MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well I don't think he's failing; the arguments will all be there.

MR ADKIN: Chooses not to.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: He won't by default have accepted them.

MR RABINOWITZ: That I think is certainly my position and I'm grateful for your Ladyship's indication.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay, so we're not going to finish the evidence this week, it doesn't look like.

MR RABINOWITZ: It depends on how much history cross-examination there is. I understand from Mr Sumption that he will be very short. Mr Gillis is dealing with Mr Sumption's history expert. I don't think he's going to be very long but he is very likely to be longer than Mr Sumption is, from the sounds of it.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, I think I will probably be very roughly an hour with Professor Fortescue.

Since, as I understand it, the point being made by my learned friends about Professor Service is that he doesn't say anything, it shouldn't take them very long to cross-examine on the subject.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay. Well, I'll sit at 10 o'clock tomorrow. I think, but I'm not sure, I may have a meeting before court but I'll try to be here by 10.00.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm grateful, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Again, don't talk about your evidence to anyone.

Very well. 10 o'clock tomorrow.

MR RABINOWITZ: Good morning, Mr Rozenberg.

A. Good morning.

Q. Can we first move to deal with the issue of the limitation period for claims arising under Article 1064.

If we can take up the joint memorandum, it's at bundle 6/1, tab 1, page 37 G(A)6/1.01/37. If you look at paragraph 116, you can see:

"It is agreed that the [basic] limitation period for a claim under Article 1064 is three years, and that the limitation period runs from the date on which the claimant knew or should have known about the violation of his rights."

If you turn over the page to paragraph 118, at the top of the page, you see it's also agreed as follows, just looking at the first sentence there:

"It is agreed that, when the court at the request of the defendant establishes that limitation period has elapsed, the claim must be dismissed unless the Court restores the limitation period under Article 205 or it is an abuse of right for the defendant to raise a limitation defence contrary to Article 10."

So this is right, isn't it: where a claim is brought outside the three-year limitation period, it will be dismissed unless either the court restores the limitation period under Article 205, or it is an abuse of right for the defendant to rely on a limitation defence contrary to Article 10?

A. Yes.

Q. Then just looking at the next sentence of paragraph 118 of the joint memorandum, we see that you summarise your position and you say:

"Mr Rozenberg maintains that the latter options may take place only in highly exceptional circumstances, where either impossibility of the claimant to timely apply to the court or defendant's intentional actions effectively preventing the claimant to do so are established."

Can we just look at what Article 205 says, and we have it set out in the joint memorandum and we may as well take it from there.

Paragraph 119, just read that to yourself if you would. (Pause)

A. Yes.

Q. You're familiar with that. So it applies, does it not, in exceptional cases, and that, I think, is something you agreed at paragraph 120, subparagraph 1 of the joint memorandum. It applies:

"In exceptional cases [where] the court considers that the reason for the lapsing of the limitation period is justifiable by reason of circumstances connected with the claimant's person (a serious illness, a helpless state, illiteracy [and the like]) ..."

Then if the claimant is a citizen, an individual, the court may defend their right and grant the claim; is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Then we see in the last sentence that:

"The reasons for [missing] the limitation period may be... justifiable if they existed in the last six months of the limitation period..."

Correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Still staying with the joint memorandum for a while longer. If you look at paragraph 120, subparagraph 2, we see that you and Dr Rachkov agree that whether Article 205 may apply obviously depends upon the particular facts of the case, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. And then at subparagraph 3, you also agree that:

"Article 205 does not [provide] an exhaustive list of circumstances that could justify a restoration of the limitation period."

A. Yes, the list is not exhaustive but gives some guidance to courts.

Q. Indeed. Now, again, if you look at paragraph 121, I just want to see what is in issue and what is not in issue. You identify what is in dispute, and you say, we see this at subparagraph 1 of 121:

"Mr Rozenberg maintains that [the] Russian courts are, almost without exception, only prepared to restore the limitation period where the claimant is seriously physically disabled or incapacitated in some other way. He maintains that the standard is a strict one: what must be shown is the effective 'impossibility' [you say] of a claimant applying to the court in time."

That's your position, is it?

A. Yes.

Q. It must be effectively impossible?

A. It should be the situation when the claimant has no choice.

Q. Okay. And we can see what Dr Rachkov says, just looking at subparagraph 2. If you read that to yourself, you see he sets out his position there. (Pause)

Then just looking at subparagraph 3 of 121, again this is your position. You say:

"Mr Rozenberg maintains that the invocation of 'stress' or 'fear' by the claimant where such 'stress' or 'fear' was allegedly caused by the defendant is inadequate to satisfy the test under Article 205, as supported by court practice. Otherwise, a limitation period could rarely be successfully invoked because a claimant would simply need to allege 'stress' coming from the defendant's action and preventing the timely filing of the claim."

This in fact reflects a point you make in your reports, and I wonder if we can just look at what you say there. G(A)3/1, tab 1, page 46, and I want to look at paragraph 147 G(A)3/1.01/46 of your third report.

At page 46, paragraph 147, just looking for the moment at the first sentence, you say:

"The invocation of 'stress' or 'fear' [you say] is inadequate to satisfy the test under Article 205."

Then you cite the case of Guseletov.

In the same report, if you then turn to page 51 so we can see what you said at paragraph 160, subparagraph (d), you see the last sentence of that G(A)3/1.01/51. You say:

"... the Russian court practice is clear that [the] mere assertion of 'fear' (even fear of one's own murder) [you say] is generally insufficient for the purposes of Article 205."

Now, can I just make sure that I understand what you are saying here, Mr Rozenberg. You are saying that if a person is incapacitated and unable to sue, then Article 205 may apply. But if a person is in fear, even if in fear of their own murder, then Article 205 cannot apply. Is that your position?

A. It's not only my position, it's the position of Russian courts, and the case of Guseletov confirmed it because in this case it's clear that a person seriously feared to be murdered, and there were correspondent materials of the law enforcement authorities confirming it. But at the same time the facts assessed by the court indicated that the person was not completely paralysed and incapacitated by this fear, and therefore there was still options in the behaviour of the person. Therefore for this person the court did not restore the missed limitation period.

Q. I'm not going to get into the facts of Guseletov with you at the moment. It's in fact a case where the person who he was worried about murdering him had actually been arrested prior to the period of limitation beginning to run. But what I want to do is just test your general proposition that this could be Russian law.

Let us just take an example, if we may. Suppose that I have a claim that I wish to pursue and that before I issue the claim, towards the end of the limitation period, gunmen surround my house and they say that if I leave my house or telephone for help I will be shot. I am frightened and the house is isolated and I remain inside. The limitation period passes. Do you say that Article 205 will apply in that case?

- A. It's always for the court to assess the facts. What you described looks like a person was really victim of serious crime already in the process of being committed, not simply some threats but a real crime committed in reality, in the particular short period of time, and the person was completely incapacitated. There was no way to go to the police, there was no way to hide somewhere, just the person was practically paralysed by gunmen.

In this situation, the probability that the court may assess the facts differently in comparison with Guseletov case is high.

- Q. I think the short way of putting that answer is that you would say that Article 205 would apply in those circumstances?

- A. Again, it always depends on facts.

- Q. Indeed.

- A. If I correctly understood you, the person had no choice. The person was completely incapacitated by gunmen surrounding his house.

Q. Very good. Now, what if the gunmen do not in fact surround my house but they don't need to because they're notorious gangsters, well known for violence, and they simply issue a threat to me that if I sue their associate I will be tortured and then killed in a particularly horrible way, and as a result of this threat, and because I don't particularly want to be tortured or die, I heed this threat against me issuing the proceedings and the limitation period expires.

Do you say in those circumstances Article 205 would apply or not?

A. Again, it's always for the court to assess the facts, but the way how you describe the situation, in my view, looks similar with rather numerous situations in our country when there were various threats of people connected with criminal circles.

I don't have the court practice supporting the petitions to restore missed limitation period on the basis of threats. Threats, unfortunately, sometimes -- I wouldn't say widespread, but still take place not very rarely. And in my view, in this situation, a person has choices. It's possible to apply to law enforcement authorities to go somewhere, just -- it's necessary to assess the facts but, as you described, the person was not paralysed and incapacitated.

Q. So you are saying that in a situation in which there is a credible threat made that if I issue the proceeding I will be murdered, and as a result I'm in fear of being murdered if I issue the proceedings, you say that that is not a basis upon which Article 205 could apply. Is that your evidence?

A. Again, it depends on facts. If, after receiving this murder, the person didn't go to the police, didn't go to the hospital because of some mental problems, there are no certificates from the law enforcement authorities, from the medical establishments, the behaviour of the person proved that he or she continued doing business, going to the office, acting in some other ways, then only the threat of murder which, unfortunately, is not exceptional in my view and according to the existing Russian court practice, probably will not be sufficient.

But, of course, you ask me every time to act instead of judges, it's difficult. But preliminarily, the way how you described the situation, it doesn't look that the claimant was paralysed, incapacitated, but there is available evidence which would be sufficient basis for a court to restore the missed limitation period.

Q. I don't want you to misunderstand that example, Mr Rozenberg, because I think you might have.

The threat of murder is if the person issues the proceedings, in other words, the threat relates to the issue of the proceedings. So it's perfectly possible for this person to go about their everyday life because a threat is only a real threat should he issue proceedings. But your evidence, I take it, is the same, is it, that Russian law would not allow Article 205 to apply?

A. It is, because otherwise a restoration of statute of limitation will not be exceptional. And the way you described it still leaves a lot of things unclear: why the person, after having received this threat, did not do anything and actually was not incapacitated if it was a really very serious threat.

Q. You see, I suggest that that is an extreme position and doesn't accord with Russian law.

Let me put another example to you, I think I can anticipate your answer but let me put it nonetheless. Let's assume that the threat in the case that I put to you, the example I've put to you, is not that they will murder me but that they will murder my wife if I issue these proceedings. Is your answer that that too is not exceptional and that that is not a sufficient reason to suspend the running of the limitation period, or to restore the limitation period?

A. Well, mostly the Russian law considers close relatives as persons as valuable for an individual as his own life or health, and if just the spouses live together and there is no evidence regarding just hostility(?) or anything else of course, I think it doesn't matter whether the threat was issued regarding the husband or regarding his wife or his child. Still the question remains whether the person was totally incapacitated, for example, went to the police and found out that the police was in conspiracy with those who were threatening him and there was no way to go anywhere just to find some other options where at least the person didn't think about finding some options, then I'm afraid that according to the existing Russian court practice, chances are not very high that only allegations of murder will be sufficient.

In Russian courts, sometimes we see threats of murder connected with various transactions, various problems in offices. Only threat of murder itself, not confirmed by other very serious facts, usually is not sufficient. That's what I can tell you on the basis of the existing practice. And you do not provide other evidence regarding involvement of other criminals and real incapacitation of a person in your suggestions.

Q. You see, Mr Rozenberg, you seem to be suggesting that threats of murder are not an exceptional circumstance in Russia, but you cite cases in the context of Article 205 in which parties have had difficulty complying with the limitation period because they've taken a business trip.

Are you suggesting that business trips are exceptional or more exceptional than threats of murder in Russia?

- A. I am afraid either you misunderstood me or you suggest something totally different because, in the first example, when the threat of murder was real and government surrounded the house, I readily accepted your example as basis for restoration of missed statute of limitation.

Your other examples looked familiar to me with many cases considered by Russian courts because, as I told you, threats of murder are not exceptional. From time to time they happen between commercial men in various situations, unfortunately even in day-to-day life sometimes between neighbours, between sometimes relatives, threat of murder takes place.

Russian court practice usually does not take the threat of murder itself without serious facts serving as additional evidence as basis for applying rules which, according to the law, are exceptional. If the law dictates that it's exceptional, it cannot be applied on day-to-day basis. And with threats of murder, again, unfortunately, but in real life courts will have to do it rather often.

It depends on facts, this is my final word.

Q. Okay, we have your answer on that then.

Can I just stay with your fifth report in bundle G(A)3/1, tab 3, and can we look at paragraph 45, please, on page 205 G(A)3/1.03/205. This is one of the other points you make about the way you say Article 205 applies, and you say:

"Secondly, Article 205 expressly states that the reasons for restoring the limitation period must be connected with the claimant's 'person'. This has been underlined by the Russian courts on many occasions. It has been held, for example, that Article 205 cannot be invoked where the incapacity in question relates to the claimant's spouse or other third persons..."

Then you refer to a St Petersburg court decision and you then say this:

"Consequently, Mr Berezovsky cannot, in any event, rely on facts relating to Mr Glushkov to invoke Article 205 himself."

Again, can I just make sure I understand your view correctly. Now, I think you accepted that in my first example, where gunmen surround the house and threaten to kill me and as a result I don't leave the house, that that would be a sufficient basis to invoke Article 205, correct?

A. In my view, if the threat was real and the person was incapacitated as you described, yes.

Q. All right. Let's assume that instead of me being in the house, again my poor wife is in the house surrounded by gunmen and they threaten to kill her if I go and start the claim.

Just assume for the purpose of these examples, Mr Rozenberg, that all of these threats can be supported by evidence. I don't want you to suggest that, you know, you can't support these threats: these are the facts, they have threatened that they will kill my wife if I issue these proceedings. Are you saying that because the person who is incapacitated, or the person who is the subject of the incapacity by virtue of being surrounded and whose life is at risk is my wife, that in those circumstances Article 205 cannot apply to me, however much I love my wife and would rather she was not killed?

A. I think I already gave the answer saying that, in many situations, courts understand that life of wife or child may be as valuable for a person like his own, and the question investigated by courts in this situation is whether the threat or the condition of spouse or child really incapacitated the claimant.

There is one case where the spouse was seriously sick and it wasn't a question of whether the claimant loved the spouse. The question was whether the sickness required claimant's presence and really incapacitated him. The same here. Answering your question, it's necessary to understand for the court assessing the facts that this threat addressed to the spouse, or even the child, really incapacitated the claimant. There was no choice, he had to behave only this way.

Q. I see. So it isn't your evidence that something done to a third person could never be a reason, a justifiable reason, for me not issuing the proceedings? You're not suggesting that?

A. I understand, and in my view courts understand the same way, that a person may be affected by serious threat to a very close relative as well as to himself and may become incapacitated by this threat. Therefore threats, serious threats, real threats, to wife or child may incapacitate the claimant therefore affecting his personality, and missed period of limitation, in my view, must be restored in such situations.

Q. I follow. So it's a question of fact, and you look to see as to the effect that the position affecting the third party has had on the potential claimant?

A. Absolutely correct. I wouldn't say -- I wouldn't choose an extremely narrow approach saying that if the threat is amongst the relatives it doesn't affect the claimant.

I agree.

Q. All right. Now, I just want to ask you about the suggestion that the test is one of effective impossibility, which is the way you put it in your report.

Do you accept that although you put it on the basis of effective impossibility, there are other commentaries and cases that put the test differently and, in particular, that they speak of circumstances creating a practical impediment or hindrance for the claim?

A. Practical impediment, practical obstacle, in my view creates impossibility, if it's a real obstacle.

Q. So you persist in saying it has to be actually impossible, do you, to issue the claim?

A. I understand the court practice I reviewed, and some scholars, that that's what moved Article 205. And again, though the list is not exhaustive but serves as some guidance, that's what Article 205 dictates to court.

Q. Again, I suggest that's an extreme position and is not supported by the commentators and certainly not by all the cases.

Can we just go to see what Professor Farshatov says about this. Can you go to bundle G(A)2/4 at tab 28 G(A)2/4.28/220. This is an extract from Professor Farshatov's work on "Period of limitation. Legislation: theory and practice", 2004.

In the middle of the page, you can see that Professor Farshatov, after identifying the elements of Article 205 and the fact that there is a discretion, says this:

"The above list of circumstances... is not exhaustive, and is subject to expansive interpretation..."

That is in the course of examining a particular case, other circumstances may also come to light which serve as grounds for restoration, in particular the death or loss of relatives, loss of or damage to property in connection with fires, terrorist acts or crimes.

This suggests that so far as Professor Farshatov is concerned, an expansive range of circumstances may potentially justify Article 205 applying. Presumably you agree with that?

- A. It's a very broad statement, very vague, so it's difficult to argue. But potentially, yes, again if the effect on the personality of claimant was as strong as dictated by Article 205.

Q. You see also he gives examples of the death or loss of a relative being a sufficient basis, and, again, I take it you don't dispute that provided it has the requisite effect on the claimant, correct?

A. Absolutely correct. It depends on facts because sometimes a person is totally incapacitated by death of relative, and then one of English books, a trip to funerals(?) of the father, was the most pleasant event for the personage, so it depends.

Q. All right, you can put that away for the moment.

Can you go to bundle 4/8, tab 5 G(A)4/8.05/38.

This is an article by Professor Maleina on Article 205 and it's an article I think you cite in your report.

A. I think I remember it.

Q. In fact this is your translation of it, yes?

A. Not my personal translation.

Q. No, okay.

You see at the beginning of the article the professor writes of Article 205 that:

"The legislator speaks of possibilities to use this mechanism in 'exceptional cases'."

Then it says this:

"However, Article 205... is widely applied in the current court practice."

Presumably you accept that that is correct?

A. I'm sorry, because I was given the Russian text. What page in the English?

Q. It's page 38, it's the first --

A. The beginning, yes.

Q. Tell me if you want me to repeat the question.

A. Well, the beginning of the article is clear, and what is the question?

Q. You see that she says:

"The legislator speaks of possibilities to use this mechanism in 'exceptional cases'. However, Article 205... is widely applied in the current court practice."

My question to you was: presumably you don't dispute that?

A. It depends what she means. Broad, because, as I said, I remember this article. If you read the last sentence of this article it looks like it's a little bit in contradiction with this beginning of the article.

Maybe we need to be sure that the translation is correct.

Q. Don't worry, Mr Rozenberg, I'll go to that last sentence, and I suggest it's not in contradiction at all. But I don't yet, I think, have an answer as to whether you dispute what Professor Maleina says about this being widely applied?

- A. Unfortunately I have to dispute it because, first, if the law indicates in 'exceptional cases', it's not quite clear for me why she wrote that it was applied broadly.

Of course, as counsel correctly indicated in the submissions, in Russia more than 1 million of commercial disputes are considered every year, and if you take even one tenth of per cent it will be already more than 1,000. Therefore several dozens of cases may look like broad application but, according to my practice and the practice of my colleagues preparing this report -- I even checked with my colleagues -- and we found out that nobody had in his or her practice restored missed statute of limitation.

The cases when the court recognised that the statute of limitation was missed I remember very well and I'm aware of them. But when it was restored we usually read in some publications. But neither I nor the lawyers whom I know ever had in their practice the case with restored missed limitation period. And now we read Maleina, who writes about a broad application. Before this, there was another article where it was indicated that the broad interpretation may take place. Unfortunately, it happens from time to time with scholars.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So you dispute the last sentence of that --

A. I dispute about broad application.

Again, if you take the whole of Russia maybe several dozens can be found, but if it's out of more than 1 million, it's just a small portion of per cent. And in the real practice of practising lawyers it's very difficult to find such cases.

I personally never have. I checked through 30 years of my practice, both in the Soviet Union and in Russia, I don't remember a single case where either at my petition or at the petition of the other side the missed statute of limitation was restored. Although I remember very well cases when this missed statute of limitation was confirmed -- applied by the court and the claim was dismissed.

MR RABINOWITZ: All right. That answer is clear.

Professor Maleina is in fact one of the writers that you cite yourself, is she not?

A. Yes.

Q. All right. For the reference, that's at your fifth report, paragraph 28, I'm not going to turn that up.

Can we just look at what else Professor Maleina says. If you go to page 41 G(A)4/8.05/41. Again I'm primarily focusing on Professor Maleina's focus on what can constitute a justifiable reason, and she starts to deal with that towards the bottom of page 41, where she says:

"The third condition for reinstatement ... is associated with the estimation of the ground for missing the period of limitation."

The way she structures this article is to identify a series of grounds and then to comment on them. The first circumstance that she identifies here is state of health, and she says, this is the last paragraph on page 41:

"The courts take into account different diagnosis and conditions. The more so because there is no such diagnosis as 'a serious illness'. For example, the omission of the period of limitation was recognised legitimate because the copies of the contested decisions were served to the claimant when she was pregnant and had a high-risk pregnancy..."

Just pausing there, a high-risk pregnancy does not make it physically impossible to bring a claim, Mr Rozenberg.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, it all depends on the facts, doesn't it.

MR RABINOWITZ: Well, it does depend on the facts. What a high-risk pregnancy suggests is that there would be stress associated with litigation and, because of that, the person who has a high-risk pregnancy is excused.

MR SUMPTION: With respect, my learned friend needs to refer the witness to the whole of the sentence and not just the first eight words of it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm perfectly happy to look at that.

"... had a high-risk pregnancy (late gestosis and risk of premature birth) due to which she was constantly treated either in hospital or as a non-resident patient."

So she wasn't incapacitated in the sense that she couldn't get to where she needed to get, was she?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, it just depends, Mr Rabinowitz.

I just don't think this is going anywhere, whether this particular claimant could or couldn't. It just depends.

MR RABINOWITZ: All right.

MR RABINOWITZ: Yes. I'm not going to labour the point.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Whether this particular lady was or was not able -- that's a Friday pun, I think.

MR RABINOWITZ: That's a Friday pun. All right.

A. If you allow me, my Lady, I can only add --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Make a point but make it briefly, please.

A. I make it very briefly, that usually it depends if medical documents submitted. If they indicate that the condition was very serious such evidence usually impresses courts in my view, in my practice. So if it was described as very serious condition it could work.

MR RABINOWITZ: Let me just go to the last sentence of this article which is the sentence that you like, Mr Rozenberg. Page 43, you see she says:

"The justifiable reasons are those which entail the absolute impossibility of filing a claim or which cause a practical impediment to apply to the court."

So she's treating these two things as different, do you accept that?

A. In my view the translation is clear enough because, in Russian, "absolute impossibility" means that it's really absolutely impossible, and "practical impediment" in this context is in line with that.

In other words, in my view, this last sentence to some extent contradicts the words about very broad application of Article 205.

Q. You see, I suggest the last sentence contradicts your position. Your position is that it has to be effectively impossible, and what the last sentence actually says is that, in addition to circumstances where it is impossible, Article 205 could also be applied where there is a practical impediment.

Do you dispute that?

- A. I understand at least the Russian sentence that "absolute" covers the meaning of the sentence, and it's not something easy and not problematic. It indicates that it's really something exceptional, I mean in line with the wording of Article 205, and not leading us to the conclusion that broad application is justified.
- Q. Can we look at one or two cases, and I'm not going to take you to too many cases because in a sense what we're interested in is the principle rather than particular cases.

Can you go, please, to bundle G(A)4/2, tab 94, the case of Shirokikh G(A)4/2.94/298. We are not really interested I think in the claim itself, what we're interested in is the reasons why the limitation period was missed and whether that reason was regarded as justifiable, so let's just focus on that.

If you turn to page 299 G(A)4/2.94/299, halfway down the page, do you see the sentence beginning:

"The court established that LI Shirokikh learned of the resolution ..."

Do you have that paragraph?

- A. Yes. If I understand, this is the case regarding the resolution of the general meeting of shareholders.

Q. Correct.

A. And the issue relates to the missed limitation period for appealing, complaining against the resolution.

Q. Yes. And what I'm interested in, in this, Mr Rozenberg, is the last sentence here:

"The Arbitrazh court rightly did not acknowledge [the claimant's] bringing action to a general court to protect his labour rights, or his receiving outpatient treatment between 18.04.2003 and 30.04.2003, as exceptional events, because they could not be treated by the court as having hindered bringing action to the Arbitrazh court to seek [the] invalidation of the resolution of the shareholders' meeting."

The way the court appears to be putting it here is by asking whether these were matters which hindered the bringing of the claim. Do you say that is the court applying the wrong test because they should have asked, rather, whether it made impossible the bringing of the claim?

A. If you allow me, my Lady, just a small comment, because I'm not sure that we need to go too deeply in this case because general conclusions I made relate to commercial disputes. But with appeals, complaints, regarding either resolutions of shareholders meetings or sometimes even court decisions the practice is different.

The courts generally -- first, of course, the limitation periods are much shorter in these situations, and, second, courts do not consider restoration of limitation periods regarding resolutions of bodies governing the companies, or even sometimes court acts, as really putting at risk the stability and certainty of civil law relations, civil law rights and obligations.

I am ready to go much deeper regarding this concrete case, but I would definitely say that what I mentioned, speaking about my practice and practice of my colleagues, of course it does not relate to missed limitation periods regarding court acts and sometimes resolutions of shareholders meetings, courts are usually more liberal here, but if you suggest we can analyse more seriously the circumstances in this situation.

But generally, the approach that it's not the stability and certainty of civil law rights and obligations regarding general limitation periods, either three years or one year in commercial disputes, but regarding these relatively short periods connected with concrete decisions the approach is different.

Q. Mr Rozenberg, are you suggesting that the severity of the tests varies depending on the length of the limitation period, that sometimes it's a test of impossibility but for shorter periods you have some different test, is that your evidence?

A. Regarding resolutions of shareholders meetings, the approach may be a little bit softer according to my observations. But I am not denying that the law should be observed, and let's check the facts how they are presented here. However, just I simply need to make clear what I said not to be misunderstood, because for decisions, concrete acts, either of governing bodies or courts, the approach is different in comparison with other disputes.

Q. I think you may be agreeing with what I'm going to put to you.

Isn't it in fact the case that the test is always the same but how it applies will depend on the facts of the particular case?

A. Well, again, what I remember from the court hearings I affected, usually the facts which are assessed are regarding resolutions of shareholders meetings, it's not whether the claimant was totally incapacitated and was in such serious condition, like with bringing other claims. But theoretically, the court may indicate absolutely the same grounds for rejecting or restoring the missed limitation period.

I am here to say what I observed, what I noticed during long practice. But let's see, we can go into concrete facts if you wish. But mostly, it's again the assessment of facts, it's at the discretion of courts.

If I mention that, for example, medical documents impress courts, according to my practice. It's not clearly indicated in laws. But this is the conclusion I made, and other practice lawyers would confirm the same --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, I think you've given your answer on this question.

Please can you go on, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm just going to take you to one other case of a similar sort. In the same bundle can you go to tab 93, the case of Puls, O against Puls G(A)4/2.93/293.

If you're on page 293 at tab 93, if you look at the third paragraph, you see that the Arbitrazh Court had dismissed O's claim as being out of time. Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Then in the next paragraph we see that this was reversed by the Court of Appeal.

Then if you go to page 294 G(A)4/2.93/294 over the page, just below the middle of the page, you have the paragraph beginning "As evidence of the validity", do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. "As evidence of the validity of her reason for missing the limitation period, the claimant submitted medical statements ... which show that beginning 14 December 2001 and for a period of 7 months, O was prescribed a regimen of strict bed-rest, followed by ambulatory care from October 2002."

So it looks as though she was confined to bed for a six-month period followed by a period of ambulatory care.

Is ambulatory care care which doesn't involve, presumably, being confined to a bed, correct?

A. I apologise, but it's necessary to study documents in case of serious issues, medical expert may be called. It's the question of assessment of facts.

Q. You see, I entirely agree with that, Mr Rozenberg, we don't disagree about that. The question is whether there's some principle involved which really does suggest it has to be actually impossible.

Because this is a case where, although you could take a view that for as long as she was confined to bed it was actually impossible, once she was not confined to bed it might have been difficult for her to start the proceedings, and therefore there was an impediment to it, but it wasn't actually impossible. Do you agree with that or not?

A. I think it's for the court to assess the facts and to decide whether it was impossible or not impossible, but...

Q. All right. Now, I'm not going to go through all of these cases because, as you say and I agree, it always depends on the facts, and we're just interested in the principle.

I just want to see if I need to take you to the St Petersburg case, I don't even think I need to take you to that. Let me just check about the St Petersburg case.

I think we've agreed that even a problem with a third person can be sufficient as long as it has the requisite effect on the claimant, you would say it means actually impossible, I would suggest the test is lower. But the point is you could have a situation in which something done to a third person could be a reason, provided it does really create a real problem for the institution of the claim?

A. As I answered already, unfortunately I had not such cases in my practice, but my reading of the law and of some court cases indicating that it's necessary to investigate what was the condition of the spouse, and whether the claimant had to stay with the spouse all the time, indicates that the claimant may be perfectly healthy. But if his or her spouse needs care then the facts are and shall be assessed by courts as affecting the personality of the claimant.

Therefore, you call them third persons, I would say just persons close to the claimant may be taken into account.

Q. That's all I was going to ask you about Article 205, Mr Rozenberg, I think we've discussed the principles enough. Can we then just talk about abuse of rights and Article 10, please.

If we go to G(A)2/1, tab 6, page 105, we have Article 10 on the left-hand side G(A)2/1.06/105, it's rather small print, headed "Limits of Exercise of Civil-Law Rights", the first paragraph provides that:

"Actions of citizens and legal persons taken exclusively with the intention to cause harm to another person are not allowed, nor is abuse of a legal right allowed in other forms."

The second sentence is concerned with competition and that doesn't concern us.

Then the second paragraph of Article 10 provides that:

"In case of failure to observe the requirements provided by Paragraph 1 of the present Article, the court, commercial court, or arbitration tribunal may refuse the person protection of the right belonging to him."

So the idea is that you're not allowed to act exclusively with the intention of causing harm to another person, and nor are you allowed to abuse a legal right in other forms. That's Article 10.1, correct?

A. Yes, that's what the law states.

Q. If you do one of these two things, then the consequence is the court may deny you the protection of your right, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Let's just see what you say about this in your joint memorandum because I think the dispute between you and Dr Rachkov here is very narrow indeed. Bundle 6/1, page 39 G(A)6/1.01/39.

A. Yes.

Q. If you look at paragraph 122, you see it says:

"It is agreed that Article 10 may be invoked by the claimant in rebutting the limitation period defence. Where this occurs, the court may prevent the defendant from applying the consequences of a limitation defence if the fact of abuse of right[s] by the defendant is established."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. So you accept that in principle a claimant may rely on Article 10 in rebutting a limitation defence, correct?

A. In principle, yes, the law gives a basis for it.

Q. Can we just then look at the circumstances in which you say this may occur. If you go back to page 38 of the joint memorandum and you look at paragraph 118, we looked at it in the context of Article 205 but let's just look at it with Article 10 in mind G(A)6/1.01/38. Here you agree that:

"... when the court at the request of the defendant establishes that limitation period has lapsed, a claim [may] be dismissed unless the Court restores the limitation period under Article 205 or it is an abuse of right for the defendant to raise a limitation defence contrary to Article 10. Mr Rozenberg maintains that the latter options may take place only in highly exceptional circumstances, where either impossibility of the claimant to timely apply to the court or defendant's intentional actions effectively preventing the claimant to do so are established."

I think what you accept here is that where the defendant's intentional actions effectively prevent the claimant from bringing his claim in a timely manner, then Article 10 may be invoked?

A. Yes.

Q. Just to be clear about what you mean here, can we then go to paragraph 123 of the joint memorandum G(A)6/1.01/39.

A. Yes.

Q. You say at 123(1) that you maintain that:

"... for Article 10 to apply what is required is that the defendant, by his particular actions, intentionally prevented the claimant from timely bringing his/her claim. Mr Rozenberg maintains that this concept is applied by the courts extremely rarely in circumstances having nothing [to do] with the present case."

Again that's your acknowledgement that as long as there is intention that is enough.

I just want to take you to, if I can, your report at G(A)3/1, tab 3, page 213 G(A)3/1.03/213.

You say at paragraph 73, just picking up from where you say "I should clarify":

"... I should clarify [what I mean] when I speak of 'intention' I am referring to both 'direct' and 'indirect' intention. I do not mean that it need be shown in all cases that the abusing party specifically had it subjectively and consciously in his mind at the relevant time that his acts would cause the claimant to miss the limitation period ('direct intention'). Rather [you say] it must be possible to conclude that a person in the position of the defendant would reasonably have foreseen ... that the claimant would be prevented from bringing the claim in time ..."

So I think what you're saying there is that if Mr Abramovich intimidated Mr Berezovsky and could reasonably have foreseen that this would cause Mr Berezovsky to miss the limitation period, then Article 10 would apply to exclude Mr Abramovich's limitation defence. Is that right?

- A. Well, I'm afraid this description is closer to negligence, but indirect intention means that the person was indifferent to the consequences, maybe the result will come, maybe it will not. But I think that it's just a broad view, a little bit I would say more liberal than the view of some scholars who think that, for Article 10, the direct intention is required.

My view that indirect is also possible; but indirect, it doesn't mean that committing intentionally some actions a person wants to reach only one concrete result. The person may be indifferent, understanding that these actions may bring to this result and may not. But it's difference between direct and indirect intention.

- Q. The expression you use here is "reasonably foreseen", and I take it you're not departing from that. As long as it can be reasonably foreseen that the person's act will have this consequence, you accept that that would be enough?
- A. It's one of the elements, but with negligence a person still would prefer to avoid the consequences, even if they can be reasonably foreseen. With indirect intention the person doesn't want to avoid the consequence, the person is simply indifferent regarding them.
- Q. The issue, as I understand it, between yourself and Dr Rachkov is that whereas you accept that as long as there is intention, direct or indirect, that is sufficient. Dr Rachkov says as long as there is a causal effect, or a causal relationship between the act of the defendant and the claimant's failing to sue, or incapacity to sue, that is enough. Is that --
- A. Unfortunately, it's not quite in accordance with the law which still mentions the word "intention" because, as you described, again it can be done by negligence. Only the result and casual (sic) link would be sufficient.
- But intention -- the law does not clearly mentions direct intention but still intention is required.
- MR RABINOWITZ: All right, Mr Rozenberg, thank you for that.

My Lady, I don't have any further questions for Mr Rozenberg.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, thank you very much.

Mr Adkin?

MR ADKIN: My Lady, I have no questions for this witness.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Sumption?

Re-examination by MR SUMPTION

MR SUMPTION: Mr Rozenberg, I wonder if you could be given bundle G(A)7/1, flag 6 G(A)7/1.06/38.

This is the case, you may recall being referred to it yesterday, of the lost original agreement and the two versions about the date of repayment of a loan.

Do you remember being referred to that case?

A. Yes, of course.

Q. I wonder if I can hand up -- we have had this uploaded on to Magnum but I'm not sure whether it's there yet -- a copy of the article of the Civil Code that is referred to in this case. You will probably have it with you in another version. (Handed)

MR RABINOWITZ: It's actually G(A)7/2.05/17.

MR SUMPTION: Right, I'm grateful.

If you look at page 42 in the English version towards the bottom of the page you will see that the decision of the court was that the due date of the performance of this obligation must be determined in accordance with the requirements of Article 810, sub-article 1. And you will find that Article there. Reading from the English, it's the second paragraph of Article 810, at sub-1:

"In cases where the period for return is not established [this is return of the loan monies] by the contract, or is defined as the time of demand, the sum... must be returned... within thirty days from the... receipt of [the] demands..."

Can you help us on which of the conditions for the application of this article to the loan agreement case in front of you was satisfied in this case? What was it in other words about the circumstances of this case that gave rise to the application of Article 810?

A. I think we need to read carefully what the court said:

"In the absence of the original loan agreement, the borrower is under the obligation to [repay] the loan considering that it has been proven that the lender has actually performed the obligation to extend the loan to the borrower and the due date for the performance of this obligation must be determined in accordance with the requirements of Article 110 (sic) section 1."

I think that here we cannot say that the agreement did not establish because the agreement existed.

Q. Yes. Have you finished your answer, Mr Rozenberg?

I don't want to --

A. Therefore the court came to a conclusion that the loan shall be repaid within 30 days from the request, from the demand of the creditor. I think on the basis of the demand, the court ruled that the loan shall be repaid.

Q. Understood. Now, the next question I want to ask you about concerns the principle set out in the Makayev case, which you were asked about, and in the information letter of the Presidium of the Supreme Arbitrazh Court.

For the transcript, the references are, in the case of Makayev, G(A)4/7, flag 93 G(A)4/7.93/1, and in the case of the information letter of the Presidium of the Supreme Arbitrazh Court, G(A)4/5, flag 36 G(A)4/5.36/125.

Now, I wonder if you can be given a copy of the transcript of evidence yesterday. It will come up on the screen but I want you to have the actual hard copy of the transcript so that you can feel free to move about if you want to.

You dealt with this in two places, the first being at pages [82] and following. If you look at page [82], you'll see that at the bottom of page [82], line [15], Mr Rabinowitz put to you a quotation from the information letter of the Presidium.

"At the same time [the] contractor's claim for payment of remuneration should not be allowed if the claimant bases said claim on a contract term making the payment amount for services dependent on a judgment by a court or government body which is to be arrived at in [the] future."

And you were asked questions about that. And at page 83, line [25], you will see your answer is:

"This is the heading, but this paragraph does not mention legal fees and clearly indicates that any claims connected with favourable decisions of state authorities will not get court protection."

Now, if you would turn on to page 117, in the same transcript, Mr Rabinowitz is here putting to you the decision of the Constitutional Court in Makayev, and you summarise the principle you extract from that at the bottom of page 117, line 23:

"Where Constitutional Court ruled that the activity of governmental officials represent execution of people's will and is not subject to civil law regulation, and therefore civil law contracts, which make dependent civil law rights and obligations [upon] favourable decisions of governmental officials ... cannot get court protection. In other words, it's a clear statement of the court that a situation when money or some material benefits follow the favourable decision of governmental authorities, cannot be considered as legal and subject to court protection."

Now, does this principle depend on the exact form of the money or material benefit that is going to be obtained depending on the favourable decision of the state official?

A. I don't think so. Just my word that:

"It's a clear fight against corruption and I cannot add anything."

Demonstrates that the form of material benefits may be different.

Q. Suppose that A and B enter into a contract, the effect of which is that B will try to procure a favourable decision from a state official and will only be paid if the favourable decision is made. How does the rule stated in the information letter and Makayev affect an arrangement of that kind?

A. Well, informational letter addressed still contingency fees arrangements, as far as I remember. Informational letter was narrower than the Constitutional Court decision, as far as I remember.

Q. Yes, and how does the principle set out in the Makayev decision affect an arrangement of that kind?

A. The Constitutional Court decision applies to much broader circle of situations connected not only with legal fees but with activities of any governmental officials, and according to this decision, since we already discussed the law, just to be brief, where there is a corruption potential, where the consequence first favourable decision, and then some form of remuneration. In such situations, no court protection for those types of transaction. That's how I understand it.

Q. Now, suppose the agreement between A and B -- I'm going to slightly vary the facts. Suppose that the arrangement between A and B is that B will try to procure a favourable decision from a state official and A agrees that if and only if the decision of the state official is favourable to him, he will pay B a share of the financial benefit that he derives from the favourable court decision. How does the rule stated in the Makayev decision affect that sort of arrangement?

A. I think we have all conditions for conclusion that the Constitutional Court decision shall be applied directly and such transaction shall be considered invalid because the results, ie share in profit, just getting various material benefits later, will be in direct(?) dependence on the successful actions of B in obtaining favourable governmental decision.

MR SUMPTION: Thank you very much, Mr Rozenberg.

THE WITNESS: My pleasure.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much indeed,
Mr Rozenberg, for coming along and helping the court with your evidence.

THE WITNESS: Thank you.

(The witness withdrew)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, Mr Rabinowitz, it's Professor Maggs next?

MR RABINOWITZ: It's professor Maggs, he's Mr Adkin's witness.

PROFESSOR PETER MAGGS (sworn)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Please sit down, Professor Maggs, if you would like to.

Examination-in-chief by MR ADKIN

MR ADKIN: Professor Maggs, could you confirm, please, that you have no electronic equipment or mobile phones on you at the moment?

A. I don't have any.

MR ADKIN: My Lady, as with the other experts, Professor Maggs would like, if he may, to have with him a copy of his translation of the Russian Civil Code.
That's what's in the blue folder in front of him.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, fine.

MR ADKIN: Could you be given bundles G(A)5/1 and G(A)5/2.
Could you turn, please, to the front of G(A)5/1
G(A)5/1.00/1. Is the document there your first report in these proceedings?

A. Yes, it is.

Q. Now, I understand that there's one small correction you wish to make to that report. Could you please turn to paragraph 50 which you'll find on page 17

G(A)5/1.00/17.

A. Yes.

Q. I understand you want to make a correction to that paragraph, could you tell us please what it is?

A. Yes, the date "1995" there should be "2000".

Q. That's the date in the first line, is it?

A. Yes.

Q. Thank you. Could you please turn to G(A)5/2 G(A5/2/1.

A. Yes.

Q. There should only be one document in that bundle. Is that your second report in these proceedings?

A. Yes, it is.

Q. Do these two reports represent your true opinion?

A. Yes, they do.

Q. And are they the evidence you wish to give of the matters on which you've been instructed in these proceedings?

A. Yes, it is.

MR ADKIN: Please would you wait there, I think Mr Sumption will have some questions for you.

Cross-examination by MR SUMPTION

MR SUMPTION: Just one matter, Professor Maggs, could I ask you to turn to bundle 5/2, your second report, please.

A. Yes.

Q. And to paragraph 25 G(A)5/2/9. In this paragraph, you're dealing with the respects in which you say the 1995 agreement failed to deal with essential terms, and the question I want to ask you is directed to (a), where you say that the common goal was in your view insufficiently defined. You say:

"The primary remedy in contractual disputes under Russian law is specific performance. A Russian court would therefore be looking for terms [which] they could turn into an order to perform the contract. I cannot see how a court could formulate such an order with regard to the common goal [in] the 1995 Agreement."

Can you please tell us, what is the juridical basis, or the source material, on which you base the opinion that you express in 25(a) about the attention that would be given to the possibility of specific performance as opposed to, say, damages?

A. Well, if one looks at Article 12 of the Code, in its list of remedies it places specific performance above compensation. But, secondly, if one looks at Article 15 of the Code, when defining compensation, it essentially would be related to the cost of obtaining alternative performance. So on either case, we have to know rather precisely what needs to be done, whether to order it to be done or to try to figure out what it would cost to get someone else to do it, if indeed anyone else was available who could do it.

Q. Thank you. Are you aware of any case law which throws light on this, or is your view based on an analysis of the provisions of the Code?

A. It's based on analysis of the provisions of the Code, and also what I think was something of a hangover from Soviet custom, particularly in the early days of the post-Soviet regime, because Russia did not have a market economy. You generally could not go out in the market and buy a substitute performance, and I think that attitude continued for some time.

Q. How long do you think it continued?

A. That would be difficult to say.

Q. I'm not asking you for a precise date, but if you can give us some rough idea of how long you feel that attitude persisted?

A. I think certainly during the 1990s.

MR SUMPTION: Thank you very much, Professor Maggs.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, on the basis indicated yesterday, I have no questions for you, Professor Maggs.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, Mr Malek?

MR MALEK: No questions, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

Well thank you very much indeed, Professor Maggs, for coming along and assisting the court with your evidence.

THE WITNESS: Thank you, my Lady.

(The witness withdrew)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well.

I'll take the break, Mr Gillis, I think.

MR GILLIS: That would be very helpful because I'm imprisoned by Russian law at the moment.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Then we can get onto some history.

Very well, ten minutes.

(11.18 am)

(A short break)

(11.33 am)

MR GILLIS: My Lady, I call Professor Fortescue.

PROFESSOR STEPHEN FORTESCUE (sworn)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Please sit down, Professor Fortescue, if you would like to.

Examination-in-chief by MR GILLIS

MR GILLIS: Could Professor Fortescue please be provided with bundles G(B)1/1 and G(B)6/1.

Professor Fortescue, just while people are getting the bundles, could you confirm that you don't have a telephone with you or a mobile device?

A. No, I have no telephone or mobile device with me.

Q. Thank you. Could you please turn to G(B)1/1 at tab 1 and turn to page 1 G(B)1/1.01/1. Is that the front page of your first report?

A. Yes, it is.

Q. Could you turn to page 113 G(B)1/1.01/113, can you please confirm that that's your signature?

A. Yes, that is my signature.

Q. Then could I ask you to turn to tab 2 in that bundle at page 140 G(B)1/1.02/140?

A. It's numbered differently as best I can see.

Q. Is that the front page --

A. 140, sorry, I do see --

Q. I'm afraid there are an awful lot of numbers there at the bottom right-hand side.

A. I do see it, yes.

Q. Is that the front page of your second report?

A. Yes, it is.

Q. Then if you could please go to page 168 G(B)1/1.02/168, and could you please confirm that that's your signature?

A. Yes, that is my signature.

Q. Now, could I ask you to go back to page 142

G(B)1/1.02/142.

A. Yes.

Q. Do paragraphs 4 and 5 there set out corrections which you wish to make to your first report?

A. Yes, they do.

Q. Subject to those corrections, can you confirm that those two reports are true to the best of your knowledge and belief and that they represent your true opinion?

A. Yes, they are true and represent my true opinion, to the best of my knowledge.

Q. And could I just ask you then to pick up G(B)6/1, and at page 1 do you have the joint memorandum which sets out the views of yourself, Professor Service and Professor Bean G(B)6/1.01/1?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Could you turn to page 26, please, G(B)6/1.01/26 and again could you confirm that that's your signature?

A. Yes, that's my signature.

Q. And could you confirm that the statements attributed to you in the joint memorandum are true to the best of your knowledge and belief and they represent your true opinion?

A. Yes, I do.

MR GILLIS: Thank you. If you could wait there, I think Mr Sumption has some questions for you.

Cross-examination by MR SUMPTION

- MR SUMPTION: Professor Fortescue, your report is substantially based on journalistic sources, is it not?
- A. Substantially, yes.
- Q. You acknowledge that the quality of press reporting is variable, even in reputable titles?
- A. Yes, I do.
- Q. And would you agree that much of the material in newspapers is based on sources which are not attributed and difficult to verify?
- A. Not sure that I'd say "much", but, yes, a considerable proportion.
- Q. And much of it is derivative from other newspapers?
- A. That's certainly a phenomenon in Russian newspapers.
- Q. Much of it subsequently turns out to be wrong as further information becomes available?
- A. That does happen, yes.
- Q. In particular, would you agree that there is a very striking difference between historical facts as they emerge when archives are opened, and the facts as they appeared to be from newspaper reports at the time?
- A. No, I don't think I would agree with that.
- Q. You wouldn't?
- A. No.
- Q. Well, perhaps Australian history has a very different pattern to English.

Would you agree that there is very little archival material for contemporary or near contemporary Russia which can be used to correct journalistic sources?

A. Yes, I would agree with that.

Q. Now, obviously, much depends on what issue one is talking about, but would you agree that the reliability of press reports is particularly difficult to assess when the papers are reporting something that is said to have gone on behind the scenes in government?

A. Yes, that does make it difficult.

Q. Now, the affairs of private individuals and companies they control in a society like Russia in the 1990s, would you agree that that is another area where it is particularly difficult to assess the reliability of press reports?

A. It is difficult but possible I believe.

Q. Well, you acknowledge, I think, in your report that newspapers are vulnerable to planted stories which suit the interests of their source?

A. They are certainly vulnerable to planted stories, and that's one of the tasks that a specialist in this field faces, to sort out those issues.

Q. Yes, but he often has nothing to go by beyond guesswork?

A. No, I think you have more to go on than guesswork.

- Q. Would you agree that planted stories are a particular problem with individuals who are keen on self-promotion, for one reason or another?
- A. Well, I don't think it's a particular problem. It's a problem that we face in this area of study.
- Q. And perhaps particularly also, where the newspaper in question happens to be owned by that person, planted stories are a particularly common phenomenon in that context, are they not?
- A. There are newspapers that are owned by individuals who have a reputation for planting stories, one of those newspapers I find reasonably reliable.
- Q. I see, even when the story looks as if it may have been planted by its proprietor?
- A. If it looks like it was planted by the proprietor we don't have a problem. We know it was planted by the proprietor and we take appropriate measures.
- Q. So you discount it?
- A. No, you don't always discount it.
- Q. I'm not saying ignore it; you apply a discount to the weight you place on it?
- A. Yes, I would say you apply a discount, but even a discounted source can provide valuable information. Even the fact that you know it's been planted can sometimes be valuable.

Q. Would you agree that another area which is particularly difficult to penetrate in the case of Russia in the 1990s is the shareholding structure through which rich Russian businessmen hold their shares; that structure is often deliberately opaque?

A. Yes, I'd agree with that.

Q. Would it be fair to say that, for all of these reasons, journalistic sources for the period covered by the present dispute have to be approached with extreme caution?

A. Well, with caution. I suppose whether it's extreme caution or not, but certainly with caution, yes.

Q. Well, let's take an example which is dealt with in your report, the relative political influence of Mr Berezovsky and Mr Abramovich in the late 1990s. In general terms, would you agree that without access to the individuals involved or to records of the inner workings of government, it is particularly difficult to assess how much influence is exercised behind the scenes by somebody with no official position?

A. It's difficult. It's possible to come to an opinion. It's difficult to know of course whether your opinion is absolutely true or not, but certainly it's what you do in the sort of job that I do that you form opinions with greater or lesser degrees of confidence.

Q. And the confidence is inevitably lesser when you are dealing without access to the individuals involved or to records of the inner workings of government; that is a factor which means that you have to have less confidence in your opinions, doesn't it?

A. I'm not sure that I'd agree with that. Sometimes I'm quite confident in my opinion even when I don't have access to people within government and the source.

Q. Even when you have no first-hand information about these workings and no records, is that right?

A. Yes, sometimes I'm quite confident.

Q. Yes. Well, you're obviously a very confident spirit, Professor Fortescue.

Could you have a look in your first report at paragraphs 70 and following G(B)1/1.01/21.

A. Paragraph 17?

Q. This is a passage of your report that appears under the heading "Mr Berezovsky's diminished influence in the late 1990s".

A. I'm sorry, can I interrupt, I must have the wrong paragraph. Could you please --

Q. Look at page 21 of G(B)1/1, flag 1.

A. Yes.

Q. Do you see paragraph 70?

A. Paragraph 70, yes I do.

Q. It's the first paragraph of a section of your report dealing with Mr Berezovsky's diminished influence, you say, in the late 1990s, and in this section you also express a view about the relative influence of Mr Abramovich, do you not?

A. Yes.

Q. Towards the end?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, what you conclude at paragraph 78 G(B)1/1.01/23 is that there was no reason to think that in 1998 and 1999, that:

"... Mr Berezovsky was in a stronger political position than Mr Abramovich, and there is some evidence to suggest that (albeit behind the scenes) Mr Abramovich actually exercised more influence than Mr Berezovsky in the Yeltsin administration."

Do you see that?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Now, what is your evidence for that statement?

A. Mr Berezovsky was, first of all, clearly subject to ups and downs in his political situation. At times he was being told that he was likely to be prosecuted or indeed charges were being offered. At other times it did appear that he was, let's say, reasserting himself, but it was a very, very fluid situation as far as

Mr Berezovsky was concerned, seemingly depending to some extent at least on who was the prime minister at the time.

In terms of Mr Abramovich, let's say it was a steadier trajectory. It would appear that he had contacts, and I am, as you suggested before, relying on press reports on these matters, but he had good contacts within the administration. Nothing was happening to him that would suggest that he was in political difficulties.

Q. Well, I think we can agree that he wasn't in political difficulties, but from what material would it appear that Mr Abramovich was more influential than Mr Berezovsky in this particular period?

A. The press reports that we've been talking about.

Q. I see. Are those the press reports referred to in this section of your report where you deal with this subject, 70 to 78?

A. Yes.

Q. Well now, let's have a look at that, shall we? You start, I'm looking at paragraph 70 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Sumption, sorry to interrupt, but the section where Professor Fortescue deals with Mr Abramovich's influence in the late 1990s actually goes from 64 to 69 as well.

MR SUMPTION: Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And there are quite a lot of press reports referred to there. I wouldn't want the witness to be confused.

MR SUMPTION: No, that is perfectly fair.

What you say, let's start at paragraph 64, shall we, Professor Fortescue G(B)1/1.01/19, you refer to the view of Mr Hoffman that:

"... by the time of [the] discussions in 1998 about replacing Prime Minister Chernomyrdin 'Roman Abramovich ... had become influential in Yeltsin's inner circle as well'."

That is a statement that Mr Abramovich had some influence. Are you able to assess from that statement what Mr Abramovich was in a position to do?

A. I wouldn't say that I could assess what he would be in a position to do. I would be able to suggest that he would be able to, if he had some interest in mind or something that he wanted to do, he could go to an influential person and try to have that brought about. I couldn't say what it was in every case that he might have wanted to do.

Q. You then quote a statement about Mr Abramovich acting for some time as the family's, the Yeltsin family's cashier or money man, and there were a lot of articles to that effect, but you do not find them a sufficient basis, do you, for reaching a conclusion on the point?

I think you say that a bit later in your report.

- A. I think that's a pretty good case, as far as I'm concerned, of something that I think you referred to previously, that something appears in one place and has a sort of cascade effect, it's repeated over and over and over again.

In that particular case, reference to Mr Abramovich as being the Yeltsin family's cashier did come from one source, it was from Mr Khorzhakov in a press conference, and it was repeated over and over and over again.

Something you learn from looking at these press reports is you learn how much minor plagiarism there is in fact in newspaper journalism, very much the same words appearing over and over again. And certainly when you see that you do very heavily -- well, it depends on the original source, but you're aware that it comes from one source.

If you are genuinely doing this sort of research, clearly you're trying to get a sense that something you would put more faith in comes from a number of different sources. If there was somebody else who had worked in the Kremlin, who might also have their own personal agenda, but nevertheless if somebody else who worked in the agenda (sic) said the same thing at a press conference, you'd give it a little more value. When only one person said it, you'd give it less value.

So in that particular case, as you point out, I say, I don't know whether it's true or not, but I don't feel particularly enthusiastic about that idea.

Q. Right. Now at paragraph 67 G(B)1/1.01/20, you quote somebody who suggests that candidates for posts in Mr Stepashin's cabinet were interviewed by people who included Mr Abramovich.

A. Yes.

Q. Is that something you believe?

A. I find that the actual account given by Mr Kasyanov, Mr Kasyanov was Mr Putin's first prime minister. At the time we're talking about he wasn't prime minister but he'd had senior positions in the government, first Deputy, Minister of Finance type levels, so he was an insider. He doesn't say there himself that he witnessed this, that he knew himself definitely, so it's hearsay on his part. Nevertheless I would have to say that that account that he gives of Mr Abramovich sitting there in an office in the Kremlin with a queue of people wanting to become ministers, or as candidates for ministers, and coming in and sort of being interviewed, I find that a little bit, well, hard to believe, to be honest.

Q. Right.

A. Having said that, I don't find it hard to believe that Mr Abramovich at the time was interested, had some awareness of who might become candidates for ministerial positions. He might well have rung them up or organised a meeting with them to discuss with them what their feelings were on different matters, to convey to them what his feelings were on different matters. And then he could well have gone to influential people within the Kremlin that he knew and said, "Look, you know, it seems to me that this person is a good candidate, this person seems to me to have some silly ideas on different things".

That version seems to me to be quite plausible. The way that Mr Kasyanov describes it, no, I don't think it could have happened in precisely that way.

Q. These things might have happened but you have no information to suggest that they did?

A. No -- well, I have information to suggest that they did, but that information is press reports and memoirs.

Q. That's why you say they might have happened rather than that they did?

A. Yes.

Q. Well now, you start the next section of your report by saying that you -- I'm looking at paragraph 70

G(B)1/1.01/21 -- by saying that:

"[You] do not know whether the [disputed] assertion in Disputed Statement 45, that from 1998, Mr Berezovsky had less contact with President Yeltsin's inner circle, is true. [It] is a question of fact which [you] cannot answer by reference to historical evidence."

Would you agree that that is not a promising start to an assessment of Mr Berezovsky's influence, whether rising or falling, in the late 1990s, if you do not have that knowledge?

A. I express -- well, I say I do not have that knowledge and that affects, needless to say, the way that I -- the degree of confidence with which I express matters, and it's open to other people to decide how much confidence they will approach what I say on these matters.

Q. Now, you go on -- just one point, Professor Fortescue. The quotation at paragraph 67 G(B)1/1.01/20, it's right, isn't it, that this quotation -- and I appreciate that you say you don't actually believe this particular statement, but it also doesn't in fact appear in the text written by Mr Kasyanov himself, does it? It appears in the introduction written by the journalist who was his co-author, Mr Kiselev, is that correct?

A. I don't know, I'd have to look at the source.

Q. Well, we can verify that for ourselves in due course.

A. Mm-hm.

Q. Moving back to the next section, paragraphs 71 to 75
G(B)1/1.01/21.

A. Yes.

Q. You refer to the reverses which Mr Berezovsky experienced during the premierships of Mr Chubais and Mr Primakov?

A. Mr Chubais was not a premier but I understand what you mean.

Q. Yes, sorry, during that period of office.

Now, would you agree that although Mr Chubais is said to have got Mr Berezovsky dismissed from his position on the Security Council in November 1997, in April 1998, within a month of his departure, he was back in favour, Mr Berezovsky was back in favour, with a new appointment as executive secretary of the Commonwealth of Independent States?

A. First of all, I don't think I do say that Mr Chubais arranged to have Mr Berezovsky dismissed. I think that it was Mr Yeltsin decided to dismiss both of them, not one or the other --

Q. You're quite right that the decision would have been made by Mr Yeltsin, but I understand you to relate this to the disagreements between Mr Chubais and Mr Berezovsky?

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. And it's right, isn't it, that within a month of Mr Chubais's departure, Mr Berezovsky was back in favour with a new appointment as executive secretary of the Commonwealth of Independent States?

A. Yes. And as I said before, his position at this time, and I suppose it's the nature of Russian politics at this particular time as well, things were very, very volatile and people's positions could change very quickly.

Q. Now, the executive secretaryship of the Commonwealth of Independent States was an influential appointment within the state, wasn't it?

A. Look, no, it wasn't very, very high in the pecking order, I think it's true to say.

Q. So wasn't high or it was?

A. It was not.

Q. It was, however, a function that meant that the occupant of that position was likely to have considerable involvement with the current problems in Chechnya; that's right, isn't it?

A. I'm sorry, I didn't quite hear what you said.

Q. That was a position that would require its occupant to occupy himself with the problems of the Russian State in Chechnya, would it not?

A. I'm not an expert, to be honest, on functions of the secretary of the CIS.

Q. You're not, right.

A. Because Chechnya is not part of the CIS so I'm not sure that that is in fact the case.

Q. Right. Well I'm relying, perhaps mistakenly, on what Mr Berezovsky himself says he did in that capacity, but if you're not an expert in that area I'm not going to test your knowledge any further.

Can we look at the further reverses under Mr Primakov. He became prime minister in September 1998, didn't he?

A. Yes.

Q. And was dismissed on 12 May 1999?

A. Yes.

Q. Are you aware, or were you aware at the time of your report, that in his previously unpublished evidence in his asylum application, and again in his evidence to this court, Mr Berezovsky said that some two to three days after being charged with currency violations and money-laundering by the public prosecutor, Mr Berezovsky went to see Mr Yumashev at the Kremlin in order to complain about Mr Primakov whom he believed had inspired that; are you aware of that?

A. I wouldn't say that I'm aware of it but I'm quite willing to accept that that's the case. I could well understand that he would.

Q. It's an example, isn't it, of one of those quite striking facts which you do not find reported in the contemporary press but may tell you, when you find out about them, a great deal about how things were working?

A. If I found out -- if that was not recorded in the press at the time, and I can't guarantee that it wasn't -- it was subsequently revealed in the way that you said it was revealed, I wouldn't be surprised. I would have expected him to go along and make such a complaint at the time, and so I wouldn't be surprised to find out afterwards that he had done so.

Q. Would you have expected Mr Primakov to find himself dismissed within a fortnight of that meeting?

A. I would -- I wouldn't necessarily confidently say that the two were linked, if that was the implication that you were making.

Q. Well, his evidence was that he was a significant factor in bringing about Mr Primakov's dismissal, do you find that credible or incredible?

A. I find it plausible, yes, it's something to be considered.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, the reference to that is Day 6, pages 138 to 143.

Now, that is, is it not, a fairly spectacular display of inside influence, you agree?

A. If that was exactly how things worked themselves out, yes.

Q. Now, there was some newspaper speculation at the time that Mr Berezovsky might have had a hand in Mr Primakov's departure, but would you agree that the details would not be known but for the evidence that Mr Berezovsky has given in the asylum proceedings and in his evidence in this action?

A. I'm sure that at the time in Moscow there was a lot of speculation along those lines, so there was -- well, I'll say no more than there was a lot of speculation at that time.

Q. Are you aware that the charges of money-laundering and so on against Mr Berezovsky, which were brought in April, shortly before Mr Primakov's departure, were subsequently in November dropped?

A. Yes, I'm aware of that.

Q. Does that surprise you?

A. No.

Q. Why not?

A. Sorry?

Q. Why not?

A. Why does it not surprise me? Because it was typical of the use of charges, threatened charges against people at the time and subsequently, in the ups and downs of people's political careers, which as I said previously, were very volatile at this time.

Q. Now, you say at paragraph 77 of your report that the charges against Mr Berezovsky were resurrected whenever circumstances allowed it. Presumably you consider that circumstances did not allow it in November 1999 when these charges were dropped?

A. Yes, that would be a logical conclusion.

Q. And that was no doubt because of the very considerable influence that was still being exercised by Mr Berezovsky at that time?

A. We have to go back to the original assumption I think that Mr Berezovsky truly had a role to play and a serious role to play in the removal from power of Mr Primakov. I said that I found that a plausible position, but I couldn't say that I know with total conviction that that's the case.

Q. Let us assume that it is, okay? Would you agree that the circumstances which did not allow the charges to be proceeded with in November 1999, when they were dropped, were that Mr Berezovsky was in a position to exercise powerful influence behind the scenes over government officials?

- A. If we make that assumption, yes.
- Q. If we make the assumption about the dismissal of Mr Primakov, you agree?
- A. Hmm.
- Q. Is that right?
- A. Could you say it again, please?
- Q. I'm going to ask you to assume that Mr Berezovsky's evidence that he had a significant part in the dismissal of Mr Primakov is true, okay? Now, on that assumption, would you agree that the circumstances in November 1999, which resulted in the charges being dropped, are likely to have been that Mr Berezovsky was in a position to exercise powerful influence behind the scenes?
- A. I have to make the assumption, and think about what the consequences of the assumption is, but, yes.
- Q. Well now, that influence continued, did it not, until Mr Berezovsky fell out with President Putin in the following year?
- A. I'm just trying to think what other events happened in those periods, but --
- Q. Let me remind you that Mr Putin became acting president at the very end of 1999 as a result of the illness of Boris Yeltsin and that he was elected in his own right in I think April of 2000.
- A. March.

Q. March, you're quite right.

A. Incidentally Mr Yeltsin resigned, it wasn't because he was particularly ill, but we'll leave that aside.

Q. Well, that's a side-show.

A. Could you --

Q. Right, but would you agree that the influence of Mr Berezovsky persisted until he fell out with Mr Putin in 2000?

A. No, I wouldn't want to say categorically that his influence remained at that same level throughout that time, no.

Q. Do you not know one way or the other?

A. It was very volatile at the time and...

Q. Are you able to express an opinion on how, if at all, the degree of influence exercisable by Mr Berezovsky changed between November 1999 and the summer of the following year when he fell out with Mr Putin? If you don't know one way or the other I won't continue to ask questions on the subject.

A. No, I think his influence -- no, look, I'll say I don't know, because it's very hard to be certain whether these -- the influence, particularly at this time, was very, very uncertain, changed very, very regularly.

It would be -- I suppose if I sat down and reviewed the history absolutely carefully I might be able to come to more careful conclusions. But, no, I would say that it's -- certainly he suffered a major reverse, of course, when Putin came to power. There's no doubt about that.

Q. Well, not immediately when Putin came to power I think but very shortly afterwards.

A. Shortly afterwards, yes.

Q. Now, would you agree that Mr Putin, whatever else one might say about him, is very much his own man and always has been since he was elected president?

A. Yes, I'd agree with that. I think we do tend to leap from that statement to saying that he never takes any notice of anything that anybody says and nobody can have any influence over him.

Q. I'm not suggesting that. Now, one thing is clear, is it not, that Mr Putin is a man who is not prepared to be pushed around by rich men?

A. He certainly wouldn't want to be, and a rich man would have to be very careful about trying to push Mr Putin around, yes.

Q. Yes. In particular, Mr Putin reacted, did he not, when he became president against the widely perceived fact that Mr Yeltsin had been pushed around by rich men? That was a widespread perception about Mr Yeltsin, was it not?

A. Yes, I would agree with that.

Q. Would it be fair to say that Mr Putin was anxious to demonstrate that he was not like Mr Yeltsin in that particular respect?

A. Yes, I'd agree with that.

Q. Now, you refer to Mr Putin's well-known assault on the oligarchs. Would you agree that his approach to the people who had made great fortunes in the 1990s was that he was not prepared to allow them to use their financial muscle to support opposition to the government?

A. Yes, I'd agree with that.

Q. Would you agree that oligarchs like Mr Khodorkovsky, Mr Gusinsky and Mr Berezovsky, who challenged the government, were generally imprisoned or driven into exile?

A. I don't actually -- with regard to Mr Khodorkovsky, I -- personally, it's not the standard view on these matters, but I believe that it wasn't just or even mainly his political activities, or purported or proposed political activities that led to the Yukos affair.

Q. I see.

A. In the case of Mr Gusinsky and Mr Berezovsky, where these people had major media holdings, I think there was a stronger political element to that. But with Mr Khodorkovsky, I think it was commercial issues, taxation issues, not so much political.

Q. That is, I think you've just acknowledged, a controversial view which most people would not accept?

A. I'd have to say that, in recent years, the view that Mr Khodorkovsky was arrested and Yukos was destroyed for political reasons has become widespread, probably more widespread than it was at the time. It's one that I didn't -- I wouldn't say I rejected it out of hand, but I believe that taxation issues, getting the oligarchs to pay their taxes, to seize some assets, were a more important issue than Mr Khodorkovsky's political activities or proposed political activities.

Q. I see. Well now, those who stayed out of politics, among the oligarchs, like Mr Fridman, Mr Deripaska and Mr Abramovich, retained their wealth, or at least a significant part of it, did they not, under Putin?

A. Yes, we have to be careful here when we say "kept out of politics", what we mean. If we mean organising political opposition, saying nasty things about Mr Putin in your media outlets, if that's what I mean -- if that's what we mean by politics, yes. If we mean by politics, being involved in the policy process, I wouldn't agree with the statement.

Q. Surely the key to survival if you were a rich industrialist under Mr Putin was to keep a low political profile?

A. Again, it depends on what you mean by political. If we are talking here about political in the sense of organising opposition, saying nasty things about Mr Putin in the media, yes.

Q. If we look at paragraph 96 of your first report, please, which is a part of your report in which you are dealing with Mr Abramovich's influence in the Putin administration. The relevant section starts at paragraph 94 G(B)1/1.01/28 and continues to paragraph 104.

A. Yes.

Q. Having dealt previously with his influence before Putin, you are now dealing with his influence after Putin's coming to power.

Now, you set out the propositions, with which you say you agree, at paragraph 95. And then, looking at the analysis, paragraphs 96 to 98, you cite some authors that you say support your view about Mr Abramovich's influence in the Putin administration, okay?

A. First of all, in those particular paragraphs, all I am saying is that there were such reports.

Q. Yes.

A. It is true that I go on and say that I think there is some truth to those reports, but what you're particularly -- I am reporting those quotations there in 97, 98, not to support my view but to simply show that there were such views.

Q. I see. Well, if these are not the reason why you formed your views, then what reasons do you have?

A. As I said, I put those there as examples of the sort of reporting at the time. Certainly I would have formed my view on the basis of those sorts of reports, including those ones. There is actually a sentence in the Sakwa quotation that doesn't seem to me to be particularly believable, regarding coveting Norilsk Nickel, but those were the sorts of reports.

On the basis of those sorts of reports, and other such reports, I form the view that, yes, Mr Abramovich was -- had suggested that Mr Abramovich's influence with the Kremlin had increased in the first half of 2001.

Q. If you didn't believe or didn't attach importance to these reports, how did they lead you to that view?

A. As I said, there was one -- a few words in the report from Sakwa that I would not -- I find surprising, let's say. Those reports I presented as relatively typical reports of what was being said at the time, and then I formed my opinion on those sorts of reports, including many others that appeared at the time.

Q. Well, let's look by way of example at what Mr Sakwa says. First of all, Mr Sakwa is a lecturer in politics at the University of Kent, isn't he?

A. Yes, he's a professor in politics at University of Kent.

Q. And he's the author of a number of published works on the oligarchs?

A. He's published a lot of works --

Q. One book and some articles?

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. What you are quoting from is an article of 2008 in an academic journal. Perhaps we can turn that up, it's at G(B)2/7, flag 190. Could we please turn at flag 190 to page 156 where the article starts G(B)2/7.190/156. This is an article in the New Political Economy in 2008. At page 156, you see in the first paragraph there's a reference to a statement made by Mr Putin in the election campaign about:

"... the need to break the cosy relationship between big business and government. In early 2000 Putin had talked, in language reminiscent of ... Stalin's plan ... to 'liquidate the kulaks ...', of his aspiration to 'liquidate the oligarchs as a class', stressing the need to create a level playing field. His central idea was that special interests, above all the oligarchs, should be kept 'equidistant' from the government."

Would you agree that that can fairly be described as being at least one of Mr Putin's central ideas?

A. Yes, I agree. However, I would qualify my agreement with that. If the interpretation of that statement is that the oligarchs -- no oligarchs any longer had any influence, I would not agree. Also I would not agree that it means that there was not in fact some -- there was not total equidistance between all of them so some nevertheless were closer than others.

Q. Well, some were in jail and some were in England and some were exercising influence; is that the point you're making?

A. That's the point that I'm making, yes.

Q. Does it follow from this particular central idea, as Mr Sakwa suggests, that:

"No longer were a select group of 'oligarchs' to have privileged access to the corridors of power or to hold the state hostage whenever the regime needed financial or other support."

That is a statement which you would endorse, is it?

A. No, it's not a statement that I fully endorse.

Q. I see. So you disagree with him on that point?

A. No. I think that overstates the extent to which Mr Putin wanted to remove rich business people from the policy process.

Q. Could we turn to page 159 G(B)2/7.190/159, please.

The first full paragraph in the page:

"Pervading the anti-oligarch campaign [this is Putin's campaign] there hung the suspicion that one set of tycoons was using the law and the presidency against another. In particular, Roman Abramovich, who in early 2000 had participated in the creation of a holding that controlled most of Russia's aluminium production, was known to covet Norilsk Nickel and Gusinsky's NTV. Other oligarchs, notably Mikhail Fridman at the head of the Tyumen Oil Company ... Oleg Deripaska and many more focused on developing their businesses and kept out of politics. They willingly accepted the new rules of the game, including clearing major initiatives with the Kremlin, and thus went on to become key figures in the new era. While business was now taken out of politics, politics entered ever more decisively into business. A new type of 'state oligarch' emerged, permitted to conduct business at home and, indeed, to go global as long as they recognised the Kremlin's claimed prerogatives."

Now, how much of that would you agree with?

- A. Again, it depends on what we mean by politics. Business was taken out of politics quite abruptly and brutally, if politics means organising political campaigns against Mr Putin, saying nasty things about him in the press.

If politics means being involved in the policy process, arguing for policy outcomes in your particular area of concern, I don't agree with that statement. The oligarchs were still very, very involved in the policy process regarding business and in very important areas.

Mr Putin -- I would say in those couple of -- first few years, up until the Yukos affair, and in some sense beyond, Mr Putin -- there was a period of cooperation and conflict. The cooperation at times was very, very close. For example, there was very, very major changes to the taxation laws in that period which required very close relationship between the oligarchs' major business, and Mr Putin and government policy makers. So we have to be careful here when we say "keep the business out of politics", it just does depend on what we mean by politics.

- Q. Now, admittedly, this paragraph is said to be no more than a suspicion, see the first line. So far as it carries any weight, it doesn't suggest, does it, that Mr Abramovich had any particular influence over Putin? On the contrary, what it suggests is that Mr Abramovich and other rich industrialists were allowed to do more or less what they liked in business provided that they stayed out of politics. That's what it's suggesting, isn't it, whether rightly or wrongly?

A. If politics means, as I've said before, organising political campaigns and saying nasty things about Mr Putin in the public arena, yes.

Q. Now, you also refer in the following paragraph of your report to an article by Paszyc and Wisniewska which is at G(B)2/6, flag 179 G(B)2/6.179/183.

Now, these two ladies are researchers, are they not, at an institution called the Centre for Eastern Studies which is based in Warsaw, is that correct?

A. Yes. Yes.

Q. This is an article, is it not, about certain major Russian industrial groups including, among others, Rusal?

A. Yes.

Q. It's not an article about political influence at all, is it, it's an article about industrial concentration?

A. It says -- the title is "Big business in the Russian economy and politics under Putin's rule".

Q. Yes, but reading the article, it is in fact about the way in which major industrial groups have been abled (sic), in the political climate that existed, to concentrate and increase their economic power?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, the paragraph from which you quote is at paragraph 3, which is on the bottom half of the first page. Perhaps you would just remind yourself of that paragraph.

A. Sorry, I'm just getting back to the first page.

Paragraph 3 I think you --

Q. Paragraph 3 of the article.

A. Yes.

Q. Which is the summary, and it's the bit from which you're quoting.

A. Yes.

Q. Now, that paragraph in the context of the article as a whole is making the point, isn't it, that Mr Abramovich and others have been allowed to accumulate considerable industrial power, provided that they're not trying to turn it into political power independent of the Kremlin?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, if we turn on in your report to paragraphs 99 and 100 G(B)1/1.01/29, having cited those two sources, you go on to refer to persistent press reports that Mr Abramovich bankrolled the Kremlin, a proposition for which I think you accept there is no sufficient evidence?

A. That's correct.

Q. Now, is there any more to your suggestion that Mr Abramovich had significant political influence under Putin than the sources which you cite in the following paragraphs, paragraphs 101 and 102?

A. Those are the -- I have those citations. I'm sure there are many more sources that I could have cited.

Q. Those are the best, are they?

A. I wouldn't even say that they are the best. Those are the ones that were chosen at the time.

Q. Let's have a look at them and see how far they take us.

Would you please turn to bundle G(B)2/2, flag 27

G(B)2/2.27/229. This is an extract from Mr Sakwa's book which was published in 2009, about a year after the article that we looked at a bit earlier.

A. Yes.

Q. Now, can you please identify -- I'm afraid it's a longish extract but you selected it which is why perhaps it's fair to ask you -- which bit of this extract of the book do you say supports your contention that Mr Abramovich was influential in Putin's Russia?

A. It's hard to read the photocopy here, I have to say.

It's -- perhaps if I could -- no, I don't --

Q. Well, I apologise for that and I entirely agree that it is, but if you can indicate the area of the extract that you had in mind, we may be in a position to ask you about it.

A. Yes, hang on. (Pause)

- Q. In your footnote, you refer to page 130 of the book, which is in the bundle numbering at page 234 G(B)2/2.27/234. These are a number of different extracts from the book. Does that help?
- A. Yes, I'm looking at page 130 and I don't see mention of independent influence over Putin including a close personal relationship.
- Q. I mean, as far as we can see, the only part of this extract which refers to Mr Abramovich is the first full paragraph to begin at page 130. But I wouldn't want to assert that too confidently if you have some other part that you want to refer to.
- A. I cannot. I can't remember offhand, if it's not on page 130 which is the one that I cite, where it might have come from in that source.
- Q. So would you agree that this particular work or at least the bits of it that we have that have been copied on your suggestion, they support the view that Mr Abramovich was able to avoid a disastrous falling out with the government of the kind that had destroyed Mr Khodorkovsky for whatever reason but they don't go any further than that?
- A. Could you repeat that question, please?
- Q. This work supports the view that Mr Abramovich was able to avoid a personally disastrous falling out with the government of the kind from which Mr Khodorkovsky had suffered, but the book doesn't appear to go any further than that, does it?

A. I can't say on -- I can't remember everything that's written in that book, I'm sorry.

Q. I see. Could you please be given bundle G(B)2/3, flag 106. This is the next reference that you give in paragraphs 101 to 102. It's an article from Vedomosti. The English translation begins at page 299 of the bundle G(B)2/3.106/299.

A. Yes.

Q. Perhaps you could point us to the statement in this article that you say bears out your view about Mr Abramovich's influence under Putin. (Pause)

A. No, I can't find it there.

Q. You can't find anything there that bears it out?

A. No, I can't.

Q. Right. Well, let's look at the third and last citation that you give, G(B)2/4, flag 118. The English begins at page 41 in the bundle numbering G(B)2/4.118/41. This is an article by a Mr A Ryklin in a publication called Demokratiya. Can you tell us who Mr Ryklin is?

A. No, I don't know. He's just --

Q. So you don't know whether he's a person of any particular authority?

A. No.

Q. What is Demokratiya?

A. It's an online journal.

Q. Right. Now, can you tell us which parts of this article you had in mind as supporting your view about Mr Abramovich's influence?

A. Well, I think it's all about the relationship between Mr Putin and Mr Abramovich.

Q. What propositions do you extract from it that support your view?

A. It's suggesting that Mr Abramovich is able to get away with behaviour that other oligarchs are not able to get away with because of his relationship with Mr Putin.

Q. That is the view of Mr Ryklin, is it?

A. Yes.

Q. A man about whom you know nothing and whose authority you're not able to assess?

A. I wouldn't put a great deal of faith in that particular article, no.

Q. Did you identify these particular sources yourself or did somebody provide you with them?

A. I certainly know Mr Sakwa's book, "The Quality of Freedom", very well. I can only assume that the referencing went wrong this particular time. Certainly I found these sources myself.

Q. Right.

At paragraph 102 of your report G(B)1/1.01/29, you say by way of summary that you have seen no credible journalistic or academic writing which doubts that Mr Abramovich had influence over Putin.

Have you seen any credible or journalistic or academic writing which provides evidence that he did have such influence?

A. Certainly there's been a problem with the referencing here, and it is very difficult for me to say that these articles support the view that I'm putting forward. I should say as well that I expressed a view about Mr Abramovich's influence with some degree of caution, but, nevertheless, I'm confident that there are plenty of such sources.

Q. Let's have a look at your conclusion to this section at paragraph 104 G(B)1/1.01/30. You say that you would not find it surprising that Mr Abramovich was in a position to encourage state agencies, including the Kremlin, to "take steps helpful to him" if they were also beneficial to the Kremlin.

Is that a fair summary of what you're saying at paragraph 104?

A. Yes.

Q. What steps do you have in mind when you say that?

A. If I can set up a number of scenarios: I don't think Mr Abramovich could have come to Mr Putin and said, "Mr X is causing me problems, I know that Mr X is your good friend and a close ally, nevertheless I want you to help me take steps against him, to remove him as a competitor or whatever", I would find that quite implausible.

If Mr --

Q. And -- sorry, forgive me, I didn't realise you were continuing. Please go on.

A. If Mr Abramovich had come to Mr Putin and said "There's this Mr X, I don't think you know Mr X, or you're not interested in Mr X, he's a problem for me, can we do something about it, would you help me do something about it?", I think that would be probably unwise, an unwise thing to do in the case of Mr Putin, but I don't find it totally impossible.

Q. Right.

A. If Mr Abramovich came along to Mr Putin -- put it another -- no, I'll start again.

If Mr Abramovich knew that Mr X was causing Mr Putin considerable frustration and grief he could have two options, he could just say, "Okay, I'll leave things to go their own way and hopefully the outcome that I want will just simply happen because Mr Putin will take measures on his own". The other possibility is that Mr Abramovich could have gone to Mr Putin and said, "Look, you know, Mr X is causing us both some grief, let's work together to do something about it", I find that quite plausible.

Q. Well, do you say that Mr Abramovich was in a position to encourage criminal proceedings against Mr Berezovsky and people associated with Mr Berezovsky by exercising influence with the Kremlin or its agencies? Is that your position?

A. I haven't engaged in that particular issue at all, no.

Q. I see.

Do you say that people generally believed that he was in a position to do that?

A. I wouldn't want to say that people generally believed, but it would certainly have been a widespread view.

Q. Well, I don't quite follow that. That appears to be a little internally contradictory; people didn't generally believe it but it was a widespread view, how widespread?

A. I couldn't say how widespread.

Q. Is it something that well-informed people would have thought, in your view?

A. Well-informed people might have been aware of the view, some would have thought it and some might not have.

I really can't comment.

Q. Is that a proposition that you can extract from any of the sources we've been looking at?

A. The particular sources that we looked at, I would say no.

Q. Can we turn to a slightly different subject covered in your report, Professor Fortescue, the loans-for-shares auctions.

Paragraph 131 of your report is where you make the point that I want to ask you about G(B)1/1.01/37.

What you say here is that in all cases of which you are aware, lenders who prevailed in loans-for-shares auctions ended up by acquiring large holdings of their own when the state's holdings were privatised or sold off by way of enforcement of security for the loans. Is that a fair summary of the point you are making?

A. No, the point I'm making -- perhaps I didn't quite understand your question, but the point I'm making in point 131 is that they were able to obtain shares through loans for shares, but they also obtained shares in other ways, and sometimes obtaining those shares in other ways provided them with the majority shareholding. Well, let's say obtaining shares through other ways plus obtaining shares through loans for shares provided them with a majority shareholding.

- Q. Are you under the impression, Professor Fortescue, that the loans-for-shares auctions were auctions in which it was possible for the successful bidder to obtain shares in the company in question?
- A. Yes, I --
- Q. That's your impression, is it?
- A. Yes.
- Q. So you're not aware that the loans-for-shares auctions were -- in fact what the successful bidder obtained in the loans-for-shares auctions was simply a pledge of the state's 51 per cent retained holding and a contractual right to manage the rights associated with that holding on behalf of the state?
- A. Yes, of course -- well, it wasn't always 51 per cent.
- Q. No, it wasn't.
- A. Obviously, clearly, the first stage of the loans for shares gave them that status that you've just described, and then the second stage, they obtained full ownership of the shares.
- Q. Well, you say the first and the second stage, the only stage of the loans-for-shares auction was an auction in which the successful bidder acquired, in the case of Sibneft for a period of three years, a pledge and a right to manage the rights associated with the state's holding of 51 per cent, and that was all, do you not agree?

A. Could you say that again?

Q. The only right that the successful bidder obtained in a loans-for-shares auction was a pledge of the state's retained shareholding and a right to manage the rights of the state's shareholding on its behalf?

A. Yes. The result of the auctions were that.

Q. The sales by which the state transferred title to its shares were the separate sales in which the non-retained part of the state's initial holding was auctioned off, and that was a separate process, wasn't it?

A. No, the shares that were held in pledge were auctioned off in the second stage.

Q. Professor Fortescue, you may not be aware of the details, but let me summarise them and see how much you're familiar with them.

There are three stages, are there not? First, you have the loans-for-shares auction in which nothing is transferred, no property in shares is transferred, what is transferred is a pledge and a right of management.

A. Yes.

Q. Right. Then there is separately from that a sale of the non-retained shares, that's to say in the case of Sibneft the loans-for-shares auction conferred a pledge of 51 per cent, and in a separate process there was then an auction of the 49 per cent that was being privatised?

A. Yes, okay.

Q. Then there's a third stage: if and when the state defaults on the loan --

A. Yes.

Q. -- then there is a realisation of the pledge which leads to an auction of the 51 per cent?

A. Yes.

Q. And those are three separate processes?

A. And the second process that you referred to might have been in between the first and the third, it might have been before the first, it might have been after the third.

Q. Indeed. Now, the suggestion has been made in this litigation on behalf of Mr Berezovsky that because all the other loans-for-shares auctions were followed by the acquisition by the lender of the actual title to substantial parts of the company's equity, then it is likely that Mr Berezovsky also did that.

Now, that's not a point that you make in terms in your report. Is it a proposition that you would support?

A. Could you say it again, please?

Q. The suggestion that has been made is that because all the other loans-for-shares auctions were followed by the successful lender acquiring title to the shares, it is likely that the same was true of Mr Berezovsky, do you follow the point that's being made?

A. Hmm.

Q. Is that a point that you would support or is it a bit simplistic?

A. I haven't looked precisely -- well, I didn't see it as part of my function, to be honest, to look precisely at the Sibneft option, but, yes, I think that was likely.

Q. What do you think is likely?

A. That the same process would happen in Sibneft case as happened in the others.

Q. Well, when you say in your report:

In all the cases of which [you are] aware, the lenders who were successful in a loans for shares deal were also able to obtain further shares in the other sales so as to take ownership control ..."

When you say that, how large a sample are we talking about?

A. The major ones, the major loans for shares, the major resource companies that we're talking about.

Q. How many?

A. Well, if I look at my table, approximately seven.

Q. Well, there were only five cases, were there not, in which large stakes in companies that had been included in the loans-for-shares programme were sold off by the state, they were Sibneft, Sidanko, Norilsk Nickel, Yukos and Surgutneftegas, would you agree? Five.

A. Yes. Five.

Q. In only two of those cases, is this right, namely Sibneft and Sidanko, were majority stakes sold off, would you agree?

A. In loans for shares?

Q. Yes -- well, no, majority stakes sold off of companies which had been included in the loans-for-shares scheme. Only in the case of Sibneft and Sidanko were majority stakes sold off in companies included in the loans-for-shares scheme?

A. Majority stakes sold off other than through loans for shares.

Q. Well, no shares were sold off through loans for shares itself, but if you take the companies included in the loans-for-shares programme, there were only two of them, a majority of whose shares were sold off in other sales.

A. I would just like to say one thing, it's just been for purposes of, well, convenience; when I say loans for shares, I do mean the two stages.

Q. Well, I'd like you to differentiate between them, Professor Fortescue, because the difference is actually quite important to the issues in this case.

A. Okay.

Q. We've agreed that there were three processes, there were the loans-for-shares auctions themselves and there were also what you refer to at paragraph 131 as the other sales through which it might be possible to obtain ownership control, okay?

A. Okay.

Q. I am differentiating between those two and I would like you to do so.

A. Can I just absolutely clarify, when I'm saying "other sales", I do not mean the sales of the shares that had been pledged. I mean sales of shares through other means, through investment tenders and so on and so forth.

Q. Well, there were two ways in which you could obtain ownership of shares in the companies included in the loans-for-shares programme, weren't there? Where a proportion of the state's shareholding was privatised, they were sold at auction and you could buy them at that auction, is that right? That was one way?

A. That was one way, yes.

Q. The other way, or another way, was that if the state defaulted on the loan which was secured by the pledge, there would then be an enforcement sale also by auction at which you could bid?

A. Again, I'm not absolutely confident that we're talking about the same thing. We did talk about those three stages and I'm clear on that. The second stage that you refer to, that is selling shares in ways that had nothing to do with loans for shares, they were through investment options, investment tenders, sometimes small proportions of shares were sold to workforces, under the general provisions of the privatisation programme.

Q. Yes.

A. So if we -- when we say loans for shares, we're talking about those initial options of the shares that were put up for sale through this programme.

Q. No, Professor Fortescue, we're not. Loans for shares were auctions of the right to make loans in return for a pledge of the shares. You agree?

A. Yes.

Q. Right. Now, I want to find out from you what your understanding is about the way in which you could obtain not just a pledge or a right of management but ownership of shares formally owned by the state.

A. Okay.

Q. One way was that you could bid in an auction for a proportion of the shares that the state had decided to privatise?

A. Yes.

Q. In the case of Sibneft, 49 per cent.

A. Yes.

Q. Agreed? Another way was that if the state defaulted on the loan --

A. Yes.

Q. -- as it, in most cases, did, you could bid in the sale of the shares that had been pledged which would then be sold by way of realisation of the security?

A. Yes.

Q. A third way I suppose is that you could buy them in the secondary market created by existing holders of privatised shares selling them, or by workers selling them if it was sold to the workers?

A. Yes.

Q. Right?

A. Yes.

Q. Any other methods?

A. Well, in that first category you referred to selling shares at auctions other than loans-for-shares auctions. There were other ways, investment tenders and so on, but I take your point. I think we are on the same wavelength.

Q. Okay. Well now, if you take the companies that were included in the loans-for-shares scheme, the companies in respect of which the state pledged part of its holding in return for loans, right, there were only two of those companies, were there not, a majority of whose shares were in due course sold off by the state by whatever method, and they were Sibneft and Sidanko, do you agree?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, Mr Potanin's Onexim Group acquired Norilsk Nickel and Sidanko, did it not?

A. Yes.

Q. And Mr Khodorkovsky's Menatep Group acquired Yukos?

A. Yes.

Q. So we've got two oligarchs who provided loans for shares and who subsequently obtained a controlling stake in the companies which had been partly pledged to them, is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Surgutneftegas was acquired by its existing management, wasn't it, for red directors?

A. That's generally believed to be the case and I would certainly accept that as being the case.

Q. Right. So we've looked at how Mr Potanin acquired control of Norilsk Nickel and Sidanko, and how Mr Khodorkovsky got control of Yukos. Surgutneftegas was sold to the red directors, and the fifth case was Sibneft.

So the point being made about the likelihood of Mr Berezovsky acquiring ownership of shares is based, is it not, on just two examples of other oligarchs, Mr Khodorkovsky and Mr Potanin, agreed?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, are you really saying that because Mr Khodorkovsky and Mr Potanin prevailed in loans-for-shares auctions, and then went on to acquire controlling shareholdings of the relevant companies, Mr Berezovsky is likely to have done the same?

A. I'm not saying anything about what Mr Berezovsky is likely to have done.

Q. You're not?

A. No.

Q. I see. Would you agree that there was one significant difference between Mr Berezovsky's position and that of Mr Khodorkovsky and Mr Potanin, namely that Mr Khodorkovsky and Mr Potanin wanted to manage and build up the companies that they acquired? Would you agree that that was true of them?

A. I would say that's true of them.

Q. Mr Berezovsky, by comparison, had no particular desire to manage and build up an industrial group, did he?

A. I don't know.

Q. You don't know?

Now, one of the journalistic sources that you regard as particularly reliable is Chrystia Freeland, is that right?

A. Yes, I find it quite a good source.

Q. Yes, well you describe her as particularly good and reliable in paragraph 24.3 of your report.

A. Yes.

Q. Now, could you please turn to bundle G(B)4/1, please, at flag 7. This is her best known book I think, "Sale of the Century"?

A. Yes.

Q. About privatisation and loans for shares basically.

A. Flag 7, just a moment.

Q. If you've got flag 7 of G(B)4/1 you should be looking at an extract from that book.

A. I don't think I am.

Q. G(B)4/1.

A. Oh, I've got G(A).

Q. Well I'm not going to cross-examine you, you'll be glad to hear, about Russian law.

A. I did see that it was a Russian decree and I did get a bit nervous.

Q. I think we've all had quite enough of the Civil Code.

A. That looks better.

Q. Okay, flag 7, please?

A. Yes, I have that.

Q. Now, could we turn to page 46 in the bundle numbering G(B)4/1.07/46, page 128 of the book, I'm sorry, that this is rather small print too.

A. No, I can see that okay.

Q. Right. Now, this is a page, page 128 in the book numbering, which is about Mr Berezovsky. I won't ask you about his appearance, of which there is a rather odd description in the second full paragraph:

"Like most of the future oligarchs, by the late 1980s he had begun to dabble in the private sector. Like all of them, he built up his capitalist fortune using bricks -- often entire walls and buildings -- torn away from the decaying edifice of the Soviet State. But while most of Berezovsky's colleagues and competitors were empire-builders, hoping to found business dynasties which would endure for generations, he was a corporate nomad who danced from one venture to another, amassing money and influence along the way but always eventually pulling up his tent and moving on."

Is that an assessment of his business methods which you would endorse, or do you not know one way or another?

A. No, Mr Berezovsky has never been a major source of attention in my research and I certainly didn't write about these aspects of his behaviour in my report.

Q. I see. Michael Ellman, is he another academic whose work you have a high regard for?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Now, he identifies, doesn't he -- I think you refer to this at paragraph 265 of your report G(B)1/1.01/72 and you cite him in support of your view about the existence of a parasitic or predator state in Russia in the 1990s.

A. Yes.

Q. Mr Ellman identifies, doesn't he -- and perhaps we can turn to the work that you cite, it's G(B)2/6, flag 174 G(B)2/6.174/80.

This is an article entitled "The Russian Economy under [Yeltsin]". Mr Ellman cites a number of characteristics of what he calls the mutant economy of Russia under Boris Yeltsin. He lists them under the heading "Systemic change" where he says, four lines up from the bottom of the first page:

"Eight aspects of this mutant system were of particular importance."

Can I direct your attention to the first two which are summarised at the very bottom of page 80 and down to about halfway down page 81.

A. "Eight aspects of this mutant system were of particular importance", yes, I see that.

Q. The first two -- the first is:

"... the lack of an efficient state apparatus and the presence of a parasitic one. The collapse of the USSR and the creation of an independent Russia did not spawn an efficient state apparatus. Russia at the end of the [Yeltsin] era lacked a state that could reasonably be seen as [a] defender of the public interest. It had officials, who temporarily held particular positions, but they saw their offices largely as ... private fiefdoms from which they could temporarily enrich themselves. Appointments were frequently made for political or financial reasons and had little to do with technical or administrative qualifications."

He says later in that paragraph:

"This may be a major cause of the far greater ... depression in Russia than in Poland..."

Would you in general accept that characterisation of the Russian economy in the 1990s?

A. Yes. With only one, I think, qualification.

Q. Yes?

A. When it says "It had officials, who temporarily held particular positions..." and goes on, I wouldn't interpret that as meaning that all officials behaved in such a way.

Q. No, and I don't think that that's what Mr Ellman is saying.

The second characteristic that he identifies is:

"... the importance of opportunistic behaviour...

At all levels the important thing was control over economic resources (rather than formal ownership). In particular, the control over cashflow and the possibility of diverting it into one's own (foreign) bank account (or that of an entity under one's ... control) or using it to finance one's own luxury consumption was particularly important. It is characteristic of the situation that in 1998, prior to the 17 August crisis, the banks exported capital on a large scale, and immediately after the crisis transferred their remaining assets to other entities controlled by the banks' controllers, thereby robbing creditors."

Now, would you accept in general terms that the second characteristic which Mr Ellman identifies was a fair characterisation of the Russian economy in the 1990s?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, one of the non-journalistic sources on which you place particular reliance, Professor Fortescue, is a research paper of September 2000 written for the World Bank by Joel Hellman and two of his colleagues.

Do you remember referring to that?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Can we look at that at bundle G(B)2/6.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Give me the paragraph number in Professor Fortescue's report where he addresses this.

MR SUMPTION: It's G(B)2/6, flag 175 G(B)2/6.175/96. If I can just enquire of the witness who Mr Hellman is.

Is it right, Professor Fortescue, that the World Bank has for many years taken a particular interest in the economic effects of political corruption in opaque or closed political systems?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Sorry, Mr Sumption, I asked you the paragraph number in Professor Fortescue's report.

MR SUMPTION: I see. I'm sorry, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It's just so that I can note it by the statement, the proposition he relies upon it for.

If you can't tell me now, tell me at 2 o'clock.

MR SUMPTION: Paragraph 35 G(B)1/1.01/12.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much. In the first report?

MR SUMPTION: Yes.

My Lady, I think I'm going to be about five minutes, perhaps a little bit more with this witness. Would you like me to continue?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, why don't you continue.

MR SUMPTION: Professor Fortescue, it's right, isn't it, the World Bank has for many years been interested in the economic effects of political corruption in opaque or closed political systems?

A. Yes.

Q. And they have a special section which has made a special study of this in different jurisdictions?

A. I'm prepared to believe you on that.

Q. Mr Hellman is a senior officer of the governance and public sector group of the World Bank which is concerned with these matters, is he not?

A. He was when that paper was written.

Q. Yes. Now, in dealing with the influence of wealthy businessmen over the government in Russia in 1990, I think that you have placed some emphasis on this particular paper?

A. Well, I cite it. I'm not sure that I give particular emphasis to it but I certainly cite it.

Q. Now, if you look behind flag 175 G(B)2/6.175/96, which is the article entitled "Seize the State, Seize the Day", Mr Hellman has developed, has he not, the concept of state capture as distinguished from petty administrative corruption.

If we look at page 99 of this article which is part of the abstract G(B)2/6.175/99.

A. Yes.

Q. After the first break in the page:

"We unbundle the notion of corruption and in particular examine empirically the phenomenon of state capture on the basis of data from the 1999 Business Environment and Enterprise Performance Survey ... We contrast state capture with two other types of relationships between firms and the state -- influence and administrative corruption. Whereas state capture refers to the capacity of firms to shape and affect the formation of the basic rules of the game ... through private payments to public officials and politicians, influence refers to the same capacity without recourse to such payments. Administrative corruption refers to so-called 'petty' forms of bribery in connection with the implementation of existing laws, rules and regulations."

Now, that's a distinction which Mr Hellman is very well known for making when dealing with corruption, isn't he?

A. Yes.

Q. And his assessment is that Russia and the Ukraine have the highest state capture indices in all the regions studied in this paper, which essentially concerns

Eastern Europe. That's right, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. And is that an approach which you endorse? I understand from paragraph 35 that it is.

A. I'll have a look at paragraph 35 to make sure what it is that I endorse.

Q. You cite it, I think perhaps you need to look at 34 to 39, you are citing it in the context of the influence of the oligarchs over the Russian State.

A. Mm-hm, yes.

Q. Which I think you regard as a form of state capture in Mr Hellman's dichotomy, do you not?

A. Well, yes.

Q. You identify Mr Berezovsky as being prominent among the oligarchs responsible for state capture at paragraph 46, do you not?

A. Yes.

Q. Would you accept Mr Hellman's characterisation of state capture as a serious form of corruption?

A. State capture, yes, as he defines it, state capture, yes. I think that access and influencing of government is not necessarily corruption but, yes, I'd agree with that.

Q. But state capture of the sort Mr Hellman is talking about, and that you're talking about at paragraphs 34 to 39 and 46, that is a form of corruption, is it not?

A. Yes, I would say so.

Q. One last matter, Professor Fortescue, Chechnya is part of Russia, isn't it?

A. It is.

Q. Russia is a member of the Commonwealth of Independent States?

A. Yes.

MR SUMPTION: Thank you.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Do you have any questions?

MR ADKIN: My Lady, I will have some questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Fine. I'll sit again at 2.05.

You understand, Professor Fortescue, that you mustn't speak about your evidence or the case with anybody, or communicate with anybody over the lunchtime?

THE WITNESS: Yes, I understand.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. 2.05.

(1.03 pm)

(The short adjournment)

(2.05 pm)

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, before we resume, could I just raise a point on this morning's transcript which relates to [draft] page 42, line 7.

This is part of Mr Rozenberg's re-examination, and I asked him the question based on a hypothesis about a financial benefit being dependent upon the decision of a state official. In line 7, the words "favourable court decision", the word "court" does indeed appear on the tape and therefore quite properly on the transcript. That was a mistake on my part.

I have discussed this with Mr Rabinowitz who agrees that it is obvious, and must have been obvious to the witness, that I wasn't talking about a court decision but a decision of the state official, see the earlier part, and he is content that the answer should be read on that footing without the need to recall Mr Rozenberg to clear up this particular glitch.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Let me just read the answer. I didn't pick it up at the time.

MR SUMPTION: No, neither did I, and I was pretty surprised when it was pointed out to me that the word "court" was there. But we have checked on the tape and I did indeed say that, not intentionally but I certainly said it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, he picks up the words "in obtaining favourable governmental decision".

MR SUMPTION: Indeed. So I think it's common ground that the answer can be read as if the word "court" wasn't there which it obviously wasn't meant to be.

Mr Rabinowitz isn't here, but I discussed this with him this morning and no doubt the transcript of what I've just said to your Ladyship will be drawn to his attention.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Gillis, that is all right, is it?

Or you weren't party to any of these discussions?

MR GILLIS: My Lady, I wasn't a party to the conversation but I don't think I needed to be, and I'm very happy to take it on the basis that that's what was discussed and agreed.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well.

Nobody else has any objections? Very well, the transcript shall be deemed to be read in that way.

MR SUMPTION: I'm grateful.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, Mr Adkin.

MR ADKIN: Professor Fortescue, could you please turn to paragraph 272 of your first report, which is at page 74.

For the transcript that is G(B)1/1.01/74.

Do you have that?

A. I have page 74.

Q. Paragraph 272 sets out various statements which relate to informal arrangements in 1990s Russia. Would you look, please at statement 14.

A. Yes.

Q. You agree with that statement, do you not? If it helps you, you deal with these statements at paragraph 274.

A. Yes, I agree.

Q. Now could you please turn to paragraph 276

G(B)1/1.01/75 which reads as follows:

"In his book, 'Violent Entrepreneurs', Volkov notes that if pressed former Soviet managers might turn to the arbitrazh court but, especially before 1996, new entrepreneurs were reluctant to do so and were more likely to turn to criminal protection or resolution in the event of disputes over their business arrangements."

I think you quote Volkov over the page.

Now, you've put that in your report, I assume that is because you agree with that?

A. I agree with particularly the part about the new entrepreneurs. I'm less certain myself in terms of my own knowledge about what former Soviet managers might have done.

Q. Okay, well don't worry for these purposes about former Soviet managers, let's just focus on the new entrepreneurs.

You've said elsewhere in your report that you consider the court system, that is the Russian court system in the mid-1990s, to have been corrupt and that the legal system at that time was uncertain, and that there were major problems at that time in enforcing court judgments even if they could be obtained. Is that a fair summary of your evidence?

A. Yes, I think that's a fair summary.

Q. Now, am I right in assuming that a reason why new entrepreneurs in the early to mid-1990s used forms of protection and resolution of their differences outside the legal or court system is because they did not consider that the legal system in Russia at that time was effective to protect their interests?

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. Now, I want to understand, if I may, how your conclusions on that relate to your conclusion that Russian businessmen during that time, that is to say the early to mid-1990s, often failed to document their arrangements. I think your evidence is that they held various assets in informal arrangements and they made their agreements orally. That's your evidence, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you say that Russian businessmen at that time adopted an informal rather than legally documented approach to their arrangements because, amongst other reasons, they did not contemplate that disputes over their arrangements would end up being resolved by the courts?

A. Yes, because they weren't confident that the courts would deal with them properly.

Q. I understand. Could you turn, please, to paragraph 83 of your report which is at page 25 G(B)1/1.01/25.

A. Yes, I have it.

Q. You have that, thank you. You talk here about the period after the resignation of President Yeltsin on 31 December, and I think my learned friend touched on that in his cross-examination. You say that Putin was not elected president until 26 March 2000 or inaugurated until 7 May 2000. Accordingly, for most of that period, that is to say December '99 to 26 March or May 2000, Putin was acting president rather than president.

"However, it was all but certain that Putin would become President, and I do not think that the distinction made any significant difference to his authority."

Now, I want to understand, if I may, why you say it was all but certain during that period that Putin would become president, would be elected?

A. There was a high expectation that he would win the election. He was genuinely quite popular at the time. A party that he had supported had won a parliamentary election I think in December 1999, so even on, let's say, electoral grounds that we might understand in this country, it was expected that he would win. There would be those who thought that there might be other considerations that would help him win regardless of his popularity.

Q. And when you say it would be expected, do you mean it was expected generally within Russia at that time that he was going to win the presidency, from the time that he took over as acting president at the end of 1999?

A. Yes, I would say that.

MR ADKIN: My Lady, I have no further questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much.

Mr Gillis.

Re-examination by MR GILLIS

MR GILLIS: Professor Fortescue, you were asked about journalistic sources and the difficulties of establishing the position without access to archives, do you recall that?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. And I think you indicated that, despite the fact that it was difficult, there were circumstances in which you could be confident with various degrees of certainty as to the factual position?

A. That's correct.

Q. Now, could you please explain to the court what is the analytical process that you apply to the journalistic sources that you looked at in order to determine whether or not you felt you could rely upon those sources?

A. The first thing to say of course is that I wouldn't rely, if I possibly could use other sources, just on journalistic sources, and usually there is something else that you can rely on, and I might come back to them after I've spoken about the journalistic sources. But if I looked at a journal article or, more commonly, a newspaper article, I would obviously look to see which newspaper it was published in, and there are some that I would regard with greater regard than others and more likely to be protected from some of the difficulties that we talked about previously, earlier today.

To some extent I'd look at the journalist. I mean, in my own field, I work much more in the mining and metals industry, and there are journals that I read regularly, and I come to rely on particular journalists. But I also would look at the format of the article.

I'll take the newspaper Vedomosti, because it is perhaps the best example of this practice, but others follow it the same way, but Vedomosti is almost formulaic in the way that it presents its articles. It will have a section where it presents purely factual material, it might be statistical, it might be references to legislation, so you have -- usually down the side of the article. Usually they will cite some sources, often those sources will be "unnamed Kremlin source" or something like that, in the same way that we're used to in western newspapers. Sometimes, of course, those references to "unnamed Kremlin source" is just as frustrating as they are if you read the same thing in an English newspaper: well, what does that mean? We have to try and understand what it means.

Generally then there will be, let's say, the journalist's statement on what the -- the information that they're trying to get across, and I suppose that might be where some of the difficulties might be. Usually Vedomosti and most other newspaper articles, in what I would call the respectable newspapers, will then cite or quote some independent experts, quite often they will be people in a more politically oriented article, say, from a think-tank of some sort, or somebody well-known as a political commentator. If it was a more economics oriented type journal, very often they cite people who work for investment banks, investment bank analysts and so on and so forth.

So in that one article you have those -- you have something to go on. It's not just somebody blathering on, if I may use that word; you have something to go on on where they're claiming that the information and the interpretation came from.

Then hopefully you will read other newspapers that will present things in the same way, and sometimes they say exactly the same thing, sometimes they say very different things. Obviously, if all the newspapers always said exactly the same thing, well, you probably wouldn't need to read very many of them, and you would suspect that there was something going on. But normally they do say different things, and then it's my task as an analyst to try and decide which is the most plausible, believable view.

As I said at the beginning of my answer, that's not the only sources that I rely on. Obviously you can learn quite a lot, not just factual material and things that are undoubtedly true, like President Putin said at a press conference, but the way that that official material is presented can give you insight into how believable the newspaper articles might be.

Also, I live in Australia and I get to Russia every now and then. I suppose I sit in Australia reading newspapers most of the time because I don't have any other great sources, also the official websites of the president and the prime minister and so on. I form a view, and when I go to Moscow, not in any terribly formal way I would say, but I just go along and I ask sometimes casually, they might not even realise that I'm trying to check up, I ask people that I think would know about these things through personal experience or close links to those places, just to get a sort of check on whether the impression that I've already formed is correct or not.

So that's basically the way that I would go about forming an opinion.

Q. Thank you.

You were asked about the difficulties of establishing share ownership where there were opaque structures, do you recall that?

A. Yes.

Q. Could I ask you to turn to paragraph 152 in your first report which we have at page 41 G(B)1/1.01/41.

A. Yes.

Q. And the table there shows for each of those six companies which were involved in those loans for shares, can you see in relation to what you have described as being the "Winning group and bid, stage 1", and then the "Winning group and bid, stage 2", which we see at the top of the table.

A. Yes, I can see that.

Q. In relation to each of those companies, you've indicated the person who you have described as being the key individual?

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. Can you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Could you explain what you mean by "Key Individuals" there?

A. Those are the people who were presented -- presented themselves or were presented at the time as being, well, I think I can say the majority shareholders, the dominant person in those particular firms. And I would say that subsequent events, well, at the time we are quite confident that those were the right people, and certainly nothing happened subsequently to change our mind -- or change my mind, sorry.

Q. Could I ask you this: so far as you are aware, is there any body of opinion that suggests that these two stages, these were not the key individuals that were involved?

A. No. I know of no other opinion.

Q. Thank you. It was put to you that no businessman had a privileged position of influence with the Kremlin since President Putin came to power.

A. Yes.

Q. Are you aware of any examples of businessmen, and please leave aside Mr Abramovich because he's the specific subject of this dispute, are you aware of examples of businessmen who appear to have a privileged position and ability to influence the Kremlin?

A. During the Putin presidency?

Q. Yes.

A. Yes.

Q. Could you identify them and explain how you believe they have benefited from their relationship with the Kremlin?

A. The benefits that the oligarchs received -- and when I say oligarchs, I'm talking generally -- under Mr Putin, sometimes they were collective, such as changes to the taxation system, changes to resource legislation.

In terms of specific benefits to particular individuals, it's not always easy to identify, whether that was because they were friends or had a relationship to Mr Putin or not, or whether it was simply the way things went commercially. I would say in that period, Mr Putin did work to at least give the appearance that he was not giving particular preference to specific individuals, and most of the appearance of benefits were collective benefits.

Q. Are you happy to name individuals that you say fall within this category?

A. Yes, I would say Mr Potanin, I would say Mr Alekperov, I would say all those people who benefited ultimately from loans for shares, as one way of describing them.

Q. Now, you were asked, in the context of the suggestion that Mr Abramovich had influence, you were asked to look at an article by Professor Sakwa.

A. Yes.

Q. Do you recall that?

Could you be provided with bundle G(B)2 and turn to tab 2, flag 27. You were asked to look at [book] page 130 G(B)2/2.27/234.

A. Thank you.

Q. You were asked what in this article supported your view that Mr Abramovich had influence with Putin. You were asked to read the first full paragraph, I think.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It's page 234 for the transcript.

I think you were asked to read the paragraph that began "Abramovich at this time", do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Could I ask you just to look towards the end of that paragraph?

A. Yes.

Q. About five or six lines from the bottom, which reads:

"In September 2005..."

Just read to the end of that.

A. Yes:

"In September 2005 --"

Q. I'm sorry, just read it to yourself, that will be fine.

A. Sorry. (Pause)

Yes, I've read it.

Q. Re-reading that last part, does that assist you at all in terms of what parts of this article you were relying upon for the purposes of your report?

A. Yes, I think that helps.

Q. Could you explain to the court why you say that?

A. Because it discusses Abramovich's relationship with the authorities and the benefit that he was able to achieve -- gain from that.

Q. Could I then ask you to go back to your report, which we have at G(B)1/1, and go back to paragraph 131 which we have at page 37 G(B)1/1.01/37.

A. Yes.

Q. You were asked about the loans-for-shares scheme and you referred to the two stages.

A. Yes.

Q. Could I just ask you to clarify what you were meaning by the two stages?

A. Yes. Again, what I call loans for shares, there were indeed two stages. At the first stage, companies bid for a certain -- bid to gain management rights over a certain number of shares that would be held in security by that company after the company had loaned the state a certain amount of money, and until such time as that money was repaid that company would have management, operational management control, over those shares. I don't know the precise legal terms, I'm sorry, but we would say held as a security. The second stage came into operation if the loan was not repaid by the state, in which case those shares would be put up for auction in order to collect the money that could be used to pay off the debt.

As it happened in practice, the same company that won the initial auction, so held the companies -- held the shares, sorry, in security, and managed the companies on that basis, they won the option when the loans were not repaid. So at that stage they gained ownership of those particular shares.

Q. In the event of a default on the loan, such that there was to be a subsequent auction, can you assist with who organised that auction?

A. In each case, as it happened -- no, sorry, I'll start again.

The company that held the shares in security organised the auction.

Q. Thank you. Moving on, it was put to you by reference to looking at paragraph 129 of your report that only two of the loans for shares were of a majority stakeholder, and that was the case of Sidanko and Sibneft, do you recall that?

A. Yes, I do recall that.

MR SUMPTION: No, what was actually put was that in only two cases was a majority of the state's holding disposed of.

MR GILLIS: I accept the correction.

Could I ask you to be provided with bundle E5, and could I ask you to turn to tab 14 and page 169.

A. I don't have the file yet.

Q. No, that's fine. So that's E5, tab 14, at page 169 E5/14/169. This is the witness statement of Mr Shvidler. Can I ask you to look at paragraph 17?

A. Yes.

Q. There, as you see, Mr Shvidler is suggesting that:

"... in the case of Norilsk Nickel, the 38 per cent ordinary voting shares put up for sale gave 51% voting control because its share capital included also non-voting preference shares".

A. Yes, I see what he said there.

Q. Are you able to indicate whether, to your understanding, what Mr Shvidler says there is correct or not?

A. That is my understanding, yes.

Q. You were asked some questions about state capture.

A. Yes.

Q. And it was suggested to you that in paragraphs 34, 39 and 46 of your first report, so maybe we can just turn those up G(B)1/1.01/12.

A. Yes, I have them.

Q. I think it was being put to you that in paragraphs 34, 39 and 46 of your first report, you were talking about state capture as described by Hellman, do you remember the article -- the working paper that we had looked at?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Now, could you please look at paragraph 34, and could I ask you this. Do you there describe this as state capture?

A. No, I don't use the phrase there "state capture".

Q. And can I ask the same in relation to paragraph 39?

A. No, I don't use the phrase there "state capture".

Q. And paragraph 46?

A. No, I don't use the phrase "state capture" in that paragraph.

Q. Can I ask you whether, in those paragraphs, the oligarchs' influence which you're describing, were you describing that in the sense of state capture, in the specific sense defined by Mr Hellman in his report, or not?

A. No, I wouldn't say in that very, very specific sense, no.

Q. And then finally, Mr Adkin asked you about informal agreements?

A. Yes.

Q. And difficulties in enforcing agreements through the courts because of the weaknesses in the legal system.

A. Yes.

Q. Are you able to assist, and say if you're not, whether businessmen regarded informal agreements of that nature, or oral agreements of that nature, as being binding or nonbinding?

A. I would expect that they considered them to be binding.

MR GILLIS: Thank you. I have no further questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much indeed, Professor Fortescue, for coming along and giving your evidence.

THE WITNESS: Thank you, my Lady.

(The witness withdrew)

MS DAVIES: My Lady, we call Professor Service.

PROFESSOR ROBERT SERVICE (affirmed)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Do sit down.

Examination-in-chief by MS DAVIES

MS DAVIES: Professor Service, could you be given bundle G(B)3 and G(B)6, please. Starting in bundle G(B)3, could you turn to tab 1 at page 1 G(B)3/1.1/1, do you see the first page of your first expert report?

A. I do.

Q. If you could turn on in that tab to page 30, please, is that your signature?

A. That is.

Q. Then if you could turn to tab 2, you should see the first page of your second expert report G(B)3/1.2/36, and at page 38 do you see your signature?

Q. Page 3 of the internal numbering, page 38 of the right-hand corner?

A. I see, yes. Yes, indeed, yes.

Q. Can you confirm that the contents of both of those reports represent your true opinion?

A. I can indeed.

Q. If you could then take bundle G(B)6 at page 1 G(B)6/1.01/1, you should find the contemporary history experts' joint memorandum, do you have that?

A. Correct.

Q. If you turn forward to page 26, can you see your signature on that page?

A. I can, yes. Yes.

Q. Can you confirm that so far as opinions are attributed to you in this joint memorandum, they represent your true opinion?

A. I can confirm that.

MS DAVIES: Thank you very much, Professor Service. There will be some questions from Mr Gillis.

Cross-examination by MR GILLIS

MR GILLIS: Professor Service, good afternoon.

A. Good afternoon.

Q. Can I make it clear that no one doubts your expertise, but could I start by asking about your publications, and I think they are listed in appendix 2 of your report, so that's G(B)3?

A. Right.

Q. I think they're listed at page 34 G(B)3/1.1/34.

So can I just take this point quite quickly. You are the author of the Penguin History of Modern Russia, is that correct?

A. That is correct.

Q. And that's a general history of Russia from 1900 to the present day, is that correct?

A. Well, to the year 2009 when it was published. I'm not a futurologist.

Q. I accept that, and I think there were editions of the book in 1997, 2003 and 2009?

A. That's absolutely correct.

Q. In the most recent edition, is this correct, that the book now has three chapters running to about 50 pages which covers Russian history from the end of the Soviet Union to 2009?

A. That's correct, and it has an afterword that rolls up the whole of the 20th century with the 21st century.

Q. Turning to your recent publications of books on specific subjects, I understand you have recently published a new book called "Spies and Commissars: Bolshevik Russia and the West"?

A. Yes, three weeks ago.

Q. So that's a book about the relationship between the Soviet Government and the western powers in the years up to 1917?

A. No, the book is about the years 1917 to 1921.

Q. I'm sorry. So it's in the years after 1917 but it doesn't touch post-Soviet history?

A. No, if you want my books -- my book that touches post-Soviet history, you would have to choose "Russia: Experiment with a People", which is specifically about that topic.

Q. That's what I was just going to come on to. But just looking through the rest of the published works, there was a biography on Trotsky in 2008, that's correct?

A. That's correct, yes.

Q. And before that you published a book called "Comrades! A World History of Communism", in 2007?

A. I did.

Q. There was a biography of Stalin in 2004?

A. That's correct.

Q. And in 2002 I think is when you published your only book which was focused specifically on post-Soviet Russian history, and that, as you said, is "Russia: Experiment with a People"?

A. That's correct, yes.

Q. Then going back, biographies on Lenin?

A. Yes.

Q. And in 1996 you published a history of the Russian Revolution from 1900 to 1927?

A. Well, it was the fourth edition of -- this is something I published years and years ago but that was its third edition, and I've now brought out a fourth edition, yes.

Q. And then before that you were engaged in a three-volume biography of Lenin?

A. Not quite correct. If you want to be absolutely pedantic about it, I didn't call it a biography because at that stage you couldn't get access to archives on Lenin, so I called it a political life. It was a study, in other words, of the political activity of Lenin. I do believe that archives and documents are important in the study of history.

Q. Well, we'll come on to that. Now, Professor Service, I'm not in any way suggesting that you don't have relevant expertise on topics you address, but is it fair to say that, while you have written about post-Soviet history, the main focus of your writing has always been the Communist period, particularly Lenin, Stalin, and Trotsky, is that fair?

- A. I think if you look at my research over the period when I've had jobs, I have always had a commitment to looking at the whole of the modern Russian historical period as a whole. I'm very much against this chopping up of periods into little patches of time. It's very much my contention that in order to understand any number of years in modern Russian history you do have to have the big picture.

While it is true, however -- and I hope I'm not being too over-pedantic here -- while it is true that most of my books have been from the Soviet years, I was the co-founder of first the Soviet press group at the School of Slavonic Studies, and then of the post-Soviet press group, a group that met every single week to look at all of the newspapers that we could possibly get hold of in order to keep ourselves abreast with what was going on in the last years of the Soviet Union and the first years of the Russian Federation.

So I've always tried to unify a study of the contemporary Soviet or Russian scene with my earlier interests. And I think this is the healthiest way of dealing with questions of Russian history.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: The one that you've written relating to the post-Communist era is "Russia: Experiment with a People"?

A. That's correct. That's 1991 through to 2001/2002.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR GILLIS: Can I ask you this. In addressing the post-Soviet period which, as you've just indicated to my Lady, you do in "Russia: Experiment with a People", is it fair to say that Russian business and Russian economy is not something you've written about except really in passing, is that fair?

A. The -- I don't think it -- it may be fair, but I don't think it really reflects what the purpose of that book was, which was to suggest that my colleagues who were economists and my colleagues who were political scientists were missing the broad horizontal range of everything that needed to be considered when we were looking at Russian public life in those years.

So it was an attempt to bring together politics, economics, culture, security, international relations, the lot. Because in order to look at one thing in Russian history, you have to look at the other things on that historical range, so that it's certainly fair to say that I didn't concentrate in that book on business, but business was very much part of the range of those interests.

Q. Can I ask you, is this right: in "Russia: Experimenting with a People", I think it's chapter 9, at pages 137 to 151, that's the chapter which is entitled "Economising on Reform"?

A. Yes.

Q. And it's that chapter, is it, that addresses economic reforms in Russia between 1991 and 2001?

A. Yes, that's correct, yes.

Q. So that's 15 pages on the topic?

A. I can see what you're driving at.

Q. No, please --

A. No, no, I don't object at all to your questions.

Q. No, Professor Service, I made it perfectly clear I respected your expertise, I just want to establish the extent to which this has been the focus of your writings.

A. You're absolutely correct. I'm giving you an open goal on this --

Q. No --

A. -- because I'm insisting that in order to understand one topic in Russian life, you have to look at all of them. And academics who demarcate the horizontal range miss the big picture and miss the necessary discipline that is required in order to understand this huge, amazing country, Russia.

Q. So can I just check with you that there is no other writing that we should be looking at where you've been discussing Russian economic reforms and Russian business practices?

A. Well, apart from my journalism, that is correct.

Q. Thank you.

Can I just move on to indicate an area which I won't be addressing with you, and could I ask you to look at your first report at page 24.

A. Yes.

Q. Can you see at paragraph 54 G(B)3/1.1/24 you appear to express a conclusion about the credibility of Mr Abramovich's witness evidence, do you see that?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Professor Service, I'm not going to ask you about that because those are matters for my Lady, do you understand?

A. I do, and that has been brought to my attention since I wrote the report, that I've somewhat trespassed over the boundary from being a historian into being a putative judge, and I have no intention of laying claim to that status or dignity.

Q. And equally so, Professor Service, you sometimes criticise Professor Fortescue for not having considered Mr Abramovich's evidence, and I'm not going to ask you about that either.

Can I ask you this: in your previous publications, is it not the case that you have expressed the view that Mr Berezovsky was one of those who benefited from the loans-for-shares scheme?

A. I don't know word for word what I've said about this, but it is certainly the case that in the 1995 to 1996 business politics, Mr Berezovsky seems to have derived commercial benefit from the intersection of politics and business.

Q. Could I ask that you be handed G(B)4/1, tab 16, do you have this?

A. Yes.

Q. This is your book, the Penguin History of Modern Russia. Could I ask you to turn to page 175, looking at the numbers at the bottom right-hand corner G(B)4/1.16/175.

It's the left-hand page which I was wanting to look at, which is page 532 in the book. Three lines from the top of the page you write:

"He [and that's Yeltsin] agreed a secret deal with Boris Berezovsky and a handful of other exceptionally wealthy businessmen who were commonly known as 'the oligarchs' whereby they would receive a lucrative stake in state-owned mining enterprises in return for bailing out the state budget and financing Yeltsin's... campaign."

Do you see that?

A. I do.

Q. Was that not referring to the loans-for-shares scheme?

A. Yes, it was, yes.

Q. Could I ask you to look at another excerpt which is in "Russia: Experiment with a People".

My Lady, I'm afraid this excerpt is not in --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It doesn't matter, I can see it on the screen.

MR GILLIS: My Lady, I think probably not. What we've done is prepared a bundle of handouts, or hand-ups.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I hope they're going on Magnum.

MR GILLIS: They will do, my Lady.

(Handed)

My Lady, I don't anticipate that I'm going to have to put all of these hand-ups to the witness but it's just quicker to have them all before the court in one go.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What, these aren't on Magnum?

MR GILLIS: No, but they will be put on Magnum.

Could I ask you to turn to tab 1.

A. Yes.

Q. This is from "Russia: Experiment with a People", do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. It's the second page, and we've sidelined the passage that we would ask you to look at.

A. I see that, yes.

Q. There you say -- I'm sorry, it's on the fifth page, so that will be page 296. There you say:

"Berezovsky's trading empire grew exponentially. His financial group diversified still further by setting up a bank and buying up properties in Switzerland and the United Kingdom. It also took a large stake in the fuel sector of the economy, especially gas and oil."

Now, again, am I right in understanding that that's a reference to what you then perceived to be Mr Berezovsky's participation in the loans-for-shares scheme?

A. Yes, that's what I then perceived to be the case.

I have more reservations about this now in the light of what I've read since I wrote that book nearly ten years ago, but you're absolutely right, that's what I said in that book at that time.

Q. But that's my Lady's juris task, not yours.

Could I now move on to discuss with you methodological approach. In your first report, is this right, you criticise Professor Fortescue's reliance on journalistic sources and memoirs, do you recall that?

A. I do recall that, yes.

Q. I think for the record that's at paragraphs 6 and 12 of your first report G(B)3/1.1/2.

I think we can also see this reflected in your comments in the joint memorandum, and could I ask you to look at that, which we have at G(B)6/1, and could you turn to paragraph 9 which is at page 5 G(B)6/1.01/5.

A. We're looking at paragraph 9, yes?

Q. Paragraph 9. This is recording your comments on historical methodology. In subparagraphs 1 and 2, I think you've pointed out that Professor Fortescue's first report was heavily based on contemporary press reports and memoirs?

A. Yes.

Q. You go on to say:

"It is true that, as yet, there is not much else available for the history of Russian high politics and big business in the period under consideration..."

Do you see that?

A. I do, yes.

Q. Professor Service, is this right, you do not go so far as to suggest that historians examining the period should ignore journalistic sources and memoirs, do you?

A. No, I don't. Could I explain what I do mean?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, please do.

A. I mean that we have to be particularly tentative about what we say about the 1990s. At the moment, my next project is a history of the ending of the Cold War, and for that purpose I've been looking at the Defence Ministry documents, the Foreign Affairs Ministry documents, the Party Secretariat minutes and documents, I've got all sorts of ways of checking whether the New York Times or Pravda or Izvestia offered reliable reports, whether memoirs written by Gorbachev's close confidants or Reagan's close associates are also reliable.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Sorry, just stopping you. The Defence Ministry and Foreign Affairs Ministry documents that you're looking at are Russian and American, or Russian or American?

A. They are -- I'm particularly picking out Russian, yes. Well, Soviet.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Soviet?

A. Soviet, yes. So that some of the things that I thought I knew about the history of 1985 to 1991, when I was tracking it on a weekly basis through newspaper reports, through listening to television programmes where Gorbachev and Shevardnadze were speaking directly, I can now check these things out. And some of those things that I thought I knew tentatively in 1985 to 1991 I now know I didn't know. Because the real happenings were a little bit different. Sometimes they were quite the opposite.

Now, what's really striking about the 1990s is how much we are being asked to rely upon a few newspapers and upon the memoirs of politicians who are obviously providing accounts that are riddled with personal bias.

Now, this is just basic, basic historiographical scepticism. I'm not being fussy here. I repeated in my second report what I said in my first report because I really strongly believe this, that we must be tentative about what we think we know about the 1990s when all we have to go on are what politicians and businessmen want us -- want to let us get access to.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

A. And when the newspapers are owned by people who have their own biases. I mean, this is just standard historical methodology. So I'm not saying anything that any serious historian would disagree with.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think you've answered the question.

Go on, Mr Gillis.

MR GILLIS: Indeed. Thank you.

I think what you indicate in paragraph 9(3) is that you have to exercise much caution, I think is the phrase you use two lines from the bottom of the page on page 5 that we're looking at. When you're looking at journalistic sources you have to exercise much caution, is that correct? That's the correct approach?

A. I think that's putting it mildly. I think sometimes we have to say: this caution involves us saying that what we think we know is only provisional and highly tentative, especially when there are so many cases in recent Russian history where what we thought we knew proved not to be true.

Q. It may well be that you cannot know for certain until such time as one has access to all of the archives, if ever. But as I understand it, you're not suggesting that until that stage comes historians should simply ignore journalistic sources; you are suggesting they should exercise much caution?

A. I would probably go further and say that they should make clear that what they think they know is only a tentative judgment based upon exiguous sources.

Q. Turning over the page to page 6, at the top of the page, at subparagraph 4, you indicate that historians should take the same approach to memoirs, is that correct

G(B)6/1.01/6?

A. Yes. Yes, I do. And that's notwithstanding the point that for demur I use newspapers and memoirs. This is not a contradictory position, one has to use the bricks that are available, but sometimes the bricks crumble.

Q. Professor Service, is that for the reason really that you give at subparagraph 9(2), so that's going back to page 5 G(B)6/1.01/5:

"It is true that, as yet, there is not much else available for the history of Russian high politics and big business in the period under consideration..."

So I suggest to you that having exercised the appropriate caution, and having evaluated those sources against all the other material, it is inevitable that those sources will play an important part in the historian's evaluation of the issues, would you agree with that?

A. I agree with it with the important caveat that when the range of sources is so limited, then the conclusions have to be all the more tentative.

Q. And could I just quickly ask you to look at what you have said about newspaper reports and memoirs in your first report, so that's going back to G(B)3/1. And could you turn to paragraph 12 at page 5 G(B)3/1.1/5. About eight lines up from the end of paragraph 12 what you say is:

"Consequently, my own working assumption is that newspaper reports and memoirs are more useful in conveying a sense of the historical pattern of attitudes and practices than in evidencing the details of a particular political event or commercial transaction."

Do you see that?

A. Yes, I do. Yes.

Q. Now, Professor Service, is this right, that while you say that that's your working assumption, would you accept that in your published works, and no doubt having exercised much caution, you've relied upon what could be described as journalistic sources to establish specific facts?

A. Alas, that has to be the case if we're to have any continuous narrative at all for the 1990s. Regretfully, that is the case.

Q. And could I maybe just show you one example. In the additional bundle that I've handed up, could I ask you to go to tab 1 at page 122, which I think is the second page. There you say -- can you see the sidelined passage:

"The Yeltsin family made plenty of money whenever the opportunity arose or could be made to arise. The president's daughter, Tatyana Dyachenko forged links with the multimillionaire financier and ex-academic Boris Berezovsky."

Now, I assume that you would accept that that's a statement of fact, not a reflection of historical patterns or attitude, is that correct?

- A. Yes. No, you're absolutely right there, and I can see what you're driving at.

Sorry, I beg your pardon, I'm meant to be addressing my remarks to the judge.

I can see the point of this link. This is a case of doing the best one can with the exiguous sources available.

- Q. And I think we can see from footnote 7, and then if you go to page 358 in this tab, that what you're relying upon there is Mr Klebnikov's book "Godfather of the Kremlin", is that correct?

- A. That's correct.

- Q. And I think you've identified in your first report, this for the record is paragraph 65 G(B)3/1.1/28, that Mr Klebnikov is a journalist who you've identified in your first report as having been accused by some reputable historians of exceeding evidence in writing, but he's fundamentally a journalistic source, is that correct?

- A. I think that's a bit unfair on the late Klebnikov. He pushes his sources too hard. I think that Stephen Kotkin's reservations about Klebnikov's book are ones that I go along with, and that's why I put them into the first report that I wrote. In particular I think that there are materials that Klebnikov gathered that were very, very useful, but his interpretation was -- yes, it was on the sensationalist side.

Q. Professor Service, what I would suggest to you is that in your published works you're willing, no doubt having exercised much caution, to reach factual conclusions on the basis of journalistic sources?

A. I am.

Q. Do you agree?

A. Sorry to butt in on you there.

That is the case, I have done this. What I'm trying to indicate in my first and second report, however, is that underpinning this is a methodological scepticism that one can't always bring out in a book of the kind that I was trying to write, "Russia: Experiment with a People".

Q. Could I just ask you to look at Professor Fortescue's second report which we have at G(B)1/1, tab 2. He responds to your criticism as to his methodological approach at paragraphs 10 to 16, which we have at pages 145 through to 151 G(B)1/1.02/145.

Can you see that at paragraph 16, Professor Fortescue states that he has not accepted any source without critical analysis and he rejects your criticism. Do you see that? I'm sorry, if I'm rushing you. Would you like to read paragraph 16?

A. I haven't found it yet.

Q. I'm sorry, page 151 G(B)1/1.02/151.

A. There we are, yes I've got there, yes.

Could you possibly repeat the question?

Q. What I suggested to you is that there Professor Fortescue states that he has not accepted any source without critical analysis and that he rejects your criticisms. I just wanted to see that you saw that was what he was saying.

A. Yes, I see that he has said that, yes, I remember reading that, yes.

Q. Professor Service, what I would suggest is that, just as it was appropriate for you to rely, after critical evaluation, upon journalistic sources for the purposes of your publication, so too it was appropriate for Professor Fortescue to rely upon those sources after critical evaluation for the purposes of reaching the conclusions he expressed in his report. Would you agree with that?

A. I don't agree with that analysis, mainly because I think that in my work on the 1990s I have tried to avoid pinning substantial acute matters of public policy or official practice on memoirs or newspaper reports. I've tried to -- you're right, in certain instances I have described events on the basis of those two types of report but I try to keep this to a minimum.

Q. And Professor Service, what I would also suggest to you is that, if you had been willing to engage in the critical evaluation of those sources, it ought to have been possible to reach agreement on various statements that remain disputed. But I assume you would disagree with that, would you?

A. I think I must draw attention to the fact that we spent two days in this joint meeting and we went through every single disputed statement, Professor Bean, Professor Fortescue and myself. We attempted as thoroughly as we could to come to agreements. But where there was a division of minds, we left it at that and agreed to disagree.

Q. Well, Professor Service, could we just start with -- I'm not going to go through all the disputed statements, obviously, but could we just start with transfer pricing.

Could I ask you to look at page 21 of the joint memo, so that's at bundle G(B)6/1, and at page 21,

G(B)6/1.01/21.

Could I ask you, unless you recall it, to read through section H, which is on transfer pricing. So we have the statements on paragraph 28 and 29, and it goes over the page where we see the Professor's comments at paragraph 48.

A. Oh, yes, I remember this. Yes.

Q. Now, the section is dealing with really four statements about transfer pricing, is that correct? Looking particularly at paragraph 29.

A. Yes.

Q. I'd suggest to you that they're setting out a very general introduction to the phenomenon of transfer pricing, is that correct?

A. I think the word "general" is very apposite here.

Q. Nowhere is it suggested that the mechanism identified applies universally or invariably, is that correct?

A. Well, typicality, to my mind, implies some kind of pattern being suggested.

Q. And these statements, they've both been endorsed by Professor Fortescue and Professor Bean, is that correct?

A. That is correct, but if I may enter yet again a reservation, having read the witness statements of Shvidler and -- Mr Shvidler and others, I came to the conclusion that there was extraordinary variety in the way that these methods of transfer pricing were conducted.

And it's for that reason that I entered that caveat, and I'm sorry that it appears that I should have made, you know, a greater attempt to come to an agreement, but I saw my duty as being to say what I really thought.

Q. Well, undoubtedly it was and still is. But what you say at the end of paragraph 48 is that you say

G(B)6/1.01/22:

"... the evidential basis of these statements remains too weak to encourage confidence in generalisations of this nature."

Do you see that?

A. I do see that, yes, and I stand by that. I was very much taken with Mr Shvidler's evidence when I read it over the course of the summer. I was very, very persuaded that there was enormous -- you might almost say imaginative variety about the way that Russian businessmen sought ways to get their money abroad.

Q. But what I suggest to you is that certainly aspects can clearly be established as being evidentially correct or not. I mean, for instance statement 30, which refers to:

"Russia did not introduce legislation regulating transfer pricing until 1999 ..."

That's objectively verifiable, isn't it?

A. You have a point about the particular number there.

It's the whole bunching of this description of transfer pricing to which I took objection.

Q. Well, can we just look at what you've said in your first report about transfer pricing, so we have that at G(B)3/1, and it's at paragraph 40, which is at page 18 G(B)3/1.1/18.

At paragraph 40 you say:

"I have little to add to what Professor Fortescue writes about low tax zones, transfer pricing and capital flight in the two decades after communism. What must be borne in mind, however, is that within the general picture there was room for much variability."

Then you refer to what Mr Shvidler has said.

A. Yes.

Q. Professor Service, what I suggest to you is that the statement that you were being asked to agree or disagree was not trying to encompass all variations, it was just trying to indicate to the court typically how transfer pricing could be done.

What I would suggest to you is that what you have said in your report really provides no proper basis for continuing to dispute that these statements are fair and accurate. Would you comment on that?

A. Well, I fail to see the logic of that proposition. I've made it very clear in my first report, paragraph 40, that Mr Shvidler's fifth witness statement points up the variety of methods by which transfer pricing was conducted, and I allude to this in the joint report, my caveat in the joint report, to which attention is now being drawn.

Q. Well, what you're saying in your paragraph 48 in the joint memorandum is that the evidential basis of these statements remains too weak. So this is going back to page 22 in the joint memorandum bundle G(B)6/1.01/22.

Is it not fair to say that the statements that you were being asked to agree are accurate and there is an evidential basis for them, but of course there are many different ways in which it could be done?

Is that not fair?

A. Could I just ask for that very long sentence to be repeated?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Put the question more simply,

Mr Gillis, please.

MR GILLIS: What I was pointing out to you is that, in your paragraph 48 in the joint memorandum, bundle 6 at tab 1, you are saying that you believe that the evidential basis for the statements remains too weak. What I was suggesting to you is that a fairer and more accurate approach, given what you're saying was the impact of Mr Shvidler's statement, would be to recognise that the statements about transfer pricing arrangement were fair and accurate, but simply to recall that there are many different ways in which this could be done, which is fundamentally, if you look at the first sentence, what Professors Fortescue and Bean have said.

- A. You are quite correct that there is evidence for a general pattern, but the extraordinary variety of transfer pricing has to be brought into play here.

I have been a touch on the fussy side in insisting that I didn't want to use the same phrasing that Professors Fortescue and Bean agreed upon, because they've got the same caveat basically as I have got and I wanted them to go for my phrasing and they stuck to theirs.

- Q. But in substance you don't disagree with how Professors Fortescue and Bean have put the point, is that right?

- A. Well, I would put it slightly differently, that I thought at the time that they basically agreed with me, and I wanted them to just simply say that in the words that I was proposing.

But this was a very amicable meeting that we had over two days and once or twice we just agreed to disagree.

Q. All right. Well, Professor Service, I must move on.

Could I move on to loans for shares?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Should I take the break, Mr Gillis, is that a convenient moment?

Very well, ten minutes.

Don't talk about your evidence to anybody.

(3.22 pm)

(A short break)

(3.40 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Gillis.

MR GILLIS: Professor Service, I now want to look at loans for shares and discuss with you who was able to acquire interest in the valuable companies which were sold eventually under the loans-for-shares scheme.

So could you start by looking at the joint memorandum, which is G(B)6/1 and it's at page 15.

G(B)6/1.01/15. Could I ask you to read statement 2 and the comments at paragraphs 31 and 32. (Pause)

A. Ah yes. Yes, yes.

Q. And is this right, statement 2 is endorsed by Professor Fortescue, but in very brief summary your objection at paragraph 32 is that you don't accept that political influence or connection to the Yeltsin administration was necessary in order to succeed in the loans-for-shares deal? And also that you are not satisfied that the loans-for-shares scheme was envisaged to lead to ownership of shares, is that correct? Is that what you're essentially saying at paragraphs 32 and 33?

- A. I'm saying quite a lot more than that. I'm objecting to this horrible word "oligarchs" that stops us thinking clearly about what was the relationship between business and politics in the 1990s and in the 2000s. This was a word that was introduced as a sort of shorthand, but it has started to involve us thinking that there was a very separate cast, a stratum of big businessmen who were qualitatively different from the other big businessmen. That's really important to challenge.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I see what you've said in your report about it and your comparison, I think, with the position in Greece.

MR GILLIS: Exactly.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've read all of that.

MR GILLIS: I wasn't going to look at that at all.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That's why you put it inverted commas all the time?

- A. Yes, sometimes I've failed to do it, and I think that's a sin, I really ought to be consistent.

But the question I was asked was: is that what I'm getting at in 31 and 32? I think if you look at what I say in my report, and what I say in 31 and 32, you can see that underpinning this is a challenge to the assumption that there was some sort of oligarchy, and that big businessmen of a particular kind, who had separated themselves off from the rest of the big businessmen in Russia, and were recognised as such by the politicians, that this was the case and that they were essentially or largely ruling Russia.

And this is just such a phenomenal misjudgment about what was going on, and that brings me back to what I said in my "Russia: Experiment" book. This is why I wrote a book, to challenge the standard orthodoxy of a lot of my colleagues in the 1990s when they were writing about politics and/or business.

So that's what I'm getting at in 31 and 32 and this is not a minor point.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

A. It's really essential for the understanding of politics and business in the 1990s and the year -- and the years that followed.

MR GILLIS: Professor Service, I was asking you about paragraphs 32 and 33, not 31, because I wasn't wanting to go into this question of whether it was a Greek concept of an oligarchy or just businessmen that exercised influence. But let me move on.

A. Well, can I make a comment on that? That it's not a Greek concept, it's a concept that has spread to the study of politics in all of the centuries that have followed.

It's a meaningful word, that it's ruled by the few, and I do not think that these big businessmen ruled Russia. They had influence, they had influence in certain sectors, we always have to ask about the depth of that influence and the breadth of that influence, and we should just simply stop using the word until we are able to show that these few businessmen ruled Russia.

In fact, of course, they didn't. It was the politicians who set the commercial strategy for the government in the 1990s, the politicians were in charge. He was an incompetent, drunken, sickly ruler, Boris Yeltsin, but he and his fellow politicians, and the businessmen who became politicians temporarily, such as Boris Berezovsky, these were the people who were in charge.

It wasn't a business oligarchy and it's not a trivial point.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, well, I think you've made it.

MR GILLIS: Thank you.

Can I now ask you to look at statements 3 to 6, which are over the page, on page 16, and read paragraph 34 which has your comments and Professor Fortescue's comments G(B)6/1.01/16. (Pause)

A. Yes, I've read them.

Q. Statements 3 to 6 are endorsed by Professor Fortescue but, is this right, you're saying that you simply can't reach any conclusion at all about what happened in the various loans for shares deals?

A. Well, I'm coming back -- I'm sorry to be a total bore and I won't be quite as emphatic and noisy as I was a few minutes ago. The evidence for all of this is our beloved newspaper reports and ever-loved memoirs. We've got to be very, very cautious about it, about saying that we really know the history of the 1990s.

Q. But you are saying that you can't express any conclusions in relation to the various loans-for-shares schemes that are detailed in paragraphs 3 to 6; that seems to be what you're saying, is that right?

A. I'm saying that the full complexity of what really went on is still not so clear as to allow us to agree to this general description.

Q. Can I just ask you to look at what you said in your first report about loans for shares, and if you could go to G(B)3/1 at page 8 G(B)3/1.1/8, and it's paragraph 18.

A. Yes.

Q. Now, what you say there is:

"The account of the privatisation process given by Professor Fortescue offers more or less the conventional picture among analysts in... the West. There are certain aspects of that process, however, where there is room for amendment or expansion."

Now, am I right in saying that there you are commenting on paragraphs 105 to 167 of Professor Fortescue's first report where he comments on and endorses statements 2 to 6 which we've just been looking at?

A. I can't off-the-cuff remember the exact numbers. Is there any way of my checking that?

Q. Certainly. If you can take up G(B)1/1, and it's at pages 31 to 45 G(B)1/1.01/31.

A. Yes.

Q. If you can see page 31, at the top of the page, it starts with the title heading "The privatisation of Russian state owned assets in the 1990s and the loans for shares auction", which is the same title heading as we have above your paragraph 18.

A. Right.

Q. Professor Fortescue's report runs from paragraph 105 to paragraph 167, which goes through to page 46.

As I understand it, going back to paragraph 18 of your report G(B)3/1.1/8.

A. Yes.

Q. You're saying that Professor Fortescue offers a more or less conventional picture among analysts in the west, is that correct?

A. Yes. And then I say why I object to this picture, yes.

Q. All right, just taking it in stages. So at paragraph 18 then, you certainly aren't suggesting that there was anything which suggests that the statements in 2 to 6 were incorrect; because can I suggest you're endorsing what Professor Fortescue is saying and he is endorsing statements 2 to 6.

A. I intended to make an exposition there of how I think the relationship between business and politics ought to be understood in the 1990s, so I took the opportunity there to indicate that I think that the -- that by and large the politicians were in charge, and the impression given occasionally in Professor Fortescue's report is that it was the other way round.

Q. But Professor Service, if I can ask you to look at the remainder of this section in your report -- so picking up at paragraph 19 G(B)3/1.1/9, and it runs through to paragraph 33 G(B)3/1.1/14 -- where, as you discuss the concept of oligarchy, I would suggest to you that there's nothing in that section of the report which suggests either that you believe or that there's any evidence to show that it was possible to acquire a company under the loans-for-shares scheme without political connection or influence. Would you accept that?

A. I think I do accept that. I don't think I contradict that anywhere in the report.

Q. And can I also suggest to you that in this section you do not give any suggestion that any of the facts set out in statements 3 to 6 about the acquisition of Yukos, Norilsk Nickel, Sidanko or Sibneft are incorrect, and that's correct as well, isn't it?

A. Now, we're going back to the joint report, are we?

Q. No, I'm looking at your report.

A. Oh, I'm sorry. So what would you like me to look at?

Q. Having generally endorsed Professor Fortescue's account at paragraph 18, then in paragraphs 19 through to 33, what I'm suggesting to you is that there is nothing there that suggests that any of the facts set out in statements 3 to 6 about the acquisition of Yukos, Norilsk Nickel, Sidanko or Surgutneftegas are incorrect, and would you agree with that?

A. I see what's being asked. Sorry, I've been a bit slow on the uptake there.

I at no point contradict this picture given in statements 3 to 6.

Q. Thank you.

Can we just look at what you say in your published works, and could I just ask you to be handed G(B)4/1, at tab 15, which I think is at page 145 G(B)4/1.15/145.

Are you at page 145?

A. I'm on 146 at the moment but I'm getting there.

Q. It's 145 in the bundle but it's actually page 146 in the book. So 145 at the bottom right-hand corner and then if you look at the -- it's page 146 in the book.

Can you see at the top of the page, it's picking up from the third line:

"Yeltsin could offer financial inducements ..."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. There you say:

"Yeltsin could offer financial inducements to politicians and administrators who could influence the result of the election in his favour.

"But there was a price to pay. As part of the deal, the oligarchs were given temporary ownership of the shares in the chief companies working in the lucrative mining areas. The nickel industrial sector was a particular attraction. These acquisitions became permanent when the government predictably proved unable to pay off the loans on time. Thus the 'oligarchs', while rescuing Yeltsin, piled up the mountains of their wealth still higher and reinforced the dependence of the political establishment upon their favour."

Do you see that?

A. I do. I would like to say that if I ever had a second edition of this book I would not use the word "ownership" in the second line of that para. I'd use "managerial control".

Q. Instead of "temporary ownership"?

A. Yes.

Q. That would be fine, I can understand why you would wish to make that correction.

But what I would put to you is that there you are expressing the view that it was the oligarchs, and I don't want to get into a definitional debate about that, it was the oligarchs through their political connection with the Yeltsin administration who were able to acquire companies under loans for shares. Do you accept that?

A. The evidence is that those people who became known as oligarchs were the ones who made the most lucrative of the deals in this period, just before the election of 1996.

Q. But that now appears to be something that you refuse to accept in the joint memorandum when one goes back to paragraph 32. G(B)6/1.01/15

A. Ah, I see what the point is. I see what the point is.

Q. What you're now querying is:

"... whether the available evidence suggests that prior 'close connection to and political influence with the Yeltsin administration' were a prerequisite for the securing of the right to become a lender under the loans for shares ..."

A. I was merely driving at the point there that the connections between the businessmen who did make a profit out of the loans-for-shares scheme, generally speaking, were tight. However, whether this was the case for all of the deals that were done in that period, I don't think we have the evidence for that. The full evidence, in other words, for the business history of Russia in the 1990s is just not in yet.

Q. And can I suggest to you that you seem to express the view in your book that it was predictable that the loans would not be paid off and that the companies included in the loans for shares would be sold, do you accept that's what you were accepting in your book?

A. I would -- I could envisage another scenario in 1997 that the world oil price rocketed, that Boris Yeltsin's health improved, that the politicians got a burst of energy, that they didn't actually have, as we know, in 1997, and that extraordinary ingratitude would have been shown by Boris Yeltsin because he had a history of doing this. So that I'm not sure, at all, that the evidence is strong enough for us to be able to say that this was a fixed set of deals from which there was no wriggling out.

Q. Well, what I suggest to you is that in your book you're indicating that you regard it as being predictable that the loans would not be repaid, but that's now something effectively you refused to agree in statement 33 of the joint memorandum, is that right?

A. I think that it was predictable if conditions didn't change. However, in the broader -- in the broader framework of the possibilities of the years after 1996 it might have been highly likely but it wasn't certain.

Q. No, all right.

And then, finally, you express the view that the acquisitions would become permanent as a result and therefore that it was the lenders who would be able to acquire ownership of the companies, is that correct? That's what you're indicating in the book?

A. That is correct, yes, that is what I'm saying in the book, yes.

Q. Then again that's something that you seem to be refusing to accept in paragraph 33 of the joint memorandum G(B)6/1.01/16?

A. I am indeed adding a caveat in the joint memorandum which is not in the book. I mean, this is the right of every scholar, to finesse his judgment in the light of more information as it starts to come in, but also more thoughts that one has about the subject about which one is writing. I mean, it's a rare scholar who has had the same opinion through the post-Communist years about contemporary Russia. I can't think of any of my colleagues who have held one single basic view all the way through.

Q. Well, Professor Service, I can understand you might want to qualify for exceptional changes in world oil prices or something like that, but will you not agree with me that in fact what is set out in the disputed statements here, at statement 2, as a summary description of the loans-for-shares scheme, is in fact not open to any serious political debate?

A. This is statement 2?

Q. Yes, so that's at page 15 G(B)6/1.01.15.

A. On page 15.

Well, of course, I'd have to have my usual rant about "oligarchs", so I would never have signed up to that with that word in there. But quite apart from that, indeed the deals were beneficial for those businessmen who could participate in them.

Q. So is there any objection apart from the use of the word "oligarch"?

A. Well, it's not a small objection. I don't want to go over that again but --

Q. We understand the point you're making, take that as read.

A. I think that, as it stands, question 2, as long as it's not connected up to -- sorry, statement 2, as long as it's not connected up to statement 3, isn't implausible. But we grouped these statements together when we considered them and that's why I expressed reservations about signing up to them, and that's why Professor Fortescue and I disagreed.

Q. All right. Well, I'll come on to statement 3.

Can we just look at the details of the loans for shares in a little bit more detail. We have them set out at statements 3 to 6. But can we first just start by establishing that we don't disagree about what the loans-for-shares deals were, and can I ask you to look at Professor Fortescue's first report which we have at G(B)1, tab 1, and can you look at page 36 G(B)1/1.01/36.

Can you see, we have the table at the bottom of page 36 running over to the next page. There Professor Fortescue sets out what I believe is uncontroversial, namely the enterprises which were placed into loans-for-shares schemes. He shows 12 enterprises as having participated in the scheme. Do you see that?

A. I do, yes.

Q. Do you see that the largest asset measured by starting price was Norilsk Nickel, where a block of shares was provided as security at an auction with a starting price of $170 million, do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Then we have Yukos for 150 million, and then Sidanko, Sibneft, Surgutneftegas. And then there are the ones where the starting bid was for $50 million or less, and Lukoil, NLMK, and so on. Do you see that?

A. I do, yes.

Q. Now, I assume you don't disagree with any of that, is that correct?

A. I have no serious objection to any of that.

Professor Fortescue's expertise is greater than mine on these particular companies.

Q. All right. So now, what I would like to do is I'd like to just concentrate on the six biggest deals, which are Norilsk Nickel, Sidanko, NLMK, Yukos, Lukoil and Surgutneftegas, because those are the ones -- plus NLMK, which are covered by statements 3 to 6 in the joint memorandum. Do you see that?

- A. I do. Can I make a comment at this point? Because I think it might hurry the inquisition along.

What I don't like about statement 3 there, or sub-statement 3, is the emphatic way in which it is said that only those with close connections to and political influence with the Yeltsin government were able to secure the rights. There's no evidence for this whatsoever.

- Q. I see.

- A. I hope that clarifies --

- Q. Professor Service, I think what we're now looking at, or what I was trying to look at, is statements 3 to 6 over the page at page 16 where we're dealing with the specifics of the various companies G(B)6/1.01/16.

- A. Right, I'm sorry. I thought we were dealing with statement 2.

- Q. No, I tried to move on from statement 2, just to look at the details of the companies in the loans-for-shares deals.

- A. I am not totally happy, as I've said, with statement 2.

- Q. No, well, I think we've got your answers on that.

As I say, what I want to do is look at the six largest companies, Norilsk Nickel, Sidanko, NLMK, Yukos, Lukoil and Surgutneftegas, because those, adding in NLMK, are the companies that are covered by statements 3 to 6.

A. Yes.

Q. As you can see from paragraph 34 in the joint memorandum G(B)6/1.01/16.

"Professor Fortescue agrees with these statements. [And you indicate that you have] difficulty with these statements as they stand since the extremely complex details of the business transactions are not yet available in public evidence and there was anyway much difference between one transaction and another; he adds that he anyway cannot see the relevance of the transactions to the current legal dispute."

Do you see that?

A. Yes, I do, yes.

Q. What I would like to do see if we can agree this: do you accept that in relation to all of those loans-for-shares deals, the person who won the auction to give a loan in return for control over the shares being offered, ultimately acquired the shares when in the event the state defaulted?

A. Yes, that seems to be the case.

Q. So can I just -- let's start just with Norilsk Nickel, Sidanko and NLMK, because these are the companies associated with Mr Potanin and Mr Prokhorov.

Is it right that you accept during 1995, during loans-for-shares auctions, the Interros group companies gained control of blocks of shares in Norilsk Nickel, Sidanko, the oil company, and NLMK, the steel producer?

A. My position is that we do not know the precise details of the business transactions that we're talking about here.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That's your main point?

A. That is my main basic point, and that these general statements about what actually happened in each of the loans-for-share deals aren't yet convincing because what documentation is available is too slim.

MR GILLIS: All right. Well, just having clarified what the dispute is, maybe I can show you some.

So is this right, that you're not willing to accept then that when the state defaulted on the relevant loans other Interros group companies acquired the blocks of shares which were under the management of those companies?

A. No, it's very clear that the end result is as you described, but the precise negotiating tactics and understandings I don't think we do yet know.

Q. Can I just clarify this with you: do you dispute that Interros and Uneximbank, which was part of the Interros group, were controlled by the oligarchs Potanin and Prokhorov?

A. Were controlled by the big businessmen?

Q. Big businessmen.

A. I don't dispute that.

Q. You don't dispute that last proposition.

Well, can I just show you some documents which are in the public record which I will suggest to you show that the factual position is really quite well established. And could I start by taking you to print-outs from the Interros and the Norilsk Nickel company website, and that's in the additional bundle at tab 2.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Gillis, you're not going to complete your cross-examination of Professor Service this evening, are you?

MR GILLIS: No, I'm not.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm happy to sit until 4.30 but I don't see any point sitting until 5.00, it's been a long day.

MR GILLIS: No, my Lady. I wouldn't finish by 5.00.

Do you have tab 2 and can you see this as the print-out from the Interros website?

A. Yes.

Q. Could you please read the section which we have at the top of the page, entitled "Foreign Trade Consulting and Banking and Finance"?

A. Yes.

Q. They explain the foundation of Interros and Uneximbank and also that Mr Potanin and Mr Prokhorov became partners in those companies, do you see that?

A. I do.

Q. And then if I can ask you to come down that page to look at "Investment in Industrial Assets", and, again, the sidelined passage, can you see it then says:

"In 1995, during pledge auctions, Interros group companies gained control of blocks of shares of Norilsk Nickel, the Sidanko company and NLMK and then Northwest Shipping".

A. I see that, yes.

Q. Just to be clear, "pledge auctions" is a translation for the Russian expression of "loans for shares", is that right?

A. Yes.

Q. So would you agree with me that that makes it clear that the Interros group won the loans-for-shares auctions for those four companies; would you agree with that?

A. I don't know the status of this document, I'm afraid.

Isn't it a document by businessmen about themselves?

Q. So you wouldn't be willing to accept even something that was stated on Interros's own website?

A. Well, this is a methodological point again that the history -- I'm asked to give evidence here as a historian, I don't accept anybody's word, just because they say that something happened, without the kind of evidence to back it that does not come from the person who is saying it.

So there has to be a sort of -- in a perfect world, there has to be a multiplicity of sources to corroborate anything as having happened or not having happened.

I don't think this particular -- it's likely that this is true but why should we accept it?

Q. All right. Well, let's just move on.

Then coming down to the bottom of that page, it deals with the auction of the block of Norilsk Nickel shares under management. Can you see the bottom sidelined section on that page indicates that:

"In August 1997 a commercial tender with investment conditions was held. At this tender the block of shares of Norilsk Nickel was acquired by one of the Interros group of companies."

Do you see that?

A. I do see that, yes.

- Q. So I would suggest to you that that makes it clear that Interros also won the second stage auction to acquire the Norilsk Nickel shares.
- A. Yes.
- Q. Do you agree?
- A. This is what they're saying about themselves, yes.
- Q. All right.
- A. I would just add the reservation that the statements by big businessmen in Russia in the 1990s about what they did or did not do are riddled with cases of falsification, obfuscation and the rest of it. One has to be very, very careful about accepting anything from any of them.
- Q. But this is a print-out from the Interros website in November 2011. Now, even though it's the statement of what happened historically, are you still saying that you're not willing to accept this as evidence of what was happening in the loans for shares in relation to Norilsk Nickel?
- A. I have no specialist knowledge of that particular deal but I do have a fundamental, you might call it, philosophical scepticism that comes into play when I see statements by big Russian companies about themselves. This would be a lot more acceptable as a historical record if it was by someone else.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Gillis, were there accounts of Interros for the period '95, published accounts?

MR GILLIS: I'll make enquiries.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Because if there were, and it will be a big if, then it will all be a matter of record, wouldn't it?

MR GILLIS: We'll make enquiries. It may well be that at that stage --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: This may just be one particular line of enquiry, but --

MR GILLIS: My Lady, we'll make enquiries.

Could I just ask you then to turn over to tab 3, and I suspect I'll get the same reply.

Here we have the print-out from the Norilsk Nickel website and, again, you can see from the top of the page this is November 2011. In the middle of the page, can you look under the heading "RAO Norilsk Nickel was Born", and can you see there it says that:

"The control packet of shares, that's 38 per cent of the shares, or 51 per cent of the voting shares, was retained as state property, and in November 1995 was put forward at a mortgaging auction as a result of which Uneximbank became the nominal holder of the control packet of shares in Norilsk Nickel."

Do you see that?

A. Yes, I can see that. Yes.

Q. It goes on to say:

"On August 5, 1997 a commercial investment competition was held for the controlling 38 per cent. It was acquired by the investment company, Swift, which represented Unexim's interest."

Do you see that?

A. I do see that, yes.

Q. Again, are you not willing to accept that as establishing that, in relation to Norilsk Nickel, the company that acquired the rights of management under the loans for shares, ultimately ended up acquiring those shares on default?

A. I accept that this is likely to have happened but I don't think that a single source is a dependable way of establishing history beyond a set of tentative suppositions.

I hope I'm not being too fussy about that, but Russian companies have an appalling record of misleading -- big Russian companies have an appalling record of misleading the public about what happened in the 1990s.

Q. Well, as an expert in the area, are you aware of any sources which are indicating that anybody other than Interros ended up acquiring Norilsk Nickel?

A. No, I'm not. No.

Q. Can I then just turn to look at the position of Sidanko. Again, you've refused to agree to the statement in relation to Sidanko, which is statement 4, and can I ask you to turn over in the additional bundle at tab 4.

A. Yes.

Q. Again, this is a print-out, tab 4, it's a print-out from the Interros website. Can you please read the fourth paragraph which, again, has been sidelined:

"Having mobilised financial resources, the group, Unexim MFK, won the auction and received management of 51 per cent of Sidanko's shares. As per the auction conditions, shares were later purchased."

Then:

"At the beginning of 1997, MFK, whilst fulfilling obligations to the government, held an investment contest with commercial conditions and offered the aforementioned 51 per cent shares for sale. The block of shares was purchased by Interros oil company."

Do you dispute that or are you willing to accept it?

A. Well, I think if I could say ditto here for what we've already discussed in the previous segment, I would say ditto. This is a company talking about itself in a rather barren economy of Russia in the 1990s. It's...

Q. Again I would ask you, as an expert in the field, is there any suggestion that anybody other than Interros acquired the Sidanko shares?

A. No, you're quite correct about that. That's the likeliest thing.

Q. And NLMK, can I ask you to turn to the fifth tab. Again, from the Interros website, and in the third paragraph, which again has been sidelined, can you see it indicates:

"By the mid-1990s, financial investors began consolidating large packs of NLMK. As such Unexim-MFK during pledge auctions received management, and later -- ownership of approximately 15% of MFK."

Again I would suggest to you that it makes it clear that it was the Interros group which won both stages of the NLMK loans-for-shares auctions and acquired the shares; would you agree?

A. Well, again, I would repeat that companies saying things about their own past history don't tend to have my automatic confidence. It's very, very likely to be the case that what you say is correct but, as historians, we're not in a position to be absolutist in what we think about the business history of the 1990s because the sources are so tenuous.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Were any of these companies obtaining capital from western sources?

A. I don't know.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I mean, were there any public prospectuses or anything of that sort? Were there any IPOs in relation to any of these companies?

A. For these companies in the mid-1990s, I simply don't know.

MR GILLIS: Professor Service, understanding your historian's caution of not wanting to commit yourself to a position until all available sources of evidence are available, and accepting that and understanding that, what I would still suggest to you is that there is ample evidence that Mr Potanin and Mr Prokhorov, having won the original loans-for-shares auctions, ended up with the ownership stakes in Norilsk Nickel, Sidanko and NLMK.

Subject to your caveat about all sources of information not being available yet, are you willing to accept that that's the position?

A. I'm afraid words have just been put into my mouth.

I have never today or at any other time said that you need all sources of information. That is an egregious misrepresentation of my position as a historian. I'm used to working with slender sources for some of the most contentious periods in modern Russian history. So it's simply not the case that I'm arguing for a perfectionist position here, but I do think that if the evidence that we've been asked to look at is restricted to newspaper reports, memoirs and the glossy brochures of Russian companies, we're not really getting very far with historical assessment.

Q. But I think you have accepted in respect of Norilsk Nickel and Sidanko, and I'll ask the same question in relation to NLMK, no suggestion that anyone else other than the Interros group acquired NLMK?

A. That appears to be the case.

Q. All right.

Can I try and deal with Yukos and Mr Khodorkovsky more briefly. Again, this is the subject of one of the disputed statements, so I think going back to G(B)6/1, at page 16 G(B)6/1.01/16.

Can you see, if you look at disputed statements 3 and 6, you dispute the statement that Mr Khodorkovsky took control of Yukos under the loans-for-shares deal, you can see what it says there. And then you're disputing statement 6 that, in relation to Yukos, the individual or individuals who controlled the lender under the loans-for-shares scheme were able to acquire the government share when it defaulted on the loan and to take control of the company. So you're disputing that?

A. I'm looking now, I think possibly, at the wrong bit of the page.

You are want me to look at page 16, is that correct?

Q. Yes. Bundle 6.

A. Yes. And you want me to --

Q. Statements 3 and 6.

A. Under B?

Q. Under section B, yes "Details of other loans for shares..."

A. Well, I am being very, very fussy, yes.

In general terms, I think 3 and 6 are acceptable, but the extremely complex details of these business deals, I think, we do not yet have the evidence for them.

Q. But in terms of the Fundamentals, would you accept that Mr Khodorkovsky and his Menatep Group won the loans-for-shares auctions in respect of a shareholding of 45 per cent of Yukos, and that, in due course, Mr Khodorkovsky and the Menatep Group ended up owning that stake?

A. Whether it was exactly 45 per cent I have no means of knowing, but generally speaking, Khodorkovsky and Potanin, yes, won those deals.

Q. Thank you.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Choose your moment, Mr Gillis, will you?

MR GILLIS: My Lady, that's probably a convenient moment.

I was going to move on to Surgutneftegas so that would be convenient.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

Professor Service, I'm sure you've got better things to do at the weekend but please don't discuss your evidence with anybody or communicate with anybody about it or discuss the case.

THE WITNESS: I understand, yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You understand the point. Very well.

Mr Gillis and Ms Davies, what time do you want to start on Monday?

MR GILLIS: 10.15?

MS DAVIES: That's fine by me, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: How much longer do you think you're going to be with Professor Service?

MR GILLIS: I think I will be another hour and a half, possibly a little bit shorter. I will look at the transcript. I think I can see what Professor Service's response is going to be in relation to the other loans-for-shares companies so it may be that I can move more quickly.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

Mr Adkin, how long are you going to be with Professor Service?

MR ADKIN: I don't anticipate having any cross-examination of Professor Service. There is then Professor Bean.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I've seen him sitting there patiently.

How long, Mr Gillis, do you think you're going to be with Professor Bean?

MR GILLIS: I think maybe an hour, an hour and a half, something like that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So we should finish by lunchtime with a bit of luck?

MR GILLIS: Certainly by the end of the day.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Certainly by the end of the day.

MR GILLIS: My Lady, I'm cautious.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay, 10.15 then.

Apart from Professor Bean's statement, which I've read, there's nothing else?

MR GILLIS: My Lady, no.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So it's just Professor Bean. Will there be any submissions on Monday about anything?

MR GILLIS: I don't think so.

MS DAVIES: I don't think so, my Lady. If starting at 10.00 would improve the prospects of us finishing in the morning, may I just raise that as a proposal, so that we don't all have to troop back after lunch.

MR GILLIS: I'm perfectly content to start at 10.00 as long as it doesn't come with the condition that therefore we have to have finished by lunchtime.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, no. Well, let's start by 10.00 if there's a chance then.

The only other thing is I would ask you, when you're preparing your closing submissions, if it is possible technically, to hyperlink the documents, if that's possible.

MS DAVIES: My Lady, certainly speaking for ourselves, in the draft in process we've been adopting the bracketing which should allow it. We do understand that there was a time lag between our opening getting hyperlinked but it is now hyperlinked on Magnum, we understand, as is the claimant's opening. So it may be that when you receive it from us next week it won't immediately be hyperlinkable but that with some technical assistance from Magnum we can make it so.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, it doesn't need, so far as I'm concerned, really to be hyperlinked until the New Year, but it would be helpful if, come the New Year, it is hyperlinked.

MS DAVIES: We certainly have that in mind in the drafting process, and we're adopting the same bracketing for that reason.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Because it is extremely helpful.

Very well. Have a nice weekend.

(10.00 am)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Gillis.

MR GILLIS: Good morning, Professor Service.

A. Good morning.

Q. On Friday, we were looking at disputed statements 3 to 6 which we have in bundle G(B)6 at tab 1, if that could be provided to Professor Service at page 16

G(B)6/1.01/16. As you may recall, I was taking you through six of the loans-for-shares transactions, do you recall that?

A. I do, yes.

Q. We'd looked at four of them, Norilsk Nickel, Sidanko, NLMK and Yukos.

A. Yes.

Q. And you had been explaining to my Lady the basis of your reluctance as a historian to express a concluded view given what you perceived to be the quality of the information available, and the fact that further information may subsequently become available that might impact the issue. Do you recall that?

A. I do recall that. That's a very fair summary.

Q. Now, the two other loans-for-shares transactions I was wanting to consider with you were Surgutneftegas and Lukoil.

In order to see if we can cut this short, and to avoid the need to look at the further documentation we have in the additional bundles, I was wanting to see if we could agree the following propositions. If I could start with Surgutneftegas, which is the subject of disputed statements 5 and 6. Can I suggest to you two propositions and let me give you both of them first of all before you comment on them, to see if we can agree them.

The first is this: in relation to Surgutneftegas, will you agree with me that the information currently available indicates that Mr Vladimir Bogdanov and his partners took control of a stake of a little over 40 per cent of Surgutneftegas in the loans-for-shares auctions and ended up purchasing that stake following the state's default. That's the first proposition that I'm putting to you by reference to the currently available information.

The second proposition that I --

A. Could I just have a go at that one because that was a huge sentence.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, look at it on the screen.

MR GILLIS: I agree. If you look at it on the screen.

I would like also to put the second proposition to you as well.

A. Okay, I'm very sorry.

Q. No, not at all.

The second proposition which I was going to suggest to you is this, that as an expert in the area, would you also agree that there are no sources known to you indicating that Surgutneftegas was acquired by anyone other than Mr Bogdanov and his partners? So I'm only asking you to comment by reference to the currently available information. Do you see?

So those are the two propositions that I was wanting to put to you.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think you should scroll back actually because it's difficult to follow otherwise.

A. Well, is that the end of your question?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Do you want to scroll back, Professor, and have a look at the first two questions. If you want assistance with that, please ask for it.

It starts at line 1 on [draft] page 2 really.

A. I think if I master this technology at this point...

Right, I've looked at proposition 1 and I can't see any objection in the light of the available evidence to proposition one.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So you accept that the information currently available indicates that Bogdanov and his partners took control of a stake of a little over 40 per cent?

A. That -- as far as I'm aware, that's correct, yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay. Can you scroll down to the second one then, please.

A. And the second proposition seems to be correct too.

What I've been trying to say, though, is that what appears to have been the case is not necessarily what is provably historical reality. It's also true that since the beginning of the millennium we know now much more about the diversity of the whole commercial history of the 1990s than we knew at the time.

I'm not a business expert, I'm not a legal expert. I'm constantly saying that, in order to understand this period of history in the 1990s, we have to take a very broad view and we have to maintain philosophical scepticism.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Professor, what I don't know the answer to and I wonder whether you can help me on this is the following: if any of these companies were raising capital from the western markets, you'd have thought they would have had some sort of offering memorandum or circular or IPO document of some sort that would indicate some of these matters which one would have expected would have been signed off by their auditors or corporate finance advisers or something of that sort, and I was just wondering (a) whether you knew whether any of that sort of information was available, and (b) whether you'd had a look at it?

- A. I'm afraid I don't know any of that information and therefore I haven't had a look at it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, okay. Thank you.

MR GILLIS: Professor Service, could I then ask you the same in relation to Lukoil, which is the final company that I was going to ask you to look at, and this is looking at Lukoil and Mr Alekperov, so again can I put the two propositions to you and see if you are content with those.

The first is this, that in relation to Lukoil, would you agree with me that the information currently available indicates that Mr Alekperov took control of a 5 per cent stake in a loans-for-shares auction and ended up purchasing that stake following the state's default. So that's the first proposition.

Then the second proposition is, as an expert in the area, would you also agree with me that there are no sources known to you indicating that the stake in Lukoil was acquired by anyone other than Mr Alekperov?

- A. Well, I give exactly the same answer as before. I have no reason to doubt the veracity of what counsel has just mentioned, but I'm open to the possibility that we can be surprised, because we have been surprised about a lot in Russian history. And I made that point I think sufficiently clear on Friday that, in comparison with the Gorbachev period which is much more open to public scrutiny, we know so little in reality about the political and commercial history of the Yeltsin years and even less about those of the Putin years.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR GILLIS: Thank you. So Professor Service, would you agree with me then that in respect of the six loans-for-shares transactions we've looked at, the government defaulted on the debt in each case?

A. Yes, indeed, yes. I think that's the conventional wisdom.

Q. And in each of the six cases that we've looked at, would you agree with me that on the basis of the currently available information, the winner of the original loans-for-shares auction became the owner of the pledged stock?

A. That is also my understanding.

Q. Thank you. Could I now just move on to the characteristics of the buyers, and this is looking -- I'm going to stick with the same six transactions, so that will take us to look at Mr Potanin, Mr Khodorkovsky, Mr Alekperov and Mr Bogdanov.

Can I start with Mr Potanin: would you accept that in 1995 Mr Potanin was a politically connected individual?

A. Well, there we are. This is a moot point. What earth is a politically connected individual? I think it really depends on what counsel is implying here, and this was one of my problems when going through the disputed statements, that they could possibly be seen to be very loaded.

I don't personally know what a politically connected businessman is. Does it mean that if they go to the Reform Club and they sit with an MP that they're politically connected? In the English language, yes, possibly, but it's a very vestigial connection. If something more than that is being implied, then I would like the term to be unscrambled. Because I'm testifying as a historian, not as a commercial operator.

Q. I understand that. If we can look at the facts then.
Is this correct, that in the 1980s Mr Potanin worked in the government Ministry of Foreign Trade?

A. Correct.

Q. And is it correct that by 1995 Mr Potanin had close links with President Yeltsin's administration?

A. That's also correct.

Q. Particularly with Anatoly Chubais, the head of the State Property Committee?

A. With Chubais.

Q. Chubais.

A. Yes.

Q. And that Mr Potanin was in a position to propose the loans-for-shares scheme to Mr Chubais?

A. He would have -- I can agree with all of that, but my comment would be that the assumption is that proposals always come from the businessman, and I would challenge that. The evidence for that is not conclusive. And my general understanding of the politics of the 1990s is that the strategy of the government, not just in politics but also in economics, was set by the politicians. And until the evidence becomes absolutely conclusive in the opposite direction I would be very, very wary of assuming that men like Potanin were the instigators of the big strategic bail-out deal that happened in 1995 to 1996, and that's why I think we have to be a little bit fussy about terms like politically connectedness.

Q. I'm not asking about whether all proposals came from businessmen, but just concentrating on the loans-for-shares proposal, would you accept that Mr Potanin was instrumental in proposing the loans-for-shares scheme to Chubais?

A. "Instrumental" is another rather awkward word to deal with. Was he involved in the discussions that led to the loans-for-shares deal? Yes, he certainly was. He was one of the instruments. But who was handling those instruments? That's another question. Who was in charge of the process? That's another question, a much more fundamental question.

Q. Could I ask you to look at the additional bundle at tab 15 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Gillis, I don't want to stop your questioning, but at the end of the day I've got to decide what Mr Berezovsky's role was, haven't I, and I can only get limited assistance from the extent to which these other businessmen were or were not involved in their particular --

MR GILLIS: I would accept that, my Lady, but at the same time --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Again I do not want to stop you because I can see you might wish to draw a parallel, but the extent to which I'm going to go into the detail of all this on the documents --

MR GILLIS: Well, maybe I'll just try and take it a little bit more quickly. The concern was that it was being suggested that Mr Potanin was an industrialist. Maybe I can just concentrate on the facts then.

Would you agree that from August 1996 to March 1997 Mr Potanin was the First Deputy Prime Minister of the Russian Federation?

A. Yes, you're obviously completely correct about that.

Q. So --

A. And his political connectedness then was very substantial.

Q. And so would you accept this, that Mr Potanin was involved in politics as well as business? He was not just an industrialist?

A. We're talking about what period now?

Q. The period 1995 through to 1997.

A. Because in your previous -- in the previous comment, I heard 1996-7 I thought.

Q. Well, take it from 1995 through to March 1997.

A. My view is that Potanin became politically involved over those years, 1995 to 1997. My comment again would be that wariness has to be applied to any possible assumption that here we have an instigator in Potanin. My view is -- my tentative view on the politics of the 1990s was that the politicians were in charge, and that insofar as the businessmen became politicians they did so at the invitation of the politicians who had a strategic view of their own.

Q. Professor Service, could I just ask you to look at G(B)4/1 at tab 15 G(B)4/1.15/1. This is your book, "Russia: Experiment with a People", is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. If we can go to page 144 in the bottom right-hand corner, that's the page numbering in the bundle G(B)4/1.15/144. Going to the page numbering in the book, at page 145, which we have at the top right-hand corner, can you come down to the bottom paragraph on page 145 in the book, can we pick up about four or five lines from the bottom:

"In deepest secrecy, the businessman ... Chubais brought together a group of businessmen who became known as the 'oligarchs'. They included [Mr] Abramovich ...Aven ... Berezovsky ... Fridman ... Gusinsky ... Khodorkovsky and ... Potanin. Although the legal spending limit for [the] Presidential candidates was $3 million, Yeltsin's campaign team probably had as much as $500 million at their disposal. Yeltsin could offer financial inducements to politicians and administrators who could influence the results of the election in his favour."

Then you go on to say:

"But there was a price to pay. As part of the deal, the 'oligarchs' were given temporary ownership of the controlling [shareholders]..."

So that's going into the loans for shares.

So would you accept that that is, at least at that stage, your description of what was happening, that in return for the influence that they were able to bear, they obtained interests under the loans-for-shares stake.

A. Yes, I do. If I were writing this book today I might not simply call Anatoly Chubais a businessman, because he started out as a new politician in 1991 to 1992 who turned himself, to everyone's astonishment at the time, into a businessman. But at the time he was bringing these people together; he straddled both worlds, more than any other single individual in Russia at the time I think.

Q. Can I then just move on to Mr Khodorkovsky, just to establish his political background, if I can use a more neutral phrase.

Is this correct, that by 1995 Mr Khodorkovsky already had taken a political job as a deputy minister to the Minister of Fuel and Energy in the Gaidar government?

A. Yes, I can't confirm that absolutely from memory but I'm assuming that you have done your homework.

Q. Well, you had better check that I have done, and it's not a memory test on your part.

A. No.

Q. If you could look at the additional bundle at tab 16. If you can turn to page 299. The sidelined passage there which goes over the page:

"... Khodorkovsky became an adviser to Vladimir Lopukhin, Gaidar's minister of fuel and energy. The Gaidar cabinet was in office for less than a year, and the carving up of the oil industry had just begun, amid much uncertainty. When Khodorkovsky took the job with Lopukhin, he did not want to leave Menatep Bank, so Lopukhin created an informal position, with the rank of deputy minister, putting Khodorkovsky in charge of the energy ministry's 'investment fund'."

So is that correct?

A. Thank you for drawing that to my attention. I think Hoffman is entirely reliable on this sort of thing.

Q. So Mr Khodorkovsky himself was involved in politics as well as business, he was not just an industrialist?

A. He was not just an industrialist, no. He was involved in politics, that's not the same as running the political show.

Q. No, I accept that, but he was in a position possibly to at least seek to influence the politicians?

- A. I agree with that entirely. I think we're actually becoming closer and closer on this. These businessmen in this period, some of these businessmen, did become politically active, institutionally involved, which is -- perhaps you don't agree with this, or perhaps counsel doesn't agree with this -- that's not quite the same as, it's not at all the same as running the whole political system.
- Q. I think I've already shown you the passage in your book, "Russia: Experiment with a People", which also explains that Khodorkovsky was in the same grouping, if I can put it in that way, as Potanin?
- A. He was in a grouping of businessmen, that's not to imply that he was permanently or fundamentally tied to a set of relationships with the others in the group, and, in fact, everything I've heard since I wrote my book about the very richest of businessmen in the late 1990s suggests that the rivalries among them were very, very intense indeed.
- Q. Can I come on to Mr Alekperov and, is this correct, that Mr Alekperov spent the 1980s working in the Siberian oilfields which became part of Lukoil?
- A. Correct.
- Q. Then from 1987 to 1990 he was the general director of Kogalymneftegas, one of the production units that became part of Lukoil?

A. Correct.

Q. Would you agree that that was a role that would now normally be described as being a red director?

A. It would indeed, yes. Yes.

Q. And that was an important and powerful position within the Soviet system?

A. It was an important position within the Soviet system. It was one of very limited power. I wouldn't say that that indicated someone who was very high up in the system.

Q. Mr Abramovich, in his evidence, said that a red director would have very great power and influence in their region and not just within the company. For my Lady's note, that's Day 16, page 151, at line 19.

Is that something you would agree with or not?

A. Well, I'm not here to agree or disagree with Mr Abramovich, I don't know in what context he said that this was a powerful position. It's certainly true that red directors, where the enterprise was the single big economic activity in a particular region, a director in that kind of situation, perhaps in a far-flung area of the Soviet Union, would be a person who had considerable influence within that region, that's certainly true. I'm loathe to go any further than that.

Q. Then in 1990, Mr Alekperov was appointed to the government as first deputy minister for the oil and gas industry, is that correct?

A. That's correct, yes.

Q. And would you agree that he lobbied for the creation of Lukoil while in his position as deputy minister for oil and gas?

A. That also appears to be correct.

Q. And that he retained his position as deputy minister until 1993 when he left to take full-time control of Lukoil, is that correct?

A. I believe that's correct.

Q. So would you agree that Mr Alekperov had a political position in that relevant time?

A. I would indeed agree.

Q. And that Mr Alekperov was himself involved in politics as well as business. Again, he was not just an industrialist I would suggest to you?

A. That's a very fair point.

Q. And would you agree that Mr Alekperov's political position assisted him to create and take control of Lukoil?

A. I believe that to be the case.

Q. And then if I could turn to Mr Bogdanov, and this is in relation to Surgutneftegas, is it correct that Mr Bogdanov became the general director of Surgutneftegas in 1984 while it was still a state-owned production association?

A. That's correct.

Q. And Surgutneftegas was then created as a vertically integrated oil company in 1992, is that correct?

A. I believe that's correct.

Q. And Mr Bogdanov was then appointed both as the chairman of the company's board of directors and the president of the company?

A. Correct.

Q. And so, again, would it be correct to describe Mr Bogdanov as being a red director?

A. Yes. I mean, this isn't a -- the term "red director" came into being in the 1930s when Stalin conducted his industrialisation campaign, and it referred to people who were politically reliable insofar as the Stalin administration was concerned. It's a rather sloppy term when it goes through the years. All it really means by the middle of the 1990s is someone who had a job running an enterprise at the end of the Soviet Union and survived into the new business environment with a similar post in private industry. I'm not sure it gets you very far as a term beyond that.

Q. It connotes a person of power and influence, I would suggest, not just within the company but also within a region?

A. I'm afraid I don't agree with that at all. That's an extraordinary definition of red director.

Q. Is it correct that Surgut is a very remote Siberian region?

A. That's certainly correct, but "red director" does not imply someone who had a huge regional influence. It certainly does not imply that. This is just a technical point, you're simply wrong about that.

Q. Would you agree it in relation to Mr Bogdanov and his position within Surgut?

A. You can -- one can call Mr Bogdanov a red director if one wants to draw attention to his appointment career before 1992. That's really all that the term is indicating to you, to one.

Q. Forget about the term "red director", and just concentrating on Mr Bogdanov and his position within Surgutneftegas and Surgut itself, a remote Siberian region, would you accept that he was a person of great power and influence?

A. I think that within his enterprise and within his region he exercised as much power as anyone. I'd be hesitant to go beyond that point.

Q. Is this correct: the Surgutneftegas management, led by Mr Bogdanov, I would suggest to you were able to use their control of their company and their influence to exclude other bidders in the loans-for-shares transaction?

A. That appears to be the case. I'm quite comfortable with what has just been said.

Q. And if I could just ask you to go to tab 16 in the additional bundle, so tab 16. If I could take you to page 318. This is from Hoffman's book, "The Oligarch", which I think is an author you cite in your report, is that correct?

A. I do cite Hoffman in my report, yes. Certainly I do, yes.

Q. And could I just ask you to look at the second full paragraph which starts:

"On the same day as the Yukos auction ..."

Q. 318.

A. Thanks.

Q. So:

"On the same day as the Yukos auction, Potanin snapped up another oil company, Sidanco, winning 51% of the shares for the 130 million. The two [other] oil generals, Alexperov and Bogdanov, also won loans-for-shares auctions for pieces of their companies, Lukoil and Surgutneftegaz respectfully. The Surgut auction was an especially graphic example of how the Chubais ideals of openness and competition were ignored in practice. Outsiders were warned in advance by the Surgut management not to make a bid, and the airport in Surgut was closed that day, so other bidders could not fly in to buy part of the company. They did not."

In the context of Surgut, would you agree with that?

A. Most of my information about that auction comes from Hoffman, so I think he did a thorough job there.

Q. Thank you for that.

Would you agree, I'm just sort of trying to summarise, and I can see that summarising is not something you like to do because it possibly takes you to a level of generalisation that you're not entirely comfortable with, but is this correct, that on the basis of the information currently available, for the loans-for-shares packages in Yukos, Norilsk Nickel, Sidanko and NLMK, they were acquired by Khodorkovsky and Potanin, both of whom had held political positions and, I would suggest to you, had political connections and influence?

A. Firstly, I love to summarise. I think a historian who doesn't make connections and seek out patterns, even on a tentative basis, is not worth his salt.

My objections to what counsel has been saying over the past few days is that I don't like his summaries, I don't like his starting points, including his linguistic and terminological starting points because they reflect a misunderstanding of what was going on in Russia in the 1990s.

But on the specifics of what he has just said, I've got no objection at all.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

A. But I think it is my job here to be picky, because what is implied in the language and the terminology affects the chronology and also the contents of the relationship between politics and business, and that's too big an objection for me to overlook what I think.

MR GILLIS: Then in respect of the loans-for-shares packets in respect of Lukoil and Surgutneftegas, what I would suggest to you is that those shares were acquired by persons who could be described as red directors, and I understand your concern about that phrase, but they were acquired by persons who had influence within the company and also within the local region. Would you agree with that?

A. I think possibly counsel has got his questions written down already, and although I have cauterised his use of the term "oligarch" I have yet to succeed with the term

"red director".

But leaving that aside, I think that the substantive empirical analysis that he has offered is unobjectionable.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Subject to the caveats you have presented earlier?

A. Yes.

MR GILLIS: Thank you.

Could I -- no, I'll move on from that.

Could I then move on to the question of political influence. Professor Service, I think we can see from your report that you were asked to look at the question of political influence in two aspects, and I think we can see this at paragraph 4(d) of your first report which we have at page [2] G(B)3/1.1/2.

You were asked to consider the question of political influence, first, as regards Mr Berezovsky's political influence in the 1990s and then, secondly, Mr Abramovich's political influence in the 2000s, can you see that?

A. Yes, I can, thank you.

Q. I think you expressed a difference of opinion with Professor Fortescue in respect of both of those areas?

A. That's correct.

Q. Now, Professor Service, I'm not going to ask you about

Mr Berezovsky's political influence because Mr Abramovich and his legal team have accepted in this action that Mr Berezovsky did have political influence, and that he was able to use that influence to get the Russian Government to create Sibneft and sell the rights to manage Sibneft.

For my Lady's note, that's Day 2 at page 7.

So the only point that I want to ask you about is Mr Abramovich's perceived and actual political influence in the 1990s. Do you understand?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. So could I ask you to take out the joint memorandum which we have at bundle G(B)6, at page 14 G(B)6/1.01/14. Could I ask you to read that section G to the bottom of the page, so that's statements 47 and 48. (Pause)

A. I've done it, thank you.

Q. Thank you. So can we leave aside terminological disputes about the definition of "oligarch"?

A. Yes, we've put that behind us.

Q. We've not put it behind us, we understand your position in relation to it.

A. I'm sorry that counsel hasn't put it behind him, but if that's his --

Q. No, Professor Service, if you prefer to view it as putting it behind us I'm happy to put it in that way.

A. Excellent.

Q. As I understand what you're saying here, you accept that there were widespread press reports, both that certain oligarchs held a favoured position with the Putin administration and that Mr Abramovich was one of those oligarchs. But you say that those reports' existence does not mean that it was necessarily true?

A. Well, that's correct, yes. That's my opinion, yes.

Q. What I'd like to consider with you is the middle ground between those two positions, as it were. And the question is whether a reasonable person who was aware of the circumstances and the press reporting at the time could conclude that Mr Abramovich did hold a position of favour and influence within the Kremlin. Would you accept that that was a view that a reasonable person could come to?

A. A reasonable person might want to say "A lot of what I read in the press is complete bunkum, it may or may not be true".

What is very clear is that Mr Abramovich was a successful businessman in the 2000s, that he was not in disfavour with the Putin administration, that he worked in political posts in Chukotka. But whether special favour was shown to him by the Putin administration doesn't come from Putin himself, doesn't come from Abramovich himself, it comes from press reports. And Russian press reports are subject to the limited reliability that we went through on Friday.

Q. Professor Service, I'm not trying to suggest that a reasonable person couldn't come to the opposite view, I'm just asking you whether a reasonable person, seeing these press reports, could come to the view that Mr Abramovich did hold a position of favour and influence in the Kremlin, as you seem to suggest, or accept, was being widely reported in the newspapers?

A. My experience of Soviet citizens, and since the fall of the Soviet Union, Russian citizens, is that those who are reasonable and astute maintain a very, very high degree of scepticism about what they read in the newspapers. That is the way that they were acculturated in the Soviet times and it has not left them. That's one of the reasons, for example, why there are so many Russian jokes, "anekdoti". That's why the politicians are continually ridiculed in contemporary Russia. Russians on the whole have been given little reason to trust their politicians.

So my general feeling is that a reasonable person would take everything he read in the newspapers with a pinch of salt. Perhaps I'm meeting the wrong sort of Russian from the point of view of it's perfectly possible that I've not met Russians who are more gullible than the people I meet in connection with my work. That's certainly a possibility to which I'm open. But my general feeling is that Russians have a huge amount of scepticism about what comes over to them in the public media.

Q. Well, Professor Service, I'll try to take it shortly and I'll just take you to one example(?).

Do you say a reasonable person reading these reports could not believe that Mr Abramovich had influence?

A. I believe that press reports have an influence on the way that reasonable people would think about politics, it would lead them to consider that it was quite a possibility that Mr Abramovich was in favour, but not to assume some kind of stronger influence on Mr Abramovich's part as to suggest, for example, that he was some kind of instigator of public policy, and that's what I'm edgy about. That's why I'm reluctant to swallow a general statement of this kind without these sort of reservations, these sorts of reservation.

Q. Would you accept that the Russian people were also very sceptical about the nature of the relationship that existed between the oligarchs and the politicians?

A. I think I would put it more robustly than that. I think that up to the year 2000 most Russians hated the big businessmen who were generally referred to as the oligarchs, and that this explains the ease with which Vladimir Putin managed public opinion after the year 2000 when he got rid of Berezovsky, Gusinsky and then Khodorkovsky.

Q. Can I just take you to one example and just ask you about this. One of the authors you cite in your report and your published works is Anders Aslund, is that correct?

A. That's correct.

Q. He was formally a professor at the Stockholm School of Economics, and economics adviser to the Russian and Ukrainian Governments.

A. That's correct, yes.

Q. And in March 2001, Professor Aslund told the Washington Post that he believed that Mr Abramovich exercised a controlling influence over parts of the Russian Government, were you aware of that?

A. I'm aware of that article, yes, and I noted when reading it that it's likely to be one of those articles where you're halfway through a tutorial or a class and a journalist rings you up and says that he has a work panic on and could you give him a quick quote on some such subject or other, and you agree to do it at the end of a class or the tutorial, and you help them out, and then the thing appears in the press next day and you have no control over the contents of that quotation, and no means of come-back.

I would prefer to judge what Anders Aslund has to say through his books rather than through a quotation by a journalist who is panicking to hit a deadline.

Q. Professor Service, I put to you that quite a lot of that is speculation on your part.

For my Lady's note, the article is B(B)1.02 at page 72 B(B)1.02/72.

Professor Service, I would suggest to you that that's not the type of comment that Professor Aslund is going to make lightly, and that if it was his view in 2001 that Mr Abramovich held a position of influence over the Russian Government, that was a view that could be well held by other persons reading the widespread press reports that you have referred to?

A. Well, I don't resile from what I've just said. I know the article to which reference is being made. Aslund is an extraordinarily prolific writer on the Soviet and post-Soviet Russian economy. If we want to know what he thinks or thought about the relationship between business and politics in the period since the fall of the Soviet Union, the best thing to do is consult his books and articles written in his own hand.

- Q. Professor Service, could I ask you to look at Professor Fortescue's report, which we have at G(B)1/1, at paragraphs 97 and 98, which is at page 28 G(B)1/1.01/28.
- A. Sorry, I'm not -- I'm to look at 98, am I?
- Q. If you could look at 98, that's an article in 2002. Can you see that?
- A. I can.
- Q. By those authors. Again, they are expressing the opinion that Roman Abramovich is in a position of some influence with the Kremlin. Is that fair?
- A. Yes, that's what they're saying, yes. And I'm not saying that Abramovich isn't influential in discussions in the Kremlin, I'm just worried about the implications of the scale of that influence. Of course Russian politicians talk to the big businessmen of today.
- Q. Professor Service, what I would suggest to you is the fact that well-known academics with expertise in the area could reach the conclusions that we've seen them expressing about Mr Abramovich's influence meant that it was a view that could reasonably be reached by others reading those press articles?
- A. Well, I don't find Richard Sakwa's comments are quite as categorical about the push given by Mr Abramovich to Mr Putin as counsel is implying, and I'm not convinced that this is an accurate picture of Russian politics in the year 2000 to 2001, not provably anyway.

Q. Could I move on to "State Action to Attack Private Business Interests", and could I ask you to take out the joint memorandum which we have at bundle G(B)6. Could I ask you to turn to page 24 G(B)6/1.01/24, which is topic 4. This is dealing with "State Action to Attack Private Business..."

Can you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Could I ask you to read statement 57 and the response in paragraph 52. (Pause)

A. I see, yes.

Q. All right. Now, again, we've put the issue about the definition of "oligarchs" behind us.

A. Yes.

Q. What I understand you to be saying is that you agree with subparagraphs 1, 2 and 3, essentially that raiding and actual or de facto confiscation of private businesses through improper measures by Russian State agencies did occur, I think you're accepting that?

A. Yes, I am. Yes.

Q. So for convenience we'll just refer to that as raiding, but you do not agree with points 4 and 5 because you do not accept that the available evidence proves that confiscation of private companies frequently occurred at the prompting of oligarchs?

A. As far as I know, no one has done a survey of business confiscations, I don't know of any academic article to that effect, and that's why I disliked the rather sweeping generalisation and the word "often".

Q. What I would like to do is just sort of clarify the scope of the disagreement. I raise the point because statement 4 does not suggest that this conduct frequently occurred at the prompting of oligarchs. It says that it:

"... often occurred at the prompting of or in collusion with businessmen, including prominent oligarchs ..."

So if you consider the position with respect to businessmen generally, including but not limited to oligarchs, and also with respect to the conduct being either prompted by or in collusion with businessmen, is the statement one that you're prepared to agree with?

A. If --

Q. Leave aside the question of "often" or "frequently", just for the moment.

A. Ah, right. So did this behaviour occur in the 1990s, that big business --

- Q. I think we're looking at the period from 2000 onwards.
- A. From 2000, of course, yes.
- Q. Including the period 2001 to 2004.
- A. Yes. Did this kind of behaviour occur from 2001 through to 2004? Yes, it did. I think we can agree on that.
- Q. Thank you. So is your objection really in relation to the suggestion that it happened often at their instigation?
- A. My guess is that it happened often, but I'm asked to testify here on the basis of what I can demonstrate. And "often" is a loaded word that I would row back from. And that's one of the reasons I -- at least the main reason why I pulled back from sub-point 4.
- Q. I think you are saying there that you guess it happened often, but would you accept that it was sometimes prompted by or in collusion with businessmen -- I'm just trying to see, because it may well be for the court's purposes, Professor Service, that it doesn't actually matter whether it often happened or whether it sometimes happened, so it may be that we can just move on from this dispute.
- A. I may even have used the word "sometimes" myself so I'm entirely happy about that reformulation.
- Q. Thank you.

Could I then move on to the question of oral agreements, which I think is the last topic that I want to address with you. This is the use of undocumented commercial arrangements in Russia during this period.

A. Ah, right, yes.

Q. Just to remind you, could I ask you to take out the joint memorandum and turn to page 18 G(B)6/1.01/18. Could I ask you to look at section C which starts at the bottom of page 18, do you have that?

A. Yes.

Q. If I could ask you to read statements 16 to 18 and then your comment at paragraph 40. (Pause)

A. Yes, I've caught up, yes.

Q. Thank you. So in summary, I think what is being suggested here is that it was common for Russian parties to enter into oral and informal ownership agreements in Russia in the 1990s, and Professor Fortescue indicates that he agrees with that.

I think we can see at paragraph 40 what you say is that you disagree with these statements for the reasons stated in your first report. Can you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, what I'd like to do is just look at your first report about this topic, because what I want to suggest to you is that it's not easy to divine from what your report says why you reject the statements we've just been looking at. So could I ask you to look at your first report, which we have at bundle G(B)3, and I think this section starts on page 15 G(B)3/1.1/15. At paragraph 34, you start by saying:

"The picture drawn by Professor Fortescue ..."

And I think we can see from the title heading that this section is actually referring to paragraphs 242 to 310 in Professor Fortescue's report where he is dealing with business practice in Russia in the early 1990s and early 2000s. I don't think I need to ask you to turn that up.

What you say is:

"The picture drawn by Professor Fortescue of Russian business practice in the 1990s is broadly in line with [the] scholarly work on the subject..."

Then you explain what you intend to add. So you say there's a:

"... need for an explicit historical understanding of this phenomenon and deal with the weaknesses and limitations of the views which he expresses."

I would suggest to you that there, there's no suggestion that you agree with Professor Fortescue's general conclusion?

- A. I think that Professor Fortescue pulled out the side of business practice that was informal, and that's what I intended to express concurrence with. I don't have any doubt that a lot of what went on was oral and undocumented.

Where his report, though, is less than helpful is its lack of attentiveness to documented written material. Some of that material relates to share ownership documents, some of it relates to what I am hoping in the years ahead we will find out about political and commercial practices in the diaries, the notes, the minutes of meetings that must have been kept in the 1990s and 2000s, but the evidence of which, as yet, has not come to light. And if you will recall, I mentioned that the immediate preceding period of Soviet history, 1985 to 1991, is now replete with such additional evidence.

I cannot believe -- it just contravenes all of the bounds of common sense to assume that nothing was written down, everything was done on a handshake, that when Mr Potanin or Berezovsky or Abramovich met each other, they consigned everything to the recesses of their brain and relied entirely on memory. For me, that conflicts with common sense. It also conflicts with --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think that's a matter for me, isn't it, at the end of the day.

A. I'm sorry, I'm trespassing again.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: All I'm interested in is your experience and knowledge of historical position.

A. Well, then I'm sorry about that, my Lady. I've trespassed again.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It doesn't matter, but let's have your evidence on the...

MR GILLIS: Professor Service, what I was going to ask you to do, in paragraph 34 you seem to have expressed broad agreement with the view that Professor Fortescue has expressed.

A. As one side of the coin.

Q. Well let's just go through it. And then what I would suggest to you is that in paragraphs 35 and 37, you essentially endorse the account that Professor Fortescue is giving about the chaotic business environment which he says encouraged the adoption of informal and oral arrangements?

A. That's correct.

Q. And is this correct: you would not dispute that there was a strong incentive for Russian businessmen to disguise the beneficial ownership of their assets; would you agree with that?

A. I also agree with that in general terms. Without -- well, I mustn't trespass again.

Q. And then in paragraph 37 you say in the last sentence

G(B)3/1.1/16:

"To be a businessman was not an easy option -- and the new businessmen of Russia, distrustful of official authority but hopeful of making a profit, often operated with highly informal methods and -- let it be said -- sometimes with scant respect for the law."

Do you see that?

A. I can, yes.

Q. So again, I suggest there that you are really saying two things. You're saying firstly that businessmen often operated with highly informal methods, and second that you're saying they sometimes operated with scant respect for the law?

A. I do indeed say that, but I then go on to say that this extraordinary, extreme informality was counterparted by an appreciated need for some kind of documentation in other areas of commercial practice.

Q. Then, Professor Fortescue (sic), at paragraph 38, in the first two sentences, you say that:

"Among the informalities identified by commentators was a sketchy attitude to drawing up and signing explicit and binding contracts. Professor Fortescue's report clearly explains the prevalence of this --"

Sorry, Professor Service, the first two sentences of paragraph 38 say:

"Among the informalities identified by commentators was a sketchy attitude to drawing up and signing explicit and binding contracts. Professor Fortescue's report clearly explains the prevalence of this contractual 'innocence'."

A. Yes, I think that Professor Fortescue, in dealing with that side of the coin, does a very clear job.

Q. Thank you.

Then I think it's at the top of the next page where you start to add the reservations G(B)3/1.1/17, we can see at the top of page 17 you then go on to say:

"Nevertheless sketchiness is not the same as ... complete absence of documentation. Mr Shvidler's Fifth... Statement draws attention to documents involved in the registration and transfer of shares..."

Then in the middle of that paragraph, you go on to say:

"There were -- and are -- things that remain unrecorded. But there was an obvious risk in doing business exclusively on the basis of a handshake, and everyone knew that certain procedures such as the formal registration of shareholdings would need to have taken place if ever the question of judicial enforcement ... [arose]."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Then I think at the end of that paragraph, you then say you offer those comments as a caveat on the general points about sketchiness made by Professor Fortescue?

A. Yes, I'm -- I thought Mr Shvidler's evidence was really quite plausible on this, and of course when I had -- when we had the joint meeting in San Francisco, this was something that Professor Bean was particularly revealing about and confirmed what Mr Shvidler had emphasised.

Q. Mr Shvidler, I think, was indicating that documentation would be created through the process of share registration. Is that correct?

A. That's correct, yes.

Q. Can I now ask you just to look at Professor Fortescue's second report.

A. Yes.

Q. Which we have at G(B)1/1. Can I ask you to go to page 158 at paragraphs 45 and 46 G(B)1/1.02/158.

Could I ask you to read paragraphs 45 and 46.

(Pause)

A. Yes.

Q. And Professor Service, what I was going to suggest to you is that your analysis in your first report, which we've just looked through, I would suggest is very much in line with what Professor Fortescue is saying here.

You say that transactions would tend to create some paper trail, for instance in relation to registration of shares, but at the same time there may be oral or informal arrangements between the parties as well, and that the documentary record of a transaction could be sketchy; would you agree with that?

- A. I would add the other side of the coin, that we do not have the right to assume that the paper trail ends at the point where share ownership records are made. I hesitate to go any further than that because I'm aware that this is not my business here. But I think I am allowed to say that if the years 1985 to 1991 have yielded up records we previously didn't know existed, the likelihood is that the same will happen to subsequent years of Russian political and business history.

- Q. Can I just try some propositions on you and see whether you would agree with this.

First, would you accept that one of the consequences of the high risk business environment which you identify existed in Russia, and I think maybe you had the result that often people sought to do business within groups of people who they knew and trusted?

- A. Yes, absolutely agree. Whether they trusted them I'm not sure but -- fully trusted them, especially in business, I'm not so sure about that now. Probably I'm less sure about that than when I wrote the "Russia: Experiment" book, because I've done further work on the big businessmen but not published it, and I'm pretty sure that their mutual rivalries and enmities were very extreme in the 1990s.

Q. Secondly, I think you accept in the joint memorandum that the Russian court system could be inefficient and ineffective, I think we see that from paragraph 38 of the joint memorandum; would you agree with that G(B)6/1.01/18?

A. I can't see how anyone would disagree with that statement.

Q. And, Professor Service, what I would suggest to you is that it flows that when contracts were made between individuals who knew and trusted each other, and who expected to be able to resolve issues by negotiation, there was a lower incentive formally to document contracts; would you agree with that?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Again, to what extent is that directed to his historical knowledge or expertise? It sounds to me like a kind of logical proposition.

MR GILLIS: My Lady, I think maybe it is more of a logical proposition, but I wished to see whether Professor Service, on the basis of his experience, was willing to agree to it.

- A. I'm not sure if I would agree to it. The fact that you trust someone doesn't mean to say that you don't write something down.

In a country whose history is riddled with episodes where people paid a very, very heavy price for doing what they did, thinking that they were in line with the current administration's desires, and then those desires changed, there is a tradition of -- a long tradition, going back before the end of the Communist period, for people to get others to sign their records so that they can cover their backs for any future unpleasant contingencies.

So to that extent, I'd be reluctant to subscribe to the general proposition that counsel has just expressed.

- Q. Even between people who trust each other, is that what you're saying?
- A. I think that the rumbustious, dangerous business history of Russia after 1991 induced businessmen in particular to hedge their bets about what degree of trust they could have in any other individual. It was worse than the Wild West in as much as very quickly in the second half of the 19th century the judges and the sheriffs in the newly claimed parts of the USA came to impose a degree of order that has really yet to be imposed on post-Communist Russia even to this day.

- Q. Professor Service, I think you accept, do you, that in the Russia of the 1990s, many Russian businessmen took steps to hide their assets; do you agree with that?
- A. Well now, if we're moving on from that then, yes, I think it's very clear that they -- that businessmen did have an incentive to try to hide their assets.
- Q. Professor Service, what I would put to you is that where there was a perceived need to conceal ownership of assets, one method that could be used, and was used, between people who trusted each other was an oral agreement whereby one would hold assets on behalf of the other. Would you agree with that?
- A. The evidence for that proposition is not as conclusive as counsel suggests.
- Q. Maybe not as conclusive, but would you accept that there is evidence that indicates that that was an arrangement that people entered into?
- A. I think there is no substantial evidence to that effect, and I think that here we do have to look at the dangers of not recording in some sort of way what was going on in the 1990s, and in similar periods of uncertainty in the history of modern Russia the same phenomenon is observable.

So I'm afraid I don't accept that proposition, I don't think the evidence for it is substantial.

Q. You may say it's not substantial, but are you willing to accept that there is evidence that indicates these types of oral arrangements were used?

A. Well, the proposition that there were oral arrangements is a strong one. It's robust, it's believable.

What isn't believable, to my mind, is that individuals who were staking hundreds of thousands of rubles, I'm not talking about billions of rubles even, would be prepared to consign their framework of arrangements to some sort of mental recess of memory and totally to a depository of assumed mutual trust.

This is not a -- this is not, to my mind, convincing in the light of the history of the country that we're talking about, or indeed the history of any country that I know anything about.

Q. Professor Service, what I would suggest to you is that it makes sense, if you have a relationship of trust and a desire to conceal ownership of assets?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Again, that's a proposition of logic rather than a proposition based on his historical expertise or experience.

MR GILLIS: Maybe then I can just ask you to look at one article, just to get your comments on it.

A. Could I just intervene, am I allowed to intervene?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, please do.

A. I've never lived in a country where there is so much pressure on one to get documentation for the contingency that an undesirable contingency, an undesirable occurrence might arise from an agreement or an incident that one is involved in. So that big Russian businessmen didn't cease to be Russians when they became rich, and the framework of understandings, both politically and economically but fundamentally culturally too, didn't change when they became rich.

MR GILLIS: Well, can I just ask you to be handed G(B)2/4 at tab 141 G(B)2/4.141/167, this is an article from Vedomosti. Could I ask you, if you can just look at the beginning of the article. And if I could explain to you, it's an article dealing with the dissolution of the partnership between Potanin and Mr Prokhorov, two of the most prominent Russian oligarchs, in 2007.

Would you agree that the assets in which they were partners included Norilsk Nickel, which was one of the most valuable companies in Russia?

A. Yes, I would agree with that, yes.

Q. If you can then turn to page 169 G(B)2/4.141/169, and if you could read the third and fourth paragraphs, which is the paragraph that starts:

"For a long time ..."

(Pause)

What I would suggest to you, Professor Service, is that from these paragraphs you can see that Mr Prokhorov was complaining that some business assets to which he was entitled had been transferred to a third party company and were not held by the main KM investment vehicle.

And Andrey Klishas, who was the president of Norilsk Nickel, gave an explanation for how those assets were held. And one can see in that second paragraph that you have read, he is saying:

"'In parallel to KM Invest' there existed a group of companies created by ... Barbasheva. The shares of the companies mentioned were not registered in the names of Prokhorov and the Potanin: there was an oral undertaking between them and Lena's staff... the nominee shareholders of these companies."

What I would suggest to you is that that is just an example of how, even in 2007, people who could be described as oligarchs were using oral agreements in relation to holding of assets?

- A. I agree with the one side of the coin that counsel has exhibited to us, but I would go on to say that, one, Vedomosti is not a newspaper of record. There are all of the weaknesses and vulnerabilities of reports by journalists that we talked about on Friday. And, two, it doesn't flow from those two paragraphs that an oral understanding was unaccompanied on both sides by some kind of consignment, literary consignment of the understanding, so that they would not have to rely only on memory. The likelihood is, therefore, that the journalist simply took at face value -- the journalists, I think, actually -- took at face value what was being said to them.

Journalists have a very hard time in extracting the truth from devious and purposive businessmen and their representatives.

Q. Professor Service, what I'd suggest to you is it's perfectly clear that it's being said it was an oral undertaking. If it was a documented undertaking that issue simply wouldn't arise, would it?

A. I'm afraid I haven't been clear enough and I apologise for that.

I could well believe that this oral undertaking did happen at the time as an oral undertaking. I could -- I think I'd have to be -- physical violence would have to be applied to me to believe automatically that that was the end of the matter and that neither side in this very, very complex business relationship didn't write something down about what they had agreed.

Q. Professor Service, what I would suggest to you is that your first report is acknowledging that in many respects that is how business was being done in this informal atmosphere where documentation was sketchy. So I would suggest to you that, in the light of what you've said in your first report, it should come as no surprise to you to see that actually here we have an example of oligarchs doing business on the basis of an oral understanding only.

A. I think, if I were writing that first report again, I would have clarified my exposition in the way that I've tried to do in the last five or ten minutes.

I do not think and did not think, but obviously didn't make it sufficiently clear, that oral understandings, a quick handshake in a shady bar in a French or Russian hotel, was all that happened when these vast sums of money were at stake between men who never really trusted each other. I find that deeply implausible.

MR GILLIS: My Lady, I have no further questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much. Mr Adkin?

MR ADKIN: My Lady, I have no questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Ms Davies.

Re-examination by MS DAVIES

MS DAVIES: Professor Service, just one matter for which you'll need the joint memorandum in bundle G(B)6, tab 1, and the transcript from Friday. The transcript from Friday is just being given to you, Day 37, at pages 166 to 167.

While you're waiting for that, if you want to turn in the joint memo to pages 15 and 16 G(B)6/1.01/15. Now, if you could look at the transcript at pages 166 to 167, and just to remind you, Professor Service, you were being asked some questions about the statements in the joint memorandum relating to the loans-for-shares scheme, and in particular you can see at page 166 my learned friend Mr Gillis was putting to you the question of whether:

"... the disputed statements here, at statement 2, [are] a summary description of the loans-for-shares scheme [that] is... not open to any serious political debate?"

A. Yes.

Q. Now, if you'd like to look in the joint memo at statement 2 on page 15, just to remind yourself of that, you see statement 2 has five subparagraphs, 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 G(B)6/1.01/15?

A. Yes.

Q. And remind yourself of the contents of all of those.

(Pause)

Then if you could look in the transcript at page 167, at line 10, do you see an answer from yourself:

"I think that, as it stands, question 2, as long as it's not connected up to -- sorry, statement 2, as long as it's not connected up to statement 3, isn't implausible."

Do you see that answer, page 167, line 10?

A. Is it actually 166, line 10?

Q. Page 167, line 10:

"I think that, as it stands..."

A. Right, I see.

Q. Sorry, the numbering is a bit confusing.

A. Yes, I see, yes.

Q. You see the answer:

"... as it stands, question 2, as long as it's not connected up to -- sorry, statement 2, as long as it's not connected up to statement 3, isn't implausible."

I wonder if you could just clarify for us what you meant by statement 2 and statement 3 in that answer?

A. The connections between statements 2 and 3, I think I gave a rather fuzzy answer on Friday there.

Q. Well, when you were referring to statement 2 in that answer, can you clarify whether you were referring to the whole of statement 2, including all of its subparagraphs 1 to 5 on page 15, or whether you were referring to something else?

A. I think we're talking about the sub-numbering, aren't we, here? Sub-statements 2 and 3, as I recall.

MS DAVIES: Thank you very much, Professor Service. I have no further questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

Thank you very much indeed, Professor Service, for coming along to give your evidence and assisting the court. You may be released now.

THE WITNESS: Thank you.

(The witness withdrew)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. I'll take the break now for ten minutes, and then we're having Professor Bean, is that right, Mr Adkin?

MR ADKIN: My Lady, yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. Ten minutes.

(11.38 am)

(A short break)

(11.50 am)

MR ADKIN: My Lady, I call Professor Bean.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just before Professor Bean is sworn, are we likely to finish this witness before the luncheon adjournment?

MR ADKIN: Mr Gillis?

MR GILLIS: I think not. I may need to run over by 20 minutes, but I'll try not to.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It doesn't matter, I just need to know for my own arrangements. Very well, thank you.

PROFESSOR BRUCE BEAN (sworn)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Please sit down.

Examination-in-chief by MR ADKIN

MR ADKIN: Professor Bean, can you confirm, please, that you have no electronic equipment or mobile phones on you?

A. I have none.

Q. Thank you.

Could you please be given bundle G(B)5/1, and you should find at the front of that bundle a document G(B)5/1.00/1. Is that your first and only report in these proceedings?

A. Yes, it is.

Q. Now, I understand that you have a very small correction that you want to make to paragraph 11 which is at page 5 G(B)5/1.00/5.

A. Yes.

Q. Could you tell us what that is, please?

A. Yes, the third sentence says:

"In June 1998 I left Coudert Brothers [and joined] Clifford Chance as [a] partner ..."

I left on a Friday, which was May 29th, and June 1st was Monday when I joined Clifford.

Q. Thank you.

Subject to that correction, does this report represent your true opinion?

A. Yes, it does.

Q. And is this the evidence you wish to give on the matters in which you've been instructed in these proceedings?

A. Yes, it is.

Q. Could you please be given bundle G(B)6/1, there is I think only one tab in this bundle. This is the joint memorandum G(B)6/1.01/1.

A. Yes.

Q. So far as this document contains opinions which are attributed to you, do they represent your true opinion?

A. Yes, they do.

MR ADKIN: Thank you, Professor Bean, if you would just wait there.

Cross-examination by MR GILLIS

MR GILLIS: Professor Bean, can we just start with your career before you moved to Moscow in 1995.

A. All right.

Q. You started your legal career in 1973 as an associate lawyer in New York, first with Simpson Thatcher, and then Patterson Belknap Webb & Tyler, is that correct?

A. Yes, but I would say that my career began the year prior when I clerked for a judge on the second circuit, but yes.

Q. Thank you. And then for five years, from 1980 to 1985, you went in-house as a lawyer at the oil company Atlantic Richfield?

A. Yes, I did.

Q. Then from 1985 to 1992, you were general counsel in an American financial services and insurance group, AmBase, is that correct?

A. AmBase was the name we ended up with, yes.

Q. Then from 1992 until 1994, you worked as an investment banker in the US?

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. And then moving on to the position in Moscow, you lived and worked in Moscow from March 1995 until July 2003, is that correct?

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. And just briefly, from March 1995 until June 1998, you worked for the US law firm Coudert Brothers, rising to become the managing partner of their Moscow office?

A. Yes, with the correction that I actually ended at the end of May, but -- that's the correction I just made.

Q. End of May.

Then from May 1998 you moved to Clifford Chance where you were the head of corporate and foreign direct investment until June 2002 before returning to the US in July 2003, is that correct?

A. Yes, that last year I was of counsel.

Q. Of counsel.

A. But I was in Moscow at that time.

Q. Just to be clear --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What's the difference between being a partner and of counsel?

A. Well, a partner was paid. And of counsel, I was there if they needed me, and if they had needed me I was paid.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

A. It's an American concept that I brought to Russia actually.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. So you had another job from June 2002?

A. No, I did not.

MR GILLIS: Just to be clear, at the time you were admitted to practise law before the Bars of the State of New York and California, is that correct?

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. So you were qualified to practise American law, not English or Russian law, including at the time you were working for Coudert and Clifford Chance in Moscow?

A. That is correct.

Q. It's also right, is it, that in Moscow you practised as a transaction lawyer, not as a litigator?

A. That's certainly correct.

Q. Thank you.

Now, in your report at paragraph 12 G(B)5/1.100/5, you say that while you were in Russia, you acted for:

"... a large number of very substantial business clients and in a number of ... significant business transactions."

I think that's paragraph 12.

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. Professor Bean, you give a list of your clients and contacts in Russia in appendix 2 of your report, and could I just ask you to turn to page 43 G(B)5/1.00/43?

A. Yes.

Q. There you list your past clients.

A. Well, I guess the ones I could recall, yes. It would not be an exclusive list, it would not be an all-inclusive list.

Q. Am I right in understanding that this is a list of the clients and contacts from your time in Russia?

A. Yes, but at both firms.

Q. In both firms.

A. Yes.

Q. I think that you've listed 29 past clients, and if you'll take that from me?

- A. I will.
- Q. Of those 29 past clients I think -- and again if you'll take this from me -- that 19 are US or UK companies, like BP, Texaco and Proctor & Gamble, and there's one Italian company, Fiat, and another is a Japanese company, Toyota, is that right?
- A. Well, at the ultimate parent level where that name comes from, yes.
- Q. And then there are I think a few UK or US/Russian joint ventures, such as Polar Lights and the Sakhalin Island projects.
- A. Well, again, Sakhalin and all of those -- all of those entities that actually operated in Russia operated through local joint stock companies or some legal entity, juridical entity.
- Q. But Polar Lights, that's a Conoco/Rosneft joint venture, is that correct?
- A. It was Conoco at the time, now I think it's Conoco/Rosneft.
- Q. And the Sakhalin Island project, that was Shell and Gazprom?
- A. It is now Shell and Gazprom, it was originally Mitsui and Marathon and two others. Shell and Gazprom both came in much later.
- Q. Then I think there are five Russian companies, that's Group Menatep, Gazprom, Inkombank, Renaissance Capital and Red October Chocolate Factory, is that right?

A. Those are Russian ownership, I suppose, yes -- well, they're certainly Russian companies, yes.

Q. Without getting bogged down in the exact percentages, is it right that your practice in Russia predominantly involved acting for very large non-Russian companies considering or making investments in Russia?

A. Early on, yes, before the financial crisis in 1998, that was certainly true. Afterwards, we did a great deal more of the Group Menatep, for instance, and some of the others were Russian companies going offshore, that is to say -- "offshore" is a strange term -- outside Russia. And again, I didn't actually list all of the companies, I listed the ones I could think of at the time.

Q. Thank you.

I think then, just to bring the position up to date, Professor Bean, you're now a professor at Michigan State University?

A. Law School, yes.

Q. I think we can see that from paragraph 8 G(B)5/1.00/5.

A. Mm-hm.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Was Brunswick Capital a Russian-based company?

A. Well, again, my Lady, they were all Russian based in that they were Russian legal entities. I think Brunswick was actually a foreign capital that had come in and adopted that name, although, in the early '90s, any western name was good for PR, so even if it had been all Russian -- but I'm sure that that company -- I'm 84 per cent sure that that company was foreign based.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Foreign capital?

A. Yes, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And Renaissance was foreign capital or Russian capital?

A. Renaissance was principally funded, I believe, by Mr Potanin eventually, but it began as a foreign funded operation, yes, my Lady.

MR GILLIS: So Professor Bean, can I start just by trying to establish what I hope will be common ground between us by reference to your report and the joint memorandum.

The first point, on which I don't think there's any real dispute, relates to the high level of risk which businesses faced in operating in Russia in the 1990s.

A. Risk, what -- I mean --

Q. Well, could I ask you to look at paragraph 50 of your report. We have that at page 19 G(B)5/1.00/19.

A. Yes, I have it.

Q. In paragraph 50 there, you are saying that:

"... by the mid-1990s ... [there was an] uncertain

... legal environment, overly aggressive tax inspectors, outmoded tax regimes based upon turnover, unhelpful, obstructionist governmental agencies and bureaucrats, potentially unreliable courts which could be exploited by aggressive competitors, and political uncertainty..."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. As I understand it, you accept that there was a high risk business environment in Russia in the mid-1990s, is that correct?

A. Well, if all these conditions mean high risk, yes.

I mean, it was possible to make money but it would have been much easier to do it in London.

Q. But what I think you're saying is that businessmen dealt with those difficulties not through the use of informal oral agreements but by moving ownership and transaction arrangements offshore; is that a fair summary of your position?

A. Well, I mean, you couldn't deal with -- I did say that and I do agree with that, but, I mean, that wouldn't have resolved any issues with unhelpful obstructionist government agencies or bureaucrats, for instance. But, as to ownership and major transactions, yes, you would want to be offshore and choose foreign law.

Q. So there's that high risk environment which you've identified.

The second aspect, which I think may be common ground, I think that you accept that one of the ways in which Russian businessmen responded to the risks which you have identified was by hiding their assets, their agreements and the beneficial ownership of Russian companies. Is that correct?

A. Well, I did say that. I mean, I'm not -- does this still relate to paragraph 50?

Q. No.

A. Okay.

Q. Maybe I could ask you to look at paragraph 39 of the joint memorandum which we have at bundle 6, page 18 G(B)6/1.01/18.

A. Yes.

Yes, I see that.

Q. So is that common ground also, I mean there you are saying that you accept there was:

"... a widespread perception that government agencies and officials might act improperly in a way which threatened businesses and that many businessmen took steps to hide assets and transactions ..."

A. Yes, that's exactly what I said. I stand by that statement.

Again, that doesn't solve all your problems, but it solves problems relating to ownership. And certainly, if you're offshore, the law is more reliable and you can avoid taxes.

Q. But can we agree that throughout the 1990s and the early 2000s there were strong incentives for Russian businessmen to conceal beneficial ownership of assets and many of them took steps to do so?

A. There were certainly incentives and many did, that's correct.

Q. Thank you. Then I think the third area of common ground is this: I think you accept that Russian businessmen made oral arrangements in the late 1980s and very early 1990s, that's before the dissolution of the Soviet Union, is that correct?

A. Well, I think we need to elaborate on that. Oral arrangements, of course there were many, many oral arrangements, and the rules did change, I mean the rules of conduct did change for Russian -- for people operating in Russia, whether they were Russians or foreigners, after that early period.

Q. Can we see what you say at paragraph 50 of your report and that's at page 19 G(B)5/1.00/19.

A. Yes, I have it.

Q. The third sentence there -- maybe I should start with the second sentence:

"Arrangements intended to be legally enforceable were not expressed only as oral agreements. There may earlier have been instances of informal oral arrangements, particularly under the uncertain conditions of the first Gorbachev [era], but by the mid-1990s, it is my view that the uncertain Russian legal environment ..."

And then you go on to say: had led to ownership of Russian businesses being moved offshore.

Do you see that?

A. I do see that.

Q. Am I right to say that the view you're expressing there is that before ownership of Russian businesses were taken offshore, the uncertain conditions may have led to informal oral arrangements?

A. Well, again, "informal oral arrangements" could relate to many, many things, only one of which would be whether the entity was offshore, or whether an agreement for a particular transaction was to be governed by foreign law.

We can't just talk about business, we have to talk about the ownership, we have to talk about taxes, transfer pricing. I mean it's all different. But, yes, it is certainly true that from the 1980s, the late 1980s, Russian businessmen and people operating in Russia knew that it made sense to be in part offshore. For instance, Cyprus had a 4.25 per cent tax rate which was wonderful, and that also helped.

Q. But particularly in relation to the tax aspects, one can see that moving offshore would be particularly advantageous.

In terms of dealing with questions of ownership and seeking to conceal ownership, would you accept that that is something that could be done through the use of oral agreements?

A. Not in my experience.

Q. All right. Well, we'll come to your experience.

A. Okay.

Q. The fourth point that I was wanting to see if it was common ground is: would you accept that one of the consequences of the high risk environment was a tendency to do business, if possible, with close and trusted friends?

A. Well, I mean, business is done with people you think you can make money with, that's how you pick your business partners in a transaction.

I noted Professor Service's comments. It seems to me, on trusted friends, my understanding is that the real circle of trust were the people that, in the Soviet era, you sat at the kitchen table and complained with, and that would have been a very, very small group. It would be highly coincidental if that particular group could later do you some good in business.

Q. But would it not be natural, in the high risk environment that you've identified, to seek to do business with people who you felt you could trust?

A. I guess that's always the case, yes. That's true in Delaware and New York as well.

Q. Thank you.

Can I just now identify something which I'm not going to be suggesting to you before we get to the main issues. First, I'm not going to be suggesting to you that it was the practice for Russian parties entering into arrangements with foreign investors to make those agreements orally. So I think we would accept that where one is talking about companies like BP or Texaco or Proctor & Gamble, there arrangements were not being entered into orally; do you follow?

A. Yes.

Q. The second point is that I was not going to suggest to you that significant corporate acquisitions generated no paperwork at all. I think we can agree that it was unavoidable that ownership of shares in Russia, Russian companies, would generate paperwork --

A. Well --

Q. If I can just finish.

A. Please.

Q. -- at least in respect of the actual share register.

A. Well, curiously enough, share registration in Russia is not reflected on a piece of paper, it's electronic, but yes, there would always be that and you could have a print-out of your interest from the share register reduced to a piece of paper. Yes, you could.

Q. Exactly so. The issue I would suggest to you is whether other aspects relating to beneficial ownership might remain undocumented, so that I suggest is the issue. Do you understand?

A. I understand your suggestion, yes.

Q. Thirdly, I'm not going to suggest to you that in the mid-1990s Russian businessmen never made use of offshore jurisdictions, either for making contracts between themselves or for ownership of their business assets; do you follow?

A. Yes.

Q. On the other side of the fence, can I try and identify the scope of your evidence. Firstly, I assume you would accept, would you, that it remained possible in the mid-1990s to use undisclosed oral nominee arrangements as a way of holding assets in Russia and disguising their beneficial ownership. Would you accept that?

A. I'm not sure I understand that. We're talking now about ownership of a juridical entity which has been created in Russia?

Q. Yes.

A. Okay, and by definition the ultimate -- the ownership of 100 per cent of the entity must be recorded on the share register. So that's recorded, and we're going to agree that that's the equivalent of paper?

Q. Yes.

A. Yes, okay. Given that it's registered in the name -- I mean, the typical example would be it's registered in the name of a Cyprus company, which has a legal name, or it's registered in the name of a Gibraltar, BVI or Isle of Man or one of these other tax-favourable jurisdictions, and that would be clearly recorded as a piece of paper, or from the share register.

Having done that, you don't know who it is that owns those offshore entities. That's correct. You have to go offshore to look at the share register there.

Q. Is that your answer?

A. Yes. What did I leave out?

Q. The answer to the question.

I was just asking whether you accepted that undisclosed oral nominee arrangements could be used as a method for holding assets in Russia and disguising their beneficial ownership?

A. I mean, is anything possible? Yes. I guess I'm not sure what piece of it you're getting to but maybe you'll make that clear.

Q. I'm just wanting to get your evidence as to whether or not you are excluding the possibility that oral nominee arrangements, if I can put it in that way, could be used in the mid-1990s in Russia as a means for disguising beneficial ownership?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Are you putting "could" in the sense of legally as a matter of Russian law, or are you saying, Mr Gillis, they were used?

MR GILLIS: Well, I would put it in the sense of "could legally" and move on to "were being used"?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Let's take it in stages.

The first question is: do you accept, Professor Bean, that they could be used as a matter of Russian law?

A. Yes, my Lady. If we had Cyprus companies showing 100 per cent ownership of a Russian joint stock company, any arrangement could be made among Russians, if that's the limit, among Russians as to the ownership of that Cyprus entity.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Does Cyprus have bearer shares, for example?

A. I believe they did, but I can't give evidence on that.
I think they did at the time.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. But a Panamanian company, you're accepting, for example, that an oral agreement might be made in relation to the bearer shares of a Panamanian company as between Russians?

A. Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Could have been?

A. Could have been, yes.

MR GILLIS: Professor Bean, I would suggest to you not merely "could have been", but such arrangements were made between Russian businessmen; would you accept that?

A. For certain I was only there eight years and I only saw what I saw. I never saw that.

Could it have happened? Yes, it could happen.

Q. Professor Bean, I'll come in a moment to your experience. But what I would suggest to you is that where there was a relationship of trust between businessmen, and there was a perceived need to conceal the beneficial ownership of one of them in the assets that were jointly made, they may well choose to do that by way of an oral agreement, particularly in circumstances where they were not being advised by the likes of Coudert Brothers or Clifford Chance; would you agree with that?

A. Is it possible? I suppose it's possible.

Q. Thank you. What I would like to put to you, Professor Bean, is that neither the sources you cite in your report, nor your own experience at Coudert Brothers and Clifford Chance, provides a sound foundation for contending that Russian businessmen who trusted each other and who wished to conceal beneficial ownership of assets would necessarily have used offshore arrangements as opposed to oral agreements, would you agree?

A. Well, again, we're -- when I say offshore arrangements, at the first instance, that's the ownership of the Russian legal entity, and that was very easy to put offshore. My experience at Coudert and at Clifford as a lawyer, certainly nobody ever came and said, "We've got this secret agreement offshore, how does it work?" That never happened in eight years.

Furthermore, I never heard of that happening, you know, whether in the informal conversations that we had at the International Lawyers' Group or with the American Chamber of Commerce or just -- I mean, unfortunately lawyers tend to talk to lawyers and have their friends as lawyers and I never came across that.

Q. But would you accept that if Russian businessmen had entered into informal oral arrangements, in order to conceal beneficial ownership, that is not something that they are likely to be disclosing to other persons?

A. I can tell you that they did not disclose that to me, that part, I can certainly agree.

Q. Can I look at what seem to be the sources that you rely upon in your report as being the basis of the views that you have expressed. I think one source that you rely upon is a quotation from David Hoffman's book "The Oligarch" which we see at page 49 of your report.

That's at paragraph 49 --

A. Paragraph 49 or page 49?

Q. Paragraph 49, page 18 G(B)5/1.00/18.

A. That I can handle.

Q. There you refer to the resentment of the -- I think in paragraph 49 you say, the resentment of the oligarchs' wealth:

"... did not of itself lead to 'informal ownership' but contributed to the widely observed [phenomena] of [ownership offshore] ..."

Then we can see that in footnote 21 you refer to a statement in Hoffman's book at page 447 in which he's talking about the offshore network operated by Mr Khodorkovsky, do you see that?

A. I see it, yes.

Q. And it says in the footnote:

"Khodorkovsky's far-reaching offshore network was typical for Russian big business. All the other oligarchs -- indeed, thousands of Russian businessmen -- did the same thing, although many on a scale less grand. Every month, by very rough calculations, up to $2 billion slipped out of Russia in wire transfers, phoney import-export documents, oil shipments and other means..."

Do you see that?

A. I do, yes.

Q. Now, what I would put to you is that, while this citation from Hoffman shows that Russian businessmen were using offshore companies, and I would suggest often for transfer pricing, and we don't dispute that --

A. Mm-hm.

Q. -- it does not, I would suggest, touch upon the question of whether Russian businessmen were also making oral agreements between themselves. Would you accept that?

A. Oral agreements between themselves, of course. That's how you get any deal started.

Are you meaning oral agreements between themselves or among themselves with respect to the ownership of offshore entities?

Q. Indeed.

A. Okay. Well, does this footnote go either way? I don't know. I happen to know a great deal about Khodorkovsky's offshore networks since I've written a chapter in a book on it, and what this says -- what Hoffman says here is that thousands of Russian businessmen did the same thing, that is to say they had their ownership offshore. That was for many purposes, including taxes, including obfuscating ownership if they wanted to do that, including choice of foreign law as an option for dispute resolution, all of those things would make sense and were presumably part of the mix.

But you would want to be offshore -- I mean, almost everybody wanted to be offshore just because they were the people that knew very well that you could manipulate the judicial system.

- Q. I understand the desire to be offshore. What I'm asking you is that Hoffman is not saying anything about the use of oral arrangements between businessmen, Russian businessmen, to disguise beneficial ownership of shares. And I would suggest to you that that's something that could even be imposed on top of an offshore structure.
- A. Hoffman does not say that. I suppose you could impose that, sure, yes.
- Q. Professor Bean, could I now just turn to your experience in Moscow working for Coudert and Clifford Chance. Can I put to you that what you have done is essentially to extrapolate from your experience dealing with your clients at those firms, and I don't dispute that experience, to conclude that Russian businessmen were not in the practice of using undocumented oral agreements for, amongst other things, concealing beneficial ownership.

Would you accept that is the basis of the opinion you are expressing before the court?

A. Certainly my opinion is based on my experience, yes, and while there were millions of Russian businessmen trying to do transactions, the major transactions, the large transactions were the ones that we were involved in. So I would want to draw the line somewhere.

The little shop owners never came to lawyers, for sure, and my exposure within the firms and within the lawyer groups that I participated in, there was no -- I mean, they were people that could afford our outrageous hourly rates, they were not little people.

Q. Exactly.

Professor Bean, what I was going to suggest to you is we've already seen that the majority of the clients you were working for in Moscow were not Russian individuals or companies, they were international companies, that's correct, isn't it?

A. Again, with the same qualification as before, that is to say if the majority were -- the source of funds and business idea came from offshore, but again, everybody dealt with Russian legal entities.

Q. What I would suggest to you is that it wouldn't be appropriate to extrapolate from your dealings with international companies, such as BP or Texaco, to reach conclusions as to the practice of Russian businessmen, would you agree?

A. Perhaps not. But the Khodorkovsky experience I had, which was fairly extensive, over three and a half years, four years, that that is certainly typical -- I'm assuming that it's typical of how major oligarchs, to use a forbidden word, operated.

Q. That would give you one insight. The Khodorkovsky work was from what date?

A. Basically after the crash, so it would have been from some time in late '98, probably.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Did you do any joint venture deals, or that kind of deal, as between Russian businessmen?

A. My Lady, the first thing we learned was don't do a joint venture. That was what we learned. Were there transactions where the foreign party would own part of a legal entity and the Russians would own part of a legal entity? Yes. Our advice was always: you need the majority. But the typical joint venture going into foreign jurisdiction, that was never successful in my experience.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm not sure you're quite answering my question. My question was: did you ever advise on deals where, whether it was a joint venture or a majority acquisition or whatever, the client on your side and the client on the other side were both Russian businessmen?

A. Oh, yes. Oh, yes. They were both Russian individuals, but they'd almost always have some offshore entity through which we operated, and through which they operated, for tax reasons, ownership reasons, et cetera.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What I'm interested in is whether your experience related to situations where, irrespective of the interposition of offshore entities, the ultimate beneficial owners on both sides of the deal were Russians as opposed to simply Texaco or BP or something?

A. Oh, yes, I would say especially dealing with the Yukos shareholders at the end. Yes, most of those transactions were done with Russian parties on both sides. Most. Some of them --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What was your involvement in the Khodorkovsky transaction? Who were you advising there?

A. We were advising -- the way the Khodorkovsky -- the Yukos shares were held, 80 to 70 per cent, depending on what number you like, were held offshore through exotic trusts which are actually referred to in one of the footnotes. So they were already offshore, they had enough money, they could afford us, and they wanted to make sure that those transactions were done properly. If they were done properly with another Russian entity, almost invariably that entity also would have a Cyprus or a Gibraltar entity. But the ultimate beneficiaries of the transactions were Russian individuals or citizens.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: On both sides?

A. Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see. Thank you.

MR GILLIS: Can I just look at the Russian clients that you were working for, that you've identified.

A. The ones that I've identified, yes.

Q. That you've identified. We've seen from the CV that that was Group Menatep?

A. Yes.

Q. Gazprom, Inkombank, Renaissance Capital and the Red October Chocolate Factory. Is that correct? Those are the Russian ones you've identified I think?

A. Well actually -- okay. Again, not to be picky, the Saint Springs investment, which is seven up from the bottom, that was an investment by the US Government fund in a completely Russian transaction that was owned by and created by an American businessman.

I'm not sure how that responds to your question. It was all Russian.

Q. It was all Russian?

A. Yes.

Q. But given that it was an investment by a US government fund, inevitably, that's going to be fully documented. I wouldn't suggest otherwise.

A. Good point, yes.

Q. Going back to the five companies we've identified, would you agree that we can exclude Gazprom from that list in the sense that it was a state-owned company which would not be involved in an attempt to disguise beneficial ownership from the Russian authorities?

A. Oh, I think that's completely wrong, with respect.

Q. Is it?

A. Yes, it was controlled -- by the time Mr Putin came to power, more than 50 per cent of Gazprom was held outside the government, in private hands. There were enormous numbers of good and not so good transactions involving Gazprom where people tried to buy shares before it was completely legal to buy shares in Gazprom. So by definition, almost all of the Gazprom transactions were trying to disguise ownership. This particular transaction was -- and I'm trying to think -- it almost had to be -- I don't recall the law controlling it but most loan transactions at this time were done under New York law. Whether Gusinsky borrowed from Gazprom under that, I'm not sure. I just don't recall.

Q. I was just going to ask you in relation to Gazprom at page 43 of your CV G(B)5/1.00/43. We can see that, in relation to Gazprom, what you refer to is in connection with the divestiture of Mr Gusinsky's interest in NTV?

A. Yes.

Q. Is that the only transaction you were involved in dealing with for Gazprom?

A. Me personally, probably, yes. That's the only one I recall and it was a major transaction and I wanted to disclose the Gusinsky connection just because of what we're dealing with. There may have been other Gazprom transactions that were done in the office that I had some connection with. It would have been at Clifford, not at Coudert.

Q. What I would suggest to you, Professor Bean, is that in terms of the Russian companies that you are -- or the Russian clients that you were dealing with of Menatep, Inkombank, Renaissance Capital, Red October Chocolate Factory and even if you want to include Gazprom in relation to the Gusinsky transaction, what I would suggest to you is that's a fairly small sample size from which you seek to draw conclusions as to what Russian businessmen did or did not do?

- A. That's -- yes, that's -- it's certainly as small as one person can do working 16 hours a day for eight years, yes.
- Q. I think you understand the point that I'm making. I'm not suggesting you didn't work hard; what I'm suggesting to you is that by far the majority of the work that you were doing was on behalf of international companies investing into Russia, rather than dealing with Russian companies.
- A. Investing -- well now, I mean, when you add "investing into Russia", I mean, almost everything that we did for, let's see, certainly for Group Menatep was probably going the other way. But I take your point, that is to say you didn't come to Clifford Chance unless you needed high quality transactional advice that you could pay for.
- Q. Absolutely. Would you accept that even in respect of the Russian companies, and you've talked about Yukos, your contact with them was as a result of the fact that they had instructed Coudert or Clifford Chance and they wanted the expertise that international firms like that could provide?

I would suggest to you that that very fact alone probably indicates that they were wanting transactions which were documented in a formalised western way, possibly even extending to the use of offshore jurisdictions. Would you agree with that?

A. I would agree that they certainly wanted documentation, yes, and that almost everything involved something cross-border because that's how you did business so, yes, I would agree with that.

Q. What I would suggest to you is that your perception of what was normal Russian business practice may have been affected by the type of institution you were working for, which would have attracted clients that were seeking the specialisation that your firms provided, namely western documented transactions and offshore jurisdictions?

A. Yes. I mean, clearly that's part of it but, again, there weren't that many oligarchs or, you know, these super wealthy well-connected folks so, yes, but -- and I had a unique kind of relationship with one of them.

Q. But putting it round the other way, would you accept that a party who wished to acquire an interest in a business without documenting that interest would be highly unlikely to approach Coudert Brothers or Clifford Chance for their advice on that transaction?

A. At least highly unlikely, yes.

Q. So Professor Bean, what I put to you is that, attempting to determine what was or was not happening in Russian business circles through the prism of what you were experiencing at Coudert and Clifford Chance might leave you with a distorted and wrong perception. Would you agree with that?

A. I would not agree that my perception is distorted or wrong. My perception is based on my experience which involved the clients and conversations with other lawyers, but it's -- as I said, it certainly didn't relate to the kiosks on the street or, you know, transactions in Khabarovsk. That, we did not deal with, that's for sure.

Q. Would you accept that it may have given you a partial perception of the type of transactions and clients that were approaching?

A. It gave me a good view of the major -- the big deals. The little deals, the other deals, that's right. I would agree.

Q. What I would suggest to you is not just the little deals but the deals that were being done by people who were not seeking to do it in the Coudert Brothers or Clifford Chance way, and that was something that you would not be seeing, is that correct?

A. It is certainly true that I did not see the things that didn't come to Clifford or Coudert, yes, that's absolutely correct.

Q. Professor Bean, I want to move on but what I want to suggest to you is that, contrary to the impression that you may have received while in Moscow working at Coudert and Clifford Chance, there is evidence that Russian businessmen did make oral agreements between themselves, particularly where there was a close and trusting relationship between them, including for the purposes of concealing beneficial ownership.

A. I mean, you have my evidence and my view based on my experience. Obviously I never saw everything, that's correct.

Q. Can I just ask you about a few of these occasions. Professor Bean, I think you indicate that one of your four Russian private companies which you had as a client and from which you draw your conclusions was Group Menatep and the controlling shareholder of Yukos, is that correct?

A. Yes, but I mean, there weren't just four. There may only be four or five on this list, but yes -- but that's correct. And those were the -- you know, that was the major oligarch-related transaction, yes.

Q. There I think you indicate that you interreacted (sic) closely with Mr Khodorkovsky's associate Platon Lebedev?

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. Did you also have any dealings with Mr Nevzlin, who was at various times the president of Group Menatep and the vice president of Yukos?

A. Never. We were limited at Coudert to representing the Yukos shareholders, and despite my what I thought was fantastic experience in oil and gas, we never got any business from the oil operating company. That was another firm and they were religious about keeping those separate. So I never met Mr Nevzlin, no.

Q. Are you aware that Mr Nevzlin has given evidence in this action?

A. I think I did see a reference in the transcript, there was some video thing, yes, I think that's right.

Q. Could I ask that you be provided with bundle D1 at tab 4.

A. I have witness statement of Nevzlin, yes.

Q. Could you turn to paragraph 52, which is on page 71 D1/04/71.

A. Yes, page 71 or page 13. Okay, I have it.

Q. If you could read paragraph 52. (Pause)

A. Yes, I read that.

Q. Can you see there, Mr Nevzlin is saying that the relationship, and that's between Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, was very close, with each trusting the other one 100 per cent. Can you see that?

A. Yes. Yes I do.

Q. Then going on to paragraph 53, if you could read that.

(Pause)

A. Yes, I've read that.

Q. So there Mr Nevzlin is indicating that he would not be surprised if Mr Berezovsky's dealings with Mr Patarkatsishvili were not in writing.

Now, Professor Bean, I'm not wanting you to comment on the question of whether Mr Berezovsky or Mr Patarkatsishvili frequently did deals without anything in writing, that's obviously not for you. But what I would suggest to you is this: there is a significant difference between deals between different corporate groups, such as you typically would have been dealing with while at Coudert and Clifford Chance, and the types of dealings which were made between individuals with a close and trusting relationship of the nature referred to here. Would you agree with that?

A. Well, a comparable relationship existed between Mr Khodorkovsky and Mr Lebedev, whom I saw very regularly, and they had buried off in Gibraltar a very clearly documented relationship where I think Lebedev had 7 per cent of Yukos tracing down through all the corporate structures.

So nobody was closer than Lebedev and Khodorkovsky, maybe witnessed by the fact that they both stayed in jail together and neither one has tried to get out based on the other -- on testimony against the other, but I have no basis for commenting on the relationship between these two gentlemen.

Q. But Khodorkovsky was using Clifford Chance and Coudert and, in consequence, I would suggest to you highly likely that they would end up with those formalised off-shore arrangements?

A. To be clear, Clifford or Coudert had absolutely nothing to do with establishing those arrangements. I think they were done by Stephen Curtis, or somebody like that, for certain.

So we had nothing to do with it, and indeed, as I reported somewhere in my report, when the disclosure was made in connection with the proposed public offering of Yukos to be listed on the New York Stock Exchange, which I did work on for more than a year, and I had told Lebedev that the ultimate ownership of Yukos has to be disclosed completely or the SEC won't even read the first page. There's a footnote or a reference to the Moscow Times article --

Q. We've seen that.

A. That was news to me; how they held it offshore was news to everybody. But it was there, and it was there for --

I have no idea how long it was there.

So it was there, and we didn't do it, and these two guys couldn't be closer.

Q. And they chose to do it in a particular way, through Clifford Chance and Coudert --

A. Excuse me --

Q. Or Stephen Curtis.

A. Yes, or some of those guys, yes.

Q. All I wish to ask you is that, seeing the description of the relationship that existed between Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky, I don't think that your evidence is seeking to go so far as to exclude the possibility of oral agreements being made between them in the mid-1990s or even 2000?

A. I never met either of them so -- and I don't know them, and I didn't know much about them, frankly. So you're correct.

Q. Could I now just ask you to look at one point that arises on the evidence contained within the reports themselves. This is the Potanin interview which you refer to at paragraph 62.

A. My paragraph 62?

Q. Your paragraph 62, which we have at page 22

G(B)5/1.00/22.

Ah, yes, I remember this comment from Fortescue.

Q. Yes. So here you're referring to the contents of a 2010 interview with Mr Potanin, and maybe just so that we can understand the point you're addressing, maybe we should look at the relevant quote which we have at paragraph 278 of Mr Fortescue's first report which is at G(B)1, tab 1 at page 76 G(B)1/1.01/76.

A. 278, at page --

Q. It's paragraph 278 on page 76.

A. Yes.

Q. You see there that what Potanin says is that:

"Remember the 1990s, which from today's perspective looks like a time for Rome antics. Then we did deals, buying assets worth tens of millions of dollars, serious stuff. Sometimes our partners would carry out an operation and register the documents in their name, and then give us our agreed share."

Do you see that?

A. I do.

Q. Then Mr Potanin goes on to talk about two particular deals, and we can see that's OLBI and Mikrodin, where he goes on to say that the interests in those companies were held on behalf of his two business partners under oral agreements. Do you see that?

A. I do, yes.

Q. And Professor Fortescue has expressed the view that this interview with Mr Potanin, one of the most prominent 1990s oligarchs, is evidence that there was a practice then to enter into oral agreements with partners in major business ventures; that's the thrust of --

A. That's the thrust of Fortescue yes.

Q. I think your response to this, and if we can go back to paragraph 62 of your report G(B)5/1.00/22, is to say that this doesn't tell us that it was the practice of Russian businessmen to enter into oral agreements in the mid-1990s because the deals which Mr Potanin is referring to you say were done prior to the dissolution of the USSR. Is that correct?

A. I did say that, yes.

Q. Professor Bean, what I'm going to suggest to you is that this attempt to distinguish, if I can put it in that way, what Mr Potanin is saying is not properly founded, and the first reason is just to go back to look at what Mr Potanin is actually saying, and that one can see from paragraph 278 G(B)1/1.01/1. And I suggest to you, as one can see, he's saying:

"Remember the 1990s, which from today's perspective looks like a time for romantics."

Then he goes on to continue, to say what we've already looked at.

Professor Bean, I would suggest to you that regardless of the specific deals Mr Potanin goes on to refer to, it's quite clear that Mr Potanin is talking about the 1990s generally, and that his observations about how business was being done were not limited to the period before 1991. Would you like to comment on that?

- A. Yes, I would. OLBI and Mikrodin were both created in about 1987/88 and they were fully merged into Potanin's empire by 1995. So whatever is true about, whatever it means, "the 1990s", the Soviet Union disintegrated on December 25, 1991, certainly this should not refer to the entire ten-year span. I didn't get there until just about the time that the merger into his Interros, or whatever piece of his empire they put him in, occurred.

I guess if I were rewriting this now, I might focus a little more on when Mikrodin was created, for instance, and when the merger took place. But I don't think you can conclude from this that he was saying, you know, that the end of 1999 is the same as the beginning of 1990.

- Q. But are you accepting it up to 1995?

- A. I am accepting that that's when the transaction took place. It was before -- well, almost all of that '90s was before I got there, and, you know, Mr Potanin was saying whatever he was saying. If we really wanted to know I suppose we would ask Potanin.

Q. Well, we'll come to look at OLBI and Mikrodin, but what I would suggest to you is that it's quite clear that, contrary to what you suggest in your report, Mr Potanin is not referring to the period during the Soviet Union, he is talking about the 1990s, and making it quite clear that during that period they were doing transactions on the basis of oral agreements.

A. Well, three years of the 1990s were under the Soviet Union, and two years afterwards were under Russia and then the merger, so, I mean, you're welcome to read Mr Potanin's statement as referring to 1999. I know that OLBI and Mikrodin were created long before.

Q. I think the Soviet Union was 1991, wasn't it, the end of the Soviet Union?

A. Okay, I'm sorry, 20 per cent.

Q. But let's leave that aside.

Can we then just look at what you suggest about the transactions themselves, and in paragraph 62, subparagraph 1, as we've seen, you're saying that the transactions that are referred to predate the end of the Soviet Union, and you give a citation to support that G(B)5/1.00/22.

A. Yes.

Q. That, I think, we have at tab 27 to your report?

A. Yes.

Q. This is a citation to an article from the website
"Kompromat RU".

A. Not one I particularly rely on.

Q. I was going to suggest, it's not a particularly reputable source, is it?

A. I agree completely.

Q. It doesn't mean that the information it gives is necessarily wrong.

The passage I was wanting to refer to in -- well, maybe you could just remind yourself of the article if you feel the need to, but the passage that I wanted to look at in particular was on the second page under "Dossier".

A. Mm-hm.

Q. The first point that I was wanting to make to you about the --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Could you give me a reference, please?

MR GILLIS: I'm sorry, it's G(B)5/1.27, page 211

G(B)5/1.27/211.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR GILLIS: The first point that I was wanting to ask you about in relation to this source, this document makes no reference at all to the second company that Mr Potanin refers to, OLBI, that's correct, isn't it?

A. That seems to be correct, yes.

Q. So in terms of relying upon this as a source for showing that Mr Potanin was referring to transactions in the Soviet period, it doesn't actually support that proposition, does it?

A. One way or the other, no, it doesn't, that's right.

Q. In relation to OLBI?

A. Yes.

Q. The second point I wanted to ask you about is in relation to Mikrodin, and on the first page, the third full paragraph, do you see that refers to the foundation of Mikrodin being in 1989?

A. Yes, okay.

Q. But more significantly, when we go over on to the second page, under the heading "Dossier", it refers to a series of business ventures of Mikrodin up to 1997, do you see that?

A. I see '92, I see '95, but I'll accept -- I mean, it clearly goes beyond --

Q. I think the reference to:

"... two years later the plant lost ..."

Do you see that? It's talking up to 1997.

A. Ah, yes, okay, I'm sorry. It's at the very end of that paragraph.

Q. Yes.

A. Yes, I see that.

Q. So what I would suggest to you is that there's nothing in this document which, contrary to your suggestion, dates the agreement that Mr Potanin is referring to as being in the Soviet era, would you agree with that?

A. Well, I guess my point in dredging up this document was that it clearly started in the Soviet era, that Mikrodin was operating in the Soviet era. There's nothing in here that explains that Mikrodin and Potanin were at the same time investing in ZIL, but -- I mean, yes.

Is this a great source? No. Could I have found a better one? Maybe. Not in the time I had, but yes.

Q. I'm not complaining about the quality of the source. What I am doing is just looking at your attempt to suggest that when Mr Potanin is referring to the 1990s, in actual fact he's mistaken in that, and he's referring to Soviet deals.

What I would suggest to you is that there is nothing here that indicates that the agreement that Potanin is talking about is a Soviet deal but could be a deal done any time between 1990 and 1997.

A. Actually earlier than 1990, but -- and I'm not sure about the 1997, because I know the merger occurred in I think September of '95, but, I mean, except the fact that in 1990 we were still in Soviet time.

I agree, this does not completely support what I said, and I apologise for that if that's a problem. But I guess it doesn't say that the practice that Potanin is referring to continued throughout the '90s, and it may have. It may have. But this doesn't say it and I never saw it.

Q. Thank you. Well, we've seen what Mr Potanin said himself --

A. This is true.

Q. -- when he was describing it as being how they were doing business in the 1990s.

A. In a journalistic report, yes.

Q. Could I move on, and what I'd like very quickly to consider is some of the evidence in the action, and try to understand, in the light of that evidence, the consequence it may have on the views you've expressed.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, I think well do that at 2 o'clock.

MR GILLIS: I'm obliged.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well.

You mustn't talk to anybody about your evidence --

THE WITNESS: I understand, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: -- or communicate with anybody about it over the break.

Very well, 2 o'clock.

(12.59 pm)

(The short adjournment)

(2.00 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Gillis.

MR GILLIS: Professor Bean, could I please ask that you be provided with bundle E4, open at tab 1. This is a witness statement served on behalf of Mr Abramovich, given by Mr Bulygin, a former senior Rusal executive and an associate of Mr Deripaska.

One of the things which Mr Bulygin gives evidence about is the making of the merger agreement in 2000 which led to the creation of Rusal. In that context, could I ask you to look at paragraph 10 which we have on page 4 E4/01/4. You will see there that he's talking about negotiations between Mr Deripaska and Mr Abramovich which he says took place in Moscow at the end of February or in early March 2000. That's at paragraph 10, do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. Then going over to paragraph 11, page 5 E4/01/5, what Mr Bulygin says is this:

"The discussions concluded by around 4.00am or 5.00am. Mr Abramovich then proposed that we should all travel to his home in Sareevo Village to celebrate the merger. I very much had the impression that, so far as Mr Abramovich was concerned, the deal had now been reached and there was no need to document our agreement straightaway. He seemed to think that a handshake was enough."

Do you see that?

A. Yes.

Q. So his evidence was that Mr Abramovich appeared to consider that an oral agreement was binding, although I should make clear that they did proceed to document it subsequently. All right?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, Professor Bean, what I would suggest to you is this, that unless Mr Bulygin's evidence is wrong it would tend to suggest, contrary to the impression that you may have received at Coudert and Clifford Chance, that Russian businesspeople, even in 2000, did regard oral agreements as binding. Would you agree?

A. No. I mean, yes, we have the two principals, these are the principal principals, and they are negotiating a transaction and they come to agreement on the principal terms and they have a handshake. That deal is done, and that must happen in Texas and New York and probably in England.

But then the ministerial work, which isn't going to be done in a couple of hours but more likely a couple of weeks, the lawyers will document the transaction.

That's absolutely typical. I've been in both kinds of meetings, and it doesn't surprise me at all. I'm not sure what Bulygin was saying. For sure, the principal thought the deal was done because they had an agreement on the important terms. I don't know that -- I mean, if I had been there, I would have said, "Well, okay, that's the principal terms, now we're going to document it." But of course it doesn't say that there.

Q. What I suggest to you it's indicating is that, so far as they were concerned, once the oral agreement had been concluded the agreement was binding?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Gillis, again, I think this is asking the witness to comment on a factual situation. You've put the point to him, he's answered it. At the end of the day these are all matters for me to decide.

MR GILLIS: I'll move on.

Can I then just take you to another piece of Mr Abramovich's evidence, just to see how this fits with your view.

Professor Bean, it was Mr Abramovich's oral evidence that in 2003 he made an oral agreement with Mr Deripaska regarding the terms on which he would sell the half of Rusal that he controlled, and that he considered himself bound by that, notwithstanding the fact that it was not reflected in the contractual documentation.

A. It wasn't ever reflected, or it wasn't -- I mean, when they had the meeting, obviously, it wasn't.

Q. I'll show you what Mr Abramovich indicated. And his position seemed to be that he was bound by an oral agreement even though it was contrary to what was subsequently documented.

But, my Lady, this is --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, again, with the greatest of respect to Professor Bean, I'm not going to be assisted by his comments on a particular factual situation. You put to him that there may be circumstances in which people agree oral agreements, and I'm sure he'd accept that. But with the greatest of respect to him, his views on whether or not there was a deal and, if so, whether it was subject to contract, a current agreement subject to a condition subsequent that had to be completed, is not going to help me on the aspects of the matter I don't think.

MR GILLIS: I'll move on then.

One final point then, Professor Bean. In your evidence you assert, and I think maybe we can see this most clearly at paragraph 50 of your report, this is at page 19.

A. Yes, I have it G(B)5/1.00/19.

Q. There in the second sentence you say:

"Arrangements intended to be legally enforceable were not expressed only as oral agreements."

Do you see that?

A. Second sentence? Oh, yes, I'm sorry, I was on the third sentence. Yes, I see that.

Q. And you make the same point at various other places in your report where you say oral agreements were not intended to be legally binding. Do you recall that?

A. I do.

Q. Professor Bean, would you not accept that that is far too dogmatic a statement?

A. I would not accept that, no. I mean, these were exactly the people that knew the Russian court system better than I, better than you. They were the people that knew that especially early, and regrettably still today, it is possible to influence the judiciary. So if you really wanted something enforced, legally enforced, as I think that's the phrase here, you would document it.

And pursuant to what I've said before, in my experience you would document it and you would do everything you could to make sure that the dispute resolution clause was for offshore resolution, whether it was arbitration or courts.

- Q. What I had understood you to be suggesting by this statement is that oral agreements were not intended to be legally binding in the sense that there was no intention to create legal relations. Is that not the point you're seeking to make?
- A. I'm not sure I follow the question, because when two principals are there and they make a deal, they think they're bound, they think the deal has been completed, we've got the price, we've got the terms and we know the asset that's to be exchanged or whatever. Then the lawyers document it, and if they can document it, there's no problem. If there's an issue that the lawyers can't agree on, you go back to the principals. The principals have always assumed that the deal was the deal, and if the darn lawyers can't make it work then we'll think about it again. But --
- Q. Professor Bean, I'm sure that's the experience that you have from Coudert and Clifford Chance where these transactions were all heavily documented. I'm just looking at the question of if there was an oral agreement made between the parties, and you seem to be saying in paragraph 50 that the mere fact that it was an oral agreement as opposed to a documented agreement of itself indicated that it was not intended to be legally enforceable. Now, if that's not the point you're making then I don't need to pursue the point.

A. All right, legally enforceable to me meant that you might have to go to court. That's what I'm trying to say there. If it's "I'll meet you tomorrow morning and we'll, you know, have breakfast together", that's an oral agreement and it's not intended to be legally enforceable. That's what I was trying to say here, perhaps I should have been more elaborate.

Q. Well, Professor Bean, what I would suggest to you is that the question of whether the parties to an oral agreement intended to be legally binding is going to be dependent upon the specific facts of the case, would you agree with that?

A. For sure, absolutely, yes.

Q. Might I just have a moment. (Pause)

So, as I understand it, you're not suggesting that the mere fact that the agreement is an oral agreement necessarily means that it was not intended to be legally binding?

A. Too many negatives in that.

Q. I think you're probably right.

You're not suggesting that simply because it is an oral agreement, that indicates that it is not intended to be legally binding?

A. Well, you can't have a documented legally binding agreement before you have an oral agreement. I mean, that's just not how it works.

Q. If you could just stick with an oral agreement.

A. Okay, we have an oral agreement, "I'll see you for breakfast tomorrow".

Q. No. Take it in the context of a commercial arrangement, and an oral agreement has been made in relation to a commercial arrangement. You are not suggesting the mere fact that it is only oral, and has not been documented, necessarily means that it was not intended to be legally binding?

A. You still have three "nots" here.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Never mind, just answer the question, please.

A. I guess the answer is yes, that's correct.

MR GILLIS: Thank you.

My Lady, I have no further questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, thank you.

Ms Davies?

MS DAVIES: I have no questions for this witness, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Adkin.

Re-examination by MR ADKIN

MR ADKIN: Just one piece of re-examination, my Lady.

Could you please go to [draft] page 84 of the transcript, you may need to be helped to get back there.

If you could be taken, please, to [draft] page 84, line 22.

A. Yes.

Q. If you wouldn't mind reading from there to [draft] page 85, line 5. (Pause)

A. Okay, I think I've read it all.

Q. Thank you. Could you please take your report and turn to page 22. For the transcript, that's G(B)5/1.00/22.

A. Yes, I have that.

Q. The footnote at the bottom of the page, footnote 24, is that the footnote that you were referring to?

A. Yes, that is the footnote that I was referring to.

MR ADKIN: Thank you very much, Professor Bean.

My Lady, I have no further questions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much indeed, Professor Bean, for coming to give your evidence and assisting the court.

(The witness withdrew)

MR GILLIS: My Lady, I think that is the evidence completed.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much.

Housekeeping

MR GILLIS: I think we now adjourn until two weeks today for Mr Sumption's oral closing.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. So that's December 19, Monday.

MR GILLIS: I think that's correct.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: At what time do you want to start then?

MS DAVIES: My Lady, I'm sure Mr Sumption would start at whatever time my Ladyship wishes. I understand he doesn't anticipate being more than two days, in fact he anticipates being less than two days, so there's no pressure on time.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Shall we start at 10.30 then?

Does that suit you?

MR GILLIS: I'm obliged.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You won't be able to get access to the room on Wednesday of this week, or you may not be able to get access to the room on Wednesday of this week, so if you forget anything today when your clerks clear away you will need to come and get it tomorrow. I mean, you'll be allowed back in on Thursday, but I anticipate there may be a difficulty on Wednesday --

MR GILLIS: My Lady, if we could just clarify.

MS DAVIES: Yes, my Lady, we had understood we didn't need to clear the court.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, you don't need to clear it.

I would be grateful if you could tidy it up because this is one of the rooms into which her Majesty is actually coming to see the courtroom. So if it looks -- I would like to have everything here because it looks a bit more real world, but I think if you could just sort of tidy it up a tiny bit.

MS DAVIES: We will certainly tidy around us.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, the only point I was making was not a tidy away point, it's just that you might have a problem getting in here on the Wednesday.

MR GILLIS: Can we ask, do all of the desks need to be cleared?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No.

MR GILLIS: In other words, is the court being used?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, the court is not being used. It's just because they have to have the detectives, or whatever, in here on Wednesday morning but the court -- oh, right, you mean is the court being used in the next two weeks?

MR GILLIS: Yes.

MS DAVIES: Our understanding, the enquiries we've made of the Commercial Court, is that it's not and we can leave the computers and the files. There may be a different issue --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That's certainly my understanding but I'll go and check and get my clerk to confirm the position to you one way or the other. That's certainly my understanding.

MS DAVIES: There may be an issue about the first week of January, and we're still trying to ascertain that, because obviously it would be more convenient if at all possible to leave all the technology rather than having to clear it between 21 December and 17 January.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I can see that.

MS DAVIES: But we're seeking to ascertain that position.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. Are we going to need a big court for January?

MR GILLIS: I suspect there will be quite a lot of press interest.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I expect there will be. Let me check that.

Certainly I would be very reluctant if you were required to clear away between now and --

MS DAVIES: Certainly we have been told -- we have been asked to tidy, and we understood that, but we have been told we can leave certainly the computer and the files, and we were hoping to negotiate the same position for January because --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Particularly because we're going to need to have the simultaneous translation booth, so I can't see that there's going to be any realistic prospect of us having -- but I suppose it may be possible that in January they want to -- no, because they're not going to use it the week before.

MS DAVIES: There's about four court days in between, because my Lady --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I'm on compensatory leave.

MS DAVIES: But literally the process of rewiring the courtroom and everything itself is obviously time-consuming, so if at all possible --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm sure we won't have to, but I'll get my clerk to email you with confirmation that you don't have to -- well, hopefully that you don't have to move.

MR GILLIS: I'm obliged.

My Lady, one would have thought that as long as the desks have been cleared of papers, even if the courtroom is being used, the screens, the computers can stay.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, I can't imagine they'll want to use it for four days because it's booked to us.

Very well, so 10.30 on Monday, the 19th.

Remind me, what is the date by which I ordered submissions to be filed?

MS DAVIES: My Lady, our submissions are due to be filed this Friday at 4.30, and my learned friends' the following Friday, the 16th, again at 4.30.

Is there a particular means by which my Lady would prefer us to file them?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, just electronically and, if they're going to be lengthy, which I anticipate they will be, perhaps I could have hard copies as well.

MS DAVIES: Of course.

MR GILLIS: My Lady, I think the Chancery defendants' submissions are this Friday as well.

MR MALEK: No.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, they're the same as yours.

Very well. I'll adjourn the case then until 10.30 on Monday, the 19th.

(2.20 pm)

(The hearing adjourned until Monday, 19 December 2011 at 10.30 am)

(10.15 am)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Sumption.

I thank all counsel for the delivery of the skeleton arguments.

Closing submissions by MR SUMPTION

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, certainly so far as we're concerned, the essence of our case is contained in that document but there is of course a very large number of issues in this case and many of them only arise on the parties' alternative or further alternative cases, so I am not, on my feet, going to even attempt to deal with all of them, which is the function of the written document.

What I would like to do, if I may, is to deal with those issues, mainly of fact, which seem in practice most likely to determine the outcome, to try where I can to offer a pathway through the conflicting claims and to address the main points of principle which are taken from Mr Berezovsky's own written closing.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

Just before you start, the letter from your solicitors dated 16 December, which I saw referred to in the press today, I don't know how that's got into the press, but unless any party is going to take any point on it I wasn't proposing to say anything about it.

MR SUMPTION: No. I don't know the answer to the question of how it got into the press.

My Lady, the issue which is fundamental to the whole of the present claim, in our submission, is what were the terms on which Mr Berezovsky agreed in 1995 to make available to Mr Abramovich his political influence in the Kremlin. It is common ground that that is what Mr Berezovsky actually did, and indeed what he agreed to do. This was, in other words, a trade in political influence.

It seems equally clear that Mr Berezovsky contributed nothing else to the Sibneft project apart from his political influence in the Kremlin and possibly his initial contacts with senior members of the management of SBS Bank and Menatep Group.

Mr Berezovsky does not claim to have contributed cash. If he had any management expertise in this area of business he certainly does not claim to have contributed it to the Sibneft project, and he assumed no financial risk of his own.

The question is whether his agreed reward for what he did was to be a share of Sibneft or straight cash. If the answer to that question is that Mr Berezovsky was doing this for cash, then that is, in our submission, not only the end of his claim in respect of Sibneft, it is also the end of his claim in respect of Rusal. The reason for that is that Mr Berezovsky's claim to have had an interest in Rusal is intimately dependent on his theory that he and Mr Patarkatsishvili had previously owned half of the aluminium assets which were contributed to the merger with Mr Deripaska. That suggestion in turn depends upon his contention that there was an agreement to give him the same interest in the pre-merger aluminium assets as he claims to have had in Sibneft. It is also, of course, a case which depends upon his contention that the aluminium assets were acquired with Sibneft assets or out of his, Mr Berezovsky's, supposed share in Sibneft profits.

So if Mr Berezovsky never had a share of Sibneft or its profits all of these arguments fall away. As a matter of fact, they fall away anyway even if he did have a share of Sibneft profits, for other reasons. I will come to the other reasons, but the point which I make at this stage is that unless Mr Berezovsky can establish at the outset that the agreement of 1995 gave him an interest of some relevant kind in Sibneft, then the whole of this elaborate confection of mutually supporting arguments, by which he claims to have acquired a large proportion of the Russian oil and aluminium industries without paying a penny for them, simply collapses.

Now, the alleged threats in relation to ORT and then Sibneft, the Devonia agreement, the Dorchester Hotel meeting, the terms of the second tranche of the Rusal sale in 2004, all of those issues have taken up days of court time but none of them arises unless he is right on this issue. Now, if he can make good his claim about the terms of the 1995 agreement, that is in our submission only the beginning of his problems.

On the Sibneft side he would then have to show, first of all, that he was blackmailed into selling his supposed interest in Sibneft; secondly, that he sold his interest in Sibneft to Devonia by a real contract and not just a sham device designed to deceive the Clydesdale Bank; and thirdly, if the tort claim is governed by Russian law, he must also establish that the Russian limitation period falls to be extended or not applied at all on the ground of personal disability or abuse of rights under the Russian Civil Code.

On the Rusal side, if he succeeds in his case on the terms of the 1995 agreement, then he has to show principally, first, that it was at some stage agreed to share out the KrAZ and Bratsk assets on the terms of the 1995 agreement, assuming that there was a 1995 agreement in the terms alleged; secondly, he has to show either that it was agreed at the Dorchester Hotel that Mr Berezovsky's share would be held by Mr Abramovich as trustee of an English law trust, or else that English law applies as a matter of legal implication. He has to show that because it is common ground that, if Russian law applies, then, one, the arrangements by which Mr Berezovsky claims he held his indirect interest in Rusal were legally ineffective, and, two, that any Rusal claim is time-barred in Russian law.

The third thing that he would have to show on the Rusal side is that there was some breach of duty on the part of Mr Abramovich in selling the Rusal shares to Mr Deripaska. Unless those shares were subject to a trust, that will depend on his establishing that everybody agreed at the Dorchester Hotel meeting that nobody should be entitled to sell out without the consent of the others.

Fourth, Mr Berezovsky has to show on the Rusal side that there is some reason why the mutual releases in the contractual documentation of July 2004 should not be given effect according to their terms if, as he says, he was a real principal behind those agreements.

Now, all of these questions, with the exception of the last one, are questions of fact. All of them depend critically on Mr Berezovsky's evidence about occasions of which there is no documentary evidence.

In the face, in our submission, of a large number of anomalies about Mr Berezovsky's story, your Ladyship would have to have a very high degree of confidence in the quality of his recollection and in his objectivity and truthfulness as a witness in order to accept that case. Now, there are in fact quite serious problems about the way that Mr Berezovsky has set about devising his case and giving his evidence. Some of these apply also to the evidence of his supporting witnesses, in particular Dr Nosova and Mr Glushkov.

In our submission, Mr Berezovsky was a persistently and deliberately untruthful witness. There are so many occasions when he can be shown to have made up the facts in which he had no positive belief or which he positively knew to be false, but it is simply not possible to take his word for anything without proper corroboration independent of Mr Berezovsky himself.

Now, in the first place, there is the regular pattern by which Mr Berezovsky molds his allegations of fact to what he thinks he needs to prove. Thus, Mr Berezovsky is told that Russian law does not recognise equitable proprietary interests. Behold his case about what was agreed in 1995 changes to suit a different case, that his rights were purely contractual. References to beneficial interests and the like are deleted from the pleading.

Mr Berezovsky thinks, in fact wrongly, that in 1995 he and Mr Patarkatsishvili, or companies controlled by them, were the legal owners of Sibneft shares. So in order to explain how they ended up with Mr Abramovich's companies, he claims that there was an express agreement in 1996 to transfer them to Mr Abramovich to be held for them. It subsequently turns out that Mr Abramovich's companies always held the shares, so Mr Berezovsky's case about the 1996 agreement suddenly changes to accommodate this new fact.

He is told that threats are not actionable if they are merely warnings about what a third party will do. At once, he claims to have understood that what was said to him at Cap d'Antibes in December 2000, and at Munich to Mr Patarkatsishvili in May 2001, was understood by him as a threat to procure the Russian State to act against his interests.

In his press statements from 2003 onwards, Mr Berezovsky claims that Mr Abramovich had made him sell out of Sibneft by telling him that the association of Mr Berezovsky with the company was exposing the company itself to attacks by the state.

That remained Mr Berezovsky's position right up to the second edition of the particulars of claim served in September 2007 when he seems to have realised that it was unlikely to be regarded as a threat of adverse action by Mr Abramovich because he would hardly wish to damage the interests of his own company. So the threat suddenly becomes something different, namely a threat not against the company but against Mr Berezovsky's interest in it.

He realises then that it's going to be difficult to persuade an English court that English law applied to the arrangements made about aluminium in 2000, and he is told that under Russian law his claim against Rusal is bound to fail, as he now concedes as a matter of Russian law. So he suddenly says, in the face of a striking out application, that he distinctly recalls conversations in which the parties expressly chose English law.

Now, that a party's case should develop and call for amendment in the course of complex litigation is perfectly normal, and the forensic indignation that it often provokes is usually bogus. That I entirely accept. But the persistence with which Mr Berezovsky's recollection of the facts varies as a direct response to his changing understanding of what he needs to prove is too striking to be ignored.

A particularly remarkable example of his rather special attitude to truth is provided by his conduct of the Forbes litigation in which his relations with the Kremlin were also under scrutiny. Mr Berezovsky made statements of truth denying that he had ever lobbied Boris Yeltsin or made use of Yeltsin's daughter, Tatyana Dyachenko, as a channel of influence. Both of these propositions are admitted, indeed asserted in the present litigation; the only difference, which is relevant, between the Forbes action and this one is that it suited him to say different things in each case.

In the Forbes case, Mr Berezovsky was suing a journal for libel for accusing him of being corrupt, so it suited him to say that he'd never lobbied Mr Yeltsin or used Mr Yeltsin's daughter as a channel of influence. In this litigation, he is trying to prove that his influence at the Kremlin was the key that unlocked all doors to Mr Abramovich, so it suits him to say precisely the opposite.

He has absolutely nothing to say in his own defence when taxed with this. His answers range from "It's a good question" to "I don't have an answer" or "I can't say anything". The references to that evidence are matters that your Ladyship will find at page 11, note 3 of our written opening.

Mr Berezovsky is a man for whom the truth is whatever serves the purposes of the moment. In the course of his cross-examination, whenever he felt the need to do so to sustain his case, he would contradict his pleadings, his instructions, as recorded by the successive solicitors who have acted for him, the statements made by him in countless interviews, transactions which bear his signature, his witness statement for the trial, indeed on a large number of occasions oral evidence that he had given only minutes before.

Now, I don't want to be unfair to Mr Berezovsky. Not all of these falsehoods are necessarily dishonest. Some of them are attributable to Mr Berezovsky's truly prodigious powers of self-deception.

A large part of this problem, which colours the whole of his evidence in this case, is his vanity and his self-obsession. Mr Berezovsky has found it very difficult to accept that, for all his former importance as a power broker and for all the great wealth that he has obtained by that means, in business terms he was a relatively marginal player. He has a constant and palpable desire to portray himself as the central indispensable figure in every venture that he has touched.

In the case of the aluminium deals in early 2000, the contrast between the pretensions and the reality is humiliating. If I may pursue the Shakespearian analogy just once more, here is Glendower in Henry IV Part I, "I can summon spirits from the vasty deep". "Yes," says Hotspur, "but will they come?"

But if that is part of the problem it's certainly not the whole of it, for a great deal of Mr Berezovsky's evidence can frankly only be described as dishonest. The Forbes lies are one example. Another, which is one of the issues that your Ladyship has to decide, is the sale of ORT and the supposed threats made at Cap d'Antibes in December 2000.

The whole of this issue is extremely odd. Having decided that he couldn't bring a claim in respect of ORT, there was in fact absolutely no reason for Mr Berezovsky to say anything about it. Instead, what he did was artificially and quite gratuitously to introduce the ORT occasion into this case, which he did by contending that because of Mr Abramovich's behaviour at Cap d'Antibes, he regarded Mr Abramovich's warnings about what the state would do to him if he didn't sell out of Sibneft as an indirect threat of adverse action by Mr Abramovich himself.

Yet the evidence that has been given at this trial shows that the Cap d'Antibes meeting is a fabrication.

What Mr Berezovsky appears to have done was to work back from the date of the ORT sale agreements of 25 December 2000, and to fabricate a meeting a few days before that at which he says that he was bullied into agreeing the sale of ORT by threats to expropriate his interest and to ensure that Mr Glushkov rotted in jail for a long time.

The facts show that the ORT transaction had been under active negotiations since October, well before Mr Glushkov's arrest, and had been approved by Mr Berezovsky at the latest at the time of the Le Bourget meeting of 6 December. Even on Mr Berezovsky's own evidence, he decided to sell ORT within minutes of hearing about Mr Glushkov's arrest from his lawyers on 7 December 2000.

He is then presented with irrefutable evidence that at the time when he says that Mr Abramovich was blackmailing him in Cap d'Antibes, Mr Abramovich was actually at Chukotka and Mr Berezovsky himself was holding press conferences in Washington and skiing in Colorado.

So we are told, a couple of weeks before the trial, that actually the meeting happened earlier in December, and then we are told in the course of Mr Berezovsky's cross-examination that he has an actual recollection, of which he says he is almost 100 per cent confident, of Mr Abramovich turning up at Cap d'Antibes on 7 December itself followed by Mr Patarkatsishvili on whose plane he had flown down from Paris.

Now, in cases like this one, one can actually observe Mr Berezovsky making up the facts as he goes along. It would be ridiculous if the allegations which he is making were less serious, but what he is actually alleging is that my client deliberately used his supposed influence in the Kremlin to keep a sick man in jail so as to blackmail his victim's closest friend. That is a very serious allegation.

In fact, Mr Berezovsky went further, because he also suggested that Mr Abramovich had actually arranged for Mr Glushkov to be arrested after failing to get Mr Berezovsky's signature on a sale contract at the Le Bourget meeting. Now, that particular allegation required Mr Berezovsky to resile from his own evidence given in his witness statement and in his evidence in various asylum proceedings that Mr Glushkov's arrest had been a foregone conclusion for five weeks before it actually happened.

Mr Glushkov himself, who had given similar evidence beforehand about the circumstances of his arrest, sat in the back of the court while Mr Berezovsky was giving that evidence and then came into the witness box and performed a similar volte face himself. Mr Berezovsky's written closing says nothing at all about this discreditable aspect of his and Mr Glushkov's evidence, and that discretion seems, with respect, to be appropriate.

This ORT episode, which was introduced to the case in order to give verisimilitude to the threat said to have been made afterwards in relation to Sibneft has therefore become the extreme test of Mr Berezovsky's personal credibility. What it shows is two things. First of all, it shows that some of the more serious allegations made by Mr Berezovsky in this action have been made, it seems, for show. He wants to make a point against the Russian Government, he wants to discredit a man who he believes, in fact wrongly, to have supplanted him by occupying the sort of position in the Kremlin of Mr Putin that Mr Berezovsky himself once occupied under Boris Yeltsin.

But the second thing this shows is that nothing that Mr Berezovsky says can be taken at face value simply on his own say-so. And in a case where so much does depend on Mr Berezovsky's say-so, that is a very significant problem.

I would suggest by comparison that Mr Abramovich was a measured and thoughtful witness. He made concessions where they were due, for example about the backdating of documents. He was not looking for opportunities to embarrass or humiliate Mr Berezovsky, as your Ladyship may recall from his refusal to discuss one aspect of his conversation with Mr Berezovsky at Megeve, and from the very low-key way in which, in his evidence in cross-examination, he referred to Mr Berezovsky's attire at the Dorchester Hotel meeting, until I pressed him to expand on it in re-examination, because it is of course relevant to the question of how significant and businesslike that meeting really was.

Now, we have called every one of Mr Abramovich's staff who was concerned with these matters, as well as a number of witnesses independent of Mr Abramovich, such as Mr Deripaska and Mr Hauser. Their evidence has been broadly consistent. They have been attacked in my learned friends' written closing on the basis that they are loyal employees of Mr Abramovich, as if that somehow meant that they were likely to tell lies for his benefit. They have been attacked on the basis that they have discussed their evidence in the course of preparing their witness statements, but that of course is a practice to which no possible objection can be taken provided that the witness applies his own mind to his evidence and distinguishes between what he can recall and what he has learned from someone else.

Dr Nosova in fact described a very similar process within the inner circle of Mr Berezovsky's advisers, the attempt to reconstruct events from documents, which is exactly what one would expect to happen. But the result is a defence to the claim which we put forward, and which I submit has been impressive in its detail, and which has sought to inform the court in as much detail as possible about what happened.

By comparison, Mr Berezovsky's evidence has been presented at an imperial level of generality and most of his supporting witnesses have been giving derivative evidence based on their conversations with him about matters of which they had little or no direct evidence of their own.

The only other general point which I would make at this stage about the evidence concerns Mr Berezovsky's surprising suggestion at paragraph 173 of his written closing, that there has been a deliberate policy on our part of destroying documents in order, it is said, to impede investigations into Mr Abramovich's dealings.

Now, that is, in our submission, an extravagant allegation which should not have been made without better support than that document actually provides.

The selective references which appear in that paragraph to Ms Goncharova's evidence leave out her detailed explanation of why she destroyed documents at a time when this action had not been begun and there was no business need to keep them. This is, of course, as your Ladyship is aware, a stale claim, and the companies involved have over the years been dissolved or sold and matters have moved on well before the action started.

The delay in disclosing the bolshoi balance, another subject of a prolonged bleat in this part of the claimant's submissions, was due, as we have explained on a number of occasions, to the need to translate the spreadsheet from Russian and to get detailed explanations, which were quite complex, of each line of it in order to establish which parts were disclosable. In the event it was disclosed in its entirety and all of this was fully explained, among other places, in annex 11 of our written opening.

Mr Abramovich has no diaries for the relevant period, mobile phone records only go back to four years. All this has been fully explained in long and tedious correspondence between the solicitors.

As for the, I would suggest, extraordinary allegation appearing at paragraphs 185 to 193 of those submissions, that Mr Abramovich has manufactured the evidence that shows that he was in Chukotka between 10 and 26 December, since it is not disputed that he was in Chukotka in that period, I really fail to understand in what sense that evidence is supposed to have been misleading.

Now, my Lady, we are well aware that all witnesses make mistakes, they forget, they confuse different occasions, they persuade themselves of things. It is in the nature of the process and of the passage of time that this happens. But if this is the best that Mr Berezovsky's team can do to undermine the integrity of our evidence, then your Ladyship may take it that it is on the whole a fair presentation of the facts so far as they can now be ascertained many years later.

I want to start, if I may, with the issue which I have suggested is fundamental to the entire case, for Mr Berezovsky has to succeed on it to get either of his two claims off the ground. What was he getting in return for the political influence that he agreed to exercise within Boris Yeltsin's administration in 1995?

Now, I ought to say something at the outset about the whole concept of krysha. Krysha is an alternative system of obligation. It's the classic product of a society where businessmen cannot count on the protection of the law, either because the law is itself defective or because the administrative and judicial agencies charged with applying it simply cannot be relied upon. It is common ground among the historical evidence witnesses that that was the situation in Russia at the time with which we are concerned. It is the experience of almost all societies that where there is no law, relationships are governed instead by power.

The existence of that phenomenon does not appear to be disputed. The point was in fact succinctly put by Mr Berezovsky's historical expert, Professor Fortescue, I don't propose to make a habit of citing chunks of documents or reports, but it is worth turning up this one at G(B)1/1.01/52, which is Professor Fortescue's first report.

Does your Ladyship have that on the Magnum screen?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR SUMPTION: Paragraphs 188 to 190:

"The term first came into use in everyday usage in Russia in the early to mid-1990s when the world was taken over by racketeers and took on criminal overtones. In that context, it meant 'protection'. Protection racketeering was a very large part of the activities of criminal gangs in the 1990s although with all the violent and involuntary connotations of the word protection, a criminal krysha was likely to also provide services beyond the immediate one of keeping other criminal groups away from your business. These included debt collection, ie contract enforcement, and conflict resolution. In the absence of an effective state, the krysha fulfilled some of the functions of the state, and collected tax for doing so.

"As I noted above, in the late 1990s the Russian state began to assert itself and to operate more effectively. This not only reduced the role of criminal groups but also led to a new application of the word krysha (which was not in general usage in the early and mid-1990s). It was now bureaucrats and politicians who provided a krysha. Like the criminal gangs, they also provided protection from a business person's enemies and competitors. They also advanced the interests of their business client within the bureaucracy and political arena and were well remunerated for doing so. Volkov says of this more recent usage of the word krysha that:

"'In current Russian business parlance [it] is used to refer to agencies that provide institutional services to economic agents irrespective of the legal status of providers and clients. Such agencies are not necessarily criminal groups but are composed of a variety of criminal, semilegal (informal), legal, and state organisations.'

"Used in this way, the term krysha does not carry the necessary implication that the services in question will be criminal or illegal."

Now, the basic concept therefore does not appear to be substantially disputed. Another briefer account of it appears in the article in the Economist, which your Ladyship may recall my referring to in the course of Mr Berezovsky's cross-examination, where it's observed that businessmen know that their best protection is not law but their krysha, a well-connected power broker.

Now, as far as the power broker is concerned, this is a system for trading inside influence within government for cash. The functions of the protector, on the strength of the evidence that your Ladyship has heard in this case, are essentially these. First of all, to procure favourable treatment for the protege's interests in the formulation of state policy or the exercise of state discretions. Secondly, to protect his client against arbitrary action by state authorities. And third, in some cases most significant of all, to provide the client with a known and visible link to influence and power whose mere existence provided that it is sufficiently public will serve to deter adverse action against him by third parties.

This is not a kind of contract for services. It certainly isn't a standard lobbying operation, nor is it a relationship based on some kind of quantum meruit or any other kind of relationship known to the law. It's a relationship of honour that cannot be broken without serious repercussions. And it is not terminable at will but by agreement and at a price.

Mr Berezovsky, in our submission, was the classic power broker. He described himself as one of the most influential oligarchs in Russia. His influence derived, as Professor Fortescue stated and as he himself confirmed in his evidence, primarily from his connections within the Kremlin but also from his ability to operate in conjunction with other oligarchs and, critically, from the control which he was, in 1995, in the process of acquiring over the national television network in Russia, formerly owned by the state corporation Ostankino.

Everything that Mr Berezovsky did for Mr Abramovich was characteristic of a relationship of protector and client rather than investor and manager.

Mr Berezovsky's own evidence, as well as Mr Abramovich's, shows that Mr Abramovich did not have a hope of amalgamating the two Siberian oil businesses and turning them round, as he did, without political influence. And it shows that it was Mr Berezovsky who provided that political influence.

Other major Russian businessmen built up industrial or commodity empires in the 1990s but relied on their own influence: Mr Khodorkovsky in the oil industry, Mr Potanin in the metals industry, and others like them. These were already very rich and influential men when they acquired the businesses that were included in the loans-for-shares scheme in 1995 and 1996, and in the privatisation programme. Indeed Mr Potanin was the main creator of the loans-for-shares scheme in March 1995.

Now, the process by which Mr Abramovich acquired control over Sibneft involved the alliance of a 28-year-old businessman with money but not enormous sums of money and with no political influence, an alliance between him and a powerful politician with a business background but no current interest in business at all. The natural form of their relationship was therefore that of protector and client.

The suggestion is made in my learned friends' written closing, it's at paragraphs 367 to 369 for the transcript, that we only have fleetingly relied upon and then abandoned our allegation that the relationship between Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky was based on krysha. Elsewhere in this document it's suggested that we only hint at the problem of corruption by way of innuendo.

I wish to disabuse my learned friends of that idea. I don't want to raise the temperature any more than I need to, but the true nature of Mr Berezovsky's so-called lobbying activities is relevant to quite a number of issues in this case. It's relevant to the nature of his relationship with Mr Abramovich, it's relevant to the question whether their bargain was legally certain as a matter of Russian law, it's relevant to the question whether the agreement was intended to be legally binding. And it is certainly our case that the relationship between Mr Berezovsky and Mr Abramovich was founded on krysha or political protection, and that the activities of a krysha or protector are inherently corrupt.

But what is more, as a general proposition, that was accepted by Mr Berezovsky himself at the outset of his cross-examination. Your Ladyship may recall that I put to him the hypothesis that a businessman approaches an elected official and says "I'm going to support your reelection campaign so please will you exercise your official powers in a way that favours my business interests and those of my associates", and the elected official says "Yes". And I asked Mr Berezovsky whether in his view that was corrupt, and his answer was, "Yes, it's corrupt". Yet that is exactly what Mr Berezovsky in his witness statement claims to have done.

As became clear later in his evidence, Mr Berezovsky only declined to regard it as corrupt when it was done by him. The references I've just been referring to are at Day 4, pages 12 to 13, and then later at page 44.

Now, it's also suggested by Mr Berezovsky in his written closing that it is common ground that the provision of krysha was only relevant at the outset in 1995. It is not common ground, nor was that proposition accepted by Mr Abramovich when it was put to him.

Mr Abramovich's evidence --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you give me a paragraph number for where the allegation of common ground is made.

MR SUMPTION: That is made at paragraph 374, subparagraph 2 of my learned friends' written closing.

Now, Mr Abramovich's evidence is that he was concerned to maintain his connection with a known and influential political protector right through to the time when Mr Berezovsky fell out with Mr Putin in 2000, and that even then he did not regard the relationship as unilaterally terminable. What is more, although this isn't directly relevant to any issue before your Ladyship, it is Mr Abramovich's evidence -- and has always been our case -- that the physical protection provided by Mr Patarkatsishvili was also valuable and, indeed in relation to the Rusal side in 2000, essential.

Now, direct evidence of the agreement of 1995 comes only from the two principals. I am not going to summarise their evidence on my feet since I've already done it at some length in my written closing, but your Ladyship's analysis of that evidence is obviously likely to depend heavily on your views about the quality of the witnesses and I have said enough for the moment on that subject.

What I would like to do is to say something about the circumstantial evidence, all of which very strongly suggests that Mr Abramovich's version of what was said in 1995 is likely to be correct. Now, I'm not going to go through all the background circumstances, they are actually exhaustively described with references in our written closing, but it is right to identify the main ones.

The first point to be made is that the agreement was made at a stage when it is most unlikely to have been in the terms alleged by Mr Berezovsky. I'm certainly not going to suggest that the terms were all agreed at one moment. It is actually quite likely that some of them evolved over a period of time.

But it isn't true, as Mr Berezovsky's counsel have suggested, that it is common ground that after initial agreement in about February the final agreement was really made in August. Mr Abramovich's evidence is that the basic features of the parties' relationship was settled at the outset, in particular his evidence is that the basis on which Mr Berezovsky was going to be remunerated, which is the critical point for present purposes, was agreed at the outset.

I say that, that that must be so, because -- well, there are a number of reasons. First of all, Mr Abramovich's evidence was that the financial arrangements were agreed at the outset. Mr Berezovsky, as your Ladyship will recall, questioned Mr Abramovich about his means, by which he can only have meant at that stage the means that he derived from his existing business interests in oil trading. What Mr Berezovsky then said was that he would expect $30 million a year.

Now, that evidence is summarised, I'm not going to ask your Ladyship to turn it up, at paragraph 20, subparagraph 4 of our closing with references.

Secondly, it must be true, in our submission, because we know that Mr Berezovsky was actively engaged in promoting the project within the Kremlin as early as February 1995. His own witness statement accepts that and so does his oral evidence. We have given references at paragraph 25.

Thirdly, the first payment was made in February 1995 in bank notes delivered personally to Mr Berezovsky by Ms Goncharova at the Logovaz Club, followed by a number of similar deliveries in the course of February and March amounting in total to $5 million of folding money. Now, if Mr Berezovsky was performing his part, and being paid for it in cash from the outset, then the basis of his remuneration must have been agreed, at least in general terms, from the outset. It is hardly likely that Mr Berezovsky would give Mr Abramovich the benefit of his inside track at the Kremlin, without any agreement about his remuneration.

Now, remuneration agreed at that stage cannot have involved a share in Sibneft which, at that stage, didn't exist, and whose ultimate creation and privatisation was as yet undecided. None of the terms alleged by Mr Berezovsky make a great deal of sense as applied to the sort of agreement that he says was made. The creation of Sibneft was not provided for by law until late August. The privatisation of 49 per cent was not approved until the end of September, although provision for it had been made in the decree creating Sibneft. The loans-for-shares scheme was not even proposed until the end of March 1995 and was not adopted until August.

Sibneft was not included in it until the end of November.

Now, it must be most unlikely that interests in Sibneft were being shared out between Mr Abramovich, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili as early as January and February 1995. The terms which are alleged by Mr Berezovsky are terms which have been devised to suit a situation that actually came into being a considerable time after the agreement is likely to have been made.

Indeed, there is another reason why they couldn't have been agreed as early as January and February 1995, when it is quite clear that the basic terms were agreed, and that is that the partnership between Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, and it's a crucial part of Mr Berezovsky's case that this was an agreement between them as partners and Mr Abramovich, but that partnership is not alleged by Mr Berezovsky to have come into being until August 1995. That is his case in the main Chancery action. The references are at paragraph 26.3 of our document.

It must be equally unlikely I would suggest, and isn't in fact alleged by Mr Berezovsky, that the basis of Mr Berezovsky's remuneration was something that changed in the course of 1995. It is perfectly true that there were other aspects of this relationship which were modified as time went on in the course of 1995.

I will mention two of them because they feature quite significantly in the evidence.

One change concerned the nature of the control which Mr Abramovich hoped to acquire. His evidence is that he was originally interested only in procuring the creation of Sibneft and acquiring management control over it within the state sector, his object being to increase the trading volumes of his trading companies by increasing the proportion of the Siberian companies' business which went through the trading companies. It was only gradually, with the beginning of the loans-for-shares scheme and the privatisation programme of August 1995, that Mr Abramovich's ambitions began to expand to embrace the actual acquisition of a large stake in the company. This process is traced in his witness statement, that's his third witness statement. I'll just give your Ladyship the principal paragraphs, paragraph 49 to 50, 59 to 61, and 71.

Now, another respect in which the arrangements were modified over time was the purpose for which the money paid to Mr Berezovsky was used by him. My learned friends have made a great deal of fuss about a suggested change in Mr Abramovich's case. The point is that it is said that the understanding between Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky was originally said to be that the money would be used to fund ORT, and it later came to include substantial volumes of personal expenditure.

Now, it has never been suggested that it was, so to speak, a term of the agreement that the money paid to Mr Berezovsky must be used to fund ORT. The term was that Mr Abramovich was to pay Mr Berezovsky money. Funding ORT was simply the reason why Mr Berezovsky said he particularly wanted money in 1995. But ultimately, there was nothing to stop Mr Berezovsky spending what he got from Mr Abramovich on whatever he liked. It made no difference to Mr Abramovich who had no particular interest in the financial health of ORT.

This development is traced again in Mr Abramovich's third witness statement, the main paragraphs are paragraphs 55-6 and 67-9. Initially, most of the money did in fact go on ORT although precise figures are difficult to establish. There was then a gradual increase in the proportion of personal expenditure which became particularly noticeable after Boris Yeltsin's victory in the 1996 presidential elections, an outcome to which Mr Berezovsky's broadcasting empire contributed very significantly.

By 1997 it is Mr Berezovsky's own evidence that, in addition to ORT funding, his entire personal expenditure was in fact being funded by Mr Abramovich. So the first of the surrounding circumstances to which I draw attention as tending to suggest that Mr Abramovich's version of the 1995 agreement is right is the stage in 1995 when that agreement appears most likely to have been made.

The second surrounding circumstance is the absence of a written record. Now, we do not dispute that oral agreements may have been less uncommon in Russia in the 1990s than they would have been in New York or London, although the evidence certainly does not go so far as to suggest that they were the norm. Kinut, the practice of denying unrecorded agreements, was a well-known hazard in Russia, and both Dr Nosova and Mr Berezovsky accepted that in their evidence. But what seems clear is that oral agreements for major transactions are unlikely to be made, even in Russia in the 1990s, except between people who have a high degree of confidence and trust in each other based on experience.

One can illustrate that by reference to Mr Berezovsky's relationship with Mr Patarkatsishvili. In our opening written statement at paragraph 29 we have given your Ladyship the references to what is known about Mr Patarkatsishvili's early relationship with Mr Berezovsky, but it looks as if they had been business colleagues for over six years before they actually became partners in 1995.

Now, Mr Berezovsky's case is that he achieved that sort of relationship with Mr Abramovich within a few weeks of having met him and before they had done any business together at all. All of his evidence, however, tends to contradict that suggestion. According to Mr Berezovsky, his attitude in 1995 was that Mr Abramovich was a small-time oil trader with no track record in business, of whose affairs he had no knowledge and no interest, and he consistently, in the early part of his evidence in cross-examination, spoke of Mr Berezovsky's (sic) talents with contempt, "He was not even smart".

Now, in a revealing aside in the course of his cross-examination, Mr Berezovsky remarked that the only reason why he was prepared to agree to Mr Abramovich managing Sibneft at all was that he was too busy; he, Mr Berezovsky, was too busy on the more important question of getting Mr Yeltsin reelected as president. He said -- the reference is at paragraph 17 and note 63 of our written opening:

"Could you believe that say, 'Mr Abramovich, young boy, fantastic boy, manage please enormous business'?"

Only because I had the other priority ..."

Of course the answer to Mr Berezovsky's forensic question is, no, Mr Berezovsky did not graciously permit Mr Abramovich to manage Sibneft, he wasn't interested in Sibneft at all. That was Mr Abramovich's affair. What Mr Berezovsky was interested in was cash.

Now, this view of the situation, and this particular explanation of why it is unlikely that the agreement would be recorded in writing and why in fact it was not, is confirmed by Mr Patarkatsishvili's remarks to Mr Berezovsky's solicitors in 2005 which tells us something about the nature of the relationship between Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky in 1995. According to Mr Patarkatsishvili, Mr Berezovsky introduced Mr Abramovich to him as a nice boy who would discuss some commercial projects. Mr Lankshear's note of that interview, and the draft proof prepared immediately afterwards, also records Mr Patarkatsishvili as saying that Mr Abramovich was looking for what Mr Patarkatsishvili called refuge, ie protection, or as we have been using it in this action, krysha.

The reason for the absence of any written record of this deal was precisely that it was not an oil industry partnership. It was a political arrangement, a trade in influence for money. It was an arrangement of the kind that no sensible person in Mr Berezovsky's position would want to see recorded in writing.

Now, that had absolutely nothing to do with fears of a Communist victory in 1996 as Mr Berezovsky sought to suggest. There were genuine fears of a Communist victory in 1996, but there is probably much to be said, at least in a figurative sense, for the view which Mr Berezovsky attributes to George Soros, that if the Communists won in 1996 Mr Berezovsky was going to be strung up from a lamp post anyway. What seems absolutely clear is that, if the Communists won, any arrangement that these parties might make about Sibneft would be reversed irrespective of whether or not it was recorded in writing. The absence of writing simply reflected the murky character of any deal based on krysha.

Now, the third circumstantial element which needs to be taken into account is the complete absence of interest shown by Mr Berezovsky in the successive auctions at which, first, the privatised 49 per cent of Sibneft and then the retained 51 per cent were sold by the Russian State. It's common ground, on the evidence, that all of these sales resulted in the acquisition of shares by companies owned and controlled by Mr Abramovich, and that Mr Berezovsky contributed zero to the cost of their acquisition.

We know, because both sides agree, that Mr Berezovsky put a good deal of effort into the loans-for-shares auction of 28 December 1995 at which Mr Abramovich acquired management control of Sibneft. Now, Mr Berezovsky did not provide the funding for that auction, that came from Runicom and from the Siberian oil companies themselves who put up the counterdeposits with SBS that enabled SBS to participate without any financial risk to themselves. But Mr Berezovsky's efforts were nevertheless considerable. They were mainly by way of behind-the-scenes political machination, but he also, as we accept, made valuable use of his contacts with groups like Menatep and SBS. Yet Mr Berezovsky did absolutely nothing about the sales at which Sibneft shares were actually acquired.

This indifference is very much what one would expect if Mr Berezovsky was providing political patronage for cash. Mr Berezovsky had used his political influence to create the opportunity and that is why these auctions were occurring at all. So it was now up to Mr Abramovich to make use of that opportunity by buying.

On the other hand, Mr Berezovsky's complete indifference to the actual sales of Sibneft shares is very surprising if the real object of the deal that he had made with Mr Abramovich was to acquire shares in Sibneft in partnership as he is suggesting. On the face of it these sales of Sibneft shares, of the 49 per cent and then the 51 per cent, were the prime means by which the acquisition of Sibneft shares would come about. Yet Mr Berezovsky, on his own evidence, did not lift a finger. He did nothing to participate in them directly and he did nothing to participate in them indirectly through Mr Abramovich either.

The contrast between Mr Berezovsky's active concern with the loans-for-shares auction and his indifference to the sales at which Sibneft shares actually changed hands is, I would suggest, particularly striking in the case of the very first sale of shares which occurred on 4 January 1996 at which 15 per cent of Sibneft was on offer as part of the privatisation programme and just over 12 per cent was acquired by Mr Abramovich's companies.

Now, that sale, the 4 January sale, occurred just one week after the loans-for-shares auction. The process that led to the sale opened on 1 November 1995. Your Ladyship will find the dates incidentally at paragraph 43, sub 4 of our document.

So the loans-for-shares auction and the first cash sale of Sibneft shares were proceeding, for practical purposes, simultaneously in the final weeks of 1995. Now, the successful bidder in the loans-for-shares auction, as we know, was NFK, a consortium company owned 50 per cent by an Abramovich vehicle and 50 per cent by Consolidated Bank which was, in effect, the in-house bank of the Logovaz Group. However, the successful bidder in the cash sale of 4 January, the first occasion on which Sibneft shares were actually acquired, was Mr Abramovich's principal trading company Runicom SA, a company in which Mr Berezovsky had no interest at all.

It's possible to understand why Mr Berezovsky was interested in the loans-for-shares auction on Mr Abramovich's version of what was agreed. It is impossible to understand why, if the 1995 agreement was really concerned with the acquisition of shares of Sibneft in partnership, that difference between these two virtually simultaneous sales was allowed to exist. If that was the agreement, then why was a consortium company not used in the 4 January sale as well?

It is worth adding that at this stage, in late 1995 and early 1996, not even Mr Berezovsky claims that there were arrangements in place for his interest to be held for him indirectly by Mr Abramovich or his companies. The terms which Mr Berezovsky says were agreed in 1995 included no arrangements for holding any interest of Mr Berezovsky or Mr Patarkatsishvili indirectly for them. He accepts that in his fourth witness statement, the reference is paragraph 166 D2/17/232. He accepts there that nothing was said about that in 1995. His case is that that was only agreed in terms in late, or later in 1996, around May or June.

That being so, it's very hard to understand what Mr Berezovsky thought that he was doing if he and Mr Patarkatsishvili were supposed to be half owners of Sibneft shares and had made no arrangements for Mr Abramovich to hold Sibneft shares for them. In that case, why weren't they out there participating in the purchase of Sibneft shares?

All of this, of course, is readily explicable if the agreement was in terms alleged by Mr Abramovich, and what they were getting was money. That view of the matter is consistent with the fact that even Mr Berezovsky does not say that there were any terms agreed in 1995 about how Sibneft shares were going to be acquired if they were sold, who was going to pay for them, how the auction was going to be managed and so on.

On Mr Berezovsky's case, there never was any obligation on him or on Mr Patarkatsishvili to pay, for example, a single cent towards the acquisition of shares which they claim were going to be half theirs.

Mr Berezovsky certainly doesn't plead any such terms. He says nothing about terms of that nature in his witness statement. His evidence on the point is limited to an absurd suggestion in the course of his cross-examination that he expected Mr Abramovich to sort all that out in his capacity as the manager of Sibneft's business.

Mr Berezovsky does not suggest that that was actually agreed, he only suggests that it was, in his view, implicit in the agreement that Mr Abramovich was going to be the manager of Sibneft's business. It is of course no part of the function of the manager of a company's business to buy shares in the company on behalf of potential investors unless perhaps he has actually agreed to do that.

What is more, Mr Berezovsky's evidence on this point doesn't explain how shares acquired by Mr Abramovich for him and Mr Patarkatsishvili, in his capacity as manager, were actually going to be paid for. Judging by his evidence in cross-examination, Mr Berezovsky's position is that Mr Abramovich should have set the cost off against his and Mr Patarkatsishvili's 50 per cent share of Sibneft's at that stage nonexistent profits, or else that he should have come and asked them for money which, on this hypothesis, they had absolutely no obligation to pay to him.

Now, the net result is said to be that although Mr Abramovich's companies paid for these shares themselves, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili are said to own half of them. Mr Berezovsky is in effect claiming to have invented a kind of financial perpetual motion machine under which he can acquire ever more valuable assets for nothing. We shall see exactly the same conceit at work in 2000 when we come to the way in which the aluminium interests were acquired.

Now, the fourth circumstantial matter pointing to Mr Abramovich's version of the agreement is, in our submission, by far the most significant, and that is the absence of any correlation between the payments made to Mr Berezovsky and the profits of Sibneft. Now, for this purpose, it's the profits of Sibneft and only the profits of Sibneft which are relevant. It is not the profits of the trading companies, it's not the total income of Mr Abramovich, it is not some nebulous concept of similar profits. If your Ladyship has my learned friends' written closing at hand and would turn to paragraph 401 at subparagraph 3, one will see what is now for the first time being suggested by way of submission, it's at page 265 of the document. "The suggestion", they say, and this is referring to the sources of profit-sharing other than Sibneft profits:

"The suggestion that there is any contradiction or lack of clarity because this was not spelt out in Mr Berezovsky's pleaded case is clearly not right. It would almost certainly be implied as a term in any contract among partners under which they agreed to share profits of an enterprise that if one or more of those partners had the power to cause profits of that enterprise to be earned through another corporate vehicle, those profits would also be shared. This would certainly fall to be implied into a Russian law simple partnership agreement because the partners under such an agreement owe each other fiduciary duties: see Rozenberg..."

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I have actually got that on page 263, just for the transcript. It doesn't matter.

MR SUMPTION: I'm reading from the printed version --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, so am I.

MR SUMPTION: I see. Well, I hope there aren't two pages missing which I haven't --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It doesn't matter, it's just for my purposes later on.

MR SUMPTION: Yes, thank you.

Now, the problem about this, one of the many problems about this, is that this is an arrangement which, although categorised as a matter of law by Mr Berezovsky's advisers as a partnership agreement, is said to depend on express agreement. Mr Berezovsky says there was an express agreement about what profits he was going to earn, it's not a matter of implication. His pleaded case is that this was something whose goal was to be the acquisition and management of Sibneft.

There is no pleaded allegation that any other profits than Sibneft's were to be shared. There are no implied terms alleged in the pleading expanding the scope of this profit entitlement, nor is it supported by Mr Berezovsky's witness statement. His principal witness statement number four at paragraph 98 is the only place where he says what he claimed to be entitled to. It's part of his evidence where he deals with the 1996 agreement, and he explains that that agreement was to the effect that the previous arrangements were to continue and those agreements entitled him, according to Mr Berezovsky's evidence, to "dividends and other payments made by Sibneft to its owners".

That is the right that Mr Berezovsky claims was expressly accorded to him, and we propose to hold him to that part of his case. We cannot reasonably be expected after the evidence has closed to start chasing Mr Berezovsky through the twists and turns of whatever case he feels he needs to make in order to meet the difficulties of the evidence.

Now, the undisputed evidence is that neither Mr Berezovsky nor Mr Patarkatsishvili ever tried to ascertain at the time what these profits actually were, of which they claim to be half owners. The procedure was that at about the beginning of each year, Mr Abramovich would have a discussion with Mr Patarkatsishvili about how much Mr Berezovsky would be expecting to receive in that year. There would then be a continuous process of ad hoc negotiation in which Mr Berezovsky or Mr Patarkatsishvili would demand that Mr Abramovich arrange for some particular payments to be made either to them or to third parties at their direction.

Now, I say that that evidence is undisputed because it is the system described by Dr Nosova and by Mr Jenni in their witness statements. We've given the references at paragraphs 56 and 57 of our document. Indeed it's the system which Mr Berezovsky himself described in his oral evidence to your Ladyship.

If I could ask your Ladyship, in one of the rare forays into the transcript, again I promise not to make a habit of this, to turn up Day 6, page 86, what Mr Berezovsky had to say about the method of arriving at these sums was this. It's page 86 of Day 6 starting at line 17:

"No, again, I describe you the method which company use to obtain the profit directly or indirectly and the way was absolutely the same for all the company.

I never calculate numbers and my relations was absolutely simple: I made request directly to Abramovich or Shvidler or indirectly through Badri. If Abramovich was able to pay, calculating what is [in] our interest, Badri and me together, he paid that. If he was not able to do [it], he said, 'Boris, we don't have money now to spend because we invest it to buy something or because company didn't generate this money'.

"I never demand Abramovich to do that, never, because it was responsibility of Abramovich, 100 per cent, to manage the company and I'm not crazy to destroy my company just thinking to buy another house, yes? I understood priority. If we don't have money, we don't have money. If we have money, I want to spend this money how I like to..."

So the system as described here is:

"If [Mr] Abramovich was able to pay, calculating what is [in] our interest ..."

Now, that isn't a profit share, it's rather closer to the classic kind of protection, "Nice place you've got here".

Now, Mr Berezovsky on the opposite page, at page [92], line 10, is taken up on that point by your Ladyship. The question is:

"... I know you say that. We're just now looking at the amounts you get paid and how -- the money doesn't [seem to] come to you automatically; you generate some sort of request for payment, presumably?

"Yes ... mainly the way was as I described before. I told Badri, 'Badri, we need that and that', for reason of ORT or for reason of charity or for personal reason to buy jewellery [for] Elena, yes? And Badri calculate with Roman what is opportunity to pay or not. That's it."

Now, whatever else one might say, in our submission, that is not a profit share. The most that one can say about it is that Mr Berezovsky's requirements became more exorbitant as Sibneft prospered and Mr Abramovich's ability to pay increased. This was essentially a demand-led system limited by Mr Abramovich's capacity to pay, and that is very different from what is described in Mr Berezovsky's witness statement.

Now, this is, in our submission, crucial because Mr Berezovsky has got to say that the huge payments made to him between 1995 and 2000 were his shares of those profits.

My Lady, could your Ladyship give me an indication of when you wish to take the break?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. Well, have we got to the end of this section yet?

MR SUMPTION: No, shall I get to the end of that?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Get to the end of the section, please.

MR SUMPTION: Now, the global figures are set out in the table which appears at paragraph 47 of our closing document.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I have that.

MR SUMPTION: Which compares Mr Berezovsky's receipts, or Mr Berezovsky's and Mr Patarkatsishvili's receipts, with the figures for Sibneft profits over the relevant period. Now, the source of those figures is this: the figures for the payments made to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili are estimates derived from the evidence of Mr Abramovich and Ms Goncharova up to the end of 1999, and they are based on the actual figures for the year 2000, the one year for which we have actual figures derived from the bolshoi balance.

Mr Rabinowitz says that his client puts forward no positive case about what he received, but Mr Berezovsky's own evidence is that, by 1997, it covered not only part of the funding gap at ORT but the entire cost of his somewhat exuberant lifestyle.

However, since these figures, the figures for his receipts, were put forward by Mr Berezovsky to the investigating magistrate earlier this year as representing the amount of his receipts from Sibneft, we must take it that Mr Berezovsky was satisfied that they were at least broadly correct, or at any rate that he was not in a position to quarrel with them.

The figures in the table for Sibneft's profits are derived from its audited financial statements. Now, I've already made the point that the payments began before any control over Sibneft was acquired, about 30 million in 1995. Now, those payments are denied by Mr Berezovsky, they are denied precisely because they are fatal to his case that what was received was a profit share since Sibneft didn't exist in 1995 and certainly wasn't under the control of Mr Abramovich.

Mr Berezovsky's preference for leaving other people to deal with the financial side of his affairs, and his professed lack of any detailed recollection, means that his evidence on this point is not going to assist your Ladyship very much. But the payments of February and March have, in our submission, been amply proved in particular by the evidence of Ms Goncharova. Your Ladyship may recall her graphic account of dragging a heavy hold-all full of bank notes up the steep staircase at the entrance to the Logovaz Club and trying to deliver it personally to Mr Berezovsky as he barked angrily down the phone and threw the telephone at his assistant. She simply could not have made that up.

Nor could she have got the date wrong. The date was fixed in her mind by the extraordinary circumstances of these deliveries and the fact that it immediately followed the move of Mr Abramovich's premises to a new address in Moscow. The details of that are given with references at paragraph 51.

Now, in my learned friends' written closing, and the reference for the record is paragraph 108 sub 4(c), there is a suggestion that Ms Goncharova's evidence cannot be true because she referred to Mr Berezovsky's assistant as Ivan, and what is said is that this refers to Ivan Surov who, they say, began working for Mr Berezovsky in December 1996, nearly two years later, and, in support of that, they have produced an annual contract of employment beginning 4 December 1996 and subsequently renewed at annual intervals.

Now, that document was disclosed by my learned friends on 22 November, six days after Ms Goncharova had given her evidence. It was not put to her in cross-examination and no application was made to recall her so that it could be and so that she could address it. If it had been, we would certainly have made the necessary arrangements.

Ms Goncharova does not identify Ivan by his surname but I can tell your Ladyship that we accept that the reference was to Ivan Surov. We do not accept that Mr Surov only started working for Mr Berezovsky on 4 December 1996, although it may well be that that was when his employment with the particular entity identified in the contract of employment did begin, but he was working for Mr Berezovsky for some time before that contract of employment with that particular entity was made.

Now, in Mr Berezovsky's written closing --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: The Logovaz Club was a kind of club that operated in the daytime? It was a club in the sense of, I don't know, White's or ...

MR SUMPTION: I think not exactly in the sense of White's. It was basically the headquarters of the Logovaz Group, which was a place set up by Mr Berezovsky where essentially food and wine could be had in more or less unlimited quantities without payment, and it was therefore a popular resort with anyone who wished to see Mr Berezovsky and, I dare say it, to some people who didn't wish to see him.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But it was a members club, was it?

MR SUMPTION: No, it's a sort of proprietary -- it was basically where Mr Berezovsky held court. I don't think it had a formal membership. It was called a club, it was actually a palatial headquarters building installed in an early 19th century classical house where you could do business over a rather more enjoyable setting than most modern architecture allows.

At any rate, the description we've had of it is that this was where all sorts of agents, factors and courtiers would go if they had business of any kind with Mr Berezovsky, and it's where he had his office.

Now, in my learned friends' written closing the evidence of the 1995 payments is attacked as late reconstruction occurring after disclosure, and as the product of collusion, it is said, between Mr Abramovich and Ms Goncharova. Now, neither of these criticisms has any weight frankly. Well before disclosure Mr Mitchard, in his witness statement for the summary judgment proceedings, gave evidence that he had been told by both Mr Abramovich and Ms Goncharova that the payments had started in 1995. This is not therefore late invention. Of course, Mr Abramovich did consult Ms Goncharova, among other sources, as he perfectly freely admitted in cross-examination. It was the obvious thing to do since

Ms Goncharova was in charge of handling these payments.

Now, turning to the figures for 1996 to 2000, there were no profits in 1996, a year in which Mr Berezovsky received, on Ms Goncharova's estimates, between 80 and $85 million. Payments to Mr Berezovsky exceeded the entire profits of Sibneft in both of the next two years. The first year in which payment could have been covered from audited profits was 1999 and 2000, and in neither of those years were the payments 50 per cent of those profits or anything like 50 per cent.

At no point, in other words, between 1995 and 2000, could payments to Mr Berezovsky have been covered by distribution to shareholders. That is because all profits were reinvested until the year 2000 when Sibneft declared its first dividend in the sum of just $50 million. That was declared in November of 2000. Now, there have been a number of more or less ingenious attempts to square this particular circle, much of which turned in the course of the evidence on arguments about transfer pricing, although one cannot help noticing that transfer pricing plays a very limited part in my learned friends' written closing, and their points about it are unsupported by any evidence that they have been able to point to.

alleged by Mr Berezovsky, Mr Abramovich had no actual obligation to pay him a share of profits emanating from any other company than Sibneft. No obligation to engage in manipulative transfer pricing for Mr Berezovsky's benefit. No obligation to pay him and Mr Patarkatsishvili a cent more than half of the profit attributable to the shareholding that they claim to have had in Sibneft. That is Mr Berezovsky's claim. "We were shareholders, we were entitled to half the amount which was distributed by Sibneft to its owners."

Now, Mr Abramovich could, therefore, under the agreement alleged by Mr Berezovsky, have declined to pay Mr Berezovsky or Mr Patarkatsishvili a single cent until Sibneft started paying dividends in 2000. He could then have paid them no more than their due proportion of $50 million, and if they had claimed more than that, legally they wouldn't have had a leg to stand on. And remember, Mr Berezovsky says this is a legal agreement.

If Mr Abramovich actually paid them more than half the profits attributable to the shares they claimed to own, then there is only one possible explanation. That explanation is that Mr Berezovsky had some hold on Mr Abramovich extending beyond any entitlement that Mr Berezovsky might have had as shareholder, beyond any legal entitlement in fact of any kind. What could that hold, extending beyond their position as shareholders and beyond legal entitlement, have been if it was not krysha, the hold that Mr Berezovsky derived for his status as Mr Abramovich's political godfather?

For that reason, it would not actually matter whether the arguments about transfer pricing were soundly based on fact, but actually these allegations about transfer pricing have no factual basis at all. The audited accounts of Sibneft specifically deal with related party transactions, as they are required to do by the general principles of accounting in accordance with which they were drawn up. The course of trading between Sibneft and the trading companies is described in detail in the Eurobond circular of 1997, a document which was cleared after due diligence by Salomon Brothers and Cleary Gottlieb, and presumably by Mr Patarkatsishvili as well since he was a director of Sibneft at the relevant time. We've given the references to all of that at paragraph 48 sub 4.

What it shows is that there was no transfer pricing between Sibneft and Mr Abramovich's trading companies, and no evidence has been produced to persuade your Ladyship that that is wrong.

Turning to the ZATOs, they seem to have disappeared as an issue judging by my learned friends' written closing. There is a full description of how they operated in Mr Gorodilov's witness statement, and some further observations on the subject in the witness statement of Mr Shvidler. In short, they were companies interposed in the chain of contracts which were entitled to tax relief on their profits under Russian legislation which remained in force until 2000. These companies transferred back to Sibneft sums which ensured that Sibneft was no worse off than it would have been if they had not been interposed.

Mr Abramovich was asked about this in cross-examination but did not know the details. Neither Mr Shvidler nor Mr Gorodilov, who did know the details and indeed were responsible for that part of Sibneft's affairs, was cross-examined about it at all. So that would appear to be the end of that particular issue.

The only attempt which Mr Berezovsky's counsel have made to correlate the profits of Sibneft with the receipts of their client is at paragraph 445 of their written closing where the suggestion is made that Mr Abramovich made payments that were related to profits in 1995 and 2000.

Now, it is slightly odd to see Mr Berezovsky relying in this part of his argument on the payments made in 1995 as being a due proportion of Sibneft's profits since his case is that no payments were ever made in 1995. But two things are, I would suggest, clear about the 1995 payments. One is that the $30 million cannot have been calculated as a proportion of Sibneft's profits since Mr Abramovich did not control Sibneft until 1996. The other is that the $30 million figure did not come from Mr Abramovich at all. On the evidence, it was the sum which Mr Berezovsky demanded at the outset of their relationship in return for his services.

Now, in relation to the year 2000, the only other year for which it's suggested that there was any correlation, the suggestion is based on the proposition that Sibneft made $900 million in profits in 2000, which is substantially more than its actual profits as disclosed by the audited accounts, and that the amounts paid, according to the bolshoi balance, were about half of that, which in fact they were not.

This is a particular issue in relation to 2000 which is dealt with in our written closing at paragraph 55, and in our submission there is no substance in it at all.

My Lady, that is a convenient point to break if that's convenient to your Ladyship.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That's the end of the section, is it, on that?

MR SUMPTION: Yes. There's one other circumstantial matter I need to deal with but it's better dealt with after the break.

MR ADKIN: Before your Ladyship rises, my Lady asked about the Logovaz Club. Mr Berezovsky himself gives a brief description of the Logovaz Club at paragraph 34 of his witness statement, which is D2/17/203. I don't understand that description to be controversial.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It's not in dispute. Thank you.

MR SUMPTION: I think your Ladyship will also find a description of it in Dr Nosova's evidence.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, very well. Thank you. I'll take ten minutes.

(11.45 am)

(A short break)

(12.01 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Sumption.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, the next circumstantial point that I wanted to draw attention to, pointing towards Mr Abramovich's version of what was agreed, is that a partnership agreement of the kind alleged by Mr Berezovsky would not in fact have served what Mr Berezovsky accepts was the purpose for which he was entering into this arrangement in the first place.

Mr Berezovsky's own evidence, and we summarise this at paragraph 31 to 34 of our document, is that the logic of entering into this arrangement with this young untried businessman was to generate a source of funds for ORT. Now, at a later stage, Mr Berezovsky's appetite for money may have been driven very much more by his personal expenditure, but at this stage there seems to be no doubt that ORT was the principal financial requirement, and it was an urgent requirement because ORT had to be funded in time to mount a major publicity campaign in support of Boris Yeltsin's re-election campaign in elections that were due to be held in June 1996.

The evidence, mainly from Mr Berezovsky himself and to some extent from Dr Nosova, was that the other private investors in ORT were not willing to pay up. Mr Berezovsky's main business, the Logovaz Group, was unable to do so. Mr Dubov came to Mr Berezovsky and said, if he demanded the money from Logovaz Group, it would be the last payment they ever made before folding. And attempts to borrow from commercial banks, according to Dr Nosova, had also failed.

Now, Mr Berezovsky needed money to fund ORT much faster than he could ever have got it out of Sibneft dividends. His only answer to this point is that it would have been perfectly simple to integrate the component businesses of the two Siberian companies into one with their old-style Soviet management and their billion dollars of accumulated debt, as Mr Abramovich described, and then to start extracting large sums of money from the combined business almost at once.

Now, that evidence, in our submission, was absurd. Mr Berezovsky cannot possibly have believed it and, indeed, his own admitted ignorance of the oil trade makes it difficult to attach any weight to it. The evidence is that from the very outset of their relationship, at the end of 1994 and the beginning of 1995, Mr Berezovsky questioned Mr Abramovich about how much he could pay and said he would require 30 million a year. At that stage, as I pointed out, this must have been an enquiry about what Mr Abramovich could pay from the proceeds of his existing oil trading businesses.

Now, the payments to Mr Berezovsky had to be made out of funds generated by the trading companies at that stage and, in fact, they continued to be made out of funds generated by the trading companies up to 2000. Mr Berezovsky cannot say at this stage, in 1995, he was expecting to receive money from so-called transfer pricing by Sibneft because his evidence is that he knew nothing about transfer pricing until the Khodorkovsky trial in 2003. We give the references to that evidence at paragraph 33, sub 1.

Now, in their written closing, my learned friends, this is at paragraph 374 of their written closing, ask forensically why they say should Mr Berezovsky have wanted to enter into a krysha relationship with Mr Abramovich in 1995? What possible reason could there be for Mr Berezovsky not to enter into a partnership with Mr Abramovich for the acquisition and sharing of Sibneft? The answer to that question is perfectly simple: the only way that Mr Berezovsky was going to get cash at the time that he needed it was by selling his influence in the Kremlin.

That's why he was interested, when he first discussed the arrangements with Mr Abramovich, in the amount that Mr Abramovich's trading companies could generate, and not in the amount that might in future be generated by Sibneft which was as yet a distant project. It's also, incidentally, the reason why Mr Abramovich and Ms Goncharova must be right in saying that the $30 million which Mr Berezovsky said he would require was paid to him in 1995 before Sibneft was ever acquired. That is when he needed it.

Now, in hindsight, it is reasonably clear that Mr Berezovsky in 1995 seriously underestimated

Mr Abramovich's business talents. Mr Abramovich took over a pair of bankrupt and inefficient state-run businesses, with accumulated historic debts of enormous proportions, and transformed them into a highly successful integrated enterprise. But it took him five years to do that, five years before any dividend was declared and three years before any significant profits were made. And that was simply not the timeframe on which Mr Berezovsky was operating in 1995 and he knew it.

Now, the high point of Mr Berezovsky's case appears to be the transcript of the Le Bourget tape. I'm not going to subject your Ladyship to yet another detailed exegesis of this rambling, obscure and possibly incomplete transcript, which appears to be the only tape recording which was worth selling to Mr Berezovsky out of the many which we are told that Mr Patarkatsishvili was in the habit of making of meetings that he attended. A detailed exegesis of the tape transcript is supplied in Mr Abramovich's commentary at bundle E6 E6/01/1, and by way of summary on this issue in our closing at paragraphs 58 and 59.

What I will do, if I may, is make a number of brief points about it. The first is that the exchanges at Le Bourget are incomprehensible without knowing about their context in the previous discussions, all of which had been between Mr Abramovich and Mr Patarkatsishvili with the exception of some that had concerned Mr Fomichev. Mr Berezovsky himself was unfamiliar with that context, as he acknowledged in his cross-examination. He was unfamiliar with the context of the discussions which he was present at because he hadn't been party to the previous discussions, and it was his practice to leave the management of his financial affairs to Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Fomichev. His own commentary on the transcript is really therefore argument rather than evidence.

The second point that has to be made about this is that the context which is chiefly important in understanding the Le Bourget tapes is the dominant role which western anti-money laundering regulations had by now come to assume in the conduct of Mr Berezovsky's and Mr Patarkatsishvili's affairs. And "dominant" is not, I would suggest, an exaggeration.

By the time of the Le Bourget meeting, Mr Berezovsky was an exiled fugitive living in France and Mr Patarkatsishvili expected very shortly to become a fugitive in his turn. In fact he did when he removed himself from Russia to Georgia in April 2001. The vast income that was required to fund the lifestyles of these two gentlemen came entirely from Russia. Now, previously, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili had received an income stream from two non-Russian sources. Andava produced an income stream which was derived from Aeroflot's treasury operations in Switzerland, and the references to that matter your Ladyship will find in our closing at paragraph 64, in particular note 394. The other income stream outside Russia was the Runicom companies which had been used in 1997 to pay most of the sums which Mr Berezovsky received from Mr Abramovich, in particular the sums he received for buying and doing up his palace on the Cote d'Azur.

Now, the Andava stream had dried up by 2000. Indeed it was the allegation of the Russian public prosecutors that the Andava monies had been stolen by Mr Berezovsky from Aeroflot, which had led to Mr Berezovsky's flight from Russia at the end of October.

The Runicom stream was about to dry up, as Mr Abramovich explained at the Le Bourget meeting, because of changes to the Russian tax system which had led to the decision to consolidate the operations of the trading companies into Sibneft itself. The evidence on this point is summarised at paragraph 59, sub 3.

So the prospect that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were facing in December 2000 at the time of the Le Bourget meeting was that every dollar that they spent would now have to be got out of Russia. That would involve, to use the delicate phrase which they constantly employed in this context, legalising the money, by which they meant providing a documented explanation of its origins to whatever western bank or asset manager they wanted the money paid to.

That was a particularly acute problem in 2000 and in the following years for reasons that were described in an interesting and unscripted part of the evidence of Mr Ivlev. Your Ladyship may recall that he told you that at the time of the ORT transaction, western financial institutions were particularly, ie more than usually, sensitive to large money funds(?) coming out of Russia because of the scale on which wealthy Russians had been seeking to export their assets, and that these suspicions were at their highest when associated with Mr Berezovsky. This was Mr Ivlev's evidence, who was of course a fugitive from Russian justice. That had resulted in Mr Ivlev's phrase of what he called an "extreme level of control from banks", and the reference to that is at paragraph 267 and note 1077 of our written document.

Now, both Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were uncomfortably aware of this, as Mr Berezovsky accepted in his evidence. They had been grappling with this problem of money-laundering enquiries ever since the beginning of 2000 when they first conceived the idea of putting their resources into offshore structures outside Russia. Now, that idea, when originally conceived of, had been a luxury, but by the end of 2000, once they had left Russia or were about to, it had become a necessity. Almost all of these people's income was derived from Mr Abramovich on a basis which was wholly undocumented and quite incapable of satisfying the money-laundering enquiries that they knew they were bound to face every time they received it.

So from this time on, the great majority of the financial documents disclosed by Mr Berezovsky were in fact generated by attempts to resolve this particular problem, and indeed it never was completely resolved, and it is some indication of the continuing significance of the money-laundering issue that, for example, after Clydesdale Bank required Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili to close their account in August 2001, it took them 18 months to find a new home for it, more than 27 banks having refused to touch the money. The references to that will be found in our written opening at paragraph 184.

Another indication is the scale of judicial investigation. There have been official or judicial enquiries into allegations of money-laundering by Mr Berezovsky and/or Mr Patarkatsishvili in no less than four western countries in addition to Russia over the past decade: Switzerland, The Netherlands, Brazil and most recently France. Most of the relevant parts of the Le Bourget transcript are concerned with methods of generating documents for the purpose of legalising Mr Berezovsky's and Mr Patarkatsishvili's receipts from Mr Abramovich.

There are essentially three respects in which the Le Bourget transcripts are said to support Mr Berezovsky's claim to have an interest in Sibneft. The first is that the transcript has a number of references to the possibility of Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili being registered as shareholders in Sibneft and receiving dividends. These arise from a proposal previously made by Mr Fomichev for legalising their receipts from Mr Abramovich by transferring shares to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, or else to a bank acting as their nominee, so that they could have a documented right to receive dividends by way of cover for the payments that Mr Abramovich was making to them.

Now, that was unacceptable to Mr Abramovich because it would have made them the owners in perpetuity of a significant proportion of his company(?), as well as, as he pointed out, discrediting Sibneft by its association with a fugitive from Russian justice.

Now, the second aspect of the transcript that is relied upon is that there are three references in it by Mr Abramovich to him holding 44 per cent of the company with the rest being, and I quote, "in trust with the management". These references will be found listed for your Ladyship at paragraph 59, sub 6.

Mr Berezovsky's suggestion is that the 44 per cent said to be held in trust with the management of Sibneft must be the half that he says was being held for him and Mr Patarkatsishvili. It is in fact, as became apparent in the course of the evidence of Mr Abramovich and Mr Shvidler, a standard formula that both of them used in order to disguise, for security purposes, the fact that Mr Abramovich was effectively the sole substantial shareholder in Sibneft. And there are press interviews, which were referred to in their cross-examinations and re-examination, in which they used that formula. So there doesn't appear to be any room for argument about that.

It would also, I suggest, be very odd for Mr Abramovich to be referring to 44 per cent as being held in trust with management if he meant that they were being held in trust by him for the very people that he was talking to in the meeting room at Le Bourget Airport.

The third respect in which these transcripts are relied upon is that there are references in the early parts of the tape to the payment of $305 million to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, of which 30 million is said to be coming from aluminium and the rest from oil. Now, there is no doubt from the transcript that the payment of this sum had been agreed at some stage before the meeting between Mr Abramovich and Mr Patarkatsishvili. The transcript itself makes that clear, and Mr Abramovich's evidence about that is that it had in fact been agreed in about October when it was increasingly likely that Mr Berezovsky would have to flee from Russia and when he was becoming anxious about the funds that would be available when he did. That is in fact confirmed by the bolshoi balance, because the bolshoi balance shows a very significant increase in the payments to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili from October onwards, which is exactly the time when, on Mr Abramovich's evidence, the agreement with Mr Patarkatsishvili had been made.

According to Mr Abramovich's evidence, Mr Patarkatsishvili, when they made that agreement, had wanted to satisfy himself that the money, 305 million(?), would be paid and he had asked where it was coming from. An understandable question since these sums were far larger than any that had previously been paid over a comparable period of time by Mr Abramovich, to either Mr Berezovsky or Mr Patarkatsishvili.

So he said "Where is it coming from?" And he was told that 30 million would be coming from the aluminium side and the rest from oil. Now, it is fair to say that several parts of the Le Bourget transcript, and in particular some of the statements of Mr Patarkatsishvili, suggest a sense of entitlement on his part. They also suggest a feeling that the more money Mr Abramovich was making, the more he could be required to pay up to him, Mr Patarkatsishvili, and Mr Berezovsky. But whether that entitlement that Mr Patarkatsishvili seems to have felt was an entitlement based on a shareholding, or some equivalent contractual right, or on krysha, is something that the transcript itself does not disclose even incidentally. For that you have to go back to the evidence of the 1995 agreement itself and the evidence of the way in which it was performed, in particular the timing and the amounts of the payments to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili.

Now, the irony is that although the Le Bourget meeting was in December 2000, Mr Berezovsky never publicly claims to have any substantial holding in Sibneft until June of 2001, and did so then in the most extraordinary circumstances, which I will come to. Between 1996 and his flight from Russia at the end of October 2000, Mr Berezovsky did not claim to have an interest in Sibneft. At least in the early part of it, it is fair to say that he allowed it to be supposed that he did, and Mr Abramovich's evidence was that he had no problem with that because he was anxious that he should be publicly associated with a protector as influential as Mr Berezovsky.

Now, holdings in Russian companies are very often deliberately made opaque by interposing complex networks of holding companies whose exact ownership is often very difficult to penetrate. There was certainly some press speculation that Mr Berezovsky did own part of Sibneft, and neither he nor Mr Abramovich denied it for the reason that I have just indicated.

In 1997, however, it was necessary now to deal formally with the question of Mr Berezovsky's relationship with Sibneft because the Eurobond issue of that year was traded on the New York Stock Exchange and marketed in the west. It therefore had to satisfy western standards of due diligence. And while an association with Mr Berezovsky was undoubtedly a salutary and valuable thing within the disordered framework of Russian society, it was not something which would be received with unalloyed enthusiasm by the average western investor. So the prospectus had to clarify the position to the standards of due diligence required in western securities markets.

Now, the prospectus for the Eurobond issue was, as I've told your Ladyship, done as a result of due diligence by Salomon Brothers and Cleary Gottlieb, and that said that while Mr Berezovsky maintained close relations with the senior management on the board of Sibneft, he does not own or control or have any other interest in the shares of Sibneft.

Now, it is perfectly clear that this statement was cleared with Mr Berezovsky before it was published. Mr Berezovsky has predictably denied that in his evidence, but it is in my submission clear. I say that for this reason. First of all, Mr Berezovsky told Ms Duncan at the interview with Mr Patarkatsishvili in November 2007 that he had been consulted about the circular and had approved this passage because he said Mr Abramovich had asked him to. And his response, when this was put to him in cross-examination, was simply to suggest that Ms Duncan has got it wrong, although it is impossible frankly to understand how she could have recorded this in her note if Mr Berezovsky didn't say it.

Your Ladyship will find the references to this particular episode at paragraph 63, sub 3(c) of our written document.

Secondly, according to Dr Nosova's witness statement, Mr Berezovsky had told her that Mr Abramovich had consulted him about the statement before it was published. Mr Berezovsky's response when that was put to him was that Dr Nosova was wrong. When Dr Nosova, who had of course been present in court to hear him give that evidence, was in turn asked about it, she claimed that she had in fact been referring to an earlier draft of the statement which referred to his having only no legal interests and was not in such all-embracing terms.

Now, quite apart from the fact that the document she was talking about was actually identified by its Magnum reference in the document, there in fact was no earlier draft in different terms, and Dr Nosova's statement makes it perfectly clear, her witness statement makes it perfectly clear that it was to that very document that she was referring and not to a draft of it. This is, in our submission, a good example of the forensic dishonesty to which both Mr Berezovsky and Dr Nosova were happy to resort when they were cornered on some particular issue of fact.

What seems quite clear is that for four years after the publication of that circular in 1997 Mr Berezovsky freely admitted to having no interest in Sibneft. He relied, in his action against Forbes, on an affidavit in which it was said by Mr Shvidler that he had no shareholding. He himself made similar statements in the press. His own evidence is that these statements were technically true because he had no registered shareholding. But if he is right in what he says were the terms of the 1995 and 1996 agreements, these statements were, as he must have appreciated, wholly misleading.

Now, there was in fact no public claim to have been a shareholder in Sibneft until 27 June 2001 when Mr Berezovsky made a statement to this effect in the press. References will be found at paragraph 65 of our document. Now, that was a statement that occasioned considerable surprise as the newspapers which reported it observed. It occasioned surprise because of the formal denial of such an interest in 1997 and on a number of occasions since.

The circumstances in which, in late June 2001,

Mr Berezovsky made a press statement to the effect that he owned a large part of Sibneft are not at all creditable to him. By that time Mr Berezovsky, according to his own account, had actually parted with whatever interest in Sibneft he had ever had by selling it to Devonian just three weeks before. When asked about this, he said rather engagingly that it wasn't exactly a lie, just "disinformation", was his phrase.

There is in fact strong circumstantial evidence that the reason why Mr Berezovsky made that statement at that stage was in order to generate newspaper copy that Mr Curtis could supply to Clydesdale Bank in support of his claim that the Devonian monies came from the sale of shares in Sibneft. What had happened, as we saw in the course of cross-examination, was that in his letter of 1 June 2001 to Mr Fomichev, Mr Curtis had asked Mr Fomichev to find some suitable copy to show to the bank, and the bank's files show that Mr Curtis duly supplied him with cuttings of this particular press statement.

The inference, in our submission, is overwhelming that the reason why Mr Berezovsky made a press statement that he owned a large part of Sibneft, three weeks after he claimed to have disposed of it in favour of Devonian, was in fact that he wanted to generate deceptive press copy which could be used to satisfy Clydesdale Bank.

Now, this press statement was one of many made over the following years which arose directly out of Mr Berezovsky's and Mr Patarkatsishvili's need to launder their funds, and these statements are on a par with the very similar untruths for which Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were responsible in the case of Aeroflot. The claim to own a large part of Aeroflot was made by Mr Berezovsky or his staff to Valmet in September 2000, it was made by Mr Curtis to Clydesdale Bank in early 2001, presumably on the basis of what Mr Berezovsky or Mr Patarkatsishvili or their staff had told him. It was recorded in the so-called explanatory memorandum which appears to have been prepared by Mr Joseph Kay but which for some inexplicable reason is attributed by my learned friends to Mr Streshinsky. It was made again to PricewaterhouseCoopers when they were preparing their report for the purposes of the Inland Revenue investigation of Mr Berezovsky's tax affairs from a source which can only have been either Mr Berezovsky himself or one of his immediate staff. The references to all of this will be found in paragraph 64 of our document, in particular at notes 393 and 394.

Now, that statement in relation to Aeroflot was completely untrue. It's acknowledged that Mr Berezovsky did not own a significant part of Aeroflot. What Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili appear to have had was not a shareholding in Aeroflot but an income stream derived from the treasury operations carried out for Aeroflot by Andava. In other words, these were lies told in order to launder an undocumented and arguably illicit income stream by presenting it as the income(?) generated from a capital asset, exactly what they repeatedly did in the case of the income stream derived from Sibneft.

Now, in my learned friends' written closing, it's paragraph 221, it is said that we have conceded the honesty of Mr Berezovsky's recollection that he owned a share of Sibneft and the most elaborate argument is founded on this supposed concession between paragraphs 390 and 396 of their written closing. I must make it clear that we have not and do not concede any such thing.

What we have said, and it's at paragraphs 61 and 62 of our document, is that it is possible, possible, that Mr Berezovsky may have persuaded himself that in some sense Sibneft was his company. We then go on to say in what sense he may possibly have persuaded himself of that. When one looks at the evidence of Mr Berezovsky's frame of mind, available in the transcripts of his evidence to this court, it becomes, I would suggest, quite obvious that Mr Berezovsky considered that he owned not so much Sibneft as Mr Abramovich.

Mr Berezovsky, presumably, at some stage came to think rather better of Mr Abramovich's business talents than he had done in 1995, but Mr Abramovich's evidence is that Mr Berezovsky never treated him as an equal, even though his lavish personal expenditure was entirely funded by him.

Now, in a revealing passage of his evidence, and we give the reference to this at paragraph 61, sub 2, it's at note 365 but the actual transcript reference is Day 5, page 15. Mr Berezovsky observed that it was easy, he said, to make money out of Sibneft; all you needed to do was to put the two component businesses together, take management control of it and immediately a great stream of cash would appear. Now, Mr Berezovsky really seems to have believed that his political contribution in procuring the original creation of Sibneft and its inclusion in the loans-for-shares scheme was not just a pre-condition of Mr Abramovich's ability to make money out of it but was actually the only thing that mattered.

As Mr Berezovsky saw it, he had personally created Mr Abramovich out of nothing and put him in a position where he had only to sit there for vast sums of money to flow into his lap. On that footing, Mr Abramovich was simply Mr Berezovsky's manager whom he generously allowed to keep half of Sibneft to incentivise him but effectively as a matter of largesse.

There is, I would submit, a valuable clue to Mr Berezovsky's way of thinking about these matters, and it's dealt with in this part of our written closing, in his attitude to NFK which, of course, was the jointly owned vehicle company that successfully bid for the loans-for-shares contract. NFK never acquired any shares in Sibneft. It only ever acquired a security interest in the state's retained 51 per cent holding and a right of management for three years. NFK, as we know, was 50 per cent owned by Consolidated Bank which was a company in the Logovaz Group over which Mr Berezovsky had effective management control but of which he only owned 14 per cent. The calculation -- I don't think this is disputed -- the calculation of Mr Berezovsky's stake, indirect stake in Consolidated Bank is set out at paragraph 43, at sub 2, of our written document which also refers to a fuller account of this in the opening document.

Now, it seems clear that Mr Berezovsky regarded this state of affairs, by which NFK was 50 per cent owned by a company he controlled, namely Consolidated Bank, as equivalent to him and Mr Patarkatsishvili owning 50 per cent of Sibneft, even though they never bought or paid for any shares in Sibneft. The clearest statement to this effect was, I would suggest, made as recently as June of this year in Mr Berezovsky's evidence to the French investigating magistrate. One of the main issues under investigation by the magistrate in Marseilles was whether Mr Berezovsky was a part owner of Sibneft. That was crucial because Mr Berezovsky was claiming that the money that he used to buy up and do up his property in France in 1997 had been derived from dividends attributable to his possession of those shares. When asked for his evidence about this, and the reference is H(C)8/182 but we give it in paragraph 61, sub 2(a) of our document, when asked for evidence of this he said this:

"I represented my interest with [Badri] by ... Consolidated Bank. It is clear evidence [he said] that I was formally shareholder of Sibneft."

That seems to have been the view that Mr Berezovsky took: "Because I owned Consolidated Bank and Consolidated Bank owned half of NFK, and NFK had won the loans-for-shares contract, I owned 50 per cent of Sibneft". In his witness statement, he appears to be making the same suggestion because what he says, and it's at paragraph 179 of his fourth witness statement, is that his interest in Sibneft arose from a transfer of NFK's rights in respect of Sibneft to FNK, FNK being the company that acquired the state's retained 51 per cent holding when it was eventually sold in 1997.

Now, references to his lengthy cross-examination on this question will be found at paragraph 61, sub 2(b) of our document. But what it all amounts to is a claim that his control over Consolidated Bank's 50 per cent of NFK conferred on him and Mr Patarkatsishvili an interest in FNK. Interestingly enough, Mr Jenni said that that was his understanding too. He thought NFK was the vehicle through which Mr Berezovsky owned part of Sibneft. That was an understanding which, on the face of it, he could only have derived from Mr Berezovsky or Mr Patarkatsishvili.

Now, some indication to the same effect, although the figures are somewhat different, can be found in Mr Berezovsky's statement to the press in 2000 -- we refer to this in our document at paragraph 61, sub 2(c) -- his statement to the press that he owned 7 per cent of Sibneft through what he called some Logovaz structures. Now, 7 per cent was of course 50 per cent of Mr Berezovsky's 14 per cent holding in Consolidated Bank, so he was again viewing his supposed shareholding in Sibneft as arising from Consolidated Bank's role in the loans-for-shares auction.

Now, of course, all of this is a legal muddle and nonsense. FNK, which won the 51 per cent auction in 1997, was a separate company owned by Mr Abramovich. There was no transfer of rights from NFK to FNK. However, it does look as if Mr Berezovsky thought that because a company 50 per cent owned by Consolidated Bank had won the loans-for-shares auction and thereby given Mr Abramovich his opportunity, he, Mr Berezovsky, owned part of Sibneft without the tiresome need to buy any shares.

Now, Mr Patarkatsishvili may very well, for all we know, have thought the same. His interview notes certainly suggest, although it's not entirely clear, that he did think in this way because he seems to suggest in those notes that Mr Berezovsky's interest in Sibneft had been acquired by way of their indirect participation in the loans-for-shares auction. That seems to be why Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili felt that sense of entitlement that is manifest in parts of the Le Bourget transcript and in many of Mr Berezovsky's statements in the course of giving evidence.

The problem is that an inchoate sense of entitlement based on the fact that Mr Abramovich only owned Sibneft because of what Mr Berezovsky had done to bring about the loans-for-shares auction, that is not the same thing as a legal interest in Mr Abramovich's shares and not the same thing as a contractual right equivalent to a legal interest. What Mr Berezovsky has tried to do in this case is to dress up as a legal interest something that was nothing of the sort by asserting all sorts of oral agreements and we do not accept that this was an honest process. This is not based on his honest recollection; it is Mr Berezovsky saying what he now realises he has got to say if his claim is to stand up in a court of law.

Now, Mr Berezovsky, of course, didn't need to worry too much about that before 2000. He was Mr Abramovich's political godfather and before 2000 that was quite enough to ensure the continuing flow of cash. But the difference between an inchoate sense of entitlement and a legal right became extremely important for the first time in 2000 as a result of two parallel developments. First, he started trying to shift his income abroad and found himself having to grapple with money-laundering enquiries which required that he did have legal ownership and, secondly, he fled from Russia and lost his political influence. Suddenly therefore, around 2000, it did become rather important to present what had previously been a reliable source of income from an undocumented source as a legal interest in the company and that, of course, is when he started saying that.

Now, there are two aspects of this particular issue, the existence or nonexistence of an interest in Sibneft, which I should deal with, however briefly. One is the so-called 1996 agreement and the other is the impact of Russian law. I can deal with the 1996 agreement very briefly indeed because, in my submission, it is an irrelevance. It was devised at a time when Mr Berezovsky had persuaded himself that he had originally owned a share in Sibneft through his own companies, and that is what he pleaded right up to the summary judgment application.

On that footing, the 1996 agreement was necessary in order to explain, in a manner that was consistent with his current claims, how these shares subsequently came to be registered in the name of Mr Abramovich's companies. Now, once Mr Berezovsky discovered that actually his companies had never owned any shares in Sibneft, and Mr Abramovich's companies had always owned them, the 1996 agreement was redundant. What he had done previously was to invent an agreement under which he could claim to have an interest in them, notwithstanding that they were transferred back to Mr Abramovich, and that actually never happened.

This issue, the 1996 agreement, on which my learned friends are commendably brief(?) in their written closing, only survives as part of this case in order to salve Mr Berezovsky's credibility as a witness. But it is a fiction. No distinct agreement was made in 1996, and whatever the nature of the arrangements made between Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky in 1995, they did not change in 1996.

It is common ground, if I may turn for a moment to Russian law, that whatever agreement was made in 1995 was governed by Russian law. However, no issues of Russian law arise unless the 1995 agreement was in substantially the terms alleged by Mr Berezovsky. On that footing, the question which arises is whether an agreement in those terms would be effective in Russian law.

Our submissions on this are set out in detail in section A2 by reference to the reports and oral evidence of the experts.

There are perhaps three points that it is worth making on my feet and which may assist your Ladyship in cutting through the thicket. The first is that much of the expert evidence on this question was concerned with the question of legal certainty on which the basic principle is not seriously disputed. The dispute related to the application of the principle to the facts of this case rather than to the principle itself, and the application of the principle is of course a matter for your Ladyship. The experts identify the principles of foreign law, your Ladyship then applies them.

The principle is that obligations of the parties must be sufficiently defined to be capable of enforcement by a court. For that purpose, the primary mode of enforcement is specific performance, and a Russian court would require the terms to be capable of specific performance. Professor Maggs was in fact the only expert who made that point in terms but his evidence was neither contradicted by the other experts nor challenged in cross-examination. My learned friend said in advance he didn't wish to cross-examine Professor Maggs. I indicated that he should nevertheless appear because I wished to ask him what the basis of this particular part of his report was. He explained in detail what the basis of it was, and my learned friend did not challenge that evidence.

Nobody suggests that the lobbying obligation in the 1995 agreement, which was a critical part that Mr Berezovsky was to play, nobody suggests that that was sufficiently defined to be specifically enforceable. Even Mr Rachkov disowned any suggestion of that kind. His evidence on this point, and perhaps I could invite your Ladyship if you have a hard copy of our document at paragraph 75, to just note in the margin "Day 34, page 31", which is where that point is acknowledged by Dr Rachkov.

Now, the second point to be made about the Russian law issues concerns the principle of public policy which is embodied in the Makayev case. Now, this is directly related to the facts that we have been discussing in the course of this morning. It's also a point on which there is a measure of common ground between the experts although it is very far from total. It is first of all common ground that the contribution of partners to an alleged simple partnership agreement must be lawful. The problem about the agreement alleged by Mr Berezovsky is that if he is right, then his reward for using his political clout in the Kremlin was going to be a share of the spoils in the event that his efforts were crowned with success and a favourable decision was obtained on the creation and privatisation of Sibneft. Only in that event would Mr Berezovsky, according to his own version of the agreement, get half of Sibneft and half of its profits.

Now, the law in Russia is that parties may not make an agreement under which payment is contingent on the favourable decision of a judge or official. There is no evidence that the parties -- the parties, that's to say Mr Berezovsky and Mr Abramovich -- agreed the exact methods which Mr Berezovsky was going to employ in order to persuade Mr Yeltsin and his entourage to do what he asked. The crude jobbery described in Mr Berezovsky's witness statement, by which Sibneft was created and included in the loans-for-shares scheme as a means for enabling Mr Berezovsky to fund a television campaign in Mr Yeltsin's favour, out of funds provided by Mr Abramovich, was not, so far as the evidence shows, something that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Abramovich discussed or specifically agreed would happen. The agreement was more general than that, lobbying.

But the point about the Russian rule of public policy is that it is not the reality of corruption which engages the principle of public policy, but the potential for contingency rewards to lead to corruption that constitutes the vice. It doesn't seem to have been suggested in the case about lawyers' contingency fees that the lawyer in question had actually bribed the judge. The suggestion was, however, that arrangements of that kind had the potential to encourage people to do that and were therefore contrary to public policy.

Now, both experts were in fact agreed on what appear to be the essential points in this area. First of all, they were agreed that the decision of the Constitutional Court in Makayev states a principle which expressly applies to all governmental authorities and not just to officials. Dr Rachkov points to the dissenting judgment of Judge Kononov, the only dissident in the court. It was not of course a decision of the court, but its significance is this. Judge Kononov at least acknowledged in terms that what the court had decided extended to rewards contingent on the decision not just of judges but of officials, and that was one of the points on which he criticised the reasoning of his colleagues. But it is the reasoning of his colleagues, who assented to the outcome, which makes the law. Other side opinions by concurring judges emphasise, I would suggest, the general application of the rule of public policy, particularly perhaps the concurring judgment of Judge Gadziev. Now, that is one point on which there appears to be agreement, that Makayev applies not just to court proceedings but to decisions of public officials.

Secondly, both experts agree that the object of the rule of public policy is to make unenforceable a type of agreement with a significant potential for corruption which is, of course, a very serious social and economic issue in Russia. In this country we once banned contingency fee arrangements for a completely different reason, namely its possible effect on the forensic honesty of counsel. It had never occurred to the authors of the common law rule against Champerty that it might be necessary in order to avoid problems associated with the corruption of judges. But one should not close one's eyes to the fact that judicial and administrative corruption is a very real problem in Russia, or at any rate was in the 1990s.

Thirdly, both experts agree that the decisions of the Constitutional Court are binding on other courts. It is fair to point out that the Constitutional Court is charged with interpreting the constitution, and nobody was suggesting in Makayev that the constitution itself prohibited rewards contingent on the decisions of public officials. But that, in our submission, is beside the point because what they were dealing with was a rule of public policy that had constitutional effect. It had constitutional effect because the result of that decision was that legal restrictions on lawyers' contingency fees were constitutional, notwithstanding the constitutional freedom of contract which the lawyer in that case was trying to invoke.

Now, of course, my learned friend says it was about lawyers' contingency fees, and that's quite true. But Russian courts, like English ones, apply legal principles to particular facts. Both the principle and the mischief at which the principle is aimed extend beyond fees payable for legal representation before a judge to arrangements which are contingent on the outcome of an official decision.

Now, the third point that I ought to make about Russian law in the context that I am presently concerned with, namely the 1995 agreement, concerns the requirement that a contract of this kind should be in writing, and the closely related question whether this contract was intended by its parties to be binding at all. Ultimately, the experts were agreed on the principle underlying Articles 161 and 162 -- it's pointed out to me that at [draft] line 8 I said the contingency fees were constitutional, I meant the ban on contingency fees was constitutional, notwithstanding the freedom of contract enshrined in the constitution.

Returning to my point, ultimately the experts were agreed on the principle which underlies the two relevant articles of the Russian Civil Code: Articles 161 and 162. The real differences, once again, concerned the application of the principle to the facts. Now, the principle established by the evidence of both Dr Rachkov and Mr Rozenberg is this. One, in a Russian court, a party would not be able to prove by oral evidence either the fact that an agreement had been made or what its terms were; both experts were ultimately agreed upon that. Secondly, a litigant would however be permitted to prove by oral evidence what the parties had done by way of subsequent performance, and in some cases that might be sufficient to establish either the original agreement or a variation of it by conduct. Three, the exclusion of oral evidence does not prevent the parties from putting forward explanations which are essentially unsworn statements that may be taken into account by the court but these have got to be verified. The result is that in a case where the only evidence about the fact or the terms of an agreement is the oral evidence of witnesses, the agreement cannot be proved. We have given the references to that at paragraph 112 of our document. I would invite your Ladyship to add opposite note 522 a reference to Day 34, pages 95 to 97, where Dr Rachkov acknowledged that, if the only evidence about the fact or terms of the agreement was the oral evidence of witnesses, the agreement could not be established.

Now, in these circumstances, it seems clear that the present claim could not be proved by oral evidence unless subsequent performance established its existence. The difficulty about that suggestion is that what is relied upon as subsequent performance is equivocal. It is at least as consistent with payment for the services of a krysha as with payment under a contract in the terms alleged by Mr Berezovsky. Indeed the timing and amount of the payments show that it's a good deal more consistent with payment for the services of a krysha.

The real issue, I would suggest, in the absence of writing, is a question which both sides agree is one for English law, namely whether this is a rule of substance or a rule of procedure. Our submissions about that are at paragraphs 113 to 116 of our document but, broadly speaking, the rule of English private international law is that the court takes a nontechnical approach to these questions with a view to giving effect to the foreign law rather than undermining it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That was the question I think I asked in the course of evidence.

MR SUMPTION: Indeed. Now, if your Ladyship -- I'm not going to take up much time referring to authority but I wonder if we can hand up --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: There's quite a lot there in the footnotes, do you want me to go off and read these?

MR SUMPTION: Can I take your Ladyship to the quite short passages from Dicey, Morris and Collins, because I think that is probably the quickest way of dealing with this.

If your Ladyship would take page 177 in the clip that I've just handed up. The general principle is described at paragraph 7-003:

"While procedure is governed by the lex fori, matters of substance are governed by the law to which the court is directed by its choice of law rule. Dicey wrote that English lawyers gave the widest possible extension to the meaning of the term 'procedure'. As a matter of history this is true, and a court may even today be tempted to extend the meaning of 'procedure' in order to invade an unsatisfactory choice of law rule. But in general the attitude expressed by Dicey has fallen into disfavour precisely because it tends to frustrate the purpose of choice of law rules. In John Pfeiffer v Rogerson, the High Court of Australia stated:

"Matters that affect the existence, extent or enforceability of the rights or duties of the parties to an action are matters that, on their face, appear to be concerned with issues of substance. Thus some questions which were at one time thought of wholly in terms of procedure are now considered to be procedural in some of their aspects only. The development of the law as to damages illustrates this process.'

"The difficulty in applying this rule lies in discriminating between rules of procedure and rules of substance. The distinction is by no means clear cut. In drawing it, regard should be had in each case to the purpose for which the distinction is being used and the consequence of the decision in the instant context. The rule under examination is to be considered as a whole without giving undue weight to verbal formulae as suggested by previous judges or by the draftsman of a statute to introduce the rule. So the words 'where proceedings are taken in any court' have been held to introduce a rule of substance.

"The mechanistic approach sometimes found in English cases of relying on the classification of the introductory verbal formula, as used in a quite different statute, or of accepting a classification as procedural or substantive made for some purpose quite unrelated to the conflict of laws is also now discredited. The distinction may have to be drawn in one place for the purposes of this rule but in another place for the purpose of the rule that statutes affecting procedure are, while statutes affecting substance are not presumed to have retrospective effect. This is not to say that the distinction may not be drawn in the same place for many purposes, it is merely to deny that it must necessarily be drawn in the same place for all purposes."

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So it's up to me to get on with it, basically.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, yes.

The other passage I wanted to read, which your Ladyship may wish to look at over the break, is at pages 183 to 184, paragraphs 7-015 to 7-016, but primarily 7-015. If your Ladyship has time to read that, that would assist.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes certainly, I'll read that over the break.

Very well. Two o'clock.

(1.00 pm)

(The short adjournment)

(2.00 pm)

MR SUMPTION: I see your Ladyship clutching Dicey and Morris.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've read it.

MR SUMPTION: Obviously the critical point that I'm taking from this is in 7-015, that it's not everything that appears in the treatise on the law of evidence that's to be classified internationally as adjectival law. The flexible approach that is described there is representing the modern alternative to the rather narrower approach taken by Dicey 100 years ago.

Now, in deciding the question of English law, as I think both parties are agreed, the court obviously takes account of the characteristics of the foreign law rule established by the foreign law experts. The way that the foreign law would itself classify its own rule is not decisive but it may of course assist the court in establishing what the relevant characteristics of the foreign law really are and what its purpose is.

Now, the decisive points in this context I would suggest are these. First of all, Article 161 is now agreed to be substantive as a matter of Russian law. That appeared at one stage to be a matter of dispute between the experts, but the reference as given at paragraph 115, and in particular note 535 of our document, established that it is no longer in issue.

At common law this provision, 161, would be regarded as substantive because it has a normative purpose, ie a purpose outside the regulation of the procedure of the court, namely the protection of parties from being held to oral agreements without unequivocal evidence connecting them with it and establishing their consent.

This is not, in other words, a rule which exists for the better regulation of the court's proceedings but for the protection of parties alleged to have entered into contracts.

The real issue --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think I should just get up 161 and 162.

MR SUMPTION: Yes, of course. Your Ladyship will find the relevant parts actually quoted verbatim at paragraph 110 of our closing which may be the quickest way --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, that's fine.

MR SUMPTION: -- to arrive at it. 161 is the rule, and 162 is the consequences of breach of the rule. The real issue concerns the impact of 162 on the way that an English court should treat these articles. Now, essentially, Article 162 lays down the mode of giving credit(?) to a substantive rule of law to be found in 161.

The object of Article 162 is not to determine how court proceedings are to be conducted, it is in reality to determine in what circumstances a particular obligation is to be recognised. For that reason, in our submission, it cannot be regarded as part of the law of evidence at all. Having regard to its purpose, it can really only be regarded as part of the law of obligations, something which is by its nature substantive.

Now, it follows, I would suggest, that unless the English court applies a corresponding restriction on the mode of proof, it will in fact not be giving any effect to the substantive law of the Russian Federation as laid down in 161, or to the underlying purpose of Article 161. This is, I would suggest, for that reason a classic instance of the class of case referred to in the extract from Dicey, Morris and Collins where the proper law determines, to use the expression in 7-015, what evidence need or may be given to prove a particular kind of obligation, in this case an obligation exceeding the value threshold in 161.

Now, this provision, 161 and 162, taking them together, is simply the Russian equivalent of the restrictions on proof of oral agreements above a threshold value, which are in fact quite common to civil law systems, and this one seems fairly clearly to be derived from Article 1341 of the French Civil Code, which your Ladyship may recall being referred to in the textbook by Luntz on Russian law, and which we produced in the course of Dr Rachkov's evidence.

Now, that is why this particular rule, 161 and 162 taken together, is classified in Professor Luntz's treatise on the Russian conflict of laws as substantive, and we give the reference to that at paragraph 115 of our document, and in fact exactly the same rule is taken by the principal textbook relied upon by my learned friends, which is the textbook of Professor Zhuikov. The reference is given in 116 sub 2, in particular at note 538.

Now, it's right to say that there is English authority that section 4 of the Statute of Frauds, which provides that "no action shall be brought" on an oral guarantee, should be classified as procedural. The case --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I was going to ask you about the Statute of Frauds, or the LPA. I can't remember what the relevant section -- section 40 or something?

MR SUMPTION: The LPA is introduced in exactly the same way, and the same case, so far as it's still good law, would apply to it. The leading case so far as the Statute of Frauds is concerned is Leroux v Brown, a decision of 1852, in which the Statute of Frauds was applied on this ground to a French law contract, on the grounds that although the Statute of Frauds was no part of the proper law of the contract, which was in fact valid and enforceable in France, it was procedural and therefore the English court was bound as part of its own procedural law to apply it.

Now, that is a decision which was expressly made on the construction of the Statute of Frauds, and in particular on the opening formula, which is also to be found in the Law of Property Act, no action shall be brought. It has no bearing on the classification, therefore, of the Russian law rule. It's essentially based on the construction of the English statute and on the question whether those introductory words have the effect, because they regulate the circumstances in which one can bring an action, as part of the procedural law.

Now, in fact, even in the reverse situation, the application of a foreign law rule about forms of contract in England, Leroux is a very much criticised decision. I do not doubt that it is good law this side of the Supreme Court, but it has in fact been much criticised academically and it has almost certainly been overruled by the enactment into English law of the Rome Convention.

This point is made, if your Ladyship would take back the clip of extracts from Dicey, Morris and Collins, at page 185 of the extract. There's a heading at the bottom of the page, "Requirement of Written Evidence":

"Section 4 of the Statute of Frauds 1677 provided that no action shall be brought on a number of contracts unless the agreement, or a note or memorandum thereof, was in writing. Section 4 now applies only to contracts of guarantee. It was held in Leroux v Brown that section 4 contained a rule of procedure and therefore prevented the enforcement in England of an oral contract governed by French law which could have been sued on in France. This decision has been severely criticised by writers on the ground that no serious procedural inconvenience would be caused by admitting oral evidence of a contract within section 4. Indeed the court is bound to admit such evidence if the contract is not set up for the purposes of enforcement but as a defence. To characterise the section as procedural merely because it says no action shall be brought is to regard the form of the section as more important than its substance. To characterise it as --"

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay, I've read that. I've read down to 7-21.

MR SUMPTION: That is the relevant part, my Lady, and there's a reference to the significance having been reduced by Article 14.2 of the Rome Convention.

If your Ladyship will turn on in the clip to page 1607, there is also --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That seems to have trumped it, doesn't it?

MR SUMPTION: -- an observation about 14.2, which is --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is that right, that Article 14.2 has made it irrelevant?

MR SUMPTION: In our submission, that is so. Article 14.2 has trumped it, but Article 14.2 is of course a provision which my learned friends rely on in itself and I will show your Ladyship that. But paragraph 32.179 deals with the application of Article 14.2 as reversing the effect of Leroux v Brown.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mm.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, since my learned friends refer to 14.2 as itself supporting their position, perhaps I might invite your Ladyship to turn that up. If we can hand these up, these are all either already on Magnum or will be uploaded to it, but it seems convenient simply to pass one up for the moment. (Handed)

Your Ladyship will find Article 14.2 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've got it.

MR SUMPTION: In order to see the background to 14.2 you need to start at 9.1 which deals with formal validity:

"A contract concluded between persons who are in the same country is formally valid if it satisfies the formal requirements of the law which governs it under this convention or the law of the country where it is concluded."

14.2, which is rather misleadingly headed "Burden of Proof Et cetera", the sting being in the "Et cetera", says:

"A contract or an act intended to have legal effect may be proved by any mode of proof recognised by the law of the forum, or by any of the laws referred to in Article 9 under which that contract or act is formally valid, provided that such mode of proof can be administered by the forum."

Now, 14.2, in our submission, has nothing to do with the question now before your Ladyship. It's concerned with formal validity, and its effect is that if the formal validity of a contract is governed by a foreign law under Article 9 then in England it may be proved either by a method recognised by the law of England or by a method recognised by one of the Article 9 laws.

The result therefore is, as Dicey, Morris and Collins say, to reverse the decision in Leroux by providing that a contract valid under the law governing its formal validity is not to be treated as invalid simply because a similar contract would not be formally valid in England.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Why does that have nothing to do with the question which I've got to decide?

MR SUMPTION: Well, Article 14.2 is concerned with formal validity because it operates by reference to Article 9 which unquestionably is concerned with formal validity. It is dealing with a situation in which an agreement is not enforceable because it isn't regarded as formally valid in England or -- sorry, 14.2 is dealing with a situation in which the law of the forum in England, ie the procedural law, would not recognise a particular agreement as enforceable, and essentially provides that if it would be formally valid under a relevant foreign law then it may be proved under that law.

Now, what this means is that if a contract of guarantee, for example, made between persons in France were unenforceable in England because of section 4 of the Statute of Frauds --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It can be proved orally.

MR SUMPTION: -- it could be proved orally.

Suppose, therefore, to take an invented example but not an implausible one, that under French law you can imagine the thing being the other way around. Suppose that under French law, a contract was enforceable in France provided that it was made in the presence of a huissier, or in front of at least two witnesses, you would be entitled to prove it in England by calling a huissier and two witnesses.

Article 14.2, therefore, is a provision which saves contracts valid under the relevant foreign law from being treated as invalid under the procedural law of England, but it only deals with a case where a contract is formally valid according to the law governing its formal validity. It doesn't authorise the English court, in other words, to recognise a contract which is formally invalid under the relevant foreign law, and it's not concerned at all with the case where what is at issue is not formal validity but a restriction on the circumstances in which a court can recognise informal contracts.

Now I observed, in introducing this point, that it was closely related to the question whether there was any intention to create legal relations, and I made that statement for this reason. The distinction between substantive and procedural law of course only arises for consideration because a Russian law dispute is being heard in an English court. Both kinds of rule would be applied as a matter of course in a Russian court without any need to distinguish between them.

Now, a Russian court is of course the only court which the parties can possibly have envisaged, at 1995, would be deciding disputes. And Russian law, on the evidence of both experts, recognises the concept of agreements which either expressly or by virtue of the surrounding circumstances are intended to be binding in honour only and not in law.

Now, it's agreed between the experts that the test for an agreement intended to be binding in honour and not in law only is objective, like any other aspect of the application or interpretation of agreements. So the fact that an agreement is not in writing in a jurisdiction whose case law requires high value agreements to be in writing is, in our submission, a very powerful indication, objectively speaking, that it wasn't intended to be binding in law.

Articles 161 and 162 arise not only as defences in themselves but as a strong evidential indication that, looking at the matter objectively, the parties cannot have intended that this should be binding in law because in circumstances where they would have thought as a matter of course that if it was binding any contract of this sort was going to come before a Russian court, they must be taken to know that it would not be enforceable there by oral evidence.

Now, that is in our submission an indication which is borne out by the vagueness of the alleged agreement and by its subject matter. In our submission, it is hardly conceivable that these parties could have intended, on either version of what was agreed, that obligations of this kind involving, as far as Mr Berezovsky was concerned, the use of his political connections and political influence behind the scenes at the highest levels of the Russian State, could ever have been intended by the parties to come before the court.

And that is, as I have submitted, in another jurisdiction, because they were dealing with an arrangement made under an alternative system of obligation. This was not intended to be legally binding. Its subject matter, its informality and its vagueness all point to that conclusion.

My Lady, may I turn to the next of the issues --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I don't need to be worried then about what on earth is constituted by the explanations of the parties?

MR SUMPTION: In our submission, no, because we don't dispute that explanations are matters which a party precluded from giving oral evidence is entitled to put before the court. It doesn't have the status of sworn evidence. But the problem is, as both expert witnesses have agreed, the problem is that an explanation is only entitled to wait so far as it is verified by evidence. And that was why Dr Rachkov, in the passage whose reference I invited you to write in the margin, accepted that if there's no other evidence of the existence of the agreement, and if future performance cannot establish the existence or terms of the agreement, then the agreement is a non-starter and that's an end of it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

MR SUMPTION: Now, my Lady, may I turn to the next of the major issues which I identified as critical when I stood up this morning, which is the question of the threats that are said to have induced Mr Berezovsky to sell his interest in Sibneft, if indeed he had an interest in Sibneft.

Now, it's one of the oddities of this part of the case that most of the attention at the trial has been devoted to the Cap d'Antibes meeting and to the alleged threats relating to ORT even though, as I've pointed out, no relief is actually claimed in respect of these matters. I've already made some general observations on this subject. There is a very full summary of the evidence about the alleged ORT threat at paragraphs 161 to 205 of our closing.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've read that.

MR SUMPTION: All I propose to do by way of addition to this well-worn subject is to deal with what appear to be the main points made in Mr Berezovsky's written closing about the alleged ORT threats before moving on to what really appears to matter, which is the alleged Sibneft threats.

Now, the first point that they make is that there must have been intimidation because otherwise why would Mr Berezovsky have agreed to sell when he would obviously have preferred to hang on to ORT, and why would he have agreed, they ask forensically, to sell for $150 million when they had been offered $300 million by the Russian Government through Mr Lesin shortly after the interviews which they refer to with Mr Voloshin and President Putin? Why indeed, they ask, would Mr Abramovich have wanted to have ORT unless he was acquiring it as a tool of the Russian Government?

Now, the answer to these questions, in our submission, are largely to be found in Mr Patarkatsishvili's interview notes. They establish that the Lesin offer was in fact pursued at a time, but shortly afterwards was reduced to $150 million, whereupon the negotiations with Mr Lesin were broken off.

The references to all this will be found in our closing at paragraphs 173, 174 and 196.

Now, what happened was that after Mr Lesin had halved his offer, Mr Patarkatsishvili, who was handling this matter, then approached Mr Abramovich because, as he described in his notes, he saw Mr Abramovich as a more trustworthy negotiating partner. "We needed a trustworthy man", he said. And ultimately, a price was agreed with Mr Abramovich corresponding to the reduced price offered by Mr Lesin.

At about this time Mr Berezovsky of course fled from Russia with very little money, and at the same time badly needed to raise funds. Now, what Mr Patarkatsishvili's interview notes record is that Mr Abramovich was willing to buy in order to help them, and in his oral evidence he said that the row between Mr Berezovsky and Mr Putin was now beginning to hurt his interests because of his public association with Mr Berezovsky, and he saw the purchase of ORT as a way of reducing the temperature.

So there is actually no particular mystery about why a price of 150 million should have been acceptable and why the deal was done with Mr Abramovich.

Mr Berezovsky's whole case depends upon the proposition that he had never intended to sell his stake in ORT until 7 December, because that appears now to be his case, or possibly the 8th -- or we're told by my learned friends in their written closing the 9th -- until he was threatened on the terrace of his house at Cap d'Antibes. The evidence, in our submission, clearly establishes that the deal was agreed in principle beforehand and that the meeting at Cap d'Antibes did not occur.

Now, those conclusions are supported by a considerable volume of corroborative evidence including, rather strikingly, the evidence of Mr Goldfarb whose evidence in cross-examination was that he must have been at Mr Berezovsky's property during 7 and 8 December, but did not, while he was there, either see or hear of any visit by Mr Abramovich.

The two points which seem critical, that the deal was agreed in principle before the arrest of Mr Glushkov and that the meeting in December never happened, are both supported by that evidence, both of them are challenged, but the challenge can fairly be described as thin.

In relation to the negotiations before the arrest of Mr Glushkov my learned friends suggest that the SBS notification document, which was served in accordance with the pre-emption rights for a private company, was prepared in December or January, although the metadata in fact show that it was prepared on 16 November. They assert that the Logovaz board minute was backdated and that that was actually prepared in December or January, although absolutely no reason is given why Logovaz should have wanted to backdate its own board minutes, and there is in fact no evidence that they did, other than Mr Dubov's evidence that they must have done because otherwise it would be inconsistent with his own evidence that nothing was done within Logovaz until the end of December.

Now, nothing is said by my learned friends about the fact that Mr Abramovich actually began to meet ORT's costs from October 2000 onwards. That is a fact to which Mr Abramovich spoke in the course of his cross-examination, and it is confirmed by the terms of the bolshoi balance which reflected the fact, of which Mr Abramovich also spoke, that agreement in principle had in fact been reached by the end of October.

At paragraph 180 your Ladyship will find the relevant references to that.

Now, Mr Abramovich --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Hang on, just let me check that. 180?

MR SUMPTION: 180, yes.

Paragraph 178 Ms Davies tells me, I apologise for that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: 178. Yes, I see. The reference is there to the bolshoi balance so I can get it from that. Yes, very well.

MR SUMPTION: Absolutely nothing, of course, is said about the fact that Mr Abramovich began to put quite substantial sums of money into a company which he considered that he had, although the deal hadn't been signed off, agreed in principle he was buying with Mr Patarkatsishvili back in October.

Now, there appears to be a suggestion in my learned friends' closing that Mr Patarkatsishvili was dealing with Mr Abramovich without Mr Berezovsky's authority, but there is absolutely no evidence to support that and it doesn't seem very likely, not least because one thing which the Le Bourget transcript plainly establishes, and the relevant extracts are summarised at paragraphs 171 to 182 of our document, but the Le Bourget transcript plainly establishes that the deal had been done in principle by 6 December.

Particularly important in this context are the private conversation between Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili recorded at boxes 408-11, referred to in those paragraphs, which occurred while Mr Abramovich was speaking on the phone, and are simply left out of the discussion of this question in my learned friends' written closing. Their significance is that of the many passages which indicate that Mr Berezovsky was perfectly happy with what Mr Patarkatsishvili had negotiated, that was one which can't be presented as a funny game that they were playing together on Mr Abramovich because, at the time, Mr Abramovich was not dealing with them at all, he was on the phone to somebody else and this was something that they were saying among themselves.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Was he out of the room?

MR SUMPTION: No, he wasn't out of the room, and technically, therefore, he could have had one ear to Mr Gorodilov on the phone and another ear to what was being muttered between Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili in the same room, and it was a small room.

At the same time, it does seem bizarre that these parties, clearly addressing each other, they couldn't actually have been addressing Mr Abramovich, should have exchanged words which indicated that they were happy to go ahead if in fact Mr Berezovsky was adamant that Mr Patarkatsishvili was not authorised to deal with this.

Now, the record of Mr Abramovich's movements between 6 December and the beginning of January is the other aspect of this matter that counts. Paragraph 849 of my learned friends' written closing is all that they have to say on that subject, and I have to say it's clutching at straws.

There is a misrepresentation of Mr Abramovich's evidence about the time required to have an aircraft made ready, to obtain flight clearance, and to fly to France and then back to Moscow, which effectively assumes that Mr Abramovich could have done it, but that would assume that he had an aircraft on stand-by when no such suggestion was in fact ever made.

The correct position on this we have summarised at paragraph 193 sub 3 of our own document.

There is in this part of my learned friends' closing --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just a second, Mr Sumption.

MR SUMPTION: Sorry. (Pause)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR SUMPTION: In this, there is no attempt to explain by my learned friends the automatic record of passport swipes at entry and exit which match the stamps in Mr Abramovich's passport and show that he didn't leave Russia in the whole of the relevant period. They say, well, occasionally you can leave Russia and for some reason that's not explained, no stamp appears.

It would be necessary, of course, for this to be a correct hypothesis, that four passport stamps should fail to appear on the passport, namely the Russian and French stamps on entry into France, and the French and Russian stamps on departure. All four of them would have, by some oversight or administrative lapse, not to have appeared. Moreover, this is a theory that does not explain the evidence which is given by the Russian border service that whether or not a stamp appears in the passport, a passport is invariably swiped through a machine and an automatic computerised record generated which shows that in fact Mr Abramovich did not leave Russia, after arriving there on night of 6 December, until the beginning of January.

There is then a series of pot shots taken by my learned friends at the evidence of Mr Abramovich's doings in Moscow between 7 and 10 December, suggesting ever more remarkable theories about how all of this evidence, not just a bit of it but all of it, which points to Mr Abramovich being in Russia at the time is wrong and is, as I understand it, suggesting that your Ladyship should prefer to that evidence a theory about Mr Abramovich's movements which is supported by no evidence at all.

Now, the most charitable thing that one can say about Dr Nosova's evidence on this point is that she learnt of the threats -- her evidence, as your Ladyship will recall, was that she learnt of the threats from Mr Patarkatsishvili in the middle of December over breakfast at the George V Hotel in Paris. Perhaps the most charitable thing one can say about that is that she is mistaken. A more realistic view of her evidence is that, having said nothing at all about this, at a time when Mr Berezovsky was claiming that the meeting happened after the middle of December, shortly before Christmas at Cap d'Antibes, she made up that part of her evidence when Mr Berezovsky's choice switched to 7 December in order to support it. Dr Nosova's enormous financial interest in the outcome of this trial and her absence of candour in disclosing that interest must inevitably, I would suggest, reduce even further the confidence that one can have in her evidence, especially when it is produced in her final witness statement the night before she actually gave evidence.

I regret to say that the same point can fairly be made of Ms Gorbunova's evidence. She claimed for the first time in cross-examination to have actually overheard part of the conversation on the terrace of the Chateau de la Garoupe when, in her witness statement, she had said nothing about this except that she had learnt of the threats later from Mr Berezovsky.

It's unfortunately impossible, however charitable one is going to be about Ms Gorbunova's evidence or Dr Nosova's evidence, to be particularly charitable about Mr Berezovsky's evidence. He, in our submission, has made up the whole of this incident in order to lend verisimilitude to what he says about the subsequent Sibneft threats, and to those threats, which are the substance of the matter which your Ladyship has to decide, I now turn.

The material going to the Sibneft threats is within a rather narrower compass than the ORT threats, in part because Mr Berezovsky has no direct evidence to give about these threats at all; they were made, according to him, to Mr Patarkatsishvili. We have dealt with the evidence on these points between paragraphs 205 and 207 of our document.

Again, I don't intend on my feet to duplicate material which is much more conveniently summarised in writing. What I may --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've read your skeleton argument.

MR SUMPTION: If I may simply identify what appear to be the salient points in the light of what my learned friends say in their document. There are really three salient points. The first is that neither the alleged threat that Sibneft would be expropriated, nor the alleged threat that Mr Glushkov would be kept in jail, are, on their face, threats of adverse action by Mr Abramovich. They are both threats of adverse action by the Russian State. So on the face, therefore, of these allegations they are not actionable threats at all.

Mr Berezovsky says that it is implicit, although not actually stated, that Mr Abramovich was threatening that he himself would bring those consequences about, and he says that Mr Berezovsky understood -- Mr Berezovsky says that he himself understood it in that way.

Now, that of course is based entirely on the suggestion that this is the inference which Mr Berezovsky reasonably drew from Mr Abramovich's conduct at Cap d'Antibes. So that if that meeting did not occur, the basis on which Mr Abramovich is saying one thing is interpreted as meaning another appears to vanish. In fact I would suggest there is actually nothing, even on the footing that the Cap d'Antibes meeting occurred, which could possibly justify the inference anyway, but the point falls away if the meeting never happened.

The second salient point is that the Sibneft expropriation threat, which is alleged by Mr Berezovsky, is quite different from the one that he had consistently made between 2003 and the beginning of these proceedings four years later in 2007. Before he began these proceedings the allegation was that Mr Abramovich told Mr Berezovsky that Sibneft, as a company, would be attacked by agencies of the state -- sorry, that Mr Abramovich told Mr Patarkatsishvili that Sibneft would be attacked by agencies of the Russian State if Mr Berezovsky continued to be associated with it.

The evidence for that is set out in our document at paragraphs 208 to 209.

The allegation was put in that way in successive press interviews. It was put in that way in Mr Berezovsky's witness statement in support of Mr Chernoi's application for permission to serve the writ in his own action out of the jurisdiction of Mr Deripaska. And in fact it was put in that way in the letter before action written to my clients by Carter Ruck.

Now, that is a statement that Sibneft would be attacked by the agencies of the state which really can't be viewed as a threat of adverse action by Mr Abramovich since Mr Abramovich could not conceivably threaten to bring his own company down, even on the footing that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili owned half of it. The allegation was in fact only restated as a threat by Mr Abramovich himself in the second edition of the particulars of claim which was served in September 2007. It is obvious that what happened in the autumn of 2007 is that somebody looked at what Mr Berezovsky would have to say in order to make out a claim in tort, and Mr Berezovsky simply said that.

The third salient point is that Mr Berezovsky's allegation that he was threatened is in fact inconsistent with what Mr Patarkatsishvili, who was there -- indeed the only person who was there apart from Mr Fomichev who has not been called, and Ms Panchenko and Mr Abramovich -- with what Mr Patarkatsishvili told Mr Berezovsky's solicitors.

His evidence, as recorded by those solicitors, was given on the basis, as we accept, that he was assuming that he and Mr Berezovsky did have an interest in Sibneft which they sold out, and that much is of course consistent with Mr Berezovsky's case in this action. But what Mr Patarkatsishvili had to say is not at all consistent with the alleged threats.

He said, one, that Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky wanted, as he put it, to sell out of Sibneft because they needed the money and it was therefore they who initiated the negotiations. Secondly, he said that Mr Abramovich had said that he personally was under pressure from the Kremlin to bring an end to his relations with Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, which is not equivalent to a threat to expropriate their interests.

Thirdly, Mr Patarkatsishvili said that he thought that the company, rather than their interest in it, would become a target if that didn't happen. Fourth, Mr Patarkatsishvili said that Mr Glushkov wasn't mentioned at the Munich meeting, the only meeting that was referred to in the interviews. And at the 2007 interviews which occurred rather later, in Mr Berezovsky's presence, that statement is embellished with the suggestion that Mr Glushkov was actually indirectly mentioned when Mr Patarkatsishvili asked Mr Abramovich at these meetings whether he was aware of "our main issue", and Mr Abramovich said that he was. Well, whether or not that exchange actually occurred, it certainly doesn't amount to any kind of threat to Mr Glushkov's position.

Fifth, Mr Patarkatsishvili said that Mr Glushkov was not a person who Mr Abramovich had the influence to assist anyway. And sixth, he says that he, Mr Patarkatsishvili, thought that the terms relating to Sibneft were in fact fair.

Now, if Mr Berezovsky was blackmailed by Mr Abramovich in and before May 2001, if that is what happened, then Mr Patarkatsishvili was being blackmailed as well, indeed far more directly blackmailed because he was, on this view of the matter, the conduit to Mr Berezovsky. It's therefore extremely unlikely that Mr Patarkatsishvili would have forgotten or overlooked that fact when he was being interviewed by Mr Berezovsky's solicitors, and equally unlikely that Mr Abramovich would actually have said such a thing.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Was Mr Patarkatsishvili a friend of Mr Glushkov?

MR SUMPTION: My understanding is that he was.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I can't remember what the evidence was about that.

MR SUMPTION: The evidence was that they were both friends of Mr Glushkov. I think it's fair to say that Mr Berezovsky's connection with Mr Glushkov was older and, so to speak, more intimate, but Mr Patarkatsishvili was also extremely concerned with Mr Glushkov's position, and your Ladyship may recall that it was Mr Patarkatsishvili who engaged in the prolonged negotiations in 2001 with various rather shadowy emissaries of the Russian Government in relation to the possible release.

What Mr Glushkov himself says at paragraph 23 of his witness statement is:

"Badri and my family also became close. We spent a fantastic summer on the Black Sea together. Badri's daughters were quite often guests of mine along with their parents."

So there is a connection with him also.

Mr Glushkov also says at paragraph 22 that Mr Berezovsky introduced him to Badri in about 1992:

"... although I knew of him before then."

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, thank you.

MR SUMPTION: They became great friends.

The fourth salient point is that the whole notion of a threat is, in our submission, inherently bizarre in the circumstances in which these people found themselves.

How do you expropriate something that isn't a proprietary interest at all but merely a personal contractual right against Mr Abramovich, which is the case that is now being made? Is it seriously being suggested that Mr Abramovich threatened that, unless Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili abandoned their contractual rights, he would use his influence to ensure that those contractual rights against him were transferred to the state? This is a particularly strange suggestion, but it is what it would have to amount to if this allegation were even to be coherent.

Now, what my learned friends in their closing say about this is, well, there were all sorts of unpleasant things the state could have done: tax raids, investigations, Maski raids and all the rest of it, but all of that consists of unpleasant things that could have been done to the company and not expropriatory acts against Mr Berezovsky's and Mr Patarkatsishvili's interests. That could only have happened by the Russian State substituting itself for Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili as Mr Abramovich's so-called partners, and that is hardly something that Mr Abramovich is likely to have been threatening.

The next salient point, and the last one to which attention should be drawn, is this: how do you explain the absence of any paper if this was really a sale or release of Mr Abramovich's contractual obligations to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili? Mr Berezovsky is saying, he says this in his witness statement, that by May 2001 he was well aware that it was vitally important to document the transaction, and he gives in his witness statement various reasons why he and Mr Patarkatsishvili were satisfied that it would have to be documented. It would have to be documented so that it could be enforced against Mr Abramovich, it would have to be documented so that they would have, or Mr Berezovsky would have, evidence that he could use in the proceedings that he claims he intended to bring in due course against Mr Abramovich, and it would have to be documented in order to satisfy the western banks to which the proceeds were going to be transferred.

Mr Berezovsky went to great lengths with Mr Curtis and Mr Fomichev and Mr Patarkatsishvili to produce a bogus document trail for this purpose. Yet the evidence suggests that he never so much as asked Mr Abramovich to supply a document. Mr Abramovich was asked whether -- well, he gave evidence in his witness statement and said:

"I was never asked for a document recording the terms on which I was paying over 1.3 billion."

Now, if that 1.3 billion was being handed over pursuant to a sale agreement and a release of Mr Abramovich's contractual obligations, one would certainly have expected that they would want that fact documented, and one would have expected that Mr Abramovich would have wanted it documented, because, according to Mr Berezovsky, Mr Abramovich made him sell out by threatening him. If Mr Abramovich had really done that, then surely he would have wanted to ensure that he got a contractual release. Mr Curtis in fact drafted a contractual release for Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili to get from Mr Abramovich. But, so far as the evidence shows, they never even proposed that to him.

In our submission, this story simply doesn't stack up, quite apart from the fact that there is no evidence to support it other than the uncorroborated hearsay evidence of a particularly unreliable witness, namely Mr Berezovsky himself.

My Lady, may I turn at this point to the Devonian agreement which is the sole basis, apart from a mystifying estoppel claim, on which Mr Berezovsky claims to have suffered by the supposed intimidation which Mr Patarkatsishvili experienced in May 2001.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Before you do that, Mr Sumption, may I ask this question: what, if anything, is the relevance of the allegation of sale at an undervalue? I know that valuation issues aren't being decided at this stage for various reasons, but is it relevant to liability that, as Mr Berezovsky alleges, the interest was sold at an undervalue? And if so, is it right that the decision on the issue of intimidation should be decided absent that evidence?

MR SUMPTION: Well, I understood it to be agreed between the parties that it was in fact perfectly possible for your Ladyship to decide it in the absence of the valuation evidence because the valuation evidence is concerned with producing, on a basis which is admittedly disputed, but it's concerned with producing a discounted cashflow valuation of the company. Nobody is suggesting that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, or anyone else for that matter, actually carried out any kind of valuation, even a back of the envelope calculation. It was simply their general impression, to which Mr Berezovsky gives evidence as far as he is concerned, that Sibneft was worth a lot more than 1.3 billion.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: The point I'm making is it could be said that in certain circumstances, one of the aspects of a sale as a result of intimidation was that the asset was sold for much less than it was objectively worth.

MR SUMPTION: I can see that entirely.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And as I understand it, apart from the subjective evidence about what Mr Glushkov and Mr Berezovsky thought, there is no other evidence -- or sorry, Mr Patarkatsishvili thought, there is no other evidence about the relevance of the 1.3 billion to the actual value, whatever it might have been, of Sibneft.

MR SUMPTION: Apart from what they -- there is first of all Mr Berezovsky's subjective evidence, there is also the evidence given by Mr Shvidler.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I remember that.

MR SUMPTION: And Mr Tenenbaum.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: About the market cap.

MR SUMPTION: About the market cap. My learned friend rubbishes that on the ground that the market cap of an illiquid 12 per cent that was floating in the market is of no relevance.

Of course, the difference between a 12 per cent in the market and a 44 per cent interest in value terms is likely to depend on whether the 44 per cent stake had a strategic value. The problem is that if you acquired the 44 per cent stake, you would be acquiring a stake that would make you not -- the strategic value of it would be much diminished by the fact that the other 44 per cent was owned by a man who had dominated the company since 1995.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, I think my question is much simpler. Are you asking me to come to any conclusion about the objective value of Sibneft at the time?

MR SUMPTION: No.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: In relation to the issue on intimidation?

MR SUMPTION: No, I'm not, and indeed if I were asking your Ladyship to do that, I could not properly have supported the suggestion that the valuation evidence should be deferred to see whether it arises after judgment.

I understood that it was on the basis that your Ladyship did not need to arrive at an objective value that both parties were content with that course.

Of course, it's fair to say that if one is trying to explain why Mr Berezovsky sold out of an interest in Sibneft, if indeed he had one, what would matter was not the objective evidence, assuming that Mr Berezovsky didn't have any objective evidence at the time, but what he thought. Suppose that objectively Sibneft was worth 1 billion, but Mr Berezovsky mistakenly believed that it was worth 3 billion, on that hypothesis his view of the value would be just as relevant in determining whether he was intimidated into selling out of it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I can see all those sort of sophisticated hypotheses, I was just putting the simple point that if in fact it was obviously at an undervalue that might feed into the question as to whether or not there had been an intimidation.

MR SUMPTION: Well, it might. In our submission, it would be impossible to contend that the undervalue was obvious, even if there was an undervalue, which we deny. But of course, before you can get to the question whether it was at an undervalue, you have to satisfy yourself that it is a sale that is happening in May 2001. And that, of course, is where the real hurdle lies.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

MR SUMPTION: Now, we have submitted in section A4 of our written closing that the Devonia agreement does not actually purport to transfer the only right which Mr Berezovsky now claims to have acquired under the 1995 agreement, namely a contractual right under a simple partnership agreement. Even the most liberal interpretation of Chartbrook v Persimmon would not justify the view that what is purported to be a proprietary equitable interest, and a contract purporting to transfer a proprietary equitable interest in a company, can in fact be effective to -- can transfer something which was not proprietary at all but simply a contractual right against Mr Abramovich.

One is bound to ask oneself, what would the sheikh have thought if he had been told: actually, although this contract says you're getting an equitable interest, of which Mr Abramovich is the trustee, what you're actually getting is an unsecured contractual right which you will have to enforce by suing him in Russia or wherever he may be found. Now, one can imagine a somewhat bad tempered response to that enquiry, which is perhaps a good way of illustrating the extreme difference between the two things.

Now, what this agreement therefore purports to transfer is not something that Mr Berezovsky now claims to have had but, in our submission, none of this actually matters because the evidence is frankly overwhelming that this was simply a sham designed to deceive banks. If your Ladyship in due course, not now, goes through the narrative of the transaction, starting at paragraph 275 of our closing, as well as the information about the Spectrum transaction on which it was modelled, that in our submission will become obvious.

The essential point is quite simple. The transaction, as described to the court, and indeed to the Clydesdale Bank at the time, involved a sale to the sheikh's company of an undocumented equitable interest in $1.3 billion worth of shares in a Russian company, said to be held by a trustee who declined to acknowledge their interest. That was the version of the facts that Mr Curtis gave to Clydesdale Bank in his letters of 1 June. It's absolutely astonishing that Clydesdale Bank should ever have accepted such a cock and bull story, and they certainly don't appear to have accepted it when the papers hit their head office in Australia sometime in about August.

But as it was, it's clear that they only did that because of assurances by Mr Curtis that the sheikh would be selling on to Mr Abramovich, on terms that Mr Abramovich would be paying the money upfront by way of security and, therefore, that pending the on-sale the sheikh would be paying Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili out of his own funds.

Now, Mr Jacobson told your Ladyship that the most likely source of that information was Mr Berezovsky's financial factotum, Mr Fomichev. But whatever the source, it's manifestly untrue. There wasn't an on-sale to Mr Abramovich, there wasn't an advance deposit. It wasn't even put to Mr Abramovich in cross-examination that there was an on-sale. So the only things that made the transaction credible to Clydesdale Bank are revealed to be bogus.

Now, in my learned friends' closing document they have sought to resurrect the argument that Mr Abramovich was in fact involved in the Devonia transaction, and they have even sought to assert that there was in fact an on-sale. Now, I respectfully submit --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you give me the paragraph, please?

MR SUMPTION: Yes. It is at paragraphs 957 onwards. 962 is where it is said that there was an on-sale.

Now, in our submission, they simply cannot be permitted to do that, not having put those matters to Mr Abramovich in cross-examination. I don't wish to suggest that every smallest point necessarily has to be put to a witness, but a point which is of this significance and which represents the sole basis on which loss is being claimed, and which would, if true, be within the knowledge of that witness, must be put to him, and this one was not.

There is also an assertion, which is to be found earlier in their closing document at paragraphs 905-6, that it was Mr Abramovich or one of his staff who rejected the plan originally proposed by Mr Curtis for a direct contract with him, with the result that the transaction had to proceed as a sale to Devonia rather than Mr Abramovich.

Your Ladyship will recall Mr Curtis originally drew up direct documentation and it was then scrapped towards the end of May.

That assertion is made in that part of the closing document, but there is absolutely no evidence for it, there is no documentary support for it, and their witness evidence on the point was given to support that, except that given by Mr Abramovich who denied it. In addition, it's right to point out that Mr Jacobson said he did not know why the change of plan occurred. So, in our submission, your Ladyship cannot possibly accept the proffered invitation to conclude that the change of plan was brought about by a decision by Mr Abramovich.

What the evidence actually shows is that there was no contact between anyone on Mr Berezovsky's side, and Mr Abramovich or his team, with the exception of the relatively low level involvement of Ms Khudyk in setting up the paperwork associated with the opening of the account at Latvian Trade Bank.

Now, your Ladyship will recall the evidence on this point, it's actually summarised in our closing at paragraphs 277 and 279, but Ms Khudyk was only involved because Mr Abramovich's companies, who were going to be paying the 1.3 billion, had an existing relationship with the Latvian Trade Bank. It was therefore suggested that whatever vehicle Mr Fomichev designated to receive the money should open an account for that purpose at the Latvian Trade Bank. That would make the payment process easier. But all that Ms Khudyk knew about the Devonia transaction was that she had been required to pay the funds to a company called Devonia, which had been nominated as the payee by Mr Fomichev, and she had assisted in the opening of an account for that company at the Latvian bank.

No other evidence was put forward for the suggestion that Mr Abramovich was involved, apart from the bare assertion by the sheikh, in short formal letters written some years later, which we have analysed in paragraph 302 of our closing. And of course nobody was called to address this point by my learned friends, on whom it is incumbent to prove it. Dr Jumean was not called, the sheikh was not called, not even hearsay statements were put in from them, apart from those short formal letters.

Absolutely no documentation has been forthcoming from the sheikh's administration or disclosed by any party, and Mr Jacobson confirms that the Curtis files disclosed no evidence of the involvement of anyone on my client's side apart from the low level involvement of Ms Khudyk, and we summarise the evidence for that at paragraph 283, and in particular note 1142.

Now, the 1.3 billion was paid into the Devonia account at Latvian Trade Bank in the stages agreed between Mr Abramovich and Mr Patarkatsishvili in Cologne on 29 May 2001. Those stages bore no relation to the timetable envisaged in the Devonia agreement and it is difficult, if not impossible therefore, to relate the payments that were actually made into that account to anything contained in the Devonia agreement. This was simply a money-laundering scheme and that was no doubt why some $200 million in commissions was paid to the sheikh on top of 18.3 million to Mr Curtis personally, and smaller sums which were shared out between the in-house financial managers of the three principals involved, namely Mr Fomichev, Mr Kay and Dr Jumean.

This is a most unattractive transaction.

Now, not only was there no sale to Devonian, but the attempts to pretend that there was one is, in our submission, yet another item of circumstantial evidence against Mr Berezovsky's claim to have had an interest in Sibneft at all.

The Devonian agreement or the Devonian scheme worked by generating documents which suggested that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili had an interest in Sibneft which they had sold to Devonian. The only reason why it was necessary to engage in all these shenanigans at a cost of about 15 per cent in commissions was that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili knew perfectly well that genuine documents would not be obtainable. They would not be obtainable because Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili had no interest in Sibneft and had made no agreement to sell anything with Mr Abramovich.

Now, your Ladyship has seen all the documents, particularly in Mr Curtis's letters, assertions that Mr Abramovich was refusing to execute such documents because he had always in the past denied the existence of such an interest. But the truth is that no attempt has been made in this trial to prove that the question of documenting a sale, if there was a sale, was ever broached with Mr Abramovich, as it surely would have been if a sale had been discussed with him. These letters were written by Mr Curtis precisely because Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili in fact knew perfectly well, without having to ask Mr Abramovich, that they weren't going to get a contract because that wasn't the deal that Mr Patarkatsishvili had made with Mr Abramovich. So they invented a contract with someone else.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is there any evidence about the reason why Curtis got a fee or commission of 18.5 million?

MR SUMPTION: The evidence consists of the minutes of the meetings of the relevant trusts which consented to the payment, and the documents by which Mr Curtis sought Mr Berezovsky's consent to it. There are also documents, these were gone through in cross-examination --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I remember, but did they suggest any rationale for the commission payment?

MR SUMPTION: They did. What they suggested was that these were commission payments, I think "introductory fee" is the description given at one stage, but what they were plainly not is a reward for Mr Curtis's professional services. We know that because the earliest of the documents in which he sets out his demands from the sheikh records that the commission payment was in addition --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: To professional fees.

MR SUMPTION: -- to the 400,000-odd of professional fees.

So the only inference one can draw is that this was in fact a payment made to Mr Curtis for his services in doing something that was distinctly underhand, indeed, as far as Mr Curtis was concerned, both unprofessional for a solicitor and unlawful.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It couldn't be characterised therefore as a commission for introducing an intermediate purchaser?

MR SUMPTION: No. I mean, the sheikh of course was already a client of Mr Curtis's, and your Ladyship may recall that in May 2001, Mr Curtis went to counsel in order to get advice on aspects of the ORT transaction. But the instructions also seemed to have covered, at least the advice covered, aspects of this transaction, and counsel noticed the commissions that were being paid to Mr Curtis personally and pointed out that this was a very unsatisfactory aspect of the transaction, not least because it might well be suggested that this was in fact a money-laundering transaction and that there's no other reason why Mr Curtis should be receiving money personally upfront on top of his professional fees. That was a point which, in our submission, was extremely pertinent.

Your Ladyship will find that all the relevant documents are referred to in paragraph 296 of our written document, in particular at subparagraph 7 and in the footnotes to that subparagraph.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, thank you.

MR SUMPTION: Now, the last of the critical issues on the Sibneft side -- my Lady, would your Ladyship want to take the break at this stage because I'm turning to limitation.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. Ten minutes.

(3.14 pm)

(A short break)

(3.30 pm)

MR SUMPTION: Could I give your Ladyship two other references to our closing which respond to points raised by your Ladyship before we took the break. At paragraph 256 we deal, under the heading "No Need to Posit Intimidation", with a number of factors of which the first is the question of undervalue, which is substantially what I said to your Ladyship orally, but the others consist of other reasons why, in any event, this is not something one needs to posit in order to explain what happened.

The other reference is to paragraph 273. That, in addition to the reference I gave your Ladyship earlier, is where your Ladyship will find the information and references about the instructions given to counsel on the propriety of the commission, or the advice given by counsel; I don't think he was asked to expressly but he did.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I was just trying to remember what the rationale was.

MR SUMPTION: This was actually, rather oddly, because the transaction had already gone through, an enquiry about the application of the money-laundering regulations to the Spectrum money, which of course also enjoys a 15 per cent commission, and it was in that context that counsel advised that he thought that that was an unattractive aspect of the transaction on money-laundering grounds, and that some care should be taken to ascertain that it was consistent with the Law Society's rules.

May I turn to the question of limitation, which was the last of the critical issues on the Sibneft side of the claim. It's common ground that under the Foreign Limitation Periods Act, the limitation period to be applied is that of the substantive law governing the alleged tort.

In his pleading, Mr Berezovsky has put as his primary case that the tort was governed by English law, alternatively he says French law, but in any event not on Russian law, please.

Now, at English law, the intimidation claim is plainly time-barred unless Mr Berezovsky can sustain the Devonia agreement as a genuine agreement. The claim form was issued on 1 June 2007, time runs from the incurring of the loss. Mr Berezovsky says that the loss was incurred when he submitted to Mr Abramovich's threats by agreeing to the sale of his alleged interest in Sibneft. Now, if there was an interest in Sibneft, he says that he agreed to sell it when he entered into the Devonia transaction which was fully executed on 11 June, the approximate date when the Devonia agreement appears to have been executed by the sheikh. The document had already been executed by Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky a week earlier on 5 June but, at any rate, in June.

Now, on the footing that the Devonia agreement was a genuine transaction, that is his case. But of course on the footing that the Devonia transaction was a sham, the relevant date would be not the date of execution of that contract but the date on which final agreement was made between Mr Abramovich and Mr Patarkatsishvili, ie the meeting at Cologne on 29 May 2001 when the mode of payment was finally agreed and the transaction went forward. The first instalment of the monies agreed to be paid on 29 May was in fact paid into Devonia's account on 31 May. It follows therefore that if the Devonia agreement was not a genuine transaction of sale, the intimidation claim was statute-barred in English law even on Mr Berezovsky's analysis of the law.

Now, there seems to be a certain lack of confidence on the part of my learned friends about their ability to sustain the proposition that the Devonia transaction was a genuine transaction, because in their written closings, as your Ladyship will have seen, French law has overtaken English law as their preferred option. Now, it is accepted by us that the claim would not be time-barred at French law. Indeed it's the only law under which it wouldn't be time-barred.

The choice of law issue is therefore somewhat critical to this question, and that issue is dealt with in section A5 of our written closing. The basic principles are not disputed, and it may assist your Ladyship to have open paragraph 310 of our written closing which sets out the statutory provisions. Under section 11, the primary rule is that the tort is governed by the law of the country where all of the events constituting the tort happened or, if they happened in more than one country, then the law of the country where the most significant of them happened. I think that's probably an uncontroversial precis of section 11. So the primary rule depends on the geographical location of the facts constituting the cause of action.

The secondary rule in section 12, which is sometimes called the rule of displacement, allows for the law chosen in accordance with section 11 to be displaced in favour of another law if the application of the latter would be substantially more appropriate. In other words, appropriate by virtue of some more substantial connection with a particular law or jurisdiction than the mere geographical location of the facts.

If Mr Berezovsky's pleaded case is taken at face value, then the general rule in section 11 points to Russia. That is because the factual elements of the tort are, one, a threat, two, submission, and three, loss. The alleged threat is said to have been made by Mr Abramovich to Mr Patarkatsishvili in Moscow, so far as concerns the expropriation threat. The Glushkov threat is said to have been made to Mr Patarkatsishvili in Germany at Munich, that is what is said in the pleading, although my learned friend floated the possibility that it might have been Cologne. Nobody is contending for German law.

Now, none of the threats are alleged to have been made in France, neither in relation to Mr Glushkov or in relation to the expropriation of their interest. The only thing that is said to have happened in France, as far as the elements of the tort are concerned, is that Mr Berezovsky received a report of the threats that were allegedly uttered by Mr Abramovich to him in Germany on the telephone at his house in France and is said to have decided there and then to accept the $1.3 billion.

So the position therefore is that the threats were not in France, the submission is alleged to have been in France in the sense that that is when Mr Berezovsky decided that he would submit, although the submission would actually have been communicated to Mr Abramovich at Cologne on the 29th when Mr Patarkatsishvili said, "Yes, go ahead".

Mr Berezovsky's supposed loss, to take the third element of the tort, was incurred not in the place where he submitted to the threat but in the place where the assets that he says he was forced to relinquish were located. That, surely, is the place where, if he lost those assets, he must have lost them, and that is plainly Russia, Sibneft being a Russian company.

Where the factual elements of the tort occur in different countries, your Ladyship is enjoined by the statute --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Wouldn't it depend on the situs of the claim he has against Mr Abramovich in relation to the Sibneft agreement?

MR SUMPTION: No -- well, my question is where the situs of that claim would be. As it turns out, he's brought it in England, but that wouldn't determine the situs of the claim. But my Lady, what matters surely is the situs of the asset he claims to have lost. He says "I lost my shareholding in Sibneft and I got back much less than it was worth".

As regards his contractual claim, what he says that he lost is an entitlement contractually as against Mr Abramovich to be registered as a shareholder in Sibneft. The value of that, he said, was equivalent to the value of the shares, and he lost it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And what was the -- if there is a situs for that chose, what does he claim the situs is?

MR SUMPTION: That's plainly Russia, because Sibneft --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What does Mr Berezovsky say about that?

MR SUMPTION: I don't think Mr Berezovsky can...

My Lady, if your Ladyship looks at page 279 of our written closing, there's a reference at note 1257 to the decision in Kwok Chi Leung v Commissioner of Estate Duty, which suggests that rights in respect of a company incorporated in jurisdiction A are rights situated in that jurisdiction.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I can see that if you've got a claim against the company, I don't know, against the company to be issued with shares. What I'm raising is where is the situs of the contractual rights as against Mr Abramovich?

MR SUMPTION: Russia. My Lady, it is Russia for a number of reasons. First of all, the right to be registered, which is the contractual right that Mr Berezovsky claims to have, is a right which arises on his case under an agreement which, by common consent, is governed by Russian law, the agreement of 1995. Secondly, the situs is Russia because the substance of that right was a right to be registered as a shareholder of a Russian company, a right which is only capable of being exercised in Russia. It must stand to reason that a court outside Russia could not possibly enforce a registration right in another country. Thirdly, the situs is Russia because Sibneft is a Russian company. And if you ask yourself: where has a loss been incurred which consists in an interest, whether contractual or proprietary, in a Russian company? The answer must be Russia.

The case which I referred your Ladyship to --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Kwok.

MR SUMPTION: Kwok. The relevant part of it, which is at page 1040, deals with --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is it in your authorities?

MR SUMPTION: It's at P(A)1/10 on the Magnum system P(A)1/10/314. If your Ladyship would look at page 1040 of the report P(A)1/10/319:

"The matter falls, in their Lordships' opinion, to be determined by reference to first principles. In the first place the notion that a debt or other chose in action [and shares of course are the chose in action], because incorporeal, can have no situs was laid to rest by the House of Lords in English, Scottish and Australian Bank Ltd v Inland Revenue Commissioners. It is clearly established that a simple contract debt is locally situated where the debtor resides -- the reason being that that is, prima facie, the place where he can be sued ... A debt which is payable in futuro is no less a debt and there is no logical reason why it should, as regard its locality, be subject to any different rule. It is simply a chose in action and like any chose in action is subject to the general rule which is conveniently stated ... in Dicey and Morris on the Conflict of Laws ..."

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, this is a promissory note, isn't it, so it's slightly different.

MR SUMPTION: Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay, I don't think that takes this particular point --

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, it does, with respect. Because what Mr Berezovsky claims to have lost is shares, which are a chose in action against the company, or contractual rights to be registered as the owner of shares, which are a chose in action against Mr Abramovich. Now, that is a right which is only enforceable in Russia because the value of a share consists in the rights that it confers against a Russian company, and a right of registration is something that is only exercisable or enforceable in Russia.

Now, in those circumstances, in our submission, the situs of a chose in action, whether you classify it as property in the shares or a contractual right of registration, has got to be Russian --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, it's not a contractual right of registration as against the company.

MR SUMPTION: No.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What we're looking at is a contractual right, on this hypothesis, as against Mr Abramovich.

MR SUMPTION: Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And you say because the debtor, or the alleged debtor, resides in Russia, therefore the situs of the chose is in Russia.

MR SUMPTION: I say that, but that's not all I say. First of all I say that because Mr Abramovich resided in Russia, the situs of that claim is Russia. But I also say --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It relates to a Russian company.

MR SUMPTION: -- that the particular nature of it -- suppose that he were to begin proceedings, managed to serve them in the Hermes shop in Sloane Street in the traditional fashion against Mr Abramovich, asking for an order that he, Mr Berezovsky, be registered as the owner of these shares, the court would surely say that this was not justiciable in England in accordance --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, with Lufkin or something.

MR SUMPTION: Yes. My Lady, whichever way you classify it --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Anyway, I get the point, I get your submission.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, when the factual elements of the tort occur in different countries, the court is required by the statute to apply the law of the country where the most significant elements occurred. Now, the only element which is said to have occurred in France is Mr Berezovsky's decision to submit, because that's where he was sitting when he was telephoned by Mr Patarkatsishvili with news of the alleged threat. Now, the location of Mr Berezovsky at the time that he took the call from Mr Patarkatsishvili is, in our submission, a matter of no significance at all for two reasons. First of all, the actual submission to the threat occurred, in our submission, when the deal was done by Mr Berezovsky's agent, Mr Patarkatsishvili, at Cologne, and not where Mr Berezovsky happened to be when he learnt about the threat and made the decision to submit.

The second reason why it's a matter of no significance is that it's purely adventitious. Mr Berezovsky might have taken the call in London or in New York or on his skiing holiday in Switzerland, or in any of the other places where he was wont to travel. The fact that he happened to be in his sitting room, or wherever, at Cap d'Antibes is of no significance at all.

One can, I suggest, test this by asking oneself hypothetically: what would happen if Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were co-plaintiffs, as Mr Berezovsky plainly at one stage hoped that they would be? Now, would one be positing that the tort was governed by French law in the case of Mr Berezovsky, and by German law in the case of Mr Patarkatsishvili, simply because when the news of the threat came through, and they agreed to submit to it, one of them happened to be in Germany at one end of a telephone line and the other in France at the other?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You say this all goes back to Russia because that's where the substantial connection is.

MR SUMPTION: Indeed, it's the only substantial connection.

In our submission the rule of displacement in section 12 would apply even in the event that it were to be held that under section 11 the choice of law was French, or for that matter English. Section 12 admits a wider range of factors because it's not confined to the geographical distribution of the facts constituting the cause of action. But in addition to the geographical distribution of the relevant facts, for the purposes of section 12, first both the alleged perpetrator of the tort and the alleged victims were either domiciled or resident, or both, in Russia.

Mr Abramovich was both domiciled and resident there; Mr Patarkatsishvili was at the time resident in Russia although probably domiciled in Georgia; Mr Berezovsky was currently resident in France but domiciled in Russia. We know that because his tax returns, the references are given at paragraph 335, sub 2 of our closing, assert that he desires to return to Russia and has many connections with it. He therefore has, on his own admission, the animus revertendi, which is the legal hallmark of domicile, a particularly significant factor in relation to tax. But it's the same test for all aspects of domicile.

The principal business interests of all three men at this stage were located in Russia, including those in connection with which the tort actually arose. Now, that's therefore the first factor which would be relevant for section 12.

The second is that the substance of both of the alleged threats was to do unpleasant things in Russia. Those things are said to be illegal or illegitimate and, in our submission, if you threaten to do something in a foreign country, the question whether they are illegal or illegitimate has to be determined by the standards of the place where you are threatening to do them.

Now, there is an ingenious argument in my learned friends' submission which says suppose that in Ruritania the dictator passed a law through a compliant parliament which said that he was allowed to kill people at his whim, and in England you threatened somebody that, unless he complied with your demands, you would perfectly lawfully persuade the dictator in question to kill the victim's relative in Ruritania.

This extreme case is hardly a useful guide to the law of the area. The question of repugnant laws is a very familiar area of the law of confidence. There is a well-established doctrine, from which the principal authority is Oppenheimer v Cattermole, under which a repugnant law -- contrary to the public policy of, in the relevant respect, the United Kingdom, or contrary to the practice of nations, and Oppenheimer v Cattermole was about the German law, perfectly lawful, a deprivation of Mr Oppenheimer's citizenship by the Nazis in the 1930s -- is simply ignored as a proposition of law, it is treated as non-law. That would be the answer to the sort of extreme cases that my learned friends envisage.

Now, the second relevant factor therefore for the purpose of section 12, in our submission, is that Russian standards would apply to the legitimacy or lawfulness of what it was that, according to Mr Berezovsky, Mr Abramovich was threatening to do or to procure.

The third relevant factor for section 12 purposes, in addition to the geographical location of the elements of the tort, is the whole background to this issue is Russian. The explanation of how the problem arose is Russian.

Did Mr Rabinowitz not submit to your Ladyship that you would need, in order to understand the inherent probabilities, to hear experts on conditions in Russia from authorities on modern Russian history, because the experience of an English judge would not be enough. In our submission, it is ridiculous to suggest that this issue can be determined otherwise than in the context of Russian politics and Russian ways.

Now, the arguments which are now advanced in support of French law, in our submission, can fairly be described as disingenuous, and I would invite your Ladyship for this purpose to open paragraph 969 of my learned friends' written closing where there are conveniently listed --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I have it.

MR SUMPTION: We can briefly go through them. The word "France" is underlined wherever it appears. Item 1 is 31 October --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I've read this.

MR SUMPTION: Well, Mr Berezovsky did not remember that meeting with Mr Abramovich having occurred at all. The evidence on that point is Day 7, page 1.

Mr Abramovich's evidence was that he was not in France at all at the time, and his travel documents demonstrate that he in fact left France a few days before 31 October.

If your Ladyship in due course turns to paragraph 131 of our written opening, the references to that are listed. This meeting was a matter on which evidence was given by Ms Gorbunova but it cannot, with respect, have happened. In any event, what Ms Gorbunova says occurred at the meeting doesn't amount to a threat and the meeting is not pleaded as one of the occasions when any threat was uttered. So that is irrelevant.

We then have the Le Bourget meeting. That is specifically pleaded on the basis that nothing said at Le Bourget is to be treated as itself constituting a threat, nor was it in fact, as the transcript of the occasion shows.

Number 3 is the Cap d'Antibes meeting which, if it happened, was a threat in relation to ORT but not a threat in relation to Sibneft but that hardly matters since it did not happen.

Item 4 is the alleged expropriation threats. Now, this is very disingenuous, because what is said here is that there is no evidence of where they happened, and that is not an acceptable submission for my learned friends to make because their pleading is that it happened in Moscow. In answer to a request for further information on this very point, they pleaded that the threats in question were uttered between August and October 2000 at the offices of Logovaz or Sibneft in Moscow.

The references to that, we hadn't anticipated this point so we haven't got them in our closing --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just give me the reference.

MR SUMPTION: The references are paragraph C41, and the request for information, request 17, the references to the bundle numbering are A1/02/16 and A2/10A/28.

Now, the timescale given there, which is August to October 2000, was subsequently extended in their pleadings to May 2001 but the location remained Moscow, A2/11/64.

MR RABINOWITZ: Your Ladyship has these references in our submission at paragraph 982, subparagraph 4, if that's any help.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, that, in our submission, is the end of that suggestion that your Ladyship can somehow assume that those things may not have happened in Moscow.

Item 5 refers to the decision to open negotiations with Mr Abramovich, a decision that Mr Berezovsky says was made between him and Mr Patarkatsishvili at Cap d'Antibes. But that is not an element of the tort, nor is it a connection for section 12 purposes of the slightest significance. It is purely fortuitous where Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili discussed that matter.

Item 6 concerns the possible meeting in Paris on 15 May. Now, this meeting has something of a question mark over it. The documents show that Mr Abramovich and Ms Panchenko flew to Paris on 15 May, and Mr Patarkatsishvili's credit card receipts suggest that he was also in Paris at that time. Neither Mr Abramovich nor Ms Panchenko can in fact remember a meeting in Paris with Mr Patarkatsishvili but they acknowledge that there may well have been one, and that appears from paragraph 284 of Mr Abramovich's principal statement and paragraph 91 of Ms Panchenko's second witness statement.

Now, it is possible, as my learned friends suggest, that if the meeting occurred, the final figure of 1.3 billion was agreed at it, and that would be consistent with the stages at which one first sees the figure of 1.3 billion appearing in the documentation relating to the opening of the account with Latvian Trade Bank. But the fact that this meeting in Paris happened, if indeed it did happen, is no more significant than the fact that the previous meeting happened in Munich or the next one in Cologne. On the face of it, both German meetings were more significant for the tort because the threats are alleged to have been uttered at Munich and the deal was finalised in Cologne.

All of this, in our submission, this six-part catalogue of things that happened in France, is so much special pleading. What matters for the general rule is the place where the threat, the submission and the loss happened, which was respectively Russia and Germany, Germany and Russia, the three elements of the tort.

What matters for the rule of displacement is the national connections of the parties, the nature of the threat, the location of the thing threatened and the surrounding circumstances. Very little that is relevant to the threat happened in France, and what did happen in France could in fact have happened anywhere. A great deal that is relevant happened in Russia, but whereas what happened in France could have happened anywhere, what happened in Russia could not have happened anywhere but Russia. This tort is, in our submission, quite plainly governed by Russian law.

English law is now an alternative case, but the sole basis on which it is said to apply, according to Mr Berezovsky's pleading, is that the Devonia agreement was negotiated there and provided for payment in England and for English law. Those points are pleaded in the particulars of claim at paragraph C54(a). Now, in our submission, this must be a hopeless argument if the Devonia agreement was not actually a genuine transaction, but it's right to point out that it's a weak argument even if it was a genuine transaction.

The choice of English law to govern the Devonia agreement can't possibly be relevant in view of the fact that Mr Abramovich was not party to that agreement. It was in fact suggested to Mr Abramovich in cross-examination, as your Ladyship may recall, that he would have expected there to be some agreement, and that he would have expected it to be governed by English law.

Mr Abramovich did not accept those propositions and no basis was put forward to support them. In fact, the Devonia agreement seems to have been devised between Mr Fomichev and Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky and Mr Curtis, partly in France and partly in England.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And partly at Baden Baden.

MR SUMPTION: Well, that is where it was executed. It was in fact executed by Mr Berezovsky at Nobu restaurant in Park Lane.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm looking at paragraph 323(3) of your closing.

MR SUMPTION: Yes. And Baden Baden was where

Mr Patarkatsishvili executed it. The sheikh's place of execution seems to be uncertain but appears to be Abu Dhabi. That at any rate was the assumption made by Mr Jacobson.

Now, my Lady, on the basis that Russian law applies, the only issue is whether the three-year limitation period in Russian law can be extended under Article 205 of the Civil Code or ignored under Article 10.

Now, your Ladyship has only recently been treated to an analysis of these provisions of the Civil Code, and I don't therefore propose to go through it laboriously. As with so much Russian law evidence in this case, the experts did not differ so much on the principle as on its application which is ultimately a matter for your Ladyship.

There is, however, one difference between this and other Russian law issues. The relevant legal principle in England is that your Ladyship applies the principles governing the issue under the foreign law, subject to the fact that in a case where the foreign law vests a discretion in the foreign court, your Ladyship is required to exercise it in the way that, on the evidence, the foreign court would exercise it. That's the effect of section 1.4 of the act, quoted in paragraph 377.

This means that the scope for expert evidence on what happens in practice is rather wider in this area than in others that we have looked at. In other words, so far as the principles of Russian law allow for a range of possible decisions, your Ladyship should decide where within that range a Russian court would in practice be likely to decide a comparable case to this one.

Now, the relevant legal principles for this purpose can be quite shortly stated and are not significantly disputed. As far as Article 10 is concerned, that's the general principle about abuse of rights which is common to almost all civil law systems.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR SUMPTION: It's common ground between the experts, one, that the mere taking of a limitation point is not an abuse of rights; two, that in exceptional cases a party may be prevented by Article 10 from relying on an otherwise applicable limitation period, and "exceptional cases" is Dr Rachkov's phrase; three, that one of these exceptional cases, the only one alleged to be relevant here, is the case where the wrong complained of has itself prevented the claimant from bringing his claim within the limitation period. In other words, it's a variant of what in English law one would say was the principle that a party may not take advantage of his own wrong.

Now, the only difference between the experts, as we understand it, is that Mr Rozenberg considers that reliance on Article 10 requires proof of intention to cause the claimant to miss the limitation period, although he also points out that that requirement will be satisfied if, on an objective test, the intention existed even if it was not subjectively present. But that is not a difference that appears to make much difference on the facts of this case.

Turning to the principles of Article 205, the essential difference between the two provisions, ie 205 and 10, is that Article 10 is focusing upon the conduct and state of mind of the defendant invoking limitation and asking whether his behaviour is such that invoking limitation constitutes an abuse of rights. By comparison Article 205 is focusing on the behaviour of the claimant who has missed the limitation period and asking why he has done so.

Now, Article 205, which is what we're on now, provides for the extension of the limitation period in exceptional cases relating to a personal characteristic of the claimant. That is the principle that is expressly laid down in the article itself and it's the principle which your Ladyship is applying.

There is an issue between the experts about whether the Russian courts take a permissive or a restrictive view in practice, although it's actually very difficult for your Ladyship to take a view about that, except by reference to specific examples which have some relevant analogy with the facts of the present case. I doubt whether your Ladyship is going to be assisted by evidence about the degree of generosity which the Russian courts show in dealing with cases about the illness of one's wife or impoverished miners in the Ukraine. Rather different would be cases which seem to bear some resemblance to the present one.

What seems to be clear is, first of all, that the exceptional nature of the extension available under Article 205 is a requirement of the article itself, and therefore one which your Ladyship can hardly ignore.

Secondly, that the necessity of proving that the delay arises from a personal characteristic of the claimant is also written into Article 205, and that is applied strictly. In particular, matters affecting some third party can only be invoked by the claimant if their effect is to incapacitate the claimant, which is why the cases involving illnesses of a family member require evidence that it incapacitated the claimant, usually by requiring him to give full-time care to the family member in question, or possibly by psychologically paralysing him.

Thirdly, the experts differ, as we read the evidence, on the question whether a claimant can obtain an extension of the limitation period if he is perfectly capable of bringing the proceedings but is afraid of the consequences of doing that.

Now, the only remotely comparable case from which your Ladyship can derive any assistance as to the practice of the Russian courts in such a case is Guseletov, the case which is referred to by both parties, in our submission, at paragraph 380.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I recall that.

MR SUMPTION: This is the threat to murder case which was held to be not good enough in the absence of medical evidence that his fear had actually incapacitated him.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just remind me, when did Mr Glushkov leave prison?

MR SUMPTION: July 2006 is when he left Russia.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: When did he leave prison?

MR SUMPTION: He left prison in March 2004, because in March 2004 he was convicted but the sentence was such that the time he had spent in prison to date warranted his release. There was then a retrial -- your Ladyship will find the relevant dates are all set out at paragraph 375 of our document.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

MR SUMPTION: He hopped it from Russia before the outcome of the retrial was enforced.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, yes, thank you.

MR SUMPTION: Now, Guseletov, of course, is the only remotely comparable case, otherwise there's no case which either expert has identified in which fear for the safety of somebody else, or even the claimant himself, has been treated as justifying an extension. And although Dr Rachkov maintained his position on this point, even he accepted that a fear in order to be relevant has got to be both genuine, ie subjectively felt by the claimant, and objectively well-founded. We've given the reference to that evidence in paragraph 365, in particular note 1358.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR SUMPTION: Now, fourthly, both experts agree that where there is a ground for extending the limitation period, the claimant must bring his action promptly after the disabling circumstance has ceased to operate.

Essentially the same facts are relied upon for both articles, namely the position of Mr Glushkov, but they are, in our submission, a very long way from satisfying even the loosest tests for applying these principles.

We have dealt with the facts at paragraph 369 and following of our document. They all depend on Mr Berezovsky's claim that he was prevented from bringing his action earlier by his concern for the position of Mr Glushkov, and that is, in our submission, a suggestion that is absurd. The fear on which Mr Berezovsky relies was, in our submission, not genuine, he never entertained such a fear, and it was certainly not well-founded, there was no reason for him to entertain it.

Now, in the first place, the only ground put forward for Mr Berezovsky's fears is the threat which he says Mr Abramovich uttered in May 2001 that, unless Mr Berezovsky sold out of Sibneft, he, Mr Abramovich, would use his influence to keep Mr Glushkov in jail. Mr Berezovsky claims that he submitted to that threat, which is the whole hypothesis on which this question arises.

Mr Berezovsky has never suggested, even in his most expansive moments, that Mr Abramovich ever threatened to keep Mr Glushkov in jail even if Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili did sell out of Sibneft.

So on the hypothesis on which the limitation question arises, it is frankly very difficult to see that anything in Mr Abramovich's conduct could have led Mr Berezovsky to think that he was going to do anything unpleasant to Mr Glushkov.

Secondly, Mr Berezovsky's conduct wasn't actually affected by his fear for Mr Glushkov's safety, even on the assumption, contrary to our submission, that he entertained such a fear. We've dealt with this at paragraphs 371 to 373. Mr Berezovsky has maintained a persistent, venomous and highly public campaign against the Russian Government ever since he arrived in this country at the end of 2001. This campaign has included making public allegations that from 2003 onwards he was forced out of Sibneft by the Russian State acting through Mr Abramovich.

In July 2005, Mr Berezovsky announced his intention of bringing these proceedings in what one can only describe as a carefully planned programme of press conferences and press statements to agencies and media organisations, both inside and outside Russia. That campaign was deliberately calculated to achieve the maximum impact in Russia, and in these statements what he said was that he was actively preparing these proceedings.

Now, in his fourth witness statement, the reference is to paragraph 402, Mr Berezovsky says that he tried to avoid blaming Mr Abramovich publicly for what had happened until after Mr Glushkov left Russia. It is, however, a matter of public record that that statement is clearly untrue. Mr Berezovsky's behaviour in the four years before the commencement of this action is completely inconsistent with the suggestion that any fears for Mr Glushkov's position affected his conduct in the slightest. Indeed, in his statement of support of Mr Glushkov's asylum application, a statement served in September 2008, Mr Berezovsky dealt in detail with the reasons why he had not previously mentioned his allegations against Mr Abramovich. And his explanation of that delay is concerned entirely with the position of Mr Patarkatsishvili, it doesn't mention the supposed fear for Mr Glushkov's safety.

Thirdly, Mr Glushkov actually left Russia in July 2006 but Mr Berezovsky didn't bring this action until June 2007. Now, in no possible sense of the word can that be described as prompt. Dr Rachkov, although without any authority or law in support of what he says, suggests that the delay might be longer if the case was complex. But Mr Berezovsky's particulars of claim are not particularly complex. Indeed, an unkind spirit might possibly describe them as rather on the thin side.

According to Dr Nosova's evidence, he had nevertheless been preparing material for this litigation since 2004. We know that Carter Ruck's interviews with Mr Patarkatsishvili were conducted in 2005, and it is quite obvious from their letter before action, and from the original points of claim, that large parts of that were based on notes and proofs prepared two years earlier in 2005.

Now, the explanation given by Mr Berezovsky for his delay after Mr Glushkov's departure from Russia is not that the case was particularly complex. His explanation is that he had a continuing fear that Mr Abramovich would procure the Russian Government to interfere with Mr Glushkov's application. He has, however, made no attempt to suggest that this fear was well-founded. What he suggests is that the Russians did interfere with his own asylum application by simultaneously bringing extradition proceedings, which effectively were the other side of the same coin. They were decided on the same basis.

What seems clear is that no such fear in fact affected Mr Berezovsky for the simple reason that Mr Berezovsky did bring this action while Mr Glushkov's asylum application was still pending. Mr Glushkov's asylum application was not decided until I think 2010. This action was brought in 2007.

Now, what Mr Berezovsky says about that is that he was advised that, if he didn't bring the action in 2007, he would be time-barred. Well, all we can say about that is that if his desire to avoid being time-barred prevailed over his concern for Mr Glushkov's safety in 2007, there is no earthly reason why it should not have prevailed over his concern for Mr Glushkov's safety in 2006, 2005 or indeed 2001.

My Lady, it's 4.20 and the next subject is Rusal.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, I think that might be a time to stop.

How are we doing for time?

MR SUMPTION: We're doing not badly. I would expect to require about two to two and a half hours tomorrow. If your Ladyship were to sit tomorrow at the same time as today I would pretty well guarantee to finish before the short adjournment.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, you've certainly got all of tomorrow, and you've got such time on Wednesday as you need.

MR SUMPTION: I won't need to go into Wednesday, that I promise.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Rabinowitz, you're not going to be starting this week?

MR RABINOWITZ: No, my Lady. I wasn't proposing to.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You haven't changed your views on that one?

MR RABINOWITZ: Not since we served our 930-page submission.

MR SUMPTION: I shall expect my learned friend to speak from memory to that at once.

MR RABINOWITZ: If my learned friend is prepared to sit here and listen, I will.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. Then I'll start at 10.15 tomorrow. Thank you all very much.

INDEX

Closing submissions by MR SUMPTION .....1

Tuesday, 20 December 2011

(10.15 am)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Sumption.

MR SUMPTION: The starting point for the Rusal claim is the question whether Mr Berezovsky ever had an interest in Rusal, or in any assets associated with Rusal, because manifestly, unless he had, no other question on this part of the case arises.

In our submission, this allegation effectively collapsed in the course of Mr Berezovsky's oral evidence. He is the only witness to the various oral exchanges on which the Rusal claim depends, and I submit that he was unable to make any of his contentions good. Indeed one of the weaknesses of my learned friends' written closing on this area is that it makes very little attempt to address the problems for his case raised by his own evidence.

The first thing that Mr Berezovsky has to establish is that he had an interest in the pre-merger aluminium assets, the so-called KrAZ and Bratsk assets. These assets were subsequently contributed to the merger with Mr Deripaska's businesses. So it follows that, unless Mr Berezovsky had an interest in the KrAZ and Bratsk assets, it's difficult to see how he could have had an interest in the merged business.

There are, as we understand it, three bases on which it is suggested that Mr Berezovsky might have had an interest in the Bratsk and KrAZ assets. One is that he was entitled to such an interest by virtue of the term alleged to have been agreed in 1995 about future business, namely that the three alleged parties to the 1995 agreement would share in all future business ventures of any of them in the same proportions as they shared, it was said, in Sibneft.

Now, that is an allegation that has been modified in Mr Berezovsky's fourth witness statement. The agreement in 1995 is now said to have been that each of them would have a right of first refusal in relation to the others' future business ventures.

The second basis on which a claim is made to the Bratsk and KrAZ assets is that there was an express agreement in 1999, towards the end of that year, to apply the 1995 agreement to those assets. Thirdly, it is said that the KrAZ and Bratsk assets were paid for from Mr Berezovsky's and Mr Patarkatsishvili's share of Sibneft profits. So all three of those bases of course assume that Mr Berezovsky succeeds in establishing what he says was agreed in 1995.

Now, the first basis, founded on the future business agreement in 1995, is a non-starter. Even on the footing that there was an agreement about future business in 1995, both Dr Rachkov and Mr Rozenberg are agreed that it lacks the degree of definition required to be effective in Russian law. In fact, I suppose it is possible, in theory, that the parties might have acted on an agreement they supposed to have been effective even though it actually wasn't.

But the parties cannot even have believed that the future business agreement in 1995 had been made. The evidence about that agreement we have summarised at paragraphs 39 to 41 of our document. In short, this agreement would have meant that Mr Berezovsky was agreeing in 1995 that Mr Abramovich, whom at the time he hardly knew and whose track record in business he despised, was going to have 50 per cent of any future venture of Mr Berezovsky's, even if that venture was entirely conceived and managed by someone else, say Mr Patarkatsishvili.

Now, that seems a preposterous suggestion in the circumstances of 1995, and it appears to have been alleged solely for the purpose of giving Mr Berezovsky some legal basis on which to claim an interest in the Bratsk and KrAZ assets, some five years later.

The second argument is that there was a specific agreement in late 1999 to apply the 1995 agreement to the aluminium assets, and that is an allegation that was added to the pleadings by amendments at the outset of this trial. We owe the argument, as we understand it, to the ingenuity of Dr Rachkov who believed it to be implicit in paragraphs 250 to 263 of Mr Berezovsky's fourth witness statement, which he sets out verbatim in his report.

There is in fact nothing in those paragraphs that supports that allegation. What Mr Berezovsky says in those paragraphs is that Mr Bosov came to him with a proposal that Mr Berezovsky's group should buy the KrAZ and Bratsk assets, and he and Mr Patarkatsishvili then passed that proposal on to Mr Abramovich. The witness statement of Mr Berezovsky says that he considered himself bound to pass the Bosov proposal to Mr Abramovich as a result of the future business agreement of 1995, but it doesn't suggest that anything was actually said about the 1995 agreement to Mr Abramovich, or that any agreement was in fact made by reference to what was supposed to have been agreed in 1995.

Ultimately, Mr Berezovsky failed to support the Rachkov analysis in his oral evidence. What he said in his oral evidence, as your Ladyship may recall, was that Mr Bosov proposed to him that he should acquire assets in the aluminium sector, which Mr Bosov did not actually identify at the time but which later turned out to be the KrAZ and Bratsk assets. Mr Berezovsky says that he then suggested to Mr Abramovich that he should follow this up. Mr Abramovich, according to this version, said he would think about it and later did follow it up, but that's all.

Now, Mr Abramovich denied, in his own evidence, that he had ever agreed anything with Mr Berezovsky in advance of the acquisition of the KrAZ and Bratsk assets, and his evidence on the point was not in fact challenged in the course of his cross-examination by my learned friend, Mr Rabinowitz. It is, we suggest, clear that Mr Abramovich's involvement in the acquisition of these assets originated with a proposal which came not from Mr Berezovsky but from Mr Patarkatsishvili, and that Mr Berezovsky himself had no involvement at all.

That leaves the third basis put forward for Mr Berezovsky's supposed interest in the pre-merger aluminium assets, namely that it was paid for from his and Mr Patarkatsishvili's share of Sibneft profits.

The short answer to this is that it wasn't. The cost of paying the initial instalments of the price of the KrAZ and Bratsk assets was borrowed from MDM Bank, and the later instalments were then satisfied from the equalisation payments made by Mr Deripaska.

Your Ladyship may find it useful to add in the margin of paragraph 412 of our closing document --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I have it.

MR SUMPTION: -- a reference to Panchenko's second witness statement at paragraph 51, and Mr Shvidler's sixth witness statement at paragraphs 10 to 11, where the financing arrangements for the initial payments of the Bratsk and KrAZ asset purchase agreements is described. We understand that to be accepted by Mr Berezovsky, see his closing document at paragraph 1152.

Now, as it happens, this is the one year, 2000, for which we have a detailed breakdown of payments made to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili. The bolshoi balance does not include any contribution to the cost of acquiring the KrAZ and Bratsk assets. Now, what Mr Berezovsky says, and the reference is to paragraph 260 of his fourth and principal witness statement, what he says is that he agreed with Mr Abramovich, it seems some time early in 2000, that the cost of acquiring the KrAZ and Bratsk assets would come out of this share in Sibneft profits. So the argument seems to be, based on this, that although Mr Berezovsky didn't actually pay out of his profits anything, he relies on an agreement that he would pay in that way.

With respect, his evidence about this agreement cannot be true. That became apparent in his cross-examination when it was obvious that he had only the haziest idea of what the cost of acquiring the KrAZ and the Bratsk assets was, and no idea at all of what share of Sibneft profits he would come into.

If Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili had a 50 per cent interest in the KrAZ and Bratsk assets upon their acquisition, their share of the total purchase price would have been $287.5 million. Of that sum, $87.5 million would have been due from them almost immediately. That was nearly half the profits, the total amount was nearly half the profits which Sibneft ultimately earned over the entire year 2000, and nearly six times the total distribution of the company to shareholders in that year. That would have come, on this view of the matter, on top of the $490 million recorded in the bolshoi balance as having been paid to these two gentlemen over the year without reference to any contribution to the KrAZ and Bratsk assets.

So what Mr Berezovsky's case really amounts to is a suggestion that he and Mr Patarkatsishvili got 50 per cent of these assets, not even for a deferred payment, but as it turns out for nothing at all.

Now, it's perfectly fair to point out that in the event, Mr Abramovich recouped the whole of what he paid for the KrAZ and Bratsk assets from the equalisation payment received from Mr Deripaska as a result of the merger. That happened in two stages, because the equalisation payment was originally agreed at $400 million at a time when the Bratsk assets weren't included in the deal. The Bratsk assets were subsequently included in the deal in April and May 2000, and the agreement was restated on 15 May to incorporate them. At that point, the price, the equalisation payment was increased to 575 million which exactly matched what Mr Abramovich had paid for them.

So that is how matters turned out and it clearly was a golden deal from Mr Abramovich's point of view.

But, of course, that was not something that could have been foreseen at the time when the KrAZ and Bratsk assets were acquired. And the question that we are currently concerned with is whether it was agreed at that time that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were going to have their share of these expensive assets paid out of the supposed Sibneft profits.

My learned friends in their closing have pointed, as they have done repeatedly in the course of the trial, to the provisions of the master contract dated 10 February which described Mr Patarkatsishvili as one of the persons constituting party 1. That, in our submission, is not actually going to help much. The master agreement was a homemade statement of intent. The inclusion of Mr Patarkatsishvili as part of party 1 may well give rise to an argument that Mr Patarkatsishvili was one of the buyers along, I suppose, with Mr Shvidler who was also named as one of party 1. But neither of them contributed a single cent to the acquisition of those assets. Mr Shvidler was certainly not a partner in the venture, he was simply its chief negotiator.

The evidence is that Mr Patarkatsishvili was added to party 1 on the same basis as Mr Shvidler. They were both critical figures in the process of negotiating the deal. And that evidence is the only evidence, the only view of the matter that is consistent with Mr Shvidler's participation unless your Ladyship accepts that he too was a buyer and the evidence does not support that at all.

Now, in fact, Mr Patarkatsishvili's role in the acquisition of the KrAZ and Bratsk assets was clearly that of an intermediary and facilitator. That is the role attributed to him in the four protocols which were prepared for him in February. The evidence about these protocols is summarised in our document at paragraph 406, sub 3. These documents were backdated and they spoke prospectively about a transaction which had in fact just happened at the time when they were drafted. That has always been accepted to be the case.

But Mr Patarkatsishvili must have regarded them as correctly recording his (inaudible) and entitlement because otherwise it is impossible to understand how or why he would have had them notarised before a Moscow notary for the record on 16 March 2000.

Now, there was an attempt made in cross-examination, which is taken up in my learned friends' closing document, that these four protocols were designed to cover the cost of the aircraft which it had been agreed at the Dorchester Hotel was going to be acquired for Mr Patarkatsishvili. Mr Abramovich was asked about this and ridiculed the idea, suggesting that you could buy four planes with the $115 million of commission due to Mr Patarkatsishvili according to the protocols.

The only evidence which my learned friends cite in support of this evidence, your Ladyship will find it in their closing, I don't think you need to turn it up, at paragraph 62, sub 8, paragraph 1225, sub 5, and note 653. This is concerned with the circumstances in which the commission agreements were located and where they were found.

What is said is that the commission agreements were found in Mr Kay's office in a box which had previously been stamped "Kathrein & Co". Kathrein & Co was the name of the Austrian bank where Mr Patarkatsishvili opened an account to pay for the aircraft. The stamped name of Kathrein & Co on the box had been struck out, so it looks as if Mr Kay, in whose office this was found, was simply using an old box to store old documents. I'm not sure that one can infer anything from that.

In our written closing, what we have sought to do is to lay to rest the suggestion about these protocols being related to the purchase of an aircraft by an exhaustive analysis of the documentation relating to Mr Patarkatsishvili's aircraft. The reference in our closing is paragraph 406, sub 3, and in particular the long analytical note at note 1461, which will give your Ladyship the references to all the relevant documents.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR SUMPTION: It's a matter of speculation, of course, why Mr Patarkatsishvili did have the protocols notarised, but I would suggest that by far the most likely reason is that this was related to the agreement which Mr Abramovich in his evidence said that he made with Mr Patarkatsishvili about the deferral of his commission payments. Mr Abramovich's evidence was that the commission would be reassessed as the aluminium venture developed and that payment would be deferred in the meantime. So the 115 million was not paid.

Now, the likelihood must be that Mr Patarkatsishvili wanted an unimpeachable record of what had been agreed so far so as to ensure that when he came back to Mr Abramovich later, under no circumstances would he get less than $115 million. Mr Patarkatsishvili obviously hoped that the venture would turn out well and that the results would justify much more than $115 million, and in that hope he turned out to be entirely justified.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And nothing surprising about taking the credit risk in the deferral, you say?

MR SUMPTION: Not at all because --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Because?

MR SUMPTION: Because the credit risk -- Mr Abramovich, his assets were very considerable. The 115 million, by the standards of the amounts of money thrown about in this case for far less significant assistance than that which Mr Patarkatsishvili gave, was a relatively small sum.

By this time in 2000, Mr Abramovich was sitting on, on either party's view of the case, very, very considerable wealth. Now, of course, all of these points are about Mr Patarkatsishvili's entitlement, whereas the question that we are concerned with is Mr Berezovsky's entitlement. Even if Mr Patarkatsishvili was a buyer, properly so-called under the terms of the master contract, which we deny, that doesn't mean that Mr Berezovsky was. Indeed it makes the omission of his name even more significant.

If Mr Patarkatsishvili was a buyer, it is, I suppose, theoretically possible that his private arrangements with Mr Berezovsky were such as to entitle Mr Berezovsky to a share of whatever Mr Patarkatsishvili had. But Mr Berezovsky does not have permission in this action to base his claim on his alleged partnership with Mr Patarkatsishvili alone, but if Mr Patarkatsishvili was a buyer, and Mr Berezovsky had an interest, it could only be by virtue of those arrangements between themselves.

Now, Mr Berezovsky's claim to have been, as he put it, the key person who made this deal happen was, in our submission, cruelly exposed in his oral evidence for the self-important nonsense that it was. Mr Berezovsky declared that he had attended many meetings with Lev Chernoi, Mr Reuben and Mr Anisimov to discuss key aspects of the transaction. All completely untrue. Mr Berezovsky couldn't remember a single thing that had been discussed at these meetings at which he was supposedly the key person. He accepted that he never even saw the master contract or the ten asset sale agreements which marked their conclusion, which he surely would have done if he had been party to them, or if he had been the key person, or involved in any way in their negotiation.

Mr Berezovsky had only the vaguest idea of the terms of those agreements, and the occurrence of these alleged meetings with Mr Berezovsky was in fact denied by every other witness supposed to have participated in them. Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler, Mr Anisimov and Mr Buzuk all denied it. Mr Reuben, who was of course called by my learned friends, remembered only a meeting with Mr Patarkatsishvili at which Mr Abramovich had been identified as the person whose consent was required for the deal. Mr Reuben said nothing about meeting Mr Berezovsky, and indeed his evidence was that Mr Berezovsky's name hadn't been mentioned.

We've collected the references to this at paragraph 409, sub 1 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I have it.

MR SUMPTION: -- and note 1474.

Now, the evidence of all these witnesses in fact more or less accorded with statements on the subject in Mr Berezovsky's own earlier statements. Because, as your Ladyship will recall, in his witness statement Mr Berezovsky said that it was Mr Patarkatsishvili, not him, who conducted the negotiations. In his pleadings in the Metalloinvest action, Mr Berezovsky said he had attended no meetings at all. In an interview with Vedomosti, which we have quoted at paragraph 409, sub 3 of our closing, Mr Berezovsky said that he was out of the country at the time and was simply telephoned after the event by Mr Patarkatsishvili and told, as he put it, that a certain deal had taken place. "Will it make money?" says Mr Berezovsky. "Yes", says Mr Patarkatsishvili. "Then I'm content", says Mr Berezovsky. That's the statement that he made to a newspaper later in March.

Presented with these inconsistencies Mr Berezovsky suggested that, well, he'd been using "meetings" in a rather special sense, as meaning just occasions with a formal agenda and written minutes. I doubt whether Mr Berezovsky has ever attended a meeting with a formal agenda and written minutes, certainly none have been disclosed in either category in these proceedings.

In our submission, Mr Berezovsky's performance on this issue was frankly embarrassing. In fact, he did nothing at all to further the deal. In Mr Berezovsky's written closing, the most that is said is that he had established valuable contacts in the industry, and that suggestion appears to depend upon a single visit to Krasnoyarsk at the end of 1998 or early 1999, which was well before the acquisition of the KrAZ and Bratsk assets was first proposed.

At this meeting, Mr Berezovsky said that he had some involvement in mediating a dispute between the KrAZ plant's owners and the provincial governor, General Lebed. Apart from that, all the prior contacts in the aluminium industry were not Mr Berezovsky's but Mr Patarkatsishvili's, and Mr Berezovsky's supposed connection with General Lebed appears to have been completely irrelevant to the deal that was subsequently made. The evidence is that General Lebed had absolutely nothing to do with it. We've summarised the references to General Lebed at 4094 of our document.

Now, what's said by Mr Berezovsky's counsel is that he would have been, or Lebed could have been a nuisance if he had not been on side, but there's actually no evidence before your Ladyship about whether General Lebed was on side or off side, and if he was on side, there is no evidence that it was Mr Berezovsky who had anything to do with putting him there.

This, in our submission, remarkably thin case is not reinforced by the suggestion made in my learned friends' closing that the sellers all thought that they were selling to Mr Berezovsky. This is simply wrong. First of all, Mr Bosov is prayed in aid. Mr Bosov's witness statement was served in order to deal with a disclosure issue, with which your Ladyship has not in the event been troubled, about a video recording which Mr Abramovich was at one point said to have obtained of some discussions at Mr Patarkatsishvili's offices in Moscow and shown to Mr Bosov earlier this year. That's what that witness statement is mainly about.

Mr Bosov's statement is relied upon because in an introductory paragraph of his witness statement, it's paragraph 8, he says that he told Mr Abramovich that he was planning to sue Mr Berezovsky for a debt and, according to the statement, he said that he'd made an agreement with Mr Patarkatsishvili, not in fact Mr Berezovsky, under which commission was due to him because of his role in the sale of the Bratsk and KrAZ assets. Now, Mr Bosov seems to have been planning to sue Mr Berezovsky about that on the footing that he thought Mr Berezovsky would be liable for his agreements with Mr Patarkatsishvili, presumably on the basis that he understood them to be partners.

Now, these facts, even if they were proved, would not establish that Mr Berezovsky was a buyer of the Bratsk and KrAZ assets. In fact, they are recorded in Mr Bosov's witness statement as simply allegations. We know absolutely nothing about the basis of Mr Bosov's proposed claim, nothing at all about the underlying facts. That evidence does not therefore appear to take your Ladyship any further.

Mr Reuben is relied upon on the basis that he is said to have given evidence that Mr Patarkatsishvili told him that Mr Berezovsky was involved. Well, Mr Reuben gave evidence that must have been a certain disappointment to those who had subpoenaed him without a witness statement. It turned out he had very little to do with the negotiations. What he in fact said about them was that he assumed that the buyers were Sibneft shareholders, and he assumed that Mr Berezovsky was a Sibneft shareholder because, he said, that was common knowledge. Mr Reuben's evidence, however, was that Mr Patarkatsishvili never mentioned Mr Berezovsky's name and that he himself never came across Mr Berezovsky in connection with the transaction at the time.

Mr Michael Chernoi was wheeled out as saying that his brother Lev thought that he was selling to Mr Berezovsky. Since Mr Chernoi's statement is double hearsay, and since Mr Chernoi refused to give evidence, even though arrangements had been made for him to do so by video-link, giving no plausible reason at all for his refusal -- I think he said that because Mr Deripaska would probably not be giving evidence he didn't see why he should -- Mr Chernoi's untested witness statement is entitled, in our submission, to absolutely no weight at all.

Mr Patarkatsishvili's interview notes undoubtedly do, as I acknowledge, suggest that by 2005, at any rate, Mr Patarkatsishvili believed himself and Mr Berezovsky to have had an interest in the KrAZ and Bratsk assets corresponding to their shares in Sibneft. However, the only indication of how such an interest might have been acquired is that the money to acquire these assets has been acquired with Sibneft assets. That was not in fact correct, as my learned friends I think now recognise.

Now, there is a suggestion, it appears in my learned friends' written closing at paragraph 1155, sub 4, that Mr Berezovsky authorised Mr Patarkatsishvili to participate in the negotiations for the acquisition of those assets in advance, and that that is something that Mr Patarkatsishvili said in these interviews. In fact that is something that comes from a passage which, although attributed by my learned friends to Mr Patarkatsishvili, is attributed by Ms Duncan to Mr Berezovsky. Your Ladyship will find that, I don't ask you to turn it up now, in due course at bundle

R(D)2/30/127.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What is the paragraph number where the claimants, you say, wrongly attribute --

MR SUMPTION: Sorry, what he said was that he authorised Mr Patarkatsishvili to take part -- sorry, Mr Abramovich to take part.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Hang on, let me just get this clear.

MR SUMPTION: It's 1155, sub 4, where the allegation is that Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky told the solicitors in proofing sessions various things. To take one example, Ms Duncan records, and then there is a quotation:

"[Abramovich] then came & said is [a] problem...

"We said ok -- he came [and] said [Mr Deripaska wanted] 50%..."

So the suggestion is that all of these discussions were authorised in advance by Mr Berezovsky.

Now, that is an extract from the notes, which in fact relates to something that Ms Duncan has attributed to Mr Berezovsky rather than to Mr Patarkatsishvili.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So what you say is wrong, and I'm looking at subparagraph 4 of paragraph 1155, what you say is wrong is the statement, "in the course of proofing session with Mr Patarkatsishvili", in the sense that that's meant to come -- although it was a proofing session with Mr Patarkatsishvili, in fact --

MR SUMPTION: In fact it appears, both from the context and in this case from Ms Duncan's attribution, to have been Mr Berezovsky saying that.

MR RABINOWITZ: That's precisely what we say, my Lady.

MR SUMPTION: I also say that, whoever it came from, that statement is wrong, it's inconsistent with all the other evidence for reasons that I've already advanced.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm not following you, Mr Sumption. At subparagraph 4 in the claimant's closing, which is what I'm looking at --

MR SUMPTION: What is suggested here is that both Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky told the solicitors that they had discussed the proposed merger with Mr Abramovich in advance and that they had, so to speak, authorised him to proceed with it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, and the first sentence is that the statement is consistent -- the claimant says -- with what both Badri and Berezovsky told solicitors in the course of proofing sessions dating back to 2005.

MR SUMPTION: This particular record appears to have been something that Mr Berezovsky, and not Mr Patarkatsishvili, said.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: The 2007 quote?

MR SUMPTION: That's right, but it's referring back to what was said earlier, before the 2000 merger agreements.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR SUMPTION: And all I'm saying at this stage is that that is not something that Mr Patarkatsishvili can have attributed to him. Obviously somebody said that at the proofing session, I don't dispute the accuracy of the notes at all, but it does not appear to have been Mr Patarkatsishvili, it appears to have been Mr Berezovsky, and to have been a forerunner of what Mr Berezovsky says in his witness statement in this action which is something that, for reasons that I've already given, simply cannot be true.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And Mr Berezovsky was at the proofing session in November 2007?

MR SUMPTION: Yes, he was. He was indeed, at both days. The only proofing sessions with Mr Patarkatsishvili at which Mr Berezovsky was not present were the ones that happened in 2005. Dr Nosova was present at those but Mr Berezovsky was not.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

MR SUMPTION: Now, if Mr Berezovsky didn't have an interest in the KRAZ and Bratsk assets, then it is hardly realistic for him to be suggesting that he had a share in the merged business into which those assets were later incorporated. That he had no such interest is, ironically, something that is confirmed by the evidence that your Ladyship has heard about the Dorchester Hotel meeting on 13 March and the events leading up to it.

Now, it is I think undisputed that the principals of the merger with Mr Deripaska's business were agreed in the course of negotiations occurring at the very start of March 2000 at a hotel in Moscow, and then, on the following day, at Mr Abramovich's house at Sareevo outside the city.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That's the Baltschug Kempinski?

MR SUMPTION: That's the Baltschug Kempinski Hotel.

There is a minor difference between Mr Deripaska's recollection and that of the other witnesses as to how much of it was agreed at Sareevo and how much of it was agreed at the Baltschug Kempinski Hotel, but I'm not sure anything turns on that.

The participants in these negotiations were Mr Abramovich, Mr Deripaska, Mr Shvidler and Mr Bulygin, and the outcome was recorded in the preliminary agreement which was another homemade agreement drawn up in something of a hurry by Mr Bulygin.

Now, that agreement provided for Mr Abramovich's companies to contribute all the aluminium assets that they had just acquired, other than the Bratsk assets, and the omission of the Bratsk assets is significant, for reasons that I will come to, to the merged business, in return for an equalisation payment of $400 million.

The agreement provided for a definitive agreement to be drawn up and executed between the principles by 20 March which would contain all the terms agreed in the preliminary agreement but, obviously, in more elaborate and legally verified terms.

It's also quite important to note that the preliminary agreement provided by clause 8 that the integration of the businesses was to start at once, with effect from 1 March. The evidence is that it did.

Now, the detailed terms, the ones that were subsequently included in the sale and purchase agreement of 15 March, were then negotiated by a working group which comprised representatives of Mr Deripaska's side and Mr Abramovich's, and the fullest account of their work was in fact given by Mr Hauser in the course of his cross-examination and examination-in-chief.

The working group met several times in London and in Moscow. The final meeting was in Moscow on the evening of 14 March and extended into the early hours of the 15th. At that final meeting, the members of the group resolved all the outstanding points referring each one to Mr Deripaska and Mr Abramovich, who were elsewhere, for a final decision.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think it was Mr Shvidler.

MR SUMPTION: Mr Shvidler, forgive me, yes, and Mr Deripaska for decision.

The result of the labours of the working group was the purchase and sale agreement between Runicom Limited and Mr Deripaska's company, GSA (Cyprus), and that confirmed in binding form and in more elaborate legal language all the terms agreed in the preliminary agreement, including the equalisation payment.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And you set that out in your statement?

MR SUMPTION: Yes. Now, the agreement was then, as we pointed out, amended and restated on 15 May to reflect the subsequent addition of the Bratsk assets. The Dorchester Hotel meeting was the only occasion even vaguely connected with the merger at which Mr Berezovsky participated. He has therefore sought to suggest that it was the meeting at which everything was agreed under his own masterly direction. What he said about this was:

"Everybody understood I am key person, not anybody more."

Now, the reality is a sad contrast to that claim. Your Ladyship will recall the evidence about how and why the meeting was set up, which has been given primarily by Mr Abramovich but also by Mr Deripaska and Mr Shvidler. It was a meeting summoned by Mr Berezovsky because he had just learnt about the merger from Mr Patarkatsishvili who had himself just learnt about it from Mr Abramovich. Mr Berezovsky had not been involved and therefore wanted to know more about it.

The Russian presidential election, this is an important matter of background, had of course occurred on 7 March, a few days earlier, and Mr Berezovsky, who believed himself to be an ally and patron of Putin, and had contributed substantially to his election campaign, was apparently at the zenith of his political influence and certainly nobody had in mind the disasters that ensued later in the year.

It has never in fact been entirely clear what Mr Berezovsky expected to get out of this meeting but he was certainly a man with a rich sense of his own importance, and a taste for grandstanding may well be a sufficient explanation of why he wanted to have it. But there is absolutely no mystery about Mr Abramovich's reason for going. His evidence was that Mr Berezovsky was his political protector and that when Mr Berezovsky wanted to see him, he went, and if he possibly could he went without delay. Mr Deripaska came, partly in order to be able to discuss the operational integration of a merged business with Mr Abramovich and Mr Shvidler, which was already in progress as a result of the terms of clause 8 of the preliminary agreement, and partly in order to dun Mr Berezovsky for a debt.

The meeting was, on any view of the matter, a bizarre occasion. Mr Deripaska personally strongly disliked Mr Patarkatsishvili because, as Mr Abramovich told your Ladyship, Mr Patarkatsishvili had at one point assisted one of Mr Deripaska's rivals in the aluminium wars. Mr Deripaska had not been warned that Mr Patarkatsishvili was going to be there and was not at all pleased to find that he was. His main interest in meeting Mr Berezovsky was to be able to dun him for the debt.

The meeting occurred in the living room of Mr Patarkatsishvili's suite in the Dorchester Hotel and all the witnesses present, including Mr Berezovsky, agree that for the first hour or so Mr Berezovsky himself was not present. All of those present, apart from Mr Berezovsky, agree that he eventually appeared from another room in the suite, unusually attired.

Now, thereafter, the meeting appears to have been awkward and brief. What seems, I would suggest, absolutely clear is that it simply cannot have been a meeting at which negotiations occurred about the terms of the merger. There are a number of reasons for saying that, reasons which, in our submission, are conclusive. In the first place, all the key points of the merger had already been agreed in the preliminary agreement and did not require or receive renegotiation. Indeed the integration of the merged business was already in progress. As far as the parties to the preliminary agreement were concerned, therefore, the merger was a done deal.

Now, neither Mr Berezovsky nor Mr Patarkatsishvili had had any involvement in the negotiations of the merger to date, and neither of them can have known anything about the merger except that it had happened. Mr Berezovsky did not dispute this in cross-examination. He did suggest that he had had some discussions with Mr Abramovich before the Dorchester Hotel meeting on the subject, but Mr Abramovich denied this, and it's a point on which he was not challenged in cross-examination.

Now, neither Mr Berezovsky nor Mr Patarkatsishvili had been involved or were ever involved in the work of the working group that was in the process of preparing the final terms of the agreement. Indeed Mr Berezovsky's evidence shows that he was not even aware of the existence of the working group. He acknowledges that at the time of the Dorchester Hotel meeting he had not even seen the preliminary agreement, his evidence was that he knew nothing about its terms, and it is really impossible to understand how Mr Berezovsky could have participated meaningfully in a negotiation for the merger if he did not know what was in the preliminary agreement that the parties he was talking to had undertaken to embody in the final agreement just ten days before.

There is no evidence at all before your Ladyship that Mr Patarkatsishvili knew any more about the previous course of negotiations than Mr Berezovsky did. On the contrary, the evidence is that he was told after the event, very shortly before the Dorchester meeting occurred.

The second point to make is that when Mr Berezovsky was asked about what were the key terms --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you just remind me, what roughly is the date of the preliminary agreement?

MR SUMPTION: The agreement itself is undated, and the witnesses --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, but it's early March --

MR SUMPTION: The witnesses said the beginning of March 2000. They were not more precise than that.

The best clue one has to it is in fact clause 8.

Mr Shvidler believes that the meetings started at 11.00pm on 4 March, and a reference to that is given at page 340, note 1504 of our document.

It must have been very shortly after 1 March because that's the date at which they were agreed that the integration of the businesses should become effective.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So we're looking at about 5 March?

MR SUMPTION: About 4 or 5 March, yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: If the meeting started at around 11.00pm on the 4th --

MR SUMPTION: That is right, depending on whether your Ladyship prefers Mr Deripaska's evidence that the whole of it was agreed at the hotel, or that it carried over to Sareevo.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So it's the 4th or 5th.

MR SUMPTION: Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: On your case anyway.

MR SUMPTION: Yes. I don't believe that the date of the preliminary agreement has been a matter in issue.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It's certainly not in issue that it was concluded and signed prior to the Dorchester Hotel meeting.

MR SUMPTION: It is not, no.

The second point to be made is that when Mr Berezovsky was asked, "Well, you say that the key terms were negotiated and resolved at the Dorchester meeting, what were the key terms?", after some hesitation he said that they were these: the proportions as between the Deripaska side and the Abramovich side; the management role of Mr Abramovich in the merged business; the choice of English law to govern the final agreement; the price, ie the equalisation payment; and a term that none of the parties, including Mr Deripaska, would be entitled to sell out of the merged entity without the consent of all the others.

Now, in fact, with the exception of that last term about not selling out, which I'll deal with separately, every one of these matters had been resolved in the preliminary agreement. That was an agreement about which Mr Berezovsky had no knowledge but which all the other parties present had already bound themselves to put into effect and which they had been personally involved in negotiating.

There is a most peculiar passage, if your Ladyship has Mr Berezovsky's principal witness statement to hand, at paragraph 280, which illustrates --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you give me the reference?

MR SUMPTION: It's paragraph 280 at D2/17/256.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you give me the page?

MR SUMPTION: I've got the page, I suspect, wrong.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Or the paragraph number.

MR SUMPTION: It's paragraph 280, which is at D2/17,
page 256.

Now, what is said here is that at this meeting:

"Badri explained to us all that the merger agreements were to be governed by English law."

Now, in our submission, this is perfectly absurd.
Here was Mr Patarkatsishvili, according to Mr Berezovsky, who had had no part in the negotiations to date, solemnly explaining to Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler and Mr Deripaska what they had themselves agreed in a document which they had been personally involved in negotiating. It is a simply ridiculous suggestion.

Now, all of these points were put to Mr Berezovsky in cross-examination and he didn't have an answer. He simply flailed and fumbled about. The one thing, oddly enough, which Mr Berezovsky claims to remember about how the negotiations of these supposed key elements actually went turned out to be something which could not be right, and that concerned the equalisation payment.

Your Ladyship will recall that Mr Berezovsky in his witness statement claimed to recall that the equalisation payment had been agreed, this is at paragraph 278 of his witness statement. What he said was that it had been agreed at 575 million. He said he wasn't very happy with that aspect of the agreement but reluctantly agreed to it.

Now, actually, nothing like that happened because the correct figure was 400 million, not 575. 400 million had been stated in both the preliminary agreement ten days or a week before the Dorchester Hotel meeting, and subsequently in the share sale and purchase agreement executed two days after the meeting.

575 million, the figure referred to at paragraph 278, was the increased equalisation payment which was agreed in the restated agreement of 15 May. What had happened was that the equalisation payment had been increased on 15 May as a result of the addition to the merger of the Bratsk assets. Mr Berezovsky had obviously picked up the 575 million figure either from the restated agreement during the preparation of his witness statement or, more probably, from somebody else who had studied the restated agreement, since one doesn't get the impression that Mr Berezovsky was in the habit of reading long legal documents, and Mr Berezovsky wrongly attributed that 575 million figure to the original agreement.

In my learned friends' written closing, paragraph 1181, they say that the Bratsk assets were in fact, they suggest, agreed to be included at the Dorchester Hotel meeting, which was why Mr Berezovsky remembered the figure of 575 million. And they suggest that it must have been omitted from the 15 March sale and purchase agreement for lack of time.

Now, your Ladyship need not spend much time on this suggestion. Mr Berezovsky did not, in the course of his evidence, suggest that the Bratsk assets had been added to the merger at the Dorchester Hotel meeting, and this was a point that was not suggested to a single witness of ours. On the contrary, Mr Berezovsky admitted that he was unaware of the increase of the equalisation payment attributable to the addition of the Bratsk assets, and that evidence he gave at Day 9, page 82. Your Ladyship may find it helpful to add in the margin at paragraph 415, sub 6 of our closing, a reference to that evidence at Day 9, page 82.

Now, in addition to Mr Berezovsky's own evidence, Mr Abramovich and Mr Hauser --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think it's 419, not 415.

MR SUMPTION: I'm sorry, my Lady?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It's paragraph 419.

MR SUMPTION: I'm sorry if I've got that wrong. Yes, 419, forgive me.

Mr Abramovich and Mr Hauser both gave unchallenged evidence on this point that the Bratsk assets were in fact added later, after the merger, and were what gave rise to the 15 May revision. Again, in the same place, 419, sub 6, it may assist if I gave your Ladyship the reference as to that evidence. It's Abramovich, Day 24, pages 42 to 43, and Hauser, Day 31, pages 49 to 51.

Now, this suggestion of course is also, as is obvious, inconsistent with the terms of the 15 March sale and purchase agreement, which doesn't include the Bratsk assets, whereas the 15 May agreement does. The suggestion that there was no time to deal with it between the Dorchester Hotel meeting and the 15 March agreement is, in our submission, ridiculous.

Under the preliminary agreement, the parties to that agreement had until 20 March to execute the definitive sale and purchase agreement, and Mr Hauser's evidence was that all the outstanding points were referred up to the principals at a long late night meeting, which I've already referred to, on the night of 14 to 15 March. The agreement was executed the next morning. So there is simply no scope for the purely imagined lack of time which resulted in its being omitted from that agreement.

Now, the only key term identified by Mr Berezovsky which was not included in the preliminary agreement was the no selling without consent provision, which Mr Berezovsky says was agreed but which, in our submission, was not agreed. In our submission, it cannot have been agreed because not only is it not in the preliminary agreement but it isn't in the sale and purchase agreement of 15 March either.

Moreover, this no selling without consent agreement is a commercial nonsense which is most unlikely to have been agreed at any time, and the denials of Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler and Mr Deripaska that they had agreed any such thing seem wholly convincing. This is a no selling out without the consent of the others agreement, which would also, according to Mr Berezovsky, have been binding on Mr Deripaska. And its supposed justification was that each party needed to be protected against being left with a minority stake and thereby (inaudible) a controlling majority shareholder which would have reduced the value of this party's stake.

Now, that would have been a problem only if one of the four parties to the alleged agreement, about not selling out, wanted to sell to another party to that agreement. The problem is that the alleged term would have prevented any of the three of them from selling out -- or the four of them, I suppose -- from selling out even to a third party, although that would actually have made no difference to the balance of power among the original shareholders. In fact, the suggested term would have prevented Mr Deripaska from breaking up his stake and selling it piecemeal to third parties which, on the face of it, would actually have increased the value of the remaining 50 per cent, turning it into a strategic stake when it would previously not have been.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is there any reference to such a term or the discussion of such a term in any of the documents relating to the --

MR SUMPTION: Not one.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: -- later agreement?

MR SUMPTION: This is a proposition that is to be found in one place and one place only, namely Mr Berezovsky's oral evidence.

I don't think there's a reference to it in Mr Patarkatsishvili's notes.

MR RABINOWITZ: I think there is.

MR SUMPTION: But I ought to check that.

What Mr Patarkatsishvili said in the note that I can recall, and I will have this checked, is that it was a matter of Russian business practice, but --

MR RABINOWITZ: With respect, that's not right.

MR SUMPTION: There is a reference, is there, to him having agreed it?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Rabinowitz, I was asking actually about later agreements, but --

MR SUMPTION: The later agreements --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just a second, Mr Sumption.

You say there's a reference in Mr Patarkatsishvili's notes, is there?

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you give that to me in due course?

MR RABINOWITZ: We will dig it up and get it to you, but there is a reference.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, but do you agree there's no reference in any of the documents relating to the subsequent agreement?

MR RABINOWITZ: Yes, my Lady, I accept that.

MR SUMPTION: Apart from Mr Patarkatsishvili's notes, which we will check.

MR RABINOWITZ: Your Ladyship sees it's set out in Mr Patarkatsishvili's note. The relevant part is set out at paragraph 1215 of our closing, page 703.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, just a second, I just want to make a reference to paragraph 1215 of your closing.

MR RABINOWITZ: Page 703, it's the last line of that page.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. Very well, thank you.

MR SUMPTION: Apart from possibly Mr Patarkatsishvili's note, this is something that is referred to by Mr Berezovsky in his witness evidence. There is no contemporaneous documentation for it at all although, of course, this part of the transaction is unusual by the standards of this case in being extremely fully documented.

It's the final part in the quotation at paragraph 1215, I think, that is Mr Rabinowitz's best point to extract from the Patarkatsishvili notes. We have dealt with this at subparagraph 7 of paragraph 536 where the same references I think will be found.

Now, this supposed term would of course have enabled any shareholder to force another shareholder who wanted to leave to sell to him on his own terms by refusing consent to a sale to anyone else.

Mr Deripaska's denial that he ever entered into such an agreement, in those circumstances, seems wholly convincing.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Rabinowitz, where is the reference to the nondisposition by any of the shareholders?

MR RABINOWITZ: If your Ladyship has paragraph 1215, it runs on for a few pages, your numbering may be different to mine, there is a very long extract under subparagraph 2 of 1215. It's the last quotation mark.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, it's in there, is it?

MR SUMPTION: It's the last paragraph on page 703 of the quotation that I understand that Mr Rabinowitz principally relies on.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: We've all got different page numbers.

MR RABINOWITZ: It's just before 1216 begins, my Lady.

MR SUMPTION: Now, that is a reference to the --

MR RABINOWITZ: Your Ladyship may also wish to look at footnote -- sorry, I apologise to my learned friend.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Go on, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: Footnote 63, I'm told, is another reference. Your Ladyship will find that on page 58. It's a reference to the June 2005 meeting.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, thank you.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, that is a reference to the 2007 notes where there is obviously a problem about Mr Berezovsky's participation in the meetings as well. Your Ladyship has gone through that with the witnesses who were there. But for your Ladyship's note, or the transcript, paragraphs 535 and 536 of our document go through in detail all of Mr Patarkatsishvili's observations on the subject, both the proofs and the successive notes, and deal with this point very fully. They contain the references that my learned friend relies on as well as the ones that we rely on.

In our submission, there is no substance in the suggestion that Mr Patarkatsishvili's notes give any reliable support to this and, in a very heavily documented part of the agreement, its absence both from the preliminary agreement and the sale and purchase agreement is absolutely inexplicable if it was actually agreed at the Dorchester Hotel meeting.

Now, none of the people, it is worth noting, who were in the process of finalising the terms of the sale and purchase agreement was present at the Dorchester Hotel, and none of them, according to their evidence, was aware of the Dorchester Hotel meeting. None of them was given to understand that they should wait for instructions that might depend on the outcome of the Dorchester Hotel meeting, and that further underlines the high degree of improbability that anything of substance relating to the merger was agreed at that meeting.

It is right, I would suggest, to point out in addition that it is common ground -- I say that because of what is said by my learned friends at I think paragraph 1212, sub 2 of their closing -- that Mr Deripaska did not get on with either Mr Berezovsky or Mr Patarkatsishvili, and had a particular dislike of Mr Patarkatsishvili. Now, Mr Abramovich explained the reasons for that in the recent history of the aluminium wars. It must, I would suggest, be most unlikely that Mr Deripaska would have agreed to enter into a close business relationship, indeed, if the no selling out clause was agreed, an unbreakable business relationship, with people whom he didn't like.

Finally it is the case, and I don't think the contrary has been suggested by any witness, that neither Mr Berezovsky nor Mr Patarkatsishvili had any involvement in the negotiation of the restated agreement of 15 May. Mr Hauser's evidence was that neither of them was even mentioned in the course of the negotiations for that agreement. Nor, it has to be said, were they involved in the creation of Rusal which did not actually come into being until the end of 2000. The references to that are at paragraph 419 of our document.

It seems most surprising, if Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were in reality parties to the deal and part owners of the enterprise, that they had no participation or involvement in either the addition of the Bratsk assets culminating in the agreement of 15 May, or the creation of Rusal later in the year.

Now, as in the case of the master contract of February, Mr Berezovsky claims to have been an undisclosed party to the preliminary agreement by virtue of the reference in the pre-amble to "partners of party 1", and to have been an undisclosed party to the share sale and purchase agreement because of the reference to "other selling shareholders" in that agreement.

The problem about this argument is that neither Mr Berezovsky nor Mr Patarkatsishvili had anything to do with either of those instruments. Mr Berezovsky says he didn't even see them until they were disclosed in this litigation. There's actually no reason to suppose that Mr Patarkatsishvili had seen them either. So it's hard to see why, in those circumstances, these phrases should be taken as references to them. Now, dealing with the two agreements in turn, first of all, the preliminary agreement, evidence on this point was given by Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler, Mr Deripaska and, by witness statement, Mr Bulygin, and is summarised at paragraphs 423 to 426 of our document.

The evidence given was that there were two basic concerns which underlay the reference to partners in the preliminary agreement. One was that if there were any undisclosed interests standing behind one of the nominal parties to the preliminary agreement, there was a concern that those undisclosed parties should be bound. Nobody had Mr Berezovsky or Mr Patarkatsishvili in mind. The background to this is an industry which was riven by rivalries and mutual distrust, as many witnesses explained to your Ladyship. Mr Bulygin, who drafted this agreement, actually assumed that Mr Shvidler was a partner of Mr Abramovich. He was wrong about that, but it certainly was not his understanding that it was Mr Berezovsky.

The other concern that appears from the evidence is that both sides were concerned that the other might be a front for other parties with whom they would not wish to be in business. The main concern on both sides appears to have been the possibility that the Trans-World Group, having apparently sold out of the aluminium industry in February, might be coming back in through nominal holders. That was why --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That's the Reuben brothers, is it? Or it was partly --

MR SUMPTION: It's the Reuben brothers among others. That seems to have been why clause 4.1 warranted that the principals and their partners did not include the Trans-World Group. That was clause 4.1 of the preliminary agreement.

Turning to the "other selling shareholders" referred to, so the corresponding phrase in the share sale and purchase agreement of 15 March, that point I would suggest was comprehensibly dealt with by Mr Hauser. He was a witness who was not beholden to either side, and his evidence is summarised with relevant references at paragraph 427 of our document.

His evidence, in summary, was that the term was used for precautionary reasons in case it should turn out that there were other interests involved. It was not used because anybody thought that there necessarily were other interests involved, and nobody had any particular other interests in mind. Mr Hauser's assumption, though it was only an assumption, was the same as Mr Bulygin's, namely that if Mr Abramovich did have a partner or a co-vendor then it was likely to be Mr Shvidler.

Mr Berezovsky's written closing on the Rusal aspect of this case is based almost entirely on what is at best circumstantial evidence, most of it dating from much later, and also on documents suggesting that persons who, in most cases, had no particular means of knowing the truth were assuming that Mr Berezovsky did have an interest in Rusal.

Now, in our submission, the evidence about the way in which the acquisition of the KrAZ and Bratsk assets happened, and the merger agreement was negotiated, simply doesn't admit of the possibility that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were undisclosed parties to those agreements, or that they had any interest resulting from those agreements. There is no basis on which such an interest could have been acquired by them under the supposed 1995 agreement, even on the footing that its terms were as alleged by Mr Berezovsky.

There is no point in the negotiations which one can identify at which it could have been agreed to confer such an interest on them if they didn't get it by virtue of the 1995 terms. None of the occasions on which it is said by Mr Berezovsky to have been agreed can actually be reconciled with the evidence, including his own evidence, and there is nothing that Mr Berezovsky had done which would have warranted giving him a buckshee interest in these assets. He did not contribute to the cost, he did not contribute contacts, he didn't contribute business ideas, he didn't contribute management expertise. He remained of course Mr Abramovich's political protector, but he was being very handsomely paid for that without any need to give him a gift of a large interest in the aluminium industry.

Now, Mr Patarkatsishvili of course did contribute a great deal to the acquisition of the pre-merger aluminium assets and therefore indirectly to the merger. He was the source of the original proposal, he was an important facilitator. He also made, as is clear, a significant contribution to ending the gang warfare that had destroyed the profitability of these businesses under their previous owners. But Mr Berezovsky contributed zilch to that, and nothing to the merger agreement either.

My Lady, does your Ladyship have a particular time in mind?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I'll take the break now. Very well.

(11.27 am)

(A short break)

(11.39 am)

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, just two grace notes to what I've already said to your Ladyship. First of all, the 15 May agreement. I should I think have pointed out that the 15 May agreement wasn't just an agreement which added the Bratsk assets to the merger, it also added assets on Mr Deripaska's side, in particular the Sayansky plant. And the 175 which was added to the equalisation payment reflected the difference in value between the Bratsk plant, which was one of the largest aluminium smelters in the world, and what Mr Deripaska was contributing.

The second point that I should perhaps briefly mention, I don't want to make a great song and dance about this, but I don't want it to be suggested subsequently that I have by silence conceded the points that are made by my learned friend in his written closing about what one can loosely call the dressing gown incident. They say that this was a result of collusion between our witnesses. There is not a trace of any suggestion to that effect in the evidence, and indeed, while it was put to them that they made that up, the suggestion that they did so in collusion was certainly not put to them and, in my submission, that aspect of their case, although it occupies quite a number of pages of their document, can safely be ignored.

Returning to where I had reached when your Ladyship rose, the absence of any evidence that makes it possible to identify any occasion on which this interest might have been agreed is, I would suggest, an unpromising starting point for Mr Berezovsky's argument that common reputation or subsequent events and documents show him to have had an interest. In our submission, it cannot be good enough, in a case like this, to say, "Well, we actually haven't a clue how he acquired his interest, but at some stage later he behaved as if he had one and a number of other people assumed that he did, therefore never mind the terms of the agreement on which this interest is said to be based." Because your Ladyship does, with respect, have to have a clue about how he acquired it if you are to be satisfied that he actually did.

Now, the subsequent events on which Mr Berezovsky relies for these purposes are, listing them, the Le Bourget transcript again, the internal planning documents, the Curtis notes of August 2003, the alleged distribution to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili of Rusal profits, the terms of the July 2004 documents for the sale of the second tranche and the Patarkatsishvili interview notes. Now, I don't wish to take up too much time on these matters since I have already dealt with them very fully in the written closing, but if I may summarise the position with an eye to the points made by the other side.

The argument based on the Le Bourget transcript depends on an extraordinarily narrow point. The argument is that the use by Mr Abramovich of the plural "we", when referring to his holding in the merged aluminium business, is an admission that he held it together with Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili. Whereas Mr Abramovich says that he was simply referring to his side as opposed to the Deripaska side of the merger.

The references to this matter are at paragraphs 429 to 432.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I have those.

MR SUMPTION: The internal planning documents are dealt with in the next three paragraphs. They are documents generated after 2000, some of which assume an interest of Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili in the merged aluminium business. These are all documents wholly internal to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili and their staff and professional advisers. None of them are self-explanatory and none of them have been explained by any of Mr Berezovsky's witnesses, but all of them must presumably have been based on information supplied by Mr Berezovsky or Mr Patarkatsishvili, or possibly Mr Fomichev. Some of them appear to have been design documents for a variety of money-laundering schemes.

There are only two on which some comment is perhaps called for although I think they are the two on which my learned friends rely most heavily. The explanatory note and the Curtis notes.

The explanatory note is an undated anonymous note prepared for an uncertain purpose which was found in the office of Mr Patarkatsishvili's financial manager, Mr Joseph Kay. Some seven paragraphs of my learned friends' written closing, at paragraphs 1247 to 1254, eight paragraphs, forgive me, are devoted to trying to prove that Mr Streshinsky was the author of the explanatory note, but nothing in the eight paragraphs in question actually does support that suggestion which Mr Streshinsky himself vigorously denied when it was put to him.

The note in fact contains quite a large number of errors, in particular it assumes that the four BVI holding companies which acquired the KrAZ and Bratsk assets belonged to Mr Berezovsky, something which not even he has suggested, and it also asserts or assumes that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili owned Aeroflot, or a large part of it, which is acknowledged in this litigation to be untrue.

Now, this note appears to have been drawn up with a view to pretending that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were the owners of assets in cases where their ownership might explain some of their income streams. That is obviously the case in the case of Aeroflot. It looks very much like a money-laundering exercise but it is hard to be sure about that on the very paltry information we have about this rather incoherent document.

Now, the Curtis notes require a bit more attention but not much more --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just before you go there, the reference to the Kay note is your footnote reference 1579, is it?

MR SUMPTION: Let me just check that. 1578 I think.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, that doesn't seem to have a document reference in it.

MR SUMPTION: The document reference is 1579, yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, thank you.

MR SUMPTION: I think it's common ground where it was actually found. The most plausible inference is that if it was found there, it was Mr Kay's document, and he was certainly a person intimately concerned in drawing up plans for what to do about Mr Patarkatsishvili's and Mr Berezovsky's assets. But really, apart from speculating on these possibilities, we don't have much to go on.

Now, the Curtis notes are dealt with in the next five paragraphs or six paragraphs of our document. These notes were prepared after or at about the time of an informal social lunch at Mr Patarkatsishvili's house in Georgia. The people present were Mr Patarkatsishvili, Mr Fomichev, Mr Tenenbaum and Mr Curtis, and a large number of other people including several children and a gentleman called Igor who has not been further identified.

Mr Tenenbaum had gone to this lunch at Mr Abramovich's request to talk to Mr Patarkatsishvili about his plans to invest in a football club as Mr Abramovich himself had recently done by buying Chelsea Football Club. Mr Tenenbaum had in fact been closely involved in the acquisition of Chelsea which is why he was sent off for that purpose.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: This was the Brazilian one, was it?

MR SUMPTION: Well, ultimately it turned out to be the Brazilian one, and there are passages in my learned friends' written closing when they cite a money-laundering enquiry document from Brazil, which is not actually an investigation into Mr Patarkatsishvili's affairs at all, but it refers to a meeting which they, for some reason, suggest must have been the only meeting or the first meeting that Mr Patarkatsishvili attended to acquire this Brazilian club, and suggest that, therefore, he can't in 2003 have been discussing such a plan with Mr Tenenbaum.

I'm perfectly content to leave your Ladyship to read that part of my learned friends' closing in due course. It doesn't appear to carry matters any further.

Mr Curtis, for his part, appears to have gone to this meeting in order to get evidence which could be used to prove that Mr Patarkatsishvili, for whom he was at this stage acting, had an interest in Rusal. Now, the reason why Mr Curtis wanted that evidence is, in fact, explained by the evidence given about events over the previous six months before this meeting. That evidence is that at the beginning of 2003 Mr Abramovich was considering ending his joint venture with Mr Deripaska and he therefore had to deal with the question that should be left over of Mr Patarkatsishvili's commission.

So he met Mr Patarkatsishvili in February 2003 and told him that he was thinking of pulling out of the joint venture with Mr Deripaska and initiated discussions on this subject. We give the references to that at paragraph 450 of our document. Now, it must be obvious that that would have immediately raised in Mr Patarkatsishvili's mind the problem of legalising his receipts in the face of western money-laundering enquiries.

Your Ladyship will recall that, according to Mr Abramovich, Mr Fomichev had suggested previously, in late 2000, that future payments by Mr Abramovich to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili should be covered for money-laundering purposes by transferring shares in Sibneft to them so that they could receive payment of dividends. That's a matter discussed at the Le Bourget meeting.

Now, a variant of this scheme was obviously being considered by Mr Patarkatsishvili shortly after his meeting in February 2003 with Mr Abramovich. That must be so because, at some stage shortly after that meeting, he instructed Mr Curtis to draw up an agreement for the transfer of 25 per cent of Rusal to himself and its registration in his own name. The draft agreement that Mr Curtis drew up for that purpose is in the bundle -- I won't ask your Ladyship to turn it up, but it's at H(A)56/215, and it's dated April 2003, about two months after his meeting with Mr Abramovich.

Mr Berezovsky said about this in his oral evidence, that this document, the draft agreement, was related to a proposal in about April 2003 that Mr Patarkatsishvili should sell his and Mr Berezovsky's shares in Rusal. It may well be that this particular draft document is associated with a plan by Mr Patarkatsishvili to have Rusal shares transferred to him so that he could sell them, but that was nothing to do with any interests of Mr Berezovsky. The draft that we have identifies Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Patarkatsishvili alone as the transferee. Nothing to do with Mr Berezovsky.

The problem of course that Mr Curtis faced, as Mr Patarkatsishvili's legal adviser, was the absence of any evidence that Mr Patarkatsishvili had ever had an interest in Rusal. That was a matter which had caused him concern in relation to Sibneft back in 2000 and that concern resurfaced in 2003 in relation to Rusal. That appears to be why Mr Curtis refers, in the note itself, to, as he puts it, the importance of creating proof of ownership and it may also be why he labelled the note as vitally important in his post-it instruction to Ms Flynn.

We give the references to that at paragraph 440, sub 6 of our document, in particular notes 1624 and 5.

What seems clear is that this note cannot be a contemporaneous record or a direct record of anything heard by Mr Curtis at this lunch. Mr Tenenbaum was adamant that nobody was taking notes at what was, on the face of it, a social lunch, and says, plausibly I would suggest, that he would certainly have asked for a copy if they had been taking notes. The conversation was in Russian, which was the language that Mr Tenenbaum spoke to Mr Patarkatsishvili, and the language of everybody else present except for Mr Curtis himself who did not understand Russian.

It follows that the note must necessarily have been derived from something that somebody else said to Mr Curtis presumably afterwards. Now, I am not going to invite your Ladyship to attach too much weight to the double hearsay statement of Mr Tenenbaum in his evidence, that Mr Fomichev subsequently told Mr Shvidler that he had dictated the note to Mr Curtis after the meeting was over, but it is clear that something of that sort, whoever was involved in it, must have happened.

We know that neither Mr Curtis nor Mr Fomichev were overscrupulous in the matter of generating documents. That is apparent from the Spectrum transaction and the Devonia transaction in which both of them had been intimately concerned. We know that the language problem, and the language that was being used at this meeting, was such that Mr Curtis cannot have heard these remarks himself.

Mr Tenenbaum is adamant that, having gone to Georgia to talk about the acquisition of football clubs, he would not have discussed Mr Abramovich's personal financial affairs with a large number of relative strangers. The only response to that point is that my learned friends have suggested in their written closing that he would have been quite likely to discuss these matters because Mr Curtis was well-known to Mr Abramovich and Mr Shvidler. He was not well-known to either of them. They had met him about ten years before when he had briefly tried to interest them in a proposal about arms selling in which they were not interested.

Mr Tenenbaum, so far as the evidence showed, had never come across Mr Curtis at all.

Now, there is in addition an argument, again ventilated in my learned friends' written closing, that some of the information attributed to Mr Tenenbaum would only have been known to him. That also is incorrect. We have dealt with that suggestion at paragraph 440, sub 5 of our closing. There is no substance in the point because it can in fact be shown, for the reasons we give there, that as a result of his involvement in the various financial transactions that had occurred since 2000, the information in question would actually have been very well-known to Mr Fomichev, indeed better known to Mr Fomichev than is likely to have been known to Mr Tenenbaum.

Now, in this particular context, I should mention two related side issues raised in Mr Berezovsky's written closing. One is that it is said that Mr Tenenbaum's reference to the Dr Evil text message sent by Mr Berezovsky to Mr Fomichev must have been an invention, and that the mention of it by Mr Tenenbaum discredits him as a witness. I have not relied on that part of Mr Tenenbaum's evidence and I don't intend to do so for reasons I'll come to in a moment, but I reject entirely the suggestion that it was untrue, a suggestion that is not supported by any evidence other than the assertion of Addleshaws in correspondence.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, isn't the point that it would be there for somebody to look at?

MR SUMPTION: Well, it wouldn't necessarily be there. It depends on what your practice is about keeping text messages, old text messages on your mobile.

My Lady, the whole issue is bound up with the second side issue raised in Mr Berezovsky's written closing which concerns the position of Mr Fomichev. Both sides have had some contact in the course of this litigation with Mr Fomichev in relation to these proceedings. That is established from the evidence in the summary judgment proceedings, and I'll just give your Ladyship the references. Marino 2, paragraph 97 on my learned friends' side, and Mitchard 3, paragraph 45, deal with some of the matters that they have ascertained from Mr Fomichev. In addition, some of Mr Abramovich's witnesses have referred to contact with him on our side, including Mr Tenenbaum.

My learned friends in their written closing on behalf of Mr Berezovsky have said that I should, in those circumstances, have called Mr Fomichev on behalf of Mr Abramovich. Now, I was not and am not prepared to call Mr Fomichev for a perfectly straightforward, indeed obvious reason. Mr Fomichev was, throughout the relevant periods, the agent of Mr Berezovsky. It is part of my case that in that capacity Mr Fomichev was directly engaged in the preparation of sham documents evidencing bogus transactions for the purpose of laundering Mr Berezovsky's money. It would have been perfectly absurd for me to call Mr Fomichev bearing that in mind. Indeed, on some of the more important issues, I would suggest that any competent legal adviser would have advised Mr Fomichev to rely on the privilege against self-incrimination in answering questions on that part of the case. I therefore find it hard to take seriously my learned friends' suggestion that I should reasonably be expected to call Mr Fomichev.

Now, having taken that course, ie the course of not calling Mr Fomichev, it followed that I could not properly deploy hearsay evidence derived from Mr Fomichev since I would not have been willing to call him in response to a counter-notice. I therefore reject the suggestion that any adverse inferences should be drawn from that.

In particular I reject the main inference which my learned friends have sought to draw from it, which is that Mr Fomichev would have confirmed that there was an onsale by Devonia to Mr Abramovich. Mr Mitchard's evidence in the summary judgment proceedings was in fact that Mr Fomichev had confirmed that there was no onsale. Now, I haven't and I don't rely on Mr Mitchard's evidence in the summary judgment proceedings to show that there was no onsale, there is plenty of other evidence to show that there was no onsale, but I do rely on it to rebut the suggestion that's now being made that a concern about Mr Fomichev's answers on that subject is the reason why he has not been called. It isn't.

Now, if I may return to the real issues, the issue of the alleged distribution of dividends in Rusal is the next matter on which Mr Berezovsky relies. This relates to $175 million, which is described as constituting Rusal dividends paid to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili between 2003 and 2005.

The underlying facts are extremely complex and are covered with very full references between paragraphs 442 and 448 of our document.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I've read those.

MR SUMPTION: Now, it's not something about which Mr Berezovsky has been able to give evidence; as he acknowledged, he wasn't concerned in that. This was a point that originated with Mr Marino who asserted in his witness statement in the summary judgment application that that 175 million represented a share of Rusal profits.

Now, he was actually mistaken about this, and I'll explain how the mistake arose. The 175 million was part of a larger sum of 377.5 million which was paid to companies designated by Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili under an agreement made between Mr Abramovich and Mr Patarkatsishvili in June 2002. The evidence that has been given by Mr Abramovich is that he agreed to pay a further 377.5 million on top of the 1.3 billion which had already been paid from May 2001 in order to compensate them for, first of all, the interest loss attributable to the fact that the 1.3 billion had been paid in instalments, and, secondly, the fact that commissions had been paid to the sheikh to legalise the payments. That was actually the first time that Mr Abramovich had learnt of the involvement of the sheikh in the transmission of the 1.3 billion.

Subsequent evidence has established that although Mr Berezovsky initially, and maybe still, denies that any more than 175 million was received out of the 377.5 million, the appearance later in the trial of the Latvian Trade Bank statements establishes that the full amount was in fact received. Indeed, there is an element of common ground about this because Mr Berezovsky confirms in his witness statement that Mr Patarkatsishvili had in fact asked for this payment. His evidence is that he and Mr Patarkatsishvili discussed asking Mr Abramovich to make a payment in compensation for these matters, and what Mr Berezovsky says is that Mr Patarkatsishvili went off and asked Mr Abramovich but he said no. Whereas Mr Abramovich's evidence is that there was indeed such a request and he agreed to it.

The fact that 377.5 million was actually paid tends very strongly to support Mr Abramovich in his recollection of that particular occasion.

The reason, and the only reason, why Mr Marino believed that that sum was a Rusal dividend was that the money came from Rual Trade Limited, which was a trading company jointly owned by Mr Abramovich and Mr Deripaska, which marketed the output of Rusal and its various subsidiaries. Now, that of course doesn't mean that it's a Rusal dividend. It only means that it was the source from which Mr Abramovich obtained the money which he paid to Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky. As it happens, and it's a good illustration of this point, the 1.3 billion which was agreed to be paid in May 2001 was also paid from Rual, but nobody has suggested that that was a Rusal dividend, and it hardly could have been. It is important to distinguish between the place where Mr Abramovich gets the money and the basis on which it is being paid.

Finally, there are the terms of the July 2004 sale of the second tranche of Rusal shares, which have given rise to a lively debate in the last few days of the evidence, plus the negotiation of those terms, which are together said to show that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili had an interest in Rusal.

The background to these rather complex arrangements is summarised in our document, I'm afraid at some length, between paragraphs 449 and 455. In summary, and I'll deal with it very shortly, Mr Abramovich had decided in early 2003 to sell out of all his joint ventures with Mr Deripaska. Both Mr Abramovich and Mr Deripaska gave evidence that in 2003 they had agreed on a total price of 2.3 billion but Mr Deripaska had been unable to raise more than 1.9 billion of that.

Now, the deal that they reached was therefore that Mr Abramovich would sell to Mr Deripaska the first tranche of 25 per cent in Rusal, plus his interests in all their other jointly-owned businesses in the automotive industry et cetera, for 1.9 billion, and the second tranche of Rusal would be sold for 450 million when Mr Deripaska could raise the money to buy it. Of course, since most of the purchase price was being loaded on to the first instalment, the parties knew that it would be very much in the interest of Mr Deripaska to complete the second one as well.

At the time when Mr Abramovich resolved to pull out of the joint venture with Mr Deripaska, he broached with Mr Patarkatsishvili, initially in February 2003, the question of his commission, and the deal that was finally agreed between them in October 2003 was that he would be paid a commission of 585 million. That reflected the fact that the aluminium holdings had been prodigiously profitable, and Mr Patarkatsishvili had made that possible, first, by bringing about the original acquisition, and, secondly, by helping to bring an end to the aluminium wars.

After agreeing the amount of the commission, Mr Abramovich and Mr Patarkatsishvili discussed how that amount was going to be paid in a way which would satisfy the compliance departments of western banks. Now, it was therefore agreed that as and when Mr Deripaska was in a position to buy the second tranche of Rusal, Mr Abramovich would transfer it to Mr Patarkatsishvili so that he could sell it on to Mr Deripaska at the agreed price of $450 million, leaving 135 million to be settled in some other way.

The second tranche sale documents, all dated 20 July 2004 were designed not just to transfer the shares to Mr Deripaska but to settle the debt of 585 million owed to Mr Patarkatsishvili in a way which would generate documentation to satisfy western banks.

Now, the sale was accomplished by a number of different contracts. We've summarised them at paragraphs --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you just help me on this. The transfer to Mr Patarkatsishvili by Mr Abramovich of the second 25 per cent tranche, was that done for no consideration -- well, no, as it were, stated consideration on the document --

MR SUMPTION: It was simply a transfer.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Simply a transfer?

MR SUMPTION: Simply a transfer, yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And the documents support that, do they?

MR SUMPTION: Yes, they do. The relevant document is at 456, sub 2, in our document.

Essentially, the deal therefore was that Mr Abramovich's aluminium holding company, Madison, would transfer the second 25 per cent of Rusal to a company nominated by Mr Patarkatsishvili.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

MR SUMPTION: Cliren, which he had acquired from Coalco a week before. Cliren then sold it straight on, on the same day, to Mr Deripaska for 450 million. Now, at the same time, there was an agreement called the deed of accounting and release with Cliren which was an agreement under which it was agreed to pay the 135 million bringing the total sum paid to Cliren to the 585 that had previously been agreed.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I remember this now.

MR SUMPTION: In that document, the deed of accounting and release, the sum purported to be a dividend payable in respect of Rusal shares.

Mr Patarkatsishvili then entered into something called the beneficial owner deed of release, under which he represented and warranted that he was, and had since 15 March 2000 been -- I'll say a bit more about that -- the sole beneficial owner of the second 25 per cent tranche. There was then a deed of acknowledgement under which, in effect, Mr Abramovich represented to Mr Deripaska that he had dealt only with Mr Patarkatsishvili about this and that whoever Mr Patarkatsishvili said was the beneficial owner of the second tranche was the beneficial owner to the best of Mr Abramovich's knowledge and belief.

Now, what Mr Berezovsky does not of course say is that the terms of the second tranche sale documents themselves support his claim to have had an interest in Rusal. The most that one could deduce from those documents, on one view of them, is that Mr Patarkatsishvili had such an interest and no one else. Mr Berezovsky's case is based essentially on the antecedent negotiations. What he says is that, in the course of the negotiations and drafting of these contracts, the various professional advisers to Mr Abramovich, Mr Deripaska and Mr Patarkatsishvili recognised among themselves that Mr Berezovsky did have an interest in Rusal and then, to use my learned friend's phrase, airbrushed him out of the contractual documents by the time they were actually executed on 20 July 2004.

Now, this suggestion is simply not justified by the facts and, in our submission, it was largely demolished by the evidence of Mr Hauser. As I pointed out already, Mr Hauser was not a witness beholden to anybody. He was called by us under subpoena, having declined to give us a witness statement, and he certainly had no emotional or financial interest in the outcome of this issue or any other. Mr Hauser's evidence was supported by that of Mr Anisimov and Mr Streshinsky who acted for Mr Patarkatsishvili.

Now, the position was complicated by the number of professional advisers involved and by the fact that they were at cross-purposes for a large part of the time when they were dealing with this documentation. But the essential problem, as your Ladyship will recall, is that in early June 2004, shortly after the negotiations had begun, Mr Berezovsky, having apparently heard that negotiations were in progress, announced in the press that he had an interest in the assets being sold and would, if necessary, resort to the courts to block the sale. That caused, as one can understand, an enormous flap among the various legal advisers who were, of course, concerned that their principals could find themselves liable at some later stage to Mr Berezovsky for infringing the rights that Mr Berezovsky was claiming in the public prints to have possessed.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You've set that all out in great detail, what your submissions are.

MR SUMPTION: We have, yes.

Of course, ultimately, both Mr Abramovich and Mr Patarkatsishvili, according to Mr Hauser, denied that Mr Berezovsky had any interest and, therefore, this aspect of it faded away. But the form of the contractual documents was not the result of the lawyers airbrushing Mr Berezovsky out of the picture; it was the result of their having received instructions that he had never been in the picture in the first place.

Now, neither the negotiations nor the contracts as executed therefore support this suggestion. On their face -- the one exception is, of course, that on its face the beneficial owner deed of release does support the suggestion that Mr Patarkatsishvili had an interest in the Rusal shares being sold that extended beyond the interest that was specifically created for him on 20 July itself, and it does that because the beneficial owner deed of release contains a warranty of historic title, ie not just that he was the beneficial owner at the date of sale but that he had been continuously from 15 March.

Now, that provision did not actually reflect the facts and the reason why it was included was the subject of some extensive evidence given in cross-examination and to some extent in chief by Mr Hauser on behalf -- who was acting on behalf of Mr Deripaska. His evidence was that he required this because he believed, rightly or wrongly, that without a historic warranty, Mr Deripaska would be exposed to a claim from Mr Berezovsky if it should one day turn out that there had been some intermediate stage at which he did have an interest, and if there was some uncertainty about the circumstances in which he had parted with it.

Mr Hauser's evidence makes it perfectly clear that this was not because he believed that Mr Berezovsky had such an interest, it was because he didn't know and wanted watertight contractual provisions for his client.

Your Ladyship may find it useful to add to paragraph 461, sub 23, a reference to Hauser, Day 31, pages 90 to 92, where he deals specifically with the concerns that led him to include and insist on the inclusion of the historic warranty.

Of course, none of these considerations assist Mr Berezovsky. Mr Patarkatsishvili made a great deal of money out of the Rusal transaction, and it may be that his private arrangements with Mr Berezovsky were such that Mr Berezovsky was entitled to a share of that. Now if, contrary to the submissions that we have been making, the money that Mr Patarkatsishvili made out of the Rusal transaction was in reality the price of a proprietary interest of his in the business, then it may be that the private arrangements he had with Mr Berezovsky were such that Mr Berezovsky shared in that interest.

But if so, those are rights that would be purely and simply rights as between Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky. Mr Berezovsky is not, of course, entitled in this action to bring a claim against my client on the basis of a right derived simply from his agreement with Mr Patarkatsishvili. The exact nature of that arrangement is something that will in due course have to be exhaustively investigated in the Chancery proceedings. We don't have the material to resolve it here, and that was essentially why your Ladyship declined to grant permission to add it by amendment at the case management conference in the summer.

Now, those are our submissions on the essential question whether there was ever an agreement to confer on Mr Berezovsky an interest in the aluminium assets or the merged assets.

Turning briefly to the English law trust that is alleged, which, in our submission, there never was an agreement to confer the interest, and one therefore doesn't get to the question whether that interest was held in trust for Mr Berezovsky or under what law. But if Mr Berezovsky did have an interest by agreement, or in any other way, in the aluminium assets, the question what law governed it then becomes a critical question because it's common ground that by Russian law any claim in respect of that interest would be time-barred.

It's probably a general rule in mitigation that the more remote an alternative case is, the more elaborate the arguments and sub-arguments which it generates and the more disproportionate the time devoted to it. I will try to buck that trend if I may by dealing relatively briefly with matters that are more fully dealt with in our written closing at sections B3 and B4, paragraphs 467 and following.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've read those.

MR SUMPTION: I'm not going to repeat those, but obviously Mr Berezovsky's primary case is that he and Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich agreed that the interests were to be held in an English law trust. What he says is that Mr Anisimov had advised him to do that, and that at some unspecified time there were discussions in which it was agreed that the merger negotiations, if they succeeded, would give rise to a new company which would be created in a proper British law way, and that their interests would be held under a trust by Mr Abramovich.

An agreement to that effect is actually said then finally to have been reached at the Dorchester Hotel meeting itself. Indeed, in his witness statement at paragraph 280, Mr Berezovsky goes further and says that at that meeting Mr Deripaska declared, in response to the others agreeing that their arrangements would be governed by English law, that, yes, he too would be holding part of his 50 per cent on trust for his partners, whoever they might be. Now, that's Mr Berezovsky's version. All of these assertions, in our submission, are entirely untrue.

Mr Berezovsky claims that the proper law was a matter of great importance to him at the time, and he claims to have a distinct recollection of the discussions in question, both the previous discussions in Moscow and those which occurred at the Dorchester Hotel. Yet we know that in spite of that distinct recollection, the allegation was not made at any stage before the summary judgment application.

We have set out the history of the way in which this was taken at paragraph 484 of our document.

The reality is that Mr Berezovsky and his advisers have always been aware of the potential problem about this. We drew attention to it in our application for summary judgment, but since then we have learnt, as a result of disclosure by the family defendants, that the problem of the proper law was actually noted and understood by Mr Berezovsky and his advisers well before that because it's recorded at the meeting at Mr Patarkatsishvili's home in England in April 2007, where the note says:

"Rusal three-year limitation, Russian law."

We refer to that at 482, sub 1, 484, sub 1, and 486.

So this was an issue that was on the table at all times as far as Mr Berezovsky was concerned.

That makes it highly significant that until the summary judgment application the only point made about proper law had been that by implication it was to be any law other than Russian law, and preferably BVI law, by virtue of the intention of the parties to hold their interests in offshore structures.

I've already in opening taken your Ladyship to the material related to Ms Dohmann's application in Mr Berezovsky's presence, and I'm not going to go through that again. But it was in direct response to the reply served in October 2008, expressly founding his contention that English law, or BVI law, governed the arrangements by implication, that we made our application for summary judgment. So Mr Berezovsky's addition of this particular allegation about an express choice of law was a direct response to that application, and, of course, to Dr Rachkov's evidence on the summary judgment application, that the points that we were taking in relation to the proper law, namely that Russian law did not recognise the alleged trust and that it was time-barred, were actually correct.

So what happened was that Mr Berezovsky effectively pulled a rabbit out of a hat at a stage when otherwise his claim in relation to Rusal would have been struck out. It was, in our submission, another Forbes moment when Mr Berezovsky asserted something because he needed to rather than because he thought it true.

Now, we know that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili attended at least five interviews with Mr Berezovsky's solicitors in 2007 alone. At at least two of which Rusal was discussed, and at at least one of which, the one in April, the problems arising out of the Russian limitation period were discussed. Therefore, the significance of the lateness and opportunistic character of the appearance of this issue is very great.

It's right to point out that, in addition, the allegation is in fact wholly inconsistent with the evidence that your Ladyship has heard. Mr Anisimov did not advise Mr Berezovsky to make his arrangements under proper British law. It's actually very difficult to see how the proper law of the arrangements for holding the interest can have been discussed, as Mr Berezovsky alleges, before the Dorchester Hotel meeting in Moscow. As your Ladyship knows, the merger proposal arose for the first time in the very beginning of March, and the negotiations were conducted in a hurry and in great secrecy.

Again, if I can invite your Ladyship to add a reference on this point in the light of the way the matter is put by my learned friends. If your Ladyship were to add to paragraph 417, sub 1, a reference to Mr Abramovich's evidence at Day 19, page 117, Ms Panchenko's evidence in her second witness statement at paragraph 54, and Mr Bulygin's witness statement at paragraph 18. Those passages emphasise the secrecy with which the merger agreement was negotiated because all the parties were concerned about the potential problem of a squeeze by the suppliers of raw materials if it became known prematurely.

So you have merger negotiations conducted in great secrecy, neither Mr Berezovsky nor Mr Patarkatsishvili are involved in them, and Mr Patarkatsishvili is told first about the merger by Mr Abramovich on the phone, very shortly before the Dorchester Hotel meeting. And Mr Berezovsky is told shortly afterwards by Mr Patarkatsishvili.

In the same place, your Ladyship might find it valuable to note the manner in which Mr Patarkatsishvili was told about the done deal, which is dealt with by Mr Abramovich at Day 19, pages 109 to 115.

Indeed, it's always nice to get some help from Mr Berezovsky on points like this. In his interview with Vedomosti, which we have quoted at paragraph 409, sub 3, of our document, Mr Berezovsky told the press and thereby the world that he wasn't in Russia at the time, and was told about the merger after it had been agreed by Mr Patarkatsishvili on the telephone. So that his statement that he had discussed the choice of English law at meetings preliminary to the merger agreement, and preliminary to the Dorchester Hotel, with Mr Abramovich among others simply can't be true.

The discussion of the proper law is then said to have occurred at the Dorchester Hotel, but the evidence has been that the Dorchester Hotel meeting was not a meeting at which the terms of the merger were being discussed. There was a discussion of the fact that the merger had occurred, but there was no discussion of its terms and certainly no negotiation.

Now, as I've pointed out, the account in Mr Berezovsky's witness statement of Mr Patarkatsishvili, who had not been involved in these negotiations, suddenly explaining to those who had been that they had agreed that it was going to be governed by English law, which indeed they had in the preliminary agreement, is one of the more ridiculous parts of his evidence.

Every other witness present denies this story of there being an agreement about the legal basis of arrangements between Mr Berezovsky, Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich at the Dorchester meeting.

Mr Patarkatsishvili said nothing about English law in his interviews, although, according to Mr Berezovsky, it was actually Mr Patarkatsishvili who had initiated this idea having received this advice from Mr Anisimov.

There is an alternative case that a choice of law is to be implied from the circumstances or imputed to the parties, and I should deal briefly with that. An implication is said in the pleadings to arise from the use of English law in other agreements, but the problem about this is that since Mr Berezovsky was not party to any of the other agreements, or indeed even aware of them at the time, it's rather hard to see how that could be a relevant consideration pointing to the choice of law in relation to this alleged agreement.

Mr Berezovsky claims that Mr Patarkatsishvili told him in advance that the merger would be governed by English law, but since Mr Patarkatsishvili was not party to the negotiations, and first heard of the deal after it had been done from Mr Abramovich, he could frankly not have known that or disclosed it to Mr Berezovsky.

I would perhaps also suggest that the reliance that Mr Berezovsky places on these other contracts is something of a non sequitur. The fact that contracts are made under English law to acquire interests in the aluminium businesses does not give rise to an implication that the same law is to govern a distinct arrangement by which one of the parties is to hold his interest for another.

I would suggest that must especially be true if Mr Berezovsky establishes that, on whatever basis, the 1995 agreement was made in the terms that he alleges and was applied to aluminium. Because on that footing there was an existing relationship between the parties, unquestionably governed by Russian law, which Mr Berezovsky says was now being applied by agreement to aluminium. And it seems most bizarre to have a relationship between parties, an existing relationship governed by Russian law, but in which you single out one particular asset, namely the aluminium assets, as being held under an English law trust.

Now, on the footing that English law applies, there are a number of other issues which are a long way down the line and which I don't propose to deal with on my feet. Is the alleged trust good even in English law? If there was no express trust, was there nevertheless an agreement to pool assets of a kind that could give rise to a resulting or constructive trust? Was there a breach of trust or contract on Mr Abramovich's part in selling the Rusal shares? Was any breach released by the terms of those agreements?

On those points I don't think there's anything that I can helpfully add to what I've put in my written submissions should those issues arise.

The only other matter which I want to deal with very briefly is to say something about my learned friends' written closing in general. If I were in a position to say to your Ladyship that I was satisfied with this document, Mr Rabinowitz and his team would not have been doing their job. One point, however, that I would make about it is that its authors have a regrettable habit of referring to points as being conceded or common ground when they are not, and I would invite your Ladyship not to take at face value, without reference to the alleged concession, any suggestion of that kind.

More generally we have the concerns that, inevitably in a hard-fought action like this, one does have about the accuracy and context of very many of the references that they give to the evidence. What I suggest is that the most efficient way of dealing with that is for us to serve a schedule of errors and omissions by paragraph of their document. It will not contain detailed further submissions but simply correct errors and omissions, and we would be in a position to serve that by 12 January which is five days before we are due to resume to hear my learned friend Mr Rabinowitz's submissions.

We hope that's acceptable both to your Ladyship and to my learned friend.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, it's certainly acceptable to me. I'll hear from Mr Rabinowitz in a moment.

If you are disputing some of the asserted concessions, I would also direct you, Mr Sumption, or your team at any rate, to provide me with a similar schedule identifying --

MR SUMPTION: It will be included --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: -- those asserted common ground propositions, and those which are common ground and those which are not.

MR SUMPTION: I will certainly do that, it will be included in the same schedule. I have dealt with what seemed to be the most significant on my feet, but we will give your Ladyship chapter and verse about those, certainly.

My Lady, those are my submissions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much, Mr Sumption.

Mr Rabinowitz, I propose to adjourn this case now until 10.15 on Tuesday, 17 January. I can't sit on the Monday.

I anticipate that on 17 January, you, Mr Sumption, will not be appearing before me?

MR SUMPTION: I will not.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm sure that the Bar would want to join with me in wishing you all the very best in your new career in another place.

MR SUMPTION: My Lady, I'm extremely grateful.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, before your Ladyship rises, can I just say this. My learned friend has proposed giving us his document of what he calls errors and omissions by the 12th. Can I ask, my Lady, that that be given by the 10th, that's to say to give us a week to deal with it rather than just five days.

MR SUMPTION: We will do our best to get it to him by the 10th.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That seems reasonable enough.

MR SUMPTION: The problems are obvious, it's a very pernicky job if it's to be done properly, but we will try our very best to get it by the 10th.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, the only other thing I was going to say before your Ladyship rises is, if it would help, these are 935 pages available in A5 rather than A4. I appreciate having them in A4 is quite a lot to carry around. If your Ladyship would like --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I would very much welcome them in A5 if those could be provided to my clerk.

MR RABINOWITZ: We will arrange it.

MR SUMPTION: Would your Ladyship like our version in that format also?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, because I've now marked the ones in A4, but if you provide me with them in A5, I will then mark those in A5.

Thank you very much.

(12.33 pm)

(The hearing adjourned until

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Rabinowitz.

Closing submissions by MR RABINOWITZ

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, when I opened this case in October, I submitted that there were four points in particular which your Ladyship would wish to bear in mind when considering the inherent probabilities of each side's case. These four points have not changed and they bear repeating.

First, your Ladyship will wish to consider whether Mr Abramovich's case relating to the events of late 2000 and 2001 can be squared with the sudden and dramatic end of his friendship with Mr Berezovsky at this time. In particular, Mr Abramovich claims that he was being generous in agreeing to pay $150 million to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili for a 49 per cent stake in ORT at the end of 2000, and generous in agreeing to pay Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili $1.3 billion in May 2001. If that were true, one would expect Mr Berezovsky to have been eternally grateful to Mr Abramovich.

But what in fact happened was quite the opposite, with Mr Berezovsky's friendship with Mr Abramovich coming to a conclusive end at exactly this time.

Mr Berezovsky's case of course makes sense of this, but Mr Abramovich's case makes no sense of it at all.

Our second point was that if Mr Abramovich has been shown, as we say he has been, to have put forward an entirely false case as regards the ownership interests in Sibneft and Rusal, then this begs this question: if Mr Abramovich had nothing to hide in terms of the allegations made, then why would he, Mr Abramovich, have chosen to put forward a dishonest case? The question remains, and remains unanswered, in our submission.

The only explanation for Mr Abramovich's continued denial is because once ownership interests in each of Sibneft and Rusal are established, Mr Abramovich has no coherent defence to the claims made.

Our third point referred to the inherent probabilities. Mr Abramovich's case is difficult to square with the sale of Sibneft at what our experts will say was a massive undervalue. Now, given that expert valuation evidence has been postponed, we cannot and do not ask the court at this time to make any findings about the true value of Sibneft. But we do rely, my Lady, on the unchallenged evidence of Mr Berezovsky, supported incidentally by contemporaneous interviews and the like, that he believed 50 per cent of Sibneft to be worth very far in excess of $1.3 billion.

For my Lady's note, we have given the references to Mr Berezovsky's belief in this regard at paragraph 867, subparagraph 3(b) of our written closing, which is behind tab 1 in volume 2 at page 522.

As to our fourth point, this related to Mr Abramovich's claim that the Cap d'Antibes meeting did not take place, or at least that it took place prior to the arrest of Mr Glushkov. The difficulties for Mr Abramovich, however, include -- and I shall be returning to these later -- first, that he originally admitted that the meeting took place after Mr Glushkov's arrest; second, that the meeting was recalled by both Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili; third, that the meeting was witnessed by others, Ms Gorbunova and Mr Giroud, an undeniably independent witness -- I'm sure I've mispronounced his name, I hope he will forgive me; and fourth, that Mr Abramovich's attempt to prove that the meeting could not have taken place have foundered, relying on hearsay evidence of witnesses not called by Mr Abramovich, and Mr Abramovich's own changing and frankly dishonest reconstruction of events.

My Lady, what has changed most significantly since October of course when the trial began is that the court has seen and heard from the witnesses in this case. Whilst of course your Ladyship will have formed your own view of the witnesses, in our submission, the dishonesty of Mr Abramovich and his key witnesses, their cynical manipulation of evidence and indeed of the trial process, is the fifth and perhaps the most important of the general points which my Lady will wish to have in mind when weighing up the evidence and making findings of fact in this case.

We have devoted a good deal of our written closing to this point and I shall be spending a little more time on it today. After that, I shall return to the Sibneft claim and then to the Rusal claim.

But my Lady, while it is undoubtedly convenient to consider the two claims separately, I would respectfully suggest that there is one overarching question that the court will want to ask itself, and it is this. As Mr Abramovich on his case provided a plausible explanation for the enormous and indeed admitted payments made to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, my Lady might think that this case is perhaps marked out by the very few facts that are not in dispute, but, as your Ladyship will be aware, the payments made are one of the matters that are largely not disputed. This being the case, your Ladyship may well consider that those payments provide an important anchor point in the analysis of the other issues that arise for determination.

Of course, if, as Mr Berezovsky says is the case, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili had ownership interests in Sibneft and Rusal then there is a ready explanation for the size of the huge payments made. On Mr Abramovich's case, of course, they had no such ownership interests, and I would respectfully suggest that the court will want to test that contention that they had no ownership interests by considering taking Sibneft and Rusal in turn, but again emphasising that the matter has to be considered together: whether Mr Abramovich's version of the alleged agreement with Mr Berezovsky regarding Sibneft could ever have accounted for the huge payment of $1.3 billion he says he agreed to make to terminate that agreement when, on his case, he had absolutely no obligation whatsoever to make any payment at all, and whether Mr Abramovich's version of the alleged agreement with Mr Patarkatsishvili regarding Rusal could ever have accounted for the equally eye-watering payment of $575 million he says he agreed to pay to Mr Patarkatsishvili in relation to Rusal in 2004 when again, on his case, he had no obligation whatsoever to make a payment of that size.

My Lady, we suggest that the total disconnect between the agreements alleged by Mr Abramovich and the size of the payments he says he made in connection with them provides the strongest possible evidence that the agreements were not as alleged by Mr Abramovich.

Mr Abramovich was not, as he would have to be on his version of events, making these huge payments out of generosity and appreciation. He made them because they related to ownership interests in Sibneft and Rusal, and that, we say, is what explains their size.

My Lady, having introduced that point, it is one I shall need to return to later.

Before I turn to make comments on the credibility of Mr Abramovich and his witnesses, which is the topic to which I propose to turn first, there is one final introductory point that I should make and it is this. We have put together, on this side of the court, what is in the context of this case a relatively short document which flags up the more egregious of the many factual inaccuracies and inaccurate citations in my learned friends' written closing, to the extent that we have not already dealt with them in our written closing.

I am not going to go through that on my feet but I would respectfully invite my Lady to pay it close regard, particularly when considering criticisms made of the witness evidence of Mr Berezovsky and his witnesses because, as my Lady will see, a very great number of the criticisms of Mr Berezovsky and his witnesses are simply incorrect. My learned friends have unfortunately, and I'm sure this was inadvertent, seen inconsistencies where there are none, misstated the facts and ignored evidence inconsistent with their case, even when it comes from their own witnesses.

My Lady, can I just then hand up that document.

I've put it in a nice 1 Essex Court file.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. (Handed)

I think I've seen this.

MR RABINOWITZ: I don't think so, my Lady, it was completed last night. What your Ladyship will have seen, I think, is the next document that I need to say something about, the monster document, as we have been calling it on this side.

Your Ladyship will recall --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What, the defendant's schedule?

MR RABINOWITZ: That's the one, the 175 pages.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've certainly seen that -- okay, no, I haven't seen this.

MR RABINOWITZ: Your Ladyship sees it adopts an approach of identifying particular paragraphs in the closing, my learned friends' closing. It sets out what is there said and then identifies what is wrong with it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

Just a second. (Pause)

MR RABINOWITZ: The references to paragraphs are obviously to Mr Abramovich's closing. And I can tell your Ladyship that it will go on Magnum, if that's where your Ladyship would rather have it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: I do also want to say something about that document which your Ladyship has seen, called the defendant's schedule, which my learned friends served I think on Wednesday afternoon of last week.

I don't know whether my Lady has had a look at this document or not --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I've had what I might call a superficial read through, but obviously I ...

MR RABINOWITZ: Your Ladyship will recall that although it was billed in advance as a document that would identify inaccuracies in our written closing, what it is rather is simply a reply closing submission presented in boxes.

Now, that is not what it was supposed to be but, be that as it may, your Ladyship has it. It runs to 175 pages, pages which are making points which largely repeat my learned friends' written and oral closing, and indeed then goes on to repeat itself.

Be that as it may, my Lady, with a view to assisting the court we have been going through this document, box by painful box and page by painful page, in order that we may be able to provide your Ladyship with an annotated version of this schedule with our commentary on their comments to our closing, and we hope to have that document available for your Ladyship before the end of the week.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So it will have box 1215 --

MR RABINOWITZ: It will simply go across. It will be a schedule, because again, with respect, it is a rather --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Otherwise it's indigestible.

MR RABINOWITZ: It's indigestible, and your Ladyship needs to see why we say what they say is either wrong or unhelpful. So that your Ladyship will get.

Can I then move more substantively on to the first of the topics that I would wish to address in my oral closing, and that relates to our submissions on the testimony of Mr Abramovich and his witnesses.

My Lady, this is of course a topic we've dealt with in section B of our written closing which begins at page 62 and, as your Ladyship will be aware from what we have said, we say that Mr Abramovich, whilst undoubtedly a smooth and well-prepared witness, proved himself to be a thoroughly dishonest and cynical witness as well, willing to perpetuate a false case, not only by giving evidence which he knew to be untrue, but also by calling as witnesses his associates who again, as Mr Abramovich well knew, gave, as they were intended to do, thoroughly untrue evidence designed only to mislead the court.

As your Ladyship will know, we have in our written submissions identified a number of matters that were, we submitted, relevant to the issue of the credibility of Mr Abramovich and his witnesses.

I'm not proposing to go through all of those now, but I do just want to say something further on some aspects of the matters we have there dealt with. The first matter I would like to say something further about is the question of collusion between witnesses. Your Ladyship will find that we have dealt with that at paragraph 98 and following of our written closing.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I'm there.

MR RABINOWITZ: The point that we address there relates to the fact that, as the evidence has established, Mr Abramovich and his witnesses discussed their recollections and Mr Abramovich's case amongst themselves at length before preparing their witness statements.

In response to this evidence, and indeed our submission about this, your Ladyship may recall that in his closing speech Mr Sumption suggested to your Ladyship that this discussion of recollections by witnesses before putting their evidence in a witness statement was, in his words:

"... a practice to which no possible objection can be taken provided that the witness applies his own mind to his evidence and distinguishes between what he can recall and what he has learnt from someone else."

That, for my Lady's note, was Day 39, page 15, line 23 to page 16, line 2.

My Lady, while it may well be the case, as Mr Sumption said, that one does often find witnesses, prior to making a witness statement, discussing the matter and indeed the issues arising with other witnesses, the point about the present case is that this is not at all what happened here. Because what is clear from the evidence is that there was here not simply a discussion of the evidence but in fact a coordinated effort to ensure that everyone's evidence was the same on particular points. In other words, there was here precisely the failure of the witnesses to apply their own minds to the issue and give their own evidence, rather than taking it from someone else, that even Mr Sumption accepts was indeed unacceptable.

And perhaps I can just give my Lady an example of this. We have, at paragraphs 105 to 109 of our written closing, on page 71 and onwards, set out extensive references to the evidence of Mr Abramovich's witnesses at the strike-out application, and again at trial, which makes this point. And as my Lady will recall, the focus of these paragraphs relates to the way in which the evidence of Mr Abramovich's witnesses changed between the strike-out application where the allegation made by Mr Abramovich was that the payments were all ORT related, and indeed that the agreement was to fund ORT, to the situation at trial where there was a transformation in this and we were now talking about krysha.

This was a change that one saw not just in the evidence of one witness but rather in the evidence of each of Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler, Mr Tenenbaum, Ms Goncharova and Ms Panchenko.

Now, your Ladyship may recall that in his closing speech Mr Sumption again sought to brush aside this issue by suggesting that this change in the evidence of all of the witnesses was, he said, no more than a great deal of fuss. Day 39, page 30. He appeared to try to dismiss this on the basis, so he asserted, that it had never been suggested by Mr Abramovich that the fact that the money was to be paid to ORT was, on Mr Abramovich's case, a term of the agreement made between Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky; and that is what he said at Day 39, page 31.

In other words, the point he seemed to be making was we were making a great deal of fuss about this and, indeed, upgrading the significance of this because he claimed, or he said in his closing submissions, the money being paid to ORT was not a term of the agreement.

One can see why Mr Sumption needed to say that, my Lady, because if on Mr Abramovich's case this funding of ORT was indeed a key term of the agreement, if it was what the agreement was all about from Mr Berezovsky's side, then any shift from this to some different type of agreement would be very damaging both to Mr Abramovich's credibility and to his case overall.

Unfortunately for Mr Abramovich, and indeed for Mr Sumption, however, it is plain that contrary to what Mr Sumption told your Ladyship, the funding of ORT was, on Mr Abramovich's case, very much a term of the agreement that he had originally claimed to have made with Mr Berezovsky, and indeed it was what the agreement was all about on Mr Abramovich's original case.

So we have, for example, in Mr Mitchard's third witness statement, that was the main witness statement made on behalf of Mr Abramovich for the purposes of the strike-out, this is at paragraph 15 of that statement --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I have it in front of me.

MR RABINOWITZ: Your Ladyship sees, it says in terms:

"Mr Abramovich says that his agreement with Mr Berezovsky was that, in exchange for the assistance Mr Berezovsky provided in the formation of Sibneft, Mr Abramovich would fund certain cash requirements of ORT."

Your Ladyship has that, I don't need to give your Ladyship the reference to that, J2/2.11. J2/2.11/182

In other words, my Lady, the suggestion that the payments to be made were with a view to funding ORT was, indeed, claimed to have been a term of the agreement, indeed what the agreement was all about.

If there were any doubt about what Mr Abramovich's original case was at that stage, I can remind your Ladyship -- this is a point we note at I think footnote 87, page 71 of our closing -- that Mr Abramovich's counsel at the strike-out application actually went so far as to refer to the 1995 agreement as the ORT funding agreement. Indeed, your Ladyship will recall that the justification that Mr Abramovich was originally giving for the payment of the 1.3 billion in 2001, in the context of the strike-out application, was that this was being paid in part because Mr Berezovsky, having got rid of his interest in ORT, there was no longer a need to fund it. So it was all about the ORT and the funding of ORT. That was supported by all of Mr Abramovich's witnesses at that stage.

But then of course, once it became clear that that was a hopeless argument, because, as Mr Abramovich and his witnesses all knew, and as was becoming clear from the disclosure which was being made, the payments which were being made were not to fund ORT, or not simply to fund ORT, there were a great many other payments which had nothing to do with ORT; as it became clear that that argument was simply hopeless what one then had was, for the purposes of this trial, a collective shift in the recollection of all of Mr Abramovich's witnesses who, to a man and indeed woman, suddenly changed their evidence on this point. So that no longer was this, on Mr Abramovich's case, an ORT funding agreement but now, so they said in unison, it was a krysha agreement instead.

It is, we would submit, very difficult to see how this could occur without collusion in the unacceptable sense that Mr Sumption identified of the witnesses failing to apply their own minds to this and instead putting forward evidence that they had been asked or agreed to put forward. That is why we submit, my Lady, that in the present case the fact that there has been collusion between Mr Abramovich's witnesses about what evidence to give, including in relation to the central point about what the agreement in 1995 was about, is a matter of some significance.

Can I turn next, my Lady, to what we have generically referred to as the smears and innuendo issue. Again, your Ladyship sees that in our written closing, beginning at paragraph 120, page 88 and following.

Your Ladyship will recall that the first smear which we identify is the Chechen elements smear, the wholly unwarranted and untrue allegation that Mr Berezovsky had links to organised crime. That's at paragraph 123. Without going back into the detail of the sorry story, my Lady, your Ladyship may recall that only one individual was identified by either Mr Shvidler or Mr Abramovich in their statements as being a Chechen whose connection with Mr Berezovsky or Mr Patarkatsishvili carried, in Mr Shvidler's words, "connotations of gangsterism", was the way he put it. That was a person called Mr Maghamet Ismailov.

Your Ladyship will recall that this allegation really just collapsed after Ms Gorbunova was able to dig up from her photo collection a photograph of Mr Shvidler's wife and children, and young child, at a birthday party hosted by Mr Ismailov. Indeed, my Lady may recall Mr Abramovich told the court in terms, "Mr Ismailov is not a gangster". That was at Day 7, page 76. Your Ladyship may also recall that, perhaps unsurprisingly, my learned friends made no reference whatever to Chechnya, Chechens or gangsterism in either their written or oral closing submissions.

Sorry, that should have been Day 17, I'm told, not Day 7, page 76.

My Lady, while my learned friends might be keen to sweep this allegation and this issue under the carpet, we would suggest that the matter, that is to say the willingness of Mr Abramovich and Mr Shvidler in particular, to try to smear Mr Berezovsky in this way is something that retains relevance to the credibility of Mr Abramovich and his witnesses generally. Because it is a clear example, and there are others, it's a clear example of their willingness cynically to give false and damaging evidence, if they think they can get away with it, where they think it will suit their ends.

But of course, no sooner did one attempt to smear Mr Berezovsky die a death than another one reared its ugly and cynical head. I have in mind of course what we referred to as the dressing gown allegation. And again, your Ladyship knows we've dealt with this in some detail at paragraph 126, page 92 and following. We've set out there the genesis and development of that allegation and I don't propose to rehearse that.

My Lady, I would suggest that, as with the Chechen smear, so too with the dressing gown smear, once again it has become clear that the evidence that Mr Abramovich and Mr Shvidler, and indeed Mr Deripaska, were willing to give on this issue has been shown to be utterly false. We've set out at paragraphs 131 to 134 of our written closing the relevant timings of 13 March 2000, timings which we submit establish very clearly that the story made up by Mr Abramovich and his witnesses simply cannot be true.

The evidence on this, as we explain there, is that Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler and Mr Deripaska arrived at the Dorchester on 13 March at about 1.00 pm on that day, and Mr Berezovsky, by contrast, arrived at about 2.00 pm having had an unplanned lunchtime visit to the Horseguards Hotel with his legal team having been in the House of Lords that morning. There was evidence before the court on this, which indeed was --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I remember that, it came in after.

MR RABINOWITZ: It came in afterwards, and Mr Sumption just waved it in.

Mr Berezovsky therefore did indeed, as Mr Abramovich and Mr Shvidler had both said in their witness statements, arrive at the Dorchester suite one hour after they did, and that had been their evidence in their witness statements. It follows that Mr Berezovsky did not get to Mr Patarkatsishvili's suite before these men and busy himself in some different room while they, apparently, on their evidence, for over an hour waited for him to emerge from this room which he eventually did in a dressing gown. That was, I submit, pure invention of the most cynical and unpleasant kind.

Perhaps unsurprisingly, Mr Sumption, as my Lady may recall, in his oral closing made no real attempt to deal with the evidence on this point. What he did say, however, in closing, and this was at Day 40, page 47, was that he didn't want it to be suggested that he had, by silence, conceded the point. He then commented that there was not a trace of any evidence to suggest that there had been any collusion about this dressing gown evidence, and he suggested to your Ladyship, and these were his words, that this was a matter that could, to use his expression, be safely ignored. That's the way he put it.

My Lady, we would respectfully disagree about that and we would submit that the dressing gown allegation cannot and should not be ignored. As with the Dr Evil text message allegation, to which I shall turn shortly, it is not open to Mr Abramovich's counsel to take the position that allegations made against Mr Berezovsky, which are subsequently shown to be untrue, when made cynically in this way can simply be ignored.

Furthermore if, as I suggest appears from the evidence, Mr Berezovsky arrived at Mr Patarkatsishvili's Dorchester suite meeting from the House of Lords after Mr Abramovich and Mr Shvidler were already there, it must follow from this finding that the evidence of Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler and Mr Deripaska, as well as being false and knowingly false evidence, must necessarily have been produced as a result of collusion between them. I say this because it is inconceivable that Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler and Mr Deripaska could, independently, have made up that story.

My Lady, can I turn next to the third example of evidence that one might include in the category of smear and that has, in the event, proved utterly false, and that is of course the Dr Evil text message evidence that Mr Tenenbaum gave. Again, for the first time, just as with the dressing gown allegation, in re-examination -- this was a constant thing which kept happening, it emerged in re-examination and again, as your Ladyship knows, we have set out the genesis and development of this allegation at paragraph 136 and following of our closing, and I'm not proposing therefore to go over this in enormous detail. But in brief, as my Lady will recall, Mr Sumption in re-examination asked Mr Tenenbaum the question as to how he, Mr Tenenbaum, could be certain that no note was taken at the meeting in Georgia at which the Curtis notes were written. This solicited, as it was plainly designed to do, a suggestion never made previously in five witness statements from Mr Tenenbaum and six witness statements from Mr Shvidler that this was something that Mr Fomichev had told Mr Shvidler.

Your Ladyship may recall that I then cross-examined Mr Tenenbaum as to why the suggestion had not been made in any one of the 11 witness statements previously produced by himself and Mr Shvidler, and Mr Tenenbaum, who plainly understood that I was suggesting that his story was a total fabrication, then came up with the story of the text message. Your Ladyship will recall that Mr Tenenbaum then told the court that Mr Shvidler had the supposed text message on his phone and that he had shown it to Mr Tenenbaum.

We of course then asked to see the text message only to be met with what I would suggest was the wholly incredible suggestion that Mr Shvidler, and indeed Mr Fomichev as well, had deleted the message, and it appears that no one had bothered to ensure that a copy of this was kept in existence.

We then asked for the mobile number to which it was alleged that the text message had supposedly been sent, and we then checked on Mr Berezovsky's phone bill to see whether any message had been sent by him to that number and, surprise surprise, we were able to establish that none had been sent.

In other words, my Lady --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, I haven't had any of this evidence before me, it's just in correspondence, isn't it?

MR RABINOWITZ: It is in a letter which confirms the position from Addleshaws which I shall give your Ladyship the reference to know.

In other words, my Lady, the investigations reveal that there was nothing whatever to support the suggestion that any such text had been sent.

Against that background, my Lady will recall that in his closing speech Mr Sumption told the court that the allegation that this Dr Evil story was an invention, which of course is exactly the allegation we make, was, he said, a suggestion that he at least rejected entirely. What he said in this regard was that the only evidence in support of this being an invention on the part of his client's witnesses was, as he put it, the assertion of Addleshaws in correspondence.

My Lady, we submit that that was, with respect, a wholly inadequate answer. The letter from Addleshaws confirming that Mr Berezovsky had sent no text message was a letter dated 15 December 2011 which, for your Ladyship's note is at L(2011) --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've got the reference, paragraph 145.

MR RABINOWITZ: I think it may be set out there what it says. It actually confirms:

"There is no record of any text being sent by Mr Berezovsky to Mr Fomichev."

That was --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Rabinowitz, where are we going with all this? I mean, it could have come from another phone. I haven't heard any evidence about it.

MR RABINOWITZ: Well, it's not just that your Ladyship hasn't heard any evidence about it --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: A text message can come from anywhere.

MR RABINOWITZ: Well, it can come from -- and if it does come from any phone then it might have been that they would have said, "This is the number that it came from." But they didn't; they gave us a number and we checked.

But that wasn't all, as your Ladyship knows. If that was all then it may be that someone could suggest that someone else's phone was used, or Mr Berezovsky picked up the phone of one of his associates and sent it from that. That wasn't what was said.

But there was another point that arose from this, and it was the point that my Lady made to Mr Sumption. Your Ladyship will recall that when Mr Sumption said, "Well, that's the only point that there is," your Ladyship said, "Well, there is also the fact that if such a text message had been sent, it would exist and be there for anyone to look at."

That was the point that your Ladyship made to Mr Sumption at Day 40, page 59.

The point that -- with respect, my Lady, the point that you put to Mr Sumption is exactly the point, the point that you made at Day 40, page 59, line 2, because if there was such a text it would be there for someone to look at and it plainly isn't.

The only response that Mr Sumption could give to your Ladyship was to suggest that this would depend, he said, on what your practice is about keeping text messages on your mobile. With respect to my learned friends, that really doesn't meet the point at all. Your Ladyship will recall that Mr Tenenbaum claimed that the text message was produced just a few months before the trial began. We were told in correspondence it was around the time of the witness statements, May 2011.

If there had been such a text received at that time, that is to say when the parties were gearing up for trial, when witness statements were being served and the like, it would have been plain and obvious to Mr Shvidler, who was very much involved in assisting with the conduct of this litigation, that this was potentially an important document. The claim that this would have been deleted is, I suggest, little short of ludicrous, whatever might have been Mr Shvidler's normal practice in relation to texts.

This is especially so, my Lady, if as Mr Tenenbaum suggested in his evidence Mr Shvidler actually considered the text sufficiently relevant to show it to him and, indeed, to discuss the whole issue with his solicitors. It is simply ludicrous that it would have been deleted by him as well as by Mr Fomichev.

All of this, as your Ladyship will recall, was supposed to support a suggestion by Mr Tenenbaum that so scared was Mr Fomichev of Mr Berezovsky that it was felt by Mr Abramovich and his team that no evidence from Mr Fomichev adverse to Mr Berezovsky, not even a reference to what he allegedly told Mr Shvidler about the Curtis notes, and your Ladyship will appreciate that the authenticity of the Curtis notes is really one of the absolutely key issues in this litigation, not even a reference to what he allegedly told Mr Shvidler about the Curtis notes could be included in any of the witness statements which were being produced for the trial.

I would respectfully submit that the suggestion that this is the reason why no reference was made is simply nonsense. After all, as your Ladyship knows, Mr Fomichev has been busy with his own litigation against Mr Berezovsky and has not been scared to oppose Mr Berezovsky or to say his evidence is untrue, judgment having been given against Mr Fomichev --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Has Mr Fomichev paid up?

MR RABINOWITZ: He hasn't.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think that's what I was told previously.

MR RABINOWITZ: He is doing his best to evade judgment.

Mr Fomichev is not scared of Mr Berezovsky. The very idea that out of the concern for Mr Fomichev's nerves, or something, Mr Tenenbaum or Mr Shvidler didn't want to put a reference to this in their witness statement is just, in my respectful submission, ridiculous. So once again, my Lady -- and indeed desperate, because this was seen as just one of the ways in which they could deal with the authenticity of the Curtis notes when all else was failing.

So, my Lady, once again we have Mr Abramovich's trusted associates and witnesses, and I include in this both Mr Tenenbaum and Mr Shvidler, who has been happy to support this allegation, dishonestly and cynically concocting a story knowing, as they obviously did, that it was utterly untrue.

Just on Mr Fomichev, I've been handed a note saying there was a hearing last week seeking to enforce against property in Mr Fomichev's wife's name. So that continues.

The point about this giving of cynical and dishonest evidence is this, my Lady: we would respectfully submit that the fact that the cynical willingness to produce false and dishonest evidence has yet again been exposed is a matter that your Ladyship should take into account when evaluating any of the evidence that Mr Abramovich and his witnesses have given.

Can I turn next to say something very briefly, again relating to the credibility of Mr Abramovich and his witnesses, concerning the failings to give proper disclosure. There is just one particular example of this that I would like to say something about, and that is the holding back of the bolshoi balance by Mr Abramovich's team for a period of some six months before they decided to disclose it.

The only reason I'm raising this again, it's a point I think we make in our written closing, I don't have the reference --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I'm just trying to find out.

MR RABINOWITZ: 175 and following. Paragraph 175.

The reason I mention this now, my Lady, is because this was something that came up in Mr Sumption's closing where, yet again, he sought to explain it away in really rather dismissive language.

The first point to make about this issue of the disclosure of the bolshoi balance, it was not disclosed when general disclosure was made, it was only disclosed when witness statements were exchanged, and there doesn't appear to be a dispute that it was sat on in the sense of not disclosed for a period of six months after it was identified as something which was relevant to the trial. This is Ms Panchenko's evidence; at paragraph 178 we've set all that out.

Now, your Ladyship may recall that when dealing with the bolshoi balance, Mr Sumption told the court that the six month delay was due, and these were his words:

"... to the need to translate the spreadsheet from Russian ..."

This is at Day 39, page 17, lines 12 and following:

"... to the need to translate the spreadsheet from Russian and to get detailed explanations, which were quite complex, of each line of it in order to establish which parts were disclosable."

Now, I have to say, my Lady, that that explanation by Mr Sumption for this delay is, with respect, simply hopeless. If my Lady looks at the bolshoi balance, and I'm not inviting --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've got it up on the screen.

MR RABINOWITZ: Okay. You will see that it is a ten-page document largely made up of numbers.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It was originally in Russian though, wasn't it?

MR RABINOWITZ: It was originally in Russian, and I'm not disputing that it needed to be translated but the numbers didn't need to be translated. And, as your Ladyship sees, the vast majority of the document is in numbers, and other than the numbers what your Ladyship sees the balance sheet contains, contains in the main, are column headings, which are simply all the months of the year, and row headings, which are generally names like Runicom, Sibneft and the like, or commonplace phrases such as "cash in" or "payments out".

It is, with respect, difficult to believe that translating that document could be the work of any more than two or three afternoons, at most.

As for the suggestion that the bolshoi balance required detailed explanations which were quite complex, with respect, this also utterly fails to justify the failure to disclose. Disclosure could and should have been given immediately. If it were felt useful to put explanations for the document before the court, that could be done later. In any event, insofar as it is said we needed to understand the document in order to decide what to disclose, your Ladyship should know that Mr Shvidler has summarised the content of the bolshoi balance in two pages in his witness statement, that's at paragraphs 133 to 145 in his third witness statement E3/10/39. That again hardly supports the suggestion of a complexity of a sort that would justify suppressing this document for six months.

My Lady, it is, I would suggest, difficult to explain the delay in disclosing the bolshoi balance, other than on the basis that Mr Abramovich and his loyal team were using the time to decide whether or not they wanted to disclose it. But at least this was a document that they did eventually decide to disclose.

There are of course other documents where we say there is an absence of an adequate explanation for their nondisclosure, including, of course, missing mobile phone bills, bank statements, credit card statements and, in particular, diaries. That, as your Ladyship will have seen, we deal with at paragraphs 180 to 183 of our written closing and I don't propose to get into the detail of that now.

Can I then move on, again to say something very shortly, about the drawing of adverse inferences from Mr Abramovich's failure to call certain witnesses to support his case. Again, for your Ladyship's note, this is dealt with in our written closing at paragraphs 194 and following, page 142.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: Your Ladyship will see there that the three witnesses in respect of whom we say adverse inferences should be drawn are Mr Smolensky, Mr Fomichev and Mr Bosov. There is nothing I propose to add on my feet about Mr Smolensky or, for that matter, Mr Bosov, although there are some points relating to the position of those two witnesses that we will pick up in responding to my learned friend's latest 175-page effort.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Sorry, just before you go any further, the schedule you've produced, what are we going to call the document that you handed up today?

MR RABINOWITZ: We could call it schedule --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Shall we call it schedule 1?

MR RABINOWITZ: Claimant's --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm anticipating I'm going to be getting quite a lot of documents and I want to be clear what you're calling it.

Shall we call it claimant's schedule 1?

MR RABINOWITZ: Claimant's schedule 1.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I mean presumably there are some schedules --

MR RABINOWITZ: Claimant's schedule of errata.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm told its Magnum reference will be in B2 but your Ladyship will still want to have a title for that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: That is not the document which will respond to the position of Mr Bosov and Mr Smolensky, that will be a document which responds to the 175-page document. We're not going to -- the document which we produce will simply take their schedule that they have produced and add another box at the end.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, fine. So I'm calling the thing you've handed up today claimant's schedule 1.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, having identified Mr Smolensky,

Fomichev and Bosov, as I've made clear, I'm not going to say anything further on my feet about Smolensky and Bosov. We are going to say something about what the defendants have said about them in their 175-page document in our response to that. I do however want to say something about the position of Mr Fomichev.

As we have identified in our written closing, Mr Abramovich and his team have plainly been in reasonably regular contact with Mr Fomichev for some years in the lead-up to these proceedings, and indeed have on occasion claimed to have relied before this court on information that it is alleged he has given to them. We identify some of those examples at paragraph 197 of our written closing.

My Lady, in the face of the obvious access that Mr Abramovich has had to Mr Fomichev, and indeed Mr Fomichev's apparent willingness to assist, if he could, Mr Abramovich and his cause, Mr Sumption was able to give just one reason, in his oral closing, for not calling Mr Fomichev. That was at Day 40, page 59.

What he said was that he was not prepared to call Mr Fomichev because, so he said, and these were his words:

"Mr Fomichev was directly engaged in the preparation of sham documents evidencing bogus transactions for the purpose of laundering Mr Berezovsky's money [so that] it would [so he said] have been perfectly absurd for me to call Mr Fomichev bearing that in mind."

My Lady, can I make two observations about this as an attempt to justify Mr Abramovich's decision not to call Mr Fomichev. The first observation is this. It is of course Mr Abramovich's own case that both the Devonia agreement and indeed the Rusal second sale documentation, or at least some of it, were sham documents produced to assist in getting money into the western banking system. This being the case, it is difficult to see why it would have been absurd for Mr Abramovich to call Mr Fomichev; indeed by calling Mr Fomichev, Mr Abramovich would simply have been further proving his own case. I suggest therefore that this is obviously not a reason for not calling Mr Fomichev.

The second difficulty that there is with Mr Sumption's reason for not calling Mr Fomichev is that Mr Sumption had no difficulty in calling Mr Gorodilov, Ms Panchenko and Ms Khudyk, and indeed Mr Abramovich himself, all of whom had been engaged in one way or the other "in the preparation of sham documents evidencing bogus transactions", to use Mr Sumption's expression, for the purpose of misleading banks and others.

Indeed, the fact that documents were produced which were sham documents is in a sense Mr Abramovich's main defence in seeking to deal with some of the documentation produced in relation to Rusal and the second Rusal sale, and Ms Khudyk and Ms Panchenko have expressly acknowledged doing this, both in relation to certain of the Devonia transaction documents but also in relation to the commission agreements.

Mr Gorodilov, Mr Abramovich's trusted friend, was of course the architect behind the sham documents produced in relation to the ORT sale, suggesting that there had been a sale for 10 million with the remaining $140 million consideration being paid by way of an option, your Ladyship will remember that. That was Mr Gorodilov who was the architect behind all this.

So all of these witnesses Mr Sumption did call were involved in producing sham documents, or had some involvement in sham documents, and they were called. That also suggests that the fact that a witness might have been involved, on Mr Sumption's case, with sham documents really was not the reason not to call that witness. That suggests that there is a different reason for not calling Mr Fomichev.

A third point to make about the non-calling of Mr Fomichev is that it appears to be inconsistent with what Mr Tenenbaum was saying. Mr Tenenbaum seemed to be suggesting that they couldn't call Mr Fomichev or even ask him to give a witness statement because of his fear of Mr Berezovsky which, as I've already suggested, is utter nonsense.

Now, I don't need to remind your Ladyship that there can be no doubt that Mr Fomichev as a witness could have given evidence on a number of matters of central importance to the issues in this case. Your Ladyship will recall that Mr Fomichev was involved with Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili almost throughout the time relevant to the issues in this case up to and including 2001. So he would have been able to give evidence about, among other things, the real nature of the relationship between Mr Berezovsky and Mr Abramovich in relation to their dealings in Sibneft and Rusal, as well as in relation to the intimidation issue, because he was at some of those meetings. Mr Fomichev could obviously also have given evidence about what was said by Mr Abramovich to have been a number of proposals allegedly made by him directly to Mr Abramovich or his team, and of course he was present at the meeting in Georgia when the Curtis notes were made.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Rabinowitz, at paragraph 194 of your closing you refer to a case where the principles relevant to the drawing of an adverse inference are set out. Are there any cases that lay down the principles as to whose obligation, if any, it is to call a witness? Or is that so fact-dependent that it's impossible to lay down principles?

MR RABINOWITZ: I don't know the answer as to whether there's any case which deals with the question of whether it's an obligation or not, but in my respectful submission, my Lady, it's unlikely that there will be a case because it is going to be fact-dependent.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But I mean in circumstances such as the present, is there any assistance that I can get from authority as to whom, if anybody, had the job of calling Mr Fomichev?

MR RABINOWITZ: We will look it up, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I would be quite interested to know if there was any guidance.

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed. In my respectful submission, it's very likely to be entirely fact-dependent. Of course, in the present case, this person may have had some connection with Mr Berezovsky but they're in the middle of litigation against each other.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Of course.

MR RABINOWITZ: That's what we'd say anyway.

Now, as I say, those are the matters in relation to which Mr Fomichev could have given evidence. He was plainly, in a sense, around at a lot of the key incidents in this case. As I've already mentioned, as your Ladyship recalls, there has of course been a substantial and very bitter falling out between Mr Berezovsky and Mr Fomichev, so much so that there is the litigation that your Ladyship has referred to earlier.

Plainly Mr Abramovich or his team, who appear to be on perfectly good terms with Mr Fomichev, could have called him, and indeed it is clear from what Mr Sumption said that they made a decision not to call him. And the question for your Ladyship is whether a good reason has been put forward for them not calling Mr Fomichev.

In our respectful submission, no good reason has been put forward for not calling Mr Fomichev. The reason suggested by Mr Sumption in closing is plainly not a good reason. Mr Tenenbaum's reason about Mr Fomichev being scared is plainly a hopeless reason. In those circumstances, my Lady, we respectfully submit that your Ladyship can and should draw the following inferences from Mr Abramovich's failure to call Mr Fomichev, and they are these.

First, that if called he would have been unable truthfully to support Mr Abramovich's case that there was no partnership between Mr Abramovich on the one hand and Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili on the other.

Secondly, that if called he would have been unable truthfully to support Mr Tenenbaum's evidence that the Georgia meeting with Mr Curtis, as recorded in the Curtis notes, did not occur.

And, thirdly, that if called he would have been unable truthfully to support Mr Abramovich's evidence as to the proposal supposedly made by him in advance of the Le Bourget meeting.

Since we have set all this out in writing I wasn't proposing, subject to your Ladyship, to say anything further about it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. You've formulated it slightly differently from ...

MR RABINOWITZ: We have, my Lady. I thought I needed to do something differently or your Ladyship might get bored.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No no.

So what you've just said doesn't include 1 and 2, does it?

MR RABINOWITZ: It does include 1 because I mentioned the proposals.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Oh, right.

MR RABINOWITZ: 2 is the corollary of -- well, to some extent it's the corollary of 55.1. It's encapsulated --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Anyway, I've got a note of what you now say are the inferences to be drawn.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can I just enquire whether your Ladyship proposes to take a morning break?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I will. I'll take a break now. Ten minutes.

(11.28 am)

(A short break)

(11.45 am)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, I turn now to the Sibneft claim.

By way of a road map, I can tell your Ladyship that I propose to deal first with the 1995 and 1996 agreements, then with the ORT and Sibneft intimidation, and finally with the choice of law issues. Since these again are all topics that we've covered in detail in our written closing I can take most of these fairly shortly, I hope.

So, my Lady, the 1995 agreement, you will have seen from section E of our written closing, that begins at around page 172, that we say that a number of disputes concerning the 1995 agreement, for example those relating to whether there was indeed an agreement, and as to what Mr Berezovsky did by way of contribution to the creation and acquisition of Sibneft, were largely resolved over the course of the trial. And what is left in issue can be described in different ways but essentially it comes down to this question: did Mr Berezovsky, Mr Abramovich and Mr Patarkatsishvili in 1995 agree a partnership in respect of the creation and acquisition of Sibneft, with all the usual incidents of such an agreement, or did Mr Berezovsky and Mr Abramovich alone enter into some other relationship, a non-binding relationship, where Mr Berezovsky provided protection for a fee. That of course is Mr Abramovich's case.

Can I begin by reminding your Ladyship of what we would respectfully submit is the key evidence that will assist your Ladyship in relation to determining the nature and content of the 1995 agreement. There are seven aspects of the evidence that, in our respectful submission, are particularly important in this regard.

First and foremost we have the Le Bourget transcript. We set that out in section E2 of our written closing, paragraphs 259 and following, where we deal with the significance of the Le Bourget recording. We deal there, of course, also with the fact that for some five months after receiving the Le Bourget transcript Mr Abramovich initially refused to accept the authenticity of that document, no doubt hoping to find a way to avoid the transcript becoming evidence at trial.

Ultimately, of course, Mr Abramovich had no choice but to accept the authenticity of the document. And when the attempt to challenge the authenticity of the document disappeared, what one had instead, as your Ladyship will recall, was a persistent attempt by Mr Sumption throughout the trial to seek to diminish the importance of the Le Bourget transcript, and one well understands why it was in Mr Abramovich's interests that he should do so. "Rambling, obscure and possibly incomplete", was how Mr Sumption described it in closing, having described it earlier as "rather turgid". That was at Day 7, page 44.

But my Lady, whether or not Mr Sumption regarded the transcript as a gripping read, the fact is that it is, we would submit, plainly a key if not the key piece of evidence before the court in relation to a number of issues. That is because it is one of the few pieces of evidence available to the court that provides a contemporaneous and indisputably genuine window into the nature of the relationship that existed and the arrangements that had been made between Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili at that time.

Of course, we submit that the exchanges between the parties at Le Bourget, including of course the references to Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky's entitlement to dividend payments in respect of Sibneft, and with the repeated reference by Mr Abramovich and Mr Patarkatsishvili to the Sibneft interests as being "our interests", and with the discussion of Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky about their wishing to have their interests in Sibneft formally and legally recognised, provides very strong support for Mr Berezovsky's case and is very difficult indeed to square with Mr Abramovich's case unless, as Mr Abramovich continually sought to do, one ignores or distorts the words the parties used.

Now, your Ladyship has our submissions on Le Bourget set out from page 177. Put shortly, my Lady, we would submit that Mr Abramovich was simply unable to provide any satisfactory explanation for the exchanges at Le Bourget which suggest that, contrary to his case, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were indeed his partners in Sibneft.

But, of course, it's not just the Le Bourget transcript that we would submit presents an insurmountable obstacle to Mr Abramovich's case. Can I then turn to the second key piece of evidence supporting Mr Berezovsky's case on the 1995 agreement, and that is of course the Curtis notes, because they are not only relevant to Rusal but they're also relevant to Sibneft. Those, as your Ladyship will recall, were produced at a meeting in Georgia attended by, among others, Mr Patarkatsishvili, Mr Curtis, Mr Fomichev and Mr Tenenbaum.

I say that this is another key piece of evidence because, as your Ladyship will recall -- and I think we've set this out at paragraphs 1309 and following, it's actually in volume 2, my Lady, at page 749 -- the Curtis notes expressly refer to Mr Berezovsky, Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich as all being shareholders of Sibneft. And there is also the express statement in the notes that "we", referring to Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky, sold Sibneft.

Now, if that is right and those notes are genuine, Mr Tenenbaum is not recorded as having suggested in any way any disagreement with that, again that provides a major problem for Mr Abramovich's contention that he and he alone was the owner of Sibneft. That is why, of course, as your Ladyship will recall, a strenuous effort was made, especially by Mr Tenenbaum, to seek to challenge the authenticity of the Curtis notes, including, as I've already been submitting, the attempts by Mr Shvidler and Mr Tenenbaum to claim some knowledge of their falsity from Mr Fomichev, an attempt that I would respectfully submit was discreditable.

Now, as your Ladyship knows, still on the Curtis notes, it is not disputed -- this is a point we make at paragraph 1309 and following -- it is not disputed that those notes are in Mr Curtis's handwriting. It is also not disputed that Mr Curtis handed those notes to his secretary at some time after the meeting in Georgia prior to his death on 3 March 2004. And it's also not disputed that there was a meeting of the sort described in the Curtis notes, attended by Mr Patarkatsishvili, Mr Tenenbaum and Mr Fomichev, and that it took place in Georgia on 25 August 2003.

Now, your Ladyship will recall that Mr Tenenbaum says that whilst he was in Georgia at that time, the discussions that he was a party to were not as recorded but, he says, instead related to a prospective Brazilian football investment. My Lady, that being the case, that being Mr Tenenbaum's evidence, it follows that there is no possibility that the Curtis notes are simply a misinterpretation of the meeting which Mr Tenenbaum says took place. Either they are accurate, as we submit they are, or they are a deliberate forgery created by an English solicitor, Mr Curtis, and created for some reason which has never been adequately explained by Mr Abramovich. Those are the choices.

Now there are, as we set out in the written closing, three particular features which point to the authenticity of the Curtis notes, point to them being authentic.

The first feature in terms of significance is how uncannily accurate the Curtis notes are. In particular, your Ladyship will recall the Curtis notes recalled --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm just going to get them up actually. I've got the reference.

MR RABINOWITZ: H(A)59/110.001.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Perhaps they could come up on the screen.

MR RABINOWITZ: They perhaps want to take it from the typed version of that which your Ladyship will have at H(A)59/110.005.

Does your Ladyship have them?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm just getting it.

Okay, what's the reference to the typed page?

MR RABINOWITZ: H(A)59/110.005 is where they start.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you. Yes, I have them now.

MR RABINOWITZ: I was making points addressed to the three particular features which point to the Curtis notes being authentic, and the first point in terms of significance is how uncannily accurate the Curtis notes are. In particular, as your Ladyship sees, the Curtis notes record that Rusal was at that time owned by six BVI companies, each of which were bearer share companies owned 50/50 by Mr Abramovich and Mr Deripaska.

Your Ladyship, I think, has that on page 006, H(A)59/110.006, card two, side three.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: This information we submit -- well, there's no doubt that this information was information which Mr Tenenbaum had, but it's also information which Mr Curtis would not have had. My Lady, no credible explanation has been advanced by Mr Abramovich for how else Mr Curtis might have acquired this knowledge, if not from Mr Tenenbaum at this meeting.

Some attempt has been made to suggest that Mr Fomichev might have provided this information to Mr Curtis, as your Ladyship may recall, but there are three points which might be made about this and they are these. First, that there is no proper explanation for how Mr Fomichev would himself have acquired this information. Secondly, that there is no document or other corroborative evidence which gives any reason to believe that this is what occurred. Third, Mr Abramovich chose not to call Mr Fomichev, and so the court may infer that this is not the evidence which Mr Fomichev could truthfully have given.

Now, I should also refer to card two, side four as well as card two, side three. Your Ladyship sees the first line of card two, side four:

"T -- Problem -- shareholders of R.A -- all of shareholders in holding [company] we are partners of third party -- BVI's held 50/50 NOT RA."

Your Ladyship may also have picked up the suggestion, this is at paragraph 440, sub-paragraph 5 of Mr Abramovich's written closing, that Mr Fomichev or Mr Curtis might have learnt about the structure of the holdings in Rusal in two particular ways, either because it was said the $1.3 billion payment to Devonian had been structured through dividend payments from Mr Abramovich's aluminium interests, or because of a letter dated 8 August 2003 which confirmed the source of funds for payments from Espat, and your Ladyship may recall those letters.

My Lady, when your Ladyship comes to consider this issue I would invite your Ladyship to follow up the references given by my learned friends in support of that submission because I would submit that it is perfectly clear that neither Mr Fomichev nor Mr Curtis could possibly have learnt of the information in that way.

The first reference that is given by my learned friends is to the evidence of Ms Panchenko, at paragraphs 84 to 92 and 97 of her witness statement. But when your Ladyship looks at that, your Ladyship will see that those paragraphs refer to the $1.3 billion payment coming from Rual Trade Limited, which Ms Panchenko describes as the trading company of the Rusal group, and in these paragraphs Ms Panchenko explains that Mr Abramovich held his interests in Rusal through Madison, and that Pax was designated to become a shareholder in Madison in order to receive dividends.

In other words, my Lady, there is no information provided here that would have enabled Mr Fomichev to know about the use of various shares, nor as to the fact that the holding companies were held on a 50/50 basis between Mr Abramovich and Mr Deripaska, which are the two features of the Curtis notes which we've identified as containing information not otherwise available to Mr Curtis.

The second bit of evidence referred to here by my learned friends is the letter from Mr De Cort and Mr Curtis dated 8 August 2003 which, for my Lady's note, is to be found at H(A)62/26.

Your Ladyship may recall that that letter --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just a second, I'm just trying to find that in your closing.

MR RABINOWITZ: I think it's dealt with in the Rusal section, my Lady, so presumably under section --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is this at 1326, round there, 1327?

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, this won't be dealt with in this way in our closing because, although it appears in the written closing, I'm not sure we had time to deal with it in detail.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, just a second.

Okay, thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: So, my Lady, the second bit of evidence referred to here by my learned friends, as I say, is the letter from Mr De Cort to Curtis & Co dated 8 August 2003 which, for your note, is at H(A)62, page 26 H(A)62/26.

What your Ladyship will see from that letter is that it states that Bluewater holds 50,000 shares of Espot Ventures Limited. It says that Espot has a 100 per cent subsidiary, Madison Equities Corporation. And it says that Madison has a 50 per cent shareholding in Rual Trade Limited, but that is all. And again, there is no information provided in that letter as to the use of bearer shares, nor as to the fact that the holding companies were held on a 50/50 basis between Mr Abramovich and Mr Deripaska. So the suggestions by my learned friends really go nowhere.

But of course, as your Ladyship may recall, it's not just the way in which the Rusal shares were held that would have been known to Mr Tenenbaum and not the other people at this meeting. Just looking at the Curtis notes, if your Ladyship still has it, your Ladyship will see, at the bottom of page 006 going on to 007, if your Ladyship has that --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I have that.

MR RABINOWITZ: Your Ladyship sees there the statements by Mr Tenenbaum recorded in the Curtis notes that Mr Abramovich's team had made disclosures in the market, and if your Ladyship goes over the page you'll see that it's to banks and insurance companies about the way in which interests were held in Rusal. What is striking about that, my Lady, is that your Ladyship will recall that an almost identical statement was made by Ms Panchenko to Mr Streshinsky in June 2004 after Mr Curtis's death.

If your Ladyship has H(A)76, page 51T H(A)76/51T, and your Ladyship will recall cross-examination about this:

"As we discussed on the telephone, in order to abide by the assurances to the banks that you made previously..."

So again, one has this point about things that have been said to banks which prevent dealing with Rusal in a particular way.

Now, again, Mr Tenenbaum plainly would have known about what had been said to banks about Rusal, but no one else at that meeting would have known about that. Certainly it's difficult to see how Mr Curtis could have known about that or even Mr Fomichev. And that, in our respectful submission, again reinforces the authenticity of the Curtis notes because there is no way Mr Curtis could have known about this point, about what had been disclosed to banks.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, the next feature of the Curtis notes in terms of significance, or in terms of, we submit, showing that they are authentic, is what we would submit is the obvious falsity of Mr Tenenbaum's alternative explanation for what was discussed at the Georgia meeting.

As your Ladyship will recall, Mr Tenenbaum's evidence was that the meeting in Georgia was actually to discuss the possibility of investing in a Brazilian football club.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: But again, as your Ladyship may recall from the cross-examination, the difficulty with that is that this meeting predated Mr Patarkatsishvili's interest in Brazilian football by almost a year which makes Mr Tenenbaum's suggestion simply impossible.

Now, Mr Sumption in his closing speech, and this was at Day 40, page 53, sought to cast doubt on the suggestion that Mr Patarkatsishvili's first connection with Brazilian football was nearly a year later. But with respect to him, there really was no evidential basis at all for the submission that he was making. And the fact -- and I say that because the fact that Mr Patarkatsishvili's first contact with Brazilian football was only a year later is something that is recorded in an official document produced in Brazil, commencing proceedings there, page 5 of that note.

I think we've dealt with this in our written closing, my Lady, at paragraph 1329.

That document, the official Brazilian document, at H(G)28, page 218 H(G)28/218, records that the introduction of Kia Joorabchian to representatives of Corinthians Football Club was in a meeting in Sao Paulo in mid-2004. And on page 6 of that document H(G)28/6 it is explained that thereafter in August 2004, Joorabchian and the Corinthians men travelled to London in what was described as the first of their trips to England. And it was there that they met Mr Berezovsky, that's to say in August 2004, and then after that they travelled with him to Georgia where they were introduced to Mr Patarkatsishvili.

So there is, in my respectful submission, no real doubt as to the timing of Mr Patarkatsishvili's involvement in Brazilian football.

In addition, my Lady, and this is a point that we note at paragraph 1329, subparagraph 3 of our written closing, there's not a single document which anyone has been able to produce, including the family defendants who would have had to make disclosure of this, which shows any earlier contact by Mr Patarkatsishvili with Brazilian football. This further cements the conclusion that at the time Mr Tenenbaum went to Georgia, Mr Patarkatsishvili was still nearly a year off anything to do with Brazilian football.

Now added to that, as your Ladyship will recall, Mr Tenenbaum in his cross-examination, in what I would respectfully submit was a rare example of him being honest about the position, in fact accepted that in 2003, Brazilian football was still a twinkle in Mr Patarkatsishvili's eye. That was at Day 28, page 118, line 5.

So as I say, my Lady, there really is no basis for the suggestion by Mr Sumption of some earlier contact in 2003 by Mr Patarkatsishvili with Brazilian football, which again suggests, as I've submitted, that Mr Tenenbaum's story is untrue.

Finally, as regards the Curtis notes and the authenticity issue, we also rely on the weak attempt by Mr Tenenbaum in his written evidence to seek to put forward a variety of reasons why the meeting could not have taken place as recorded by Mr Curtis; an attempt which I submit was further weakened by the obvious untruths in Mr Tenenbaum's witness statement on the strike-out application where, as your Ladyship may recall, he had claimed to have not performed any direct role in relation to the acquisition or establishment of either Rusal or Sibneft. Your Ladyship will recall that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: You also I think have there, paragraph 1333 and following of our written closing --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I have it.

MR RABINOWITZ: -- where we identify in how many respects we submit Mr Tenenbaum's evidence in his strike-out application evidence was obviously untrue.

At trial Mr Tenenbaum in fact had to accept that, contrary to the impression he had tried to convey in his evidence to the court in the context of the strike-out application, he was involved in the original aluminium acquisitions, he was involved in drafting and indeed initialling every page of both the 15 March 2000 share purchase sale agreement, and the 15 May 2000 version, and he was involved in the shareholders agreement between Mr Abramovich and Mr Deripaska, and indeed he was involved in the proposals from May 2003 onwards to restructure Rusal.

My Lady may also recall from the evidence Mr Tenenbaum's pious assertion that he would not discuss Mr Abramovich's matters in front of people he did not know, a point I would submit that was also shown to be of no significance given that he was at the meeting in the place of Mr Abramovich who had been invited but could not attend, and that he had in fact met both Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Fomichev previously, and that Mr Curtis was there as Mr Patarkatsishvili's lawyer and was in any event a person well known to both Mr Abramovich and Mr Shvidler, each of whom had had previous dealings with Mr Curtis.

Finally, of course, there was the bogus suggestion of a language barrier, which was really the primary suggestion when the trial started, some language barrier which it was suggested meant that one couldn't -- that the Curtis notes couldn't be authentic. My Lady, that was a suggestion that rather collapsed once it became clear that everyone who spoke at the meeting in fact spoke English.

We therefore submit that there is no basis for the contention that the Curtis notes are anything other than genuine. That being the case, my Lady, we submit that they really do provide another very substantial hurdle to the attempt by Mr Abramovich to deny that the effect of the 1995 agreement was to make Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky and himself partners in Sibneft.

Now, I wasn't going to say anything else about the Curtis notes in relation to Sibneft. I'm going to come back to them in relation to Rusal.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, fine.

MR RABINOWITZ: That was the second area of evidence that I would wish to emphasise.

The third matter that I would wish to emphasise in the context of your Ladyship's consideration of what was agreed in 1995 is the nature of the relationship between Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky. Again, for your Ladyship's note, this is something we deal with I think beginning at page 247 of our written closing, paragraph 376 and onwards, 247 of volume 1.

My Lady, the fact that Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky were indeed friends was something that was well evidenced at trial and, indeed not seriously disputed by Mr Abramovich's counsel in closing. You will recall the extensive evidence of Mr Berezovsky and Mr Abramovich holidaying together and the close friendship of their families, not to mention Mr Abramovich's admission in paragraph D4 of his defence that he and Mr Berezovsky were indeed friends.

In our submission, such evidence is very much more -- such evidence which points to the friendship between these men is very much more consistent with there having been a partnership relationship between them than it is with the sort of relationship between them that Mr Abramovich suggests, which is a relationship of protector and protectee.

My Lady, I would submit that this, the fact that they were friends was damaging to Mr Abramovich's case, was a point well understood by Mr Abramovich which is why, in his witness statement, he made a tentative attempt to claim that he and Mr Berezovsky had never really been friends. Your Ladyship will recall him being cross-examined on this.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: But by the end of his evidence that suggestion again had really rather disappeared and, in my submission, the suggestion was always a rather hopeless one.

My Lady, the fourth aspect of the evidence that we would submit is strongly supportive of Mr Berezovsky's case, and contrary to that of Mr Abramovich, is the fact that, as again became clear from the evidence, the work of Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili in 1995 went well beyond the provision of mere political lobbying or protection which is, of course, what Mr Abramovich claims the agreement was about. He says that was the only contribution that Mr Berezovsky was to make for which he'd be provided with a fee.

Again, my Lady, just so that the point is clear, what Mr Abramovich says was agreed is that Mr Berezovsky would lobby and provide krysha. Now, if the facts show that what Mr Berezovsky did went well beyond just lobbying; if, as I submit, the facts show that Mr Berezovsky was involved in funding or in seeking to fund the bid, and indeed in seeking to ensure that the bid succeeded, that, in our respectful submission, is again entirely consistent with what Mr Berezovsky says had been agreed but it is not consistent with what Mr Abramovich says had been agreed. In our respectful submission, the evidence does show that Mr Berezovsky's contribution went well beyond just lobbying.

Your Ladyship may recall, for example, the evidence relating to the role Mr Berezovsky played in securing funding for the Sibneft bid. The evidence went to that point in three different ways. Your Ladyship will recall first the evidence showed that Mr Berezovsky was actually vital in securing the support of the management of the Noyabrskneftegas and Omsk Oil Refinery, which was key for funding, and your Ladyship sees the evidence on this set out at paragraphs 313 and 314 of our written closing, that's at pages 208 onto 212 of volume 1.

Indeed, we also set out at paragraphs 321 and following the evidence of Mr Abramovich which explained how the 1995 auction was financed on the strength of long-term guaranteed oil supply contracts granted by the companies(?). The point being this: without -- Mr Abramovich acknowledged that without Mr Berezovsky, he would not have got the cooperation of the management of Noyabrskneftegas and Omsk Oil Refinery which was absolutely critical for the purposes of financing the acquisition.

The second way in which Mr Berezovsky was involved in funding was, as your Ladyship will recall from the evidence, he introduced Mr Abramovich to SBS Bank, and indeed gave Mr Smolensky a personal assurance, something that was, as Mr Smolensky told the Russian investigators, a necessary part of Mr Smolensky and thus SBS's willingness to become involved in the deal. Your Ladyship has that evidence set out at paragraphs 201 to 208 of our written closing, that's at pages 146 to 149. It is also dealt with at paragraphs 325 to 327 of the written closing. The earlier paragraphs deal with the evidence of Mr Smolensky to the Russian investigators and the later paragraphs deal with the evidence of Mr Abramovich and Mr Grigoriev relating to SBS's involvement in the Sibneft auction.

My Lady, the third particular way in which Mr Berezovsky was important in raising funding for the Sibneft auction was in his persuasion of Mr Khodorkovsky of Bank Menatep that he should risk Bank Menatep's own funds. This is at paragraph 328 of our closing, page 221. He was the one who persuaded Mr Khodorkovsky of Bank Menatep that he should risk Bank Menatep's own funds in two ways. First, by providing a necessary back-to-back guarantee for SBS's bank guarantee of the NFK bid and, second, by lodging its own bid with its own deposit and its own guarantee in the Sibneft auction which would ensure that the 1995 auction was formally valid.

My Lady, there is another example of Mr Berezovsky being involved in funding which undermines

Mr Abramovich's case, and it is this, because it wasn't just those three ways which were in fact successful attempts by Mr Berezovsky to assist with the funding, there was also Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili's involvement in seeking funding which was not successful. But the mere fact that they were involved in that again is a point against Mr Abramovich, because why would they be involved in this on Mr Abramovich's case? They wouldn't be involved in this at all.

The evidence I have in mind, my Lady, is for example Mr Berezovsky's unsuccessful attempt to raise funds from Mr Soros, for which Runicom prepared a package of documents. For your Ladyship's note, the package of documents prepared, so that Mr Berezovsky could see if he could go and get funds from Mr Soros, is at H(A)02, page 194 H(A)02/194.

But it isn't only just in relation to funding where Mr Berezovsky was involved in a way which is inconsistent with Mr Abramovich's case. There was other work that Mr Berezovsky and his team did with regard to the bid which suggests that his role plainly did go beyond lobbying, and your Ladyship -- and indeed beyond even Mr Abramovich's elastic description of krysha. Your Ladyship will recall, for example, the evidence that Dr Nosova was involved in going through the bid documents, and he was the one, I think the evidence did show, who discovered the flaw in Inkombank's bid for the 1995 auction. We set that out in I think paragraph 339 of our written closing, page 225.

So there is Dr Nosova becoming involved in reviewing the documentation and indeed being instrumental certainly in the elimination of Inkombank, and also there is Mr Patarkatsishvili flying to Sameko to persuade them not to lodge their own rival bid. Both, I would submit, activities not consistent with Mr Abramovich's case about krysha but entirely consistent with what Mr Berezovsky says was agreed, namely that there was to be a partnership and they would both work towards this.

My Lady, that was the fourth aspect of the evidence in relation to the 1995 agreement to which I would draw your attention. The fifth aspect of the evidence that I would emphasise as strongly supportive of Mr Berezovsky's case is the large number of people who believed, based on their contemporaneous involvement with the parties, that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili did indeed have an interest in Sibneft. Now, of course, it may be said that they were wrong, but the fact that they did believe this, in our respectful submission, is a strong pointer towards this, namely that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili did have an interest, being true.

Just going through the list of people who did so understand, first and foremost of course is Mr Berezovsky himself.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Where do I find this? Have you set this out somewhere or not? It doesn't matter if you haven't but, if you have, I'll just make a note.

MR RABINOWITZ: I think this is largely responsive, my Lady. This is very likely spread around the --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay, don't worry. I'll just make a different --

MR RABINOWITZ: Insofar as I can give your Ladyship I will. I tend to have the references --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It's no problem. It's just if you have dealt with it somewhere, I'll go there.

MR RABINOWITZ: No, I will give your Ladyship it if I get to one.

So first and foremost among the people who believe Mr Berezovsky and indeed Mr Patarkashivili had an interest in Sibneft is Mr Berezovsky himself.

Now, your Ladyship will recall that, at paragraph 61 of Mr Abramovich's written closing, there is, we say, in fact a concession that Mr Berezovsky may have believed that Sibneft was his company. Your Ladyship will also recall that Mr Sumption, in his closing speech -- this is at Day 39, page 76 -- sought to suggest that this was not a concession. In our respectful submission, it's difficult to see what else it could be. It does actually say, "Mr Berezovsky may have believed that Sibneft was his company".

In any event, my Lady, the fact that Mr Berezovsky plainly did and indeed does believe that he acquired a stake in Sibneft in 1995 was, in any event, clear from the evidence, which is of course why Mr Sumption, at paragraph 61, was led to acknowledge that Mr Berezovsky may have believed this.

It wasn't just Mr Berezovsky who believed he had an interest in Sibneft as a result of the 1995 agreement, Mr Abramovich in his written closing also accepts that Mr Patarkatsishvili was also, and the word he uses was "likely" to have believed that he and Mr Berezovsky did have an interest which they sold in 2001. That, for my Lady's note, is at paragraph 61.3 of my learned friends' written closing. So it's not just a concession relating to Mr Berezovsky maybe believing this but saying that Mr Patarkatsishvili is likely to have believed this. Again, I would submit that the concession was rightly made, given that the Patarkatsishvili -- the Badri proofing sessions and in particular his evidence given to Ms Duncan and Mr McKim reflects this, as does their overall impression of his evidence.

Now, of course consistently with this, your Ladyship will recall that Mr Patarkatsishvili's widow and family have, in other proceedings, given evidence that Mr Patarkatsishvili had owned stakes in Sibneft and in Rusal, as indeed in other proceedings did Mr Fomichev, the individual who of course managed the finances for both men. For that, your Ladyship does have a reference in the written opening rather than the closing. In our written opening, that is set out at paragraphs 246 to 256, page 131 and following; there's a cross-reference to this, my Lady, at paragraph 386.4 of our written closing at page 253. We give the reference to the evidence given in those proceedings by Mr Patarkatsishvili's widow and family and indeed to Mr Fomichev's evidence.

We also give the reference in our written opening -- this is at paragraph 270 to 272 -- to the affidavits of Mr Fomichev and Mr Kay confirming their belief that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili owned a very substantial percentage of Sibneft. That's at page 145 of our written opening.

In addition to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili so believing, and indeed to Mr Patarkatsishvili's family so believing and Mr Fomichev and Mr Kay as well, there are also, as your Ladyship may recall, the various Russian businessmen with whom Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili had dealings in relation to Sibneft who seem uniformly to have taken the view that Mr Berezovsky was at least a part-owner in Sibneft. There was, for example, Mr Smolensky who thought that Mr Abramovich was, to use his words, playing a supporting role compared to Mr Berezovsky. That, as your Ladyship will recall, is what he told the Russian investigators.

There was also Mr Viktor Gorodilov who, again, in evidence he gave to the Russian investigators, told them that he considered Abramovich and Berezovsky to be the actual owners of Sibneft. Again, that was, your Ladyship will recall, the documents which we obtained from the French proceedings which related to interviews conducted with the Russian authorities. Again, we've given a reference to Mr Gorodilov's evidence at paragraph 386.4 of our written closing, that's at page 254. If your Ladyship is there, your Ladyship may want to note that it is set out and dealt with more fully in our written opening at paragraphs 258 and 259, page 139.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: Then there was Mr Nevzlin who told the court that he had had many discussions with Mr Abramovich and Mr Shvidler in which they both said not only that Mr Berezovsky had an interest in Sibneft but that he had the last word when it came to taking decisions for the company. That was paragraph 23 of his statement which, for my Lady's note, is at D1, tab 4, page 64. If your Ladyship also notes paragraph 20 of his statement, Mr Nevzlin explains what he meant by "interest" when he said that Mr Khodorkovsky had told him that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili had a 50 per cent stake in Sibneft. So that's Mr Nevzlin who believed it.

There is also, of course, Mr Reuben who, when he sold aluminium assets, explained to my Lady that he thought he was selling to Sibneft shareholders, by which he meant, as he explained, Mr Patarkatsishvili, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Abramovich. That is covered, for my Lady's note, in our closing submission at paragraphs 1120 to 1122, volume 2, page 643.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: Then there was Mr Anisimov. We say, as my Lady knows, that Mr Anisimov regarded Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili as owners of Sibneft. As your Ladyship may recall, we say this is clear in particular from Mr Moss's attendance note of 5 June 2001. Your Ladyship may recall that, it's at H(A)35, page 161 H(A)35/161. It's Mr Moss's attendance note where he went to, I think it was Baden Baden, and went through the Devonia agreement with Mr Anisimov sitting there, the Devonia agreement of course recording that Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky had an interest in Sibneft. We've dealt with that at paragraphs 952 to 956 of our written closing. I don't know whether your Ladyship wants to turn the document up but it is, I think -- what we say about it is set out in our written closing.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: Of course, it's right to acknowledge, as your Ladyship may recall, that Mr Anisimov pleads a combination of ignorance and amnesia in relation to his interaction with Mr Moss and the Devonia agreement but, in our submission, it's difficult to see how one can give much weight to his evidence, and no one suggests that Mr Moss made up his attendance note. This is then a further example of a Russian businessman in fact believing that Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky did have a stake in Sibneft in 2001.

So, my Lady, that is the point about everyone they come into contact with thinking they have an interest in Sibneft and that was the fifth aspect of the evidence that I wanted to stress.

The sixth aspect of the evidence that I would wish to stress is this, and that is again the question of the payments made by Mr Abramovich to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili because, in our submission, these payments clearly support Mr Berezovsky's partnership case rather than Mr Abramovich's krysha case. The points on this your Ladyship is aware of and they can therefore be shortly stated, and I repeat them only because of their significance.

The first point to make about the payments is that the payments made by Mr Abramovich to Mr Berezovsky were clearly not correlated with any activity of Mr Berezovsky.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: Your Ladyship will recall that the payments increased over time, a fact which is utterly inconsistent with the krysha allegation. The reason I say it's inconsistent with the krysha allegation is because Mr Abramovich could not name a single act of krysha provided by Mr Berezovsky after 1995. Notwithstanding that, we have an increase in the level of payments. By contrast, of course, the payments were correlated with profits made by Mr Abramovich from his control of Sibneft, as would be expected from a partnership arrangement. That is the first point.

Secondly, and this is obviously a closely connected issue, there is again the $1.3 billion payment and that is the overarching point I referred to when I began my closing submissions. As my Lady is aware, you are faced with two alternative explanations for that $1.3 billion payment. On the one hand, Mr Berezovsky says that he and Mr Patarkatsishvili sold their shares in Sibneft for $1.3 billion in 2001; I would submit that that is an obviously plausible story. On the other hand, by contrast, Mr Abramovich has come up with a range of explanations for why, when in a position of great power and influence in Russia, he should pay $1.3 billion to a political exile and enemy of the Russian president in order to terminate a nonbinding agreement.

Your Ladyship has this dealt with and analysed at paragraphs 914, that's page 545 of volume 2, so it's 914 and following. We set out a summary and an analysis of the various explanations which Mr Abramovich came up with from time to time. I would submit that those explanations range from the utterly bizarre, such as the fear that Mr Berezovsky might bounce back because he previously had recovered from Hepatitis C, as providing a reason for a payment at that level, to the wholly implausible, such as that Mr Abramovich paid

$1.3 billion to Mr Berezovsky out of loyalty and respect. My Lady, $1.3 billion is, in anyone's language, a huge sum and that is so even before any account is taken of the 25 per cent further top-up payment which Mr Abramovich says he agreed to make when he paid a further $375 million in June 2002.

Leaving aside that by June 2001 Mr Berezovsky had been in exile for many months and leaving aside the fact that he had provided no services in relation to Mr Abramovich in respect of Sibneft for many years, it is, we submit, quite inconceivable that Mr Abramovich would have thought that he had to agree to pay $1.3 billion to terminate an arrangement that he had with Mr Berezovsky. In fact, we would submit that the suggestion is, with respect, absurd.

Your Ladyship will have in mind that this was something like double the total amount that, on anyone's case, Mr Abramovich had ever previously paid to Mr Berezovsky. Indeed, according to evidence that Mr Shvidler was happy to give in one of his witness statements, this was an amount which Mr Shvidler in his evidence was claiming was equal to the whole value of Sibneft at that time. I would submit that that evidence was utter nonsense, but this is what Mr Shvidler was happy to say. That was at paragraph 203 of his third witness statement, E3, tab 10, page 58 E3/10/58.

Even assuming that Mr Abramovich is a generous man, and he may well be, but even assuming that he is a generous man this would have been the most remarkable act of largesse on his part, under which the sum bore no relation to the amount initially contemplated as payable, or the services then being provided, which of course were zero, or even the amount paid to Mr Berezovsky when his powers were at their zenith, all of which was being paid to a man who, according to Mr Abramovich, was not someone he was even close to and for whom, according to Mr Abramovich in another part of his evidence, he had lost respect given the manner in which Mr Berezovsky had dealt with the Kursk incident in the summer of 2000, that is just a few months earlier.

My Lady, the truth is this was not an act of largesse on Mr Abramovich's part at all because the payment was not made in relation to the agreement falsely asserted by Mr Abramovich. The payment made was made to acquire Mr Berezovsky's and Mr Patarkatsishvili's ownership interests in Sibneft, and that of course explains the otherwise inexplicable size of the payment.

I will return in due course to why Mr Abramovich's case on Rusal, which also requires him to assert unbelievable largesse on his part in agreeing to pay Mr Patarkatsishvili $575 million, should also be rejected.

In our respectful submission, if your Ladyship is with us in relation to whose explanation for the $1.3 billion is more likely, that I would suggest goes a long way towards assisting your Ladyship with the resolution of this issue.

My Lady, the seventh matter to which I would refer, in the context of seeking to determine whether it is Mr Berezovsky or Mr Abramovich's version of the 1995 agreement that is to be preferred, is in fact the krysha allegation itself. Now again we've dealt with this, for your Ladyship's note, at page 236, volume 1. Page 236 at paragraph 367 and following.

There are just two further observations I would wish to make about the krysha allegation. The first observation is this: as your Ladyship is aware, the case that is put forward by Mr Abramovich in effect involves the suggestion of there being an either/or choice between there being a krysha relationship between Mr Berezovsky and Mr Abramovich on the one hand, whatever that means, and there being, on the other hand, a partnership between them in relation to Sibneft. What is perhaps somewhat unclear, my Lady, is whether this notion of there having to be a dichotomy between these two choices -- sorry, is where this notion of there having to be a dichotomy between these two choices comes from.

In other words even assuming, contrary to what I would suggest is all the evidence, that Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky were not friends and that, rather, the nature of the relationship had its roots in Mr Berezovsky providing political cover for Mr Abramovich, in other words even assuming that the nature of his contribution, and the relationship, was to do with him providing political cover and lobbying, why, your Ladyship may ask, does it follow from this that the parties could not have agreed that in return for Mr Berezovsky's assistance in this regard they were to be partners, that is to say that Mr Berezovsky would have a share in Sibneft?

What is it that suggests that even if Mr Abramovich's evidence is right about what it was that Mr Berezovsky was to provide, why does it follow from that that the only agreement that could have been made was one which involved Mr Abramovich paying Mr Berezovsky cash?

The answer to this, my Lady, is that there is little or no evidence for this at all. The point about this is that even if your Ladyship does accept what we would submit is this untrue case about krysha, that really is nothing more than a red herring because it begs the real question, which is as to what the parties agreed, in August 1995, Mr Berezovsky would be entitled to for working with Mr Abramovich in relation to the creation and acquisition of Sibneft.

The second point about the krysha concept that I would wish to make a comment on is this, and it arises in the context of Mr Sumption in his oral closing seeking to offer your Ladyship some sort of better explanation for why Mr Abramovich would have been willing to pay Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili $1.3 billion in mid-2001 at a time when Mr Berezovsky was in exile and without any influence. What your Ladyship may recall is that Mr Sumption suggested in the course of his closing that a krysha relationship, he said, is a relationship of honour which he said:

"... cannot be broken without serious repercussions. And it is not terminable at will but by agreement and at a price."

That is the assertion he made at Day 39, page 22.

But as your Ladyship will appreciate, other than the suggestion that this was the case made by Mr Abramovich himself, who as we have observed sought to make krysha mean whatever at any particular point in time he needed it to mean for the purposes of his case, there is again simply no evidence whatever to support this suggestion.

We would submit that it is in fact a fanciful -- I'm so sorry. We would submit that it is a fairly unreal suggestion, and I say that first because it suggests that there are somewhere some rules about termination, just as one would have of a legal obligation, that are said to govern this relationship which we are told is a relationship of honour.

Secondly, because it suggests that these rules require an agreement and a price, both of course legal concepts, or concepts generally associated with legal agreements, and not generally associated with a relationship of honour, which is how Mr Sumption described it, in order to terminate a nonlegal relationship.

The third reason we submit that this is a faintly unreal suggestion is because it appears to presuppose, as Mr Abramovich must make it do if it is to make sense to his argument, that the obligation to make payments and the need to terminate the arrangement by making a huge termination payment can carry on even at a time when nothing at all has been done in relation to that arrangement for many years to warrant any payment at all having been made. In other words, it involves the suggestion that even though the krysha relationship, which is Mr Abramovich's case, was set up for the purposes of creating Sibneft, and even though Mr Berezovsky had done nothing for many years before this, he had to make a payment of 1.3 billion to terminate an arrangement which was in effect, in a sense, frustrated because Mr Berezovsky plainly was not in any position to do anything at all.

My Lady, we submit that it is very unlikely to be the case that there were any such rules of the sort that Mr Abramovich needs to assert in order to make sense of his case.

So for these reasons, as well as for the other reasons we develop in our written closing, we respectfully submit that your Ladyship should conclude that it is Mr Berezovsky's case about the 1995 agreement that is to be accepted.

My Lady, before I leave this topic, I do, I think, need to deal with four observations that Mr Sumption made in his closing speech in an attempt to meet the case advanced by Mr Berezovsky about the nature and content of the 1995 agreement. The four observations Mr Sumption made were, first, related to the question of the timing of the 1995 agreement; secondly, the question of Mr Berezovsky's involvement in the 1996 auctions; third, the question of the correlation between payments and profits; and fourth, the question of the purposes of the 1995 agreement.

My Lady, so far as concerns Mr Sumption's point on timing, Mr Sumption told your Ladyship, this is at Day 39, page 26, that, so he said:

"... the agreement was made at a stage when it is most unlikely to have been in the terms alleged by Mr Berezovsky."

The point that we understood Mr Sumption to have been seeking to make is that if the agreement, including as to remuneration, was made in February 2005 -- sorry, 1995, which is Mr Abramovich's case, then that would have been made at a time before Sibneft was included as a loans-for-shares company. So it is unlikely that there could have been any discussion about a partnership in relation to the acquisition of Sibneft. That seemed to be his point.

But of course, my Lady, there is a dispute about when in fact this agreement was made and concluded. As your Ladyship may recall, contrary to Mr Abramovich's case, Mr Berezovsky's evidence was that in fact it was only in July or August that it was agreed that they would each be -- what they would each be entitled to in connection with the arrangement that was being made. Indeed, your Ladyship may recall the cross-examination of Mr Abramovich in relation to the August date, he having started off saying that the agreement was made very much earlier, and eventually accepting that the agreement indeed was still in the process of being formed all the way up to August 1995.

In any event, my Lady, the essence of the dispute about timing between the parties is therefore this. Mr Berezovsky's case is that the three men were partners and that they agreed the partnership in July or August 1995, after working together for many months, and that is when they agreed that they would split their interests in Sibneft 50/50. By contrast, Mr Abramovich says that as early as February 1995 a deal was reached between the parties under which Mr Abramovich in effect agreed that, in return for Mr Berezovsky's assistance, he would agree to pay Mr Berezovsky in effect unlimited sums depending entirely on Mr Berezovsky's demands, but in any event, just looking at that first year, a payment of 30 million, or 75 per cent of Mr Abramovich's entire profits in the previous year.

Now that is the issue for your Ladyship, and I would submit that whilst Mr Berezovsky's case on the timing has the ring of truth to it, Mr Abramovich's case is really rather bizarre. And I say that because it would, I submit, be truly odd for Mr Abramovich to have reached an agreement of the sort that he suggests with a man that at the time he barely knew, with whom he had never worked, at a time when the value of Mr Berezovsky's future contribution was wholly unknown, under which he was willing to pay him whatever Mr Berezovsky might in the future demand.

For your Ladyship's note on that, the reason I say that that is the agreement that Mr Abramovich is saying he was willing to make is this: his evidence is that in the first year, he says Berezovsky indicated he would require approximately $30 million per year for ORT and his personal expenses. That's what he says at paragraph 56. But he says of subsequent years:

"... I was expected to continue to meet whatever payment demands he made."

In other words, you ask and I have to pay. That's paragraph 70 of his third witness statement E1/03/55.

Just for your note, my Lady, the reason I say he was -- on Mr Abramovich's case, he was agreeing to pay 75 per cent of his entire profits in the previous year, he made $40 million total from the oil business in 1994, that is Day 16, pages 155 and 156, and I think it also reflects what he says in his third witness statement at paragraph 56.

My Lady, just moving on to the second of Mr Sumption's observations. The second observation that Mr Sumption made in relation to the 1995 agreement was to point to what he said was the complete lack of interest of Mr Berezovsky in the subsequent cash auctions, that is the 1996 auction, and to suggest that, in his words, "Mr Berezovsky contributed zero" to those auctions. For your Ladyship's note, that was at Day 39, page 35.

My Lady, that might perhaps have been a point of at least some substance had the position been that it was Mr Abramovich himself who had contributed all or even most of the funding for the purposes of the 1996 auction. But of course that was not the case at all.

As we've set out in Mr Berezovsky's written closing, this is between paragraphs 350 to 353, volume 1, page 213, as we set out there, based on the evidence of Mr Abramovich's own witnesses, in fact just $1.5 million of the sums paid in the 1996 auctions came from Mr Abramovich. All the remainder, that is to say some $132.5 million, 98.9 per cent of the funds used in fact came from SBS loans, secured by guarantees of Sibneft companies, or from within Sibneft itself. And neither SBS's involvement, nor the assistance of Noyabrskneftegas and Omsk Oil Refinery, could have been obtained without the efforts of Mr Berezovsky in 1995.

In other words, my Lady, in terms of the contribution to the funding for the 1996 auctions, if anything it was Mr Berezovsky's contribution that was very much more significant than that of Mr Abramovich.

While it is true that Mr Berezovsky was not involved in the process of these cash auctions, this was for very good reason. As Mr Berezovsky told your Ladyship, he had left Mr Abramovich to manage Sibneft, and that didn't just mean running Sibneft itself but also managing the partners' interests in Sibneft. So once again, my Lady, we submit that there really is nothing in Mr Sumption's second point.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Before you go on to the third point, can you just give me, and I'm not in any way putting pressure on you, just give me an idea of the timetabling, not just of your submissions but also of other counsel, just so I have an indication.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, indeed. At present rate I will finish in a day and a half, so I will finish around lunchtime tomorrow.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Malek has suggested he'll be around --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Don't feel you're under any pressure from the court because, as it were, my time is yours.

MR RABINOWITZ: It's very nice of your Ladyship to say so.

Mr Malek has indicated to me he will be half a day, maximum half a day. Mr Adkin I don't know.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, I'll ask Mr Adkin.

Mr Adkin, how long do you --

MR ADKIN: My Lady, about one and a half to two hours.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So let's say half a day, under.

MR RABINOWITZ: And Ms Davies, I suppose it depends on whether I say anything new, but I'm endeavouring to say as little as possible which is new.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Ms Davies, can you give me any indication?

MS DAVIES: My Lady, it's very difficult. There are some things that have been said today that I do need to address because they have been put in a new way, but I would anticipate certainly an hour maybe, tops, but we'll have to see as matters progress.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, very well.

So that would be Thursday. And then any further reply from you on Friday.

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So we're looking at possibly finishing by the end of this week.

MR RABINOWITZ: I think everyone's expectation and hope, my Lady, is that we will finish this week. It may not be your Ladyship's expectation and hope, but certainly from the discussions that the parties have had we anticipate that your Ladyship will be finished with the submissions by the end of this week.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, thank you. And it's helpful just to know when the court will be available for other court users.

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed.

MR MUMFORD: My Lady, I should of course say that misses me out.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I know, I'm very sorry. I'm conscious that I've missed you out.

MR MUMFORD: Rightly so. Unless my Lady wants to hear from me on anything, I wasn't actually proposing to do an oral closing.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, thank you. I'm sorry, I didn't mean to miss you out, Mr Mumford.

Very well, I'll sit again at 2 o'clock.

(1.00 pm)

(The short adjournment)

(2.00 pm)

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, I was dealing with the four observations that Mr Sumption made in relation to the 1995 agreement, I just dealt with the second of those.

The third point made by Mr Sumption in this context related to what he suggested was an absence of any correlation between the payments made to Mr Berezovsky and the profits of Sibneft, is how he put it. But again, my Lady, this is an entirely false point, and that is because it is a point that depends entirely upon Mr Sumption's incorrect assertion that Mr Berezovsky only ever claimed to be entitled to a portion of the profits made by Sibneft.

My Lady, that was never Mr Berezovsky's case, not in his pleadings and not in his evidence. Mr Berezovsky's case was always that the three partners had agreed to share the profits which they made from obtaining ownership and control of Sibneft. And that case plainly extends to profits made by companies owned by Mr Abramovich through Sibneft contracts.

In other words, my Lady, if by virtue of Mr Abramovich obtaining control of Sibneft he generated the profit in, for example, a ZATO, the suggestion that is made appears to be that that was not part of what it was agreed would be shared by way of profits. Any profits that Mr Abramovich would be able to make in another company, it seems to be suggested, was never a profit in which Mr Berezovsky claimed he was entitled to a share.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is there any evidence, remind me, of the three partners, or two of them, sitting down together and working out what 100 per cent is of the gross profits and what a third of the gross profits is, or half the gross profits is?

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, the closest one gets I think to that is, your Ladyship will recall in the Le Bourget transcript there's the $900 million where Mr Abramovich appears to be saying, in response to Mr Patarkatsishvili's question "What are we going to be making?" he says "900 million". So that --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you give me the page reference or the box reference for that?

MR RABINOWITZ: It's Le Bourget, it's in E6 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I know where the transcript is, but if you could give me the specific reference to that.

Are there any other references in the evidence to the calculation method of what was the 100 per cent of the profits that were being made, and therefore what was the 50 per cent that, as Mr Berezovsky says, was to go to him and Mr Patarkatsishvili?

MR RABINOWITZ: I think, my Lady, there is -- if there is, there is minimal evidence. I don't have it off the top of my head.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And what's your case as to why that sort of exercise was never engaged in?

MR RABINOWITZ: We're not saying they were never engaged in.

In fact the evidence was that that was something that Badri would do with Mr Abramovich, indeed possibly with one of Mr Abramovich's people. They would sit down, I think even Mr Abramovich suggested this, they would sit down with a paper which would set out what was owed one way or the other. And Le Bourget is an example of that, because your Ladyship will recollect in Le Bourget they're addressing some document which sets out what it is that is due to go to Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky. And they're talking about --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'd be quite interested to have, apart from the Le Bourget reference, the references to the evidence as to the procedure by which you say the partners or alleged partners went through the business of working out what their profit share was.

MR RABINOWITZ: I will --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I would quite like them in one place, I'm sure they're in here somewhere.

MR RABINOWITZ: We will put them in a note for your Ladyship and we will collect the references together.

For my Lady's note, just dealing with the point I was making about Le Bourget, it's paragraph 266 of -- our written closing sets out, that's at page 181.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: The reason this is, we would respectfully submit, particularly helpful is because the 900 million figure ties in with broadly what it is said by Mr Abramovich he paid over in that year, or at least what is I think also shown in the bolshoi balance to have been paid over in that year, which I think we try to explain at paragraph 266 and the paragraphs that follow. And that does support the 50 per cent split.

Of course, one of the difficulties one has with this is the lack of documentation coming from Mr Abramovich's side. Your Ladyship will recall, some of that appears to have been destroyed following an inspection, I think was the evidence.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think I'd like, at paragraph 266 -- perhaps you set it out at 265. This is the evidence about how the calculation was done, is it?

MR RABINOWITZ: Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You said I think a moment ago that there was evidence that Mr Berezovsky's people sat down with -- or Mr Patarkatsishvili's people sat down with Mr Abramovich's people to do the calculation. I'd be quite interested to have the references, if there are any in the evidence.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, we will put something together.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, on this profits point,

Mr Sumption's suggestion that one of the problems with our case is there's no correlation between the profits made by Sibneft and what was distributed to Mr Berezovsky. As I've said, that was never our case. This appears to be -- Mr Sumption's suggestion that this was our case appears to be a pleading point.

I can tell your Ladyship that we respectfully submit that that is not a submission which is borne out by the pleadings, and for your Ladyship's note, the relevant pleading is at paragraph C34 and C34B, which is at A1, tab 2, page 11 A1/02/11. And, for example, at paragraph C34B we talk about profits resulting from the joint activity. There certainly was not, and there certainly wasn't intended to be -- I say there wasn't -- any limiting of that to profits generated by Sibneft itself.

Indeed, my Lady, it would in fact have been irrational for Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili to have agreed that they would receive only a share of Sibneft's profits given that they knew that Mr Abramovich was making -- planning to make the large profits outside of Sibneft by acting as Sibneft's oil trader. For your Ladyship's note again, that was

Mr Abramovich's own evidence that he told Mr Berezovsky about this, that's Abramovich 3, paragraph 53, E1, tab 3, page 48 E1/03/48.

That is why, my Lady, it follows that the true question of correlation is whether payments made to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili correlated with 50 per cent of the profits which Mr Abramovich made as a result of his control of Sibneft. My Lady will have seen what we say in this regard at paragraphs 439 to 445 of our written closing where we analyse the limited evidence which there is available on this point, which tends to suggest that there was just such a correlation, but that this can't be proven one way or the other on the evidence just because of the missing documentation.

Now, finally on this point, the point about correlation, Mr Sumption made mention of transfer pricing, claiming that our points on transfer pricing are unsupported by any evidence that we had been able to point to. That was at Day 39, page 52, line 23. That, with respect, was a rather curious submission, and the reason I say it was a rather curious submission is because we do not and never had a transfer pricing point, whether in our written opening or in our written closing or indeed in our witness evidence. We looked rather at the question of how Mr Abramovich made money out of his control of Sibneft, and we did this solely in order to demonstrate that the sums involved meant that the payments to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili could be correlated with those sums.

As we make clear at paragraphs 439 to 442 of our written closing, that's at volume 1, page 287, there is no dispute between the parties as to how Mr Abramovich made his money and, as I have already submitted, the evidence does indeed demonstrate that the payments to Mr Berezovsky can be correlated with the profits made by Mr Abramovich from his control of Sibneft. Your Ladyship has that in particular at paragraph 445, page 293.

That then brings us to the fourth of Mr Sumption's points which I can deal with very briefly. He made this at Day 39, page 57, where he said that:

"... a partnership agreement [he said] of the kind alleged by Mr Berezovsky would not in fact have served what Mr Berezovsky accepts was the purpose for which he was entering into this [agreement] in the first place."

Namely, to generate cash.

Mr Sumption's point, my Lady, as we understood it, was that Sibneft itself did not make profits for some years and so Mr Berezovsky could have received no money for some years. But with respect to Mr Sumption, that was simply a rehash of the previous point because it depends upon treating the partnership as one that limited Mr Berezovsky to an entitlement to share in the profits of Sibneft rather than the profits generated by the partners thanks to their control of Sibneft, which is what the agreement was really about.

Now, having dealt with Mr Sumption's four points, that was all I was proposing to say on my feet, my Lady, about the 1995 agreement.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, not only have I read your submissions on this point, but obviously before or during the course of writing the judgment I will go away and read them --

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm grateful, my Lady, and your Ladyship will, as I say, get another document from us.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You can assume that about all parts of your skeleton.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, indeed that is precisely what we have assumed which is why I'm taking the closing in the way that I am.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, thank you, that's very helpful.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can I then deal with the 1996 agreement which I can take relatively shortly. We, as your Ladyship knows, submit that there was a 1996 agreement under which it was agreed between the three partners that their interests in Sibneft would thereafter be held in companies registered in Mr Abramovich's name alone. This was a change from the previous position because, previously, the major interest which they had had in Sibneft shares, namely the 51 per cent of Sibneft pledged to NFK, which gave NFK the right to vote 51 per cent of the company's shares, had been held in a vehicle which was 50 per cent Abramovich and 50 per cent Consolidated Bank which, as your Ladyship may recall, was a Berezovsky/Patarkatsishvili vehicle.

Sure enough, when the 50 per cent shares were auctioned under the chairmanship of Mr Patarkatsishvili, as is recorded at paragraph 106 of Mr Abramovich's third witness statement E1/03/67, when those shares were auctioned to a friendly vehicle, FNK, this new vehicle was one which was solely in Mr Abramovich's name. The net result was that by 2001, all shares were held in Mr Abramovich's name alone.

As your Ladyship may recall, there were factual issues raised by Mr Abramovich about Mr Berezovsky's case on the 1996 agreement. We've dealt with all of those in our written closing at section F and also in our corrections document, and I don't propose to spend time on that now, my Lady, subject to your Ladyship.

Can I then turn to deal with the next major issue which concerns ORT and the circumstances which led to Mr Berezovsky giving up his stake in ORT.

Again, your Ladyship will find this in our written closing in section 8, volume 2, page 420, where we deal with ORT. Your Ladyship will see we set out in that section a number of reasons why we submit that Mr Abramovich's case as to why he bought and as to why Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili agreed to sell 49 per cent of ORT for $150 million makes no sense at all.

My Lady, just by way of a brief overview, there are, we submit, at least four main reasons why Mr Abramovich's case on this issue, that is the ORT intimidation issue, is, we say, incoherent.

The first of these reasons arises out of the fact that, as does not appear to be disputed, Mr Berezovsky had previously refused to sell his ORT interest to the state even when offered $300 million.

My Lady, if, as is not disputed, Mr Berezovsky had been unwilling to sell his interest to the state when offered $300 million, why then would he have agreed to sell his shares to Mr Abramovich for half of that, for $150 million, if not because, as Mr Berezovsky says, there was some added inducement which of course we say was the imprisonment of Mr Glushkov? He refuses for 300, and yet it is said that with nothing else, nothing significant else happening, he agrees to sell to Abramovich for half of that.

My Lady may recall that Mr Sumption's only substantive response to this point, in his closing speech, was to assert at Day 39, page 109, that Mr Lesin's offer of $300 million was pursued at the time, but that, according to Mr Sumption, shortly afterwards, Mr Lesin's offer was reduced to $150 million whereupon the negotiations with Mr Lesin were broken off.

In other words, my Lady, in Mr Sumption's submissions what he suggested was that the government negotiations themselves had reached the point where the 300 million was halved to 150 million, and it was at that point that, in Mr Sumption's portrayal of the evidence, negotiations broke off.

Of course, the fact that Mr Sumption appreciated the need to deal with this point reflects the fact that he appreciates that this is a real problem for Mr Abramovich's case. In our respectful submission, however, Mr Sumption's attempt to deal with the point is one that entirely fails to assist his case. I say that because the version of events that Mr Sumption puts forward is simply not supported by the evidence.

Mr Sumption, when he made this submission, and my Lady may not find all of this referred to in our note because it arises out of what Mr Sumption said orally, but Mr Sumption, when he made this submission, referred to Mr Patarkatsishvili's proofing notes. But as your Ladyship will see, if you look at those notes, and I do invite your Ladyship in due course to go back to these --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Shall we go there now?

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed. You will find them at R(D)1, tab 2, page 20 R(D)1/2/20. There are three notes, my Lady, R(D)1, tab 2, page 20; there's one at tab 3.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I've got page 20.

MR RABINOWITZ: If your Ladyship looks on page 20, your Ladyship sees:

"Badri met Lesin ..."

Does your Ladyship have that? It's about a third of the way down on page 20.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Page 20, sorry.

MR RABINOWITZ: R(D)1/2, page 20.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I've got it.

MR RABINOWITZ: Your Ladyship sees:

"Badri met Lesin -- he negotiated -- agreed 300m. That's all they had -- need to pay for Gusinsky and ORT. Badri wanted to sell first -- BB stubborn -- not going to sell -- did not go back to Russia. Agreements breached by gov. Don't trust them. So we needed trustworthy man -- recd invitation from Roman to meet -- met in Paris. [Roman] said for your sake -- I will buy shares and give them to government -- offered $150 m -- before that agreement with [Roman] -- for election campaign for Putin. $50m -- our share was $25m -- RA paid -- so we sold for $175m -- inc $25m."

So these are Mr Stephenson's notes in 2005.

"NG mentioned one of main reasons to sell -- before meeting -- even if not paid -- we will give free for NG release. Didn't hesitate -- evidently he couldn't. Voloshin promised in personal conversation with Badri later -- not easy to persuade BB -- thought would deceive -- Badri believed should keep."

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: This is Mr Stephenson's notes of briefing Badri, is it?

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed, of 2005.

The point for present purposes, my Lady, is your Ladyship sees there is no suggestion in this note at all that the price went down while Mr Lesin was negotiating from 300 to 150, which appears to have been what Mr Sumption was suggesting.

If your Ladyship then goes to the next tab, so R(D)1/3, to page 39.004 R(D)1/3/39.004, these are

Mr Lankshear's notes, again from 2005. On page 9, the extract under the heading "Page 9", your Ladyship sees:

"Badri met Lessing. He negotiated with Lessing. Price agreed at $300 [million]. That's all Lessing had at his disposal. BP wanted to sell. BB stubborn, no we are not going to sell. As time passed, didn't go back to Russia. Many agreements breached ... Didn't trust them anymore..."

Then we get Abramovich coming into the picture, and then you have the offer for 150 million instead.

Then the third of the notes, and again this is simply not consistent with what Mr Sumption has submitted; the third of the notes, if your Ladyship goes to tab 6 in the same file, page 77 R(D)1/06/77, and this is the draft proof which was put together on the basis of those notes, from line 320, your Ladyship sees what is set out there.

So what one has as reflected in these notes is, first, an offer from Mr Lesin of $300 million, second a refusal by Mr Berezovsky to agree to sell even at that price, and the notes record alternatively: "BB stubborn, so we're not going to sell", "BB stubborn, not going to sell", "I wanted to sell at this price but BB was adamant that we should not". And then third, Mr Abramovich's offer to pay only $150 million after Mr Glushkov's arrest.

So just standing back, one has a 300 million offer from Mr Lesin on the table, Mr Berezovsky rejects that. The only other offer mentioned that was made was that subsequently made of half of that of $150 million.

So, my Lady, what appeared to be the main point that Mr Sumption sought to make in trying to explain away this difficulty is, we would submit, a false point for which there is no evidence.

I think also in this context that Mr Sumption also suggested that at this time, that is to say after Mr Berezovsky left Russia, he had left with, as Mr Sumption said -- this is Day 39, page 110 -- "very little money" and "badly needed to raise funds".

In other words, my Lady, the suggestion appeared to be that Mr Berezovsky sold ORT for half the amount he had originally turned down because he was short of cash. That seems to be what's being suggested.

My Lady, there are, I would submit, two reasons why this argument also has no merit. The first reason this argument from Mr Sumption has no merit is because, as your Ladyship heard from Mr Berezovsky when he gave evidence, this was simply not the position, the suggestion that he didn't have any money.

Mr Berezovsky's evidence was that he was not short of cash. He told your Ladyship, this is at Day 6, page 97, line 9, he said that he had:

"... more than enough to stay for thousand years in London ..."

My Lady, that evidence was not contradicted.

The second reason that Mr Sumption's point is, we would respectfully submit, a bad point is that it involves an inherent inconsistency with Mr Abramovich's case. Mr Abramovich's case, my Lady, is that the arrangement that he had with Mr Berezovsky was that whenever Mr Berezovsky wanted money, Mr Berezovsky would come to him and ask for money, and he, Mr Abramovich, would give that money.

Now, in that context your Ladyship should note that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili received $460 million, plus or minus $460 million in 2000 from Mr Abramovich on Mr Abramovich's case. If the arrangement was as Mr Abramovich says it was, namely if Mr Berezovsky needed money he would just come to Mr Abramovich and ask for the money and be given it, why on earth is it said that Mr Berezovsky would, in order to get that money, have been willing to sell shares he had refused previously to sell for $300 million? All that he needed to do was to ask Mr Abramovich and, according to Mr Abramovich, he'd give him the money for nothing, without Mr Berezovsky having to surrender an asset which, on anyone's case, was very dear to him, namely his shares in ORT.

With respect, Mr Abramovich's case on this makes no sense at all. If Mr Berezovsky was short of funds Mr Abramovich would give them to him on Mr Abramovich's case. And it simply doesn't explain why Mr Berezovsky would, to get money, have been willing to sell his ORT shares.

So, my Lady, our question, we would submit, remains both valid and unanswered: why should Mr Berezovsky agree to sell 450 million to Mr Abramovich if not because there was some added inducement, such as the imprisonment of Mr Glushkov, which made him sell?

My Lady, the second major flaw with Mr Abramovich's case in relation to ORT is that, even now, he has been able to give no satisfactory or plausible explanation for why he would wish to buy a stake in ORT. Your Ladyship will remember that Mr Abramovich claims, and we've set these citations out at paragraph 750, subparagraph 2 of our closing --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I have it.

MR RABINOWITZ: He says that only ORT was of absolutely no interest to him, and he also says that President Putin didn't want the shares.

If this is the case, why did he buy the shares?
Now, Mr Abramovich claims that the reason why he bought the shares was, he says, because he was associated closely with Mr Berezovsky and that, so he says, if Mr Berezovsky didn't stop using ORT in his fight with the government, "I", Mr Abramovich, "would suffer personally".

My Lady, given the fact that Mr Abramovich had managed to become close to all those people in power, including Mr Voloshin and President Putin, one might doubt whether Mr Abramovich would really have worried that he would have been held responsible by his friends in the administration for what Mr Berezovsky was doing. But perhaps a much more significant problem for Mr Abramovich's case, and indeed his explanation, is that Mr Abramovich's own witness, Mr Voloshin, in effect the government, was insistent that the government was able to stop Mr Berezovsky's influence in ORT without any need for the state even to acquire Mr Berezovsky's shares.

Your Ladyship may remember asking Mr Voloshin about this, whether the shares were needed in order to stop Mr Berezovsky, and Mr Voloshin saying, "We didn't need the shares, we were in a position where we could control the company anyway, we just had to tell Berezovsky to stop".

Now, if it is the case, as Mr Voloshin says, and indeed as Mr Abramovich's case generally suggests, if it is the case that the government could stop Mr Berezovsky using ORT without acquiring the shares, they didn't need the shares to stop it, then again it makes a nonsense of Mr Abramovich's explanation.

His explanation is, "I had to get the shares from him because if he didn't stop using ORT in the fight with the government, I would suffer personally". His own case appears to be, however, that they didn't need the shares to stop him, they had stopped him.

Mr Voloshin told him to get out of ORT and they didn't need to acquire the shares.

If that is right, my Lady, that removes the only other explanation that Mr Abramovich has come up with in order to explain why he was willing to acquire the shares. So one is then still left in the position that his case on this is incoherent, he has no sensible explanation for why he was willing to buy those shares, if not because he was perfectly happy to intercede on the side of the government to take the shareholding out of Mr Berezovsky's hands, and that he was assisting the state in that endeavour by approaching Mr Berezovsky in Cap d'Antibes, following Mr Glushkov's arrest, as Mr Berezovsky has suggested.

My Lady, the third major flaw with Mr Abramovich's case in relation to ORT is Mr Abramovich's repeated insistence that Mr Berezovsky had decided to sell his ORT shares before Mr Glushkov's arrest on 7 December 2000, and especially before meeting Mr Abramovich following Mr Glushkov's arrest at that time. We of course say that this is simply not true.

Taking this in stages, the question of whether or not there is a basis for Mr Abramovich's case that Mr Berezovsky decided to sell the ORT shares before Mr Glushkov's arrest on 7 December. Taking it in stages, my Lady, we submit that the Le Bourget transcript makes clear that Mr Abramovich knew full well that no deal had yet been agreed between him and Mr Berezovsky on 6 December 2000, which is obviously when they met at Le Bourget. Your Ladyship may recall the repeated references by Mr Abramovich at Le Bourget to his wishing to finalise the deal so that he could go and tell President Putin that the deal was done.

Your Ladyship may recall that there was some encouragement from Mr Patarkatsishvili, but consistently with Mr Patarkatsishvili's proofing notes, where Mr Patarkatsishvili explained that he was willing to sell but Mr Berezovsky was stubborn, there is no confirmation from Mr Berezovsky that the deal was indeed done.

Now, your Ladyship will have seen that Mr Abramovich's written closing, at paragraphs 185 and following, seek to demonstrate a willingness by Mr Berezovsky to sell ORT before any meeting with Mr Abramovich following Mr Glushkov's arrest, and they seek to do so first by suggesting that it was well known that Mr Glushkov was going to be arrested for some time before his actual arrest; secondly, by suggesting that Mr Berezovsky announced the sale of ORT immediately after Glushkov's arrest and before meeting with Mr Abramovich; and, third, by suggesting that there was no date after Mr Glushkov's arrest when Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky could have met at Cap d'Antibes.

Now, we would respectfully submit that it is clear from the evidence that your Ladyship has that each of these points is wrong. My Lady, as regards whether it was certain prior to 7 December that Mr Glushkov would be arrested, in fact I would suggest that just the opposite is clear, namely that it was not known for sure that Mr Glushkov would be arrested on 7 December 2000.

As your Ladyship may recall, the best possible evidence of this is to be found in the Le Bourget transcript itself where, on the day before Mr Glushkov's arrest, Mr Berezovsky asked Mr Abramovich whether he thought Mr Glushkov would be arrested and Mr Abramovich said not.

That is set out, the relevant references are set out at paragraph 775.3 of our written closing, that's in volume 2, page 440 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I've got it.

MR RABINOWITZ: -- where we set out the relevant exchange from Le Bourget.

Mr Berezovsky asks Mr Abramovich:

"Do you think Mr Glushkov will be arrested?"

And his response is:

"I don't think they would."

Box 641 and box 642.

So the suggestion that it was certain that he was going to be arrested is simply wrong. Indeed, as your Ladyship sees at subparagraph (d), Mr Abramovich told the court:

"I thought, I assumed, guessed that he would not be arrested."

Now, how it is consistent with that for my learned friends to say it is certain that he would be arrested, I do not know.

My Lady, so far as the second of my learned friend's points as to why the sale must have taken place -- the agreement to sell must have taken place before 7 December -- sorry, before Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky could have met following the arrest of Mr Glushkov, contrary to what appears to be suggested by my learned friends it is also wrong to suggest that Mr Berezovsky's interview on Ekho Moskvyy on 7 December 2000 involved him making it clear that he was selling ORT.

For my Lady's note, the interview is set out at paragraph 776 of our written closing, also beginning at the bottom -- beginning on page 441. It is worth having this one open.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I have it open.

MR RABINOWITZ: Your Ladyship sees towards the bottom -- well, actually at the bottom of page 441, the whole interview pays re-reading. He's talking, as your Ladyship sees towards the top of the interview, about the arrest of Glushkov;

"The actions against Krasnenker [Krasnenker was I think released] are absolutely consistent with the authority's ..."

He wasn't arrested but he certainly wasn't detained in the way that Glushkov was.

"The actions against Krasnenker are absolutely consistent with the authority's action. My assessment is as follows: this is pure blackmail, blackmail against me, and it is blackmail in the best KGB tradition, so to speak. In other words, the president said he would bash my head with a cudgel. The cudgel turned out to be too short. He cannot reach me here so he started hitting people close to me. In other words, it is in the very worst tradition, blackmailing someone by putting pressure on their relatives, their associates and their friends."

Then later on, towards the bottom of the page,
Boris Abramovich:

"Did I understand you correctly that you basically plan to cancel your proposal with respect to setting up Teletrast?"

Mr Berezovsky:

"Not only that, I plan to withdraw it -- to withdraw it officially. I have now spoken with the majority of the shareholders of Teletrast and told them about my decision and I am going to implement this decision.

"So what will actually happen to the shares?"

"You know, despite all the talk, all the speculation that I sold these shares, all 49% of these shares currently belong to me and my partner, Mr Patarkatsishvili, and in this situation I believe it absolutely makes no sense to struggle against such risks, and risks to me personally but to my friends and families, therefore I will decide within the next two days what to do with these shares."

Now, Mr Berezovsky is saying then, following the arrest: I will decide what to do with these shares. That is not, as my learned friends have suggested, a declaration that he was selling ORT, and it is also flatly inconsistent with their case that he had already agreed to do so.

He's making it clear that in light of the arrest of Glushkov he will cancel the Teletrast scheme and decide what to do with the shares.

He then, we submit, has his meeting with Mr Abramovich in Cap d'Antibes and, following that meeting, agrees to sell the shares. In other words, my Lady, this interview is entirely consistent with Mr Berezovsky's case, and I would respectfully submit entirely inconsistent with Mr Abramovich's case.

Now I will come to the third of these suggestions, which is that there was no date on which the meeting at Cap d'Antibes could have taken place after the arrest of Mr Glushkov, but I'll deal with it separately because it does warrant stand-alone attention.

Before I deal with that, can I just say something about what we would suggest or we would submit is the fourth major difficulty with Mr Abramovich's case on ORT, and that is his complete inability to provide any credible explanation for why he and Mr Berezovsky stopped talking to each other from the time of the ORT sale.

My Lady, there can, I would suggest, be no real doubt that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Abramovich were on good terms up until -- certainly up until and including the Le Bourget meeting on 6 December 2000. So far as the period leading up to that meeting is concerned, we know that over the course of 2000 Mr Berezovsky and Mr Abramovich had met on a number of occasions, whether in France or in London, and we also know that at this time Mr Berezovsky continued to regard Mr Abramovich as his friend, as someone who could be trusted -- could act as a trusted intermediary with the state. And as your Ladyship will recall, the fact that they were friendly all the way up to December 2000 is clear also from the Le Bourget transcript which, even in Mr Abramovich's own words, was a candid and amiable meeting.

That, for your Ladyship's note, is Mr Abramovich's evidence in his fourth witness statement at paragraph 98 E5/11/42.

Then one has the rupture in the relationship that seems to occur at around this time. As my Lady knows,

Mr Berezovsky says that he and Mr Abramovich never met, indeed never spoke again, from the time when ORT was sold. Of course Mr Abramovich suggests that there was this meeting in Megeve, which we deal with in our witness statement. We say that that never happened. But even Mr Abramovich says that that was the last time they ever had contact, proper contact with each other.

Now, Mr Berezovsky's explanation for this is perfectly clear and straightforward. He says they had a falling-out at Cap d'Antibes after the Le Bourget meeting, as a result of which he regarded himself as having been so utterly betrayed by his friend and partner that he never wanted to speak to him again. I would submit that Mr Abramovich, on the other hand, simply has no real explanation for this at all.

Now, among the attempts to explain it, your Ladyship will recall that at one point Mr Abramovich suggested in his evidence that, from his point of view at least, he regarded Mr Berezovsky as having behaved dishonestly -- dishonourably, in relation to the way in which ORT had covered the Kursk incident. That was what he said at Day 22, page 124, and we cite that passage in our written closing at paragraph 865.5(c) on page 520 of volume 2.

But, of course, my Lady, that was in August, many months before, and it is clear that that was not what gave rise to the split, given that the two men did meet, on everyone's case, at least once and I think at least twice thereafter, in meetings that no one suggests were anything other than cordial. So we know that that wasn't the reason for the split.

Indeed, my Lady, it's Mr Abramovich's own case that after that Kursk incident he says he bought ORT for more than it was worth, in effect as a favour to Mr Berezovsky, some time after the Kursk incident, and he says that in early January 2001, at Courcheval or Megeve, he agreed to make a pay-out to Mr Berezovsky which would dwarf all previous payments, that's the $1.3 billion. And your Ladyship will recall Mr Sponring saying that these men were hugging each other, that was Mr Sponring's evidence. All of which, if remotely true, would again suggest that Mr Berezovsky would be treating, and indeed was treating, Mr Abramovich as an even closer friend than before, rather than the opposite. After all, he'd helped him out, on Mr Abramovich's case, with ORT, he'd given him this astonishingly generous -- he'd agreed to make this astonishingly generous payment of 1.3 billion in effect for nothing. Plainly, that is just not consistent with them falling out after this.

But the fact that there was some rupture in the relationship is clear, and the extent of it is clear, from the fact that after this point, my Lady, when their paths did subsequently cross in Israel they did little more than acknowledge each other's existence and then move on. And that, we would submit, is extraordinary unless, of course, something had happened between them. And Mr Abramovich is simply unable to explain that.

Now, Mr Abramovich, who I have to accept is no fool, well understood the difficulty for his case if, as Mr Berezovsky had said and consistently said, there had been this irreparable falling-out because, of course, on Mr Abramovich's case, Mr Berezovsky really should have remained indebted to him, Mr Berezovsky (sic), for ever more. He was very generous with him.

Of course that is why Mr Abramovich came out with what we would submit was the utterly false evidence in the course of the strike-out application of -- your Ladyship will recall this evidence, we've set it out at paragraph 157 of our written closing, page 113, volume 1.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: It was suggested that -- this is really in response to Mr Berezovsky saying, "After this we never met again", your Ladyship sees:

"The meeting at which ORT was discussed was not the last meeting between Mr Berezovsky and Mr Abramovich. There had been at least two meetings in Israel since then."

Now, we know that that is utterly false because not even Mr Abramovich is suggesting that that is true anymore.

Indeed your Ladyship will recall -- and I think we've set this out, indeed we have, in the next paragraph of our closing -- it then became clear that there was only one occasion where they had even come across each other. I think Mr Abramovich began by calling that a meeting but by the end it was perfectly clear that it wasn't a meeting at all. It was an acknowledgement of each other's existence. I think they may have said hello and then they moved on.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Where did that take place, remind me?

MR RABINOWITZ: That was in Israel, I think it was at a hotel in Israel.

Did your Ladyship ask me when or where?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Where.

MR RABINOWITZ: In Israel, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So there was an encounter in Israel?

MR RABINOWITZ: An encounter in Israel which, far from suggesting that there hadn't been a falling out, in my respectful submission supports the case that there was a falling-out given what actually happened there, where they acknowledge each other's existence and they move away.

Now, given the shared history that these two men had, my Lady, going back any number of years, the fact that this was all that they could manage, acknowledging each other's existence and moving on, reinforces the point that they were no longer friends. Because even someone who you -- frankly, someone who you were at school with, you would do more than these two people did when they met in Israel, whether you liked the person at school or not. But they couldn't even manage a conversation.

So, in our respectful submission, it's perfectly clear that the evidence that Mr Abramovich gave for the purpose of the strike-out, to meet Mr Berezovsky's point, proved to be false.

One is then left with really there being no proper answer to Mr Berezovsky's point that something happened which made them fall out and that this is what it was, the ORT issue. And this final flaw in Mr Abramovich's case, my Lady, is in our submission a fatal flaw in Mr Abramovich's case on ORT.

His story of the generous purchaser and the grateful vendor just falls apart when one sees the impact that the sale of ORT had on the relationship between the two old friends and partners.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Had Mr Berezovsky been reported as making disparaging remarks about Mr Abramovich in the press? I'm looking at your paragraph 1574. I just don't remember what those were saying.

MR RABINOWITZ: I can't remember what there was either, my Lady, but Mr Abramovich's general position in this litigation has been that Mr Berezovsky had never complained about Mr Abramovich so I'm not clear what that is.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What I would be interested to have, if there are any, are the page references to the limited comments in the press made by Mr Berezovsky about Mr Abramovich.

MR RABINOWITZ: We will get those for your Ladyship.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It doesn't matter now.

MR RABINOWITZ: We will see if there is anything that fits that description, my Lady.

That then brings us to the Cap d'Antibes meeting which, for my Lady's note, we've dealt with in our written closing at paragraphs 847 and following at volume 2, page 492. Again --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is the chronology now in a pretty much agreed state?

MR RABINOWITZ: I think so.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Because I am going to be using that, and maybe some work will have to be done in the next week or so by your respective teams because I really don't want to be going to a document that doesn't make it clear to me where you agree and where you disagree. Because I think it's moved on from certainly the original hard copy.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, both sides have heard what your Ladyship says and we will endeavour to do that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. I really do need that document.

MR RABINOWITZ: So in Cap d'Antibes, and the first point to make about the Cap d'Antibes meeting is, as we submit, that the timing of the meeting is, or at least certainly was, we say, in fact at one stage admitted on the pleading by Mr Abramovich. We have explained why we say this at, for your Ladyship's note --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I have it.

MR RABINOWITZ: It's in the written opening as well, I don't know whether your Ladyship has it. Can I give your Ladyship a reference to that. It's paragraph 618 to 626 of our written opening, that's at page 305 of that.

The point that we make there, my Lady, is that it is clear that when Mr Abramovich signed off on his original pleading, he was accepting that there had indeed been a meeting at Cap d'Antibes following Mr Glushkov's arrest on 7 December but before 25 December. That's to say, the meeting was after Glushkov's arrest at some point in December, and it was admitted that it was some time in December. What he didn't admit was the location of the meeting.

Perhaps I can just give your Ladyship also a reference to the pleadings where your Ladyship will find this. It is, as I say, all set out in our written opening, but it's also at A1, tab 2, page 9 A1/02/9, that's paragraph C27 of the points of claim, particulars of claim, and then A1, tab 3, page 42 A1/03/42, for the defence, paragraph 27, D27.

Now, my Lady, in light of that pleading and that pleading position, my solicitors wrote to Mr Abramovich's solicitors to put them on notice some months before the trial -- this was on 12 August 2011, the letter is at L(2011), 14, page 59 L(2011)14/59 -- that unless Mr Abramovich could provide evidence to the contrary, we would be inviting the court to infer that Mr Abramovich's instructions in 2007 had been that he did recall that the meeting took place after Mr Glushkov's arrest on 7 December.

I can tell your Ladyship that no contrary evidence has been produced, which means that I do therefore ask that the court, in light of this, infer that Mr Abramovich, in 2007, remembered that he had met Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili in December 2000, after Mr Glushkov's arrest, in France.

What this means therefore is that this court has evidence before it that in 2007, at least, the people who recalled Mr Berezovsky, Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich meeting in relation to ORT, after Mr Glushkov's arrest, included, first, Mr Berezovsky, whose evidence is before the court, secondly, Mr Patarkatsishvili, whose evidence to that effect is in his proofing materials where he describes discussing the sale of ORT in return for the release of Mr Glushkov, evidence that would make no sense at all if the sale had been concluded prior to Mr Glushkov's release.

I don't know whether that point is clear to your Ladyship, but in the Badri proofing notes, and we can look at this, when he's talking about the negotiations to sell ORT with Mr Abramovich, he talks about the Glushkov release being part of the package. That makes no sense at all if that negotiation had all been concluded prior to Mr Glushkov's arrest.

So the Badri proofing notes again strongly indicate that Mr Patarkatsishvili's evidence was that the negotiations with Mr Abramovich about the sale of ORT must have been after Glushkov's arrest.

My Lady, Mr Gillis is pointing out that at [draft] page 118, between lines 7 and 9, it's recorded, probably accurately, that I said:

"It would make no sense at all if the sale had been concluded prior to Mr Glushkov's release."

That should say "if the sale had been concluded prior to Mr Glushkov's arrest".

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: So one has Mr Berezovsky saying that he recalls that it must have been after Glushkov's arrest, we have Mr Patarkatsishvili telling the solicitors that it must have been -- well, giving the solicitors evidence which is consistent only with it being after the Glushkov arrest. And, as I've suggested in light of the pleading point, Mr Abramovich as well at that stage recollected that the discussion about ORT would have concluded after the Glushkov arrest and not before.

So those three gentlemen -- there is of course also Ms Gorbunova, whose evidence is before the court, who, as your Ladyship knows, was at the Cap d'Antibes when Mr Abramovich was there. And there is Mr Giroud, the French bodyguard, whose evidence I would submit about a meeting at that time was both clear and compelling.

In other words, my Lady, everyone who is known to have been at Cap d'Antibes that day, with the possible exception of Mr Berezovsky's aged mother, recalls the meeting at that time.

Now, in responding to what I would call the eye witness evidence of a meeting at Cap d'Antibes at that time, Mr Sumption in his oral closing adopted two particular lines of attack with which I can deal briefly. First, Mr Sumption attempted to dismiss the evidence of Ms Gorbunova by suggesting -- this was at Day 39, page 117, he suggested that her evidence was unreliable because, as he suggested:

"She claimed for the first time in cross-examination to have actually overheard part of the conversation on the terrace of Chateau de la Garoupe when [according to Mr Sumption], in her witness statement, she had said nothing about this except that she had learnt of the threats later from Mr Berezovsky."

My Lady, in fact Mr Sumption was entirely wrong about this and entirely wrong to criticise Ms Gorbunova in this way, and indeed the point doesn't enable him to attack the credibility of Ms Gorbunova who, I would suggest, was a patently honest and truthful witness.

My Lady, at paragraph 40 of her witness statement, this is her first witness statement, which for your Ladyship's note is at D4, tab 8, page 66 D4/08/66, Ms Gorbunova said, and I'll give your Ladyship the exact words she used:

"I heard the men talking about Boris and Badri's interest in ORT. I recall Roman saying that the government wanted to pay significantly less for the ORT shares than he was going to pay, and that it was only thanks to Roman that they would pay more. I think Roman also said that he was personally paying some of the sale price as he was fed up with the story with Boris and Badri."

In other words, my Lady, it was always Ms Gorbunova's evidence that she overheard the conversation about ORT. So Mr Sumption's first line of defence, attacking the credibility of Ms Gorbunova on the basis of some suggested shift in her evidence, was we submit unfounded and unfair.

The second line of defence, of course, was Mr Abramovich's alibi evidence, evidence that we've dealt with in some detail at paragraph 849 of our written closing. It's a paragraph that extends over a number of pages from page 500 to 506 of volume 2. I would submit that it is clear from what we have set out there that Mr Abramovich cannot in fact establish an alibi for the Cap d'Antibes meeting, especially of course when his diaries, mobile phone records, credit card statements and phone bills have all not been provided to the court for consideration.

Now, my Lady may recall that Mr Sumption's response to this volume of evidence directed to the difficulties with Mr Abramovich's alibi evidence was to make just two substantive points. First he said, and this was at Day 39, page 115, that we have made no attempt to explain "the automatic record of passport swipes at entry and exit which match the stamps in Mr Abramovich's passport and show that [Mr Abramovich] didn't leave Russia in the whole of the relevant period". That's what Mr Sumption said.

But, my Lady, that is wrong for at least three reasons. First and foremost, because there was no such automatic record adduced in evidence at all. What there was, my Lady, was the bare assertion in a letter from a Russian official that there was an automatic registration system accompanied, as your Ladyship may recall, by a refusal to disclose or really to tell your Ladyship anything at all about this system, refusal to disclose either the means used to collect such information or the relevant registration records themselves. For your Ladyship's note, that is the letter from a Mr Mochalov, dated 13 October 2011.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I remember that.

MR RABINOWITZ: The second reason this was a bad point is because, contrary to what Mr Sumption submitted, we do in fact deal with the suggestion that such record might exist and we do so for my Lady's note at paragraph 849.5, that's page 500 of volume 2 of our written closing.

The third reason why Mr Sumption is wrong is because, as we there explain, the evidence given by Mr Pronichev and Mr Mochalov suggesting that such record might exist, we submit, is unreliable. We've set that out at paragraph 849.5.

Allied to all of this, my Lady, there is the feature of Mr Abramovich's evidence relating to his presence in Chukotka on which we have already made submissions which demonstrate, we submit, a willingness and an ability on his part, and on the part of his team, to manufacture travel evidence where they think that this might assist Mr Abramovich. We deal with this, as my Lady knows, at paragraphs 185 to 193 of our written closing, that's at page 138 and following.

We submit that, when taken together with Mr Abramovich's obvious political influence in Russia, these letters about some automatic system which shows that Mr Abramovich could not have been in Cap d'Antibes really can't be given any weight at all by the court.

My Lady, the second substantive point taken by Mr Sumption in his response to our submissions on Mr Abramovich's alibi evidence was to allege that, for the Cap d'Antibes meeting to have taken place, what he said was four passport stamps should fail to appear on the passport, namely the Russian and French stamps on entry into France and the French and Russian stamps on departure. All four of them, he said, would have, by some oversight or administrative lapse, not to have appeared. That was at Day 39, page 115, at line 22 and following.

Again, my Lady, we submit that this also was a point of very little substance. I say that because even with the very few meetings which we are able to test against in Mr Abramovich's passport, we have noticed that there are at least four missing stamps. We've set all this out in paragraph 849.4 of our written closing.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I have it.

MR RABINOWITZ: There is a missing Russian exit stamp for when Mr Abramovich left Russia on 6 December for the Le Bourget meeting. There is a missing Russian entry stamp for when he arrived in Russia on 30 May, after the Cologne meeting, 30 May 2001, and there is a missing French exit stamp for when he left France after the Le Bourget meeting on 6 December. There is also a missing French exit stamp for when he left France after his skiing holiday in January 2001. We don't have very many meetings to test against but even by reference to the ones that we do have, one can find a great number of missing stamps. It appears, my Lady, that when one is travelling into and out of countries on a private jet, as Mr Abramovich was, passport stamping is not something that always happens. That is why, in our respectful submission, there is little weight to be given to Mr Sumption's second point.

In the end, my Lady, we would respectfully submit that the eye witness evidence about Cap d'Antibes is much more reliable than the attempt by Mr Abramovich to create alibi evidence. We submit that your Ladyship should find that there was indeed a meeting that took place at Cap d'Antibes following Mr Glushkov's arrest on 7 December. My Lady, that was all I was going to say about the Cap d'Antibes meeting. Your Ladyship obviously has our detailed submissions on that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. Just a second, Mr Rabinowitz.

Do the shorthand writers want a break?

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm getting an indication "yes", my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. I'll take ten minutes.

(3.07 pm)

(A short break)

(3.28 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, I'm going to move next to the question of Sibneft intimidation. As your Ladyship will have seen, we set out our positive case on this in our written closing at volume 2, page 522. I wasn't going to repeat what we've said now. What I did want to do in relation to this issue again, if I may, is to deal very quickly with what Mr Sumption described in his closing speech as his salient points on this. We haven't dealt with this in our written closing, my Lady, because they arise out of his oral submissions.

I think he identified five points, each of which we would submit is of limited weight. What Mr Sumption called his first salient point, which for my Lady's note is found in the transcript at Day 39, page 118, involved the contention that, on their face, the words used by Mr Abramovich did not threaten Mr Berezovsky but rather warned him of adverse state action. My Lady, in fact, this so-called salient point turns out, with respect, not to be a point at all. We have always accepted that the words used by Mr Abramovich, on their face, did not purport to threaten Mr Berezovsky but rather warned him of adverse state action. Indeed, as your Ladyship will know, it has never been Mr Berezovsky's case that Mr Abramovich said in terms that, unless Mr Berezovsky handed over Sibneft, then Mr Abramovich himself would cause the loss of his interests and cause Mr Glushkov to remain in prison indefinitely.

Rather, it has always been Mr Berezovsky's case that Mr Abramovich said this, in effect made that threat, in effect using other words and that Mr Abramovich was more subtle than to put his point expressly. He was, in the words that Mr Patarkatsishvili used when speaking to the solicitors, playing a game. But his clear message, which he intended to deliver and which Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili well understood, was a threat.

So this point that there was here not a threat but just a warning, your Ladyship should know, is a point that Mr Abramovich's counsel have always had a difficulty with. Indeed it is a point that they have aired both before Sir Anthony Colman and before the Court of Appeal and on each occasion the point has failed, because, as your Ladyship knows, the question whether or not there was a threat or just a warning is, as it always has been, this: in context, is what Mr Abramovich said properly to be understood as a threat or a warning?

In our respectful submission, the most important piece of context in this case is Mr Abramovich's twin denials, first, that Mr Berezovsky ever had an interest in Sibneft and, secondly, his denial that he even said the relevant words. We say that, had Mr Abramovich's words been a mere warning or been intended as a mere warning, then he would not have denied Mr Berezovsky's interest in Sibneft and he would certainly not have denied that he said the relevant words. He would just have said, no, they were intended as a warning. But he didn't, he denied saying anything.

We have of course in our written closing, also identified further elements of context, in particular Mr Abramovich's conduct in the Le Bourget meeting where he repeatedly emphasised his access to and influence with the Kremlin and where he denied Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili the opportunity to formalise their interests in Sibneft and where Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili demonstrated their vulnerability to state action. For your Ladyship's note, we've set all this out at paragraph 872 and following of our written closing.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I've got that.

MR RABINOWITZ: But, my Lady, the short answer to Mr Sumption's first point is that it goes nowhere because, in context, the words used by Mr Abramovich were indeed intended to convey a threat and were so understood.

Now, the second of what Mr Sumption labelled his salient points, in effect, involved the suggestion that Mr Berezovsky had not made an allegation about a threat of adverse action by Mr Abramovich until the second round of the particulars of claim in September 2007. Again, there seemed to be a suggestion that there was some fluctuation in his saying that there was a threat of adverse action by Mr Abramovich. This was a point made by Mr Sumption at Day 39, page 120.

Again, my Lady, we submit that this point also is not correct. Without turning this up, I can tell your Ladyship that paragraph 17 of the original particulars of claim, which for my Lady's note can be found at K2, tab 3, page 9 K2/03/9, contained an allegation about a threat having been made by Mr Abramovich in terms very similar to that contained in the second version of the particulars of claim which, again for my Lady's note, I can tell you the Court of Appeal said very clearly was perfectly sufficient to constitute an allegation of a threat of action on the part of Mr Abramovich.

So Mr Sumption's second salient point also does not advance Mr Abramovich's case.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What's the paragraph number in the Court of Appeal's decision?

MR RABINOWITZ: Can I come back to that, my Lady?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, sure.

MR RABINOWITZ: I do have it but I've put it away somewhere.

Can I then just deal with the third of Mr Sumption's points. Mr Colton will get out that reference for you.

What Mr Sumption identified as his third salient point related to whether Mr Patarkatsishvili regarded himself as having been threatened or subjected to pressure by Mr Abramovich. That third salient point is one that Mr Sumption identified at Day 39, page 121. More particularly, my Lady, it appears to have been the submission of Mr Sumption that Mr Patarkatsishvili, the person to whom the words were conveyed, did not regard himself as having been threatened. Mr Sumption sought to support this contention by a series of unreferenced statements as to what Mr Patarkatsishvili believed or felt, presumably based, although Mr Sumption didn't say so, on a particular reading of Mr Patarkatsishvili's proofing materials. In other words, Mr Sumption said it didn't appear that Mr Patarkatsishvili felt himself to be pressured by Mr Abramovich, and he didn't identify where he got this from, but we assume that he was taking it from Mr Patarkatsishvili's proofing materials.

Once again, my Lady, we submit that Mr Sumption's point about this is just not justified by the evidence.

Your Ladyship may recall that Ms Duncan and Mr McKim together interviewed Mr Patarkatsishvili in 2007 and they were able to form a clear view as to his recollections relevant to the claim. And while, as is inevitable with a draft note of the meeting, or draft proof, some of their notes are susceptible to multiple interpretations if taken in the abstract, the real value of the evidence given by the solicitors of their meetings with Mr Patarkatsishvili lies in the impression which the solicitors gained overall as to Mr Patarkatsishvili's recollection of these matters. I can tell your Ladyship that none of their evidence on this was challenged.

My Lady, before I show you the evidence, which I'm proposing to do, I can give you the reference to Lord Justice Longmore's judgment, 02/8.099/26, page 26 and following. It's paragraphs 80 to 84. I apologise that I didn't have that reference.

On the question of the impression formed by Ms Duncan and Mr McKim as to whether Mr Patarkatsishvili felt he was being pressured by Mr Abramovich, can I invite your Ladyship to go to bundle D1, tab 6, page 88 D1/06/88 where we have Ms Duncan's understanding.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: If I can just show your Ladyship paragraph 27, which as I say wasn't challenged:

"I set out below my understanding of Mr Patarkatsishvili's stance based on my meeting with him.

"(a) That Sibneft was acquired 50/50 between Mr Abramovich on the one part and Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili on the other.

"(b) Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili would not have sold their interest in Sibneft but for the pressure from Mr Abramovich conveyed to them at several meetings.

"(c) They did not get a fair price for the interest in Sibneft but felt that they had no choice but to take what was on offer.

"(d) Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili had a 50% interest in Rusal which they shared 50/50 with Mr Abramovich.

"(e) It was agreed that no partner in Rusal could sell his interest without the agreement of the others, and that Mr Patarkatsishvili, on learning that Mr Abramovich had sold his stake in Rusal, objected to this at a meeting with Mr Abramovich in Tbilisi."

I'm showing your Ladyship material here which also goes to Rusal just so that we don't have to come back to this later on.

Mr McKim set out his views in his witness statement for trial at paragraph 31, and if I can invite your Ladyship to go to bundle D2, tab 14, page 63 D2/14/63.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm there.

MR RABINOWITZ: So Mr McKim says:

"My understanding of Mr Patarkatsishvili's position following the meeting included:

"(a) That the most important principle of the arrangement with Mr Abramovich was that their interests in Sibneft and any future businesses would be split 50:50, with 50% for Mr Abramovich and the other 50% for Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili;

"(b) That there was no good commercial reason for Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky to sell their interests in ORT or Sibneft;

"(c) That Mr Abramovich was playing a game by claiming that he was also a victim (or potential victim) of the pressure being exerted by the Kremlin and Mr Patarkatsishvili did not believe that Mr Abramovich was under any such pressure;

"(d) That they only agreed to sell their interests in Sibneft and ORT as a result of the pressure exerted on them by Mr Abramovich, and in particular:

"(i) The concern that, if they did not sell, their interests would be expropriated and that Mr Abramovich was in a position to do so if he so wished; and

"(ii) Based on Mr Abramovich's assurances that, if they did sell Mr Glushkov would be released from prison."

And (e) --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I have read all that.

MR RABINOWITZ: Yes. So, my Lady, that is a clear understanding of Mr Patarkatsishvili's position.

Can I just show your Ladyship paragraph 32 and invite your Ladyship to read paragraph 32.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I've read it.

MR RABINOWITZ: Then finally Ian McKim, if I can ask your Ladyship to go to paragraph 48, page 71. It starts before page 72, it starts at page 69.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I've got it.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can I invite your Ladyship to look at that, and in particular subparagraphs (a), (f) and (i).

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: So that's the evidence that the solicitors give of their understanding of Mr Patarkatsishvili's position. In light of that, we would respectfully submit it's difficult to see on what basis Mr Sumption felt able to say that Mr Patarkatsishvili did not consider that there had been any intimidation. That then is Mr Sumption's third so-called salient point.

Can I then deal with his fourth point, and that was the suggestion at Day 39, page 124, where he said that this whole notion of a threat was, he asserted -- what he said it was was:

"... inherently bizarre in the circumstances in which these people found themselves."

My Lady, this point was one which Mr Sumption made very briefly and to which I can respond equally briefly. Mr Sumption's suggestion appeared to be that it made no sense to threaten to expropriate what was, he said, merely a personal contractual right. With respect, this point, which also surfaced from time to time in the strike-out application, is not correct at all. As a matter of legal technicality it would, of course, be possible for the Russian State to interfere with personal contractual rights and deprive a person of them.

That could be done in a variety of ways. For example, the state could declare that all of Mr Berezovsky's assets were forfeit to the state and so any contractual obligation due to them were now due to the state. Or it could declare that his contractual rights no longer existed. Or it could put pressure on prosecutors and judges to refuse to recognise

Mr Berezovsky's rights or to create fake obligations on his part against which those obligations could then be set off.

In any event, my Lady, Mr Berezovsky has never suggested that he is alleging that Mr Berezovsky actually used the word "expropriation" in his discussions with Mr Patarkatsishvili -- sorry, that Mr Abramovich actually used the word "expropriation" in his discussions with Mr Patarkatsishvili. Nor does Mr Berezovsky allege that the precise way in which his interests would be taken were spelt out in so many words. It didn't need to be. As Mr Berezovsky explained in his first witness statement, that's Berezovsky 4, paragraph 373 D2/17/278, Mr Berezovsky had no doubt that a range of strategies using criminal investigations, court procedures, insolvency procedures, tax investigations and the like could be used if Mr Abramovich wanted. So we submit the point Mr Sumption makes is a bad one.

But it is in any event, my Lady, a red herring, because when it comes to threats, as your Ladyship knows, the court need not enquire into the question of whether the threat was in fact possible to carry out. Your Ladyship will know the loaded gun example. The fact that someone points a gun at you which is unloaded doesn't mean that because it was not loaded and you couldn't actually be shot, no threat to shoot you was made.

What matters here is only that the person to whom the threat was made believed that this was possible, and my Lady, there is clear law on this, and it's common ground. We've referred to this at paragraph 929 of our written opening.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: Significantly, I can tell your Ladyship that Mr Berezovsky was not even challenged on his evidence of what he believed in this regard.

Now, the final point that Mr Sumption made in this context involved him asking rhetorically, this was at Day 39, page 125, how it is that one is to explain the absence of any paper if this really was a sale or release of Mr Abramovich's contractual obligation to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili.

My Lady, I would submit that this point is, with respect, a little bit difficult to follow. If the interests were originally held under an oral agreement and, in particular, given that the interests were already all under Mr Abramovich's own control, the shares all being registered in his name, it's difficult to see why a paper would be needed for this transfer.

Mr Abramovich would have been very confident that he was secure, not least given the fact that he'd paid over $1.3 billion. How, one might ask rhetorically, could Mr Berezovsky have imagined that he could have denied having agreed a transfer or waiver of his interests in light of his receipt of so substantial a payment?

And of course it is a point --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm not sure I'm following this. Even if the transfer of, what, initial -- or might be regarded as an equitable interest was done orally, one might have expected some sort of receipt that referred to the transaction; is that the point that's being made against you?

MR RABINOWITZ: That might be the point which is being made against me. The point that I'm making in response to that is that, if that were in England now, one might well expect a receipt. But of course this was --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Hasn't a transfer in equitable interest got to be done in writing anyway?

MR RABINOWITZ: If we're talking in England it always has to be done in writing.

Of course, we're dealing here with two people who had made an agreement orally, a situation where the shares were already in Mr Abramovich's name. I'm not suggesting that in fact it wouldn't be a good idea for there to be paper, indeed I suggest that there was paper because there was the Devonia agreement. But I'm suggesting that even if one ignored the Devonia agreement the point really doesn't go very far, given that these parties had operated until then on the basis of an oral agreement, and the notion that Mr Berezovsky would be able to dispute that he had waived his interests in Sibneft, given his receipt of $1.3 billion, is in my respectful submission not a realistic point to make.

Now as I say, my Lady, Mr Sumption's whole point presupposes that there is no paper here and that entirely ignores the existence of the Devonia agreement, which, as your Ladyship may recall, includes a number of recitals and operative clauses which do record Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili giving up their interests in Sibneft.

For your Ladyship's note, that's recital E and clause 2(a) of the Devonia agreement, which your Ladyship will find at H(A)35, pages 215 and 218 H(A)35/215.

Your Ladyship also has the vendor certificate to be completed separately by each of the vendors for each part of the interest being sold, which is at H(A)35, page 234 H(A)35/234.

Of course, that does bring us on to the Devonia agreement, and again, as your Ladyship knows, we've set out in our written closing, section J, our detailed submissions on Devonia. We respond there to the points that are made in my learned friends' written closing, and Mr Sumption in his closing speech really largely rehashed those points so there's nothing new to add about that.

There is just one point I do -- my Lady, there is just one point I need to pick up from what Mr Sumption said about this issue in his oral closing and it's this. Your Ladyship may recall that Mr Sumption, as part of his attempt to suggest that the Devonia agreement was an obvious sham, referred in very damning terms to the due diligence that -- does your Ladyship --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, I'm fine, go on.

MR RABINOWITZ: He referred in very damning terms to the due diligence that Clydesdale Bank had done, and he was very critical of the fact that Clydesdale were willing to accept that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were selling their interests in Sibneft to Mr Abramovich.

What he said, this is at Day 39, page 132, he said:

"It's absolutely astonishing that Clydesdale Bank should ever have accepted such a cock and bull story, and they certainly don't appear to have accepted it when the papers hit their head office in Australia sometime in about August."

That's what he said.

Now, Mr Sumption didn't support this assertion about Clydesdale head office with any reference, nor is any to be found in Mr Abramovich's written closing. Indeed I can tell your Ladyship that Mr Abramovich's only analysis of Clydesdale's decision to close Mr Berezovsky's accounts is to be found at annex 8 to Mr Abramovich's written opening at B(D)/179 and following. And perhaps inconveniently for Mr Abramovich's case, that analysis demonstrates the exact opposite of Mr Sumption's submission, because what this makes plain is that the Clydesdale Bank were closing Mr Berezovsky's account, a process which took many months, not because of any doubts as to the accuracy of the explanations given to them concerning the Devonia agreement, but only because they had changed their policy regarding large foreign payments.

As my Lady may recall, the Clydesdale Bank provided to the parties, under a court order, a good deal of documentation relating to the bank's dealing with Mr Curtis and others. That's at bundle H(D). And there is nothing which supports Mr Abramovich's attempts, or indeed Mr Sumption's assertion, that Clydesdale had any concerns about the due diligence which it had performed on that transaction.

My Lady, so far as concerns the question of the authenticity of the Devonia agreement, again, the point that we would want to emphasise to your Ladyship is the one that we make at paragraph 933 of our written closing, and it is this. If the court concludes, as we respectfully say it should, that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili had an interest in Sibneft from 1995 onwards, and that they relinquished it in 2001, as evidenced in particular by the final large payment being made to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili in 2001, then there is no possible basis for Mr Abramovich's allegation that the Devonia agreement is a sham, because it would, in that situation, reflect the realities of the transaction which the circumstantial evidence, not to mention Mr Berezovsky's direct evidence, demonstrates occurred at that time.

My Lady, subject to one point, that is all I was proposing to say about the facts relating to the Sibneft claim.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: There is just one other point to make about the Sibneft facts, and I can make it very shortly because I am repeating the point, and that relates to the $1.3 billion.

The only point I'm going to make is this: your Ladyship will perhaps not recollect, but Mr Sumption in his oral closing, what screamed out about Mr Sumption's oral closing is he offered no explanation at all for this. He simply stayed away from the 1.3 billion. In our respectful submission, that reflects the fact that there really is no answer to the point that we make --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What, why it was paid?

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed. There's simply nothing in his oral closing about that, and we submit that that really holds the key to the whole of the Sibneft factual issues.

Now, my Lady, what I'm going to go on to next is choice of law issues, and I don't know whether your Ladyship wants me to carry on. I am making good progress.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've got to go to a meeting at 5.00, I've got quite a lot to do before then. If it would suit you to stop now it would certainly suit me but I don't want to interrupt.

MR RABINOWITZ: No, my Lady, I would rather stop now and then start fresh tomorrow.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well.

Just a second, I just want to make a note of this.

Very well. What time would suit you, Mr Rabinowitz, to start tomorrow?

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, I would expect to finish either just before or just after lunchtime, so, subject to your Ladyship, I think we can start at 10.30, and I feel very secure that we'll finish before the end of the week.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. 10.30 tomorrow.

INDEX

Closing submissions by MR RABINOWITZ .....1

Wednesday, 18 January 2012

(10.30 am)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Rabinowitz.

Closing submissions by MR RABINOWITZ (continued)

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, on Sibneft, I was about to turn next to the legal questions relating to the Sibneft claim. There are in fact very few matters I need to deal with under this head, in part, indeed in the main, because the parties are not very far apart on the law here, and in part because again this is a subject covered in great detail both in our written opening and indeed closing documents.

Can I, however, just say something about the question of the system of law applicable to the Sibneft claim, that's the choice of law issues, where the parties are plainly not in agreement.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: This is section K, is it?

MR RABINOWITZ: It's in section -- I believe it's section K, my Lady, yes.

As your Ladyship will know, the parties plainly are not in agreement about this and it may well be a matter of some significance to the outcome of the claim. In general outline, as your Ladyship knows, we submit that the Sibneft claim falls to be dealt with under French law or English law, whereas my learned friends say Russian law. We submit that is simply wrong.

So far as the law is concerned, as your Ladyship knows, the relevant statute is the Private International Law Act 1995, and in particular sections 11 and 12 of that act. Your Ladyship has that set out in our -- I think it's in our written opening, I'm not sure we've set it out in our closing.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It doesn't matter, I can find it in the opening.

MR RABINOWITZ: I can also give your Ladyship a reference, the bundle reference. It's O11 at tab 6 01/1.06/1.

In our opening document, it's section M at B(A)2, page 437 B(A)2/437.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you. Do I need to go to it?

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm going to take your Ladyship through it, I do need to emphasise one or two points.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm not signed in so let me just look at it in hard copy.

MR RABINOWITZ: The 01/1 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So this is section?

MR RABINOWITZ: Page 437, it's volume 2 I think of our written opening. Page 437, section M.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, I've got Russian law at section M. Section L?

MR RABINOWITZ: If your Ladyship goes to -- if your Ladyship is in volume 2 of 2, you should have at page 437 -- is there a paragraph 879, paragraph 880?

Your Ladyship may be looking in our closing rather than in our opening.

I'm told it's on the screen, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm in the written closing, I'm sorry. Forgive me.

If it's on the screen, I'll look at it there.

MR RABINOWITZ: It's on the screen.

Now, as your Ladyship sees there, section 9 is where one begins to get choice of law in tort and delict. Your Ladyship needs to start with section 11, which is "Choice of applicable law: the general rule".

As your Ladyship sees, section 11.1 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can we have section 11, please, which is just further down?

MR RABINOWITZ: Page 438 B(A)2/438.

Your Ladyship sees:

"The general rule is that the applicable law is the law of the country in which the events constituting the tort or delict in question occur."

Then, as your Ladyship sees, section 11.2 begins:

"Where elements of those events occur in different countries, the --"

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: We're in (c), are we?

MR RABINOWITZ: We're exactly -- my Lady, we're (c):

"In any other case, the law of the country in which the most significant elements of those events occurred."

So one is trying to identify the country in which the most significant element or elements of the events constituting the tort occurred, and your Ladyship may wish to note here three particular points, all of which I would submit have been overlooked or ignored by my learned friends in their analysis of this provision.

First, as your Ladyship sees, for the purposes of section 11, what matters is the events or elements of events that constitute the tort which occur. It therefore obviously follows from this that the mere geographical connection of the parties, their nationality for example, are completely irrelevant to section 11. They are obviously not events --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So you say that it took place -- the threat or the alleged threat was made in France so you say it's French law.

MR RABINOWITZ: It was made in the sense of Mr Berezovsky had it in France, that's where he succumbed to the threat, and that is why France rules. The fact that Mr Abramovich may be Russian and had his residence in Russia, and that Mr Berezovsky may at one point have been Russian, is neither here nor there for the purposes of section 11.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: The events constituting the tort are the threat and the reliance and the subsequent damage, are they?

MR RABINOWITZ: The threat and the succumbing to the threat and the damage.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So you say the threat, the succumbing to the threat, and where do you say the actual transfer of the interest took place?

MR RABINOWITZ: Well, that depends on the view your Ladyship takes about the Devonia agreement. If the Devonia agreement is a valid agreement then in a sense that is going to be very relevant to the determination of the choice of law issues, and that has an English choice of law provision.

If your Ladyship disregards that, then --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Was that the Devonia agreement that was signed in Nobu or something?

MR RABINOWITZ: Exactly that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Or handed over, I can't remember.

MR RABINOWITZ: I think it was brought to Mr Berezovsky when he was having dinner in Nobu by one of the solicitors, and he signed it there. Mr Berezovsky was plainly not in Russia, indeed he couldn't go back to Russia at any stage.

It may just be worth my analyse -- teasing out just a little bit further some of the points about this because there are a number of respects in which I would submit that Mr Sumption's submission failed really to apply section 11.

So first, the point is you're looking for events or elements which occur. Now, if something doesn't occur, then it's not relevant for the purposes of section 11. So that, for example, my Lady, a threatened event, this is the focus of Mr Sumption's submission, something which is threatened to occur: we're going to keep Mr Glushkov in jail, something is going to happen in Russia to expropriate --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You say that's irrelevant because it's not --

MR RABINOWITZ: It's irrelevant, it doesn't occur.

Now, those matters might have some connection if one ever gets into section 12, but for the purposes of section 11 they are irrelevant.

If authority is needed for this proposition your Ladyship has it in Cheshire and North's. We cite that in our written opening at paragraphs 883.4 and 5, which is volume 2, page 44. The relevant extract, my Lady, is also in the authorities bundle at O3.1, tab 2, it's pages 630 and 632 of O3.1 O3/02/630. We've cited it rather more briefly here -- I would invite your Ladyship actually in due course to go to the full reference in O3.1 because it does make the points that I have been making. I think it's illustrated by the point we make in our written opening about mens rea not being something that occurs.

So that was the first of the points that I wanted to make arising from section 11.1.

The second point -- sorry, section 11.2(b).

The second point about section 11 is that, as your Ladyship will note, there is no question here of considering whether the location of an event was merely fortuitous or happenstance. This may be a point of relevance to section 12, which I'll come to shortly, but for the purposes of section 11, and in particular section 11.2(c), the focus is on the significance of the elements of the events and not on the significance to the parties of the location.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: Again, that is relevant to a number of points that Mr Sumption sought to make about this which I'll come to.

Now, the third point to be made about section 11 is this: that factual events, including in relation to the tort of intimidation, may, by virtue of what that tort involves, not all occur in a single time or in a single place but they may involve ongoing or continuous events.

That was a point that was made by Lord Justice Mance, as he then was, in relation to negligent misstatement claims in a case called Morin v Bonham and Brooks. That's a case we cite again in our written opening. Your Ladyship has that at paragraph 888 O2/4.64/888.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've got it in front of me, yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: He referred in fact in paragraph 15, which I'm not sure is set out at paragraph 888, to the continuum of reliance and loss. I think in the passage set out he refers to the continuum of reliance. Again, for your Ladyship's note, that authority in paragraph 15 is at O2/4.64/887.

My Lady, just as reliance can involve an ongoing event, it's obvious that the intimidation or threat itself might involve an ongoing circumstance. Just by the way of example, one of the cases we have in the bundle is a case called Godwin v Uzoigwe, and that is in fact the only decided authority at Court of Appeal level prior to the present proceedings relating to the tort of two-party intimidation. The Court of Appeal dealt with facts in that case where the element of intimidation itself was an ongoing or continuous one.

For your Ladyship's reference, we cite the judgment of Lord Justice Stuart Smith, again this time in our written closing, paragraph 977.1 it's at page 578 of volume 2.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I have it.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, the reason for making this point, as your Ladyship will appreciate, is because in our submission the relevant elements of a threat for the purposes of the tort of intimidation may well include any steps taken by the defendant to create the conditions and context necessary for the threat which he makes to be effective, whether by communicating to his victim the defendant's own position of power or influence, or the victim's position of weakness and vulnerability.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: Now, my Lady, with those principles generally identified, can I next address the application of those principles to this case and in so doing respond to the points that Mr Sumption made about this in his oral closing. First, when it comes to threats, it's perhaps obvious in the context of the tort of intimidation that one does not look solely at the place where the threat was communicated by the threatener, it is plainly relevant also to look to the place where the threats are received.

I say this because, obviously, a threat is not a threat until the victim actually hears it. If Mr Abramovich had been shouting in an empty room there would have been no threat. If Mr Abramovich had spoken to Mr Patarkatsishvili, but Mr Patarkatsishvili had said nothing to Mr Berezovsky, there would have been no threat made to Mr Berezovsky. There was a threat to Mr Berezovsky only when Mr Berezovsky learned, as he was intended to learn, of what Mr Abramovich had said, understanding the threat that his statements entailed.

Of course, as your Ladyship will recollect, Mr Berezovsky was in France when he received the threats, as he was intended to receive those threats, by Mr Abramovich.

Just on this point about the place where the threats are received being relevant, we've cited at paragraph 885 of our written opening -- I'm sorry to keep flicking between our opening and closing -- but we've recited at paragraph 885 of our written opening an extract from Dicey, Morris and Collins which makes this point in the somewhat analogous case of misstatement. If your Ladyship has that, you see that they say:

"It may be the case that if a negligent or fraudulent misstatement is made by telephone or telefax in one country but is received and acted upon by the claimant in another country, that applicable law will be the law of the latter country. The same result may also be found to ensue when representations are made by electronic mail or on the internet."

Again, one can perhaps illustrate how it will apply in the context of intimidation by reference to the sending of the letter or the making of a telephone call. If Mr Abramovich in Russia made a telephone call to Mr Berezovsky in France, in which a threat was made then, following Dicey, it may well be the case that the threat made is to be regarded as made in the place where it was received, that is to say France. So too if Mr Abramovich had posted a letter containing the threat from Russia to France.

My Lady, we submit that the fact that the message was passed on via human means, that is in the form of Mr Patarkatsishvili, really makes no difference to this. That is why I would submit there's no warrant, as Mr Sumption appeared to contend, for simply ignoring the communication of the threats to Mr Berezovsky having taken place in France.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

MR RABINOWITZ: So that is the first point. The second point is on the question of submission, which is obviously another element of the tort of intimidation. Submission occurs at the place where Mr Berezovsky comes to submit to Mr Abramovich's threats, and it doesn't occur when Mr Berezovsky's decision to submit happens to be communicated to Mr Abramovich.

That, of course, is because, as your Ladyship will appreciate, communication of a submission forms no part of the tort at all. It's the submission which matters. A victim may well not communicate his intention to submit to a blackmailer, he may simply submit.

So contrary to Mr Sumption's submission at Day 39, page 145, it is irrelevant under section 11 to enquire as to where Mr Abramovich was when he learnt of Mr Berezovsky's intention to submit to Mr Abramovich's threats. It just has got nothing to do with the issue.

What matters here is where Mr Berezovsky was when he submitted to those threats and that, again, was France.

Now, the third point arising from Mr Sumption's submissions that I should say something about is --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm just trying to work out -- I'm looking at page 445 of your opening, at paragraph 891, where you say the threats were made at the meeting at Mr Berezovsky's home at Cap d'Antibes. But that related to the ORT shares.

MR RABINOWITZ: It did, and your Ladyship --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So how can that be relevant?

MR RABINOWITZ: Your Ladyship is absolutely right to focus on it. It was a point I was going to come to.

Your Ladyship will recall that the third of my points related to the fact that in identifying the elements of this tort, just as a reliance can be a continuum, that's to say you have to look at the elements leading to the reliance, and just as loss can involve a continuum, so too with a threat, it could involve a continuum.

Your Ladyship will recall that our pleaded case, and indeed our case in our closing, is that both at the meeting in France, at Le Bourget and at Cap d'Antibes, Mr Abramovich said and did things which were material to the context in which the threat -- the words used to Mr Patarkatsishvili about Mr Glushkov and about pressure being applied in relation to Sibneft are to be interpreted.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So you say there's a continuum?

MR RABINOWITZ: Exactly that, which includes what happened both at Le Bourget -- I'm going to say something about it shortly -- and indeed at Mr Berezovsky's home at Cap d'Antibes. That's the relevance of that point, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see. This is the point you're making at paragraph 977 of your closing.

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed, yes. 977.2.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And 3, yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: If your Ladyship is content with that, can I move on to the third point arising from Mr Sumption's submissions.

He referred your Ladyship to the decision of the Privy Council in a case called Kwok Chi Leung Karl v The Commissioners of Estate Duty, decided in 1988. Your Ladyship may recall, that was a decision on the legal situs of a debt to which my learned friend referred your Ladyship in an attempt to identify a further event located in Russia, and that was at Day 39, page 146.

Now, my Lady, with respect to Mr Sumption, again that case doesn't assist your Ladyship at all. First, it's an authority which predates the 1995 act, and plainly therefore it wasn't considering what is an event or whether -- where an event has occurred within the meaning of section 11. All it determines, and this is for the purpose of the Hong Kong estate duty ordinance, is the legal situs of a future debt under a promissory note. But, of course, the legal situs of an obligation, and I think Mr Abramovich may have in mind the obligations under the 1995 agreement, is not an event that occurs for the purposes of the tort of intimidation. It's really just -- it's not an element of the tort.

So even if the legal situs for some purposes of Mr Abramovich's obligation to Mr Berezovsky under the 1995 agreement was Russia, given that this was not something that was ever performed, it's difficult to see how one could regard this as an event of any sort. And this being so, it is very difficult to see how this can be said to be relevant under section 11.

So that's the third point, my Lady.

The fourth point is that Mr Sumption spoke of Mr Berezovsky's location in France. Your Ladyship will have in mind, France was the place, as your Ladyship has already remarked, where Mr Berezovsky was when the threat was made to him and the place where he was when he submitted to the threat.

Mr Sumption spoke of Mr Berezovsky's location in France as being, he said, these were his words, "purely adventitious" and as being "of no significance at all". That was at Day 39, page 151. He said, this is still Day 39, page 151, this is what he submitted to your Ladyship:

"Mr Berezovsky might have taken the call in London or in New York or on his skiing holiday in Switzerland, or in any of the other places where he was wont to travel. The fact that he happened to be in his sitting room, or wherever, at Cap d'Antibes is of no significance at all."

With respect to Mr Sumption, I would submit that this is another bad point.

First, of course, it is simply nonsense to suggest that it is purely adventitious that Mr Berezovsky was in France. Mr Berezovsky was in France because he lived in France. That's why he was in France. He was not there on a holiday, he wasn't in some anonymous hotel or in an airport meeting room, he was at his home in France.

Your Ladyship may recall that it's not in issue that Mr Berezovsky had been resident in France at that time since the end of October 2000 so that by the end of May 2001 he had been there for some seven months. Your Ladyship may also recall that Mr Abramovich told the court that the meeting at Le Bourget in December 2000 was in France because that was where Mr Berezovsky was then living and, indeed, Mr Abramovich's own pleaded case says that the Cap d'Antibes meeting was at Cap d'Antibes because Mr Berezovsky had told him that he could no longer live in Russia. That's a pleaded part of Mr Abramovich's defence, paragraph 27.1.

Secondly, and whether or not this was adventitious, the adventitiousness or otherwise of Mr Berezovsky's location is, as I've already submitted, irrelevant for section 11 purposes. Your Ladyship may recall that under section 11 it's the significance of the events which my Lady is called upon to weigh up under section 11, not the significance of the locations. That may be a point for section 12 but it's really got nothing at all to do with section 11.

So even if Mr Berezovsky had just been passing through France, that, the fact that he was just passing through it, at least for the purposes of section 11, would have been irrelevant.

So, in our respectful submission, for the reasons I have been submitting, and indeed for the reasons we set out in section K which, as your Ladyship knows, we give a fuller analysis, we've analysed all the relevant events, we submit section 11 of the act most naturally points towards French law as applying.

I need to deal with section 12 as well which, again, your Ladyship has in our opening. It's paragraph -- it started on paragraph 985 and following of our written closing, and on -- your Ladyship I think has on the screen the opening.

Just again looking at section 12, it's worth focusing on the words used B(A)2/438:

"If it appears, in all the circumstances, from a comparison of --

"(a) the significance of the factors which connect a tort or delict with the country whose law would be the applicable law under the general rule; and

"(b) the significance of any factors connecting the tort or delict with another country, that it is substantially more appropriate [and I emphasise those words, "substantially more appropriate"] for the applicable law for determining the issues arising in the case, or any of those issues, to be the law of the other country, the general rule is displaced and the applicable law for determining those issues or that issue ... is the law of that other country."

Then sub 2:

"The factors that may be taken into account as connecting a tort or delict with a country for the purposes of this section include, in particular, factors relating to the parties, to any of the events which constitute the tort or delict in question or to any of the circumstances or consequences of those events."

So plainly, as your Ladyship sees, the ambit is very substantially wider for the purpose of section 12 than it is for the purpose of section 11. But the test that one is applying here in section 12 is that section 11 applies unless, looking at the factors pointing to another jurisdiction, one concludes that it is substantially more appropriate for the applicable law to be the law of some other country.

Now, there are three points made by Mr Sumption that I need to address in relation to section 12. First, Mr Sumption said that section 12 admits of a wider range of factors than section 11, and with that we would respectfully agree.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you give me the reference to where Mr Sumption's arguments orally were?

MR RABINOWITZ: Day 39, page 152.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: So it does admit of a wider range of factors.

Mr Sumption was, however, wrong in this context to suggest that it was more appropriate to apply Russian law than any other law to the tort because, I think one of the reasons he gave was that Mr Patarkatsishvili was at the time of the threat a resident in Russia. That was at Day 39, page 152, line 22.

My Lady, there are two points about this. First, Mr Patarkatsishvili is of course not a party to the action. The second point to make about that is that Mr Patarkatsishvili was not, at the time of the tort, resident in Russia. Indeed, as Mr Sumption had earlier stated in his closing speech, this was at page 62 of Day 39, Mr Patarkatsishvili had himself become a fugitive from Russia before the meeting in May 2001. Mr Sumption said this had occurred in April 2001. Mr Berezovsky's evidence -- this is Berezovsky 4, paragraph 333, that's at D2, tab 17, page 268 D2/17/268 -- Mr Berezovsky's evidence was that Mr Patarkatsishvili had become a fugitive from Russia in March 2001, but either way it was before the tort was complete.

Secondly, Mr Sumption identified the fact that Mr Berezovsky may have had a tax domicile in Russia as being relevant to section 12. This was Day 39, page 153. The tort of Mr Berezovsky having an animus revertendi to Russia. My Latin pronunciation is even worse than my French pronunciation. He talked of Mr Berezovsky having an animus revertendi to go back to Russia, which is of course the hallmark of domicile for tax purposes.

But with respect to Mr Sumption, my Lady, for the purpose of section 12, the fact that Mr Berezovsky at some point in time, perhaps when the regime changes or whatever, would like to go back to Russia, is hardly a point of any substance for the purposes of section 12 in seeking to determine what law should be applied to the tort which was committed at a time when he was --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So you say, even on the assumption that his domicile remained that of his domicile of birth, that fact is irrelevant?

MR RABINOWITZ: For the purposes of seeking to determine the proper law here, yes, my Lady.

Your Ladyship will have in mind that Mr Abramovich himself says in his evidence that Mr Berezovsky had told him at the time that he could not live in Russia. Those were the words that Mr Abramovich used in his evidence. Mr Berezovsky said he could not live in Russia. And given this, even if it were relevant that Mr Berezovsky hopes one day to return to Russia, I would submit it's of no real significance when deciding the proper law of this tort to look at that when, at the time of the tort, he could not return to Russia.

Now, the third point to make about Mr Sumption's submissions is this: he identified three further factors which he said pointed to Russian law as being substantially more appropriate. This is Day 39, again at page 153, why he said Russian law was substantially more appropriate than French law for the purposes of section 12. We submit that none of these, whether individually or in combination, comes anywhere near the high standard required to displace section 11, and the factors were these.

The first factor was said to be that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Abramovich and Mr Patarkatsishvili all had their principal business interests in Russia. My Lady, whilst it may be true that they had their principal business interests in Russia we would submit that this is of limited value indeed. After all, why should it matter where their other principal business interests were? They also had interests in other countries. And indeed, my Lady, and this in my submission is a point of some substance, in relation to the assets, the interests which were the subject matter of the tort, all of them had taken steps to ensure that those interests were held offshore.

Your Ladyship will recall the evidence of Mr Abramovich going to Gibraltar and Cyprus to set up trusts to deal with his Sibneft interests and Liechtenstein to deal with his Sibneft interests. All of those structures that he used had some non-Russian law, so he was actually concerned himself that his interests should be governed by non-Russian law.

Your Ladyship will also recall the trusts which Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili set up, the Octopus and Hotspur Trusts, again set up offshore using a non-Russian law. So they were very concerned that Russian law should not apply to these interests.

Given that, my Lady, the fact that they may have had other interests in Russia, in my respectful submission, is not a reason why Russian law is substantially more appropriate as the law to apply than some other law which you've determined under section 11.

The second factor that Mr Sumption referred to, and this was at Day 39, page 154, was that he said the substance of the threat was to act wrongfully in Russia, with the wrongfulness of the action being subject to Russian law.

My Lady, we would submit that it's unclear why this makes it substantially more appropriate, or even more appropriate, for Russian law to apply to the tort of intimidation than French law, which is of course the law of the country where Mr Berezovsky was living when he was intimidated and succumbed to the threat. We submit that this is particularly so in circumstances which will always be the case, in relation to intimidation, where the threat was never carried out. That is to say, no conduct of any relevance in relation to these threats actually took place in Russia because Mr Berezovsky succumbed to the threat.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is it not a factor that the threat is to do something in Russia?

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm not saying these things have no weight --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, but you say on its own it doesn't amount to substantial --

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed, on its own -- indeed cumulatively with the others, it doesn't amount to make Russian law substantially more appropriate.

I'm not taking an extreme position and saying your Ladyship can't give any weight to any of these factors at all for the purposes of section 12. For the purposes of section 11 I do say of that. For the purposes of section 12 it's really a balancing exercise, although in the end you have to be satisfied that it's substantially more appropriate that French law should apply.

That then brings us to the third factor which Mr Sumption identified in this context, and that was, he said, this is Day 39, page 154:

"... the whole background to this issue is Russian."

That was, with respect, a rather vague submission because, although it's obviously correct that the history of Mr Berezovsky and Mr Abramovich's relationship and dealings was one based in Russia, that is not the same thing as saying that Russian law would be substantially more appropriate than French law.

Again, as your Ladyship will have in mind, when the tort was committed Mr Berezovsky had left Russia for good, knowing that he would not be able to achieve justice there, that Mr Abramovich came to France repeatedly, which is where he set up his intimidation of Mr Berezovsky, including at the Le Bourget meeting and Cap d'Antibes, and it was also where Mr Abramovich was dealing with Mr Berezovsky via Mr Patarkatsishvili. When he did that, he always did so outside of Russia, including on at least one occasion in Paris.

So, my Lady, we submit that none of those reasons that Mr Sumption has identified either individually or cumulatively, produced a situation where Russian law can be regarded as substantially more appropriate than French law.

That is all I was proposing to say about the choice of law issues. If your Ladyship is with us on the choice of law issues then French law applies and, as your Ladyship knows, the parties are in agreement that your Ladyship should treat French law as being the same as English law for this purpose. The only difference between the two is that French law has no arguable relevant limitation period at all, and so your Ladyship can, in a sense, deal with this as if English law did apply. Now, so far as English law is concerned, there were, when the matter was before the court in the context of the strike-out application, some very interesting points of the English law relating to the tort of two-party intimidation, and among the points that were at issue was this, namely whether for the purposes of the tort of intimidation the threat of conduct had to be threat of unlawful conduct, or whether it was sufficient that an illegitimate threat was made. Your Ladyship will have seen this referred to in the Court of Appeal judgment.

Your Ladyship I think does not have to worry about that for the purposes of this trial because, under the two possible systems which will govern the question of whether the threat was unlawful or not, Russian law or English law, the parties are in agreement that, as a matter of Russian law, if those threats of conduct were made and Russian law governs, then they were unlawful under Russian law.

So far as English law --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So it's agreed that if the threats were made --

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed, then they would have been threats of unlawful conduct, if that is a question, that is to say the question of unlawfulness is to be governed by Russian law. And equally, if that is a question, the question of whether the conduct was -- the threatened conduct was unlawful, equally, if that is to be governed by English law, we have set out in some detail in our submission why, as a matter of English law, those threats would be unlawful as a matter of English law, and I had not seen any suggestion that that is challenged. Indeed, not even in the 175-page document is there any suggestion that this is challenged.

So given that, on any basis, the threats, if made, were of unlawful conduct, your Ladyship doesn't need to decide the question of whether it is sufficient that the threat be of illegitimate -- sorry, the threat itself be an illegitimate threat. So in a sense it is only if Russian law applies, that is to say if your Ladyship is against us on the choice of law issue, it is only if Russian law applies that there are legal issues, although, having said that, there are certain legal issues arising under Russian law which will apply even if your Ladyship concludes that French law or English law applies to the tort. Because, of course, your Ladyship will recall that one of the issues we had to consider with the experts was whether Mr Berezovsky actually had any rights under the 1995 and 1996 agreements. Because if he didn't have any rights, then there was nothing that he gave up in the tort of intimidation.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, obviously. If he doesn't have any rights --

MR RABINOWITZ: He lost nothing.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: -- then there's no -- well, there may have been an intimidation but there was no submission.

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed, and that will be a live issue for your Ladyship to decide, even if your Ladyship decides that French law or English law applies. In a sense that goes to the prior issue of whether there were rights that he was intimidated to give up.

Now, your Ladyship has detailed submissions from us on --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: If it's Russian law, it's agreed that -- sorry, if the Russian law governs the tort then there's a debate as to whether, or a dispute as to whether as a matter of Russian law the limitation period is extended, yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: Exactly. I tried to take a shortcut and perhaps I shouldn't have.

There are three potential issues arising under Russian law. The first concerns whether there were any rights that Mr Berezovsky had under the 1995 and 1996 agreement. The second point is whether, if Russian law applies to the tort of intimidation, there is a tort of intimidation, that is to say, what is the Russian law tort of intimidation? The third issue on Russian law is about the limitation period.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I thought you said the second was not in dispute.

MR RABINOWITZ: I was about to say exactly that. Of those three issues, the second one is not in dispute.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, you said if the threats were made, then as a matter of Russian law there's no dispute that those threats were contrary to Russian law.

MR RABINOWITZ: Were unlawful. But there is a different question -- a different question is whether, if you look at all Mr Berezovsky's (sic) conduct, and the question of whether he's committed a tort is one -- the tort of intimidation as a whole is governed by Russian law. Number one, what are the Russian law elements of the tort of intimidation? Number two, will Mr Berezovsky have been able to make those out? That would be a different question to the question of whether the threats were of unlawful conduct under Russian law.

On that issue, that's to say the elements of the Russian tort of intimidation, there is no dispute between the parties, no serious dispute between the parties, as I understand it, and --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So what is the dispute under the second issue?

MR RABINOWITZ: The second issue, that's to say if the law is governed by the Russian law of intimidation?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: It's really -- the significant point is the limitation period, which is the third point, it's not really the second point.

Your Ladyship will recall that the experts were not even cross-examined on the Russian law tort of intimidation. Paragraphs 1025 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm just looking at what you said a moment ago because I'm not following this. Just a second.

You say there's a different question, which I think is the second issue, is the question whether he's committed a tort, whether Mr Abramovich has committed a tort.

MR RABINOWITZ: Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And that involves obviously looking at the Russian law elements of the tort of intimidation.

MR RABINOWITZ: Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: At the moment I don't understand what are the disputed issues as to the constituent elements of the Russian tort of intimidation and whether they're present here. You've told me it's agreed that, if the threat was made, it would constitute unlawful conduct. What I'm not understanding at the moment is what you say is the Russian law dispute as to the constituent elements of the tort or whether they were present in this case.

MR RABINOWITZ: It is my fault. These questions overlap. Can I just try to separate them out. Your Ladyship has identified them but just if I can then make sure we're on the same page.

What I was addressing earlier when I said there was no dispute between the parties is this: even as a matter of English law there has been thought to be a requirement that you show that the threat should be of unlawful conduct. So let's assume English law applies -- is the proper law of the tort. We say: you made a threat, the threat was of unlawful conduct. The question is was the threat of unlawful conduct? What law governs the question of whether the threat was of unlawful conduct, even if English law governs the tort generally? It could be Russian law, it could be English law. That doesn't matter because on either law it was unlawful conduct.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What, to threaten to keep someone in jail?

MR RABINOWITZ: Exactly.

A different question is if Russian law governs -- if Russian law is the proper law of the whole tort, what are the elements of the tort and are they made out? We've dealt with that at 1017 and following. I don't understand there to be any issue between the parties -- that's pages 601 to 608 -- I don't understand there to be any issue between the parties about what the elements of the tort are.

Your Ladyship may want to note paragraph 1029 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So it's the causation issue?

MR RABINOWITZ: It's the causation issue. The parties didn't even cross-examine the experts because on the facts it's unlikely to make any difference at all. That is the only possible issue of Russian law that might arise there.

I'm sorry, that was rather confused, but it does get rather confusing, my Lady.

So it's the second issue, and I don't want to ignore the limitation point which is also obviously --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, I've got that, I appreciate that.

It's the other issue I wasn't so clear about.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, that was all I was going to say about Sibneft law, subject to your Ladyship having questions for me about that.

Can I just, before I move to Rusal which is what I was proposing to do next, deal with the three matters which arose in the course of my submissions yesterday, so I can just wrap up on Sibneft before I move to Rusal.

First, in relation to the question of the drawing of inferences, with regard to witnesses not called, your Ladyship will recall that you asked in the context of the Wisneski case which we cited at paragraph 194, page 142 of our closing submissions, your Ladyship had asked whether there were any cases that lay down the principle as to whose obligation it is to call a witness, or whether there's anything which would assist your Ladyship as to whom, if anybody, had the job of calling Mr Fomichev.

My Lady, we haven't been able to find cases precisely on that point, and we've looked at the standard text and had a go through the authorities. What I am going to hand up to your Ladyship, not with a view to going through this in detail now, are two decisions by Mr Justice Peter Smith who applies the Wisneski principles, and a decision by Mr Justice Burnett which also applies the Wisneski principles. Mr Justice Peter Smith applied the principles in order to conclude that he should draw the inference. Mr Justice Burnett decided he shouldn't.

Now, can I just tell your Ladyship -- we'll get the cases handed up. They will be put on Magnum. (Handed)

I wasn't proposing to take time going through them now, my Lady, because in the end I would suggest that they're not going to help you terribly much with the point your Ladyship identified, but they will at least give your Ladyship some examples of how other judges recently have applied these principles. In a sense, what your Ladyship will see is that they reinforce the point your Ladyship made to me that this is a terribly fact-based inquiry.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, that's what I thought.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can I just tell your Ladyship what the cases are then. The first in time case is the Da Vinci Code case, that's the Baigent v Random House case, 2006, EMLR, and that is one of the judgments of Mr Justice Peter Smith. He drew an adverse inference because of the failure by Random House to call Dan Brown's wife. Dan Brown's wife had been involved in research for the book, and he wasn't satisfied that the reason that Mr Brown, Dan Brown, gave as to why his wife was not called was a sufficient reason.

Your Ladyship will find the relevant passages, I'm not suggesting that they will help you enormously, but paragraphs 213 to 215 of that judgment.

The second of Mr Justice Peter Smith's decisions is the case of Lewis v Eliades number 4, and again Mr Justice Peter Smith was content to draw adverse inferences. Your Ladyship will find the relevant passages between paragraphs 59 and 62. Your Ladyship will see from those that it's very fact-based but, again, I wasn't proposing to go through this because --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I can read them.

MR RABINOWITZ: -- you can read them and I'm certainly not promising you'll get a lot out of them.

Mr Justice Burnett's decision was in a case called Davies v Global Strategies Group. That was 2009. In a sense, your Ladyship may get more assistance out of this because this was a case where he wasn't willing to draw the adverse inference, and he was dealing with a case in which the people who were not called were either employees or had been employees. So in a sense, at least he's looking at a relationship and saying, well, does the relationship mean that there was some sort of responsibility?

Your Ladyship will see that his conclusion is that it doesn't. He concluded that these -- the people who could have been called as witnesses, one of whom was no longer an employee, he would have been a material witness but he was working in Nigeria and therefore --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What are the relevant paragraphs?

MR RABINOWITZ: Paragraphs 5 to 7 and then paragraphs 81 to 83.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: Insofar as there is any point remotely approaching the point of principle which emerges out of that, it is that the fact that someone is no longer an employee is not of itself a sufficient reason not to call that person if they have important evidence to give. Your Ladyship will see that between paragraphs 81 and 83.

So that was that point, my Lady. I'm sorry we couldn't assist you with --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, that's fine, thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: The second issue that arose yesterday, your Ladyship asked about the other evidence relating to the procedure by which the parties went through the business of working out what the profit share was. Your Ladyship will recall, this was in the context of the profit share issue.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, in addition to the materials set out at paragraph 264 and 265 of our written closing --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just a second, let me go back.

MR RABINOWITZ: Your Ladyship will see that we've set out there, that's pages 179 to 180, we've set out the evidence your Ladyship has on this from Le Bourget, which is what I mentioned yesterday, and we also provide a transcript reference of the evidence that Mr Abramovich gave to the court, this is on page 181, that he sat down each year with Mr Patarkatsishvili to agree how much was to be paid. That your Ladyship has there.

I should give your Ladyship one other reference which your Ladyship may want to write down at those passages, and that's to paragraph 21 of Mr Berezovsky's fourth witness statement, that's at D4, tab 6, page 36 D4/06/36, where Mr Berezovsky makes the point I made to your Ladyship yesterday about it being Mr Patarkatsishvili -- sorry, fifth statement. Mr Berezovsky makes the point I made to your Ladyship yesterday about it being Mr Patarkatsishvili who dealt with Mr Abramovich's team in relation to profit share.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, thank you very much.

MR RABINOWITZ: Then the third issue that arose in the context of Sibneft was in the context of the Israel encounter where Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky acknowledged each other and moved on, and your Ladyship will recall in our written closing, paragraph 157.4, that's at page 114, we refer to Mr Abramovich's evidence that the encounter was no more than an acknowledgement, he says, in light of Mr Berezovsky's negative comments to the press about him.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I raised a question on that.

MR RABINOWITZ: Your Ladyship asked for the page reference to any negative comments made by Mr Berezovsky in the newspapers.

Now, we have looked for these. One difficulty with this is that there appears to be no evidence before the court as to when it was that this encounter in Israel took place. Mr Abramovich, paragraph 312 of his third witness statement E1/03/129, just says he had seen Mr Berezovsky on at least one occasion in Israel.

I can tell your Ladyship that Mr Abramovich's written closing at paragraph 372, that's at page 307 of his written closing, has gathered together what appear to be the relevant references, and I can give them to your Ladyship --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: If they're there I can just take them from there.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can I just say this. The first criticism of Mr Abramovich in print appears to have been made in December 2003. Perhaps I'll reference this for the transcript, my Lady. They give these references: H(A)69/3, H(A)69/5 and H(A)69/7.

Then they also refer to something in July 2005 when

Mr Berezovsky told media organisations that he claimed to file a claim against Mr Abramovich. That is at H(A)90, page 52 H(A)90/52, H(A)90, page 55 H(A)90/55, and H(A)90, page 57 H(A)90/57. Of course, my Lady, the first one they can identify is in December 2003 --

MS DAVIES: My Lady, I hesitate to interrupt but it may just be quicker on this point.

There is also a reference in Mr Abramovich's evidence to a press report in December 2002 in which Mr Berezovsky said he did not know Mr Abramovich, and the reference to that is H(A)51, page 83 H(A)51/83.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm grateful to my learned friend, we didn't spot that one.

Even allowing for that, my Lady, one has almost a full two years which Mr Abramovich said he can't explain by reference to these witness statements. If you go from December -- or January 2001, Mr Abramovich is identifying something in December 2002 with absolutely no contact whatsoever.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, I was about to move on to Rusal.

I'm not sure when your Ladyship is proposing to take the morning break.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'll rise now.

(11.28 am)

(A short break)

(11.45 am)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, before I move on to Rusal, just two comments about the reference that my learned friend, Ms Davies, volunteered about the press reports. I'm not inviting your Ladyship to turn it up, it's the document at H(A)51/83. Your Ladyship will see this when you look at it, but the first point is that although Mr Abramovich referred to disparaging remarks in the press, your Ladyship will see this is in fact a television interview.

The second point is that I would invite my Lady to read the interview because, in our respectful submission, there's nothing disparaging here about Mr Abramovich, and this plainly is not what he had in mind when he gave the evidence that we identify in our written submission.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'll read it in due course.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can I then turn to Rusal. Your Ladyship will find this dealt with at section N, page 626 of volume 2 of our written closing. We've also provided a summary of Rusal with an overview at section A5 of our written closing. And your Ladyship will perhaps have discerned that there are probably four key issues arising in relation to Rusal, and they are these.

First, did Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili have ownership interests in Rusal? Secondly, was Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili's relationship with Mr Abramovich in relation to Rusal governed by English law? Third, was there an agreement that prevented any of them selling their interests in Rusal without consulting the others?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: When you say ownership interests, are you making a distinction there between proprietary interests in the assets or contractual claims or rights as against Mr Abramovich?

MR RABINOWITZ: I am drawing -- in relation to Rusal, our case is that Mr Abramovich held those interests on trusts for us, so it would be a proprietary interest, and that would carry with it the usual incidence of fiduciary duties and the like.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: So the third factor was: was there an interest (sic) that prevented any of them selling their interests in Rusal without consulting the others? And fourth, did Mr Abramovich breach his obligations to Mr Berezovsky, and is he liable to account, pay compensation for their breach, although of course, as your Ladyship is aware, the quantum issues have been deferred.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: As your Ladyship knows, we submit that Mr Berezovsky's claim in relation to Rusal provides an extremely good fit with the contemporaneous materials and the inherent probabilities of the case and that Mr Abramovich's case does not.

We've identified a number of facts and matters which Mr Abramovich needs to explain away if he's to persuade your Ladyship that, as he claims, he alone acquired the aluminium assets and he alone was Mr Deripaska's partner in the merger with Rusal.

In summary, my Lady, as we've explained more fully in the written closing, Mr Abramovich must first overcome, or sorry, must overcome five significant hurdles we say, each of which is fundamentally inconsistent with the case he now puts before your Ladyship.

First, he has to explain away, if he is right about being the sole person with an interest in the aluminium assets and in those shares, why five contemporaneous contracts relating to the aluminium assets and Rusal do not in fact mean what they appear on their face to say. In particular, Mr Abramovich has to explain (a) why

Mr Patarkatsishvili, Mr Shvidler and the four BVI companies were not in fact purchasers of the aluminium assets although that is precisely how they are described in the 10 February 2000 master agreement; (b) Mr Abramovich needs to explain why he warranted to Mr Deripaska in the preliminary agreement -- I shall give your Ladyship precise references to these in a moment, where we deal with them -- (b) why Mr Abramovich warranted to Mr Deripaska in the preliminary agreement of 5 and 6 March 2000 that he had partners whose consent to the Rusal merger he promised that he would obtain, and whose consent we say he did obtain at the Dorchester Hotel meeting on 13 March.

We deal with that, my Lady, at paragraphs 1164 to 1175 of the written closing, page 672. The first point I identified we deal with between paragraphs 1103 and 1117 at page 637.

Third, Mr Abramovich needs to explain why, in both the Rusal merger contract of 15 March 2000 and the amended and restated contract of 15 May 2000, Mr Abramovich warranted that there were other selling shareholders and other P1 shareholders who had legal and beneficial interests in the aluminium assets that were being pooled with those of Mr Deripaska, and who were entitled to a share of the $575 million equalising payment that Mr Deripaska had to make.

That, as your Ladyship may wish to note, we deal with between paragraphs 1257 and 1276, page 722.

Fourth, Mr Abramovich will need to explain why in the second Rusal sale agreement, that's the one of July 2004, he acknowledged that he was not the beneficial owner of the 25 per cent stake, and he admitted that since 15 March 2000 Mr Patarkatsishvili had had a beneficial ownership interest of 25 per cent.

That's a topic we deal with at paragraphs 1421 to 1422 and also 1532 to 1534, page 791. I'm going to say more about these, my Lady --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, it's all very fully set out.

MR RABINOWITZ: It is, and I therefore propose to take this relatively quickly.

Now, of course, my Lady, Mr Abramovich has tried to come up with explanations for each of these contracts, and he's sought to explain why the provisions in his contracts do not mean what they in fact appear to say; he has had to, in order to defend the extreme position that he's taken in this case, that he and he alone was Mr Deripaska's partner in relation to the Rusal merger. We've analysed those various explanations at length in the written closing and your Ladyship has those.

But, of course, your Ladyship should not lose sight of the cumulative impact of all of these contractual documents because we submit that, taken in isolation, Mr Abramovich's various explanations for each of these contractual provisions look thin but, when taken cumulatively, we submit that they start to look positively skeletal.

Put another way: although it may be possible for the court to conclude that something has gone wrong with the contractual wording in relation to one particular contract, by the time one gets to the third, fourth and fifth contracts such arguments we submit become less and less realistic. We submit the much simpler and more straightforward explanation for these contracts is that, consistent with Mr Berezovsky's case, Mr Abramovich did indeed have partners who were involved in the Rusal merger with Mr Deripaska and who acquired a beneficial interest in Rusal from 15 March onwards, and Mr Abramovich was not, as he would now have it, the sole legal and beneficial owner of the 50 per cent stake in Rusal.

My Lady, I obviously have to acknowledge that none of the five contemporaneous contracts expressly name Mr Berezovsky either as one of Mr Abramovich's partners in Rusal. But we would submit that is hardly surprising given that, as revealed by the transcript of Le Bourget, it was understood and accepted as between the three men that there should be no written agreements between Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky.

For my Lady's reference, that's box 460 of the Le Bourget transcript. We've set it out at paragraph 1285 of our written closing, volume 2, page 735.

Of course, as your Ladyship will appreciate, Mr Abramovich's difficulties don't stop with the five written contracts. Mr Abramovich must also, on his case -- first, he needs to explain away the numerous passages in the Le Bourget transcript where he appears to acknowledge Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili's interest in Rusal and their entitlement to Rusal dividends, and, secondly, he must write off the Curtis notes as a forgery because the Curtis notes, as your Ladyship will recall, record Mr Patarkatsishvili telling Mr Tenenbaum that both he and Mr Berezovsky had beneficial interests in 25 per cent of Rusal, which they were contemplating selling, with no suggestion of any different view being held by Mr Tenenbaum about the position.

Now, I'll come back if I may to the Le Bourget transcript and what we say about it in the context of the Rusal claim.

Can I first just say, so far as the Curtis notes are concerned, I've already addressed your Ladyship on this and explained why we submit they are authentic and your Ladyship can rely upon those. If your Ladyship finds, as we say you should, that the Curtis notes are not a forgery and that they do reflect what was discussed between Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Tenenbaum in the presence of Mr Curtis and Mr Fomichev in August 2003, that provides extremely strong contemporaneous proof of Mr Berezovsky's case.

Again we've dealt with this, for my Lady's note, in our written closing in the context of Rusal between paragraphs 1309 and 1376. At page 749, your Ladyship will find, volume 2.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I've got it.

MR RABINOWITZ: Now, again, my Lady, Mr Abramovich's difficulties do not stop even there because it's not just the five contemporaneous contracts and the Le Bourget transcript and large sections of the Curtis notes that point against Mr Abramovich's case, there is also of course the following.

First, why it was that substantial dividend payments totalling $177.5 million were made to companies associated with Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili between 2003 and 2005 from profits made by the Rusal group.

Secondly, why it was that when Mr Abramovich came to sell up the interests in Rusal that were held by his companies he did so in not one but rather in two stages in the autumn of 2003 and the summer of 2004, and why it was that he surrendered complete control of Rusal to Mr Deripaska in the first stage.

Thirdly, Mr Abramovich will need to explain why it was that in 2004 he agreed to pay Mr Patarkatsishvili an amount of $585 million when, on his case, even on his case, the only amount which he says Mr Patarkatsishvili was entitled to was $115 million, that being the amount allegedly payable under the so-called commission agreements. He will also need to explain why it was necessary to pretend, as is his case, that this was in respect of the sale by Mr Patarkatsishvili of a beneficial ownership interest in the 25 per cent Rusal venture(?) holding.

This of course harks back to the overarching point I made when starting these submissions, that Mr Abramovich's case requires you to accept, both in the case of Sibneft and Rusal, that he was motivated to make huge payments to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili not in recognition of legal obligations arising through ownership interests, but out of what we would say, and indeed what undeniably would be the case, would be remarkable largesse on his part.

In the case of Rusal, to put it in context, the payment of $585 million, which Mr Abramovich said he agreed to pay Mr Patarkatsishvili even though the so-called commission agreements suggested an entitlement of only $115 million, would have represented some 37 per cent of the capital profits Mr Abramovich made on the Rusal transaction.

My Lady may already have done the maths, but the $585 million that Mr Abramovich says he agreed to pay Mr Patarkatsishvili for his assistance constitutes 37 per cent of the $1.578 billion Mr Abramovich says he received through the sale of Rusal to Mr Deripaska.

My Lady may think, and we would submit that your Ladyship would be right in this, that it is quite inconceivable that Mr Abramovich agreed to pay such a large share of capital profits that he would otherwise receive in consequence of his four-year investment in the aluminium industry simply because he was appreciative of the assistance Mr Patarkatsishvili had provided and the investment had been profitable.

Just as with Sibneft, we suggest that my Lady would be correct to find that the scale of the payment is attributable not to any largesse on the part of Mr Abramovich but rather to an ownership interest and dividend entitlement on the part of Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, as is evidenced by the Le Bourget transcript, the Badri proofs and the Curtis notes, as is claimed by Mr Berezovsky.

My Lady, it is a slight variation of the old adage, "follow the money". In much the same way, we submit that much light is to be thrown on where the truth in this case lies by looking at the payments made to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili -- as I've already submitted, that is one of the few non-disputed facts in this case -- and asking what the scale of those payments indicates as to the true nature of the interests held by Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili in the disputed assets.

Now, again, as your Ladyship knows, we've dealt with this in some detail in our written closing. I wasn't proposing to say very much more on them. We deal with -- well, your Ladyship has the notes. I can give your Ladyship the references if it would help but your Ladyship has the documents.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, I've got them. It's fully set out.

MR RABINOWITZ: It is.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've just got to go away and read it,

I think.

MR RABINOWITZ: Sadly for your Ladyship.

But even that is not the end of the difficulties with Mr Abramovich's case, because a further difficulty which Mr Abramovich faces, and which he must explain away, relates to the fact that the contemporaneous view of virtually all the other participants in the aluminium acquisitions, Rusal merger and Rusal sales, was that contrary to what Mr Abramovich now claims, Mr Abramovich indeed had partners that he was bringing to the merger with Mr Deripaska and who had proprietary interests in the aluminium assets that were being merged.

Again I'm not going into the detail of all these individuals but they include, of course, the original aluminium asset sellers, Mr Reuben, Mr Chernoi, Mr Anisimov and Mr Bosov, and they also include, of course, Mr Deripaska and his advisers, including Mr Bulygin and Mr Mishakov, who also did not believe that Mr Abramovich alone was the acquirer of these assets.

Significantly, they also included Mr Patarkatsishvili himself. I say that because, prior to his death, he consistently told his financial advisers, such as Mr Samuelson, in 2000, as well as Mr Berezovsky's legal representatives at the meetings between 2005 and 2007, that both he and Mr Berezovsky had acquired a 25 per cent interest, beneficial interest, in Rusal, the other 25 per cent being beneficially owned by their partner, Mr Abramovich.

Then of course, and I know your Ladyship has this, there is the meeting at the Dorchester Hotel on 13 March 2000, a meeting right at the time that the merger with Mr Deripaska was being finalised, and a meeting at which Mr Abramovich, Mr Deripaska, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were all present -- all the principals -- where, as is common ground between Mr Berezovsky and Mr Abramovich, the Rusal merger was specifically discussed. Again that's something I will come back to shortly if I may.

Now, what I propose to do is to run as briefly and quickly as possible through some of the more salient features of the Rusal claim and, if your Ladyship has the point, your Ladyship will tell me and I will move even more swiftly than I was planning to.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think -- I've read this, and obviously I've got to go back and do a lot more reading, but I'm quite interested in your submissions, if you have any to add, on issues 24 and 25.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can your Ladyship just remind me --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That's the release, the Cliren and Madison documents.

MR RABINOWITZ: In the deed of release?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: We're dealing with that, as your Ladyship knows, from paragraph 1681, page 912.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, there isn't anything else, I think we've set out all our points there. We would respectfully submit that the argument -- the reason I wasn't proposing to address your Ladyship on it is Mr Sumption said nothing about it. We have addressed all the points that the other side have made about the deed of release. In our respectful submission, the argument doesn't work at all for a number of reasons that we identify in our written closing. There was nothing I was proposing to add to that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay. I think what I would find of some assistance would be, again just in your own words: if, as you say, nothing was in writing and Mr Patarkatsishvili was authorised by Mr Berezovsky to deal with Mr Abramovich, why is it that the deed of settlement documents, although of course they don't mention Mr Berezovsky, you say, and don't involve any power of attorney on his part, why do you say that that is not Mr Berezovsky going along with Mr Patarkatsishvili's apparent signing of a deed of release?

MR RABINOWITZ: Because, my Lady, in order for that to bind Mr Berezovsky, Mr Patarkatsishvili would have needed the authority of Mr Berezovsky to deal with that as well. And Mr Berezovsky's evidence was very clear to your Ladyship, I don't know whether we've identified it here, I think we have; it was very clear, he gave your Ladyship evidence that he absolutely did not authorise Mr Patarkatsishvili to enter into any such deed of release of that sort.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm looking at paragraph 1685.

MR RABINOWITZ: Paragraph 1706, my Lady, at page 919.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, okay, thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: I think we've set the argument out very fully there.

Your Ladyship knows there's a prior point there about the effect of a deed only taking effect inter partes, but again we've set this out at paragraph 1690 and following, and in our respectful submission that again is a complete answer to the point. Indeed I have to say there is a further point which is about the construction of the deed of release --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've got that point.

MR RABINOWITZ: -- which also, in my respectful submission, is a complete answer to the point because it simply doesn't cover what has happened. That's the point we deal with at 1710 and following.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: It simply doesn't get far enough.

Can I just try and then take this as quickly -- subject to your Ladyship having any other points you specifically want me to deal with, I had better just go through as quickly as I can, just in case I ignore something, for example something Mr Sumption said that I need to address.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well.

MR RABINOWITZ: It won't take too long and if I don't finish before the short adjournment --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You're under no pressure as far as I am concerned.

MR RABINOWITZ: I just don't want to waste your Ladyship's time, that's all. I don't feel under any pressure, I just don't want to take up unnecessary time here.

My Lady, so far as the acquisition of the aluminium assets is concerned, that is in a sense the starting point for the whole Rusal issue. Again, your Ladyship has what we say set out at section N3 in detail, and the starting point for the acquisitions was of course Mr Bosov's approach in late 1999 to Mr Berezovsky asking if he might be interested in purchasing aluminium assets. That we refer to at paragraph 1092.

The approach to Mr Berezovsky (sic) resulted from contacts Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili had with Mr Lev Chernoi, Mr Anisimov, General Lebed and Mr Bykov, all of whom were key players in the Russian aluminium industry at that time. We deal with that at 1078 to 1081. Your Ladyship will recall that there was a minor dispute as to whether Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili together approached Mr Abramovich about this, or whether Mr Patarkatsishvili alone did so, but it is a notable curiosity of the case that Mr Abramovich's evidence is that the result was that he alone acquired interests in the aluminium assets.

We submit that the evidence shows that Mr Berezovsky, Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich agreed to acquire the aluminium assets in the same proportions as under the 1995 agreement, that's to say on a 50/50 basis. For my Lady's note, the relevant evidence for this is to be found in particular at paragraph 260 of Mr Berezovsky's fourth witness statement, D2, tab 17, page 251 D2/17/251, where Mr Berezovsky explained that the three men had agreed that the purchase price of the aluminium assets would be paid for from their collective entitlement to the profits generated from the Sibneft interests, and that, as with Sibneft, the interests would be subject to a 50/50 split, this being in accordance with what Mr Berezovsky says was the agreement made regarding future business interests.

Now, Mr Abramovich's counsel did not directly challenge this evidence in cross-examination and yet Mr Sumption, in his closing speech, submitted that there was nothing in the evidence that supported the allegation of any discussion in 1999 that Mr Berezovsky, Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich would share their interests in the same way as previously.

My Lady, given what Mr Berezovsky said at paragraph 260, that was with respect a rather odd submission. I say that because paragraph 260 on its face plainly does support the proposition that the parties agreed to share their interests in the usual proportions. What is more, since the parties agreed to pay for the aluminium assets out of their Sibneft profits, they clearly intended to share these assets in accordance with their usual Sibneft division.

Of course, even though, as it turned out, the parties were able to structure the deal so that no cash was in fact paid out by them, because the entire cost was covered by Mr Deripaska's balancing payment, this is obviously not something which they would have known at the time that they first agreed to move into aluminium.

Nor is there anything in the suggestion that this is all with the benefit of hindsight and that there is no evidence to suggest that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili could have paid for their share of the aluminium acquisitions out of the Sibneft profits had they been required to do so. This is a constant theme which runs through the submissions that the other parties have put in.

Now, we've addressed that particular red herring at paragraph 1549.1 of our closing submission, that's at page 857, and we've set out at some length the evidence, primarily in the form of the bolshoi balance, which indicates that the amounts that were due to and in fact paid to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili in the course of 2000 under the Sibneft arrangements would have more than covered their share of the contribution to the aluminium acquisitions.

Your Ladyship will recall, the bolshoi balance refers to Sibneft interests -- profits from the Sibneft interests in December 2000 being 900 million, and of that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili would have been entitled to, and indeed they did receive, some $450 million under those arrangements, and that would easily have been sufficient for them to pay for their share of the aluminium assets. Half of 575, or $287.5 million, and that would be so even if there hadn't been an equalisation payment.

Now, still in the context of the original acquisition of assets in 1999, your Ladyship may recall that Mr Sumption, in attempting to suggest that Mr Berezovsky was not involved in the aluminium acquisition, described Mr Berezovsky's evidence as to his involvement in the 1999 acquisition of aluminium assets as the product of what he called disparagingly the:

"... constant and palpable desire to portray himself as the central indispensable figure in every venture that he has touched."

Mr Sumption went on to say that:

"... the contrast between the pretensions and the reality is humiliating."

That was at Day 39, page 10. I would respectfully submit that that was both unfair and completely wrong.

I've already referred to the fact that it was to Mr Berezovsky and to Mr Patarkatsishvili that Mr Bosov came with his proposal that Mr Berezovsky and his partners move into aluminium, and it is, as I've already noted, common ground that in the course of 1999

Mr Berezovsky made a trip to the Krasnoyarsk region in the company of Mr Lev Chernoi and possibly also Mr Anisimov, and that, whilst there, Mr Berezovsky met with Mr Anatoly Bykov, the chairman of the board of the Krasnoyarsk plant; indeed that was Mr Abramovich's own evidence. We provided a reference to all of this at paragraph 1081 of our written closing at page 627. As your Ladyship will appreciate, those were some of the key players in the aluminium industry at the time.

There was of course also Mr Berezovsky's relationship with General Lebed who was the governor of the Krasnoyarsk region. Mr Abramovich's own evidence, that was his third witness statement, paragraph 152 E1/03/81, was that:

"It was important that General Lebed did not oppose our purchase of KrAZ since it would have been extremely difficult to establish and maintain control of the assets we purchased without local political support."

My Lady may recall the graphic evidence Mr Anisimov gave, this was at Day 31 at page 108, as to how the governor had conducted raids on the smelter and interfered with the all-important alumina supplies. He was obviously a critical person to get on board.

Mr Berezovsky also gave unchallenged evidence of his historic dealings with General Lebed. We've given references to that, paragraphs 1080 and 1081, that's at page 627 of our closing.

Indeed, your Ladyship may recall that there was also evidence about General Lebed too confirming that Mr Berezovsky was involved in the transaction. We refer to that at paragraphs 1099 and 1100. Of course, Mr Sumption, in wishing to advance his case that Mr Berezovsky had absolutely nothing to do with the aluminium acquisition, needed to try and explain away the reference to General Lebed saying that Mr Berezovsky was involved, and the way he sought to do this was to suggest that this was simply something that Mr Berezovsky would have done as Mr Abramovich's political protector, and that this did not mean that he should as a result be regarded as interested in the aluminium acquisition because, as Mr Sumption put it, he was being very handsomely paid for that without any need to give him a gift of a large interest in the aluminium industry. That was at Day 40, page 46.

Now, it was of course contrary to Mr Sumption's general case to even accept that Mr Berezovsky was involved. But, in any event, my Lady, it's rather difficult to follow Mr Sumption's point on this because, of course, on Mr Abramovich's case, the patronage that he says Mr Berezovsky was providing, the political patronage, was only in respect of Sibneft and never in respect of any other business. That was Mr Abramovich's own evidence at Day 16, page 120, lines 10 to 12, which we set out at paragraph 374.2(a) of our written closing.

So, with respect to Mr Sumption, he really can't use the political patronage argument to try and explain away Mr Berezovsky's involvement in the aluminium acquisition of late 1999.

My Lady, we submit that the only explanation for Mr Berezovsky's undoubted involvement in the aluminium acquisition is that, of course, Mr Berezovsky was indeed involved in the aluminium acquisition deal, contrary to the impression that Mr Abramovich and his witnesses, especially Mr Shvidler, have sought to give.

Now, this of course is what led to the making of the 10 February master agreement and that's a document which, for the reasons we've set out at paragraph 1103 and following of our written closing, that's page 637, is very difficult to square with Mr Abramovich's case that he and he alone acquired the aluminium assets.

Your Ladyship may recall that, when dealing with the 10 February 2000 master agreement, Mr Sumption described this document -- he called it a home-made statement of intent. That was at Day 40, page 9.

In our respectful submission, it was plainly much more than that. It was a document which was deliberately drafted in and intended to have legal effect, and indeed it was the subject of three amending protocols, all also in legal form and executed by each of the parties, none of which is consistent with it being written off simply as a home-made statement of intent, as Mr Sumption sought to do. We refer to those many protocols at paragraph 1150 of our written closing.

Your Ladyship will recall that the 10 February 2000 master agreement identified both Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Shvidler, together with a number of offshore companies, as being within the definition of party 1 purchasers, which of course presents a problem for Mr Abramovich's case that he and he alone invested in the aluminium assets.

My Lady will find the implausible nature of Mr Abramovich's and Mr Shvidler's answers in cross-examination, when they attempted to deal with the party 1 problem, dealt with at paragraphs 1108 to 1112 of our written closing. That's volume 2, page 637. I'm not proposing to go into those now.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No.

MR RABINOWITZ: Now, the other point to make about the original acquisition of the aluminium assets is that each of the vendors believed that they were selling to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili. Again, my Lady, we've set out at paragraphs 1118 to 1139 of our written closing, that's at page 642, why we say that each of the vendors have acknowledged or given evidence that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili acquired the aluminium assets, and, again, I'm not proposing to go through all that again.

I do need to say something about the position of Mr Chernoi -- sorry, Mr Lev Chernoi because Mr Sumption sought to suggest, in effect, that your Ladyship should not be concerned with the evidence that there was about Lev Chernoi's belief about this. This evidence is to be found first in the various press cuttings that we refer to in which Mr Chernoi, or his statement, refer to the people to whom he was selling the assets as the group of Sibneft shareholders. We've set those out at paragraphs 1126 to 1128, page 647 of our closing.

But there is also the evidence of Mr Michael Chernoi.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: Your Ladyship will recollect that there was a witness statement served for Mr Chernoi in which he explained -- this was at paragraph 23 -- that his brother had told him that when he referred to the Sibneft owners he understood Mr Berezovsky to be among them. Now, your Ladyship may recall that Mr Sumption suggested to you that you should ignore this because, they suggested, no plausible reason -- that's what he said -- was given for Mr Chernoi not attending to give evidence. That was Day 40, page 19. This, with respect, was simply not correct.

My Lady, the position is fully set out in a letter of 20 October 2011 from Mr Chernoi's solicitor Decherts, which was provided on that day to Mr Abramovich's solicitors which, for your Ladyship's note, is to be found at bundle L(2011) 29/180 to 182 L(2011)29/180. That explained that Mr Chernoi was not willing to devote the considerable time which would be needed for him to prepare to give evidence to the court but that, in addition, a further and powerful factor was that he wished to avoid the disadvantage which might arise from exposing himself to cross-examination in circumstances where at that time he had no way of knowing whether Mr Deripaska, against whom he was litigating in his own case this year, would also turn up to give evidence. This was, it is submitted, a perfectly reasonable fear for Mr Chernoi to have. Indeed, of course, Mr Berezovsky couldn't require Mr Chernoi to give evidence given his absence from the jurisdiction.

It's respectfully submitted that Mr Chernoi's evidence as to his brother's understanding in 2000, consistent as it is with contemporaneous newspaper reports, is a matter to which my Lady can give some weight.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Why couldn't he give evidence by video-link? That was because of the impending trial against Deripaska?

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed. He at this stage didn't know whether Mr Deripaska would turn up to give evidence or not.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What's the relevance of that?

MR RABINOWITZ: He didn't want to be cross-examined in a way which would expose him to points when his own trial came --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What does that have to do with whether Mr Deripaska turns up or not?

MR RABINOWITZ: The view he might have taken was that, if Mr Deripaska was going to do this, then he could see why he should do it as well. But he didn't know at that stage that Mr Deripaska was going to do it and he was concerned that he would do it, Mr Deripaska would then not do it and he would have been at a disadvantage. Of course, we plainly couldn't compel him to do it, to give evidence because he was outside the jurisdiction.

My Lady, there is also Mr Bosov about whom I should also say something. Mr Bosov said, as your Ladyship may recall, in his witness statement something about wishing to claim commission from Mr Berezovsky arising out of the 1999 aluminium acquisitions. Your Ladyship may also recall that his comments in the press, including an interview he gave with Vedomosti in January 2008, had him saying that he regarded Mr Berezovsky with Mr Patarkatsishvili as having been an acquirer of the aluminium assets.

Now, we have that set out at paragraph 1131.3 of our written closing, page 650. Your Ladyship will recall that Mr Bosov was not in the event called by Mr Abramovich. We have already made the point in our written closing as to the adverse inference that we say should be called in relation to Mr Bosov. It's plain, we submit, that had he been called he would have given evidence totally contrary to Mr Abramovich's case and that is why he wasn't.

Now, there is then also Mr Anisimov. I think we have set out what we say about him at paragraphs 1133 to 1140 of our closing submissions and about his knowledge.

That then brings us to the Patarkatsishvili proofing materials. In our respectful submission, the Patarkatsishvili proofing materials, in the context of Rusal, constitute an important piece of evidence relating to the acquisition of the aluminium assets which is completely consistent with Mr Berezovsky's case and utterly undermines Mr Abramovich's case.

Mr Sumption in fact had to concede -- this was at Day 40, page 19, he said:

"Mr Patarkatsishvili's interview notes undoubtedly do, as I acknowledge, suggest that by 2005, at any rate, Mr Patarkatsishvili believed himself and Mr Berezovsky to have had an interest in the KrAZ and Bratsk assets, corresponding to their shares in Sibneft."

In fact, my Lady, Mr Patarkatsishvili's belief about his and Mr Berezovsky's interests in the aluminium assets has been consistent and predates 2005 by a considerable margin. What Mr Patarkatsishvili told the solicitors consistently between 2005 and 2007 is, of course, of a piece with other evidence of Mr Patarkatsishvili telling third parties that he and Mr Berezovsky were both interested in the aluminium assets with Mr Abramovich. I include in this the evidence of Dr Nosova and Mr Jenni to this effect, the instructions he gave to Mr Samuelson on Valmet in the course of 2000 and, of course, the Curtis notes in 2003.

Your Ladyship has all of this dealt with, together with references to the key documents, at paragraph 1145, volume 2, page 663, and also between paragraphs 1277 and 1282 of our written closing, volume 2, page 733.

The main response of Mr Sumption to what I would suggest is rather a great deal of evidence pointing in favour of Mr Berezovsky's case about who were the buyers in relation to the 1999 aluminium assets was to point to the commission agreements or protocols which purported to have been concluded with Mr Patarkatsishvili as an agent for the undisclosed intermediary. Your Ladyship will recall this.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: Mr Sumption referred to this at Day 40, page 9. Just for your Ladyship's note, the translation of the commission agreement -- I'm not suggesting you turn that up now -- can be found at H(E)1/7, at 7 to 10 H(E)1/7.

Your Ladyship may recall that Mr Sumption asserted that these agreements referred to Mr Patarkatsishvili as an intermediary and facilitator and, on this basis, he asserted that this therefore must have been the true and only role played by Mr Patarkatsishvili in the acquisition of the aluminium assets. We would respectfully submit that that assertion is misconceived. As my Lady will recall, Ms Panchenko accepted, as indeed she had to, that the documents did not accurately or genuinely reflect whatever agreement had been made.

Indeed it was obvious that the agreements were a sham since, despite being produced after the agreement to acquire aluminium assets in February 2000, the agreements purported to have been produced at some different time and suggested that the parties had no knowledge at all whether or not any aluminium acquisition would result. They were plainly a sham.

A further point, my Lady, is that it's clear that it is accepted that those documents were never actually acted upon, reinforcing the sham nature of these agreements. My Lady may recall that your Ladyship actually asked Mr Abramovich about whether they were acted upon and he acknowledged that no payment was ever made under these documents which were really just produced and then, it appears, ignored.

Given the general willingness, my Lady --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Why does the fact that a payment wasn't made under an agreement mean that it's a sham? It may mean that the parties subsequently decided not to exercise their rights under the agreement? There was evidence, wasn't there, from Mr Abramovich that Mr Patarkatsishvili didn't press because he thought he'd get more and that was right?

MR RABINOWITZ: That's what he said but if your Ladyship looks through all the documents --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I don't see why it's just a sham because you don't necessarily enforce an agreement at the time.

MR RABINOWITZ: It's not just because of that, my Lady. Had someone tried to act upon it, that would suggest it was a genuine agreement. I accept that it doesn't follow necessarily from the converse that it is a sham but the starting point is the evidence given by Ms Panchenko which in effect shows that these were not genuine agreements. Allied to that is the fact that they were never acted upon. They seem to have been made and, insofar as we can tell, put into a file of documents, together with the explanatory note, intended to be shown to an Austrian bank, Kathrein & Co, with a view to opening up an account there.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: This was the agreement that was notarised, was it?

MR RABINOWITZ: This was the agreement that was notarised. They got that notarised, they seemed to have been put into this box of documents which were intended to be shown to an Austrian bank and in effect forgotten about. Because it's not just that they didn't act upon it, my Lady. Your Ladyship will recall that, even on Mr Abramovich's case, even on his case, when he says he came to pay Mr Patarkatsishvili, the payment which he made had nothing to do with the suggested amount in the commission agreements. It bore no relationship to that.

As your Ladyship will recall, the maximum amount that the commission agreements talked about I think was $115 million. In fact, on Mr Abramovich's case, he paid Mr Patarkatsishvili for his services $585 million. It's impossible, I would respectfully submit, to reconcile the two. That, again, reinforces the notion that these agreements were a sham. They were created in order to be shown to a bank in order to justify payments which were going to be made to Mr Patarkatsishvili and indeed to Mr Berezovsky as well, as it turns out, to deal with, for example, the aeroplane. Your Ladyship will recall the evidence about the Bili company and its opening accounts.

Now, the other point I think to make about this is we would respectfully submit --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just a second, Mr Rabinowitz. The aeroplane, remind me, was the aeroplane a gift on top of the 585 or was the money given to pay for the aeroplane? I can't remember.

MR RABINOWITZ: It was on top of. Your Ladyship will recall, the evidence was -- and I don't think this was disputed -- that at the Dorchester meeting, March 13 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I remember that.

MR RABINOWITZ: -- for some reason or other, Mr Abramovich does not dispute this, he agreed to give Mr Patarkatsishvili an aeroplane.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So it wasn't that he was given the money to buy it? There was 585 plus the aeroplane?

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed.

Now, so far as the attempt by Mr Sumption to try and rely on the commission agreement to tell the court precisely what it was that Mr Patarkatsishvili was doing and exactly what his role was, in our respectful submission, given the general willingness of Mr Abramovich and his team to produce false documents, that's to say documents evidencing transactions that were intended to create a false impression of the transaction concluded, and I have in mind in this, your Ladyship will recall, the ORT documentation, Mr Gorodilov's suggestion, the younger Gorodilov's suggestion was, your Ladyship will recall, to produce an offshore sale of $10 million and then an option agreement of $140 million.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: That had nothing to do with the true nature of that transaction.

Then of course there was the Rusal second sale documentation. Mr Abramovich's own case there is that he produced false documents, that's to say documents -- this is his case, not ours -- documents which suggested that Mr Patarkatsishvili was the beneficial owner. Now, it's difficult to see why he should say the commission agreement correctly states Mr Patarkatsishvili's position and the Rusal second sale agreement doesn't.

With respect to Mr Sumption, that point really doesn't carry very much weight.

Then of course one also has the various Devonia documents prepared by Ms Khudyk to justify the payment, again suggesting transactions which didn't actually take place. And given all this, it really hardly lies in Mr Abramovich's mouth, or indeed Mr Sumption's, to say that because there was here a sham document produced that suggested that Mr Patarkatsishvili was just an agent, that this definitively establishes that this is all Mr Patarkatsishvili was.

Now, my Lady, I've already made the point that it is relevant that the sham commission agreements -- or commission agreements, I'll stop using the word "sham", it's our submission that they're sham; the commission agreements were found together with the explanatory note. Your Ladyship will recall the explanatory note. That made clear that, in addition to the payments to be made under the commission agreements, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili actually had an interest in the aluminium assets.

So you have the commission agreements, found together with this note which refer to the commission agreements but also say that they have an interest in the aluminium assets themselves. In our respectful submission, that also makes it very difficult for Mr Sumption simply to say: here are these commission agreements, they tell you the true story.

The fact that those commission agreements were found, as they were, in a box of documents all concerned with the opening of an account at an Austrian bank, Kathrein & Co, in our respectful submission really identifies the real purpose of those agreements.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Where do you deal with this, please?

MR RABINOWITZ: At paragraph 1227 and following of our written closing we deal with -- page 702 deals with the point about the Kathrein & Co documents, and the sham nature of the agreements --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, what I'm really looking for is where do you deal with the note that was found with the commission agreements?

MR RABINOWITZ: Paragraph 1227 and following, it's at page 708. It goes all the way through to and including paragraph 1243 where your Ladyship can see we've quoted from the explanatory note which identifies the fact that certainly the maker of the note thought that the partners had an interest in the aluminium complex.

We've highlighted the relevant extracts there.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. Thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: So that is what I was proposing to say about the commission agreement and Mr Sumption's reliance on that.

Can I then turn next to deal with Mr Deripaska and the Dorchester Hotel, the merger with Mr Deripaska and the Dorchester Hotel meeting. Mr Sumption submitted at Day 40, page 22, he said that if Mr Berezovsky didn't have an interest in the KrAZ and Bratsk assets then it is hardly realistic for him to be suggesting that he had a share in the merged business. That was Mr Sumption's admission.

My Lady, that would seem to be a perfectly reasonable point. If we didn't have any interest in the assets, then one can see why it would be reasonably argued that we really were unlikely to have acquired an interest in Rusal. But of course the converse is also true. If your Ladyship forms the view that we did have an interest in the underlying assets, then it would seem to follow that it is extremely unlikely that we wouldn't also have had an interest in Rusal when those assets were combined with those owned by Mr Deripaska to form that company.

That then brings me on to the Dorchester Hotel meeting. We deal with that at section N5, pages 684 and following.

There are three introductory points to make in relation to the Dorchester Hotel issue, and we've covered this in detail, my Lady. The first introductory point is that, on Mr Abramovich's case, the Dorchester meeting was, we submit, the most remarkable coincidence.

Mr Abramovich would have the court believe that, although he and Mr Deripaska and their respective teams had been in London negotiating the Rusal merger between 7 and 12 March, and although they executed the share purchase and sale agreement on 15 March, very shortly after the Dorchester meeting, in the presence he says of both Mr Abramovich and Mr Deripaska, two men who did not know each other well, accompanied by Mr Shvidler who had led the negotiations for Mr Abramovich in relation to the deal, a meeting in London with Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky on 13 March at which, as is common ground between Mr Abramovich and Mr Berezovsky, the Rusal deal was discussed, is little more than an amazing coincidence entirely unrelated to the Rusal sale.

In our respectful submission that is simply incredible.

The second introductory point is that Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler and Mr Deripaska have all plainly worked hard to deny what really happened on that day. I have addressed my Lady on the dressing gown allegation, I'm not going to repeat those submissions. The significant point for present purposes is that Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler and Mr Deripaska were plainly so concerned about the truth of the meeting -- a meeting which, if Mr Berezovsky's evidence is accepted, will hurt Mr Deripaska in his litigation with Mr Chernoi as much as it will harm Mr Abramovich in these proceedings -- that they came up with an added but, we submit, wholly fabricated detail of the meeting in an attempt to show that no serious business was conducted there.

The third and final introductory point about the Dorchester meeting is simply to remind my Lady of what we would submit was the great difficulty that Mr Abramovich and his witnesses had in explaining how it was that the Dorchester meeting took place at all, and why it was that if Mr Berezovsky really had no interest or involvement in the acquisition of the aluminium assets, Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler and Mr Deripaska would all have been willing, at very short notice, to fly to London to meet with Mr Berezovsky having been told by Mr Patarkatsishvili that Mr Berezovsky wished to talk about the transaction.

Again, your Ladyship has the relevant references set out at paragraphs 1183 and following of our written closing, that's page 683. We also deal with this at paragraphs 474 and 475 of our written opening, volume 1, page 311.

Generally, my Lady, just sort of pausing here to consider the issue whether or not Mr Berezovsky did indeed have an interest in Rusal following the merger which was discussed at the Dorchester meeting, my Lady may recall that in his oral closing Mr Sumption told the court that Mr Berezovsky's written closing on the Rusal aspect of this case he said is based almost entirely on what is at best circumstantial evidence, most of it dating from much later, and also on documents suggesting that persons who in most cases had no particular means of knowing the truth were assuming that Mr Berezovsky did have an interest in Rusal. That was at Day 40, page 45.

With respect to Mr Sumption, that was a wholly incorrect submission. There is, I would suggest, a wealth of evidence that would support Mr Berezovsky's Rusal case.

First, of course, your Ladyship has the evidence of both Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili both as to what was discussed at the Dorchester Hotel meeting and, more generally, as to their having an interest in Rusal.

As regards Mr Berezovsky's evidence as to what was discussed at that meeting, for your Ladyship's notes, that's referred to at paragraph 1213 of our written closing, page 701. As regards Mr Patarkatsishvili's evidence of what was discussed at the Dorchester meeting, I've already reminded your Ladyship of the summary evidence of Ms Duncan and Mr McKim.

My Lady, the second reason why Mr Sumption's point was a bad one, quite apart from the direct evidence of Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, and the contemporaneous contracts I've mentioned, all of which refer to Mr Abramovich having partners or there being other selling shareholders, is of course because there is the Le Bourget transcript which, as your Ladyship will recall, took place in December 2000 and is, therefore, in my respectful submission, very much contemporaneous evidence as to what the position was with regard to the aluminium assets.

I've already addressed my Lady on the significance generally of the Le Bourget transcript. Mr Sumption, when he made his submissions to your Ladyship -- this was at Day 40, page 49 -- told you that the only significance of the Le Bourget transcript in relation to Rusal was, he said, the use of the word "we" in reference to the 50 per cent holding which your Ladyship has at box 502.

My Lady, even leaving aside Mr Abramovich's complete inability to give an adequate explanation of why he consistently referred to "we", which certainly appeared to include Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky when talking about ownership or control of the Rusal interests, this, with respect, completely misstates the significance of the Le Bourget transcript.

In the first place, my Lady, it is important to bear in mind, when considering the Le Bourget transcript and what it tells us about the aluminium interests, that it is of course Mr Abramovich's case that Mr Berezovsky had absolutely nothing to do with Rusal. That's his starting point. If that is right, why then was Mr Berezovsky raising the question of Rusal with Mr Abramovich at the Le Bourget meeting at all? On Mr Abramovich's version of events, Mr Berezovsky would have had no basis at all for asking to be made a formal shareholder in Rusal, which is what he did ask, or indeed for anything whatever to do with Rusal.

And if Mr Abramovich's version of events was correct, one would have expected Mr Abramovich's reaction to Mr Berezovsky raising Rusal, and the recognition for him of a formal shareholding in Rusal, in a fairly dismissive if polite way.

What one has instead is not Mr Abramovich saying to Mr Berezovsky "What on earth are you talking about?", what he in fact says in response when Mr Berezovsky raises the topic of Rusal is consistent only with Mr Abramovich regarding and treating Mr Berezovsky as a co-owner. This can be seen, my Lady, most clearly perhaps from two passages. Your Ladyship may recall box 500 where Mr Abramovich tells Mr Berezovsky:

"You cannot do anything with Aluminium, that's for sure."

In other words, they're discussing whether they can recognise their rights in relation to aluminium, and Mr Abramovich says to him, "You can't do anything with Aluminium, that's for sure." And the reason he gives is in box 502, he says:

"We only hold 50 per cent there [that is at Rusal], so the other party has to agree [about formally legalising their interests]."

Mr Abramovich has been able to provide no explanation at all for why Mr Berezovsky should have been asking about legalising his Rusal interests, nor indeed why he considered he had anything to do with Rusal.

It is, we would submit, also fair to say that Mr Sumption also made no serious attempt to grapple with the other obvious difficulty posed by the Le Bourget transcript, namely the passage at box 504 where Mr Abramovich tells Mr Berezovsky, with whom he's speaking at this point, and this is in relation to Rusal:

"... you will have to wait in line for dividends" --

Sorry:

"... you will have to wait in line to receive dividends."

For my Lady's notes, that's E6.1, page 173/4 E6/01/173.

My Lady, why would Mr Berezovsky have any interest in dividends from Rusal if, as Mr Abramovich says, he had nothing whatever to do with the aluminium interests at all? Why would he have to wait in line for dividends from Rusal? There would have been no basis for him to stand in that line at all.

We've dealt with these points in relation to Le Bourget very fully at paragraphs 1287 to 1289, page 737 and following of our closing, my Lady. I'm not going to repeat them all now.

There is, however, also just one further point in relation to Le Bourget. Your Ladyship will recall boxes 37 and 38, E6, tab 1, page 13 and 14 E6/01/13, your Ladyship will recall the reference in those to 30 million being due to Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky from aluminium.

That again raises the question for Mr Abramovich as to why this would have been mentioned if neither Mr Berezovsky nor indeed Mr Patarkatsishvili had anything to do with Rusal. We've considered that again at paragraphs 288 to 293, volume 1, page 193.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: Again, just to make this point, it was of course only nine months after the Dorchester Hotel meeting that the Le Bourget meeting took place. Indeed it was before Rusal was formally formed, which took place late in December, so that is very contemporaneous evidence indeed.

My Lady, the third reason why we submit that Mr Sumption's suggestion that there is nothing other than noncontemporaneous circumstantial evidence involving people who would not know the true position to support the existence of Mr Patarkatsishvili's and Mr Berezovsky's Rusal interests is wrong is of course because of the Curtis notes, and I've already addressed your Ladyship on those notes and I don't propose to do so again.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, fine.

MR RABINOWITZ: Paragraph 1369 and following is where we deal with that.

Then of course there is, on this same point, the payment of the dividends from Rusal profits. Your Ladyship will recall the dividend of $177.5 million paid to Rich Brown out of the profits of the Rusal group, and the fact that when Rusal came to be sold Mr Abramovich had to do so in two stages.

Can I just mention that, go into that in a little more detail, the question of the stages of the Rusal sale because, in our respectful submission, that also is key evidence in relation to the Rusal issue.

It will not have been lost on your Ladyship that in his closing speech Mr Sumption made barely any reference at all to the sale of the first Rusal tranche. That's the one I want to focus on for the moment, the sale of the first Rusal tranche in the autumn of 2003. Your Ladyship will recall that there are -- I'm just going to give your Ladyship the reference to where we deal with this because it may help your Ladyship.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Paragraph 1377?

MR RABINOWITZ: 1377 and following, that's correct, my Lady.

Your Ladyship may recall that there were irreconcilable differences, we would submit, between the evidence of Mr Abramovich and Mr Deripaska as to the circumstances of the sale and, more particularly, as to why Mr Deripaska only acquired half of the holding registered in Mr Abramovich's name at this time.

Mr Deripaska's evidence in February 2008 in his litigation with Mr Chernoi was that he had, in 2003, made an offer for the whole of Mr Abramovich's 50 per cent stake but was told that only 25 per cent was available.

Your Ladyship will also recall that this was completely inconsistent with Mr Abramovich's evidence that he and Mr Deripaska reached an agreement in the summer of 2003 relating to the sale of the whole of Mr Abramovich's 50 per cent stake in Rusal but agreed to structure it in two stages because Mr Deripaska did not have sufficient funds available. We deal with that at 1383 to 1386 of our written closing.

Now, the other aspect of this, your Ladyship will also recall Mr Deripaska's evidence was also consistent with what was said by Mr Abramovich's own spokesman. That's a point we deal with at paragraph 1400, subparagraph 1, at page 781. He also said that only 50 per cent was sold because there were other people with interests in the other 50 per cent. But it's not only Mr Deripaska's evidence in the Chernoi litigation that is impossible to reconcile with Mr Abramovich's case as to what occurred in 2003. Your Ladyship will recall the documents, which evidenced the transaction itself whereby Mr Abramovich and Mr Deripaska's lawyers set out the agreement, suggest that what Mr Abramovich told the court about the deal done with Mr Deripaska in 2003 is simply not true. That we've dealt with at paragraph 1377 and following, that's page 773. Your Ladyship will recall those agreements. There was an option agreement; it was impossible, we would submit, to reconcile that with what Mr Abramovich was saying he had in fact agreed.

There really is just the common sense point about this. If Mr Abramovich really was entitled to dispose of the whole of his Rusal tranche in 2003, it is, we submit, really difficult to understand why, commercially, he would only have disposed of half of that stake. In circumstances where that would leave him at the mercy of a businessman, Mr Deripaska, whom even Mr Abramovich said liked to squeeze his partners. It just does not make sense at all, why Mr Abramovich would do that if he could have done anything different.

That, of course, is why Mr Abramovich had to come up with the story of having disposed of the whole of his stake and fixed the price for it in the summer of 2003 because he also recognised the commercial incoherence of only having disposed of half of it, leaving him as an unprotected minority in a company controlled by Mr Deripaska. In our respectful submission, once your Ladyship concludes, as your Ladyship must, that Mr Abramovich's story about 2003 is bogus, which it undoubtedly is, that really exposes the thinness of his whole case in relation to Rusal.

Now, can I then just say something about the sale of the second Rusal tranche.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: Under that tranche, of course, sale documentation was entered into that provided that, contrary to Mr Abramovich's case, Mr Patarkatsishvili and not Mr Abramovich had been the beneficial shareholder of the 25 per cent interest since March 2000. Again, we've dealt with this in our written closing, page 788 and following, that's paragraph 1418 and following. My Lady may recall that, in his oral closing, Mr Sumption suggested that the documents relating to the second Rusal sale do not assist Mr Berezovsky. We would submit that they do for the reasons we've set out in our written closing but, on any view, they certainly do not assist Mr Abramovich because they demonstrate that a number of people who were involved in the second Rusal sale transaction understood that (a) Mr Abramovich was not the beneficial owner of the remaining 25 per cent stake in Rusal, (b) that there was at least one, if not two other persons described variously as "BB" or "B plus B" or "B1 and B2", "X and Y", who were beneficially interested in that 25 per cent stake in Rusal, and (c) that at least some people regarded or understood Mr Abramovich was in a trustee and/or fiduciary relationship with those other parties.

Now, whatever Mr Abramovich and the Chancery defendants may now seek to suggest, to the effect that that understanding arose because of newspaper reports, in our respectful submission, that is simply not a tenable suggestion. It's perfectly obvious that the understanding of a number of these representatives was ultimately derived, as one would expect in a transaction of this scale and magnitude, from instructions received from the various principals involved in the transaction and, in particular, the understanding of Mr Deripaska and Mr Patarkatsishvili.

That this was so can perhaps be most readily seen from the fact that Mr Hauser uses the language of advice when setting out his understanding of the factual background in his 9 June 2000 memorandum and the fact that, as he admitted in the course of his cross-examination, the information set out in that memorandum and others like it was not based solely on the newspaper reports. Again, for my Lady's notes, as your Ladyship has probably picked up, we cover this between paragraph 1441 and 1443 of our written closing, page 802.

I think I said 9 June 2000; it's 9 June 2004 for Mr Hauser's memo.

My Lady, perhaps most significantly so far as concerns the second Rusal sale and the final contractual documentation executed by Mr Abramovich is the deed of acknowledgement in which Mr Abramovich openly acknowledged that he was not and never had been the beneficial owner of the last 25 per cent tranche of Rusal and that the beneficial ownership of that tranche was vested in whomever Mr Patarkatsishvili said it was vested in.

The language of the deed of acknowledgement on this point is so clear that, for once, not even Mr Abramovich can seek to argue that something has gone wrong with the contractual wording or that it should be read subject to some Russian tradition or business understanding. Mr Abramovich is therefore reduced to arguing that he was prepared knowingly to put his name to a false document and that he was a willing party to a money-laundering scheme designed to deceive western banks and to transfer millions into western bank accounts.

What is therefore notable about this, my Lady, is that Mr Abramovich would rather admit to being a participant in that dishonest scheme rather than to admit the truth, which is altogether more straightforward and which is reflected in much of the other evidence to which I've referred, including for example the Curtis notes, Le Bourget and Mr Patarkatsishvili's proof of evidence. That is that Mr Abramovich never was the sole beneficial owner of the 25 per cent stake in Rusal but rather that he held that stake for and on behalf of Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili.

My Lady, that is all I was proposing to say about the purely factual issues. As I say, they are set out in great detail.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you. They've been very comprehensively set out.

MR RABINOWITZ: I was going to move on to deal very shortly with some of the legal issues but perhaps I can return to it --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: After the break, at 2 o'clock. Very well. 2 o'clock.

(12.58 pm)

(The short adjournment)

(2.00 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, can I say something about the choice of law issues relating to Rusal. For my Lady's note, we deal with this in our written closing at volume 2, page 872 and following, paragraphs 1573 and following. This is again an important issue in the context of the Dorchester meeting and indeed Rusal generally because, as your Lady knows, we submit that English law applies to the arrangements in relation to Rusal, indeed that it was expressly agreed, and that is the matter of some dispute.

My Lady, on the question of whether there was in fact an agreement that English law should apply, your Ladyship of course has direct evidence relating to that from Mr Berezovsky who told the court that he, Mr Patarkatsishvili, and Mr Abramovich discussed the use of English or British law both in advance of the Dorchester meeting and indeed at the Dorchester meeting itself, but there is here the usual conflict in the evidence between the parties.

Mr Sumption in closing chose to describe

Mr Berezovsky's evidence about what happened at the Dorchester Hotel meeting in relation to the agreement to apply English law as "ridiculous". Again, I would submit there was no basis at all for such an overblown submission.

There are three observations that we would make in relation to this, my Lady. First, Mr Sumption sought to persuade the court, as did Mr Abramovich's other leading counsels before him in the course of the strike-out application, that Mr Berezovsky had somehow changed his case on the governing law of Rusal arrangements. And again, as your Ladyship knows, we say that's simply not right. We've set out the details of that, paragraph 1590, page 877 and following and I'm not going to repeat --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, it's all set out there.

MR RABINOWITZ: It is.

We also submit, secondly, my Lady, just considering the whole circumstance and what is likely to have happened at the Dorchester meeting, your Ladyship will recall that the whole discussion at the Dorchester meeting would obviously have involved, we submit, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili being filled in on where matters had reached following the earlier discussions that had taken place between Mr Abramovich,

Mr Shvidler and Mr Deripaska. It's a point we've made previously, but if in light of that Mr Patarkatsishvili, or indeed anyone else, had asked or provided a summary of what had been agreed, given what was agreed in the preliminary agreement a few days earlier about English law, it's difficult to see why that summary would not have included words to the effect such as "We've also agreed that our merger relations will be governed by English law", because that is precisely what clause 14 of the preliminary agreement said.

Now, the third point we make here is to remind your Ladyship that Mr Berezovsky's evidence about the parties agreeing English law is in fact evidence he gave at a time before any disclosure by Mr Abramovich of the mass of documentation was given which is all consistent with it.

The point is this: my Lady should know that Mr Berezovsky recorded in a second witness statement at paragraph 77 that it had been explained at the Dorchester meeting that all the merger arrangements would be governed by English law. That statement was served in July 2009 although it was in fact in materially identical terms to a version served in mid-April 2009. The only difference between the versions was the deletion of an accidental reference to a draft witness statement in the first version. So Mr Berezovsky was saying this about English law applying in mid-April 2009.

At that time, that's to say in mid-April 2009, Mr Berezovsky had obtained a copy of the 10 February 2000 agreement which, of course, did not contain any English governing law provision, but what he had not at that time obtained was the preliminary agreement of early March 2000 which did contain an English choice of law provision. He had not yet been provided with the 15 March agreements which also contained English law provisions. He didn't have at that stage the 15 May agreement which also contained English choice of law provisions and, of course, your Ladyship will recall that those were the contracts by which the aluminium assets were merged.

Those were disclosed by Mr Abramovich under cover of Mr Mitchard's third witness statement which was only served on 19 June 2009. That, your Ladyship can see, at paragraph 56 of Mitchard 3, which is at J2/2.11, page 208 J2/2.11/208.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: So, my Lady, far from it being

Mr Abramovich's evidence -- sorry, Mr Berezovsky's evidence being ridiculous, what Mr Abramovich's case involves, your Ladyship, to conclude, is that in effect Mr Berezovsky made a very lucky guess when he said, "Oh, we agreed that English law could be applied", a lucky guess which was, as it turns out, supported by all the other documents which were subsequently produced which he didn't have in his possession.

We respectfully submit that your Ladyship should not conclude Mr Berezovsky made a lucky guess here. The fact that all of these documents also contain English choice of law provisions is very strong evidence that that is what the parties had in mind should be the law which governed the Rusal relations.

As for the circumstantial evidence supportive of Mr Berezovsky's recollection, we submit that the evidence about this is overwhelming. We've listed it out for my Lady's note at paragraph 1581, page 874, starting at 1581 and going all the way to 1592 of our written closing.

As your Ladyship will see from that, that evidence includes, for example, first the evidence of Mr Abramovich's increasing use of non-Russian law structures, more particularly the creation in late 1999 of the Cypriot trust through which he held his interests in Sibneft, and the 12 contracts through which Mr Abramovich's companies effected the necessary transfers, each of which had an English choice of law provision. We've given references to that at paragraph 1089, page 630.

There are also the ten dual language share purchase and sale agreements which were executed at around the same time as the 10 February master agreement relating to the aluminium assets, and again, my Lady has that identified at paragraphs 1148 to 1151 of our written closing, page 666.

Then, thirdly, there is the preliminary agreement which, as your Ladyship will recall, also contained an English choice of law provision. Now, again, that's dealt with at 1158 to 1182 of our written closing, page 671. And the relevant clause, clause 14 is, we would submit, strongly indicative of the approach that Russian businessmen generally, and indeed the investors in Rusal in particular, took to the question of the governing law at this time.

My Lady, the fact that the businessmen at that meeting, that's to say the meeting at the Kempinski which I think then carried on at Mr Abramovich's house, the fact that the businessmen at that meeting themselves concluded that an English choice of law provision should be included indicates, we would submit, that Russian businessmen worried about these things, and indeed discussed and agreed them even when lawyers were not present. It also indicates the high regard that Russian businessmen quite properly had for English law at that time, and their knowledge that they needed to expressly deal with the question of choice of law by including a provision to that effect in their agreements.

In our respectful submission, my Lady, if this was a matter which would be sufficient to be addressed by the parties at the Kempinski Hotel meeting there is no reason at all why it would also not have been addressed by very similar parties at the Dorchester Hotel meeting very shortly thereafter.

Now, a fourth matter which your Ladyship may regard as relevant in this context --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, Mr Berezovsky wasn't at the Kempinski, was he?

MR RABINOWITZ: No, he was (sic), but the others were. And that was really the point I was about to come on to, because they were all content with English law provisions, they were agreeing them there. Mr Berezovsky, as your Ladyship will recall, the evidence is that he comes to the Dorchester meeting having just been in the House of Lords dealing with the Forbes litigation. And the evidence he has given to your Ladyship is as to how impressed he had come to be with the English legal process. He just thought English law and the English legal process was the bee's knees.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Had he just won in the House of Lords or was it just the argument?

MR RABINOWITZ: I think it was just the argument. I think among the things that impressed him was the bowing and the politeness and the fact that it appeared there was going to be a fair hearing, which may not have been something he was entirely used to.

In those circumstances, where Mr Berezovsky had just spent the morning in the House of Lords attending his jurisdiction battle there, if someone had mentioned the fact that they had agreed to English law to govern the future of merger relations between the Abramovich group and the Deripaska group it would, I suggest, have been entirely unsurprising that Mr Berezovsky would also have readily agreed that English law should govern internal legal relations of the Abramovich group.

This circumstantial evidence, which we submit is strongly supportive of Mr Berezovsky's actual recollection, is, as your Ladyship appreciates, the same evidence as that which would in any event support an implied or imputed choice of law under the Hague and/or Rome Conventions. Again, we've set out all this for your Ladyship at paragraphs 1590 through to 1636, page 879.

So that is why we say, even if your Ladyship were to conclude that there were no express discussion of choice of law at the Dorchester Hotel meeting, then that does not matter because English law would be the applicable law in any event. That's under Articles 5 to 7 of the Hague Convention.

Now, finally in relation to the claim against Mr Abramovich, your Ladyship will have seen that we deal with our submissions on the law and the resolution of the Rusal issues in some detail at section O in volume 2 of our written closing. Again, I wasn't proposing to repeat those submissions here.

The very short version is that if my Lady is with us on the facts of Rusal, and in particular that Mr Abramovich was not acting alone but that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were his joint venture partners in relation to Rusal, and that their relationship was expressly or impliedly governed by English law, then much as one might expect, there will be no legal impediment to Mr Berezovsky succeeding in his claim. That's what it will come to. There is certainly no legal argument why, if the facts are in his favour, he would nonetheless not succeed.

My Lady, can I then move now to deal with the Chancery defendants. I propose to say very little about the position of the Chancery defendants.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can I just be clear. The claim in relation to Rusal, the claim for compensation or accounting, only relates to the fact that the second tranche was sold, you claim, at an undervalue?

MR RABINOWITZ: Well, it was sold. The point about -- the claim in relation to Rusal --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, it was sold contrary to what you say was an agreement that it wouldn't be sold?

MR RABINOWITZ: They wouldn't sell without permission. In other words, you wouldn't sell in circumstances where you would put the other party into the position of a minority.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But I'm looking at the issues at page 849 in the second volume of your closing.

MR RABINOWITZ: If your Ladyship picks it up at issue 18, your Ladyship sees 18.2 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What I'm not quite clear about is the compensation claim.

MR RABINOWITZ: Right.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm looking at 26, 27. Is the claim for compensation dependent upon there being a breach of what you assert is the obligation not to sell without the agreement of the others?

MR RABINOWITZ: Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Or is there another type of claim?

MR RABINOWITZ: Well, there's the breach of fiduciary duty as well, that's to say, we've set it out in our written closing, but there is also a breach of fiduciary duty not to compete with those for whom one is standing in a fiduciary position. So that -- it's not just the contract claim, there's a breach of fiduciary duty claim as well, but it is very much related to the fact that Mr Abramovich, we submit, held in trust, and by virtue of his being a trustee, if he sold his interests in a way so as to favour himself over the position of his beneficiaries that also gives rise to a claim.

That's the point we deal with at paragraph 1570, page 870.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But assume he sold the assets and there wasn't a breach of the obligation, let's assume there wasn't, the court were to find there wasn't an obligation to sell, say, with the agreement of the others, is there still an accounting claim?

MR RABINOWITZ: That would be a breach of trust claim, yes, my Lady. That would also give rise to the claim.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Because you say that irrespective of whether he should have sold or could have sold or not, he hasn't accounted to you for the proceeds?

MR RABINOWITZ: Well, he's favoured himself in the sense that he sold his share for 1.5 billion, which made our share worth --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. And he should have sold you say pari pasu your shares and his shares.

MR RABINOWITZ: Precisely.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I'm not quite clear, if that's right -- well, no, I can see the argument on quantum.

And you don't accept that whatever was paid to Mr Patarkatsishvili was an appropriate accounting so far as Mr Berezovsky was concerned?

MR RABINOWITZ: Definitely not, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So no credit is to be given for the money that was paid --

MR RABINOWITZ: Ah, sorry. You would give credit for that money in a sense that -- as I understand the law, we have an election, we can actually say, "You've sold our share because we were your beneficiaries", the 1.5, whatever it is, but that is not to say that there's some part of the 580 or 570 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: 585.

MR RABINOWITZ: 585 including, that you wouldn't be able to take into account by way of a deduction.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Would you just direct me? I'm afraid I haven't read quite to the end of this, which I still have to do.

Can you tell me where you make the point on accounting in relation to the 585? It's not quite clear how you put your case on this.

MR RABINOWITZ: No, I follow, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I can see the claim that you say Mr Abramovich wouldn't have sold at all, or that he shouldn't have told his stake, in inverted commas, at a higher price without selling part of your holding as well. And I can see that you've got an accounting claim, or that you say you've got an accounting claim. What I'm not clear about is whether or not you concede that you should credit, or some credit, for the 585 that was paid to Mr Patarkatsishvili.

MR RABINOWITZ: Can I invite your Ladyship to go to the opening submissions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Yes, I've got them. Which?

MR RABINOWITZ: Paragraph 1477 and following, page 637, behind V.

If your Ladyship looks at paragraph 1479 on page 638.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, 1479. You recognise it -- yes, I must have got it from there.

MR RABINOWITZ: I think that was the point my Lady was after.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So he's accepting, as it were, is this right, that Mr Patarkatsishvili had authority to receive the 45 (sic) million on the "partnership's" account.

MR RABINOWITZ: Not that he had authority but that he in fact did.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So anyway he's giving credit for that.

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: For the 450 million. He's not saying, "You should have paid half to me, Mr Abramovich. You shouldn't have paid the whole lot to Mr Patarkatsishvili"?

MR RABINOWITZ: He's not disputing that Mr Patarkatsishvili would have been entitled to half of what the proceeds were, that is to say, of the 25 --

The claim arises in this way: number one, he shouldn't have sold without consent, so that as a consequence of that he was in breach of --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've got all of that. All I'm interested in is whether, in paragraph 1479, the recognition there is an acceptance that he has to give credit for whatever his share is of the 450 million?

MR RABINOWITZ: And I think we do accept that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well you seem to be there.

The alternative would be to say "You had no authority to pay Mr Patarkatsishvili without my consent and agreement, I'm not giving any credit for any part of it".

MR RABINOWITZ: Well, he could have said that, and perhaps we could have said that --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But he's not?

MR RABINOWITZ: -- but he's not saying that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, okay, I'm clear on that. Thank you.

MR RABINOWITZ: Just for your Ladyship's note, we deal with quantum issues further at section 08, page 924 and following.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: In the second --

MR RABINOWITZ: In our written closing.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: In your written closing.

MR RABINOWITZ: That may assist your Ladyship in terms of what our position is generally in relation to the claims.

Now, can I then turn to the position of the Chancery defendants.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, certainly.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm going to say very little about them because the position they take very largely mimics the submissions of Mr Abramovich which, as your Ladyship knows, have been dealt with in full in our written closing.

So far as the position of the family defendants is concerned, there are only two points we would wish to make. The first is really by way of a caveat to suggest that your Ladyship tread carefully when dealing with the family defendants' written closing because, in our submission, that document reflects an unfortunate tendency not always to fairly portray the documentary evidence or the oral evidence, but since a number of the issues to which those submissions are directed really just follow what your Ladyship will find in Mr Abramovich's materials, again I'm not going to take up time on that now.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: Secondly, so far as the family defendants are concerned, is just to note the curious position that the family defendants have had in these proceedings. As my Lady will recall, Mr Patarkatsishvili's widow and daughters had previously run a case in Gibraltar and given evidence there which recognised the interests of Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili in both Sibneft and Rusal.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: Despite the fact that they were, Mr Patarkatsishvili's widow and daughters, very frequently in this court during the trial, and there would not appear to have been any difficulty whatever with them doing so, Mr Patarkatsishvili's widow and daughters declined to give evidence to the court on matters which were plainly within their knowledge. Yet here they are, having led absolutely no evidence of their own, and in circumstances where they had previously told the court exactly the opposite, seeking to persuade the court that Mr Berezovsky had no interest in Rusal.

Indeed more than that, my Lady, they are seeking to persuade the court that Mr Patarkatsishvili also had no interest in Rusal, arguing for example at paragraph 35 of their written closing that the commission agreements demonstrate, they say, Mr Patarkatsishvili's role as a key intermediary in the aluminium deal and not a principal to it.

My Lady, if that were not enough, there is also the fact that the family defendants' case, as presented by their counsel since they called no evidence, is also inconsistent with Mr Patarkatsishvili's own evidence as described, for example, in the statements of Ms Duncan and Mr McKim. A further oddity which, in our submission, demonstrates that the position which they adopt is entirely self-serving and a position of pure convenience. And indeed, despite the family defendants' protestations in the course of their oral opening that they would not want Mr Patarkatsishvili to be branded a gangster, that's at Day 2, page 147, it is notable that in their written closing the family defendants are perfectly prepared to seek to brand their late husband and father a serial and methodical liar.

For your Ladyship's note, you may wish to see, for example, paragraph 72 of the family defendants' written closing where it is suggested that Mr Patarkatsishvili falsely asserted to Mr Berezovsky's solicitors between 2005 and 2007 that both he and Mr Berezovsky had acquired ownership interests in Rusal when that was not in fact the case.

My Lady, the fact that the family defendants are apparently perfectly content to make submissions that their late husband and father, Mr Patarkatsishvili, was a deceptive and dishonest man, willing to mislead Mr Berezovsky's solicitors, shows, we submit, just how far the family defendants are now prepared to go in order to defeat Mr Berezovsky's claims against Mr Abramovich in the Commercial Court action and themselves in the Chancery actions.

I would submit that this does not reflect well on them and strongly suggest what the claimant has all along suspected, and which has never been openly and adequately dealt with by the family defendants, namely that there is much going on behind the scenes which has resulted in their being willing to betray the memory of their father and husband in this way.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can I ask, and it may be I've seen some reference to this, did your solicitors write to the solicitors acting for the family defendants to enquire whether there were any arrangements between the --

MR RABINOWITZ: They did.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What was the answer to that? Do I need to look at that correspondence?

MR RABINOWITZ: We have -- for my Lady's note, annex B to our opening document sets out that, page 660.

There was a reply which we made clear was, in our submission, not a satisfactory reply in that it left open a number of questions which were unanswered.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Annex B?

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed, my Lady may recall I raised it in opening --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I remember.

MR RABINOWITZ: It was never dealt with by Mr Adkin then, through no fault of his own I think.

Now, given that there is overlap between what they're saying and what Mr Abramovich is saying, I wasn't proposing to address your Ladyship specifically on the points that they have made. They are, I would submit, adequately covered by what we say in our closing.

Can I then just turn to the Anisimov defendants, and again I can be brief about this. Again, this is a document which, perhaps unsurprisingly, is also substantially parasitic on Mr Abramovich's written submissions and, again, since the points arising are really the same, I'm not going to repeat them just because they're repeated in Mr Anisimov's submissions.

My Lady there are perhaps two points arising from the Anisimov defendant's written closings that I do need to mention. The first relates to the point that they make about various matters not being put to Mr Anisimov, in particular about --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think I may have left it in my room so I'm going to get it up on the screen.

Can you give me the reference to Mr Malek and Ms Tolaney's closing, please, so I can look at it on the screen? I may have left it in my room.

MR MALEK: Can we give your Ladyship another -- it's a clean copy I'm told, of our submissions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I mean, I have got one, but if I could have another copy. You haven't got it in small, I suppose? It doesn't matter. That's fine. Thanks very much. (Handed)

I have read it, Mr Malek.

MR RABINOWITZ: So the first, as I have said, the first point relates to the point that they make that there were various matters not put to Mr Anisimov about what he knew of Mr Berezovsky's involvement in the original aluminium acquisition, and the second point I need to address is a point which they make -- Mr Anisimov makes about the second Rusal sale.

Now, just on the first point, points not put and the like, your Ladyship may recall that the overlap issues, for very sensible reasons, have not been defined so as to require this court to make any findings about Mr Anisimov's knowledge or about questions of his honesty and dishonesty. That was for the very good reason that those are matters to be dealt with in the Chancery action where there will have to have been full disclosure on all matters from Mr Anisimov and all the parties, and the court in the Chancery Division will have all relevant evidence before it on all issues.

It was for this reason, that's to say that this court will not have to make any findings about Mr Anisimov's knowledge or about questions of his honesty or dishonesty, that various matters were not put to Mr Anisimov about his state of knowledge and bona fides.

As we have made clear in our written closing, we are not inviting the court to make any findings as to Mr Anisimov's knowledge in these proceedings and nor is the court required to do so.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No.

MR RABINOWITZ: That is the first point.

My Lady, the second point I need to pick up on is that Mr Anisimov, in his written closing, this is at paragraph 168, page 80, suggests to your Ladyship that it is fanciful to suppose that there was some sort of conspiracy in relation to the second Rusal sale documentation to misrepresent the true factual position. That is what he says.

My Lady, the difficulty with that submission is that it is a point that is completely undermined by Mr Abramovich's own defence in this action. In other words, both on Mr Berezovsky's case and on Mr Abramovich's case it is suggested that the second Rusal sale documentation quite deliberately did materially misrepresent the true factual position.

From Mr Berezovsky's side, Mr Berezovsky says the conspiracy was to keep his name out of that documentation. From Mr Abramovich's side, the suggestion is that Mr Patarkatsishvili was dressed up to look like a beneficial interest holder when he was not. So that on both sides' case, they are suggesting to your Ladyship that there was indeed a conspiracy of sorts to misrepresent the true factual position in the sale documentation.

So it's somewhat ironic that Mr Anisimov, Mr Anisimov alone, contends that it is fanciful to think that there could have been any conspiracy of that sort given that, in effect, that point is common ground. So, my Lady, we submit that that point of Mr Anisimov is bad. I'm not, as I say, going to address the other points because, as I say, they do largely overlap and I would just be repeating myself even further than I already have.

So unless I can assist your Ladyship with anything else, those were our closing submissions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much indeed.

MR RABINOWITZ: The only other thing I would say is that we are endeavouring to get the schedule, which will become an important document for your Ladyship, I think, schedule 2 -- well, it's their schedule with our comments, we hope to do so by the end of this week.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm grateful.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: In fact I've got a criminal case that I've got to deal with for three days, and some reading for that, so I'm not going to start writing this judgment --

MR RABINOWITZ: We will get it to you as soon as we possibly can.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I can tell all the parties I'm not going to start writing this judgment immediately, not least because I've got a three-day criminal case, but also because I have a lot of reading to do because, as you know, I was not given any formal reading time before the case started. Obviously you'll be kept up with progress.

So if there is anything you wish to deal with you'll have at least seven days before I get into the reading.

MR RABINOWITZ: I'm grateful. Thank you my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Thank you very much, Mr Rabinowitz, and also your entire team.

MR RABINOWITZ: Thank you.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Malek.

Closing submissions by MR MALEK

MR MALEK: My Lady, can I start off by saying how I intend to deal with our oral submissions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I have read your document.

MR MALEK: I'm obliged.

What I propose to do is to break my submissions down into two parts. First of all, to deal with some issues as to how we submit your Ladyship should approach the evidence and the issues in this case, and then I will move on to submissions directed to Mr Berezovsky's Rusal claims.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR MALEK: At the outset, we are grateful for the indication that you gave to my learned friend Mr Rabinowitz as to how you will use the written submissions. And I will not repeat our written submissions although I would wish to highlight some points.

For the avoidance of doubt, we confirm that we adopt the submissions made by Mr Abramovich as far as they affect us and Rusal, and also the submissions of the family defendants. My objective this afternoon is not to go into the detail because that's the purpose of the written submissions. What I would like to do is to focus on some big picture issues that hopefully will assist your Ladyship in reaching your decisions on the issues in dispute. When I go through my submissions, I will do my best to give your Ladyship supporting references so that you can follow up the arguments if your Ladyship wishes to do.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR MALEK: The first topic I would like to cover is the difficulties that this case presents to the fact finder, namely your Ladyship. There are three features of the case that stand out. First of all, it's about hotly disputed oral agreements; it's a case where the claims are stale, and when I say stale I mean the limited evidence upon which Mr Berezovsky's claims are based is stale; and then the third feature is that the burden of proof is on Mr Berezovsky to establish his claims. We submit it's those three features that present insuperable difficulties for Mr Berezovsky. There cannot be any serious dispute about those three features.

All I wish to say about the burden of proof, your Ladyship heard submissions from my learned friend Mr Rabinowitz about overreaching questions on the case, Day 41, page 4, lines 15 to 18. He said:

"I would respectfully suggest that there is one overreaching question that the court will want to ask itself, and it is this: has Mr Abramovich on his case provided a plausible explanation for the enormous and indeed admitted payments made to Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili?"

Now, all I wish to say about that is it's careful (sic), when your Ladyship considers questions like that, that there is no reversal of the burden of proof. The burden of proof is on Mr Berezovsky to establish his case. And it's important to keep that consideration in mind when one considers the broad questions.

As to the first two features, it's quite plain that the Sibneft and Rusal claims do require consideration about alleged oral agreements made many years ago. The agreements are all oral, they are the four agreements that your Ladyship has heard about, namely the 1995 tripartite agreement, the 1996 agreement, the 1999 agreement and finally the Dorchester 2000 agreement.

Although not on the agenda for determination at this trial, but as part of the background, there is the disputed bilateral joint venture between Mr Berezovsky and Badri that is part of the Chancery proceedings, and based on that bilateral joint venture, Mr Berezovsky appears to assert an entitlement to a share of all of Badri's assets and investments from 1995 until Badri's death in February 2008 with some limited exceptions. I'll come back to that bilateral joint venture and its significance in these proceedings in a moment.

The next point to make is that this is not a case about --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: When you say all Mr Patarkatsishvili's assets, are we dealing with real property and things as well?

MR MALEK: I think we're dealing with real property as well.

There are some exceptions, but the answer to that question is yes, as I understand it.

Now, the point I was about to go to --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I mean homes in Georgia?

MR MALEK: No, personal property and investments I'm told.

His personal property, yes, is excepted, yes.

As far as the point about the disputes about the alleged oral agreements, it's quite plain that this is not a case about minor disputes. In fact every aspect of the alleged oral agreements are in dispute: whether they were entered into, whether they were intended to be legally binding terms in governing law. And as your Ladyship knows, there's a dispute as to what Mr Berezovsky was wearing on one occasion that is the dressing gown issue in relation to Dorchester.

You're not going to hear me about dressing gowns, you'll be pleased to know, but there is a serious point about that which is that your Ladyship is not required, we would submit, to try every factual disputed issue, and the purpose of my submissions is to focus on the core issues and to avoid the sideshows.

Now, as to staleness, in my submission, there could be no doubt about that. The court is being asked to make findings of fact in 2012 in relation to agreements some 16 to 17 years ago, and, as your Ladyship knows, the Dorchester Hotel meeting celebrates its 12th anniversary in March. Now, the difficulties of stale claims are well known. Oral evidence tends to be based on reconstruction rather than specific recollection. Yesterday Mr Rabinowitz criticised Mr Anisimov of amnesia in relation to the Baden Baden meeting in June 2001. In my submission, it can't be expected that individuals remember meetings so long ago and I'll come back to that specific meeting later on in the course of my submissions.

Now, even in the normal litigation, the problems are well known. Witnesses can persuade themselves of a version of events that on analysis is simply wrong, documents get destroyed in the ordinary course of business. But this case is more difficult because here is a case where the parties' resources are substantial, there are allegations of dishonesty, there has been a substantial strike-out before Sir Anthony Colman, and this has meant that the material before the court on these alleged oral agreements is substantial and that in itself gives rise to difficulties to the fact-finder.

Now, as far as how a fact-finder deals with a case like this, this is clearly a case which is intensively factual.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I don't think you need to call me the fact-finder. I'm the judge, aren't I?

MR MALEK: The judge, exactly. For the judge.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You could call me the decision-taker.

MR MALEK: Yes. I'll call you the decision-taker and the judge, of course.

But the point I'm making is that the main difficulty that Mr Berezovsky faces is that he is dealing with -- relying on conversations many years ago and where he is the only real witness in the case. As far as the facts are concerned, your Ladyship will approach this no doubt having regard to the contemporary documents, the likely probabilities and the demeanour. I'm not going to say anything at this stage about likely probabilities, and nor do I propose to say anything about demeanour because that's subjective and it's something for your Ladyship to form a view on.

But in our submission, there are two types of factors which your Ladyship should take into account. There's what I may describe as general factors that make the court's task a difficult one in any event, and then there are specific ones to Mr Berezovsky and his evidence which we submit means that his claim must fail.

As far as the general points are concerned, there are four points that I would like to draw your Ladyship's attention to. First of all, there is the unusual background and context. It is often said in cases that context is everything. Contrary to what has been written about by some in the recent press, there are good reasons why this case is being tried in London. And this court has a unique experience dealing with cases of an international element. But you are undoubtedly trying a case with an unusual background and context. That's the medieval history point that Mr Sumption made at the outset of the case, it's the Russian context.

Of course one way that your Ladyship has been able to mitigate this difficulty is allowing in the expert evidence from Professors Fortescue, Service and Bean, and it goes without saying that we invite your Ladyship to proceed on the basis that they all discharged their duties to the court as experts.

But the fact that the court is being asked to rely on historical evidence from experts to provide context for disputed oral agreements is unusual and is why there was a dispute of application to admit this evidence. The Russian context also deals with the issues about the governing law and questions of its content and, again, your Ladyship had assistance from well-qualified experts.

But there's this other difficulty that's perhaps worth stressing at this point, that when your Ladyship comes to consider the evidence and looking at conversations, there were undoubtedly conversations involving English and Russian speakers, and that's the language barrier point or the lost in translation point, and that covers conversations that the solicitors were party to, whether it's Mr Curtis or Mr Moss, and the proof-taking before Badri died.

The second general overview point here is that the court would normally expect, in view of their importance, that the alleged agreements be recorded in writing or certainly evidenced in writing by contemporaneous documents and here they were not. Mr Berezovsky in his closing submissions challenges this by saying that there is documentary evidence. But when I'm speaking of contemporaneous documentation I am not referring to circumstantial evidence or documents that might support a version of events, I'm speaking of the type of records that you would normally see in a case of this kind of nature. I'm talking about notes, of records of any kind. But, in our submission, this lack of documentation to the alleged oral agreements is very damaging to Mr Berezovsky's case.

Now, a lot of evidence has been given about why the agreements were oral, and to some extent that that is tied into the Russian context point that I've mentioned. But I would submit that the court should approach this as a matter more of common sense than Russian history about business practices.

Whatever might be said about the lack of written agreements between trusted friends and partners, it is hard to see why, if Mr Berezovsky's version of events is correct, no record was made by anyone of the Dorchester Hotel agreement involving Mr Deripaska, who clearly was a principal player in the merger and who Mr Berezovsky had no relationship with.

Moreover, if my learned friend Mr Rabinowitz is right in his argument, which is hotly disputed on the facts, that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Abramovich fell out after the alleged intimidation in relation to ORT at the end of 2000, and then in relation to Sibneft, why did he do nothing to secure his alleged interest in Rusal if he really believed that he had an interest in Rusal? In my submission, there is no answer to that.

So whatever might be said about the reason for the lack of contemporary documents, whether it is because there are no agreements or for any other reason, the fact of the matter is that you are dealing with agreements which are oral and undocumented. It means that the court lacks the important material to test the parties' version of events. It means that the court is being asked to look at events and material long after the alleged oral agreements to see whether they provide circumstantial evidence in support of the matters sought to be proved.

Now, the third point is that the combination of the lapse of time and unfortunate circumstances means that there are limited materials before the court and certainly the court did not hear from all of those who could have given evidence that might have assisted the court in determining whether the alleged oral agreements were made. That is a feature of stale claims. The court simply does not have all the evidence that might have been available had the dispute been resolved nearer the time of the alleged oral agreements rather than 16 years after they were concluded.

Your Ladyship knows who I am referring to. Badri obviously was a key witness, and the various notes that were taken of meetings with him years after the event in question are clearly not a substitute for his oral evidence. Undoubtedly he would have been a key witness, not simply to Mr Berezovsky but also to Mr Abramovich whose evidence was that he remained in friendly relations until Badri died.

Important witnesses are dead. Mr Curtis is dead, he died in a helicopter accident. He suffered the same fate as General Lebed. Both of them would have been important witnesses but on different topics. Mr Moss, the solicitor involved in the Baden Baden meeting in June 2001, is dead. And some witnesses simply refused to give evidence.

And you've heard about Mr Michael Chernoi. As Mr Abramovich points out in his written closing at paragraph 251.7, it appears that there is some financial arrangement between Mr Berezovsky and Mr Chernoi. Inexplicably Mr Chernoi refused at the last minute to be cross-examined by video-link. We would submit it shows a weakness of Mr Berezovsky's case that he continues to rely on his evidence. But, in my submission, no reason has been given as to why he has not been called.

Yes, he has a litigation in relation to Mr Deripaska but arrangements were made by Mr Deripaska to protect his interests in relation to that litigation. The same could have been done in relation to Mr Chernoi. And we would submit that there may be a link, to say the least, between the financial arrangements that were mentioned in the course of evidence and Mr Chernoi refusing to come to give evidence.

We would say that if you have any interest in his evidence you should read Mr Justice Henderson's judgment in Cherney v Neuman which is at 2011, it's going to go on to Magnum at P(A)4/05B, where you will see that there is a very odd situation where he was apparently rehearsed in cross-examination, the judge indicated that he approached his evidence with considerable caution, and the judge said that his answers in cross-examination were often evasive.

Now, as far as Mr Fomichev is concerned, it appears that he was thought to be so unreliable that no one called him. I'm not going to deal with him because your Ladyship has the submissions about him from the principal protagonists.

Joseph Kay is another person but his absence is not a surprise and, as we point out in our closing submissions, the Gibraltar court's assessment of him was somebody with a palpable predisposition to mendacity and for whom the truth is vaporous.

Now, the fourth difficulty -- he obviously made a very convincing witness.

The fourth difficulty is that this is not only a case -- not a case where the oral agreements are evidenced by the contemporary documents; the documents that do exist are of limited assistance and often do not help because there is an issue of whether they can be taken at face value.

A good example of this is in relation to the documents relating to the second Rusal sale. Here there is some common ground between the principal protagonists. Mr Abramovich says that the declaration that Badri had been an owner since 2000 is not true, Mr Berezovsky says that Badri's representations and warranties are not true, and those agreements are summarised in our closing submissions at paragraph 207.

You've heard about the backdating of documents. You have also received allegations that sham documents were created in order to satisfy the requirements of western banks. So this means that where ownership interests are referred to in correspondence, the question for your Ladyship is whether this is reflective of real ownership interests or whether it is simply a false statement in order to allow the movement of money to satisfy money-laundering requirements.

Moreover, there is evidence that Mr Berezovsky was prone to making claims to ownership which he knew to be untrue. That's a reference to Aeroflot and I'll come back to that later in the context of the explanatory note.

What about press statements? Clearly they were sometimes unreliable and they do not always say the truth. You remember I put to Mr Berezovsky in cross-examination the press statement that said that Logovaz had acquired the aluminium assets. He said that that was disinformation. As we point out in our closing submissions at paragraph 51.1, Mr Berezovsky accepted in his evidence that he used the media to spread deliberate disinformation.

So those four factors make Mr Berezovsky's case difficult to establish, whether it's a question of context, lack of contemporary documents, missing witnesses and unreliable witnesses, but claims which are -- of course we're dealing with claims which are dependent on the court's acceptance of his oral evidence on which he has the burden of proof.

Now, on their own, these four factors would have presented by themselves massive problems for a case based on disputed oral agreements. However, we submit that acceptance of Mr Berezovsky's case becomes almost impossible when one considers his evidence, and there are five short points to be made here.

The first is the relevance of politics in this case and how it affects the court's consideration of the evidence in this case. Politics of course is at the forefront of the allegations in relation to ORT and the Sibneft intimidation claim. Politics and law do not go together very well, but the political aspects of this case cannot be ignored in relation to other aspects of the case.

There are three examples of this. The first is this: it was Mr Berezovsky's political influence that was important as to why he received from Mr -- money from Mr Abramovich. Whether that's under the oral agreements he alleges, or is krysha as Mr Abramovich alleges, that in itself does not affect the Rusal claim because Mr Berezovsky did nothing in relation to Rusal. However it is Mr Abramovich's case, which the Anisimov defendants support, that it was Mr Berezovsky's perceived political power, after President Putin was elected in March 2000, that is important in understanding why Mr Abramovich and others were prepared to go to the Dorchester Hotel to meet him.

The second point is this, it was Mr Berezovsky's political aspirations and his character which perhaps explains the tendency on the part of Mr Berezovsky to grandstand. You have the many statements to the press that your Ladyship was referred to and this means that the court should be slow to rely on statements to the press as being true.

You have the examples of this in the submissions. When Mr Berezovsky tells the press in February 2000 that Logovaz has acquired aluminium assets, when in late June 2004 he says that he has an interest in Rusal and disapproves of the sale and will challenge it to the court if necessary.

Now, the question for the court is whether, when he made those statements, it was because he believed Logovaz has an interest, or he had an interest in Rusal, or was it because he wanted to be on the stage with the lights on him? We know the statement in relation to Logovaz was fiction. Our case is that the June statement about Rusal was grandstanding and again untrue.

The third fact about the political aspect ties in with political krysha and the payment for influence. I do not propose to go into the issue of krysha but you have heard how it was important for key players in Russia to have persons associated with you. This may require the relationship to involve the appearance of ownership rights. How does one determine, as a judge determining a case, whether this is a complex krysha arrangement involving real ownership or simple apparent ownership?

That was a point covered by Mr Abramovich in his evidence, and the reference to the transcript is Day 17, from page 63 onwards, and also his third witness statement, at paragraph 32 through to 36 E1/03/42.

So the short point here is that the political aspects of the case cannot be ignored and, we submit, present difficulties for Mr Berezovsky in establishing his case.

Now the second difficulty, or the point here, is that Mr Berezovsky's case concerns important changes in his case. There are many examples of this, a good example being the alleged agreement on English law to govern the dealings in relation to Rusal. Another example is the late introduction of the 1999 agreement when it became clear that the 1995 agreement did not produce the consequences desired by reason of operation of Russian law.

In many cases, of course, we accept that amendments to a case are not reason for doubting the merits of the case. However, in a case based on alleged oral agreements and dependent on who your Ladyship believes is telling the truth it really does matter. And anyone advising a client will tell him or her that they need to get the version of events correct right at the outset, whether it's in a pleading or in a witness statement, and I would suggest that in a modern context, with statements of truth, that is a consideration of particular importance.

Now, we contend, as your Ladyship knows, that the many changes were not fine-tuning of a bona fide claim by way of clarification or correction, but have all the hallmarks of invention.

The third point is Mr Berezovsky's tendency to blame his lawyers for changes in his case, and the issue here is whether the changes to the case can be justified because of misunderstandings between a client and his lawyers or whether Mr Berezovsky, as we allege, blames his lawyers as a false excuse for changes. Again it shows how unreliable his evidence is and why it cannot be accepted.

Now, the fourth point is that there are features of Mr Berezovsky's evidence that are disturbing and, we submit, fatal to a case based on disputed oral agreements. First of all, there are his blatant lies and there are two examples of that. There's first of all Forbes, and that relates to the case he advanced in response to the justification defence which he knew to be untrue. And then, secondly, as to the nature and extent of his involvement in the acquisition of the premerger aluminium, which we cover in our closing submissions at E1.4.3. In addition to that, in addition to the blatant lies, is his tendency to supply what he called disinformation that is tied into the political aspects that I have referred to.

Of course, the lies are important because they are lies connected with the court process, and although one may have a scale in terms of the seriousness of lies, we submit that those lies are important and are relevant because it shows an indifference to the truth and also a predisposition to make up allegations to bolster a false claim.

The last point I make on these general overview factors is what I might call the corruption of the trial process that taints his evidence in the case.

Mr Rabinowitz referred yesterday to the manipulation of the trial process by Mr Abramovich. I'm not going to respond to those points against Mr Abramovich, but one may think that people in glass houses should not throw stones.

It is not that Mr Berezovsky has paid evidence (sic), as he has in relation to the Le Bourget transcript and Cliren's Latvian bank accounts. It concerns the agreements with Dr Nosova and Mr Lindley giving them eye watering amounts of money if Mr Berezovsky succeeds in this case.

You have seen the written winning agreements. It is rather ironic that Dr Nosova and Mr Lindley were not prepared to rely on undocumented agreements of the nature that forms the basis of Mr Berezovsky's alleged claims. You have also heard about the financial arrangement with Mr Cotlick who played an important part in the preparation of the case.

There are three other points. First of all, there is how the agreements came to light. Clearly they were suppressed from his own lawyers, and Mr Berezovsky hoped that they would never see the light of day. Secondly, it reflects very badly on Mr Berezovsky that he denied he was paying witnesses, which he himself recognised could be seen as bribing of the witnesses, until prompted by his own counsel in re-examination. Thirdly, there is a reason why these agreements were made in the first place. This is not the way litigation is carried out in London. Mr Lindley's greed shows a complete lack of judgment of the conduct this court expects from its officers. It is grubby, it shows a willingness to get a result at all costs.

In Mr Berezovsky's written submissions at paragraph 227, it is suggested that Mr Abramovich's team took a personal dislike to Dr Nosova. Personal dislikes are irrelevant. The real concern is that she gave evidence for Mr Berezovsky in a prior action in which she stood to gain under her winnings agreement without that being revealed to the court or the opposing parties. It might be said that at least this court in this action knows the true position. However, it all leads to a lurking suspicion that is hard to displace of what else in the conduct of this litigation has taken place to achieve the desired result that we do not know about. If you're prepared to pay for evidence in this way, and to cover up that you are doing it, it may be thought that there is nothing off limit to get the desired result.

The next point about the evidence is the importance of assessing it against the relevant questions that the court must decide. I'm only dealing with Rusal. The first point is that Mr Berezovsky's claim in relation to Rusal must be evaluated against the case he has to prove. Most of his written agreement is an exercise of picking small holes in Mr Abramovich's version of events. Yet, as I've stressed earlier, the burden is on Mr Berezovsky to prove his case, not to simply undermine Mr Abramovich's defence.

Secondly, there is a chronology that cannot be ignored. I will explain this in more detail in a moment, but the essence is this. Mr Berezovsky says that he obtained an interest in Rusal by virtue of the agreement at the Dorchester meeting in March 2000 and that the reason for that agreement was, he says, because he had an interest in the aluminium assets that were combined to form Rusal. On his formulated case, that takes one back to matters he says were agreed in 1995.

Now, that is the only way in which Mr Berezovsky says he obtained an interest in Rusal, at least insofar as this court is concerned in this action, namely by virtue of the prior aluminium assets and the Dorchester meeting.

The third point here is that Mr Berezovsky spends a lot of time in his submissions looking at subsequent events, that is after the Dorchester agreement. Now, of course, we accept that subsequent events can provide assistance in evidencing the existence of an earlier made agreement, albeit that that assistance is necessarily rather limited by virtue of the ex post facto nature of the subsequent evidence. But that is all that the subsequent evidence can do. The key point is that the subsequent evidence cannot provide a new and independent case for Mr Berezovsky that has not been pleaded in this action and is not open to him.

Now, it will be recalled that Mr Berezovsky attempted to introduce a case based on the bilateral joint venture between himself and Badri shortly before this trial commenced. That attempt failed when the allegations were struck out by the court in July 2011.

It is not legitimate to Mr Berezovsky to say that everybody thought he had an interest in Rusal in 2004 for whatever reason, therefore he must have an interest in Rusal however that interest arose.

In our submission, the court should look at this from the right end of the telescope, and that is all the more given the growing awareness of the need to legalise money flows out of Russia at the time of the various subsequent documents that Mr Berezovsky relies upon as evidencing his alleged interest in Rusal.

Therefore, evidence as to subsequent payments, the two sales of the Rusal shares or, for that matter, anything taking place after the Dorchester Hotel must be viewed through the prism of whether they support Mr Berezovsky's pleaded case.

Does this evidence help to prove that Mr Berezovsky was a purchaser of the aluminium assets in late 1999, early 2000? Does this evidence help to prove that Mr Abramovich agreed at the Dorchester Hotel to act as Mr Berezovsky's trustee?

We contend it's those questions that must be considered when you look at the subsequent events that are relied upon by Mr Berezovsky.

The next topic about the evidence concerns the allegation that Mr Berezovsky is able to make in order to support his claim. We would submit that not only is he confined to his pleaded case in this action, he is confined to the allegations that he is allowed to make. This comes from the point that Mr Rabinowitz mentioned a moment ago. And in the course of my opening oral submissions, the issue of what points did and what points did not need to be put to witnesses was discussed, and it was agreed that in the interests of avoiding duplication in a trial of this nature it was not necessary for all points to be put to witnesses. The reference here is to N2/134.18 to 135.11.

The two categories that were left out were first of all allegations of dishonesty and then, secondly, important matters to the witnesses. Your Ladyship specifically indicated that if she were to consider something important that was not put, there would be consequences. So those are the two categories: allegations of dishonesty and important matters to the witnesses.

Now, this point is of importance as Mr Berezovsky wholly failed to put a number of key points to Mr Anisimov during the course of the trial. There are three points here to make. First of all, the alleged informal meetings with Mr Anisimov. As your Ladyship will recall, Mr Berezovsky's oral evidence about the aluminium assets was to suggest for the first time that he had a significant and important role in the acquisition of aluminium assets. This included, he said, multiple meetings with sellers of the aluminium assets, including Mr Anisimov, yet this was not put to Mr Anisimov in cross-examination. Here we submit the court should take that into account on the basis of matters not put to Mr Anisimov.

Secondly, there was Mr Berezovsky's alleged grand conspiracy, which included Mr Anisimov, during the course of the second Rusal sale to airbrush him out of the paperwork. He says that dishonest documents were produced to disguise his interest. That would necessarily have involved a number of persons including Mr Anisimov.

In cross-examination of Mr Streshinsky, the point was made on a number of occasions that Mr Streshinsky would have shared all information with Mr Anisimov and acted on his instructions only. The point is repeated in Mr Berezovsky's closing submissions and the reference there is at paragraph 1137.7.

We would submit that these are matters of critical importance in relation to what the case is. These aren't minor points, these aren't matters that are going to go to the Chancery proceedings, these are points which are of critical importance, and yet Mr Anisimov, like Mr Deripaska, was not asked one question about the second Rusal sale, and it was certainly not put to him that he was involved in any such dishonesty.

Now, it is not open to Mr Berezovsky, we submit, now to assert that there was a conspiracy theory involving Mr Anisimov, or that Mr Anisimov knew that Mr Streshinsky about any conspiracy -- or that Mr Anisimov knew through Mr Streshinsky about any conspiracy that Mr Berezovsky alleges was carrying on.

The third point is that Mr Berezovsky also alleges that Mr Anisimov advised Mr Berezovsky and/or Badri -- his case remains unclear -- that British law should be used, around the time of the purchase of the aluminium assets and/or the Dorchester meeting, again his case remains unclear.

This key allegation was not put to Mr Anisimov in cross-examination. The allegation is tellingly down-played in his written closing submissions, there's no mention of it made in the key sections addressing the alleged express agreement between Mr Berezovsky, Badri and Mr Abramovich as to British law, and the reference there is his closing, paragraphs 67 to 74, 1581 to 1592, but it is nonetheless maintained in the backwaters of the submissions by way of a comment in respect of the explanatory note, and the reference there is paragraph 1253, and we deal with this at E3 of our written closing.

Again, the court should take that into account that this point was not made to Mr Anisimov at all.

The next general point about the evidence is to respond to allegations Mr Berezovsky makes about the credibility of the witnesses put forward by the Anisimov defendants. In short, Mr Berezovsky's team makes a rather tiresome point in the written submissions, paragraphs -- in the opening submissions, paragraphs 28 to 29, and repeated in their written closing, 1134 to 1136, 1137.5, that Mr Anisimov's evidence against Mr Berezovsky should not be accepted on any matter that was potentially unhelpful to Mr Anisimov because he has a financial interest in Mr Berezovsky failing to prove that he had an interest in Rusal, that financial interest being that Mr Anisimov will not have to compensate Mr Berezovsky for the proceeds of the second Rusal sale that Mr Anisimov invested into the metals industry, that's the MGOK/Metalloinvest.

In our submission, that point does not assist Mr Berezovsky at all. First of all, it is logically nonsense because it begs the question the court is to answer. Mr Anisimov has cause to lie in this case,

Mr Berezovsky says, because he is lying in the Metalloinvest action. He must lie to be consistent. But it is of course equally logical that Mr Anisimov is being constantly truthful. He has as much motive to tell the truth to honestly protect money that is rightfully his as he would have to lie to dishonestly keep money that is not his. In other words, Mr Berezovsky's argument prays in aid the dishonesty he seeks to prove.

In any event, it is not an argument that has any merit because if it applies, it applies to Mr Berezovsky as well. Two can play at that game. If millions of dollars give Mr Anisimov a motive to lie, by the same token billions of dollars give a greater motive to lie.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just a second, Mr Malek. The allegation in the Chancery proceedings is that Mr Anisimov knew of Mr Berezovsky's interest?

MR MALEK: Correct, that's it.

The only point --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: As a result of the Dorchester Hotel meeting?

MR MALEK: As a result of a separate agreement made subsequently.

If your Ladyship goes back to our opening submission we deal with this, but it is entirely separate and it's not linked to any knowledge based about the Dorchester. It's based, as I understand it, on the alleged joint venture and also discussions that took place between the two of them.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Subsequently to the Dorchester Hotel meeting?

MR MALEK: Correct.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I remember that.

MR MALEK: Yes. Ms Tolaney reminds me, it's not a discussion that Mr Berezovsky was a party to, it was a discussion between Mr Anisimov and Badri that he alleges. We don't accept that of course.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR MALEK: So the point is that it cannot seriously be argued that your Ladyship should reject Mr Anisimov's evidence because he has a financial interest, and that tellingly is the only point that Mr Berezovsky can find to cast aspersions on Mr Anisimov's honesty.

As to Mr Streshinsky and Mr Buzuk, they no longer are employed by Mr Anisimov, as your Ladyship heard in the evidence, and they should be treated as witnesses with no witness (sic) to grind and they are independent.

I am now going to turn to the Rusal claim. Your Ladyship will say when you would like me to stop.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I will take the break now, I will take quarter of an hour now.

(3.15 pm)

(A short break)

(3.38 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Malek.

MR MALEK: My Lady, I'm now going to turn to Rusal. So that your Ladyship has the structure of this part of the argument I'm first of all going to deal with the interrelationship between the Sibneft and Rusal claims, then I'm going to deal with Mr Berezovsky's claim to the aluminium assets, then Dorchester, and then subsequent events, and then finally the knowledge of Mr Anisimov.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, very well.

MR MALEK: As far as the interrelationship between Sibneft and the Rusal claim, there's the obvious link that's been mentioned by the parties about what might be called the holistic approach to the evidence, namely that views on, say, the credibility of evidence in relation to the Sibneft witnesses is likely to influence in relation to the evidence in relation to Rusal, and the converse is true.

But the one fundamental difference in Sibneft and Rusal is this: is Mr Berezovsky does not contend that he did anything, beyond show up at the Dorchester meeting in March 2000, towards the formation of Rusal. That's in stark contrast to his claim to Sibneft where Mr Berezovsky says that he was the reason -- says that the reason that he was entitled to a share in Sibneft was because of the role in its creation. He doesn't claim any role in respect of Rusal, he does not say that he did anything apart from attend the meeting. Mr Abramovich did all the hard work putting Rusal together. Mr Berezovsky did nothing.

Rather, Mr Berezovsky says the reason he was entitled to 25 per cent in Rusal, and the reason Mr Abramovich allegedly agreed to hold a 25 per cent interest in Rusal on trust for him, was because Mr Berezovsky says that this reflected Mr Berezovsky's share of the aluminium assets that went into Rusal.

So Mr Berezovsky's claim to Rusal is therefore solely dependent, based on the assets he contributed. He is not entitled to anything based on work done towards Rusal, whether its creation or formation, and therefore the Rusal claim is very different from the Sibneft claim.

When we look to see why Mr Berezovsky says he owned the aluminium assets that went into Rusal in the first place, we see that the claims are quite connected. In short, although Mr Berezovsky sought to reorientate his case during the course of the trial, which we will go into shortly, Mr Berezovsky's pleaded case is that it was because of his earlier agreement with Mr Abramovich in 1995, and the use of Mr Berezovsky's Sibneft profits to purchase the aluminium assets, that Mr Berezovsky gained an interest in the aluminium assets.

For this purpose, could I just invite your Ladyship to turn to the particulars of claim, which is in A1/02/26. It may be that this can just come up on the screen, but if your Ladyship has the pleading, it's paragraph C59B.

What you see there is:

"As Mr Berezovsky, Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich had agreed in 1999, before the aluminium assets were acquired, the 1995 Agreement (as set out in paragraphs C34 to C[35]B) applied to the aluminium assets, and payment for these assets came from Mr Berezovsky's, Mr Patarkatsishvili's and Mr Abramovich's share of profits derived from their interest in Sibneft. Accordingly, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili had Russian law rights in respect of the aluminium assets under the 1995 agreement, and Mr Abramovich was obliged to act in good faith and reasonably towards them in respect of such assets."

So it's really that part of the pleading which refers to the earlier agreement and the use of the Sibneft profits, which is the basis of the acquisition of the interest in the aluminium assets. I'll come back to that, if I may, in a moment.

Now, the second topic, I've now dealt with the interrelationship, is how does Mr Berezovsky seek to establish an interest in the aluminium assets? There are three ways that he seeks to establish that interest. We deal with it in our --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I've got your --

MR MALEK: In fact we deal with it in our opening submissions at D2.2 which explains how the claim emerged. But if I could just summarise the three ways.

The first way is that the 1995 agreement he alleges between himself, Mr Abramovich and Badri, and that's the first way. In short, it is his submission that it was agreed that in 1995 all future business would be shared in the same proportions as it was shared in relation to Sibneft. That allegation was modified in his written evidence, the fourth witness statement, which was to the effect that each of them would have a right of first refusal in relation to the other's future business ventures. That's the first way.

The second allegation is that there was an agreement in 1999 that the 1995 agreement would be applied to the aluminium assets.

And the third allegation is that the aluminium assets were paid for -- the aluminium was paid from Mr Berezovsky's and Badri's share of the Sibneft profits.

So those are the three allegations.

We submit that all three allegations fail. The points are made in writing, but essentially the short points are these. As far as the 1995 agreement, there are two points, one legal and one factual. The legal point is that in relation to the agreement in relation to future business, whatever the agreement was in 1995, it was governed by Russian law. And the Russian experts are agreed that an agreement to cover future business lacks certainty and that an agreement covering future business would be ineffective as a matter of Russian law. So this means that even if Mr Berezovsky establishes the 1995 agreement, which we contend he does not, the claim fails.

The factual point about the 1995 agreement is a point that Mr Sumption made in his oral submissions at N40, page 3, which shows that this argument was a nonstarter.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you give me the transcript date, please? That's Day 40, is it?

MR MALEK: Day 40, yes, page 3, where he makes the point, which we adopt, that this argument was a non-starter because it's inherently implausible that Mr Berezovsky would have given up, in 1995, 50 per cent of all future business to Mr Abramovich whom he viewed at the time as having achieved nothing in politics or business.

So those are the two points in summary why the 1995 agreement fails.

We then move on to the 1999 agreement which also fails, and the second way -- this is the second way in which he formulates a claim, by relying on an agreement made in 1999 to the effect that the 1995 agreement would be applied to any acquisition of the aluminium assets.

We submit that that argument is hopeless. The origin of the allegation appears to come from the evidence of Dr Rachkov, the Russian law expert. It was introduced late, the allegation was introduced into this action in April 2011, and in the Metalloinvest action in February 2011, as we point out in our closing at paragraph 68.2.

We submit that not only was it late and based on the Russian law evidence, we submit that even Mr Berezovsky has not gone as far as to say that the 1995 agreement was mentioned, discussed, or any agreement made by explicit reference to it during the discussions he says he had with Mr Abramovich in 1999.

Now, there is a dispute here. You will see it in the claimant's schedule 1 which was handed up yesterday, at page 33, which attempts to strain the reading of his fourth statement to suggest the 1995 agreement was referred to in oblique terms during his discussions with Mr Abramovich. But we submit that the statement cannot be read in that way, and we cover that in our closing submissions at paragraph 70 to 72. I will not repeat it.

But significantly, the alleged agreement was not even put to Mr Abramovich in the course of the evidence. Again, that's covered in our written closing at 70 to 72. And, in short, the parties never agreed that the aluminium acquisition would be subject to the same partnership terms as the Sibneft arrangement.

One other reference to give on that is Mr Abramovich's schedule that was handed up recently at pages 122 to 123, and we adopt what is said there as well. So that's the second way the case is put, the 1999 agreement.

Then the third way is the one that I've just mentioned, namely that the third basis for an interest in the premerger aluminium interests is that it was paid for from Mr Berezovsky's and Badri's share of the Sibneft profits. And that's the particulars of claim that we just looked at, at C59B.

Your Ladyship may think that, given the importance and significance of the alleged agreement, one might have expected Mr Berezovsky to be able to state how and when the profits were applied in this way. However, his evidence was completely lacking. He could not tell us, because as Mr Sumption explained during the course of his oral submissions, and the reference there is Day 40, pages 5 to 8, Sibneft profits were not used to pay for the aluminium assets.

Now, we cover that in our written submissions at E1.2.2. We also rely on Mr Abramovich's closing at paragraph 412, and on Mr Abramovich's schedule at paragraph 21 commenting on paragraph 62.4 of Mr Berezovsky's closing submissions.

As we point out in our closing submissions at paragraph 73, this was another late change to Mr Berezovsky's case. It was introduced in February 2011 in the Metalloinvest action and was pleaded in the Abramovich action in April 2011.

So the fact of the matter is that Mr Berezovsky made no contribution to the acquisition of the aluminium assets.

The fact that the Sibneft profits were not in fact used is more than a simple mismatch between what

Mr Berezovsky says was originally agreed with Mr Abramovich and what in fact subsequently happened. We submit it is fundamental to Mr Berezovsky's pleaded case that Sibneft profits were used to purchase the aluminium assets. This is because Mr Berezovsky's pleaded case is that he, Badri and Mr Abramovich agreed in 1999 that the 1995 agreement applied to the aluminium assets and payment for those assets came from Mr Berezovsky's, Mr Patarkatsishvili's and Mr Abramovich's share of profits derived from their interest in Sibneft. That's the passage that we just looked at.

So it's not simply an agreement that profits would be used; it's an assertion that profits were used. Moreover, it is not an independent basis, separate from the alleged application of the 1995 agreement, for Mr Berezovsky to have acquired an interest in the aluminium assets. In our submission, it's clear that it is a necessary requirement for the 1995 agreement to have been able to apply.

Now, this very specific formulation of the pleaded case as to the nature and operation of the 1995 agreement was repeated by Mr Berezovsky in his oral evidence when he made it clear, following an express question from your Ladyship, that the 1995 agreement required each party to contribute to the cost of any business investment.

If I could ask your Ladyship, or if this could be put on to the screen. It's Day 6, it's N6 at 125.1 to 125.8. We can see that, I don't know if your Ladyship has the transcripts to hand, but this is one passage that I would like your Ladyship to see, or to see it on the screen if we can put it up there.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It's on the screen.

MR MALEK: It's at 125 and this is 10 October. Your Ladyship asked this question:

"What were the terms of the right of first refusal? Was there an agreement that if you wanted to go into the new venture, you had to put up 50 per cent of the capital for it as well?

"Answer: Yes, absolutely. It means that we should put --

"MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Match the capital that the other party was putting in?

"Answer: Absolutely correct. Absolutely correct.

"MR SUMPTION: Was that actually agreed? Do you that that was agreed?

"Answer: Absolutely correct. It was agreed that we invest 50/50, definitely.

"MR SUMPTION: ... so that's something we should add to your witness statement, is it?

"Answer: Thank you very much, but it was absolutely clear because we share ... 50/50 and if we go to new business we should share 50/50 our investment."

This is a point that we make in our closing submission at paragraph 76. Now, the point here to stress is that the realisation that Sibneft profits were not in fact used to purchase the aluminium assets has led to this assertion in Mr Berezovsky's closing submissions, and if your Ladyship could turn to Mr Berezovsky's closing submissions at paragraph 1152, where this point is made.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR MALEK: Perhaps I could just ask your Ladyship to read paragraph 1152.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've read that.

MR MALEK: The point that's being made is that, yes, he accepts that no financial contribution was made to the acquisition of the aluminium assets, and that his case that he was one of the people who was entitled to benefit from the -- this is a reference to the balancing payment of 575 million, ultimately paid by Mr Deripaska in the Rusal merger arrangements, being one of the partners in the aluminium acquisition itself.

Now, there are a number of responses to this. The first point, it involves rather overenthusiastic but incorrect and circular logic. Mr Berezovsky's case is that he was a partner in the purchase of the aluminium assets because the 1995 agreement applied and Sibneft profits were used. We submit it's logical nonsense to assert that Mr Berezovsky can dispense with a necessary basis for that partnership, ie that Mr Berezovsky's money was used to purchase the aluminium assets, because he was entitled to the benefit of Mr Deripaska's subsequent payment because he was already a partner in the aluminium acquisition.

Now, the second point is that the assertion that Mr Berezovsky ever contended that he was entitled to the benefit of Mr Deripaska's payment because he was already a partner is simply wrong. It is wrong for four reasons.

First, there would need to be a clear agreement with Mr Abramovich that Mr Berezovsky was intended to be a partner from the outset despite not having any input into the aluminium asset sale. That has never been Mr Berezovsky's case and, until Mr Berezovsky's embarrassing attempts in his oral evidence to carve out a role for himself in the negotiations of the aluminium assets, Mr Berezovsky has never presented any discernible rationale as to why Mr Abramovich would agree to make Mr Berezovsky a partner in the absence of any financial contribution.

Secondly, such an agreement would make nonsense of Mr Berezovsky's case that he agreed with Mr Abramovich in 1999 that Sibneft profits would be used.

Thirdly, as mentioned in paragraph 103 of our written closing, no such agreement could possibly have been made because it was not known at the time of purchasing the aluminium assets that Mr Deripaska's payment under the Rusal arrangements would equal the sums needed to purchase the aluminium assets.

Finally, Mr Berezovsky did not even know at the time what the structures of the financing were. Apparently he thought that Sibneft profits had been used, and this is another example of making it up as he goes along.

So you have before your Ladyship a very late amendment alleging that he has an interest by virtue of the Sibneft profits that went into purchase aluminium assets. When it became clear that that case was flawed, he came up with another unpleaded allegation relating to the equalisation payment and, for the reasons I've just identified, that too fails.

That ties in with another point. In order to bolster his case, Mr Berezovsky came up with a number of new and, we would submit, wild allegations in his oral evidence about meetings Mr Berezovsky had never before mentioned with the sellers of the aluminium assets and the importance of Mr Berezovsky's alleged influence with General Lebed to the survival of the aluminium deal.

If your Ladyship just briefly turns to our written closing, we cover this from page -- I think it's about page 40, it starts at E1.4.1 and goes through to E1.4.3. Your Ladyship has read that, but what, we submit, is clear from that explanation of the evidence is that this role that Mr Berezovsky now asserts is pure fiction. He's had many opportunities to present what his case is on the aluminium assets, and it's quite clear that the departure, and the new evidence that was given during the course of cross-examination, just simply shows that he was lying on this.

I'm not going to go through that because it's all self-explanatory, but as we point out at paragraph 97, he had every opportunity in the Metalloinvest to explain that he had this important role that he now asserts before your Ladyship, and at no time was it ever suggested that he had this role. And in fact in support of the allegations of knowledge on the part of Anisimov, he didn't refer to any discussions or meetings, he just simply referred to press cuttings and the like.

As we say at 99, he has given no credible explanation as to why he introduced this new and inconsistent evidence during the course of the oral evidence, and we submit that Mr Berezovsky's case on this was untrue and that he knew it was untrue.

There's only a few points that I wish to add by way of oral submissions. The first is, if the court wishes to enquire why Mr Berezovsky lied on this, the answer, we submit, is clear. He lied because he knew he had to come up with a reason why Mr Abramovich would have agreed to give him an interest in Rusal. Mr Berezovsky's sudden creation of a role for himself in the negotiations leading up to the aluminium asset sale was an attempt to present a rationale for why Mr Abramovich agreed to give him 25 per cent of the aluminium assets even though not a penny of Mr Berezovsky's money had gone towards their acquisition. In other words, he needed to replicate his Sibneft case.

But a role in the aluminium negotiations alone does not assist Mr Berezovsky. His pleaded case is flatly inconsistent with any new, distinct performance-only based interest in the aluminium assets.

Secondly, all of Mr Berezovsky's evidence in respect of the aluminium negotiations -- sorry, all that Mr Berezovsky's evidence in respect of the aluminium negotiations served to do was to show that he was willing to, and did, present evidence which was manifestly false and untruthful. He had nothing to do with the deal, and we cover that in our written submissions and I do not repeat it.

What is said in my learned friend's submissions at paragraph 53 is that the claim in respect of Rusal is, on any view, a strong one. What we have seen, just from looking at the way the case is pleaded, and the way the evidence emerged, is that Mr Berezovsky's claim to have acquired an interest in the aluminium assets rests solely on the allegation that in 1999 it was agreed that the 1995 agreement would apply to them. We would submit that the claim is not a strong one, it is hopeless.

Nor is Mr Berezovsky's case assisted any further by any sundry ambiguities and gaps he points to. These include, first of all, the inclusion of Badri and Mr Berezovsky, as a signatory to the master agreement, and secondly the argument that Mr Berezovsky was a party to the master agreement by virtue of being a beneficial owner of the purchasing companies.

Mr Berezovsky relies on the master contract of 10 February. I don't need to take your Ladyship to it. It's at H(A)17 at 38T H(A)17/38T. Badri is described as one of the persons constituting party 1, it also includes Mr Shvidler, and the evidence as to why Mr Shvidler was a party was to the effect that he was one of the critical figures in the process of negotiating the deal.

As far as Mr Badri's role is concerned, he was the person who facilitated the deal, and his involvement is covered in the four protocols which were prepared for him in February. They are the documents that were notarised before a Moscow notary on 16 March 2000. There is a dispute as to whether these were documents designed to cover the cost of an aircraft which was agreed at the Dorchester. However, we adopt Mr Abramovich's submission that these agreements were unconnected to the acquisition of aircraft, which is dealt with in Mr Abramovich's closing at paragraph 406.3 and footnote 1461.

As to the dispute of whether or not Mr Badri was a purchaser of the aluminium assets, evidence was given on behalf of Mr Anisimov to the effect that he believed that Badri was a purchaser. That evidence was also given by other witnesses called by Mr Anisimov.

But a number of points need to be made on this. First, the relevant question for this court is whether or not Mr Berezovsky was a purchaser of the aluminium assets. Now, one of the issues in the Chancery case is whether or not Mr Berezovsky and Badri were partners so that Mr Berezovsky could claim in respect of Badri's interest in the aluminium assets, assuming he did acquire an interest, and that issue is in the Chancery Division and it doesn't arise before this court.

That's a point that we make in our closing at paragraph 117, especially 117.3.

The second point is that it follows that Mr Berezovsky cannot say in the proceedings before your Ladyship that Badri acquired some interest, specifically by way of the master agreement, and that helps Mr Berezovsky. That would be bringing in by the back door the argument that Mr Berezovsky is not allowed to make. He is not allowed to say that if Badri had a right, Mr Berezovsky had half of that right because of his alleged bilateral joint venture with Badri.

As your Ladyship --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm not sure I agree with that. I'm not sure it needs to rest on the alleged joint venture agreement with Mr Patarkatsishvili.

MR MALEK: If it doesn't need to rely on the joint venture then the point doesn't arise. But if it does need to --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, the point I'm making, Mr Malek, is that surely it's open to Mr Berezovsky to say, well, Mr Abramovich knew, because of my agreement with him, that I was in there half and half and Mr Badri was there, as it were, fronting for me.

MR MALEK: That's fine, there's no difficulty with that. My only argument is the argument that because Badri was a party to the bilateral joint venture, and therefore if Badri acquired an interest then I'm entitled to claim an interest by virtue of that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I can see that.

MR MALEK: That's the only point I'm making.

The contention that Mr Berezovsky was an undisclosed principal to the master agreement is, we say, absurd. As he confirmed in cross-examination in response to my questions, he had not even seen the agreement prior to this litigation. He did not know its terms. Clearly he did not assume any obligations under it and could not have acquired any rights.

The third point, which I think is tied into the point I just made to your Ladyship under my second point, is that Mr Berezovsky cannot say that because Badri signed, everyone must have known that Badri (sic) was involved because everybody knew of Mr Berezovsky's partnership with Badri. That's another case, that Mr Berezovsky expressly tried to add but was struck out by the court.

So the attempt to sneak this argument back, and the reference is to his closing submissions at paragraph 62.3 and 1114, where he states that his partnership with Mr Patarkatsishvili was notorious, is in our submission inappropriate.

So it therefore follows that a fourth possible route to make a claim to the aluminium assets is simply not open to Mr Berezovsky in these proceedings, and it's that fourth possible route which I'm addressing here. There was the three routes, there is no fourth route.

So that highlights a point that, when considering the question of whether the subsequent evidence indicates that Mr Berezovsky thought he had an interest in the aluminium assets, whether pre or post merger, for the court to keep in mind that the critical question is not whether or not Mr Berezovsky has an interest based on arguments that are not open to him; the critical question must be whether or not it proves one of the three ways in which he brings this claim.

That's a point that we submit is very important to keep in mind when your Ladyship comes to look at the subsequent evidence. You have to look at the subsequent evidence, we submit, to see whether it supports a pleaded case based on the 1995 agreement, the 1999 agreement, or the contribution of the Sibneft profits into the aluminium assets.

The final point here is that Mr Berezovsky's closing submissions jump upon Mr Anisimov's, Mr Streshinsky's and Mr Buzuk's assumption that Badri may have been one of the purchasers as evidence in support of his case that they believed that Badri and Berezovsky were purchasers.

The references there to Mr Berezovsky's submissions are 1139, 1143.5. And Mr Berezovsky asserts at 1114 that the view, and I quote, of "all four sellers", including specifically Mr Anisimov, was that "Mr Berezovsky acquired an ownership interest in the aluminium assets and was one of the principals involved in the transaction."

Now, to put it lightly, this is a gross mischaracterisation of Mr Anisimov's evidence. It is a point repeated over and over again in Mr Berezovsky's closing submissions, and, again, in the schedule 1 handed up yesterday at page 33, responding to paragraph 395 of Mr Abramovich's submissions, and at page 40, the box concerning paragraph 414. But hollow repetition of this bad point does not give it credibility.

Mr Anisimov was very clear in his evidence about this, and it's in paragraph 42, where he says that:

"Mr Berezovsky was not present at any of the meetings which I attended and at which the sale of the KrAZ assets was discussed nor, to the best of my knowledge, was his name even mentioned."

Paragraph 45:

"I am aware that Mr Berezovsky is claiming that he had an interest in the KrAZ assets".

Then he goes on to say in the same paragraph:

"For my part it was neither apparent to me nor was it ever suggested to me that Mr Berezovsky was involved in the purchase of, or acquired [an] interest in, the KrAZ assets."

And as to any assumptions as to Mr Badri's interest, Mr Anisimov, Mr Streshinsky and Mr Buzuk's assumptions were just that, assumptions. There is a subtle but significant difference between an assumption without an enquiry and a belief based upon extraneous knowledge.

Mr Anisimov's, Mr Streshinsky's and Mr Buzuk's assumptions should not be mistaken for any concrete form of belief. They do not provide evidence of what Mr Badri's evidence in fact was, and they certainly do not provide any support as to whether or not Mr Berezovsky had any interest.

Now, the other point made is Mr Berezovsky as a beneficial owner of the purchasing companies. In cross-examination of a number of witnesses, Mr Buzuk and Mr Streshinsky, see paragraph 113 of our written closing submissions for references, a point was made that the sellers did not know the identity of the beneficial owners of the purchasing company. Mr Berezovsky now says that he was one of those beneficial owners. The cross-reference to his closing submissions are paragraphs 62.3, 1114 and 1149.

Mr Berezovsky was never able to identify what exactly it was he says Mr Abramovich held on trust for him. Was it the companies or the plants? The cross-reference to our opening submissions on that, where we deal with this point, is at paragraph 39.10.

Now, in his written closing, Mr Berezovsky at paragraphs 1114 and 1149, plumps, contrary to his pleaded case in this action at C59A to C59B, for being a beneficial owner of the companies rather than the plants. Mr Berezovsky says that this is significant because the four purchasing companies were party to the master agreement. The reference there is 1114.

But this does not add anything to Mr Berezovsky's case on the alleged 1999 agreement or the master agreement as he contends. He does not advance any specific basis for asserting that he was a beneficial owner of the companies, for example a declaration of trust by offshore nominee holders. He simply relies on

Mr Abramovich's alleged agreement in 1999 that the aluminium assets would be held on the same terms as the 1995 agreement.

Mr Berezovsky would be as much a party to the master agreement by being a beneficiary behind Mr Abramovich as he would be a beneficiary behind the companies.

So the beneficial owner of the companies case is therefore not a distinct case for the alleged 1999 agreement, and it certainly does not give Mr Berezovsky an additional route into being a party to the master agreement.

Can I just deal briefly with the Badri interview notes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can I just say this. I've got to rise promptly at 4.15 because I've got a meeting. If you're going to go beyond 4.15 then I'm going to ask you to continue tomorrow.

MR MALEK: I'll be one minute, two minutes, last point.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Again I don't want to put any pressure on you.

MR MALEK: I'm obliged, your Ladyship. It's just this on the Badri interview notes.

It was argued by Mr Berezovsky that these indicate that Badri believed himself and Mr Berezovsky to have an interest in KrAZ and Bratsk assets corresponding to their shares in Sibneft.

However, the only indication as to how that interest was acquired was on the basis that the money to acquire those assets had come from the Sibneft assets. We know that that is not correct, as I've just indicated, and therefore the evidence of the interview notes do not take matters further.

The reference to this can be found in Mr Abramovich's schedule at page 126, commenting on paragraphs 1145.4 to 5 of Mr Berezovsky's closing submissions.

My Lady, that's a convenient point to rise, if that's convenient to your Ladyship.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. How much longer do you think you're going to be?

MR MALEK: An hour.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much indeed. Very well, 10.30 tomorrow.

I think there is some sort of educational function here arranged by one of the parties after court.

I assume you all know about it?

MR MALEK: I don't but I don't think it matters.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay. Well, perhaps you could ask Mr Huntley, who is sitting at the back of the court, about it.

MR MALEK: We will ask Mr Huntley.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just so you all know. I may have got it wrong, it may be next week.

Very well. 10.30 tomorrow.

Closing submissions by MR MALEK .....115

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Malek.

MR MALEK: My Lady, we were looking yesterday at the question of whether Mr Berezovsky had an interest in the aluminium assets on the basis alleged in these proceedings, and we say no.

So the next point to deal with is the question as to what are the consequences if he didn't have that interest, and we submit that there are three consequences. The first one is that, when considering the question of the likely probabilities, we contend that the court should conclude that it is inconceivable that Mr Abramovich and Mr Deripaska would have given an interest to him during the course of the Dorchester meeting on 13 March 2000. There is no reason for Mr Abramovich to have done so. Mr Berezovsky had nothing to do with the hard work of putting together Rusal, and he had no role in relation to Rusal and its creation or its future business.

The second consequence, and this follows from the first point, is that Mr Berezovsky would have provided no consideration for the alleged express trust in relation to Rusal which he alleges was agreed at the Dorchester Hotel.

The third consequence is that Mr Berezovsky has no interest that he can trace into Rusal, whether by way of a constructive trust or otherwise.

My Lady, there's one point, I should pick up this point that is made in the claimant's schedule that was handed up by my learned friend, Mr Rabinowitz, in the opening, and it's at page 32 where he makes a point in response to what is said by Mr Abramovich at paragraph 395 of the closing submissions.

If I could ask your Ladyship just to read what the response is and I will make a short point in response. So it's at the bottom of page 32, it's the last box dealing with 395.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR MALEK: It's really the first point made there, the so-called non sequitur about the technically defective. Our response to that is that we are not saying that Mr Berezovsky's interest was technically defective as a matter of Russian law. We contend that he had no interest at all, and that's a response to that point.

That is the end of his claim for a constructive trust or resulting trust in respect of Rusal since his claims are based on him having a pre-existing proprietary interest in the assets contributed in the merger.

I can now then deal with the next, I think my third, topic in the list of subsequent events, and that's the Dorchester Hotel meeting. Various points about this meeting have been fully canvassed, and by way of oral submission I wish to make seven short points on why that claim fails.

The first point is that your Ladyship is aware of the essential background: the negotiations started in March 2000 at the hotel, continued at Mr Abramovich's house. The material terms found their way into the sale and purchase agreement of 15 March, and it was amended on 15 May to reflect the addition of the Bratsk assets.

Our point there is that there is no evidence that Mr Berezovsky was involved in anything relating to the negotiations apart from the Dorchester Hotel meeting. He therefore is forced to contend that this meeting is of critical significance during which everything was agreed.

The second point is that a lot is made by Mr Berezovsky as to why Mr Abramovich and others were willing to see him in London. As I mentioned earlier in my submissions yesterday, we contend that the evidence makes sense as a Russian presidential election had taken place on 7 March. Mr Berezovsky was at the height of his political influence. In view of Mr Berezovsky's interest in promoting his profile, it is reasonable to conclude that he wanted the meeting in order to highlight his importance.

The third point is that Mr Berezovsky's account of the meeting does not make sense in a number of respects. He had not been involved in the working group or in the drafting of the various agreements. His evidence that important matters were agreed is simply not made out during the course of that meeting. Of the matters that he says were agreed at the Dorchester meeting, it is clear that they had already been covered in the preliminary agreement.

The fourth point is that Mr Berezovsky's evidence that he recalls about the equalisation payment involving Mr Deripaska is simply false and dishonest. This is a matter which was agreed later and was related to the addition of certain of the Bratsk assets to the merger. The evidence of Mr Hauser was that certain of the Bratsk assets were added later and this gave rise to the 15 May revision.

We refer your Ladyship, not to turn to it now, to Mr Abramovich's schedule commenting on Mr Berezovsky's closing at paragraph 1181, and that's at pages 130 to 132 of the schedule, where there is a whole series of points demolishing Mr Berezovsky's new theory that it was agreed at the Dorchester Hotel meeting that the Bratsk assets would be included in the merger, in return for increasing the compensatory payment from Mr Deripaska from $400 million to $575 million.

The fifth point is that had Mr Berezovsky or Badri been parties to the deal in relation to the merger, it is reasonable to suppose that they would have been involved in the addition of the Bratsk assets which culminated in the agreement of 15 May. They were not.

Sixthly, the only term that Mr Berezovsky has identified which was not included in the preliminary agreement was a no selling without consent provision. There is no reason why this term should have been agreed. It is denied by Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler and Mr Deripaska. And as Mr Sumption pointed out in the course of his oral submissions, it is not a term that would have made any commercial sense. That's Day 40, 35.27 to 37.7.

Seventhly and finally, none of the persons involved in the process of finalising the terms of the purchase agreement knew of the meeting. This confirms that nothing of substance was agreed at the meeting.

There is one issue which your Ladyship raised with my learned friend Mr Rabinowitz, which related to the question of the nature of the interest that Mr Berezovsky acquired as a result of the meeting, and your Ladyship asked the question whether it was personal or whether it was proprietary. You will find a discussion of this point in Mr Abramovich's written closing at paragraphs 516 to 519. And the point that is made there, and I just simply summarise, is that it is all too vague and nothing was identifiable which could constitute trust property. But we simply adopt the submissions that are made there and I do not repeat them.

The only other point to make about Dorchester is that the allegation upon which Mr Anisimov has adduced evidence is Mr Berezovsky's contention that it was agreed that the merger agreements would be governed by English law. That's the British law point. And, as I mentioned to your Ladyship yesterday, this allegation was not put to Mr Anisimov during the course of his cross-examination.

By way of oral submission, I just wish to highlight four brief points. The first point is that Mr Berezovsky's written submissions in respect of this allegation have been thoroughly inconsistent, both in respect of when the advice was given, what it related to, and who it was given to, whether it was to Badri and/or Mr Berezovsky. The reference there is E3.3 of our written closing submissions.

Secondly, the court will no doubt wish to trace the history of the allegation. The allegation was only introduced in the context that Mr Berezovsky suddenly realised that he needed to prove English law in order for this claim to be valid. We deal with that in section E3.2 of our written closings. We submit that everything here points to this being an invention. Had the allegation any substance it would have been raised far earlier.

The third point is that this part of the trial was a low point for Mr Berezovsky. His performance in the witness stand in respect of the alleged advice from Mr Anisimov was abysmal. He flipped and flopped all over the place, and we deal with that at E3.4.2 of our written closing submissions.

The fourth point is that the third point I have just made was tacitly recognised in Mr Berezovsky's closing submissions.

Tellingly, Mr Anisimov's alleged advice about British law is not cited as one of the pieces of evidence in support of the alleged express agreement between Mr Berezovsky, Badri and Mr Abramovich. You will see that from the closing submissions of Mr Berezovsky at 67 to 74, 1581 to 1592, whereas previously it had always been cited in support, and you will get that from Mr Berezovsky's written opening at paragraph 457.

In fact, the only mention of Mr Anisimov's advice in Mr Berezovsky's written closing submissions, which is not warranted given that the point was not even put to him, has now changed. Mr Berezovsky's closing submissions -- and this is paragraphs 1253 to 1254 -- say that the explanatory note, which does not refer to British law but refers to using offshore structures and generically western lawyers, supports Mr Berezovsky's allegations that Mr Anisimov advised Badri, and I quote:

"... to structure his affairs offshore using western laws, and that it was Mr Patarkatsishvili who had subsequently used the phrase 'British law'."

As I say, that's at paragraph 1254, lines 5 to 6.

Now, we say that that is simply wrong.

Mr Berezovsky's allegation has always been that Mr Anisimov advised the use of British law, not Badri. The reference there is paragraph E3.3 of our written closing which sets out Mr Berezovsky's various allegations in pleadings and the written evidence. And it is not correct to say now that Mr Berezovsky's case has been that Mr Anisimov's advice was confined to western law in order to manipulate the evidence to support Mr Berezovsky's last minute argument that the explanatory note was authored by Mr Anisimov or his advisers.

Now, the next point is the Rusal contractual documentation. Mr Berezovsky has made a number of submissions concerning what was referred to in his written opening submissions as the Rusal contractual documentation, and the starting point on that is that it cannot be said that this documentation can be used for the purpose of establishing any knowledge on the part of Mr Anisimov. He was not involved in the formation of Rusal and did not see any of the documentation prior to the commencement of these proceedings.

Now, let's just deal with the main points made by Mr Berezovsky. First, he contended that he was an undisclosed party to the preliminary agreement, and that was provided for in the use of the word "partners" of Mr Abramovich. You will get that from his closing submissions at paragraphs 1164 to 1175. But the answer to that is that Mr Berezovsky had not seen the preliminary agreement before these proceedings and admitted that he knew nothing about its negotiation.

We contend that it is hard to see how it could seriously be contended that he was an undisclosed principal to an agreement which he did not see, he did not know its terms and, moreover, the drafting of the agreements indicate that Mr Berezovsky was not considered to be involved. The concern, as your Ladyship heard, was that one of the parties might be acting as a front for the Trans-World Group. Mr Hauser's evidence is important on this and we submit that Mr Hauser is a credible witness with no axe to grind.

The reference to the materials on this is our closing submissions, E2.2 and paragraph 157, and we also adopt Mr Abramovich's closing submissions at paragraphs 422 to 428, and also Mr Abramovich's schedule which deals with this at paragraphs 127 forwards -- sorry, page 127 forwards, and which deals with the evidence of the draftsmen.

Now, the second point is that Mr Berezovsky contends that he was similarly an undisclosed party to the merger agreement of 15 March after the Dorchester meeting, and that's covered by the phrase "Other Selling Shareholders". He makes the same point concerning the restated and amended SPSA in his closing submissions at paragraph 1271 forwards, where the reference is to the "other P1 shareholders". Again Mr Hauser's evidence comprehensively demolished these points and this has been dealt with by Mr Abramovich's team. The reference to our closing is E2.2 and paragraph 157, Mr Abramovich's closing submissions paragraphs 422 to 428, and Mr Abramovich's schedule at page 127 onwards.

So we submit that the only conclusion that can be reached is that Mr Berezovsky's account concerning the Dorchester agreement is false and must be rejected. We submit the account given by Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler and Mr Deripaska should be preferred. We point out that there is no contemporaneous documentation supporting Mr Berezovsky's account. And as far as his heavy reliance on the notes of the interviews with Mr Badri, these were made long after the events in question. They started in 2005 and, we submit, do not support -- are not contemporaneous and do not support Mr Berezovsky's account. You will find a useful summary of the various points in Mr Abramovich's schedule at page 134 commenting on Mr Berezovsky's closing submissions at paragraph 1215.

Let's move on to the fourth topic, which is the subsequent events to the Dorchester meeting that Mr Berezovsky relies upon. As your Ladyship knows, this is concerned with the question of the weight that can be attached to circumstantial evidence covering events after the merger as an indication that Mr Berezovsky had an interest in Rusal.

As I mentioned yesterday, the question is not whether there is evidence that is consistent with Mr Berezovsky having an interest in Rusal, but whether there is evidence that supports his case that he acquired an interest in Rusal by virtue of the case that is pleaded and which he can advance in these proceedings before your Ladyship. You are not concerned with the allegation in the Chancery Division that he acquired an interest by virtue of the alleged bilateral joint venture between Mr Berezovsky and Badri.

It is also right to record here that it is not suggested by Mr Berezovsky that he can advance a case outside his pleadings, and we are proceeding on the basis that the only case we have to meet is the one that has been pleaded.

Now, the matters that are relied upon are six. There's the Le Bourget transcript; the internal planning documents; the Curtis notes of August 2003; the alleged distribution to Mr Berezovsky and Badri of Rusal profits; the terms of the --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just stopping there, Mr Malek, and going back to the point you made a moment ago.

MR MALEK: Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It is relevant for the purposes of this action for me to consider and probably to decide whether the fact that Mr Patarkatsishvili was paid 585 million reflected an interest which he, Mr Patarkatsishvili, might have had in the assets.

MR MALEK: Correct, I agree with that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I have got to decide what is the correct characterisation or the reason for that payment.

MR MALEK: Correct.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Which has or potentially might have an ongoing impact for the Chancery proceeding.

MR MALEK: My Lady, if your Ladyship could just bear for a moment, I'm going to come back specifically to that question of what your Ladyship needs to decide, and I'll deal with that, if I may, at that point of time, but I will come back to that point.

Just going through the list, I think the last point I made were the terms of the 2004 documents for the sale of the second tranche and the Badri interview notes. I'm going to deal with most of this very quickly.

As far as the Le Bourget transcript is concerned, your Ladyship has Mr Abramovich's closing submissions at paragraphs 429 to 432. We have nothing to add on this beyond to stress that they do not give rise to any indication on any reading that Mr Berezovsky acquired an interest in Rusal which -- along the lines that he alleges in these proceedings.

The second point is the internal planning documents, which is dealt with in Mr Abramovich's closing submissions at paragraph 433 to 435. And the main document there is the explanatory note, and the reference for the transcript is H(E)1/3/4T. That's a document that was found in the office of Mr Badri's financial adviser, Mr Kay. It is now suggested that Mr Streshinsky was the author of the explanatory note but there is no evidence to support this, and that's a point that I will come to at the end of my oral submissions. And we adopt what Mr Sumption said about this document in the course of his oral argument, Day 40, page 51, where he said:

"It looks very much like a money-laundering exercise but it is hard to be sure about that on the very paltry information that we have about this rather incoherent document."

Curtis notes are covered by Mr Abramovich at 436 to 441. We submit that Mr Tenenbaum's evidence was entirely credible. The creation of this note suggests it was part of a legalisation document process. It ties into the Spectrum transaction and the Devonian transaction, from which Mr Curtis received a personal payment of $18 million in addition to his firm charging full professional fees.

As far as the alleged distribution of the dividends in Rusal, that relates to the 175 million which is described as constituting Rusal dividends paid to Mr Berezovsky and Badri in 2003 and 2005. It is covered in Mr Abramovich's written closing, paragraphs 442 to 448. Nothing further to add.

So that leads us on to Rusal. I'm not proposing to say anything about the first tranche because that's covered by Mr Abramovich, I want to deal with the second Rusal sale which, of course, is more important as far as my client is concerned.

Now, Mr Berezovsky's case on this, in a nutshell, is that references to multiple beneficiaries and BB in the draft documentation proved that he was a beneficial owner of Rusal but that he was airbrushed out of the final documents. We covered this in our written submissions at section E2.5, which is page 77, and E2.6 which is page 79.

What I propose to do is just to make a few short remarks by way of oral submission.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: E2.5 is the sale of the first --

MR MALEK: It's the first one, and then the second one is E2.6. So it's really E2.6.

Now it's important to distinguish between different issues. The matter in issue is whether or not Mr Berezovsky had an interest in Rusal proceeds on the basis pleaded in this case, and that is not the same as whether or not Badri had an interest in the Rusal proceeds because, as everybody agrees, Badri did have an interest in the monies he received, precisely because he received them. The defendants contend that they were his commission payments that he agreed with Mr Abramovich.

As I've just mentioned, the issue which does not arise in these proceedings is whether or not Mr Berezovsky had an interest in Badri's Rusal proceeds simply by virtue of the alleged joint venture between Badri and Mr Berezovsky.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I can quite see that, but the issue that does arise in these proceedings is whether, as Mr Berezovsky contends, because he's going to give credit for his share of the payment, that that was paid as part of the alleged ownership interest in Rusal.

MR MALEK: Agreed. And so the question then is not simply whether people thought that Mr Berezovsky had an interest in the Rusal proceeds, but whether any such speculation assists Mr Berezovsky in proving that Mr Abramovich agreed, back in 2000, to act as a trustee for Mr Berezovsky.

In this context, the key point is that none of the draft documents and none of the people involved in the creation of the documents for the second Rusal sale ever referred to the Dorchester meeting. It was never suggested to anyone during the course of this trial that the Dorchester meeting was linked to the second Rusal sale and the matters discussed.

So the short point here is that the second Rusal sales do not help Mr Berezovsky establish any of his claims to Rusal in these proceedings.

The second point is that the essence of Mr Berezovsky's case is that those drafting the documentation in connection with the second tranche transaction recognise that Mr Berezovsky did have an interest in Rusal and airbrushed him out of the contractual documentation by the time that the transaction was executed on 20 July 2004.

The point we make here is that there is no doubt that an allegation of airbrushing involves an allegation of dishonesty on the part of those involved in the transaction, in other words, the production of documentation which was knowingly false and a fraud on Mr Berezovsky to disguise -- to wipe out his interest.

We submit, as I indicated yesterday, that it was incumbent on Mr Berezovsky to put to the witnesses that particular allegation so that it could be answered by them. What he cannot do is to invite his lawyers to present a case theory in closing that was not firm enough to put to the witnesses so that they can answer the allegation.

Now, as I said, if there was a conspiracy to airbrush that would have necessarily involved Mr Anisimov. It was not a case that was put to Mr Anisimov and therefore it is not appropriate for him to maintain that Mr Anisimov was involved in any impropriety or conspiracy. That is true of all the allegations against Mr Streshinsky about Salford and Leboeuf's removal from the transaction, and it goes to the allegations that Mr Streshinsky told First Zurich Bank that Mr Berezovsky was a beneficiary and then withdrew the statement when money-laundering became an issue.

The sole purpose of those allegations was to implicate Mr Anisimov in Mr Berezovsky's alleged conspiracy theory. But as I say, that option is not open to Mr Berezovsky because no case of impropriety was put to Mr Anisimov.

The third point is that not only was the conspiracy theory not put to Mr Anisimov, it was comprehensively rebutted by the witnesses in evidence and the conspiracy theory is wholly unsupported by any evidence.

Let's look at the draft documents. The court will no doubt recall Mr Hauser's evidence when he emphatically denied that any airbrushing took place. His evidence was credible and should be accepted. Your Ladyship will remember Mr Hauser's evidence on that. He was clearly angry, he was irritated that this allegation was made against him and he answered that allegation to your Ladyship, and I would submit that his evidence was honest, it was credible and it should be accepted.

Now, the sole basis for this assertion by Mr Berezovsky is that because Mr Hauser confirmed that the references in documents that he drafted to BB and beneficiaries did not come from Mr Abramovich's representatives or Badri's representatives, and Mr Hauser indicated in one answer that the press reports may not have been the sole reason he persisted in including the references in his documents, that therefore by process of deduction it is alleged that the only logical conclusion is that Mr Deripaska instructed Mr Hauser that Mr Berezovsky was involved.

Now, the logic of its origin is attributed on some of the occasions that the point is asserted, but it is repeated with such frenzy, and the references are 1418.5, 1424.1, 1425 to 27, 1439 to 1443, 1462, 1488, 1492, 1512, 1513. It's a point that's made over and over again, but where you perhaps see it most clearly is in the closing submissions at paragraph 1418.5 where it is stated in his closing submissions:

"Mr Deripaska's team were originally instructed that Mr Berezovsky was also a beneficial owner alongside Mr Patarkatsishvili. However, they were prepared to live with the acknowledgement from Mr Abramovich and the warranty from Mr Patarkatsishvili that he was the sole beneficial owner."

This detailed version of the instructions given to Mr Deripaska's representatives, and Mr Deripaska's representatives' mindset, is pure make-believe. It finds no support in the evidence.

Let's start off by looking at Mr Deripaska's knowledge. The one person who could speak to Mr Deripaska's belief in 2004 was the one person who was not asked and that was Mr Deripaska himself. Mr Deripaska was only asked about events up to 2003, he was not asked about 2004. You will get that from his evidence at Day 29 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just a second. Before you go there, I'm just checking the reference you gave a moment ago.

MR MALEK: To 1418, subparagraph 5.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You referred to 1518.5 [in the draft transcript].

MR MALEK: I should correct it, it's 1418, subparagraph 5.

I think there was a mistake.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just a second, please.

Yes, thank you.

MR MALEK: So the point I'm making is that this is an allegation of instructions given by Mr Deripaska, and the point is that no questions were asked of Mr Deripaska.

Since Mr Deripaska was not asked any questions about the 2004 events, he was not asked whether he believed that Mr Berezovsky was behind the second Rusal sale. Instead of that, what Mr Berezovsky does is he relies on yet a circuitous and speculative route to establish something that could have been simply asked of Mr Deripaska directly.

In fact, we submit that the evidence shows that Mr Deripaska did not have this belief. As we point out in our closing submissions at paragraph 205.4, Mr Anisimov's unchallenged evidence was that he was asked by Mr Deripaska whether Mr Berezovsky had any connection to the transaction. Mr Anisimov therefore raised this with Badri, Badri assured him that Mr Berezovsky was not anywhere near the deal.

Now, this unchallenged evidence from Mr Anisimov indicates that Mr Deripaska did not have the knowledge alleged.

If I could ask you to turn to the schedule again of Mr Berezovsky, the claimant's schedule, at page 46, what is said in the bottom box is this, in relation to that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I can read it.

MR MALEK: Yes, it's the first sentence:

"Mr Deripaska denied having ever had the initial conversation with Mr Anisimov despite being asked about the matter by Mr Anisimov's own counsel, Mr Malek."

Now, with respect, that is wrong. He made no denial. In a note that was supposed to correct errors, alleged errors, this is a rather unfortunate error itself because if your Ladyship turns to Day 29, page [5] at line 18, he made no denial. He said he simply does not recall. And we would submit that it's not a case of what Mr Rabinowitz called amnesia in relation to Mr Anisimov's evidence on Baden Baden; it's hardly surprising that he doesn't recall this because it happened seven years ago. So that's Mr Deripaska.

What about Mr Hauser? We say it's bizarre for Mr Berezovsky to rely on Mr Hauser's evidence to support this conspiracy theory, and there are four points on this.

The first point is that Mr Hauser vehemently denied any impropriety in deliberately airbrushing Mr Berezovsky out of the documents. That's Day 32, page 29.16 to 30.6.

Secondly, if, as Mr Berezovsky's theory requires, Mr Hauser knew well from Mr Deripaska's instructions that Mr Berezovsky was a beneficial owner, then on Mr Berezovsky's case, what Mr Deripaska would have told Mr Hauser would not be a simple belief or possibility that Mr Berezovsky was involved, it would have been Mr Deripaska's instruction that he incontrovertibly knew that Mr Berezovsky was a beneficial owner, and had always been, and had had personal dealings with Mr Abramovich concerning the shares from at least the moment of the meeting at the Dorchester Hotel in 2000, because Mr Deripaska was at that meeting, a party to the alleged Dorchester agreement, and a witness to the alleged trust agreement between Mr Abramovich, Badri and Mr Berezovsky.

The acknowledgement from Mr Abramovich and the warranty from Badri would thus have simply been a lie and Mr Hauser would have known that. Yet Mr Hauser specifically confirmed, in addition to generally confirming that he was not a party to airbrushing conspiracy, that he would not have allowed his client to sign a document that he knew to be factually inaccurate.

The references to Mr Hauser's evidence are Day 31, 29.16 to 30.6, Day 31, 93.4 to 17. We submit, as I indicated earlier, that his evidence was credible and we would invite your Ladyship to accept it.

Thirdly, were it to be the case that Mr Hauser allowed his client to knowingly sign agreements which were liable to be challenged by Mr Berezovsky, because Mr Deripaska knew at the time that they were false, then as Mr Hauser explained, those documents do not do what they purport to do. That's Day 31, 26.16 to 30.6. But Mr Hauser made it clear that he thought that that would be an incompetent thing for a solicitor to have done. That's Day 31, 30.1 to 6.

The fourth point is that it follows from this that Mr Berezovsky's speculation that Mr Deripaska must have instructed Mr Hauser that Mr Berezovsky was a beneficiary based on what Mr Hauser could not say, namely what Mr Deripaska's instructions to him were, was an avenue that is closed off by what Mr Hauser did say. That's the important point. Mr Hauser's evidence is clear.

Now, what other sources Mr Hauser may have been referring to when he said that the press was not the sole reason for including a reference to Mr Berezovsky in his documentation, whatever it could have been, it cannot have been Mr Deripaska's instructions.

That deals with Mr Deripaska and it deals with Mr Hauser.

In fact the explanation for the draft documentation is simple. It's addressed in our closing submissions at paragraphs 182 to 184 and goes back to Mr Berezovsky's public assertions that he had an interest in Rusal. As we explained there, people who draft documentation have to be careful, they want to avoid risk, and those drafting the documents adopted an approach to drafting which did not proceed on the basis that they thought that Mr Berezovsky had an interest in the Rusal proceeds, but rather they proceeded on the basis that their respective clients would not take the risk that Mr Berezovsky had an interest.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just remind me, Mr Abramovich called Mr Hauser, not your client?

MR MALEK: That's correct. Under a witness summons.

As your Ladyship will recall, this goes back to the period in early June 2004, shortly after the negotiations had begun, where Mr Berezovsky made the announcement to the press that he had an interest in the assets being sold and would, if necessary, resort to the courts to block the sale. That of course resulted in a consequent flurry of activity between the lawyers as to which party should take the risk that Mr Berezovsky would follow up his public assertions with some kind of nuisance claim in the future. Understandably, none of the parties were willing to do so.

The reasons for this are addressed fully in our submissions at paragraph 206, which I will not repeat here, but again commonsense comes into play. What is particularly telling is that, although Mr Berezovsky was prepared to make those statements to the press, he did not make any statement to those involved in the drafting of the documents. We would submit that that is important. Because had Mr Berezovsky genuinely held an interest in Rusal, it is reasonable to suppose that he would have asserted an interest directly rather than sitting by and making grand and empty statements which no doubt increased the perception of his importance by virtue of those statements but which had no legal consequences and were untrue.

We contend that the events surrounding the second Rusal sale show that Mr Berezovsky's account about the Dorchester meeting, or that he had an interest in the assets that found their way into Rusal, is false.

Your Ladyship knows that Mr Badri gave a confirmation that was inconsistent with Mr Berezovsky having any interest, and it is worth stressing that Mr Berezovsky's case about what he knew about that confirmation by Mr Badri is confusing to say the least. We submit that it seems likely that he knew that Badri gave that confirmation, and that's a point that we cover in our closing submissions at paragraph 210, page 104.

Now, the next point concerns this point, which is we know that it was Badri who took on that risk. He was receiving the money from the transaction so he was the natural commercial party to accept the risk. Badri was happy to do so, and indeed expressly confirmed both in documentation and privately that the representations were correct.

There are two points here. First, Badri told Mr Anisimov that Mr Berezovsky was not involved in the deal, and that's referred to in our closing submissions at paragraph 205.4, which makes a reference to Mr Anisimov's evidence at paragraph 71. And this evidence is an important point relevant specifically to Mr Anisimov, and it falls within the second category of points which should have been put to Mr Anisimov if Mr Berezovsky disagreed with it. Yet Mr Anisimov's evidence about this conversation was not challenged in cross-examination.

The second point is that Badri confirmed to Mr Streshinsky that the representations he was making were correct and that he was in fact the sole beneficial owner of the shares, and that was during Mr Streshinsky's trip to Badri's dacha in Georgia. Now Mr Berezovsky necessarily challenges Mr Streshinsky's evidence on this, and this entails, in order to explain away the conversation between Badri and Mr Streshinsky, an elaborate theory that Badri and Mr Streshinsky sent Mr Faekov of Akin Gump off on a merry wander down the beach so that he was out of earshot whilst Mr Streshinsky and Badri cooked up a plot to give the warranties, even though they were false, just to get the deal done.

That theory is far-fetched, it is unfounded. There is absolutely no evidence to justify the assertion. Mr Berezovsky contends in his closing submissions at paragraph 1522, subparagraph 5, that there is no credible alternative explanation for why Mr Faekov accompanied Mr Streshinsky on the trip to Georgia. This is both illogical and inconsistent with the evidence.

As Mr Streshinsky explained, the trip was a three-day trip in which both of them worked on the documentation. Just because Mr Faekov was not a party to one conversation with Badri does not mean that his presence on the trip is inexplicable in the absence of Mr Berezovsky's conspiracy explanation.

In fact, Mr Streshinsky followed up the meeting with Mr Patarkatsishvili by sending him the deal approval document, and that's a document at H(A)81 at 184 H(A)81/184, and we deal with that in our closing at 205.8 to 205.11.

What Mr Berezovsky does is that he interprets this document as an admission of Mr Berezovsky's interest, and you get that from his closing submissions at 1525(c) to 1529. But, and this is the important point, he omits to mention that Mr Faekov's and Mr Streshinsky's conclusion was that they did not know of any facts that Mr Berezovsky could rely on to substantiate his allegation.

If your Ladyship could just turn to paragraph 205.8 of our --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I'm there.

MR MALEK: You'll see the point, and it's made there.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR MALEK: The statement that they did not know of any facts that Mr Berezovsky could rely upon, that necessarily would have been false and known to be false if the conspiracy theory is correct, and we would submit that there is no basis at all for doubting that conclusion.

So the position is that there was no conspiracy. There are many other flaws in the conspiracy. Had there been a conspiracy, it would involve many persons apart from Mr Anisimov. There were too many professionals involved to suggest that this allegation has any substance to it. And it is important to stress that the conduct of the parties and the advisers can be explained in a way that does not involve any dishonesty or wiping out of Mr Berezovsky's interest.

What the evidence shows are concerns of the drafting parties that Mr Berezovsky might have an interest that was genuine, as was the subsequent acceptance that Mr Berezovsky did not have an interest and their residual caution about allocating the risk of an unfounded and baseless claim by Mr Berezovsky.

Now, the only other two allegations concerning the alleged conspiracy that concern Mr Anisimov directly are Mr Berezovsky's allegations concerning the removal of Salford/Leboeuf from the transaction negotiations, and Mr Streshinsky's communications with First Zurich Bank. My Lady, those arguments are dealt with in our submissions, I don't propose to go through them.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can I ask you one question, I'm looking at the document --

MR MALEK: At H(A)81/184, is that the one?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. Just remind me, because I can't see my note on it, who put the comments in the right-hand column, the prescient comments? Was there ever any evidence on that?

It's the column that says "Methods of elimination and assessment of the risk". Just remind me --

MR MALEK: My Lady, it was a jointly prepared document by Mr Streshinsky and Mr Faekov of Akin Gump, so it would --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It was jointly prepared by both -- it's not a response in any way, it's jointly prepared by Mr Streshinsky and Mr Faekov, is it?

MR MALEK: That's our understanding, correct.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thanks.

MR MALEK: As I say, the only other two allegations -- there's the Salford/Leboeuf point, which is the point that we cover in our submissions at 186 to 193. Your Ladyship has our submissions in writing, and the points that are made -- relied upon are fully set out in writing and I don't propose to repeat them because there's nothing further to add.

Now, as far as the First Zurich Bank is concerned, that is at 194 to 204 of our written closing, and it's the height of Mr Berezovsky's case on this, as it appears from Mr Streshinsky's comments to First Zurich Bank that Mr Streshinsky contemplated the possibility that Mr Berezovsky was a beneficial owner of the Rusal shares but, again, that is an argument that is built upon speculation, and there's just three points worth stressing in relation to that.

The first point is that, as Mr Streshinsky conclusively clarified, until he had spoken to Badri in June 2004 in Georgia, he did not know with confidence what the position was with regard to Mr Berezovsky. He knew Mr Berezovsky was claiming an interest. He knew that Mr Deripaska was concerned about this but he had no personal knowledge of the true position. So on any view this evidence does not help Mr Berezovsky prove an alleged Dorchester meeting at all.

The second point is that nor does it assist Mr Berezovsky to prove Mr Anisimov's knowledge. The argument appears to be that if Mr Streshinsky thought something, Mr Anisimov must think the same. That is just pure speculation.

Then the third point, and this is perhaps the most important point about the FZB communications, is that Mr Berezovsky's -- the unreliability of the FZB communications to Mr Berezovsky's case is in fact borne out by the later communications, which Mr Berezovsky's written closing conveniently ignores.

As set out in paragraph 203 of our written closing, that's page 96, FZB's conclusion on the evidence they had seen, and the information Mr Streshinsky had provided them, was that there was some form of retroactive structuring going on for the purposes to provide a satisfactory explanation for the settlement of account, but the evidence did not support any actual historical interest in the Rusal shares, whether in Badri or Mr Berezovsky.

We would submit that that very conclusion is wholly contradictory to Mr Berezovsky's case that he acquired in 2000 at the Dorchester meeting the interests that he pleads in Rusal. It is, on the other hand, supportive of the legalisation activity that was a particular concern for Badri at the time.

There remains one specific allegation -- one allegation specific to Mr Anisimov that needs to be addressed, and that is Mr Anisimov's alleged knowledge of Mr Berezovsky's interest in Rusal. If your Ladyship turns to Mr Berezovsky's closing, you'll see that this is dealt with at 1137 to 1140. I have two issues which I need to address. The first is the issue of what findings the court should make in respect of Mr Berezovsky's allegations about Mr Anisimov's knowledge. Then the second is it to address why Mr Berezovsky's allegations about Mr Anisimov's knowledge, which are set out in detail in his written closing, are wrong.

Let's deal with this first question, the question of what findings a court should make as to Mr Anisimov's state of knowledge. Now, it was suggested by my learned friend Mr Rabinowitz yesterday to your Ladyship that no findings should be made about Mr Anisimov's knowledge of Mr Berezovsky's alleged interest in Rusal. What Mr Rabinowitz said is that this was the correct approach because, I quote:

"... the overlap issues ... have not been defined so as to require this court to make any findings about Mr Anisimov's knowledge or any questions of his honesty or dishonesty."

The transcript reference to that is Day 42, page 112, lines 11 to 15. We submit that that is not correct, and Mr Berezovsky's team did not take that approach when making detailed submissions about Mr Anisimov's knowledge in their written closing submissions.

We would submit that there are three very good reasons why this court should make findings of fact as to Mr Anisimov's knowledge. In summary -- let me just list them and I'll develop the points. The first point is that it is Mr Berezovsky who has put Mr Anisimov's alleged knowledge in issue in this case and, on

Mr Berezovsky's own case, the question of Mr Anisimov's knowledge falls to be determined under overlap issues 1, 2 and 3. Mr Berezovsky relies on Mr Anisimov's alleged knowledge in both 2000 and in 2004 as evidence of Mr Berezovsky's alleged interest in the aluminium assets and in Rusal. That's my first submission.

My second submission is that Mr Berezovsky has himself invited the court to make findings about Mr Anisimov's knowledge. Mr Rabinowitz's position yesterday was a reversal from the position in Mr Berezovsky's written closing submissions.

My final point is that this court is the forum in which issues about Mr Anisimov's knowledge relating to the aluminium assets and Rusal are to be decided. Any other outcome would involve exactly the duplication and waste of court time that the joinder of these actions was intended to avoid and would be unfair to the Anisimov defendants.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: When you say issues about Mr Anisimov's knowledge, do you include dishonesty as part of the knowledge issue?

MR MALEK: Yes, exactly. If it's part of their case, the allegation involves allegations of dishonesty, the answer is yes. And, of course, these are -- the fact that those points were not put needs to be considered.

Let's just deal with each of these three points that I've just mentioned. My first submission was that Mr Anisimov's alleged knowledge of Mr Berezovsky's interest in the aluminium assets and Rusal is squarely within overlap issues 1, 2 and 3, having been brought into those issues by Mr Berezovsky himself.

Now, overlap issue 1 concerns whether Mr Berezovsky acquired an interest in the aluminium industry prior to the meeting at the Dorchester meeting in March 2000, namely by acquiring an interest in the aluminium assets sold by Mr Anisimov as one of the sellers in early 2000.

As your Ladyship is aware, Mr Berezovsky's case is that he was one of the purchasers of the aluminium assets. He has attempted to prove that case by asserting that the sellers, including Mr Anisimov, all knew that he was one of the purchasers. Indeed, Mr Berezovsky went to town in his oral evidence in his assertions that the sellers, including Mr Anisimov, all knew that he was the key to the deal, saying that he had had numerous meetings with them and so on. So this is not an insignificant part of Mr Berezovsky's case.

Your Ladyship can see that these allegations are repeated in Mr Berezovsky's closing submissions, and the references there to his closing submissions are 59.5, 1114, 1118, 1137 to 1139, 1143 subparagraph 5, 1146, 1251, 1547.7, and it's repeated in the schedule 1, pages 33 and 40.

It was also a case advanced orally by Mr Rabinowitz yesterday, which is at Day 42, page 63.27 to 64.7 -- sorry, 63.23 and 64.7.

So we submit it is perverse that Mr Berezovsky now suggests that the court should make no findings concerning Mr Anisimov's knowledge, despite relying on what he asserts the sellers, including Mr Anisimov, knew in order to prove his case against Mr Abramovich.

Mr Berezovsky's submissions concerning Mr Anisimov's alleged knowledge to prove his case on overlap issue 1 are not limited to a general assertion about the four sellers. In fact Mr Berezovsky goes out of his way in a series of very detailed arguments, which I will address shortly, to prove that specifically Mr Anisimov did have knowledge of Mr Berezovsky's alleged interest in the aluminium assets, and Mr Berezovsky then makes detailed points on the basis of various matters.

First of all, there is Mr Anisimov's visa declaration, and that's his closing submissions, 1137.1. Secondly, there's Mr Moss's note of the purported Baden Baden meeting with Mr Anisimov, and that's paragraph 1137, subparagraphs 2 to 5. Thirdly, there is Mr Anisimov's alleged knowledge about the use of British or western law, and the closing submissions there are 1245 and 1253 to 1254.

Fourthly, there's Streshinsky's email to Ms Khudyk, and that's his closing submissions at 1137, subsection 6. Fifthly, there is the fax from Syndikus to Mr Streshinsky dated 27 March 2000, and the closing submission is at 1250. Sixthly, there is Mr Streshinsky's communications with First Zurich Bank, and that is Mr Berezovsky's closing submissions, paragraph 1137, subparagraph 6(g). And seventhly, there is the explanatory note, which is in his closing submissions at 1137, subparagraph 8.

Your Ladyship will recall that a lengthy amount of cross-examination of Mr Streshinsky was devoted to these last four documents in order for Mr Berezovsky to try to assert that Mr Streshinsky, and therefore Mr Anisimov, knew about Mr Berezovsky's alleged interest in the aluminium assets. That's Day 33, page 46, 112, and page 129 to 147.

We would submit: what was the purpose of this cross-examination if the court was not going to make any findings because that was a matter for the Chancery Division? With respect, this demonstrates how bad this point is that has been taken on behalf of Mr Berezovsky.

Indeed, of the four sellers whose purported views

Mr Berezovsky relies upon as evidence of his alleged interest, it is Mr Anisimov who is the focus of his written closing submissions. Messrs Reuben, Chernoi and Bosov get about eight and a half pages all together, Mr Anisimov is 14 pages, and there's five and a half pages on the question of the authorship of the explanatory note.

So that's overlap issue 1.

Overlap issues 2 and 3 deal with the agreement allegedly made at the Dorchester Hotel meeting concerning Rusal. In addition to recycling the arguments about Mr Anisimov's alleged knowledge of Mr Berezovsky's alleged interest in the aluminium assets, Mr Berezovsky relies upon a case that he was deliberately airbrushed out of the second Rusal sale documents. And specifically, in relation to Mr Anisimov, Mr Berezovsky relies upon Mr Streshinsky's alleged knowledge of Mr Berezovsky's interest as a beneficiary which he asserts would have been knowledge shared by Mr Anisimov. The reference there for your Ladyship is Mr Berezovsky's closing submissions at 1127, subparagraph 7, where he says:

"Given Mr Streshinsky's knowledge, it would be astonishing if Mr Anisimov was not aware of the position."

So the position is this: Mr Berezovsky relies upon the draft documents circulated during the negotiations for the second Rusal sale as evidence that everyone involved in the second Rusal sale, including specifically Mr Streshinsky, that they considered that Mr Berezovsky was a beneficial owner of the shares. The references there are 1418 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just a second.

1127, subparagraph 7 is a misreference. Can you give me the correct one, if it's a reference to Mr Berezovsky's closing.

MR MALEK: I'm told it's 1137.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thanks very much.

MR MALEK: So we're looking at the point about the draft documentations, and the reference there is 1418, 1429 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I have it.

MR MALEK: The next point is the disinstruction of Salford, and that's paragraph 1420, subparagraph 4, which Mr Berezovsky alleges was deliberate because of Salford's investigations into Mr Berezovsky, and the reference there is 1430 and 1448 to 1506.

The next one is the allegation that Badri told Mr Streshinsky that Mr Berezovsky was involved and told him that the representation he was asked to give was therefore false, allegedly false. The reference there is --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just a second.

Yes.

MR MALEK: The last one is the allegation that Badri told Mr Streshinsky that Berezovsky was involved and told him that the representation he was asked to give was therefore allegedly false. The reference there to the closing submissions is 1418(c) to 1516, and 1525.

So the point about this first submission is this: it is therefore quite wrong to say that Mr Anisimov's state of knowledge does not fall within the overlap issues. It does, and it does so precisely because Mr Berezovsky has sought to rely upon Mr Anisimov's alleged knowledge of his interest in Rusal, which he says is demonstrated by the events of the second Rusal sale, to prove his case on those overlap issues. This alleged knowledge forms a central part of the purported evidence that Mr Berezovsky relies upon.

Now, the second point is that Mr Berezovsky himself invites the court to make findings about Mr Anisimov's knowledge. The point here is that the second reason why it is not correct to suggest that the court should not make findings about Mr Anisimov's knowledge is that Mr Berezovsky in fact has invited the court to do so. In addition to positively asserting a case based upon

Mr Anisimov's knowledge, Mr Berezovsky expressly invites the court to evaluate Mr Anisimov's evidence and to reject it. The reference to his closing there is at 1138.

He then recognises that the court may take the view that it will not make specific findings as to Mr Anisimov's knowledge but seeks to persuade the court to make findings about Mr Anisimov's and Mr Streshinsky's understanding during both the aluminium asset sale and the second Rusal sale that would support Mr Berezovsky's case. The reference there to his closing submissions is 1139, subparagraphs 1 to 2.

I explained yesterday why we submitted that Mr Berezovsky's claims in these proceedings are doomed to failure. But we submit that in this case, where the wheels really did come off was during Mr Berezovsky's performance in the witness box. He no doubt wishes to see whether he can salvage something for the Chancery Division and therefore wants to narrow the findings your Ladyship makes so that he can fight another day.

We say the true reason for Mr Rabinowitz's shift of position yesterday is obvious. It follows from the realisation that Mr Anisimov was a credible and honest witness who said that he did not have any knowledge that Mr Berezovsky was a purchaser of the aluminium assets or had any interest in Rusal. In fact, he believed that Mr Berezovsky did not have any interests because of what Badri said.

Now, Mr Rabinowitz appealed to the scope of the overlap issues to explain why points were not put to Mr Anisimov, but we would submit that that explanation simply does not work. He had to put the points which were relevant to his case in these proceedings, and the points that he relies upon, as we have seen, were not simply points that might or could have been put, they should have been put if he was going to advance a case against Mr Anisimov. And the obligation to put important points applied to all witnesses and was nothing to do with the scope of the overlap issues.

This change of position also followed the receipt of our written submission where it was pointed out that Mr Berezovsky failed to put to Mr Anisimov a number of important points and therefore cannot maintain a case that Mr Anisimov knew about certain matters when he was not asked about them, or certainly he cannot put a case of dishonesty against Mr Anisimov.

So this is the context in which Mr Berezovsky now says that the court should not make any findings about Mr Anisimov's knowledge at all so that Mr Berezovsky can have another go in the Chancery action, with the caveat that, rather hypocritically, Mr Berezovsky would still like to rely on Mr Anisimov's knowledge to support his case in this action.

That cannot be right. He cannot both have his cake and eat it, and he cannot seek to relitigate the same issues in the Chancery proceedings.

That leads on to my third point, which is that this court is manifestly the appropriate forum to make findings as to Mr Anisimov's knowledge concerning the aluminium assets and Rusal.

The first point is that the whole point of the conjoinder of the Chancery defendants was so that the Rusal issues could be decided once and once only, in the best forum, with the best evidence and without duplication or waste of the court's time. The basis for that assertion is what was said in the combined judgment, the joint judgment, which is at -- and I've asked for this to come on to the Magnum screen if your Ladyship doesn't have the hard copy.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've got it.

MR MALEK: It's I1/05/138 to 139. Hopefully the judgment will come up. I'll repeat the reference -- it's that judgment.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR MALEK: We would invite your Ladyship to have a look at that judgment, and particularly at paragraph 28, particularly subparagraph 2, and 29, where it is made plain what the purpose of this trial is, and the purpose of this trial is to deal with all the Rusal issues.

It simply can't be right that we're going to have a repeat of all of this in the Chancery Division. It is this court that has seen and heard all the evidence in respect of the aluminium assets and Rusal, and the key points are these. First of all, all the documents relating to the aluminium assets and Rusal were disclosed in this action. Secondly, this court has heard from all the relevant witnesses including, for example, Mr Reuben who was another seller of the aluminium assets, and perhaps most importantly, Mr Berezovsky spent a significant amount of time conducting detailed cross-examination of Mr Anisimov and, in particular, Mr Streshinsky that was aimed solely at establishing Mr Streshinsky's and Mr Anisimov's knowledge of Mr Berezovsky's alleged interest in the aluminium assets and Rusal.

That cross-examination, if Mr Anisimov's knowledge is now said to be irrelevant, as Mr Rabinowitz says, would have served no purpose and been entirely wrongful.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just a second, Mr Malek. Are you saying that I should decide once and for all the extent of Mr Anisimov's knowledge? Surely all I can do in relation to the overlap issues is to decide, if I agree with the submissions you've made, the extent of his knowledge of the alleged trilateral agreement.

MR MALEK: Yes, that's correct.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I can't decide, can I, whether or not Mr Anisimov had knowledge of the bilateral joint venture agreement between Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili because that's not within my remit.

MR MALEK: Correct. Your Ladyship has to, in our submission --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You may say one leads to the other but, strictly speaking, I can't go further than determining, if I agree with your submissions, whether Anisimov had knowledge of the trilateral joint venture.

MR MALEK: Correct, and a knowledge of interest based on the aluminium assets.

The point is, yes, we entirely agree with what your Ladyship says. Your Ladyship can only deal with the allegations of knowledge that are before this court relevant to the proceedings that are before your Ladyship.

Your Ladyship is not in a position to deal with the bilateral joint venture, alleged bilateral joint venture between Badri and Mr Berezovsky, but what your Ladyship can do is that where in their written submissions they make allegations about Mr Anisimov's knowledge, where Mr Anisimov has made statements about his knowledge in his witness statements, where Mr Anisimov has been cross-examined about his knowledge, where anything is said about Mr Anisimov and what he knew, your Ladyship is in a position to make, and we say should make, determinations about those matters.

How it plays out eventually in the Chancery case in terms of the bilateral, that's a matter for another occasion and before a different court, but we would submit that your Ladyship should make findings of Mr Anisimov's knowledge on the points because the whole process, including evidence of witnesses and arguments, will not be repeated in the Chancery trial. The Chancery trial is not going to go into Rusal and aluminium assets again because that would be a complete duplication and a waste of the court's time.

Moreover, it specifically makes Mr Anisimov's and Mr Streshinsky's and Mr Buzuk's appearance at this trial a complete waste of time. If their belief, understanding and knowledge is irrelevant to the overlap issues, then there was no conceivable reason for them to waste their time, effort and money coming here as they do not testify directly to Mr Berezovsky's alleged interest in either the aluminium assets or Rusal; the only conceivable use of their evidence at this trial requires a finding of fact by the court as to their knowledge or belief. And that is exactly the use that Mr Berezovsky seeks to make of their evidence.

If one stands back, can it really be said that in their closing submissions they spend pages and pages going on about what Mr Anisimov knew, and then to say, "Well, you're not meant to make any findings", it just doesn't make any sense what is being said here.

What is really happening in this case is that they know the case has been lost, and what they're trying to do is salvage something for the Chancery Division and they should not be allowed to do that.

Now, the only other point that I make on this is that there is no -- not only is there every reason why this court should not make findings as to Mr Anisimov's state of knowledge about Mr Berezovsky's alleged interest and the aluminium assets and Rusal, but conversely there is no reason why the Chancery court would be put at a disadvantage when considering Mr Anisimov's alleged knowledge of a bilateral joint venture.

This is because any documents in this action that arguably show knowledge specifically of the alleged bilateral joint venture will obviously be deployed by Mr Berezovsky before the Chancery court.

Insofar as Mr Berezovsky hopes to prove knowledge of the alleged bilateral joint venture simply by showing that Mr Anisimov knew individually about Mr Berezovsky's interest in lots of specific investments, the court does not need to retry the question of whether Mr Anisimov had specific knowledge about Rusal. It will of course remain open to the Chancery court division, the Chancery judge, to find that even if as a result of this trial Mr Anisimov is not shown to have any specific knowledge of any alleged interest in Rusal, he must nevertheless have known of Mr Berezovsky's alleged interest in Rusal and/or the Rusal proceeds received by Badri because he knew about the bilateral joint venture by virtue of knowledge about other assets.

But there are therefore many reasons why this court should, indeed will, need to make findings about Mr Anisimov's knowledge and no obvious reasons why those findings should not be binding for the purposes of the Chancery actions, and therefore we invite the court to make those findings.

My Lady, the last part of my submissions was to deal with a separate point, which are the specific arguments that Mr Berezovsky has advanced to support his allegation that Mr Anisimov knew about Mr Berezovsky's alleged interest in the aluminium assets and in Rusal.

I think it will take me about 20 minutes to do that so it may be that that's a convenient time to break.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay. I'll take the break now for a quarter of an hour.

(11.41 am)

(A short break)

(12.00 noon)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Malek.

MR MALEK: My Lady, the last topic I need to address before your Ladyship concerns Mr Anisimov's alleged knowledge and I can deal with this quickly, not because it's not important but simply because it's covered in our written submissions.

The matters that are relied upon in support of knowledge are the declaration that Mr Anisimov gave in connection with a visa application for a visit to the USA in which he said that the aluminium assets were to the shareholders of Sibneft, that's dealt with in Mr Berezovsky's written submissions at 1137, subsections 1 to 5, which is at page 654. Then there's the documentation prepared by Mr Streshinsky in the course of the second Rusal sale and that's covered at 1137.6 to 7, and then there's the explanatory note, which is 1137 to 1138.

I'm not going to deal with the visa declaration because although we exchanged written submissions we anticipated that that point was going to be made and we covered that in our written submissions. The same in relation to the Streshinsky documents and the emails to Ms Khudyk, and also the FZB compliance report.

So all we need to deal with is the explanatory note, which is at H(E)1/03/4T, that's the English translation, and that's a star late entrant to Mr Berezovsky's case on knowledge. It's listed at 1137.8 as evidence of Mr Anisimov's knowledge although the substantive argument as to its authorship is set out at paragraph 1249 and at page 59 of schedule 1.

We say that the argument is completely overstated. The argument is presented as if the authorship of the explanatory note is obvious, and insinuates that the Anisimov defendants only question its authorship because it is damaging to their case.

The first point we make is that that is a bold assertion given that, as we set out at paragraph 129.5 of our closing submissions, Mr Berezovsky was still accusing various people of drafting the explanatory note as late as his opening submissions. His latest theory that Mr Streshinsky is the author appears to only have occurred to him during the course of the trial.

What I will now do is go through each of the reasons given by Mr Berezovsky in his closing submissions dealing with this question of whether or not Mr Streshinsky is the author. As I will show, these arguments range from the superficial to the demonstrably wrong.

Let's just go through them very quickly because we haven't done this in our written submissions. The first point is at 1249.1, and the argument here is that the note contains both Russian and English words. That's at 1249, subsection 1, on their closing.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR MALEK: If your Ladyship could have that perhaps open.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've got it.

MR MALEK: Then I can deal with our responses.

In our submission, that hardly narrows this down to Mr Streshinsky. Your Ladyship will know that it's our case, and indeed Mr Abramovich's case, that Mr Kay is the most likely author and he spoke both Russian and English as well.

Now, the next point is the question of where the document was found and the argument there is that it was found in -- I'm just finding the reference to this in my submissions.

The next point is that the argument that the -- in fact, the first point, yes, is English and Russian words, and the next point I think is at 1249.4(a), it says:

"Amongst all Mr Kay's other papers at 11 Grosvenor Place, there is not a single document which Mr Kay appears to have authored in Russian."

That is a very odd submission to make, and your Ladyship will note that there is no reference to support that argument, there's no footnote, and we are not aware of the evidence that supports that proposition. What we can say is that this part of the skeleton is very misleading because, as far as we are aware, Mr Berezovsky's solicitors have not reviewed all the documents at 11 Grosvenor Place but only a proportion of them. Our submission is that this argument ought to be dropped now, or at least Mr Berezovsky should explain when all the documents at 11 Grosvenor Place were reviewed if he's going to substantiate this allegation.

So that's a first point about Mr Kay.

The second point is that the note contains errors in Russian language, and Mr Streshinsky was a dual Russian/English speaker, and that point is made at 1249.2. Our response to that is that Mr Streshinsky's native language is Russian and it's actually very unlikely that he would make simple grammatical errors. So our conclusion is that that is a factor against Mr Streshinsky being the author.

In fact, there is no basis in fact and no evidence to support the assertion in paragraph 1249.2 that the explanatory note does contain grammatical errors that are replicated in other documents supposedly authored by Mr Streshinsky. Again there is no supporting evidence, this is only mere assertion and we submit should be dropped.

The third point is that Mr Streshinsky would have been familiar with the financial information on KrAZ and the other company that it was envisaged in the information -- explanatory note would be supplied. That's at 1249.3.

Our response to that is that anyone who was familiar with the Russian aluminium industry is likely to have known that Mr Anisimov owns his assets through the Coalco companies. Moreover, Mr Streshinsky's knowledge of the financial information is such that it's most unlikely that he would have referred to the purchase price as being "about 600 million" as the author of the explanatory note states at the top.

He knew what the figure is, he wouldn't have used language like 600 million. Similarly, he knew from a recent report, and the reference there is to our opening submissions at paragraph 50 and footnote 84, that he knew from a recent report that had valued those assets, a third of the aluminium assets, at 940 million.

As your Ladyship can see, the author of the explanatory note values the assets at 6 to 8 billion. Our point there is that Mr Streshinsky would not have done that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Streshinsky said he'd not seen it before and he wasn't the author of the note?

MR MALEK: That's correct. These are the points that are --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Was it suggested to him in cross-examination that he was the author of the note?

MR MALEK: Yes, it was, and that's why I'm going through these points, at least giving your Ladyship the bullet references.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, thank you.

MR MALEK: Point four is the one at 1249, subparagraph 4, which is that Mr Berezovsky and Badri are referred to as "the clients". What Mr Berezovsky says is that Mr Streshinsky would have referred to Badri and Mr Berezovsky as "the clients" but Mr Kay would not.

Our response to that is that it's complete speculation that Mr Berezovsky does not even attempt to explain. He gives no reason why Mr Kay would not have referred to Mr Berezovsky and Badri as "the clients", given that he worked for them, while Mr Streshinsky would have referred to them as "the clients". In fact they were not Mr Streshinsky's clients at all, and there is no evidence that we can point to to suggest that Mr Streshinsky ever referred to Badri as "the client".

You can see that from the compliance memo, the FZB, which is at H(A)77/95, Ms Khudyk's communications which are H(A)76/54 and 57, and the Syndikus fax at H(E)3/22/1 which Mr Berezovsky says is linked to the explanatory note.

In fact, as your Ladyship may recall, Mr Streshinsky's evidence was that he'd never spoken to Mr Berezovsky and confirms that he would not have referred to him as "the clients". That's at paragraph 22 of his statement, F1/02/60.

It's also worth pointing out that in Mr Berezovsky's oral opening, Day 1/55, 10 to 22, my learned friend Mr Rabinowitz explained that Mr Berezovsky and Badri were planning a trip to see Samuelson to discuss moving their assets and Mr Rabinowitz linked the explanatory note to this evidence. Mr Berezovsky and Badri were therefore Samuelson's clients. So again, that point is a bad one.

The fifth point is at 1249, subparagraph 5, which is that the explanatory note lists Aeroflot as Mr Berezovsky's asset and Mr Kay would have known better. That is a particularly bad argument, as we point out in our closing submissions at 129.6, page 62, where we reference to a number of documents created by Mr Berezovsky's other advisers containing this error.

The indication is that this is something that Mr Berezovsky told his advisers. That ties into the point I made to your Ladyship yesterday that it is hard to take at face value anything said by Mr Berezovsky about his ownership because it seems that he told his advisers that he had an interest in Aeroflot, although he expressly disavowed this.

Indeed, Samuelson in particular is known to have recorded this point, and the reference there is H(A)19/10. Neither Mr Anisimov nor Mr Streshinsky have ever expressed the view that Mr Berezovsky had an interest in Aeroflot. So the conclusion on this point is that that is a factor against Mr Streshinsky being the author, and more likely that one of Mr Berezovsky's other advisers, whether it's Kay or Mr Samuelson, as being the author of this document.

The next point is not any better, which is the point that there are similarities in the layout of the explanatory note and one document authored by Mr Streshinsky. That's 1169 at 6. In our submission, this is extremely superficial analysis. Most of the formatting points can be made about Mr Berezovsky's own submissions, introductory paragraphs with colons, use of subparagraphs, bold and underlining and bullet points. There are an equal number of differences between the explanatory note and Mr Streshinsky's email to Ms Khudyk that Mr Berezovsky refers to, different fonts, different formatting of headings, different spacing between the numbered paragraphs.

So this evidence is little more than a superficial attempt to compare writing styles which is usually the purview of more sophisticated and complex expert analysis.

Point seven is the final what is described as remarkable evidence that Mr Berezovsky points to, and that's at 1250 at page 720, which is that Mr Streshinsky appears to have envisaged on the steps identified in stage 1 of the explanatory note at exactly the same time as the explanatory note was drawn up -- sorry, was engaged on the steps, I should have said, appears to have been engaged on the steps identified in stage 1.

Another bad point. The date of the explanatory note is certainly not clear, and that's a point that Mr Abramovich's schedule at page 137, commenting on Mr Berezovsky's closing submissions at paragraph 1250, make. But in fact the only steps that Mr Streshinsky is said to have been involved with is the provision of documents to a third party to help set up an account for Badri, and that's the only one. So this argument is thin to say the least.

So we submit that Mr Berezovsky's case on the explanatory note is speculation, supposition, and a lot of inaccurate and misleading assertions. We in fact agree with what Mr Abramovich says in his closing submissions at paragraph 433, subparagraph 1, that the author of the explanatory note is likely to be Mr Kay in whose offices the document was found.

The other point I would like to make on this is that it is said in paragraph 1252 of Mr Berezovsky's closing submissions, and that's at page 721, that Mr Streshinsky's evidence on the explanatory note is, and I use his phrase, "deeply unsatisfactory". It was only so insofar as it was unsatisfactory to Mr Berezovsky because he did not give the answers that Mr Berezovsky wanted.

In fact when you come to re-read the cross-examination of Mr Streshinsky, you will see that it consists of a whole series of speculative assertions in lengthy speeches at Mr Streshinsky with Mr Streshinsky having very little to say. But he certainly denied, and this is the point that your Ladyship raised with me, in clear terms that he was the author of the explanatory note, and as set out above in the points I've just made there is no good evidence to show anything to the contrary and a lot of good points to show that he was not the author of the explanatory note.

The only other point I would make on the explanatory note is that the points need to be kept in context. Mr Berezovsky is using speculative inference upon inference to infer, one, that Streshinsky was the author of the explanatory note; two, that Mr Streshinsky therefore knew that Mr Berezovsky was a purchaser of the aluminium assets; three, that Mr Streshinsky told Mr Anisimov about this; and four, that Mr Anisimov therefore knew that Mr Berezovsky was a purchaser of the aluminium assets and therefore had an interest in Rusal. It is a creative case certainly, but it is not credible or a viable case from which to find that Mr Anisimov had any knowledge about Mr Berezovsky's alleged interest in the aluminium assets.

And, of course, the other point to make on this is that, were it true, why did Mr Berezovsky feel the need to make up in his oral evidence a load of direct conversations with Mr Anisimov which, as we've said to your Ladyship, are simply fiction?

My Lady, that's all I wanted to do, apart from just cover up -- just to make a few corrections and to answer a point made by your Ladyship.

The first point is the transcript of Mr Deripaska's evidence, and I made a mistake which in fact doesn't help Mr Berezovsky but it is a correction that I need to make. I said to your Ladyship incorrectly that no questions were asked --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Hang on, can you just give me the --

MR MALEK: Yes, it's at Day 29, which I think is in volume 2 of the transcripts, and it's at Day 29, and it's at page 45. This was one of the documents that was put to Mr Hauser -- to Mr Deripaska, and therefore what I said to your Ladyship was incorrect.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What line on the page?

MR MALEK: I'm not sure where it starts, but the passage concludes at page 45. Your Ladyship asked Mr Deripaska at line 13 on page 46:

"Mr Deripaska, in this first paragraph the suggestion is made that Madison, that's Mr Abramovich's company, is holding the 25 per cent shareholding in Rusal Holdings Limited on behalf of another company, called B Company, or that company's ultimate owners, B.

"Is that something or is that issue something that you knew anything about at that time?"

"Answer: No, I was not aware of that in any way."

So it is -- so that corrects what I said to your Ladyship this morning at [draft] page 20 at lines 6 to 11. So if your Ladyship could just note that correction.

The second point is the effect of findings and this touches upon a question that your Ladyship asked. If your Ladyship is prepared to turn down the transcript to page --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So you made a misstatement at page 20, lines 6 to 11 of today's transcript?

MR MALEK: Yes, and my mistake was when I said that nothing had been asked of Mr Deripaska about the events in 2004 concerning the second Rusal sale where it's quite clear that there was a reference.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR MALEK: And in fact a clear denial on the part of Mr Deripaska.

The second topic, just by way of wrap-up, is if your Ladyship turns to the transcript for today at [draft] page 12, and your Ladyship said:

"It is relevant for the purpose of this action for me to consider and probably to decide whether the fact that Mr Patarkatsishvili was paid 585 million reflected an interest which he, Mr Patarkatsishvili, might have had in the assets."

Now, your Ladyship does need to decide on the evidence whether, as Mr Abramovich said, Badri did not acquire an interest in Rusal but was simply paid a debt through the sale of the second tranche of the Rusal shares in 2004.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, obviously I've got to decide that.

MR MALEK: Yes. Or whether, as Mr Berezovsky says, he and Badri jointly acquired an interest in Rusal in 2000.

The point I just make there is the one your Ladyship I'm sure has that Mr Berezovsky does not allege in these proceedings that only Badri acquired an interest in Rusal in 2000. His case is that he and Badri jointly acquired an interest in Rusal in 2000 and, as the judge said, the finding made by the court in these proceedings will be relevant to the Chancery actions, because, for example, if the court decides that Badri did not acquire an interest in Rusal in 2000 then no such interest can form part of the joint venture that he has to establish.

So that's the point there.

The other point that your Ladyship raised, and this is the third of my miscellaneous points, is that your Ladyship asked me the question about the deal summary that we looked at earlier, which is at [draft] page 30 of the transcript at 11.15, where your Ladyship asked for the authorship of the document at H(A)18/181 (sic), which, your Ladyship remembers, the point I was making there is it records the fact that the authors did not know of any fact that Mr Berezovsky could have relied upon in order to assert an interest.

The evidence dealing with that is Mr Streshinsky's evidence in his written evidence at F1/02 at page 87 at paragraph 122 F1/02/87, where he gives evidence to the effect that "Around this time, at my instruction, Mr Faekov began to prepare a document entitled 'Transaction with Rusal Holdings'".

As your Ladyship knows, in fact we need to go back, it starts at -- Ms Tolaney reminds me I should read the whole passage or in fact just have the reference. It starts at 121 and we would ask your Ladyship to read 121 and 122. In fact it's 135, it's the whole section. And in fact it shows that they both authored it, so that was the point to your Ladyship's question.

The only other point I would make is that I did go through the references to the bundles quite quickly --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've got them all on the transcript.

MR MALEK: What we were going to do is to check them and if there were any errors to give those corrections to your Ladyship.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, fine, if you would email them to my clerk.

MR MALEK: Thank you.

Those are my submissions, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much indeed, and thank you to the entire team as well.

Yes, Mr Adkin.

Closing submissions by MR ADKIN

MR ADKIN: My Lady, the overlap issues each reflect issues you were asked to decide in the Commercial Court action, and we have sought in our closing document to indicate the paragraphs from the agreed list of issues arising in that action to which each overlap issue relates.

It follows, of course, that we are in the happy position of being able to rely, as we do, on the evidence and submissions advanced on behalf of Mr Abramovich on those issues.

Although each is a separate overlap issue, Mr Berezovsky's case in relation to those issues requires him, we submit, to establish a chain of agreements, each of which is necessary to make out the next. In order to successfully establish that he obtained an interest in Rusal, and therefore in its proceeds, he needs to show that he had an interest in the aluminium assets merged into it. In order to establish an interest in those aluminium assets, he relies on an agreement said to have been reached between himself, Mr Abramovich and Mr Patarkatsishvili in 1999 by which they amended or agreed to supplement the 1995 agreement.

Since it's common ground that the acquisition of the aluminium assets was in the event funded by a bridging loan, and not Sibneft profits in which Mr Berezovsky can assert an interest, that alleged 1999 agreement is in fact now the only basis upon which Mr Berezovsky is able to assert an interest in the aluminium assets, so that agreement must be made out. And in order to make that agreement out, we submit Mr Berezovsky needs to make out the claimed 1995 agreement. That is because, as all of the Russian law experts were agreed, in order for there to be an effective amendment or an addition to an existing agreement, that existing agreement itself had to be effective. We've set out the references to that expert evidence in our closing document at paragraph 19, footnote 27.

It follows therefore that if there was no effective 1995 agreement, either because it was not made as alleged by Mr Berezovsky or it didn't work under Russian law, the claims '99 agreement cannot work and the whole of the case on the overlap issue, we submit, collapses.

My Lady, all of the agreements that Mr Berezovsky seeks to rely on were, of course, oral. None of them is recorded or indeed evidenced in writing. None of them resulted in any form of documented ownership interest in Mr Berezovsky. And the only person present on any of the occasions at which those agreements can sensibly have been said to have been made, who supports Mr Berezovsky's story, is Mr Berezovsky himself.

We therefore endorse the submission made on behalf of Mr Abramovich that, in approaching the evidence, unless your Ladyship can have a high degree of confidence in Mr Berezovsky's truthfulness as a witness it's unlikely that he can succeed.

Now, Mr Berezovsky has, through his closing, urged upon your Ladyship a somewhat different approach to the evidence. The theme of the submissions made on his behalf yesterday, as we understand them, was to suggest that there is a large number of evidential matters relating to the Rusal part of the action which cannot be explained in a manner consistent with Mr Abramovich's case, as a result of which it is said Mr Berezovsky's case should be accepted.

We respectfully submit that there is a number of problems with that approach. The first, of course, is that it amounts to an illegitimate attempt to reverse the burden of proof which lies with Mr Berezovsky. Second, whatever one might conclude as to the consistency of the evidence pointed out by Mr Rabinowitz with Mr Abramovich's case, and we don't accept that the evidence is in fact inconsistent, most, if not all, of the matters relied on by Mr Berezovsky are in fact entirely inconsistent with his own case. A good example of this, we would submit, is the reliance placed by Mr Berezovsky on the five contemporaneous agreements relating to aluminium which might, we would say, fairly be said to be amongst the most significant documents on this part of the case.

Now, Mr Berezovsky is not recorded as a party to a single one of those agreements, nor is he expressly referred to in any of them. The key term which he says was agreed at the Dorchester Hotel, and on which reliance is now placed, the provision that nobody would sell their interest without the consent of others, is wholly absent from any of the subsequent agreements following the Dorchester meeting which your Ladyship has seen.

Another term, the balancing payment of 575 million from Mr Deripaska which is said to have been agreed at the Dorchester Hotel meeting, is absent from a written agreement which was produced only a few days later.

The remaining terms which are said to have been agreed at that meeting are in fact to be seen in an earlier agreement, all already having been agreed to.

Emphatic representations are made in the July 2004 sale agreement which are completely inconsistent with Mr Berezovsky having had an interest in the Rusal assets.

So, in fact, we submit, on analysis, the only way in which any of those agreements can be said to lend support to Mr Berezovsky's case is the reference in the February 2000 document to "partners", and in the March and May agreements to "other selling shareholders". But of course those are points upon which your Ladyship has had evidence from the draftsmen, including Mr Hauser, a man of undeniable, we would submit, neutrality and integrity, who have all made very clear that such references had nothing whatsoever to do with Mr Berezovsky.

Similar points can be made on various of the other parts of the evidence upon which Mr Berezovsky relies as being inconsistent with Mr Abramovich's case. The point I want to make now is that, whilst your Ladyship will undoubtedly want to test the known facts against the conflicting evidence of Mr Abramovich and his witnesses, and that of Mr Berezovsky, it is not enough, we would submit, for Mr Berezovsky simply to assert inconsistencies with Mr Abramovich's case unless he can also establish that the known facts are consistent with his own case. That, as we will submit in due course, is a burden, we say, he is unable to discharge on the overlap issues.

Now, my Lady, of course the critical part of the evidence that you will have to assess is that of the witnesses that you have seen. Your Ladyship has received a number of submissions from both sides, which I don't propose to repeat, as to the particular importance of the witness evidence in a case such as this where one is dealing with oral arrangements and the documents are not to be trusted, it being common ground that documents were created which did not properly reflect the true position on both sides of the case.

I want simply to add one further point to the significance of the witness evidence and the role that we submit it should play in your Ladyship's approach to the overlap issues. It is, we submit, a fact of critical importance that, although Mr Berezovsky claims, as he must, that his involvement in the acquisition of the aluminium assets in February 2000, and in the merger of those assets with Mr Deripaska's business in March 2000, was to be concealed from the documents, he emphatically does not claim that his involvement was to be concealed from those others involved in the deals. In fact Mr Berezovsky claims to have been a, indeed the, key player in both deals and to have met with and negotiated the arrangements with the relevant counterparties.

We've set out the references to Mr Berezovsky's position in relation to the February 2000 deal at paragraph 25 of our closing document.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR ADKIN: Mr Deripaska's -- the March 2000 deal of course needs no reference since, as your Ladyship knows, it's a central part of Mr Berezovsky's case that he met with Mr Deripaska and negotiated that merger at the Dorchester Hotel.

Now, if Mr Berezovsky's case is to be believed, there are a number of people on both sides of these deals who must have known of his involvement, indeed who he says he met and with whom he discussed the deals and whose evidence would, if truthful, support his case. Of course, as your Ladyship has seen, Mr Berezovsky's case has received no such support from any of the witnesses from whom you have heard involved in either of these deals. None of Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler, Ms Panchenko, Mr Tenenbaum, Mr Anisimov, Mr Streshinsky, Mr Buzuk, Mr Deripaska, Mr Hauser suggested in their evidence that Mr Berezovsky had any part of any of those agreements. We've summarised their evidence at paragraphs 26 and 27 and paragraph 50 sub 1 and sub 2 of our document.

Even Mr Reuben, who Mr Berezovsky himself called, made clear that he had no particular idea with whom he was dealing and that, quite contrary to Mr Berezovsky's evidence that he'd met and discussed the terms of the sale with him, in fact the whole deal from his side had been negotiated by somebody else. And the references to his evidence we've set out at paragraph 26.1 of our closing document.

Now, the best that Mr Berezovsky is able to do is to rely in large part on the evidence of two witnesses, Mr Bosov and Mr Michael Chernoi from whom your Ladyship has not heard. In fact Mr Bosov nowhere says in the statement that has been filed, which is devoted solely to a disclosure issue, that Mr Berezovsky was a party to the aluminium deal. As to Mr Michael Chernoi, your Ladyship has of course heard submissions as to why very little, if any, reliance can sensibly be placed on his evidence, which is further undermined by the excuse he proffered for not coming to give it, namely a fear that Mr Deripaska might not go after him, which must on any view have been apparent to Mr Chernoi and indeed those dealing with him from the very time he gave his statement.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: When you say "namely a fear that Mr Deripaska might not go after him", what do you mean by "not go after him"?

MR ADKIN: As we understand it, the excuse Mr Chernoi has principally proffered is that he wasn't willing to come and give evidence on a topic which touched on his claim against Mr Deripaska because there was a possibility that Mr Deripaska might not subsequently turn up and himself be heard and give evidence to the court, thereby obtaining --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: In this action?

MR ADKIN: In this action, thereby obtaining some sort of illegitimate advantage.

The difficulty with that explanation, other than we would submit it lacks any sensible credibility at all, is that it's an explanation which was inherent in the process and which he must have known from the time that he gave his statement.

Now, to overcome the problem that the witness evidence presents for him, Mr Berezovsky has been compelled to assert the existence of what, as we understand it, amounts to a substantial conspiracy to deceive your Ladyship. It's important to note that this conspiracy must, on the logic of Mr Berezovsky's case, extend not only to Mr Abramovich and his close advisers and those who have given evidence on his behalf, it must also of course extend to Mr Deripaska, and it must also, of course, extend to Mr Anisimov and the witnesses called by him.

It is similarly important, we would suggest, to note that the conspiracy must also encompass witnesses, most notably Mr Streshinsky and Mr Buzuk, who have no continuing association with any of the key players in this case and no apparent axe to grind at all. We've set out references to that point at paragraph 28 of our skeleton.

Now, I don't propose to add to the submissions that your Ladyship has already heard on the credibility of the witnesses arrayed against Mr Berezovsky, but we respectfully submit that the claims of widespread dishonesty advanced on Mr Berezovsky's behalf come nowhere close to being supported by the few peripheral points relating to dressing gowns, Dr Evil texts and the like, which Mr Berezovsky's team have been able to make out about credibility of witnesses.

Now, Mr Berezovsky, of course, was his own principal witness on the Rusal issues. Indeed he was the only witness from whom your Ladyship has heard with any direct involvement in the aluminium agreement who stated that he was a party to them. We have set out our submissions on Mr Berezovsky's own credibility at paragraph 8 of our closing document. You've had the main points from Mr Sumption and Mr Malek and I don't propose to repeat them.

What I do want to do, my Lady, is to add one further point about Mr Berezovsky's character which we submit is of some significance and with which one suspects he might himself agree. Mr Berezovsky is a man who recognised the importance of being politically powerful and being seen to be powerful. Indeed, it is his evidence that, after he survived the assassination attempt against him in 1994, he realised that the key to success in business was the acquisition of power and influence. One sees that from his fourth witness statement at paragraphs 40 to 41 at D2/17/205. Of course, as the enumerable contemporary references to Mr Berezovsky and his activities in the press illustrate, it can, we submit, fairly be said that Mr Berezovsky was keenly interested in being seen to be powerful.

Now, that facet of Mr Berezovsky's character is significant to a number of the issues in this case but, for the purposes of the overlap issues, we submit it is of considerable importance when one comes to consider the evidence as to the circumstances and reasons for why the Dorchester Hotel meeting took place.

Before finishing with dealing with the witnesses, my Lady, I should also address the suggestion made on Mr Berezovsky's behalf that the family defendants are somehow in Mr Abramovich's pay and have participated in some sort of deception. The foundation of that allegation appears to be a suggestion made by Mr Berezovsky that the family defendants have changed their tune on Rusal and have done so because they have been bought off by Mr Abramovich. That was set out in Mr Berezovsky's written opening at annex B; it was not reprised in the written closing but it was by Mr Rabinowitz yesterday.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, it's said you said something inconsistent or members of the family said something inconsistent in the Gibraltar litigation.

MR ADKIN: My Lady, yes.

The further suggestion was made, very seriously, that the reason why the tune has been changed is because the family has been bought off.

Now, when I moved to address that suggestion in opening, your Ladyship, with respect quite rightly, indicated that it would be more helpful if it was dealt with at the end of the trial, after hearing the relevant evidence. The reference for that is Day 2, page 143, line 4 to page 144, line 25. Now, in the event, there has been no relevant evidence on that point and that is because Mr Berezovsky at no stage saw fit to put the very serious suggestion that he had bought off the family defendants to Mr Abramovich or indeed any other of his witnesses. We submit, with respect, that if that sort of allegation was to be pursued, it needed to be put and it is simply not open to Mr Berezovsky to resurrect it now.

In fact, the family defendants had in their pleadings made clear that they would, if appropriate, rely on Mr Abramovich's position in the Abramovich action at a time long before it was directed that these two claims be tried together and, therefore, long before they could offer any particular support to Mr Abramovich in the way alleged. The references to that are paragraph 85 of the family's defence at M1/06/229, a paragraph which can be seen was introduced in March 2010, M1/06/180, the idea of a joint trial first being canvassed before Mr Justice Mann in May 2010 at I1/04/115.

After the suggestion that the family defendants have changed their tune, the suggestion was made yesterday that Mr Patarkatsishvili's widow and daughters had previously given evidence in Gibraltar that recognised Mr Berezovsky's and Mr Patarkatsishvili's interest in Rusal and Sibneft. That is not in fact the case in relation to the daughters, one of whom gave no evidence in Gibraltar at all and one of whom gave very brief evidence there which made no mention of Rusal or Sibneft.

So far as Ms Goudavadze is concerned, it is true to say that, in answer to a question whether Mr Patarkashivili sold a number of assets when he left Russia which were listed by the cross-examiner and which included Rusal and Sibneft, Ms Goudavadze replied yes. One sees that at S1/1.13/201, in the manuscript, page 109, lines 1 to 9.

We respectfully submit that the weight that has been sought to be placed by Mr Berezovsky on that answer, given in wholly unrelated proceedings to which Rusal and Sibneft was entirely irrelevant, is rather greater than it will bear.

Ms Goudavadze can hardly be criticised for having previously concluded that Mr Patarkashivili had an interest in Rusal --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you just give me the reference again? It hasn't come up in the transcript.

MR ADKIN: That is S1/1.13/201. I referred your Ladyship to the manuscript within the page which is 109, lines 1 to 9.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR ADKIN: In fact, the available documents, namely the July 2004 sale document, showed on their face Mr Patarkatsishvili to have had an interest and indeed it's common ground that, for at least a time in July 2004, Mr Patarkatsishvili did acquire such an interest which was then immediately sold to Mr Deripaska.

Now, the fact is, as Ms Goudavadze had alluded to in the preceding line of her cross-examination, her knowledge of many of Mr Patarkatsishvili's and Mr Berezovsky's financial affairs prior to and in the time immediately following her husband's death was seriously limited, not least because Mr Berezovsky and his associates, Dr Nosova and Mr Lindley being prominent amongst them, had refused her access to the relevant material. That is a theme in fact picked up by the family defendants in their pleading in the Chancery actions, and your Ladyship has the references at paragraphs 170 to 197.

Of course, as the family defendants have obtained greater access to documents and heard what Mr Abramovich has had to say, they have had every reason to conclude that Mr Berezovsky's account of events is untruthful. Now, we respectfully submit that the indignation with which the attacks on the family defendants have been pursued is particularly misplaced given that the most serious of the allegations thrown out by Mr Berezovsky, that they've been bought off by Mr Abramovich, was simply not put, and the person throwing that particular stone, Mr Berezovsky, is in an especially vulnerable glass house given the evidence of his own concealed commission agreements with his own witnesses, Dr Nosova and Mr Lindley.

Finally on this, my Lady, I ought to deal with the suggestion that's been made that the family defendants' position departs from what has been described as Mr Patarkatsishvili's own evidence on the Rusal issues. This is a point which, we respectfully submit, has been grossly overblown. Repeated reference has been made on behalf of Mr Berezovsky, both in his written and oral closing, to Mr Patarkatsishvili's evidence. Mr Patarkatsishvili, of course, has not and is not in a position to give any evidence. Indeed, none of the draft witness statements attributed to him were signed by him, nor is there any real evidence that he ever saw or approved of their contents or of the contents of the notes or conversations with him.

Now, it would in our submission be quite wrong, as Mr Berezovsky has on occasion sought to do, to elevate these various drafts, lawyers' notes et cetera, to the status equivalent to as if Mr Patarkatsishvili had actually come to court, appeared before your Ladyship, taken an oath and given evidence. Indeed it's a particular irony that Mr Berezovsky seeks to disregard the limitations inherent in comments or instructions given to lawyers in circumstances where he has, in his own evidence, frequently sought to resile from statements his own lawyers have made on his behalf.

But whatever may or may not be derived from the comments Mr Patarkatsishvili made at various times to Mr Berezovsky's various lawyers, about which your Ladyship has heard a very great deal to which I don't propose to add, two things can safely be said about Mr Patarkatsishvili's own position in relation to Mr Abramovich prior to his death, namely that he remained on entirely friendly terms with Mr Abramovich and that he did not join with Mr Berezovsky in suing

Mr Abramovich in respect of matters which, if Mr Berezovsky is to be believed, Mr Patarkatsishvili had an equally valid claim. Indeed, he allowed the limitation period, on any view, for such claims to pass before he died.

Now, the characteristics to be attributed to Mr Patarkatsishvili, if Mr Berezovsky's story is right, are, we would suggest, deeply dishonourable ones.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Just a second, Mr Adkin. You made the point that he didn't join with Mr Berezovsky in suing Mr Abramovich. Can you just remind me of the chronology? When did Mr Patarkatsishvili die and when was the writ issued?

MR ADKIN: The writ was issued in 2007, Mr Patarkatsishvili died in February 2008.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you.

MR ADKIN: My Lady, the characteristics to be attributed to Mr Patarkatsishvili, if Mr Berezovsky's story is right, are, we would suggest, deeply dishonourable ones. He suggests, that is Mr Berezovsky suggests, that Mr Patarkatsishvili was prepared to continue to pretend to Mr Abramovich that he was his friend and to do so over a great many years, indeed to within weeks of the alleged intimidation of Mr Patarkatsishvili in May 2001, to go and see Mr Abramovich, invite Mr Abramovich's wife and Mr Abramovich to join him in his home in Georgia, generally entertained them and generally behaved in a thoroughly friendly way. That is all seen from Mr Abramovich's seventh statement, paragraphs 12 to 13, E8/18/219, which evidence has not been challenged.

We respectfully submit that the reason Mr Patarkatsishvili continued to be friendly with Mr Abramovich is because he was his friend.

My Lady, overlap issue 1, the acquisition of the aluminium industry assets. We've dealt with that issue at paragraphs 13 to 42 of our closing document.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR ADKIN: The principal points on the evidence have already been set out there, and also of course by Mr Sumption and Mr Malek in their oral closings.

I want to add only a very few further points. Now, in the absence of any documented interest in the aluminium deals struck in February 2000, or of any supportive witness evidence from those involved, Mr Berezovsky's evidence on this overlap issue, we submit, boils down to two things.

First, a claim that he can show himself to have made some sort of contribution to the acquisition of those assets, and, second, a pointing to the presence of Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Shvidler on the documented agreement from which, he suggests, it can sensibly be inferred that he was a party to it as well.

So far as the claimed contribution is concerned, we submit there's very little significance(?) to what Mr Berezovsky says. He says that it was agreed that the acquisition would be funded from Sibneft proceeds, though since in the event the acquisition was funded from a bridging loan paid off from the proceeds of the subsequent merger with Mr Deripaska, we only have Mr Berezovsky's word to go on that.

Mr Berezovsky also says that his contracts with General Lebed were critical. It is not at all clear why. None of the witnesses, not even Mr Berezovsky himself, has suggested that General Lebed played any particular part in the deal. It's also said, and this was a point repeated by Mr Rabinowitz in his oral closing, that General Lebed confirmed Mr Berezovsky's involvement in the deal by making certain statements in the media. The short answer to that point is that he didn't.

In fact, as your Ladyship will see from the article relied on by Mr Berezovsky at H(A)18/71.003T, what General Lebed in fact said was that the main purchaser was Mr Abramovich. He refuted any suggestion that Mr Berezovsky was going to buy some of the aluminium shares, and he said that Mr Berezovsky was a middleman, a position which is consistent with nobody's case and which, again, underscores the difficulties of relying on what's said in the papers.

Finally, Mr Berezovsky says that the deal -- that he, as it were, brought the deal to Mr Abramovich and Mr Patarkatsishvili because the deal was brought to him by Mr Bosov on behalf of the vendors. The difficulty with that proposition --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Sorry, can I just go back to the article.

MR ADKIN: My Lady, yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Where do you say --

MR ADKIN: It's right at the bottom, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've got it on my screen, the document. Yes, I've got it, thank you.

MR ADKIN: Your Ladyship has it.

Now, the difficulty, we submit, with the proposition that the deal was brought to Mr Berezovsky by Mr Bosov is that we only in fact have Mr Berezovsky's word for that. Furthermore, Mr Berezovsky himself said in his evidence that Mr Anisimov had already taken the deal to Mr Patarkatsishvili and that Mr Bosov's role was considerably overplayed. One sees that from the transcript, Day 9, page 9, line 21 to page 10, line 2.

So there is, we submit, nothing of substance in Mr Berezovsky's first suggestion that he made some form of contribution to the deal.

This second suggestion relies on the master agreement in which Mr Berezovsky points to Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Shvidler being named along with Mr Abramovich as parties to it. My Lady, if Mr Berezovsky's claim to have participated in the purchase of the aluminium assets is to have any credibility, one would, we submit, at the very least expect him to be able to present a coherent case as to who his partners in that venture actually were.

The case which has emerged in Mr Berezovsky's written closing is that Mr Shvidler, as well as Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich, was his partner in that venture. That is set out in the written closing at paragraph 61, sub 1, paragraph 1113, paragraph 1114, paragraph 1143, sub 4, and paragraph 1149, sub 1, sub (b).

That is a case which appears to spring entirely from the reference to Mr Shvidler in the definition of "Party 1" contained in the written agreement. Indeed it is a case that Mr Berezovsky has to make if the point about Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Shvidler being parties to the master agreement is to be any good to him, because if Mr Shvidler was not in reality a co-investor then his presence on that agreement is not at all inconsistent with what Mr Abramovich says.

Now, the assertion that Mr Shvidler was Mr Berezovsky's co-investor is, we submit, yet another very clear example of Mr Berezovsky massaging, indeed changing his story in order to fit the facts when he thinks it might help him to do so. It is in fact a case which is entirely inconsistent with Mr Berezovsky's previous position and with his pleaded position.

Mr Berezovsky has never before suggested that Mr Shvidler was a party to that deal. It's not the position that Mr Berezovsky maintains in his pleadings, one sees that from the particulars of claim in the Commercial Court action at paragraph C59 to C62, A1/2/26 to 27 A1/2/26, nor was it in fact a point mentioned by Mr Berezovsky in his evidence.

The claim that Mr Shvidler was a co-purchaser of the aluminium assets, which is now pursued with such vigour in Mr Berezovsky's written closing, is also, of course, hopelessly inconsistent with the remainder of Mr Berezovsky's case. It is, of course, his case that the aluminium acquisition deal was simply an extension of the 1995 agreement, an agreement which he has never suggested and does not now suggest included Mr Shvidler.

It is also Mr Berezovsky's case that it was agreed that the aluminium assets would be paid for out of the Sibneft profits yet nobody has suggested that Mr Shvidler had any entitlement to any part of those profits. And it's impossible to understand how, on Mr Berezovsky's case, he would have acquired(?) an entitlement to the aluminium assets to be purchased with them.

It is also in fact a case which is inconsistent with the Curtis notes upon which Mr Berezovsky places such great reliance.

Now, Mr Berezovsky's belated attempt to suggest that Mr Shvidler was a co-investor in the aluminium assets, we submit, simply illustrates the extent to which he is willing to drop one story and pick up another to fit what he perceived to be the evidence that might help him, and that he has in fact no true idea as to the true nature of the deal in which he claims to have participated.

My Lady, before moving on from the first overlap issue I should say something briefly about the Patarkatsishvili commission agreements. Now, the significance of those documents in support of Mr Abramovich's case is of course obvious and has been developed in his closing by Mr Sumption. In an attempt to draw the sting out of those documents, it's been suggested on Mr Berezovsky's behalf that they were somehow produced after the Dorchester agreement had been made for money-laundering purposes to enable Mr Patarkatsishvili to obtain funds for a plane which, it is common ground, he would obtain by way of commission.

Now, we submit that that suggestion, which appears to be based solely on the fact that the relevant documents were found in a box with the name of a particular bank crossed out, is hopeless for all the reasons set out orally by Mr Sumption and in the various skeleton arguments that your Ladyship has received from the defendants.

We also note that this particular piece of inventiveness in relation to the commission agreements does not sit at all well with Mr Berezovsky's case on the explanatory note which is relied on by Mr Berezovsky as an accurate account of what happened but, in fact, records the commission agreements as being for the benefit of both Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili, something which cannot be squared with the suggestion now made that the commission agreements were produced simply for the purpose of allowing Mr Patarkatsishvili alone to receive a plane.

We also submit that Mr Berezovsky's position fails to deal with a further and more fundamental question which is why, if Mr Patarkatsishvili was as he says a principal to this agreement, he was being paid any commission at all.

Now, I should add a further point which arises out of Mr Berezovsky's case in relation to the commission agreements which is this, the suggestion that they were manufactured for essentially a money-laundering purpose does at least recognise one plain fact amongst the vast amounts of material in this case that Mr Berezovsky has so far been unwilling openly to acknowledge, which is that a great many documents were manufactured to legitimatise payments to be received by Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili in the west.

My Lady, I was about to turn to the second overlap issue. If this is a convenient moment --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I will rise now. 2 o'clock.

(12.59 pm)

(The short adjournment)

(2.00 pm)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Adkin.

MR ADKIN: My Lady, over lunch, it's been pointed out to me that there are some corrections I need to make to the transcript.

The reference to bundles at [draft] 76, lines 18 and 20 is to "N" for November, it should be to "M" for Mike.

At [draft] 73/23, it records me as saying that Mr Berezovsky was able to make out a number of criticisms about Mr Abramovich --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I wondered about that.

MR ADKIN: If I did say that I certainly didn't mean it. We don't accept that any of the various criticisms that have been made about Mr Abramovich's witnesses have any validity at all.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I assumed you weren't making a concession there.

MR ADKIN: My Lady, no.

Finally, your Ladyship asked me about the issue of Mr Berezovsky's claim against Mr Abramovich in relation to Mr Patarkatsishvili's death. Your Ladyship will see from the claim form that Mr Berezovsky issued his claim against Mr Abramovich on 1 June 2007, that can be seen from K2/2/4. That of course is over six/seven/eight months before Mr Patarkatsishvili died.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I have it all in the chronology but I just wanted to be in touch there.

MR ADKIN: My Lady, yes.

My Lady, overlap issue two, the Dorchester meeting. We deal with that at paragraphs 43 to 72 of our closing document, and your Ladyship has already heard the principal points on it from Mr Sumption and Mr Malek to which I wish to add very few.

The first point that I want to add concerns the circumstances in which the Dorchester Hotel meeting can be shown to have come to be arranged. Now, it was Mr Berezovsky's evidence that the Dorchester meeting was a pre-planned summit of principals at which the key terms of the merger deal were finalised and agreed. And he said that the meeting had been arranged to take place in London and that such arrangement had been made some seven to ten days before in fact it occurred.

The reference to that in Mr Berezovsky's cross-examination is set out in our closing at paragraph 51.1, to which I would invite your Ladyship to add a reference in Mr Berezovsky's witness statement as well, fourth witness statement, paragraph 274 at D2/17/255.

Conversely, it was Mr Abramovich's evidence that the meeting was a last minute arrangement which was only set up on 12 March at Mr Berezovsky's request, indeed insistence, after Mr Abramovich had returned to Moscow and reported to Mr Patarkatsishvili the deal that he'd just concluded with Mr Deripaska, a matter in which Mr Patarkatsishvili can fairly be said to have had an interest given his commission arrangements with Mr Abramovich in relation to aluminium.

We submit, with the greatest of respect to Mr Berezovsky, that his evidence on how the Dorchester meeting came to be arranged and came about simply cannot be true. We know, both from their evidence and also the passport stamps, that Mr Abramovich and Mr Shvidler flew back to Moscow from London on Sunday 12 March, the very day before the Dorchester meeting occurred. It appears also that Mr Deripaska flew back from London to Moscow at around the same time. That suggestion is supported by Mr Berezovsky himself in his closing document at paragraph 1184.

Now, my Lady, it is impossible to understand why these people would have flown from London to Moscow on 12 March if they knew, as Mr Berezovsky says they must have known, that there was to be a summit meeting in exactly the same place, London, the very next day. Indeed, the difficulties with Mr Berezovsky's evidence on this topic are further underscored by the fact that Mr Berezovsky himself can be shown to have arrived in London on 12 March and, therefore, been in exactly the same place on exactly the same day as Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler and Mr Deripaska, the people he summoned back to attend the meeting at the Dorchester Hotel the following day.

Mr Berezovsky's passport stamp shows him arriving in London on 12 March, that's at R(I)1G/30/15, and that is of course consistent with the evidence of Ms Gill, the Carter Ruck lawyer acting for Mr Berezovsky in the Forbes appeal to the House of Lords, who said that Mr Berezovsky was attending the hearing of that appeal the very next morning.

We submit all of this goes to demonstrate that Mr Berezovsky's case for the Dorchester meeting was a pre-arranged summit of principals arranged to thrash out the terms of a merger deal --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Sorry, why is Mr Berezovsky coming into London on 12 March something that goes to support your analysis as opposed to his analysis?

MR ADKIN: My Lady, we say this, because if as Mr Berezovsky says this was a pre-arranged summit of principals, what on earth were those principals doing --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I can see the point you're making in relation to Mr Abramovich and Mr Deripaska but I can't see why that is supported by Mr Berezovsky flying in on 12 March.

MR ADKIN: Because they could have had the meeting on the 12th when they were all in the same place at the same time. Mr Berezovsky must have known long in advance that he would be in London on that date because he was attending a no doubt long-in-the-diary fixed hearing at the House of Lords. We submit it simply defies belief, if there was indeed a pre-planned meeting of these people, that half of them should have flown from one city to another at the very same time that the others flew into that city and the very day before they were all going to have to fly back there. It simply beggars belief.

Now, doubtless recognising that problem, those tasked with drafting Mr Berezovsky's closing document have in fact departed wholesale from Mr Berezovsky's evidence on this particular topic and now appear to accept that the Dorchester meeting was indeed a last-minute arrangement put together at very late notice.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Where was Mr Berezovsky flying in from?

MR ADKIN: I'm so sorry?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: When was Mr Berezovsky flying in from?

MR ADKIN: That I'm afraid we don't know. Or if we do, I don't.

The departure from Mr Berezovsky's own evidence in his closing is to be seen from paragraphs 1192, 1199 and 1548, sub 2 of that document. Now, the problem with that, quite apart from the fact that it is wholly at odds with Mr Berezovsky's own evidence, is that it is impossible to make sense of it in a way consistent with his case. If it is right, as now appears to be accepted, that the Dorchester meeting was arranged at the very last moment on 12 March 2000, the question arises: what happened on that day to cause the meeting to come about?

Now, Mr Abramovich's evidence provides a ready answer to that question. What happened is that Mr Berezovsky found out about the merger, was informed about it, and insisted that his protege, Mr Abramovich, attend the meeting to tell him about it.

Mr Berezovsky's case, indeed his evidence, is totally contradictory to that and provides no explanation at all.

Now, my Lady, there is a further and we say important way in which Mr Berezovsky's case on the Dorchester Hotel has experienced a significant shift in his closing submissions. Faced with the difficulty of trying to provide a reason for the Dorchester meeting consistent with the rest of the evidence, Mr Berezovsky's team have, at paragraphs 1175 and 1199 of their closing document, departed from what we understood to be Mr Berezovsky's case, and indeed his evidence, that the event was a prearranged meeting of principals at which the terms of the merger deal were arrived at, and now suggest that the Dorchester meeting came about because Mr Abramovich had to make good on what they claim was a promise, contained in clause 4.2 of the preliminary agreement with Mr Deripaska, that his "partners" would consent to the merger deal which had already been done.

Now, there are, we submit, a number of problems with that proffered explanation. First, as the evidence makes clear, the reference to "partners" in that particular clause of the preliminary agreement is not in fact a reference to Mr Berezovsky at all. You've heard submissions on the point from Mr Sumption and Mr Malek and I don't propose to repeat them.

Second, the suggestion is wholly inconsistent with Mr Berezovsky's own evidence. It was his evidence not only of course that the meeting was planned seven to ten days before, but that the terms of the merger were actually negotiated and agreed to at the Dorchester Hotel, which is a far cry from the suggestion now advanced that it was simply an occasion on which he signified his approval to a deal already done.

Third, if, as Mr Berezovsky's submissions suggest, the preliminary agreement envisaged from the outset that there would be some occasion in the future on which Mr Berezovsky was to signify his consent to it, it is impossible to understand why that occasion was not planned well in advance rather than arranged, as it evidently was, at the very last moment at great inconvenience to all concerned.

Finally, if the true purpose of the Dorchester meeting was to obtain Mr Berezovsky's consent to the preliminary agreement, which he says had been signed on his behalf by Mr Abramovich a number of days or weeks before, it is difficult, we would submit impossible, to understand why no reference was made to that agreement and no copy of the agreement was produced, indeed why Mr Berezovsky never saw a copy of the agreement at all, which we understand it to be common ground he did not.

The fact is, my Lady, that the circumstances in which it is clear the Dorchester meeting came to be organised are entirely consistent, on analysis, with Mr Abramovich's evidence as to why it happened, and entirely inconsistent with Mr Berezovsky's own evidence and his case, whether taken in its original form or in its rejigged form as set out in his closing document.

The next point I want to deal with is the effect of Mr Berezovsky's case on ORT and Devonian as it relates to the overlap issues. Now, of course, Mr Berezovsky must live with the consequences of his Sibneft case when it comes to considering what he says about Rusal. We submit that those consequences are rather significant. We set out some of those at paragraph 52 of our closing document and I want to develop some of those points.

It is at the heart of Mr Berezovsky's case that from December 2000 onwards he was forced by Mr Abramovich to sell out first of ORT and second of Sibneft at a knock-down price on a promise that Mr Glushkov would be released, a promise which Mr Berezovsky says Mr Abramovich broke not once but twice.

Now, against that background, Mr Berezovsky would have it believed, in relation to Rusal, first, that he was entirely content to remain partners with Mr Abramovich in the company and leave the valuable asset in the hands of Mr Abramovich without making any attempt whatever to obtain a record or acknowledgement of his ownership interest in it, and, second, that despite Mr Abramovich's ruthless intention to force Mr Berezovsky out of Sibneft for a song, and turn his back on his former mentor, he balked at doing the same in relation to Rusal and indeed continued diligently for the following four years to pay dividends to Mr Berezovsky.

Now, we respectfully submit that Mr Berezovsky's case, as it relates to his continuing interest in Rusal, makes very little sense when considered against the backdrop of what he said happened in relation to Sibneft.

There is a further point which we submit can fairly be made on this. The evidence shows that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were in fact aware that the $1.3 billion Devonia payment was actually derived from Rusal profits. That is referred to by Mr Jacobson in his witness statement at D2/16/126, a point developed in cross-examination at Day 13, page 134, lines 1 to 6.

Now, if Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili truly believed that they had an interest in Rusal, it is hard to understand why they were willing to be paid for what Mr Berezovsky says was their interest in Sibneft from what must have been their own monies.

My Lady, finally on this point, I want, if I may, to deal with the point Mr Rabinowitz described as "follow the money". The problem with this point, from Mr Berezovsky's point of view, is that it is quite plain from the evidence that he had no idea whether he was receiving any of the monies to which he says he was entitled or indeed where the money actually went.

So far as the alleged Rusal profits are concerned, the suggestion that Mr Berezovsky received any profits at all, let alone the amount of them, is not one born of Mr Berezovsky's own knowledge. It is simply constructed from the available evidential material, and we've set the point out in our closing.

Mr Berezovsky's own evidence is that --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What paragraph are you referring to?

MR ADKIN: I'm so sorry, my Lady, I've missed the paragraph from my submissions, I'll make sure your Ladyship has it in due course.

Mr Berezovsky's own evidence is that he had no idea whether he was receiving any Rusal profits but feels sure that, if he was not, Mr Patarkatsishvili would have told him.

Now, in light of the fact that Mr Berezovsky says that he catastrophically fell out with Mr Abramovich at the end of 2000, the suggestion that he paid no regard to whether he received what was due to him from Mr Abramovich in relation to Rusal over the ensuing four years is, we submit, difficult to credit.

So far as concerns the amounts actually paid over by Mr Abramovich, and which Mr Berezovsky claims represent profit payments, those of course payments of which it is common ground he was entirely unaware, we would submit that there is in fact a fair amount of common ground as to the circumstances in which those payments were made, and we set this out at paragraph 61 of our closing document.

It is common ground that, following the Devonia transaction, Mr Patarkatsishvili approached Mr Abramovich and asked him for more money to compensate for the very considerable costs associated with that transaction, including in particular the large sums of commission which had to be paid to legalise the money. It also appears to be common ground that very substantial sums of commission were indeed paid under the Devonia deal, including to the sheikh, to Mr Curtis, to Mr Kay and others.

I should also add that it is also common ground that, in respect of the prior transaction between Mr Berezovsky, Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Abramovich, namely the sale of ORT, substantial commission costs associated with that deal were indeed met to the tune of over 10 per cent of the value of the deal by Mr Abramovich. One sees this in the bolshoi balance.

The only issue in dispute therefore is whether, when Mr Abramovich was approached by Mr Patarkatsishvili and asked to contribute again to the costs that had been incurred in the Devonia transaction, Mr Abramovich said no, as Mr Berezovsky claims he did, or whether Mr Abramovich said yes, as he claims he did.

If, as we submit the evidence suggests, Mr Abramovich did say yes, then this provides a ready explanation for the sums that can in fact be shown to have been paid from Mr Abramovich to Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky between 2003 and 2004. It is also of course entirely consistent with what happened in relation to the ORT transaction.

Now, the suggestion that these monies were in fact representative of Rusal profit entitlements to which Mr Berezovsky -- which Mr Berezovsky was entitled to receive is further undermined by the fact that he is unable to point to a single piece of evidence which suggests any attempt to calculate any entitlement to such profits, or to corroborate (sic) the payment of the profits -- the payments shown to have been made to any profits actually made by Rusal, and the fact that it is clear from the bolshoi balance that nothing which could sensibly be said to represent Rusal profits was in fact paid to Mr Patarkatsishvili or Mr Berezovsky in the period which it covers in 2000 and 2001.

So far as concerns the proceeds of the second Rusal sale in July 2004, I really want to deal with these very briefly but to emphasise quite how little evidence Mr Berezovsky is in fact able to give about what happened to these monies, to take Mr Rabinowitz's words, how completely inadequately he is in fact able to follow the money.

Indeed, when asked in cross-examination, Mr Berezovsky admitted that other than the alleged investment made in Metalloinvest, also referred to as MGOK, he had absolutely no idea where the 585 million went. That is at Day 10, page 120, line 16.

My Lady, I don't propose to add to any of those points. Your Ladyship has already heard at considerable length on the Curtis notes, the Le Bourget transcript and all the other various bits of evidence which Mr Berezovsky relies on. I don't think I need to add to what's been said and what's in the closing submissions.

I want therefore, if I may, to move on to overlap issue three, which is the express English law trust. I propose to say very little on that. Your Ladyship has already heard a great deal about it and it's dealt with in our closing document at paragraphs 73 to 78.

We submit that there has, in relation to the claimed express English law trust, been a tendency in Mr Berezovsky's closing document, which has been repeated by Mr Rabinowitz orally, to elide two rather different concepts.

Great reliance is placed on the proposition that it was agreed that the terms of the merger with Mr Deripaska were to be governed by English law, and reference is made to the English law clause there undoubtedly was in the prior preliminary agreement, though how far that point goes is questionable given that Mr Berezovsky admits he never saw that document. It is suggested on the back of all of that that, in the circumstances, it was perfectly natural for the parties to the Dorchester meeting to have agreed that the terms of their merger would be governed by English law.

Now, my Lady, we submit that the problem with all of this is that it overlooks the case which Mr Berezovsky actually makes and needs to prove. That is not a case as to an express choice of any particular system of law to govern the merger agreement. It's a rather different proposition, that there was a specific agreement between Mr Abramovich, Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili that the interests to be created in Rusal would be held subject to a trust and that that trust would be governed by English law. That is an arrangement which is in fact said to have been made between the three of them prior to the Dorchester meeting and reaffirmed by them at that meeting.

Now, we respectfully endorse Mr Sumption's submissions that that proposition is difficult to credit and we seek to add some points on the inherent implausibility of this at paragraph 75 of our written closing. It is simply incredible, we would respectfully submit, that any parties to a trust agreement should have considered it more important to select a system of law to govern that agreement than to bother to write the agreement down. That is an even more incredible suggestion in relation to these particular parties who, on Mr Berezovsky's own evidence, never in a million years contemplated falling out and trusted each other completely.

They therefore had absolutely no purpose which anybody has been able to identify in agreeing a system of law to govern their relationship which could only be of any relevance in relation to Mr Abramovich, Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky in the event that they might actually fall out, an event which Mr Berezovsky himself acknowledged none of them ever considered might be feasible.

It's all the more incredible, we submit, when one considers Mr Berezovsky's own evidence that he had very little idea of how English trusts worked, had never come across one in oral form, neither sought nor received English law advice, and therefore, one must assume, had absolutely no idea, even on his case, to what he says he was agreeing to.

It is, we submit, similarly incredible that they all should have solemnly reaffirmed this particular agreement, said to have been reached between the three of them prior to the Dorchester meeting, reaffirmed that agreement at the Dorchester meeting when, on the face of it, the terms upon which Mr Abramovich was to hold the assets for Mr Patarkatsishvili and Mr Berezovsky were nothing to do with Mr Deripaska and irrelevant to anything that they actually had to discuss on that occasion.

On the validity of any express trust, and on the resulting and constructive trust case, I don't propose to add anything to what your Ladyship already has in my written document at paragraphs 76 to 81, or indeed to the submissions from the other defendants. That therefore covers overlap issue four.

So far as regards the final overlap issue, which is related to how the proceeds of the second Rusal sale are to be regarded, that issue of course will turn on your Ladyship's findings on the preceding issues and I need say no more about it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR ADKIN: Finally, my Lady, it's right that I should mention something about the experts which I've called and who have been subject to a great deal of criticism by my learned friend in closing.

A great deal of time has been taken up in Mr Berezovsky's document making various criticisms of the historical experts, including Professor Bean who of course was called by me. I'll deal with those criticisms in due course, briefly, but so far as concerns the Rusal part of the claim, we submit that they are largely beside the point. The reason for that is that all three history experts were agreed that whatever the position may have been in the early to mid-1990s, by 2000, which of course is the relevant date for the purposes of the Rusal claim, Russian businessmen such as Mr Berezovsky did document their interests and did formalise their holdings.

The reference to that is to be found in the joint memorandum which is at paragraphs 43 and 44 at G(B)6/1.01/20.

So, my Lady, it can fairly be said that Mr Berezovsky's claim to have acquired a wholly undocumented interest in the aluminium assets, both in relation to the initial acquisition of such assets in February 2000 and indeed the merged business set up in March 2000, runs contrary to the expert evidence, including that of his own history expert.

Given that the position on business practice by 2000 is common ground, the primary relevance of Professor Bean's expert evidence is as to the 1995 agreement which, for the reasons I've explained at the beginning of my oral closing, is relevant to the Dorchester -- to the overlap issues.

Professor Bean gave evidence to the effect that Russian businessmen who wished to make binding agreements in the mid-'90s did so in writing, very often involving the use of offshore structures. In relation to his evidence, it can fairly be said that Mr Berezovsky has sought in his closing document to have his cake and eat it. He relies heavily on Professor Bean's understanding and evidence that offshore structures were used by Russian businessmen, but he refutes the suggestion that the agreements made between Russian businessmen at the time, at least where they intended to operate beyond the system of honour only, were in writing.

The tension between those two points, of course, is an obvious one. The use of sophisticated offshore holding structures is hardly consistent with a system of undocumented obligations, handshakes and mutual understandings. The assertion is made in Mr Berezovsky's closing document that Professor Bean is somehow unqualified to give the evidence as to business practice which he in fact gave. That is to be found at paragraph 246 of Mr Berezovsky's written closing.

Unsurprisingly, of course, it's not advanced in respect of that proportion of Professor Bean's evidence as to business practice upon which Mr Berezovsky himself seeks to rely. Indeed, Mr Berezovsky's submissions go so far as to assert that Professor Bean accepted that his conclusions were inapplicable to the types of agreement which are the subject of this action, that's in Mr Berezovsky's closing at paragraph 246, sub 6(?).

As Mr Abramovich's team have pointed out in their responsive document, that is an assertion wholly unsupported by the transcript references provided in which Professor Bean fairly accepted the obvious point that he did not see every single agreement made between Russian businessmen at the time, and indeed it's not an assertion supported, so far as we can see, by any other portion of Professor Bean's evidence.

We would submit, with force, that Professor Bean was in fact the best placed of all the experts as to Russian history, from whom you heard, to give evidence on Russian business practice at the relevant time. As is clear from his evidence and from his CV, he was able to draw on two strands of knowledge, both the academic learning that he has in the field but also, uniquely in this case, his experience as a lawyer working in Russia at the relevant time, 16 hours a day it would seem.

Now, the suggestion is made that Professor Bean's evidence is to be discounted because his experience is limited to working with multi-national and not Russian clients. That assertion, even on its face, is incorrect because, as Professor Bean pointed out, he had many more Russian clients than the ones he identified in the limited list he provided with his CV. One sees that from the transcript, Day 38, page 83, lines 19 to 22.

It might also fairly be said that whatever the number of Russian clients whose business arrangements he was involved with actually was, it was a greater number than any other expert.

In fact Professor Bean came closest of all the experts to giving evidence of a truly comparable situation in Russia when he talked about his experience, his direct experience, dealing with the Yukos ownership structure and the relationship between Mr Khodorkovsky and Mr Lebedev. That is to be found in the transcript at Day 38, page 85, line 19, to page 87, line 8.

That evidence made clear that, in relation to Yukos, the ownership structure was fully documented using offshore arrangements and the services of Mr Curtis or somebody like him, even though the relationship between Mr Khodorkovsky and Mr Lebedev could not, as Professor Bean described it, have been closer.

Of course we don't submit that it must be assumed because one comparable set of transactions or relationships was recorded in writing, the agreement that Mr Berezovsky claims was made must also have been recorded in writing.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: If that's right, where is the expert evidence going on all this?

MR ADKIN: Well, my Lady, quite. Quite.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: One can tell from one's own -- or one knows from one's own practice at the Bar, if one had any Russian clients back in the '90s, that some transactions were documented and some weren't.

MR ADKIN: Your Ladyship will recall that the proposition that your Ladyship would benefit from hearing Russian history evidence, expert evidence, was loudly vaunted by Mr Berezovsky and resisted by everybody else for precisely the reason that your Ladyship has identified.

MR RABINOWITZ: With respect, not on this issue though, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think that's right, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR ADKIN: Well, if I've made an incorrect submission --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: All I would say is that on this particular point, Mr Adkin, obviously one is assisted to a certain extent by expert evidence, but at the end of the day I've got to decide whether or not there was an oral agreement in this case.

MR ADKIN: My Lady, absolutely. Absolutely.

The short and, we submit, elementary point that I seek to make is simply to rebutt the suggestion that Professor Bean's evidence is a complete waste of time and Professor Fortescue's should be preferred, and to suggest that, insofar as any evidence is going to help your Ladyship on this issue from the experts, Professor Bean is going to be the most helpful because he is the closest to some sort of vaguely comparable transaction. That's as far as I seek to take the point.

As far as Professor Maggs is concerned, it can fairly be said that a great deal of reliance has in fact been placed by Mr Berezovsky's team on Professor Maggs's opinions in various places. In fact, they refer to and endorse his published views on Russian law on no fewer than seven occasions in their closing document.

Now, it's quite plain from this and from the scope and the nature of his publications that Professor Maggs's views are entitled to the fullest respect and are of the greatest assistance to the court. It is particularly regrettable therefore that what we submit was a purely tactical decision was apparently taken on behalf of Mr Berezovsky not to explore Professor Maggs's evidence at all, even where that evidence contributed to and expanded on, indeed differed from, that given by Professor Rozenberg on Mr Abramovich's behalf.

Now, it was suggested at paragraph 496 of Mr Berezovsky's written closing that Professor Rachkov's evidence was to be preferred to that of Professor Maggs because Professor Maggs's evidence was, to quote, brief and did not always represent fully researched views. Very limited examples are given in support of that proposition, neither of them was put to Professor Maggs, and it's difficult to see how any reliance can fairly be placed on either of them when Professor Maggs was not given an opportunity to comment.

The position that your Ladyship has been left in as a result of the decision taken not to cross-examine Professor Maggs is, we would submit, particularly unsatisfactory given that he developed a number of points in his reports which added to or departed from Professor Rozenberg's position. A point of particular importance was Professor Maggs's evidence that the primary remedy in Russian contract law was specific performance, the primacy of which was mirrored in the approach to compensation in the Russian courts which would be calculated as the cost of obtaining alternative performance, so that either way you would need to know what the obligations of the parties to a contract actually were.

That is to be found in Maggs's second report, paragraph 25(a), at G(A)5/02/9, and in cross-examination by Mr Sumption at Day 37, page 46, line 2.

A further point that Professor Maggs developed in addition to those made by Mr Rozenberg was his evidence on the way Article 434 of the 1964 Civil Code worked during the period in 1995 after the entrepreneurial activity rules came in but prior to the express repeal of that provision. That is to be found at Maggs 2, paragraph 18, G(A)5/02/6.

Now, my Lady, we submit that, in circumstances where Mr Berezovsky has deliberately chosen not to challenge the views expressed by Professor Maggs on those issues, no serious weight can be given to the various criticisms now sought to be made by him in relation to those views and you should be very slow to reject them.

My Lady, that's all I have to say about the overlap issues.

My Lady, during the course of his submissions,

Mr Malek reminded your Ladyship of the interrelation with the Chancery actions. If it would assist your Ladyship to have the latest directions order in the Chancery actions we'll make sure that your Ladyship has that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I think so.

MR ADKIN: My Lady, one final thing. The reference that I was unable to give your Ladyship was --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, just remind me what it was in connection with.

MR ADKIN: It relates to Mr Berezovsky's own knowledge of the Rusal profits, and that reference is paragraph 62, subparagraph 1 and following of our closing document.

Unless I can assist your Ladyship any further, those are my submissions.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No. Thank you very much, and thank all members of your team too for the work that has gone into the submissions.

Yes, Mr Mumford.

MR MUMFORD: My Lady, I was only going to confirm that our position remains neutral on the overlap issues on which we are to be bound and, accordingly, unless there's anything that I can assist my Lady with, I wasn't proposing to --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, thank you very much, Mr Mumford.

I have read your charmingly brief submission of three pages.

Yes, Ms Davies.

Reply submissions by MS DAVIES

MS DAVIES: My Lady, many of the points made by my learned friend Mr Rabinowitz in his oral submissions, with which we respectfully disagree, are points that have already been addressed in our written closing, or were made in my learned friend's lengthy written closing and have therefore already been addressed in Mr Sumption's oral closing submissions or in our schedule. I'm obviously not going to seek to repeat points that have already been made there.

Given the disparaging remarks that were made by my learned friend at the outset of his oral submissions in relation to our schedule, I would however just make two observations about it. The first is that the schedule seeks to provide your Ladyship with appropriate cross-references to our written closing submissions on key points which we hope will be of assistance to your Ladyship in finding the relevant materials amongst the morass of documentation that is now before the court.

But second, and more substantively, the schedule also identifies the key respects in which we submit my learned friends' written closing submissions mischaracterise Mr Abramovich's case or the evidence before the court, and provide the references to make good those points. We obviously hope that my Lady will work through and take up those points when working through my learned friends' written closing.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I will do, Ms Davies.

MS DAVIES: We heard from my learned friends that they intend to produce a response to our schedule, which will presumably focus on the second category of point but we have obviously not yet seen that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Hang on, can I just be clear what I've got. At the moment I've got schedule 1 to Mr Berezovsky's submissions which sets out --

MS DAVIES: That's claimant's schedule of errata 1.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MS DAVIES: That responds, as we understand it, to our written closings and sets out what are described as so-called errors in our written closing. What we are told is yet to come --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, is a response --

MS DAVIES: -- is a response to this document.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can we just call them something different?

Your defendant's schedule 1 is -- shall we call it the defendant's errata schedule?

MS DAVIES: Of course.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Theirs is the claimant's errata schedule. What is proposed is that they're proposing to respond to your errata schedule.

MS DAVIES: Errata to errata, yes, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, errata to errata, okay.

MS DAVIES: The simple point I was just making is we haven't seen that yet, and nor did my learned friend address in his oral submissions any of the particular points that we made in our schedule so we will have to see what they produce on that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay, let me just work out where we are on this.

Mr Rabinowitz, what's the easiest way of dealing with this? I'm happy to give you seven days.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, we hope to get it to your Ladyship in the middle of next week.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay, so seven days for you. And any response, as far as I'm concerned, reply, I don't want it to go on forever, but if either side feels they've got to put in a further response of course you're free to do so.

MS DAVIES: My Lady, we would not unless we felt it was really necessary of course.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay. So if I give Mr Rabinowitz seven days from today to get the document in.

MR RABINOWITZ: It will be in by then, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And if Ms Davies or indeed anyone else feels that they simply have got to put something in, do so, but please identify precisely what it is so that my clerk can add it to the bundles and make sure it goes on Magnum.

MS DAVIES: Of course, my Lady.

What my learned friend Mr Rabinowitz did do in his oral submissions, when developing certain of the points made on Mr Berezovsky's behalf, was to interject a number of new mischaracterisations of Mr Abramovich's case or the evidence and it is on those points which I intend to focus now. I will take the matters as briefly as I can and I propose to follow broadly the same order as my learned friend, rather than any order of significance to the issues my Lady has to decide, as I anticipate that will be of most use to my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MS DAVIES: I will mainly be addressing points relating to the general criticisms of my client's case or Sibneft as many of the points on Rusal have already been addressed by my learned friends, Mr Malek and Mr Adkin.

My learned friend Mr Rabinowitz started his oral submissions by making a number of points about the conduct of this trial by Mr Abramovich and his witnesses. Those included the suggestion of improper collusion between Mr Abramovich's witnesses, including the suggestion of collusion in supposedly changing the case in relation to the reasons for the payments to Mr Berezovsky, or what my learned friend described as the smears and innuendo issue. Most of those points already feature in section B of his written closing and are therefore fully addressed in section B of our schedule in response, and they were also addressed by Mr Sumption at various points in his oral submissions. In our respectful submission, there is no merit in any of them.

There are, however, four short points arising from my learned friend's oral submissions on this topic that I should address. First, in the context of the smears and innuendo issue, my learned friend suggested that in his oral submissions Mr Sumption had indicated that your Ladyship could safely ignore the evidence about Mr Berezovsky's attire at the Dorchester Hotel meeting. That was at Day 41, pages 19 to 20. Now, with respect to my learned friend, that was not what Mr Sumption was saying at all. Rather Mr Sumption was making the different point that my Lady could safely ignore the allegation made in my learned friends' written closing that Mr Abramovich, Mr Deripaska and Mr Shvidler colluded together to make up their evidence about the circumstances of Mr Berezovsky's arrival at the meeting. The reference to Mr Sumption's submissions on that are at Day 40, pages 47 to 48.

The reasons why your Ladyship can safely ignore the allegations of collusion on this point are elaborated upon at page 28 of our schedule where we address the circumstances in which this evidence came out. The point did not, as my learned friend suggested orally was a constant theme, emerge in Mr Abramovich's re-examination at all. He mentioned it in his cross-examination. And, as my Lady may recall, the evidence from Mr Shvidler and Mr Deripaska on this point was effectively forced out of both of them by my learned friend himself in cross-examination because they were repeatedly asked about the issue.

We respectfully submit that those circumstances provide the most unpromising basis for a suggestion that the parties colluded to smear Mr Berezovsky about his behaviour.

In passing, I would also point my Lady to the next box at page 28 of our schedule --

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, I'm not going to do this too often but I do have to rise at this point because what my learned friend has just submitted misrepresents the situation.

The reason that I dealt with that in cross-examination is because Mr Sumption came to me in the course of the cross-examination to tell me that he was going to deal with it in re-examination and, in those circumstances, if I didn't deal with it in cross-examination I wouldn't have had the opportunity to deal with it again.

MS DAVIES: My Lady, I would ask my Lady to re-read the transcript on those points and to see that the point I was making was the repeated questions made by my learned friend Mr Rabinowitz of both Mr Deripaska and Mr Shvidler on this issue in which my learned friend persisted in seeking to extract the evidence from them.

I was then moving very briefly just to point out to my Lady the next box at page 28 of our schedule, which is responding to paragraphs 133 to 135 of my learned friends' written closing, where we address the suggestion that was put, if anything, in even stronger terms orally by my learned friend, that's at Day 41, pages 18 to 19, that the evidence establishes that Mr Abramovich, Mr Shvidler and Mr Deripaska arrived at the Dorchester Hotel at about 1.00 pm and, as my learned friend put it, that Mr Berezovsky did indeed arrive about one hour after they did at 2.00 pm which, it is said, demonstrates that Mr Berezovsky could not have arrived from the internal door in Mr Patarkatsishvili's suite.

The evidence that is said to demonstrate that, as we point out, is in fact nothing more than travel schedules. And when each of Mr Abramovich, Mr Deripaska and Mr Shvidler were asked about it, unsurprisingly, they could not be precise as to times.

The second point under this heading relates to the Dr Evil text. When addressing that issue in his oral submissions, my learned friend appeared to suggest in response to an intervention from my Lady that Skadden in correspondence had identified the number from which the text had been sent and, when that was given, that phone was checked and no record of the text was found. That's Day 41, pages 23 to 24.

No doubt that was inadvertent by my learned friend but it is not correct. Skadden were only asked to which number the text was sent, which is what they provided. I of course accept that Addleshaw Goddard then indicated that they'd checked the relevant phone records for Mr Berezovsky's phone, whatever that might mean, and they showed no record of the text being sent. We've set out the relevant references at page 3 of our schedule.

But that obviously does not rule out the possibility, which is the possibility my Lady was putting to my learned friend and to which my learned friend was attempting to respond, that the text was sent from another phone. With respect, your Ladyship was therefore exactly right to query where my learned friend's submissions on this issue got him.

Third in this category, it was suggested by my learned friend in his oral submissions that there didn't appear to be a dispute that the bolshoi balance had been, as he put it, sat on for a period of six months in the sense of not being disclosed after it had been identified as relevant, a process he elsewhere described as one of suppression for a period of six months, and that this event should in some way lead my Lady to conclude that Mr Abramovich and his team had failed to comply with their disclosure obligations. That was at Day 41, pages 28 to 30.

Now, the issues that have been raised in relation to the disclosure of the bolshoi balance have been repeatedly addressed in correspondence and in our submissions, but those explanations were unfortunately again mischaracterised by my learned friend in his oral submissions.

In particular, it was not just a question of translation. Rather, the key point is that it was a document that contained a whole host of confidential information, much of which was not obviously relevant to the issues in dispute and indeed hasn't been referred to at trial. For example, details of payments received or made from various third parties that had nothing to do with Sibneft or Rusal.

It also, as my Lady will recall, includes a lot of abbreviations: PRR, PBR, PRBBR and the like which needed to be understood in order that the potential relevance of the figures then given could be understood, and so that the issue of the extent of disclosure that needed to be made could be determined, and that meant it was one of some complexity.

It is also just not correct to suggest, as my learned friend did, that we accept that the document was sat on for a period of six months after it was identified as disclosable. That misstates the time line. We set out the correct time line at page 33 of our schedule, which is that the document was harvested as part of the harvest of electronic documents in November 2010. That harvest produced, as my Lady might expect --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You've set it all out here, haven't you?

MS DAVIES: Indeed, and it wasn't until February 2011 that it was identified as potentially relevant. It was then considered in light of the points I've just made.

There is in fact, my Lady, a certain irony in my learned friend's criticisms of these events given the extent of the very late disclosure that has been made by my learned friend's client in this case with important documents continuing to be disclosed right up to and through the trial. Those include documents relating to Mr Berezovsky's and Mr Glushkov's asylum applications --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Do you know, I'm not going to decide this case on the lateness of discovery on either side. I know Mr Rabinowitz has made some substantive submissions about the absence of documents on your side.

MS DAVIES: Indeed, my Lady, and that's why I'm addressing this, because what is being suggested, and it's a very serious allegation indeed, is that my client has wholesale failed to comply with his disclosure obligations. My client is heavily criticised, for example, for failing to disclose documents of the very same type as are missing from Mr Berezovsky's own disclosure, such as mobile phone bills, bank statements, credit card statements and the like. Those criticisms are made notwithstanding that, on Mr Berezovsky's own evidence, he anticipated bringing these claims from as early as 2001 whereas the first that Mr Abramovich heard about them was 2007.

Moreover, and this is an important point in our respectful submission, none of these serious allegations of disregard of disclosure obligations were put to Mr De Cort, who was the person within Mr Abramovich's internal team with internal responsibility for overseeing the disclosure process and who signed the disclosure statements.

The suggestion that there has been some sort of blatant disregard for the disclosure process or blatant withholding of documents is wholly unjustified.

Fourth, and the last point in this category, relates to the points made by my learned friend in relation to what he suggested was Mr Abramovich's failure to call Mr Fomichev, and specifically my Lady's query whether we could find any assistance, or my Lady would find any assistance in the authorities on the issue of whose job it was to call Mr Fomichev.

Now, like my learned friend, following my Lady's query, we have looked and we've found nothing specific in the authorities. There is of course no obligation on any party to call a witness, that's confirmed at Phipson, paragraph 11.15. And what all the cases do is simply seek to apply the test of whether it's appropriate to draw an adverse inference to the particular facts.

My learned friend yesterday produced three authorities. Those really are, as he readily acknowledged effectively, no more than recent examples of the application of the principles to the facts. The two Peter Smith decisions are cases where the individual concerned was a relative of one of the parties, close relative, so it's not surprising an adverse inference was drawn.

The third decision, Mr Justice Burnett, is perhaps of slightly more interest as, whilst the judge was not prepared to draw an adverse inference in that case, he did indicate that the fact that the individual was no longer in his previous employer's employ was not a sufficient reason not to call him. That is of some relevance, we would submit, in the present case, for, as my Lady will appreciate, we submit that it was in fact Mr Berezovsky, if anyone, and not my client, who might reasonably have been expected to call Mr Fomichev.

Mr Fomichev was after all --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: What, even after he sued him for the recovery of money?

MS DAVIES: Well, my Lady, Mr Fomichev is based in London and susceptible to a summons so the fact they've fallen out is not a reason not to call him. In fact what Mr Berezovsky said in his oral evidence is that he didn't want to call Mr Fomichev because he now regards him as untrustworthy.

If that's a good reason not to call him, it's actually a good reason why no party in this litigation would wish to call him as a witness on their behalf.

Now, my learned friend in his oral submissions on this point latched on to just one of the reasons that had been given by Mr Sumption in his oral closing for not calling Mr Fomichev, namely the evidence that shows that he was directly involved in the preparation of sham documents, and he sought to knock that point down. That ignored the fact that Mr Sumption had also referred to the fact that Mr Fomichev was Mr Berezovsky's agent, which I've just addressed.

But, in an effort to make it good, my learned friend went on to suggest that there was no difference between my client calling Mr Fomichev on this account and calling other witnesses, such as Mr Gorodilov, who, he suggested, was the architect behind the sham Spectrum documents produced in relation to the ORT sale. That's at Day 41, page 35. That was a theme he returned to yesterday when he suggested that it was Mr Gorodilov's idea to produce an offshore sale of the ORT shares for $10 million and then an option agreement of $140 million, Day 42, page 73.

Now, even leaving to one side the obvious point that Mr Gorodilov is an employee of Mr Abramovich, the basis upon which my learned friend suggested that Mr Gorodilov was the architect of the sham Spectrum documents was not clear from his submissions. It's not in fact borne out by Mr Gorodilov's evidence. That was to the effect that what was agreed was that there would be a payment of $10 million in Russia and a direct payment of $140 million outside of Russia to an account indicated by Mr Fomichev. That's paragraphs 70, 73, 76 and 84 to 96 of Mr Gorodilov's first witness statement at E2, tab 4.

He repeated that explanation in his oral evidence at Day 24, pages 93 to 94, in a passage of his evidence where he was providing an explanation of the background to the payments that were made. None of that evidence was challenged.

His evidence was further that he knew nothing about the Spectrum documents, that's paragraphs 88 to 90 of his first witness statement. That again was not challenged. Indeed, there was no reference in his cross-examination to the Spectrum agreements at all.

What Mr Gorodilov did say in his witness statement, and that's in paragraph 87, was that at a much earlier stage of the discussions in relation to the ORT sale he had identified the possibility of using an option agreement as one amongst the various means then being considered of transferring the shares, but he went on in the same paragraph to point out that, so far as he was concerned, the potential use of an option agreement had been rejected by the time of the meeting at Le Bourget. And if my Lady follows up the reference to the documents prepared by Mr Gorodilov, it's at H(A)23/191T, my Lady will also see that what Mr Gorodilov was talking about having previously been considered was a real option agreement, executed before any share transfer, as a means of transferring the shares. He wasn't contemplating a fictitious grant of an option in respect of the ORT shares, coupled with a forged assignment of that option, both executed following the actual sale by Mr Berezovsky to Akmos as we know in fact occurred.

What the evidence in fact demonstrates is that the sham Spectrum documents were conceived by and produced by a combination of Mr Fomichev, Mr Curtis and Mr Ivlev on Mr Berezovsky's behalf, and that Mr Gorodilov had nothing to do with it. That is all set out at paragraphs 271 to 274 of our written closing.

That's all I wanted to say on the criticisms of -- general criticisms of my client's case.

So I turn now specifically to the Sibneft claim. Now, my learned friend started by identifying and addressing various key -- pieces of key evidence which it is suggested will be of most assistance to my Lady in determining the nature and content of the 1995 agreement. Most of these points are points that we have already addressed at length in section A1 of our written closing and pages 42 to 64 of our schedule. There are, however, three topics arising specifically out of what my learned friend said in his oral submissions that I wish to address.

First, when addressing the Curtis notes, my learned friend suggested that no credible attempt had been made to explain how certain information contained in those notes could have been known by Mr Curtis if it was not information provided by Mr Tenenbaum. That is an issue which we had addressed in paragraph 440, subparagraph 5 of our written closing, but, in his oral submissions, my learned friend focused on two specific pieces of information that he suggested could not have been learned from the sources that we cite there. That was at Day 41, pages 46 to 50.

In particular, my learned friend suggested that those sources do not identify that the shareholders in Rusal were held on a 50/50 basis with Mr Deripaska or were bearer share companies. We respectfully submit there is nothing in either point.

First, Mr Berezovsky's own particulars of claim expressly recognise -- and that's paragraph C65A at A1, tab 2, page 30 A1/02/30 -- that the 50/50 split of ownership between Mr Abramovich and Mr Deripaska in respect of Rusal had been publicly announced by as early as 4 April 2001. That 50/50 split of the aluminium interests was then of course expressly confirmed by Mr De Cort in July and early August 2003, shortly prior to Mr Tenenbaum's visit to Georgia, in the context of the payments being made to Blue Waters. I'm referring there, my Lady, both to Mr De Cort's letter to Mr Curtis dated 8 August 2003 at H(A)62/26, and the attendance note of Mr De Cort's conversation with Mr Keeling on 16 July 2003 at H(A)62/19.

Second, in the context of arranging the payments to Devonia, at least Mr Fomichev and probably Mr Curtis would have been well aware that Mr Abramovich used bearer share companies in the BVI. As Ms Panchenko explained in her evidence, the mechanism by which the US 1.3 billion payments were made, starting in 2001, was that bearer shares in Pex, which was itself the shareholder in Madison, which in turn was the 50 per cent shareholder of Rual, were transferred temporarily to Devonian for the period of time required to allow Pex to declare a dividend to Devonian using funds received from Rual. That's Panchenko's second witness statement, paragraphs 86 to 87 and 96, at E3, tab 7, 186 and 189 E3/07/186.

The same point can be made about the later top-up payments in 2002 to Devonian, that's again explained by Ms Panchenko in her second witness statement at paragraphs 104 to 105, E2/07/191.

Further, your Ladyship will in fact recall that Mr Tenenbaum's evidence was that, by August 2003, he thought the reorganisation of Rusal had been undertaken, so the information in the Curtis notes which related to the preorganisation structure did not reflect his understanding at the time. That's Mr Tenenbaum's evidence at Day 28, pages 126 to 128.

Now, also in relation to the Curtis notes, my learned friend then went on to suggest that Mr Tenenbaum's explanation of what was discussed in Georgia was obviously false, and indeed he put it as high in his oral submissions as impossible, because the meeting in Georgia pre-dated, so he said, Mr Patarkatsishvili's interest in Brazilian football by almost a year.

That suggestion is in turn based on the document produced by the Brazilian authorities when investigating Mr Berezovsky which my learned friend did not take your Ladyship to but which my learned friend suggested confirms that Mr Patarkatsishvili's first contact in Brazilian football was only a year later.

That document is at H(G)28/218.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Hang on, I'd like to look at that.

MS DAVIES: It's a lengthy document, my Lady, starting at page 28.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: H(G)28, is it?

MS DAVIES: Have I got the reference wrong? I do apologise.

H(G)28, page 218. Page 218, which is actually the first reference to Mr Joorabchian, "First steps in Brazil".

My Lady, it's a lengthy document. What it does indicate or suggest, particularly for example at page 220 if we can go forward to that, is that Mr Patarkatsishvili's first contact with Mr Joorabchian may have been in 2004, but we submit that if you go through the whole of this document, which I wasn't proposing to do now, there is nothing in it on the issue of whether Mr Patarkatsishvili had any other contacts or interest in Brazilian football before this date.

I'm being referred to the last paragraph on page 219 which is perhaps one of the ones my learned friend is relying upon.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So that's doing it in August 2004.

MS DAVIES: Yes, it is suggesting that the first meetings with Mr Joorabchian were then, but that's not the point that my learned friend is seeking to extract from this document. What he's seeking to extract from this document, and we say you can't extract it from this document, is that Mr Patarkatsishvili had no interest and no contacts with anyone in Brazilian football prior to 2004. And as well known as Mr Joorabchian is in this jurisdiction now, it is difficult to conceive that there are not others in Brazil who have contacts in Brazilian football apart from him.

The second topic I wished to address under this head was one that featured a number of times in my learned friend's oral submissions, namely his suggestion that the evidence as to the payments that were made by Mr Abramovich clearly support, as he put it, Mr Berezovsky's case as to the 1995 agreement.

The first point I wish to pick up in that context is my Lady's request to my learned friend for references to the evidence suggesting that there had been an exercise of calculating what was 100 per cent and what was 50 per cent.

Yesterday, my learned friend in response to that referred you to paragraphs 264 to 265 of their written closing. My Lady may also wish to note that all the references to the evidence indicating how the amounts of payments were decided upon are to be found in paragraphs 46 to 57 of our written closing. We refer there, for example, to the evidence, including the evidence of Mr Berezovsky's own witnesses such as Dr Nosova, which show that the payments were the result of an ad hoc negotiation process and not the result of any correlation with Sibneft's profits, whether that means the profits of Sibneft itself or, as it is now suggested, something broader.

We also specifically address at paragraphs 55 to 57 the discussions at Le Bourget and the question of what other discussions there were between Mr Abramovich and Mr Patarkatsishvili --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You need not repeat those.

MS DAVIES: No. All I would ask my Lady to do is to put a note against those paragraphs to refer also to footnote 251 to paragraph 46 because that also sets out information about the conversations between Mr Abramovich and Mr Patarkatsishvili.

In short, we submit that the evidence does not demonstrate that there was anything even approximating the exercise my Lady was enquiring about.

In relation to the payments made, my learned friend also took issue with the suggestion we had made in both our written and oral closing that, prior to his oral evidence, Mr Berezovsky had only ever claimed to be entitled to a portion of the profits earned by Sibneft rather than by any other entity, and he suggested that Mr Berezovsky's case in his pleadings and his evidence was always that the three partners had agreed to share the profits which they made from obtaining ownership and control of Sibneft.

To support that suggestion, my learned friend referred my Lady in particular to paragraphs C34 and C34B of the particulars of claim. When my Lady takes up that reference, you will, in our respectful submission, find that it is in fact silent on this issue. That is perhaps unsurprising as Mr Berezovsky's witness statement on the 1995 agreement was equally silent on the issue. In fact, the paragraphs of that statement describing the terms of the 1995 agreement, that is Berezovsky 4, paragraphs 95 to 106, at D2/17/216 and following, those paragraphs say nothing at all about an agreement to share profits, let alone any agreement to share profits of any company other than Sibneft.

Indeed tellingly, in paragraph 401 of his written closing submissions on this issue, my learned friend put the suggested entitlement to profits of companies other than Sibneft as an implied term of the alleged 1995 agreement.

That's an allegation that doesn't work for the reasons we've set out at page 57 of our schedule, but it is also an allegation that is obviously inconsistent with the suggestion now made that Mr Berezovsky's case all along has been that it was expressly agreed that they would share any profits earned as a result of the obtaining of control of Sibneft.

Now, to find Mr Berezovsky's pleaded case on the profits to which he was entitled a share of, my Lady in fact needs to look at paragraph C37.4 of the particulars of claim in relation to the 1996 agreement at A1/02/14, to which my learned friend did not refer in his oral submissions.

There it is said unequivocally that in 1996 it was orally agreed that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili would continue to be entitled to dividends and to any other payments made by Sibneft to its owners. That can only be interpreted as a reference to payments being made by Sibneft and no other company.

The reason my learned friend spent time making his, in our submission, incorrect pleading point was that he then went on to suggest that both of our points on the absence of the correlation between the payments made and the profits of Sibneft, and our point as to Mr Berezovsky's purposes in reaching his understanding with Mr Abramovich in 1995, both those points were, as he put it, entirely false because they depended entirely on the incorrect assertion that Mr Berezovsky only claimed to have an entitlement to the profits of Sibneft. That was at Day 41, pages 86 and 93.

We submit that the premise for that suggestion was wrong for the reasons I've just explained. But, in any event, my learned friend is also wrong to say that that's what our case on this issue depends upon.

First, there are a number of reasons why the absence of correlation point doesn't depend on Mr Berezovsky's claimed entitlement only being to Sibneft profits. For example, the evidence of ad hoc negotiation, and also the contents of the bolshoi balance which even my learned friend accepts reveal that Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili were paid less than half of the receipts from the oil trading companies and the ZATOs. I'm referring here to their comment on paragraph 56 of our closing submissions at page 11 of their schedule of so-called errata.

But significantly, the bolshoi balance also reveals that the payments were made on an erratic basis which bears no discernible relationship to any receipts, so that even if there was an entitlement to something broader than Sibneft profits, properly so-called, there was no correlation.

Significantly, as my Lady will appreciate, there is also the clear evidence that payments commenced in early 1995, essentially from the moment that Mr Berezovsky started to provide his political patronage and way before any question of control of Sibneft arose. Revealingly, these payments in 1995 were not mentioned at any point by my learned friend in his oral submissions. The evidence of those payments, my Lady will recall, included the evidence of both Mr Abramovich and Ms Gorbunova who, in the strike-out application before the disclosure exercise was undertaken -- sorry, Goncharova, not Gorbunova, who, in the strike-out application before the disclosure exercise was undertaken, had explained that the payments started in early 1995.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've got that evidence.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, again I hesitate to rise. My learned friend knows, we've discussed this, that she doesn't have a right of reply. She has a right of reply in relation to new points. How it is said there is a new point when I didn't say something I frankly don't understand.

We have tried to stay seated and I would be grateful if my learned friend really just stuck within the parameters --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I have got a lot of these points in your written closing submissions already and I really must restrict you to a right of reply on new points.

MS DAVIES: My Lady, what I was trying to deal with was the point which is completely new, which is that our case on correlation and purposes depends entirely on the suggestion that Mr Berezovsky was only claiming an entitlement to Sibneft profits, and the 1995 payments are one of the very key reasons why that suggestion, which was made for the first time by my learned friend in his oral submissions, is wrong.

The 1995 payments are also the reason why our submissions on Mr Berezovsky's purposes in 1995 are not dependent on the claimed entitlement only being to Sibneft profits, because under the loans-for-shares auction, on any view, Mr Abramovich was not even going to get control of Sibneft until 1996, whereas Mr Berezovsky's needs in early 1995 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: This is repetitive, I've got all this.

MS DAVIES: The third topic I wish very briefly to address, given the significance to the issues my Lady has to decide, are the repeated criticisms made by my learned friend in his oral submissions of Mr Abramovich's case on krysha. I was going to take this very briefly because Mr Sumption of course addressed my Lady on this issue, but various further points were developed by my learned friend in his oral submissions on this point which I just very briefly --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, as long as they're new, Ms Davies. I have had an awful lot of submission on krysha, both in your closing and by Mr Sumption in oral closing.

MS DAVIES: The very short point I would ask my Lady to note is that when my Lady works through all the various criticisms made by my learned friend in his oral submissions on this topic my Lady will find, in our respectful submission, that they are dependent on the mischaracterisation by him of the evidence as to the nature of the krysha relationship. And in particular what he sought to do repeatedly orally was to pigeonhole Mr Abramovich's case on this issue as being one where the concept of krysha merely involved the provision of specific lobbying services which he could then suggest had come to an end. Whereas, as my Lady knows, our submission, supported by the evidence of Mr Abramovich and the evidence of the historical experts, is that krysha is a much broader concept.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I have got that point.

MS DAVIES: My learned friend also suggested orally, and this was a new suggestion, that Mr Abramovich's case on krysha was bizarre because in 1995 Mr Abramovich barely knew Mr Berezovsky, had never worked with him --

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, that may be a new adjective but it's really not a new point.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I don't think it is, Ms Davies.

I have got an awful lot of material, and unless it's a really new point arising out of what Mr Rabinowitz said, you know, it's just actually even keeping a note of it or going back to the transcript. I really must ask you to be a bit disciplined about it.

MS DAVIES: My Lady, we're seeking to, but we hadn't understood that suggestion to be made before but I'll move on.

That brings me to ORT where there are six very short points raised by my learned friend in his oral submissions that I need to address.

I will take these very briefly. First, my learned friend criticised Mr Sumption's submissions about the evidence relating to the negotiations with Mr Lesin and took my Lady to various passages of the notes of the interviews. All I would ask my Lady to do is to also refer, when looking back at those passages, at R(D)1/06/78 lines 361 to 364, which my learned friend didn't take my Lady to in the course of his oral submissions but which we submit is important on this issue of whether Mr Lesin's offer remained on the table.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right, well, I'll look at those.

MS DAVIES: Second, in connection with the same point, my learned friend went on to refer to Mr Berezovsky's evidence that he had more than enough money to stay in London for a thousand years, and made a whole host of criticisms of Mr Abramovich's reasons for the ORT share purchase. Again, just to give my Lady some references, we would ask my Lady to look at Abramovich 3, paragraphs 209 to 214 at E1/03/98, and Abramovich 4, paragraph 57, E5, tab 11, page 26 E1/11/26, where Mr Abramovich sets out all the various reasons, the pressure from Mr Patarkatsishvili, the concerns about money and so on, and also Mr Jenni's evidence at Day 11, pages 109 to 110, and Mr Ivlev's evidence at Day 14, pages 118 to 120 about the difficulties Mr Berezovsky was experiencing in obtaining funds at that time.

The third point, and again it's a very brief point but it was a suggestion that was made more than once by my learned friend in his oral submissions, that Mr Abramovich has previously admitted that there was a meeting with Mr Berezovsky after Mr Glushkov's arrest, and that his evidence --

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, again that is not a new point. It was made in our written opening.

MS DAVIES: Again, I just wanted to --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Ms Davies, just a second. I've got all the points about changing case on both sides.
I mean, I must have enough material before me to decide all that.

MS DAVIES: I just wanted to give my Lady the reference to Mr Abramovich's evidence on it, that's all I wanted to do.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay, it's not in your closing --

MS DAVIES: Unfortunately it's not there.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay, give it to me then.

MS DAVIES: Abramovich, Day 21, page 126, where he expressly rejected the suggestion of change of case. Day 21, page 126.

Fourth, and this is again a very quick point to give my Lady the reference, it relates to Ms Gorbunova. My Lady will recall my learned friend took my Lady to paragraphs 40 to 41 of Ms Gorbunova's witness statement and suggested that Mr Sumption's criticisms of her evidence were wrong. My Lady, what we would ask my Lady to do is to compare paragraphs 40 to 41 with Ms Gorbunova's evidence at Day 11, page 133 to 135.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MS DAVIES: The final point on this relates to the catastrophic breakdown and I don't want to repeat all the points we've made about why there was no catastrophic breakdown. But the point I wanted to pick up relates to the occasion in Israel where I gave my Lady a reference yesterday to Mr Berezovsky's comments in the media in December 2002. My learned friend in response invited my Lady to read that report and suggested it contained nothing disparaging of Mr Abramovich but my Lady also needs to look at Mr Abramovich's fourth witness statement, paragraph 150, at E5, tab 11, 61 E5/11/61, where he explained that when he read it at the time he regarded it as being very disparaging, was stunned by it and arranged a specific meeting with Mr Patarkatsishvili to discuss it.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MS DAVIES: I then turn to Sibneft intimidation which I really -- there's only one point I want to address which relates to the reliance by my learned friend orally in relation to the witness statements of Mr McKim and Ms Duncan, and there are just three short points we would ask my Lady to take into account in relation to that. The first is that my learned friend studiously didn't refer to any of the 2005 notes of the interviews.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, I've got to look at all those.

MS DAVIES: Indeed. My learned friend, to try and make good his points, referred solely to 2007 material and it's not just what Mr Patarkatsishvili said in 2005 that needs to be looked at against that, it's also Mr Berezovsky's own public statements in 2005.

Finally, when considering the evidence that my learned friend relied on of Ms Duncan and Mr McKim, my Lady of course needs to have in mind what Ms Duncan and Mr McKim said in their oral evidence about those impressions and notes representing a combination of sources, in particular Mr Berezovsky. That's Day 16, pages 12 to 13 and Day 16, 37 to 38.

My Lady, I have about ten more minutes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, I'm going to go on because I think I want to finish this now.

MS DAVIES: I'm then turning to Sibneft choice of law which I accept of course, my Lady, we addressed fully in section A5 of our closing but the submissions made by my learned friend yesterday at Day 42, page 2 to 5, not only appear to demonstrate some confusion about what we were saying but they also introduced a couple of new points that I just do need to deal with.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Please do.

MS DAVIES: The starting point is of course section 11 which requires my Lady to identify where the events constituting a tort occur --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I know what section 11 does.

MS DAVIES: Yes, exactly. There's no dispute between us about what section 11 requires my Lady to look at. We identify at paragraph 319 of our closing the four constituent elements of the tort as identified by the Court of Appeal in this case. The first is a threat of unlawful act --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I don't need to have those repeated to me, Ms Davies, I really have got this on board.

MS DAVIES: No. Well, my Lady, I just need to make a couple of points about them. The threat of unlawful act, no threats are said to have been uttered by Mr Abramovich in France. Instead what my learned friend in his oral submissions sought to do was to identify a new concept in this respect, that is of the threat being made in France in the sense of that being the place where Mr Berezovsky received and succumbed to the threat. But, with respect to my learned friend, the issue of the place where Mr Berezovsky succumbed confuses the elements of the making of the threat and the element of coercion.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: He says it was made in France because that's where the recipient of the threat was at the time.

MS DAVIES: Yes, and that's the point I'm trying to address.

We say that confuses the making of the threat and the coercion which is a separate element. But in any event the evidence demonstrates that Mr Berezovsky left it to Mr Patarkatsishvili to handle the relations with Mr Abramovich once he'd left Russia in October 2000. Communications to Mr Patarkatsishvili were therefore in effect communications to Mr Berezovsky and the empty room example that my learned friend referred to yesterday is not, in our submission, analogous.

He also sought to rely on what he said was the context to the threats, the meetings at Le Bourget and Cap d'Antibes. Now, assuming for a moment my Lady were to accept that anything of relevance occurred on those occasions, that, in our submission, doesn't of course mean that the relevant event constituting the tort occurred in France. The event only occurs once the threats are made.

Moreover, if my Lady is trying to --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: This is his continuum point, I've got that on board.

MS DAVIES: My Lady, the second big point that my learned friend focused on is the coercion in fact submission.

The submission was originally said by my learned friend to have occurred in England when Mr Berezovsky signed the Devonia agreement but now it's suggested occurred in France because that's where he took the decision to submit and it was suggested communication of that submission is not necessary.

With respect, that can't be right. For as long as Mr Berezovsky remained uncommitted to sell to Mr Abramovich, the alleged threat had not resulted in any coercion in fact and the commitment to sell could only come with some form of outward communication by Mr Berezovsky of his decision. That's why indeed it has previously been my learned friend's case that the submission occurred through the Devonia agreement in London when the commitment came about.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So you say they've changed their case on it?

MS DAVIES: They have changed their case but in a way that doesn't work because simply a decision to submit doesn't amount to coercion in fact.

The final point here is damage. My Lady has our submission that the situs of the loss is Russia but in that connection my learned friend criticised Mr Sumption's reference to the Kwok Chi Leung case on the ground that it had nothing to do with one of the events giving rise to the tort. With respect, that's difficult to understand. Mr Sumption was merely making the point that damage is a necessary component of the tort, as with any tort, and what Kwok Chi Leung tells my Lady is that damage here was in substance suffered in Russia.

Finally on Sibneft, my Lady, my learned friend suggested that there was no issue between the parties whether what was threatened was unlawful as a matter of Russian or English law. That's correct so far as Russian law goes if my Lady accepts Mr Berezovsky's case at its very highest, although there are other elements of Russian law my Lady will need to consider, but it's not correct in relation to English law. We have set out in our closing submission at paragraph 355 to 379 various submissions as to why what is said to have been threatened was not unlawful as a matter of English law. I wasn't going to repeat those but just draw attention to that.

I then come to Rusal where there are only five very short points. First, in relation to the nature of the agreement between Mr Abramovich and Mr Patarkatsishvili in respect of aluminium, my learned friend suggested it was incredible to suggest that what Mr Abramovich was doing in 2004 was paying Mr Patarkatsishvili his deferred commission for the assistance he'd provided in relation to the original aluminium asset because, he said, the amount Mr Patarkatsishvili received represented 37 per cent of the capital cost of Rusal. That was Day 42, page 49.

To get to that figure, he compared the 585 paid to Mr Patarkatsishvili to the 1.58 billion Mr Abramovich received from Mr Deripaska in 2003. Now, on any view, that's not the right comparison because Mr Deripaska in fact paid 450 of the 585 directly to Mr Patarkatsishvili but, more significantly, that point also ignores the very substantial dividends that Mr Abramovich received in respect of aluminium in the period between 2000 and 2004, the quantum of which is in fact demonstrated by the fact that those dividends were the source used to fund the 1.3 billion payments made between 2001 and 2002.

Second, a very short point in relation to events in 2003 where my learned friend firstly suggested Mr Sumption hadn't referred to this in his oral closing, he did, Day 40, page 64 to 65; but secondly said that there was no commercial sense in the decision on Mr Abramovich's part only to sell half in 2003. We address this at 451 of our closing submissions. The short point is Mr Deripaska couldn't afford to buy the whole 50 per cent, so it makes a lot of commercial sense.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I've got that in 451.

MS DAVIES: Third is to pick up on a question my Lady asked about the deed of release and whether my learned friend had any further submissions he wished to make, and my learned friend pointed to paragraph 1706 of his closing, which dealt with paragraphs 422 to 425 of Mr Berezovsky's fourth.

I just wanted to give my Lady, because it's not clear from other materials, the reference to our closings that deal with those paragraphs of Mr Berezovsky at 560 to 564.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Hang on. Yes, thank you.

MS DAVIES: The key point really is that Mr Berezovsky stated in his oral evidence that he told Mr Patarkatsishvili he is absolutely free to do everything he likes in relation to the sale. In our submission, that was obviously authority enough.

It's also the reason, incidentally, why my learned friend was wrong to suggest yesterday that his client could have refused to have given credit for the 585 million paid in 2004. Mr Berezovsky had authorised on any view Mr Patarkatsishvili to enter into the 2004 documents.

Rusal choice of law issue --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Did Mr Rabinowitz suggest yesterday that he could have refused? I thought the suggestion came from me actually.

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed.

MS DAVIES: And it was picked up by my learned friend and they said: but we haven't done it anyway.

MR RABINOWITZ: And my learned friend simply asserts her case and says on any view he was authorised. Really this is not a new point.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Well, I'm interested in this point, and I raised the point I think with Mr Rabinowitz yesterday because there seems to be a concession.

Mr Rabinowitz, are you saying you could have refused?

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady will have to put the point to me again. Could have refused what? I think my Lady said --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Could have refused to have given credit.

MR RABINOWITZ: Not -- because we had the money, that was the point. Your Ladyship said was it because you were authorised, I said, well, we had the money. If we had the money, how could we refuse to give credit?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You got the money from Mr Patarkatsishvili?

MR RABINOWITZ: As I understand it, to the extent that we have the money we have to give credit for it. It's got nothing to do with the authority. That was the point I made to my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes. The point I put to you, I thought, yesterday was theoretically there was a defence or there was a point that Mr Berezovsky might have taken which was paying the money to Mr Patarkatsishvili is not a good discharge by Mr Abramovich of the obligation that he owes me.

MR RABINOWITZ: That was the point your Ladyship put to me.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And as I understand it, you accepted that you had to give credit for the half-share because that's in your closing submission.

MR RABINOWITZ: To the extent that we --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And is that on the basis that you're simply not taking the point or that you did in fact get the money or half of the money that was paid to Mr Patarkatsishvili?

MR RABINOWITZ: We in fact got the money, it was on that basis.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay. Thank you. That's clarified it for me.

MS DAVIES: My Lady, I was trying to make a broader point which is actually there's a further reason why they had to give credit, which is Mr Berezovsky's own evidence, and we give the references at paragraph 563.1 of our written closing, that he had told Mr Patarkatsishvili that he was absolutely free to do everything what he liked to do in relation to the sale.

The dispute between the parties is really about, we would submit, whether specific authority was needed in relation to the release.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay, thank you.

MS DAVIES: Then finally, two short points on the Rusal choice of law issue. Firstly, my learned friend submitted that the principals had discussed and agreed upon the choice of law at the meeting at the Kempinski Hotel. Just for my Lady's note, that submission we submit is not borne out by the evidence. Mr Bulygin's evidence was that he put the clause in, it's paragraph 15 of his statement, and that was confirmed by Mr Abramovich at Day 19 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That's in your closing, isn't it?

MS DAVIES: It may be there somewhere.

The final point is that my learned friend suggested, and this certainly was a very new point and is in fact also wrong, that in April 2009, when Mr Berezovsky first suggested that there was an express agreement of English law, Mr Berezovsky didn't know what system of law governed the underlying aluminium asset acquisition agreement or the Rusal merger agreement, and he went on to say that his fixing on English law in those circumstances would have been a lucky guess if there was in fact no express agreement.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I remember that submission.

MS DAVIES: I'm sure it's inadvertent on my learned friend's part but it's based on a false premise. Mr Marino's first witness statement, which was served at the same time as Mr Berezovsky's statement and which Mr Berezovsky confirmed in his statement he had read, states in terms that both the underlying aluminium acquisition asset agreements, and the Rusal merger agreements, were governed by English law. That's Marino 1, paragraphs 266 to 284 at J2.2/09/121.

He may well not have seen the executed agreements by that time but what Mr Marino's statement reveals is that he had seen other evidence which clearly indicated to him the position, for example a statement from Mr Hauser confirming that the merger agreements were governed by English law, to which Mr Marino refers. So there was, with respect to my learned friend --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Marino was a solicitor acting for Mr Berezovsky?

MS DAVIES: Indeed. No question of a lucky guess at all.

My Lady, unless there are any further points on which I can assist?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: No, thank you very much, and thank all the team too, please, Ms Davies, for your helpful submissions.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, so far as anything that my learned has said requires to be addressed, we will do it in the schedule that we're dealing with because it's largely repetitive.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You have got the last word, Mr Rabinowitz.

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed. And insofar as we want to address points she has made I would largely do it in writing.

I would just say one thing --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I think it will be quicker and easier if you do it from the transcript in writing.

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed. That's really what I'd rather do.

What I'd like to do is just address one point which was made, because it may matter to my Lady when your Ladyship is considering the issues. It arose out of something that in fact Mr Malek said about whether we are inviting or not inviting your Ladyship to make findings about Mr Anisimov's knowledge.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You've got a right of reply in relation to anything that Mr Malek said and anything that Mr --

MR RABINOWITZ: Most of it simply repeats points that are, in any event, in Mr Abramovich's schedule, and insofar as we need to deal with it we will deal with it there.

I do want to address this point because it affects the way your Ladyship approaches the determination of the matter. Mr Malek, I think, suggested that we had changed our position from one which we were taking in our written closing where he said we were telling your Ladyship you should make findings about Mr Anisimov's knowledge. He said that in my oral closing I had changed that and I was now saying that your Ladyship shouldn't.

In fact, neither of those was correct.

Paragraph 1139 of our written closing says exactly what I said on my feet, which is that the overlap submissions do not require your Ladyship to make findings about Mr Anisimov's knowledge. The point that we were trying to make was this, my Lady: the overlap issues in effect try and carve out for the purposes of this trial the question of the determination whether objectively Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili had an interest in Rusal because, plainly, if objectively they did not have such an interest, the issues which arise in the Chancery trial about tracing claims and the like, depending on Mr Anisimov's knowledge of that interest, cannot arise in relation to that interest because it didn't exist.

Now, the point that we have been trying to make in our written closing, and obviously not made well enough, was this. If incidentally, on your Ladyship's route to try to determine whether or not Mr Berezovsky and Mr Patarkatsishvili had interests, your Ladyship finds it of assistance to either find or not find that Mr Anisimov had knowledge of that, then that is plainly something that your Ladyship will want to consider.

The only point that we were trying to make is that outside of that your Ladyship may regard it as not appropriate to make findings about the stand-alone question of the extent of Mr Anisimov's knowledge, that's to say, subjective knowledge, because that really is something which arises not as part of the objective determination of whether these interests existed but as part of an issue which arises in the Chancery litigation.

I don't mind taking your Ladyship to this now, although given the time your Ladyship may not want to do it, but the overlap issues, at least the previous draft, because your Ladyship knows that there was an amendment to it, are found at bundle I2 --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Have we not got --

MR RABINOWITZ: Your Ladyship changed something. We can see it insofar as we need to -- in fact we can hand it up --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Is this the final version of the overlap issues?

MR RABINOWITZ: Just let me ask Mr Gillis exactly what it is.

Rather than take it from this, which I'm not sure what it is exactly, if your Ladyship wants to take it from Magnum, your Ladyship will find it at bundle I2, tab 6, page 24 I2/06/24.

Now, there was an amendment which your Ladyship made but I don't understand it to affect the point that I'm making --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I hope somebody has set out for me in one of the closing submissions what the overlap issues are in their final form.

MR ADKIN: My Lady, we have. You'll find them at the beginning of our submissions and also --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: And that is the final version, is it?

MR ADKIN: That is the final version.

We rather piously promised your Ladyship that we'd ensure that this sealed order was actually put onto the database. I'm afraid we've not lived up to that promise, I think in part because the order hasn't actually been sealed.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I don't want to go to anything that isn't the final version.

MR ADKIN: The final version is set out in our closing in paragraph 1 in italics, and in annex 1.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. Well, Mr Adkin, can you make sure, because you might be interested in the point, that they are actually on Magnum, they do get --

MR ADKIN: We will get the order sealed if it hasn't already been sealed, and we will make sure that a sealed order ends up on Magnum, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: While you're standing, Mr Adkin, I would like to thank you, or your junior, for the useful chart at annex 2.

MR ADKIN: My Lady, I'm grateful.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, Mr Rabinowitz. So I'm working from there then.

MR RABINOWITZ: I2, page 26. Your Ladyship has the overlap issues subject to the amendment which was made which doesn't affect the point I'm making. If your Ladyship goes through those, you will see they're directed to, in a sense, the determination of whether, objectively, Mr Berezovsky -- obviously Mr Patarkatsishvili as well -- had the interest. They don't raise the question in the context of the overlap issues for determination of, for example, Mr Anisimov's knowledge. That was the only point that we were trying to make.

We weren't saying to your Ladyship, you can't decide this, or that you must decide it, simply that the overlap issues were done in a way which does not require your Ladyship to do it because the question of Mr Anisimov's knowledge will be an issue -- that is going to be one of the main issues in the Metalloinvest action where there will be any number of other related issues before whoever tries it.

We're not saying your Ladyship should stay away from it insofar as you find it helpful in considering whether or not they had an issue, and that was the only point. I just wanted your Ladyship to be clear about what we were or not saying.

And insofar as there are any points which have arisen, as I say, we will set it out for your Ladyship in the written document that we are producing rather than take up more time now.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It will be quicker for you, won't it, as well, if you do it by reference to the transcript?

MR RABINOWITZ: It certainly will.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Very well. Obviously I'm going to reserve my judgment.

So far as communication with counsel is concerned,

Mr Rabinowitz, should my clerk communicate, rather than with all counsel, could you designate and let him know from each party who he should communicate with?

MR RABINOWITZ: Indeed, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Otherwise, does he communicate to all your clerks or all solicitors? So can each team have one designated point of contact?

MR RABINOWITZ: We will do that.

Two other things I ought to mention. Your Ladyship asked for an up-to-date chronology.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR RABINOWITZ: We have progressed that at our end, and it will be progressed, and your Ladyship will have an up-to-date chronology.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Can you send me a hard copy of it?

MR RABINOWITZ: We will do.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: With an agreed statement that it either sets out the agreed chronology or it identifies where people disagree.

MR RABINOWITZ: We will do.

The only other point, my Lady, first can Mr Gillis just deal with a point.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Certainly.

Yes, Mr Gillis.

MR GILLIS: My Lady, just one point of housekeeping, and it relates to the order that your Ladyship made on 28 October which was --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Remind me.

MR GILLIS: It was amending -- can I hand it up? (Handed)

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes.

MR GILLIS: It was amending the overlap issues as against the Chancery defendants in order to introduce the constructive trust, resulting trust claim.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I remember.

MR GILLIS: I've mentioned this to my learned friends, the Chancery defendants. Your ladyship made the order on Day 15 but we've never received a sealed copy of the order.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Whether I've signed it or not, why don't I just sign it now?

MR GILLIS: If your Ladyship could do that.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: This is just -- it's in the Chancery Division action?

MR GILLIS: Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: But that's all right, I haven't got to go and get Mr Justice Mann to co-sign it?

MR GILLIS: No. This was brought to Mr Justice Mann's attention after you had made the order and he has confirmed it in the Chancery proceedings as well. It is just a formality, we don't actually have a sealed copy.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right. I'll say this can be sealed.

There you are.

MS DAVIES: My Lady, may I mention one other point of housekeeping?

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Mr Gillis, that's all you have?

MR GILLIS: Yes.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Thank you very much.

MS DAVIES: It's to do with the transcripts. Behind the scenes there has been much correspondence between the parties about translation issues arising in relation to the transcripts. The interpreters have now, as it were, signed off on the final version. That's gone to Addleshaw Goddard. I'm sure that the corrected transcripts will be uploaded very quickly but I just wanted to mention that there is that process that has been --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay. Will they be corrected final transcripts? I mean, I don't want to have to go to three different transcripts of Day 15.

MS DAVIES: No, my understanding is that they're corrected final transcripts.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Yes, I see.

MS DAVIES: And that hasn't affected the page numbering, otherwise all these wonderful documents might be -- but that hasn't happened, because they are sort of words and so on in places.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: So if, for example, in quotations from transcripts something has changed, are you going to bring that to my attention?

MS DAVIES: My Lady, we will do that. I can't say on my feet now whether I know there's anything that's changed in our submissions --

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: It's just that if you quoted a particular nugget, and as a result of the work that you've all done behind the scenes it has now changed, I don't want to be the one who has to go and check each reference you've made to check that it hasn't been amended.

MS DAVIES: I entirely understand that, my Lady. We will get that exercise done.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Okay.

MS DAVIES: It may be that there isn't anything, I just don't know, but we will check.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: Right.

MR RABINOWITZ: My Lady, the only thing that remains from this side of the court, and I'm sure I speak on behalf of all the counsel teams for all the parties, is to thank your Ladyship for the way in which your Ladyship has conducted the case.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: That's very kind of you.

MR RABINOWITZ: Also, if I may, the transcript writers and I'm sure the translators as well.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: I would certainly like to say thank you very much to the translators, to the IT people and to the transcript writers because we've cracked through, with everybody's cooperation, very quickly, and in fact that goes for the witnesses as well. We have actually cracked through and finished pretty much on time.

Right, is there anything else that from a practical point of view that needs to be dealt with now? No?

MR RABINOWITZ: I don't believe so, my Lady.

MRS JUSTICE GLOSTER: You will have tomorrow to move your papers. I'm sitting tomorrow on something else but I don't know whether it's in this court or not, hopefully it won't be, but you can liaise with my clerk about that.

Very well, thank you very much.
