Searches give a glimpse into what the world was interested in during 2016. And for all the year's difficulties and challenges, there were also moments of levity, beauty, and inspiration.

The world mourned after the attacks in Brussels and Orlando. People struggled to understand the ins and outs of Zika and Brexit. And issues raised during the presidential election season continue to resonate even after November 8. But there were also moments of comic relief—demonstrated by the unlikely memes of Dat Boi and Michael Phelps—and experiences that brought us together, such as the Olympics, Pokémon Go, and a strong desire to win Powerball.

Year in Search showcases some examples of the way people are living their lives during the moments that matter: those times when there's an immediate need to fulfill. In those moments, consumers want to know, go, do, or buy—and they turn to search for information and inspiration.

In 2017, marketers need to be present in consumers' moments that matter and find ways to be useful, too. And they'll have to do it while navigating a world that is, in many ways, divided.

The Great Recession presented a similar dynamic. Marketers responded in 2009 with a spate of feel-good advertising. Coca-Cola and Pepsi debuted competing upbeat campaigns, 'Open Happiness' and 'Refresh Everything,' respectively. And Anheuser-Busch InBev doubled down for 2009's Super Bowl with seven beer advertisements that were "lighthearted or warmly emotional rather than infused with slapstick and sight gags," according to The New York Times. The current climate is similarly ripe for optimistic, heartwarming messages. Marketers must find ways to reassure consumers and position their brands as trustworthy. And in order to succeed, they'll need to be relevant during the moments that, together, will add up to another big year in search.
