, no services were rendered, nothing. However, we filed a claim with the Russian court, the defendant did not appear, the defendant did not produce any evidence. We evidenced what exactly was rendered in terms of services, so I provided email exchange which was, however, mostly unilateral, so a few emails which I got back from the client, mainly sending minutes of meetings of its board of directors to me. One of the points in the objections of the former client was that there was no agreement, the court granted our claim in both instances. This is a development of this year.

- Q. So the position in that case was that first of all you had documentary evidence, and, secondly, there was no objection to your deploying it from the other side because they didn't appear; that's right, isn't it?
- A. No, they provided written objections to the court.
- Q. But you had documentary evidence?
- A. I had some documentary evidence, and this shows that the Russian court relies on the totality of evidence available.
- Q. If a particular oral agreement is being made, for which the only evidence is the recollection of witnesses, you can't prove it in a Russian court, can you?
- A. No, you cannot.
- Q. In your evidence, as we've established, you say that this is a rule of procedure. Is it right that the question whether it is procedural or substantive has never actually been decided in a Russian court, so far as anyone can discover; is that right?

A. To the best of my knowledge, it was not, yes. I mean, maybe it's so commonplace that there is no need to decide on it.

Q. Well, one reason for that, I imagine, is that in a Russian court it wouldn't matter whether it was procedural or substantive because it would be the law in either case which a Russian court would apply. So it's not something a Russian court would ever have to decide?

A. Yes, I agree with you.

Q. On the other hand, a foreign court might have to decide it, or a Russian court might have to decide it when receiving evidence of a foreign law because of the distinction between substantive and procedural law in private international law. You understand that, don't you?

A. I understand it.

Q. Now, would you agree that the consensus among legal scholars in Russia is that Article 161 is a substantive rule?

A. No, I disagree with that. I think the consensus among Russian scholars is that the rule to the effect that agreements cannot be evidenced by witness statements, if the agreements are oral, is of procedural nature.

I refer to such authorities as Professor Molchanov, Professors Mozolin and Masliaev, and these are paragraphs 152, 153 of my fourth report G(A)1/1.01/54.

- Q. Would you agree that Professor Lunts is a highly respected academic authority on these matters?
- A. In which matters, excuse me?
- Q. On questions of procedure and contract?
- A. No, I wouldn't agree with that. Professor Lunts was a specialist of Soviet time in private international law. He died maybe more than 20 years ago when the old Soviet rule applied.
- Q. Well, the rule about proof of contracts is in fact older than the Civil Code of the 1990s, isn't it?
- A. Maybe so. I don't know the wording by heart. I can imagine that it is, yes.
- Q. Can we look at Professor Lunts's book, G(A)7/2, flag 1. Now, the reason I'm referring you to Professor Lunts is that he is the one Russian scholar that we have found who appears to deal with this precisely in the context of private international law, looking at the classification for the purposes of private international law G(A)7/2.01/1-4.
- MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just remind me, Mr Sumption, under English PIL rules, is it for this court to characterise the rule, or is it for this court to have regard to how the foreign law characterises the rule?

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, it is for this court to classify the rule by enquiring what is the nature and purpose of the rule and how it functions, but for that purpose it is relevant to consider what the consequences are and how it is classified in the foreign system. It is not conclusive how the foreign system classifies it, because the foreign system may be applying criteria which would not be recognised as valid by an English court.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I see. At the end of the day I have to make my mind up, but it's informed by how it's classified as a matter of the domestic foreign law.

MR SUMPTION: Among other matters, yes. In our submission, your Ladyship will need to look at the purpose, nature and consequences of this and take a view, as a matter of English private international law, that the foreign law's approach to it is relevant in that exercise.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

MR SUMPTION: Dr Rachkov, if you've got there the extract from this textbook open, in the first paragraph of paragraph 6 G(A)7/2.01/3, the first block of highlighted text, is the professor making the point that a provision of the Code preventing the parties from relying on witness evidence may simply be the procedural consequence of a substantive rule of law?

Just read through it and tell me whether you agree with that summary. (Pause)

A. And the summary is? Can you repeat, please, because I was reading the --

Q. Of course. Have you read that first block of text?

A. Yes, I did.

Q. As I understand it, and correct me if I'm wrong, the point that the Professor is making here is that the provision of the Code, which prevents parties relying on witness evidence, and he is referring to the older Soviet codes here, may simply be a procedural consequence of a substantive rule of law.

Do you agree that that's what he's saying?

A. Yes, the procedural consequence of the substantive rule of law.

Q. Now, in the second paragraph, the part immediately under the highlighted block of text, is Professor Lunts making the point that the exclusion of witness evidence under a foreign legal system would be respected in a Russian court if it had a substantive purpose. He cites as an example Article 1341 of the French Civil Code.

A. I don't think he mentions a Russian court, he gives an abstract case.

Q. Yes, but this is a textbook, isn't it, on Russian rules of private international law?

- A. It is a textbook on Russian civil procedure, international civil procedure, or not Russian, international civil procedure.
- Q. Well, it's specifically directed to the position in Russia, isn't it?
- A. Well, it was written in, whatever, 1976, to deal with the Civil Code of the then Russia which was part of the Soviet Union.
- Q. I understood it to have been written in 2002. It may be an up-to-date edition.
- A. It is just a reprint of a book which was written in 1976.
- Q. Well, it refers to the Fundamentals of Civil Legislation, Article 125, which was promulgated in 1991?
- A. Yes, but Professor Lunts has a co-author whose name is Marysheva, and of course, because the book was printed in 2002, there was some update with references to them.
- Q. In England we use a book called Dicey, Morris & Collins, notwithstanding that Dicey has been dead for about 100 years.

The point that is being made in the block of text between the two highlighted blocks is that:

"... in accordance with Article 125 of the Fundamentals of the Civil Legislation [when] the form of a document is governed by foreign law, it is impossible to admit the witness testimony if according to this foreign law the witness testimony may not be accepted instead of or in disproof of the written document, as for example it is provided for by Article 1341 of the French Civil Code."

Now, what that is saying is that if you had an equivalent provision to Article 161 in a foreign legal system which it was sought to rely on, and a contract for example governed by that foreign legal system was being deliberated on in a Russian court, the Russian court would apply the foreign code equivalent of 161 as if it was a substantive rule. That's the point he's making, isn't it?

A. That's apparently the point he's making.

Q. You see, 1341, I don't know whether you're familiar with other systems of civil law apart from the Russian one, Dr Rachkov?

A. Yes, with German law.

Q. Yes. Well, I think the same applies in the German Civil Code. It's a very common principle, isn't it, in the civil law systems, French, German, Swiss, for example, that there are provisions that above a minimum value threshold, oral evidence is not admissible to establish an agreement; that's quite a common principle, isn't it?

A. I'm more familiar with the substantive law than procedural law of Germany, and in accordance with the material -- with the substantive law of Germany, if an entrepreneur sends an offer to the other entrepreneur, and the other entrepreneur remains silent, the offer is accepted.

Q. Let's look at the example which Professor Lunts, or perhaps it's Marysheva, actually cites, which is Article 1341 of the French Civil Code. You'll find that in flag 3 of the same bundle. And it is substantially the same as Article 161, isn't it?

There's an English translation if you would prefer to read it in English.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: When you say the same bundle?

MR SUMPTION: Flag 3 of 7/2. Does your Ladyship have that?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Flag 3 of 7/2.01?

MR SUMPTION: In my bundle it's flag 3, and the page reference is G(A)7/2.03/11.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR SUMPTION: That's the English translation of Article 1341 of the French Civil Code which provides that:

"An instrument before [notaries] or under private signature must be executed in all matters exceeding a sum or value fixed by decree [currently 5,000 francs or 800 euros], even for voluntary deposits, and no proof by witness is allowed against or beyond the contents of instruments, or as to what is alleged to have been said before, at the time of, or after the instruments, although it is a question of a lesser sum or value."

Now, 1341 therefore is like Article 161, although there are some differences between them, a provision excluding witness evidence in relation to transactions above a minimum value.

That's the kind of thing which Professor Lunts and Dr Marysheva are suggesting would be classified as substantive by a Russian court?

- A. It may well be that they classify that way, but I do not fully understand what the relation of the French Code Napoleon, for our case, is. That's the first remark.

And the second remark is, as I understood the French wording, because I'm fluent in French as well, the contents of this rule is broader than the Russian one. The Russian law only says the mere fact of the transaction and its terms may not be evidenced by oral statements. Other facts can well be evidence, for instance performance.

- Q. You're quite right that the French rule is in that respect broader than the Russian one, but what they have in common is that they exclude witness evidence to establish the existence or terms of an agreement above a certain value threshold, and that in a Russian court,

I suggest to you, would be regarded as a substantive rule, and gives one some guidance as to how the Russian courts would classify 161, sub-article 2, if they ever had to decide that question. Do you agree?

- A. No, I don't agree. I think it's a far-reaching conclusion.

I refer in my sixth report to a number of not least authoritative sources, like Zhuikov and Treushnikov, "Commentary to the Civil Procedural Code", this is paragraph 61 G(A)1/1.03/193; to a commentary of Professors Abova and Kabalkin, which also say that this rule is procedural; to the commentary of Grishaev and Erdelevsky. So I think there are at least three very alternative sources which confirm the correctness of what I've said.

- Q. But the only context, surely, in which this would ever have to be decided is an issue of private international law?
- A. Is it a question?
- Q. Yes. I'm asking you whether you disagree with that?
- A. I do not understand which role the private international law can play here. We have an agreement which was entered into between two Russian citizens. The agreement was to be performed in Russia. So there is no space to me to apply private international law.

The private international law answers basically the question which law shall be applied? Shall it be Russian law? Shall it be a foreign law? I do not see how and why any foreign laws in(?) Russian shall be applied to the 1995 or 1996 agreement.

- Q. I'm not going to debate with you the question whether the matters I'm asking you about are relevant. That's a matter in due course for my Lady. But it arises, if I may just inform you, from the fact that although these matters are governed by Russian law, they are being determined by an English court.

Now, can you think of any other context in which it would matter whether a rule of Russian law was procedural or substantive, except private international law context?

- A. Whenever a dispute arises between parties to a contract this rule applies, and whenever these parties are Russian citizens who entered into a contract which is governed by Russian law.

- Q. Can you look at the final paragraph in the extract from Professor Lunts's book G(A)7/2.01/3:

"In regard to such cases of close connection between the procedural provision and substantive law, DI Polumordvinov in the mentioned book reasonably notes that non-admission of the witness testimony for proving existence and content of some civil law transactions provided in the legislation of several states (USSR, English-American and Romanic countries) represents a direct consequence of those legal forms which determine the form of transaction. If the court, he denotes, admits proving [of a contract] by means of witness testimony, it would violate the substantive legal norms of that foreign state which it is obliged to apply resolving the dispute on merits."

Now is the point being made here this: that if the rule in question, and we're talking about Article 161, sub-article 2, reflects a rule of legal policy, then one would expect it to be applied in any court which was applying the foreign law in question, in this case Russian law; isn't that the point that's being made?

- A. It may well be. I think it's always difficult to comment on some excerpts which are taken from a book, which in turn refers to an excerpt from a second other book.

I don't know who Polumordvinov is and what exactly he says in the context of his work.

- Q. Well, neither do I know who he is, but I am suggesting to you that that is the opinion expressed by this book, because it endorses Mr Polumordvinov's view and explains its implications, doesn't it?

A. It may well be, yes.

Q. Now, if we turn to Professor Zhuikov, who is one of the authors that you say we should be referring to in this context. Could we look at paragraph 92 of your fourth report, G(A)3/1, flag 2, page 93 G(A)3/1.02/93.

A. Can you repeat the --

Q. This is not your fourth report, forgive me, this is Mr Rozenberg's fourth report, but it contains a quotation from Professor Zhuikov.

You haven't got it yet, I'm sorry, I should have waited.

At G(A)3/1, flag 2, page 93, paragraph 92, Mr Rozenberg quotes from Professor Zhuikov. Just to identify him, he is currently, is this right, the deputy chairman of the Russian Supreme Court, is that correct?

A. I think so, I'm not very up-to-date, but he was for a while at least, yes.

Q. Now, his work is being quoted here:

"Admissibility of evidence [he says], as a rule of proof in the civil law procedure, is connected first of all with the existence of the norms of substantive (civil) law regarding determination of the scope of possible evidentiary materials in a specific case. Certain types of evidence may be excluded by norms of substantive law from the list of [admissible] sources of information about legally meaningful facts."

Now, is Professor Zhuikov making the same point here as Professor Lunts is making in the book that I've just referred you to, namely that some procedural rules reflect substantive rules of law?

A. It may well be. Can I please ask to provide me with the annex to this statement by Mr Rozenberg?

Q. You mean the text he's referring to?

A. Yes, Professor --

Q. You'll find it in tab 26 of MAR4, which I think is in -- you'll need G(A)4/2 I think.

Sorry, let me just find the reference for you. It's 4/5 I'm told. You want tab 26 in this bundle, which is G(A)4/5.26/68.

A. Can I also please ask to provide me with my own report and annexes to the sixth report, please?

Q. By all means. Which one do you want?

A. The same. So I mean Mr Rozenberg indicates a commentary but translated it only up to clause 6, and I would like to refer to clause 8.

Q. Yes, by all means. But can I just, while that is being fetched, invite your attention to paragraph 5 which is the passage quoted by Mr Rozenberg?

A. Yes, I understand this paragraph.

Q. Yes. Now, is the point that is being made by Professor Zhuikov in this passage that a rule of procedural law may reflect a norm of substantive law?

A. I understand what Professor Zhuikov says: a rule of procedural law can reflect a rule of substantive law, which means that -- excuse me, which means that apparently he wants to say this is a commentary to the Civil Procedure Code, not to the Civil Code. He wants to say by this that the Civil Procedural Code may contain some substantive law rules, not vice versa.

Q. Right.

A. Can I now refer to mine?

Q. Yes, by always means. Are you looking for flag 31?

A. Correct.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can somebody give me the reference, please?

MR SUMPTION: It's G(A)2/5.31/139.

A. What he says there is:

"Civil procedural rules are contained in many substantive acts: Civil Code of the Russian Federation, Housing Code [and so on]. So, for example, according to Article 162 of the Civil Code of Russian Federation disregard of the simple written form of a transaction divests the parties, in the event of a dispute, of the right to refer the witness evidence in support of the transaction and its conditions, but does not divest them of the right to produce written and other evidence. By its legal nature, this rule is a civil procedural rule regulating the admissibility of evidence in the civil process."

- Q. If you look at 7/2.02/7, you will see another extract from Professor Zhuikov's commentary.
- A. I'm afraid there is nothing inside.
- Q. Do you have 7/2, flag 2? Do you not have a flag 2 in that?
- A. Yes, flag 2, I do have.
- Q. Is that another extract from the Civil Procedure Code of Professor Zhuikov, his commentary on it rather?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Are we still in GA?

MR SUMPTION: Yes, it's G(A)7/2. Do you have that?

- A. Yes.
- Q. Does Professor Zhuikov cite Article 162 as an example of a norm of substantive law or a consequence of it? If you look at the highlighted text on page 7:

"In addition, norms of substantive law establish other rules having significance for the civil legal proceedings: on admissibility of evidence; on presumptive (prima facie) evidence and burden of proof; on who is the proper claimant in a case; on the right of a court, if the interests of justice so require, to go beyond the subject and grounds of a claim ...

"The following norms may be given as an example.

"According to Section 1 of Article 162 ... failure to conclude a transaction in the simple written form shall in the case of a dispute deprive the parties of their right to refer to witness testimony in order to confirm the transaction and its terms, though shall not deprive them of the right to adduce written and other evidence."

Then various other examples are given.

What Professor Zhuikov appears to be saying is that Article 162 in fact reflects a substantive rule(?) of law. Do you agree that is what he is saying?

A. That this is what I'm saying, what he is saying?

Q. You both say that, do you?

A. No, I don't say this, and he doesn't say it either.

Q. What do you understand him to be saying when he says:

"In addition, norms of substantive law establish other rules having significance for the civil ... proceedings..."

A. This means exactly what I said before. This means that the Civil Code, which basically contains substantive law, can also contain procedural rules, and Article 162, paragraph 1, is one of these examples, that this is a procedural rule of law.

Q. The point is actually very simple, isn't it, Dr Rachkov?

Article 161 is a substantive rule of law, Article 162 is a procedural consequence of that substantive rule of law. Article 161 therefore falls to be applied by any court applying Russian law?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you disagree?

A. No, I agree with that.

Q. Thank you.

A. I would not call Article 162, paragraph 1, a procedural consequence of the substantive rule, I would say it is a procedural rule of law, but it's just, I don't think there is a big difference between you and I.

Q. Well, we are at any rate agreed that Article 161 is a substantive rule of law?

A. 161 is a substantive rule of law.

Q. I understand. Now, can we deal briefly, Dr. Rachkov, with your point about subsequent performance which you have mentioned on a number of occasions this morning, and which I said I would come back to you.

Is the basis of -- first of all, it's common ground I think between you and the other experts that the way in which the parties have performed, or appear to have performed an agreement may be evidence of what its terms were; is that a point that you agree with the other experts upon?

A. Yes, it can first indicate whether or not the contract was concluded based on Article 438, paragraph 3, of the Civil Code. It can also indicate what the parties agreed and how they performed this agreement.

Q. Well, if we look at joint memorandum, paragraph 24 --

A. Can I please ask someone to provide me with the joint memorandum.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You have rather a lot of bundles there. Would you like to get rid of some?

MR SUMPTION: Yes, I apologise for that. If you could keep bundle G(A)4/4 in front of you and for the moment I suggest we dispose of the others.

Now, paragraph 24 of the joint memorandum G(A)6/1.01/9, I understand it to be:

"... agreed that where both parties have performed a contract without dispute, and there is evidence of such performance, such evidence shall be taken into account by a Russian court when assessing whether or not a contract was concluded.

Now, that's the proposition on which the experts are agreed, isn't it?

A. Correct.

Q. Is the basis of that Article 431 of the Civil Code, which we referred to for another purpose this morning, which refers in the second paragraph to subsequent performance as evidence of the terms of an alleged agreement?

A. It's not only 431, it is also 438, paragraph 3, in connection with 434 paragraph 3. So 431, 434 --

Q. I'm just looking for 438 which is not in the extract that I ...

Now, if we look at one of the other propositions that's agreed, if you look back at the joint memorandum, you will see that at 25.3 it's agreed:

"At a minimum... the performance of the contract may shed light on the content of their original agreement in accordance with Article 431."

That of course does not summarise the whole of your view, but that's a proposition on which you agree with the other experts?

A. Yes, since I subscribed to this joint memorandum, that's what I think.

Q. Now, does it follow from that proposition that subsequent performance may enable the terms of the original agreement to be defined with greater precision than would otherwise have been possible without it?

A. Yes, the performance clarifies what was agreed upon, yes.

Q. Now, does that mean that subsequent performance may give certainty to a contract which would otherwise have lacked it?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, suppose that a contract was non-concluded because an essential term wasn't agreed or wasn't sufficiently defined, okay? Suppose that. Would you agree that subsequent performance cannot save that contract unless it shows that the essential terms were in fact agreed or sufficiently defined?

A. No, I don't agree with what you are saying, Mr Sumption. The idea is that -- imagine there is an essential term which was not initially agreed. However, despite this fact, the parties started performing their contract as they understood that contract, and the specific performance replenished the gap in regulation of the contract. There are many cases to which I refer in my report which indicate that it happens quite often in Russia, maybe due to some negligence of the parties to the contract, that they do not agree on something.

For instance, there was a case where the parties entered into a construction contract. In accordance with the rules of Russian law they must agree on, for instance, the technical documentation which must be provided by the customer or the contractor. However, they did not. Still the contractor constructed the building using the technical documentation which he developed without any consent of the customer, and the customer accepted this, the result of these construction works.

So the court came to the conclusion that although indeed the contract was not initially concluded due to the lack of this essential term, later on, due to the performance, the contract was cured, if you want, by the subsequent performance.

- Q. Presumably the juridical basis of that was that the parties subsequently, by conduct, entered into a more specific agreement than they originally had, is that right?
- A. Well, it was a bit more complicated. As I said, the customer did not approve the technical documentation for the construction of the building in advance. He just accepted the result of the works.
- Q. Yes. Well, what that means is that the parties subsequently conducted themselves in a way that added to the obligations that they originally undertook. Is that correct?
- A. It was an amendment to the initial agreement in a way that they replenished the provision which was lacking in their initial contract.
- Q. So by their conduct, they amended the original agreement, and the amended agreement had the certainty that the original one lacked?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, if I can refer you back to the joint memorandum which I think you've still got open in front of you, paragraph 25(2) at G(A)6/1.01/9. This is the part where the experts all agree that:

"The principle [of relying on subsequent performance] can only apply, if the performance makes it possible to define the essential term which was otherwise undefined."

That's a proposition that you agree about, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, does that mean that if the parties behave in a way that is consistent with a number of possible different terms, then the subsequent performance isn't going to help much. Do you follow my point?

A. Not really.

Q. Okay, let me try to put it again. Let's suppose that you have an agreement which is non-concluded because some specific and essential term has been left undefined, all right? Let's suppose that the parties subsequently behave in a way that is equally consistent with their having agreed two or three different things. In other words, you can't identify the term which is implicit in their behaviour because it is consistent with quite a number of terms, do you follow my example?

- A. I can hardly imagine what do you mean, so how does it work in practice?
- Q. Would you agree that the subsequent conduct has got to be unambiguous? It's got to be conduct which points to a particular term having been agreed and nothing else?
- A. Yes, the subsequent conduct must identify the essential term which was not agreed upon initially.
- Q. Yes. So if, for example, the parties were to make a payment to each other, and those payments were equally consistent with there being profit shares, or krysha, just to take a random example, you wouldn't be able to determine from the subsequent performance which was the right answer, would you?
- A. I'm really in troubles. I do not understand, what do you mean by krysha exactly?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Give a more simple example, not related to the facts of this case.

MR SUMPTION: Okay. If you have a contract and the parties have not agreed, let us say, the price of a car, let us suppose for example that I am alleged by my local church to have bought off them a car for £1,000, and the only evidence is that I paid them £1,000.

Now, I say that that was my annual contribution, my annual gift to the church's funds. They say, "No, it's the price of the car." Now, that's an example, isn't it, of a situation in which the performance alleged is ambiguous? It might be performance, it might not, depending on a whole host of other facts; do you agree?

A. In principle I agree. I would however have a look at your payment order, what you've indicated as the purpose of your payment order.

Q. I'm sure you would, but that is an illustration, perhaps a slightly artificial one, of the point which is being made by all three experts at 25.2, isn't it, which is that the principle of relying on subsequent conduct can only apply if the subsequent conduct enables you to demonstrate -- if the subsequent conduct was referable to a particular term and there's no other explanation of it?

A. Yes, but in your example, imagine there was an announcement at the church that they are selling their car at £1,000, who pays first gets the car. You were the first. What is wrong about it? Unless you've indicated in your payment order that this is your charity contribution.

Q. I quite see that, as with any example, if you add enough further facts you may make it less ambiguous, but whatever you do, the facts have got to point unambiguously to the parties having agreed a particular term. That's right, isn't it?

A. Yes, that's right.

Q. Thank you. Now, can we just turn briefly to sui generis agreements. This is dealt with at paragraph 62 of the joint memorandum which indicates that there is quite a large measure of common ground G(A)6/1.01/19.

Now, can I just ask you this: a sui generis agreement, does that simply mean an agreement which does not belong to some specific category provided for by the Civil Code?

A. Yes.

Q. And a contract which doesn't satisfy the requirements of the Civil Code relating to a simple partnership agreement may sometimes be valid as a sui generis or unclassified contract, is that right?

A. That's right.

Q. Now, suppose that an alleged partnership agreement is non-concluded because some term which is essential for a partnership agreement is either missing or insufficiently defined, okay? Suppose that. Would you agree that the alleged agreement can only be valid as a sui generis agreement if the relevant term, although essential to a partnership agreement, is not essential to a sui generis agreement?

A. The question is too complicated, can you please shorten it a bit?

Q. Let's suppose that you have an agreement which is said to be a partnership agreement, okay? And let's suppose that it is non-concluded because there is some term, essential to a partnership agreement, that is either missing or insufficiently defined, all right?

A. All right.

Q. Now, that could only be valid as a sui generis agreement if the essential terms required for the validity of a sui generis agreement were different, do you agree?

A. Different or less.

Q. Yes.

A. For instance, I can give you a good example. The partners entered into a joint activity agreement or, as I call it, a simple partnership contract but there was nothing but this as indication. So on the top there was just a title, "Joint Activity Contract" or "Simple Partnership Contract".

From the content however you derive only one obligation, to keep the information exchanged confidential and, second, if one party discloses this information without the prior written consent of the other party, this may be sanctioned with a contractual penalty of X. Then a joint simple -- sorry, a joint activity agreement, ie simple partnership contract, failed if the contributions were not agreed upon, but the confidentiality agreement survived.

Q. Yes, well --

A. And this is an example of sui generis agreement, because confidentiality agreements are not regulated explicitly by Russian Civil Code.

Q. Well, I'll can see that, but that's an illustration where you have an agreement covering the larger number of matters, and it's not valid as a partnership agreement, but some obligations may be independently binding. That's the analysis of the example you've just given, isn't it?

A. Well, it is a sui generis agreement which creates rights and obligations on both parties, and also the liability if one of the parties does not perform this agreement.

Q. Well now, in the present case, the question which arises is if you take all the terms said to have been agreed as a partnership agreement, and assume that they're not valid as a partnership agreement because they don't include essential terms, and the question is: can you take all those terms and then say they are valid as a sui generis agreement?

Now, what I'm suggesting to you, and I think you agree with this, is that they can only be valid as a sui generis agreement if the requirements of certainty for a sui generis agreement are less exacting than those for a partnership agreement; the terms that are essential are fewer, for example?

- A. The sui generis agreement can be more detailed and it can be less detailed. It just has another subject matter, another object, than simple partnership contract.
- Q. All right. Suppose the parties intend that their agreement should be a partnership agreement and nothing else, but they do not reach agreement on the essential terms for a partnership agreement, okay? Just suppose that. Now, do you accept that that agreement can't be valid as a sui generis agreement because the parties intend that it shall be a partnership agreement?
- A. Here I must agree with you, yes. If they do understand what a simple partnership agreement is, which they are obliged to understand even if they are not lawyers, but they use these words, and there is no doubt that they use it in the proper meaning, then there is no simple partnership contract.
- Q. Indeed there's no contract of any sort on that agreement, is there? There's no sui generis contract either, is there, because if the parties have agreed "We intend to make a partnership agreement," and they understand what that means, then you can't reclassify it as a sui generis agreement, can you?

A. No, I think you are right, unless, as I said before, the performance shown that still they performed something, so then you need to classify what the performance was. Was it unjust enrichment if there was no contract, or if there was a contract but not a simple partnership contract?

Q. Well, subsequent performance may show that the parties implicitly changed their legal relationship later.

A. And their intention as well maybe.

Q. Okay. Now, would you also accept that an agreement must have sufficient certainty to enable the court to enforce it, whether you call that agreement a partnership agreement or a sui generis agreement?

A. Yes, I agree with that.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, I'm going to turn to a completely different subject. Would your Ladyship like to break at this stage?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'll take the ten minute break now, thank you.

(3.23 pm)

(A short break)

(3.40 pm)

MR SUMPTION: Dr Rachkov, just to recap on one small point, you mentioned on a couple of occasions earlier this afternoon Article 438, sub-article 3, do you recall that?

A. Yes.

Q. That's not actually in the materials in any of these bundles, it must be just about the only proposition of Russian law that isn't. Am I right in thinking that 438.3 is about offer and acceptance?

A. Yes, it's about offer and acceptance.

Q. And what it says is that an offer can be accepted by conduct subject to certain conditions?

A. Yes.

Q. Thank you. Can we turn to Article 434 of -- MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Perhaps you would let me have a copy of it?

MR SUMPTION: We will. I am going to have a copy of the article translated and then I will endeavour to agree the translation with the other side and add it to the existing extracts.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think it's in the -- isn't it all translated anyway in the Code?

MR SUMPTION: It's not unfortunately because we only have extracts of the Code and this isn't an article --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I thought the book that Dr Rachkov has has got it in the English as well?

A. I have only the Russian version, but I'm sure the --

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, I've no doubt --

A. -- counsel team has a very good translation by Professor Osakva(?) on which the court can rely.

Q. There are plenty of translations on the internet and in print and we will have no difficulty in supplying an agreed one.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: In agreeing one, fine.

MR SUMPTION: But Dr Rachkov, there is an issue between you and Dr Rozenberg about whether Article 434 of the 1964 Civil Code applies. But you accept, do you not, that if Article 434 of the Civil Code, the '64 Civil Code, applies, it excludes simple partnership agreements made for entrepreneurial purposes and confines them to partnerships for personal needs, is that a proposition you accept, if it applies?

A. If it applies, yes.

Q. We can basically for the record, and so that my Lady can see the text, see Article 434 at G(A)4/4, flag 3.

I think that's one of the bundles you've got with you G(A)4/4.03/83.

MR RABINOWITZ: It's at 4/4.02 as well.

MR SUMPTION: It's at page 83 of the page numbering in the bundle.

Now, if you've got Article 434 in front of you at page 83, have you Dr Rachkov?

A. Yes.

Q. There's more than one restriction in this article, isn't there? What it says is that:

"Under a joint activity contract the parties undertake to act jointly in order to achieve a common economic goal..."

And various examples are given.

Then there are two restrictions, are there not? The first is:

"Citizens may conclude a joint activity contract only to meet their own personal domestic needs."

That's the restriction that you've just given an answer about, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. Then there's another restriction:

"Joint activity contracts between citizens and socialist organisations are not permitted."

Now, am I right in thinking that "socialist organisations" refers to a category of legal entity which, in the original 1964 Civil Code, was included in Article 24, is that right?

A. I'm afraid I'm not that fluent in the old Civil Code.

Q. No. Well, I'm not surprised, but if you would like to take bundle 7/3.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: State collective farms go back a bit, don't they?

MR SUMPTION: They do indeed, and I think it's going to be common ground that that particular restriction is no longer germane.

If you look at Article 24 in 7/3, flag 2, page 99 G(A)7/3.02/99, am I right in thinking that "socialist organisations", as referred to in Article 434 of the '64 Civil Code, is a reference to the organisations listed here in Article 24?

A. Yes, it looks like this.

Q. Yes. Is it right that those are the old-style Soviet categories of legal entity which ceased to be relevant once the Fundamentals of Civil Law were promulgated in 1991?

A. Not really. By that time, there were already some other enterprises, including joint stock companies and limited liability partnerships as they were called at that time, and limited liability companies as they are called now.

Q. Yes.

A. So besides -- the legal entities under the Soviet rule had a special legal capacity, which means that they were only entitled to engage into the activity which was indicated in their charters, unlike the current theory which presumes that any commercial legal entity, ie joint stock company or limited liability company, is entitled to engage into any business activity unless there are any restrictions in the charter of such company.

Q. Did there come a stage when "socialist organisations" ceased to be a recognisable legal category?

A. Yes.

Q. And if so when did that happen?

A. Frankly, I'm not -- at that time I was 16 years old, when the Soviet Union break away, so I can't say for sure when exactly it happened, but this was for sure before 1992 I guess.

Q. Yes, I see. So by 1992 at the latest, "socialist organisations" was a legally redundant category?

A. Yes, it became obsolete.

Q. So that the second prohibition in 434 would have no relevance after 1992?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, Article 434 never did affect partnership agreements between citizens and legal entities other than socialist organisations, did it?

A. No, I don't think so.

Q. It regulates joint activity contracts between citizens, that means natural persons, doesn't it?

A. Correct.

Q. It doesn't matter whether they are Russian citizens or not?

A. In Russia, the domestic regime applies to foreigners as well, and also to stateless persons.

Q. So for "citizens" we can read, for practical purposes, "natural persons"?

A. Correct.

Q. So 434 never did regulate joint activity agreements a citizen on the one hand and a legal entity on the other. It once regulated joint activity agreements between citizens and socialist organisations but ceased to do so from 1992. Is that correct?

A. I think so, yes.

Q. So what we are concerned with is simply whether any continuing effect was to be given in 1995 to the provision that says that:

"Citizens may conclude a joint activity contract only to meet their own personal domestic needs."

That's the question we're concerned with, isn't it?

A. I think you are concerned with this question.

Q. Yes. Well now, I think it's common ground that once part 2 of the Civil Code came into force in March 1996, Article 434 was of no relevance at all. I know that there's an issue as to what happened before, but the parties are agreed, aren't they, or the experts are agreed that after 1996 there is no doubt that even the restriction on citizens concluding joint activity agreements disappeared?

A. After 1 March 1996, yes.

Q. So what we're concerned with is the status of that provision in 1995. Now, do you agree that there was no legislative act which formally abrogated Article 434 before 1996?

A. Yes, I agree, and there is a very good explanation why. Because the residual old-fashioned Soviet law was so great in its -- was so voluminous that it was just impossible for the parliament to work 24 hours a day to abolish abolish abolish old Soviet rules. That's why there was a general conclusion, to which the then Russian Parliament came, that the Soviet laws, whatever level it has, applies only to the extent it does not contradict the Russian constitution of 1993, the laws adopted by the Russian Federation on the basis of the constitution, the Fundamentals of 1991 and the first part of the Russian Civil Code.

Q. Yes. So essentially the question we're concerned with is whether there is anything inconsistent with the prohibition of joint activity agreements between citizens other than to meet their personal domestic needs in, one, the constitution, two, the Fundamentals, and three, part 1 of the Civil Code?

A. Plus of course the international treaties to which Russia was a party at that time, including the international covenants on civil rights and so on, so there are two authoritative sources for that.

Q. I don't think you suggest in your report that international treaties had any bearing on the application of 434 to this partnership agreement?

A. I didn't mention them explicitly because they're not that self-executing, but at least it indicates that Russia from a certain period of time adhered to a standard which is in all civilised nations, as the charter of the UN says.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Dr Rachkov, can you tell me where in your fourth or your sixth report you deal with this?

A. I deal with Article 434 in my sixth report and actually it starts on page 3 G(A)1/1.03/180. This is bundle G(A) --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've got it, thank you.

A. And this is paragraph 6, and the forthcoming.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR SUMPTION: As I understand your evidence, Dr Rachkov, the two laws which you think are inconsistent with this prohibition in Article 434 are articles of the constitution, in particular Articles 8 and 34, and the Fundamentals, in particular Article 9.2. Is that correct?

A. And the Civil Code as well. For instance, it's Article 9.

Q. When you refer to part 1 of the Civil Code which particular provisions of part 1 do you have in mind?

A. This is Article 9.

Q. Article 9 of the Civil Code?

A. Of the first part of the Civil Code.

Q. I see. Can we just deal with the constitution first. Would you turn to bundle G(A)2/1, flag 2, please. Now, if you've got the constitution in flag 2 open, could you turn to Article 8 first of all, please. I'm going to consult it in the English version which is on pages 45 and 46 of the bundle numbering G(A)2/1.02/45.

Now, that provides that:

"In the Russian Federation the integrity of economic space, free flow of goods, services and financial resources, support of competition, and ... freedom of economic activity [are] guaranteed."

And:

"... municipal and other forms of property shall be recognised ..."

The other provision is, I think, Article 34, which is at page 51 of the English version G(A)2/1.02/51:

"Everyone shall have the right to use freely his [or] (her) abilities and property for entrepreneurial and other activity not prohibited by law.

"Economic activity aimed at monopolisation and unfair competition shall not be permitted."

Before I ask you about this, can I refer you to the Fundamentals, Article 9.2 --

A. Excuse me for interrupting you, Mr Sumption. We can also refer to Article 35 of the constitution which deals with the right of private ownership, and actually says that everyone is entitled to use his or her property as well as solely and with other parties or persons.

Q. Yes, I understand that. So those are the provisions that I think you identify as relevant under the constitution, is that right?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, if we can just turn to the Fundamentals, which are in G(A)1/1, flag 3. Sorry, forget that reference, I will refer it to you in the original text.

In bundle 7/3, there's an English translation of the whole of the Fundamentals which will save us having to jump about. And on page 231, we find Article 9 of the Fundamentals of Civil Law G(A)7/3.04/231. Article 9.2 provides that:

"A citizen may hold belongings in ownership; inherit property; engage in entrepreneurial and any other activities not prohibited ...; set up legal persons independently or together with other citizens; conclude transactions not prohibited by law; choose the place of residence ..."

And so on.

Broadly summarising the position, these articles that we've looked at, and the constitution and the fundamentals of civil law, would you agree that they are all essentially saying that, in the post Soviet system, citizens have the freedom to engage in commercial activity and to own and dispose of property? That's broadly what they are -- those are the rights they are creating?

A. Yes, this is the right which they are creating in accordance with standards as they are for instance set by -- also by international treaties like European Convention on Human Rights and the like.

Q. I understand.

A. Protocol number 1, for instance, to it, Article 1.

Q. You mentioned a moment ago Article 9 of the Civil Code, part 1. The reference to that is G(A)4/4, flag 2, page 7 G(A)4/4.02/7. That is the provision that says that citizens and legal persons can exercise their civil law rights at their discretion but are not obliged to exercise them.

A. No, they are not obliged. On top of this you can please refer to Article 18, Mr Sumption, which describes --

Q. To Article?

A. 18.

Q. Of the Civil Code?

A. Yes, which describes in more detail what legal capacity of citizens is.

Q. Yes.

"Citizens may have property by right of ownership; inherit and will property; conduct entrepreneurial and other activity not forbidden by a statute ... make any other transactions not contrary to a statute and participate in obligations ..."

That essentially repeats what we have already seen in the Fundamentals of the Civil Law at 9.2, doesn't it?

A. Yes, correct.

Q. Would you agree that the fact that you are allowed to engage in commercial activity and own property does not mean that you can necessarily do it through a simple partnership?

A. You can do it by making any contract, including simple partnership contracts.

Q. Well, Dr Rachkov, are you not confusing two separate things? You can have a law, as we in England have laws, which confer a general right to carry on business activities, but it doesn't follow that you can necessarily do it through a company or a partnership or some other form of legal organisation; that's right, isn't it, as a matter of logic?

A. I do not confuse these two things.

Q. Well, would you not accept that laws conferring a general right to carry on business activities and own property can exist side by side with laws regulating the use of companies or partnerships for that purpose?

A. In theory, in an abstract country, yes.

Q. In a what sort of country?

A. In an abstract country other than Russia, yes.

Q. Well, in principle, there's nothing inconsistent, is there, between a general right to carry on business and own property, and a regulation which says that certain kinds of business and certain kinds of property cannot be operated or owned by a company or a partnership. There's no inherent inconsistency in that, is there?

A. There is no inherent inconsistency.

Q. No. Well now, Article 434, the relevant prohibition, is a specific provision limiting the purpose for which partnerships can be created or used. It's a specific provision which says you can only use it for domestic needs, that's what it says?

A. No, it is not what it says. It was maybe the case as long as the Soviet rule existed but I think it ceased to exist and to apply in that way starting from 1986.

Recently Russia celebrated the 25th anniversary of the introducing of the law on individual labour activity, which was the starting law adopted in 1986 to allow private initiative. So starting from that moment --

Q. Dr Rachkov, you've misunderstood my question.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Let him finish his answer.

A. Starting from that moment, this particular prohibition was not in activity any longer, in operation.

Later on the state broadened and broadened even more and more the private initiative giving the right to engage into banking activity, so for instance the individuals were allowed to create banks, to create legal entities and so on. So that's the answer to your question, Mr Sumption.

MR SUMPTION: Well, it isn't actually the answer to my question because I understand that your view is that 434 doesn't apply anymore, but what I wanted you to confirm was what 434 actually means, okay? Now, what I suggest to you is that Article 434 is a specific provision which says that joint activity contracts can only be made for the purpose of meeting the parties' personal domestic needs. That's what it says, isn't it?

A. Taken by word, it's what it says.

Q. And if it applies, that's what it means? I know you say it doesn't apply, but if it applies that's what it means?

A. It's very straightforward and, if it applies, it is that it means, yes.

Q. Yes. Well now, there is no inherent inconsistency, is there, between a law which says that citizens can carry on any business activity and own property and another law which says that they can't do so through a joint activity agreement except in order to meet their own personal needs?

A. Indeed. Russian law can be construed that way. However, in Russian law, there are two very important rules as in many other systems. The first is lex posterior derogat legi priori, which means that a law which was adapted afterwards and regulated the same subject matter applies to the relationships which arose later.

The second is lex specialis derogat legi generali, so I think starting from the moment when all this loss allowing private initiative were adapted, Article 434, second paragraph and the like could not be applied any longer.

Q. Well, would you agree, Dr Rachkov, that even after the coming into force of part 2 of the Civil Code in 1996, some restrictions on the permissible use of partnership still existed even though there was a right to own property and engage in business activities? Would you agree with that?

A. Which particular limitations do you mean?

Q. Well, let's have a look at Article 1041 of part 2 of the Civil Code which you will find in G(A)4/4, flag 2, page 73 G(A)4/4.02/73. At least that's where -- yes, you'll find the bilingual version of it there. Under Article 1041, sub-article 2, it is provided, isn't it, that:

"Only individual entrepreneurs and/or commercial organisations may be parties to a contract of simple partnership concluded for the conduct of entrepreneurial activity."

Now, would you agree that, notwithstanding that there is a general right to engage in economic activity and own property in Russian law, there are nevertheless, even now, restrictions on the uses that they be made of simple partnerships. Would you agree with that?

A. I agree.

Q. Now, this particular provision is concerned with contracts of partnership concluded for an entrepreneurial activity, and says that the parties can only be individual entrepreneurs or commercial organisations, that's its effect, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. As I understand it, correct me if I'm wrong, being an individual entrepreneur is a formal status, isn't it? You have to register as one?

A. Yes, sole entrepreneurs are registered in the same manner as legal entities in Russia.

Q. That is the effect, I think you'll agree, of Article 23, which I believe has been added to the provision but you can probably tell us that from memory?

A. Yes, this is Article 23.

Q. It's in the same tab. Now, would you accept that this question, whether Article 434 still has some application, was the issue which came before the Federal Arbitrazh Court for the East Siberian circuit in the Salata case in 2004? Would you agree that that was the question which they were asked to decide?

A. Yes, there was one case which is referred in Mr Rozenberg's report which is Salata, yes.

Q. Well, I'd like to ask you to look at that. It's at G(A)4/6, flag 77. Now, I think we've agreed that this was the issue in this case, and the way that it was resolved I think can be seen on page 139 of the bundle numbering G(A)4/6.77/139 where there's a highlighted block of text.

A. Yes.

Q. I think the most efficient way of dealing with this is to invite my Lady to read the highlighted block of text, and the witness to remind himself of it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. (Pause)

MR SUMPTION: Has your Ladyship --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I've read that.

MR SUMPTION: Can I first of all ask you to note this was about a contract which was made in April 1995, so therefore at about the time that the so-called 1995 agreement in this case is said to have been made and, in any event, before part 2 of the Civil Code came into force the following year. That's right, isn't it?

A. It looks like that's right.

Q. Yes, and would you agree that what the court did in this case was to treat the contract as invalid because, under section 434 of the 1964 Civil Code, citizens could only conclude a joint activity agreement for the purpose of satisfying their personal needs, and this was a partnership agreement relating to an unfinished storage building.

A. Yes.

Q. In the last paragraph of the highlighted text:

"The provisions of Section 434... do not contradict Section 122 of the Principles of Civil Law..."

That's the Fundamentals, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. "... which were in effect at the time when the disputed relations arose, and are consistent with Section 1041(2) of the Civil Code of the Russian Federation, under which parties to the simple partnership contract concluded for the purpose of doing business may be only individual entrepreneurs ... (or) commercial entities."

Would you agree that this case, if correct, does appear to suggest that Article 434 did have continuing application to agreements made in 1995?

A. No, I do not agree.

Q. Why is that?

A. In my sixth report, I refer to approximately seven or eight different cases where judgments were rendered on contracts of simple partnership entered into before the second part of the Civil Code entered into force.

Q. I'm going to come to those in a moment but at the moment I'm just asking you about the effect of this case.

Do you agree that the effect of this case -- and we'll look at the other materials in a moment, but the effect of this case is that Article 434 did have a continuing application to simple partnership agreements in 1995?

A. I think this is a too broad statement. I think only in this particular case one of the Russian courts decided that Article 434 of the Civil Code of 1964 did not contradict Article 122 of the Fundamentals. However, if you look at the very substance of this contract, what happened? This company, which was the claimant, was inactive since 1998. Besides, it was in bankruptcy proceedings. That means that the choice which the court had in front of it was the following.

Either the property is returned into a bankrupt estate of this company and is distributed among maybe a lot of creditors, or this property is away from this company, at least to the extent a share in it belongs to the defendant who actually filed a counterclaim, and stays with that.

I think the court, after having got the evidence, who spent actually how much money, who did what to perform this contract, and take into account also the public interest, decided that, on the basis of all these circumstances, the contract shall be declared invalid.

Frankly, this indication is not needed in this. So I think the court could have rendered its judgment without any indication whether or not Article 434 is or is not in compliance with Article 122 of the Fundamentals.

Q. Well, let's just look at what the court actually decided --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just before you go there. Tell me, this circuit court, the East Siberian Circuit Federal Arbitrazh Court, what level is that in the hierarchy?

A. This is the final appeal instance. Actually this court judgment has no precedential value, it's not the judgment of the Presidium of the highest arbitrazh court, it is just a case by case decision.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So it has no precedent value?

A. No.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, that is true, as I understand it, in Russia as in most civil law systems of all courts below the level of the court of cassation, and I entirely accept that this decision, like many of the decisions though not all of them, is below that level.

At the same time, Dr Rachkov, this is some relevant evidence, isn't it, about what Russian law is, although I quite accept it's not conclusive?

A. It is not conclusive. It is only one case without any precedential value.

Q. Well now, if we just look for a moment at what it decided. You're quite right to say that the issue in this case was whether property was going to be employed to satisfy a company's debts to its general creditors or whether part of it was going to go into the hands of the claimant.

A. That's obvious.

Q. Yes. And the claimant's claim to have part of this property treated as his own depended on whether he had entered into a valid partnership agreement. That's right, isn't it? He was relying on a partnership agreement?

A. Yes, among other things.

Q. Yes.

A. And besides, I must say, the claimant's interest, maybe the court decided in that way because the court said, "Look, the claimant is not deprived of the right to raise a claim based on the unjust enrichment." So even if the contract falls away, it's still the claimant who, if he has actually spent some money, is entitled to recover this money. However he will not be entitled to get a share in the real estate, he will only be one of potentially many creditors and will not get 100 per cent of what he spent but only an appropriate share.

Q. I understand that, Dr Rachkov. But the way in which they arrived at that conclusion was to say that the claimant could not rely on the joint activity agreement that he was founding his claim on because, under section 434 of the 1964 Civil Code, it wasn't a contract for personal domestic needs and was therefore not a valid partnership agreement; that's what they said, wasn't it?

- A. Yes, but why do you speak about the citizen? The citizen has nothing to do with that. This was a dispute between a mixed partnership on the one hand who claimed that it spent some money to construct the store, and an open joint stock company which was in the situation of bankruptcy.

The claimant said, "I spent so much money, I now need my property," but he wasn't able to evidence what exactly he spent, how much, how was it documented. He simply said in the court that, well, he bought something but without proving it with any written evidence.

In Russia, there is a requirement that legal entities in principle must transfer money wireless, so without any cash payments, and here, there is no evidence in here. Besides, if we need to -- if we really want to understand what happened in this particular case we need to analyse also the lower courts' judgments. Maybe they say something about it. I don't know.

- Q. Dr Rachkov, do you agree that one of the things that this case decided was that the alleged joint activity agreement was not valid?

- A. One of the conclusions to which the court came was indeed that the simple partnership contract is not concluded.

Q. Yes.

Do you agree that the ground on which they reached that decision, as recorded in the middle of the highlighted block of text on page 139, was that in accordance with section 434 of the 1964 Civil Code:

"... citizens may conclude a joint venture contract only for the purpose of satisfying their personal... needs."

And that means:

"... the latter's participation in the construction of residential buildings, apartments, and garages. Participation in a contract for joint construction of a store building does not constitute satisfaction of personal domestic needs... it is an indication of the intentions of the citizen... to be involved in business aimed at earning [a] profit..."

Do you agree that the reason why this particular joint activity agreement was not valid was that it was not a contract for the purpose of satisfying personal domestic needs; that's what they say, isn't it?

A. I think it's common sense that if a building of a store is erected, it is not to satisfy someone's personal needs.

Q. And that's why this particular joint activity agreement was not valid, isn't it?

A. This is one of the arguments on which the court relied, yes, because it didn't find any better grounds.

However, I must draw your attention, Mr Sumption, to the paragraph which says -- well, actually I have the Russian wording in front of me because this is my mother tongue, it is for me better to understand it, but my free translation is as such:

"The defendant got the construction permit to construct the store, the defendant got the right to use the land beneath it, besides it spent money to construct. Whereas the defendant did not -- was not granted the land, was not granted the construction permit, and he didn't prove the fact that he spent anything to construct the store."

Q. Could you please turn to your sixth report in bundle G(A)1/1, starting at page 178, and to the part of your sixth report where you refer to a number of decisions which you say go the other way. I think you're referring to what we see between paragraphs 28 and 38 of your sixth report. Do you see that?

G(A)1/1.03/178

A. Correct.

Q. Now, do you agree that these decisions are all earlier than the Salata decision?

A. They are all earlier, but they are -- or some of them at least are of equal legal force and some of them even of -- well, I don't see whether there was a claim which was -- yes, one claim was dealt by the Supreme Court and one of them was dealt by the Presidium of the Supreme Arbitrazh Court which are -- well, upper courts as compared to a simple Federal Arbitrazh Court of the Eastern Siberian circuit.

Q. I understand that.

Do you agree that none of the cases to which you refer in these paragraphs referred to or considered Article 434 of the 1964 Civil Code?

A. No, I do not agree with that.

Q. Can you identify which ones you say did refer to or consider Article 434?

A. Can I please ask to provide me with the bundle which contains annexes to my sixth report?

Q. You will I think find that in 2/5.

A. Yes, 2/5.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Tab?

MR SUMPTION: Well, the witness is going to take us to the ones that he says he wishes to refer to.

A. For instance, the case which is in this bundle, it's in flag number 9, the case is as follows, an individual entrepreneur --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you just identify the name of the case?

A. It's K v State Tax Service of Petrozavodsk.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, thank you.

A. So what happened there, the claimant acquired the car, he believed that this was based on a simple partnership contract which was entered into between him and another firm before the second part of the Civil Code came into force. So he relied on this fact. And the question of whether or not Article 434 applies was implicitly raised by him apparently. It is not mentioned in this judgment, that is true, but this indicates that by that moment this particular provision of Article 434 was not applicable any longer.

MR SUMPTION: Well, you agree that 434 is not mentioned in this decision?

A. Yes, 434 is not mentioned in this decision.

Q. Right. Now, when you say that it is implicit in it, is there any particular passage which you say is an implicit reference to 434?

A. Let me see. (Pause)

I think I based my conclusion on the absence of Article 434 in this judgment, it was not relied upon by the defendant or by the claimant, therefore I came to the conclusion that Article 434, paragraph 2, does not apply.

Q. Well, can I suggest to you another reason why Article 434 was not mentioned.

A. Sure.

Q. This case concerned an alleged partnership agreement between a natural person and a legal entity, didn't it?

A. Correct.

Q. And I think we agreed at the outset of our discussion of Article 434 that Article 434 had never applied to partnership agreements between a natural person and a legal entity. That's right, isn't it?

A. That's right.

Q. So Article 434 was inapplicable on its own terms to the partnership agreement considered here, that's right, isn't it?

A. Yes, that's right.

Q. And the same is true, isn't it, of all the other cases that you referred to between paragraphs 28 and 38, they're all about alleged partnership agreements between citizens and legal entities? You can see that actually from the summaries that you give in your report?

A. Yes, but as I said before, any attempt to say that these contracts were not concluded failed, and I'm sure the courts analysed, among other things, the arguments that Article 434 may apply. Whether it was that part of the article which deals with the prohibition to meet personal needs, or with the prohibition to contract with what was called before socialist organisations, this is of secondary importance to my mind.

- Q. Well, it's actually pretty critical, isn't it, Dr Rachkov? Because the reason why Article 434 was not considered in any of these cases is that Article 434 had never applied to contracts between natural persons and legal entities; it had at one stage applied to contracts between natural persons and socialist organisations but that, as you've explained, was gone by this time. That's why 434 was not relied on here, isn't it?

- A. I see what you mean. However, as I explained yesterday, any contract on formation of a commercial legal entity in Russia is also deemed a joint activity or a simple partnership agreement. This means that if two individuals enter into such a contract to form, for instance, a limited liability company in Russia, or a joint stock company, then this is a simple partnership contract. We all understand that this is not a contract to satisfy one's personal needs. On the other hand, it is not a contract to engage in entrepreneurial or business activity. These contracts were upheld.

I refer to flag 10 of exhibits to my sixth report, this is to me a very authoritative regulation of the plea notes of the Supreme Court and the highest arbitrazh court of the Russian Federation dating back in 2 April 1997 which says, among other things, that such a contract is a simple partnership contract.

So the courts implicitly recognised, without need to indicate, that Article 434, second paragraph applies. Because by that date it was just common sense that you don't need to indicate all the many thousands of rules which do not apply, which became obsolete, just because they were overruled by new law.

Q. Dr Rachkov, you yourself point out at paragraph 30, when referring to this case, that it concerned an agreement between a citizen and a legal entity, and I thought we'd agreed that the prohibition we are concerned with in Article 434 only applies to simple partnership agreements between natural persons.

A. I'm afraid we're speaking about different cases, Mr Sumption. I referred to flag 10 in the bundle, which is called G(A)2/5, claimant Russian law exhibits G(A)2/5.10/26. This deals with a case whether or not contracts on creation of legal entities constitute a simple partnership contract or something else.

Q. Who were the parties to the partnership agreement being considered in the case at flag 10?

- A. It is not indicated.
- Q. Right. But it matters very much, doesn't it, who the parties were if one is to know whether 434 applies?
- A. I disagree. If we follow your logic, Mr Sumption, then all legal entities which were established in Russia before 1 March 1996, between individuals only, without any participation of legal entities, were invalid or otherwise unlawful, because these agreements were entered into not to meet the personal needs of the persons who are parties to the contract.
- Q. Dr Rachkov, that depends on your view, about which I cross-examined you yesterday, that foundation agreements and agreements to set up and operate limited companies are joint activity agreements, and that is a point which I have suggested to you, I know you don't accept this, is, as a matter of Russian law, wrong?
- A. It is not wrong under Russian law. Under Russian law it's recognised since many years, and maybe the first time when it was explicitly said, this is this regulation to which I refer, dated 2 April 1997, that such contracts are simple partnership contracts.
- Q. Dr Rachkov, are you aware of any Russian court decision at any level which upholds a joint activity agreement between natural persons made before 1 March 1996 which was not for satisfying domestic needs?

A. There are many. However, this question was maybe not dealt with as the basic question, so I imagine the parties claimed that the joint activity agreement to form a joint stock company was not or was not duly performed. That's why the court based its opinion on the fact that there was such a contract, it was concluded, it was valid, so that's why there was no need for the court to deal with this question which you asked me.

Q. Well, you say that there are many such cases, but the examples that you include between paragraphs 28 and 38 do not include a single one because none of them are alleged partnership agreements between natural persons.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Do you accept that or not?

A. I accept only that, of course, the documents which I provided are exhaustively contained in this folder but, as I said, there are many court cases where the law was applied on a dispute arising out of a simple partnership contract, ie a contract on formation of a limited liability company between individuals, and the court upheld these contracts.

MR SUMPTION: I'm not going to go over that ground again. This depends on your view that contracts to create or operate a company are simple partnership agreements, and that's an issue on which you and Dr Rozenberg are in difference.

A. But how can you deny it, Mr Sumption, if I refer to the regulation --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, that's a matter for me, not a matter for him to answer.

A. Good.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think that's enough for today.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, I was going to suggest that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: How much longer are you going to be with this witness, Mr Sumption?

MR SUMPTION: I think I will be most of tomorrow morning.

What I've got to cover is the subject matter of the amendment made at the opening of the trial about the aluminium agreement made in 1999 as alleged.

I've then got to cover the two articles relied upon as providing for an extension to the limitation period in relation to the intimidation tort, which is a completely different aspect of Russian law. That will take me, I suspect, until about midday tomorrow.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR SUMPTION: Possibly a little longer.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

MR SUMPTION: Now, I was going to suggest, if your Ladyship would be agreeable to this, that your Ladyship might be prepared to sit at 10 o'clock tomorrow in the hope of completing the expert evidence this week. I have discussed this with my learned friend, and I think his position is that he would be perfectly happy to deal with it, and possibly to deal with it on that basis for the rest of the week as well, if necessary.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm always happy to sit early. The problem is I've got a meeting with Lord Saville at 9.30 tomorrow which I've already pushed back for my own personal reasons from 9.00 to 9.30. I'm now fixed to do that at 9.30, and I've got something else before that.

So if I can conclude my meeting with him by 10 o'clock, I'll be here. So shall we say not before 10.00?

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've also got to hand down a judgment but that's the work of a minute, and I can do that with all you here because it's not subject to counsel's submissions.

MR SUMPTION: Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But I'll say I'll certainly sit not before 10.00 but if I'm a bit late, please excuse me.

Right, so 10 o'clock tomorrow and, again, don't talk about the evidence you've given or email or communicate in any way about it.

THE WITNESS: Sure.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much. Not before 10.00.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Sumption. Good morning.

THE WITNESS: Good morning.

MR SUMPTION: Good morning, Dr Rachkov.

It is I think accepted by you that the alleged agreement made in 1995, that the parties would be entitled to participate in each other's business ventures, in future business ventures, is invalid as a matter of Russian law. That's correct, isn't it?

A. That is correct.

Q. And that is, for the record, an agreement which is recorded in the joint memorandum, paragraph 70, subparagraph 2 G(A)6/1.01/22.

Now, the reason for that, as recorded in the joint memorandum, is that that particular part of the alleged 1995 agreement is too vague. That's correct, isn't it, in summary?

A. That is correct.

Q. Now, because it's too vague, it lacks the certainty required for an enforceable agreement to that extent?

A. Taken apart from any subsequent performance, yes, this is correct.

Q. Now, is that because in the case of the agreement, or is it in part because in the case of the agreement as to future businesses it was not clear what the partners would be required to do in order to acquire or run that business? Was that one of the reasons why it was too vague?

A. This is one of the reasons, yes.

Q. And it wasn't clear either, was it, what contribution they would be required to make to either funding or managing the business?

A. This is correct.

Q. Now, can you tell us why exactly the same objection does not apply to Mr Berezovsky's case that the 1995 partnership agreement extended to the acquisition of shares in Sibneft when the state came to sell first the 49 per cent and then the 51 per cent?

A. As I explained in my report, the important feature of the current case is its subsequent performance. That's why I believe on the basis of the facts as presented in the documents I was provided with that the specific performance indicated what the parties intended and what they did afterwards.

Q. So is it right that, but for your view that subsequent performance demonstrates what the parties agreed about the acquisition of the Sibneft shares, you would regard the application of the 1995 agreement to the acquisition of shares as suffering from the same problem, ie excessive vagueness? If it weren't for the subsequent performance, that would have been your view?

A. Being a reasonable man, I would say of course if we don't have a written agreement it is extremely difficult to identify what the parties agreed upon and what they intended actually.

Q. Yes. But if it weren't for the fact that in your view one can identify the terms with sufficient certainty from the subsequent performance, you would regard the suggestion that the 1995 agreement applied to the subsequent acquisition of Sibneft shares as open to the same objection that you accept is valid in relation to future business. That's right, isn't it?

A. In principle this is right.

Q. Now, I think it's common ground that it follows from your view about the provision relating to future business that Mr Berezovsky would have no right to participate, no legal or contractual right to participate in the aluminium assets acquired in February 2000 unless there was some agreement after 1995 which gave him such a right; a fresh agreement?

A. No, this is not the conclusion to which I came in my reports. The conclusion to which I came in my reports on the basis of the applicable Russian law on simple partnership contracts is that if the parties contributed some property to the joint activity, and if the parties generated some other property as a result of the joint activity, this is their joint shared ownership.

Q. Which joint activity are you talking about when you give that answer?

A. I'm speaking about the joint activity which was carried out on the basis of the 1995 agreement.

Q. Are you talking about Sibneft rather than the aluminium assets?

A. I'm talking about the property which was contributed by the partners to perform the oral 1995 agreement, plus all fruits and income generated on the basis of that agreement.

Q. Dr Rachkov, I think you may have misunderstood my question.

I am focusing on the acquisition of the aluminium assets in 2000, which was not part of the original alleged partnership agreement.

A. This is how you interpret the statements of fact, Mr Sumption.

Q. Dr Rachkov, in 1995, Mr Berezovsky alleges that there was a partnership agreement to acquire control of Sibneft and, he says, ownership of Sibneft. That's what he says. Now, you have agreed that that agreement did not, as a matter of Russian law, effectively apply to any future business ventures, have you not?

A. No, I doubt I agreed this. What I said, and I'm continuing to say this, is that the property which was contributed by the partners to the joint activity, plus the property which was acquired by the partners as the result of their joint activity, constitutes their joint shared ownership.

Q. Well, what are the implications of that view for the aluminium assets acquired by Mr Abramovich in February 2000?

A. The implication is that if the shares acquired in 2000 in aluminium assets constitute income or fruits of the joint activity, then the partners are entitled to the appropriate shares in such joint shared property.

Q. Would there not have had to be some agreement to that effect?

A. I cannot deny that under Russian law, rights and obligations and liabilities arise either out of contracts or out of defaults, ie torts.

Q. Can we please look at your fourth report at paragraph 281 G(A)1/1.01/89. I'm referring you to paragraphs 281 to 284. At paragraph 281, you set out part of Mr Berezovsky's pleaded case as it then was. It has been amended since. At paragraph 282 you set out in full paragraphs 250 to 263 of Mr Berezovsky's witness statement. Then at paragraph 283 you say

G(A)1/1.01/91:

"In my opinion, these passages describe an agreement among Mr Berezovsky, Mr Abramovich and Mr Patarkatsishvili by which they would seek to acquire the Aluminium Assets on the same terms and in accordance with the 1995 Agreement. Their common goal was to acquire control of the Aluminium Assets, and the effect of the agreement was to bring the Aluminium Assets within the scope of their partnership contract."

Now, that is a conclusion you say that you draw from the passages of the pleading and the passages that you quote from Mr Berezovsky's witness statement, is that correct?

A. This is correct.

Q. Now, could you please, leaving that part of your report open, take bundle A1, which you won't have in front of you but I'm sure somebody will be good enough to provide it, at flag 2, at paragraph C59B, which is at page 26 A1/02/26.

Now, this is an amendment which was made to Mr Berezovsky's particulars of claim, it's on the bottom of page 26 and the top of page 27 --

A. Yes.

Q. -- after you wrote your report, and, as we understand it, an amendment that was based upon your report.

What I want you to do is to read paragraph C59B to yourself and tell us whether you, in your report, are supporting as a matter of Russian law the case which is made in that paragraph? (Pause)

A. I read this paragraph. I think nothing changes in what I've said before. So it looks like the parties at least, as the situation is described here, agreed to apply their 1995 agreement to further assets, ie aluminium assets, in the case at hand.

Q. You see, what this pleading is alleging is that in 1999 there was a further agreement between Mr Berezovsky, Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich to the effect that the 1995 agreement would also apply to the aluminium assets. That's what's being alleged. Now, is that the proposition that you are supporting at paragraph 283 of your report?

A. It is the proposition which I support in 283 and 284 of my fourth report.

Q. Right. Thank you.

A. With maybe, well, one small of caveat that there is a direct connection between these two agreements, so the agreement which was reached, if it was reached, in 1999 is a logical continuation of the agreement of 1995. It is not a new one agreement, it is, so to say, a supplement or amendment to some extent because any supplement is an amendment to the previous agreement.

Q. I see. Well now, can you tell us, please, which facts stated in the paragraphs that you quote at paragraph 282 amounted to an agreement, according to you, in 1999 to apply the 1995 agreement to the aluminium assets? Which facts are you identifying in that rather long quotation as amounting to such an agreement G(A)1/1.01/89?

A. It's the totality of this long quotation. But, for instance, here in paragraph 256 of the draft particulars, I mean the particulars of claim as -- no, sorry, witness statement, as they are quoted here.

"Badri and I raised the Bosov proposal with Mr Abramovich, as we considered we were obliged to do in accordance with our 1995 agreement with him."

Q. That's the essence of it, is it?

A. At the end of the day, this is the most characteristic sentence which, to me, indicates that when discussing this issue, first with Mr Abramovich and later on with his associates, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili proceeded from the assumption, and maybe said this explicitly, which I don't know, to Mr Abramovich.

Q. Well, I'm not going to ask you to comment any further on the facts, I'm going to put to you a series of assumptions or hypotheses, Dr Rachkov.

Assume, please, for the moment that nothing was said to Mr Abramovich in 1999 about the 1995 agreement, and nothing was said by Mr Abramovich about the 1995 agreement in that year. On that assumption, do you say that there was an agreement in 1999 to apply the '95 agreement to the aluminium assets, on the assumption that nothing was said by either party or by any of the three of them about the 1995 agreement?

A. If nothing was said, no, there was no gesture, there was no written exchange, there was no understanding, common understanding, between the parties that whatever they did over the last five years or so, or four years, was their joint activity, then I would agree that there was no agreement to apply the 1995 agreement to the subsequent agreements.

Q. And assume that there was no agreement in 1999 about contributions, whether financial or of any other kind, on that assumption you wouldn't say, would you, that there was an agreement to contribute to the cost of acquiring the aluminium assets, if you make that assumption. Is that right?

A. If this assumption also includes that there was no 1995 agreement beforehand then maybe I would agree. However, as I said before and as is stated in Russian law, joint activity presumes combining not only and not necessarily property, which can be tangible, but also efforts.

Q. But if there was in 1999, one, no reference at all to the 1995 agreement and, two, no agreement on a specific partnership and, three, no agreement about contributions to the aluminium assets, you wouldn't suggest that the partnership was by agreement extended to the aluminium assets, would you?

A. No, I would not. I base my opinion on Article 1041 of the Russian Civil Code which defines the contract of simple partnership and, clearly, the parties must either agree beforehand what their contributions are, which may be either property or efforts, business skills and so on, or they must show in the course of the performance of the agreement that they both agree on something.

Q. I want to turn now to the tort claim, Dr Rachkov, the intimidation claim.

I am not going to cross-examine you on the elements of the tort, on which there is a very large measure of agreement, certainly on all the points which seem to matter. What I do want to ask you about, however, is your opinion on the subject of the limitation period and the grounds on which it may be extended. Okay?

A. That is a very interesting question indeed.

Q. Well, I'm glad you think so, Dr Rachkov.

Can we please ask you to turn to chapter 12 of the Civil Code which I am looking at in bundle G(A)4/1, flag 5, page 30 and following G(A)4/1.05/30. Can we look first at Article 96 which in the -- hang on, sorry, Article 196, forgive me.

Now, just to establish the basic background to this, which I think is common ground but I think it will assist if we just agree about this, the general limitation period in Russian law is three years. Is that right?

A. That's right.

Q. And that's the effect of Article 196.

A. Yes.

Q. But as is pointed out in 197, laws may prescribe specific time limits which are different from three years for particular cases, and they may be longer or shorter than three years; that's correct, isn't it?

A. They are mostly shorter, yes.

Q. Yes. Now, it's agreed, isn't it, that no special time limit applies in this case which is why three years is the relevant time limit?

A. I think it is agreed.

Q. And there are special provisions, are there not, for a number of other types of claim, not relevant in this dispute, which may be as short as two months?

A. Correct.

Q. It's also right, isn't it, that limitation periods in Russian law run from the time that the claimant knew or ought to have known the facts which violated his right?

A. That's the general rule.

Q. There are two provisions which you refer to as giving rise to a possible extension of the limitation period in this case, Article 205 and Article 10. I'm going to deal with them, if I may, in that order.

Article 205 is at page 32 in the English, and that provides G(A)4/1.05/32:

"In exceptional cases..."

Well, perhaps I might just pause to allow my Lady to read the whole of the provision before I ask about it.

(Pause)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I've read it.

MR SUMPTION: Dr Rachkov, the first point I want to ask you about, this is a provision that applies only in exceptional cases, isn't it?

A. I can't deny it.

Q. So there has to be some exceptional impediment to prevent the claimant bringing his action?

A. Yes, to lapse the period of limitation.

Q. Yes. Well now, the second point I want to put to you is: is it right that the exception circumstance has got to be something amounting to a personal disability of the claimant, hence the words:

"... due to circumstances associated with the person of the claimant (serious illness, helpless condition, illiteracy, etc.)..."

Is that right?

A. Not really, no, it is not right.

Q. Does it not have to be due to circumstances associated with the person of the claimant?

A. Sure. If the period of limitation expired due to reasons which are connected with the personality or person of the claimant, an approximate list of such circumstances is indicated here, however it is not an exhaustive list, then the period of limitation can be restored by the court.

Q. I understand, and I wasn't intending to suggest to you that the list of conditions in brackets is an exhaustive list. Indeed it couldn't be, it says "etc".

What I was intending to suggest, and I don't think you differ from this, was that whatever the circumstances relied upon, they have got to be circumstances associated with the person of the claimant?

A. With the person or personality of the claimant.

Q. Right.

A. It's what -- "lichnyest" (?) may be translated in various ways into English, but in principle there is no disagreement between us, I believe, in what person or personality is.

Q. No, I don't think there is.

Thirdly, as a matter of causation, is it right that the exceptional circumstance associated with the person or personality of the claimant has got to have prevented the claimant from bringing his action within the limitation period? It's got to have causally had that effect, hasn't it?

A. Well, there should be a valid excuse, yes. I think so, yes.

Q. Well now, just to get this out of the way, the final sentence of Article 205:

"The reasons for allowing the time limit of the statute of limitations to expire may be recognised as compelling if they took place during the last six months of the time limit of the statute of limitations, and if this time limit is equal to six months or less than six months -- during the time limit of the statute of limitations."

Now, that says two things, doesn't it? First of all, it says that the exceptional circumstance associated with the person of the claimant may be recognised as compelling only if it was operative for the last six months of the limitation period. Is that right?

A. Yes, at any moment within the last six months.

Q. Secondly, the final words of that last sentence are I think irrelevant to our situation because they deal with the situation in which the limitation period is six months or less, so we can forget about those final words, can we not, for present purposes?

A. We can for present purposes.

Q. Now I want to take you to some illustrative authorities so that we can see how far we are agreed about what is meant by exceptional circumstances due to the person of the claimant.

You cite the textbook, I think, of Maleina which we find at G(A)4/8, flag 5, page 38 and following G(A)4/8.05/38.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Sumption, please may I have a reference to the paragraph in I think it's the fifth report of Dr Rachkov where he deals with this?

MR SUMPTION: He deals with it starting at page 56, so that's G(A)1/1, flag 2, page 164 of the bundle numbering G(A)1/1.02/164.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

A. Excuse me, can I have my own reports, please? It's Rachkov 5, exhibit 41.

MR SUMPTION: Yes, of course. Could you be given bundle G(A)1/1 which has all your reports in it. I'm sorry, I didn't realise you didn't have them.

I'd like the witness also to be given G(A)4/8. Do you have G(A)4/8, Dr Rachkov?

A. Yes.

Q. Could you please turn to flag 5 in that bundle.

A. Yes.

Q. This is an article, I think, by Dr Maleina, and that's an author that you yourself I think cite and for whom you have a high regard, is that right?

A. That's right.

Q. She is an authoritative writer? He or she? Is it he or she?

A. She, yes. She's a specialist in personal intangible rights, such as, well, claims arising out of defamation, but I have no doubt that she deals also very well with these issues, since I am referring to her.

Q. Right. Well now, this provides, this work provides an illustrative list or discussion of instances in which the limitation period has been extended under Article 205, and I wonder if I could invite my Lady to read from the bottom of page 39 G(A)4/8.05/39, the words:

"The period of limitation may be reinstated ..."

Up to -- well, the critical parts that I'm concerned with, but I don't want to be tendentiously selective, are that part up to the fifth line of the next page, and then the main section which I'm concerned with is the one that starts with the words:

"The second condition ..."

Just below halfway down page 41 and continues to the bottom of page 43.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well.

MR SUMPTION: Dr Rachkov, can I invite you just to remind yourself about what those parts of the work say.

(Pause)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, I've read that.

MR SUMPTION: Dr Rachkov, there's one particular example given here which I would just like you to help us about. Towards the bottom of page 43, you will see that Dr Maleina says:

"It would seem that the circumstances relating to the personality of the claimant should include his professional activities. It is evident that this is not the job performance itself but non-ordinary working situations that may be regarded as legitimate reason. Thus, the fact that the claimant was away on business for a long period of time prevented him from making an appeal against the resolution of [a] general meeting of a limited... company and therefore, this fact was recognised as a ground for reinstatement of the period of limitation..."

There's a reference to a decision in 2006. Are you familiar with that decision, Dr Rachkov?

- A. I read it for sure but I need to maybe find it again.
- Q. I'm not going to ask you about the details or take you to it unless you would like me to, but it's right, isn't it, that when you are challenging a decision in court of a general meeting of a limited liability company, the relevant limitation period is only two months, isn't it?
- A. I think it's two months only, yes.
- Q. In that particular case, what happened was that the general meeting occurred at a time when the businessman in question was away on business and he didn't come back until it was too late to do anything about it --
- A. No.
- Q. Those are not the facts?
- A. No, I don't think so.
- Q. Well, let's have a look at the report in that case. Can we look at G(A)2/4, flag 9, page 61 G(A)2/4.09/61.
- Have you got that open, Dr Rachkov?
- A. Yes, the Russian version.

Q. Now, we see that the limitation period was two months, from page 63, about three quarters of the way down the page G(A)2/4.09/63. And there's a reference to Article 205. If you look at page 63, you will see that the facts are set out towards the top of the page:

"... each member of the Company [has to be] informed ..."

And Mr Turchinovich received his notice on 15 February about the holding of a meeting on the 24th, seven days before the relevant date.

And if you look back at page 62 --

A. Nine days.

Q. Is it nine days?

A. 24 minus 15, it's nine days.

Q. Okay, I'm not going to argue with you about the difference between 7 and 9.

Page 62, the previous page --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It says seven days in the text.

MR SUMPTION: It does.

A. In accordance with Russian law, the general meeting of participants of a Russian limited liability company must be convened with a notice of 30 days, unless all participants otherwise agree.

Q. Yes. Well, that no doubt was part of the grounds on which Mr Turchinovich was complaining.

If we just look at the facts on the previous page, page 62, halfway down the page:

"As is evident from the documents and established by the court, on [24 February] there was an extraordinary general ... meeting ... with the following agenda ..."

And it's set out.

On the first page, you will see in the third paragraph under the word "Established":

"RV Turchinovich furthermore requested to reinstate the time [limit] permitted for appealing ... decisions of the general members' meeting which he had missed for good reason in connection with being on a business trip for the period 18 [March] 2005 to 26 [August] 2005."

- A. So in fact he was absent not when the meeting was conducted.
- Q. You're absolutely right about that. He was therefore absent for a little over half of the two-month limitation period. Okay?
- A. Okay.
- Q. Which was a particularly short one. I think two months is the shortest limitation period which exists in Russian law, isn't it?
- A. It's very short indeed.
- Q. Now, if you look at the last paragraph on page 43 of Dr Maleina's work G(A)4/8.05/43:

"The justifiable reasons are those which entail the absolute impossibility of filing a claim or which cause a practical impediment to apply to the court."

Do you see?

Would you accept that as a fair statement of the law, that paragraph?

- A. It is a fair statement, but it is a too general statement. I think what she means is that, if there are such reasons which entail an absolute impossibility to file a claim, then they are of course valid grounds to restore the limitation period. But it doesn't mean that any reason should be that.

The reason connected with the personality of the claimant has a subjective character or a subjective nature, that's why the courts should always look at what is subjectively a valid reason for this or the other claimant.

- Q. Well, it's not the law, is it, that anything which the claimant thinks prevents him from filing a claim is treated as relevant? The court has got to agree that it actually did prevent him, surely?
- A. Yes, it is not what the claimant subjectively thinks, it is what he or she is subjectively prevented to do.
- Q. Well, it's whether the court thinks it was impossible for the claimant to file in time.

A. If the court, on the basis of the evidence provided by the claimant, and maybe by the defendant, by third parties, comes to the conclusion that there are such grounds, yes, the court is entitled to restore the period of limitation.

Q. And the sort of impediment which is envisaged here is something that actually prevents the claimant from taking the administrative steps necessary to begin his action. That's right, isn't it:

"... a practical impediment to apply to the court."

A. I think if the practical impediment is one of the reasons connected with the personality of the claimant, yes.

Q. Right. Now, would you agree, generally, that the examples discussed by Dr Maleina between pages 41 and 43 of the bundle numbering are a fair body of examples of how Article 205 is applied by the Russian courts?

A. I think she lists a lot of interesting issues or cases where the question of period of limitation arose, and I think she described them very well.

I can also refer to a very interesting case where legal illiteracy of a claimant who lived in Ukraine, in relation to the Russian legislation, was recognised by court as a justifiable reason.

Q. I understand.

A. We can look at this case if my Lady wants.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Sumption, this may be in dispute, but nevertheless perhaps you can assist me. Have I got to decide whether there was an impossibility or a practical impediment to Mr Berezovsky filing a claim in Russia or in England?

MR SUMPTION: In England, because your Ladyship is applying under the act a Russian limitation period and Russian principles of limitation to a failure to commence proceedings in England within the Russian limitation period.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is that agreed, Mr Rabinowitz?

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, yes.

MR SUMPTION: It's also correct, and I think this is also common ground, that so far as the operation of limitation in the relevant foreign jurisdiction depends on an exercise of discretion by the foreign court, your Ladyship should exercise that discretion for yourself, but on the principles that would guide the foreign court.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, thank you.

MR SUMPTION: My learned friend nods, I'm grateful.

Now, if you just turn to another textbook which is cited by you and for which I think you have a high regard, this is the work by Mozolin at G(A)2/4, flag 30

G(A)2/4.30/229.

A. You don't like to discuss the case I'm referring to,
Mr Sumption?

Q. Well, you've summarised the circumstances. I'm not sure that they are particularly close to those of Mr Berezovsky.

A. They are very close, because there the limitation period was lapsed which was equal to ten months. It looks like here in this case the period is 11 months.

Q. Right. Well, I'm going to come to that particular case in due course, but there is a difference upon it and I will get to that.

A. Of course there are no 100 per cent coinciding cases.

Q. Could you for the moment please turn to bundle G(A)2/4.

A. Yes, I'm here.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Tab?

MR SUMPTION: At tab 30, page 229 G(A)2/4.30/229. I think I'm right in saying this is a work that you cite, and it is a work again for which you have a high regard, is that right?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, that tells us that:

"According to Article 205... restoration of a missed period of limitation can only be allowed in the following circumstances. Firstly, a period of limitation can only be restored in exceptional circumstances [and you've agreed to that] ... secondly, only by [the] court. Thirdly, the court must accept the reason for missed period of limitation as compelling."

I think you accept that, don't you?

A. "As valid justifiable" is maybe the more appropriate translation, but the word "compelling" is maybe not the wrong one.

Q. "Fourthly, [the] period of limitation can only be restored with respect to individuals... where compelling circumstances are related personally to the claimant."

You agree to that as well, don't you?

A. Related to the personality of the claimant in proper Russian, but I mean -- otherwise I agree, yes.

Q. This translation says:

"... related personally to the claimant", ie to the claimant and not to someone else.

A. The Russian wording says -- it just repeats the wording of the law, which is the reasonable, or the justifiable circumstances connected with the personality or person of the claimant. But I think the distinction is not that great.

Q. Okay. The work then goes on:

"In connection with this the Civil Code for the first time provides an approximate list of reasons which could be taken into account for the purposes of [restoring the] period of limitation. In particular, those include illness of the claimant, incapacity, illiteracy of the claimant... Such circumstances as [the] claimant being on a business trip have also been taken into account in judicial practice [that's the case we have just been talking about]. Other compelling reasons are also possible. However, circumstances related personally to the defendant [that's the defendant rather than the claimant] are not taken into account..."

Is there anything in that paragraph which you would disagree with?

A. No, I cannot disagree with that, because this is the literal repetition of the wording of the Russian Civil Code which is, for me, the second important book after the Bible, so that's why I can't disagree with that.

Q. Yes, well, I'm not going to cross-examine you on the biblical authority for any of these propositions.

A. Thank you. I will be lost.

Q. I have been asking you questions mainly devoted to the exceptional character of the event relied upon. I want to ask you a little further about the personal character of the disability.

There are a number of cases, are there not, which show that the sickness of the claimant may be a personal disability, as indeed the article says, but the sickness of his spouse, his or her spouse, will not be a relevant factor unless the claimant is required to give her continuous personal care. That's broadly right, isn't it?

- A. That's broadly right. In one of the cases to which I refer, indeed the claimant says "The period of limitation must be restored because I was taking care all the time for my wife." But in the reality, the court learned that the claimant was not taking care all the time for his wife, he was working all the day, he was away from time to time, so that's why the court came to the conclusion that the claimant was simply lying.
- Q. Yes. What the court found was that his wife's problem had not prevented him, since he wasn't the person who was ill, from filing his claim in time?
- A. Yes, in this particular case. But there are also other cases when the claimant is so tied up with taking care for his wife, or other close relatives, that he is not in a position to take care for the claim.
- Q. Yes. And the requirement that the disability should be personal, or should be due to the person or personality of the claimant, is satisfied in that case by the fact that the claimant was fully occupied in looking after his wife, is that correct?

- A. I think that's correct. What Russian courts try to achieve is that, of course, the claimant has the right to fair trial but, on the other hand, there is a certain period of limitation which is there to create more stability in the civil turnover. But I think in general the Russian courts of common jurisdiction apply very generously the restoration of limitation periods. It includes not only such reasons as sickness of a close relative, a serious sickness which actually prevents, it's not like just a headache within one day but a continuous heavy sickness. It can be an absence away from the home because the person is, for instance, imprisoned. I did refer to one of such cases. It may be a long business trip, what we already discussed. It may be legal illiteracy as I referred in one of the cases.

Q. What do you mean by legal illiteracy?

- A. By a legal illiteracy I mean that there was a miner from Ukraine, of Russian origin though, so there is a Russian minority, which is not that minor, living in the eastern part of Ukraine, in Donetsk, which is also a mining region. He was working for a long time with Norilsk Nickel. So he got some shares and wasn't able to exercise certain rights as a shareholder. So the court came to the conclusion that because he was a miner -- a mining worker, not minor but a mining worker -- he was not in a position to understand Russian law and its particularities and restored the period of limitation. Although the person, I must say, was not, so to say, illiterate (sic), he was a Russian native and he was able to read all these laws, spending maybe five years of his life understanding what they all mean.

- Q. But you're not suggesting, are you -- I mean this was about, as I understand it, an impoverished mine worker in the Ukraine. You're not suggesting that a rich and powerful figure with access to all the advice that he might want would ever be able to say "I didn't realise the limitation period was what it is"?
- A. I don't know. There are wealthy individuals who are illiterate, or legally illiterate. Their life is very rich than that what I can imagine.
- Q. If somebody has all the means that he needs to find out what the relevant law is, he's never going to be able to say, is he, "The limitation period should be extended because I didn't realise it was only three years"?
- A. No, I think -- I agree, this case looks very exotic. In Russian, real life, usually the courts say like this, "You don't know the law but it's your problem, so you should have known the law, you should have taken legal advice." But still, as I explained, the same logic may be deployed in all other cases. For instance, a person being in prison can say, or the court can say to the person being in prison, "Look, you could have given, I don't know, a power of attorney to a lawyer to represent you," and actually one of the cases deals with such a situation.

Q. Could you please turn to bundle G(A)4/8, flag 8 G(A)4/8.08/58.

A. Yes.

Q. Dr Rachkov, when you've opened that, if I can just go back to the mine worker. Looking at the case, it seems to have been decided on a combination of three factors: one, he lived in a foreign state, namely the Ukraine; two, his legal illiteracy; and three, the significant territorial distance between him and the court. Is that correct? I can certainly take you to the case if you would like to be --

A. Maybe we should indeed look at the case. I remember well that these were the three reasons but I think there were even more than this.

For instance, he -- what happened in that case, my Lady, the shares of this -- the mining worker was entitled to get shares in Norilsk Nickel because the company was privatised, so he got some shares due to the privatisation and moved to Ukraine later on, after he discontinued working at Norilsk Nickel.

His shares were fraudulently taken away by a person acting on the basis of a power of attorney. The signature of this mining worker was forged under the powers of attorney, which was recognised later on by the law enforcement agencies of Russia and Ukraine.

However, among other things, because he went not to the court directly but to the local authorities in Ukraine and in Russia, to the Ministry of Interior, to the police, to complain, things went very slowly, so the period of limitation passed away.

This was one of the grounds why the period of limitation was restored in that particular case. And it is not only what Mr Sumption mentioned but it's much more.

Q. We had better look at the case then. Leave open the bundle you have just opened, please, and turn to bundle G(A)2/4, flag 11, page 76 and following G(A)2/4.11/76.

If you have got the case open -- Dr Rachkov, have you?

A. Yes.

Q. Right. Now, if you look at page 79 in the bundle numbering you will see, after an account of the facts, halfway down the page G(A)2/4.11/79:

"... in his petition to revive the statute of limitations, the complainant state[s] that he lives in Ukraine, is inexperienced in legal matters, and is not familiar with the special legislation of Russia.

"At the session of the appeal court the representative of U explained that the complainant is a miner, who has extremely limited funds due to the economic situation [of the] Ukraine, and took measures to defend his infringed rights, and that time was lost in connection with the transfer of materials regarding [that's, I think, the company] by the agencies of the Ministry of Internal Affairs of Russia and Ukraine and the lack of a summary decision by the investigating authorities in relation to [the company]."

- A. Yes, the documents relating not to the company but to the person who was allegedly acting on the basis of the power of attorney, but, as we learned from this case, forged the signature of this mining worker under the powers of attorney.
- Q. Yes, but time was lost because of the delays by public authorities in transmitting relevant information, wasn't it?
- A. Well, the literal wording is that.
- Q. Right. The next paragraph says:

"The change in interstate jurisdiction [in] the criminal prosecution did not depend upon the will of the complainant and cannot serve as grounds to dismiss the defence of [his] civil rights."

What was the change in interstate jurisdiction of the criminal prosecution?

A. I don't know.

Q. You don't know, okay.

Now, the part that I was referring to a moment ago when I gave the three reasons which appeared to be relevant is the first full paragraph on page 80

G(A)2/4.11/80:

"Taking into consideration article 6 of the European Convention ... the appeal court deems reasonable the excuse that the complainant overran the statute of limitations due to conditions connected with the individual complainant [one] living in a foreign state, [two] and due to legal experience and [three, I'm adding the numbers obviously] significant territorial distance he was unable to defend his legal rights within the prescribed term and was deprived of his acquired property due to the fault of the respondents."

Those seem to be the reasons, do they not?

A. Yes, plus the court refers to the fact that the circumstances emerged or have taken place within the last six months of the period of limitation.

- Q. Right. Well now, I was going to ask you to look at the decision of the -- it's the cassation ruling by the St Petersburg city court at bundle G(A)4/8, tab 8 G(A)4/8.08/58. This is one of the cases about somebody claiming to extend the limitation period because his wife was unwell.

There are a number of cases like this, are there not, in which somebody was relying on the sickness of his wife?

- A. Other ways around. The claimant was female.

- Q. Or spouse. You're quite right.

The reason I'm referring you to this is that it contains a statement of principle and I'm going to ask you whether you agree with that statement. If you look at page 62.003, halfway down the page G(A)4/8.08/62.003:

"The court of first instance established that it follows from the Claimant's husband's medical documents that he received in-patient treatment during the periods from 1 February 2010 to 9 April 2010, from 7 June 2010 to 20 July 2010 and [then for a third period in July].

"Thus, the court of first instance came to the correct conclusion that it was not during the last six months of the limitation period that the Claimant's husband was receiving in-patient treatment, as a consequence of which the Claimant could have submitted a claim from 2 August 2010 to the day of expiry of the limitation period..."

The next paragraph says:

"At the same time, as the District Court correctly concluded, a husband's illness is not grounds for [the] restoration of the limitation period, as it follows from the meaning of Article 205 of the Civil Code that the right to restoration of the limitation period and [the] recognition of the validity of the reason for which it was missed applied to circumstances inextricably connected to the Claimant's person, and not that of other parties. In addition, the Claimant has not produced evidence that, during the legally significant period, the Claimant's husband was in a state requiring constant care from another person."

Is there anything in the passage that I have just read which you would disagree with as a statement of the law?

- A. I would not disagree, I would only stress that the most important sentence is the last sentence which you've cited.

The claimant failed to prove that her husband was in a state which was necessary for her to take care for him. He was in a hospital, there was appropriate care for him when he was in hospital. At that time, apparently the court came to the conclusion that this lady could have filed a claim, and even indicated the time gap within which it could have happened.

Q. Yes. What I'm trying to get your assistance on, Dr Rachkov, is the principle that my Lady should apply to the rather different facts of this case. The actual legal principle is the one stated immediately before that sentence about the facts of this case where the court said:

"At the same time, as the District Court correctly concluded, a husband's illness [et cetera] ..."

Is not a ground, unless there is a circumstance inextricably linked to the claimant's person and not that of other parties. You accept, don't you, that that is a correct statement of the legal principle that is being applied to the various facts?

A. No, I do not accept that this is a correct legal principle. It is a correct statement in this particular case.

Q. Well --

A. You cannot say that whenever a husband is ill, and whatever the gravity of this illness is, the court must decline the application for restoration of period of limitation. The cases are very various.

Q. I'm not suggesting that to you for one moment, Dr Rachkov. What I am saying is that the legal principle that applies is that a husband's illness is not grounds for the restoration of the limitation period in itself. You've got to show that the husband -- that the wife was actually taken up personally with caring for him, or some other factor affecting her, right? Do we agree on that?

A. This particular wife and this particular husband, yes.

Q. Yes. And the legal principle is, as is stated here, that:

"... it follows from the meaning of Article 205 ... that the right to restoration of the limitation period and recognition of the validity of the reason for which it was missed applied to circumstances inextricably connected to the Claimant's person, and not that of other parties."

Do you agree that that follows from the meaning of Article 205?

A. No, I do not agree that this follows from the Article 205 because the person does not live in isolation, there are many people around it, it may be friends, it may be close relatives, it may be animals(?) who prevented, or whose state prevented the claimant to file the claim in due course within the limitation period.

Q. So do you say that this is a mistaken statement of the law by the cassation court of St Petersburg?

A. No, I cannot say this for this particular case, but I would not derive from this very generic conclusions on Russian law.

And by the way, this judgment has no precedential value, as I said.

Q. Well, that is true of all judgments below the top cassation level in Russia, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. But we still are entitled, are we not, to look at decisions for illustrative purposes as guidance to what Russian law is; you don't dispute that, do you?

A. That's true, but I wouldn't expand the importance of this particular judgment to the court practice in Russia in general.

Q. You see I suggest to you that the statement of principle here is in fact exactly what Article 205 says, we've looked at it. Do you not agree?

A. I can only say that the circumstances which are connected with the personality of the claimant can include also the conditions in which third parties are; it may be close relatives, it may be third persons, it can be animals.

Q. Provided, would you agree, that the conditions of the third party have the effect of personally disabling the claimant himself from acting?

A. Can you give me an example?

Q. I'm asking you to agree that that is the principle.

A. No, but I can't agree with that.

Q. Sorry?

A. I cannot agree with that. It's a too general statement.

Q. Right. Well, we will have to agree to disagree on that.

If the various conditions of Article 205 are satisfied, do you agree that it does not follow that the limitation period is extended indefinitely?

A. I'm afraid I cannot understand your question.

Q. If the conditions for an extension are satisfied, the extension is not indefinite, is it?

A. The extension is not indefinite.

Q. The extension of the limitation period.

A. The extension of the limitation period is not indefinite.

Q. No.

What it means is this, isn't it: the claimant is allowed to bring his claim once the exceptional circumstance has ceased to be operative, even if that is after the expiry of the limitation period; that's the effect, isn't it?

- A. It is the effect, however plus a period of time which is objectively necessary and sufficient for this person to prepare the claim and to file the claim. If the case is so simple that the evidence can be gathered within one day or, another case, this whole time all the evidence was collected and the draft statement of claims was prepared.

So the only missing thing is a signature beneath the statement of claim, its filing with the court, then I would agree. Otherwise unfortunately -- or fortunately for you, Mr Sumption, but the Russian law does not indicate what is the period which the court can grant the claimant to file the claim, even if the period of limitation is lapsed. That's a problem a bit.

- Q. Do you accept that the Russian courts have held that the exceptional circumstance must operate not only in the last six months of the limitation period but continuously thereafter up to the point where the claimant finally brings his claim?

- A. No.

- Q. Can we look at an illustration of that at bundle G(A)4/3. If you've got that bundle, I would like you to turn to flag 108, page 90 and following G(A)4/3.108/90.

Now, this was a case in which the Federal Arbitrazh Court for the Moscow circuit overturned the decision of a lower court to extend the limitation period on the grounds that the allegedly exceptional circumstance did not operate continuously up to the time of filing.

Could you please turn to page 91, the second page of the translation. I wonder if you would like to read to yourself from two-thirds of the way down page 91, the paragraph beginning:

"The Arbitrazh Court, having examined the indicated application..."

Until the end of the court's reasoning on this particular point which is about a third of the way down page 92, at the end of the paragraph which begins:

"Having established these circumstances..."

Perhaps you would just remind yourself of that.

(Pause)

A. I am through.

Q. Right. Now, I think this may have been the case that you had in mind earlier this morning when you referred to a case where the claimant was relying on the illness of his wife but it turned out he'd been carrying on his business in the ordinary way, notwithstanding the illness of his wife, was that right?

A. Yes, that's right.

Q. Now, if we just look at this case, on page 91, second paragraph from the end G(A)4/3.108/91:

"Here, a right to restoration of the statute of limitations arises if the circumstances connected with the person of the plaintiff that provide a basis for the court to declare them valid arose within the last six months of the statute-of-limitations period."

You accept that that is so in principle, do you not?

A. So far I accept.

Q. Then in the next paragraph:

"Thus, the reasons for missing the deadline of the statute of limitation that the plaintiff cites in the justification for restoring the period must be continuous in nature from 1 [January] 2002 ([the] date of its expiration [that's the expiration of the limitation period]) through [to] 24 [May] 2004 (... filing [of the] claim in the court)".

Do you accept that that is a correct statement of the law?

A. This may be a correct statement in this particular case but it is not a correct statement on Russian law, generally speaking.

Q. Well, it was because the claimant in this case could not satisfy that requirement that he failed, isn't it?

A. Yes, but besides there are many other requirements, so it looks like -- you know, Russian courts do not like when people are lying to them, which happened here.

Second, if you have a look at the substance of the case, the case was as such: the claimant filed an application to withdraw from a limited liability company. This is one of the major draw-backs of the Russian company law which is feared by many, many foreigners when they engage in business in Russia. That's why many of them prefer to establish a joint venture with a Russian partner not as a limited liability company but as a joint stock company.

In a limited liability company until recently any participant could withdraw at any time, which means that the company is under pressure to pay the actual value of the share of that participant to such participant within a very short period of time. This may undermine the solvability of the company.

So -- but the case as such is quite simple. If I would be the judge I will of course decline the application for restoration of the period of limitation in this very case, because here the circumstances when the wife of the person was in need of the care ended at 1 January 2002. But the claim was filed on 24 May 2004, which means that this is a period of time comparable to the three-year limitation period in a very straightforward and simple case, whether or not the company paid the actual value to a withdrawing participant and what its amount should be.

- Q. Dr Rachkov, I'm not particularly interested in the application of the principle to facts which are very different from ours, I'm interested in getting your assistance in identifying what the principle is.

This court believed that the principle was that the justification must be continuous in nature from the expiration of the limitation period to the date of filing the claim in the court. That is a statement of legal principle. Do you say it's wrong?

- A. I say it's wrong.

- Q. You say it's wrong. Right.

- A. I say it's wrong.

- Q. Are you aware of other cases in which any other principle has been applied once the limitation period has expired? Or are you simply referring to the Urybin case which you mentioned, the 10-month case, a moment ago?

- A. To save time I'm referring only to Urybin case, but I think the same applies in other cases whenever the period of limitation must be restored. So --

- Q. Well we'll look at that --

- A. -- the conclusion is that Russian law, although there is a requirement that the circumstances preventing from filing a claim should have arisen within the last six months of the limitation period, there is no deadline within which, after the circumstances discontinued, the claim must be filed. It really depends on the nature of the claim. And, as I said, if the evidence is simply lacking nobody will file a claim and -- incurring additional costs and expenses. First all the evidence must be collected.

And if you compare this situation with the situation of a normal claim, in a normal case the claimant has three years to think about whether he is in a position to settle the case with a defendant amicably, whether there are any mediation possibilities, to gather the evidence, to engage in correspondence with the defendant and maybe third parties, and to think thoroughly about whether or not to file the claim, and to prepare it.

What is wrong about a person who is not in a position to file a claim to have the same period of time? So there is absolutely no rule on that in Russian law.

- Q. Are you suggesting that the claimant has three years from the end of his disability to bring his claim, is that your suggestion?
- A. It is not my suggestion because, as I said before, it's really -- this question must be solved on a case by case basis. However, it is not unreasonable to think that in difficult cases it may well be three years.

Q. Your own evidence is that the claimant must bring his claim promptly once the exceptional circumstance has ceased to operate, isn't it?

A. Yes, but subject to the evidence which he or she must gather in the meanwhile.

Q. Well, let's turn to the exceptional circumstances alleged in this case, and I'm not asking you to discuss the facts but simply to proceed on certain hypotheses.

Mr Berezovsky says that he was aware of the violation of his rights in May 2001 but was afraid that if he sued Mr Abramovich while Mr Glushkov was still in Russia, Mr Abramovich would use his influence to prevent Mr Glushkov's release from prison or would influence his prosecution.

That's Mr Berezovsky's case, you understand that?

A. I understand.

Q. Now, I'm going to ask you to assume that that is true, okay? Would you describe that, I presume not, as a serious illness or a helpless state as far as Mr Berezovsky is concerned?

A. It is not an illness of Mr Berezovsky.

Q. It's not, therefore, one of the specific exceptional circumstances mentioned on a non-exhaustive basis in Article 205, is it?

- A. So it is not a physical, heavy illness, maybe it's a mental one; it's not a helpless state; it's not illiteracy.
- Q. Now, you would not say, would you, that this particular alleged disability is even analogous to the exceptional circumstances which are mentioned in 205, would you?
- A. What do you mean by analogous?
- Q. It's not even similar.
- A. No, it is not similar.
- Q. Now, you recall the extract which we went through from Dr Maleina's work and the various examples that she gives: illness, need to attend to a sick family member, change of residence, residence abroad, long business trip; it's not analogous to any of those either, is it?
- A. No, but Dr Maleina underlines that the list is not exhaustive. Dr Maleina tries, as any writer, to identify the most typical cases, but, as I said, the life is much richer than yours and mine and Dr Maleina's imagination.
- Q. It's not a problem personal to the claimant, Mr Berezovsky, is it; it's about Mr Glushkov?
- A. It may be a personal problem of Mr Berezovsky. I don't know how good or how confident, how friendly the relations between Mr Berezovsky and third parties is.

- Q. It's not a matter that made it impossible for Mr Berezovsky to give instructions to his solicitor to issue a claim form, is it? There's nothing in that assumed fact that a Russian court would regard as preventing Mr Berezovsky from giving instructions to an English solicitor to prepare and issue the claim, is there?
- A. It's not quite right. I mean in Russian reality, and here I need to refer to the Russian reality, wealthy individuals were put under pressure to give up some property, and here I'm speaking about such cases as Woshinski(?), as Khodorkovsky, as, you know -- what is it, the name -- Gusinsky, who gave up their property, Galdovski(?), who gave up their property at undervalue because they were threatened and because they were put under pressure. Some of them were put in jail.
- Q. Dr Rachkov, I don't want to debate the facts with you, but this alleged tort was committed in May 2001, and the Russian limitation period expired therefore in about May 2004, and for all but six months of that period Mr Berezovsky was out of Russia.
- A. I can't deny it if these are the facts, which you know. I don't know all the facts, but maybe you are (inaudible).

Q. We shouldn't be debating the facts.

Now, are you aware of any case in which a claimant's fears for the consequences of bringing his action have been accepted as a reason for extending the limitation period?

A. The cases which I was able to identify do not contain such situation.

Q. No. Would it make any difference to the application of Article 205 if the claimant's concerns, although genuinely felt by him, were objectively unfounded?

A. If they were not -- if the feelings of Mr Berezovsky or an abstract claimant were not well-founded and genuine, then indeed there is no reason to restore the limitation period.

Q. So if he had a genuine but completely unfounded fear that, if he were to leave his house to go and file a claim, he would meet with ghosts or monsters on the way, that would be irrelevant?

A. I think it would be irrelevant, yes.

Q. Could we please have a look at a decision of the Federal Arbitrazh Court of Western Siberia at G(A)4/3, flag 95 G(A)4/3.095/1. It's the same bundle that we had open last, I believe.

A. What is the number of the flag? Can you repeat this?

Q. 95. This is the case of Mr Guseletov. Now, the allegation -- have you got that? The allegation here was that the claimant was prevented from bringing his claim by a fear that, if he did bring his claim, the defendant would murder him.

If we just look at the reasoning, at the bottom of the first page of the extract, second paragraph up from the bottom:

"Having considered the arguments in favour of granting a revival [that's of the limitation period], the court found that there were no exceptional personal circumstances present (as set forth in Article 205...) that would warrant granting the motion to revive the limitation period. Having reviewed the medical documents submitted, the court found that they had failed to corroborate the claimant's inability to take procedural action in court (such as preparing the statement of claim, filing it in court, etc.). The claimant's assertion of discontinuity in the limitation period was denied."

Now, just pausing there, in that part of the judgment the court is saying, isn't it, that they had been presented with no medical evidence that suggested that the claimant's fear of being murdered was something that prevented him from preparing a statement of claim and filing it in court et cetera, ie taking the practical administrative steps to start an action. That is the point that they're taking into account there, isn't it?

A. Yes, correct. I think Guseletov behaved in courts very strangely. So he said he wants to refrain or to prohibit a public hearing, and he filed several applications, so I have the impression that he was a bit crazy in saying something.

Q. Well I'm sure Mr Guseletov was a most eccentric person, but courts of law in Russia apply legal principles to particular facts, don't they?

A. Yes.

Q. If we can just look at the second page of this report, bottom of the page G(A)4/3.095/2:

"The court found that the claimant became or should have become aware of the violation of his rights... on 18 [October] ... at the latest, when along with Kuznetsov he was making decisions on issues within the authority of the general... meeting. [Mr] Guseletov filed his claim as to ... ownership ... in [January 2010] ... after the three-year limitation period had expired."

Then they set out Article 205.

After that paragraph:

"VV Guseletov asserts that he has failed to file within the time allowed because on 18 [September]... he learned from law enforcement officials that ... Kuznetsov was conspiring to commit a crime (murder) against him, and he was so much affected by this that he could not file his claim in court prior to the expiration of the limitation period. As a matter of proof, the claimant submitted a ruling to bring criminal charges dated 18 [September]... and certain medical documents.

"Having considered the arguments in support of the motion... the court found that the claimant had failed to prove the special circumstances asserted therein.

"The documents in the case file contain no evidence to corroborate the assertion that the claimant has been in a state that prevented him to file on time for six months prior to the expiration of the limitation period.

"The court did not consider the claimant being under stress and in a state of confusion as a valid enough reason to miss the allowed filing window. The medical diagnosis in the documents... does not corroborate the assertion that the claimant has been gravely ill and incapacitated."

Now, there's a number of points about that that I want to ask you about. First of all, do you agree that the ground on which the court proceeded was that a fear of being murdered was only a relevant factor if it could be shown that it produced a physical or psychological incapacity on the part of the claimant of the sort that you would expect to be established by medical evidence? Would you agree that that is what they said?

- A. No, I don't derive such conclusions from this case, and I think it would be too creative to expand it to the Russian court practice in general.
- Q. Would you agree that the first ground on which the court decided this case was that the claimant's fears for his safety was not established by medical evidence demonstrating that he was under a personal incapacity; do you agree that that was the first of their grounds?
- A. I agree that the claimant did not provide the court with the documents deriving from a medical institution, and saying that he is in such an illness which prevented him from filing a claim on time.
- Q. Now, would you agree that the second ground was that, in the court's view, the claimant's fears for his safety were not such as to prevent him from performing the various administrative steps necessary to bring his claim such as filing and drafting and so on? Do you agree that was the second ground upon which they decided this?

A. Well, the court does not mention such statement that the claimant has enough time to prepare the claim, and so on.

Q. Well, let's have a look at four paragraphs down, page 3 G(A)4/3.095/3:

"The documents in the case file contain no evidence to corroborate the assertion that the claimant has been in a state that prevented him to file on time for six months prior to the expiration of the limitation period."

A. Yes, but there is nothing said in that that he had enough time to collect evidence and so on. What is said is that, within the last six months of the period of limitation, the claimant was not in a state which prevented him from filing a claim.

What does it mean? Does it mean that he could not evidence that he could not go to the post office and file the claim? Maybe something else. Who knows?

Q. What they say in the last paragraph of the part that I referred you to is:

"Moreover, the court was correct to note that the reasons the claimant asserted had prevented him from filing before the limitation period... did not at the same time [prevent] him from personally managing a number of companies..."

In other words, he was perfectly capable of conducting his affairs.

A. Absolutely.

Q. And if he was capable of conducting his ordinary business, then there was no reason why he shouldn't be capable of filing a claim even if he thought he was going to be murdered by Mr Kuznetsov. That's what it decided, isn't it?

A. It is only decided that -- or it appears from the judgment to me that Guseletov tried to say some lies to the court, to say that he was so badly stressed that he couldn't do anything.

I think if he would be in such a state he would not be able to work, so that's why I think it was very imprudent from his part to lie to the court.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What's your evidence if, just through fear, he didn't file? So obviously there's some stress but he's not incapacitated, he goes and runs his business, he manages his affairs, but he's just frightened that something will happen to him or his family if he files proceedings against the defendant; is that enough to extend the period of limitation in your view?

A. I think this can be enough. I think clearly it all depends on the specifics of the case --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay. Let me just hypothesise to you that the specifics are he's perfectly well in himself but he is just frightened that if he files, the defendant will murder or kill him or members of his family.

A. If he knows the defendant so well that he understands that this might well happen, I think that's a valid ground to restore the limitation period.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

MR SUMPTION: You see, this court appears to have been of a different view, because if you look at page 3, almost exactly halfway down the page G(A)4/3.095/3:

"The court did not consider the claimant's being under stress and in a state of confusion as a valid enough reason to miss the allowed filing window."

Because the medical evidence did not establish that the stress was such as to incapacitate him.

A. Yes, but stress and confusion is something else than a well-founded, or well-grounded and genuine fear.

Q. You see --

A. I am also in stress now when you are cross-examining me.

Q. I don't believe that for a moment, Dr Rachkov.

Now, what I suggest to you is that this case is a perfectly orthodox application of the relevant general principles of Russian law. Would you accept that?

There's nothing legally questionable about this analysis.

A. I think in this particular case the analysis is correct, but you cannot expand this reasoning to all other cases because the cases are many-fold.

Q. What I would suggest to you is that a state of stress and confusion on the part of the claimant is not enough to justify an extension of the limitation period unless it is such as to incapacitate the claimant from running his affairs.

A. Yes, and I can give you a very good example.

Q. First of all, would you accept that that, as a general statement of law, is a fair summary?

A. It's a fair summary, and I can give you an example.

When Hitler was just 20 kilometres away from Moscow, a famous Soviet composer Maxim Dunayevsky, who was a Jew, he was so in stress that he couldn't able -- he couldn't do anything for three years. He couldn't write any music, nothing.

This shows that people can, although Hitler did not promise to kill him personally, and the Hitler troops did not occupy Moscow at the end of the day, but he was in a position -- he wasn't simply able to do anything.

Q. I understand, and my Lady will in due course decide whether that would be a fair description of Mr Berezovsky's condition between 2001 and 2007.

A. Well, but thanks to the situation, Mr Abramovich is not Hitler who threatened Mr Dunayevsky.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, let's get back to the principles of law, shall we?

MR SUMPTION: Now, in this case, Mr Glushkov left Russia in July 2006 but the claim form was not issued until June 2007, and it's in that context that you refer to the Urybin decision of the arbitrazh appellate court, that's right, isn't it?

A. Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: If you're going on to another case, I'm going to take a break for the shorthand writers.

MR SUMPTION: Yes, of course.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Ten minutes.

(11.35 am)

(A short break)

(11.50 am)

MR SUMPTION: Dr Rachkov, Urybin is the case about the legally illiterate miner living in the Ukraine which we referred to in another context earlier this morning.

I'm coming back to it because of your suggestion that this shows that you might have quite a long time to prepare your case and so on, and ten months was the gap in this case. That's the point you're making, isn't it?

A. I don't know whether in that particular case the claimant needed ten months to prepare his statement of claim, I just said that in an abstract case it may take time to prepare the statement of claim plus its annexes.

Q. Dr Rachkov, if you've got Urybin open, and I would like you to turn to page 80, which is the last page of the reasoning in the English text --

A. Can you remind me please of the binder?

Q. Sorry, it's G(A)2/4, flag 11 G(A)2/4.11/80.

You remember we had a discussion about the reasons for it, the disability is identified in the first full paragraph towards the top of page 80. And the dates in question, from where you get your ten months, are to be found in the second last paragraph before the words "Has Rule":

"The findings of the appeal court in relation to the statute of limitations not being overrun cannot be adopted since the complainant did not state the date of 9 [November] 2002 in the statement of claim ... when he learned of disposal of the shares."

So he learned of wrongful disposal of the shares in September 2002.

"... in the statement of claim ... when he learned of the disposal of the shares. The legal action was received by the court on 19 [July] 2006."

Now, where do we get the ten months that you refer to? Is that because you're taking three years from September 2002, and then measuring the time from September 2002 -- no, that doesn't work.

Where do you get the ten months, Dr Rachkov?

A. Yes, I can explain.

Three years from 9 September 2005 -- 2002, sorry, makes 9 September 2005.

Q. And it's the gap between that and July?

A. Yes, the gap between these dates.

Q. I understand. So that is the gap between the expiry of the limitation period and the filing of the claim, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. It is not the gap between the time when the exceptional circumstance ceased to operate and the time when the claim was filed, is it?

A. I don't know. This question is not addressed here.

Q. I see. So you cannot say that this case shows that you can have as much as ten months between the exceptional circumstance ceasing to operate and the claim being filed; this case does not say that, does it?

A. No, it does not.

Q. And indeed, if we look at what the disability was in the first full paragraph at page 80, namely the fact that the individual complainant was legally inexperienced, living in a foreign state and so on, all of those are factors which, on the face of it, appear to operate right up to the moment where he began the claim. That's right, isn't it?

A. It may well be.

Q. Now, are you aware of any case, however complex, in which a Russian court has allowed a claim to be brought after the expiry of the limitation period when the exceptional circumstance had ceased to operate 11 months or more before the claim was filed?

A. I did not find this.

Q. No.

Now, I want to turn if I may to Article 10, and that we will find at G(A)4/4, flag 2. It's on page 7 of flag 2 G(A)4/4.02/7.

Have you got that, Dr Rachkov?

A. Yes.

Q. You're obviously very familiar with this, but if I may just ask you to open it so that we can remind ourselves of its terms.

"Actions of citizens and legal persons taken exclusively with the intention to cause harm to another person are not allowed, nor is abuse of a legal right allowed in other forms."

Then there's a reference to competition which we don't need to trouble about.

Now, this is the provision of the Russian Civil Code equivalent to the provision which we found in almost all other civil law systems about abuse of rights, isn't it?

A. I think so, yes.

Q. And the basis of the argument that you found on this, I just want to make sure I've correctly understood it. What do you say is the right that Mr Abramovich would be abusing if he relied on the limitation period in this case?

A. Nothing.

Q. Nothing? Would he not be abusing his right if he relied on the limitation period in this case, in your opinion?

A. If we take an abstract case, there is nothing. If we take the particulars of claim, as I was made familiar with, I think the abuse may consist in preventing by threatening the claimant to file the actions, to file this claim. That's the abuse of right.

Q. I see. So is the basis on which you say there may be an abuse of right, and obviously you're not expressing a view on the facts but on the legal principles.

A. Of course.

Q. Is the basis on which you say there may be an abuse of rights that Mr Abramovich's conduct, in making threats to Mr Berezovsky, may have caused him to miss the limitation period; is that the basis of it?

A. That's the basis.

Q. So is this a form, or is the principle here that Mr Abramovich should not be allowed to apply the limitation period because he would be thereby profiting from his own wrong, is that the essential point that you say is an abuse of rights?

A. Well, yes, provided that all this is evidenced --

Q. Of course. But that's the legal principle that you're referring to?

A. That's the legal principle.

Q. Understood. The wrong in question being the threats made in May 2001, on his case?

A. Or continuant one.

Q. Well, would you agree that in order to succeed in this argument Mr Berezovsky would have to show at the very least that the threat said to have been made by Mr Abramovich in May 2001, and I can tell you that no threats are alleged after that, caused him to delay issuing his claim form until June 2007? Would he have to prove that?

A. What exactly?

Q. Sorry?

A. What must he prove, excuse me?

Q. Well, in order to succeed in this argument -- can I ask you to assume that no threats were made after May 2001, okay? Now, in order to succeed in this argument, would Mr Berezovsky not have to show at the very least that the threat made in May 2001 caused him to delay issuing his claim form until June 2007?

A. Maybe so.

Q. Well, is it so or not?

A. In Russian procedural law it looks a bit different. So first the claimant files the claim. The claimant is free to either file simultaneously or afterwards an application for restoration of the limitation period, but the claimant can also act the other way around. The claimant can wait until the defendant raises the objection that the period of limitation lapsed and only then file such application.

Q. Well, I'm not asking you about the procedure in a Russian court for establishing whether or not the limitation period should be extended, I'm asking about the underlying principle of law.

If you assume that the last threat was made in May 2001, would it be necessary for Mr Berezovsky, in order to be able to rely on Article 10, to show that the threat made in or before May 2001 caused him to delay issuing his claim form until June 2007? Would it be necessary for him to establish that?

A. I think it is important, yes.

Q. Now, you cite by way of analogy Articles 179 to 181 of the Civil Code. I don't think you say that they are directly applicable but you say that one can get guidance from them.

A. Yes.

Q. Can we just look at those. I think the best place to find this is in your fifth report where you actually, I think, set it out verbatim. It's not in the extracts that I've been using. G(A)1/1, flag 2, page 163
G(A)1/1.02/163.

A. Yes.

Q. And at the bottom of page 162 and the top of page 163 you deal with this and you refer to Article 181.

Now, this is concerned, isn't it, with the running of the limitation period in cases of duress and fraud, is that right?

A. Which cases are you --

Q. 179 to 181 are concerned with that.

A. So we're speaking about the Civil Code of the Russian Federation, aren't we?

Q. Yes, I think we'll need to look at something which has 179 as well.

Forgive me for jumping around, my Lady.

Can you turn to G(A)2/1, flag 6, where we've got the whole of this section of the Code, and in particular page 118 G(A)2/1.06/118.

Now, is Article 179 of the Civil Code concerned with the invalidity of transactions made under the influence of fraud, duress, threats and so on? Is that right?

A. Yes.

Q. And the analogy that you are referring to is with the provisions relating to the running of time there, and Article 181 deals with time periods of limitations of actions under invalid transactions.

This is concerned with time periods of limitation of actions in cases where a transaction has been made under the influence of fraud, duress, threat et cetera, is that right?

A. Yes.

Q. Does Article 181 provide at sub-article 2 that:

"A suit for the declaration of an avoidable transaction as invalid and for [the] application of the consequences of its invalidity may be brought within a year from the day of the termination of the duress or threat under the influence of which the transaction was made... or from the day when the plaintiff knew or should have known of other circumstances that are the basis [of invalidity]."

So is it the position -- there is obviously a special time limit here, unlike the time limit that applies for a damages claim, relating to fraud, duress and so on, that's right, isn't it? There is a special time limit of a year which starts from the time that the threat ceases to operate, is that correct?

A. Yes, which can be well beyond the three-year period.

Q. Yes. The reason this doesn't apply directly is that when we're talking about a claim not for the recognition of a transaction as being invalid but a claim for damages for a tort, there is no special period of time which starts from the time when the threat ceased to be effective, isn't that right?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, the significant point about this, surely, is that this time period, so far as it's analogous, begins to run as soon as the influence of the threat or violence in question comes to an end?

A. In principle, yes. However, we need to understand whether this rule applies vis-a-vis the party to the transaction or third parties.

Q. Now, if we can go back to the article we're looking at, Article 10, I may ask you to address one other aspect of this particular issue G(A)4/4.02/7. Article 10.1 refers to:

"Actions of citizens and legal persons taken exclusively with the intention to cause harm to another person are not allowed nor is abuse of a legal right allowed in other forms."

Now, would you agree that there is a respected school of thought among Russian legal scholars that an allegation of abuse of rights requires proof that the party abusing his rights intended to use his rights for an improper purpose?

A. To which writers do you refer, Mr Sumption?

Q. Well, I'm asking you to agree generally that there are respected writers who take that view.

A. There are respected writers.

Q. Well, for example, Volkov takes it, does he not?

A. Let us have a look at Volkov.

Q. G(A)4/8, flag 16. G(A)4/8.16/84.

First of all, do you regard Volkov as a distinguished and reputable legal scholar?

A. Frankly I don't know him. Volkov is a very widespread Russian name, I simply don't know which Volkov it is.

Q. I see, so you know nothing about him.

A. No.

Q. What he says about this is:

"Subjectively, exercising a certain right 'wrongfully' implies certain blamefulness of the relevant authorised person. Causing harm accidentally in the course of exercising a subjective civil law is not considered to be an act of 'wrongdoing' and shall be qualified under the laws of tort."

A little lower, after the page break:

"May any other forms of abuse of a right be manifested not intentionally but by negligence, or at least with [an] indirect intention...? An intention is different from a wish and/or motives by the fact that [a] person who expresses an intention has a goal clearly articulated for himself/herself. Abuse of right, unlike other offences, is carried out by ... means of right. This is what makes it so different, and this exactly 'model' is entirely built-in into the program formed beforehand in the offender's mind. The awareness of the means by which he/she would achieve the goal makes it impossible for the offender's mental process to go on other than in the form of direct intent. As one cannot chop wood without knowing the purpose of a wood chopper, one cannot abuse a right without being aware why a person uses such right."

Now, the translation isn't terribly fluent there but if we go down to the next sentence:

"Hence the conclusion: both chicane and any other forms of abuse of right may only be exercised by a person with direct intent, i.e. deliberately. Actions performed unintentionally or by negligence must be qualified either in accordance with individual rules of the Civil Code ... or in the context of tort law."

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I must say I'm mystified by the last sentence about the wood chopper.

MR SUMPTION: I don't think it's a close analogy, my Lady. It will not be featuring in our submissions.

But I think it's clear what the point being made is. The point being made is this, isn't it, Dr Rachkov: if the law confers upon you a certain right, and contrary to Article 10 you use a legal right that you undoubtedly have but for abusive purposes, you may be disabled from exercising your right.

The point that Mr Volkov is making is that since this is a rule that prevents you from relying on an undoubted legal right, you cannot accidentally commit an abuse of right, you can only do so intentionally.

Do you agree that's the point that he's making?

A. To some extent. In Russian law we differentiate between accidental causation of harm, and causation of harm at fault.

Q. And? I didn't hear that last word.

A. Causation of harm at fault. The fault consists of either intention or negligence, and in turn negligence and intention may have two sub-forms, if you want.

So I wouldn't say that the first paragraph, which deals with accidental causation of harm, is somehow related to the case at hand.

Q. Well, what I'm suggesting to you, and this is certainly the view expressed by Mr Rozenberg, is that if you are going to be disabled from exercising a right conferred upon you by the Code, namely a right to rely on limitation on the ground of abuse of rights, nothing short of an intentional abuse of your rights will do.

Do you accept that?

A. I think it can be also negligence.

MR SUMPTION: I see. Those are all my questions,

Dr Rachkov. Thank you very much.

THE WITNESS: Thank you.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Adkin.

MR ADKIN: My Lady, I have a few questions.

Cross-examination by MR ADKIN

MR ADKIN: Dr Rachkov, I want to ask you some questions on behalf of the family defendants.

Do you agree that under Russian law you cannot amend or add to an existing contract if that existing contract is non-concluded or invalid?

A. Yes. This statement makes sense, I agree.

Q. You would agree, wouldn't you, that in resolving disputes about whether a contract has been formed, the Russian courts do not apply laws retroactively, that is to say, they apply to the dispute the substantive law in place at the time of the making of the contract?

A. Russian law is more difficult than this. If you have a look at Article 2, paragraph 4 I guess -- no, it's Article 4, paragraph 2 -- which stipulates that if there was a contract made before the first part of the Civil Code entered into force, but certain rights and obligations have arisen out of this contract after that date, then the Civil Code applies to this these rights and obligations and liability.

Q. I understand. But subject to that qualification which arises out of the provision of the Civil Code, what Russian law doesn't do is apply to a contract, which was made, performed, concluded in 1992, the Civil Code which wasn't introduced until 1995?

A. Yes, in principle that's correct. Russian law, as any other -- or many other laws of other countries, has no retroactive effect, unless the law so provides.

For instance, if you have a look at 422 of the Russian Civil Code, it states that if after the contract was concluded some mandatory rules were introduced they apply anyway.

Q. I see. And you would also agree, would you, that in resolving disputes before the Russian court, the Russian court will apply the procedural rules in place at the time of the hearing of the relevant court proceeding?

A. Yes, I agree with that.

Q. Please could you be given Professor Maggs's first report, and turn to paragraph 58, which is at bundle G(A)5/1.00/19.

A. Can you repeat the number of the flag, please?

Q. I don't think the flag has a number, it's just at the very front of the bundle.

You should there see the first expert report of Professor Maggs, and I would like you, if you would, please, to turn to page 19 of that report. Do you have that?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Now, prior to the introduction of Article 161 of the '95 Civil Code, which I think we're all agreed came into force on 1 January 1995, the provision of Russian law which dealt with the nonobservance of the written form in contracts was Article 46 of the 1964 Civil Code. That is the article which is set out by Professor Maggs at paragraph 58 of his first report. Do you agree?

A. Yes, I do agree, with a small caveat that I'm not a specialist in historical law which applied at that time.

Q. I understand.

Professor Maggs tells us in this part of his first report that he has searched for cases involving the confirmation by witness testimony of an oral contract where the contract was formed before 1 January 1995, ie before the '95 Civil Code was introduced, but the case was heard after that date; do you understand?

A. I do understand.

Q. And he tells us -- and this is at paragraph 59 of his report -- that he has discovered two such cases, and that in both cases the court applied not Article 161 of the '95 Code, but Article 46 of the '64 Code, ie the predecessor provision. Do you see that?

A. I do see that.

Q. Now, I want, if I may, to look at these cases. They're both in the same bundle. The first is at tab 9. For the transcript that is G(A)5/1.09/89.

Now, this is a decision, as I understand it, of the Supreme Court, that's right, isn't it?

A. Yes, of the Supreme Court of the Russian Federation.

Q. And we see from the first large paragraph that it was heard in September 1998, and if we scroll until four paragraphs from the bottom, we will see that the lower court hearing was December 1996, and the intermediate court May 1997. In other words, all of the relevant hearings in this case happened after the date of the introduction of the '95 Civil Code; do you follow?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. We also see, don't we, from the third substantive paragraph, the paragraph in the middle of page 89, that the relevant transaction with which this case was concerned occurred in May 1993. Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. And that was of course before the '95 Civil Code was introduced.

Now, turning over the page, we get to the conclusion of the Supreme Court. It disagreed with the court below, and it criticised the decision of the lower court because it said it had applied the wrong substantive law. We see that again in the middle of page 90, the paragraph that starts -- well, the first paragraph I should take you to is in the middle of page 90 and it says:

"The decision of the court, which is in violation of Art 197, as well as Arts 192 and 194 of the... Code of Civil Procedure, is based solely on the tentative testimony of the plaintiff, who has an interest in the outcome of the case."

Then two paragraphs below:

"In accepting the arguments of the plaintiff that the transaction was concluded under the influence of fraud, the court did not referred [perhaps that should be 'was not referred' or 'did not refer'] to any evidence in support of this, the notary was not questioned and the substantive law -- Art 179 Civil Code -- was not properly applied, since on the date of these events -- 1993 -- the Civil Code (Part 1) of 1995 [had] not yet entered into effect."

Then if we go to the final paragraph on page 90, the court remits the case back to the lower courts for a fresh determination, and the Supreme Court says this:

"In the new proceedings it will be necessary to consider the above and issue a decision in accordance with the law, bearing in mind that by virtue of Art 46 [of the 1964 Civil Code] confirmation or denial of contractual clauses by testimony is not allowed, except in the cases specified by law."

So would you agree that what is happening in this case is that the Supreme Court is looking at a contract, looking in 1998 to the contract formed in 1993, and saying, in relation to the writing requirement: you have to apply the provision of the code in force in 1993, namely Article 46 of the 1964 Civil Code. That's right, isn't it?

A. I think it's a too generic statement. If you have a look at the chronology, the contract was made in May 1993 but the claimant filed the claim in May 1994. In May 1994, of course the old Civil Code applied. That's why the court of the first instance which accepted this claim for trial, and rendered its judgments only in December 1996, applied the old Civil Code.

Besides, I think the credibility of the reasoning here is undermined largely by the mix-up of two various legal regimes. On the one hand, the court refers to Article 179 of the new Civil Code, which is on the second page; on the other hand, it refers suddenly to Article 46 of the old Civil Code.

Last remark. The wording of Article 46 of the Civil Code of 1964 is interchangeable with the wording of the current Article 162.

Q. Well, can I just pick up on what I understand the two points that you've made to be.

Firstly, you said there appears to be some confusion because it's referring to Article 179 of the new Civil Code. Now, if one goes to page 90, and I referred you to this paragraph a moment ago, what the Supreme Court appears to be saying in the paragraph starting:

"In accepting the arguments of the plaintiff ..."

Is that the courts below were wrong to apply

Article 179 of the new Civil Code because, at the date of these events, ie the contract, 1993, the new Civil Code had not yet entered into effect.

That's right, isn't it? That's what the court is saying?

A. I have difficulties in understanding this very awkward wording which the court used.

Q. Could we please look at the second decision, which is at tab 10. Again, this is a decision of the Supreme Court, as I understand it. I'm not sure one can see that from the face of the document, but we are told that by Professor Maggs in his first report G(A)5/1.10/95.

A. I think the number indicates that this is a judgment of the Supreme Court.

Q. Thank you.

And here, if one looks at the first paragraph, these proceedings were instigated in October 1999. Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. And if one looks at the fourth paragraph, we see what the proceedings were about, and they're about an agreement which was entered into in November 1990.

So this is a case, again, where we have a pre-'95 agreement and a post-'95 determination on that agreement.

And if we go over the page, please, to page 96 G(A)5/1.10/96 and look at the fourth paragraph up from the bottom of the page, the court says this:

"The rule on observance of the written form of a transaction --"

Sorry, do you have that, Dr Rachkov?

A. Yes, I do, yes.

Q. "The rule on observance of the written form of a transaction by legal entities with citizens in respect of housing and on the removal of rights of the parties in a dispute to refer the case to support the transaction on the evidence is contained in the Civil Code [this is the 1964 Civil Code] [at] Art ... 46, which was in force at the time of sale of the house."

So again, they're applying the pre-existing 1964 Code provision, Article 46 on simple written form, because that was the provision which was in force at the time of the sale of the house.

Do you follow, Dr Rachkov?

A. Yes, I do follow.

Q. What I suggest these cases show is that, because the court was applying the pre-1995 rule, notwithstanding that the cases were heard after the introduction of the '95 Civil Code, it indicates that the rule in question on simple written form is regarded by the Supreme Court at least in these cases as substantive and not procedural. Do you agree?

- A. No, I do not agree. I can draw your attention to the fact that in this judgment, the mix-up is even more -- is even heavier than in the previous one. In this judgment the court cites for instance here -- the English wording is, "In confirmation", it's page 96, second paragraph from the bottom:

"In confirmation of the contract of sale of the house between V and PC 'Kolorit', the court decision referred to the testimony of witnesses, whereas in accordance with Art 162 of the Civil Code non-compliance of the transaction with simple... form deprives the parties of the right in the event of dispute to refer to the confirmation of the transaction and its conditions as evidence ..."

And here the court refers to Article 46 of the Code of the RSFSR, which are, by the way, fully interchangeable between each other.

I also refer to, well, to the same page in the middle, the upper part of the middle:

"As stipulated in Art 161 of the Civil Code, the transactions of legal entities with each other and with citizens must be made in writing, except for transactions that require notarisation."

Q. Dr Rachkov, I think we can agree that they're interchangeable in this sense, that they contain largely the same provision to the same effect; but what I suggest to you is clear is that when the court considers what was actually in force at the time of the agreement, ie what is to be applied, it says it's Article 46. That is clear, is it not, from the fourth paragraph up from the bottom?

A. I disagree.

Q. Now, I want, if I may, to ask you some questions on a different topic.

As I understand it, it is your evidence that the general trend of legislation in Russia during the course of the '90s, if not beyond, was to liberalise the laws as they related to economic activity so as to permit individuals to engage in such activity with fewer and fewer restrictions.

Is that right? Have I understood your evidence correctly?

A. In general, this is right. However, later on, this freedom was more and more limited by the state. For instance, by introduction of licensing for certain business activities, by saying that individuals cannot do that, cannot do this, but only if they are sole entrepreneurs and registered as sole entrepreneurs they can do such things.

But in general, starting from 1986, so right after the Perestroika was announced, this began with the law on individual labour activity, indeed the freedom to engage in business activity was enlarged more and more.

Q. Well, you're quite right, Dr Rachkov, I do want to ask you about the entrepreneurial provisions, but let me ask this.

I also understand it to be common ground that from 1 March 1996 onwards, when the second part of the Civil Code was introduced, simple partnership agreements concluded by individuals for the purposes of entrepreneurial activity could only be concluded by registered entrepreneurs, do you agree with that?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, do you say that there are any restrictions on individuals, any restrictions on individuals, entering into simple partnership agreements for the purposes of entrepreneurial activity immediately prior to 1 March 1996?

A. Immediately prior there was, at least to the best of my knowledge, no such limitation, because I disagree that Article 434, second paragraph of the old Civil Code, applied.

Q. I see. So your evidence, as I understand it then, is this: until March -- from some stage in the 1980s, people were entirely free to conduct simple partnership agreements as individuals, but in 1996 that changed?

- A. Yes, it was to some extent a further development of the idea which was already reflected in Article 434 of the old Civil Code of 1964. You may remember that the old Civil Code prohibited not only citizens from engaging into simple partnerships beyond their personal needs, it also prohibited them from contracting with legal entities, with socialist organisations as they were called before. So this is the logical continuation of this idea in the new reality, if you want.

I'm not sure whether I expressed myself comprehensively enough.

- Q. No, that's helpful, thank you.

I think you said during cross-examination by Mr Sumption that you accept that Article 434 wasn't, as it were, formally annulled until the introduction of the second part of the '95 Civil Code on 1 March 1996, that's right, isn't it?

- A. Yes, that's right. I also would like to draw your attention to a paragraph of my fourth report, it's paragraph 46, where I explain what the rule was G(A)1/1.01/23.

As I said, the Soviet Union was a great state, a big one, and the corpus juris was so numerous that the parliament was simply not in a position to say, "Okay, these laws are old-fashioned, we abolish them, and these newer do apply."

So that's why the Solomon(?) decision was to say -- and which was actually done, the Supreme Soviet of the Russian Federation, which was, if you want, the permanent body of the Russian Parliament of that time, took a decision dated 14 July 1992 that the laws of the old Soviet Union, or old Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic, shall not apply if they are not in line with the newer law, ie Fundamentals.

And the explanation was that if there is something in the old Civil Code which is not 100 per cent reflected in the new -- in the Fundamentals, or new Civil Code, these restrictions do not apply.

Q. I understand. Well, I don't want to go over that ground again because I think it was covered by Mr Sumption.

What I want to do is put to you something which Professor Maggs says about this topic as it relates at least to entrepreneurial activity.

Could you please be given Professor Maggs' second report at G(A)5/2/6. Professor Maggs's analysis of this Article 434 issue is set out here, and I just want to take you through it.

Could you look, please, at paragraph 18, I think the easiest way of doing it is to take you to that, and 19.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What page?

MR ADKIN: That's page 6, my Lady, and page 7, where Professor Maggs sets out Article 23 of the first part of the Civil Code G(A)5/2/6.

Now, that sets up the situation in which a citizen is entitled to conduct entrepreneurial activity without the formation of a company but only from the time of registration as an individual entrepreneur. That's the effect of Article 23.1.

The effect of Article 23.3 is to apply the rules of the Code that regulate the activity of legal persons that are commercial organisations to entrepreneurial activity of citizens. That's right, isn't it?

A. Yes, that's the wording of the law.

Q. Yes. Now Professor Maggs explains, and do you agree, that the rules regulating commercial organisations, to which Article 23, sub-3 nods, were not contained in the first part of the Civil Code; they were introduced, weren't they, in the second part?

A. Excuse me, can you specify your question, please?

Q. The rules that regulated the activity of commercial organisations, at least in relation to joint activity agreements, were in the second part of the Civil Code, weren't they?

A. Yes. The contract on simple partnerships you mean, yes.

Q. So in order to make sense of Article 23.1 and 23.3, as it stood in 1995, before the introduction of the second part of the Civil Code, one would either have to ignore the article in its entirety or apply analogous provisions from another source, pursuant to Article 6, which I understand is the article which allows the provision of law by analogy. Do you agree with that?

A. With what exactly?

Q. In order to make sense, Article 23 sets up a situation where a set of rules are to be applied to an entrepreneurial activity before those rules have actually been brought into force, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. So in order to make sense of Article 23, either one has to ignore it in its entirety, at least in 1995 before those other rules have been brought into force, or one has to look to some other set of rules which were already in existence or which one could apply by analogy?

A. To the best of -- not necessarily. To the best of my knowledge, the legal status of a sole entrepreneur or registered entrepreneur pre-existed 1995.

Q. I understand, but we're talking here about --

A. So that's why I don't understand why we shall apply analogy of law or analogy of reasoning here.

Q. Well, Article 23 does not allow -- let me start again.

Article 23 was in the 1995 first part, wasn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. And we've established that it referred to a set of rules which were not in the 1995 first part?

A. Yes.

Q. Now which set of rules do you say it was referring to?

A. Before 1 January 1995, there was a federal law that regulated the activity of legal entities and individual entrepreneurs, and there was a requirement that if the individuals -- the individual engaged in business activity, then he must be registered as a sole entrepreneur, or a sole trader, if you wish.

The purpose of that was that the state knows who is doing what to collect taxes, for instance, and so on. However, the definition of the entrepreneurial activity is contained in Article 2 of the Civil Code which stipulates -- this is just my translation.

The entrepreneurial activity -- it's Article 2 of the Russian Civil Code of 1994 -- the entrepreneurial activity is an independent activity run at one's own risk, aimed at the systematic gaining of profit from using property, sale of goods, performance of works or provision of services by the persons who are registered in that capacity in accordance with the procedure established by the law.

As a matter of fact, only small traders who are well sitting(?) in the market were registered as sole entrepreneurs. None of Russian tycoons was registered as a sole entrepreneur.

- Q. But the rules concerning contracts, as I understand it -- and I think you agree with this -- regulating a contract between legal persons that were commercial organisations were not in place in 1995, were they?
- A. Yes, but there were other rules.
- Q. There were other rules?
- A. Yes.
- Q. Now, what Professor Maggs says is that the appropriate way of dealing with Article 23 is as follows. Because there were no rules dealing with the regulation of contracts between legal persons that were commercial organisations at that time and, specifically, no rules dealing with the regulation of contracts for joint activity, he says that one applies by analogy, so far as concerns joint activity agreements, the rules of the 1964 Civil Code. Do you agree with that?
- A. As long as --
- Q. That question was a bit dense so if you want to take some time to read it on the transcript, please feel free.

A. I'm afraid I still do not understand the substance of the question. What shall be applied by analogy to what?

Q. Well, he says that in order to make sense of Article 23 you need to apply by analogy the rules on joint activity contracts between legal persons that were previously in place, namely the rules contained in the 1964 Civil Code and in particular Article 434. Do you understand?

A. To the extent the Civil Code of 1964 did not contradict, as I said, the laws adapted since 1986, first in the Soviet Union and then in the Russian Federation, and these laws were numerous.

Q. What Professor Maggs says the upshot of that analysis is is that registered entrepreneurs could, in 1995, enter into joint activity agreements to pursue entrepreneurial activity without falling foul of the satisfaction of everyday needs(?) restriction in Article 434 of the 1964 Civil Code, but only if they registered as entrepreneurs according to Article 23.1 of the '95 Civil Code.

A. No.

Q. You disagree with that, do you?

A. I disagree with that. I can refer to the cases to which I tried to refer yesterday by -- unfortunately, I was pushed a lot but now I can refer to them.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, you can't. You will be referred to them in re-examination.

A. Excuse me.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: If Mr Rabinowitz thinks it's appropriate to do so, he can take you then. Unless Mr Adkin wishes to take you there?

MR ADKIN: My Lady, I don't. I've put the point I wanted to put.

Now, Dr Rachkov, I understand it is common ground, and you've affirmed this again this morning, that the purported term of the '95 agreement, the alleged '95 agreement that any future business between interests acquired by Mr Abramovich, Mr Berezovsky or Mr Patarkatsishvili would be shared between them was too vague to be legally binding. You agree with that, don't you?

A. In terms of contributions or in which terms?

Q. Let me remind you of what you say about this in the joint memorandum. If you could be handed please bundle G(A)6 and turn to tab 1, or the only tab, at page 29 G(A)6.01/29. I have in mind paragraph 82 which says:

"... it is agreed that the purported term of the 1995 Agreement described in C34.3, namely that any future business interests [the three] acquired would be shared between them with 50% to be owned by the Defendant and 50% to be owned by Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, was too vague to be legally binding."

I understand that you say that it did give rise or there was a term which gave rise to an obligation for each party to inform the other, but this is correct, is it not?

A. Yes, this is correct. Plus you should look at the performance, if any.

Q. I understand.

Now, the consequences of the invalidity of part of a transaction are set out in the first part of the Civil Code at Article 180, aren't they?

A. Yes.

Q. I'd like, if I may, to turn to this. If you could be given, please, bundle G(A)2/1 at tab 6 at page 118.

That's G(A)2/1.06/118:

"The invalidity of part of a transaction shall not entail the invalidity of the other parts of it if it is possible to suppose that the transaction would have been made without the inclusion of its invalid part."

Dr Rachkov, do you agree that what this means in practical terms is that, if the court concludes that a part of an agreement is invalid, it must decide whether the parties to that agreement would nonetheless have reached that agreement if that part had not been included?

A. Yes, I agree.

MR ADKIN: My Lady, I have no further questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Thank you very much, Mr Adkin.

Anybody else wishes to cross-examine?

MR MALEK: I have no questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

Mr Rabinowitz, would you like to start now or at 1.50?

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed. I may actually be able to finish.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well.

Re-examination by MR RABINOWITZ

MR RABINOWITZ: Dr Rachkov, on Monday, two days ago, you told my Lady that where parties enter into a contract with the purpose of creating a company, this was a so-called foundation contract. Do you recall that?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. You also said that this foundation contract was recognised by Russian court practice and legal literature as a simple partnership contract. Do you recall that?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Now, can I ask you, please, to go to bundle G(A)1/1, tab 3, which is where you'll find your sixth report. If you go to paragraph 34, I think it begins at page 186 G(A)1/1.03/186. Do you have that?

A. I do.

Q. You refer there, you say:

"Another form of partnership contract is a foundation contract, by which parties agree to create a company. The Plenums of the Supreme Court and the Supreme Arbitrazh Court have confirmed that this is a joint activity contract (partnership contract)..."

And then you cite something from that. Can I just invite you, please, to go to G(A)2/5, tab 10. You may have been taken to this by Mr Sumption. This is a joint resolution of the Plenums of the Supreme Court and the Supreme Arbitrazh Court and can you just -- the English is at page 27 G(A)2/5.10/27. Can you just read this to yourself. (Pause)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I don't think we have been to this.

MR RABINOWITZ: I beg your pardon?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I don't think we have been to this document. We may have been, I just haven't taken a note of it.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm not sure that we focused on -- maybe we haven't. The bit I think in particular, Dr Rachkov:

"A contract on the creation of a company being concluded by the founders of a joint stock company is a contract of joint activity on the foundation of the company [and then it says] and bears no relation to the foundation documents..."

Do you see that?

A. I do.

Q. Can you say whether or not this is the joint resolution of the Plenums that you had in mind?

A. This is the resolution that I had in mind.

Q. Thank you. You can put that away now, thank you.

Can I ask you next, please, if you could take up bundle G(A)4/6 and go to tab 63. I think this may have been what Mr Sumption took you to. This is Sukhanov's writing on the law of obligations. Can I ask you, please, to look at page 69 G(A)4/6.63/69 and in particular the penultimate paragraph of that page. You see it says:

"The goal for which a simple partnership is created should be common (joint) for all participants of a simple partnership agreement. At the same time it may be of commercial or non-commercial nature..."

Then you see the examples he gives:

"... (making profit, construction of apartment building, [and then this] formation of legal entity...)."

Do you see that?

A. I do.

Q. Can you say whether this is part of what you understand to be the writings and practice in Russia which reflects what you said about parties entering into a contract for the purpose of creating a company making a simple partnership contract?

A. Yes, this is the writing to which I refer when saying this.

Q. You can put 4/6 away. Can I ask you, please, to go to bundle 7/1. On Tuesday, yesterday, you said in answering Mr Sumption's questions that there was at least scholarly opinion that the Civil Code of 1964 and the Fundamentals of 1991 proceed from the assumption that if the parties did not define their contributions, the contributions would be equal. Do you recall that?

A. I do recall.

Q. Now, can I invite you, please, to go to tab 1 of 7/1, the English starts for relevant purposes on page 7. Well, it doesn't start, the relevant passage is on page 7 G(A)7/1.01/7.

This is, as you see from page 5 G(A)7/1.01/5, a work produced by Professor Ryasentsev?

A. Ryasentsev.

Q. Ryasentsev. I apologise to you and to him.

If you then go to page 7, do you see -- perhaps I should just get the date of this as well, I'm sorry. Can you help us as to when this book was published, page 4 G(A)7/1.01/4?

A. Yes.

Q. 1964?

A. 1965.

Q. 1965. Then going back to page 7 G(A)7/1.01/7, do you see the second paragraph --

A. Yes.

Q. -- on page 7:

"The amount of each participant's contribution is determined by the contract. If it is not determined in the contract, the sizes of contributions are assumed to be equal."

Can you say whether or not this was part of the scholarly opinion that you were referring to?

A. Yes, exactly.

Q. Can you then go to tab 2 in the same bundle, please, the English starts at page 11 G(A)7/1.02/11. Can you tell us whose work is this?

A. It's the work by Professors Ioffe and Tolstoi and Cherepakhin.

Q. And when was this published?

A. It was published in 1971.

Q. If you go to page 13 G(A)7/1.02/13, can you look in particular at the sentence at the beginning of the last paragraph of that page:

"The amount of each participant's contribution is determined by the contract. In the absence of direct indications in the contract, all the participants provide contributions of equal size."

Can you say whether this also is an example of the scholarly opinion to which you referred?

A. Yes, this was one of the examples to which I referred.

Q. Can you finally just go to tab 3. There is English at page 18 G(A)7/1.03/18, a work edited by Professor Krasavchikov, 1973. Can I ask you, please, to go to page 21 G(A)7/1.03/21 and can you look in particular at the section in the middle of the page beginning with the bold letters:

"The duty of the participants in the contract..."

A. Yes.

Q. Just read that, if you would, to yourself, in particular the second paragraph. You see it also says there:

"The amount of the contribution of each of the participants in joint activities in property or in work is determined by agreement between the parties. If not otherwise established by agreement, the amount is assumed to be equal for all participants."

Can you say whether this is another example of the scholarly opinion to which you referred?

- A. Yes, this is another example to which I referred when saying that the Civil Code of 1976 proceeded from the assumption that the contributions are equal unless otherwise regulated in the contract.
- Q. Now, today Mr Adkin was asking you about whether in 1995 only a registered entrepreneur could conclude a partnership contract. You disputed that and said that you wished to refer to a case or cases in your report. If you can do that quickly, can I invite you please to go to 1/1, tab 3, I don't want to tell you where you wanted to -- do you have it in front of you, Dr Rachkov?
- A. Yes, sorry.
- Q. Can you just identify what case or cases you were referring to, that you wanted to go to in answer to Mr Adkin's question?
- A. Yes. Well, the most significant case to which I referred was that mentioned in paragraph 37 of my sixth report --
- MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Sixth report?
- A. Yes.
- MR RABINOWITZ: Page 187, 1/1, tab 3 G(A)1/1.03/187, is that right?
- A. Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just a second. So it's B v S in paragraph 37, is it?

A. Correct.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And CJSC in 38?

A. Correct, and why is it so significant to my opinion?

Because it is the judgment which was rendered by the Supreme Court of the Russian Federation. It was based on a foundation contract dated 23 December 1993 and the court explicitly said that this is an agreement on simple partnership.

MR RABINOWITZ: I have no further questions, Dr Rachkov.

Thank you very much.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Those are the cases you were referring to earlier, are they, when Mr Adkin was examining you?

A. Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well.

Thank you very much indeed, Dr Rachkov, for coming and giving your evidence.

THE WITNESS: Thank you.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well, you may be released.

THE WITNESS: Thank you.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, 2 o'clock.

(The witness withdrew)

(1.00 pm)

(The short adjournment)

(2.00 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Sumption.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, I call Mr Rozenberg.

MR MIKHAIL ROZENBERG (sworn)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Please sit down if you would like to.

Examination-in-chief by MR SUMPTION

MR SUMPTION: Mr Rozenberg, would you give the judge your full name, please?

A. My name is Mikhail Rozenberg.

Q. Have you got bundle G(A)3/1 in front of you, I think you're about to be given it.

Now, you have prepared three expert reports for this trial, your third, fourth and fifth reports. Can you confirm that those three reports are the documents that we find behind the three flags of this bundle?

A. I confirm it.

Q. And do those reports represent your opinion?

A. Yes, they do.

Q. And are they the evidence that you wish to give on the matters on which you've been instructed in this hearing?

A. Yes.

MR SUMPTION: Thank you.

A. Thank you.

Cross-examination by MR RABINOWITZ

MR RABINOWITZ: Good afternoon, Mr Rozenberg.

A. Good afternoon.

Q. In your reports you identify a number of reasons why you say the 1995 agreement, and indeed the 1996 agreement, are invalid and ineffective, and I'm going to ask you, to begin with, questions relating to the reasons that you have identified.

I would like to start, if I may, with your contention that because the agreement between Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky was in oral and not in written form, that of itself makes it impossible for Mr Berezovsky to establish either the 1995 agreement or indeed the 1996 agreement, okay?

A. Yes.

Q. Can I begin this topic by seeing what you and indeed the other experts say about this in the joint memorandum, and if you can be given bundle 6/1, G(A)6/1, and keep it handy because we will be going back to it regularly.

G(A)6/1, there's only one tab, if you can go to page 5 of that, it's to see paragraph 12 which is where you deal with this topic G(A)6/1.01/5.

Just going through this, you see, looking at paragraph 12(1) that you and Dr Rachkov agree as follows:

"If the 1995 [agreement] and 1996 Agreements were made in oral form as alleged, Article 161.1 would apply to them, with the consequence provided by Article 162.1."

So it's common ground, is it not, that the consequences provided by Article 162.1 apply to the 1995 and 1996 agreements?

A. Yes.

Q. We have Article 161 and 162. If you go to G(A)4/4 behind tab 2, page 191 of this exhibit -- sorry, I've given a bad reference. It's page 29 of that exhibit, 4/4, tab 2, page 29 G(A)4/4.02/29. Okay?

Just have that open because we will need to refer to it.

Just going back -- do you see it, Mr Rozenberg?

A. "Transactions Made in Simple Written Form"?

Q. That's right. So just looking again at the joint memo, and then just looking at subparagraph 2 to see what else is agreed, you also agree that the consequences of 162.1 are, and you say:

"Article 162.1 prevents the parties from referring to sviedetelskie pokazania or 'witness evidence' to prove the existence of the agreement [or] its terms."

Do you see that?

A. Yes, yes, I do.

Q. At the moment -- I mean, do look at the article if you want. At the moment I'm just looking at what you and Dr Rachkov have agreed about this. It's right then that what Article 162.1 does is to prevent the parties from referring to witness evidence to prove the existence of the agreement and its terms, right?

A. That's absolutely correct.

Q. Then subparagraphs 3 and 4, where you set out what you agree the consequences of 162.1 are not.

In subparagraph 12(3), you agree that:

"Article 162.1 does not prevent the parties from referring to ..."

Evidence other than witness evidence.

You say in the first sentence:

"Article 162.1 does not prevent the parties from referring to other evidence to prove the existence of the agreement and its terms."

Correct?

A. Correct.

Q. Then you give some examples of the kind of evidence to which the parties may refer. You say:

"The parties are entitled to refer to documentary evidence or some other kind of physical evidence (such as records, photographs or videotapes etc) to prove these matters."

So, tell me if this is right: the claimants can rely, for example, on a tape recording of a conversation between the parties at the time of the relevant events before the litigation arose?

A. No, other evidence, such evidence, is possible.

Q. And that would include a tape recording of a conversation between the parties?

A. It's not prohibited by law. It's possible.

Q. Indeed Professor Maggs in his report has actually referred to a case in which the court allowed admission of a tape recording of the parties agreeing to the contract terms. Are you aware of that?

A. Yes, that's what Professor Maggs wrote.

Q. And you would accept that that accords with Russian law?

A. I see nothing contradicting it so I can agree.

Q. Thank you.

Then just going to subparagraph 4, you agree this, just looking at the first three sentences of subparagraph 4 of paragraph 12 of the joint memo:

"Article 162.1 does not itself prevent the parties from referring to their own... explanations to prove the existence of the agreement and its terms. Such explanations are a type of evidence, but they are not... 'witness evidence', and they are not precluded by Article 162.1. As noted below, however, it is disputed whether the parties' explanations have any independent weight (absent any documentary or physical proof)."

A. Yes.

Q. So just pausing here, you appear to agree with the following. First, you agree that Article 162.1 does not itself prevent Mr Berezovsky from relying on his own explanations to prove the existence of the agreement and their terms, that's right, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. Secondly, you agree that Mr Berezovsky's explanations are a type of evidence; that's right, isn't it?

A. That's right.

Q. Yes. And third, you agree that Mr Berezovsky's explanations are not witness evidence within the meaning of Article 162.1 and so are not precluded by Article 162.1, correct?

A. Obyasneniya, it's written in Russian, but explanations, party explanations, are not prohibited of course. Actually they're required.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you just explain to me what an explanation is?

A. I would say that it's the type of evidence closest to witness statements but given by the parties. And from the point of view of procedural form, both in courts and in arbitrazh procedural courts, they look almost like witness statements, with the difference that witnesses are warned that they will have to bear criminal liability in case of lying to the court, and parties are not informed about it.

And the second difference is that, of course, usually explanations of the parties are broader because parties reflect their position regarding the whole case, and witness evidence usually relates to particular episodes or particular parts which are important.

But from the point of view, form, and how it goes in courts, are just individuals explaining to the court, explain -- answering questions of lawyers whether they are parties, whether they are witnesses from the point of view of a person sitting in the courtroom.

It may look similar, but their legal weight, the importance of this evidence, is absolutely different because, first of all, both the Civil Procedure Code and the Arbitrazh Procedural Code require that evidence should be checked and evaluated in connection with other evidence.

And this brings the court to the situation when there is only one party's evidence and nothing else. It's important to verify this evidence and to evaluate in accordance with other evidence. But when there is at least one witness, it's already possible to evaluate the witness's evidence in connection with explanations of the parties.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So if, for example, one had an oral contract for the sale of a car between A and B, B says the contract was never made for the sale of the car, A said it was made, C is a bystander who heard the conversation. Is what A says and what B says explanation and what C says evidence?

A. Unfortunately the word "evidence" is used also regarding explanations, it's also a type of evidence. But you are absolutely right that C's statement -- because C is a witness, it will be witness evidence which, as I write, and I'm sure I confirm again, has much bigger legal weight because it's always possible to compare C's witness evidence at least with parties' explanations, with parties' evidence.

But in the absence of C, it's practically impossible for the court to compare the parties' explanations with any other evidence.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So all Article 162.1 would prevent, if it applied, would be to prevent C giving evidence of the conversation?

A. Correct. If this is a dispute regarding oral form of the transaction then C's -- if this agreement, sale of the car, was not in writing, if it was an oral agreement, then in order to confirm the existence of this transaction and of its terms it will be impossible to refer -- actually it will be impossible to call C as a witness for confirmation of the circumstances.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But A and B can give their evidence as to whether the conversation took place or did not take place?

A. Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But it's got limited weight.

A. Yes. But in the absence of C, and in the absence of any other evidence, it will be really a sad situation for the claimant, I would say.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see. Thank you very much.

Sorry, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: So it's a rather narrow exclusion because it excludes -- it doesn't exclude evidence from the parties at all, you say, other than the fact that it's given a different name; it's in effect the evidence of the parties, it simply excludes the evidence of third parties?

A. It excludes the evidence of witnesses. Third parties sometimes participate in trials, it's a different story.

Q. All right. I think it's becoming a lot clearer, thank you, Mr Rozenberg.

A. My pleasure.

Q. I think it becomes even clearer if we go to your second report at J2/5, tab 37 and you go to page 113

J2/5.37/113. You have paragraph 27, do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. And you say here:

"However, according to statutory rules of proof, each piece of evidence shall be evaluated by the court in conjunction with the other evidence in the case and no single piece of evidence has any predetermined value ..."

A. Yes, this is what the law says.

Q. So the law makes it clear that no piece of evidence has any predetermined value.

Then you say that this applies to evidence of subsequent conduct as much as anything else.

Then in paragraph 28, you continue as follows:

"Also, as follows from the Procedure Codes, a court may only accept evidence which relates to the case under consideration. The scope of evidence accepted is at the court's discretion and depends on the object to be determined by the court, to be established for the proper settlement of the dispute. Evidence that proves or disproves the circumstances related to the object to be proved will be related evidence. Accordingly, evidence unrelated to the object to be proved shall not be accepted by the court. Although of course this does not restrict the parties to the court proceeding from submitting whatever evidence to the court that they believe to be relevant, the weight to be attached to, or the admissibility of, such evidence will be a matter for the court."

A. Yes.

Q. So again you're saying that there is no single piece of evidence that has any predetermined weight, and that the weight to be attached to the evidence, and indeed its admissibility, is a matter for the court, correct?

A. That's correct.

Q. Then if we turn to page 155 of this report, paragraph 142 J2/5.37/155, at the bottom of the page, you see you say here:

"I agree with Mr Rachkov at paragraph 79(5) of his report that the pleadings of the parties would be an admissible proof of evidence with respect to oral agreements; however, this evidence will not have any independent evidential [significance] ..."

Then you carry on at paragraph 143:

"Russian procedural law recognises the following types of evidence: written evidence and material objects, explanations (pleadings) of the parties, expert opinion, witness statements, audio and video recordings, and other documents and materials ..."

Then you cite various statutes.

"Therefore, witness statements and pleadings of the parties are different types of evidence, and since Article 162 of the Civil Code (which is a substantive rule of law, and not of procedure) restricts only witness statements from proof of an oral contract... it may be concluded that the pleadings of the parties are not restricted to be used as such."

I think you've explained to my Lady that where you're referring to explanations of the parties, it's not just their formal pleadings, it's what they actually say, the evidence that the parties give; correct?

A. That's correct.

Q. Thank you.

Again, I think you've confirmed this, but the parties' explanation, while you say that the parties' explanation have no independent evidential significance, you accept that they are a type of evidence which is different to witness evidence and which is not restricted by Article 162.1?

A. That's correct.

Q. Thank you.

We can see this distinction again if you go to Article 64.2 of the Arbitrazh Procedural Code. You'll find that at G(A)2/1, tab 8, page 192 G(A)2/1.08/192. The Russian starts earlier, the English starts at page 192.

Again, this is making the point that this is all evidence, you see the heading "Evidence":

"Evidence may take the form of written and material evidence, explanations of the persons participating in the case... witness evidence, audio and video recordings..."

So again that emphasises the fact that this is all evidence, does it not?

A. Yes, yes, I agree. I confirm.

Q. In fact the only dispute between you and Dr Rachkov, this is right, isn't it, is over the weight that is to be attached to the explanations of the persons participating, the explanations of the parties. That's right, isn't it?

A. It is a very serious disagreement, that's correct.

Q. No, but that is the only disagreement though, isn't it?

A. Well, regarding all the issues, or regarding what?

Q. Regarding this particular issue relating to 162.1.

A. Well, I remember about substantive and procedural laws, there were some other disagreements, but it's a serious disagreement.

Q. This is the core of the disagreement in terms of the admissibility of the evidence. You say this is all evidence, it all goes in, but there is a dispute as to the weight that is to be attached to the explanation of the parties?

A. I'm sorry, I disagree with the word "admissibility" because at least there is no dispute between Mr Rachkov and me that evidence of the parties, explanations of the parties, are clearly admissible. It's only regarding the witness statements.

Q. All right. Let's just see if we can clear up any confusion about this.

If you go back to your joint memorandum, and you go back to page 6, so bundle 6/1, if you look at paragraph 15 on page 6 G(A)6/1.01/6, we see how this dispute about the weight is described. Paragraph 15 says:

"It is disputed whether a party's explanation has any independent weight to prove an oral agreement or its terms in and of itself.

A. Yes.

Q. If we then look at subparagraph 1, we see that you and Professor Maggs state your collective position:

"Mr Rozenberg considers (and Professor Maggs agrees) that the parties' explanations or pleadings, independent of any other documentary or physical proof, have de minimis weight in a Russian court, and in a situation where an oral agreement is supported only by a party's explanations such agreement cannot be established."

So that's your position, is it?

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. Can you go to bundle G(A)7/1, tab 21 at page 186, please G(A)7/1.21/186?

A. Yes.

Q. Now at this tab, Mr Rozenberg, you should see Professor Maggs's book entitled "Law and Legal System of the Russian Federation", do you have that?

A. Yes, I can see it.

Q. Okay, thank you. I just want to show you what Professor Maggs says here about this and related topics and get you to comment.

On page 189 G(A)7/1.21/189 you can see that --

A. I'm sorry, it looks like it starts from 400.

Q. You need to be looking at the pages on the bottom right-hand side.

A. Yes.

Q. You can perhaps pick it up at page 187. Do you see, if you go to page 187, you should have just the page with the copyright date G(A)7/1.21/187.

A. 187 is actually the cover.

Q. Well, it's the inside cover perhaps.

Do you see that this book was dated 2009?

A. Yes.

Q. Then if I can ask you, please, to go to page 193, again using those same numbers. They're not that easy to read.

A. Okay, now I understand how it works.

Q. Very good.

A. 193.

Q. Please G(A)7/1.21/193.

You see Professor Maggs is dealing, just looking at the right-hand side, with aspects of the civil trial in Russia. If you then go over to page 194 --

A. Yes.

Q. -- just picking it up on the bottom paragraph on the left-hand side of the page, we see that Professor Maggs is talking here about the Civil Procedure Code and he says this:

"Current Art 12(2), by contrast, requires that the judge 'create the conditions for a complete examination of the evidence from all sides, the establishment of the factual circumstances and properly application of the law in the trial and decision of the civil case.' The evidence 'is to be presented by the parties.' If the evidence submitted by the parties is inadequate, the court may propose that the parties submit additional evidence and [that] the court, at the request of the parties, is to assist the parties in assembling that evidence. An admission by a party is to be taken as true and is not subject to further evidentiary hearing unless the court finds that 'it was made for the purpose of concealing the circumstances of the case and [I think he must mean 'or'] was made by the party under the influence of fraud, force, a threat or a good-faith mistake'."

Do you agree with this so far, Mr Rozenberg?

A. Yes, even just absence of 'or', and here, because simply it's a direct translation from Russian. Yes, it's the law.

Q. Thank you. At the right-hand side of the page, we see in the paragraph at the top of the page that Professor Maggs also says this:

"At the same time the incidence of judicial control and activism during the trial are considerably greater than would be the case in a common-law adversarial trial. Thus, while the parties must prove their claims and defences, trial judges determine what issues are important, what evidence will be examined at trial and in what order witnesses are to be heard. Judges have the right to interrogate the witnesses and parties at any time and, in practice, often do so..."

Wouldn't that be nice, my Lady?

"... if they believe the parties are off the track."

That is right as well, is it not, Mr Rozenberg? The judge may interrogate the parties and witnesses and ask them questions?

A. They always do.

Q. They always do, thank you.

Then lower down --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: There are obviously some lessons to be learned here.

MR RABINOWITZ: Lower on the right-hand side of the page, Professor Maggs has a section entitled "Elements of Proof at Trial" and one sees that he says this:

"The Civil Procedure Code lists the permissible means of proof: explanations of the parties and third [parties]; testimony of witnesses; documentary evidence; physical evidence; audio and video recordings and; conclusions of experts."

Then separately he says:

"Parties' Explanations. The oral explanations of the parties are not given under penalty of perjury, but are considered to be a form of proof the court must take into account along with the other evidence. Normally, the court will require other evidence, such as police accident reports, in addition to party explanations.

"Witness Testimony. Witnesses who are summoned by the court to appear at the trial must testify and testify truthfully under penalty of the criminal law, unless they claim an exemption from the obligation to give evidence. Before taking testimony, the judge must warn the witness of these sanctions and their obligation to [tell the truth]... The witness's testimony begins when the judge asks the witness to state everything the witness knows about the matter in dispute. After this narrative account is given, questions by the parties are permitted, with the party at whose request the witness was called to testify asking questions first, followed by the other parties."

Can we just break down what Professor Maggs appears to be saying here, Mr Rozenberg. First he describes the explanation of the parties as a different form of witness testimony, do you see that?

A. Yes, that's what I said, it looks similar.

Q. Indeed. You agree with that, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. And second he says, and this is the first sentence of the paragraph entitled "Parties' Explanations":

"The oral explanations of the parties are not given under penalty of perjury, but are considered to be a form of proof the court must take into account along with the other evidence."

So what Professor Maggs appears to be saying here is that the oral explanation of the parties are a form of proof which the court must take into account along with the other evidence, is that correct?

- A. I wouldn't say so categorically because what does it mean, "the court must take into account"? Very often I can read in the judgments that the court does not take into account explanations of a party because these explanations contradict witness statements, other evidence and so on. Therefore, it depends what sense just we understand in these words.

But the key point here is that, of course, the law both now in Russia and in the Soviet times always released a party from criminal liability for lying and, therefore, the attitude of courts to parties' explanations is absolutely different in comparison with witness statements.

Moreover, the reason for releasing parties from criminal liability for lying to the court, and actually is reflected in some scholars' writings, is that it's clear for the court that parties have very strong personal interest in presenting their explanations and, therefore, it's practicably impossible to concede -- to evaluate them with the same attitude like witness statements and other evidence. This is the key point.

But, of course, to deprive parties from right to give explanations, and to ignore them, would mean violation of law, and courts need to evaluate this type of evidence in connection with all the other evidence. But it's really a very special type of evidence.

- Q. I think in the last sentence of that rather long answer you rather agreed with what Professor Maggs says. You may choose slightly different words.

Professor Maggs is not saying you have to take them into account in the sense that you have to accept everything that they're saying. What he's saying is that you have to have regard to them, not that you have to believe them, do you follow?

- A. Yes, I do, simply very often it's like a cliché, just we can read in judgments that the court cannot take into account parties' explanation because it's not supported by other evidence, contradicts the following or the following evidence.

But from the point of view of just putting words in the right order, if you mean that to pay attention, taking into account, then of course the court must pay attention, but eventually may reject them.

- Q. Of course they may reject it, Mr Rozenberg, but they have to have regard to it. They may plainly reject it because they may think "This is not supported by anything and I don't believe it," but they have to have regard to it, as Professor Maggs says. Do you agree with that?

A. Yes. I keep repeating that the court must not only regard them but evaluate them.

Q. Absolutely.

A. The court must evaluate parties' explanations, the court cannot ignore them.

Q. Then just looking on to what Professor Maggs also says, and this is in the last sentence of the paragraph entitled "Parties' Explanations", he says:

"Normally, the court will require other evidence, such as police accident reports, in addition to party explanations."

So what Professor Maggs in this book seems to be saying -- or let me put that slightly differently, what Professor Maggs in this book does not say is that the parties' explanation must always be supported by independent evidence. He says the court will normally require other evidence to support parties' explanation. Do you agree with that, Mr Rozenberg?

A. Well, when we speak about civil cases, I think I would generally agree because, strictly speaking, this is the parties' obligations to prove circumstances on which they base their claims and objections. Therefore, the court normally and usually requires, but if nothing is submitted it's the parties' fault.

Q. Okay. Then if we turn over, back to Professor Maggs's work, if you go over to page 195 G(A)7/1.21/195, and you look at the top right-hand side of the page, you see the paragraph beginning:

"Consistent with the civil law tradition..."

He says this:

"Consistent with the civil law tradition, Russia has few strict exclusionary rules of evidence. Since exclusionary rules of evidence are necessary to protect inexperienced jurors from being swayed by unreliable evidence, the use of professional judges obviates the need for them. In general, then, all relevant evidence will be considered for whatever probative value it might have. A related principle shared by both common-law and civil law systems is the principle of 'free evaluation' of all the evidence. Thus, no particular kinds of evidence have any predetermined weight or hierarchy of value."

So he says that there is no kinds of evidence with "any predetermined weight or hierarchy of value". Then he continues:

"This principle has some legal and practical limits, however ... For example, failure to put an agreement in writing will in some cases deprive the parties of the right to rely on witness testimony as to its content."

If you look at footnote 269 on the bottom right, you can see there's a reference there by Professor Maggs to Article 162.1, so it's clear he has that provision very much in mind.

A. Yes, I can see.

Q. What Professor Maggs then says, I'm looking at the next paragraph --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Sorry, what page are you on?

MR RABINOWITZ: If my Lady has page 195, we're in bundle G(A)7/1, tab 21.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm still in Professor Maggs' work, am I?

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I am there. I was looking at the books and page numbers, I apologise.

MR RABINOWITZ: On the book page it's 411, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, I'm there, thank you. I've got it now.

MR RABINOWITZ: Right, we'll carry on then.

A. So far, mostly these are citations from the Civil Procedure Code and from the Civil Code.

Q. All right, let's just see what Professor Maggs then says, shall we?

So he's identified the fact that no kinds of evidence have any predetermined weight or hierarchy of value, and the fact that there are some cases in which failure to put an agreement in writing will deprive the parties of being able to rely on witness testimony.

Then he carries on to say this:

"There are also intuitive tendencies towards an informal hierarchy of probative value that are perhaps universal. For example, documentary evidence tends to be favoured over testimony. Also, opinions of court-appointed experts may carry greater weight than witness testimony. In addition, party explanations are looked at with some skepticism. Similarly, while there is no prohibition against hearsay evidence, in general it is given little weight unless it is supported by other evidence."

So what he appears to be saying here, Mr Rozenberg, is this: first he is referring to what he calls intuitive tendencies which are perhaps universal -- I would say calls accurately -- intuitive tendencies which are perhaps universal. He is not referring to the rules of law but to the natural way in which judges assess evidence, correct?

- A. That's correct, and I would support Professor Maggs's view because the law requires an impartial attitude of the court to all evidence and states that no evidence has predetermined value. In practice, of course, some evidence, especially expert reports, and especially in some areas like, for example, medical knowledge, of course has much greater value than other evidence.

Q. Indeed, I don't disagree with any of that.

The second thing Professor Maggs does is he gives us an example: the natural tendency to favour documentary evidence over testimony. Do you see that?

A. Yes, especially in commercial disputes.

Q. Indeed. And again, you would describe that as a universal tendency and I don't think anyone would disagree with that.

Then he says, the third thing that one can find Professor Maggs saying here is that: party explanations are looked at with some scepticism.

Do you see that?

A. Of course.

Q. So he doesn't say that they will automatically carry no weight unless corroborated by independent evidence, he says they are considered critically, does he not?

A. He cannot say that they have zero weight because it would contradict the law. The law recognises explanations of the parties as evidence and requires to evaluate them, but scepticism and minimal weight, what is reflected in our joint memorandum, is the reality.

Q. So you agree, in fact, with the way Professor Maggs puts it here, don't you?

A. Generally I agree.

Q. Is it nonetheless your view that the parties' explanation carries no weight unless corroborated, which is the way you've put it in your report?

A. Unless supported by other evidence.

Q. So you say it carries no weight unless corroborated, no weight at all?

A. If it's not supported by other evidence it's practically zero weight.

Q. Well, practically zero weight, so close to no weight, yes?

A. Well, theoretically, if a party gives explanations and withdraws the claim though it has weight, but these are extreme situations.

But generally, from the point of view of evaluation of evidence, if there is only a party explanation and no other evidence, if the party explanation is not supported by other evidence, then from the point of view of evaluation of evidence, yes, it's practically zero weight.

Q. Right. But you wouldn't suggest, would you, that it would be okay for the judge to disregard the parties' explanations? That would be inconsistent, would it not, with the judge's duty to consider all evidence?

A. Absolutely correct. The judge cannot simply ignore. The judge would write that, after having considered evidence, the court comes to the conclusion that parties' explanation is not supported by any other evidence and therefore it cannot be in the usual way(?) taken into account or taken into consideration.

Q. All right. I think the dispute between us is a lot narrower than I had understood it to be.

Perhaps we can just see really whether there is anything left in this particular dispute, Mr Rozenberg. Can I put to you a hypothetical example and just get your reaction to this.

Let us suppose that I go to work for my uncle who lives alone on his farm. I'm going to give you the story and then ask you to comment. I don't really have an uncle with a farm but let us suppose that I did and I worked on that farm.

After a number of months the farm burns down and all records are lost, okay? I say that my uncle owes me money for the last three months when I have worked on his farm, I say we had a written agreement but it burnt in the fire. My uncle denies having ever met me -- not uncommon in my case. I say that it isn't true, and under the judge's interrogation my uncle admits that it isn't true, and he accepts that I have spent the last three months working on his farm. But he still denies that he owes me any money, he says I was working for him for free.

Now, the judge is convinced that my uncle is still not telling me the truth but no other evidence can be found because the fire burnt anything (sic), and there are no other witnesses.

Do you say that this is a case in which the Russian court is incapable of doing justice?

- A. I wouldn't say. Of course it's a very interesting case, and thank you for giving such example, because the first question in Russia would be whether there was an employment agreement or a civil law agreement, whether you were working as employee in the company or if you were providing services on the basis of civil law contract, and different legal rules apply.

However, I understand that basically it was a civil law agreement, there were no other employees there, and he was not like a boss in the office, simply you were a contractor, something like that. If it was a civil law agreement, then after confession of your uncle who, as I understand, should be the defendant in this case, you brought a lawsuit against him, you didn't specify it but I understand that.

- Q. He is the defendant in this case.
- A. So then the party's explanation, I mean your claimant's explanation, is not the only evidence. Suddenly enough your explanation is supported by the confession of the defendant who agreed that you were working, and working for a long time, right?
- Q. Well, that's as far as it got: he denied that he owed me any money, Mr Rozenberg.
- A. No, but first he agreed that you were working for him?
- Q. He confessed, as you put it, to that, yes.
- A. Yes, it's very important, because then he should answer questions on what basis you were working a long time for free, and the question would be what kind of work you were performing.

And, of course, just judges in Russia and in the Soviet Union very often use -- were using, and are using, the wording like the explanation of the party, which contradicts explanation of the other party. It would be already regarding the evidence of your uncle. It doesn't look credible and appears to be something the defendant simply -- well, usually in Russia the word "invented" is used, but it means that the court does not trust him.

Therefore, in your story, it's not so simple and easy that in the absence of a written agreement it's hopeless, then it will be necessary for your uncle to explain why a normal person agreed to work several months performing rather hard labour for free.

Q. And at the end of that rather long explanation, Mr Rozenberg, would you accept that the Russian court, with the judge who simply doesn't believe any explanation that the defendant, my uncle, gives, is able to do justice by coming to a conclusion, if this is the conclusion he is convinced is the case, that my uncle does owe me money, because there was a contract under which he had not paid me?

A. It's very difficult and practically impossible to imagine the situation you described, that it would be just absolutely no other evidence because probably, if it was a farm, there should be some records for the tax authorities, some --

Q. Yes, but they burnt down, Mr Rozenberg, that was the example I gave you. There was no evidence.

A. There is just a citation, I'm sorry, from a very popular Russian book that handwritings cannot be burnt, something always remains, there should be some other documents in the tax inspectorate, there should be some signs whether the production --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But stick to the hypothesis. What's your answer if you stick to Mr Rabinowitz's hypothesis?

A. If nothing remains, there are only explanations of the parties, and still the uncle could not explain why and on what basis a normal person, not mentally sick, preferred to work many months performing hard labour for free, then in my view chances are high that the judge probably would check what is the normal salary in this region for this type of work, and would probably award you some monetary remuneration, because otherwise simply the party's explanation, I mean the defendant's story, looks absolutely incredible.

MR RABINOWITZ: All right. Thank you very much for that.

I think in the end we got to the result where you say the judge would do justice and would give the claimant his award.

Now, I want to change the facts --

A. I am sorry, of course I cannot guarantee, but that's what appears to me. The probability is high.

Q. I'm not asking you to guarantee anything, Mr Rozenberg, it was only a hypothetical example so it will never get tested.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Maybe the hypothesis should include the fact that the uncle had promised, or said he'd promised, the house to the nephew if he worked for free.

A. Ah, it would be different story.

MR RABINOWITZ: Then one would have an ambiguity.

But let's just go a little more slowly than that, shall we?

Let's consider the facts, that the facts are as follows, because I want to ask you about the degree of corroboration from supporting documents that you say is required, and I think, in light of what you said in answer to the previous question, I know what you will say.

So consider the facts as follows: once again I go to work for my uncle on his farm and we make a written agreement. Once again there is a fire and his business burns down and nearly all records are burnt. Okay? So this is getting closer to what you wanted to change my hypothetical example to be.

This time, however, I have bank accounts showing that my uncle has been paying me money for the past year, and that therefore undermines his story about me working for free. Presumably on those facts you would accept that the judge would be entitled to accept my explanation and grant my claim if he, the judge, was satisfied that I and not my uncle was telling the truth, given that the bank accounts corroborate my story and discredit his story?

- A. As far as I understand, in this case, simply additional evidence appeared.

Q. Yes. Do you --

A. Of course I would say that chances are high in this situation for you to win the case if just everything remains the same and noted parties are involved, then nothing else affects my previous conclusion.

Q. All right. Then can we change the facts a little bit further, just to bring it a little bit closer to the facts of this case. It's still very, very far away, but a bit closer.

Let us suppose that my uncle admits that he hired me and admits that he owes me money, what he disputes is how much money he owes me. In particular, I say that when he hired me he agreed to pay me 10 per cent of the profits of the farm, he disputes that and says I was only entitled to a fixed salary.

Let us suppose that my bank statements show irregular payments, in other words payments not consistent with a fixed salary being paid. So assume that the bank accounts corroborate my story, first, that I was not an unpaid worker and, secondly, that I was employed but not at a fixed salary.

On these facts, would you accept that the judge was entitled to accept my explanations and grant my claim if the judge was satisfied that I and not my uncle was telling the truth?

- A. Getting the truth, I have to check whether it was clear from the bank account that all the money was transferred directly by your uncle to your account.
- Q. Then let's assume that to be the case. We're talking about payments coming from my uncle and they were of irregular amounts.
- A. The uncle would be questioned by the judge and asked whether all the money he was transferring was only the salary or something else, and if something else, on what basis.

And if your uncle gives a credible story, in the absence of any other evidence, probably regarding amounts, the explanations of your uncle shall be taken into account because there is no other evidence.

However, if there is no explanation what else constituted these payments besides the salary, then probably chances are high that the court will share your view, your line.

- Q. Okay. Now I want to add just a further piece of supporting evidence. Let us suppose the documents are recovered from the fire showing the profits made by the farm, and let us suppose that the payments which my bank account show my uncle has made to me happen to correspond to 10 per cent of those profits, the very percentage I am claiming. Presumably you would accept that that would be sufficient to allow the judge to decide the claim based on her inner conviction of the truth, having heard only from the parties and this being the only evidence?

- A. Again, the situation with the parties' explanation, as I said, is never simple. If there is only parties' explanation and nothing else, such explanation would fail, they have practically no legal value. If parties' explanation are supported at least by the other parties' explanation, like in the case with your uncle, and there is no other credible explanation of the facts, then chances are high that the court will take this as proven fact.

But in addition, if there are some documents, as I understand, which also confirm, and written evidence, as we read, has big importance in Russian courts, if in addition to your explanation, in other words, the court's judgment may look like statement that claimant's explanations are supported by -- partially by the defendant's explanations and also by the documents attached to the fire.

- Q. All right. I'm going to change one more fact here and then I'm going to leave this.

Let us suppose that I find a voicemail message on my mobile from my uncle, in other words a recording, and it says, this is what the voicemail says:

"Well done for the hard work, it's been a good year, I'm sure you will enjoy your share of the profit."

Presumably that also would be sufficient to allow the judge to decide the claim based just on that, and having heard from the witnesses, one of whom, me, he believes, and he doesn't believe my uncle, yes?

A. I'm sorry, you deserve some share of the profit, but the numbers would be indicated.

Q. Well, we're adding that to the evidence I've just referred to earlier where the bank account details show that my uncle has been paying me an amount which corresponds to 10 per cent of the profits.

A. It looks like you have a winning case.

Q. A slam-dunker.

A. Just one last question: I understand from the very beginning that the respondent, ie your uncle, never denied that the agreement in writing just was destroyed in fire, right?

Q. He did not dispute that.

A. He did not dispute it. Well, then just a situation where apparently there was no violation of law, all requirements of law were observed, the work was performed, and just from the record it looks like the uncle was satisfied, and there is no contradiction, no contradicting evidence, then your chances are very high, I would say.

- Q. Just to sum up this topic I'm going to suggest some conclusions and you can tell me whether you agree or disagree.

First, the supporting evidence that you say is necessary to corroborate a party's explanation need not expressly confirm every disputed fact?

- A. Need not; I said I think that party's explanation always shall be supported by something, at least, as in your example, by the other party's explanation, but without such support just it will fail.

- Q. Yes, but it doesn't need to confirm every disputed fact? None of the further pieces of evidence which I referred to in the examples expressly confirmed that I was hired on terms entitling me to 10 per cent of the profit of the farm, and yet each, I think you accept, was sufficient to allow the judge lawfully to decide the claim in my favour?

- A. Yes, but we spoke about the decision either in your favour or a possibility to dismiss the claim.

But you mentioned every fact; usually courts are not obliged to analyse every fact if the case may be resolved without giving evaluation to every fact. The most important facts must be evaluated.

- Q. Secondly, the oral form of the agreements does not prevent a party from seeking to establish those agreements by a combination of his own explanation, the other party's evidence and admissions, and documentary or physical evidence including tape recordings? Do you agree?
- A. That's what in general the law states.
- Q. Third, the judge is required to evaluate all of this evidence separately and together as a whole, and using his or her own inner conviction, based on a comprehensive, full, objective and first-hand study of the evidence available in the case, and if the judge is satisfied that an oral agreement was made, then the judge is entitled to find that as a fact, correct?
- A. Yes, I think usually the key words, "in accordance with the law", are used, but it's correct.
- Q. Fourth, Article 162.1 does not exclude the oral explanations of the parties or documentary or physical evidence, it only excludes witness testimony, and that only means the sworn evidence of non-parties; I think you've agreed with that already?
- A. Yes, yes, we agreed.
- Q. And fifth, Article 162.1 does not render an oral contract invalid, it simply excludes one form of proof, it restricts the range of evidence that may be admitted in a Russian court, correct?

- A. Just oral contract may be invalid in some instances clearly indicated in the law, like for an economic transaction, for example. But in general it's correct.
- Q. Thank you. And sixth, Article 161 is a substantive rule which has only a limited procedural effect, correct?
- A. I would agree it's not quite clear for me why only limited to some procedural effect, that's correct.
- Q. All right, the procedural effect that we've been discussing.
- A. Yes.
- Q. Thank you very much.

All right, I think we can leave that topic and go on to another of the grounds that you identify for saying that the 1995 agreement was invalid or ineffective or incomplete, and that's intention to create legal relations.

Can we see what you say about this if we go to bundle G(A)3/1 at tab 2 where we have your fourth report, if you go to page 148 of that G(A)3/1.02/148.

Now, before we look at what you say here, Mr Rozenberg, I just want to be clear about this. My focus at this stage is on what you say about the question whether the parties intended their agreement to be legally binding. Of course, there is some overlap with other topics, such as the topic we've just looked at, namely proof of oral agreements, and the topic we'll come to next, namely the certainty of the contract, but at this stage I am just on the question of whether the agreement was intended to be a legally binding agreement. Do you follow?

A. Yes, that's very important.

Q. Presumably you also understand that the position of Mr Berezovsky on this issue is that this is an issue in which your opinions and indeed Russian law are wholly irrelevant because the question whether the parties intended their agreement to be legally binding is a question of fact to be decided by my Lady in accordance with the ordinary English rules of evidence and proof. Do you understand that that's Mr Berezovsky's position?

A. Yes, that's clear.

Q. The lawyers for Mr Abramovich have a different position, as I understand it, and that is why I need to ask you some questions about it, okay?

A. I understand.

Q. Now, just looking, if you would, Mr Rozenberg, at paragraph 275, in paragraph 275, and I'm picking it up in the middle of this paragraph, page 148 of bundle 3/1 behind tab 2 G(A)3/1.02/148, you say:

"The limited consensus of the parties alleged in relation to certain projects, on the Claimant's case, fell far short of establishing a sufficiently precise, binding agreement. The alleged agreement is hopelessly vague and imprecise. I am strongly of the view that a Russian court would not enforce it and would not regard it as having been intended by the parties to create legally binding obligations."

Then in paragraph 276, you say this in the first sentence:

"First, the vague nature of the parties' purported obligations suggests a complete absence of objective intention to enter into a legally binding contract."

Then just looking at the last sentence of paragraph 276, you say:

"Reasonable commercial parties would not intend to be legally bound by a vague obligation to 'coordinate contacts' or 'raise funds' (as the Claimant alleges) because it is too difficult to give objective meaning to these activities."

Then just paragraph 7 (sic) if I may, you say here:

"Clearly, the purported obligations of Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili could not have been enforced through the Russian judicial system; the court could not bind Mr Berezovsky to use his 'connections' to ensure privatisation of Sibneft for his own benefit through the issuance of the August Decree or oblige Mr Patarkatsishvili to invoke his business contacts to achieve the agreed goal. It is impossible to determine an objective standard by which the performance of such obligations could be measured or damages for any non-performance assessed."

Now, in these paragraphs, Mr Rozenberg, you seem to be drawing two conclusions. Your first conclusion is that the 1995 agreement was too vague and incomplete to be a binding agreement, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And your second conclusion is that because the 1995 agreement was, you say, vague and incomplete, it follows, you say, that the parties did not intend the agreement to be legally binding, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Can I ask you this, does your reasoning apply in reverse? If the agreement was sufficiently precise and complete to be a binding contract and if it was in writing, would it follow that the parties did intend their agreement to be legally binding?

A. If it's in writing specifically precise and comprehensive, then of course I leave aside the questions of validity of certain provisions. But it would appear that there is a sufficient basis for a conclusion that the party really had intention to be legally bound by this agreement.

- Q. So you do say that your reasoning applies in reverse?
- A. If the agreement is in writing and indicates in details parties' rights and obligations, yes, there is no basis for a conclusion that the participants of such agreement had any other goal rather than to enter into legally binding agreement.
- Q. So it follows then, doesn't it, that your second conclusion about whether or not the parties intended their agreement to be legally binding actually adds nothing to your first conclusion? If the agreement is too vague and incomplete to be a binding agreement, then why does it matter whether the parties intended their agreement to be binding? Either way the agreement will fail, do you agree?
- A. It's not quite clear for me because, usually, if parties prefer to conclude not an agreement but something what we call protocol of intent or letter of intent, they're satisfied by very vague and general wording of the planned actions and of the planned obligations. If they want to have the agreement legally binding, they prepare just something what can be legally enforced through the Russian judicial system as a rule.

Therefore, just the fact that there was no such agreement which could be enforced in Russian legal system brought me to conclusion that parties never wanted to be legally bound.

Q. And in that sense, Mr Rozenberg, your second point adds nothing because your second point is entirely predicated on your first point. In other words, you are saying, "I think that the agreement was vague and incomplete"; and because of that you're saying, "That tells me that there was no intention to create legal relations", correct?

A. Not precise, incomplete in the oral form. These facts, in my view, if considered by a court, would bring the court to a conclusion that there was no intention to create a legally binding agreement.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can I just get away, for a moment, from your views as to the application of the principle to the facts and just concentrate on the principles. Is there a separate requirement under Russian law of an intention to create legal relations in order for there to be a binding contract?

A. Just the law is rather short. The law requires that the parties should agree on all essential terms in the form prescribed by law and this should be the basis for the conclusion that parties intended or that the will of the parties was directed at conclusion of legally binding agreement.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But if -- again, going back to the agreement for the car. I agree to sell you a car and we agree the price and all the relevant terms, we shake hands on it but I say to you, "This won't be a binding contract, it's just binding in honour only", and you say, "Yes, I agree". There is no intention as a matter of English law to create legal relations there. Would Russian law take the same view?

A. If as you said "in honour only" and they agreed that it will be called even in Russia so-called gentleman's agreement. Gentleman's agreement, it's not a legally binding agreement. In honour only, usually translated --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So as a matter of law your evidence is that there is an additional requirement that there should be an intention to create legal relations?

A. The will of the parties should be directed, yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Likewise, if there is an agreement for the sale of a car, but on the shake of hands it's said, "Well, this is subject to a written contract", again that would be a situation in which there was no contract because there was no intention to create binding legal relations at that stage?

A. At that stage, absolutely correct, but with the plan to do it in the written form later.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, but there wouldn't be a binding contract at that stage?

A. Not yet. Not yet.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can we just have a look at what you say at paragraph 278 of your report and I'm looking at the first sentence here G(A)3/1.02/149. You say:

"Secondly, had commercial businessmen intended that an agreement of this scale and significance be legally binding, they would have put it in writing."

Then you give your reasons for this conclusion. You say in the second sentence:

"Whether or not this was a mandatory requirement of Russian law (as I discuss below at paragraphs 340-343), the fact that they did not [put it in writing] indicates that they intended to rely on informal arrangements rather than on legal enforcement."

Then you say:

"Mr Rachkov himself states that '[r]elationships in Russia are often based on trust, and it is often thought that putting agreements in writing would undermine that trust, or suggest that such trust does not exist'. The difference between an informal understanding and a legally binding agreement is well known to Russian commercial businessmen."

Then you say in the last sentence:

"Thus, the fact that the 1995 Agreement, which was purportedly concluded to establish multi-million dollar wealth between three individuals was concluded without regard to the basic requirement of Russian law to have significant agreements between individuals in writing, serves as clear evidence that the parties did not intend this agreement to be legally binding."

There is, I suggest, something of a contrast between your second sentence and your final sentence here, Mr Rozenberg. You see, in the second sentence, you seem to be saying that your opinion applies regardless of whether writing was a mandatory requirement of Russian law, correct? Do you see that? You say:

"Whether or not this was a mandatory requirement of Russian law...?"

A. Yes, yes, I can see it.

Q. If you look at the last sentence of this paragraph, you do appear to rely on what you say is the legal requirement to use written form. You rely on what you say is the basic legal requirement to have the agreement in writing in support of your opinion that the use of oral form is clear evidence, as you put it, that the parties did not intend the agreement to be legally binding. Do you follow?

A. Yes.

Q. Can I just make sure I understand what you are saying.

Do you mean to suggest, as the second sentence implies, that even if there was not a mandatory requirement of Russian law that the agreement be in writing, so even if Mr Berezovsky could establish his agreement in a Russian court and even if that agreement was sufficiently precise and complete to be a binding contract, even then nonetheless it remains your opinion that the use of oral form indicates that the agreement was not intended to be binding?

A. Frankly, as far as I remember, when I was writing it, I was concerned that it was not absolutely clear whether it could be considered a foreign economic transaction because of Mr Patarkatsishvili's Georgian citizenship and in this case it's clearly violating mandatory rules of Russian law. But even if it's not so, still my view was that the decision to ignore the mandatory rule of Russian law, the consequences of violating of which were not as serious as with foreign economic transaction, still were bringing me to a conclusion that there was no serious intention. That's why I wrote "whether or not it violates mandatory requirements", because at that moment still I thought that there is a chance that it violates mandatory requirements which will bring to more painful consequences, it will destroy the agreement in any event.

However, the meaning I think is clear that whether this violation of mandatory requirement is the deal-killer or it's still possible somehow to survive the fact that such extremely important contract was, if not planned to be in writing, demonstrates that there was no intention to be legally bound by this agreement to conclude a legally enforceable contract.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Rabinowitz, it may help you to cut this down, what I'm interested in at the end of the day, without disrespect to either expert, are the relevant principles of law.

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: At the end of the day, although -- their conclusions as to the applications of those principles to the facts of their case and their views as to whether on the evidence here there was or was not an agreement, with respect to both experts, is irrelevant.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm grateful, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What I'm interested in is what are the relevant principles of law which I have to apply or may have to apply.

MR RABINOWITZ: In which case, as your Ladyship knows, that is our approach. I shall skip the questions relating to --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So don't feel you have to challenge --

MR RABINOWITZ: No, I'm not going to.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: -- his conclusions of applying the law to the facts.

MR RABINOWITZ: I am grateful for that, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'll take the break now. Ten minutes.

You mustn't discuss your evidence with anybody during the break.

(3.14 am)

(A short break)

(3.25 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: I would like to turn to the next reason why you say the 1995 agreement was not valid or binding, and that concerns the topic of whether the 1995 agreement was sufficiently precise on all essential terms to be a concluded partnership contract.

And again, I want to start by making sure that we are clear on the concept of essential terms and default terms and the like. We'll come later to how these general concepts apply to partnership contracts in particular.

Can I ask you, again, to go in bundle G(A)6/1, the joint memorandum, to page 3, paragraph 7.

G(A)6/1.01/3.

At page 3, paragraph 7, we have what you and Dr Rachkov have agreed about, and in subparagraph 1 you agree that:

"Part 1 of the Civil Code (Articles 1-453) came into force on 1 January 1995..."

That's correct, isn't it?

A. Yes, of course.

Q. Then you say in subparagraph 2 that:

"Part 2 of the Civil Code (Articles 454-1109) came into force on 1 March 1996..."

So a helpful thing to remember when we are considering the 1995 agreement is that articles numbered 453 or less of the Civil Code applied in 1995, while articles numbered 454 or more did not apply in 1995 but only came into force later, correct?

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. If you then go in the joint memorandum to page 6, paragraph 17 of the joint memorandum G(A)6/1.01/6.

A. Yes.

Q. We have here the heading "Terms of a contract" and in subparagraph 1 you agree that:

"The terms of [the] contract are determined by agreement of the parties ..."

In subparagraph 2 you agree that:

"Any contract is subject to mandatory rules of law which apply irrespective of the agreement of the parties ..."

And in subparagraph 3 you agree that:

"The contract may also be governed by 'default rules' which are rules specified by law and which apply unless the parties exclude their application by agreement ..."

Then over the page on top of page 7, you identify:

"Two examples of default rules which you say are Article 314.2 (time for performance) and Article 424.3 (price)."

You refer in this paragraph to a number of articles of the Civil Code. Can we just turn those articles up so that we're quite clear what a default rule looks like.

If you go to bundle G(A)4/4, tab 2, page 65 is where you get the beginning of Professor Maggs's translation, it has both languages.

If you go to page 54 G(A)4/4.02/54, you have Article 314, do you have that?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Headed "Time period for Performance of an Obligation".

Subparagraph 1 says:

"If an obligation provides for or makes possible the determination of the day of its performance or the period of time in the course of which it must be performed, the obligation is subject to performance at this day, or accordingly, at any time within the limits of such period of time."

So where the agreement provides for or makes it possible to determine the day of performance of the obligation in question, that is when the obligation must be performed by? That's right, isn't it?

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. And then subparagraph 2 provides as follows:

"In cases when an obligation does not provide a time period for its performance and does not contain terms making possible the determination of this time period, it must be performed in a reasonable time period after the origin of the obligation."

So subparagraph 2 applies where the agreement doesn't provide, or make it possible to determine the time for the period of performance. And what it says is then the obligation must be performed within a reasonable period of time; do you agree?

A. Yes, absolutely.

Q. Then if we go to page 59, we can see Article 424, which is the other default provision that you and Dr Rachkov referred to G(A)4/4.02/59. This one is headed "Price", at the top of the right-hand side, do you see that?

A. Yes, "Price".

Q. And then subparagraph 1 provides:

"Performance of a contract is paid for at a price established by [the] agreement of the parties."

Then subparagraph 3, if we can look at that:

"In cases when in a compensated contract a price is not provided and may not be determined proceeding from the terms of the contract, performance of the contract must be paid for at the price that, under comparable conditions, usually is taken for analogous goods, work, or services."

So what that means is that where the agreement does not provide the price, or make it possible to determine the price, performance is to be paid for at the price usually payable under comparable conditions for analogous goods, works or services, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And those are two examples of default rules, are they not?

A. Yes.

Q. I think they're sometimes called dispositive rules?

A. Correct, dispositive, correct.

Q. Don't put Professor Maggs's translation away, but if you can just go back to the joint memo, page 7, under "Terms of a contract", I just want to look with you at subparagraph 4.

What you agree there is this: you agree that if a term of a contract is not established by the parties or by a default rule, the relevant term may be determined by a rule of commercial custom applicable to the relations of the parties. Correct?

A. Yes.

Q. So we've looked at paragraph 17 of the joint memorandum and that has told us in general terms, just looking at the subparagraphs in turn, first that the parties may agree the terms of the contract, that's subparagraph 1, yes?

A. Sorry, what paragraph?

Q. Paragraph 17 of the joint memo.

A. Yes, and subparagraph?

Q. 17.1 tells us that the parties may agree the terms of the contract?

A. "The terms of a contract are determined by agreement of the parties (Article 421.4)."

Q. So that's telling you that the parties may agree the terms of the contract, correct?

A. Of course.

Q. Then subparagraph 2 tells us that the contract may also be subject to mandatory rules, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Subparagraph 3 tells us that the terms of the contract may also be defined by default rules, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. And also, this is subparagraph 4, that in some cases terms may be determined by rules of commercial custom, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And then if we look, just so we can see what is common ground, at paragraph 18 of the joint memo, this is headed "Essential terms" as you see. What you agree in subparagraph 1 is this:

"Under Article 432, if the parties do not reach agreement on all the essential terms for their contract, that contract is... 'non-concluded'. It has not been formed. An essential term is therefore a necessary term, in that the parties must reach an agreement in order to give rise to a contract."

So what this is saying, you'll tell me if this is right, is that if a term is truly an essential term then it must be agreed before there can be a contract, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Then in subparagraph 2 you agree that:

"Where a term, which is not essential, has not been agreed, that does not prevent an agreement from being concluded."

A. Correct.

Q. That means what it says.

A. Correct, correct.

Q. If it's not essential it doesn't matter if it hasn't been concluded, correct?

A. Generally, at least it doesn't prevent an agreement from being concluded. Whether it doesn't matter at all, that's maybe too strongly said.

Q. No, that's a very fair comment.

So it is important in any analysis to identify very clearly what terms are essential terms and what terms are not essential terms if what you want to determine is whether a contract has been concluded, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And then in subparagraph 3, you also agree with Dr Rachkov that:

"In accordance with the last sentence of Article 432, there are three types of essential terms which must be agreed before there can be a contract."

First predmet, which is a subject or subject matter, I think it's sometimes called the object of the contract as well in some translations, correct?

A. Yes, sometimes.

Q. Then:

"Terms identified by law as essential for contracts of the given type, or which are necessary having regard to the nature of the contract."

And then:

"Any terms which either party declares must be agreed in a contract."

Then in subparagraph 4 you agree:

"In order to be an essential term, a term must qualify under one of these three types. However, the terms that may be essential ([that is] the precise composition of essential terms) may be different for different types of contract."

And that makes sense, yes?

So in order to be an essential term, it has to be one of those three types. And I think what you're saying is that for different types of contract, different terms may qualify. Correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Okay. Now, can we just look at Article 432 of the Civil Code to be clear how it describes the three types of essential terms, and if you have G(A)4/4, tab 2, can you go to page 63 of that, please. G(A)4/4.02/63.

And on the right-hand side of the page, you have chapter 28, "Conclusion of a Contract", and then you have Article 432. Do you have that?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Thank you. Then looking at subparagraph 1 and the second paragraph of this, this tells us what the essential terms are. It says, do you see that, subparagraph 1, but we go to the second paragraph there:

"The essential terms are those on the subject of the contract, terms that are named in a statute or other legal acts as essential or necessary for contracts of the given type, and also all those terms with respect to which by declaration of one of the parties an agreement must be reached."

And that reflects, I think, what we saw in the joint memo, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, can we just look at what you say about these three types of essential terms in your reports. Perhaps we can look at paragraph 112 of your fourth report which you can find at bundle G(A)3/1 at tab 2, page 101 G(A)3/1.02/101.

So if you're there, paragraph 112, page 101:

"The first type of essential term is the 'subject matter' of the contract (in my view [this is you saying this] this is the most appropriate translation of predmet). This refers to the nature of the obligation that each party is agreeing to perform, and the object at which such obligations are directed. So, in a simple sale of goods contract, the subject-matter of the contract will be the delivery of goods by one party, and the acceptance of and payment for those goods by the other party with the aim being to transfer money for goods."

So is this right: the subject matter of the contract is really a description of the nature of the obligation?

A. Yes.

Q. If you want to agree a contract for the sale of goods, then one party must agree to sell goods and the other party must agree to purchase and pay for those goods, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. Then if you go over the page to paragraph 114, you deal here with the second type of essential term, and you say, paragraph 114:

"The second type of essential term includes those terms that have been identified in the... Civil Code or other legal act as being necessary for a particular type of contract. I agree with Mr Rachkov that it is implicit in Article 432 that this second type of essential terms may be identified not only from legislation but also from the nature of the contract."

And so what effectively you're saying about the second type of essential term is that this applies where there is legislation saying that a certain term is essential for a particular type of contract, or where it is obvious from the nature of the contract that this is the case, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Then in paragraph 115 you say as follows, I'm just picking up in the second sentence:

"I note that Mr Rachkov relies on a statement made in the textbook, edited by Professor Sukhanov in support of the proposition that most contracts only have one essential term -- the subject-matter of the contract... This, of course, is true; but it is because the vast majority of civil contracts are very simple, and impose only one clearly definable obligation on each party."

Just pausing there, I think, just looking at this, therefore you accept that for the vast majority of civil contracts there are no essential terms other than the subject, that's what you say here, is it not?

A. Yes.

Q. Then just seeing what you carry on saying in the same paragraph:

"That is not to say, as I think Mr Rachkov seeks to imply, that there are very few other types of essential term applicable to more complex contracts, such as the one alleged in the present case."

We'll come in due course to look at partnership contracts and we'll see if there's anything terribly complex about them. I just want to stay with the general topic of essential terms for the moment, okay?

If you then go back to page 98, paragraph 105 of your report G(A)3/1.02/98.

A. Page 98?

Q. Page 98, paragraph 105. Just back a few pages. At paragraph 105 you say this:

"I agree with Mr Rachkov that an 'essential' term is, (as the name suggests) a necessary term. Default terms are the terms which fill a gap in a contract with respect to certain terms which could be agreed by the parties. Such default terms in legal literature are recognised as essential [terms]..."

You then quote a passage by Professor Vitryanskiy. Professor Vitryanskiy, is this right, is the deputy chairman of the Supreme Arbitrazh Court?

A. Yes.

Q. And the Supreme Arbitrazh Court is the top Russian Commercial Court, is that right?

A. That's correct.

Q. And as well as being a very senior judge, Professor Vitryanskiy is also a leading contract law scholar and a member of the group of senior jurists who wrote and designed the Civil Code, correct?

A. Yes, this is correct.

Q. Perhaps we can look at Professor Vitryanskiy's article. If you go to bundle G(A)2/3 at tab 40.

You're looking for page 21 in the English G(A)2/3.40/21, that's where the English starts.

I'm going to ask you to go to page 27 G(A)2/3.40/27, and if you have page 27, Mr Rozenberg, I think you do?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you see that towards the top of page 27 in the English, Professor Vitryanskiy says this:

"The second group of material terms --"

I think he uses "material terms" in the way that we're using "essential terms", yes?

A. "Material" and "essential" sometimes are two words used for translation of (Russian words). Essential terms, yes, material, of substance, essential.

Q. Thank you for that.

"The second group of material terms includes contract terms specified by a law or other legal acts as being essential for contracts of the type in question."

We've seen that.

In the next paragraph, do you see he says:

"In numerous cases the Civil Code, in regulating various types of contract, specifies a range of essential terms for such contracts."

Again I think that reflects what we have already discussed.

Just going down to -- do you see the paragraph "Particularly noteworthy"?

A. Yes.

Q. "Particularly noteworthy are cases in which the legislator refers to essential terms of a contract and at the same time prescribes [dispositive] rules in the case of absence of the relevant clauses from the text of the contract."

What Professor Vitryanskiy is saying is that sometimes the legislature indicates an essential term for a contract, but at the same time it provides a default rule or dispositive rule which will apply where the term in question is missing from the text of the contract. Do you agree?

A. Yes, I agree.

Q. Thank you.

Then in the next paragraph, Professor Vitryanskiy gives an example. He says:

"Thus under 339 ... of the Civil Code a pledge agreement must provide [not only] for the object of the pledge; its valuation; the substance, extent and [period of] performance of the obligation to be secured by the pledge [but] also an indication as to which of the parties is holding the pledged [parties]. However, in the section 3 of chapter 23 of the Civil Code we find [dispositive] rules which specify two of the three essential terms of a pledge: a rule to the effect that, unless a contract has prescribed otherwise, pledged property is to remain with the pledgor ... and a rule to the effect that, unless the contract has prescribed otherwise, a pledge secures a claim to the extent of its scope at the time it is granted and in particular interest, penalty, compensation for losses caused by delayed performance, and also compensation for necessary expenses of the pledge for maintenance of a pledged item and expenses concerning execution."

So what Professor Vitryanskiy is saying, is this right, is that although Article 339 provides that a pledge agreement must contain various essential terms, the Civil Code itself provides default rules covering some of those terms, correct?

A. Yes, I agree.

- Q. So just because the Civil Code describes a particular term in a way that makes it sound essential, it does not follow, does it, that the term is truly essential in the sense that its absence will mean the invalidity of the agreement, and that is because there may be a default rule which applies even if the parties do not reach agreement on that term. Correct?
- A. This you are citing?
- Q. No, I'm putting something to you.
- A. Because it looks like just you are going too far, saying that if there are terms which are default rules and still not agreed by the parties, am I correct?
- Q. No, you're going much too far. We haven't got anywhere near there yet, Mr Rozenberg.
- A. Maybe it was a very long question. I didn't find it in the text.
- Q. Let me put the question to you. I think you were trying to see whether -- you thought I was quoting Professor Vitryanskiy.
- A. Right.
- Q. What I was suggesting to you arises from what Professor Vitryanskiy is saying is this: just because the Civil Code describes a particular term in a way that makes it sound essential, it does not follow that the term really is truly essential in the sense that its absence will mean the invalidity of the agreement, and that is because there may be a default rule which applies even if the parties do not reach agreement on that term?

- A. My general view is that if there is a term which either has to be agreed by the parties, or in the absence of agreement shall be understood according to the default rule, then in the absence of the agreement of the parties, and in the absence of their concern to apply the default rule, the absence of this term will bring the agreement to the situation when it will be non-concluded.

In other words, this term which, as you said, can be actually filled out by the default rule still will be essential. And by the way, Professor Vitryanskiy and Professor Braginskiy, Braginskiy wrote about such situation. I have one of the paragraphs in my report about it.

- Q. All right. Let's just take this a little more slowly if we can, Mr Rozenberg.

We're positing a situation in which there is an essential term, for example the time for performance, and for whatever reason one party writes a letter saying "I want this done" or "I would like this done in three weeks", the other party says "I would like this done in four weeks", and they never managed to come together and make an agreement about that. In those circumstances, you have a default rule which says:

"In the absence of agreement, a reasonable time."

Correct?

- A. And nobody objects, or it's unclear?
- Q. Let's assume the object is sorted out, we're just talking about that particular term, about the time for performance.
- A. Because the key point here is the following: if there are no objections and this term is filled out as default rule by legislator, no problem. But if still parties did not agree the default rule will resolve the question, then it will be an essential term. That's what Vitryanskiy and Braginskiy wrote.
- Q. Let's just be clear about what you're saying. Are you saying that you have to have an express agreement by the parties that the default rule will apply before it will apply. Is that your evidence?
- A. You came from another end --
- Q. Indeed.
- A. -- because the situation here is the following. If the parties agreed that, in the absence of the agreement, the default rule will work, it's fine, and we can call this term nonessential. However, if the parties disagreed, and one of them or all of them insist that some deviation from the default rule should take place and still there is no agreement, then this term will be essential.

Q. Let's just break that down, Mr Rozenberg, because you've posited two different situations there. You start off by saying that if the parties agreed that in the absence of agreement the default rule will work, it's fine.

Are you suggesting that what you need before a default rule will apply is an agreement by the parties that it will apply?

A. Actually the agreement is concluded when there is agreement on all essential terms, and if the parties object against the default rule, then this term becoming essential precludes the agreement from being concluded.

From this point of view, we can see that before the agreement is concluded it should be clear that parties do not -- at least do not object against the default rule.

Q. You see, Mr Rozenberg, you're jumping in a sense to the third issue. What you're effectively saying is that where parties insist -- one of the parties insist that you reach an agreement, for example on time, then that will be an essential term and you cannot have the default provision, okay? Because that's what the third default -- sorry, the third essential term involves, one of the parties saying, expressly I suggest, that we have to make an agreement about time. Therefore, even if that weren't otherwise an essential term, it would become an essential term.

But what I'm positing with you is the situation in which neither party insists on that agreement, they try and reach agreement about a particular provision but they fail to do so in circumstances where there's a default provision. In those circumstances the default rule will apply, correct?

A. If I understood you correctly, that the parties did not reach agreement, the default rule applies and there are no objections from the parties against application of the default rule. Am I right?

Q. Correct.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can we have a simple example, Mr Rozenberg, of where you say there wouldn't be an agreement and where you say there would be, because the default rules apply?

A. Yes, that's what I'm saying actually. Vitryanskiy and Braginskiy said the situation when there is no agreement between the parties and the default rule --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Go back to the example of a car, the sale of a car or the sale of a house or something. Give me an example, a concrete example.

- A. With the house, for example, just regarding the price, of course it's usually easier not with the house but with some goods --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, let's do goods, goods is easiest.

- A. -- which are sold in this region at the time, at the price which prevails at this period of time.

If there is by default rule just the price is established, and there are no objections of the parties against such price, or if you speak about the time what is indicated, counsel read the provision of the Civil Code just five minutes ago with time as indicated in the Civil Code, and there are no objections of parties, then this term is not essential and the agreement will be concluded.

MR RABINOWITZ: Perhaps I can put an example to you,

Mr Rozenberg, and you can indicate your view about this.

Let's take the situation of the car. I want to sell you a car and I would like to sell it with delivery to take place next week. In fact, you would rather delivery took place in a month because you don't have the money, okay? So I say, "Here's my car, this is the price, I would like to transfer it to you next week." And you say, "Well, actually, I'm not happy about next week, I want next month."

Now, we know that the essential term -- there is an essential term of time, time for performance, yes? But we haven't been able to agree that essential term of time because I would like a week, you would like a month, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. In those circumstances, do you say the default rule applies or not? Let's just be clear what the default rule says, the default rule says performance within a reasonable time, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. All right. Now, in the situation I've given you, do you say that the default rule applies or that it doesn't apply?

Just say whether it applies or not and then give your explanation if you would.

A. If the default rule is indicated on the Civil Code, and there is (inaudible) time, and there are just following provisions, does not meet objections from the parties, the agreement is concluded, and there is no problem that initially they didn't reach any agreement.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But here it could be said there would be an objection from one of the parties because the purchaser of the car doesn't want the car delivered within a reasonable time, he wants the car delivered in a month, which, let's say objectively, is not a reasonable time. Had the parties thereby, by implication, agreed that the default rules would not apply?

- A. My understanding of counsel was that initially the purchaser who didn't have money raised objection, but eventually agreed with application of default rule.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No.

MR RABINOWITZ: No. Can I just --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Put it again, will you?

MR RABINOWITZ: -- with Mr Rozenberg suggest this.

The third default rule, Mr Rozenberg, is a rule which says that you'll have a default rule -- sorry, the essential term is a term -- you see this if you go in paragraph 18 of the joint memo -- is a term which either party declares must be agreed in a contract, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. So the party actually says, "This has to be agreed before we have a contract. I insist that we agree this term, otherwise there is no deal," correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And so in the scenario that we've been discussing, where I say, "Well I would like it to be a month," or a week, I think I had it, and you had it a month, unless we're in a situation where either of us is saying, "No,

I insist that it be in a week or we don't have a contract," we're not dealing with a third default term, are we?

A. If nobody insists, then the default rule may apply.

Q. Thank you.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But if they do insist --

A. If they do insist, and they do not agree with the application of default rule, the agreement is non-concluded, just because this term which becomes essential was not agreed. It was neither agreed between the parties nor replaced by the default rule.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But they don't have to specifically refer to the default rule in the example that's been given by Mr Rabinowitz.

A. Absolutely not.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: He wants the car today, you say "I can only deliver it in a month's time," or "I can only pay for it in a month's time, I don't want delivery in a month's time," you don't have to mention the default rule for it to be disapplied?

A. Again, I am sorry, just -- my Lady, initially there are negotiations of an agreement, and during the negotiations, as I understand, they didn't reach an agreement. Then their proposal to have the default rule applied, either the proposal or the understanding that the default rule will apply, did not meet any objections. Then the agreement will be concluded.

However, if a party which initially was insisting on something still objects against the default rule, or from the very beginning insists, as we used the word, insists on the other term, then the default rule cannot apply and therefore this essential term remains unagreed.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: What one needs in order to have your third essential term is that one party must insist that that term is agreed before there will be a contract, correct?

Let me put it differently. It has the ability to elevate a term which wouldn't be an essential term into an essential term if one party insists that there be an agreement about that term before he will make a contract?

- A. If there is a term on which one of the parties insists and still never agrees to have it in accordance with the will of the other party, there will be no agreement because this essential term will never be --
- Q. It becomes an essential term because he insists on an agreement about it?
- A. Of course. But since we mention the default rule, it means that at some stage there was a possibility to apply the default rule. The parties actually at least either discussed or were ready to leave this clause silent, but if at the last moment still one of the parties objects against the application of the default rule, it makes the agreement non-concluded.

Q. You're just putting it in a slightly different way.

The fact that you have a negotiation where parties try and agree on a particular term but don't agree on a particular term, in other words, I would like the car to be red, you don't have a red car and would like it to be green, but I don't insist on it, that's probably not an occasion on which there would be an agreed default term.

The fact that I want something and don't get it doesn't make that an essential term. It is only if I say, "The only car I'm going to buy is a green car" that it becomes an essential term, correct?

A. Yes, correct.

Q. And the fact that in a negotiation I have said that is what I want, unless I've insisted upon that it does not make it an essential term, correct?

A. If you do not insist on the colour, it is not indicated in the law, it is not an essential term.

Q. All right.

I hope my Lady is a little the wiser for that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: Then if we just go back to the Civil Code, you can --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you give me the reference, please?

MR RABINOWITZ: Sorry, I'm just going to try to put my -- I'm not taking him to a particular reference. It's all in 4/4.02, my Lady, where --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay.

MR RABINOWITZ: Sorry, that's at bundle 4/4, tab 2, at page 63 G(A)4/4.02/63.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: Probably the clearest place to get this is in the joint memo, paragraph 18.

I'm going to put to you again, Mr Rozenberg, what I've just put to you in the hope that having cleared away some of the confusions it will be clearer.

Just because the Civil Code describes a particular term in a way that makes it sound essential, it does not follow that that term is truly essential in the sense that its absence will mean the invalidity of the agreement, and that is because there may be a default rule which applies even if the parties do not reach agreement on that term?

A. In general, yes, default rule just replaces the agreement of the parties, strictly speaking.

Q. Very good, thank you for that.

Now, we were looking at Professor Vitryanskiy's article, G(A)2/3, tab 40, page 27 G(A)2/3.40/27, and we then come in this article to the passage that you quote in your report at paragraph 105.

Having given the example of a pledge agreement Professor Vitryanskiy says as follows, this is at page 27, just below halfway:

"This example confirms the notion that the essential terms of a contract must not be considered as terms, the absence of which from the text of [the] contract leads to the contract being deemed not to have been concluded, and also ... the existence of definable essential terms of the contract, [that is] essential terms which are specified by dispositive rules where they are absent from the text of a contract."

Okay?

Can we just look at what Professor Vitryanskiy appears to be saying here. He is saying, is he not, that essential terms must not be considered as terms, the absence of which, from the text of the contract, will lead to the contract being non-concluded, do you agree?

A. Absence will not lead because default exists.

Q. Because of the default terms, that's right.

Now, can we then look at what Professor Vitryanskiy says in the next sentence of the same paragraph on page 27. This is a passage on which you comment in your report and we'll look at what you say in a moment.

He says this:

"True it should be mentioned that in a number of cases the legislature has become excessively distracted in relation to individual types of contracts by formulating a list of essential terms without considering possible negative consequences: increasing the risk of specific contracts drawn up by the parties being deemed non-concluded by reason of the absence of an agreement on various contract terms which have been declared (often invalidly) to be essential."

So what Professor Vitryanskiy appears to be saying is that the legislature sometimes formulated a list of essential terms without considering the possible negative consequences of this, namely the increased risk that contracts will fail due to the absence of agreement on those terms.

That is what he is saying, is he not?

A. Yes.

Q. Then, in the next two paragraphs he gives an example from the world of leasing, and I don't think we need to be concerned with that.

Then in the next paragraph he goes back to dealing with the general position rather than the particular example of leasing. He says, and I'm just looking at the first sentence, it's on page 28:

"In our view, the only element which is indisputable and obvious in relation to rule making of this kind is the conclusion that when these provisions on the essential terms of a lease agreement were formulated, no consideration whatsoever was given to the possible consequences of their application."

He continues then:

"For surely, after all, the question of deeming a contract non-concluded because of the absence from that contract of some essential term is, as a rule, raised by a party to a contract who is acting in bad faith in response to entirely well-founded attempts by a party acting in good faith to compel the other party to fulfil his obligations in the necessary manner, or to apply the prescribed sanctions [to] him."

Would you agree that Professor Vitryanskiy's view, as reflected in this passage, is that the argument that the contract is not concluded is one that, as a rule, is raised by a party to a contract who is seeking in bad faith to resile from his agreement?

That is his view, is it not?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Why is that relevant to anything I've got to decide, that particular view?

MR RABINOWITZ: Because --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It may or may not be the case.

MR RABINOWITZ: Well it may or may not be, my Lady, but what there is in the literature, in Russian law literature, is a view that one shouldn't be overzealous to find essential terms, and that is going to be one of the issues that your Ladyship is going to have to decide.

Do you agree that that is Professor Vitryanskiy's view?

A. This is Professor Vitryanskiy's view based on Russian court practice. Very often defence is raised on the basis of an argument that agreement was not concluded.

Q. Just reading on, he then says:

"In this regard, any unjustified extension of the range of essential terms, or inclusion in that range of various secondary or purely technical terms (for example, in respect of a list of additional services, procedure for accounting of property on the balance sheet and so on) adversely affects the position of a party who is fulfilling his duty under the contract in good faith and does not foster stability of contractual relations."

In effect what Professor Vitryanskiy is saying, is he not, Mr Rozenberg, is that one should be cautious before allowing a contract to fail on the grounds that essential terms were not agreed?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But that must be fact dependent, Mr Rabinowitz, in any law, in any system of law? Whether or not there's a contract and whether or not somebody is acting in bad faith, in asserting the existence of the contract or denying its existence, must be totally fact dependent.

MR RABINOWITZ: That must be fact dependent, but what I submit is not fact dependent is what I've just put to the witness, that one must be cautious before allowing a contract to fail on the grounds that essential terms were not agreed.

That is the view of Professor Vitryanskiy.

A. I'm not sure that I share your view.

Professor Vitryanskiy wrote that sometimes just a party which is not very cautious may really be at risk later if the contract will be considered by the court non-concluded, just even ideally this party would not like such an outcome, but the only recommendation is, yes, to be cautious and to prepare good and valid contracts.

Q. Is it not your own opinion, expressed in your own reports, that Professor Vitryanskiy's view was indeed,

I think as you put it, an exhortation to the legislature to permit less restrictive drafting techniques?

A. Professor Vitryanskiy expressed a view that, broadly speaking, sometimes Russian law is too formalistic. But it's true, there are many regulations, many specifications, including essential terms regarding some agreements. There are pluses and minuses, there are advantages and disadvantages. It depends, because sometimes it's better to be more specific. But Professor Vitryanskiy warns that it's necessary to pay attention to it. But of course it all depends on facts.

Q. All right. Let's have a look, if we can, at the information letter, recent information letter of the Presidium of the Supreme Arbitrazh Court.

Can you go to G(A)7/1, tab 7, please. The Russian begins at page 44 G(A)7/1.07/61, and the English begins on page 61 G(A)7/1.07/61.

Now, just before we look at this, I think you say in your second report that information letters of this kind play an important role in the understanding and interpretation of Russian law, is that correct?

A. Yes. They summarise the court practice with the implementation of --

Q. And as you see, this information letter is dated 13 September 2001 --

A. 2011.

Q. Sorry, 2011, thank you. Just looking at this, if you can look at paragraph 12 of the information letter, the Presidium describes a case as follows:

"The court granted the claim of [the] bank for recovery of a loan under a loan agreement and dismissed the counterclaim to declare the agreement [as] non-concluded, since the disputed agreement contains [terms] agreed by the parties on the loan amount and ... terms for its disbursement."

In the next paragraph we see what the claim was for:

"The bank filed a claim with the court against [the] joint stock company for the recovery of the loan amount, interest under the loan agreement for use of the loan, and penalties for late performance of the obligation to repay the loan."

So what one is dealing with here is a bank suing to recover the loan, plus contractual interest and penalties, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Then just looking at the third paragraph we see that the defendant tried to get out of its bargain, and in particular to resist the claim for contractual interest and penalties, and the defendant's argument was that essential terms had not been agreed.

The third paragraph says this:

"The company, disagreeing with the claims for recovery of interest and penalties, filed a counterclaim to declare the agreement non-concluded, stating that the parties did not reach an agreement on essential terms of the loan agreement: the loan amount, the term and procedure for disbursement of the loan, and the [term] for repayment of the loan. Furthermore, the loan agreement [is] in violation of the provisions of Article 30 of the Law on Banks, [and] does not contain terms on the liability of the bank for breach of contract or the procedure for termination."

Then in the next paragraph the terms of the loan are provided, it says:

"Considering the claims, the first instance court found that a credit agreement had been concluded between the parties, which provided for issue of a loan in the form of a credit line up to 1,978,000 rubles. The parties agreed the credit limit under this agreement, providing for the loan to be disbursed in tranches on the application of the borrower, and furthermore that only one application could be submitted in a month for a sum not exceeding 440,000 rubles."

So the contract, is this right, provided for a credit line of nearly 2 million rubles to be disbursed in tranches on the application of the borrower, with a maximum of one application per month, for up to 440,000 rubles a time, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, we're not concerned with Article 30 of the law of banks so we can ignore the next paragraph.

But if we look at the paragraph that begins right at the bottom of page 61 and goes over the page, we see that the lower court had upheld the borrower's argument that the contract was non-concluded because it omitted material terms:

"However, the court considered [this is the lower court] the parties not to have reached agreement on other terms which the law treats as essential for loan agreements: terms on the time period and procedure for disbursement of the loan. The court came to the conclusion that this agreement cannot be considered concluded and that there were therefore no contractual relations between claimant and the defendant in relation to [the] repayment of the loan, and dismissed the bank's claim."

Okay?

Then just looking at the next paragraph in the English on page 62, we see that:

"The appellate court set aside the judgment of the first instance court, [and] granted the claims of the [lender]... "

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. The reasons given by the appeal court are set out in the last paragraph on page 62, and do read it for yourself, if you would.

A. Just the last paragraph, "The appellate court acknowledged"?

Q. Exactly. (Pause)

A. Yes, it's clear.

Q. So would you accept this, that the Presidium is saying -- in fact it's reflecting precisely what Professor Vitryanskiy said in his article. It's saying there are some essential terms which do not have to be expressly agreed because they're covered by default rules, correct?

A. In general I agree.

Q. And the fact that the parties have failed to express their will or reach agreement on such essential terms does not provide a ground to treat the contract as non-concluded, correct?

A. In this situation, I understand there were no objections of the parties to act within the credit limit.

Q. What happened here was they didn't reach agreement on an essential term but there was a default rule which could apply, yes?

A. In the absence of agreement, the default rule applied and there were no objections of the parties against its application.

Q. All right.

Now, I want, if I may -- my Lady, I don't know what time your Ladyship --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm happy to sit until 4.30 if you wish to go on.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm happy to go on given the amount we have to get through.

I want to focus, if I can, on the third type of essential term, and we've discussed this already somewhat. These are terms with respect to which, by declaration of the parties, or one of them, agreement must be reached, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And can we go back then to the joint memorandum just to see what the difference is between you and Dr Rachkov in relation to this?

A. I remember this.

Q. Bundle 6/1, tab 1, page 7, paragraph 18 G(A)6/1.01/7.

A. 18.

Q. If you look under paragraph 18(3)(c), we've already looked at the fact that it was agreed between you that:

"Any terms which either party declares must be agreed in a contract."

Is an essential term.

Then we have this:

"Dr Rachkov maintains, in this regard, that the third and last category of essential terms under Article 432.1 applies where a party has said that one, more or all [the] terms of the contract must be agreed before there can be a contract: such terms are, for this reason, essential terms, and until agreement is reached on them, the parties have not concluded a contract."

Then just looking down to paragraph 20, at the bottom of that page, we see that it's said:

"It is disputed whether a default term will necessarily become an essential term if the parties have tried but failed to depart from it."

Then we have Dr Rachkov explaining his position, subparagraph 1:

"Dr Rachkov maintains that such an attempt will make that term an essential term only if either party has made clear that agreement must be reached on that term before there could be a contract. Dr Rachkov maintains, in this regard, that the declaration must be made prior to the conclusion of the contract, and that, as noted above, what is required is that either party must declare that the term must be agreed before there can be a contract."

So what Dr Rachkov is saying, is this right, is that in order for a default rule to become a type 3 essential term, one party must make clear that the parties must reach agreement on that term before there can be a contract between the parties, correct?

- A. Correct, but I wrote in my report that mentioning a specific declaration is quite artificial expression.

In practice, and I cite legal scholars, it's sufficient to make clear for the other party that the party which does not agree with the default rule wishes something else. And the words "declaration", they do not work in practice.

- Q. Let's just see the way you put it in the joint memorandum, if we look at subparagraph 2 on page 8 G(A)6/1.01/8, you say there:

"Mr Rozenberg maintains that an attempt to depart from a default rule without reaching agreement on that term makes that term an essential one (if it is not already an essential term), as the attempt evidences that the parties have agreed that the default rule will not apply. In his view, the assertion of a necessity to make any specific declaration/statement (oral or otherwise as a separate announcement) in this context is quite artificial; what is necessary is an indication of any type that either party wishes to deviate from the default rule."

In order that we get a complete picture of what you're saying, this may have been what you were just referring to, can you go to your fifth report, bundle G(A)3/1, tab 3 at page 269. We're looking for paragraph 246 G(A)3/1.03/269.

This reflects what you've put in the joint memorandum, paragraph 246:

"If during negotiations either party expresses a desire to deviate from a relevant default rule provided in law, or raises an additional issue not reflected in law at all that must be included in a contract, it is clear that such terms become essential for the particular contract. As such, the term in question will have to be agreed between the parties to become a contractual term mutually acceptable to both parties (by virtue of Article 432...). An attempt to depart from a default rule would, in and of itself, evidence that the parties have agreed that the default rule will not apply, and, consequently, that this rule will not be applicable in the event that it is not agreed by the parties."

So --

A. "This situation would lead to a contract being non-concluded".

Q. Indeed.

So you say, do you, that if during negotiations either party simply expresses a desire to depart from a default rule, then the term in question becomes an essential term. And if an agreement isn't reached on it, the contract will be non-concluded and will fail entirely, is that your view?

A. Yes, either default rule applies without objections of the parties. If one of the parties wants, desires, as I wrote, desires to deviate from a relevant default rule, then either it's necessary to agree or the contract is non-concluded. This term becomes essential.

Q. So if, going back to the example of the time for delivery of a car, if I say in negotiations "I would like to deliver it in a week" and that is necessarily departing from the default rule because that would provide for a reasonable time, and you say, "Well, actually I would like it delivered in a month" and that again is necessarily, implicitly, an attempt to depart from the default rule, as you are saying a month rather than a reasonable time.

You are saying that if we don't reach agreement on that, if we have a negotiation about it and we don't reach an agreement on it, the contract will fail because the default rule can't apply?

A. That's correct.

Q. Well, I suggest to you, Mr Rozenberg, that that is a very extreme position to take. Is it not obvious that the whole purpose of this default rule is to apply in circumstances where the parties do not in fact reach agreement on things like the time for delivery, time for performance?

A. My view is that the agreement cannot be concluded against the will of the parties. If the parties understand the application of the default rule will violate their will, object against it, it cannot be mandatory against their will.

And if you allow me, my Lady, I can refer to a very impressive citation of both Professor Braginskiy and Vitryanskiy in my fourth report.

Q. Before you do that, and I'm not going to stop you doing it, I just want to be again very clear what you're saying.

We're dealing here with a situation in which neither party says "I insist on this particular time for delivery", but they simply raise in the context of negotiation that what they want is a particular time for performance, okay? So neither party says, "There is no contract unless we agree on what I say should be the time for performance," they simply raise in negotiation the time for performance, and they don't agree about that.

Your evidence is that merely by raising what they would like as the time for performance, that means the default rule can't apply?

- A. The default rule cannot apply against the will of the parties.
- Q. Mr Rozenberg, there's no point in simply repeating that. We accept necessarily, because this is what you've agreed with Dr Rachkov, that if either party -- this is what you say at paragraph 18 -- if either party:

"Any terms which either party declares must be agreed in a contract."

Then that party will become an essential term.

I have put to you an example in which neither party is declaring that it must be agreed, they are simply raising what they want to happen without saying, "I will not enter" -- saying any words to the effect of "I will not enter this contract if we can't agree it".

- A. I wrote in my report and in the joint memorandum that the word "declaration" used by legislator means expression of will, but not some specific statement like in foreign relations, for example.

And since you said that the parties still never agree regarding the application of default rule, in my view it makes the agreement non-concluded. At least the parties should keep silent regarding the application of the default rule. As soon as one of the parties raises objections against application of the default rule, the contract becomes non-concluded. And as I said in my fourth report, as far as I remember it's paragraph 69.

Q. Mr Rozenberg, are you suggesting that the mere fact that parties try to negotiate about something for which there is a default rule, that is the same as raising an objection to the default rule applying, such that if they can't agree on this matter the contract fails?

A. There is no special procedure for negotiations. In considering whether the agreement was reached or not, courts, according to Russian law, check what was the will of the parties.

Q. But just go back to my example. Are you saying that the mere fact that the parties tried to negotiate about something, for example I write to you and say "I would like delivery to be in a month," are you saying that by doing that, that is the same thing as raising an objection to the default rule in a way that you say elevates my request that this be delivery in a particular time, to the status of an essential term; is that what you're saying?

A. Basically yes, because application of default rule is a very important issue and actually mentioned rather frequently in Russian court practice. And it's clear that if parties did not agree, default rule applies. If there are no objections, it's fine, the agreement is concluded. If parties deviate, using this English word, or object against application of the default rule, and it's their will, then the agreement cannot be considered concluded.

Q. Perhaps we can just have a look at what Professor Vitryanskiy says about this. If you go, please, to G(A)2/3 at tab 40, the bottom of page 29, it's the article we were looking at earlier G(A)2/3.40/29. It's further on in the article.

Do you have page 29 there?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you see towards the bottom of page 29, Professor Vitryanskiy says this:

"And, finally, the fourth group of essential terms of a contract are made up of all those terms on which one of the parties indicates agreement must be reached."

Do you see he says that?

A. Yes.

- Q. Now, he calls this the fourth group of essential terms, and that is because, I don't think you need to go back, but earlier, at pages 27 and 28, he split up the second group into two parts. But what he's referring to here is the same as your third type, is it not?
- A. Yes, basically, yes.
- Q. Then in the next paragraph, at the bottom of page 29, we see that Professor Vitryanskiy says as follows:
- "Judicial and arbitrazh practice categorises as essential terms far from all the terms of a contract which were contained in an offer or acceptance at the time when the contract was being concluded. For these purposes it is required, in relation to a relevant term, that one of the parties should have directly stated the necessity of achieving an agreement, under threat of refusal to conclude the contract."
- Just pausing there, Professor Vitryanskiy is saying that, for this type of essential term, it is required that one of the parties should have directly stated the necessity of achieving agreement on the threat -- on the term under threat to conclude the contract.
- Do you agree that this is what Professor Vitryanskiy is saying; plainly it is what he is saying, is it not?
- A. I think he uses the word "one of the parties should have directly stated". I said that one of the parties disagreed with the application of default rule, or insisted on the term, but I think it's the same meaning.

Q. He says they:

"... should have directly stated the necessity of achieving an agreement, under threat of refusal to conclude the contract."

A. Right.

Q. Do you agree that Professor Vitryanskiy is right in this formulation?

A. This is my understanding of the situation.

Q. All right. Then maybe there's less between us than appears.

If you then look at what Professor Vitryanskiy goes on to say at the bottom of page 29 and over to page 30:

"In practice [this is the last two lines of page 29] it is not infrequently the case that in concluding a contract the parties have not settled differences, for example in relation to the size of a contractual penalty for failure to fulfil obligations, but have then fulfilled the terms of the contract. And only in the event of a dispute arising in relation to liability does one of the parties state that the contract should be regarded as not having been concluded, as at the time no agreement was reached on a contract term in respect of the amount of the penalty. In this case a contract is to be deemed as having been concluded (but without a term in respect of the amount of the penalty), bearing in mind that when concluding the contract neither of the parties had made a statement that it was necessary to reach an agreement on the disputed term of the contract."

So this is in a sense a fairly straightforward example. One party wants something in relation to the contractual penalty to be paid, tries to negotiate this but fails, and they nonetheless perform their contract. He says the contract will be deemed concluded without the penalty term, do you agree?

- A. My understanding that it's closely connected with the next sentence, that still it should be clear for both parties, for all the parties, that nothing is included accidentally or something is missing accidentally. And the procedure, how to raise objections, to make declarations, in my view can be considered as irrelevant. This is the key sentence:

"... as has been shown previously, the procedure for conclusion of contracts under Russian law precludes the possibility of 'accidental' entry of any terms into a contract, just as, conversely, it also precludes 'accidental' non-inclusion of any terms in a contract."

The will of the parties should be reflected in the agreement.

Q. I'm sure that the will of the parties should be reflected in the agreement, Mr Rozenberg. The point is what is the consequence of not agreeing a particular term? And what Professor Vitryanskiy is plainly saying here is that you could have a negotiation in relation to a particular term and not reach agreement about it, and unless one of the parties -- and then the parties perform the contract. Unless it was an essential term, the fact that they haven't reached agreement on it will not matter?

A. If there was no deviation from the default rule, it will not matter.

MR RABINOWITZ: All right.

My Lady --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well.

Mr Rozenberg, you mustn't talk about your evidence overnight, do you understand, with anybody, or communicate with anybody?

THE WITNESS: I understand.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well.

10.15, 10 o'clock tomorrow, what do you want to --

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Sumption plainly has a strong view. I'm happy to start at 10.00, my Lady.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, I would suggest, if your Ladyship was willing to start at 10.00, that would be wise because it would increase the prospect of finishing certainly the legal expert evidence and possibly at least a substantial part of the historical evidence by the end of the week.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, very well. How much longer do you have?

MR RABINOWITZ: I have probably the whole of tomorrow, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: The whole of tomorrow, fine. Okay very well, 10 o'clock tomorrow.

(10.00 am)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm sitting with a marshall today, a student.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, I thought it might be sensible to give your Ladyship an indication of where we are timetable wise. I'm likely to go through the day with Mr Rozenberg and indeed tomorrow morning.

I've told my learned friend Mr Adkin that the view we're taking in relation to Professor Maggs is that I don't propose to go through with Professor Maggs what I've gone through with Mr Rozenberg. I think that would just tax everyone's patience.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Not mine, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: Of course not, your Ladyship's patience is infinite.

That may mean that we don't have anything for Professor Maggs, or very little. On that basis, there is at least a prospect that we will finish the evidence tomorrow. It rather depends -- I understand that the history evidence won't take very long. But if we don't finish tomorrow, it looks as if we'll certainly finish on Monday.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, fine.

MR RABINOWITZ: But we will be, I think, all day with Mr Rozenberg, at least.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well.

MR MIKHAIL ROZENBERG (continued)

MR RABINOWITZ: Good morning, Mr Rozenberg. We were talking about essential terms, the relationship between essential terms and default rules. What I would like to do, if I may, is to ask you to look at a recent decision of the Presidium of the Supreme Arbitrazh Court. It's the decision in Delex which you will find in bundle G(A)7, tab 6. The English begins at page 41.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: G(A)7/1, is it?

MR RABINOWITZ: It's G(A)7/1, sorry I may have just said G(A)7. G(A)7/1, tab 6. G(A)7/1.06/41

Does your Ladyship have it?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I have it.

MR RABINOWITZ: It's a decision, very recent, of 5 April 2011, as you see. You will also see, Mr Rozenberg, if you look at who the members of the Presidium were, that they included Professor Vitryanskiy, do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see it.

Q. And then, about a third of the way down the page, just under the section which begins "Having heard", we see what the claim is about. The court says this:

"Delex LLC filed a claim with the Moscow Arbitrazh Court against Cassiopeia LLC seeking to recover 6,000,000 rubles in [principal debt] under the 16 January 2007 Loan Agreement... as well as 2,455,890 rubles and 41 kopecks in interest accrued on the loan for... 17 January 2007 to 8 June 2010 (subject to changes [made] to the claims and the waiver of the default interest and penalties)."

So we see from that, do we not, that Delex is suing Cassiopeia for repayment of a loan plus accrued interests. Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Then right at the bottom of the page there is a break, and then you see a section beginning "Having examined the merits of the arguments", do you see that, just at the bottom of the page?

A. In Russian it's on top of the next page.

Q. Okay. In the next paragraph the court says this, it's at the bottom, certainly in the English, of page 41, going over to page 42:

"As was established by the courts, Partner (the lender) and Cassiopeia (the borrower) entered into Loan Agreement [number] ... 16 January 2007, under which the lender extends to the borrower a loan totalling 6,000,000 million rubles at the interest rate of 12 per cent per annum."

So the loan agreement is one, as you see, made between Partner and Cassiopeia, do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Then in the next two paragraphs, in the English the first two paragraphs on page 42, the court says this:

"By its payment instruction... of 17 January 2007, Partner transferred the amount in question to the transactional account of Cassiopeia.

"The defendant does not dispute having received the funds under the Loan Agreement."

Again, pausing there, I think this tells us, does it not, that the lender, Partner, advanced the loan money and the borrower, Cassiopeia, accepted that it had received the money, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. Still at the top of page 42, in the next paragraph we see how Delex comes into the picture. The court explains this:

"Under the receivables assignment agreement dated 31 July 2009, Partner transferred its receivables under the Loan Agreement to Orbita, which in turn assigned these receivables to Delex under the receivables assignment agreement dated 1 October 2009."

So in effect Delex has taken assignment of the loan, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. The court then continues as follows:

"Believing that the loan became due for repayment off 16 April 2007 and that the borrower defaulted on the obligations, Delex filed this claim with the arbitrazh court."

Nothing that unusual so far.

Let's then see how the dispute arose, so the court says in the next three paragraphs this:

"As part of the case files, the claimant presented a photocopy of Loan Contract Number 03/01-07 of 16 January 2007, which states the loan repayment date as 16 April 2007.

"The defendant furnished the court with a photocopy of the same Loan Agreement stating the loan repayment date as 16 April 2027.

"Neither the claimant nor the defendant has been able to furnish the court with the original copy of the Loan Agreement."

So what appears to have happened, Mr Rozenberg, is this: the claimant, Delex, presents the court with a copy of the loan agreement which says that the date for repayment is 16 April 2007, and that is a date which has elapsed by the time the matter has come to court, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. And the defendant then comes up with a different copy of the same loan agreement, and that has a repayment date of 2027, 20 years into the future. And, if that were the position, then plainly the loan would not have --

A. Due.

Q. Be due, exactly that. And neither party can produce the original loan agreement.

A. Right.

Q. We can see how the lower courts resolved the situation. If you then just look at the next paragraph beginning "The first instance court", about a third of the way down page 42 in the English:

"The first instance court dismissed the defendant's arguments..."

Can you just read that to yourself. (Pause) Just the bit about the first instance court.

A. I think it's a very good resolution.

Q. Well, I'm not sure which resolution you're talking about, but just looking at the first instance court --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just a second, are you talking about the resolution by this court or by the earlier courts?

A. The final resolution of the Presidium, I find it very substantiated, reasonable, and actually that's -- the first impression is that the decision explains in details why such a resolution should take place.

MR RABINOWITZ: Yes. So just seeing what the earlier court has done, what the first instance court does is it looks at the assignment agreement and it sees that the assignment agreement also referred to the repayment date as 16 April 2007 and, on the basis of that, it concludes that the claimant's version is right, that is to say that the repayment date had arisen already, correct?

A. That's what they state.

Q. And then you see that the appellate court, the court to which they appeal from the first instance court, took a different view and it concluded that the claim failed because the photocopies could not be accepted as evidence, and on that basis said the claimant had failed to prove the defendant's obligation to repay. That's what the second court did, did it not?

A. Right.

Q. And then you get the appellate court's position, and it's dealing, obviously, with a situation where you have two copies showing different repayment dates. And just seeing what the court does, if you go to about two-thirds of the way down, just looking at the approach of the Presidium, you see:

"The position of the appellate and cassation courts is erroneous."

A. Yes.

Q. "A loan agreement [it says] may not be deemed to be non-concluded when there is proof that the loan amount has been transferred to the borrower, while the parties disagree on the repayment date. The legal relationship arising between the parties out of this agreement is subject to the provisions of Article 810(1) of the Civil Code, under which the loan amount must be repaid by the borrower within thirty days of the lender's demand where the agreement does not establish the repayment date or states that the loan shall be repaid on demand."

Can we just look at the reasoning here. The first thing that you see the Presidium says is that you can't deem a loan contract concluded where the loan funds were actually transferred to the borrower, even though the parties disagreed on the repayment date.

Do you agree that that's what they say?

A. That's what they say.

Q. And do you agree with that as an approach? I think you already indicated that you do.

A. Yes.

Q. So it's upholding the contract as a concluded contract even where the parties disagree on a fairly fundamental matter, do you agree?

A. Well, they disagree on this matter because the original was lost. It's a question of evidence, I understand, because nobody argues that there was disagreement at the moment of conclusion of the agreement.

Q. Well, they're in a position where they don't know what the position is on that. They have one version saying 2007 and another version saying 2027, and what they conclude is that in circumstances where they're unable to resolve the position, they can nonetheless uphold the contract in particular; yes, do you agree with that?

A. Right.

Q. The second thing the Presidium says in relation to the repayment date is that the default rule in Article 810(1) applies:

"... under which the loan must be repaid within 30 days of the lender's demand where the agreement does not establish the repayment date ..."

Do you see that?

A. I see the text.

Q. Well, you see the text and you've already indicated that you agree with its reasoning, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. What that case shows, Mr Rozenberg, is that where the parties try to deviate from a default rule, but either fail to reach agreement, or even where they do reach agreement but something goes wrong, a default rule can apply, correct?

A. It's not quite clear for me what you mean saying something goes wrong.

Q. Well, plainly there was an agreement at some point in relation to the loan repayments date, at least the parties thought they had agreed it, but there was something defective about that because one party was saying 2007 and the other party was saying 2027. In those circumstances, something has gone wrong with the attempt to agree a repayment date. They may have agreed it but something has gone wrong, in the sense that neither of them can establish that that was agreed. Do you follow?

A. I do.

Q. What the court is doing in those circumstances, where something has gone wrong, even though the parties thought or understood that they'd agreed it, is to apply the default rule; do you agree?

A. I agree that the Supreme Arbitrazh Court indicated that, in the absence of the original agreement, the court found this way of resolution of the case. But I see no sign in this court act that there were disagreements at the moment of the conclusion of the agreement, and it's unclear whether the parties agreed at the moment of conclusion of the agreement what should be the provision of the contract.

Q. Well, at a minimum, it appears that both parties had a view as to when the repayment date should be because one party produces a version which says 2007 and the other party produces a version which says 2027, correct?

A. That's correct.

Q. And notwithstanding this apparent attempt, even on that basis, to deviate from the default rule, what the court is willing to do in those circumstances is to apply the default rule, do you agree with that?

A. I agree with the remark that there was no deviation connected with conclusion of the agreement. It was not deviation, but I would say different interpretation of the agreement concluded long ago, simply because of the fact of the absence of the agreement.

If you allow me, my Lady, I will remember yesterday's example when the agreement was destroyed in fire and still the parties tried to find the resolution of the dispute through the court. And actually, as I understand in such situation, the key point is not what was the behaviour of the parties and the arguments of the parties at the moment of the conclusion of the agreement, but rather evaluation of all the evidence in their entirety. That's what always Russian courts do.

And the fact that in connection with banking activity, which usually is very strictly regulated in Russia, and courts try to avoid to the maximum possible extent unclear situations when rights and obligations connected with transfer of monetary funds remain unclear.

In this situation, my understanding is that this reference to Article 110, paragraph 1 (sic), of the Civil Code of the Russian Federation shall be understood not in connection with negotiations of the parties at the moment of conclusion of the agreement and deviation from the default rule, but in light of necessity to apply correctly the existing material law to resolve the dispute in light of the available evidence.

Q. Mr Rozenberg, there's no doubt that the court is trying to resolve the dispute in light of the available evidence, that is indisputable.

You said one thing in that answer, which I'm not sure was an answer to my question, and that, I think, reflected something I put to you yesterday which is that the courts seek to uphold contracts which have been performed and not allow them to, in a sense, be invalidated, correct?

A. In the general sense, when everything is crystal clear, the courts have just -- I would say there is a trend in Russian court practice that courts prefer to uphold contracts which are performed when there are no dispute between the parties that it was really the performance of this agreement.

Q. Right, that's very helpful. But I just want to go back to my question because I'm not sure that you did answer my question. Because is this not a case where it is perfectly clear that the parties did not intend or expect the default rule to apply? One party produces -- neither party, on the version of the contract that it produces, has a provision which ties in with a default rule, which is 30 days from demand; would you agree at least with that?

A. Your question is rather long, but the beginning, as far as I remember, at the beginning of your question you said that there was no intention to deviate from the default rule, am I correct?

Q. Well there was an intention to deviate from the default rule, that's very clear. Neither party is putting in this contract a provision which reflects the default rule, which is that there will be repayment 30 days from a demand.

A. If I am correct, when the contract was concluded, there was not even such an issue, deviation of the default rule. When the contract was concluded both parties, according to the explanations in the court of the first instance, knew what was the term, simply the evidence is different today because the agreement was destroyed, like in your example yesterday when it was destroyed in fire.

There is no agreement today, but at the moment of the conclusion of the agreement both parties explain they knew what was the term, and there was -- nobody even ever mentioned the default rule when the contract was concluded.

- Q. I entirely accept that, they didn't mention a default term, but they each asserted a term which was inconsistent with the default rule, correct?
- A. They brought their evidence today to the court, which is different, but it doesn't mean that there was discussion, and actually nobody alleges that there were negotiations or discussions at the moment of the conclusion of the agreement.
- Q. Mr Rozenberg, I think I've given you a sufficient opportunity to deal with this. I suggest to you that this is a clear case where the parties had plainly intended that the default rule should not apply, but something has gone wrong so as to mean that the court is not in a position where it can give effect to what either party intended should apply, and that, in those circumstances, the default rule applies.

Do you agree with that or do you disagree with that?

A. My Lady, correct me if I'm wrong, but courts in Russia resolving a dispute go step by step. First step, to identify what was the will of the parties when the agreement was concluded. It's clear that the will of the parties was to have agreement specifying all the terms, and it's clear that, at the moment of conclusion of the agreement, the parties did reach agreement on all the terms, and there was nothing unclear at that moment. And neither the party nor the creditor -- either the creditor or the borrower had in mind that the default rule should apply. At the moment of the conclusion of the agreement everything was clear.

Am I correct?

Q. Well, that's a very interesting point. You are saying that the parties did reach agreement on all the terms and nothing was unclear at that moment. Then what happens, Mr Rozenberg, on your analysis, what happens next?

A. And next some time expired and the original agreement was destroyed.

Q. So it becomes impossible to rely upon or determine what the original agreement on that term was, correct?

A. That's correct.

Q. And then, in those circumstances, the court applies a default rule?

A. That's correct.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What would have happened, and this is maybe a bit artificial, this example I'm about to give you, but what would have happened if the claimant had sued on the basis of the default provision, said to the court, "Well, I know there's a disagreement between the defendant who says the loan is not payable until 2027, and I'm saying it's repayable in 2012, there therefore is a dispute between us, I'm relying on the default provision and I'm serving my demand in 2011."

Would the courts have allowed, in those circumstances, the claimant to have recovered on the basis of 30 days from the demand by virtue of the default provision, or would the court have said, "Well, your case is that the loan is repayable in 2011, and on any basis you're going to have to wait until then until you demand your money back."

I'm just not quite clear how this default provision, as it were, comes in to the picture.

A. I understand that there are several possibilities here. The first, regarding declaring the agreement non-concluded because of a default rule, cannot apply if at least one of the parties insists on specifying the term, and therefore the term becomes essential. The other side disagrees, and maybe there is a silent agreement that default rule should apply, nor one of the parties prevails in this disagreement at the moment of the conclusion.

If such evidence were presented to the court, and it would be clear for the court that, from the very beginning, there was unclear which party prevailed in the negotiations, and it would be at the same time crystal clear that both parties disagreed regarding application of default rule at the moment of the conclusion of the agreement, then the court probably had no choice, would have no choice, and would have to declare the agreement non-concluded in such situation.

But in the situation when both parties agreed that the agreement was perfectly valid at the moment of conclusion, that all the terms were specified and there was no essential term for which the default rule should apply in that moment; next question before the court is how to evaluate this evidence, either to prefer one version about 2011, or the version of 2027, or the third option which the court choose that, according to the -- you say -- counsel says default rule, but according to this dispositive norm, to apply the legislation allowing the payment on demand.

In this situation, when it was clear that there is no legal basis to declare the agreement non-concluded, number one, because nothing was wrong at the moment of the conclusion of the agreement, second, as I understand, there was no objective basis for the court to prefer one or(?) the second version of the agreement, otherwise I understand it would be necessary to acknowledge that there is a forgery, or just other consequences would take place.

But in this situation, the court simply applied the rule allowing to pay the loan on demand because there was no other legal basis in this -- in light of this evidence, in light of these circumstances. We always say that of course it's necessary to check, to investigate very carefully, all the circumstances of the case, but on the surface it looks here that this is the only possibility to issue a substantiated decision and not to put anybody in a very unfair situation.

Because first there is no basis to make a conclusion that the decision -- that the contract was non-concluded, and as we agreed with counsel, to the extent possible when the circumstances allow or Russian courts prefer not to declare agreements non-concluded, but at the same time to rule that only in 2027 the time for repayment should come, although it contradicts apparently some other available evidence mentioned here in the decision. The court chose the best way how to resolve the dispute, in my view.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay, I think I've got the picture.

Thank you very much. I think we can move on.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm going to move on to a slightly different topic, if I may. We've discussed the issues of essential terms, and the next topic I would like to consider with you is what happens when the parties agree a contract but one of the terms which they agree is void or invalid. And the question is: does the rest of the contract survive or does it fail?

You agree, I think, that this is an issue covered by Article 180 of the Civil Code. Can we just turn that up, bundle G(A)4/4, tab 2, page 33 G(A)4/4.02/33.

Just looking at what Article 180 is about "Consequences of Invalidity of Part of a Transaction". It says:

"The invalidity of part of a transaction shall not entail the invalidity of the other parts of it if it is possible to suppose that the transaction would have been made without the inclusion of its invalid part."

Then can we just look, if we may, at what you and Dr Rachkov have said in the joint memorandum, paragraph 28 of that. It's bundle G(A)6/1, tab 1, page 10 G(A)6/1.01/10.

We can see where the agreement is and where the disagreement is about this. So paragraph 28, page 10, and just looking at the first two sentences of paragraph 28:

"It is agreed that, where part of a contract is invalid, other parts of the contract may survive if it is possible to suppose that... a contract would have been made without the inclusion of the invalid part (Article 180). Surviving part of the contract must contain all essential terms for a contract to be concluded."

That seems straightforward enough. There is, is there not, a factual question whether the parties would have made the contract without the invalid term, and a legal question whether the surviving contract contains all essential terms for a contract. If both questions are answered affirmatively, the surviving part of the contract stands, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. In paragraph 29, just staying with the joint memorandum, we see that you and Dr Rachkov disagree as to whether the severability principle in Article 180 can ever apply where an essential term is invalid. You say it cannot while Dr Rachkov says it can. Is that correct?

A. It is correct.

- Q. Then can I just put to you a hypothetical example just to test your position on this point. Let us suppose that I agree to lease your property with an option to buy it at the end of the lease, okay? So it's a lease of the property, but we're also wanting to agree an option that I be able to buy the property at the end of the lease. Let us suppose also that we agree all essential terms for a lease, okay?
- A. Okay.
- Q. We also agree all essential terms for the option, for the sale option, but one of those terms is void.
- A. Yes.
- Q. Now, as a matter of fact, in this hypothetical example, we would both have been happy to enter into the lease contract on the same terms even without the option to buy at the end. Let us just suppose that that is the case, okay?
- A. We can suppose anything, of course.
- Q. All right, thank you for that. My family then move into the property and we live there happily for a period of time, but the option fails because one of its essential terms are void. All right? Do you say that in this example you can evict me and my family from the property on the basis that the failure of the option to buy causes the failure of the lease as well, even though the lease contains all essential terms for a lease, and we would both have signed the lease on the same terms even without the option to buy?

A. I understood at the beginning that it was not an essential term.

Q. No.

A. That option to purchase.

Q. No, we agree a lease and an option. We agree all the terms, all the essential terms of the lease and we agree all the essential terms of the option, but the option part of it fails because an essential term is void. The factual hypothesis, the hypothetical, involves an assumption that we would have been happy to enter into the lease even without the option. Do you say that the lease fails because an essential term of the option has failed so that the option has to fall away?

A. The crucial point here is the beginning. We agreed all the essential terms, and one of the essential terms was this option. It was also integral part of the whole agreement.

In other words, I would never enter into this agreement without this option because I would like to have a tenant, potentially a buyer. Am I correct?

Q. Mr Rozenberg, you're changing the facts that I gave you. The facts that I gave you were that we agree a lease with an option to buy at the end. The other fact that I gave you is that we would have been happy to agree the lease without the option. We agree all essential terms of the lease part of it and all essential terms of the option part of it, but there is an essential term of the option part of it which fails so that, in a sense, the option part of it would have to fall away. Do you say that as a consequence of that the lease part of it also becomes invalid?

- A. It's not quite clear for me what and how reflected in the agreement is that we would both be happy if this option would not work. In other words, we would agree about lease even without an option. How to prove it, and is it included in the agreement, because it seems to me that it's really an essential term.
- Q. Well, Mr Rozenberg, you accepted that for the purposes of Article 180 there's a factual question as well as a legal question, and the factual question is whether we would have been happy to agree the lease without the option. And I've put to you a hypothetical example in which that is the case.
- A. Normally all leases, not all of course, the majority of leases are concluded without such option. The vast majority of leases. Therefore if the parties agreed this term in addition to the lease, on the surface it appears that it's an essential term of the agreement. However, you added that it was not. If it's indicated in the agreement somehow that actually it doesn't matter for the seller -- I'm sorry, for the landlord at least, then the position would be that the failure with this option does not invalidate the whole agreement.

However, what I understand, it really was the essential term, and, as a result, the landlord has a tenant who will never become a buyer though he would prefer to have a tenant, potential buyer. Therefore, my view is legally, if there is no indication that parties clearly confirmed that it doesn't matter for them whether the option remains or not, then the failure of the option is fatal for the whole agreement.

Q. Mr Rozenberg, it may be that you have misunderstood or confused what we are talking about when we talk about essential terms.

Let us just be clear. The option is not an essential term of the lease agreement. An option agreement has its own terms: for example, how much has to be paid if you're going to exercise the option, when you have an entitlement to exercise the option.

The lease agreement has its own essential terms, okay?

What the parties have agreed is, if you like, a mixed agreement in the sense that it contains both a lease and an option to buy at the end. So the option is not an essential term of the lease, and we know that because, in the example I gave you, I have made clear that both you and I would have been happy with the lease, happy to enter into the lease, even if there wasn't an option.

Now, I will put the example to you one more time. If the option part of that contract fails because an essential term of that option is void for some reason, do you say that the lease as well becomes invalid, even though all essential terms relating to the lease aspect of that agreement are valid and have been agreed?

A. My Lady, since it's for the court to evaluate evidence, I understand that in this example it's crystal clear that it was irrelevant for the parties at the moment of the conclusion of the agreement whether the option would fail or not, and therefore the conclusion is that the failure of the option is irrelevant and the lease agreement remains valid.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And that's just applying Article 180?

A. Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: And that is so even if the reason that the lease -- the option part of it fails is because of a failure in respect of an essential term of the option part of that contract, correct?

A. I understood from the counsel that at the beginning, at the moment of the conclusion of the agreement, it was not the situation, when in the mixed contract the option was an essential term. It was indicated that, for the parties, it was not the necessary element of the mixed agreement.

Q. Mr Rozenberg, again, I think you're mixing up what we mean when we talk about an essential term.

An option is a separate contractual obligation. It contains its own terms. And the lease has certain terms which may be essential. The hypothesis that I'm putting to you is that the parties would have entered into the lease without the option and that the option fails because an essential term in relation to the option part fails.

Do you accept that on the basis of applying Article 180 the lease agreement will still stand?

A. I think I gave the answer. I can only confirm that if in a Russian court it would be established that without an option such agreement would never be concluded, then the failure of the option would be fatal. If however, according to what the counsel presented, it was clear that both parties were perfectly happy, even without the option entering into the lease, and the lease was crucial, then the failure of the option doesn't matter.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think I've got the point you're making and I've got the answer the witness has given.

MR RABINOWITZ: Thank you, my Lady.

All right. I'm grateful for that, Mr Rozenberg. Now, we've been dealing with a situation where part of a contract fails because it contravenes the law and is therefore void. Can we consider the situation where the parties agree a contract but one term fails for uncertainty. The question is: does the rest of the contract survive in those circumstances; okay?

Now, can we just look at what the joint memorandum says on this point, it's again bundle G(A)6/1, tab 1, page 11, paragraph 30 G(A)6/1.01/11.

Just looking at paragraph 30, this says as follows:

"It is disputed whether it is possible for part of a contract to be non-concluded and for another part of the contract to survive."

You set out your position at subparagraph 1 of paragraph 30, you say:

"Mr Rozenberg maintains that this is not possible. Mr Rozenberg says that a part of a contract cannot be non-concluded (it can only be invalid), and the absence of an essential term makes the whole agreement non-concluded. Mr Rozenberg maintains that if the parties intended to make a mixed contract, then the essential terms for each contract must be agreed or the mixed contract as a whole (both parts) is non-concluded. However, Mr Rozenberg considers that the concept of a mixed contract is not relevant for [present purposes]."

Perhaps you can glance at what Dr Rachkov says about this:

"Dr Rachkov maintains that [it] is possible. Again, for example, the parties agree a mixed contract of sale and loan. If the parties fail to reach agreement on an essential term for the loan contract, but reach agreement on all essential terms for the sale contract, and would have made the sale contract even without the loan contract, then the sale contract will be concluded and the loan contract non-concluded. In effect, the rule in Article 180 applies in that situation by analogy."

All right? So that's the difference between you.

Perhaps I can just go back to my hypothetical example and give you an opportunity to respond on this slightly different set of facts. Again, let us suppose that I agree to lease your property with an option to buy it at the end of the lease and, again, we agree all essential terms of the lease but we fail to agree all essential terms of the sale option. Again, as a matter of fact, we would have both entered into the lease contract on the same terms even without the option to buy at the end.

Do you say, in this example, that you can get out of the lease and evict me from the property, if I've already moved in, on the basis that the failure of the option to buy causes the failure of the present lease?

- A. I'm very sorry, but what is the difference with the example we already considered?
- Q. In the first example we dealt with a situation where an essential term of the option was void. Here we're dealing with the situation in which an essential term of the option is simply not agreed. Do you say the result is different because we're dealing with a not agreed situation as opposed to a void situation? Or do you say that the outcome is the same?
- A. I think you just read, my position is that the essential terms for each contract must be agreed or the mixed contract as a whole is non-concluded. This situation is essentially clear.
- Q. So I just want to be clear about what you're saying, Mr Rozenberg. You're saying that in a situation where we have, as in my example, a lease and an option where the parties would have been very content for the lease to be concluded without the option, the lease has all the essential terms agreed but there is a non-concluded essential term in the option, you say that the lease also will fail?

A. Again, I think we already had this problem in the first example. First you say both parties would be happy without the option, and then you say it was essential for the parties to have this option.

Q. No, that's not what I said at all. I said --

A. If it's irrelevant for the landlord whether there is option or there is not option, then the terms of the option are not essential terms, as I understand.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can I just be clear, Mr Rozenberg. Using the language of Article 180, is a transaction invalid if terms haven't been agreed, or does "invalidity" reflect something else?

There's not a reference here to contract, one is looking at a transaction. Is invalidity something like a licence not being granted, or some other provision being ineffective, or does invalidity include a non-agreed transaction? I'm not quite clear what is meant by invalidity here.

A. The invalidity means that something happened not in connection -- probably not in connection with the will of the parties, because the licence was not obtained or was recognised invalid, for example, or something else took place. As a result at least some actions which were supposed to be performed on the basis of this transaction will not be performed, and the question is whether the parties in any event would enter in this transaction.

By the way, even the question with the loan suggested by my colleague Dr Rachkov is not bad. For example, it's something nice to have, for example, to have a loan in addition to the sale of a car, but even without a loan parties would, for example, carry out the sale in any event. And with this loan, invalidity of the loan because of let's say currency problems, absence of the licence, of the creditor and so on, then would not invalidate the sale agreement because parties would like to enter into the sale agreement regardless of the part of the agreement which became invalid.

And I agree with this if the invalid part was not essential, in other words if the purchaser would not have money to purchase this car, and the loan was substantial, essential for the purchaser, then invalidation of the loan would kill the whole transaction.

It was nice to have, but in the absence of this loan the purchaser would find money somewhere else, maybe with a high interest, but still would like to purchase this car, then invalidation of this part of the whole contract is not a deal killer, and then transaction remains.

Therefore 180 clearly states that if the court will come to a conclusion that even without the invalid part the transaction would be entered and carried out, then invalidation of a part doesn't matter.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But is invalidity directed at contracts that are not concluded at all because there's no certainty of terms?

A. It would bring to the conclusion that it would be non-concluded, again, if it would be clear that without the invalid part parties would never enter into this contract.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So invalidity can extend to contracts which are not concluded because a term is uncertain?

A. Because the term is uncertain.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes I see.

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Rozenberg, I have to say, that is an answer that is helpful for my position but in all honesty I'm not sure that that's right.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I was only asking the question.

MR RABINOWITZ: No, indeed, and my Lady got an answer which I can tell your Ladyship is helpful to our case.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I can see that.

MR RABINOWITZ: But I'm not sure that that's right,

Mr Rozenberg, and can I just suggest something to you because I don't want this to go off on a false basis, although perhaps I should happily grab that.

Is there not a difference in Russian law between something being void or voidable and simply being non-concluded in the sense that the parties did not reach an agreement on a term?

A. Just again, my Lady, to be clear that the words are used correctly, because here the words -- a lack of clarity whether the parties would agree or not agree from the very beginning.

If the understanding is that intention of the parties was clear, that they would like to have the whole agreement performed, and one of the part became invalid, then in this situation it's clear that there was no situation when the agreement would be non-concluded.

Therefore, to avoid any misunderstanding, I have to say that in this situation invalidation of the part which was crucial for the parties leads to invalidity of the whole contract.

Q. I don't want to --

A. If I was understood in a different way I'm sorry, but this is the clear statement of the law.

Q. Let me see if I can cut through this.

A. In other words, the question whether the agreement would be concluded or not depends on the evaluation of evidence from the point of view of will of the parties at the moment of the conclusion of the agreement.

If both parties understood that the whole agreement will be concluded, shall be concluded, there is no default rule, nothing is unclear, and one of the parts of the transaction becomes later invalid, not because of the parties, then the invalidity of the part of the transaction leads to invalidation of the transaction if it's clear that the parties would never have entered into the transaction without the invalid part.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

So he seems to be agreeing with you that there is a difference, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: For my Lady's note, Article 166, which your Ladyship will find on page 31 of G(A)4/4, deals with void and voidable G(A)4/4.02/1.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It's just the use of the word "invalid".

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed, and your Ladyship will see at Article 166 that it says a transaction is invalid if it's void or voidable.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, thank you. That's the point I wanted.

MR RABINOWITZ: I thought that was the point.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think it's common ground that that wouldn't include something that is merely not concluded.

MR RABINOWITZ: Yes.

Our position is, as is clear from what Dr Rachkov says, we say Article 180 applies by analogy, and that is the point I've been trying to put to Mr Rozenberg, having dealt with that.

Mr Rozenberg, rather than taking up more time on this, can I just ask you this. I gave you the hypothetical example of the lease and the option, and the option being invalid -- well, in the first case, invalid in relation to an essential term, and in the second case non-concluded because there wasn't agreement on essential term.

Your position is that it doesn't matter. In both cases the position is that the lease agreement fails as well because of the problem with the essential term in the option agreement, is that right?

A. Just -- the key point was that if all the parties would never have entered into the agreement without the invalid part then it would be fatal for the agreement.

Q. And if they would have entered into the agreement, that is to say the lease agreement, regardless, then you accept that it would be valid, the lease agreement, do you?

A. This was the first suggestion of the counsel where I was a little bit misled that the party would be perfectly happy without the option, if I remember correctly.

Q. In those circumstances, you would accept that it would be valid, the lease agreement, yes?

A. If this is not the essential term, yes.

Q. Thank you for that.

Now, I want next to look at partnership contracts. We have been dealing with some general concepts but we now need to apply them to the particular contract we're concerned with here, which is a partnership contract. And a partnership contract or a joint -- what is it, a joint activity contract, is a particular type of contract in Russian law, correct?

A. A joint activity agreement, in parenthesis, a simple partnership, that's what we are talking about.

Q. And our concern is to understand what essential terms and default rules apply for a joint activity or partnership contract, and whether the 1995 agreement was sufficiently definite and complete to be a concluded and binding partnership contract, okay?

A. Okay.

Q. Now, can we look at what you and Dr Rachkov say about this matter in the joint memorandum, bundle G(A)6/1 again, page 11 G(A)6/1.01/11 paragraph 31.

You can see that the heading is "Simple partnership contract, also called joint activity contract".

Then we see at paragraph 31 that you and Dr Rachkov actually agree a number of points. Subparagraph 1, you agree:

"A simple partnership contract is the same as a joint activity contract. Both these words are used [in] Article 1041 to name the contract [described by that Article]. Dr Rachkov generally refers to this as a 'partnership contract' and Mr Rozenberg as a 'joint activity agreement', but these two... mean the same [thing]."

Then subparagraph 2, you agree:

"At the relevant times a partnership contract was provided for by Article 122 of the Fundamentals (which applied in the period from 1 January 19395 to 1 March 1996) and Article 1041 of the current Civil Code (which applied from 1 March 1996)."

So just making sure that we're clear about this, when the 1995 agreement was made, the relevant provision of the law relating to the partnership contract was Article 122 of the Fundamentals, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And it's common ground that the Fundamentals were a mini Civil Code put in place in the early 1990s as part of the transition to a market economy in Russia, that's right, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. Article 122 of the Fundamentals was supplemented by the general rules in Articles 1 to 454 of the Civil Code, including Article 432 which we've looked at, because these articles had already come into force in 1995, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. But the rules on particular contracts in Articles 455 to 1109 of the Civil Code didn't come into force until 1 March 1996. At that point, Article 1041 would have replaced Article 122 of the Fundamentals, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, that all sounds terribly complicated, and you raise a specific point about the continued application of the 1964 Civil Code which we'll get to. But so far as essential terms are concerned, in fact the complications don't need to concern us because in fact you and Dr Rachkov agree that Article 122 of the Fundamentals was essentially similar to Article 1041 of the Civil Code; they're basically the same in that regard, are they not?

A. Yes, they're very close.

Q. We actually see this if you look at page 12 of the joint memorandum, if you look at subparagraph 4 G(A)6/1.01/12.

A. Yes.

Q. You see that you say that:

"The essential terms for a partnership contract are the same under Article 122 of the Fundamentals as under... 1041 of the current Civil Code."

So can we look then at the provisions of the Fundamentals. Can you go, please, to -- it's actually in J2/6, tab 32.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: There isn't a tab 32 in J2/6.

MR RABINOWITZ: Sorry. The reference I have here is J2/6 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've got 38.

MR RABINOWITZ: 38, sorry. J2/6.38 at tab 32. It's page 182 J2/6.38/182.

These are the exhibits to your second report, and if we look, we can see what Article 122 says, "Agreement on Joint Activity", it's the first two sentences:

"Joint activity without formation for this purpose of a legal entity shall be established under the agreement between its participants. Under [a] joint activity agreement (simple partnership agreement) the parties (participants) undertake to pool their contributions, integrate their efforts and act jointly in order to achieve [a] common business objective or other objective not contrary to... law."

Okay?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, perhaps we can look at Article 1041 of the Civil Code, just to see the extent to which that has got any differences. G(A)4/4, tab 2, page 73 G(A)4/4.02/73.

A. I have the Civil Code here, it's not a problem. Okay, Article 1041.

Q. 1041. On the left-hand side of the page, you see Article 1041 entitled "The Contract of Simple Partnership". Just looking at the first paragraph:

"Under a [simple partnership contract] (a contract on joint activity) two or more persons (the partners) undertake the duty to join their contributions and act jointly without the formation of a legal person to acquire profit or achieve another purpose not contrary to a statute."

So both of these provisions speak of the parties agreeing to pool or join their contributions and integrate their efforts and undertake joint activity in order to achieve a common business objective or goal or other objective or goal not contrary to law, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. Now, if we then go back to the joint memorandum, page 11, just to look at paragraph 31(3)
G(A)6/1.01/11.

A. Yes.

Q. At the bottom of page 11 you can see that you agree that:

"A partnership contract envisages a joint activity of the partners towards a common goal without formation of a legal entity. This common goal must be [a lawful one]."

If you go over to page 12 and you look at subparagraph 5 at the top of the page, you see that you agree also that:

"All essential terms must be sufficiently defined.
It would not be sufficient for the parties literally to agree to 'combine... contributions and act in pursuance of a common goal' without any detail."

So we all agree, do we not, that the parties must agree more detail than that?

A. Yes.

Q. Then just looking at subparagraph 6, you address the concept of a contribution which the party must agree to make, and you agree again:

"The concept of 'contribution' is very wide.

A party can contribute property or skills, efforts or services. It is not essential [you say] that property be contributed. There is nothing objectionable about a partnership contract in which each [party] agrees to contribute only efforts or services."

Correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Then just looking at subparagraph 7, you address the concept of a joint activity which the parties are to undertake, and you agree also this:

"The agreed activities may be the same as the contributions made by either party, particularly where the contributions are made in the form of skills or efforts. In this case, the term on contributions and activities of the partners will coincide. Such term must be sufficiently defined."

So where the parties are to contribute efforts, I think what you're agreeing here is that those efforts may also comprise their agreed activities provided that they are sufficiently defined, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, thus far you and Dr Rachkov agree, but if we then look at paragraph 32, we can see that you dispute the precise nature of the essential terms of a partnership contract.

Now, to some extent there is agreement between you, because you both agree that a partnership contract must reach a sufficiently defined agreement on, first, the parties' contributions, secondly, their joint activities, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And third, the common goal that those efforts are directed towards.

Where you disagree is on how precisely these matters must be defined, and we see that in paragraphs 32 and 33 of the joint memorandum. It really relates to the certainty of what the parties are to do and the goal that they seek to define, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. While we're on paragraph 32, just looking at paragraph 32(1)(d), you say that the essential terms for partnership contract include:

"The shares the parties will hold in the common property, in case the parties did not wish them to be equal."

So your suggestion here, Mr Rozenberg, is this right, is that the shares the parties will hold in the common property are not necessarily an essential term but will become so if the parties do not intend their shares to be equal. And in that event, you say, their respective shares are an essential term which must be agreed or the contract will fail?

A. Yes, because if there is no agreement between the parties reflected in the agreement but the default rule works and there are no objections against it, it's not necessary for the parties to determine the shares.

Q. Right. And we come back to the question of default rules because you accept, I think, that there are default rules governing the shares of the party in the common property.

Let's just have a look at what you say, if you go to paragraph 37, which is on page 15 of the joint memorandum G(A)6/1.01/15, just looking at paragraph 37(2), you say:

"It is agreed that the Civil Code provides default rules by which, unless the parties agree to the contrary or unless otherwise follows from the circumstances or legislation ...

"The parties will hold an equal share in the common property..."

And you refer there to Article 245, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Then you each add an observation:

"Mr Rozenberg observes, however, that where the parties decide to depart from this default rule but fail to finally agree otherwise, the default rule will not apply."

And we've talked about that already.

"Dr Rachkov observes, as noted above, that the default rule will only not apply if the parties have made clear that they must reach agreement on that term before there can be a contract."

So just pausing there, the position appears to be this, that there is a default rule which provides that the parties will hold an equal share in the common property, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. That is the default rule to be found in Article 245 of the Civil Code, which is numbered less than 454, and which therefore applied in 1995 when the 1995 agreement was made, do you agree?

A. Yes, because at that time the only legal basis for this was Article 245. Articles of the part 2 were not in effect yet.

Q. And third, I suggest, the mere fact that the parties tried but failed to reach agreement on their respective shares does not make this an essential term. The default rule can still apply. Do you agree?

In other words, they try and agree what the shares are going to be but they fail to reach agreement, in those circumstances the default rule can apply?

A. Now I'm trying to be more careful because from the counsel's statement it's unclear whether the parties tried, failed and agreed that the default rule should apply, or tried, failed but still insist that the shares should not be equal. In other words, disagree with the application of the default rule. This is the key point.

Q. All right. This goes back to the general point we've already discussed I think, Mr Rozenberg, and I'm not going to get into that again.

As I've already indicated, and as Dr Rachkov has made clear, our case is that the default term would only become an essential term -- I'm not going to go into it. You know what my position is.

Can we look at what other default rules may apply to a partnership contract, and can we look, if you're still on page 15 of the joint memorandum, at paragraph 37, subparagraph 1. And here you agree that the Civil Code applies another default rule, namely the value of the parties' contributions will be deemed equal. But do you see that that is at Article 1042.2; do you see that at 37.1?

A. Yes.

Q. If we just look at paragraph 33 of the joint memorandum for the moment, at the bottom of the page, subparagraph

33(1)(b), you say that one matter which the agreement must define is:

"Evaluation or value of contributions (primarily if contributions comprise intangible assets, or services)."

So I think you're saying, are you, that a term on the evaluation of contributions is an essential term for which, under the Civil Code as it applied in 1996, there is a default rule, correct?

A. In what paragraph are you reading this?

Q. Paragraph 33(1)(b), you talk about how precisely the parties' contributions must be defined, and you say that the contributions must include:

"Evaluation or value of contributions..."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. And then if you go back to page 15, looking at 37(1), you say that:

"The value of the parties' contributions will be deemed equal ..."

My point to you is that there is a default rule which applies in those circumstances, that's reflected in your paragraph 37(1), is it not?

A. The law states that the contributions shall be deemed equal on value otherwise established by the agreement of the parties or by the concrete circumstances. This article was not in fact at the moment of 1995 agreement, but now it exists, I agree.

Q. Indeed.

A. And I indicated why I double-checked what counsel said.

I checked what in 33 was said because I indicate here that Mr Rozenberg maintains that the agreement as required by Russian courts must define.

Then just the following text, because it was based, for the '95 agreement, on the court's practice, but still Article 1042 was not in fact at the moment of '95 agreement.

Q. Mr Rozenberg, I wasn't trying to catch you out with Article 1042.2 and when it applied. It is a default rule under the Civil Code and, as I think I said, since the article has a number higher than 454 we know that it didn't apply in 1995?

A. Correct.

Q. In fact, it only applied from 1 March 1996, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And that then gives rise to this question, whether there was prior to this in 1995 any corresponding default rule here, correct? That is the issue?

That is the issue, isn't it, Mr Rozenberg? We know that Article 1042 is a default rule but that it only applied from March 1996. Now, the question is whether there was in 1995 a corresponding default rule, that is where you and Dr Rachkov disagree, is it not?

A. As far as I remember, we both agreed about the shares. It was not quite clear about the basis maybe for Mr Rachkov in his cross-examination, but my view is always that for the shares, the default rule was always 245 in the absence of any other default rules in the Fundamentals.

Q. Indeed, Mr Rozenberg, but we're not dealing with shares here, we're dealing with contributions, which is why we're looking at 1042.1, which only applies from March 1996. And there is an issue as to whether, notwithstanding that 1042.1 only applied from March 1996, there was nonetheless a default rule that would have applied in 1995, do you understand?

A. I remember that the only default rule which applied to the partnership agreement for shares and contributions was 245, and there was also Article 437, as far as I remember, of the old Civil Code regarding profits and losses. But I don't have under my hand the old Civil Code.

Q. All right.

Mr Rozenberg, I want to show you some materials which are relevant to the question as to whether there was a default rule in relation to contributions that applied prior to 1995 and therefore would have applied to the 1995 agreement.

One gets, I suggest, some assistance on this from some of the old books which deal with this issue and I want to show some of those to you. Can we start, please, by looking at what Professor Sukhanov said in his 1993 textbook. You will find that at G(A)7/1, tab 11. The English starts at page 99 G(A)7/1.11/99.

Let me ask you this about Professor Sukhanov, Mr Rozenberg. He is, is he not, another senior jurist who was one of the architects of the Civil Code, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. So let's just see what he says, page 99 in the English, and if you turn, please, to 98.001 G(A)7/1.11/98.001, just so that you can see that he is the author of chapter 46, which is what we're going to look at, as well as the editor of this book. Okay?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Rabinowitz, please may you identify for me the paragraph in the joint memo where the dispute between the parties in relation to the default rule, or the application of any default rule prior to 1996 is identified?

MR RABINOWITZ: Paragraph 54.2 G(A)6/1.01/18.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: 54.2, thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: It's a rather opaque reference to this, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That doesn't seem to me to be addressing it.

MR RABINOWITZ: I think the point came out of Dr Rachkov's evidence yesterday relating to the fact that there was this default rule. I think you'll recall I took him in re-examination to some of the materials.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, okay. So it's not actually addressed --

MR RABINOWITZ: It's not sufficiently clearly addressed in the joint memo for me to be able to point you to something which says very clearly that this is the issue.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, okay.

MR RABINOWITZ: I apologise for that.

Now, if you have 7/1 at page 98.001, I think I've already made this point with you, you see that Professor Sukhanov is the author of chapter 46 as well as the editor of this book, called "Civil Law in Two Volumes". Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. And if you go to page 100, please, do you see in the middle of the page the paragraph beginning "The participant", do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. He says this, and bear in mind obviously this is his 1993 book, Mr Rozenberg:

"The participant to the contract is allowed to provide any property as a contribution: cash funds, securities, goods, real estate or the rights to use it, items of intellectual creativity (patents, know how etc.). Moreover [he says], the participants' contributions are not obliged to be equal, although they are assumed to be so unless there is a special agreement to this effect."

Then he says:

"But in any event it is vital that they are precisely defined because this consequently defines the size of the share in the profits or losses."

So what Professor Sukhanov is saying is that the parties' obligations are not obliged to be equal although they are assumed to be so in the absence of special agreement, do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. And so, again, what Professor Sukhanov appears to be saying, is he not, as far back as 1993, is that there is a dispositive rule or a default rule by which the contributions of the parties are assumed to be equal. That is correct, is it not?

A. Unless there is a special agreement to this effect, yes.

Q. So you agree with me?

A. Yes.

Q. And then, just looking at the next paragraph,

Professor Sukhanov says as follows:

"The contribution of a participant of a partnership may also be expressed in terms of various services provided by the participant for the common objective, including labour and activities requiring special knowledge and so [on] and so forth. Because each participant is obliged to provide a defined property contribution for the common objectives, it is impossible for a situation to arise whereby one of the participants would be denied the receipt of a part of the profit, or on the contrary the imposition of a part of the losses."

Just focusing on the last sentence here, Professor Sukhanov appears to be saying that it is impossible for the situation to arise where one of the parties would be denied either the receipt of part of the profits or the imposition of part of the losses, and the reason is, is it not, of course, because the dispositive rule, the default rule of equality, will apply if the parties do not establish for themselves how they will share the profits and losses of their joint venture, do you agree?

- A. I understand of Professor Sukhanov whether it will be impossible for such a situation to arise, not because the default rule exists and assigns at least some share in the contributions to everybody, but simply because each participant is obliged to make contributions to provide some concrete property as a contribution. This is the sense of the statement.
- Q. Well, that's fine, but if they haven't agreed what the contribution -- what the value of their contribution is, then the dispositive rule will apply and the value of their contributions will be said to be equal. That's what Professor Sukhanov says in the first paragraph that we looked at?
- A. In the first paragraph, contributions are not obliged to be equal but they are assumed to be so unless there is an agreement, that's correct.
- Q. So that's the position from 1993.

And can we just very briefly see what the Soviet scholars said on this topic. If you've got bundle 7/1 there, can you go to tab 3, please. The English starts at page 18, it's a commentary of 1973 G(A)7/1.03/18, the Russian is at page 15 G(A)7/1.03/15.

You can see that the work, "Soviet Civil Law", you can see that the work is edited by Professor Krasavchikov, do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. If you turn to page 19, however, in the English, you can see that chapters 30, 34 and 44 were written by VF Yakovlev, do you see that?

A. VF Yakovlev.

Q. And this is right, isn't it, that he became Professor Yakovlev and he served as the distinguished chairman of the Supreme Arbitrazh Court between 1992 and 2005?

A. There is no such position, distinguished chairman. He was chairman of the Supreme Arbitrazh Court.

Q. He was chairman and he was distinguished, very well.

Can we just look at page 19.001 G(A)7/1.03/19.001.

I just want you to see that chapter 44 was written by Professor Yakovlev, it's the "Joint Activities" chapter, do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Okay. Now, let's just see what he says. If you look at page 21 G(A)7/1.03/21 in the English, and the heading is, if you're following in the Russian, "The duty of the participants in the contract."

A. 21, right?

Q. And this is dealing with joint activities contract, page 21.

A. Yes, I've found it.

Q. So he's dealing with joint activities contract, and this is what he says in relation to the duties of the participants in the contract:

"The [duties] of the participants in the contract consists in general of taking part in joint activities in order to achieve the business aim set by the contract. Specific participation in joint activities may consist of making contributions in cash or other property, performance of work in the field of production or organisation, covering the costs provided by the contract, [or] a combination of all or some of these forms of participation in [the] joint activities."

This is really in line with the point upon which you and Dr Rachkov agree, that contributions can either be property or work, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. Then in the next paragraph Yakovlev says this:

"The amount of the contribution of each of the participants in joint activities in property or in work is determined by agreement between the parties. If not otherwise established by agreement, the amount is assumed to be equal for all participants. If [the] property is transferred for the needs of [the] joint activities only for its use or operation, but not as the joint property of the participants in relations, the amount of the contribution is determined not by the value of the property but by the value of the service rendered."

So the author here, Yakovlev, is confirming that even under the 1964 Civil Code the dispositive rule, or the default rule, was that the amount of the contribution of each party was to be assumed equal, do you agree?

A. That's what I can read. I cannot find quickly this rule in 1964, but maybe --

Q. But that seems to be what he is saying?

A. That's what he is saying, yes.

Q. All right. My Lady, we started at --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That would be a convenient moment?

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. I'll take 15 minutes.

(11.28 am)

(A short break)

(11.47 am)

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Rozenberg, can we go to the joint memorandum again, at page 17, paragraph 50 this time G(A)6/1.01/17.

You see at paragraph 50 in the middle of the page, we see that it's agreed that:

"Where a partnership contract has been concluded, property contributed by the partners, and property emerging as a result of the joint activity, is common property unless otherwise provided by legislation or the parties' agreement."

It may just be worth seeing what you say about this in our fourth report. Can you go, please, to bundle G(A)3/1, tab 2, page 113 G(A)3/1.02/113.

Just looking at paragraphs 153 and 154, you say:

"Under Article 124 of the Fundamentals, monetary funds or other contributed property of the parties to the agreement, as well as property created or acquired as [a] result of their joint activity, shall be their common property.

"Similarly, pursuant to Article 1043 of the [Russian] Civil Code, contributions made by the partners to the joint activity, and property [created or] acquired ... as a result of [their] joint activity, is common property of the partners unless otherwise provided by statute or agreed."

I think I'm right in saying that the property created or acquired as a result of the joint activity, which is common property, includes profits and income for the joint activity, correct?

A. Fruit of revenues, as indicated in the law, yes.

Q. That's equivalent to profits and income.

A. Yes.

Q. Very good.

Now, just going back to the joint memorandum, bundle 6/1, page 17. Can we just look at paragraph 54 of that, please G(A)6/1.01/17.

Just looking at subparagraph 1 of paragraph 54, you see that:

"It is agreed that...

"Profits received by the partners as a result of the joint activity or from the use of common property are to be distributed proportionately to the value of the partners' contributions or, prior to 1 March 1996, their share in the common property unless [otherwise agreed]."

So profits and income are to be distributed proportionately, and let me just suggest this. So after 1 March 1996, when part 2 of the Civil Code came into force, they are to be distributed proportionately to the value of the parties' contributions. And prior to then, in 1995, they are to be distributed proportionately to the parties' share in the common property. Correct?

A. Yes.

Q. We know that the default rule for both contributions and common property is that the parties will share equally, the parties can agree upon another division but that is the default rule, we've seen that, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. So the position is, is it not, in 1995 and in the following years, the default rule is that profits and income are to be distributed equally unless the parties agree on a different share or division; that's right, isn't it?

A. It is correct.

Q. Thank you. Now, what I want to look at next is how precisely the contributions, activities and goals of the partners must be defined, and if you have the joint memorandum, can I ask you, please, to go back to page 12, paragraph 33, towards the bottom of page 12 G(A)6/1.01/12.

We see there that there is a dispute between you and Dr Rachkov as to how precisely the parties' contributions must be defined. At subparagraph 1 you refer to three matters which you say must be defined. At (a) you say:

"The amount or numeric characteristics of [the] contributions (where the contributions are to be not services, but countable things)".

Then at (b) you say:

"Evaluation or value of contributions (primarily if contributions comprise intangible assets or services)".

Then at (c) you say:

"The order, timing and process of their making [and that's the partners' making] of contributions (if they cannot be made simultaneously with [the] conclusion of [the] agreement)."

One can see from paragraph 33(2) that Dr Rachkov doesn't agree with you about these matters. Can you just read to yourself what he says. (Pause)

A. Yes.

Q. So Dr Rachkov accepts that the parties must agree how or what it is they will contribute, but he doesn't agree that they must define the order, timing and process by which they will do so. He also doesn't accept that they must define a value for their contributions; that's right, isn't it?

A. Right.

Q. Just looking at paragraph 34, page 13, we see that you and Dr Rachkov dispute how precisely the agreed activities must be defined. We see there is a reference back to the heading "Certainty of essential terms" so we know that this has to do with essential terms.

If we go back to page 8, just to remind ourselves of what you say about this, it's paragraph 21

G(A)6/1.01/8. You see that you and Dr Rachkov agree certain things about essential terms, and subparagraph 1 you agree that:

"The parties must [agree] the essential terms of the contract with sufficient certainty to define [their obligations]."

Correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And then subparagraph 2 you further agree that:

"The contract must impose an obligation, and under Article 307, an obligation must be to undertake (or to refrain from undertaking) a 'defined act'."

Yes?

Then in subparagraph 3, we see that you agree that a defined act may refer to a defined activity or a course of conduct, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Then you add this proviso, you say:

"... provided that, in Mr Rozenberg's view, in case of a dispute a court is able to establish what specific steps were envisaged under such obligation."

Then just looking at subparagraph 4, we see that you and Dr Rachkov agree that:

"The agreement must define the obligation with sufficient certainty such that it is objectively ascertainable (and a court can adjudicate) whether the obligation has been complied with."

A. Yes.

Q. Okay. And looking then at paragraph 22, just following this through to paragraph 22, still on page 8, we see that:

"It is disputed whether the joint activity or simple partnership agreement in particular must set out (or make it possible to identify) prescribed steps or specified acts that the parties are required to perform as an essential term of a joint activity agreement."

And in subparagraph 1 you state your position and you say this:

"Mr Rozenberg maintains that this is necessary, although if the steps that the parties are required to take can be derived from the nature of the activity that they are obliged to perform, then it is unnecessary to spell them out. However, where those specific steps are not clear from the nature of the activity ([that is] a description of a skill or service without particular steps), they must be expressly identified."

Just to make sure I understand what you're saying, Mr Rozenberg, you are saying I think this. First, that the contract may provide for the parties to pursue a defined activity or course of conduct, and the specific steps which the parties are required to take need not be spelled out, provided that those steps would in any event be clear from the nature of the agreed activity, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. But you say that where those specific steps are not clear from the nature of the agreed activity, and you give the example of a description of a skill or service without particular steps, then you say the specific steps must be expressly identified in the agreement, is that right?

A. Right.

Q. And I think you also say, and I have in mind what you said at paragraph 33(1)(c) at page 13, that the agreement must therefore expressly identify the order, timing and process by which the parties are to make their efforts, is that what you say?

A. Yes.

Q. Again, can we just look at the way you put this in your report. If you go to G(A)3/1, tab 2, your fourth report, page 153 G(A)3/1.02/153, it's paragraph 300(a). We see that you say in the first sentence, dealing with the question of whether there was an agreement as to contributions, you say:

"As to Mr Berezovsky's supposed contribution, an agreement to 'lobby' or to 'raise finance' is not, in my view, sufficient."

Then you carry on and you say this:

"Mr Rachkov concedes (as he must) that if there was a valid agreement and the Claimant failed to perform his contribution, he would be liable in damages pursuant to Article 15 of the... Civil Code."

In fact I'm not sure that is what Dr Rachkov is saying but that doesn't matter for present purposes.

But just going on with what you have to say in this paragraph, you say in the last three sentences:

"But it would be impossible for a court to assess damages in relation to such an obligation; it is not sufficiently objectively definable. In addition, it goes without saying that such an obligation could never be specifically enforced. Consequently, it was not sufficiently precise to form the subject matter of a binding agreement."

Can we just take this in stages, Mr Rozenberg. In the first sentence, you say that damages could never be assessed in relation to an obligation to lobby or to arrange finance, correct?

A. For a court it looks like an impossible task to define, in the monetary form, damages in case of failure to perform such obligation.

Q. All right. So I think what I suggested to you was correct.

Then in the second sentence, you are saying that such obligations could never be specifically enforced, that's right, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. So what you then say in your third sentence is that consequently such obligations are not sufficiently precise to form the subject matter of a binding agreement, is that a fair summary of your view?

A. Yes.

Q. And we see that you elaborate on this earlier in your report, in fact if you go back to page 148, paragraph 277 G(A)3/1.02/148, you see the paragraph beginning "Clearly":

"Clearly, the purported obligations of Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili could not have been enforced through the Russian judicial system; the court could not bind Mr Berezovsky to use his 'connections' to ensure privatisation of Sibneft for his own benefit through the issuance of the August Decree or oblige Mr Patarkatsishvili to invoke his business contacts to achieve the agreed goal. It is impossible to determine an objective standard by which the performance of such obligations could be measured or damages for any non-performance assessed."

So a further point I think you are making here, and it's the last sentence, is that it is impossible to determine an objective standard by which performance of an agreement to lobby could be measured; is that what you're saying?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, you deal with the same point, if we can just briefly look at it here, in your second report, that's bundle J2/5, tab 37 at page 131, paragraph 74, please J2/5.37/131. Do you have that? Paragraph 74.

If we just pick that up --

A. I'm afraid in this report I cannot find paragraph 74.

Q. Are you behind tab 37, page 131? (Pause)

So what you say, I'm just picking it up in the middle of that paragraph:

"Clearly, the obligations of Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili could not have been enforced through the judicial system (the court could not bind Mr Berezovsky to use his high level connections to ensure privatisation of Sibneft through the issuance of the respective Decree or rule that Mr Patarkatsishvili hold his business contacts to achieve the said goal), which additionally proves absence of any legal meaning thereof."

In paragraph 75 you say:

"Therefore, it is clear that the contributions of Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili would not be recognised as legally meaningful under Russian law, and, as such, they cannot recall within the categories mentioned in Article 1042 of the ... Civil Code regulating contributions to the joint activity agreement, namely 'money, other property, professional and other knowledge, skills and expertise, and also business reputation and business contracts'."

I think there is a typo in paragraph 75, that should presumably say "business contacts" rather than "business contracts"?

A. Of course, business contacts.

Q. Then in paragraph 76, I think you summarise your view, you say:

"To summarise, the alleged 1995 Agreement did not and could not give rise to any enforceable obligations between the parties and, therefore, as a matter of Russian law, it could have no legal nature and/or force, and could not possibly give rise to [the] joint activity agreement under Russian law."

To sum up what you're saying, Mr Rozenberg, it is, is it not, at least on this point, that an agreement to lobby or to raise finance is not legally meaningful and cannot be a contribution to a partnership contract because, you make three points, you say first it is impossible to identify precisely how the agreement should be performed, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And then you say, secondly, the obligation could not be specifically enforced if the promissor refuses to make their agreed contribution, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And third, you say it's impossible to determine an objective standard by which the performance of such agreement could be measured, that's your third reason, correct?

A. It's impossible to assess, to evaluate the amount of damages if they are not performed, that's correct. In addition, later, I also specified some important points regarding contribution in the form of lobbying services because again such contribution cannot get any protection in the court in case of dispute.

Q. Yes, I was about to show you that. If you go to page 149, I think in the same report, paragraph 123 J2/5.37/149, you see you say:

"In the doctrinal view of Russian ... law, 'service is a means to satisfy individual need of a person, which is connected with non-material result of the performer's actions, permitted by current law and order, on a paid basis'."

Then you say this:

"Under Russian civil law services which go beyond the framework permitted by the law (such as the services of a paid killer, to give an extreme example) or services which do not have civil law contents (such as the services of, say, a fortune teller) may not be subject to legislative regulation applicable to civil law services..."

Yes? That's what you say?

A. Yes, yes, and the next, mm-hmm.

Q. I certainly do not disagree with you that a paid killer is not entitled to be paid for his services, but can we look at your suggestion that a fortune teller would not be entitled to payment for, let's assume it's her services.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That's a sexist assumption, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: We'll make it his services then. I could make some other assumptions about that which wouldn't, no doubt, go down well.

Let's take the fortune teller, shall we, Mr Rozenberg, because I have some difficulty with your suggestion that a fortune teller or indeed a lobbyist or a person who arranges finance is not entitled to payment for their services. Again, I wonder if we can test this with a hypothetical example.

- A. About the person who arranges finance, I didn't say this. I indicated that since it was absolutely unclear what kind of raising finance would be performed, this specific obligation is unenforceable. And also I didn't indicate that it's contrary to law, like in case with lobbying services.
- Q. All right, we'll come to those points, but let's just deal with the fortune teller. Let us suppose that a fortune teller agrees to tell my fortune in return for £10. He is to tell me my fortune and then I am to pay him £10. Okay?
- A. Okay.
- Q. If the fortune teller breaks his promise and refuses to tell me my fortune, I can quite see that it may be impossible to identify what fortune he would have told me and that I may be unable to show that I've suffered any particular damage from his failure to tell me my fortune. I can see that it may, in those circumstances, be difficult or impossible for me to obtain a court order compelling him to tell me my fortune. I can see all of that, Mr Rozenberg. But the position is quite different, is it not, where the fortune teller has in fact told me my fortune, yes?
- A. What is the question? You paid -- in the first situation you paid money and the fortune teller received money and didn't tell you anything.

Q. And in that situation, where he doesn't tell me anything, I can quite see it would be difficult to go to court and get an order compelling him to tell me my fortune.

A. No, it's clear, at least under Russian law, it's necessary to go to the police and it's a fraud and you will get the money.

Q. I'm sure that's so.

But the position is different, is it not, Mr Rozenberg, where the fortune teller has in fact told me my fortune.

A. Right.

Q. Yes?

A. Yes.

Q. Because once the fortune --

A. But "yes" doesn't mean the end of the story. The position is different, and then what?

Q. Let's just see if it's different, or how it's different.

Once the fortune teller has told me my fortune then I would suggest that I would become obliged to pay him the agreed price of £10, do you agree?

A. This is the problem with Russia. If you voluntarily pay money to the fortune teller it's fine, nobody will be prosecuted. But if you refuse, then the fortune teller will have problem because his or her services will not be recognised as obtaining court protection in Russian courts, and he or she will stay without money.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I suspect fortune tellers get their money upfront, don't you?

MR RABINOWITZ: They may well do that, my Lady. I've never used him or her.

A. Moreover, in the worst case scenario, if the court will see that it's done on a systematic basis then there may be some troubles for the fortune teller, but it's another story.

Q. Let's take a different example because fortune tellers are obviously treated specially.

Let's take a different activity. Let's take a situation in which you meet me and you say to me "I hear you have an interesting life, I will give you £10 if you tell me your story, your life story", okay? Now, again, before the contract is performed it may be difficult for anyone to ascertain what that story will be, but let's assume that, in fact, I do tell you my story, it may not be as interesting as you hoped, but I do tell you that story, and I then want the £10 from you.

Do you say in those circumstances that a Russian court would have any difficulty in saying, "The contract has been performed, you have to pay the £10"?

- A. As far as I understand, it's something like agreement either to prepare some kind of memoirs or to give an interview or to prepare something else for publication, I see nothing wrong here.
- Q. And that would be so even if you had no idea what my telling you that story was going to involve, whether that was going to be a long story or a short story, you had no idea what the content of that story was going to be?
- A. It's the same like obligations to build something in your courtyard or to do some other work. Of course ideally the agreement should specify everything to get court protection later in case of problems, but it depends on the concrete case. If nothing were specified, he will face problems obviously in the court.
- Q. You see, I suggest to you, Mr Rozenberg, that activities like that, whether it be story-telling or indeed lobbying, and I understand your other objections to lobbying, or arranging finance, certainly once they have been performed they are capable of constituting the subject matter of a contract and giving rise to a contractual payment obligation, do you agree or not?
- A. Some payment obligations, if it was agreed with sufficient certainty, yes. But if it was as vague as you described, just an interview or some recollections without any specification, then chances are high that such agreement will be considered as non-concluded.

Q. Well, what I'm suggesting to you is this, Mr Rozenberg, that in order for an agreement to be performed, and to give rise to binding payment obligations, it is not necessary that it should have been possible at the outset to identify the specific steps that the parties were required to take, at least with any greater precision than "You will tell me my (sic) story" or "You will do the lobbying" or "You will arrange finance"?

A. It depends, it's impossible to make such general conclusion because otherwise we will come to a strange result that, for example, interview in one sentence, "I had a wonderful life", period. And then the request to be paid would be sufficient and enforceable. Everything depends on concrete circumstances.

But ideally, the more precise your agreement is the higher your chances are for obtaining court protection in case of dispute. If everything is performed, everything goes without problems, it's fine and we all understand the court will not be involved. But if you anticipate that there may be problems, then ideally you go to a lawyer and prepare a comprehensive and very clear agreement.

Q. I think, just picking up on what you said, I think you accept that if everything is performed and there is no dispute about the fact that it has been performed, then that will get the protection of the Russian law, correct?

A. I said that if everything was agreed without dispute and performed without dispute, and all the parties are happy, then there is no basis for the involvement of the court. But whether everything was legal or not quite, it's an additional question like with the fortune teller.

Q. All right, that's very helpful.

Can we just look at one or two authorities on this. Can I ask you, please, to go to bundle G(A)4/5 at tab 36 G(A)4/5.36/125.

At tab 36, Mr Rozenberg, you I hope have informational letter number 48 of the Presidium of the Supreme Arbitrazh Court. I think this is exhibited to your fourth report. The English is at page 125, I think the Russian starts at page 127 if you prefer to see it in the Russian.

A. Yes, of course.

Q. Again I think you agreed that information letters of this kind play an important role in the understanding and interpretation of Russian law?

A. Yes.

Q. So can we just look at what this letter says. It's entitled, "On certain issues of judicial practice arising when disputes are considered relating to contracts for the provision of legal services".

If you look at section 1:

"In accordance with section 779 of the ... Civil Code under a contract for the paid provision of services the contractor undertakes on the instructions of the client to provide services (perform certain actions or conduct certain activities), while the client undertakes to pay for those services."

Then if you look at the next paragraph:

"In considering disputes it is necessary to proceed from the fact that the said contract may be deemed concluded if it lists specific actions that the contractor is obliged to perform, or indicates the specific activities which he is obliged to conduct."

So the Presidium is saying, is it not, that a contract for services may be deemed concluded if it either lists specific actions that the contractor is obliged to perform or it indicates specific activities that he is obliged to conduct. Do you agree?

A. Yes.

Q. And then looking at the next sentence of the same paragraph:

"In cases where the scope of the contract is defined by an indication of a specific activity, the range of possible actions by the contractor may be determined on the basis of negotiations that preceded the conclusion of the contract and correspondence, established practice in the mutual relations between parties, normal... practice, subsequent conduct of the parties, etc."

Perhaps we can just break down what the Presidium seems to be saying here. Firstly saying that the contract may be deemed concluded if it indicates a specific activity to be performed, even if that activity may be performed in a range of possible ways, do you agree?

A. Yes.

Q. Second, it is saying that the range of possible actions can be determined on the basis of prior negotiation or discussions, or established practices, or normal business practices, or the subsequent conduct of the parties. Again, I take it you agree with that?

A. Yes, there is even a reference to the appropriate article of the Civil Code. Hard to argue about.

Q. Now, the existence of a range of possible actions shows that it may be a matter of judgment for the service provider to choose from within that range which specific steps to take. That is true, is it not?

A. It's true, but it's clear from this letter that if still actions and terms are not sufficiently defined, it may be up to the court to decide what had to be done.

Q. Well, indeed, but you'll accept at least this, that the range -- the existence of a range of possible actions shows that it may be a matter of judgment for the service provider to choose from within that range which specific steps to take? (Pause)

Isn't that obvious, Mr Rozenberg?

A. For me not quite clear. Could you please indicate what concrete words state this?

Q. I'm not saying the words state this; I'm saying it follows from what they've said.

The existence of a range of possible actions, which is what they're contemplating here as a contract involving, shows that it may be a matter of judgment for the service provider to choose from within that range of possible actions what specific steps to take. You may be engaging a person in the sort of activity where there are a range of ways in which he can deal with it and it's a matter of judgment as to what way he chooses to deal with what you've engaged him to do?

A. I think if it's more or less standard activity, some more or less standard services for a customer, it doesn't matter what concrete steps a lawyer would choose, even in preparation for litigation, for example. But if it really matters, and something unusual is anticipated, I think both parties should agree what concrete steps shall be taken, shall be chosen, to avoid any misunderstandings and, in the worst case scenario, court dispute in the future.

Q. Indeed, I was actually going to give you that very example.

If you engage a lawyer to appear for you, to argue your cause in some matter to try to get you a particular result, you don't have to specify in advance exactly what it is you say he should do in order to get that cause, which witnesses to call, which evidence he should adduce. You leave it to him, having engaged him to conduct that activity, to choose within the range of activities what exactly he will do in order to get you what you want. Correct?

A. Yes. In general, yes.

Q. Now, can we then look at section 2 of this letter, towards the bottom of page 125, and the first sentence says:

"According to section 781 paragraph 1 of the ... Civil Code, a client is obliged to pay for the services provided him within [the] deadlines and in accordance with the procedure indicated in the contract."

Then the next paragraph:

"In considering disputes relating to payment for legal services rendered in accordance with a contract, arbitrazh courts must be guided by the provisions of section 779 of the ... Civil Code, according to which a contractor may be deemed to have properly fulfilled his obligations in performing the actions... indicated in the contract."

So the Presidium is saying here that in the context of disputes of a payment for legal services, the court should be guided by this provision of the Code under which the contractor is to be deemed to have properly fulfilled his obligations if he's performed the activities indicated in the contract, that's right, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. So again, Mr Rozenberg, the question for the court is whether the contractor has done what he promised, do you agree?

A. It's up to the court.

Q. Indeed, it is up to the court so I think you are agreeing. The court must decide whether the contractor has done what he promised, correct?

A. Right.

Q. Then in the next sentence the Presidium says:

"At the same time one should proceed from the fact that refusal by a client to pay for services actually provided to him is prohibited."

A. Right.

Q. So where services have been provided they must be paid for appears to be what they are saying, correct?

A. Yes, presuming that of course there were no violations of the agreement of the service provider.

Q. Indeed, and presumably they were the contracted-for services?

A. Right.

Q. If we then look at the next paragraph at the bottom of the page and on to page 126:

"At the same time [the] contractor's claim for payment of remuneration should not be allowed if the claimant bases said claim on a contract term making the payment amount for services dependent on a judgment by a court or government body which is to be arrived at in [the] future."

So what the Presidium seems to be saying here is that the contractor can't include a contract term which makes his fee dependent on a judgment by a court or government body which is obviously to be arrived at in the future, correct?

- A. Just any claims regarding favourable court or governmental decisions are not enforceable in courts, correct.
- Q. And what it appears to be prohibiting here are legal success fees, correct?
- A. It's not only legal success fees, because other state authorities are mentioned. Therefore I understand, and according to this paragraph, it's not only legal services fees, just any contracts which put the remuneration in connection with favourable decisions, either of courts or other state authorities, are legally meaningless.
- Q. You may say that, Mr Rozenberg, and indeed you do say that about Makayev, but it's perfectly plain that this is an information letter on certain issues of judicial practice arising when disputes are considered relating to contracts for the provision of legal services. That is what this is about, is it not?
- A. This is the heading, but this paragraph does not mention legal fees and clearly indicates that any claims connected with favourable decisions of state authorities will not get court protection. This particular paragraph doesn't mention legal fees. Sometimes it happens the main issue considered here are legal -- payments for legal services, but the last paragraph is a little bit broader.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Could I ask you this, an agreement with an architect that he will get paid a contingency fee in the event that the local authority gives planning permission, is that illegal under this provision?

A. As I understand, it's illegal.

MR RABINOWITZ: I suggest to you, Mr Rozenberg, that is completely wrong and we will deal with that when we get to Makayev. I'm going to suggest to you that you have expanded Makayev out of all natural proportions but we will come to that when we get to Makayev.

A. Just to avoid any misunderstanding, I understood your question, my Lady, that the remuneration of architect, we leave aside his professional work as architect, will depend directly on the favourable decision of local authorities regarding some construction issues.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I have an agreement with an architect to build my house, I have a fixed fee of $50,000 plus a percentage increase in the event that the planning permission is favourably granted by the local authority or the planning authority.

A. Still generally I confirm my question only with just specification. It's entirely at the discretion of the local authorities or simply there is some provision, regulation that if the architect prepared everything correctly, then such licence or approval shall automatically be done?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, let's say it's --

A. It's a discretion --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: -- putting up blocks of flats on green belt or something like that so it's a discretionary --

A. Discretionary. This is the key point because the same -- like in an agreement between a construction company and a person who will allegedly contribute their licence to carry out construction in the centre of the city, for example, and again it's at the discretion of the mayor's office, it's not automatically done if the project is very good, then again such terms which connect the remuneration with favourable decision which is at the discretion of the governmental authorities will be illegal.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see, thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: You're introducing discretion into your answer there, Mr Rozenberg, "Discretion. [That's] the key point". But do you say there is a basis for that in Makayev? Where's the discretion in Makayev? You're dealing with a case which is simply the application of the law.

A. First of all I use the word "favourable" but "favourable" means based on connected with favour which is discretionary. You may do favour to somebody or you may deny favour, and this is discretionary because there are some functions of governmental authorities which, using legal terminology, should not be unreasonably denied if you prepare all the documents correctly. You have to get your new passport if your old passport expires, for example, and there are some organisations which carry out clerical work, collecting necessary papers, doing paperwork and submitting later all the papers to the governmental authorities in order to get the passport, which practically automatically will be issued.

Or in order sometimes to do the -- to give approval for let's say just replenification of your apartment, there are some regulations. You want, instead of let's say three rooms, to have two rooms. Again, in the past, it was sometimes discretionary. Now there are certain regulations and it's clear that it cannot be considered as favourable decision and, therefore, organisations preparing all necessary paperwork are entitled to get payment just for their work, not for the favourable decision but for their work because, if the work is done properly, then their approval shall be done automatically. The same to some extent just may apply to companies which prepare documents for obtaining visas in foreign embassies.

MR SUMPTION: Can I just point out that there's a rather important missed type in the [draft] transcript at 84, line 11 which might be better sorted out at this stage than later. The last word on line 11 I do not think is what the witness said but perhaps that can be clarified.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you look at it, please, Mr Rozenberg, line 11 of [draft] 84.

A. "... cannot be considered as favourable decision..."
"... will be illegal".

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Rozenberg, we'll come to Makayev in due course but while we're on this document, let me ask you this. Makayev is a case, at least on its face, dealing with legal services as indeed is the informational letter. It's right, isn't it, that you haven't been able to identify a single case outside of the legal services area to support your contention that any contract which involves a success fee being paid in order to achieve a particular result, take the example of the architect, is prohibited as a matter of Russian law?

A. I don't think there are many cases because, frankly, in such situations participants of these transactions or arrangements -- they are mostly called this way in Russia -- never go to courts because they understand that instead of civil law matter they may have to deal with the criminal law matter.

- Q. Why, Mr Rozenberg? Take my Lady's example of the architect who gets a slightly enhanced fee if, as a result of his activities, there is planning permission granted for a particular part of what he's going to do. Why should he be worried about the criminal law, just because of such a contract?
- A. Because when it's done on the basis of discretion, a party, the service provider, who would like to have such arrangement, will probably expect -- unfortunately, my Lady, I have to guess but I'm trying to explain why there are so few cases of this kind in courts. So the person who insists on including such provision in the agreement expects that discretionary decisions of governmental authorities will always be in his or her favour. Unfortunately, taking into account the widespread corruption, especially in the construction area in our country, just there is a serious reason to anticipate that somebody among governmental authorities is expected to help this architect if he or she is so confident that all discretionary decisions will always be favourable, because otherwise it doesn't make sense for him to include this provision.

Again, this is very(?) commonplace, I would say, in a country where unfortunately corruption is not exception. Therefore, cases when some remuneration depends on favourable decisions are extremely, extremely rare, I would say. It's not the situation when parties would like to go to courts.

- Q. You seem to be suggesting that the only time anyone would ever include a fee which provides a benefit for having achieved a particular result is where they have some corrupt intention in mind. Might it equally not be possible, Mr Rozenberg, that such an arrangement would be made in circumstances where the service provider knows that he will have to do a great deal of work to achieve a particular result and that, if that result is achieved, it will be of enormous benefit to his client? No corruption at all.
- A. It's better to concrete -- just concrete cases. I was asked first why such cases are very rare and indeed, in my practice, I can hardly remember any civil law agreement where parties would like to have a clause which would put remuneration in dependence of a favourable decision of governmental or court authorities. Let's put the court aside, of course, it's the success fee and in general in law firms it's not greeted(?) but --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm not understanding you. If you could just look back at [draft] page 88, lines 8 and following. You say, "I can hardly remember any civil law agreement where parties would like to have a clause...", can you just explain what you mean by the following lines from 12 onwards?

A. Well, a clause which would put remuneration in dependence, making remuneration dependent on a favourable decision of governmental authorities.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So you're saying you've not come across --

A. No.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: -- agreements where there is a provision for a success fee or a contingency fee dependent on a favourable decision by government authority?

A. By governmental authorities, yes, correct. Therefore I have serious reason to anticipate that, in the absence of corruption, if parties understand that it's impossible to predict whether decision will be favourable or not favourable, they never include such clauses since the key point for remuneration is performance of work and performance of work -- due performance of work does not depend on the favourable or unfavourable decision of authorities.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I suppose it's possible, if they did have such an agreement with their architect, they wouldn't put it in a written agreement anyway?

A. They could put it in the written agreement, but if everything goes well, just of course it's possible to pay; but in case of dispute, such clause would never be enforced and it's, by the way, one of the reasons why nobody does it. But another reason, as I said, because mostly parties understand very well what is the basis for remuneration, good work or good connections with favourable -- with appropriate people, let's say, in governmental authorities.

MR RABINOWITZ: We'll come to deal with what Makayev says.

But just on the information letter which we have open at the moment, can I just ask you this: the Presidium in this letter is not prohibiting lawyers, or indeed anyone else, from recovering fixed fees which are due regardless of a case, that is correct, is it not? Regardless of the outcome of the case?

A. Of course legal work, like any other work, shall be paid.

Q. Shall be paid?

A. Shall be paid.

Q. So I think you're agreeing with me?

A. Perform legal services shall be paid, nothing to discuss as I understand.

- Q. And there's nothing wrong with charging a fixed fee regardless of the outcome?
- A. A fixed fee for the work?
- Q. Yes.
- A. Regardless of the outcome.
- Q. Yes.
- A. Of course and what is dealt with, I think it's clear.
- Q. The reason -- Mr Rozenberg, there's a difference between saying work shall be paid for, and saying that the work shall be paid for by reference to a fixed fee. Do you follow? It could be an hourly rate, in which case there wouldn't be a fixed fee, but there is nothing here in this information letter, I think you will agree with this, where the Presidium says you cannot agree a fixed fee in respect of work which will be payable regardless of the result of the case?
- A. Fixed fee is not prohibited in this case, like in any other services agreement.
- Q. Good, thank you.

Just lastly on this, can we look at page 126 G(A)4/5.36/126. We just see -- I don't think I need to bother with that. We can put this away.

I want to go back, if we can, just to talk about the question of certainty of contract, and I want to consider a hypothetical example again with you, if I may. Let us suppose that Mr B agrees with Mr A that in return for a fixed fee he would lobby the state to create and privatise a company that would own shares or assets in a state enterprise, the energy enterprise, okay? So what they agree is lobbying in return for a fixed fee, all right?

Mr B doesn't guarantee that his lobbying will succeed, he promises to try and persuade the state to do what they want, and he was to be paid this fixed fee regardless of whether his efforts succeeded. And let us assume, because I don't want this to be clouded by other things, that it was written down and it was intended to be binding and it was entirely certain.

Let me ask you this: do you agree that this would be a concluded contract under which Mr B agreed to perform a defined activity lobbying the state for a defined purpose?

- A. As far as I remember, lobbying is not indicated in legislation -- in legislative acts. Usually what we understand is some activity connected with drafting legislation, organising publications, proposing some changes in legislation, and it has some general aspect. It's not connected with one concrete decision because, with one concrete decision, it's unclear what concrete work shall be done.

Services, when they are legal, when we do not speak about using personal connections in order to get quick and easy favourable decision of governmental authorities, services mean concrete work, there should be some substance. If in order to achieve some goals including, let's say, privatisation, it's necessary to prepare some kind of draft legislation, draft regulation, maybe to organise some meetings, conferences, discussions, publications, to persuade people who later either make pressure, or just somehow contribute to adaption of changes in the legislation. Then these kind of services, if you call them lobbying, would be perfectly legal, but if you speak about finding the right person who will arrange the favourable decision for a concrete amount of money, then in my view still it will be illegal(?), but maybe you didn't explain all the details of the work which is anticipated to be performed. Because I think the key point here is what concrete work will be done under the label of services, ie lobbying services.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Do you have political lobbyists in Russia?

A. We don't.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You don't?

A. We don't.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So for example if you had a, I don't know, grain and food trades association, who wanted to lobby for a change in an act of parliament, would they be at liberty to pay somebody to talk to politicians, to publish in the newspaper the need for a change to some law?

A. As I said, we don't have regulations regarding this. When I said we don't, I mean we do not have official legal forums for it. In practice, of course there are groups, social groups, industrial groups who try to promote favourable changes in legislation --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And presumably they're paying someone to do that, aren't they?

A. Just, again, if somebody carries out publications, organises meetings, conferences, these payments are perfectly legal. But, of course, again there is financing of political parties by oligarchs, for example, and then it sometimes becomes questionable.

But there is no legal basis regulating such activity, therefore I had to answer your question, my Lady, whether we have political lobbyists, it's not an activity which have concrete legal forums, like for example lawyers' activity or advertisement agencies' activities and so on.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see, thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: Dr Rachkov says, as you know I think,

Mr Rozenberg, that there are political lobbying firms in Russia, as indeed there were in 1995. Do you recall him saying that, paragraph 217 of his fourth report?

A. I read that Mr Rachkov mentioned lobbying firms which do concrete work, but I don't want to argue about words.

I understand that there is no legal basis for activity of individuals who achieve favourable political decisions or favourable political changes.

Q. You see, what you agreed with me about the information letter was that there was nothing there which prevented a fixed fee being paid regardless of the result, do you remember that?

A. Yes.

Q. And the example I've put to you is of Mr B agreeing to be paid a fixed fee regardless of the result of his lobbying activity. Do you follow?

A. I do.

Q. So do you agree that you could have a concluded contract under which Mr B agreed to perform a defined activity, lobbying, for a defined purpose? Because I think you gave a long answer but I'm not sure you actually answered my question.

A. I guess to answer your question we have to have real substance of the services, because lobbying does not specify, does not define anything in the context of Russian existing legislation.

Q. Well, you say in the context of Russian existing legislation, and it may be that you're referring here to contracts which are named in the Civil Code, is that what you're referring to? That there is no named contract of lobbying in the Civil Code?

A. This is included too.

Q. Yes, because you accepted, I think, in the joint memorandum that the fact that a contract is named or unnamed doesn't mean that it can't -- sorry. The fact that a contract is an unnamed contract doesn't make it any the less a contract, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. So the fact that you don't have legislation specifically identifying lobbying as an activity is really neither here nor there?

A. It's important because in the absence of any legal definitions you have to specify sufficiently what kind of work the service provider is expected to do. Because if we write that it will be legal services, it's clear, transportation service, it's clear. If you write lobbying services, it needs to be clarified.

Q. It needs to be clarified because there are a range of possible activities that could be carried out, correct?

- A. It should be clarified in the range, I would say, the volume of activity which is expected to be paid under the label "lobbying services" should be determined.
- Q. We saw earlier from the authority that I've just taken you to that it is perfectly possible to have an activity specified in an agreement where there is a range of ways in which that activity could be carried out. Do you remember that?
- A. And we both agreed that the court will assess whether it should be remunerated.
- Q. Indeed, the court will assess it. But the mere fact that there is a range of ways in which this activity could be carried out doesn't make it a non-contract, do you agree?
- A. I understand that you speak about enforceable contracts, because a contract may be unenforceable, and in order to have an enforceable contract for lobbying services it should be crystal clear what kind of services shall be provided and on what basis they will be paid.
- Q. Now, assume for the purposes of this hypothetical example that Mr B in fact carried out certain activities, okay, so that it was possible for a court objectively to determine whether Mr B in fact performed his side of the bargain.

- A. Theoretically we can assume it, and I think I gave examples of lobbying activity which may be subject of a civil law contract, like drafting new legislation, organising publications, meeting and conferences and so on. Such type of services, such type of works which should be paid on the basis of a contract within the agreed amount are not illegal.
- Q. In a situation like that, the court would be able to decide whether Mr B has actually lobbied the state as he had agreed he would?
- A. I think the correct answer would be not whether Mr B lobbied the state but whether Mr B performed the services connected -- just indicated in the agreement, ie drafting legislation, organising publications, meetings, conferences and so on. Then it would be possible for the court to assess the evidence available.
- Q. Very good. It's also possible, I think you would agree, in a situation like the one I've described in my example, that there may in fact be no dispute about the matter. That's to say that Mr A may accept that Mr B did what he promised and that the result was in fact achieved.
- A. If there is no dispute then there is no need to go to the court.
- Q. I think also that you will accept that the public policy prohibition against success fees that we see in the information letter, and indeed as we see in Makayev, would certainly not apply to the example I've given you where the fee was a defined fee and it was agreed to be payable whether or not the activity succeeded?

A. If there were only services and not some use of personal connections to achieve certain results, definitely it would not contradict the public policy.

Q. All right. Now so far we've considered examples, in this hypothetical example, of a contract for services when the fee is fixed, okay? But, of course, the parties may agree another form of quid pro quo, the parties may agree that the person providing the services should not be paid a fixed fee but should instead share in the fruits of the services, yes?

A. Provider of services will share in the fruit of the services. It will be a complicated scheme but preliminarily I see nothing wrong here.

Q. Nothing wrong with that. Thank you for that, that is very helpful.

Can you just give me one moment, Mr Rozenberg, please. (Pause)

Now, I want, if I can, next to just pick up something that you say in your fourth report at paragraph 333, G(A)3/1 at tab 2 G(A)3/1.02/162. It's page 162. You say at paragraph 333:

"As I have explained above, there are some circumstances in which Russian courts have held that, although a joint activity agreement would have been considered non-concluded at its inception, the fact that the parties have performed that agreement without demur prevents them from arguing that they should not be bound by the agreement."

Then in paragraph 334 you say that the principle does not apply in this case. And we will look later at the reasons that you give.

Can we just turn back in this report to page 105, please, paragraph 125. Here you point out what Dr Rachkov says, and you say:

"Mr Rachkov contends that where the parties have performed the contract without dispute, Russian courts have confirmed that the contract will be deemed concluded regardless of whether the original agreement omitted essential terms, or was too vague or insufficiently defined."

In the next paragraph you say this:

"I accept that where it can be demonstrated that a contract has been fully performed, the documentary evidence of its performance may be taken into consideration by a Russian court when assessing whether a contract is or is not concluded. I therefore accept the validity of the principles espoused in Babenko ... Zhilischnik ... and Sokolniki. In my view those cases were [rightly] decided."

I wonder if we could just have a look at Babenko to see exactly what it is deciding. Could you please go to bundle G(A)2/2, tab 29.

So the English starts at page 61 and if you look at the second paragraph, you can see what the claim was about G(A)2/2.29/61:

"Sole trader NF Babenko ... applied to [the] arbitrazh court with a claim against sole traders ... Chebatkov, ... Ryagin, ... Volvich, [and] ... Gorbov for a voidance of joint activity agreement of 1 [February] 2006."

Then in the third paragraph, we see that third parties, the Federal Tax Service of Russia and a Mr Antonyan were invited to take part in the case. Do you see that?

A. Mr Antonyan was participate -- yes.

Q. In the fourth paragraph we see it says:

"By the decision of 24 [March] 2008, upheld by the Court of Appeal ruling of 3 [July] 2008, the claim was dismissed."

In effect what was happening was that Babenko was trying to get a joint activity agreement declared as non-concluded and he succeeded in the lower court. Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Sorry, he failed in the lower court, I'm sorry. They upheld the joint activity contract.

A. In the first and appellate courts, the claim was dismissed.

Q. So Babenko failed.

Then we see that the court says this:

"The reason for the decisions was that the agreement had been performed from the time of its execution, and no uncertainties had arisen for the parties as to the scope of the agreement in the course of its performance. Sole traders [usually] made their contributions, and there is not dispute as to the type, size of the contribution and terms of profit allocation. There are no grounds for [the] voidance of the agreement."

So this is right, isn't it, the reason for the decision of the lower courts was, as you see, that the agreement had been performed and that, at that time, there were no disputes which had arisen as to that performance, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. Then in the next paragraph, we see that Mr Babenko appealed and he said that the parties had not agreed the essential terms, translated here as "substantial terms".

You see:

"In his cassation appeal ... Babenko ... is asking to reverse the decision and the appeals court ruling, and issue a new court decision satisfying the claim. The appellant notes that [the] contents of the agreement do not amount to a simple partnership agreement which in law gives grounds to a joint property. The intended joint activity and joint obligations cannot be identified from the terms of the agreement. Neither the scope of activity nor actions required to achieve the intended goal are identified. Agreement of 1 [February] 2006 does not contain substantial terms [I suggest that is essential terms] related to [the] size and features of contributions by simple partnership members, or to joint property, terms of profit allocation, terms of administration of the joint business of the partners."

So he was saying, was he not, that a number of what he said were essential terms had not been sufficiently agreed, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Then at the top of page 62 G(A)2/2.29/62, we see in the last sentence of that top paragraph that Mr Babenko also said that:

"Cash payments, as per debit slips, to ... Babenko and other members were made on the basis of independent freight transportation agreements, not a simple partnership agreement."

Do you see that? So there were payments which had been made and Babenko were saying: these payments reflect not a simple partnership but rather the fact that people were being paid for independent freight transportation agreements. Do you see that?

A. I want to check it in Russian to be sure that the translation is correct. (Pause)

Babenko claimed that the basis for payments were independent agreements of transportation but not the simple partnership.

Q. Indeed. So in this sense at least bearing a similarity to this case, payments were being made, there was a dispute as to really whether the payments reflected the fact that there was a partnership or whether they reflected in fact simply a different arrangement at all, namely independent transportation agreements. Do you agree?

A. Yes.

Q. Yes. And then two paragraphs further down, we see that the Federal Tax Service opposed Babenko's appeal; in other words the Federal Tax Service considered that Babenko's partnership contract was a fully concluded contract?

- A. In Russian, I see that the Federal Tax Service considers that the decision of the court of first instance and of the appellate court are legal and justified and asks(?) not to cancel them.

MR RABINOWITZ: Yes, I think you're agreeing with what I put to you.

Now, in order to see -- my Lady, I'm about to go to -- it's not a convenient moment but it will take too long to get to a convenient moment.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay, I'll rise now and sit again at 2 o'clock. Thank you very much.

You mustn't talk to anybody about your evidence over the break.

THE WITNESS: I know.

(12.58 pm)

(The short adjournment)

(2.00 pm)

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Rozenberg, we were dealing with Babenko which I hope you still have open, 2/2 G(A)2/2.29/62.

A. Yes.

Q. I think we had just had a look at the top of page 62, where one sees that Mr Babenko was disputing whether the payments he received were made pursuant to a joint activity agreement, and he was claiming they were on the basis of an independent freight transportation agreement.

In the middle of page 62, you see it says this:

"North Caucasus Circuit Federal Arbitrazh Court, having considered the case, arguments of the cassation appeal, having heard the persons involved in the case, believes that the appeal cannot be upheld for the following reasons."

In the next paragraph the court summarises the terms of the joint activity agreement. As you see it says:

"As shown by the materials in the case, on 1 [February] 2006 the parties executed a joint activity agreement whereas members of simple partnership undertook to join efforts and act jointly to achieve common business goals -- transportation of freight to Krasnodar Krai."

Krasnodar Krai is Krasnodar province, is that the right?

A. Krasnodar region.

Q. Just carrying on with the same paragraph:

"The same of the simple partnership -- SV Chebatkov ST. According to paragraph 1.3 of the agreement the partnership is set up for the term of 2 years. The agreement is valid from the time of its execution until 1 [February] 2008 ... According to paragraph 2.1 of the agreement members of the partnership undertake to contribute cash and other assets to support its activities."

So it appears from the last sentence that the parties are to contribute cash and other assets to support the partnership contract. It does not appear from this at least, Mr Rozenberg, that the partnership contract defined the parties' contributions any more precisely than that, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. So just looking at this, the contract did not for example define the amount of the contributions or the size or value or order, timing and process by which they were to be made, or at least the federal court did not consider these matters to be relevant or material, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. If we look then at the next paragraph, towards the bottom of page 62, we see that the court says:

"NF Babenko ST, believing that this simple partnership agreement is void, filed a claim to arbitrazh court. In his claim Babenko referred to the vagueness of the scope of the agreement, absence of terms related to types, times and terms of contributions, lack of certainty as to the common purpose of the partnership."

Those, of course, are very similar to the objections that you make in your reports about the contract in this case, Mr Rozenberg, correct?

A. Not quite.

Q. Okay.

A. The big difference is that in this case the court referred first to the agreement in writing which was executed in February 2006, and indicated that during two years this agreement in writing was performed in a way which makes impossible to dispute the performance as Mr Babenko does, because there are documents confirming that all activity, joint activity, took place and the payments were done with the reference to the agreement of February 2006, what makes allegations of Mr Babenko that performance really did not correspond to the agreement baseless.

In other words, two main points are indicated here. The agreement in writing, which is rather clear, and the payments with reference to this agreement. In other words, the performance is done according to the agreement and cannot be disputed anymore. In this situation, even the issue of contributions which were not specified enough has nothing to do with allegations of Mr Babenko that payments were different in comparison with the agreement. This is the difference.

- Q. All right, well we'll see if that really is a difference in this case, Mr Rozenberg.

The point I was really putting to you at the moment was about the vagueness scope of the agreement, absence of terms related to types, time and terms of contributions. I'm not suggesting that's the only point you make about the 1995 agreement, but this is similar to the point you make about vagueness of terms. You say in this case some of the terms were too vague, it didn't specify types, times and terms of contributions, et cetera. That is all I was trying to put to you here. Do you follow?

- A. I did, but if there were not written evidence in the case of Babenko, maybe the vagueness would be fatal as well. It's hard to guess.
- Q. We will see that in fact the agreement in Babenko wasn't clear as to why the contributions were being made, that is why there was a dispute as to whether those payments were being made because of an independent freight agreement or because of a simple partnership, do you follow?
- A. In the case of Babenko, after two years of performance which could not be put in question, because written evidence confirmed even the monetary transfers, just exactly in accordance with the agreement and written reference to this agreement.

In this situation -- I can show you that in Russian just it's indicated that in the payment orders on the basis on which Chebatkov paid the correspondent portion of the profit as basis for the payment is indicated the agreement of February 2006.

- Q. It wasn't only written agreements. The court also took into account, you can see this at page 63 G(A)2/2.29/63, the explanations provided by the partners. It took into account all of these matters in trying to work out what it was that the agreement was about, whether it was a simple partnership agreement or in fact an independent transportation agreement that led to these payments being made.
- A. It's the obligation of the court to assess all the evidence available, including --
- Q. Indeed.
- A. -- explanations of the parties.
- Q. Indeed, and it did that. And despite the fact that there was a potential ambiguity, having taken into account all of the evidence, it concluded that there was a binding agreement here, a simple partnership, correct?
- A. According to the civil legislation, some ambiguity can be sometimes fixed on the basis of the investigation in the court of the performance if this performance is not questioned in -- is not disputed.

Q. Indeed.

A. As I understand, the conclusion of the court here is that this vagueness could not affect the final resolution because it was clear that during two years everything was performed strictly in accordance with the agreement, and during these two years there were no disagreements.

Q. That was in fact very much the point I was going to make to you, Mr Rozenberg. Because what we have here is a case where, on its face, you have an agreement which is vague as to the scope of the agreement, there are terms which are absent, and the court says, "Well, given that it has been performed, and it's been performed for a period of two years, none of these points are of any relevance at all." I don't want to overstate it, none of those points is sufficient to treat this contract as an invalid contract. Do you agree that is what this case says?

A. That is what the court said.

Q. Just on the point about what it was that the court took into account, if you for example look at page 63, you can see that the court says on page 63:

"The courts established also that documents disclosed in the case [and then there's a list of documents] (debit slips, cash book statements, invoices, explanations by sole traders...)"

The explanations by sole traders that are referred to there related to the explanations that had been given to the tax authorities previously, do you recollect that?

- A. Just in this sentence, the court states that it took into account both explanations by sole traders and tax audit materials.
- Q. Yes, but in fact some of the explanations by the traders that they're taking into account were explanations that had been given to the tax authorities when they first investigated; that's right, isn't it?
- A. Apparently, yes. I didn't have a chance to look at the materials of the case.
- Q. Just looking at the next paragraph, if you're on page 63:

"Having established from explanations provided by the partners and payment documentation that the sole traders had contributed their vehicles and their labour to the simple partnership, and that during performance of the agreement... no disputes about type and size of contributions, terms of allocation of profit from joint activities had had arisen between the parties, the courts correctly concluded that there were no grounds for avoidance of the disputed agreement, and rightly dismissed the claim."

So this is an illustration, is it not, that where you have a contract which is actually performed with no disputes at the time as to what needs to be done, one can't later come along and say, "Well, that is an invalid contract because you didn't agree sufficiently some term or other," correct?

A. More important that not only you did agree sufficiently because, according to the allegations of the claimant, it was not sufficiently agreed, but more important that when the court considers the case there is sufficient evidence that it was performed according to the agreement as it was concluded.

Q. But provided the court is satisfied that it was performed, the fact that at the outset there were gaps doesn't matter, in the sense that it's not a sufficient basis to treat the contract as an invalid contract.

A. Sometimes, when it's relatively simple and the numerous documental evidence confirms the performance, I agree with you.

Q. All right. Thank you very much.

Now, I want to move on to the next question which is whether what the parties agreed was valid. We've dealt with certainty, and this is going to deal with the issue of lobbying.

I would like to start with your view that, quite apart from certainty, lobbying cannot ever be a valid contribution to a partnership agreement.

We touched on this this morning, and we've looked at information letter number 48, but I want, if I may, to look at the analogy you draw between that situation and the present case.

Can we begin by looking at how this is dealt with in the joint memorandum. It's G(A)6/1, tab 1, page 13, we're looking at paragraph 35 G(A)6/1.01/13.

A. Yes.

Q. In subparagraph 1(a) you say, it's the first sentence:

"Mr Rozenberg maintains that lobbying is not capable of being a contribution under a joint activity agreement protected by Russian law as this transpires from the position of the RF Constitutional Court, which provides that those who lobby may not claim remuneration for doing so which depends on a favourable government decision, as such remuneration will not be subject to civil law protection."

This is a reference, is it not, to Makayev, correct? That's the Constitutional Court decision that you're referring to?

A. Yes.

Q. Before we go to Makayev, which we will do, I just want to explore a little further what you say here.

Could we please go to paragraph 306 of your fourth report, bundle G(A)3, tab 2, page 155 G(A)3/1.02/155. If you have paragraph 306 there, just looking at the first sentence you say this:

"Finally, a contribution to a joint activity agreement may, of course, consist in utilising business contacts (subject to the comments I made earlier about vagueness)."

So here you were accepting that, subject to your point about vagueness, using business contacts can be a valid contribution to a partnership contract, correct?

A. Just the whole paragraph I think deserves to be read.

Q. I will go through the whole paragraph, I just want to take it bit by bit, if I may.

A. Yes.

Q. So do you agree that you accept here, subject to your point about vagueness, that using business contacts can be a valid contribution to a partnership contract?

A. I agree, I confirm.

Q. Just looking at the second sentence, you say:

"I disagree, however, that lobbying services are capable of being such a contribution under Russian law."

Then in the next sentence you say:

"It has been held that a party who rendered services the remuneration for which depended on a favourable governmental decision (in that case a success fee arrangement for lawyers was considered) may not claim any compensation for these services under Russian... law. This is the conclusion of the..."

And that's Makayev again, is it not?

A. Correct.

Q. Then you set out a paragraph from Makayev which you say expresses the Constitutional Court's conclusion in that case, and you can read that to yourself, if you will.

(Pause)

A. Okay, we read it yesterday.

Q. All right. So let me be clear that I'm going to suggest that this is not in fact the actual conclusion of the Constitutional Court at all. We will look at Makayev, but the actual conclusion that the court reached was that the current law prohibiting legal success fees, that is information letter number 48, is constitutional.

Do you accept that?

A. Where Constitutional Court ruled that the activity of governmental officials represent execution of people's will and is not subject to civil law regulation, and therefore civil law contracts, which make dependent civil law rights and obligations on favourable decisions of governmental officials, including courts, cannot get court protection. In other words, it's a clear statement of the court that a situation when money or some material benefits follow the favourable decision of governmental authorities, cannot be considered as legal and subject to court protection. It's a clear fight against corruption and I cannot add anything.

Q. The only point I was trying to make to you, Mr Rozenberg, is this: you suggest that this is the conclusion of the Constitutional Court, and what I'm suggesting to you is the conclusion of the Constitutional Court is much narrower. The conclusion of the Constitutional Court -- this may have been part of its reasoning, but the conclusion of the Constitutional Court was that the current law prohibiting legal success fees, and that is information letter number 48, is constitutional.

A. First of all, let's make clear that if we try to interpret somehow the Arbitrazh Court decision as contradicting the Constitutional Court ruling, under Russian law decisions of Constitutional Court are highest legal value. Strictly speaking, even decisions of the Parliament can be put in doubt by the Constitutional Court.

And of course the Supreme Arbitrazh Court cannot, on the rule, cannot prevail in case of disagreements, though I don't see any disagreement by the way, but just in case, if you do, if you'll find any disagreement between the Supreme Arbitrazh Court and the Constitutional Court, then according to the law on Constitutional Court, my Lady, the decisions of the Constitutional Court of the Russian Federation have the highest legal force regarding all individuals, governmental and other authorities and organisations in the Russian Federation. Therefore, whether we can interpret this way or that way, the decision of the Supreme Arbitrazh Court is irrelevant.

However, how I understood the decision of the Supreme Arbitrazh Court is that it doesn't mean that the parties cannot agree between themselves about the terms, and in any event, their fees for legal services shall be awarded. But the Supreme Arbitrazh Court never ruled that courts should uphold claims for additional compensation for success in litigation. And, moreover, I notice that even the Arbitrazh Court decision, besides courts, governmental officials were also indicated, like in the reasoning of the Constitutional Court.

Therefore, I am sorry if we spent so much time on it, but my position is firm and clear that monetary remuneration or other material benefits in civil law agreements cannot depend on the favourable decisions of governmental authorities. And only one of the cases which may take place in real life regarding these circumstances is the success fee arrangements between lawyers and clients. But both the Constitutional Court and Supreme Arbitrazh Court ruled much broader, in my view, that works and services shall be paid, but additional remuneration dependent on the success in courts or success in governmental offices has no legal protection in courts and otherwise.

Q. Mr Rozenberg, that was a very long answer to a question I don't think I asked. I wasn't beginning to suggest that the Supreme Arbitrazh Court and the Constitutional Court decisions were inconsistent, in fact I was suggesting that they were inconsistent (sic).

But actually all I was making was a very narrow point, maybe not even one worth making, which is that you have expressed this as the conclusion of the Constitutional Court, whereas I say it is not the conclusion of the Constitutional Court. The conclusion -- it's part of its reasoning, I'm not disputing that, but you have taken one paragraph of reasoning in isolation from the rest of the judgment and put it in your report and called it the conclusion. That is what you have done, and I think you've commented on that already.

What I would like to do, however, is just take you to a passage of the judgment of Judge Bondar in Makayev itself where he comments on the approach that you have taken to this.

If we can go to Makayev, it's bundle G(A)4/7, tab 93 at page 8 G(A)4/7.93/8. Now, Judge Bondar was one of the judges who decided with the majority of the Constitutional Court, so he's not a dissenting judge, but he wanted to issue a side opinion expressing his own view. You can see at page 8 he says:

"Having voted for the final conclusion [of the] Constitutional Court..."

Do you see that?

A. Yes. I prefer to look at it in Russian.

Q. All right, I'm sure.

If you go to page 9 G(A)4/7.093/9 Judge Bondar expresses his separate reasoning. And just looking at the bottom of page 9, do you see he says -- perhaps we should pick it up from the paragraph before:

"Before we proceed to analyse the above issues that bears upon the true content and significance of the conclusions reached in the Resolution with respect to 'success fees', the following should be noted. One may not discern the true meaning of this -- or any other -- Resolution of the Constitutional Court of the Russian Federation without considering the fact that any decision by the Constitutional Court is a unified, wholesome act of constitutional justice whose inner structure and content are predicated upon the logic of constitutional and legal arguments of essence to successful assessment of specific legal norms contested in particular cases; taken together, they determine the final conclusions that form the core of any decision of the case."

Then he says this:

"Consequently, it would be a mistake to interpret the legal position stipulated in the Resolution as a mere sum total of separate statements or raise each of these statements to the level of an independent legal position of the Constitutional Court."

What Judge Bondar is saying is that it is a mistake to take a separate passage made in the reasoning and elevate it to the level of an independent legal position of the court. Would you agree that that's what he's saying?

- A. I think that reading the following sentences is the idea that Mr Bondar doesn't object against the reasoning in general, but simply states that absolute prohibition against success fees may be questionable.

But, by the way, success fees is the trigger for the consideration of the whole issue and -- though in the opinion of Mr Bondar has no legal consequences because the majority clearly ruled in favour of the resolution. And moreover, Judge Gadzhiyev even emphasised stronger the importance of such approach in light of necessity, broadly speaking, to fight against corruption.

But what Mr Bondar says is I think understandable, that total prohibition of success fee maybe is too strong approach. I would like to state that, in my view, it's probably the softest situation regarding dependence of material remuneration in civil law contracts on favourable decisions because, clearly, success fee follow professional efforts, are connected with professional art of those who perform services. And very often we can assume that it's the result of work and clearly has nothing to do with using of personal connections and so on. But even in this situation, the Constitutional Court preferred to be more severe than maybe from the point of view of equity and fairness, one should think, and apparently Mr Bondar thinks this way.

Still the Constitutional Court considered that in order to fight clearly against corruption and regarding success fees, it's necessary to be very strong and severe.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Rozenberg, it would help me if your answers were a bit shorter, I know it's difficult when you're discussing legal concepts, but if you could kind of peg your answers to the questions I'd be grateful.

A. I will shorten it immediately. I'm sorry, simply I was asked so many times about this decision, therefore since before lunch we already discussed it I thought that I have to answer it.

MR RABINOWITZ: At the moment I'm just asking about Judge Bondar.

A. But very shortly I can say that regarding other governmental officials who are mentioned both -- other governmental authorities, besides courts, mentioned both in the Constitutional Court decision and in the Supreme Arbitrazh Court, it's absolutely clear that with decisions in such cases, professional efforts usually have nothing to do with the results and, therefore, application of this decision is rarely(?) substantiated and necessary in light of the explanation of the Constitutional Court.

Q. Judge Bondar was the presiding judge in this Constitutional Court, was he not?

- A. Frankly I did not pay much attention to it --
- Q. You can see that if you go to page 1.
- A. -- but it happens sometimes that the presiding judge only has dissenting opinion.
- Q. He's not dissenting, Mr Rozenberg, he is with the majority but he wants to make it clear that people do not take this case out of context. He makes it clear in the first part of his judgment, beginning at page 8, he says:
- "Having voted for the final conclusion ..."
- He wants to say something. Do you see that?
- A. I think that the necessity not to take out of context is reasonable, and what is the question to me?
- Q. You accept that it's reasonable. He's specifically warning in the context of this case that you shouldn't take reasons out of context and elevate them to the status of a legal principle, and that is what I suggest you have done here.
- A. My understanding is that it's connected with absolute prohibition against success fees.
- Q. Well, maybe it is connected with that, and that is what he's concerned should not be understood by this judgment, because he doesn't want it to be elevated outside of the context in which he's dealing with it.
- A. Is that a question?

Q. Well, I think I've got your answer to that question, but if you want to respond to that don't let me stop you, if you can make it short.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Rozenberg, are you saying that his statements here about the fact that there may be circumstances in which success fees are acceptable is limited to success fees in legal cases?

A. That's what -- how I read it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

MR RABINOWITZ: So in a case, Mr Rozenberg, let's see if we can understand that. In a case specifically concerned about success fees relating to legal services, you say Judge Bondar warns against elevating this to a principle which prohibits success fees in legal cases, but you say he wasn't saying anything about the possibility of elevating success fees in a context not before the court, that is to say in the context of any other governmental decision; is that what you say we should understand Judge Bondar as saying?

MR SUMPTION: Maybe the witness should be invited to read the whole of that eight-line question.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Could you read the question, please, Mr Rozenberg, on the screen.

A. "So in a case, Mr Rozenberg, let's see if we can understand that. In a case --"

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think it might be easier,
Mr Rabinowitz, if you break the question down.

MR RABINOWITZ: I will do that.

Your answer to my Lady's question, Mr Rozenberg, appears to suggest that when Judge Bondar warns against extending the principles in this case too far, what he is warning against is extending the principles of this case to all legal success fees. Is that what you're saying?

A. Again I understand that I cannot take too much time of the court, but I understand the conclusion of Mr Bondar as the following G(A)4/7.93/10:

"Therefore, in and of itself (ie, by the letter of
it) the final conclusion made by the Constitutional Court does not preclude the use in Russian legal system of alternative regulatory models for paying legal fees that do not directly follow from yet are not excluded by the constitution of the Russian Federation."

Therefore my view is -- maybe I am wrong and I have to study this opinion again, my view is that it is only regarding legal fees in the legal system, it is not regarding favourable decisions of other governmental authorities.

Q. So you're saying that whilst he's qualifying this prohibition in relation to legal services, he is not qualifying it in relation to any other services involving any other governmental decision. Is that what you're saying?

- A. My understanding, though it doesn't mean that I agree with Mr Bondar, but my understanding that he was concerned that this resolution, though he doesn't argue about the reasoning, may affect alternative methods of payments of legal fees which have some justification in his view.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can I just be clear, as I understand it, you're saying that the decision of the majority extends or is not limited to the illegality of contingent legal fees but extends to other fees which are dependent upon the decisions of state authorities?

- A. Yes, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But so far as what Judge Bondar is saying about his concern that this case shouldn't be taken out of context, you're saying that his concerns are only addressed at contingency legal fees?

- A. Yes, absolutely correct.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: Right. Thank you for that.

Now, this point that you make here is not a point that you raised in the reports you submitted in the strike-out in 2008 and 2009, is it, Mr Rozenberg?

- A. What I remember in my report, I was emphasising the decision, and the principle that favourable decisions are not covered by civil law regulations. I try to be very short, we already spent so much time. But correct me if I'm wrong, I thought it was clear from the report.
- Q. I think in this report it's clear. My point is this is not a point you had previously taken until this report, but I'm not going to spend --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Rabinowitz, do we really need to go back and make the point? You can make the point in submission if you think it takes me further.

MR RABINOWITZ: All right. I think we have Makayev in front of us, I'm not sure I need to go through the detail of this with you, Mr Rozenberg, but let me just be very clear on what I am going to submit. I am going to submit that it is abundantly clear from the reasoning of the Constitutional Court in this case that it was dealing with a specific context, that is to say legal services, and that what the court was concerned about was the public policy relating to access to legal services. Do you follow?

- A. I do, but I disagree.
- Q. I understand that you disagree. What I am also going to be submitting is that it is clear from every other passage in this report -- and I don't want to take up time going through it because the court has gone through this -- that there was a specific focus in this case on legal services, and that the specific focus on legal services is simply inconsistent with the way in which you say we should interpret this case. But you disagree with that?

A. Unfortunately I have to disagree because all such cases considered by the Constitutional Court are initially connected with concrete facts and circumstances. But decisions of the Constitutional Court are usually much broader, and this is the case, because the trigger was the issue of success fees in representation of clients by lawyers, and the result was the conclusion applying to any remuneration following favourable governmental decisions.

Q. What I do want to show you in Makayev is just another passage from Judge Bondar which you can see if you go, please, to page 12 under point 2.3 of Judge Bondar's opinion. So G(A)4/7, [tab 93], page 12
G(A)4/7.093/12. It's point 2.3.

Judge Bondar is dealing here with the ability of federal legislators, if they wish, to legislate for implementing some form of contingency fees, which he plainly thinks they can do.

If you then go to the paragraph which begins "This conclusion", do you see that paragraph?

A. Yes.

Q. He says:

"This conclusion is also corroborated by the fact that in the case under review the Constitutional Court set about to verify constitutionality of 'success fees' from the standpoint of a particular agreement subject to civil law, namely, a commercial service agreement, and therefore, the legal opinion stipulated in the Resolution can hardly be considered universal and apply to all possible types of civil agreements for legal services or the entire scope of appropriate [regulations] in the society in general."

Do you see that, Mr Rozenberg? Second paragraph from the end of page 12.

A. Yes, I can read it.

Q. So you have Judge Bondar here expressly confirming his view that the decision in Makayev is limited to success fees in legal services contract, and:

"... can hardly be considered universal and apply to [other] possible types of civil agreements for legal services or [to other types of contract] in general."

A. In the first place, even Judge Bondar put the legal services, and speaking about entire scope, I don't see that he mentioned specifically governmental officials.

It's a very broad statement and probably there is some reasoning here, I don't want to argue, but my view is that still we have to follow the resolution adapted by the majority of judges.

Q. You see, Mr Rozenberg, I suggest that this contradicts your view that Makayev can be applied by analogy to partnership contracts involving neither legal services nor success fees, but you presumably do not agree with me?

A. Of course I do not agree because for theoretical analysis it's interesting to read the opinion of Judge Bondar, but, as lawyers, we have to analyse only the resolution of the Constitutional Court.

Q. Okay, now we can leave Makayev and legal success fees. Can you go next, please, to bundle G(A)7/1 at tab 9. At tab 9 you should, I hope, have the decision of the Supreme Arbitrazh Court in the case of Kitoi, do you have that?

A. Yes.

Q. The Russian begins at page 87 G(A)7/1.09/87 and the English at page 89 G(A)7/1.09/89.

You can see from the top of this report that this decision, Kitoi, was decided on 9 December 2009, so nearly three years after Makayev. Makayev was decided on 23 January 2007, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. So on page 89, just looking at the third paragraph, we see that the claim was by Kitoi, LLC Kitoi, against Mr Bukhaev for a declaration of ownership of 60 per cent of an uncompleted extension to a shop in the city of Ulan-Ude, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Then in the next paragraph, immediately below the words "The Court established", we see that:

"The claim was upheld by [three levels of lower court]."

Do you see that?

A. Three courts, yes.

Q. Then just picking this up about three quarters of the way down the page you see that the Supreme Arbitrazh Court says this:

"Having studied the arguments in the appeal and the judgments in the case, the judicial panel of the Supreme Arbitrazh Court concluded that the case should not be referred to the Presidium of the Supreme Arbitrazh Court due to lack of grounds for supervisory review..."

So what it appears is happening here is that the judicial panel of the Supreme Arbitrazh Court is refusing permission to appeal to the Presidium and is in effect upholding the lower court's decision which granted Kitoi's claim, correct?

A. Yes, it's a very widespread situation, they mostly reject such petitions, and it's very rare when the Supreme Arbitrazh Court takes the case for reconsideration.

Q. Right. We can see what the facts of the case are if you look at the next paragraph:

"When examining the case, the courts established that a simple partnership contract was concluded between Kitoi and Bukhaev on 27 April 2007, [according to] which they undertook to [pool] their contributions and act jointly in order to build the 'Extension [to] the Kedr Shop' and also agreed that the facilities built as a result of their activities be deemed to be in [joint] shared ownership: Bukhaev to hold a 2/5 stake and Kitoi to hold a 3/5 stake in the [joint] shared ownership of the facilities."

So what was happening here was the parties made a partnership contract. What they agreed to do was to act jointly to build an extension to I think it's a Kedr shop, and they agreed that they would hold it in agreed shares, Bukhaev was to have 40 per cent and Kitoi 60 per cent, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. If you go to the bottom paragraph on that page, you can see that the court sets out the terms of the contract, clauses 1.2.1 and 1.2.2 of the contract:

"... the parties indicated that Bukhaev's contribution would be: the right to lease a plot of land with a designated cadastral number for the construction of the facilities, design estimate documentation for the facilities, drafted at his expense, and the necessary arrangements and technical conditions, and Kitoi's contribution would be: obtaining formal permissions for the construction --"

Mr Rozenberg, can you just push your mic up a little bit.

"... Kitoi's contribution would be: obtaining formal permissions for the construction of the facilities and its commission into operation, and the construction of the facilities at Kitoi's own expense and using [his] own materials."

So it's clear from that that Kitoi's contribution, as you see, was to be obtaining of formal permissions, and there were two permissions, first for the construction of the facilities and then for their commission into operation, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. And the formal permissions that Kitoi was to obtain would be governmental, would they not?

A. They would be issued by some state officials.

Q. Yes.

Then in the next paragraph on page 90

G(A)7/1.09/90 the court says:

"During the examination of the case no evidence was presented to indicate that [the above] contract between the parties had been [adjudged] illegal or invalid or terminated in accordance with due legal process."

Then in the next paragraph it says:

"On 11 July 2008, Bukhaev registered his ownership rights to the uncompleted and disputed facilities."

Now, it may be worth, if we can, just going to the lower court judgment to see what Bukhaev had to present to register his ownership rights.

In bundle G(A)7/1 can you go, please, to tab 19. At tab 19 you see the first instance decision in Kitoi, the English starts at page 174 G(A)7/1.19/174.

Then if you turn to page 177 G(A)7/1.19/177 you can see just below the middle of the page the following, you see the paragraph beginning:

"From the explanations of the representative of the third party ..."

A. Yes.

Q. "... the Directorate of the Federal Registration Service for the Republic of Buryatia, it follows that State registration of the right of ownership of the incomplete construction work took place on the grounds of the documents produced by ... Bukhaev: the decision of the Property Management Committee of Ulan-Ude on making [the plot] available on lease, the lease contract ... the construction permit ... the project documentation for the work and the technical passport of the 15 April 2008."

So what one sees from that is that Bukhaev, when he registered his ownership, he presented a construction permit dated 22 April 2008, do you see that?

A. Yes, yes.

Q. And so it seems likely, does it not, that Kitoi actually performed its promise and obtained the construction permit, correct?

A. Yes, but I understand that it's just routine paperwork in rather big volume which is subject, of course, to evaluation. And I mentioned earlier that some work in preparation of passports, visas, other documentation, which mostly is not discretionary because here we don't see any competition between Kitoi and some other applicants regarding formal registration or formal documents concerning construction work. I see no inconsistency with the public order in this case.

Q. Well, it was always possible that the permission would be refused, Mr Rozenberg, that must be a possibility?

If you need permission and you have to apply for it, that must be a possibility?

- A. It looks like in this case it would be refused if documentation is not prepared properly. It's not the situation when the mayor decides whether to give this plot of land to this applicant or to that applicant.

I frankly see here no favourable governmental decisions which could be issued this way or that way, like in court disputes for example.

- Q. Well, Mr Rozenberg, the favourable government decision here was the grant of the permit, and plainly it was a permit which could be refused, correct?

- A. Theoretically visas can be refused and passports can be refused, but if all documents are prepared properly usually it doesn't happen. And I understand here the situation is more important whether it's discretionary or not, and it looks like it's not discretionary, to issue the permit if construction is prepared according to the existing regulations.

- Q. But the point you make about it being clear that he would get what he wanted, the same could be made for a legal case, Mr Rozenberg. You could have a case in front of the court where, as long as you turn up with the right documents, you will get the order that you want if the law is applied. But on your interpretation of Makayev, you can't have a legal success fee even for that sort of arrangement, isn't that right?

- A. I understood even the opinion of Judge Bondar in a different way, it mostly applies not decisions which are absolutely clear, because if there is practically nothing in the dispute, and I can hardly imagine why Commercial Court would consider something which is crystal clear, as you say, there is always some discretion. But in Bondar case, the key point is that Judge Bondar considered that it may depend on professional level of performance of services, but --
- Q. You see, Mr Rozenberg -- sorry, I don't want to interrupt you. Carry on.
- A. To make it short, I think it's clear that the meaning of the Constitutional Court decision is fight against corruption. If you see that it's a routine documentation which has to go through a registration process then there is no basis for application of this Constitutional Court decision.
- Q. You see, Mr Rozenberg, what I suggest is that you appreciate that Kitoi, decided three years after the Constitutional Court case Makayev, is completely inconsistent with your interpretation of what Makayev represents because, if you are right about what Makayev represents, and it extended, for example, to the contribution that one is making towards a partnership, Kitoi could never have been decided in the way that it was.

Do you want to comment on that?

- A. I'm afraid we were already told that it's better to be short here, and again I can only say that in this case I say my indication that it was a favourable governmental decision which could be issued in a different way, because what is the basis to reject the proper documentation submitted for construction permit?

If I fill out properly all documents for the new driver's licence, of course it's the governmental official's decision, but there is no basis to reject the petition. And in such situations, in my view, the Constitutional Court's decision is not applicable.

- Q. But you could have corruption even in a situation like that, Mr Rozenberg, you could have someone who, for whatever reason, doesn't want a Kedr shop built there, and they pay a government official to refuse it. There might be opposition.

This case is not saying: well, it depends on whether there's any opposition to it; it's saying there is nothing wrong with this being a contribution to the partnership.

A. As far as I can see, this issue was not even the focus of the court dispute regarding Makayev.

Q. Can we just go back to the Supreme Court decision in Makayev at G7/1 tab 9, page 90 G(A)7/1.09/90.

We saw I think that Mr Bukhaev had registered the Kedr extension in his own name without telling the registration service about the partnership contract. So what was happening in this claim was that Kitoi was suing for recognition of its 60 per cent share in the Kedr extension, do you remember that?

So what I want to show you, Mr Rozenberg, is what the court says at page 90 happened in the lower court. You see it says:

"The first instance court concluded that there were grounds to recognise a 3/5 stake of the joint shared ownership of the uncompleted facilities in favour of Kitoi on the basis of the terms of the contract concluded between the parties on 27 April 2007 and the circumstances of the case which the court established, concerning the performance by the parties to this contract of their obligations. Those terms correspond to the provision of Article 7.3 of [a law on investment activities in RSFSR], which defines the rights of joint ownership of the subjects to an investment process in uncompleted facilities."

Then the next paragraph:

"According to the terms of the contract, after the facilities are commissioned, the facilities are to be apportioned and the actual floor space to be allocated today each of the parties is to be determined, taking account of their respective contributions. An analysis of the arguments in the application for supervisory review revealed that they do not establish the grounds provided for by Article 304 of the... Code."

So what happened here, Mr Rozenberg, was that Kitoi obtained the construction permit and commenced construction. While the construction was still underway, Mr Bukhaev registered the uncompleted building in his sole ownership, and Kitoi's claim was for recognition of its 60 per cent share in the uncompleted building. And that claim was granted because the partnership contract was valid and because the law of 1991 permits ownership of uncompleted property under construction. Do you agree?

A. And the court indicated it as the basis for the judgment.

Q. Yes.

A. Yes, I agree.

Q. And so -- I don't need to deal with that, I've put that point to you already I think. All right, I've already suggested to you that Kitoi is inconsistent with what you say Makayev says and I'm not going to go back to that.

I want to consider next with you the concept of a silent partnership. Can I ask you, please, to go to bundle G(A)7/1, tab 22 at page 225 G(A)7/1.22/225. If you're at page 225, on the bottom of the left-hand side, going over to the top of the right-hand side, you should have Article 1054.

A. Yes, "Silent Partnership".

Q. That's right. Can we just see what it says:

"A contract of simple partnership may provide that its existence will not be revealed to third persons (a silent partnership). The rules provided by the present Chapter on the contract of simple partnership shall be applied to such a contract, unless otherwise provided by the present Article or follows from the nature of the silent partnership."

So, at least from 1 March 1996, it was possible to agree that a partnership contract would be kept silent from the third parties. That's right, isn't it?

A. After March 1996.

Q. Yes. Do you agree?

A. Yes, I agree.

Q. All right. And then just looking at subparagraph 2, do you see it says:

"In relations with third [parties], each of the participants in the silent partnership shall be liable with all his property for [the] transaction that is he [concludes] in his name [and] in the common interests of the partners".

Then subparagraph 3:

"In relations between partners, obligations that have arisen in the process of their joint activity shall be considered common."

This is right, isn't it, where a silent partnership is agreed, each partner is liable to third parties for transactions concluded in his name and the common interest, but obligations are common as between partners and must therefore be shared as between partners?

A. Is it a question?

Q. Yes. Do you agree with that? Where a silent partnership is agreed, each partner is liable to third parties for transactions concluded in his name in the common interest, but obligations are common as between partners and must therefore be shared as between partners.

A. That's what the law says.

Q. So you agree. And the concept of a silent partnership suggests, does it not, that the shares may be registered in the name of one partner who may owe obligations towards the silent partner, correct?

A. The shares would be registered in the name of one partner, and then what happens?

Q. He may owe obligations towards the silent partner.

A. But these are different questions. Silent partnership indicates that something is not disclosed, but registration of common property is a different issue.

Q. I'm just asking you whether the concept of a silent partnership suggests that you could have shares registered in the name of one partner, that's to say the non-silent partner, in circumstances where he may owe obligations towards his silent partner, which is to say the partner whose name is not --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I don't understand the question.

I don't understand why share registration has got anything to do with the concept that's being discussed in this article.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm going to skip that line if your Ladyship --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I can see what the article says.

A. Because -- I'm sorry, my Lady, there are special regulations regarding ownership and registration of ownership rights, and it has nothing to do with the concept of silent partnership. These are different areas, and silent partnership cannot prevail if we consider rules regarding registration, either securities or real estate.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can I just ask you this: this silent partnership rule we've just been looking at in Article 1054, if A has a contract with B, and C is B's silent partner, can A sue C under this article that says that the -- under Article 2 here, 1054.2.

A. Just A and B are partners and C is not?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, A sues C. B is a partner with C. C is the silent partner. Can A sue C directly, or does A sue B who sues C for an indemnity?

A. It depends on the facts, but of course silent partnership does not prevent from being defendant in case of dispute, so there is no prohibition.

Moreover I would say that silent partnership means that they do not disclose some matters. But regarding ownership, by the way, and there is some publication, I think I indicated in my report, that regarding carry out ownership rights, it's impossible to follow completely the terms of silence because ownership shall be disclosed to third parties.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

MR RABINOWITZ: Now, I want to ask you about split ownership and personal obligations, and I think we all agree that you can't have split ownership as a matter of Russian law.

But what I want to explore with you is the circumstances in which you can have ownership in the name of one person, but that person is then subject to personal contractual obligations owed to another person, do you follow?

A. Personal contractual obligations may exist for an owner, for a non-owner, no question, no dispute.

Q. Yes. And among the obligations that the parties could agree in the circumstances is that, on demand, the party who is the registered owner of the shares will register the other person's co-ownership interests, that could be a personal contractual obligation which he could accept, yes?

A. It's a terrible problem. Of course not. Because what you are saying, if I understood the counsel correctly, I'm sorry, my Lady, is that the owner, legal owner, who has registered assets in this case, securities as I understand, may be obliged by a contract at the request of another person to transfer ownership title to this person.

Did I understand you correctly?

Q. Well, to register the other person's co-ownership interest, in other words instead of all the shares being registered in his name alone, he will transfer -- he will produce a change to the register which reflects the fact that there is another owner as well. Why can't that be the subject of a contractual obligation?

A. Just if it is a purchase and sale, and it's clear that there will be transferal right, it's okay. But I understood you, if I am correct, that it will be done on a demand.

Q. There is an agreement that what will happen is that the person says at some point, "If I ask that you do this, you will do this"?

A. But "at some point" means at any moment, correct?

Q. Well, at a particular point in time, yes.

A. This means that the concept of ownership under Russian law is entirely violated. This means that a person is a legal owner of some property, registered owner. And though according to the law he has full right of possession, disposal and use of this asset, in reality he does not determine the legal destiny of this property. At any moment his ownership right will be terminated at demand, and this means that it will be a complete violation of Russian law, because the owner cannot be a little bit owner. The owner determines completely the legal destiny of the object of ownership. Only the owner decides at what moment he or she will dispose of this property.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But if I have ownership of a car and I enter into a contract to sell you the car and to transfer your name to the vehicle title registry, why does that offend concepts of ownership? I own the car until you're registered but I enter into a personal obligation, not an in rem obligation, to transfer the car to you. Why is that a problem?

A. It's perfectly legal, my Lady, but this means that there is a purchase and sale agreement and the registration of the title may take some time, but it will, of course, happen. But what -- and the former owner, ie the seller, will not be the owner from the moment -- if it's a car, from the moment of conclusion of the agreement, it will take some time with registration.

With real estate, the transfer of ownership title will be registered, it also takes some time. But it doesn't mean that there is no purchase and sale agreement. What I understand, it's the agreement that one person remains legal owner and another person becomes de facto owner, and nobody knows at what moment --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, I don't think that's what's being put to you. I think what's being put to you is that A is the owner of the property, let's say securities, registered as the owner of the securities, but enters into a contract with B that because B has provided or will provide services to A, A will, at the request of B at any date in the future, register B on the title to the securities as joint owner with A.

Why does that offend notions of property?

- A. Unfortunately it contradicts the law, because "at any moment of the future" means that during indefinite time there will be split ownership. A will be the legal owner and B will be the real owner. This means that indefinitely B will be the real owner covered by A's title, and the owner can be only the sole owner. And it seems to me that we have(?) agreed with Dr Rachkov that split ownership contradicts Russian law.

Otherwise, it's a violation of numerous laws regarding ownership, regarding legal capacity, regarding sham transactions. Numerous violations. I'm not sure that you will allow me to discuss it in details.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, just a second, let me just see.

This is an agreement to have joint ownership on the register of securities, it's an agreement that B's name will be added to that of A and they will be joint owners, joint registered owners.

- A. Excellent, no problem. Then they should go and register or agree about the moment in time when it should be carried out. Usually, of course, in reasonable time to avoid any accusation that it's a fiction. But registered common ownership is allowed by law, and if they agreed that services will be provided, and for these services registered co-ownership shall take place, they should go and register, or may agree that it will be done.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Are you saying that if there is a fixed time for the performance of the obligation to register B's name, that's all right, but if it's an uncertain date, it's not all right?

A. Yes, that's correct.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can we just test that, Mr Rozenberg. Let's take the situation of an option. Let's say party A has 100 per cent of the shares in a particular company registered in his name, and he grants an option to party B, the option exercisable for a period of three years, which gives party B the right, if you like, to acquire the option, it doesn't really matter -- sorry, to acquire the shares, for a period of any time extending for three years, which will mean that if that option is exercised, A will have to transfer 50 per cent of the shares into B's name.

Do you say that that contradicts or conflicts with the principle of split ownership just because he has a right which he can exercise at any time in those two years to require half the shares to be transferred to him?

A. I understand there will be an agreement of an option, of a purchase and sale agreement between two parties.

Q. There's an option there. Does that, in your view, offend against the principle of split ownership?

A. Usually either option or preliminary agreement on future purchasers and sale is allowed by law, but you specify the terms of this agreement and carry it out according to the terms.

What you said that at the month, in the indefinite future, the ownership title will be transferred. This is the split ownership, but not the preliminary purchase and sale agreement or option agreement.

Q. Well, I'm not entirely following that because, for the period of time during which the option is exercised but hasn't yet been exercised, the person has the right to exercise that option which would require half the shares to be registered in his name. Now, leave aside how specified or how detailed the contract is, do you say that that does or doesn't infringe against the principle of split ownership?

A. Broadly speaking, either with option or preliminary purchase and sale agreement, I understand that there is an agreement between two individuals that, for some consideration, there will be transfer of ownership title, and the question is only when. Here, as I already answered, my Lady, it's perfectly legal.

Q. Why should it depend on the precise nature of the personal contract which gives rise to this right?

A. Because ownership title may and shall be transferred on the basis of concrete civil law transactions. It can be purchase and sale, it can be gift, it can be exchange trade, various bases, but then transfer of ownership title is perfectly legal.

But what you are suggesting is that A will be legal owner and B will be factual owner who will request the transfer of ownership title at request, at demand.

Q. I suggest I'm not suggesting that but I'm going to move on to something else.

Can you please go to bundle G(A)2/2 at tab 38, please. The English starts at page 183 G(A)2/2.38/183.

This is the work produced by Professors Makovsky and Khokhlov, do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. It's the introduction to the Civil Code, and they were two of the architects of the Civil Code, were they not?

A. Many people claim they were architects.

- Q. Well, maybe so, but would you dispute that Professor Makovsky was indeed one of the architects?
- A. Indeed, he is a very reputable legal scholar.
- Q. Thank you. If you go then to page 193 G(A)2/2.38/193, do you see the heading "What the Civil Code allows and what it requires"?
- A. 193?
- Q. 193.
- A. Yes.
- Q. They say this:
- "The well-known phrase 'what is not forbidden is permitted' is applicable to the highest degree [of] civil legislation, for one of the basic principles of civil [law] is the principle of free disposition by each person of the civil law rights belonging to him.
- "The Civil Code in essence opens with this principle, proclaiming in its first article that citizens and legal persons 'obtain and exercise their civil law rights by their own will and in their own interest[s]'.... This principle is formulated even more precisely in Article 9, where it is said that citizens and legal persons 'at their discretion exercise the civil law rights belonging to them'... It is made concrete in a number of other provisions of the Civil Code that discuss the right of the owner of property to take 'at its discretion ... any actions' with respect to this property..., on the impermissibility of compelling anyone to conclude a contract..., on [determination] by the parties of the terms of the contract at their discretion..."

Now, there are of course certain limits to freedom of contract, as the learned professors go on to point out in the next paragraph. But I take it you accept that freedom of contract was a fundamental principle of Russian civil law in 1995 and 1996?

A. I accept it.

Q. I think you agree that the parties are free to agree either a contract that is specifically named in the Civil Code, or a contract that is not specifically named in the Civil Code provided that the contract is not contrary to law; that's right, isn't it?

A. I fully agree.

Q. Can we just look at what Professors Makovsky and Khokhlov say about the English concept of a trust, if you go to page 262 G(A)2/2.38/262.

A. Yes.

Q. The heading "Entrusted administration of property"?

A. Yes.

Q. "Entrusted administration of property (Chapter 53 of the Civil Code). The contract of entrusted administration of property and also entrusted administration of another's property on the basis of [legislation] are mentioned in [part 1] of the Civil Code..., which articles do not contain, however, any detailed rules on [these forms] of obligations that is new for Russia. In the Second Part of the Code, the rules on this contract are included as the analogue of a 'trust' -- an institution hasty borrowed from an entirely different legal system and unsuitable for full application outside this legal system. Unknown to the Russian law, the 'splitting' of the right of ownership between the two owners, on which the 'trust' is based, and the absence of special means for protection of 'entrusting' that lie at the [heart] of this institution have required the transfer of these relations to the plane of contract."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Can we just focus on the last sentence. So what the professors are saying is that the absence of any form of split ownership under Russian law required the transfer of relations that would, in England, be governed by trust to the plane of contract. Do you agree that that is what they're saying?

A. They mention chapter 53 of the Civil Code, and I know that, according to the rules regulating entrusted administration of property, the legal owner remains the legal owner, and the person to whom entrusted administration is assigned remains a manager, indicating in all transactions that he is acting only on the basis of the trust arrangement.

And therefore there is absolutely no distinction between legal and factual owner, there is a person who is managing the trust. Therefore splitting -- well, of course, it's a label. The authors indicate here "splitting", but splitting, according to Russian law, does not mean like it happens in English trust, as I understand, that the legal owner will act according to the instructions of the real owner. Under Russian law, the legal owner on the contrary gives instructions and the person who gets the property for trust always indicates that he is not the legal owner at all.

- Q. Would you agree with this, that the contract of entrusted management, in which the owner transfers possession to an agent, is an example of relations between owner and agent that are governed by contract?
- A. Yes, but frankly I don't see any splitting of ownership here, although the respected authors wrote about splitting. I'm afraid it's a confusing label about splitting.
- Q. With respect, I don't think it's confusing at all.

I think what they're saying is: we don't have a trust concept in Russia, and therefore many of the things that you achieve by using a trust in -- he's obviously talking about England -- we deal with by use of the plane of contract. We obviously don't achieve the exact same result because we can't, because we don't want to split ownership. In effect what they're saying is you can achieve a lot of the same thing by using contracts, do you agree?

- A. My main point is that in Russia the agent, as you say, is a person who has nothing to do with legal ownership, and he, on the contrary, even maybe sometimes without necessity, must indicate that he is not the owner, that he is only the manager, on each and every transaction, what is absolutely contrary to the concept of splitting ownership.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, I'm about to move on to a different topic. Subject to your Ladyship --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That would be a good moment. Quarter of an hour, and I'll sit until 4.30.

MR RABINOWITZ: That would be very helpful, my Lady.

(3.22 pm)

(A short break)

(3.37 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, do start, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Rozenberg, I'd like to turn next to your point that Article 434 of the 1964 Civil Code applied to invalidate the 1995 agreement.

Can we begin, perhaps, by going to your fourth report, bundle 3/1 at tab 2, page 70 G(A)3/1.02/70. At 3/1, tab 2, page 70, we see your point number 4. You say:

"The alleged agreement violates Article 434 of the 1964 Civil Code (as defined below) because it is not made to satisfy personal needs. Consequentially, the agreement, even if concluded, is void."

Can we just then remind ourselves of what Article 434 of the '64 Civil Code in fact provides. If you go to bundle G(A)4/4, tab 3 at page 83 G(A)4/4.03/83, do you have it?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. If you look at the last two sentences in Article 434 you see it says:

"Citizens may conclude a joint activity contract only to meet their own personal domestic needs.

"Joint activity contracts between citizens and socialist organisations are not permitted."

So there appear to be two prohibitions here, are there not? First, a prohibition on partnership contracts between citizens other than to meet their personal needs and, secondly, a prohibition on partnership contracts between citizens and socialist organisations even if those contracts are purely to meet the citizen's personal domestic needs?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, the 1964 Civil Code was, of course, a Soviet Civil Code, and obviously the Communist authorities did not take kindly, at least in theory, to private individuals amassing vast wealth, that's correct, isn't it?

A. Broadly speaking, yes.

Q. And so, as we can see from Article 434, all the Soviets would allow citizens to enter into partnership contracts for was to satisfy their personal needs, and what they had in mind, presumably, was food on the table or a roof over their head, that sort of thing, yes?

A. I think that Soviet citizens had a little bit more than bread and a roof.

Q. I'm sure they did.

A. It's broad, of course.

Q. I think if there's one thing we can all agree on in this case, though, it's that the ambitions of Mr Berezovsky and Mr Abramovich were not limited to that?

A. I agree.

Q. So had the 1995 agreement been made in 1964 it would undoubtedly have been void as contrary to Soviet prohibitions, that's clear, is it not?

A. I would say stronger. In this year, there was special article of the Criminal Code for private entrepreneurship.

Q. Right. Let's just do one thing at a time.

The question for us is whether these Soviet prohibitions continued to apply in 1995. Now, you're aware, are you, that Professor Sukhanov says that Article 434 of the 1964 Civil Code did not apply in 1995? I can show you an article.

Can you go, please, to G(A)7/1. I think you need out 7/1 and also 2/5 as well, because we need to look at both.

Tab 11 of 7/1. If you're in tab 11 of 7/1, could you go to 98.001, please G(A)7/1.11/98.001.

We've got out two volumes because we don't have the whole extract in one place unfortunately. I just need to show you something from 7/1 and then we're going to go to 2/5.

If you're at 98.001 you can see from that that this is the 1993 edition of Professor Sukhanov's book, do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. And you can also see Professor Sukhanov is the author of chapter 46, among other things, top left-hand side; do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. And then if you go back to page 97.001

G(A)7/1.11/97.001, the English is at 98.001

G(A)7/1.11/98.001, you can see, and perhaps you can tell us, this is a chapter on joint activity agreements, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. All right. Now, unfortunately the page that I want to take you to is in another place, it's in 2/5. I just needed to show you that so that we could be clear on what I was showing you at 2/5.

In G(A)2/5, can you go, please, to tab 25

G(A)2/5.25/112.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just for the record, I don't seem to have the page that's on the screen on my Magnum.

I don't know why that is.

MR RABINOWITZ: 97.001.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I don't have 98.001, I don't know why not.

MR RABINOWITZ: I can tell your Ladyship you're not missing much, it simply identifies the date of the --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That's fine. I'm sure it will get on there some time, but just so you don't think I've got it.

What's the next document?

MR RABINOWITZ: More importantly is 2/5 at tab 25. If one goes to page 114 G(A)2/5.25/114 one has an extract from the relevant chapter in English. And what we have is Professor Sukhanov in 1993 saying as follows:

"Previously [partnership contracts] were distinguished on the basis of their participants, since the law did not permit the simultaneous participation in such contracts of legal entities and individuals (furthermore the latter, according to Article 434 of the Civil Code, were allowed to enter into such agreements only for satisfaction of their personal everyday needs, and not for commercial purposes). This was the direct consequence of fundamental differences in the legal regime regarding state and personal ownership. New civil legislation abolished these unjustified limitations, and accordingly the grounds for differentiating between such agreements fell away."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. So the first point to note is that Professor Sukhanov considers, and this is in 1993, that Article 434 at some point in time prohibited partnership contracts between citizens and legal entities, do you see that's the way he puts it?

- A. It seems to me that he is focusing on it.
- Q. So he says 434 was about prohibiting partnerships, among other things, partnership contracts between citizens and legal entities. And then it's plainly his view, you will accept this I think, writing in 1993, that Article 434 of the Civil Code had been abolished and no longer applied?
- A. I'm ready to agree with you. It seems to me that here he attacks directly the agreements between legal entities and individuals which were prohibited entirely under the old Civil Code regarding individuals, it's in parenthesis, and for me it's not entirely clear although I'm ready to agree with you.
- Q. You are ready to agree with me, thank you for that.

Perhaps we can just look at another commentary to see if that assists still further. In the same volume which is 2/5, can you go to tab 26 G(A)2/5.26/120.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Sorry, are you agreeing that that's his view, or are you agreeing with his view?

- A. I agree that this view is a little bit unclear but I don't want to waste time, and I'm ready to agree that it may apply to both.

How it's read, especially in English, it looks like he is directly attacking the prohibition of joint activity agreements between individuals and legal entities, which were completely prohibited by the Soviet Code. But in parenthesis it mentions -- and also, by the way, there was restriction regarding individuals and whether the following sentence applies to both, only to what -- besides parenthesis, it's not absolutely clear --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I see that, but do you agree with his view, with the conclusion he reached? Do you personally agree with the conclusion he reached?

A. Personally I don't agree.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

MR RABINOWITZ: You don't agree.

I'm grateful, my Lady.

Let's have a look at another commentary then. If you go to tab 26, which I think is the next tab, the English begins at page 120 G(A)2/5.26/120.

This is a commentary by someone called Mr Saveliev, he's an author who you yourself cite in your fourth report, is he not?

A. Of course, yes.

Q. If you turn to page 121 G(A)2/5.26/121, do you see he also says:

"The Fundamentals also removed the prohibition under the former legislation on the simultaneous participation of citizens and legal entities in a joint activity (simple partnership) contract."

A. Yes, it's correct.

Q. Do I take it that you would disagree with Mr Saveliev as well?

A. Yes, I respectfully disagree.

Q. All right.

Can we then just look at what you say in your report, G(A)3/1, tab 2, page 133 G(A)3/1.02/133, and I want to look at paragraph 220, please.

At paragraph 220, you say:

"Indeed, even today a citizen may not enter into a joint activity agreement for an entrepreneurial purpose unless he or she is a registered entrepreneur: see Article 1041 of the... Civil Code. This provision has been applied on many occasions to render an agreement in violation thereof invalid. Finally, it is striking that there is no Russian court decision upholding any joint activity agreements concluded between individuals for business purposes at the relevant time ([that is] in 1995...)"

So, am I right, your suggestion is that because even today a citizen cannot make a partnership contract for entrepreneurial purposes, therefore it is reasonable that in 1995 the old Soviet prohibitions continued to prohibit citizens from making partnership contracts for anything other than basic supplies?

- A. I'm afraid it's a simplification of my arguments. I realise that this question is not very simple and I respect other views.

But, as a lawyer, if asked regarding the law applicable at this moment, in 1995, I have to take into account two main factors. Number one, at this moment, Article 434 formerly was the only rule of the special part of the civil legislation regulating this type of agreements. The special part of the Civil Code was adapted and took effect only in 1996.

At this moment, this part was not replaced by anything, and the question was whether it contradicted or didn't contradict other normative acts which my respected colleague, Dr Rachkov, enumerated. I don't want to waste time on this.

So the question is: was Article 434 in effect at that time, or there was some vacuum, and practically no other article of the Civil Code regulated the joint activity or simple partnership agreements.

When such situation arises, usually the best guidance is the court practice. There are three court decisions, not one but three consecutive court decisions. The lower court, the appellate court and the cassation court. This dispute, Salata case, went through all instances of the judicial system available at that time. And, by the way, even today, because the Supreme Arbitrazh Court interferes very rarely, and only when it disagrees; when the Supreme Arbitrazh Court agrees they do not show up on the picture.

In other words three courts, including the highest cassation court, ruled with reason, and we have this in the materials of the present case, ruled that Article 434 applies if the agreement is not concluded -- if the joint activity agreement with participation of an individual is not concluded for the personal needs. The courts indicated that, if it is for apartments, for parking places, for cars, for other personal needs, it's fine. If it's for systematically obtaining of profit in entrepreneurship then it's prohibited. This is what the courts said.

And second factor, the development of legislation. I can see, and I wrote about it, that in 1964 there were strong restrictions. After 1995, still there are restrictions, they look a little bit softer but still are rather severe because the most serious sanctions, complete invalidation of agreements if there is no registration of individuals participating in such transactions, it's broadly applied by Russian courts after 1995.

Since the whole legislation during the period in question developed gradually and in other areas, whether it's currency, bank accounts, other economic freedoms, there were more such shocking changes.

My view is that simply in the period in question, in 1995, joint activity agreements connected with entrepreneurial activity for individuals were available if such individuals were acting in some legal forms, and to have a form of legal entity to establish either limited liability company or closed type joint stock company with only one founder was quick and easy. Everybody knows it was practically the same procedure, like becoming registered entrepreneur.

Therefore, my understanding was that for fiscal purposes the legislators did not allow, in the period of question, the activity of individuals who are not registered at all. This was my conclusion though I agree that there may be different views.

Q. All right. Mr Rozenberg, I really don't want to stop you giving relevant evidence, but it would help if you try to make your answers a little shorter and responded to my question.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think we've got the picture here. He's got his view and he accepts it's reasonable to hold an alternative view.

MR RABINOWITZ: An alternative view. All right.

I do need to explore I think with you, Mr Rozenberg, and I'm sorry that this will take time, but, you see, part of what you are saying apparently in paragraph 220 seems to relate to agreement for entrepreneurial purposes and registered entrepreneurs.

I just want to be clear that there is no confusion as to the concept of entrepreneurial activity, because this is a matter which arises not only in this context but it also arises in the context of limitation in Article 205 of the Civil Code, okay? So I just want to see if I can very quickly try and get rid of any confusion about this.

Can we just look, please, at bundle G(A)6/1, page 40, paragraph 127 G(A)6/1.01/127. In paragraph 127, this is in the context of 205, you say:

"... it is agreed that Article 205 cannot be applied at all where the claimant is an individual entrepreneur and the claim arises out of entrepreneurial activity."

Now, there is a dispute as to how this applies, and I just want to be clear that the authority which confirms this is expressed in precisely these terms and no wider.

Keep the joint memorandum to hand, but can you please take up bundle 4/3 and go to tab 103, page 63

G(A)4/3.103/63. We have here the Plenums of the Supreme Court and Supreme Arbitrazh Court producing a resolution. If you look at paragraph 12, you can see that in the first sentence they confirm that:

"A request by a party to [apply a limitation period] shall constitute grounds for the dismissal of the claim..."

In the second sentence of the same paragraph, they say that such a request:

"... does not prevent the court from considering an application by a claimant who is a citizen to honour the reason for missing the limitation ... period and to restore it, which the court may grant, provided the circumstances are proven as set forth in ... 205 ..."

I'm not worried about that for present purposes.

In the next paragraph they say this:

"The courts shall keep in mind that the limitation of action period missed by a legal entity, as well as by a claimant who is an entrepreneur for claims related to their business activities is not subject to restoration regardless of the reasons why it was missed."

I've emphasised the words "business activities", but it's right, is it not, that the Russian word which is used is the same word that appears in Article 23 of the Civil Code which I think Professor Maggs translates as entrepreneurial activity?

A. I confirm.

Q. So just going back to the joint memorandum at G(A)6/1, page 40, paragraph 127 G(A)6/1.01/40, you agree that Article 205 cannot be applied where the claimant is an individual entrepreneur and the claim arises out of entrepreneurial activity; do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. In paragraph 128 we see in subparagraph 1 that you say:

"Mr Rozenberg maintains that Mr Berezovsky may be considered to be acting as an individual entrepreneur since his alleged activity (and rights allegedly arising therefrom) was of economic nature, and that this would deprive him of the right to rely on Article 205."

Now, this concept of economic nature that you use there is slightly ambiguous. Can we just very quickly look at how you put it in G(A)3/1, tab 3, in your report, page 207, paragraph 51 G(A)3/1.03/51. Here you say:

"Furthermore, if one interprets the alleged 1995 Agreement as a valid joint activity agreement governed by Russian law..., the activity of the parties to such agreement would inevitably be deemed by a Russian court to be business or entrepreneurial activity."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. So having said in the joint memorandum that the alleged activity was of an economic nature, here you say that it would inevitably be deemed to be business or entrepreneurial activity?

A. Yes.

Q. Okay?

A. Because Article 434 did not indicate clearly that only entrepreneurship is prohibited. It indicated that everything except personal needs, and I word it in connection with this to indicate that activity which is business entrepreneurial activity is not activity for personal needs.

The same regarding statute of limitation, because legal entities are mentioned there, and the whole understanding is that whether it's connected with business activity.

Q. I just at this point want to understand whether you say that the 1995 agreement involved entrepreneurial activity as defined in Article 2 of the Civil Code? Because I suggest it isn't clear, and just looking at what the Plenum said in the document we looked at at 4/3, tab 103, you see the Plenum spoke expressly of "entrepreneurial activity", using the same Russian words as are used in Article 3.

- A. I agree.
- Q. 23, sorry.
- A. I agree.
- Q. But you say in the joint memorandum that the joint activity was of an "economic nature". And then you say in paragraph 51 of your fifth report that the joint activity would be deemed to be "business or entrepreneurial activity". So you add here the word "business".
- A. Regarding the joint activity in connection with Article 434, it's not crucial, it's not critical. It's sufficient to determine whether this activity was aimed at personal needs or it was not.
- Q. All right. Just let me ask you this: do you say that a partnership agreement to acquire a controlling shareholding interest in a company involves entrepreneurial activity as defined in the Civil Code on the part of the partners? Or do you say that it involves other kinds of economic activity aimed at generating wealth?
- A. It is a difficult question and I wrote that it "may be considered" as entrepreneurial activity. We can read together the definition of entrepreneurial activity which is rather broad. The simple purchase of shares, of course, is not entrepreneurial activity, but how the whole agreement and all the actions of the parties were formulated, it may give basis for consideration of this as entrepreneurial activity. So this question remains to be discussed.

Q. You see, Dr Rachkov is clear about this. Can you just go to G(A)1/1, tab 3, at page 188 G(A)1/1.03/188, do you see at paragraph 43 Dr Rachkov says -- I'm looking at the first sentence:

"Entrepreneurial activity is a narrower concept than economic activity, and does not encompass every activity that may be undertaken for commercial or business purposes."

Presumably you agree with that?

A. I agree.

Q. In the second sentence he says that both:

"... the Constitution and the Civil Code distinguish entrepreneurial from other economic activity."

Presumably you agree with that?

A. I think the first sentence is sufficient.

Q. Okay. But you don't dispute the second sentence, presumably?

All right, let's go over the page, page 189. If you look at paragraph 44, you'll see that Dr Rachkov says:

"Entrepreneurial activity is defined in Article 2 of the Code ..."

And he sets that out. If you look at the definition, it's actually set out here:

"Entrepreneurial activity is independent activity done at one's own risk directed at [the] systematic receipt of profit from the use of property, sale of goods, performance of work, or rendering of service by persons registered in this capacity by the procedure established by legislation."

Do you agree that acquiring shares in a company, being a shareholder, does not fall under this definition?

A. If Mr B and Mr A would come to purchase shares, and that's it, of course these actions should not be considered as entrepreneurial activity. With a broad activity, it's a question, but I don't want to insist. I wrote "it may be considered"; it's a question, it's of economic nature. It's not entirely clear, and frankly even all the activity under this agreement is not crystal clear.

Q. That's very fair.

A. Therefore I agree with you only that acquisition of share stock is not entrepreneurial activity, that's correct.

Q. That's very fair, Mr Rozenberg.

Can we just very quickly look at the constitution.

If you go to bundle G(A)2/1 at tab 2, please. The English, if you can go to page 51 of that G(A)2/1.02/51 you see that Article 34 at the top of the page says:

"Everyone shall have the right to use freely his (her) abilities and property for entrepreneurial and other economic activity not prohibited by law."

So that again draws a distinction between entrepreneurial activities and economic activities, I think you have agreed with that.

A. Of course, otherwise I would say no question at all.

Q. And the constitutional guarantee applies to each, does it not? Everyone has the constitutional right to use their abilities and property for each of those activities, entrepreneurial or other economic activities "so far as not prohibited by law".

A. If not prohibited by law, I fully agree.

Q. And where it says "so far as not prohibited by law", this does not mean, does it, Mr Rozenberg, so far as the Soviets did not prohibit it; that's not what the 1993 constitution means?

A. Three Russian courts ruled in a different way. And by the way, not long ago it was, not 1995 though, in connection with the facts which took place in '95, therefore I have to disagree.

Q. I just want to understand your position.

If a citizen went to the Constitutional Court in 1995 and said "I want to make a simple partnership contract to invest in a company to try to make a lot of money", this is in 1995, "I know I couldn't do this in Soviet times but can I do it now?" is it seriously your suggestion, Mr Rozenberg, that the Constitutional Court would reply "Sorry, you cannot do this, your Article 34 rights are limited by Soviet law and you will have to wait until we get around to amending them"?

Is that your evidence?

A. "I want to make a simple partnership", then according to the law in effect at that time he could register very quickly, within a week or two maximum, a limited liability company being one founder, or closed type joint stock company being one founder, with extremely small charter fund, it was just a ridiculous amount, and enter into any joint activity agreement, because then all his actions would be supervised by the tax authorities, no question.

This is the answer.

Q. All right. Can you put away 2/1, please, and go to bundle 2/4 at tab 8, page 50 G(A)2/4.08/50. This is the Constitutional Court decision in Kadet, and just looking at paragraph 3, which is the first paragraph you see there?

A. Yes.

Q. "Article 8(1) of the Constitution... affirms freedom of economic activity as one of the foundations of the constitutional system. The principle of economic freedom constitutionally predetermines guaranteed powers comprising the basic content of the constitutional right to free use of one's abilities and property for entrepreneurial and other ... activity not prohibited by law. Exercising this right, enshrined in Article 34 (Part 1) of the Constitution..., citizens are entitled to determine the sphere of this activity and conduct the corresponding activity solely or jointly with other persons by means of participation in a business entity, partnership or productive cooperative, [that is] by means of the creation of a commercial organisation as a form of collective entrepreneurship, to select autonomously an economic business development strategy, use their property based on the guarantees of rights of ownership... [and then] and government support of fair competition... established by the Constitution of the Russian Federation."

So would you agree that what the Constitutional Court is here doing is affirming that citizens are entitled to determine the sphere of their entrepreneurial or other economic activity, and to pursue such activity solely or jointly with other persons by means of a participation in a business entity or partnership?

- A. I agree, but correct me if I'm wrong, but in here I don't see for example that it's necessary for an individual to be registered, and the resolution was issued in 2004. By that time it was easy to participate in joint stock -- I'm sorry, in the joint -- in the simple partnership, and still the registration was required, but the Constitutional Court cannot go into such details.

It's a broad definition and I agree with that, but we should understand that everything should be done on the basis of the existing laws and regulations with certain sometimes formal restrictions.

- Q. You see, despite these ringing words of freedom, you're saying that citizens could not form a simple partnership contract with one another for much more than a sandwich or a basic commodity, is that your evidence?
- A. I need to be very brief. I already said that creating, very quickly, a legal entity, it's an equivalent of registration later. A citizen could be engaged in very sophisticated forms of entrepreneurship, not only preparing sandwiches. Because otherwise, we have to agree that this activity could be carried out without any supervision of the state authorities, what is inconsistent with the principles of Russian and I think any other country's legislation.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So you're saying that it would have been all right -- if the individual had registered as an entrepreneur that would have made it all all right?

A. Definitely registered as individual entrepreneur later, and in 1995, probably to have full guarantee, it would be better instead of being registered individual entrepreneur to be acting through a legal entity, not as individual but as owner of limited liability company or closed type joint stock company.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So in 1995, an individual couldn't have registered as an entrepreneur?

A. In '95 he already could, but for the purposes of 434 it remains unclear whether it would be sufficient.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

A. But I say it's equivalent either to be registered as individual entrepreneur, or to register as a limited liability company, the only founder, the only owner, and very low charter fund, let's say equivalent of $100, no more. It was even lower at that time.

MR RABINOWITZ: Now, we saw, Mr Rozenberg, that you said in your fourth report, paragraph 220, that there is no

Russian court decision upholding any joint activity agreements concluded between individuals for business purposes at the relevant time, that's to say prior to part 2 of the Civil Code on 1 March 1996.

A. Only between individuals without legal entities, we never saw anything.

Q. You see, Dr Rachkov says that is not right, and can we just look at some of the decisions that he refers to. Can you go, please, to bundle 2/5 at tab 15, page 55 G(A)2/5.15/55, the Russian is at 52 G(A)2/5.15/52 and the English starts at 55.

This is a decision of the Supreme Court, as you see. It's B against S, you see that from the first substantive paragraph, just below the top. On page 55, below the heading "Established", we see that B, the founder of the company Respect, applied to the court with a claim against S, another founder and director of the company, for the compulsory registration of the transfer of ownership rights to a shop from S to the company Respect. Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. In the next paragraph, we see that the contract was a foundation contract made in 1993, and in the following paragraph we see that the wife of one of the parties applied to invalidate it. So that is what the claim was about. Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. And there is no mention here of B or S being or needing to be registered entrepreneurs, correct?

A. Regarding entering into foundation contract.

Q. Yes, but do you see that there is no reference to them needing to be registered entrepreneurs?

A. But it's in connection of the entering in the foundation contract.

Q. Okay. If you then go to the last paragraph at the bottom of the page, you'll see that the court says as follows:

"In sustaining B's demand, the court proceeded from the fact that the joint economic activity contract and the creation of the limited liability company of 23 December 1993, concluded by the founders of the company -- S and B, contains a term in accordance with which the founders integrated their personal contributions for [the] joint economic activity, by depositing property in the form of a shop and car acquired by them for joint cash funds worth a total of 12 million-odd rubles, thus creating the company's authorised... capital."

So the court upholds the claim and proceeded on the basis that this was a joint activity contract, correct?

A. It's correct, but it's a bit confusion because, unfortunately, in some decisions of the Supreme Court and of the Supreme Arbitrazh Court, and of some writers, these agreements are also called joint economic activity agreements. However, these foundation agreements are not simple partnerships because we all agreed, as I understand, that the simple partnership is the joint activity without creation of legal entity. And these agreements are aimed at creation of legal entity and present a different category. We shall not be confused by this. They are subject to regulation of special norms regarding foundation of legal entities, either limited liability companies or joint stock companies, and of course they are not falling under the restrictions of Article 434.

I even remember that my respected colleague, Dr Rachkov, in one of his reports, indicated that joint economic activity agreements are not foundation agreements, that these are different categories.

Q. Well, can we just look at the document which you'll find at tab 10, G(A)2/5, tab 10, in the same bundle G(A)2/5.10/27.

A. Yes.

Q. This is a joint resolution by the Plenum of the Supreme Court and the Supreme Arbitrazh Court. Do you see it says:

"A contract on the creation of a company being concluded by the founders of a joint stock company is a contract of joint activity on the foundation of the company and bears no relation to the foundation documents..."

- A. Yes. I said just I think two minutes ago that unfortunately both our supreme courts and some scholars created this confusion because, if we read carefully, and moreover understand carefully what it means, these are agreement on joint activity on the foundation of the company and it has nothing to do with simple partnership which are, on the contrary, aimed at joint activity without creation of any legal entity.
- Q. Mr Rozenberg, if you look at tab 8, if you go to page 21 of tab 8, I just want to show you another reference to this sort of contract. This is the Presidium of the Supreme Arbitrazh Court of the Russian Federation resolution. Do you see tab 8, page 21? G(A)2/5.08/21
- A. Yes.
- Q. "The foundation agreement is a joint activity contract between the founders on the creation of the joint stock company and is of a civil law nature. Accordingly, the demand to have it recognised as invalid is a claim to have a civil law transaction recognised as invalid."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. So isn't that again recognition that a foundation agreement is a joint activity contract?

A. But I already said that, unfortunately, our supreme courts and some scholars created this confusion, and forgive me, I want to be extremely brief but sometimes some legal terms are used in different meanings.

There is an English term "security" which may be used as collateral, as pledge, and at the same time something like absence of danger, security. And the same here, there are joint activity agreements aimed at creation of a legal entity where joint activity agreements on foundation of a company. And there are other joint activity agreements, ie simple partnerships, which on the contrary are aimed at activity without creation of a legal entity.

Different rules should apply, otherwise it's simply impossible to understand. And by the way, Dr Rachkov wrote in one of his reports, we can go to it, that these are different categories. We cannot consider joint activity agreements on foundation of companies as equivalent of joint activity agreements, parenthesis, simple partnerships, aimed at activity without creation of legal entity.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Why can't you have a joint activity agreement for the formation of a company which comes to an end once the formation of the company has been done?

A. We can, of course, and it should come to an end when the formation is done, that is absolutely correct. But still it's a different category because customary requirements to joint activity agreements, the personal participation is needed, activities of all the partners, but not simply execution of payment, one-time payment of a certain amount. These requirements applying to joint activity agreements are not applicable to agreements on creation of a legal entity.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

MR RABINOWITZ: You see, Mr Rozenberg, Dr Rachkov refers to a number of cases in which partnership contracts made in 1994 were upheld. I'm not going to go through them all. They include cases of partnership contracts between a citizen and a legal entity not simply for personal domestic needs, and that is in his report, his sixth report, at paragraphs 29, 30 and 31, one of those cases being a Supreme Court decision. He also refers to cases of partnership among citizens, plural citizens, as well as legal entities. That's at paragraph 32 of his sixth report. And that includes a case where 12 citizens were party to the contract. He also includes other cases in which foundation contracts, which are a form of a partnership contract, were treated as potentially valid.

You, on the other hand, have cited a single case, Salata, in which the Federal Arbitrazh Court struck down a partnership contract made in 1995 on the ground of Article 434. I'm not disputing that is what happened in that case. But I think you also accept that Russian judgments, especially lower court judgments, can sometimes be inconsistent and wrong, correct?

A. I think in any country court decisions may be wrong.

Q. That is a very fair comment. Not this court of course.

So I would suggest, Mr Rozenberg, that Professor Sukhanov, Dr Saveliev and the Supreme Court decision I have referred to are all right, that the end of Communism was indeed an end of Communism, and that restrictions of the kind found in Article 434 were washed away by the new constitutional and civil law freedoms; you dispute that, do you?

A. If either you or Dr Rachkov would bring me at least one decision, if not upheld at the appellate or cassation level, at least one decision of any court considering just this legal issue, not in general questions of payments, tax issues and other problems considered in the cases you indicated, but just this particular issue, whether Article 434 was applicable or not at that time.

And this decision would contradict the Salata case decisions, I am ready to entirely agree with you.

So far no one case was brought whether this particular issue was in the focus of the dispute, and the Russian courts usually -- Russian judges, and I think it was indicated in your submissions, Russian judges have so many cases, you sometimes can see the list schedule of cases, just ten minutes for one case, 15 minutes for the second case, and 15 cases for one day. And if the question is --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: We sometimes have that too.

A. So if the question is regarding the amount which should be paid, why should the judge to look for another job and consider some other issues? Especially if it's not raised by any party.

But when this issue was in the focus, three levels came to this conclusion. How can I as a lawyer ignore all this without getting any support anywhere? In court we cannot bring Professor Sukhanov's or somebody else's opinions. The judges will laugh at us.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm sure they won't. But can I ask one last question about this, I just want to clarify exactly what you're saying.

We saw Article 434 had two prohibitions, the one prohibition was about individuals entering into partnership with legal entities, correct? And the other prohibition was about individuals entering into partnerships with each other for anything more than basic needs, yes?

A. Yes, and the prohibition to enter into agreement with legal entities, as far as I remember, was indicated only regarding socialist organisations.

Q. Well, "legal entities" in fact is the way it's put by Professor Sukhanov and others. But you accept, I think, that so far as the first of those prohibitions is concerned, that had gone by 1995?

A. Of course. There were no socialist organisations anymore.

Q. Well, in fact it refers, as we've seen in the literature, to "legal entities". What I want to understand from you is: is it your case that it is only the second limb that somehow survived, the restriction on partnership on individuals for anything other than basic needs?

A. Individuals had to enter into joint activity agreements not for personal needs in forms of legal entities, that's correct.

MR RABINOWITZ: All right. I suggest to you that you're wrong and Dr Rachkov is right but we're not going to go round that one again.

My Lady, this is in fact a convenient moment.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well.

MR RABINOWITZ: I can tell your Ladyship, all I have left for Mr Rozenberg are the limitation issues. Depending on how it goes, it will take between one hour and three depending on how it goes, but I would expect, if we start at 10.00, we should easily finish in the morning. Overnight we will consider whether we need Professor Maggs at all.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. You can deem having put all the points to him.

MR RABINOWITZ: That's my -- and I need to be clear with your Ladyship what the position is. Professor Maggs doesn't cover any other ground. In relation to two of the issues he suggests a further reason why he says his view is to be preferred. We need to take a view ourselves as to whether it really is necessary to go through that further --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But if, for example, in relation to a particular issue, he does say, "And there is an additional reason", it doesn't seem to me that I can be prevented from considering that reason.

MR RABINOWITZ: No, we're not for a moment saying that your Ladyship shouldn't consider it. But if for example it's in relation to an issue where we have identified a series of reasons why that ultimate conclusion is wrong, then, in my respectful submission, it may not assist your Ladyship to hear us try and trash the further reason.

I'm not for a moment suggesting that the other side can't rely on Professor Maggs' further reason, but I suggest it just would not be an efficient use of time to go over all the same ground again.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, I can see that.

I'll hear from Mr Sumption.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, I should point out that there is one aspect of Professor Maggs's opinion on which I would like to cross-examine him. In the circumstances, I do not think that it would be right for me to cross-examine him in an adversarial manner or using leading questions, I wouldn't propose to do that. But there is a particular aspect which Professor Maggs deals with, which other expert witnesses have not dealt with, on which I would like him to explain the basis of his view for your Ladyship's assistance.

So unless Professor Maggs is withdrawn by Mr Adkin, he may need to be called so that I may cross-examine him.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

Mr Rabinowitz, I'll leave it to you, but I'm not requiring you to go through the same exercise with Professor Maggs. I will take things as challenged.

If there's a different point, you can either leave it, as it were, for me to consider in the light of your reasons or you can challenge him, but I think that's a view you must take.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm not suggesting that everyone says "That's fine," no one can rely on that at all, my Lady, that's very much the position.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You run the risk, but that's a matter for you, that if you don't challenge his additional reason, without that challenge I might be persuaded by it.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm grateful, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Adkin.

MR ADKIN: My Lady, I'm grateful for that. That's precisely the approach that we propose to take as well. I quite understand that my learned friend doesn't want to replicate his cross-examination of Mr Rozenberg, but there are points that Professor Maggs addresses in his reports which are supplemental to those made by Mr Rozenberg. If my learned friend chooses not to cross-examine on those points --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, I'm not going to take them as accepted, I'm going to put them into the bucket and work out what, at the end of the day, I consider the answer is.

MR ADKIN: My Lady, exactly. And he fails to cross-examine, as it were, at his own risk.
