Excellent total reference book...By Kasey CoffFTD - fronto-temporal dementia - is the second-most common dementia after Alzheimer's disease, yet few seem to realize not all dementias are the same. An exceedingly tough subject to write about - Radin is informative, candid, and clear. He makes good use of research, statistics, case studies, and includes experiences from people in the field, both professional and non-professional. Most of all, his tone is never condescending: there is an underlying warmth but an overall practicality that is perhaps more useful than anything else to the FTD caregiver. There are a lot of compassionate books out there, and a lot of people write about the emotional and psychological struggles in dealing with FTD; equally, there are a lot of publications that are pitched to those in the medical field, articles and books full of specialized jargon and obscure references. Few books hit the middle zone of no-nonsense advice, clear information about what to expect, and information on resources, organizations, online groups, etc. If you're a caregiver, if you know someone who is, if you know someone in the throes of FTD and want to learn more, this is the best comprehensive guide I've seen.1 of 1 people found the following review helpful. Hope, at lastBy MichMy mother has had many years of symptoms that just don't seem to get her the help she needs. Her neurologist told us her issues are not neurological because she doesn't fit their examination of memory issues. This book gave me hope that someone out there might understand and help us. Her problems are centered on executive functioning. I hope to contact the resources mentioned in this book.1 of 1 people found the following review helpful. Very well written and filled with some of the best information I have foundBy pamThis is not a book I wanted to have to order, but since I needed to learn about this, of course I got it. I was impressed with how well laid out the content was and how well it answered so many of the questions I had. If you are facing a future with
