2. Textual Criticism and the Historical Jesus

The reconstruction of historical figures of classical antiquity is made more difficult by the problem of the numerous refractions or differences between the flesh-and-blood person himself, the events linked to his life, the sources which speak about him or about these events, and the perspective of the historian. It is true that most of these problems can already be found when one studies historical figures of the modern period; but the greater the distance from the figure himself, the more must we assume a loss of potential sources. Similarly, we must reckon to a greater degree with the likelihood that the surviving sources no longer correspond to the original sources, but have been changed in a great variety of refractions in the course of an extremely complex process of transmission. In the specific case of the quest for the historical Jesus, this means that the complex textual history of the New Testament—or more precisely, of the early Christian sources on which we draw for the process of reconstruction—must be taken into account. This important point has often been neglected in research into the historical Jesus, perhaps because scholars had such great trust in the reliability of the standard critical editions of the New Testament. These editions do not however claim to reproduce “the” original texts of the New Testament writings (if such texts in fact ever existed);<sup>47</sup> what is offered is an eclectic text reconstructed from a number of manuscripts, which claims to come as close as possible to an early textual form. One must remember here that the earliest manuscript attestations for some New Testament passages must be dated more than two hundred years later than their hypothetical date of composition and that all we can propose for the intermediary period, in which the textual transmission may have been very free, are well-grounded hypotheses.

---

<sup>46</sup> Cf. Porter, Criteria, 210–237. In this discussion, Porter builds on his earlier work on discourse analysis in Greek biblical texts. On this, cf., e.g., idem, "Discourse Analysis and New Testament Studies," in Discourse Analysis and Other Topics in Biblical Greek, ed. S. E. Porter and D. A. Carson, JSNTSup 113, Studies in New Testament Greek 2 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995), 14–35; and the essays in S. E. Porter and J. T. Reed, eds. Discourse Analysis and the New Testament: Approaches and Results, JSNTSup 170, Studies in New Testament Greek 4 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999). Cf. also J. T. Reed, "Discourse Analysis," in Handbook to Exegesis of the New Testament, ed. S. E. Porter, NTTS 25 (Leiden: Brill, 1997), 189–217.

Despite these problems, it is only in recent years that the question of the significance of work on textual history for the quest of the historical Jesus has been the object of intensive study. S. E. Porter has led the field here. He points out that the hypothesis that Jesus repeatedly spoke Greek in the course of his life—with the consequent possibility of discovering ipsissima verba of Jesus in the gospels—increases the importance of detailed text-critical work for the quest of the historical Jesus.<sup>48</sup> In two articles written jointly with M. Brook O’Donnell and in his monograph on criteria for research into the historical Jesus, Porter has presented a detailed overview of the numerous variants in the tradition of the words and deeds of Jesus of Nazareth, and given examples of dimensions where textual criticism proves to be an important factor in this quest.<sup>49</sup>

---

<sup>47</sup> On the problems associated with the idea of an “original text” of the New Testament writings, cf., e.g., the programmatic article by E. J. Epp, “The Multivalence of the Term ‘Original Text’ in New Testament Textual Criticism,” HTR 92 (1999): 245–281; and idem, “Rethinking New Testament Textual Criticism: Moving from the Nineteenth Century to the Twenty-First Century,” in Rethinking New Testament Textual Criticism, ed. D. A. Black (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2002), 17–76, esp. 70–75.

<sup>48</sup> On this, cf. S. E. Porter and M. Brook O’Donnell, “The Implications of Textual Variants for Authenticating the Words of Jesus,” in Authenticating the Words, ed. Chilton and Evans, 97–133, esp. 103–104; same authors, “The Implications of Textual Variants for Authenticating the Activities of Jesus,” in Authenticating the Activities of Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTTS 28.2 (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 121–151, esp. 121; Porter, Criteria, 187–190.

First, it is very common to find links between the dominant source-critical theory in the synoptic question and text-critical decisions,<sup>50</sup> e.g. the decision in favor of the reading ἀφίενται (against the well attested ἀφέωνται) at Mark 2:5, 9 in the Greek New Testament. The Textual Commentary justifies this decision in a way that presupposes specific aspects of the two-source theory in the synoptic question.<sup>51</sup>

Secondly, the acceptance of different textual variants as original can make it necessary to employ different criteria in order to answer the question of the authenticity of a logion. Porter's example is the logion at Mark 7:9, which is attested in Greek in two strands of tradition. Within the Greek transmission of the New Testament, the predicate in the final subordinate clause is attested in two variants. The reading τηρήσῃτε is attested by  $\aleph$  A B (in fact τηρητε) f<sup>13</sup> 33, the majority text, etc.; the reading στήσῃτε which is preferred by NA27 is based inter alia on D W  $\Theta$  f<sup>1</sup> and a number of minuscules.<sup>52</sup> Depending on how one decides this extremely difficult case,<sup>53</sup> the text must be translated as follows:

---

<sup>49</sup> Cf. the previous note. Shortly before this article went to print, I received the monograph by H. W. Shin, Textual Criticism and the Synoptic Problem in Historical Jesus Research: The Search for Valid Criteria, Contributions to Biblical Exegesis and Theology 26 (Leuven: Peeters, 2004). Shin's starting point is the observation that the quest for the oldest form in textual criticism, the quest for the underlying text or source in the context of the "synoptic problem," and the quest for the historical Jesus all look for the earliest units of material, but work with very different and partly incompatible criteria. This leads Shin to formulate anew the criteria for the quest of the historical Jesus.

<sup>50</sup> For details, cf. Porter and O'Donnell, "Implications," 119–121.

<sup>51</sup> Cf. B. M. Metzger, A Textual Commentary on the Greek New Testament, 2nd ed. (Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft, 1994), 66: "Although strongly supported in the manuscripts, the perfect tense . . . appears to be secondary, having been introduced by copyists from Luke's account (Lk 5.20). Mark's use of the present tense . . . was followed by Matthew (Mt 9.2)." On the problem in general, cf. also J. K. Elliott, "The Relevance of Textual Criticism to the Synoptic Problem," in Essays and Studies in New Testament Textual Criticism, ed. J. K. Elliott (Córdoba: Ediciones El Almendro, 1992), 147–158.

<sup>52</sup> Porter and O'Donnell, "Implications," 121–123, investigate the variants of the text with the aid of the apparatus criticus in NA27. For more differentiated and very reliable information, cf. the volumes edited by R. Swanson, New Testament Manuscripts: Variant Readings Arranged in Horizontal Lines against Codex Vaticanus. The volume on the Gospel of Mark (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995) offers a detailed overview on p. 107.

<sup>53</sup> Cf. Metzger, Textual Commentary, 81, where the passage is evaluated as {D}.

Reading 1: "You have a fine way of abolishing the commandment of God, in order to keep to your tradition."

Reading 2: "You have a fine way of abolishing the commandment of God, in order to set up your tradition."

How is the authenticity of this logion to be judged? The argumentation will vary in accordance with the text-critical decision. If we follow NA27 in assuming reading 2 to be original, we could argue that these words are formulated from the perspective of the separation between Christianity and Judaism, and it is not easy to attribute such a logion to the historical Jesus. On the other hand, reading 1 is certainly conceivable on the lips of the Jewish teacher Jesus, who is criticizing a specific Jewish praxis.<sup>54</sup> Accordingly, this example shows not only the limits of text-critical reconstruction, but also (indirectly) the dependence of the quest of the historical Jesus on antecedent decisions which, in most cases, are simply taken for granted in the interpretation of the text.<sup>55</sup>

Porter is not content to assemble the variants of the New Testament text which could play a role in the investigation of the words and deeds of the historical Jesus, nor to present the above mentioned examples with their methodological implications. He takes the further step of formulating a criterion for this investigation which is intimately linked to questions of textual history. The criterion of Greek textual variance depends on the presupposition that the criterion of Greek language (see above) can be employed; it is also perceived as a variation on the criterion of multiple attestation.<sup>56</sup> Porter writes:<sup>57</sup>

This criterion posits that, where there are two or more independent traditions with similar wording, the level of variation is greater the further one is removed from the common source. Conversely, the less variation points to stability and probable preservation of the tradition, and hence the possibility that the source is authentic to Jesus. It is, of course, only logical to assume that the common source of two independent traditions is earlier than either of them, and in terms of the Jesus tradition in the Gospels, has a reasonable claim to authenticity.

<sup>54</sup> For a detailed presentation of this example, cf. Porter and O'Donnell, "Implications," (n. 48 above), 121–122.

<sup>55</sup> For example, J. Gnilka, Das Evangelium nach Markus (Mk 1–8,26), 3rd ed., EKK II.1 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1989), mentions only in a very brief footnote the text-critical problem which is presupposed in his nuanced exposition of 7:9 (283 n. 36).

<sup>56</sup> Cf. Porter, Criteria, 191.

<sup>57</sup> Ibid., 191.

Methodologically speaking, this means that if a logion fulfills the criterion of the Greek language and is also found in the same wording in independent traditions, it is highly probable that these specific words can be considered authentic words of Jesus. If in addition there is only a slight variation in the transmission of the logion, the degree of certainty is higher than if the opposite were the case.<sup>58</sup>

Although these ideas are closely linked to the criterion of multiple attestation, the novelty of this approach and the boldness of the argumentation are surprising, and this suggests that it is worth developing Porter's ideas critically:

First, the reconstruction of isolated ipsissima verba of Jesus makes sense only when it is linked to concepts that these words intend to communicate. Even if a logion could be traced back without any doubt to the historical Jesus, one would still have to ask what relevance it has, if it cannot be related to a unifying concept with a validity broader than that of past situations. In other words, even if this methodology increases the chances of isolating individual ipsissima verba of Jesus, perhaps also in connection with concrete situations, these logia do not automatically possess either historical or theological relevance.

Secondly, there is an element of what we might call "fuzziness around the edges": how far is it in fact possible to give an account of the de facto text-historical breadth of variation in a passage? The existing manuscripts are only "chance discoveries"—most of which for a long time were clustered in specific places such as Oxyrhynchus or the Fayyum region.<sup>59</sup> One must be cautious in drawing inferences from them about the total original picture of the textual transmission, especially on fine points of detail.

---

<sup>58</sup> This formulation closely follows Porter, Criteria, 192. Cf. also ibid., p. 195: "Obviously, the strongest probability of authenticity rests with independent traditions that record the same statement of Jesus word for word, and the longer the passage even the more likely (lessening the chance of accidental similarity for a couple of words)." On pp. 196–207, he applies this principle to a number of examples: Mark 7:25–30 = Matt 15:21–28; Mark 12:13–17 = Matt 22:16–22 = Luke 20:20–26; Mark 8:27–30 = Matt 16:13–20 = Luke 9:18–21; Mark 15:2–5 = Matt 27:11–14 = Luke 23:2–4 = John 18:29–38.

<sup>59</sup> On the context of Oxyrhynchus, cf. the important essays by E. J. Epp, "The New Testament Papyri at Oxyrhynchus in Their Social and Intellectual Context," in Sayings of Jesus: Canonical and Non-canonical: Essays in Honour of Tjitze Baarda, ed. W. L. Petersen, NovTSup 89 (Leiden: Brill, 1997), 47–68; "The Codex and Literacy in Early Christianity and at Oxyrhynchus: Issues raised by Harry Y. Gamble's Books and Readers in the Early Church," Critical Review of Books in Religion 11 (1997): 15–37; "The Oxyrhynchus New Testament Papyri: 'Not Without Honor Except in their Hometown,'" JBL 123 (2004): 5–55; "The Jews and the Jewish Community in Oxyrhynchus: Socio-Religious Context for the New Testament Papyri," in New Testament Manuscripts and their World, ed. T. J. Kraus and T. Nicklas, TENT 2 (Leiden: Brill, 2006), 13–52. On the Fayyum region, cf. G. Schmelz, "Das Christentum in Fayyum bis zum 5. Jahrhundert," in Patristica et

Thirdly, it is difficult to know whether the tangible variation in the textual transmission from the second and third centuries (and later) permits conclusions about earlier periods. This question can be posed on two distinct levels. On the level of the surviving textual history, a high variation in later periods need not necessarily lead to negative conclusions about the early transmission, since particular readings may have been consciously produced only from one point in time onwards, in response to specific problems<sup>60</sup>—this applies especially to variants which have an effect on the contents of a text. Other variant readings may be due to changes over the centuries in the sense of style.<sup>61</sup> On the other hand, I accept the plausibility in Porter's argument that zero variation within the later textual transmission of independent sources to which we have access—always bearing in mind that variants may in fact have been lost en route—permits the conclusion that there was zero variation in the earlier textual transmission too. But I believe that we can draw an inference from the written level to the oral level (with all due caution) only when we can genuinely assume the existence of

---

Oecumenica: Festschrift W. Bienert, ed. P. Gemeinhardt and U. Kühneweg, MThSt 85 (Marburg: N. G. Elwert, 2004), 147–156.

<sup>60</sup> On this, cf. the programmatic study by B. D. Ehrman, “The Text as Window: New Testament Manuscripts and the Social History of Early Christianity,” in The Text of the New Testament in Contemporary Research: Essays on the Status Quaestionis: Festschrift B. M. Metzger, ed. B. D. Ehrman and M. W. Holmes, SD 46 (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1995), 361–379. A number of examples of changes made because of debates about questions of orthodoxy can be found in the well known book by the same author, The Orthodox Corruption of Scripture: The Effect of Early Christian Controversies on the Text of the New Testament (New York: Oxford University Press, 1993). On the question of changes due to apologetic interests, cf. (as a complement to Ehrman's book) W. C. Kannaday, Apologetic Discourse and the Scribal Tradition: Evidence of the Influence of Apologetic Interests on the Text of the Canonical Gospels, SBL Text-Critical Studies (Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2004).

<sup>61</sup> The investigation of the language and style of New Testament texts plays a decisive role above all in the approach called “radical eclecticism” which is proposed by G. D. Kilpatrick and J. K. Elliott. For basic information and numerous examples, cf. G. D. Kilpatrick, The Principles and Practice of New Testament Textual Criticism: Collected Essays of G. D. Kilpatrick, ed. J. K. Elliott, BETL 96 (Leuven: Peeters, 1990); Elliott, Essays and Studies. J. K. Elliott has given a clear summary of the principles of this approach in several essays: cf. “Thoroughgoing Eclecticism in New Testament Textual Criticism,” in Text, ed. Ehrman and Holmes, 321–335; “The Case for Thoroughgoing Eclecticism,” in Rethinking, ed. Black, 101–124; “Thoroughgoing Eclecticism,” in The Bible as Book: The Transmission of the Greek Text, ed. S. McKendrick and O. A. O'Sullivan (London: British Library, 2003), 139–145.

independent traditions, since this alone draws the sting from the objection that one cannot take the stability of (later) written transmission as proof of a similar stability in the previous oral transmission. And there is a grey area that must not be ignored completely: the surviving variants do not correspond to the variants which occurred de facto in the transmission, and our conclusions about the “zero variation” of the written transmission, based on the incomplete material which has survived, can never be more than approximate. But let us for the moment leave this question aside. The absolute stability at a late date, combined with the identity of mutually independent traditions, is almost inexplicable if the same stability and identity were lacking in the earlier periods.<sup>62</sup> If I understand Porter aright, however, this conclusion would lie ultimately on the level of the criterion of multiple attestation by mutually independent sources; in that case, all it proves (in my opinion) is the early date of a tradition which has been handed on in a stable manner. The final question, viz. whether a logion can in fact be attributed authentically to Jesus, remains open.

Fourthly, we have the problem of applicability. The criterion becomes stronger and more clearly relevant when sufficiently long and complex utterances of Jesus are transmitted in several mutually independent sources in a stable textual history. But the longer these concordant passages are, the more are we obliged to ask whether it is still possible to assume the independence of the sources: ought we not to apply a criterion of literary dependence here?<sup>63</sup>

---

<sup>62</sup> An example to the contrary—a mutually independent common redactional revision of the comparable traditions—is conceivable only on the level of the history of the written text (and naturally calls into question the presupposition of mutual independence). This would argue against the thesis of textual “zero variation.”

<sup>63</sup> On this, cf. the methodological reflections on literary dependence by J. Frey, “Das Vierte Evangelium auf dem Hintergrund der älteren Evangelientradition: Zum Problem: Johannes und die Synoptiker,” in Johannesevangelium—Mitte oder Rand des Kanons? Neue Standortbestimmungen, ed. T. Söding, QD 203 (Freiburg: Herder, 2003), 79–82. This problem can be seen in the discussion of Mark 7:25–30 = Matt 15:21–28. Porter, Criteria, 197, must begin here by demonstrating the mutual independence of the two episodes (certainly against the view held by many other scholars), before he can apply his criterion. Cf., e.g., U. Luz, Das Evangelium nach Matthäus 2: Mt 8–17, EKK I.2 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1990), 230, on Matt 15:21ff.: “The source of this passage is Mk 7:24–30. There are no other primary or secondary sources.”

3. Redaction Criticism and the Historical Jesus

3.1. The Role of Redaction Criticism in the Application of the “Criterion of Embarrassment”

One of the most widely used criteria in the quest for the historical Jesus is the so-called “criterion of embarrassment”; German scholars tend to speak of “something running contrary to the general tendency” or of a “disturbing tradition.” E. Schillebeeckx offers the following classic definition of this criterion:<sup>64</sup>

Each of the Gospels has its own theological position, which can be seen both in the structure and through the separation of redaction and tradition. Through their own eschatological, christological, or ecclesiological views they reveal their theological standpoint by means of their selection of the account of Jesus’ words and deeds and by the way in which they arrange and present their material. The consequence is that when they also transmit material which does not fit particularly well into their own theological conception, this can be considered a genuflection before venerable traditional material. This entitles us to assume that they regarded the tradition in question as inviolable and that they held (for historical or theological reasons)... that it went back to Jesus himself.

Schillebeeckx thus emphasizes the importance of redaction-critical work in the application of this criterion, although tradition criticism also plays a role here. J. P. Meier offers a definition which is clearly different:<sup>65</sup>

The criterion of ‘embarrassment’ ... focuses on actions or sayings of Jesus that would have embarrassed or created difficulty for the early Church. The point of the criterion is that the early Church would hardly have gone out of its way to create material that only embarrassed its creator or weakened its position in arguments with opponents. Rather, embarrassing material coming from Jesus would naturally be either suppressed or softened in later stages of Gospel tradition, and often such progressive suppression or softening can be traced through the Four Gospels.

These two formulations show very clearly that the two scholars emphasize different aspects; I myself tend to prefer the version formulated by J. P. Meier, although this means that the strong redaction-critical emphasis in Schillebeeckx's formulation moves into the background. The Dutch scholar's definition embraces more material than Meier's description, including elements which fail to correspond only to the specific redactional tendency of an evangelist (but which need not in principle have posed a problem for the transmission of these elements in the church). On the other hand, Schillebeeckx's approach presupposes very far-reaching considerations and hypotheses about the redactional tendencies of an evangelist, and these in turn are linked (at least in part) to hypotheses about relationships of mutual literary dependence which do not always win universal acceptance. Since Meier's definition is more strongly linked than Schillebeeckx's to the tendencies of the tradition, it is tradition-critical rather than redaction-critical; but since it too deals with the question of plausible interventions in the tradition (i.e., "redaction" in the broader sense of the term), this criterion can be classified as redaction-critical in the widest sense even in Meier's formulation. And it is in fact advisable to locate this criterion on the redaction-critical level, as the following examples show:

---

<sup>64</sup> E. Schillebeeckx, Jesus: Die Geschichte von einem Lebenden (Freiburg: Herder, 1975; repr., 1992), 78–79. As far as I know, the oldest formulation of this criterion is by P. W. Schmiedel, “Die Person Jesu im Streite der Meinungen der Gegenwart,” Protestantische Monatshefte 10 (1906): 257–282.

<sup>65</sup> J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, vol. 1, The Roots of the Problem and the Person, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 168.

First, there are a few passages in the Gospel of Mark with no parallels in the other two synoptics. Given that Matthew and Luke knew a Gospel of Mark in the form in which we know it, we may assume that the two later synoptics expunged the text in their redactional work independently of each other. One of these texts is Mark 3:21, the statement that Jesus' relatives wanted to fetch him by force (and probably take him back to Nazareth) because they held him to be "out of his senses." The redaction-critical tendency here is clearly to eliminate these words. In an early church in which the mother of Jesus, as well as his brothers James and Jude, played an important role, it is difficult to imagine why such a negative picture of the family of Jesus should have been invented. And when we bear in mind that the Gospel of John too, possibly independently of the synoptics, portrays a relationship of distance between Jesus and his family (e.g. John 2:3-4:12; 7:5),<sup>66</sup> then the "criterion of embarrassment" provides one argument in favor of the authenticity of this brief piece of information.<sup>67</sup>

---

<sup>66</sup> On John 2:12, cf. my essay "Die johanneische 'Tempelreinigung' (Joh 2,12-22) für Leser der Synoptiker," ThPh 80 (2005): 1-16.

<sup>67</sup> A different view is taken by J. D. Crossan, "Mark and the Relatives of Jesus," NovT 15 (1973): 91-113, esp. 110-113.

Secondly, however, it is also possible for material that apparently puts Jesus in a bad light to have penetrated the Jesus tradition at a later date, as we see in the following verse, Mark 3:22, a dispute between Jesus and scribes from Jerusalem. When they accuse him of being possessed by Beelzebul, Jesus reacts by defending himself in vehement words (3:23–30).<sup>68</sup> It is clear that Matthew and Luke see no reason here to tone down the accusation which is leveled at Jesus: it merely moves from the lips of the scribes from Jerusalem to the “Pharisees” (Matt 12:24) or “some people” (Luke 11:15). This accusation may seem “embarrassing,” but the redactional tendency does not permit us to draw any conclusions about the historicity of the dispute. It is in fact perfectly conceivable that the historical Jesus faced similar accusations.<sup>69</sup> On the other hand, however, it is in principle possible that the story was constructed only at a later date: the accusation that the miracles of Jesus were brought about by demonic powers or magical means could have arisen in the context of the Christian proclamation of such mighty deeds; and the idea that Jesus seduced the people is attested from later Jewish and pagan perspectives (John 7:12b; 8:48; 10:20; Justin, 1 Apol. 30.1; Dial. 69.7; Origen, Contra Celsum 1.69; 2.49).<sup>70</sup>

3.2. The Criterion of Discourse Features

A third criterion elaborated by S. E. Porter, the “criterion of discourse features” which was mentioned briefly above, is likewise situated on the level of redaction criticism. Porter here takes up a discourse-analytical model which has been developed by M. A. K. Halliday.<sup>71</sup> Porter proposes the following steps:<sup>72</sup>

<sup>68</sup> Theissen and Merz, Der historische Jesus, 115 and 268–269, take Mark 3:22–24 par. as an argument (in addition to others) for the historicity of Jesus’ activity as exorcist. Cf. also the argumentation (on different grounds) by N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1996), 440.

<sup>69</sup> On this, it is good to read the cautious argumentation by G. Stanton, Jesus and Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004), 143–147.

<sup>70</sup> Cf. also J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew, vol. 2, Mentor, Message, and Miracles, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1994), 551, on these and comparable charges: “To be sure, many of these accusations... mirror polemics in and against the early church rather than against the historical Jesus.”

<sup>71</sup> In the field of New Testament exegesis, it is above all J. T. Reed, A Discourse Analysis of Philipians: Method and Rhetoric in the Debate over Literary Integrity, JSNTSup 136 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997), who has fruitfully employed this model. For an overview of the most important studies by Halliday, cf. Porter, Criteria, 214–215 n. 10.

<sup>72</sup> Ibid., 214–215.

A way to proceed would be, for each of the Gospels, to take the words of Jesus and isolate them from the other words of the Gospel . . . , and identify a number of linguistic features in these bodies of material. On the basis of these findings, one could establish from the narrative and expository material the linguistic tendencies of a given Gospel writer. Against this one could then test the wording of a passage purportedly uttered by Jesus.

If it can be established that words spoken by Jesus are clearly distinct linguistically from their context in the gospel, and at the same time that they prove to be mutually consistent in various segments, one may assume that the final redaction of the gospel in question had received logia of Jesus in an older and possibly authentic form.<sup>73</sup> Naturally, this criterion has a limited aim, viz. to determine whether one particular section is affected by the final redaction of the gospel or not—this criterion on its own can only identify material which is linguistically so distinct from its context that its authenticity seems more probable than that of the surrounding text. But as a complement to the classic redaction-critical criterion, it could supply additional arguments which would help scholars reach a decision or formulate a problem with greater precision. Once again, however, we must remember that this criterion too aims at the reconstruction of ipsissima verba of Jesus. Is it meaningful to apply it also in narrative contexts, where it cannot be proved (and may indeed be improbable) that Jesus spoke in Greek? Does not the detachment of logia of Jesus from their narrative framework, which this criterion demands, contradict the criterion of the Greek language, which sees the contexts in which logia are transmitted as decisive for the question whether ipsissima verba may be present there? In other words, whereas the “criterion of discourse features” must presuppose in principle that logia receive their context only in the framework of a later level of narration, the “criterion of Greek language” depends on the assumption that the contexts presented in the gospels are historically plausible.

On another level, we have the methodological question whether the narrative sections of the gospels display unified characteristics of an author (or final redactor) which can be objectively identified in linguistic and stylistic terms—such as one might perhaps find in a modern novel. Even the Gospel of John, which is marked linguistically by a strongly unifying final redaction,<sup>74</sup> repeatedly displays characteristics in short sections which are otherwise scarcely compatible with the linguistic profile of the text.<sup>75</sup> Naturally, these indicate that older traditions have been taken over in these passages without any great revision. In order to apply Porter's third criterion, however, we must know how we are to deal with such passages. Is it always so easy to separate tradition and redaction that the language of the redaction (or of the author) of the gospel can be reconstructed with absolute certainty?

---

<sup>73</sup> Cf. the formulation by Porter, Criteria, 217.

These critical questions do not mean that it is impossible in principle to apply this criterion; but it is at any rate clear that this is no easy task.<sup>76</sup>

4. A Summary and a Look Ahead—Reflections Prompted by the Theory of History

Despite some proposals which seek to detach the quest for the historical Jesus from the intellectual strategies which have been followed up to now, I believe that the investigation of the date and the historical plausibility of traditions about the historical Jesus will continue to form a central axis of this quest. Even the most important of the alternatives to form and tradition criticism which I have discussed here<sup>77</sup> have been <sup>74</sup> The classic study is by E. Ruckstuhl and P. Dschulnigg, Stilkritik und Verfasserfrage im Johannesevangelium: Die johanneischen Stilmerkmale auf dem Hintergrund des Neuen Testaments und des zeitgenössischen hellenistischen Schrifttums, NTOA 17 (Fribourg: Universitätsverlag; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1991).

---

<sup>75</sup> For example, John 5:2–3a + (textually disputed) 5:3b–4 presents special problems linked with questions of the history of transmission and textual history. On the problem, cf. T. Nicklas and T. J. Kraus, "Joh 5,3b–4. Ein längst erledigtes textkritisches Problem?" ASE 17 (2000): 537–556, esp. 552–553. For the linguistic argumentation, cf. A. Duprez, Jésus et les dieux guérisseurs: À propos de Jean, V, CRB 12 (Paris: Gabalda, 1970), 134–135; L. Devillers, "Une piscine peut en cacher une autre. À propos de Jean 5,1–9a," RB 106 (1999): 175–205, esp. 188; and M.-É. Boismard, "Bethazatha ou Siloé?" RB 106 (1999): 206–218, esp. 214.

<sup>76</sup> Porter himself is aware that further work is necessary here in order to achieve greater precision; above all, the attempt should be made to apply this criterion to an extensive body of text, with all the difficulties this would entail. In Criteria, 220–234, he points to linguistic divergences between the eschatological discourse in Mark 13 and the rest of the Gospel of Mark, but he emphasizes that his analysis does not yet go far enough to permit a definitive solution to the question (234).

<sup>77</sup> Some exceedingly dubious criteria (e.g., the "criterion of the more vivid narrative") which are repeatedly applied in secondary literature, either openly or in a concealed manner, have already been sharply criticized by Meier, A Marginal Jew I, 180–183. There is thus no need to review them anew in the present essay.

presented more or less openly in association with the questions posed in tradition criticism. The classic questions of literary and source criticism play a role in every discussion of the quest of the historical Jesus, and it is obvious that the way in which they are answered strongly influences the theses concerning a “re-construction”; besides this, we have seen the potential for investigations on the levels of linguistic analysis, textual criticism, and the history of the text and of its redaction. In many instances, the questions posed by tradition and form criticism play at least a part in these investigations. Of all these proposals, S. E. Porter’s suggested criteria for the quest of the historical Jesus, which form a closed system, are the most clearly detached from the questions of tradition criticism, and this is why they merit particular attention and a debate which can take his suggestions further. Porter is more strongly interested than many other exegetes in the possibility of isolating ipsissima verba of Jesus, rather than concepts and basic ideas. In each of its steps, the system which he applies can be considered a reformulation of already existing criteriologies in order to achieve a greater precision:

First, the classic (and very vague) criterion of the Aramaic language is changed on two levels. Porter avoids the incalculabilities of translation back into Aramaic by looking for ipsissima verba only in those contexts where it is in fact possible that Greek was spoken. In the passages on which he concentrates, he does not presuppose a probable authenticity, but only registers the possibility that ipsissima verba of Jesus may have been preserved here.

Secondly, the criterion of “variation in the Greek text” can be seen as making more precise the criterion of multiple independent attestation, which is ultimately a criterion of source criticism.

Thirdly, the “criterion of discourse features” is suggested as a means of asking more precise redaction-critical questions. This explains the points of contact with “the criterion of embarrassment.”

These refinements are linked to the attempt to lend an objective character to research into the historical Jesus. One implicit presupposition is however problematic, viz. the clearer the logical assumptions of a methodological instrument are, the less it offers possibilities for subjective decisions; and the sharper the methodological shears that are applied, with a greater restrictiveness that accepts no compromises, the more “objective” (and hence intersubjectively comprehensible) will be the results of the historical investigation. As a matter of fact, Porter’s cluster of exact methods allows very few “subjective” decisions on the part of the exegete, although this level can never be excluded completely. At the same time, when the instruments are sharpened, and above all when the scholar concentrates on ipsissima verba of Jesus, the number of results which are intersubjectively comprehensible is reduced. And this brings to us a problem which confronts every investigation of the historical Jesus: a methodology which is extremely precise, and allows scarcely any leeway for subjectivity in its methodological decisions, leaves us with only a few sections in our sources which reflect material that is certainly historical—but these sections per se do not yet bring us to the historical Jesus. Indeed, if taken on their own, they are wholly irrelevant. In the case of the ipsissima verba, this can be seen on two levels:

First, we must bear in mind the multiple differences between (a) a logion on the lips of Jesus which may possibly have been spoken many times in various situations and (b) a logion which was spoken many times in an unknown number of situations in the oral transmission; further, (c) this logion was then written down in sources and gospels, and was (and is still) read and interpreted in very various situations.<sup>78</sup> And this formulation does not even begin to take account of the breaks in transmission through possible changes in the text.

Secondly, even more than longer narrative passages of text, isolated ipsissima verba require the subjective interpretation of the exegete before they can be used in the “construction” of a consistent and workable picture of a historical figure.<sup>79</sup>

What applies to ipsissima verba can in principle be predicated of all the tradition about Jesus which has acquired linguistic form through a

---

<sup>78</sup> On this, cf. the reflections by W. H. Kelber, “Der historische Jesus: Bedenken zur gegenwärtigen Diskussion aus der Perspektive mittelalterlicher, moderner und postmoderner Hermeneutik,” in Der historische Jesus, ed. Schröter and Brucker, 15–66, esp. 54: “In the quest for the historical Jesus, it is widely assumed that the ipsissimum verbum is an incontrovertible fact of linguistic existence. Immense amounts of energy have been spent by scholars in the attempt to reconstruct the original words of Jesus. And yet orality is characterized by a plurality of speech-acts, not by the original logion. It is an undeniable fact of the oral mode of communication that words are repeated and stories told anew, in order to address a variety of hearers.” Cf. also 54–55: “When Jesus uttered an aphorism in one place and then decided to utter it anew in another place, neither he nor his hearers understood this renewed utterance as a secondary version of the primary, original logion. Rather, each utterance was an autonomous speech-act.”

<sup>79</sup> On this problem in the context of research into the so-called agrapha, cf. my essay “Zur Problematik der so genannten ‘Agrapha’: Eine Thesenreihe,” RB 113 (2006): 78–93.

(written) text.<sup>80</sup> “It is only the interpretation of the surviving elements and their integration into a context sketched by the historian... that breathes life into the remnants of past ages.”<sup>81</sup> Without readers and interpreters (and without their interpretation, which is always subjective), they remain “sluggish mechanisms.”<sup>82</sup> In their openness, texts are always exposed (within certain limits of interpretation)<sup>83</sup> to the subjectivity of the interpreter: the attempt to “reconstruct” the historical Jesus can never escape from the dilemma that it must attempt to “construct” a more less plausible or appropriate “picture” of the historical Jesus.<sup>84</sup> We never have more than an indirect access to the past, by rendering it present to ourselves from our contemporary perspective—and many refractions lie along this path. It is impossible to exclude completely the subjectivity of the interpreter, on the level of the choice of sources or on the level of interpretation.<sup>85</sup> And this means that Albert Schweitzer’s discovery that the Leben Jesu of the nineteenth century were closely connected

---

<sup>80</sup> On the problems of the “historical representation” of events by means of narratives—precisely in connection with the quest of the historical Jesus—cf. M. Moxter, “Erzählung und Ereignis: Über den Spielraum historischer Repräsentation,” in Der historische Jesus, ed. Schröter and Brucker, 67–88.

<sup>81</sup> J. Schröter, “Von der Historizität der Evangelien: Ein Beitrag zur gegenwärtigen Diskussion um den historischen Jesus,” in Der historische Jesus, ed. Schröter and Brucker 163–212, esp. 166–167.

<sup>82</sup> On this understanding of text, cf. U. Eco, Lector in Fabula: Die Mitarbeit der Interpretation in erzählenden Texten, 3rd ed. (München: Taschenbuch, 1998), 63–64.

<sup>83</sup> The openness of the texts within “limits of interpretation” which must be defined anew in the case of each individual text precludes the possibility of an “objective” reconstruction of history and makes it therefore advisable to distinguish between “appropriate” and “inappropriate” constructions. The classic introduction of this concept into scholarly discussion is by U. Eco, Die Grenzen der Interpretation (München: Taschenbuch, 1992). For further details, cf. J. Kocka, “Angemessenheitskriterien historischer Argumente,” in Objektivität und Parteilichkeit in der Geschichtswissenschaft, ed. W. J. Mommsen and J. Rüsen (München: Deutscher Taschenbuch-Verlag, 1977), 469–475.

<sup>84</sup> Cf. also Schröter, “Von der Historizität,” 167: “The goal of historical research is... not the reconstruction of the past, but the construction of history.” U. Schnelle, “Historische Anschlußfähigkeit: Zum hermeneutischen Horizont von Geschichts- und Traditionsbildung,” in Kontexte, ed. Frey and Schnelle, 47–78, takes a similar view. Cf. esp. 50: “History is not reconstructed, but inescapably and necessarily constructed.”

<sup>85</sup> Cf. also Schnelle, “Historische Anschlußfähigkeit,” 48–49: “The point in time where the historian or exegete stands is always the present, into which he himself is ineluctably woven. The cultural standards of the present bring a decisive influence to bear upon our understanding of that which (from today’s standpoint) is the past. The socialization of the historian or exegete, his traditions, and the political and religious values to which he subscribes necessarily condition what he says in the present about the past.” On this, cf. the fundamentally important remarks by P. Ricoeur, Zeit und Erzählung, vol. 3, Die erzählte Zeit (München: W. Fink, 1991), 225: “The first way to think of the ‘past-ness’ of the past consists in removing from it the sting of temporal distance.” to the biographies and interests of their authors is not only correct, as a sheer matter of fact:<sup>86</sup> from the perspective of theory of history, the mutual relationship between the subject who constructs the “historical Jesus” and the picture which results from his work is inescapable!<sup>87</sup> This is not merely a matter for regret. For only an “historical Jesus” who is mirrored via the subjective perspective of contemporary human persons, or who can be interpreted from their subjective perspective,<sup>88</sup> can be relevant to people today.<sup>89</sup>

---

<sup>86</sup> A. Schweitzer, Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung, (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2nd ed. 1913; 9th ed., 1984), remains a decisively important work.

<sup>87</sup> This is the conclusion of the essay by G. Theissen, “Jesus und seine historisch-kritischen Erforscher: Über die Möglichkeit der Jesusforschung,” in Jesus als historische Gestalt, 295–308.

<sup>88</sup> Naturally, this does not exclude the possibility of erroneous interpretations!

<sup>89</sup> I allude here (though not exclusively) to the question of the “relevance” of the “historical Jesus” (or of the constructions of the “historical Jesus”) to faith in Jesus of Nazareth. This question is once again the center of vigorous controversy. (Trans. Brian McNeil.)

SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES AND JESUS RESEARCH

BRUCE J. MALINA

1. Introduction

The meanings people share in their interpersonal communication derive from their social systems. This is a universal human phenomenon.<sup>1</sup> If ancient authors communicated meanings to their audiences, the only way to understand what those audiences understood is to understand their social systems. To understand what the ancient sources dealing with Jesus meant, one must obviously have recourse to the social system(s) of that time. Otherwise readings of the sources will necessarily be anachronistic and ethnocentric. Social-science approaches to Jesus research have been developed to avoid those pitfalls.<sup>2</sup> These approaches employ a collection of appropriate generalizations and models from the social sciences to interpret the sources for the study of Jesus of Nazareth. What makes a social-scientific generalization or model appropriate depends upon social-scientific and historical judgment. The social-scientific judgment of appropriateness relates to whether the behaviors in question conform to the social system of the eastern Mediterranean cultural region, with its traditional values (e.g. gender roles, concern for honor) and social structures (e.g. kinship focus, endogamous marriage).<sup>3</sup> The historical judgment of appropriateness relates

---

<sup>1</sup> As basis for such a claim, see David E. Cournoyer and Barris P. Malcolm, "Evaluating Claims for Universals: A Method Analysis Approach," Cross-Cultural Research 38 (2004): 319–342.

<sup>2</sup> See Bruce J. Malina, "Interpretation: Reading, Abduction, Metaphor," in The Bible and the Politics of Exegesis: Essays in Honor of Norman K. Gottwald on His Sixty-Fifth Birthday, ed. David Jobling, Peggy L. Day, and Gerald T. Sheppard (Cleveland: Pilgrim Press, 1991), 253–266; "Social Scientific Criticism and Rhetorical Criticism: Why Won't Romanticism Leave Us Alone," in Rhetoric, Scripture and Theology: Essays from the 1994 Pretoria Conference, ed. Stanley E. Porter and Thomas H. Olbricht, JSNTSup 131 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996), 71–101; "La antropología cultural del mundo mediterráneo y el Nuevo Testamento," in El mundo social de Jesús y los evangelios (Santander: Sal Terrae, 2002), 295–328. Note also the excellent introduction in Elisa Estévez López, El poder de una mujer creyente: Cuerpo, identidad y discipulado en Mc 5,24b–34: Un estudio desde las ciencias sociales, Asociación bíblica española 40 (Estella: Verbo Divino, 2003), 48–71.

<sup>3</sup> On the Mediterranean as a culture area, see Peregrine Horden and Nicholas Purcell, The Corrupting Sea: A Study of Mediterranean History (Oxford: Blackwell, 2000). To

to whether the generalizations and models can be shown to trace back to the first-century eastern Mediterranean. To make such a historical judgment, the historian must remove the filters rooted in the historical developments called Technologism and Scientism, Romanticism (or Postmodernism), the Industrial Revolution, Sense of History, the Enlightenment, the Renaissance and Reformation, the Scientific Method, Scholasticism, Islam, Christendom, Jewishness (rabbinic and Talmudic), Augustine, Constantine, Origen and the like. Each of these historical episodes introduced social features that obfuscate an understanding of the first-century eastern Mediterranean.

The requisite historic awareness of social features that have emerged over the past two millennia indicates that social-scientific approaches to Jesus research are always a form of historical study. However unlike most historians, those using social-scientific approaches explicitly state which generalizations and models they use and why. They explicitly define the terms used in their generalizations and models and then describe the models that undergird the generalizations. In other words, those using social-scientific approaches study the available sources with specific historical questions in mind, with a view to locating the information generated by those questions within some historically and cul-study comparative culture areas, see the Human Relations Area File (begun by George P. Murdock, now on CD) in which every society on the planet is described in terms of its institutions, values and notable behavioral features. The fruit of such a collection has been to understand other people on their own terms through comparative generalizations. The outcome has been the awareness of culture-areas, areas in which various people hold similar cultural values and modes of perception and assessment of life experiences. Murdock, for example, produced a small book called Theories of Illness: A World Survey (Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh, 1980) in which he took 186 societies and compared them in terms of similarities and differences relative to sickening. Thanks to his categorizations, he surfaced the main theories of illness common to various groupings of these various societies. I mention this book because one of Murdock's unexpected conclusions was to discover a theory of illness characteristic of and distinctive to the circum-Mediterranean region, regardless of the particular histories of the distinctive ethnic or national groups: "Trial and error showed, however, that if North Africa were detached from sub-Saharan Africa and the Near East from Asia, and if both were grouped with Europe to form a composite Circum-Mediterranean region, this would yield three regions reasonably comparable not only to one another but also to each American continent and the Insular Pacific. The experimental tabulation of the incidence of the major theories of illness in these ad hoc regions led to a serendipitous discovery: The theories actually showed some tendency toward segregation by region" (42). Illness theories are replications of the interpretive themes of a culture, and common illness theories would point to common interpretive themes. Thus as regards illness perception, the Mediterranean is different, a difference Murdock traces back to antiquity.

---

turally appropriate theoretical framework of concepts and hypotheses to produce intelligibility and interpretations. Most historically oriented biblical scholars concerned proceed in the same way, but in practice there are two main differences. The first is that the historian's conceptualization tends to be implicit, arbitrary, and unsystematic, whereas the social scientist's is explicit and systematic. The second is the historian's tendency, because his sources usually provide him with some sort of loose narrative pattern to which the facts can be related, to evade so far as possible the theoretical issues, and also to deal for [sic] preference less with the underlying structure than with events and personalities, which are usually far more sharply delineated in historical records than in the materials anthropologists and sociologists commonly use.<sup>4</sup>

Social-scientific approaches in Jesus research are directly concerned with history, not social science. Yet as sociologist John Coleman has pointed out, they have made some significant contributions to the social sciences.<sup>5</sup> The use of the social sciences in the historical enterprise of New Testament interpretation is evident by the exegetes' use of explicit, testable and systematic conceptualizations in place of the usual historical approaches typical of traditional historical Jesus research rooted largely in the usually unwary adoption of implicit, arbitrary and unsystematic conceptualizations. Furthermore, and most significantly, social-scientific approaches seek to set out the underlying social structures that provided the meanings articulated in the sources used in historical Jesus research.<sup>6</sup>

For the most part, social-scientific research in New Testament studies has been concerned with interpreting the documents of the New Testament, not with the general story-telling of historians. In other words, its concerns have been exegetical, not historiographical. This is perhaps

---

<sup>4</sup> Geoffrey Barraclough, Main Trends in History (New York: Holmes & Meier, 1978), 50.

<sup>5</sup> John A. Coleman "The Bible and Sociology," Sociology of Religion 60 (1999): 125–148.

<sup>6</sup> See John H. Elliott, What Is Social-Scientific Criticism? GBS (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1993); Bruce J. Malina, "The Social Sciences and Biblical Interpretation," Int 37 (1982): 229–242; "Why Interpret the Bible with the Social Sciences," American Baptist Quarterly 2 (1983):119–133; The New Testament World: Insights from Cultural Anthropology, 3rd rev. ed. (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2001); David May, "Drawn From Nature or Common Life: Social and Cultural Reading Strategies for the Parables," RevExp 94 (1997): 199–214; Jerome H. Neyrey, ed., The Social World of Luke-Acts: Models for Interpretation (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991); John J. Pilch, "Illuminating the World of Jesus with Cultural Anthropology," The Living Light 31 (1994): 20–31; Richard L. Rohrbaugh, ed., The Social Sciences and New Testament Interpretation (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1996).

why there is no “life” of the historical Jesus based on social-scientific interpretations so far.<sup>7</sup> Yet the social-scientific interpretative enterprise has produced works bearing upon a historical understanding of Jesus’ career in such great quantity and of such superb quality that one can speak of social-scientific approaches to Jesus research.<sup>8</sup>

2. What Are the Social Sciences?<sup>9</sup>

That all human beings are entirely the same, entirely different and somewhat the same and somewhat different at the same time is a truism of contemporary western culture. Human beings are entirely the same from the viewpoint of nature, as studied in the natural sciences (physics, chemistry, biology, anatomy). This is the area of the “objective.” Human beings are entirely different from the viewpoint of unique personhood, as discovered by introspection and studied in psychiatry. Since the nineteenth century, this is the area of the “subjective.” Finally human beings are somewhat the same and somewhat different from the viewpoint of distinctive human social groupings and their interpretation of nature.

---

<sup>7</sup> But see William Herzog II, Jesus, Justice and the Reign of God: A Ministry of Liberation (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2000); Halvor Moxnes, “The Historical Jesus: From Master Narrative to Cultural Context,” BTB 29 (1999): 135–149; Putting Jesus in His Place: A Radical Vision of Household and Kingdom (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2003); Ekkehard Stegemann and Wolfgang Stegemann, The Jesus Movement: A Social History of the First Century (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1999).

<sup>8</sup> Consider the work of Rafael Aguirre, Carmen Bernabé, S. Scott Bartchy, Pieter Craffert, Zeba Crook, Richard DeMaris, Adriana Destro, Dennis Duling, John H. Elliott, Philip Esler, Elisa Estevez, Carlos Gil, Santiago Guijarro, Anselm Hagedorn, K. C. Hanson, William Herzog, T. Raymond Hobbs, Stephan Joubert, Stuart Love, Bruce J. Malina, David May, Halvor Moxnes, Dietmar Neufeld, Jerome Neyrey, Douglas Oakman, Mauro Pesce, John Pilch, Ronald Piper, Richard Rohrbaugh, Torrey Seland, Gary Stansell, Wolfgang Stegemann, Christian Strecker, Walter Taylor, Andries van Aarde, Ritva Williams. References to their works can be readily accessed on Ebsco, ATLA, or NTAbstracts CD; a large collection of bibliographical references may be found in Social Scientific Models for Interpreting the Bible: Essays by the Context Group in Honor of Bruce J. Malina, ed. John J. Pilch, BIS 53 (Leiden: Brill, 2001); The Social Setting of Jesus and the Gospels, ed. Wolfgang Stegemann, Bruce J. Malina, and Gerd Theissen (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2002).

<sup>9</sup> For broader understanding of this section, see any introductory college textbook, for example, Craig Calhoun, Donald Light, and Suzanne Keller, Understanding Sociology (New York: Glencoe McGraw-Hill, 2001). For theory, see Jonathan H. Turner and Peter R. Turner, The Structure of Sociological Theory, 6th ed. (Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 1998). For American Society, see Robin M. Williams, American Society, 3rd ed. (New York: Knopf, 1970).

This area is the "social" which is the focal interest of the social sciences. These include sociology, anthropology, social psychology, sociolinguistics and specializations such as political science, economics, communication studies and the like. The social dimension of human beings embraces persons in groups ranging from large societies to small support and/or action groups.

Social scientists study human beings in their interactions with others. What they discover is that human beings perceive aspects of their environment (persons and animate and inanimate non-persons) and interact with their environment in rather regular or patterned ways. It is the patterns of perception and behavior, including thinking and feeling, that enable the articulation of certain rules of a given society. Members of the society know these rules, largely implicitly, and behave according to them. When people adhere to the rules the result is predictable human relations. Ignoring the rules leads to confusion, grievance and judgments of deviance. Generalizations based on observations of such usual patterns of behavior provide a description of the norms of a given society. Norms enable members of a society to understand each other and predict what others will do in certain circumstances. A description of the institutions, values and person types of a given society entails a description of predictable behaviors: the means and goals of modes of acting, perceiving, thinking, feeling and the like. Sociologists as a rule describe the societal patterns or norms of social interaction in their own societies, including normative patterns of evasion. Anthropologists, in contrast, seek to describe such patterns and norms in some alien society. Studies of how individuals relate to groups is the scope of social or cross-cultural psychology. Since both the subject and sources for a life of Jesus derive from an alien society located in the eastern Mediterranean, Mediterranean anthropology would be the social science of choice for the social-science approach. To perform such studies, anthropologists must know their own society so as not to confuse their own social experiences with the foreign institutions, values and person types they study. Without explicit comparison, the anthropologist would interpret the foreign people under study as though they actually belonged to the anthropologist's own society. Such confusion leads to ethnocentric conclusions, and when the confusion deals with history, the outcome is anachronism. Ethnocentrism and anachronism are the two major problems that social-science research seeks to eliminate in Jesus research.

3. Social Sciences and History

Since the subject and sources for a life of Jesus are removed from the modern scholar by some two millennia, the anthropological models and generalizations must be of a historical sort. In other words, to use anthropology to understand the New Testament, the biblical interpreter, like the anthropologist, must be cognizant of his or her own society to avoid ethnocentrism. And to use the social sciences well, a scholar must use a heavy dosage of modern historical research and historical conclusions both when it comes to the history of other times and places and major actors, modes of writing and speaking, narrating etc. This approach might be best called anthropological historiography.<sup>10</sup> Social-science approaches that bypass historical awareness are not appropriate. Examples of inappropriate social sciences include the use of modern sociology of religion and its models of formal religion, modern economics and its models of formal economics, or psychological explanations deriving from the study of individualistic subjects and their conversion experiences.<sup>11</sup>

Since historical study is always rooted in the imagination of the historian, what the social sciences bring as they process the data processed by traditional or modern historians is a greater focus on the scenarios that are conjured up in the minds of investigators. (Such scenarios are also called schemas, frames, scenes, scripts, gestalts, active structural networks, memory organization packets). After filtering out the accretions of social development evidenced both in his or her own society and in the modern Mediterranean, the investigator will find the behaviors and values that have survived in the region through all historical vicissitudes to be quite useful. Among these we might mention, for example, the primacy of kinship and the kin group over all other institutions, primacy of the ingroup, endogamy, patron-client relationship, shame as sanction, concern for honor, agonism, envy and the evil eye, coalitions, physical force in defense of honor, the primacy of honor over wealth, hospitality toward strangers, almsgiving, no separation between church and state, sexual organs as symbolizing honor, altered states of consciousness as normal and common human experiences, gender division of labor, folk healing, limited good, and collectivistic personality.

---

<sup>10</sup> After Pieter Craffert, "Jesus and the Shamanic Complex: Social Type and Historical Figure." Paper read at the Annual Meeting of the Society of Biblical Literature, Orlando, FL, 1998.

<sup>11</sup> See Bruce J. Malina, "Understanding New Testament Persons: A Reader's Guide," in Using the Social Sciences in New Testament Interpretation, ed. Richard L. Rohrbaugh (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1996), 41–61; John J. Pilch, "BTB Readers Guide: Psychological and Psychoanalytical Approaches to Interpreting the Bible in Social-Scientific Context," BTB 27 (1997): 112–116.

The appropriate use of the social sciences in New Testament interpretation involves a set of presuppositions.

4. Social-scientific Presuppositions

Outfitted with the sense of history common to post-Enlightenment education, social-scientific approaches are rooted in four presuppositions: (1) meanings derive from social systems; (2) reading is rooted in what readers bring to the documents they read; (3) after puberty, most human beings can think abstractly at various levels of abstraction; and (4) thinking to a scientific conclusion is circular. The first presupposition comes from the social-scientific study of language in use, a study known as sociolinguistics. The second presupposition comes from experimental psychological studies of reading at a level greater than the sentence. The third presupposition comes from experimental psychological studies of human cognitive development. The final presupposition comes from the philosophy of science dealing with the formation of scientific hypotheses.

4.1. Presupposition One: How Language Works<sup>12</sup>

Jesus research is rooted exclusively in reading and interpreting ancient documents, both written and monumental. The preponderance of these documents are writings produced in the past in order to communicate with persons in that time period. Given the nature of the evidence, historical Jesus research obviously has to provide some adequate explanation of how language works and how reading works in order to validate what exactly is retrieved through reading and how exactly does language function. After all, ancient languages do not live in scrolls or books. Rather the markings on a page stand for or represent wordings that represent meanings that can come alive only through the agency of the minds of readers. This observation is rooted in sociolinguistics.

---

<sup>12</sup> See Michael A. K. Halliday, Language as Social Semiotic: The Social Interpretation of Language and Meaning (Baltimore: University Park Press, 1978) and other studies in sociolinguistics.

Sociolinguistics is concerned with language in use, language as used, language intended to communicate meaning and feeling. In contrast, general linguistics focuses on lexical items (words) and complete thoughts (sentences). Sociolinguistics envisions communication through language as entailing three levels. Concretely (level one) language is scribblings and/or soundings. These scribblings and/or soundings are set out in wordings (level two), that is patterns of lines and/or sounds forming lexical items, sentences, paragraphs and the like. Finally, the scribblings/soundings in wordings express meanings (level three). The meanings expressed (encoded) in wordings expressed (encoded) through scribblings and/or soundings derive from the social system of the speakers and/or writers and audiences/readers. The three tiers are evident even to non-literates who know how to change the way (level two) they say something (wording) and yet say the same thing (meaning). General linguistics and the propositional theory of reading (one gets ideas from reading) focus on the sentence level. Sociolinguistics and the scenario theory of reading (one gets meanings from reading) focus on the textual level. A text here is a meaningful configuration of language (realized through sentences) intended to communicate.

4.2. Presupposition Two: How Reading Works<sup>13</sup>

How does a reader get to understand meanings through the wordings of some writing? While acquaintance with writing systems (orthography) and wording systems (lexico-grammar) affords many interesting data, a social-scientific approach would focus upon the meanings that are imparted in the process of reading. In experimental psychology, the model of reading comprehension that can be validated might be called a scenario model.<sup>14</sup> This model considers the text as a succession of explicit and implicit scenes or schemes in which the mental representation evoked in the mind of the reader consists of a series of settings, episodes, or models deriving directly from the mind of the reader, coupled with appropriate alterations to these settings, episodes, or models as directed by the text. Here the reader must perform two tasks: s/he has to use the text to identify an appropriate “domain of reference,” i.e., call to mind an appropriate scene, scheme, or model suggested by the text, and then s/he must use the identified “domain of reference” as the larger frame within which to situate the meanings proposed in the text as far as this is possible. This model of reading comprehension does have some validation from contemporary experimental psychology.

---

<sup>13</sup> See A. J. Sanford and S. C. Garrod, Understanding Written Language: Explorations of Comprehension beyond the Sentence (New York: John Wiley and Sons, 1981); further references in Bruce J. Malina, "Reading Theory Perspective: Reading Luke-Acts," in The Social World of Luke-Acts: Models for Interpretation, ed. Jerome H. Neyrey (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991), 3–23.

<sup>14</sup> See Sanford and Garrod, Understanding Written Language.

The point is that the meanings derived from reading and from language are rooted in some social system from which the meanings come. Unless one knows the social system of the authors of documents from antiquity, one cannot help but provide scenarios from one’s own society and thus misunderstand the author’s scenarios. Stated another way, a reader cannot understand what is being said by comprehending what an author communicates in terms of one’s own social system. Similarly, if one knows the wordings (lexicography and syntax) of Greek, Latin or Aramaic without knowing the social system of the speakers/writers of those ancient languages, one can only inject meanings from one’s own social system into the Greek, Latin or Aramaic wordings. Hence the fundamental need to learn about and understand the social systems of the authors of the documents that serve as evidence for historical Jesus research. And access to those social systems is provided by anthropological historiography, the workhorse of social-science approaches.

4.3. Presupposition Three: How Abstraction Works<sup>15</sup>

In general, human beings after reaching puberty have the ability, often unused, to think abstractly. Abstract thinking, often called generalization or generalized reasoning, is thinking in terms of ideas or conceptual representations of the essence of things rather than in terms of concrete images. The seemingly concrete word “tree” covers a whole range of rather different objects from deciduous to evergreen and all types falling under each category. Abstraction involves gathering a large number of items and discerning the similarity among them while dismissing the differences. Ideas and concepts are abstract representations of the essences of things; they are the result of the ability to extract and “chunk” together common qualities from a large number of concretely different items, and then to express these chunks in terms of non-concrete signs and symbols. For example, instead of imagining (or talking about) an individual Jonathan apple or Bartlett pear or cooking banana or Freestone peach or Italian plum or navel orange or Hawaiian pineapple, humans can form the idea or concept of fruit. Now what the word "fruit" refers to is an idea of what all items in the previous list have in common, their similarities. And this common or similar element of "fruitness" really has no concrete, physical existence at all. It is really not concrete at all. Obviously, what concretely exists are actual, specific and individually unique apples, pears, bananas, and the like. To conceive of them as apples, pears, and bananas, for example, is a sort of first-level abstraction or chunk. Yet people can go further. They can take such abstractions as fruit, meat, vegetables, bread, and the like and produce a still higher abstraction, in this case "food." Every higher abstraction is a sort of bigger picture. Moreover, along with generating such abstractions, persons who think abstractly also have the ability to make relationships among or between abstractions. One can say, for example, food is necessary for human life. And even beyond this, one can take statements of relationships and put them in sequences called syllogistic reasoning. Abstract thinkers can make deductions from general abstract principles to concrete cases, and inductions from concrete cases to general abstract principles, and abductions to hypotheses in circular reasoning. One can analyze by taking abstractions apart into lower-level abstractions all the way to the concrete level. Conversely, one can synthesize by putting chunks together to ever higher levels of abstraction.

---

<sup>15</sup> See Jaan Valsiner and Kevin J. Connolly, eds., Handbook of Developmental Psychology (London: Sage, 2003).

This point of higher and lower levels of abstraction eludes not a few critics of social-science approaches. As a matter of procedure, if a data set does not fit some generalization, one can always go to a higher level of abstraction to remove disconfirming qualities. For example, consider the following levels of abstraction, from highest to lowest: society  $\Rightarrow$  social institutions  $\Rightarrow$  institutional rewards and sanctions  $\Rightarrow$  shame or guilt or anxiety  $\Rightarrow$  honor and shame  $\Rightarrow$  in the Mediterranean area  $\Rightarrow$  in eastern Mediterranean  $\Rightarrow$  in Syro Palestine  $\Rightarrow$  in Galilee or in Jerusalem  $\Rightarrow$  in a specific village. Each level of abstraction adds or subtracts some feature of the behavior or value in question, just as the abstract level of "tree" is three times removed from the topmost abstract level, with many subsets below.

Why do human beings think abstractly? Biologists ascribe such thinking to the development of the cortex of the brain. Experimental psychologists, however, tell us that the main reason for abstract thinking is that human beings are unable to keep any more than seven (plus or minus two) disparate elements in mental focus at one time.<sup>16</sup> What abstraction enables us to do is to represent and make some order among the countless experiences we undergo in the course of our interacting with our multiple environments. In short, our ability to think abstractly enables us to generate some orderly or patterned understanding of our complex experiences in terms of usually implicit generalizations and models.

Patterns of relationships among abstractions are called models (sometimes theories, or paradigms when they are very high-level abstractions). Models are abstract, simplified representations of more complex real world objects and interactions. Like abstract thought, the purpose of models is to enable and facilitate understanding. Of course such understanding can then be applied to predict and to control outcomes, but understanding comes first. Understanding, then, is the result of the process of abstraction in terms of patterns which order, classify, and give shape to human experiences.

Models are generalizations or abstract descriptions of real world experiences. They are approximate, simple representations of more complex forms, processes, and functions of physical and non-physical phenomena.<sup>17</sup> Now because models are simplifications, they are notorious for misfitting the real world experiences they attempt to represent. To reduce the misfit as much as possible, our cultural tradition—both scientific and humanistic—espouses a validation process presently called “the scientific method.” The scientific method consists of the following steps: (1) postulate a model (or theory or paradigm); (2) test the model against the “real world” experience it relates to; (3) modify the model in terms of the outcome of the test to reduce the misfit by detecting errors of omission or commission. This method is a form of circular reasoning, called abduction. The procedure serves as a safeguard against the twin pitfalls of human understanding: superficiality and inaccuracy.

Models really cannot be proved right or wrong. After all they are postulated, a step basic to abduction (see next presuppositions). They derive from a sort of insight that seems to hold experiences together in such a way as to make sense. Models may be polythetic (instances share many features) or monothetic (instances share all features). Models can only be validated. What validation means is that the generalizations or abstract statements deriving from the model have been checked out according to the steps of the scientific method and have been found adequate, given the experiences or data the model is meant to chunk. In other words, in validation all data readily fit the postulated model, and anyone can check it out. The fact that explicit generalizations and models can be validated is what differentiates social-scientific approaches from other methods used in Jesus research. Other approaches use generalizations and models that remain implicit and unclarified.

---

<sup>16</sup> George A. Miller, “The Magical Number Seven, Plus or Minus Two: Some Limits on Our Capacity for Processing Information,” Psychological Review 63 (1956): 81–97.

<sup>17</sup> On models and their use in the study of the Greco-Roman world, see Thomas F. Carney, The Shape of the Past: Models and Antiquity (Lawrence, KS: Coronado Press, 1975).

4.4. Presupposition Four: How Scientific Thinking Works

On the basis of their observations of repeated behaviors of persons in society, social scientists conclude to a range of generalizations that are typical of a given society or a part of that society. How might one utilize these social-science generalizations with reference to data deriving from ancient documents?

One might begin with some generalization about contemporary Mediterranean societies (e.g., envy and the evil eye, honor and shame, patronage), hone down the generalization to get rid of any accretions that might have surfaced over the past two millennia, then use the generalization as a net to collect data from first-century Mediterranean documents. With the data, one then reasons to a hypothesis and back again to the data and its embedding generalization. Reasoning from some insight used to collect data to an explicit hypothesis and back again to the data set is called abduction. Abduction consists of circular or spiraling or oscillating reasoning. It is a sort of spiraling circular deductive induction and inductive deduction by means of which hypothetical reconstructions are developed. This sort of reasoning was first explained by Charles Sanders Peirce (d. 1914), who called it abduction. Scheff calls abduction a “kind of shuttling back and forth between deductive and inductive methods.”<sup>18</sup> Fann explains: “Peirce wished to show that reasoning towards a hypothesis is of a different kind than reasoning from a hypothesis... (Reasoning towards a hypothesis) has usually been considered either as not reasoning at all, or as a species of induction.

---

<sup>18</sup> Thomas J. Scheff, “Shame and Conformity: The Deference-Emotion System,” American Sociological Review 53 (1988): 402.

Peirce said: 'I don't think the adoption of a hypothesis on probation can properly be called induction; and yet it is reasoning' (8:388).<sup>19</sup> Reilly, in turn, notes: "In opposition to Hume, Peirce emphasizes that our knowledge is not derived from experience alone. In fact 'every item of science came originally from conjecture, which has only been pruned down by experience... The entire matter of our works of solid science consists of conjectures checked by experience.'"<sup>20</sup>

Abduction is reasoning that begins with data collected in terms of some explicit or implicit generalization. The data are then moved toward a hypothesis with the introduction of a new idea. It is reasoning towards a hypothesis; it deals with how a hypothesis is adopted on probation, with reasons for suggesting a hypothesis in the first place. There are reasons for suggesting a hypothesis initially as a plausible type of hypothesis. The verification process makes known the approximation of the suggested hypothesis to the reality it attempts to describe. In turn, the hypothesis may render the observed facts necessary, or at least highly probable. Abduction then entails drawing up a hypothesis for explaining a curious circumstance by supposing it to be a case of a general rule. In the process facts not capable of direct observation are inferred.

Induction "infers the existence of phenomena such as we have observed in cases that are similar" while abduction "supposes something of a different kind from what we have directly observed, and frequently something which it would be impossible for us to observe directly (2.640)... For in induction we generalize from a number of cases of which something is true and infer that the same thing is probably true of a whole class. But in abduction we pass from the observation of certain facts to the supposition of a general principle to account for the facts. Thus induction may be said to be an inference from a sample to a whole, or from particulars to a general law; abduction is an inference from a body of data to an explaining hypothesis, or from effect to cause. The former classifies, the latter explains. Abduction furnishes the reasoner with hypothesis while induction is the method of testing and verifying."<sup>21</sup>

The scientific explanation suggested by abduction has two characteristics that must be pointed out now (along with others that will be dealt with later): 1.) an explanatory hypothesis renders the observed facts necessary or highly probable; 2.) an explanatory hypothesis deals with facts which are different from the facts to be explained, and are frequently not capable of being directly observed.<sup>22</sup>

<sup>19</sup> K. T. Fann, Peirce's Theory of Abduction (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1970), 4.

<sup>20</sup> Francis E. Reilly, Charles Peirce's Theory of Scientific Method, Orestes Brownson Series on Contemporary Thought and Affairs 7 (New York: Fordham University Press, 1970), 31.

<sup>21</sup> Fann, Peirce's Theory, 9–10.

Hypotheses are of three types: factually not observed but observable, factually not observable (history), and factually and theoretically not observable. A hypothesis would be explained by supposing that it was a case of a certain general rule, and thereupon one could adopt that supposition. This sort of inference is called “making a hypothesis.” When we adopt a certain hypothesis, it is not only because it will explain the observed facts but also because the contrary hypothesis would probably lead to results contrary to those observed.<sup>23</sup>

In sum, the four presuppositions behind social-scientific approaches to Jesus research form the underpinning of the truism that without an understanding of the social system in which the sources of Jesus research were produced one simply cannot understand what those sources meant. And it is a presupposition of all academic Jesus research that it is of primary importance to understand what the sources of Jesus research meant in their original cultural and historical contexts. Consequently if other methods of Jesus research do not employ some explicit model of the social system of the people to and for whom early Jesus group writings were intended, they must necessarily supply social system information simply from their own experience. Such information is invariably anachronistic and/or ethnocentric.

5. Some Historical Caveats While Using the Social Sciences in Jesus Research

Social-scientific method applied to historical Jesus research begins with some problem that might arise from claims made about Jesus in some contemporary source (accessible by reading books and articles on US society, for example) or about life in the modern eastern Mediterranean relevant to early Jesus group members (accessible by experience<sup>24</sup> or by reading books and articles on Mediterranean anthropology). Consider

---

<sup>22</sup> Reilly, Charles Peirce's Theory, 35.

<sup>23</sup> See Fann, Peirce's Theory, 10.

<sup>24</sup> For an example of how a Mediterranean scholar's experience might influence interpretation, see Carmen Bernabé, “Of Eunuchs and Predators: Matthew 19:1–12 in a Cultural Context,” BTB 33 (2003): 128–134.

the question of person types.<sup>25</sup> Human beings are born one by one. As individuals, human beings are nurtured and cherished and socialized. About 20% of the individual human beings on the planet have been socialized into patterns of behavior that are individualistic, with focus on the individual's self-reliance and the primacy of self. About 80% of the individual human beings on the planet have been socialized into patterns of behavior that are collectivistic, with focus on the integrity of the individual's group, with the primacy of group concerns over the individual.<sup>26</sup> The individualistic orientation emerged in the seventeenth century AD with cultural values among elites which at that time disrupted the bio-psycho-spiritual unity of human consciousness that had existed until then. The result is a sort of "acquired consciousness," whereby individualists dissociate self and look at self "objectively." Western culture socializes individuals to develop a metasef, a critical observer who monitors and comments on experience. The metasef does not allow the total absorption in the lived experience of the group or lived experience in general. The metasef stands in the way of unreflected, unmediated experience which now becomes distanced.<sup>27</sup> No such individualistic persons existed in the first-century eastern Mediterranean.<sup>28</sup> The same holds for Jesus as well. Psychological investigations into Jesus' self-concept are totally misplaced.<sup>29</sup>

---

<sup>25</sup> See Harry Triandis, "Cross-Cultural Studies in Individualism and Collectivism," in Nebraska Symposium on Motivation 1989, ed. R. Dienstbier (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1987), 41–133; Individualism and Collectivism, New Directions in Social Psychology (San Francisco: Westview, 1995); and the Journal for Cross-Cultural Psychology.

<sup>26</sup> Gert Hofstede, "Empirical Models of Cultural Differences," in Contemporary Issues in Cross-Cultural Psychology, ed. Nico Bleichrodt and Pieter J. D. Drenth (Amsterdam: Lisse; Berwyn, PA: Swets & Zeitlinger, 1991), 17.

<sup>27</sup> See Arthur Kleinman, Rethinking Psychiatry (New York: Free Press; London: Collier Macmillan Publishers, 1970), 50. See also John J. Pilch, "Visions in Revelation and Alternate Consciousness: A Perspective from Cultural Anthropology," Listening 28 (1993): 231–244.

<sup>28</sup> However there were quasi-individualists that included the 2% elites who acted narcissistically and greedily, with a focus on the individual self at the top of a collectivistic hierarchy, and the 10% "throwaway" people who were compelled to live apart from normal, stable collectivistic society; see Richard L. Rohrbaugh, "Ethnocentrism and Historical Questions about Jesus," in The Social Setting of Jesus and the Gospels, ed. Stegemann, Malina, and Theissen, 27–44.

<sup>29</sup> Pilch, "BTB Readers Guide: Psychological and Psychoanalytical Approaches to Interpreting the Bible in Social-Scientific Context," 112–116.

In another direction, consider social institutions. US sociology deals with at least four basic social institutions (and subsets): family, economics, politics and religion. Historians indicate that the separation of church and state (religion and politics) occurred for the first time in the eighteenth century as did the separation of bank/market and state (economics and politics). Anthropologists have frequently noted that peasant societies (presumably first-century Mediterranean societies as well), with their perception of limited good, have substantive economic systems. "Substantive" means that economics is embedded in family (domestic economy) and government (political economy). Likewise, societies not directly influenced by the eighteenth-century Euro-American idea of separation of church and state (e.g. Islamic countries) will have "substantive" religion. This means religion is coterminous with the whole of society embedded both in the family (domestic religion) and the state (political religion). Given that the New Testament antedated the eighteenth century and its separations, the presumption is that in the time of the New Testament there existed domestic religion and political religion as well as domestic economy and political economy but no formal religion or formal economy. Religious and economic concerns were realized through kinship and political norms. To proclaim the kingdom of God (theocracy) or to hail someone as king of Israel is to express political statements. To address one's fellows as "brothers" or "sisters" in Christ is to describe others in kinship terms. Although most contemporary New Testament readers consider those documents to be about religion, the documents originated in social systems where religion was embedded in kinship and/or politics. Hence the documents are about kinship and/or politics in which religion is embedded.<sup>30</sup> For this reason the use of modern sociology of religion based on religion as a formal, free-standing social institution will always produce inaccurate anachronistic and ethnocentric results. Historians are quite aware of these step level changes that have affected western society, yet they still speak endlessly about Jesus as concerned with the religion of Israel.

---

<sup>30</sup> Bruce J. Malina, "Religion in the World of Paul: A Preliminary Sketch," BTB 16 (1986): 92-101.

6. *Jesus Research and Anthropological History:
Some High Level Abstractions*

Historians as a rule tell their stories based on research into sources read from a perspective of “immaculate perception.” They frequently believe that the facts, the evidence, is there for the picking: “just read the sources!” Social-science approaches do not for a moment believe in such “immaculate perception.” Ancient sources rarely mean what we foreigners think they meant. However, since social-science approaches proceed with the Enlightenment passion for accurate chronology typical of historians, they share the historians’ chronological data set and come to the following conclusions about Jesus and his story.

Jesus was socialized and enculturated in a specific social system, at a given time and place. Obviously we know quite certainly that Jesus was socialized and enculturated in a society of the eastern Mediterranean that was totally uninfluenced by globalism, universalism, scientism, the modern city, the industrial revolution, nation state, the Enlightenment, international law, the Renaissance, Arab-European scholasticism, Justinian’s Code, Constantine’s Christendom, the Talmudic Jewishness, Ben Zakkai’s Scribalism, and the like. It is certain that he was socialized and enculturated in the Hellenized Israelite peasant society common to the region at the time. In other words, he was influenced by what we today call Hellenism as assimilated in Israelite peasant village life in that section of the Roman province of Syria called Galilee. Because of his socialization and enculturation, he shared meanings with others in his social group, and these meanings were expressed in language, gesture, artifacts and the like. These all derived from and expressed the social system of Galilee in the first century, where and when Jesus, as a person communicating with others, was enculturated. Jesus always perceived and judged in terms of the social presuppositions that he brought to the events he perceived.<sup>31</sup>

Social systems consist of social institutions, value configurations and modal personalities. Social institutions are fixed forms of phases of social life. Since the separation of church and state, and of market/bank and state, occurred in the eighteenth century, we can safely say that in the world of Jesus there were only two focal or formal social institutions, kinship and politics. The roles, statuses, and values of kinship and politics were used to express and understand economics and religion. The outcome, from our point of view, is a social system with a political institution along with political religion and political economy, as well as a kinship institution along with domestic religion and domestic economy. The historical sources indicate that the political institution was theocratic and was marked by a range of political theocratic parties. Similarly the kinship institution was endogamous and nucleated, existing alongside elective groupings or coalitions that had the structure of fictive kin groups.<sup>32</sup>

---

<sup>31</sup> See K. C. Hanson and Douglas E. Oakman, Palestine in the Time of Jesus: Social Structures and Social Conflicts (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1998), with rather full bibliography and a CD.

Since the individualistic orientation of modern western societies originated with the metasef of the seventeenth century AD, Jesus, like his contemporaries, was enculturated into a collectivistic society, hence his was a collectivistic personality. He was not individualistic. His general concern was with group integrity, not with standing on his own feet and pursuing his own purposes.<sup>33</sup> The group whose integrity Jesus sought to maintain was the typical collectivistic group of a specific family located in a specific village, which in turn was located in a specific region, which in its turn was located in a common people (tribe, common collectivity). He saw his society in terms of a Russian-doll or Chinese-box arrangement of his family (parents, brothers and sisters), his village (initially Nazareth, then Capernaum), his region (Galilee), and his people (the house of Israel). The family he knew was a nucleated endogamous family, although Israel's story shared the ideal of an extended endogamous family.

His was a high-context society.<sup>34</sup> High context societies produce sketchy and impressionistic conversations and documents leaving much to the reader's or hearer's imagination and common knowledge. Since people believed few things had to be spelled out, few things were in fact spelled out. This is so because people had been socialized into widely

---

<sup>32</sup> Santiago Guijarro, "The Family in First-Century Galilee," in Constructing Early Christian Families: Family as Social Reality and Metaphor, ed. Halvor Moxnes (London: Routledge, 1997), 42–65; Fidelidades en conflicto: La ruptura con la familia pro causa del discipulado y de la misión sinóptica (Salamanca: Universidad Pontificia de Salamanca, 1998).

<sup>33</sup> See Rohrbaugh, "Ethnocentrism," 27–44; and on social identity, Henri Tajfel, Differentiation between Social Groups: Studies in the Social Psychology of Intergroup Relations (London: Academic Press, 1978).

<sup>34</sup> On high and low context societies, see Malina, "Reading Theory," 19–20.

and rather invariable shared ways of perceiving and acting. Hence, they quite accurately assumed very much about what their interacting partners brought to a conversation. As high-context documents, the gospels are rather full stories touching upon everything people needed to hear about Jesus for a complete presentation. In contrast, for members of low-context societies and their specialized, detailed, introspective descriptions, the all too brief gospels do not work as well as a three-hundred page biography.

The second significant aspect of social systems is the culture or value set into which social system members were enculturated. We are quite sure of the value orientations and the values that Jesus held in his interaction with others. If we consider the standard value objects found in all societies (self, others, nature, time, space, and the All), we know that Jesus and those he recruited defined self in terms of gender, genealogy or ingroup and geography.<sup>35</sup> We previously noted Jesus' family and regional collectivistic concerns. In terms of gender, his society was patriarchal, with females embedded in related males, and lower status bonded males embedded in higher status males as well. A higher status female was of greater value than any male of lesser rank. The patriline (male and female offspring) had entitlements, not the matriline. On the other hand, the matriline (males and females on the mother's side) related to each other not on the basis of entitlements but on the basis of commitment and loyalty mediated through the mother. Social interactions followed the pathways of honor and shame with challenge and riposte, duly engendered, typical of interaction of outgroup persons.

As far as others were concerned, people and groups were assessed in terms of ingroup and outgroup boundaries, drawn in terms of general group patterns (e.g. family, village, region, ethnic group are always the ingroup poised against other families, village, region, ethnic group). This ingroup/outgroup perception replicated thinking in terms of either/or (both/and does not emerge until the seventeenth century).<sup>36</sup> All groups were ethnocentric, using their ingroup as norm for what is human. Jesus believed that Galilean social norms were proper for his fellow Israelites since Galileans formed his wider ingroup. He was fully cognizant of the wider ingroup known as the house of Israel, but he was enculturated to see the Galilean realization of Israelite norms as normative. Such ethnocentrism was also typical of the authors of the gospels and Paul and their community members. In fact all New Testament documents were ethnocentric, and the “ethnos” in question depended on the ingroup level one considered (e.g. Galilee versus Judea, Israel versus non-Israelites, Hellenistic Israelites versus “barbarian” Israelites, and the like). To find “anti-Semitism” (nineteenth-century coinage for anti-Judaism) in the New Testament is certainly and totally anachronistic and incomprehensible to any first-century person.

---

<sup>35</sup> See Bruce J. Malina and Jerome H. Neyrey, Portraits of Paul: An Archaeology of Ancient Personality (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1996) for how selves were described in the Greco-Roman world.

<sup>36</sup> See Gerd Gigerenzer, Zeno Swijtink, Theodore Porter, Lorraine Daston, John Beaty, and Lorenz Krüger, The Empire of Change: How Probability Changed Science and Everyday Life (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989); Bruce J. Malina, "Three Theses for a More Adequate Reading of the New Testament," in Practical Theology: Perspectives from the Plains, ed. Michael G. Lawler and Gail S. Risch (Omaha, NE: Creighton University Press, 2000), 33–60.

Jesus, like his fellow Galileans, lived subject to nature, with great concern to understand those personal entities that impinged on their lives, whether visible like stars and planets or invisible like spirits, angels and demons. For Jesus, human nature, hence human character, never changed. While people could get their lives in order by living up to the norms of their social groups, their choice to do so depended on their character. Some persons simply were unchangeably deviant (“bad seed”) and had to be avoided. Jesus found that stories of Israel’s past were very useful since in them he found direction for behavior in the present. As those stories indicated, the God of Israel was a living God who did not change his intentions for Israel. What Jesus knew for certain was that he was not in control of his existence and, for the most part, he was not responsible for what was happening to him. Like everyone in his society, from king to beggar, he knew that all goods in life were limited. Like land, there was no way to increase the amount of the good things in life without impinging on another. To impinge on others was deviance, a sin or breach of interpersonal relations. Given his perception of limited good, he was quite aware of envy, which in its Mediterranean configuration was usually characterized by the evil eye, which he also knew.<sup>37</sup>

For Jesus, time was focused on a broad present that included the immediate past (to which there were living witnesses) and the forthcoming future (deriving from present behavior).<sup>38</sup> He was fully aware that any knowledge of the distant past or the distant future was unavailable to human beings. Only the God of Israel knew the past and the future. Of course the God of Israel might reveal that information if necessary to his Israelite prophets, like Moses who describes creation and Samuel who wrote of his own period and of Israel's kings.

---

<sup>37</sup> For a consideration of these values, see Malina, The New Testament World: Insights from Cultural Anthropology. On the evil eye, see John H. Elliott, “The Evil Eye and the Sermon on the Mount: Contours of a Pervasive Belief in Social Scientific Perspective,” BI 2, no. 1 (1994): 51–84.

Jesus shared this peasant world view. His temporal orientation was to the broad present in a way that was pre-clock, pre-monastic, pre-Newtonian, pre-Enlightenment, pre-Industrial Revolution and pre-Einsteinian. To be on time meant to be some place before the most honorable person arrived. The most honorable person can never be late (similarly there could never be a delay of the Parousia). Like other first-century Mediterranean people, Jesus too knew that society, and nature with it, was running down, in a process of devolution as we would say (an analogy deriving from animate beings).<sup>39</sup>

Jesus interpreted space in terms of the geographical territoriality norms of his day. All the land was marked off and controlled by persons with force to back up their claims. Mountain tops offered closer proximity to the deity. Jesus' society was ruralized, consisting of social givers (the majority of the population) and takers (the elites). The central places (Greek: polis, Hebrew: ir, translated city) served as part time residences for elite landowners whose wealth in produce and raw materials derived from land holdings. These elites had second homes in cities, where they produced power to control the surround of the city and beyond. Elites saw little clear division between town and country, since elites had their primary residence in the country. But Jesus, like his fellow non-elites, had little interest and concern for cities. City elites maintained their city staffs through taxation which was never expended on behalf of taxpayers. While Jesus experienced geographical territoriality, he also knew about celestial territoriality, with celestial entities having significant impact on the lands over which they were to be found.<sup>40</sup>

---

<sup>38</sup> Concerning time, see Bruce J. Malina, "Christ and Time: Swiss or Mediterranean," CBQ 51 (1989): 1–31, reprinted in The Social World of Jesus and the Gospels (London: Routledge, 1996), 179–214.

<sup>39</sup> See John J. Pilch, "A Window into the Biblical World: A New Sky and a New Earth," The Bible Today 41.1 (2003): 49–53.

<sup>40</sup> Concerning territoriality, see Bruce J. Malina, "Apocalyptic and Territoriality," in Early Christianity in Context: Monuments and Documents: Essays in Honour of Emmanuel Testa, ed. Frederic Manns and Eugenio Alliata (Jerusalem: Franciscan Printing Press, 1993), 369–380.

This limited general overview provides some insight into the type of collectivist person Jesus was. The sources tell us that Jesus recruited a faction to assist him in his task of proclaiming a forthcoming theocracy to Israel. What it meant to join a Jesus group can be understood in terms of a model of social identity. Jesus along with his faction members performed this task in a ruralized society characterized by force, cruelty and extortion on the part of elites toward non-elites. In order to avoid falling victim to the full impact of such elite power, persons had to find duly placed patrons. Distinctively, Jesus sought the patronage of the God of Israel, whom he called “Father” or “Patron.”<sup>41</sup>

7. Jesus Research and Anthropological History: Some Lower Level Abstractions

7.1. Jesus Certainly Proclaimed Theocracy

All historically oriented biblical critics agree that, if Jesus did anything, he proclaimed the kingdom of Heaven (or the Sky), a politically correct Israelite way of saying kingdom of God.<sup>42</sup> The phrase “kingdom of Heaven/God” fell under the category of politics, specifically political religion. In more abstract language, the proclaimed kingdom of Heaven was a form of theocracy. The repentance required for participation in the forthcoming kingdom consisted in persons’ getting their lives in order for living in the new political order.

What would such a theocracy be like? Perhaps the best analogy is that of the well-known contemporary theocratic state of Iran. The theocratic state is rooted in the will of God, expressed in God’s revelation as interpreted by Islamic tradition (the umma or people) and more specifically by those learned in the sacred writings. Whatever their specific names, over five thousand years of Middle Eastern history, these persons were/

---

<sup>41</sup> See Bruce J. Malina, “Establishment Violence in the New Testament World,” Scripture 51 (1994): 51–78; Torrey Seland, Establishment Violence in Philo and Luke: A Study of Non-conformity to the Torah and Jewish Vigilante Reactions, BIS 15 (Leiden: Brill, 1995); on patron-clientelism, see Bruce J. Malina, “Patron and Client: The Analogy Behind Synoptic Theology,” Forum 4 (1988): 2–32; John H. Elliott, “Patronage and Clientage,” in Social Science and New Testament, ed. Rohrbaugh, 144–156.

<sup>42</sup> See Bruce J. Malina, The Social Gospel of Jesus: The Kingdom of God in Mediterranean Perspective (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2001).

are “scribes.” These scribes were arranged in hierarchy, with higher level personages having greater “interpretative” authority, hence power backed by God himself. Israel’s Messiah, like the Mahdi of Islam, leads the fight to establish the theocracy, but then backs off in favor of the “scribes.”

7.2. Jesus Was an Israelite Holy Man: A Certainty (First Title of Jesus in the Synoptic Story)

Jesus was an Israelite holy man.<sup>43</sup> Like holy men in the past and present, Jesus had direct contact or communication with the realm of God; control of or power over the spirits; ongoing altered states of consciousness experiences through which he had contact with the realm of God. Like holy men the world over, his activities had a “this worldly” focus on the material world, to help people in distress. He could take sky journeys and travel through the spirit world and the realm of God, although the sources only mention the sky journey at his final appearance to his faction members. As a holy man, in his encounter with spirits, he interacted with them without fear of them possessing him. And typically, healing is a major focus of his activity. Jesus’ own altered state of consciousness experiences made it easy for his core group and his fellow Galileans to consider him a holy man and prophet. He became aware of his role in an altered states of consciousness experience related to the time of his baptism by John. Altered states of consciousness are common to eighty to ninety percent of contemporary human beings (filtered out as non-rational in the West). Hence it is not surprising that the helpers recruited by Jesus were likewise capable of having altered states of consciousness experiences: they saw Jesus walking on the sea, transfigured and raised from the dead. All such visions are a type of altered states of consciousness experience, mentioned along with others by Paul and throughout the story of the Acts of the Apostles.

Jesus coupled his holy man role with that of prophet, like the prophetic holy men of Israelite traditions (Elijah, Elisha). He proclaimed the forthcoming kingdom of God. In this he followed his tutor, John the Baptist, who performed a similar prophetic role.

---

<sup>43</sup> On this topic, see Pieter Craffert, “Jesus and the Shamanic Complex: Social Type and Historical Figure”; John J. Pilch, “Altered States of Consciousness in the Synoptics,” in Social Setting of Jesus and the Gospels, ed. Stegemann, Malina, and Theissen, 103–116; Bruce J. Malina and Richard L. Rohrbaugh, Social Science Commentary on the Synoptic Gospels, 2nd ed. (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2003), 369.

7.3. Jesus Certainly Formed a Political Faction

All sources agree that, after Jesus' career was over, a group survived that was previously rather closely connected to Jesus. Since such a group did in fact exist, it was previously formed by Jesus within the framework of Jesus' own concern. We know that Jesus' concern was with a forthcoming Israelite theocracy, hence the group formed by Jesus consisted of a set of persons who witnessed to and participated in Jesus' program. Since a program focused on theocracy was a political religious one, within a political institution, a group formed to support someone's program is called a faction. It is beyond doubt that Jesus formed a Galilean faction with a view to communicating information about a forthcoming Israelite theocracy. The sources attest to the political aspirations of Jesus' core group. Factions by definition are coalitions, that is, groups formed by a central person for a specific purpose and for a specific time.<sup>44</sup>

7.4. Jesus Was Concerned with Israel Alone

The forthcoming theocracy that Jesus and his faction proclaimed looked to the house of Israel alone.<sup>45</sup> As Israelite holy man, Jesus healed non-Israelites, but as Israelite prophet, the theocracy he proclaimed had nothing to do with non-Israelites at all. Jesus' ingroup concerns would preclude concern with outgroup non-Israelites. The God of Israel, Jesus' Patron, had a covenant with the people of Israel alone. Theocracy rooted in the record of the God of Israel's dealings with his people would only be concerned with the house of Israel. Further, only Israel and Israelite tradition have the social role of Messiah. And only Israel's tradition had a celestial or astral figure known as the "son of man" who was to be the harbinger of the theocracy.

7.5. Jesus Certainly Spoke Only of the God of Israel

In his concern for theocracy in Israel, Jesus proclaimed this theocracy in the name of the God of Israel, the God confessed in the Shema "The Lord our God."<sup>46</sup> The deity to whom Jesus referred and to whom

---

<sup>44</sup> See Malina, "Patron and Client"; Malina and Rohrbaugh, Social Science Commentary on the Synoptics, 342–343; Dennis Duling, "Egalitarian Ideology, Leadership, and Factional Conflict in the Gospel of Matthew," BTB 27 (1997): 124–137.

<sup>45</sup> See Malina, "Three Theses."

<sup>46</sup> See Bruce J. Malina, "Is There a Circum-Mediterranean Person: Looking for Stereotypes," BTB 22 (1992): 66–87.

he related was always “the God of Israel” (Matt 15:31; Mark 12:29; Luke 1:68; an ancestral God: Matt 22:32; Mark 12:26; Luke 20:37; Acts 3:13; 7:32; Matt 8:11 and compare Luke 13:29). The synoptics report that the theocracy Jesus proclaimed refers to the rule of Israel’s God over Israel. In spite of the best intentions and intuitions of many modern theological commentators, I believe it is fair to say that there really is no evidence of universalism of any sort in antiquity. The deities of various peoples were the traditional gods of the groups, even if Hellenistic theology began to see equivalences among the many deities of the Roman oikoumene. But such equivalences would be apparent only to persons in contact with outsiders and living among them. This was not Jesus’ experience, to the best of our knowledge. Just as stars had impact only on the lands over which they were to be found, so too the deities resident in the sky (and often visiting in their temples on the land directly below) had impact only on the lands below their celestial residence.<sup>47</sup>

7.6. Jesus Necessarily Spoke of Political Religion and Political Economy

Since the Bible is a book of the Christian church today, the presumption is that it deals with religion in the way that modern formal institutional religion does. However even the separation of pope and state during the Reformation did not produce a formal religion. With Constantine, the Jesus groups and their ideology became part of the political religion of the empire. It was no different for Jesus in Galilee.<sup>48</sup> If Jesus proclaimed theocracy, which is certain, his proclamation was a political religious one with political economic dimensions.<sup>49</sup> The reason for this is that during Jesus’ day, religion and economics were embedded in politics and necessarily included in it. Since Jesus proclaimed a forthcoming theocracy that would transform God’s people, Israel, such a theocracy would entail “proper” approaches to God as well as “proper” provisioning of Israelite society. The details of what this entailed are not spelled out since the proclamation was high context in nature.

<sup>47</sup> See Malina, “Apocalyptic and Territoriality”; “Jesus as Astral Prophet,” BTB 27 (1997): 83–98.

<sup>48</sup> See Malina, The Social Gospel of Jesus; Hanson and Oakman, Palestine; Herzog, Jesus, Justice, and the Reign of God; Moxnes, Putting Jesus in His place.

<sup>49</sup> See Douglas E. Oakman, Jesus and the Economic Questions of His Day, Studies in the Bible and Early Christianity 8 (Lewiston, NY: Mellen, 1986); “The Lord’s Prayer in Social Perspective,” in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. Bruce Chilton and Craig A. Evans, NTTS 28.1 (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1999), 137–186.

7.7. Jesus' Career as Faction Founder: From Forming to Adjourning

The life of Jesus, like the life of other human beings, had a beginning, a middle and an end. However Jesus is best remembered for the year or so (one dry season, one rainy season and one dry season) of his career that preceded his death. This phase of his life is often called his “public ministry,” a church term for his public career. Since he had such a career, he must have been born and developed before launching on that career as an adult. And since in antiquity all infancy descriptions derive from the time after a person’s career is complete, such infancy accounts might readily be attached to a life of Jesus—with the same verisimilitude as other ancient, unwitnessed infancy stories.<sup>50</sup>

The ancient introduction to a bios (life) in this period consisted of mention of ancestry (antecedents), birth and paideia (education or formation). While these three features are duly highlighted in Matthew and Luke with their genealogies, infancy stories and description of Jesus’ testing as Son of God, Mark offers instead an introduction to the bios of Jesus as holy man and prophet, that is, as a Son of God. Mark presents Jesus’ ancestry based on John the prophet and the citation from Isaiah, his birth as holy man with an inaugural vision, and the formation of a holy man with a wilderness testing.<sup>51</sup> One of the sources claims Jesus was a first-born son (Luke 2:7) who was about 30 when he launched his public career (Luke 3:23). And all of the sources make no mention of his having been married. One can raise the question about why Jesus did not marry. The sources attest to Jesus’ having a number of brothers and sisters (Matt 13:55; Mark 6:3; 1 Cor 9:5). What sort of culturally based explanation is available for the non-marriage of a first born son of a family of at least six other children? The oldest son was surrogate father and was responsible for the support of the other children in the family. Today among Palestinians, it would not be odd for males to put off marriage even to their thirties to help with the family. Palestinian males frequently marry at 30+ with females in their late teens.

Be that as it may, we can presume from this information (ancient and modern) that Jesus began his career of promulgating the kingdom of Heaven/Sky/God after he worked for his family to see to the support of his other siblings. The sources trace back Jesus' career as holy man and prophet to an altered state of consciousness experience that occurred at the time of John the Baptist (time in the ancient world was noted by famous personages; for example Jesus died under Pontius Pilate—a date, not an accusation). For what happened subsequently, it is not difficult to produce a rather general description of the career of Jesus from the simple fact that Jesus recruited a faction. This model of a “public life” of Jesus consists of an outline of the chronology of Jesus' activity based on the stages of the social movement organization he founded. This outline does not require any of the time sequences in the synoptics or John. On the other hand, given its higher level of abstraction, it does serve as a factual framework of Jesus' career. Data presented in the sources can then be attached to various dimensions of this outline and thus flesh out a highly probable “public” life of Jesus with the proposed schema (perhaps not unlike the geographical procedure of Mark running from Galilee to Judea).

---

<sup>50</sup> See Thomas Wiedemann, Adults and Children in the Roman Empire (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1989).

<sup>51</sup> Noted by Santiago Guijarro, “Why Does the Gospel of Mark Begin as It Does?” BTB 33 (2003): 28–38.

The reason for this assertion is that at a high level of abstraction, group formation and group development are quite rigidly structured (as rigidly structured as the human skeleton). And the structures have been verified in a wide range of cross-cultural situations so as to be rather self-evident truisms. Some historians will claim that the structures are so abstract as to be historically worthless. Yet such a contention simply denies what historians inevitably do: begin with an abstract pattern of structures, gather data to fit those patterns, then tell a story that unfolds the patterns in terms of the data. It is worth remembering that there is no “immaculate perception.” At least with these structures, which human groups inevitably follow, we have skeletal certitude (the same certitude European scholars used to identify the Alpine “Ice Man” as human!).

7.8. Jesus Formed A Group

The story of Jesus' career actually begins with his recruiting a small group for his own purposes of proclaiming a forthcoming theocracy.<sup>52</sup> This small group constituted to assist him is a faction. Jesus had a project in mind based on his solution to some problem. Small group formation is always rooted in the solution to some problem. Jesus became aware of a need for change and shared this awareness with others. They then mutually nurtured a hope of success in implementing the change in question. And they joined Jesus because they lived in a societal context in which group formation was expected. Jesus did indeed proclaim a kingdom and looked upon God as Patron. He proclaimed a political, political-religious and political-economic theocracy to his fellow Galilean Israelites. He was aware of a solution to Israel's political problems and was in process of sharing that solution with others. That Jesus offered such a solution likewise indicates that Israel had political problems that some believed required solution.

---

<sup>52</sup> See Bruce J. Malina, “Early Christian Groups: Using Small Group Formation Theory to Explain Christian Organizations,” in Modelling Early Christianity: Social-Scientific Studies of the New Testament in Its Context, ed. Philip F. Esler (London: Routledge, 1995), 96–113.

Those who heard Jesus' solution would compare that solution with other available solutions. Those who found the solution feasible would adopt it and act to implement it, while telling others about it. It was at this point that people became amenable to forming a small group around Jesus. Those who rejected Jesus' solution to the problems facing the house of Israel simply dismissed Jesus' proclamation. In brief, the features of a small group formation may be summed up as: aware—share—compare—declare. Here Jesus is prophet as problem solver.

Group development entails changes in the group as a whole over time as well as changes in the relationship between the group and each of its members. The development of the originating Jesus group marked the unfolding of Jesus' activity over time—a life of Jesus. As previously noted, the cross-cultural study of small groups has produced the following model of the stages that small groups trace over time, with verifiably predictable behavior at each stage. The stages are: forming, storming, norming, performing and adjourning.<sup>53</sup> First, forming.

The forming stage was the period when Jesus put his core group together. He formed his faction to accomplish a task directed to Israel at large. This extra group orientation differentiated the original Jesus group from the Jesus group gatherings that followed since those gatherings were formed for intragroup social support. Jesus recruited his faction to perform an extra group task. The task activity of this group is articulated variously in the sources. There is reference to “fishers of men” (Mark 1:17; Matt 4:19; Q 10:2 remembers it as a “harvest”; as does John 4:35; Rom 1:13). The so-called “mission” charge recalls Jesus as expanding his vague project: to proclaim God’s taking over the country soon, to urge Israelites to get their affairs in order to this end, and to heal those in need of healing.<sup>54</sup> Mark implies that group members were chosen with healing ability in tow (Mark 3:15 and 6:7 mention only that Jesus gave the Twelve authority over unclean spirits; yet when they return we are told that “they anointed with oil many that were sick and healed them” 6:13). Matt 10:6 and Luke 9:1 (10:9 is unclear on this score), on the other hand, state that Jesus bestowed the healing ability characteristic of holy men on his recruits. During the forming stage, group members discussed the nature of their task and how it might be performed. The behavior of group members toward each other apart from the brothers in the group, was tentative; commitment to the group was low. The sources (Mark) tell of Jesus’ impatience with his followers because of this tentative commitment (“little faith”).

---

<sup>53</sup> This sequence is based on the cross-cultural model developed by Bruce W. Tuckman, "Developmental Sequence in Small Groups," Psychological Bulletin 63 (1965): 384–399; Bruce W. Tuckman and M. A. C. Jansen, "Stages of Small-Group Development Revisited," Group and Organization Studies 2 (1977): 419–427. Tuckman's work was further corroborated by Richard L. Moreland and John M. Levine, "Group Dynamics Over Time: Development and Socialization in Small Groups," in The Social Psychology of Time: New Perspectives (Newbury Park, CA: Sage, 1988), 151–181.

7.9. Storming in the Jesus Group

The sources tell of Jesus’ disciples eventually jockeying for position and easing into assured interpersonal locations. Consider the dispute about who is greatest (Mark 9:33–37; Matthew 18:1–5; Luke 9:46–48); a general argument about precedence (Mark 10:41–44; Matt 20:24–27; Luke 22:24–27); concern for sitting next to Jesus in the kingdom (Matt 20:20–23—mother; Mark 10:35–40; not in L); and the general concern about rewards (Mark 10:28–31; Matt 19:27–30; Luke 18:28–30—appropriated). Peter’s rebuking Jesus after talk about suffering and death is an attempt to persuade Jesus to change goals to fit what the group is concerned about (Mark 8:32–33; Matt 16:22–23; not in L). These episodes witness to the storming phase of Jesus’ group development. Conflict among the disciples emerged, with emotions getting free expression.<sup>55</sup> They became more assertive, and each of them tried to change the group's purposes to satisfy his own "personal" needs. Resentment and hostilities erupted among disciples with differing needs. Each of them attempted to persuade the others to adopt group goals that will fulfill their needs. The behavior of group members toward one another became assertive, while their commitment to the group was higher than it was before. Jesus had to deal with the storming postures of his disciples to keep their allegiance and to have them continue with his project. His responses to ingroup conflict looked to how he managed this phase of his group's development.

---

<sup>54</sup> The anthropology of healing applied to the New Testament has been well developed by John J. Pilch, Healing in the New Testament: Insights from Medical and Mediterranean Anthropology (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2000); see also the significant contribution by Estévez López, El poder de una mujer creyente.

7.10. Norming in the Jesus Group

Early on in the story told by Mark and followed by Matthew and Luke, we find evidence of intergroup conflict resolution in favor of mutually agreed upon patterns of behavior. The task norms for Jesus' core group are listed in the so-called "mission" discourse (Matt 10:5–16 and expanded with vv. 17–25; Mark 6:7–11; see 3:13–15; Luke 9:1–5). These norms point to the norming phase of group development. Jesus set out his ideas for how his disciples should carry out their agreed upon task that would forward Jesus' project. His disciples presumably offered their input concerning the implementation of the task in question (proclaiming, healing, exorcizing, lodging etc.) and the desired level of performance. Norming had Jesus involve his group members in the attempt to resolve earlier conflicts, often by negotiating clearer guidelines for group behavior.

7.11. Performing in the Jesus Group

With the performing stage, Jesus' disciples carried out the program for which they were recruited. This was the problem-solving stage of task activity groups. With Jesus, the disciples solved their performance problems and worked together productively. From the evidence provided in the sources, it is clear that the Jesus faction moved into a performing stage (return from successful task performance: Mark 6:12–13; Luke 9:6; no report in Matthew). The sending of the seventy (-two) and their success (Luke 10:1–20) points to enlarged activity. This implies further recruitment or forming, with subsequent storming and norming to lead to greater performing.

---

<sup>55</sup> See Bruce J. Malina, "Mark 7: A Conflict Approach," Forum 4 (1988): 3–30; Bruce J. Malina and Jerome H. Neyrey, "Conflict in Luke-Acts: A Labelling-Deviance Model," in The Social World of Luke-Acts, ed. Neyrey, 97–122.

By all accounts, the level of performance that Jesus expected of his disciples consisted of proclamation of the kingdom along with healing/exorcism. Obviously the healing that Jesus as well as his disciples carried out took place in a context of political religion. As we know from contemporary experience, such healing threatened those in authority.<sup>56</sup> The purpose of healing was to restore the ill person to his/her station in society. Jesus as well as his disciples healed in the fashion of Israelite folk healers and holy men.<sup>57</sup> The sources describe both Jesus and his disciples readily entering into altered states of consciousness.<sup>58</sup>

At one point in his career, the sources tell us that Jesus went to Jerusalem with his disciples on a Passover pilgrimage. In the city, it was his healing activity that called Jesus to the attention of the Jerusalem authorities (“by what authority do you do these things”).<sup>59</sup> This led eventually to the groups adjourning.

7.12. The Jesus Group Adjourns

The event that precipitated the adjourning of the Jesus group was Jesus’ crucifixion. Crucifixion, like any public execution, was a status degradation ritual.<sup>60</sup> All the typical features of the status degradation ritual are to be found in all the gospel accounts, and even if they were not, they might be easily reconstructed, although at an abstract level. The specific features of a high-context report can be easily described.<sup>61</sup> The motive for Jesus’ being put to death was reported as “envy,” a culturally specific

<sup>56</sup> On the significance of healing in political religion, see Paul W. Hollenbach, “Jesus, Demoniacs, and Public Authorities: A Socio-Historical Study,” JAAR 49 (1982): 567–588.

<sup>57</sup> See John J. Pilch, “Insights and Models from Medical Anthropology for Understanding the Healing Activity of the Historical Jesus,” Hervormde Teologische Studies 21 (1995): 314–337; and his Healing in the New Testament.

<sup>58</sup> See Pilch, “Altered States of Consciousness in the Synoptics,” in Social Setting of Jesus and the Gospels, ed. Stegemann, Malina, and Theissen, 103–116; see the models in Pilch’s latest book, Visions and Healing in the Acts of the Apostles: How the Early Believers Experienced God (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 2004).

<sup>59</sup> See Hollenbach, “Jesus, Demoniacs and Public Authorities.”

<sup>60</sup> Bruce J. Malina and Jerome H. Neyrey, Calling Jesus Names: The Social Value of Labels in Matthew (Sonoma, CA: Polebridge Press, 1988), 69–92.

<sup>61</sup> Jerome H. Neyrey, “Despising the Shame of the Cross: Honor and Shame in the Johannine Passion Narrative,” Semeia 68 (1996): 113–137; John J. Pilch, “Death With Honor: The Mediterranean Style Death of Jesus in Mark,” BTB 25 (1995): 65–70.

motive that perfectly fits the general Mediterranean culture area, the perception of limited good, and concern for honor.<sup>62</sup> It seems to be certainly the motive of the collectivistic persons who had Jesus put to death. Furthermore, the death of Jesus is understood in cultural terms as a year-long process during which the cadaver rots in a tomb and atones for deeds that shamed God. At the end of the year, the bones are collected and reburied. The story of Jesus' empty tomb means the year-long process was interrupted in his case, and this by the God of Israel. That would mean he did not go through any atoning process.

7.13. The Resurrected Jesus Group Forms

In the sources, the performing phase of Jesus and his recruits came to a rather abrupt end, marked by the crucifixion of Jesus. As regards Jesus' core group, the post-crucifixion stories liberally attest to preparations for adjourning, quashed by the experience of the appearance of the Risen Jesus (altered state of consciousness experiences).<sup>63</sup> With this experience, a feedback loop enters the process with new storming, norming and subsequent performing, as described telescopically in the final sections of Matthew and Luke, but at length in the opening of Acts.<sup>64</sup> The trigger event for this loopback was the core group's experience of the appearance of Jesus after his death, an experience understood as the work of the God of Israel, now described as "He who raised Jesus from the dead" (Acts 3:15; Rom 8:11). The God of Israel thus indicated Jesus was Israel's forthcoming Messiah, to usher in the forthcoming kingdom of Heaven. The new storming among the remaining Jesus group members led to what might be called a Jesus Messiah group, still faithful to Jesus' original project of proclaiming the forthcoming kingdom of heaven, but this time with greater urgency. (The development running from the political religion of the Jesus Messiah group [second generation] to the kinship religion of messianic Jesus groups [third and fourth generation] permeates the sources as they describe the story of Jesus in terms of their experiences and evoke words of Jesus for their newly discovered way of life "in Christ.")

<sup>62</sup> See Anselm C. Hagedorn and Jerome H. Neyrey, "'It Was Out of Envy That They Handed Jesus Over' (Mark 15.10): The Anatomy of Envy and the Gospel of Mark," JSNT 69 (1998): 15–56.

<sup>63</sup> See John J. Pilch, "Appearances of the Risen Jesus in Cultural Context: Experiences of Alternate Reality," BTB 28 (1998): 52–60; Bruce J. Malina and Richard L. Rohrbaugh, Social-Science Commentary on the Gospel of John (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1998).

<sup>64</sup> There is no evidence for Jesus' or the subsequent messianic Jesus groups' espousing egalitarianism; see John H. Elliott, "Jesus Was Not An Egalitarian: A Critique of an Anachronistic and Idealistic Theory," BTB 32 (2002): 75–91; for the community of Matthew, see the series of articles by Dennis Duling, "Matthew and Marginality," Hervormde Teologiese Studies 51 (1995): 1–30; "The Matthean Brotherhood and Marginal Scribal Leadership," in Modelling, ed. Esler, 159–182; "Egalitarian Ideology, Leadership, and Factional Conflict in the Gospel of Matthew," BTB 27 (1997): 124–137; "Matthew 18:15–17: Conflict, Confrontation, and Conflict Resolution in a 'Fictive Kin' Association," BTB 29 (1999): 4–22; for Acts see Pilch, Visions and Healings in Acts; F. Scott Spencer, Journeying through Acts: A Literary-Cultural Reading (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2004).

7.14. Conclusions

In sum, we possess quite a bit of general information about Jesus, his collectivistic personality and social concerns from his cultural setting alone. Coupled with further historic information, we know with certainty that Jesus proclaimed theocracy, formed a political faction, was concerned with Israel alone and spoke only of the God of Israel in typical ethnocentric fashion, and thus necessarily dealt with political religion and political economy in Israel. We can with certainty sketch his career in terms of the stages of small group development, from formation to adjournment. We can likewise use social psychology to draw a sketch of the collectivistic modal personality of the time and place, altered state of consciousness experiences and concerns for group integrity. All of this information is useful for assessing the traditions about Jesus presented in the gospels, canonical and otherwise. While it may be too abstract and non-psychological to form an adequate modern biography of Jesus, it surely provides a set of boundaries that will warn us when some historians' Jesus research is erroneous because anachronistic and/or ethnocentric.

NEW LITERARY CRITICISM AND JESUS RESEARCH

ELIZABETH STRUTHERS MALBON

Since the term “literary criticism” was once applied to what is now known as “source criticism,” the term “new literary criticism” is generally employed to classify those varied approaches to biblical materials that, since the last third of the twentieth century, and especially but not solely in the United States, focus on their literary aspects. These approaches range from narrative criticism, with its concern for the elements of story (plot, characters, setting, rhetoric, etc.); to reader-response criticism, with its interest in the reader or audience, whether implied within the literary work or existing outside it and thus actualizing it; to deconstruction, with its post-structuralist philosophical challenge to unexamined presuppositions of all sorts. After a sketch of some roots of new literary criticism in New Testament studies, this essay will briefly characterize two of its strongest branches—narrative criticism and reader-response criticism<sup>1</sup>—before considering directly the impact of new literary criticism in the field of Jesus research. The essay will close with the posing of several questions for discussion between these two well-developed and not yet well-connected areas of the study of the New Testament and Christian origins: new literary criticism and Jesus research.

---

<sup>1</sup> For other overviews of or introductions to the “new literary criticism” in New Testament studies, see Edgar V. McKnight, The Bible and the Reader: An Introduction to Literary Criticism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); Mark Allan Powell, What Is Narrative Criticism? GBS (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1990); Amos N. Wilder, The Bible and the Literary Critic (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1991); Janice Capel Anderson and Stephen D. Moore, eds., Mark and Method: New Approaches in Biblical Studies, 2nd ed. (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2008); Edgar V. McKnight, “Literary Criticism,” in Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels, ed. Joel B. Green and Scot McKnight (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1992), 473–481; Stephen R. Haynes and Steven L. McKenzie, eds., To Each Its Own Meaning: An Introduction to Biblical Criticisms and Their Application (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1993); Elizabeth Struthers Malbon and Janice Capel Anderson, “Literary-Critical Methods,” in Searching the Scriptures, vol. 1, A Feminist Introduction, ed. Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza (New York: Crossroad, 1993), 241–254; John R. Donahue, “The Literary Turn and New Testament Theology: Detour or New Direction?” JR 76 (1996): 250–275. For overviews and critiques, see Lynn M. Poland, Literary Criticism and Biblical Hermeneutics: A Critique of Formalist Approaches, AARAS 48 (Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1985); Stephen D. Moore, Literary Criticism and the Gospels: The Theoretical Challenge (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1989). On deconstruction, not discussed in this essay, see Elizabeth A. Castelli, Stephen D. Moore, Gary A. Phillips, and Regina M. Schwartz, eds., The Postmodern Bible: The Bible and Culture Collective (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1995); Moore, Literary Criticism and the Gospels, 131–170; Stephen D. Moore, Mark and Luke in Poststructuralist Perspective (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1992); Stephen D. Moore, Poststructuralism and the New Testament: Derrida and Foucault at the Foot of the Cross (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1994); A. K. M. Adam, What Is Postmodern

1. Roots of New Literary Criticism

New literary criticism of the New Testament may be understood as a development from redaction criticism from the biblical studies side and the New Criticism and structuralism from the side of literary criticism more generally.

To some extent, source, form, and redaction criticism ask literary questions. Source criticism was first called “literary criticism” because it approached Matthew, Mark, and Luke as “literary documents.” But source criticism is a search for literary sources and relationships in history. Which gospel was written first? Which gospel was the historical source for the others? These are primarily historical questions. Form criticism is concerned with the literary form of the small stories that make up the gospels. But form criticism is a search for the sources behind the sources in history. What do the individual stories tell us about the history of the earliest churches? What may we attribute to the historical Jesus? Redaction criticism, which depends on both source and form criticism, certainly has literary aspects. As the study of the theological motivation of the editing of earlier traditions, it is concerned with the literary framework of the gospels. But redaction criticism is a search for the theology of the churches of the gospel writers or of the evangelists themselves in history.<sup>2</sup>

Source, form, and redaction criticism have all made crucial contributions to the quest for the historical Jesus. Source criticism, with its “resolution” of the “synoptic problem” in the theory of Markan priority

---

Biblical Criticism? GBS (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1995). For additional bibliography, see Mark A. Powell, with the assistance of Cecille G. Gray and Melissa C. Curtis, The Bible and Modern Literary Criticism, Bibliographies and Indexes in Religious Studies 22 (New York: Greenwood, 1992). New literary critics also adopt and adapt approaches from cultural criticism, new historicism, and post-colonial criticism, which are beyond the scope of this essay.

<sup>2</sup> This paragraph is adapted from Elizabeth Struthers Malbon, “Narrative Criticism: How Does the Story Mean?” in Mark and Method, ed. Anderson and Moore, 29–30. Edgar McKnight even comments that “Redaction criticism seeks objectively to find the one correct theme, structure and historical setting” (“Literary Criticism,” 478, italics original); this is not a goal shared by new literary criticism.

(Mark as the prior source of Matthew and Luke), gave those in quest of the historical Jesus the initial confidence of isolating the oldest source, which seemed at the time to suggest that it was also the most historically accurate source. The work of William Wrede on the Gospel of Mark,<sup>3</sup> however, challenged the Markan hypothesis (the theory that Markan priority implied Markan historicity), finding Mark as theologically motivated as Matthew and Luke. Form criticism then moved the search for historical sources to the sources behind the sources: the oral tradition implied behind the smaller units of sayings and stories that make up the gospels. But form criticism (or “form history,” to use the literal translation of the German term Formgeschichte), while foundational for Jesus research in its approach to the gospels as built up of layers of tradition, has complicated the quest for the historical Jesus. Form criticism did not find purely historical sources behind the sources of the gospels. Form criticism reminds us that the New Testament materials were part of a living process of communication within a developing community of faith. While source criticism may be seen as a lasting contribution of the “old quest” of the historical Jesus and form criticism as a lasting contribution of the “no biography” stage associated with Bultmann, redaction criticism was a feature of the “new quest” that began with the work of Käsemann. Early redaction criticism suggested that one could separate the (later) redaction of the evangelists from the (earlier) tradition, yet scholarly consensus in the separation of tradition from redaction has been hard to come by.<sup>4</sup> In addition, redaction criticism in its move toward composition criticism<sup>5</sup> stressed the creativity of the evangelists, thus undercutting their value as reporters of the history of Jesus.

As an heir to redaction criticism (and thus to source and form criticism), literary criticism also complicates the work of Jesus research, as will be discussed below. However, it is worth noting here that Jesus researchers usually begin with the subsidiary units isolated by form criticism to reconstruct the “words and deeds” of Jesus,<sup>6</sup> while New Testament literary critics push appreciation of the literary wholeness of the gospels beyond redaction criticism.

<sup>3</sup> William Wrede, Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1901; 2nd ed., 1913; 3rd ed., 1963), ET: The Messianic Secret, trans. J. C. G. Greig, Library of Theological Translations (London: James Clarke; Greenwood, SC: Attic Press, 1971).

<sup>4</sup> See, e.g., C. Clifton Black, The Disciples According to Mark: Markan Redaction in Current Debate, JSNTSup 27 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1989).

<sup>5</sup> See John R. Donahue, “Redaction Criticism: Has the Hauptstrasse Become a Sackgasse?” in The New Literary Criticism and the New Testament, ed. Elizabeth Struthers Malbon and Edgar V. McKnight, JSNTSup 109 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1994; Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1994), 27–57. Stephen Moore (Literary Criticism and the Gospels, 3–13) observes that the move from composition criticism to narrative criticism was a shift in focus from theology to story.

But the new literary criticism in biblical studies is also heir to two movements in literary criticism more generally: the New Criticism and structuralism. The shift to a literary paradigm by some biblical interpreters echoed a similar and earlier shift among interpreters of secular literature. In the 1940’s the New Criticism argued that the key to reading a poem, play, novel, or short story is to be found in the work itself. Historical information about the culture and biographical information about the author were pushed aside as external to the work. The New Criticism must be understood as a reaction to previous literary studies that gave such information primary importance. A similar reaction in biblical studies led many to move from redaction criticism to literary criticism.<sup>7</sup> The final lines of a poem by Archibald MacLeish may be understood almost as a slogan for the New Critics: “A poem should not mean/But be.”<sup>8</sup> A critic or reader must not be concerned with a poem’s referential meaning, that is, its reference to some external world. She or he must attend to its being, its presence, its metaphoric power. The poem’s power to speak to us depends neither on the author’s intention nor on the reader’s knowledge of the author’s circumstances. It depends on the poem itself—its words, its rhythms, its images.<sup>9</sup>

The New Criticism made its initial impact in New Testament studies on interpretations of the sayings and parables of Jesus. Amos Wilder’s work on Early Christian Rhetoric: The Language of the Gospel was a precursor, with its reflections on the dialogue, the story, the parable, and the poem in biblical literature.<sup>10</sup> The “significance of forceful and imaginative language” in the synoptic sayings of Jesus was explored by

---

<sup>6</sup> See Arland J. Hultgren, “Form Criticism and Jesus Research,” in the present volume.

<sup>7</sup> In fact, in the anthology of critical methods entitled To Each Its Own Meaning, structural, narrative, reader-response, poststructuralist, and ideological criticisms are categorized under “Overturning the Tradition”—in distinction from “Traditional Methods of Biblical Criticism” (e.g., redaction criticism) and those that are seen as “Expanding the Tradition” (e.g., social-scientific criticism).

<sup>8</sup> Archibald MacLeish, “Ars Poetica,” in Collected Poems 1917–1954 (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1962), 50–51.

<sup>9</sup> This paragraph and the five succeeding ones are adapted from Malbon, “Narrative Criticism,” 30–32, with permission of Augsburg Fortress Press.

<sup>10</sup> Amos N. Wilder, Early Christian Rhetoric: The Language of the Gospel (London: SCM; New York: Harper & Row, 1964; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, rev. ed. with new preface, 1971).

Robert Tannehill.<sup>11</sup> Robert Funk considered “language as event and theology” in parable and letter.<sup>12</sup> Dan Via reflected on the “literary and existential dimension” of the parables.<sup>13</sup> And the surprising, challenging, world-shattering potential of the parables was the theme of John Dominic Crossan’s work.<sup>14</sup> “A poem should not mean/But be.” And a parable should not refer but impel.

Structuralism is another critical approach that has influenced new literary criticism. Structuralism was born in linguistics<sup>15</sup> and grew up in anthropology, literature, and other areas. Central to structuralism are three affirmations about language. First, language is communication. Language as communication involves a sender giving a message to a receiver. For literature this means an author giving a text to a reader. Redaction critics focus on the sender/author, and reader-response critics focus on the receiver/reader. Structuralist critics in particular, like literary critics in general, focus on the text. By analogy, structuralist critics note that within a narrative text a “sender” gives an “object” to a “receiver.” For example, in a traditional fairy tale the king gives his daughter in marriage to the most worthy suitor. (Much of the tale works out which suitor is most worthy.) In a synoptic parable a king gives a feast to—surprisingly—the poor and the outcast. This model of language as communication and narrative as language has been worked out by French structuralist A. J. Greimas.<sup>16</sup>

Second, structuralism stresses that language is a system of signs. No sign has meaning on its own. Signs have meaning in relation to other signs. Analogously, no element of a literary work has meaning in isolation. Everything has meaning as part of a system of relationships. A

<sup>11</sup> Robert C. Tannehill, The Sword of His Mouth, SemeiaSup 1 (Philadelphia: Fortress; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1975).

<sup>12</sup> Robert W. Funk, Language, Hermeneutic, and Word of God: The Problem of Language in the New Testament and Contemporary Theology (New York: Harper & Row, 1966).

<sup>13</sup> Dan Otto Via, Jr., The Parables: Their Literary and Existential Dimension (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1967).

<sup>14</sup> John Dominic Crossan, In Parables: The Challenge of the Historical Jesus (New York: Harper & Row, 1973); Crossan, The Dark Interval: Towards a Theology of Story (Niles, IL: Argus Communications, 1975; Sonoma, CA: Polebridge, 1988).

<sup>15</sup> See, e.g., Roland Barthes, “Éléments de sémiologie,” Communications 4 (1964): 91–135, ET: Elements of Semiology (Boston: Beacon, 1970); and Ferdinand de Saussure, Cours de linguistique générale, 3rd ed. (Paris: Payot, 1967), ET: Course in General Linguistics (New York: Philosophical Library, 1959).

<sup>16</sup> A. J. Greimas, “Elements of a Narrative Grammar,” trans. Catherine Porter, Diacritics 7 (1977): 23–40. For an explanation, see Daniel Patte, What Is Structural Exegesis? GBS (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976), 41–43. For an adaptation and application to the parables, see Crossan, Dark Interval.

narrative, that is, a literary work that tells a story, must be read in two ways to disclose its system of relations. It must be read diachronically, that is, “through time,” from beginning to end. It must also be read (understood) synchronically, that is, as if everything happened at the “same time.” For a synchronic reading, logical categories (good vs. evil, order vs. chaos, etc.) are more important than chronological categories. The interrelation of parts within a whole is the key. This approach has been worked out by French structural anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss and applied in detail to the spatial settings of Mark’s Gospel.<sup>17</sup>

Third, structuralism focuses on language as a cultural code. This understanding of language builds on the other two. Through careful analysis of the oppositions expressed in a text, the even more basic oppositions implicitly supporting it are revealed. Daniel Patte, the foremost biblical structuralist, has illustrated this and other aspects of structuralism in relation to Paul’s letters and Matthew’s gospel. Patte seeks to uncover the “system of convictions” of Paul and of Matthew.<sup>18</sup> As John Donahue notes, while structuralism “never elicited [a] wide following in the United States,” it “made important contributions to biblical studies” because it “called attention to the need for a close reading of texts and moved scholars away from an atomizing exegesis that centered on particular pericopes toward concern for the total literary and cultural context of any segment of a larger narrative.”<sup>19</sup>

Both the New Criticism and structuralism focus on the text itself—the language of the text and the text as language. Biblical literary criticism has been influenced by both approaches and shares this focus on the text. The first texts examined in detail by New Testament literary critics were the sayings and parables of Jesus. These short and powerful texts are in some ways comparable to the poems that intrigued the

---

<sup>17</sup> Claude Lévi-Strauss, “The Structural Study of Myth,” Journal of American Folklore 68 (1955): 428–444; Claude Lévi-Strauss, “The Story of Asdiwal,” trans. Nicholas Mann, in The Structural Study of Myth and Totemism, ed. Edmund Leach, Association of Social Anthropologists Monographs 5 (London: Tavistock, 1967), 1–47. Elizabeth Struthers Malbon, Narrative Space and Mythic Meaning in Mark, New Voices in Biblical Studies/The Biblical Seminar 13 (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1986; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1991).

<sup>18</sup> Daniel Patte, Paul’s Faith and the Power of the Gospel: A Structural Introduction to the Pauline Letters (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); Daniel Patte, The Gospel According to Matthew: A Structural Commentary on Matthew’s Faith (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987). See also Daniel Patte, Structural Exegesis for New Testament Critics, GBS (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1990). For a brief introduction to structuralism with an application to Luke 24, see Daniel Patte, “Structural Criticism,” in To Each Its Own Meaning, ed. Haynes and McKenzie, 153–170.

<sup>19</sup> Donahue, “Literary Turn,” 256–257.

New Critics. The gospels are the texts most explored by current New Testament literary critics. The gospels are narratives, stories, in many ways not unlike the myths and folktales that structuralists often analyzed. One of the strongest branches of New Testament literary criticism is narrative criticism, a label employed by biblical critics but not by literary critics more generally.

2. Narrative Criticism<sup>20</sup>

For narrative critics, “the text” is not an isolated object but the center of a communication event: author/text/audience. In fact, following Seymour Chatman,<sup>21</sup> the author and the audience are considered implied elements of the text. Literary critics distinguish between the real author and the real audience and the implied author and the implied audience. The implied author and implied audience are creations of the real author that are embedded in the text. The implied audience is the addressees, the one or ones to whom and for whom the story is told. By focusing on the implied author and the implied audience, narrative critics are asserting a certain independence from the presumed intention of the real author and the reconstructed historical circumstances of the original audience in interpreting the work. The chief elements narrative critics investigate are settings (spatial and temporal), characters, plot, and rhetoric.<sup>22</sup> Through the interrelationships of these elements, the implied author communicates with the implied audience; the story unfolds between them.

The way literary critics approach the settings of the gospel narratives illustrates well the difference between historical and literary approaches. Historical critics sift through spatial and temporal references for clues that might reveal the biography of Jesus or the community of the evangelist; they construct a geography and a chronology of Jesus’ ministry or a description of the redactor’s community. Literary critics, however, are

---

<sup>20</sup> The first six paragraphs of this section are adapted from a similar section of Malbon and Anderson, “Literary-Critical Methods,” 245–248, drafted by Malbon, with permission of Crossroad Publishing Company.

<sup>21</sup> Seymour Chatman, Story and Discourse: Narrative Structure in Fiction and Film (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1978).

<sup>22</sup> For useful introductions to narrative criticism see Malbon, “Narrative Criticism”; Powell, What Is Narrative Criticism?; David Rhoads, Joanna Dewey, and Donald Michie, Mark as Story: An Introduction to the Narrative of a Gospel, 2nd ed. (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1999).

more interested in the connotational or symbolic value of these spatial and temporal markers. Literary critics do not try to locate physically and literally the mountain on which Jesus gave the Sermon on the Mount. (Geographically, there is no “mountain” on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee.) Rather, they observe the association made between Moses as the bearer of Torah (teaching, law) on the mountain and Jesus as the bearer of new Torah on the mountain. Similarly, Mark’s use of the name “Sea of Galilee” (Luke uses the usual “Lake of Gennesaret,” 5:1) for the place where Jesus manifests extraordinary power (calming the sea, walking on water) links Jesus’ power to God’s power over the sea (cf. Psalm 107). The map constructed by literary methods is associative, ideational, and symbolic, rather than literal, physical, and geographic.

Temporal markers are understood similarly. “Forty” is a biblical number indicating a long time. The Hebrew people wandered in the wilderness for forty years. Jesus was in the wilderness tested by Satan for forty days. Here the spatial and temporal settings combine to suggest that Jesus recapitulates the history of the people of God; Jesus passes the test. This story of the prelude to Jesus’ ministry is recounted briefly in each of the synoptic gospels. All four gospels relate the story of Jesus’ passion, the postlude to his ministry, in some detail. And each of them slows down the narrative at this point. We are given a day-by-day and, finally, an hour-by-hour account of Jesus’ end. Narrative critics understand this not as more detailed and accurate biography but as rhetorical emphasis on the most startling aspect of the Jesus story: the messiah comes as one who serves and suffers. The storyteller demands attention to this point; the hearer/reader is forced to let it sink in slowly.<sup>23</sup>

The “Jesus” that narrative critics investigate is not “the historical Jesus” that historical critics quest after, but the central character of the gospel narratives. The audience learns about this Jesus the way it learns about all the characters: through speech and through actions. The audience learns about characters by what they say and do and by what others (both characters and the narrator) say and do in relation to them. The gospels reveal their characters more by “showing” than by “telling,” more by the unfolding action than by the narrator’s direct descriptions. Compared with the complex, psychological characterization of modern novels, the characters of the gospels are quite simply sketched. Most of them are “flat,” that is one-dimensional, manifesting one character trait. The “Pharisees” in Matthew’s gospel are hypocritical; the minor characters who seek Jesus’ help in Mark’s gospel are trusting. Only Jesus and the disciples would appear to be “round” characters, that is, multidimensional, exhibiting at least several character traits and, possibly, change and development. The disciples in Mark illustrate trust and fear, initiative and flight.<sup>24</sup> Feminist narrative critics shed light on previously ignored women characters and female images of God in much the same way as feminist critics of secular literature focus on images of women in the literary canon.<sup>25</sup>

---

<sup>23</sup> For a thorough treatment of narrative time, see Gérard Genette, Narrative Discourse: An Essay in Method, trans. J. Lewin (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1980).

Characters interact within the plot. The plot is an ordered sequence of actions and events. Just as the gospels do not rely on complex characterization for their stories, they do not depend on intrigue and suspense for their plots. There are unknowns, of course: Will the Markan disciples come to understand? Will the “Jews” in Luke-Acts ever see and perceive? But the main events of the plot have a certain divine inevitability. What is intriguing about the plots of the gospels is the intertwining of the story lines of two major groups of characters based on their response to Jesus. Jesus’ story is the central cord. Around it are wound the story line of the Jewish religious leaders (from the questioning of Jesus’ authority by the Pharisees in Galilee to the plotting of his death by the chief priests, scribes, and elders in Jerusalem) and the story line of the disciples (following Jesus, preaching and healing, struggling to understand Jesus, abandoning him at his death, being called again at his resurrection). It is the disciples who experience the most ups and downs (especially in Mark), and it is the disciples with whom the implied author most invites the implied audience to identify. The challenges the disciples experience in the plot are not unlike the challenges the implied audience experiences in its life and faith.

---

<sup>24</sup> On characters and characterization in Mark, see Elizabeth Struthers Malbon, In the Company of Jesus: Characters in Mark’s Gospel (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2000); Whitney Taylor Shiner, Follow Me! Disciples in Markan Rhetoric, SBLDS 145 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1992); Joel F. Williams, Other Followers of Jesus: Minor Characters as Major Figures in Mark’s Gospel, JSNTSup 102 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1994). On characters and characterization in Luke-Acts, see John A. Darr, On Character Building: The Reader and the Rhetoric of Characterization in Luke-Acts, Literary Currents in Biblical Interpretation (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1992); James M. Dawsey, The Lukan Voice: Confusion and Irony in the Gospel of Luke (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1986). On characters and characterization in the Bible more generally, see Elizabeth Struthers Malbon and Adele Berlin, eds., Characterization in Biblical Literature (Semeia 63 [1993]); and David Rhoads and Kari Syreeni, eds., Characterization in the Gospels: Reconceiving Narrative Criticism (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999).

<sup>25</sup> See, e.g., Joanna Dewey, “The Gospel of Mark,” in Searching the Scriptures, vol. 2, A Feminist Commentary, ed. Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza (New York: Crossroad, 1994), 470–509; Mary Ann Tolbert, “Mark,” in The Women’s Bible Commentary, ed. Carol A. Newsom and Sharon H. Ringe (London: SPCK; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1992), 263–274.

The ability of the gospels to pull the audience into the story, to offer critique and encouragement of the disciples as an implicit word to the hearers and readers, is part of the rhetoric of the gospels. Rhetoric is the art of persuasion. Narrative rhetoric is how the story is told. To show the passion story in slow motion is a rhetorical move. To juxtapose Jesus' anointing by an unnamed woman with his betrayal by a named man (Judas), as Mark does in 14:3–11, is a rhetorical move. To imply by careful wording that not Jesus but all who respond to him are on trial, as John does, is a rhetorical move. The rhetoric of the gospels involves symbolic numbers: in Matthew and Mark, twelve baskets of food are left over from the miraculous feeding of the Jews (representing the twelve tribes of Israel), and seven baskets are left over from the feeding of the Gentiles (representing the seventy nations of the Gentiles). And, of course, there are plenty of rhetorical questions—questions that seem not to demand real answers in their immediate contexts but that linger with the implied audience in broader contexts. The disciples, having seen Jesus calm the sea, ask, “Who then is this...?” (Mark 4:41 // Luke 8:25; cf. Matt 8:27). Jesus, having reviewed the miraculous feedings with the disciples, asks, “Do you not yet understand?” (Mark 8:21). Pilate, having questioned Jesus, asks, “What is truth?” (John 18:38). Literary methods draw attention to these and other rhetorical devices and patterns whereby the implied author persuades the implied audience to follow the story.

Commentators on the dependence of biblical literary criticism on broader literary criticism (as it is practiced in academic departments of English and comparative literature) often note that while biblical critics have “recapitulated the major critical currents of the past half-century,” they “have often lagged almost a decade behind.”<sup>26</sup> Thus biblical literary critics often embrace “concepts like textual unity” without realizing that these concepts “have been the storm center of recent critical debate” among literary critics more generally.<sup>27</sup> John Donahue urges that “a broad awareness of the critical debate among literary critics themselves about the problems attending different methods and approaches to texts be part of the marriage contract between the biblical scholars and the new literary criticism"<sup>28</sup>—surely sound pastoral counseling.

<sup>26</sup> Donahue, “Literary Turn,” 265.

<sup>27</sup> Moore, Literary Criticism and the Gospels, 11. See also David Rhoads, “Narrative Criticism: Practices and Prospects,” in Characterization in the Gospels, ed. Rhoads and Syreeni.

While some biblical interpreters employ literary critical methods to focus on the text, that is, the interrelations of its various elements (settings, characters, plot, rhetoric), others employ literary critical methods to focus on the audience, that is, the hearer or reader of the text, whether the implied reader or the real reader or both. Although these two groups of interpreters, narrative critics and reader-response critics, both assume “the text” is the center of a communication event (author/text/audience), they speak in different ways about the text/audience relationship—and can help to redress imbalances when in conversation with each other.

3. Reader-Response Criticism

If narrative critics ask how the text means, reader-response critics ask what the text does, what effects the text has on its various audiences. The varieties of reader-response criticism derive from (1) varying evaluations of the extent of the role of the reader and (2) varying reconstructions of the reader/hearer/audience. With regard to the extent of the reader’s role, Janice Capel Anderson asks, “does the reader find or make meaning”? She answers that critics range from those who speak as if the text guides and molds the reader to those who argue that without the reader no text exists. One key reader response critic (Wolfgang Iser) [<sup>29</sup>] compares the text to stars in the night sky. One reader draws lines between the stars to form the Big Dipper, another to form a plough. Nonetheless, there are fixed stars. Another critic (Stanley Fish) [<sup>30</sup>] suggests that without the reader not only are there no constellations, but there are no fixed stars.<sup>31</sup>

<sup>28</sup> Donahue, “Literary Turn,” 265–266.

<sup>29</sup> Wolfgang Iser, Der Implizite Leser: Kommunikationsformen des Romans von Bunyan bis Beckett (München: Wilhelm Fink, 1972), ET: The Implied Reader: Patterns of Communication in Prose Fiction from Bunyan to Beckett (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1974); also Der Akt des Lesens: Theorie ästhetischer Wirkung (München: Wilhelm Fink, 1976), ET: The Act of Reading: A Theory of Aesthetic Response (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1978).

<sup>30</sup> Stanley Fish, Self-Consuming Artifacts: The Experience of Seventeenth-Century Literature (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1972); also Is There a Text in This Class? The Authority of Interpretive Communities (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1980).

<sup>31</sup> Malbon and Anderson, “Literary-Critical Methods,” 248, drafted by Anderson. I

But all reader-response critics question the presumed autonomy of the text and presume multiple interpretations as a result of the engagement of multiple readers/hearers or even multiple readings of a single reader.<sup>32</sup>

Reader-response critics conceive of the reader/hearer in a variety of ways, perhaps best depicted as ranging along a continuum from internal to external. According to Anderson, the internal reader is a set of values and a response-inviting structure in the text, a role a real reader must play or resist in reading. External readers may be real readers whose interpretations critics examine or a historical audience that the critic constructs from information about readers/hearers at the time the text was written or in subsequent historical periods. Mediating between these two positions are those who view the reader as partly internal and partly external. This implied reader exists at the intersection of textual structures and perspectives that control any reading and positions outside the text from which the text must be read.<sup>33</sup>

The fact that narrative critics often discuss the “implied reader” makes obvious the connections between narrative criticism and reader-response criticism. However, the focus of other reader-response critics on actual flesh-and-blood readers, whether contemporary with the text or contemporary with the critic or somewhere in between (moving toward reception history), challenges narrative criticism’s tendency to treat the text as autonomous. Reader-response critics also recognize that an individual reader is not autonomous; both ordinary readers and expert readers (or critics) are shaped by the learned linguistic and literary conventions of their (sometimes overlapping, sometimes competing) reading communities.

---

am grateful to my former co-author Janice Capel Anderson not only for her work on the article cited here, but also for her careful reading and thoughtful comments on an earlier draft of the present essay.

<sup>32</sup> For reader-response anthologies, see Susan R. Suleiman and Inge Crosman, eds., The Reader in the Text: Essays on Audience and Interpretation (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1980); and Jane P. Tompkins, ed., Reader-Response Criticism: From Formalism to Post-structuralism (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1980). For thorough reader-response interpretations of Mark’s Gospel, see Robert M. Fowler, Let the Reader Understand: Reader-Response Criticism and the Gospel of Mark (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1991); John Paul Heil, The Gospel of Mark as a Model for Action: A Reader-Response Commentary (New York: Paulist, 1992); Bas M. F. van Iersel, Mark: A Reader-Response Commentary, trans. W. H. Bisscheroux, JSNTSup 164 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998). For a reader-response interpretation of the Gospel of John, see Jeffrey Lloyd Staley, The Print’s First Kiss: A Rhetorical Investigation of the Implied Reader in the Fourth Gospel, SBLDS 82 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988).

<sup>33</sup> Malbon and Anderson, “Literary-Critical Methods,” 249, drafted by Anderson.

By focusing on the process of reading, reader-response critics have drawn attention to the linear, temporal dimension of the reading experience. Robert Fowler notes that “The ‘response’ in reader-response criticism is always a fluid, shifting response, mutating throughout the time of the reading experience.”<sup>34</sup> Fowler, in introducing reader-response criticism, presents a number of temporal metaphors to suggest how readers read. Readers look forward and look back, anticipating what will happen next and reflecting on what has already been reported in the narrative. The frequently used words euthus (immediately) and palin (again) direct the reader in this process in a small way in Mark’s gospel; the Markan Jesus’ predictions that are fulfilled in the narrative do the same on a larger scale, as do the two feeding stories (6:30–44 and 8:1–10). In looking forward and looking back “the reader experiences an ironic tension between what he understands about the story and what the characters in the story do not understand.”<sup>35</sup> Another metaphor for the work of the reader has been popularized by Wolfgang Iser: the reader encounters “gaps” and “fills” them. As Fowler notes, “Many of the arguments between readers are over how best to deal with gaps in the texts we read. As long as there are gaps (which is forever), readers will argue about how to handle them.”<sup>36</sup> The gospels of Matthew and Luke may be read as indications of how these two evangelists filled the gaps of their source, Mark.

A metaphor for the process of reading popularized by Wayne Booth is reconstruction, the process of discerning and deciphering irony.<sup>37</sup> The verbal and dramatic irony of the mockery of the Markan Jesus on the cross (15:16–32) manifests the author’s trust in the reader’s ability to figure things out and reconstruct meaning. A metaphor popularized by Stanley Fish is “self-consuming artifact”; sometimes something given in the process of reading is taken back (consumed, subverted, inverted) as the reading process continues.<sup>38</sup> A Markan example is seen in the mysterious saying about speaking in parables, 4:10–13. As Fowler explicates, <sup>34</sup> Robert M. Fowler, “Reader-Response Criticism: Figuring Mark’s Reader,” in Mark and Method, ed. Anderson and Moore, 65.

<sup>35</sup> Fowler, “Reader-Response Criticism,” 69.

<sup>36</sup> Ibid., 70.

<sup>37</sup> See ibid., 74–79; Wayne C. Booth, A Rhetoric of Irony (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1974).

<sup>38</sup> See Fowler, “Reader-Response Criticism,” 79–83.

In 4:13 Jesus turns to the ‘insiders’ of 4:11 and asks them: ‘Do you not understand this parable? How then will you understand all the parables?’ The tables are turned; roles are reversed. The disciples, the insiders of 4:11, are now revealed to be outsiders, those for whom the parables are riddles. The reader of the Gospel, the outsider of 4:11, now understands that the disciples do not understand. This insight is not much, but it is enough to make the reader a modest insider. . . .

Altogether in 4:10–13 we experience a gap in the discourse in 4:11, a strong possibility of verbal irony in 4:11–12, and an experience of a self-consuming artifact in 4:13.<sup>39</sup>

A final metaphor for the reading experience presented by Fowler is the “resisting reader,” a phrase that comes from Judith Fetterley’s book by this title, a classic work of feminist reader-response criticism.<sup>40</sup> For feminist readers, resisting reading is a defensive strategy in the face of misogyny, but resisting reading “has been and will always be practiced by all kinds of people struggling for dignity, justice, or new relevance for their old traditions,”<sup>41</sup> and resisting reading is manifest within the Bible itself. Resisting reading will likely engage readers in the other processes of reading marked by the metaphors presented by Fowler—looking forward and looking back, filling gaps, reconstruction, appreciating the self-consuming artifact. All together, focusing attention on these aspects of the temporal process of reading increases our self-consciousness as readers. Since all reading is interpretation (there is no “straight” reading), the choice for readers is to read unselfconsciously or self-consciously; reader-response critics aim to encourage readers to choose responsibly for self-consciousness.

Finally, some reader-response critics point out that the emphasis on temporal sequence (a reader encounters the story sequentially, from beginning to end) aids in reconstructing the aural experience of the first-century audience who heard New Testament texts read aloud. In fact, reader-response critics who are interested in first-century readers have come to use the term audience or hearers rather than the anachronistic term “reader,” as have narrative critics concerned with the first-century contexts of the gospels. Here Werner Kelber has served to bring the pioneering work of Walter Ong into New Testament studies and to raise critical methodological questions,<sup>42</sup> while Tom Boomershine, Joanna Dewey, and Whitney Shiner have imaginatively drawn out the implications of orality/aurality in interpreting the gospels.<sup>43</sup> This influence of the historical situation of the first century on New Testament literary critics, both narrative and reader-response critics, illustrates that literary criticism has moved beyond the adversarial position of its origin in reaction to the extremes of historical criticism. Increasingly, literary critics are committed to exploring first-century literary paradigms when interpreting gospel texts, and, consequently, the term “literary” must include oral contexts and popular genres, not just elite literature. Yet the cross-fertilization of new literary criticism and historical criticism is still under development, and the sub-fields of Jesus research (within historical criticism) and new literary criticism remain considerably isolated from each other.

<sup>39</sup> Fowler, “Reader-Response Criticism,” 81–82.

<sup>40</sup> See ibid., 83–90; Judith Fetterley, The Resisting Reader: A Feminist Approach to American Fiction (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1978).

<sup>41</sup> Fowler, “Reader-Response Criticism,” 84.

4. New Literary Criticism and Jesus Research

Since, at least in the United States, new literary criticism of the New Testament has been an important scholarly development of the past thirty years, and the “renewed” or “third” quest for the historical Jesus has also been an important development during the same period, one might expect that literary approaches would have been utilized as one among other helpful tools in the quest of the historical Jesus, at least in the United States. This expectation would be further suggested by the early appreciation of the “poetic” nature of Jesus’ sayings by scholars who have become key figures in the renewed quest of the historical Jesus, for example, Robert Funk and John Dominic Crossan. However, this concern for the poetic language of the Jesus sayings has been largely taken up after the manner of form criticism, with its interest in the smallest units of tradition, and not in the manner of redaction criticism, with its interest in the gospels as edited wholes. In addition, both form criticism and redaction criticism, while manifesting aspects of literary interest (at different levels of the gospel texts: pericope/larger units or an entire gospel), were (and are) at heart historical-critical approaches, interested in the history of the tradition (at different periods of the gospels’ histories: pre-gospel traditions/redacted gospels). Whereas Jesus researchers approach the gospels as source materials to be excavated and sifted, new literary critics approach the gospels as creations in themselves to be explored and appreciated holistically. Thus one finds in key English-language scholars of the quest of the historical Jesus little interest in or use of the results of new literary criticism. New literary criticism and historical Jesus research, at least in the United States and England, seem to have begun and remained as parallel tracks rather than as intersecting approaches. As evidence and qualification of this generalization, I present here brief comments on a sampling from the scholarly and more popular work of perhaps the two most well known current Jesus researchers: John Dominic Crossan and N. Thomas Wright, who might be seen as representing the ends of a spectrum.<sup>44</sup>

---

<sup>42</sup> Werner H. Kelber, The Oral and the Written Gospel: The Hermeneutics of Speaking and Writing in the Synoptic Tradition, Mark, Paul, and Q (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); Walter J. Ong, The Presence of the Word: Some Prolegomena for Cultural and Religious History (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1967; paperback ed., Minneapolis, MN: University of Minnesota Press, 1981); Ong, Interfaces of the Word: Studies in the Evolution of Consciousness and Culture (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1977); Ong, Orality and Literacy (New York: Methuen, 1982).

<sup>43</sup> Thomas Eugene Boomershine, “Mark, the Storyteller: A Rhetorical-Critical Investigation of Mark’s Passion and Resurrection Narrative” (Ph.D. diss., Union Theological Seminary, New York, 1974); Joanna Dewey, “Oral Methods of Structuring Narrative in Mark,” Int 53 (1989): 32–44; idem, ed., Orality and Textuality in Early Christian Literature, Semeia 65 (1994); idem, “From Storytelling to Written Text: The Loss of Early Christian Women’s Voices,” BTB 26 (1996): 71–78; idem, “The Gospel of Mark as an Oral-Aural Event: Implications for Interpretation,” in The New Literary Criticism and the New Testament, ed. Malbon and McKnight, 145–163; idem, “The Survival of Mark’s Gospel: A Good Story?” JBL 123 (2004): 495–507; Whitney Shiner, Proclaiming the Gospel: First-Century Performance of Mark (London: Trinity Press International, 2003). See also Christopher Bryan, “Was Mark Written to Be Read Aloud?” Part 2 of A Preface to Mark: Notes on the Gospel in its Literary and Cultural Settings (New York: Oxford University Press, 1993).

John Dominic Crossan has found it crucial to work out an explicit and systematic methodology for Jesus research, which, as he carefully outlines in the prologue to The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant, has “a triple triadic process: the campaign, the strategy, and the tactics, as it were.”<sup>45</sup> The first triad—or in the words of Crossan’s popular book, Jesus: A Revolutionary Biography, the triangulation where three independent vectors cross—involves (1) at the macrocosmic level, cross-cultural and cross-temporal social anthropology, (2) at the mesocosmic level, Greco-Roman and especially Jewish history of the first part of the first century, and (3) at the microcosmic level, literary or textual study of the specific traditions about Jesus, both within and beyond the canon. What is most important is that all three levels “must cooperate fully and equally for an effective synthesis.”<sup>46</sup>

---

<sup>44</sup> Both Crossan and Wright differ significantly in their methodology from a more “classical” approach, e.g., that of John P. Meier.

<sup>45</sup> John Dominic Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1991), xxviii. The prologue of Crossan’s popular book, Jesus: A Revolutionary Biography (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1994), presents a shortened version of this methodological outline; as a whole, the popular book represents a distillation of Part III of the scholarly book.

The third level or vector, literary or textual study, receives the greatest methodological elaboration, beginning with the affirmations that “The Gospels are neither histories nor biographies, even within the ancient tolerances for those genres”<sup>47</sup> and that both canonical and extra-canonical gospels are made up of “original, developmental, and compositional layers” or “retention, development, and creation.”<sup>48</sup> In addition, Crossan “reject[s] absolutely any pejorative language for those latter processes. Jesus left behind him thinkers not memorizers, disciples not reciters, people not parrots.”<sup>49</sup> These statements, not surprising given Crossan’s earlier work on Jesus’ parables under the influence of the New Criticism, suggest an openness to literary criticism as a tool in Jesus research, although the language of layers is more in tune with the trajectory from source to form to redaction criticism than with the more recent literary criticism (including narrative and reader-response criticism) of the New Testament. Similarly, the opening sentence of The Historical Jesus, the downbeat of the “Overture,” manifests Crossan’s openness to newer understandings of orality in the ancient world: “In the beginning was the performance; not the word alone, not the deed alone, but both, each indelibly marked with the other forever.”<sup>50</sup>

Both the second and third triads of Crossan’s methodology specify how one examines the literary or textual level, strategically and tactically. The complexity of the Jesus tradition itself calls for a strategy of (1) inventory, listing all the sources to be used, (2) stratification, positioning each source or text in a chronological sequence with a date range, and (3) attestation, presenting the now stratified data base in terms of multiplicity of independent attestation. Crossan does not claim that placing texts “in their historical situation and literary relationship” (notice the redaction-critical ring) will eliminate controversy, only that it must be done by the Jesus researcher “so that a reader knows where

<sup>46</sup> Crossan, Historical Jesus, xxix.

<sup>47</sup> Ibid., xxx.

<sup>48</sup> Ibid., xxxi.

<sup>49</sup> Ibid., xxxi.

<sup>50</sup> Ibid., xi, italics original. See also the close of this frame on page xxvi.

one stands on every issue.”<sup>51</sup> The final triad specifies Crossan’s tactics for dealing with this collated and categorized literary or textual data: the researcher must focus on (1) the sequence of the strata (even though “Chronologically most close does not, of course, mean historically most accurate,”<sup>52</sup> study must begin with the chronologically first stratum); (2) the hierarchy of attestation (“complexes,” content-related clusters of sayings or deeds rather than single sayings, that occur in the tradition independently more frequently must be given greater consideration, “And, although in abstract theory there could be just as much development and creation in that first stratum as in any of the other three, my method postulates that, at least for the first stratum, everything is original until it is argued otherwise”<sup>53</sup>); and (3) bracketing of singularity (of 522 complexes in his inventory, Crossan counts 342 with only a single attestation and thus methodologically inappropriate for building on; “Plural attestation in the first stratum pushes the trajectory back as far as it can go with at least formal objectivity”).<sup>54</sup>

Why has Crossan felt it necessary to develop and explicate such an elaborate methodology as a Jesus researcher? Because “Historical Jesus research is becoming something of a scholarly bad joke,”<sup>55</sup> “an academic embarrassment. It is impossible to avoid the suspicion that historical Jesus research is a very safe place to do theology and call it history, to do autobiography and call it biography.”<sup>56</sup> Thus, because Crossan is suspicious of what theology can do and has done to history in the quest of the historical Jesus, he strives to separate history and theology, using literary criticism as a tool. However, from a new literary critical point of view, although Crossan’s literary critical sensibility is refreshing and challenging, his presumed literary critical tools are largely source-, form-, and redaction-critical approaches employed to establish historical layers or strata in the Jesus tradition, and Crossan trusts these presumed literary tools in the work of suggesting historical layers far beyond what a new literary critic would. Although many new literary critics might share Crossan’s suspicion of theology, few share his level

---

<sup>51</sup> Crossan, Historical Jesus, xxxi.

<sup>52</sup> Ibid., xxxii.

<sup>53</sup> Ibid., xxxii. Since Crossan shifts the burden of proof between the first stratum and the later ones, a great deal depends on how complexes get assigned to strata.

<sup>54</sup> Ibid., xxxiii.

<sup>55</sup> Ibid., xxvii.

<sup>56</sup> Ibid., xxviii.

of trust of literary criticism as a tool for reconstructing history because, more basically, new literary criticism begins with a healthy suspicion of history, that is, history as it has been reconstructed by scholars from the literature of the New Testament.

At the other end of the spectrum of current Jesus research is N. Thomas Wright, now Bishop of Durham, Church of England. Because Wright is suspicious of what history can do and has done to theology in the quest of the historical Jesus, he strives to integrate theology and history, rejecting literary criticism as a tool at the level of the gospels as wholes and using it selectively at the level of Jesus' parables. Wright does not trust even the earlier literary tools of form and redaction criticism, which place limits on the history that can be reconstructed. He does find some parables research, influenced by the New Criticism (and perhaps mediated through the work of Crossan), useful in his theological/historical reconstruction. Although new literary criticism begins with a suspicion of history, that is, history as it has been reconstructed by scholars from the literature of the New Testament, it is not, like Wright's, a suspicion based on valuing theology, which has also seemed suspicious to literary critics in its dominating influence on New Testament literature, especially in redaction criticism. For Wright, redaction criticism is too literary in its scope; for literary critics, redaction criticism is too theological and too historical in its interests. The spectrum of Jesus research is broad.

For Wright there are two major ways of knowing about Jesus: history and faith.<sup>57</sup> Furthermore, these two ways are not to be understood as in conflict, or even as separate. As Wright affirms early on in Jesus and the Victory of God,

The underlying argument of this book is that the split [between history and theology (elsewhere history and faith)] is not warranted: that rigorous history (i.e. open-ended investigation of actual events in first-century

---

<sup>57</sup> For a succinct presentation of history and faith as ways of knowing Jesus, see N. T. Wright, "Knowing Jesus: Faith and History," in The Meaning of Jesus: Two Visions, by Marcus J. Borg and N. T. Wright (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1999), 15–27. In Jesus and the Victory of God, vol. 2 of Christian Origins and the Question of God (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1996), Wright employs the terms "history" and "theology" as the two modes of knowing about Jesus, and even works out an interpretation (allegory?) of the parable of the Prodigal Son relevant to historical Jesus research in which the younger son/brother is history (124), "Enlightenment historiography" (117), or "the historical task itself" (137), and the older son/brother is theology (137). Wright sees his historical method as "a penitent history" that "offers itself as the long and dusty road back to reality, to confrontation, and perhaps to reconciliation" (144).

Palestine) and rigorous theology (i.e. open-ended investigation of what the word 'god,' and hence the adjective 'divine,' might actually refer to) belong together, and never more so than in discussion of Jesus.<sup>58</sup>

Any boundary between history and theology seems totally dissolved in Wright's popular book (based on a British television special), The Original Jesus, where the sub-categories do not appear specifically, and the sermon-like essay flows in a presumed historical mode from the Lukan Jesus' parable of the Prodigal Son to Ezekiel's vision of the valley of the dry bones, and from the Matthean Jesus' Sermon on the Mount to the Lukan Mary's Magnificat ("Maybe his mother had taught him her song...").<sup>59</sup> I must admit that this much togetherness of the categories history and theology/faith is too much for me, but my purpose here is to note that literature (or narrative or story), an obvious, although complex, category of the gospels, our best sources for both history and theology about Jesus, is not mentioned here. There is a promising mention of the mediating role of language:

One important feature of bringing together the worlds of history and faith, and recognizing that other people (notably first-century Jews) did so, too, is that we should make ourselves conscious of the way in which we, and they, use language to do both at the same time.<sup>60</sup>

However, this promise seems to apply only to recognizing the importance of language in the stories Jesus is reported to have told, not in relation to the stories told about him.<sup>61</sup> A brief discussion of the parable of the Prodigal Son in The Original Jesus exclaims that "Stories create worlds" (sounding very like an echo of Crossan's The Dark Interval),<sup>62</sup> and a chapter that employs the parable of the Prodigal Son as a paradigm in Jesus and the Victory of God opens "History proceeds by telling stories."<sup>63</sup> But no mention is made in either place of the world created

<sup>58</sup> Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, 8.

<sup>59</sup> N. T. Wright, The Original Jesus (Oxford: Lion; Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1996), 50. Another popular book by Wright, Who Was Jesus? (London: SPCK; Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1992), is not a presentation of his own research but a review and critique of the books of three "maverick popularizers" (viii) that appeared in 1992: Barbara Thiering, A. N. Wilson, and John Spong.

<sup>60</sup> Wright, "Knowing Jesus," 18–19.

<sup>61</sup> A connection between parable and gospel, although recognized by some Markan literary critics, is denied explicitly by Wright: "My point remains that the genre of the gospels, and that of the individual stories in which Jesus figures, lies along the continuum of history and biography, not of parable" ("The Truth of the Gospel and Christian Living," in The Meaning of Jesus, 216).

<sup>62</sup> Wright, Original Jesus, 36.

<sup>63</sup> Idem, Jesus and the Victory of God, 125. In this final chapter of the introductory

by the author of Luke 15 by presenting together three parables of the lost and found, nor of how that might complicate our understanding of “the original Jesus.”<sup>64</sup>

In Wright’s survey of the quest of the historical Jesus in the opening chapters of Jesus and the Victory of God, he divides questers into two (largely heuristic) categories: followers of Wrede, manifesting a thoroughgoing skepticism, and followers of Schweitzer, manifesting a thoroughgoing eschatology. It is telling for me to realize that Wright, as a Jesus researcher following Schweitzer, links the work of Wrede with thoroughgoing skepticism, that is, skepticism of Mark’s Gospel as a source for the historical Jesus, and employs negatively in relation to Wrede’s heritage the phrase “Mark as pure fiction.”<sup>65</sup> I, on the other hand, as a Markan narrative critic, link the work of Wrede positively with the beginning of an appreciation of literary characteristics of Mark’s Gospel. Although Wright critiques form criticism and those Jesus researchers who apply criteria to one saying or story at a time (preferring instead a “method of hypothesis and verification”),<sup>66</sup> it is still the smaller units of the gospel tradition that form criticism isolates that he focuses on as well. Wright is also suspicious of redaction criticism as it is generally practiced, which, he complains, “has sometimes misled scholars into supposing that they [the gospels] are therefore of less historical value.”<sup>67</sup> New Testament new literary criticism, redaction criticism’s latter-day stepchild, Wright seems to reject in theory and ignore in practice.<sup>68</sup> part of Jesus and the Victory of God, the parable of the Prodigal Son serves as a paradigm (allegory?) of both the history of Jesus research (see note 57 above) and of the historical Jesus that Wright constructs: “Thus, in a nutshell, the parable of the prodigal father points to the hypothesis of the prophetic son: the son, Israel-in-person, who will himself go into the far country, who will take upon himself the shame of Israel’s exile, so that the kingdom may come, the covenant be renewed, and the prodigal welcome of Israel’s god, the creator, be extended to the ends of the earth” (132). In volume I of Christian Origins and the Question of God, entitled The New Testament and the People of God (London: SPCK; Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1992), Wright performs a Greimasian (French structuralist) analysis of the Markan parable of the Wicked Tenants (69–77).

---

<sup>64</sup> However, in the chapter in Jesus and the Victory of God, Wright does comment: “Luke, to be sure, has used the story within his own larger story. There is an interesting parallel, again not always observed, between Luke 15 and Acts 15. In both, people are being welcomed in from beyond the boundaries of normal acceptability” (128).

<sup>65</sup> Ibid., 81.

<sup>66</sup> Ibid., 87.

<sup>67</sup> Ibid., 89.

<sup>68</sup> I find myself somewhat mystified by Wright’s rich chapter on “Literature, Story and the Articulation of Worldviews” (ch. 3 in The New Testament and the People of God), especially in light of his claim in the preceding chapter that “the study of the New Testament involves three disciplines in particular: literature, history and theology”

Obviously the intention of this essay is not to review Jesus research in its vast array, even from the point of view of new literary criticism. However, this brief glimpse of the work of two of its foremost practitioners, who are in many ways poles apart, may suggest the range of relationships possible between new literary criticism and Jesus research. To recapitulate, because Crossan is suspicious of what theology can do and has done to history in the quest of the historical Jesus, he strives to separate history and theology, using literary criticism as a tool—perhaps trusting too much how well those presumed literary tools work in delineating historical sources and layers. On the other hand, because Wright is suspicious of what history can do and has done to theology in the quest of the historical Jesus, he strives to integrate theology and history, rejecting literary criticism as a tool at the level of the gospels as wholes and using it selectively at the level of Jesus' parables—perhaps trusting too little what literary criticism might add to both history and theology. New literary criticism, for its part, is suspicious of what history and theology can do and have done to literary critical appreciation of the gospels—perhaps trusting too little in both.

5. Open Questions

Although it has roots in source, form, and redaction criticism on the biblical studies side as well as roots in the New Criticism and structural-

---

(31) and his insistence elsewhere that the two sources of knowledge of the historical Jesus are theology and history (with no reference to literature). In this third chapter, Wright ranges over a wide variety of modern and postmodern literary theories, but, somewhere between the incredibly long sentences and the sustained sarcastic tone in describing other literary theories or strategies of reading, I realize I do not know what to believe about what he believes about the inherent importance of literature and the power of story as story. In Wright's usage, "story" is connected with worldviews—and with knowledge and verification (see The New Testament and the People of God, 31–46, especially 45), but not especially connected with literature or with the gospels as narratives. I wonder: Is Wright's proposed theory of reading, "critical realism," a cipher for rescuing authorial intent and historical reference from the onslaughts of modern and postmodern literary critical theory? Is he using "story" as a temporary stand-in for history (which is, in his view, quite connected to theology)? Is "literature" subsumed by theology? These are my questions of Wright. The questions Wright raises about literary theories of reading are pertinent, but the proposals he offers seem equally problematic, especially in light of his integration of history and theology without sustained reference to literature or literary criticism in Jesus and the Victory of God. Since, in Jesus and the Victory of God, Wright states that the fourth and fifth questions Jesus researchers must ask, (4) How and why did the early church begin? (see 109–112) and (5) Why are the gospels what they are? (see 112–13), "must be put on hold for the time being" (143), perhaps both redaction criticism and literary criticism will receive fuller attention in a later volume.

ism on the side of literary criticism more generally, new literary criticism in New Testament studies, including two of its strongest branches—narrative criticism and reader-response criticism—has grown up in reaction against certain excesses of historical criticism. It is no wonder that suspicion remains between those questing for the historical Jesus and those questioning the literary-ness of the gospels.<sup>69</sup> Although suspicion does not generally encourage conversation, it need not preclude it—especially in an age when scholars of many varying points of view and focus recognize the necessity and positive value of a hermeneutic of suspicion. In closing I mention three areas of open questions that would seem to be fertile for cross-pollination between Jesus research and new literary criticism: studies of orality, evaluation of the Q hypothesis, and reconsideration of layers or strands within the gospels. The three areas are connected to each other and to both Jesus research and new literary criticism through the heritage of source, form, and redaction criticism. The hypothesis of Q emerged from source criticism as part of the resolution of the synoptic problem in the two-source hypothesis, along with the assumption of the priority of Mark. The oral tradition implied behind Mark and the other gospels has been the focus of form criticism, while redaction criticism has focused on layers or strands of tradition and redaction in the gospels. However, questions need to be raised about how well the presuppositions of source, form, and redaction criticism that lie at the roots of current new literary criticism and Jesus research continue to serve contemporary scholarship.

First, in terms of orality studies, Jesus researchers have a clear stake in understanding the contexts in which the gospel traditions were transmitted. Form criticism, which intends to explore the oral traditions behind the written gospels, has been formative in the quest of the historical Jesus. However, much has been learned about oral cultures and the transmission of oral tradition since the formation of form criticism.

---

<sup>69</sup> David M. Gunn ("Narrative Criticism," in To Each Its Own Meaning, ed. Haynes and McKenzie, 193) comments: "An acute problem remains in biblical studies, namely, that much of the data for any kind of historical discourse must come from texts whose provenance is, despite nearly two centuries of historical investigation, a matter of mere speculation. The question of literary criticism's relation to historical criticism therefore is an important one, but it requires a more sophisticated discussion than it has generally been afforded so far." Donahue ("Literary Turn," 273) proposes "that within biblical studies the developments within rhetorical criticism and the new historicism [see 262–272] offer the best combination of historical research, literary sophistication, and concern for religious experience... Concretely, the new historicism, which views texts at the intersection of historical and social forces, recommends dialogue between biblical 'literary critics' and those engaged in the application of social scientific methods to biblical texts."

Looking back, one can detect models of print culture projected onto form-critical presuppositions about the transmission of oral traditions. As Werner Kelber notes,

The concepts of original form and variants have no validity in oral life, nor does the one of ipissima vox, if by that one means the authentic version over against secondary ones. In a sense each performance is “an” original, if not “the” original’ [quoting Albert B. Lord, The Singer of Tales, Harvard Studies in Comparative Literature 24 (Cambridge, MA, Harvard University Press, 1960), 101]. Moreover, if each utterance constitutes an authentic speech act, then the question of transmission can never be kept wholly separate from composition. In speaking, transmission involves an act of composition, or at least recreation. All too often when we think of transmission of traditions, we think of it primarily as the passing on of fixed forms. In other words, we think of it in literary terms. In orality, tradition is almost always composition in transmission.<sup>70</sup>

Joanna Dewey extends this implication to the Gospel of Mark—and it can be extended, perhaps to a lesser extent, to all of the gospels:

All we can say with certainty is that our text likely represents only one version among many, one version that may or may not be characteristic of the Markan performance tradition. We do not know if, in our modern sense, there was an ‘original Mark,’ and if there was, precisely what ‘original Mark’ looked like. Nonetheless, our written text is the only text we have. Whether we are doing literary analyses of the text as an object to be read, or trying to reconstruct its meanings in the context of oral performance-reception, it is the text that of necessity we must use. Let us use it; but let us remember how differences between literate and oral-aural worlds affect how we understand Mark. Let us remember that it represents one version among many. Let us remember we do not know how typical it is, and that we do not know which audience it reflects at what time.<sup>71</sup>

In addition, Dewey has recently argued, on the basis of the work of Thorleif Boman and others,<sup>72</sup> that “Studies from the fields of folklore, oral tradition, and oral history all suggest that traditions are likely to coalesce into a continuous narrative or narrative framework quite quickly. . . . All agree against the form-critical assumption of transmission of disparate small episodes.”<sup>73</sup> If this is the case, what effect will

<sup>70</sup> Kelber, Oral and Written Gospel, 30, italics original; see also Werner H. Kelber, “Jesus and Tradition: Words in Time, Words in Space,” Semeia 65 (1994): 139–167.

<sup>71</sup> Joanna Dewey, “Mark as an Oral-Aural Event,” 159.

<sup>72</sup> Thorleif Boman, Die Jesus-Überlieferung in Lichte der neueren Volkskunde (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1967). See Dewey’s discussion in “Survival of Mark’s Gospel,” 500–503.

<sup>73</sup> Dewey, “Survival of Mark’s Gospel,” 500, 501.

this realization have on Jesus researchers who continue to work with the “disparate small episodes” of form criticism? What effect will this pushing back in time and tradition history of a “continuous narrative or narrative framework” have on new literary critics who focus on these very aspects of our written gospels? Are Jesus researchers and new literary critics analyzing these newer investigations of orality and considering fully their implications for our understanding of both the gospels in themselves and the gospels as sources for reconstructing the historical Jesus?<sup>74</sup>

Second, in terms of the Q hypothesis, are Jesus researchers and literary critics remembering that it is just that, a hypothesis? Although the Q hypothesis grew out of the old literary criticism, that is, source criticism, as a way of explaining the non-Markan agreements between Matthew and Luke, questions may be raised about the necessity of hypothesizing such a sayings “source” (Quelle in German) from the point of view of new literary criticism.<sup>75</sup> As Mark Goodacre has shown, with a fuller appreciation of the literary characteristics of Luke’s gospel, the Farrer-Goulder hypothesis—that Matthew knew Mark and Luke knew both Mark and Matthew—does make sense and has the advantage of not needing to postulate a hypothetical document.<sup>76</sup> Many Jesus researchers, <sup>74</sup> The question of orality seems more problematic for Wright than for Crossan, whose comments on “performance” and focus on “complexes” rather than on exact sayings or stories already seem to interact with certain aspects of current orality studies, although neither scholar’s work takes into account the more recent challenge of form criticism’s assumed “disparate small episodes.” Wright does consider the impact of orality in his reconstruction of the historical Jesus, but he builds not on the model of orality of Walter Ong and his heirs but on the model of Kenneth E. Bailey (“Informal Controlled Oral Tradition and the Synoptic Gospels,” AJT 5 [1991]: 34–54), who Wright claims “has argued effectively for a position midway between the extremes represented by Bultmann and Gerhardsson” that stories of and about Jesus were passed down through “informal but controlled oral tradition”—giving them, of course, greater historical reliability (Jesus and the Victory of God, 134). Wright observes, almost with glee, that “if Bailey is anywhere near the mark in his analysis of Mediterranean peasant oral culture, then the case for Mark-the-filmscript writer melts away like morning dew” (137). (I take the phrase “Mark-the-film-script writer” as a caricature of new literary critical approaches.) Dewey also notes that Boman wants “to use orality to argue for greater historicity” but that in her opinion “orality does not support historicity” (“Survival of Mark’s Gospel,” 500 n. 21).

---

<sup>75</sup> Although it still seems to be the case that the majority of literary critics do not question the Q hypothesis any more than the majority of historical critics do. See, e.g., Dewey’s opening question concerning the survival of Mark: “Why did it not go the way of Q?” (“Survival of Mark’s Gospel,” 495).

<sup>76</sup> Mark Goodacre, The Case against Q: Studies in Markan Priority and the Synoptic Problem (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2002). Cf. Austin Farrer, “On Dispensing with Q,” in Studies in the Gospels: Essays in Memory of R. H. Lightfoot, ed. D. E. Nineham (Oxford: Blackwell, 1955), 55–58, and reproduced on The Case Against Q web

however, are quite invested in Q, which not only gives them another source to count in seeking to meet the criterion of multiple attestation but also, as a hypothetical document, is open to an even wider range of interpretation than documents that are concretely known. As Bart Ehrman notes,

Q is a source that we don't have. To reconstruct what we think was in it is hypothetical enough. . . . But to go further and insist that we know what was not in the source, for example, a Passion narrative, what its multiple editions were like, and which of these multiple editions was the earliest, and so on, really goes far beyond what we can know—however appealing such ‘knowledge’ might be.<sup>77</sup>

When the Q hypothesis was first developed, most New Testament scholars shared a rather limited evaluation of the abilities and desires of the evangelists in general and Mark in particular. Limiting the creativity of Mark's author served well, of course, those who sought in this first gospel a trustworthy source for the historical Jesus; Markan historicity was as valued as Markan priority. Few remain now who would affirm Markan historicity, but, interestingly enough, there are those who come close to affirming the historicity of that other of the “two sources”: Q! There are reconstructions of the historical Jesus that are built in part not only on the Q hypothesis but on an early dating of Q. The “Markan hypothesis” (if Mark is first, it must be the most historical) dissolved when most scholars let go of Markan historicity while maintaining Markan priority. Now, while some scholars are calling on us to let go not only of Q's priority but its very existence, others are calling on us to assert not only its priority but its historicity!

While the two-source critics assigned priority and historicity to Mark, they favored Matthew for what limited literary creativity they were willing to see. Thus the material shared only by Matthew and Luke, that is, Q, was thought to be more creatively arranged by Matthew, more woodenly inserted by Luke. Perhaps knowledge of the history of interpretation would suggest whether this preference for Matthew was an aesthetic or a theological preference or even a historical accident concerning which site, <http://ntgateway.com/Q>; Michael Goulder, “On Putting Q to the Test,” NTS 24 (1978): 218–234; Michael Goulder, “Farrer on Q,” Theology 83 (1980): 190–195; Michael Goulder, “Is Q a Juggernaut?” JBL 115 (1996): 667–681, and reproduced on The Case Against Q web site. For other materials, see the bibliographies of Goodacre's book and web site.

---

<sup>77</sup> Bart D. Ehrman, Jesus: Apocalyptic Prophet of the New Millennium (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999), 133.

scholars were working on Matthew, but it is clear that when Matthew's gospel lost the priority implicitly given by its place in the canon and explicitly given by Augustine, it gained status as the more thoughtful of the gospels based on the "two sources." Goodacre regards this preference for Matthew as another fallacy at the heart of the Q hypothesis.

Given these significant changes in the presuppositions about Mark, Matthew, and Luke that were widely shared at the birth of the Q hypothesis, it seems unlikely that such a hypothesis would be developed today, but, being full-grown, the Q hypothesis shows no signs of cardiac arrest with these changes in presuppositions. In fact, the literary creativity first glimpsed in Matthew, then Mark, then Luke that might be thought of as challenging the Q hypothesis is now being appreciated in Q and Thomas, first considered just straightforward lists of Jesus sayings. And the model of orality that might seem to make Q problematic is now being applied to Q. Apparently the Q hypothesis is quite adaptable to new conditions—even robust, to continue the human analogy. The advantage of a hypothesis is, of course, its explanatory power. But the disadvantage of a strong hypothesis is that its explanatory power blocks other questions. The assertion that Luke followed Q rather strictly, for example, blocks the question of why so-called Q material is where it is in Luke. If more interpreters were to become more concerned for the questions blocked by the Q hypothesis, its explanatory power would perhaps weaken. It is, I believe, the attraction of new questions, more than the rebuttal of old answers, that brings about a paradigm shift. In any case, the Q hypothesis deserves a fresh evaluation, from its presuppositions through its hypothesized recensions; both new literary critics and Jesus researchers have a stake in this question, and their dialogue may be essential to the endeavor.<sup>78</sup>

Third and finally, cross-fertilization between literary criticism and Jesus research seems called for in the reconsideration of layers or strands within the gospels. Redaction criticism approached the gospels as layered constructions of tradition and redaction. Jesus researchers have been most interested, of course, in isolating the earliest layer of tradition, while new literary critical scholars, although usually approaching the gospels holistically, have been especially interested in the presumed redactional moves of the implied author throughout the narrative. However, new literary criticism raises the question of whether the historical categorization of tradition and redaction is the only or the best way to understand the layers or strands within gospel texts. All strands or layers in a text need not be evidence of historical differences (as literary critics of the Hebrew Bible have pointed out with reference to JEDP); such layers or strands clearly have literary effects.

---

<sup>78</sup> The question of Q seems more problematic for Crossan, for whom the "Sayings Gospel Q" is a first stratum source, than for Wright, who raises significant questions about Q—as a part of his critique of the work of the Jesus Seminar (Jesus and the Victory of God, 41–43, 48). Wright's complaints, however, seem to have more to do with the portrait of the historical Jesus that is painted on the basis of Q (see 43 and 48) than with the literary construction of the hypothetical document; certainly Wright offers no argument in favor of Matthean and Lukan creativity as evidence against Q.

One wonders, for example, if the historical Jesus that some scholars have reconstructed might be more fairly described as the Markan Jesus (although Marcus Borg's portrait of Jesus may manifest a partiality toward the Lukan Jesus).<sup>79</sup> Since Markan priority is affirmed by most New Testament scholars—both Jesus researchers and new literary critics, both those who assume the two-source hypothesis and those who find the Farrer-Goulder hypothesis more convincing—Mark's gospel has remained a key source for historical Jesus scholars. While narrative critics have frequently claimed that the Markan narrator and the Markan Jesus share the same point of view,<sup>80</sup> my own work on Jesus as a character in the Gospel of Mark suggests a distinction between the Markan narrator and the character Jesus that parallels a distinction Jesus researchers often take as a distinction between the evangelist and the historical Jesus.<sup>81</sup>

Mark's narrative manifests a significant gap between what the character Jesus says about himself and what other characters and the narrator say about him. Jesus' responses deflect away from himself the recognition,

---

<sup>79</sup> See Marcus J. Borg, Jesus: A New Vision: Spirit, Culture, and the Life of Discipleship (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987); and Meeting Jesus Again for the First Time: The Historical Jesus and the Heart of Contemporary Faith (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1994).

<sup>80</sup> In his classic, and now also more than twenty-five-year-old, essay on "'Point of View' in Mark's Narrative" (Semeia 12 [1978]: 97–121), Norman R. Petersen asserts that the Markan narrator's "ideological standpoint is identical with that of his central character, Jesus, with whom he shares the power of knowing what is in the minds of others" (107). In fact, he argues that "Through this commonality of psychologically internal points of view, and with the support of the plotting of the story by which one actor is rendered central, the narrator is aligned—if not identified—with the central actor" (102). For a discussion of three significant differences between Petersen's assumptions and mine, see Elizabeth Struthers Malbon, "The Christology of Mark's Gospel: Narrative Christology and the Markan Jesus," in Who Do You Say That I Am? Essays on Christology: Festschrift Jack Dean Kingsbury, ed. Mark Allan Powell and David R. Bauer (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1999), 43–44.

<sup>81</sup> Elizabeth Struthers Malbon, Mark's Jesus: Characterization as Narrative Christology (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2009), especially the concluding chapter.

honor (sincere or sarcastic), or attention a character, group of characters, or the narrator intends to give. The words of the Markan Jesus do not echo the words (titles? labels? descriptions?) of the Markan unclean spirits, crowds, John the Baptizer, Herod, Peter, Bartimaeus, high priest, Pilate, chief priests and scribes, centurion, or narrator. The narrator imparts to Jesus' apparent "shyness" a theological motive: the Markan Jesus wishes to deflect the attention given to him, especially as healer, to the true source of the healing, God. Jesus' negative commands for "christological" secrecy (don't tell about me) are balanced by his positive statements of theology (tell about God). Such a view is not shared by the Markan characters who present statements about or questions to Jesus.

The Markan narrator knows all this. The narrator is aware of Jesus' reticence to receive attention and his desire to deflect honor to God, but the Markan narrator does not entirely share that reticence. The narrator's point of view is not dramatically at odds with the point of view of the Markan Jesus, but they are clearly distinguishable. The narrator boldly asserts that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God. Jesus is reticent. Perhaps this is why it is so important that God confirm the narrator's point of view; the Markan Jesus hardly does so! Yet the Markan Jesus makes assertions about the Son of Man, about which the narrator is silent, and boldly proclaims the kingdom of God, about which the narrator speaks directly just once, and that after Jesus' death (15:43). There is thus a tension between the Markan narrator who wants to talk about Jesus and the Markan Jesus who wants to talk about God.<sup>82</sup>

In addition, and contrary to what has generally been observed about Mark's gospel, the narrator is not identical with the implied author.<sup>83</sup> Both the Markan narrator and the Markan Jesus are under the control of the implied author. The implied author is the one who allows a character, even the main character, to have a point of view distinct from the narrator—and for a good purpose: a Jesus who talked like the narrator could hardly be a Jesus who "came not to be served but to serve" (10:45). In the Gospel of

---

<sup>82</sup> My work summarized here focuses on the character Jesus. In Jack Dean Kingsbury's book, The Christology of Mark's Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983), concern for the "titles of majesty" applied to Jesus by the other characters, and especially by the narrator, dominates. Kingsbury takes "the narrator's point of view" to be the only "correct" point of view on christology in the Gospel of Mark; all differing points of view expressed by characters (Jesus is not considered in the same way) are wrong; all similar points of view, including God's, are congruent and thus "correct."

<sup>83</sup> See Malbon, "Narrative Criticism," 33, and Mark's Jesus.

Mark the tension between the narrator's point of view and Jesus' point of view enables the implied author to present a Jesus whose focus is always on God, even though the narrator keeps focusing on Jesus. One could hardly present the story of Jesus without focusing on Jesus; the narrator is thus not to be blamed. But neither is the implied author to be ignored in creating the gap, the tension, between the narrator's point of view and that of the main character, Jesus. It is not the Markan Jesus' point of view nor the Markan narrator's point of view that is the point of view of Mark's gospel. It is the implied author's point of view. Thus the tension between the narrator and Jesus is not a problem to be resolved, not a gap to be filled in, but a "narrative christological" confession.<sup>84</sup>

To treat the point of view of the character Jesus as the point of view of the historical Jesus and the point of view of the Markan narrator as the point of view of the Markan evangelist would be to make the category mistake of simply equating literary distinctions with historical distinctions. Of course, elements of a narrative may reflect both historical realities and literary effects, but that is just what needs to be argued in each case by new literary critics and Jesus researchers in dialogue, not presupposed as a general rule. And this conclusion—concerning the need for argumentation and dialogue between new literary critics and Jesus researchers about their shared and distinctive presuppositions—is true of the open questions in all three areas introduced here: studies of orality, evaluation of the Q hypothesis, and reconsideration of layers or strands within the gospels.

It is clear why these three areas of open questions are important for new literary criticism, which is suspicious of what history and theology can do and have done to literary appreciation of the gospels. (1) New literary criticism's suspicion of literary claims based on historical and theological constructions is manifest in (a) applying current understandings of orality to prior understandings of the formation of gospel traditions and (b) re-evaluating with new literary critical understandings the hypothesis of Q that was established with old literary critical understandings. (2) New literary criticism's suspicion of historical claims based on literary evidence is manifest in the reconsideration of the meaning of layers or strands within the gospels. It is also clear that these open questions are important for Jesus research, whose varied researchers bring their own scholarly suspicions. Suspicion is good; without it scholarship would come to an end. But conversation around shared and distinctive suspicions is very good; with it scholarship may come to ever-new beginnings.

---

<sup>84</sup> Robert C. Tannehill ("The Gospel of Mark as Narrative Christology," Semeia 16 [1979]: 57–79) introduced the term "narrative christology" to mean taking "seriously the narrative form of Mark in discussing this gospel's presentation of Jesus Christ" (57). For a detailed and creative exploration of the distinction between the voice of Jesus and the voice of the narrator in Luke, see Dawsey, The Lukan Voice. Although Dawsey does not employ the term "the implied author," he does use the term "author" in this sense: "Obviously the author was an accomplished artist who could control the language of his characters. It is also a credit to his ability as a storyteller that the author allowed his narrator and Jesus to hold different views concerning some elements of the story" (75).

Realistically, of course, in this age of specialization it has become impossible for researchers to keep up with the scholarly literature of both the quest of the historical Jesus, which has increased exponentially in the past thirty years, and new literary criticism of the gospels, enjoying its initial growth in these years—much less become experts in the study of orality, Q, and gospel layers or strands! This circumstance would seem to suggest that we talk with each other more, not less. These two sub-fields share some common roots in source, form, and redaction criticism and a common period of new growth in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries, as well as, more recently, mutual influence by more sociological approaches. Yet the relative isolation of new literary criticism and Jesus research is not accidental or based solely on the demands of specialization.<sup>85</sup> New literary criticism and Jesus research differ in their basic approaches to the gospels. For Jesus researchers, the challenge is to analyze the gospels for traces of something else—the historical Jesus. For new literary critics, the challenge is to appreciate the gospels in themselves and in relation to their multiple audiences. For the former the gospels are means, for the latter, ends. Can the silence be broken for a challenging conversation?

---

<sup>85</sup> Compare Mark Alan Powell's description of the situation in which "literary criticism and Jesus scholarship . . . often placed scholars committed to either enterprise at a distance from those dedicated to the other, with an unfortunate lapse in opportunities to learn from each other" ("Authorial Intent and Historical Reporting: Putting Spong's Literalization Thesis to the Test," JSHJ 1 [2003]: 225–249, at 225). Although I do not find Powell's argument about authorial intent entirely convincing, I do find his attempt to engage both literary critics and Jesus researchers in the conversation admirable and encouraging.

MEMORY THEORY AND JESUS RESEARCH

ALAN KIRK

Gospels scholarship still works with conceptions of memory long abandoned by those who study memory in its social, cognitive, and cultural aspects. The “passivist” model of memory is described by Edward Casey as “the view that all memories of necessity repeat the past in a strictly replicative manner. The contribution of the remembering subject... is nugatory.”<sup>1</sup> The cognitive theory associated with this approach likens memories to traces, “stored up like so many definite impressions, fixed and having only the capacity of being reexcited.”<sup>2</sup> Memory is thereby reduced, in Casey’s words, “to being an inert sedimentation, a mere residuum.”<sup>3</sup> This epitomizes the conception of memory operative in the model of tradition that has been bequeathed to historical Jesus scholarship by classical form criticism. However, at least as early as F. C. Bartlett’s seminal work in 1932, virtually contemporaneous with the second German edition of Bultmann’s History of the Synoptic Tradition, memory theorists were beginning to approach memory as an active, constructive faculty.

1. Form Criticism and Memory

The form critics equated memory with individual eye-witness recollection. While memory traces of this sort lay at the origins of the tradition, they were a residuum, largely inert with respect to developments in the tradition itself. The salient image was of so-called authentic memories of Jesus coming to be buried under multiple layers of “tradition.” Tradition, in other words, had little to do with memory. William Wrede’s

---

<sup>1</sup> Edward S. Casey, Remembering: A Phenomenological Study (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987), 269.

<sup>2</sup> Frederick C. Bartlett, Remembering: A Study in Experimental and Social Psychology (1932; repr., Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995), 214; also George A. Bonanno, “Remembering and Psychotherapy,” Psychotherapy 27 (1990): 175–186, esp. 175.

<sup>3</sup> Casey, Remembering, 277.

bifurcation of Markan tradition into surviving elements of empirical history on the one hand and Easter-engendered dogma on the other, with the latter occluding the former, was precursor to the form critics' model. Of a "historical view of the real life of Jesus," wrote Wrede, only "pale residues" survive.<sup>4</sup> The analytical task, therefore, was like refining metals from slag: "[H]ow do we separate what belongs properly to Jesus from what is the material of the primitive community?"<sup>5</sup> Bultmann adopted this view of the tradition, positing, for example, that underlying the passion narrative there existed "a short narrative of historical reminiscence about the Arrest, Condemnation, and Execution of Jesus," which had been overgrown and "disfigured" by legend.<sup>6</sup> Martin Dibelius correlated the "Paradigms" chronologically with the period of the eyewitnesses, with eyewitness recollections assigned a role, not in the formation of the tradition itself, but as a sort of external control.<sup>7</sup>

Bultmann connected the formation of tradition with recurrent social settings associated with the life of the early communities. In attributing crucial importance to a community's present social realities in its conceptualizations of the past, Bultmann's approach aligned with a central postulate of memory theory (see below). However, correlating form closely with sociological function, and assuming that the eschatological communities lacked a constitutive orientation to the past, he inferred that contemporary social dynamics were the primary factor in generating the tradition. The gospel tradition was thus construed as a bifurcated entity: fabricated tradition coming to overlay diminishing residues of memory, for their part more or less inert with respect to the traditioning process itself. Tradition thus conceived primarily gave expression to the contemporary debates, predicaments, and developments of the early church.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>4</sup> William Wrede, The Messianic Secret, trans. J. C. G. Greig (London: James Clarke, 1971), 131. Analysis of this trend can be pushed back to D. F. Strauss; see Jens Schröter, "Von der Historizität der Evangelien: Ein Beitrag zur gegenwärtigen Diskussion um den historischen Jesus," in Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektive der gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. Jens Schröter and Ralph Brucker (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002), 163–212, esp. 169–173.

<sup>5</sup> Wrede, Messianic Secret, 4.

<sup>6</sup> Rudolf Bultmann, The History of the Synoptic Tradition, trans. John Marsh (New York: Harper & Row, 1968), 273–274.

<sup>7</sup> Martin Dibelius, From Tradition to Gospel, trans. Bertram Lee Woolf (London: Redwood, 1971), 61–62.

<sup>8</sup> Bultmann acknowledged in a footnote that "memories of Jesus, his words and deeds played their part in the literary productions of the early Church" (History, 48 n. 2), but it is clear he assigned these—viewed as individual recollections—no significant role in the formation of the tradition.

Bultmann's analysis was in fact characterized by a programmatic disconnect between memory and the growing tradition, his occasional gestures to "reminiscence" notwithstanding. This was the consequence of according to memory little agency and instead locating the decisive generative forces for tradition in contemporary social factors. In Bultmann's additive model, dominical sayings were the tradition's primary point of departure. But authentic sayings, in his view, exercised only an anemic influence upon the expanding tradition, and accordingly he found it "difficult to believe that the changes and revaluation of such meshalim as are to be found in the tradition have in fact retained some reminiscence of such changes and revaluations by Jesus."<sup>9</sup> Moreover, this inertness made possible, indeed necessary, the large-scale incorporation of inauthentic sayings into the Jesus tradition to meet the challenges of contemporary social realities.<sup>10</sup> In consequence, Jesus' radically distinctive message could now be heard only faintly. Bultmann was far from denying all continuity whatsoever between authentic sayings and developments in the tradition. Extraneous materials and community practices often displayed significant congruence with dominical pronouncements. The dogmatic belief in Jesus as Messiah, moreover, did not eradicate the memory of Jesus' "actual work as a teacher of the Law," and this inspired confidence that many of Jesus' sayings about the Law had been preserved.<sup>11</sup> However, on this point also Bultmann's conception of memory—its trace-like existence and marginality vis-à-vis other forces generating the tradition—emerged, for this "picture [of Jesus as rabbi], which must have been distinctly impressed on their memory... was gradually thrust into the background by the figure of the Messiah."<sup>12</sup>

Bultmann accordingly construed the history of the gospel traditions as a sequence of "stages."<sup>13</sup> Each stage generated its own tradition and subsequent stages stood in discontinuity with preceding stages. Hence Bultmann's analytical project was to "clearly distinguish," "separate" the tradition in accordance with these stages.<sup>14</sup> Again, such a procedure was entailed in locating the decisive forces in the creation of tradition in the

---

<sup>9</sup> Bultmann, History, 101.

<sup>10</sup> Ibid., 105.

<sup>11</sup> Rudolf Bultmann, Jesus and the Word, trans. Louise Pettibone Smith and Erminie Huntress Lantero (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1958), 125–126.

<sup>12</sup> Bultmann, Jesus, 126.

<sup>13</sup> Bultmann, History, 155.

<sup>14</sup> Bultmann, Jesus, 12.

changing social contexts of the various communities. Particularly notable was his distribution of the tradition into Palestinian and Hellenistic stages respectively, traditions from the latter standing in “distinction” from those of the former.<sup>15</sup> The social and cultural realities of the Hellenistic milieu generated corollary traditions that superimposed upon the older Palestinian tradition, “impressing it with a meaning such as it needed in the Hellenistic Churches. . . .”<sup>16</sup> Notable, in other words, was the inertia of the Palestinian tradition as it and its particular portrayal of Jesus were commandeered by the religionsgeschichtliche forces of syncretistic Hellenism. The Gospel of Mark was the resulting artifact: a “cult legend” that combined the κύριος Christ-myth of the Hellenistic cult “with the tradition of the story of Jesus.”<sup>17</sup> Accordingly, “the Christ who is preached is not the historic Jesus, but the Christ of faith and the cult.”<sup>18</sup> In its terminal point in Mark the tradition had moved a distance quite remote from the memory traces that lay at its origins. Given this scenario the task of historical Jesus research was to move back through the developmental stages of the tradition, bracketing materials that could be designated “Hellenistic” as well as other materials that expressed the interests of the church. With the goal being “to distinguish the oldest layer,”<sup>19</sup> the form critics’ procedure was to identify and discard accreted materials and arrive at the authentic residue through application of the dissimilarity criterion, the “original form” axiom, and the so-called laws or “tendencies” of the tradition.

Bultmann put a great deal of effort into defining these tendencies that, in his view, had likewise been key factors in the creation of tradition, for isolating the auto-operations propelling the tradition’s “immanent urge to development”<sup>20</sup> gave him precision tools for further unraveling its history, in particular prior to its fixation in the written sources. These included, for example, the attribution of specific names and labels within a tradition originally marked by anonymity. Others could be sub-categorized under a broad evolutionary tendency of the tradition to develop from simple to complex forms, and apophthegms

<sup>15</sup> Bultmann, Jesus, 13; idem, History, 239.

<sup>16</sup> Bultmann, History, 347.

<sup>17</sup> Ibid., 347–348.

<sup>18</sup> Ibid., 371; also Dibelius, Tradition to Gospel, 297–300.

<sup>19</sup> Martin Dibelius, Jesus, trans. Charles B. Hedrick and Frederick C. Grant (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1949), 34.

<sup>20</sup> Bultmann, History, 373.

had a tendency to differentiate into variants.<sup>21</sup> This positing of innate tendencies reflected the form-critical conception of the tradition as a development away from original memory traces under the impulse of not just external but also immanent forces. The development of the gospel tradition, in other words, was driven by virtually every force except the salient past itself.

Little of this tradition model can survive scrutiny in light of advances in research on the phenomenology of tradition. The primary factors producing tradition variants are not innate tendencies but social and cultural variables inhering in the settings in which tradition is repeatedly enacted. On these grounds alone the confidence that knowledge of the tradition's "tendencies" opened up paths allowing the critic to move back through its oral stages to isolate earlier forms and perhaps even an authentic residuum was misplaced. Moreover, Bultmann grounded the tendencies of the oral tradition in evidence from written sources. The "tendency of the tradition to enlarge upon older sayings" was established by reference to Ben Sirach, who "combined and enlarged" collections of popular sayings.<sup>22</sup> As regards his claim that proper names and specific labels displace primitive anonymity in the transmission of apophthegms, Bultmann connected up Mark, Matthew, John, and then novelistic developments in the apocrypha into a trajectory to infer this as an inherent tendency of the oral tradition.<sup>23</sup> His derivation of oral tendencies from redactional operations was predicated on his view that "there is no difference in principle" between oral and written processes.<sup>24</sup>

The oral-written juncture, however, is better construed as a break than a continuum, in Jens Schröter's words, "als eine Veränderung im Überlieferungsprozeß."<sup>25</sup> John Miles Foley characterizes writing and orality as distinct communication "channels" or "media."<sup>26</sup> Literary trafficking with oral tradition entails a displacement of oral dynamics, even if the written artifact is composed for oral enactment. The written medium enables new ways for working with tradition, such as incorporation

<sup>21</sup> Bultmann, History, 52–53, 62–68, 85–89, 199.

<sup>22</sup> Ibid., 88–89.

<sup>23</sup> Ibid., 68.

<sup>24</sup> Ibid., 6, 87.

<sup>25</sup> Jens Schröter, Erinnerung an Jesu Worte: Studien zur Rezeption der Logienüberlieferung in Markus, Q und Thomas, WMANT 76 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1997), 464.

<sup>26</sup> John Miles Foley, Homer's Traditional Art (University Park: The Pennsylvania State University Press, 1999), 4.

within comprehensive literary frameworks and reworking not under the immediate exigencies of performance settings but in the service of mediated redactional programs. The emblematic multiformity of oral tradition arises from enactment and transmission strategies equal to the immediacy and immateriality of oral communication. Literary editorial operations, therefore, are not prescriptive for the oral medium, and to take them to be so, as Bultmann did, was regrettably to inject into scholarship some quite misleading notions about the history of the gospel tradition.<sup>27</sup> Tradition histories are only possible where the existence of parallel traditions in written sources permits analysis of priority. This is to say that the oral tradition and its history cannot be viewed except through the opacity of the written medium; in other words, “one cannot go beyond the different versions and contextualizations of a saying into the oral phase of transmission.”<sup>28</sup> This spells the end of the form-critical project of arriving at memory traces of the historical Jesus thought to lie near the bottom of a multilayered oral tradition.

Critique of the form-critical model for tradition is hardly a novel enterprise. Our approach has been to assess the model, which in its various permutations still functions as the cognitive framework for much historical Jesus research, in terms of its operative conceptions of memory. We have seen that the form critics, to the extent they reflected on it at all, associated memory with individual eyewitness recollections. These lay as inert traces at the origins of a tradition whose formation and development took place at the primary behest of other factors. Hence the distinguishing of so-called authentic memory from fabricated tradition is the hallmark of historical Jesus analyses indebted to the form-critical model.

The next section will offer a précis of social and cultural memory approaches that subsequently will be integrated with our discussion of research on the cognitive aspects of memory.<sup>29</sup> We will see that memory theory gives firm methodological grounding to Jesus research by supplying it with a defensible account of the origins and history of the gospel traditions.

---

<sup>27</sup> In the new introduction to his classic work that first comprehensively articulated this critique, Werner Kelber summarizes the form critical conception of the history of the gospel tradition with its underlying “print mentality” thus: “[T]he gospel composition is imagined as a revision of antecedent texts carried out with such literary precision and ideological correctness that it enables us to retrace tradition, stratum by stratum” (The Oral and the Written Gospel: The Hermeneutics of Speaking and Writing in the Synoptic Tradition, Mark, Paul, and Q [1983; repr., with a new introduction by Werner Kelber, Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1997], xxii). Kelber also has been the pioneer in recognition of the essential connection between memory and tradition.

<sup>28</sup> Jens Schröter, “The Historical Jesus and the Sayings Tradition: Comments on Current Research,” Neot 30 (1996): 151–168, esp. 157.

2. Memory, Identity, and Community

Social memory studies originated with Maurice Halbwachs (1877–1945), a disciple of Emile Durkheim.<sup>30</sup> Halbwachs argued that memory is constituted by social frameworks, which is to say that the social realities and communicative practices of communities give substance, shape, and duration to the memory of the people belonging to them. Memory emerges in coherent, durable form to the extent remembrances find articulation in communicative interaction within a group; conversely, individual remembrances fade to the extent they are not pertinent to the groups that individuals are affiliated with. Correspondingly, a community bears a complex of memories constitutive of its very existence. “Genuine communities,” writes Jeffrey Olick, “are communities of memory that constantly tell and retell their constitutive memories.”<sup>31</sup> A community marks certain elements of its past as being of constitutive significance, in particular, memories of its origins, “the event that marks the group’s emergence as an independent social entity.”<sup>32</sup> Both identity and continuity, in fact the very survival of a community, depend upon its constant revitalization of these memories.<sup>33</sup>

<sup>29</sup> For a fuller survey of contemporary social and cultural memory theory see Alan Kirk, “Social and Cultural Memory,” in Memory, Tradition, Text: Uses of the Past in Early Christianity, ed. Alan Kirk and Tom Thatcher, Semeia Studies 52 (Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2005), 1–24.

<sup>30</sup> Maurice Halbwachs, The Collective Memory, trans. Francis J. Ditter Jr. and Vida Yazdi Ditter (New York: Harper & Row, 1980), originally published as La mémoire collective (Paris: Presses Universitaires, 1950); idem, On Collective Memory, ed. and trans. Lewis A. Coser (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992), originally published as Les cadres sociaux de la mémoire (Paris: Presses Universitaires, 1952; 1st ed. 1925).

<sup>31</sup> Jeffrey K. Olick, “Collective Memory: The Two Cultures,” Sociological Theory 17 (1999): 333–348, esp. 344; also James Fentress and Chris Wickham, Social Memory (Cambridge: Blackwell, 1992), 25.

<sup>32</sup> Yael Zerubavel, Recovered Roots: Collective Memory and the Making of Israeli National Tradition (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995), 4–7.

<sup>33</sup> Jan Assmann, Das kulturelle Gedächtnis: Schrift, Erinnerung und politische Identität in frühen Hochkulturen (Munich: Beck, 1992), 132–133.

Accordingly, commemoration is a core activity of viable communities. Commemorative practice counteracts the danger of rupture between a community and its past, the loss of memory that spells the unraveling of its identity and hence its dissolution.<sup>34</sup> Commemoration, in Kirk Savage's words, attempts "to fix the meaning and purpose" of the past (emphasis added).<sup>35</sup> Commemoration picks up "bedrock events experienced with powerful immediacy" but whose meaning and significance must be discerned, precisely through commemorative activities.<sup>36</sup> This entails that through its commemorative activities a community fashions its representations of its formative past.<sup>37</sup>

That memory is highly active and constructive should now be clear. Memory "acts to organize what might otherwise be a mere assemblage of contingently connected events."<sup>38</sup> Its configurations, however, do not thereby assume immobile form. The activity of memory in articulating the past is unceasing because it takes place within the social frameworks of the ever-shifting present. Halbwachs argued that to remember is not to retrouver, but to reconstruire, to align the image of the past with present social realities.<sup>39</sup> Differential attribution of meaning to the past, a core activity of memory, proceeds from and serves the conditions of the present. Barry Schwartz points out that collective memory thus becomes "a social fact as it is made and remade to serve changing societal interests and needs."<sup>40</sup> However, it is by constantly bringing its commemorated past into alignment with its open-ended series of "presents" that a community maintains continuity of identity across time, a sense of always being vitally connected to its past.<sup>41</sup>

---

<sup>34</sup> Casey, Remembering, 224–225; also Yosef Yerushalmi, Zakhor: Jewish History and Jewish Memory (Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1982), 94; Paul Connerton, How Societies Remember (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989), 70.

<sup>35</sup> Kirk Savage, "The Politics of Memory: Black Emancipation and the Civil War Movement," in Commemorations: The Politics of National Identity, ed. John R. Gillis (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1994), 127–149, esp. 127.

<sup>36</sup> Roy Rosenzweig and David Thelen, The Presence of the Past: Popular Uses of Memory in American Life (New York: Columbia University Press, 1998), 67.

<sup>37</sup> Barry Schwartz, Abraham Lincoln and the Forge of National Memory (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2000), 306.

<sup>38</sup> Casey, Remembering, 291.

<sup>39</sup> Halbwachs, On Collective Memory, 40.

<sup>40</sup> Barry Schwartz, "Memory as a Cultural System: Abraham Lincoln in World War II," ASR 61 (1996): 908–927, esp. 909.

<sup>41</sup> Assmann, Das kulturelle Gedächtnis, 40–42, 88.

Powerful forces are at work in the present contexts of a community to shape particular versions of its formative past. In a manner reminiscent of the form critics, some theorists go so far as to suggest that constructions of the past may in all important respects be understood as projections of the ideological factors of the present.<sup>42</sup> However, it is doubtful that strong constructionist approaches of this sort can be generalized into paradigmatic models for memory and tradition. Such tend a priori to exclude inquiry into the diachronic question, namely, how the depth of the past might inform, shape, and constrain the dispositions and actions of those situated in the present.<sup>43</sup> Arjun Appadurai argues that the past is not just “a limitless and plastic symbolic resource, infinitely susceptible to the whims of contemporary interest and the distortions of contemporary ideology.”<sup>44</sup> While communities (and for that matter individuals) view and shape their past from perspectives and identities grounded in their present contexts, that identity has emerged from the diachronic depth of memory.<sup>45</sup> It is this identity that orients to the experiences of the present and that encompasses the predispositions for a community’s continual reassessment of its own past.

This may be stated as follows: The past, constellated by the work of commemoration and immanent in the narrative patterns in which it has become engrained in the social memory, provides for a community and its members the framework for cognition and interpretation of the experiences of the present.<sup>46</sup> Social memory makes available the moral and symbolic resources for making sense of the present through what Schwartz refers to as its “keying” of present experiences and predicaments to archetypal images and narrative representations of the commemorated past.<sup>47</sup> This entails that both present social realities and the salient past are potent variables in these semiotic constructions constantly occurring in social memory.<sup>48</sup>

---

<sup>42</sup> John Bodnar, Remaking America: Public Memory, Commemoration, and Patriotism in the Twentieth Century (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1992), 15.

<sup>43</sup> Schwartz, “Memory as a Cultural System,” 910; Jeffrey K. Olick and Daniel Levy, “Collective Memory and Cultural Constraint: Holocaust Myth and Rationality in German Politics,” ASR 62 (1997): 921–936, esp. 922.

<sup>44</sup> Arjun Appadurai, “The Past as a Scarce Resource,” Man NS 16 (1981): 201–219, esp. 201.

<sup>45</sup> Fentress and Wickham, Social Memory, 126.

<sup>46</sup> Ibid., 51; Connerton, How Societies Remember, 2.

<sup>47</sup> Barry Schwartz, “Frame Image: Towards a Semiotics of Collective Memory,” Semiotica 121 (1998): 1–38.

<sup>48</sup> See Olick and Levy, “Collective Memory,” 923.

A community's commemorated past exerts powerful normative force. This is to say that its images of archetypal persons and events embody a group's moral order and thus are mnemonic of group-defining norms.<sup>49</sup> The normativity of the past is central to what Jan Assmann refers to as the "mythomotorisch" effect of the cultural memory, driving a community's continual articulation of itself, along the lines of its constitutive norms, in the midst of changing realities and in the face of emerging crises.<sup>50</sup> Hence a synergistic relationship exists between commemorative and hortatory activities. Deaths of significant persons call forth commemorative activities focused in a particularly intense way upon the norms and virtues these individuals embodied in life and in their death. A martyr's death is instrumental in establishing the urgent normative claims of the virtues he or she embodied and died exemplifying, and in mobilizing a social movement cohering around those norms.<sup>51</sup>

Commemorative activities, therefore, drive the formation and transmission of cultural identity. Social memory fashions a "Symbolsystem," which is to say that in commemorated persons, commemorative narratives, and related artifacts and practices, it objectifies a community's archetypal, axiomatic meanings and norms. Through commemorative transposition a community elevates to symbolic, identity-constituting status marked elements of its past. The "symbolische Figuren" of culture are in effect "Erinnerungsfiguren" (memory configurations).<sup>52</sup> These commemorative symbols seem inexhaustibly responsive hermeneutically to complexity and change in a community's social realities. The revisionist and socialist camps within early Zionism, for example, debated fiercely whether the martyrdom of the settler Trumpeldor authorized the sword or the plough, armed resistance or settlement and agriculture as a program for national revitalization. "It was not the historical event per se, but rather the encoding of its symbolic meaning that provided fuel to this controversy."<sup>53</sup> It is this hermeneutical responsive-

---

<sup>49</sup> Halbwachs, On Collective Memory, 59; Assmann, Das kulturelle Gedächtnis, 16–17; idem, Religion und kulturelles Gedächtnis: Zehn Studien (Munich: Beck, 2000), 127–128.

<sup>50</sup> Assmann, Das kulturelle Gedächtnis, 79–80, 168–169.

<sup>51</sup> Halbwachs, On Collective Memory, 175; Zerubavel, Recovered Roots, 28–29; Conerton, How Societies Remember, 43.

<sup>52</sup> Assmann, Das kulturelle Gedächtnis, 52–59, 139–140; also Schwartz, Abraham Lincoln, x–xi, 17–18; idem, "Frame Image," 25–26; Fentress and Wickham, Social Memory, 59; Halbwachs, On Collective Memory, 188–189.

<sup>53</sup> Zerubavel, Recovered Roots, 157.

ness of commemorative symbols that gives rise to the sentiment that salient pasts are little more than ideological projections of the present. However, commemorative projects are dependent upon the core realities they take up, though the nature of this dependence from case to case cannot be a priori prescribed. Robin Wagner-Pacifiçi points out that memorializing activities are ignited by “ordering” persons and events, that is, “fraught with conflict and significance” on the larger social scale.<sup>54</sup> Persons and events of this sort form the “adamantine core” of commemoration, generating and shaping the interpretations that can be produced upon them across time.<sup>55</sup> Wagner-Pacifiçi further argues that commemorative artifacts emerge from the interaction among three factors, namely, “the social realities of empirical events, the cultural realities of modes of generic encodings, and the political and aesthetic realities of the work of translators,” the latter being those who effect the transformation of empirical realities into the various artifactual forms of cultural memory.<sup>56</sup>

Social memory, to borrow Appadurai’s phrase, may therefore be understood as the “symbolic negotiation between ‘ritual’ pasts and the contingencies of the present.”<sup>57</sup> Olick and Levy express this principle as follows: “Collective memory is this negotiation, rather than pure constraint by, or contemporary strategic manipulation of, the past. . . . The relationship between remembered pasts and constructed presents is one of perpetual but differentiated constraint and renegotiation over time, rather than pure strategic invention in the present or fidelity to (or inability to escape from) a monolithic legacy.”<sup>58</sup> Schwartz describes memory as being simultaneously a “model of” and a “model for” society.<sup>59</sup> “In its reflective (model of) aspect, memory is an expressive symbol—a language, as it were, for articulating present predicaments; in its second (model for) aspect, memory is an orienting symbol—a map that gets us through these predicaments by relating where we are to where we have been.”<sup>60</sup>

The pertinence of social and cultural memory analysis for clarifying the phenomenology of the gospel tradition should be evident. Along

---

<sup>54</sup> Robin Wagner-Pacifiçi, “Memories in the Making: The Shape of Things that Went,” QS (1996): 301–321, esp. 302–303.

<sup>55</sup> Schwartz, Abraham Lincoln, 309; also Casey, Remembering, 286.

<sup>56</sup> Wagner-Pacifiçi, “Memories in the Making,” 308–309.

<sup>57</sup> Appadurai, “Past as a Scarce Resource,” 218.

<sup>58</sup> Olick and Levy, “Collective Memory,” 934.

<sup>59</sup> Schwartz, Abraham Lincoln, 18; similarly Casey, Remembering, 284.

<sup>60</sup> Schwartz, “Memory as a Cultural System,” 910.

with its negation of passivistic and individualistic models for memory, it rules out the sharp distinction the form critics made between memory and tradition. Rather, the gospel tradition may be understood as the artifact of memory, of the continual negotiation and semantic engagement between a community's present social realities and its memorialized past, with neither factor swallowed up by or made epiphenomenal of the other.<sup>61</sup>

Memory approaches, therefore, make it possible to overcome the polarities of constructionism (tradition as the product of a community's present social realities), and passivism (tradition as a transparent representation of empirical events of the past). By the same token, a social memory model accounts for the proliferation of transformations in the tradition, for as the artifact of memory dynamics tradition is responsive hermeneutically to the social frameworks of its reception. What memory analysis rejects, however, is the denial or even downplaying of vital connections between developments in the tradition and a community's salient past. Rather, it analyzes these very transformations in terms of the charged engagement of that normative past, laid down in tradition, with the present social frameworks of the tradent community. Bultmann, for example, attributed the tense dialogue about forgiveness of sins (Mark 2:5–10), an interpolation into the more primitive story of the Healing of the Paralytic (Mark 2:1–12), to the desire of the "Church . . . to trace back to Jesus its own right to forgive sins."<sup>62</sup> The secondary element, that is, was generated by the present interests of the church. But criticism informed by memory approaches, while perhaps not disputing per se this tradition-history, would question whether the community's right to forgive sins could be accounted for apart from some reference to the salient past. This would entail inquiry into how the community's salient past has furnished it with the moral and symbolic resources for perceiving and mastering its contemporary crises and predicaments.

Social memory analysis, therefore, hardly amounts to drawing naïve correspondences between "memory" and "history." Rather, it provides a research framework for assessing the origins and transformations of the gospel tradition in terms of the constitutive orientation of the Jesus-communities to a commemorated past. The pressing historiographical question, however, is how one might move from memory, of which tradition is the multiform artifact, to history. A methodological response to this problem has been attempted by Jens Schröter. Schröter's approach is predicated upon the semantic vigor of the constitutive past and the effect of present social realities that give particular refractions to that past, as well as upon recognition that the past is accessible only through those refractions. Consequently, one cannot speak about the historical Jesus apart from the acts of reception in the early communities.<sup>63</sup> Common traits perduring in Mark, Q, and Thomas as well as the acts of reception themselves become the basis for Schröter to draw inferences about the lineaments of a historical past that exerts a charged influence upon all three reception contexts.<sup>64</sup> Aware that every act of traditioning is an act of remembering in which past and present semantically interact, Schröter's approach instead of discounting exploits interpretive reconstructions of the tradition to draw inferences about Jesus.

---

<sup>61</sup> See Schröter, Erinnerung, 463.

<sup>62</sup> Bultmann, History, 15–16.

Schröter restricts himself to a triangulating analysis of complexes of tradition found in the written sources. Mark and Q nevertheless stand near the threshold with orality. In them oral tradition, to be sure worked over within new literary contexts and hence with earlier reception-contexts effaced, is to an extent still visible.<sup>65</sup> Working back diachronically through "stages" of the oral tradition, we have seen, is nonsensical. Nevertheless it would be a mistake to turn away prematurely from the oral gospel tradition, such as we have it. Memory theory has a great deal to say about the formation and transmission of oral tradition, as well as about the crux problem of the transition from oral to written media. At this point, research on the cognitive aspects of memory becomes pertinent.

3. Cognitive Approaches to Memory and Tradition

Gospels scholarship, to the limited extent it even reflects upon memory and the transmission of tradition, tends to conceive it in terms of serial communication along chains of isolated individuals, in accord with its

---

<sup>63</sup> Schröter, "Historical Jesus," 165.

<sup>64</sup> Idem, Erinnerung, 142, 483–485.

<sup>65</sup> John Miles Foley's category oral-derived texts, which designates written artifacts characterized by complex interactions of orality and literacy, is pertinent here. See Homer's Traditional Art, 4; and idem, The Singer of Tales in Performance (Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1995), 210–211.

conception of memory as individual recollection. We need only to reference the serious comparison of the transmission of gospel traditions to the children's game "Telephone" made by Bart Ehrman in his widely used college introduction to the New Testament to give a sense of the current understanding of this problem in gospels scholarship.<sup>66</sup> In fact, remarkably little attention is paid to how this individuals-seriatim model might be coordinated with the account of the formation and history of the gospel tradition worked out by the form critics and in important respects still standard in the discipline.

Occasionally one finds attempts to support the individuals-seriatim model by reference to studies on the cognitive operations of memory, and in particular to experiments by F. C. Bartlett.<sup>67</sup> Bartlett tested individual recollection by asking individuals to reproduce a story, after one or two exposures, multiple times at lengthening intervals. He concluded that "remembering is rapidly affected by unwitting transformations: accurate recall is the exception and not the rule."<sup>68</sup> He also tested "serial reproduction" along a chain of individuals, with this result: "[S]erial reproduction normally brings about startling and radical alterations in the material dealt with... nearly every possible variation seems as if it can take place, even in a relatively short series." He concluded, quite rightly, that human memory "is normally exceedingly subject to error."<sup>69</sup>

Bartlett's results from his transmission experiments, however, are hardly pertinent to the gospel tradition. They correspond to the artificial lab environment of seriatim transmission of random information down a chain of randomly selected individuals with no social connections to one another and, therefore, as David Rubin states, tell us more about rumor transmission or "party games" than about the cultivation of

---

<sup>66</sup> Bart D. Ehrman, The New Testament: A Historical Introduction to the Early Christian Writings, 2nd ed. (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000), 46–47. Robert Funk and Roy Hoover may also be taken as typical: "The evidence provided by the written gospels is hearsay evidence. Hearsay evidence is secondhand evidence. In the case of the gospels, the evangelists are all reporting stories and sayings related to them by intermediate parties; none of them was an ear or eyewitness of the words and events he records. Indeed, the information may have passed through several parties on its way to the authors of the first written gospels" (The Five Gospels [New York: Macmillan, 1993], 16). Out of this are worked up weighty "rules of evidence" of the sort relevant to cross-examination of individual recollection in a courtroom setting.

<sup>67</sup> John Crossan appeals to Bartlett's experiment (The Birth of Christianity [San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1998], 82).

<sup>68</sup> Bartlett, Remembering, 61.

<sup>69</sup> Ibid., 175.

memory and tradition within communities.<sup>70</sup> Rubin points out that “transmission in oral traditions... is much more complex and much more conducive to stable transmission.”<sup>71</sup> In contrast to the one or two exposures that initiated the lab experiments in recall, cultivation of oral traditions is characterized by “overlearning,” that is, “numerous intermittent repetitions by different members of the group,” by “recitation” in performance mode, and by “spaced practice,” all of which have been experimentally shown to be “important factors in improving long-term retention.”<sup>72</sup> In addition, cultivation of tradition is an enterprise of communities, not isolated individuals. Tradition is enacted within a group knowledgeable of and existentially identified with it; its performance is a shared ritual rehearsal of the cultural memory.

The social dimension of memory and tradition entails, moreover, that transmission does not occur down seriatim “chains” of individuals at all, as Bartlett’s experiment had it, but along far more complex “nets” the very complexity of which, Rubin states, “leads to greater stability of transmission than would be expected from laboratory research.”<sup>73</sup> He explains the distinctions as follows:

For a single individual, the chain [model of transmission] would have a single line leading in and a single line leading out. In contrast, for a single individual, the net would have an indefinite number of lines leading in and out. . . . That is, the difference between chains and nets is that in a chain an individual hears only one version and transmits it to only one other person, whereas in a net individuals can hear and combine many versions before passing on their own version any number of times to any number of people.<sup>74</sup>

This has a mnemonically reinforcing and stabilizing effect: “The main advantage of a net over a chain is that if the version transmitted by one singer omits parts or introduces changes that are outside the tradition, then other versions can be substituted for these lapses. . . . Multiple versions from many sources serve another purpose. They allow a listener to

---

<sup>70</sup> David C. Rubin, Memory in Oral Traditions: The Cognitive Psychology of Epic, Ballads, and Counting-Out Rhymes (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1995), 122. Bartlett readily acknowledged that “much human remembering is influenced directly and strongly by factors which are social in origin. The influence of these factors may be obscured by the ordinary laboratory methods of the study of memory” (Remembering, 95).

<sup>71</sup> Rubin, Memory in Oral Traditions, 132.

<sup>72</sup> Ibid., 129, 154, 228.

<sup>73</sup> Ibid., 144.

<sup>74</sup> Ibid., 134.

learn the range of acceptable variation.”<sup>75</sup> Transmission along nets, taken with its overall community contextualization, leads to the insight that the precariousness of memory and tradition exists not at each of the multiple points of a putative individual-to-individual seriatim chain but chiefly in the crisis brought about by a community’s generational succession, a threshold that Assmann designates as a “Traditionsbruch” that constitutes a “Krise in der kollektiven Erinnerung.”<sup>76</sup> We will return to this subject below.

Far from being helplessly exposed to the frailties of human memory so well documented in Bartlett’s experiments, oral tradition is better viewed as a set of strategies calibrated precisely to counter these frailties.<sup>77</sup> At stake is nothing less than cultural survival. As the deposit of a community’s formative narratives and normative wisdom,<sup>78</sup> tradition must be proof against the limitations of human memory. In Rubin’s words, “Oral traditions must, therefore, have developed forms of organization (i.e., rules, redundancies, constraints) and strategies to decrease the changes that human memory imposes on the more casual transmission of verbal material.”<sup>79</sup> In addition to the learning and retention strategies that have already been mentioned, the formation of oral tradition can be understood in terms of memory’s cognitive operations that render memory an extraordinarily efficient faculty.

Researchers have pointed to memory’s radical economizing activity. Bonanno states, “[T]he myriad of possible experiential stimuli necessitates that the memory system be prudent. For the purposes of economy, experiences are catalogued schematically into categories, scripts and prototypical units of knowledge.”<sup>80</sup> Exact recall of experiences would entail unmanageable surfeits of detail, inducing, as Casey puts it, “that state of clutter and confusion which Luria’s subject . . . reported as a living nightmare.”<sup>81</sup> Memory in other words is in the literal sense a cognitive artificer that renders the raw material of experience and perception

---

<sup>75</sup> Rubin, Memory in Oral Traditions, 134.

<sup>76</sup> Assmann, Das kulturelle Gedächtnis, 218.

<sup>77</sup> Rubin, Memory in Oral Traditions, 144.

<sup>78</sup> Assmann, Das kulturelle Gedächtnis, 141–142.

<sup>79</sup> Rubin, Memory in Oral Traditions, 10.

<sup>80</sup> Bonanno, “Remembering and Psychotherapy,” 177.

<sup>81</sup> Casey, Remembering, 285, referring to A. R. Luria’s study of an individual with savant capabilities of exact recall, in whom external sensory cues triggered overwhelming cascades of detailed remembrances, inducing a kind of cognitive paralysis; see The Mind of a Mnemonist, trans. Lynn Solotaroff (New York: Basic Books, 1968).

into manageable, efficient memory artifacts. Bartlett observed this cognitive tendency towards the rapid condensation of remembered stories into concise, economical units through the elimination of details.<sup>82</sup> Rubin compares the newspaper report of an actual train wreck with its commemorative version in the ballad The Wreck of the Old 97 and its variants: “The article was divided into 100 facts. . . . On the average, only 6 of these 100 facts appeared in each ballad, producing ballads in which only the essentials were preserved.”<sup>83</sup> Rubin points out that memory operates “to abstract and remember the structure from many similar events,” that is, memory compounds multiple related remembrances into single, frequently composite memories that take on emblematic, representational functions.<sup>84</sup> This economizing activity of memory likewise accounts for the fading out of precise times, durations, and locales of discrete experiences into more indeterminate spatio-temporal frameworks, for example, “last year. . . .” Locales for their part act as clustering points and hence important mnemonic cues for emblematic memories associated with them. This accounts for what Casey describes as the “pastiche” character of memory’s representations of the past: “Between and around the stably situated and relatively well-defined locales of memories are undefined and unlocalized patches of space. . . . Thanks to their very gappiness, memories can be considered pastiches of the past—never its full spatial re-presentation.”<sup>85</sup>

Another cognitive operation performed by memory is conventionalization or schematization, which refers to the rapid reduction of diffusely complex experiences to stereotyped forms and scripts that act as mnemonic mechanisms for their reproduction as memory.<sup>86</sup> This works in close tandem with condensing operations, for as memory reduces empirical remembrances to a type, details “not. . . adding to the representational significance of the whole” are dropped.<sup>87</sup> Rubin’s case study cited above is illuminating in this regard: “Almost 60% of the lines produced could have occurred. . . in a ballad about another train wreck. . . . Thus much of the text of the generated ballads followed a general pattern,

---

<sup>82</sup> Bartlett, Remembering, 126–127.

<sup>83</sup> Rubin, Memory in Oral Traditions, 284.

<sup>84</sup> Ibid., 7; also Larry R. Squire and Eric R. Kandel, Memory: From Mind to Molecules (New York: Scientific American Library, 1999), 46.

<sup>85</sup> Casey, Remembering, 72–75.

<sup>86</sup> Bartlett, Remembering, 53–54, 63, 83, et passim.

<sup>87</sup> Ibid., 106–107.

including just enough facts that fit the existing ballad pattern to keep the song unique.”<sup>88</sup> We see that assimilation to a type entails significant distancing from the actual empirical realities. It must be stressed though that this distancing is itself a mnemonic and pragmatic strategy. The human mind as we noted is exceedingly inefficient at retaining and reproducing the details of uninterrupted streams of experience. “Memory work,” writes Schwartz, “like a lens filters extraneous materials the better for us to see the kinds of recollecting relevant to our purposes.”<sup>89</sup> We have seen that memory’s radical reduction of detail is what makes possible its efficient operation in the first place. Conformity to formulaic types gives memories simplicity and coherence, enables their categorization, and thereby aids their subsequent recollection. Likewise, with conventionalization of memories comes their greater impregnability to change.<sup>90</sup>

This review of the cognitive operations of memory brings to mind salient features of oral-traditional genres. Here we find ourselves at the place where the cognitive functions of memory intersect with social and cultural memory dynamics. Rubin in fact analyzes genres of oral tradition precisely as mnemonic strategies. Before continuing with this line of inquiry, however, we may pause to bring out more clearly the pertinence of this research to analysis of the gospel traditions. Cognitive operations of memory, such as economy of presentation, compounding, temporally indeterminate framing, and schematizing in a typology of forms correspond to characteristic features of the synoptic tradition. These were acutely observed and catalogued by the form critics.<sup>91</sup> Bultmann noted the “gappiness” or “pastiche” (to use Casey’s terms) effect resulting from these modes of representing the past, persisting even beyond the efforts of the evangelists to create contiguity.<sup>92</sup> Both Bultmann and Dibelius posited the existence of initial processes from which the tradition, particularly in its definitive form of the pronouncement story, emerged. But having discounted vital connections of tradition

---

<sup>88</sup> Rubin, Memory in Oral Traditions, 284. It is important, however, to avoid relapse into notions of “historical residue” or “abbreviated history” as models for the relationship of the tradition artifact to history. Memory transformations are more like alchemy (see below).

<sup>89</sup> Barry Schwartz, “Jesus in First-Century Memory—A Response,” in Memory, Tradition, Text, ed. Kirk and Thatcher, 249–262, esp. 251.

<sup>90</sup> Bartlett, Remembering, 83–93.

<sup>91</sup> Bultmann, History, 188–190.

<sup>92</sup> Ibid., 307.

with memory, they could not offer a satisfactory account of these processes. Bultmann made vague reference to “the relatively rapid precipitation of a somewhat fixed tradition” in traditional Jewish genres, while Dibelius located the formation of the “Paradigm” in the pragmatics of preaching.<sup>93</sup> Particularly ironic, though, was Bultmann’s inclination to view the tradition’s distancing from empirical realities, in fact the effect of mnemonic strategies, as evidence that it had come untethered from memory and history.<sup>94</sup>

The variability of the tradition is also closely aligned with memory’s cognitive function. Research brings to light the fact that memory as a crucial cognitive resource gives an organism the capability to respond successfully to new environments. In memory the data of experience are shaped into these economical patterns, or “schemas,” that, as Bartlett puts it, “render a specific adaptive reaction [to present and future situations] possible.”<sup>95</sup> The busy-bee condensing, compounding, and conventionalizing activities of memory described above, accordingly, are not merely for the purpose of enhancing memory’s retentive capacities, but to enable its key function as a rapid-response strategy for comprehending and mastering new situations.<sup>96</sup> This occurs through memory’s capacity to perform analogical operations, that is, to cue present experiences directly “to that portion of the organized setting of past responses which is most relevant to the needs of the moment.”<sup>97</sup> The cognitive capacities of memory extend thereby to intellection of and assigning meaning, “a name,” to present experiences, which in turn facilitate the integration of these experiences in their own right into organized, active memory.<sup>98</sup> Casey describes this dynamic as follows, and, moreover, in terms redolent of Schwartz’s characterization of the functions of social memory for a community:

Rather than a mere repository of experience, remembering becomes thereby a continually growing fund for experience: a source itself, indeed a resource, on which not only future acts of remembering but many other experiential modes can draw as well. . . . It also supplies a supportive Hintergrund for ongoing experience: a backdrop which at once unifies and

---

<sup>93</sup> Bultmann, History, 368; Dibelius, Tradition to Gospel, 65.

<sup>94</sup> Bultmann, History, 63–64.

<sup>95</sup> Bartlett, Remembering, 208.

<sup>96</sup> Ibid., 44–45; Bonanno, “Remembering and Psychotherapy,” 177.

<sup>97</sup> Bartlett, Remembering, 206.

<sup>98</sup> Ibid., 32, 200.

specifies what comes to appear in the foreground. Any experiential scene... possesses such a background, which contributes depth to an otherwise shallow setting.<sup>99</sup>

Memory, being an active cognitive capacity of this sort, never amounts to mere retrieval of stored “traces” of the past. Rather, memory manifests itself as a “formulation” expressive of the active relationship that the past—as it has come to be configured in memory—enters into with the circumstances of the present for which it has its particular cognitive salience.<sup>100</sup> This is not construction of the past, but reconstruction: items are “picked out of [memory] schemes, reshuffled, and used to aid adaptation towards conditions which have perhaps never occurred before. The items picked out are the distant events; the immediate situation sets the problems which they are to help solve.”<sup>101</sup> Casey refers to this as the “thick autonomy of memory”—autonomous with respect to the empirical past because not bound to direct recall, but rather to remembering “the same past differently on successive occasions.”<sup>102</sup> Memory nevertheless “is enmeshed in its origins even when it seems to be functioning independently of them”; it retains “a commitment to truth concerning the past, a truth that reflects the specificity of the past even if it need not offer an exact likeness of it.”<sup>103</sup>

Analysis of the cognitive dynamics of memory, the focus of experimental psychology or phenomenological studies like Casey’s, naturally takes human memory as embodied in its neural substrate as its object. But that these same dynamics play out in the social context of groups should not be surprising, for as we noted earlier, the locus of communal memory is the memories of individuals whose identities are bound up in their affiliation with a particular community. Social memory, the appropriation of a commemorated past within the frameworks of present social realities, fulfills for a community the cognitive function of memory that Bartlett describes as “the utilisation of the past in the solution of difficulties set by the present.”<sup>104</sup> The “keying” (Schwartz) or

<sup>99</sup> Casey, Remembering, 284.

<sup>100</sup> Bartlett, Remembering, 225.

<sup>101</sup> Ibid., 297.

<sup>102</sup> Casey, Remembering, 286.

<sup>103</sup> Ibid., 280, 283; on this point see also Martin A. Conway, “Autobiographical Knowledge and Autobiographical Memories,” in Remembering Our Past: Studies in Autobiographical Memory, ed. David C. Rubin (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996), 67–93, esp. 88.

<sup>104</sup> Bartlett, Remembering, 225.

“analogic mapping” (Malkki) operations of social memory reproduce the “effort after meaning” that Bartlett designates as the salient feature of memory cognitively brought to bear upon present situations.<sup>105</sup> The import for the phenomenology of tradition likewise is obvious. Above we suggested that the forms of oral tradition reflect the schematizing, compounding, and transmuting activities of memory and that, accordingly, oral genres can be viewed as pragmatic mnemonic strategies. Tradition, as a community’s deposit of its formative narratives and normative wisdom, is the artifactual manifestation of its cultural memory. The semantically dense, image-rich, formulaic properties of tradition artifacts enhance their utility for cognitive search-and-cue operations that bring apposite aspects of the commemorated past to bear upon a community’s present predicaments.

4. Oral Genres as Memory Strategies

Oral tradition can be arranged in culture-specific genre typologies. These genres are strategies that maximize the memorability and therefore the stability of the tradition while simultaneously enabling the flexibility that renders tradition responsive to new situations. Rubin characterizes each genre as “a different solution to the problem of stability.”<sup>106</sup> In cultural environments in which orality predominates, it is a matter of necessity that the normative resources of the community be retained in and transmitted in the medium of memory. Tradition, therefore, may be understood as a collocation of mnemonic strategies that circumvent the natural limitations of human memory while exploiting its remarkable strengths.<sup>107</sup>

Mastery of oral tradition proceeds along lines quite other than rote, verbatim memorization, the goal of the latter being identical recall across numerous enactments. Memory is notoriously inefficient at such tasks, and static formations of this sort typically require the support of the written medium. Rather, oral traditional genres are “systems of multiple constraints” that on the one hand supply cues to memory and on

---

<sup>105</sup> Schwartz, Abraham Lincoln, 232; Liisa H. Malkki, Purity and Exile: Violence, Memory, and National Cosmology among Hutu Refugees in Tanzania (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995), 121; also Bartlett, Remembering, 20.

<sup>106</sup> Rubin, Memory in Oral Traditions, 251; also Bartlett, Remembering, 81.

<sup>107</sup> Rubin, Memory in Oral Traditions, 10, 309–319.

the other place limits on variation by limiting choice.<sup>108</sup> Constraints include the schematic form of the genre itself, theme, imagery, association, and (depending on genre) assonance, rhyme, and rhythm. Though their joint operation is a dynamic rather than static process, its outcome is stability in the tradition, or better, a genre-relative equilibrium between stability and variation. Constraints and cues combine to relieve memory of the impossible burden of exact memorization of masses of detail.<sup>109</sup> “Memorization” applied to oral tradition, therefore, does not signify verbatim mastery and rote reproduction, but accurate recall through competency in a system of constraints and cues.<sup>110</sup> Multiformality is an index feature of oral tradition because genre-embodied configurations of constraints and cues permit more than just a single, exact solution.<sup>111</sup> Genres, moreover, vary amongst themselves in the number of interacting constraints each characteristically exhibits. The result is a spectrum running from low-constraint genres that enable a wider range of variation in performance to high-constraint genres that permit minimal variation, perhaps even something approaching verbatim reproduction from performance to performance, though Rubin stresses that “in all genres the overall constraints are enough to prevent drift beyond local variation.”<sup>112</sup> The inherent flexibility of genre-based multiple-constraint systems enables a community to adapt its foundational traditions to its changing social realities. This points, as Rubin puts it, “to the importance of learning the general organization, constraints, or rules of a genre as opposed to the rote learning of a collection of instances without the ability to extend them to new situations.”<sup>113</sup> We observe again the intersection of cognitive memory strategies with social memory forces operative within a community.

Let us look at how multiple constraint systems work in practice, and then bring this to bear upon selected genres of the gospel tradition. Genres themselves are culturally-inculcated patterns of organization, or scripts, that operate cognitively as memory schemas; in other words, the recurrent pattern definitive of a particular genre functions as an aide to memory. Competence in the conventions of a genre facilitates both

---

<sup>108</sup> Rubin, Memory in Oral Traditions, 119, 300, et passim.

<sup>109</sup> Ibid., 90, 101.

<sup>110</sup> Ibid., 293.

<sup>111</sup> Ibid., 284–285.

<sup>112</sup> Ibid., 300.

<sup>113</sup> Rubin, Memory in Oral Traditions, 143.

learning and reproduction of multiple traditions cast in that genre. To the extent that genre patterns cause recitation of a given tradition to unfold in a conventional, scripted order, its individual elements cue one another sequentially. Moreover, component elements of a genre frequently stand in conventional relationships to one another. In the ancient administrative genre of the petition, for example, the concrete petitions always follow upon an inaugural honorific address. We see this in the Our Father, which conforms to this genre.<sup>114</sup> Conventional narrative scripts may organize sets of motifs constitutively operative within a particular genre, as in the case of healing stories.<sup>115</sup> Interwoven with a genre's infrastructure, accordingly, are meaning and imagery, which constrain and cue the specific content of a given tradition. "Meaning" designates specific themes conventional to a particular genre. This may include a set of motifs or a plot conventionally constellated with a particular theme, and so cued associatively with the invocation of the theme. Requests for subsistence food and debt relief, for example, are highly recurrent in the ancient petition genre. The powerful mnemonic properties of images have long been recognized, and so it is not surprising that oral tradition is characteristically rich in both descriptive and spatial imagery. This (spatial imagery in particular) provides loci that cue motifs and—in a non-rote manner—the verbal component of the tradition.<sup>116</sup> That imagery forms the leading edge of the cuing properties of tradition is clear from the fact that it facilitates the searching and combining operations of memory.<sup>117</sup> It emerges that tradition-artifacts are memory-artifacts, systems of "constraints that combine to limit choices for recall and increase stability."<sup>118</sup> Rubin points out that most of these bundled constraints have "their own neural substrates," a testament to the capacity of tradition to muster and combine all the cognitive resources of the brain for the exigency of remembering.<sup>119</sup>

An important goal for research is analysis of the different genres of the gospel tradition as memory strategies. We will focus here on what both Bultmann and Dibelius viewed as the queen of the tradition, the

---

<sup>114</sup> See A. Kirk, "Peasant Wisdom, the 'Our Father,' and the Origins of Christianity," TJT 15 (1999): 31–50.

<sup>115</sup> See Rubin, Memory in Oral Traditions, 36, 304; Casey, Remembering, 74–75.

<sup>116</sup> Rubin, Memory in Oral Traditions, 18–19, 48, 94–95, 305.

<sup>117</sup> Bartlett, Remembering, 219.

<sup>118</sup> Rubin, Memory in Oral Traditions, 101.

<sup>119</sup> Ibid., 94–95.

pronouncement story. Bultmann observed the economy of the form, for instance, its dramatis personae portrayed as emblematic types.<sup>120</sup> Both Bultmann and Dibelius in isolating and classifying the genre recognized its distinctive organizing schema. This sets the constraints and cues for enactment in all the genre's discrete exemplars: brief narrative contextualization, frequently with conventionalized syntax, culminating in a pungent saying, itself formulated in accordance with cultural conventions for proverbs and maxims for maximum memorability. To assess the pronouncement story's utilization of additional constraints to cue specific content we can take Mark 3:31–35, the Family of Jesus, as an example. The narrative contextualization that inaugurates the unit is dense in descriptive and spatial imagery (vv. 31–32). The dominant image is “family,” and it is important to note that the imagery cues wording, in a generative, non-rote manner, for the brief lead-in narrative. The image of Jesus' family (mother and brothers), moreover, cues the theme: “Who are my mother and my brothers?” (v. 33) The image and the theme are simultaneously a mnemonic for the climactic aphorism: “Whoever does the will of God is my brother and sister and mother” (v. 35). The image of “mother and brothers” recurs in each component of the unit. Likewise, the image and the aphorism reinforce each other mnemonically, which is to say that the narrative portion could for its part be cued from recollection of the memorable aphorism. In short, the unit is a system of cues that together eliminate the burden of exact recall, that is, of carrying the story around verbatim in one's head as a condition for reproducing it from occasion to occasion. It also renders it capable of variation.

Though an acute observer of the features of the genre, Bultmann failed to recognize its mnemonic orientation and integration. Consequently, he viewed the narrative settings as owing their existence primarily to pedagogic and aesthetic impulses—they were “pictorial concretions” of “universal truths” expressed by the dominical sayings, giving “vividness” or “lively” expression to the latter.<sup>121</sup> This assessment naturally induced him to view narrative settings as secondary derivations of the sayings. Taken with the fact that many sayings had the capacity to circulate independently, this led him to isolate dominical sayings as the primary datum of the gospel tradition.<sup>122</sup> Correspondingly, he construed the fact that the dramatis personae were ideal, symbolic types as evidence that the scenes were imaginary, that is, generated by the respective saying. While acknowledging that in some cases scene-construction might have drawn upon traditional materials, he viewed this as incidental.<sup>123</sup> This assigning of priority to sayings over narrative, and its corollary, that sayings were the generative seeds of the tradition, were crucial to Bultmann's evolutionary conception of history of the gospel tradition.

<sup>120</sup> Bultmann, History, 309.

<sup>121</sup> Ibid., 32–47. Bultmann supported these opinions, moreover, by reasoning from literary analogies (see 61). Dibelius for his part put the origins of the narrative settings of the Paradigms down to the “edifying tendencies” of the sermon, and their narrative economy he attributed to the concern of the preachers that the listeners not be “distracted from the sermon” (Tradition to Gospel, 26, 48).

Nothing is easier than to show that dominical sayings could and did indeed circulate separately, that individual sayings might subsequently have narrative settings attached to them, or conversely become independent of narrative settings. Nor is there anything to be gained denying that the narrative settings reflect pedagogic and aesthetic concerns, or that sayings influenced the shaping of their narrative frames. By the same token there can be no naïve construing of the ideal-type narratives as simply abbreviated versions of discrete historical occasions on which sayings were pronounced—the relationship between history and the representational powers of memory is far too complex for that (see below). What memory analysis does, however, is destroy Bultmann's grand evolutionary tradition-history inferences, for it shows that memory strategies, enacted in various genres, are an inherent property of the tradition.

As just such a constellation of memory strategies, tradition expresses a community's fundamental orientation to its salient past, its resolute determination to remember. Likewise, as a system of constraints and cues that enable variation in reproducing that past, rather than a technology of static verbatim repetition, tradition speaks in fresh ways to the present social realities of a community without diminishment of the animating moral authority of the salient past. Here we may reiterate our earlier point that enactment of tradition takes place where social and cultural memory forces intersect with the cognitive memory strategies formative of the tradition itself and enabling its reproduction.

A community's constitutive mnemonic efforts, however, are directed toward remembering the tradition. In other words, the historiographical question of the relationship of memory, tradition, and history needs to be posed once again.

---

<sup>122</sup> Bultmann, History, 47–49.

<sup>123</sup> Ibid., 29–30.

5. Memory, Jesus Tradition, and History

We return to our earlier discussion of memory's cognitive conversion of experience into memory artifacts. We saw that memory forms the undifferentiated streams of experience into conventional patterns, scripts, and types. While the purpose is mnemonic, the effect is to conform events to the representational type. Elements consistent with the pertinent memory schema are assimilated to it, while "discrepant information is ignored or devalued."<sup>124</sup> Rubin describes this process as follows: "Changes in the recall of a particular piece will make it more like the schema, both in order and content. If a detail cannot be recalled, a common substitute from the schema will often be used. . . . Aspects of a piece that are more central or important to a schema will be recalled more quickly than aspects that are not."<sup>125</sup> By way of example Rubin refers to another balladic commemoration, this time the 1896 murder of Pearl Bryan: "[T]he events could fit into either of two existing [narrative] patterns of ballads: the murdered-girl pattern or the criminal-brought-to-justice pattern. . . . The actual murder has enough details to fill both patterns, but the traditional ballad must follow one or the other; it is either the victim's story or the murderer's."<sup>126</sup> The result of these sorts of complex cognitive conversions is memory artifacts in which an exact redescription of the past has been exchanged for enormous mnemonic advantage.

Casey refers to this as "intensified remembering" and draws attention to its correspondence to the dynamics of commemoration:

One way to intensify something is to give it a thicker consistency so as to help it last or to remain more substantively. Such thickening is surely the point of any memorialization, whether it be ceremonial, sculptural, scriptural, or psychical. Every kind of commemoration can be considered an effort to create a lasting "remanence" for what we wish to honor in memory—where "remanence" signifies a perduring remainder or residuum (as in the literally thick stone of war memorials or grave markers).<sup>127</sup>

The cognitive activity of memory, in other words, is not just about achieving mnemonic efficiency. Rather, as is the case with all commem-

<sup>124</sup> Bonanno, "Remembering and Psychotherapy," 177.

<sup>125</sup> Rubin, Memory in Oral Traditions, 22.

<sup>126</sup> Ibid., 280–281. Rubin draws upon A. B. Cohen, Poor Pearl, Poor Girl: The Murdered-Girl Stereotype in Ballad and Newspaper (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1973).

<sup>127</sup> Casey, Remembering, 273.

oration, it carries out a thorough-going signification of the past. Drawing upon all the symbolic resources of the culture, memory infuses past events with meaning; it converts them into symbolic forms artficed to be bearers of the truths, moral judgments, and norms perceived to be immanent in the actual empirical events.<sup>128</sup>

This accounts for important features of the Jesus tradition. The tradition is inherently neither calibrated nor concerned for a direct re-description of empirical events. Rather, through complex mnemonic, commemorative operations, it amounts to the conversion, or transmutation, of the diffuse actualities of historical events into mnemonically efficient, image-rich verbal artifacts designed to bear the axiomatic meanings and norms—the emerging cultural memory—of the Jesus-communities. Stated differently, in the Jesus tradition the past is marked and represented in such a way as to enable it to exercise culture-symbolic power for the tradent communities. Malkki's characterization of the formation of tradition in Hutu refugee camps in Tanzania following their flight from the 1972 genocide in Burundi is apposite: "It was most centrally concerned with the reconstitution of a moral order of the world. It seized historical events, processes, and relationships, and reinterpreted them within a deeply moral scheme of good and evil."<sup>129</sup> Rehearsal of the tradition thereby constitutes the community in its identity as a moral community. A community's commemorative activity productive of its tradition always occurs, it must be emphasized, in the crucible of its present realities and crises, and by the same token, "it contribute[s] to structuring social action in the present."<sup>130</sup>

The normative concerns driving the formation of tradition, accordingly, account for the prominence of dominical sayings and pronouncement stories in the Jesus tradition. The "ideal types" of narrative settings (Pharisees, Scribes, Disciples, Crowds, Tax Collectors, etc.) function not just as mnemonic shorthand, but as categorical moral types. Typification of narrative scenes and their tight coordination with authoritative sayings reveal the investment of the early communities in the normative dimension of their commemoration of Jesus. The observable form of the

---

<sup>128</sup> Casey, Remembering, 51, 283; also Malkki, Purity and Exile, 242–244; Assmann, Das kulturelle Gedächtnis, 52–59, 139–140; Schwartz, "Frame Image," 25–26; Fentress and Wickham, Social Memory, 59; Halbwachs, On Collective Memory, 188–189.

<sup>129</sup> Malkki, Purity and Exile, 56.

<sup>130</sup> Ibid., 105.

pronouncement story is an artifact of this guiding interest in normative memory, exhibiting, moreover, the convergence of mnemonic strategies with normative goals. The form critics themselves constantly remarked on the tradition's heavy investment in norm inculcation vis-à-vis historical description.<sup>131</sup> Moreover, in Bultmann's repeated characterization of narrative settings as "ideal and symbolic" there lurks a fundamental insight into the phenomenology of tradition, and in this vein it is hard to improve, for example, upon his observation that "Mk. 1.16–20, 2.14 condense[s] into one symbolic moment what was actually a process."<sup>132</sup> Lacking adequate models for memory and tradition, however, and handicapped by superannuated historiographical assumptions,<sup>133</sup> Bultmann failed to recognize the essential memorializing connection of the forms of the tradition with the life of Jesus. For Bultmann, symbolic representation and historical representation were mutually exclusive. The Calling of the Disciples (Mark. 1:16–20), for instance, "is in no sense an historical record, but a description of an ideal scene" (emphasis added).<sup>134</sup> The question Bultmann puts in stark terms to Mark 11:28–30 (Challenge to Jesus' Authority) is "whether it is an historical record or a creation of the early Church, designed to disarm its opponents of their weapons" (emphasis added).<sup>135</sup> "Ideal," accordingly, is for him largely synonymous with "imaginary." Vague chronological and geographical data suggest to Bultmann that the tradition has lost its moorings in history.<sup>136</sup> "Religious and edifying" is contrasted with "historical."<sup>137</sup> History in his view is in principle accessible apart from symbolic mediation, albeit meagerly, through "historical record[s]," "reports of historical occasions," and "actual historical reports" excavated from the tradition.<sup>138</sup>

Memory analysis suggests skepticism towards this understanding of the tradition and also brings important contributions to the historiographical discussion. Tradition being the product of memory dynamics, we have seen, rules out that it transparently redescribes empirical events.

<sup>131</sup> E.g., Bultmann, History, 63; Dibelius, Tradition to Gospel, 65.

<sup>132</sup> Bultmann, History, 57.

<sup>133</sup> See David S. du Toit, "Der unähnliche Jesus: Eine kritische Evaluierung der Entstehung des Differenzkriteriums und seiner geschichts- und erkenntnistheoretischen Voraussetzungen," in Der historische Jesus, ed. Schröter and Brucker, 89–130.

<sup>134</sup> Bultmann, History, 28.

<sup>135</sup> Ibid., 20.

<sup>136</sup> Ibid., 63–64.

<sup>137</sup> Ibid., 244.

<sup>138</sup> Ibid., 29–30, 39–41, 48, 57.

Genre-based mnemonic strategies, moreover, are directed to recalling and enacting the tradition. Nevertheless, to return to the point made earlier, the gospel tradition has an essential relationship to the empirical past, one that is mediated by commemoration. The tradition may be viewed, in other words, as a commemorative representation of historical events. To deny this historical dynamic to the Jesus tradition would be equivalent to claiming that the Vietnam War Memorial in Washington D.C., because it is the product of politically charged commemorative debates of the 1980's,<sup>139</sup> has no historical relationship to the Vietnam War, or likewise that the Lincoln Memorial, reflective as its design is of the preoccupations of the pre-Civil Rights era,<sup>140</sup> has nothing of historical value to tell us about the presidency of Abraham Lincoln and the events of the American Civil War. To the contrary, the changing, even conflicting, interpretations of landmark events evident in these commemorative enterprises amount to the reverberative effects of foundational events into new social contexts and thus are historically informative in their own right. As regards the Jesus-traditions this entails a historiography of reception along the lines sketched out for example by Schröter, summarized above, and one that addresses the relationship between historical events and their symbolic representation.<sup>141</sup>

Memory analysis also traces the social processes through which communities transmute formative historical experiences into commemorative artifacts like tradition. Halbwachs showed that memory is forged in the communicative dynamics of groups. Rosenzweig and Thelen, in a major survey of popular uses of memory, reported of their respondents that "with individuals they trusted . . . they probed experiences and constructed the traditions they wanted to sustain. In these relationships they . . . shaped and reshaped memories into trajectories . . . and generally created the perceptual world they wanted to inhabit."<sup>142</sup> Malkki refers to this as "collective discursive practice" and observed its operations in Hutu refugee camps, where the experience of genocide was

---

<sup>139</sup> Robin Wagner-Pacifici and Barry Schwartz, "The Vietnam Memorial: Commemorating a Difficult Past," AJS 97 (1991): 376–420.

<sup>140</sup> Savage, "Politics of Memory," 127–149.

<sup>141</sup> See Schröter, "Von der Historizität der Evangelien," 184–206; and Michael Moxter, "Erzählung und Ereignis: Über den Spielraum historischer Repräsentation," in Der historische Jesus, ed. Schröter and Brucker, 67–88. See also Paul Ricoeur, Memory, History, Forgetting, trans. Kathleen Blamey and David Pellaur (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2004).

<sup>142</sup> Rosenzweig and Thelen, Presence of the Past, 196.

forged into an enduring tradition under the influence of the present social realities of the camps.<sup>143</sup> Experimental psychologists have observed that stories are transformed into condensed, durable versions conforming to culturally available genres in the course of multiple retellings.<sup>144</sup> Malkki notes that it was by this means that the Hutu stories took on their mnemonic and didactic-symbolic contours:

Accounts of these key events very quickly circulated among the refugees, and, often in a matter of days, acquired what can be characterized as “standard versions” in the telling and retelling. These “standard versions” were not simply isolated accounts of particular events, told for the sake of telling and soon to be forgotten. Rather, they were accounts which, while becoming increasingly formulaic, also became more didactic and progressively more implicated in, and indicative of, something beyond them. In this sense, the “standard versions” acted as diagnostic and mnemonic allegories connecting events of everyday life with wider historical processes impinging on the Hutu refugees.<sup>145</sup>

These social processes render landmark historical events into the commemorative artifacts of tradition which, we have seen, are open to fresh transformations in new social contexts of enactment.

6. Orality, Writing, and Memory

This essay has focused a great deal on the properties of oral tradition. There is a danger that the abandonment of the form-critics’ project of working back through the oral tradition to its so-called earliest layers may have the collateral effect that scholarship comes to view the oral tradition as inaccessible and hence simply not relevant to analysis. Schröter in fact argues that a reception-based historiography must focus

---

<sup>143</sup> Malkki, Purity and Exile, 242; also Gérard Namer, Mémoire et société (Paris: Méridiens Lincksieck, 1987), 140–157, on survivor groups supplying the social contexts for Jews, who had been deported to the death camps, to forge a collective memory of their experiences.

<sup>144</sup> Bartlett, Remembering, 63, 83, 95; Rubin, Memory in Oral Traditions, 131, 281–282; Jerome Bruner and Carol Fleisher Feldman, “Group Narrative as a Cultural Context of Autobiography,” in Remembering our Past, ed. Rubin, 291–317, esp. 293; Mary Susan Weldon and Krystal D. Bellinger, “Collective Memory: Collaborative and Individual Processes in Remembering,” Journal of Experimental Psychology: Learning, Memory, and Cognition 23 (1997): 1160–1175; Elizabeth Tonkin, Narrating Our Pasts: The Social Construction of Oral History (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992), 60, 86.

<sup>145</sup> Malkki, Purity and Exile, 106.

on the written sources because earlier reception-contexts for the oral tradition are simply irrecoverable.<sup>146</sup> This is true if by analysis is meant de-layering on the form-critical model, but the form critics' notion that the oral tradition is layered or a sequence of diachronic "stages" was a great misunderstanding. Others, however, draw attention to the fluid nature of oral tradition, hence the difficulty of getting an analytical fix on it except as it has survived into the medium of writing.<sup>147</sup> To be sure, reconstructing a history of the performances of the oral tradition is out of the question. Memory analysis, however, throws a great deal of light upon this period that post-form-critical scholarship is prone to view as impenetrably obscure.

This is not just because the genres of oral tradition are mnemonic strategies calibrated, moreover, to bring stability and flexibility into equilibrium. These give us no royal road to the historical Jesus. We have seen that built right in to oral genres, precisely as mnemonic strategies, is not just autonomy from the empirically-described past, but also capacity for variability in recall and, accordingly, for enactments adaptive to diverse social contexts. To be sure, the fact that oral tradition is mnemonically configured is a warning against exaggerating its fluidity or underestimating a community's resolute dedication to remembering its past. What memory analysis does, however, is negate descriptions of the oral history of the gospel traditions as a diachronic transmission through multiple stages—a sort of complex regress from the gospels that is simply incapable of reconstruction. According to such accounts, each stage constitutes a caesura, a crisis, and cumulatively a progressive breakdown in transmission, much as in the individuals-seriatim model.

Memory analysis, in contrast, indicates that the sphere of oral transmission of the tradition, even given the realities of a community's multiple performance settings and shifting social contexts, is a synchronic space defined by a community's generational life-cycle. Stated differently, the crisis in tradition is first significantly triggered by the generational succession within an emergent community. This is because foundational memories and their artifact, tradition, are shaped socially and discursively by the community. Moreover, consistent with its social origins and emplacement, tradition circulates along nets, not down chains, within the ambient context of the entire community and within this generationally-defined temporal space. Cast in genres that enable flexibility and multiformity, the tradition is affected by the community's shifting social realities without thereby becoming severed from foundational memories collectively forged and over which the community exercises collective proprietorship. This scenario is supported by sociological research that demonstrates that a generation is defined by shared memories of autobiographically experienced formative events. Formative memories, that is to say, are borne through the life-cycle of the generation, and absent successful strategies for cross-generational transmission they tend to fade with their tradent cohort.<sup>148</sup>

---

<sup>146</sup> Schröter, "Historical Jesus," 165; idem, Erinnerung, 483–485.

<sup>147</sup> du Toit, "Der unähnliche Jesus," 123.

How then does a community respond to the grave crisis generational succession poses for its survival? Jan Assmann's analysis of the transition from "communicative memory" to "cultural memory" illuminates this problem. Broadly conceived, communicative memory encompasses all dimensions of face-to-face communication in predominantly oral societies: "Dieses Gedächtnis gehört in den Zwischenbereich zwischen Individuen, es bildet sich im Verkehr der Menschen untereinander heraus."<sup>149</sup> This draws upon Halbwachs's insight that the social realities and communicative practices of communities give substance and duration to the memory of the people belonging to those communities. Hence communicative memory includes those communicative and cognitive operations through which oral traditions coalesce in emergent communities. Traditionsbruch is the term Assmann uses for a serious breakdown of the communicative frameworks enabling transmission of tradition. This confronts a community with loss of connection to memory and hence with the crisis of its own dissolution. It forces it to turn toward more durable media capable of carrying memory in a vital manner across generations, that is, toward the artifactual forms of cultural memory, and in particular, writing.<sup>150</sup>

For emergent communities a Traditionsbruch arises out of a breakdown in communicative memory directly connected with its generational lifespan: "Dieses Gedächtnis wächst der Gruppe historisch zu; es

---

<sup>148</sup> Howard Schuman and Jacqueline Scott, "Generations and Collective Memories," ASR 54 (1989): 359–381.

<sup>149</sup> Assmann, Religion und kulturelles Gedächtnis, 13.

<sup>150</sup> Assmann, Das kulturelle Gedächtnis, 165, 218–221, 275; also idem, Religion und kulturelles Gedächtnis, 53–54, 87–88. Assmann's model suffers from a certain ambiguity at this point that in my view is due to "communicative memory" and "cultural memory" being positioned in too categorical a distinction to each other. Assmann wants to reserve

entsteht in der Zeit und vergeht mit ihr, genauer, mit seinen Trägern. . . . Dieser allen durch persönlich verbürgte und kommunizierte Erfahrung gebildete Erinnerungsraum entspricht biblisch den 3–4 Generationen. . . .”<sup>151</sup> The outer limit for the operations of communicative memory, in other words, is the cohort of those still able to claim direct contact with those who knew the first generation, hence three or at the most four generations.<sup>152</sup> Assmann argues that the limitations of communicative memory force themselves upon an emergent community as a crisis of memory at approximately the forty-year threshold, that is, when it is becoming apparent that the cohort of its living carriers—the generation that experienced the charismatic period of origins—is disappearing. It is at this point that the community, if it is not eventually to dissolve along with its memory, must accelerate the transformation of communicative memory into the enduring artifacts of cultural memory, a process Assmann characterizes as “die Objektivationen gemeinsam erinnerten Wissens in Gestalt kultureller Formen.”<sup>153</sup> Moreover, “[w]enn wir den typischen Dreigenerationen-Zeitrahmen des kommunikativen Gedächtnisses als einen synchronen Erinnerungsraum auffassen, dann bildet das kulturelle Gedächtnis anhand weit in die Vergangenheit zurückreichenden Überlieferung eine diachrone Achse.”<sup>154</sup> The exigency is the securing of long-term cultural viability in the face of the collapse in the social frameworks, in this case the generational framework, for “cultural memory” to refer to new artifactual forms of memory that arise after the breakdown in “communicative memory.” But as we have seen, oral traditions are themselves cultural artifacts forged in the crucible of oral practices Assmann associates with communicative memory. Assmann is nonetheless clear that “eine mündliche Überlieferung gliedert sich genau so nach kommunikativer und kultureller, alltäglicher und feierlicher Erinnerung wie die Erinnerung einer Schriftkultur” (Das kulturelle Gedächtnis, 59). Assmann softens the distinction in a recent essay in which he analyzes tradition as a cultural artifact (“Form as a Mnemonic Device: Cultural Texts and Cultural Memory,” in Performing the Gospel: Orality, Memory, and Mark, ed. Richard A. Horsley, Jonathan A. Draper, and John Miles Foley [Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2006], 67–82).

---

<sup>151</sup> Assmann, Das kulturelle Gedächtnis, 50.

<sup>152</sup> Ibid., 37. Rosalind Thomas’s study of Athenian family traditions is a striking confirmation of the three to four generation life-span of communicative memory (Oral Tradition and Written Record in Classical Athens [Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989], 125–129).

<sup>153</sup> Assmann, Religion und kulturelles Gedächtnis, 117; also idem, Das kulturelle Gedächtnis, 11, 32–38, 50–56, 218–221. See also Sarah Farmer, Martyred Village: Commemorating the 1944 Massacre at Oradour-sur-Glane (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999), 197–213.

<sup>154</sup> Assmann, Religion und kulturelles Gedächtnis, 19, drawing here expressly upon Aleida Assmann’s Zeit und Tradition: Kulturelle Strategien der Dauer (Köln: Böhlau, 1999).

oral transmission of normative and formative tradition.<sup>155</sup> The large-scale programmatic shifting of tradition from oral to written media arises out of the crisis of memory.

The gospels (particularly Mark and Q) as oral-derived texts are artifacts of this crisis of memory triggered by generational succession in the Jesus movement. This means, moreover, that the oral tradition therein incorporated has freshly emerged from the synchronic space of memory, namely, the social frameworks constituted by the foundational generation, in whom those memories were autobiographically vested. It is important to emphasize in this regard that the written sources are by no means passive transcriptions of the traditions emerging from the first generation. They constitute fresh acts of memory, fresh enactments of the tradition in their own contemporary social and cultural frameworks, forging in the process a new kind of connection with the past, one that reconstructs it from quite different vistas, from across the Traditionsbruch.<sup>156</sup>

7. Conclusion

Memory theory does not offer facile solutions to the historiographical challenges of Jesus research. Its initial effect, in fact, should be methodological complication as it is brought into more specific engagement with existing research approaches where with some notable exceptions the category “memory” is remarkably absent. We have seen, however, that memory analysis puts the proper complexion on the core datum of research, the gospel traditions. They are artifacts of memory; they have circulated along memorializing pathways; and by finding their way into the written medium they have navigated the major crisis of memory. The gospels, we might say, are the deep pools of early Christian memory.

---

<sup>155</sup> Assmann, Religion und kulturelles Gedächtnis, 29–30.

<sup>156</sup> Assmann, Das kulturelle Gedächtnis, 274.

THE BURDEN OF PROOF IN JESUS RESEARCH

DAGMAR WINTER

1. Introduction

The burden of proof in Jesus research refers to the question of historical veracity of the New Testament accounts of Jesus. As soon as historical scholarship is applied to the Bible, the burden of proof becomes an implicit issue and expresses the various presuppositions held: are biblical accounts basically trustworthy, thus laying the burden of proof on the side arguing against the historicity of certain passages—or are biblical accounts to be fundamentally mistrusted historically so that the burden of proof rests with anyone wishing to uphold the historical content of a passage? The burden of proof may also relate to more specific aspects or elements of the Jesus tradition.

In the course of the quest for authentic Jesus material, various criteria (cf. criteria of authenticity) are used to examine the historical accuracy of the sources. A further role is played by the opinio communis on the trustworthiness of certain sources, e.g. the synoptic gospels.

2. The Burden of Proof in the History of Jesus Research

2.1. The Background to the Discussion

The issue of the burden of proof is implicit from the very beginning of biblical criticism.

The Reformation period with its emphasis on scripture was followed by Protestant Orthodoxy with its doctrine of divine inspiration of the biblical texts. Critical study of the Bible could therefore not go beyond issues of textual criticism lest the whole dogmatic system of orthodox theology be called into question. When seventeenth-century Socinianism pursued just such a polemical agenda, it did so by joining reason together with scripture to stand against doctrine. While reason was thereby introduced as a critical standard, it was not yet applied to the Bible.

It was English Deism that used reason as a critical argument against scripture.

The antisupernaturalism of the deists led them not only to reject the miracles of the Bible but also to reject the church doctrine of the inspiration of the Bible. Having rejected these, the deists felt the necessity for supplying some plausible theory of the natural origin of the Books and of its contents. This led to a study of the origin of the Books of the Bible, to investigations of questions of canon and authorship.<sup>1</sup>

As early as 1738, Chubb wrote:

[The] later system of the apostles [was oriented] not to the facts themselves, but the narration of the reported events had to be oriented to their changed system. Consequently, one must put aside everything in their account that bears the marks of the apostles' later system, and not judge Jesus on the basis of their accounts, if one wants to know his true views and intentions.<sup>2</sup>

Thus Chubb stated that there were reliable and unreliable elements in the Jesus tradition and that there was a need to distinguish between them.

The historical-critical studies by H. S. Reimarus in the eighteenth century further developed this approach of distinguishing between the gospel texts and the historical reality which they describe. The hitherto unreflected historical authority of these texts and their veracity were challenged by distinguishing between the historical Jesus and the apostles as sources and writers/editors of the Jesus material.<sup>3</sup> This was further emphasised in D. F. Strauss's introduction of the idea of myth to the Jesus tradition in the gospels.<sup>4</sup>

When the Enlightenment's discovery of history behind scripture led to a conflict between traditional dogmatics and historical insights, the

---

<sup>1</sup> J. Orr, English Deism: Its Roots and Its Fruits (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1934), 246.

<sup>2</sup> This quotation is dated ca. 1750, unpublished at the time. H. S. Reimarus, Apologie oder Schutzschrift für die vernünftigen Verehrer Gottes, vol. 2, ed. G. Alexander (Frankfurt: Insel, 1972), trans. M. E. Boring in The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria, by G. Theissen and D. Winter (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002), 264.

<sup>3</sup> It is worth noting that critics such as Chubb and Reimarus were primarily motivated by establishing the essence of Christian faith and practice in their day rather than a historically 'true' account of biblical subject matter. For instance, while Reimarus believed that as a Jew Jesus would have expressed himself in Jewish ways and therefore some of the Johannine Jesus sayings had to be unhistorical, he considered such (historical) Jewish elements to be of little value to the positive religion for which he strove.

<sup>4</sup> D. F. Strauss: The Life of Jesus Critically Examined, ed. P. C. Hodgson (1835/1836; repr., Ramsey, NJ: Sigler, 1994).

burden of proof was not yet discussed. However, rather than biblical texts having no need to enter the arena of debate and prove anything, a heavy and unshiftable burden was placed on those passages (e.g., miracle stories) that contradicted a rationalist understanding of the world. The idea that elements of biblical narrative could be historically evaluated and proved—and particularly disproved!—opened the door for the burden of proof debate.

Nineteenth-century historicism had a major impact on biblical scholarship and the value such scholarship placed on historicity. As history developed into a scholarly discipline in its own right, history was seen as ‘made’ by human activity, no longer with a divine external reference point<sup>5</sup> or as a source for normativity. Historical truth was understood as historical authenticity; the goal was an objective description of historical facts. L. v. Ranke was historicism’s first outstanding proponent and it is no coincidence that one of his most important legacies is the development of the critical method of source analysis.

Equipped with literary-critical methodology, the liberal quest of the historical Jesus in the nineteenth century set out with great optimism. As can be seen in H. J. Holtzmann’s work,<sup>6</sup> the two-source theory led to Jesus research being based on Mark and Q as principally reliable sources. While the burden of proof was not a point of debate as such, in practice the high historical value appropriated to Mark and Q meant that an almost impossibly heavy burden of proof rested on anyone wishing to uphold the historical authenticity of any material from other sources which did not agree with Mark and Q.

The collapse of the old quest of the historical Jesus has been well described.<sup>7</sup> Of particular interest to us is the rise of form criticism, which saw the gospel accounts as an expression of the early church. This effectively destroyed the ability to rely on Mark and Q without more thoroughgoing research. It also meant that issues of burden of proof

---

<sup>5</sup> See E. Troeltsch’s groundbreaking work and application of “historical method” to the New Testament, employing criteria of analogy and correlation. E. Troeltsch, “Über historische und dogmatische Methode in der Theologie,” in Gesammelte Schriften, vol. 2, Zur religiösen Lage, Religionsphilosophie und Ethik, 2nd ed. (Tübingen: Mohr, 1922), 729–743.

<sup>6</sup> H. J. Holtzmann, Die synoptischen Evangelien: Ihr Ursprung und geschichtlicher Charakter (Leipzig: Engelmann, 1863), 9: in our questions about the historical Jesus we find in Mark and Q “eine vollkommen gesicherte und nach allen Seiten gerechtfertigte Antwort.”

<sup>7</sup> A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus, first complete edition, ed. John Bowden (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2001).

were no longer primarily a question of the value of sources. Instead, criteria were needed.

For M. Dibelius, the insights of form criticism meant that "It is proper to speak of non-genuine sayings only where the later circumstances, conditions or problems of the already existing Church are clearly presupposed."<sup>8</sup> Thus the burden of proof came to rest on those wishing to uphold as historically authentic such passages which reflect the life of the early Christian community.

The New Quest of the Historical Jesus was 'new' for scholars who emerged from the influence of Bultmannian theology. With Bultmann, the burden of proof was not an issue since his form-critical work led him to see New Testament sources primarily as sources for the life of the early church. The thrust of the New Quest was to investigate the continuity between the historical Jesus and early Christianity. There was here an apologetic agenda which sought to show how critical biblical scholarship used the tools of its trade in order to strengthen the link between the message of the historical Jesus (the sayings traditions were of particular importance to the New Quest) and the faith of the church.

In the New Quest the burden of proof became a hotly debated issue. Every writer and scholar on Jesus had to come down on one of two sides regarding the credibility of New Testament accounts, and the burden of proof was placed accordingly on the other side. Thus the question of the burden of proof became an explicit touchstone of the conservative and radical wing of gospel research respectively in the twentieth century.

By definition, the use of the burden of proof argument presupposes something to prove or disprove. Consequently, it was used not only for the gospel text in general but also as a marker in stages of research: once certain criteria established a critically assured minimum, anyone putting forward material as authentic which was deemed incompatible in content or genre with the said assured minimum would have to bear the burden of proof. This became a particular issue when the criterion of dissimilarity was used to establish a critically assured minimum, since this criterion produced an image of Jesus which effectively removed him from his Jewish background or from his Christian followers or from both (cf. article on criteria of authenticity/criterion of dissimilarity).

---

<sup>8</sup> M. Dibelius: Jesus: A Study of the Gospels and an Essay on "The Motive for Social Action in the New Testament" (London: SCM, 1963), 22.

2.2. The Positions Held in the Burden of Proof Debate

2.2.1. The Burden of Proof Resting with Those Trusting the Historical Authenticity of the Gospel Text

Käsemann's 1953/54 lecture and essay on "The Problem of the Historical Jesus" heralded not only the advent of the New Quest for the Bultmann school, but also the burden of proof as an issue. In a reversal of the direction of argument by Dibelius, form criticism led Käsemann to state categorically that "the obligation now laid upon us is to investigate and make credible not the possible unauthenticity of the individual unit of material but, on the contrary, its genuineness."<sup>9</sup> This position became the consensus position in most of German language scholarship. Leading English language scholars, Norman Perrin reemphasized that "the nature of the synoptic tradition is such that the burden of proof will be upon the claim to authenticity."<sup>10</sup> This was also the position adopted by Funk's Jesus Seminar: "Supposedly historical elements in these narratives [embellished by mythic elements] must... be demonstrated to be so."<sup>11</sup>

2.2.2. The Burden of Proof Resting with Those Mistrusting the Historical Authenticity of the Gospel Text

Other scholars soon voiced their concern and argued for the burden of proof to be laid at the door of the sceptics. The presupposition of these generally more conservative scholars like Jeremias was more optimistic concerning the historical reliability of the gospels. Thus McEleney speaks of the criterion of historical presumption.<sup>12</sup> Hare speaks of continuity being more probable than discontinuity.<sup>13</sup>

<sup>9</sup> E. Käsemann, "The Problem of the Historical Jesus," in Essays on New Testament Themes (London: SCM, 1964), 15–47, esp. 34. See also H. Zahrnt, The Historical Jesus, trans. J. S. Bowden (New York: Harper, 1960), 107–108: "[W]e no longer have to prove the unauthenticity, but (and this is far harder) their authenticity."

<sup>10</sup> N. Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (London: SCM, 1967), 39. Cf. also Leander E. Keck, A Future for the Historical Jesus: The Place of Jesus in Preaching and Theology (Nashville: Abingdon, 1971; London: SCM, 1972), 42 n. 15. J. Sauer, Rückkehr und Vollendung des Heils: Eine Untersuchung zu den ethischen Radikalismen Jesu, Theorie und Forschung 133, Philosophie und Theologie 9 (Regensburg: S. Roderer, 1991), 81–84.

<sup>11</sup> R. W. Funk, R. W. Hoover, and The Jesus Seminar, The Five Gospels: The Search for Authentic Words of Jesus (New York: Macmillan, 1993), 5.

<sup>12</sup> N. J. McEleney, "Authenticating Criteria and Mark 7:1–23," CBQ 34 (1972): 431–460, here 445.

<sup>13</sup> D. R. A. Hare, The Son of Man Tradition (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1990), 257, seeking to establish the earliest use of "Son of Man," indicates that the burden of proof should rest on those who argue for discontinuity in the tradition.

A more general argument has also been employed, stating that telling the truth and acceptance is the default position for human communication.<sup>14</sup>

2.2.3. The Burden of Proof Shifting from One Side to the Other—a Compromise

McArthur<sup>15</sup> offered a compromise by seeing the burden of proof lying initially with those affirming authenticity of particular motifs in the gospel tradition. Using the criterion of multiple attestation, he then shifted the burden of proof onto the side of the sceptics if three or four sources supported authenticity.

2.2.4. The Burden of Proof Resting with Both Sides

Hooker was one of the first to give voice to this position: “It is the duty of every scholar, in considering every saying, to give a reasonable account of all the evidence; for he is not entitled to assume, simply in the absence of contrary evidence, either that a saying is genuine or that it is not.”<sup>16</sup> This even-handed approach became largely normative for the Third Quest since it concurred with its general historical rather than New Testament centred outlook. Typically, E. P. Sanders spoke of the liberation of “history and exegesis from the control of theology.”<sup>17</sup> Besides E. P. Sanders, the Third Quest proponents of Hooker’s even sharing of the burden of proof include B. Meyer, J. P. Meier and G. Theißen.<sup>18</sup>

2.2.5. Jesus Research in Practice: The Pragmatic Solution

In practice, a combination of the last two positions is generally accepted. In other words, the criterion of multiple attestation comes into play

<sup>14</sup> For this position, see W. G. Kümmel, “Jesusforschung seit 1950,” ThR 31 (1965–1966): 15–46, here 43; S. C. Goetz and C. L. Blomberg, “The Burden of Proof,” JSNT 11 (1981): 39–63, here 51–52; R. Latourelle, “Critères d’authenticité historique des Évangiles,” Greg 55 (1974): 609–638, at 617.

<sup>15</sup> H. McArthur, “The Burden of Proof in Historical Jesus Research,” ExpTim 82 (1970): 116–119.

<sup>16</sup> M. D. Hooker, “On Using the Wrong Tool,” Theology 75 (1972): 570–581, here 580. Cf. also R. S. Barbour, Traditio-Historical Criticism of the Gospels: Some Comments on Current Methods, SCC 4 (London: SPCK, 1972), 11.

<sup>17</sup> E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985), 333–334.

<sup>18</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 13; Ben F. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus (London: SCM, 1979), 81–87; J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, vol. 1, The Roots of the Problem and the Person (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 183; Theissen and Winter, The Quest for the Plausible Jesus, 204.

when there are enough contradictions between sources to safeguard their mutual independence but also enough agreements to allow for a coherent picture to emerge which one can assume to be consonant with the underlying historical reality. In this case, the burden of proof shifts to the side of the historical sceptics.<sup>19</sup> The historical evaluation of sources thus is part of the process from the outset without which the burden of proof does indeed rest on both sides.

3. The End of the Burden of Proof Debate and Its Limitations

3.1. The End of the Debate

For several reasons, the argument over the burden of proof died down after the early 1970's. First, many scholars agreed that the burden of proof should rest with those presuming historical veracity as much as with those who deny it. Secondly, the burden of proof issue was closely related to a quest for the historical Jesus, which concentrated on authenticity or inauthenticity of gospel texts, if not seeking the ipsis-sima vox or verba Jesu. This was a clear legacy of the New Quest with its concentration on reconstructing the message of Jesus. The gospel texts and their veracity or not were often at least as important as the reconstruction of the historical Jesus. However, the advent of the Third Quest moved away from this approach, and the gospel texts as an issue were subordinated to much more general historical questions about the figure of Jesus. Therefore, it appears that the burden of proof is no longer a live issue of debate.

We should note that the term "burden of proof" is still used in popular debates about Jesus, more recently for example in conjunction with The Da Vinci Code (novel by Dan Brown and the movie). Just as the burden of proof is pushed from one side to the other between atheists and theists concerning the existence of God, so debates on Jesus' existence argue over where the burden of proof should lie.

3.2. The Limitations of the Debate

One of the great limitations of the debate around the burden of proof in Jesus research was that it was partly a vicarious argument: strongly held opinions on the gospels were played out in the criteriological field of Jesus research.

---

<sup>19</sup> Cf. G. Theissen and A. Merz, The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide (London: SCM, 1998), 115–117.

The background of this debate is a time during which theologians and churches were dealing with the fallout of a historical-critical approach to the New Testament. The preoccupation with the historicity of the gospel texts is obvious from the use of emotive courtroom language while discussing the burden of proof. McArthur describes the tradition as being either “innocent” or “guilty,”<sup>20</sup> Goetz and Blomberg speak of “truth-telling” or “lying.”<sup>21</sup> This is telling language for what is ostensibly no more than establishing a starting point for research. The debate around the burden of proof was to some extent more about defining positions on the theological landscape than seeking actual methodological clarity.

There are also, of course, issues around the whole area of authenticity and historicity—what can ‘proof’ concerning historical texts possibly mean?<sup>22</sup> The concept is wide open to the suspicion that it wants to deal with absolute truth, with the apologetic motive of proving the biblical text to be ‘true.’ There is also a hermeneutical circle in which the question of authorship and authenticity of a saying or deed of Jesus is dependent on the meaning of the saying and vice versa. The interpretation and a judgment about a saying’s authenticity mutually condition each other. And finally, authenticity is no longer judged to be about the ipsissima verba (the ‘very words’) of Jesus since authenticity in the sense of verbal authorship could only be claimed properly if we had documents composed by Jesus himself. The thrust of historical Jesus research has moved to study the life and work of Jesus as a whole, and researching a picture of this life which ‘proves’ to be historically coherent and plausible appears to be more meaningful—albeit that this will include historical judgements as to the authenticity of individual sayings and deeds.

<sup>20</sup> McArthur, “The Burden of Proof in Historical Jesus Research,” 116.

<sup>21</sup> Goetz and Blomberg, “The Burden of Proof,” 52.

<sup>22</sup> For a more detailed reflection on these issues, see Theissen and Winter, The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria, 191–201. See also J. Riches and A. Millar, “Conceptual Change in the Synoptic Tradition,” in Alternative Approaches to New Testament Study, ed. A. E. Harvey (London: SPCK, 1985), 37–60.

4. Conclusion

The common sense approach of Hooker and others can only be commended for researching the gospel tradition. Requiring an explanation if a gospel text is to be judged as not historically authentic does not imply a literalist attitude to the New Testament, nor does demanding a reasonable account of evidence for genuineness mean an indictment of the gospels and their worth—both are simply in keeping with scholarly discipline.

The historical evaluation of gospel texts, whatever it is, and the reconstruction of the source background, need to be historically plausible. This is one important point of the criterion of historical plausibility<sup>23</sup> (cf. criteria of authenticity) which reinforces the closure of the debate on where the burden of proof should lie.

---

<sup>23</sup> See Theissen and Winter, The Quest for the Plausible Jesus, 128–129 and 172–212.

Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus

Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus

Volume 2

The Study of Jesus

Edited by

Tom Holmén and Stanley E. Porter

BRILL

LEIDEN • BOSTON
2011

This book is printed on acid-free paper.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication-Data

Handbook for the study of the historical Jesus / edited by Tom Holmén and Stanley E. Porter.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and indexes.

ISBN 978-90-04-16372-0 (hardback : alk. paper) 1. Jesus Christ—Historicity—
Study and teaching. I. Holmén, Tom. II. Porter, Stanley E., 1956–
BT303.2.H364 2010
232.9'08071—dc22

2010038765

ISBN Vol. 1: 978 90 04 17091 9

Vol. 2: 978 90 04 17092 6

Vol. 3: 978 90 04 17093 3

Vol. 4: 978 90 04 17094 0

Set: 978 90 04 16372 0

Copyright 2011 by Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, The Netherlands.
Koninklijke Brill NV incorporates the imprints Brill, Hotei Publishing, IDC Publishers, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers and VSP.

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, translated, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without prior written permission from the publisher.

Authorization to photocopy items for internal or personal use is granted by Koninklijke Brill NV provided that the appropriate fees are paid directly to The Copyright Clearance Center, 222 Rosewood Drive, Suite 910, Danvers, MA 01923, USA.
Fees are subject to change.

PRINTED IN THE NETHERLANDS

CONTENTS

VOLUME 1

HOW TO STUDY THE HISTORICAL JESUS

Introduction: The Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus in Perspective .....	xv
TOM HOLMÉN AND STANLEY E. PORTER

PART ONE

CONTEMPORARY METHODOLOGICAL APPROACHES

How to Marginalize the Traditional Criteria of Authenticity .....	3
DALE C. ALLISON, JR.
Fourth Quest? What Did Jesus Really Want? .....	31
ERNST BAASLAND
The Search for Jesus' Special Profile .....	57
JÜRGEN BECKER
The Historical Jesus: How to Ask Questions and Remain Inquisitive .....	91
JAMES H. CHARLESWORTH
Method in a Critical Study of Jesus .....	129
BRUCE D. CHILTON
Context and Text in Historical Jesus Methodology .....	159
JOHN DOMINIC CROSSAN
Remembering Jesus: How the Quest of the Historical Jesus Lost its Way .....	183
JAMES D. G. DUNN
Jesus-in-Context: A Relational Approach .....	207
RICHARD A. HORSLEY
Sources, Methods and Discursive Locations in the Quest of the Historical Jesus .....	241
JOHN S. KLOPPENBORG
Basic Methodology in the Quest for the Historical Jesus .....	291
JOHN P. MEIER

Jesus Research as Feedback on His Wirkungsgeschichte .....	333
PETR POKORNÝ
The Role of Greek Language Criteria in Historical Jesus Research .....	361
STANLEY E. PORTER
From the Messianic Teacher to the Gospels of Jesus Christ .....	405
RAINER RIESNER
The Gospel of the Historical Jesus .....	447
JAMES M. ROBINSON
Scholarly Rigor and Intuition in Historical Research into Jesus .....	475
JACQUES SCHLOSSER
Critical Feminist Historical-Jesus Research .....	509
ELISABETH SCHÜSSLER FIORENZA
Historical Scepticism and the Criteria of Jesus Research: My Attempt to Leap Over Lessing's Ugly Wide Ditch .....	549
GERD THEISSEN
A Metalanguage for the Historical Jesus Methods: An Experiment .....	589
TOM HOLMÉN

PART TWO

VARIOUS ASPECTS OF HISTORICAL
JESUS METHODOLOGY

With the Grain and against the Grain: A Strategy for Reading the Synoptic Gospels .....	619
COLIN BROWN
Form Criticism and Jesus Research .....	649
ARLAND J. HULTGREN
Tradition Criticism and Jesus Research .....	673
GRANT R. OSBORNE
The Criteria of Authenticity .....	695
STANLEY E. PORTER
Alternatives to Form and Tradition Criticism in Jesus Research .....	715
TOBIAS NICKLAS
Social-Scientific Approaches and Jesus Research .....	743
BRUCE J. MALINA

New Literary Criticism and Jesus Research .....	777
ELIZABETH STRUTHERS MALBON
Memory Theory and Jesus Research .....	809
ALAN KIRK
The Burden of Proof in Jesus Research .....	843
DAGMAR WINTER

VOLUME 2

THE STUDY OF JESUS

Introduction: The Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus in Perspective .....	xv
TOM HOLMÉN AND STANLEY E. PORTER

PART ONE

THE ONGOING QUEST FOR THE HISTORICAL JESUS

The Quest of the Unhistorical Jesus and the Quest of the Historical Jesus .....	855
COLIN BROWN
Futures for the Jesus Quests .....	887
BENGT HOLMBERG
The Parable of the Goose and the Mirror: The Historical Jesus in the Theological Discipline .....	919
SCOT MCKNIGHT
Historical Jesus Research in Global Cultural Context .....	953
TERESA OKURE
Diverse Agendas at Work in the Jesus Quest .....	985
CLIVE MARSH
Jesus of Nazareth and the Christ of Faith: Approaches to the Question in Historical Jesus Research .....	1021
SVEN-OLAV BACK
The Jesus Quest and Jewish-Christian Relations .....	1055
DONALD A. HAGNER
Historic Jesuses .....	1079
CEES DEN HEYER

PART TWO

CURRENT QUESTIONS OF JESUS RESEARCH

Jesus and Cynicism .....	1105
F. GERALD DOWNING
Jesus and the Scriptures of Israel .....	1137
STEVE MOYISE
Implicit Christology and the Historical Jesus .....	1169
EDWIN K. BROADHEAD
Jesus and the “Partings of the Ways” .....	1183
MICHAEL F. BIRD
Prophet, Sage, Healer, Messiah, and Martyr: Types and Identities of Jesus .....	1217
CRAIG A. EVANS
Jesus im Licht der Qumrangemeinde .....	1245
HEINZ-WOLFGANG KUHN
Jesus without Q .....	1287
MICHAEL GOULDER
Dispensing with the Priority of Mark .....	1313
DAVID L. DUNGAN
The Role of Aramaic in Reconstructing the Teaching of Jesus ...	1343
MAURICE CASEY
The Quest for the Historical Jesus in Postmodern Perspective: A Hypothetical Argument .....	1377
MOISÉS MAYORDOMO AND PETER-BEN SMIT
Why Study the Historical Jesus? .....	1411
COLIN BROWN

PART THREE

PERSISTING ISSUES ADJACENT TO THE JESUS QUEST

The Context of Jesus: Jewish and/or Hellenistic? .....	1441
STANLEY E. PORTER
The Transmission of the Jesus Tradition .....	1465
SAMUEL BYRSKOG
Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes, Herodians .....	1495
ÉTIENNE NODET
The Son of Man in Ancient Judaism .....	1545
JOHN J. COLLINS

Jewish Apocalyptic and Apocalypticism .....	1569
CRISPIN FLETCHER-LOUIS
Anti-Judaism and the New Testament .....	1609
LUKE TIMOTHY JOHNSON
The Writings of Josephus: Their Significance for New Testament Study .....	1639
STEVE MASON
Rabbinic Writings in New Testament Research .....	1687
DAVID INSTONE-BREWER
Synagogue and Sanhedrin in the First Century .....	1723
LESTER L. GRABBE
Echoes from the Wilderness: The Historical John the Baptist ....	1747
KNUT BACKHAUS
Historiographical Literature in the New Testament Period (1st and 2nd centuries CE) .....	1787
EVE-MARIE BECKER

VOLUME 3

THE HISTORICAL JESUS

Introduction: The Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus in Perspective .....	xv
TOM HOLMÉN AND STANLEY E. PORTER

PART ONE

JESUS TRADITION IN INDIVIDUAL DOCUMENTS

The Historical Jesus in the Gospel of Mark .....	1821
JOANNA DEWEY
Jesus Tradition in non-Markan Material Common to Matthew and Luke .....	1853
CHRISTOPHER TUCKETT
The Special Material in Matthew's Gospel .....	1875
DONALD SENIOR, C.P.
Luke and Acts .....	1901
JOHN NOLLAND
The Non-Synoptic Jesus: An Introduction to John, Paul, Thomas, and Other Outsiders of the Jesus Quest .....	1933
MICHAEL LABAHN

Jesus Tradition in the Gospel of John .....	1997
D. MOODY SMITH
Jesus Tradition in the Letters of the New Testament .....	2041
DAVID WENHAM
The Thomas-Jesus Connection .....	2059
EDWIN K. BROADHEAD
Traditions about Jesus in Apocryphal Gospels (with the Exception of the Gospel of Thomas) .....	2081
TOBIAS NICKLAS
Jesus Tradition in Early Patristic Writings .....	2119
RIEMER ROUKEMA
Jesus Tradition in Classical and Jewish Writings .....	2149
ROBERT E. VAN VOORST

PART TWO

FUNDAMENTALLY ABOUT JESUS

The Historicity of Jesus: How Do We Know That Jesus Existed? .....	2183
SAMUEL BYRSKOG
Background I: Jesus of History and the Topography of the Holy Land .....	2213
JAMES H. CHARLESWORTH
Background II: (Some) Literary Documents .....	2243
MARTIN MCNAMARA
Background III: The Social and Political Climate in which Jesus of Nazareth Preached .....	2291
WOLFGANG STEGEMANN
The Chronology of Jesus .....	2315
HAROLD W. HOEHNER
The Birth of Jesus .....	2361
RICHARD T. FRANCE
The Death of Jesus .....	2383
JOEL B. GREEN
The Resurrection of Jesus .....	2409
PHEME PERKINS
Family, Friends, and Foes .....	2433
JOEL B. GREEN

The Language(s) Jesus Spoke .....	2455
STANLEY E. PORTER
The Self-Understanding of Jesus .....	2473
MATHIAS KREPLIN
The Message of Jesus I: Miracles, Continuing Controversies .....	2517
GRAHAM H. TWELFTREE
The Message of Jesus II: Parables .....	2549
ARLAND J. HULTGREN

PART THREE

JESUS AND THE LEGACY OF ISRAEL

Jesus and God .....	2575
MARIANNE MEYE THOMPSON
Jesus and The Sabbath .....	2597
SVEN-OLAV BACK
Jesus and the Temple .....	2635
JOSTEIN ÅDNA
Jesus and the Shema .....	2677
KIM HUAT TAN
Jesus and the Purity Paradigm .....	2709
TOM HOLMÉN
Jesus and the Law .....	2745
WILLIAM LOADER
Jesus and the Holy Land .....	2773
KAREN J. WENELL
Jesus and Sinners and Outcasts .....	2801
BRUCE CHILTON
Jesus and Israel's Eschatological Constitution .....	2835
STEVEN M. BRYAN
Jesus, Satan, and Company .....	2855
DARRELL BOCK
Jesus and Apocalypticism .....	2877
CRISPIN FLETCHER-LOUIS

VOLUME 4

INDIVIDUAL STUDIES

Introduction: The Handbook for Study of the Historical Jesus in Perspective .....	xv
TOM HOLMÉN AND STANLEY E. PORTER
The “Dark Side of Power”—Beelzebul: Manipulated or Manipulator? Reflections on the History of a Conflict in the Traces Left in the Memory of its Narrators .....	2911
MICHAEL LABAHN
Did Jesus Break the Fifth (Fourth) Commandment? .....	2947
PETER BALLA
Did Jesus Stay at Bethsaida? Arguments from Ancient Texts and Archaeology for Bethsaida and et-Tell .....	2973
HEINZ-WOLFGANG KUHN
Flawed Heroes and Stories Jesus Told: The One About a Man Wanting to Kill .....	3023
CHARLES W. HEDRICK
Jesus and Magic: The Question of the Miracles .....	3057
BERND KOLLMANN
Jesus and the Greeks: A Semiotic Reading of John 12:20–28 .....	3087
JOSEPH PATHRAPANKAL
Jesus and the Synagogue .....	3105
GRAHAM H. TWELFTREE
Jesus and the Ten Words .....	3135
HERMUT LOEHR
Jesus as Moving Image: The Public Responsibility of the Historical Jesus Scholar in the Age of Film .....	3155
CLIVE MARSH
Jesus’ “Magic” from a Theodicean Perspective .....	3179
TOM HOLMÉN
Jesus’ “Rhetoric”: The Rise and Fall of “The Kingdom of God” .....	3201
JAMES M. ROBINSON
Jewish Galilee .....	3221
ETIENNE NODET
On Avoiding Bothersome Busyness: Q/Luke 12:22–31 in its Greco-Roman Context .....	3245
GERALD DOWNING

Poverty and Wealth in Jesus and the Jesus Tradition .....	3269
HEINZ GIESEN
The Question of the Baptists' Disciples on Fasting (Matt 9:14–17; Mark 2:18–22; Luke 5:33–39) .....	3305
RAINER RIESNER
Riddles, Wit, and Wisdom .....	3349
TOM THATCHER
Three Questions about the Life of Jesus .....	3373
CHRISTIAN-BERNARD AMPHOUX
Why Was Jesus Not Born in Nazareth? .....	3409
ARMAND PUIG I TÀRRECH
Words of Jesus in Paul: On the Theology and Praxis of the Jesus Tradition .....	3437
PETR POKORNÝ
Index of Ancient Sources .....	3469
Index of Modern Authors .....	3605

INTRODUCTION

THE HANDBOOK FOR THE STUDY OF THE HISTORICAL JESUS IN PERSPECTIVE

TOM HOLMÉN AND STANLEY E. PORTER

A hundred years ago, Albert Schweitzer gathered the bulk of the most important (mostly German) Jesus research done during the preceding two centuries (the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries) within one cover and made an assessment of it. Today, to write a summa historica of Jesus studies is not an undertaking that one person could embark on and realistically hope to accomplish (not even two people), but requires a collaboration of a legio of the best minds from across many countries and cultures. Albert Schweitzer's Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung<sup>1</sup> marked a significant milestone in historical Jesus scholarship, a movement that has continued in various forms and in diverse ways, but in all events unabated, until today. As a result, in a 1994 article, James Charlesworth, who himself has been actively involved in the recent expansion of historical Jesus study, asserted that historical Jesus study was expanding with "chaotic creativity."<sup>2</sup> While an apt and appropriate description of the condition of the times, this characterization is all the more accurate today, fifteen years later. Since its latest renaissance in the 1980s,<sup>3</sup> historical Jesus study has continued to expand, drawing into its broadening scope more and more scholars of the New Testament and cognate areas. There is an abundance of Jesus studies today that displays an almost overwhelming diversity of methods, approaches, hypotheses, assumptions, and results. While creativity and fecundity are theoretically

---

<sup>1</sup> A. Schweitzer, Von Reimarus zu Wrede: Eine Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1906). The second edition was simply entitled: Die Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung (1913). The English translation was entitled: The Quest for the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede, trans. W. Montgomery, with a preface by F. C. Burkitt (London: Adam and Charles Black, 1910).

<sup>2</sup> J. H. Charlesworth, "Jesus Research Expands with Chaotic Creativity," in Images of Jesus Today, ed. J. H. Charlesworth and W. P. Weaver (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1994), 1–41.

<sup>3</sup> See M. J. Borg, "A Renaissance in Jesus Studies," TheoIT 45 (1988): 280–292.

to be welcomed, chaotic creativity works against the scholarly pursuit of orderly understanding, and the sheer mass of material threatens to overwhelm even the heartiest of participants in the quest. However, in some instances such creativity can spur on and nourish various forms of enquiry that result in unpredictable and unplanned results. The future of historical Jesus study rests with the community of scholars being able to harness this chaotic creativity to its service, and to create order out of a morass of growing detail.

What are the purposes of Jesus research? The first one is clearly an abiding academic purpose. This has always been regarded as important and has, together with the latest renaissance of Jesus study, only grown in importance. In fact, if “academic” and “historical” can be seen to correlate, many scholars would claim that this is what the study of Jesus today is all about. According to many representative Jesus questers, a main characteristic of current Jesus research is that it is being spurred and guided by an outspoken historical interest. Indeed, Jesus lies at the juncture of many interests and phenomena that are crucial to understanding great lines of historical development and that form the basis of understanding the world today. There is therefore no doubt about the great historical and academic value of Jesus research. However, several other purposes, motivations, and aspirations obviously feed into the historical pursuit of Jesus. Among these are religious, political, cultural, artistic, fictional, romantic, psychological, financial, apologetic, and simply personal reasons to engage in conversing about Jesus of Nazareth. We merely state this as an observable fact: such purposes for Jesus research exist and are being pursued in practice. Unfortunately, sometimes scholars too easily classify such purposes as either well- or ill-founded. In the post-colonial, post-Einsteinian, post-modern, post-structural (some say even post-human) etc. world of ours, who can be so clear as to be able to tell the difference between relevant and irrelevant motivations, not to speak of labeling them as either good or bad? Nevertheless, in all this it is vital to genuinely retain the concepts of historical Jesus and historical Jesus research around which the variegated conversation centers and revolves. How this happens and is realized may not be an easy or altogether straightforward thing to do.

The Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus (HSHJ) was designed to be one, important means of handling both the growing abundance and the increasing diversity of Jesus scholarship. Such is not an easy task, as we the editors have grown to appreciate in the course of creating this set of volumes. Putting the diversity on display in a controlled, manageable, and understandable fashion, while acknowledging the numerous and diverse major issues, and ensuring that as many as possible of the important adjacent themes are recognized, has been a significant task. The HSHJ seeks to offer a convenient, even if still circuitous, route through the maze of current historical Jesus research, so that scholars and other interested parties can appreciate the broad and diverse spectrum of current opinion.

There have been a number of recent efforts to survey the history of historical Jesus scholarship, which we have taken into account in planning these volumes. Some of these publications have included individual essays that try to cover the range of major topics, although no effort to date has included as many as this set of volumes.<sup>4</sup> Several of these studies are retrospective accounts that anthologize past statements of significance in the study of the historical Jesus, but they lack the contemporary coordinating force of the HSHJ.<sup>5</sup> Even those publications that attempt to address the contemporary issues in historical Jesus research in a coordinated fashion, because of their encyclopedic nature, are unable to provide the kind of depth and even breadth of exposure that these volumes contain.<sup>6</sup> Whatever merits such previous volumes may have, and they have many, none of them is designed to accomplish the same goals as the Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus.

There are many distinguishable features of the HSHJ. This collection of four volumes of essays first of all seeks to be thorough and inclusive. We realize that there are always other opinions that could be included in volumes such as these, but we have tried to solicit and elicit as much of that diverse opinion as was available for publication. We want this collection to serve, not only as a historical encapsulation of the topics of their day, but as a worthy expression of the range of viable thought currently available in historical Jesus studies.

Besides the inclusive nature of these volumes, we have sought for HSHJ to be international in scope, not simply for the sake of diversity,

---

<sup>4</sup> E.g. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, eds., Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, NTTS 19 (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994).

<sup>5</sup> See, e.g., H. K. McArthur, ed., In Search of the Historical Jesus (New York: Scribners, 1969); G. W. Dawes, ed., The Historical Jesus Quest: A Foundational Anthology (Leiden: Deo, 1999); C. A. Evans, ed., The Historical Jesus: Critical Concepts in Religious Studies, 4 vols. (London: Routledge, 2004); J. D. G. Dunn and S. McKnight, eds., The Historical Jesus in Recent Research, Sources for Biblical and Theological Study 10 (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2005).

<sup>6</sup> E.g. C. A. Evans, ed., Encyclopedia of the Historical Jesus (London: Routledge, 2007).

but so that multiple voices can be ably represented in the discussion. The approximately one-hundred contributors to this project come from around twenty different countries. Some countries no doubt are represented more heavily than others, and some other important nationalities may be under-represented or not represented at all. This was not by design, as our purpose from the start has been to try to free the discussion of Jesus from regional or local agendas and schools of thought.

Besides the multiplicity of voices from a wide range of places and people, in the HSHJ we have sought to free study of the historical Jesus from the trammels of a variety of other restraints. We have been conscious that study of Jesus in the past has been directly linked to particular forms and contents of higher education, and even specific methodologies, and that such study has often gone hand-in-hand with particular religious, cultural or even political traditions and histories. This set of volumes has been created to move beyond, or perhaps even rise above, such artificially imposed constraints. As a result, though ideologies will no doubt be present in the individual contributions, the volumes as a whole are not reacting or responding to any particular local or even nationally determined situation with regard to historical Jesus study. Our primary criterion in selecting and welcoming the contributors has been their expertise and their addressing a topic of relevance. Despite our best efforts, there is no doubt that most of the contributors are still “white male western Europeans and European-Americans” (as Richard Horsley states).<sup>7</sup> We accept this comment, while acknowledging also that our best efforts were put into attempts not to fall victim to this as an inevitable conclusion. Nevertheless, it is probably a realistic observation of the situation that prevails in historical Jesus studies to this day. Whether it will be different in the future, we must wait and see.

The efforts above have been undertaken so that we could focus these volumes on what we consider the most important elements in current study of the historical Jesus. In order to do this, we have divided the essays into four structured volumes.

As a result of this process of assessment, what became evident was that one of the most important sources of continued diversity in historical Jesus study is the element of methodological divergence. Methodological diversity entails the formulation of varied and disparate conscious approaches to the study of Jesus. Questions of method are inevitably confronted at the outset of any scientific or historical investigation, and usually indicate the significant parting of the ways between differing approaches to the same body of data. Consequently, volume one of the HSHJ is dedicated to questions of method. Realizing and being knowledgeable of the different methodological starting points in historical Jesus study not only facilitates one's determination and understanding of the results, but also gives important and necessary insight into the reasons for the results and their implications. In other words, attention to method forces us to ask the question of why it is that a particular scholar comes to a specific set of conclusions, as opposed to a different set of conclusions. In this regard, the first volume of HSHJ itself speaks volumes about historical Jesus research. In this volume, we have attempted to assemble many of the world's leading experts on methodological questions regarding the study of Jesus. They present their approaches to study of the historical Jesus as a means of introducing us to the fundamental issues at stake. This is not to deny that there is some challenging reading to be had in this volume, but within this one volume the reader has easier access than before to the range of methods currently at play in historical Jesus studies. By using this volume, scholars and students alike will be able learn about methods with which they are less familiar, compare the major features of these methods, and determine how the varied hypotheses about the historical figure of Jesus are rooted in methodological choices made at the early stages of thinking and research.

---

<sup>7</sup> See his article in volume one.

The first volume is, therefore, divided into two parts. The first part includes a wide range of distinct methodological statements by advocates of those methods. This part encompasses the methods that are distinct to historical Jesus study as it has been practiced over the last twenty to thirty years. It is here that we gain further insight into the approaches that have been adopted by a wide range of scholars who have had influence within historical Jesus study, as they have tried to define the nature and characteristics of the study and its results. Part two of this volume extends the range of methodologies to the interaction between historical Jesus study and methods that have proven themselves in other areas of New Testament and cognates studies. Some of these are the traditional methods of biblical study, while others are recent innovations influenced by the rise of various types of social-science criticism. The interface of Jesus study and these methods has provided a range of results that help to ensure that the study of Jesus will not soon grow quiescent.

The second volume of HSHJ focuses on the history and future of historical Jesus research, by identifying many if not most of the specific issues of contention that have been raised in the broad and long history of Jesus study. This volume is divided into three parts. The first part deals with the notion of quests for the historical Jesus. One of the points of continued contention in study of Jesus is not only whether there are periods in such study, but how current study relates to previous study, in terms of both its methods and its results. Here various authors address the relation of Jesus study to the various quests that have been proposed. The second part of the volume brings to the fore questions that are being asked in the contemporary climate of historical Jesus studies. These include the questions that are currently and recurrently at the forefront of discussion, often suggesting in their questions an alternative to the course that previous research has taken. Part three of this volume addresses some of the perennial topics in Jesus research. In some ways, these are issues that are either assumed or regularly taken into account in formulating various hypotheses about Jesus. They form the convenient and necessary intellectual background for pursuing historical Jesus studies.

The third volume of HSHJ brings Jesus himself as a historical figure directly into the discussion. There are three parts in this volume as well. The first part treats Jesus in regard to primary documents of the ancient world, such as the canonical gospels, other portions of the New Testament, and non-canonical works. The second part of this volume takes the elements of the life of Jesus and exposes them to rigorous critical and scholarly scrutiny. Rather than examine Jesus in terms of how he is depicted in one of the biblical books (as in the previous section of this volume) or in terms of a particular issue, this section dissects the life of Jesus in terms of its logical and necessary components, from issues of historicity to his teaching and message, and many if not most places in between. It is in studies such as these that one realizes the importance of the previous studies and approaches for the explication of these subject areas. These topics bring to bear the variety of issues previously discussed. The third part of this volume relates Jesus to the legacy of Israel. Jesus' Jewish roots and relations have long been an essential item of discussion and contention in historical Jesus studies. In this part, various key elements of his relationship to Israel are scrutinized. The result of this set of studies is to place Jesus firmly within his Jewish context, a desideratum of much recent historical Jesus scholarship.

The fourth and final volume of HSHJ is a collection of individual studies by a range of scholars. It is a positive comment on the state of current historical Jesus study that, even with the best planning and intention, it is difficult, if not impossible, to plan and anticipate all of the necessary topics for such a comprehensive study. Therefore, we have designed this fourth volume to include important studies that we have solicited and have had submitted for which there was no other place in the volume, but that warranted a position in a compendium of scholarship such as this handbook attempts to be. There is a wide range of valuable research to be found in this fourth volume. Some of the studies explore areas for which there has been very little previous Jesus research but in which the author shows there is a lamentable lacking and oversight in the discipline. Others of the studies take topics on the fringe of either Jesus studies or contemporary culture and try to bridge the two in creative and insightful ways. Finally, some of the studies are designed to focus on particular and specific issues that would otherwise have been overlooked in the course of this study, but that a perceptive scholar realized would make a contribution to the final product.

The results of a project such as this are many and varied. We do not doubt that many of the significant contributions to scholarship found in these volumes will establish themselves as standards in the field and continue to have warranted influence on the study of the historical Jesus. Such studies may well be found in any or all of the volumes. We further believe that there are a number of essays that will have uncovered or discovered or even re-discovered insights that have been lost or lost sight of or not yet sighted, and that will bring these into consideration on the broader canvas of historical Jesus studies. There are other essays within these volumes that have broken some boundaries and will establish themselves as new and innovative ways forward in the discussion. The problem is that it is not easy to tell which essays are which, and what the significance of each individual contribution will be. We are confident, however, that these volumes contain, as much as is possible within the parameters of such a project, a responsible and representative, and in some cases even forthright or contrarian, presentation of the current state of historical Jesus scholarship. Such scholarship is the backbone of a project such as this, and is a mainstay of how one approaches contemporary New Testament scholarship. There are essays within this collection that will prove to be seminal for study of the historical Jesus, as they force both sympathetic and unsympathetic readers to contemplate issues and perspectives in ways that were unanticipated. Such scholarship helps to pave the way forward for further research. Its place of final repose cannot be predicted or estimated.

PART ONE

THE ONGOING QUEST FOR THE HISTORICAL JESUS

THE QUEST OF THE UNHISTORICAL JESUS AND THE QUEST OF THE HISTORICAL JESUS

COLIN BROWN

For much of its history the Christian church has been—and still is—engaged in a quest of the unhistorical Jesus. The quest of the historical Jesus is relatively new, and began with the English Deists in the second half of the seventeenth century.<sup>1</sup> The purpose of this article is to compare the two quests, focusing on theological issues.

1. The Quest of the Unhistorical Jesus

The quest of the unhistorical Jesus follows two paths. In art, literature, and popular culture Jesus is more the presupposition of faith than a historical figure to be investigated.<sup>2</sup> Since this path leads to the domain of social history, which lies outside the scope of this book, I shall venture no further down it. The other path is that of religious belief. The motive for going down it is summed up by the Reformer, Philip Melancthon: “[T]o know Christ means to know his benefits . . . For unless you know why Christ put on flesh and was nailed to the cross, what good will it do you to know merely the history about him?”<sup>3</sup> Luther agreed. “If I had to do without one or the other—either the works or the preaching of Christ—I would rather do without the works than without his preaching. For the works do not help me. But his words

---

<sup>1</sup> Colin Brown, Jesus in European Protestant Thought, 1779–1860 (Durham: Labyrinth, 1985; reprint Pasadena, CA: Fuller Seminary Press, 2008), 1–55.

<sup>2</sup> Jaroslav Pelikan, Jesus through the Centuries: His Place in the History of Culture (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1985); Stanley E. Porter, Michael A. Hayes, and David Tombs, eds., Images of Christ Ancient and Modern (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997); Richard W. Fox, Jesus in America: A History of Our National Obsession from Columbus to Columbine (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 2003); R. Laurence Moore, Touchdown Jesus: The Mixing of Sacred and Secular in American Religion (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2003); Stephen R. Prothero, The American Jesus: How the Son of God Became a National Icon (New York: Farrar, Straus, and Giroux, 2003).

<sup>3</sup> Philip Melancthon, Loci Communes (1521), Melancthon and Bucer, LCC 19, ed. Wilhelm Pauck (London: SCM, 1969), 21–22.

give life, as he himself says [John 6:63]... Therefore John's Gospel is the one, fine, true, and chief gospel, and is far, far to be preferred over the other three and placed high above them. So, too, the epistles of St. Paul and St. Peter far surpass the other three gospels, Matthew, Mark, and Luke."<sup>4</sup>

From the early church onwards theology was driven by what Wolfhart Pannenberg calls Christology "from above."<sup>5</sup> Christology "from above" purports to give God's perspective, as it attempts to explain the logic of the incarnation from the standpoint of salvation history. The messianic "Son of God" of the gospels became the pre-existent God the Son—the Second Person of the Trinity—who came down to earth for the salvation of humankind. As theology pursued a relentless quest of the unhistorical Jesus, it moved increasingly away from the Jesus of Second Temple Judaism.

The church took a step away from the historical Jesus when it adopted the convention of translating the New Testament Greek form of his name Ἰησοῦς (Iesous) into the Latin Jesus.<sup>6</sup> In so doing, it obscured its Semitic form Yeshua. During Yeshua's lifetime perhaps the only ones who called him Jesus were Pontius Pilate and the Roman soldiers who crucified him. The effect of the transformation of Yeshua into Jesus was to contextualize him for the Roman world. The contextualization obliterated the connection between Yeshua of Nazareth and the Yeshua (Joshua) of the Old Testament.<sup>7</sup> The price was to turn Yeshua into a virtual Gentile whose fate was to live among recalcitrant "Jews."

A parallel move was the adoption of "Jew" as the generic term for Judeans, Galileans, and Israelites. Ἰουδαῖος (Judaios) strictly means

<sup>4</sup> Preface to the New Testament (1522), Luther's Works, 35, ed. E. Theodore Bachmann (Philadelphia: Muhlenberg, 1960), 362.

<sup>5</sup> Jesus—God and Man, trans. Lewis L. Wilkins and Duane A. Priebe (London: SCM, 1968), 21–37.

<sup>6</sup> Yeshua and Yeshu are shortened forms of Yehoshua, the name of Moses' successor and leader of the conquest of the Promised Land, Joshua the son of Nun. The name originally meant "Yahweh helps" or "May Yahweh help." Ἰησοῦς is also used in the LXX, Josephus, and the New Testament (Heb 4:8) for Joshua the son of Nun. See John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, I: The Roots of the Problem and the Person (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 205–208; BDAG, 471–72.

<sup>7</sup> J. D. M. Derrett, "Crumbs in Mark," and "Why and How Jesus Walked on the Sea," in Studies in the New Testament (Leiden: Brill, 1986), 4:82–91, 92–111; Colin Brown, "The Jesus of Mark's Gospel," in Jesus Then & Now: Images of Jesus in History and Christology, ed. Marvin Meyer and Charles Hughes (Harrisburg: Trinity Press International, 2001), 35–36.

Judean, an inhabitant of Judea.<sup>8</sup> “Jew” is an anachronism, which has the effect of pitting Jesus against Jews in general, whereas historically the clash was between Yeshua and the Judeans. The point is highlighted by John 7:1 NRSV: “After this Jesus went about in Galilee. He did not wish not go about in Judea, because the Jews [Ἰουδαῖοι] were looking for an opportunity to kill him.” But if we substitute “Judeans” for “Jews,” we get a translation that makes sense: “After this Jesus went about in Galilee. He did not wish to go about in Judea because the Judeans were looking for an opportunity to kill him.” Having made my point, I regretfully revert to using Jesus and Jews if only for the sake of communication.

The Arian controversy was the first of a series of clashes that shaped Christology. It dates from dispute of the Alexandrian presbyter Arius (d. 336) with his bishop over the divinity of Christ.<sup>9</sup> Arius saw Jesus as a creature who could not share the divinity of the Father. The dispute led to the Council of Nicea (325) with its condemnation of Arius and its affirmation of “one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the only-begotten from the Father, that is from the substance of the Father, God from God, light from light, true God from true God, begotten not made, consubstantial with the Father [ὁμοούσιον τῷ πατρὶ].”<sup>10</sup> Though never free from controversy, homoousios became part of orthodoxy, incorporated into the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed (381)<sup>11</sup> and the formula of Chalcedon (451).<sup>12</sup> The concept, though not <sup>8</sup> BDAG, 478–479; M. Lowe, “Who Were the Ἰουδαῖοι?” NovT 18 (1976): 101–130; Urban C. von Wahlde, “The Johannine ‘Jews’: A Critical Survey,” NTS 28 (1982): 33–60; Graham A. P. Harvey, The True Israel: Uses of the Names Jew, Hebrew and Israel in Ancient Jewish and Early Christian Literature, AGJU 35 (Leiden: Brill, 1996); Shaye J. D. Cohen, The Beginnings of Jewishness: Boundaries, Varieties, Uncertainties (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999).

---

<sup>9</sup> Robert C. Gregg and Dennis E. Groh, Early Arianism: A View of Salvation (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981); Rowan Williams, Arius: Heresy and Tradition, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2002); R. P. C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318–381 (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1988); Maurice Wiles, Archetypal Heresy: Arianism through the Centuries (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996).

<sup>10</sup> Decrees of the Ecumenical Councils, ed. Norman P. Tanner (Washington: Georgetown University Press, 1990), 1:5.

<sup>11</sup> Decrees 1:21.

<sup>12</sup> Decrees 1:86. Chalcedon was a compromise patchwork of phrases drawn from tradition and the warring schools of Antioch and Alexandria. It affirmed a double homoousion: the Son was “consubstantial with the Father as regards his divinity and the same consubstantial with us as regards his humanity; like us in all respects except for sin.”

necessarily the term, lives on in those churches where the Nicene Creed forms part of their liturgy. Sunday by Sunday members of the Episcopal Church (myself included) profess their faith in “one Lord Jesus Christ, the only Son of God, eternally begotten of the Father, God from God, Light from Light, true God from true God, begotten, not made, of one Being with the Father.”<sup>13</sup>

Athanasius (ca. 296–373) of Alexandria vehemently opposed Arianism. His De Incarnatione argued that, “He was made man that we might be made God; and he manifested himself by a body that we might receive the idea of the unseen Father; and he endured the insolence of men that we might inherit immortality” (§54).<sup>14</sup> In the nineteenth century, Alexandrian word-flesh Christology won endorsement from John Henry Newman who urged, “Though man, He was not, strictly speaking, in the English sense of the word, a man.”<sup>15</sup>

Two observations may be made. The first concerns the strategy of trying to show that the Savior must possess certain qualities: he must be human (though not a sinner) in order to be our representative, and God in order to overcome evil and death. The argument is like a game that anyone can play and win—if one loads the dice. It was a game played by both the orthodox and the heterodox. The way that Athanasius played it led to vindication of orthodoxy. But an Arian could argue that Christ could not be consubstantial with the Father who is immutable and impassible. Jesus suffered and died. One could say that he was like God, but not “the only true God” (John 17:3).<sup>16</sup>

My second observation concerns the creeds. One would never imagine from them that Jesus was Jewish. The Apostles’ Creed reduces the life of Jesus to a comma between “born of the Virgin Mary” and “suffered under Pontius Pilate.” The Nicene Creed makes it the presupposition of faith. Should we not silently add with Jürgen Moltmann?

Baptized by John the Baptist,
Filled with the Holy Spirit:
to preach the kingdom of God to the poor,

<sup>13</sup> The Book of Common Prayer (1979), 358.

<sup>14</sup> Edward Rochie Hardy and Cyril C. Richardson, eds., The Christology of the Later Fathers, LCC 3 (London: SCM, 1954), 107–108.

<sup>15</sup> Parochial and Plain Sermons (London: Rivingtons, 1868), 6:62; cf. Newman, Select Treatises of St. Athanasius in Controversy with the Arians, freely Translated, 7th ed. (London: Longmans, 1897), 2:192; Roderick Strange, Newman and the Gospel of Christ (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1981), 47–67.

<sup>16</sup> Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God, 109–110, 562–572.

to heal the sick,
to receive those who have been cast out, to revive Israel for the salvation of the nations, and to have mercy on all people.<sup>17</sup>

The first theologian to announce his intention of proving the rational necessity of the incarnation “apart from Christ, as if there was never anything about him [remoto Cbristo, quasi numquam aliquid de illo]”<sup>18</sup> was Anselm (ca. 1033–1109). Anselm’s Cur Deus Homo (Why God Became Man) resembles a mathematical equation that determines the value of X in light of given premises, a, b, c, d, etc. The premises—“That the redemption of mankind could not have been brought about by any other than a divine person,” “That the devil has no jurisdiction over man,” “that [Christ] died voluntarily,” “That mankind cannot be saved without recompense for sin,” etc.<sup>19</sup>—are supplied by articles of faith. The argument has an internal consistency commensurate with Anselm’s profession Credo ut intelligam—“I believe so that I may understand.”<sup>20</sup>

Richard Swinburne’s “Evidence for the Incarnation”<sup>21</sup> updates Athanasius and Anselm.<sup>22</sup> Against the “background evidence”—“that there is a God of the traditional kind” with the “power” and “good reason to become incarnate”<sup>23</sup>—Swinburne identifies five reasons which would qualify a candidate as “God incarnate.” He or she “should have led a perfect life and provided deep moral teaching”; he should state publicly that his death was a sacrifice for sin; his teaching should include that he was “God incarnate”; he should provide means of continuing his faith and practice (the church); and he should provide a “supermiracle” (the resurrection).<sup>24</sup> Jesus is the best candidate for this profile. Finally, Swinburne appeals to Bayes’ Theorem of Probability to show that Chalcedon was right after all.<sup>25</sup>

<sup>17</sup> The Way of Jesus Christ: Christology in Messianic Dimensions, trans. Margaret Kohl (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1990), 150.

<sup>18</sup> Cur Deus Homo, Preface (author’s translation, Anselm, Opera Omnia, ed. F. S. Schmitt [Stuttgart-Bad Canstatt: Frommann, reprint 1984], 2:42).

<sup>19</sup> Why God Became Man 1.1.

<sup>20</sup> Proslogion 1 (Opera 1:100).

<sup>21</sup> In Jesus Then & Now, ed. Meyer and Hughes, 170–185.

<sup>22</sup> “Evidence”, 173.

<sup>23</sup> Ibid., 177.

<sup>24</sup> Ibid., 177–179.

<sup>25</sup> Ibid., 180–183.

The argument runs into two roadblocks. The first is the problem of trying to assign quantifiable values to historical evidence and theological interpretation. Then there is the fact that its ostensibly self-evident premises are themselves faith-based, and whatever logic they have is a consistency internal to the belief-system to which they belong. As with all a priori theories of atonement, we are left with the feeling that the theological rationale “from above” and the course of events narrated in the gospels belong to different worlds.

The second roadblock also confronts theologies at the other end of the spectrum. The upside to process christology<sup>26</sup> and feminist christology<sup>27</sup> is their promise of new perspectives. The downside is the creation of christologies that exchange the Jesus of history for one that fits a modern agenda. Even though more orthodox Christians believe in the incarnation, history is not a priority.<sup>28</sup> But the question remains: Has the quest of the historical Jesus brought us any closer to Yeshua of Nazareth?

2. The Quest of the Historical Jesus

The gospels, which are increasingly seen as ancient biography,<sup>29</sup> together with extra-biblical texts,<sup>30</sup> present the sources and challenge to see Jesus as a historical person.

2.1. The Old Quest

The idea of a concerted quest of the historical Jesus gained currency through the work of Albert Schweitzer (1875–1965). His English title

---

<sup>26</sup> D. R. Griffin, A Process Christology (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1973); Ronald R. Farmer, “Jesus in Process Christology,” in Jesus Then & Now, 201–215.

<sup>27</sup> Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza, Jesus, Miriam’s Child, Sophia’s Prophet, Critical Issues in Feminist Christology (New York: Continuum, 1994).

<sup>28</sup> Scott Cowdell, Is Jesus Unique? A Study of Recent Christology (New York: Paulist, 1996); Stephen T. Davis, Daniell Kendall, Gerald O’Collins, eds., The Incarnation: An Interdisciplinary Symposium on the Incarnation of the Son of God (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002).

<sup>29</sup> Richard A. Burridge, What Are the Gospels? A Comparison with Graeco-Roman Biography, 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2004); Dirk Frickenschmidt, Evangelium als Biographie: Die vier Evangelien im Rahmen antiker Erzählkunst (Tübingen: Francke, 1997); David E. Aune, The Westminster Dictionary of New Testament and Early Christian Literature (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2003), 204–206.

<sup>30</sup> Meier, A Marginal Jew I, 56–201; Robert E. van Voorst, Jesus Outside the New Testament: An Introduction to the Ancient Evidence (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2000).

coined by his translator The Quest of the Historical Jesus: A Critical History of its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede (1906; trans. W. Montgomery, 1910)<sup>31</sup> bestows added drama. To see it in perspective two facts must be noted. The first is that Schweitzer's book was preceded by his Strassburg dissertation, part of which was published as The Mystery of the Kingdom of God: The Secret of Jesus' Messiahship and Passion. Building on Johannes Weiss's eschatological interpretation of the kingdom, Schweitzer proposed an "eschatological-historical" solution.<sup>32</sup> In sending out the disciples to proclaim the kingdom, Jesus expected them to inaugurate the messianic woes as prelude to the coming of the Son of Man (Matt 10:23).<sup>33</sup> When they returned unscathed, Jesus realized that he himself was called to initiate the woes by giving his life as a ransom (Mark 10:45).<sup>34</sup> The mystery was Jesus' secret conviction about this vocation. Initially, he revealed it only to Peter, James, and John. Peter told it to the Twelve, and Judas told it to Caiaphas.<sup>35</sup> In a postscript Schweitzer declared that his aim was "to depict the figure of Jesus in its overwhelming heroic greatness and to impress it upon the modern age and upon the modern theology."<sup>36</sup>

The second fact is the coincidence that Schweitzer's Mystery of the Kingdom of God and William Wrede's book on the same subject The Messianic Secret<sup>37</sup> were published on the same day.<sup>38</sup> Both titles contain the word Geheimnis. Whereas Schweitzer's translator took the word to mean "mystery," in Wrede's book it meant "secret." It was bound up with Jesus' injunctions not to tell anyone that he was the Messiah, for Jesus did not claim to be the Messiah. The "messianic

---

<sup>31</sup> References are to the reprint with introduction by James M. Robinson (New York: Macmillan, 1968). The Quest of the Historical Jesus, First Complete Edition, ed. John Bowden (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2001) is based on the 1913 edition. See further Werner Georg Kümmel, The New Testament: The History of the Investigation of Its Problems, trans. S. McLean Gilmour and Howard C. Kee (Nashville: Abingdon, 1972); Daniel L. Pals, The Victorian "Lives" of Jesus (San Antonio: Trinity University, 1982); Brown, Jesus in European Protestant Thought; James A. Baird, History of New Testament Research, 1. From Deism to Tübingen, 2. From Jonathan Edwards to Rudolf Bultmann (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992, 2003).

<sup>32</sup> The Mystery of the Kingdom of God (1901), trans. Walter Lowrie (London: Black, 1914), 83; cf. Johannes Weiss, Jesus' Proclamation of the Kingdom of God, trans. R. H. Hiers and D. Larrimore Holland ([1892] Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971).

<sup>33</sup> Mystery, 88–89.

<sup>34</sup> Ibid., 230–236.

<sup>35</sup> Ibid., 214–218.

<sup>36</sup> Ibid., 274 (Schweitzer's emphasis).

<sup>37</sup> Trans. J. C. G. Greig (Cambridge: James Clarke, 1971).

<sup>38</sup> Quest, 330.

secret” was an invention. The scholarly world’s acceptance of Wrede set Schweitzer on a course of self-vindication that resulted in The Quest of the Historical Jesus. It would show the world that the quest led inexorably to the choice: Wrede’s thoroughgoing skepticism or Schweitzer’s thoroughgoing eschatology.

The Quest of the Historical Jesus is like a tennis tournament in which competitors progress through successive rounds by knocking out opponents. The simile may be pressed further: “seeded” scholars were destined to win preliminary rounds, though not the championship. Hermann Samuel Reimarus (1694–1768) is declared to be a bolt from the blue, without predecessors or successors,<sup>39</sup> whose work was “perhaps the most splendid achievement in the whole course of the historical investigation of the life of Jesus,” for he was the first to grasp the fact that Jesus’ thought-world was “essentially eschatological.” In view of subsequent neglect of eschatology, “the whole movement of theology, down to Johannes Weiss, appears retrograde.”<sup>40</sup>

Reimarus was well known in the German Enlightenment for his “rational thoughts” on sundry topics. Privately he composed an Apology or Defence of the Rational Worshippers of God, which was a vindication of Deism. Shortly before Reimarus’s death, Gotthold Ephraim Lessing moved to Hamburg, where he got to know the Reimarus family and secured a copy. Later, as librarian to the Duke of Brunswick, Lessing published extracts supposedly found in the ducal library at Wolfenbüttel under the title Fragments of an Unnamed Author.<sup>41</sup> The “Wolfenbüttel Fragments” provoked a bitter pamphlet war affording Lessing occasion to air his views.

The last of the Fragments examined The Intentions of Jesus and his Disciples (1778). Jesus was a Jewish reformer who had no intention of founding a new religion. His call to repentance was a call for renewal. In a manner evocative of the English Deists, Reimarus insisted that Jesus taught no “mysteries.”<sup>42</sup> “Son of God” simply meant “God’s

<sup>39</sup> Quest, 26.

<sup>40</sup> Ibid., 23.

<sup>41</sup> The Fragments have been included in editions of Lessing’s works, but the full text is Apologie oder Schutzschrift für die vernünftigen Verehrer Gottes, ed. Gerhard Alexander, 2 vols. (Frankfurt: Suhrkamp, 1972); cf. Hermann Samuel Reimarus (1694–1768): Ein “bekannter Unbekannter” der Aufklärung in Hamburg (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1973).

<sup>42</sup> Reimarus: Fragments, trans. Ralph S. Fraser, ed. Charles H. Talbert (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1970), 72–76.

Beloved.”<sup>43</sup> Jesus’ fatal mistake was to embrace political messianism.<sup>44</sup> His dying words, “My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?” attest his disillusionment.<sup>45</sup> The resurrection was a fraud perpetrated by the disciples who pretended to the credulous populace that they had encountered Christ alive and that he would return to earth.<sup>46</sup>

The ensuing quest was like a tournament with three decisive rounds. Each was marked by a confrontation that determined its subsequent course. “The first [great alternative] was laid down by Strauss: either purely historical or purely supernatural. The second had been worked out by the Tübingen school and Holtzmann: either synoptic or Johannine. Now came the third [with Johannes Weiss]: either eschatological or noneschatological!”<sup>47</sup> But this was not the end. There remained the final challenge round with the two remaining combatants and their rival theories: Wrede with his “thoroughgoing skepticism” versus Schweitzer with his “thoroughgoing eschatology.”<sup>48</sup> Schweitzer’s portrait of Jesus was determined by the outcome of these engagements: elimination of the supernatural, elimination of John as a historical source, and the triumph of thoroughgoing eschatology. The conclusions drawn in The Mystery of the Kingdom of God were reiterated. If it seems paradoxical to deny the supernatural while seeing eschatology as the key to understanding the historical Jesus, it must be remembered that, though Jesus was possessed by the notion of the imminent kingdom of God, it did not mean that it had objective reality.

Schweitzer concluded the Quest on an almost mystical note. “He comes to us as One unknown, without a name, as of old, by the lake-side, He came to those men who knew Him not. He speaks to us the same word: ‘Follow thou me!’ and sets us the task which He has to fulfil for our time.” Those who follow “shall learn in their own experience

---

<sup>43</sup> Fragments, 76–88.

<sup>44</sup> Ibid., 136–150.

<sup>45</sup> Ibid., 150.

<sup>46</sup> Ibid., 153–227.

<sup>47</sup> Quest, 238. David Friedrich Strauss’s The Life of Jesus Critically Examined (1835–36) trans. George Eliot (London, 1846; reprint with introduction by Peter C. Hodgson, Philadelphia: Fortress, 1972) argued that the supernatural portrait of Jesus in the gospels was mythological. Strauss’s mentor, F.C. Baur, the leader of the Tübingen School, argued that Matthew was the earliest gospel since it was the most Jewish. John with its docetic dualism was dated in the second half of the second century. Holtzmann was Schweitzer’s mentor.

<sup>48</sup> Quest, 330–397.

Who He is.”<sup>49</sup> More bleakly Schweitzer confessed that, “There is nothing more negative than the result of the critical study of the Life of Jesus.”<sup>50</sup> “The true historical Jesus”—“an imperious ruler”—had overthrown “the Modern Jesus” of Liberalism.<sup>51</sup>

From the standpoint of impartial history Schweitzer’s work raises questions. Unsuspecting readers would not guess that the origin of the quest was to be found in the English Deists whose work Reimarus had appropriated and whose ideas were already well known in Germany.<sup>52</sup> Schweitzer paid scant attention to philosophy and culture,<sup>53</sup> or to scholars outside Germany and France. His work, like the quest in general, was characterized by lack of interest in Judaism. No mention is made of Abraham Geiger (1810–74), leader of Reform Judaism and admirer of Strauss and Baur, who sought to reclaim Jesus for Judaism.<sup>54</sup> The reasons for these omissions may be traced to Schweitzer’s organizing principle. The Quest was a study in self-vindication, which in the interests of accuracy might have been entitled, as Paul Wernle suggested, Von Reimarus zu Schweitzer.<sup>55</sup>

Proponents of the quest have been charged with making Jesus in their own image. The Catholic Modernist George Tyrrell observed: “The Christ that Harnack sees, looking back through nineteen centuries of Catholic darkness, is only the reflection of a Liberal Protestant face, seen at the bottom of a deep well.”<sup>56</sup> Schweitzer described Renan’s Vie de Jésus (1863) as a work of “imperishable charm,” written by an author who had to “perfume” the New Testament “with sentimentality in order to feel himself at home in it.”<sup>57</sup> Schweitzer’s Jesus turned out to be Nietzsche’s “superman” in Galilean garb—the Übermensch—revaluing all values regardless of pain. Jesus tried to turn “the wheel of

<sup>49</sup> Quest, 403.

<sup>50</sup> Ibid., 398.

<sup>51</sup> Ibid., 403.

<sup>52</sup> Brown, Jesus in European Protestant Thought, 36–53.

<sup>53</sup> Vincent A. McCarthy, Quest for a Philosophical Jesus: Christianity and Philosophy in Rousseau, Kant, Hegel, and Schelling (Macon: Mercer, 1968); Brown, Jesus in European Protestant Thought, 57–104, 133–160.

<sup>54</sup> Susannah Heschel, Abraham Geiger and the Jewish Jesus (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998); Colin Brown, Shofar 18.4 (2000): 138–141.

<sup>55</sup> TLZ 31 (1906): 502–506.

<sup>56</sup> Christianity at the Cross-Roads (1909; reprint London: Allen & Unwin, 1963), 49; cf. Adolf Harnack, What is Christianity? trans. T. B. Saunders (London: Williams and Norgate, 1901).

<sup>57</sup> Quest, 192.

the world,” and when it finally moved it crushed him. “The wheel rolls onward, and the mangled body of the one immeasurably great Man, who was strong enough to think of Himself as the spiritual ruler of mankind and to bend history to His purpose, is hanging upon it still. That is His victory and His reign.”<sup>58</sup>

Schweitzer valued Nietzsche’s critique of Western values. “[O]nly that system of ethics deserves to be accepted which springs from independent reflection on the meaning of life. . . . Men of genius and strong individuality, therefore, should be intent only on allowing the greatness that is in them to have free play.”<sup>59</sup> “Not the historical Jesus, but the spirit which goes forth from him and in the spirits of men strives for new influence and rule, is that which overcomes the world.”<sup>60</sup> Schweitzer emerged as the first postmodern theologian.

2.2. From Old Quest to New

The period following Schweitzer’s Quest down to the post-Bultmanian New Quest is sometimes dubbed “the No Quest.”<sup>61</sup> Three factors were responsible. The first was the belief that Schweitzer had said all that was to be said. The second was the dominance in theology of Karl Barth (1886–1968) whose stress on the otherness of God and revelation as the sole means of knowing God made the quest seem irrelevant.<sup>62</sup> The third was the ascendancy of Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976) whose program of form criticism and demythologizing exalted the kerygma of the cross and resurrection at the expense of the historical Jesus.

Bultmann’s approach was characterized by Sachkritik (“subject matter criticism”), which “distinguishes what is said by what is meant and

---

<sup>58</sup> Quest, 370–371. The similarity was noted by B. H. Streeter in Foundations (London: Macmillan, 1912), 111.

<sup>59</sup> The Philosophy of Civilization, 2. Civilization and Ethics, trans. C. T. Campion, 3rd ed. (London: Black, 1946), 174, 176.

<sup>60</sup> Quest, 401.

<sup>61</sup> Stanley E. Porter, The Criteria for Authenticity in Historical—Jesus Research, JSNTSup 191 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), 45; Leander E. Keck, A Future for the Historical Jesus: The Place of Jesus in Preaching and Theology (Nashville: Abingdon, 1971), 9.

<sup>62</sup> Colin Brown, Karl Barth and the Christian Message, 2nd ed. (Portland: Wipf and Stock, 1998); Eberhard Busch, Karl Barth: His Life from Letters and Autobiographical Texts, trans. John Bowden (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976); Bruce L. McCormack, Karl Barth’s Critically Realistic Dialectical Theology: Its Genesis and Development, 1909–1936 (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1995).

measures what is said by its meaning.”<sup>63</sup> “Since exegetical work is work with concepts, and since the word of the text is never the subject matter itself, but its expression, this subject matter becomes available to the exegete only if he understands the word.”<sup>64</sup> Bultmann insisted that the Sache of Scripture was the Word of the transcendent God, the meaning of which had to be separated from its mythical, culturally conditioned forms. Sachkritik set Bultmann on a path that led from form criticism to demythologization.

Bultmann’s The History of the Synoptic Tradition (1921)<sup>65</sup> leaves the impression that, while much can be known about the early church, little can be known about Jesus himself who remains hidden behind the forms of tradition. This impression was strengthened by Bultmann’s Jesus (1926),<sup>66</sup> which initiated a series on “The Immortals—the Spiritual Heroes of Humanity in their Life and Work.” His “New Testament and Mythology” (1948) launched the demythologizing debate that was to preoccupy New Testament scholarship for the next quarter century.<sup>67</sup> It applied to the New Testament the viewpoint of the History of Religions School, of which Bultmann was the last surviving member. Whereas earlier liberals had held that stories like the virgin birth, the magi and the empty tomb were mythical, Bultmann argued that the entire thought-world of the New Testament was mythical. Notions of the heavenly redeemer, salvation, and judgment were drawn from the mythical worlds of Jewish apocalyptic and Hellenistic Gnosticism. The New Testament should be demythologized for the sake of the Sache of the kerygma of the cross and resurrection which alone can bring liberation.

Signs of unrest in the Bultmann school surfaced in 1953 when Ernst Käsemann (1906–98) presented a paper on “The Problem of the Historical Jesus.”<sup>68</sup> Like others who followed him in the “New Quest,”

---

<sup>63</sup> “The Problem of Theological Exegesis,” in The Beginnings of Dialectic Theology, ed. James M. Robinson (Richmond: John Knox, 1968), 241.

<sup>64</sup> The Beginnings of Dialectic Theology, 255.

<sup>65</sup> The History of the Synoptic Tradition, trans. John Marsh (Oxford: Blackwell, revised 1972).

<sup>66</sup> Jesus and the Word, trans. L. P. Smith and E. H. Lantero (New York: Scribner’s, [1934] 1958), 217–219.

<sup>67</sup> Kerygma and Myth: A Theological Debate, ed. Hans-Werner Bartsch, trans. Reginald H. Fuller (London: SPCK, 1953), 1–44; cf. Bultmann, Jesus Christ and Mythology (London: SCM, 1960).

<sup>68</sup> Essays on New Testament Themes, trans. W. J. Montague (London: SCM, 1964), 15–47.

Käsemann protested fidelity to Bultmannian methodology and disavowed any attempt to write a biography of Jesus. Nevertheless, Käsemann feared a relapse into docetism—the idea that Jesus lacked real humanity—if the exalted Lord of the kerygma was detached from the humiliated Lord in history. The way forward was to discover the earthly Jesus through the kerygma.

The challenge to seek the earthly Jesus through the kerygma was answered in Europe by Ernst Fuchs,<sup>69</sup> Günther Bornkamm,<sup>70</sup> Hans Conzelmann,<sup>71</sup> Ferdinand Hahn,<sup>72</sup> and Eduard Schweizer,<sup>73</sup> and in North America by Schubert M. Ogden,<sup>74</sup> Reginald H. Fuller,<sup>75</sup> Norman Perrin,<sup>76</sup> and James M. Robinson whose work popularized the term, “the New Quest of the Historical Jesus.”<sup>77</sup> In 1959 Bultmann responded in a lecture to the Heidelberg Academy of Sciences.<sup>78</sup> Like a headmaster remonstrating with erring pupils, Bultmann reminded them that, “[I]t is the Christ of the kerygma and not the person of the historical Jesus who is the object of faith . . . the man whom the kerygma addresses may not inquire behind the kerygma for a legitimation offered by historical research.”<sup>79</sup> “To believe in the Christ present in the kerygma is the meaning of the Easter faith.”<sup>80</sup>

Bultmann’s address marked the beginning of the end of the New Quest. Its European protagonists turned to other branches of study.

<sup>69</sup> Studies in the Historical Jesus, trans. Andrew Scobie (London: SCM, 1964).

<sup>70</sup> Jesus of Nazareth, trans. Irene and Fraser McLuskey with James M. Robinson (New York: Harper, 1960).

<sup>71</sup> Jesus, trans. J. Raymond Lord, ed. John Reumann (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973).

<sup>72</sup> The Titles of Jesus in Christology: Their History in Early Christianity (1963), trans. Harold Knight and George Ogg (London: Lutterworth, 1969).

<sup>73</sup> Jesus, trans. David E. Green (London: SCM, 1971).

<sup>74</sup> Christ without Myth: A Study Based on the Theology of Rudolf Bultmann (New York: Harper, 1961).

<sup>75</sup> Reginald H. Fuller, The Foundations of New Testament Christology (London: Lutterworth, 1965).

<sup>76</sup> The Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1963); Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (London: SCM, 1967); A Modern Pilgrimage in New Testament Christology (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974).

<sup>77</sup> A New Quest of the Historical Jesus (London: SCM, 1959); reprint A New Quest of the Historical Jesus and Other Essays (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983). The term “New Quest” was suggested by Robinson’s publisher.

<sup>78</sup> “The Primitive Christian Kerygma and the Historical Jesus,” in The Historical Jesus and the Kerygmatic Christ: Essays on the New Quest of the Historical Jesus, ed. Carl E. Braaten and Roy A. Harrisville (Nashville: Abingdon, 1964), 15–42.

<sup>79</sup> “Primitive Christian Kerygma,” 17.

<sup>80</sup> Ibid., 42.

Robinson plunged into the study of the Nag Hammadi texts<sup>81</sup> and Q, concluding that the earliest stratum of Q gives the best picture of the historical Jesus.<sup>82</sup> Meanwhile, reports of the demise of the Old Quest turned out to have been greatly exaggerated. Its pursuit is documented by Walter P. Weaver's definitive analysis The Historical Jesus in the Twentieth Century, 1900–1950.<sup>83</sup>

A work that paved the way for locating Jesus within Judaism was The History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ (2nd ed. 1886–87) by Emil Schürer (1844–1910). It began modestly as a textbook but metamorphosed into The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (1973–87).<sup>84</sup> This encyclopedic work is like a background without a portrait, since Jesus himself does not appear. Nevertheless, as Schürer pointed out, “No fact of Gospel history, no word in the preaching of Jesus is thinkable without the presupposition of Jewish history and the entire thought-world of the Jewish people.”<sup>85</sup>

The alternative to Bultmann was Joachim Jeremias (1900–79), who surveyed the scene in “The Present State of the Debate about the Problem of the Historical Jesus” (1956).<sup>86</sup> Jeremias feared a lapse into docetism, if Jesus became a mere presupposition, and Paul's proclamation were to replace the good tidings of Jesus. He urged that, “we must continually return to the historical Jesus and his message. The sources demand it; the kerygma, which refers us back from itself, also demands it. To put it in theological terms, the Incarnation implies that the story

<sup>81</sup> The Nag Hammadi Library in English, ed. James M. Robinson, 3rd ed. (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1988).

<sup>82</sup> James M. Robinson, Paul Hoffmann, and John S. Kloppenborg, eds., The Critical Edition of Q: Synopsis Including the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, Mark and Thomas with English, German, and French Translations of Q and Thomas (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2000); Robinson, “The Image of Jesus in Q,” in Jesus Then & Now, ed. Meyer and Hughes, 7–25. Robinson's Jesus was an itinerant who sent out disciples to proclaim God's reign, which involved the bestowal of God's peace and the reception of hospitality. “Son of God” was not originally a christological title, but like “son of peace” it was a designation of a disciple. To become one meant abandoning family and home.

<sup>83</sup> Harrisburg: Trinity Press International, 1999.

<sup>84</sup> Ed. Geza Vermes, Fergus Millar, Martin Goodman et al., 3 vols. (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1973–87).

<sup>85</sup> Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes im Zeitalter Jesus Christi, 3rd and 4th ed. (Leipzig: Hinrichs, 1901), 1:1 (author's translation).

<sup>86</sup> Published as The Problem of the Historical Jesus, trans. Norman Perrin (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1964); reedited in K. C. Hanson, ed., Jesus and the Message of the New Testament (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2002), 1–17.

of Jesus is not only a possible subject for historical research, study, and criticism, but demands all of these.”<sup>87</sup>

Jeremias’s main contributions lay in The Eucharistic Words of Jesus,<sup>88</sup> The Parables of Jesus,<sup>89</sup> and his work on the Lord’s Prayer.<sup>90</sup> Throughout there runs the theme that, even though we might not hear Jesus’ ipsisima verba (actual words), we may hear his ipsissima vox (authentic voice).<sup>91</sup> Aspects of Jeremias’s work have been called into question—his competence in rabbinics,<sup>92</sup> his interpretation of Jesus’ parables,<sup>93</sup> and the meaning of Abba.<sup>94</sup> If scholarship has moved on from Jeremias, it has moved right away from Bultmann.

2.3. The Third Quest

To some, the Third Quest embraces all the renewed interest in the historical Jesus from the mid-sixties onwards. However, N. T. Wright, <sup>87</sup> The Problem of the Historical Jesus, 14–15.

<sup>88</sup> 2nd ed. trans. Norman Perrin (London: SCM, 1966).

<sup>89</sup> Revised ed. trans. S. H. Hooke (London: SCM, 1963).

<sup>90</sup> The Prayers of Jesus, tr. John Bowden (London: SCM, 1967).

<sup>91</sup> The Parables of Jesus, 22; The Prayers of Jesus, 57.

<sup>92</sup> E. P. Sanders claimed that Jeremias knew little beyond what he found in Strack-Billerbeck, a commentary characterized by “miscategorization and incorrect summaries” (“Jesus and the Kingdom: The Restoration of Israel and the New People of God,” in Jesus, the Gospels and the Church: Essays in Honor of William R. Farmer, ed. E. P. Sanders [Macon: Mercer, 1987], 225–239; “Defending the Indefensible,” JBL 110.3 [1991]: 463–477). Ben F. Meyer replied with “A Caricature of Joachim Jeremias and His Scholarly Work,” JBL 110.3 (1991): 451–462.

<sup>93</sup> Jeremias followed Adolf Jülicher in rejecting allegory and looking for Jesus’ intended meaning. His pupil Norman Perrin advocated a literary approach which distinguished two types of symbols. The “steno-symbol” has a one-to-one relationship with what it represents, e.g., a mathematical symbol. The “tensive symbols” in the parables have meanings which cannot be exhausted or represented by any one referent (Jesus and the Language of the Kingdom: Symbol and Metaphor in New Testament Interpretation [Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976], 30; cf. 198). See also John W. Sider, “Rediscovering the Parables: The Logic of the Jeremias Tradition,” JBL 102.1 (1983): 61–83; Arland J. Hultgren, The Parables of Jesus: A Commentary (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2000), 12–14.

<sup>94</sup> Jeremias traced Abba (Mark 14:36; cf. Rom 8:15; Gal 4:6) to children’s talk, and claimed that its use in address to God was unique to Jesus. It showed his complete surrender to the Father (The Prayers of Jesus, 57–65). Recent scholarship has rejected this. See James H. Charlesworth, “A Caveat on Textual Transmission and the Meaning of Abba: A Study of the Lord’s Prayer,” in The Lord’s Prayer and Other Prayer Texts from the Greco-Roman Era, ed. James M. Charlesworth, Mark Harding, and Mark Kiley (Valley Forge: Trinity Press International, 1994), 9; James Barr, “Abba isn’t Daddy,” JTS 39 (1988): 28–47; “‘Abba, Father’ and the Familiarity of Jesus’ Speech,” Theology 91 (1998): 173–79; Vermes, Jesus the Jew (see n. 121), 211. Charlesworth sees Jesus’ use of Abba as a reminder of Israel’s sonship (Hos 11: 11) and that of the king (Ps 2:7).

who is credited with coining the term,<sup>95</sup> claims that the Third Quest is characterized by a methodology which differs from those of the previous quests. The Old Quest was characterized by Source Criticism, the New Quest by Form and Redaction Criticism. The criterion of dissimilarity was widely used—Jesus had to be dissimilar to Judaism and to the early church whose picture of Jesus was colored by belief in the resurrection. For teaching to qualify as authentic it had in addition to bear the marks of Aramaic.<sup>96</sup>

Whereas the Old Quest tore Jesus from his Jewish roots to the point of being anti-Semitic,<sup>97</sup> the Third Quest seeks to locate Jesus in Second Temple Judaism. Over against the criterion of dissimilarity Wright proposes a criterion of double similarity and double dissimilarity: “It is thus decisively similar to both the Jewish context and in the early Christian world, and at the same time importantly dissimilar. . . [W]hen something can be seen to be credible (though perhaps deeply subversive) within first-century Judaism, and credible as the implied starting point (though not the exact replica) of something in later Christianity, there is a strong possibility of our being in touch with the genuine history of Jesus.”<sup>98</sup>

To qualify as a contribution to the Third Quest, accounts of Jesus must follow this approach. Otherwise Wright dismisses them as vestiges of earlier quests, even though they may be contemporary with the Third Quest. In this regard the Jesus Seminar and the writings of its co-chair, John Dominic Crossan, qualify as continuations of the Old Quest. The Jesus Seminar was founded in 1985 by its other co-chair and high-profile publicist, the late Robert W. Funk. The Seminar’s

---

<sup>95</sup> Stephen Neill and Tom Wright, The Interpretation of the New Testament, 1861–1988 (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988), 379–403; cf. William Telford, “Major Trends and Interpretative Issues in the Study of Jesus,” in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. Bruce D. Chilton and Craig A. Evans, NTTS 25 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 33–74; Ben Witherington, The Jesus Quest: The Third Search for the Jew of Nazareth, 2nd ed. (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1997); Mark Allan Powell, Jesus as a Figure in History: How Modern Historians View the Man from Galilee (Philadelphia: Westminster John Knox, 1998).

<sup>96</sup> Fuller, The Foundations of New Testament Christology, 18; Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus, 42–43. Perrin added what he called “the principle of coherence”: “material from the earliest strata of the tradition may be accepted as authentic if it can be shown to cohere with material established as authentic by means of the criterion of dissimilarity.” For critique see Morna D. Hooker, “Christology and Methodology,” NTS 17 (1971): 480–487.

<sup>97</sup> Heschel, Abraham Geiger and the Jewish Jesus, 107–161, 229–242.

<sup>98</sup> Jesus and the Victory of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996), 132.

“Fellows” met regularly “in pursuit of the historical discrepancy between the historical figure [of Jesus] and the representations of him in the gospels.”<sup>99</sup>

The Seminar’s two most ambitious projects are The Five Gospels: The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus,<sup>100</sup> which sought to destabilize the canon by including the Gospel of Thomas as the fifth gospel, and The Acts of Jesus: The Search for the Authentic Acts of Jesus.<sup>101</sup> The two volumes are color-coded in line with the colored balls used in voting. “Red meant that Jesus very probably said or did this. Pink meant that Jesus probably said or did this. Gray meant that Jesus probably did not say or do this (although in practice gray meant that the data were ambiguous and no firm judgment was possible). Black of course meant that Jesus very probably did not say or do this.”<sup>102</sup> 90 aphorisms and parables out of 500 were judged authentic, whereas only 29 of 176 events were deemed historical. These results were reached by stratifying the texts, using only those in the earliest strata, texts multiply attested by canonical and non-canonical sources, and by rigorously applying the criterion of dissimilarity to what was left.

The cover of Crossan’s The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Peasant<sup>103</sup> describes it as “The first comprehensive determination of who Jesus was, what he did, what he said.” The claim rests upon a “triple triadic process.”<sup>104</sup> In the first triad Crossan reconstructs the world of Jesus using the “macrocosmic” tools of cross-cultural and cross-temporal anthropology, the “mesocosmic” tools of Greco-Roman

---

<sup>99</sup> Robert W. Funk, “The Jesus Seminar and the Quest,” in Jesus Then & Now, Meyer and Hughes, 133; Honest to Jesus: Jesus for a New Millennium (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1996).

<sup>100</sup> Robert W. Funk, Roy W. Hoover and the Jesus Seminar (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1993).

<sup>101</sup> Robert W. Funk and the Jesus Seminar (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1999).

<sup>102</sup> Funk, in Jesus Then & Now, Meyer and Hughes, 135.

<sup>103</sup> San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1991. Spin-offs include Jesus: A Revolutionary Biography (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1994); and Who Killed Jesus? Exposing the Roots of Anti-Semitism in the Gospel Story of the Death of Jesus (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1995). See also Jeffrey Carlson and Robert A. Ludwig, eds., Jesus and Faith: A Conversation on the Work of John Dominic Crossan (Maryknoll: Orbis, 1994); John Dominic Crossan, Luke Timothy Johnson, Werner H. Kelber, The Jesus Controversy: Perspectives in Conflict (Harrisburg: Trinity Press International, 1999); Donald L. Denton, Historiography and Hermeneutics in Jesus Studies: An Examination of the Work of John Dominic Crossan and Ben F. Meyer, JSNTSup 262 (London: T&T Clark International, 2004).

<sup>104</sup> The Historical Jesus, xxviii–xxix.

history, and the “microcosmic” tools of literature. What emerges is a picture of a ruthless empire, which oppressed captive peoples politically and economically. One way of achieving happiness was through the counter-culture adopted by the Cynics.

The second triad focuses on the Jesus tradition. It involves three steps: compilation of an inventory of texts; stratification into four strata (30–60, 60–80, 80–120, and 120–150 CE); and determination of their attestation.<sup>105</sup> None of the canonical gospels is assigned to the First Stratum, though the first layers of the Gospel of Thomas and Q, the Egerton Gospel, P. Oxy. 1224, a Miracles Collection, and the Cross Gospel (now embedded in the Gospel of Peter) are located in it. The Secret Gospel of Mark (“discovered” by Morton Smith),<sup>106</sup> followed by canonical Mark, is assigned to the Second Stratum. Matthew and Luke are assigned to the Third, and John to the Fourth.

The third triad focuses on “the methodological manipulation” of the inventory. The first step is to focus on the sequence of strata. The second step determines hierarchy of attestation, and the third brackets singularity by discounting all singly attested units.<sup>107</sup> The figure that emerges is “a peasant Jewish Cynic” whose hometown of Nazareth was close enough to the Greco-Roman city of Sepphoris that knowledge of Cynicism was not unlikely. Jesus practiced “magic and meal”<sup>108</sup>—a “combination of free healing and common eating, a religious and economic egalitarianism that negated alike and at once the hierarchical and patronal normalcies of Jewish religion and Roman power.”<sup>109</sup>

Despite the claim to academic rigor, Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter draw attention to a methodological flaw in Crossan’s insistence upon multiple attestation: “When one bases the picture of Jesus exclusively on multiple-attested traditions in canonical and non-canonical texts, one makes oneself dependent on two things: first, on the accidental preservation of a few words and deeds on papyrus fragments, and second on the tendentious selection of sayings in the Gospel of Thomas. Since the Gospel of Thomas contains the picture of the

<sup>105</sup> The Historical Jesus, 427–450.

<sup>106</sup> Clement of Alexandria and a Secret Gospel (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1973); The Secret Gospel: The Discovery and Interpretation of the Secret Gospel According to Mark (New York: Harper & Row, 1973).

<sup>107</sup> The Historical Jesus, xxxii.

<sup>108</sup> Ibid., 303–353.

<sup>109</sup> Ibid., 346.

‘noneschatological Jesus,’ one will almost automatically end up with a picture of Jesus that is noneschatological (in the apocalyptic sense).<sup>110</sup> Christopher M. Tuckett notes “a veneer of simplicity and objectivity in setting up ‘databases’ ... that give the impression of security and facticity.”<sup>111</sup> Equally questionable is the priority accorded to the Secret Gospel of Mark, which is now increasingly seen as a hoax based on a pastiche of gospel verses.<sup>112</sup>

Other problems include the sanitized portraits of Cynics<sup>113</sup> and magicians who might have stepped straight out of Disneyland. In the Old Testament and the ancient world the practice of magic was a capital offence.<sup>114</sup> The Cynic magician is a modern construct, for Cynics were not magicians and magicians were not Cynics. Perhaps this is in keeping with Crossan’s explanation in which healings turn out not to be physical changes but changes of attitude, and exorcisms are the liberation of “the almost split-personality position of a colonial people.”<sup>115</sup> The most trenchant criticism comes from Birger A. Pearson who contends that the Seminar is ideologically driven to produce a secular Jesus. “The Jesus of the Jesus Seminar is a non-Jewish Jesus. To

---

<sup>110</sup> Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter, The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria, trans. M. Eugene Boring (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002), 238.

<sup>111</sup> “The Historical Jesus, Crossan and Methodology,” in Text und Geschichte: Facetten theologischen Arbeitens aus dem Freundes- und Schülerkreis. Dieter Lührmann zum 60. Geburtstag, ed. Stefan Maser and Egbert Schlarb, Marburger Theologische Studien 50 (Marburg: Elwert, 1999), 257–279, at 278.

<sup>112</sup> Foreword by Jacob Neusner to Birger Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscripts Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity with Tradition and Transmission in Early Christianity (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1998), xxvii. Robert M. Price suggests that Smith based his hoax on J. H. Hunter’s The Mystery of Mar Saba (1940) (“Second Thoughts on the Secret Gospel,” BBR 14.1 [2004]: 127–32).

<sup>113</sup> Derek Krueger, “The Bawdy and Society: The Shamelessness of Diogenes in Roman Imperial Culture,” in The Cynics: The Cynic Movement in Antiquity and Its Legacy, ed. Robert Bracht Branham and Marie-Odile Goulet-Cazé (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996), 222–239.

The leading advocate of the Cynic hypothesis, F. Gerald Downing, admits that there is no solid evidence for a Cynic presence in Galilee at the time of Jesus (Cynics and Christian Origins [Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1992], 146–147).

<sup>114</sup> Deut 13; 17; 18; 21; Lev 19 and 20; cf. Eric Eve, The Jewish Context of Jesus’ Miracles, JSNTSup 231 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002); Matthew W. Dickie, Magic and Magicians in the Greco-Roman World (London: Routledge, 2001); Naomi Janowitz, Magic in the Roman World: Pagans, Jews, Christians (London: Routledge, 2001).

<sup>115</sup> Jesus: A Revolutionary Biography, 82, 91. In A Long Way from Tipperary: A Memoir (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 2000), 29–52, Crossan muses on how far his perceptions have been shaped by Ireland’s struggles with colonialism.

put it metaphorically, the Seminar has performed a sneak epispasm on the historical Jesus, a surgical procedure removing the marks of circumcision."<sup>116</sup>

The question of authenticating Jesus' words and activities has been handled more thoroughly and even-handedly elsewhere.<sup>117</sup> Whereas previous quests sought to set Jesus apart from Judaism, the chief merit of the current quest is its endeavor to see Jesus in the world of Second Temple Judaism.<sup>118</sup> An important feature is "the Jewish reclamation of Jesus."<sup>119</sup> Among those in the forefront are David Flusser,<sup>120</sup> Geza

<sup>116</sup> "The Gospel according to the 'Jesus Seminar': On Some Recent Trends in Gospel Research," in The Emergence of the Christian Religion: Essays on Early Christianity (Harrisburg: Trinity Press International, 1997), 56.

<sup>117</sup> Stanley E. Porter, ed., Handbook to Exegesis of the New Testament, NTTS 25 (Leiden: Brill, 1997); Bruce D. Chilton and Craig A. Evans, eds., Studying the Historical Jesus; Chilton and Evans, eds., Authenticating the Words of Jesus, NTTS 28.1 (Leiden: Brill, 1998); Chilton and Evans, eds., Authenticating the Activities of Jesus, NTTS 28.2; (Leiden: Brill, 1998); Jens Schröter and Ralph Brucker, eds., Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, BZNW 114 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002).

<sup>118</sup> John Kenneth Riches, The World of Jesus: First-Century Judaism in Crisis (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990); Maurice Casey, From Jewish Prophet to Gentile God: The Origins and Development of New Testament Christology (Cambridge: James Clarke, 1991); A. Roy Eckardt, Reclaiming the Jesus of History: Christology Today (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); Joel B. Green and Max Turner, eds., Jesus of Nazareth, Lord and Christ: Essays on the Historical Jesus and New Testament Christology (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1994); Graham N. Stanton, Gospel Truth? New Light on Jesus and the Gospels (Valley Forge: Trinity Press International, 1995); William E. Arnal and Michel Desjardins, eds., Whose Historical Jesus? Studies in Christianity and Judaism 7 (Waterloo: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1997); Marcus J. Borg, ed., Jesus at 2000 (Boulder: Westview, 1997); Bryan F. Le Beau, Leonard Greenspoon, and Dennis Hamm, eds., The Historical Jesus through Catholic and Jewish Eyes (Harrisburg: Trinity Press International, 2000); Donald A. Hagner, "An Analysis of Recent 'Historical Jesus' Studies," in Religious Diversity in the Graeco-Roman World: A Survey of Recent Scholarship, Dan Cohn-Sherbok and John M. Court, eds. (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001), 81–106; Paul Copan and Craig A. Evans, eds., Who Was Jesus? A Jewish Christian Dialogue (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2001); Doris Donnelly, ed., Jesus: A Colloquium in the Holy Land (London: Continuum, 2001); Markus Bockmuehl, ed., The Cambridge Companion to Jesus (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001); Leander E. Keck, Who Is Jesus? History in Perfect Tense (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2001); Bruce Chilton, Craig A. Evans, and Jacob Neusner, eds., The Missing Jesus: Rabbinic Judaism and the New Testament (Leiden: Brill, 2002); Sean Freyne, Jesus, A Jewish Galilean: A New Reading of the Jesus Story (London: T&T Clark, 2004).

<sup>119</sup> Donald A. Hagner, The Jewish Reclamation of Jesus: An Analysis and Critique of Modern Jewish Study of Jesus (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1984).

<sup>120</sup> David Flusser with R. Steven Notley, Jesus (Jerusalem: Magnes, 1997); Flusser, "Hillel and Jesus: Two Ways of Self-Awareness," in Hillel and Jesus: Comparative Studies of Two Major Leaders, ed. James H. Charlesworth and Loren S. Johns (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1997), 71–107; Ithamar Gruenwald, Shaul Shaked, and Gedaliahu G. Strousma, eds., Messiah and Christos: Studies in the Jewish Origins of Christianity Presented

Vermes,<sup>121</sup> and Paula Fredriksen,<sup>122</sup> though it is not easy to reconcile their portraits of Jesus. Flusser and Vermes depict Jesus as a Hasid, a Galilean charismatic holy man in the tradition of Honi the Circle Drawer and Hanina ben Dosa.<sup>123</sup> Their presumed familiarity with God and confidence in their own teaching offended the Pharisees. Hanina was a man of deed (m. Sotah 9:15); disciples thought of Jesus as “a prophet mighty in word and deed” (Luke 24:19). Jesus proclaimed the imminent intervention of the Father, maintaining his trust until the terrible moment when he realized that God had abandoned him (Mark 15:34).

Fredriksen’s Jesus is an observant Jew whose orthodoxy has been distorted by Mark, who depicts him engaged in polemic against the Torah, the Pharisees, and the Temple.<sup>124</sup> A feature of her reconstruction is her appeal to John according to whom Jesus paid repeated visits to Jerusalem and the Temple.<sup>125</sup> Jesus’ mistake was to proclaim the kingdom’s imminent arrival to Passover pilgrims, who in turn proclaimed him messianic king.<sup>126</sup> Events got out of hand, and Jesus was put to death to avoid a general uprising.

The most comprehensive investigation of Jesus is the Roman Catholic scholar John P. Meier’s A Marginal Jew.<sup>127</sup> Meier sees his task as strictly historical, guided by rigorous criteria.<sup>128</sup> Jesus was “marginal” to David Flusser on the Occasion of His Seventy-Fifth Birthday, TSAJ 32 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1992).

---

<sup>121</sup> Geza Vermes, Jesus the Jew: A Historian’s Reading of the Gospels (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973; 2nd ed., 1981); Jesus and the World of Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984) revised as Jesus in His Jewish Context (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003); The Religion of Jesus the Jew (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); The Changing Faces of Jesus (London: Penguin, 2000); The Authentic Gospel of Jesus (London: Penguin, 2003).

<sup>122</sup> Paula Fredriksen, From Jesus to Christ: The Origins of the New Testament Images of Jesus (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1988); Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews: A Jewish Life and the Emergence of Christianity (New York: Knopf, 2000).

<sup>123</sup> Flusser, Jesus, 117; Vermes, Jesus the Jew, 80; Vermes, “Hanina ben Dosa,” in Post-Biblical Jewish Studies, SJLA 8 (Leiden: Brill, 1975), 178–214.

<sup>124</sup> Jesus of Nazareth, 105–106.

<sup>125</sup> Ibid., 240–241.

<sup>126</sup> Ibid., 241–259.

<sup>127</sup> John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, I: The Roots of the Problem of the Person; II: Mentor, Message, and Miracles; III: Companions and Competitors (New York: Doubleday, 1991, 1994, 2001).

<sup>128</sup> A Marginal Jew I, 167–184; 2:5–6. The criteria are (1) embarrassment, suggesting that the church would not have invented embarrassing material; (2) double discontinuity; (3) multiple attestation; (4) coherence with other accepted material; (5) rejection and execution—“A Jesus whose words and deeds did not threaten or alienate people, especially powerful people, is not the historical Jesus.”

in a number of ways. He is hardly mentioned in Jewish and pagan histories. He died the death of a criminal. He marginalized himself by living in poverty and obscurity. By the time he died he had managed to make himself appear obnoxious and dangerous. Jesus proclaimed “the kingdom of God” which was “a tensive symbol, a multifaceted reality, a whole mythic story in miniature that cannot be adequately grasped in a single formula or definition. This is why Jesus can speak of kingdom as both imminent and yet present.”<sup>129</sup> Whereas Meier holds that the exorcisms and healings rest on a bedrock of fact,<sup>130</sup> he is inclined to treat the “nature miracles” as “a product of early Christian theology.”<sup>131</sup>

Current scholarship sees a variety of Judaisms with differing messiahs.<sup>132</sup> Among the issues are how Jesus relates to the Dead Sea Scrolls,<sup>133</sup> the Nag Hammadi Codices,<sup>134</sup> Josephus,<sup>135</sup> and how he compares with Hillel.<sup>136</sup> Vexed issues are the political climate of Jesus’ day and the nature of his involvement. The modern debate was initiated

<sup>129</sup> A Marginal Jew II, 452.

<sup>130</sup> Ibid., 726–727; cf. 646–772.

<sup>131</sup> Ibid., 993; cf. 874–1038.

<sup>132</sup> Jacob Neusner, William S. Green, and Ernest Frerichs, eds., Judaisms and their Messiahs at the Turn of the Christian Era (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987); James H. Charlesworth, Jesus Within Judaism: New Light from Exciting Archaeological Discoveries (New York: Doubleday, 1988); idem, ed., Jesus’ Jewishness: Exploring the Place of Jesus in Early Judaism (New York: Crossroad, 1991); idem, ed., The Messiah: Developments in Earliest Judaism and Christianity (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); John J. Collins, The Scepter and the Star: The Messiahs of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Other Ancient Literature (New York: Doubleday, 1995); William Horbury, Jewish Messianism and the Cult of Christ (London: SCM, 1998); Timo Eskola, Messiah and Throne: Jewish Merkabah Mysticism and Early Christian Exaltation Discourse, WUNT 142 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 2001).

<sup>133</sup> James H. Charlesworth, ed., Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls (New York: Doubleday, 1992).

<sup>134</sup> Craig A. Evans, Robert L. Webb, and Richard A. Wiebe, eds., Nag Hammadi Texts and the Bible: A Synopsis and Index, NTTs 18 (Leiden: Brill, 1993); Majella Franzmann, Jesus in the Nag Hammadi Writings (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1996).

<sup>135</sup> In a passage known as the Testimonium Flavianum, Josephus appears to refer to Jesus as “a wise man,” one who wrought “paradoxical works,” and was “the Christ” (Ant. 18.63–64). John P. Meier thinks that once the Christian interpolations are removed Josephus regarded Jesus as a sage (A Marginal Jew I, 56–88). Others, including F. F. Bruce, Graham N. Stanton, and Graham H. Twelftree, read the passage as a condemnation (van Voorst, Jesus Outside the New Testament, 81–103).

<sup>136</sup> James H. Charlesworth and Loren S. Johns, eds., Hillel and Jesus: Comparative Studies of Two Major Leaders.

by Martin Hengel's The Zealots (1961).<sup>137</sup> Hengel sees continuity between a Zealot movement which dates back to the Maccabees and the violent Zealot party that emerged in the Jewish War. The archetypal hero Phinehas "was zealous for his God, and made atonement for the Israelites" (Num 25:6–13; 4 Macc. 18:12). One of Jesus' disciples was Simon the Zealot (Mark 3:18; Matt 4:10; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13). Jesus himself was a non-violent revolutionist, a charismatic leader whose call to follow him set him apart from rabbinic Judaism. He dared to act in God's place as he summoned Israel to repent in light of the nearness of God's rule.<sup>138</sup>

Richard A. Horsley challenges the Zealot hypothesis, claiming that the Zealots emerged only during the War with Rome. He sees a mounting spiral of violence, which led from social exploitation to revolution. Horsley's Jesus is a prophetic leader who opposed violence and institutional oppression. Jesus sought social renewal within village life, calling for egalitarian family relations, non-hierarchical communities, canceling of debts, sharing, mutual assistance and reconciliation. Jesus spearheaded a renewal movement, and pronounced divine judgment on Rome and its client rulers in Israel.<sup>139</sup> At issue here is whether Jesus was primarily a religious reformer or an avant garde social reformer. There can be no doubt that Mark deliberately pits Jesus as God's Son against the imperial cult of the emperor.<sup>140</sup> At the same time Mark

---

<sup>137</sup> The Zealots: Investigations into the Jewish Freedom Movement in the Period from Herod I until 70 A.D., trans. David Smith (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1989).

<sup>138</sup> The Charismatic Leader and his Followers, trans. James Greig (New York: Crossroad, 1981), 68–69, 86–88; Studies in Early Christology (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1995).

S. G. F. Brandon went beyond Hengel, and saw links between Jesus' followers and the Zealots, which were suppressed in Christian literature (Jesus and the Zealots: A Study of the Political Factor in Primitive Christianity [Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1967]). See also Ernst Bammel and C. F. D. Moule, eds., Jesus and the Politics of His Day (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984); Rebecca Gray, Prophetic Figures in Late Second Temple Jewish Palestine: The Evidence from Josephus (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1993).

<sup>139</sup> "The Zealots: Their Origin, Relationships and Importance in the Jewish Revolt," NovT 28.2 (1986): 159–192; Horsley and John D. Hanson, Bandits, Prophets, and Messiahs: Popular Movements in the Time of Jesus (Minneapolis: Winston, 1985); Horsley, Jesus and the Spiral of Violence: Popular Jewish Resistance in Roman Palestine (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987); Hearing the Whole Story: The Politics of Plot in Mark's Gospel (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2001); Jesus and Empire: The Kingdom of God and the New World Order (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003).

<sup>140</sup> Craig A. Evans, Mark 8:27–16:20, WBC (Nashville: Nelson, 2001), lxxx–xciii; cf. Hans-Josef Klauck, The Religious Context of Early Christianity: A Guide to Graeco-Roman Religions, trans. Brian McNeil (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 2000), 288–313. Evans observes that Mark "presents Jesus as the true son of God and in doing so deliberately depicts Jesus as the agent of God's purpose whose mission was to restore Israel to her God.<sup>141</sup>

The Canadian Roman Catholic Ben F. Meyer depicted Jesus as the builder of the messianic Temple of the eschaton—the restored remnant of Israel and the gathered Gentiles.<sup>142</sup> Meyer sought to press beyond positivistic history's attempt to discover "facts" buried in the detritus of history by drawing on the critical realism of the philosopher Bernard Lonergan.<sup>143</sup> Critical realism recognizes that, while the historical Jesus is an intellectual construct, the construct and the process by which it is reached enable one to grasp something of the intelligible reality embedded in the sources.

Jesus and Judaism (1985) by E. P. Sanders assessed the state of current scholarship with regard to two questions: Jesus' intention and his relationship to his contemporaries.<sup>144</sup> These questions led to others: the reasons for Jesus' death and for the split between Christianity and Judaism. Sanders broke with convention by refusing to start with Jesus presents Jesus in opposition to Rome's candidates for a suitable emperor, savior, and lord. All the features that made up the emperor cult and the various customs associated with the office and title of emperor in various ways find expression in NT Christology" (lxxxix). They include the term euangelion "gospel" (found once in the Old Testament [2 Sam 4:10], but frequently in inscriptions, papyri, Josephus), omens, prophecies, the "triumphal procession" of the condemned, being hailed in divine terms, confession of Jesus as Lord, healing, sitting/standing at God's right hand, hope of Jesus' parousia and a new order, post-mortem recognition.

---

<sup>141</sup> G. B. Caird, New Testament Theology, ed. L. D. Hurst (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1995), 365–66; Caird, Jesus and the Jewish Nation (London: Athlone, 1965).

<sup>142</sup> The Aims of Jesus (London: SCM, 1979); Critical Realism and the New Testament, PTMS 17 (Allison Park: Pickwick, 1989); Christus Faber: The Master-Builder and the House of God, PTMS 29 (Allison Park: Pickwick, 1992); Reality and Illusion in New Testament Scholarship: A Primer in Critical Realist Hermeneutics (Collegeville: Michael Glazier, 1994). See n. 103.

<sup>143</sup> "Knowing...is not just seeing; it is experiencing, understanding, judging and believing. The criteria of objectivity are not just the criteria of ocular vision; they are the compounded criteria of experiencing, of understanding, of judging, and of believing. The reality known is not just looked at; it is given in experience, organized and extrapolated by understanding, posited by judgment and belief" (Bernard J. F. Lonergan, Method in Theology [London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1972], 238). Lonergan developed his epistemology in Insight: A Study of Human Understanding (New York: Philosophical Library, 1958; 3rd ed., 1970). It is summed up in "Cognitive Structure," in Collected Works of Bernard Lonergan, 4. Collection (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1993), 205–221.

<sup>144</sup> Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985). Sanders has further developed his view of Jesus' orthodoxy in Jewish Law from Jesus to the Mishnah: Five Studies (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990); and Judaism, Practice and Belief, 63 BCE–66 CE (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1992). The Historical Figure of Jesus (London: Penguin, 1992) presents a summary.

as a teacher. For there is no consensus on what or how he taught, and this procedure tacitly presumes that Jesus was first and foremost a teacher. Sanders's method was to start with what was most certain and look for explanations. Eight facts may be assumed.

1. Jesus was baptized by John the Baptist.
2. Jesus was a Galilean who preached and healed.
3. Jesus called disciples and spoke of there being twelve.
4. Jesus confined his activity to Israel.
5. Jesus engaged in a controversy about the temple.
6. Jesus was crucified outside Jerusalem by the Roman authorities.
7. After his death Jesus' followers continued as an identifiable movement.
8. At least some Jews persecuted at least parts of the new movement (Gal 1, 13, 22; Phil 3, 6), and it appears that this persecution endured at least to a time near the end of Paul's career (2 Cor 11, 24; Gal 5, 11; 6, 12; cf. Matt 23, 34; 10, 17).<sup>145</sup>

The test of a good hypothesis for explaining these facts is that "it should situate Jesus believably in Judaism and yet explain why the movement initiated by him eventually broke with Judaism."<sup>146</sup> Sanders rejected the traditional view that Jesus intended to "cleanse" the Temple so that "pure" worship might be restored. Any real effort to stop the Temple trade would have required an army.<sup>147</sup> Sanders concluded that Jesus "probably expected a new temple to be given by God from heaven, and that he made a demonstration which prophetically symbolized the coming event."<sup>148</sup> It was this act—not any supposed difference of teaching and religious practice—which led to Jesus' death.<sup>149</sup>

"We do not learn with certainty what Jesus thought of himself, although it is reasonable to think that he, as well as his followers, saw his miracles as testifying to his being a true messenger from or an agent of God."<sup>150</sup> Sanders's Jesus bears an uncanny resemblance to Schweitzer's. Sanders admitted the likeness, but claimed that his version is superior.<sup>151</sup> Schweitzer's Jesus was based chiefly on Matthew 10. Jesus expected a cosmic cataclysm preceded by suffering. Sanders's Jesus was driven by "restoration eschatology" which envisaged that God would establish a new Temple. Both were mistaken.

<sup>145</sup> Jesus and Judaism, 11.

<sup>146</sup> Ibid., 18.

<sup>147</sup> Ibid., 70; cf. Hengel, Was Jesus a Revolutionist? 16–17.

<sup>148</sup> Jesus and Judaism, 75.

<sup>149</sup> Ibid., 294–318.

<sup>150</sup> Ibid., 173.

<sup>151</sup> Ibid., 327.

Return to the eschatological Jesus has been urged by Dale C. Allison, Jr.,<sup>152</sup> Bart D. Ehrman,<sup>153</sup> Ben Witherington III,<sup>154</sup> and E. Earle Ellis.<sup>155</sup> Interpretations of Jesus' eschatological discourse have been definitively surveyed by George R. Beasley-Murray.<sup>156</sup> In his multi-volume Christian Origins and the Question of God<sup>157</sup> N. T. Wright presents an alternative view. For Schweitzer eschatology meant the end of the world. For Crossan it is a vehicle of socio-political critique. For Wright eschatology is "the climax of Israel's history, involving events for which end-of-the-world language is the only set of metaphors adequate to express the significance of what will happen, but resulting in a new and quite different phase within space-time history."<sup>158</sup> "The gospel subverts the normal Jewish apocalyptic tellings of Israel's story, not by renouncing the ideas and literary modes of apocalyptic, but by redirecting its central thrust."<sup>159</sup>

A feature of Wright's reconstruction is his exile theology—the belief of many Israelites that, although they had returned from Babylon and the Temple had been rebuilt, conditions were such that it felt as if they were still in exile. Israel was in bondage to foreigners, and worse, Israel's God had not returned to Zion.<sup>160</sup> "Jesus saw himself as a prophet announcing the kingdom of YHWH; he believed himself to be Israel's true Messiah; he believed that the kingdom would be brought about by means of his own death at the hands of the pagans. He believed, that is, that the message of the Isaianic herald was coming true at last:

---

<sup>152</sup> The End of the Ages Has Come: An Early Interpretation of the Passion and Resurrection of Jesus (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); The New Moses: A Matthean Typology (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998).

<sup>153</sup> Jesus, Apocalyptic Prophet of the New Millennium (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999).

<sup>154</sup> Jesus, Paul, and the End of the World: A Comparative Study in New Testament Eschatology (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1992). Elsewhere Witherington argues that Jesus cannot be fitted into a single category. His roles include agent, sage, and prophet (The Christology of Jesus [Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990]; Jesus the Sage: The Pilgrimage of Wisdom [Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994]; Jesus the Seer: The Progress of Prophecy [Peabody: Hendrickson, 1999]).

<sup>155</sup> Christ and the Future in New Testament History, NovTSup 97 (Leiden: Brill, 2000).

<sup>156</sup> Jesus and the Last Days: The Interpretation of the Olivet Discourse (Peabody: Hendrickson, 1993).

<sup>157</sup> The New Testament and the People of God; Jesus and the Victory of God; and The Resurrection of the Son of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992, 1996, 2003).

<sup>158</sup> Jesus and the Victory of God, 208.

<sup>159</sup> The New Testament and the People of God, 392–393; cf. 280–338.

<sup>160</sup> Ibid., 268–272; Jesus and the Victory of God, 126–127, 203–204.

Israel's god [sic] was becoming king, 'Babylon' was being defeated, and the exile was over at last."<sup>161</sup>

Wright has proved a catalyst in bringing to the fore the themes of exile and restoration, and has reenergized interest in the historical Jesus.<sup>162</sup> Yet his exile theology<sup>163</sup> and concern for critical history have been questioned. Luke Timothy Johnson faults Wright's consistent adherence to "a theoretical model" and propensity to caricature. "The strength of the model is its simplicity and clarity. The weakness... is that the simplicity is achieved at the cost of a more adequate reading of the evidence." "Wright has taken pieces of evidence that fit his overall schema and rejected or reinterpreted pieces that don't." "Wright seems intent on maintaining the character of the Gospels as accurate historical records basically unaffected by literary shaping, while at the same time he is insisting that they tell the story of Jesus as the story of Israel in miniature." "He provides no reason why he follows now one Gospel and now another; indeed, he fails to acknowledge that this is his procedure."<sup>164</sup>

I am not convinced by Wright's claims that the gospels "are the story of Jesus told as the story of Israel in miniature,"<sup>165</sup> and that the point of the parables is to teach this metanarrative.<sup>166</sup> Whereas Wright repeatedly explains his ideas, it has fallen to others to make the case for exile theology and the restoration of Israel.<sup>167</sup> The themes of exile

<sup>161</sup> Jesus and the Victory of God, 612.

<sup>162</sup> Carey C. Newman, ed., Jesus & the Restoration of Israel: A Critical Assessment of N. T. Wright's Jesus and the Victory of God (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1999).

<sup>163</sup> Reviews by Clive Marsh and Maurice Casey, JSNT 69 (1998): 77–94, 95–103; cf. Wright's reply, 105–12.

<sup>164</sup> Luke Timothy Johnson, "A Historiographical Response to Wright's Jesus," in Jesus & the Restoration of Israel, ed. Newman, 207, 214, 217, 218. Wright responds to his critics on pages 244–277.

<sup>165</sup> The New Testament and the People of God, 402; cf. Jesus and the Victory of God, 631.

<sup>166</sup> See Wright's treatment of the parables of the prodigal son and the sower (Jesus and the Victory of God, 125–131, 230–239). There are good reasons to think that the former is based on the stubborn and rebellious son (Deut 21:18–21) and the wise and foolish son in wisdom literature (Colin Brown, "The Parable of the Rebellious Son(s)," SJT 51.4 [1998]: 391–405). The parable defends Jesus' reception of sinners, and poses the riddle: who is the stubborn and rebellious son—Jesus or his critics?

<sup>167</sup> Craig A. Evans, "Aspects of Exile and Restoration in the Proclamation of Jesus and the Gospels," Bruce Chilton and Craig A. Evans, in Jesus in Context: Temple, Purity and Restoration, AGJU 39 (Leiden: Brill 1997), 263–293; Evans, "Jesus & the Continuing Exile of Israel," in Jesus & the Restoration of Israel, ed. Newman, 77–100. See also James M. Scott, ed., Exile: Old Testament, Jewish, and Christian Conceptions and restoration are crucial to understanding the historical Jesus, but they need to be filled out by exploring other areas. Missing is recognition of the importance of purity and holiness.<sup>168</sup> Jacob Neusner has observed: “The land is holy, therefore must be kept clean. It may be profaned by becoming unclean.”<sup>169</sup> The Jesus of the gospels appears repeatedly to cross boundaries of purity.<sup>170</sup> Actions like touching a leper, a woman with a flow of blood, and the corpse of a girl, healing on the Sabbath, consorting with tax collectors and sinners, and challenging dietary laws appear to threaten Temple-centered piety.<sup>171</sup> Bruce Chilton resists these implications and depicts Jesus as a Galilean rabbi in some ways more orthodox than his adversaries. The ultimate conflict turned on Jesus’ Temple action protesting the practice (recently introduced, according to Chilton, by Caiaphas) of selling animals for sacrifice within the Temple precincts.<sup>172</sup> Marcus J. Borg sees the difference between Jesus and his adversaries as one of orthopraxis. For the Pharisees, the dominant paradigm was holiness. For Jesus, it was justice, mercy and faithfulness.<sup>173</sup> Klaus Berger traces the root of the con-

---

SJSJ 56 (Leiden: Brill, 1997); Scott, ed., Restoration: Old Testament, Jewish, and Christian Conceptions, SJSJ 72 (Leiden: Brill, 2001).

<sup>168</sup> Chilton and Evans, Jesus in Context: Temple, Purity and Restoration.

<sup>169</sup> Jacob Neusner, The Idea of Purity in Ancient Judaism, SJLA 1 (Leiden: Brill, 1973), 108; cf. Hannah K. Harrington, The Impurity Systems of Qumran and the Rabbinic Foundations, SBLDS 143 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1993); Holiness: Rabbinic Judaism and the Graeco-Roman World (London: Routledge, 2001); Fredriksen, Jesus of Nazareth, 52–54, 65–70, 197–214.

<sup>170</sup> David Rhoads, “Social Criticism: Crossing Boundaries,” in Mark and Method, Janice Capel Anderson and Stephen D. Moore, ed., 2nd ed. (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2008), 145–79.

<sup>171</sup> James D. G. Dunn, “Jesus and the Temple,” in The Partings of the Ways Between Christianity and Judaism and their Significance for the Character of Christianity (London: SCM, 1991), 37–56.

<sup>172</sup> The Temple of Jesus: His Sacrificial Program within a Cultural History of Sacrifice (University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1992); Profiles of a Rabbi: Synoptic Opportunities in Reading about Jesus, BJS 177 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1989); Pure Kingdom: Jesus’ Vision of God (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1996); Rabbi Jesus: An Intimate Biography (New York: Random House, 2000).

Craig A. Evans offers alternative views: “Jesus’ Action in the Temple and Evidence of Corruption in the First-Century Temple,” “Jesus and the ‘Cave of Robbers’: Towards a Jewish Context for the Temple Action,” “Jesus and Predictions of the Destruction of the Herodian Temple,” in Jesus and His Contemporaries, 319–344, 345–366, 367–380; “Jesus’ Action in the Temple: Cleansing or Portent,” in Chilton and Evans, Jesus in Context, 395–440.

<sup>173</sup> Marcus J. Borg, Conflict, Holiness and Politics in the Teachings of Jesus (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, [1984] 1998), 116; Jesus A New Vision: Spirit, Culture, and the Life of Discipleship (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987); Jesus in Contemporary Scholarship (Valley Forge: Trinity Press International, 1997).

flict to different conceptions of purity.<sup>174</sup> The Pharisees had a “defensive” attitude, which avoided contact with whatever defiled, and followed prescribed rituals when contact was unavoidable. Jesus’ disregard of “defensive” purity violated Pharisaic practice. His practice of “offensive” holiness conveyed purity to the unclean in virtue of his anointing by the Spirit.<sup>175</sup> Mark’s Jesus makes the impure pure, the common holy, and includes the excluded.<sup>176</sup> Berger’s view puts purity at center stage, and is in my view compelling.

At the same time, Jesus’ “offensive holiness” raises the question of whether Jesus’ healings and exorcisms might be the signs of a seducer, a false prophet who performed signs and wonders in order to lead Israel astray (Deut 13:1–11; 11Q Temple Scroll XLIV, 8–18; m. Sanh. 7:4, 10; Mark 3:20–32 par.; Luke 4:27–28; John 7:12; 8:48–49, 59; 11:47–48).<sup>177</sup> In my view this is a central issue in the canonical gospels.<sup>178</sup> The healings and exorcisms<sup>179</sup> of Jesus were not simply acts of

<sup>174</sup> “Jesus als Pharisäer und frühe Christen als Pharisäer,” NovT 30 (1988): 231–262; cf. Jerome H. Neyrey, “The Idea of Purity in Mark’s Gospel,” Semeia 35 (1986): 91–128.

<sup>175</sup> Berger, “Jesus,” 247.

<sup>176</sup> On exclusion of the lame, blind, deaf, and blemished see Num 5:2–3; Lev 21:17–24; 2 Sam 5:6–8; Isa 52:1; Joel 3:17; 1Q28a 2.3–10; 11Q Temple 45.12–14; Kelim 1:1–9; cf. S. John Roth, The Blind, the Lame, and the Poor: Character Types in Luke Acts, JSNTSup 144 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997).

<sup>177</sup> August Strobel, Die Stunde der Wahrheit: Untersuchungen zum Strafverfahren gegen Jesus, WUNT 21 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1980); Otto Betz, “Probleme des Prozesses Jesu,” ANRW II 25.2 (1982): 566–647; J. Duncan M. Derrett, “Jesus as a Seducer (PLANOS = MAT‘EH),” Bijdragen 55 (1994): 43–55.

<sup>178</sup> Colin Brown, “Synoptic Miracle Stories: A Jewish Religious and Social Setting,” Foundations and Facets Forum 2.4 (1986): 55–76; “The Jesus of Mark’s Gospel,” in Jesus Then & Now, ed. Meyer & Hughes, 26–53; cf. Morton Smith, Jesus the Magician (New York: Harper & Row, 1978); David E. Aune, “Magic in Early Christianity,” ANRW II 23.2 (1980): 1507–1557; Edwin M. Yamauchi, “Magic or Miracle? Disease, Demons and Exorcisms,” in Gospel Perspectives 6, The Miracles of Jesus, ed. David Wenham and Craig Blomberg (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1986), 89–185.

The question was hotly debated in the early centuries. See Justin, Dialogue with Trypho 69, 102, 106–107; First Apology 30; Origen, Contra Celsum 1.38; Eusebius, Demonstration of the Gospel 3; Acts of Thomas 96; b. Sanh 43a; cf. Graham N. Stanton, “Jesus of Nazareth: A Magician and a False Prophet Who Deceived God’s People?,” Jesus of Nazareth, Lord and Christ, ed. Evan and Turner, 164–180; Eugene V. Gallagher, Divine Man or Magician? Celsum and Origen on Jesus, SBLDS 64 (Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1982); Harold Remus, Pagan-Christian Conflict over Miracle in the Second Century, PMS 10 (Cambridge: The Philadelphia Patristic Foundation, 1983); Frederic W. Norris, “Eusebius on Jesus as Deceiver and Sorcerer,” in Eusebius, Christianity and Judaism, ed. Harold W. Attridge and Gohei Hata (Detroit: Wayne State University; Leiden: Brill, 1992), 523–540.

<sup>179</sup> Howard Clark Kee, Miracle in the Early Christian World: A Study in Sociohistorical Method (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1983); Gerd Theissen, The Miracle

compassion, but in the tradition of the sign-working prophets,<sup>180</sup> they were signs (Matt 12:28; Luke 11:20).<sup>181</sup> What made them problematic for the Pharisees was their combination with deviant teaching and praxis that made Jesus seem to fit the profile of the sign-working false prophet of Deuteronomy 13. The Beelzebul charge was a capital offence, which suggests that Beelzebul was “the other God” whom Jesus was serving. Jesus was under a cloud of suspicion from the early days of his public activity.

The motif of Jesus as a sign-working false prophet is maintained through the hearing before the Sanhedrin with the question about rebuilding the Temple in three days, the taunts to prophesy, the challenge to come down from the cross, and the presumed call to Elijah. The turning point is Jesus’ prophecy of the sign that the high priest would see Jesus as the Son of Man seated at the right hand of Power

---

Stories of the Early Christian Tradition, trans. Francis McDonagh, ed. John Riches (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); Kee, Medicine, Miracle and Magic in New Testament Time, SNTSMS 55 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986); Barry Blackburn, Theios Aner and the Markan Miracle Traditions: A Critique of the Theios Aner Concept as an Interpretative Background of the Miracle Traditions in Mark, WUNT 40 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1991); Blackburn, “The Miracles of Jesus,” in Studying the Historical Jesus, ed. Chilton and Evans, 353–94; Graham H. Twelftree, Jesus the Exorcist: A Contribution to the Study of the Historical Jesus, WUNT 54 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1993); Jesus the Miracle Worker: A Historical and Theological Study (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1999); John Pilch, Healing in the New Testament: Insights from Medical and Mediterranean Anthropology (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1999).

See also Susan R. Garrett, Magic and the Demonic in Luke’s Writings (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); Peter G. Bolt, “Jesus, the Daimons and the Dead,” in The Unseen World: Christian Reflections on Angels, Demons and the Heavenly Realm, ed. Anthony N. S. Lane (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1996), 75–102; Jesus’ Defeat of Death: Persuading Mark’s Early Readers, SNTSMS 125 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003); John Christopher Thomas, The Devil, Disease and Deliverance: Origins of Illness in New Testament Thought, JPTSS 13 (London: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998); Armin Lange, Hermann Lichtenberger, and K. F. Diethard Römheld, eds., Die Dämonen: Die Dämonologie der israelitisch-jüdischen und frühchristlichen Literatur im Kontext ihrer Umwelt (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 2003).

<sup>180</sup> Alan Richardson, The Miracle Stories of the Gospels (London: SCM, 1941), 50–58; Maria Trautmann, Zeichenhafte Handlungen Jesu. Ein Beitrag zur Frage nach dem geschichtlichen Jesus (Würzburg: Echter Verlag, 1980); Morna D. Hooker, The Signs of a Prophet: The Prophetic Actions of Jesus (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1997). Non-miraculous signs include Jesus’ taking a child in his arms (Mark 9:36; cf. 10:13–16), instructing his disciples to shake off the dust from their feet as a sign (Mark 6:11), entering the Holy City on a colt (Mark 11:1–11; cf. Matt 21:5; Zech 9:9), “cleansing” the Temple (Mark 11:1–19 par.), washing the disciples’ feet (John 13:1–12), sharing bread and wine as his body and blood at the Last Supper (Mark 14:22–24 par.).

<sup>181</sup> Edward J. Woods, The ‘Finger of God’ and Pneumatology in Luke-Acts, JSNTSup 205 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001).

coming with the clouds of heaven (Mark 14:62 par.; cf. Psalm 110; Dan 7:13). The high priest Caiaphas<sup>182</sup> tears his robes (cf. m. Sanh. 7:5) on hearing this blasphemy, and Jesus is condemned.<sup>183</sup>

Two attempts to reexamine the divinity of Christ should be noted. In a series of studies culminating in Lord Jesus Christ: Devotion to Jesus in Earliest Christianity<sup>184</sup> Larry W. Hurtado has analyzed veneration of Jesus in the context of Jewish Christian monotheism.<sup>185</sup> Spirit christology explores the role of the Spirit in the activity of Jesus (Mark 1:10 par.; 3:29; Luke 4:18; 11:20; Matt 12:18, 28). James D. G. Dunn contends: "Certainly, it is quite clear that if we can indeed properly speak of the 'divinity' of the historical Jesus, we can do so in terms of his experience of God: his 'divinity' means his relationship with the Father as son and the Spirit of God in him."<sup>186</sup> The notion of the "incarnation" of the preexistent Son imposes patristic christology on the New Testament.<sup>187</sup> On the other hand, Gerald F. Hawthorne<sup>188</sup> and

---

<sup>182</sup> Helen K. Bond, Caiaphas: Friend of Rome and Judge of Jesus? (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2004).

<sup>183</sup> Otto Betz, ANRW II 25.1, 595; Strobel, Die Stunde der Wahrheit, 81–86; Darrell L. Bock, "The Son of Man Seated at God's Right Hand and the Debate over Jesus' 'Blasphemy,'" in Jesus of Nazareth: Lord and Christ, ed. Green and Turner, 181–191; Blasphemy and Exaltation in Judaism and the Final Examination of Jesus: A Philological-Historical Study of the Key Jewish Themes Impacting Mark 14:61–64, WUNT 106 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1998); Raymond E. Brown, The Death of the Messiah: From Gethsemane to the Grave (New York: Doubleday, 1994), 1:484–515.

<sup>184</sup> Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003.

<sup>185</sup> Earlier studies are One God, One Lord: Early Christian Devotion and Ancient Jewish Monotheism, 2nd ed. (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1998); At the Origins of Christian Worship: The Context and Character of Earliest Christian Devotion (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999).

<sup>186</sup> Jesus and the Spirit: A Study of the Religious and Charismatic Experience of Jesus and the First Christians as Reflected in the New Testament (London: SCM, 1975), 92; cf. Dunn, Christology in the Making: A New Testament Inquiry into the Origins of the Incarnation (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2nd ed. 1989, reprint 1996), 138; The Christ and the Spirit, 1. Christology, Pneumatology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); Graham N. Stanton, Bruce W. Longenecker, and Stephen C. Barton, eds., The Holy Spirit and Christian Origins: Essays in Honor of James D.G. Dunn (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004). Dunn's recent work focuses on the impact made by Jesus (Jesus Remembered [Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003]).

<sup>187</sup> "Christ, Adam, and Preexistence," in Where Christology Began: Essays on Philipians 2, ed. Ralph P. Martin and Brian J. Dodd (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998), 74–83.

<sup>188</sup> "In the Form of God and Equal with God (Philippians 2:6), in Where Christology Began, ed. Martin and Dodd 96–110; The Presence and the Power: The Significance of the Holy Spirit in the Ministry of Jesus (Dallas: Word, 1991).

Ralph Del Colle<sup>189</sup> seek to combine Spirit Christology with traditional Christology. The late Dutch Jesuit, Piet Schoonenberg,<sup>190</sup> saw Spirit Christology as a means of redressing the imbalance of Chalcedonian two-natures Christology. Craig S. Keener argues that early Christian experience centered on the Holy Spirit: Jesus is the bringer of the Spirit.<sup>191</sup>

3. Unfinished Agenda

The idea of three quests of the historical Jesus is more a convenient tool than accurate account of the situation. Perhaps there are only two quests with many forms—the quest of the unhistorical Jesus and the quest of the historical Jesus. Both are unfinished. Doubtless many will continue to pursue the quest of the unhistorical Jesus, in the belief that the unhistorical Jesus is the real Jesus. But a Jesus of faith detached from history is a figment of the imagination. For Christians and those of other faiths the reality of Jesus cannot be detached from history. The agenda for the future will emerge out of the questions that exercise us today.

---

<sup>189</sup> Christ and the Spirit: Spirit Christology in Trinitarian Perspective (New York: Oxford University Press, 1994).

<sup>190</sup> The Christ: A Study of the God-Man Relationship in the Whole of Creation and in Jesus Christ, trans. Della Couling (New York: Herder, 1971). Schoonenberg came under censorship for inverting the doctrine of enhypostasia, claiming that the Logos became personal in Jesus (The Christ, 88–91). Spirit Christology figures in Schoonenberg's later work, Der Geist, das Wort und der Sohn: Eine Geist-Christologie, trans. Wilma Immler (Regensburg: Pustet, 1992); cf. Birgit Blankenberg, Gottes Geist in der Theologie Piet Schoonenbergs (Mainz: Matthias Grünewald, 2000).

<sup>191</sup> The Spirit in the Gospels and Acts: Divine Purity and Power (Peabody: Hendrickson, 1997).

FUTURES FOR THE JESUS QUESTS

BENGT HOLMBERG

1. Introduction

In a well-known article, “Jesus the Victim” (originally a presidential address to the Society of Biblical Literature 1991), Helmut Koester criticized “the Third Quest” of the historical Jesus. He noted that what some scholars saw as a new era in Jesus research was in reality more of a return to the position of liberal theology of a hundred years ago: Jesus is again the non-eschatological social reformer:

We are again on the way to a human Jesus who is just like one of us, one who holds values that are very close to our ideological commitments, a Jesus who is a social reformer and who attacks patriarchal orders, a Jesus who, as a real human person, can stand as an example and inspiration for worthy causes.<sup>1</sup>

The “progress” made in the field of Jesus research might then, in Koester’s view, be more of a shift in how present-day scholars want to see Jesus than a real advance in historical understanding of him or in the application of rigorous historical methods.

This critical perspective is a healthy reminder that present-day weaknesses in scholarship might simply be rehearsals of past ones—only so much harder to recognize because we believe them to be safely done with. But from the fact that the historical picture of Jesus today is again more similar to what scholars held a hundred years ago one can draw two different conclusions. Either: we are repeating their mistakes (Koester’s position), or: they were not all that mistaken! Only an ingrained evolutionist who believes that later is always better needs to conclude from the detected similarity between scholarly perspectives a hundred years apart that they must both be wrong, and that the present has not “advanced” beyond the past. But possibly they might both have got some things right. In my opinion, none of the quests should be discarded or accepted as a whole. Looking over weak and strong aspects of the scholarly endeavour of more than two centuries of Jesus research, we might conclude that some of the roads taken are dead-end streets, while others have not been explored enough and still others open possibilities of increased historical understanding.

---

<sup>1</sup> Helmut Koester, “Jesus the Victim,” JBL 111 (1992): 3–15, at 7, referring to Marcus Borg, Richard Horsley and Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza.

1.1. A Brief Look at the Three Quests

It should be admitted at the outset that it is hard to avoid a good amount of simplification in talking about different “quests” (let alone three quests), as if they were fairly unitary and distinct entities in the history of scholarship.<sup>2</sup> But scholarly constructs like labelling and sorting phenomena, books and scholars in patterns, taxonomies, lines of development, and periods of research are inevitable if one wants to make large-scale but interesting generalizations.

So, to characterize very briefly: The First Quest of the historical Jesus (ca. 1780–ca. 1955) aimed at finding the real, “historical” Jesus behind the gospel surface, especially by going back to the oldest layers, or “sources,” in the gospel tradition. After subtracting the considerable amount of Christian interpretation and “mythology” from these sources, they (mainly Mark and Q) were thought to provide a fairly objective historical report of Jesus, depicting him as an ethical reformer and preacher. A typical work in this genre is Adolf von Harnack’s The Essence of Christianity (1900).

The “First Quest” of the historical Jesus became a label designating all previous Jesus research only when James M. Robinson published a book in 1959 on the renewed historical Jesus research in Germany. In Robinson’s opinion, what had followed upon the famous lecture of Ernst Käsemann in Marburg in 1953 on the need to take up this scholarly work again was so revolutionary and different from anything that had been done in the field before that he named it The New Quest of the Historical Jesus (London: SCM, 1959). So, everything earlier became the “Old” or “First Quest.” The title alluded, of course, to The Quest of the Historical Jesus, the title of the 1910 English translation of Albert Schweitzer’s important study and critique of all previous historical study of Jesus, Von Reimarus zu Wrede (1906).

---

<sup>2</sup> The division of the history of Jesus research into three or even four periods—First Quest, No Quest, Second Quest, Third Quest—has been challenged by several scholars. See e.g. William Telford, “Major Trends and Interpretive Issues in the Study of Jesus”, in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. Bruce Chilton and Craig A. Evans (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 33–74, esp. 62–64, Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide (London: SCM, 1998), 22–30, opting for five stages in Jesus research; and Clive Marsh, “Quests of the Historical Jesus in New Historicist Perspective,” BibInt 5 (1997): 403–437, who would rather talk about nine different quests.

In the first half of the twentieth century it had become clearer to Jesus research that even the oldest sources in the tradition about Jesus were saturated with christology and had been formed by a generation of oral transmission in Christian groups. Consequently, pessimism had grown about the possibility of reaching Jesus himself at all by way of historical research (cf. Rudolf Bultmann). The method of the Second Quest (ca. 1955–1990) to penetrate the double barrier of Christian oral tradition and Christian redaction of sources was to use sharply formulated criteria of authenticity to ensure a critically secure minimum of Jesus sayings which could then serve as the basis for an historical picture of him. The paramount criterion was that of double dissimilarity: only that in the Jesus tradition which was unlike both contemporary Judaism and the earliest Christianity could be considered authentic Jesus material. Typical works in this genre are Günther Bornkamm’s Jesus of Nazareth (1956) and Norman Perrin’s Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (1967).<sup>3</sup>

The next time a scholar wanted to indicate that a fresh new start had been made in Jesus research it was inevitable that the “quests” would start being numbered the “first,” “second,” and “third.” This happened in 1988 when N. Tom Wright published the second edition of Stephen E. Neill’s The Interpretation of the New Testament 1861–1961, changing the concluding date to 1986, and adding a long chapter on what had happened in the 25 years since the book’s first edition. One of the more remarkable things, in Wright’s opinion, was the major turn-about that had taken place within Jesus research around 1980.

A new optimism with regard to the feasibility of historiography on Jesus had emerged, together with a determined focus on the Jewishness of Jesus and his rootedness in contemporary Judaism (rather than his dissimilarity from it), as well as his undeniable influence on and continuity with the movement that became “the Christians.” While not denying that Second Quest scholars were still active, Wright considered this new, less theological approach, the Third Quest, to be the way forward for a real historical investigation of Jesus.<sup>4</sup>

---

<sup>3</sup> G. Bornkamm, Jesus von Nazareth (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1956); N. Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (London: SCM, 1967).

But even Tom Wright who introduced the label warns against simply lumping together all scholars who have written on the historical Jesus during the last twenty years under the label “Third Quest.” There is still quite an amount of research on Jesus performed in the Second Quest style, and there is no inevitability or necessity of changing to a Third Quest outlook. What distinguishes one “quest” from another has primarily to do with differences in hermeneutical and historical method and historical focus, and many of these differences between scholars remain and are likely to do so.<sup>5</sup>

1.2. And Next?

The prophetic task that I have accepted from the editors in relation to research on Jesus is of course a very human undertaking. But it shares the properties of prophecy in being a mixture of prediction and prescription. What must happen in Jesus research nobody can say, but to voice an opinion about what ought to and possibly will happen belongs to the responsibility of scholars to reflect upon their trade. So, I will point to a few characteristics of Jesus research that I think will and should prevail in the future. I will pronounce only two “prophecies,” both fairly broad and general:

---

<sup>4</sup> Against the impression sometimes given that Jesus research of the Third Quest type is a mostly North American and British enterprise, it should be pointed out that important new books of this kind have been published by or with substantial input from German scholars: Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, Der historische Jesus: Ein Lehr-buch (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1996), English translation: The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide, Michael Labahn and Andreas Schmidt eds., Jesus, Mark and Q: The Teaching of Jesus and its Earliest Records, JSNTSup 214 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001); Andreas Lindemann, ed., The Sayings Source Q and the Historical Jesus, BETL 158 (Leuven: Leuven Univ. Press and Peeters, 2001); Jens Schröter and Ralph Brucker, eds., Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, BZ NW 114 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002); Wolfgang Stegemann, Bruce J. Malina and Gerd Theissen, eds., The Social Setting of Jesus and the Gospels (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2002), Gerd Theissen, Jesus als historische Gestalt: Beiträge zur Jesusforschung, ed. Annette Merz (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2003); Gerd Theissen, Die Jesusbewegung: Sozial-geschichte einer Revolution der Werte (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 2004).

<sup>5</sup> See N. Tom Wright’s “Introduction” to the republication of an important work that more or less started the “Third Quest” in 1979: Ben F. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus, with a New Introduction by N. T. Wright, PTM 48 (San José: Pickwick Publications, 2002), 9a–91, at 9e.

- A. The gospels will be seen as generally trustworthy evidence of Jesus.
- B. Jesus research will use a more holistic method.

2. “Prophecy” 1: The Gospels Will Be Seen as Generally Trustworthy Evidence of Jesus

This statement could easily be thought to constitute nothing more than a traditionalist hope or apologetic wishful thinking. Therefore, I want to point to a number of arguments put forward by scholars writing on the methodology of Jesus research in order to indicate that there are good reasons for our discipline to develop in the said direction.

2.1. Neither Trust nor Mistrust in Historical Sources should be Exaggerated

The first argument is a very general observation by Gerd Theissen: The very same axiom that prevents us from believing in a perfectly truthful representation of historical reality in human memory and narrative also prevents us from believing in the possibility of a perfectly false representation of that reality. One is not more possible than the other.<sup>6</sup>

Why is it practically impossible to doubt the existence of Pontius Pilate, realizing, as we do, that all historical knowledge is relative and hypothetical? The answer is, in Theissen’s witty formulation, that even if there had existed in the first century a powerful Committee for Deceiving Later Historians intent on presenting a false picture of their own historical reality—including a Roman governor Pilate that never existed—it would be a simply unattainable goal for them to control all sources and remains needed to produce that effect. Should we imagine that they had arranged for false coins with Pilate’s name to be planted in the soil of Palestine and to smuggle in an inscription mentioning him and his official title as part of a stair in the theatre of Caesarea? Did the committee manage to talk Philo, Josephus and Tacitus (or later copyists of their works) into adding some notices about Pilate here and there in their writings, and then also have the evangelists tell about him in ways that neither contradict nor borrow information from these other writers? The only possible answer is: impossible!<sup>7</sup>

---

<sup>6</sup> Gerd Theissen, “Historische Skepsis und Jesusforschung,” in Jesus als historische Gestalt: Beiträge zur Jesusforschung. Zum 60. Geburtstag von Gerd Theissen herausgegeben von Annette Merz, FRLANT 202 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2003), 327–363, esp. 333–334.

The practical conclusion or methodological axiom informing historical work with ancient sources like the gospels is therefore necessarily a double one: Human beings are incapable of attaining perfect historical truth, and that is why we have to treat even the best of sources with a methodically disciplined mistrust. Humans are also incapable of attaining perfect historical falsehood, and that is why we ought to treat historical sources with a methodically disciplined trust. So, both reasoned trust and reasoned mistrust should be part of a scholarly historiography.

2.2. Dispensing with Hyperscepticism as Historical Method

Early nineteenth-century research in ancient history and classical literature was dominated by a strong scepticism. The critical spirit saturated historical work to the extent that eventually scholars disbelieved everything stated by a Greek or Roman historian or writer, including of course all information about authorship of literary works. They wanted instead to build their historical reconstructions only on a critically secure minimum of information that had been excavated and sifted out like grains of gold from the ancient deserts of unreliable texts—and of course a large amount of conjectures and daring hypotheses of their own. The latter were necessary as the textual data had been reduced to a few fragments.<sup>8</sup>

The monumental presumption that lay behind both the consistent scepticism against ancient information and the unmitigated trust in one's own inventiveness as a better source of knowledge was however unmasked and abandoned in the classical disciplines already before 1900. Historians of antiquity and classical philologists were the first to point out that a maximal distrust of information from the available sources must lead to a paralysis of historical research. And very often this attitude results, as it must, in researchers resorting to vastly more fanciful and complicated hypotheses than the ones based on a critical trust in the usefulness of ancient sources in retrieving historical information about ancient times. But in classical scholarship this hypersceptical attitude has been replaced since more than a hundred years by ordinary historical-critical work built on probability judgments reached by the process of hypothesis and verification.

---

<sup>7</sup> In stating the impossibility of complete falsehood in historical sources Theissen is thinking of source material of some scope and complexity, not a single statement of fact, which can of course be completely true or false.

<sup>8</sup> Malcolm F. Lowe, "The Critical and the Skeptical Methods in New Testament Research," Greg 81 (2000): 693–721.

Total historical scepticism is an intoxicating drug that makes its addict think that he or she has reached a very high level of critical scholarship. In a more sober mood historians use more effort in being critical against their own and others' hypotheses than on critiquing away the available historical material. I believe it is high time that the turning away from nineteenth-century hyperscepticism as a methodological postulate should be undertaken also in New Testament studies, including Jesus research.<sup>9</sup> Part of the problem is the reluctance of biblical scholars to appear gullible and pious ("unkritisch"). If we exegetes apply the same attitude to the gospels as classicists and historians do in regard to their texts our discipline will produce simpler hypotheses, doubtless closer to the image given by the sources, and that causes discomfort concerning one's scholarly image. But the discomfort will probably wane. In scholarship a simple hypothesis is not evidence of a simpleton, and there is no ban on arriving at answers to historical questions which lie close to the information in our sources.

I predict that in the future historians of Jesus will find it more probable that the originality, inner consistency and daringly innovative appeal to and continuity with biblical and Jewish religious tradition that mark the core of the Jesus tradition of the gospels comes basically from one person endowed with a strong intellect and prophetic passion (Jesus), than that this is the result of a many-layered accumulation and redaction process in which any number of early Christian teachers and theologians could and did cooperate.<sup>10</sup> This means that the gospel tradition is more generally seen as fairly (not totally!) reliable evidence about what Jesus said and did, even if the tradition has obviously been worked on and every single saying or story remains with a margin of uncertainty as regards historicity.

---

<sup>9</sup> One of the four tendencies that Scot McKnight sees as characteristic for recent Jesus research is scepticism in methodology: "Jesus of Nazareth," in The Face of New Testament Studies: A Survey of Recent Research, ed. Scot McKnight and Grant R. Osborne (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic and Leicester: Apollos, 2004): 149–176, esp. 153–162.

<sup>10</sup> Cf. Paul W. Barnett, Jesus and the Logic of History (Downers Grove: InterVarsity Press, 1997, repr. 2000).

2.3. Hearing the Voice of Jesus

Joachim Jeremias put some effort into finding characteristics of what he termed the ipsissima vox Iesu, “the very own voice of Jesus.” He reckoned that if a retranslation of Greek Jesus logia into Aramaic reveals structured language, such as word-play, alliteration, or rhythm, this would increase the probability that we really have an Aramaic original from Jesus under the Greek wording. Among such characteristics of Jesus’ diction that Jeremias collected in his last book are: the frequent use of passive when Jesus refers to God, and of antithetical parallelisms (there are more than 100 in the gospels), alliterations and assonances, several types of patterned, poetic rhythms in the wording of sayings, the opening Amen, a high frequency of pictorial language, enigmas, metaphors and parables, and frequent use of words from the stem mlk, like “kingdom” or “rule.”<sup>11</sup>

Dale C. Allison has taken up and added to this list of literary features of the Jesus material, or “rhetorical strategies” as he names them, by pointing also to a high frequency of rhetorical questions, hyperboles (the beam in the eye, a camel through a needle’s eye), and aphorisms.<sup>12</sup> In these instances one seems really to be in contact with a special way of talking, a personal diction belonging to an individual, his very own voice. This impression is strengthened by the fact that the diction of the evangelists in redactional material is in many ways different from the one found in the Jesus tradition. Jeremias himself was careful, however, to point out that the existence of these “voice imprints” or typical speech patterns in the gospel tradition is not in itself sufficient to determine whether a Jesus saying in the gospel really is a verbatim rendering of something said by Jesus, ipsissima verba Iesu. But it increases the probability that it is.

It is of course imaginable that such easily recognized Jesuanic speech patterns were not only admired, remembered and reproduced, but also imitated by others—especially by the earliest, Aramaic-speaking Christians. Dale Allison asks us to imagine such a scenario: There lived a Jewish woman, Faustina, in Jerusalem in the year 35 CE who had heard Peter preach and became an enthusiastic convert to belief in

<sup>11</sup> Joachim Jeremias, New Testament Theology, 1., The Proclamation of Jesus (London: SCM, 1971), ch. 1.

<sup>12</sup> Dale C. Allison, Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998), 49–50.

Jesus as the Christ. Soon she found that she had the gift of prophetic speech, and in the frequent meetings of the Christ-believers she started delivering prophetic messages in the name of the Risen Christ Jesus. She was a revered charismatic figure and those who heard her really believed that her oracles were words from Jesus himself. So, many of her prophetic utterances were remembered and transmitted to other believers with the preface "Jesus said."

Allison asks us to imagine for the sake of his argument that Faustina was actually the one who introduced the apocalyptic Son of Man sayings in earliest Christianity. In her prophetic words from Jesus she used the Aramaic term bar nasha, "son of man," that Jesus himself had sometimes used as a modest circumlocution for himself, a self-reference as in the saying "The son of man [= I, Jesus] has nowhere where he can rest his head." But Faustina's use of the term was influenced by the book of Daniel, where "Son of Man" in chapter 7 is used about a figure with heavenly properties, symbolizing the whole of Israel, who after oppression shall come in power and glory from Heaven. By using the Jesuanic phrase "son of man" in a new way she thus made the Risen Jesus prophesy about his return as the heavenly Son of Man. And because these words were added to the oral tradition long before the different collections of sayings and events were written down, it is not possible to distinguish the voice and words of Jesus from those of Faustina, and there is no way of doing so by source analysis or further refined stylistic analysis.<sup>13</sup>

Allison puts forward his Faustina hypothesis mainly in order to demonstrate that our standard criteria of authenticity do not suffice to establish indubitably authentic words of Jesus.<sup>14</sup> Neither the "Jesus hypothesis" nor the "Faustina hypothesis" can be strictly disproved, which is why Allison concludes: "if the sayings in the earliest Jesus traditions, taken in their entirety, are not roughly congruent with the sort of things Jesus tended to say, then our task is hopeless."<sup>15</sup> So, before we start any historical investigation of Jesus we must answer

---

<sup>13</sup> Allison, Jesus, 7–10.

<sup>14</sup> He does not, however, believe in his own hypothesis as an explanation of how the Jesus tradition actually was formed. This is clear from the large part of his book where he tries to show that Jesus was really a "millenarian prophet," whose proclamation and mission was saturated with eschatological thinking. See the listing of seventeen dominant themes of the Jesus tradition on pp. 46–48 where the first eight are eschatological, and especially the thorough argument of pp. 95–171.

<sup>15</sup> Allison, Jesus, 35.

Yes or No to the question: Do we hear Jesus through the gospels or not? And if the answer is No, we should face the consequences and put down any quest for the historical Jesus.

Allison thinks there are good reasons to give the answer “Yes, we do hear Jesus in the gospels.” The reasons are not found by starting in a detailed investigation of all sayings one by one (or even the larger complexes of sayings) to see which of them are authentic. One should rather look for an explanatory model or matrix, a larger story, research programme or “gestalt” from which the material is understood as a whole. And the best research programme of that kind is “Jesus as an eschatological prophet.”<sup>16</sup> After giving a number of reasons for concluding that this is an adequate way of summarizing Jesus, Allison goes on to show how the first-century Jesus tradition is not a collection of totally disparate and wholly unrelated materials. Certain themes and motifs and rhetorical strategies are consistently attested over a wide range of the material. About half of these themes are clearly eschatological, others show that Jesus—if this material preserves historical memory—was a teacher of compassion, a moral rigorist, and a miracle worker.

In the end it has to be admitted that either most of these themes and strategies are authentic and made by Jesus—or none of them. Allison’s main proposition, following from his discussion of method in Jesus research, is then that the Jesus tradition is evidence about Jesus, not in part (say 18, 33 or even 50 percent), but either in its entirety or not at all.<sup>17</sup>

This “global” acceptance of or trust in the gospels as evidence about Jesus does not mean that an historian should simply accept anything in this tradition or stop using criteria of authenticity at all. It is still quite difficult to pronounce with certainty on the authenticity of a single utterance of Jesus, while on the other hand the total amount of sayings show a historical profile of high probability. It is simply reasonable to believe that we hear Jesus himself in this tradition of sayings that are found so soon after the end of his life and are so distinct both in form and content.

---

<sup>16</sup> Allison, Jesus, 36–38.

<sup>17</sup> Allison, Jesus, 50–51. He points to the fact that other scholars, such as Nils Astrup Dahl or John Riches, take the same either—or stand, and sums up: “Here it is the collective weight of the evidence, the pattern created by the multitude, that is being considered; the accuracy of any particular witness is another matter” (50 n. 171).

This, like so many historical judgments, is not an unavoidable conclusion from some alleged fund of historical “facts” and super-secure rules for historical work (they do not exist). But it is a well-grounded assumption based on inherent probability. In practice it functions as a hypothesis or basic assumption to work from and see whether it provides good historical explanations. This first step is then followed by the application of (five) criteria or, as Allison names them with Meier, “indices” of authenticity, in order to authenticate individual complexes and topics as probably coming from Jesus himself.

2.4. Is it so Easy to Imitate Jesus?

The highly hypothetical character of Allison’s Faustina scenario is underlined by the fact that it presupposes something as possible that must be considered unproven and even unlikely: that a human is capable of completely imitating another person’s characteristic way of thinking and expressing himself—especially if this other person is an innovative and creative thinker. Complete and convincing imitation includes more than a few turns of phrase or the rhythm of spoken Aramaic. It requires mastery of matters more difficult to imitate, such as the other person’s symbolical thinking, understanding of reality, poetical strength and spiritual depth.

How easy is it really to shape a single parable that could be added undetected as equal in literary merit and spiritual depth to the ones we have from Jesus in the gospels? Most of his parables can be told in less than a minute and appear at first simple and artless. But once one starts trying to understand what they really and fully mean they turn out to be subtle, many-layered and pregnant with significance—and not easy to imitate.

If one persists and simply postulates that Faustina was sufficiently gifted, both literarily and spiritually, to enrich the Jesus tradition on a level and scope comparable to (or surpassing) the Master’s, one has actually introduced into the argument a “second Jesus,” an invented genius who is the real originator of a good deal of what the gospels tell us was said by Jesus of Nazareth. And if Faustina has been entered into the explanation of how the sayings of Jesus were produced as a second originator, why not a third or fourth or more? Once we allow five or twenty-five Jesuses,<sup>18</sup> all of whom contributed their separate ideas and pieces to the gospel puzzle image of Jesus, the question becomes unavoidable whether the real Jesus need have been a genius—or whether he need have existed at all—in order to explain the existence of the gospels. And by then we have of course arrived at the second of Allison's two alternatives: the gospel traditions about Jesus are totally unusable as material for historical knowledge about Jesus.

---

<sup>18</sup> One could perhaps name this imaginary group of anonymous but brilliantly innovative disciples “the Jesus Seminar.”

As a fact this second alternative has been the dominant one during the last two centuries of Jesus research: Jesus himself was a fairly simple and uncomplicated person with a small programme and simple teaching on whom theologically genial followers hung layer upon layer of exuberant apocalyptic and messianic ideas, more exactly those ideas that we know as the early Christian faith.

2.5. Possible—Plausible—Probable

It is possible that this is how the gospel tradition was created, but is it probable? No, and I believe that is why nowadays more Jesus researchers choose the first of Allison's alternatives (global trust in gospels), whether they are Christians or Jews, liberals or traditionalists. It is increasingly realized that in historical research a scholar is much more obliged to find the probable than to invent the possible. Consequently, reconstructions of the historical Jesus have tended during the last two decades to start with a basic trust, albeit a critical one, in the possibility of using the gospels as a basis for historiography.

For any historian it is important to distinguish carefully between what is possible, plausible, and probable. Suggestions about possible explanations of historical data can be put forward by the dozen, while plausible hypotheses demand a higher degree of probability than simply being brilliant and theoretically possible. So the number of arguable, i.e. plausible, explanations is seldom higher than a handful. The will and capacity to then move on from the level of plausibility to a historically well-grounded judgment about which hypothesis is the most probable is, in the words of Bernard Lonergan, what separates men from boys in scientific historiography.<sup>19</sup>

---

<sup>19</sup> The reference is given by Ben F. Meyer in his review of John Dominic Crossan's book The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (1991), CBQ 55 (1993): 575–576. Meyer gives a good description of the three levels of historical certainty and how historians should work their way from possibility to probability in the first, methodological part of his The Aims of Jesus.

2.6. Form-Critical Arguments against Form-Critical Scepticism

Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz come to much the same conclusion<sup>20</sup> as Dale Allison from another direction: a self-critical analysis of the historical scepticism typical of form criticism. The deep scepticism against the authenticity of the sayings of Jesus so characteristic of the form-critical tradition is overdoing the first and missing the second part of the fundamental double axiom mentioned above:<sup>21</sup> total historical truth and total historical falsehood are both unattainable. So now it is time to turn a bit of scepticism against this sceptical tradition, for reasons that are as socio-historically and sociologically grounded as form criticism itself. Five reasons speak against this now conventional scepticism:<sup>22</sup>

1. What we know of the social situation of the early Christian communities is not mirrored in the synoptic gospels to the extent one would expect according to the principles of form criticism. Questions such as the necessity of circumcision for Christ-believers or what offices/ministries should make up the authority structure were important in the “Jesus movement,” but there is not a single saying of Jesus about these questions.
2. The continuity of behavioural patterns between Jesus and the wandering charismatics that carried and transmitted his radical ethos concerning matters of family, property, social responsibilities and status increases the probability that this tradition was preserved unchanged.<sup>23</sup>

---

<sup>20</sup> “The Jesus tradition was preserved in accordance with his intention—not as verbatim authenticity (Lat. ipsissima verba, ‘his very own words’), but as the authenticity of the themes, the literary forms and his intentions (Lat. ipsissima vox, ‘his very own voice’),” Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, “Den kontroversielle historiske Jesus,” in Den historiske Jesus og hans betydning, ed. Troels Engberg-Pedersen (Copenhagen: Gyldendal, 1998), 50–71, at 53 (my translation from the author’s Danish).

<sup>21</sup> See n. 5.

<sup>22</sup> Theissen and Merz, “Den kontroversielle historiske Jesus”, esp. 52–55. This line of argument is found also in their article “Der umstrittene historische Jesus. Oder: Wie historisch ist der historische Jesus?” in Gerd Theissen, Jesus als historische Gestalt. Beiträge zur Jesusforschung, 3–32.

<sup>23</sup> In his recent Die Jesusbewegung: Sozialgeschichte einer Revolution der Werte (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 2004), 33–98, Theissen takes up, defends and develops his well-known hypothesis of the wandering charismatics of the Jesus movement.

3. The Jesus of the gospels fits better and better into the Palestinian Jewish socio-historical, political and cultural context of the first half of the first century the more we learn about it. He is historically better understood as a product of Jewish history than of early Christian imagination. This increases the general historicity of tradition, even if the details are uncertain.
4. The Jesus movement shows a number of similarities with other millenaristic movements. One of the characteristics of such movements is that they are stamped by a charismatic person, a “prophet.” The prophet’s individuality explains the character of the movement much more than the movement explains the picture of the prophet given in its tradition—so why should it be any different in the Jesus movement?
5. Against the “redaction-critical” argument that the multiplicity of Jesus images in the gospels is a result of their growing distance from historic reality and colouring by the Christology of the evangelists, Theissen and Merz object that one can never compare a source with the historical reality it depicts, but only with other sources. Now the very multiplicity and difference between the sources show that they are to some degree independent of each other, and then their remaining points of agreement are stronger evidence of a common kernel of events and words from the person Jesus. If it is possible to reconstruct from differing Jesus images in the first century a logically coherent picture of a historical Jesus, who is also plausible in the context where the gospels place him (Galilee around 30), that also speaks against any taken-for-granted scepticism concerning the historical value of the gospels.

After looking at reasons for trusting the Jesus tradition a bit more and dispensing with hyperscepticism for reasons of general historical method, we will turn to a new (or not so new) understanding of the sources and their character and development.

2.7. The Oral Character of the Jesus Tradition Brings us Closer to the Jesus of History

In his thousand-page book Jesus Remembered (2003) and in the brief methodological follow-up to that in A New Perspective on Jesus (2005), James Dunn has made a major effort to change the ingrained literary, source-analytical understanding of the gospels and the process that produced them.<sup>24</sup> This by now centuries-old “default setting” has made scholars for generations think about the gospel tradition from and about Jesus as a literary and very textual phenomenon. Every stage in the process is seen as a text that depends on and has used other texts, and in that process almost inevitably “redacted” and changed them. Looking on the gospels as a kind of literary equivalent of an archaeological tell, the natural first aim of an historical investigation of Jesus has been to dig down through the layers of distortive editing that has been layered on top of the original tradition and find bedrock, the tradition so old and unchanged that it represents Jesus himself. One notices that the First Quest axiom of the immense difference between the gospel image of Jesus and Jesus as he really was is secretly operative as the presupposition of this conventional orthodoxy.

Whether the prime candidate for this position of bedrock tradition is the Gospel of Mark (as in the First Quest), or Q, or even the oldest layer of Q (as in the Q research of the last decades),<sup>25</sup> the understanding of the tradition process common to the last two centuries is strictly, not to say woodenly, textual and linear. Every piece of tradition is written—or thought of as written—and therefore fixed at a specific date. All differences between sources can ideally be arranged sequentially in an unbroken line of literary dependence. Together, this means that (only) the oldest source or layer is thought to contain the information about the historical Jesus least tainted by interpretative redaction governed by Christian faith. For some undisclosed reason faith always distorts historical reality, and temporal proximity within literary history guarantees a higher degree of correct interpretation of what happened with Jesus and what his mission was all about.

Even if one distances oneself from such too facile equations between literary history and the history of tradition,<sup>26</sup> the question remains: is

---

<sup>24</sup> James D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered, Christianity in the Making, 1 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003), and A New Perspective on Jesus: What the Quest for the Historical Jesus Missed (Grand Rapids: Baker, 2005).

<sup>25</sup> See John S. Kloppenborg, The Formation of Q: Trajectories in Ancient Wisdom Collections (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987), and later work by him and others.

<sup>26</sup> See John S. Kloppenborg, “Discursive Practices in the Sayings Gospel Q and the Quest of the Historical Jesus”, in The Sayings Source Q and the Historical Jesus, ed. Andreas Lindemann, BETL 158 (Leuven: Peeters, 2001), 149–190, e.g. 159 n. 29. And on pp. 244–245 he admits that material added to the stage Q<sup>2</sup> could be older than Q<sup>1</sup> and even dominical.

the gospel tradition process a literary history at all? Dunn contends that it is not and that this literary, source analytical (mis)understanding of the gospels has seriously marred the quest(s) for the historical Jesus from beginning to now. It makes us misunderstand several basic facts and characteristics of the gospel tradition. He summarizes his own view in the form of three theses:<sup>27</sup>

- a. The ultimate origin of the Jesus tradition is the impact that Jesus made on people who heard him and believed him—and expressed that impact in the first formulations of the Jesus tradition. Faith in Jesus and in the tremendous importance of his teaching did not start only after the resurrection, but governed remembrance from the first day, even if that faith was transformed by the events of cross and resurrection.
- b. Tradition was oral, not a series of written redactions, and it was carried through the first decades by groups whose lives were shaped by the “performance” of these oral traditions. Tradition was not confined to the memory held or collected by individual authors who then wrote it down.
- c. The features in the Jesus tradition that are both characteristic and relatively distinct reflect fairly faithfully the impact of Jesus. This gospel tradition gives us—not Jesus himself or the event itself—but Jesus as he was remembered from the start, which is as close as any historical source can bring us to an historical person or event.

Dunn’s view, that each version or “performance” of the tradition may vary from others but still retains the core elements given it at the start in the life of Jesus, results in reducing the distance between Jesus and the gospel texts quite considerably. Basically all these performances are at the same, fairly close distance from the impact that started the telling. Much in the gospels as we meet them is a written-down version of an oral performance of how Jesus was remembered in that event or saying.

Other attempts at re-envisaging oral tradition are criticized by Dunn as being after all too marked by a literary culture: oral transmission of large cultural tradition complexes by memorization specialists, oral history, and “social memory.” One might counter that Dunn in his turn underplays rather severely the role of memorization and of the authoritative transmitter of tradition, the reliable eyewitness and collector of eyewitness evidence in oral culture, all richly evidenced in ancient sources.<sup>28</sup> Sometimes his image of the anonymous and faceless group only transmitting their important oral tradition by “performing” or “celebrating” it comes uncomfortably close to the faceless “Gemeinde” (community) of form criticism that somehow carries on and shapes a very informal and uncontrolled tradition.

---

<sup>27</sup> Dunn, A New Perspective, passim. For a summary, see p. 77.

Dunn is certainly right in asking that gospel scholars need to understand how oral cultures work and live by their foundational memories in order to understand the emergence of the gospel tradition. His outlook is one further reason to move in the direction of a greater trust in the general reliability of the gospels as historical material—my first hypothesis about future Jesus research.

2.8. Criteria of Authenticity and Historical Trust

A general indication that I am right in that hypothesis is that scholars already work and probably will work even more with the plausibility criterion when investigating the historicity of the Jesus tradition.

The double dissimilarity criterion typical of the Second Quest was underneath its “scientific” appearance anti-Jewish and anti-Christian dogmatics masquerading as historical method. These scholars did not deny that the gospels had painted a too Christian picture of the originally quite unmessianic Jesus—that was a taken-for-granted inheritance from the First Quest. But they wanted to liberate Jesus even more from his Jewishness, and thus isolated him from his historical context.<sup>29</sup> This double screening process caused a large-scale reduction of the usable source material for knowing about the historical Jesus to fragments of the gospel material, sifted out like gold grains from tons of too Jewish and too Christian sand.<sup>30</sup>

---

<sup>28</sup> See e.g. Marcus Bockmuehl’s review of Dunn’s Jesus Remembered (2003), JTS 56 (2005): 140–149, and especially Samuel Byrskog’s important work Story as History—History as Story: The Gospel Tradition in the Context of Ancient Oral History, WUNT 123 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000), and his discussion with Dunn in “A New Perspective on the Jesus Tradition: Reflections on James D. G. Dunn’s Jesus Remembered,” JSNT 26 (2004): 459–471 (followed by Dunn’s reply). Cf. also Richard Bauckham, “The Eyewitnesses and the Gospel Tradition,” JSHJ 1 (2003): 28–60.

<sup>29</sup> This is not only an error in historical methodology, but actually also in Christian theology (which, one should remember, was the main reason for starting the Second Quest), moving as it does toward a denial or spiritualizing of the incarnation.

<sup>30</sup> To give just one recent but typical example of the effects of making the criterion of dissimilarity the final arbiter of authenticity one can point to Philip F. Esler’s

But stating the dissimilarity criterion as a postulate, i.e. that Jesus self-evidently must have been completely unlike both his contemporary Judaism and the Christian movement that he was the cause of, reveals how improbable and weird it really is. Today there is virtual unanimity in Jesus research that he was and wanted to be a Jew, and that he wanted to be heard by and influence his own people, the Jews.

One should, however, keep in mind two things here: first that Jewish society, culture and religion in the days of Jesus was a multiform, variegated entity with many internal conflicts. This very fact of dissension and intra-Jewish conflict makes the assertion that Jesus was thoroughly Jewish less telling than is often imagined.<sup>31</sup> Being Jewish in the first century is not a unitary, clear categorization, and it does not preclude severe disagreement with and hostility from other Jews. And as Jesus was eventually delivered up to be executed by the Romans, he must have been transgressing the constraints of at least the society's rulers in an intolerable fashion. The constraints of the Jewish society he lived in cannot, consequently, be construed as a limit to what he could possibly think, say and do.

Further, it is a necessary part of any historical work on Jesus to elucidate the connections between the life of this person and the early Christian movement that grew out of it. The obvious and undoubted treatment of the parable of the good Samaritan: "Jesus and the Reduction of Inter group Conflict," in The Social Setting of Jesus and the Gospels, ed. Stegemann, Malina and Theissen 185–205, the main argument of which is very well worth reading. Esler concludes by discussing the authenticity of this parable that brilliantly subverts group differentiation and stereotyping. He admits that he would like the parable to be authentic (199), but finds that it shows too many likenesses with Lukan emphases to be allowed the degree of dissimilarity in all directions that is necessary for concluding that its origin is Jesus. It does not help that Jesus could very plausibly have said this, to judge from "his undoubtedly historical practice of breaking down other forms of social categorization, by, for example, dining with sinners and tax collectors" (Esler, 200). The dissimilarity criterion takes over historical probability and forces the conclusion that if the answer to "Could Luke have made this parable?" is Yes, the answer to "Could Jesus have made this parable?" is of necessity No. Jesus cannot have said anything that others could say, and nobody could say what he had said. This may be good logic (granted the weird presuppositions), but good historical reasoning it is not.

---

<sup>31</sup> Tom Holmén, "The Jewishness of Jesus in the 'Third Quest'," in Jesus, Mark and Q: The teaching of Jesus and its Earliest Records, ed. Labahn and Schmidt, 143–162. Halvor Moxnes, "Jesus the Jew: Dilemmas of Interpretation," in Fair Play: Diversity and Conflicts in Early Christianity. Essays in Honour of Heikki Räisänen, ed. I. Dunderberg, C. Tuckett, and K. Syreeni (Leiden: Brill, 2002), 83–103.

personal and social continuity of this movement and its first leaders with Jesus makes the historical relation between him and the early church more compact and rich in content than the form critics imagined when guided by the analogy of the development of folklore across centuries. The faith and life of the early church is actually an explanatory factor for understanding parts of Jesus' life, simply because it provides the effect ("Wirkung") of the effectual plausibility ("Wirkungsplausibilität") of Jesus' words and actions. Facts like the unusual attitude of the early Christ-believers towards divorce, children, purity rules, violence and warfare help us see the profile of Jesus.

The growing realization of these two historical facts, the rich relation between Jesus and contemporary Judaism and between him and the emerging Christ-believing movement, has had the effect of bringing to the fore a completely different criterion for authenticity—the (double) criterion of plausibility. This says that only those parts of the Jesus tradition which can be plausibly located in first-century Judaism (contextual plausibility) and which can plausibly explain the effect ("Wirkung") of Jesus on early Christianity have a good claim to be historical.<sup>32</sup> Another, slightly earlier formulation of this criterion of Jesus' closeness to both Judaism around him and the "Jesus movement" after him—and of his difference from both—is the following: "When something can be seen to be credible (though perhaps deeply subversive within first-century Judaism), and credible as the implied starting point (though not the exact replica) of something in later Christianity, there is a strong possibility of our being in touch with the genuine history of Jesus."<sup>33</sup>

The weakness of some research in regard to admitting this kind of connection between Jesus and the early Christians can be described as a willingness to discard only one half of the dissimilarity criterion.

---

<sup>32</sup> See esp. Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter, Die Kriterienfrage in der Jesusforschung: Vom Differenzkriterium zum Plausibilitätskriterium (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997), English translation by Eugene Boring: The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Essential Problem of the Criterion of Dissimilarity (Philadelphia: Westminster and John Knox Press, 2002). Armand Puig y Tàrrach gives a succinct summary of recent developments in thinking about criteria in "La recherche du Jésus historique," Bib 81 (2000): 179–201, esp. 185–194. For a thoughtful and sharp methodological discussion of the criterion of plausibility, see Tom Holmén's review essay of Theissen and Winter 1997/2002: "The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: the Question of Criteria," JTS 55 (2004): 216–228.

<sup>33</sup> Tom Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996), 132.

While claiming with good reason that Jesus cannot be cut off from his contemporary Jewish religious and cultural reality, Geza Vermes happily adopts the form-critical perspective of Bultmann and Käsemann when denying any genuine continuity or relation between Jesus and the Christ-believing Jewish ekklesia of the first century. But, as the Jewish scholar Joseph Klausner put it, a real historian must be able to explain both how Jesus could be so Jewish and how he could be the origin of a movement that so soon broke off from Judaism.<sup>34</sup>

To summarize this long argument in a very short form, one could say that the basic presupposition that anything historical and human is bound by a thousand fine threads to its weave of surrounding reality is now being applied to Jesus. The investigation of the manifold connections between Jesus and his historical context in all directions has verified that the Jesus described in the gospels belongs squarely in the first third of first-century Jewish Galilee. The corollary of this growing trust in the researchability of Jesus and in the value of the Jesus tradition in the gospels as historical material is the increasing use of the double criterion of plausibility.

3. "Prophecy" 2: Jesus Research Will Use a "Holistic" Method

3.1. Research on Jesus Starts from the Total Picture, or Master Narrative, of Jesus, not the Details

In recent discussion of methodology in Jesus research it is something of a commonplace to state the need of using a "holistic" method, instead of starting with the details. This is a reversal of the methodological paradigm of the Second Quest, where one typically started with the individual sayings of and narratives about Jesus, deciding in every case whether this was authentic material from Jesus or not, before attempting to build a larger picture of Jesus from the few pieces of critically secured historical information. The method of the Jesus Seminar scholars voting on each saying is a model example of this approach.

The reason for beginning at the other end, with a plausible picture of the whole of Jesus, is simply that this is how historiography works. It starts grappling with the assembled historical data with the help of an initial hypothesis, research programme (Allison), or Gestalt (Meyer), which most often has a narrative character. Data must be at least preliminarily, even experimentally, interpreted in order to be manageable for history. This Gestalt or master narrative governs the making of hypotheses, which are then tested and verified. This type of procedure has been used and discussed by many scholars, like Ben F. Meyer (leaning on the work of Collingwood and Lonergan),<sup>35</sup> N. Tom Wright,<sup>36</sup> Dale C. Allison,<sup>37</sup> and James D. G. Dunn.<sup>38</sup>

---

<sup>34</sup> Noted by Ed P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985), 3.

Applying this approach to Jesus research means that one has to decide from the outset which basic interpretive framework one intends to use in one's reconstruction of Jesus—was he an eschatological prophet, a Cynic peasant, or more of an existentialist vagabond teacher? The fact that the First Quest managed to overlook or at least to leave out the large amount of eschatological material in the teaching of Jesus when writing his life is simply a reflection of the effect of this fundamental methodological procedure. Their Gestalt or governing image of Jesus was one of a timeless, universalistic teacher of ethics, completely incompatible with bizarre apocalyptic thinking and acting—and with being a popular healer-cum-exorcist.<sup>39</sup>

For good and for worse this kind of master image of the subject or person investigated is rather resistant to inclusion of data alien to it. Material in the assembly of data that does not fit with one's preconceived over-all image or Gestalt of Jesus must be left out, or included

---

<sup>35</sup> For a good discussion of this procedure used already in his ground-breaking work The Aims of Jesus, esp. 76–94, see Ben F. Meyer, “The ‘Inside’ of the Jesus Event,” in his Critical Realism and the New Testament (Allison Park: Pickwick Publications, 1989), 157–172, and “Jesus and His Mission: Finding the Gestalt,” in his Christus Faber: The Master Builder and the House of God (Allison Park: Pickwick Publications, 1992), 107–129.

<sup>36</sup> Tom Wright, The New Testament and the People of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991), 81–120, and Jesus and the Victory of God, part I.

<sup>37</sup> Allison, Jesus of Nazareth, 36–44.

<sup>38</sup> Generally used in James Dunn, Jesus Remembered, more specifically described in Idem, A New Perspective, 69–78, where he calls this the “search for the characteristic instead of the distinctive Jesus.”

<sup>39</sup> This has to be judged a major error of the First Quest. The impossibility of eradicating eschatology from authentic Jesus tradition has been strongly argued since Weiss and Schweitzer, e.g. by Ben F. Meyer, Dale C. Allison, and Marius Reiser's vigorous chapter “Eschatology in the Proclamation of Jesus”, in Jesus, Mark and Q: The Teaching of Jesus and its Earliest Records, ed. Labahn and Schmidt, 216–238.

and allowed to restructure the Gestalt completely.<sup>40</sup> The bad side of this is scholarly intransigence, sheer unwillingness to listen to uncomfortable data or other scholars. The good side of having a Gestalt to work from is the awareness that data really have to be assembled into a coherent whole if one is to attain a level of historical understanding. The most important function of master narratives or controlling images is precisely their role in hypothesis verification: a good hypothesis should account for all the data, in the most economic way possible. Operating with a controlling Gestalt necessitates an attempt to answer all the pertinent questions that a conscientious historian should put to the Jesus event.<sup>41</sup>

In any case, there is no such thing as dispensing with a governing narrative altogether, simply because historical reconstruction consists in narrativising the result of scrutinizing the data and testing one's hypotheses. Even if not immediately apparent or articulated, any verdict on the authenticity of this or that Jesus logion or narrative operates with some benchmark idea of what he was like.

Halvor Moxnes discusses a number of recent master narratives in historical work on Jesus, both within the modernist perspective (John P. Meier and Ed P. Sanders) and outside it (Richard Horsley, John Dominic Crossan, and Bruce Malina). He notes that "a paradigm of interpretation can never be based on 'mere facts'; it always implies a hermeneutical decision and a choice of presuppositions."<sup>42</sup> An overarching interpretive construct is necessary to make sense of history, but it is evident that none of the several alternatives has a monopoly <sup>40</sup> An illustration of this from another area is the inability of the disciples to take in what Jesus said about his coming suffering and death. As it could in no way be fitted into their gestalt or controlling image of Jesus, it was immediately discarded as totally absurd and meaningless (Luke 9:44–45). The restructuring took place only after the Master's death and resurrection.

---

<sup>41</sup> Cf. the five questions that Wright points to as necessary for any historian of Jesus to answer, Jesus and the Victory of God, 90.

<sup>42</sup> Halvor Moxnes, "The Historical Jesus: From Master Narrative to Cultural Context," BTB 28 (1998): 135–49, at 142. James Dunn has criticized the grand narrative approaches of Crossan and Wright (in "'All that glitters is not gold': In Quest of the Right Key to unlock the way to the historical Jesus," in Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. Jens Schröter and Ralph Brucker, BZNTW 114 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002), 131–161 (criticizing grand narratives, 140–147). In my opinion, the rightness of his criticism concerns more the insufficient data support for the specific models proposed by Crossan and Wright than the method itself of using a master narrative as a frame of interpretation. See Bengt Holmberg, "Questions of Method in James Dunn's Jesus Remembered," JSNT 26 (2004): 445–457, esp. 453–57.

of interpretation, which is why their proponents can and should engage each other in dialogue.

3.2. Investigating the Aims of Jesus is more Fruitful than Attempting his Psychobiography

Psychobiography, the interpretation of an historical person with the help of modern personality psychology, is an old genre from the nineteenth century brought to new life in recent years. As could be expected, the more recent books in this genre have a foundation in Freudian developmental psychology and psychoanalytical theory.<sup>43</sup> They are also marked by historical sophistication and a capable reading up of modern Jesus research. Still, they end up in almost diametrically opposed interpretations of the psychobiography of Jesus.

For Donald Capps the behaviour and the teaching of Jesus as critically retrieved from the gospels is evidence that Jesus was not accepted as the son of Joseph, who therefore did not teach him a trade, did not instruct him in the Torah, did not arrange for him to be married, or do him much good in any way. No wonder then that the adult Jesus had a severely wounded personality, and was driven by utopian melancholy and deep needs of reparation and self-assertion all the way to the cross.

John W. Miller interprets the very same gospel material as evidence that Jesus had a harmonious childhood and upbringing, with an excellent relation to his biological father, Joseph (the virgin birth is discarded as legend). The trauma caused by Joseph's premature death was mastered in a mature way by Jesus, who took on the difficult but necessary role of male leadership or (in Erik H. Erikson's term) "generativity" in his family, and came out of this difficult period stronger and more capable of caring for others than before. Miller can write about Jesus' joyful creativity and courage (after John's arrest) in his own new-found "calling" as "generative" prophet-evangelist of God's love for the "lost" (a father now himself with a "family" of his own...); his extraordinary faith and intuitively wise "father-like" talent for relating helpfully to all types of people and situations.<sup>44</sup>

---

<sup>43</sup> Among these books one can note: John W. Miller, Jesus at Thirty: A Psychological and Historical Portrait (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1997). Donald Capps, Jesus: A Psychological Biography (St. Louis, Missouri: Chalice Press, 2000). Capps has summarized his own book: "A Summary of Jesus," Pastoral Psychology 50 (2002): 391–400; Andries van Aarde, Fatherless in Galilee: Jesus as a Child of God (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2001), summarised by the author: "Jesus as a Fatherless Child," in The Social Setting of Jesus and the Gospels, ed. Stegemann, Malina, and Theissen, 65–84. These and other scholars write on the same subject in J. Harold Ellens and Wayne G. Rollins, eds., Psychology and the Bible: A New Way to Read the Scriptures, 4: From Christ to Jesus (Westport: Praeger, 2004). Regrettably, this work came too close to the finishing of this study for me to interact with the many valuable articles in it.

Both Capps and Miller relate to the large amount of material about fathers, the Father, and father-like attitudes and sayings of Jesus in the gospels, but the method of psychoanalytical retrodiction is unable by itself to answer the question: Is this material a reflection of Jesus' positive experiences with a good father (Miller), or is it a reflection of his intense longing for a good father he never had (Capps)? The conclusion seems hard to avoid that psychobiography is a poor instrument even for historical retrodiction (explaining afterwards why something had to happen in a specific way in a certain person's life), with no controls against the arbitrary wielding of this "method."<sup>45</sup>

The weakness of the psychobiographical approach to Jesus is, however, not primarily that we have too little material or data to perform it, although that is also a problem. We have reams of historical data on the life of Winston Churchill, but would hardly be persuaded by any thorough-going attempt at explaining all his major speeches and acts as a political leader between 1940 and 1945 as caused by how his relation to his parents had worked out in early childhood or how his emotionality had developed during his adolescence. That is simply an insufficient, to some degree even irrelevant, category or genre of explanation, and it will not become truer as an historical explanation by adding, say, eight newly found letters from his school years.<sup>46</sup>

---

<sup>44</sup> Miller, Jesus at Thirty, 99. The English psychiatrist Jack Dominian's picture of Jesus and what his childhood and youth must have been like in his book One Like Us: Psychological Interpretation of Jesus (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1998) is much the same as Miller's, as is John P. Meier's in A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, I (Garden City: Doubleday, 1991).

<sup>45</sup> The many methodological weaknesses inherent in psychobiography—the lack of evidence especially about the childhood of ancient people, the reductionism of over-emphasizing psychological and psychopathological factors at the expense of social and cultural factors, the multivariant correspondence between a certain type of childhood and a certain psychological behaviour or character in the adult life of that person, the anachronism of supposing that all eras and cultures are the same when it comes to personal psychology—were pointed out in William McKinley Runyan, Life Histories and Psychobiography: Explorations in Theory and Method (New York: Oxford University Press, 1982).

Historical actors who make a large impact on the surrounding world are more reasonably explained by finding out about their mindset and intentions in relation to their historical context, what they aimed at in relation to their own society, and how their visions resonated with many other people and made them change and move. As Tom Wright has stated:

There is nothing in principle magical or mystical, nothing in principle inaccessible, about the settled intentions, aims, or ambitions of an individual. Even if little is said about them, they will gradually become apparent in actions performed, in choices made, in lifestyles adopted. In searching for the aims of Jesus, we are looking for a particular mindset within a particular worldview, quite possibly challenging that worldview in some ways, but with intentions that make sense in relation to it.<sup>47</sup>

This is, as Wright points out, actually what historians do all the time, standard historiographical procedure. Reimarus was right in focusing his study of the historical Jesus on his aims (“Zwecke”). Historical data remain mute, as long as we do not get hold of their “inside,” the human thought or intention that made the “outside” event into an action and gave it meaning and direction.

3.3. The Key to Jesus’ Aims is his Self-Understanding, Centring on how he Saw his Own Death

So the fundamental question in historical research on Jesus is whether in the words and actions we can reconstruct as his there existed a fundamental unity, a common purpose and goal that held together everything that Jesus did and said to a comprehensible whole. Did he want to become “the king of the Judaeans”? or the Prophet? or the saviour of Israel? Inevitably, this means that Jesus’ own thinking, his theology as it were, must play a key role in understanding his priorities, choices, and goals. And theology in a broad sense means how he thought on God, his election of Israel, his presence and will and coming Rule, and what Jesus' own role was in all this (his "christology").

---

<sup>46</sup> In his thoughtful and severe “Review of [Donald Capps’] Jesus,” Pastoral Psychology 50 (2002): 415–423, Paul N. Anderson summarizes: “Capps views these and other parts of Jesus’ ministry through the lens of projecting the neediness of Jesus upon his actions and teachings rather than seeing Jesus as addressing social, political, and religious issues in the name of God’s redemptive love” (422).

<sup>47</sup> Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, 101.

I thus contend that it is an eminently historical task to engage the theology of Jesus, as it manifests itself both in his actions and way of life and in his teaching. This is how history is done, e.g. by Ben F. Meyer and Tom Wright: working from top down, from the larger or total picture (Gestalt) to the details, from the unifying and meaning-giving aims of a person to a historical understanding of him as an actor in history. Jesus' self-understanding peaks in how he viewed his own death, because this clearly foreseen end summarizes and crowns his ministry, even to Jesus himself.

How Jesus saw his death has, in spite of its obvious importance, been rather neglected in (especially American) Jesus research except among German scholars, as Scot McKnight has shown in a masterful overview.<sup>48</sup> And Peter Balla notes that Third Quest scholars such as John Dominic Crossan, the members of the Jesus Seminar, Ed P. Sanders and R. A. Horsley do not even mention and discuss this subject.<sup>49</sup> In his ground-breaking and influential Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985), Ed Sanders focused instead on the temple action of Jesus as the key to interpreting what Jesus aimed at, while downplaying the importance of events like the triumphal entry and the crucifixion for understanding what Jesus intended with his ministry.

Not a few scholars agree, however, that Jesus not only knew his inevitable death in advance (he would have had to be reality-blind not to),<sup>50</sup> but that he willingly accepted it as meaningful and willed by God the Father.<sup>51</sup> In Albert Schweitzer's words, Jesus went up to Jerusalem in order to die. The next question must then be: What did Jesus think was God's meaning with such an ignominious end to all his strivings? In my opinion those scholars have the better argument who conclude—especially from the Last Supper—that Jesus saw his death as some kind

---

<sup>48</sup> Scot McKnight, "Jesus and His Death: Some Recent Scholarship," CR: BS 9 (2001): 185–228.

<sup>49</sup> Peter Balla, "What Did Jesus Think about his Approaching Death?" in Jesus, Mark and Q: The Teaching of Jesus and its Earliest Records, ed. Labahn and Schmidt, 239–258, at 240–242.

<sup>50</sup> Ulrich Luz, "Warum zog Jesus nach Jerusalem?" in Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. Labahn and Schmidt BZfNW 114 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002), 409–427, at 414.

<sup>51</sup> See the three preceding footnotes and e.g. the large-scale books on Jesus by Tom Wright (1996), Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz (1996), and James Dunn (2003).

of sacrifice inaugurating the new covenant or even an expiation for the sins of “the many” and Israel.

Whatever answer is given to how Jesus made sense of his death, there is no denying that the answer is important for how one interprets the purpose and meaning that Jesus gave to his life and mission as a whole. And the fact that the question concerning how Jesus understood his freely chosen death receives much fuller treatment in recent books on Jesus (Wright, Theissen–Merz, Dunn) perhaps signals a growing realization that Jesus’ life cannot be fully understood without his death. One is reminded of John P. Meier’s insistence that the execution of Jesus is an important control of authenticity: the picture of Jesus reached by historical reconstruction must be such that his execution on the cross is a logical and reasonable consequence of what he said and did.<sup>52</sup> A Jesus whose words and actions do not irk, provoke and infuriate people, especially the mighty, is not the historical Jesus. But this why-did-Jesus-die authenticity control reaches in the other direction as well; it demands convincing answers both to the question why people wanted Jesus killed and to the question why he accepted that. A Jesus who is simply taken by surprise by his arrest and swift death (Vermes, Fredriksen), or who sees it a mile ahead yet feebly accepts the approaching catastrophe without one communicated thought about God’s intention in all this, is not a historically believable Jesus either.<sup>53</sup>

3.4. Theology must be Included when Looking for the Key to Jesus’ Actions

I think the Second Quest scholars were right in seeing the self-understanding of Jesus as the most important question for Jesus research, the key to an historical understanding of him. This is an insight that some scholars within the Third Quest tend to pass lightly over, or silently disagree with. Especially Ed P. Sanders writes as if the question of who Jesus claimed to be is somehow a “theological” and therefore illegitimate question for a historian. He considers himself (like Albert

---

<sup>52</sup> Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus I, 177.

<sup>53</sup> See the penetrating discussion in Leander E. Keck, Who Is Jesus? History in Perfect Tense (Fortess: Minneapolis, 2001), ch. 4: “The Fractured Prism: Jesus’ Death and the Living God,” 113–150.

Schweitzer) as a person who keeps his historical results apart from and uninfluenced by his own theological preferences:

I am a liberal, modern, secularized Protestant, brought up in a church dominated by low christology and the social gospel. I am proud of the things that that religious tradition stands for. I am not bold enough, however, to suppose that Jesus came to establish it, or that he died for the sake of its principles.<sup>54</sup>

This sounds liberal-minded and humble, but only until one realizes that these three “I am”-sayings contain a hidden instruction to other, more orthodox scholars: you too should keep christology out of your image of the historical Jesus! If you arrive at results close to classical christological thinking about Jesus (e.g. he had “messianic” ideas about himself, or saw his approaching death as a covenant-renewing sacrifice), you are necessarily unhistorical and unscholarly, because theology and history are diametrically opposed to each other. Which is of course not a neutral statement but a liberal Protestant theological standpoint.<sup>55</sup>

One could even argue that Sanders and others actually have left “the Quest of the Historical Jesus,” when they for the sake of alleged historical neutrality do not even attempt to grasp the self-understanding of Jesus as an historical factor.<sup>56</sup> If Jesus’ actions and priorities were determined by how he understood himself, and this was determined by his specific ideas about God and his Rule and his own place in it, or in other words, by his theology, how could any ambitious historical investigation of Jesus not try to analyze and grasp a factor of such central importance?

---

<sup>54</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 334.

<sup>55</sup> Alan G. Padgett criticizes among others Sanders for what he terms “the neutrality two-step.” This is a scholarly attitude “in which the prejudice of perspective is recognized, but then we try and step around it back into scientific neutrality. For the ‘neutrality two-step’ version of the myth [of a purely historical Jesus], the problem of perspective is a problem only for faith—not for the scientific, rational scholar who of course has no faith.” See Padgett, “Advice for Religious Historians: On the Myth of a Purely Historical Jesus,” in The Resurrection: An Interdisciplinary Symposium on the Resurrection of Jesus, ed. Stephen T. Davis, David Kendall, and Gerald O’Collins (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997), 287–307, esp. 292–93. It has also been pointed out that the Third Quest is not so theologically uninterested as some of its representatives claim; Tom Holmén, “A Theologically Disinterested Quest? On the Origins of the ‘Third Quest’ for the Historical Jesus,” ST 55 (2001): 175–197.

<sup>56</sup> This is Stephen Fowl’s criticism of Sanders, “Reconstructing and Deconstructing the Quest of the Historical Jesus,” SJT 42 (1989): 319–333.

The same modernistic bias is at work in Crossan's often-quoted dictum about his suspicion "...that historical Jesus research is a very safe place to do theology and call it history, to do autobiography and call it biography."<sup>57</sup> Here too a total incompatibility between theology and history is taken for granted—as if they could not appear in the same reality, or even in the same text.<sup>58</sup>

The well-worn idea that history and theology relate to each other as fire and water, truth and error, forever different and in irreconcilable conflict, is a philosophical heritage from the European Enlightenment. It has made generations of scholars take for granted that the truth about the historical Jesus cannot have contained any theology or christology, and that any historical conclusion even reminiscent of Christian faith in Jesus must be put aside from the outset of any investigation with historical pretensions—and never let in again! To which it must be said that if some results are forbidden from the outset of historiography on Jesus, one is not operating with a scientific attitude. This anti-theological (or rather: anti-faith) stand is rather a mirror image of the dogmatism that scholars wanted to keep out of liberated historical research on Jesus.<sup>59</sup>

But real history does not by some alleged necessity exclude theology or the supernatural, neither from the historical Jesus, nor from the historian writing on Jesus.<sup>60</sup> Jesus himself was through-and-through a

---

<sup>57</sup> John Dominic Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1991), xxvii.

<sup>58</sup> One might also add that Crossan's beautifully thrown stone shatters a lot of glass in his own work on Jesus. His detailed methodology with its very scientific-looking procedure, including an inventory of all gospel material divided into eccentric categories is a good example of doing a highly idiosyncratic theological interpretation of Jesus and calling it history. See especially the sympathetic but cutting criticism of Crossan's methodology by Allison, Jesus of Nazareth, 10–33, and by Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, 44–66.

<sup>59</sup> A variant of this is the insistence on keeping historical elucidation strictly apart from any attempt to find answers to theological questions, advocated e.g. by Troels Engberg-Pedersen in Den historiske Jesus og hans betydning (Copenhagen: Gyldendal, 1998), 37–41. Theological interest is seen as contaminating historical research because it is not bound to the historical material in its possible otherness. Could it be that this methodological purism camouflages a modernist philosophical-theological stand: history drives out theology and vice versa?

<sup>60</sup> Cf. Joel Willitts' vigorous methodological analysis of six prominent Jesus scholars (Sanders, Crossan, Meier, Wright, Theissen, and Allison), "Presuppositions and Procedures in the Study of the 'Historical Jesus': Or, Why I Decided Not to be a 'Historical Jesus' Scholar," JSHJ 3 (2005): 61–108, and his critique of the separation of theology from history, 70–71 and 101–106.

theologian, always orienting his opinions, actions and very life to God and claiming to know God very well. He spoke often of God and for God and saw his death as the destiny determined for him by God. If for no other reason than this, Jesus' theology must be the centre of any historical image of Jesus. And "Jesus' death, isolated neither from the life that preceded it nor from his resurrection that followed it, continues to be the prism through which Christian Gentiles [!] must understand both God and themselves."<sup>61</sup>

The historian's "theology" or total interpretation of reality is part of the inevitable subjectivity of any historical work and therefore to be accepted openly.<sup>62</sup> Part of such a non-positivistic consciousness ought to be a diminished emphasis on sheer, "neutral" fact-finding in historical reconstruction. Historiography on Jesus is of course bound to finding facts, but they always come embedded in interpretive frameworks of a "christological" kind (Marsh)—in the texts and in our reconstructions. Therefore, writing history is not so much finding facts about the past as a process of making sense of it, a complex and multi-dimensional process of mediation between past and future. "The 'sense' is as part of the historical object of inquiry as the 'facts' themselves."<sup>63</sup>

The futures for the Jesus quests will probably merge into one, with more interaction of both critical and appreciative character between the different approaches. A narrow modernism will be left behind as a too thin version of historical work on Jesus, which will instead open itself to a greater hermeneutical and theological awareness of both its subject and its method.

---

<sup>61</sup> Keck, Who is Jesus? 140.

<sup>62</sup> A postmodern New Historicist like Clive Marsh deplors a naïve separation of history and theology and concludes his article "Quests of the Historical Jesus in New Historicist Perspective," BibInt 5 (1997): 403–437 by asking for "the firm location of Jesus Research within a revised christological framework" (430). "My claim is that when interpreting the figure of Jesus, interpreters of whatever philosophical persuasion, socioeconomic context or religious outlook are inevitably embroiled in a debate which cannot but be called christological"—not because it takes a stand for or against Christian orthodoxy, but "because the task of interpreting the figure of Jesus by definition requires the disclosure, perhaps in a way that the interpretation of few other historical figures does, of commitments as to what one believes 'really is,' how humans behave, what constitutes human community, as well as how one assesses the cultural and ecclesiastical impact of the figure of Jesus" (431).

<sup>63</sup> Bernhard Latagan, "Questing or Sense-Making? Some Thoughts on the Nature of Historiography," BibInt 11 (2003): 588–601, 598. Latagan builds on J. Rüsen, "Was heisst: Sinn der Geschichte?," in Historische Sinnbildung, ed. K. E. Müller and J. Rüsen (Hamburg: Rowohlt, 1997), 17–47.

4. Summary

The prophetic task of writing on the futures of the Jesus Quests is fulfilled by mixing prediction and prescription about where Jesus research will and should move. A general sobering concerning historical presuppositions, the (oral) character of our main sources and the method of doing history will lead to a greater trust in the general reliability of the source material we have. Hyperscepticism combined with a strong belief in the uniqueness of Jesus, manifested in the dissimilarity axiom called "criterion," has paralyzed Jesus research, which will be revived by using the double plausibility criterion belonging to normal historiography.

Research on Jesus starts from the total picture or master narrative of Jesus, not the details. This is illustrated by a comparison of psychobiography with the looking for Jesus' aims. The total picture or "Gestalt" of Jesus should be connected to how he understood his mission and what he was out to do. And the key to Jesus' aims is his self-understanding, his "christology," as it were. The reconstruction of his aims is not complete until one has incorporated how Jesus saw his death, the final and complete summary of his achievement under God. This means that the historiographical task of questing for Jesus by finding the interpretative key to his life and ministry not only includes, but even centres on theology.

THE PARABLE OF THE GOOSE AND THE MIRROR:
THE HISTORICAL JESUS IN THE THEOLOGICAL DISCIPLINE

SCOT MCKNIGHT

In history, as elsewhere, fools rush in, and the angels may perhaps be forgiven if rather than tread in those treacherous paths they tread upon the fools instead.

—G. R. Elton<sup>1</sup>

When academics stand before an audience and explain a view of the “historical Jesus,” and do so in the context of a theological discipline and education, they may think they are walking on water, but the voices of truth are calling out to them to watch their step. Toned down, we might say the voices of truth are simply asking three questions: What is history?, What is a historical Jesus?, and What role is that historical Jesus to play in the theological curriculum?

1. Modern Historiography: A Brief Taxonomy<sup>2</sup>

Historical Jesus scholars appropriate a historiography, though very few of them spell their historiography out.<sup>3</sup> Those historiographies can be conveniently labeled “postmodernist” and “modernist,” with all sorts of shades within each label as well as a spectrum of how those historiographies have been used by historical Jesus scholars. The most complete historiography by a historical Jesus scholar is probably that of N. T. Wright in the first two volumes of his multi-volume series on Christian Origins and the Question of God,<sup>4</sup> though the recent,

---

<sup>1</sup> The Practice of History (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1967), 89.

<sup>2</sup> For a good survey of the history of historiography, see E. Breisach, Historiography: Ancient, Medieval, and Modern, 2nd ed. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994).

<sup>3</sup> An informed study in this regard is the article by Halvor Moxnes, “The Historical Jesus: From Master Narrative to Cultural Context,” BTB 28 (1999): 135–149. He studies the historiography, with reference to “master narratives,” of J. P. Meier, E. P. Sanders, R. A. Horsley, J. D. Crossan, and B. J. Malina.

<sup>4</sup> See The New Testament and the People of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992), 29–144. The historiography of Wright was then worked out in Jesus and the Victory of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996).

lengthy (!) introduction by James D. G. Dunn in his Jesus Remembered offers a nuanced historiography.<sup>5</sup> While other studies are intensely informed at the level of technical method—one thinks of B. F. Meyer, J. P. Meier, J. D. Crossan, and Dale Allison,<sup>6</sup> few are actually proposing a historiography as Wright has done. Why I say this about Wright and Dunn (with reservations, of course), will become clear in our survey of postmodernist and modernist historiography.<sup>7</sup>

1.1. Postmodernist Historiography

Whatever postmodernism has going for it or against it, it has the confidence that when it comes to the matter of historiography it alone has the goose by the neck. Take, for example, Keith Jenkins, the UK's most confident postmodernist historiographer. Jenkins defines "postmodernism" as the "era of the aporia."<sup>8</sup> That is,

By aporia I mean that this is an era when all the decisions we take—political, ethical, moral, interpretive, representational, etc., are ulti-

---

<sup>5</sup> Jesus Remembered, Christianity in the Making 1 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003), 11–336.

<sup>6</sup> B. F. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus (London: SCM, 1979), 76–110; Critical Realism and the New Testament (Allison Park, PA: Pickwick, 1989); Reality and Illusion in New Testament Scholarship: A Primer in Critical Realist Hermeneutics (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical [Michael Glazier], 1994); J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 3 vols., ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1987–2001), esp. 1:1–201; J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (New York: HarperCollins, 1991); on Crossan's method, one must see the heavy evaluation of D. C. Allison, Jr., Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998), 10–33, as well as his own constructive proposal.

<sup>7</sup> One might say that there are three strands of historiography among historical Jesus scholars: (1) those of a modernist bent include scholars as diverse as N. Perrin, J. P. Meier, E. P. Sanders, B. D. Chilton, and M. Borg, even though their theologies differ wildly; (2) those of a postmodernist bent include E. Schüssler Fiorenza and James D. G. Dunn; and (3) those of a mediating line include N. T. Wright. The critical separation occurs over the relation of Subject (historian) and Object (Jesus/gospels/ancient evidence). The closer one gets to the Subject dominating the discourse, whether that historian is the historical Jesus scholar or the gospels themselves, the closer one gets to the postmodernist enterprise. The closer one gets to seeing the Object as capable of speaking for itself, simply by uncovering the "earliest original material," as is clearly the case with J.P. Meier, the closer one is to the modernist enterprise.

<sup>8</sup> A potent critique of Keith Jenkins, and other postmodernists, can be found in Richard J. Evans, In Defence of History, rev. ed. (London: Granta, 2000). There is no embracing definition of postmodernism, and what I mean by "postmodernist historiography" essentially can be narrowed down to Jenkins himself. There is not space here to develop the spectrum of postmodernist historiographies. On this, see Richard J. Evans, The Postmodern History Reader (London: Routledge, 1997).

mately undecidable (aporetic). That our chosen ways of seeing things lack foundations and that, as far as a discourse like history is concerned, it is essentially to be thought of as an aesthetic—a shaping, figuring discourse—and not as an objective, true, or foundational epistemology.<sup>9</sup>

And:

... there are not—and nor have there ever been—any “real” foundations of the kind alleged to underpin the experiment of the modern; that we now just have to understand that we live amidst social formations which have no legitimising ontological or epistemological or ethical grounds for our beliefs or actions beyond the status of an ultimately self-referencing (rhetorical) conversation.<sup>10</sup>

Jenkins, who at times fawns over (the earlier) Hayden White,<sup>11</sup> America’s leading postmodernist historiographer,<sup>12</sup> essentially claims that all history writing is a narrative created in the head of the historian out of discrete facts from the past.<sup>13</sup> Scholars often speak of the “linguistic turn” in historiography, a linguistic turn developed by postmodernists shaped by the “logocentrism” of Jacques Derrida. Everything about history, it is claimed by these sorts, is emplotted in a narrative—and it is the narrative that matters in that it shapes the content. The narrative

<sup>9</sup> Keith Jenkins, Refiguring History: New Thoughts on an Old Discipline (London: Routledge, 2003), 71 (Introduction, n. 1).

<sup>10</sup> Keith Jenkins, On “What is History?”: From Carr and Elton to Rorty and White (London: Routledge, 1995), 7.

<sup>11</sup> Jenkins also utilizes Richard Rorty at a deep level. See his On “What is History?” 97–133. While I’m hardly conversant with Rorty, I am aware that Jenkins relies on the “linguistic turn” of Rorty, but fails in his most recent book (Refiguring History) substantially to engage Rorty’s later “pragmatist turn” and, even more recently, his “romantic polytheism turn,” both of which put strain on Rorty’s earlier linguistic turn. See R. Rorty, Achieving Our Country: Leftist Thought in Twentieth-Century America (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1997). A summary can be found in J. Boffetti, “How Richard Rorty Found Religion,” First Things 143 (2004): 24–30. See also “Religion in the Public Square,” JRE 31 (2003): 141–149. According to the English philosopher, Bernard Williams, Rorty’s philosophical pragmatism was running on empty: see Truth and Truthfulness: An Essay in Genealogy (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2002), 59.

<sup>12</sup> See Hayden White, Metahistory: The Historical Imagination in Nineteenth-Century Europe (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1973); Tropics of Discourse: Essays in Cultural Criticism (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1978); The Content of the Form: Narrative Discourse and Historical Representation (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1987); and, with some clear modification, Figural Realism: Studies in the Mimesis Effect (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1999).

<sup>13</sup> Keith Jenkins, Rethinking History (London: Routledge, 1991/2003); Why History? (London: Routledge, 1999).

one historian tells differs from the narrative another historian tells because they are telling a different story. Therefore, history is all rhetoric, all discourse, all language, and in effect all autobiography.<sup>14</sup> History is, after all, nothing but historiography, the history of histories and the history of historians. The impact of this theory is at times quixotic. History, the postmodernist stays, is the study of ancient texts, not the ancient past; it is, in other terms, phenomenalism.

A leading historiography all dressed up in the attire of a previous generation, Sir Geoffrey Elton, calls the postmodernist approach to history the “ultimate heresy” and “frivolous nihilism.”<sup>15</sup> A modernist historiographer<sup>16</sup> like Elton, Jenkins says, thought he was getting at the “facts” and “finding the truth,” but in effect that sort of history can be turned on its head, as deconstructionists gleefully do, to see little but the historian’s own narrative tale. As Richard Evans sums it up:<sup>17</sup>

The implication is that the historian does not in fact capture the past in faithful fashion but rather, like the novelist, only gives the appearance of doing so.

Jenkins throws down the gauntlet more than once: when speaking of (upper case) History, he says, “I mean, nobody really believes in that particular fantasy any more” and when he speaks of (lower case) history, he says that view “is now unsustainable.”<sup>18</sup> Except that there are some who believe the former, including many historical Jesus scholars—who have the bravado, like Marcus Borg, to think that what they find in the past about Jesus has historic significance for understanding both history and life.<sup>19</sup> In fact, nearly every historical Jesus

<sup>14</sup> For another recent study along this line, see F. R. Ankersmit, Historical Representation, Cultural Memory in the Present (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 2002).

<sup>15</sup> G. P. Elton, Return to Essentials: Some Reflections on the Present State of Historical Study, Cook Lectures 1990 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991), 43, 49.

<sup>16</sup> Jenkins defines modernism as follows: “It is a general failure... of the attempt, from around the eighteenth century in Europe, to bring about through the application of reason, science and technology, a level of personal and social wellbeing within social formations which, legislating for an increasingly generous emancipation of their citizens/subjects, we might characterise by saying that they were trying, at best, to become ‘human rights communities’” (On “What is History?”, 6).

<sup>17</sup> In Defence of History, 98.

<sup>18</sup> On “What is History?”, 8, 9.

<sup>19</sup> See the trajectory in Marcus Borg’s writings from his Jesus, A New Vision: Spirit, Culture, and the Life of Discipleship (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987) to his most recent The Heart of Christianity: Rediscovering a Life of Faith (San Francisco: Harper-SanFrancisco, 2003).

Martin Kähler laid down the maxim that Christian faith could not be based on the results of historians; history itself mocks his claim. Nearly every historical Jesus scholar scholar operates at least with a lower case history. (Roughly speaking, “History” pertains to macroscopic visions of history—like the Bible, like Augustine, Hegel, and Marx [an odd box of chocolates, to be sure], while “history” pertains to the microscopic attempts to shed light on smaller corners of real people in the real past.)

For postmodernist historiographers like Jenkins, there is indeed a “past,” a “present,” and a “future.” That past can be characterized as containing “facts,” i.e. “existential facts” or better yet, “discrete facts.” And, in contrast to what some historical Jesus scholars now claim, the historian can at times determine those facts or find them in spite of their present location within narratives (like the gospels). However, those “facts” are “discrete,” according to the postmodernist, in that they are unrelated, uninterpreted, and meaningless in and of themselves.<sup>20</sup>

Which means that whenever such a proliferation and dispersal is disciplined into some specific unity, into some specific sort of significance... then that unity is not, and cannot be, one which has arisen from the dispersed facts themselves; is not one which has arisen from the sources, but is a unity which is and can only be logically derived from outside these things—from theory; only theory can give history any unity of significance... theory ultimately reasserts itself as the inescapable determinant of meaning.

Historians can make “statements” about those dispersed (or discrete) facts, and they can also connect them chronologically to form a “chronicle,” but that is not what “history” really is. History is the spinning of a narrative out of discrete facts in order to ascertain meaning. But,

---

I know believes in the portrait of Jesus he or she has painted on the canvas of historiography. Nor, so I think, can Kähler sustain the claim that “historical” knowledge and “theological” or “systematic” knowledge are epistemologically that different. “Faith” is inevitably shaped by what one knows, and what one knows is shaped by one’s historiography and epistemology. On this, see M. Kähler, The So-Called Historical Jesus and the Historic Biblical Christ, trans. C. E. Braaten (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1964). While it is wise to contend that the Church’s faith is not to shift every time a new historical Jesus study is offered, it is unwise to think that this is an epistemological issue. Put slightly differently, the church’s faith is rooted in the New Testament and in the historic creeds, not in the shifting results of scholars, but that knowledge of the New Testament and the creeds contains a historiography and a “narrative” in the mind of every individual believer. The reason Luke Timothy Johnson’s The Real Jesus struck a live nerve with (Christian) historical Jesus scholars is because he contended for a creedal faith, even if he mistakenly appealed to a Kähler-like foundation for such a contention. See The Real Jesus: The Misguided Quest for the Historical Jesus and the Truth of the Traditional Gospels (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1996).

<sup>20</sup> On “What is History?,” 82–83.

to discover “facts” is not to discover “meaning.” Meaning is created by the historian, who tells a narrative as a piece of aesthetics. Hayden White, for instance, sees “history” as a form of “literature.”<sup>21</sup>

Thus, Jenkins claims,<sup>22</sup>

we [all of us, so it seems] recognise that there never has been, and there never will be, any such thing as a past which is expressive of some sort of essence, whilst the idea that the proper study of history is actually “own-sakism” is recognised as just the mystifying way in which a bourgeoisie conveniently articulates its own interests as if they belonged to the past itself... Consequently the whole “modernist” History/history ensemble now appears as a self-referential, problematic expression of “interests,” an ideological-interpretive discourse without any “real” access to the past as such; unable to engage in any dialogue with “reality.” In fact, “history” now appears to be just one more “expression” in a world of postmodern expressions: which of course is what it is.

...modernist renditions are now naïve: their historical moment has passed.

Saying true things about the past at the level of the statement is easy—anybody can do that—but saying the right things, getting the picture straight, that is not only another story but an impossible one: you can always get another picture, you can always get another context.

...then precisely insofar as the narrative endows real events with the kind of meaning found otherwise only in myth and literature, we are justified in regarding such a construct as an allegory.

In other words, history as a discourse is not an “epistemology.”

Bingo! There you have it: a postmodernist understanding of what historical Jesus scholars are actually (unbeknownst to them) doing. They are simply asserting their power and ideology through an aesthetic presentation about Jesus. Since postmodernism is the only game in town, it is the game historical Jesus scholars are playing. It would not be unfair, though it would be edgy, to describe postmodernist historiography as semiotic fascism. Words, and only words, rule—totally.

Historical Jesus scholarship becomes, in Jenkins’ categories, bourgeoisie—when it is the proletariat (read: postmodernist historiographers) that now run the game. The studies of Joachim Jeremias, Geza Vermes, Ben Meyer, E. P. Sanders, M. Borg, J. P. Meier, J. D. Crossan, N. T. Wright, B. D. Chilton, and James D. G. Dunn turn out to be nothing but ideologies, nothing but personal expressions of power. They simply emplot the events or existential facts about Jesus in a narrative, and it is the narrative that determines which facts are to be emplotted. Each narrative is a game of power, played by the author and his intended audience. And, what makes one presentation of Jesus “true” and another “not true” or “less than true” is that the “true” one is connected to persons in power while the “not true” or “less than true” ones are not. Truth, then, is little more than the voice of privilege.<sup>23</sup>

<sup>21</sup> See his Metahistory.

<sup>22</sup> On “What is History?”, 9, 10, 21, 24. “Own-sakism” is a shot at Sir G. R. Elton, who will be examined below.

As Jenkins puts it in a way that “goes all the way down” to the bottom of the soul,<sup>24</sup>

Postmodern historians think that human beings can live ironic, reflexive, historicised lives, without the magic, incantations, mythologisations and mystifications spun by certaintist historians from across the board in both upper and lower cases. Postmodern historians see their own histories as being made not for “the past itself” but for themselves and for people whom they like (for when, they ask, was that ever not the case?).

This is a bitter pill to swallow for most of us. But, Jenkins counsels us, sometimes we have to take our medicine and hope to get better—which would mean we would need to stop thinking what we are doing is what we are really doing, and start recognizing that we are nothing but ideologues. This critique of scholarship is not the old standard stuff of historical Jesus scholarship. This is not E. P. Sanders criticizing Joachim Jeremias for having a Lutheran gospel grid through which he forces Jesus; nor is this Marcus Borg arguing that previous scholars have not sufficiently recognized the religious genius of Jesus; nor is this N. T. Wright claiming that previous scholars have not sufficiently recognized the profound grasp Jesus had on Israel’s story.

No, what Jenkins is accusing us of is far more profound, and it closes the books on nearly every historical Jesus study ever done. He is saying that we are not finding the “real” Jesus behind the texts, the rediscovery of whom sheds light both on the “real” Jesus and on a more genuine faith. He is arguing that we are simply fooling ourselves: what we think we are doing is not what we are doing. We are not finding Jesus back there, hidden for all these years by the church and others. What we are “finding” is nothing; we are “imposing” pleasing narratives about our own ideologies in order to assert our own power and we do this by using rhetoric about Jesus. Historical Jesus scholars don't have a goose by the neck, after all; instead, they have a mirror by the top and they are looking at themselves. "History," he is saying, is not the "past." "History" is a "narrative" using discrete facts about the past. This sort of "history" is as much imagined as it is found. The "past" remains there, discoverable in its historiographical representations (like the gospels), but meaningless until it is spun into a narrative. "History" makes discoverable, discrete and existential facts "meaningful."

---

<sup>23</sup> Jenkins, On “What is History?”, 38–39.

<sup>24</sup> Ibid., 38.

Sometimes, of course, we recognize that historical Jesus scholars have such a heavy agenda that any notion of "objectivity" (which Jenkins excoriates) is tossed into the winds, but I've not yet met many who think they ought to abandon "objectivity" and instead simply tell a narrative of their own choosing, gathering bits and bobs of discrete facts and spinning them into a narrative, a meta-narrative of meaning. At least not at the conscious, intentional level.

1.2. (More or Less) Modernist Historiography

Keith Jenkins remonstrates with two historians whose books have shaped the modern discussion of historiography, the works of E. H. Carr<sup>25</sup> and G. R. Elton.<sup>26</sup> If Carr, in his soft Marxist modus operandi, contends that a "fact" becomes history only when it is absorbed into a meaningful history by a historian, Elton represents pure modernism: history is the attempt to find out what happened and why for its own sake. Carr thinks what matters is how we can use the past to predict and shape the future, while Elton thinks what matters is not how something can be used but what it was really like—to use the famous Rankean expression (wie es eigentlich gewesen ist). While both Carr

---

<sup>25</sup> What is History? The George Macaulay Trevelyan Lectures (January-March, 1961) (New York: A. A. Knopf, 1962; 2nd ed., 1987). See also J. Haslam, The Vices of Integrity: E. H. Carr, 1892-1982 (New York: Verso, 1999); M. Cox ed., E. H. Carr: A Critical Appraisal (New York: Palgrave, 2000).

<sup>26</sup> Practice of History; Return to Essentials.

Teachers know that one of the most proven ways to get students to learn is to present polar opposites so that students can hash it out and find their own way. This, I suppose, is why Carr and Elton have proven so popular (though more modern-day historians today are Marxist, and incline toward Carr, than toward Elton). I suspect Jenkins and Evans can replace Carr and Elton as opposites.

and Elton are Rankean to one degree or another, Elton is the post-Rankean Ranke. And Carr and Elton did not get along.<sup>27</sup>

To play with the image we have already used, if Jenkins claims that both Carr and (especially) Elton are not holding the goose by the neck but a mirror instead, Elton has a counter. The modernist will claim that Jenkins, by admitting that his own ideology shapes his “history,” is the one with a mirror in his hands. In addition, the modernist historiographer is ashamed that Jenkins is proud of it. Elton and his ilk will lay claim to the fact that it is they who have the goose by the neck, even if at times they are humble enough to admit their grip is tenuous and at times the goose escapes. But at least, Elton would say, the modernist historian is interested in the goose of (what remains from) the past and not the mirror of a present ideology.

Jenkins thinks Elton’s methodology is as passé as drinking tea from one’s saucer, while Elton thinks Jenkins is cracked—cup and saucer. Jenkins may lay claim that postmodernism is no longer an option for historians but is instead the “fate” and “condition” of all who are at work at all time, but Elton (were he still alive) would simply say . . . perhaps I should use Elton’s own words that get at this with his own savage wit:

No one reads or writes history in a fit of total absentmindedness, though a fair amount of history has been written by people whose minds seem in part to have been on other things.

In other words, Elton would think Jenkins has his mind on other things (and his eyes on a mirror), while Elton thinks he’s got his own hand around the goose’s neck and Jenkins’ neck (the mirror was left at home as he trotted off to the library).

Whether the goose image is useful or not, the majority of historical Jesus scholarship can be categorized as Rankean, post-Rankean, and modernist. That is, it is concerned with finding “facts,” discovering what those “facts” meant at their time and in their original context, and then setting out an interpretation of those facts in a way that best corresponds to the originals. It aims to be scientific—hence preoccupied with method and neutrality and objectivity, and it breathes the air of the hopeful—hence convinced that proper methods, intelligence, and the suppression of one's own views can lead to an ever enlarging knowledge base about the past and its value (should one care about such matters) for the present and future. This is a modernist historiography at work, though I'm not so sure most historical Jesus scholars are as conscious of this as perhaps they ought to be. What modernist historians assume is that language is not simply self-referential but is also (more or less) other-referential.

---

<sup>27</sup> See, e.g., Elton, The Practice of History, 12–22. Carr, who was a Marxist, gets this put-down from Elton: “Marxism . . . [is] a truly remarkable achievement of scientific insight and ill-controlled speculation” (The Practice of History, 37).

It would be unfair, however, to historical Jesus scholarship to suggest that historical Jesus scholars are simply working out the historiography of either Carr or Elton. In fact, the historiography of historical Jesus scholars is eclectic and (often) unconscious or uninformed of a specific historiography. Because historical Jesus scholarship is eclectic, we need to mention three, yea four, other historiographers whose views come into play when one discusses the historiography of historical Jesus scholarship: Marc Bloch,<sup>28</sup> Jacques Le Goff,<sup>29</sup> Richard J. Evans,<sup>30</sup> and John Lewis Gaddis.<sup>31</sup> But, because historical Jesus scholarship seems largely unconscious of its historiography, or at least unwilling to trot out its essential features, it is important for us to bring to the surface some of its essential features.

If we care about the place of the "historical Jesus" in the theological curriculum, it becomes fundamentally important for us to become aware of what we are doing when we "go after" the historical Jesus.

---

<sup>28</sup> The Historian's Craft, intro. J. R. Strayer, trans. P. Putnam (New York: Random [Vintage], 1953). This book is a draft of a volume that was never completed; Bloch was assassinated by the Third Reich on June 16, 1944, along with twenty-six others. The book has enjoyed enormous popularity.

<sup>29</sup> A member of the French Annales school with its social-scientific and "objective" approach, and following the lead of Marc Bloch, Le Goff is a major medievalist, and I am grateful to my colleague, Dr. Susan Rabe, for introducing me to Le Goff. See his History and Memory, European Perspectives, trans. S. Rendall, E. Claman (New York: Columbia University Press, 1992). This study is a collection of major articles originally translated into Italian for Enciclopedia (Turin: Einaudi, 1977–1982).

<sup>30</sup> Closer to Elton than to Carr, but a mediating voice between them nonetheless, is R. J. Evans, In Defence of History. His study is an elegantly written masterpiece of a chastened modernist historiography. The decision to respond to his many (mostly postmodernist) critics wounds the elegance of the book by this modern German history scholar.

<sup>31</sup> Standing on the shoulders of E. H. Carr, John Lewis Gaddis, an American historian of the Cold War period, gave a series of lectures at the University of Oxford as the George Eastman Visiting Professor at Balliol. They follow the lines set out by Carr and, like Carr, Gaddis writes masterfully. See his The Landscape of History: How Historians Map the Past (New York: Oxford University Press, 2002).

Because, so it seems to me, most historical Jesus scholars are fundamentally Eltonian, I will focus on his work.<sup>32</sup>

Sir Geoffrey Elton is best understood if we begin with these two claims:<sup>33</sup>

Historical method is no more than a recognized and tested way of extracting from what the past has left the true facts and events of that past, and so far as possible their true meaning and interrelation, the whole governed by the first principle of historical understanding, namely that the past must be studied in its own right, for its own sake, and on its own terms... Its fundamental principles are only two, and they may be expressed as questions, thus: exactly what evidence is there, and exactly what does it mean? Knowledge of all the sources, and competent criticism of them—these are the basic requirements of a reliable historiography.

The historian must not go against the first conditions of his calling: his knowledge of the past is governed by the evidence of that past, and that evidence must be criticized and interpreted by the canons of historical scholarship.

Never mind that Elton's sharp pen has what amounts to two "firsts," what is evidence?<sup>34</sup>

Evidence is the surviving deposit of an historical event; in order to rediscover the event, the historian must read not only with the analytical eye of the investigator but also with the comprehensive eye of the storyteller.

The historian, so claims the modernist historian G. R. Elton, can be objective:<sup>35</sup>

In the process of learning, he already constructs, and in so far as the first is governed by the integrity imposed by the evidence the second flows from that evidence rather than from the historian's mind. However, it is he who uses the evidence: he chooses, arranges, interprets. As a researcher, he has his defences; we must see whether as a writer he can escape the relativism of his personality.

---

<sup>32</sup> For Jenkins' relentless critique of Elton, see Jenkins, On "What is History?", 64–96.

<sup>33</sup> Elton, The Practice of History, 65, 35.

<sup>34</sup> Ibid., 84.

<sup>35</sup> Ibid., 91. On "objectivity," see Evans, In Defence of History, 224–253; Peter Novick, That Noble Dream: The "Objectivity" Question and the American Historical Profession, Ideas in Context (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988); Gaddis, The Landscape of History, 111–128; Le Goff, History and Memory, 111–115.

In another context, Elton put it with his usual flair for the dramatic:<sup>36</sup>

Historians' personalities and private views are a fact of life, like the weather; and like the weather they are not really worth worrying about as much as in practice they are worried over. They cannot be eliminated, nor should they be. The historian who thinks that he has removed himself from his work is almost certainly mistaken; what in fact he is likely to have proved is the possession of a colourless personality which renders his work not sovereignly impartial but merely dull.

He can't stop with this, so he continues:

But though dullness is no virtue, neither is self-conscious flamboyance. The historian need not try either to eliminate or to intrude himself; let him stick to the writing of history and forget the importance of his psyche. It will be there all right and will no doubt be served by his labours, but really it matters less to the result than critics lament or friends acclaim, and it matters a great deal less than does his intellect.

Which is not to say that the historian does not hop the rails of objectivity and reveal that he'd rather go at it alone and chase a different path. For Elton, awareness of this bias is critical in keeping the historian on the rails.<sup>37</sup>

The point is rather that whatever piece of the past the historian reconstructs must, to be present to the mind, achieve a shape of beginning and end, of cause and effect, of meaning and intent. If, as he ought to be, the historian is in addition an artist, a man wishing to create (in words) a thing of interest and beauty, the constructive element in the process can become overpowering; and if political motives supervene it becomes really dangerous.

A nasty war has taken place between the historian and the social scientist over whether or not we focus on individuals shaping history or history shaping, because it determines, individuals. A leading light in this discussion was Isaiah Berlin, both in his Historical Inevitability, wherein he fought against determinism of all kinds in the name of a humane, free-will-oriented and even moralistic historiography, and in his inimitable essay on Leo Tolstoy's historiography, "The Hedgehog and the Fox.”<sup>38</sup> But Elton, building on that scholarship, cut to the chase (because he, too, was a hedgehog) with this:<sup>39</sup>

---

<sup>36</sup> The Practice of History, 105.

<sup>37</sup> Ibid., 97.

History does not exist without people, and whatever is described happens through and to people. Therefore let us talk about people, by all means imposing categories on them and abstracting generalizations from them, but not about large miasmic clouds like forces or busy little gnomes like trends.

Elton was attacked, especially of late by the postmodernists, and Elton responded with an only slightly chastened claim:<sup>40</sup>

Reality has to be rediscovered and described on the basis of knowledge which is invariably incomplete, often highly ambiguous, and cannot be enlarged once all the relevant survivals have been studied, all of which demands constant decisions based on choice among the possibilities... [but] the present must be kept out of the past... That partial and uneven evidence must be read in the context of the day that produced it... [because] we must study the past for its own sake and guided by its own thoughts and practices.

And, as he ends chapter one of his classic textbook:<sup>41</sup>

Omnia veritas.

1.3. What is History?

There is one fundamental issue in all of historiography today: the relation of the Subject to the Object,<sup>42</sup> of the historian to what that historian wants to study—in our case, Jesus of Nazareth and the historical relics that survive about him and his world. If the postmodernist,

---

<sup>38</sup> Isaiah Berlin, Historical Inevitability, Auguste Comte Memorial Trust Lecture 1, 12 May 1953 (London: Oxford University Press [Geoffrey Cumberlege], 1954); “The Hedgehog and the Fox,” in Isaiah Berlin, The Proper Study of Mankind: An Anthology of Essays, ed. H. Hardy, and R. Hausheer (New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1998), 436–498. For an informative setting of Berlin’s historiography in context, at times humorous, see M. Ignatieff, Isaiah Berlin: A Life (New York: Henry Holt, 1998), 203–207.

<sup>39</sup> The Practice of History, 102.

<sup>40</sup> Return to Essentials, 65.

<sup>41</sup> The Practice of History, 50. On p. 51 he states that we are to recognize “that inability to know all the truth is not the same thing as total inability to know the truth.”

<sup>42</sup> Few have discussed, so far as I know, the claim of Elton that the subject matter of history is more objective than that of the natural sciences because the material is independent and has (what he calls a) “dead reality.” See The Practice of History, 51–58.

someone like Jenkins, wants to usurp the Object in the Subject by contending that history is narrative, history is rhetoric, and history is ideology, the modernist wants to blanket the Subject and find the Object, pure and simple and untouched. Let this be said: what the modernist wants to do can't be done. The postmodernists have made this clear. Unfortunately, too often they make this point with rhetoric and logic and not examples.<sup>43</sup> Even before the postmodernists, E. H. Carr tossed blocks of ice on the heat of claimed neutrality and objectivity of the modernist, empiricist history, saying that such a day is now over.<sup>44</sup>

This [era of empiricist historiography] was the age of innocence, and historians walked in the Garden of Eden, without a scrap of philosophy to cover them, naked and unashamed before the god of history. Since then, we have known Sin and experienced a Fall; and those historians who today pretend to dispense with a philosophy of history are merely trying, vainly and self-consciously, like members of a nudist colony, to recreate the Garden of Eden in their garden suburb.

Study the historian before you begin to study the facts... When you read a work of history, always listen out for the buzzing. If you detect none, either you are tone deaf or your historian is a dull dog.

...two books cannot be written by the same historian.

But neither is the bold claim of Jenkins do-able; we cannot completely swallow the Object in our subjectivity. We remain differentiated ego masses—and can do nothing about it. This is why the category of Ben F. Meyer, a historical Jesus scholar, namely “critical realism,” is so important to historical Jesus scholarship.<sup>45</sup>

So what then is history? And, for our purposes, what kind of history is the historical Jesus scholar doing? First, history begins with “facts” that survive from the past as evidence (“facts” constituent of the Object), this evidence and the facts behind it confront the Subject (observer),<sup>46</sup>

---

<sup>43</sup> A weakness in the approach of Keith Jenkins is his lack of examples from historical work. This, in part, is what Sir Geoffrey Elton despised: he listened only to those who were doing actual historical work (e.g., Return to Essentials, 3–26, 34). At the level of style and example, the studies of Richard J. Evans and John Lewis Gaddis carry the day.

<sup>44</sup> What is History?, 21, 26, 52.

<sup>45</sup> See his Critical Realism.

<sup>46</sup> A nuanced historiography makes this distinction: we study not so much the past but what survives from the past. But, few historians question that they can look “through” what survives to say something about the past itself. “Facts” exist independently of the mind, whether they are discovered or not; that is, things were said and which facts, even if one follows the dynamic flow of the French phenomenologist Michel Henry on life, time and truth,<sup>47</sup> can be gotten ahold of as “existential facts”—a point permitted even by the postmodernist Keith Jenkins. The Subject does not completely swallow up the Object, and when it is claimed that it does, we are seeing what Richard Evans calls the “narcissism of much postmodernist writing” and “inflated self-importance, solipsism and pretentiousness.”<sup>48</sup> The Object can be distinguished from the Subject, and while Object is always at the level of “perception” or “re-presentation” (what isn’t?),<sup>49</sup> such Objects genuinely exist (even if they need to be sorted out through a critical procedure). The “realism” of the Object requires a “critical” (not naïve) approach, that is, one in which the Subject and the Object interact.<sup>50</sup> To be sure, apart from (perhaps) archaeological remains, all “existential facts” have been through what Elton calls “some cooking process” and no “existential facts” are “raw.”<sup>51</sup> Nonetheless, the relic of that past remains and it can be studied—and some things can be known. As Jacques Le Goff puts it,<sup>52</sup>

In sum, I think history is indeed a science of the past, if it is acknowledged that this past becomes an object of history through a reconstitution that is constantly questioned.

John Lewis Gaddis is not alone in countering postmodernity’s fetish worry about the Subject when he states that “Historians are relatively minor actors, therefore, in the coercive process.”<sup>53</sup> But the necessary recognition that Subject and Object interact to form a knowledge rooted in critical realism means that all conclusions must be recognized things occurred. “Evidence” is what survives of those “existential facts.” The judgment that “facts” are “discrete” is a claim that “facts” have no meaning in and of themselves and that context and emplotment are not constitutive of those “facts.” I agree with R.J. Evans when he says, “The historian formulates a thesis, goes looking for evidence and discovers facts” (In Defence of History, 78).

---

<sup>47</sup> Michel Henry, I Am the Truth: Toward a Philosophy of Christianity, Cultural Memory in the Present (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 2003).

<sup>48</sup> In Defence of History, 200.

<sup>49</sup> On this, see Gaddis, The Landscape of History, 129–151.

<sup>50</sup> A good summary of this can be found in Wright, The New Testament and the People of God, 31–46.

<sup>51</sup> See Elton, The Practice of History, 58. With his customary wit, Elton goes on: “one could at best then hope to find an historian [from the ancient past] learned, wise and sensitive enough to have cooked his materials in such a way that their natural flavour appears in the dish” (59).

<sup>52</sup> History and Memory, 108.

<sup>53</sup> The Landscape of History, 146.

as approximate, probabilistic, and contingent—and, not to be missed, shaped by the interaction of Object and the Subject's story.

An example of an “existential fact” would be Jesus' entering into the Jordan River near John the Baptist. If we are the Subject, and Jesus (as represented in the gospels and Josephus) is the Object and one of the “existential facts” is that he entered into the Jordan River, Subject and Object can be distinguished—even if the Object can be known only through the mind of the Subject.

Second, while there is something to be said for treating heuristically the “existential facts” as genuinely discrete, the postmodernist wedge has been driven in too deep: even “existential facts” emerge from the waters of context and contingency and intention.<sup>54</sup> The “existential facts” we work with, say Jesus' entering the Jordan River, are embedded and emplotted in their own context because humans intend and humans interpret as part of what makes them human and part of Life itself.<sup>55</sup> It wasn't just any old river he entered; and it wasn't during the night; and the entry wasn't disconnected from a John who was known for baptizing people, etc.

It might be useful to think more clearly about “discrete” facts and “emplotted” or “contextualized” facts. It can be just as easily claimed that no fact is genuinely “discrete,” because all “facts” occur in contexts, as a result of intentions, and therefore have some sort of “narrative” or “meaning” constituent to their very existence.<sup>56</sup> If I were to be seen walking around my car to open the door, one might interpret that (discretely) as an “existential fact” of walking around the car to open a door into which I did not enter. Odd behavior, to be sure, but still “discrete.” But, if one widens the context to see both contingency and intention in my action, one would see that I opened the door for a female, who is from other contexts determined to be my wife (Kris), and which behavior is characteristic of males such as I who were reared

---

<sup>54</sup> On these matters, see Gaddis, The Landscape of History, 71–109. On intention, see G. E. M. Anscombe, Intention, Library of Philosophy and Logic (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1979). With the rise of Marxism especially, the issue of historical inevitability was pushed to the front by historiographers. A definitive argument in favor of free will and contingency and against determinism is the engaging essay, in his customary style of the winding road, of Isaiah Berlin, Historical Inevitability, esp. 69–79, where Berlin presents his own view. The rest of the essay is a polemic against determinism as a legitimate hermeneutic of reality.

<sup>55</sup> Again, see Henry, I Am the Truth, 33–52.

<sup>56</sup> See the helpful comments in Evans, In Defence of History, 75–102.

to open doors as an act of courtesy. In such a context, any kind of “meaning making” would see my action as an act of love and kindness and chivalry. (Of course, there are other truthful explanations of the action on other occasions: maybe the door is jammed and she needs my help in prying the door loose from its lock or maybe her hands are full and mine are not.) In general, in context, my action would be discernible and susceptible to truthful “meaning making.” In such a context, treating my action as “discrete” would tell us less than we could and should know. This is important because, without defense, Jenkins and other postmodernist historiographers assume the fundamental importance of treating “existential facts” as “discrete.”<sup>57</sup> But, if as I have argued, “existential facts” and “events” were originally “emplotted” because of human intention and because humans “read” others’ intentions through actions, etc., then there was an “original meaning,” however inchoate, and it is the aim of the historian to get as close to that “original meaning” as possible by working at the sources to find the “original emplotment.”

Third, it is at this level, at the level of “contextualizing” the “existential facts,” that “meaning-making” begins to take place. That is, if I understand Jesus’ entry into the Jordan River to be connected, because of a discernible context, to John the Baptist, to John’s message and mission (which were determined through other “existential facts”), and to Israel’s historic associations with this very location at the Jordan, then some kind of “meaning” can be “made” by the historian of what Jesus was doing and what his baptism meant. This meaning is brought to the surface through narration, through what Paul Ricoeur labeled the “fictive.”<sup>58</sup>

---

<sup>57</sup> It may be observed here that this is precisely the strategy of the early form critics, who isolated events and sayings of Jesus, rendered their current contextual location in the gospels as secondary, and then “imagined” more original and secondary contexts out of which those events or sayings emerged. Redaction critics followed soon after and sought to discover the theology inherent in the “fictive” or “imaginary” “narrative” imposed on the “discrete events” by the redactor. It is perhaps the social scientists, however, who have undercut this simplistic model of the early form critics by arguing that all persons/events/sayings are socially, culturally, and ideologically embedded and emplotted—in and of themselves. For recent studies bringing these issues into the light, see Michael Moxter, “Erzählung und Ereignis: Über den Spielraum historischer Repräsentation,” in Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. J. Schröter and R. Brucker, BZNW 114 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002), 67–88; Jens Schröter, Jesus und der Anfänge der Christologie: Methodologische und exegetische Studien zu den Ursprüngen des christlichen Glaubens, BTS 47 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener, 2001); G. Theissen and D. Winter, The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria, trans. M. E. Boring (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002).

In other words, history involves three “steps”—though we hasten to insert that “steps” gives the wrong impression if one thinks that one proceeds from one to the other. Actual historical study reveals that the three “steps” are taken at the same time because, as Marc Bloch put it so well, “In the beginning, there must be the guiding spirit.”<sup>59</sup> In fact, “meaning-making” occurs from the beginning of the process. This was the insight of several earlier historiographers, including Benedetto Croce and R. G. Collingwood.<sup>60</sup> Back now to these three (interrelated) “steps”: they are (1) the discovery of existential facts—in our case the “discovery” of the gospel evidence by exegesis, etc., or of archaeological data, or of political contexts. Then, (2) there is criticism of the “existential facts.” It is here that historical Jesus scholars have made big beds with billowy pillows and thick covers. An “existential fact” often becomes “non-existential” at the hand of a sceptical historical Jesus scholar. Some scholars, many perhaps, think Jesus was baptized but do not know where—not because there is not evidence that Jesus was baptized near where the children of Israel reportedly crossed the Jordan (e.g., John 1:22–23, 26) but because that evidence is judged, through criticism, to be unreliable.<sup>61</sup>

Now we get to the significance of the postmodernist enterprise. Next, (3) the historian begins to “make meaning” by “interpreting” what he or she judges to be critically-reliable fact in its context and for the author’s own intention.<sup>62</sup> It is at this point that “narration” begins to shape the <sup>58</sup> The literature by Ricoeur, not to mention about him and as an extension of him, is immense. I cite his three-volume set of essays: Time and Narrative, trans. K. McLaughlin, K. Blamey, D. Pellauer (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984–1988).

---

<sup>59</sup> The Historian’s Craft, 65.

<sup>60</sup> B. Croce, Théorie et histoire de l’historiographie (Paris, 1915); R. G. Collingwood, The Idea of History (London: Oxford University Press, 1946).

<sup>61</sup> So, when James D. G. Dunn disagrees with me because “the tradition contains no indication in that regard,” he must mean that the evidence in John is not to be regarded as an “existential fact.” See his Jesus Remembered, 378 n. 182. That is, that John 3:26 is not part of the tradition.

<sup>62</sup> There was a long-standing debate between E. H. Carr and G. R. Elton over whether something becomes historical only when it is swallowed up into a historical narrative, or whether events in and out themselves are historical. Carr, for himself, thought history was about taking facts and placing them into a narrative in order to shape the present and the future, and that objectivity was all about what from the past fit into the course of the future. See What is History?, 36–69. Elton, on the other hand, had a different design: all facts were historical; some were more significant than others. But,

choice of facts, the order those facts are to find, and what meaning will occur as a result of that narration. That is, the historian “makes meaning” through narration, as a result of imagination,<sup>63</sup> through sorting through the evidence with a narrative that “puts it all together,” and this whether or not one prefers Ricoeur’s “fictive” label.

This occurs whether the historian is doing something large and formidable, as Peter Brown does in his The Rise of Western Christendom or Martin Hengel does with his Hellenism and Judaism or E. P. Sanders whether or not they had functional use for the future had nothing to do with their being historical or objective. See his The Practice of History, 51–87. Carr has been followed in this regard by Gaddis, The Landscape of History, 1–16.

---

It is my view that no historian ever studies anything purely for its own sake (though I have undertaken some studies because I had to for an assignment). All historians have a reason for what they are studying, even if that reason is curiosity—but nearly all of them render judgment about their “Object” in the process. As an example, some modern historical Jesus scholars trumpet rather boldly that they are not at the personal level Christians in any ordinary sense and that this makes them more “objective” or “neutral” in their judgments. But, what becomes clear upon examination of their ‘narratives’ about Jesus is that their Jesus tends, more often than not (and I know of almost no exceptions), to lean in the direction of their own belief systems. Jesus, thus, can become an enthusiastic apocalyptic and not worthy of utter devotion and (what I am suggesting) their own non-faith in such a Jesus can be confirmed. What would be rare is someone who came to the conclusion that Jesus was utterly divine but who did not think him worthy of devotion. In other words, all historical Jesus scholars have an aim in what they are writing about Jesus. Thus, knowledge and power are related though I maintain they are not mutually determinative. See the excellent study of this topic in Evans, In Defence of History, 191–223.

A good example of this can be seen in J. H. Charlesworth, “The Historical Jesus and Exegetical Theology,” PSB 22 (2001): 45–63, who begins his study (45) with this claim: “All scholars who are distinguished in Jesus Research acknowledge that the historical-critical method needs to be employed.” A postmodernist of a deconstructionist spirit could be justified in seeing this as nothing more than the assertion of power—those who don’t do historical Jesus studies by “my” or “our” method will not be acknowledged and, because we acknowledge one another, “our” studies are the best. However, inasmuch as I think Charlesworth does state the “facts” straight in this regard—that the best scholarship is genuinely critical—I tend to think he is not playing the game of power, but “objectively” stating a historiographical truth. This, however, is not to say that genuine insights can be gleaned from those who do not operate with the historical-critical method. Inasmuch as Charlesworth is a modernist historian, his statement intentionally includes the postmodernist approach to Jesus. He speaks on p. 48 of “true historians,” on p. 49 of “virtually bruta facta” and includes here “healing miracles”—which is not a “brute fact” but instead an explanation of something else. He also speaks of the “purely historical and scientific methods” that must be “disinterested” (62). In addition, Charlesworth proceeds to say that while the Christian faith is rooted in history it transcends that history (62). This is an excellent article on the topic of this chapter.

<sup>63</sup> On imagination, which is discussed by most historiographers, see Gaddis, The Landscape of History, 35–52.

does with his Paul and Palestinian Judaism or James D. G. Dunn with his The Parting of the Ways. Or, it occurs when some historian narrows his or her scope to a singular event, theme or saying, as can be seen in Kathleen Corley's Women and the Historical Jesus or in Tom Holmén's Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking. In each of these studies, whether big or small, it is the historian, not the "existential fact," that makes meaning through what some classic historiographers call "interconnectedness." It is the business of a historian to "make meaning" of existential facts by bringing them into a coherent narrative—and the better written the more likely it is that the narrative will catch on. Bloodless historians create bloodless meanings—with the proviso that the sanguine do not necessarily write better histories.

This raises the question of "truth." Are some "narratives" or "meanings" more truthful than others? Is there, at times, "meaning" inherent to an "existential fact"? That is, does the very act of Jesus' baptism in the Jordan River at the hand of John the Baptist need anything more than "exegesis" (a "bringing out of what is there")? At this point a wedge can be pushed into the discussion. If, as some postmodernists suppose, all events are indeed "discrete" in the sense that they are not connected and there is no meaning inherent in the event itself, then one must conclude that no historical narrative is "true" in the sense of final. Why? Because there is no standard to which one can measure the narrative against to claim that it is "true" (assuming here some sort of correspondence theory for "true"). It is here that the postmodernist enjoys the role of using the dagger. Because of his or her position of irony, the postmodernist delights in the claim that all is rhetoric, or narrative, or language. But, as Richard J. Evans points out rather more than less often, no postmodernist historiography permits the role to be reversed—that is, no postmodernist permits his or her "narrative" to be seen as nothing more than ideology and language, and nearly all such postmodernists trumpet their claim to have a method (postmodernist) that tells the "true" (even if they don't use that term) story about method and about what can be known.<sup>64</sup> Oddly enough, the postmodernist claims his or her irony as the truth.

---

<sup>64</sup> In Defence of History, throughout.

Call it common sense realism or critical realism,<sup>65</sup> or whatever else you'd like, no human lives this way. I take one simple example. We live in Chicago. We are fans of the American game of baseball, and that means we cheer for the Chicago Cubs. The Chicago Cubs have not won a "pennant" in decades, and a few years back, when they were on the verge of clinching a decisive game and putting themselves in position to go to the World Series, an event occurred (so far as I can tell) in the sixth game of the National League Playoff Series. That event involved a Cubs fan (may he nonetheless live to a ripe old age). The fan reached up to snatch a baseball that had been hit by a batter, and a Chicago Cubs player (Moises Alou) reached out to catch the ball. The fan interfered and the player did not catch the ball. Had Alou caught the ball, perhaps, just perhaps, the Cubs would have won the game and been able to go to the World Series—and who knows, perhaps they would have brought home the bacon with the pennant.

Now, here's my point: according to a strict postmodernist interpretation, all we know about the game is what newspaper writers told us, what radio announcers relayed to us, and what TV analysts showed us. They told us what they wanted to tell us for their own reasons, according to their own ideologies, and for the assertion of their own power. What we don't know is the "reality" of the event. We could, by analyzing the residue of historical evidence—newspaper reports, eyewitnesses (one of whom was my son), and TV camera shots (which distort depth perceptions), come to our conclusion and "tell our own story." But, no story would be true. All we have is rhetoric and all we have is ideology.

I think this construction of reality to be as difficult to live with as the denial of the law of contradiction. More importantly, I think no postmodernist lives this way—most of them who heard about the game would think they know what happened and most of them could make meaning out of it—and a meaning that they would think truthful at some level. (And this would be so even for those who only heard reports by friends and fans.) Most postmodernist historiographers, also, would have an opinion on what would have happened (contingency) had the man not reached out and touched the ball. Many, and

---

<sup>65</sup> On "critical realism," see esp. Meyer, Critical Realism; Reality and Illusion.

I am among that group, think Alou would have caught the ball and the Cubs would have (most likely) won the game. None, I think, would say that the fan touching the ball was simply a discrete event that had no connection to the baseball player or even to the outcome of the game.<sup>66</sup>

We live in a world where we have to make meaning to live, and some meanings are more realistic and truthful than others. The person who looks up at a baseball coming at him or her, and has a world in which “meaning making” does not observe the rules of gravity, may get whacked in the face with a small missile that will bring considerable pain—and what I am saying is that people don’t live like this. Not even postmodernists. One who has a “meaning making” narrative in which the laws of gravity are at work has a more truthful narrative than the one who does not.

Returning back from our digression into the pit of nether gloom that is Cubs baseball, we can look once again at what “truth” means when it comes to history and “meaning making.” In contrast to the postmodernist agenda, if “facts” are not simply “discrete,” if events have context, if the contingency of “existential facts” is not simply chaos, if humans have intentions in their actions and sayings, that is, in the “existential facts” for which there is a historical residue, then some “narratives” and “meanings” are more truthful than others. Those that are most truthful are those that can be demonstrated to correspond more or less to the “existential facts” in their historical contexts. As Richard Evans puts it, in what can only be called a chaste post-postmodernist modernism,<sup>67</sup>

I will look humbly at the past and say despite them all: it really happened, and we really can, if we are very scrupulous and careful and self-critical, find out how it happened and reach some tenable though always less than final conclusions about what it all meant.

Postmodernists teach us that our own narratives are not equivalent with that reality in the past, and they remind us that our narratives need to be held lightly with the obvious potential of being revised and even jet-

---

<sup>66</sup> So meaningful was that event to some Cubs fans that the ball was enshrined for some time in a bar near Wrigley Field and the next winter was blown up, in front of cheering fans, and at considerable expense. So ended, it is believed, the curse against the Cubs.

<sup>67</sup> In Defence of History, 253.

tisoned, but they cannot steal from us this: that our narratives more or less correspond to what we can know about “existential facts” and their “contexts” in such a way that we can derive a narrative that approximates truth. The best histories are those that narrate the most significant events in such a manner that meaning and events are close.

2. The Historical Jesus: Brief Remarks

We can begin with this: Christianity believes in history. Historiographers are fond of commenting that “history” as we now know it was washed into the tide of generations by Israel and the early Christians who believed, as is now clear, in “events” and “sayings” as put together into a “narrative.”<sup>68</sup> Two brief points draw the issue to the surface.

First, the Apostle Paul contends that the entirety of the Christian faith is founded on the “fact” of Jesus being raised from the dead.<sup>69</sup> He states this is the Christian tradition (i.e., their “narrative representation”) from the very beginning (1 Cor 15:3–7). Perhaps his most pointed lines are these:

If there is no resurrection of the dead, then not even Christ has been raised. And, if Christ has not been raised, then (1) our preaching is useless and (2) so is your faith (15:13–14).

That is, the Christian gospel is absolutely dependent on the understanding that Jesus Christ was dead, was buried, and came back to life—in the words of N. T. Wright, acquired “life after life-after-death.” This, in other words, is the claim that faith is rooted in the facticity of an event, a particular event, namely, the resurrection of Jesus from the grave. This is one reason why historiographers often claim Christianity is a religion of history.

A second example is from The Apostles’ Creed, in which (whenever one dates it) the faith of Christianity is expressed, not so much in the Bible as in the events to which the Bible witnesses—namely those “done” by the Father, Son, and Spirit.<sup>70</sup> Events—as put into a holistic

<sup>68</sup> E.g., Elton, The Practice of History, 2; Bloch, The Historian’s Craft, 31.

<sup>69</sup> On how Paul understood the resurrection, see now the exhaustive tome of N. T. Wright, The Resurrection of the Son of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003), 207–398.

<sup>70</sup> On creeds, see now J. Pelikan, Credo: Historical and Theological Guide to Creeds and Confessions of Faith in the Christian Tradition (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2003). I find L. T. Johnson’s The Creed: What Christians Believe and Why It Matters

Christian narrative—are at the foundation of this unifying creed of Christians: God creating and the Son dying, descending, rising, and ascending.<sup>71</sup> To be sure, there is a “narrative” understanding of these “existential events” or, to use Ricoeur’s language, a “fictive representation,” but if those events are simple “fictions” or “myths,” then some serious damage is done to the content of what it is that Christians affirm.

What is also affirmed today is that the “historical Jesus” matters. What do historical Jesus scholars mean when they speak of the “historical Jesus”? In light of the brief survey of historiography above, it can only mean this: the historical Jesus is the narrative re-presentation of the existential facts about Jesus that survive critical scrutiny. The reason N. T. Wright’s study of Jesus makes a strong case for itself as an instance of history is because he renders “history” into a “story,” as a “narrative representation,” on the basis of a conscious method. That is, his study is not simply a study of “existential facts” that survive scrutiny, but it is a complete “narrative representation” of those “existential facts.” It puts all things together into a robust, engaging “story.”<sup>72</sup> This is what, according to historiographers, genuine history does. I do not mean by this that N. T. Wright’s study of Jesus is the best, though I am partial to much of what he says,<sup>73</sup> but what I do mean is that N. T. Wright’s study of Jesus is exemplary when it comes to the matter of historiography. There is no “Jesus” study on the shelf that is any more complete, historiographically speaking. There are some historiographical rivals, namely the historical Jesus studies of B. F. Meyer, E. P. Sanders, R. A. Horsley, James D. G. Dunn, the imaginative J. D. Crossan and the even more imaginative B. D. Chilton, but none of these provides as rich or as complete of a “narrative representation.”

Scholars will no doubt dispute some, or much, of the evidence that has survived Wright’s critical scrutiny—which they have a right to do

---

(New York: Doubleday, 2003) inadequate because it monkeys around too much with words, turning them into “experience” rather than affirmation.

<sup>71</sup> See the comments of Charlesworth, “The Historical Jesus and Exegetical Theology”, 62–63.

<sup>72</sup> My criticism of James D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered, is precisely along these lines. In contrast to other works of his, this study does not have a guiding story that shapes the entire portrait of Jesus. In this sense, his study is historiographically more modernist and inductivist than it is a chastened form of postmodernist modernism.

<sup>73</sup> As can be seen in my A New Vision for Israel: The Teachings of Jesus in National Context (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999).

if they are doing history. In disputing the “existential facts” Wright uses, less will survive and a new “narrative representation” will have to be offered. The point here is not which evidence survives, but what one does with the evidence that does survive. For it to be good “history” it must be an engaging “narrative.” To be sure, some studies are only partial (histoire en miettes) because, as monographs or articles, they examine only some of the evidence or are narrowly focused. But, for something to pass muster with the historiographers, a “narrative” is needed to give “existential facts” their appropriate meaning.

Others, of course, tell a different narrative. B. F. Meyer and E. P. Sanders, who have had their share of tussles, tell the narrative of the restoration of Israel, J. D. Crossan tells the narrative a counter-cultural Jesus, while Richard Horsley tells the narrative of a socially-engaged Jesus, and Bruce Chilton tells the narrative of a mamzer (“illegitimate child”) who was also a mystic . . . and the narratives go on and on. And what needs to be seen as “on and on” is that each new re-presentation of Jesus is, in effect, a new gospel to be believed by the historical Jesus scholar and by any who care to agree with that scholar. I know of no other way of putting this. Historical Jesus studies tend to construe “existential facts” into a new narrative, a new gospel.

It is this “on and on” that causes the problem we are facing: what role are these “narrative representations” of Jesus to play in the theological discipline? The issue here is found in one of the words italicized above: the historical Jesus is the narrative re-presentation of the existential facts about Jesus that survive critical scrutiny. Every “historical Jesus” placed on the table is a “re-presentation” of Jesus, and it is “re-presentation” of the Jesus in the canonical Four Gospels—sometimes by eschewing the overall “narrative” of those Four Gospels in favor of a non-canonical “re-presentation” or in favor of the historical Jesus scholar’s own rendition of what Jesus was “really like.” It is this “on and on” of “re-presentations” that raises a critical question for the theological discipline.

There are two deep traditions of a “narrative” about Jesus, the four canonical gospels and the various creeds of the church, that have shaped the entire history of the church and the “role” Jesus himself plays in that church. Are the new “narrative representations” of Jesus to oust those two deep traditions? Are they to supplement them? Are they to correct them?

It can be said without exaggeration that the “church’s” own “presentation” of Jesus in the Four Gospels, or in the creeds, is the governing story of Jesus. It is this “story,” or “history,” that (as Larry Hurtado so ably demonstrates) won the day and that has shaped the self-identity of the church for two millennia.<sup>74</sup> This “presentation” is the church’s “memory,” and it is both memorization of past as well as generation of identity and future.<sup>75</sup> The church makes the claim that neither the modernist nor the postmodernist has either the goose by the neck or the mirror by the top. Instead, the church claims it has the gospel and it can be found by reading the four canonical gospels or by studying its creeds. By and large, the church doesn’t eat goose and it does not care to look at itself in a mirror of itself. It believes instead the “narrative of Jesus” found in a singular story about Jesus.

The problem, therefore, with other “re-presentations” of Jesus is scriptural—what role is the scripture to play in the church’s understanding of Jesus? The problem is also christological—what role are the traditional affirmations of Jesus to play in the church’s understanding of other “re-presentations” of Jesus? The problem is epistemological—how do the “re-presentations” of Jesus correspond to the “block” of material we can find about Jesus? And, finally, it is ecclesiological—what role is the church’s own self-identity to play in judging new “re-presentations” of Jesus? Is it not the case, whether we come at this from the angle of postmodernism, tradition history, or just common sense, that a new “narrative” of Jesus will re-shape the church’s own self-identity?

An even more complicating factor, and one into which we cannot delve here, is that the church, in opting for the four canonical gospels (and the creeds to which those very four gospels contributed), also eschewed other “narrative presentations” of Jesus. That is, the church judged that the Gospel of Thomas and the Gospel of Peter were not consistent enough with the “canonical narrative” to be accepted as authoritative for shaping Christian theology and self-identity.

---

<sup>74</sup> Deconstructionists, of course, may suggest that “won the day” is precisely the problem: it was an ideology that had sufficient power to control the story (as did Dante in his Divine Comedy). I do not dispute the power inherent in Constantine. But, having admitted that, we must recognize that (1) that story was not invented by Constantine; it had deep, original roots in the Christian tradition. And (2) it is that story that has shaped the identity of the church ever since. To mess with that story is to mess with the identity of the church—which is what some want to do today (e.g., Elaine Pagels, Beyond Belief: The Secret Gospel of Thomas [New York: Random, 2003]).

<sup>75</sup> On which, see esp. Le Goff, History and Memory, 51–99.

This presses all other “narrative re-presentations” of Jesus into a corner and leads us to this question: Did the church, by accepting only these Four Gospels, render a judgment once and for all about all other attempted “re-presentations” of Jesus? We could answer this with a “yes” and a “no”—a “yes” for any grand narrative claiming final authority, but a “no” for any narrative claiming some sort of insight into the canonical gospels or some kind of support or supplement to them.

So, we ask again, how do the various “historical Jesus” “re-presentations” fit into the theological discipline?

3. The Historical Jesus and the Theological Discipline

What lurks behind much of the discussion of both a modernist and postmodernist historiography is the simple observation that a Christian faith embraces, at some level, an upper case “History,” a macro-scheme of where things started and where they are ultimately going. In other words, because Christian faith by nature confesses both aitia and telos, it cannot be simply postmodernist—for postmodernity rejects such explanations in its disprivileging of any reading. Furthermore, to the degree that modernity eschews the “question of God” it also eschews a Christian understanding of history.<sup>76</sup> So, while technical historiography may need to move, in the public forum where faith assumptions may need to be bracketed for the sake of conversation, along modernist or postmodernist lines, a truly Christian historiography, not to say a Christian historiographical approach to Jesus, will need to carve its own path. To use the inimitable terms of Isaiah Berlin, Christian historiographers are more or less hedgehogs.<sup>77</sup>

In light of our discussions above about both historiography and the historical Jesus, what can we say about the role of the historical Jesus in the theological discipline?

First, we can back up to the postmodernist claim about what “history” is and make this observation: if our understanding of “history” and the “historical Jesus” is near the mark and we are concerned about how the “historical Jesus” fits into the theological discipline, historical Jesus scholars can only offer “narrative representations” of Jesus that fit with the relics about Jesus in the surviving evidence. That is, they cannot make of him what they will without being accused of the charge of historical misrepresentation. At this point the historical Jesus scholar (and nearly all agree so far as I can see) parts company with the post-modernist radical who thinks we can make of history whatever we want because, after all, it is all rhetoric, language, and ideology. After all, it is a branch of aesthetics and literature and so the task of the historian is to offer as good a narrative as he or she can. I would counter with the words of Marc Bloch: “Explorers of the past are never quite free. The past is their tyrant.”<sup>78</sup>

---

<sup>76</sup> On which, see N. Berdyaev, The Meaning of History (London: Geoffrey Bles/Centenary, 1945); The Destiny of Man (London: Geoffrey Bles/Centenary, 1945); C. Dawson, Religion and the Rise of Western Culture (New York: Sheed and Ward, 1950); S. J. Case, The Christian Philosophy of History (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1943).

<sup>77</sup> See Berlin, “The Hedgehog and the Fox.”

(The limitation of every historical representation of Jesus to the evidence inevitably means that the canonical gospels themselves are often held accountable to the evidence as well. At some level, at least for most historical Jesus scholars, the gospels themselves become “authoritative” to the degree that they themselves correspond to the evidence that can be discovered about Jesus.)

The evidence, and we can bring every bit of it that we can find into one large marble block, determines the parameters of what a historical Jesus scholar should say about Jesus. “In some cases,” as Richard Evans states it, “the narrative is there in the sources.”<sup>79</sup> The old cry of Sir Geoffrey Elton, “to the evidence” (ad fontes), is at the foundation of nearly every historical Jesus study I know of. We have wildly different portraits of Jesus in the studies of B. F. Meyer, E. P. Sanders, R. A. Horsley, J. D. Crossan, J. P. Meier, N. T. Wright, (to some degree) James D. G. Dunn, and B. D. Chilton, but each of them claims—overtly—that his “re-presentation” of Jesus is grounded in the facts and that it comes from those facts. They are each, to use our historiographical taxonomy, modernists through and through. They believe we can discover the evidence, judge it through a critical process, “find” (rather than “impose”) its meaning in its context with clarity, and that they can, sometimes with more potency than other times, “re-present” it all in a compelling “narrative.” But, as modernist historiographers, each believes in the “evidence”—and each is not all that unlike Sir Geoffrey Elton in orientation.

---

<sup>78</sup> The Historian's Craft, 59.

<sup>79</sup> In Defence of History, 147.

In that I have placed Carr and Elton in the same category of a modernist historiographer, I must add that many if not most historical Jesus scholars tend to make a presentation of Jesus that “fits” with what they think the “future” of Christianity holds, as E. H. Carr so clearly argued. While each may make the claim that they are simply after the facts and simply trying to figure out what Jesus was “really like”—and while most don’t quite say this, most do think this is what they are doing—what nearly everyone of them presents is what they’d like the church, or others with faith, to think about Jesus. Crystal clear examples of this can be found in the studies of Marcus Borg, N. T. Wright, E. P. Sanders, and B. D. Chilton—in fact, we would not be far short of the mark if we claimed that this pertains to each scholar—always and forever.<sup>80</sup> And each claims that his or her presentation of Jesus is rooted in the evidence, and only in the evidence.

If that evidence is likened to a marble block, then the historical Jesus scholar may have to chisel away chunk after chunk, but the historical Jesus scholar is not permitted to add marble to the already determined block. Some historical Jesus scholars will chisel away more than others—E. P. Sanders, J. D. Crossan, Kathleen Corley, N. T. Wright, and James D. G. Dunn, for instance, each chisel away different parts of the marble block, but each (confessedly) is working on the same block and trying to find what the block was intended to be—as a good sculptor will always admit.

Second, a word about hermeneutics, a topic which (again) cannot be given here the attention it deserves. I build here on the profound work of A. C. Thiselton in his New Horizons in Hermeneutics and F. Watson in his Text and Truth.<sup>81</sup> Thiselton demonstrates that post-modernity operates with a “hermeneutic of suspicion,” and, as Keith Jenkins’ works on historiography reveal, it is a hermeneutic that sees “texts” as ideological grasplings for power written for a cadre who utilize that text as an assertion of power. Watson, for his part, demonstrates satisfactorily an older notion: a text is an attempt at communication. As Kevin Vanhoozer argues, texts are (at some level)

---

<sup>80</sup> This is precisely why Martin Kähler’s famous claim that faith is not based on historical study is disproven by history. Scholars, and those who follow them—in the church or not in the church—believe in their own narratives.

<sup>81</sup> New Horizons in Hermeneutics: The Theory and Practice of Transforming Biblical Reading (New York: HarperCollins, 1992); Text and Truth: Redefining Biblical Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997).

persons and, as Alan Jacobs contends, texts must be treated as our “neighbors.”<sup>82</sup>

I contend that a hermeneutic of suspicion is fundamentally at odds with the gospel, which is what a theological discipline is most concerned with. In other words, what a Christian needs is not a hermeneutic of suspicion but, as Alan Jacobs brilliantly presents, a “hermeneutics of love”<sup>83</sup> or a “hermeneutic of trust.”<sup>84</sup> Jacobs, building on the profound but often-neglected study On Christian Doctrine by Augustine, writes that a “charitable interpretation” not only fully embraces the distinction between “Subject” and “Object,” but also knows that genuine “hearing” can take place only when the reader “subordinates” himself to the Other (or, Object) in order to hear and to understand and to love. This is not some soft-kneed nonsense that Jacobs offers us. As Jacobs states it,<sup>85</sup>

Discernment is required to know what kind of gift one is being presented with, and in what spirit to accept it (if at all), but a universal suspicion of gifts and givers, like an indiscriminate acceptance of all gifts, constitutes an abdication of discernment in favor of a simplistic a prioriism that smothers the spirit.

Because the hermeneutic of love knows that genuine love is righteous and holy, it speaks the truth about what it reads, judges some things good and some things bad, but it nonetheless operates on the basis of “trust” and “love” rather than suspicion. While it may conclude that some texts are genuinely ideological and graspings for power—who would not judge the Marquis de Sade’s In Praise of Folly as a monstrosity?—a proper reading cannot begin with “suspicion.” Instead, a (Christian or not) reader needs to recognize that “texts” are intended to be “communication events” between two humans made in the image of God and that a genuinely humane reader is one who

---

<sup>82</sup> Kevin Vanhoozer, Is There a Meaning in This Text? The Bible, the Reader, and the Morality of Literary Knowledge (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1998), 455–468; Alan Jacobs, A Theology of Reading: The Hermeneutics of Love (Boulder, CO: Westview [Perseus], 2001), 9–35.

<sup>83</sup> I recently noticed that N.T. Wright spoke of this in his 1992 study; see The New Testament and the People of God, 64; Wright himself points to Thiselton, New Horizons, 604–611.

<sup>84</sup> See Jacobs, A Theology of Reading.

<sup>85</sup> A Theology of Reading, 24. Italics added.

trusts the words of the others.<sup>86</sup> This approach is as humane as it is Christian.

When it comes to the “historical Jesus,” I am not claiming that a Christian, because he or she adopts a chaste but genuine “hermeneutics of love and trust,” thinks everything in the gospels is, simply by inclusion, “historical.” This would miss the general strength of our point about hermeneutics. What it means is that the historical Jesus scholar would not assume the texts are “unhistorical” or so ideologically-driven that they must be deconstructed and re-shaped by one’s own ideology. This sort of treatment of the gospels is, in my view, the destruction of communication because it refuses to listen to the Other (Object, the gospels) and it intends the Subject (reader) to swallow up the Object in his or her own ideological agenda. Communication, which is what happens in any genuine love, is broken when suspicion gains the upper hand. Again, this does not mean that the gospels contain only “red” letters—to use the coding of the Jesus Seminar—but it does delay the judgment until after genuine encounter and reading of the text occurs.

Third, “history” as defined by historiographers involves the “narration” of “existential facts.” When it comes to the theological discipline, therefore, there are “narrations” and there are “narrations,” which means there are some that are good and there are some that are bad, with both “good” and “bad” defined by what the “theological discipline” itself defines as its own narrative. Which means this: since history is a “narrative,” there is either one defining narrative or there are an infinite number of narratives. Since the theological disciplines involve Scriptures and creeds, there is a single normative narrative, or what we could also call a “four-fold” normative narrative about Jesus. That is, if history is a narrative, and if we are concerned with the role of modern historical narratives in the overall theological discipline, we have no options other than surrendering to no normative narrative or to the Church’s normative narrative. To use the words of my professor’s own book on the historical Jesus, all we have at the normative level is the “remembered Jesus.” It is this “remembered Jesus” that was the normative narrative.

I offer now a fourth, but final, observation and it is a bit of a trump card. If we are dealing with the theological discipline, we are probably dealing with both faith-based seminaries or colleges as well as state-based or university-based schooling. What is expected in one differs from the other. But we can perhaps cut to the chase with a rather simple observation: to the degree that the school that shapes the curriculum is itself shaped by the two deep traditions about Jesus (the canonical gospels, the creeds), to the same degree its openness or closedness to the historical Jesus is determined.

---

<sup>86</sup> See here Watson, Text and Truth.

In a university setting, where freedom of thought (along with political correctness) is championed as the one and only creedal statement, there will be almost no restrictions on what a historical Jesus scholar may say and teach about Jesus. In a more ecclesiastically-shaped institution, the sort of institution I teach in at North Park University, there will be restrictions (at different levels) on what can be said and taught about Jesus. Institutions of this sort vary on what is permitted and what is not permitted.

My trump card is now clear: if a theological curriculum is based on a traditional confession in the narrative depiction of Jesus in the gospels, or the historic creeds, then the historical Jesus has a distinct but limited role. The historical Jesus scholar's narrative representation of Jesus is of value only insofar as it supplements or supports the grand narrative of Jesus that is found in the gospels or the creeds. It may have lesser values: showing how we got from the "original Jesus" to the present "canonical Jesus"; offering an apologetic for what the church believes by filtering through non-canonical evidence or other sorts of evidence and arguments; or simply writing out a "history" of early Christianity in order to provide for students and Christians "how things became what they did." But, what is clear is that for the person who is committed to the canonical gospels, or to the creeds, as the church's definitive "narrative" about Jesus, another "narrative" about Jesus will not play a faith-determining role. It will not because it cannot.

The reason for this is clear: theological curricula are shaped by larger bodies, by administrative and church-based boards, and they are shaped to foster students into the faith that body confesses. The faith of such bodies, in most cases, is the result of two millennia of study of the Bible and the creeds, the result of two millennia of intense theological debate and discussion. It is unlikely, one, that a single historical Jesus scholar will completely change the theological conclusions of either the church or even of a smaller church body. Two, the swirl of ideas that emerge from a wide variety of historical Jesus scholarship makes clear that not every one of these can be adapted or adopted for use in the life of the church or in the theological curriculum.

In his recent, brilliant magnum opus, Larry Hurtado traces with exacting nuance how the early churches expressed Christ devotion.<sup>87</sup> The church itself came from the trajectory Hurtado sorts out. And many historical Jesus studies today would fit within the parameters sketched by Hurtado. Many, also, would not fit. Those narrative representations of Jesus that do not fit into that grid would also not fit into a theological curriculum intent on teaching a traditional understanding of Jesus.

Most theological curricula permit enough freedom of thought for the individual scholar to offer suggestions here and there, and to offer, under the watchful eye of both scholarship and theological context, a new narrative representation of Jesus. It is no surprise that both N. T. Wright and B. D. Chilton serve in the same church body: the Church of England and its American family member, the Episcopal Church. Other church bodies would not be so supple, and they have a right to determine their own parameters. Such parameter-making, after all, is an expression of freedom of thought. As free as any science discipline that requires its professors and students to learn to explore the world within a set of categories well-established by others.

---

<sup>87</sup> Lord Jesus Christ: Devotion to Jesus in Earliest Christianity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003).

HISTORICAL JESUS RESEARCH IN GLOBAL CULTURAL CONTEXT

TERESA OKURE

1. Introduction

The historical Jesus research as a global cultural phenomenon did not begin in modern times. It started right from the New Testament era itself. By historical Jesus is meant the question whether Jesus of Nazareth (ca. 4 BCE/6 CE–33 CE) really existed, whether he personally said, taught and did all the things attributed to him; and whether from the extant “historical” records we today can gain a glimpse of his historical person “as he really was.” Global research could mean attempts to discover what the different nations and scholars worldwide are saying or have said in their different cultural contexts about the historical Jesus as here outlined. This study, however, focuses on how each epoch and culture, starting from the New Testament era, understands and appropriates the global Jesus whose global cultural nature is given by God, in virtue of his being God’s universal Messiah, not a human construct. It acknowledges that the main resources in any discussion of the historical Jesus are the canonical gospels, though recently the “historical” value of the apocryphal gospels is being emphasized.<sup>1</sup> As Dei Verbum rightly observes, “even among the New Testament, the Gospels have a special place, and rightly so, because they are our primary source for the life and the teaching of the Incarnate Word, Our Savior.”<sup>2</sup> The debate on the historical nature or otherwise of these documents cannot invalidate their irreplaceability as our unique primary sources for meeting the Jesus of history, or their value in themselves as historical documents.<sup>3</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> See, for instance, Christopher Tuckett, “Sources and Methods” in Cambridge Companion to Jesus, ed. Markus Bockmuehl (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001), 121–137, esp. 128–130; J. D. Crossan, Four Other Gospels: Shadows on the Contours of Canon (Minneapolis: Winston Press, 1985), and the rich bibliography cited in these works.

<sup>2</sup> Austin Flannery, O.P., Vatican Council II, 1: The Conciliar and Post Conciliar Documents (New York: Costello Publishing Company, rev. ed., 1988), 760.

Secondly, these historical documents on the historical Jesus, we recall, were not written for Christians of the twentieth or twenty-first centuries. It is even doubtful that New Testament authors ever thought the world would last this long, given their expressed belief in the Lord's promise to return soon or that the generation then alive would not pass away until all his words and promises had been fulfilled, notwithstanding the Lukan parables warning against expectation of immediate return (Luke 19:11–27) of the master going on a long journey (cf. Luke 20:9–19).<sup>4</sup> Any discourse on the historical Jesus, therefore, needs to bear in mind the short term, contextualized, localized, even personalized, community-based and faith-motivated nature of these documents and, above all, their interpretative nature.<sup>5</sup> Reception, digestion/assimilation and transmission are integral aspects of the New Testament writings, especially the gospels (cf. Luke 1:1–4; John 20:30–31). This applies also to what they record about the historical Jesus. All history, not only the “history” of the historical Jesus, is interpretation, as is all human endeavor, since to be human is to be a hermeneut, an interpreter, one who is able to read, understand and respond to the signs

---

<sup>3</sup> We may situate this issue in the context of other historical persons, ancient and modern. How, for instance, do we know that a Plato, an Aristotle, a Socrates, a Hammurabi, or a Pharaoh really lived and did the things attributed to them? How and what do we know about the historical Moses, by all indications founder of the Israelite nation and religion? The answers to these questions may vary, yet one thing is certain, that to gain even a glimmer of truth about these historical persons, we depend, at least as a starting point, even if only in faith, on the records about them transmitted down the centuries by those who knew them or claimed and thought they knew them. The New Testament records cannot be an exception to the rule, especially since they date much closer to the events they narrate than those other ancient documents.

<sup>4</sup> Scholars have unfairly accused Luke of converting the Parousia into an indefinite period of history. For Albert Schweitzer (The Quest of the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of Its Progress from Raimarus to Wrede, ed. J. M. Robinson, trans. W. B. D. Montgomery, reprint 1968 [Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1998], 4), Jesus was the first to be disappointed in his expectation of the immediate return of the Son of Man, a figure Schweitzer distinguishes from Jesus himself.

<sup>5</sup> “Personalized” in the sense that the gospels were primarily concerned with the immediate persons and communities to whom they addressed their work in order to elicit from them a life-giving faith in the historical Jesus; “community-based,” because the authors did not write independently of the community of faith from which they received and to which they directed their writings.

and symbols of one's community and world if one is to survive and function in that community and world.<sup>6</sup>

Redaction criticism and contextual New Testament readings have long established that the gospels are not verbatim recordings of the ipsissima verba or acta of Jesus but his words and deeds as the eyewitnesses understood and transmitted them to their immediate audience and as subsequent generations also understood/interpreted the transmitted records, both oral and written, to their own audience. Contextual studies from the perspective of two-thirds world have consolidated this by emphasizing the life context of the audience addressed (not just the Sitz-im-Leben or context in which a text was used). John, for instance, emphasizes both the selective and interpretative nature of his gospel, adding that if all the things Jesus did and said were written down, the world itself would be unable to contain such books (John 20:30–31; 21:25); an exaggeration perhaps, but the point is made nonetheless.<sup>7</sup>

These observations draw attention to the need to accept the faith-based, life-oriented or hortatory nature of New Testament sources. We find peace in accepting that the authors were interested not in pure historical documentation of events about Jesus, but rather primarily in underscoring their own expected response to this historical person.<sup>8</sup> Their struggle with faith response clearly colored their works and give a different orientation to the facts about the historical Jesus than does contemporary classroom, scientific research whereby the researcher, even if an atheist, can write “authoritatively” on the historical Jesus without making a personal contact with him or being touched and transformed by the positive fruits of his or her research.

Furthermore, we recall that our contemporary concern with historicity was not that of New Testament authors, that our classroom, library, Internet “scientific/academic” contexts for discussing the

---

<sup>6</sup> See further, T. Okure, “I will open my mouth in parables (Matt 13:35): A Case for a Gospel-Based Biblical Hermeneutics,” NTS 46 (2000): 445–463, esp. 447–449; S. C. Bates, Human Life is Cultural: Introducing Anthropology (Pietermaritzburg: Cluster Publications, 2002).

<sup>7</sup> It is possible, for instance, to read all four gospels, and even the whole of the New Testament in a maximum of one day. Yet Jesus taught and ministered for at least three years.

<sup>8</sup> Were it not for the problems in the Corinthian community, for instance, we would probably never have known Paul's version of the Last Supper (1 Cor 11:23–26) or the resurrection creed he received from the tradition “as of first importance” (1 Cor 15:3–8).

nature of the historical Jesus were not theirs, nor was their understanding of history. Rather, according to the declared intention of at least two of the evangelists (Luke 1:1–4; John 20:30–31) their purpose was to urge their audience to root their lives, their own life history, in the stream of Jesus' own life history. As 1 Peter observes, "Although you have not seen him [or known him, according to some witnesses], you love him; and even though you do not see him now, you believe in him and rejoice with an indescribable and glorious joy, for you are receiving the outcome of your faith, the salvation of your souls" (1 Pet 1:8). Discipleship for the early Christians meant summatively: following and learning from Jesus, loving him, drawing life from him and living as he lived, in the hope of sharing his victory over sin and death. Their concern with the historicity of Jesus of Nazareth lay in its unique significance for their own lives. This itself was rooted in the belief that Jesus' own life effected a radical change in the history and status of every believer, of humanity as a whole and of the entire creation.<sup>9</sup>

For the New Testament authors, therefore, research into the historical Jesus made little or no sense apart from themselves, that is, without their sustained effort to understand, personally accept Jesus and live by his teaching in their diverse socio-cultural and life locations. They themselves, the faith-filled, faith-based community, were very much part or extensions of the historical Jesus. In them (en christo), Jesus continued to live visibly; they found new individual and communal identity and worth through their believing in him. Paul sums up the significance of the historical Jesus for the individual and community when he states: "If Christ has not been raised, then our preaching is in vain, and your faith is in vain...we are of all people most to be pitied" (1 Cor 15:14–19). Equally today, the historical Jesus continues to live on in the faith, the strengths and weaknesses of committed believers. To leave out this dimension, that believers form part of the historical Jesus by rooting their own lives in him, would be to greatly impoverish the New Testament understanding of the historical Jesus, and consequently, too, our research into his historicity.<sup>10</sup>

---

<sup>9</sup> Cf. T. Okure, "'In him all things hold together': A Missiological Reading of Col 1:15–20," International Review of Mission 91.360 (2002): 62–72; eadem, "The Global Jesus," in The Cambridge Companion to Jesus, ed. Bockmuehl 237–249; eadem, "Colossians," in Global Bible Commentary, ed. Daniel Patte, Teresa Okure et al. (henceforth GBC) (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2004), 490–499.

The last observation, offers, arguably, an essential key for discussing the historical Jesus research in a global cultural context. If research here means discovering what the nations are saying about the historical Jesus, the implication is that the global community locates its interest in Jesus in the discourse about his historicity as is currently posed by western scholars in the historical Jesus research, typified at its lowest value by the so-called “Jesus Seminar.”<sup>11</sup> This writer’s experience does not corroborate such an assumption. In light of this, our concern with the historical Jesus research in a global cultural context leads us to focus on how different peoples worldwide understand in faith, appropriate and reap the fruits of the historical Jesus portrayed in the New Testament, especially in the gospels. The New Testament and gospel authors themselves adopted this approach, since their writings are largely a collective witness to their efforts to understand and get to know the historical Jesus and relate their own lives, that of their diverse audience, of humanity as a whole and the entire creation to his life. Outside this life-centered, faith-based optic and orbit, the discourse or research on the historical Jesus, especially from a global perspective, risks losing much of its relevance and significance.

As a way forward, this current research examines the question of the historical Jesus research in a global context first by identifying the salient features of this life-oriented “research” among the New Testament Christians themselves in their own time and world; then it attempts a brief survey of how today people in different parts of the world conduct the same life-oriented research and reception of the historical Jesus in their diverse socio-cultural contexts on the basis of their concrete life-experiences and needs.<sup>12</sup> How did the life issues on

---

<sup>10</sup> Jesus’ prayer for his disciples in John 17:21 (that their lives of unity, modeled on that of the Trinity, would persuade the world to believe in him) can be cited as evidence of this observation.

<sup>11</sup> This was started in 1965 by Robert Funk of the Pacific School of Religion, Berkeley, California; see Marcus J. Borg, “Portraits of Jesus in Contemporary North American Scholarship,” HTR 84 (1992): 1–22; Robert W. Funk, Honest to Jesus: Jesus for a New Millennium (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1996); Robert W. Funk, ed., The Acts of Jesus: What Did Jesus Really Do? The Search for the Authentic Deeds of Jesus (San Francisco: HarperCollins).

<sup>12</sup> In my previous study on “The Global Jesus” (n. 9 above), I attempted a survey of the reception of the historical Jesus in major historical epochs. Here, I concentrate only on the New Testament era, as a foundational era, and on our own era.

the ground and the diverse intentions/interests of the New Testament authors fashion and condition their understanding and proclamation of the historical Jesus? If the gospels, and New Testament generally, summatively see Jesus as the Savior of the World (cf. John 4:42), God's lamb "who takes away the sin of the world" (John 1:29), God's good news to the poor and marginalized and agent in granting a general amnesty (Luke 4:18–19) and reconciling the world to the divine self (2 Cor 5:19), how today do peoples in diverse cultural settings view this same historical Jesus? What motivates, conditions and even delimits their interpretations of the historical Jesus they receive through the canonical gospels? Two basic principles guide this study. First it posits that the global Jesus research from a global cultural perspective goes back to the New Testament itself; and second that the process by which the historical Jesus is received in this historical research both in the New Testament and today is the exact opposite of what obtains in secular exploitative and capitalist globalization.

2. The Historical Jesus Research in the New Testament

Interest in the historical Jesus in the New Testament seems to have been initiated by Jesus himself, according to the synoptic tradition, when he asked his disciples at Caesarea Philippi: "Who do people say the son of man is? . . . But who do you say that I am?" (Matt 16:13, 16).<sup>13</sup> Jesus was physically present with his disciples and the people, yet he felt the question about his identity needed to be openly raised and discussed. The disciples seem to have been the only ones who had no previous thought about his identity apart from seeing him as Rabbi, Master, teacher, though some, in the Johannine tradition, saw him as the one "of whom Moses in the law and also the prophets wrote" (John 1:45) or, in a rare confession, as "the Christ, the Son of God, he who is coming into the world" (11:27).<sup>14</sup> Yet even this designation <sup>13</sup> See also Mark 8:27, 29; Luke 9:18, 20. Unlike Matthew, Mark and Luke both have "that I am?" in both questions.

<sup>14</sup> John here incredibly places on the lips of Martha, a woman, confession of the faith, which inspires and undergirds his entire Gospel (John 20:30–31). See further on this, Teresa Okure, The Johannine Approach to Mission: A Contextual Study of John 4:1–42, WUNT 2.31 (Tübingen: Mohr [Paul Siebeck], 1988), 246–248; eadem, "John," in International Bible Commentary: A Catholic and Ecumenical Resource for the Twenty-First Century, ed. William R. Farmer et al. (Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1998), 1438–1502, esp. 1482.

had a problem, since the Christ was to come from Bethlehem in Judea, not from Nazareth in Galilee, a village from which no good could come and a region which never produced a prophet, not to mention the Messiah (John 1:46; 7:52). The people's answers to Jesus' question ("John the Baptist, Elijah or one of the prophets") reveal the different receptive frames his audience used to view him and the hopes they reposed on him.

The question of Jesus' identity raised at Caesarea Philippi may seem irrelevant in a discourse on the historical Jesus research; but this is not so.<sup>15</sup> Normally, how we view a person determines the value or worth we attach to their words and deeds. Third world women, especially from sub-Saharan Africa, experience this regularly. Often, a groundbreaking idea from such scholars may fail to command the attention of the academic world. But if a "better placed" scholar ("better" in terms of sex, race, class and geographical location) picks up the same idea, gives it a new name and presents it to the academic world, then the idea receives great attention and generates much discussion in the field. Records of what Jesus said and did and how this was received depended largely on how his contemporaries viewed him. Scholars are perhaps right that the disciples themselves did not think much of him till after the resurrection. Emphasis on the post-Easter faith as coloring the gospel accounts of Jesus is no new discovery; the gospels themselves testify the same. Only after Jesus had risen from the dead did they remember some of the things he had told them and learned to believe in him (cf. John 2:22). Years later they committed to writing only a tiny selection of what he said and did (John 20:30–31; 21:25).

If this is the reality about the historical Jesus research in our primary sources, our contemporary research on the same cannot hope to fare better.<sup>16</sup> Awareness of this keeps us realistic and radically humble about the results of such research (a term that has replaced "quest" in the earlier researches). What we can hope to discover is the historical Jesus, portrayed conjointly by the faith communities of Matthew, Mark, Luke, John and Paul. For besides sharing bread and other possessions in common, the early Christians also held in common their faith-based and interpreted knowledge about Jesus, added to it in the process and passed it on, depending on their receptive frames and the situation on the ground, all for stereological reasons. No research for the historical Jesus is or has ever been neutral and objective. This is particularly true of the Jesus Seminar mentioned earlier. It has been observed, for instance, that the historical Jesus issue today is an obsession of first world white male scholars. Is there behind it a search for a male historical Jesus who would validate the white male self?<sup>17</sup> Awareness of the inevitable personal interest of the researcher in the research is as sobering as it is liberating. Once this truth is openly acknowledged, the historical Jesus research will not thereby end but will rather come truly into its own, as each researcher, in each generation, seeks to make a life-giving encounter with the living historical Jesus of the gospels who wants to continue to live in his brothers and sisters believers.

---

<sup>15</sup> For further discussion on the issue, see Francis Watson, "The Quest for the Real Jesus", in Cambridge Companion to Jesus, ed. Bockmuehl, 156–169, esp. 163.

<sup>16</sup> James Carlton Paget, for instance ("Quests for the Historical Jesus", in Cambridge Companion to Jesus, ed. Bockmuehl, 138–155), asks whether "we know more about the historical Jesus than our forebears" and answers in the negative (150).

3. Salient Features of the Global Jesus Research in the New Testament

The historical Jesus research in the New Testament seems to have started around Jesus' resurrection, the core of New Testament faith. Some scholars believe the problem about the resurrection in Corinth included doubt in Jesus' own resurrection, not only the resurrection of dead Christians. Equally, Thomas's doubt, when told that Jesus had indeed risen and appeared to Simon, and Jesus' response to it a week later (John 20:24–26), are often interpreted as being calculated towards addressing doubt about Jesus' resurrection in the Johannine and other early Christian communities. This is understandable, for Jesus' resurrection was not just one belief among others concerning the historical Jesus. It was the bedrock of their faith and life. If Jesus was not raised from the dead, then the entire Christian kerygma, faith and life (which had their rationale and raison d'être in his resurrection) were useless; worse still, God was implicated (1 Cor 15:12–19). If Jesus' resurrection is not an historical fact, other facts about him (that he lived, taught, died, was buried) lose their meaning. Indeed not only the early Christian kerygma and life stand or fall by this truth; biblical scholarship itself and the Christian faith of the past 2,000 years are equally a sham. Awareness that Jesus did not simply die and rise from the dead in the first century CE for the first-century Christians, but that he lives on physically in every age, in his own person and in the lives of authentic believers (Paul, Priscilla, Teresa of Avila, Mother Teresa of Calcutta, Francis of Assisi, John Paul II, and in each living committed Christian of today) forms an integral part of the global reception (a more appropriate term perhaps than research) of the New Testament faith in the historical Jesus on the part of committed Christians.

---

<sup>17</sup> Nicole Wilkenson Duran, "Jesus: A Western Perspective", in GBC, 346–349, esp. 346 where she asks, "Why are western male scholars and virtually no others drawn to this project? What are they looking to define, in defining the historical Jesus over and over again, each in his own way?" Similarly, Scott M. Lewis (What Are They Saying about New Testament Apocalyptic [New York/Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 2004], 9) remarks that Schweitzer's "haunting portrayal of the meaning and mission of Jesus could well be used to describe his own life."

The life-oriented nature of the New Testament witness about Jesus requires that particular attention be paid to how New Testament authors and their addressees used their diverse cultural frames of reference to receive, interpret, understand, articulate, proclaim and transmit (first orally and later in writing) their knowledge of the historical Jesus. The process by which Jesus of Nazareth becomes progressively and increasingly global (the process by which he is proclaimed, encountered, received, and transmitted in diverse world cultures) differs radically from that which governs contemporary secular globalization. Secular globalization tends to make global by imposition what was originally local in nature (e.g., individualism, corruption, terrorism, militarism, sex tourism) and in the process subsumes and eventually destroys the local.<sup>18</sup> The globalization of Jesus, on the contrary, tends to enlarge and enrich what was originally local with the norms and values of the new locality and cultures to which it moves; in the process, the new cultures may even replace the original with their own norms and concepts. This happens wherever the proclamation of Jesus, God's gospel, spreads. The New Testament authors had their own type of secular globalization, Hellenism. Alexander's unique contribution, perhaps, lay in making Greek the lingua franca of the empire, thus providing a major linguistic tool and cultural framework for the spread of the gospel from Palestine (a predominantly Jewish milieu) to the Hellenistic-Roman world. As the gospel moved out of the Jewish matrix, it encountered other cultures and belief systems with which it needed to interact and evangelize. In the process, it developed its own new language for understanding Jesus of Nazareth (the historical Jesus) in that global cultural context. That Greek replaced Aramaic as extant New Testament language (arguably the dominant language Jesus used), is an outstanding example of this.<sup>19</sup> Vestiges of this original language are found in such gospel sayings as talitha koum/i (Mark 5:41) and eloi eloi lama sabachthani (Mark 15:34), which interested researchers treasure as germs of the ipsissima verba of Jesus.

---

<sup>18</sup> See further, T. Okure, "Africa: Globalisation and the Loss of Cultural Identity," in Globalisation and Its Victims, ed. Jon Sobrino and Felix Wilfred, Concilium 2001.5 (London: SCM, 2001), 67-74.

The historical Jesus preached in Palestine in a largely Jewish context wore new clothes and put on a new face when he moved into the Hellenistic-Jewish and Greco-Roman World. Some of the more prominent Hellenistic titles given to him include Logos (Divine Word and Reason), Sophia (Widom), the New Humanity (Adam) and the First Born of All Creation (prōtotokos pasēs ktiseōs).<sup>20</sup> He has done the same ever since, though some scholars hold that the Christian message, having passed from the Jewish to the Hellenistic-Jewish milieu, remained essentially the same till after the Second Vatican Council, when it became open once more to other cultures and became for the first time truly a world religion.<sup>21</sup> In this ever-evolving process, the person of historical Jesus remains constant and unchanged. Yet this constancy of his historical person embodies within its very scope the necessity for each generation and culture to accept and embrace it according to its own norms and values. The Pentecost event (Acts 2) where each nation under heaven heard the great works of God proclaimed in their own mother tongue confirms this. This process is essentially that of inculturation, modeled on the incarnation, understood as a “self-emptying and selective assumption.” The culture that embraces the gospel needs a self-emptying of what is contrary to Jesus of Nazareth and an assumption of gospel values that are authentically of the historical Jesus. At

---

<sup>19</sup> Jesus’ rootedness in his Jewish culture and the influence of this is well brought out by Brad Young, Jesus the Jewish Theologian (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publishers, 1995; fourth reprint, 1999), and in the four-volume work by John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus (New York: Doubleday, 1999–2009).

<sup>20</sup> I discussed this in some detail in “The Global Jesus,” 241–242.

<sup>21</sup> See, for instance, Virgil Elizondo, “The Emergence of a World Church and the Irruption of the Poor,” in The Twentieth Century: A Theological Overview, ed. Gregory Baum (Maryknoll: Orbis Books, 1999), 104–107 and the literature cited in the work.

the same time, the culture is free to discard those elements in the proclamation that have their roots in the unredeemed cultures of the New Testament authors and use those that have gospel values, what Eusebius would call “seeds of the word” (sperma verbi). This process of inculturation is not an invention of African or third world theologians. It is an indispensable process in the proclamation of the gospel or the historical Jesus.<sup>22</sup> Indeed for the Catholic Church, it is impossible to plant the gospel firmly in any culture at any age without this process of inculturation, understood as “the intimate transformation of authentic cultural values through their integration in Christianity and the insertion of Christianity in the various human cultures.”<sup>23</sup>

4. The Global Jesus Research in the Canonical Gospels

The gospels themselves give evidence of this ever-expanding understanding of the person and mission of the historical Jesus even at the level of Jesus, during his lifetime. A striking example is Matthew’s Gospel. Here Jesus at first understood his mission as being “only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel” (Matt 15:2), an understanding reiterated in the sending of the Twelve (Matt 10:5–6). But after his encounter with the Syrophenician woman and her invincible faith (Matt 15:21–28), he seems to have reached out to Gentiles. By the end the gospel, his concern to include the Gentiles of all times and ages becomes an essential aspect of his gospel mission and takes the form of the Great Commission, “Go therefore, make disciples of all nations” (Matt 28:19). In other words, they are to tell all peoples of all ages without exception about God’s good news of their liberation and invite them to appropriate this as disciples—those who live the same kind of self-giving life as Jesus did (and ultimately as God does). As

---

<sup>22</sup> See further Teresa Okure, “Inculturation: Biblical Theological Bases,” in T. Okure, Paul van Thiel, et al., 32 Articles Evaluating the Inculturation of Christianity in Africa, Spearhead 112–114 (Eldoret: AMECEA Gaba Publications, n.d.), 55–88.

<sup>23</sup> Second Extraordinary Assembly of Bishops (December 7, 1985), Final Report, II, C, 6, cited in John Paul II, Redemptoris Missio, no. 52.2. Indeed, the literature on this topic is legion. It includes Ad Gentes of the Second Vatican Council and Evangelii Nuntiandi of Paul VI. An easy reference to these works can be found in the footnotes of Redemptoris Missio, especially in the section “Inculturating the Gospel in people’s culture,” nos. 52–54, in J. Michael Miller, (with Notes and Introductions), The Encyclicals of John Paul II (Huntington, IN: Our Sunday Visitor, 1996), 537–540.

Emmanuel, God with us, with humanity, he enables this life to happen among believers, in whom he also lives.

Luke's process of globalizing the historical Jesus differs from Matthew's. The process may be termed "his hermeneutic of self-inclusion" (his transformation of a local christology into a universal one and his reinterpretation of the Jesus traditions to include himself and his gentile friends while not excluding the Jews).<sup>24</sup> Indicators of this self-inclusion are many and diverse. Here we examine three. First, he studies the available historical resources and interviews the witnesses and ministers of the word, then highlights in his own account those aspects and encounters of the historical Jesus that were of no interest to mainstream Jewish Christians but were crucial to him and his predominantly Gentile audience. Critics have long noted, for example, his leaning towards the marginalized, and social and moral outcasts (women, Samaritans, tax collectors). Though some feminist scholars lately interpret his inclusion of women negatively (that Luke subjugates women rather than liberates them, especially in the incident of Martha and Mary), the very fact that these women are mentioned as following Jesus publicly in his evangelizing tours of the villages of Galilee (some of them married women like Joanna the wife of Herod's steward, Chuza), is sufficient indication of the cultural breakthrough that the Lukan Jesus brought to women in his time. These women follow him not only through the towns and villages of Galilee, but in his great missionary journey (Luke 9:51) from Galilee to Jerusalem where they emerge at the Passion and Resurrection as "the women who had come up with him from Galilee" and became the first witnesses and heralds of the resurrection (Luke 23:55; 24:1-11).

Is this cultural and theological breakthrough a Lukan invention or an action of the historical Jesus, which gives insight into his counter-cultural life-style and mission in his own culture? Where do we begin and end in our quest of the historical Jesus in this context? How is it that Matthew, reputed to be the most Jewish of the gospels, does not mention the women except at the resurrection episode? Whatever the case, the presence of the women in Luke's Gospel alongside their men counterparts, the Twelve, shows Luke's interest to include them and present them. He gave them a visibility which New Testament scholarship hardly noticed till the advent of women scholars into the field. The interpreter, the interests and the interpretative frames of reference used are all very much part of the historical Jesus research.

---

<sup>24</sup> See Teresa Okure, "Who do you say that I am?' 'The Christ of God'", in Cristologia e Missione oggi. Atti del Congresso Internazionale di Missiologia, Roma 17-20 ottobre 2000, ed. G. Colzani, P. Giglioli, and S. Karotemprel (Vatican City: Urbaniana University Press, 2001), 267-279, esp. 269.

Luke's second strategy in his historical Jesus research lies in his account of Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi. Unlike the Matthean Peter who confesses him as "the Christ" (the Messiah, and in this context the reference is to the Jewish Messiah), Luke identifies him as "the Christ of God." By this designation Luke moves Jesus beyond being merely a Jewish Messiah to seeing him in his own way as God's Messiah for everybody. He does the same with Jesus' genealogy, extending this to "Son of Adam, Son of God" where none can be excluded, whereas Matthew simply terminates his genealogy with the proto-ancestor of the Jewish nation "Son of Abraham." In the infancy narrative, while an angel announces the birth of Jesus to Jewish shepherds, a multitude of the heavenly host proclaim "peace among people" with whom God is pleased, or of goodwill (Luke 2:14) everywhere, understood. The Matthean account on the contrary focuses on Jesus as the one who would "save his people from their sins" (Matt 1:21). Which of these versions gives the correct account of the life of the historical Jesus or of what Peter at Caesarea and the angel at Jesus' birth said? A plausible interpretation is that each evangelist tailored his understanding of the "events which happened among [them]" according to their life concerns at the time of writing and those of their immediate audience. Both give us insight into the historical Jesus research in a global/universal context even in the New Testament era. It would be a mistake, if we take their perspective seriously, to dismiss one as being historical and the other not.

Luke's third method of his globalizing Jesus occurs in the second volume of his work. At Pentecost, the disciples in the Upper Room were "all Galileans" (Acts 2:7), and presumably would have spoken Aramaic as their mother tongue. The global community ("from every nation under heaven," v. 5), however, heard, experienced and received the event in their own mother tongues. What they heard challenged them to move beyond useless arguments (whether or not the disciples had had their fill of new wine), to ask the life-giving question for themselves: "Brethren, what shall we do?" (v. 37). In the end, they repented, were baptized, received the Holy Spirit, joined the nascent community and became themselves testimonies to the effectiveness of the life of the historical Jesus of Nazareth, who lived and died for them

(vv. 41–46). In Acts 1:8, Jesus asks his disciples to be his witnesses “to the ends of the earth.” Not stopping there, Luke moves the seat of Christianity progressively from Jerusalem to Rome, the capital of the then worldwide empire. At the same time, he moves the focus on the leadership of the church from Peter and James in Jerusalem to Paul the Apostle of the Gentiles in Rome, in whose camp Luke himself belongs. In Rome, Paul gains full freedom to proclaim the gospel unhindered by anybody (Acts 28:31), though we know from history that Paul was martyred about 63 CE in the persecution of Nero for preaching this same gospel. Luke’s approach in globalizing Jesus is thus the very reverse of modern secular globalization.

After narrating the event of Pentecost (which embraced peoples from “every nation under heaven,” Acts 2:5), Luke still felt the need to report a Gentile Pentecost in the house of Cornelius as a distinct event (Acts 10). Yet the more general one in Acts 2 had a universal scope. Peter, using the prophecy of Joel (3:1–5; Acts 2:17–21), explained this event as God’s baptism of the earth with fire.<sup>25</sup> Luke’s point in narrating this exclusively Gentile Pentecost seems to be, not that Gentiles were not included in the first one, but that Peter as leader of the church needed to become fully aware of the scope of his own previous interpretation of the first Pentecost, that God’s gift of the Holy Spirit embraced everybody regardless of race, sex, class and age. He needed to become personally (not just theologically) aware of the truth that God has no favorites (Acts 10:34–35), since he witnessed God give the Gentiles exactly the same Holy Spirit as he gave to the Jews. His first-hand experience of the Gentile Pentecost served as his preparation for leading the universal church forward when the question of the inclusion of the Gentiles became an ecclesiastical and canonical affair (Acts 15). By narrating this experience at the Council (Acts 15:7–11), he was able to persuade the assembled church to decide by a decree to admit Gentiles to full membership without requiring that they first become Jews by being circumcised. The struggle of the early church on the inclusion of the Gentiles was itself a struggle to make the historical Jesus they proclaimed relevant in their lives.

---

<sup>25</sup> See further on this, Teresa Okure, ed., To Cast Fire Upon the Earth: Bible and Mission Collaborating in Today’s Multicultural Global Context (Pietermaritzburg: Cluster Publications, 2000), 5–6.

The most significant Johannine parallel to Jesus' move from the Jewish into the Gentile, global community is perhaps the episode of his encounter with the Samaritan woman (John 4:1–42). Here, the woman also becomes the bearer of the good news of Jesus as the Christ to the Samaritans who, in turn, confess him as the global Jesus or “Savior of the World” (John 4:42). This distinctively Johannine version of his global Jesus research is to be taken along with his marked emphasis on the universal nature of the incarnation and mission of the God-Word: that the Word became a human being (ho logos sarx egeneto, where sarx in biblical language refers to the human as opposed to the divine [cf., Isa 40:6, MT]) and lived among us (John 1:14), and that acceptance of him knows no racial or gender bounds. His key recurrent phrases here are pas ho (“all” or “anybody who”), and ean tis (“if anyone”) (e.g., John 14:22–23 where Judas not Iscariot asks Jesus why he will reveal himself to the disciples only and not to the world).

To these emphases may be added those passages where Jesus promises to draw all to himself (12:32); where the gospel states that God loved the world to the extent of sending the uniquely beloved son to redeem it (3:16); that Jesus died not only for the nation but to gather together all God's scattered children (11:52); and that Jesus saw the advent of the Greeks to him as the signal of the arrival of his long awaited hour (12:20–23). Another Johannine indicator occurs in the prologue (1:1–14) where the evangelist dresses up the Jewish concept of Wisdom (sophia), the divine principle of creation, with the clothes of the Greek logos (panta di'autou egeneto; 1:3; Prov 8:22; Wis 9:1) whose mission is to enlighten every human being (ho phōtizei panta anthrōpon). His frequent use of pas ho is neutral in terms of race, sex, class, age and geographical location. Ironically, this Johannine emphasis on the universality of Jesus' mission exists alongside what appears to be his marked or negative attitude towards the world. This apparent contradiction, found mostly in the farewell discourses which scholars see as written under persecution of the Johannine community, is evidence that the gospel accounts of Jesus are by no means neutral but are determined by the total situation of the audience on the ground.

Is the Johannine portrait of Jesus, like that of Luke, therefore less historical than that of Matthew's, which focuses more on the Jewish nature of Jesus? Scholars are becoming increasingly aware that John's Gospel is as equally Jewish, if not more Jewish than the synoptics. Jewish scholars cite John as evidence of aspects of Jewish life and practice in the first century. Moreover, for John, Jesus is not merely the Savior of the World or a Jewish Messiah. As the monogenēs theos (1.18, according to some MSS) and hyios tou theou, he reveals God absolutely and exclusively, so that true or full knowledge of God by anybody in any age is impossible apart from him. Accordingly, he alone has the key to gaining true knowledge of God (John 17:4). Whether one believes/accepts or rejects this Johannine faith-based testimony is a question which lies outside the interest of this study. The point is that this faith is integral to the Johannine portrait of the historical Jesus in a global perspective. Are we, therefore, asking the right question when we seek to know which of the gospel narratives gives us the true account of the historical Jesus as proclaimed?

5. The Research into the Historical Jesus in Paul

Other articles in this book treat the historical Jesus research from the Pauline position. Our interest, however, is to examine how Paul, a Pharisee of Pharisees, carried out the globalization of Jesus in his own life and mission, and the forces which shaped his approach. Paul, more than any New Testament author, perhaps best substantiates the thesis of this study that the historicity of Jesus on the global cultural level is placed on the disciples who accept and make him part of the organizing principle of their own lives. Though Paul did not meet the historical Jesus (the Christ “according to the flesh,” 2 Cor 5:16), he nevertheless claimed to have seen himself in a way that qualified him to be a witness to his resurrection (1 Cor 15:8). According to the three Lukan accounts of his conversion (Acts 9:1–29; 22:3–21; 26:9–20), Paul did not actually see Jesus. He only saw a light and heard a voice. But Paul claimed by that experience to have seen the risen Lord in much the same way as the disciples who knew him during his lifetime.

When Paul found the historical Jesus, he also found his own true and authentic life and worth: “Life to me means Christ.” “All I want is to know Christ Jesus and be given a place in him.” “I count everything as loss because of the surpassing worth” or supreme privilege “of knowing Christ Jesus my Lord.” If only “I may gain Christ and be given a place in him” (Phil 3:7–8). He bequeathed or wished the same privilege for his converts: “When anyone is in Christ that person is a new creation” (2 Cor 5:17). All who are “baptized in Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Gentile, slave nor free, male and female. For you are all one in Christ Jesus” (Gal 3:27–28); in other words, for one who is in Christ, there is no longer racism, classism or sexism. In the light of that finding, he realized the need to radically revise his own prejudiced socio-cultural and theological upbringing, encapsulated in his attitude towards those the culture regarded as “Gentile sinners” (Gal 3:15).

The rereading led him to go beyond exclusivist election (that the Messiah was for Jews only and that any who wished to have a place in him needed to become Jews) to recognizing that God’s promise given to Abraham as pure grace embraced the whole of humanity. That is not all: Paul, seeing with the lenses of Christ, was able to realize that both Jew and Gentile stood equal before God as sinners, and the claim that the Jews were better off because they had the law and the covenant was simply false: “All have sinned and fallen short of God’s glory,” the Jews through the law of the covenant, the Gentiles through the law of conscience (Rom 3:23). Both are therefore justified by “God’s grace as a free gift, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus, whom God put forth forward as an expiation by his blood” (vv. 24–25). While maintaining equally firmly that God had not rejected his people, Paul recognized that God was not bound to subscribe to his people’s misunderstanding of the purpose and dynamics of their divine election and covenant.

Paul did not develop these theses through abstract reflection in a library. When faced with flesh and blood believers like himself, whom he baptized and won for Christ, he had to make room in himself for these other peoples if his belief that both of them were equally in Christ was to be taken seriously. That belief gave him the physical, psychic and spiritual energy to proclaim to all and sundry that Jesus of Nazareth, sprung from the race of David according to the flesh (Rom 1:2–4), was indeed God’s universal gospel offered to all without discrimination or prejudice. He was not ashamed of that gospel. Instead, he was prepared to die, and actually did die for that gospel in the persecution of Nero in Rome (ca. 65 CE).

Paul’s perception of the historical Jesus led him also to cosmological reconciliation. The meaning of the historical Jesus signified a transformation of the fate of creation as well as of humanity. The entire creation is groaning in one great act of giving birth to become a new heaven and a new earth, just as humanity is waiting for the revelation of God’s children; since all died in the first Adam all will be made alive in the second Adam, Jesus (1 Cor 15:22). That some Jews refused to recognize Jesus as the expected Messiah in no way diminished Jesus’ universality for all peoples and creation. In the Pauline Colossians, the reconciliation embraces the entire creation, “everything in heaven and everything on earth.” This reconciliation is done, not through the Christ of faith, but through the historical Jesus: “making peace by the blood of his cross” (Col 1:20). Paul’s attachment to the historical Jesus as the basis of all his theologizing, proclamation of the gospel and personal life lies perhaps in his perception of the redemptive meaning of the cross of Christ.

Paul did not gain this insight into Christ’s cross and sufferings through abstract reflection. He personally carried in his body the sufferings of Jesus, and so knew from experience the liberating nature of Christ’s suffering (cf. 2 Cor 11:23–32). He realized that his own suffering too had a redemptive value, that it helped him to complete in his “flesh” what still needed to be experienced in the suffering Christ “for the sake of his body, the church” (Col 1:24). Consequently, he wanted to boast of nothing except the cross of Christ, through which the world stood crucified to him and he to the world. For him, the exaltation and divinization of Jesus embraces that of the believer, irrespective of race, sex and class. This emerges polemically in the letter to the Colossians. The polemical tone suggests again that a problem of the audience about principalities and powers, perhaps a nascent Gnostic teaching about the plērōma, gave rise to his designation of the historical Jesus globally as the one in whom “the plērōma of the deity dwells bodily” (sōmatikōs, Col 1:9).

The first formative influence on Paul’s all-inclusive approach to the historical Jesus goes back to his first encounter with the risen Jesus on the way to Damascus. “Who are you Lord?” ... “I am Jesus whom you are persecuting” (Acts 9:5). Actually, Paul was not persecuting Jesus, but followers of the Way, men, women and children. Yet here the risen Jesus made it plain that he identifies himself with these different classes of people who believe in him: “I am Jesus whom you are persecuting.” This identification is not only with individuals, but also with the entire believing community, “the followers of the Way.” Paul would later return to this in his letter to the Corinthians, where he sees the believing community as the Body of Christ with different members and functions (1 Corinthians 12).

His second formative experience lay in the obstacles and strong opposition he encountered in proclaiming the gospel to the Gentiles without first requiring that they became Jews, a task mission he claimed he received directly from God and Christ, not from human beings. In his case the common saying was true, "Obstacles are there to be overcome." Paul did not simply overcome the obstacle posed by the Judaizers among and outside the believers. The experience enabled him to grow in his knowledge and insight into the person of Jesus and his own place in him along with others. As I said earlier, Paul's research into the historical Jesus called and challenged him to place his own life history, past present and future, in Jesus' own life and to persuade his converts to do the same. His ensuing theologies of grace, salvation, sin and Jew/Gentile relation grew from these two basic insights into the historical Jesus: namely, the ontological equality of all human beings before God, and on the level of grace. God has no favorites, but treats all equally. "God was in Christ reconciling the world to the divine self" (2 Cor 5:19). All in all, Paul's theology and life are inseparably rooted in that of the historical Jesus, though he recognizes that after the resurrection this historical Jesus transcends the boundaries of Jewish race and Messianic expectation. The transcendence does not diminish the value of the historical Jesus. On the contrary, it makes him accessible to peoples of all cultures and locations, thereby bringing out clearly his true meaning and nature: that of his being God's gospel for humanity and the entire creation.

This New Testament evidence is not exhaustive either in the individual cases examined or in the perspective of the entire collection. But one point establishes itself across the board, namely, that the globalization of the historical research arose in the context of faith life and as an effort to claim his graces for the self and relate intimately to him using concepts familiar or meaningful to the researcher; and allowing the concrete faith struggles and obstacles to deepen one's understanding of the global significance of Jesus. Every search for the historical Jesus, like all theology, is rooted in life in one way or the other. Even this current book is occasioned by the diverse questions raised, especially in western academia, concerning the historical Jesus. The New Testament witnesses examined here give concerted witness that whatever else one might say, the historical Jesus for them was a person who lived in the particular time, culture, race and nation, a fullness of life in a way that his life had radical and irreversible significance for them, for the whole of humanity and for creation. Today's faith-filled researchers of the historical Jesus do the same, using their own cultural frames of reference, life questions and concerns to articulate and embrace who the historical Jesus means for them and their world.

6. Historical Jesus Research in Today's Global Cultural Context

If the view is right that after the Second Vatican Council for the first time in history, Christianity moved from being a largely Hellenistic-Jewish religion to becoming a world religion, nowhere is this more true than in the historical Jesus research in global context, as understood in this study, namely, efforts of committed Christians to appropriate Jesus and relate his meaning to their lives and world. The name, Jesus, fundamentally means Savior (Hebrew Yeshua, Matt 1:21). If it is accepted that recipients of the good news of Jesus of Nazareth are themselves part of the historical Jesus research, when this research is placed within the optic and scope of biblical revelation, then such research requires us to observe how Christians today continue the process of receiving (hearing the proclamation), accepting (believing), appropriating (living according to the Christ received), and transmitting (proclaiming) this same historical Jesus. As noted in a previous study already cited (note 9 above), this type of search for the historical Jesus is as rich and diversified as are believers worldwide. Recipients/researches span race, color, sex, age, profession and so forth. Without repeating the findings of this previous study, this current study focuses on the more recent works (of a survey kind) on the topic.

The global literature on the topic is vast and ever expanding.<sup>26</sup> Comprehensively, the historical Jesus research in our contemporary world lies in the sustained efforts of believers of all persuasions, walks of life and socio-cultural and geographical locations to articulate for themselves what Jesus of Nazareth, proclaimed as the risen Christ, means for them. This research is perhaps more intensive in the two-thirds or developing world than in the first and industrialized world. The Jesus movement in the gospel itself was basically a grassroots movement whereby the poor and marginalized of society found in him a champion and advocate for their cause. He was their prophet, teacher and expected Messiah/Son of David. He not only told them the kingdom of God belonged to such as them (cf. the Beatitudes), but chided their leaders for exploiting and oppressing them in the name of God and of religion (Matthew 23) and swallowing widows' properties under cover of their long prayers (Luke 12:40). In the Beatitudes (Matt 5:3–11), he reversed on their behalf the traditional theology which proclaimed that wealth was a sign of one's good standing before God, a sign that God was with the rich, and that poverty was a sign of lack of holiness on the part of the poor. This theology was so radically new that his disciples were amazed. If the rich could enter heaven only with difficulty, the poor had even a lesser chance of getting there. Jesus of Nazareth met every aspect of their needs and used their humdrum or daily chores to model the kingdom (e.g., a women kneading dough; a fisherman casting a net into the sea; a sower sowing seed, etc.). Summatively, he was good news to them, one who liberated them from all kinds of oppression and diseases and proclaimed God's reign to them.

---

<sup>26</sup> One may cite such works as The Cambridge Companion to Jesus, already referred to many times in this work (e.g., n. 9); Kelly Brown Douglas, The Black Christ (Maryknoll: Orbis, 1994); and with a pardonable leaning for works in African context: Mercy Amba Oduyoye and Musimbi Kanyoro, eds., The Will to Arise: Women, Tradition and the Church in Africa (Maryknoll: Orbis Books, 1992); J. N. K. Mugambi and Laurenti Magesa, eds., Jesus in African Christianity: Experimentation and Diversity in African Christology, African Christianity Series (Nairobi: Initiatives Ltd., 1989); John S. Pobee, "Jesus Christ—the Life of the World: An African Perspective," Ministerial Formation 21 (1983): 5–64; Diane B. Stinton, Jesus of Africa: Voices of Contemporary African Christologies, Faith and Culture Series (Maryknoll: Orbis, 2004), gives a selective survey of some of the significant researches of the historical Jesus by African scholars; "Christologies" in Virginia Fabella and R.S. Sugirtharajah, eds., Dictionary of Third World Theologies (Maryknoll: Orbis, 2000) gives perspectives of the research from global third-world regions; similarly, GBC has entries from the African, Asian, Latin American, Orthodox and Western Perspectives. We will refer to these latter articles in greater detail in this next section of the work.

The research/reception of the proclamation of the historical Jesus follows the same trend in our times, especially in the two-thirds world, as in the time of Jesus. As has been remarked, "The theologies and spiritualities of the developing world represent a significant challenge already to individualistic and historical readings of the believer's relation to Jesus... There are bridges to be built here with the substantial historical resources... if we can overcome both western and modernist snobberies."<sup>27</sup> It is impossible to separate the portrayal of Jesus from the cultural frameworks of the recipient. Once the recipient accepts that Jesus is "the Christ of God," God's universal Messiah, or "God's truly human identity and truly God's human identity,"<sup>28</sup> one cannot but attribute to him concepts and titles in one's culture and spirituality that express hopes for a better life and a better world order. As Jewish recipients mined their scriptures to identify and attribute to

---

<sup>27</sup> Rowan Williams, "A History of Faith in Jesus," in Cambridge Companion to Jesus, ed. Bockmuehl, 220–236, at 234.

<sup>28</sup> Richard Bauckham, "The future of Jesus Christ," in Cambridge Companion to Jesus, ed. Bockmuehl, 265–280, at 275.

Jesus a whole string of designations that were rooted in their Messianic expectation (Isaiah's suffering Servant, Son of David, Messiah, the Prophet who is to come, Rabbi, Teacher, Master, Son of God, Lamb of God and King of Israel), even so do the recipients of the two-thirds world mine their traditions and cultures to find adequate and life-oriented meanings and expressions for him.

A perspective of the poor, the marginalized, the oppressed, the outcasts, those excluded on the basis of sex or color and so forth dominates the research thinking of this two-thirds world: the masses, the unemployed, the socially, economically and politically disadvantaged, the powerless who are considered expendable within the evil social, economic, political and even ecclesiastical systems, except where they serve or are ab/used as a cheap labor force for the rich (both individuals or nations). These poor wear different faces in the different continents and even within the continents, but they suffer basically the same fate. The two-thirds world women figure prominently in these categories of the poor and marginalized, both because they are women and from Africa (this applies mainly to "Black" African women). These poor and marginalized see and seek in Jesus of Nazareth, the historical Jesus, a person who shares their lot personally and who champions their cause on two fronts. First by becoming solidaire with them (though he was rich for our/their sake he became poor to enrich us out of his poverty; 2 Cor 8:9), and secondly by openly confronting and challenging the evil systems that dominate, oppress and exclude them (e.g., Matthew 23). They see Jesus as one who understands them from within, on the basis of his own personal experience of rejection even unto death; one who gives them hope because of his own triumph over the system through his resurrection from the dead, and who promises to liberate those who endure the same fate as he did.

They find courage when they hear Jesus turn their state of poverty into a blessing (a beatitude), making them sure candidates for and models of God's kingdom. Their state of powerlessness makes them more open to receive God's salvation, redemption and transformation as a free gift than are the rich who put their trust in their wealth and have no need of God (like the rich fool, Luke 12:13-21). Jesus reverses the values of the dominant and dominative systems by throwing down the mighty, those who consider themselves to be something, and raising the lowly (cf. the Magnificat, Luke 1:46-55). They are encouraged by his attitude to lepers (social outcasts), Samaritans (racial outcasts) and tax collectors (religious and moral outcasts), prostitutes (sex workers), those stigmatized and blamed for their illness (the woman with the hemorrhage and today those with all kinds of incurable diseases in the two-thirds world), and even zealots (political insurgents) to believe that they too can approach him as they are and find acceptance from and transformation by him.

All this requires faith. Belief in (perhaps a more correct term where the two-thirds world is concerned than research into) the historical Jesus is like a two edged sword. On the one hand, it seeks out and affirms in the culture what enables peoples to understand Jesus better in their own language and terms, while at the same time challenging those values of the cultures that are anti-gospel or anti-Christ in the Johannine sense of the word. This is an integral aspect of inculturation hermeneutics. On the other hand, the research takes a more liberative approach in openly exposing and denouncing the oppressive and exploitative systems and their practices. Jesus himself did this by proclaiming the Beatitudes as the magna carta of his kingdom, while declaring woes to those who staunchly refuse to be transformed and embrace the values of the kingdom.

In Africa's academic sphere, for instance, male scholars see Jesus as the Ancestor (God being the proto-ancestor), Healer (Native Doctor), Elder Brother and African chief. Understandably, Black South African and African American theologians see him as the Black Christ, one with whom they can identify in contra-distinction to the White Christ of their oppressors. If Jesus is what the historical/gospel records portray him to be, one who shared the lives of the poor and the oppressed, and stood up to the system to the point of death, then their historical Jesus needs to be divested of, even liberated from the clothing of the oppressor imposed on him (to domesticate him) and re-clothed with that of the oppressed and marginalized he came to liberate from all kinds of oppression: social (class), cultural (taboos, e.g., about food and ritual purity), and religious (a hypocritical and exploitative worship of God, or a religion that would make a poor widow—by all reckoning the poorest of the poor in Jesus' society—put all she had to live on into the temple treasury [Mark 12:41–44] or that would use the pretext of prayers to appropriate the property of widows). Restoration of the land, an underlying jubilee motif in Jesus' proclamation of a general amnesty to all (Luke 4:18–19) offers a spiritual energy for standing up against the usurpation of the majority by a minority elite (as in apartheid South Africa), or the forced eviction of the poor from their lands by unscrupulous rich citizens and governments.

African women theologians see Jesus essentially as a liberator, an instrument of God's justice. Justice here is understood not only in terms of retributive justice (giving to another what is his or her due), but also more especially as moral "truth in relationship," the truth being that all human beings are created equal in God's image and likeness, and that as the 1948 United Nations' Universal Declaration on Human Rights posits, nobody is to be discriminated against on the basis of sex, race, color or religion. More significantly, African women theologians see Jesus as a nurturer of life, one who enables, empowers and gives them courage and authority to take up their lives and live, break with the cultural and church taboos that exclude them yet claim support from the Bible (forgetting that the Bible itself contains many unredeemed Jewish cultural practices rooted in patriarchy). As a nurturer of life, Jesus images women and is essentially a Mother. He serves as a mother to men, women and children. His "motherhood is characterized by nourishment, protection of the oppressed, care for the poor, the vulnerable, the oppressed and the marginalized (Mark 10:13–16). The way Jesus relates to people, especially to the disciples shows a warm tenderness, affection, receptivity and a readiness to restore life to an integrated wholeness."<sup>29</sup> Among his works as liberator is liberation of African women from childlessness as happened with Elizabeth in connection with his birth, or even his own miraculous birth from his Mother. As healer, Jesus not only restores wholeness to the sick, the wounded, the broken hearted, but also restores wholeness to creation and to whole communities, especially when he frees people from cultural taboos, like the leper and the woman with the hemorrhage, and reinstates them in the community.

One lacks words to describe the diversity and richness of popular reception of Jesus. The diversity here goes beyond what happens in the academia among both men and women, for the popular sphere knows no bounds between men and women when it comes to discovering and applying images for Jesus. Both theologians (men and women) and the people accept, on the New Testament evidence, that Jesus is unquestionably God. Popular piety, however, tends to appropriate to Jesus what belong to the entire deity. A refrain for the Nicene Creed, for instance, sings: “I believe in one God, Jesus Christ the Only Son of God.” Another chorus sings: “I have a Father that will never, never fail me/ I have a Father that will never, never fail me./ Jesus is my Father that will never, never fail me./ Rock of Ages never, never fails.” Another chorus (original in Ibibio, Nigeria) sings: “Jesus is my good friend,/ I am happy to walk with him./ Never he no play me wayo-o./ I am happy to walk with him.” This rendering is partly in pidgin English. “Wayo” is deception or cheating, though translated into English, it loses much of the emotional hurt caused by the deception as registered by wayo. Secondly, what is translated “Good Friend” in English is “Lover” (Ama ami, one who loves me and whom I love) in the original Ibibio. “Ama ami” has a warmth, tenderness, reciprocity and deep respect lacking in the English word “lover” as used these days. Perhaps it is to avoid the erotic connotations embodied by the English “lover” that the translators instinctively preferred “Good Friend.” Most importantly for the research interests, it is noteworthy that in this and similar choruses (and they are countless), the people do not refer to Jesus as the Christ, but by his life-time, historical name, “Jesus”: Jesus is my good friend, Jesus is my Father, and Jesus is my darling as in another chorus: “Darling Jesus, darling Jesus/ O my darling Jesus you’re a wonderful love./ I love you so my darling Jesus,/ O my darling Jesus you’re a wonderful love.” Only in the chorus of the Creed (with its doctrinal formulation) is Jesus joined to Christ: “Jesus Christ, the only Son of God.”

---

<sup>29</sup> Anne Nasimiyu Wazike, "Jesus: An African Perspective," in GBC, 329–332; see further Mercy Amba Oduyoye, Introducing African Women's Theology, Introductions in Feminist Theology 6 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001), esp. "Jesus the Divine—Human: Christology," 51–65.

This entry hardly does justice to the rich, dynamic and wholly life-centered nature of the reception of the historical Jesus in the richly diversified African cultures. The receptive images used depend on the user’s culture and gender. Interestingly, while men theologians emphasize male images of Jesus—Ancestor, Elder Brother, Chief, Master of Initiation Rites, and so forth—African women emphasize his life-giving, tender, compassionate and life-nurturing roles. Yet within these complexes of readings, whether of women and men theologians or of the people, Jesus as Liberator and Savior informs and inspires the African view of the historical Jesus, be it liberation from oppressive cultural and social practices, liberation from exploitative foreign economic powers, liberation from oppressive and exploitative personal and national economic and political practices or liberation from evil forces (attacks by the devil, people of the underworld, evil spirits, etc.), from hunger, disease, childlessness, unemployment, and so forth. The suffering Jesus is also a staunch friend, perhaps more so than the Jesus of Easter, since the African continent seems to be consigned with him to death all day long, crucified in the world media and by self-serving and unscrupulous leaders with their gang of foreign collaborative thieves who receive, keep and share their loot of their national treasures and natural resources with them.

The same life-centered reception of Jesus applies in Latin America. The region's theology of liberation drew its rationale from Jesus the liberator, while the Exodus from Egypt, the watershed of biblical history, served as its prototype and provided the psychic energy for the theology. However, now that the communist ideology (of a Marxist type) is no longer in vogue, theologians of the region are faced with the challenge to still see Jesus as liberator, not simply in socio-political and economic terms, but also and more especially as the liberator of all human beings from whatever deceives and dehumanizes them. This includes exploitative capitalism, usurpation of the land by multinational companies from the First (or one-third) World, corruption among political leaders of the diverse countries and fear on the part of church leaders to confront the oppressive systems both within and outside the church.

A recent study has highlighted salient points of the research into the historical Jesus in the region.<sup>30</sup> Jesus, according to this study, has many faces in Latin America. The most traditional and popular are: "the child Jesus, the merciful Jesus (the Sacred Heart) and the suffering Jesus." Among the newly appearing faces are "the Indian Jesus, the black Jesus, the Campesino Jesus, the young Jesus (almost a hippie), the revolutionary Jesus (with Che Guevara's face), Jesus interacting with women, the itinerant or charismatic Jesus, Jesus as liberator of the poor, and Jesus confronting the authorities." Similarly, base community Bible studies (el movimiento biblico popular) in the region have highlighted "many faces of the historical Jesus implicit in the gospels." This region's "quest for the historical Jesus" is thus "a joint venture of exegetes with pastoral orientation and community workers with biblical training" (337). While the region appreciates the three faces of the quest in the First World, it is now engaged in its own "fourth search." This search "does not presumptuously claim to supersede the insights of the former quests, as if the goal were to invalidate their results.” It is “rather a constructive effort to use and adapt the best of this First-World research to a different context” (338).

---

<sup>30</sup> Pablo Richard, "Jesus: A Latin American Perspective," in GBC, 337-341. For easier reference, the number of pages in the GBC in this and the next survey from Asia will be entered in the text itself.

Three characteristics of this research are: its being done from the perspective of the poor and the marginalized, its attention to the historical Jesus in the context of the origins of Christianity, and to the historical Jesus understood as a function in the church’s re-formation (338–340). The region is conscious that the re/searches of America and Europe “ignore the social, cultural and religious reality of the Third World.” Thus, while using the best in their research, scholars in the region feel free to focus their search on what promotes and sustains life. It therefore carries out its research of the historical Jesus “from the perspective of the poor, the oppressed, the marginalized by considering the economic, social, political, cultural and religious contexts and the related issues of gender and generation gap.” Summatively, while “behind the scholars of the First World there is a library,” “behind the scholars of the Third world there are continents of poor and marginalized peoples” (338).

The research for the historical Jesus in Asia follows the same life-and-poor-centered orientation.<sup>31</sup> As in Latin America, Abesamis uses “the valid exegetical methods of historical criticism and sociological analysis” to attempt “to offer a biblical reading of Jesus based on how the text presents him.” He does this reading by wearing “‘eyeglasses’ of the poor.” This reading through the eyes of the poor enables one “to see Jesus of the gospels as if for the first time and challenges the traditional views of Jesus and his mission” held by many throughout the world (333). The reading highlights two aspects of Jesus: he is one “connected with the Source, his Abba” and he is also “totally poured out in mission—a mission for total salvation, both human and cosmic. The reading underscores the same fact that the poor and marginalized are closely identified with Jesus; to them he preaches the good news, understood as “nothing more and nothing less than justice and liberation for the poor” (335). The reading brings salvation down to earth as freedom from sin and also “liberation from all evils: personal evil (Jesus restored sick individuals to health), social evil (he blessed the hungry at large) and cosmic evil (he will come again to vanquish all evil cosmic powers” [336]). The salvation which Jesus brings has a socio-economic dimension: "life-blessing, such as food, land, health," as well as a spiritual dimension: "forgiveness of sins and life with God." As in Africa and Latin America, the search for the historical Jesus in the region is rooted in life; it requires that we see this Jesus alive and suffering in the poor and marginalized; but also that "we be charged with hope and divine energy that this same Jesus will defeat all oppressive forces even as he did in his own time by rising from the dead and promising to put an end to evil in his second coming."

---

<sup>31</sup> Carlo Abesamis, “Jesus: An Asian Perspective,” in GBC, 333–336.

Missing in this brief survey is the historical Jesus research from the perspective of women and from other complex cultural contexts of receiving Jesus in Asia, especially that of religious pluralism and the caste system (dalits and free-borns). Works by Asian women theologians draw attention to these dimensions.<sup>32</sup> In a context where women are treated as third-class citizens and denied personhood especially in the context of marriage and the dowry system,<sup>33</sup> the women's reception of the historical Jesus, though firmly rooted in scripture, emboldens them to guard against and resist the use or abuse of Jesus to victimize women. "While we seek in Jesus' passion, death and resurrection a meaning for our own suffering, we cannot passively submit ourselves as women to practices that are ultimately anti-life."<sup>34</sup> It is against the liberating gospel of Jesus to victimize others in his name. The reception of Jesus in the context of interfaith leads people in the region to affirm their own biblical faith in the divinity of Jesus, but at the same time to respect the other religions, some older than Christianity, who make similar claims for their prophets.

Research into the historical Jesus in an Orthodox faith context highlights the humanity and divinity of Christ, based on the cultural tradi-

---

<sup>32</sup> Monica J. Melanchthon, "Asian" under "Christologies," in Dictionary of Third World Theologies, ed. Fabella and Sugirtharaja, 47–50; Virginia Fabella and Sun Ai Lee Park, eds., We Dare to Dream: Doing Theology as Asian Women (Kowloon, Hong Kong: Asian Women's Resource Centre for Culture and Theology, 1989); see especially the articles by Virginia Fabella, "Christology from an Asian Woman's Perspective," 3–14; and Monica Melanchthon, "Christology and Women," 15–23.

<sup>33</sup> In India, for instance, the woman pays the dowry to the husband and for every female child she gives birth to, her family has to bring additional dowry to the husband, so that he may supposedly have enough dowry to pay for her when her time comes to get married or even for his own sisters. Little wonder that baby girls in poor families are at times stuffed to death with rice balls.

<sup>34</sup> Fabella, "Christology from an Asian Women's Perspective," in We dare to Dream, ed. Fabella and Park, 8.

tions of the Greek Fathers.<sup>35</sup> In all that Jesus of Nazareth was, said and did, “he was not only a human being, but also God. He suffered death as a man [sic] but by his resurrection from the dead the real hypostasis of Christ was proved to be not the biological one, but the eschatological or Trinitarian hypostasis.” Since he is a person who exists “in freedom and love,” humans can, thanks to him, “exist and affirm their existence as personal” (345). Thus, while the search appears to be inspired by the pronouncements of the Nicene Creed and such Councils as Chalcedon (451 CE) on the nature and person of Christ as truly God and truly human, it equally explores the implications of these traditional christological affirmations for the individual and the church or community of believers. “The incarnation of the Son of God, his earthly work of proclaiming the gospel, his death on the cross, his resurrection and ascension to be at the right hand of the Father and his second coming are all stages of God’s work for the salvation of the world.” “We confess the Lord Jesus as the Parousia, as the one who comes in the glory of God.” The crowning value of Christ’s life and work for humanity will be the Parousia when everything will be made new (344). Thus, as in the readings from the other marginalized regions already examined, the search for the historical Jesus, though overlaid with inspiration from the creedal formulae of the Greek Fathers, still has its feet firmly planted in the life of Jesus of Nazareth and his significance both for the individual and for humanity.

The search for the historical Jesus in the West, it has been observed, focuses on “the educated, Euro-American Christian elite.”<sup>36</sup> This reading sees the quest for the historical Jesus as mainly a white male undertaking, a western project that is both “theological and ideological.” The research tags the “rejection of Jesus” by American scholars “revolutionary.” To say that Jesus is not western by origin is to admit that this observation disguises “the degree to which Jesus is western historically” for “this Jesus has spent so long in his exile in the West that even when he seeks to return to other parts of the world closer to his original birthplace, he has to do so most often in western ships and planes, western languages, and the pursuit of western interests.” How then can this privileged, westernized Jesus, who is white and elitist, liberate the westerner from his/her sins? This can happen only if the researches into the historical Jesus “speed up the inevitable end of the dominance of [their] Jesus” so that the real Jesus of the gospels discovered by the rest of the world may stand up and liberate the West as well as the whole of humanity from the complex systemic, structural and individual sins.

---

<sup>35</sup> Vasile Milhoc, “Jesus Christ: An Orthodox Perspective,” in GBC, 342–345.

<sup>36</sup> Nicole Wilkenson Duran, “Jesus: A Western Perspective,” in GBC, 346–349.

It was necessary to give some space to these recent and accessible researches into the historical Jesus. Understandably, the reports on the state of the research in these regions are those of individuals (even as is this current study itself) offering a glimpse of what they see happening in their regions on the search of the historical Jesus. Other reviewers might discover other trends in this research for the historical Jesus. Fragmentary as they are, these surveys pinpoint the main directions and areas of concern in the historical Jesus research in a global cultural context. Whatever the cultural situation, one fact clearly emerges from this entire study: that the quest or research of the historical Jesus, from the New Testament times until now, makes little or no sense unless it is related to the life of real men, women and children for whose sake alone the historical Jesus of the gospels, God-Word, became a human being, lived, taught and proclaimed the advent of God’s reign and good news for all and sundry. For proclaiming this good news of salvation and liberation, he was put to death but rose from the dead to prove that evil could never overcome the good, nor hatred, love. “The light shines in darkness and the darkness was unable to overcome it’ (John 1:5).

Perhaps time has come to join in the fifth search for the historical Jesus, already in progress, one whereby every believer will see himself or herself as another Christ in the world, not just ideologically but in spirit and in truth. When, just before his ascension, Jesus asked his disciples to be his witnesses to “the ends of the earth” (Acts 1:8), he was not merely asking them to simply tell peoples and nations about his historical life and teaching, or argue among themselves about what they heard him say; he was telling them above all to model him in their way of living and relating to one another and to all and sundry, so that seeing their lives (as an audio-visual), the world may indeed come to believe that God did send him and that he was in deed and in truth God’s good news to humanity. Seeing him thus alive in the disciples/Christians of today, the world might be drawn to him to receive, in turn, the enduring gift of salvation understood as liberation from all evils: physical, moral, spiritual, political, ecological and economic, and people may themselves experience with the entire creation the glorious liberty of God's children (Rom 8:21). A research into the historical Jesus which ignores or relegates to the background this vital and dynamic aspect of the historical Jesus in the life of believers, loses much of its relevance to Jesus of Nazareth himself and to the researcher.

7. Conclusion?

The study has emphasized that the historical Jesus research in a global cultural context lies not so much in the concern to discover the historical Jesus as he really was in first-century Palestine, but also as he continues to live in believers in every generation worldwide, with focus on the New Testament and our own times. Believers themselves are very much part and parcel of the historical Jesus. They become so through a process of christological globalization (or inculturation) that is radically different from and even opposed to modern, secular globalization. While modern globalization exploits, dominates and destroys the local, the globalization of Jesus on the contrary, in a process of "self-emptying" and "selective assumption" (incarnation-like), seeks and employs ways of enriching, enhancing, perfecting (cleansing) and revitalizing the local. This is perhaps one way of interpreting the dictum of Jesus in John's Gospel that he has come so that people may have life in its fullness, that as the shepherd he lays down his life for his sheep, and that those who believe in him will be able to do even greater things than he.

The focus and approach adopted in this study may not be what the reader expected from a research on the proposed topic, viz. the historical Jesus research in a global cultural context. If so, then this study itself can be seen as evidence of the rich diversity of concerns and expectations which the topic itself generates. Would our research into the historical Jesus assume a different significance and dimension if we focused more on this life-centered aspect of the question just as much as we focus on the need to discover elusive historical facts about him? Might focus on the life of the Christian as a living extension of the historical Jesus (the Body of Christ) put the research of the historical Jesus on a different platform and so help to find an answer to the age-old quests of him? What will the historical Jesus research look like in the third millennium (if the Parousia or the new heaven and new earth do not come by then to put an end to all researches into the historical Jesus question, because by then all will see him as he really is, because all will become like him)?

While the North or West seems bent on and committed to endless “quests” or “research” into the historical Jesus, the South prefers to devote its psychic, intellectual and spiritual energy and resources to the “reception” of this same historical Jesus. Both approaches have the historical Jesus in common. Ultimately, reception is what the historical Jesus himself would prefer from North and South, East and West: “Whoever receives me receives the one who sent me” (Matt 10:40). There is more joy in receiving than in pursuing the historical Jesus. Jesus, God’s Word and Wisdom, would be happy that the research/quests for him that have gone on for over a century now bear fruit in finding him: As Wisdom says, “Finding me is finding life and wins salvation from the Lord.” So Jesus, the power and wisdom of God, proclaims: “I have come so that the [all] may have life and have it in ever greater abundance” (John 10:10), and “at the cost of my own life.” That is the historical Jesus, God’s good news, for all, a person worth looking for and receiving with warm hospitality and love.

DIVERSE AGENDAS AT WORK IN THE JESUS QUEST

CLIVE MARSH

The Quest of the Historical Jesus has never only been about the quest for Jesus. This simple yet significant conclusion is a major legacy of the Quest's history. A reading of the Quest's history as a story of the search for the grail of historical objectivity in the face of the obfuscating irritations of ideology or subjectivity proves both oversimplified and dangerously misleading. However laudable the quest for historical objectivity might have been and be, it remains elusive. Objectivity needs to be respected lest the narratives or pictorial portrayals of Jesus which continue to prove culturally (religiously, socially, ethically and politically) influential lose all connection with the man from Nazareth.<sup>1</sup> Attention to the many "interests" at work alongside the quest for historical objectivity is, however, essential. These interests may not prove of equal weight or be worth commending. But as some of these "interests" might coincide with Jesus' interests, the historical task of narrating the life of this hugely significant figure entails teasing out what interests these might have been, and whether such interests are worth pressing in the way that the story of Jesus itself is written. The historical Quest for Jesus is thus always also an ideological Quest too. How the "agendas" at work within the various quests are to be understood is the focus of this chapter.

In an earlier article, I conducted a survey of the history of the various Quests built on a dissatisfaction with the customary linear Old Quest-No Quest-New Quest-Third Quest account.<sup>2</sup> In identifying nine interlocking Quests I interpreted the Quest's two-century history more thematically than has often been the case.<sup>3</sup> Here I take that approach a stage further. Rather than offering a taxonomy of approaches based on methodological approaches, I cut across the various Quests in search of what appear to be the basic intentions (purposes, drives) of differing contributions to the Quest. This is not a study of "presuppositions." Nor is it a (pseudo-)psychoanalytical attempt to understand contributors better than they understood themselves. Its purpose is to examine the Quests from the point of view of what contributors have been contributing for. Why have people been bothering to find out what Jesus was like? As will become clear, the Quest has always been a hyphenated Quest (a "historico-something else" Quest). For historical research always serves some interest or other. As a continuing chapter in human intellectual history, the Quest should be seen as historical research in the service of the flourishing of humankind and the fostering of better forms of human society, via theology, ethics, politics etc.

---

<sup>1</sup> This is, then, the same conclusion reached by Ernst Troeltsch about the significance of historical research in his social-psychological study of the place of the historical figure of Jesus in Christianity ("The Significance of the Historical Existence of Jesus for Faith," in idem, Writings on Theology and Religion [London: Duckworth, 1977], 182–207), i.e. "Jesus" always inevitably means more than "the Jesus of history" for Christianity, but some link between the two always has to be sought. I in fact press Troeltsch's insight further: "Jesus" as a cultural figure is always more than the "Jesus of history," yet the same need to establish a link between the two applies. Troeltsch's "social psychological law" thus applies not only in theology and religion.

<sup>2</sup> "Quests of the Historical Jesus in New Historicist Perspective," BibInt 5 (1997): 403–447.

The chapter is divided into eight sections. I begin by distilling from the Quest's history seven interweaving agendas that have been at work. In the eighth I take a step back and offer a brief summary of findings. Throughout the chapter I take it as read that every contributor discussed believes they are saying something about Jesus of Nazareth as he was.<sup>4</sup> I offer here no detailed summaries or assessments of their contributions. The "what else?" question constitutes this chapter's main concern.

1. A Theological Agenda

The most prominent agenda at work in the Quest's history has been a theological agenda, usually in a specifically Christian form. Many scholars have sought to clarify the accuracy of the judgment made of

---

<sup>3</sup> The nine Quests identified were: The Positivist Quest, Form 1 (insufficiently ideologically aware, non-eschatological Jesus resulting); The Positivist Quest, Form 2 (insufficiently ideologically aware, eschatological Jesus resulting); The Romantic Quest; The Form-Critical Quest; The Quest of the Non-Jewish Jesus; The Traditio-Historical Quest; The Existentialist Quest; The Jewish Christian Quest and The Postmodern Quest.

<sup>4</sup> In my earlier article I called this the "positivist moment" contained in all contributions to the Quest ("Quests," 416, 426, 432–433).

Jesus that when you have to do with Jesus you are dealing directly with God. The theological agenda has, however, taken many forms.

The contribution of Heinrich Julius Holtzmann (1832–1910) was to ground the two-source theory of the emergence of the canonical gospels (Mark and Q).<sup>5</sup> Though Markan priority had been supported in the work of Wilke and Weisse in the 1830s, Holtzmann's work proved decisive. After the appearance of Holtzmann's Die synoptischen Evangelien: Ihr Ursprung und ihr geschichtlicher Charakter in 1863, orthodox Christians could breathe a sigh of relief that Strauss's scepticism had not destroyed the historical basis of faith. Jesus could be all that faith claimed him to be. It was believed that finding a satisfactory answer to the synoptic problem meant that solid historical evidence about Jesus had been located.

Solving the synoptic problem, of course, meant nothing of the sort. Solving a literary puzzle does not in itself necessarily deliver historically reliable data. Within fifty years, Wrede and the Form Critics, whilst being indebted to Holtzmann's enquiries, would demonstrate this. But the drive to locate historically reliable data, which meant tackling the literary complexity of the best available resources, at least revealed the theological importance of the endeavour.<sup>6</sup> The development of New Testament study as a discipline in the modern period and the needs of the Quest were thus inextricably linked from the start within a theological interest. The theological agenda simply took a literary form.

Theological agendas have, however, taken other forms. The enormous stimulus provided to the Quest by Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976) added an eschatological twist. With an almost evangelistic drive, the urgency of the call of the figure of Jesus to contemporary people reverberates through Bultmann's writings. Bultmann knew that a call to faith could never be dependent on the findings of historians.<sup>7</sup> The theoretical framework within which he located his own quest for Jesus linked ethical responsibility with ultimate demand. Jesus required a response to the Kingdom of God which he proclaimed. Likewise, any

---

<sup>5</sup> Holtzmann believed he could trace a source behind canonical Mark (Urmarkus).

<sup>6</sup> The concern to clarify the best available sources remains alive even in our post-positivist times, as Crossan's work on the stratification of early Christian literary sources makes clear.

<sup>7</sup> Bultmann did, though, recognize that the fact of Jesus having lived (and above all having died on the cross) was theologically necessary.

encounter with the figure of Jesus in the context of Christian proclamation (Kähler's "preached Christ") in turn called for a response which was an answer to an existential question posed by God.<sup>8</sup> Despite his notorious statement that he thought "that we can now know almost nothing concerning the life and personality of Jesus," Bultmann also declared: "No sane person can doubt that Jesus stands as founder behind the historical movement whose first distinct stage is represented by the oldest Palestinian community."<sup>9</sup> At issue in Bultmann's eschatological agenda is how the presence of God with Jesus is to be reflected in the form of eschatological ethics in the present.

Bultmann's eschatological-existential position can, of course, be considered wholly compatible with Christian orthodoxy even if such a conclusion has been disputed. Many other contributors to the Quest have been more overt in claiming such compatibility. For every Reimarus and David Friedrich Strauss there has been not only a Pastor Goeze,<sup>10</sup> but also a Daniel Schenkel (1813–1885),<sup>11</sup> a T. W. Manson (1893–1958),<sup>12</sup> or, most prominently of late, an N. T. Wright (1948–).<sup>13</sup> The compatibility of the Quest's results with Christian orthodoxy will, however, have been more evident in the preaching and pastoral work of Christian churches over two centuries than in scholarly tomes. If it is "known" what Jesus was basically like, and that "basic likeness" is preserved in the gospels, then the detail of what scholars get up to is neither here nor there. In that sense, the practical impact of the whole

---

<sup>8</sup> R. Bultmann, Jesus and the Word (1934; London: Fontana, 1958), II.4: "Future and Present: The Necessity of Decision."

<sup>9</sup> Bultmann, Jesus, 14 and 17.

<sup>10</sup> Lessing's opponent in the debate which followed the publication of Reimarus's Fragments from 1774.

<sup>11</sup> Schenkel's Das Charakterbild Jesu (1864) is rightly categorized as a "Liberal Life" in Schweitzer's account of the Quest (A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus—First Complete Edition [London: SCM, 2000], ch. 14, esp. 177–181), and its author's ecclesiastical involvement was not without controversy. As Schweitzer notes, "the Jesus portrayed here can be imagined plunging into the midst of the debates in any pastors' conference" (Schweitzer, The Quest, 179).

<sup>12</sup> For a discussion of Manson, see e.g. W. P. Weaver, The Historical Jesus in the Twentieth Century: 1900–1950 (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1999), 154–8.

<sup>13</sup> Wright is quite clear about the significance of the theological results of his enquiries (Jesus and the Victory of God, [London: SPCK and Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996], 660–2), though he clearly states that the Jesus he presents is neither like himself, nor the one he expected to find when setting out (xv).

history of the Quest upon Christian orthodoxy, it could be argued, has been minimal.

As a scholarly enterprise, however, the Quest's history is inevitably defined more by its controversial boundary-stretchers than by those for whom Historical Jesus Research does not prove problematic for Christian faith. This is for three simple reasons. First, whether Reimarus can be said to have launched the Quest, he certainly sets its tone: one of hostility towards Christian orthodoxy. Second, history and theology are different pursuits. Though the disciplines are integrally related, historians are not going to deliver all that the theologians need to be able to do their work. Third, uncontroversial works do not normally sell as many copies, and this applies in the scholarly world, even if not on the same scale as with tabloid journalism. The "theological agenda" as it surfaces within the Quest and in accounts of its history is thus more likely to be a theological questioning of Christian orthodoxy or, as the next section shows, take the form of an anti-ecclesiastical stance.

Theological explorations deriving from Christian contributors working within the academy have thus been critical of orthodoxy from within. This was the tenor of a century of enquiry post-Reimarus. Martin Kähler's sober, if over-simplified, warning to the church about what it was doing in constructing a picture of the "historical Jesus" was well-made and rightly influential.<sup>14</sup> Christian theological reflection would always be doing more with the figure of Jesus than the strictest findings of the historians would permit. The danger of Kähler's warning is that it implied that historical enquiry could never offer a theological challenge to orthodoxy. But what if historians discovered that orthodoxy remained more fluid or incomplete than frequently supposed? What if orthodoxy could benefit from theologically sensitive analysis of and interaction with the critical findings of historians? The history of various forms of the theological agenda present within the Quest reveal, then, that the Quest has too easily been seen to throw up challenges to Christian orthodoxy, as if historical-critical enquiry is inevitably undertaken from outside a community of faith. From the perspective of late- or post-modernity, such a view looks too simple.<sup>15</sup> Historical-criticism does not simply serve Christian orthodoxy. But nor is it itself value-free. At issue, then, is what further interests (and communities) are being served when historians practice their art.

---

<sup>14</sup> Not least on Barth, Bultmann and Tillich.

<sup>15</sup> I shall comment further on this point in "A Philosophical Agenda" below.

One final aspect under the heading of “theological agenda” needs to be addressed. I have so far discussed only Christian theology, an obvious theological conversation-partner in the Quest. One major legacy of the Quest has been the reminder that Jesus was never a Christian but a Jew. Broader developments in history, not only intellectual history, through the nineteenth and especially in the first half of the twentieth century would mean that such a reminder would not be able to be given with ease. Yet its significance for the Quest, for its theological appropriation and for the relationship between Christianity and Judaism is clear. In the Third Quest period, the character of Jesus’ Judaism features as an aspect of any Historical Jesus Research. Contributors to the Quest now address the question of Judaism more in the form of what kind of Judaism Jesus emerged from or allied himself with, rather than the degree to which he detached himself from Judaism. With hindsight, the absence of the likes of Abraham Geiger (1810–74), Claude Montefiore (1858–1938), and Joseph Klausner (1874–1958) from standard histories of the Quest is both striking and shocking.

Admittedly, even in circles more directly Christian in orientation, attention to Jesus’ Jewishness did not begin with the important work of Geza Vermes (b. 1924), whose comments on the lack of knowledge of Judaism on the part of so many New Testament scholars were timely when first made.<sup>16</sup> With hindsight again, it can be seen to be more than a merely intellectual tragedy that the history-of-religion school did not have more of a theological impact upon Christianity. The exploration of the religious world out of which Jesus came, conducted with great vigour at the end of the nineteenth century, seemed too easily to imply a theological relativism more dangerous and complex than most Christian theology could handle. Over a century later, the fact of Jesus’ Judaism is well-established, the existence of religious and theological pluralism is accepted, yet complete relativism is not recognized as an inevitable corollary.

Theological interest in finding the Jesus of history does not, then, inevitably lead to a Christian conclusion. It may, however, be a driving force behind the desire to layer the literary sources accurately and to sift the sayings diligently. It is often the expectation that the figure encountered will have some positive benefit for what it means to speak of God which keeps scholars at their desks. Christian enquirers are certainly prominent in the Quest because of this. But ultimately, all theologically interested contributors recognize that the question of whose tradition of God, past or present, is being worked with in the process, cannot be far away. Theological enquiry does not happen in a vacuum.

---

<sup>16</sup> G. Vermes, Jesus and the World of Judaism (London: SCM, 1983), ch. 5.

2. An Anti-ecclesiastical Agenda

The work of Hermann Samuel Reimarus (1694–1768) is usually held to have launched the modern Quest.<sup>17</sup> His contribution may appear anti-theological. More accurately, he was driven by opposition to Christian orthodoxy, and hence his agenda was anti-ecclesiastical. Reimarus's deception theory—according to which the disciples stole the body of Jesus and fabricated the story of Jesus' resurrection and the strand of suffering and rising predictions within the gospel texts—set up an extreme example of what would accompany the Quest throughout its history. The search for the Jesus of history and the detailed critical scrutiny of the canonical gospels which went with it would inevitably lead to the asking of awkward questions of Christian orthodox claims made about Jesus the Christ.

On occasions, an anti-ecclesiastical stance may have become anti-theological too. Where Bruno Bauer (1809–82), for example, ended up on the question of God may not be clear. But his conclusion that Jesus never even existed, and that the story of his life was invented by an original evangelist,<sup>18</sup> at least leads to a savage critique of the theologians of his day, who did not seem able to face what he regarded as facts.<sup>19</sup> Arthur Drews (1865–1935) is now the more widely cited proponent from the “Jesus never existed” school.

---

<sup>17</sup> Though Reimarus was initially hidden behind Lessing's publication of his work anonymously from 1774 onwards. He is the starting-point in most standard accounts of the Quest (e.g. W. B. Tatum, In Quest of Jesus: A Guidebook [Atlanta: John Knox Press, 1982 and London: SCM, 1983]; C. Brown, Jesus in European Protestant Thought 1778–1860 (Grand Rapids: Baker Book House, 1988). Dawes traces the Quest's origins back further to Spinoza (G. Dawes, The Historical Jesus Question: The Challenge of History to Religious Authority [Louisville, London and Leiden: Westminster John Knox Press], 2001).

<sup>18</sup> Whether this be Mark or a precursor of Mark.

Common to these anti-ecclesiastical contributions is the view that religion is to be viewed as a human invention. The God question can be shelved rather than answered negatively. What unites them is the view that Christian orthodoxy has got history badly wrong. This view is supported, and sometimes defended passionately, whatever views individual writers may have held about the potentially positive function of religion in society.

In the present, a different anti-ecclesiastical stance is evident in the work of Robert Funk (1926–2005) and the Jesus Seminar.<sup>20</sup> The work of these scholars, and the Westar Institute (host of the Jesus Seminar) to which they relate, is not anti-theological. Whether it is “anti-ecclesiastical” is a more moot point. Funk is at times vehement in his criticism of what the Christian church has made of Jesus.<sup>21</sup> What differentiates some of these more recent critics of Christian orthodoxy from their predecessors is the lack of clarity about whether they see themselves as standing inside or outside churches as they offer both the results of their historical Jesus research and their assessment of its theological significance. It is now much more culturally acceptable than was the case earlier to be a contributor to the Quest whilst having an institutional home in the academy alone. This would scarcely have been possible in the nineteenth century.<sup>22</sup>

In this regard the ‘liberal lives’ of the nineteenth century remain instructive, regardless of their inadequacies on many fronts. They functioned as both theological defences and critiques of orthodoxy. Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768–1834) is now scarcely mentioned in

---

<sup>19</sup> In Bauer’s defence, as Schweitzer demonstrates, the literary puzzles presented by the canonical gospels were sharply identified by Bauer. The basic accuracy of the conclusion he drew from his attention to the literary inter-relationship between the gospels (earliest is not necessarily historical) was re-presented later by William Wrede (1859–1906). Bauer’s own historical deduction admittedly does not follow from his literary conclusion. It took more than half a century for his literary insights to receive a fairer hearing, and even then not without controversy.

<sup>20</sup> Dominic Crossan and Marcus Borg are also members of the Jesus Seminar but cannot be claimed to be anti-ecclesiastical even whilst they are creative and critical in their theological positions.

<sup>21</sup> E.g. R. W. Funk, Honest to Jesus: Jesus for a New Millennium (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1996), 6, 53–54 and 305–306, though there are also more hopeful statements on 11–12 and 306.

<sup>22</sup> Though therefore also all the more difficult to offer radical proposals, as Strauss and Bruno Bauer both discovered.

the context of the Quest and his Life of Jesus lectures are not positioned within Schweitzer's listing of "liberal lives," but they stand as a good example of how historical interest in Jesus has in practice functioned throughout the Quest. His primary interest was dogmatic.<sup>23</sup> His achievement was therefore an easy target for Strauss, whose The Christ of Faith and the Jesus of History (1865) offered a devastating critique of Schleiermacher's lectures a year after their publication. Strauss was, however, judging Schleiermacher's work in terms of the historical quest. Schleiermacher had let the historical cat out of the bag in the playground of orthodoxy, and in Strauss's judgment had not fully recognized the consequences. All of those who followed and who tried to remain orthodox were simply facing up more to the challenge which Schleiermacher ducked (by leaning heavily on the Gospel of John). Theologically speaking, the adequacy of orthodoxy was at issue.<sup>24</sup> Historical enquiry into the life of Jesus was merely one aspect of the task of trying to express a viable contemporary form of orthodoxy.

Contributors to the historical Quest for Jesus may, then, rarely be anti-theological. Believers in secular, neutral historical enquiry could, in any case, bracket off all theological questions as beyond their frame of reference. Such a stance is unlikely in late modernity. Participants in the Quest are more likely to have some theological interest, however tenuously that interest may link them to organized religion. An anti-ecclesiastical inclination usually becomes but a different form of theological agenda from a desire to support a form of orthodoxy (Christian or Jewish). Questioning of Christian orthodoxy from within need not amount to an anti-ecclesiastical frame of mind. The history of the Quest has, however, supplied many examples of ways in which Historical Jesus Research is uncomfortable for Christianity. It could be argued that it has simply taken a long time for the consequences of the question which nineteenth century liberals had stumbled upon to be worked through, i.e. if you find a historical Jesus who does not fit easily within Christian orthodoxy, then do you have to let go of a Christian view of God?

<sup>23</sup> Though in dogmatics as it served practical Christian living.

<sup>24</sup> Schleiermacher saw this, though the fuller version of his response in the field of Christology is to be found in The Christian Faith (1821–22; 2nd ed., 1830–31; Eng. trans.: Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1928). For a study of the Quest's history from the perspective of its challenge to religious authority, see Dawes, The Historical Jesus Question.

3. An Ethical Agenda

Theological agendas in the Quest, be they ecclesiastically interested or not, have always accompanied other interests. Agendas beyond the explicitly theological have, however, not always been combined with a theological concern. To take ethics as an example: those who have wanted to find a Jesus who can help people to work out how to live have sometimes been theologically inclined, sometimes not.

The most prominent contributor to the Quest who was both theologically and ethically interested is also the most famous historian of the Quest itself: Albert Schweitzer (1875–1965).<sup>25</sup> One of the most often-quoted paragraphs in Jesus Research—the concluding paragraph of Schweitzer’s The Quest of the Historical Jesus (“He comes to us as one unknown...”)—is more an exhortation to mystical, ethical discipleship than an expression of the difficulties of historical research, though it remains the latter too.<sup>26</sup> Schweitzer’s ethical intent is clear: it is the following that matters. Whatever their initial intent or the nature or level of their grasp of what Jesus of Nazareth stood for, Schweitzer suggests, those who follow will go on discovering what drove Jesus through participation in their own, contemporary versions of the efforts, conflicts and sufferings entailed in trying to live in a similar way to Jesus and his first followers.

---

<sup>25</sup> The first complete English translation of the last edition which Schweitzer worked on (the 6th German edition) finally appeared in 2000. On Schweitzer’s contribution to Jesus research, see e.g. D. E. Nineham’s article in Jesus in History, Thought and Culture: An Encyclopedia, Vol. 2, ed. J. L. Houlden (Santa Barbara, Denver and London: ABC-CLIO, 2003), 764–769, and his Foreword to the 2000 edition, though also Part III of E. Grässer, Albert Schweitzer als Theologe (Tübingen: Mohr [Paul Siebeck], 1979).

<sup>26</sup> The full text reads: “He comes to us as one unknown, without a name, as of old, by the lakeside, he came to those men who did not know who he was. He says the same words, ‘Follow me!’, and sets us to those tasks which he must fulfil in our time. He commands. And to those who hearken to him, whether wise or unwise, he will reveal himself in the peace, the labours, the conflicts and the suffering that they may experience in his fellowship, and as an ineffable mystery they will learn who he is...” (Schweitzer, The Quest, 487). The paragraph remained the final words of every edition, despite the addition of three new chapters to the second edition of 1913. Significant changes in the English translation are worth noting, reflecting a changed climate. The “One unknown” has become “one unknown,” satisfying publishing conventions, but making Jesus more accessible to those who may not share Christian convictions. And Bowden has changed Montgomery’s “to those who obey him” to “to those who hearken to him” (German: denjenigen, welche ihm gehorchen). Obedience has more negative connotations in an age of greater autonomy and choice.

This is not a customary method amongst historical-critics. The search for objectivity means that historians must do their best to become detached from their subject-matter and deal as neutrally as possible with sources before them. It is usually assumed that although historians know that they are involved in their work, they should not be as personally wrapped up in engagement with the historical person under scrutiny as Schweitzer is suggesting is inevitable with Jesus. Distortions cannot but result.

History has not been kind to Schweitzer. His view of a deluded, eschatological Jesus who tried to force the hand of God by his launch of the disciples' mission and his journey to Jerusalem did not find widespread support. Inevitably, it did not please orthodox Christians. It is, however, historically suspect too, being much too dependent on Matthew (certain texts in Matt 10 and 15 especially). Morgan comments that Schweitzer "popularized and corrupted" Johannes Weiss's insights into Jesus' eschatology.<sup>27</sup> Weaver notes that Schweitzer added little to the development of work on the primary sources and, rather than offering something wholly different in kind from the nineteenth-century liberals he so roundly criticized, merely used the sources in the same way to produce a different picture of Jesus. Grässer cites Helmut Groos's identification of exegetical weaknesses in the "four main pillars" of Schweitzer's account.<sup>28</sup>

All that said, Schweitzer's critics remain appreciative. The popularizing of Weiss's insights was important, as it emphasized the strangeness of Jesus to Christian believers always prone to seeking and finding a Jesus like themselves. Schweitzer merely highlighted a struggle with which Weiss himself wrestled. Though the writer of Jesus' Proclamation of the Kingdom of God (1892), in which he established the case for the eschatological Jesus, Weiss also wrote Die Nachfolge Christi und die Predigt der Gegenwart (1895) and Die Idee des Reiches Gottes in der Theologie (1901). In both of these works Weiss addressed the difficulties produced by his findings with regard to systematic theology and ethics: how do you make use of the view of the kingdom of God which

---

<sup>27</sup> R. Morgan with J. Barton, Biblical Interpretation (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988), 329.

<sup>28</sup> These are: the summoning of the kingdom of God through human effort; the sending of the disciples; the change in Jesus' approach due to the delay of the parousia; and the purpose of the journey to Jerusalem (Grässer, Albert Schweitzer, 126–129). See also Nineham in Jesus in History, Thought and Culture, ed. Houlden, 767.

Jesus apparently held, and how do you follow such a distant and alien figure?<sup>29</sup> Weiss's own response was to resort to a liberal position not very different from that of the father-in-law he, as exegete, opposed (Albrecht Ritschl). Weiss wanted as much as anyone to work out a way of supporting the view that this "kingdom of God" somehow had to be "lived."<sup>30</sup>

Schweitzer's impact can be acknowledged in further respects. If his Interimsethik—his "in-the-meantime-ethics" which awaits an imminent End—is found wanting, the urgent necessity of response produced by any encounter with the texts which bear witness to Jesus is exemplified in Schweitzer's life. His own life demonstrates that history cannot be an indifferent discipline, despite the objectivity it seeks. Historians who wrestle with texts about Jesus and fail to be ethically challenged are to be pitied. This is both Schweitzer's legacy to the Quest and evidence of the extent to which he was a classic German Romantic. The notion that you can actually learn more about a historical figure in the act of following is at least continuous with Schleiermacher's hermeneutical insight into the subjective dimension of interpretation. Schweitzer's approach is merely an extreme form of the "subjective-historical" attempt to get inside the shoes of an author, recognizing that as "author" here, Jesus is at least one stage removed from the contemporary hearer/reader.<sup>31</sup>

Schweitzer finds an unlikely ally here in Liberation Theology. In a powerful passage within his assessment of "The Importance of the Historical Jesus in Latin American Christology," Jon Sobrino writes:

Christ's demythologization is important...; but more urgent in Latin America is his rescue from manipulation and connivance with idols. Demythologization is important because without it Christ remains dangerously abstract and ideal; but it is insufficient unless it leads to Christ's rescue from manipulation. Demythologizing Christ in Latin America

---

<sup>29</sup> The later texts have never been translated into English, and therefore this aspect of Weiss's own struggle has not been fully represented throughout a significant proportion of the scholarly world. I also note with surprise that Weiss merits no article of his own in Houlden, ed., Jesus in History, Thought and Culture.

<sup>30</sup> For a helpful summary of these points, see the Introduction to J. Weiss, Jesus' Proclamation of the Kingdom of God (London: SCM, 1971), by Hiers and Holland, esp. 16–24.

<sup>31</sup> And developments in literary theory have extended discussion on two fronts since Schweitzer: with respect to the gospel texts themselves (form criticism, tradition criticism, redaction criticism etc.) and with respect to the act of reading (identification of implied author, implied reader and the role played by "real readers" especially).

does not primarily mean giving an account of his historical faith in the face of rational criticism...; primarily it means avoiding a situation in which, by reason of Jesus' historical abstraction, reality can be left to its misery. More urgent than Christ's demythologization, therefore, will be his "depacification," if we may be permitted the neologism. Christ must not be forced to leave reality in peace.

Sobrino's language reflects later debates (the Bultmann-initiated "demythologization debate" above all). Its context in theological discourse is also apparent (references to "Christ," not "Jesus"). But the shared ground with Schweitzer's ethical agenda is clear. Whether or not historians are satisfied with the picture of "the historical Jesus" being worked with in Latin American (or other) liberation theologies, an ethical agenda within the Quest means being clear about whose interests are served by any picture of Jesus created. Historical research may not be able to produce a rational, objectively-neutral "figure of Jesus." But Christianity and human cultures need an image of some sort with which to work, if for no other reason than that the figure of Jesus has been, and will remain, influential on each. This image cannot be "abstract and ideal" in the sense of being unrelated and unrelatable to human life as it is actually lived, if it is a past historical figure who is being interpreted for present purposes. The task of the Quest in the eyes of Liberation Theology, then, is the construction of an image of Jesus which, whilst not defensible to the satisfaction of historians at all points, is not un-historical (i.e. historically implausible) and which serves a liberative cause. More will be discovered about Jesus, in any case, in the course of following a liberative path.<sup>32</sup>

The claim that more can be understood about Jesus in the context of the practice of following may be supportive background as far as contributors to the Quest are concerned. It is not likely to surface in the list of criteria of authenticity for Jesus-sayings.<sup>33</sup> But ethically-interested enquirers after Jesus are onto something here. The insight does not amount to a general principle that a biographer better understands their subject by trying to become like them.<sup>34</sup> Rather, the recognition that engagement with the (historical) figure of Jesus is very often ethically-driven turns an interpreter's attention to the task of contributing to human flourishing. If Jesus has an interest in human flourishing, then participation in activities in the present that are focused on human flourishing may better equip those who try to understand his life.

---

<sup>32</sup> A further alliance between Liberation Theology and early twentieth-century German theology which may at first seem surprising, and which echoes this link with Schweitzer, is between Segundo and Bultmann. Segundo writes: "...I see no reason to be upset by the circular character of the interpretative method proposed by Bultmann for speaking meaningfully today about Jesus of Nazareth. While I disagree with him on specific points, I think it is the one which best integrates, in principle, the present-day interest of the human being with the summons issued to us by the Absolute in Jesus" (J. L. Segundo, The Historical Jesus of the Synoptics [Maryknoll: Orbis, 1985], 35).

<sup>33</sup> I discuss Kümmel's blanket dismissal of the historical value of Segundo's work in Marsh, "Quests," 416-417.

The interplay between ethics and the Quest thus has a pay-off in both directions: both for the understanding of Jesus and for ethics. An excellent example of this occurs in the work of Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza, whose writings over nearly three decades have constantly questioned the ethics of biblical study itself, whilst making creative contributions to the field. In terms of Jesus Research, her major contribution is the extent to which she has sought to encourage a shift of focus from the individual Jesus to "Jesus and his movement."<sup>35</sup> Arguably, this shift undermines the Quest itself, something which, on the evidence of the later work, Schüssler Fiorenza herself might not dispute.<sup>36</sup> In terms of the discussion of this chapter, however, the value of Fiorenza's work lies in three areas. First, Schüssler Fiorenza is upfront at every stage about the hermeneutical complexity and "interestedness" of historical enquiry. She is clear that her liberationist agenda stands in a circular relationship with the early Christian texts she is examining. She is conscious that the texts she reads have contributed to the liberative agenda she adopts, whilst also proving problematic for the support of that agenda in the present. Second, she is clear about how many of the contributors to the Quest have been operating: men in search of a heroic, individual male Jesus.<sup>37</sup> When the first two points are brought together, the Quest's history can be viewed as a history of too many individual males unaware of their own agendas or methods underplaying the extent to which their historical reconstructions

<sup>34</sup> For what, for example, would happen to biographers of Hitler or Stalin?

<sup>35</sup> See E. Schüssler Fiorenza, In Memory of Her: A Feminist Theological Reconstruction of Christian Origins (London: SCM, 1983), esp. ch. 4.

<sup>36</sup> See e.g. E. Schüssler Fiorenza, Jesus: Miriam's Child, Sophia's Prophet (London: SCM, 1995), 82–88.

<sup>37</sup> This point is echoed from a different perspective recently in H. Moxnes, Putting Jesus in His Place: A Radical Vision of Household and Kingdom (Louisville and London: Westminster John Knox Press, 2003).

of Jesus are precisely that: reconstructions.<sup>38</sup> The result is an exercise in individualism: individual biographers focussing on the isolated male. Third, Schüssler Fiorenza is clear also about what all her work is intended to contribute to: feminist liberation. The goal is the liberation of all humanity, but Schüssler Fiorenza retains the adjective “feminist” because her approach must rigorously examine through a feminist lens all efforts to speak of liberation, when ultimately liberation may not, in fact, be in view.<sup>39</sup> Her ethical intent is, in other words, transparent.

As a result of such emphases, Schüssler Fiorenza can see things clearly about Jesus. In her discussion of Jacqueline Grant’s work, she comments: “I do not think that we can derive the criterion and norm of a feminist Christian theology from the option of the historical Jesus for the poor and outcast.”<sup>40</sup> Schüssler Fiorenza’s overtly theological-ethical-liberationist approach to her historical task functions, in other words, as a restraint on what she can conclude about Jesus the historical figure. Rather than claim too much for the Jesus of history, Schüssler Fiorenza is realistic about what Jesus in the context of his first-century movement is likely and unlikely to have been able to think and do.<sup>41</sup> But it is a circular approach, and historical imagination is at work. Schüssler Fiorenza is, however, quite open about this: she conducts historical enquiry with an ethical agenda.

In the realm of ethics, Schüssler Fiorenza maintains a rigorous stance with respect to the socio-political dimensions of human life. She therefore has little time for enquiry into the origins of Christianity which loses sight of the particular, contextual location of all forms of thought and the social structures in which thoughts and beliefs take shape.<sup>42</sup> In the same way that understanding the Quest as individual interpreters seeking an isolated Jesus is misguided, so also exploring

---

<sup>38</sup> Though not all Questers are guilty of this, of course, as Crossan’s work makes clear.

<sup>39</sup> Her rigorous critique of many forms of feminist Christology in Schüssler Fiorenza, Jesus, ch. 2 is striking in this respect. Ruether, Grant, Brock, Heyward and Grey, for example, are all found wanting. It should also be said that Fiorenza stresses the need for women to be liberated: “Feminist movements and theologies must seek to overcome the oppression of all persons exploited by kyriarchy, women and men, but they nevertheless must focus their efforts especially on the liberation of women who live on the bottom of the pyramid of multiplicative oppressions” (Schüssler Fiorenza, Jesus, 48).

<sup>40</sup> Schüssler Fiorenza, Jesus, 48.

<sup>41</sup> Christian theology is, for example, always prone to claim too much in wanting to warrant historically its theological claims about Jesus.

<sup>42</sup> See e.g. Schüssler Fiorenza, Jesus, 18–24.

Jesus and his movement without looking for contemporary social locations of liberation is equally distorting. Schüssler Fiorenza thus takes Schweitzer's attention to the act of following Jesus into the socio-political domain. Like other liberationists, she in effect claims (to gloss Schweitzer) that "to those who hearken to him in the context of communities which seek liberation, he will reveal himself in the peace, the labours, the conflicts and the suffering that they may experience in his fellowship, which is itself the struggle for and enjoyment of liberation, and as an ineffable mystery they will learn who he is..." If Schweitzer's approach could ultimately be described as a form of "Jesus-mysticism,"<sup>43</sup> then perhaps Schüssler Fiorenza's ethically-driven historical enquiries can be seen as linked to a socio-political Christ-mysticism which focuses on the ekklesia of wo/men.<sup>44</sup>

I have dwelt on two quite different examples of contributors to Jesus Research who have exhibited a clear ethical agenda. Both are theologically concerned and ecclesiastically committed. Others could have been added (e.g. Shailer Mathews). There are also questers with a clear ethical agenda who are theologically inclined though less ecclesiastically concerned (Robert Funk, for example).<sup>45</sup> Others are historians whose religious affiliation is either indistinct or non-existent, yet who carry an ethical intent (Renan).<sup>46</sup> Plenty more, whether religious or not, may believe that questing after Jesus stimulates ethical reflection, though this plays no direct part in the historical work itself (John P. Meier, for example).

I have tried to show in this section that an ethical agenda in Jesus Research takes shape not simply in the form of "applying" the consequences of historical findings about Jesus. At its most creative, an

<sup>43</sup> On which, see e.g. Weaver, The Historical Jesus, 41.

<sup>44</sup> Schüssler Fiorenza, Jesus, 24–31.

<sup>45</sup> Funk concludes the final chapter of Honest to Jesus, in which he outlines a number of consequences of his historical enquiries, with the statement: "These are my twenty-one theses. If I had a church, I would scotch tape them to the door" (314).

<sup>46</sup> There is much debate about Renan's intentions and achievements. Schweitzer's damning critique (Schweitzer, The Quest, 158–167, esp. 165–167) is often taken on trust (e.g. Wright, Jesus, 18) and his sincerity is questioned (e.g. The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997], 1383). For all its faults, Renan achieved something that most scholars do not: he wrote a popular book in a style which communicated the results of scholarship with a light touch. The work was controversial, certainly unorthodox and lodged within a framework of Romantic Idealism. But it got its readers thinking about the spirit of the human Jesus. Bennett is right when he says that: "What Renan was actually doing was pioneering a new genre of Jesus literature" (C. Bennett, In Search of Jesus: Insider and Outsider Images [London and New York: Continuum, 2001], 193).

ethical intent is bound up with how one asks the questions of, and draws conclusions from, one's sources. An ethical agenda may best be expressed in this form: what do you have to conclude about Jesus to encourage people to act in a way which is in continuity with him?<sup>47</sup> Such an interest can, of course, distort one's enquiries to the point of mishearing. Equally, as I have sought to show, it can become part of a historian's methodology. In this way, orthopraxy, as a form of orthodoxy, can function in critical conversation with the texts with which a Jesus Researcher works.<sup>48</sup>

4. A Political Agenda

A more specific form of the ethical agenda is that of the political. To some extent I have anticipated what needs to be said here in my comments on Schüssler Fiorenza. Schüssler Fiorenza's enquiries are socio-politically committed. A political agenda may, however, take a less sociological form (e.g. as an ekklesia of wo/men) and portray Jesus as the precursor and promoter of a particular political programme.<sup>49</sup> At issue in this section, however, is more the question whether contributors to the Quest view insights from Jesus as having contemporary political implications, or use their own political inclinations as part of their interpretative strategy. There are many writers on Jesus who can be considered. I shall use four: Horsley, Weitling, Kalthoff and Grundmann.

Richard Horsley is a contributor to the current Quest who most explicitly draws out the political dimensions of Jesus' preaching and activity, both in first-century and contemporary contexts. In a series of persuasive publications, he has actively resisted what he perceived as the dominant ethos of Jesus scholarship: "Much of the 'quest for the historical Jesus' as well as much of the mainline scholarship on Jesus in the twentieth century could be understood as a systematic attempt to ward off the political reading of Jesus originally broached by <sup>47</sup> Working on the assumption that a basic continuity is going to be a good thing and lead to human flourishing.

---

<sup>48</sup> This approach to the study of Jesus has taken a pedagogical form recently in Alice Batten's "Studying the Historical Jesus Through Service," Teaching Theology and Religion 8.2 (2005): 107–113.

<sup>49</sup> Scholars are, however, virtually unanimous that to ask about a "political" Jesus is to pose an anachronistic question, given the integration of religion and politics in first-century Palestine.

Reimarus.”<sup>50</sup> By contrast, Horsley stresses not merely the location of Jesus within the political and economic turbulence of the first century, but also the interplay between historical enquiries into first-century imperialism and current political debate.<sup>51</sup> The interplay is especially striking in his Rauschenbusch Lectures of 2001, published as Jesus and Empire: The Kingdom of God and the New World Order. Two features are prominent in Horsley’s account.

First, Horsley develops what he terms a “relational approach to Jesus.”<sup>52</sup> By this he means that Jesus must be made sense of in five respects. He attempts to understand how, “(1) in the particular historical conditions that had created a crisis for the ancient Judean and Galilean people (2) and working out of the Israelite cultural tradition in which those people were rooted, (3) Jesus emerged as a leader (4) by assuming/adapting particular social role(s) (5) in interaction with particular people who responded by forming a movement that became historically significant...”<sup>53</sup> Like Schüssler Fiorenza, Horsley seeks a “Jesus-in-movement.”<sup>54</sup> By following this line of enquiry he hopes to resist the atomistic individualism, depoliticization and dehistoricization which has bedeviled much Jesus Research. It is on the basis of his relational approach that he constructs as full an account as possible of the political and economic context in which, in his view, the subversive peasant movement which Jesus “spearheaded” took shape.<sup>55</sup>

The second strand of Horsley’s approach which is of especial interest is the parallelism he notes between Rome and the “American Empire” and the contrast he draws between the latter and the “Christian Empire.”<sup>56</sup> This is admittedly an Epilogue in Horsley’s 2003 book, by

---

<sup>50</sup> R. Horsley, “The Death of Jesus,” in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. B. D. Chilton and C. A. Evans (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 395–422, at 406.

<sup>51</sup> E.g. R. Horsley, Bandits, Prophets and Messiahs: Popular Movements in the Time of Jesus (San Francisco: Harper and Row), 1985; idem, Jesus and the Spiral of Violence: Popular Jewish Resistance in Roman Palestine (San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1987); idem, Galilee: History, Politics, People (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1995); idem, Jesus and Empire: The Kingdom of God and the New World Disorder (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003).

<sup>52</sup> Horsley, Jesus and Empire, 55–78.

<sup>53</sup> Ibid., 57–58.

<sup>54</sup> It is noteworthy that he makes no reference to Schüssler Fiorenza’s work, nor indicates any way in which he might be indebted to feminist insights in moving to such a “relational” emphasis.

<sup>55</sup> Horsley, Jesus and Empire, 79.

<sup>56</sup> Ibid., 129–149.

which time he has moved beyond historical enquiry to political preaching. But we should resist seeing Horsley's insights as mere applications of dispassionately drawn historical conclusions. The methodological framework within which Horsley has conducted his enquiries means that he cannot step out of the political climate in which he writes. Indeed, he wants to see how the critical discussion with Jesus-in-movement which he undertakes will affect his reading of his own political world.

In no way am I claiming that Horsley's awareness of his own political context has clouded his vision and distorted his reading of the gospels. Furthermore, I do not need to make a judgment as to whether or not I think his reading of Jesus is in fact historically accurate when noting that a political agenda is at work here. I am simply observing that Horsley is clear about what his historical task entails and how there is interplay between his subject-matter and his own self-awareness about his particular context.

As Horsley rightly notes, this has not always been so in the Quest. Arguably, one of the Quest's deepest flaws, especially in its twentieth-century form, was precisely its avoidance of the political dimensions of Jesus Research.<sup>57</sup> Political ideologies uncomfortable for, and sometimes unwelcome in, Western democracies were thus able to fill the void left by mainstream Jesus-questers. This can be illustrated with reference to a number of writers on Jesus from the mid-nineteenth century onwards.

Wilhelm Weitling (1808–71), Albert Kalthoff (1850–1906) and Walter Grundmann (1906–76) rarely feature in accounts of the Quest.<sup>58</sup> Attention to their work does, however, add further twists to recognition of the political nature of historical enquiry into the life of Jesus.

---

<sup>57</sup> Dieter Georgi's work, which tracks the alliance between the rise of bourgeois culture and the Quest's history is important here ("The Interest in Life of Jesus Theology as a Paradigm for the Social History of Biblical Criticism," HTR 85 [1992]: 51–83).

<sup>58</sup> Kalthoff, but not Weitling, is mentioned in Schweitzer, and merits a four-page discussion (Schweitzer, The Quest, 279–283). There are extracts (in German) from Weitling and Kalthoff in M. Baumotte, ed., Die Frage nach dem historischen Jesus: Texte aus drei Jahrhunderten (Gütersloh: Gerd Mohn, 1984). Weaver mentions Grundmann briefly (Weaver, The Historical Jesus, 246). For a discussion of Grundmann, see most recently P. Head, "The Nazi Quest for an Aryan Jesus," JSHJ 2.1 (2004): 55–89.

Weitling's Das Evangelium des armen Sünders appeared in 1843.<sup>59</sup> It was a communist tract, reflecting Weitling's failed contribution to the task of giving emergent European socialism a religious shape and content.<sup>60</sup> In Weitling's understanding, Jesus preached a gospel of equality and action, seeking to create a society in which private ownership of property, inheritance and money would be abolished. Jesus looked beyond the family as the basic social unit in the interests of a new form of community. The love feast became for Weitling a symbol of this new form. The chapter in which these ideas are contained ("The Pure Teaching of Jesus") is the longest in the book and lies at its heart. It is a collage of quotations from, and references to, the canonical gospels with interspersed paragraphs of commentary.

Weitling is no competitor with contemporaries such as Strauss, Bruno Bauer or Daniel Schenkel as an original contributor to the historical Quest. The work's relevance for our immediate purposes lies in the use to which he put his reading of the gospels in the historical context in which he wrote. Like many who interpret Jesus politically, Weitling focuses on the teaching of Jesus in a way which implies that the teaching can be detached from the person. In this way, Jesus is prone to being unhistorically received, i.e. his words are taken out of context. But Weitling also stands as evidence of what all do when interpreting Jesus, even if not for explicitly political purposes: all interpret Jesus for something. The lack of disinterestedness is blatant in Weitling's account. Political interpreters therefore merely make the interests being served in Jesus Research most apparent.

Albert Kalthoff was a pastor in Bremen from 1888. He was also one of the founders, with Ernst Haeckel, of the German Federation of Monists (Deutscher Monistenbund). He lectured on Jesus in 1880 and at that point, as Schweitzer notes, was happy to accept the general findings of contemporary theologians.<sup>61</sup> As time went on, however, he became skeptical of the conclusions theologians were drawing from their historical enquiries. Jesus was in his view being tamed by their presentations of him. Mixing skepticism with philosophical idealism,

---

<sup>59</sup> The latest English translation (by Dinah Livingstone) is W. Weitling, The Poor Sinner's Gospel (London and Sydney: Sheed and Ward, 1969).

<sup>60</sup> Engels called Weitling the "first German communist." For a summary of Weitling's life and an assessment of the significance of The Poor Sinner's Gospel, see David McClellan's Foreword to the 1969 English edition.

<sup>61</sup> Schweitzer notes that Kalthoff later disowned his 1880 lectures (Schweitzer, The Quest, 279–280).

by the turn of the century, in Das Christus-Problem (1902) and Die Entstehung des Christentums (1905), Jesus “the Christ” had become a principle rather than a historical figure. It was the Messianic idea and the impact upon a community of followers that were most important for Kalthoff. His purpose in contributing to the Quest at all, then, was political. He both believed that Jesus “the Christ” is best understood out of the cauldron of political unrest in first-century Palestine and that the responsible way of speaking of the Christ in the present was to recover the spark of political activism (primitive Christian communism) which Christianity possessed in its origins. Jesus is thus dispensable for Kalthoff. He may or may not have existed, but this question is in any case beside the point.<sup>62</sup> The purpose of writing about Jesus “the Christ” at all, is to recover the community of the Messiah as a social and ethical movement.

Kalthoff may have had laudable aims, and his political intent will even now find many supporters. The history of the Quest reveals, however, that the strategy he adopted—the detachment of the Christ idea from any interest whatever in the Jesus of history—has disastrous consequences. This is nowhere better illustrated than in the work of Walter Grundmann, whose Jesus der Galiläer und das Judentum (1940) has until recently received little attention in surveys of the Quest’s history.<sup>63</sup> In a work to which its author later in life never referred, Grundmann argues that Jesus was not, in fact, indebted to Judaism. His task was to oppose it. Furthermore, he was probably not ethnically Jewish. Crucial to Grundmann’s argument is the Galilean origin of Jesus. Galilee had, according to Grundmann, long been populated by Aryan tribes, and in the centuries immediately prior to Jesus was largely Hellenistic. If, then, Grundmann reflects in his conclusion, one asks how the redemptive work of Jesus could have nevertheless come about out of a Jewish milieu in the context of a struggle against Judaism, then this is simply on the basis that, as John 1:5 states: “The light shines in the darkness and the darkness did not overcome it.”<sup>64</sup>

---

<sup>62</sup> Kalthoff is writing in the context of discussion of the work of Arthur Drews.

<sup>63</sup> See now Marsh, “Quests,” 413–414; brief references in S. Heschel, Abraham Geiger and the Jewish Jesus (Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1998), and Weaver, The Historical Jesus, and above all Head, “The Nazi Quest,” 70–86, esp. 81–86.

<sup>64</sup> W. Grundmann, Jesus der Galiläer und das Judentum (Leipzig: Georg Wigand, 1940), 207.

Grundmann's work remains, even with the benefit of hindsight, a shock to read, given its scholarly origins and the starkness of its anti-Judaism. A number of comments are necessary. First, and most importantly, what Grundmann is doing here is no different in kind from what any interpreter of Jesus is doing, i.e. constructing an image which serves a particular purpose. As suggested above, it is simply that with political interests at work, the purpose becomes more explicit. Common to each of the political Jesuses here considered, however, is the way in which Jesus is ultimately detached from his first-century socio-political context. It is both intriguing and disturbing that at first glance Grundmann's account seems to be the least guilty of this detachment. His exploration of Jesus' Galilean location is substantial.<sup>65</sup> However, Grundmann's purpose is to find a geographical context for Jesus which enables Jesus to be deracinated from Judaism.

This leads to a second, highly topical, observation: the function of Galilee in Jesus Research. It is striking that many enquiries in the Third Quest have focused on the social and political significance of Galilee for understanding Jesus.<sup>66</sup> Rather than confirming Grundmann's conclusion, such studies have simply drawn attention to the political complexity of the region, the likelihood of Jesus' being caught up in peasant hostility to Roman rule, and the different types of Judaism within which Jesus, as a Galilean, might have operated. Thus, knowledge of Galilee is vitally important for an understanding of Jesus. But it is for an understanding of Jesus the Galilean Jew.

Third, a different kind of political point emerges from a discussion of Grundmann's work. Head comments:

There are some indications of the impact of Nazi ideology on the faculty at Jena [where Grundmann lectured]... Nevertheless the primary realm for Grundmann's activity was in a separate church-based research institute... The Institute for the Study and Eradication of Jewish Influence from German Church Life... founded in Eisenach on 6 May 1939 under the leadership of Grundmann and Siegfried Leffler...<sup>67</sup>

<sup>65</sup> Grundmann, Jesus, 166–175.

<sup>66</sup> Esp. the studies by S. Freyne (e.g. Galilee from Alexander the Great to Hadrian: A Study of Second Temple Judaism [Wilmington, DE: Glazier and Notre Dame: Notre Dame University Press, 1980]; Galilee, Jesus and the Gospels: Literary Approaches and Historical Investigations [Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988]; and, most recently, Jesus, a Jewish Galilean: A New Reading of the Jesus Story [New York and London: T&T Clark Continuum, 2004]) and Horsley, Galilee.

<sup>67</sup> Head, "The Nazi Quest," 75–76.

There are warnings here for both religious groups and the academy about how research is best undertaken. Universities are not value-free. But they do (usually) provide a good location for encounter with and critical examination of ideas, interests and ideological (including religious and theological) commitments. Where religious groups (such as the “German Christians”) set up a research institute on a particular political platform, institutionally detached from a context of encounter with those of different views, then the purpose of research is skewed.<sup>68</sup> Similarly, to exclude religious or theological exploration from university settings, or to pretend that some form of value-free consideration of religion and theology is possible, are identifiable as dangerous tendencies in the light of the Grundmann experience. Research is not disinterested. But Historical Jesus Research, it becomes clear, needs the interplay of diverse institutional contexts in order to enable it to deal effectively with the many interests and approaches being served by those who participate.

A political agenda in Jesus Research therefore has two clear aspects to it: the giving of attention to Jesus’ socio-political, economic and geographical context in first-century Palestine, and the recognition that an image of Jesus constructed can be made to serve many political ends. It would be desirable to be able to conclude that the greater attention that is given to the first, the more fruitful the latter will be. This is much too simple. There is no guarantee that the Jesus discovered will be politically useful. And the political interest which people may want their Jesus to serve may not be easily defensible on the grounds disclosed by historical research. One conclusion is, however, permissible. If a link between a contemporary political outlook or programme and the Jesus of history is claimed, then the socio-political context of Jesus of Nazareth cannot be neglected. A contemporary programme may not be able to be defended point for point. But detachment from Jesus and his context, or the turning of Jesus into a set of teachings, a principle or an idea, or an ethnically pure individual who seemed to have no real roots, merely raises the suspicion that it is not really Jesus who is being interpreted.

---

<sup>68</sup> In Germany in the 1930’s and 1940’s, of course, things were more complex still, as the universities themselves were under Nazi control.

5. A Cultural-Religious Agenda

The next interest to be considered explores the border between scholarly endeavour and wider cultural interest in the figure of Jesus. On the one hand I shall pay attention to a recent example of how the work of scholars is popularized. On the other, I shall address the fact that the Quest and its findings serve religion, though in a less specific case than religious traditions themselves might wish. In current terminology, we might call this “spirituality’s” interest in Jesus. I prefer, however, to call this the “cultural-religious” agenda in order to indicate that the interest under consideration inevitably remains connected to religious traditions, even if those links are not always clear.

Nearly seventy years ago, Henry Cadbury’s The Perils of Modernizing Jesus was a challenge to contributors to the Quest to do justice to Jesus’ sheer uncongeniality to many contemporary concerns. As Weaver rightly notes: “The book contained a capsule picture of Jesus, though its main intent was to issue a warning against reading into the historical Jesus all our own presuppositions, a point that Schweitzer as well as others (Tyrrell) had made much earlier, but which could not be made often enough.”<sup>69</sup> For Cadbury, Jesus was a loyal Jew who differed in his own views only in few, if significant, ways, from the Judaism in which he was immersed. Jesus was a bit of a mystic, an apocalypticist focused on the will of God, and addressed individuals rather than proclaiming a social or political programme.

That the book appeared three years prior to Grundmann’s is noteworthy. Though Cadbury’s challenge came out of a need to challenge the modernization of Jesus within the social gospel, its significance moves beyond that immediate debate: Jesus will undoubtedly always be claimed for many causes. Abuse of the figure of Jesus is easy. And some of the details of Cadbury’s own picture which are not in dispute—Jesus’ Jewishness above all—offer a significant corrective to tendencies present in so much Jesus Research which was emerging in Christian circles.<sup>70</sup>

<sup>69</sup> Weaver, The Historical Jesus, 185.

<sup>70</sup> The social gospel was not in any simple sense anti-Jewish or anti-Semitic. Nor do Jesus-Questers of a Christian background inevitably downplay or misread Jesus’ Jewishness. Within the social gospel movement, Shailer Mathews, for example, sought to locate Jesus firmly in first-century Jewish eschatology (see esp. ch. 3 of W. D. Lindsey, Shailer Mathews’s Lives of Jesus: The Search for a Theological Foundation for the Social Gospel [Albany, NY: State University of New York Press, 1997]). Questions can admit-

Seven decades after Cadbury, of course, things appear less simple. Though his charge and word of warning can be well-heeded, the difficulty of constructing the “capsule picture” to which Weaver refers remains. Furthermore, his position rests on the over-optimistic positivism which has accompanied the Quest in all its forms. I have myself supported the notion that a “positivist moment” inevitably remains part of the Quest, for otherwise Jesus/the Christ can indeed become a cipher, symbol, or principle without any reference to the historical person who gave rise to the “figure” which must go on being interpreted. But support for such a “moment” resists going as far as claiming that any image of the Jesus of history is fully warranted on satisfactory historical-critical grounds.<sup>71</sup>

The pressure to “modernize” does, however, remain inevitable on moral grounds. People beyond church and academy have a right to know what difference it makes to go on interpreting this figure who has proved influential in many cultures. Many in church and academy also recognize that the task of interpreting Jesus has consequences not simply for those attached to these institutions. “Modernization” need not mean “adapt to contemporary concerns.” It could simply mean “try to make accessible.” In this context, what I am calling the “cultural-religious” agenda becomes prominent. As the Jesus Seminar acknowledges, academic study of Jesus has an ethical responsibility which not only affects religions, but society and culture too. In Weaver’s term, this amounts to exploration of “Jesus as Public Icon.”<sup>72</sup>

To get at how the “cultural-religious” agenda takes shape in Western culture, I am using the example of the Lives of Jesus documentaries

---

tedly be raised about Rauschenbusch’s references to Judaism (see e.g. C. Marsh, Christ in Focus: Radical Christocentrism in Christian Theology [London: SCM, 2005], ch. 5). Beyond the social gospel, Bultmann was as clear as anyone about Jesus’ Jewishness, and about the impossibility of presuppositionless exegesis (Bultmann, Jesus, ch. 1 and his famous essay “Is Exegesis without Presuppositions Possible?” in his Existence and Faith [London: Fontana, 1964], 342–351). He was, however, also located within a thought-world (socio-cultural and theological) which required him to accentuate discontinuity between Jesus and his Jewish faith. On this whole question, see now esp. Heschel, Abraham Geiger, esp. chs. 4–5, and S. Kelley, Racializing Jesus: Race, Ideology and the Formation of Modern Biblical Scholarship (London and New York: Routledge, 2002), ch. 5.

<sup>71</sup> This will become more apparent in the “Psychological Agenda” section below.

<sup>72</sup> Weaver, The Historical Jesus, ch. 9, a chapter devoted to an assortment of writers who sought to “popularize” the Quest. Here, by contrast, I am dealing not merely with the popularization of the Quest, but trying to assess also what interest such popularization serves.

made for the BBC in 1996.<sup>73</sup> Mark Tully is a Cambridge theology and history graduate who has spent a large part of his life working for the BBC in India. He made his own forays into the Third Quest material, wanting to offer an evaluation of the “explosion of scholarly interest over the last twenty-five years in discovering more about Jesus the man.”<sup>74</sup> In the course of making his documentaries, he conducted informed interviews with a range of contemporary scholars.<sup>75</sup> His assessment of his qualification for this reads: “I am certainly not a scholar. I am a journalist, a profession not always regarded very kindly by scholars. But journalists do have a role as simplifiers of scholarship.”<sup>76</sup> Tully immediately locates himself, therefore, in the role of popularizer.

His work is, however, more than merely illustrative of the popularization of the scholarly Quest. It is instructive in so far as it explains what human cultures are doing with the figure of Jesus, even when professing secularity, or at least a disinterestedness in religion. Tully again: “From my youngest days I have been fascinated by Jesus, and although I could not claim to be a card-carrying Christian I am certainly no sceptic.”<sup>77</sup> Admittedly, Tully had a fairly traditional introduction to the Christian faith through English Anglicanism and he even began at one stage to study for the priesthood. His time in the Indian sub-continent has, however, left him asking about the ongoing spiritual and cultural significance of the figure of Jesus in a way which cannot easily be contained within Christian orthodoxy in a straightforward way. Tully is thus an example of someone who combines in a highly contemporary way a concern for “spirituality” in the way that Jesus is handled within human cultures. He shows a respect for, but

---

<sup>73</sup> Four documentaries were broadcast, and Tully wrote an accompanying book, God, Jew, Rebel, the Hidden Jesus: An Investigation into the Lives of Jesus (London: BBC Books, 1996). A Study Guide was also produced (ed. P. Millson) containing complete transcripts of the interviews (Manchester: BBC North, 1996).

<sup>74</sup> Tully, God, Jew, Rebel, 6.

<sup>75</sup> Including Richard Burridge, John Dominic Crossan, Gerald Downing, Richard Horsley, Ya'akov Meshorer, Marvin Meyer, Jerome Murphy-O'Connor, Elaine Pagels, David Rosen, E. P. Sanders, and Tom Wright. In addition, Tully made use of the writings of, amongst others, Marcus Borg, the Jesus Seminar and Geza Vermes. His conversation partners outside of Jesus studies included Bishop Azariah of the Diocese of Madras in the Church of South India, Luke Dysinger, Ursula King, Jyoti Sahi, Bishop Kallistos Ware, and Zwi Werblowsky.

<sup>76</sup> Tully, God, Jew, Rebel, 7.

<sup>77</sup> Ibid., 7.

awareness of the limitations of trying to identify and explore by historical-critical means alone, the person who lies behind the figure now portrayed.

The cultural religious agenda at work in the Quest for Jesus recognizes, then, I suggest, that: "... the image of Jesus is inescapably bound up with the archetype of the self in our Western culture... No matter whether one takes an affirming view of Jesus or a devaluing view of Jesus, it is always going to be in order to support a particular view of life, a theology or philosophy."<sup>78</sup> Even those professing no religious interest in Jesus, in other words, are still tangled up in the way in which the figure of Jesus functions in culture. And given that "Jesus" denotes a historical person from the past as well as a symbol of so much else (be it archetypal self, spiritual master, embodiment of God, or whatever), then historians' work is relevant to, even if not wholly determinative of, what cultures do with the image of Jesus.

If historians do not do their own popularizing, however, then someone else has to. The necessary cultural carrying of the figure of Jesus does not, then, depend upon the church and the academy alone. Church and academy are both indebted to the way the figure of Jesus is carried (and used and abused) within cultural life more broadly, in all its ambiguity. This constitutes the cultural-religious agenda bound up within the Quest.

6. A Psychological Agenda

Talk of the "archetypal self" inevitably raises the question of the extent to which a psychological agenda is also at work in the Quest of the Historical Jesus. For do not all contributors come to their task not only with theologies and philosophies as presuppositions, but also with basic understandings of the human self? And do not these theories of the self, and the psychological backgrounds of the contributors, shape what people see in Jesus?

In this section, I shall confirm that psychology is important, though resist the reductionism implied in the two questions just posed. To adapt an already-famous quotation from Crossan, "Life of Jesus research is a safe place to do autobiography and call it biography, although as all historical writing is inevitably affected by autobiography, Life of Jesus research cannot escape this.”<sup>79</sup> The fact that in this exploration of the agendas within Jesus Research the cultural-religious and psychological agendas connect discloses two consequences of the cultural conveying of the figure of Jesus. First, the figure of Jesus carries an existential significance beyond that of the claims made by church and academy alone. Neither an orthodox theological reading nor the work of academic specialists is therefore adequate to identify the functions played by the figure of Jesus. Second, even within the task of undertaking historical Jesus Research, it is inadequate to see the task of interpretation in terms of the lingering impact of a past figure. Interpreters are always themselves caught up in their own enquiries.<sup>80</sup> Thus, though the “positivist moment” remains a necessary component of Jesus Research to serve as a reminder of the limits of projection of all sorts of interests onto the figure of Jesus, it is precisely that: a moment. Projection (be it theological, ethical, political or whatever) remains part of the reconstructive task.<sup>81</sup>

---

<sup>78</sup> H. Childs, The Myth of the Historical Jesus and the Evolution of Consciousness (Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2000), 246–247 (cf. 14).

I shall dwell more on the subjectivity of the interpreter shortly. First we must note that that a psychological agenda can, more obviously, take the form of an attempt to offer a psychological reading of Jesus himself. Despite the apparent paucity of available evidence, this is a path many interpreters have taken during the Quest.<sup>82</sup> Albert Schweitzer offered The Psychiatric Study of Jesus in 1948. But this is only one of twenty-four such studies listed by Hal Childs.<sup>83</sup> Capps addresses the “problem of inadequate evidence” as one of seven criticisms made of

---

<sup>79</sup> The original Crossan quotation reads: “...historical Jesus research is a very safe place to do theology and call it history, to do autobiography and call it biography” (J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus [San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1991], xxviii).

<sup>80</sup> This aspect of historical study has, of course, been prevalent since Schleiermacher and then Dilthey, and was accentuated especially through Hans-Georg Gadamer. In the present, the self-involving character of historical enquiry has received a new twist with postmodernism, especially in the work of Hayden White. The relevance of this development is examined in Childs, The Myth (esp. ch. 3).

<sup>81</sup> See Childs’ critical comments on Crossan (The Myth, 39–40, 226).

<sup>82</sup> This objection has force, given that psychological studies of any depth would usually be expected to be based on interviews with subjects.

<sup>83</sup> Childs, The Myth, 17 n. 45. J. Miller, Jesus at Thirty: A Psychological and Historical Portrait (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1997), and D. Capps, Jesus: A Psychological Biography (St. Louis, MO: Chalice Press, 2000) can now also be added to the list. Miller reviews some of the most notable contributions in an Appendix to his 1997 study.

psychobiography.<sup>84</sup> Nevertheless, both he and Miller have made thoughtful and stimulating contributions to discussion about Jesus' possible psychological background and development. Miller majors on the possibility that the death of his father Joseph may have contributed directly to the reconfigurations Jesus experienced and commended in family and household life.<sup>85</sup> Capps interacts directly with four contemporary Jesus Questers (Sanders, Meier, Crossan and Borg) in working out a reading of Jesus which concludes that his personality type was that of a "utopian melancholic."<sup>86</sup> As with Miller, exploration of Jesus' relationship with Joseph, and the possibility of his father's early death, features prominently in Capps' study. Especially helpful is the extent to which Capps interacts with recent studies of Jesus' social world and offers his psychological portrait within a realistic assessment of Jesus' social context. The social psychological dimensions of Jesus' healing activity are read in this light. A psychological reading of Jesus as "the village healer" is thus located within a "peasant style" approach to the world.

Both of these works remain highly speculative. But they are not for that reason to be neglected. They emphasize how much imagination is needed for the task of historical reconstruction. Capps also summarizes well the obstacle which faces all would-be interpreters of Jesus:

Given two millennia of viewing Jesus as the most perfect human being who ever lived, one is tempted to portray him as having reconciled, in both his internal dynamics and social role, the contradiction not only of his own culture but of human experience itself. This temptation was a major impulse toward the transformation of the historical Jesus into the Christ of Christianity.<sup>87</sup>

Though Capps's second sentence offers an unwarranted claim about theological causality, his first statement stands. To express the point differently: Christian theological claims for Jesus may in fact prevent the possibility of his being appreciated as a human being, despite the fact that full humanity is contained within those theological claims.

That such an approach to Jesus (Jesus as perfect human being) has been implied throughout Western history and has thus affected contemporary engagement with the figure of Jesus, is made clear in Hal

---

<sup>84</sup> Capps, Jesus, 50–59.

<sup>85</sup> For a summary, see Miller, Jesus at Thirty, 97–99.

<sup>86</sup> Capps, Jesus, ch. 8.

<sup>87</sup> Ibid., 220.

Childs' study The Myth of the Historical Jesus and the Evolution of Consciousness. Here, though, the emphasis shifts from statements made about Jesus as a past historical figure, to the recognition that because history-writing is never simply about the past, then what is offered in constructed images of Jesus is always also a combination of disputed data about a past figure and projections of some sort derived from the world of the interpreter.

As already noted, that a psychological dimension is present in hermeneutics has been known since Schleiermacher. The subjectivity of the interpreter has thus been a commonplace of Romanticism's critique of Enlightenment rationalism. Both of these strands of thinking have accompanied the Quest's history. Bultmann's theological-existential encounter with the figure of Jesus can be interpreted as an early twentieth-century form of the same subjective interest. At the end of the century, Crossan can be viewed on the one hand as in continuity with that same Romantic tradition, and on the other (e.g. by Childs) as not nearly continuous enough.<sup>88</sup> What is at stake here?

To assess adequately the psychological agenda at work within the inevitable subjective dimension to Jesus Research we must mention the roles played by projection, imagination and emotion in the interpretative task. By "projection" here I simply mean that whenever an interpreter takes a basically positive view of Jesus, i.e. interprets Jesus as worth studying because of his force for good on humanity, then some form of projection occurs.<sup>89</sup> Furthermore: "Imagination is at the heart of projection... it is this deep sense of imagination that plays a central role in creating images of Jesus."<sup>90</sup> Imagination is not, then, made use of in Jesus Research simply in the form of the historian's speculative leaps between items of "hard" data about Jesus. Imagination also comes into play within the interest implied in what contributors think they are doing their study of Jesus for. No one studies history as if it will not teach us anything. In studying Jesus the individual in the context of what has been made of him, historians know they are dealing with more than the life of a past figure. Emotion is significant too,

---

<sup>88</sup> In Childs' view, despite all indications to the contrary Crossan remains locked in Enlightenment positivism.

<sup>89</sup> Childs develops his thinking along Jungian lines (The Myth, 155 and 171) and considers that projection is at work in Jesus Research. Whether or not his particular Jungian argument can be accepted in full, I think he is right in his basic insight.

<sup>90</sup> Ibid., 237 (see also 99, 124, 244 and 246).

if only to remind an interpreter that history is not a dispassionate discipline and that attention to one's own subjectivity as a historian acknowledges the limits of rationality alone, and the need to treat people as whole persons.<sup>91</sup>

Rather than being reductionist, the adoption of such a psychological agenda to Jesus Research therefore enables greater transparency within the historian's art.<sup>92</sup> Objectivity remains in view in the acknowledgements that it is Jesus who is being interpreted and that a narrative about him is not spun solely out of the interpreter's world. Recognition of a psychological interest at work identifies that there is more to what an interpreter presents than the data they select and expound.

7. A Philosophical Agenda

Finally, I consider the way in which a philosophical agenda is evident in Jesus Research. Clearly, all that has been said so far could be subsumed under the term "philosophical." Anyone respecting a particular political or ethical slant, or acknowledging a specific view of the human self, is adopting a "philosophical position" in a general sense. Here, however, I am being narrow in my definition in recognizing that contributions to the Jesus Quest are inevitably accompanied by some form of philosophical outlook which contains a particular understanding of the nature of reality and which therefore shapes how the historical enquiry is conducted. Sometimes, contributors have actively sought to promote their philosophical viewpoint whilst undertaking Jesus Research. Strauss is a clear example of this in his attempt to promote Hegelian Idealism. In many cases, however, the philosophical standpoint is dealt with cursorily or left unacknowledged. Again, I can only deal with examples and broad sweeps.<sup>93</sup>

Much of the Quest's history has been undertaken under the influence of two main philosophical positions: positivism in historical

---

<sup>91</sup> Childs, The Myth, 14–15 and 99.

<sup>92</sup> Ibid., 86.

<sup>93</sup> The philosophical background to the Quest has been more commented upon in the past than many of the other agendas dealt with in this chapter. Other studies are therefore available. On the so-called "Old Quest," see e.g. Brown, Jesus in European Protestant Thought 1778–1860. For Old Quest through to New Quest see Dawes, The Historical Jesus Question. On philosophical aspects of the latest Quest see e.g. R. Martin, The Elusive Messiah: A Philosophical Overview of the Quest of the Historical Jesus (Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1999).

research, and Idealism in metaphysics. Both are hallmarks of the Enlightenment, and thus the Quest is clearly identifiable as an Enlightenment project. Positivism means that the Quest has always been engaged to a greater or lesser degree in the search for the one, original Jesus. Because there was a historical person Jesus, the search is pursued by rational means, making the best use of hard data (texts especially, but also archaeological finds) and a variety of disciplinary approaches in search of Jesus and his world. The positivist Quest proceeds on the assumption of the existence of agreed principles of universal rationality.

The Idealist background to the Quest means that for much of the Quest's history the search has been concerned with Jesus' teaching or beliefs, with the thought-world in which Jesus moved, or with the God in whom Jesus believed. Though positivism and Idealism do stand in conflict in so far as positivism is more materialist in practice (in its interest in hard data), and Idealism is more concerned with immaterial consciousness or mind, their unifying point lies in the universality which each assumes. There is one Jesus who must be sought; there is one universal reality in which all things participate. Such an approach is, of course, highly complementary with a theological agenda, especially in the latter case. Theology can live more easily with a diversity of Jesus images than it can with a notion of fundamentally fragmented notion of reality, or an absence of any sense of "out-there-ness" beyond the material realm. The irony of the fate of David Friedrich Strauss was that he was far from being untheological in the attention he gave to "myth." By accentuating his philosophical Idealism (towards seeing the divine Spirit as embodied in humanity as a whole, following the example of the "God-man"), Strauss's critics obscured his achievements in recognizing how the gospels needed to be read. The fruitful aspects of his challenge to positivism were overlooked for a long time.

Though dominant, these two philosophical tendencies have, however, not been the only philosophical currents at work in the Quest, and certainly not of late. The methodological relativism in the study of religion which was encouraged especially in the wake of the Religionsgeschichtliche Schule (The History of Religion School) could be contained by the overarching Idealist framework within which their work was undertaken.<sup>94</sup> Exposure to comparative beliefs and ideas in other religious traditions, especially those prior to Christianity's emergence, was a major challenge to Christian theologians. But theologically speaking, the originality of Jesus could still be maintained given the assumption that the one God oversaw all such developments. The "kingdom of God" could still be uniquely shaped by Jesus' preaching and activity whilst lying beyond all earthly manifestations of it.

---

<sup>94</sup> This insight pertains directly to Bultmann and his school, including even those of his pupils who were critical of him (e.g. Käsemann and J. M. Robinson) and sought to set off on a fresh tack in the so-called "New Quest."

Diversity could, however, become problematic when Idealism itself was challenged; and it has been challenged on many fronts. In metaphysics, it has been confronted by the challenge to all notions of any sense of "out-there-ness" to human reality, so that God has either disappeared altogether, or become, in the minds of non-realists, a necessary fiction in human living. Even when unity in human experience might be considered retainable,<sup>95</sup> the extent of human diversity, evident in cultural difference, radical social and geographical particularity ("in religion, you are where you were born") could not but affect the philosophical climate in which all historical enquiry was undertaken. In the Quest itself, as N. T. Wright has rightly noted, "a 'history of ideas' will never get to the bottom either of Jesus or the early church."<sup>96</sup>

It is in this philosophical climate that the Quest is now undertaken. Positivism and Idealism are not dead, but things are not what they used to be. Past certainties are less certain than once thought, and even those astute enough to see what is at stake (Crossan, for example) receive the charge of not being astute enough.<sup>97</sup>

There are counters to this trend, in the post- or late-modern context within which the Quest is now pursued. Craig Evans states quite baldly of the Third Quest that it "is not driven by theological-philosophical concerns."<sup>98</sup> My quibble is with the word "driven." Maybe it is not driven by them. But if it fails to show awareness of them and take account of them, then it may simply be shown to be theologically and philosophically unhelpful. N. T. Wright is one example of a creative New Testament scholar always willing to look at the biggest possible picture of what was going on in the first century. He has also undertaken much philosophical homework in arguing for a "critically

---

<sup>95</sup> Such as Jung, for example, was supplying with his notion of the "collective unconscious."

<sup>96</sup> Wright, Jesus, 660.

<sup>97</sup> E.g. Childs, The Myth, 226.

<sup>98</sup> C. A. Evans, Jesus and His Contemporaries: Comparative Studies (Leiden: Brill, 1995), 11.

realist" position in his approach to history.<sup>99</sup> The results of his endeavours are contained in Jesus and the Victory of God (1996). Wright feels more able than many to draw conclusions from his historical enquiries which complement Christian orthodoxy. Jesus was actively interpreting his life and work in the context of the hope of Yahweh's return to Zion. Jesus saw himself, in Wright's view, as embodying the return of the king.

Wright's confidence in the widespread reliability (for historical purposes) of the canonical gospels is marked, and not shared by all. But whether his assured handling of the texts quite does justice to the freight, and multiple agendas, which the search for Jesus has always carried also beyond the Christian church has yet to be seen. Be that as it may, it is appropriate that at the end of this lengthy exploration of the multiple agendas at work in the Quest we have returned to theology. This is not because it should inevitably have the first and last word, but because it is unavoidable as a conversation-partner when handling questions about Jesus of Nazareth. Whether or not contributors to the Quest are religiously or theologically inclined, the philosophical framework within which the Quest operates requires its contributors to come clean about what they think history, the human self, and reality are all about. There is no escaping this. And in this sense, Childs is quite right to say: "The quest for the historical Jesus will always have a christological agenda—either for some christ or against some christ. Denying the christological agenda simply allows it to remain an unconscious ideology."<sup>100</sup>

8. And Where, and What, is Jesus in All of This?

What can be said in response to this trawl through the many and varied agendas which always accompany the Quest for the historical Jesus? A number of concluding comments suggest themselves.

First, it could be claimed that despite the inevitability of agendas supplementing the historical aim, these other agendas are to be exposed and stripped away. They obscure, rather than assist, the immediate historical task. From all that has been said it should be clear by now that I do not think this is either possible or desirable. Historical enquiry is not value-free and therefore one or more of the agendas described are unavoidably present when historical research into Jesus is undertaken.

---

<sup>99</sup> See esp. N. T. Wright, The New Testament and The People of God (London: SPCK and Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992), part II.

<sup>100</sup> Childs, The Myth, 221.

Does this then mean, second, that Jesus now only “exists” as narrative? Has the figure from history wholly disappeared from view and his image therefore become no more than an ideological playground (battleground, even) in which one narrative Jesus competes against another? In one sense it must be true that Jesus is only narrative now. The person behind the narrative is no more and is lost from view. However, to say this without qualification overlooks how the agendas described actually function. Ethically-orientated interpreters can say that Jesus also exists as performance, for the narrative constructed must do something to people, to encourage or require them to act in certain Jesus-like ways. Religiously or theologically inclined interpreters might say that Jesus also exists as “Spirit,” for the God who was with him can continue to be experienced in and through the images of Jesus constructed in the present. The Quest’s theological and psychological agendas thus imply an ontology and an aesthetics too. To say then, with post-modern historians, that all history is narrative is in danger of stifling the recognition of what narrative history is for and the interests it serves, and the complex, multi-dimensional way in which narratives actually work in human living.

Third, however, we must return to the “positivist moment” which inevitably features within the Quest. Though all seven agendas can be deemed valid,<sup>101</sup> and though positivism in its strongest form really is dead (or should be quietly put to sleep if it is not), there remains the question of how the conflict of multiple interpretations is to be handled. This is especially so when the hard evidence available will never satisfactorily solve the question of how the Jesus of history is portrayed. History does not work like that, and Jesus cannot be captured in that way. Attention to the positivist moment is simply a way of acknowledging that Jesus was not a fictional figure, and that the Quest’s history shows how dangerous it can be when Jesus is turned into a principle or idea, or his teachings are detached from his person.

Perhaps, though, this positivist moment is best respected by means of respect for the significance of the clash of institutional contexts in which the figure of Jesus is explored: church, synagogue, seminary, university, media, political party or campaign.<sup>102</sup> Only through the interplay of a variety of images respecting diverse agendas—as well as the historical—can the one historical Jesus have much of a chance of being adequately grasped. It is not, then, the hard data demanded by a positivist approach which will keep historical research in check. The mutual critique offered by other interpreters of the theologically orthodox (Jesus) Christ, of Jesus as “the Christ ideal,” as “the Christ myth,” as “the archetypal self,” as the spiritual hero, as the perfect human worthy of imitation, or as the centre of a mystical movement will enable Jesus to be kept in view. Even if Jesus will only always “exist” in this contested space in hotly-disputed narrative form, the mutual critique is vital. In this way, the agendas which constantly accompany the historical Quest will be respected, whilst the figure of Jesus continues to do what he/it has always done: sought to promote life in all its fullness.

---

<sup>101</sup> Even if disputes are inevitable as to their relative importance or usefulness.

---

<sup>102</sup> One could also add the arts here, though this would take us much further beyond the historical Quest as such, towards theology, christology and culture more generally.

JESUS OF NAZARETH AND THE CHRIST OF FAITH: APPROACHES TO THE QUESTION IN HISTORICAL JESUS RESEARCH

SVEN-OLAV BACK

1. Introduction

According to the faith of the Church Catholic, Jesus of Nazareth is the Christ and the Son of God. Where does the origin of this faith lie? Is it with Jesus himself, or was it born in the post-Easter church? In that case, is there nevertheless some sort of continuity between Jesus' view of himself and the christology of the church? Or is the christological dogma of the church rather something radically new, perhaps even representing a betrayal of Jesus and his message? Questions like these have been on the agenda of historical Jesus research since the Old Quest.

As Albert Schweitzer pointed out, "the historical investigation of the life of Jesus did not take its rise from a purely historical interest."<sup>1</sup> There was, rather, an anti-dogmatic agenda from the very beginning of Jesus research: "it turned to the Jesus of history as an ally in the struggle against the tyranny of dogma."<sup>2</sup> In his assessment of the Old Quest for the historical Jesus, Schweitzer further noted that "each successive epoch of theology found its own thoughts in Jesus" and even, that "each individual created Jesus in accordance with his own character."<sup>3</sup> In other words, having rejected the Christ of faith, the questers, in their flight from dogma, did not find the real Jesus, but the Christ of their respective private judgments.<sup>4</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> Albert Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus, First Complete (English) Edition, ed. John Bowden (London: SCM, 2000), 5.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid., 5.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid., 6. Nevertheless, Schweitzer found some exceptions to this rule, e.g., Johannes Weiß and Schweitzer himself.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. Martin Kähler, Der sogenannte historische Jesus und der geschichtliche, biblische Christus, ed. E. Wolf (München: Kaiser, 1953 [1st ed. 1892]), 30, commenting on the nineteenth century life-of-Jesus research: "Es ist zumeist der Herren eigener Geist, in dem Jesus sich spiegelt." Ibid., 29: "Vor einem Dogma, wenn es ehrlich als solches geboten wird, ist heute jedermann auf seiner Hut. Erscheint aber die Christologie als

In the New Quest there was also an interest in christology. Indeed, as John Reumann notes, “at bottom it represented a new interest in allowing or finding in Jesus some glint of Christology,”<sup>5</sup> be that an explicit or an implicit one. Ironically, the wide use (or abuse) of the criterion of dissimilarity worked somewhat in the opposite direction.

The problem of the relationship between Jesus of Nazareth and the Christ of faith is, of course, still there in Jesus research. Even today, the interest in the question, generally speaking, is hardly of a purely historical kind. Rather, James D. G. Dunn argues, “the flight from dogma continues to be a motivating force in attempts to reconstruct the historical Jesus.”<sup>6</sup> And Jörg Frey, looking back at the Old Quest and comparing it with recent research, comments: “Die historische Frage nach Jesus wird... zunächst formuliert als Infragestellung der Christologie, und sie lebt—zumindst in manchen ihrer Vertreter—bis heute von diesem antidogmatischen Impetus, der freilich alles andere als eine ‘undogmatische’ Haltung widerspiegelt.”<sup>7</sup>

---

Leben Jesu, dann sind nicht mehr viele, welche den dogmatisierenden Regisseur hinter den fesselnden Schauspiel des farbenreich gemalten Lebensbildes spüren.” In spite of the criticism of Schweitzer and Kähler, the modernizing of Jesus continued; see the observations and warnings in Henry J. Cadbury, The Peril of Modernizing Jesus (London: SPCK, 1962 [1st ed. 1937]).

<sup>5</sup> John Reumann, “Jesus and Christology”, in The New Testament and Its Modern Interpreters, ed. Eldon Jay Epp and George W. MacRae (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1989), 501.

<sup>6</sup> James D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered, Christianity in the Making 1 (Grand Rapids and Cambridge, UK: Eerdmans, 2003), 65, referring primarily to what he terms the “neo-Liberal” quest (ibid., 58–65). According to Dieter Lührmann, the conflict with dogma is nowadays mostly a phenomenon in the Roman Catholic context, where “they still have a dogma which can be criticized” (“Marinus de Jonge’s Shaffer Lectures: Where Does Jesus Research Now Stand?” in From Jesus to John: Essays on Jesus and New Testament Christology in Honour of Marinus de Jonge, ed. Martinus C. de Boer, JSNTSup 84 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993), 57).

<sup>7</sup> Jörg Frey, “Der historische Jesus und der Christus der Evangelien,” in Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. Jens Schröter and Ralph Brucker (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002), 275. According to M. Eugene Borings, theological concerns tend to be “implicit and inescapable” even in Third Quest-reconstructions of Jesus (“The ‘Third Quest’ and the Apostolic Faith”, Int 50 [1996]: 46–47). Barry W. Henaut, commenting on Jesus research in general, argues that “every presentation of Jesus’ life and thought creates a de facto Christ of faith” (“Is the ‘Historical Jesus’ a Christological Construct?”, in Whose Historical Jesus?, ed. William E. Arnal and Michel Desjardins (Studies in Christianity and Judaism 7 [Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1997], 241). By “Christ of faith,” Henaut means what I would rather term a “Christ of private judgment.” For a perspective other than that of Frey, cf. Robert W. Funk, Honest to Jesus: Jesus for a New Millennium (San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1996), 65: scholars involved in the so-called Third Quest “are really conducting a search primarily for historical evidence to sup-

This article looks at some recent approaches and theses in Jesus research concerning the question of continuity (or discontinuity) between Jesus of Nazareth and the Christ of faith.<sup>8</sup> By “Christ of faith” I refer to the christological dogma of the Church Catholic, as it is expressed in the Nicene and Apostolic creeds.<sup>9</sup> In these creeds, Jesus is confessed as the Messiah/Christ (Apostolicum) and as the incarnate Wisdom of God (Nicaenum).<sup>10</sup> Hence, the following pages focus on the question whether Jesus might have understood himself as the Messiah and/or the Wisdom of God in person, or rather, how this question has been dealt with in recent Jesus research.<sup>11</sup> The port claims made on behalf of creedal Christianity and the canonical gospels. In other words, the third quest is an apologetic ploy.” Funk himself thinks “we should either revise or eliminate the creeds” (312).

---

<sup>8</sup> There is no need here to discuss the distinction between Jesus-as-he-really was (or is) and the Jesus reconstructed by scholars working with certain methods and sources. We are dealing with reconstructions by scholars, who know that their historical reconstructions cannot be equated with the “real Jesus.” Cf. John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, I: The Roots of the Problem and the Person (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 21–40; Boring, “Third Quest,” 345–354; Luke Timothy Johnson, The Real Jesus: The Misguided Quest for the Historical Jesus and the Truth of the Traditional Gospels (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1996), 81–86; Dunn, Jesus, 125–126.

<sup>9</sup> “The Christ of faith,” then, is not a shortcut for, e.g., “Christian faith” in general, or the fides qua of individuals, or the “Christ” of private judgments. The “faith” in question is, of course, the faith of the church.

<sup>10</sup> See, e.g., Jaroslav Pelikan, The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition (100–600), The Christian Tradition: A History of the Development of Doctrine, 1 (Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press, 1971); Robert M. Grant, Jesus after the Gospels: The Christ of the Second Century (London: SCM, 1990); Oskar Skarsaune, Inkarnasjonen—myte eller faktum? (Oslo: Lunde Forlag, 1988); idem, Og Ordet ble kjød: Studier i oldkirkens teologi (Oslo: Luther Forlag, 2001).

<sup>11</sup> This is part of the broader question regarding the emergence and development of Christology in earliest times. Cf., e.g., Martin Hengel, Der Sohn Gottes: Die Entstehung der Christologie und die jüdisch-hellenistische Religionsgeschichte (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1975); James D. G. Dunn, Christology in the Making: An Inquiry into the Origins of the Doctrine of the Incarnation (London: SCM, 1980); Christopher M. Tuckett, Christology and the New Testament: Jesus and His Earliest Followers (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2001). Here I do not enter into the broader question, but try to focus on Jesus research in spite of the fact that there is no clear dividing line between the different areas of research. I will also disregard discussions of the relationship between “history” and “revelation,” or of the “relevance” of Jesus research for “faith.” For different perspectives, cf. Johnson, Jesus; Matthias Kreplin, Das Selbstverständnis Jesu: hermeneutische und christologische Reflexion; historisch-kritische Analyse, WUNT 2.141 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001), 9–73. Some recent reflections from a systematic theologian may be studied in Asger Chr. Højlund, “Den historiske Jesus og kristologien”, Ichthys 7 (2001): 27–40.

question of (a possibly Jesuanic) Wisdom Christology is handled very briefly; the emphasis is placed on the problem of Jesus' messiahship.<sup>12</sup>

By "Wisdom Christology" I here mean an interpretation of the person of Jesus in terms of Prov 8:22–31 and/or other texts referring to the divine person/hypostasis Wisdom.<sup>13</sup>

The problem of defining the Messiah concept is more complicated. A reasonable definition is the one proposed by Collins: "[A] messiah is an eschatological figure who sometimes, but not necessarily always, is designated as a משיח in the ancient sources."<sup>14</sup> As Collins explains, royal, priestly and prophetic eschatological figures may be designated in this way in ancient Jewish literature.<sup>15</sup> We will see below, however, that other views have also been espoused in both older and more recent scholarly literature.

This paper is not an attempt at writing anything like a full history of recent research, but rather a glance at some—perhaps quite randomly selected—theses. As a rule I have tried to avoid straying onto the ground covered by John Reumann's 1989 article "Jesus and Christology,"<sup>16</sup> although there is, at some points, an inevitable overlap.

Initially this paper turns to the problem of Jesus' messiahship. Firstly, we will look at some proposals to the effect that Jesus made no messianic claims, but that his ministry was a non-messianic one (2); secondly, there is an overview of the arguments of a few scholars for an implicit Christology on the part of Jesus (3);<sup>17</sup> thirdly, some

<sup>12</sup> The "son of man" problem, however, will not receive more than cursory attention within the limits of this article.

<sup>13</sup> For this christology in some early Christian hymns/formulae, see John 1:1–18; 1 Cor 8:6; Phil 2:5–11; Col 1:15–18; Heb 1:2–3; Rev 3:14. For the most important Old Testament and ancient Jewish wisdom texts, see n. 168 below.

<sup>14</sup> John J. Collins, The Scepter and the Star: The Messiahs of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Other Ancient Literature (New York: Doubleday, 1995), 12. Cf. the discussion in Johannes Zimmermann, Messianische Texte aus Qumran: Königliche, priesterliche und prophetische Messiasvorstellungen in den Schriftfunden von Qumran, WUNT 2.104 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1998), 16–18.

<sup>15</sup> Collins, Scepter. On the prophetic Messiah, see in particular Florentino García Martínez, "Messianische Erwartungen in den Qumranschriften," in Der Messias, Jahrbuch für biblische Theologie 8 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1993), 203–207; Collins, Scepter, 116–122; Zimmermann, Messianische Texte, 312–417.

<sup>16</sup> See above, n. 5.

<sup>17</sup> These scholars argue that Jesus made a distinct self-claim without making any use of messianic (or Christological) titles. For the sake of convenience—rather than clarity—I have chosen the broader category "christology" here, not the stricter "messianology." Now and then we will also run into the phenomenon of an "evoked" christology. Since this is by definition a christology of others than Jesus, there is no point in treating it in its own right here.

works, where the case is made for Jesus having made an explicit messianic self-claim, are discussed (4). In a further section, the question regarding a Wisdom Christology in the Jesus tradition receives our attention (5). Finally, there are some tentative reflections (6).

2. A Non-Messianic Ministry?

The hypothesis of Jesus' pre-Easter ministry as a non-messianic one—and the “resurrection” as the terminus post quem and the cause of the belief in Jesus' messiahship—was proposed by William Wrede in his work Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien.<sup>18</sup> Among Wrede's nineteenth-century prodromoi,<sup>19</sup> Gustav Volkmar had contended that, since Jesus' contemporaries thought of the Messiah solely in political terms, it was clear that “had Jesus desired the messiahship, he could have claimed it only in this political sense.” The only alternative was “to suppose that he did not desire it.”<sup>20</sup>

At this point, some reflections should be made regarding the methodological problem that comes into focus here. A century before Volkmar, Reimarus (1694–1768) had argued that Jesus must have shared his contemporaries' views on the kingdom of God and the Messiah.<sup>21</sup> Against Reimarus, Semler (1725–1791) maintained that Jesus had modified and transformed the contemporary Jewish view into something new.<sup>22</sup> Colani later (1864) argued in a way that was similar to Semler's,<sup>23</sup> whereas Volkmar followed the same path as Reimarus. The alternatives are still there today. As is well known, Harvey discussed the matter in Jesus and the Constraints of History,

<sup>18</sup> William Wrede, Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien: Zugleich ein Beitrag zum Verständnis des Markusevangeliums, 2nd ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1913). Although Wrede tries to be cautious when phrasing his conclusions, he nevertheless seems to have made up his mind regarding the non-messianic character of Jesus' ministry (221–222, 229, 239).

<sup>19</sup> In addition to Volkmar, Wrede refers to Bruno Bauer and S. Hoekstra (Messiasgeheimnis, 280–286).

<sup>20</sup> Schweitzer, Quest, 193, discussing Volkmar's 1882 work Jesus Nazarenus und die erste christliche Zeit, mit den beiden ersten Erzählern.

<sup>21</sup> Schweitzer, Quest, 17–18, on Reimarus' Von dem Zwecke Jesu und seiner Jünger (1778).

<sup>22</sup> Colin Brown, Jesus in Protestant Thought 1778–1860 (Durham, NC: The Labyrinth Press, 1985), 11, on Johann Salomo Semler, Beantwortung der Fragmente eines Ungenannten insbesondere vom Zwecke Jesu und seiner Jünger (1779).

<sup>23</sup> Schweitzer, Quest, 190–192, on Timothée Colani, Jésus-Christ et les croyances messianiques de son temps (1864).

stating among other things: “No individual, if he wishes to influence others, is totally free to choose his own style of action and persuasion: he is subject to constraints imposed by the culture in which he finds himself.”<sup>24</sup> As far as Jesus is concerned, “he had to speak a language they [sc. his contemporaries] could understand.”<sup>25</sup> On the other hand, however, we cannot insist “that he must have been totally subject to these constraints. Like any truly creative person, he could doubtless bend them to his purpose.”<sup>26</sup>

Now we return to Volkmar. He simply rejected the idea that Jesus may have “set himself up as Messiah but in another than the popular sense” and, accordingly, asserted that “Jesus could not possibly have come forward with messianic claims.”<sup>27</sup>

The above-mentioned and some other suggestions by Volkmar were incorporated by Wrede in his Messiasgeheimnis. The leading critics of the day were far from convinced by Wrede’s argument,<sup>28</sup> but his views were later on well received by Rudolf Bultmann and strongly promoted by him.<sup>29</sup>

The Bultmann version of the hypothesis is as follows: (1) According to the traditional Jewish view, the Messiah is a king (e.g. Pss. Sol. 17:23). Jesus, however, was a rabbi, a prophet, and an exorcist, but did not

---

<sup>24</sup> Anthony E. Harvey, Jesus and the Constraints of History: The Bampton Lectures, 1980 (London: Duckworth, 1982), 6.

<sup>25</sup> Ibid., 7.

<sup>26</sup> Ibid. Cf. the criterion of “The Plausibility of Historical Context” as defined by Theissen and Winter in their discussion of the criteria of authenticity in Jesus research: “Contextual Appropriateness” must be combined with and balanced by “Contextual Distinctiveness.” “We are looking for distinctive individual traits of Jesus within the framework of the Judaism of his own time” (Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter, The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria, trans. M. Eugene Boring (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 2002), 179–188, at 185).

<sup>27</sup> Schweitzer, Quest, 193.

<sup>28</sup> See Martin Hengel, “Jesus der Messias Israels,” in Martin Hengel and Anna Maria Schwemer, Der messianische Anspruch Jesu und die Anfänge der Christologie: Vier Studien, WUNT 138 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001), 20–25, with references to H. J. Holtzmann, Wilhelm Bousset, Julius Wellhausen, Johannes Weiß, Paul Wernle, and Hermann von Soden. For Schweitzer’s criticism of Wrede, see Quest, 309–310. Cf. however Martin Dibelius, Die urchristliche Überlieferung von Johannes dem Täufer, FRLANT 15 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1911), 64.

<sup>29</sup> E.g., Rudolf Bultmann, Theologie des Neuen Testaments, 9th ed. (Tübingen: Otto Merk, Mohr Siebeck, 1984) 26–34. See also “Die Frage nach dem messianischen Bewußtsein Jesu und das Petrus-Bekenntnis,” in idem, Exegetica: Aufsätze zur Erforschung des Neuen Testaments, ed. Erich Dinkler (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1967), 1–9.

claim to be a king.<sup>30</sup> (2) There is no evidence for the view that Jesus should have transformed or spiritualized “the traditional Messiah concept,”<sup>31</sup> (3) nor did Jesus claim to be the future Messiah. True, he probably spoke about the coming Son of Man, but he did not thereby refer to himself, but to some other figure.<sup>32</sup> (4) Texts such as Rom 1:4 and Acts 2:36 are the remains of an early view, according to which Jesus’ messiahship did not begin until after the resurrection.<sup>33</sup> (5) The gospel stories that indicate belief in Jesus’ messiahship or describe him as the Messiah during his earthly ministry are unhistorical legends or retrojected Easter stories.<sup>34</sup> (6) That the life of Jesus should have been non-messianic soon became an intolerable enigma, and Jesus’ past ministry was instead seen in the light of the messianic faith of Hellenistic Christian circles. The theory of the Messiasgeheimnis was developed, but due to its self-contradictory character this theory reveals more than it conceals; Jesus’ command in Mark 9:9 is especially telling.<sup>35</sup>

Through the influence of Bultmann and his school, Wrede’s hypothesis did not remain a path less travelled by, but became a well-trodden one. (The fact that Wrede himself had second thoughts on the question towards the end of his life went almost completely unnoticed during the twentieth century.)<sup>36</sup> Even today, the hypothesis of a non-messianic ministry of Jesus appears to be quite popular. It is endorsed not only by “revisionists” arguing for a non-eschatological

<sup>30</sup> Bultmann, Theologie, 28–29; cf. Wrede, Messiasgeheimnis, 216–217.

<sup>31</sup> Bultmann, Theologie, 29–30; and earlier Wrede, Messiasgeheimnis, 43–45, 220. But what about the suffering of the Messiah? “In den Leidensweissagungen ist freilich der jüdische Messias-Menschensohn-Begriff umgeprägt... Aber diese Neuprägung ist nicht von Jesus selbst, sondern von der Gemeinde ex eventu vorgenommen worden” (Bultmann, Theologie, 32). “Wir haben den nackten Ausdruck der Gemeindegemeinschaft vor uns und weiter nichts” (Wrede, Messiasgeheimnis, 91).

<sup>32</sup> Bultmann, Theologie, 30–32. In Wrede’s opinion, the sayings concerning the coming Son of Man presuppose a Christian understanding of the Messiah (Messiasgeheimnis, 219).

<sup>33</sup> Bultmann, Theologie, 28; see also Wrede, Messiasgeheimnis, 213–215, 235.

<sup>34</sup> Bultmann, Theologie, 27–28; cf. Wrede, Messiasgeheimnis, 31, 47–51 and passim.

<sup>35</sup> Bultmann, Theologie, 33; Wrede, Messiasgeheimnis, 66–69 and passim.

<sup>36</sup> In a letter to Adolf von Harnack (January 2, 1906), Wrede was prepared to accept that Jesus saw himself as Messias designatus: “Ich bin geneigter als früher zu glauben, daß Jesus selbst sich als zum Messias ausersehen betrachtet hat.” The letter was not published until 2001. See references and comments in Hengel and Schwemer, Der messianische Anspruch Jesu, IX–XI.

Jesus,<sup>37</sup> but also by scholars who defend a more “traditional” eschatological interpretation of Jesus’ ministry and message.

In his work Jesus after Two Thousand Years, Gerd Lüdemann emphasises the importance of separating the Jesus of history from the Christ of faith, and sounds a warning against attempts to “unify” Jesus and Christ, for this would imply an attempt to “overturn the historical consciousness of modernity.”<sup>38</sup> That consciousness, however, is of utmost importance, and “since the great confessions and religions have failed, it is the only approach which is capable of building up peace between human beings and their ideologies and religions.”<sup>39</sup>

According to Lüdemann, Jesus was a proclaimer of the eschatological kingdom of God. He understood his miracles as signs of the in-breaking of this Kingdom. He hoped that, by divine intervention, the twelve tribes of Israel would soon be restored. Then, he and his twelve disciples would be judges of Israel and rulers in the Kingdom.<sup>40</sup>

But there is no authentic evidence to show that Jesus should have made any messianic claims. There are no implicit messianic claims in authentic sayings such as Luke 7:22–23/Matt 11:5–6 or Mark 14:58.<sup>41</sup> The Markan account of the triumphal entry into Jerusalem does have clear messianic connotations, but it is a post-Easter “messianic legend.”<sup>42</sup> The account of the trial and condemnation in Mark 14 has no historical value (apart from Mark 14:58), and Mark 14:61–62 is a “compendium” of Markan Christology.<sup>43</sup>

Jesus’ temple action was the cause of the Jewish authorities’ delivering him to the Romans, who—for some reason—crucified him as “an emergent political messiah.”<sup>44</sup> This was exactly what Jesus did not <sup>37</sup> The works of these scholars (Crossan, Borg, Mack, etc.) have been discussed extensively by others; see, e.g., N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, Christian Origins and the Question of God 2 (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996), 28–82. There is no need here to go over the same ground once more.

---

<sup>38</sup> Gerd Lüdemann, Jesus after Two Thousand Years: What He Really Said and Did (London: SCM, 2000), 3. At the end of this book, there is a helpful “Index of All the Authentic Sayings and Actions of Jesus” (694–695).

<sup>39</sup> Ibid., 3.

<sup>40</sup> Ibid., 25, 211–212, 689–690.

<sup>41</sup> Ibid., 78, 306.

<sup>42</sup> Ibid., 75–76.

<sup>43</sup> Ibid., 101–102. Lüdemann asserts that Mark 14:53–65 was composed on the basis of the account of the hearing before Pilate (Mark 15:1–5.15b–20a); hence, it is unhistorical.

<sup>44</sup> Ibid., 77, 102, 108. Lüdemann accepts the titulus crucis (Mark 15:26) as authentic (ibid., 108).

want to be, for when Peter “confessed” him as the Messiah (i.e., the political Messiah), Jesus rejected this “confession” as a satanic misunderstanding.<sup>45</sup>

According to H. J. de Jonge, Jesus regarded the proclamation of the kingdom of God as his primary task. Moreover, he saw his own actions as the beginning of the Kingdom.<sup>46</sup> Jesus understood himself as one in the line of the prophets of Israel, but since time was “up,” Jesus thought he was “God’s definitive prophet.”<sup>47</sup>

Contrary to the Wrede/Bultmann hypothesis, de Jonge also argues that Jesus must indeed have been regarded as the Messiah, the “anointed one,” during his earthly ministry.<sup>48</sup> Now the term “anointed,” when applied to Jesus, clearly implies the idea of a (future) “king.” Jesus, however, had no ordinary political ambitions and would not, then, have considered himself to be “anointed.” Hence, we can assume that “it was not Jesus who applied the title of ‘anointed one’ to himself but some of his followers.”<sup>49</sup> This assumption receives support from the fact that the Q-source does not use the term Χριστός for Jesus, suggesting that not all followers of Jesus regarded him as Χριστός, which, in turn, is hard to understand if he indeed had proclaimed himself as the Messiah.<sup>50</sup>

In de Jonge’s view, then, Jesus did not claim to be the Messiah (nor did he refer to himself as the Son of Man).<sup>51</sup> De Jonge reasons that this reconstruction is not only harmless but also salutary, since “it makes him [Jesus] more worthy of belief” if others applied these

---

<sup>45</sup> Lüdemann, Jesus, 56–57. For a classical statement of this thesis, see Erich Dinkler, “Petrusbekenntnis und Satanswort: das Problem der Messianität Jesu”, in idem, Signum Crucis: Aufsätze zum Neuen Testament und zur christlichen Archäologie (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1967), 283–312.

<sup>46</sup> H. J. de Jonge, “The Historical Jesus’ View of Himself and of His Mission,” in From Jesus to John, 35–36. In this article, H. J. de Jonge offers a critical examination of the views of Marinus de Jonge regarding Jesus’ messianic claims (cf. n. 49).

<sup>47</sup> de Jonge, “Jesus’ View,” 36.

<sup>48</sup> Ibid., 24, with reference to early and frequent pre-Pauline formulae such as “Christ has died,” as well as to the pointlessness of applying the title “anointed” to Jesus after his death, “as something new, if it had not already been bestowed on him.”

<sup>49</sup> de Jonge, “Jesus View,” 24–27, at 27. H. J. de Jonge rejects the suggestion of Marinus de Jonge to the effect that Jesus may have understood himself as the Messiah in another sense than the national-political one, viz. as a “prophetic Son of David” (27). Cf. Marinus de Jonge, Jesus, the Servant-Messiah (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1991), 68–72.

<sup>50</sup> de Jonge, “Jesus’ View,” 27.

<sup>51</sup> Ibid., 30–34.

titles to him rather than if he had used them himself.<sup>52</sup> And, “Would theology and the church not do better, when putting into words the meaning of Jesus for a present-day audience, to refrain from using such unclear, misleading functional terms as ‘Christ,’ ‘Messiah’ and ‘Son of Man’?”<sup>53</sup>

Jürgen Becker must also be mentioned in this context. According to Becker, Jesus understood himself as a prophet of the end-time. He did not proclaim himself, but God’s kingdom. Moreover, he not only proclaimed the Kingdom, but was bringing it in through his person and work. “Jesus versteht sich in besonderer Weise als Prophet der Endzeit, der Gottes Herrschaft bei den Menschen Realität werden läßt.”<sup>54</sup>

In spite of the fact that Jesus, as understood by Becker, saw himself as bringing in the Kingdom and thus fulfilling a decisive role in the eschatological salvation of Israel, he had nothing to say about himself that could be understood as christology. In no way did he claim to be the Messiah (or the Son of Man), and it makes no sense to describe Jesus’ self-understanding in terms such as “christology in the making” (“Christologie im Vollzug”) or “indirect christology.” Jesus was “ganz innerhalb des frühjüdischen Prophetismus.”<sup>55</sup>

Becker rejects some of the evidence that could be brought into play against this position: Peter’s confession before Jesus (Mark 8:27–33) is a post-Easter construction,<sup>56</sup> as is Jesus’ own messianic confession before Caiaphas in Mark 14:62. Against the authenticity of the latter, Becker has a collection of arguments that is sizeable, but of slightly doubtful value.<sup>57</sup> Further, he finds no synoptic passages representing Jesus as a prophetic Messiah.<sup>58</sup> As far as the titulus crucis (Mark 15:26) is concerned, Becker accepts its historicity, but he sees no connection at all to a messianic confession of Jesus. In fact, the reader

<sup>52</sup> de Jonge, “Jesus’ View,” 37.

<sup>53</sup> Ibid., 37.

<sup>54</sup> Jürgen Becker, Jesus von Nazaret (Berlin/New York: de Gruyter, 1996), 266–274, at 266.

<sup>55</sup> Ibid., 246–267, 272 (here the quotations).

<sup>56</sup> Ibid., 247.

<sup>57</sup> Ibid., 248, 428–429. Becker’s main point is that Mark 14:61–62 belongs to the redactional layer of the trial scene. The reasons for this suggestion, as indicated by Becker, are quite scant (428–429).

<sup>58</sup> Ibid., 246: “Die synoptische Tradition bedient sich der Erwartung eines gesalbten Propheten nicht.”

does not get to know why Jesus, in Becker's view, should have been crucified as a "king of the Jews."<sup>59</sup>

The Fellows of the Jesus Seminar want to set the real Jesus free from creed and dogma. However, as Jesus was also misunderstood by biblical scholarship during most of the twentieth century, "the liberation of the non-eschatological Jesus of the aphorisms and parables from Schweitzer's eschatological Jesus" is also an important task.<sup>60</sup>

The eschatological misrepresentation of Jesus arose among his followers "once Jesus was not there to remind them." One of the ingredients in this false reinterpretation of Jesus was the belief in his messiahship.<sup>61</sup> This idea is reflected in, e.g., the stories about Peter's confession ("the creation of the storyteller"), the triumphal entry into Jerusalem ("a contrivance of the evangelist"), and the trial scene with Jesus' answer to Caiaphas ("mostly a fabrication of the Christian imagination"). As far as Jesus' response to the Baptist is concerned (Luke 7:22–23/Matt 11:5–6), the list of activities is taken from the scriptures, "which means (!) that this response is a piece of Christian apologetic, designed to demonstrate that these activities fulfil ancient prophecies."<sup>62</sup>

These judgments are related to the "rules of evidence" that enable scholars to "pick out a distinctive voice in a Galilean crowd."<sup>63</sup> One of these rules (!) is this: "Jesus makes no claim to be the Anointed, the messiah."<sup>64</sup> On what basis was this rule formulated? The Fellows explain:

Jesus taught that the last will be first and the first will be last. He admonished his followers to be servants of everyone. He urged humility as the cardinal virtue by both word and example. Given these terms, it is difficult to imagine Jesus making claims for himself—I am the son of God, I am the expected One, the Anointed—unless, of course, he thought that nothing he said applied to himself.<sup>65</sup>

<sup>59</sup> Becker, Jesus, 435–437.

<sup>60</sup> Robert W. Funk, Roy W. Hoover, and the Jesus Seminar, The Five Gospels: The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus (New York: Scribner, 1996), 1–8, at 4.

<sup>61</sup> Ibid., 4.

<sup>62</sup> Ibid., 75, 97, 121, 177–178.

<sup>63</sup> Ibid., 30–34, at 30.

<sup>64</sup> Ibid., 32.

<sup>65</sup> Ibid., 33. The Fellows, however, deem it probable that Jesus made the "outrageous" demand, "Follow me, and leave it to the dead to bury their own dead" (Matt 8:22). Also, he does not seem to have avoided insulting his audience: "You phony, first

3. Implicit Christology?

Ernst Käsemann and Günther Bornkamm were prominent among earlier scholars who detected an implicit christology in Jesus' proclamation, i.e., they held that Jesus made a distinct self-claim—he was more than, say, a rabbi or a prophet—without making any use of messianic (or christological) titles.<sup>66</sup>

Käsemann turned his attention to gospel material that may be regarded as authentic on the basis of the criterion of dissimilarity.<sup>67</sup> Here, he found a claim to authority that implied that Jesus wanted to be more than a rabbi or a prophet:

Die einzige Kategorie, die seinem Anspruch gerecht wird, ist, völlig unabhängig davon, ob er sie selber benutzt und gefordert hat oder nicht, diejenige, welche seine Jünger ihm denn auch beigemessen haben, nämlich die des Messias.<sup>68</sup>

---

take the timber out of your own eye..." (Matt 7:5) (Funk et al., Five Gospels, 153–154, 160–161). Apparently, then, Jesus' demand of humility did not apply to himself.

<sup>66</sup> Ernst Käsemann, "Das Problem des historischen Jesus," in idem, Exegetische Versuche und Besinnungen, 1, 2nd ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1960), 187–214; Günther Bornkamm, Jesus von Nazareth, 13th ed. (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1983). On Jesus' non-use of titles, see Käsemann, "Problem," 211, 213; Bornkamm, Jesus, 61, 150–157, 198–202. The idea of an implicit christology on the part of Jesus seems to have been introduced by Bultmann; see a discussion with references in Jacques Schlosser, "Q et la christologie implicite," in The Sayings Source Q and the Historical Jesus, ed. Andreas Lindemann, BETL 158 (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 2001), 290–292. Bultmann, however, did not see any great significance here; see Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, Der historische Jesus: ein Lehrbuch, 2nd ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997), 27 n. 17.

<sup>67</sup> Käsemann, "Problem," 205. As both the context and the wording make clear, Käsemann does not indicate that the criterion should be used negatively. Rather, it is the only criterion which is able to provide some certainty: "Einigermaßen sicheren Boden haben wir nur in einem einzigen Fall unter den Füßen..." (205, emphasis added). Cf. 204–206, 211–212. Many others have mistakenly used the criterion as a criterion of non-authenticity. A mistake made by Käsemann himself is the demand of a double dissimilarity: "...wenn nämlich Tradition aus irgendwelchen Gründen weder aus dem Judentum abgeleitet noch der Urchristenheit zugeschrieben werden kann..." (205). This demand "errs by excess," as Ben F. Meyer noted (The Aims of Jesus [London: SCM, 1979], 86). Käsemann also introduced some confusion by linking the criterion of dissimilarity to the question of characteristic features in Jesus' proclamation ("Problem," 211, 213). For recent discussions of the dissimilarity criterion, see Theissen and Winter, Quest; Tom Holmén, "Doubts About Double Dissimilarity: Restructuring the Main Criterion of Jesus-of-history Research," in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. Bruce D. Chilton and Craig A. Evans (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 47–80.

<sup>68</sup> Käsemann, "Problem," 206, commenting on the "But I say to you..." in the first, second and fourth antitheses of the Sermon on the Mount. Other sayings that

However, all passages containing a Messiasprädikat are to be understood as Gemeindekerygma.<sup>69</sup>

Bornkamm followed the reasoning of Wrede and Bultmann up to a certain point,<sup>70</sup> but rejected their conclusion regarding the non-messianic character of Jesus' ministry, pointing out the messianic expectations that Jesus must have evoked.<sup>71</sup> He argued that Jesus was unwilling to encourage these expectations,<sup>72</sup> but he also noted the Anspruch of Jesus embedded in the Kingdom proclamation, and observed here the pre-Easter roots of the titles that the post-Easter church bestowed on the risen Jesus.<sup>73</sup> This Anspruch, however, was only an implicit one, and Jesus did not make his status a main theme in his proclamation: "[D]ies gerade gehört zu der Eigenart seiner Botschaft und seines Tuns, daß Jesus in seinem Wort und seinem Tun aufgeht und nicht seine Würde zu einem eigenen Thema seiner Botschaft vor allem andern macht."<sup>74</sup>

Of the many scholars reasoning along the lines indicated above, Helmut Merklein must without doubt be mentioned here.<sup>75</sup> Merklein

---

Käsemann finds authentic on the basis of the dissimilarity criterion include Mark 2:27; 7:15; Matt 6:25–34; 10:26–27; 11:12–13; in addition, he refers to the "Amen" sayings (206–211). For another Spitzenaussage on implicit christology, cf. 213: "Das Evangelium ist an den gebunden, der sich vor und nach Ostern den Seinigen als Herr offenbarte, indem er sie vor den nahen Gott... stellte. Er tat es einst ohne jede ausweisbare Legitimation und selbst ohne den Anspruch, der Messias zu sein, und tat es doch in der Vollmacht dessen, den das vierte Evangelium den eingeborenen Sohn nennt."

<sup>69</sup> Käsemann, "Problem," 211. This position results from a sceptical attitude towards the gospel tradition: one must start from the presupposition that the tradition is inauthentic (203); and the criterion of dissimilarity cannot authenticate sayings that agree with the early Christian understanding of Jesus. A consistently sceptical scholar would, of course, not accept the use of the criterion of dissimilarity, but would attribute the allegedly "dissimilar" stuff to otherwise unknown circles that agreed with its contents and so passed it on. Cf. Tom Holmén, "Knowing about Q and Knowing About Jesus: Mutually Exclusive Undertakings?," in The Sayings Source Q and the Historical Jesus, ed. Lindemann, 497–514.

<sup>70</sup> Bornkamm, Jesus, 150–151.

<sup>71</sup> Ibid., 151–152; cf. 59: the titulus crucis "zeigt, daß Pontius Pilatus ihn als einen der vielen messianischen Thronprätendenten hinrichten ließ."

<sup>72</sup> Ibid., 152.

<sup>73</sup> Ibid., 153; cf. 51–55, 60, 88–90, 150.

<sup>74</sup> Ibid., 149 (emphasis original); cf. 150, 157.

<sup>75</sup> Helmut Merklein, Jesu Botschaft von der Gottesherrschaft: Eine Skizze, SBS 111, (Stuttgart: Verlag Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1983). See also Joachim Gnilka, Jesus von Nazaret: Botschaft und Geschichte, HTKNTSup 3 (Freiburg: Herder, 1990), 251–267.

argues that christological or messianic titles do not lead us to the heart of Jesus' self-understanding (Selbstverständnis).<sup>76</sup> One must instead start from the Kingdom proclamation.

The decisive point, Merklein contends, is the fact that Jesus did not only proclaim the future coming of the Kingdom, but the Kingdom "als bereits in Gang gekommenes Geschehen."<sup>77</sup> It is important to realise that the Kingdom cannot be separated from the person of Jesus, since it is through his ministry of healing, exorcism and proclamation that the kingdom of God enters the world and offers divine salvation to Israel.<sup>78</sup> Hence, Jesus implicitly claimed to be "der irdische Repräsentant des göttlichen Geschehens der Gottesherrschaft."<sup>79</sup> This implied self-understanding has an important corollary:

Diese Repräsentanz des eschatologisch handelnden Gottes ist nicht denkbar ohne ein singuläres, unmittelbares Gottesverhältnis, das dann in der nachösterlichen Reflexion seinen wohl tiefsten Ausdruck in der Rede von Jesus als dem präexistenten Sohn (Gottes) gefunden hat.<sup>80</sup>

Merklein also suggests that Jesus may have understood himself as the representative of Israel as well, and that this self-understanding may have influenced the later (post-Easter) reception of the title "Messiah."<sup>81</sup>

The main reason why the earliest church made use of the title "Messiah" with reference to Jesus was probably his death as a messianic pretender, the "king of the Jews."<sup>82</sup> Yet Merklein has no real answer to the question why Jesus was crucified as the "king of the Jews" in the first place.<sup>83</sup>

The main ideas in Matthias Kreplin's recent work are clearly related to the solutions proposed by Bornkamm and Merklein.<sup>84</sup> According to Kreplin, Jesus neither used any Hoheitstitel with reference to himself nor allowed other people to apply such titles to him.<sup>85</sup>

---

<sup>76</sup> Merklein, Jesu, 145–149: Jesus may have evoked messianic expectations. Yet in that case he must have rejected them, since he certainly did not want to be the royal/political Messiah. There were other messianic alternatives, but the royal one was predominant.

<sup>77</sup> Ibid., 59–91, 149.

<sup>78</sup> Ibid., 65–66, 150 and passim.

<sup>79</sup> Ibid., 150.

<sup>80</sup> Ibid., (emphasis original).

<sup>81</sup> Ibid., 151.

<sup>82</sup> Ibid., 146; cf. 131.

<sup>83</sup> Ibid., 131–134.

<sup>84</sup> Matthias Kreplin, Das Selbstverständnis Jesu: Hermeneutische und christologische Reflexion; historisch-kritische Analyse, WUNT 2.141 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001).

<sup>85</sup> Kreplin, Selbstverständnis, 83–197.

In connection with his Kingdom proclamation, however, Jesus implicitly raised a distinctive self-claim: he was God's eschatological representative. Through him, God was offering the forgiveness of sins, driving out demons and performing other acts of healing. There is an "Aufblitzen der Gottesherrschaft" in the ministry of Jesus. On the other hand, Jesus did not emphasize his role, but was unwilling to make his person or status a theme in his proclamation.<sup>86</sup>

Therein lies a tension: on one hand, Jesus accepted no titles and did not emphasize his own status; on the other hand, he implicitly claimed to be the eschatological representative of God. How should this tension be resolved? According to Kreplin, the nearness of the Kingdom demanded that people refrain from all claims to a status that would place a person above his fellow human beings; in short, Jesus' Kingdom teaching included the ideal of equality. And Jesus, being a "listener" to his own teaching, must also on his own part conform to the demands of the Kingdom.<sup>87</sup>

We must remember, though, that Jesus, according to Kreplin, did claim to be the eschatological representative of God,<sup>88</sup> even if this claim was only an implicit one. Moreover, he explicitly emphasized his ἐγώ over against the Mosaic Torah.<sup>89</sup> So the tension between equality and self-claim seems to remain.<sup>90</sup>

---

<sup>86</sup> Kreplin, Selbstverständnis, 198–271. Throughout this section, the influence of Bornkamm and Merklein is obvious.

<sup>87</sup> Kreplin, Selbstverständnis, 272–302.

<sup>88</sup> I.e., in distinction to, e.g., John the Baptist or the disciples of Jesus (Kreplin, Selbstverständnis, 221–224, 240–242).

<sup>89</sup> Ibid., 253–256. Kreplin explains, "In den Antithesen findet sich... eine der wenigen Stellen, an denen Jesus seine eigene Person durch ein betontes ἐγώ hervorhebt" (254, emphasis added).

<sup>90</sup> The problems with Kreplin's argument increase towards the end of his study. Having argued that Jesus accepted no Hoheitstitel and showed clear restraint against pointing to his own status, and having explained why this restraint was an inevitable consequence of the Kingdom teaching (Kreplin, Selbstverständnis, 83–302), Kreplin now turns to a discussion of the "consequences for wider fields in New Testament exegesis" (303). In this context, he discusses the trial scene, including Jesus' answer to Caiaphas, and reaches the conclusion that Jesus indeed probably made a messianic confession, which was a main cause of his execution (317–322). The Fremdkörper character of this surprising section is made clear by Kreplin's later comment on p. 343: "Der historische Jesus verzichtete darauf, sich selbst mit einem Hoheitstitel zu bezeichnen oder sich so anreden zu lassen."

James D. G. Dunn is another contemporary scholar travelling the path trodden by Bornkamm and others.<sup>91</sup> Arguing against the Wrede/Bultmann hypothesis, Dunn insists that Jesus' messiahship was indeed an issue during Jesus' mission. The incidents reflected by stories such as the feeding of the five thousand (Mark 6:32–44 pars.), the entry into Jerusalem (Mark 11:1–11 pars.), and the "cleansing" of the temple (Mark 11:15–17) are likely to have triggered the question whether Jesus was, or wanted to be, the expected royal Messiah. It is also highly probable that the story about Peter's confession of Jesus as the royal Messiah (Mark 8:27–30) is founded on a well-rooted memory. And the probability is "strong beyond plausible rebuttal, that the issue of messiahship was raised at the hearing before Caiaphas" (Mark 14:55–64).<sup>92</sup>

Now Dunn argues, as did Bornkamm, that Jesus declined the role as a royal Messiah.<sup>93</sup> He did not welcome Peter's confession,<sup>94</sup> his entry into Jerusalem on an ass was "a statement of some significance" but not necessarily a deliberate allusion to Zech 9:9,<sup>95</sup> and—above all—his answer to Caiaphas ("You say," Matt 26:64) indicated "an unwillingness to accept the title of Messiah/king."<sup>96</sup> In spite of this <sup>91</sup> James D. G. Dunn, "Messianic Ideas and Their Influence on the Jesus of History", in The Messiah: Developments in Earliest Judaism and Christianity, ed. James H. Charlesworth (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992), 365–381; idem, "'Are You the Messiah?': Is the Crux of Mark 14.61–62 Resolvable?", in Christology, Controversy and Community: New Testament Essays in Honour of David R. Catchpole, ed. David G. Horrell and Christopher M. Tuckett (Leiden: Brill, 2000), 1–22; idem, Jesus, esp. 615–762.

<sup>92</sup> Jesus, 627–647, at 633–634; "Messianic Ideas," 373–374; "'Are You the Messiah?'," 7–10. Dunn points out that Caiaphas' move from the temple saying (Mark 14:58) to the Messiah question is quite logical. For, as Otto Betz has shown, the messianic implications of the temple saying are obvious (Dunn, Jesus, 633). On this, see e.g. Betz, "Die Frage nach dem messianischen Bewußtsein Jesu," in idem, Jesus der Messias Israels: Aufsätze zur biblischen Theologie, WUNT 42 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1987), 144–146, 155–156. Betz's main point is that an eschatological interpretation of 2 Sam 7:13 (as in 4QFlor) implies the view that the building of a new temple is a task assigned to the Messiah.

<sup>93</sup> Jesus, 647–654; "Messianic Ideas," 375–376. Dunn refers explicitly to Bornkamm (Jesus, 652, n. 173).

<sup>94</sup> Dunn, Jesus, 648.

<sup>95</sup> Ibid., 642 (here the quotation), 649.

<sup>96</sup> Ibid., 652. Dunn has given up his earlier proposal that Mark 14:62 originally read  $\sigma\upsilon\ \epsilon\dot{\iota}\pi\alpha\varsigma\ \acute{\upsilon}\tau\iota\ \epsilon\gamma\acute{\omega}\ \epsilon\dot{\iota}\mu\iota$  ("Messianic Ideas," 375–376), and now accepts the unambiguous  $\epsilon\gamma\acute{\omega}\ \epsilon\dot{\iota}\mu\iota$  as the original Markan reading. Yet in terms of the history of tradition he thinks Matthew's  $\sigma\upsilon\ \epsilon\dot{\iota}\pi\alpha\varsigma$  has the better claim to originality ("Are You the Messiah?," 11–12; Jesus, 652). As far as the implications of the "You say" answer are concerned, Dunn's proposal in the 1992 article was that Jesus was unwilling to accept the title "Messiah," but did not reject it outright; he "may have attempted to redefine unwillingness on the part of Jesus, Caiaphas turned him over to Pilate “on the charge of claiming to be David’s royal successor, in the full knowledge that one who claimed to be a king was likely to receive short shrift from the prefect.”<sup>97</sup> This charge was plainly false.

Yet the fact that Jesus rejected the role of a royal Messiah does not imply that he understood himself as just another prophet, or healer, or teacher; these categories are appropriate but insufficient to describe Jesus’ view of his own role.<sup>98</sup> According to Dunn, Jesus drew especially on Isa 61:1–3 to inform his own prophetic and healing mission (Matt 5:3/Luke 6:20; Matt 11:5/Luke 7:22), and hence laid claim to “a special anointing by the Spirit.”<sup>99</sup> Yet Dunn seems to be unwilling to use the category of a “prophetic Messiah” when discussing Jesus’ self-claim. He emphasizes, though, that Jesus implicitly claimed an astonishing authority, which found a particular expression in the amen formula.<sup>100</sup>

But there is more. Abba must have been Jesus’ distinctive and consistent address to God. This address is a family word, and Jesus’ consistent use of it is an indication that he “experienced his relationship the content of the title in terms of the role he saw himself as filling” (“Messianic Ideas,” 376; cf. 381). In the 2000 article, Dunn suggested that the answer could be paraphrased as “It depends on what you mean by the term” (“‘Are You the Messiah?’,” 12). In the 2003 work, however, these suggestions are dropped, and only Jesus’ unwillingness to accept the title “Messiah” is left. It was Jesus’ first disciples who made the redefinition: “[T]hey had in fact been convinced that Jesus was Messiah, son of David, during his mission, but... their conception of his messiahship was radically transformed by the events of Good Friday. In that light they in effect emptied the title of its traditional content and filled it with new content provided by the law and the prophets and the psalms” (Jesus, 653).

---

<sup>97</sup> Dunn, Jesus, 634. The Markan account implies that the claim to be the Messiah and “the son of the blessed one” (14:61–62) was “translated” as a claim to kingship and then brought before Pilate (15:1–2). According to Dunn’s reconstruction, however, there was nothing to “translate”; hence Caiaphas is implicitly seen as a completely dishonest person. In the 2000 article the implied picture of Caiaphas is not quite so dark. Here, Jesus’ answer is paraphrased as “It depends on what you mean by the term” (see above), and Caiaphas, then, has at least some material to work with: “[A]part from an outright denial by Jesus, whatever he said in response would provide sufficient grounds for him to be ‘handed over’ to the Roman authorities” (“‘Are You the Messiah?’,” 22).

<sup>98</sup> Ibid., 655–704.

<sup>99</sup> Ibid., 694; cf. 664, 706; “Messianic Ideas,” 376–378. Dunn observes that the anointed prophet in Isa 61 is seen as an eschatological figure, “the anointed of the Spirit,” in 11QMelch II, 15–16 (Jesus, 656). He also notes that 4Q521 mentions a future Messiah in connection with a list of acts of healing (and preaching to the “poor”) which is quite similar to the list in Matt 11:5/Luke 7:22 (ibid., 448–449).

<sup>100</sup> Dunn, Jesus, 702–704; “Messianic Ideas,” 381.

with God as an intimate family relationship.” He “thought of himself as God’s son,” and this sense of sonship must have been central to Jesus’ self-understanding.<sup>101</sup> Dunn underlines that the sonship of the disciples (expressed in the abba address) is derivative from Jesus’ sonship.<sup>102</sup>

According to Dunn, Jesus cannot easily be placed within any of the categories—e.g., “the Messiah”—that were available in his days; he broke through the established categories. The best we can do is to see him as “the man who was remembered as one who above all took on the role of eschatological spokesman for God.”<sup>103</sup>

4. Messianic Claims?

A messianic claim can be made in different ways, and with varying degrees of explicitness. The following few pages are a discussion of some proposals to the effect that Jesus’ self-claim was more distinct than an Anspruch, the implications of which must be teased out: he claimed to be the Messiah.

Martin Hengel, together with Anna Maria Schwemer, argues that “the hypothesis of a non-messianic Jesus” is one of the fundamental mistakes in New Testament exegesis during the twentieth century.<sup>104</sup> Hengel criticizes the Wrede/Bultmann hypothesis and makes a case for the opposite standpoint: the view of Jesus as the Messiah was by no means a new interpretation by the post-Easter church, but arose

<sup>101</sup> Jesus, 711–724, at 717–718. Dunn does not want to press the reference to the “son” in Mark 12:6, and shows great hesitation regarding the authenticity of the explicit son-sayings (Matt 11:27/Luke 10:22; Mark 13:32) (718–723).

<sup>102</sup> Ibid., 717.

<sup>103</sup> Ibid., 762.

<sup>104</sup> Hengel and Schwemer, Anspruch, XII–XIII. The four studies in this important volume are the following: Hengel, “Jesus der Messias Israels” (1–80); idem, “Jesus als messianischer Lehrer der Weisheit und die Anfänge der Christologie” (81–131); Schwemer, “Die Passion des Messias nach Markus und der Vorwurf des Antijudaismus” (133–163); eadem, “Jesus Christus als Prophet, König und Priester: Das munus triplex und die frühe Christologie” (165–230). “Jesus der Messias Israels” is a new version of a study that appeared earlier in Hengel, Studies in Early Christology (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1995). There is a much shorter version in I. Gruenwald, S. Shaked, and G. Stroumsa, eds., Messiah and Christos: Studies in the Jewish Origins of Christianity, TSAJ 32 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1992). Several other studies by Hengel are relevant in this connection, e.g., “Setze dich zu meiner Rechten! Die Inthronisation Christi zur Rechten Gottes und Psalm 110,1,” in Le Trône de Dieu, ed. M. Philonenko, WUNT 69 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1993), 108–194.

during Jesus' pre-Easter ministry and was accepted by Jesus himself, who indeed claimed to be the Messiah.<sup>105</sup>

An important point made by Hengel concerns the impossibility of accepting, with Wrede and others, the view of a strictly defined messianic concept in ancient Judaism, especially before 70 CE. There was no monolithic Messiasdogmatik, but rather a string of different pictures of the Messiah. Thus, a messianic claim would not necessarily have brought to mind, say, the idea of a kingly warrior in the style of Pss. Sol. 17. There were other options, such as a prophetic Messiah.<sup>106</sup> In Jesus' time, it was surely possible to bring in yet another messianic image—different from the existing ones, but still conspicuously messianic—and Jesus may have done precisely this.<sup>107</sup> Hengel refers to Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God as another example of this kind of reinterpretation.<sup>108</sup>

The Wrede/Bultmann hypothesis, then, is undermined at a crucial point. But what are the reasons for assuming a messianic claim of Jesus in the first place?

Hengel observes, first, the use of Χριστός in Paul—the earliest Christian writer—and in pre-Pauline formulae: not only is Χριστός quite massively applied to Jesus, but the word has already, less than twenty years after the crucifixion, almost completely lost its original titular value (“the Messiah,” “the Christ”) and has become a name: “Christ.” This remarkable fact reflects a situation in the early Church when Jesus' messiahship is regarded as self-evident: there is only one Messiah/Christ, i.e. Jesus Christ himself.<sup>109</sup> This belief in the messiahship of Jesus must be very early indeed; it can be traced back to the earliest Jerusalem church and its putative confession משיחא ישוע.<sup>110</sup> Now, this belief in Jesus' messiahship is not only early, but it must be pre-Easter as well; it cannot have been caused by the resurrection, as in the Wrede/Bultmann hypothesis, as there is no real evidence in ancient Judaism or in earliest Christianity for the idea that the status

<sup>105</sup> See esp. Hengel, “Messias.”

<sup>106</sup> Ibid., 34–45; see also Frey, “Jesus,” 308–312.

<sup>107</sup> Hengel, “Messias,” 31, 35, 69, 76, 79.

<sup>108</sup> Ibid., 31. Hengel (34 n. 129) points out that Wellhausen observed this analogy long ago. In his Messiasgeheimnis, Wrede rejected this line of reasoning: “Ich gestehe, dass ich mir davon keine Vorstellung machen kann” (220).

<sup>109</sup> Hengel, “Messias,” 1–8, 12.

<sup>110</sup> Ibid., 8–10; similarly Frey, “Jesus,” 301–303.

of Messiah is a consequence of resurrection from the dead.<sup>111</sup> There are no remains of an “adoptionist” Christology in Rom 1:3–4 and Acts 2:36; these passages concern Jesus’ elevation to “the right hand” of God rather than the beginning of his messiahship.<sup>112</sup>

Secondly, Hengel points to the titulus crucis, which is historical: Jesus was in fact sentenced and executed by Pilate for having claimed to be a “king of the Jews.”<sup>113</sup> Now, “es greift hier das eine ins andere”:<sup>114</sup> Pilate could not have invented the accusation regarding Jesus’ self-claim on his own, but must have got it from the Jerusalem hierarchs.<sup>115</sup> The hierarchs, in turn, presented Jesus’ self-claim in a language that Pilate could understand, i.e. in political terms: this man claims to be a “king.”<sup>116</sup> This accusation, however, was hardly fabricated out of nothing. It was, rather, founded on Caiaphas’s interrogation, during which Jesus probably made a messianic claim or confession, more or less in the way Mark reports (14:61–62).<sup>117</sup>

<sup>111</sup> For the lack of Jewish evidence, see Hengel, “Messias,” 10, 12, 14. As Hengel notes (14–15), Johannes Weiß made the same point.

<sup>112</sup> Ibid., 13: “[I]n Röm 1,4 wird nicht gesagt, daß der Sohn vor der Auferstehung keine messianische Würde beansprucht habe, dieselbe wird ja bereits durch das ἐκ σπέρματος Δαυιδ κατὰ σάρκα angedeutet. Vielmehr geht es um die Einsetzung als Sohn Gottes ἐν δυνάμει, d.h. in seine volle eschatologische Würde und Machtposition zur Rechten Gottes (vgl. 8,34).” And on Acts 2:36: “In diesem, doch wohl von Lukas selbst formulierten Text wird nicht eine alte adoptianische Christologie—von der weiß ein Lukas nichts—, sondern die radikale Umkehrung der ‘Machtverhältnisse’ zur Sprache gebracht: Gott hat den, den die Führer des Volkes zur Kreuzigung auslieferten... zum ‘Herrn und Gesalbten’ gemacht, d.h. in seine endzeitliche Funktion als Gottes Gesalbter, Herr und Richter eingesetzt” (13); similarly Frey, “Jesus,” 303.

<sup>113</sup> Hengel, “Messias,” 50–54; see also Frey, “Jesus,” 304–305.

<sup>114</sup> Hengel, “Messias,” 57.

<sup>115</sup> Ibid., 51; thus also Frey, “Jesus,” 306.

<sup>116</sup> Hengel, “Messias,” 59; cf. Frey, “Jesus,” 313.

<sup>117</sup> Hengel, “Messias,” 51, 57, 59–60, 77; similarly Frey, “Jesus,” 307, 317. Hengel (“Messias,” 58) notes the following points in favour of the general reliability of the Markan account (14:55–64): (1) “die sonderbare Notiz über das angebliche Tempelwort Jesu, die erzählerisch unnötig ist,” (2) “der Hinweis auf die Widersprüche zwischen den Zeugenaussagen, die auf ein relativ ordentliches Verfahren... hinweisen,” (3) Otto Betz’s observation on the inner connection between the temple saying and the question regarding Jesus’ messianic claim (cf. above, n. 84). Hence, “Ich kann diesen durch und durch jüdischen, komplizierten und zugleich hochdramatischen Text nicht in toto als christologische Dichtung erklären” (Hengel, “Messias,” 58). True, one cannot demonstrate in a binding way what was said during the interrogation, but: “Wenn Jesus unter der Anklage, er sei ein jüdischer Messiasprätendent... ausgeliefert und gekreuzigt wurde, dann muß die Messiasfrage doch schon im Mittelpunkt des Verhörs durch die jüdischen Behörden gestanden haben” (ibid., 59; emphasis by Hengel). On Jesus’ answer cf. also Hengel, “Setze dich...,” 163: “Ob Jesus in dieser oder ähnlicher Weise selbst zu den Volksführern gesprochen hat, läßt sich natürlich nicht mehr

Thus, on one hand, pressing backward from the use of Χριστός in Paul, we arrive at the pre-Easter origin of the belief in Jesus' messiahship, and, pressing backward from the titulus crucis, we arrive at Jesus' own messianic claim. On the other hand, Hengel argues, the hypothesis of a non-messianic Jesus is not able to explain either of these data in a satisfactory manner.<sup>118</sup>

If Jesus, then, wanted to be the Messiah—at least in some sense—this claim would probably have been recognizable even before his last days (or hours) in Jerusalem. And, in fact, it does shimmer through during the Galilean ministry as well. True, Jesus does not seem to have explicitly proclaimed himself as the Messiah.<sup>119</sup> Nevertheless, there is a “messianic” quality to Jesus' Galilean ministry as a whole and in its parts: his “service” is “messianic,” as are his “teaching,” his “acts,” his “authority,” his “knowledge,” and so on.<sup>120</sup> Here, “messianic” seems to be a term just as all-embracing as “eschatological.”<sup>121</sup> Hengel justifies the broad use of the term in the following way: “Nicht eine vorgegebene jüdische ‘Messianologie’ bestimmte seinen Dienst..., sondern sein Dienst setzte die Maßstäbe dafür, was im wahren Sinne als ‘messianisch’ zu gelten hatte.”<sup>122</sup>

At this point, one could of course raise critical questions concerning circular reasoning.<sup>123</sup> However, this sort of criticism might be too simple. For, as Hengel emphasizes, there is an important saying (Luke 7:22–23/Matt 11:4–6) which links Jesus' healing and preaching ministry to the depiction of the “anointed” prophet in Isa 61:1–3. Further, beweisen, er scheint sie aber zumindest durch den Hinweis auf seine ‘messianisch-richterliche’ Vollmacht so provoziert zu haben, daß sie ihn als messianischen Prä-tendenten an Pilatus auslieferten.” On Jesus' “blasphemous” answer to Caiaphas, see Darrell L. Bock, Blasphemy and Exaltation in Judaism and the Final Examination of Jesus: A Philological-Historical Study of the Key Jewish Themes Impacting Mark 14:61–64, WUNT 2.106 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1998).

---

<sup>118</sup> Hengel, “Messias,” 60.

<sup>119</sup> Ibid., 64; idem, “Lehrer,” 120; similarly Frey, “Jesus,” 306, 317. Hengel regards the lack of explicitness of the gospel tradition in this regard as a sign of its relative reliability (“Messias,” 64).

<sup>120</sup> Hengel, “Messias,” 69–70, 75–76, 78–79.

<sup>121</sup> The terms “messianic” and “eschatological” seem almost synonymous; cf. Hengel, “Messias,” 72.

<sup>122</sup> Ibid., 69 (emphasis removed).

<sup>123</sup> Cf., e.g., Wrede's description of the development of “ein neuer, ein spezifisch christlicher Messiasbegriff”: “alles Wesentliche, was man von Jesu Leben wusste und zu wissen meinte, (wurde) zum Begriff des Messias selber geschlagen” (Messias-geheimnis, 218; emphasis removed).

there is some Qumran evidence (11QMelch 4Q521) for the interpretation of this figure in Isaiah 61 as an eschatological prophet and a prophetic Messiah in ancient Judaism. Reading the Jesuanic saying against the background of Isa 61:1–2 and with an eye also on the Qumran texts, one may well understand Jesus as making a messianic claim here.<sup>124</sup> “Man könnte Jesus von diesem Profetenwort [sc. Isa 61:1–2] her—mit allen Vorbehalten—als prophetischen Messias, als ‘Geistgesalbten’ bezeichnen.”<sup>125</sup> On the other hand, it seems clear that Jesus showed no eagerness to conform exactly to any fixed messianic role, but rather adapted and molded existing messianic thinking into something new.<sup>126</sup>

Jostein Ådna regards the temple act and the temple saying as expressions of Jesus’ messianic self-claim, his “messianische Sendung.”<sup>127</sup> For Ådna, an important starting point is provided by Peter Stuhlmacher’s position on Jesus’ messianic claims.<sup>128</sup>

According to Stuhlmacher, Jesus evoked messianic expectations through several symbolic actions, such as the founding of the circle of the twelve. He did not reject these expectations, but, on the contrary, affirmed them in the midst of his disciples, and, finally, when facing Caiaphas. He identified himself with the messianic son of man proclaimed by John the Baptist, without, however, simply copying the Baptist’s messianism. For Jesus radically transformed it in terms of a suffering son of man: “er wollte Messias nur als leidender

<sup>124</sup> Hengel, “Messias,” 31, 42–44, 72–73; idem, “Lehrer,” 122–125.

<sup>125</sup> Hengel, “Lehrer,” 123. Jürgen Becker rejects this interpretation with the comment, “steht nicht im Text” (Review of Hengel and Schwemer, Der messianische Anspruch Jesu, TLZ 127 [2002]: 1051). Cf. Becker’s assertion above, n. 58.

<sup>126</sup> Hengel, “Messias,” 76 and passim (see n. 107 above).

<sup>127</sup> Jostein Ådna, Jesu Stellung zum Tempel: Die Tempelaktion und das Tempelwort als Ausdruck seiner messianischen Sendung, WUNT 2.119 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000). See further Ådna, “Jesus’ Symbolic Act in the Temple (Mark 11:15–17): The Replacement of the Sacrificial Cult by his Atoning Death,” in Gemeinde ohne Tempel: Zur Substituierung und Transformation des Jerusalemer Tempels und seines Kults im Alten Testament, antiken Judentum und frühen Christentum, ed. Beate Ego, Armin Lange, and Peter Pilhofer, WUNT 118 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1999), 461–475.

<sup>128</sup> Peter Stuhlmacher, Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments, 1: Grundlegung. Von Jesus zu Paulus (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1992), 61–66, 81–84, 107–125. See also idem, Jesus von Nazareth—Christus des Glaubens (Stuttgart: Calwer Verlag, 1988), 27–36; idem, “Der messianische Gottesknecht,” in Der Messias, 131–154.

Menschensohn sein.”<sup>129</sup> In the end, however, he expected to be enthroned in terms of Ps 110:1 and receive “das endzeitliche Richteramt des Menschensohnes.”<sup>130</sup>

Accepting this position in all essentials,<sup>131</sup> Ådna takes a closer look at the temple saying (Mark 14:58) and the temple act (Mark 11:14–17). He makes a case for the authenticity of the temple saying<sup>132</sup> and proposes a retranslation into Aramaic.<sup>133</sup> With this saying, Ådna argues, Jesus alluded to the idea of the Messiah as the builder of the eschatological temple on Mount Zion. The roots of this idea are in the Old Testament, where not only David’s son Solomon, but also Cyrus, the Lord’s “anointed one,” and Zerubbabel, the messianic “Branch” in the book of Zechariah, are temple builders.<sup>134</sup> The view of the Messiah as a temple builder lived on in ancient Judaism, as is shown by several texts.<sup>135</sup>

When Jesus—probably during the last week in Jerusalem—announced that he would tear down the old temple and within a short lapse of time build a new one, the implications could not have been missed by anyone. Jesus had been proclaiming the kingdom of God as “bereits in Gang gekommenes Geschehen” (Merklein). He had also accepted the old ideas of God ruling from Mount Zion. Further, he was surrounded by messianic expectations. Now he added to all this an announcement of his future role as the builder of the eschatological temple. Herein lays a messianic claim which is crystal clear, even if it is only an implicit one.<sup>136</sup> In the temple saying there is

<sup>129</sup> Stuhlmacher, Theologie, 114. On Jesus’ transformation of Jewish messianism, see ibid., 114–115, 117, 121, 125.

<sup>130</sup> Ibid., 124.

<sup>131</sup> Ådna, Stellung, 136–142.

<sup>132</sup> Ibid., 113–116, 128–30, 151–153.

<sup>133</sup> Ibid., 127–128.

<sup>134</sup> Ibid., 50–65, with references to 2 Sam 7:13; Isa 44:24–45:7; Zech 6:12–13, and other texts.

<sup>135</sup> Ådna (Stellung 65–87) examines texts such as Pss. Sol. 17; 1 En. 53.6; Sib. Or. 5.414–433; Tg. Neb. Zech 6:12–13; Lev. Rb. 57 (on 9:6). In 4QFlor the son of David in 2 Sam 7 is interpreted as the Messiah (“the Branch of David” who shall arise at the end of days), but it is God rather than the Messiah who will build the eschatological temple according to this text; see Stellung, 87–88, 101–105. On God as the builder of the temple, cf. below.

<sup>136</sup> Ibid., 130–151, at 143: “Wenn einer, an den... messianische Erwartungen herangetragen werden, mit seiner Botschaft von der hereinbrechenden Basileia Gottes nach Jerusalem zieht und in diesem Zusammenhang auch noch ankündigt, er werde den Tempel abbrechen und durch einen anderen ersetzen, dann muß sich... fast zwangsläufig

also a connection to the idea that the eschatological temple will not be made by human beings, i.e., “with hands”; rather, it will be a work of God. This idea has its root in Exod 15:17b–18, and is reflected in a number of ancient Jewish texts (4QFlor is one of them).<sup>137</sup> Jesus’ announcement regarding the building of the temple means that he, as the Messiah, steps into God’s area of competence and claims to work on behalf of God and as his representative.<sup>138</sup>

Jesus’ temple act was a symbolic one. He consciously directed it especially against the temple cult,<sup>139</sup> thereby indicating that there was neither room nor a need for it in the realized Kingdom of God.<sup>140</sup> The act should be interpreted in connection with the view expressed in sayings such as Mark 10:45 and 14:24: Jesus’ wish and intention was to replace the atoning temple cult by his own atoning death.<sup>141</sup> His symbolic temple act, together with the aforementioned sayings, completes the picture of Jesus’ messianic claims: through his willingness to suffer, he transforms the traditional messianic role.<sup>142</sup> Ådna, then, does not understand Jesus’ readiness to suffer as being in tension to his messianic role (or as an addition to it), but rather sees it as being included therein.

Scholars such as Hengel, Stuhlmacher and Ådna, then, do not see Jesus as having been tied to a fixed messianic concept. With different emphases, they suggest that Jesus may have adapted or transformed contemporary messianic ideas into something new.<sup>143</sup> Other scholars, der Eindruck einstellen, hier trete jemand mit dem Anspruch auf, der messianische Bauherr des eschatologischen Tempels auf dem Zion zu sein.”

---

<sup>137</sup> Ådna, Stellung, 91–110.

<sup>138</sup> Ibid., 145–47, 382.

<sup>139</sup> Ådna emphasizes that Jesus’ choice of targets—the dove vendors, the money changers, and the vessels—cannot have been coincidental. The dove vendors provided sacrificial victims, the money changers collected the Temple tax (which supported the cult), and the vessels were needed “for the transport of money and offering ingredients between the Royal Stoa and the inner precincts.” Aiming at these targets, Jesus symbolically interfered with the atoning cult of the temple. See Ådna, “Act,” 464–469 (quotation from p. 469); idem, Stellung, 251–265, 384–385.

<sup>140</sup> Ådna, “Act,” 472; idem, Stellung, 385.

<sup>141</sup> Ådna, “Act,” 469–473; idem, Stellung, 412–30.

<sup>142</sup> Ådna, “Act,” 417: “(D)ie Umprägung der Messiasrolle zu der eines gedemütigt Leidenden ist so radikal und unerhört gewesen, daß sie auch von Jesu engsten Jüngern nicht akzeptiert und verstanden worden ist (vgl. Mk 8,27–33 par.; 9,32 par.)” On this Umprägung on the part of Jesus, see also Ådna, Stellung, 140–142, 416, and Stuhlmacher, Theologie, 114–115 and passim.

<sup>143</sup> Cf. also Theissen’s suggestion to the effect that Jesus transferred royal messianic functions to the circle of the Twelve (Matt 19:28–29/Luke 22:28–31), thus giving such as John J. Collins and John P. Meier, while more or less affirming Jesus' messianic self-claim, are reluctant to emphasize any Jesuanic transformation of contemporary ideas. Instead, they prefer to focus on the idea of the Davidic Messiah and reflect on Jesus' wish to clothe himself in royal robes.

Collins' work The Scepter and the Star (1995) includes a condensed and important discussion of Jesus' messianic claims.<sup>144</sup> Collins accepts the line of reasoning involving the titulus crucis and Χριστός as a virtual name in Paul, rejects the hypothesis of a post-Easter origin of the belief in Jesus' messiahship, and reasons that "the messianic identity of Jesus must be grounded in some way before his crucifixion."<sup>145</sup>

By "messianic identity," Collins refers primarily to the idea of the royal, Davidic, Messiah. For it is precisely this idea which is prominent in the early Christian sources. However, we are then confronted with the classical dilemma of the discrepancy between Jesus as he is portrayed by the gospel tradition and the Jewish expectation of the Davidic Messiah, who is a militant character.<sup>146</sup> How can this problem be resolved?

As we indicated above, Collins rejects a solution which would involve a redefinition or a transformation of the concept of a royal messiahship, for "new meanings of the word 'messiah' cannot be coined at will."<sup>147</sup> But perhaps Jesus was seen as a prophetic Messiah?

---

them the status of a "messianic collective"; see his "Gruppenmessianismus: Überlegungen zum Ursprung der Kirche im Jüngerkreis Jesu," in Theissen, Jesus als historische Gestalt: Beiträge zur Jesusforschung, ed. Annette Merz, FRLANT 202 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2003), 255–281.

<sup>144</sup> Collins, Scepter, 204–210, 212–214. See also idem, "Jesus, Messianism and the Dead Sea Scrolls", in Qumran-Messianism: Studies on the Messianic Expectations in the Dead Sea Scrolls, ed. James H. Charlesworth, Hermann Lichtenberger, and Gerbern S. Oegema (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1998), 100–119.

<sup>145</sup> Collins, Scepter, 204; idem, "Jesus," 112. For the arguments in question, cf. above, pp. 1039–1041. On Rom 1:3–4, Collins remarks that Paul probably refers to "the full realization of Jesus' kingship by his heavenly enthronement" (Scepter, 204).

<sup>146</sup> Collins, Scepter, 204; idem, "Jesus," 112. Collins does not support the old view of a fixed messianic dogma in ancient Judaism, but he argues, firstly, that the expectation of a royal Messiah was the most widespread one, and, secondly—this is the important point here—that the royal Messiah "was consistently expected to drive out the Gentiles by force." See Scepter, 49–73; "Jesus," 102–112, at 105. Collins does not accept the suggestion that Jesus might have been a militant revolutionary (Scepter, 213 n. 55).

<sup>147</sup> Collins, Scepter, 205. The target of this criticism is E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985), 234: "'Messiah' will do perfectly well for a person who is superior to the judges of Israel [Matt 19:28], even if he was not a warrior."

This suggestion should be taken seriously, Collins argues, pointing to Jesus' answer to the Baptist's question (Luke 7:18–23/Matt 11:2–6) and the parallel in 4Q521, where God heals the wounded and preaches good news to the poor—through “his Messiah,” a prophetic figure.<sup>148</sup> However, this is no solution to the problem at hand, namely, why Jesus should have come to be regarded as the royal Messiah and crucified as the “king of the Jews.”<sup>149</sup>

Instead, Collins turns his attention to Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Mark 11:1–10). If the historicity of the gospel account may be upheld—and Collins seems prepared to consider it seriously<sup>150</sup>—we might have the decisive link that could hold together Jesus' prophetic ministry on the one hand and his execution as a “king” on the other hand. For the royal connotations of the triumphal entry must have been clear to people familiar with the scriptures: “Lo, your king comes to you . . .” (Zech 9:9). If historical, the incident shows a change of roles on the part of Jesus, “from that of the prophetic herald of the kingdom to that of the king who ushers it in.”<sup>151</sup>

According to Collins, Jesus' (possible) re-enactment of Zechariah 9 does not necessarily mean that he would have wanted to transform the traditional concept of the royal Messiah, for in the context of the prophecy, there is a reference to the achievement of peace by military victory.<sup>152</sup>

On the whole, John P. Meier's reconstruction is similar to Collins' 1995 suggestions. According to Meier, Jesus thought—or rather, came to think—of himself as a royal Davidic Messiah.<sup>153</sup> The argument for

<sup>148</sup> Collins, Scepter, 117–122, 205–206; “Jesus,” 112–116. See also Collins' article on 4Q521, “The works of the messiah,” DSD 1 (1994): 98–112.

<sup>149</sup> Collins, Scepter, 206.

<sup>150</sup> Collins' reasons for accepting the historicity of the account are mainly the following: (a) the triumphal entry fits well together with the crucifixion as a “king”; (b) the re-enactment of biblical paradigms was typical of eschatological prophets (Scepter, 206).

<sup>151</sup> Ibid., 206.

<sup>152</sup> Ibid., 207. In his 1998 article, Collins plays down the role of the triumphal entry in his reconstruction. Instead, he now points to Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God as an important factor in Jesus' transition from prophet or prophetic Messiah to “king.” Both Romans and Jews (at least some) may have had difficulties in making a distinction “between prophets who preached about a kingdom and pretenders who aspired to rule” (“Jesus,” 116–117).

<sup>153</sup> John P. Meier, “From Elijah-like Prophet to Royal Davidic Messiah,” in Jesus: A Colloquium in the Holy Land, ed. Doris Donnelly (New York: Continuum, 2001), 45–83.

this thesis includes two steps. First, the Son-of-David Christology, being so broadly and multiply attested in the New Testament, must be very early.<sup>154</sup> Second, this picture of Jesus can hardly have been a consequence of belief in his resurrection,<sup>155</sup> nor of the fact that he was crucified as “king of the Jews.”<sup>156</sup> Rather, one must suppose that it reaches back into the days of the earthly Jesus.<sup>157</sup>

Now, until the last week in Jerusalem, Jesus’ ministry was a prophetic one: he appeared as an eschatological prophet “clothed in the mantle of Elijah.”<sup>158</sup> At the gates of Jerusalem, however, Jesus decided to “clothe himself as well, by metaphorical actions, in the royal robes of the Son of David.”<sup>159</sup> These actions were the triumphal entry and the temple demonstration: as the Son of David, Jesus took symbolic possession of his capital city, and proceeded to “express symbolically his control over the temple.”<sup>160</sup> “Jesus was claiming to be the royal Davidic Messiah coming to his capital and symbolically claiming control over the capital’s temple.”<sup>161</sup>

These actions, seen together with Jesus kingdom proclamation, were at least in part understood by the authorities: they discerned that a messianic claim was being made.<sup>162</sup> There was, however, a “fateful hermeneutical divide” between Jesus on one hand, and Caiaphas and Pilate on the other, over the question of the coherence between the prophetic and the royal element in Jesus’ self-understanding.

Priest and prefect understood the coherence in terms of a popular prophet and leader of the masses now revealing that he was also a rebel messianic pretender preparing to seize power, possibly by armed revolt. Jesus understood the coherence in terms of the coming kingdom of God somehow already present.<sup>163</sup>

---

<sup>154</sup> Meier, “Prophet,” 48–61.

<sup>155</sup> Ibid., 61–62.

<sup>156</sup> Ibid., 62–63. Meier points out that there was no self-evident connection between being a king of the Jews, like Herod the Great or the Hasmonean kings, and being Son of David.

<sup>157</sup> Ibid., 63–4.

<sup>158</sup> Ibid., 68.

<sup>159</sup> Ibid.

<sup>160</sup> Ibid.

<sup>161</sup> Ibid., 71.

<sup>162</sup> “Jesus, a popular prophet, was claiming to be royal Son of David foretold by the prophets” (Meier, “Prophet”)

<sup>163</sup> Ibid., 72.

The understanding of priest and prefect resulted in Jesus' arrest and crucifixion as the "king of the Jews."<sup>164</sup> In Meier's reconstruction, Caiaphas apparently did not need any messianic confession from Jesus' mouth; his actions (together with the Kingdom proclamation) were enough. Meier does not refer to Mark 14:61–62 at all.

5. Wisdom in Person?

Earlier, in the section on implicit christology, we came across Käsemann's declaration to the effect that Jesus acted and spoke without claiming to be the Messiah, and yet "in der Vollmacht dessen, den das vierte Evangelium den eingeborenen Sohn nennt."<sup>165</sup> We also noted Merklein's comment on Jesus' implicit claim to a close relation to God, "das dann in der nachösterlichen Reflexion seinen wohl tiefsten Ausdruck in der Rede von Jesus als dem präexistenten Sohn (Gottes) gefunden hat."<sup>166</sup> Here instead of following up these hints concerning a continuity from Jesus of Nazareth to the post-Easter church and then on to the Christological dogma of the Church Catholic, this paper will take a brief look at some proposals regarding a Wisdom Christology in sayings of Jesus in the synoptic gospels.

The sayings in the centre of the discussion are as follows: (i) Luke 7:31–35/Matt 11:16–19; (ii) Luke 10:21–22/Matt 11:25–27; (iii) Luke 11:31–32/Matt 12:42; (iv) Luke 11:49–51/Matt 23:34–36; (v) Luke 13:34–35/Matt 23:37–39; (vi) Matt 11:28–30. Sometimes (vii) Luke 9:58/Matt 8:20 is also brought into play.<sup>167</sup> It is widely recognised that these sayings—in addition to the explicit mention of σοφία in (i) and (iv)—contain motifs that in the Old Testament and ancient Jewish wisdom literature are connected with Wisdom as a person or hypostasis, e.g., the motif of Wisdom inviting and calling people to obedience but meeting rejection.<sup>168</sup> In this context there are two crucial

<sup>164</sup> Meier, "Prophet," 71.

<sup>165</sup> "Problem," 213 (above, n. 68).

<sup>166</sup> Botschaft, 150 (above, p. 1034).

<sup>167</sup> In the following discussion, these sayings are termed "wisdom sayings."

<sup>168</sup> The most important texts are Job 28; Prov 1:20–33; 8:1–21, 22–31; 9; Sir 1:1–20; 24; Bar 3:9–4:4; Wis 6–9; 1 Enoch 42; 4 Ezra 5.9–11; 2 Apoc. Bar. 48.33, 36; 2 Enoch 30.8; 33.4; 11QPs<sup>a</sup> XVIII. The list is taken from Hermann von Lips, Weisheitliche Traditionen im Neuen Testament, WMANT 64 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1990), 153. For a discussion of the terms "personification" and "hypostasation," see 153–166.

questions, viz. (a) whether Jesus is identified with Wisdom, in which case there is a Wisdom Christology in the strict sense of the term, and (b) whether this identification was made by Jesus himself.

The alternatives were set out clearly in three works that appeared in 1970. David W. Smith and M. Jack Suggs argued that there is a Wisdom Christology in Matthew, but none in Q, for here Jesus is seen as an envoy of Wisdom rather than “incarnate Wisdom.”<sup>169</sup> Felix Christ, however, insisted that not only Matthew, but also Luke and Q identify Jesus with Wisdom, and concluded his investigation with the following words: “Möglich bleibt schließlich, wenn auch nicht beweisbar, daß schon Jesus selbst sich als Sophia verstand.”<sup>170</sup> Sverre Aalen, working independently of Felix Christ, went one step further. He concluded that Jesus himself was indeed the originator of Wisdom Christology, and noted that Jesus’ own christology, then, was more related to the christology of the patristic church than to “the one found in the picture of Jesus made by present-day scholarship.”<sup>171</sup>

In more recent research, a position like that of Felix Christ (or Aalen) seems quite unusual, whereas Suggs’ exegesis is widely accepted.<sup>172</sup> Thus Tuckett explains that in Q, “Jesus’ position is seen... as one of Wisdom’s messengers, and it is primarily Matthew who ‘upgrades’

---

<sup>169</sup> David W. Smith, Wisdom Christology in the Synoptic Gospels (Rome: Pontificia Studiorum Universitas, 1970); M. Jack Suggs, Wisdom, Christology, and Law in Matthew’s Gospel (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1970). Suggs’ conclusions were accepted by R. G. Hamerton-Kelly; see his Pre-existence, Wisdom, and the Son of Man: A Study of the Idea of Pre-existence in the New Testament (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1973), 29–36. The phrase “incarnate Wisdom” is used by Suggs.

<sup>170</sup> Felix Christ, Jesus Sophia: Die Sophia-Christologie bei den Synoptikern, ATANT 57 (Zürich: Zwingli Verlag, 1970), 154. Christ investigated sayings (i), (ii), (iv), (v), and (vi). An interesting and puzzling element in his thesis is that the wisdom sayings are said to portray Jesus both as “Sprecher und Träger der Weisheit” and as “die Weisheit selbst” (153 and passim).

<sup>171</sup> Sverre Aalen, “Visdomsforestillingen og Jesu kristologiske selvbevissthet,” SEÅ 37/38 (1972/73): 45. Aalen’s proposal had a broader basis than just a few sayings. He argued that the categories “eschatological” or “definitive prophet,” or even “Messiah,” are not enough to explain the way the synoptic Jesus speaks and acts; only “Wisdom in person” will do (37–46).

<sup>172</sup> See, e.g., J. Gnilka, Jesus of Nazareth (Peabody: Hendrickson, 1997), 260; von Lips, Traditionen, 268–277; Christopher M. Tuckett, Q and the History of Early Christianity: Studies on Q (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1996), 166–179, 188–189, 218–221; Schlosser, “Q,” 298–302. Cf. Schlosser’s crisp comment: “[L]a portée d’une éventuelle identification de Jésus avec la sagesse divine est évidente, mais... cette piste paraît bouchée” (298).

the Christology to identify Jesus with Wisdom.”<sup>173</sup> To mention just one point: In Matt 11:19 (saying [i]), the “works” of Wisdom are clearly Jesus’ works; but this is made clear only by the redactional context (11:2, 20) and by Matthew’s replacement of “children” (Luke 7:35) by “works.” In the original Q-saying, however, the “children” of Wisdom are “die, die die Botschaft ihrer Boten Johannes und Jesus annahmen.”<sup>174</sup>

Yet there are dissenters, arguing along the lines of Felix Christ and Sverre Aalen, e.g., Ben Witherington.<sup>175</sup> According to Witherington, not only Matthew but also Q regards Jesus as the embodiment of Wisdom.<sup>176</sup> For instance, discussing saying (i), Witherington maintains that Matthew kept the original “works” in 11:19, whereas Luke changed it into “children” to make 7:35 fit with the preceding parable (7:31–34).<sup>177</sup> Hence, Matthew did not upgrade the Q Christology, but preserved it.<sup>178</sup>

Witherington presses further, and suggests that the Wisdom Christology arose before Q; indeed, Jesus represented himself as “divine Wisdom incarnate,” “God’s Wisdom in the flesh.”<sup>179</sup> As far as the authenticity of the wisdom sayings is concerned, Witherington tries to make a case for a couple of them.<sup>180</sup> On a more general level, he makes two points. First, he argues that Jesus, understanding himself as God’s agent or שליח, must have felt he knew the sender’s mind; and “[t]his profile describes the portrait of Wisdom we find in

<sup>173</sup> Tuckett, Q, 219. Saying (ii) is seen as an exception by several scholars, but Tuckett sees no identification of Jesus and Wisdom here; see 276–281 for references and discussion. Von Lips seems undecided (Traditionen, 272–273, 276–277).

<sup>174</sup> von Lips, Traditionen, 269.

<sup>175</sup> Ben Witherington III, The Christology of Jesus (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); idem, Jesus the Sage: The Pilgrimage of Wisdom (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994). Witherington refers explicitly to Felix Christ (esp. Jesus, 236) but does not seem to know the work of Aalen. See also Hartmut Gese, “Die Weisheit, der Menschensohn und die Ursprünge der Christologie als konsequente Entfaltung der biblischen Theologie,” SEÅ 44 (1979): 77–114. Gese sees a Wisdom Christology in Matthew as well as in the Q wisdom sayings (ii, iv, v, and vi), but does not discuss the authenticity of the sayings (ibid., 98–102).

<sup>176</sup> Christology, 49–53 on saying (i); 221–228 on (ii); Jesus, 202 on (iii); 228 on (iv); 205–207 on (vi); 202–203 on (vii).

<sup>177</sup> Ibid., 49, 51.

<sup>178</sup> Witherington does not raise the question whether this exegesis of the saying is possible without the redactional context in Matthew 11.

<sup>179</sup> Witherington, Christology, 51, 52 (here the quotations), 53, 221–228, 269, 274–275; Jesus, 201–208.

<sup>180</sup> Christology, 224–227 on saying (ii); Jesus, 205–206 on saying (vi).

Proverbs 8 and elsewhere.”<sup>181</sup> Secondly, he appeals to the explaining force of the hypothesis that Jesus regarded himself as Wisdom incarnate:

[S]parked by the catalyst of this... association by Jesus of a historical individual with God’s personified Wisdom, the early church took this seed, planted it and raised a vast harvest of Wisdom Christologies, found in such varied contexts as Q, christological hymns, Paul, and the narrative framework of Gospels. How better to explain the appearance of the idea... than to assume that Jesus in some way presented himself as Wisdom?<sup>182</sup>

The position of Martin Hengel should not be equated with Witherington’s proposal. In the earliest wisdom sayings, Hengel observes no Wisdom Christology in the strict sense of the word; rather, Jesus is portrayed as an envoy of Wisdom.<sup>183</sup> Since it is highly unlikely that the post-Easter church should have developed such a picture, Hengel concludes that the earliest sayings are on the whole authentic and that Jesus did understand himself as Wisdom’s representative.<sup>184</sup>

Jesus’ view of himself as a representative of Wisdom coheres well with his claim to be a prophetic Messiah and anointed by the Spirit in terms of Isa 61:1–3, Hengel contends, and quotes several texts that portray the Messiah both as a Geistträger and as an exponent of divine wisdom.<sup>185</sup> This is the case also with the messianic “son of man”-figure in 1 Enoch 48–51. This “anointed” figure, however, is not <sup>182</sup> Jesus, 208; cf. Christology, 275. The somewhat vague phrase “association... with... Wisdom” (cf. “in some way”) does not seem to cohere with the rest of the argument on the preceding pages, where the point is that Jesus understood himself as “Wisdom in person,” not only as being in “association” with Wisdom.

<sup>181</sup> Christology, 51.

<sup>183</sup> Hengel, “Lehrer,” 84–99.

<sup>184</sup> Ibid., 96: “[D]aß in den späteren Gemeinden die präexistente Weisheit als eigenständige Größe neben, ja hinter dem Menschensohn und Messias Jesus erschien, fügt sich schwer in die nachösterliche Entwicklung der Christologie ein.” For Hengel’s discussion of the authenticity of individual sayings, see 84–99. Hengel observes an identification of Jesus and Wisdom in saying (vi), but only in its present Matthean form (96–99). An earlier version of saying (ii) might well be authentic, as Joachim Jeremias argued, but even in that case Jesus would not speak as Wisdom in person, but “im Auftrag und in der Vollmacht der Weisheit Gottes” (97). For Jeremias’ proposal, see his Neutestamentliche Theologie, 1: Die Verkündigung Jesu, 3rd ed. (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus Mohn, 1979), 65–67.

<sup>185</sup> “Lehrer,” 108–113. The principal text is Isa 11:1–4 (cf. Prov 8:12–14). In addition, the following texts are discussed: Pss. Sol. 17.23, 29, 35, 37, 43; 18.6–7; T. Levi 18; T. Jud. 24; Tg. Isa. 53:5, 11; 11QPs<sup>a</sup> XXVII, 2–11; 4Q534. For Jesus’ claim to be a prophetic Messiah and anointed by the Spirit, see above, pp. 1041–1042.

only a Geistträger and an exponent of wisdom, but is also interpreted in terms of Proverbs 8 and seen as pre-existent (1 En. 48.3, 6); he is the representative and even the embodiment of Wisdom.<sup>186</sup>

This messianic pattern serves, first, as an analogy to Jesus' self-understanding; secondly, it might have provided some of the impulses that very soon caused the post-Easter church to take the step that had not been taken earlier, viz., to see Jesus as Wisdom in person.<sup>187</sup>

6. Some Points in Conclusion

More could be said on our subject. There are, no doubt, other approaches and proposals that would also merit attention. However, the time has now come to put forward some simple observations on the approaches we have seen above, the focus being on sections 2.–4.

1. First, some remarks on the suggestion that Jesus' view of himself may be described in terms of an implicit christology. At first sight, the both and quality of this proposal makes it attractive: Volkmar, Wrede, and Bultmann were right up to a certain point, but the "traditional" view of Jesus also has a grain of truth in it.

However, problems tend to appear precisely because of the give-and-take character of this basic solution: The "but I say to you..." sayings allegedly imply a messianic self-understanding;<sup>188</sup> Jesus' view of himself as an eschatological representative of God was subsequently (in the post-Easter situation) expressed in talk of Jesus as the pre-existent Son of God, we are told;<sup>189</sup> the abba address of the disciples implied their divine sonship, but this was supposedly derivative of Jesus' sonship.<sup>190</sup> And so on. With explanations like these the classical non-messianic view of Jesus is avoided, it is true, but there seems to be need for some "intuition" to produce these readings.

The notion of a messianic self-claim of Jesus must also be kept at a distance. Hence, it is said, even if Jesus made it clear that he was the

---

<sup>186</sup> Hengel, "Lehrer," 117–119. Important in this context is Gottfried Schimanowski, Weisheit und Messias: Die jüdischen Voraussetzungen der urchristlichen Präexistenzchristologie, WUNT 2.17 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1985); cf. also William Horbury, Jewish Messianism and the Cult of Christ (London: SCM, 1998), 86–108 (on the pre-existence and "spiritual" character of the Messiah in ancient Jewish literature).

<sup>187</sup> Hengel, "Lehrer," 120–131.

<sup>188</sup> Käsemann, "Problem," 206.

<sup>189</sup> Merklein, Botschaft, 150.

<sup>190</sup> Dunn, Jesus, 717.

eschatological representative of God in a unique sense, due to his humility he made no messianic claim;<sup>191</sup> time and again, he did evoke messianic expectations—but always unintentionally;<sup>192</sup> his “triumphal” entry into Jerusalem was “a statement of some significance,” but no messianic claim was intended;<sup>193</sup> his Anspruch can only be understood in messianic terms, but every Messiasprädikat is Gemeindekerygma;<sup>194</sup> Jesus was indeed crucified as ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν Ἰουδαίων, but the reason for this must be other than the one implied by Mark.<sup>195</sup> And so on.

If these observations reveal real problems and if the problems arise from the compromising character of the implicit-christology approach, this approach must be rejected and a clear-cut Schweitzer-like alternative must be stated: Jesus’ ministry was either non-messianic or messianic. Either he made an explicit messianic claim or he made no distinct self-claim at all.

2. Secondly, some words on the non-messianic view of Jesus. Volkmar’s point is still reiterated: had Jesus desired the messiahship, he could have claimed it only in a “political” sense; but this he most certainly did not do, and he could not have modified the popular messianic idea either.<sup>196</sup> In order to make any sense, this line of argument must assume a monolithic Jewish Messiasdogmatik in Jesus’ time; but this assumption is false.<sup>197</sup>

A “negative” use of the criterion of coherence was observed—due to his humility, Jesus could not have made any messianic claim—and found whimsical.<sup>198</sup> It is also clear that the criterion of dissimilarity cannot be invoked in this context; in principle, it cannot function as an indication of non-authenticity. Sometimes the absence of the word Χριστός in Q is stressed; but this is an argument from silence and cannot be insisted on. The strongest point in favour of the non-messianic alternative would still seem to be the one built on the

<sup>191</sup> Kreplin, Selbstverständnis, 198–302.

<sup>192</sup> Dunn, Jesus, 627–654.

<sup>193</sup> Ibid., 642, 649.

<sup>194</sup> Käsemann, “Problem,” 206, 211.

<sup>195</sup> Merklein, Botschaft, 131–134; Dunn, Jesus, 652.

<sup>196</sup> Lüdemann, Jesus, 56–57; de Jonge, “Jesus’ View,” 24–27; cf. Dunn, Jesus, 647–654.

<sup>197</sup> Volkmar’s point may be “softened” in at least two ways: (a) the idea of the royal Messiah was the predominant one (—so what?); (b) a messianic claimant would have had to choose between the available messianic options; he could not have made any modifications at all (—really?).

<sup>198</sup> Funk et al., Gospels, 33. Cf. above, n. 65.

“adoptionist” (?) passages Rom 1:3–4 and Acts 2:36. The weakness of the non-messianic view of Jesus is above all its inability to explain the titulus crucis.

3. Thirdly and finally, a few comments on the view that Jesus—in different ways and with varying degrees of explicitness—claimed to be the Messiah. Against this view, it seems, Volkmar’s point can hardly be raised any more. The most serious problem would seem to be the allegedly “adoptionist” passages. These texts, however, might perhaps be interpreted in terms of sessio ad dexteram rather than in terms of the beginning of messiahship. In that case the messianic view of Jesus and his ministry, in comparison with the non-messianic one, probably has the better claim. For this solution does provide a truly satisfactory explanation both of the titulus crucis and of the rapid transformation of the title משיח or ὁ Χριστός into a personal name.

THE JESUS QUEST AND JEWISH-CHRISTIAN RELATIONS

DONALD A. HAGNER

The point of contention that has always been decisive in the Jewish-Christian dialogue has been the person of Jesus. If we have now begun to see through historical Jesus studies that Jesus Christ binds Jews and Christians together, it is also clear that he remains the main dividing point between Jews and Christians.<sup>1</sup> It is understandable that Jews and Christians have always shared a very large amount of their theology—in fact, a much greater amount than is usually expected. The first Christians, all of whom were Jewish, believed that their faith was the fulfillment of the Jewish scriptures and that they were beginning to receive what had been promised in the covenants and the prophets. They thought of their faith not as a new religion but as the true Judaism. There was nevertheless a key dividing point between the earliest Christians and the Jews, and it centered in the Christian confession of the crucified Jesus as both Messiah and Lord, as the one who had inaugurated a new era in the history of salvation, an era of eschatological fulfillment. The situation was effectively captured in the aphorism of Schalom Ben-Chorin, himself the author of a book entitled Brother Jesus: “The faith of Jesus unites us—faith in Jesus separates us.”<sup>2</sup>

If the estimate of Jesus is the fundamental cause of disagreement between Jews and Christians, one may well ask whether or not the quest of the “historical Jesus,” assuming it arrives at something other than the traditional Christian view of Jesus, might not be a boon for Jewish-Christian dialogue. Without doubt the quest has been an ameliorating factor in the dialogue, as we shall see, but one could hardly call it a boon. We will explore the reasons for this conclusion in this essay. We begin with a brief look at the history of the Jewish study of Jesus that parallels the liberal Protestant quest, proceed to an analysis of some of the specific conclusions of the quest that bear upon our subject, follow this with a discussion of the obstacles posed by the quest, and conclude with some comments about the dialogue itself.

---

<sup>1</sup> The Common Bond: Christians and Jews—Notes for Preaching and Teaching, Vatican Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews, 1986.

<sup>2</sup> Bruder Jesus: Der Nazarener in jüdischer Sicht (München, 1967), now available in English translation, Brother Jesus: The Nazarene through Jewish Eyes, trans. Jared S. Klein and Max Reinhart (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2001).

1. The Jewish Study of Jesus and the Quest

The nineteenth-century quest for the historical Jesus, as documented in Albert Schweitzer's famous book, was—from Reimarus to Wrede—almost exclusively a Gentile undertaking. Nevertheless, already with Reimarus (1778),<sup>3</sup>—anticipated by the English Deists—and with a considerable number of the others described by Schweitzer, the Jewishness of Jesus began to emerge with striking clarity, and concomitantly the disjuncture between Jesus and the Christ who was the center of the church's faith. Influential scholars such as Ferdinand Christian Baur<sup>4</sup> and William Wrede<sup>5</sup> drove a great wedge between Jesus and Paul, stressing the discontinuity between the two, and making Paul the de facto creator of Christianity. This is a viewpoint that would eventually be taken up by Jewish scholars in the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

Apart from the scandalous Toledot Yeshu, an ancient folk-tale based partly on Talmudic anecdotes about Jesus, written down first in the tenth century, but still read by orthodox Jews in the nineteenth century, Jews wrote little about Jesus until the twentieth century. The emancipation of the Jews from the ghettos of Europe over a two-hundred year period, ending in 1933, and the birth of the Haskalah (the Jewish "Enlightenment") movement among the Jews in the eighteenth century, enabled the Jews to escape their isolation and to enter, and adapt themselves to, the world of modern thinking. The

---

<sup>3</sup> German available in Paul Rilla, ed., Gotthold Ephraim Lessing: Gesammelte Werke, vols. 7 and 8 (Berlin: Aufbau, 1956); Eng. trans.: Reimarus Fragments, trans. Ralph S. Fraser, ed. C. H. Talbert (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1970).

<sup>4</sup> Paulus, der Apostel Jesu Christi: Sein Leben und Wirken, seine Lehre: Ein Beitrag zu einer kritischen Geschichte des Urchristentums, ed. by Eduard Zeller, 2 vols., 2nd ed. (Leipzig: Fues, 1866); Eng. trans.: Paul the Apostle of Jesus Christ, His Life and Work, His Epistles and His Doctrine: A Contribution to a Critical History of Primitive Christianity, trans. A. Menzies, 2 vols., 2nd ed. (London: Williams & Norgate, 1876), reprinted as Paul the Apostle of Jesus Christ: His Life and Works, His Epistles and Teachings (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2003).

<sup>5</sup> Paulus, Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher 1.5/6, 2nd ed. (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1907). Eng. trans.: Paul, trans. Edward Lummis (London: Green, 1907; reprinted, Lexington: American Theological Association, 1962).

changes occurring for the Jews in this period were enormous and had highly significant results. Not least, the new situation was responsible for the emergence of Reform Judaism. And it was primarily in Reform Judaism that the critical thinking spawned by the Enlightenment began to be applied to the study of Judaism in what became known as die Wissenschaft des Judentums, “the science of Judaism.” Now Jews began to defend Judaism as a religion in the face of the Enlightenment’s rationalistic polemic against all established religion. Gradually, but inevitably, the Pharisees and the Judaism of the New Testament came under scrutiny, and then, at long last, Jesus himself.

Although there were some nineteenth-century pioneers, such as Joseph Salvador, Abraham Geiger, and Heinrich Graetz (all ignored by Schweitzer, except for a brief note about Salvador that misspells his name), it was the twentieth century that brought the flowering of the Jewish study of Jesus, with such notable scholars as Claude Goldsmid Montefiore, Israel Abrahams, Joseph Klausner, Samuel Sandmel, Schalom Ben-Chorin, David Flusser, Pinchas Lapide, and Geza Vermes. There is no need here to review this interesting history.<sup>6</sup> But it will be useful to summarize the general results of the modern Jewish study of Jesus. Enough is held in common by these scholars, in my opinion, to speak of them collectively. The first and most important conclusion of these scholars is that Jesus was a Jew, through and through. There is a surprising amount of openness to concluding that he may have claimed to be the Messiah (thus Montefiore, Hyman Enelow, Klausner, Samuel Cohon, Sandmel, Hugh Schonfield) although it is also clear to these scholars that if he made such a claim he was mistaken, since the messianic age did not come and he died as a common criminal. He was faithful to the Law in his life and teaching, and the seriousness of his concern about its meaning qualifies him, in the minds of some, to be considered as a Pharisee or at least Pharisee-like, or rabbi-like (thus, e.g., Klausner, Geiger, Martin Buber, Paul Winter, Ben-Chorin, and Hyam Maccoby). Others have categorized Jesus as an Essene (Heinrich Graetz; several others see Essenic traits in Jesus without identifying him as an Essene), a Zealot (Joel Carmichael, Lapide), or as a charismatic, miracle-working hasid (Kaufmann Kohler, Flusser, Vermes). One of the most interesting designations is that of prophet, since it confers a special dignity upon Jesus that would separate him from his contemporaries (thus Montefiore, Hyman Enelow, Flusser). Although there is obviously little agreement as to what is the most appropriate category in which to position Jesus, it is also clear that all of these categories are eminently Jewish.<sup>7</sup> We may further note that Jewish scholars generally give little or no attention to the classic christological titles, except in the case of Vermes, who finds the minimum content in each: Lord (an address of respect), Son of Man (a circumlocution for "I"), Son of God (a term applied to a wide variety of individuals).

---

<sup>6</sup> This history has been reviewed by Gösta Lindeskog, Die Jesusfrage im neuzeitlichen Judentum: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung (Uppsala: Almqvist & Wiksells, 1938), reprinted with new postscript (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1973); and D. A. Hagner, The Jewish Reclamation of Jesus: A Critique and Analysis (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1984). See too, the two volumes of Jacob Jocz, The Jewish People and Jesus Christ: A Study in the Relationship between the Jewish People and Jesus Christ (London: SPCK, 1949; 3rd ed. Grand Rapids: Baker, 1979) and The Jewish People and Jesus Christ after Auschwitz: A Study in the Controversy between Church and Synagogue (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1981). Reviews from the Jewish side can be found in Schalom Ben-Chorin, Jesus im Judentum (Wuppertal: Brockhaus, 1970), an English distillation of which is found in The Journal of Ecumenical Studies 11 (1974): 401–430; and Pinchas Lapide, Ist das nicht Josephs Sohn? Jesus im heutigen Judentum (München: Calwer, Kösel, 1976; Eng. trans.: Israelis, Jews, and Jesus [New York: Doubleday, 1979]).

Now the extent to which these results overlap with those of the quest outlined by Schweitzer, and of the twentieth century more particularly, is remarkable. For all of the uncertainty about exactly where to place Jesus in the spectrum of first-century Judaism, it is the Jewishness of Jesus that eventually emerges with striking clarity. Furthermore, equally important is the conclusion that Jesus was very different from the Christ that became the center of Christian faith. The "real" Jesus is not the Jesus of the church. The gospels are documents so colored with the patina of Christian faith that, as they stand, they are historically untrustworthy.

What relationship, if any, is there between this flowering of the Jewish study of Jesus and the Jesus quest of Christian scholars? From the beginning there seems to have been no direct dependence of Jewish scholarship upon Christian scholarship; the former was capable of generating its own momentum. In this field of study Jewish scholars had no need of Christian scholars to assist them. The similarity in conclusions we have noted was rather the result of a common predisposition against the usual convictions of Christianity, caused on the one side by religious reasons<sup>8</sup> and on the other by the demands of critical historiography. Eventually, however—indeed already in the case of Montefiore—it becomes more and more evident that Christian scholarship begins to exert an influence upon Jewish writers. Reform Jews, who were not threatened by the rationalism of the Enlightenment, realized that the scientific historiography practiced by liberal Protestant scholarship could become a helpful ally in showing the error of Christianity. It was hardly discouraging to Jewish scholars that liberal Protestant scholarship continued to assert that the gospel accounts of Jesus reflected Gemeindetheologie, the theology of the church, more than it did actual history. The conclusions of Christian scholarship seemed eminently reasonable to Jewish scholars and to square with their reading of the gospels. The result was that the Christian questers became increasingly influential upon Jewish scholarship, as the twentieth century progressed.<sup>9</sup> Indeed, eventually Jewish scholars writing about Jesus become nearly indistinguishable from others involved in the quest as, for example, in the case of Vermes (who goes out of his way to note that he writes as a historian rather than a Jew) and Paula Fredriksen. It would seem now that the Jewish reclamation of Jesus has fully merged with the quest of the historical Jesus.<sup>10</sup> “Und auf jüdischer Seite hat die ‘Heimholung Jesu ins Judentum’ heute den Wind der historischen Jesusforschung nicht gegen sich, sondern im Rücken.”<sup>11</sup>

---

<sup>7</sup> For a fuller and more precise discussion, see Hagner, The Jewish Reclamation of Jesus, 227–271.

---

<sup>8</sup> See W. Riggans, “The Jewish Reclamation of Jesus and its Implications for Jewish-Christian Relations,” Themelios 18 (1992): 9–16.

<sup>9</sup> E. Bammel may overstate the matter, however, when he writes: “And when Jewish scholars started to develop an interest in Jesus they based their interpretation on the concepts of liberal German scholarship” (“Christian Origins in Jewish Tradition,” NTS 13 [1966–67]: 317).

<sup>10</sup> H. D. Betz concludes: “Modern Jewish interpretations [of Jesus] are again different in that they interact with or are part of historical-critical scholarship of the 19th and 20th century. These contributions also share in the shifts and changes, the loyalties and animosities of modern scholarship, and they must therefore be carefully assessed within the history of scholarship and the cultural and political circumstances in which they came into existence” (“Wellhausen’s Dictum ‘Jesus was not a Christian, but a Jew’ in Light of Present Scholarship,” Studia Theologica 45 [1991]: 83–110, at 97).

<sup>11</sup> K. Haacker, Versöhnung mit Israel: Exegetische Beiträge, Veröffentlichungen der Kirchlichen Hochschule Wuppertal, NF 5 (Neukirchener: Foedus, 2002), 201.

2. Positive Results of the Quest for Jewish-Christian Dialogue

The primary underlying concern of Jewish-Christian dialogue—of supreme and self-evident importance—has been to counteract the kind of misinformed, hateful thinking that ultimately caused the Holocaust. Christians and Jews have accordingly worked together on two fronts: to bring about a better understanding of Judaism, on the one hand, and a better understanding of Jesus, on the other. The quest of the historical Jesus in its recent manifestations<sup>12</sup> has been of great help on both fronts.

1. One of the distinguishing marks of the so-called, but misnamed, third quest, is the amount of attention given to Second Temple Judaism as the context in which the historical Jesus must be understood. Here we encounter influence in the opposite direction: Christian scholars have benefited greatly from the work of Jewish scholars, as one might well expect. There is much agreement between the two on fundamental matters. A great amount of helpful knowledge has been compiled concerning such things as the social conditions, politics, economics, and religious life of first-century Palestine, and there is a unified conviction that if the historical Jesus is to be explained, he must somehow be placed squarely into this context.<sup>13</sup> At the same time, we have acquired a better understanding of Judaism as a religion marked by covenantal nomism, a religion of grace and not merit.<sup>14</sup> Judaism then appears not so much as a foil for the Christian gospel of grace, but rather a parallel expression of a divinely ordained religion. If Jews are saved by the grace of God as much as Christians, then it would seem unnecessary for Christians to proselytize Jews.

---

<sup>12</sup> For helpful surveys, see W. R. Telford, "Major Trends and Interpretive Issues in the Study of Jesus," in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Research, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTTs 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 33–74; and David A. du Toit, "Redefining Jesus: Current Trends in Jesus Research," in Jesus, Mark and Q: The Teaching of Jesus and its Earliest Records, ed. Michael Labahn and Andreas Schmidt, JSNTSup 214 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001), 82–124.

<sup>13</sup> An exception that may be said to prove the rule is Burton L. Mack, who regards Jesus as a Hellenistic Cynic sage with little or no concern with things Jewish. See his A Myth of Innocence: Mark and Christian Origins (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988).

<sup>14</sup> Fully articulated first by E. P. Sanders in his Paul and Palestinian Judaism: A Comparison of Patterns of Religion (London/Philadelphia: SCM/Fortress, 1977), and developed in various later publications.

2. In 1905 Julius Wellhausen articulated the now famous dictum "Jesus was not a Christian, but a Jew."<sup>15</sup> It is clear that the great accomplishment of the quest, general though it is, is the establishment of the Jewishness of Jesus.<sup>16</sup> When Jewish scholars look at the Jesus of the gospels they are able immediately to recognize his intense Jewishness in a wide-ranging variety of respects that need not be reviewed here,<sup>17</sup> and that Jesus belongs as much, if not more, to the Jews as he does to the Christians. The realization of the Jewishness of Jesus may not at first seem to be much of an accomplishment, until one realizes that as the early church became more and more Gentile, and focused more and more upon the risen Lord, the Jewishness of Jesus began to recede, and indeed virtually disappeared from Christian consciousness. Christians lost any sense of their Jewish heritage and this loss soon produced fertile ground in which anti-Semitism could and did flourish.<sup>18</sup> A corollary to the conclusion that Jesus was fully Jewish is that to be Jewish is therefore something good.<sup>19</sup>

3. Furthermore, and perhaps more importantly for dialogue, it is widely concluded by the quest and by Jewish scholars that the historical Jesus is of necessity to be separated from the later church's understanding of him. The faith of the church, it is usually argued, apparently transformed Jesus into something he was not, and something that was very far from his mind. Here we encounter head-on the high christology of the New Testament documents. There is obviously an affirmation and heightening of the divinity of Jesus in the New Testament that necessarily goes beyond the actuality of the historical

---

<sup>15</sup> Einleitung in die drei ersten Evangelien (Berlin: Reimer, 1905), 113; see Betz, "Wellhausen's Dictum."

<sup>16</sup> See Tom Holmén, "The Jewishness of Jesus in the 'Third Quest,'" in Jesus, Mark and Q, ed. Labahn and Schmidt, 143–62. Holmén points out that "Jewishness," as widely defined, has become too broad to be helpful in understanding Jesus. He suggests the need for an "essentialist" approach that specifies core elements of Judaism, against which Jesus can be measured.

<sup>17</sup> See J. H. Charlesworth, ed., Jesus' Jewishness: Exploring the Place of Jesus within Early Judaism (New York: Crossroad, 1991); and idem, Jesus within Judaism: New Light from Exciting Archaeological Discoveries (New York: Doubleday, 1988).

<sup>18</sup> See R. T. Olson, "The Christian Blasphemy: A Non-Jewish Jesus," in Jews and Christians: Exploring the Past, Present, and Future, ed. J. H. Charlesworth (New York: Crossroad, 1990) 211–238, reprint of an article that appeared originally in JAAR 53 (1985).

<sup>19</sup> L. Keck notes that "theologically the Jewishness of Jesus has made this disagreement about him rather like a family quarrel," Who is Jesus? History in the Perfect Tense (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2000), 63.

Jesus. Rosemary Ruether is famous for her description of anti-Semitism as “the left hand of christology,”<sup>20</sup> meaning that the christology of the church is a primary cause of anti-Semitism. It is well known that the admirable desire to avoid anti-Semitism has led to frequent calls for a major overhaul of Christian theology in general and christology in particular. If, as the quest maintains—at least as it does for the most part—that the historical Jesus is to be understood as some type of Jewish teacher, healer, and reformer, then he need no longer be the great dividing point between Jews and Christians. But, as we will see below, such a minimalist conclusion is problematic for the explanation of the rise of Christianity, and therefore, problematic precisely from the perspective of sound historical method.

4. Furthermore, Jesus did not intend to create a new faith. The historical Jesus is fundamentally about Judaism, not about Christianity. He came, it is commonly argued, as a reformer of Judaism. Jesus thus did not intend—on the contrary, would have been offended by—the creation of a new community of faith, over against the Jewish faith, and especially one that made him the center of its theology and worship. It is, rather, the disciples of Jesus who are the creators of Christianity. It is they who transform Jesus into something he was not, and they who are responsible for the separation from Judaism. Jesus of course did not have as his purpose the creation of a new religion. Such a platitude, however, fails to reckon with the complexity of the fulfillment stressed by the New Testament, which involves continuity as well as discontinuity. Christianity entails newness, but the first generation of Christians thought of their faith as the true form of Judaism, not as a new religion.

5. As the obverse of the preceding point, in no way was Jesus disloyal to the Jewish faith. Quite the contrary, the gospels provide abundant evidence that despite his criticism of the Pharisees, Jesus remained fundamentally loyal to the faith of the Jews. “Instead, there is substantial evidence that Jesus accepted all of the major tenets of the Jewish faith: the unity and sovereignty of God, the value and sanctity of the Temple of Jerusalem, the authority of the Jewish Scriptures, the election of the people of Israel, and the hope of Israel’s redemption.”<sup>21</sup>

---

<sup>20</sup> Faith and Fratricide: The Theological Roots of Anti-Semitism (New York: Seabury, 1974), 64–65.

<sup>21</sup> Craig A. Evans, “The Jesus of History and the Christ of Faith: Toward Jewish-Christian Dialogue,” in Who Was Jesus? A Jewish-Christian Dialogue, ed. P. Copan

Jesus accepted the Torah and never intended to overthrow its authority. "Do not think that I have come to abolish the law or the prophets; I have not come to abolish but to fulfill" (Matt 5:17). The teaching of Jesus in the gospels is not meant to undermine the law, but rather to fulfill it, in the sense of bringing to expression its intended meaning.

3. Problematic Aspects of the Quest for Jewish-Christian Dialogue

If there are, as we have seen, undeniably some positive results of the quest of the historical Jesus for Jewish-Christian dialogue, there are also problematic aspects. Some of these have to do with the intrinsic methodological weaknesses of the quest, others with results of the quest. We turn now to look at these.

1. The quest has shed more light on the context of Jesus than on Jesus himself. The immense amount of attention given to the socio-cultural milieu of first-century Palestine and Second Temple Judaism has produced a richer understanding of the context of Jesus than ever before, and it has thereby opened up numerous options for the classification of Jesus. At the same time, however, there is little agreement concerning how to understand Jesus himself. Indeed, the current quest has produced as many Jesuses as did the old quest described by Schweitzer.<sup>22</sup> And despite the clear advances in scholarship, it seems no less true today than in the nineteenth century that scholars tend to see in Jesus a reflection of their own image. Which historical Jesus, if any, is the "real" Jesus?

Furthermore, better knowledge of the context has itself brought other new problems. The quest has revealed how complex first-century Judaism was. It seems that we must now speak of a variety of Judaisms.<sup>23</sup> What sort of Judaism does Jesus reflect? Was the Jewish background and C. A. Evans (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2001), 59–72, at 61, italics are Evans'.

---

<sup>22</sup> "Thus, the major disputed issue in the 'Third Quest' is what kind of person Jesus was and what the essence of his message, ministry, and intention was": M. E. Boring, "The 'Third Quest' and the Apostolic Faith," in Gospel Interpretation: Narrative-Critical and Social-Scientific Approaches, ed. J. D. Kingsbury (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1997), 237–252, at 240; reprint of an article that first appeared in Interpretation 50 (1996): 341–354, at 343–344.

<sup>23</sup> The classic example nowadays of a diverse Judaism is that of the Dead Sea Scroll community. See C. A. Evans, "The New Quest for Jesus and the New Research on the Dead Sea Scrolls," in Jesus, Mark and Q, ed. Labahn and Schmidt, 163–183.

against which Jewish scholars have understood Jesus accurate? Did it possibly make the explanation of Jesus too easy?<sup>24</sup>

2. The main criteria used by the quest to decide authenticity have not proved to be very effective. In particular, the criterion of double dissimilarity as classically employed cuts Jesus off not only from his followers but also from the Jewish context in which he lived. According to this criterion, only that which is unparalleled in the New Testament and in contemporary Judaism can be trusted as reliable history. The result is a Jesus who is totally isolated from his context. What is accepted as authentic concerning the historical Jesus becomes that which marks him out as eccentric and idiosyncratic. As a consequence the Jewishness of Jesus—an element of great importance for the Jewish-Christian dialogue—recedes into the background. According to Theissen and Winter, the theological motive behind this criterion is “anti-Judaism”—namely “the theological rejection of the Jewish religion, expressed especially in a strongly negative portrayal of Jewish faith and life,” a portrayal that functions as “a negative foil for the advent of Jesus and/or Christianity.”<sup>25</sup>

In recent years, however, a growing dissatisfaction with the dissimilarity criterion has developed. Theissen and Winter comment: “It is therefore time to replace the criterion of dissimilarity with a new criterion, in the process keeping its legitimate elements and correcting its distortions and one-sidedness.”<sup>26</sup> They advocate the “criterion of historical plausibility,” giving more positive consideration to contextual plausibility on the Jewish side, and to the plausibility of historical effects, on the Christian side. This new criterion will bring with it a positive and a negative result for Jewish-Christian dialogue: it will help

---

<sup>24</sup> D. J. Harrington raises the problem of the variety of Judaisms in the time of Jesus: “The Jewishness of Jesus: Facing Some Problems,” CBQ 49 (1987): 1–13, reprinted in Jesus’ Jewishness: Exploring the Place of Jesus within Early Judaism, ed., Charlesworth, 123–36. See also J. Neusner, W. S. Green and E. Frerichs, eds., Judaisms and their Messiahs at the Turn of the Christian Era (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987); and T. Holmén, “The Jewishness of Jesus in the ‘Third Quest,’” in Jesus, Mark and Q, ed. Labahn and Schmidt, 150–52.

<sup>25</sup> G. Theissen and D. Winter, The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria, trans. M. E. Boring (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002), 67.

<sup>26</sup> Theissen and Winter, Quest 172. For a similar critique, see T. Holmén, “Doubts about Double Dissimilarity: Restructuring the Main Criterion of Jesus-of-history Research,” in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTTS 28.1 (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 47–80.

establish the Jewishness of Jesus, but it will also help build connections with the Christian view of Jesus.

3. The determination of Jesus' self-understanding remains an important aspect of the quest. Thus far, however, the quest has not been very successful here. In the opinion of Craig Evans, "probably no feature of Jesus research has been more divisive than the question of the claims that Jesus made for himself."<sup>27</sup> Nevertheless, this is an issue that can have extremely important implications for Jewish-Christian dialogue.

It is clear that Jesus was unique in some respects. One of the immediate impressions one gains from the synoptic gospels is that Jesus was perceived as possessing a unique authority. Both in his deeds and his words, Jesus constantly amazed those around him. That pattern of authority stems from personal claims, explicit or implicit. A range of possibilities confronts the interpreter, as we have already seen. Some of these, e.g., proto-rabbi, charismatic healer, reformer, or prophet,<sup>28</sup> are not necessarily problematic for the Jewish-Christian dialogue. Other options—those that move toward a "high" christology—such as Messiah, Messianic Son of Man, unique Agent of God, one who is uniquely the Son of God, and the personification of Wisdom—since they accord more with the Christian estimate of Jesus, can complicate the dialogue.

The quest, armed with the criterion of dissimilarity, has essentially put a question mark over the perspective of the gospel writers, and seems, thus far, unable to come to a conclusion concerning Jesus' self-perception. But we may well see more progress on this issue in the future,<sup>29</sup> and the implications for Jewish-Christian dialogue are significant.

4. Another issue that is of the greatest interest to Jews is the cause of, and the responsibility for, the death of Jesus. This is crucial for Jewish-Christian dialogue since blaming Jews for the death of Christ—the crime of deicide, as it has unfortunately been called—is perhaps the root cause of anti-Semitism. The dominant Jewish point of view is that Jesus was put to death by the Romans for fomenting political revolt. Since crucifixion was a Roman, and not a Jewish, form of punishment, this is obviously true at one level. But is it the whole story?

<sup>27</sup> "The Jesus of History and the Christ of Faith," 63.

<sup>28</sup> See Markus Öhler, "Jesus as Prophet: Remarks on Terminology," in Jesus, Mark and Q, ed. Labahn and Schmidt, 125–42.

<sup>29</sup> As examples of encouraging directions, see Marinus de Jonge, God's Final Envoy: Early Christology and Jesus' Own View of His Mission (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998) and Ben Witherington III, The Christology of Jesus (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); cf. C. A. Evans, "The Jesus of History and the Christ of Faith," 63–66.

The role of the Jews in the death of Jesus seems clear from the gospels. But if there is Jewish complicity in the death of Jesus, it is to be limited primarily to the Jewish leadership,<sup>30</sup> rather than to the Jewish people as a whole. Furthermore, the Jewish mob who yelled for the crucifixion of Jesus with the words "Let his blood be upon us and upon our children," is hardly representative of the totality of the Jewish people. Certainly the Jews of later generations down to the present had nothing to do with the death of Jesus. A further point that gospel scholarship has made clear is that the New Testament's hostility toward the Jews is heightened by, and a reflection of, the increasing animosity between Jews and Christians as the first century wore on. This undoubtedly has had its impact upon the passion narrative, as well as other parts of the gospel narratives.

What was it about Jesus that drew forth the wrath of the Jewish leadership? The gospels call attention to Jesus' stance towards two pillars of Judaism, the Law and the Temple.<sup>31</sup> The controversy stories in the early chapters of Mark illustrate the opposition of the leadership stirred up by Jesus' attitude toward typical Sabbath observance (e.g., Mark 3:6). Jesus does appear to have a transcendent authority concerning the law ("the Son of Man is Lord even of the Sabbath," Mark 2:28). Nevertheless, Jesus must finally be judged as being fundamentally loyal to the Law (Matt 5:17). The quest has turned to the Temple as a more promising explanation, for Jesus not only prophesied its destruction (though some doubt this), but he also acted with uncharacteristic violence in ousting the money-changers from the Temple area (Mark 11:15–17 and parallels). The Markan account is followed by the notice that "the chief priests and the scribes heard it and sought a way to destroy him” (Mark 11:18). This revolutionary attack against the establishment could hardly have been overlooked by the Jewish authorities—certainly not at Passover time, and not by one who had previously entered the city to the sound of messianic acclamation (Mark 11:1–10 and parallels).<sup>32</sup>

---

<sup>30</sup> One must balk, however, at the excessive portrayal of the Jewish leadership in Mel Gibson's much-discussed movie, The Passion.

<sup>31</sup> "Torah and temple, it is often correctly said, were the two foci of Judaism, and Jesus either threatened or was perceived as threatening both": W. D. Davies and E. P. Sanders, "Jesus: From the Jewish Point of View," in The Cambridge History of Judaism, vol. 3, ed. W. Horbury, W. D. Davies and J. Sturdy (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999), 618–677, at 674. Davies and Sanders conclude that four factors were responsible for the death of Jesus: the question of who speaks for God; proclamation of the kingdom with the implication that Jesus was a king; the political situation that posed danger for a charismatic leader; and the temple incident (675).

It is clear that the question concerning the reason for the death of Jesus can hardly be answered if he is understood as only an unusual teacher, with unusual interpretations of the commandments. The more solidly scholars place Jesus comfortably into his Jewish context the more difficult it becomes to explain his death. H.-D. Betz rightly faults Wellhausen for his inability to provide a plausible explanation for the crucifixion of Jesus.<sup>33</sup> Why, it is normally and correctly asked, would anyone bother to crucify an exceptional teacher? In response to a similar question, about why anyone would crucify a charismatic hasid and healer, Vermes writes “He died on the cross for having done the wrong thing (caused a commotion) in the wrong place (the Temple) at the wrong time (just before Passover). Here lies the real tragedy of Jesus the Jew.”<sup>34</sup> Jesus was thus ultimately crucified for political reasons, as the authorities tried to keep control of a potentially inflammatory situation. Here again we find a concordance between the conclusions of the quest and those of Jewish scholarship.

At the same time, Jesus’ stance toward both the Law and the Temple clearly implies a unique authority, an authority in which messianic claims are implicit. The irony of the inscription on the cross, “King of the Jews,” is remarkable for several reasons. What is meant as a parody ironically conveys truth. The death of Jesus was probably due to a combination of things, but it is difficult to rule out the unique personal authority and implicit claims of Jesus as major factors in the mix. The reference to blasphemy in the scene of Jesus’ “trial” or hearing before the Sanhedrin seems connected with the unacceptable personal claims either made or implied by Jesus.

The trend today seems more and more to underline the Jewishness of Jesus and to fit him into his Jewish context. To the extent, however, that the conclusions of some questers point to the authority of Jesus

---

<sup>32</sup> For a full study of the crucial temple incident, see Jostein Ådna, Jesu Stellung zum Tempel: Die Tempelaktion und das Tempelwort als Ausdruck seiner messianischen Sendung, WUNT 2.119 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000).

<sup>33</sup> “Wellhausen’s Dictum,” 86.

<sup>34</sup> G. Vermes, The Religion of Jesus the Jew (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993), x.

vis-à-vis the Law and the Temple, and to the extent that personal claims are also regarded as implied, the more the quest provides an obstacle to Jewish-Christian dialogue.

5. A final, key issue that confronts the quest is how to frame an adequate explanation of the faith of the first Christians and the birth of the church. Here again, the more “ordinary” Jesus is made to appear, the more he fits into his context, the more unconvincing the explanation becomes. Any construal of the evidence that fails to provide a plausible account of Christian origins can hardly be regarded as acceptable.<sup>35</sup>

To begin with, the matter of the resurrection experience of the disciples must be considered. The resurrection itself, of course, has traditionally been regarded as off-limits for historical study. The historian per se has no access to that which is outside the normal, closed system of cause and effect.<sup>36</sup> Recently, however, from one deeply involved in the Jesus quest, the issue of the resurrection has been addressed head on. In a bold, path-breaking book, N. T. Wright argues that the resurrection is both a legitimate and necessary subject for historical inquiry.<sup>37</sup> At the end of his long investigation, he concludes: “We are left with the secure historical conclusion: the tomb was empty, and various ‘meetings’ took place not only between Jesus and his followers (including at least one initial sceptic) but also, in at least one case (that of Paul, possibly, too, that of James), between Jesus and people who had

---

<sup>35</sup> Betz points out that “Wellhausen has no explanation of a historical connection between Jesus and the early church” (“Wellhausen’s Dictum,” 87).

<sup>36</sup> Cf. J. P. Meier, who at the beginning of his multi-volume study of the historical Jesus writes: “a treatment of the resurrection is omitted not because it is denied but simply because the restrictive definition of the historical Jesus I will be using does not allow us to proceed into matters that can be affirmed only by faith” (A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus I [New York: Doubleday, 1991], 13). Volume 4 thus promises no discussion of the resurrection, but rather a treatment of why Jesus was crucified, “the starkest, most disturbing, and most central of all the enigmas Jesus posed and was” (III, 646 [2001]).

<sup>37</sup> The Resurrection of the Son of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003). The empty tomb and the resurrection appearances “took place as real events... they are, in the normal sense required by historians, provable events; historians can and should write about them” (709). “Provable” here means reaching the high probability that is within the province of the historian. Cf. J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003), 102–105. “In historical scholarship the judgment ‘probable’ is a very positive verdict” (103). See, too, W. P. Alston, “Biblical Criticism and the Resurrection,” in The Resurrection: An Interdisciplinary Symposium on the Resurrection of Jesus, ed. S. T. Davis, D. Kendall, and G. O’Collins (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997), 148–183.

not been among his followers.”<sup>38</sup> In Wright’s view, “the combination of empty tomb and appearances of the living Jesus forms a set of circumstances which is itself both necessary and sufficient for the rise of early Christian belief. Without these phenomena, we cannot explain why this belief came into existence, and took the shape it did. With them we can explain it exactly and precisely.”<sup>39</sup>

If the resurrection is taken as a historical datum, what are the implications for the understanding of Jesus? Wright addresses this question in the final chapter of his book, concluding that it points not merely to Jesus as being the Messiah, but as being uniquely the Son of God. Wright’s perspective is bound to be controversial among those questioning after the historical Jesus, but his argument is not easy to dismiss.

Another factor that must be explained in the quest is the surprisingly early devotion to Jesus in the early church, a topic now taken up fully in the recent book by Larry Hurtado.<sup>40</sup> Devotion to Jesus, writes Hurtado, does not appear at a secondary stage, but “emerges phenomenally early,” an occurrence without contemporary religious analogy, and “this intense devotion to Jesus, which includes reverencing him as divine, was offered and articulated characteristically within a firm stance of exclusivist monotheism.”<sup>41</sup> Hurtado examines the fact of this devotion to Jesus from the beginning, and not its cause. But lying behind it must be an adequate explanation—one that undoubtedly goes back not only to the impact made by Jesus but also to the resurrection. There are many interesting ramifications of Hurtado’s book that we cannot go into here—e.g., when can we first speak of “Christianity” and when does the “parting of the ways” between synagogue and church begin? Perhaps some currently popular conclusions will need revision.

Another recent and remarkable book makes a similar point, but pushes the question of the faith of the disciples back into the ministry of Jesus itself. J. D. G. Dunn presents a compelling argument that the

---

<sup>38</sup> He adds: “I regard this conclusion as virtually certain, as the death of Augustus in AD 14 or the fall of Jerusalem in AD 70” (Wright, Resurrection, 710).

<sup>39</sup> Wright, Resurrection, 696.

<sup>40</sup> Lord Jesus Christ: Devotion to Jesus in Earliest Christianity (Grand Rapids and Cambridge, UK: Eerdmans, 2003). The earlier work of Franz Mussner along these lines should be noted, as well as his treatment of other themes pertinent to the present essay. See now his collected essays, Jesus von Nazareth im Umfeld Israels und der Urkirche, WUNT 111, ed. Michael Theobald (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1999); and, of course, his classic Tractate on the Jews, trans. L. Swidler (1979; London and Philadelphia: SPCK/Fortress, 1984).

<sup>41</sup> Hurtado, Lord Jesus Christ, 2–3.

faith of the early Christians goes back to the earliest encounters of the disciples with Jesus, and does not begin with or after the resurrection.<sup>42</sup> Dunn finds the essence of the synoptic tradition as already the product of the pre-Easter impact of Jesus and the resultant faith of the disciples.

Inevitably the attempt to explain the origin of the faith and worship of the earliest Christians drives us back to the person of Jesus and inevitably we are brought back to an early and very “high” christology. Insofar as that is the case, it is clear that the results of the work of Wright, Hurtado, and Dunn will be problematic for Jewish-Christian dialogue.

6. Two further matters—now concerning the methodology of the quest—deserve mention here. The first is the well-known problem of the inadequacy of the historical method. Because of the self-imposed limitations of the method, Jesus will always be more than the historians can describe or analyze.<sup>43</sup> The quest for the historical Jesus must play by the rules, but the problem is that the rules predetermine the outcome in a way that may not be fair to reality. With no room for the possibility of recognizing God at work in the historical process, thereby negating the very assertion of the gospels, the method is seemingly bound to produce a severely diminished Jesus, at least so far as those of Christian faith are concerned. “It is precisely in the material that is most problematic to the secular historian (for example, the birth and resurrection stories) that this acknowledgment of the true scope and significance of the event of Jesus’ life is most clearly manifested.”<sup>44</sup> The gospel portraits of Jesus continually challenge the adequacy of the historical method. As a result, the historian’s Jesus is necessarily an artificial Jesus. John P. Meier begins his monumental multi-volume study of the historical Jesus with the paradoxical words: “The historical Jesus is not the real Jesus. The real Jesus is not the historical Jesus.”<sup>45</sup> M. E. Boring has called attention to the problem with these words: “If, how-

<sup>42</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered.

<sup>43</sup> Cf. Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 125–126.

<sup>44</sup> Francis Watson, “The Quest for the Real Jesus,” in The Cambridge Companion to Jesus, ed. M. Bockmuehl (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001), 156–169, at 165. Cf. L. Keck: “What must not be missed is that by deleting from Jesus’ history all references to divine action, critics set aside precisely those parts of the gospels by which the Evangelists expressed the most explicitly their understanding of the ongoing significance of Jesus, his perfect tense” (Who is Jesus?, 5).

<sup>45</sup> A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus I, 21.

ever, one wishes to engage in the perfectly legitimate, perhaps for us in our time even theologically necessary, enterprise of reconstructing a historian's Jesus that can be argued about by historians limiting themselves to historical methods, the Jesus so reconstructed will always be less than the 'real Jesus'.<sup>46</sup>

Once one is required by the historical method to reject the interpretive framework and perspective of the gospel writers, the possible interpretations quickly multiply, as has happened in the third quest, and the resultant Jesus necessarily becomes the reflection of the interpreter's image, even as Schweitzer demonstrated in his review of the nineteenth-century quest.

Insofar as the basic method of the quest by its nature can say nothing about items central to the Christian faith, its results remove a traditional obstacle to dialogue and are accordingly looked upon favorably by Jewish scholars. The resultant predicament of Christian scholars, however, is that "having been deprived of the pivotal figure of Jesus, Christianity is left either without a historical foundation or with the extremely difficult task of finding another way to relate to the historical Jesus."<sup>47</sup>

For those thoroughly bogged down in this quandary, Wright's approach to the resurrection (see above) holds considerable promise. Can the historical method, in any meaningful sense, deal responsibly with the miracles of Jesus?<sup>48</sup> At this point, not unexpectedly, many will

---

<sup>46</sup> "The 'Third Quest' and the Apostolic Faith," 249. Boring rightly adds, "Even so, there must also be lines of continuity between the reconstructed historian's Jesus and the 'real Jesus'—these cannot be utterly discontinuous, or one of them is wrong" (249).

<sup>47</sup> Betz, "Wellhausen's Dictum," 98.

<sup>48</sup> Cf. N. T. Wright: "But one cannot rule out a priori the possibility of things occurring in ways not normally expected, since to do so would be to begin from the fixed point that a particular worldview, namely the eighteenth-century rationalist one, or its twentieth-century positivist successor, is correct in postulating that the universe is simply a 'closed continuum' of cause and effect" (The New Testament and the People of God [Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992], 92). Cf. Dunn: "the question remains whether a viable concept and practice of 'historical method' can also be retrieved from the blinkered historicist and positivist perspectives of modernity, from the narrowing rationalist and scientific assumptions of the Enlightenment" (Jesus Remembered, 29). Particularly helpful on the subject is C. S. Evans, The Historical Christ and the Jesus of Faith: The Incarnational Narrative as History (Oxford: Clarendon, 1996). Cf. Graham H. Twelftree, "The History of Miracles in the History of Jesus," in The Face of New Testament Studies: A Survey of Recent Research, ed. S. McKnight and G. R. Osborne (Grand Rapids: Baker/Apollos, 2004), 191–208: "No less than in the nineteenth century, the fluctuating fortunes of the way the miracles of Jesus are treated has remained theologically driven and often philosophically shackled by rationalism or decline the invitation. And this brings us to our second observation concerning methodology.

7. There is no need here to go into the vagaries of post-modernism.<sup>49</sup> Nevertheless, it is worth calling attention again to the impossibility of a neutral history. We are much more sensitive now, than earlier in the last century, to the biased character of all our observation and knowledge. We have no access to pure facts; there is no escape from interpretation. The hermeneutical circle, which no-one fully escapes, means that all of us incline to see things the way we have been taught to see them, and the way our respective communities see them. The positivist ideal of objective facts has had to give way to the reality of socially constructed, and community-influenced, knowledge.

Those who have the eyes of faith will, of course, tend to deal with the historical evidence differently from those who are skeptical. Christians will see the Jesus of history one way; Jews will see him in a different way. There is no neutral ground from which to decide who is right and who is wrong. This is not a counsel of despair. All can make the attempt to step outside their prior understandings. All can take a new look at the evidence. There is still room for the use of reason, evaluation of evidence, and the presentation of arguments. But under the circumstances there will also be plenty of room for humility and charity.

In fact, we cannot give up on the importance of historical research and the rational consideration of evidence. We simply cannot do without it unless we choose the comfort of solitude and silence and cut ourselves off from the realm of public discourse. Because we cannot have absolute knowledge does not mean that we cannot have knowledge.<sup>50</sup>

4. The Quest and Jewish-Christian Dialogue

Having looked at the positive and negative aspects of the quest for Jewish-Christian dialogue, we may now turn to some concluding naturalism. It cannot be otherwise until historiographers are able to challenge successfully this ascendant paradigm of reality supposed by most Jesus questers" (208).

---

<sup>49</sup> Dunn is one of the few who addresses the matter head-on: Jesus Remembered, 92–97.

<sup>50</sup> See Alan G. Padgett's helpful article, "Advice for Religious Historians: On the Myth of a Purely Historical Jesus," in The Resurrection, ed. Davis et al., 287–307.

remarks on the subject. Given the mixed results that we have noted, what can we say about the quest of the historical Jesus and its impact upon Jewish-Christian relations? How far have we come? How much further can we go? What can we realistically expect?

1. To begin with, we must be grateful for what has been accomplished, which at least deserves the evaluation so far, so good. If we had only the two main achievements of the quest, namely, our increased knowledge of Second Temple Judaism, and the firm establishment of the Jewishness of Jesus, our gratitude would be justified. These are indeed significant contributions that have had a positive effect on Jewish-Christian dialogue.

The quest to this point has focused on areas upon which Jews and Christians can often readily agree, and to this extent we may judge the quest as helpful. But how far has the quest come, and how successfully?

2. Since it is widely agreed that thus far the quest can itself hardly be called an unalloyed success, the potential of the quest for Jewish-Christian relations remains unclear. The trouble is that the quest has not been able to get very far in arriving at its announced goal. Focusing more on the context than on Jesus himself, the quest, as we have noted, has failed to address the ultimately decisive questions. The historical method has seemed ill-suited to its subject matter in this case. Perhaps with the recent works of Wright, Dunn, and Hurtado, however, this may have begun to change.

Problems remain even with some agreed-upon positive conclusions mentioned above that have importance for Jewish-Christian dialogue. Thus, the quest's insistence that Jesus was fundamentally loyal to the Jewish faith and did not intend to create a new religion, while true enough on the one hand, can also conceal the newness that is implicit in so much of Jesus, his message and the new community of faith. It is clearly wrong to speak of that newness in terms of the creation of a new religion or of disloyalty to the Jewish faith. The only adequate word is "fulfillment," with all the continuity (and discontinuity) implied by that word, but "fulfillment" is not exactly a term that will promote positive responses from Jewish scholarship, or enhance Jewish-Christian relations. Not unexpectedly, "fulfillment" has the ring of supersessionism to Jewish ears. Supersessionism, however, we must insist, cannot be an option to any Christian who has read Romans 11.

3. In the final analysis, it would appear that the "historical" Jesus arrived at through the historical method as traditionally practiced, cannot finally become a bridge strong enough to cross the chasm that divides Jews and Christians. "...Christians and Jews have drawn different conclusions and can stay together regarding Jesus' identity only part of the way. At some point along that way we necessarily confront the theological issues..."<sup>51</sup> This should not be a distressing conclusion. The limited agreement that the quest has been able to provide has been helpful, but productive dialogue and good relations do not depend on the ability to agree on everything.

In fact, Jewish and Christian scholars who look at Jesus will continue to disagree, and therefore we must learn how to face and cope with our disagreements. "Why are we so reluctant, in this age of dialogue, to emphasize those things that separate or differentiate Jews and Christians?" asks Isabel Wollaston.<sup>52</sup> The point of dialogue, after all, is not to erase disagreements or to overcome all differences, but rather to come to a better understanding and to learn to respect those with whom we disagree. Post-holocaust sensitivities, as highly appropriate as they are, have unfortunately made it difficult—indeed, sometimes nearly impossible—for Christian scholars to arrive at any negative conclusions about the Judaism of the New Testament, or things Jewish, such as the Pharisees or the Law, without being considered anti-Semitic, or at least potentially so.

For that very important reason, however, one very important caveat must be insisted upon at this point. Christians can disagree with Judaism only if they remain highly vigilant against any semblance of anti-Semitism. Here we are required to speak in absolute, non-negotiable, terms: Christians cannot and will not tolerate anti-Semitism.

4. Dialogue must finally take place within the framework of the faith of the other, as defined by the other. Jacob Neusner has called attention to the futility of Christians defining Judaism, and Jews defining Christianity, in such ways as to minimize the differences between the two.<sup>53</sup> In this way the distinctive character of each is compromised. One of the most common instruments used in this regard is the historical Jesus, who is seen more and more as the common denominator that can pull together the two religions. Neusner refers to the minimalist or “Judaic Christology” of the Jewish Jesus as the product of what he calls a “dual monologue.”

<sup>51</sup> Harrington, "The Jewishness of Jesus: Facing Some Problems," 13.

<sup>52</sup> "Responses to Anti-Judaism and Anti-Semitism in Contemporary Christian-Jewish Relations," in The Future of Jewish-Christian Dialogue, ed. D. Cohn-Sherbok (Lewiston: Mellen, 1999), 31–48, at 44.

<sup>53</sup> Telling Tales: Making Sense of Christian and Judaic Nonsense: The Urgency and Basis for Judeo-Christian Dialogue (Louisville: Westminster and John Knox, 1993). See his earlier Jews and Christians: The Myth of a Common Tradition (New York and London: Trinity Press International/SCM, 1990).

Similarly, Christians who in their eagerness to build bridges or repair the damage to relations caused by the holocaust, appeal to the “historical” Jesus, and speak of a Jesus fully explainable within Jewish categories, hardly recognizable as the Lord of the church, do no service to dialogue. Facing the differences candidly, Neusner concludes “‘the historical Jesus’ is simply inconsequential when it comes to a dialogue between Judaism and Christianity. Either Judaism addresses Jesus Christ God Incarnate (or equivalently critical formulations of Christian theology) or it fails to address Christianity at all.”<sup>54</sup>

New Testament scholar David Catchpole articulates a similar perspective when he argues that Christians who participate in Jewish-Christian dialogue “must be more careful than they have sometimes been to work to and then from a clear definition of the essence of Christianity.”<sup>55</sup> “This pattern of faith,” he continues, “does not invest in the historical Jesus as such, nor in Jesus the Jew, nor in the Jesus who confined his mission to the Jewish people, nor in the Jesus who worked within the parameters of the Mosaic law and thus understood the ‘boundary markers’ of the people of God to be circumcision, food laws, and sabbath.”<sup>56</sup>

Catchpole nevertheless does not dismiss the importance of the historical Jesus. He calls attention to the importance of historical elements within the Niceno-Constantinopolitan creed itself. One of <sup>54</sup> Telling Tales, 89. “On the Jewish side, by focusing upon the man Jesus—presenting him, for example, as a Reform rabbi or a marginal Jew or a Galilean pietist (Hasid) or in numerous other this-worldly Christologies—Jews have avoided stating forthrightly what in the Middle Ages, under different circumstances, they found the courage to state on pain of death: he was not and is not what the Christians say he was and is” (103).

---

<sup>55</sup> “The Role of the Historical Jesus in Jewish-Christian Dialogue,” in The Future of Jewish-Christian Dialogue, ed. Cohn-Sherbok, 183–216, at 211. “My suggestion is that the absolutely crucial and essential core of that position is to be found in post-historical-Jesus realities: the resurrection itself, the inclusive and corporate Christ who is the eschatological Adam and the embodiment of a new humanity; the worldwide community, drawing into itself persons of any and every ethnic background without distinction; the one baptism which makes legally binding and determinative the faith experience of the one God who is the God of the whole world, and whose sovereignty over that one world is effected through the lordship of the risen one” (211).

<sup>56</sup> Catchpole, “Role of the Historical Jesus,” 211.

the central elements in that creed is the crucifixion of Jesus, which already points to what remains a remarkable tension within the historical Jesus.

Himself a member of the Jewish people, [Jesus] was in his mission in conflict with the Jewish people, and in the end he believed he was dying for the Jewish people. That essential identification with, and at the same time critical distance from, his people represents a tension in the mission of the historical Jesus which, I submit, the Jewish-Christian dialogue at any and every later time must not relax.<sup>57</sup>

5. Concluding Observations

It is clear that we have reason to be grateful for the significant achievements of the quest of the historical Jesus. We have been deeply enriched by an increased knowledge of Second Temple Judaism and the emphasis upon the Jewishness of Jesus. At the same time, however, we have had to criticize the quest at points and to deem its method as, in the last analysis, inadequate to the task. It remains to be seen whether the historical-critical method can be refined, as some are attempting to do, so as to make it a more effective tool in understanding the Jesus of history.

In light of the calls of Neusner and Catchpole for the necessity of Jewish-Christian dialogue to come to terms with the full christology of the church, some might conclude that the quest of the historical Jesus is not merely impossible, but unnecessary too. This would be a grave mistake, however, since it would result in the heresy of docetism, wherein the humanity of Jesus becomes a mere illusion. The creeds, like the New Testament itself, affirm with equal vigor the humanity and the deity of Jesus. This fact alone warrants the robust study of Jesus as a man set fully in his own historical context.

It is clear that dialogue worthy of the name cannot succeed if it works with the severely reduced data base that the quest of the historical Jesus provides. But, as Catchpole and others have indicated, even within the criteria normally mandated of the historical Jesus there are surprising indicators that do not fit the Jewish context well—the unusual, the unexpected, the problematic. We cannot expect the historical Jesus to correspond exactly to the Christology of the church, impacted—but not created by!—the experience of the resurrection. The post-resurrection perspective of the church has its inevitable effect upon the gospel narratives. But if we cannot look for a one-to-one correspondence between the historical Jesus and the Jesus believed upon in the early church, we can at least establish a degree of continuity between the two.<sup>58</sup> And that continuity is of the greatest importance, since without it the Christian faith becomes like a vaporous cloud, the phantasm of deluded minds.

---

<sup>57</sup> Catchpole, "Role of the Historical Jesus," 212. On the death of Jesus, see Peter Balla, "What Did Jesus Think about his Approaching Death?" in Jesus, Mark and Q, ed. Labahn and Schmidt, 239–258.

The quest of the historical Jesus has much importance for Jewish-Christian relations. It is not, however, a panacea. True dialogue will always have to go beyond the historical Jesus to consideration of the Jesus confessed by the faith of the church. But there are positive contributions of the quest that can and ought to lead not merely to tolerance, but also to mutual respect, good will, and, yes, even love for the other. After all, Christians are, because of Jesus, kinsfolk of the Jews—indeed, Gentiles come into the larger family through adoption—even if at the same time they remain members of different families.<sup>59</sup>

We end where we began, with the comment that Jesus Christ is paradoxically the one who divides and unites Jews and Christians. Jewish scholar Lewis John Eron makes the point in the following words:

Jesus, the Jew, neither binds us nor separates us. He is historically interesting. Jesus, the Christ of the Church, is the one who brings us together and draws us apart. It is because of Christ that religious Jews can meet with religious Christians, realize the depth of our experiences, and learn that we are truly not the same but refreshingly different.<sup>60</sup>

---

<sup>58</sup> There will, of course, always be those who dissent, such as Geza Vermes who, having concluded that Jesus the Jew “does not reflect, but rather clashes with, traditional, dogmatic, Christocentric, Trinitarian Christianity” and that “historic Christianity is not the religion of Jesus the Jew, nor the religion taught by him,” speaks of the serious questions “awaiting Christian answers”: “Jesus the Jew: Christian and Jewish Reactions,” in Jews and Christians in a Pluralistic World, ed. Ernst-Wolfgang Böckenförde and Edward Shils (New York: St. Martin’s, 1991), 25–42, at 39.

<sup>59</sup> As Keck points out, “that Jesus links Gentiles to Israel is as true today as it was in the first century,” Who is Jesus?, 63.

<sup>60</sup> “Jesus and Judaism,” in Leonard Swidler, Lewis John Eron, Gerard Sloyan, and Lester Dean, Bursting the Bonds? A Jewish-Christian Dialogue on Jesus and Paul (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1990), 108.

HISTORIC JESUSES

CEES DEN HEYER

1. Albert Schweitzer

A hundred years ago, Albert Schweitzer (1875–1965) wrote his famous book about the research being done on the Jesus of history.<sup>1</sup> Thereafter he became a well-known figure in this field of theological study. In his work he provided an overview—as complete as possible—of the many publications of the nineteenth century that had resulted from the interest in historical questions concerning Jesus. Who was he really? The traditional christological dogma had no doubt about that: Jesus was the son of God, “of one substance with the Father.” With their critical questions, theologians, as a direct consequence of Enlightenment thought, challenged these statements which had been vindicated through the centuries. Driven by their curiosity, they probed beyond confessions and dogmas in search of the real Jesus.

Schweitzer reports on this quest in his well-written book. He also points out the weaknesses of this investigation. Researchers claimed to present an objective image of Jesus, but it was not consistent. Each researcher found his “own” Jesus. He was a conservative for the conservative, a progressive for the progressive, a capitalist or a Communist, a moralist, a revolutionary, an artist, a thinker of genius or a man of humble origin from Galilee.<sup>2</sup> It is to Schweitzer’s credit that he demonstrated how much the course of this “objective” research was determined by subjective assumptions.

Schweitzer expressed the problem in a very striking way:

The research into the life of Jesus has gone through a strange process. The intention was to find the Jesus of history with the idea of placing him in this form into our time as teacher and saviour. The tie binding him to the rock of church teaching for centuries was loosened, and those involved were glad that there was life and movement again in this figure and that they saw the human Jesus of history approaching. But he did not stop; he went past our time and returned to his own. The theology of the past decennia felt estranged and shocked by the fact that it could not, with all its forced explanations and violence, retain him in our time, but had to let him go. He returned to his own time the way a released sling returns to its original position.

---

<sup>1</sup> A. Schweitzer, Von Reimarus zu Wrede (Tübingen: Mohr, 1906); Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung (Tübingen: Mohr, 1913; ET: Tübingen: Mohr, 1966).

<sup>2</sup> J. Jeremias, “Der gegenwärtigen Stand der Debatte um das Problem des historischen Jesus,” in Der historische Jesus und der kerygmatischen Christus, ed. H. Ristow and K. Matthiae (Berlin: Topelmann, 1961), 12–25.

Nineteenth-century research produced no single image of Jesus, but a confusing multitude of perceptions and ideas.<sup>3</sup> Consciously or not, each researcher created a Jesus who corresponded to his wishes and desires. This assertion raises the question whether it is possible to construct a research method that will lead to an objective conclusion. Schweitzer thought he could provide an affirmative answer to this question. His assumption was that Jesus would remain a stranger to people of the nineteenth and the twentieth century. Schweitzer was thoroughly convinced of this. The man from Nazareth is no contemporary of the people of today. He lived in another time and in another world of thought. This fact should be taken absolutely seriously. It sounds like a paradox, and it is one: Only as the “stranger” from an ancient past can Jesus be a source of inspiration for people living twenty centuries later.

In summary, the fact of Jesus being a “stranger” forms the essence of Schweitzer’s view. In the chapter titled “The Solution of Consistent Theology,” he sketches an image of Jesus as an apocalyptic who expected the Kingdom of God to come during his lifetime. Typical for Schweitzer’s position is his preference for the Gospel of Matthew. Otherwise than most exegetes, he chose not to go along with the hypothesis of two sources which is based on the priority of Mark. In chapter 10 of his gospel, Matthew includes a lengthy discourse by Jesus directed to his disciples, whom he is sending off to proclaim the message of the Kingdom of heaven. Schweitzer considers the passage that follows to be the central one: “When they persecute you in one town, flee to the next; for truly, I say to you, you will not have gone through all the towns of Israel, before the Son of man comes” (Matt 10:23).<sup>4</sup> Jesus was convinced that he would not see his disciples again on this earth, so close at hand was the Kingdom.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>3</sup> C. J. den Heyer, Jesus Matters, 150 Years of Research (London: SCM, 1996).

<sup>4</sup> All Bible quotations are taken from the Revised Standard Version (1972).

<sup>5</sup> M. Künzi, Das Nahwartungslogion Matthäus 10,23. Geschichte seiner Auslegung (Tübingen: Mohr, 1970).

Jesus' commandments, such as those written down in the Sermon on the Mount, fit into this scheme. Jesus' ethics are to be understood as ethics "for the interim." It is not the ethics of the Kingdom of God itself, but it is ethics intended for people who are expectantly awaiting that Kingdom—people who, like Jesus, are living in the "interim," in the short period of time presaging God's final intervention in this world. For Schweitzer, this is the ongoing meaning of Jesus' words and deeds, life and death. He has shown us that it is always worthwhile to live, anew, "apocalyptically"—to live, following the example of Jesus, in expectant anticipation of God's victory.

2. Reactions<sup>6</sup>

The results of Schweitzer's research have ongoing significance for the discussion on the Jesus of history. To this day his conclusions are mentioned in every scholarly study. In our time we can no longer approach the subject as uncritically—not to say: naively—as they did in the nineteenth century. This is the lesson Schweitzer taught not only his contemporaries but also following generations. Jesus lived in the Jewish world in the first decades of the Common Era. He was a man of his time.

Schweitzer's words of warning were heard and taken to heart, but his view of Jesus met with very little favour. He was attacked from two directions. His apocalyptic Jesus raised the unmitigated ire of orthodox believers. The idea that Christ could have been mistaken was rejected as blasphemous. His critics drew support from the fourth-century confession in which the divinity of Jesus was claimed as being established beyond the shadow of a doubt.

However, a critical voice could be heard even in the circle of exegetes trained in the historical-critical approach. Their objection was not that Schweitzer's view conflicted with classical dogma, but that he did more or less the same thing as those he so sharply criticized. After all, in his book he did not call for an end to researching the life of Jesus. In spite of his cautioning, he maintained the opinion that the gospels allow access to the historical Jesus. While his choice for the priority of Matthew's Gospel was original, his way of using it as a source did not differ from what his contemporaries did with respect to the Gospel of Mark.

---

<sup>6</sup> E. Grässer, Albert Schweitzer als Theologe (Tübingen: Mohr, 1979).

Albert Schweitzer was at the brink of the twentieth century when he completed his study on the research concerning the Jesus of history. He was situated on the frontier of two periods in several respects. It is tempting to assign him a place at the beginning of a new period of theological investigation. And yet, it does not seem advisable to do so. Schweitzer's view that it is possible to reconstruct the life of Jesus marks him as a nineteenth-century man after all. He did offer sharp and correct criticism of his predecessors, he quite rightly espoused caution, but he did not bring any renewal.

3. Rudolf Bultmann

A second name we cannot ignore on this issue is that of Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976), the eminent and very influential German scholar of the New Testament. He was involved in New Testament research on a broad scale.<sup>7</sup> This also included intensive concern with the origins of the four gospels. His extensive study dedicated to Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition appeared in print at an early stage of his academic career.<sup>8</sup> Later, while preparing his commentary on the Gospel of John, he developed a complicated thesis on the literary sources on which this document is based.<sup>9</sup> In this article it will suffice to provide a short summary of his findings. Although Bultmann had great appreciation for the Fourth Evangelist's theological insights, he considered the gospel inadequate to serve as a source for reconstructing the life of Jesus. He viewed Paul and John as the two greatest theologians from the first century of church history. The author of the Fourth Gospel may have been a profound theologian, but he was no historian. Bultmann expressed less enthusiasm for the level of theological profundity in the synoptic gospels. They directed their vision on the past and tried, each in their own way, to sketch "a life of Jesus." This does not mean that the synoptic gospels may be compared with

---

<sup>7</sup> B. Jaspert, ed., Rudolf Bultmann. Werk und Wirkung (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1984).

<sup>8</sup> R. Bultmann, Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition (Tübingen: Mohr, 1921).

<sup>9</sup> R. Bultmann, Das Evangelium des Johannes, Meyers Kommentar (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1941).

biographies in the modern sense of the word. But Bultmann was convinced that those three documents make it possible to trace a “profile” of Jesus. For this very reason he responded affirmatively, in the twenties of the twentieth century, to a request to write a historical study of Jesus.<sup>10</sup> The book was published in a series of biographies of influential figures in the history of humanity.

According to Bultmann, Jesus did not see himself as the Messiah. He presented himself as prophet for the Kingdom of God that was to come. The obvious conclusion would seem to be that Bultmann does not contribute much that is new in comparison to Schweitzer. Indeed, Bultmann’s interpretation of Jesus’ message could be considered “consistently eschatological.” However, there are noteworthy differences between the two theologians. For Schweitzer the key to a good understanding of Jesus’ words and deeds lay in his apocalyptic expectations for the future. Rather than calling Jesus an apocalyptic, Bultmann refers to him as an “eschatologist.” In Jesus’ proclamation, the Kingdom of God did, indeed, have a major role, but his expectations were not—or very minimally—influenced by apocalyptic conceptions. In his preaching it was not so much the dramatic end of the world that formed the central theme, but the call to his contemporaries to repent, with a view to the near advent of the Kingdom of God. According to Bultmann, Jesus was not bent on terrifying his listeners with exhaustive graphic descriptions of the horrors presaging the end of the world. Jesus did not appear as a prophet of repentance. He was the prophet for God’s love for people.

A second difference between Schweitzer and Bultmann is in how the research on the Jesus of history is evaluated. We have seen that the former considered it very important and was, besides, convinced that it could bring trustworthy results, provided it is carried out in the right way. Bultmann was extremely sceptical about this historical research. He wrote a book about Jesus, but subsequent to his scholarly publications he emphasized again and again that faith could not be based on historical research. He positioned the Jesus of history over against the Christ of kerygma—that is to say Christ as proclaimed in the early Christian community. Bultmann had come to see that, in fact, there is no way beyond the writings of the New Testament leading to the Jesus of history. We have only the Jesus of kerygma. One could say that in this way Bultmann attempted to evade the problem of historicity. His view found wide support for a long time in the twentieth century. This does not mean, however, that a satisfactory solution has been found. For who is this kerygmatic Christ? What is the content of this kerygma (= the proclamation concerning Jesus)? Bultmann put emphasis on the theological views of Paul and John, in his opinion the two greatest theologians from the earliest beginnings of Christianity.<sup>11</sup> But what, then, is the significance of, for example, the synoptic gospels?

---

<sup>10</sup> R. Bultmann, Jesus (Berlin: Deutsche Bibliothek, 1926).

4. Creative Evangelists

Anyone looking for the “real” Jesus will not be able to avoid providing an answer to the question of the historical value of the various gospels. I shall offer a few examples to illustrate this. Matthew and Luke relate that Jesus was born in Bethlehem.<sup>12</sup> Mark says nothing about that, while John even seems to deny it (John 7:40–44). Is the story about Jesus’ birth in Bethlehem of real significance for Christian faith? Matthew and Luke give an affirmative answer to this question. Matthew in particular regards this event as evidence that Jesus’ “roots” are firmly anchored in scripture. Was Jesus really born in Bethlehem? The other two evangelists, Mark and John, evidently have no idea of it. Did Matthew and Luke have access to supplementary information? Or should their stories about Jesus’ birth in Bethlehem be read as theological treatises and not as reports of historical events?

Mark evidently enjoyed telling stories about healings by Jesus (Mark 2:1–12; 5:1–20, 21–43). Sometimes, however, the writer of the earliest gospel is strikingly frugal in his reporting. For example, in telling about the “temptations” of Jesus in the wilderness, he does not say much more than that he was tempted by Satan (Mark 1:12–13). Matthew and Luke have far more to tell about it (Matt 4:1–11; Luke 4:1–13). They derived these facts from the Q-source. Ascertaining this does not, of course, resolve the difficulty: how do you explain that the Q-source has more information than the Gospel of Mark?

A long list of differences between the four gospels can, without any difficulty, be added to these two examples. Since that is not the purpose of this publication, I shall confine myself to one more example. Practically everyone would regard a profile of the historical Jesus as incomplete without some attention in it for the Sermon on the Mount (Matthew 5–7). Through the ages this discourse has given people the courage and the spiritual strength to rise up against oppression and violence, to protest against injustice and inhumanity, and to stand up for those who are plagued by poverty and hunger. And yet, one must face up to the question whether Jesus ever spoke the whole discourse. To begin with: a search for the Sermon on the Mount in the Gospels of Mark and John turns up nothing. The Third Gospel includes only a much shortened version (Luke 6:17–49). It is because of Matthew that the term “sermon on the mount” has found its way into church and theology: “Seeing the crowds, he went up on the mountain . . .” (Matt 5:1). Again Matthew points to scripture. He does not desire his reader to hunt up “the mountain of the beatitudes” on a map. Matthew believes that for anyone who knows the Bible, half a word is sufficient: just as Moses in the olden days went up Mount Sinai to receive God’s Torah (Exodus 19), so, too, does Jesus now, as the new Moses, climb the “mount” to make known his interpretation of the laws in public for the first time. Matthew was no historian in the modern sense. He was a scribe (Matt 13:52). Using tradition—the memories of Jesus’ statements—he has created his Sermon on the Mount. In scholarly publications an attempt is often made to find Jesus’ actual words underneath the words of the evangelist. A uniform judgment appeared to be an impossibility. In all honesty it must be admitted that we cannot say precisely when it is Jesus speaking and when it is the evangelist presenting his own interpretation and his view.

<sup>11</sup> R. Bultmann, Theologie des Neuen Testaments (Tübingen: Mohr, 1953).

<sup>12</sup> R. E. Brown, The Birth of the Messiah: A Commentary of the Infancy Narratives in Matthew and Luke (New York: Doubleday, 1979).

Jesus lived in the land of the Jews in the first decades of the first century. At the beginning of the thirties he died on a cross in Jerusalem. The canonical gospels were written forty or fifty years later. In that relatively short period, much had happened, much had changed. After the cross and the resurrection, the earliest disciples started reflecting on—or, in modern terms, working through—the past. The apostle Paul felt called (Gal 1:15–16) to approach the Gentile world with the gospel of Christ. His activities beyond borders made theological reorientation essential.<sup>13</sup> Dramatic events in the land of the Jews during the sixties and seventies—a revolt against the Romans, the conquest of Jerusalem and the destruction of the temple, the growing influence of the Pharisaic group—aggravated the antitheses between the early Christian community and the Jewish tradition and led, finally, to the schism between Jewry and Christianity. This was the complex situation in which the evangelists wrote their gospels. They brought the past to memory, but not, in the first place, out of historical interest. They looked backwards in the hope of finding answers to questions and problems of their own time.

---

<sup>13</sup> J. C. Beker, Paul the Apostle: The Triumph of God in Life and Thought (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1980).

5. Various Images of Jesus in the New Testament<sup>14</sup>

Every comparison of the gospels reveals that the evangelists used the available sources—whether written or oral—creatively. According to a saying in Matthew, he and his colleagues can be compared with “a householder who brings out of his treasure what is new and what is old” (Matt 13:52). This combination of continuity and discontinuity is the reason that Jesus’ life cannot be described in detail. Thanks to more than one hundred and fifty years of intensive historical-critical investigation concerning the four canonical gospels, much has become known about their origins, but at the same time it has to be acknowledged that a great deal remains hidden in the mystery of the past.

The evangelists did not write fiction. However, they do not hesitate to express their preferences, their wishes and their desires in their stories about Jesus. For Mark, Jesus was, first and foremost, a miracle worker and an exorcist. With compassion the earliest evangelist describes the hopeless situation of the sick and the possessed, who are healed and liberated from ailments and evil spirits by Jesus (Mark 5:1–20 and 5:21–43). Laying the passages from Mark and Matthew side by side renders surprising discoveries. Usually Matthew follows Mark’s text more or less word for word. However, at the very moment that his evangelist colleague gives attention to the serious nature of the illness or the case of possession, he starts abbreviating the story considerably (Matt 8:28–34 and 9:18–26). Evidently Matthew is not particularly interested in the miracle working power of Jesus. The result is that his narrative is strikingly frugal. He deems a few words sufficient. Matthew is primarily interested in the interpretation of the commandments of Torah. For him, Jesus is the scribe and teacher who teaches his followers what to do and how to live with a view to the speedy advent of the Kingdom of heaven (Matthew 5–7; 25:31–46).

---

<sup>14</sup> H. Köster and J. M. Robinson, Entwicklungslinien durch die Welt des frühen Christentums (Tübingen: Mohr, 1971).

The Third Evangelist is directed to another address and therefore writes a different gospel. Luke addresses himself to Theophilus, obviously an important man, a high official in the Roman Empire (Luke 1:1–4). Luke is absolutely clear about the fact that the gospel of Jesus Christ is also intended for Gentiles. He emphasizes that the gospel consists in a glad message (Luke 2:10). Even the heavens celebrate when a sinner repents and a human being is saved from the threat of ruin (Luke 15). The poor receive free passage through the Kingdom of God (Luke 6:20–26). In the parable, the poor man Lazarus is carried by angels to the bosom of Abraham immediately after his death (Luke 16:19–31). While writing his gospel, Luke had the wealthy man of status Theophilus constantly in mind—and he probably also thought of himself. He, too, belonged to the better situated of his time. He was a man of letters, with a broad education, of Greek-Hellenistic background but also very familiar with Jewish Scripture. Luke, too, must have struggled with the cogent question how a rich man can be saved. He created unrivalled stories (= parables) in which can be found answers to this question. The remarkable parable about the unjust steward ends as follows: “make friends for yourselves by means of unrighteous mammon, so that when it fails they may receive you into the eternal habitations” (Luke 16:9). The conclusion is clear: money is and always will be, for the possessor of it, a danger that must not be underrated, but one can also do good things with it, and then a bright future is in sight.

His view of Jesus—the christology of Luke’s Gospel—fits into this way of thinking. In the conversations that, according to this evangelist, were held by Jesus and his disciples after the last supper, we find a typical statement put in Jesus’ mouth by Luke: “For which is the greater, one who sits at table, or one who serves? Is it not the one who sits at table? But I am among you as one who serves” (Luke 22:27). Roles are radically reversed in the Kingdom: lords become servants, those who are last become first.

The Fourth Evangelist follows a line of his own and sketches an image of Jesus that can be understood only with difficulty by those who have intimate knowledge of the synoptic gospels. The following sentence from the famous prologue of the Fourth Gospel can be considered the point of departure: “And the Word became flesh and dwelt among us, full of grace and truth” (John 1:14). Jesus is a human being among human beings, but as such he also reveals the glory of God. This “duality” shows up in all the stories of the Fourth Gospel. Going by outward appearances, a tired Jewish man is sitting at Jacob’s well (John 4:6), but on closer acquaintance he appears to be “the Saviour of the world” (John 4:42). In Jesus’ work, God’s work is revealed (John 5:17–18). Father and son are one. God and Jesus are wholly one in spirit: in works, will and purpose.

The four canonical gospels speak extensively about Jesus’ suffering and death. The fact that he is crucified forms part of their narrative, but—contrary to Paul’s letters—it is not given a special, soteriological meaning in any of the four gospels. Mark emphasizes in his passion story that he dies on the cross as the suffering righteous one (Mark 15:34). His dying is the ultimate consequence of his life: he lived for others; therefore his death on the cross, also, can be interpreted as a suffering and a dying “for others.” His words and acts at the last supper with his disciples will need to be interpreted in this light as well (Mark 14:22–25).

The Fourth Gospel follows a line of its own also in this aspect of Jesus’ life. In his passion story, Jesus is not the victim, but rather the director. He knows what he can expect and what he must do. He does not hesitate, nor does he doubt. The Fourth Evangelist says nothing of a spiritual struggle in Gethsemane. Jesus has no difficulty fulfilling his task. He goes, and conquers darkness. The cross is no defeat or humiliation, but victory and exaltation (John 18–19).<sup>15</sup>

The apostle Paul views his suffering in general and his crucifixion in particular differently. This event is central to his view of what forms the core of Christian faith. According to his understanding, the cross is first and foremost a symbol of humiliation and certainly not of exaltation (Phil 2:6–11). According to Torah, a man crucified is a man accursed of God (Gal 3:13). His death on the cross is a stumbling block and folly (1 Cor 1:23). After an encounter with the Risen Lord near Damascus, Paul knows that the curse has become a blessing, and that what is foolishness for human beings, can turn out to be wisdom for God. From that moment he regards the crucified as the source of his life, his liberty and his reconciliation (2 Cor 5:16–21).<sup>16</sup>

---

<sup>15</sup> M. C. de Boer, Johannine Perspectives on the Death of Jesus (Kampen: Pharos, 1996).

The limitations of the space allotted me lead me to confine my observations to what is written above. Should anyone wish to include other biblical writings—such as the letter to the Hebrews, the letters of Peter and the last book of the Bible—in his or her considerations, he or she will discover new aspects besides what has already been named. For this reason, the exegete cannot, ultimately, be satisfied with concentrating on the Christ of kerygma or, as is said in orthodox circles, the Christ of Scripture. The one who claims that should not be astonished when he or she is asked: which Jesus or which Christ of Scripture is meant, exactly? Which image of Jesus or of Christ is preferred?

6. Reinterpretation of the Kingdom of God

The Bible is a many-coloured book.<sup>17</sup> The writings of the New Testament voice views and counter-views. Matthew creates a different image of Jesus than he met up with in his most important source, the Gospel of Mark. One can even show thought developing within one and the same gospel. This is particularly the case for the Gospel of Matthew: under pressure from changed circumstances, a strong relationship to the Jewish and Old Testament tradition is converted to a view that could, instead, be typified as anti-Jewish. As a consequence of the Kingdom of God not arriving as speedily as expected, that conception, too, is examined critically. The apocalyptic Kingdom of God has a central place in Mark's Gospel. This is also the case with many passages in Matthew. But in a few pericopes we also hear other voices. The suggestion that corrections have taken place in a later re-working of the gospel seems to find support: not the coming of the Kingdom is important, but the going to the Kingdom (Matt 21:31). Such shifts can also be found in the Gospel of Luke: "the kingdom of God is in the midst of you" (Luke 17:20–21). The Gospel of John, finally, bids farewell to the expectation of the kingdom of God; if, indeed, it is mentioned at all—and that is not often—the reference is to seeing or entering the kingdom (John 3:3, 5).

---

<sup>16</sup> J. D. G. Dunn, The Theology of Paul the Apostle (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1998), 207–233.

<sup>17</sup> J. Reumann, Variety and Unity in New Testament Thought (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1991).

Corrections and appositions based on increasing understanding? It seems to me that we need to characterize the developments described above in this way. The fact that the coming of the Kingdom of God was not realized required the early Christian community to re-orient itself drastically. The result was a Gnostic understanding of the concept of the apocalyptic Kingdom of God. It is no longer necessary to wait for its advent. It is already present. It is simply a matter of having the ability—and this requires knowledge and insight—to discover and to see it. This saying from the Gospel of Thomas is significant: “His disciples said to him: ‘When will the kingdom come?’ (Jesus said) ‘It will not come by waiting for it. It will not be a matter of saying “here it is” or “there it is.” Rather, the kingdom of the father is spread out upon the earth, and men do not see it’” (Logion 113).<sup>18</sup> The above quoted passage from the Gospel of Luke influenced this saying.

The change in the message has consequences for the image of the one who proclaims it. Already within the New Testament, the apocalyptic Jesus is being de-apocalypticized. He changes with respect to his outer appearance as well as his inner self. The strange, perhaps frightening prophet full of the end changes into a teacher of wisdom, and the image of the crucified is altered as well: the reality of suffering disappears into the background and is replaced by the sublimity and the untouchability of the pre-existent son of God. The result is that the interpretation of the concept “redemption” also shifts. In his earliest letter Paul writes, short and snappy, in a totally apocalyptic context: “Jesus who delivers us from the wrath to come” (1 Thess 1:10). In the Gospel of John it is not the future that has the central position, nor the cross, but the incarnation, the son of God being sent into the world: “He who believes in him is not condemned; he who does not believe is condemned already” (John 3:18).

---

<sup>18</sup> J. M. Robinson, ed., The Nag Hammadi Library in English (Leiden: Brill, 1988).

7. Jesus in the Non-Canonical Writings<sup>19</sup>

In the introduction to his gospel, Luke reports that he is not the first to have attempted to write down memories of Jesus' words and deeds. Others before him have done so. Luke even says that many did it (Luke 1:1). Evidently many gospels were in circulation in the first centuries. The evangelist probably completed his book in the eighties of the first century. One can conclude from writings of church fathers that they were not only aware of the existence of non-canonical gospels but also of their content. They refer to them and sometimes even quote from them. Usually they do not do this to show agreement. Church fathers warn their readers concerning the heretical character of these non-canonical gospels.

A few of the non-canonical gospels have a Jewish-Christian origin, such as The Gospel of the Hebrews, The Gospel of the Nazarenes and The Gospel of the Ebionites. The authors of these writings were very conscious of their being Jews and placed great value on fulfilling the commandments of Torah. Basing their view on Scripture, they regarded Jesus as the "eschatological" prophet following the example of Moses (Deut 18:15–18). They resisted on principle the idea that Jesus could really be the Son of God—an idea that gained increasing influence in the Gentile Christian church from the second to the third century partly through the logos christology arising from the prologue of the Fourth Gospel. The result was that Jewish Christians who did not want to deny their Old Testament-Jewish background became more and more isolated. Their accentuation of Jesus' humanity came into conflict with the high christology that began dominating. Their deviant christological conceptions were challenged and dismissed by the church fathers for this reason. They are declared to be heretics. Their writings, including the gospels mentioned, disappear from the stage. At the end of the first century Luke already wrote about "the many" who were supposed to have attempted to write a gospel. Very likely he was unaware that his would not be the last of a stream of publications, but the first. In the following centuries as well, "many" took to the pen to write down their view of Jesus and preserve it for descendants.

---

<sup>19</sup> H. Koester, Ancient Christian Gospels: Their History and Development (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990).

Jewish Christians sketched the image of a Jesus who remained within the boundaries of Jewish tradition. In Gnostic circles, writings appeared in which Jesus was drawn as a teacher of wisdom who had distanced himself completely from his Jewish background. It is not possible to include an extensive treatment of these developments. In connection with the discussion about the Jesus of history, I shall limit myself to the Gospel of Thomas. To an increasing degree, this document, since its discovery and publication, plays a major role in the research.

8. The Gospel of Thomas

In 1945 an amazing discovery was made at Nag Hammadi, in southern Egypt, concerning fifty documents dating from the first centuries of Christianity. The Gospel of Thomas was part of this small library. It is customary to call this document a "gospel," but that gives rise to misunderstandings. In terms of form it cannot be compared to the four canonical gospels. It does not contain a continuous story beginning with Jesus' birth in Bethlehem, followed by his public appearance in Galilee and ending with his death on a cross in Jerusalem. In the Gospel of Thomas one looks in vain for something like a birth story; neither is a passion story found in it. This "gospel" consists of a hundred and fourteen sayings of Jesus. The length of the sayings is very diverse. Some include only a few words, others consist of a few sentences. Jesus seldom holds discussions with anyone; usually he is delivering a monologue. Where there is no story, there can hardly be a chronology. Until now it has also proved impossible to demonstrate convincingly any thought development in the successive sayings.

Although the Gospel of Thomas is part of a Gnostic library, in the course of time it became evident that not all the sayings can be called Gnostic without further ado. In the twelfth saying, Jesus gives his disciples some remarkable advice. They ask him who is to be their leader when he is gone. Jesus' answer is surprising: "The disciples said to Jesus, 'We know that you will depart from us. Who is to be our leader?' Jesus said to them: 'Wherever you are, you are to go to James the righteous, for whose sake heaven and earth came into being'" (Logion 12). In the New Testament this James is called "the Lord's brother" (Gal 1:19).

A plausible conclusion is that the Gospel of Thomas includes several "layers": a later layer that has a Gnostic character, but also earlier layers which have not (yet) been influenced by Gnostic conceptions. The one who has got onto this trail can dig in this gospel like an archaeologist in search of earlier layers. In this way the researcher comes upon a few sayings that are similar to words of Jesus in the canonical gospels.<sup>20</sup> As illustration, the following example:

He said, 'there was a good man who owned a vineyard. He leased it to tenant farmers so that they might work it and he might collect the produce from them. He sent his servant so that the tenants might give him the produce of the vineyard. They seized his servant and beat him, all but killing him. The servant went back and told his master. The master said, "Perhaps he did not recognize them." He sent another servant. The tenants beat this one as well. Then the owner sent his son and said, "Perhaps they will show respect to my son." Because the tenants knew that it was he who was the heir to the vineyard, they seized him and killed him. Let him who has ears hear' (Logion 65).

People knowledgeable in the New Testament will have heard many familiar notes in this story. But very likely it will not have escaped their notice that the story sometimes differs considerably from what they retain in their memory. A comparison with the parable of the unjust tenants in the three synoptic gospels (Mark 12:1–12; Matt 21:33–46; Luke 20:9–19) reveals that the version in the Gospel of Thomas is short and simple. Long before the Nag Hammadi discovery, exegetes pointed to the possibility that the parable in the canonical gospels may be strongly influenced by the christological reflection of the early Christian community.

Does this "gospel," hidden during the fourth century among a collection of Gnostic writings in a jar in Egypt, bring us closer to the historical Jesus? Does this "gospel," with its complex origins, include elements that could be assessed as authentic words of Jesus? It seems almost too good to be true, but there are exegetes who defend such a thesis and take into account that the earliest "layers" in the Gospel of Thomas could possibly be of an early date, perhaps even earlier than the canonical gospels.<sup>21</sup>

---

<sup>20</sup> C. Tuckett, Nag Hammadi and the Gospel Tradition: Synoptic Tradition in the Nag Hammadi Library (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1986).

<sup>21</sup> M. J. Borg, Meeting Jesus again for the First Time: The Historical Jesus & the Heart of Contemporary Faith (San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1994).

9. Jesus Has Many Faces

In the first half of the first century there lived a Jewish man in Galilee who made history. He answered to the name Jeshua but later became known worldwide as Jesus Christ. He came from Nazareth, at that time an unimportant little town without traditions or pretensions. Almost nothing is known with certainty about his youth. He grew up as the oldest son of Joseph the carpenter and his wife Miriam/Mary. The family consisted of five sons and an unknown number of daughters. Probably both parents had sympathy for Pharisaic ideals and brought up their children in such a way that they became familiar with the scriptures and obeyed the commandments of Torah. Joseph practiced the carpentry trade and, as was customary at that time, Jeshua, as eldest son, followed in his father's footsteps. He learned carpentry in practice from his father.

Marriage and family were honoured in the early Jewish tradition. Measured by today's standards, the marriageable age was exceptionally young: for girls it was around thirteen or fourteen, for boys a few years later. Anyone who was not yet married at age twenty was considered eccentric. The parents on both sides played an important role in bringing about a marriage. Joseph and Mary probably also went looking for a wife for their eldest son in Nazareth and its surroundings. It is not known whether a marriage ever occurred. But something else happens. At a certain moment, Jeshua's life takes a radical turn. It is not clear when, exactly, this change took place. It probably occurred somewhere between his twentieth and his thirtieth year. Jeshua leaves Nazareth and begins the life of a wanderer. However, he remains in the northern part of the land of the Jews. By preference, he stays in the regions around Lake Galilee. He is seen frequently in a few little towns, beautifully situated on the shores of this lake, such as Magdala and, above all, Capernaum; he appears to have friends and acquaintances there who offer him hospitality.

Jeshua quickly attracts much public interest. The former carpenter of Nazareth gathers a group of disciples around him, men and women who have been caught in his spell and become fascinated by the words he speaks and the things he does. His interpretation of commandments is frequently surprisingly creative. Besides that, he has the use of special powers. The sick are healed by him, lepers cleansed; and evil spirits, on his orders, leave their victims alone from that time on. Jeshua is a spiritually gifted human being, a real charismatic. He appears to be a mystic, besides. To him, the God of Israel is not distant. He experiences him as a reality in his own life. Jeshua is aware of his profound spiritual bond with the God who has made himself known to his people Israel in scripture and tradition and who reveals himself to him now as well.

Jeshua leads an “exemplary” life. And yet, he does not only spread gladness and joy. He also evokes irritation. His piety and his steadfastness in fulfilling the commandments of Torah do not keep him from seeking the company of people whose way of life is not all that meticulous. He associates with sinners and tax-collectors as friends. He even shares their meals. Asked for an explanation for this—as viewed by the pious—offensive behaviour, he replies that he has come to seek that which is lost. As a shepherd goes to much trouble to bring a lost sheep back to the herd, so he, too, concerns himself with the fate of people who are on the verge of becoming lost.

Jeshua’s doings arouse curiosity. Who is he? What can one expect from him? Nearly a century earlier, the land of the Jews became part of the Roman Empire. This situation leaves a deep impression on society and divides the Jewish population into parties which have disdain for each other, hate and even fight each other. Great are the contrasts. Some do not shy away from the struggle. They encourage their adherents to resist the Romans by force. They are absolutely convinced that God is their ally and that he will not desert them. Others fear that a revolt will end in a blood bath and consider it more sensible to drop the weapons and wait for God to take a hand. There are also Jews who cooperate with Roman occupation authorities. For fanatics, they are collaborators, and they can expect God’s wrath to come upon them at the time of victory.

Jeshua lives in this deeply divided society. Which side does he choose? It is not easy to provide a clear answer to this question. He is evidently not a hothead. Neither is he a fanatic. Jeshua declares openly that he does not support the use of violence. He refuses to write people off or treat them as heretics simply because they take a different position than he. He appears to be notably forgiving toward tax-collectors, who grow rich thanks to Rome’s unjust tax system. In the judgment of fanatic Zealots, Jesus is far too “meek.” He concerns himself with people’s fate, but he shows little interest in political matters.

Jeshua is cautious and reserved. He does not employ great rhetoric. In general he rejects the term Messiah. Sometimes he talks about the coming of the Son of man. However, it remains vague to whom this refers: to himself or to someone else? On many occasions he points to the proximity of the Kingdom of God. And yet, even then his view is of an ambiguous nature. In general he creates the impression that the Kingdom is as yet hidden in the—near—future. On one occasion, however, he seems to suggest that the Kingdom of God is basically already present in this world.

In accordance with the commandments, he journeys to Jerusalem as a pilgrim as the annual Passover feast approaches. When he arrives in the city, the situation starts becoming dangerous for him. Amazingly enough, this man of peace and meekness no longer avoids the confrontation. On the contrary, he consciously creates tensions. He organizes a procession into the city, with the result that he invites the suspicion that he claims kingship. In the temple he astonishes both friend and foe by his unexpected attack on the tradesmen found there. His criticism of what is done there calls some Old Testament prophets to mind.

What does Jeshua of Nazareth want? On one point at least, the authorities are in full agreement: he is dangerous and must therefore be eliminated as soon as possible. His strange behaviour can inspire others to take action and is therefore a serious threat in a situation which can best be described as armed peace. Jewish leaders and Roman occupation authorities have quickly joined forces on this and made a monstrous covenant. In the darkness of night they arrest Jeshua, and then they sentence him to death in a mockery of a trial. As early as the next day the execution is carried out; Jeshua dies on a cross.

Is this the tragic end of a good man? A short time later the mood in the group of disciples has changed like day and night. They take courage again in spite of the death of their teacher, their spiritual leader and source of inspiration. They tell an amazing story. Some of them have seen Jeshua again in the flesh. They believe that God has raised him from the dead. His followers tell the stories with so much conviction and joy that others start believing it, too. Jeshua is not dead, he lives!

In New Testament scholarship there is a great diversity of opinion. This does not mean, however, that there is never any consensus of a kind. It is not too daring, for instance, to presume that the above sketch of Jesus' life—a mini-biography—will find basic support with most current scholars. Of course, all the aspects mentioned could receive more attention, but that is not possible, or necessary, in this article.

It must be said that historical investigation has its limits. New Testament scholars have been looking fervently for the real Jesus since the nineteenth century, and the result of all their efforts is a short biographical sketch of a human being who lived a long time ago. He appears to have been an unusual human being, an interesting, creative personality, a man with an inspiring and liberating message. That is all true, and yet, readers are assailed by a sense of disappointment. Is that all there is to say? The historian will have to answer this question affirmatively. According to current standards of scholarship, at this time nothing more can be achieved than the above mini-biography.

Has all this, then, been a waste of time? In the eighteenth and nineteenth century, theologians hoped to disengage themselves from the centuries-old Christ of dogma. In optimistic mood they went searching for the real Jesus, using what they saw as objective, historical methods. However, they found the historical Jesus. At first they assumed that they had achieved their purpose after all: the historical Jesus and the real Jesus were one and the same. Gradually they came down to earth, and they came to see that they had not succeeded in their object. Theologians began to realize that historical research into the real Jesus was evidently doomed to failure. The one who looks at the past using historical methods can map out only part of the past. It is possible to sketch an image of the historical Jesus, but this does not mean that we are any closer to an understanding of the real Jesus. It is common knowledge that, argued from the historical point of view, the Gospel of John is considerably less trustworthy than the three synoptic gospels. Does the Fourth Gospel therefore have nothing to say to us? The thought cannot be excluded out of hand that it nevertheless offers more information about the real Jesus than a modern historian who has conceived a historically trustworthy image of Jesus with the help of methods standard in current scholarship.

10. The Discussion Begins in the New Testament

The Bible is a many-coloured book. The New Testament includes a great number of images of Jesus. Perhaps I am being unjust to someone, but I cannot escape the impression that anyone who makes the case for concentrating on the “Christ of the kerygma” or the “Christ of Scripture” is insufficiently aware of the danger of playing down the differences between the various books of the New Testament. He or she is assuming and constructing a unity that simply does not exist. Already in the first centuries of church history, theologians developed christological dogma on this assumption. Of course, they, too, observed nuances and differences between the gospels, but they felt called to look for similarities and therefore attempted, patiently and carefully, to put together the differences like the pieces of a puzzle so that in the end a single image of Jesus Christ came to the fore. Thereafter an effort was made to put this image of Jesus into words in an explicit way in written confessions and dogmatic formulas. This striving for unity had consequences for the church community. The one who had difficulty coming to terms with the accepted image ran the risk of being put out of the church as a heretic. The assumed unity in New Testament christology must provide the fundament for church unity. Church history has taught us that this ideal rarely, if ever, became reality.

In the New Testament there is no single clear, rounded off image of Jesus Christ. Each biblical writer, depending on the period, circumstances, desires and wishes, has his own way of looking at the past. A century ago, Schweitzer showed that in the nineteenth century every researcher sketched his or her own image of Jesus. A hundred years later, this statement appears not to have lost any of its significance or relevance. It has become increasingly clear in the debate that New Testament writers actually do nothing else. They, too, sketch their own image of Jesus. Again I will provide a few examples—to liven up the discussion I am assuming that the biblical writers had knowledge of each other's work and then put critical questions.

An interesting conversation could be set up between the four gospels and Paul concerning the value and purpose of stories about Jesus' doings. It is not impossible that Matthew and Paul get caught up in a hefty battle of words during this discussion about the place and the function of Torah commandments. It seems to be ruled out that the two could ever come to an agreement in this area. When these fighting-cocks are worn out from the struggle, the voice of Mark may sound. He will ask Paul in astonishment why he has consistently called Jesus Christ in all his letters. Mark will advance as clarification that he, on the contrary, had learned that Jesus himself several times impressed on his disciples not to use the term. Is the injunction to silence no longer in force since the resurrection? The Fourth Evangelist will hold a separate position in the whole debate. His colleagues will want to hear from him how he came to know so many stories they never heard of: the wedding at Cana, the conversation with Nicodemus, the meeting with the Samaritan woman, the healing at Bethesda, the resurrection of Lazarus—where did he get all this material? And then they preserve silence about all those long discourses that Jesus is supposed to have held according to the Fourth Evangelist. John, how come you know more than we do? Paul waits impatiently for his turn and finds it difficult not to interrupt the others. The discussion about the origin of these stories is of little interest to him. What bothers him most is how the Gospel of John can speak about Jesus' suffering in such a—for him, that is—strange way. Humiliation or exaltation? Paul and John will not readily reach unity on this point.

Who will be the first to raise the subject of “the future”? It is a certainty that the conversation at that point threatens to disintegrate into a true cacophony of voices that sometimes supplement, but more frequently contradict each other. Are we now hearing, for the first time, the voice of the writer of the Gospel of Thomas? Does he get mixed up in the debate because he considers all the attention to the future objectionable? In his writing he concentrates entirely on the words of Jesus. How will the circle of “canonical” writers, who tend to see him as an “apocryphal” misfit in any case, receive his contribution to the discussion? Of course his voice may be heard as well.

11. A Many-Coloured Jesus

The debate that began in the New Testament is continued in church history and has still not been rounded off today. It need not astonish us that there is no unity in the church, for the New Testament is a many-coloured book. How can that be explained?

In the first place, each person—including the biblical writers—views events in past and present in his or her own way. What happened, exactly? Experience tells us that even witnesses on the spot can contradict each other. This also holds true for the image we have of others. People react to one another, and change because of it. In the encounter with one person I am a little different than in the encounter with another. The image I have of someone is never wholly consistent with the image that someone else has of that person. Evangelists and apostles, each in his own way, in their turn wrote their own view of Jesus. They were not objective, nor could they ever be.

In the second place, Jesus was probably a many-faceted personality. Words are inadequate to do him justice, traditional titles appeared to be insufficient. Which aspect of his public appearance should be emphasized? The cross? Naturally there is a lot to say for this. But why should we not give at least as much attention to his life on earth? Is it meaningful to accentuate that he performed miracles? To this question as well, an affirmative answer may be given. But why should we not begin with putting emphasis on his radical interpretation of the commandments of Torah? And is not his concern for finding lost people equally “miraculous”?

Jesus has many faces. No written confession or dogmatic formula is able to sketch an image of Jesus that gives all these “faces” their proper place. It can even be ruled out that this goal could be attained, because some interpretations seem to contradict each other. Honesty requires acknowledgment of the fact that even the Christ of the kerygma is not, strictly speaking, the real Jesus but the result of a selection of facts. In my view, therefore, the exegete can never escape going the way back again and again and investigating the Jesus of history. The mini-biography at the beginning of this chapter could function as a kind of “conscience” in this. It is, after all, tempting to concentrate completely on the crucified, in the manner of Paul. The history of church and theology provides many examples showing what a liberating effect Paul’s theologia crucis has had. At the same time, it is necessary to acknowledge that this view of Jesus is also one-sided and needs revision. The one who bases himself exclusively on Christ crucified forgets all too easily to tell the stories that show Jesus’ life had an ‘exemplary’ character: his doings can shape the life of his followers. Jesus has many faces. We know the Jesus of Paul, of Mark, of Matthew, of Luke, of John, but also of Thomas. We know that Jesus hoped for a speedy advent of the Kingdom of God, but we also know that he thought he experienced that same Kingdom in his own life and the world. Jesus could be called an apocalyptic, but he appears also to be a source of inspiration for Gnostic thinkers. We know stories about Jesus’ doings: liberating and healing, giver of hope and lover of human beings, creative and sometimes provocative. We also know that Jesus died on the cross and we believe that God raised him from the dead. The New Testament is surprisingly open and broadminded. Jesus is not fixed to formulas and sealed up in statements that should be valid everywhere and at all times. The one who tries to do that, evokes the suggestion that he or she has spoken the final and definitive word on Jesus. The interesting thing about the encounter with Jesus is that, on the contrary, the final word has obviously still not been spoken concerning him and perhaps never will be. Jesus is constantly different; he is surprising and confusing; he is known and familiar and then again a strange rebel and unexpectedly novel. Jesus lived in the land of the Jews and lives on even now in the stories that people tell each other.<sup>22</sup>

---

<sup>22</sup> Translated by Lydia Penner.

PART TWO

CURRENT QUESTIONS OF JESUS RESEARCH

JESUS AND CYNICISM

F. GERALD DOWNING

That Cynic tradition had positive significance for Christian ethical reflection, and thus for reflection on Jesus' life and teaching as presented in the gospels, was widely acknowledged among the early fathers, even those who disapproved of some aspects or variants of Cynicism.<sup>1</sup> It would seem that a predominantly positive evaluation of Cynic ascetic life-style and teaching then emerged once more among western Christians in the early Middle Ages.<sup>2</sup> It may seem that it was only when Diogenes was enlisted as a critic of established Christianity by thinkers such as Valla, and later Rousseau, that a similarly measured response among Christian thinkers may have become less acceptable, despite a sympathetic appraisal by Kant. Nietzsche's avowal of Cynicism in his rejection of conventional Christianity may well have further discouraged any positive appraisal of Cynic resonances in the Jesus tradition on the part of continental European students of the New Testament.<sup>3</sup>

Nonetheless, it would seem that some English-speaking scholars in Britain at least, and up to the 1930's, were willing to make such connections, if only with idealized strands in Cynicism. We find instances in such eminently "respectable" writers as Edwin Hatch, Samuel Dill,

---

<sup>1</sup> G. Dorival, "L'image des Cyniques chez les Pères grecs," in Le cynisme ancien et ses prolongements, ed. M.-O. Goulet-Cazé and R. Goulet (Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1993), 419-444, at 432-439, "L'éloge du cynisme"; cf. idem, "Cyniques et Chrétiens au temps des Pères grecs," in Valeurs dans le stoïcisme. Du Portique à nos jours. Textes rassemblés en hommage à Michel Spanneut, ed. M. Soetard (Lille: Presses Universitaires de Lille, 1993), 57-88; cf. M.-O. Goulet-Cazé, "Le cynisme à l'époque impériale," ANRW II 36.4, 2720-2823, at 2778-2800; and F. G. Downing, Cynics and Christian Origins (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1992), 169-301.

<sup>2</sup> S. Matton, "Cynicism and Christianity from the Middle Ages to the Renaissance," in The Cynics, ed. B. Branham and M.-O. Goulet-Cazé (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996), 240-264.

<sup>3</sup> D. Kinney, "Cynic Selfhood in Mediaeval and Renaissance Culture," in The Cynics, ed. Branham and Goulet-Cazé, 294-328; and H. Niehues-Pröbsting, "The Modern Reception of Cynicism: Diogenes in the Enlightenment," in The Cynics, ed. Branham and Goulet-Cazé, 329-365, citing 353-365; but compare H. D. Betz, "Jesus and the Cynics: Survey and Analysis of a Hypothesis," JR 74.4 (1994): 453-475.

and W. R. Halliday.<sup>4</sup> Among gospel scholars 1945–1980 we then seem to find that Cynics were granted at best walking-on parts.<sup>5</sup> In more recent times the first attempts to sketch a more embracing comparison appear to have come from the present author, based on an initially very general exploration of available ancient Greco-Roman sources, only slowly being made aware of the history of Cynicism and then of earlier reflections on Christian origins in the light of Cynic sources.<sup>6</sup> Much more influential, however, have been publications on Jesus and Cynicism by North American scholars, especially members of “the Jesus Seminar.”<sup>7</sup> Proposals have varied, but attention has generally been focused on apparent similarities in the itinerant life-styles, including dress, of Cynics and of Jesus and his followers, their espousal of poverty, their eschewing gainful employment and so their dependence on others, their reliance on models drawn from non-human “nature,” acting in a determined opposition to codes of civic respectability; together with particular attention to comparisons of their styles of communication and individual recorded actions and utterances.

These suggestions have, of course, met with criticisms, some more carefully argued than others.<sup>8</sup> The most forceful seem to be as follows:

---

<sup>4</sup> E. Hatch, The Influence of Greek Ideas on Christianity (1890; repr. New York: Harper, 1957), 139–158; S. Dill, Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius (1905; repr. New York: Meridian, 1956), 334–383, noting especially 355, 361; W. R. Halliday, The Pagan Background of Early Christianity (Liverpool and London: Liverpool University Press and Hodder & Stoughton, 1925), 126; 169–170; 190–191; compare D. B. Dudley, A History of Cynicism (London: Methuen, 1937), 172–174; 202–208.

<sup>5</sup> E.g., C. Schneider, Geistesgeschichte des antiken Christentums, 2 vols. (München: Beck, 1954), 1:21–35; G. Theissen, “Wanderradikalismus: Literatursoziologische Aspekte der Überlieferung von Worten Jesu im Urchristentum,” ZTK 70.3 (1973): 245–271, at 255–257.

<sup>6</sup> Inter alia, F. G. Downing, “The Politics of Jesus,” The Modern Churchman 25.1 (1982): 19–27; “Cynics and Christians,” NTS 30.4 (1984): 584–93; “The Social Contexts of Jesus the Teacher,” NTS 33.3 (1987): 435–491; Jesus and the Threat of Freedom (London: SCM, 1987); Christ and the Cynics (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1988); Cynics and Christian Origins (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1992).

<sup>7</sup> E.g., J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (New York: HarperCollins, 1991); H. Taussig, “Jesus in the Company of Sages,” in Profiles of Jesus, ed. R. W. Hoover (Santa Rosa, CA: Polebridge, 2002), 169–193; L. E. Vaage, “The Ethos and Ethics of an Itinerant Intelligence” (PhD Thesis, Claremont Graduate School, California, 1987); idem, Galilean Upstarts: Jesus’ First Followers According to Q (Valley Forge: Trinity Press International, 1994); B. Mack, A Myth of Innocence. Mark and Christian Origins (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); idem, The Book of Q and Christian Origins (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1993).

<sup>8</sup> I note in particular, Betz, “Jesus and the Cynics”; C. M. Tuckett, “A Cynic Q?” Bib 70.2 (1989): 349–76 and idem, Q and the History of Early Christianity. Studies on Q (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1996), esp. 355–391; B. Witherington, Jesus the Sage: The

1. Much of the evidence adduced stems from dates too early or too late to be relevant, and Cynicism itself had lain dormant until a late first-century CE revival.
2. There is no independent evidence for any Cynic presence in Galilee.
3. There are essential features of Cynicism missing in the Jesus tradition; especially “shameless” behaviour, displays of “indifference,” an urban base, and individualism; and despite this individualism, they all wore a uniform of cloak, staff and satchel, quite different from the habit(s) of Jesus’ followers.
4. Cynics regularly deployed slogans, key words or catch-phrases that are absent from the Jesus tradition.
5. Cynics frequently deployed “apothegms” or “chreiai”; and these constitute a consistent Gattung that rarely appears in the Jesus tradition, which itself deploys distinctively Jewish parables.
6. There are essential elements in the Jesus tradition that are incompatible with the supposed essence of Cynicism, such as an interventionist deity concerned with healing and with imminent cosmic renewal.
7. Such similarities as do appear are superficial, and there is an underlying difference of ethos. Jesus is gentle, and a bon viveur rather than a harsh ascetic.
8. If any similarities seem more striking, they are nonetheless coincidental, independent responses to similar socio-economic conditions.

---

Pilgrimage of Wisdom (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); P. R. Eddy, “Jesus as Diogenes? Reflections on the Cynic Jesus Thesis,” JBL 115.3 (1996): 449–469; M. Ebner, “Kynische Jesusinterpretation—‘disciplined esaggeration’?”, BZ NF 40 (1996): 93–100; and idem, Jesus—Ein Weisheitler?, HBS 15 (Freiburg: Herder, 1998), 26–31 and 399–416. There are replies to Betz and to Eddy by D. Seeley, “Jesus and the Cynics: A Reply to Hans Dieter Betz,” JHC 3.2 (1996): 284–290; and “Jesus and the Cynics Revisited,” JBL 116.4 (1997): 704–712; and from J. Kloppenborg, “A Dog among the Pigeons: The ‘Cynic Hypothesis’ as a Theological Problem,” in From Quest to Q: Festschrift J. M. Robinson, ed. J. M. Asgeirsson et al. (Leuven: Peeters, 2000), 73–118; largely repr. in his “Social Characterizations in Theological Perspective,” in idem, Excavating Q: The History and Setting of the Sayings Gospel (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 2000), ch. 9, 409–444; and F. G. Downing, “Deeper Reflections on the Jewish Cynic Jesus,” JBL 17.1 (1998): 97–104; and “The Jewish Cynic Jesus,” in Jesus, Mark and Q: The Teaching of Jesus and its Earliest Records, ed. M. Labahn and A. Schmidt, JSNTSup 214 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001); from the latter I have kind permission to reproduce matter here.

All of these warrant a brief response before a positive case is outlined. First, however, it seems worth noting John Kloppenborg Verbin's comment on the debate, to the effect that the hypothesis of a Jewish-Cynic strand in Christian origins seems to be expected to meet much higher standards than the critics deploy in their own alternative reconstructions.<sup>9</sup> It is also important to add that the defence that follows is of the present author's own procedures, and it will include an occasional distancing from some other writers' reconstructions of a Cynic Jesus, both for their accounts of Cynicism and for their accounts of Jesus.

1. Dating

Excluding the historical Antisthenes as questionably Cynic, we start with Diogenes himself in the early fourth century BCE; and specialists work with the assumption that something of this original figure is recoverable, and that accounts of him, albeit added to and adapted, continued to be available, as were works by successors, including Menippus of Gadara (available to Varro in Rome, first century BCE, through to Lucian of Samosata in the second century CE), and Meleager of Gadara. Important is Diogenes Laertius, Lives of Eminent Philosophers 6, probably late second or early third century CE, but widely taken to have used much earlier sources. The (pseudonymous) Cynic Epistles, displaying variants on Cynic themes, also span our period. With care these, and Cicero, Musonius, Epictetus, Dio of Prusa, Oenomaus of Gadara, Philo, Seneca and others can be used, and are by specialists in the field in their reconstructions, including reconstructions of Cynicism in the first century CE.<sup>10</sup> New Testament scholars also work with similar carefully reasoned conventional reconstructions, arguing for continuities where no physical evidence (for instance, of synoptic gospel texts) exists. Many New Testament scholars also use matter from Jewish writings becoming canonical to illustrate the culture of first-century Galilee, without direct independent evidence that they were at all well known there, or, if known, understood as suggested. Rabbinic material from writings dated only very much later than most of the Cynic sources quoted is often also adduced. The procedures are the same in principle, and, if carried out with care, neither is any less or more valid than the another.

---

<sup>9</sup> Kloppenborg, "A Dog among the Pigeons: A Cynic Q?"; and "Social Characterisations."

<sup>10</sup> Goulet-Cazé, "Le cynisme à l'époque impériale"; compare her L'ascèse cynique: Un commentaire de Diogène Laërce VI 70–71 (Paris: Vrin, 1986), and Les Kynika du stoïcisme, Hermes 89 (Stuttgart: Franz Steiner, 2003); and notes 1 and 2 above; and R. Hoistad, Cynic Hero and Cynic King: Studies in the Cynic Conception of Man (Uppsala: Bloms, 1948); there is a fuller survey of sources accepted as relevant for "Cynicism" by various classicists, in Downing, Cynics and Christian Origins, 340–342.

It is true that we have for the first century CE no records of named Cynics literate enough to be noted, until Seneca's friend Demetrius, and then Dio of Prusa, Demonax, Oenomaus, Peregrinus and others. Such literary figures are of course relevant, but it is not at that level that Cynic influence in Jesus' Galilee is imagined. M.-O. Goulet-Cazé, on whose judgment scholars on all sides tend to rely, argues, with evidence, that popular Cynicism continued as an unbroken chain.<sup>11</sup> The currency of Cynic ideas in Paul's world has also been argued by many scholars.<sup>12</sup>

2. Cynics in Galilee

There is in fact very little independent evidence of any sort for popular culture in early first-century CE Galilee. The only at all extensive documents we possess that even claim relevance are the four gospels. The only other evidence adduced is mostly drawn from older (unlocated) canonical writings, or south Judean sectarian writings, or later rabbinica (as noted); and from accounts of nineteenth- and twentieth-century CE peasant communities. The relevance of these may be argued, but there is no independent evidence by which to verify (or falsify) the conclusions proposed, as is shown by the varied and often conflicting conclusions reached by those who do restrict themselves to the sources listed.<sup>13</sup> There is simply a powerful conventional and often unreflective restriction to this choice of illustrative material.

---

<sup>11</sup> Goulet-Cazé, "Le cynisme à l'époque impériale", 2724, "la chaîne ne s'était point interrompue"; compare Branham and Goulet-Cazé, eds., The Cynics, "Introduction," 13–14.

<sup>12</sup> One may also compare A. J. Malherbe, e.g., in his Paul and the Popular Philosophers (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); or M. Ebner, Leidenlisten und Apostelbrief, FzB 66 (Würzburg: Echter Verlag, 1991); and the evidence adduced in F. G. Downing, Cynics, Paul and the Pauline Churches (London: Routledge, 1998).

<sup>13</sup> This is argued at greater length in Downing, "The Jewish Cynic Jesus," 187–195, referring especially to work by S. Freyne and R. A. Horsley; compare F. G. Downing, "In Quest of First Century CE Galilee," CBQ 66.1 (2004): 78–97; repr. in F. G. Downing,

We do know that over the centuries three named Cynics, Menippus, Meleager and Oenomaus, originated in Gadara. That is more than for any Greek city apart from Athens. We know that Gadara was proud of its intellectual tradition; and we know of just one Gadarene scholar of another school, the Epicurean Philodemus, a vigorous critic of Cynicism. Gadara is a few kilometres south-east of the Galilean lake, and the easiest route to the coast would pass near Jesus' Nazareth. This proves very little: only that Cynic influence in Galilee, at a popular level, is not completely implausible. But it does mean that if we find that some gospel matter significantly resembles Cynic tradition, and the similarity is greater than with any known contemporary native Jewish traditions, then we are justified in considering an hypothesis to account for this as being other than "pure coincidence." One such hypothesis would be that strands of popular Cynicism had been assimilated in Galilee over the centuries since the time of Menippus, sufficiently so for such motifs to be communicable, to make enough sense for Jesus' own critical variant of some such popular Cynic-tinged Jewish culture to be understood. The synoptic gospels are then themselves to be taken as evidence for a measure of popular Cynicism in the culture of Jewish Galilee. Clearly this argument is circular, taking the gospels as evidence for their own context, but that is inevitable, short of arbitrarily refusing to take as potential evidence for Jesus' Galilee the only material that actually purports to emanate from there.

3. A Missing Essence of Cynicism

Ancient Cynicism, like the early Christian movement, was very diverse, and many of our informants were overtly eclectic (Cicero, Philo, Seneca, Dio, Lucian's Demonax). Cynicism was "more a way of life than a philosophical system."<sup>14</sup> Attempts to define an elaborate "essence" of the early Christian "way" will meet these days with incredulity. Unfortunately many of those who do posit Cynic influence on Jesus themselves maintain an unjustifiably monochrome picture of Cynicism, encouraging superficial rebuttals. What the evidence suggests are various "family resemblances" within each grouping as discerned both by insiders and by outsiders.<sup>15</sup> Some commentators seem particularly fascinated by the sexual and excretory “shamelessness” of Diogenes in some strands of the tradition, ignoring the absence of these examples from accounts of other, later Cynics, but also ignoring other actions then seen as shameless, such as eating in public and dressing badly. Cynic “indifference” is thus taken, contrary to the texts, as indiscriminate.

---

God with Everything: The Divine in the Discourse of the First Christian Century, SWBA 2.2 (Sheffield: Sheffield Phoenix Press, 2008), 151–173.

<sup>14</sup> Diogenes Laertius, Lives 6.103.

Cynics do appear mostly in larger towns, where the literate who record them lived; but they also travel on foot between towns, and some are found staying in the countryside. And these are not solitary individualists, but teachers with groups of disciples, and a socially disruptive message and practice (family, work, civic authority, cults), recognized as such by others.<sup>16</sup> To demand that every item of all variants of Cynicism be matched in any Jewish Cynicism ascribed to Jesus is to ask for more to be included together there than is found together in any acknowledged Cynic source.

4. Cynic Slogans

In the ancient texts, the key-words commentators pick on, such as ἀυτάρκεια, ἀπάθεια, and even κυνικός, occur mainly in comments by outsiders. They are rare or even absent in many writings normally taken to be Cynic.<sup>17</sup> Their absence from the gospels is of but minor significance.

5. Diverse “Genres” or “Gattungen”

Scholars have picked on the definitions of the “chreia” form in ancient manuals, relating incidents where a speaker responds to a word or action with a further word or action, or with both. In the “Q” tradition, the material common to Matthew and Luke, and taken by most in the debate to stem from a mainly sayings collection, there are few such, although there is a slightly larger tally in Mark. Cynics, to be sure, very likely used this form; but that they spoke solely or mainly in this style has by no means been demonstrated. Neither the Cynic Epistles nor Dio of Prusa's nor Lucian's imaginary Cynic dialogues suggest anything of the sort. Chreiai so defined constitute a large part of Diogenes Laertius's collection; but it is noteworthy that he also felt free to present Cynic opinions in much more "gnomic" form, without any account of circumstance.<sup>18</sup> What makes the utterances and other significant actions distinctive and gives them their specific colour is their attribution to a particular figure. The same is true of the narrated sayings and other actions in the synoptic gospels.

<sup>15</sup> On “family resemblance,” L. Wittgenstein, Philosophical Investigations, 2nd ed. (Oxford: Blackwell, 1956), 31–32.

<sup>16</sup> In more detail, Downing, Cynics and Christian Origins, 18, 26–30, 50–56, 82–84, 148–149; and 79 on groupings, on which see Goulet-Cazé, “Le cynisme à l’époque impériale,” 2736–2738.

<sup>17</sup> Downing, Cynics and Christian Origins, 45–50.

It has in fact not been shown, only asserted (and contrary to evidence) that ancient authors felt at all tightly bound by the "forms" which they for pedagogic purposes discerned; and Cynic teaching on most matters of concern is preserved for us in various styles.<sup>19</sup> As varied in form is matter ascribed to Jesus.

We have no independent evidence for anyone, distinctively Jewish or not, deploying shorter or longer still-life or narrative "parables" in Galilee in the early first century CE.<sup>20</sup> We have evidence for later rabbis using illustrative parables; but neither Josephus nor Paul, self-styled contemporary Pharisees, do so; while Dio of Prusa could say that crowds would come up to people dressed as he was in his Cynic period, expecting vivid word pictures.<sup>21</sup> We shall return to parables below (13.7); but, if their presence in the gospel material is indicative of anything, it aligns the Jesus tradition with Cynicism, rather than distinguishing it.

---

<sup>18</sup> Diogenes Laertius, Lives 6.22–24; 27b–31, 33, 35b (with a few exceptions; 70–73, 75–76).

<sup>19</sup> Compare J. F. Kindstrand, "Diogenes Laertius and the Chreia tradition," Elenchos 7 (1986): 219–243; perhaps also, on scholars' inventions of genres, Pedro Pablo Fuentes González, Les Diatribes de Teles (Paris: Vrin, 1998), 47–78.

<sup>20</sup> Compare B. B. Scott, "Essaying the Rock," Foundations and Facets Forum 2 (1986): 3–11, at 5, "nothing of the sort"; idem, Hear Then the Parable: A Commentary on the Parables of Jesus (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989), 14; and Downing, "The Jewish Cynic Jesus," 197–198.

<sup>21</sup> Dio of Prusa, Discourses 55.9, 11, 22; cf. 72.13.

6. Elements in the Jesus Tradition Supposedly Incompatible with "Cynicism"

All reconstructions of Jesus' teaching allow, often explicitly, for his having made his own selection from diverse Judaism as represented. No known contemporary Jew—not even Josephus—could include every variant. Adherence to Torah meant to Torah as interpreted, if not as re-written (the Temple Scroll). But critics of the hypothesis of Cynic strands in Jesus' convictions seem to assume that from Cynicism he must be taken to have accepted all or nothing, rather than to have made his own selection (from what was also, as argued just above, itself also diverse). Jesus cannot be allowed to have left out elements, if such there were, that might seem to us incompatible. Yet Cynics argued among themselves, made their own selections; people on the fringes (Musonius, Epictetus, even Seneca) made their own individual selections; people with still less sympathy (Cicero, Philo) made some selections. But, it would seem, it cannot be imagined that Jesus of Nazareth might have picked and chosen from whatever of Cynicism might have come his way.

Talk of God or Gods is common in many Cynic sources,<sup>22</sup> even while the Homeric myths are derided. Deciding how best to interpret this, including talk of Cynics as messengers of the Gods and friends of the Gods, is difficult. But any notion of God over-riding human freedom would seem likely to have been unacceptable among any of the Cynics whose convictions have come down to us; so, if that scepticism came Jesus' way, he excluded it. On the other hand, seeing humans as receiving shared general divine care is, as we shall recall later, very much a common strand. One variant of the Diogenes story even allows him to seek oracular guidance, a practice contemptuously dismissed by a later Cynic, Oenomaus.<sup>23</sup>

Cynics were expected to oppose what they saw as false, as pretence; and included in that could be insincere recourse to purifications, initiations, sacrifices, and localizations of God or Gods in temples or images. Much of this, as ascribed to Oenomaus, was welcomed by later rabbis, as it was by Eusebius.<sup>24</sup>

---

<sup>22</sup> Cf. J. H. Moles, "Le cosmopolitanisme cynique," in Le cynisme ancien, ed. Goulet-Cazé and Goulet, 259–278; repr. (ET) in Branham and Goulet-Cazé, The Cynics, 105–120.

<sup>23</sup> Diogenes Laertius, Lives 6.20–21; Oenomaus in Eusebius, Praeparatio euangelica 4–7 and 13.

Physical health was important to Cynics as it was to the Jesus of the tradition; but illness for a Cynic would probably be a hardship to be borne, rather than a matter for divine healing.<sup>25</sup> Here again, if Jesus met with such Cynic scepticism, he chose to reject it (as the movement around the Cynic Peregrinus may have done in the next century, according to Lucian).<sup>26</sup>

Along with refusing divine determination of human life, the Diogenes of the chreia tradition rejects any cosmological speculation,<sup>27</sup> and this would seem to rule out cosmic eschatology. Some North American proponents of a Jewish Cynic Jesus avoid this conflict by categorizing any promise of an imminent end as part of a later intrusion (stratum) in the tradition. If one is not convinced that strata, let alone strata from differing sources, are there to be discerned in the tradition, this ready solution is not available, and simply pruning the Jesus tradition to fit the Cynic hypothesis would be even harder to justify.<sup>28</sup> So we would have to have Jesus reject one more element, if scepticism on eschatology was there in any selection of Cynic convictions available to him. It is still worth noting, however (if only as one more illustration of the variety in Cynicism as discerned around the time), that there are other Cynic motifs that might seem at least to use language and images that may seem to resonate with motifs in apocalyptic eschatology. There are Lucian's Menippean dialogues involving travel to the realm of the Gods, and to Hades; and there are the assurances that great Cynic figures will have judicial authority after death.<sup>29</sup> We may well suppose any original intention in these to have been metaphoric; but the imagery might well seem familiar.

<sup>24</sup> Downing, Cynics and Christian Origins, 42–44 and, for Oenomaus, 147–148.

<sup>25</sup> Jerome, Ad Jovinianum 2.14, on Diogenes and his fever.

<sup>26</sup> Lucian, Peregrinus 28.

<sup>27</sup> Diogenes Laertius, Lives 6.28a, 29a.

<sup>28</sup> “Strata” in the Q tradition were proposed by J. S. Kloppenborg, The Formation of Q (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987), without judging the ultimate provenance of their contents; that was a deduction others made and that Kloppenborg has resisted; see, further, F. G. Downing, “Word-processing in the Ancient World,” JSNT 64 (1996): 29–48; repr. in idem, Doing Things with Words in the First Christian Century, JSNTSup 200 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), 75–94.

<sup>29</sup> “The ethereal dwellings will receive me and I shall prosecute the Ephesians,” Pseudo-Heraclitus 5.2; compare Pseudo-Diogenes 39.2; Socrates, Epistle 25.1; Lucian, Downward Journey 23; cf. Epictetus, Encheiridion 15 (of Heraclitus and Diogenes).

With so much variety and internal disagreement among designated Cynic sources, and so much evidence for eclecticism across named schools of thought, we are in no position to decide in advance what sets of Cynic practices and ideas could have been around in Gadara or in other towns of the Decapolis; nor that any Galilaeen encountering any such variant set must have felt bound to take it or leave it whole and entire.

7. A Difference of Ethos

Luke 7:31–34 (//Matt 11:16–19), together with other notes of Jesus at shared meals, can be seized on to insist that this Jesus is no ascetic (even if John was). This simply ignores divisions between harsh and gentle Cynics, and differences of opinion among them on luxury foods.<sup>30</sup> Whether there are similarities which are more than superficial is a question to be considered in more detail, below.

8. Coincidence?

In biology, similar exigencies can produce similar responses. There are, it seems, around ten different kinds of “eyes.” Mammalian eyes in fact share a common inheritance. Similar socio-economic situations may prompt similar social structures. But some similarities suggest a direct inheritance. Whether the similarities between Jesus tradition and Cynic tradition suggest a direct inheritance also has to be discussed in some detail (see further, below, 15.1).

I have responded to eight theses hostile to the case for seeing Jesus as a Cynic of any kind, even a very Jewish one. If the reader is not persuaded, I still hope she or he will accept at least that there is a case to be made. I now advance some theses of my own, in more positive support of the case.

---

<sup>30</sup> Cf. Downing, Cynics and Christian Origins, 27–31, 68–69, 78–79.

9. *We May Have Much or Little Valid Data,
But We Do Not Know for Sure*

It is entirely possible though by no means provable that the synoptic traditions include quite a lot of quite good information about the meaningful activities of Jesus of Nazareth. It is, of course, also imaginable that very little if any of what is recorded goes back at all closely to Jesus ("the Jesus Seminar"), and scholarly reconstructions of the traditions can be assembled which instead ascribe most if not all to later creativity in the Christian communities. The trouble with this choice of attribution is, as I argued some forty years ago, "We do not know enough about Jesus to allow us to construct a clear account of the primitive church because we do not know enough about the primitive church to allow us to construct a clear account of Jesus."<sup>31</sup> But (as I also then went on to argue), neither do we have a clear enough picture of the contexts of Jesus (see also 2, above) or of the early communities to shed decisive light on either. We are left with rival reconstructions that compete in terms of coherence and inclusiveness.<sup>32</sup> There is nothing to tell us before we start drafting our reconstructions where the best balance of attributions must lie. The "criteria" we may use, albeit often shared, have force only internally, within our reconstructions. If I (for instance) rule out some item from my reconstructed sketch of Jesus and his early followers by the "criterion of dissimilarity," that does not mean it must be ruled out of yours. What is "dissimilar" or is contextually validated, "plausible," in your reconstruction of Galilean Judaism and of Jesus and of the communities that nursed the traditions of Jesus, may not be so in mine.<sup>33</sup> And, in whichever way the

---

<sup>31</sup> F. G. Downing, The Church and Jesus, SBT 2.10 (London: SCM, 1968), 51. This conclusion is quoted with approval by D. C. Allison, Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998), 5 n. 17.

<sup>32</sup> Cf. Downing, "The Social Contexts of Jesus the Teacher"; and F. G. Downing, Jesus and the Threat of Freedom (London: SCM, 1987), 147–160. For brevity my own previous work is listed, but it includes extensive interaction with others.

<sup>33</sup> Cf. Downing, The Church and Jesus, 93–131; and the references, n. 32, above, and idem "Shifting Sands," in idem, Doing Things with Words, esp. 220–224; and among other recent discussions of "criteria" (or "indices"), J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew, I: The Roots of the Problem and the Person. Rethinking the Historical Jesus, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 6, "Criteria", 167–195; G. Theissen and D. Winter, The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2002).

attributions of authorship go, the Cynic-seeming elements still warrant attention.

10. Actions Communicate, Words Perform

In our reconstructions we do best to discuss intentional actions, with verbal communication as a major sub-group of actions, rather than divide “sayings” from “narratives” (even though many scholars do that). “Speech-act” analysis (J. L. Austin) has been taken up quite widely, but it has to work both ways: actions communicate, words perform.<sup>34</sup> Intentional actions (whether involving speech or not) presuppose a community with a shared even if diverse culture, a “language” of behaviour, including verbal behaviour. For innovation (innovative non-verbal/part-verbal action included) to register, be noteworthy, it must still reflect convention (“langue-parole-idiolect”).<sup>35</sup> A chosen public life-style (such as that ascribed to Jesus) most likely presupposes its own social intelligibility.

So (to come a little closer to my announced subject matter), Jesus could, for instance, have deployed parable form(s) quite spontaneously, and/or chosen his particular range of subject matter (labourers, landowners, housewives, children, plants...) without precedent; and the same could apply to his dress code. However, it is more or most likely that others had been doing and saying some things of similar kinds, for Jesus (or anyone else) to repeat and/or innovate on that basis, and be understood, and be taken seriously by some. We must always attempt to sketch a plausible context for deeds (including utterances).<sup>36</sup>

However, as already argued at (2), above, we have little if any evidence independent of the gospels for the socio-cultural life of Galilee

---

<sup>34</sup> Cf. F. G. Downing, “Words as Deeds and Deeds as Words,” BibInt 3.2 (1995): 129–143; repr. in idem, Doing Things with Words, 41–56; J. L. Austin, How to Do Things with Words (Oxford: Clarendon, 1962). Austin is taken up by, among others, J. R. Searle, Speech Acts: An Essay in the Philosophy of Language (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1969) and by J. Habermas, e.g. Communication and the Evolution of Society (ET, London: Heinemann, 1979).

<sup>35</sup> Searle, Speech Acts, 17, with reference to F. de Saussure.

<sup>36</sup> “Plausibility” is a term favoured by Gerd Theissen. I acknowledge the value of many of his detailed suggestions, while disagreeing with the main thrust of many of his conclusions. See G. Theissen and A. Merz, The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide (London: SCM, 1998); and Theissen and Winter, Quest for the Plausible Jesus.

in Jesus' day. The absence of pig bones, and the presence of stone water jars (later said to resist impurity) indicates an observant Jewish population, but it does not tell us how the observance was interpreted.<sup>37</sup>

11. Sociological/Anthropological/Economic Models

Sociological/anthropological/economic models may have considerable heuristic value, but they do not provide us with historical "laws." There are no such laws of a kind that may tell us that some events (including reactions of participants) otherwise unevidenced "must" have happened, nor that events "must have been" interpreted in a particular way even if unexpressed, nor that specific social pressures "must have been exerted" irrespective of the data available to us, nor that happenings apparently evidenced could not have occurred.<sup>38</sup>

Physical laws are in a different category; even those who accept "miracle" presuppose physical regularities in creating their reconstructions.

12. In Quest of a Plausible Fit

In attempting to reconstruct an interpretative context for Jesus and his first followers we can still, of course, exclude by dictat any matter that does not bear a distinctive Judaic label. Or we may examine such Judaic matter with care, and see what sort of "fit" it offers the Jesus tradition. And if elements, more or less extensive, of Jesus tradition seem to fit well with our Judaic matter, that is to be expected, and welcomed. But if a sizable amount fails to fit at all comfortably, we may reasonably look round for any other (perhaps supplementary) socio-cultural contextual strands that may plausibly be held also to have been available. And we shall then attempt as objective an assessment of this further suggested context as we may attain.

---

<sup>37</sup> See S. Freyne, "Archaeology and the Historical Jesus," in idem, Galilee and Gospel, WUNT 125 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000), 160–182; M. A. Chancey, The Myth of a Gentile Galilee, SNTMS 118 (Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 2002). Miqwaoth, ritual baths, are noted, but only in towns; and ossuaries, bone-boxes; but these seem to appear only rarely and later in Galilee; see L. Y. Rahmani, A Catalogue of Jewish Ossuaries in the Collection of the State of Israel (Jerusalem: Israel Antiquities Authority, 1994), 21–27; and, more recently, M. Aviam and D. Syon, "Jewish Ossuaries in Galilee," in What Athens has to do with Jerusalem, ed. L. V. Rutgers (Leuven: Peeters, 2002), 151–187, at 183, have concluded, "It seems, therefore, that the custom of secondary burial in ossuaries arrived in Galilee towards the end of the first century C.E.;" with thanks to Dr. John Kane and doctoral student Tamlin Lizius, Manchester.

<sup>38</sup> Downing, The Church and Jesus, 150–159.

13. Jesus the Jew

First, as most of us interpret the evidence, Jesus is presented in the gospels as they stand, and in what seems to many as tradition on which the gospels depend, as a Galilean Jew (though not a Ἰουδαῖος, Judean).

13.1. Jesus has a very real concern (at the least) for Jerusalem and the Temple, even if the latter needs drastic renewal (Luke/Q 13:34; the Passion Narratives, etc.). There is no strong reason for excluding this matter.

13.2. He is from time to time represented as attending congregational meetings (“synagogues”), in the gospels, though not in Q.

13.3. He respects Torah; and even if he interprets it at times distinctively, so do other contemporaries (Luke/Q 16:16–17; Mark 7:1–13; 10:1–12).

13.4. He is from time to time represented as citing scriptural traditions—very occasionally the text (most full quotations being editorial), more often allusively. Here I would agree readily with Richard Horsley, that Jesus is represented as alluding to a selection of orally retold and transmitted traditions, even elements with an Israelite (northern) bias (e.g., Elijah and Elisha).<sup>39</sup> It seems too readily assumed that every village (Nazareth included) will have had available for repeated reading most if not all the emergent canon of scriptures. Cost, and the absence of a community building for storing so valuable a collection, would seem to have made it unlikely.<sup>40</sup> The only evidence adduced seems to point in a different direction. The Roman soldier executed, so Josephus tells us, for desecrating a scroll of the law he found in one village (War 2:229) found only that to burn, not a library. It would hardly have been all five books in one scroll, for that would have been far too cumbersome; compare the Qumran finds. If a village had only one book, one might conjecture that it would be Deuteronomy, the most frequently found at Qumran; and one may compare the one “copy of the laws of Moses” brandished by Jesus son of Sapphias in a confrontation at Tarichaeae (Josephus, Life 134–135). The other two books most frequently found at Qumran (Isaiah and the Psalter) also figure quite often in the tradition. But there seems no good reason to imagine Jesus immersed in reading and re-reading any extensive set of books. Even the traditions that portray him as literate (Mark 7:6; Luke/Q 7:27; Luke 4:16–21, 10:26; John 8:6–8) do not suggest he was bookish.<sup>41</sup> His intellectual–religious–cultural food would be received for the most part orally and visually and in other sensuous ways, and he would not have needed to be torn away from books to engage with it, absorb it, digest it, talk it over, live it, interact with others living it, ruminate on it, interpret it, sort it, select and reject within it, reinterpret it, recast it, elaborate it, expand it, add to it...

<sup>39</sup> R. A. Horsley, Galilee: History, Politics, People (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1995), 148–156.

<sup>40</sup> Cf. C. Hezser, Jewish literacy in Roman Palestine, TSAJ 81 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001).

However, since only quite a small proportion of the activity ascribed to Jesus finds a context clearly provided by Temple, synagogue, Torah and scripture, we need to search more widely for what might have provided the “langue” and the stimulus for the rest of what he seems to have tried to do and share, by reproducing, adapting, innovating, in interaction with others.

13.5. Jesus, according to the gospels, experienced revelations of divine reality, and expected a universal divine judgment and a new beginning.<sup>42</sup> The language in which this is expressed does seem to tally for the most part with the emergent canon of scripture, rather than stemming from the surviving eschatological apocalypses (“Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha”). However, “Son of Man” becomes a title with eschatological significance only later and “Kingdom of God” has few precise antecedents in surviving documents, but is anyway mostly editorial and so less significant than it is often made out to be. The gospel traditions with their comparative lack of elaborate details (even in Mark 13 etc.) seem only distantly related to surviving eschatological documents. Perhaps something like the traditions in The Lives of the Prophets was important to Jesus, but he does not use any of the most prominent prophetic forms; there is no “thus says the Lord.”<sup>43</sup> Geza Vermes’ attempt to discern a tradition of “charismatic” Galilean wonder-workers has no compelling evidence to support it, and what is adduced has little if anything in common with Jesus the teacher as narrated. We have no independent evidence of other healers, though in the gospel traditions there are notes of other exorcists (Luke/Q 11:19; Mark 9:38).<sup>44</sup>

---

<sup>41</sup> Contra, e.g., J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology, 1 (London: SCM, 1971; ET of Neutestamentliche Theologie I: Die Verkündigung Jesu, Gütersloh: Mohn, 1971), 205, “Jesus lived in the Old Testament”; cited with approval by R. Riesner, Jesus als Lehrer, WUNT 2.7, 2nd ed. (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1984), 225; cf. W. Popkes, in “James and Scripture: An Exercise in Intertextuality,” NTS 45.2 (1999): 213–229: there was no ready access to texts.

<sup>42</sup> I find myself often in qualified agreement on the latter two themes with Allison, Jesus of Nazareth; however, Allison does not sufficiently allow for revelatory experience.

13.6. Apart from allusions to Solomon, Jesus does not seem to quote the literary wisdom tradition and his ethos is quite different (see below). Furthermore, there is no clear evidence for a living Galilean wisdom tradition of wandering sages continuous with some or all the very diverse standpoints and forms of Sirach, Qoheleth, Proverbs, Wisdom of Solomon, Pseudo-Phocylides...<sup>45</sup>

13.7. We are not told of any first-century Galilean other than Jesus using the various figurative speech-forms termed “parables” in the gospel tradition. We may well imagine such forms were already in circulation, and that Jesus did not invent the forms nor introduce to the later (much later) rabbis those genres they also subsequently used; but we have no compelling reason to suppose such forms were used by contemporary Pharisees or by Scribes whether Pharisaic or not. Pharisees do not seem to have set out to teach as such, but simply to set an example of strict adherence to chosen norms of behaviour. In the gospels Pharisees appear in Galilee, but Josephus would lead us to suppose few if any lived there. Scribal lawyers helped to interpret law and apply it, perhaps on the staff of Jewish rulers and other wealthy landowners (especially the priests among them) and we may presume lawyers taught apprentice lawyers; but even the scribalism of the much

---

<sup>43</sup> Against, for instance, Migaku Sato, Q und Prophetie: Studien zur Gattungs- und Traditionsgeschichte der Quelle Q (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1988).

<sup>44</sup> G. Vermes, Jesus the Jew: A Historian’s Reading of the Gospels (London: Collins, 1973), 69–80. Onias/Honi is a pacific Judaeen rain-maker, Hanina ben Dosa survives snake-bite and heals by prayer (not word and touch etc.) and his link with Galilee is tenuous. Neither Honi nor Hanina teaches, collects disciples, nor wanders the countryside.

<sup>45</sup> Against, for instance, B. Witherington, Jesus the Sage: The Pilgrimage of Wisdom (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); and, e.g., Eddy, “Jesus as Diogenes?”, 460–461.

later Mishnah does not deploy parable forms for its exposition.<sup>46</sup> If parabolic communication was in circulation, affording precedent for Rabbis later, and for Jesus in the first century, it was circulating in other circles than those of the scribes or the Pharisees.

14

So we have in quite specifically Jewish sources a reasonable fit for some substantial elements of the Jesus tradition. Yet there is much else; and for these remaining elements of the Jesus tradition lacking close analogies in other available near-contemporary Jewish sources, popular contemporary Cynicism, with some roots in Palestine, seems to afford some quite close analogies, and thus a possible context.

But, it must be noted, if we do find in Jesus Cynic elements from the Greek tradition he remains no less a Jew than does Philo or Josephus or the author of the Wisdom of Solomon, or the writer of 4 Maccabees—or those responsible for the Mishnah, and the Talmuds, with the Greek influence discernible there.

14.1. It has been quite often noted that itinerant Christians obeying some version of the synoptic mission-charge (Mark 6:8–10; Matt 10:9–10; Luke 9:3–4, 10:4–5) might well have looked to spectators somewhat like Cynics. The point was made by Gerd Theissen, for instance, in his 1973 article, “Wanderradikalismus.” Theissen then went on to argue that the specific prohibitions in Luke 9:3 were “probably intended to avoid the least shadow of an impression that the Christian missionaries were these [Cynic] beggars or were like them.”<sup>47</sup> This supposed deliberate difference in “uniform” has then been widely accepted by others.<sup>48</sup>

---

<sup>46</sup> Some Sadducees respond to Jesus imaginatively (Mark 12:18–23); no one else does. On this (limited) account of Pharisees, see, e.g., M. Goodman, “A Note on Josephus, the Pharisees, and Ancestral Tradition,” JJS 50.1 (1999): 17–20; Scott, “Essay-ing the Rock,” 5: “as to such similitudes as master/servant, tower/war, lost sheep/lost coin, the heir, faithful servant, children at play, leaven . . . we have nothing of the sort”; and in Hear then the Parable, 14, “in those layers of the [rabbinic] tradition that can be isolated as belonging to the Pharisees there are no parables” (citing J. Neusner, “Types and Forms in Ancient Jewish Literature: Some Comparison,” History of Religions 11 [1972]: 354–390). Paul, as a self-professed Pharisee, uses figurative language, but none at all close to the synoptic parables. See also A. J. Saldarini, Pharisees, Scribes and Sadducees in Palestinian Society (Wilmington: Glazier, 1988), for the scribes as “bureaucrats . . . and experts on Jewish life,” but nothing more, 266, summarizing a detailed argument.

The evidence for a supposed uniformity in Cynic dress is in fact derived from a small number of caricatures derived from outsiders. If one looks at the Cynic sources themselves in detail (rather than at today’s or yesterday’s generalizations—Theißen quotes a few secondary sources and Diogenes Laertius 6.13 only) there was even more variety in Cynic get-up (and in the terminology<sup>49</sup> for the various items of “equipment” that might or might not be deployed) than we find among the sets of instructions in the synoptic gospels. Mark allows both sandals and staff, which many Cynics would carry; Matthew forbids the staff, as Luke does in one list, and Matthew forbids sandals, as Luke does in his other list. Paul, of course, interprets the tradition differently again: 1 Cor 9:14–15, with 4:11–12, γυμνιτεύομεν, probably only “half naked.” “Barefoot” is how Dio describes Diogenes; on this sculptors vary in their depictions of Cynics. (Particularly significant in fact are the photographs of acknowledged statues of Cynics available in various published collections, but perhaps now especially those in Diskin Clay’s recent essay.)<sup>50</sup> Some Cynics forgo a staff; for some the begging bag (or, for others, bowl) is a positive symbol, others would prefer to earn their keep. Though Jesus’ followers do not beg (αἰτεῖν), they are expected to depend on others’ hospitality, as some Cynics did.<sup>51</sup> The critics of any Jewish Cynic Jesus thesis tend to ignore or

---

<sup>47</sup> Theissen, “Wanderradikalismus”, 245–271, at 255–259, “Das Verbot von Tasche und Stab zielt wahrscheinlich darauf hin, auch den geringsten Anschein zu vermeiden, die christlichen Missionare seien solche oder ähnliche Bettler,” as in the ET, “The Wandering Radicals,” in Social Reality and the Early Christians: Theology Ethics and the World of the New Testament (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1992), 47. This distinction is repeated without argument in Theissen and Merz, The Historical Jesus, 216; cf. R. A. Horsley and N. A. Silberman, The Message and the Kingdom: How Jesus and Paul Ignited a Revolution and Transformed the Ancient World (Minneapolis: Fortress 1997), 58–59.

<sup>48</sup> E.g., by R. A. Horsley, Jesus and the Spiral of Violence (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987), 230; C. M. Tuckett, variously, including Q and the History of Early Christianity (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1996), 385–389; Eddy, “Jesus as Diogenes,” 461–462.

<sup>49</sup> Goulet-Cazé, “Le cynisme à l’époque impériale,” 2738–2746. I am grateful to Prof. J. M. Robinson, for helping me, in conversation, clarify and strengthen (I hope) this and some of the following points.

<sup>50</sup> D. Clay, “Picturing Diogenes,” in The Cynics, ed. Branham and Goulet-Cazé 366–387; especially fig. 9, p. 381, naked with bowl; and fig.10, p. 384, with no cup, staff or satchel, but here with sandals and cloak draped around his midriff.

<sup>51</sup> See Downing, Cynics and Christian Origins, 10–11, 32–33, 133–34, for some long lists; but cf. Dio Chrysostom 6.15, 60; Musonius 19 (Lutz 120–122); Pseudo-Lucian, dismiss such inconvenient data, preferring, as noted earlier, a clearly defined Cynic appearance with which to contrast a clearly defined early Christian self-presentation. Yet to appear poorly dressed, to draw attention to yourself with a message encouraging poverty while relying on others' support, is, in much of the first-century east Mediterranean world, certainly quite enough to risk being seen as a Cynic.<sup>52</sup> The variegated Cynic tradition could provide an intelligible context for the variations the early Christians allowed themselves in response to these injunctions from Jesus.

Would this hold, however, in Galilee? Negatively we have no evidence from outside the gospels for anyone in Galilee around Jesus' day behaving in any closely similar way. Josephus's account of Essenes travelling light to visit other known or unknown members of their dispersed community affords no close analogy at all; nor, in ancient tradition, does Elijah or Elisha. But eye-catching actions of this sort are only at all fully significant, even in some measure recognizable, where they can presuppose a context in which people know how to interpret them (a commonplace of "sociology of knowledge" so-called). We can of course always still posit coincidence—and that could be the correct assessment. Jesus could just have chanced on a method of approach with (apparently) no precedent in his own culture, but one that happened to have been adopted over the past few centuries by innumerable others travelling through the countryside among the Hellenistic towns of the Mediterranean world, not excluding Gadara, a few kilometres to the south east of Nazareth, Gadara where two significant named Cynics, two famous sons, had originated (and at least one vigorous critic of Cynicism) and where another, Oenomaus, would emerge. Well, coincidences do occur. Jesus himself may have thought he was innovating. And still no one (no more widely travelled merchant, soldier, artisan, scribe, Pharisee, Herodian or Sadducee, no one acquainted with the Greek-speaking world) told him or his followers what sort of itinerants they might be mistaken for, even without staff or shoes or satchel. Or, if anyone did exclaim, "Why get yourselves up like a Cynic? Get back to Gadara!" Jesus and his friends (or the later tradents at least) remained content with the image and the likely interpretation.

---

The Cynic 3; Teles, Stobaeus IVA, Hense 44; Philostratus, Lives of the Sophists 488; Pseudo-Crates 2.19.2; Pseudo-Diogenes 38.4; R. F. Hock, The Social Context of Paul's Ministry (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980), 37–42.

<sup>52</sup> On not begging, but expecting support: Luke 10:7; and cf. Pseudo-Crates 2.19, 22; Pseudo-Diogenes 38.4.

14.2. Freyne and Horsley (as leading examples) differ as to the extent and depth of poverty in Jesus' Galilee. We have no evidence in older or contemporary Jewish thought of poverty being commended as a condition for the good life. The dangers of wealth, of seeking it, placing too much reliance on it (Ps 49:6, 62:10; Prov 30:7–9), are noted; and there are scriptural references to "the poor" who may be God's special concern, without our knowing the kind of poverty in question. But nowhere else in Jewish sources do we seem to find poverty as such commended, let alone commanded, until we reach Philo in Alexandria.<sup>53</sup>

Jesus in the tradition commends the blessedness of the poor, forbids the accumulation of wealth, and judges it incompatible with service to God, demanding dispossession (Luke/Q[?] 6:21–25; Luke/Q 12:22–31, 33–34; Luke/Q 16:13; Mark 10:17–26). So, again, we find Jesus, with no clear precedent in his own culture, hitting on poverty as constitutive of the good life, of blessedness: an approach that for centuries in the Hellenistic world had been exhibited and commended and talked about and related in lively Cynic anecdotes that could be part of the school curriculum for anyone learning to write Greek. But Jesus, we are asked to guess, reached this Cynic conclusion independently, and expressed it in Cynic-like dress, also independently; and with no cultural precedent some Galileans accepted his lead, while no one with contacts in the world where Greek was the first language ever said, "You're just another Cynic!" or put him off by telling him it was not just non-Jewish, it was foreign, it was Greek. Well, coincidences do occur.

14.3. It is not just the fact that Jesus adopted poverty and commended it (so we are told), but the way in which we are told he commended it that is also striking. He urged people to accept the example of birds and flowers, and not bother about food, clothes, or stores. In "On avoiding bothersome busyness: Q/Luke 12:22–31 in its Greco-Roman Context," in the companion volume 4, I offer a very full discussion of this passage, one which can only be summarized here. Commentators have noted how similar this passage, whether in Luke's or Matthew's version, seems to Greco-Roman concerns about anxiety.<sup>54</sup> Comparing it in detail with two nearly contemporary treatises, the De tranquillitate of Seneca and that of Plutarch respectively, as well as with a large number of shorter passages from various authors, brings out these affinities still more clearly.

---

<sup>53</sup> T. E. Schmidt, Hostility to Wealth in the Synoptic Gospels, JSNTSup 15 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987), 49, concludes that no canonical passages listed "puts poverty in a favourable light"; 73, "none can be said to laud poverty"; and on Philo, 82. Cf. also R. J. Coggins, "The Old Testament and the Poor," ExpT 99 (1987–88): 11–14; R. N. Whybray, "Poverty, Wealth and the Point of View in Proverbs," ExpT 100 (1989–90): 332–336.

One may discern over all in this material at least fifteen sub-themes: (1) bothersome concerns detailed; (2) body and soul talk; (3) inner resources; (4) wild beasts; (5) flowers; (6) opulence; (7) human worth; (8) women's work and men's work; (9) busy toil; (10) possessions; (11) food's availability; (12) divine provision; (13) human limitations; (14) the divine realm; (15) sufficient to the day. Of these, all but (3), inner resources, occur in Matthew; and all but (3) and (15) in Luke. Various shorter selections of these themes occur in various settings in various orders. Dio of Prusa deploys eleven in his Discourse 6, Diogenes, or On Tyranny, and seven in Discourse 10, debating what counts as useful. Musonius (Discourse 15) has seven or possibly eight in a discussion of family life; Epictetus (Diss. 1.9.7–9) uses seven in a consideration of human kinship with deity. Much later, Clement of Alexandria includes with an echo of the gospel passage others of these themes in forms much closer to those in our pagan authors, to discuss fussily obtaining exotic foods (Paid. 2.1.5–6).

What emerges as distinctive in this comparison is a divide between passages that stress inner resources (and thus are emphasizing feelings of anxiety) on the one hand; and those that make no mention of inner resources, but are concerned with bothersome, fussy activity: toil. The gospel pericope is usually interpreted as dealing with the former, feelings of anxiety. Yet what the birds and flowers are commended for is none such. They are commended for not doing things, not doing toil-some things, not sowing, harvesting, storing, spinning, weaving. And that is a distinguishing mark of much Cynicism, the refusal of bothersome toil for results seen as valueless.

Might not Jesus or the tradition have produced this cluster of themes, complex though it is, out of "native" Jewish resources? The search for such has not been very productive. Yes, ants may be admired (Prov 6:6): but precisely for careful storing. Certainly, God is seen as provider for beasts and for humans; but that encourages humans, at least, to work, not to abstain from it (e.g., Ps 104:21–23; Sir 39:30–40:7).

---

<sup>54</sup> E.g., F. Bovon, Das Evangelium nach Lukas 2, Lk 9,51–14,35, EKK III.2 (Zurich: Benziger, 1996), 292–318; for further references, Downing, "On avoiding bothersome busyness."

So, if this is not reliant on Greco-Roman, and specifically Cynic tradition, we are asked to believe that Jesus, by coincidence, and quite independently, chooses thirteen or fourteen such strands, and to make what is a frequent Cynic point, unprecedented otherwise in his native culture.<sup>55</sup> And, as it happens, this complex sequence, though lacking Galilean Jewish cultural precedent is meaningful enough to have been remembered, recorded, repeated, in detail. Coincidences certainly do seem to be piling up.

14.4. Although in one strand Jesus affirms respect for father and mother (Mark 7:10–13) and for marriage (Mark 10:4–9), elsewhere he enjoins the fracturing of families (Luke/Q 12:51–53; Mark 10:29–30) and even forbids the pious duty of burial for a parent (Luke/Q 9:59–60). As Tom Wright notes, this presents “a shocking challenge to the Jewish world of Jesus’ day.”<sup>56</sup> It is significant that while D. C. Allison places considerable stress on voluntary celibacy as undertaken in the light of an imminent end, the only explicit passage he can cite in illustration is from 1 Cor 7:26.<sup>57</sup> Allison’s Jewish eschatological sources promote other kinds of renunciation, but not this. There is precedent for such radicalism, however, in Cynic teaching, where it formed part <sup>55</sup> Many commentators agree on excising elements from the passage, as disturbing its logic. Without them the passage would still have more motifs than have any set noted by me, bar the two full dissertations cited, and the remainder would still be distinctively Cynic. However, the fact that so many such sub-motifs in various sequences, whether to our minds logical or not, can be evidenced suggests, as argued in Downing, “On avoiding bothersome busyness,” that such insistence on a logic with which both Luke and Matthew were content is itself over-fussy and anachronistic.

---

<sup>56</sup> T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (London: SPCK, 1996), 402.

<sup>57</sup> Allison, Jesus of Nazareth, 188–197, referring to 190. It is a weakness of Allison’s argument that he places so much stress on sexual renunciation (and elaborate arguments to enhance its importance in the tradition) and simply lists in passing other items, 174–175. This emphasis fits Allison’s own estimate of the importance in the tradition of “intention” whereas that is a Matthaean theme, and the other synoptic passages cited as instances of “intention” are concerned with enacted commitment (186 compared with 47 §12 and n. 151). The Jesus tradition as a whole (like those of many Cynics, and in this case, like some Jewish tradition) places its emphasis on what is done, not on intention on its own: Philo, De mutatione 241–243; 4 Macc. 3.3–5; cf. m. Makk. 3:15.

of a considered and fairly coherent rejection of the civic values of which family values are an integral part, and this gives it sense.<sup>58</sup> We are again asked to imagine Jesus arriving at this apparently graceless irresponsibility within no supporting context known to us, yet he is (or is presented as being) understood and followed by some.

14.5. To return to the issue of parables, where we noted (13.7) that we have no independent evidence for such communication being used in Jesus' Galilee. We are assured, however, by one critic that "one of the most characteristic forms of Jesus' teaching style—the parable—has no real Cynic parallels."<sup>59</sup> In fact, most of the short metaphors and similes in the synoptic tradition do have close parallels in Cynic and related sources; and that is most of the material.<sup>60</sup> In the synoptic gospels we can also see longer and shorter versions (of, for instance, The Thief in the Night, The Sower, and The Mustard Seed; and different "expansions" of The Pounds/Talents). Longer figurative constructions are admittedly not frequent in our Cynic materials (they are not frequent in the gospels); but when we do find such in Cynic sources, we realize how readily the short forms may have been condensed from the longer ones or shorter ones expanded. We may instance Antisthenes on "strongholds" in Diogenes Laertius compared with the preserved fragment of his Odysseus; or the brief example of "athletic prizes" in Paul compared with the treatment of the same model in Dio; and in Dio in particular do we find other "expansions" of metaphors and similes found in brief elsewhere. The metaphor of "fighting with wild beasts" used with reference to controlling the passions can be used in Cynic writing as briefly as by Paul (1 Cor 15:32), or as expanded by Dio into his "Libyan Myth."<sup>61</sup> Dio's "Good Euboean" has formal as

---

<sup>58</sup> Cf. W. Deming, Paul on Marriage and Celibacy: The Hellenistic Background of 1 Corinthians 7, SNTSMS 83 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995), ch. 2, "The Stoic-Cynic Marriage Debate," 50–61; and F. G. Downing, Christ and the Cynics, JSOT Manuals 4 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1988), 44, 79. (To supplement the latter on the break with family: Diogenes Laertius, Lives 6.20–21; 54; 72; Pseudo-Diogenes 21, 38.5, 47; cf. Epictetus, Diss. 3.22.47, 67–82; 4.1.153); and idem, Cynics and Christian Origins, 133, 139. As in the Jesus tradition, one can find a counter-balance among Cynics, too: in favour of marriage, Diogenes Laertius, Lives 6.96–98; and respect for an abandoned parent, Pseudo-Diogenes 7.30, 34.

<sup>59</sup> Eddy, "Reflections," 461.

<sup>60</sup> See Downing, Christ and the Cynics.

<sup>61</sup> Arguing that the metaphor is shared, A. J. Malherbe, "The Beasts at Ephesus," JBL 87 (1968): 71–80, repr. in his Paul and the Popular Philosophers (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989), 79–89. Q/Luke 11:24–26 (the returning unclean spirit) also affords an interesting comparison with Dio's Libyan Myth, Discourse 5.

well as substantial similarities with Luke's "Good Samaritan." Dio here writes at very much greater length, but uses an everyday rural setting and an unexpected generous "hero" to challenge narrow-minded expectations (besides portraying a rural Cynic "natural" simplicity).<sup>62</sup> Dio says that people come to men dressed as he was (as a Cynic) expecting such stories. To quote an earlier conclusion of my own, "the sheer quantity of parable, metaphor and simile [in the synoptic tradition] would strongly reinforce the impression that anyone repeating this material was some sort of Cynic."<sup>63</sup>

14.6. Mark, Matthew and Paul in 1 Corinthians, together with some longer texts of Luke and also Justin Martyr, supported allusively by John, indicate that Jesus encouraged his immediate entourage to share bread and wine designated as his body and his blood. There is no plausible Jewish context, no otherwise suggested Galilean Jewish context in which this might seem acceptable. Of course food and drink could be consumed in a way we might term "symbolic," and "blood" might be used as a metaphor ("the blood of the grape," Deut 32:14; cf. Prov 5:15). But the idea of drinking blood, even symbolically, simply horrifies (2 Sam 23:17), as is often noted.<sup>64</sup> Although pagan mysteries as an alternative context have often been canvassed for such an apparently "Thyestean" feast, I have shown elsewhere that when such charges are later levelled at Christians, it is always in combination with "Oedipean intercourse"; and this combination (cannibalism and incest) is only ever proposed for Cynics in our most nearly contemporary sources. In theory Cynics could accept both such possibilities as "natural" (without there being any record of their putting theory into practice).<sup>65</sup> Again, Jesus could quite independently have hit on an idea—eating human flesh, drinking human blood—that only Cynics

---

<sup>62</sup> Malherbe discusses the Antisthenes passages in "Antisthenes and Odysseus and Paul at War," now in his Paul and the Popular Philosophers, 91–119; H. Funke discusses the prizes in "Antisthenes bei Paulus," Hermes 98 (1970): 459–471; the passages can be found in G. Giannantoni, Socratis et Socraticorum Reliquiae II (Naples: Bibliopolis, 1990); the "Good Euboean" is in Dio 7.1–80.

<sup>63</sup> Dio 55.9, 11, 22; cf. 72.13; quoting Downing, Cynics and Christian Origins, 139; this entire present paragraph is drawn from Downing, "Deeper Reflections on the Jewish Cynic Jesus," 100–101.

<sup>64</sup> H. Maccoby, Paul and Hellenism (London: SCM, 1991), 99, citing John 6:60–66; M. Casey, "No Cannibals at Passover," Theology 96.771 (1993): 199–205, esp. 203.

<sup>65</sup> F. G. Downing, "Cynics and Christians, Oedipus and Thyestes," JEH 44.1 (1993): 1–10, repr. in idem, Making Sense, 134–147. Zeno and the earliest Stoics seem to have retained this twin motif, but by Jesus' day the Stoics had long abandoned it.

are known to have contemplated with serious equanimity. Just one more coincidence.

14.7. It has also been difficult to find earlier “purely Jewish” antecedents for Jesus’ teaching on love of enemies (Luke/Q 6:27–29, 35), and on not judging (Luke/Q 6:37–38, 41–42). Again there are plentiful Cynic or Cynic-influenced instances. As I have in the past noted, there are also inconsistencies: Diogenes in the tradition can be very vindictive; but, in the wider tradition at least, so, too, can Jesus.

14.8. Jesus speaks in his own name, and uses none of the canonical prophetic formulae (“the word of the Lord,” etc.), and, as we noted above, rarely quotes and infrequently even alludes to scripture. Similar forthrightness, readily interpretable as self-opinionated, was characteristic of many Cynics, who also eschewed references to authority or technical arguments. The tradition assumes that Jesus’ hearers were unfazed by his self-assurance; only once in the combined synoptic tradition is Jesus challenged on this score (Mark 11:27).

14.9. From strands I have discussed in more detail elsewhere<sup>66</sup> I have here picked out a number of very significant items and themes where activity including teaching ascribed to Jesus has no at all obvious known Jewish precedent to render it persuasive, let alone intelligible, even “thinkable” or “enactable” for him and his Galilean audiences (or his followers and their audiences), and even runs counter to otherwise evidenced varieties of Jewish ethos, but where an otherwise still very Jewish Jesus is displayed exhibiting and articulating ideas, attitudes and practices resembling strands of Cynicism in recognizably Cynic ways: and being understood and persuasive.

14.10. There are many other issues on which known Jewish and Cynic sources together say similar things (as shown in my Christ and the Cynics). If these common strands were recognized in Jesus’ Galilee, they could have made assimilation of some of the more distinctive Cynic themes much easier. In fact in these areas, where there are non-Cynic Jewish analogies, teaching ascribed to Jesus is still often closer in content to the Cynic than to the non-Cynic Jewish sources.

14.11. We have carefully noted in advance (13.1–7, above) areas where Jesus in the tradition does also recall for us close precedents in “non-Cynic” Judaism, for which I have only been able to argue elsewhere that even these are not without some analogies among some Cynics. So, as noted, his eschatology is Jewish; yet eschatological themes are widely shared, and the rhetoric of his “subversive kingdom” talk can strike a fairly detached observer (L. G. Bloomquist) as similar in its drive to the kingdom language of Cynics.<sup>67</sup> This Jesus can speak of himself or of attitudes to himself as significant for a coming judgment (but so, as we saw, can some Cynics). He heals and exorcises (or heals exorcistically). We have only a very general analogy in Cynic concern for physical well-being, and one very partial later Cynic analogy noted in the apparent therapeutic value of relics of the self-immolated Cynic Peregrinus (but then we have no independent evidence for healers of any other kind in Jesus’ Galilee). And so on.<sup>68</sup>

---

<sup>66</sup> Downing, Jesus and the Threat of Freedom; Christ and the Cynics; Cynics and Christian Origins; and other work listed there and in other notes here.

15

How are we to interpret all this? We can stress (or invent by general re-description) dissimilarities between Christian and Cynic sources, stress or invent by general re-description similarities between the Christian and non-Cynic Jewish sources. I prefer to try to allow for both similarities and differences on all sides.<sup>69</sup>

15.1. We can allow that there are real similarities, but, as noted above in (8), argue that they are culturally simply coincidental, they are epiphenomenal, simply a function of similar economic and social conditions (Theißen, Horsley, Vaage, and others, in their various ways.)<sup>70</sup> This seems to me hard to credit. Similar attitudes may well be

---

<sup>67</sup> L. G. Bloomquist, “Methodological Considerations in the Determination of the Social Context of Cynic Rhetorical Practice: Implications for our present Studies of the Jesus Traditions,” in The Rhetorical Analysis of Scripture: Essays from the 1995 London Conference, ed. S. E. Porter and T. H. Olbricht, JSNTSup 166 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997), 200–231, at 222–230.

<sup>68</sup> See Downing, Cynics and Christian Origins, 140–141 (on eschatology; now adding Socrates, Letter 25.1 and Lucian, Downward Journey 23, to Pseudo-Heraclitus 5 and 9, Pseudo-Diogenes 39, Epictetus, Encheiridion 15); and F. G. Downing, “Common Strands in Pagan, Jewish and Christian Eschatologies in the First Century,” ThZ 51.3 (1995): 197–211; and Cynics and Christian Origins 130–131 (on healing; for the miraculous relic of a Cynic, Lucian, Peregrinus 39).

<sup>69</sup> Cf. Kloppenborg, “A Dog among the Pigeons.”

<sup>70</sup> Theissen and Horsley as above; Vaage, Galilaeen Upstarts; and review of Downing, Cynics and Christian Origins, CBQ 56 (1994): 587–589; and “Q and Cynicism: On Comparison and Social Identity,” in The Gospel behind the Gospels. Current Studies on Q, ed. R. A. Piper (Leiden: Brill, 1995), 199–229; J. D. Crossan, Jesus, A Revolutionary Biography (San Francisco: Harper, 1994), 122, perhaps Jesus was “just re-inventing evinced in similar socio-economic circumstances in different cultures; but we have no evidence elsewhere for as closely similar significant action-and-articulation as is discussed above simply arising spontaneously from parallel socio-economic conditions in distinct cultures. Why should we resort to such a “marvellous” conclusion here?<sup>71</sup>

We may, however, note, that the general socio-economic situation that we are able to reconstruct from our archaeological and other sources for Galilee in Jesus’ day would indicate that his attitude to wealth and security would at least be relevant, even if not necessarily popular, let alone inevitable.

The gospel evidence (in the absence of conclusive evidence to the contrary) seems to indicate a sufficient presence of popular Cynic influence within Galilean Israelite culture, to allow Jesus to make his own selection and form his own Jewish-Cynic synthesis, and be understood.<sup>72</sup>

16

It would seem that Paul perceived the young Jesus movement as a sort of Jewish Cynicism (or Cynic Judaism), and so quite naturally deployed major strands of Cynic praxis and articulation in living, developing and propagating his new commitment.

16.1. I have argued all this at length, in my Cynics, Paul and the Pauline Churches.<sup>73</sup> In that work I have attempted to show, on the basis of others’ researches, and fresh work of my own, that the Paul of the Thessalonian and Corinthian and Galatian letters depicts and articulates a life-style in terms that would so clearly look and sound Cynic to the ordinary townspeople he met that he must have been aware of that, and content with it. What he had to say on “neither Jew the Cynic wheel all by himself”; cited by M. A. Powell, Jesus as a Figure in History (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998), 97.

---

<sup>71</sup> So, when Allison, Jesus of Nazareth, argues that similar situations produce millenarian prophets with often very similar attitudes, but in instances quite independently of each other, we nonetheless note that the precise articulation argued is still culturally specific.

<sup>72</sup> D. Fiensy, “Leaders of Mass Movements and the Leader of the Jesus Movement,” JSNT 74 (1999): 3–27, suggests that Jesus as a carpenter would have been in a good position to “network,” to encounter a variety of people, and so, of ideas.

<sup>73</sup> Downing, Cynics, Paul and the Pauline Churches, ch. 10, 287–295. Along with my own researches I rely particularly on work by A. J. Malherbe (without claiming his support for my conclusions).

nor Greek, neither bond nor free, no male and female” would sound Cynic, as would his disparagement of law, and much of the discussion of sexual and dietary taboos, along with the consuming of bread and wine as body and blood; but also his ostentatious poverty, half-naked, showing the scars of shameful beatings, in fact his entire self-presentation as a teacher working with his hands to gain a living, would look Cynic. A recognizably Cynic deviancy constituted much of the initial thrust of his invitation to a Christian deviancy.<sup>74</sup> When Paul joined the Christians he seems to have supposed it appropriate to behave and talk in ways that must often have seemed Cynic.

16.2. Well before his letters, and as a zealot for his people and their sacred traditions, Paul had originally persecuted some early Christian communities (Gal 1:13–14; Phil 3:6). Presumably he saw their life-style and their announced views as a threat to the security and integrity of both nation and inheritance. The insistence of these followers of Jesus that a man whom God had allowed to suffer crucifixion was nonetheless God’s anointed leader, God’s Messiah, on its own might well have disturbed Paul (“a stumbling-block,” 1 Cor 1:23);<sup>75</sup> but much more significant would have been the life-style these “Messianic Jews” had adopted. As we are often reminded of Judaism over the ages, it is “orthopraxis” that is central; ideas are secondary, important only if they threaten or actually disturb the faithful observance of the Torah as interpreted.<sup>76</sup>

Yet Paul became convinced that he had been encountered by (and himself enlisted by) the Christians’ crucified leader, now totally vindicated by God, glorified Messiah and Lord (as his disciples had been claiming). So what Jesus’ followers had apparently been doing wrong, would now be seen by Paul as pre-eminently right. The life-style Paul had tried to eradicate he would now himself adopt and propagate. The Christian-Cynic way of life we can see Paul enacting and articulating must, then, be presumed to have been his version (even if not a precise imitation) of what he had up to then seen and detested. He now propagated the πίστις, the faithful response to God, that he had tried to destroy (Gal 1:23). At least in broad terms the conclusion seems irresistible; otherwise one would be imagining a Paul become convinced that what his erstwhile opponents had been doing was right, yet himself then in response still doing something quite different.

<sup>74</sup> See also F.G. Downing, “Paul’s Drive for Deviants,” NTS 49.2 (2003): 360–371.

<sup>75</sup> Philo says, “A merciful and forgiving God would never surrender an innocent man to be done to death,” Spec. 3.121.

<sup>76</sup> G. F. Moore, Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1927), 110–111; though in our period there was clearly less uniformity of practice than Moore supposed before the Qumran library had been discovered; cf., e.g., J. Neusner, Judaisms and their Messiahs at the Turn of the Christian Era (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987), ix–xiii.

To live a life that matched his new convictions in a way that would also create the appropriate impression in the Greek towns where he was at home, he would seem to have had to adopt many facets of a fairly gentle but still rigorously self-disciplined Cynicism. His praxis and its articulation obviously must be presumed to have mirrored quite closely, if not precisely, that of those he had been opposing, but with whom he now had allied himself. To draw people away from their ancestral gods (neither Jew nor Greek), and to proclaim an end to linked basic social conventions (neither bond nor free, no male and female) could only be seen as a Cynic deviancy; and this is what Paul espoused as the appropriate way to be a follower of the Galilean Jesus in some of the Greek towns of the eastern Mediterranean.

16.3. It is clear from 1 Corinthians 9 that Paul is responding to the Jesus tradition represented by the synoptic “mission charge.”<sup>77</sup> Paul parading himself “hungry and thirsty, [half-]naked and homeless” is (as noted above) also displaying an image and deploying slogans from Cynic stock; but he does all this precisely because it is the appropriate working out of the new life he has been drawn into. It provides the appropriate “spectacle,” it is to imitate Christ so others may too, it is to allow Christ’s power (his characteristic power) to be effective. It may well be that it is by living so that Paul is “crucified with Christ” and thus able to portray him publicly (Gal 2:20; 3:1).<sup>78</sup> Certainly it is by accepting tribulations in a Christian–Cynic way, he tells us, that he “carries round in his body the death of Jesus” (2 Cor 4:8–11). Paul himself, of course, maintains a Cynic freedom to adopt a variant method of obtaining a livelihood (one that puts him in effective touch with people (1 Thess 2:1–12); but it is still “in poverty” that he makes others rich (2 Cor 6:10; as in his own way his Lord has done, 2 Cor 8:9). Though quite obviously it is the match between his life-style and his understanding of Jesus Christ his Lord that is most important to Paul, he is fully aware that this Cynic-seeming way of living is rooted in a part of the wider church's Jesus tradition.

<sup>77</sup> D. Wenham, Paul—Follower of Jesus or Founder of Christianity? (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995), 190–200.

<sup>78</sup> Cf. B. S. Davis, “The Meaning of προεργάφη in the Context of Galatians 3.1,” NTS 45.2 (1999): 194–212.

What we should conclude from this is that on many fundamental programmatic issues Paul is at one both with Cynic-seeming strands in the Jesus tradition and also with such strands among the wider Christian communities.

16.4. Obviously these findings (if in fact found at all persuasive) are important for our understanding of Paul's perception of nascent Christianity but they are also highly significant for our understanding of other Christians' reaction to Paul's Cynic-Christian Judaism. Paul tells us that "after fourteen years" he checked out the message he had been sharing with leading Christians in Jerusalem "lest somehow I should be running or had been running in vain" (Gal 2:2). It was apparently agreed that in essentials he was on the right lines. The implications for legal matters (circumcision, diet and Sabbath, in particular) of the "neither Jew nor Greek" in the baptismal formula did become controversial. On no other point where Paul appears Cynic in his behaviour and his articulation of it does he have to defend himself: in fact, quite the opposite. His Cynic-seeming practice and Cynic-sounding accounts of it are deployed as having considerable apologetic value in controversy, and especially in 2 Corinthians, in response to those who (even if not original apostles) represent a rival "conservative" and Jewish strand among the early communities. Paul can match their claims both to Jewish inheritance and to Cynic life-style: "Hebrews ... Israelites ... descendents of Abraham ... ministers of Christ ... in laborious hard work, going without sleep, hungry, thirsty, fasting, cold, [half-]naked" (2 Cor 11:22, 27). For his response to have seemed to Paul himself to have worthwhile force, he must have seen the Cynic presentation of these central strands in his practice as affording quite uncontroversially important and agreed common ground.

16.5. Already before Paul joined them around 33 CE, within a year or within at most three of the crucifixion of Jesus, the early Christian communities in many significant ways looked and sounded Cynic, to Paul, who responded in the light of this perception, and to others, and to themselves; and they went on doing so. This Cynic Judaism (or Jewish Cynicism) must seem to have been part of the earliest origins of the movement, in the life, activity and shared thoughts of Jesus himself.

17. Concluding Thesis

Deploying much the same standards with much the same rigour as serve other competing hypotheses (no easier, no harsher), Jewish and Cynic elements in the early Christian movement, and specifically in the Jesus tradition, seem clearly arguable, along the lines sketched above, and to deserve open-minded appraisal.

JESUS AND THE SCRIPTURES OF ISRAEL

STEVE MOYISE

1. Introduction

If the gospels portray Jesus as a healer and teacher of wisdom, they also portray him as an interpreter of scripture. The four gospels record Jesus quoting about fifty different passages of scripture,<sup>1</sup> along with at least twice that number of allusions and echoes.<sup>2</sup> Of course, we know from the rest of the New Testament that scripture interpretation was important to the early church and so we must reckon with the possibility that some of their exegesis has been read back into the life of Jesus. We cannot, therefore, agree with Kimball's assumption that the "Jesus tradition as it is preserved in the canonical Gospels is historically reliable, and consequently also that Jesus was an expositor of the OT as the Gospels depict him."<sup>3</sup> But neither should we adopt an unduly sceptical approach and assume that "citations of scripture are usually a sign of the interpretive voice of the evangelist or the early Christian community."<sup>4</sup> In fact, less than 20% of the quotations attributed to

---

<sup>1</sup> According to UBSGNT: Genesis: 1:27 (Matt 19:4 //), 2:24 (Matt 19:5 //), 5:2 (Matt 19:5 //); Exodus: 3:6 (Matt 22:32 //), 12:46 (John 19:36), 20:12–16 (Matt 19:18–19), 20:12 (Matt 15:4 //), 20:13 (Matt 5:21), 20:14 (Matt 5:27), 21:17 (Matt 15:4 //), 21:24 (Matt 5:38); Leviticus: 19:12 (Matt 5:33), 19:18 (Matt 5:43, 19:19, 22:39 //), 24:20 (Matt 5:38); Numbers: 30:2 (Matt 5:33); Deuteronomy: 5:16 (Matt 15:4 //), 5:17 (Matt 5:21), 5:18 (Matt 5:27), 6:4–5 (Mark 12:29–30), 6:5 (Matt 22:37 //), 6:13 (Matt 4:10 //), 6:16 (Matt 4:7 //), 8:3 (Matt 4:4 //), 19:15 (Matt 18:16), 19:21 (Matt 5:38), 24:1 (Matt 5:31; 19:7 //); Psalms: 8:3 (Matt 21:16), 22:1 (Matt 27:46 //), 31:5 (Luke 23:46), 35:19 (John 15:25), 41:9 (John 13:18), 69:4 (John 15:25), 69:9 (John 2:17), 78:2 (Matt 13:35), 78:24 (John 6:31), 82:6 (John 10:34), 91:11–12 (Matt 4:6 //), 110:1 (Matt 22:44 //, 26:64 //), 118:22–23 (Matt 21:42 //), 118:25–26 (Matt 21:9 //, 23:39 //); Isaiah: 6:9–10 (Matt 13:14–15 //, John 12:40), 29:13 (Matt 15:8–9 //), 53:12 (Luke 22:37), 54:13 (John 6:45), 56:7 (Matt 21:13 //), 61:1–2 (Matt 11:5 //, Luke 4:18–19); Daniel: 7:13 (Matt 24:30 //, 26:64 //); Hosea: 6:6 (Matt 9:13; 12:7), 10:8 (Luke 23:30); Jonah: 1:17 (Matt 12:40); Micah: 7:6 (Matt 10:35–66); Zechariah: 13:7 (Matt 26:31 //); Malachi: 3:1 (Matt 11:10 //).

<sup>2</sup> E.g. references to biblical characters such as Abel, Abraham, Noah, Lot, Moses, David, Solomon, Elijah, Elisha, Isaiah, Daniel, Jonah.

<sup>3</sup> C. A. Kimball, Jesus' Exposition of the Old Testament in Luke's Gospel, JSNTSup 94 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1994), 43–44.

<sup>4</sup> R. W. Funk, R. W. Hoover and the Jesus Seminar, The Five Gospels: The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus (New York: Polebridge Press, 1993), 98.

Jesus in the gospels are quoted elsewhere in the New Testament, suggesting that far too much weight has been placed on this argument.<sup>5</sup> As Meier says, “Jesus would have been a very strange Jewish teacher in 1st-century Palestine if he had never quoted, commented on, or argued about the meaning of the Jewish Scriptures.”<sup>6</sup>

Having said that, we should not disguise the fact that formidable difficulties stand in the way of reconstructing how Jesus used scripture. For a start, the gospels are written in Greek, whereas Jesus’ quotations and allusions would have been in Aramaic or Hebrew.<sup>7</sup> This makes it very difficult to determine whether agreements or disagreements with known manuscripts are evidence for how Jesus used scripture or the translating and editing processes that led to the written gospels (or the transmission of the LXX). Not surprisingly, the majority of studies in this field have been redactional studies of how the gospel writers used scripture.<sup>8</sup>

Second, though the early church may have preserved the memory that Jesus used particular texts, differences between the gospels show

---

<sup>5</sup> Gen 2:24 (1 Cor 6:16; Eph 5:31), Exod 3:6 (Acts 3:13), Lev 19:18 (Rom 13:9; Jas 2:8), Deut 19:15 (2 Cor 13:1), Ps 69:9 (Rom 15:3—but not the same phrase), Ps 110:1 (Acts 2:34–35; Heb 1:13), Ps 118:22 (Acts 4:11; 1 Pet 2:7) and the second table of the Decalogue (Exod 20:12–16/Deut 5:16–20). The list would be much greater if we included allusions (e.g. the combination of Dan 7:13 and Zech 13:7 in Rev 1:7) but then so would the list of Jesus’ references. One might also add that the New Testament use of the Decalogue is hardly an argument against Jesus’ use of it (and perhaps also the command to love one’s neighbour).

<sup>6</sup> J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew, II: Mentor, Message, and Miracles (New York: Doubleday, 1994), 141. For this reason, while we regard the primary criteria for authenticity as (1) Plausibility in a first-century Jewish context; and (2) Dissimilarity with later church usage, we agree with Wright and others that the second criteria can include traditions that are not identical with later church usage but offer a plausible explanation for their development. See N. T. Wright, Christian Origins and the Question of God, 2: Jesus and the Victory of God (London: SPCK, 1996), 125–144; G. Theissen and D. Winter, The Quest for the Plausible Jesus. The Question of Criteria, trans. M. E. Boring (Louisville/London: John Knox Press, 2002).

<sup>7</sup> It is quite possible that a τέκτων like Jesus had a working knowledge of Greek and S. E. Porter argues that Jesus probably used it when conversing with Pilate, the centurion and the Syrophenician woman. However, despite a sustained attempt to use this to develop new criteria for authenticity, only two Old Testament texts appear in the index of the book (Lev 16:12–21; Ps 22:1). Jesus may have used some Greek in conversation but it is unlikely that he based his teaching on the LXX. See S. E. Porter, The Criteria for Authenticity in Historical-Jesus Research: Previous Discussion and New Proposals, JSNTSup 191 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000).

<sup>8</sup> E.g., M. J. J. Menken, Matthew’s Bible: The Old Testament Text of the Evangelist, BETL 173 (Leuven: Leuven University Press/Peeters, 2004); R. Beaton, Isaiah’s Christ in Matthew’s Gospel, SNTSMS 123 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002).

that they have not always preserved the context in which the words were spoken.<sup>9</sup> Sometimes we might be able to offer a plausible reconstruction of the context and make deductions based on that. But on other occasions, we simply have to admit our ignorance. In these cases, it will be difficult to say much more than that Jesus wished to make some sort of point using this particular text.

Third, though we do not accept the argument that quotations and allusions are necessarily secondary if they are also used by the early church, there is nevertheless evidence that the evangelists (or their sources) were sometimes willing to place quotations on the lips of Jesus. For example, very few scholars would defend the authenticity of the scriptural exchange between Jesus and the devil in Matt 4:1–11/Luke 4:1–13 (absent from Mark). Though it can never be a hard and fast rule, quotations and allusions that seem more at home in the life of the early church than in the life of Jesus are rightly regarded as less probable (though not impossible).

It is important to clarify the implication of these three points. Vermes analyzes forty-one examples of Jesus' use of scripture and concludes that the "Old Testament did not play an important role in the preaching of Jesus."<sup>10</sup> But if the tradition is as unreliable as that, it would be safer to conclude that Jesus probably did use scripture, since most of his contemporaries did, but that our sources do not allow us to say very much more than that. In other words, if the sources are so poor, why opt for a reconstruction that makes Jesus such a singular figure? As Allison asks, "What Jewish teachers do we know of who did not feel constrained to relate their words continually to the Tanak?"<sup>11</sup> If the gospels were silent on this matter, it is likely that we would hypothesize that a Jewish teacher like Jesus probably did use scripture, but the Gentile-dominated church which followed had little interest in it. It is surely a methodological error to think that this view is somehow weakened because the gospels do in fact present Jesus as an interpreter of scripture.

---

<sup>9</sup> A good example is the double command to love God and neighbour. If we only had Mark's account (12:28–34), we might conclude that this was an original and creative use of scripture by Jesus. But according to Luke's account (10:25–37), it is the lawyer who cites the double command, suggesting perhaps that it was a commonplace.

<sup>10</sup> G. Vermes, The Authentic Gospel of Jesus (London: Penguin Books, 2003), 212.

<sup>11</sup> D. C. Allison, The Intertextual Jesus: Studies in Q (Harrisburg: Trinity Press International, 2000), 213.

We will proceed cautiously by looking at a selection of texts where a case for authenticity has been argued. For reasons of space, we will confine our examples to Jesus' use of the Law (section 2) and Jesus' use of the Prophets (section 3). Our guiding principle is that a Jewish teacher like Jesus is likely to have related his teaching to scripture, but whether there is enough evidence to say how he used it remains to be seen. We begin then with Jesus' use of the Law.

2. Jesus and the Law

2.1. Divorce

That Jesus discussed and commented on texts concerning marriage and divorce is accepted by most scholars.<sup>12</sup> The traditions have come down to us in three forms: (1) A wisdom saying that forbids divorce in Matt 5:31–32 (except for adultery), Luke 16:18, and in a different context, Mark 10:11–12; (2) A pronouncement story in Mark 10:2–9/ Matt 19:3–9 which has Jesus contrasting God's intention for marriage (Gen 1:27/2:24) with Deut 24:1–4, a text which permits divorce; and (3) Paul's instructions in 1 Cor 7:10–16 that seek to apply (some would say circumvent) the tradition to Christians married to unbelieving spouses. Some scholars think the wisdom saying has been constructed by Matthew on the basis of the pronouncement story, since the so-called exception clause (παρεκτός λόγου πορνείας/μὴ ἐπὶ πορνείᾳ), generally thought to be later redaction, appears in both.<sup>13</sup> Holmén accepts the point but does not consider it fatal to reconstructing a Q text that lacked the exception clause and is close to what we now find in Luke 16:18.<sup>14</sup> Given the evident difficulties of applying the absolute prohibition in the early church, it is “virtually certain that the historical Jesus actually held this position.”<sup>15</sup>

<sup>12</sup> E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985), 256–260; Vermes, The Authentic Gospel of Jesus, 180–181; T. Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking (Leiden: Brill, 2001), 162–169; J. D. G. Dunn, Christianity in the Making, 1: Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003), 577.

<sup>13</sup> U. Luz, Matthew 1–7: A Commentary (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1990), 269; D. A. Hagner, Matthew 1–13, WBC33A (Dallas: Word Books, 1993), 122–123.

<sup>14</sup> Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, 164–166.

<sup>15</sup> H. D. Betz, The Sermon on the Mount (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1995), 251–252. It would appear to be John the Baptist's position also (Mark 6:18), though Betz's claim that this is why Jesus “preferred to stay unmarried” (252) is speculative.

It would appear that marriage and divorce were keenly debated in the Second Temple period, and in rabbinic literature, an entire tractate is devoted to it (Gittin). This is not surprising, as scripture appears to contain an ambiguity on the subject. On the one hand, the creation stories envisage a permanent bond between the couple (“and they become one flesh”) and adultery (נִאֵף/μοιχεύω) is expressly forbidden in the seventh commandment (Exod 20:14). On the other hand, while not addressing the question of divorce in general, Deut 24:1–4 implies that a man may divorce his wife if he finds in her something objectionable (דָּבָר / ἄσχημον πρᾶγμα). The meaning of this phrase was debated by the schools of Shammai and Hillel. Shammai emphasized ערוה and only allowed divorce for some “shameful” behaviour. Hillel, however, stressed the word דָּבָר and famously concluded that this could be for something as trivial as spoiling the dinner (m. Git. 9:10). Josephus appears to support this position when he paraphrases Deut 24:1 with the words, “He who desires to be divorced from the wife who is living with him for whatsoever cause—and with mortals many such may arise—must certify in writing that he will have no further intercourse with her” (Ant. 5.253).

The evidence from Qumran is disputed. Divorce is accepted in CD XIII, 17 and 11QT XLIV, 4–5 without comment but CD IV, 20–V, 2 accuses the “builders of the wall” of unchastity (זנות) because “they take two wives in their lives (בחייהם), while the foundation of creation is male and female he created them.” The suffix on “lives” is masculine, which, according to Westerholm, “suggests that the sectarians were opposed to any second marriage for a man, whether the first had been terminated by death or divorce.”<sup>16</sup> However, Brewer has argued that this text is primarily about polygamy (not having two wives simultaneously) and does not contradict the permissive view found elsewhere in the scrolls. We know of no Jewish group, he says, which forbade divorce on any grounds.<sup>17</sup>

Neither is it absolutely clear that Jesus forbade divorce on any grounds. Though the majority of commentators hold that Matthew’s <sup>16</sup> S. Westerholm, Jesus and Scribal Authority, ConBNT 7 (Lund: Gleerup, 1978), 116. So also W. R. G. Loader, Jesus’ Attitude to the Law (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002 [1997]), 89; Betz, Sermon on the Mount, 252. 11QT LVII, 17–19 (“And he shall not take in addition to her another wife, for she alone shall be with him all the days of her life”) is also quoted in support of this position.

<sup>17</sup> D. I. Brewer, “Jesus’ Old Testament Basis for Monogamy,” in The Old Testament in the New Testament. Essays in Honour of J. L. North, ed. S. Moyise, JSNTSup 189 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), 75–105.

“exception” clauses are redactional, they might well be a correct interpretation of Jesus’ words. Within his Jewish milieu, it was assumed that adultery led to divorce; the debate was about the level of seriousness required in more mundane causes (like spoiling the dinner). Jesus takes a rigorous stance and in the light of CD IV, 20–V, 2, it is probably correct that he had the Genesis story in mind,<sup>18</sup> even if the tradition has been elaborated.<sup>19</sup> Sanders suggests this might reflect Jesus’ eschatological outlook, but Vermes is more definite:

The immediacy of the Kingdom of God made for Jesus and his followers the restoration of the paradisiacal conditions of matrimonial morality (indissoluble marriage of one man and one woman) an absolute imperative.<sup>20</sup>

More controversial is whether Jesus actually commented on Deut 24:1–4 and if so, to what effect? Becker thinks it comes from the early church, reflecting “church rules on marriage” rather than Jesus’ uncompromising stance based on his own authority.<sup>21</sup> However, it is not clear that a Sitz im Leben in the early church is more persuasive than one in Jesus’ time. When Paul accepts that separation might be the only option if an unbelieving spouse insists on it (1 Cor 7:15), there is no hint that Deuteronomy 24 has figured in the discussion. Neither is it easy to imagine why the early church would insert it, since it plays no role in Christian debates. While acknowledging that the tradition does not come from Jesus “word for word,” Betz thinks it “may truthfully reflect his concerns and his methods regarding the Jewish Torah,”<sup>22</sup> namely, an interpretation rather than a rejection of the Law:

The true meaning of the famous passage Deut 24:1–4 is the curbing of divorce as a social instrument that produces injustice in the form of adultery, which is prohibited by the Decalogue... Divorce can be allowed only if defilement already exists through “sexual immorality” (πορνεία); divorce cannot be allowed if it will produce adultery.<sup>23</sup>

Holmén agrees that “Jesus probably did not intend his words to contradict, oppose or be directed against the law” but adds that “Jesus’ prohibition on divorce cannot be taken as merely interpreting the

<sup>18</sup> So Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 257.

<sup>19</sup> Mark’s quotation agrees with the LXX in reading the numeral “two” (“the two shall become one flesh”) and goes on to emphasize it (“So they are no longer two, but one flesh”). The numeral is lacking in the Hebrew text.

<sup>20</sup> Vermes, The Authentic Gospel of Jesus, 56.

<sup>21</sup> J. C. Becker, Jesus of Nazareth (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1998), 292.

<sup>22</sup> Betz, Sermon on the Mount, 212.

<sup>23</sup> Ibid., 258.

law... On the contrary, the prohibition dissolves any attempt to speculate about sufficient cause for divorce.”<sup>24</sup> Powery goes further and even speaks of Jesus “correcting” the tradition. He also thinks this offers a good example of Jesus’ hermeneutical method, though we will have cause to question this later in our study:

By the use of this wider narrative or script, Jesus levels the Mosaic law to a post-creation period for “hardened” humanity. That is, it is not the ideal. Jesus’ scriptural choice serves as a corrective. This interpretative tension (script against scripture) sets up elements in a hermeneutical (preferential) system: (1) God’s act over Moses’ commands; (2) the creation period as the ideal; and (3) historical narrative balances law.<sup>25</sup>

2.2. Oaths

Though the swearing of oaths played an important role in the Law, both by people<sup>26</sup> and by God,<sup>27</sup> the consequences of failing to keep an oath led in one of two directions: (1) A growing reluctance to swear oaths, as in Sir 23:11: “The one who swears many oaths is full of iniquity, and the scourge will not leave his house”; or (2) A multiplicity of circumlocutions so as to avoid directly mentioning the name of God (“heaven,” “heaven and earth,” “the almighty,” “the temple,” “the altar,” “the covenant,” “the Torah,” “Moses”). Interestingly, the Jesus tradition preserves sayings relevant to each of these.

Matt 5:33–37

Again, you have heard that it was said to those of ancient times, “You shall not swear falsely, but carry out the vows you have made to the Lord.” But I say to you, Do not swear at all, either by heaven, for it is the throne of God, or by the earth, for it is his footstool, or by Jerusalem, for it is the city of the great King. And do not swear by your head, for you

Matt 23:16–22

Woe to you, blind guides, who say, “Whoever swears by the sanctuary is bound by nothing, but whoever swears by the gold of the sanctuary is bound by the oath.” You blind fools! For which is greater, the gold or the sanctuary that has made the gold sacred...?

James 5:12

Above all, my beloved, do not swear, either by heaven or by earth or by any

<sup>24</sup> Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, 168–169.

<sup>25</sup> E. B. Powery, Jesus Reads Scripture. The Function of Jesus’ Use of Scripture in the Synoptic Gospels (Leiden: Brill, 2003), 52.

<sup>26</sup> Exod 22:11; Num 5:19, 21; 30:2, 10, 13.

<sup>27</sup> Deut 6:23; 7:8; 8:1; 9:5; 29:12, 15, 19; 31:20, 21.

cannot make one hair white or black. Let your word be “Yes, Yes” or “No, No” (ἔστω δὲ ὁ λόγος ὑμῶν ναὶ ναὶ οὐ οὐ); anything more than this comes from the evil one.

other oath, but let your “Yes” be yes and your “No” be no (ἦτω δὲ ὑμῶν τὸ ναὶ ναὶ καὶ τὸ οὐ οὐ) so that you may not fall under condemnation.

The tradition that Jesus prohibited the swearing of oaths is preserved in Matthew’s fourth antithesis and in the epistle of James. Most scholars consider James to be the more original form, though some have argued that it might stem from a genuine antithesis.<sup>28</sup> It does not seem likely that literary dependence between Matthew and James explains the parallel and an absolute prohibition of oaths appears contrary to the practices of the early church (Rom 9:1; 2 Cor 11:10, 31; Gal 1:20). Thus there is a case for regarding such a prohibition as going back to Jesus, if not the antithesis.<sup>29</sup> What then are we to make of Matt 23:16–22, where Jesus challenges scribal law concerning which oaths are permanently valid and which may be broken? Since this “woe” is not present in Luke’s collection (11:42–52), the obvious answer is that it is Matthean redaction aimed at presenting Jesus as an expert in halakha. On the other hand, it could be that on occasion, Jesus was content to demonstrate the faulty reasoning behind such scribal exegesis, without prohibiting oaths altogether.

Loader understands the prohibition as condemning the manipulative use of oaths; one should not take an oath “made on the basis of a surety that, in fact, God provides, and not the swearer.”<sup>30</sup> Holmén reaches a more radical conclusion: “The total prohibition on oaths ascribed to Jesus—very much unlike Old Testament and contemporary Jewish criticism of swearing falsely or loosely—implies criticism of the law itself.”<sup>31</sup> He sees this as very similar to the prohibition on divorce. On the other hand, Crossley points out that Philo regarded the “abstinence from oaths” (ἀνώμοστον) as one of the ways the Essenes demonstrated their love for God. If Philo did not regard it as a criticism of the Law, it is “very unlikely that anyone would have perceived the Matthean Jesus to be speaking against biblical commandments in

<sup>28</sup> K. H. Tan, The Zion Traditions and the Aims of Jesus, SNTSMS 91 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997), 86–96.

<sup>29</sup> Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, 176–187.

<sup>30</sup> Loader, Jesus’ Attitude to the Law, 177.

<sup>31</sup> Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, 180.

Mt. 5:33–37.”<sup>32</sup> There is clearly no consensus on whether Jesus’ radical interpretations of the Law passes over into its “correction” or even its “rejection.”

2.3. Love of Enemies/Neighbour

The command to “love your enemies” (Matt 5:44; Luke 6:27, 35) is universally recognized as authentic (printed red by the Jesus Seminar) and at the heart of Jesus’ teaching. It is not itself a quotation from scripture but is almost certainly linked to Lev 19:18 (“love your neighbour”) in some way or other. This is made explicit in Matthew’s version, where Jesus says: “You have heard that it was said, ‘You shall love your neighbour and hate your enemy.’ But I say to you, Love your enemies and pray for those who persecute you” (Matt 5:43–45). While this is most likely Matthew’s own formulation, a number of scholars have argued that the Q text from which it is drawn (Q 6:27–38) is dependent on Leviticus 19. Allison, for example, notes the following parallels:<sup>33</sup>

Leviticus 19	Q 6:27–38
be holy because God is holy	be merciful because God is merciful command to judge one’s neighbour	command not to judge others
the golden rule (negative form)	the golden rule (positive form)
love your neighbour	love your enemy
maintain good fraternal relations	it is not enough to do good to “brothers”

If most of Q 6:27–38 goes back to Jesus, as Allison believes, then this appears to be a deliberate interpretation of scripture, not least in the omission of the command to love one’s neighbour. Both Leviticus 19 and Q 6:27–38 are concerned with “vengeance, love, and judging others,”<sup>34</sup> but Jesus emphasises that “neighbour” should not be limited to one’s own people. And neither should the pursuit of holiness lead to a lack of mercy.<sup>35</sup> This is of course illustrated by Luke when he later includes the parable of the Good Samaritan (almost certainly authentic), which focuses on the question, “And who is my neighbour?” (Luke 10:29). For Allison, this as an example of Jesus’ “ironic” use of scripture, designed to provoke and unsettle.<sup>36</sup>

<sup>32</sup> J. G. Crossley, The Date of Mark’s Gospel: Insight from the Law in Earliest Christianity, JSNTSup 266 (London: T&T Clark International, 2004), 102.

<sup>33</sup> Allison, The Intertextual Jesus, 33 (wording slightly adjusted). The golden rule is not found in the Hebrew text of Leviticus 19 but is present in the Targum (“You will love your neighbour, so that what is hateful to you, you will not do to him”).

<sup>34</sup> Allison, The Intertextual Jesus, 29.

If Allison is correct, it would appear that Matthew wishes to avoid the implication that Jesus criticized Lev 19:18 by focusing the criticism on the gloss (“and hate your enemies”). He may also have been concerned that the tradition preserves a story where Jesus specifically upholds this commandment, in conjunction with Deut 6:4:

Matt 22:34–40

When the Pharisees heard that he had silenced the Sadducees, they gathered together, and one of them, a lawyer, asked him a question to test him. “Teacher, which commandment in the law is the greatest?”

He said to him, ‘You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind.’ This is the greatest and first commandment.

And a second is like it: “‘You shall love your neighbour as yourself.’

On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets.

Mark 12:28–32

One of the scribes came near and heard them disputing with one another, and seeing that he answered them well, he asked him, “Which commandment is the first of all?”

Jesus answered, “The first is ‘Hear, O Israel: the Lord our God, the Lord is one; you shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind, and with all your strength.’

The second is this, ‘You shall love your neighbour as yourself.’

There is no other commandment greater than these.” Then the scribe said to him, “You are right, Teacher . . .

Luke 10:25–37

Just then a lawyer stood up to test Jesus. “Teacher,” he said, “what must I do to inherit eternal life?” He said to him, “What is written in the law? What do you read there?” He answered,

“You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your strength, and with all your mind; and your neighbour as yourself.”

And he said to him, “You have given the right answer; do this, and you will live.” But wanting to justify him-

<sup>35</sup> The deliberate replacement of “holiness” in Lev 19:2 by “mercy” is important for Borg’s reconstruction of Jesus’ alternative holiness paradigm. See M. J. Borg, Conflict, Holiness and Politics in the Teachings of Jesus (Harrisburg: Trinity Press International, 1998 [1984]), 135–155.

<sup>36</sup> Allison, The Intertextual Jesus, 220. He also sees the divorce saying (Q 16:18) and the requirement for disciples to hate mother and father (Q 14:26) as evidence of an “ironic” use of scripture.

“to love one’s neighbour as oneself,”—this is much more important than all whole burnt offerings and sacrifices.”	self, he asked Jesus, “And who is my neighbor?” Jesus replied, “A man was going down from Jerusalem to Jericho...
--	--

There is nothing intrinsically unlikely about Jesus combining these key texts, but the very different settings make it difficult to say very much more than this. Indeed, in Luke’s account, it is not Jesus that links the two texts but the lawyer, perhaps suggesting that the link was something of a commonplace.<sup>37</sup> Matthew and Mark clearly draw different conclusions from the episode (foundation of all the law and prophets/more important than sacrificial laws) and Luke follows it with the parable of the Good Samaritan. This would appear to be an example of what was set out in the introduction: Jesus probably did cite the two texts but the traditions that have come down to us do not allow us to say anything more definite.

2.4. Food Laws

Though the Jesus tradition does not include any explicit quotations concerning the food laws, many scholars have taken the aside in Mark 7:19 (“Thus he declared all foods clean”) as correctly deducing the implication of the inside/outside aphorism.<sup>38</sup> The aphorism (“there is nothing outside a person that by going in can defile, but the things that come out are what defile”) is found in Mark 7:15, Matt 15:11 and also Gos. Thom. 14, where it supports the missionary advice to “eat that which they will set before you.” Matthew and Luke also have a further (obscure) saying which urges the Pharisees to focus on cleaning the “inside of the cup, so that the outside also may become clean” (Matt 23:25–26/Luke 11:39–41). Bryan acknowledges that Jesus himself observed the purity laws and even urged others to do the same (Mark <sup>37</sup> Though it is rare in extant texts. It occurs in T. Iss. 5.2 (“love the Lord and your neighbour”) and T. Dan. 5.3 (“love the Lord and one another with a true heart”), but these might be Christian interpolations.

<sup>38</sup> Funk (The Five Gospels, 69): “The aphorism—it’s not what goes in but what comes out that defiles—is a categorical challenge to the laws governing pollution and purity”; Wright (Jesus and the Victory of God, 398): “the traditions which attempted to bolster Israel’s national identity were out of date and out of line”; Becker (Jesus of Nazareth, 291): “An examination of Jesus’ total proclamation makes clear that he consistently intensifies social norms, while he shows little or no interest in cultic norms” (291).

1:44) but thinks that Jesus is claiming that “bodily impurity posed no threat to holiness,” a stance that inevitably led to their role being “drastically attenuated.”<sup>39</sup>

On the other hand, had Jesus taken such a stance on the food laws, it is difficult to see why it was such an issue for the early church (Acts 10:14; 15:29; Gal 2:12).<sup>40</sup> As Sanders notes, the debate in Mark 7 begins with a question about hand-washing, not food laws. He thinks the connection in 7:14 (“Then he called the crowd again and said”) is so obviously artificial that the teaching that follows clearly reflects the needs of Mark’s Gentile readers.<sup>41</sup> Crossley takes this further and argues that not only did Jesus uphold the food laws, so also does Mark. He takes the opening debate on hand-washing as the key to the whole episode, which concerns “the expansion of Jewish law where it was believed that impurity passed from hands to food to eater via liquid.”<sup>42</sup> Mark understands Jesus to be denying this and so concludes that “he declared all foods clean,” meaning that food is not contaminated in this way. Since Mark’s readers have already heard Jesus say to the Pharisees, “You abandon the commandments of God and hold to human tradition,” they would hardly have deduced from Mark’s aside that Jesus was nullifying the food laws. He was simply stating that those foods that the Law recognizes as clean are not defiled through hand-washing, contrary to recent halakha.

2.5. Resurrection

Jesus said to them, “Is not this the reason you are wrong, that you know neither the scriptures nor the power of God? For when they rise from the dead, they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are like angels in

---

<sup>39</sup> Steven W. Bryan, Jesus and Israel’s Traditions of Judgement and Restoration, SNTSMS 117 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002), 167. He adds: “Concerns about bodily uncleanness could scarcely remain central when the impurity which gave bodily uncleanness its significance had already so penetrated the life of the nation as to make its judgement certain” (188).

<sup>40</sup> “This great fact, which overrides all others, sets a definite limit to what can be said about Jesus and the law” (Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 268). Becker represents a minority view when he says, “our safest assumption is still that the position of the Hellenists around Stephen, of the pillars at the Council, and of Peter in Antioch, who soon after the so-called lapse in Antioch obviously reverts to his Gentile-Christian orientation, is based on the authority of Jesus” (Jesus of Nazareth, 305).

<sup>41</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 266.

<sup>42</sup> Crossley, The Date of Mark’s Gospel, 204. See also T. Kazen, Jesus and Purity Halakhah: Was Jesus Indifferent to Impurity? ConBNT 38 (Stockholm: Almqvist and Wiksell, 2002), 228–231.

heaven. And as for the dead being raised, have you not read in the book of Moses, in the story about the bush, how God said to him, 'I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob'? He is God not of the dead, but of the living; you are quite wrong." (Mark 12:24–26)

The rabbinical style of argument, whereby a general truth is inferred from a particular verse, has been used as an argument both for the authenticity<sup>43</sup> of this episode and against it.<sup>44</sup> I am inclined to accept the argument of Chilton and Evans that had the exchange belonged to later debates between Christians and Pharisees, one would have expected a more specific reference to Jesus' resurrection. As it stands, Jesus upholds the Pharisaic doctrine of resurrection by quoting from the Law, hardly a polemical point against the Pharisees. It might also be significant that Jesus constructs his proof from the Law, rather than making use of more obvious texts such as Dan 12:2, because the Sadducees would not have recognized the authority of Daniel. Meier cites the idiosyncratic use of Exod 3:6 as evidence for authenticity, a view accepted by Dunn.<sup>45</sup>

Powery thinks this is a critical passage for understanding Jesus' use of scripture as presented by Mark. It is not a literal or historical interpretation of Exod 3:15 but one that stems from a specific theological conviction. According to Jesus, the error of the Sadducees is their faulty theology. Jesus corrects this ("God is not a God of the dead but of the living") and then accommodates the text accordingly.<sup>46</sup> Schüssler Fiorenza makes a different point. The Sadducees not only have a faulty theology of resurrection, they also have a faulty patriarchal understanding of marriage ("whose wife will she be?"). Jesus challenges this with his view of the afterlife, where "they neither marry nor are given in marriage."<sup>47</sup> On the other hand, we should guard against the implication that a theological disposition is taking precedence over scripture. There is no suggestion that the theological disposition (or the power

---

<sup>43</sup> B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, "Jesus and Israel's Scripture," in Studying the Historical Jesus, ed. Chilton and Evans (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 290–291.

<sup>44</sup> Vermes, The Authentic Gospel of Jesus, 188.

<sup>45</sup> J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew, III: Companions and Competitors (New York: Doubleday, 2001), 431–444; Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 426 n. 234.

<sup>46</sup> Powery, Jesus Reads Scripture, 69. The categories are from J. A. Fitzmyer, "The Use of Explicit Old Testament Quotations in Qumran Literature and in the New Testament," NTS 7 (1960–61): 297–333.

<sup>47</sup> E. Schüssler Fiorenza, In Memory of Her: A Feminist Theological Reconstruction of Christian Origins, rev. ed. (London: SCM, 1994), 143–145.

of God) is something other than what scripture teaches. Meier summarizes the logic of the argument thus:

1. Major Premise: According to God's self-chosen definition, the very being of God involves being the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. This is his permanent self-definition.
2. Minor Premise: But, as the whole of the OT proclaims, God is God only of the living, not the defiling, unclean dead, with whom he has no relation.
3. Unspoken Conclusion: Therefore, if God's being is truly defined by his permanent relationship to the three patriarchs, the three patriarchs must be (now or in the future) living and in living relationship to God.<sup>48</sup>

2.6. Summary

Though the saying recorded in Mark 7:9 ("You have a fine way of rejecting the commandment of God in order to keep your tradition!") was probably crafted by Mark, most scholars agree that it accurately represents Jesus' position. Whether Jesus offered a theological interpretation of the Law, a rigorous application of it or simply its true (divine) intent, it seems clear that he used his interpretations to challenge a number of contemporary halakha. The point of debate concerns the implications of this for the ongoing validity of the Law.

At one end of the spectrum, Crossley argues that there are no implications for relativizing the Law, and readings of Mark's Gospel which assume this are mistaken. Jesus upheld the Law in word and deed and only ever criticized halakha, which he viewed as extending the Law beyond its original intent. At the other end of the spectrum, Becker asserts that "in post-Maccabean Judaism prior to Jesus one can think of no comparable example of such a critical attitude toward the Law."<sup>49</sup> He adds that "Jesus does not require his disciples and hearers to study and obey the Law" and that he taught "a life that is independent of the Torah and whose authority comes from the Kingdom of God alone."<sup>50</sup> These are extraordinary statements and are soon qualified when discussing particular texts. For example, he says that Jesus' teaching on divorce "is for Jewish ears an intolerably negative judgment," but then adds that “Jesus’ statement is similar to the marriage laws of the Essenes.”<sup>51</sup> Thus there is at least one community of Jewish ears for which it was not an “intolerably negative judgment.” In terms of oaths, Becker acknowledges that “refusing to do something that the Torah permits is not a violation of the Torah,”<sup>52</sup> and in terms of food laws, he makes it clear that Jesus would not have agreed with Paul that “nothing is unclean in itself” (Rom 14:14).

<sup>48</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew, III: Companions and Competitors, 429–430.

<sup>49</sup> Becker, Jesus of Nazareth, 281–282.

<sup>50</sup> Ibid., 284.

Holmén offers an innovative approach, which he calls “covenant path searching,” i.e. the practical matters by which Jews of all persuasions demonstrated their covenant loyalty. This offers a more nuanced approach to whether Jesus upheld the Law or not. In a certain formal sense, nothing Jesus said is contrary to the Law (forbidding what is permitted is not a contradiction). But this is a blunt tool which fails to distinguish Jesus’ teaching from countless future rabbis who discuss and debate halakha. According to Holmén, in a rather conspicuous way, Jesus does not attempt to demonstrate covenant loyalty but sits rather loosely to it.

One of the reasons that Jesus does not go out of his way to demonstrate covenant loyalty is thought to be his eschatological outlook. Thus Vermes understands the debates about divorce as reflecting an eschatology whereby the conditions of paradise would return. Bryan’s view that the purity laws are relativized is based on his understanding that Jesus judges the Jerusalem Temple for not fulfilling the conditions of the eschatological Temple.<sup>53</sup> And Allison ends his study by stating that “Jesus reformulated and in some cases we might say even deformed tradition in order to convey his urgent message.”<sup>54</sup> That message was of a “millenarian prophet who longed for the fulfillment of Jewish eschatological expectations and so necessarily looked for the fulfillment of the scriptural texts that grounded those expectations.”<sup>55</sup>

Lastly, we have seen some evidence of Jesus’ use of contemporary exegetical methods. The juxtaposition and mutual interpretation of texts (Genesis and Deuteronomy) resembles the second of Hillel’s rules, while the deduction of a general principle (resurrection) from a

---

<sup>51</sup> Becker, Jesus of Nazareth, 292.

<sup>52</sup> Ibid., 296.

<sup>53</sup> Leading to an interesting explanation of the cursing of the fig tree. Jesus expected to find figs out of season because in the eschatological age, there would be fruitfulness all year round (Bryan, Jesus and Israel’s Traditions, 224).

<sup>54</sup> Allison, The Intertextual Jesus, 222.

<sup>55</sup> Ibid., 216.

particular text (“I am the God of Abraham”) is a good example of the third rule. Chilton and Evans also regard the summarizing of particular commandments in the greatest commandment(s) as an example of the fifth rule, though the authenticity of this episode is debated. There is no suggestion that Jesus “applied” these rules in a mechanical way, but they do situate Jesus within the broad spectrum of Jewish exegetical debate.

3. Jesus and Prophetic Traditions

3.1. Vineyard Parables

In his chapter on “Jesus and the Scriptures of Israel,” Bryan focuses his study on the vineyard parables, since they almost certainly go back to Jesus in some form or other.<sup>56</sup> It is also widely held that to a first-century Jewish audience, any story about a vineyard not producing fruit would automatically suggest the allegory of Isaiah 5.<sup>57</sup> This is not negated by the observation that the parable of the tenants (Matt 21:33–46; Mark 12:1–12; Luke 20:9–19) has clearly been elaborated to make such links more explicit. Even if the less allegorical version in Gos. Thom. 65 is closer to what Jesus actually said (which is by no means certain), we still have a story where a landowner plants a vineyard, intends to collect its fruit, sends a servant who is abused, and then sends his son, who is killed. This is sufficient to show that Jesus both appropriated the vineyard allegory and introduced new elements (the emissaries) which took it in new directions.

In the parable of the barren fig tree (Luke 13:6–9), a story is told about a landowner who returns to his vineyard three times in the hope of finding fruit from a particular fig tree, but finds none. He thus tells the vinekeeper (ἀμπελουργός) to destroy the offending fig tree. The vinekeeper responds by urging one last attempt to make it fruitful. The repeated visits by the landowner and the plea by the vinekeeper echo

<sup>56</sup> According to the Jesus Seminar, the parable of the workers (Matt 20:1–16) is in red; the barren fig tree (Luke 13:6–9) and the version of the parable of the tenants in Gos. Thom. 65 are in pink; the parable of the two sons (Matt 21:28–32) is in grey, though we are told that 58% of the Fellows voted red or pink.

<sup>57</sup> Bryan, Jesus and Israel's Traditions, 46–49; Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 722; W. J. C. Weren, “The Use of Isaiah 5,1–7 in the Parable of the Tenants (Mark 12,1–12; Matthew 21,33–46),” Bib 79 (1998): 1–26; Chilton and Evans, “Jesus and Israel's Scriptures,” 304–306. The Jesus Seminar take a contrary view.

the pathos of Isa 5:4 (“What more was there to do for my vineyard that I have not done in it? When I expected it to yield grapes, why did it yield wild grapes?”). The novel element in Jesus’ parable is the introduction of the fig tree, an image often used for Israel’s fruitfulness (blessing) or barrenness (curse).<sup>58</sup> Some regard this as an insuperable difficulty for linking the parable with Isaiah 5,<sup>59</sup> but this is only true if we insist that Jesus must have used the same decoding in all of his parables. As we have seen with the parable of the tenants (even from Gospel of Thomas), Jesus can both appropriate a tradition and add new elements to it (the emissaries). According to Bryan, the reason why Jesus introduces the fig tree is because it concentrates the divine judgment in one single act. Isaiah 5 describes the destruction of the vineyard in a series of actions: hedge removed; wall broken; trampled underfoot; laid waste; unpruned; overgrown; parched. But cutting down a fig tree is swift and decisive (cf. John the Baptist: “Even now the axe is lying at the root of the trees”). The message is that Israel, now symbolized as a fig tree, is on the verge of being cut off, though it has been given one final chance. In this parable, the fig tree does not stand for something within Israel but Israel itself.<sup>60</sup>

On the other hand, the focus in the parable of the tenants is on the behaviour of the tenants and this is commonly understood as a reference to Israel’s leadership. Furthermore, the sending of a servant and his subsequent abuse is almost certainly a reference to a prophet,<sup>61</sup> which Mark or the tradition before him has made more explicit by speaking of “many” servants, some of whom were killed (Mark 12:5).

---

<sup>58</sup> Funk (Five Gospels, 345) says: “References in both Hebrew scriptures and rabbinic literature to the fruitful fig tree as a sign of blessing and to the barren fig tree as a sign of curse or judgement are numerous.” Strangely, the Seminar is so adamant that scripture was of little importance to Jesus that they conclude that “the parable has been drawn from common lore.”

<sup>59</sup> So K. R. Snodgrass, The Parable of the Wicked Tenants: An Inquiry Into Parable Interpretation, WUNT 27 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1983). For a critique, see G. J. Brooke, “4Q500 1 and the Use of Scripture in the Parable of the Vineyard,” DSD 2 (1995): 268–294.

<sup>60</sup> Bryan, Jesus and Israel’s Traditions, 75, 49. Bryan accepts the location of the parable in Luke and uses this to heighten the sense of impending doom: “It is not the possibility of sudden and unexpected death for some but the prospect of a sudden and impending judgement for all which underscores the urgency of repentance” (75).

<sup>61</sup> “Jerusalem, Jerusalem, the city that kills the prophets and stones those who are sent to it!” (Matt 23:37/Luke 13:34). As Dunn notes, it is hard to imagine the early church inventing a prediction of Jesus’ death that talks about stoning (Jesus Remembered, 792).

But who is the son, mentioned even in the Gospel of Thomas? It is clearly a royal figure, uniquely related to the landowner (God) and able to act on his behalf. Since Jesus was in the habit of addressing God as Father,<sup>62</sup> it seems perverse to deny that Jesus was referring to himself (even if “beloved son” is an embellishment). Indeed, the targum of Ps 118:22 has changed the “rejected stone” to the “boy whom the builders abandoned was among the sons of Jesse and he is worthy to be appointed king and ruler.” If this reading was known in Jesus’ day, then it not only offers a precedent for Jesus introducing a rejected (royal) son into the parable, it also offers an explanation for why Ps 118:22 is quoted at the end of the parable.<sup>63</sup>

All four traditions also state that the son was killed, though only the synoptic accounts speak of the subsequent transfer of the vineyard “to others,” which looks like the hand of the early church. Bryan defends it, noting that Isaiah 27 had already prophesied a restored vineyard which will “fill the whole world with fruit.” Thus it is by no means impossible that Jesus could have depicted “simultaneously both Israel’s destruction (through the fate of the tenants) as well as the preservation of all that it meant to be Israel (through the giving of the vineyard to others).”<sup>64</sup> But even if this has been added by the early church, there remains a story where Jesus tells a parable about Israel that includes a climactic role for himself. Lee says that “when we consider that the parable is told by someone who, in the light of other passages, showed a self-consciousness of being uniquely related to God as his Father and of coming from God, it is entirely legitimate to interpret the christological significance attached to the parable in the whole context of his self-consciousness.”<sup>65</sup> Others will be more reticent in speaking about Jesus’ self-consciousness, but “christological” is not an inappropriate adjective to describe Jesus’ use of scripture here. After all, he

---

<sup>62</sup> The one word printed in red by the Jesus Seminar in the two versions of the Lord’s Prayer (Matt 6:9; Luke 11:2).

<sup>63</sup> Since Ps 118:22 is quoted in the New Testament (Acts 4:11; 1 Pet 2:7), we are rightly cautious about its authenticity but Hebrew word-play (אבן/בן: stone/son), Targumic features (“among the sons of Jesse”) and Qumran parallels (4Q500) have convinced a number of scholars that it derives from Jesus. See C. A. Evans, Jesus and His Contemporaries: Comparative Studies (Leiden: Brill, 1995), 397–406; Brooke, “4Q500 1 and the Use of Scripture in the Parable of the Vineyard,” 268–294.

<sup>64</sup> Bryan, Jesus and Israel’s Traditions, 56.

<sup>65</sup> A. H. I. Lee, From Messiah to Preexistent Son, WUNT 2.192 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2005), 165.

has taken scriptural traditions of vineyard and rejected stone and given himself a role in their fulfilment.

3.2. Targum Isa 6:9–10

The possibility that Jesus new and used (what was to become) the Isaiah Targum has particularly been argued for the quotation of Isa 6:9–10 in Mark 4:12.<sup>66</sup> Unlike the MT and LXX, both Mark and the Targum speak of “forgiving” rather than “healing” and use third person statements (“they may indeed look... and may indeed listen”) rather than imperatives (“keep listening...keep looking”). Manson went on to speculate that the problematic  $\dot{\iota}\nu\alpha$  in Mark (“in order that...they may not turn again and be forgiven”) can then be explained as a mistranslation of the Aramaic relative  $\daleth$  (“that”). However, in the light of Mark 9:12, this explanation is unnecessary<sup>67</sup> and the various differences between Mark and the Targum show that it is more a summarizing allusion than an actual quotation. Whether it was originally linked to the parables is difficult to determine. The problems it has caused for interpretation could count in its favour but the more usual explanation is that Mark or the tradition before him is responsible for the erroneous link with the parables. Perhaps all we can say with confidence is that at some point in his ministry, Jesus compared the lack of responsiveness to his teaching with the commission given to Isaiah.

3.3. The Anointed One Who Brings Good News (Isaiah 61)

According to Luke 4:16–21, Jesus attends a synagogue service, is handed the scroll of Isaiah and reads the passage that we know as Isa 61:1–2. He then returns to his seat and declares, “Today this scripture has been fulfilled in your hearing.” If authentic, this would be a key passage for understanding Jesus’ use of scripture, but there are several reasons for doubting its authenticity: (1) It is clearly based on the “rejection in his home town” story, which occurs much later in Matthew and Mark; (2) The purported reading (Isa 61:1–2) omits a phrase from Isa 61:1 (“to bind up the brokenhearted”), includes a phrase from Isa 58:6 (“to let the oppressed go free”) and agrees with the LXX on reading “recovery of sight to the blind” rather than “release to the prisoners” (MT); (3) The most likely link between Isa 61:1 and Isa 58:6 is the Greek word ἀφέσις (“release”), whereas the Hebrew uses two different words. Though the import of these can be lessened,<sup>68</sup> even Kimball suggests that what we have here is most likely a summary of Jesus’ sermon (not recorded) rather than an actual reading from a scroll.<sup>69</sup>

<sup>66</sup> T. W. Manson, The Teaching of Jesus (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1931); B. Chilton, A Galilean Rabbi and His Bible: Jesus’ Own Interpretation of Isaiah (London: SPCK, 1984); C. A. Evans, To See and Not Perceive: Isaiah 6.9–10 in Early Jewish and Christian Interpretation, JSOTSup 64 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1989). This connection has been strenuously denied by M. D. Goulder, “Those Outside (Mk. 4.10–12),” NovT 33 (1991): 289–302 but see the critique in Chilton and Evans, “Jesus and Israel’s Scriptures,” 300–304.

<sup>67</sup> As Chilton and Evans (“Jesus and Israel’s Scriptures,” 301) note, the  $\dot{\iota}\nu\alpha$  in Mark 9:12 clearly means that the “Scriptures speak to the effect that the son of man should suffer, but surely not with the express intention or purpose of making him suffer.”

Isa 61:3–5

The spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because the Lord has anointed me; he has sent me to bring good news to the oppressed, to bind up the brokenhearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and release to the prisoners (LXX: τυφολοις ἀνάβλεψιν); to proclaim the year of the Lord’s favour, and the day of vengeance of our God; to comfort all who

Luke 4:16–21

“The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he has anointed me to bring good news to the poor. He has sent me to proclaim release to the captives and recovery of sight to the blind (τυφολοις ἀνάβλεψιν), to let the oppressed go free, to proclaim the year of the Lord’s favour.’ And he rolled up the scroll, gave it back to the

Luke 7:22

“Go and tell John what you have seen and heard: the blind receive their sight, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, the poor have good news brought to them.”

Luke 6:20–21

“Blessed are you who are poor, for yours is the kingdom of God. Blessed are you who are hungry now, for you will be filled.

Matt 11:4–5

“Go and tell John what you hear and see: the blind receive their sight, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, and the poor have good news brought to them.”

Matt 5:3–6

Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.” Blessed are those who mourn, for they shall be comforted

<sup>68</sup> For example: (1) it is unlikely that Mark’s “rejection in his home town” is his only source for this incident; (2) the LXX reading (“recovery of sight to the blind”) was known at Qumran; and (3) if Porter is correct that Jesus would have known some Greek, it can hardly be said that Jesus could not have known that both texts use the common word ἀφέσις.

<sup>69</sup> Kimball, Jesus Exposition, 108. This then allows him to make deductions about Jesus’ use of scripture because he thinks we have the remnants of an actual sermon: “Jesus defined his ministry in terms of OT prophecy and fulfillment: he cited Isa. 61.1–2 to claim that he was the herald who proclaimed the messianic release and inserted Isa. 58.6d to emphasize that he was also the agent of this spiritual liberation” (110).

mourn; to provide for those who mourn in Zion—to give them a garland instead of ashes, the oil of gladness instead of mourning, the mantle of praise instead of a faint spirit. They will be called oaks of righteousness... foreigners shall till your land and dress your vines.

attendant, and sat down. The eyes of all in the synagogue were fixed on him. Then he began to say to them, "Today this scripture has been fulfilled in your hearing."

Blessed are you who weep now, for you will laugh."

Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the land.

Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, for they shall be satisfied."

There are, however, two other traditions which echo Isa 61:1–3, whose claim to authenticity is stronger. The first is Jesus' reply to followers of John the Baptist recorded in Matt 11:4–5/Luke 7:22. Now this could be a convenient fabrication, rather like the Baptist's question about whether it is more appropriate for him to be baptised by Jesus (Matt 3:11–12). On the other hand, there are several reasons for accepting the authenticity of the dialogue, even if the context (John being allowed to send emissaries from prison) is more doubtful:<sup>70</sup> (1) given John's emphasis on judgement, it is quite plausible that he later came to doubt whether Jesus was "the one to come"; (2) we know from 11QMelch and 4Q521 that the Qumran community reflected on the figure of Isaiah 61, so it is quite plausible that Jesus did; (3) the saying reflects the activities narrated in the gospels more than the christological affirmations of the early church; and (4) had it originated in the early church, one might have expected a statement that John was convinced by Jesus' reply. Thus there are good reasons to suggest that Jesus saw in Isaiah a description of his miracle working activity and fashioned a reply to John by crafting a short florilegium or cento of quotations from Isa 35:5–6; 29:18–19 and 61:1. As Meier points out, it is noteworthy that Jesus omits any mention of the vengeance or judgement that occurs in neighbouring texts (Isa 35:4; 29:20; 61:2) for “the accent is now on what a loving, merciful God is already doing to save Israel.”<sup>71</sup>

<sup>70</sup> "[A]s if Herod Antipas would have granted his prisoner the leisure and liberty to discuss messianic claims" (B. Chilton, Rabbi Jesus: An Intimate biography [Doubleday: New York, 2000], 63). P. M. Casey also doubts the historicity of the setting but argues for the authenticity of the dialogue (An Aramaic Approach to Q, SNTSMS 122 [Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002], 105–145). On the other hand, Allison (The Intertextual Jesus, 113) finds it significant that Jesus' reply omits any reference to setting prisoners free; most apt if John is communicating from prison.

The second passage is Matt 5:3–6/Luke 6:20–21, where the kingdom of God/Heaven is promised to the poor/poor in spirit (Isa 61:1), comfort to those who weep/mourn (Isa 61:3), and in Matthew’s version, there follows a promise of inheriting the earth (Isa 61:5, 7). This latter promise is not in Luke and agrees exactly with the LXX of Isa 61:7 (κληρονομήσουσιν τὴν γῆν), against the Hebrew text. Meier is thus sceptical that the earliest form of these beatitudes can be traced to Isa 61:1–3, though he accepts that the promise of comfort to those who mourn shows “clear influence of Isaiah 61.”<sup>72</sup> Dunn summarizes:

[E]ven if Luke’s portrayal of Jesus reading the passage and explicitly claiming its fulfilment (Luke 4.16–21) is an elaboration of the briefer tradition in Mark 6.1–6a, we can still be confident that this elaboration was based on a strong remembrance of Jesus making clear allusion to the passage on more than one occasion.<sup>73</sup>

3.4. Isaiah 56:7/Jeremiah 7:11

While some scholars doubt whether the so-called “cleansing of the Temple” actually occurred,<sup>74</sup> the majority of scholars accept that something must have happened to provoke Jesus’ arrest and crucifixion. However, not all accept the authenticity of the quotations, partly because of their Septuagintal character and partly because of the nature of the accusation (“den of robbers”).<sup>75</sup> The first is not significant: (1) because the LXX is a close rendering of the Hebrew, even maintaining its word order; and (2) the fact that the gospel writers cite texts from the LXX is not in itself evidence that they created them. For the second point, if Jeremiah can say that the Temple of his day had become a “den or robbers,” there seems no reason why Jesus could not have done likewise. Furthermore, the link between the two verses is clearly <sup>71</sup> Meier, A Marginal Jew, III: Companions and Competitors, 134. On the other hand, “Jesus has not given up John’s hope of a consummation yet to come, including punishment for those who harden themselves against the final offer of salvation” (134).

<sup>72</sup> Meier, A Marginal Jew, II: Mentor, Message and Miracles, 380 n. 124.

<sup>73</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 516–517.

<sup>74</sup> Becker, Jesus of Nazareth, 333, 345.

<sup>75</sup> Vermes, The Authentic Gospel of Jesus, 185.

the word “house,” a Jewish exegetical procedure that Jesus uses on more than one occasion. A positive argument can also be put forward based on Mark’s inclusion of “for all the nations.” Had he, or the tradition before him, wished to place a quotation on the lips of Jesus to justify the Gentile mission, Isaiah 56 would be a surprising choice.

Isa 56:7 these I will bring to my holy mountain, and make them joyful in my house of prayer; their burnt offerings and their sacrifices will be accepted on my altar; for my house shall be called a house of prayer for all peoples.	Jer 7:11 Has this house, which is called by my name, become a den of robbers in your sight?	Mark 11:17 “Is it not written, ‘My house shall be called a house of prayer for all the nations’? But you have made it a den of robbers.”	Matt 21:13 “It is written, ‘My house shall be called a house of prayer’; but you are making it a den of robbers.”
--	---	--	--

Recent writers have focused on Jesus’ use of Jer 7:11. Thus Holmén suggests that the emphasis should fall on “den” rather than “robbers.” Jesus is not accusing the buyers and sellers of “robbery” as they carry out their (essential) Temple business. Like Jeremiah and the prophets before him, Jesus accuses them of hypocrisy, namely, attempting to fulfil their Temple duties while continuing to live immoral lives (Jer 7:8–10).<sup>76</sup> Wright has a more specific view. The meaning of ληστής is not just “robber” but “armed robber” or “bandit.” According to Wright, “the Temple had become, in Jesus’ day as in Jeremiah’s, the talisman of nationalist violence, the guarantee that YHWH would act for Israel and defend her against her enemies.”<sup>77</sup>

On the other hand, Bryan thinks that Jesus is deliberately citing traditions concerning judgment (Jeremiah 7) and restoration (Isaiah 56). This is not a contrast between the present material Temple and a future eschatological Temple, but the fact that the Temple should by now have become the eschatological Temple. In support, he cites the fig tree episode where Mark (confusingly) explains that Jesus did not find fruit because it was not the season for figs. Bryan suggests that in “Jesus’ estimation, the tree should have been laden with figs whatever the season, for it was the time of eschatological fulfilment.”<sup>78</sup>

<sup>76</sup> Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, 312–328.

<sup>77</sup> Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, 420.

There is clearly no consensus on the precise meaning of Jesus’ words and all we can conclude is that: (1) The two texts were most likely combined by the common word “house”; (2) Jesus endorsed Isaiah’s promise of restoration; and (3) Jesus appropriated Jeremiah’s judgment as applicable to some aspect of the Temple service in his own day.

3.5. Elijah Traditions

In contrast to the wealth of rabbinic material on the returning Elijah, Sir 48:10 and 4Q558 are the only texts that can confidently be dated to the first century.<sup>79</sup> The latter does not tell us anything other than the hope of his return. For the former, the original text of Sir 48:10 has not survived but from the LXX, Peshitta and a late Hebrew text from the Cairo Geniza, it appears that the promise of Mal 3:23–24 had been extended to “restoring” or perhaps “preparing” the tribes of Israel (καταστήσαι φυλάς Ιακωβ).

Mal 3:1

See, I am sending my messenger to prepare the way before me, and the Lord whom you seek will suddenly come to his temple. The messenger of the covenant in whom you delight—indeed, he is coming, says the Lord of hosts.

Mal 4:5–6

Lo, I will send you the prophet Elijah before the great and terrible day of the Lord comes. He will turn the hearts of parents to their children and the hearts of

Mark 9:11–13

Then they asked him, “Why do the scribes say that Elijah must come first?” He said to them, “Elijah is indeed coming first to restore all things. How then is it written about the Son of Man, that he is to go through many sufferings and be treated with contempt? But I tell you that Elijah has come, and they did to him whatever they pleased, as it is written about him.”

Matt 11:9–14

“What then did you go out to see? A prophet? Yes, I tell you, and more than a prophet. This is the one about whom it is written, ‘See, I am sending my messenger ahead of you, who will prepare your way before you.’ Truly I tell you, among those born of women no one has arisen greater than John the Baptist; yet the least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he. From the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven has suffered

<sup>78</sup> Bryan, Jesus and Israel’s Traditions, 225.

<sup>79</sup> J. J. Collins has suggested that the anointed figure in 4Q521 is a reference to Elijah, but this has not won much support. See J. J. Collins, The Sceptre and the Star: The Messiahs of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Other Ancient Literature, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1995), 117–121.

children to their parents, so that I will not come and strike the land with a curse.

violence, and the violent take it by force. For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John came; and if you are willing to accept it, he is Elijah who is to come.'

There are four main difficulties with Jesus' recorded sayings about Elijah: (1) The composite quotation of Mal 3:1 and Exod 23:20 appears in Mark 1:2 as an editorial comment rather than words of Jesus;<sup>80</sup> (2) in Mark 9:11–13, Jesus appears to identify the returning Elijah with John the Baptist, whose recent death makes it difficult to understand how he “restored all things”; (3) it is difficult to see how the Aramaic (most likely) spoken by Jesus can bear a titular meaning (“the Son of Man”); and (4) in any case, it is difficult to identify any scriptures that speak of the suffering of “the Son of man.”

Casey thinks these can be answered by setting aside the assumption that Elijah is the forerunner of the Messiah, for which there is no early evidence, and focusing on the underlying Aramaic spoken by Jesus. Based on Mal 3:24 (ET 4:6), Casey thinks that Jesus probably said that Elijah “turns back all” (ומתיב כולא), which would not have been taken in a literal sense (“everybody”) but “many,” a not unreasonable description of John's popular and largely successful ministry. The difficulty is that John's ministry ended in rejection and there are no traditions that forecast the returning Elijah's death. But there are texts that can be linked to Malachi 3 (gezarah šawa) that forecast the suffering (Job 14), death (Isaiah 40) and rejection (Jeremiah 6–7) of “man” in general, and according to Casey, this explains the presence of a generic “son of man” saying with special reference to John.<sup>81</sup> Casey thus offers the following literal translation of his reconstructed Aramaic:

<sup>80</sup> Meier (A Marginal Jew, III: Companions and Competitions, 141) also cites the rather formal introduction (“This is the one about whom it is written”) and the change from Malachi's “before me,” meaning God, to “before you,” probably meaning Christ, as reasons for doubting its authenticity.

<sup>81</sup> Casey suggests that Mal 3:1a would have easily led Jesus to the almost identical Isa 40:3a, and hence to the statement that all flesh fades like grass in Isa 40:6, and hence to Job 14:2. Less convincing is his suggestion that the refining mentioned in Mal 3:2 led Jesus to Jer 6:27–30 and hence the rejection of “man” by God in Jer 7:29. Though it is of interest that Jesus uses Jer 7:11 in the Temple incident, it is not clear how God's rejection of “man in general” is applicable to John the Baptist, who was God's prophet. See P. M. Casey, Aramaic Sources of Mark's Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998), 111–137.

And he said to them, "Elijah comes first and turns back all, and how it is written of (a/the son of) man that he suffers much and is rejected! And I tell you that, moreover, Elijah has come, and they did in the case of him whom they desired according as it is written concerning him/it."<sup>82</sup>

Bryan, however, thinks the key is not the reference to "the Son of man," but the reference to resurrection. He thinks Jesus is engaging in the well-known exegetical practice of reconciling texts that appear contradictory. He paraphrases Jesus meaning:

Elijah comes just prior to the establishment of the kingdom and restores all things, but restoration cannot mean the re-establishment of the twelve tribes, as you assume, because that idea cannot be reconciled with the Danielic tradition whereby God's holy ones are to suffer just prior to the establishment of the kingdom.<sup>83</sup>

Both Casey and Bryan think that Jesus was involved in the subtle exegesis of multiple texts, though neither thinks that Jesus was identifying with a figure called "the Son of Man" from Dan 7:13.

3.6. Daniel 7:13

It is the additional phrase of "coming in/on clouds" in Mark 13:26/14:62 and parallels that has convinced some scholars that Jesus did identify with the figure of Dan 7:13. Thus Kimball speaks of Jesus expounding Dan 7:13 "to proclaim his coming not merely as a man or divine figure but as Yahweh on the eschatological day of Yahweh."<sup>84</sup> He calls it a peshering use of scripture, "a type of implicit midrash in which the biblical text was altered for exegetical purposes to show an 'eschatological' fulfillment of the OT."<sup>85</sup>

Wright has a different understanding of Dan 7:13. He does not think that it is talking about the 'coming' of a divine figure, as if the clouds were a mode of heavenly transport, but the vindication of God's people, using traditional apocalyptic language (cf. Isa 13:10; 34:4; Ezek 32:7). Jesus alludes to Dan 7:13 not because it speaks about his "return" but because it speaks about vindication. Jesus has predicted the destruction of the Temple, for which he will pay with his life, but the "divine

<sup>82</sup> Casey, Aramaic Sources, 121–122.

<sup>83</sup> Bryan, Jesus and Israel's Traditions, 110. Original in italics.

<sup>84</sup> Kimball, Jesus Exposition, 196.

<sup>85</sup> Ibid., 193 n. 168.

kingdom will be manifest within a generation, when Jesus and his followers are vindicated in and through the destruction of Jerusalem.”<sup>86</sup>

A third interpretation is that of Chilton, who seeks to integrate the “generic” interpretation of “son of man” with a specific reference to what he calls, “Israel’s advocate in the heavenly court.”<sup>87</sup> Jesus was not claiming “identity” with this figure but a special (mystical) connection. As a “son of man” or person like any other, Jesus “enjoyed access to the heavenly court through the angelic figure who was like a person.” The allusion to Dan 7:13 indicates the (esoteric) source of Jesus’ authority.

In the light of such diverse interpretations, Dunn’s assessment that the “parallels on which historical research so much depends, both in linguistic and apocalyptic usage, are so disputed as to dating and relevance as to leave any historical hypothesis vulnerable to attack”<sup>88</sup> seems correct. Though Jesus may have had Daniel 7 in mind, it is difficult to say with any confidence what type of use of Scripture is implied by it.

3.7. Isaiah 52:13–53:12

The debate as to whether Jesus ever alluded to this passage has been frequently summarized and need not be repeated here.<sup>89</sup> The three main contenders are Mark 10:45; 14:24 and Luke 22:37. The linguistic evidence is interesting. Luke 22:37 (καὶ μετὰ ἀνόμων ἐλογίσθη) is close to the LXX of Isa 53:12 (καὶ ἐν τοῖς ἀνόμοις ἐλογίσθη) and the introductory formula (“this scripture must be fulfilled”) identifies it as a quotation. However, λογίζομαι is not the usual rendering of מנח. Furthermore, the formula reflects characteristic Lukan language and appears to disrupt the flow from vv. 36, 38. Dunn concludes that a “tradition-historical analysis cannot trace it back to Jesus with any confidence.”<sup>90</sup>

<sup>86</sup> Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, 365.

<sup>87</sup> B. Chilton, “(The) Son of (The) Man, and Jesus,” in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 282.

<sup>88</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 759.

<sup>89</sup> W. H. Bellinger and W. R. Farmer, eds., Jesus and the Suffering Servant: Isaiah 53 and Christian Origins (Harrisburg: Trinity Press International, 1998).

<sup>90</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 812.

As for the other two sayings, there are no close parallels with the LXX,<sup>91</sup> so that any argument must depend on thematic similarities. For those like Wright, who see Deutero-Isaiah as an overarching “meta-narrative” for understanding Jesus’ mission, this is not a problem. It is assumed that the passage was well known, so that the faintest of echoes (“handed over,” “poured out,” “the many”) would be enough to evoke the controlling story.<sup>92</sup> As a general theory, this is quite possible but for our purposes, its strength is also its weakness. If a few phrases are sufficient to evoke the general story, it is difficult to deduce anything specific about Jesus’ use of that story. In particular, one should not use such a general theory to argue for something as specific as vicarious atonement, especially as that aspect of the story was not widely known.<sup>93</sup> As with Daniel 7, it is possible that Jesus alluded to Isaiah 53, but it is hazardous to make any deductions about Jesus’ use of scripture from it.

4. Conclusion

We saw in our second section that Jesus appears to use a number of exegetical practices that were later codified as Hillel’s seven exegetical rules. We can now add to that. The combination of Isa 56:7 and Jer 7:11 was probably suggested by the common word “house.” Though there is little agreement about Jesus’ intended meaning, it is safe to say that he was juxtaposing traditions of restoration and judgment. In the parable of the tenants, the connection between the rejected stone and the death of the son appears to be the wordplay בן/בן/בן, perhaps evidence for authenticity, though the early (Aramaic speaking) church could be responsible for it. Thirdly, the response to John the Baptist’s question produces a cento of phrases from Isaiah, a mini florilegium.

---

<sup>91</sup> The nub of M. D. Hooker’s challenge in The Servant of God (London: SPCK, 1959) and reiterated in “Did the Use of Isaiah 53 to Interpret His Mission Begin with Jesus?” in Jesus and the Suffering Servant, ed. Bellinger and Farmer, 88–103.

<sup>92</sup> Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, 602–604. Powery (Jesus Reads Scripture, 252) offers a contrary view. The fact that Jesus only alludes to or echoes these texts, rather than explicitly quoting them, shows that “christological issues are not central to Jesus’ use of scripture.”

<sup>93</sup> For a recent assessment, see D. D. Hannah, “Isaiah within Judaism of the Second Temple Period,” in Isaiah in the New Testament, ed. S. Moyise and M. J. J. Menken (London: T&T Clark International, 2005), 7–33.

It is Casey's opinion that Jesus' mastery of scripture made it "obvious" to associate Malachi 3 with Isaiah 40, Job 14 and Jeremiah 6–7.

We have also seen examples where Jesus introduces an innovative element into the interpretation of texts. In the parable of the barren fig tree, the action focuses on the fate of a fig tree placed within the vineyard, which nevertheless represents the vineyard. In the parable of the tenants, Jesus introduces emissaries sent by the owner to obtain a share of the produce. This allows the parable to speak about their shameful treatment and, in particular, the death of the owner's son. Though the connection with Psalm 118 is less certain, these elements are sufficient to take the allegory of Isaiah 5 in new directions. Indeed, since Jesus is interpreting texts in the light of his own role in salvation history, some might go as far as to call this a christological interpretation. Thus Meyer concludes that, "Jesus, in the consciousness of election to a climactic and definitive mission to Israel, sought and found in the Scriptures the specifications of God's eschatological deed and the specifications of his own role as the chosen instrumental doer of that deed."<sup>94</sup>

We also saw in our first section that Jesus' radical teaching about marriage and the relativizing (though not abolishing) of certain purity laws has been explained by his eschatological vision. This can take a futurist perspective (purpose of temple, death of the son) but its leading characteristic is present fulfilment. Thus Elijah has come and "restored all things," just as Malachi predicted; the miracles spoken about in Isaiah are present in Jesus' ministry; the blindness exhibited by some of Jesus' hearers is a "fulfilment" of Isaiah's commission. Most importantly, Jesus identified with the anointed prophet of Isaiah 61, who comes to preach good news to the poor. According to Bryan, what is most characteristic of Jesus' use of scripture is his selection of texts:

Unlike many of his contemporaries whose understanding of Israel's situation was shaped by biblical traditions which anticipated Israel's restoration and the judgement of the nation's Gentile oppressors, Jesus' expectations were heavily informed by traditions which declared that the heat of God's wrath would be vented on Israel for covenant unfaithfulness.<sup>95</sup>

---

<sup>94</sup> B. F. Meyer, "Appointed Deed, Appointed Doer: Jesus and the Scriptures," in Authenticating the Activities of Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. Evans (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 172–173.

<sup>95</sup> Bryan, Jesus and Israel's Traditions, 86.

However, in the light of Jesus' use of Isaiah 61, his focus on the positive rather than negative aspects of Isaiah 29 and 35, and his general habit of combining texts, a better summary might be his purposeful juxtaposition of traditions of restoration and judgement, rather than emphasizing one to the exclusion of the other.

In terms of function, Powery concludes that Jesus uses scripture primarily to correct (divorce, purpose of Temple), to defend (resurrection, role of John), to instruct (adultery, oaths), and to agree or reinforce (commandments).<sup>96</sup> Powery's study focuses on how the synoptic gospels portray Jesus' use of scripture but his comments on the texts that we have discussed are instructive. Drawing on Fitzmyer's categories, he suggests that Jesus corrects contemporary views about divorce by accommodating the Genesis text to the present situation, whereas the use of Isa 56:7 to declare the purpose of the Temple is more an eschatological appropriation. Reciting the commandments is an example of a literal appropriation, while applying Isaiah's commission to himself and his contemporary hearers is a modernizing use.<sup>97</sup> These broader conclusions suggest that his comment on the divorce text ("Jesus levels the Mosaic law to a post-creation period") should not be generalized beyond this pericope. In fact, the law of Moses as articulated in Deut 6:4 ("You shall love your God"), is quoted as the greatest commandment. There is no suggestion in this exchange (Mark 12:28–32//) that there is something "higher" than this in Genesis. Indeed, the second commandment (if original), comes from Leviticus, further indicating that Jesus did not operate with a hermeneutic that automatically gave priority to Genesis—and perhaps it was not Powery's intention to suggest this.

We began our study by noting that some scholars think Jesus made little reference to scripture and, when he did, it was only to confirm a conclusion reached on other grounds. Though some of our conclusions are necessarily tentative, they are sufficient to refute this view. Indeed, Vermes opens his chapter on Jesus and scripture by saying: "The Bible played a fundamental part in the religious and literary creativity of the Jews in the intertestamental era when the Apocrypha, Pseudepigrapha, the Dead Sea Scrolls and the earliest rabbinic writings were produced.”<sup>98</sup> Since he goes on to assign the majority of the quotations found in the gospels to the early church, he presumably also includes the apostles in this list. How strange then that he concludes that scripture was of little importance to Jesus. The most “plausible” Jesus is the one who discusses, debates and argues the meaning of Israel’s scriptures—for they were also his scriptures.

---

<sup>96</sup> He also has a fifth category, to predict, but his only two examples are the use of Isa 58:6 in Luke's synagogue reading and the use of Zech 13:7 to predict the desertion of the disciples (Mark 14:27).

<sup>97</sup> As the categories were derived from a study of quotations in the New Testament and the Dead Sea Scrolls, Powery's study further roots Jesus in the exegetical practices of the day.

---

<sup>98</sup> Vermes, The Authentic Gospel of Jesus, 173.

IMPLICIT CHRISTOLOGY AND THE HISTORICAL JESUS

EDWIN K. BROADHEAD

Implicit christology represents diverse attempts to find christological motifs embedded in the words, deeds, and person of the historical Jesus. This quest originates as a response to the scholarly excision of all christological dogma from the historical Jesus.

1. Faith and History

The demarcation between history and dogma was inherent in the basic tenets of the Enlightenment and in the modernity to which it gave birth. In particular, the insistence upon scientific analysis of all historical events in order to separate myth, dogma, and ideology from historical reality presumed a critical analysis of the New Testament images of Jesus.

By the late seventeenth century scientific criticism had already turned to the texts of the New Testament and to their portraits of Jesus. Spinoza (1632–77) questioned the miracle stories, and English Deists challenged traditional views of Jesus.<sup>1</sup> A more significant challenge came from Hermann Reimarus (1694–1768), who saw a conflict between Jesus' own intentions and the fraudulent conspiracy by Jesus' disciples in the days following his death. Reimarus's Jesus was distinct from the Christ described in the gospels:

The former was a Jewish revolutionary who attempted unsuccessfully to establish a messianic kingdom on earth, while the latter was the fictional projection of those who stole his body and pretended he had risen from the dead.<sup>2</sup>

By 1836 D. F. Strauss saw the miraculous accounts of the New Testament as myths created in the faith response to Jesus. Strauss believed

---

<sup>1</sup> See James Dunn, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003), 29.

<sup>2</sup> Raymond Brown, An Introduction to the New Testament (New York: Doubleday, 1996), 817.

this generative process made it almost impossible to illuminate the historical life which lay behind these ideas and myths.<sup>3</sup>

The decisive blow came in the opening years of the twentieth century, and it was delivered along three fronts. At the turn of the century Adolf Harnack argued that the true image of Jesus must be distilled from the Christ of dogma—from the metaphysical overlay of Greek philosophy.<sup>4</sup> While Harnack framed a theological distinction, a second front rooted the demarcation in the gospels themselves. The lives of Jesus written in the nineteenth century abandoned the Gospel of John as theological mythmaking. For a time the Gospel of Mark was granted priority, both chronologically and theologically: the earliest of the gospels was assumed to be a rather straightforward account of Jesus' messianic mission. The third front came with Wrede and Schweitzer, who took the division into the heart of the Gospel of Mark. William Wrede argued that the Gospel of Mark, with its motif of a secret messiahship, is a theological construction and not a direct historical account of Jesus' ministry.<sup>5</sup> In the same year Albert Schweitzer severed the link between the Marcan portrait so favored by the liberal quest and the realities of the historical Jesus.<sup>6</sup> Schweitzer argued that the liberal portrait of Jesus, based on the Gospel of Mark, had fallen before a double blow—the thoroughgoing scepticism of Wrede and the thoroughgoing eschatology of Schweitzer:

Thoroughgoing scepticism and thoroughgoing eschatology, between them, are compelling theology to read the Marcan text again with simplicity of mind... The material with which it has hitherto been usual to solder the sections together into a life of Jesus will not stand the temperature test. Exposed to the cold air of critical scepticism it cracks; when the furnace of eschatology is heated to a certain point the solderings melt. In both cases the sections fall apart.<sup>7</sup>

---

<sup>3</sup> See Brown, Introduction, 818; Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 29–34.

<sup>4</sup> Adolf von Harnack, Das Wesen des Christentums (1900), ET: What is Christianity? (London: Williams and Norgate, 1901).

<sup>5</sup> William Wrede, The Messianic Secret, trans. J. C. G. Greig (Cambridge: James Clark, 1971 [1901]).

<sup>6</sup> Albert Schweitzer, The Mystery of the Kingdom of God: The Secret of Jesus' Messiahship and Passion (New York: Macmillan, 1950 [1901]).

<sup>7</sup> Albert Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede (London: A&C Black, 1948 [1906]), 331.

Schweitzer's 1906 survey of the historical quest for Jesus dismissed the liberal quest and defined Jesus as an eschatological figure who remains a mystery and an enigma to the modern world.<sup>8</sup>

The demarcation of the historical Jesus from the Christ of faith was completed in the work of Rudolf Bultmann and Martin Kähler. While Bultmann believed that numerous facts could be known about the historical Jesus, he considered this scattered data neither relevant nor helpful. Though some things could be known about the message of Jesus, the search for his personality and inner life was pointless.<sup>9</sup> For Bultmann, Jesus can be known only in an existential encounter with the word of proclamation about Christ. This position was based on Bultmann's form-critical analysis of the gospels and his conclusion that the earliest traditions show no interest in specific locations or in the development of Jesus' self-consciousness. Bultmann's textual work thus affirmed the theological stance taken in 1892 by Martin Kähler: Jesus can be known in confidence as the Christ preached in the writings of the Bible, quite apart from the transient efforts to attain the external validation of historical data.<sup>10</sup> With Kähler and Bultmann, description of a Jesus verified through historical analysis was not only impossible; it was also unnecessary.

2. From Closed Quest to Implicit Christology

While Bultmann is seen as the scholar who closed the Quest, it was also he who left open the possibility of further investigation. By 1948 Bultmann would note that for the church, as for Jesus himself, the central importance was not found in the content of his message; it was found instead in his call.

In his lifetime he had demanded decision for his person as the bearer of the Word; the Church has now made this decision. Jesus' call to decision implies a christology. That call does not justify speculation about him as a heavenly being. Nor does it support the Messiah-consciousness attributed to him. But it does imply a christology which will unfold the implications of a positive answer to his demand for the decision, the obedient response which acknowledges God's revelation in Jesus. Such

---

<sup>8</sup> Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus.

<sup>9</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 76.

<sup>10</sup> Martin Kähler, The So-Called Historical Jesus and the Historic, Biblical Christ, trans. C. Braaten (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1964 [1892]).

christology became explicit in the earliest Church to the extent that they understood Jesus as the one whom God by the resurrection has made Messiah, and that they awaited him as the coming Son of Man. For it is apparent that in that very fact they understood his sending as God's decisive act.<sup>11</sup>

Bultmann suggested that the kerygma of the risen Christ could be understood only on the basis of a unique historical figure such as Jesus; therefore the life of Jesus, particularly his call to decision, implied a christology.

The New Quest, initiated by students of Bultmann in the 1950's, declared that a historical portrait of Jesus was important and that such a description, in limited form, could be attained through historical-critical analysis. The New Quest believed that Jesus exercised a unique authority that distinguished him from the Judaism of his day. This authority constitutes an implied christology that stands in continuity with the explicit christology formulated by the early church.

The New Quest sought to build on Bultmann's form-critical results and gave primary attention to what Jesus said. Since the criterion of dissimilarity, which was central to New Quest analysis, removed sayings with any hint of Jewish tradition or church confession, the New Quest looked as well to other aspects of the Jesus tradition. Extensive research was applied to the christological titles in the gospels in an effort to sort out what Jesus called himself and what he meant by any such titles. No consensus was reached on the general use of titles or on any one title. In addition to the limited list of authentic sayings and the complex issue of titles, the New Quest searched Jesus' words, deeds, and presence for signs that might imply a messianic self-awareness. This search for an implicit christology represents a conscious attempt to leap over the line of demarcation separating the Christ of faith from the Jesus of history.

The New Quest sought to establish continuity between the post-Easter preaching (kerygma) and its christology on the one hand and the historical life of Jesus on the other. Theissen and Metz note that this connection was attempted along various lines:

---

<sup>11</sup> Rudolf Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, trans. K. Grobel (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1951 [1948]), 42-43.

- as an existential experience of the call of Jesus to the Kingdom of God (Bultmann)
- as Jesus' critique of the Law and his call to freedom (Käsemann)
- as the immediacy of Jesus in contrast to the legalism and apocalypticism of his day (Bornkamm)
- as the impending claim of God's love for sinners, present in Jesus' words and deeds (Fuchs)
- as the paradox of radical obedience to the Torah and radical grace, a paradox found in Jesus (Herbert Braun)
- as the model of faith initiated by Jesus' own faith in God (Ebeling).<sup>12</sup>

These New Quest connections to a pre-dogmatic understanding of Jesus are each constructed through a criterion of dissimilarity: all traits which may be attributed to Christian doctrine or to a Jewish worldview are excluded in order to define the uniqueness of Jesus. The result, of course, is that Jesus is isolated from both Judaism and early Christianity. Moreover, Judaism becomes a foil (legalistic, apocalyptic, particularistic) against which to define the uniqueness of Jesus.

3. Extending the New Quest

In the wake of the New Quest, various areas suggested themselves as fertile ground for extracting the messianic consciousness of Jesus. Almost all of these involved a search for elements of Jesus' words and deeds which implied something about his identity and his self-awareness. A sampling of these treatments reveals some common patterns.

For some, it is the concept of existence which connects the Christian kerygma to the Jesus of history. James M. Robinson notes that Jesus called people to a radical break with the present in light of the future, which was determined by the imminent arrival of the Kingdom of God. Robinson believes that behind the eschatological terminology of Jesus lies a deeper message: "in accepting one's death there is life for others; in suffering, there is glory; in submitting to judgement, one finds grace; in accepting one's finitude resides the only transcendence."<sup>13</sup> For Robinson, there exists a clear line of continuity between this deeper meaning and the christological confessions of the early church: "It is this existential meaning latent in Jesus' message which is constitutive of his selfhood, expresses itself in his action, and is finally codified in the Church's kerygma."<sup>14</sup>

---

<sup>12</sup> Gerd Theissen and Annete Merz, The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide, trans. John Bowden (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998 [1996]), 8.

The voice of Jesus—the manner in which he spoke—was seen by many as a pointer to his self-awareness.<sup>15</sup> This connection was sought at three different levels. For some scholars the ipsissima verba (the very words of Jesus) may be heard, and these are the basis of later christological confessions. Two specific terms are seen to reveal the identity of Jesus. In his use of Abba to address God as Father, Jesus' Sonship is unveiled. The unique authority of Jesus is seen in his twofold use of amen to begin a statement. While Joachim Jeremias was intrigued by Jesus' use of such terms, he gave particular attention to the ipsissima vox Jesu (the very voice of Jesus). Jeremias identified two important lines of linguistic and stylistic characteristics in the sayings of Jesus: (1) those patterns which are not new, but appear with unusual frequency, and (2) those patterns which are without analogy and may be identified as the ipsissima vox Jesu.<sup>16</sup> Jeremias was confident that these patterns, along with attention to content, placed one close to the authentic words of Jesus. Jeremias also found inherent in this voice a clear expression of Jesus' self-conscious sonship and authority. Later scholars would suggest the key to Jesus is found in the manner in which he spoke—the ipsissima structura.

The authority of Jesus was understood by many to imply a messianic consciousness. A comprehensive development of this approach is found in the work of Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz. The authority of the historical Jesus is evident in his person—that is, in his charisma. This charisma operates in both a horizontal and a vertical dimension. The horizontal dimension is relational: "Jesus was a charismatic who had an almost inexplicable aura: fascinating to followers, provocative

<sup>13</sup> James M. Robinson, A New Quest of the Historical Jesus (London: SCM, 1959), 123.

<sup>14</sup> Robinson, A New Quest, 123.

<sup>15</sup> John Reumann, "Jesus and Christology," in The New Testament and Its Modern Interpreters, ed. E. Epp and G. MacRae (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1989), 501–564.

<sup>16</sup> Joachim Jeremias, New Testament Theology: The Proclamation of Jesus, trans. John Bowden (New York: Charles Scribners' Sons, 1971), 8–37.

to opponents.”<sup>17</sup> This charisma is seen in Jesus’ relationship to his family, to John the Baptist, to his disciples, to women followers, and to his opponents.<sup>18</sup> The vertical dimension of Jesus’ charisma is seen in his special closeness to God. This characteristic is seen in Jesus’ use of the amen formula, in his emphatic “I” in the antitheses and the “I have come” sayings, in the use of Abba, in the forgiveness of sins, in the causal attribution of his miracles to the working of God, and in the evaluation of the Baptist’s greatness (which implies an even greater status for Jesus).<sup>19</sup>

Christopher Tuckett believes there is a christology implicit in various elements of Jesus’ ministry—the proclamation of an eschatological Kingdom, the relation to John the Baptist, the presence of the Kingdom in the deeds of Jesus.<sup>20</sup> Further evidence is found in Jesus’ appointment of precisely twelve in addition to himself. For Tuckett, Jesus’ words and deeds articulate an implicit christology: Jesus is the agent through whom God’s eschatological activity is taking place, and he has placed himself at the head of the twelve who represent Israel.<sup>21</sup>

Bart Ehrman suggests there is a confluence between Jesus’ proclamation on the one hand and his deeds and experiences on the other; various aspects of Jesus’ words and deeds imply a christology.<sup>22</sup> In a similar vein, John P. Meier builds on the response of the people to Jesus: “This belief in Jesus as a prophet who was at the same time a miracle-worker—a belief that goes back to his ministry—furnishes an important key to understanding who people thought Jesus was and perhaps even who he thought he was.”<sup>23</sup> For Meier, “the so-called ‘charismatic’ nature of Jesus, which one can observe in his prophetic

---

<sup>17</sup> Theissen and Metz, The Historical Jesus, 235.

<sup>18</sup> Ibid., 235–237.

<sup>19</sup> Ibid., 523–531.

<sup>20</sup> Christopher Tuckett, Christology and the New Testament: Jesus and His Earliest Followers (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2001), 206–210.

<sup>21</sup> Ibid., 209–210.

<sup>22</sup> Bart Ehrman, Jesus: Apocalyptic Prophet of the New Millennium (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999), 183–226. Among these sources of implied christology are Jesus’ baptism, his relationship with his associates (including Jesus’ followers, the Twelve, sinners and outcasts, women followers), Jesus’ early ministry in Galilee, his miraculous deeds, the reception of Jesus (including widespread rejection and his controversy with the Pharisees), and Jesus’ death.

<sup>23</sup> John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, II: Mentor, Message, and Miracles (London: Doubleday, 1994), 1044.

ministry and miracle-working, also surfaces in his teaching on the Law."<sup>24</sup>

The most comprehensive schema for linking Jesus' activity with the christological kerygma of the early church was formulated by Willi Marxsen. For Marxsen the faith of Jesus is enacted in history and creates a Jesus kerygma; the faith of the early church is formulated as an explicit Christ kerygma; this is expressed in the gospels as a formalized Jesus Christ kerygma.<sup>25</sup>

A more recent attempt to connect the faith of the early church to the reality of Jesus is found in the work of James Dunn. Dunn believes that the Jesus tradition as found in the gospels demonstrates that there was a concern to remember Jesus and it shows us how Jesus was remembered. For Dunn, the primary force for shaping the Jesus tradition is the impact made by Jesus upon his first disciples. The initiating impact was the pre-Easter call to faith, and behind that impact stands Jesus.<sup>26</sup> Dunn concludes that "In short, it is not only the impression of Jesus' words and actions which is imprinted in the Jesus tradition, but also the impression of who Jesus was."<sup>27</sup>

This complex range of portraits, all claiming to be rooted in the historical Jesus, led in part to the critical turn to literary analysis or narrative criticism. Here the story itself became the focus of analysis, with various tools borrowed from secular literary criticism. Attention was given to how the story was told, then eventually to the hearer of the story. Even in this self-contained world, the possibility of implied christology emerged. The narrator, a persona wholly contained within the world of the story, usually serves as the voice of the implied author, who may or may not represent the image of the real author. The implied author speaks through the devices of the story world to an implied reader, who may or may not represent the real reader. One of the key means of communication is the use of implicit commentary. For many literary critics, this hermeneutical process (reading) carries an underlying hope that the story signifies something real about Jesus and his message.<sup>28</sup>

<sup>24</sup> Meier, A Marginal Jew II, 1046.

<sup>25</sup> Willi Marxsen, "Christology in the NT," IDBSup, 146-156.

<sup>26</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 881-893.

<sup>27</sup> Ibid., 892.

<sup>28</sup> See, for example, R. Alan Culpepper, Anatomy of the Fourth Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983).

The so-called “Third Quest”<sup>29</sup> for the historical Jesus has been marked by attention to social history, to the role of Jesus within Judaism, and to the use of non-canonical sources.<sup>30</sup> While this movement has split into two streams over the question of whether Jesus was eschatological or non-eschatological, there is consistent unity in the rejection of the criterion of dissimilarity. This has been replaced with a criterion of plausibility: “what is plausible in the Jewish context and makes the rise of Christianity understandable may be historical.”<sup>31</sup> As a consequence, implied christology plays a diminished role in the so-called “Third Quest.”

4. Retrospective

While various other studies could be cited, attention to the line of development makes clear the place of implicit christology. Faced with the excision of all christological dogma from the historical Jesus and confronted by a wall of separation between the Christ of faith and the Jesus of history, alternate routes were explored. If no explicit christological claims could be credited to Jesus himself, then implicit claims kept open the hope of knowing something about Jesus and the hope of connecting the confessional preaching of the early church to Jesus himself. Even where explicit claims were accepted, implied christology served to bolster the portrait of Jesus.

5. A Critical Assessment of Implicit Christology

The attempt to frame an implicit christology on the facts of Jesus’ life is fraught with danger. Numerous critical issues are evoked by this quest.

First, implicit christology is not an obvious or necessary hermeneutical step; it is a response to the failed attempt to locate a clear, explicit christology with Jesus himself.

---

<sup>29</sup> The name is credited to Tom Wright, who used it in his 1988 updating of Stephen Neill’s The Interpretation of the New Testament (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988), 379.

<sup>30</sup> See the summary by Theissen and Metz, The Historical Jesus, 10–12.

<sup>31</sup> Ibid., 11.

Secondly, implicit christology often thrives on a supposed contrast between Jesus and Judaism. The criterion of dissimilarity, by definition, separates Jesus from Judaism. The dangers inherent in this approach are evident: the persistence of anti-Jewish scholarship, a sterile portrait of Jesus, and a supersessionist view of Christian faith.

In the third place, implicit christology is in danger of being uncritical. Redactional and theological interests are not limited to explicit portraits of Jesus but may be present as well in implicit descriptions. If there is an implied christology in the gospels, who implied it—Jesus, the tradition, or the redactor? For example, the idea that Jesus affirms the decisive role of the Baptist but sees himself as more than John implies a christology, but this motif is likely a redactional effort to place Jesus above John rather than behind him. Implicit motifs may tell us more about traditional or redactional interests than about Jesus himself.

Fourthly, implicit Christology is equally subject to Schweitzer's critique of liberal portraits of Jesus. For example, Ernst Käsemann, in the aftermath of the Nazi era and of Fascism, found implicit christology in Jesus' new call to freedom.<sup>32</sup> It is ironic that Käsemann sketched this post-war image of Jesus as a contrast to a failed Judaism, thus extending the anti-Judaism of the Nazi era. It is possible that the image of Jesus framed as an implication of authentic material may stand no closer to Jesus than did the liberal quest.

Fifthly, the quest for an implicit christology may combine two problems: the absence of explicit material and the insertion of redactional interests. For example, the messianic secret has been understood as a Markan solution to an embarrassing reality—Jesus was not proclaimed and followed as the messiah in his own lifetime. Mark addresses this reality by claiming that Jesus himself made this determination: he could not and would not be identified as messiah until after his death and resurrection. By crediting this secrecy motif to Jesus himself, Mark implies something about Jesus' authority and about his true identity: Jesus reveals himself as the crucified messiah who will return shortly as the conquering Son of Man. Thus, the absence of explicit christology (the messianic secret) is turned into evidence of a messianic consciousness (by Mark). Mark claims that Jesus was not known because he did not want to be known, and this shows that what he is to us is what he has always been. But it is precisely this Markan messianic motif, with its implied christology, which has been judged to be not historical.

---

<sup>32</sup> Ernst Käsemann, Jesus Means Freedom, trans. Frank Clarke (London: SCM, 1969).

In the sixth place, when a christology is implied in some aspect of Jesus' life, it is not always clear what is implied. The charismatic authority of Jesus is an example. For Käsemann and Bornkamm, this sets Jesus in contrast to the Judaism of his day.<sup>33</sup> For Geza Vermes, however, it is the charisma of Jesus which places him precisely within Judaism.<sup>34</sup>

Finally, as with the earlier quest for an explicit christology, a collection of implied data or images about Jesus might not articulate a coherent portrait of who he was as a real person (the real Jesus).

6. What is Implied By What We Know About Jesus?

In light of this history of development and these critical warnings, is there any positive role for implicit christology? The time has come to explore an approach that is perhaps more grounded and more productive. Rather than beginning with isolated fragments of authentic material and seeking some implicit thread that unites them, it is possible to begin with a broad outline of the major features of Jesus identified through historical critical analysis and then ask what is implied by such features. This analysis would not focus on what is dissimilar in Jesus' ministry, but would measure data along a continuum of what is possible, what is plausible, and what is probable. Rather than using implicit christology to establish the profile of Jesus, it would be fruitful to explore what is implied by what we think we already know about Jesus. In this approach, implied christology could play a positive role in filling out an already established profile.

I would contend the following are plausible, probable descriptions of Jesus, firmly grounded in historical analysis and widely affirmed in critical scholarship. (1) Jesus was born, lived, and died as a Galilean Jew. (2) He lived all of his life, and all aspects of his life, under the oppressive hand of Rome. (3) Jesus was baptized by John the Baptist. (4) Jesus spoke primarily about Yahweh, the God of Israel. (5) The content of Jesus' message about God centered in the concept of God's Reign. (6) The manner of Jesus' message presented a distinctly Jewish rhetoric grounded in parables, proverbs, sayings, and similes. (7) Jesus employed a prophetic rhetoric of urgency and demand. (8) Jesus stood at a distance from the cultic centers of Jewish faith. (9) Jesus engaged in ongoing controversy with the leaders of Israel. (10) Jesus died in Jerusalem at the hands of the Romans.

---

<sup>33</sup> Reconstructing the Judaism of Jesus' day presents its own problems!

<sup>34</sup> Geza Vermes, Jesus the Jew: A Historian's Reading of the Gospels (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981 [1973]), 58–82.

If the broad lines of this profile are true, what do they imply about Jesus as a historical figure?

1. Jesus was born, lived, and died as a Galilean Jew. This implies:
  - Jesus believed that Yahweh alone is sovereign over all creation and over all nations
  - Jesus affirmed God's special work for and with and through Israel.
  - Jesus believed that God's will should dominate all of life.
  - Jesus believed the current age stood in irresolvable tension with the purposes of God; thus, catastrophe was imminent and unavoidable.
  - Jesus spoke Aramaic, but likely understood some Greek
  - Jesus was likely married.
2. Jesus lived all of his life, and all aspects of his life, under the oppressive hand of Rome. This implies:
  - Like most faithful Jews, Jesus saw the Roman Empire as the antithesis of God's Reign, as an oppressive challenge to the sovereignty of God
  - Jesus believed that Rome, like all nations, was subject to the judgment of God
  - Jesus' silence about Roman power and his refusal to engage it directly implies his opinion that Rome is irrelevant in the larger scheme of history.
3. Jesus was baptized by John the Baptist. This implies:
  - Jesus knew well the person and the preaching of John
  - Jesus accepted John's call to repentance
  - Jesus was a follower of John
  - Jesus affirmed, at least initially, the judgment pronounced by John.
4. Jesus spoke primarily about Yahweh, the God of Israel. This implies:
  - Jesus was driven by a theology rather than by a christology

- Jesus believed the destiny of the world depended on God's actions, not his own
  - Jesus believed that the current age belonged to God's enduring work with Israel.
5. The content of Jesus' message about God centered in the concept of God's Reign. This implies:
- the created order stands already under the sovereign control of Yahweh
  - the Roman Empire, because it stands in opposition to God's Reign, will cease
  - the tension between the present order and God's purpose is irresolvable and unbearable; catastrophic change is imminent
  - Jesus' identity is consistent with the content of his message: Jesus is the herald of the Kingdom of God.
6. The manner of Jesus' message employed a distinctly Jewish rhetoric grounded in parables, proverbs, sayings, and similes. This implies:
- Jesus embraced the prophetic tradition of Israel and placed himself within that tradition
  - Jesus understood the social implications of his eschatological message
  - Jesus understood himself as the distinct voice announcing the arrival of God's Reign; one's response to Jesus validated one's standing before God.
  - Jesus' role is consistent with the manner of his message: he is the Jewish prophet who speaks the word of the Lord.
7. Jesus employed a prophetic rhetoric of urgency and demand: repent, believe in the gospel, follow me. This implies:
- Jesus' understanding of his role is consistent with the rhetoric of his message. He is the one in whose words and deeds the message is realized; his message demands a response and this response is final.
8. Jesus stood at a distance from the cultic centers of Jewish faith. This implies:
- Jesus believed holiness was a spiritual value grounded in common places and common people
  - Jesus believed his call and his teaching on the Kingdom of God set the standard for holiness
  - Jesus believed the leadership of Israel, particularly the Jerusalem temple, had failed God and God's people.

9. Jesus engaged in ongoing controversy with the leaders of Israel. This implies:
  - Jesus was a part of the lively Jewish dialogue about what it means to be faithful to God
  - Jesus initiated some of this controversy
  - Jesus saw this controversy, especially with the temple leaders, as a part of his prophetic calling.
10. Jesus died in Jerusalem at the hands of the Romans. This implies:
  - the Romans interpreted Jesus' words and deeds as politically dangerous
  - Jesus' dispute over the role of the temple played a part in his arrest.

What is known about Jesus carries important implications for analyzing what is not yet fully known. Underlying this analysis is the hermeneutical presumption that the identity of the messenger is congruent with the context, manner, and content of his message. If this is true, the teaching of Jesus implies that he is a faithful Jew who stands in the prophetic tradition, calling Israel to repent and to practice public, persistent holiness in light of the imminent catastrophe that will sweep away the current era and establish the sovereignty of God. Standing in the steps of John the Baptist, Jesus issues a final call to God's Kingdom. Jesus thus framed his own work and his own being in the blinding light of the coming Reign of God.

In this approach implicit christology need no longer serve in a desperate attempt to preserve or to bolster some thread of connection to the historical Jesus. Implicit christology is no longer building upon scattered fragments, but upon broad historical characteristics and contexts. Implicit christology now serves a positive role as it considers the implications of Jesus' mission and shines further light upon the contours of his identity.

Of course, different assumptions about the profile of Jesus would hold different implications. But these different assumptions must first stand the test of critical analysis and sway the discourse of wider audiences.

The quest continues.

JESUS AND THE “PARTINGS OF THE WAYS”

MICHAEL F. BIRD

1. Introduction

The “partings of the ways”<sup>1</sup> between Christianity and Judaism is a facet of Christian origins that continues to fascinate scholars. A constellation of questions calls for resolution, such as why the ways parted in the first place, what facilitated or accelerated the separation, and when was the parting finally complete? In the course of answering these questions a concerted amount of attention has been paid to Paul and the gospel communities and their contribution to the eventual split. However, one particular aspect of the debate remains particularly contentious, viz., the role and the significance of the historical Jesus for the parting of the ways.

In the past there have been a number of attempts to postulate Jesus as causing (though perhaps not intending) the eventual division between Judaism and Christianity. Julius Wellhausen wrote: “The parting occurred first through the crucifixion, and for practical purposes first through Paul. But it lay in the consequences of Jesus’ own teaching and his own behaviour.”<sup>2</sup> Given that Wellhausen was part of nineteenth-century German scholarship that was hardly amicable towards the Jews, his perspective is not surprising. On a different tack, however, a number of Jewish scholars think that the parting did in some way originate with Jesus.

Joseph Klausner maintained that there is something at the root of Jesus’ ministry that led to the split despite the fact that Jesus’ teaching is thoroughly indebted to Judaism. Klausner censures late nineteenth-century Christian scholarship for seeing Jesus as opposing Judaism rather than regarding Jesus as one Pharisee who opposed other Pharisees.<sup>3</sup> For Klausner, Christianity is a hybrid of Judaism and Hellenistic philosophy that stands at some distance from Jesus the Jew.<sup>4</sup> In the mind of interpreters: “Jesus was not a Christian,’ but he became a Christian.”<sup>5</sup> Unsurprisingly Klausner maintains that “Jesus was a Jew and a Jew he remained till his last breath,” but he also adds that: “Ex nihilo nihil fit: had not Jesus’ teaching contained a kernel of opposition to Judaism, Paul could never in the name of Jesus have set aside the ceremonial laws, and broken through the barriers of national Judaism.”<sup>6</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> The term “partings of the ways” is itself disputed: Judith M. Lieu, “The Parting of the Ways’: Theological Construct or Historical Reality?” JSNT 56 (1994): 101–114, esp. 101–109; Stanley E. Porter and Brook W. R. Pearson, “Why the Split? Christians and Jews by the Fourth Century,” JGRChJ 1 (2000): 82–119, esp. 107–109; Adam H. Becker and Annette Yoshiko Reed, eds., The Ways that Never Parted: Jews and Christians in Late Antiquity and the Middle Ages, TSAJ 95 (Tubingen: Mohr/Siebeck, 2003).

<sup>2</sup> Julius Wellhausen, Einleitung in die drei ersten Evangelien (Berlin: Reimer Verlag, 1905), 114: “Der Schnitt erfolgte erst durch die Kreuzigung, und praktisch erst durch Paulus. Er lag aber in der Consequenz von Jesu eigener Lehre und seinem eigenen Verhalten.”

Similarly, Jacob Neusner contends that Jesus instituted a movement and a ritual that could not conceivably remain within the orbit of Judaism. In Neusner’s understanding, Jesus’ act of overturning the moneychangers’ table (which Israelites paid to participate in the upkeep of the daily offering) was a rejection of the most important rite of the Israelite cult, the daily whole-offering, and was a statement that the means of atonement was null and void. Jesus wanted to replace the table of the moneychangers with the table of Eucharist which would offer atonement and expiation.<sup>7</sup> Jesus’ demonstration in the Temple and his institution of a quasi-cultic meal set Jesus and his followers on a trajectory away from Judaism. The result is that the holy place has shifted from the Temple to Jesus and his followers as the locus of the divine presence.<sup>8</sup> This can be coupled with Jesus’ teaching where he announces in his own name what the Torah says in God’s name. Jesus effectively sets himself up as an authority equal to or above Torah.<sup>9</sup> It

---

<sup>3</sup> Joseph Klausner, Jesus of Nazareth: His Life, Times, and Teaching, trans. Herbert Danby (London: Allen & Unwin, 1929), 106.

<sup>4</sup> Ibid., 363.

<sup>5</sup> Ibid., 413; cf. Wellhausen, Einleitung, 113: “Jesus war kein Christ, sondern Jude. Er verkündete keinen neuen Glauben, sondern er lehrte den Willen Gottes tun.”

<sup>6</sup> Klausner, Jesus, 368–369. Similarly, another Jewish scholar Richard L. Rubenstein wrote (My Brother Paul [New York: Harper & Row, 1972], 121): “In reality it was not Paul but Jesus who instituted the irreparable breach with established Judaism.”

<sup>7</sup> Jacob Neusner, “Money-Changers in the Temple: The Mishnah’s Explanation,” NTS 35 (1989): 287–290.

<sup>8</sup> Jacob Neusner, A Rabbi Talks with Jesus: An Intermillennial, Interfaith Exchange (New York: Doubleday, 1993), 69.

<sup>9</sup> Neusner, A Rabbi Talks with Jesus, 30–31.

is Jesus' elevation of himself over Temple and Torah that constitutes the tectonic fault line between Jesus and the Judaism of his time. The consequence is that: "The two religious traditions, Christianity and Judaism, in their first statements really do represent different people talking about different things to different people."<sup>10</sup> Viewed this way the very idea of a common Judeo-Christian tradition is a "myth."<sup>11</sup>

On the Christian side, C. H. Dodd argued that Jesus was, in effect, the founder of Christianity.<sup>12</sup> Jesus' ethical teaching, despite some similarities to rabbinic Judaism, was oriented to a different direction, due to Jesus' eschatological perspective where the kingdom was already a present reality confronting people with its demands.<sup>13</sup> Although there is an organic relationship between Jesus' teachings and the matrix of Judaism, his teaching represented a "new departure" from that matrix since his ethical praxis was anchored in a radical imitation of God's attributes rather than in legal casuistry.<sup>14</sup> In Dodd's opinion, Jesus shared many positions with other Jewish teachers, but he went beyond them and this eventually gave way to a "rift" between himself and them on disputed matters. There came a time when this disputation became "an irreconcilable breach."<sup>15</sup> According to Dodd, Jesus' critics rightly observed that his "teaching threatened the integrity of Judaism as a system in which religion and national solidarity were inseparable."<sup>16</sup> It is quite significant for Dodd that Jesus was not trying to reform Judaism, but was seeking to embody a new Israel who would embrace the call of the kingdom.<sup>17</sup> The parable of the vineyard (Mark 12:1–12) acknowledges that Israel is the Lord's vineyard, but the "existing establishment is doomed" and the new Israel will be under a different leadership.<sup>18</sup> The final breach, as it were, occurs in the Last Supper where the announcement of a "new covenant" implies the

---

<sup>10</sup> Neusner, "Moneychangers," 290; similarly Bruce Chilton and Jacob Neusner, Judaism in the New Testament: Practices and Beliefs (London: Routledge, 1995), 6.

<sup>11</sup> Jacob Neusner, Jews and Christians: The Myth of a Common Tradition (London: SCM, 1991).

<sup>12</sup> C. H. Dodd, The Founder of Christianity (Bristol: Shoreline, 1993 [1970]).

<sup>13</sup> Ibid., 56.

<sup>14</sup> Ibid., 63–65.

<sup>15</sup> Ibid., 68, 75.

<sup>16</sup> Ibid., 75–76.

<sup>17</sup> Ibid., 85–86.

<sup>18</sup> Ibid., 131–132.

inauguration of a covenant charter for a new Israel and Jesus installed his disciples as its founding members.<sup>19</sup>

E. P. Sanders has done more than most scholars to situate Jesus in Judaism and to argue that Jesus had no significant dispute with either Judaism in general or the Pharisees in particular. Nonetheless he writes: "I am inclined to look for basic disagreement, beginning even with Jesus, as the source of the Jewish-Christian split."<sup>20</sup> What brought Jesus into conflict with his contemporaries was not abstractions over whether God was merciful or not, but the disputes took concrete form over specific issues that separated Jesus from the Jewish hierarchy. The disputes were symptomatic of a larger question: who spoke for God?<sup>21</sup>

Craig Evans supposes that the "roots of early Christianity's separation from Judaism are found in the teaching of Jesus, the apostles and the New Testament writings; that is, the roots of the separation are found in the earliest forms of Christianity."<sup>22</sup> That is not to say that Jesus or his followers intended to found a new religion that would break away from the mother faith since both Jesus and the early church sought and/or proclaimed eschatological renewal in the context of Jewish faith. In the case of Jesus, every aspect of his social and religious life was thoroughly Jewish, but he also enacted a form of "inclusiveness" with sinners and outcasts that was to have a formative impact upon the later church, which included non-Torah-observant persons within its ranks.<sup>23</sup> Similarly, Stanley Porter and B. R. Pearson state that, rather than a gradual split, the early polemic about Jesus' birth and teaching suggests an early division going back to Jesus' lifetime itself.<sup>24</sup>

<sup>19</sup> Dodd, Founder, 89–90.

<sup>20</sup> E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985), 280.

<sup>21</sup> Ibid., 279–281; idem, "Jesus, Ancient Judaism, and Modern Christianity: The Quest Continues," in Jesus, Judaism and Christian Anti-Judaism: Reading the New Testament after the Holocaust, ed. Paula Fredriksen and Adele Reinhartz (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2002), 31–55; idem, The Historical Figure of Jesus (London: Penguin, 1993), 236–237.

<sup>22</sup> Craig A. Evans, "Christianity and Judaism: Partings of the Ways," in Dictionary of the Late New Testament, ed. Ralph P. Martin and Peter H. Davids (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1997), 159–170, esp. 160; idem, "Root Causes of the Jewish-Christian Rift: From Jesus to Justin," in Christian-Jewish Relations through the Centuries, ed. Stanley E. Porter and Brook W. R. Pearson, JSNTSup 192 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), 20–35.

<sup>23</sup> Evans, "Christianity and Judaism," 160.

<sup>24</sup> Porter and Pearson, "Why the Split?" 110.

In contrast, several studies have argued that all of Jesus' controversial actions and attitudes are plausible within the diverse milieu of Second Temple Judaism.<sup>25</sup> As such Jesus' ministry, however subversive and provocative it was, remained securely within the orbit of "common Judaism"; a Judaism that could accommodate Jesus as much as it could accommodate groups as diverse as the Qumranites, Enochic Jews, Philo, and John the Baptist. The upshot of this view is that Jesus is not directly responsible (or liable) for what became Christianity and its eventual divorce from its parental religion. The parting then has to be attributed to other influences and factors such as the ministry of Paul, the gentilization of the church, and the spread of Christianity into its Greco-Roman environs.

In Geza Vermes' opinion the real founder of Christianity is Paul. It was Paul who incorporated Gentiles into the church without proselytization. In contrast to Jesus, it was Paul who declared the Torah not merely optional but revoked, abolished, and superseded. The creeds of Christianity have very little to do with Jesus the charismatic Galilean Holy Man. The parting is between Jesus and Judaism on the one side and Paul and Christianity on the other side.<sup>26</sup>

To give a Christian example of this perspective, James Dunn contends that there is nothing about Jesus' attitude towards the Temple, nothing in his stance on Torah and Covenant, or even monotheism, that would mark a departure from Judaism since all of Jesus' actions and teachings remain intelligible within the diversity of Second Temple Judaism.<sup>27</sup> Even so, Dunn can still claim: "[I]t is impossible to reasonably dispute that the movement which became known as Christianity has been the most direct and lasting effects of his work. The above

---

<sup>25</sup> The use of the criterion of dissimilarity, especially in relation to Judaism, has had a detrimental effect in pre-empting a separation between Jesus and Judaism. See Tom Holmén, "Doubts About Dissimilarity: Restructuring the main criterion of Jesus-of-history research," in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. Bruce D. Chilton and Craig A. Evans (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 47–80.

<sup>26</sup> Geza Vermes, Jesus the Jew (London: SCM, 1973), 15–17; idem, Jesus and the World of Judaism (London: SCM, 1983), 54–57; idem, The Authentic Gospel of Jesus (London: Penguin, 2004), 413–417.

<sup>27</sup> James D. G. Dunn, The Partings of the Ways between Christianity and Judaism and their Significance for the Character of Christianity (London: SCM, 1991), 55–56, 116, 182; idem, Jesus Remembered: Christianity in the Making, 1 (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003), 563–566.

study, however, makes it clear that there was a very substantive continuity between Jesus' mission and what followed."<sup>28</sup>

This last remark of Dunn is hardly a concession, but is a sober reminder that the Jewish-Christian split, however it relates to Jesus himself, should still be regarded as being part of his "effective history."<sup>29</sup> The controversy and notoriety surrounding Jesus that resulted in his death was replicated by his followers who found themselves initially experiencing persecution from their co-religionists in Jerusalem, regarded with suspicion in the synagogues in the Diaspora, expelled from the synagogues in certain places, and later anathematized by post-70 CE representatives of Judaism. Now Judaism may have been diverse and multifarious, centred on orthopraxy rather than orthodoxy, but somewhere along the way Christians were deemed to have departed from the web of social and religious commitments that marked out Jewish identity in the Greco-Roman world. The realities of apostasy and idolatry signify that Jewish belief and identity had limits.<sup>30</sup> Thus, there came a point where some Jews believed that, in either ethos or ethnos, those who expressed devotion to Jesus had transgressed the boundaries of Jewishness.<sup>31</sup> Lest we think that the expul-

<sup>28</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 890–891.

<sup>29</sup> Steven M. Bryan, Jesus and Israel's Traditions of Judgement and Restoration, SNTSMS 117 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002) 9.

<sup>30</sup> CD I, 18–20; 2 Macc 5:15; 13:7; 3 Macc 1.3; 2.28–33; 7.10–15; 4 Macc 4.11; Wis 3:10; Philo, Virt. 34–44, 182; Vit. Mos. 1.31, 295–305; 2.193; Spec. 1.54–58; 3.29; QG 3.3; Josephus, Ant. 12.240; 18.141; 20.100, 145–146, 200; War 7.46–62; Apion 2.123; Mark 14:64; Acts 6:11–15; 8:1–2; 12:1–3; 14:1–6; 17:1–15; 18:4–7; 21:28; John 9:22; 10:33; 12:42; 16:2; m. Sanh. 10:1; Amidah 12. Root causes of apostasy are normally attributed to idolatry, intermarriage with pagans, hellenization, blasphemy, speaking against Moses and the Prophets, being a "law-breaker," and not observing the covenant "boundary markers" (i.e., food laws, Sabbath-keeping, and circumcision). Of course we must be aware of the problems of defining "heresy" and "apostasy" as rigid and monolithic categories in Second Temple Judaism and also differentiate these from nominal or lax observance of Jewish customs (e.g. Philo, Spec. 1.186). See further J. M. G. Barclay, "Who was Considered an Apostate in the Jewish Diaspora?" in Tolerance and Intolerance in Early Judaism and Christianity, ed. Graham N. Stanton and Guy G. Strouma (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998), 80–98; idem, "Deviance and Apostasy: Some Applications of Deviance Theory to First Century Judaism and Christianity," in Modelling Early Christianity: Social-Scientific Studies of the New Testament in Its Context, ed. Philip Esler (London: Routledge, 1995), 114–127; Lester L. Grabbe, Judaism from Cyrus to Hadrian (London: SCM, 1992), 536–537; W. Horbury, "The Benediction of the Minim and Early Jewish-Christian Controversy," JTS 33 (1982): 19–61; Daniel Boyarin, The Partition of Judeo-Christianity (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004), 66; Stephen G. Wilson, Leaving the Fold: Apostates and Defectors in Antiquity (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2004).

<sup>31</sup> Jack T. Sanders (Schismatics, Sectarians, Dissidents, Deviants: The First One Hundred Years of Jewish-Christians Relations [London: SCM, 1993], 88–89) notes that

sion of Christians from Jewish communities was one-sided, we have every reason to think that the separation was probably accelerated by Christians who purposely wanted to break away from Jewish communities.<sup>32</sup>

Thus, the diverse character of Second Temple Judaism and the Jewishness of Jesus in no way guarantee that Jesus and his followers would continue to exist within the matrix of Judaism. The implication to be drawn is that responsibility for the parting of the ways between Christianity and Judaism cannot be borne alone by later forms of Gentile Christianity, but may well derive from the very genesis of the Jesus movement and owe some debt to the historical Jesus. I am not suggesting that Jesus intended to establish a religious movement independent of Judaism or that the parting is wholly attributable to Jesus. I am advocating instead that several of Jesus' controversial attitudes and actions sowed seeds of division that would eventually evolve into a prickly hedge that partitioned off his later followers from other Jewish groups.

Therefore, the aim of this study is to examine the role and significance of the historical Jesus for the parting of the ways. The manner in which this will be pursued is through outlining (1) the reason for Jesus' execution, and (2) Jesus' disputes with his contemporaries. This study hopes to establish that the mission and message of the historical Jesus were a contributing factor to the eventual parting between Christianity and Judaism.

2. The Death of Jesus

That Jesus was crucified by a coalition of Jewish priests and aristocrats in belated cooperation with a Roman official may not be due purely to the sinister machinations of his accusers. It might have followed on

---

Judaism was not always tolerant and groups like the Samaritans and Essenes were persecuted in the Hasmonean period and James was martyred during a time when Roman power was directly absent from Jerusalem. Paula Fredriksen ("The Birth of Christianity and the Origins of Christian Anti-Judaism," in Jesus, Judaism and Christian Anti-Judaism: Reading the New Testament after the Holocaust, ed. Paula Fredriksen and Adele Reinhartz [Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2002], 8–30, esp. 14) maintains that Diaspora Judaism was inclusive towards outsiders, but exclusive about the conduct of insiders.

<sup>32</sup> Cf. Magnus Zetterholm, The Formation of Christianity in Antioch (London: Routledge, 2003); Alexander J. M. Wedderburn, A History of the First Christians, UBW (London: T&T Clark, 2005), 37–38.

from the opposition that Jesus himself fostered in light of what was deemed politically, socially, and religiously responsible in the context of first-century Palestine.<sup>33</sup> The crucifixion of Jesus may tell us something about Jesus' relationship with the Jewish ruling class, but also about Jesus' position vis-à-vis common Judaism. Jesus' execution is symptomatic of some degree of hostility and rivalry between Jesus and other Jewish leaders. Jesus' death may be taken as the first sure historical marker in a gradual and successive series of hostile encounters between Jews and the Jesus movement. This is evident enough from the passion narratives which are also told from the vantage point of those in a later period who have experienced hostility from various Jewish groups. In which case, we must reckon with the possibility that Jewish opposition to Christians (pre- and post-70 CE) stands in some historical relation to Jewish opposition to Jesus. That Jesus was crucified in Jerusalem ca. 30 CE is arguably the most secure historical fact about the historical Jesus that we possess (1 Cor 15:3; Mark 15:25–26, 37; John 19:18–19, 30; Tacitus, Ann. 15.44; Josephus, Ant. 18.63–64).<sup>34</sup> Problems occur, however, when we try to penetrate beyond the mere fact of Jesus' death and attempt to exploit the passion narratives for further information about its precise circumstances. We have to contend with significant issues relating to the authenticity of the trial/interrogation stories, the tendency of the evangelists to exonerate the Romans and implicate the Jewish leadership/crowds, and the theological overlay that clearly pervades the stories in relation to early Christian theology.<sup>35</sup> We must unfortunately bypass the majority of the debate and focus on one particular subject: why did Jesus die and what does that have to do with subsequent Jewish-Christian relations? On the first part, Vermes asserts that Jesus died because he did the wrong thing (caused a commotion), in the wrong place (the Temple), and at the wrong time (Passover).<sup>36</sup> Vermes is correct in so far as Jesus' provocative action in the Temple was the trigger (or final straw) that drove the Jewish leadership to move against him. From the Roman side (and acknowledged by the pragmatic Jewish leaders in John

<sup>33</sup> Raymond E. Brown, The Death of the Messiah, 2 vols., ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1994), 1:391–92.

<sup>34</sup> N. A. Dahl, "The Crucified Messiah," in Jesus the Christ (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991), 27–47, esp. 29; Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 11; idem, Historical Figure, 11.

<sup>35</sup> See Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide, trans. John Bowden (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998 [1996]), 440–473.

<sup>36</sup> Geza Vermes, The Religion of Jesus the Jew (London: SCM, 1993), x.

11:48–50) the death of a religious radical was necessary to keep the peace amidst the swelling of crowds in Jerusalem at Passover when nationalistic feelings would be most acute (cf. Josephus, War 1:88). But there may have been other factors as well and it is no surprise that our sources are variegated and complex on the actual cause of Jesus' arrest, trial and crucifixion. The reasons the sources offer are as follows:

(1) A false prophet who was leading the nation astray. This charge is made explicit in the Babylonian Talmud, "Jesus was hanged on the eve of Passover... He is going forth to be stoned because he practiced sorcery and enticed and led Israel astray" (b. Sanh. 43a; cf. 107b). The accusation of leading Israel astray also appears in Christian literature (Luke 23:2, 14; Matt 27:63–64; John 7:11–12, 47; Justin, Dial. 69.7; 108.2; T. Levi 16.3; Acts of Thomas 48, 96, 102, 106, 107). Theissen and Merz object to the authenticity of the charge since it does not appear in the earliest source (Mark 14), Luke reflects political agitation rather than religious matters, Jesus did not lead anyone into idolatry, and the charge of leading the nation astray derives from a period in which Jews and Christians had separated.<sup>37</sup> In response several things can be said. First, the indictment in the Talmud seems to have been made independently of Christian interpretation of Jesus' death and is probably rooted in historical tradition.<sup>38</sup> The Jewish sources are dissimilar from Christian accounts in that the former have a double charge of magic and false prophecy and also refer to stoning rather than crucifixion, which are absent from the gospels. Second, in the Talmudic horizon, the apostasy of (Jewish) Christians may comprise the target of the accusation from the Jewish side (i.e. they are the ones led astray by Jesus), but that does not necessarily establish the origin of the charge itself. It is far more probable that Jewish leaders have uplifted a known charge against Jesus and applied it to his followers, than that the evangelists have taken a known Jewish polemic against them and applied it to Jesus since the accusation of being a false prophet is attested in multiple pre-passion complexes (Mark 6:4/Luke 4:24/John 4:44/Gos. Thom. 31/P. Oxy 1.6; Luke 7:39; John 7:52). Third, contra Theissen, in the Markan passion narrative there is an implicit allegation of false prophecy (Mark 14:65; 15:29). Fourth, this type of accusation might also explain elements of the trial itself since in the Tosefta those accused of such a crime could have the normal rules for a trial set aside (t. Sanh. 10:11) and be killed during the time of a festival (t. Sanh. 11:7). Additionally, the charge that a Jewish prophet was leading people astray remains historically plausible in the first-century context given that Josephus said similar things about impostors who purportedly filled Judea with deceptions (War 2.259). Fifth, Luke may depict the Sanhedrin as touting Jesus as a political “agitator,” but that is only because they knew Jesus to have stated objectives that would interfere with the political status quo.<sup>39</sup> Sixth, blasphemy can be connected with more than idolatry, as it can also pertain to slander (e.g. Exod 22:28; Lev 24:16). By speaking against God’s Temple or by claiming that he would destroy the Temple, Jesus was potentially committing an act of slander.

<sup>37</sup> Theissen and Merz, Historical Jesus, 463; cf. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 300–301.

<sup>38</sup> N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, COQG 2 (London: SPCK, 1996), 548.

The background to the charge derives from Deuteronomy 13 and 18 about false prophets and diviners who lead the nation into idolatry and make false prophecies. Jesus was purportedly leading the nation astray not in the sense of guiding Israel into idolatry, but in so far as his attitudes represented a competing model for how to be Israel. Jesus was a false prophet in the sense that he was performing “signs” like the sign prophets and was filling many Jews with hopes of liberation.<sup>40</sup> Jesus’ dramatic action in the Temple may likewise have promoted a concern that he was a false prophet as later was Jesus ben Ananias for his prediction of Jerusalem’s destruction (Josephus, War 6.300–309). This assumes that Jesus’ contemporaries recognized him as a prophet. Something is discernible from the contours of Jesus’ ministry that followed the pattern of Elijah (Luke 4:24–27; 7:11–17; Luke 7:59–60/Matt 8:21–22) and the script of Isaiah (Luke 4:16–21; Luke 7:22/Matt 11:5). Jesus' prophetic actions would have broadcasted this further (Luke 11:20/Matt 12:28; Luke 7:18–23/Matt 11:4–6; Mark 3:13–19; Luke 22:28–30/Matt 19:28–30; Mark 3:16/Matt 16:17–19; Mark 2:13–17, 18–22, 23–28; 6:11, 30–44; 7:1–23; 11:1–10, 11–19; 14:22–25; Luke 5:1–11)<sup>41</sup> and he was regarded by the crowds as a prophet (Mark 6:14–16; 8:28; Matt 21:11, 46; Luke 7:16–17, 39; John 4:19; 6:14–15; 7:40; 9:17).

---

<sup>39</sup> Cf. further August Strobel, Die Stunde der Wahrheit, WUNT 21 (Tübingen: Mohr/Siebeck, 1980), 80–92; Martin Hengel, The Charismatic Leader and His Followers, trans. James C. G. Greig (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1981), 42; D. Neale, “Was Jesus a Mesith?” TynBul 44 (1993): 89–101; Graham N. Stanton, “Jesus of Nazareth: A Magician and False Prophet Who Deceived God’s People,” in Jesus of Nazareth Lord and Christ, ed. Joel B. Green and Max Turner (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1994), 164–180; Brown, Death of the Messiah, 1:541–544; Scot McKnight, Jesus and His Death (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2005), 95–96.

<sup>40</sup> On the sign prophets see Ant. 18.85–87 (Samaritan); Ant. 20.97–98; Acts 5:36 (Theudas); Ant. 20.169–172; War 2.261–263; Acts 21:38 (Egyptian); Life 424–425; War 7.437–442 (Jonathan the refugee); and in general War 2.259. Jesus’ mighty deeds should be understood similarly as comprising part of a prophetic program that produced “signs” which, in light of scripture, indicated that the restoration of the nation was at hand. On the expectations for (political) liberation created by Jesus’ ministry see Luke 9:54–55, 24:19–21, John 6:14–15 and Acts 1:6.

In primitive christology Jesus was regarded not merely as a prophet but as the prophet of Deut 18:15 (Acts 3:22; 7:37). Thus, Christians claimed not only that Jesus spoke for God, but that he did so in a final and definitive way (e.g. Heb 1:1–2; Rev 1:8; 21:6; 22:13). That itself was properly grounded in Jesus' own perception of his role as the agent par excellence of eschatological restoration (e.g. Mark 12:1–12; Luke 13:34–45/Matt 23:37–39) where he was, to use Marinus de Jonge's term, God's final envoy.<sup>42</sup> Christians were not accused of being false prophets themselves, but they were regarded as maintaining a perception of Israel's raison d'être and exhibiting a praxis that seriously endangered the boundaries of Jewish identity, hence the charge of changing the "customs" of the Jews (Acts 6:14; 21:21; 28:17). This is beyond mere debates about the minutiae of law observance; it includes a charge of reconfiguring Jewish identity and the boundaries that marked out Jews from Gentiles. The prophetic ministry of Jesus and his subversive agenda for national salvation were maintained and intensified by the early church and it continued to be a point of contention with other Jewish groups. If Jesus was accused of leading the nation astray, then the post-70 CE Jewish polemic tacitly mirrored in Matt 27:63–64 and John 7:11–12 suggests that many Jews thought that Jewish Christians had in fact gone astray (cf. Polycarp, Mart. 12.2).<sup>43</sup>

(2) Blasphemy. Mark and Matthew both agree that a charge of blasphemy was included at Jesus' trial (Mark 14:64; Matt 26:65). Such an allegation is known elsewhere outside of the passion narratives (Mark 2:7; John 10:33–36).<sup>44</sup>

<sup>41</sup> Cf. M. D. Hooker, The Signs of a Prophet: The Prophetic Actions of Jesus (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1997); Scot McKnight, "Jesus and Prophetic Actions," BBR 10 (2000): 197–232 (esp. 223–224).

<sup>42</sup> Marinus de Jonge, God's Final Envoy: Early Christology and Jesus' own View of his Mission (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1998).

<sup>43</sup> Cf. J. Louis Martyn, History and Theology in the Fourth Gospel (Nashville: Abingdon, 1979), 64–81, 158–160.

E. P. Sanders, among others, rejects the authenticity of this charge at Jesus' trial.<sup>45</sup> The most compelling objections of Sanders are that Jesus' statement in Mark 14:62 about the enthronement of the Son of Man is likely to be a Christian creation and it is hard to imagine an actual train of transmission whereby the events of the trial were transmitted to others. As for a chain of transmission that communicated the proceedings of trial to others, it was perhaps sympathizers of Jesus among the Sanhedrin such as Joseph of Arimathea (e.g. Mark 15:43) or the priests themselves who reported the outcome of the trial to the crowds. Crowds, sympathizers, and followers would have been anxious to know the circumstances surrounding Jesus' death. Sanders concedes that speaking against the Temple could have conceivably led to a charge of blasphemy, but the evangelists attribute the blasphemy charge not to the accusation about Jesus destroying and rebuilding the Temple, but to Jesus' answer to the high priest's question. Speaking against the Temple does appear to be a legitimate basis for blasphemy leading to punishment as is evident from Jeremiah (Jer 26:18–19), the exile of the Teacher of Righteousness (1QpHab IX, 9–10; XI, 4–8), Stephen (Acts 6:11, 14), and Jesus ben Ananias (War 6.300–309). The reason why this was not sufficient of itself to condemn Jesus is provided by the evangelists: the witnesses could not agree (Mark 14:56–57). What is more, speaking against the Temple may have been an insufficient charge to warrant the intervention of the Romans and to justify the death penalty. Speaking against the Temple might also have been inadequate to achieve another of the high priest's aims, which was to have Jesus' reputation disgraced on religious grounds. If the high priest can pin both a messianic claim and a charge of blasphemy on Jesus then he achieves both aims, viz., he gives ample rationale for Roman involvement in a capital offence and has Jesus utter something that would be religiously offensive to the pious pilgrims in Jerusalem for

<sup>44</sup> Cf. Brown, Death of the Messiah, 1:544–547.

<sup>45</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 297–298; see the response by Darrell L. Bock, “The Son of Man Seated at God's Right Hand and the Debate over Jesus' ‘Blasphemy,’” in Jesus of Nazareth Lord and Christ, ed. Green and Turner, 181–91; idem, “Jewish Expressions in Mark 14.61–62 and the Authenticity of the Jewish Examination of Jesus,” JSHJ 1 (2003): 147–59; Robert H. Gundry, Mark: A Commentary on His Apology for the Cross (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1993), 902–903. More agnostic is Brown, Death of the Messiah, 1:532–547.

Passover. Thus, the switch from a charge of speaking against the Temple to a messianic question in search of a political and religious offence by Jesus was not the invention of Mark, but a reasonable action by the high priest in light of the circumstances.

Caiaphas asks Jesus an explicit messianic question to which Jesus retorts with an enigmatic allusion to the enthronement of the Son of Man. The authenticity and meaning of the Son of Man sayings are among the most disputed areas of gospel scholarship; still, I would be prepared to argue that they are largely authentic and identify Jesus as the messianic representative of Israel. In Mark 14:62, Jesus is saying that he shall be enthroned as God's vice-regent and that, in contrast to the current circumstances, he is the one who is entitled to render judgment and exercise the divine prerogatives. That coheres with the Rabbinic tradition that Rabbi Aqiba was reported to have said that the multiple thrones referred to in Dan 7:9 include one for God and one for the son of David, a view that was denounced by Rabbi Yose as profaning God (b. Hag. 14a; b. Sanh. 38b). The charge of blasphemy is then intelligible not as a result of Jesus' uttering the tetragrammaton (e.g. m. Sanh. 7:5), but because of his speaking against the Temple and claiming for himself the status or privileges that belonged to one enthroned beside God.<sup>46</sup>

It is noteworthy that at certain points Christians were regarded as committing blasphemy by their Jewish opponents. In Acts 6, Luke records that Stephen was stoned for speaking blasphemous words against Moses and God (6:11) to the effect that "Jesus of Nazareth will destroy this place and will change the customs that Moses handed on to us" (6:14).<sup>47</sup> I shall have more to say later about Jesus' attitude to

---

<sup>46</sup> Cf. Adela Yarbro Collins, "The Charge of Blasphemy in Mark 14.64," JSNT 26 (2004): 379–401.

<sup>47</sup> The fact that the witnesses against Stephen are called "false" (ψευδής) does not mean that the charge itself is false (contra Craig Hill, Hellenists and Hebrews: Reappraising Division within the Earliest Church [Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992]). Jesus may well have said things about the Mosaic law and the Temple that were regarded as offensive to Jews. What is "false" in their testimony is that they accuse Stephen of speaking blasphemies against Moses and God (Robert W. Wall, "Acts of the Apostles," in New Interpreter's Bible, ed. Leander Keck, 10 vols. [Nashville: Abingdon, 2002], 122). On the historical tradition behind the accusation against Stephen see Gerd Lüdemann, Early Christianity according to the Traditions in Acts: A Commentary, trans. John Bowden (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989), 82–83. A similar prediction is found in Mark 14:57–58 (cf. 15:29) where the witnesses also bear "false witness" (ψευδομαρτυρέω) against Jesus on the charge. But Mark thinks that the testimony is only partly false.

Torah and Temple; for the moment we can note that the charge brought against Stephen in Luke's telling is one that is taken directly from dominical tradition (Mark 14:58; 15:29; Matt 26:61; John 2:19; Gos. Thom. 71).<sup>48</sup> Whereas, for matters of survival, the Aramaic-speaking church emphasized those aspects of Jesus' teaching that fitted comfortably within Judaism, a group of Greek-speaking Jewish Christians began to emphasize those elements of Jesus' teaching that were at odds with commonly held convictions in Judaism. In Justin's Dialogues with Trypho the Jew, Justin depicts Trypho as saying: "For you utter many blasphemies, in that you seek to persuade us that this crucified man was with Moses and Aaron, and spoke to them in the pillar of the cloud; then that he became man, was crucified, and ascended up to heaven, and comes again to earth, and ought to be worshipped" (Dial. Tryph. 38; cf. 79).<sup>49</sup> What is blasphemous to Trypho is not any particular aspect of Jesus' teaching, but rather the entire christological narrative. It is blasphemous in the sense that this narrative makes claims about Christ and God that Jews are unable to accept. For Trypho the redefinition of theism, the crucifixion of the messiah, and the incorporation of Jesus into a form of binitarian worship by Christians cannot be accommodated within the web of Jewish belief.<sup>50</sup> Although I maintain that the blasphemy charge against Jesus has a historical kernel, its retention in the tradition owes its existence to the fact that the memory continued to be relevant for communities that were assaulted with claims that their basic christological convictions about messiahship and divine sonship were blasphemous.<sup>51</sup> Thus, like Jesus, Christians were also accused of blasphemy sometimes for exhibiting similar beliefs about Torah and the Temple and sometimes for

---

The error is their assumption that Jesus would build "another" (ἄλλον) Temple of the same kind, that is, another physical temple (Bryan, Jesus, 231–232).

<sup>48</sup> On authenticity see e.g. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 71–76; Dunn, Partings, 167; idem, Jesus Remembered, 631.

<sup>49</sup> Elsewhere, Justin (Dial. Tryph. 35, 80, 82) can concede to Trypho that some things Christians say are blasphemous, but they are uttered by heretics who are just as blasphemous to Christians as they are to Jews.

<sup>50</sup> On this latter point see Larry W. Hurtado, "Pre-70 CE Jewish Opposition to Christ-Devotion," JTS 50 (1999): 35–58; idem, Lord Jesus Christ (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003).

<sup>51</sup> Hurtado, "Pre-70 CE Jewish Opposition," 37; cf. C. P. Anderson, "The Trial of Jesus as Jewish-Christian Polarization: Blasphemy and Polemic in Mark's Gospel," in Anti-Judaism in Early Christianity: Paul and the Gospels, ed. Peter Richardson (Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1986), 107–125.

their claims that Jesus participated in the divine identity and was an object of religious devotion of the order that was normally afforded only to Yahweh. Of course Christians did not accept the blasphemy charge lying down and there is good evidence that they thought that the accusation could be returned.<sup>52</sup>

(3) A messianic claimant. That Jesus was crucified due to a perceived messianic claim is evident from the question posed to him by the high priest (Mark 14:61) and from the titulus "King of the Jews" on the cross (Mark 15:26; John 19:19).<sup>53</sup> Whether Jesus claimed to be the Messiah is mooted in scholarship. It has been customary to argue that a messianic christology owes its origin to the post-Easter church which thought that Jesus' resurrection implied his messianic identity.<sup>54</sup> Several scholars suppose that Jesus never accepted the designation and expressly rejected it. If the Messianism of Jesus does have a pre-Easter origin then the association of Jesus with the Messiah may have been due to the enthusiasm of his followers who began to proclaim him as such especially upon his entrance into Jerusalem.<sup>55</sup> According to Hengel: "Today the unmessianic Jesus has almost become a dogma among many New Testament scholars."<sup>56</sup>

There remain, nevertheless, strong indications that Jesus did make an implicit claim to be the Messiah and that it was determinative for his being handed over to the Romans.<sup>57</sup> In the first place, as Weiss and Schweitzer pointed out, there is absolutely no reason why the resurrection should be said to necessitate the messianic identity of Jesus.<sup>58</sup>

<sup>52</sup> Acts 13:45; Jas 2:7; Rev 2:9; Ignatius, Eph. 10.2.

<sup>53</sup> It was customary in Roman executions to display the charge of the victim during the execution process (Suetonius, Caligula 32.2; Domitian 10.1; Dio Cassius 54.3.6-7; Juvenal, Sat. 6.230; Pliny, Ep. 6.10.3; 9.19.3; Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 5.1.44). On the authenticity of the titulus see E. Bammel, "Titulus," in Jesus and the Politics of His Day, ed. E. Bammel and C. F. D. Moule (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984), 353-364, esp. 363.

<sup>54</sup> William Wrede, Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1901).

<sup>55</sup> Cf. e.g. Vermes, Jesus the Jew, 148-149; Paula Fredriksen, Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews (New York: Random, 1999), 234-59; Brown, The Death of the Messiah, 1:475-483; Dunn, Partings, 167-169; idem, Jesus Remembered, 652-654.

<sup>56</sup> Martin Hengel, Studies in Early Christology (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1995), 16.

<sup>57</sup> Cf. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, 477-539; Hengel, Studies in Early Christology, 1-71; Michael F. Bird, Are You the One Who is to Come? The Historical Jesus and the Messianic Question (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 2009).

<sup>58</sup> J. Weiss, Das Urchristentum (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1917), 22; Albert Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus, trans. W. Montgomery (London: A&C Black, 1945 [1906]), 335-345 (esp. 343); Dahl, "Crucified Messiah," 38.

Second, elements of Jesus' pre-passion ministry have messianic overtones. Jesus' action in preaching a gospel and his work of healings and exorcisms correspond to the messianic vocation as spelled out in the Messianic Apocalypse from Qumran: "He [Messiah] will heal the badly wounded and will make the dead alive, he will proclaim good news to the poor" (4Q521 II, 12). In fact, in a pericope from Q (Luke 7:18–23/Matt 11:2–6) Jesus answers an explicit messianic question from followers of John the Baptist with an answer along the lines of 4Q521, "Go back and report to John what you have seen and heard: The blind receive sight, the lame walk, those who have leprosy are cured, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, and the good news is preached to the poor" (Luke 7:22/Matt 11:5).<sup>59</sup> There was indeed a "messianic secret" operative during Jesus' ministry that was designed to disassociate Jesus from the messianism of other Jews such as that found in Pss. Sol. 17.21–46 and the would-be kings like Simon and Athronges (Ant. 17.273–274, 278). The "messianic secret" is historically authentic as apocalyptic figures often believed themselves to be recipients of divine information not yet ready to be publicly manifested.<sup>60</sup> The confession of Jesus' messiahship at Caesarea-Philippi is perhaps one such incident where, following Peter's confession, Jesus identifies his messiahship with the sufferings of the coming tribulation (Mark 8:27–31). The self-reference of Jesus as the "Son of Man" opens up a series of perennial debates, but the notion that it was a cryptic messianic title is not unmerited.<sup>61</sup> Third, Jesus' ministry in Jerusalem in his final days can be said to have a messianic motif in so far as the triumphal entry, the cleansing of the Temple, and parabolic utterances like the parable of the tenants all point in the direction of a carefully crafted messianic claim. Ben Meyers wrote, "the entry into Jerusalem and the cleansing of the Temple constituted a messianic demonstration, a messianic critique, a messianic fulfilment event, and a sign of the messianic restoration of

<sup>59</sup> On authenticity see Michael F. Bird, Jesus and the Origins of the Gentile Mission, LNTS (London: T&T Clark, 2007), 64–67.

<sup>60</sup> Jonathan Knight, Jesus: An Historical and Theological Investigation (London: T&T Clark, 2004), 138–145.

<sup>61</sup> Cf. K. Müller, "Menschensohn," BZ 16 (1972): 161–87; 17 (1973): 52–66; William Horbury, "The Messianic Associations of the Son of Man," in Messianism Among Jews and Christians (London: T&T Clark, 2003), 125–155; Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, 512–519.

Israel."<sup>62</sup> The Temple and messiah are intimately linked since, according to 2 Sam 7:14 and Zech 6:12, the Davidic Son/Heir is also builder of the Temple (cf. 1Q174 III, 10–13; Tg. Zech. 6:12).<sup>63</sup> Herod had tried to legitimize his rights to the Jewish throne precisely by refurbishing the Temple on a grand scale. Ultimately we should accept that Jesus spoke of a kingdom, Jesus saw himself as having a unique role in establishing and ordering that kingdom, Jesus was executed as a messianic pretender, and after his death his followers continued to believe that he would return to establish the kingdom.<sup>64</sup> We may not have here an unassailable case for Jesus' messiahship, but one as good as we could imagine given the nature of our sources.

The title Χριστός ("Christ") is ubiquitous in early Christian usage.<sup>65</sup> When the title is taken together with the designation χριστιανοί ("Christians")<sup>66</sup> they hold some significance for the parting of the ways. The very act of proclaiming a Messiah could prove divisive. For a start, not all Jews believed in a Messiah or even wanted one. For someone to make a messianic claim during the Roman period would always lead, intentionally or not, to one sure outcome: bloodshed. A Jewish Messiah climbs to the Jewish throne over the bodies of Jewish martyrs. Furthermore, those that did hope for a Messiah had varied perspectives on what kind of Messiah would come.

What is incredible in the Christian claim is that it is a crucified Jew who is identified as Israel's Messiah. Paul states that a crucified Messiah was a point of contention with his Jewish compatriots and a point of compromise with his Jewish Christian opponents (1 Cor 1:18–23; Rom 9:32–33; Gal 5:11; 6:12–14; Phil 3:18). Mark's Gospel is arguably an apology for the cross.<sup>67</sup> A crucified Messiah is more than an "insufferable paradox"<sup>68</sup> or an "obstacle to Jewish conversion to Christianity."<sup>69</sup>

<sup>62</sup> Ben F. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus (London: SCM, 1979), 199; cf. Ben Witherington, The Christology of Jesus (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990), 215.

<sup>63</sup> Otto Betz, "Die Frage nach dem messianischen Bewusstsein Jesu," NovT 6 (1963): 24–37.

<sup>64</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 307–308.

<sup>65</sup> Cf. Hengel, Studies in Early Christology, 1–15.

<sup>66</sup> Acts 11:26; 26:28–29; 1 Pet 4:16; Tacitus, Ann. 15.44; Suetonius, Nero 16; Pliny the Younger, Ep. 10.96.1–5; Josephus, Ant. 18.64; Ignatius, Rom. 3.2.

<sup>67</sup> Gundry, Mark, 1022–26; Michael F. Bird, "Jesus is the Christ: Messianic Apologetics in the Gospel of Mark," RTR 64 (2005): 1–14.

<sup>68</sup> Jacob Neusner, "Varieties of Judaism in the Formative Age," in Jewish Spirituality, ed. A. Green (London: SCM, 1989), 171–197, esp. 190.

<sup>69</sup> Sanders, Schismatics, 92–93.

There was a real offence here, but why? In short, the Messiah was meant to be the representative of Israel par excellence, thus “[t]he cross is offensive to Jews because a crucified Messiah implies a crucified Israel.”<sup>70</sup> A crucified Messiah forced a reconfiguration of the Jewish belief mosaic on topics such as kingship, vindication, eschatology, restoration, and the fate of the Gentiles. The messiahship of Jesus was an obvious dividing point between Jewish and Christian communities (see John 9:22; Justin, 1 Apol. 31.5–6; Dial. Tryph. 108), but its significance for the Jewish-Christian split can be easily exaggerated.<sup>71</sup> In the second century Rabbi Aqiba proposed that Simon bar Kochba was the Messiah (y. Taan. 68d) and when Kochba was crucified by the Romans it was fairly evident that Aqiba was gravely mistaken. But no one thought that Aqiba had apostatized or departed from Judaism.<sup>72</sup> J. Weiss noted that: “It was no breach of the law if they chose to consider a dead teacher as the Messiah.”<sup>73</sup> Similarly, Günther Bornkamm argued that we should reject the idea that “for an orthodox Jew like [Paul] belief in Jesus as the Messiah was of itself sufficient reason for persecution.”<sup>74</sup> That would be true for the followers of Jesus as it was for the followers of Sabbatai Svi.<sup>75</sup> More likely, then, it was the persistent proclamation of a crucified Messiah coupled with devotion centred on Jesus by Christians that constituted the christological component of the parting.

The very name χριστιανοί signifies that Jesus as “Christ” contributed to the parting in some locations. According to Luke, the title was first used to describe Christians in Antioch (Acts 11:26). Was the title “Christians” first created by Jesus-followers themselves<sup>76</sup> or by outsid-

<sup>70</sup> N. T. Wright, “The Paul of History and the Apostle of Faith,” TynBul 29 (1978): 61–88, esp. 68.

<sup>71</sup> Cf. C. J. Setzer, “‘You Invent a Christ!’ Christological Claims as Points of Jewish-Christian Dispute,” USQR 44 (1991): 315–328; Evans, “Root Causes,” 20–35; A. J. Hultgren, “Paul’s Pre-Christian Persecutions of the Church: Their Purpose Locale and Nature,” JBL 95 (1976): 97–111, esp. 103; Paula A. Fredriksen, From Jesus to Christ (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2000), 147–148.

<sup>72</sup> Wedderburn, First Christians, 34; Christopher Rowland, Christian Origins (London: SCM, 1985), 78–79.

<sup>73</sup> Johannes Weiss, Earliest Christianity: A History of the Period A.D. 30–150 (New York: Harper and Row, 1959), 170.

<sup>74</sup> Günther Bornkamm, Paul (New York: Harper & Row, 1971), 15.

<sup>75</sup> Cf. W. D. Davies, “From Schweitzer to Scholem: Reflections on Sabbatai Svi,” JBL 95 (1976): 529–558.

<sup>76</sup> Helge Botermann, Das Judendikt des Kaisers Claudius: Römische Stadt und Christiani im 1. Jahrhundert, Hermes Einzelschriften 71 (Stuttgart: Steiner, 1996), 144–188.

ers like pagan authorities?<sup>77</sup> The Jesus movement already had their own names to identify themselves including "the Way," "disciples," and "the ekklesia." The use of "Christian" as self-designation does not appear until Ignatius of Antioch. Non-Christian Jews, it seems, referred to Christians as a αἵρεσις ("sect") and Ναζωραῖοι or Nasrayya ("Nazarenes").<sup>78</sup> The use of "Christian" could refer to any number of Jewish groups with messianic aspirations. What is more, the -ανοί/-iani suffix is a Latinism and points to a non-Jewish origin by pagans. It was used predominantly of political groupings around figures like Herod (Ἡρωδῖανοί) and Caesar (Καίσαρειανοί).<sup>79</sup> The political dimension of the term is probably indebted to the description of Jesus as κύριος by the early church which could quite easily elicit a perceived counter-imperial connotation especially in conjunction with a messianic claim (e.g. Acts 17:3.7). That would be significant because Jewish messianic expectations were known to pagans (Tacitus, Hist. 5.13; Seutonius, Vesp. 4.5) and the veneration of a Jew known to have been crucified by a Roman official was likely to provoke suspicion by authorities (Tacitus, Ann. 15.44). So why did pagans coin the designation "Christians"? It did not come about as a way of designating a religious group that had both Jewish and Gentile adherents, since synagogues in Antioch had Gentile sympathizers and pagan associations had Jewish members.<sup>80</sup> What probably stood out was that Gentiles were attaching themselves to a Jewish messianic group that was either separate from or on the fringe of Jewish communities in Antioch. Just

<sup>77</sup> G. Schneider, EDNT 3:478; W. Grundmann, TDNT 9:536–537; Wedderburn, First Christians, 69–70; Eckhard J. Schnabel, Early Christian Mission (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2004 [2002]), 1:794; Rainer Riesner, Paul's Early Period: Chronology, Mission Strategy, Theology, trans. D. Scott (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1998), 112; Martin Hengel and Anna Maria Schwemer, Paul between Damascus and Antioch, trans. John Bowden (London, SCM, 1997), 203, 225–230; Adolf Harnack, The Mission and Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries, trans. James Moffatt (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1961 [1904–1905]), 1:53–54, 411–412; E. A. Judge, "Judaism and the Rise of Christianity: A Roman Perspective," TynBul 45 (1994): 355–368.

<sup>78</sup> Acts 24:5, 14; 28:22; Justin, Dial. Tryph. 108; Tertullian, Adv. Marc. 4.8. See Richard Bauckham, "Why Were the Early Christians Called Nazarenes?" Mishkan 38 (2003): 80–85.

<sup>79</sup> Cf. Martin Hengel, "Das früheste Christentum als eine jüdische messianische und universalistische Bewegung," in Judaica, Hellenistica et Christiana: Kleine Schriften 2, WUNT 109 (Tübingen: Mohr/Siebeck, 1999), 200–218; Hengel and Schwemer, Paul, 228–229.

<sup>80</sup> Contra Riesner, Paul's Early Period, 112; W. A. Meeks and R. W. Wilken, Jews and Christians in Antioch in the First Four Centuries, SBLBS 13 (Ann Arbor: Scholars Press, 1978), 15–16.

as “Judaizer” could refer to Gentiles who took to Jewish customs in Antioch (Josephus, War 2.463; cf. Gal 2:14), “Christian” denoted those who joined this Jewish messianic sect. There might also be a pejorative sense to the term as “partisan of Christ,” “client of Christ,” or perhaps even “sycophant of Christ.” 1 Peter, also from Asia Minor, states that persons should not be ashamed to suffer as a “Christian” and a sense of derision is implicit (1 Pet 4:16). By the time of Ignatius, however, “Christian” has become an established and celebrated self-reference by Christians in Asia Minor, so that Ignatius can urge the Romans to pray that: “I may not merely be called a Christian, but really found to be one” (Rom. 3.2). Not only did Ignatius prompt reaction from pagan authorities, but he also warned of too close association of Christianity with Judaism (Phil. 6.1; Magn. 10.3). In Syria, then, the appellation of “Christian” was coined by pagans in the early 40’s to describe a movement somehow of but not in the Jewish synagogues of Antioch, and it was used by Christians in the early second century to differentiate themselves from Jews.

A separate identity for Christians seems to have developed also in Rome by the mid-first century. Suetonius reports that Claudius expelled the Jews from Rome on account of a certain “Chrestus” (Claud. 25.4) in ca. 49 CE. There is no reference to “Jesus” or Iousiani, but to “Chrestus” (a probable Latinism of Χριστός). The origin of the tumult in the Jewish communities in Rome probably concerned the application of the title of “Christ” to Jesus by Jewish Christians.<sup>81</sup> The expulsion, which was not the first exile of Jews from Rome (others happened in 139 BCE and 19 CE), resulted also in the expulsion of Jewish Christians from Rome as evidenced by the arrival of Priscilla and Aquila in Corinth (Acts 18:2) and the return of the Jewish Christians in 54 CE arguably occasioned Paul’s epistle to the Romans (esp. Rom 14:1–15:13). Yet in a period less than ten years later, Tacitus can refer to those “the crowd called Christians” as experiencing a merciless pogrom at the hand of Nero in the early 60’s CE (Tacitus, Ann. 15.44). These Christians were perceived by the public and by the imperial <sup>81</sup> It is quite possible that the Jewish Christians in Rome were preaching a gospel similar to Paul that created furor (Wedderburn, First Christians, 186). After the expulsion, Romans Jews would be naturally wary of associations with Christians (J. C. Walters, “Romans, Jews, and Christians: The Impact of the Romans on Jewish/Christian Relations in First-Century Rome,” in Judaism and Christianity in First-Century Rome, ed. K. P. Donfried and Peter Richardson [Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1998], 175–194, esp. 178–179).

---

apparatus as separate from the Jewish community in Rome. There is no hint that Tacitus has confused them with Roman Jews, since Tacitus knew full well about Jewish communities in Rome (Tacitus, Hist. 5.5). Thus, there was a transition going on, since in 49 CE Christians were simply part of the Roman Jewish community, while in the early 60's Christians appear to have become a recognizably separate social entity from the Jewish community. The development of Christianity in Rome from the 40's to 60's is complex and there were undoubtedly a number of social, political, and religious factors that contributed to a differentiation between Jews and Christians.<sup>82</sup> This differentiation is partly attributable to the house churches in Rome which were constituted by a Gentile majority with a Jewish minority (cf. Rom 1:13; 11:1–25; 15:16–20, 27; 16:4).

What should be clear is that: (1) Jesus' messianic claim was partly responsible for his execution by the Jewish leaders in co-operation with Rome; (2) Jesus as Messiah was an obvious point of contention between Jews and Christians; (3) the designation "Christian" was probably coined by pagan authorities in locations such as Antioch and Rome to distinguish adherents of the Jesus movement from Jews.

3. Jesus' Dispute with his Contemporaries

Jack T. Sanders commences his study of first-century Jewish-Christians relations with the death of Jesus, but never really looks before that, to the period of Jesus' ministry to see if anything of Jesus' message was of significance for the hostility in later Jewish-Christian relations.<sup>83</sup> In contrast, the approach outlined here contends that constituent factors in the Jewish-Christian rift do have their roots in Jesus' ministry. James Dunn and others have maintained that all of Jesus' disputes with his contemporaries can be understood as intra-Jewish debates which are paralleled in the conflicts of Jewish factionalism. This is undoubtedly true and is a necessary caveat with which to preface our discussion. Sociological factors such as group identity, deviant labelling, and sectarian rivalry likewise provide reasons why Jesus provoked opposition. I am not advocating that Jesus urged a departure from Judaism, but various facets of his aims and actions were controversial precisely within Judaism. When those convictions were taken up and developed further by followers in the post-Easter church, in conjunction with a continuing process of self-definition in Judaism especially in the aftermath of 70 CE, with significant increases in the number Gentile adherents to Christianity who had no former Jewish association, amidst diverse socio-religious settings permeated by Hellenism to various degrees, then the parting of the ways was probably inevitable. But before the destruction of Jerusalem, before the Gentile mission, and before Easter, there were several fault lines developing. I wish to briefly explicate those here, and I begin with Jesus' confrontation with his contemporaries.

---

<sup>82</sup> Cf. Thomas H. Tobin, Paul's Rhetoric in Its Contexts (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2004), 34–36; Peter Lampe, From Paul to Valentinus: Christians at Rome in the First Two Centuries (London: T&T Clark, 2003); Donfried and Richardson, eds., Judaism and Christianity in First Century Rome.

<sup>83</sup> Sanders, Schismatics, 1.

In the gospels, the disputes between Jesus and various figures and authorities over purity, tithing, oaths, divorce etc. are plausible as intra-Jewish halakhic debates. In many ways, the debates between Jesus and the Pharisees were over who spoke for God and who had the most viable program to achieve national restoration. It was a debate between two competing Jewish renewal movements. One must recognize, however, that the sharp polemics and invective between Jesus and the Pharisees depicted in the gospels were coloured by debates between Christians and the synagogues in the post-Easter period. I have argued elsewhere that these passages ultimately have an origin in the life of Jesus, and they cannot be deposited at the door of a later Gentile church.<sup>84</sup> This is reinforced by the fact that many religious people disliked Jesus, and it was not because their religion was full of hypocrisy, externality, legalism and manufactured dogma, whereas Jesus taught a religion of love, relationships, and peace. The fundamental breach was over several root issues: who spoke for God, whose way of being Israel avails before God, and who is the faithful interpreter of Moses and the Prophets? This is what occasioned, at times, ruthless conflict and vitriolic debate. Raymond Brown correctly notes that Jesus was “capable of generating intense dislike.”<sup>85</sup> Larry Hurtado remarks that Jesus was a figure of “notoriety and controversy.” He adds:

---

<sup>84</sup> Michael F. Bird, "The Purpose and Preservation of the Jesus Tradition: Moderate Evidence for a Conserving Force in its Transmission," BBR 15 (2005): 161–185, esp. 167–169; idem, "Jesus the Law-Breaker," in Who Do My Opponents Say That I Am? Investigating the Accusations Against Jesus, ed. Joseph B. Modica and Scot McKnight, LHJS (London: T&T Clark, 2008), 3–26.

This is, whatever may have been Jesus’ intention (often difficult to establish with certainty for historical figures, even when we have their statements on the subject!), the effect of his public activity was very much to polarize a good many of his contemporaries over the question of how to regard him, whether to take a negative or a positive stance about him. It is, I think, a reasonable inference that there was likely something in Jesus’ own actions and statements that generated, or at least contributed to, this polarization.<sup>86</sup>

Graham Stanton takes a similar view:

It is generally accepted that in the first and second centuries Christians and Jews were at odds about christology and the law. It is less frequently appreciated that both the actions and the teaching of Jesus were also a source of tension: they were assessed very differently by his later followers and opponents.<sup>87</sup>

To suggest that Jesus was controversial places him beside Judas the Galilean, Rabbi Hillel, John the Baptist, and the Teacher of Righteousness as figures who fostered division and hostility. But unlike these other individuals who launched religious movements that continued to propagate their ideas within Judaism, the one launched by Jesus would eventually split off from Judaism. The question is why?

4. Jesus’ Attitude towards the Pillars

In this section I wish to highlight Jesus’ relationship to the pillars of Judaism and suggest how they eventually opened the way for more stark divisions between Jews and Christians.

(1) God.<sup>88</sup> There is no reason to see Jesus as anything other than a pious monotheist.<sup>89</sup> Harvey goes so far as to speak of the “constraint

<sup>85</sup> Brown, Death of the Messiah, 1:392.

<sup>86</sup> Hurtado, Lord Jesus Christ, 55.

<sup>87</sup> Stanton, “Jesus of Nazareth,” 180.

<sup>88</sup> I have chosen not to cite material unique to the Fourth Gospel since the history of its tradition is strongly contested. Instead, I have only cited Johannine material that parallels synoptic evidence (see Dunn, Partings, 176–178).

<sup>89</sup> The term “monotheism” is itself elastic and we must acknowledge the debate about how “strict” Jewish monotheism was. See for a helpful approach Richard of monotheism” for understanding Jesus.<sup>90</sup> After all, Jesus proclaims the kingdom of God, the gospel of God (e.g. Mark 1:14–15), he prays to God as Father (Mark 14:36; Luke 11:1–4/Matt 6:9–13; John 11:41–42), and calls for steadfast devotion to God (Matt 6:24/Luke 16:13). In the Jesus tradition, only God is to be worshipped (Luke 4:7–8/Matt 4:9–10) and God alone is good (Mark 10:18). Many of the parables have the purpose of explicating the character of God (e.g. Luke 15).<sup>91</sup> In particular, Jesus affirms the Shema of Deut 6:4 (Mark 12:29–30).

Nevertheless, there are multiply-attested units where Jesus refers to himself as the “Son” and so refers to his unique filial relation to God and his special role in ushering in the kingdom (Q [Luke 10:22/Matt 11:27], Mark [12:1–12], and John [3:35–36; 5:19–47; 6:45–46]). This is affirmed by Jesus’ own experience of God in baptism (Mark 1:11), temptation (Matt 4:1–11/Luke 4:1–13), and the transfiguration (Mark 9:2–8). Jesus expressed a sense of unmediated divine authority that led the authorities to question him about its origin (Mark 11:27–33) and public opinion about him was that he spoke with a distinct authority that set him apart from the scribes (Mark 1:22.27; cf. Matt 8:9/Luke 7:8).<sup>92</sup> Claims to speak for God do not imply divinity, as several prophetic figures often claimed to speak for God, but no-one thought them divine. But in the case of Jesus this authority became unusually acute. Jesus pronounces the forgiveness of sins, which leads to the charge of blasphemy (Mark 2:5.10; Luke 7:36–50). The allegation, “Who can forgive sins but God alone?” (Mark 2:7) demonstrates that Jesus appropriated the role of the priest in relation to atonement, but outside of the cult. Here Jesus does not claim to be a rogue priest, but he offers the forgiveness that was available only through the divinely instituted system of sacrifices (cult of Yahweh) at the place of God’s dwelling (Temple of Yahweh). Jesus also reconfigures divine commandments based on his own authority (e.g. Matt 5:21, 27, 33, 38, 43). We can add that Jesus’ eschatology implies a christology: not only is

---

Bauckham, God Crucified: Monotheism and Christology in the New Testament (Carlisle: Paternoster, 1998).

<sup>90</sup> A. E. Harvey, Jesus and the Constraints of History (London: Duckworth, 1982), 157.

<sup>91</sup> Cf. P. B. Payne, “Jesus’ Implicit Claim to Deity in His Parables,” TrinJ 2 (1981): 3–23.

<sup>92</sup> Cf. Morna D. Hooker, “Creative Conflict: the Torah and Christology,” in Christology, Controversy and Community ed. David G. Horrell and Christopher M. Tuckett (Leiden: Brill, 2000), 117–136, esp. 134.

the kingdom coming, but Jesus is the one who inaugurates it through his mighty deeds, healings, exorcisms, and preaching. In Luke 11:20 Jesus is remembered as saying: "But if it is by the finger of God that I cast out demons, then the kingdom of God has come upon you."<sup>93</sup> It is simplistic therefore to say that Jesus proclaimed the kingdom and that the church proclaimed Jesus.<sup>94</sup> Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom always carried with it an implied self-reference, as he is the agent bringing it. It is response to Jesus' message that determines one's standing in the covenant and entrance into the kingdom (Matt 10:40/Luke 10:16; Mark 1:15; 8:34–9:1; 10:32; 12:1–12; Matt 7:24–27; 21:31; John 13:20). Moreover, there are instances where Jesus apparently refers to himself as one who is like Wisdom (Matt 11:19/Luke 7:35 [Sir 4:11]; Matt 11:28–30 [Sir 24:19]; Luke 11:49), is greater than the Temple (Matt 12:6), and greater than Satan (Mark 3:27; Matt 12:29/Luke 11:21–22). Torah, Wisdom, and Temple were symbols of God's presence with his people and were in a sense incarnational, and it is these symbols that Jesus associates with his own vocation and identity.<sup>95</sup> Jesus' use of Psalm 110 in Mark 12:35–37, though muted in meaning and authenticity,<sup>96</sup> testifies to Jesus' belief that the Messiah is somehow more than a Son of David and destined for an enthronement on a par with Dan 7:13–14 or 1 En. 55.4, 62.3–5. In Luke 19:44, Jesus is remembered as saying: "And they will not leave one stone upon another in you, because you did not know the time of your visitation." The background to this saying is probably Ezekiel 34 which depicts the coming of God in the coming of the Davidic Shepherd-King. Wright is correct when he posits Jesus as entering Jerusalem believing that he is embodying the return of God to Zion and offering divine salvation to the populace of Jerusalem.<sup>97</sup>

In the early church there arose rather quickly the integration of Jesus into patterns of worship. Religious devotion became largely

---

<sup>93</sup> Cf. Graham Twelftree, Jesus the Exorcist (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1993), 217–224.

<sup>94</sup> Howard Clark Kee, The Beginnings of Christianity: An Introduction to the New Testament (New York: T&T Clark, 2005), 65, 80; cf. Rudolf Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, trans. K. Grobel (London: SCM, 1952), 1:33.

<sup>95</sup> On the pre-existence of Jesus in the synoptic gospels see Simon Gathercole, The Pre-Existent Son: Recovering the Christologies of Matthew, Mark and Luke (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2006).

<sup>96</sup> Cf. Gundry, Mark, 722; Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, 507–509; Bird, One to Come.

<sup>97</sup> Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, 631–653.

binitarian,<sup>98</sup> centred on Jesus and God, and Jesus was accordingly regarded as participating in the divine identity, which goes back as early as the Aramaic speaking church (e.g. 1 Cor 16:22). It is important to realize that although Christianity was still within the domain of monotheism it has metamorphosed into messianic monotheism, whereby the very meaning of “God” is redefined in view of the resurrection and exaltation of Jesus (Phil 2:5–11; 1 Cor 8:6; Rom 9:5; Col 1:15–20 and John 1:1–14). This was to be a singular and lasting point of division with Jews,<sup>99</sup> and yet this event is not unprecedented, since Jesus’ claim to authority, his claim to act and speak on behalf of God, his mission to embody the presence of God in Jerusalem is the presupposition for the binitarian Christ-devotion of the primitive church. While it may be true that Jesus stood within the boundaries of monotheism,<sup>100</sup> he ascribed to himself a role in the divine design that was unprecedented and blurred the line between author and agent. Jesus is a prophet, and more than a prophet, and it is this “more” that prompted deeper reflection in light of belief in his resurrection and exaltation as to how Jesus related to the identity and personification of God. The worship patterns of the primitive church did not occur ex nihilo; belief in the resurrection and exaltation of Jesus would not be sufficient of itself to effect the belief that Jesus had been co-enthroned with God and incorporated into the divine identity, any more than it would be for Enoch or Elijah to be worshipped. Rather, the seed bed upon which this faith in Jesus grew was Jesus’ belief that he was the divine agent par excellence. As Evans states: “The New Testament deification of Jesus Christ, as seen especially in the theologies of Paul and the fourth evangelist, has its roots in the words and activities of the historical Jesus.”<sup>101</sup>

(2) Torah. There is no area of historical Jesus research that is more controversial and complex than that of Jesus and the Torah. We must

---

<sup>98</sup> Cf. Larry W. Hurtado, “The Binitarian Shape of Early Christian Worship,” in The Jewish Roots of Christological Monotheism, ed. C. C. Newman, J. R. Davila, and G. S. Lewis, JSJSup 63 (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 187–213.

<sup>99</sup> Alan F. Segal, Rebecca’s Children: Judaism and Christianity in the Roman World (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1986), 151–157. Contra Sanders (Schismatics, 93) who does not think that the high christology of John, though outlandish, would have constituted blasphemy with the Roman period of Judaism.

<sup>100</sup> Cf. Dunn, Partings, 182.

<sup>101</sup> Craig A. Evans, “The Historical Jesus and the Deified Christ: How Did the One Lead to the Other?” in The Nature of Religious Language: A Colloquium, ed. Stanley E. Porter (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996), 47–67, esp. 67.

appreciate a tension that is reflected in the Jesus tradition, as Jesus is portrayed as both a legal radical in some matters (e.g. fasting, Sabbath keeping, and food laws) but also as pious and Torah obedient (especially toward the Temple).<sup>102</sup> Relaxation and intensification of certain commandments is a distinguishing feature of Jewish renewal movements.<sup>103</sup> Nevertheless, Jesus can set the imperatives of the kingdom against the commands of Torah when those commands conflict with one another. If Nickelsburg is right to claim that it was the preference for eschatology over Torah that facilitated the separation between Jewish and Christian groups, then this process commenced with Jesus himself.<sup>104</sup>

Jesus challenged and flouted many of the legal interpretations of his contemporaries. Jesus stood not against Moses, but against other renewal movements like the Pharisees on matters of the law. For them, text and interpretation were not neatly separable, so that Jesus' affront to their halakah was a de facto challenge to Torah. Hence, in the view of his opponents, Jesus' fidelity to the Torah was regarded as suspect to the point that Jesus and his disciples were regarded as performing unlawful acts (Mark 2:24; 3:4; 7:2–4; Luke 11:38). While there was a significant amount of diversity in early Christianity about the law,<sup>105</sup> we find that Stephen (Acts 6:11–14), Paul (Acts 21:28; 25:8; Rom 3:8), and James the brother of Jesus (Ant. 20.200) were also accused of breaking the law.<sup>106</sup> Importantly, the opposition that all three provoked resulted eventually in their execution just like Jesus. That is not to say that Jesus or Christians consciously abrogated the law or deliberately flouted its requirements. But it is unassailable that the Christian approaches to the Jewish law fostered persecution and ultimately contributed to the parting of the ways (see also Justin, Dial. Tryph. 108).

---

<sup>102</sup> Hooker, "Creative Conflict," 117.

<sup>103</sup> Marcus Bockmuehl, Jewish Law in Gentile Churches: Halakah and the Beginning of Christian Public Ethics (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 2000), 10; Gerd Theissen, The Sociology of Palestinian Christianity, trans. John Bowden (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978), 78–80.

<sup>104</sup> G. E. Nickelsburg, Ancient Judaism and Christian Origins (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003), 194.

<sup>105</sup> Peter Stuhlmacher, "The Law as a Topic of Biblical Theology," in Reconciliation, Law and Righteousness (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986), 110–133; Raymond Brown and John P. Meier, Antioch and Rome (New York/Ramsey: Paulist, 1983), 1–9; James G. Crossley, The Date of Mark's Gospel: Insights from the Law in Earliest Christianity, JSNTSup 266 (London: T&T Clark, 2004), 125–158.

<sup>106</sup> Cf. Bird, "Jesus the Law-Breaker."

Is the origin of this divide, however it developed in different Christian trajectories, attributable to Jesus? Hengel thinks so:

Jesus' attitude towards the Torah and the temple possesses, over against that of all other Jewish groups, an unmistakable, original stamp. He thereby brings something really new, and he continues this new thing in the Church made up of his disciples. Both Jesus and the Church fall outside the framework provided by the idea—valued so highly by Sanders—of a harmonious “common Judaism.” After all, it is no accident that the movement initiated by Jesus opened itself step by step to an increasingly “law-free” Gentile mission just a short time after his death. Nor is it an accident that the three “pillars” at the Apostolic Council about eighteen years later, who were closely associated with Jesus, acknowledge uncircumcised Gentile Christians who were not under obligations to the Torah as full members of the Church, destined to experience eschatological salvation. Must that not also ultimately have something to do with Jesus' attitude? Ex nihilo nihil fit—or, to take up the illustration which Sanders himself uses (and rejects): from our historical distance, we must conclude from the smoke that there is also a fire. The persecutions of the early Palestinian Church were connected with this partially critical attitude toward Torah and cult, as well as with Christology (this whole complex cannot be torn apart.) Jesus himself provided the first impetus for persecution. Early Christianity's relatively quick break with Sanders' “common Judaism,” despite the fact that it rested entirely on Jewish roots, is a phenomenon which we believe ultimately goes back historically and theologically to Jesus' words and deeds, in combination with his claim to have been sent from God. This development is without analogy in Palestinian Judaism.<sup>107</sup>

In primitive circles of the early church, the controversies about the law and the Gentiles impinged upon another pillar of Judaism, that of (3) Election. A central tenet of Jewish belief was that the Creator God has chosen Israel to be his people.<sup>108</sup> Yet “Who is Israel?” was the burning question of Jewish factionalism.<sup>109</sup> What divided Jews and Christians was not differences over systems of salvation, but rather the question “Who are the people of God?” According to early Christian responses, the feature that marks out God's chosen people is not ethnicity but faith in Israel's Messiah. The early church saw itself, ostentatiously, in the position of Israel. For this reason Paul can say that a Jew is not one outwardly but inwardly (Rom 2:27–28) and not all from Israel belong to Israel (Rom 9:6). Paul states in Phil: 3:3 that Christians are the circumcision. He concludes Galatians with a blessing for the "Israel of God" (Gal 6:16). By the end of the first century Exod 19:6 was taken up and applied to Christians.<sup>110</sup> The word ἐκλεκτός ("elect") in the Septuagint frequently denotes Israel,<sup>111</sup> but in the New Testament it often signifies Christians.<sup>112</sup> 1 Clement applies the election passages of Deuteronomy (4:34; 14:2; 32:8–9) to Christians (1 Clem. 29.1–3). It is true that the phrases "new Israel" or "true Israel" do not appear in the New Testament,<sup>113</sup> but many Christians appear to have redefined the meaning of election in view of their own allegiance to Israel's Messiah, with the result of understanding themselves as the eschatological representatives of Israel in the messianic age. The fact that other Jewish groups could describe themselves as Israel over against their fellow Jews shows that this is congruent within Second Temple Judaism.<sup>114</sup>

<sup>107</sup> Martin Hengel and Roland Deines, “E. P. Sanders' ‘Common Judaism,’ Jesus, and the Pharisees,” JTS 46 (1995): 1–70, esp. 15–16; cf. Sanders, Schismatics, 95–99.

<sup>108</sup> Cf. Deut 7:6–7; 14:2; 32:8–9; Exod 19:5; Pss 33:12; 135:4; Isa 41:8–9; 44:1–2; 45:4; Wis 4:15; Tob 8:15; 4 Ezra 2:15–17; 5:23–29; 6:54; Philo, Migr. 60; Spec. 1.303; Mos. 1.278; Jub. 15.30–32; Pss. Sol. 9.9–11; 4Q381 frags. 76–77, 14–16.

<sup>109</sup> 1 Macc 1:43, 52–53; 9:23–25; 10:14; 3 Macc 1:3; 4 Ezra 3:36.

That Jesus focused his mission on Israel (Matt 10:5–6; 15:24) and chose twelve disciples as symbolic of Israel (Mark 3:13–16; Luke 22:30/Matt 19:28) is an indicator that he assumed God's election of the nation.<sup>115</sup> Yet the transference of designations used for Israel to followers of Jesus most likely began with Jesus himself. The parable of the wedding banquet ends with the warning that many are called but few are "chosen" (Matt 22:14). In the Markan apocalypse Jesus is presented as saying that God will save the "elect" (Mark 13:20, 27). In the Lukan parable of the unjust judge, Jesus promises that God will grant justice to his "elect who cry out to him" (Luke 18:7). Jesus spoke of his followers, as other apocalyptic groups did of themselves, as specially chosen by God.<sup>116</sup>

There were those who pointed out that one cannot trust in the inviolability of Israel's election to maintain their own status in the

<sup>110</sup> 1 Pet 2:9; Rev 1:6; 5:10; 20:6.

<sup>111</sup> Cf. e.g. 1 Chron 16:13; Pss 88:4; 104:6, 43; Isa 65:9, 15, 23; Tob 8:15.

<sup>112</sup> Rom 8:33; Col 3:12; 2 Tim 2:10; Tit 1:1; 1 Pet: 1:1; 2:4, 6, 9; 2 John 1:13; Rev 17:14; 1 Clem. 1.1; 2.4; 46.3–4; 49.5; 59.2; 2 Clem. 14.5; Hermas, Vis. 1.3.4; 2.1.3; 2.2.5; 2.4.2; 3.5.1; 3.8.3; 3.9.10; 4.2.5; 4.3.5.

<sup>113</sup> M. A. Elliott, "Israel," in Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels, ed. Joel B. Green, Scot McKnight, and I. Howard Marshall (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1992), 356–363, esp. 357.

<sup>114</sup> Pss. Sol. 10.6; 1 Macc 1:53; 7:9; 9:51; CD IV, 4; 1QS V, 22; VIII, 4; 1QSa I, 6; IQM X, 9; Philo, Migr. 113–14; Conf. 56; Her. 78.

<sup>115</sup> Cf. Bird, Jesus and the Origins of the Gentile Mission, 54–70.

<sup>116</sup> 1QS VIII, 6; 1 En. 1.1; 38.2–4; 62.7–8.

covenant. John the Baptist is recorded as saying that descent from Abraham is no guarantee of deliverance in view of the coming eschatological judgment (Luke 3:8/Matt 3:9). Even the Maccabean literature is careful to note that Jewish ethnicity is no defence against apostasy (3 Macc 1:3). In a similar way, Jesus warned Israel about the danger of rejecting his message in light of the coming eschatological crisis. He is all too aware that his message affects a division in Israel. Weeds and wheat would be gathered together, but the weeds are separated and burned (Matt 13:24–30, 36–43). A dragnet would bring in fish of every type and the bad would be thrown out (Matt 13:47–50). A returning king would reward faithful stewards, but punish severely those citizens who petitioned against him or failed to do his will (Luke 19:11–27/Matt 25:14–30). Wicked tenants who killed the messengers and the son of the absentee landlord would see the vineyard given to others (Mark 12:1–10; Gos. Thom. 65).<sup>117</sup> These warning oracles do not suppose that Israel's election was something that had been used up; but belonging to Israel does not guarantee that one will belong to the coming age.

Moreover, Jesus implied that those whom many would exclude from covenant membership and participation in the future kingdom would in fact participate. Against the Jewish leadership, Jesus can say, “tax collectors and the prostitutes are going into the kingdom of God ahead of you” (Matt 21:31). A passage like Luke 4:25–27 arguably represents a form of prophetic criticism that reconfigures the election of Israel as including outcasts like Gentile lepers and foreign widows.<sup>118</sup> In various Jewish sects table-fellowship functioned as a social boundary indicating who was inside and who was outside the restrictions of the group identity.<sup>119</sup> Jesus' table-fellowship with “sinners”<sup>120</sup> (and “sinners” can be a synonym for Gentiles)<sup>121</sup> is further proof that the identity of the renewed Israel that Jesus is reconstituting around himself is broader than any sectarian or ethnic horizon. That is something that set him apart from both the Pharisees and the Qumranites. To

<sup>117</sup> Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, 328.

<sup>118</sup> James A. Sanders, “From Isaiah 61 to Luke 4,” in Luke and Scripture: The Function of Sacred Traditions in Luke-Acts, ed. James A. Sanders and Craig A. Evans (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993), 46–69.

<sup>119</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 602.

<sup>120</sup> Luke 7:31–35/Matt 11:16–19; Mark 2:15–17; 14:3; Luke 15:2; 19:1–10.

<sup>121</sup> Cf. e.g. Ps 9:17; Isa 14:5; Gal 2:15; 1 Macc 2:44, 48; Jub. 23.23–24; Pss. Sol. 1.1; 2.1–2; 17.21–25.

dine with sinners or persons of Gentile-like status would provoke umbrage (Acts 10–11; Gal 2:11–14), but it would not separate Jesus from Judaism. Yet Jesus' openness to Gentiles, his willingness to associate with sinners, and his claim that they shall be vindicated at the eschaton while other Jews with greater claim to covenant standing will be ejected was genuinely shocking (e.g. Matt 8:11–12/Luke 13:28–29). In fact, it is acceptance of Gentiles as Gentiles and integration of them into Christian fellowship that is arguably a point of contact between Hellenists and Jesus.<sup>122</sup> Once others like Paul began regarding Gentiles as part of the "Israel of God" (Gal 6:16) without coming via the route of proselytism, the seeds of division were well and truly sown. The Pauline conviction was that one did not have to become a Jew in order to become a Christian, and this divorced election from ethnicity. This led to the gentilization of the church and a supersessionist theology.<sup>123</sup> The influx of Gentiles prompted numerous problems for Jewish Christians and for Jewish-Christian relationships, especially after 70 CE. Eventually: "[t]he parting of the ways arose because, for most other Jews, that Christian Jewish claim was incredible. The inclusion of pagans and the devastation by pagans were irreconcilable."<sup>124</sup>

(4) Temple.<sup>125</sup> A final area we must consider briefly is Jesus and the Temple. First, a significant amount of material in the gospels depicts Jesus not only as law observant, but as observant of the regulations of the Temple.<sup>126</sup> These sayings and actions are significant when juxtaposed with another body of tradition that predicts the destruction of the Temple.<sup>127</sup> In terms of authenticity, the motif is multiply-attested

<sup>122</sup> Cf. Wedderburn, First Christians, 50–51; Hengel, Between Jesus and Paul, 57–58.

<sup>123</sup> Porter and Pearson, "Why the Split?" 91, 108.

<sup>124</sup> Jonathan L. Reed and John Dominic Crossan, Excavating Jesus: Beneath the Stones, Behind the Texts (San Francisco: Harper, 2001), 324.

<sup>125</sup> On the significance of the Temple for the partings see Richard Bauckham, "The Parting of the Way: What Happened and Why," ST 47 (1993): 135–151.

<sup>126</sup> Vermes, Religion of Jesus, 11–17. Jesus is remembered for affirming payment of the Temple tax (Matt 17:24–27), sending supplicants of healing to the Temple for reintegration into Jewish society (Mark 1:44; Luke 5:14, 17:14; John 9:7). He upholds the sanctity of the Temple in relation to oaths (Matt 23:16–22), denounces the murder of Zechariah between the sanctuary and the altar (Luke 11:51/Matt 23:35), teaches and heals in the Temple (Matt 21:14; Mark 12:35; 14:49; John 5:1–15; 7:14–15.28; 8:2, 20; 18:20), and the Johannine Jesus makes several trips to the festivals (John 2, 5, 7, 10, 12).

<sup>127</sup> Luke 13:34–35/Matt 23:37–39; Mark 13:2; 14:58; 15:29; Matt 26:61; Luke 19:41–44; 21:20–24; 23:27–31; Acts 6:14; John 2:19; Gos. Thom. 71; Gos. Eb. § 6; Gos. Pet. 7.25–26; cf. Craig A. Evans, "Prediction of the Destruction of the Herodian Temple in

(Q, Mark, "L," John). Jesus was not the first Jewish prophet to predict the destruction of the Temple (Jeremiah), nor the last (Jesus ben Ananias).<sup>128</sup> This is an obvious point of continuity with Stephen, who was stoned for reiterating Jesus' promise that the Temple would be destroyed. One should avoid the position that Stephen (or Luke's) view of the Temple is influenced by Hellenistic Judaism, which thought of the Temple as "relatively useless."<sup>129</sup> The opposite is true, as several Hellenistic authors give glowing reports about the Temple (Josephus, War 5.223; Ep. Arist. 83–104; Philo, Spec. 1.67–77; Sib. Or. 3.657–60). Several writings arguably stemming from a Palestinian provenance regard the Temple as impure and defiled (1QpHab XII, 8–9; CD V, 6–8; 4Q390 I, 8–10; 1 En. 89.73–74; Pss. Sol. 2.3; 8.11–13; T. Levi 14.5–8; 16.1; Jub. 23.21; T. Mos. 5.3–6.1; Ps.-Clem. Hom. 2.44.2; 3.52.1; Epiphanius, Adv. Haer. 19.3.6; Gos. Eb. § 6). The tendency to transcendentalize the Temple or to point out the inadequacies of the physical structure to contain the divine presence was already embedded in Israel's sacred scriptures and intertestamental literature (e.g. 1 Kgs 8:27; 2 Chron 6:18; Isa 6:1–13; 66:1; Pss 11:4; 103:19; Bar 2:16; 1 En. 14.16–20; T. Levi 3.4–6; 5.1–2; Sib. Or. 4.6–11, 27–28; Philo, Cher. 100–101; cf. Plato, Republic 9.592a, b; Euripides, Frag. 968).

On the surface, Jesus' utterances against the Temple would not necessitate a division between Jews and Christians since other Jews made similar remarks, but we must add three other factors. First, even if other Jews were sympathetic, speaking against the Temple would be sufficient itself to warrant exile (Teacher of Righteousness) or even death (Jesus, Stephen, Jesus ben Ananias), highlighting the seriousness of the offence against what was the religious, political, and economic hub of Judaism. Second, it is possible that Jesus intended to replace the Temple with something else such as a "symbolic meal"<sup>130</sup> or his own circle of followers who would be the "new Temple."<sup>131</sup> This could the Pseudepigrapha, Qumran Scrolls, and Related Texts," JSP 10 (1992): 89–147, esp. 97–98.

---

<sup>128</sup> Bird, Jesus and the Origins of the Gentile Mission, 255–256.

<sup>129</sup> Harnack, Expansion of Christianity, 1:56–57.

<sup>130</sup> Neusner, "Money-changers," 291–95; Bruce D. Chilton, The Temple of Jesus: His Sacrificial Program within a Cultural History of Sacrifice (University Park, PA: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1992); Jostein Ådna, "Jesus' Symbolic Act in the Temple (Mark 11:15–17): The Replacement of the Sacrificial Cult by his Atoning Death," in Gemeinde ohne Tempel (Tübingen: Mohr/Siebeck, 1999), 461–475.

<sup>131</sup> Paul Barnett, Jesus and the Rise of Early Christianity (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1999) 170–71; Neusner, "Varieties of Judaism," 189–190.

potentially have been regarded as an act of apostasy, as the Samaritan Temple<sup>132</sup> and the Temple at Leontopolis<sup>133</sup> were thought of as apostate institutes of worship. Third, Christians identified themselves (Gal 2:9; 1 Cor 3:16; 6:19; 2 Cor 6:16; 1 Pet 2:5; Rev 3:12; 11:1–2; Did. 10.2; Ignatius, Eph. 9.1; Barn. 4.11; 6.15; 16.1–10) and Jesus (Matt 12:6; 18:20; John 1:14; 2:19; Eph 2:21; Rev 21:22; Ignatius, Magn. 7.2; Smyrn. 2.1 [longer text]) as the Temple, and this could have been viewed as an act of religious rivalry as to who or what was the nexus into the divine realm.

5. Conclusion

This study has argued that constituent elements of the Jewish-Christian rift find their germinal roots in the historical Jesus. The reasons for Jesus' death (a false prophet, blasphemy, Messiah) and his debates with his contemporaries that touched upon the pillars of Judaism (God, Torah, election and Temple) illustrate points of contention between Jesus and his contemporaries. Although Jesus himself remained within the orbit of a "common Judaism," his attitudes and actions did push those boundaries to the point that he incurred violent opposition from other Jews. These actions and attitudes of Jesus were subsequently developed in the early church in a new religious and social context where a split between Jews and Christians became inevitable. The ongoing process of Jewish and Christian self-definition in light of the political developments of the first century prompted persons from both groups to see the other as excluded from the designation "the people of God."

<sup>132</sup> Ant. 12.257–264; 18.29–30; 2 Macc 6:2; b. Nid. 4.1; b. Bek. 71; b. Roš Haš. 22b.

<sup>133</sup> Josephus, Ant. 13.65–70.

PROPHET, SAGE, HEALER, MESSIAH, AND MARTYR: TYPES AND IDENTITIES OF JESUS

CRAIG A. EVANS

One of the oft-heard complaints in historical Jesus research in the last half century or so has to do with the diverse portraits of Jesus. According to the popular view, Jesus is the Messiah of Israel and the Son of God, but in many more-or-less learned books Jesus is presented as a prophet, sage, magician, Pharisee, Essene, or holy man. In more eccentric studies Jesus is presented as an eastern mystic or as an embodiment of some mythical religious construct.

Some critics take this diversity as evidence of the impossibility of the task, either due to the limited historical value of the principal sources or to the subjectivity of the scholars involved. It must be admitted that our sources are not as full and corroborated as we would like, and scholars are humans, after all, and therefore are prone to subjectivity. However, the diversity of scholarly results could also be interpreted as evidence that Jesus functioned and understood himself in more than one category. Indeed, the evidence suggests that this was very probably the case; and there is nothing strange in finding two or more categories. For example, to be regarded as Israel's Messiah does not preclude functions associated with the office of prophet or miracle-working holy man, nor does it preclude identification as a sage or even as a martyr, as Jesus faced the likelihood of his death during his final week in Jerusalem. In short, Jesus could have seen himself as called and empowered in several of these functions and offices.

Having said this, of course, does not mean that Jesus' contemporaries necessarily interpreted Jesus in the light of all of these typologies. Some no doubt thought of Jesus as a Davidic, royal Messiah, who would drive out the Romans and establish Israel's sovereignty. Others may have seen Jesus primarily as a miracle-working healer, while still others may have seen Jesus as a teacher. At the outset of his public ministry, Jesus may well have been viewed as simply a prophet who proclaimed the coming rule of God, a rule in which Jesus himself would play a role hardly beyond that of the one who proclaimed it. Indeed, I suspect that it was the appeal to the typology of the righteous martyr, whose death will benefit Israel, that motivated Judas Iscariot to betray his master. So long as Jesus proclaimed God's rule, so long as it appeared that Jesus himself might reign over Israel, along with his disciples, Judas was strongly supportive. But talk of suffering and death led this disciple to abandon the cause.

Openness to seeing in Jesus a combination of identities and functions is justified in principle by the recognition that in our sources from late antiquity we in fact find these typologies mixed and diverse. To mention a few examples: The great lawgiver Moses is also a prophet (Deut 18:15–19; 34:10). David the king is a prophet (cf. 11QPs<sup>a</sup> XXVII, 2–11, esp. line 11 [David “composed through prophecy”]; Acts 1:16; 4:25; Epistula Apostolorum §19 [“the prophecy of the prophet David”], §35; P. Oxy. 5 verso). His son Solomon is a healer and wise man (T. Sol. 3.5; Josephus, Ant. 8.45–49), as well as prophet (Tg. Ps 72:1 [“composed by Solomon, uttered in prophecy”]). Moses and Elijah are sometimes linked in eschatological contexts (Mark 9:4; Deut. Rab. 3.17 [on Deut 10:1]; Pesiq. Rab. 4.2); the Messiah and Elijah are sometimes linked (Mark 9:11–13; b. Erubin 43a–b; Pesiq. Rab. 35.3; Tg. Ps.-J. Deut 30:4; Exod. Rab. 18.12 [on Exod 12:42]); and the Messiah is sometimes linked with Moses (Frag. Tg. [and perhaps Neof.] Exod 12:42; Tg. Song 4:5 “Messiah son of David...like Moses”). Some prophets are workers of miracles (e.g., Elijah and Elisha, and Isaiah).

Some Old Testament figures served more than one function. One thinks of Melchizedek, who is identified as both king and priest (Gen 14:18–24), as well as the great Samuel, who was both priest and prophet (1 Sam 2:35; 3:20) and, until the anointing of Saul the Benjaminite, functioned more or less as Israel's de facto king (1 Sam 8:4–9). Jesus himself, though regularly addressed as Rabbi or teacher and sometimes acknowledged as a prophet, at times acted in a quasi-priestly manner, declaring someone clean (Mark 1:41), forgiving sins (Mark 2:5; Luke 7:47–48), pronouncing on offerings and sacrifices (Matt 5:23–24; 23:18–20; Mark 12:32–34), and in demonstrating in the Temple precincts criticizing the ruling priests (Mark 11:15–18, with appeals to Isa 56:7 and Jer 7:11, both concerned with Temple matters).

In the discussion that follows I shall consider Jesus under five categories or identities: prophet, sage, healer, messiah, and martyr. I put them in this sequence, because I think this is how, over time, Jesus was perceived by the general public and by his closest followers.

1. Jesus as Prophet

The evidence that Jesus saw himself as a prophet is compelling.<sup>1</sup> It is implicit in his proclamation of the rule of God, call for repentance, and warning of judgment (Mark 1:15; Luke 4:43; 11:20). Jesus' announcement stands in the tradition of Israel's classic prophets, who likewise proclaimed the rule of God.<sup>2</sup> Indeed Jesus' proclamation was in all probability based on Isaiah's proclamation, especially as interpreted and paraphrased in the Aramaic-speaking synagogue.<sup>3</sup> As did the classic prophets,<sup>4</sup> as well as John the Baptist (Matt 3:2, 8, 11; par.), Jesus also called on Israel to repent (Matt 11:20–21; 12:41; Mark 6:12; Luke 5:32; 13:3; 15:7, 10).

Direct evidence that Jesus understood himself as a prophet is seen in his declaration: "A prophet is not without honor [οὐκ ἔστιν προφήτης ἄτιμος], except in his own country, and among his own kin, and in his own house" (Mark 6:4; cf. Matt 13:57; John 4:44).<sup>5</sup> To be sure, the saying is proverbial, especially in the Greek-speaking

---

<sup>1</sup> For recent studies, see M. D. Hooker, The Signs of a Prophet: The Prophetic Actions of Jesus (Harrisburg: Trinity Press International, 1997); M. Reiser, Jesus and Judgment: The Eschatological Proclamation in Its Jewish Context (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1997); D. C. Allison Jr., Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998); W. R. Herzog II, Prophet and Teacher: An Introduction to the Historical Jesus (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 2005).

<sup>2</sup> See Isa 6:5; 33:22; 43:15; 44:6; Jer 8:19; 10:10; Ezek 20:33; cf. Pss 5:2; 44:4; 47:7; 68:24; 74:12; 84:3; 95:3; 145:1.

<sup>3</sup> The proclamation, "Behold your God!" (Isa 40:9), in the Aramaic is rendered, "The kingdom [or rule] of your God is revealed!" See also Isa 52:7 in Hebrew and Aramaic. For more on the "kingdom of God" in Aramaic Isaiah, see B. D. Chilton, The Glory of Israel: The Theology and Provenience of the Isaiah Targum, JSOTSup 23 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1982), 77–81. For analysis of the Old Testament backdrop, see G. R. Beasley-Murray, Jesus and the Kingdom of God (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1986); B. D. Chilton, "The Kingdom of God in Recent Discussion," in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. B. D. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 255–280.

<sup>4</sup> See Isa 1:27; Jer 5:3; 8:6; 9:5; 26:19; 34:15; Ezek 14:6; 18:30; Zech 1:6; cf. 1 Kgs 8:47–48; 2 Chron 6:37–38.

<sup>5</sup> The differences in Luke's form of the saying ("Truly, I say to you, no prophet is acceptable [δεκτός] in his own country") are likely redactional, to link Jesus' utterance with the concluding portion of the quotation from Isaiah 61 ("to proclaim the acceptable [δεκτός] day of the Lord." Compare Luke 4:19 with 4:24.

world,<sup>6</sup> but this hardly argues against the authenticity of the saying. Given the exalted assessment of Jesus in the post-Easter setting, one should hardly expect the creation of sayings in which Jesus is regarded as (only) a prophet, indeed, as a prophet accorded no honor in the very village in which he was raised.<sup>7</sup>

There are other passages that lend further important support. Jesus' lament over obstinate Jerusalem, a lament preserved in Q, with a strong claim to authenticity, implies that Jesus be identified with the prophets rejected by Israel: "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, killing the prophets and stoning those who are sent to you! How often would I have gathered your children together as a hen gathers her brood under her wings, and you would not!" (Matt 23:37 = Luke 13:34). The public rumor that Jesus was a prophet (cf. Mark 6:14–15; 8:27–28, "one of the prophets") is also very probable.

There are also two passages in which Jesus is challenged that corroborate further his identity as a prophet. In one passage (Mark 8:11–12) Pharisees request of Jesus "a sign from heaven" (σημεῖον ἀπὸ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ), which Jesus refuses: "Why does this generation seek a sign? Truly, I say to you, no sign shall be given to this generation." The request for a "sign from heaven" carries with it prophetic implications. One thinks of Isaiah's appeal to Ahaz: "Ask a sign [תִּיָּא / σημεῖον] of the Lord your God; let it be deep as Sheol or high as heaven" (Isa 7:11; cf. v. 14, "the Lord himself will give you a sign"). Signs are offered in Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel. The association of signs with prophets is almost formalized in the Mosaic law (e.g., Deut 13:1 "If a prophet arises among you, or a dreamer of dreams, and gives you a sign [תִּיָּא / σημεῖον]..."). In the second passage, where the question of authority is raised (Mark 11:27–33), Jesus compares himself with John the Baptist, regarded by the Jewish people as a prophet (v. 32). The logic of Jesus' counter-question is that, like John, Jesus is a prophet whose authority derives from heaven and not from humans.

<sup>6</sup> As in Dio Chrysostom, Disc. 47.6 ("it is the opinion of all the philosophers that life is difficult in their home country"); Apollonius of Tyana, Ep. 44 ("until now my own country alone ignores me"); and others.

<sup>7</sup> The latter part of the saying, "and among his own kin, and in his own house," may well be a later gloss, perhaps reflecting the experience of the early Christian community. So also in the case of the Thomasine version (cf. Gos. Thom. 31: "...physicians do not heal those who know them"), whose latter part is surely secondary, reflecting Lukan influence (cf. Luke 4:23, "Physician, heal yourself"), as well as the esoteric, if not gnostic orientation of the later Syrian context in which Thomas was composed.

There are other materials, whose antiquity and authenticity are less certain. After Jesus raised the widow's son (Luke 7:11–17), the astounded crowd “glorified God, saying, ‘A great prophet has arisen among us!’ and ‘God has visited his people!’” (v. 16). Whereas the first declaration could be authentic, the second is probably a Lukan gloss.<sup>8</sup> In the story of the sinful woman (Luke 7:36–50), Simon the Pharisee is said to suppose: “If this man were a prophet, he would have known who and what sort of woman this is who is touching him, for she is a sinner” (v. 39). Although the historicity of the episode is not easy to settle, at least in all of its details, the question of Jesus' prophetic status does reflect what in reference to Jesus was being affirmed by some and denied by others. Undoubtedly many of his followers believed that Jesus was a prophet, while many critics did not. The evangelist Luke presents yet another saying, whose authenticity is difficult to gauge. After receiving a warning from Pharisees, Jesus declares: “Nevertheless I must go on my way today and tomorrow and the day following; for it cannot be that a prophet should perish away from Jerusalem” (Luke 13:33).<sup>9</sup>

The saying just considered could well form a body of negative comments about the dismal fate of the prophet to Israel. In one saying (Mark 6:4) Jesus declares that no prophet is without honor except in his home country. In another (Matt 23:37 = Luke 13:34) he laments that Jerusalem kills the prophets; and in a third he asserts that a prophet cannot perish away from Jerusalem (Luke 13:33). The coherence of these three sayings encourages us to view them as authentically reflecting Jesus' self-understanding. He is the prophet who proclaims the rule of God, calls on Israel to repent, and expects rejection at home and especially in Jerusalem.<sup>10</sup>

<sup>8</sup> The Lukan evangelist is fond of the theme of visitation (ἐπισκοπή / ἐπισκέπτομαι); cf. Luke 1:68, 78; 7:16; 19:44.

<sup>9</sup> For critical assessments of the origin of this saying, see J. A. Fitzmyer, The Gospel according to Luke X–XXIV, AB 24A (Garden City: Doubleday, 1985) 1028; I. H. Marshall, The Gospel of Luke, NIGTC (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1978) 569–70.

<sup>10</sup> Other sayings, in which the prophetic status of Jesus is affirmed, are either secondary creations or glosses composed by the respective evangelists. Among such sayings is the declaration of the crowd, on occasion of the entry into Jerusalem: “This is the prophet Jesus from Nazareth of Galilee” (Matt 21:11). Narrating the activities in the temple precincts, the Matthean evangelist says the ruling priests “feared the multitudes, because they held him to be a prophet” (21:46). In the post-Easter setting,

One must not overlook the mockery that Jesus suffered at the hands of his enemies upon his arrest and interrogation. After the ruling priests and Jewish council condemn Jesus, officers cover his head, strike him, and ask him to “prophesy” (Mark 14:65), that is, demonstrate prophetic clairvoyance by identifying who has struck him, even though he is blindfolded (Matt 26:68 = Luke 22:64). The jeering demands that Jesus prophesy make sense only if Jesus came to them with the reputation of being a prophet.

Some of Jesus’ miracles recall miracles associated with Israel’s prophets. The Lukan evangelist exploits some of this tradition, underscoring points of contact between Jesus and the prophets Elijah and Elisha. Jesus’ appointment of twelve apostles, which surely had to do with the restoration and completion of Israel (i.e., the twelve tribes of Israel), may have brought to the mind of some the altar that Elijah built with twelve stones, “according to the number of the tribes of the sons of Jacob, to whom the word of the Lord came, saying, ‘Israel shall be your name’” (1 Kgs 18:31; cf. Exod 28:21; 39:14). What we have here is the employment of typology. Typology also underlies Jesus’ appeal to the “sign of Jonah,” whatever its original meaning, again encourages us to place Jesus in the category of prophet. So also when Jesus warns his impenitent generation of their condemnation by the people of Nineveh, who repented at the preaching of Jonah (Matt 12:39, 41 = Luke 11:30, 32).

Sayings attributed to Jesus with good claim to authenticity, as well as a number of other sayings and actions, give us every reason to conclude that Jesus understood himself as a prophet.<sup>11</sup> This understanding was accepted by his followers and probably a great number of others who were not necessarily counted among his followers, but it was challenged by various critics, opponents, and enemies.

---

Luke has the disciples say to the risen but not yet recognized Jesus: “Concerning Jesus of Nazareth, who was a prophet mighty in deed and word before God and all the people” (Luke 24:19). Three times in the Fourth Gospel Jesus is said to be a or the prophet (John 4:19; 7:40; 9:17). Even the angry retort, “Search and you will see that no prophet is to rise from Galilee” (John 7:52), implies that some regarded Jesus as a prophet, even if others did not.

<sup>11</sup> Jesus’ prophetic status is probably reflected in the parable of the Vineyard (Mark 12:1–9), where the rejected and murdered son (surely to be understood as Jesus himself) is linked by function to the dishonored servants (surely to be understood as Israel’s rejected and persecuted prophets).

2. Jesus as Sage (or Rabbi)

Bruce Chilton and others have identified Jesus as a rabbi or sage.<sup>12</sup> After all, Jesus is called rabbi by his disciples and others (Matt 26:25, 49; Mark 9:5; 10:51; 11:21; 14:45; John 1:38, 49; 3:2, 26; 4:31; 6:25; 9:2; 11:8).<sup>13</sup> The number of occurrences increases if we include instances where Jesus is addressed as “teacher” (that is, διδάσκαλος; cf. Mark 4:38; 5:35; 9:17, 38; 10:17, 35; 12:14, 19; and many more). That “teacher” is understood to be the meaning of rabbi is explicitly stated (John 1:38; 20:16; cf. Matt 23:8; John 3:2).<sup>14</sup> The number of occurrences increases further if we include instances of “master” (ἐπιστάτα), which is a favorite of the Lukan evangelist (cf. 5:5; 8:24, 45; 9:33, 49; 17:13).<sup>15</sup>

Not only is Jesus addressed as “rabbi” or “teacher,” his closest followers are called “disciples” (μαθηταί),<sup>16</sup> whose Hebrew/Aramaic equivalent is תַּלְמִידִים,<sup>17</sup> that is, “learners” or “students” (from μαθάνειν and לָמַד, respectively). This language corresponds with the terminology of early rabbinic Judaism, though there is much earlier evidence.<sup>18</sup>

The numerous parallels between Jesus’ teaching and the rabbinic tradition, as well as the many points of agreement between Jesus’ interpretation of scripture and the rabbinic tradition, confirm the <sup>12</sup> B. D. Chilton, A Galilean Rabbi and His Bible: Jesus’ Use of the Interpreted Scripture of His Time, GNS 8 (Wilmington: Glazier, 1984); idem, Profiles of a Rabbi: Synoptic Opportunities in Reading about Jesus, BJS 177 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1989); idem, Rabbi Jesus: An Intimate Biography. The Jewish Life and Teaching that Inspired Christianity (New York: Doubleday, 2000); W. E. Phipps, The Wisdom and Wit of Rabbi Jesus (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1993); B. Witherington, Jesus the Sage: The Pilgrimage of Wisdom (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); B. H. Young, Jesus the Jewish Theologian (Peabody: Hendrickson, 1995); idem, Meet the Rabbinic: Rabbinic Thought and the Teachings of Jesus (Peabody: Hendrickson, 2007).

<sup>13</sup> In the Greek gospels we find more than one dozen occurrences of ῥαββί, which transliterates רַבִּי, and twice we find ῥαββουί (Mark 10:51; John 20:16), which transliterates רַבִּנּוּי. There are spelling and pronunciation variations among the Greek and Aramaic forms of this title.

<sup>14</sup> Rabbi literally means “my great one.”

<sup>15</sup> Prior to 70 CE the designation “Rabbi” is informal, even imprecise, and lacks the later connotations of formal training and ordination, which obtain sometime after the destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple.

<sup>16</sup> Mark 2:15, 16, 18, 23; 3:7, 9; 4:34; 5:31; and Q: Luke 6:20; 10:23; 12:22; 14:26.27.

<sup>17</sup> For examples, see m. ’Abot 1:1, 11; 2:8; 5:12; 6:6.

<sup>18</sup> “This, in turn, is education in the law [ἡ τοῦ νόμου παιδεία], by which we learn [μαθάνομεν] divine matters reverently and human affairs to our advantage” (4 Macc 1:17).

identification of Jesus as a rabbi.<sup>19</sup> Jesus frequented the synagogues of his day, which is consistent with his identity as rabbi and teacher (Matt 4:23; 9:35; Mark 1:21; 6:2; Luke 4:15; 6:6; 13:10; John 6:59). In the style of the sages and rabbis of his day, Jesus “sat down” when he taught (Matt 5:1; 26:55; Mark 12:41; Luke 4:20; 5:3; cf. Matt 23:2, where Jesus refers to the scribes and Pharisees who sit on the “seat of Moses” [ἐπὶ τῆς Μωϋσέως καθέδρας], as well as the discussion in b. Meg. 21a concerning when to sit or stand). Moreover, Jesus’ contemporaries compared him with scribes, who were students of scripture: “And they were astonished at his teaching, for he taught them as one who had authority, and not as the scribes” (Mark 1:22). On occasion Jesus himself refers to reading scripture. He asks Pharisees who criticized his disciples for plucking grain on the Sabbath: “Have you never read what David did, when he was in need and was hungry...?” (Mark 2:25; cf. Matt 12:3). In another polemical context, Jesus asks the ruling priests and elders: “Have you not read this scripture: ‘The very stone which the builders rejected has become the head of the corner...?’” (Mark 12:10). Later he asks the Sadducees, who had raised a question about resurrection: “And as for the dead being raised, have you not read in the book of Moses in the passage about the bush, how God said to him, ‘I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob’?” (Mark 12:26). In a discussion with a legal expert (νομικός τις), who has asked what one must do to inherit eternal life, Jesus asks in turn: “What is written in the Law? How do you read?” (Luke 10:26). Jesus’ style of debate accords with what we find in rabbinic literature: “Similarly you read” (e.g., b. Sabb. 97a; b. Ketub. 111a, 111b); or “How would you read this verse?” (e.g., b. Ketub. 81b; b. Qid. 22a, 40a, 81b).

Jesus’ interpretation of scripture also coheres with rabbinic interpretation. Rabbinic tradition holds that midrash was pursued following seven rules (or “measurements,” from מִדּוֹת—middot) of Hillel the Elder (cf. t. Sanh. 7.11; Baraita R. Ishmael §1; ’Abot R. Nat. [A] 37.10).<sup>20</sup> Several, perhaps even all, of these rules or close approxima-

<sup>19</sup> R. Riesner, Jesus als Lehrer, WUNT 2.7 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1981; 4th ed., 1994); B. D. Chilton and C. A. Evans, “Jesus and Israel’s Scriptures,” in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. Chilton and Evans, 281–335, here 285–298.

<sup>20</sup> According to Sipre Deut. §2 (on 1:3) even Moses is said to have taught several of these rules.

tions of them were employed by Jesus. Here are examples from three of them:<sup>21</sup>

According to the rule of qal wa-homer (lit. “light and heavy,” from קָל וְחוֹמֶר) what is true or applicable in a “light” (or less important) instance is surely true or applicable in a “heavy” (or more important) instance. Such a principle is at work when Jesus assures his disciples (cf. Matt 6:26 = Luke 12:24) that because God cares for the birds (= light), as taught in scripture (cf. Ps 147:9; Pss. Sol. 5:8–19), they can be sure that he cares for them (= heavy). A similar saying is attributed to Rabbi Simeon ben Eleazar: “Have you ever seen a wild animal or a bird practicing a craft?—yet they have their sustenance without care and were not created for anything else but to serve me? But I was created to serve my Maker. How much more then ought not I to have my sustenance without care? But I have wrought evil, and [so] forfeited my [right to] sustenance [without care]” (m. Qidd. 4:14). Although Simeon ben Eleazar applies similar logic, he has drawn a very different inference from the comparison. Adam sinned, therefore humanity must toil for its food. The inference drawn by Jesus may have reflected the belief that with the dawning of the kingdom living conditions could approximate those that existed prior to the fall.<sup>22</sup> Other dominical examples are readily at hand: “If God so clothes the grass of the field...” (Matt 6:30 = Luke 12:28; cf. Mek. on Exod 16:4 [Vayassa’ §3]: “He who has what he will eat today and says, ‘What shall I eat tomorrow,’ behold, this man lacks faith”); “If you then, who are evil, know how to give good gifts to your children...” (Matt 7:11 = Luke 11:13; cf. y. Seb. 9.1: “Rabbi Simeon ben

<sup>21</sup> Some of the examples have been taken from J. Doeve, Jewish Hermeneutics in the Synoptic Gospels and Acts (Assen: Van Gorcum, 1954), 91–118; A. Finkel, The Pharisees and the Teacher of Nazareth: A Study of Their Background, Their Halachic and Midrashic Teachings, the Similarities and Differences, AGSU 4 (Leiden: Brill, 1964), 123–128, 155–175; E. E. Ellis, “Biblical Interpretation in the New Testament Church,” in Mikra: Text, Translation, Reading and Interpretation of the Hebrew Bible in Ancient Judaism and Early Christianity, ed. M. J. Mulder, CRINT 2.1 (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988), 691–725, esp. 700–702; idem, The Old Testament in Early Christianity, WUNT 54 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1991), 130–132; R. Kasher, “The Interpretation of Scripture in Rabbinic Literature,” in Mikra, ed. Mulder, 547–594; H. L. Strack and G. Stemberger, Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992), 21–23. For further discussion of the middot, see S. Zeitlin, “Hillel and the Hermeneutical Rules,” JQR 54 (1963–64), 161–73.

<sup>22</sup> See D. C. Allison Jr. and W. D. Davies, Matthew, 3 vols., ICC (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1988–97), 1:648–651; S. T. Lachs, A Rabbinic Commentary on the New Testament: The Gospels of Matthew, Mark and Luke (Hoboken: Ktav, 1987), 132.

Yohai...said: 'A bird apart from heaven will not perish, how much less (the) son of (the) man!"; Lev. Rab. 34.14 [on 25:25]: "If this man, who is flesh and blood, cruel and not responsible for [his wife's] maintenance, was filled with compassion for her and gave her [what she needed], how much more should you be filled with compassion for us who are the children of your children, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and are dependent on you for our maintenance!").<sup>23</sup>

According to the rule of gezera sawa (lit. "an equivalent regulation," from גְּזֵירָה שְׂוָוָה) one passage may be explained by another, if similar words or phrases are present (m. Betza 1:6). When Jesus took action in the Temple precincts, he quoted phrases from Isa 56:7 and Jer 7:11: "Is it not written, 'My house shall be called a house of prayer for all the nations'? But you have made it a 'cave of robbers'" (Mark 11:17).<sup>24</sup> What has drawn these two passages together is the word "house," which appears in the quotation drawn from Isa 56:7 and also appears in the part of Jer 7:11 not quoted: "Has this house, which is called by my name, become a cave of robbers in your eyes?" Jeremiah 7 qualifies the positive eschatological expectation expressed in Isaiah 56. The principle of gezera sawa may have lain behind Jesus' appeal to the example of David, when accused of violating the Sabbath (Mark 2:23–28). As "son of man," to whom the kingdom has been promised (Dan 7:13–14), Jesus may rightfully claim the prerogative assumed by David, to whom the kingdom was also promised, when he and his men ate the consecrated bread (1 Sam 21:1–6).<sup>25</sup> Examples of gezera sawa are common among the rabbis.<sup>26</sup>

<sup>23</sup> Cf. Allison and Davies, Matthew, 1:656, 683–685; Lachs, Rabbinic Commentary, 133, 142–143. A similar saying is attributed to Yohanan ben Zakkai in b. Ber. 28b. For discussion of the saying attributed to Simeon ben Yohai, see Chilton, Profiles of a Rabbi, 91–103.

<sup>24</sup> Some interpreters have claimed that Mark 11:15–17 is inauthentic, at least in part, because Jer 7:11 refers to "robbers" (λησταιί), not "thieves" (κλέπται). According to E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985), 66: "'robber' always means raider, never swindler." Sanders wonders why Jesus would cite a passage that talks about robbers, instead of swindlers. Given what Josephus says about the behavior of the first-century ruling priests (Ant. 20.179–181; 20.205–206; for rabbinic criticisms of the ruling priests, see t. Menah. 13.18–22; t. Zebah. 11.16; b. Pesah. 57a), Sanders's objection is hardly persuasive.

According to the rule of binyan 'ab mikkatub 'ehad (lit. “constructing a father [i.e., principal rule] from one [passage],” from בִּינְיָן אֶבְיָן אֶחָד (מִכְּתוּב אֶחָד)) a general principle may be established from one verse or phrase. Other verses, which contain this key phrase, can be viewed as belonging to a family. Jesus’ defense of the resurrection evidently presupposed this rule. Since God is not the God of the dead, but of the living, the revelation at the burning bush, “I am the God of Abraham” (Exod 3:14–15), implies that Abraham is to be resurrected. From this one text and its inference one may further infer, as Jesus did (Mark 12:26),<sup>27</sup> the truth of the general resurrection. Similarly, <sup>25</sup> Some interpreters believe that Mark 2:25–26 was created by the early church to justify its violation of the Sabbath and answer the Pharisaic criticism prompted by it. One should then wonder why the early church, perusing scripture for a word of justification to place on the lips of Jesus, should create a saying that contains no actual citation of Scripture (which is what the church usually does), but instead a difficult reference to “Abiathar the high priest,” which the early church will then have to mitigate through omission (cf. Matt 12:4 = Luke 6:4). The retort, “Have you never read,” and an appeal to an Old Testament passage that has nothing to do with Sabbath law reflect a spontaneous Sitz im Leben Jesu rather than a later community setting.

P. Sigal (The Halakah of Jesus of Nazareth according to the Gospel of Matthew [Lanham: University Press of America, 1986]) has recently argued that the anonymous Tannaitic interpretation of Exod 31:14 (“‘And you shall keep the Sabbath, for it is holy to you’: This means: the Sabbath is given to you but you are not surrendered to the Sabbath”) may actually derive from Jesus (cf. Mek. on Exod 31:12–17 [Sab. §1]).

D. M. Cohn-Sherbok (“An Analysis of Jesus’ Arguments concerning the Plucking of Grain on the Sabbath,” JSNT 2 [1979]: 31–41) acknowledges that Mark 2:23–28 provides evidence that Jesus was familiar with rabbinic hermeneutics, but he thinks that Jesus’ arguments were “not valid from a rabbinic point of view,” adding that this “misuse of rabbinic reasoning should not surprise us since it bears out the truth of the Gospel in asserting that Jesus was not a skilled casuist in the style of the Pharisees and Sadducees” (40). By describing Jesus’ exegesis as “not valid” and as a “misuse of rabbinic reasoning” Cohn-Sherbok is guilty of anachronism in his use of rabbinic sources. Jesus’ exegesis is “not valid” only when compared to later practice. Such a judgment is without warrant when describing early first-century Jewish exegetical practice. Cohn-Sherbok seems to read later rabbinic practices into the pre-70 CE Pharisees and Sadducees.

<sup>26</sup> Although from a later period, the opinion of Rab Ashi illustrates the importance that rabbis attached to gezera sawa: “Do not lightly regard a gezera sawa, for the cases to which death by stoning applies are essential laws of the Torah, yet Scripture teaches (most of them) by gezera sawa” (b. Ker. 5a). For more examples, see b. Pesah. 66a; Gen. Rab. 27.3 (on Gen 6:5); Pesiq. R. 4.2.

<sup>27</sup> Some interpreters doubt the authenticity of the passage, supposing that it reflects a rabbinic-style argument characteristic of the early church’s dispute with Judaism. This line of reasoning is dubious. First of all, given the common ground from נמצא? (“he is found”) the rabbis deduced that two or three witnesses are always required, since this command precedes a series of examples in Deuteronomy 17 (Sipre Deut. §148 [on 17:2]). There are many other examples.<sup>28</sup>

3. Jesus as Healer

The healing dimension of Jesus’ ministry was diverse, including not only healing, but exorcism, and even, in a certain sense, medicine. As recent studies have shown, the lines between miracle, medicine, and magic were not clearly drawn in antiquity.<sup>29</sup> How one assessed an unusual deed often depended on one’s assessment of the doer of the deed.

Today many scholars agree that Jesus’ contemporaries viewed him as a worker of miracles. At the very least, it is conceded that Jesus did things and that things happened around him that eyewitnesses regarded as supernatural events. It is rightly recognized that the his-shared by Christians and Pharisees (both believe in the resurrection) and the fact that it is with the Pharisees that early Christians quarreled, why was the invention of such a dominical saying necessary? And, secondly, if the early church felt it necessary to defend the truth of the general resurrection, how do we account for no allusion to Jesus’ resurrection (which was the real bone of contention between Christians and non-Christians)? There is nothing in this pericope that is specifically Christian and nothing that suggests that it did not originate with Jesus.

---

<sup>28</sup> Among others, see b. Mak. 5b; Sipra Lev. §209 (on Lev 20:13–16).

<sup>29</sup> For a representative sampling of bibliography, see D. E. Aune, “Magic in Early Christianity,” ANRW II 23.2 (1980): 1507–1557; E. Eve, The Jewish Context of Jesus’ Miracles, JSNTSup 231 (London and New York: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002); C. J. Hemer, “Medicine in the New Testament World,” in Medicine and the Bible B. Palmer, ed. (Exeter: Paternoster Press, 1986), 43–83; J. M. Hull, Hellenistic Magic and the Synoptic Tradition, SBT 2.28 (London: SCM, 1974); H. C. Kee, Miracle in the Early Christian World (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1983); idem, Medicine, Miracle and Magic in the Roman World (Boston: Boston University Press, 1985); idem, Medicine, Miracle and Magic in New Testament Times, SNTSMS 55 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986); M. Labahn and B. J. Lietaert Peerbolte, eds., A Kind of Magic: Understanding Magic in the New Testament and its Religious Environment, LNTS 306 (London and New York: T&T Clark International, 2007); J. J. Pilch, Healing in the New Testament: Insights from Medical and Mediterranean Anthropology (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2000); J. Scarborough, “Medicine,” in Civilization of the Ancient Mediterranean, ed. M. Grant and R. Kitzinger (New York: Scribner’s Sons, 1988), 1227–1248; M. Smith, Jesus the Magician (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1978); G. Theissen, Miracle Stories of the Early Christian Tradition (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1983); G. H. Twelftree, Jesus the Miracle Worker: A Historical and Theological Study (Downers Grove: InterVarsity Press, 1999).

torian need not pass judgment with regard to the metaphysical or supernatural causes, nor try to find “scientific” explanations for what Jesus’ contemporaries say they saw or experienced. It is sufficient to inquire into what Jesus did and how people assessed what he did and then evaluate the antiquity and credibility of the sources that report these events.<sup>30</sup>

In the case of Jesus what we see is that not everyone was favorably impressed. There was no uniform assessment of Jesus’ teaching and his works of power. This is an interesting observation. The degree of ambivalence expressed in the gospels with respect to the miracles of Jesus in my opinion lends additional support to the authenticity of the tradition. One would think that a spurious tradition, generated out of apologetic interests and unchecked gullibility, would present Jesus’ words of power in an unambiguously positive light, as in fact we often see in the later gospels and gospel-like writings, which have no credible link to eyewitness testimony. But in the synoptic gospels the public response to the miracles of Jesus is mixed and often non-committal.

In response to Jesus’ exorcistic activities we are told that people reacted with surprise and astonishment: “What is this? A new teaching! With authority he commands even the unclean spirits, and they obey him” (Mark 1:27). “We never saw anything like this!” (Mark 2:12). Narrating responses such as these may have served some apologetic purposes, but even so they hardly constitute a ringing endorsement of Jesus’ divine credentials and truth of his message.<sup>31</sup>

Other responses are anything but positive. After the wild encounter with the Gerasene demoniac, the locals “beg Jesus to depart” (Mark 5:17). This too hardly serves Christian apologetic interests. After he preaches in Nazareth and presumably performs some works of power (as the full context suggests), residents ask: “Where did this man get all this? What is the wisdom given to him? What mighty works are wrought by his hands! Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary and brother of James and Joses and Judas and Simon, and are not his sisters here with us?" (Mark 6:2b–3a). The evangelist adds: "And they took offense at him... And he marveled because of their unbelief" (Mark 6:3b, 6a).<sup>32</sup> In Luke's longer version of the Nazareth visit, Jesus has the words flung at him: "Physician, heal yourself! Do here what you have done at Capernaum" (Luke 4:23). At the very least these words have the ring of a challenge;<sup>33</sup> they reflect little, if any, faith.

---

<sup>30</sup> For more on this topic, see B. Saler, “Supernatural as a Western Category,” Ethos 5 (1977), 21–33; C. Brown, Miracles and the Critical Mind (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984).

<sup>31</sup> See the important study by G. H. Twelftree, Jesus the Exorcist: A Contribution to the Study of the Historical Jesus, WUNT 2.54 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1993; repr. Peabody: Hendrickson, 1993).

The unenthusiastic response of the people of Nazareth is consistent with reservations expressed by Jesus' family. The evangelist tells us that on one occasion when a crowd gathered (probably because of healings and exorcisms), "his family, hearing of it, went out to seize him, for they were saying, 'He is beside himself'" (Mark 3:21). The Greek is not clear: καὶ ἀκούσαντες οἱ παρ' αὐτοῦ ἐξῆλθον κρατῆσαι αὐτόν: ἔλεγον γὰρ ὅτι ἐξέστη. The RSV translates οἱ παρ' αὐτοῦ "his family." Literally it means "those by him." It surely does not refer to his disciples. So it refers either to people in the crowd (3:20) or to members of his family. The other problem concerns who is speaking the words, "He is beside himself" (ἐξέστη). Grammatically and contextually one should think that the subject of "they were saying" (ἔλεγον) is οἱ παρ' αὐτοῦ. If so, the evangelist seems to be saying that members of Jesus' family attempted to seize Jesus, for they (members of his family) were saying that Jesus was in a state. But Markan syntax is sometimes less than clear. Here the evangelist may be saying that Jesus' family attempted to seize him because they (i.e., people in the crowd—so the RSV) were saying that Jesus was in a state. In other words, Jesus' family was in a sense trying to protect Jesus. However the text is understood, readers are left with the impression that Jesus did not enjoy the full support of his family (cf. John 7:5, "even his brothers did not believe in him"). The awkwardness of this material argues strongly for the authenticity of Jesus' reputation as healer and exorcist.<sup>34</sup>

<sup>32</sup> On the Markan evangelist's understanding of miracle and faith, see M. E. Glasswell, "The Use of Miracles in the Markan Gospel," in Miracles: Cambridge Studies in their Philosophy and History, ed. C. F. D. Moule (London: Mowbray, 1965), 151–162.

<sup>33</sup> J. Nolland, "Classical and Rabbinical Parallels to 'Physician, Heal Yourself' (Lk. IV 23)," NovT 21 (1979): 193–209.

<sup>34</sup> This diversity of opinion with regard to Jesus' miracles, along with its ubiquity, virtually guarantees the historicity of Jesus' reputation as a worker of miracles. I believe this point is quite significant, notwithstanding the objections recently raised Jesus' reputation as a healer even reaches the ears of the tetrarch of Galilee, Herod Antipas. Although opinions regarding Jesus differed, Herod, along with others, thinks he is perhaps John the Baptist, who had been beheaded, raised from the dead (Mark 6:14–16). Speculation such as this would have meant several things. First, it suggests the reputation of Jesus had grown a great deal. Though not the intention, Herod's opinion pays Jesus a compliment, in that Jesus' power is viewed as so great that it can be explained only in reference to a return from the dead, in which the prophet redivivus has brought back power from the immortal realm. Second, the comparison with John is ominous, for one would expect the tetrarch to seek Jesus' life, even as he had taken John's life. This, in fact, is what we are told in Luke (13:31; cf. 23:7–11).

More ominously, we are told that scribes from Jerusalem leveled a pretty serious charge against Jesus, saying: "He is possessed by Beelzebul and by the prince of demons he casts out the demons" (Mark 3:22). Such a charge not only discredits the healings and exorcisms of Jesus, it may also bring into play Mosaic teaching with regard to a false prophet, who, though he performs signs, leads Israel astray, urging the people to worship other gods (Deut 13:1–11). The people are not to listen to such a prophet. Even the prophet's family is to take no pity on him (13:6–9). The false prophet is to be killed (13:10). I am not certain that the accusation in Mark 3:22 carries this connotation, but it is interesting to observe that Jewish criticism of Jesus in the second century and later sometimes alluded to Deuteronomy 13.<sup>35</sup> by Eric Eve, "Meier, Miracle and Multiple Attestation," JSHJ 3 (2005): 23–45. I have to agree with John Meier's point: "To sum up: the historical fact that Jesus performed extraordinary deeds deemed by himself and others to be miracles is supported most impressively by the criterion of multiple attestation of source and forms and the criterion of coherence. The miracle traditions about Jesus' public ministry are already so widely attested in various sources and literary forms by the end of the first Christian generation that total fabrication by the early church is, practically speaking, impossible." See J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, II: Mentor, Message, and Miracles, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1994), 630. Eve underestimates the strength of the eyewitness testimony lying behind the New Testament gospels. On this point, see S. Byrskog, Story as History—History as Story, WUNT 123 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000); R. J. Bauckham, Jesus and the Eyewitnesses: The Gospels as Eyewitness Testimony (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006).

---

<sup>35</sup> As seen in Justin Martyr, Dial. Tryph. 69.7; b. Sanh. 43a, 107b. For discussion of the possibility of Deuteronomy 13 lying behind the accusation, see G. N. Stanton, "Jesus of Nazareth: A Magician and a False Prophet Who Deceived God's People?"

Jesus' healing and exorcistic powers seemed to elicit the most amazement and comment. His actions are explicitly compared to those of the scribes: "And they were astonished at his teaching, for he taught them as one who had authority, and not as the scribes" (Mark 1:22). The crowd was astonished, because Jesus invoked no authoritative names, uttered no incantations, and employed no paraphernalia. He commanded the evil spirit to depart, and it departed. Thanks to a few eyewitness accounts and the survival of a number of magical texts, we have some idea of what the typical exorcist did, in attempting to cast out an evil spirit. One of the most helpful accounts is provided by Josephus.

According to Josephus (Ant. 8.46–49), a certain Eleazar, who employed incantations attributed to king Solomon, could draw out demons through a person's nostrils, through use of the Baaras root (a root further described in War 7.180–85) and a ring and seal (δακτύλιον ἔχοντα ὑπὸ τῆ σφραγίδι ῥίζαν) handed down, supposedly given to Solomon by an angel (cf. T. Sol. 1:6 δακτυλίδιον ἔχον σφραγίδα). Josephus tells us that Eleazar "in the presence of Vespasian, his sons, tribunes, and a number of soldiers, could free people possessed by demons." He could do this because Solomon had "composed incantations by which illnesses are relieved, and left behind forms of exorcisms with which those possessed by demons drive them out, never to return" (Ant. 8.45–46).

The tradition of Solomon as exorcist par excellence was widespread in late antiquity. It begins in the Bible itself where Solomon is described as unsurpassed in knowledge (1 Kgs 4:29–34). His knowledge of proverbs and plants (1 Kgs 4:32–33) contributed to later speculation that he had mastered the secrets of herbs and spells. And with his knowledge of herbs and spells the king had power over spirits. According to the Wisdom of Solomon God gave the monarch knowledge of "the powers of spirits [πνευμάτων βίαις] and the reasonings of men, the varieties of plants and the virtues of roots; [he] learned what is both secret and what is manifest" (Wis 7:17–21).

---

in Jesus of Nazareth: Lord and Christ. Essays on the Historical Jesus and New Testament Christology, ed. J. B. Green and M. Turner (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994), 164–180. Stanton concludes that "it would be surprising if some opponents did not dub [Jesus] as a false prophet, perhaps even with Deuteronomy 13 in mind" (180). See also P. W. Hollenbach, "Jesus, Demoniacs, and Public Authorities: A Socio-Historical Study," JAAR 49 (1982): 567–88.

Solomon's power over demonic forces was appealed to for protection, as has been shown by Aramaic and Hebrew incantations dating from the early centuries of the Common Era. It is to this tradition that Josephus refers in mentioning Eleazar.

The tradition of Solomon as master healer and exorcist was well known in Christian circles. Origen refers to those who attempted exorcisms according to the spells written by Solomon (Comm. Matthew 33 [on Matt 26:63]). The pseudepigraphal Testament of Solomon, probably written by a Greek-speaking Christian in the second or third century, though based on earlier Jewish material, is wholly dedicated to this theme.<sup>36</sup>

The name of Solomon was invoked in Jewish charms and incantations. In an Aramaic incantation bowl we read: "Bound are the demons...with the bond of 'El Shaddai and with the sealing of King Solomon, son [of David]...Amen..."<sup>37</sup> Solomon's name appears in the Aramaic version of Psalm 91, a psalm that in late antiquity was understood as providing protection from demons.<sup>38</sup> Even in pagan incantations the name of Solomon is invoked: "I conjure you by the seal [κατὰ τῆς σφραγίδος] that Solomon placed on the tongue of Jeremiah" (PGM IV.3007–3086, at lines 39–41). The seal (σφραγίς) mentioned here is that mentioned in Josephus and in Testament of Solomon.<sup>39</sup>

Three gospel passages are particularly interesting in the light of this Solomonic tradition. The first is Jesus' assertion: "Behold, something

<sup>36</sup> D. C. Duling, "The Eleazar Miracle and Solomon's Magical Wisdom in Flavius Josephus' Antiquitates Judaicae 8.42–49," HTR 78 (1985): 1–25.

<sup>37</sup> From C. H. Gordon, "Aramaic Incantation Bowls," Orientalia 10 (1991): 116–141, 272–280, at 273–276 (no. 11, lines 17–18).

<sup>38</sup> See v. 3, which reads: "For he will deliver you, Solomon my son, from the snare and the obstacle, from death and confusion," and v. 9, which reads: "Solomon answered and said: 'For you are my confidence, O Lord...'" Solomon's name does not appear in the Hebrew or Greek versions of Psalm 91. The demonic orientation of the Aramaic version is seen in vv. 5–6, which read: "Be not afraid of the terror of demons who walk at night, of the arrow of the angel of death that he looses during the day; of the death that walks in darkness, of the band of demons that attacks at noon," and in v. 10, which reads: "The lord of the world responded and thus he said: 'No harm shall happen to you; and no plague or demon shall come near to your tents.'" greater than Solomon is here [πλεῖον Σολομῶνος ᾧδε!]” (Matt 12:42). In itself this assertion is astonishing. But more than that, the language of the formula, namely, that someone important is “here” (ᾧδε), is echoed in other incantations, e.g., “Abraham dwells here [ᾧδε]” (P.Rainer gr. 19889). In other words, Jesus’ choice of words may have deliberately echoed the language of incantation. Coherent with Jesus’ comparison of himself with Solomon is a second passage, in which blind Bartimaeus appeals to Jesus for healing, addressing him as “Son of David” (Mark 10:46–52, esp. vv. 47–48). Given Solomon’s reputation as healer, the epithet that the blind man chose may allude to Solomon, son of David, as much as it alludes to David’s messianic descendent.<sup>40</sup>

<sup>39</sup> For more on this topic, see C. C. McCown, "The Christian Tradition as to the Magical Wisdom of Solomon," Journal of the Palestine Oriental Society 2 (1922): 1–24; D. C. Duling, "Solomon, Exorcism, and the Son of David," HTR 68 (1975): 235–252.

The third passage concerns the exorcist, outside Jesus’ following, who casts out demons in the name of Jesus (Mark 9:38–40):

John said to him, “Teacher, we saw a man casting out demons in your name [ἐν τῷ ὀνόματί σου ἐκβάλλοντα δαιμόνια], and we forbade him, because he was not following us.” But Jesus said, “Do not forbid him; for no one who does a mighty work in my name will be able soon after to speak evil of me. For he that is not against us is for us.”

What is remarkable is that this activity evidently was taking place during the pre-Easter ministry. The probability that this is authentic pre-Easter tradition is seen in the surprising response of Jesus, which stands in tension with early Christian teaching and practice, in which only Christian leaders, especially the apostles, have the authority to invoke the name of Jesus for purposes of healing and exorcism. This point is dramatically illustrated in Acts, in the story of the young slave girl with the python spirit (Acts 16:16–18) and in the story of the seven sons of Sceva, the Jewish high priest (Acts 19:13–20). Not just anyone can invoke the name of Jesus, certainly not professional soothsayers and exorcists. Given the probability that we have here the post-Easter Christian perspective, it is more than probable that the story found in Mark 9 represents genuine pre-Easter tradition.<sup>41</sup> Of course, well after the timeframe of the book of Acts, the name of Jesus is invoked, not only by Christians, but by pagans (e.g., PGM IV.3019–3020: “I adjure you by the God of the Hebrews, Jesus”) and even non-Christian Jews (t. Hullin 2.22; cf. b. Sanh. 43a; b. Gittin 57a, ms M).

---

<sup>40</sup> For more on this passage, see Duling, “Solomon, Exorcism, and the Son of David”; J. H. Charlesworth, “Solomon and Jesus: The Son of David in Ante-Markan Traditions (Mk 10:47),” in Biblical and Humane: A Festschrift for John F. Priest, ed. L. B. Elder et al., Homage 20 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1996), 125–151; idem, “The Son of David: Solomon and Jesus (Mark 10.47),” in The New Testament and Hellenistic Judaism, ed. P. Borgen and S. Giversen (Aarhus: Aarhus University Press, 1995), 72–87.

The implications are extraordinary: Professional exorcists in the time of Jesus invoked his name, much as they invoked the name of Solomon, whose name and reputation in late antiquity were highly regarded. Perhaps others shared Jesus’ opinion, namely, that indeed one greater than Solomon was here.

Before concluding the discussion of Jesus as healer and exorcist, something needs to be said about the mystical or visionary dimension of his life and ministry. In a recent book on the life and spiritual development of Jesus Bruce Chilton has appealed to Jewish Merkabah (“Chariot”) mysticism as the probable backdrop of Jesus’ mysticism and access to divine insight and empowerment.<sup>42</sup> Few know the Jewish world of Jesus as well as Chilton and his book is filled with helpful, clarifying insight, not least his treatment of Jesus’ status as mamzer, or one of suspect birth. Although the degree of influence of Merkabah mysticism in the development of Jesus has been challenged,<sup>43</sup> the significance of the ecstatic and visionary dimension cannot any longer be ignored.<sup>44</sup>

---

<sup>41</sup> For more on Mark 9:38–40, see G. H. Twelftree, In the Name of Jesus: Exorcism among Early Christians (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2007), 125–127.

<sup>42</sup> Chilton, Rabbi Jesus.

<sup>43</sup> See C. L. Quarles, “Jesus as Merkabah Mystic,” JSHJ 3 (2005): 5–22.

<sup>44</sup> The question of Merkabah mysticism in the time of Jesus is as difficult as it is interesting. There does seem to be evidence of antiquity, as seen in some of the Dead Sea Scrolls and here and there in early Christian writings. One thinks of Paul’s ascent into the “third heaven,” where he heard things that cannot be repeated (2 Cor 12:1–7), of those at Colossae who, having entered heaven, have participated in angelic liturgy (Col 2:18), and of the visionary at Qumran, who has acquired learning in heaven and therefore has no equal on earth (4Q491c). For a study on the general topic, see T. Eskola, Messiah and the Throne: Jewish Merkabah Mysticism and Early Christian Exaltation Discourse, WUNT 2.142 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001). For studies of the possible presence of early Merkabah ideas in the Dead Sea Scrolls, the LXX, and Christian tradition, see D. J. Halperin, “Merkabah Midrash in the Septuagint,” JBL 101 (1982): 351–363; J. M. Baumgarten, “The Qumran Sabbath Shirot and Rabbinic Merkabah Traditions,” RevQ 13 (1988): 199–213; J. Schaberg, “Mark 14.62: Early Christian Merkabah Imagery?” in Apocalyptic and the New Testament: Essays in Honor of J. Louis Martyn, ed. J. Marcus and M. Soards, JSNTSup 24 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1989), 69–94; D. Dimant, “The Merkabah Vision in Second Ezekiel Jesus' vision of heaven (Mark 1:10–11; 9:2–8; Luke 10:18–19), identification with the human being, or “son of man,” of Dan 7:13–14 (Mark 2:10), as well as his bold assertion to be seated at the right hand of God himself (Mark 14:61–62), attest this mystical and visionary dimension. Moreover, Jesus' encounter with Satan in the wilderness temptation (Mark 1:12–13; Matt 4:1–11 = Luke 4:1–13) and his declaration, “I saw Satan fall like lightning from heaven” (Luke 10:18), add further documentation to Jesus as healer, exorcist, and mystic.

4. Jesus as Messiah

For Jesus the beginning of the messianic trajectory is probably to be traced to his appeal to passages from Isaiah. He is the prophetic herald of good news who is “anointed” with the Spirit of God. His announcement, “The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent, and believe in the gospel” (Mark 1:15), reflects the language of Isa 40:9 and 52:7, which in the Aramaic the text reads: “The kingdom of your God is revealed.” Isaiah's “gospel” (בשרה = εὐαγγέλιον) is understood to be the revelation of the kingdom (or rule) of God.<sup>45</sup>

Jesus is qualified and equipped to proclaim this message, because he is the prophet anointed by the Spirit of the Lord. We see this in the Lukan version of the Nazareth Sermon (Luke 4:16–30), where Isa 61:1–2 is quoted (“the Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because the Lord has anointed me to bring good news”) and is said to be fulfilled “today” (Luke 4:21). Although some critic have expressed reserva-(4Q385 4),” RevQ 14 (1990): 331–48; B. Nitzan, “The Merkabah Descriptions in 4Q Berakhot,” in Proceedings of the Eleventh World Congress of Jewish Studies. Division A: The Bible and its World, ed. D. Assaf, (1994), 87–94 (Hebrew); and M. G. Abegg Jr., “Who Ascended to Heaven? 4Q491, 4Q427, and the Teacher of Righteousness,” in Eschatology, Messianism, and the Dead Sea Scrolls, ed. C. A. Evans and P. W. Flint, Dead Sea Scrolls and Related Literature 1 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997), 61–73. Quarles (“Jesus as Merkabah Mystic”) expresses reservations about the conclusions reached in some of these studies.

---

<sup>45</sup> The dictional and thematic coherence between Jesus' proclamation and the Aramaic paraphrase of Isaiah has been adequately clarified and defended by B. D. Chilton, A Galilean Rabbi and His Bible: Jesus' Use of the Interpreted Scripture of His Time, GNS 8 (Wilmington: Glazier, 1984); idem, “The Kingdom of God in Recent Discussion,” 255–280.

tions about the historicity of this version of Jesus' proclamation in Nazareth (cf. Mark 6:1–6), there is little reason for skepticism with regard to the allusions to Isaiah in Jesus' reply to the imprisoned John the Baptist (Matt 11:2–6 = Luke 7:19–23).<sup>46</sup> The significance of Jesus' allusion to words and phrases from Isaiah has been greatly clarified by one of the fragmentary scrolls from Qumran.

4Q521 speaks of a "Messiah, whom heaven and earth will obey." The text goes on to describe things expected to take place: God's "Spirit will hover over the poor, and he will renew the faithful with his strength." He will free prisoners, restore the sight of the blind, heal the wounded, make alive the dead, and proclaim good news to the poor. The parallels to Jesus' reply to the imprisoned John the Baptist have been pointed out (Matt 11:5 = Luke 7:22).<sup>47</sup> Jesus' reply, as in the case of 4Q521, is heavily dependent upon words and phrases drawn from Isa 26:19; 35:5–6; and 61:1–2.<sup>48</sup> The parallels suggest at the very least that Jesus' reply would have been understood as an implicit claim to a messianic role (though whether principally in a royal or prophetic capacity must be settled on other terms).

---

<sup>46</sup> In my opinion, when in Mark's briefer version Jesus declares, "A prophet is not without honor, except in his own country..." (Mark 6:4), in all probability he has alluded to Isa 61:1, which in the Aramaic says, "The prophet said, 'A spirit of prophecy before the Lord God is upon me...,'" the very text presented in the longer Lukan version (Luke 4:17–19). On the eschatological understanding of Isa 61:1–3 in Jewish late antiquity, see 11Q13.

<sup>47</sup> For principal literature, see É. Puech, "Une apocalypse messianique (4Q521)," RevQ 15 (1992): 475–522; J. D. Tabor and M. O. Wise, "On 'Resurrection' and the Synoptic Gospel Tradition: A Preliminary Study," JSP 10 (1992): 150–161; R. Bergmeier, "Beobachtungen zu 4Q521 f 2, ii 1–13," ZDMG 145 (1995): 38–48; J. J. Collins, "The Works of the Messiah," DSD 1 (1994): 98–112; idem, The Scepter and the Star: The Messiahs of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Other Ancient Literature, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1995), 117–122; M. Becker, "4Q521 und die Gesalbten," RevQ 18 (1997): 73–96; K.-W. Niebuhr, "Die Werke des eschatologischen Freudenboten (4Q521 und die Jesusüberlieferung)," in The Scriptures in the Gospels, ed. C. M. Tuckett, BETL 131 (Leuven: Peeters, 1997), 637–647; E. Puech, "Some Remarks on 4Q246 and 4Q521 and Qumran Messianism," in The Provo International Conference on the Dead Sea Scrolls: Technological Innovations, New Texts, and Reformulated Issues, ed. D. W. Parry and E. Ulrich, STDJ 30 (Leiden: Brill, 1998), 545–565; M. Labahn, "The Significance of Signs in Luke 7:22–23 in the Light of Isaiah 61 and the Messianic Apocalypse," in From Prophecy to Testament: The Function of the Old Testament in the New, ed. C. A. Evans (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2004), 146–168.

<sup>48</sup> The authenticity of the exchange between Jesus and John should not be doubted. No plausible explanation can be found for why Christians would invent a conversation between Jesus and John, where the latter openly expresses doubt about the identity and mission of the former.

Recognition as the anointed eschatological prophet does not preclude identification as the messianic “son of David.” As already mentioned, in late antiquity David was viewed as a prophet. Nor does recognition as a healer and exorcist preclude identification as the messianic “son of David,” for David himself, on whom the Spirit of the Lord came mightily (1 Sam 16:13), could drive away evil spirits (1 Sam 16:23), and, as already reviewed above, his famous son Solomon was exorcist par excellence.

Accordingly, we should not be surprised that Jesus, well known prophet, healer, and exorcist, was hailed as “son of David” by blind Bartimaeus (Mark 10:47–48), and when he entered Jerusalem, mounted on the royal mule (Mark 11:7–11; cf. 1 Kgs 1:32–48), was greeted with the words of Ps 118:25–26, influenced again by the Aramaic interpretive tradition, “Blessed is the kingdom of our father David that is coming!” (Mark 11:10).

Jesus’ royal messianic self-understanding is confirmed in his reply to the high priest. Caiaphas asked Jesus directly: “Are you the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?” The epithet “Messiah, Son of God,” is most naturally interpreted as in reference to the anticipated Davidic Messiah (2 Sam 7:14; Pss 2:1, 7; 89:20, 26–27; 4Q174 I, 11; Rom 1:3–4). Jesus not only affirmed that he is the Messiah, Son of God (as is clear in the words “[Yes,] I am”), he combined Davidic material with his favorite self-designation as “the Son of man” in a conflation of Ps 110:1 and Dan 7:13: “you will see the Son of man seated at the right hand of Power, and coming with the clouds of heaven” (Mark 14:62). Both Psalm 110 and Daniel 7 envision scenes of judgment upon God’s enemies.<sup>49</sup> Thus, in replying the way he did Jesus threatened Caiaphas and his colleagues with judgment, a judgment that will some day be carried out when Jesus sits on the very chariot throne of his heavenly father. The high priest understandably reacted in horror, tearing his garments in response to such blasphemy.

That Roman authority understood the royal implications of Jesus’ claim is seen in his subsequent crucifixion as “king of the Jews” (Mark 15:2, 18, 26), the title reserved for Israel’s ruler appointed by Rome (Josephus, War 1.282; Ant. 14.36; 15.373, 409). Jesus’ earliest followers understood their master in terms of Davidic messianism as well. Jesus' physical descent from David is acknowledged, with surprisingly little emphasis (as seen especially in Rom 1:3), and Jesus is so commonly referred to as Messiah (i.e., "Christ" in Greek) that the title takes on the function of a name.

---

<sup>49</sup> See M. Hengel, “‘Sit at My Right Hand!’,” in Studies in Early Christology (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1995), 119–225, esp. 181–189.

5. Jesus as Martyr

There are several utterances that suggest that Jesus anticipated martyrdom for himself and some of his followers. The obvious place to begin is with Jesus' formal predictions of his suffering and death (e.g., Mark 8:31; 9:31; 10:32–34, among others).<sup>50</sup> Of course, many critical scholars claim that these Passion predictions are prophecies after the fact, or what are sometimes called vaticinia ex eventu ("prophecies from the event"). It must be admitted that these predictions have a formulaic appearance and contain details (such as being mocked, spat upon, and scourged) that suggest knowledge of what in the end actually happened to Jesus. But even if it is acknowledged that the Passion predictions have been edited in the light of what happened, that does not necessarily mean that Jesus in fact did not anticipate his death, even death specifically by crucifixion. What is the evidence outside the formal Passion predictions that suggests that Jesus really did anticipate suffering and death?

First, Jesus' warning that those who wish to follow him had better be prepared to take up the cross (Mark 8:34). John Dominic Crossan thinks this saying is probably authentic, because of a similar saying credited to a Cynic!<sup>51</sup> This argument is hardly compelling, not least because Jesus was no Cynic. What makes the cross saying likely genuine is that in the end Jesus was unable to take up his cross and carry it to the place of crucifixion. Someone else has to carry it (Mark 15:21). What post-Easter follower of Jesus would invent a saying that reflects an ideal that Jesus himself could not fulfill?

Taking up one's cross would for the first-century inhabitant of the Roman Empire call to mind the condemned person carrying his cross to the place of execution.<sup>52</sup> Crucifixion was common enough in Palestine itself (cf. Josephus, Ant. 17.295) that we need not think Jesus' saying must have originated later and elsewhere. But the saying is strange nonetheless. In rabbinic parlance a disciple is urged to take up the yoke of Torah, or the yoke of the commandments (e.g. m. 'Abot 3:5; m. Ber. 2:2); never to take up the cross. Jesus' summons would have struck a somber, if not macabre note in the ears of his audience.

---

<sup>50</sup> H. F. Bayer, Jesus' Predictions of Vindication and Resurrection: The Provenance, Meaning and Correlation of the Synoptic Predictions, WUNT 2.20 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1986).

<sup>51</sup> J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1991), 353. Crossan cites Epictetus, Diatr. 2.2.10: "If you want to be crucified, just wait. The cross will come."

Closely related to Jesus' exhortation and warning regarding the cross are his sayings about the dangers of temptation and the dreadful consequences of causing others to stumble (Mark 9:42–48):

Whoever causes one of these little ones who believe in me to sin, it would be better for him if a great millstone were hung round his neck and he were thrown into the sea. And if your hand causes you to sin, cut it off; it is better for you to enter life maimed than with two hands to go to hell, to the unquenchable fire. And if your foot causes you to sin, cut it off; it is better for you to enter life lame than with two feet to be thrown into hell. And if your eye causes you to sin, pluck it out; it is better for you to enter the kingdom of God with one eye than with two eyes to be thrown into hell, where their worm does not die, and the fire is not quenched.

The fearsome injuries described (amputated limbs, gouged out eyes) parallel the horrors described in 2 Maccabees 6–7 inflicted upon the faithful who refused to commit apostasy during the pogroms of Antiochus IV. The opening statement, “Whoever causes one of these little ones who believe in me to sin,” may allude to the steadfast testimony of the righteous elder Eleazar (2 Macc 6:18–31). When asked only to pretend to eat pork and thereby escape torture and death, he refused, saying “Such pretense is not worthy of our time of life,” he said, “lest many of the young should suppose that Eleazar in his ninetieth year has gone over to an alien religion, and through my pretense, for the sake of living a brief moment longer, they should be led astray because of me, while I defile and disgrace my old age. For even if for the present I should avoid the punishment of men, yet whether I live or die I shall not escape the hands of the Almighty.”

---

<sup>52</sup> M. Hengel, Crucifixion: In the Ancient World and the Folly of the Message of the Cross (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977), 62: “People were all too aware of what it meant to bear the cross through the city and then to be nailed to it.”

The courageous words of Eleazar cohere with the point that Jesus has made. Jesus warns his followers not to cause “one of these little ones who believe in me to sin,” just as Eleazar tells his tormentors that he will not, through pretense, cause “the young” to “be led astray.” If he does engage in pretense, to avoid the punishment of men (which as we see in 2 Maccabees 7 includes amputated limbs and gouged out eyes), he will “not escape the hands of the Almighty.”<sup>53</sup>

Second, the questions that Jesus put to James and John about drinking the cup also attest his anticipation of suffering and martyrdom (Mark 10:38–39):

“Are you able to drink the cup that I drink, or to be baptized with the baptism with which I am baptized?” And they said to him, “We are able.” And Jesus said to them, “The cup that I drink you will drink; and with the baptism with which I am baptized, you will be baptized.”

The entire dialogue smacks of authenticity. When the disciples learn of the request of James and John (to sit on the right and left of Jesus when he rules) they are indignant. The self-interest of the sons of Zebedee and the anger of the other disciples hardly paint a flattering portrait of Jesus' closest followers. But what is especially interesting is that here again Jesus is not able to fulfill his own words. He asked James and John if they were able to drink the cup that he will drink and they said that they were able. Yet, in prayer in Gethsemane, shortly before his arrest, Jesus fell on his face and begged God to take the cup of suffering from him (Mark 14:33–36). This is not the stuff of pious fiction or post-Easter dogma. It is authentic material, even if awkward and unflattering.

---

<sup>53</sup> In recent years a great number of studies concerned with martyrdom have appeared, many of them treating the Maccabean martyrs. For a selection of studies, see K. Grayston, “Atonement and Martyrdom,” in Early Christian Thought in its Jewish Context: Festschrift M. D. Hooker, ed. J. Barclay and J. Sweet (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996), 250–263; J. W. van Henten, The Maccabean Martyrs as Saviours of the Jewish People: A Study of 2 and 4 Maccabees, JSJSup 57 (Leiden: Brill, 1997); D. Boyarin, “Martyrdom and the Making of Christianity and Judaism,” Journal of Early Christian Studies 6 (1998): 577–627; J. W. van Henten, “Martyrism and Martyrdom: Some Remarks about Noble Death in Josephus,” in Internationales Josephus-Kolloquium Brüssel 1998, ed. J. U. Kalms, Münsteraner judaistische Studien 4 (Münster: Lit, 1999), 124–141; S. A. Cummins, Paul and the Crucified Christ in Antioch: Maccabean Martyrdom and Galatians 1 and 2, SNTSMS 114 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001); T. Rajak, “Dying for the Law: The Martyr’s Portrait in Jewish-Greek Literature,” in The Jewish Dialogue with Greece and Rome: Studies in Cultural and Social Interaction, AGJU 48 (Leiden: Brill, 2001): 99–133; P. B. Munoa, “Jesus, the Merkavah, and Martyrdom in Early Christian Tradition,” JBL 121 (2002): 303–25; J. W. van Henten and F. Avemarie, Martyrdom and Noble Death: Selected Texts from Graeco-Roman, Jewish and Christian Antiquity (London and New York: Routledge, 2002); S. M. Passamaneck, “The Jewish Mandate of Martyrdom: Logic and Illogic in the Halakhah,” HUCA 74 (2003): 215–241; J. W. van Henten, “Jewish Martyrdom and Jesus’ Death,” in Deutungen des Todes Jesu im Neuen Testament, ed. J. Frey, WUNT 181 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2005): 139–68; K. R. Atkinson, “Taxo’s Martyrdom and the Role of the Nuntius in the Testament of Moses: Implications for Understanding the Role of Other Intermediary Figures,” JBL 125 (2006): 453–76.

Third, Jesus' widely attested Words of Institution (Mark 14:22–25; 1 Cor 11:23–25; Did. 9:1–5), provide further evidence that Jesus anticipated his martyrdom and sought to understand it. His words allude to several important scriptures (Exod 24:8; Jer 31:31; Zech 9:11). In the shedding of his blood, Jesus finds the guarantee of the covenant and the kingdom of God. Luke's addition of "new," as in "the new covenant" (Luke 22:20), may well reflect Christian editing, but in all probability correctly captured the sense of Jesus' words. The "new covenant" hearkens back to the promise of the prophet long ago: "Behold, the days are coming, says the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and the house of Judah" (Jer 31:31). The new covenant cannot be established until the blood of God's Son, Israel's Messiah, is shed.

The idea of the saving benefit of a righteous man's death is hardly unusual in the Jewish world, or in the Mediterranean world in general for that matter. There are several expressions of the belief that the death of the righteous will benefit, or even save, God's people (e.g., 1 Macc 6:44; 4 Macc 1:11; 17:21–22; 18:3–4; T. Moses 9–10; Ps.-Philo, L.A.B. 18:5). Among the most important are traditions associated with the torture and death of the already mentioned Maccabean martyrs, who in the second century BCE bravely opposed the Syrian tyrant Antiochus IV: "If our living Lord is angry for a little while, to rebuke and discipline us, he will again be reconciled with his own servants...I, like my brothers, give up body and life for the laws of our fathers, appealing to God to show mercy soon to our nature...and through me and my brothers to bring to an end the wrath of the Almighty which has justly fallen on our whole nation" (2 Macc 7:33, 37–38, RSV, with emphasis added). Similarly, Jesus believed that God was angry with his people for having rejected his message. We see this in Jesus' weeping over the city (Luke 19:41–44; Matt 23:37–39 = Luke 13:34–35) and in his ominous allusion to the shepherd in Zech 13:7, whom God would strike down.

6. Conclusion

The principal difficulty in attempting to classify or categorize Jesus is that he exhibited characteristics of several categories and the categories themselves overlap. Because Jesus probably exhibited features characteristic of all of them, he was regarded by many—among his following and among those not of his following—as prophet, sage, healer, Messiah, and martyr, including combinations of these categories. That his movement settled on “Messiah” as the title of office and “Son of God” as the personal or metaphysical title strongly suggests that the messianic identity of Jesus took hold early in the tradition, probably in the pre-Easter setting and not after Easter, as one perspective among several competing perspectives. If the latter were the case, one would expect evidence of competing, different interpretations of Jesus. Jesus as Messiah is ubiquitous in the tradition. Indeed, to deny Jesus as the Messiah is to deny the faith (e.g., 1 John 2:22–23).

JESUS IM LICHT DER QUMRANGEMEINDE<sup>1</sup>

HEINZ-WOLFGANG KUHN

Da vor der Auffindung der Qumrantexte so gut wie keine jüdischen Texte im Original aus der zeitlichen und örtlichen Nachbarschaft Jesu zur Verfügung standen, hat die Entdeckung von weithin nur in Fragmenten erhaltenen über 900 Qumranschriften (davon über 200 Handschriften des späteren hebräischen Kanons)<sup>2</sup> der Erforschung des historischen Jesus neue Perspektiven eröffnet. Die Entdeckung erfolgte insbesondere in elf Höhlen um Chirbet Qumran am Toten Meer zwischen 1947–1956;<sup>3</sup> die Veröffentlichung der Texte liegt seit 1993 in einer Microfiche-Ausgabe<sup>4</sup> und jetzt auch in ca. 30 Qumranbänden der Reihe “Discoveries in the Judaean Desert”<sup>5</sup> fast

---

<sup>1</sup> Der hier veröffentlichten Darstellung liegen folgende Vorarbeiten des Verf. zum Thema zugrunde: 1) „Eschatologie und Gegenwart in der Verkündigung Jesu“, Anhang in H.-W. Kuhn, Enderwartung, 189–204; 2) “Qumran Texts”; 3) “Jesus”; 4) „Hintergrund“ (siehe zu allen „Ausgewählte Literatur“). Der Aufbau der letzten beiden Arbeiten ist hier im Wesentlichen beibehalten worden. Ich danke Herrn Dr. Jacob Nordhofen für die Mithilfe vor allem bei der Literatursuche und der Gestaltung des Manuskripts und meiner derzeitigen Qumran-Mitarbeiterin Frau Astrid Stacklies, M.A. für Korrekturlesen und Suche und Auswertung der Literatur. Frau Dr. Regina Franke, Frau Dr. Stephanie Keim, Frau Annedore Becker, Herr Paul Henke und Frau Andrea Krakau haben ebenfalls bei der Korrektur geholfen.

<sup>2</sup> Vgl. Emanuel Tov, Revised Lists of the Texts from the Judaean Desert (Leiden: Brill, 2010), 113.

<sup>3</sup> In der Niederlassung selbst (abgesehen von 7–9 Q) sind zwar keine Handschriften gefunden worden, aber u.a. mit Schrift drei Ostraka (KhQ1–KhQ3, veröffentlicht in DJD 36 [2000]). Es sind Scherben von Krügen, die um die Niederlassung herum entdeckt wurden, von denen KhQ1 eventuell das für die Qumrangemeinde charakteristische Wort  $\text{תן}$  („Einung“) enthält (Z. 8).

<sup>4</sup> Emanuel Tov und Stephen J. Pfann (Hrsg.), The Dead Sea Scrolls on Microfiche: A Comprehensive Facsimile Edition of the Texts from the Judean Desert (Leiden: Brill, 1993), mit Inventory List of Photographs, zusammengestellt von Stephen A. Reed, hrsg. von Marilyn J. Lundberg. Zu benutzen mit: dies.en (Hrsg.), The Dead Sea Scrolls Catalogue: Documents, Photographs and Museum Inventory Numbers, SBLRBS 32 (Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1994). Siehe ferner bes. Emanuel Tov (Hrsg.), The Dead Sea Scrolls Electronic Library (rev. ed.; Provo, UT: Brigham Young Univ. / Leiden: Brill, 2006).

<sup>5</sup> Oxford: Clarendon, 1955–. Es fehlen für die Qumrantexte noch die Bände 5a (Neuausgabe des Allegro-Bandes 5 [4Q158–186], 1968); 32 (die beiden Jesaja-Rollen aus 1Q; erscheint in Kürze) und ein Band mit Korrekturen und Ergänzungen, der die Fragmente “Cryptic A texts”: 4Q313c (ohne lesbaren Text), 4Q317 und 4Q324 d–i enthalten soll, die bisher nur in Fotografien in DJD 28 (2001) vorliegen; für den zuletzt genannten Band siehe DJD 39 (2002), IX, Anm. 1. Nicht in dieser Reihe, vollständig vor (nach den Bänden dieser Reihe richtet sich hier die Zählung der Fragmente und der Zeilen, soweit dort publiziert).<sup>6</sup> Die außerbiblischen Qumrantexte (bis auf das Buch Ester sind Fragmente aller Bücher des späteren hebräischen Kanons, einschließlich Sirach, gefunden worden)<sup>7</sup> gehören in die Zeit von ca. 300 v. Chr. bis 68 n. Chr.,<sup>8</sup> sie sind neben wenigen Texten in Griechisch so gut wie alle in Hebräisch und Aramäisch auf bearbeiteter Tierhaut und zum Teil vor allem auf Papyrus geschrieben. Die Untersuchung der Qumrantexte ist durch die Veröffentlichung einer Konkordanz für alle (!) nichtbiblischen Qumrantexte (bis auf offenbar nur ganz geringe, seit den letzten Jahren erst bekannt werdende Ausnahmen, wie der in Anm. 20 genannte Text 4Q230) ungemein gefördert worden; sie ist auf Papier<sup>9</sup> und elektronisch<sup>10</sup> zugänglich.

Auch wenn sich zeigt, dass ein Vergleich der Jesusbewegung mit der Qumrangemeinde theologisch mehr Unterschiede als Gemeinsamkeiten ergibt, sind doch der verwandte jüdische Hintergrund und gerade auch die theologischen und soziologischen Unterschiede von höchstem Interesse. Die älteren abwegigen Spekulationen, die Jesus und die Essener schon vor der Entdeckung der Qumrantexte in eine größere Nähe brachten, lebten nach der Entdeckung der Qumrantexte in neuer Gestalt selbst in wissenschaftlichem Umfeld wieder auf

---

sondern in anderen wissenschaftlichen Editionen sind erschienen: 1QS, 1QpHab, 1QM, 1QapGen und 11QT<sup>a</sup> (11Q19); außerdem CD. Die zurzeit gültige, aber freilich schon wieder korrekturbedürftige Liste aller Qumranschriften mit dem Ort ihrer Veröffentlichung findet sich bei Tov, Revised Lists, 5–80.

<sup>6</sup> Für 1QH<sup>a</sup> siehe jetzt Hartmut Stegemann und Eileen Schuller in DJD 40 (2009); für 11QT<sup>a</sup> (11Q19) siehe die neue Zählung der Zeilen bei Annette Steudel (Hrsg.), Die Texte von Qumran II: Mit Masoretischer Punktation: Übersetzung, Einführung und Anmerkungen (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 2001), 1–157.

<sup>7</sup> Von Esra-Nehemia sind nur Esra-Fragmente (4Q117) vorhanden. Siehe zu den gefundenen Texten des späteren hebräischen Kanons Eugene Ulrich in DJD 39 (2002) "Index of Passages in the 'Biblical Texts'" (185–201).

<sup>8</sup> Zu 68 n. Chr. siehe gleich unten.

<sup>9</sup> Martin G. Abegg, Jr. u.a. (Hrsg.), The Non-Biblical Texts from Qumran, Bd. 1 von The Dead Sea Scrolls Concordance (Leiden: Brill, 2003); als Bd. 3 sind 2010 The Biblical Texts from the Judaean Desert, hrsg. von Abegg u.a., erschienen.

<sup>10</sup> Martin G. Abegg, Jr., Qumran Sectarian Manuscripts: Qumran Text and Grammatical Tags [on CD-ROM]. Version 2.1 in Accordance 6.5 (Alamonte Springs, FL: Oaktree Software, 2005 [zurzeit in Accordance 8, 2010]); die Computer-Version enthält u. a. alle hebräischen und aramäischen nichtbiblischen Qumrantexte "grammatically tagged" und eine englische Übersetzung der Texte. Die Konkordanz und die Computer-Version berücksichtigen auch schon die in DJD 37 und 40 soeben (2009) erschienenen Texte (nur der Accordance-Text, überprüft an Version 2.8 in Accordance 7.3 von 2007, enthält ferner schon 4Q230).

(von André Dupont-Sommer seit den fünfziger Jahren bis Barbara Thiering). Die Qumranforschung unterscheidet, soweit dies möglich ist, zwischen Schriften, die direkt auf die Qumrangemeinde (bzw. die Essener) zurückgehen (vor allem 1Q/4QS,<sup>11</sup> 1QSa/4QSE, CD/4QD, 4QMMT, die Pescharim, 1Q/4QH, 4QMidrEschat), ferner solchen, die nur zu ihrer Bibliothek gehörten (gerade in diesem Fall ist aber auch die Zahl der Exemplare zu berücksichtigen; z. B. existiert 1Q/4QInstruction [1Q26/4Q415ff.] in mindestens sieben Exemplaren), und auch solchen, die von außen kamen, aber in der Gemeinde eine Überarbeitung erfuhren (1Q/4Q/11QM) oder Texten, die in ihre Schriften in mehr oder weniger redaktionell überarbeiteter Fassung integriert wurden (die in Anm. 11 genannte Zwei-Geister-Lehre).

Mit „Qumrangemeinde“ sind hier gemäß der Gemeinderegel „alle ihre Niederlassungen“ gemeint (1QS VI, 2 par. 4QS<sup>d</sup> [4Q258] II, 6). Die Existenz der Qumrangemeinde in diesem weiteren Sinn, auf deren Texten hier der Schwerpunkt liegt, beginnt mit ihrem eigentlichen Gründer, dem sog. Lehrer der Gerechtigkeit, um die Mitte des 2. Jh. v. Chr. Aufgrund der spärlichen archäologischen Hinweise auf eine Niederlassung schon in der Mitte des 2. Jh. (sog. Periode 1a von Roland de Vaux) wird heute eine Besiedelung in Qumran durch die Qumranfrommen meistens nach 100 v. Chr. angenommen,<sup>12</sup> was hier nicht diskutiert werden kann. Die Meinung, dass die Textfunde und die Niederlassung sachlich nicht zusammengehören,<sup>13</sup> halte ich zwar

---

<sup>11</sup> Wohl mit Ausnahme der mehr oder weniger redaktionell überarbeiteten Zwei-Geister-Lehre 1QS III, 13–IV, 26 (mit Parallele in 4QS<sup>c</sup>), deren Dualismus jedoch einen deutlichen Einfluss auf die Qumrangemeinde zeigt, wie z. B. 1Q/4QS selbst, CD/4QD, 1Q/4QH und 4QMidrEschat (4Q174 und 177) zeigen (vgl. Jörg Frey, „Different Patterns of Dualistic Thought in the Qumran Library: Reflections on their Background and History,” in Legal Texts and Legal Issues, hrsg. M. Bernstein u.a., STDJ 23 [Leiden: Brill, 1997], 275–335: 277–278; vgl. auch jüngst Albert L. A. Hogterp, „The Eschatology of the Two Spirits Treatise Revisited,” RevQ 23 [Nr. 90, 2007]: 247–259).

<sup>12</sup> Vgl. Jodi Magness, The Archaeology of Qumran and the Dead Sea Scrolls (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2002), bes. 49–50, 63–66 (anders Yaakov Meshorer, „Numismatics,” EncDSS 2:619–620: 619a). Magness hält es für „reasonable to date the initial establishment of the sectarian settlement to the first half of the 1st century BCE” (S. 65), was bedeuten würde, dass der Lehrer der Gerechtigkeit die Qumran-Niederlassung nicht mehr erlebte und sie also nicht der „Ort seines Exils“ von 1QpHab XI, 6 war.

<sup>13</sup> Ich nenne nur Yizhar Hirschfeld, Qumran in Context: Reassessing the Archaeological Evidence (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2004) (die Niederlassung sei das Herrenhaus eines landwirtschaftlichen Gutsbesitzers, der priesterlichen Kreisen in Jerusalem vor der Zerstörung der Stadt im Jahr 70 n. Chr. einräumte, die Rollen in mit der überwiegenden Mehrzahl der Qumranforscher für irrig, sie betrifft aber kaum die folgende, von den Texten ausgehende Darstellung. Die genaue Datierung der Zerstörung der Niederlassung in Qumran durch die Römer auf das Jahr 68 n. Chr. (und das offenbar baldige Ende auch ihrer sonstigen Niederlassungen) wird aus Josephus, Bell. 4:449 erschlossen. Auf die auch von mir geteilte Annahme einer weitgehenden Gleichsetzung der Qumrangemeinde mit den bei Josephus und anderen antiken Autoren dargestellten Essenern gehe ich hier im Allgemeinen nicht ein,<sup>14</sup> weil auf den Qumrantexten selbst der Schwerpunkt liegen soll.

1. Zum Stand der Jesusforschung und zur Differenz zwischen Jesus und der Qumrangemeinde

Jesus ist als Jude in Nazaret in Galiläa in der Tetrarchie des Herodes Antipas (4 v. Chr.–39 n. Chr.) aufgewachsen. Dass er von Johannes dem Täufer getauft wurde, ist historisch sicher, dass aber der Täufer ursprünglich zur Qumrangemeinde gehörte, ist sicherlich nicht der Fall gewesen (siehe unten). Als Wirkungsstätten Jesu sind—bei kritischer Lektüre der Evangelien—in Galiläa und der östlich vom Jordan gelegenen Gaulanitis neben Kafarnaum noch Betsaida und Chorazin (siehe das authentische oder wenigstens sehr alte Logion Q 10:13–15)<sup>15</sup> wie überhaupt das Gebiet um das Nordende des Sees Gennesa-der Nähe zu verstecken). Es gibt viele Varianten der Auffassung einer Nichtzugehörigkeit von Niederlassung und Rollenverstecken. Gegen solche Auffassung spricht schon, dass viele Texte eine bestimmte „Gemeinde“ (קִיָּה) voraussetzen, die überdies gemäß 1Q/4QS die „Steppe/Wüste (מִדְבָּר)“ im Blick hat (1QS VIII, 13–14 par. 4QS<sup>d</sup> [4Q258] VI, 7 [offenbar ohne Zitat von Jes 40:3] und 4QS<sup>e</sup> [4Q259] III, 3–4; 1QS IX, 19–20 par. 4QS<sup>b</sup> [4Q256] XVIII, 3 und 4QS<sup>e</sup> [4Q259] III, 19).

---

<sup>14</sup> Hierzu siehe vor allem die umfassende Zusammenstellung der Originaltexte bei Karl Adam und Christoph Burchard, Antike Berichte über die Essener, KIT 182 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1972). Vgl. auch die Textsammlung von Geza Vermes und Martin D. Goodman, The Essenes According to the Classical Sources, OCT 1 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1989).

<sup>15</sup> Dazu zuletzt Heinz-Wolfgang Kuhn, „Betsaida und et-Tell in frühromischer Zeit: Historische, archäologische und philologische Probleme einer als Wirkungsstätte Jesu angenommenen Ortslage“, Teile I und II, ZNW 101 (2010): 1–32 und 174–203 (mit zusammen acht Tafeln), hier II, 194–196. Siehe ferner ders. in Bd. 4 des vorliegenden Handbook. Mit Q + Stellenangabe ist entsprechend der Konvention des „Internationalen Q-Projekts“ (siehe unten in Abschnitt 1) die vermutliche Rekonstruktion eines Q-Textes aus dem Matthäus- und Lukasevangelium gemeint; die Stellenangabe richtet sich nach dem Lukasevangelium.

ret (vgl. in den kanonischen Evangelien neben den Orten Kafarnaum und Betsaida auch die häufige Erwähnung des Sees)<sup>16</sup> deutlich erkennbar; Jerusalem mit Judäa waren wohl nur kurze Zeit bzw. für kurze Zeiten Wirkungsstätte Jesu. Die Qumrangemeinde und ihre Niederlassungen sind offenbar nur in Judäa zu suchen.

Jesus trat in einer Weise als Wanderprediger und Wundertäter auf, die so gut wie keine Entsprechungen in den Qumrantexten hat. Für den Wanderprediger Jesus sind die Redeformen der Gleichnisse und die Wendung „Königsherrschaft Gottes“ (βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ) charakteristisch (zur „Königsherrschaft Gottes“ vgl. nur die zweite Bitte des Vaterunsers, einige Gleichnisse im Markusevangelium und in der Logienquelle und Worte Jesu wie z. B. Mk 9:47; 10:25; Q 11:20; zum eschatologischen Verständnis der Botschaft Jesu siehe unten in Abschnitt 2.4). Die Redeform der Gleichnisse und die Wendung „Königsherrschaft Gottes“ haben nur sehr bedingt Parallelen in den Qumrantexten. Soweit ich bisher sehe, enthalten die Qumranschriften nur ein Gleichnis, nämlich die wohl auch nicht in der Gemeinde formulierte<sup>17</sup> sog. Baumparabel in 4QpapAdmonitory Parable (4Q302) 2 II–III. Was die Königsherrschaft Gottes betrifft, so kennen die Qumrantexte zwar öfter die Wendung, vor allem in der wohl doch aus der Qumrangemeinde stammenden und dort in offenbar neun Exemplaren vorhandenen Engelliturgie (ShirShabb: 4Q400–407; 11Q17; Mas1k). Gerade dieser Text spricht sehr oft von Gott als „König“ und sogar über 20-mal von Gottes „Königtum“ (מלכות). Die Königsherrschaft Gottes bezieht sich aber in den Qumrantexten, zumindest in der Regel, nicht, wie bei Jesus, auf das eschatologische Kommen (z. B. Q 11:2) oder Gekommensein (z. B. Q 11:20) der Gottesherrschaft (beides z. B. im Gleichnis vom Senfkorn Mk 4:30–32; vgl. Q 13:18–19), sondern allgemein darauf, dass Gott herrscht.<sup>18</sup>

<sup>16</sup> θάλασσα, bei Lukas immer λίμνη. Außerdem sind für Jesu Wirken gemäß den kanonischen Evangelien für den nordwestlichen Bereich am See noch folgende Orte oder Gebiete zu nennen: (1) Gennesaret (Ort oder Landschaft?); (2) Dalmanuta bzw. Magadan (= Magdala?) als Ort am Westufer des Sees, wohl im nördlichen Teil; (3) gemäß einigen Evangelienhandschriften Gergesa am nördlichen Ostufer; (4) eventuell die Dekapolis am südlichen Ostufer.

<sup>17</sup> Bilhah Nitzan, „302. 4QpapAdmonitory Parable,“ in DJD 20 (1997), 125–149, pl. X–XII: 127. Vgl. noch die „Allegory of the Vine“ in 6Q11 in DJD 3 (1962).

<sup>18</sup> In 4QapocrDan ar (4Q246) II, 5 („sein Königtum“) ist der Bezug auf Gott nicht sicher (vgl. zu den Formulierungen Dan 3:33 mit 7:27 und auch 7:14). Vgl. zur „Königsherrschaft Gottes“ Koch, „Gegenwart und Zukunft“ (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“).

Der historische Jesus hat zweifellos auch in besonderem Maße als Wundertäter gewirkt. Heilungen und speziell Exorzismen sind für ihn kennzeichnend.<sup>19</sup> Aber Erzählungen über solch aktuelles Wunderhandeln gibt es, soweit ich sehe, überhaupt nicht in den Qumrantexten, wenngleich gerade der Dämonismus in den Qumrantexten und anderen qumrannahen Schriften, wie im Jubiläenbuch, belegt ist.<sup>20</sup> Zum Handauflegen zwecks Heilung, die für Jesus z. B. Mk 8:23, 25 und Lk 13:13 erzählt wird, sei auf die Parallele im sicherlich nicht der Gemeinde entstammenden Genesis-Apokryphon in 1QapGen ar XX, 22, 29 verwiesen: Hier soll Abraham für den Pharao beten, dass er von dem „bösen Geist“, den Gott ihm geschickt hatte, befreit werde; Abraham legt die Hände auf den Kopf Pharaos und heilt ihn.<sup>21</sup> Jesus und die Qumrangemeinde gehen, wie viele Fromme damals, von einem baldigen Kommen des Eschaton aus, also von einer neuen und endgültigen Welt Gottes in der nahen Zukunft. Dass Jesus für sich selbst die Bezeichnung „Messias“ in Anspruch genommen hat, <sup>19</sup> Vgl. für den heutigen Stand der Forschung Michael Becker, Wunder und Wundertäter im frührabbinischen Judentum: Studien zum Phänomen und seiner Überlieferung im Horizont von Magie und Dämonismus, WUNT 2.144 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2002), bes. 181, 417–442; siehe auch z. B. Bernd Kollmann, Jesus und die Christen als Wundertäter: Studien zu Magie, Medizin und Schamanismus in Antike und Christentum, FRLANT 170 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1996).

<sup>20</sup> Vgl. Eric Eve, The Jewish Context of Jesus' Miracles, JSNTSup 231 (London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002) (mit einem eigenen Kapitel über die Qumrantexte: 174–216); Becker, Wunder, 146–147 (zu den Qumrantexten bes. 144–148); Lichtenberger, „Qumran and the New Testament,” 121–126 („Spirits and Demons in the Dead Sea Scrolls“); ders., „Demonology” (siehe für beides „Ausgewählte Literatur“). Vgl. auch Clinton Wahlen, Jesus and the Impurity of Spirits in the Synoptic Gospels, WUNT 2.185 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2004); Wahlen behandelt u. a. auch die Qumrantexte. Verwiesen sei noch auf den lange unveröffentlichten Text 4QCatalogue of Spirits (4Q230), wo in Fragment 1, Z. 1 vom „unrei[nen] Geist“ die Rede ist: Eibert J. C. Tigchelaar, „These are the Names of the Spirits of . . .’: A Preliminary Edition of 4QCatalogue of Spirits (4Q230) and New Manuscript Evidence for the Two Spirits Treatise (4Q257 and 1Q29a),” RevQ 21 (Nr. 84, 2004): 529–547, siehe bes. 531–532; siehe auch ders., „Catalogue of Spirits, Liturgical Manuscript with Angelological Content, Incantation? Reflections on the Character of a Fragment from Qumran (4Q230 1), with Appendix: Edition of the Fragments of IAA #114,” in A Kind of Magic: Understanding Magic in the New Testament and its Religious Environment, hrsg. M. J. Labahn und B. J. Lietaert Peerbolte (London: T&T Clark, 2007), 133–146; siehe auch oben Anm. 10.

<sup>21</sup> Die drei zusammengehörenden Fragmente 4QPrNab ar (4Q242) 1–3, die kein genaues Verständnis des Textes zulassen, verbinden mit dem letzten babylonischen König Nabonid Krankheit, Heilung (ergänzt) und Sündenvergebung, und zwar im Zusammenhang mit einem als „jüdisch“ bezeichneten גזר („Seher“/„Wahrsager“; vgl. z. B. Dan 2:27). Gern verweist man in diesem Zusammenhang auf die jüdisch belegte, aber in Mk 2:1–12 (mit Parallelen) nachträgliche Verbindung von Sündenvergebung und Heilung.

wird von der kritischen Forschung (auch bei Berücksichtigung vielfältiger „Messias“-Vorstellungen in den Qumrantexten) fast allgemein verneint. Entscheidend für Jesu Verständnis von sich selbst ist sein einzigartiger Anspruch (siehe unten insbesondere Abschnitt 2.4), dem der Gebrauch des damals vieldeutigen Wortes „Messias“ eher im Wege gestanden wäre. Deswegen wird auf die Messiaserwartungen der Qumrangemeinde hier nicht eingegangen.<sup>22</sup> Um 30 n. Chr. ließ der römische Präfekt Pontius Pilatus (26–36 n. Chr.) Jesus kreuzigen (zur Hinrichtung Jesu und zum Tod des Lehrers der Gerechtigkeit siehe unten in Abschnitt 3).

Die sog. Zwei-Quellen-Theorie für die synoptischen Evangelien (das Matthäus- und das Lukasevangelium haben außer ihrem Sondergut das Markusevangelium und die Logienquelle [Q] als Vorlage benutzt) gilt weithin unangefochten weiter (ausgereift schon bei Heinrich Julius Holtzmann in der zweiten Hälfte des 19. Jahrhunderts). Die Annahme eines Ur-Markus, abgesehen von kleineren Unterschieden zum heutigen Markusevangelium, hat sich nicht bewährt (trotz eines 1958 eventuell entdeckten „Geheimen Markus-evangeliums“). Die Erforschung der weithin angenommenen Logienquelle hat schon seit dem Ende der fünfziger Jahre des letzten Jahrhunderts eine neue Blüte erfahren<sup>23</sup> und gipfelte dann in dem „Internationalen Q-Projekt“, das vor allem von Forschern aus den USA, Kanada und Deutschland getragen wird.<sup>24</sup> Die Formgeschichte hat bereits seit ca. 1920 (Rudolf Bultmann, Martin Dibelius, Karl Ludwig Schmidt) die immer noch gültige Einsicht gebracht, dass der

<sup>22</sup> Vgl. aber Hengel, „Jesus der Messias Israels“ (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), 34–45 und jüngst ders. und Schwemer, Jesus und das Judentum (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), 498–548. Zu den Messiaserwartungen in den Qumrantexten siehe insbesondere Johannes Zimmermann, Messianische Texte aus Qumran: Königliche, priesterliche und prophetische Messiasvorstellungen in den Schriftfunden von Qumran, WUNT 2.104 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1998); siehe auch Lichtenberger, „Messiasvorstellungen“ bzw. „Qumran-Messianism“ (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), und etwa Heinz-Josef Fabry, „Die Messiaserwartung in den Handschriften von Qumran“, in Wisdom and Apocalypticism in the Dead Sea Scrolls and in the Biblical Tradition, hrsg. F. García Martínez, BETL 168 (Löwen: Leuven University Press, 2003), 357–384.

<sup>23</sup> Siehe z. B. A. Lindemann (Hrsg.), The Sayings Source Q and the Historical Jesus, BETL 158 (Löwen: Leuven University Press, 2001).

<sup>24</sup> Siehe insbesondere J. M. Robinson u.a. (Hrsg.), The Critical Edition of Q: Synopsis including the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, Mark and Thomas with English, German, and French Translations of Q and Thomas (Löwen: Peeters, 2000). Außerhalb des „Internationalen Q-Projekts“ erschien (mit fast 1000 Seiten) Harry T. Fleddermann, Q: A Reconstruction and Commentary, Biblical Tools and Studies 1 (Löwen: Peeters, 2005).

älteste Evangelist (abgesehen von der Passionsgeschichte) im Wesentlichen nur Einzellogien, Einzelgeschichten und ältere Sammlungen zur Verfügung hatte und dass der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu auf die Evangelien selbst zurückgeht (zu präzisieren ist diese Erkenntnis nur dadurch, dass der Evangelist schon eine ältere zusammenhängende Passionsgeschichte vorfand, dass Mk 13 eine kürzere „kleine Apokalypse“ zugrunde liegt und dass Markus bereits einige ältere Sammlungen, wie ich zu zeigen versuchte, vorfand).<sup>25</sup> Bewegung ist in die Frage der Kriterien für authentisches Jesusgut gekommen: Das Differenzkriterium als das wichtigste Kriterium ist im Blick auf die eine Seite der Differenz, nämlich die jüdische Umwelt (die andere Seite der Differenz ist die werdende Kirche), in die Kritik geraten, weil man vor allem fürchtete, Jesus dem Judentum zu entziehen. Das ist aber oft nur ein Missverständnis eines falsch angewendeten Kriteriums gewesen (wie überhaupt manchmal eine zu theoretische Kriteriendiskussion den Details kritischer Erkenntnisse nicht gerecht wird). Gerd Theißen (der sein betreffendes Buch zusammen mit Dagmar Winter verfasst hat)<sup>26</sup> spricht von einem „Plausibilitätskriterium“, was freilich recht undifferenziert klingt. Die beiden Seiten des Differenzkriteriums (zum Teil in Verbindung mit anderen herkömmlichen „Kriterien“) heißen bei ihm nun „(jüdische) Kontextplausibilität“ und „wirkungsgeschichtliche Plausibilität“, das Erstere <sup>25</sup> Heinz-Wolfgang Kuhn, Ältere Sammlungen im Markusevangelium, SUNT 8 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1971). Ich nahm solche Sammlungen an innerhalb von Mk 2:1–3:6, 4:1–34, 10:1–45 und eventuell 4:35–6:52; für Mk 10 meine ich später den sicheren Nachweis erbracht zu haben in „Neuere Wege in der Synoptiker-Exegese am Beispiel des Markusevangeliums“, in Bilanz und Perspektiven gegenwärtiger Auslegungen des Neuen Testaments: Symposium zum 65. Geburtstag von Georg Strecker, hrsg. F. W. Horn (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1995), 60–90, speziell 68–72, 87–90.

<sup>26</sup> Gerd Theißen und Dagmar Winter, Die Kriterienfrage in der Jesusforschung: Vom Differenzkriterium zum Plausibilitätskriterium, NTOA 34 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997) (Eng. trans.: The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria [Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 2002]); vgl. auch ders. und Annette Merz, Der historische Jesus: Ein Lehrbuch (3. durchges. Aufl.; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2001), 116–120 (Eng. trans.: The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide [London: SCM Press, 1998], 115–118). Wenig brauchbar als Kriterium erscheinen mir die drei „neuen“ Kriterien, die Stanley E. Porter jüngst aufgestellt hat und die ich hier nur nennen kann: griechische Sprache (Jesus habe in bestimmten Situationen Griechisch gesprochen); griechische Textvarianten (unter denen man den authentischen Wortlaut eventuell finden kann); „discourse features“ (die auf Unterschiede zum übrigen Evangelium hinweisen). Siehe The Criteria for Authenticity in Historical-Jesus Research: Previous Discussion and New Proposals, JSNTSup 191 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000).

durchaus mit Recht vor allem im Blick auf Galiläa, aber auch im Blick auf Jesu Individualität, was ja beides (!) der Frage nach der Differenz wieder entgegenkommt. Bei der Kontextplausibilität und der Wirkungsplausibilität geht es Theißen jeweils um die „Auswertung von Übereinstimmungen“ und von „Nichtübereinstimmungen“,<sup>27</sup> was freilich selbstverständlich ist.

Ohne das in der Regel im Einzelnen auch aufzuführen, setzt die folgende Darstellung des Wirkens Jesu natürlich die Kriterienfrage voraus, weiß aber, dass uns das Judentum zur Zeit Jesu in Galiläa und der Gaulanitis nur relativ bekannt ist (die sog. „dritte Frage“ nach dem historischen Jesus bemüht sich gegenwärtig gerade um Galiläa; von den Qumrantexten gibt es hierzu freilich überhaupt keine direkte Hilfe). Ferner kann man mit Gerd Theißen den Unterschied zwischen dem Jesus der Historie und der Jesusbewegung nach Ostern nicht mehr so scharf wie früher ziehen (das konnte man nicht zuletzt aus seiner „Soziologie der Jesusbewegung“ zwischen ca. 30–70 n. Chr. lernen).<sup>28</sup> Mit diesen Hinweisen zum Stand der Jesusforschung sind die Voraussetzungen im Blick auf den historischen Jesus, dessen Leben kaum (abgesehen vom Kreuzestod) und dessen Verkündigung nur bedingt dargestellt werden können, für die folgende Darlegung gegeben.

2. Hauptgesichtspunkte des theologischen Vergleichs

Nur die vier wesentlichen Vergleichspunkte können hier dargestellt werden.<sup>29</sup> Die von der kritischen Forschung als abseitig aufgefassten Thesen (vor und nach der Entdeckung der Qumrantexte), die Jesus direkt mit den Essenern bzw. der Qumrangemeinde verbinden, werden nicht behandelt. Ferner bleiben solche Thesen unberücksichtigt, die zu spekulativ sind, wie die meines Erachtens abzulehnende Vermutung, dass Johannes der Täufer ein Mitglied der Qumrangemeinde

---

<sup>27</sup> Siehe die Übersicht in Theißen und Winter, Kriterienfrage, 217.

<sup>28</sup> Gerd Theißen, Soziologie der Jesusbewegung: Ein Beitrag zur Entstehungsgeschichte des Urchristentums, TEH 194 (7. Aufl.; Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 1997; zuerst München: Kaiser, 1977); außer in vielen anderen Sprachen auch Eng. trans.: The First Followers of Jesus: A Sociological Analysis of the Earliest Christianity (London: SCM, 1978).

<sup>29</sup> Vgl. z. B. die kurze Zusammenstellung von in der Forschung vertretenen Vergleichen zwischen Jesus und den Qumrantexten bei Brooke, „Dead Sea Scrolls“ (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), 20–25.

gewesen sei.<sup>30</sup> Nicht belegbar ist die These, die Jesus in Verbindung mit den Essenern in Jerusalem (insbesondere beim Essentor) bringt<sup>31</sup> (vor allem nicht die Annahme, dass Jesus nach dem essenischen Kalender das letzte Mahl gefeiert habe, wobei schon ein letztes Mahl Jesu aufgrund der neutestamentlichen Abendmahlsberichte historisch kaum zu erfassen ist).<sup>32</sup> Übereinstimmungen etwa zwischen den Seligpreisungen der Bergpredigt (Mt 5:3–12), deren Herkunft aus der Gemeinde bzw. deren teilweise Authentizität nur in einer komplexen Diskussion erörtert werden könnte, und den Qumrantexten müssen hier ebenfalls unbesprochen bleiben.<sup>33</sup> In den Qumrantexten gibt es keinerlei Hinweis auf Jesus oder frühe Christen (in 7Q sind zweifellos

<sup>30</sup> Die Literatur hinsichtlich einer Beziehung zwischen Johannes dem Täufer und der Qumrangemeinde bzw. den Essenern ist uferlos. Vgl. nur die vier folgenden, sich im Aufbau und in der Sache weithin entsprechenden Aufsätze, darunter zwei längere Fassungen, zum Verhältnis Qumrantexte und Neues Testament von Jörg Frey, „Die Bedeutung der Qumranfunde für das Verständnis des Neuen Testaments“, in Qumran—Die Schriftrollen vom Toten Meer: Vorträge des St. Galler Qumran-Symposiums vom 2./3. Juli 1999, hrsg. M. Fieger u.a., NTOA 47 (Freiburg, CH: Universitätsverlag, 2001), 129–208: 164–177; ders., „The Relevance of the Dead Sea Scrolls for New Testament Interpretation with a Bibliographical Appendix,” AcT 23 (2003): 86–116: 99–103; ders., „Zur Bedeutung der Qumran-Funde“ (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), 46–51; ders., „The Impact“ (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), 443–450; siehe ferner z.B. H. Stegemann, Essener (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), 292–313, bes. 306–311 (Eng. trans.: Library [siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“], 211–227, bes. 221–225); Webb, „John the Baptist“ (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“). Alle drei Autoren ablehnend; dagegen vertritt Charlesworth jüngst wieder ausführlich die These, dass der Täufer die Qumrangemeinde wegen gravierender Differenzen verlassen habe („John the Baptizer“ [siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“]); anders—in Auseinandersetzung mit einer früheren ähnlichen Veröffentlichung von Charlesworth („John the Baptizer and Qumran Barriers in Light of the Rule of the Community,” in The Provo International Conference on the Dead Sea Scrolls: Technological Innovations, New Texts, and Reformulated Issues, hrsg. D. W. Parry und E. Ulrich, STDJ 30 [Leiden: Brill, 1999], 353–375)—mit Recht Frey auch in den beiden oben zuletzt genannten Aufsätzen, „Zur Bedeutung“ (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), 47–51; ders., „The Impact“ (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), 446–450.

<sup>31</sup> Vgl. die kritischen Ausführungen bei Frey, „Die Bedeutung“, 146–152; „Relevance“, 95–96; vgl. auch ders., „The Impact“ (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), 430–435.

<sup>32</sup> Siehe unten Abschnitt 2.1.

<sup>33</sup> Vgl. den nicht spezifisch zur Qumrangemeinde gehörenden Weisheitstext 4QBeatitudes (4Q525) und vor allem die Entsprechungen von οἱ πτωχοὶ τῷ πνεύματι („die geistlich Armen“ oder ähnlich) in V. 3 zu עֲנִי רֹחַ („geistlich Arme“ oder ähnlich) in IQM XIV, 7 und IQH<sup>a</sup> VI, 14 (XIV, 3 Sukenik). Unter den häufigen Arbeiten zu den Makarismen sei nur verwiesen auf Lichtenberger, „Makarismen“ (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“) und „Qumran and the New Testament“ (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), 112–120.

auch keine neutestamentlichen Texte gefunden worden),<sup>34</sup> und das gilt, jedenfalls für ausdrückliche oder eindeutige Hinweise, auch umgekehrt.

2.1. Jüngerschaft bzw. Gemeinde

„Nachfolge“ Jesu im engeren Sinn ist in den ältesten Schichten des Evangelienstoffes keine Voraussetzung für die Teilhabe an der Gottesherrschaft. Soweit es die älteste Überlieferung noch erkennen lässt, hat der Jesus der Historie nur Einzelne in die Nachfolge aufgenommen, während er allen, denen er predigte, die Annahme der Gottesherrschaft anbot. Dass Jesus nur Einzelne zur Nachfolge aufforderte, zeigen ausnahmslos die Berufungsszenen der vier kanonischen Evangelien, wie z. B. die fünf Berufungen in den beiden Berufungsgeschichten des Markusevangeliums (1:16–20; 2:14) und auch noch die Annahme von fünf Jüngern in Joh 1:35–51.<sup>35</sup> Ganz anders verhält es sich mit der Qumrangemeinde: Die Qumranfrommen organisierten sich als eine geschlossene Gemeinde (charakteristisch dafür ist die Selbstbezeichnung  $\tau\tau'$  „Einung“) mit dreimaligen Prüfungen und einem zweijährigen Aufnahmeverfahren (so 1QS VI, 13–23; par. 4QS<sup>b</sup> [4Q256] XI, 8–13 und 4QS<sup>s</sup> [4Q261] 3 1).<sup>36</sup> Von „Jüngerinnen“ sprechen die kanonischen Evangelien nicht,<sup>37</sup> aber davon, dass auch Frauen Jesus „nachfolgen“.<sup>38</sup> Wieweit auch Frauen zur Gemeinde gehörten, die in Qumran ansässig war, ist immer noch umstritten; auf keinen Fall waren es viele.<sup>39</sup> Bei Jesus muss die ständige

<sup>34</sup> Vgl. nur Enste, Kein Markustext (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“).

<sup>35</sup> Siehe Heinz-Wolfgang Kuhn, „Nachfolge nach Ostern“, in Kirche, hrsg. D. Lührmann und G. Strecker (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1980), 105–132, bes. 107–108.

<sup>36</sup> Siehe James C. VanderKam, The Dead Sea Scrolls Today (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1994), 87–89 (deutsch: Einführung in die Qumranforschung: Geschichte und Bedeutung der Schriften vom Toten Meer [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1998], 109–111).

<sup>37</sup> So aber ausdrücklich  $\mu\alpha\theta\eta\tau\iota\alpha$  („Jüngerin“) in EvPet 12 (50) von Maria Magdalena am Ostertag und in Apg 9:36 von einer Christin Tabita in Joppe.

<sup>38</sup> Mk 15:41 par. Mt 27:55 und Lk 23:49; Lk 23:55; an den beiden Lukasstellen begegnet das Verb  $\acute{\alpha}\kappa\omicron\lambda\omicron\upsilon\theta\epsilon\acute{\iota}\nu$  aber nicht absolut als terminus technicus, sondern nur mit einer Präposition verbunden ( $\sigma\upsilon\upsilon\text{-}$ ,  $\kappa\alpha\tau\text{-}$ ). Vgl. auch Lk 8:1–3.

<sup>39</sup> Vgl. nur Jodi Magness, „Women at Qumran?“, in Debating Qumran: Collected Essays on its Archaeology, hrsg. Jodi Magness, ISACR 4 (Löwen: Peeters, 2004), 113–149; dies., The Archaeology of Qumran and the Dead Sea Scrolls (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2002) (siehe Kap. 8: „Women and the Cemetery at Qumran“ [S. 163–187]).

Begleitung durch Frauen (vgl. Mk 15:40–41; Lk 8:2–3; 23:55) eher auffallend gewesen sein. Jesus hat also allen, die ihm begegneten, insbesondere seinen jüdischen Landsleuten, die Gottesherrschaft angeboten, ohne seine Anhänger aber dann in einer Gemeinde oder Gemeinden zu sammeln. Das haben erst die sich als „Kirche“ (ἐκκλησία) verstehenden Christen nach der Kreuzigung Jesu und den Auferstehungserfahrungen getan, und insofern sind die christlichen Gemeinden (ἐκκλησία), deren Initiationsritus die Taufe war (inwieweit ein Tauchbad auch mit dem Eintritt in die Gemeinde verbunden war, ist in den Texten nicht deutlich),<sup>40</sup> gruppensoziologisch mit der Qumrangemeinde bzw. den Qumrangemeinden verwandter als die älteste Jesusbewegung.

Der ganz Israel repräsentierende Zwölferkreis Jesu dürfte historisch wohl noch nicht in die Zeit Jesu gehören (was allerdings umstritten ist),<sup>41</sup> und insofern ist auch die Repräsentation der zwölf Stämme durch zwölf Laien in 1QS VIII, 1–4 (par. 4QS<sup>e</sup> [4Q259] II, 9–13) hier nur bedingt heranzuziehen. In der Gemeinderegel heißt es von diesem Kreis: „In der Gemeinschaft der Gemeinde“ (בְּעֵצַת הַיְחִיד)<sup>42</sup> soll es „zwölf Männer (sc. aus den Laien) und drei Priester“ geben, die „vollkommen sind in allem, was aus der ganzen Tora offenbart ist“.<sup>43</sup> Der Bezug der Zwölfzahl auf die zwölf Stämme Israels (siehe z. B. 1QM V, 1) dürfte sicher sein.

Diejenigen, die Jesu Jünger werden, verlassen wohl in der Regel Familie und Besitz (wenngleich das Markusevangelium voraussetzt, <sup>40</sup> Vgl. H.-W. Kuhn, Enderwartung (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), 84.

<sup>41</sup> Man vergleiche die heute sogar beliebte gegenteilige Sicht. Ausführlich H.-W. Kuhn, „Nachfolge nach Ostern“, 108–109, 111–113, vor allem unter Hinweis auf die mangelnde Verwurzelung in der älteren synoptischen Tradition. Für eine vorösterliche Entstehung siehe neben z. B. John P. Meier, „The Circle of the Twelve: Did It Exist during Jesus' Public Ministry?“ JBL 116 (1997): 635–672, auch Theißen und Merz, Der historische Jesus, 216–217: hier bleibt unberücksichtigt, dass das als primärer Beleg angeführte Wort Q 22:30 (vorausgesetzt, dass das Logion authentisch ist) wohl nur vom Sitzen auf Thronen und nicht auf zwölf Thronen spricht (vgl. die „Throne“ in Offb 3:21, TLevi 3:8 und das Fehlen der Zwölf in der Logionquelle, obgleich auch die „Jünger“ Jesu bis auf immerhin offensichtlich Q 7:18 und 6:40 nicht als solche zweifelsfrei genannt sind).

<sup>42</sup> עֵצַת הַיְחִיד meint hier die Gesamtgemeinde, wie z. B. auch in 1QS VI, 13–14 (par. 4QS<sup>b</sup> [4Q256] XI, 8).

<sup>43</sup> Gemeint sind 15 Mitglieder, wie 4QMiscellaneous Rules (4Q265) 7 7 zeigt. Genannt sei noch die Gruppe von „Zwölf“ in 4QpJes<sup>d</sup> (4Q164) 1 4, die aber wegen des zum Teil zerstörten Kontextes nicht ganz deutlich ist (vgl. dazu auch Steudel, Die Texte von Qumran II, 234–235, 275).

dass sich Jesus öfter in Kafarnaum im Haus des Petrus und seiner Schwiegermutter aufhielt),<sup>44</sup> und Frauen unterstützen offenbar die Gruppe unter anderem „aus ihrem Vermögen“ (Lk 8:3). Eine Über-eignung des Besitzes an die neue Gruppe wie in der Qumrange-meinde (z. B. 1QS I, 12–13; VI, 19–20, 22) findet in der Gefolgschaft Jesu nicht statt.

Auch die folgenden vier Parallelen betreffen die spätere christliche Gemeinde: Die Regelung von Bruderpflichten in Mt 18:15–17, die eine große Nähe zu 1QS VI, 1 (par. 4QS<sup>d</sup> [4Q258] II, 5–6 und 4QS<sup>i</sup> [4Q263] 1–2) und CD IX, 3 (par. 4QD<sup>e</sup> [4Q270] 6 III, 17–18) zeigt, gehört eindeutig in die Zeit christlicher Gemeinden nach Jesu Tod.

Die an die Qumrangemeinde erinnernde Selbstbezeichnung „Kin-der des Lichts“ (ἅγιοι τοῦ φωτός / בני אור, selten בני האור)<sup>45</sup> im Gleich-nis vom ungerechten Haushalter (Lk 16:1ff.; hier V. 8b) ist nicht auf Jesus zurückzuführen, denn mindestens V. 8b ist (wegen des Stil-bruchs), wenn nicht schon V. 8a (wegen des κύριος, der wohl schon Jesus ist, wie auch Lk 18:6 nahelegt), bereits eine sekundäre Anfügung an das Gleichnis.

Das Gemeinschaftsmahl in der Qumrangemeinde<sup>46</sup> und das letzte Mahl Jesu können im Blick auf den historischen Jesus nicht mitein-ander verglichen werden, weil die neutestamentlichen Berichte über das Herrenmahl (bis auf Mk 14:25 und Parallelen) schon soweit aus der urchristlichen Liturgie stammen, dass sie keinen direkten Zugriff mehr auf das Mahl Jesu erlauben.<sup>47</sup> Die Spekulationen darüber, dass die verschiedenen Datierungen des letzten Mahls Jesu in den Synopti-kern einerseits (Jesu Kreuzigung am Freitagmorgen, erst nach der Pas-sanacht) und im Johannesevangelium andererseits (Jesu Kreuzigung <sup>44</sup> Siehe Mk 1:29–31 (das Dauer ausdrückende Imperfekt von „dienen“ ist in V. 31 zu beachten); 2:1, 15; 9:33.

<sup>45</sup> Die Wendung ist in jüdischen Texten vom Alten Testament bis in die ältere rabbinische Literatur für Menschen nicht bezeugt; in den Qumrantexten findet sie sich aber in dieser Bedeutung ca. 20-mal, davon jedenfalls fast immer in Gemein-de-texten oder Texten, die wohl in eine Gemeindegemeinschaft übernommen wurden (so 1QS III, 13–IV, 26 par. 4QpapS<sup>c</sup> [4Q257] V–VI); außerdem aramäisch in dem wohl vor-qumranischen Text 4QVisions of Amram (4Q543ff.).

<sup>46</sup> 1QS VI, 2–7 mit Parallelen in 4Q; 1QSa (1Q28a) II, 11–22 mit Parallelen in 4Q.

<sup>47</sup> Zum Vergleich zwischen dem Qumranmahl und dem Herrenmahl in der christ-lichen Gemeinde siehe Heinz-Wolfgang Kuhn, „The Qumran Meal and the Lord’s Supper in Paul in the Context of the Graeco-Roman World,” in Paul, Luke and the Graeco-Roman World, hrsg. A. Christophersen u.a., JSNTSup 217 (London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002), 221–248.

am Freitagnachmittag, direkt vor der Passanacht) auf ein Passamahl Jesu gemäß dem qumranischen, primär von der Sonne bestimmten Kalender, in der Nacht von Dienstag auf Mittwoch zurückzuführen seien,<sup>48</sup> haben die kritische Forschung (trotz einer solchen Chronologie für die Passionswoche zuerst in der Didaskalia des 3. Jh. n. Chr. [Kap. 21]) nicht überzeugt.<sup>49</sup>

Vom Lehrer der Gerechtigkeit wird in 4QpPs<sup>a</sup> (4Q171) III, 16 gesagt, dass er von Gott den Auftrag erhalten habe, er solle „ihm eine Gemeinde von [...] erbauen“ ([...] לבנות לו עדת). Die einzige wörtliche Parallele zum „Bauen“ einer Gemeinde stellt Mt 16:18 dar, ein Jesuswort, das jedoch zweifellos erst in die Zeit nach Jesu Tod gehört.

2.2. Die Tora und die Halacha

Das Verhältnis Jesu zur Tora und ihrer zeitgenössischen Auslegung ist schwer zu beschreiben,<sup>50</sup> zumal auch nicht geklärt ist, wieweit sein Wirken in Galiläa und der Golanitis vom dortigen, wohl mit Jerusalem nicht voll übereinstimmenden Toraverständnis beeinflusst ist. Die Tendenz der archäologischen Erforschung Galiläas, genauer Unter-galiläas, geht heute dahin (vor allem aufgrund der in der Mitte der achtziger Jahre begonnenen Ausgrabungen in Sepphoris, der Hauptstadt Galiläas in der Jugendzeit Jesu), dass die Bevölkerung Galiläas jedenfalls seit der Besiedlungspolitik der Hasmonäer um 100 v. Chr.

<sup>48</sup> Die These hat Annie Jaubert begründet, vor allem durch ihr Buch La date de la cène: Calendrier biblique et liturgie chrétienne, EBib 27 (Paris: Gabalda, 1957); vgl. Bargil Pixner, „Das letzte Abendmahl Jesu“, in ders., Wege des Messias und Stätten der Urkirche: Jesus und das Judentum im Licht neuer archäologischer Erkenntnisse, hrsg. R. Riesner (Gießen: Brunnen, 1996), 219–228: 222–224.

<sup>49</sup> Siehe nur J. T. Milik, Ten Years of Discovery in the Wilderness of Judaea (London: SCM, 1959), 112–113; Joachim Jeremias, Die Abendmahlsworte Jesu (4. Aufl.; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1967), 18–19; Braun, Qumran und das Neue Testament (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), Bd. 2, 43–54.

<sup>50</sup> Siehe jetzt vor allem John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, Bd. 4: Law and Love (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2009). Vgl. auch den an einer „theoretical method“ ausgerichteten Aufsatz von Meier, „Historical Jesus“ (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“ bei 2003); das Zitat S. 79. Einen neuen Ansatz zur grundsätzlichen Frage nach Jesu Verhältnis zur Tora bietet Tom Holmén, „Jesus, Judaism and the Covenant“, Journ. for the Study of the Hist. Jesus 2 (2004): 3–27. Er legt dar, dass sich Jesus nicht an der üblichen Suche nach der richtigen Auslegung von Tora und Halacha beteiligt habe (von Holmén zusammenfassend auf S. 3 formuliert als „the activity of trying to find out how to keep faithful to the covenant“). Jesus sei offenbar vielmehr von den eschatologischen Erwartungen eines Bundes gemäß Jeremia (z. B. 31:31–34) und Ezechiel (z. B. 37:24 mit 26) bestimmt gewesen. Vgl. auch schon ders., Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, BIS 55 (Leiden: Brill 2001).

weithin jüdisch gewesen ist.<sup>51</sup> Aber dass sie im Toragehorsam Judäa nicht nachstand, ist nicht in gleicher Weise deutlich, auch wenn man dem Ausspruch, der Jochanan ben Zakkai (um die Mitte des 1. Jh. n. Chr.) zugeschrieben wird, nicht zu viel Gewicht beimisst („Galiläa, Galiläa, du hasst die Tora“ [y. Šabb., Ms. Leiden, 16, 15d]). Herodes Antipas leistete es sich, seine neue Hauptstadt Tiberias um 20 n. Chr. auf einem Friedhof zu errichten, freilich nicht ohne Schwierigkeiten wegen seines „ungesetzlichen“ Handelns (Josephus, Ant. 18:38). Immerhin fällt auf, dass Herodes der Große keine heidnischen Tempel oder entsprechende hellenistische Bauten in Galiläa errichtete,<sup>52</sup> was wohl aus Rücksicht gegenüber der jüdischen Bevölkerung geschehen ist. Auch der Nachfolger in Galiläa, Herodes Antipas, baute keine heidnischen Tempel dort und verzichtete, entsprechend dem jüdischen Bilderverbot, auf Münzen mit Abbildern von Menschen oder Gottwesen, was sein Halbbruder Philippus (4 v. Chr.–33/34 n. Chr.) jenseits des Jordan, wo Betsaida lag, nicht tat. Josephus berichtet auch, wie er z. B. auf die Sabbatobservanz in Tarichea, das mit Magdala gleichzusetzen ist, Rücksicht nahm (Vita 159). Die archäologischen Funde im Sepphoris der frühromischen Zeit, insbesondere von Ritualbädern in Häusern und von Steingefäßen, sprechen für die Einhaltung der jüdischen Halacha.<sup>53</sup> Sollte Untergaliläa eine strenge Torafrömmigkeit gehabt haben, würde sich das Auftreten Jesu umso mehr in dieser Hinsicht abheben. Anders steht es aber mit der stärker heidnisch geprägten Gaulanitis, zu der das siebenmal in den Evangelien erwähnte Betsaida gehörte, ein Ort, in dem Jesus mit Sicherheit aufgetreten ist.<sup>54</sup> Die Grabungen seit 1987 haben in dieser Frage noch nicht zu einem eindeutigen Ergebnis <sup>51</sup> Vgl. nur die manchmal ihre Argumente überziehende, aber trotzdem nützliche Arbeit von Mark A. Chancey, The Myth of a Gentile Galilee, SNTSMS 118 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002); ferner z. B. Jonathan L. Reed, Archaeology and the Galilean Jesus (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2000); aus der Fülle der weiteren Literatur seien hier noch Sean Freyne, Jesus, a Jewish Galilean: A New Reading of the Jesus-Story (London: T&T Clark, 2004), und Eric M. Meyers, „Jesus und seine galiläische Lebenswelt“, Zeitschr. f. NT 1 (1998): 27–39 genannt.

---

<sup>52</sup> Vgl. Chancey, The Myth, 50–51.

<sup>53</sup> Chancey, The Myth, 79–80.

<sup>54</sup> H.-W. Kuhn, zuletzt: „Betsaida und et-Tell“, Teil II, 191–196. Siehe ferner meinen Beitrag in Bd. 4 des vorliegenden Handbook.

geführt, obgleich kein Zweifel besteht, dass Betsaida auch deutlich jüdisch bestimmt war.<sup>55</sup> Jedenfalls ist der Gegensatz zwischen dem rigorosen Toraverständnis, wie es in den Qumrantexten entgegentritt, und Jesu Verhalten gegenüber der Tora, insbesondere hinsichtlich der Fragen von rein und unrein und des Sabbats, unübersehbar.<sup>56</sup>

Die vielleicht umstrittenste Stelle der kanonischen Evangelien hinsichtlich Jesu Stellung zur Tora ist Mk 7:15 (par. Mt 15:11 und EvThom 14),<sup>57</sup> ein Satz, der die Kernaussage von V. 14–23 darstellt und wohl Jesus zuzuschreiben ist, wie weitgehend in der kritischen Forschung anerkannt ist.<sup>58</sup> Hat Matthäus die schroffe Formulierung seiner Vorlage entsprechend seinem Toraverständnis etwas abgeschwächt (οὐ „nicht“ statt οὐδέν „nichts“) oder sollte der einfachere, vielleicht doch auch sprachlich geglättete Parallelismus membrorum bei Matthäus (und im Thomasevangelium) ursprünglicher sein? Kaum! Die erstere Gestalt (Markus) ist nicht aus der letzteren (Matthäus) zu erklären.

Mk 7:15  οὐδέν ἐστὶν ἔξωθεν τοῦ  ἀνθρώπου  εἰσπορευόμενον εἰς αὐτὸν  ὃ δύναιται κοινῶσαι αὐτόν,  ἀλλὰ τὰ ἐκ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου  ἐκπορευόμενά  ἐστὶν τὰ κοινῶντα τὸν ἄνθρωπον.	Mt 15:11  οὐ  τὸ εἰσερχόμενον εἰς τὸ στόμα  κοινοῖ τὸν ἄνθρωπον,  ἀλλὰ  τὸ ἐκπορευόμενον ἐκ τοῦ στόματος  τοῦτο κοινοῖ τὸν ἄνθρωπον.
--	---

<sup>55</sup> Heinz-Wolfgang Kuhn, „Jesu Hinwendung zu den Heiden im Markusevangelium im Verhältnis zu Jesu historischem Wirken in Betsaida mit einem Zwischenbericht zur Ausgrabung eines vermuteten heidnischen Tempels auf et-Tell (Betsaida)“, in Die Weite des Mysteriums: Christliche Identität im Dialog. Für Horst Bürkle, hrsg. K. Krämer und A. Paus (Freiburg: Herder, 2000), 204–240.

<sup>56</sup> Vgl. die Besprechung der Reinheitsfragen in den Texten der Qumran-Bibliothek: Hannah K. Harrington, The Purity Texts (London: T&T Clark, 2004). In Übernahme des Terminus „hyper-nomism“ von Shemaryahu Talmon schreibt die Autorin: „This ‘hyper-nomism’ is nowhere more evident than in the laws of purity“ (S. 46).

<sup>57</sup> Bei Lukas gehört der Vers zu seiner zwischen 9:17 und 9:18 erfolgten Streichung des sog. Betsaida-Abschnitts bei Markus, der von Mk 6:45 (V. 45 „Betsaida“) bis Mk 8:26 (V. 22 „Betsaida“) reicht (siehe H.-W. Kuhn, „Betsaida und et-Tell“, Teil II, 192–193 und ders. in Bd. 4 des vorliegenden Handbook).

<sup>58</sup> Dass das Wort νόμος („Gesetz, Weisung“) im Markusevangelium nicht begegnet, bedeutet keinesfalls, dass Jesus nicht zu Fragen der Tora und der Halacha Stellung bezieht. Auch in der Logienquelle kommt νόμος nur in Q 16:16–17 vor. Das fast völlige Fehlen des Nomens νόμος in der älteren Jesusüberlieferung (im Gegensatz zum über hundertmaligen Vorkommen in den nichtbiblischen Texten der Qumran-Bibliothek) dürfte freilich für den Jesus der Historie charakteristisch sein. Siehe auch unten im Abschnitt zur Ehe.

Es gibt nichts, das von außerhalb des Menschen	Nicht das,
in ihn hineinkommt,	was in den Mund hineinkommt,
was ihn unrein machen kann,	macht den Menschen unrein,
sondern, was aus dem Menschen	sondern,
herauskommt,	was aus dem Mund herauskommt,
macht den Menschen unrein.	das macht den Menschen unrein.

Wenn das jüdisch anstößige Wort, auf das vielleicht schon Paulus als eines der relativ wenigen Jesusworte bei ihm anspielt (Röm 14:14;<sup>59</sup> vgl. V. 20), authentisch ist, dann liegt hier keine dogmatische Aussage über die Gültigkeit der Tora vor, sondern ein von Jesus radikalisiertes weisheitliches Wort, wie auch das Logion in der weiteren Überlieferung bei Matthäus verstanden worden ist. Einerseits verschärft Jesus hier die Tora durch den Gegensatz von äußerer Nahrungsaufnahme und ethischer Haltung, andererseits stößt er dabei freilich an eine Grenze zur Aufhebung der Tora (vgl. Lev 11 und Dtn 14:3–21; siehe bes. Lev 11:41–45). Eine ähnliche Haltung im Blick auf den Opferkult verraten prophetische Formulierungen wie Hos 6:6 und Jer 7:21–23. Aber aus dem zeitgenössischen Judentum sind mir Formulierungen wie Mk 7:15 nicht mehr bekannt.

Wenn ich die Literatur recht übersehe, kann hier eine neue Lösung angeboten werden, die das Wort im Munde Jesu verständlich macht. Jesus hebt hier nicht die Tora auf oder auch nur die Halacha über rein und unrein, vielmehr argumentiert er indirekt so, dass es von der Schöpfung her, genauer vom Menschen (deutlicher in der <sup>59</sup> So leitet Paulus das Wort ein: οἶδα καὶ πέπεισμαι ἐν κυρίῳ Ἰησοῦ ὅτι... („ich weiß und bin im Herrn Jesus überzeugt, dass...“). Ein eindeutiger Hinweis auf die Jesusüberlieferung ist das nicht. Sieht man von dem nicht voll vergleichbaren πέποιθα... (bzw. nur δέ) ἐν κυρίῳ ὅτι („ich vertraue... im Herrn darauf, dass...“) in Gal 5:10 und Phil 2:24 ab, so zeigt sich: Wenigstens an drei weiteren Stellen (gemäß dem Text von Nestle/Aland), aber bei vielen anderen ähnlichen, ist der Bezug auf den irdischen Jesus mit einem Hinweis auf „(den) Herrn Jesus“ in der Tat gegeben: 1. Kor 11:23 (Herrenmahl), 1. Thess 2:15 (Tötung Jesu) und 2. Kor 4:14 (Auferweckung Jesu). Schon deutlicher ist der Bezug auf den irdischen Jesus bei bloßem „Jesus“ (ich zähle bei Paulus sieben von neun Stellen). Wo Paulus sich aber eindeutig auf ein Herrenwort beruft, gebraucht er (ὁ) κύριος (1. Thess 4:15; 1. Kor 7:10–11; 9:14). Zu οἶδα καὶ πέπεισμαι („ich weiß und bin überzeugt“) vgl. den vermutlichen Hinweis auf ein Jesuswort in 1. Thess 5:2: ἀκριβῶς οἴδατε („ihr wisst genau“). Der Nachweis, dass Paulus hier an ein Jesuswort denkt, ist also nicht möglich, aber es bleiben einige Auffälligkeiten. Vgl. zum Problem u.a. Cilliers Breytenbach, „Vormarkinische Logientradition: Parallelen in der urchristlichen Briefliteratur“, in The Four Gospels 1992, hrsg. F. Van Segbroeck u.a., Bd. 2; BETL 100-B (Löwen: Leuven University Press, 1992), 725–749: 733–735.

Markusfassung erhalten), nicht auf kultisch reine oder unreine Nahrung ankommt. Ein Wort des oben schon genannten Jochanan ben Zakkai, der offenbar bereits zur Zeit Jesu für 20 Jahre in Galiläa lebte, kann zum Verständnis des Jesuswortes beitragen (Pesiq. Rab Kah. [ed. Mandelbaum] 4:7). Das Wort klingt fast so, als ob es auf Jesu Argumentation über rein und unrein antworten würde, und zwar in dieser Weise: „Du, Jesus, hast an sich schon recht, wenn Du von der Schöpfung her denkst, aber Gott hat es eben nun einmal anders in der Tora geboten.“ Das Logion in der Pesiqta de Rab Kahana lautet:

Bei eurem Leben (sagt Rabban Jochanan ben Zakkai zu seinen Schülern), nicht der Tote verunreinigt und nicht das Wasser macht rein (ähnlich sagt es auch Jesus), sondern eine Verordnung des Heiligen—gepriesen sei er—ist es. Der Heilige—gepriesen sei er—hat gesagt: Ein Gebot habe ich festgesetzt, eine Verordnung habe ich verordnet, und du hast keine Erlaubnis, meine Verordnungen zu übertreten, (wie es heißt): „Dies ist das Gebot der Tora“ (Num 19:2).

In diesem rabbinischen Text wird also eine Einsicht von der Schöpfung her mit der Mose-tora zurückgewiesen. Bei Jesus ist es offenbar gerade umgekehrt. Hannah K. Harrington, die sich ausführlich mit der kultischen Reinheit in den Qumrantexten beschäftigt hat,<sup>60</sup> beschreibt die Differenz so: “the scrolls emphasize the necessity of observing all the ritual purity laws of the Torah.<sup>61</sup> Jesus, by contrast, appears to marginalize the whole issue of ritual purity...”,<sup>62</sup> worin ihm freilich Christen in Jerusalem nicht folgen konnten (siehe Gal 2:12–13) und andere, die heidenchristlich orientiert waren, umge-

<sup>60</sup> Hannah K. Harrington, The Impurity Systems of Qumran and the Rabbis: Biblical Foundations, SBLDS 143 (Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1993); dies., “Purity,” EncDSS 2:724–728. Siehe auch Ian C. Werrett, Ritual Purity and the Dead Sea Scrolls, STDJ 72 (Leiden: Brill, 2007).

<sup>61</sup> “The key to understanding the maximal interpretations of purity in the scrolls” liege im priesterlichen Charakter der Gemeinde, wobei auch darauf verwiesen wird: “the community was a substitute for the Temple” (H. K. Harrington, “Purity,” 2:727b).

<sup>62</sup> H. K. Harrington, “Purity,” 2:727b. Vgl. auch Kazen, Jesus (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“). Unter substanzieller Berücksichtigung der Qumrantexte versucht Kazen, Jesu Relativierung der Reinheitshalacha von drei Gesichtspunkten her zu erklären, nämlich den prophetischen und frühjüdischen Vorstellungen von innerer Reinheit, der schwer zugänglichen galiläischen Halacha und Jesu eschatologischer Verkündigung der Gottesherrschaft, die mit Dämonen, Krankheiten und bestimmten Unreinheiten in Verbindung gebracht wird. Trotz Rückgriffs auf innerjüdische Traditionen und Kontexte stellt Kazen fest, “that Jesus’ attitude to impurity did not represent that of any of the known major groups within Second Temple Judaism” (S. 297).

kehrt das Wort absolut verstanden (so offenbar die Interpretation von Mk 7:15 in V. 19 am Schluss). Das verbreitete Verständnis des Wortes in der Forschung im Sinne eines „nicht so sehr...als“<sup>63</sup> führt in die gleiche Richtung einer relativen Deutung wie die oben für möglich gehaltene. Das Problem der kultischen Reinheit begegnet vor allem innerhalb der folgenden Texte aus der Qumrangemeinde: 4QMMT, 1Q/4QS, 1QSa bzw. 4QSE, CD bzw. 4Q-6QD und 4QFlor = 4QMidrEschat<sup>a</sup>.<sup>64</sup> Auch die Tischgemeinschaft mit „Zöllnern und Sündern“ ist für Jesus offenbar charakteristisch gewesen. Verwiesen sei auf einige mögliche Belege dafür, die authentisch sind oder Jesu Wirken wohl widerspiegeln: Mk 2:15–17 par. Mt 9:10–13 und Lk 5:29–32 (Zöllnermahl); Q 7:33–34 (Kontrast zu Johannes dem Täufer), 19:7 (Zachäus).<sup>65</sup> In der Qumrangemeinde dagegen dürfen noch nicht einmal die Novizen, auch wenn sie nach einer vorhergehenden Prüfung (1QS VI, 14–16 par. 4QS<sup>b</sup> [4Q256] XI, 11) danach schon ein ganzes Jahr in der Gemeinde gelebt haben, „die Reinheit (der Speise)<sup>66</sup> der Vielen (d.h. der Vollmitglieder) berühren“ (1QS VI, 16–20 par. 4QS<sup>b</sup> [4Q256] XI, 12–13) und selbst in einem weiteren Jahr noch nicht „das Getränk der Vielen“ (1QS VI, 20–23 par. 4QS<sup>s</sup> [4Q261] 3 1).

In der priesterlich bestimmten Qumrangemeinde existiert eine ältere Gemeindeordnung (1QSa [1Q28a]/4QSE), die das Kommen eines Messias oder zweier Messiasgestalten erwartet.<sup>67</sup> Die eschatologische Zukunft steht noch aus, da es noch körperlich Behinderte gibt, die als kultisch unrein verstanden wurden (1QSa II, 3–11).<sup>68</sup> In Anlehnung an Lev 21:16–24, einem Abschnitt, der von der Untauglichkeit zum Priestertum handelt, wird ein Ausschluss von der eigentlichen Gemeinde für alle körperlich Behinderten (unter anderem Gelähmte, Hinkende und Blinde) gefordert (II, 3–11). Es klingt wie

<sup>63</sup> Siehe Friedrich Blass und Albert Debrunner, Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Griechisch, bearb. F. Rehkopf (18. Aufl.; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2001), § 448 Anm. 1. Vgl. z. B. Holmén, Covenant Thinking, 239–246.

<sup>64</sup> Vgl. H. K. Harrington, „Purity,” 2:724a.

<sup>65</sup> Wie Lukas das Wirken des irdischen Jesus in dieser Hinsicht gestaltet, zeigt seine Einleitung zum Gleichnis vom verlorenen Schaf in 15:1–2 (vgl. François Bovon, Lk 15,1–19, 27, Bd. 3 von Das Evangelium nach Lukas, EKK 3 [Düsseldorf: Benziger, 2001], 19–21).

<sup>66</sup> H. K. Harrington, „Purity,” 2:725b.

<sup>67</sup> Siehe H.-W. Kuhn, „The Qumran Meal,” 221–248, bes. 234–236.

<sup>68</sup> Vgl. Hartmut Stegemann, „Some Remarks to 1QSa, to 1QSB, and to Qumran Messianism,” RevQ 17 (Nr. 65–68, 1996): 479–505, bes. 494–495.

ein Kontrastprogramm gegen die Qumranfrommen, wenn Jesus gemäß dem Lukasevangelium in einem Logion in 14:12–14 neben den „Armen“ (eine positive Selbstbezeichnung der Qumrangemeinde!) gerade auch „Krüppel, Lahme und Blinde“ als einzuladende Tischgenossen nennt, was der Evangelist im nachfolgenden Gleichnis vom Festmahl im Reich Gottes in 14:21 wiederholt.

Die drei zuvor behandelten Themen (Nahrungsaufnahme, Tischgemeinschaft, Behinderte) haben gemäß den zitierten Texten mit kultureller „Reinheit“ zu tun (vgl. Mk 7:15: 2-mal κοινῶν „unrein machen“; 1QS VI, 16–17 par. 4QS<sup>b</sup> [4Q256] XI, 12: „Reinheit der Vielen“; 1QSa [1Q28a] II, 3–4 par. 4Qpap cryptA SE<sup>s</sup> [4Q249g] 3–7 l: „mit irgendeiner der menschlichen Unreinheiten“). Was die Speisegebote betrifft, so bewegt sich Jesus hier offenbar überhaupt an der Grenze dessen, was in der damaligen Zeit als jüdisch möglich erscheint. Das gilt auch in Fragen des Sabbats. Jesu Haltung zum Sabbat ist mit jener der Qumrangemeinde nicht vereinbar. Wenden wir uns zunächst dem zweifellos authentischen Logion Mk 2:27 zu, das wieder von der Schöpfung her argumentiert. In der Erzählung vom Ährenraufen am Sabbat, einem Apophthegma (Mk 2:23–28 par. Mt 12:1–8 und Lk 6:1–5), heißt es bei Markus in V. 27: „Der Sabbat ist wegen des Menschen geschaffen worden (ἐγένετο; der folgende zweite Teil des Satzes nimmt auf die Schöpfung Bezug)<sup>69</sup> und nicht der Mensch wegen des Sabbats.“<sup>70</sup> Schon im Markusevangelium ist das Wort in V. 28 in seiner Liberalität abgeschwächt; das Matthäus- und Lukasevangelium haben das Logion offensichtlich unabhängig voneinander gestrichen.<sup>71</sup> Gerne wird eine rabbinische Parallele zu diesem Wort zitiert, aber dort ist nicht, wie schon Ernst Lohmeyer erkannte,<sup>72</sup> allgemein vom Menschen die Rede, sondern spezieller von Israel, was im Blick auf Jesu Predigt durchaus einen Unterschied macht. Zu Ex 31 ([V. 12] „Und Jahwe sprach zu Mose:... [V. 14] ‚Ihr sollt den Sabbat halten, denn er ist für euch heilig‘“) heißt es im tannaitischen Midrasch Mekhilta de Rabbi Yischma'el (ed. Horowitz und Rabin, 2nd ed.) zu Ex 31:13 (wiederholt zu V. 14): „Euch ist der Sabbat übergeben worden (מסורה), und nicht ihr seid dem Sabbat übergeben“,<sup>73</sup> eben weil es Ausnahmen geben kann, wie der Kontext zu V. 13 sagt. Freilich wäre das Ährenraufen am Sabbat kaum eine zulässige Ausnahme (weder die Frage der ursprünglichen Zusammengehörigkeit von V. 27 mit V. 23–24<sup>74</sup> noch die halachische Frage des Ährenraufens am Sabbat kann hier weiter verfolgt werden). Es zeigt sich wieder, Jesus bewegt sich durchaus noch im Rahmen des damaligen Judentums, aber doch wohl eher an der Grenze. Genannt sei auch noch aus der Jesusüberlieferung die darauf folgende Sabbatgeschichte Mk 3:1–5 (par. Mt 12:9–13 und Lk 6:6–10),<sup>75</sup> die für den Jesus der Historie besonders charakteristisch zu sein scheint, weil die Erzählung schon bereits Gutestun am Sabbat mit Lebensrettung gleichsetzt. Lebensrettung am Sabbat war ja in jedem Fall erlaubt (siehe z. B. wiederum Mek. zu Ex 31:13). Jesus radikalisiert hyperbolisch in einer für ihn typischen Weise (vgl. nur Mk 10:25 par. Mt 19:24 und Lk 18:25) das Tun des Guten zur Lebensrettung und das Tun des Bösen zum Töten und führt so seine kritischen Beobachter in der Synagoge ad absurdum.

<sup>69</sup> Walter Bauer, „γίνομαι“, Griechisch-deutsches Wörterbuch zu den Schriften des Neuen Testaments und der frühchristlichen Literatur (6. Aufl.; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1988), 316–321 (Eng. trans.: A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and other Early Christian Literature [überarbeitet und hrsg. von F. W. Danker auf der Basis von W. Bauers Griechisch-deutsches Wörterbuch zu den Schriften des Neuen Testaments und der frühchristlichen Literatur; 3. Aufl.; Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 2000], 196–199). Unter 2a schlägt Bauer als Übersetzung „angeordnet sein“ (Eng.: „be established“) vor, aber eine Übersetzung mit „geschaffen werden“ entspricht besser dem zweiten Teil des Satzes, wie oben gesagt, und damit aber auch der Kongruenz mit Jesu Verweisen auf die Schöpfung.

<sup>70</sup> Vgl. z. B. die ausführliche Diskussion dieses Logions bei Frans Neiryck, „Jesus and the Sabbath: Some Observations on Mark II, 27,“ in Jésus aux origines de la christologie, hrsg. J. Dupont, BETL 40 (Löwen: Leuven University Press, 1975), 227–270.

<sup>71</sup> Vgl. H.-W. Kuhn, Ältere Sammlungen, 73–74.

In der Qumrangemeinde herrschte dagegen strengste Sabbatobservanz, wie z. B. die in der Gemeinde (im weiteren Sinn) verfasste Damaskusschrift (CD) in X, 14–XI, 18 (teilweise par. in den Handschriften 4QD<sup>a,b,e,f</sup> [4Q266, 267, 270, 271]) zeigt. In CD XI, 13–14 (auch zum Teil in den Parallelhandschriften 4QD<sup>e,f</sup>) und

<sup>72</sup> Ernst Lohmeyer, Das Evangelium des Markus, KEK 1.2 (17. Aufl. + Ergänzungsheft [3. Aufl. bearbeitet von Gerhard Saß]; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1967), 66.

<sup>73</sup> Das Wort wird R. Schim'on b. M'enasja (um 180) zugeschrieben.

<sup>74</sup> Siehe H.-W. Kuhn, Ältere Sammlungen, 73–76.

<sup>75</sup> Mk 3:6 ist nach meiner Auffassung der markinische Abschluss der Streitgespräche 2:1–3:5 (siehe H.-W. Kuhn, Ältere Sammlungen, 18–24, 53–98, bes. 87–88). Vgl. zu Mk 3:1–5 Meier, „Historical Jesus“ (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“ bei 2008), bes. 304 (die Feststellung zu den synoptischen Heilungen am Sabbat „first manifestations of a rabbinic position“ ist einleuchtend, der Schluss auf generell nichthistorisch hingegen voreilig).

4QMiscellaneous Rules (4Q265) 6 5–6 gibt es das Verbot, einem Tier herauszuhelfen, das am Sabbat in eine Zisterne oder in eine Grube bzw. ins Wasser gefallen ist. CD XI, 13–14 lautet:

Niemand soll am Sabbat Vieh beim Gebären helfen. Und wenn es in eine Zisterne (14) oder in eine Grube fällt, soll man es am Sabbat nicht herausholen.

Diese Vorschrift wäre für Jesus so absurd, dass er in einem Wort in Q 14:5 ganz selbstverständlich von dem Gegenteil ausgeht.

Ausdrücklich von der Schöpfung her argumentiert Jesus auch in Mk 10:2–9 (par. Mt 19:3ff.) gegen die Möglichkeit der Ehescheidung, die „Mose“ einräume. Genau dieser Ansatz, mit der Schöpfung zu argumentieren, findet sich aber auch in ähnlichem Zusammenhang einmal in CD IV, 20–21 (par. 4QD<sup>d</sup> [4Q269] 3 2 und 6QD [6Q15] 1 2–3), wo außerdem auf die gleiche Bibelstelle Gen 1:27 zurückgegriffen wird. Wieder zeigt sich, wie sich die Argumentation bei Jesus und die in seiner jüdischen Umwelt ähneln können. Während Jesus in Mk 10:9 par. Mt 19:6 die Scheidung untersagt und in einem in Mk 10:11–12 par. Mt 19:9 und Q 16:18 überlieferten Jesuswort auch die Wiederverheiratung nach einer Scheidung (siehe auch 1. Kor 7:10–11), fordert die Qumrangemeinde—natürlich ohne Abgrenzung gegenüber Mose—für Männer, „in ihrem Leben“ (בַּחַיִּיהֶם) nur mit einer Frau verheiratet zu sein.<sup>76</sup> Die Scheidung wird für Qumranfromme jedenfalls nicht ausgeschlossen, wie CD XIII, 17–18 zusammen mit der Parallele 4QD<sup>a</sup> (4Q266) 9 III, 5–7 zeigt. Sollte die zurückhaltende Abgrenzung gegenüber Mose in Mk 10:3–4 (par. Mt 19:7–8) authentisch sein, würde das gut zu Jesu Gesetzesverständnis passen. Ist es Zufall, dass Jesus weder vom Exodus noch vom Sinai-bund mit Israel her seine Botschaft entfaltet?

<sup>76</sup> Oder ist etwa—philologisch bedenklich—gemeint: keine Wiederverheiratung, solange die Geschiedene lebt (so Broshi, „Matrimony“ [siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“], 254), oder ist gar nur Polygamie verboten (so Schremer, „Qumran Polemic“ [siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“], 160 und D. J. Harrington, „Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls“ [siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“], 38). Der sprachliche Kontrast zu „Frauen“ legt eher nahe, dass mit dem maskulinen Suffix (trotz Vorkommen in femininer Bedeutung, z.B. in 4QMMT B 59 [4Q394 8 IV, 9 par.]) hier „Männer“ angesprochen sind. Von der Formulierung her wären Polygamie und Wiederverheiratung nach einer Scheidung oder dem Tod der Frau ausgeschlossen (gegen das Letztere könnte allerdings die vorqumranische Tempelrolle in 11QT<sup>a</sup> [11Q19] LVII, 24–25 [17–18 Yadin/Qimron] sprechen, wo speziell für den König Wiederverheiratung nach dem Tod seiner einen Frau ausdrücklich vorgesehen ist; die Scheidung ist für den Israeliten gemäß 11QT<sup>a</sup> [11Q19] LIV, 11–12 [4–5 Yadin/Qimron] nicht ausgeschlossen). Die vielfältige Diskussion insbesondere über den CD-Text kann hier nicht weiter dokumentiert werden (vgl. zum CD-Text etwa Meier, „Historical Jesus“ [siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“], bes. 73–75). Speziell zur Frage der Scheidung siehe außer Meier in dem eben zitierten Aufsatz S. 64–79 noch Tom Holmén, „Divorce in CD 4:20–5:2 and in 11QT 57:17–18: Some Remarks on the Pertinence of the Question,” RevQ 18 (Nr. 71, 1998): 397–408, und überhaupt zu den Textproblemen jetzt auch Lichtenberger, „Schöpfung und Ehe“, Doering, „Marriage“ und Kister, „Divorce,” 199–212 (siehe zu allen drei Aufsätzen „Ausgewählte Literatur“).

Zu der antithetischen Form der sog. Antithesen in der Bergpredigt (Mt 5:21–48), von denen insbesondere die erste und zweite authentisch sein dürften, gibt es wiederum eine gewisse Parallele. Jesus stellt ein „Ich aber sage euch“ einer anderen Tradition entgegen. In der aus der Frühzeit der Qumrangemeinde stammenden Streitschrift 4QMMT<sup>a-f</sup> (4Q394–399)<sup>77</sup> wird die gegnerische Meinung öfter mit „wir (aber) sagen“ abgelehnt: B 55,<sup>78</sup> B 64–65,<sup>79</sup> B 73.<sup>80, 81</sup>

2.3. Das Liebesgebot

Auch das Liebesgebot spielt in der Qumrangemeinde eine herausragende Rolle: Das Gebot in Lev 19:18 „Du sollst Deinen Nächsten lieben wie dich selbst“ klingt in CD VI, 20–21 (par. 4QD<sup>d</sup> [4Q269] 4 II, 2–3 und 6QD [6Q15] 4 1–3) in der Fassung „man liebe seinen Bruder“ (Lev 19:17) „wie sich selbst“ an; aber auch an den Fremden wird hier gedacht: „man nehme sich... des Fremden an“. In allen kleineren sog. Tugendkatalogen in 1QS begegnet die Liebe als „treue Liebe“ (אהבת חסד; II, 24; V, 4, 25; VIII, 2; X, 26), und in dem großen Tugendkatalog in IV, 3ab–6a findet sich in Z. 3 „unendliche Güte“ (טוב עולמים); in allen Fällen ist zweifellos an die Gemeindemitglieder als Gegenüber gedacht. Anders steht es mit der Feindesliebe. Dieses Gebot Jesu in Mt 5:44–45 par. Lk 6:27, 35 wird immer wieder mit Sätzen der Qumrangemeinde kontrastiert, weil 1QS ausdrücklich davon spricht, „alle Kinder des Lichts zu lieben, aber alle Kinder der Finsternis zu hassen“ (I, 9–10; siehe auch IX, 21–22).<sup>82</sup> Dass Jesus sich hier gegen die Qumrangemeinde wendet, lässt sich jedoch keineswegs

<sup>77</sup> Die Bezeichnung für 4Q398 lautet genauer: 4QpapMMT<sup>e</sup>. Gehörte zu MMT auch 4QcryptA MMT<sup>g</sup> (4Q313)?

<sup>78</sup> 4QMMT<sup>a</sup> (4Q394) 8 IV, 5 par. 4QMMT<sup>c</sup> (4Q396) 1–2 II, 7.

<sup>79</sup> 4QMMT<sup>c</sup> (4Q396) 1–2 III, 4–5 par. 4QMMT<sup>a</sup> (4Q394) 8 IV, 14.

<sup>80</sup> 4QMMT<sup>c</sup> (4Q396) 1–2 IV, 2 par. 4QMMT<sup>d</sup> (4Q397) 6–13 11.

<sup>81</sup> Neben öfter „wir aber meinen“. Vgl. „ihr aber wisst“ in B 68, 80; C 8 (hier wird auf die nähere Kennzeichnung der Fragmente verzichtet). Vgl. in der rabbinischen Literatur z. B. t. Bik. (ed. Rengstorf) 1, 2 („Aber ich sage“). Zur rabbinischen Formel „aber ich sage“ siehe Berndt Schaller, „The Character and Function of the Antitheses in Matt 5:21–48 in the Light of Rabbinical Exegetic Disputes“, in The Sermon on the Mount and Its Jewish Setting, hrsg. H.-J. Becker und S. Ruzer, CRB 60 (Paris: Gabalda, 2005), 70–88: 77–78.

<sup>82</sup> Die letztere Stelle ist teilweise auch in den Parallelhandschriften 4QS<sup>b,d,e</sup> (4Q256, 258, 259) erhalten.

erhärten. Dieser „Hass“ in Texten der Qumrangemeinde geschieht aus religiösen Gründen und hat einen dualistischen Hintergrund, der letztlich ein Jesus fremdes Gottesbild voraussetzt. Er ist von dem bei Jesus abgelehnten Hass zu unterscheiden, der allgemein menschlich zu deuten ist.<sup>83</sup> Die ausdrückliche Feindesliebe in dieser überfordernenden, von der Gegenwart des Eschaton her (siehe unten in Abschnitt 2.4) zu verstehenden Formulierung, wie sie bei Jesus begegnet, hat in der jüdischen Literatur der Antike keine Parallele<sup>84</sup> und ist zweifellos auf Jesus selbst zurückzuführen, der offenbar wieder von der Schöpfung her argumentiert, zumal selbst die frühen Christen ihre Schwierigkeiten mit dem Gebot der Feindesliebe hatten.<sup>85</sup> Vermutlich lautete der für die Logienquelle aus Mt 5:44–45 + Lk 6:(27), 35 zu gewinnende Text etwa so (in Mt 5:45 liegt gegenüber Lk 6:35 wohl die ursprünglichere Fassung vor; die Fassungen, die die beiden Evangelien benutzten, mögen freilich vielleicht schon unterschiedlich gewesen sein).<sup>86</sup> ἀγαπάτε τοὺς ἐχθροὺς ὑμῶν, καὶ ἔσεσθε υἱοὶ τοῦ πατρὸς ὑμῶν τοῦ ἐν οὐρανοῖς, ὅτι τὸν ἥλιον αὐτοῦ ἀνατέλλει ἐπὶ πονηροὺς καὶ ἀγαθοὺς καὶ βρέχει ἐπὶ δικαίους καὶ ἀδίκους.

Liebt eure Feinde,
und ihr werdet Kinder eures Vaters im Himmel sein, denn er lässt seine Sonne aufgehen über Böse und Gute und lässt regnen über Gerechte und Ungerechte.

Das Gebot der Nächstenliebe aus Lev 19:18 lässt sich—in der Damaskusschrift immerhin anklingend (siehe oben)—auch für den historischen Jesus feststellen, und zwar im Apophthegma der Frage nach

<sup>83</sup> Anders liegt es mit dem rabbinischen Midrasch Sifra Lev 19:18, wo der Hass als „Rache“ und „Zorn“ gegenüber Heiden erlaubt ist (siehe dazu Heinz-Wolfgang Kuhn, „Das Liebesgebot Jesu als Tora und als Evangelium: Zur Feindesliebe und zur christlichen und jüdischen Auslegung der Bergpredigt“, in Vom Urchristentum zu Jesus, hrsg. H. Frankemölle und K. Kertelge [Freiburg: Herder, 1989], 194–230: 206–209; 208 zu den herangezogenen Textausgaben).

<sup>84</sup> Siehe dazu H.-W. Kuhn, „Liebesgebot Jesu“, 224–226.

<sup>85</sup> Siehe H.-W. Kuhn, „Liebesgebot Jesu“, 196–197. Ich war natürlich der Meinung, dass das von mir aufgezeigte weitgehende Fehlen des Gebots der Feindesliebe in christlichen Texten vor der Mitte des 2. Jh. n. Chr. Relevanz für die Frage der Authentizität des Jesuswortes hat, obgleich ich es in der nachfolgenden Behandlung der Differenz dieses Wortes zu zeitgenössischen Texten und der Authentizität des Logions (S. 224–226) nicht mehr ausdrücklich zur Sprache brachte (zu Tom Holmén, „Doubts about Double Dissimilarity: Restructuring the Main Criterion of Jesus-of-History Research“, in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, hrsg. B. Chilton und C. A. Evans, NTS 28 [Leiden: Brill, 1999], 47–80: 69 Anm. 87).

<sup>86</sup> Vgl. im Einzelnen zu der Rekonstruktion H.-W. Kuhn, „Liebesgebot Jesu“, 223–224. Eine etwas andere Rekonstruktion bei Robinson u.a., Critical Edition of Q.

dem obersten Gebot (Mk 12:28–34 par. Mt 22:34–40 und Lk 10:25–28).<sup>87</sup> Es handelt sich hier nicht, wie man früher meinte, um ein „Erbstück aus dem hellenistischen Judentum“,<sup>88</sup> genauer aus dem griechisch sprechenden Judentum. Diese Sicht wurde mir schon Ende der achtziger Jahre fraglich. Jesus geht hier offenbar nicht von der hellenistischen Verbindung von „Frömmigkeit“ und „Menschenliebe“ oder ähnlich als „Inbegriff des göttlichen Willens“<sup>89</sup> aus, sondern ordnet vielmehr betont die Nächstenliebe (Lev 19:18) der Basis des Judentums, dem schon damals herausgehobenen Sch<sup>c</sup>ma Jisrael (Höre, Israel), das mit Dtn 6:4–9 beginnt, zu. Die Verbindung der beiden Zitate Dtn 6:5 und Lev 19:18 ist in zeitgenössischen jüdischen Texten, soweit ich sehe, nicht belegt, das Nebeneinander von Gottesfurcht und Liebeswerken oder ähnlich in hebräisch-aramäischen Texten selten (z. B. Jub 36:7–8 = 4QpapJub<sup>h</sup> [4Q223–224] Unit 2 II, 48–49 [weithin ergänzt]). Dann spricht vieles dafür, dass wir es hier mit einem authentischen Jesuswort zu tun haben, das die Rolle der Nächstenliebe in besonderer Weise zu einem herausragenden Grundsatz erhebt.<sup>90</sup>

2.4. Die Eschatologie

Besonders überraschend erwies sich die Hilfestellung der Qumrantexte für ein besseres Verständnis der Eschatologie Jesu. Wie wir jetzt wesentlich sicherer erkennen können, enthält diese sowohl futurische Aussagen als auch solche, die dieses von der Zukunft erwartete Heil schon für die Gegenwart behaupten. Bis zur Entdeckung der Qumrantexte meinte man, dass Jesus gegenüber seiner jüdischen Umwelt entweder ein völlig neues Verständnis von Eschatologie gehabt habe (Werner Georg Kümmel)<sup>91</sup> oder dass diese Interpretation der

<sup>87</sup> Das Matthäusevangelium leitet damit auch das Gebot der Feindesliebe ein (5:43) und fügt es Dekaloggeboten in 19:19 zu. Die zahlreichen „minor agreements“ in der Matthäus- und Lukasfassung beruhen offenbar auf einer jüngeren Fassung des Apophthegmas.

<sup>88</sup> Christoph Burchard, „Das doppelte Liebesgebot in der frühen christlichen Überlieferung“, in Der Ruf Jesu und die Antwort der Gemeinde, hrsg. E. Lohse (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1970), 39–62: 57. Der Vergleich des Zitats von Dtn 6:5 mit der Hebräischen Bibel und der LXX kann dafür sprechen, dass nur das Zitat von Dtn 6:5 im Munde Jesu (ohne διάνοια „Denken“ und die sonstige Angleichung an die LXX), aber nicht die Wiederholung durch den Schriftgelehrten authentisch ist.

<sup>89</sup> Burchard, „Liebesgebot“.

<sup>90</sup> Vgl. H.-W. Kuhn, „Liebesgebot Jesu“, 223 Anm. 76a.

<sup>91</sup> Verheißung und Erfüllung: Untersuchungen zur eschatologischen Verkündigung Jesu, ATANT 6 (3. Aufl.; Zürich: Zwingli-Verlag, 1956).

Eschatologie Jesu falsch sei, da sie sich im zeitgenössischen Judentum nicht belegen lasse (Rudolf Bultmann).<sup>92</sup> Vor einiger Zeit ging zwar das sog. Jesus-Seminar in Nordamerika sogar von einem völligen Fehlen von Eschatologie und Apokalyptik bei Jesus aus,<sup>93</sup> aber diese Ansicht lässt sich exegetisch nicht halten (man vergleiche nur die Bitte des Vaterunsers „Dein Reich komme“ in Q 11:2 und einige der Gleichnisse Jesu). Zu den wichtigsten authentischen Jesusworten, die von der Gegenwart des erst in der Zukunft erwarteten Heils sprechen, gehören Q 11:20 (hier wird gesagt, dass mit Jesu Dämonenbannungen schon die Gottesherrschaft angebrochen sei), ferner Q 10:23–24 (die Seligpreisungen der Augen- und Ohrenzeugen), Q 7:22 (Schilderung der eschatologischen Heilszeit mit Motiven des Jesajabuches) und Mk 2:19αβ par. Lk 5:34 (Aufhebung des Fastens).<sup>94</sup>

Wegen des Vergleichs mit den Qumrantexten gleich unten seien hier die sechs Aussagen über die Heilszeit im Mund Jesu zitiert (Q 7:22), die alle bis auf die Reinigung der Aussätzigen ihre Parallele vor allem im Jesajabuch haben; das gilt auch für die Auferstehung der Toten, wie oft übersehen wird. In den alttestamentlichen Stellen ist in der Regel Gott das Subjekt. Der Text in der Logienquelle dürfte etwa so gelautet haben (wieweit der Kontext in Q 7:18–23 ursprünglich ist, braucht hier nicht diskutiert zu werden):<sup>95</sup>

τυφλοὶ ἀνοβλέπουσιν<sup>96</sup>
καὶ χωλοὶ περιπατοῦσιν,<sup>97</sup>

<sup>92</sup> „Zur eschatologischen Verkündigung Jesu“, ThLZ 72 (1947): 271–274.

<sup>93</sup> Es wurde 1979 von Robert W. Funk gegründet und begann 1985 mit den offiziellen Treffen. Per Abstimmung unter Zuhilfenahme farbiger Kügelchen kam es zu seinen Ergebnissen. Siehe Robert W. Funk, Roy W. Hoover and the Jesus Seminar, The Five Gospels: The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus (New York, NY: Macmillan, 1993); Robert W. Funk and the Jesus Seminar, The Acts of Jesus: The Search for the Authentic Deeds of Jesus (San Francisco, CA: HarperSanFrancisco, 1998).

<sup>94</sup> Siehe zu den vier Logien: H.-W. Kuhn, Enderwartung (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), 189–204, bes. 193–199.

<sup>95</sup> Auch für Robinson u.a., Critical Edition of Q lautet der Text so.

<sup>96</sup> Vgl. Jes 29:18b (BHS und 1QJes<sup>a</sup>): עיני עורים תראינה „die Augen der Blinden sehen“; Jes 35:5a (BHS und 1QJes<sup>a</sup>): תפקחנה עיני עורים „es werden die Augen der Blinden aufgetan“; Jes 42:7a (BHS und 1QJes<sup>a</sup>): עינים עורות (1Q: לפקח) לפקח „blinde Augen zu öffnen“ (vom Gottesknecht ausgesagt); Ps 146:8a פקח עורים „er öffnet die (Augen der) Blinden“. Wegen des gleich zu besprechenden Qumrantextes wird der hebräische Text zitiert; die gegebenenfalls nachträgliche Nähe zur LXX braucht hier nicht diskutiert zu werden.

<sup>97</sup> Vgl. Jes 35:6a (BHS und 1QJes<sup>a</sup>): פסח (1Q: כאיל) ידלג כאיל „es springt der Lahme wie ein Hirsch“.

λεπροὶ καθαρίζονται
καὶ κωφοὶ ἀκούουσιν,<sup>98</sup> καὶ νεκροὶ ἐγείρονται<sup>99</sup> καὶ πτωχοὶ εὐαγγελίζονται<sup>100</sup>

Blinde sehen wieder, und Lahme gehen umher, Aussätzige werden rein,
und Taube hören,
und Tote stehen auf, ja Armen wird eine frohe Botschaft verkündet.

Das hier zitierte Jesuswort über die Gegenwart des Eschaton (Q 7:22) hat nun eine Parallele in 4Q521,<sup>101</sup> wobei aber dieser Qumrantext in traditioneller Weise nur von der Zukunft spricht. In dem Text der Spruchquelle Q malt Jesus, wie wir gesehen haben, vor allem mit Worten des Jesajabuches (35:5–6; 29:18–19; 26:19; 61:1) ein Bild des künftigen eschatologischen Heils, das er als bereits gegenwärtig versteht. Der erste Höhepunkt der Aufzählung der eschatologischen Heilsereignisse ist die Auferstehung der Toten, der eigentliche Höhepunkt aber Jesu Botschaft an die Armen (es geht nicht einfach um eine Aufzählung der Taten Jesu, sondern um eschatologische Bilder). Bei dem Qumrantext handelt es sich um Fragmente einer Schrift, die zurzeit den vielleicht nicht zutreffenden Namen „Messianic Apocalypse“ trägt;<sup>102</sup> der Text muss nicht in der Qumrangemeinde entstanden sein. Fragment 2 II enthält zwei Listen, die ebenfalls mit

<sup>98</sup> Vgl. Jes 29:18a (BHS und 1QJes<sup>a</sup>): וּשְׁמַעוּ... הַחֲרָשִׁים „und es hören... die Tauben“; Jes 35:5b (BHS und 1QJes<sup>a</sup>): חֲרָשִׁים תִּפְתַּחְנָה (1Q: וְאוֹזְנִי וְאוֹזְנִי) „und die Ohren der Tauben werden geöffnet.“

<sup>99</sup> Vgl. Jes 26:19a (BHS und 1QJes<sup>a</sup>): יַחֲיוּ מִתֵּיךְ (מִיַּתִּיךְ) נִבְלָתִי יִקְוֹמוּן הַקִּיצוֹ (1Q: וְרִנְנוּ (וְרִנְנוּ) וְרִנְנוּ (וְרִנְנוּ) וְרִנְנוּ (וְרִנְנוּ)) „deine Toten werden leben, meine Leichen werden auferstehen; wacht auf und jubelt, die ihr im Staub liegt“ (1Q: es werden jubeln und aufwachen, die im Staub liegen).

<sup>100</sup> Vgl. Jes 61:1b (BHS und 1QJes<sup>a,b</sup>), von einem Propheten ausgesagt: לְבַשׂר עֲנוּיִם „er hat mich gesandt, den Armen die frohe Botschaft zu verkünden“; Jes 29:19b (BHS und 1QJes<sup>a</sup>): וְאֲבִינֵי אָדָם... יִגִּילוּ „und die armen Menschen... jubeln“.

<sup>101</sup> Siehe aus der Fülle von Literatur zu diesem Text M. Becker, „Die ‚messianische Apokalypse‘ 4Q521“ und Novakovic, „4Q521“ (siehe für beide Aufsätze „Ausgewählte Literatur“).

<sup>102</sup> Mit מְשִׁיחוֹ (zu lesen als מְשִׁיחוֹ) „seine Gesalbten“ und wohl nicht als מְשִׁיחוֹ „sein Gesalbter“ [= der Messias] in 2 II, 1 sind hier sicherlich die biblischen Propheten gemeint, entsprechend dem Plural „Heilige“ in der zweiten Zeile des Parallelismus membrorum (Z. 2) und entsprechend dem Plural מְשִׁיחֵיהֶם „und alle (!) ihre (was ist das Bezugswort?) Gesalbten“ in Z. 9 von Fragment 8. Falcetta, „Logion of Matthew“ (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), bes. 228–229, übersetzt 2 II, 1: „his messiah(s)“.

biblischen Aussagen das eschatologische Heil beschreiben, dessen Subjekt hier aber Gott ist (siehe Z. 5; auch in der zweiten Liste gemäß Z. 11). Die Übereinstimmung betrifft in der ersten Liste (Z. 4–8) die Heilung von Blindheit (Z. 8):

...
<sup>103</sup> פוקח עורים	τυφλοὶ ἀναβλέπουσιν
...	...
...
er öffnet blinde (Augen),	Blinde sehen wieder,
...	...

In der zweiten Liste (Z. 12ff.) liegen folgende Übereinstimmungen vor. Hier findet sich das gleiche Nacheinander von Totenaufstehung gemäß Jes 26:19 und Predigt an die Armen gemäß Jes 61:1.<sup>104</sup>

...	...
<sup>105</sup> ומתים יחיה	καὶ νεκροὶ ἐγείρονται
<sup>106</sup> ענוים יבשר	καὶ πτωχοὶ εὐαγγελίζονται.
...
...	...
und Tote wird er lebendig machen,	und Tote stehen auf,
Armen wird er eine frohe Botschaft verkünden,	ja Armen wird eine frohe Botschaft verkündet.
...

Hinter dem Jesuswort und hinter dem Text 4Q521, der wohl von außen in die Qumrangemeinde kam, dürfte eine gemeinsame jüdische Tradition der Beschreibung der Heilszeit stehen.

Wir wenden uns jetzt noch den eschatologischen Gegenwartsausagen zu. Während die in den Qumrantexten öfter begegnende Gemeinschaft der Gemeinde mit den Engeln<sup>107</sup> an sich noch keine Vorwegnahme einer futurischen Heilserwartung bedeutet, ist jedoch von einem Selbstverständnis der Gemeinde als Tempel Gottes her

<sup>103</sup> Siehe Ps 146:8 (BHS): פוקח עורים „er öffnet die (Augen der) Blinden“.

<sup>104</sup> Der Qumrantext fährt nach der Botschaft an die Armen mit weiteren Aussagen fort, so dass diese hier nicht der Höhepunkt ist.

<sup>105</sup> Vgl. oben Anm. 99.

<sup>106</sup> Vgl. oben Anm. 100.

<sup>107</sup> Z. B. 1QH<sup>a</sup> XI, 22–24 (III, 21–23 Sukenik); XIX, 16f. (XI, 13f. Sukenik); 4QAgescreat B (4Q181) 1 II, 3–4; auch die wohl doch aus der Qumrangemeinde stammende Engelliturgie (ShirShabb).

(siehe bes. 1QS VIII, 5, 8–9) deutlich, dass für sie die Gegenwart nicht mehr, wie in der Apokalyptik, nur heilsleer sein kann. Das ist offenbar der Hintergrund dafür, dass die Qumrangemeinde futurisch-eschatologische Vorstellungen in die Gegenwart transponiert, wie ich vor einigen Jahrzehnten zu zeigen versuchte.<sup>108</sup> Das geschieht besonders deutlich in Gemeindeliedern in 1Q/4QH und im Schlusslied von 1QS (genauer XI, 2–9 par. 4QS<sup>d</sup> [4Q258] XII). Aus den oben genannten Jesusworten sei hier beispielhaft Q 11:20 zitiert:<sup>109</sup>

εἰ δὲ ἐν δακτύλῳ θεοῦ
 ἐγὼ ἐκβάλλω τὰ δαιμόνια, ἄρα ἔφθασεν ἐφ' ὑμᾶς
 ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ.

Wenn ich durch den Finger Gottes die Dämonen austreibe, dann ist (bereits) zu euch gelangt die Königsherrschaft Gottes.

Das Wort wurde einzeln überliefert, wie der parallele Kontext im Markusevangelium zeigt. Das Verb φθάνειν („hingelangen“) sollte deutlich von dem Verb ἐγγίζειν („nahekommen“)<sup>110</sup> unterschieden werden. Hinter φθάνειν könnte das aramäische Verb נִשְׁמַח/נִשְׁמַח „hinzugelangen“ stehen (in den Qumrantexten begegnet das Verb z. B. in 4QEnGiants<sup>a</sup> ar [4Q203] 8 12). Die „Königsherrschaft Gottes“ begegnet häufig in den Qumrantexten,<sup>111</sup> aber niemals ist dort, soweit ich sehe, vom (eschatologischen) Kommen der Gottesherrschaft die Rede. Ich konnte eschatologische Gegenwartsaussagen in mehreren Texten der Qumrangemeinde feststellen.<sup>112</sup> Die Untersuchung kann hier nicht auf weitere Qumrantexte ausgedehnt werden. Ich nenne nur zusätzlich einen Text aus 4QH, der erst nach meiner früheren Untersuchung zu den eschatologischen Gegenwartsaussagen bekannt wurde und die damaligen Deutungen bestätigt. Zunächst seien aus den Gemeindeliedern in 1Q/4QH zwei schon damals herangezogene Texte angeführt, die offenbar in Abhängigkeit voneinander entstanden sind, d.h., 1QH<sup>a</sup> XIX, 13–17 (XI, 10–14 Sukenik) scheint 1QH<sup>a</sup> XI, 21–24

<sup>108</sup> H.-W. Kuhn, Enderwartung (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“).

<sup>109</sup> Siehe dazu H.-W. Kuhn, Enderwartung (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), bes. 190–193. Der hier angenommene Q-Wortlaut entspricht Robinson u.a., Critical Edition of Q.

<sup>110</sup> Vgl. Mk 1:15 (par. Mt 4:17); Q 10:9; Lk 10:11.

<sup>111</sup> Siehe oben in Abschnitt 1.

<sup>112</sup> H.-W. Kuhn, Enderwartung (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“).

(III, 20–23 Sukenik) vorauszusetzen.<sup>113</sup> Die Texte stammen aus den beiden fast vollständig erhaltenen Gemeindeliedern 1QH<sup>a</sup> XI, 20–37 (III, 19–36 Sukenik) und 1QH<sup>a</sup> XIX, 6–17 (XI, 3–14 Sukenik).<sup>114</sup> Bei den beiden im Folgenden nebeneinandergestellten Abschnitten (mit jeweils fortlaufendem Text) geht es hinsichtlich der eschatologischen Gegenwartsaussagen um Totenaufstehung (1QH<sup>a</sup> XIX) und um Neuschöpfung (1QH<sup>a</sup> XI und XIX). Die Parallelen in beiden Texten sind durch unterschiedliche Schrift gekennzeichnet (sie gehen aber noch über den hier abgedruckten Text hinaus).

	1QH <sup>a</sup> XI, 21–24 (III, 20–23 Sukenik)	1QH <sup>a</sup> XIX, 13–17 (XI, 10–14 Sukenik)
a		(siehe g) טהרתה אנוש מפשע...
b		...
c		...
d		...
e	...	...

<sup>113</sup> In meiner Untersuchung Enderwartung (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), hatte ich außer den oben genannten Zeilen aus dem Schlusslied von 1Q/4QS und den gleich unten zu besprechenden Liedabschnitten in 1QH<sup>a</sup> XI und XIX noch das Lied 1QH<sup>a</sup> XIX, 18ff. (XI, 15ff. Sukenik) und den Liedabschnitt 1QH<sup>a</sup> VII, 27–38 (XV, 14–25 Sukenik) behandelt (siehe vor allem VII, 29–30 [XV, 16–17 Sukenik]). Der erstere Text in 1QH<sup>a</sup> XIX, 18ff. hat nun Parallelen in 4QH<sup>a,b</sup>; nach Stegemann/Schuller, in DJD 40 (2009), 252 bzw. 110–111, reicht das Lied selbst bis XX, 6 (XII, 3 Sukenik) und der letztere Text in 1QH<sup>a</sup> VII, 27–38 gehöre zu dem Lied VII, 21–VIII, 41 (XV, 8–XVI, 20 Sukenik). Hingewiesen sei auch noch auf 4QAgasCreat B (4Q181) 1 II, 3–4: Einige der „Menschen“ seien bereits auf dem „Platz zum ewigen Leben“ (במעמד לחיי עולם).

<sup>114</sup> Zu den beiden Liedern siehe die Details in H.-W. Kuhn, Enderwartung (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), bes. 44–66 und 78–90 (zur Abhängigkeit der beiden Texte voneinander S. 80–85). Nach Stegemann/Schuller, in DJD 40 (2009), 242–243, reicht das Lied in Kolumne XIX von Z. 6 bis XX, 6; XIX, 18 stelle nur einen Abschnittsanfang dar. Schon formgeschichtliche Gründe legen aber einen Neuanfang in XIX, 18 (Z. 15 Sukenik) nahe (siehe Kuhn, Enderwartung, 94 ff.). Es wäre außerdem die einzige Stelle in den Hodajot, an der mit אודך / אודכה („ich will dich loben“), das in den Hodajot immer als erstes Wort in einer neuen Zeile steht (11- bis 12-mal), nicht auch ein neues Lied anfängt. Könnte der vermeintliche Buchstabenrest vor א nicht ein besonders dunkler Lederfleck sein (wie solche sehr dunklen Stellen im Kontext gleich mehrmals vorhanden sind)? Die Ergänzung <sup>g</sup>[ואנ] am Anfang von Z. 18 ist von diversen Fotografien (!) her (Sukenik- u. Stegemann/Schuller-Ed. bzw. das vergrößerungsfähige Infrarotfoto SHR 4249 in Tov, Electronic Library [s.o. Anm. 4]) paläografisch zwar möglich (anscheinend Buchstabenrest, Größe der Lücke, andernfalls eigentümlich kleine Lücke am Zeilenbeginn), aber die Wendung אודך / אודכה / אודכה ist außerdem in den Hodajot und sog. hodajotähnlichen Texten nicht belegt (die Ergänzung in 4Q511 [4QShir<sup>b</sup>], 28+29, 2 ist äußerst fraglich). In der vorangehenden Zeile gibt es nach dem Ende des Textes, der etwa 40 Prozent der Zeile ausmacht, jedenfalls aufgrund diverser Fotografien, keinen wirklichen Hinweis auf weiteren Text.

Table (cont.)

	1QH <sup>a</sup> XI, 21–24 (III, 20–23 Sukenik)	1QH <sup>a</sup> XIX, 13–17 (XI, 10–14 Sukenik)
f	לאשר יצרתה מעפר לסוד עולם	להרים מעפר תולעת מתים לסוד א[מתכה]
g	ורוח נעוה טהרתה מפשע רב (siehe a)	ומרוח נעוה לבינת[כ]ה
h	...	...
i	...	...
j	עם רוחות דעת (siehe k)...	[[הויה]] כול [הויה] ... [הויה] נהיה
k	להלל שמכה ביחד ר[נ]ה	ועם ידעים ביחד רנה
a		... du hast den Menschen vom Verbrechen gereinigt (siehe g),
b		...
c		...
d		...
e	...	...
f	für den, den du aus dem Staub heraus geschaffen hast für eine ewige Gemeinschaft.	damit du aus dem Staub heraus das Totengewürm zur Gemein- schaft [deiner Wahrheit] erhebst
g	Damit hast du verkehrten Geist von großem Verbrechen gereinigt (siehe a),	und weg von verkehrtem Geist zu deiner Einsich[t]
h	...
i	...
j	... mit den Geistern der Erkenntnis (siehe k),	[...(und)] erneuert zu werden mit allem, was geworden ist (oder: was ist und sein wird)
k	deinen Namen zu preisen in gemeinsamem Jubel	und mit den Wissenden in gemeinsamem Jubel zu sein

In der Diskussion um den Text in 1QH<sup>a</sup> XI ging es vor allem darum, ob יצרתה מעפר („du hast aus dem Staub heraus geschaffen“) an die erste Schöpfung des Menschen bzw. seine Geburt oder an die eschatologische Neuschöpfung zu denken ist, die dann schon mit dem Eintritt in die Gemeinde stattfindet. Diese Deutung hatte bereits Karl Georg Kuhn vor über einem halben Jahrhundert vorgeschlagen.<sup>115</sup> Vom Kontext her, von der theologischen Sprache der Qumrangemeinde her und aufgrund der vermutlichen Parallele in 1QH<sup>a</sup> XIX ist

<sup>115</sup> Karl Georg Kuhn, „Die in Palästina gefundenen hebräischen Texte und das Neue Testament“, ZTK 47 (1950): 192–211: 201 Anm. 7.

eine klare Entscheidung möglich: Die auf Zeile f folgende Zeile in 1QH<sup>a</sup> XI stellt wegen der Inversion des Verbs<sup>116</sup> zweifellos eine Deutung der vorangehenden Zeile dar, d.h., die Schöpfung „aus dem Staub heraus“ wird als Sündenvergebung interpretiert. Bekanntlich ist auch im biblischen und rabbinischen Hebräisch ein „von neuem“ oder „wiederum“ zu ergänzen, wenn der Gedanke der Neuschöpfung verbal ausgedrückt wird.<sup>117</sup> Dass מעפר sich auf das irdische Dasein beziehen kann, ist in den Texten der Qumrangemeinde eindeutig zu belegen (siehe den gleich unten zitierten Text 4QH<sup>a</sup> [4Q427] IV, 8 und ferner 1QM XIV, 14 par. 4QM<sup>a</sup> [4Q491] 8–10 I, 12) und hat schon in der Hebräischen Bibel seine Vorläufer.<sup>118</sup> Vor allem der Text in 1QH<sup>a</sup> VII, 29–30 (XV, 16–17 Sukenik) aus einem Gemeindelied zeigt, dass מעפר „aus dem Staub heraus“ bzw. „weg vom Staub“ und מבשר „weg vom Fleisch“ in der theologischen Sprache der Gemeinde quasi synonym verwendet werden können: ותרם מבשר כבודו „und so hast du (mit dem Eintritt in die Gemeinde) weg vom Fleisch seine Herrlichkeit aufgerichtet“.<sup>119</sup> Neben dem Kontext der in Frage stehenden Wendung und sprachlichen Beobachtungen wird diese Deutung auch durch die vermutliche Parallele in 1QH<sup>a</sup> XIX bestätigt: Der Psalmist in 1QH<sup>a</sup> XIX benutzt das Vokabular der Zeile f in 1QH<sup>a</sup> XI dazu, um von der Totenaufstehung zu sprechen, eine Vorstellung, die nun ebenfalls in einem Qumrantext eindeutig bezeugt ist (siehe den oben zitierten Text 4Q521 2 II, 12). Dass es sich hier ebenfalls um eine Gegenwartsaussage handelt, zeigt wiederum die folgende Zeile, die die Totenaufweckung als Weggang von einem verkehrten Geist zur göttlichen Weisheit deutet, was wie die Sündenvergebung den Eintritt in die Gemeinde beschreibt (vgl. für den Eintritt in die Gemeinde die sog. Heilspferkta in den Gemeindeliedern).<sup>120</sup> Darüber hinaus führt der Psalmist zusätzlich in der Zeile j die Neuschöpfung

<sup>116</sup> Siehe dazu Emil Kautzsch, Wilhelm Gesenius' Hebräische Grammatik (28. Aufl.; Leipzig: Vogel, 1909), § 142; siehe auch H.-W. Kuhn, Enderwartung (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), 21 Anm. 3.

<sup>117</sup> In der Hebräischen Bibel und in der rabbinischen Literatur fehlt ein Wort für „neu“, wenn auf eine Neuschöpfung Bezug genommen wird (z. B. Ps 102:19: עם נברא „das Volk, das [neu] erschaffen wird“).

<sup>118</sup> Siehe H.-W. Kuhn, „Qumran Texts and the Historical Jesus“ (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), bes. die Tabelle auf S. 580.

<sup>119</sup> Siehe zu diesem Lied H.-W. Kuhn, Enderwartung (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), 103–112.

<sup>120</sup> Siehe H.-W. Kuhn, Enderwartung (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), bes. 11.

ein,<sup>121</sup> die zu einer Gemeinschaft mit den Engeln im eschatologischen Jubel führt (Zeile k). Ob man die Auferstehung und die Neuschöpfung mit dem Eintritt in die Gemeinde als reale Erfahrung oder als bildliche Rede versteht, sei einer angemessenen Berücksichtigung des hebräischen Denkens überlassen.<sup>122</sup>

Der oben erwähnte, erst später bekannt gewordene Text ist ein Lied, das am vollständigsten in 4Q erhalten ist: 4QH<sup>a</sup> (4Q427) II, 18–V, 3 (= 3 4–8 I, 3) par. 1QH<sup>a</sup> XXV, 34–XXVII, ca. 3<sup>123</sup> (und weitere Parallelstücke in 4Q). Wie immer das wegen der „Self-Glorification“ des Ich in 4QH<sup>a</sup> III, 6–13 (= 7 I, 6–13) (par. 1QH<sup>a</sup> XXVI, 6–9 und 4QSelf-Glorification Hymn 4Q471b [= 4QH<sup>e</sup>] 1a–d 3–10) schwer zu deutende Lied zu interpretieren ist, in dem gleich zitierten Satz ist jedenfalls allgemein der Qumranfromme gemeint, der die Bezeichnung „Armer“ (אביון) trägt. Der Text in 4QH<sup>a</sup> (4Q427) IV, 7–9 (= 7 II, 7–9) par. 4QH<sup>e</sup> (4Q431) II, 16–18 (= 2 6–8) und 1QH<sup>a</sup> XXVI, 26–28 (= 1QH<sup>a</sup> 7 II, 2–3 [Sukenik]) lautet:

Groß ist Gott, der [Wunderbares] wirkt,
 (8) denn er erniedrigt den hochmütigen Geist(?) gänzlich, aber erhebt aus dem Staub heraus den Armen zur [ewigen Höhe] (וירם מעפר אביון לרום עולם)
 (9) und bis zu den Wolken macht er ihn an Hochsein überlegen, so dass er sich zusammen mit den göttlichen Wesen in einer gemeinsamen Gemeinde befindet.

Die Versetzung des „Armen“ in den Himmel begegnet hier wie auch in 1QH<sup>a</sup> XI, 20–21 (III, 19–20 Sukenik); an der zitierten Stelle ist zusätzlich wichtig, dass die in 1QH<sup>a</sup> XI, 22 (III, 21 Sukenik) im Zusammenhang der Neuschöpfung gebrauchte Wendung „aus dem Staub heraus“ (מעפר) auch hier begegnet, wo natürlich nicht die erste Schöpfung bzw. die Geburt des Menschen gemeint sein kann.

In der besonderen Ausprägung des Verständnisses der Gegenwart, wie es in Gemeindetexten aus Qumran und bei Jesus vorliegt, besteht kein Zusammenhang. Die eschatologisch-gegenwärtigen Aussagen der Qumrantexte gründen in der Heilsgegenwart Gottes auf Grund des Selbstverständnisses der Gemeinde, und sie ist der Ort, an dem schon das künftige Heil präsent ist. Ganz anders bei Jesus: Die Verkündigung der Gegenwart der Königsherrschaft Gottes gründet in dem Anspruch Jesu, dass in seinem Wirken Gottes Herrsein aufgerichtet wird. Ein direkter Zusammenhang zwischen Jesus und der Qumrangemeinde ist hier also nicht gegeben.

<sup>121</sup> Das Hitpael hat hier passivischen Sinn (siehe die ausführliche Begründung in H.-W. Kuhn, Enderwartung [siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“], 84 Anm. 7). Eventuell ist der vorhandene Text wegen eines vielleicht zu ergänzenden Buchstabens am Anfang von Z. 16 (Z. 13 Sukenik), wie oben vorgeschlagen, zu lesen (vgl. 1QM XVII, 5).

<sup>122</sup> Siehe Christoph Barth, Die Errettung vom Tode in den individuellen Klage- und Dankliedern des Alten Testaments (Zollikon, CH: Evangelischer Verlag, 1947).

<sup>123</sup> So Stegemann/Schuller, DJD 40 (2009), 310.

3. Jesus und der Lehrer der Gerechtigkeit

Die äußeren Umstände beider Leben sind sehr verschieden: Der Lehrer der Gerechtigkeit war Priester (4QpPs<sup>a</sup> [4Q171] III, 15; vgl. 1QpHab II, 8) und vielleicht sogar Hohepriester, wie Hartmut Stegemann annahm,<sup>124</sup> während Jesus wohl aus einer einfachen Familie in Nazaret stammt, deren Herkunft aus dem Haus David (Röm 1:3; Mk 10:47–48; 11:10; Mt 1; Lk 1–2 u.a.) historisch nicht zu verifizieren ist (Davidsohnschaft galt für den königlichen Messias, z. B. PsSal 17:21; 4MidrEschat<sup>a</sup> [4Q174 = 4QFlor] III, 11 zu 2. Sam 7:11ff.). Der Lehrer der Gerechtigkeit ist um 110 v. Chr. eines natürlichen Todes gestorben (vgl. CD XIX, 35–XX, 1; XX, 13–14), während Jesus, offenbar von den jüdischen Autoritäten den Römern übergeben, in den Jahren ± 30 gekreuzigt wurde.<sup>125</sup> Es bestehen aber erstaunliche Übereinstimmungen zwischen dem Sendungsbewusstsein Jesu und dem des Lehrers der Gerechtigkeit. Gemäß den eigenen Liedern des Lehrers in den Lobliedern in 1Q/4QH hat Gott dem Lehrer der Gerechtigkeit nicht nur „alle Geheimnisse“ der Propheten „kundgetan“ (1QpHab VII, 4–5), sondern Gott hat ihn „zum Zeichen für die gerechten Erwählten gesetzt“ (1QH<sup>a</sup> X, 15 [II, 13 Sukenik]) und zum „Vater für die Kinder der Gnade“ (XV, 23 [VII, 20 Sukenik]). Der Lehrer der Gerechtigkeit wird „zur Falle für Übeltäter, aber zur Heilung für alle, die von der Sünde umkehren“ (X, 10–11 [II, 8–9 Sukenik]).<sup>126</sup> Dem Selbstbewusstsein des Lehrers der Gerechtigkeit entspricht es, wenn

<sup>124</sup> H. Stegemann, Essener (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), 205–206; zurückhalten-der z. B. VanderKam und Flint, Meaning (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), 284–285.

<sup>125</sup> Vgl. Heinz-Wolfgang Kuhn, „Kreuz II. Neues Testament und frühe Kirche (bis vor Justin)“, TRE 19:713–725, dort 719.

<sup>126</sup> Wer das Ich in dem Liedabschnitt der „Self-Glorification“ in 4QH<sup>a</sup> (4Q427) III, 6–13 (par. 1QH<sup>a</sup> XXVI, 6ff. und 4QSelf-Glorification Hymn [4Q471b = 4QH<sup>et</sup>] 1a–d 3–10) ist, ist meines Erachtens noch nicht geklärt.

Jesus in einem sicherlich in der Grundstruktur authentischen Logion sagt, dass sich an der Stellung ihm gegenüber das Heil entscheidet, weil dies für den künftigen Menschensohn der Maßstab beim Gericht sein wird (siehe in der Spruchquelle die ältere Fassung in Lk 12:8–9 und im Markusevangelium 8:38). Die Städte, die Jesus verwerfen, fallen nach seinen Worten dem Gericht Gottes anheim (Q 10:13–14). Sein Wirken ist bereits der Einbruch der Gottesherrschaft, wie wir in Abschnitt 2.4 gesehen haben. Das Letztere geht über den Anspruch des Lehrers deutlich hinaus.

Der Lehrer der Gerechtigkeit wird zum Gründer einer der bedeutendsten frommen Vereinigungen des damaligen Judentums; Jesus hingegen schart nur am äußersten Rande des damaligen jüdischen Kernlands eine kleine Gruppe von wenigen Leuten um sich und wird dabei zu einem Grenzgänger in die Gaulanitis: Wie schon oben gesagt, lag historisch jedenfalls ein wichtiger Ort seines Wirkens in einem stärker heidnisch bestimmten Gebiet jenseits des Jordan, in der Tetrarchie des Herodessohnes Philippus, genauer Betsaida (siehe vor allem Q 10:13–14). Wie auch schon oben erwähnt, wissen wir von Betsaida zurzeit aufgrund der Ausgrabungen seit 1987 noch nicht genau, wie jüdisch und wie heidnisch der Ort nach der makkabäischen Besetzung und den folgenden politischen Wechselfällen gewesen ist.<sup>127</sup> Abgesehen davon, dass sich Jesus sicherlich auch am östlichen Ufer des Sees Gennesaret aufgehalten hat (im Bereich der Gaulanitis und vielleicht auch der Dekapolis),<sup>128</sup> sind die weiteren Orte und Gebiete nicht mit einiger Sicherheit für Jesus zu verifizieren, am ehesten noch das „Gebiet von Tyrus“ (Mk 7:24), noch weniger sicher die „Dörfer von Caesarea Philippi“ (Mk 8:27).<sup>129</sup>

Mit Jesu Wirken zweifellos nicht vereinbar ist eine Forderung in CD XI, 14–15 (par. 4QD<sup>b</sup> [4Q267] 9 II, 8 und 4QD<sup>f</sup> [4Q271] 5 I, 9),

<sup>127</sup> Für die Gaulanitis und weitere Regionen dort sagt Josephus, Bell. 3:56–58, dass in diesen offenbar für ihn von Juden dominierten Gebieten zu seiner Zeit (2. Hälfte des 1. Jh. n. Chr.) „Juden und Syrer gemischt“ lebten. Siehe auch oben in Abschnitt 2.2.

<sup>128</sup> Das älteste Evangelium nennt die Dekapolis aber nur in einer redaktionellen Formulierung in 7:31 und als Gegend, wo ein Geheilter Jesus verkündigt (5:20, vielleicht identisch mit der Gegend, in der Jesus gemäß 5:1 auftritt). Wäre in 5:1 „Gergesa“ die richtige Lesart, ist vielleicht die südliche Gaulanitis betroffen. Diese massive Wundergeschichte in 5:1–20 lässt sich historisch nicht irgendwie auf Jesus zurückführen.

<sup>129</sup> Vgl. H.-W. Kuhn, „Jesu Hinwendung“, 204–240, bes. 214–215 (Tyrus) und 209–211 (Caesarea Philippi).

man solle „am Sabbat den Ruhetag nicht an einem Ort in der Nähe der Heiden begehen“.<sup>130</sup>

Dem Lehrer der Gerechtigkeit wird zwar von dem „Frevelpriester“ nach dem Leben getrachtet (4QpPs<sup>a</sup> IV, 8; vgl. 1QpHab XI, 4–8), er stirbt aber, wie schon gesagt, offenbar eines natürlichen Todes, während Jesus, wohl ausgeliefert von Autoritäten seines eigenen Volkes, fälschlicherweise als politischer Revolutionär durch den römischen Präfekten über Judäa, Pontius Pilatus, mit der schändlichen Strafe der Kreuzigung zu Tode kommt. Gemäß allen vier kanonischen Evangelien geschah die Übergabe an die Römer unter führender Beteiligung des Hohepriesters Kaiphas. In beiden Fällen gibt es eine Verfolgung durch den Hohepriester: durch den Hohepriester zur Zeit des Lehrers der Gerechtigkeit, wohl Jonathan, bzw. durch den Hohepriester Kaiphas. Das gilt übrigens auch für die Steinigung des Jakobus, des Leiters der Urgemeinde in Jerusalem und Bruders Jesu; hier ist der Verursacher der Hohepriester Ananus, der Jüngere (siehe Josephus, Ant. 20:200). Die sog. Tempelrolle, die voessenisches ist, gibt in 11QT<sup>a</sup> (11Q19) LXIV, 13–20 (6–13 Yadin/Qimron) für das Verständnis eines eventuellen Prozesses vor jüdischen Autoritäten und Jesu Hinrichtung keine Hilfe; 4QSefer ha-Milḥamah (4Q285) 5 spricht auch nicht von einem getöteten oder gar gekreuzigten Messias.

Erstaunlich ist, wie schließlich die Wirkungsgeschichte alles umkehrt: Der Lehrer der Gerechtigkeit hat zunächst für gut einhalb Jahrhunderte ein bedeutendes Nachwirken in seiner hervorragend organisierten Qumrangemeinde (ca. 120 v. Chr. bis 68 n. Chr.) und ihren Niederlassungen. Aus CD VI, 10–11<sup>131</sup> kann man aber nicht auf einen Glauben an seine Wiederkehr schließen.<sup>132</sup> Während das Judentum insgesamt die Katastrophen der beiden jüdischen Kriege im 1. und 2. Jh. n. Chr. überwindet, spielen jedoch der Lehrer der Gerechtigkeit und seine Anhänger nach der Zerstörung der Qumransiedlung im Jahr 68 n. Chr. durch die Römer<sup>133</sup> und dem offenbar baldigen Untergang der Gesamtgemeinde keine Rolle mehr. Jesu Anhänger dagegen beginnen nach seinem Tod sich auf Augenzeugen dafür zu berufen, dass Gott ihn von den Toten auferweckt habe (siehe

<sup>130</sup> In 4QD<sup>e</sup> (4Q270) 6 V, 18 ist aber der ganze Satz ausgelassen.

<sup>131</sup> Zum „Self-Glorification“-Text 4QH<sup>a</sup> III, 6–13 und Parallelen siehe oben in diesem Abschnitt und in Abschnitt 2.4.

<sup>132</sup> Vgl. Jeremias, Lehrer der Gerechtigkeit (siehe „Ausgewählte Literatur“), 283–295.

<sup>133</sup> Zur Datierung siehe den Anfang dieses Beitrags.

besonders die alte Überlieferung in 1. Kor 15:3–5). Christen verstehen ihn von jüdischen Kategorien her unter anderem als Messias (so schon das alte Traditionsstück, das Paulus in Röm 1:3b–4a zitiert),<sup>134</sup> von solchen den Heiden leichter zugänglichen Kategorien als präexistentes göttliches Wesen (so in dem von Paulus bereits übernommenen Christuslied in Phil 2:6–11), und die als jüdische Splittergruppe angetretene Jesusbewegung erfasst bald weithin die ganze damalige Welt, was für Paulus faktisch schon selbstverständlich ist (vgl. nur den Hinweis auf Spanien in Röm 15:24, 28) und vom ältesten Evangelisten als Programm formuliert wird (Mk 13:10; vgl. 14:9).

Ausgewählte Literatur zum Thema

- Becker, Michael. „Die ‚messianische Apokalypse‘ 4Q521 und der Interpretationsrahmen der Taten Jesu,“ in Apokalyptik und Qumran, hrsg. J. Frey und M. Becker, Einblicke 10 (Paderborn: Bonifatius Druck, 2007), 237–303.
- Berger, Klaus. Qumran und Jesus: Wahrheit unter Verschluss? (7. Aufl.; Stuttgart: Quell, 1998); Eng. trans.: The Truth under Lock and Key? Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 1995).
- Betz, Otto, und Rainer Riesner. Jesus, Qumran und der Vatikan: Klarstellungen (6. durchges. Aufl.; Gießen: Brunnen, 1995) = Verschwörung um Qumran? Jesus, die Schriftrollen und der Vatikan (Rastatt: VPM, 1999); unter letzterem Titel auch als Taschenbuch (München: Knauer, 2007); Eng. trans.: Jesus, Qumran and the Vatican: Clarifications (London: SCM, 1994).
- Braun, Herbert. Qumran und das Neue Testament, 2 Bde. (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1966) (bes. Bd. 2, § 5).
- Brooke, George J. „The Scrolls and the Study of the New Testament,“ in The Dead Sea Scrolls at Fifty: Proceedings of the 1997 Society of Biblical Literature Qumran Section Meetings, hrsg. R. A. Kugler und E. M. Schuller, Society of Biblical Literature Early Judaism and Its Literature 15 (Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1999), 61–76 (bes. 72–74).
- . The Dead Sea Scrolls and the New Testament (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2005), bes. S. 19–26: „Jesus, the Dead Sea Scrolls and Scrolls Scholarship.“
- . Qumran and the Jewish Jesus: Reading the New Testament in the Light of the Scrolls, Grove Biblical Series 35 (Cambridge: Grove Books, 2005).
- Broshi, Magen. „Matrimony and Poverty: Jesus and the Essenes,“ in Bread, Wine, Walls and Scrolls, hrsg. M. Broshi, Journal for the Study of the Pseudepigrapha: Supplement Series 36 (London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001), 252–258.
- . „What Jesus Learned from the Essenes: The Blessing of Poverty, the Bane of Divorce,“ Biblical Archaeology Review 30 (2004): 32–37, 64.
- van Cangh, Jean-Marie. „Béatitudes de Qumrân et béatitudes évangéliques: Antériorité de Matthieu sur Luc?“ in Wisdom and Apocalypticism in the Dead Sea Scrolls and in the Biblical Tradition, hrsg. F. García Martínez, Bibliotheca Ephemeridum Theologicarum Lovaniensium 168 (Löwen: Leuven University Press, 2003), 413–425.

<sup>134</sup> Hier wird gesagt, dass Jesus erst mit der Auferstehung zum Gottessohn, d.h. hier zum Messias (!), eingesetzt wird.

- Charlesworth, James H. (Hrsg.), Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls (New York, NY: Doubleday, 1993) (siehe insbesondere die Beiträge von James H. Charlesworth, James G. D. Dunn, Craig A. Evans, Howard C. Kee, Rainer Riesner und Joe Zias).
- . "John the Baptizer, Jesus, and the Essenes," in Caves of Enlightenment: Proceedings of the American Schools of Oriental Research: Dead Sea Scrolls Jubilee Symposium (1947–1997), hrsg. J. H. Charlesworth (North Richland Hills, TX: BIBAL Press, 1998), 75–103.
- . "The Qumran Beatitudes (4Q525) and the New Testament (Mt 5:3–11, Lk 6:20–26)," Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses 80 (2000): 13–35.
- . "John the Baptizer and the Dead Sea Scrolls," in The Scrolls and Christian Origins, hrsg. J. H. Charlesworth, Bd. 3 von The Bible and the Dead Sea Scrolls, hrsg. ders. (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2006), 1–35.
- Collins, John J. "Qumran, Apocalypticism, and the New Testament," in The Dead Sea Scrolls Fifty Years after their Discovery: Proceedings of the Jerusalem Congress, July 20–25, 1997, hrsg. L. H. Schiffman u.a. (Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society, 2000), 133–138.
- . "A Messiah before Jesus?" in Christian Beginnings and the Dead Sea Scrolls, hrsg. J. J. Collins and C. A. Evans (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Academic, 2006), 15–35.
- Davila, James R. "Melchizedek, the 'Youth,' and Jesus," in The Dead Sea Scrolls as Background to Postbiblical Judaism and Early Christianity, hrsg. J. R. Davila, Studies on the Texts of the Desert of Judah 46 (Leiden: Brill, 2003), 248–274.
- Doering, Lutz. "Marriage and Creation in Mark 10 and CD 4–5," in Echoes from the Caves: Qumran and the New Testament, hrsg. F. García Martínez, Studies on the Texts of the Desert of Judah 85 (Leiden: Brill, 2009), 133–163.
- Donaldson, Terence L. "Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls: Context," in Whose Historical Jesus?, hrsg. W. E. Arnal und M. Desjardins, Studies in Christianity and Judaism 7 (Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1997), 188–189.
- Dunn, James D. G. "Jesus and Ritual Purity: A study of the tradition history of Mk 7, 15," in À Cause de L'Évangile: Études sur les Synoptiques et les Actes offertes au P. Jacques Dupont, O.S.B. à l'occasion de son 70<sup>e</sup> anniversaire, Lectio Divina 123 (Paris: Cerf, 1985), 251–276.
- Elliott, Mark Adam. "Retribution and Agency in the Dead Sea Scrolls and the Teaching of Jesus," in Sacred Scriptures, Ideology, and Violence, hrsg. J. H. Ellens, Bd. 1 von The Destructive Power of Religion: Violence in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, hrsg. ders. (Westport, CT: Praeger, 2004), 207–231.
- Enste, Stefan. Kein Markustext in Qumran: Eine Untersuchung der These: Qumran-Fragment 7Q5 = Mk 6, 52–53, Novum Testamentum et Orbis Antiquus 45 (Freiburg, CH: Universitätsverlag, 2000).
- Evans, Craig A. "Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls from Qumran Cave 4," in Eschatology, Messianism, and the Dead Sea Scrolls, hrsg. C. A. Evans und P. W. Flint, (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1997), 91–100.
- . "Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls," in The Dead Sea Scrolls after Fifty Years, hrsg. P. W. Flint und J. C. VanderKam (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 2.573–598.
- . "Diarchic Messianism in the Dead Sea Scrolls and the Messianism of Jesus of Nazareth," in The Dead Sea Scrolls Fifty Years after their Discovery: Proceedings of the Jerusalem Congress, July 20–25, 1997, hrsg. L. H. Schiffman u.a. (Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society, 2000), 558–567.
- . "The New Quest for Jesus and the New Research on the Dead Sea Scrolls," in Jesus, Mark and Q: The Teaching of Jesus and its Earliest Records, hrsg. M. Labahn und A. Schmidt, Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 214 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001), 163–183.
- . "Jesus, John, and the Dead Sea Scrolls: Assessing Typologies of Restoration," in Christian Beginnings and the Dead Sea Scrolls, hrsg. J. J. Collins und C. A. Evans, (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Academic, 2006), 45–62.
- Falchetta, Alessandro. "The Logion of Matthew 11:5–6 par. from Qumran to Abgar," Revue Biblique 110 (2003): 222–248.

- Fitzmyer, Joseph A. The Dead Sea Scrolls and Christian Origins (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2000) (siehe "Index of Subjects" unter "Jesus").
- Flusser, David. Jesus—Qumran—Urchristentum, Bd. 2 von Entdeckungen im Neuen Testament, hrsg. M. Majer (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener, 1999).
- Flusser, David, with R. Steven Notley. With an Introduction by James H. Charlesworth. The Sage from Galilee: Rediscovering Jesus' Genius (4th ed. of Jesus; Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2007; siehe "Index of Subjects" unter "Essenes").
- Freeborn, Jack. "Jesus and Sectarian Judaism," in Studia Biblica 1978, II: Papers on the Gospels, hrsg. E. A. Livingstone, Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 2 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1980), 95–109.
- Frey, Jörg. „Zur Bedeutung der Qumran-Funde für das Verständnis des Neuen Testaments,“ in Qumran—Bibelwissenschaften—Antike Judaistik, hrsg. U. Dahmen u.a., Einblicke 9 (Paderborn: Bonifatius Druck, 2006), 33–65.
- . "The Impact of the Dead Sea Scrolls on New Testament Interpretation: Proposals, Problems, and Further Perspectives," in The Scrolls and Christian Origins, hrsg. J. H. Charlesworth, Bd. 3 von The Bible and the Dead Sea Scrolls, hrsg. ders. (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2006), 407–461.
- Harrington, Daniel J. "Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls," in Jesus: A Colloquium in the Holy Land, hrsg. D. Donnelly (New York, NY: Continuum, 2001), 27–44.
- Hengel, Martin. „Jesus der Messias Israels,“ in ders. und A. M. Schwemer, Der messianische Anspruch Jesu und die Anfänge der Christologie: Vier Studien, Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 138 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001), 1–80 (bes. 34–45).
- Hengel, Martin, und Anna M. Schwemer. Jesus und das Judentum, Geschichte des frühen Christentums 1 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2007).
- Horsley, Richard A. "The Dead Sea Scrolls and the Historical Jesus," in The Scrolls and Christian Origins, hrsg. J. H. Charlesworth, Bd. 3 von The Bible and the Dead Sea Scrolls, hrsg. ders. (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2006), 37–60.
- Jeremias, Gert. Der Lehrer der Gerechtigkeit, Studien zur Umwelt des Neuen Testaments 2 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1963), bes. 319–353.
- Kazen, Thomas. Jesus and Purity Halakhah: Was Jesus Indifferent to Impurity? Coniectanea Biblica: New Testament Series 38 (Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell International, 2002).
- Kister, Menahem. "Divorce, Reproof, and Other Sayings in the Synoptic Gospels: Jesus Traditions in the Context of 'Qumranic' and Other Texts," in Text, Thought, and Practice in Qumran and Early Christianity: Proceedings of the Ninth International Symposium of the Orion Center for the Study of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Associated Literature, Jointly Sponsored by the Hebrew University Center for the Study of Christianity, 11–13 January, 2004, hrsg. R. A. Clements und D. R. Schwartz, Studies on the Texts of the Desert of Judah 84 (Leiden: Brill, 2009), 195–229.
- Koch, Klaus. „Gegenwart und Zukunft des Reiches Gottes im Alten Testament sowie in hebräischen und aramäischen Texten um die Zeitenwende,“ in Apokalyptik und Qumran, hrsg. J. Frey und M. Becker, Einblicke 10 (Paderborn: Bonifatius Druck, 2007), 123–167.
- Kuhn, Heinz-Wolfgang. Enderwartung und gegenwärtiges Heil: Untersuchungen zu den Gemeindefiedern von Qumran mit einem Anhang über Eschatologie und Gegenwart in der Verkündigung Jesu, Studien zur Umwelt des Neuen Testaments 4 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1966), bes. 189–204: „Eschatologie und Gegenwart in der Verkündigung Jesu.“
- . "Qumran Texts and the Historical Jesus: Parallels in Contrast," in The Dead Sea Scrolls Fifty Years after their Discovery: Proceedings of the Jerusalem Congress, July 20–25, 1997, hrsg. L. H. Schiffman u.a. (Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society, 2000), 573–580.
- . "Jesus," in Encyclopedia of the Dead Sea Scrolls, hrsg. L. H. Schiffman und J. C. VanderKam, 2 Bde. (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000), 1.404–408.

- . „Jesus vor dem Hintergrund der Qumrangemeinde,“ in Grenzgänge: Menschen und Schicksale zwischen jüdischer, christlicher und deutscher Identität: Festschrift für Diethard Aschoff, hrsg. F. Siegert, Münsteraner Judaistische Studien 11 (Münster: Lit, 2002), 50–60.
- Kvalbein, Hans. „Die Wunder der Endzeit: Beobachtungen zu 4Q521 und Matth 11,5p,“ Zeitschrift für die Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der Älteren Kirche 88 (1997): 111–125.
- Lichtenberger, Hermann. „Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls,“ in Hillel and Jesus: Comparative Studies of Two Major Religious Leaders, hrsg. J. H. Charlesworth und L. L. Johns (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1997), 389–396.
- . „Messiasvorstellungen in Qumran und die neutestamentliche Christologie,“ Communio Viatorum 44 (2002): 139–160; Eng. trans.: „Qumran-Messianism,“ in Emanuel: Studies in Hebrew Bible, Septuagint and the Dead Sea Scrolls in Honor of Emanuel Tov, hrsg. S. M. Paul u.a., Supplements to Vetus Testamentum 94 (Leiden: Brill, 2003), 323–333.
- . „Makarismen in den Qumrantexten und im Neuen Testament,“ in Wisdom and Apocalypticism in the Dead Sea Scrolls and the Biblical Tradition, hrsg. F. García Martínez, Bibliotheca Ephemeridum Theologicarum Lovaniensium 168 (Löwen: Leuven University Press, 2003), 395–411.
- . „Qumran and the New Testament,“ in The Changing Face of Judaism, Christianity, and Other Greco-Roman Religions in Antiquity, hrsg. I. H. Henderson und G. S. Oegema unter Mitarbeit von S. Parks Ricker, Studien zu den Jüdischen Schriften aus hellenistisch-römischer Zeit 2 (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 2006), 103–129.
- . „Schöpfung und Ehe in Texten aus Qumran sowie Essenerberichten und die Bedeutung für das Neue Testament,“ in Judaistik und neutestamentliche Wissenschaft: Standorte – Grenzen – Beziehungen, hrsg. L. Doering u.a., Forschungen zur Religion und Literatur des Alten und Neuen Testaments 226 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2008), 279–288.
- . „Demonology in the Dead Sea Scrolls and the New Testament,“ in Text, Thought, and Practice in Qumran and Early Christianity: Proceedings of the Ninth International Symposium of the Orion Center for the Study of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Associated Literature, Jointly Sponsored by the Hebrew University Center for the Study of Christianity, 11–13 January, 2004, hrsg. R. A. Clements und D. R. Schwartz, Studies on the Texts of the Desert of Judah 84 (Leiden: Brill, 2009), 267–280.
- Meier, John P. „The Historical Jesus and the Historical Law: Some Problems within the Problem,“ The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 65 (2003): 52–79.
- . „The Historical Jesus and the Historical Sabbath,“ in Redefining First-Century Jewish and Christian Identities: Essays in Honor of Ed Parish Sanders, hrsg. F. E. Udoh u.a., Christianity and Judaism in Antiquity Series 16 (Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 2008), 297–307.
- Niebuhr, Karl-Wilhelm. „Die Werke des eschatologischen Freudenboten (4Q521 und die Jesusüberlieferung),“ in The Scriptures in the Gospels, hrsg. C. M. Tuckett, Bibliotheca Ephemeridum Theologicarum Lovaniensium 131 (Löwen: Leuven University Press, 1997), 637–646.
- Novakovic, Lidija. „4Q521: The Works of the Messiah or the Signs of the Messianic Time?“ in Qumran Studies: New Approaches, New Questions, hrsg. M. T. Davis und B. A. Strawn (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2007), 208–231.
- O’Neill, John C. Review of Israel Knohl, The Messiah before Jesus: The Suffering Servant of the Dead Sea Scrolls. Dead Sea Discoveries 8 (2001): 315–318.
- Philonenko, Marc. „Les paroles de Jésus contre ‚cette génération‘ et la tradition qoumrânienne,“ in Frühes Christentum, hrsg. H. Lichtenberger, Bd. 3 von Geschichte—Tradition—Reflexion: Festschrift für Martin Hengel zum 70. Geburtstag, hrsg. H. Cancik u.a. (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1996), 89–96.
- . „Marc 1,15a et 4Q215a: La préhistoire esséno-qoumrânienne d’une proclamation eschatologique,“ Revue d’histoire et de philosophie religieuse 80 (2000): 213–220.

- Pixner, Bargil. "Jesus and his Community: Between Essenes and Pharisees," in Hillel and Jesus: Comparative Studies of Two Major Religious Leaders, hrsg. J. H. Charlesworth und L. L. Johns (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1997), 193–224 (bes. S. 213–224, sehr spekulativ).
- Puech, Émile. "Les manuscrits de la mer Morte et le Nouveau Testament," in Qumrân et les Manuscrits de la mer Morte: Un cinquantenaire, hrsg. E.-M. Laperrousaz (Paris: Cerf, 1997), 253–313.
- . "Les manuscrits de la mer Morte et le Nouveau Testament," in Aux origines du christianisme, hrsg. P. Geoltrain (Paris: Gallimard et le Monde de la Bible, 2000), 157–167 (= andere und kürzere Fassung gegenüber dem vorhergehenden Eintrag).
- Rietz, Henry W. M. "Reflections on Jesus' Eschatology in Light of Qumran," in Jesus and Archaeology, hrsg. J. H. Charlesworth (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2006), 186–205.
- Schremer, Adiel. "Qumran Polemic on Marital Law: CD 4:20–5:11 and Its Social Background," in The Damascus Document. A Centennial of Discovery: Proceedings of the Third International Symposium of the Orion Center for the Study of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Associated Literature, 4–8 February, 1998, hrsg. J. M. Baumgarten u.a., Studies on the Texts of the Desert of Judah 34 (Leiden: Brill, 2000), 147–160.
- Schwemer, Anna Maria. „Gott als König und seine Königsherrschaft in den Sabbatliedern aus Qumran,“ in Königsherrschaft Gottes und himmlischer Kult im Judentum, Urchristentum und in der hellenistischen Welt, hrsg. M. Hengel und A. M. Schwemer, Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 55 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1991), 45–118.
- Söding, Thomas. „Feindeshaß und Bruderliebe: Beobachtungen zur essenischen Ethik,“ Revue de Qumran 16 (Nr. 64, 1995): 601–619.
- Stegemann, Hartmut. "The 'Teacher of Righteousness' and Jesus: Two Types of Religious Leadership in Judaism at the Turn of the Era," in Jewish Civilization in the Hellenistic-Roman Period, hrsg. S. Talmon, Journal for the Study of the Pseudepigrapha: Supplement Series 10 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1991 = [außerhalb einer Reihe] Philadelphia, PA: Trinity Press International, 1991), 196–213.
- . "Jesus and the Teacher of Righteousness: Similarities and Differences," Bible Review 10 (1994): 42–47, 63.
- . Die Essener, Qumran, Johannes der Täufer und Jesus, Nachwort von Gert Jeremias (10. Aufl.; Freiburg: Herder, 2007), bes. 314–352; Eng. trans.: The Library of Qumran: On Essenes, Qumran, John the Baptist, and Jesus (Leiden: Brill, 1998), bes. 228–257.
- VanderKam, James C., und Peter Flint. The Meaning of the Dead Sea Scrolls: Their Significance for Understanding the Bible, Judaism, Jesus, and Christianity (San Francisco, CA: HarperSanFrancisco, 2002), bes. 321–345; Flint, "Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls: The Gospels and Qumran."
- Vermes, Geza. "Eschatological World View in the Dead Sea Scrolls and in the New Testament," in Emanuel: Studies in Hebrew Bible, Septuagint, and Dead Sea Scrolls in Honor of Emanuel Tov, hrsg. S. M. Paul u.a., Supplements to Vetus Testamentum 94 (Leiden: Brill, 2003), 479–494 (bes. 488–490).
- . Searching for the Real Jesus: Jesus, the Dead Sea Scrolls and Other Religious Themes (London: SCM Press, 2010).
- Wassen, Cecilia. "Jesus and the Hemorrhaging Woman in Mark 5:24–34: Insights from Purity Laws from the Dead Sea Scrolls," in Scripture in Transition: Essays on Septuagint, Hebrew Bible, and Dead Sea Scrolls in Honour of Raija Sollamo, hrsg. A. Voitila und J. Jokiranta, Supplements to the Journal for the Study of Judaism 126 (Leiden: Brill, 2008), 641–660.
- Webb, Robert L. "John the Baptist," in Encyclopedia of the Dead Sea Scrolls, hrsg. L. H. Schiffman und J. C. VanderKam, 2 Bde. (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000), 1.418–421.
- Wilcox, Max. "Jesus in the Light of his Jewish Environment," Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt, Part 2: Principat, 25.1., hrsg. W. Haase (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1982), 131–195, bes. 164–169.

JESUS WITHOUT Q

MICHAEL GOULDER*

Accounts of the historical Jesus have to be based on two foundations, supposed sources and proposed criteria. It is my conviction that one main source normally assumed, Q, never existed; and that some of the criteria normally employed are invalid. In this essay I therefore offer a different point of view; but before I do so I should say something to excuse my unorthodoxy.

1. Q: the Standard Theory and the Farrer Theory

There are in practice only two horses running in the synoptic race, the Standard Two-Source Theory and the Farrer Theory.<sup>1</sup> They are agreed that Mark wrote first, and that his gospel was known to Matthew and Luke. Matthew and Luke have some two hundred further verses in common: Farrer thought that Luke took these over from Matthew as the most congenial part of the latter's material; while the Standard Theory supposes that they both took them from a lost source, Q. The Q hypothesis is vulnerable on two counts: it is implausible in face of the Minor Agreements (MAs), and it is involved in self-contradiction.

There are more than a thousand small changes which Matthew makes to Mark, and which Luke also makes. Some of these are striking, because the change is typical of Matthew but untypical of Luke: this might then suggest that Luke took the change over from Matthew.<sup>2</sup> For instance:

---

* Michael Daylas Gouldner (1927–2010).

<sup>1</sup> So called from its proposal by A. M. Farrer in an essay, "On Dispensing with Q," in Studies in the Gospels: Essays in Memory of R. H. Lightfoot, ed. D. E. Nineham (Oxford: Blackwell, 1957), 55–88.

<sup>2</sup> The Minor Agreements have been a recognized problem for the Standard Theory since the nineteenth century. J. C. Hawkins, Horae Synopticae (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1899), 208 invented the term. The criteria for evaluating them, outlined here, were suggested by me in "On Putting Q to the Test," NTS 24 (1978), with twelve examples. These have been criticized and further discussed in G. Strecker, ed., Minor Agreements: Symposium Göttingen 1991, GTA 50 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck &

Matt 22:27 ὕστερον δὲ πάντων ἀπέθανεν ἡ γυνή.
 Mark 12:22 ἔσχατον πάντων καὶ ἡ γυνή ἀπέθανεν.
 Luke 20:32 ὕστερον καὶ ἡ γυνή ἀπέθανεν.

Matthew's change from ἔσχατον to ὕστερον is characteristic: he uses the word six times elsewhere in his gospel, introducing it in a Markan context also at 21:37. But ὕστερον is uncharacteristic of Luke; he never uses it elsewhere in Luke-Acts. So it looks as if Luke is following Mark in the Markan context, but inserts the ὕστερον by a reminiscence of Matthew. There is a sufficient number of such striking MAs to cast severe doubt on the Q theory. The most notorious case is at Mark 14:65, where both Matthew and Luke add the same five words in the same order to Mark's taunt, "Prophecy!," τίς ἐστὶν ὁ παίσις σε; The verb παίειν is a hapax in both Matthew and Luke.<sup>3</sup> Naturally Luke's use of Matthew does not disprove the existence of Q, but it makes Q redundant: entities should not be multiplied beyond what is necessary.

But the Q theory is not only in this way implausible; it is also self-contradictory.<sup>4</sup> The method by which Q-scholars reconstruct Q is again by isolating Matthew's and Luke's characteristic styles. For instance, Matthew frequently writes "the kingdom of heaven" and "my/your Father in heaven," phrases which hardly ever occur, if at all, in Mark or Luke. So if these expressions come in a Q passage, and Luke has "the kingdom of God" or "my/your Father," it is taken that Luke has retained the Q form, and Matthew has adapted it to his own style, which was different from Q's.

However among the typical Matthaean phrases are a number of striking instances which also occur once in "Q," i.e. in the parallel text of Luke. These include "There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth," "O ye of little faith," "you offspring of vipers." But there are more wide-ranging things. For example, there are ten instances in the gospels of double animal symbols, like "Be ye wise as serpents and Ruprecht, 1993). For a recent comment see M. S. Goodacre, The Case against Q (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2001), 152–169.

---

<sup>3</sup> A defence of the Standard Theory was offered by F. Neirynck, "ΤΙΣ ΕΣΤΙΝ Ο ΠΑΙΣΙΑΣ ΣΕ. (Mat. 26,68/Luk. 22,64 (diff. Mk. 14,65)), ETL 63 (1987): 5–47: that the story in Matthew does not make logical sense, and all witnesses must go back to an early corruption. I have defended the coherence of the Matthaean account in "Two Significant Minor Agreements (Mat. 4:13 Parr.; Mat. 26:67–68 Parr.)," NovT 45 (2003): 366–373.

<sup>4</sup> M. D. Goulder, "Self-Contradiction in the IQP," JBL 118 (1999): 506–517.

harmless as doves”; all of these come in Matthew, and three of them in “Q,” i.e. in parallel texts in Luke; but not in Mark or “L” or John. So it seems that over a considerable area Matthew’s style and Q’s are very similar. So at the least there is a contradiction in the method of reconstructing Q: when Matthew and Luke differ in Q-passages, it is taken that Matthew’s style is different from Q’s; but when the wording is the same, that has to be Q’s wording, which is then very similar to Matthew’s. Another view (of mine) would be that Q and Matthew were the same person, or in other words that Matthew was the author of the Q material, and that Luke copied it, edited it, and reordered it, as Farrer said.

2. Criteria

All criteria for accounts of Jesus are theory-laden. The multiple source criterion assumes the existence of Q and other lost traditions. Aramaic retranslations assume verbatim memories. Dissimilarity criteria presuppose Jesus’ originality over against Judaism, and the church’s invariable development of Jesus’ message.<sup>5</sup> I have accepted two widely approved criteria, and adopted a third one of my own. (i) Any account must be coherent. (ii) We may cautiously trust anything told us incidentally. (iii) I have argued elsewhere that there were two missions in the early church, one headed by the “pillars” in Jerusalem, and the other by Paul.<sup>6</sup> While it is easy to see motives for development by followers of Paul like Mark and John, who might wish to think that Jesus agreed with Paul, it is likely that in general the Jerusalem church maintained a continuity with the teaching of Jesus.

For our purposes the gospels are central. Mark is strongly Pauline. He is very critical of Jesus’ family (3:21, 31–35; 6:4), and rather critical of the Twelve, and especially of Peter and the sons of Zebedee; he supports Paul’s position on such matters as Sabbath and the food-laws. These positions are all softened by both Matthew and Luke, both of whom retain Pauline emphases like the cross and (some form of) incarnation. They are thus both concerned to bridge the gap between the two missions, from their different angles, Matthew more Jewish, Luke more Gentile. Insofar as Matthew “re-judaizes” Jesus, his version of events is often interesting.<sup>7</sup> John is an ultra-Pauline, who has tried to write an account of Jesus assuming the Incarnation; hence Ernst Käsemann’s Jesus who is God striding over the earth and walking an inch above the ground.<sup>8</sup> I take it that John has developed the synoptic tradition for polemical purposes (against “the Jews,” and especially the Jewish-Christians), and that we get only incidental help from his gospel.

---

<sup>5</sup> These criteria are widely cited; for instance by Paula Fredriksen, From Jesus to Christ (New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1988), 5–6; or more fully in J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew, I (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 168–184. For a careful account of criteria in using Q for reconstructing a life of Jesus see J. S. Kloppenborg, “The Sayings-Gospel, Q, and the Historical Jesus”, HTR 89 (1996): 307–344.

<sup>6</sup> M. D. Goulder, A Tale of Two Missions (London: SCM, 1994; US edition St Paul versus St Peter, Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1995); Paul and the Competing Mission in Corinth (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2001).

This perspective gives us the basis for a criterion to assess the gospel traditions. If Mark gives a Pauline picture of Jesus, we shall suspect it. If he gives a non-Pauline picture, it will look like undigested tradition, and so to be cautiously credited. In general what goes against the grain of an author’s thought is to be treated seriously; anything he finds embarrassing is probably true.

3. John the Baptist

Josephus includes a brief paragraph on John the Baptist, which confirms the gospel accounts on two points.<sup>9</sup> John’s ministry was a success. He drew large crowds and was taken seriously enough for Herod to execute him; Josephus gives him more notice than he does to Jesus, even if we credit the testimonium. Secondly, his preaching was

---

<sup>7</sup> This means that in practice the Matthaean form of the Q-material does sometimes have its place in the picture, though I have argued that virtually all the non-Markan matter in Matthew is Matthew’s own expansion of Mark, Paul or Old Testament texts: see my Midrash and Lection in Matthew (London: SPCK, 1974). Matthew was thus assimilating the Jesus tradition to the background in Judaism to which Jesus belonged historically. Similarly the “L” and “Q” material in Luke is almost all Luke’s own creation from matter in Matthew, especially the Lukan parables: see my Luke: A New Paradigm, JSNTSup 20 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1989).

<sup>8</sup> Expounded in his The Testament of Jesus, OTL (London: SCM, 1968 = Jesu letzte Wille nach Johannes 17, 1966), ch. 2, “Glory.”

<sup>9</sup> Ant. 18:117–119. English version and comments in E. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus (175 BC to AD 135), new English edition ed. by G. Vermes and F. Millar (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1973–1987), 1:345.

distinctive in requiring baptism: he was known as John the Baptist, or Baptizer.

Josephus produces a hellenized version of the meaning of baptism, but there is no doubt of its significance for John. Judaism, both mainstream and Essene, prescribed various repeatable lustrations, but John's was a once-for-all rite, a "baptism of repentance for the remission of sins" (Mark 1:4). He proclaimed that the kingdom of heaven was at hand (Matt 3:2), and this would mean judgement for all. Matthew provides a sparkling version of this message (3:7–10, 12), albeit in highly Matthaean phrasing. Such a threatening approach would fit well with the demand for baptism, which would constitute a passport to the coming kingdom.<sup>10</sup> Baptism washed away past sins, and genuineness of repentance must be shown by future righteousness. The themes of judgement and salvation thus cohere with baptism as an eschatological sacrament.

Biblical prophecy had foretold a ministry such as John's: Mal 3:23 said, "Behold, I send you Elijah the prophet before the great and terrible day of the Lord." Mark understood this text to refer to John. At 1:2 he cites the similar Mal 3:1 as speaking of John, "Behold, I send my messenger..." At 1:4–6 he says that John appeared (ἐγένετο), and that he was clothed in camel hair and a leather belt round his loins: this is the same garb which Elijah wore in 2 Kgs 1:8, shortly before he was assumed into heaven. Mark is thus portraying John as Elijah redivivus. At 9:11–13 he specifically says that John was the coming Elijah. The same identification is made by Matthew (11:14), but is made ambiguous by Luke (1:17), and is denied in the Fourth Gospel (John 1:21).

The Fourth Gospel's steady anti-Baptist polemic suggests that John's disciples were an increasing threat by the end of the century; but it is less easy to be sure of Mark's tendency over John. He wants to exalt the Baptist as the initiator of the Christian movement, but he wants even more to diminish him as inferior to Jesus. The latter concern is evident. He amends his Mal 3:1 citation to have John go not before God's face but before Jesus', and to prepare Jesus' way; and he reduces John's preaching to a statement of his own inferiority, and that of his baptism, in view of the mightier coming Jesus.

---

<sup>10</sup> Many scholars insist that the Greek ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ should be translated "the reign of God," and often this seems justified; but other texts speak of entering the βασιλεία, and similar expressions, for which "kingdom" would be more suitable. I have used both renderings.

This may suggest that John's position of destiny as the prophesied Elijah is not the invention of the Markan church but was how John saw himself. The fact that people imagined Jesus to be the coming Elijah (Mark 6:15; 8:28) shows the idea to have been current. There are few texts in the Old Testament about a prophet of the end, and Mal 3:23 is obtrusive, both by its colourfulness and by its prominence at the very end of the Twelve (Prophets). It was a well-known text in contemporary Judaism.<sup>11</sup> Of course John did not think he had descended from heaven wearing ninth-century BCE clothes: he felt himself called to proclaim the imminent Judgement, and inferred from scripture that he was the destined Elijah.<sup>12</sup>

John's baptism was for the remission of sin, and Jesus will have accepted his message and his baptism as a means to the forgiveness of his own sins. This is confirmed by the universal embarrassment which the baptism causes. Mark turns it into the moment of revelation for Jesus' own destiny (1:9–11); Matthew has John object, and Jesus respond with the obscure explanation that they are fulfilling all righteousness (3:14–17); Luke somehow manages to have John arrested before he can perform the baptism (3:20); the Fourth Gospel does not mention Jesus' baptism at all (John 1:32).

4. John's Disciples

We hear incidentally a number of times of John's disciples, and the Fourth Gospel tells us that Andrew and probably Peter were among them (John 1:35–41). There is no obvious tendency behind the allegation, and it should be credited. What is not said by any evangelist is that Jesus became one of John's disciples, and there is a transparent motive for such silence—a disciple is not greater than his master. But Jesus' discipleship is plainly implied by Mark. After his baptism Mark keeps him safely in the desert for forty days, but it is not until John's arrest that he comes into Galilee: where has he been in the meantime? He has been with John's community by the Jordan.<sup>13</sup> When their master is removed, part of the group moves for safety to Capernaum, the home of Simon and Andrew, where Jesus becomes their new leader. A rump remained by the Jordan, and became "John's disciples."

<sup>11</sup> Sir 48:10; Pseudo-Philo, L.A.B. 48:1; Sib. Or. 5:187–189, 194–202.

<sup>12</sup> M. Öhler, "The Expectation of Elijah and the Presence of the Kingdom of God," JBL 118 (1999): 461–476, argues for historicity because John's diet of locusts and wild honey was not mentioned in 2 Kings.

Jesus' movement is shown to be continuous with John's by the universal practice of once-for-all baptism in the church. The synoptists do not mention Jesus baptizing, because again they wish to pass over in silence any suggestion of his being John's follower. The Fourth Gospel refers to it with some embarrassment at John 4:1–2: Jesus did not baptize himself, only his disciples. But all branches of the church regarded baptism as essential, a passport to salvation; and this must have been taken over from Jesus, and ultimately from John.

On the position of John, the least defensive evangelist is Matthew, and the most likely to be historical. He makes John's preaching and Jesus' virtually identical. John said, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt 3:2), and Jesus says the same at Matt 4:17. John's colourful abuse in 3:7–12—offspring of vipers, trees cast in the fire, corn gathered in the barn—all recur in Jesus' mouth later in the gospel. Matthew sets the two men side by side at 11:16–19, with "this generation" rejecting both: John was an ascetic and proclaimed judgement followed by salvation; Jesus was a convivial type who proclaimed salvation followed by judgement. But Matthew himself is quite clear that the two are not in the same league. John is the last and greatest of the prophets, but his place in heaven is dubious (11:11–14); Jesus is the Son of God.

5. The Kingdom of God

Jesus' proclamation is understood in the synoptics in terms of the later chapters in Isaiah. Mark says that John's mission was the beginning of the gospel (εὐαγγέλιον), recalling the εὐαγγελιζόμενος of Isa LXX 40:9; 52:7; and the descent of the Spirit on Jesus suggests a particular reference to Isa LXX 61:1, "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, therefore he has sent me to bring good news (εὐαγγελίσασθαι) to the poor.” Mark cites Isa 40:3 as a prophecy of John’s crying in the wilderness. He gives Jesus’ first words as “The time (καιρός) is fulfilled. The kingdom of God has drawn near (ἤγγικεν). Repent and believe the gospel (εὐαγγέλιον)” (1:15). The good news proclaimed in Isa LXX 52:7 is of the reign of God: “Your God βασιλεύσει.” Isa LXX 56:1 says, ἤγγισεν γὰρ τὸ σωτήριόν μου. Isa LXX 60:22, the verse before 61:1, says that God will gather his people κατὰ καιρόν. Matthew makes Jesus open his preaching (5:3–4) with blessings on the poor (in spirit) and the mourners, echoing Isa 61:1–2; and Luke makes Jesus preach his first sermon at Nazareth on the same text (4:18–19).

---

<sup>13</sup> So, hesitantly, G. Theissen and A. Merz, The Historical Jesus (London: SCM, 1997), 209.

There is thus a united but varied tradition that Jesus’ message was a proclamation of the kingdom of God. What is initially less clear is whether Jesus thought it was at the gates or had actually arrived; ἤγγικεν is ambiguous. With his catalogue of healing miracles, it would seem that he must have seen God’s reign as already in action, and Matthew again puts this into words, “If I by the Spirit of God cast out demons, then the kingdom of God has arrived upon you” (12:28);<sup>14</sup> again there was Isaiah’s word for the healings in Isa 35:5–6.

That this was in fact Jesus’ understanding is confirmed by an alteration in 1 Corinthians. There Paul reproaches sarcastically those “of Cephas” (1:12), who “boast of men” (3:21; 4:6; i.e. that their leader was Jesus’ chief disciple), “Already you are sated! Already you are enriched! Without us you have begun to reign (ἐβασίλευσατε)” (4:8). 4:20 shows that the “reigning” is in the supposed reign of God, “For the βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ is not in talk but in power.” Paul returns to the same issue over the resurrection at 15:50, “Flesh and blood cannot inherit God’s kingdom.” Jerusalem Christians, claiming Peter’s authority, think that God’s reign is here already, and that they should give up work (4:12; 1 Thess 2:9; 2 Thess 3:11), and generally behave unrealistically; but to Paul this is just talk, God’s reign will begin with the Last Trump. Matthew includes Jesus’ realized view at 12:28 (above), but he inserts his own (Pauline) position in his ideal Prayer, “Thy kingdom come!”<sup>15</sup> at 16:28, and in the parables of Matthew 24–25.

<sup>14</sup> 4Q521 expects Isa 35:3–5 and 62:1–2 to be fulfilled with the coming of Messiah; Theissen and Merz, Historical Jesus, 212.

<sup>15</sup> For Matthew as the author of the Lord’s Prayer, see M. D. Goulder, “The Composition of the Lord’s Prayer,” JTS 14 (1964): 32–45; for the realized eschatology

6. Jesus as a Prophet

John was a prophet, and if Jesus took over the leadership of his movement, Jesus will have seen himself as a prophet also. This is latent in the late-Isaiah texts which have been cited above, especially Isa 61:1: the speaker is a prophet on whom the Spirit has come for him to proclaim the gospel. There was no Jewish tradition that Elijah would be followed by Messiah.<sup>16</sup> Mark himself thinks that Jesus was the Son of God (1:1; 15:39), and has the heavenly voice reveal this to him at 1:11, “Thou art my beloved Son; in thee I am well pleased” (σὺ εἶ ὁ υἱός μου ὁ ἀγαπητός, ἐν σοὶ εὐδόκησα). “Thou art my son” comes in Ps 2:7, but the remainder seems to echo Isa 42:1, “Here is my servant...in whom my soul delights.” This is the NRSV version of the Hebrew, from which our LXX diverges, but Matthew gives the text as ἰδοὺ, ὁ παῖς μου...ὁ ἀγαπητός μου εἰς ὃν εὐδόκησεν ἡ ψυχὴ μου (12:18). Whether Matthew knew a different form of the Greek here, or assimilated his citation to Mark 1:11, Matthew knows a tradition that Jesus can be spoken of as God’s servant (παῖς, cf. Acts 3:13; 4:27, 30). It is likely that this was the form of the earliest tradition of the voice at Jesus’ baptism, and that Mark has changed it to “Son” in line with his Pauline theology.

It was natural for John’s successor to be seen as a prophet like him; but there was a theological problem just the same. Malachi said that Elijah would come before the great and terrible Day of the Lord: well, Elijah had now come in the form of John, but the Day of the Lord was still ahead—what then was Jesus’ position? A solution was suggested by Jesus’ healing gift, and perhaps by an early healing of a disfiguring skin affliction, thought of as “cleansing a leper.” This recalled Elisha’s famous cleansing of Naaman, and suggested an answer to the problem. Elijah was a great prophet, but he cast his mantle on Elisha, who received a double portion of his spirit, and performed twice as many miracles as his master. There are repeated signs that Jesus was thought of as a kind of new Elisha. As Elisha restored to life the son of the Shunamite woman, so does Jesus bring back to life the daughter of the synagogue ruler (Mark 5:21–43). A man brought Elisha issue, see my “Already?” in To Tell the Mystery: Essays on New Testament Eschatology in Honor of Robert H. Gundry, ed. T. Schmidt and M. Silva, JSNTSup 100 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1994), 1–18.

---

<sup>16</sup> Öhler, “Expectation,” 461–464.

twenty loaves, and he told his servant to feed the people with them; the servant asks, "How can I set this before a hundred people?," but is bidden, "Give them to eat," and they eat, and leave a remainder (2 Kgs 4:42–4). Jesus' disciples ask him to send the five thousand away to buy food, but he says, "You give them to eat"; they in turn are sceptical, having but five loaves, but Jesus repeats the command, and basketfuls of crumbs are taken up (Mark 6:35–44). Whereas Elijah slept under a juniper bush and was fed by the ravens, Elisha had his own room at the house of the wealthy woman at Shunem; and in the same way Jesus dines with Pharisees, and tells his disciples not to go from house to house (Mark 6:10). There is a constant echo of these Elisha-type stories: "Blind see and lame walk; lepers are cleansed and deaf hear; and dead are raised..." (Matt 11:5); "Heal the sick, raise the dead, cleanse the lepers, cast out demons" (Matt 10:8). In the Fourth Gospel the five thousand are fed with barley loaves (John 6:9), like Elisha's crowd in 2 Kings 4. It is difficult to be sure where such thinking has stopped. It was at the Jordan that Elijah cast his mantle on Elisha to give him a double portion of his spirit (2 Kgs 2:9): and it is at the Jordan that John baptizes Jesus, and he receives the Holy Spirit. It is true that Elijah also restored a boy to life, and marvellously fed the widow at Zarephath, but the Elisha legends are closer to the gospel. It is easy to think that Jesus was seen as a new Elisha.

The understanding of Jesus as a prophet was to persist in Jewish Christianity. We have two lines of evidence from later times. The Pseudo-Clementines, the Homilies and the Recognitions, go back to a second-century work, the Kerygmata Petrou: in this Jewish-Christian tradition Jesus is normally spoken of as "the Prophet." Behind this title lies a theory of "the true Prophet" who is incarnated in a series of figures, and ultimately comes to rest in Jesus.<sup>17</sup> The other line is known to us through the Fathers' accounts of the heresies, and especially Irenaeus's and Epiphanius's descriptions of the Ebionites, the only clearly Jewish-Christian heresy. The Ebionites (from Hebrew 'ebionim, the Poor People) thought that Jesus was conceived naturally, the son of Joseph and Mary, and that at his baptism a divine spirit, Christ, entered him. This spirit enabled him to work miracles and to reveal the unknown Father; but being spiritual it could not suffer, and left Jesus before the Passion. In this way Christ comes upon Jesus and for a period takes him over, much as the word of the Lord came upon the prophets.<sup>18</sup>

---

<sup>17</sup> H. J. Schoeps, Theologie und Geschichte des Judenchristentums (Tübingen: Mohr, 1949); G. Strecker, Das Judenchristentum in den Pseudoklementinen, TUGAL 70 (Berlin: Akademie Verlag, 1958). Cf. G. Friedrich, "προφήτης," TDNT 6:781–861.

An Ebionite link with the Jerusalem church is quite plausible. The “pillars” asked Paul to raise money for “the Poor,” i.e. their church (Gal 2:10). Pauline Christians believed in the Incarnation (Phil 2:6–11; 2 Cor 8:9), but in 2 Cor 11:1 comes a Jewish Christian missionary proclaiming a different gospel with “another Jesus.” So a prophetic christology seems likely to be deeply rooted in Jewish Christianity; even back to Jesus’ own time; according to John 7 his brothers, later the leaders of the Jerusalem church, did not believe in him.

7. Jesus the Healer

Much of the gospel tradition is concerned with Jesus’ healings, and it is not likely that so strong a tradition is fictitious; nor could we form a consistent picture of his proclamation of the kingdom without some visible sign of its arrival. Modern rationalists have dispensed with miracles, and will have to be content with explanations of psychosomatic disease. Certainly, modern experience suggests that such afflictions are widespread where there is belief in demon-possession, and the synoptics often imply such a background.<sup>19</sup> The Fourth Gospel has no such exorcisms, perhaps because the evangelist rates them as second-class wonders.

But a second element is also the influence of the prophetic tradition, examples of which have been cited above from the Elisha legends. Here again the early church turned to the later chapters of Isaiah for inspiration: “Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf unstopped; then the lame shall leap like a deer, and the tongue of the stammerers (μογιλόλων) sing for joy” (Isa LXX 35:5–6).<sup>20</sup> Such a passage would certainly encourage belief that

<sup>18</sup> M. D. Goulder, “A Poor Man’s Christology,” NTS 45 (1999): 332–348.

<sup>19</sup> For a discussion see Stevan L. Davies, Jesus the Healer (London: SCM, 1995).

<sup>20</sup> J. A. Emerton, “Maranatha and Ephphatha,” JTS 18 (1967): 427–429, argues that Jesus’ Ephphatha is an echo of the Hebrew of Isa 35, not of Aramaic.

Jesus had healed blind and deaf people, and it is striking that we find the rare Greek word μογιλάλος used of the sufferer at Mark 7:31.

8. The Twelve

A significant element in the tradition is the presence of an inner group of Jesus' followers known as "the Twelve." They are primary witnesses of his risen presence after his death (1 Cor 15:5); their names are given, in slightly different forms, by the synoptists; and rather extensive instructions to them are alleged. There can be no doubt that they were a key element in Jesus' understanding of his mission. He was sent to the twelve tribes, the lost sheep of the house of Israel. In his own activity and through them he was to renew Israel as the holy people of God; God's reign would be evidently realized in the exorcisms and healings they would perform; when Judgement Day came there would be a people prepared. Matthew again puts this into words (whether historical or not): "You shall sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (19:28).

Within the Twelve there was a central core, Peter and Andrew and the sons of Zebedee. Several of these men had probably been disciples of the Baptist (see above), and this would explain the ease with which, according to the synoptists, they left all and followed Jesus. They had been fellow-disciples for months, and knew that Jesus was something exceptional. Mark has Jesus call them from their trade, on the model of Elijah's call of Elisha (1 Kgs 19:19).

Mark says that Jesus wanted the Twelve to be with him and to be sent out to proclaim the arrival of the kingdom, and to cast out demons (3:13–15). For the new movement to have any hope of success he needed commitment from his followers, and he pitched the price high. The disciples had to commit themselves. They must claim the power to exorcise, and risk being found wanting (Mark 9:14–29); they must take no provisions with them, and depend entirely on the charity of their audience for food and shelter (1 Cor 9:14). They must expect often to be rejected (Mark 6:7–13). Jesus also expected commitment from his women followers, whether relatives of the men or sufferers he had healed (Mark 15:40; Luke 8:1–3); it is unclear whether their "ministering" (διακονεῖν) consisted in cooking or contributing money.

A further open question concerns Jesus' forbidding of divorce. In the gospels this is understood as referring to marital discord, as with the debates in Judaism; but in 1 Cor 7:10 the first initiative is with the wife, and the context is the demands of devotion to the movement. It may be that when men left their homes to go on mission their wives were left unsupported and wished to have their freedom; but Jesus said No—wives could go round with their husbands, as happens in 1 Cor 9:5.

But Jesus' own self-commitment was primary. John had proclaimed his expectation of the kingdom by his asceticism, the renunciation of wife and home, and of a normal diet and clothes: to dispense with such apparent necessities was a clear testimony to the imminence of a different order. Jesus partly followed suit. He had no home nor wife of his own, and lived rough (Matt 8:20). But why did he abandon his master's Spartan ways and desert location? Perhaps from experience. The people who streamed out of Jerusalem to hear John may have been mainly good religious people like those who attend a modern evangelist's crusade; tax-collectors and harlots might feel uncomfortable in such a context, and in any case the Judaeen desert was too close to Herod. So Jesus showed his independence of social norms in a different way. He ate and drank with the outcasts of society, and even included the tax-collector Levi among his core followers. In this way he could make it plain that he was serious about bringing forgiveness to sinners before Judgement Day. People were scandalized that he should be the friend of publicans and sinners (Matt 11:18), but the new policy showed itself to be effective as well as scandalous.

9. Jesus and the Law

There are two contradictory traditions in the synoptics on Jesus' attitude to the Torah. Mark pictures him as a liberal. In a long discussion in Mark 7 he describes the "tradition of the elders," that is the interpretations of the Law by the learned, as "commandments of men," and repeals the food laws by declaring all food clean; what defiles a man is not what goes into him but what comes out of him, impure thoughts of all kinds. Elsewhere Mark has Jesus excuse Sabbath-breaking, and encourage a lax attitude to the Sabbath: "the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath" (Mark 2:28).

There is a far more conservative Jesus in Matthew. Here Jesus came not to destroy but to fulfil the Law, no jot of which shall pass away, i.e. lose its validity. Anyone breaking the least of these laws and teaching men so will rank low in the kingdom (Matt 5:17–19). Matthew leaves out the offensive comment on the Sabbath (12:8), and carefully glosses the dangerous line of Mark 7 (Matt 15).

Of these two positions there is an a priori likelihood that Matthew's is the more historical. How could a preacher in first-century Israel hope to be accepted as a man of God if he countermanded the divine Torah?<sup>21</sup> But further, there was a dispute in Gal 2:11–14 between Paul and Peter about food and purity laws, and here Peter takes the conservative line, which he would hardly do if he had been chief disciple of a liberal Jesus. It seems probable that Mark, as a disciple of Paul and critic of James and Peter, has turned Jesus into a Pauline liberal.

This appears to be further confirmed by a passage in Heb 6:1–2. The author is appealing to Jewish-type Christians to move on to consider his soteriology of the cross, “not laying again a foundation of repentance from dead works and faith in God, of teaching of baptisms and laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead and eternal judgment.”<sup>22</sup> This “foundation” sounds very like the preaching of the Baptist or the early Jesus, “Repent and believe the gospel!” Faith is required in God, not in Christ. The resurrection of the dead and eternal judgement are identical with the great and terrible day of the Lord, the wrath to come. The teaching of baptisms and laying on of hands recalls the “teachings of men” about the baptisms of pots and vessels, and unclean hands which the Markan Jesus attacks in Mark 7:1–7. The Jewish Christians of the 60's addressed in Hebrews still have as their foundation the conservative theology of Judaism taught by John and Jesus: keep the whole Torah, written and oral, and believe the gospel; judgement is coming.

10. The Son of Man

In all four gospels Jesus frequently speaks of himself as “the Son of Man,” especially in connection with his return at the Parousia. This tradition is almost certainly unhistorical. (i) There is no sign that such a title was current in first-century Judaism. (ii) In Aramaic “a son of man” just meant a human being; attempts to reconstruct some of the traditional sayings with this meaning have not been generally persuasive. (iii) If Jesus thought that the kingdom had arrived, there would be no place for a figure coming on the clouds. (iv) If Jesus had used the expression of himself, meaningfully and often, we should expect it to be reflected in all branches of early Christianity; but it never occurs in Paul.

<sup>21</sup> A. E. Harvey, Jesus and the Constraints of History (London: Duckworth, 1982), 140–142.

<sup>22</sup> M. D. Goulder, “Hebrews and the Ebionites,” NTS 49 (2003): 393–406.

The Epistle to the Hebrews seems to be written to confute the Jewish-Christian (later, Ebionite) view that Jesus had been a man possessed by a heavenly power, an “angel.”<sup>23</sup> The author believed he was the Son of God made incarnate, and appealed to Psalm 8, where it is said of the Son of Man (υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου), “Thou madest him for a little while lower than the angels; Thou crownedst him with glory and honour; Thou hast subjected all things under his feet” (Heb 2:7–8). He interprets the glory and honour as “because of the suffering of death” (2:9). The passage seems to him accordingly an ideal proof-text. It showed the angel theory to be wrong; Jesus had been incarnate, lower than the angels for a short time. He had suffered death and so been glorified in the resurrection, and enthroned over the angelic powers. It even gave his heavenly title, “the Son of Man,” since it was his destiny to be a human being. This title is then fully exploited by the evangelists, especially in prophecies of his death, resurrection and return in glory.

11. From Prophet to Messiah

Mark 8:27 makes a break in the narrative: Jesus is hailed as the Christ by Peter, and shortly after leaves Galilee for Jerusalem. Although we do well to be sceptical about Mark’s account—and even more about psychological explanations derived from it—no consistent picture can be built up without Jesus seeing himself as Messiah.

Jesus’ Galilean ministry was that of a prophet like Elisha proclaiming the advent of God’s reign, following the prophecy of Isa 61:1. But such a vision of his vocation concealed a possible contradiction.

---

<sup>23</sup> M. D. Goulder, “Psalm 8 and the Son of Man,” NTS 48 (2002): 18–29.

There was a variety of expectations of how God's reign would be inaugurated, and Jesus might well have supposed that God would institute it himself, as is implied in Isa 40:9. But the idea of a Messiah was also widely current. There were false Messiahs at the time, both historical, like Theudas, and imagined, as in Mark 13:22. It is impossible that Jesus should have been unaware of this, or for him not to wonder how such a figure would fit in with his own proclamation. But the identity of the Messiah with the prophet of good tidings was itself suggested by Isaiah. Isa 61:1 said, "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me; because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings..." But earlier the prophet had said (Isa 11:1-2), "And there shall come forth a shoot out of the stock of Jesse... And the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him." I have already mentioned Isa 42:1 as probably underlying the divine words at the baptism, "Behold, my servant... my chosen, in whom my soul delighteth: I have put my spirit upon him." Jesus' power, both as a healer and as a preacher who could inspire crowds, must have seemed a guarantee that he had indeed received the divine spirit; from that it was but a step, and perhaps an inevitable step, to coalesce the image of the anointed prophet of good news with that of God's servant, the shoot from the stock of Jesse, the Lord's Anointed. Naturally such an account on its own would be much too cerebral. Jesus' awareness of being Messiah must surely rest upon some religious experience, but this is veiled from us. He addresses God as Abba, the normal Aramaic word for Father, but many Jewish liturgical prayers use the same (Hebrew) word. Perhaps the account of his baptism is evidence that he was a visionary; but, as I have suggested above, other forces are at work in this passage.

In this way we have some explanation for the division in Christian tradition over Jesus' identity. Jewish Christians in the Pseudo-Clementines spoke of Jesus primarily as a prophet, and the (Jewish-Christian) Ebionites held something close to a prophetic christology, in which the human Jesus was temporarily possessed by a heavenly power. But the church generally proclaimed Jesus as Messiah, both the Pauline Gentile churches and, according to Acts, Peter and the Twelve to the Jews. This would be understandable if Jesus had seen himself as a prophet in Galilean days, but towards the end of his life accepted that he was Messiah. It would have been suicide to publish such a claim, so he kept it to his intimates, and so the confession that he was the Christ comes to be associated with Peter. But his family were late-comers to the inner circle, and had been accustomed to the prophetic image, which corresponded so much better to his actual history; and it may well be that claims of Davidic ancestry were strange and embarrassing to them.<sup>24</sup> Thus Peter would have said one thing and James another, and after Peter's death the view taken by the family would prevail in the Jewish wing of the church.

That James should have maintained the earlier prophetic christology is suggested by some later tradition. Messianic claims were divisive. They led to unrest and to Roman suppression with the loss of life. Jewish authorities wanted peace, unless there was a really strong candidate, supported by religious opinion, as Bar Kochba was by Aqiba. James wanted good relations with the Jewish leadership, and Hegesippus says that they asked him to deny claims that Jesus was Messiah, and that he did so.<sup>25</sup>

12. Jerusalem

In the preceding paragraphs I have accepted two hypotheses: (i) that late in his life Jesus came to believe that he was the promised Messiah; and (ii) that he reached this conclusion at least partly by meditating on scripture. These two notions seem to be borne out by the subsequent narrative.

In the synoptic tradition, Peter's confession is followed by the community's departure for Jerusalem. Mark says that Jesus arranged for his disciples to bring a colt, on which he rode into the city. The crowds hailed his entry as messianic, with the words, "Blessed be the coming kingdom of our father David" (Mark 11:1–10). Matthew describes the scene as a fulfilment of Zech 9:9, "Behold, thy king cometh to thee, humble and riding on an ass, and a colt the offspring of a beast of burden" (Matt 21:5). Although it is theoretically possible that the incident is legendary, being created from the Zechariah prophecy, this is unlikely because Mark gives so little hint of a link with Zechariah. Pilgrims commonly walked to Jerusalem for the festivals, and we never hear elsewhere of Jesus riding. It might be, as Morna Hooker suggests, that the act of riding was in itself an assertion of authority;<sup>26</sup> or it might be that Jesus was familiar with the prophecy and staged the scene as a deliberate public claim of messiahship.<sup>27</sup> It is probable at any rate that this is how the Roman authorities understood it, for the claim to kingship was the ground of his execution (Mark 15:26).

---

<sup>24</sup> Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.19.1, 20.7, cites Hegesippus for a tradition that Domitian arrested two grandsons of Jesus' brother Jude as being descendants of David. R. Bauckham, Jude and the Relatives of Jesus in the Early Church (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1990), 94–105, treats this seriously; but it bears many hallmarks of a legend, and if the family kept a genealogy going back centuries, it is curious that Matthew and Luke differ so widely on the names.

<sup>25</sup> Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 2.23.10–16.

Mark says that the day after the triumphal entry Jesus went into the Temple, turning out the sellers of sacrificial animals and the money-changers. Again we have a number of possible interpretations. (i) The priests and other traders were fleecing the people, overcharging, finding blemishes in unblemished animals, etc. (ii) Jesus objected to trade of any kind in the Temple per se. (iii) Jesus, like the prophets, saw sacrifice without social justice as hypocrisy. (iv) Jesus was not cleansing the Temple, but symbolizing its destruction.

While the fleecing theory remains possible, Mark does not suggest it, and there is no evidence for such sharp practice in Jewish sources. Mark does say that Jesus cited Jer 7:11 on the den of thieves, but the context of that verse is concerned with the adulteries, murders, and so on which go on alongside the sacrifices. Mark has set the Temple scene between two references to the barren fig-tree, and it is clear that he takes the parallel seriously: Israel has not brought forth fruit, above all in its rejection of Jesus, and the withering of the fig-tree answers to the destruction of the Temple which Mark lived through in 70. But it would be difficult for those present to understand Jesus' action in this sense. E. P. Sanders says correctly that the high priest's decision to have Jesus executed can be explained as due to his attack on the Temple, which would be blasphemy; and Jesus is portrayed as prophesying the destruction of the Temple, both by Mark (13:2) and by Jesus' accusers (14:58).<sup>28</sup> But if this were in Jesus' mind, the symbolism would not be very obvious: when Jeremiah wished to symbolize the coming destruction of the Temple, he publicly smashed a potter's vessel (Jer 19).

Sanders is right to say that an efficient sacrificial system requires the provision of such services as were on offer. People needed proper currency to pay their Temple tax, and animals that were guaranteed unblemished; and such services have to be paid for. But this need not be relevant. The Fourth Gospel's account of the incident has Jesus say. "Make not my Father's house a house of trade" (ἐμπορίου, John 2:16). Here the offence is seen as trade in itself, and suggests a reference to Zech 14:21, "In that day there shall be no more a trader in the house of the Lord of Hosts."

<sup>26</sup> M. D. Hooker, The Gospel according to St Mark (London: A&C Black, 1991), 257.

<sup>27</sup> So E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985), 235, 306.

<sup>28</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 61–71.

Mark adds a further detail: "and he did not allow anyone to carry a vessel (σκεῦος) through the Temple" (11:16). The echo of Zech 14:21 suggests a reference to the preceding phrases in Zech 14:20, "In that day...the vessels in the Lord's house shall be like the bowls before the altar. Yea, every vessel in Jerusalem and Judah shall be holy to the Lord of Hosts."<sup>29</sup> We may think then that the prophecy of Zechariah was in Jesus' own mind throughout. He rode into Jerusalem in deliberate fulfilment of Zech 9:9. He drove out the traders in deliberate fulfilment of Zech 14:21. He stopped the carrying of unconsecrated vessels through the Temple in fulfilment of Zech 14:20. "That day," so beloved of the prophet, had arrived with the coming of the kingdom. Later the church was to find further fulfilments of Zechariah in "I will smite the shepherd...", the thirty pieces of silver, and the potter's field.

13. Jesus' Death

The hypothesis of a conscious fulfilment of prophecy carries with it certain corollaries. Jesus will hardly have had access to copies of the Prophets, so we have to think of a devout community leader at Nazareth, a scribe perhaps teaching the village boys in the synagogue. This is not unlikely, for we find a broad familiarity with the scriptures in the writings of Paul, Matthew and John the Seer, to name but a few; and this was a period of high religious seriousness among Jewish people generally. We also need to think of Jesus as a meditative person, turning over these texts and asking how they applied to him. He will have needed a good memory and a sharp intelligence, both of which may be conceded. The New Testament seems in fact to require something of the same atmosphere more generally. John knew the prophecy of Malachi well enough to see his vocation as the Elijah who was to come.<sup>30</sup> Jesus seems likely to have discerned his own destiny first as the prophet of good news in Isaiah 61 and later as the Messiah of Isaiah 11. Paul read from Isa 49:1 his calling to proclaim the gospel to the Gentiles as ordained from his mother's womb (Gal 1:15).

---

<sup>29</sup> C. Roth, "The Cleansing of the Temple and Zechariah xiv:21," NovT 4 (1960): 174–181. Roth includes a discussion of Zech 14:20. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 67, objects that Jesus would be requiring the traders to move further out, with the sanctification of the whole city; but this does not seem absurd.

This brings us then to the controversial issue of Jesus' death: did he foresee it, as is said repeatedly in the gospels, and if so how did he interpret it? We have two indications of answers to these questions: one in Mark 10:45, "The Son of Man came not to be served, but to serve, and to give his life a ransom for many"; the other in the eucharistic words, variously given in the synoptics, 1 Corinthians 11 and the Didache. It is often thought that at least the former text is related to Isaiah 53, though this is disputed,<sup>31</sup> and I have already indicated that the phrase "the Son of Man" is probably a creation of the church. However, Jesus saw his proclamation of the gospel as prophesied in Isaiah 40. This consisted of the reign of God according to Isa 52:7. His salvation had drawn near according to Isa 56:1. He was God's servant of Isa 42:1, on whom God had set his spirit according to Isa 61:1 now that the time of Isa 60:22 had come. He had healed the blind, the deaf and the lame following Isa 35. With so broad an appeal to the later chapters of Isaiah, it is difficult to believe that Jesus missed the passage on the Servant in Isaiah 52–53.

It behoves us to be cautious. Isaiah's (LXX) word "My παῖς" does not occur in Mark, though it is repeated in Peter's speeches in Acts (Acts 3:13, 26; 4:27, 29). Mark's word διακοπεῖν does not occur in Isaiah LXX 52–53. Isaiah's 'asham, a sin-offering, is not the same as Mark's λύτρον, a ransom. The latter root is used in the LXX for the substitution of say an ass as sacrifice in place of a first-born son, or of the payment to redeem a slave, or for God's redemption of his people from Egypt. Nevertheless the instinct that Isaiah 53 may have been in Jesus' mind may not be mistaken. Mark says that in

---

<sup>30</sup> "The Twelve" Minor Prophets were treated as a unity in Judaism, and Zechariah-Malachi marks their end, and the end of the Prophets as a whole in the Hebrew Bible. It is not an accident that the end of history is so much in evidence in Zech 14–Mal 3.

<sup>31</sup> M. D. Hooker, Jesus and the Servant (London: SPCK, 1959).

Gethsemane Jesus prayed that “this cup,” the cup of his passion, might be taken from him. The image comes from Isa 51:17, 22, where Jerusalem has drunk at the hand of the Lord the cup of his fury. Soon afterwards comes God’s Servant in 52:13–53:12. As a lamb led to the slaughter he opened not his mouth (53:7); as Jesus answered nothing to the high priest (Mark 14:59). He poured out his life unto death as he bare the sin of many (53:12); as Jesus was to say, “This is my blood of the covenant which is poured out for many” (Mark 14:28). The life is in the blood, and the one can be seen poured out in the other. For Jesus, as for the Servant, the “many” are the people of Israel. The church’s earliest creed was that “Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures”—presumably Isa 53:10–12.

There are other problems about the Last Supper which cannot be considered here. Was it a Passover meal, as Mark says, or the last of a series of fellowship meals, taken the day before Passover, as implied in the Fourth Gospel? Were the words of institution those in Mark or those in Paul (and Luke)? What is to be made of the claim made by Aramaic scholars that the phrase “my blood of the covenant” cannot be retranslated into Aramaic?

Nevertheless, the main outlines are clear for the understanding of the crucifixion. Jesus scandalized the Jewish hierarchy by publicly interfering with the Temple sacrificial system. He felt called to do this because his vocation was to proclaim that God’s reign had come, “that day” when there would be no more traders in the Temple, nor any unholy vessel (Zech 14:20–21). To the priests the Temple sacrifices were the means of sustaining Israel’s covenant with God; God had ordained them, and to obstruct them was blasphemy. But Jesus had also estranged the Roman authorities. He needed to proclaim his Messiahship as part of the incoming reign of God, and he did this by riding into Jerusalem in the way prophesied in Zech 9:9. To a governor familiar with messianic pretenders and their ability to rouse unrest, this was asking for trouble. The Jewish leaders arrested Jesus and gave him a rapid trial, for whose details Mark had no evidence, and was compelled to fill them in from the Old Testament. The high priest then delated Jesus to Pilate, and the crucifixion followed.

Jesus was probably a political innocent, and had at first little idea of the hideous consequences such actions would entail. But as Holy Week passed, the situation became increasingly transparent. A contemporary author wrote of the Maccabaeen martyrs that they became an atonement (ἀντίψυχον) for the nation’s sin (4 Macc 17:21, also ἰλαστήριον), an idea which is likely to derive similarly from Isaiah 53, the only clear statement in scripture of the idea that an innocent man might bear the sins of many. With his familiarity with so many passages in later Isaiah, it is likely that Jesus saw his passion as destined in prophecy. It was a cup which, like anyone, he still hoped not to drink; but if this pleased the Lord he would take it, and his blood would seal a covenant that would cover Israel's sin and restore its relation to God for the in-breaking of his reign.

14. The Resurrection

It would hardly be proper to end an account of Jesus with his death, when so much turns on the claim of his resurrection. The evidence for this may be split into two categories: the primary evidence in 1 Cor 15:5–8, which tells of his having been seen by Peter, the Twelve, five hundred Christians, James, “all the apostles,” and finally Paul; and later accounts in the gospels and subsequent writings, which describe more physical events—touching, eating, drinking, an empty tomb, etc.

All Christians believed that Jesus had been raised on the third day (ἐγήγερται, 1 Cor 15:4, where this is part of the pre-Pauline gospel); but there were different ways of understanding the expression. To Paul, when Jesus died, he “fell asleep” in Sheol, like the rest of humankind; when he was raised, his body returned to earth, as understood in Dan 12:2, but transformed. The same process will befall all Christians who die before the Parousia (1 Cor 15:51–54). But there are some in Corinth who do not accept this for Christians. They say, “There is no resurrection of corpses” (ἀνάστασις νεκρῶν οὐκ ἔστιν, 15:12), at least for Christians. They think the idea of physical resurrection absurd: “How are the corpses raised? And with what sort of body do they come [back to earth]?” (15:35). Paul tries to persuade them by appealing to Jesus' resurrection (15:13–20). But this is too easy: if they had believed in a bodily resurrection for Jesus, they would have believed in the same for themselves.

Mark 12:18–27 records a tradition in which Jesus says that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are alive, and therefore the Sadducees are in error in saying that there is no resurrection (ἀνάστασιν μὴ εἶναι). The patriarchs are not thought of as having returned to earth in their bodies; they are just alive in heaven, not dead in their graves.

Similarly, Judas Maccabaeus sees the high priest Onias III and the prophet Jeremiah alive in heaven interceding for Israel (2 Macc 15:13–15), rather as Jesus is pictured as interceding with God in heaven by Stephen (Acts 7:56), or by Paul (Rom 8:34). Hellenistic ideas of a soul in a body have infected Judaism by New Testament times (cf. Matt 10:28), and Philo gives such a picture when describing the death of Moses:

The time came when he had to make his pilgrimage from earth to heaven and leave this mortal life for immortality, summoned thither by the Father who resolved his twofold nature of body and soul into a singularity, transforming his whole being into mind (νοῦς), pure as the sunlight (Mos. 2.228).

Philo thinks of Moses as transformed at death into “mind,” and some such notions, often vague and unspecific, seem to have been widespread at the time.<sup>32</sup> It is clear that the opposition at Corinth think that the personality survives death, for they practise baptism on behalf of their dead relatives and friends (15:29). They think the kingdom of God has come (15:50), and hold some unreal views of themselves as reigning, glorified, enriched with spiritual powers, etc. (4:8–21; 12; 14). They think that for them death has been overcome already (unlike Paul, for whom it is the last enemy to be destroyed, 15:26). So no doubt when they said that Jesus had been raised, they thought of him somewhat as Philo thought of Moses.

Those who thought they were already reigning in the kingdom of God at 1 Cor 4:8 boasted in men, i.e. in Cephas as their authority at 3:21, and were puffed up on behalf of the one apostle Peter against the other, Paul, at 4:8. In 15:45–49 the opposition is revealed as appealing to a sophisticated Jewish exegesis of the two accounts of the creation of man in Genesis 1–2, and at 15:56 Paul criticizes their appeal to the Law. It seems clear then that those who deny the physicality of the resurrection both for Christians and for Jesus, are the followers of the Jerusalem apostles. This appears to be confirmed by Mark, who comments at 9:10 that Peter, James and John “questioned what the rising from the dead was.” Similarly at Mark 6:49 the disciples see Jesus walking physically on the water and think he is a ghost.

---

<sup>32</sup> E. P. Sanders, Judaism: Practice and Belief, 63 BCE–66 CE (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1992), 298.

This division between Paul and the Jerusalem leaders then illuminates the empty tomb story in Mark, and the other traditions of Jesus' post-mortal physicality. Martin Hengel says that the Romans almost always left the bodies of crucified criminals on the cross, where unburied and a prey to birds, they would be a horror and a warning to passers-by.<sup>33</sup> He cites Petronius, for example, who speaks of a soldier guarding the corpse of such a victim.<sup>34</sup> We should assume that Jesus' fate followed the normal pattern, and that his body was left hanging for perhaps forty-eight hours. For the Jerusalem view of resurrection all that was necessary was that Jesus should have been seen. That proved that he was alive after his passion, in process of making his pilgrimage from earth to heaven, transformed into a bodiless spirit.

But for Paulines this was not enough, and the gospel stories of Jesus' post-mortal physicality correspond with the Pauline doctrine. In Mark 16 the "young man" says to the women, "You are looking for Jesus of Nazareth who was crucified: he has been raised, he is not here; look, the place where they laid him!" The physical, crucified Jesus has gone from where he was laid in the tomb, and is now on his way to Galilee. Luke has a succession of physical appearances. He is known to the Emmaus road disciples by breaking bread; he says to the Eleven, "Behold my hands and my feet, that it is me" (24:39), and asks for something to eat (cf. Acts 1:4). John 20 emphasizes the touching theme memorably by the interaction with Thomas. Ignatius, a strong admirer of Paul, cites the Lukan text in the form, "Handle me and see that I am not a bodiless demon" (Smyrn. 3:2). This physical stress was important to the Paulines.

But was not at least the empty tomb story historical? Its trouble is that at so many points it is implausible, and even contradictory. If Jesus' body is to be found missing, it will have to be buried in the tomb of a wealthy sympathizer. Joseph of Arimathaea supplies this need: he is an honourable councillor and has been expecting the kingdom of God. But then surely this is what Jesus has spent the week proclaiming in the Temple; and if he is a councillor, presumably that means a member of the Sanhedrin, and he will have been present at the recent meeting, and so have been part of the unanimous vote condemning Jesus for blasphemy. A group of women goes out to anoint Jesus' body "exceedingly early," not knowing who is to roll away the enormous stone covering the tomb: although they are part of a community of tough men, some of them their relations, they would rather take a chance on meeting a gardener, or some such person, who happened to be around at 4 a.m. The point of the angel's message is to have the disciples directed to Galilee, but the women say nothing to anyone in their fear, so the whole tale is pointless. The thought must arise that it is a late development of the Markan church, and that the women's silence is an explanation of why it has not been heard before. In a divided church, those who thought physical resurrection an absurdity would not take kindly to a brand new story that Jesus' body was buried in a stranger's tomb, and had left it in the night. They would inevitably ask, "Why have we never heard this before?" "Ah," replies the wily evangelist, "the women said nothing to anyone; for they were afraid."

---

<sup>33</sup> M. Hengel, Crucifixion in the Ancient World and the Folly of the Message of the Cross (Eng. trans.: London: SCM, 1977), 87–88.

<sup>34</sup> Satyricon, 111–112.

An early tradition, known to Paul (1 Cor 15:5) spoke of Jesus' burial before his resurrection; but this includes no reference to Joseph. Josephus describes the crucifixion of many thousands of Jews, but the bones of only one such victim have been uncovered, and this has raised the suspicion that often when a criminal's body had hung long enough on the cross, it was taken down and thrown in a common grave. If this happened with Jesus, we should still have an explanation for all the New Testament traditions. The Jerusalem Christians held to some form of spiritual resurrection. And they only saw the risen Jesus. The tales of Jesus' body leaving a tomb, and of his eating and touching, are in our later evidence, especially in the Pauline gospels of Mark, Luke and John.

DISPENSING WITH THE PRIORITY OF MARK

DAVID L. DUNGAN*

1. Introduction

The basic starting point for any reconstruction of the historical Jesus based on the canonical gospels is the Enlightenment distinction between the original Jesus of Nazareth on the one hand, and the narratives written about him written later by disciples and their assistants, on the other hand. Modern scholarship (since Form and Redaction Criticism) has refined that distinction into the recognition that one encounters three levels of tradition in the gospel text:<sup>1</sup> passages that stem from the first or earliest level consisting of authentic reminiscences or sayings of the historical Jesus; other passages that stem from the second level, namely, the oral tradition period, which elaborated and shaped and augmented the original historical Jesus material, as the earliest followers handed on their reminiscences and applied them to the life of the Christian community; finally, passages that stem from the third level when the gospel we have now was composed (more or less), where the two prior levels of tradition have been combined and theologically elaborated in a composition “written so that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you may have life in his name” (John 20:31). Reconstructing a historical portrait of Jesus and the disciples within a consistent hypothetical reconstruction of the development of earliest Christianity, using the gospels and related materials as your basic data, essentially consists in distinguishing in each pericope—following the standard Enlightenment-inspired definition of a historical event—the different levels: genuine, historical, Jesus material, or subsequent oral tradition, or authorial redaction.

The primary evidence for recognizing these three levels is given already in the prologue of the Gospel of Luke, which clearly mentions all three levels in a strikingly matter-of-fact manner, i.e., without the reference to supernatural influence typical of second- and third-century accounts.

---

* David Laird Dungan (1936–2008).

<sup>1</sup> In this essay, I use “gospel” when I mean the generic term to refer to any gospel, “Gospel” when I refer to one of the four canonical Gospels, since it is part of their title.

Inasmuch as many have undertaken to compile a narrative of the things which have been accomplished among us [third, redactional level], just as they were delivered to us by those who [second, oral level] from the beginning [historical Jesus, primary level] were eyewitnesses and ministers of the word [second, oral level], it seemed good to me also, having followed all things closely for some time past, to write an orderly account [third, redactional level] for you, most excellent Theophilus, that you may know the truth [this term involves a complex mixture of all three] concerning the things of which you have been informed (Luke 1:1–4 RSV).

The chief alternative to the three levels identified by Enlightenment-oriented gospel interpretation is to interpret the text as it stands, whether as literal truth or as complete myth. These approaches have been adopted by literalists of all times and places, both those within the church who believe that by doing so they will support the credibility of the gospels, and those outside the Christian faith intent on debunking it as a fraud, from ancient times until today. The chief danger of this approach, for both groups, is that of seriously misunderstanding the text, as such interpreters use nothing more than their imaginations to guide them.

2. Fundamental Decisions Prior to the Choice of a Synoptic Source Theory

Source theories are important but other choices are logically prior for the task of reconstructing the life and activity of the historical Jesus. The proof of this can be seen in the fact that very different reconstructions can and do arise, even when scholars use the same source theory. Conversely, largely similar results can be obtained even if scholars use different source theories. These prior choices have a logical progression to them. First of all, what is the field of data to be examined? Will one include the Gospel of John in one's purview or not? Will one include the non-canonical gospels of Thomas, Mary, and other agrapha Iesu in one's data-base? Will one include the evidence from the Apostle Paul?

Once one's field of data has been chosen, the next question is what criteria of authenticity will be used to sort them out in the spectrum of highly probable to highly improbable? For example, are all self-referential sayings involving Jesus' messiahship, son of God, divinity, suspect? Are only sayings and actions that do not conform to contemporary Judaism or subsequent Christianity genuine and all others suspect (principle of dissimilarity)? Are shorter sayings always more original than longer versions of the same saying? What about the presence of clear formal characteristics? Are these more original than broken form, poor form, or mixed form? Or just the opposite; is a highly intricate, balanced form always later than a broken, crude form? Is it always the case that a saying existing in poor Greek in one source cannot depend upon the same saying existing in good Greek in another source? What about "high theology," compared to "low theology"? Is it always the case that there is only one kind of theological development in early Christianity, from low theology (or low christology, e.g., "Jesus as prophet") to a "high" christology (e.g., Jesus as Son of God)? These kinds of choices (and there are others) directly affect the decisions on "early" and "late" tradition, leading to the division of the gospel materials into the three basic levels: the historical Jesus, oral tradition, and final redaction. Most of them were invented during the hey-day of Form Criticism in the middle of the last century, and are still commonly used today.

The following question affects the third level: the final redaction.<sup>2</sup> It focuses on the question of "authorial creativity" and bears on the question: generally speaking, how reliable for reconstructing the historical Jesus is the gospel redaction as a whole? That is, how much did the final author or redactor of a gospel over-write or modify the traditions (sources) received? Did this redactor just repeat traditions more or less intact (like a scribe), or did he thoroughly revise, rewrite, recast, create the accounts now found in his gospel (like an author)? This holistic judgment affects the writing as a whole, but it should be kept in mind that gospel authors could treat different kinds of material with greater or lesser degrees of freedom or creativity. Thus for instance, liturgical material such as hymns and prayers were usually treated more conservatively (left unchanged); the same applies to certain kinds of sayings material such as parables. On the other hand, narrative material, apocalyptic predictions, various kinds of hortatory and ethical sayings were treated with more freedom.

---

<sup>2</sup> In this essay, "Matthew," "Mark," "Luke" and "John" refer to the final author or redactor. I am aware that the notion of a "final redactor" is increasingly dubious, as there may have been a succession of "final redactions," giving rise to some of the major textual variants (e.g., the Longer Ending of Mark; the Western Text of Luke/Acts, etc.). "Mt," "Mk," "Lk," and "Jn" refer to the canonical text as it stands.

There is a useful control for general decisions regarding redactional creativity: if a gospel author has written anything else, the style, vocabulary, theology, and ecclesiastical themes in the second writing are a good guide to ascertaining the author's tendencies in the first writing. For example, one can get a good idea of the style, vocabulary, theological concerns, and ecclesiology of the author of the Gospel of John from his genuine, first epistle, 1 John. Likewise, one can obtain a good sense of the style, vocabulary, theological concerns, and ecclesiology of the author of the Gospel of Luke from his second writing, the Acts of the Apostles. (In both cases I assume with the majority of scholars that the same person wrote both writings.)

This control principle is not available for Matthew or Mark. In these cases, the first step toward identifying the prime redactional level should be the application of what we may call the "Peabody principle" (after its discoverer): identify the top redactional level by focusing on those repeated summary phrases that function to link together two or more widely separated narrative units.<sup>3</sup> This kind of "redactional connective tissue" cannot stem from the historical Jesus level, or from the oral tradition material, since they bind disparate segments of the gospel redaction. Hence, identifying them is the first step in identifying the final gospel author's style, narrative concerns, theological point of view, etc. Matthew's repeated concluding phrase: "when Jesus had finished these sayings..." was used by the final redactor to delimit one part of his narrative and begin the next. Mark's use of "and again..." was used by the final redactor of the Gospel of Mark to link together two or more disparate segments of his narrative.<sup>4</sup> As one identifies such stylistic devices created by the final redactor, one begins to get a picture of the entire redactional activity of the author, in order to distinguish it from the oral tradition level and the historical Jesus level.

---

<sup>3</sup> See D. B. Peabody, Mark as Composer (Macon: Mercer University Press, 1987), 26: "Those passages that seem to provide structure or some principle of organization for the gospel as a whole have the highest probability of coming from the hand of the author of Mark."

<sup>4</sup> Peabody, Mark, 27: "πάλιν used retrospectively to unite two or more separated pericopes" is the kind of redactional "connective tissue" I am talking about.

As these decisions are made and modified, it is obvious that one has gone well beyond analyzing individual pericopes to comparing strings or groups of pericopes among several gospels for signs and indications of the various levels and the direction of change across pericopes. The hard way to do this is to put one's fingers in various places in the gospels and carry out the comparisons in one's head. Typically, scholars create a synopsis because no printed synopsis can adequately reveal all of the evidence one wants to consider. To do that properly, one must select some kind of source theory to help one arrange the material in one's synopsis since it is impossible to create a source neutral synopsis.<sup>5</sup>

3. Synopses and Source Theories

Every source theory so far invented has strengths and weaknesses. I know from long experience that there are no theories which are uniformly convincing all the time, no theories which do not involve serious problems of some kind. Why is this? Because the whole network of literary and oral relationships among the gospels is so intricate and subtle and complex that all existing attempts at visualizing a solution cannot help but ignore important data, contain glaring inconsistencies, misconstrue evidence, and over- or under-estimate important phenomena.

Moreover, since all source theories arise out of the very gospels they seek to explain, with little by way of external controls to control them, it is unavoidable that every approach falls prey to the perils and pitfalls of circular reasoning. It begins immediately with the first two essential steps any critic must take to study the gospels: determining the text to be examined and ascertaining the meaning units (pericopes) to compare.

Every attempt at a critical text is a fundamentally circular process involving numerous subjective judgments, including a source theory to guide the decision-making process even though the resulting text is then used as evidence for one's preferred source theory.<sup>6</sup> Both

---

<sup>5</sup> See D. L. Dungan, "Theory of Synopsis Construction," Bib 61 (1980): 305-329.

<sup>6</sup> See D. L. Dungan, "Synopses of the Future," Bib 66 (1985): 476-484: "The division into pericopes cannot be 'neutral'." Bruce Metzger was a rare example of a leading text critic admitting what most text critics used to deny, namely reliance on a scholars of Old Testament and New Testament textual criticism are beginning to propose the idea of abandoning the whole idea of reconstructing “the original text” as seriously misleading,<sup>7</sup> and Reuben Swanson’s recently published display of textual variants of the gospels has already given it up: it is no more than a collection of the most important variant readings with no attempt to evaluate them.<sup>8</sup> This is not to say that the choice of which text to use does not make any difference; it does. There are many variant readings that directly contribute to the evidence one brings to “solve” the synoptic problem. For example, many possible readings in Luke were rejected by the United Bible Societies editorial board—all believers in Markan Priority—as “late harmonizations.” Yet many of these same readings are accepted as original to Luke by adherents of the Two Gospel Group (the Austin Farrer School would concur) because in their view Luke copied directly from Matthew.<sup>9</sup>

---

source-theory. See B. M. Metzger, A Textual Commentary on the Greek New Testament. A Companion Volume to the United Bible Societies’ Greek New Testament (New York: United Bible Societies, 1971), xxvii–xxviii, which notes that the Hypothesis of the Priority of Mark helped them decide in certain cases, “what the author [of Luke or Matthew or Mark] was more likely to have written.”

<sup>7</sup> See E. Tov, “The Status of the Masoretic Text in Modern Text Editions of the Hebrew Bible: The Relevance of the Canon,” in The Canon Debate, ed. Lee Martin McDonald and James A. Sanders (Peabody: Hendrickson, 2002) 234–252 (240): “When the Qumran scrolls were written at Qumran and elsewhere, scribes created and consulted without distinction different texts of the Bible; all of which reflected the ‘Bible’ [to them] and all were authoritative, though not to the same extent... The goal of [striving for] textual uniformity [did not appear until] later in the Judaism of the first century CE onward.” Again, “... all of these literary stages were equally original, or alternatively, none of these stages should be thought to constitute ‘the original text’” (248). And again, “Insurmountable problems confront the evaluation of variant readings... In my view, the data compel us to discontinue such valuations and record these variants without evaluation in parallel columns so as to facilitate our understanding of these texts” (249–250; emphasis in original). For New Testament text criticism, consider the similar opinion of E. J. Epp, “The Multivalence of the Term ‘Original Text’ in New Testament Textual Criticism,” HTR (1999): 245–281, at 263: “Recently the task of New Testament criticism... [has] turned away from the search for merely one ‘original text’ to an understanding of earlier stages of composition and to earlier texts—earlier ‘originals’—that lie behind what textual critics had become accustomed to consider the ‘original.’ Which ‘original’ or ‘originals’ ought we to seek?... Should text critics seek for an ‘original’ at all?” (emphasis in original).

<sup>8</sup> See R. J. Swanson, ed., New Testament Greek Manuscripts: Variant Readings Arranged in Horizontal Lines against Codex Vaticanus. Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, 4 vols. (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995).

<sup>9</sup> For examples of circular reasoning involved in establishing the text of the Gospels, see Dungan, “Synopses of the Future,” 458–463.

Once the text is more or less chosen, the next step involves breaking up the long stream of Greek letters into words and sentences (with attendant punctuation), both of which are missing in the early manuscripts. These two actions are necessary preludes to the next step, dividing the gospels up into meaning units or pericopes. It is not possible to compare the gospels without some sense of the meaning units within the gospels, call them what you will: anecdotes, stories, pericopes, sections. But meaning unit divisions are not provided in the early Greek manuscripts (Eusebius's sections, based on Ammonius's pericopes, are the first step in that direction) and must be provided by the critic. Of course, most scholars skip all of these early steps and simply turn to the current "critical text" which has already broken the Greek text into sentences and meaning units (with handy paragraph titles and cross-references to facilitate comparison). But this expedient does not solve the problem of participation in circular reasoning, it just sweeps it under the rug.

As a matter of fact, most scholars go on and use some current synopsis (pretending to be "neutral") which has already paralleled the pericopes for them. But as I have shown, it is not possible to provide any objective, neutral parallelization of pericopes. All synopses necessarily presuppose some sort of source in their construction, and then they are used to provide evidence in discussions of the synoptic problem, an obvious exercise in circular reasoning.<sup>10</sup>

One reason why it is not possible to create an objective or neutral synopsis is because it is impossible to arrive at an objective definition of pericope endings and beginnings. Mark Regazzi has recently examined some 300 synopses, gospel parallels, and harmonies in the twentieth century, as well as the more famous early parallelizations (Eusebius, Augustine, Calvin, etc.) and the early lectionary evidence, and come to the conclusion that "There is no uniformity in the determination of pericopes in gospel comparators. A pericope is what the author or editor determines it to be. This lack of standardization also applies to commentaries and studies on the gospels."<sup>11</sup>

---

<sup>10</sup> See Dungan, "Synopses of the Future," 463–476: "the arrangement of any synopsis cannot be neutral."

<sup>11</sup> M. B. Regazzi, "The Delimitation of Pericopes. A Case Study in Matthew" (unpubl. Ph.D. dissertation; Andrews University, Berien Springs, Michigan, 2000), abstract, 643–651.

Another reason why it is not possible to create an objective or neutral synopsis is because it is impossible objectively to determine what are the parallels to specific pericopes to print in the synopsis. I have shown that there are two kinds of parallels typically used in modern synopses: primary and secondary. But in fact the concept of “parallel” shades off indeterminately into further tertiary parallels, possible allusions, echoes, and minor resonances. As Joseph B. Tyson has said, “the principles for judging parallelism are by no means clear. Most scholars seem to apply judgments which are neither explained nor defended.”<sup>12</sup> Regazzi comments, “the problem with attempts to define ‘parallels’ in the Gospels is the same problem as attempting to define ‘pericope.’ There is too much variety within the Gospels to admit of any standard definition.”<sup>13</sup>

These are some of the reasons why I say that we create the evidence we use to understand the gospels. It is impossible to investigate the gospels without unknowingly selecting some phenomena to study and overlooking other phenomena. It is not possible to investigate the gospels directly, objectively, without “disturbing” the phenomena. This situation resembles the Heisenberg Principle of Indeterminacy, originally discovered in the field of sub-atomic physics, but here applied to gospel research: one cannot examine the phenomena without breaking them up in the act of creating a synopsis to study them.

I suggest that the methodological corollary atomic physicists drew from this principle also applies to gospel research: one cannot investigate an individual phenomenon directly (without modifying it) but one can predict the statistical probabilities of large blocks of data (quanta). That is what quantum mechanics is, identifying the probabilities of statistically significant aggregations of data. A comparable application in gospel research would be comparing hypotheses that identify putative general trends or large-scale probabilities. That hypothesis would be preferable that can give a “convincing” description of large numbers of putative tendencies covering many phenomena in all four (or three) gospels. Analysis of a single double- or triple-tradition passage is statistically meaningless as far as buttressing a particular source hypothesis is concerned.

---

<sup>12</sup> J. B. Tyson, “Sequential Parallelism in the Synoptic Gospels,” NTS 22 (1976): 276–308, at 277.

<sup>13</sup> Regazzi, “Delimitation,” 659.

This brings me to the end of the ancillary considerations. Let us now consider some texts. I suggest that the best place to begin is a significant event in the life of Jesus where there is the highest degree of overlap or mutual correspondence in order and content among the four gospels.

4. The Accounts of Jesus' Crucifixion

The greatest degree of unanimity among all four gospels in the New Testament occurs within the narratives describing Jesus' arrest, "trial," torture, and crucifixion. It is true that even here there are many significant differences among the four accounts, but, compared to the widely divergent narrative and saying material prior to this part of the gospels, and the extremely divergent resurrection accounts among the four gospels, the greatest degree of convergence occurs in the account of Jesus' crucifixion. This strikingly higher degree of correspondence among the four gospels at just this point has been provided with many explanations. I agree with those who say that it is no accident. It reflects the profound significance the earliest Christians felt toward the brutal death of their Lord. For this reason, the Crucifixion should be the starting point for our reconstruction of the historical Jesus.

The fact of its great importance does not mean that all four gospels depicted the Crucifixion in exactly similar fashion. The Resurrection was also of fundamental significance, yet observe the variety in the accounts of it: they are so divergent (and do not forget 1 Cor 15:1-11) that they cannot be placed in the usual synoptic parallel columns! Let us examine the accounts of the Crucifixion in each of the gospels in turn, to see the distinctive elements.

Matt 27:33-56 describes a grim and brutal scene, a continuation of the mocking and torture Jesus has just received from the Roman guard (Matt 27:27-32). Friday morning Jesus is taken out and crucified between two criminals, with a mocking sign fastened to the cross over his head. The people and Jerusalem officials shout scornful things at him. Suddenly, around noon, the sun's light fails, a terrifying celestial portent signifying God's wrath. Pitch darkness remains for almost three hours, when, just as unexpectedly, the sun's light reappears around three in the afternoon. In anguish, Jesus cries out in a loud voice, "My God, My God! Why have you forsaken me?!" and with another loud cry, he dies.

It is a scene of overwhelming grief and horror. We might be inclined to say, “Something this terrible must be historical. They would never have made this up.” Perhaps, but in a narrative dealing with an event this important, there is all the more reason to proceed with utmost caution. For example, it is widely recognized that the climax of the scene, Jesus’ “Hebrew” words from the cross, is in fact a quote from Ps 22:1 “Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani?”<sup>14</sup> which Mt’s text immediately translates into Greek, “My God! My God! Why have you forsaken me?” If we examine the larger context, we find several more quotations, echoes, and allusions to Psalm 22, seven or eight to be precise. The following chart lays out the evidence.

Psalm 22	Matthew 27–28
“But I am a worm, and no man; scorned by men, and despised by the people. All who see me mock at me, they make mouths at me, they wag their heads... ” (Ps 22:6–7)	“And those who passed by derided him, wagging their heads... ” (Matt 27:39)
“He committed his cause to the LORD; let him deliver him , let him rescue him, for he delights in him!” (Ps 22:8)	“He trusts in God; let God deliver him now, if he desires him; for he said, ‘I am the Son of God’” (Matt 27:43; cf. Matt 27:40)
Many bulls encompass me, strong bulls of Bashan surround me; they open wide their mouths at me, like a ravening and roaring lion (Ps 22:12)	(Palace guard mocking and beating Jesus: “Then the soldiers of the governor took Jesus into the praetorium, and they gathered the whole battalion before him” Matt 27:27)

<sup>14</sup> The Hebrew of Ps 22:1 is אֵלֵי אֵלֵי לָמָּה עֲזַבְתָּנִי azavtani not sabach-thani. At mid-phrase Mt’s version switches to the Aramaic שְׁבַקְתָּנִי. As might be expected, there is a long and complex textual history to this Word of the Lord and its Markan parallel; see the comments by Metzger, Textual Commentary, 70, 119–120. Metzger points out that Mt’s wording is half Hebrew אֵלֵי אֵלֵי לָמָּה, and half Aramaic שְׁבַקְתָּנִי, while Mark’s ελωι ελωι λεμα σαβαχθανι is consistent Aramaic אֵלֵי אֵלֵי לָמָּה שְׁבַקְתָּנִי. See further W. D. Davies and Dale C. Allison, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel According to Saint Matthew, 3 vols. (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1988), 3:264, for evidence from the Aramaic Targum, MT Hebrew, and first-century Palestinian linguistic possibilities.

Yea, dogs are round about me; a company of evildoers encircle me; they have pierced my hands and feet (Ps 22:16)

... they divide my garments among them, and for my raiment they cast lots (Ps 22:18)

I am poured out like water, and all my bones are out of joint; my heart is like wax, it is melted within my breast; my strength is dried up like a potsherd, and my tongue cleaves to my jaws; thou dost lay me in the dust of death (Ps 22:14–15)

But thou, O LORD, be not far off! O thou my help, hasten to my aid! Deliver my soul from the sword, my life from the power of the dog! Save me from the mouth of the lion, my afflicted soul from the horns of the wild oxen! (Ps 22:19–21)

I will tell of thy name to my brethren; in the midst of the congregation I will praise thee: ... All the ends of the earth shall remember and turn to the LORD; and all the families of the nations shall worship before him. For dominion belongs to the LORD, and he rules over the nations. Posterity shall serve him; men shall tell of the Lord to the coming generation (Ps 22:22–30)

And when they had crucified him ... (Matt 27:35a)

And when they had crucified him, they divided his garments among them by casting lots (Matt 27:35b)

And about the ninth hour Jesus cried with a loud voice, "Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani?" that is, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" ... And one of them at once ran and took a sponge, filled it with vinegar, and put it on a reed, and gave it to him to drink (Matt 27:46–48)

(Tomb/Resurrection)

Great Commission:

And Jesus came and said to them, "All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me. Go therefore and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, teaching them to observe all that I have commanded you; and lo, I am with you always, to the close of the age" (Matt 28:18–20)

What are all of these allusions and quotations of Psalm 22 doing here? How do they affect our sense of the historical value of Mt's Crucifixion account, coming, as they do, at key junctures throughout the entire account?

We cannot deal with this question in isolation; the intertextuality of this passage ties into the larger question of the role of Matthew's repeated explicit quotations of the Old Testament to structure his narrative. These occur after Matthew describes some action of Jesus and adds, "Jesus did this in order to fulfill what was spoken by the prophet” and then a quotation. This pattern occurs in Mt’s text more than sixty times and is basic to the entire structure of the Gospel. The many tacit allusions to Psalm 22 in the Crucifixion account suggest that there are likely many more times that number of tacit allusions to the Old Testament (LXX) throughout Mt playing a similar role in shaping the narrative.<sup>15</sup> Unfortunately, the massive presence of this phenomenon greatly undermines the historical value of the whole Gospel because, in so many cases (including the key Crucifixion account we are considering), the narrative may have been shaped to make events conform to the Old Testament “prophecies.”

This suspicion on the part of modern critics is quite ironic, since precisely Mt’s prophecy-fulfillment feature helped make the Gospel of Matthew popular among first- and second-century Jews and Gentiles.<sup>16</sup> Edouard Massaux conducted an exhaustive study of gospel quotations in all Christian literature down to the end of the second century, and discovered that Matthew’s Gospel was by far the most popular.<sup>17</sup> In those days, Mt’s prophecy-fulfillment scheme was not regarded with suspicion, just the reverse. As George Buchanan has correctly said, “Convinced that Jesus was the Messiah and armed with these two Psalms (22 and 69), the author of this narrative did not at all presume that he was composing fiction. As a good research student, he was simply applying the scripture that was available to him.”<sup>18</sup>

I am not saying that we should reject the whole Gospel because of this feature. To begin with, in individual cases, there may in fact be a

---

<sup>15</sup> By far the most detailed discussion of the complex pattern of intertextuality of the entire Gospel of Matthew with the LXX, as well as later echoes in rabbinic literature, is G. W. Buchanan’s two-volume intertextual commentary The Gospel of Matthew (Lewiston: Mellen Biblical Press, 1996); also particularly rich in this kind of intertextual investigation is the three-volume commentary by Davies and Allison, Matthew. Focusing specifically on the formula-quotations is the classic study by K. Stendahl, School of St. Matthew and Its Use of the Old Testament (Lund: Gleerup, 1968).

<sup>16</sup> This is the most important reason the mid-second-century Christian philosopher Justin Martyr can bring forward to convince the Emperor Antoninus of the veracity of the gospels; see 1 Apol. 30, followed by an extended citation of fulfilled Old Testament prophecies with frequent explanations, §§31 to 53.

<sup>17</sup> E. Massaux, The Influence of the Gospel of Saint Matthew on Christian Literature before Saint Irenaeus, 3 vols., ed. A. J. Bellinzoni (Leuven: Peeters, 1990), 3:186–187: “Of all the New Testament writings, the Gospel of Mt. was the one whose literary influence was the most widespread and the most profound in the Christian literature that extended to the last decades of the second century.”

<sup>18</sup> Buchanan, Matthew, 2:1016; see further 2:1009.

valid historical memory that was subsequently (whether during the oral tradition level or at the redaction level) framed and interpreted by an Old Testament quotation by the early community. On the cross, Jesus may actually have cried out, “My God! My God! Why have you forsaken me!” intentionally beginning to say Psalm 22.<sup>19</sup> When the well-known second century Rabbi Aqiba was having his skin peeled off in strips by Roman soldiers in retaliation for his involvement with the Bar Kochba rebellion, he died trying to recite the Shema.<sup>20</sup> Of course, we cannot be certain of the historical value of this account either, but it is plausible. In other words, we need to assess each case.

In Mt, these scripture quotations are applied to miracles, teachings, and actions, beginning with Jesus’ birth and circumcision. Insofar as they apply to his healing and nature miracles, they raise a separate question: how should the historical critic respond to the widespread miraculous element in the gospels? Once again, this brings us into a fundamental “judgment call” far removed from the debate over source theories. As important as it is, given the scope of this essay, I must put it to one side. Before I do, I need to bring in an important part of Matthew’s Crucifixion story: the resurrection of the saints during the final stages of the Crucifixion (Matt 27:52–53).<sup>21</sup>

This passage, which is unique to Mt, clearly locates Jesus’ death (and resurrection) within the final Eschatological Drama. First would come the General Resurrection foretold by Ezekiel 37. After this would come, in the traditional scenario, God’s Judgment (Dan 7), followed by eternal reward or punishment. In other words, for Matthew, Jesus’ resurrection is not an isolated supernatural occurrence as it is in Lk (see below). For Matthew—as for Paul—it is

---

<sup>19</sup> Davies and Allison, Matthew 3:624–625, explain the differing vocalization of the saying in Matt 27:46 cf. Mark 15:34, and give a plausible historical reason for Jesus trying to speak the words of Ps 22 while on the cross.

<sup>20</sup> See b. Ber. 61b; this famous story is available in David R. Cartlidge and David L. Dungan, Documents for the Study of the Gospels (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994), 182–183.

<sup>21</sup> Buchanan, Matthew, 2:1015–1016 collects scriptural and rabbinic passages that provide further traditional meaning for this enigmatic passage. He does not mention any link between the darkness and the earthquake and rending of the Temple veil (Matt 27:45, 51), which are all signs of divine wrath at the death of his Righteous One, which—in Mt’s scenario—provides the rationale for God beginning the final eschatological events with the General Resurrection. On the culminating effect of the “woes of the Messiah,” see the Synoptic Apocalypse (Matt 24:9–22 and pars.), Dan 9:22–27; Did. 16:4–5; and for rabbinic parallels, Raphael Patai, The Messiah Texts (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1979), 95–103, “the pangs of the times.”

viewed as part of the great and terrible events of the last days: “Christ has been raised from the dead, the first fruits of those who have fallen asleep” (1 Cor 15:20, 23), and Paul gives the rest of the scenario in 1 Cor 15:23–26 (cf. 1 Thess 4:16). It should be noted that this thoroughly eschatological interpretive framework provided by Matthew is immediately abandoned by his successors: Luke, Mark, and John (more on that below). What the historian makes of the strong eschatology in the Gospel of Mt is another fundamental question, the answer to which far transcends the scope of this essay since it must be dealt with apart from any source hypothesis.

All of these features of Mt: the repeated prophecy/fulfillments worked into every aspect of the narrative, the manifold miraculous events beginning with the Virgin Birth and culminating with the Ascension, the distinctive eschatological orientation, all make it quite obvious that the Gospel of Matthew, like the other three gospels, has a fundamental theological and apologetic purpose well summed-up in the (first) conclusion to the Gospel of John: “Now Jesus did many other signs in the presence of the disciples, which are not written in this book; but these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you may have life in his name” (John 20:30–31). Although in the past scholars, noting the heavy theological component of the Gospel narratives, dismissed them as “myth,” I do not think such sweeping skepticism is justified. Many critics have learned how to make allowances for the faith-based approach of the gospels as they “read between the lines” for authentic historical reminiscences of Jesus and the disciples and the events in his life. It is at this point that we should be especially grateful for the presence of four gospels in the New Testament, not just one; each gospel has a unique agenda and a unique compositional technique. By comparing each one to the others, and working back and forth between all four, it is possible to produce a surprisingly resilient and clear-cut picture of the historical Jesus.

For this kind of comparative study, a source theory is indispensable; the alternative is a confusing, eclectic, arbitrary analysis. But not just any source theory; the wrong source theory will scramble the evidence just as surely as no source theory at all. That is precisely why so much rests on discovering the correct relationship among the gospels.

We discovered that the Crucifixion narrative in Mt exhibited the author’s (and/or possibly the oral tradition’s) custom of interweaving of the event with quotations from and/or allusions to the Old Testament, in this case especially Psalm 22. We also noted that recognizing this authorial pattern (which he may have gotten from the oral tradition) did not automatically signify that none of it was historical. The historical Jesus most likely taught his disciples and acted in conformity with some Old Testament text to make a point.<sup>22</sup> Moreover, this kind of scriptural application to the life of Jesus was typical in early first-century Palestinian Pharisaism, suggesting that the author(s) had a kind of scribal approach to telling the life of Jesus, in contrast to Luke's more authorial approach. This fact, and other features of Mt, indicated that the Gospel of Matthew, while containing a clear overall compositional narrative framework, still grouped its material by genre (sayings, miracles, mission instructions) far more than any of the other gospels. In other words, there is relatively little "overwriting"—especially as compared to the Gospel of John. For that reason, I am inclined to say that in the Gospel of Matthew, we often have the genuine words of Jesus, and many of his historical actions.

Luke's depiction of the Crucifixion of Jesus (Luke 23:33–49), while containing similar broad structural elements, differs from Mt's account (and all other Crucifixion accounts) in striking, detailed ways. First, Luke 23:34 describes Jesus forgiving those crucifying him (NB the significant textual problem with this verse), an action not found in any other gospel (but conforming to Lk's emphasis upon the non-retaliation sayings in Mt's Sermon on the Mount; see Lk 6:27–36). Luke then has the various groups mocking and deriding him (not in the same order as Mt), but, when it comes to the two thieves, instead of having them merely shout at him, as in Mt, one of the criminals cries out to Jesus to save himself and them, but the other rebukes the first, adding, "Jesus, remember me when you come in your kingly power!" Jesus replies, "This day you will be with me in paradise!" In other words, precisely in the midst of Jesus' brutal death, Luke's Jesus makes it crystal-clear that he is not in any real danger, he is not terribly concerned, since he (and the thief) will soon be in "Paradise." Then comes the darkness and the Temple curtain is torn and with a loud voice, Jesus cries—now quoting Ps 31:5 not Psalm 22—"Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit!"

---

<sup>22</sup> On Jesus' teaching methods, see B. Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript: Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998).

In sum, Luke's subtle alterations throughout create the effect of assuring his Greek audiences that Jesus was in complete control of the situation. In addition, Mt's apocalyptic framework has been completely dropped: Jesus' death is not portrayed as inaugurating the great events of the final Eschatological Drama. Instead, a new framework has been created according to which Jesus' death is presented as the courageous, selfless act of the Savior, providing an example for Christians martyrs to follow. They, too, are to forgive their tormentors and trustingly commend their spirits to God when they are unjustly arrested and executed, and Luke underlines this lesson in Acts, in his account of the first Christian martyr, Stephen, who did precisely those things Jesus did where Luke's account differed from Mt's: he forgave his tormentors (Acts 7:60) and commended his spirit to God/Christ (Acts 7:59).<sup>23</sup> In short, wherever Lk's account differs from Mt's, we can clearly see Luke's hand making secondary alterations intended to edify the Gentile Christian congregations to whom Luke addressed his Gospel. (At this point one can see an illustration of the value of the source theory I am presupposing.)

Mark 15:22–41 is very similar to Mt's account and thus like it differs greatly from Lk both in order of pericopes and in the contents of individual pericopes. What differences there are between Mk and Mt (and Lk) stand out clearly. Mk's version of Jesus' cry from the cross is consistent Aramaic "Eloi, Eloi..." not like Mt's mixed Hebrew-Aramaic "Eli..." I take Mark's version to be secondary to Mt, since "rougher is likely to be more original." Moreover, elsewhere Mark seems to have a penchant for having Jesus say (semi-)Aramaic words, e.g. "Talitha cumi," Mark 5:41 (missing in the parallels Matt 9:25 and Luke 8:54); "Ephphata" Mark 7:34 (missing in the parallel at Matt 15:30). I think Mark inserted these strange foreign words himself because his Jesus spoke magic-sounding commands when he healed, as in the modern English phrase: "Abracadabra!" Second, Mark, like Luke (and John), deleted Mt's apocalyptic framework for the Crucifixion account; another secondary characteristic.<sup>24</sup> In other words, contrary to the claims of critics utilizing any hypothesis

---

<sup>23</sup> For a more detailed analysis of the secondary character of Lk's crucifixion account vis-a-vis Mt's, see A. J. McNicol et al., Beyond the Q Impasse: Luke's Use of Matthew. A Demonstration by the Research Team of the International Institute for Gospel Studies (Valley Forge: Trinity Press International, 1996), 301–307.

<sup>24</sup> For a detailed analysis of all of the secondary characteristics of Mk's account vis-à-vis both Mt's and Lk's account, see D. B. Peabody, L. Cope, and A. J. McNicol, involving the priority of Mark, there are no important historic reminiscences in Mk's account not already better represented in Mt's account.

John 19:16–37 differs from the synoptic accounts at numerous points. Most important is the date of Jesus' Crucifixion, namely, on the day before Passover, i.e., Thursday, "the Day of Preparation" (John 19:14, 31). Scholars have offered many explanations for this strange disagreement between John and the synoptics, beginning already in patristic times.<sup>25</sup> Within the crucifixion account as such there are many themes also found in the synoptic account, including a literalistic fulfillment of Ps 22:18, "they divide my garments among them, and for my raiment they cast lots" in John 19:23–24, followed by John 19:28: "After this Jesus, knowing that all was now finished, said (to fulfill the scripture), 'I thirst'"—which echoes Ps 22:15, "my strength is dried up like a potsherd, and my tongue cleaves to my jaws." With all of these echoes, one might expect Jn to have also included the same last word found in Mt and Mk, but this would have gone directly counter to Jn's whole purpose and goal in composing his gospel. "In deliberate contrast to the passion tradition preserved for us in the Markan, synoptic line of tradition, the Crucifixion in John is Jesus' triumph... [Jesus] carries his own cross and closes his life's words with an announcement of completion and offers up his own spirit in death."<sup>26</sup> In other words, the trend we can see of "softening" the impact of Jesus' death (that it was some sort of terrible catastrophe), at the same time increasing the theme that Jesus was in complete control of events, that began in Mt and extended to Luke now culminates in John's account where Christ's death is a victory and the central event of the entire Gospel. While John's interpretation is theologically very significant, the synoptic tradition as represented by Mt is far closer to the original historical events.

---

eds., One Gospel from Two: Mark's Use of Matthew and Luke (Harrisburg: Trinity Press International, 2002), 311–321.

<sup>25</sup> C. S. Keener, The Gospel of John: A Commentary, 2 vols. (Peabody: Hendrickson, 2003), 2:1100–1103 gives a good overview of the main problems and solutions, including the possibility that Jesus and his disciples were following a sectarian calendar. He concludes that "John has simply provided a theological interpretation of Jesus' death, the way he opens Jesus' ministry with the temple cleansing [the other major chronological clash with the synoptic outline], so that the shadow of passion week may cover the whole period" (1102).

<sup>26</sup> Keener, Commentary on John, 2.1133.

5. The Last Supper and Words of Institution

In keeping with the central task of this article to focus mainly on those aspects of the gospel tradition where use of the Two Gospel Hypothesis—without recourse to the Q hypothesis or the priority of Mark—makes the most difference in interpreting the synoptic tradition, I would like to branch off from the Crucifixion account and turn next to the Last Supper account, and Jesus' words of institution regarding the cup and the bread. A reconstruction of the historical Jesus must link together closely what happened on the day of his death with the equally significant account of his last meal with his disciples, where he explains to them the purpose of his death and how he understands it. As will become evident, the Two Gospel Hypothesis becomes very useful in helping to clear up famous and long-standing areas of confusion (largely caused by exegesis assuming the Two Source Hypothesis) regarding what actually happened on that occasion.

As before, on the Two Gospel Hypothesis, one begins by considering Mt's account, compares it to Lk's, and then the others. In general, critics have noted how terse and brief Mt's account of the Last Supper is; it is the shortest of the three synoptic accounts. Nevertheless it has a definite, step-wise, internal logic.<sup>27</sup>

- a. Matt 26:20: Jesus is with the twelve disciples: his "family" (Passover is a family festival), who will be judges in the New Israel (cf. Matt 19:28 where Jesus had said to them, "Truly, I say to you, in the new world, when the Son of man shall sit on his glorious throne, you who have followed me will also sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel"). In this way, Matthew decisively sets the scene for what is to follow.
- b. Matt 26:21–25: Everything else about the beginning of the meal is ignored. In the midst of the Passover meal, Jesus warns them that one of them will betray him and he will soon die, so that "the Son of Man goes as it is written of him"—referring to the suffering and death of the Servant (Isa 53) as the Son of Man (see further below on "Son of Man"). This reference to his impending betrayal and death provides

---

<sup>27</sup> For the points made here, see the more complete discussions in William R. Farmer, The Gospel of Jesus: The Pastoral Relevance of the Synoptic Problem (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1994), 52–63, ch. 5: "The Lord's Supper," and A. Leske, "Commentary on Matthew" in William R. Farmer et al., The International Bible Commentary. A Catholic and Ecumenical Commentary for the Twenty-First Century (Collegeville: The Liturgical Press, 1998), 1388–1389.

- the motivation for the next act: Jesus ritually inducts the Twelve, the nucleus of the eschatological Israel, into the New Covenant prophesied by Jeremiah.
- c. Matt 26:26–28: Jesus blesses, breaks and shares the bread and the cup of wine and commands his disciples to partake of his body and blood of the New Covenant “poured out for many for the forgiveness of sins” combining the redemptive death of the Servant in Isa 53:1–12 with the eschatological prophecy in Jer 31:31 and the covenant ceremony in Exod 24:8, and Zech 9:11. In this way they can be participants in the eschatological covenant predicted by the prophets.
  - d. Matt 26:29: After the dramatic complex of thoughts uttered so far, Jesus reassures his beloved disciples that he is doing all this voluntarily, on purpose, and will soon “drink [the cup] new in my Father’s kingdom” with them.
  - e. Matt 26:30: They sing a hymn and head out for the Garden of Gethsemane on the Mount of Olives.

For decades critics have tried to understand the historical Jesus by down-playing elements of Mt not found in Mk, and trying to interpret the remainder of Mt’s account as a “Judaizing” revision of Mk. In the process, they have simultaneously not noticed the coherence of Mt’s portrayal, disregarded sound evidence for the historical Jesus level in Mt, and undermined the theology of the church based on this important pericope.<sup>28</sup> My reaction to the carefully structured account in Mt 27 is to grant that we can see the hand of the final redactor here, tying together many theological strands that go back to key passages in his gospel.<sup>29</sup> Nevertheless, the basic outlines of the scene seem historical to me: Jesus could have been quite aware who would play the traitor in his small band; whether he urged him on or made some sort of comment during the Meal can no longer be decided but seems secondary. More importantly, Jesus’ portraying himself as the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 53, while referring to the Eschatological Covenant of Jer 31:31, and tying in the Danielic Son of Man, all correspond to so many earlier authentic sayings and actions of Jesus that I find it excessively skeptical to dismiss the statements in the Words of Institution as completely unhistorical (as the Bultmann School and their recent descendants in the Jesus Seminar have done). Moreover, if Jesus actually chose twelve disciples and if he knew he would die soon because of a plot against him, would he not have enacted some sort of symbolic deed or ritual to underline the eschatological significance of “the Twelve”—drawing upon the rich symbolism of the Passover Meal—at their last meal together?

<sup>28</sup> See the great cost to the church resulting from the enormous distortions caused by this approach, described in Farmer, Gospel of Jesus, 61–63, “The Lord’s Supper and the Two Source Hypothesis.”

<sup>29</sup> For a brief account of the main ones, see Peabody, One Gospel from Two, 284–288, “The Secondary Character of Mark to Matthew in the Account of the Last Supper.”

These conclusions are consistent with the likely historical scenario lying behind the passion narrative in the Gospel of Matthew as a whole: Jesus allowed himself to be arrested, objected to the bogus “trial” as it went through its illegal process, voluntarily submitted to his death while protesting against the gross injustice of it, and announced to friend (disciples) and foe (High Priest) alike that he would soon be with “his Father” while they would see the Hand of Judgment drawing nigh (Matt 26:64–65).

Lk’s account of the Last Supper (Luke 22:7–38) differs markedly from Mt’s account, re-arranging the pericopes and adding much new content. On the Two Gospel Hypothesis, I would argue that Luke has revised Mt for a number of reasons arising from his desire to communicate a differently nuanced kerygma to the Gentile Christian churches of Paul’s mission field. Most important, Luke desired to portray a very different understanding of Jesus’ death (as a moral example) and of the disciples (standing for both the church leadership of his own time, and also the suffering, waiting community). On the over-arching redactional level, Luke needed to revise Mt’s entire passion/resurrection account because he wanted to prepare the conclusion of his gospel so that it would flow smoothly into his second narrative, the Acts of the Apostles, which is the story of the adventures of the leadership of the immediate post-Easter community. Viewed from this perspective, all of the parts of Luke’s account of the Last Supper that differ from Mt’s account stand out sharply and can be identified and accounted for.<sup>30</sup> This does not mean that all of them are secondary, coming from the redactional level of tradition, so that none of them stems from the historical Jesus level; I feel confident that for many of his alterations, Luke was following another source beside Mt, namely what he learned from Jesus' family.<sup>31</sup>

---

<sup>30</sup> For a thorough account of the secondary character of Lk’s Last Supper account vis-à-vis Mt, see McNicol et al., Beyond the Q Impasse, 276–287, “Luke’s Revision of Matthew’s Account of the Last Supper,” with three synoptic charts more exact and complete than any currently in print.

What are the main outlines of the Lukan redactional alterations and additions? To start with, Luke has transformed Mt's terse, somewhat abrupt scene into a longer story having several parts, each with considerable drama, worthy of the occasion. Luke sets to one side Mt's rough and abrupt "When it was evening and the twelve were sitting at the table, he said, 'Truly I say to you, one of you will betray me...'" (Matt 26:20–21), and creates Luke 22:15–17 which simultaneously announces his impending suffering (Luke 22:15), utters a prophecy about not eating "it" (i.e., bread) until "it is fulfilled in the Kingdom of God" (Luke 22:16)—which is precisely what happens when he breaks bread with Cleopas and the other man at Emmaus (Luke 24:30)—and creates a bond of brotherhood in the Paschal "cup of thanksgiving" (Luke 22:17). Luke 22:18 concludes the opening unit by reaching forward to Matt 26:29, Jesus' eschatological hope to be with them all again in "the Kingdom of my Father," and uses it to end the first speech, greatly weakening the eschatological hope and inadvertently(?) introducing a second reference to a cup.

The next unit introduces the Words of Institution (Luke 22:19–20) and it contains a major textual problem because centuries of copyists tried to reconcile Lk's reference to two cups with the one cup of the other gospels. The profusion of textual alternatives has led modern text critics to question the originality of Luke 22:19b–20, but I regard this passage as belonging to original Luke. Part of the problem results from the fact that Luke has blended 1 Cor 11:24–25 with Matt 26:26–28,<sup>32</sup> because his audience would be composed of Gentile Christians

---

<sup>31</sup> I consider it very significant that Simeon, Jesus' nephew and son of Clopas/Cleopas, was bishop of Jerusalem (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.11; 4.5.3; 4.22.4) at the time Luke was composing his Gospel. It helps me understand the extraordinary fact that in Luke's post-resurrection narrative, the first male the Risen Jesus explains "all the scriptures" to is not one of the Eleven, but Cleopas, Jesus' uncle (the same person as Clopas and his wife Mary, mentioned in John 19:25)—not one of the Twelve. Why did Luke portray the Risen Lord explaining all the scriptures to his uncle? Something major is going on here. Luke would not give such a big signal for no reason. I believe it gives a window into the rationale for Luke's meticulous rearrangement of the Matthean narrative so that events were "in the proper order." How did he know what to put where? On the basis of inside information directly from Jesus' family. For further discussion, see McNicol et al., Beyond the Q Impasse, 314.

<sup>32</sup> For a lengthy discussion of the important textual variants in Luke's version of the Last Supper, see Metzger, Textual Commentary, 173–177; for a discussion of the textual evidence from a Two Gospel point of view, see McNicol et al., Beyond the Q Impasse, 283–284.

in Paul's churches used to Paul's liturgical tradition for the Eucharist. Modern Two Source critics merely see "harmonization" (which it is), but it is original.

Without a pause, Luke introduces the third part of the Last Supper, Jesus' announcement that one from among them will soon betray him, adding the shocked reaction of the disciples (missing in Mt; see Luke 22:21–23). This reaction, in light of what comes next, comes across as totally hypocritical, "What?! Who would do such a terrible thing? Tsk Tsk." Because, at that point, Luke moves with exquisite irony to the fourth part of his version of the Last Supper story: a shocking scene—in light of all that Jesus has just said—of petty squabbling among the disciples as to who would be the boss after Jesus died: "A dispute arose among them as to which of them was to be regarded as the greatest" (τὸ μείζων 'the most important,' Luke 22:24). This verse is missing in Mt, indicating that Luke is now departing from Mt's order, and the next words of Jesus in Luke, a response to the portrayal of wretched egotism among his disciples, are two sayings imported from locations several chapters earlier: the word on selfless leadership from Matt 20:25–28, and the reference to eating and drinking with Christ in "his" Kingdom (Luke 22:29–30//Matt 19:28). I believe Luke's purpose for bringing this subject up precisely here, with the attendant words of advice from the Lord, is because the Christian community of Luke's day (roughly the late sixth decade of the first century) was plagued by squabbling between factions and, no doubt, church leaders claiming supreme apostolic authority (Paul mentions this problem). When better to have a "word from the Lord" on who was the "most important"?

For the next speech, Luke reaches forward in Mt's outline (Matt 26:34–35) and brings Jesus' prophecy of Peter's denial back into the middle of the Last Supper. Looking at Mt's outline, it is in fact strikingly awkward to have Jesus bring the theme of betrayal after the supper while they are walking in the dark toward Gethsemane, after they had just sung a hymn together (what hymn was that?)—a detail both Luke and Mark omit because it clashes so much with the dramatic context. Luke wants to soften Mt's version of the prediction of Peter's denial and has the Lord combine the prediction of the denial with an affirmation, "after you have repented, strengthen your brothers" (Luke 22:32)—which Peter immediately lives up to in the early chapters of Acts.

Finally, Luke's Last Supper comes to an end with a curious little interchange between Jesus and the twelve which ends by Jesus recommending that they should arm themselves with a sword because they will need it. As far as I can see, exegetes should be careful not to read too much into this pericope, since its sole purpose is to make it clear that one of the disciples had a sword ready to use in the next pericope, the Arrest at Gethsemane, a typical Lukan compositional technique.

Most if not all of Luke's changes seem to me clearly secondary to Mt's account (and Mk as well, since Mk is so similar to Mt). The words of institution are different since this Gospel was intended to be read in the churches using Paul's tradition of the Last Supper Words of Institution. The prophecy about Peter seems clearly intended to prepare for the later leadership role in the first part of Acts. And the business about the swords—which has elicited great anguish from pacifist interpreters of Jesus' ethics—is simply Luke's way of having one of Jesus' disciples ready to use it during the mob-scene at Gethsemane (Luke 22:49). In short, little in Luke's Last Supper account reflects significant reminiscences of the historical Jesus.<sup>33</sup>

Mk's account of the Last Supper (Mark 14:12–26) is almost as brief as Mt's and much of it is identical in wording (66 out of 77 total words). It has, of course, been widely considered as Mt's main source and the slight differences have been explained as due to Matthew's stylistic preferences. What has not been noticed in the past is that Mk's text can be viewed as a careful blending of all of the points where Mt and Lk have the same or similar wording in the same relative order. This linguistic phenomenon conforms to one of the basic compositional objectives of the author of Mark claimed by advocates of the Two Gospel Hypothesis: namely, it was one of Mark's goals to record similar traditions in Mt and Lk that occur in the same order.<sup>34</sup> In this scene, Mk has elected to not include any of Lk's additions, with the result that Mk's account is as short, or actually shorter, than Mt's. Any evidence as to its secondary character will be in some of the important details.<sup>35</sup>

Thus we have discussed the Words of Institution in the synoptic gospels (there are none in the Gospel of John) and seen that the

<sup>33</sup> For explanations of these elaborations and redeployments of Matthean texts, see McNicol et al., Beyond the Q Impasse, 284–285.

<sup>34</sup> See for a further elaboration Peabody, One Gospel from Two, 60–63.

<sup>35</sup> For a detailed exploration of the secondary character of Mk's account vis-à-vis Matthew, see Peabody et al., eds., One Gospel from Two, 284–288.

Matthean redaction is clearly more original than Luke's or Mark's, and that at the base of the Matthean account is a historical foundation whereby Jesus prepared his disciples for the terrible events about to unfold, inducted his disciples into the New eschatological Covenant in his blood, combining the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 53 with Jeremiah 31, and announced the subsequent, glorious dénouement when they would be with him in "his Father's kingdom" sitting on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, whatever that may have meant originally.

We have come to the end of what I regard as the most historically reliable starting point in the reconstruction of the historical Jesus: the Crucifixion Account and the Last Supper. It now remains to add further examples from pericopes usually thought of as Q material (or Q–Mark Overlaps) to flesh out what we have established so far.

6. The Parables of Jesus—a Uniquely Reliable Type of Tradition

The choice of the best place to begin examining the sayings material is exceedingly important. As with the narrative tradition, I think also here the thing to do is begin with sayings material that is, according to a consensus of historians, the most likely to go back to the historical Jesus: the parables.

I concur with J. Jeremias and others who claim that the parables in the gospels are a uniquely reliable tradition.<sup>36</sup> There are three reasons for this view: first, while widely used in contemporaneous and later rabbinic teaching,<sup>37</sup> genuine parables are not found anywhere else in the New Testament or anywhere else in all of early Christianity. That means that Jesus was unique in all of early Christianity in his frequent, habitual use of parables. There are extended metaphors (the body analogy in 1 Cor 12:12–31), apocalyptic visions and typologies (Apocalypse of John), and moral exhortations, but no parables. Why not? There are many proposed explanations for this fact, which are not necessary to rehearse here. The point I am interested in is the opposite inference: since there were no other creators/users of parables in early Christianity, the chances that the parable tradition was a complete invention and introduced into the sayings tradition during the second, oral period, or at the third, redactional level by the gospel authors, are much lower.

---

<sup>36</sup> See J. Jeremias, Parables of Jesus (New York: Scribner, 1963), 10–22; further B. H. Young, The Parables: Jewish Tradition and Christian Interpretation (Peabody: Hendrickson, 1998), 37–38.

<sup>37</sup> Young, Parables, 4; D. Stern, Parables in Midrash: Narrative and Exegesis in Rabbinic Literature (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1991), 188–189, cites David Flusser's pioneering work in proving that "Jesus' parables and the Rabbinic meshalim share compositional similarities—formulaic elements of diction, stereotyped themes, and motifs—which indicate that they were both part of a single genre of traditional narrative."

Secondly, they have a clear, distinctive form.<sup>38</sup> Alterations, insertions, secondary additions stand out clearly and can be removed, so that the original parable can be seen. In this they are like sonnets: a sonnet is supposed to have 14 lines. If there is a sonnet with 22 lines, there is a good chance some lines have been added. If the suspicious lines are removed and the sonnet makes better sense, that is also evidence that they were secondary accretions. The same applies to the parables. This applies especially to the allegorical interpretations fastened to them in the tradition; they are all secondary.<sup>39</sup>

Third, we get the impression of a single “voice” or personality in the gospel parables; a distinctive point of view.<sup>40</sup> The problem is that these parables have been lifted out of their original historical context. Each one is like hearing one-half of a phone conversation. The interpretive task is to reconstruct the other half of the conversation, that is, reconstruct the original historical situation in which they were spoken.

Two examples where parables may have fragments of their original historical context still attached to them are in Luke 7. They are the parable of the children in the market-place, where both Jesus and John the Baptist are criticized and rejected (Luke 7:24–35), followed by the parable of the two debtors, told in the context of a dinner visit of Jesus to Simon, a Pharisee (Luke 7:36–50). These two settings, especially the latter, are rich with irony, full of color, and vividly illustrate Jesus’ wit and penetrating insight. No doubt Luke enhanced and sharpened the vivid details in the latter scene of the woman “crashing the party” at Simon’s house, but even so, the parable of the two debtors fits the context like a glove, and so is a good example of what would certainly be the case if we only knew the original historical settings of all the other parables in Matthew 13//Luke 6//Mark 4. As Jeremias says, the original parables “correct, reprove, attack... Every one of them calls for immediate response.”<sup>41</sup> As it is, these chapters contain “strings of pearls”—a chain of mysterious comparisons, with the first one, the Parable of the Sower, allegorically interpreted to suggest to the reader how to interpret the rest. The early church Fathers certainly took the hint.

<sup>38</sup> Young, Parables, 23–24.

<sup>39</sup> Jeremias, Parables, 12–13, Young, Parables, 14; but see the nuanced rejection of the hyper-strict division between parable and allegory in Stern, Parables in Midrash, 10–13.

<sup>40</sup> Jeremias, Parables, 12 and passim; Young, Parables.

Once one has studied the parables and worked at understanding their original meanings (which means reconstructing their original settings, Jesus’ original audiences, etc.), one has the beginnings of an understanding of Jesus’ message to various groups.<sup>42</sup> To do this with any hope of historical accuracy one must know the original order of composition of the gospels, so as to compare the evolving parable tradition correctly.

7. The Lord’s Prayer and the Beatitudes

Q theoreticians stumble around trying to decide if the Lord’s Prayer (Matt 6:9–15//Luke 11:2–4) was a Q text or a liturgical tradition transmitted in two (or more) versions. The problem is that their usual methods of argumentation (Luke is usually more original than Mt) does not work in this case because while Lk’s version is shorter (and therefore presumably more original), Mt’s version has several obviously original features.<sup>43</sup> In fact, the secondary features of Lk’s version stand out and can easily be explained. The main difference is that Lk’s version has de-eschatologized the prayer almost completely: the omission of Matt 6:10b, the change of Mt’s “bread of tomorrow” = Kingdom of God to a practical petition for “daily bread” (compare the similarly de-eschatologized, practical realism of Lk’s Beatitudes,

---

<sup>41</sup> Jeremias, Parables, 21.

<sup>42</sup> Many important studies of the “message of the parables” have been published recently. Some of my favorites are Jeremias, Parables (still useful); Young, Parables; K. E. Bailey, Poet & Peasant; and, Through Peasant Eyes: A Literary-Cultural Approach to the Parables in Luke (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983); R. W. Funk, Jesus as Precursor, ed. E. F. Beutner (Sonoma: Polebridge Press, 1994).

<sup>43</sup> See the evidence of hesitancy and confusion in the discussion of John Kloppenborg, Q Parallels: Synopsis, Critical Notes & Concordance (Sonoma: Polebridge Press, 1988), 84–85.

discussed below), and the omission of the reference to Satan and the eschatological time of testing (Matt 6:13b). Other features: Mt's "debts" (Matt 6:12) is more original; Lk's "sins" (Luke 11:4) is what Mt's version means, but has been altered to conform to the usage in Paul's churches.<sup>44</sup>

Luke's abbreviations and other changes are neither surprising nor indications of superior historical value, as they are clearly driven by a desire to make the prayer conform to the worship customs in his Gentile context. Moreover, the de-eschatologizing can be found throughout the Gospel of Luke whenever there is a parallel pericope in Mt redolent of eschatological perspectives and language. What Luke always does (and we have seen two examples already in the Crucifixion and the Last Supper) is to drive the content in ethical, moralistic directions, an agenda provided with a dramatic starting-point in Luke's creation of Jesus' Inaugural Sermon in the synagogue at Nazareth (Luke 4:16–30). Bringing the account of the Rejection at Nazareth in Matt 13:54–58 forward to the context of Jesus' return to Capernaum/Nazareth after the Temptation (Luke 4:14//Matt 4:12), Luke creates a vignette of Jesus giving the first public speech of his career in the synagogue of his home town, where he reads a "prophecy" from the prophet Isa 61:1–2 which enunciates an exclusively this-worldly social reform program: "release to the captives, sight to the blind, liberty for the oppressed."

Luke's extensive changes to the Beatitudes (Matt 5:3–12//Luke 6:20–26) arise from the same practical agenda. Not only is Mt's liturgical, poetic structure destroyed, but Luke introduces a striking shift of Mt's spiritual emphasis ("Blessed are the poor in spirit" ... "Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness") to a strictly utilitarian, social reform agenda: "Blessed are you poor, you who are hungry, you who weep..." and the converse: "Woe to you who are rich, to you who are full (of food), to you who laugh..." (Luke 6:24). This pronounced anti-wealth, anti-establishment theme runs throughout Lk, from the Infancy narrative, where Jesus is born in a stable with society's lowest classes to welcome him, through the anti-extortion preaching of the John the Baptist (Luke 3:10–14), and on to such parables as the Rich Fool (Luke 12:13–21) and Lazarus and Dives (Luke 16:19–31), and the calling of Zacchaeus the Tax Collector (Luke 19:1–10). It fits in with Lk's downplaying of Jesus' Jewish Messianism in favor of Jesus Christ as the Son of God, the Savior of the poor, outcast, and disenfranchised of the world.

---

<sup>44</sup> For further discussion of the secondary character of Lk's Lord's Prayer, see McNicol, et al., Beyond the Q Impasse, 174.

8. Son of Man—Son of God

Suppose one desired to look into the question of what Jesus thought of himself? One of the best places to look would be the Son of Man sayings—a notorious crux interpretum. All references to the Son of Man are on the lips of Jesus and they seem alternatively to be substitutes for “I,” references to an eschatological person (not himself), and still other references that are difficult to categorize. They occur in all four gospels, as well as the Gospel of Thomas. Paul never uses the term, but it is found in an Old Testament quotation cited in the Epistle to the Hebrews and twice in the Apocalypse of John.

I will not enter into a detailed discussion here (it would greatly exceed the intended confines of this essay), but simply make some methodological observations and give a few tentative conclusions based on the Two Gospel approach. First of all, it is critical which synopsis one uses. Evidence visible in one synopsis disappears altogether in another, so create your own and use more than one.<sup>45</sup> Second, be sure to use a concordance to the Greek text; some recent dis-genderized translations, such as the New Revised Standard Version, cause “son of man” to disappear into “people.” Better yet, use a computer program like Accordance Software for Biblical Studies (available only for Macintosh computers), or other similar computer applications that can perform concordance searches, and compile a complete list of all occurrences of Son of Man in the Bible. The resulting list will reveal:

- pericopes where Son of Man in Mt is parallel to “I” in Lk and Mk: Mt 9:6, cf. Luke 5:24//Mark 2:10; Matt 16:13, cf. Luke 9:18//Mark 8:27. It is used thirteen times in the Gospel of John as a cryptic kind of self-reference (equivalent to “I”).

---

<sup>45</sup> I recommend the recently published, color-coded synopsis created by David B. Peabody with Lamar Cope and Allan J. McNicol, A Synopsis of Mark: A Synopsis of the First Three Gospels Showing the Parallels to the Markan Text, available only on CD from Trinity Press International (1992). It can also be gotten from D. Peabody or T. R. W. Longstaff; contact <http://www.synoptic.info>.

- pericopes where the Son of Man is a future, eschatological figure of judgment as in Dan 7, Wisdom of Solomon 1–6, the Parables of Enoch (1 Enoch 37–71), and 4 Ezra 11–13: Matt 10:23; 13:37; 13:41; 16:27; 19:28 cf. Luke 22:30; 24:27 cf. 17:24; 24:30; 24:37 cf. Luke 17:26; 24:39; 24:44 cf. Luke 12:40; 25:31; 26:64.
- pericopes where the suffering and death of the Son of Man are predicted, similar to the Servant passages in Isa 52–53: Matt 12:40 cf. Luke 11:30; 17:19 cf. Mark 9:9; 17:12; 17:22 cf. Luke 9:44//Mark 9:31; 20:18 cf. Luke 18:31//Mark 10:33; 20:28 cf. Mark 10:45; 26:2; 26:24 cf. Luke 22:22//Mark 14:21; 26:45 cf. Mark 14:41.
- pericopes having a kind of wisdom orientation: Matt 8:20; 11:19.
- pericopes with Son of Man sayings difficult to categorize: Matt 11:19 cf. Luke 7:34; 12:8 cf. Luke 6:5//Mark 2:27; 12:32 cf. Luke 12:10 (this group includes the examples in the first category).

These sayings reveal a rich, dense mixture of traditions reaching back to Daniel (the eschatological Judge), the Parables of Enoch (a royal, messianic figure), the Wisdom of Solomon (a suffering, persecuted person who will be the eschatological judge), and Isaiah 52–53 (suffering Servant personification of righteous Israel).<sup>46</sup> As such, this dense, complex, composite portrait corresponds in its main outlines to the historical picture we get from the Crucifixion, the Last Supper, and the parables. Using the correct source theory to sort out the true, original relationships among the gospels is of course absolutely critical. On the Two Gospel Hypothesis, Matthew’s Danielic eschatological one like a son of man is joined with the suffering and dying Servant of Isaiah 52–53, while other sayings closely parallel 1 Enoch’s eschatological Messiah/Judge Son of Man (esp. in Matthew 24).<sup>47</sup> This complex persona is clearly simplified and narrowed in Luke and Mark; the Gospel of John takes it in a very different direction, combining it with his Logos typology. By the second century, it has lost its original significance altogether. Ignatius uses “son of man” in parallel with “son of God” to depict the two aspects of Christ’s nature, human and divine (Eph. 20.2), as do the Epistle of Barnabas 12.10 and Justin Martyr in Dial. Tryph. 100.3.

<sup>46</sup> See the superb discussion on Son of Man by George Nicklesburg, “Son of Man,” in The Anchor Bible Dictionary, ed. D. N. Freedman et al. (Doubleday 1992), 6:137–150.

<sup>47</sup> For a good overview of Mt’s Son of Man Christology, see Adrian Leske, Dennis Farkasfalvy, and Rudolf Pesch, “Commentary on Matthew,” in W. R. Farmer et al., The International Bible, 1258–1259.

9. Conclusion

Much more could be said about the topics I have covered, as well as the many other major issues involved in reconstructing the historical Jesus without recourse to the Q Hypothesis, and the previous hypothesis upon which it depends: the Priority of Mark. To see detailed discussions of many of them, I recommend Adrian Leske's commentary on Matthew,<sup>48</sup> David Peabody, Lamar Cope, and Allan McNicol's study of the composition of the Gospel of Mark,<sup>49</sup> Allan McNicol, David Dungan, and David Peabody's study of the composition of the Gospel of Luke,<sup>50</sup> and William Farmer's introduction to the ethical and theological consequences of following the Two Gospel Hypothesis as opposed to the Two Source Hypothesis.<sup>51</sup>

---

<sup>48</sup> Leske, Commentary on Matthew.

<sup>49</sup> Peabody et al., eds., One Gospel from Two.

<sup>50</sup> McNicol et al., Beyond the Q Impasse.

<sup>51</sup> Farmer, Gospel of Jesus.

THE ROLE OF ARAMAIC IN RECONSTRUCTING THE TEACHING OF JESUS

MAURICE CASEY

1. Introduction

Jesus spoke Aramaic, both when conversing with his disciples, and when teaching crowds of ordinary Jews. His teaching is however transmitted to us in gospels written in Greek. The occasional Aramaic word alone survives, and most of these occur in comments made by him or his disciples rather than in his teaching. For example, ταλιθα κουμ (Mark 5:41) correctly represents the Aramaic טליתא קום, “girl, get up,” so we have two of Jesus’ ipsissima verba.<sup>1</sup> Occasional reports by the church fathers show us that more was once available. For example, at Matt 6:11, Jerome comments on the most difficult word in the Lord’s Prayer:

In Evangelio quod appellatur secundum Hebraeos, pro supersubstantiali pane mahar reperi, quod dicitur crastinum, ut sit sensus: Panem nostrum crastinum, id est futurum, da nobis hodie.<sup>2</sup>

In the Gospel which is called “according to the Hebrews,” for “bread necessary for existence” I found “mahar,” which means “tomorrow’s,” so that the meaning is, “Give us today our bread ‘for tomorrow’” that is, “for the future.”

Here Jerome found a correct tradition that behind the difficult ἐπιούσιον lay the straightforward Aramaic word מחר, which means “to-morrow’s.” This supplies us with one more of the ipsissima verba of Jesus, one used in a fundamental piece of his teaching, and it helps us greatly to interpret this piece of his teaching. It also tells us that there was once a gospel written in Aramaic. Unfortunately, however, all such source material has long since vanished. The nearest we get to Aramaic gospels are the translations of our canonical Greek gospels into Syriac.<sup>3</sup> These do not show significant signs of independent transmission of the teaching of Jesus.

---

<sup>1</sup> For more detailed discussion, see P. M. Casey, “Aramaic Idiom and the Son of Man Problem: A Response to Owen and Shepherd,” JSNT 25 (2002): 3–32, at 9–10.

<sup>2</sup> For the text, D. Hurst and M. Adriaen, eds., S. Hieronymi Presbyteri Opera. Pars I, 7. Commentariorum in Matheum Libri IV, CCSL 77 (Turnholt: Brepols, 1969). I have followed the reading “mahar,” other readings being due to scribal difficulties over an unfamiliar word.

There is no agreement among scholars as to what to do about this. At one end of the spectrum, I have argued that we can reconstruct Aramaic sources of parts of the Gospel of Mark and of what scholars call "Q." This helps us to locate the teaching of Jesus in its original cultural context. In this way, we can demonstrate that he really did say some of the things attributed to him in our oldest sources, and we can see much more clearly and accurately what he originally meant.<sup>4</sup> From this perspective, the role of Aramaic is central to reconstructing and understanding the teaching of Jesus. At the other end of the spectrum, some scholars have argued that Jesus taught in Greek, and this view has recently been revived by Stanley Porter.<sup>5</sup> From this perspective, Aramaic has no role to play in reconstructing the teaching of Jesus. In practice, the majority of New Testament scholars suppose that Jesus generally taught in Aramaic, but they do not learn it properly, and make little use of it in interpreting his teaching.

---

<sup>3</sup> G. A. Kiraz, ed., Comparative Edition of the Syriac Gospels, Aligning the Sinaiticus, Curetonianus, Peshîttâ and Harklean Versions, 4 vols., NTTTS 21 (Leiden: Brill, 1996); cf. also A. S. Lewis and M. D. Gibson, eds., The Palestinian Syriac Lectionary of the Gospels, Re-edited from Two Sinai MSS. and from P. de Lagarde's Edition of the "Evangelium Hierosolymitanum" (London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co., 1899).

<sup>4</sup> P. M. Casey, Aramaic Sources of Mark's Gospel, SNTSMS 102 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998); idem, An Aramaic Approach to Q: Sources for the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, SNTSMS 122 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002).

<sup>5</sup> See especially D. Diodati, DE CHRISTO GRAECE LOQUENTE EXERCITATIO (Naples: Raymundus, 1767; repr. London: Gladding, 1843); A. Roberts, Greek: The Language of Christ and his Apostles (London: Longmans, Green & Co., 1888); T. K. Abbott, Essays, Chiefly on the Original Texts of the Old and New Testaments (London: Longmans, Green & Co., 1891), 129–182; N. Turner, "The Language of Jesus and his Disciples," in Grammatical Insights into the New Testament (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1965), 174–188, repr. in The Language of the New Testament: Classic Essays, ed. S. E. Porter, JSNTSup 60 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1991), 174–190; S. E. Porter, "Did Jesus Ever Teach in Greek?," TynBul 44 (1993): 199–235, rev. as "Jesus and the Use of Greek in Galilee," in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTTTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 123–154; S. E. Porter, The Criteria for Authenticity in Historical-Jesus Research: Previous Discussion and New Proposals, JSNTSup 191 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), esp. 95–97, 164–180.

2. History of Research

Serious modern research into the Aramaic level of the teaching of Jesus effectively began with J. T. Marshall in the 1890's.<sup>6</sup> Marshall put forward clear arguments for supposing that Jesus spoke Aramaic. For example, he explained ταλιθα κουμι (Mark 5:41) as Jesus' native Aramaic.<sup>7</sup> His account of the problems which arise in the translation process was the best produced at that time.<sup>8</sup> He was not however able to make his case for a detectable Aramaic Urevangelium. One major problem was that there was not enough ancient Aramaic for scholars to work with. A major problem within scholarship was that Aramaic explanations were sought for synoptic variants when editing by Matthew or Luke was altogether more probable. For example, Marshall proposed that ὀφειλήματα at Matt 6:12, and ἁμαρτίας at Luke 11:4, were two translations from the Aramaic ܐܘܪܝܢܐ ("our debts" in the sense of "our sins").<sup>9</sup> In response, W. C. Allen properly pointed out that the extraordinary Greek ἐπιούσιον at both Matt 6:11 and Luke 11:3 implies a single Greek translation of the whole Lord's prayer.<sup>10</sup> It follows that revision of the Aramaizing ὀφειλήματα by Luke, who preferred to write the more normal Greek ἁμαρτίας, is a more probable explanation of this difference. Indeed, following criticisms of his work by Allen and by S. R. Driver,<sup>11</sup> Marshall did not revise his articles to produce a monograph, though he did write a very vigorous reply.<sup>12</sup> This was regrettable, because in the succeeding decades, other English-speaking scholars do not seem to have been properly acquainted <sup>6</sup> J. T. Marshall, "The Aramaic Gospel," Expositor 4.3 (1891): 1-17, 109-124, 205-220, 275-291, 375-390, 452-467; 4 (1891): 208-223, 373-388, 435-448; 6 (1892): 81-97. For brief reviews of comments from the pre-critical era, see A. Meyer, Jesu Muttersprache: Das galiläische Aramäisch in seiner Bedeutung für die Erklärung der Reden Jesus und der Evangelien überhaupt (Freiburg i.B./Leipzig: Mohr [Siebeck], 1896), 7-27; Casey, Aramaic Sources of Mark's Gospel, 1-6.

<sup>7</sup> Marshall, "Aramaic Gospel," Expositor 4.3 (1891): 11.

<sup>8</sup> Ibid.: 116-118.

<sup>9</sup> Ibid.: 124, 281-282.

<sup>10</sup> W. C. Allen, "The Aramaic Gospel," Expositor 4.7 (1893): 454-470 (at 468-469).

<sup>11</sup> Cf. Allen, "The Aramaic Gospel"; S. R. Driver, "Professor Marshall's Aramaic Gospel," Expositor 4.8 (1893): 388-400, 419-431.

<sup>12</sup> J. T. Marshall, "The Aramaic Gospel. Reply to Dr. Driver and Mr. Allen," Expositor 4.8 (1893): 176-192.

with the first outstanding monograph on this subject: Meyer, Jesu Muttersprache (1896).<sup>13</sup>

Meyer set out the main evidence that Jesus taught in Aramaic.<sup>14</sup> He also attempted the well-nigh impossible task of determining which Aramaic sources should be used in reconstructing Jesus' teaching. He naturally wanted to use Galilean Aramaic, but then as now there were no first-century sources for this dialect. Meyer used the Jewish Aramaic of the Yerushalmi and Christian Palestinian Syriac, because this was the best he could do. He made the fundamental advance of offering reconstructions of whole Aramaic sentences, and showed that, despite the rather late date of the sources which he used, this was a great help in locating Jesus' teaching in its original cultural context. For example, he offered this reconstruction from Mark 2:27–28:<sup>15</sup>

שבתא בגין ברנשא איתעבידת ולא ברנשא בגין שבתא:
גגלל כן מריה הוא דשבתא ברנשא.

The greatest advantage of this reconstruction is that the final example of ברנשא appears as it must appear in Aramaic, as a normal term for "man." This is an inevitable effect of a complete reconstruction, and only a complete reconstruction can do this. This illustrates what an important advance Meyer made.

At the same time, Meyer's work left behind difficult problems for any scholar interested in continuing such work. The most serious was the lack of early Aramaic source material. This was not Meyer's fault, and there was nothing anyone could do about it until more source material was discovered. Consequently, Meyer used a wider range of Aramaic than was available to Jesus. This made his results very difficult to assess. It also meant that he produced too many puns, some of them in very unlikely places. The most serious was the Fourth Gospel. For example, Meyer proposed this for Jesus' saying at John 8:34:<sup>16</sup>

כל עבדי (דְעֵבִיד) עוויא עבדא הוא דעוויא

<sup>13</sup> Meyer, Jesu Muttersprache: Das galiläische Aramäisch in seiner Bedeutung für die Erklärung der Reden Jesus und der Evangelien überhaupt (see n. 6).

<sup>14</sup> Ibid., esp. 35–72.

<sup>15</sup> Ibid., 93.

<sup>16</sup> Ibid., 79, using the wordplay suggested by A. Smith Lewis, A Translation of the Four Gospels from the Syriac of the Sinaitic Palimpsest (London: Macmillan, 1894), xv.

This suggestion is quite misleading because the Fourth Gospel was written in Greek, and suggestions like this could persuade people that there was really a genuine Aramaic underlay, and this could have a deleterious effect on the quest of the historical Jesus. In Meyer's day, no one could see that this was a result of learned men using their creative ingenuity to play with too wide a range of Aramaic. Nonetheless, Meyer took a major step forward, and produced the best piece of work until Black fifty years later.

The next major work was Dalman, Die Worte Jesu (1898).<sup>17</sup> This book made some good points. For example, Dalman provided a sound presentation of the reasons why we should believe that Jesus taught in Aramaic.<sup>18</sup> He also put forward criticisms of the views expressed by other scholars, and many of these criticisms were useful. For example, he argued that where different gospel writers have synonyms, merely pointing out that one Hebrew word could be used for both of them does not establish that there was a Hebrew original, an important point when everyone did not agree that Jesus taught in Aramaic.<sup>19</sup> Unfortunately, however, Dalman also made serious mistakes. One of the worst was his regrettably influential view that Jesus used מלכותא דשמיא ("the kingdom of heaven") rather than מלכותא דאלהא ("the kingdom of God") to avoid the divine name.<sup>20</sup> It should have been obvious that אלהא was not the divine name, so that this argument is quite wrong. Dalman was also handicapped by the absence of sufficient Aramaic sources of early date. Accordingly, he could not confirm that רבע means "recline," nor present an Aramaic equivalent of κύριος as a term for "God," despite his abundant knowledge of both in late source material.<sup>21</sup> Such problems were so serious that, despite its importance in its day, Dalman's work on the Aramaic

---

<sup>17</sup> G. H. Dalman, Die Worte Jesu: mit Berücksichtigung des nachkanonischen jüdischen Schrifttums und der arämaischen Sprache, 1: Einleitung und wichtige Begriffe (Leipzig: Hinrichs, 1898; 2nd ed., 1930; there was no second volume); Eng. trans.: The Words of Jesus, Considered in the Light of Post-Biblical Jewish Writings and the Aramaic Language, 1: Introduction and Fundamental Ideas, trans. D. M. Kay (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1902). See further also G. H. Dalman, Jesus-Jeschua: Die drei Sprachen Jesu (Leipzig: Hinrichs, 1922); Eng. trans.: Jesus-Jeshua: Studies in the Gospels trans. P. P. Levertoff (London: SPCK, 1929).

<sup>18</sup> Dalman, Worte Jesu, 1-72; Words of Jesus, 1-88.

<sup>19</sup> Dalman, Worte Jesu, 34-35; Words of Jesus, 44-45.

<sup>20</sup> Dalman, Worte Jesu, 75-79, 159-162, 223; Words of Jesus, 91-94, 194-197, 272.

<sup>21</sup> Dalman, Worte Jesu, 91-92, 180-182; Words of Jesus, 112, 179-181.

substratum of the teaching of Jesus should now be regarded as out of date.

Despite the problems of working at that time, some progress was also made with the investigation of some details. For example, Lietzmann surveyed the use of בר נשא in the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, the Palestinian Syriac Gospels, and several tractates of the Palestinian Talmud.<sup>22</sup> This was much the most extensive investigation conducted up to that time, and Lietzmann concluded correctly that בר נשא was a straightforward term for a person. This was a permanent gain, and Lietzmann concluded in the light of it, "Jesus hat sich selbst nie den Titel 'Menschensohn' beigelegt, weil derselbe im Aramäischen nicht existiert und aus sprachlichen Gründen nicht existieren kann."<sup>23</sup> Where he believed that בר נשא was original in a saying of Jesus, however, Lietzmann did not offer reconstructions. His further conclusion that υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου was a technical term of Hellenistic theology was also unsatisfactory. His work on the Aramaic material was accordingly not as influential as it might have been.

A number of detailed suggestions were made by Wellhausen, and several of them have stood the test of time. For example, he suggested that achi ("give life to," "save") was the Aramaic original behind σωσαι at Mark 3:4, a suggestion which I adopted when I reconstructed the whole pericope.<sup>24</sup> Again, he proposed that at Matt 23:26, κάθαρσον was a correct translation of the Aramaic dakkau (reinigt), whereas in the parallel passage Luke 11:41, δοτε ἐλεημοσύνην resulted from misreading dakkau as zakkau. This is not merely plausible in itself, and a great help towards understanding the otherwise strange text of Luke; it was also a useful contribution to the question of the relationship between the different forms of the Q material. It was often repeated, and I adopted it when I reconstructed and interpreted the whole passage Matt 23:23–36//Luke 11:39–51.<sup>25</sup> On the other hand, Wellhausen usually discussed only single words, so that even

<sup>22</sup> H. Lietzmann, Der Menschensohn: Ein Beitrag zur neutestamentlichen Theologie (Freiburg i.B./Leipzig: Mohr [Siebeck], 1896).

<sup>23</sup> Lietzmann, Menschensohn, 85.

<sup>24</sup> J. Wellhausen, Das Evangelium Marci (Berlin: Reimer, 1903), 23; Casey, Aramaic Sources of Mark's Gospel, ch. 4.

<sup>25</sup> J. Wellhausen, Einleitung in die drei ersten Evangelien, 2nd ed. (Berlin: Reimer, 1911), 27; Casey, Aramaic Approach to Q, ch. 3.

his brightest ideas could never be satisfactory on their own, but would need taking up into much more extensive discussions.

The next major monographs were by Burney and Torrey in the 1920's and 1930's.<sup>26</sup> Each of them made some sound points. For example, Burney pointed out a number of features of Semitic writing in the gospels, such as parataxis.<sup>27</sup> He also offered complete Aramaic reconstructions of some passages, including for example Matt 8:20// Luke 9:58.<sup>28</sup> Unfortunately, however, the work of both these scholars suffered from such serious errors of method that none of it has stood the test of time. For example, Burney tried to write rhyming Aramaic verse, whereas rhyme is not a feature of Aramaic verse as old as the time of Jesus. The passages which he attempted included John 10:1–3,<sup>29</sup> part of a document which was not written in Aramaic. Both scholars made mistakes in their choice of Aramaic words. For example, at Matt 8:20//Luke 9:58, Burney has ḵinnīn for Q's κατασκηνώσεις. But the Aramaic קנין means "nests," so any reasonable Greek translator would have rendered it νοσσιόζς. Accordingly, the original Aramaic must have been משכנין or the like.<sup>30</sup> At Mark 7:3, Torrey suggested that πυγμῆ was a translation of לגמך, "with the fist," and that the translator should have read לגמך, and translated it "at all."<sup>31</sup> But neither of these words occurs in Aramaic of anything like the right period, and there is no Aramaic word גמד for "fist." Both scholars posited misunderstandings like this, and misreadings of conjectured Aramaic originals, in passages which make perfect sense as they stand in Greek. Perhaps the worst example was John 1:13–14, where Burney, followed by Torrey, reconstructed the singular אֵיתִילִיד, "was born," from the Greek plural ἐγεννήθησαν, "were born," the last word of John 1:13.<sup>32</sup> He proposed that ἵ, which he put for καί, the first word of John 1:14, had become accidentally doubled, and this had caused the last word of John 1:13 to be read as the

<sup>26</sup> C. F. Burney, The Aramaic Origin of the Fourth Gospel (Oxford: Clarendon, 1922); idem, The Poetry of Our Lord (Oxford: Clarendon, 1925); C. C. Torrey, Our Translated Gospels: Some of the Evidence (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1937).

<sup>27</sup> Burney, Fourth Gospel, 5–6, 56–59.

<sup>28</sup> Burney, Poetry, 132, 169.

<sup>29</sup> Ibid., 174.

<sup>30</sup> Ibid., 132, 169; for proper discussion, P. M. Casey, "The Jackals and the Son of Man (Matt. 8.20//Luke 9.58)," JSNT 23 (1985): 3–22, at 8, 20–21.

<sup>31</sup> Torrey, Translated Gospels, 93–94.

<sup>32</sup> Burney, Fourth Gospel, 34–35, 41–42, followed by Torrey, Translated Gospels, 151–153.

plural אֵיתִילִידוּ, “were born.” This argument is quite implausible, and it enabled Burney and Torrey to get the virgin birth of Jesus into the Fourth Gospel, a document from which it is notoriously absent.

When this was the standard of scholarship in the two major monographs of the time, too much could not be expected of other scholars, not even the most distinguished. For example, at Mark 1:15, C. H. Dodd proposed that the Aramaic behind ἤγγικεν was m'ta so that the text really meant that the kingdom of God “has come.”<sup>33</sup> This is a one-word naughty trick which changes the meaning of a text at the hand of a completely improbable conjecture.<sup>34</sup> It was easier to leave out Aramaic altogether, or almost so. For example, Bultmann and Dibelius mentioned only a very occasional item in their pioneering works of Formgeschichte.<sup>35</sup>

The next major event was the publication in 1946 of the outstanding monograph of Matthew Black, An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts.<sup>36</sup> In assessing previous work, Black laid down a number of correct principles. For proposed mistranslations, he declared that “the mistranslation must at least be credible; and the conjectured Aramaic must be possible.”<sup>37</sup> It is a shocking comment on the work of his predecessors that it was important to state this, and that it excluded a high proportion of their suggestions. In this matter, Black naturally observed his own principles, and criticized Torrey’s Aramaic, noting that some of his supposed words are not attested.<sup>38</sup> Black also followed Driver in calling for the presentation of whole sentences.<sup>39</sup> In this matter, however, Black was not always able to follow his perfectly correct principle. Black also offered a sound summary of the range of Aramaic sources then available, of Aramaic

<sup>33</sup> C. H. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom (London: Nisbet, 1935; 2nd ed., 1961), 36–37.

<sup>34</sup> For more detailed discussion, Casey, Aramaic Sources of Mark’s Gospel, 27.

<sup>35</sup> M. Dibelius, Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums (Tübingen: Mohr [Siebeck], 1919; 2nd ed., 1933); Eng. trans.: From Tradition to Gospel, trans. B. L. Woolf (London: Nicholson & Watson, 1934); R. K. Bultmann, Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition, FRLANT 29 NF 12 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1921); Eng. trans.: The History of the Synoptic Tradition, trans. J. Marsh (Oxford: Blackwell, 1963).

<sup>36</sup> M. Black, An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts (Oxford: Clarendon, 1946; 2nd ed., 1954; 3rd ed., 1967).

<sup>37</sup> Black, Aramaic Approach (1946), 7.

<sup>38</sup> Ibid., 8–9.

<sup>39</sup> Ibid., 12.

dialects, and of the languages which Jesus is likely to have known. He concluded that Jesus taught almost entirely in Aramaic, and that his task was to determine the extent of Aramaic influence in the gospels.<sup>40</sup> His discussions of major features of Aramaic included for example a section on asyndeton.<sup>41</sup> This includes discussion of whether the extent of asyndeton might be due to Jewish or Syrian Greek, rather than translation from Aramaic. Black's separation out of these possibilities was much more careful than the work of his predecessors. Equally, Black did not continue Burney's efforts to find rhyme in Aramaic poetry behind the gospels.<sup>42</sup> Black also contributed helpful reconstructions of some gospel passages, and helpful comments on a number of passages where he did not offer a complete reconstruction. For example, he noted that there must be wordplay on "son" (b<sup>e</sup>ra) and "ox" (b<sup>e</sup>cira) at Luke 14:5. His discussions of linguistic features included aorists such as ἐβόπτισα at Mark 1:8, which must represent a Semitic perfect.<sup>43</sup> Altogether, in addition to sound principles, Black contributed the largest number of sound examples of Aramaic influence in New Testament Greek so far collected.

Black's extensive and sober discussions of all these features, with ample examples, are the main points which made this book the best treatment of its subject. Nonetheless, serious problems remained. The most profound underlying problem was still the small quantity of ancient Aramaic which survived. For example, Black supposed that "the construct has largely fallen into abeyance in all Aramaic dialects."<sup>44</sup> This was a fair comment on the sources available to him, but we now know that it was not the case. The small quantity of extant documents also made those which had been discovered more difficult to date than they are now, and this is one reason why Black accepted too early a date for the Palestinian Pentateuch Targum, and for the Targums to the Hagiographa.<sup>45</sup> Black's massive improvements in methodology still left him with criteria which were too loose. For example, he suggested that at John 3:33 ἀληθῆς was a translation of the Aramaic שְׂרִירָא, which was a misreading of שְׂדִרְיָה, so that the

---

<sup>40</sup> Black, Aramaic Approach (1946), ch. 2.

<sup>41</sup> Ibid., 38–43.

<sup>42</sup> Ibid., 105.

<sup>43</sup> Ibid., 93, 126.

<sup>44</sup> Ibid., 68.

<sup>45</sup> Ibid., 20–22.

original text meant "sent him," and Black believed that this had enabled him to restore the original parallelism.<sup>46</sup> But the text makes perfectly good sense as it stands, and a more watertight case for the Fourth Gospel being a translation from Aramaic cannot be made. Neither conjectured misreadings, nor parallelism, are sufficiently controllable to demonstrate this. Much more work on these problems would therefore be necessary, especially when more source material was discovered and published.

In the next years, further advances on a smaller scale were made by scholars who used Aramaic when writing about aspects of the life and teaching of Jesus. Perhaps the most notable was Jeremias. For example, it was often suggested that the Greek ἄρτος could not designate unleavened bread.<sup>47</sup> Since Mark uses ἄρτος in describing the Last Supper, it might seem to follow that the Last Supper was not a Passover meal. In a fine scholarly discussion, securely based in primary source material presented in its original languages, Jeremias showed that both ἄρτος and the Aramaic and Hebrew לחם were normal terms for referring to the unleavened bread at Passover.<sup>48</sup> This was essential for establishing the cultural context of Jesus' important teaching about his forthcoming death, and it illustrates the massive potential for careful and methodologically sound research into the Aramaic substratum of the synoptic gospels. Jeremias also offered Aramaic reconstructions of some gospel passages to help with the task of interpreting Jesus' teaching, including most notably the Lord's Prayer.<sup>49</sup>

There was also a seminal paper by Vermes on the use of בר (א)נש(א) in Jewish Aramaic.<sup>50</sup> Vermes argued that בר (א)נש(א) was used as a circumlocution for "I." While this did not convince everyone, the evidence presented by Vermes impressed scholars who interpreted it

<sup>46</sup> Black, Aramaic Approach (1946), 110–111.

<sup>47</sup> E.g. J. Wellhausen, "Ἄρτον ἔλασεν, Mc 14,22," ZNW 7 (1906): 182.

<sup>48</sup> J. Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, trans. N. Perrin (London: SCM, 1966), 62–66.

<sup>49</sup> J. Jeremias, The Prayers of Jesus, trans. J. Bowden et al. (London: SCM, 1967), 94, with extensive discussion; idem, New Testament Theology, 1: The Proclamation of Jesus, trans. J. Bowden (London: SCM, 1971), 196.

<sup>50</sup> G. Vermes, "The Use of בר (א)נש(א) in Jewish Aramaic," App. E. in Black, Aramaic Approach (3rd ed. 1967), 310–328; repr. in G. Vermes, Post-Biblical Jewish Studies (Leiden: Brill, 1975), 147–165.

differently.<sup>51</sup> In the long term, more Aramaic evidence and developments in Pragmatics and Translation Studies would be required for a complete solution to the Son of man problem to be found.<sup>52</sup> Chilton used his detailed study of the Isaiah Targum to help interpret Jesus' teaching about the kingdom of God, offering a detailed discussion of Jesus' sayings in the light of this background.<sup>53</sup> Wilcox provided a useful summary of the current state of scholarship, together with learned and incisive comments of his own.<sup>54</sup> In particular, while accepting the importance of using Aramaic of relatively early date, Wilcox brought forward specific examples to justify the careful use of later Aramaic sources as well. Taken together, the work of all these scholars formed an advance in knowledge from which we all had much to learn.

Two more attempts at major monographs were made by Zimmermann in 1979 and Schwarz in 1985.<sup>55</sup> Zimmermann deliberately presented himself as carrying forward the work of Torrey. Consequently, his work is full of methodological errors, and should be regarded as out of date already when it was written. Most of his examples are changes in single words, supposedly mistranslations of an Aramaic substratum. His worst example was in the Johannine prologue. Where Burney and Torrey, coming in from a Christian perspective, had used an Aramaic trick to get the virgin birth into the Johannine prologue, Zimmermann, coming in from a Jewish perspective, used a different Aramaic trick to get the deified λόγος out of it! He proposed that λόγος represented an Aramaic ܠܘܘܢ, which was intended to mean "lamb."<sup>56</sup> This is creative rewriting of a text, not sober exegesis. Nor did Zimmermann provide a reasonable account

---

<sup>51</sup> For an early attempt to do this, P. M. Casey, "The Son of Man Problem," ZNW 67 (1976): 147–154.

<sup>52</sup> See now P. M. Casey, The Solution to the Son of Man Problem (London: T&T Clark, 2007).

<sup>53</sup> B. D. Chilton, Jesus' Announcement of the Kingdom, God in Strength: SNTU B1 (Freistadt: Plöchl, 1979; repr. Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987); The Glory of Israel: The Theology and Provenience of the Isaiah Targum, JSOTSup 23 (Sheffield, JSOT Press, 1982); A Galilean Rabbi and His Bible: Jesus' Own Interpretation of Isaiah (London: SCM, 1984).

<sup>54</sup> M. Wilcox, "Semitisms in the New Testament," ANRW II 25.2 (1984): 978–1029.

<sup>55</sup> F. Zimmermann, The Aramaic Origin of the Four Gospels (New York: Ktav, 1979); G. Schwarz, "Und Jesus sprach": Untersuchungen zur aramäischen Urgestalt der Worte Jesu, BWANT 118 = 6.18 (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1985; 2nd ed., 1987).

<sup>56</sup> Zimmermann, Aramaic Origin, 167–170.

of Johannine theology about a pre-existent lamb, and, like earlier scholarship, he presupposed an incomprehensible translator. More generally, his suggestion that the Aramaic behind the gospels was what he called “proto-Syriac” was completely unconvincing. He in fact used ordinary Syriac and later Jewish Aramaic, and omitted the Dead Sea Scrolls and all earlier Aramaic sources, thereby failing to take any advantage of the increased resources which were becoming available, and which would permit more accurate work. He also played one-word naughty tricks with other parts of the Fourth Gospel, which has never been shown to have had Aramaic sources.

The 1985 monograph of Gunther Schwarz is the most recent attempt to write a major monograph using Aramaic to reconstruct the teaching of Jesus as a whole.<sup>57</sup> This is a very learned book, which makes many good points. For example, Schwarz provides a list of all the Aramaic words in the gospels, with correct explanations of their use.<sup>58</sup> He also offers many Aramaic reconstructions of sayings of Jesus. These show great learning and ingenuity, and in doing them Schwarz follows the basic principle of reconstructing whole sentences. Unfortunately, however, his work suffers from serious problems of method inherited from traditional scholarship. One is that Schwarz continues to use late Aramaic sources, and occasionally labels them Galilean when they are not specific to Galilee. For example, in reconstructing Matt 6:2, he cites Tg. Jer. Lev 19:13 for אַרְטוּס as the source of Matthew’s μισθόν.<sup>59</sup> But Targum Ps-Jonathan, as it is better known, is a late source, it is not particularly Galilean, and it is translation Aramaic. Moreover, אַרְטוּס is not attested in earlier Aramaic. We should therefore prefer אַרְטוּ, which is attested both earlier and later than the time of Jesus, and with the right meaning at 4Q196 frg. 16, so it is much more likely to be the word which Jesus used. Secondly, despite his methodologically sound procedure of reconstructing some whole sentences, Schwarz continues the methodologically unsound tradition of playing one-word naughty tricks. For example, Schwarz criticises the use of ἀληθῶς with Ἰσραηλίτης at John 1:47. He would prefer ἀληθινὸς Ἰσραηλίτης, and proposes that ἀληθῶς is a misunderstanding of the Aramaic יִשְׂרָאֵלִי.<sup>60</sup> We have already seen that this

<sup>57</sup> Schwarz, Und Jesus sprach.

<sup>58</sup> Ibid., 5–48.

<sup>59</sup> Ibid., 202.

<sup>60</sup> Ibid., 112–114.

method of changing the text is faulty, and Schwarz never demonstrates that there was an Aramaic source of John 1:47, nor of any part of the Fourth Gospel. Thirdly, Schwarz uses traditional scholarly methods to remove glosses and the like, so that even some of his reconstructed passages have been arbitrarily shortened. For example, in a further monograph devoted to the Aramaic background of the Son of man problem, Schwarz shortens Mark 10:45 on the ground that each stichos is differently constructed, so that the verse has a rhythm unknown in Semitic poetry.<sup>61</sup> But Mark 10:45 is written in Greek prose, and we have no reason to think that its source was in Semitic verse rather than Aramaic prose. By such means Schwarz deletes οὐκ...διακονηθῆναι ἀλλὰ διακονῆσαι, which removes the connection of this saying with its context, and ἀντὶ πολλῶν, which reduces the clarity of the saying. He thus reconstructs the following:

אתא בר נשא למיתן נפשיה פורקן

Ich kam, um mich selbst als Lösegeld zu geben.

This interpretation of בר נשא, which follows the seminal paper of Vermes, also removes the connection of this saying with Jesus' answer to James and John earlier in this passage. Thus, instead of the use of Aramaic helping us to see the teaching of Jesus in its original cultural context, this "reconstruction" has removed it from its context altogether. Thus Schwarz's work, learned and ingenious though it is, has not been very influential either.

Apart from the outstanding work of Meyer and Black, with excellent but occasional contributions from scholars such as Wellhausen and Jeremias, it will be evident that the history of research shows a drastic degree of methodological faults, leading to a very small proportion of acceptable results. It is not surprising that a few scholars have sought to bring order into chaos with rules, some of which should be regarded as too strict. The most notable has been Fitzmyer. Fitzmyer has made many positive contributions to the study of the Aramaic background of the teaching of Jesus, and to the illumination of particular expressions. Some of these are background material which barely fall for discussion here, such as meticulous editions of texts with proper discussions of Aramaic grammar and syntax.<sup>62</sup> More important for present purposes is a fine 1970 article on the languages of Palestine at the time of Jesus. This is a model of clarity, learning and sound judgement.<sup>63</sup> Detailed studies include an article on קרבן (Mark 7:11), the Aramaic קרבן, which was found on an ossuary.<sup>64</sup> While he did not himself attempt much work on reconstructing Aramaic sources of the teaching of Jesus, Fitzmyer did reaffirm the central principle that whole sayings should be reconstructed.<sup>65</sup>

<sup>61</sup> G. Schwarz, Jesus "der Menschensohn": Aramäistische Untersuchungen zu den synoptischen Menschensohnworten Jesu, BWANT 119 = 6.19 (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1986), 89–94, 171–176.

Problems arose from Fitzmyer's bold and necessary attempt to classify the development of Aramaic into different phases.<sup>66</sup> He proposed five such phases: (1) Old Aramaic, roughly 925–700 BCE; (2) Official Aramaic, roughly 700–200 BCE; (3) Middle Aramaic, roughly 200 BCE–200 CE; (4) Late Aramaic, roughly 200–700 CE; (5) Modern Aramaic. It is Middle Aramaic which is the most important for present purposes, and the most open to abuse. It was almost inevitable that some conservative scholars would use the starting date of this phase to date the conservative Aramaic of the book of Daniel too early.<sup>67</sup> More serious for present purposes was Fitzmyer's own use of his closing date of this phase to exclude the use of what he labelled "Late Aramaic" for reconstructing the sayings of Jesus. There is still too little Aramaic extant from the period of "Middle Aramaic" for this to be satisfactory. By excluding too much Aramaic, this arbitrarily pre-

<sup>62</sup> E.g. J. A. Fitzmyer, The Genesis Apocryphon of Qumran Cave I: A Commentary, BibOr 18 (Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1966; rev. ed., BibOr 18A, 1971; 3rd ed., BibOr 18B, 2004); The Aramaic Inscriptions of Sefire, BibOr 19 (Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1967; rev. ed., BibOr 19A, 1995).

<sup>63</sup> J. A. Fitzmyer, "The Languages of Palestine in the First Century AD," CBQ 32 (1970): 501–31; rev. ed., A Wandering Aramean: Collected Aramaic Essays, SBLMS 25 (Missoula: Scholars Press, 1979; repr. The Semitic Background of the New Testament, Grand Rapids/Livonia: Eerdmans/Dove, 1997), 29–56; more generally, "Problems of the Semitic Background of the New Testament," in The Yahweh/Baal Confrontation and Other Studies in Biblical Literature and Archaeology: Essays in Honour of E. W. Hamrick, ed. J. M. O'Brien and F. L. Horton (Lampeter: Mellen, 1995), 80–93.

<sup>64</sup> J. A. Fitzmyer, "The Aramaic qorbān Inscription from Jabel Ḥallet eṭ Ṭūri and Mk 7:11//Matt 15:5," JBL 78 (1959): 60–65; rev. ed., Essays on the Semitic Background of the New Testament (London: Chapman, 1971; repr. Missoula: Scholars Press, 1974; repr. Semitic Background of the New Testament), 93–100.

<sup>65</sup> E.g. J. A. Fitzmyer, The Gospel According to Luke, AB 28–28A, 2 vols. (New York: Doubleday, 1981–85), 2:947.

<sup>66</sup> J. A. Fitzmyer, "The Phases of the Aramaic Language," in Wandering Aramean, 57–84, a revision of a 1974 lecture; cf. "Problems of the Semitic Background," 87–93.

<sup>67</sup> So B. Witherington III, Jesus the Seer: The Progress of Prophecy (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1999), 197.

vents us from fulfilling the basic methodological principle of reconstructing whole pieces of the teaching of Jesus.

Moreover, there is sufficient direct evidence that the Aramaic of Jesus' words included features which are not extant in "Middle Aramaic" texts. I have noted two of Jesus' ipsissima verba at Mark 5:41: קום טליתא. The word טליתא does not occur in Aramaic texts until the phase of "Late Aramaic" (except perhaps in two undated inscriptions from Palmyra). Nor does the precise form קום rather than קומי, to which some mss have corrected it (reading κουμι). While the "correct" form of the 2 f. sg. impv. is קומי, final vowels after the tone syllable were quiescent in Syriac and in Christian Palestinian Aramaic.<sup>68</sup> This shows that Jesus' spoken idiolect had this particular isogloss in common with these later dialects, and that this oral form was written down. It follows that we should not exclude other features of these dialects from consideration when the (still meagre) remains of "Middle Aramaic" are not sufficient for our purposes. The same applies to many detailed features of Jesus' teaching where it survives only in Greek. For example, Jesus compared his opponents to whitewashed tombs, τάφοις κεκοιναμένοις (Matt 23:27). "Whitewash" is not a very common term, and Luke misconstrued it, but we should not hesitate to reconstruct מתטשין merely because the word does not occur in "Middle Aramaic" texts.<sup>69</sup> Again, at his last meal with his disciples, Jesus instructed them about his forthcoming death, using the metaphor of "go." Mark has ὑπάγει, for which we must reconstruct אזל, undeterred by scholars who think (reasonably) that this reference is not extant in "Middle Aramaic" texts, and who infer (unreasonably) that Jesus did not use this common early Aramaic word with such a reference.<sup>70</sup>

Fitzmyer himself made the most serious detailed mistake of this kind. He argued that the examples of the idiomatic use of בר נש(א) collected by Vermes should not be accepted because they do not have the prosthetic א. There is not enough "Middle Aramaic" left for us to expect בר נש(א) to be used in this idiomatic way, complete with the prosthetic א, in extant texts. Subsequent work has moreover shown that the semantic area of (א)נש(א) בר is not affected by whether it has the prosthetic א, and it is entirely possible that, like the ׳ at the end of קומי, it was not pronounced by Jesus because it was not pronounced in Galilee.<sup>71</sup> What is worse, the application of such a strict rule is sufficient to prevent us from finding a solution to the Son of man problem.

<sup>68</sup> T. Nöldeke, Compendious Syriac Grammar, trans. J. A. Crichton (London: Williams & Norgate, 1904), 35–36, 103–104; F. Schulthess, Grammatik des christlich-palästinischen Aramäisch (Tübingen: Mohr [Siebeck], 1924), 16, 62.

<sup>69</sup> See further Casey, Aramaic Approach to Q, 64–65, 89–92.

<sup>70</sup> For more detailed discussion, see Casey, Aramaic Sources of Mark's Gospel, 220, 233–236.

It follows that Fitzmyer's rules are not a satisfactory solution to the problems posed by the meagre remains of Aramaic from the time of Jesus, nor to the methodological chaos of most earlier scholarship. Much further work would therefore need to be done. This is so recent that it falls for discussion in the following sections.

3. The State of Play

The most remarkable feature of recent scholarship is the widespread omission of the Aramaic background to the teaching of Jesus. Perhaps the most brilliant work incorporating extensive use of Jesus' Jewish culture is that of E. P. Sanders. In addition to work on the Jewish material as such, Sanders has contributed Jesus and Judaism (1985), perhaps the most brilliant book on the historical Jesus so far, and The Historical Figure of Jesus (1993), arguably the best single-volume Life of Jesus ever written.<sup>72</sup> Neither book makes or depends on significant use of Aramaic. So, for example, in discussing the Cleansing of the Temple in Jesus and Judaism, Sanders repeats the view that Mark 11:17 is a secondary addition, quoting the scholarly tradition that this is indicated by the introductory words, "and he taught them and said." Sanders does not even discuss the possibility of an Aramaic source.<sup>73</sup> When this is reconstructed as וּאֵלֶּף הוּהּ וְאָמַר, it emerges as a natural way of writing an Aramaic narrative, adding to the existing narrative Jesus' most important words. These embody quotations from Isa 56:7 and Jer 7:11, which are essential for understanding what Jesus taught about the significance of his action.<sup>74</sup> Again, in offering an innovative hypothesis about Jesus' relationships with "sinners," Sanders suggested that behind the Greek ἀμαρτωλοί stood the Hebrew רשעים or its Aramaic equivalent.<sup>75</sup> Sanders could have offered reconstructions of whole sentences, with full philological discussion of contentious words. His published work shows that he is learned enough to do so, and includes discussion of רשע, ἀμαρτωλός and some other relevant words.<sup>76</sup> That one of our very best scholars chose not to produce and interpret Aramaic reconstructions illustrates only too well the current state of scholarship.

<sup>71</sup> For the detailed debate sparked off by Vermes, "Use of נש/בר א in Jewish Aramaic," see further G. Vermes, "The Present State of the 'Son of Man' Debate," JJS 29 (1978): 123–134, at 127–130; idem, "The 'Son of Man' Debate," JSNT 1 (1978): 19–32, at 23–25; J. A. Fitzmyer, "The New Testament Title 'Son of Man' Philologically Considered," in Wandering Aramean, 143–160, at 149–153; idem, "Another View of the 'Son of Man' Debate," JSNT 4 (1979): 58–68, esp. 61–64; Schwarz, Menschensohn, 71–73, 84; P. M. Casey, "The Use of the Term (א)נש(א) בר in the Aramaic Translations of the Hebrew Bible," JSNT 54 (1994): 87–118.

<sup>72</sup> E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985); The Historical Figure of Jesus (London: Penguin, 1993). More recently, cf. W. D. Davies and E. P. Sanders, "Jesus: from the Jewish point of view," in The Cambridge History of Judaism, 3: The Early Roman Period (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999), 618–677.

In the largest Life of Jesus currently being written, J. P. Meier also makes very little use of Aramaic.<sup>77</sup> This is in spite of the fact that the opening volume contains quite a reasonable demonstration that Jesus usually taught in Aramaic.<sup>78</sup> He does offer a "possible Aramaic retroversion of this primitive saying," namely Mark 8:35 with Matt 10:39// Luke 17:33,<sup>79</sup> but it is printed in English letters, and it is very unusual for him to do even this much. He does discuss the occasional Aramaic word, such as talitha koum (Mark 5:41), but he does not note the later attestation of the quiescent form קום, not even in a discussion which shows that this is the original Markan form.<sup>80</sup> Moreover, his discussion of other Semitisms in the same passage is very dependent on the secondary literature.<sup>81</sup> Again, he discusses βουνηργες (Mark 3:17), but he does not give proper weight to the fact that the

<sup>73</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, esp. 66, 367 n. 41.

<sup>74</sup> For a complete reconstruction, showing how helpful the Aramaic source is for reconstructing Jesus' actions and teaching, see P. M. Casey, "Culture and Historicity: The Cleansing of the Temple," CBQ 59 (1997): 306–332.

<sup>75</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 177.

<sup>76</sup> E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism (London/Minneapolis: SCM/Fortress, 1977), 342–345, 357–358, 402; "Jesus," 636–643. Sanders does not however offer proper discussion of the Aramaic רשעים and חייבין: cf. Casey, Aramaic Approach to Q, 137–142.

<sup>77</sup> J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, ABRL, 4 vols (New York: Doubleday, 1991–2009).

<sup>78</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew I, 264–266, 296–299.

<sup>79</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew III, 61.

<sup>80</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew I, 265–266, 297–298, cf. II, 759.

<sup>81</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew II, 785–786, 848–849.

Aramaic word for “thunder” is רעם.<sup>82</sup> He treats Mark 3:6 as “probably a redactional creation of Mark,” and in any case he declares it to be the conclusion of a story which does not go back to a historical event in Jesus’ ministry, without considering any possible Aramaic background to it.<sup>83</sup>

The real reason for all this emerges, not in his three enormous volumes on the life of Jesus, but in a regrettable 2004 article on Mark 2:23–28, in which Meier rejects the use of Aramaic as a tool for interpreting this passage.<sup>84</sup> Meier discusses my original attempt to reconstruct an Aramaic source of this pericope in 1988, but ignores my 1998 book Aramaic Sources of Mark’s Gospel, which contains a reconstruction of the immediately following pericope Mark 3:1–6 as well, argues that these two pericopes were originally associated in genuine historical events, and offers a full discussion of the proposed methodology.<sup>85</sup> For example, it is notorious that ὁδὸν ποιεῖν at Mark 2:23 does not make proper sense in Greek. Accordingly, in reconstructing the whole of both pericopes, I suggested that Mark’s ἤρξαντο ὁδὸν ποιεῖν went back to a source which read שריו למעבר אורח, so that the disciples “began to go along a path.”<sup>86</sup> This makes perfect sense both of the incident and of the translator, who suffered from interference and misread למעבר (“to go along”) as למעבד (“to make”), one of the simplest possible mistakes. Despite my offering abundant additional evidence that Mark’s text is a translation of an Aramaic source, of which the son of man saying at Mark 2:28 is only the most obvious, Meier casts doubt on whether the whole story ever existed in Aramaic, and complains about my tendency to “rewrite the text.”<sup>87</sup> Thus he omits most of the evidence for an Aramaic source, does not discuss the most recent and extensive work of secondary literature, and criticizes a travesty of the proposed methodology. That so distinguished an author of the largest current scholarly attempt to write a

<sup>82</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew III, 214–215, 261 n. 40.

<sup>83</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew II, 682–684, 730–731.

<sup>84</sup> J. P. Meier, “The Historical Jesus and the Plucking of the Grain on the Sabbath,” CBQ 66 (2004): 561–581.

<sup>85</sup> Meier, “Plucking of the Grain,” discussing P. M. Casey, “Culture and Historicity: The Plucking of the Grain (Mark 2.23–28),” NTS 34 (1988): 1–23, but not Aramaic Sources of Mark’s Gospel, notably not ch. 2, “Method” (73–110), nor ch. 4, “Two Sabbath Controversies: Mark 2.23–3.6” (138–192).

<sup>86</sup> Casey, “Plucking,” 1–2; Aramaic Sources of Mark’s Gospel, 138–141.

<sup>87</sup> Meier, “Plucking of the Grain,” 565, n. 6 from p. 564.

Life of Jesus should proceed like this illustrates again the unsatisfactory state of scholarship.

With problems like this in serious scholarship, it is hardly surprising that other distinguished scholars have recently contributed some strange remarks about aspects of the language which Jesus spoke. For example, in Jesus Remembered (2004), Dunn makes a number of positive remarks on the use of Aramaic which I had made in previous published work.<sup>88</sup> Nonetheless, he is quite uncritical of Burney's work,<sup>89</sup> and his section on the notorious Aramaism "son of man" contains a number of peculiarities. For example, he declares that we must suppose that Jesus used the term "the Son of Man" (my italics) of himself, without sufficient discussion of the use of the definite and indefinite states in Aramaic, and he further supposes that the "articular form" may be rendered "that son of man."<sup>90</sup> When Aramaic does not have a separate article as Greek and English do, there is no excuse for the description "articular form" with reference to Jesus' usage, nor for the further replacement of the definite article with the demonstrative "that." On the other hand, Dunn declares that Jesus' use may be deliberately "ambiguous,"<sup>91</sup> without proper discussion of Aramaic sources in which the use of בר (א)נש(א) is not ambiguous. When distinguished scholars deal with the term "son of man" in this way, it is not surprising that the Son of man problem should continue to seem insoluble.

Despite the abundant evidence of Semitisms in the synoptic gospels, some scholars still suppose that Jesus taught in Greek. The most notable at present is Stanley Porter.<sup>92</sup> In principle, we should of course consider the possibility that Jesus taught in Greek as well as in Aramaic, but the primary evidence is not sufficient to support such a conclusion. This is illustrated by the two major mistakes which Porter makes. One is to downplay or even omit the evidence that Jesus spoke and consequently taught in Aramaic, in an environment in

<sup>88</sup> J.D.G. Dunn, Christianity in the Making, 1: Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004), e.g. 225 n. 221; 408 n. 130; 427 n. 242.

<sup>89</sup> Ibid., 225.

<sup>90</sup> Ibid., 739, 741 n. 151, 759.

<sup>91</sup> Ibid., 743, 746, 760.

<sup>92</sup> Porter, "Teach in Greek?"; "Jesus and the Use of Greek"; "Jesus and the Use of Greek: A Response to Maurice Casey," BBR 10 (2000): 71–87; Criteria for Authenticity, esp. 95–97, 164–180, "Excursus: A Response to Maurice Casey on the Languages of Jesus"; cf. P. M. Casey, "In Which Language Did Jesus Teach?", ExpTim 108 (1997): 326–328; Aramaic Sources of Mark's Gospel, 65–68.

which normal Jews understood Aramaic, which Jesus would therefore have to speak in order to communicate with them. For example, noting quotations in Aramaic in the synoptic gospels which are often and rightly taken as evidence that Jesus spoke Aramaic, Porter comments, "By this reasoning it is more plausible to argue that Jesus did most of his teaching in Greek, since the gospels are all Greek documents."<sup>93</sup> This misrepresents the nature of the gospels themselves. They were written in Greek to communicate the good news to Greek-speaking Christians. This mere fact does not tell us in which language Jesus taught, whereas the Aramaic words in the synoptic gospels cannot be explained unless the gospel writers could expect their audiences to know that the ministry took place in an Aramaic-speaking environment, and this is part of the evidence that Jesus must have taught in Aramaic. This is supported by peculiarities such as ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, which is not normal monoglot Greek, and which makes excellent sense as a translation of (א)נש(א) בר.<sup>94</sup> Porter seeks to diminish the importance of even this by noting quite correctly that the "adjectival attributive genitive pattern, of nomen rectum following the nomen regens without repetition of the article, was very common in classical Greek." He argues that this became more common, and concludes, "This increase makes the idea of Semitic influence on the use of this pattern in the Greek of the New Testament difficult to sustain."<sup>95</sup> This misses the point. The point is not this common pattern, but rather that ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου itself is not normal monoglot Greek, can be understood as a translation of (א)נש(א) בר, and makes sense in some sayings when they are reconstructed in Aramaic in accordance with Aramaic rather than Greek usage (e.g. Mark 2:28; 9:12).<sup>96</sup>

Porter's second major mistake is to exaggerate the use of Greek in Israel. This is an important point, for if Porter were right, it would be possible to argue that Jesus taught in Greek as well as in Aramaic, and to consider gospel passages which show no clear signs of <sup>93</sup> Porter, "Jesus and the Use of Greek," 125 n. 9, repeated in Porter, "Excursus," 171, with a complaint that I have taken it out of context. I cannot see that this argument has any validity, whatever its context.

<sup>94</sup> Porter, "Excursus," 167, admits only this of the arguments presented by Casey, "In Which Language," 327, cf. Aramaic Sources of Mark's Gospel, 65, 111–121, as "germane."

<sup>95</sup> Porter, "Excursus," 167–168, n. 113 from p. 167.

<sup>96</sup> For full discussion see now Casey, The Solution to the Son of Man Problem.

Semitisms as examples of this. For example, Porter has Galilee “completely surrounded by hellenistic culture.”<sup>97</sup> This hellenistic culture was however Gentile, and its presence in cities such as Tyre and Scythopolis is entirely consistent with its rejection by Aramaic-speaking Jews. Again, Porter cites the funerary inscriptions from Beth She‘arim, noting that they date from the first to the sixth centuries CE, and subsequently responding to criticism by continuing to maintain them as evidence that “some from that area, including possibly Jesus, used Greek.”<sup>98</sup> But “only a few of the village’s tombs date to the first century CE, and these do not contain inscriptions.”<sup>99</sup> So much of Porter’s evidence is from a later time or the wrong place that it should not be used to support the notion of Jesus conducting a Greek-speaking ministry in the Galilean countryside or in relatively small towns such as Capernaum. Porter also draws on what was then recent research to support his view, but this has now been exposed as a temporary trend, and the Jewishness of the area of the historic ministry has been recognized.<sup>100</sup> Accordingly, Porter’s view should not be accepted.<sup>101</sup>

Some scholars continue to argue that Jesus taught in Aramaic, and that reconstruction of Aramaic sources from the synoptic gospels enables us to cast much light on his life and teaching. Having recently done extensive work in this area, I proceed with a review of this. In 1988, I offered the first reconstruction of the proposed Aramaic source of a complete pericope, Mark 2:23–28, as noted above.<sup>102</sup>

---

<sup>97</sup> Porter, “Jesus and the Use of Greek,” 135.

<sup>98</sup> Porter, “Jesus and the Use of Greek,” 146–147; “Excursus,” 172–173, responding to Casey, “In Which Language,” 327, and Aramaic Sources of Mark’s Gospel, 66.

<sup>99</sup> M. Chancey, The Myth of a Gentile Galilee, SNTSMS 118 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002), 108–109, citing N. Avigad, Beth She‘arim. Report on the Excavations during 1953–1958, 3: Catacombs 12–23 (New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1976), 260–261. Avigad (124–125, 261) has catacomb 21 as the earliest, dating perhaps from the Herodian period, but perhaps later, and with no inscriptions.

<sup>100</sup> See especially M. Chancey, “The Cultural Milieu of Ancient Sepphoris,” NTS 47 (2001): 127–145; idem, Myth of a Gentile Galilee; idem, Greco-Roman Culture and the Galilee of Jesus, SNTSMS 134 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2005).

<sup>101</sup> See further Casey, “In Which Language”; Aramaic Sources of Mark’s Gospel, 63–68. A fuller response to Porter, “Excursus,” is not possible here. I profoundly regret that administrative duties, followed by a lengthy period of illness, have prevented me from responding at greater length elsewhere. I hope to do so in due course.

<sup>102</sup> Casey, “Plucking.”

Compared with previous generations of scholars, I was able to do this because of the increased quantity of Aramaic sources which were discovered and published. The most important were the Aramaic Dead Sea Scrolls, which were written in the right language among people of the right culture not too long before the time of Jesus. With this complete reconstruction, I was able to propose a solution of the main interpretative problems of this pericope. With a source which read שדיו למעבר אודח, I could argue that the disciples “began to go along a path,” and then infer that they were taking Peah, a cultural assumption which could be taken for granted when the source was transmitted by Aramaic-speaking Jews. Faced with the notorious ἐπὶ Ἀβιαθᾶρ ἄρχιερέως, I reconstructed ביומי אביתר כהן רב, which does not imply that Abiathar was high priest at the time, and is consistent with him being isolated as exceptionally important. Equally important, I was able to recover the cultural assumption that the incident of David eating the shewbread, and giving some to his men to eat, took place on the Sabbath, which makes Jesus’ argument of obvious relevance to the situation of his disciples. I was also able to recover the original force of the Son of man statement with which the passage ends, for this makes proper sense only when the original Aramaic idiom is reconstructed.

Reviewing the current state of scholarship in 1994, Wilcox not only saw this as “a rather important article,” but summarized his own essay as arguing that “the whole approach to the Aramaic and Hebrew background of the New Testament must be linked in with as full an historical, social and midrashic perspective as possible, and that the atomistic ‘spot the Aramaism’ endeavours of the past, whatever their merits, must give way to that new approach.”<sup>103</sup> There are two major points here. One is that we need the reconstruction of whole passages. The second is this enables us to put such passages in their original cultural context. This is now possible, and we need no more one word naughty tricks. This “new approach,” so much facilitated by the discovery of additional Aramaic sources, enables us to recover the teaching of Jesus within his own cultural background.

I carried this work further in a 1998 book.<sup>104</sup> After surveying previous work in the opening chapter, I wrote a whole chapter on methodology. In both of these chapters, I noted the reasons why we must now suppose that Jesus taught in Aramaic. First, we have early evidence that Jews needed the Torah translated from Hebrew into Aramaic so that they could understand it (e.g. Neh 8:1–8). Secondly, we have an ample quantity of Aramaic documents from Israel from before the time of Jesus, including the Aramaic Dead Sea Scrolls. These documents show significant interference from Hebrew, but not from Greek. Thirdly, there are a number of small pieces of information which fit into the pattern of Aramaic being the normal tongue of Jews in Israel, and which do not fit any other pattern. For example, the inscriptions on the shekel trumpets in the Temple were in Aramaic (m. Segal 6:5), and Gamaliel wrote a letter to Galilean Jews in Aramaic (t. Sanh. 2:6//y. Sanh. I.2.18d.12–19//b. Sanh. 11b). Fourthly, Aramaic continued to be used in Israel later. This is shown by massive evidence including the Palestinian Talmud for Jews, and the Christian Palestinian Syriac lectionary among Christians. The Targums show that many Jews needed an Aramaic version of the scriptures to help them understand them. These points form a massive argument of cumulative weight, showing that Jesus would be brought up with Aramaic as his native tongue, and that he would have to teach in Aramaic in order to be understood by normal Jews. They are complemented by the evidence of the synoptic gospels that this is what actually happened. We have already seen that this includes a small number of Jesus' ipsissima verba, such as טְלִיתָא קוּם from Mark 5:41, and features of his teaching such as his use of בַּר (א)נִשְׂא (א). This is the aspect of the evidence which I began to consider at great length in a number of reconstructions of Mark's Aramaic sources, which included accounts of Jesus' actions as well as his teaching. These should not be considered separately at a point like this, because the composition of complete accounts of Jesus' teaching during a variety of incidents is part of an argument of cumulative weight that he did in fact teach in Aramaic.

<sup>103</sup> M. Wilcox, “The Aramaic Background of the New Testament”, in The Aramaic Bible: Targums in their Historical Context, ed. D. R. G. Beattie and M. J. McNamara, JSOTSup 166 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1994), 362–378, at 376–377.

<sup>104</sup> Casey, Aramaic Sources of Mark’s Gospel.

In the two introductory chapters, I also drew on important facets of the work of colleagues in Bilingualism, Translation Studies and the study of the LXX to illuminate the most fruitful way of reconstructing and interpreting possible Aramaic sources of Mark's Gospel. I concluded the chapter on methodology with a seven-point procedure for finding and reconstructing these sources,<sup>105</sup> and I now offer an updated summary of this.

<sup>105</sup> Casey, Aramaic Source of Mark's Gospel, 107–110.

1. Select passages which show some signs of being translations of Aramaic sources. The simplest are those which show signs of very literal translation, especially mistakes such as ὁδὸν ποιεῖν (Mark 2:23). We must also take seriously linguistic features such as parataxis, and Semitic features such as the use of the term ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου. Thirdly, we should also consider passages which provide non-linguistic reasons for believing that events in them took place, and that the teaching of Jesus found in them is authentic. This is because the language of Jesus was Aramaic, as was the language of at least the majority of eyewitnesses and the majority of original tradents.

2. Attempt to reconstruct a possible Aramaic source. For this purpose, we should use in the first instance the Aramaic of the Dead Sea Scrolls, because it is so close to the right date and cultural environment. When these scrolls do not contain the words which we need, we should use other Aramaic with care. This is a perfectly legitimate procedure, because Aramaic was an exceptionally stable language.<sup>106</sup> It is consequently possible to exclude forms such as ܝܝ which is known to have become out of date, and specific uses of words such as ܘܥܪܝܚ, which can be shown to have developed the meaning “necessary,” equivalent to the Greek δεῖ, only later.<sup>107</sup> The bulk of the language, however, did not change like this, so that earlier and later sources provide us with a wealth of material, provided that we use them judiciously.

3. Check that the proposed reconstruction is written in genuinely idiomatic Aramaic.

4. Interpret the resulting reconstruction from a first-century Jewish perspective. We must pay particular attention to any respect in which it differs from the Greek translation in front of us, as for example in the striking difference between (א)גש(א) בר and ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου. We must then use all necessary criteria to determine whether Jesus really said and did what our proposed source attributes to him. Our Aramaic sentences should be extremely helpful in reconstructing Jesus' life and teaching in their original cultural setting, but they cannot function without their complete cultural context.

5. Consider the passage from the perspective of an ancient translator. In the light of what is now known about ancient translators and the translation process itself, we must ensure that we have a possible source of such a kind that an ancient translator might reasonably have used it to produce the Greek text which we have got. We must look for consistent habits, and for strategies such as the translation of (א)נש(א) בר with ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, but we must be careful not to invent either of them.

<sup>106</sup> Casey, “Response to Owen and Shepherd,” 5–12.

<sup>107</sup> P. M. Casey, “The Aramaic Background of Mark 9:11: A Response to J. K. Aitken,” JTS NS 55 (2004): 92–102 (at 96–101).

6. Isolate any deliberate editing by the gospel writers. For example, considering the central group of Mark's passion predictions (Mark 8:31; 9:31; 10:33–34) in the light of possible Aramaic sources makes his editorial procedures clearer than we could see otherwise.<sup>108</sup> This is an especially important procedure in dealing with Q passages, where the two versions in Matthew and Luke sometimes differ from each other in ways characteristic of each gospel writer.

7. Assess the probability that the reconstruction of the proposed Aramaic source is accurate, determine how accurate the proposed interpretation of it should be considered to be, and consider whether it represents correctly the teaching of Jesus, and any narrative framework as well. While his teaching is the focus of this article, it is methodologically important that, in doing culturally informed historical work of this kind, his life and teaching cannot reasonably be separated.

The importance of these principles was illustrated by the four passages which I reconstructed: Mark 2:23–3:6; 9:11–13; 10:35–45; 14:12–26. From a purely technical point of view, perhaps the most important was Mark 9:11–13, because the Aramaic reconstruction permitted the solution of all the problems traditionally posed by this passage.<sup>109</sup> The Son of man saying in v. 12 is especially difficult if ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου is interpreted in accordance with Christian tradition as a reference to Jesus alone, not least because the previous and following comments seem to refer to John the Baptist/Elijah. The following reconstruction removes the problem: והיכה כתיב על בר אנש דיכאב שגיא ואתבשר. This is a general statement which looks backwards to the death of John the Baptist/Elijah, as well as forwards to the death of Jesus. Moreover, once we realize that this is a general statement, we can find the scriptural passages referred to in vv. 12 and 13, looking for general statements in passages such as Isaiah 40 and Job 14. It should also be noted that this reconstruction could not be done before the publication of the second set of Aramaic Dead Sea Scrolls. The gradual publication of the first scrolls made it clear that Hebrew penetrated Aramaic during the Second Temple period to a greater degree than we had previously realized. However, we still did not have an Aramaic word for “suffer” which could underlie Mark’s πάθη. Writing in 1994–96, however, I was able to point out that “The noun מכאב is now extant at 4QTL Levi VIII, 1; VIII, 3, with... ]מכאב at VII.3, so there should be no doubt that כאב could be used in the Aramaic of our period, and meditation on this Hebrew scripture [sc. Job 14:22, with יכאב] is precisely what would make Jesus choose it.”<sup>110</sup> This is a dramatic example of how dependent we are on having sufficient Aramaic available to us to do these reconstructions. Work of this kind was simply not an option for the great scholars of the past, Meyer, Wellhausen, Black and Jeremias, because there was not sufficient Aramaic material for them to work with. It is now our responsibility to carry this work forward.

<sup>108</sup> For detailed discussion, see Casey, Solution to the Son of Man Problem, ch. 9.

<sup>109</sup> Casey, Aramaic Sources of Mark's Gospel, ch. 3.

I was able to make progress with each of the other passages studied in detail in this book, though this can only be illustrated briefly here. For example, in discussing Mark 3:1–6, I was able to illuminate the information that the Pharisees were watching Jesus to see if he would heal on the Sabbath with the cultural assumption that they might be able to enforce the death penalty for two violations of the Sabbath, but not for one. This makes perfectly good sense of the death threat at the end of the passage, where Mark’s unsatisfactory Greek συμβούλιον ἐδίδουν should be regarded as a translation of יהבין עיצה, “gave counsel.” The translator used συμβούλιον rather than συμβουλία because he was suffering from interference as is normal among bilingual translators.<sup>111</sup> In discussing Mark 10:35–45, I was able to recover the unity of the passage, and defend its historicity, partly by reconstructing the final verse, where the Aramaic בר (א)נש(א) must have a general level of meaning. This enables us to see it as the natural conclusion to the incident in which James and John agreed to die with Jesus, so that the general level of meaning includes their death with his, and includes cultural assumptions about martyrdom.<sup>112</sup> In discussing Mark 14:12–26, I was able to solve the problems posed by Jesus' word over the cup with an Aramaic reconstruction, carefully distinguished from translations of it into Aramaic, which caused such trouble to previous scholars. I could then place it in its cultural context as part of Jesus' final Passover with his disciples rather than the institution of the Eucharist.<sup>113</sup> All these passages have one major point in common. The Aramaic reconstructions have to be seen in their original cultural contexts as part of accounts of Jesus' life and teaching. They are then an essential element in enabling us to understand the historic ministry.

<sup>110</sup> Casey, Aramaic Sources of Mark’s Gospel, 128.

<sup>111</sup> Ibid., 138–139, 173–175, 185–186.

<sup>112</sup> Ibid., 194, 211–218.

I carried this further in my 2002 book, An Aramaic Approach to Q.<sup>114</sup> In a survey of previous scholarship, I was able to point to only a few scholars who had made any positive contribution to the study of the teaching of Jesus in Q by considering its possible Aramaic background: most scholars simply left it out. After a chapter on method oriented especially towards the Q material, I proceeded with the seven principles outlined above to investigate three passages of different kinds. From Matt 23:23–36//Luke 11:39–51, I reconstructed one Aramaic source which had been translated twice. From Matt 11:2–19//Luke 7:18–35, I reconstructed one Greek source which was used by both evangelists, and an Aramaic source from which it had been translated into Greek. The most complicated was Mark 3:20–30, Matt 12:22–32 and Luke 11:14–23; 12:10. Here I reconstructed one Aramaic source from Mark 3:20–29, which was translated and edited to form Mark 3:20–30. I reconstructed a Greek source from Matt 12:22–32//Luke 11:14–23, with help in the opening two verses from the less heavily edited Matt 9:32–33. I also reconstructed an Aramaic source which was translated to form this Greek source. I found that Mark 3:28–29, Matt 12:32 and Luke 12:10 were due to no less than three translations of the same Aramaic saying, now found in its original context in Mark and Matthew. In all three cases, I was able to use the Aramaic reconstructions to help with the interpretation of the teaching of Jesus and with the editing of the evangelists. Again, I can only exemplify this briefly here.

For example, I was able to reconstruct from Matt 23:23 ἀφήκατε τὰ βαρύτερα the Aramaic עברתון על חומריא, using the technical legal term חומרִיא for the “heavy” or more important points of the Law, a term which Luke left out because it would be difficult to explain to Gentile Christian readers. I also recovered the unavoidable play on words between עבד (Matt 23:23//Luke 11:42 ποιῆσαι), “do,” and עבר (Matt 23:23 ἀφῆκατε...ἀφιέναι, Luke 11:42 παρέργεσθε...παρεῖναι), “transgress,” “pass over,” and followed Matthew’s ἄνηθον in reconstructing שבתא, “dill,” which Luke misread as שברש, producing the inappropriate πήγανον, “rue.” All this made it much more possible to put in its cultural context the way in which Jesus was attacking the Torah observance of scribes and Pharisees. He did not teach that there was anything wrong with tithing, not even with tithing mint, dill and cummin, which would provide the priests in the Temple with herbs as well as corn, wine and oil. He taught that scribes and Pharisees were at fault in combining this observance of their detailed expansion of the Torah with neglect of fundamentals, justice, mercy and trust.<sup>115</sup>

<sup>113</sup> Casey, Aramaic Sources of Mark's Gospel, 220, 241–242; earlier, cf. P. M. Casey, "The Original Aramaic Form of Jesus' Interpretation of the Cup," JTS NS 41 (1990): 1–12.

<sup>114</sup> Casey, Aramaic Approach to Q.

Again, I was able to reconstruct and interpret Jesus’ teaching at Matt 12:30//Luke 11:23. Here the reading με after σκοπίζει has generally been found impossible, rather than the more difficult, and the saying has been interpreted as a generality not properly related to its context. I was able to reconstruct בדרני, “scatters me,” for in Aramaic, as in Hebrew (פזר), one can scatter a single animal or person, as one cannot in Greek or English. Jesus taught that anyone who did not gather with him, that is, participate in his successful ministry to gather in the lost sheep of the house of Israel (cf. Matt 10:6), was effectively scattering him, that is, treating him as someone who was cast out from Israel. This fits perfectly with the accusation that he cast out demons by means of the devil, for some scribes and Pharisees who made such an accusation would very much have like to see him removed.<sup>116</sup> It follows that these two books have proposed a methodology for reconstructing the teaching of Jesus, and that this could prove even more fruitful in increasing our understanding of his teaching, in demonstrating that some of his teaching recorded in the synoptic gospels is indeed authentic, and in helping to fit it into the ministry as a whole.

<sup>115</sup> Casey, Aramaic Approach to Q, 64–65, 72–76.

<sup>116</sup> Ibid., 148–149, 176–177.

A few other scholars have done work of this kind very recently, albeit on a much smaller scale. For example, in expounding the Lord's prayer, Chilton offered a complete Aramaic reconstruction of it.<sup>117</sup> In another book, his discussion of possible Aramaic background to teaching of Jesus included a retroversion of an original saying from Mark 14:25, with an appendix on method.<sup>118</sup> Without doing complete Aramaic reconstructions, Crossley has shown the importance of careful linguistic study of the background to some gospel passages. For example, drawing on rabbinic literature and the Syriac versions of the gospels, he showed that the view that the Aramaic תוֹב (and Hebrew טוֹב) forms the background for the teaching of Jesus on repentance is correct.<sup>119</sup> Detailed linguistic research of this kind remains essential for the task of reconstructing Jesus' teaching.

Aus has advanced the study of traditions about Jesus in several books, with very careful study of Jewish texts though without Aramaic reconstructions. Much of this work concerns actions of Jesus rather than teaching, and even traditions about him.<sup>120</sup> Whether literally concerned with the teaching of Jesus or not,<sup>121</sup> Aus's work is of methodological relevance and of great importance, because Aramaic reconstructions of the teaching of Jesus must be seen with equal care and learning in the context of Jewish tradition.

In a book published after this article went to press, I carried the work of the previous two books further, but on a narrower front, in proposing a solution to the notoriously difficult Son of man problem.<sup>122</sup> Those parts concerned with the teaching of Jesus are based on the methodology discussed earlier in this section. I also discussed

---

<sup>117</sup> B. D. Chilton, Jesus' Prayer and Jesus' Eucharist: His Personal Practice of Spirituality (Valley Forge: Trinity Press International, 1997): 24–51.

<sup>118</sup> B. D. Chilton, A Feast of Meanings: Eucharistic Theologies from Jesus through Johannine Circles, NovTSup (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 44–45, with 177–181, App. Four, "Aramaic Retroversions of Jesus' Sayings."

<sup>119</sup> J. G. Crossley, "The Semitic Background to Repentance in the Teaching of John the Baptist and Jesus," JSHJ 2 (2004): 138–157.

<sup>120</sup> E.g. R. D. Aus, My name is "Legion": Palestinian Judaic Traditions in Mark 5:1–20 and Other Gospel Texts (Lanham: University Press of America, 2003); Matthew 1–2 and the Virginal Conception: In Light of Palestinian and Hellenistic Judaic Traditions on the Birth of Israel's First Redeemer, Moses (Lanham: University Press of America, 2004).

<sup>121</sup> Cf. further R. D. Aus, Weihnachtsgeschichte, barmherziger Samaritaner, verlorener Sohn: Studien zu ihrem jüdischen Hintergrund (Berlin: Institut Kirche und Judentum, 1988).

<sup>122</sup> Casey, The Solution to the Son of Man Problem.

extensively the translation process, especially in discussing further the strategy of rendering (א)נש(א) בר with ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου when the reference is to Jesus, but not otherwise. I also made extensive use of a point of method which has had a chequered history, partly because previous generations of scholars did not have a sufficient understanding of the translation process. This is to argue that when sayings of Jesus cannot be reconstructed in any feasible Aramaic, he cannot have spoken them. This point of method has to be handled with extreme care. It is vulnerable to our failure to realize that a slightly free translation has resulted in a gospel saying, as most notoriously in Jesus' interpretation of the wine at the last supper.<sup>123</sup> The term ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου is however a special case, because it is a strategic translation of (א)נש(א) בר, which cannot function as a christological title, as ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου is in many sayings attributed to Jesus. In the case of most secondary Son of man sayings, therefore, we can demonstrate with quite unusual ease that an Aramaic version of a saying would not be feasible. Moreover, in ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου itself, these sayings contain the most notorious Semitism in the New Testament, so that arguments for their secondary nature would not even be vulnerable to a conviction that Jesus spoke Greek. This point of method is essential to my proposed solution of the Son of man problem, but it remains to be seen whether much fruitful use can be made of it in studying more generally the teaching of Jesus.

We must therefore conclude that the present state of scholarship is very mixed. On the one hand, many scholars refuse to utilize Aramaic reconstructions of the teaching of Jesus, to the point where they do not become competent to do so. On the other hand, many passages have been reconstructed, and having been central to this work, I have argued that it has been very fruitful. In the final section of this article, I indicate what else could be done.

---

<sup>123</sup> See above, with n. 111, citing Casey, "Jesus' Interpretation of the Cup."

4. Future Work

There are many other passages which include teaching of Jesus which could benefit from the exploration of further Aramaic reconstructions. For example, Mark 1:44 contains Jesus' instructions to a man whom he had healed of a skin disease to go and show himself to a priest and offer the sacrifice prescribed by Moses, which shows Jesus conspicuously teaching within the Law of Moses. Here the article in  $\tau\tilde{\omega}$   $\text{\textcircled{I}}\text{\textcircled{E}}\text{\textcircled{P}}\text{\textcircled{E}}$  probably reflects the use of the Aramaic definite state. The more difficult and surely correct reading in 1:41,  $\delta\rho\gamma\iota\sigma\theta\epsilon\acute{\iota}\varsigma$ , must go back to the Aramaic  $\text{\textcircled{I}}\text{\textcircled{G}}\text{\textcircled{R}}$ , the semantic area of which is much broader than the English word "be angry" and the Greek  $\delta\rho\gamma\acute{\iota}\zeta\omicron\mu\alpha\iota$ . A full study of this might illuminate what state the narrator thought Jesus, or perhaps the man, was in, "trembling" or "deeply moved," and show once more a translator suffering from interference. The narrative of Mark 1:41–45 as a whole has several unmarked changes of subject, as Aramaic narratives often do. It also has a lot of parataxis. A complete Aramaic reconstruction of the whole passage would surely be fruitful, and enable us to see Jesus' actions and teaching more clearly together within their cultural framework and within the framework of the historic ministry.

At Mark 12:1–12, a parable of Jesus sets off from Isaiah 5, and portrays in parabolic form Jesus' rejection by official Jewish leaders, his death, and his final triumph in accordance with one of the scriptures set for Passover. If authentic, this passage contains important teaching of Jesus about his forthcoming death and subsequent triumph. There has however been a lot of scholarly dispute about its authenticity, partly because of problems over its cultural background, and no-one seems to be able to understand the unique occurrence of  $\epsilon\kappa\epsilon\phi\alpha\lambda\acute{\iota}\omega\sigma\alpha\nu$  at Mark 12:4. We should accordingly explore the rare and colourful Aramaic word  $\text{\textcircled{P}}\text{\textcircled{R}}$ , which has a semantic area approximately equivalent to the English "pound," "bray." This is just the sort of word which Jesus might use and which a bilingual translator might not know. Moreover, the plural of its present participle,  $\text{\textcircled{P}}\text{\textcircled{R}}\text{\textcircled{A}}\text{\textcircled{S}}$ , might well be thought to be a verb derived from the noun  $\text{\textcircled{P}}\text{\textcircled{R}}\text{\textcircled{A}}$ , "head." These are precisely the circumstances in which a struggling translator might produce the neologism  $\epsilon\kappa\epsilon\phi\alpha\lambda\acute{\iota}\omega\sigma\alpha\nu$ . An attempt at a complete Aramaic reconstruction of the whole passage might prove fruitful. It might enable us to take an informed decision about which parts, if any, are authentic, and whether or not this provides valuable evidence of Jesus looking forward to his death and resurrection, and his subsequent rule of a restored Israel, with the twelve judging the twelve tribes and someone important on his right and his left (cf. Mark 10:35–45, Matt 19:28//Luke 22:30).

There are further passages of Q which could benefit from this kind of investigation. Some are isolated items not in common order. For example, Matt 12:11 has been put by Matthew into his version of Mark 3:1–6, whereas its parallel at Luke 14:5 occurs in a narrative which shows many signs of Lukan construction. The saying itself, however, has a perfectly good Sitz im Leben in Jesus' teaching about the Sabbath, and I noted above that a suggestion of Black implied an Aramaic level of the tradition. This should be carried further, and might cast further light on the chaotic model of Q which I have proposed elsewhere, as well as on the teaching of Jesus.<sup>124</sup> A major passage worthy of further consideration is the Lord's Prayer. Several attempts to discuss this in the light of Aramaic reconstructions have already been made, a remarkable testimony to its iconic status.<sup>125</sup> Nonetheless, further progress is surely possible, and here as elsewhere an Aramaic reconstruction has an important role to play in locating Jesus' teaching in its original context.

The passages discussed in this section are no more than suggestions for further research. They are also only examples. Many more passages could be suggested, to the point where I conclude that serious work on the Aramaic level of the transmission of gospel traditions about the life and teaching of Jesus is only just beginning.

5. Conclusions

The following conclusions may therefore be suggested. Serious academic research into the role of Aramaic in reconstructing the Teaching of Jesus effectively began in the 1890's. It was extremely difficult to do, owing to the lack of sufficient Aramaic sources. Consequently, only two brilliant books on the whole subject were written in the following century, those of Meyer in 1896 and Black in 1946.<sup>126</sup> These were complemented by a small number of works which fruitfully discussed particular aspects of Jesus' teaching, studying Aramaic which was of especial relevance. Most work was however methodologically unsatisfactory, and it may be this which has made most New Testament scholars unwilling to become properly competent in the language which Jesus spoke. Even the work of Meyer and Black, complemented by the studies of other outstanding scholars such as Wellhausen and Jeremias, had severe methodological problems caused primarily by the lack of sufficient Aramaic sources.

---

<sup>124</sup> See above, noting Black, Aramaic Approach (1946) on Luke 14:5, and Casey, Aramaic Approach to Q.

<sup>125</sup> See notably Dalman, Worte (2nd ed., 1930), 283–365, Anhang A, "Das Vater-unser"; Burney, Poetry, 112–113; E. Lohmeyer, Das Vater-unser (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1946), Eng. trans.: The Lord's Prayer, trans. J. Bowden (London: Collins, 1965); Jeremias, Prayers, 82–107; Schwarz, Und Jesus Sprach, 209–226; Chilton, Jesus' Prayer, 24–51; R. Antonisz, The Original "Our Father" in Aramaic: A New Discovery, A New Reconstruction of the "Our Father" (Coulsdon: Lamp, 1999). For detailed discussion of an attempted reconstruction in Hebrew, J. Carmignac, Recherches sur le "Notre Père" (Paris: Letouzey & Ané, 1969).

This situation gradually changed with the discovery and publication of further Aramaic sources, among which the most important and dramatic were the Aramaic Dead Sea Scrolls. We are now in a position to do much more extensive and fruitful work than was possible even for our most able and learned predecessors. In this article I have illustrated this with a number of passages of Mark and of Q which have already been reconstructed, and made suggestions for further work. In so doing, I have also proposed a clear methodology by which scholarship could proceed. It is profoundly to be hoped that many more scholars will rise to this challenge, so that together we can make a major contribution to the Quest of the historical Jesus.

---

<sup>126</sup> Meyer, Jesu Muttersprache; Black, Aramaic Approach.

THE QUEST FOR THE HISTORICAL JESUS IN POSTMODERN PERSPECTIVE: A HYPOTHETICAL ARGUMENT*

MOISÉS MAYORDOMO AND PETER-BEN SMIT

[Baudolino:] And I said to myself, [...] on the basis of these notes I would compose the Gesta Baudolini. So in the course of my journeys I carried with me the story of my life. But in the escape [...] I lost these pages. It was like losing life itself. [Niketas Choniates, Byzantine historian:] You will tell me what you remember. I receive scraps of events, fragments of actions, and I extract a story from them, woven by a design of Providence. In saving my life you have given me what little future remains to me and I will repay you by giving you back the past you have lost... [Baudolino:] But maybe my story has no meaning. [Niketas:] There are no stories without meaning. And I am one of those men who can find it even when others fail to see it. Afterwards the story becomes the book of the living, like a blaring trumpet that raises from the tomb those who have been dust for centuries... Still it takes time, you have to consider the events, arrange them in order, find the connections, even the least visible ones.<sup>1</sup>

1. Introduction: Building a Hypothesis in a “War Zone”

In the 1970’s, when “post-structuralism” first appeared on the academic stage, many critical voices warned against what they considered a “repeated and often extremely subtle denial of,” a “hedonist withdrawal from” or “the randomization of” history.<sup>2</sup> In spite of these

---

* We would like to thank Sam van Leer for correcting our English, Julia Müller-Clemm for graphical help and Ulrike Sals for some critical comments. All remaining mistakes are our own responsibility.

<sup>1</sup> Umberto Eco, Baudolino (New York: Harcourt, 2002), 11–12.

<sup>2</sup> In that order: Frank Lentricchia, After the New Criticism (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1980), xiii; Terry Eagleton, Literary Theory: An Introduction (Oxford: Blackwell, 1983), 150; Perry Anderson, In the Tracks of Historical Materialism (London: Verso, 1983), 48. For an early assessment cf. Derek Attridge, Geoff Bennington and Robert Young, eds., Post-structuralism and the Question of History (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987).

early attacks, post-structuralism has not only survived (often under the broader umbrella of “postmodernism”) but also established itself in the field of historical studies.<sup>3</sup> The postmodern challenge, though, has sparked a debate often marked by semi-religious zeal.<sup>4</sup> Critics

---

<sup>3</sup> The following theoretical contributions arguably belong to the vastly heterogeneous field of “postmodern historiography”: Frank R. Ankersmit, Narrative Logic: A Semantic Analysis of the Historian’s Language (The Hague: Nijhoff, 1983); History and Tropology: The Rise and Fall of Metaphor (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994); Historical Representation (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 2001); Sublime Historical Experience (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 2005); F. R. Ankersmit and Hans Kellner, eds., A New Philosophy of History (London: Reaktion Books, 1995); Robert F. Berkhofer, Beyond the Great Story: History as Text and Discourse (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1995); Roger Chartier, On the Edge of the Cliff: History, Language and Practices (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1996); Elizabeth D. Ermarth, Sequel to History: Postmodernism and the Crisis of Representational Time (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1992); Hans-Jürgen Goertz, Unsichere Geschichte: Zur Theorie historischer Referentialität (Stuttgart: Reclam, 2001); Keith Jenkins, On “What is History?”: From Carr and Elton to Rorty and White (London: Routledge, 1995); Refiguring History: New Thoughts on an Old Discipline (London: Routledge, 2003); Patrick Joyce, “The Return of History: Postmodernism and the Politics of Academic History in Britain,” Past & Present 158 (1998): 207–235; Hans Kellner, Language and Historical Representation: Getting the Story Crooked (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1989); Dominick LaCapra, History and Criticism (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1985); History in Transit: Experience, Identity, Critical Theory (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 2004); Allan Megill, ed., Rethinking Objectivity (Durham: Duke University Press, 1994); Alun Munslow, Deconstructing History (London: Routledge, 1997); The New History (Harlow: Longman, 2003); Philipp Sarasin, Geschichtswissenschaft und Diskursanalyse, stw 1639 (Frankfurt a.M.: Suhrkamp, 2003); Joan W. Scott, ed., Feminism and History (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996); Beverley C. Southgate, History: What and Why? Ancient, Modern and Postmodern Perspectives (London: Routledge, 1996); Postmodernism in History: Fear or Freedom? (London: Routledge, 2003); Hayden White, Metahistory: The Historical Imagination in Nineteenth-century Europe (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1973); Tropics of Discourse: Essays in Cultural Criticism (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1978); The Content of the Form: Narrative Discourse and Historical Representation (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1987). Two important journals debating theory issues are History and Theory (Blackwell) and Rethinking History (Routledge). Some useful introductions and anthologies include Callum G. Brown, Postmodernism for Historians (Harlow: Longman, 2004); Christoph Conrad and Martina Kessel, eds., Geschichte schreiben in der Postmoderne: Beiträge zur aktuellen Diskussion (Stuttgart: Reclam, 1994); Herta Nagl-Docekal, ed., Der Sinn des Historischen: Geschichtsphilosophische Debatten (Frankfurt a.M.: Fischer, 1996); Keith Jenkins, ed., The Postmodern History Reader (London: Routledge, 1997); Kevin Passmore, “Poststructuralism and History,” in Writing History: Theory and Practice, ed. Stefan Berger et al. (London: Arnold, 2003), 118–140; Willie Thompson, Postmodernism and History (Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2004).

<sup>4</sup> Mainly because of this controversy, a number of historians resigned from the “American Historical Association” (founded in 1884) and formed “The Historical Society” with the aim of “reorienting the historical profession toward an accessible, integrated history free from fragmentation, over-specialization, and political proscription” (cf. <http://www.bu.edu/historic/index.html> and Elizabeth Fox-Genovese wonder “if history might be on the way to becoming an endangered species,” they fear that their profession “has been shaken right down to its scientific and cultural foundations,” they diagnose “Clio under cultural shock” and it is even suggested that literary critics and social theorists are doing nothing less than “murdering our past.”<sup>5</sup> The dramatic dimension of this conflict has reached its (preliminary?) climax in an (in)famous and much cited statement from one of the leading British historians:

[I]n battling against people who would subject historical studies to the dictates of literary critics we historians are, in a way, fighting for our lives. Certainly, we are fighting for the lives of innocent young people beset by devilish tempters who claim to offer higher forms of thought and deeper truths and insights—the intellectual equivalent of crack, in fact. Any acceptance of these theories—even the most gentle or modest bow in their direction—can prove fatal. [...] Ad fontes remains the necessary war cry.<sup>6</sup>

So far the reports from the war zone.<sup>7</sup>

Although postmodern thinking has exerted some influence on exegesis and theology, it has not been integrated in any substantial way into mainstream historically-oriented biblical exegesis.<sup>8</sup> We would, and Elisabeth Lasch-Quinn, eds., Reconstructing History: The Emergence of a New Historical Society [New York: Routledge, 1999]). For an instructive entry into the British debate cf. Lawrence Stone’s short critical note “History and Post-Modernism” (Past & Present 131 [1991]: 217–218) and the following interchange between Patrick Joyce and Catriona Kelly on the one hand (ibid. 133 [1991]: 204–213) and L. Stone and Gabrielle M. Spiegel on the other (ibid. 135 [1992]: 189–208). For further examples cf. <http://www.history.ac.uk/projects/discourse/index.html> (May, 2005).

---

<sup>5</sup> In that order: Stone, “History and Post-Modernism,” 218; Joyce Appleby, Lynn Hunt and Margaret Jacob, Telling the Truth about History (New York: Norton & Company, 1994), 1; Ute Daniel, “Clio unter Kulturschock: Zu den aktuellen Debatten der Geschichtswissenschaft,” Geschichte in Wissenschaft und Unterricht 48 (1997): 195–218, 259–279; Keith Windschuttle, The Killing of History: How Literary Critics and Social Theorists are Murdering our Past, 2nd ed. (New York: Free Press, 1997).

<sup>6</sup> Geoffrey R. Elton, Return to Essentials: Some Reflections on the Present State of Historical Study (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991), 41, 52.

<sup>7</sup> Other defenders of “traditional” historical study include John Tosh, The Pursuit of History (London: Longman, 1984); Lawrence Stone, The Past and the Present Revisited (London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1987); Gertrude Himmelfarb, On Looking into the Abyss: Untimely Thoughts on Culture and Society (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1994); Richard J. Evans, In Defence of History (London: Granta Books, 1997); Georg G. Iggers, Historiography in the Twentieth Century: From Scientific Objectivity to the Postmodern Challenge (Hanover: Wesleyan University Press, 1997); Arthur Marwick, The New Nature of History: Knowledge, Evidence, Language (Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2001).

<sup>8</sup> Cf. the overview in section 3.

thus, like to raise the question as to how historical Jesus research relates to the epistemological problems at stake in this ongoing debate. Since discussions on “postmodernism” have often been marred by prejudices and suspicion on both sides, we would like to lay open our own stance in this regard.<sup>9</sup> As far as the daily use of postmodern epistemology is concerned we may call ourselves “interested outsiders.” We do not think that postmodernism in all its multifaceted guises can be simply dismissed as “fashionable nonsense”;<sup>10</sup> nor do we think that the tremendous scholarly efforts made under the banner of “modernism” are worthless. To state it positively, we think that the questions raised by postmodernism can enrich our critical agenda.<sup>11</sup> We would therefore wish to develop an experimental argument based on postmodern historiography as its basic hypothesis,<sup>12</sup> outlining the questions at stake and probing the depths of their consequences. The question, thus, is not a normative one but a hypothetical one: Assuming the epistemological legitimacy of postmodern historiography, what would historical Jesus research look like?<sup>13</sup>

2. Mapping the Field of Postmodern Historiography

2.1. “Postmodernism”: Entering a Hall of Mirrors

The conventional organization of knowledge assigns definitions a place of honour at the beginning of every critical inquiry. However, when it comes to defining a term like “postmodernism” we enter a linguistic hall of mirrors. The term itself has been assimilated to so many different <sup>9</sup> Both authors are male, educated at European universities, concentrating on New Testament studies, currently employed at the University of Berne, Switzerland. In spite of these similarities, it should be noted that they have significantly different ecclesial and social backgrounds: the one Mennonite and Reformed, the other an ordained Old Catholic priest, the one married with children, from a Spanish-emigrant cultural background, the other unmarried and Dutch. But then again, this sort of autobiographical data discloses as much as it covers, guides as much as it misguides.

---

<sup>10</sup> As suggested in Alan D. Sokal and Jean Bricmont, Fashionable Nonsense: Postmodern Intellectuals' Abuse of Science (New York: Picador, 1998).

<sup>11</sup> In any case, a philosophical argument for or against one of these positions would go far beyond our competence.

<sup>12</sup> The best model for a hypothetical argument remains Plato's Meno, where the dialogue partners take as a starting point the assumption that they actually know what virtue is, though it cannot be known with certainty.

<sup>13</sup> An undertaking not dissimilar to the contribution of David J. Clines, “The Postmodern Adventure in Biblical Studies,” in The Interpretation of the Bible, ed. Jože Krašovec, JSOTSup 289 (Sheffield: Academic Press, 1998), 1603–1616.

contexts inside and outside academia that it “resists” any attempt to circumscribe it.<sup>14</sup> As a consequence of its having a “‘nudging’ commitment to doubleness, or duplicity,”<sup>15</sup> definitions of it can only end in self-contradiction. Nevertheless, some common features can be singled out:

[I]ndeterminacy and immanence; ubiquitous simulacra, pseudo-events; a conscious lack of mastery, lightness and evanescence everywhere; a new temporality, or rather intemporality, a polychronic sense of history; a patchwork or ludic, transgressive or deconstructive approach to knowledge and authority; an ironic, parodic, reflexive, fantastic awareness of the moment; a linguistic turn, semiotic imperative in culture; and in society generally the violence of local desires diffused into a terminology of seduction and force.<sup>16</sup>

More than marking a threshold from one epoch called “modernism” to an epoch which, purportedly, has moved beyond it,<sup>17</sup> the prefix “post” expresses a more intricate relationship of aversion and addiction towards a form of modernity, which to a great extent is a product of postmodern boundary-marking. It is the modernism of Cartesian stable subjectivity and not the modernism of Freud’s psychoanalysis, of Hegel’s determinist philosophy of history and not of Einstein’s

---

<sup>14</sup> Victor E. Taylor and Charles E. Winquist, eds., Postmodernism: Critical Concepts, 4 vols. (London: Routledge, 1998) offer the most comprehensive inventory of foundational and critical studies. Both have also edited a useful Encyclopedia of Postmodernism (London: Routledge, 2001). The history of this term from 1880 (!) is traced in Michael Köhler, “‘Postmodernismus’: Ein begriffsgeschichtlicher Überblick,” Amerikastudien 22 (1977): 8–18 and Wolfgang Welsch, “Postmoderne: Genealogie und Bedeutung eines umstrittenen Begriffs,” in “Postmoderne” oder Der Kampf um die Zukunft, ed. Peter Kemper (Frankfurt a.M.: Fischer, 1988), 9–36. Besides its early use in arts and literature, it was within the field of social analysis that the endemic use of the term started its career, especially through Jean-François Lyotard’s highly influential analysis of the developments within post-industrialised societies in The Postmodern Condition: A Report on Knowledge (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1986; French: 1979).

<sup>15</sup> Linda Hutcheon, The Politics of Postmodernism (London: Routledge, 1989), 1.

<sup>16</sup> Ihab Hassan, The Postmodern Turn: Essays in Postmodern Theory and Culture (Ohio: Ohio State University Press, 1987), xvi.

<sup>17</sup> Doubts concerning the adequacy of the term as an epoch label are expressed by Birgit Aschmann, “Moderne versus Postmoderne: Gedanken zur Debatte über vergangene, gegenwärtige und künftige Forschungsansätze,” in Historische Debatten und Kontroversen im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert, ed. Jürgen Elvert and Susanne Krauss (Stuttgart: Franz Steiner 2002), 256–275; Dieter Langewiesche, “‘Postmoderne’ als Ende der ‘Moderne’? Überlegungen eines Historikers in einem interdisziplinären Gespräch,” in Gestaltungskraft des Politischen: Festschrift Eberhard Kolb, ed. Wolfram Pyta and Ludwig Richter, Historische Forschungen 63 (Berlin: Duncker & Humblot, 1998), 331–347.

theory of relativity, of interpretive positivism and not of Joycean fragmentation of meaning. However, for the sake of the argument we may assume that “modernism” is (not: “was”)<sup>18</sup> marked by belief in the unity of experience, the predominance of universals, and a determinate sense of referentiality. [...] In the most basic terms, modernism represents the residual belief in the (self-evident) supremacy of logic and scientific rationalism that assumes reality as a whole can be rendered and comprehended, that ideas and concepts are determinate, and that human beings share a level of universal experience with one another that is transcultural and transhistorical.

“Modernism” is, further, characterized by an optimistic attitude towards the possibilities of progress in understanding, control and growth, and by its firm belief in absolute truth and objective knowledge. This picture of modernism is pivotal for the postmodern stress on the uncertainty of knowledge, the fragility of reality, the self-referentiality of language and the deconstruction of oppositions. Lyotard’s now classic description of postmodernism as “incredulity towards metanarratives [métarécits]”<sup>19</sup> and Jacques Derrida’s concept of deconstruction<sup>20</sup> remain central points of reference.

Obviously any form of historiography aiming at reconstructing the past simply “wie es eigentlich gewesen”<sup>21</sup> cannot remain unaffected by postmodernism. Typical facets of “modern” historiography have come under critical cross fire, like the pursuit of objectivity, the precise representability of the past, the basic distinction between fact and fiction, the possibility of verifying historical truth on the basis of the available evidence or of explaining the course of past events by means of laws

---

<sup>18</sup> The following quotation from David Clippinger, “Modernism,” in Encyclopedia of Postmodernism, ed. Taylor and Winkler, 251 is, significantly, formulated in the past tense.

<sup>19</sup> Lyotard, Postmodern condition, xxiv.

<sup>20</sup> Cf. Of Grammatology (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1976; French: 1967) and Writing and Difference (London: Routledge and Kegan, 1978; French: 1967).

<sup>21</sup> Leopold von Ranke, Geschichten der romanischen und germanischen Völker von 1494–1514, Sämtliche Werke 33/34 (Leipzig: Duncker & Humblot, 1885), 7. When read in context, though, it becomes clear that Ranke’s famous dictum was directed against the moralizing tone of enlightenment historiography: “Man hat der Historie das Amt, die Vergangenheit zu richten, die Mitwelt zum Nutzen zukünftiger Jahre zu belehren, beigemessen: so hoher Aemter unterwindet sich gegenwärtiger Versuch nicht: er will bloß zeigen, wie es eigentlich gewesen.”

of causality,<sup>22</sup> and the idea that history is in itself meaningful and intentional. Postmodern critique, though, does not start at zero, but incorporates and duplicates many “modern” critical voices from the fields of Marxist studies, feminism, post-colonialism, the psychology of perception and philosophical constructivism.<sup>23</sup>

Probably the most important impetus came from linguistics, especially from what has been labelled the “linguistic turn.”<sup>24</sup> In the wake of the (re)discovery of Saussurian linguistics the evaluation of language changed from being simply a neutral and ingenuous instrument humans use to refer to the “reality” (simple referential view) to forming the cultural “matrix” which actually constitutes reality (constructivist view). Every language-orientated “science” has to face the fact that the very language it uses determines in very substantial ways how critics relate, interpret and interact with their objects in the “outside” world. The arbitrariness of signs, the distinction between synchronic and diachronic and the production of meaning by a relation of difference to other signs have raised important questions concerning the relation between written history and the “past” which it pretends to comprehend.<sup>25</sup> The problematic relation between language and world affects the classical understanding of truth as correspondence and blurs the basic differences between fact and fiction, historical source and literature.<sup>26</sup> Once the products of historians as well as their sources are regarded as linguistic signs, an endless interplay starts between the

---

<sup>22</sup> Cf. its classical expression in Carl Gustav Hempel, “The Function of General Laws in History,” Journal of Philosophy 39 (1942): 35–48 = Aspects of Scientific Explanation and other Essays in the Philosophy of Science (New York: Free Press, 1965), 231–243. Clayton Roberts, The Logic of Historical Explanation (University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1996) offers a neo-positivist version.

<sup>23</sup> Cf. especially Southgate, History: What and Why?, 58–107. For a brief account of “postmodern affinities” in the first half of the twentieth century, cf. Ernst Breisach, On the Future of History: The Postmodernist Challenge and its Aftermath (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003), 33–51. Of course, the most important early critic of the historicist paradigm was Friedrich Nietzsche. He uncovered the connection between objectivity claims and the interests of the middle-classes in his “Vom Nutzen und Nachteil der Historie für das Leben” (English: On the Advantage and Disadvantage of History for Life [Indianapolis: Hackett, 1980]).

<sup>24</sup> The term has been popularized by Richard Rorty, ed., The Linguistic Turn: Recent Essays in Philosophical Method (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967).

<sup>25</sup> Passmore, “Poststructuralism and History,” 120–121.

<sup>26</sup> Fred W. Burnett, “Historiography,” in Handbook of Postmodern Biblical Interpretation, ed. A. K. M. Adam (St. Louis: Chalice, 2000), 108: “The blurring of the line between history and fiction [...] is perhaps the main upshot of the linguistic turn in historical studies.”

texts historians use, the texts historians produce, and the “historical reality” which they (re)construct.<sup>27</sup>

2.2. Some General Positions—A Brief Sketch

Postmodern historians (cf. n. 3) approach problems which “modern” historians have avoided or left unresolved,<sup>28</sup> like:

Can empiricism legitimately constitute history as a separate epistemology? What is the character of historical evidence and what function does it perform? What is the role of the historian, his/her use of social theory, and the construction of explanatory frameworks in historical understanding? How insignificant to historical explanation is its narrative form?<sup>29</sup>

Postmodern historiography is not only “postmodern” for raising such critical questions but also for its absence of “schools of thought,” textbooks and clear-cut methodological instructions.<sup>30</sup> It is even disputable what credentials are required for admission into the “postmodern club.”<sup>31</sup> Some main lines within postmodern historiography are nevertheless palpable:

---

<sup>27</sup> For further discussion cf. Elizabeth Ann Clark, History, Theory, Text: Historians and the Linguistic Turn (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2004); Sarasin, Geschichtswissenschaft und Diskursanalyse, 11–31.

<sup>28</sup> Aschmann, “Moderne versus Postmoderne,” 259 sums up succinctly: “In der Geschichtswissenschaft [...] befindet man sich offenbar tatsächlich inmitten einer schweren epistemologischen Krise, die man [...] nur deshalb den ‘Postmodernen’ anlastet, weil man die Herausforderungen der Moderne, ihre Ambivalenzen und Infragestellungen zu lange nicht recht wahrgenommen hat.”

<sup>29</sup> Munslow, Deconstructing History, 3.

<sup>30</sup> However, Allan Megill, “‘Grand Narrative’ and the Discipline of History,” in New Philosophy of History, ed. Ankersmit and Kellner, 151–173 formulates four “prescriptive postulates”: “The Multiplicity Postulate: Never assume that there is a single authorized historical method or subject matter. [...] The Hybridization Postulate: Always establish residences outside the discipline. [...] The Fictionality Postulate: Always confront, in an explicit way, the fictionality implicit in all works of history. [...] The Theory Postulate: Always theorize” (168–173).

<sup>31</sup> For instance, the openly anti-methodical “New Historicism,” associated with the work of Stephen Greenblatt, has been left out of consideration here for two reasons: First, Greenblatt is not a historian trying to discover the rhetorical status of history but a literary critic trying to relate literature to history in typical postmodern ways. Then, this field of studies has been already ploughed from the perspective of biblical criticism in a special number of Biblical Interpretation 5/4 (1997): 289–481 (ed. Stephen D. Moore) with two articles on the Historical Jesus.

2.2.1. History without fixed meaning

The question whether there is fixed meaning and rationality inherent to history (governed, for instance, by its teleological orientation) is answered negatively. Within a postmodern paradigm the existence of hidden historical laws clearly cannot claim the status of an epistemological a priori.<sup>32</sup> If there are no binding principles, no hidden structures, no grounding chains of causality, then the mere possibility of finding a specifically historical explanation is called into question. To give an “explanation” means to account for something as following on from something else by causality, logic or common sense. However, a de-centered history cannot provide causal explanations. What historians can do is to tell a story, encrypting their explanations within the plot of that story. In a precise sense, this is an explanation of the past, but it is not a historical one, rather more generally, a narrative one.<sup>33</sup>

2.2.2. History without object—History as text

If the “past” is the main object of history, then historical research is ironically characterised by the absence of its object.<sup>34</sup> Without a seizable object, though, it is impossible to validate a historical proposition—given as an “objective description” of what “really” happened—by simply recalling the past.<sup>35</sup> Of course, historians are aware of the fact that the only access they have to the past is through an appeal to “evidence,” so-called source material, which again has to be discovered, edited, prepared, preserved, described, catalogued, indexed, selected, weighed, interpreted, related to other evidence and integrated into a meaningful narrative. One of the few things that we should be able to say with a fair amount of certainty is that historians write texts (mainly, if not exclusively, narratives) on the basis of other texts (or artefacts) which they judge relevant to the enterprise of (re)constructing a partial

---

<sup>32</sup> Cf. Agnes Heller, A Philosophy of History in Fragments (Oxford: Blackwell, 1993), 1–35; M. C. Lemon, The Discipline of History and the History of Thought (London: Routledge, 1995), 135–144.

<sup>33</sup> Lemon, Discipline of History, 144.

<sup>34</sup> Cf. Tony Bennett, Outside Literature (London: Routledge, 1990), 49–51. Goertz, Unsichere Geschichte, 7: “Die Geschichtswissenschaft hat keinen Gegenstand, der ihre Existenz rechtfertigt, sie hat nur Probleme bzw. ein Problem. Sie muß damit fertig werden, daß die Vergangenheit tot ist, die Gegenwart ihr entgleitet und die Zukunft noch nicht begonnen hat.”

<sup>35</sup> From a Popperian perspective on the principles of critical research, this would render historical utterances utterly unscientific.

aspect of the past. Postmodern historiography leaves objectivity claims behind, not simply because the historian cannot be objective, but because history has no object or, one should better say, no object beyond texts.<sup>36</sup>

2.2.3. History as hermeneutics

If the proper object of history is not the past in itself but the historical interpretation of textual “evidence,” then the hermeneutical question cannot be evaded. Of course, the hermeneutical field offers a wide range of positions from one single meaning validated by appeal to the intentio auctoris to the immateriality of the text and its being re-written in every act of reading.<sup>37</sup> The point, though, is that historians, just like literary critics, have to subject their own hermeneutical premises to scrutiny.<sup>38</sup> Especially after Bultmann’s critique of the idea of “exegesis without presuppositions”<sup>39</sup> and Gadamer’s subsequent hermeneutical reappraisal of prejudice and “Wirkungsgeschichte,”<sup>40</sup> they should be critical of their own contextual (dis)position<sup>41</sup> and, in consequence,

---

<sup>36</sup> Klaus Weimar, “Der Text, den (Literar-)Historiker schreiben,” in Geschichte als Literatur: Formen und Grenzen der Repräsentation von Vergangenheit, ed. Hartmut Eggert, Ulrich Profitlich and Klaus R. Scherpe (Stuttgart: Metzler, 1990), 29–39 defines this point very well: “Historiker erforschen nicht Geschichte, sie lesen Texte über Vergangenes; Historiker schreiben nicht Geschichte, vielmehr schreiben sie Texte über Geschichte. [...] Texte stehen am Anfang ihrer Arbeit, Texte stehen auch am Ende, und die Arbeit der Historiker bestünde demnach darin, aus den Texten am Anfang die Texte am Ende zu machen. Das Sicherste, das man über Historiographie sagen kann, ist, daß sie Neuvertextung ist” (29); “[H]istoriographische Texte haben keinen vorgegebenen Gegenstand, den sie beschreiben können, weder ‘die Geschichte’, noch auch nur ‘Ereignisse’; sie beschreiben vielmehr in einem ganz genauen und wörtlichen Sinne die Abwesenheit—sie füllen die Abwesenheit mit Schrift” (36).

<sup>37</sup> Cf. for discussion on these issues Moisés Mayordomo, Den Anfang hören: Leserorientierte Evangelienexegese am Beispiel von Matthäus 1–2, FRLANT 180 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1998), 11–195, 366–392.

<sup>38</sup> Hans Robert Jauss once stated that no text has ever been written in order to be interpreted philologically by philologists or historically by historians (Ästhetische Erfahrung und literarische Hermeneutik, stw 955 (Frankfurt a.M.: Suhrkamp, 1982], 688). We wonder, though, how historians who search for a determinate meaning of the past cope with the contradiction that they can reach this “goal” only by reading the textual evidence against its (supposed) intention.

<sup>39</sup> Rudolf Bultmann, “Is Exegesis without Presuppositions Possible,” in New Testament and Mythology and Other Basic Theological Writings, ed. Schubert M. Ogden (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984), 145–153 (German: 1957).

<sup>40</sup> Hans Georg Gadamer, Truth and Method, 2nd ed. (New York: Continuum, 1989).

<sup>41</sup> Michael Stanford, An Introduction to the Philosophy of History (Oxford: Blackwell, 1998), 53: “The historian not only writes about the constant flow of events; she also writes from within the flow.”

question the possibility of reaching complete congruence between a text used as historical evidence and its interpretation.<sup>42</sup> Even first-hand autobiographical evidence is not free of interpretation.<sup>43</sup> The ideal, thus, of a decontextualized historian runs up against the insurmountable problem that—to borrow a formulation of Moxter—“ein solcher Chronist kann die Geschichte nur um den Preis erfassen, daß er selbst keine hat.”<sup>44</sup>

2.2.4. History in plural forms, also in “classical vesture”

The plurality of perspectives is one of the most important concerns of postmodern historical writing. It seems impossible to deduce from it an imperative to desist from all approaches hitherto used. One can share the idea that all history-making moves within the limits of textuality and nevertheless write history in ways very similar to the well-known projects of “modernism.” All methodological approaches can “continue just as before, but with the proviso that none of them can continue to think that they gain direct access to, or ‘ground’ their textuality in, a ‘reality’ appropriated plain.”<sup>45</sup> Postmodernism is not about replacing but about expanding, which again opens up possibilities for exploring alternative forms of historiography, especially in the field of narrativity.<sup>46</sup>

2.2.5. History as referential language

The thorny question of whether language constructs or represents reality is becoming more and more of an exasperating burden to the

---

<sup>42</sup> Reinhart Koselleck, Vergangene Zukunft: Zur Semantik geschichtlicher Zeiten, sw 757 (Frankfurt a.M.: Suhrkamp, 1979; 4th ed., 2000), 204: “Eine Geschichte ist nie identisch mit der Quelle, die von dieser Geschichte zeugt.”

<sup>43</sup> Sarasin, Geschichtswissenschaft und Diskursanalyse, 57.

<sup>44</sup> Michael Moxter, “Erzählung und Ereignis. Über den Spielraum historischer Repräsentation,” in Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. Jens Schröter and Ralph Brucker, BZNW 114 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002), 67–88: here 74.

<sup>45</sup> Jenkins, What is History?, 32.

<sup>46</sup> In spite of the impression that “the few books and articles that have supposedly [...] followed the linguistic or rhetorical turns look more like the old history” (Berkhofer, Great Story, 25) there are creative examples of postmodern historical writing: Simon Schama, Dead Certainties (Unwarranted Speculations) (New York: Vintage, 1992); Patrick Joyce, Democratic Subjects: The Self and the Social in Nineteenth-century England (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994); Robin Bisha, “Reconstructing the Voice of a Noblewoman of the Time of Peter the Great: Daria Mikhailovna Menshikova,” Rethinking History 2 (1998): 51–63.

theoretical debate.<sup>47</sup> The problems the answer to this question poses may be by-passed, however, by focusing on the way language is actually approached. The basic rules of the “language game” suggest that we can appropriate an utterance in any meaningful way only by relating it to something. Even postmodernists “refer” to the theories and works of others; and they do it in such ways that we as readers cannot avoid the impression of dealing with entities outside of the present text. Historiography, thus, should not express its fear of the so-called “linguistic turn” by invoking the perils of becoming a “mere” language-game—as long as “reference” is part of the game.

In conclusion, this leads to a much more complex view of the historiographical work which can be graphically illustrated:<sup>48</sup>

2.3. Hayden White’s “Metahistory”

One of the main impulses for postmodern historiography stems from the analysis of social discourse and power by Michel Foucault (1926–1984).<sup>49</sup> At present, the most widely discussed exponent of postmodern historiography is Hayden White<sup>50</sup>—a thinker who has been given the dubious credit of being responsible for “the most damaging undertaking ever performed by a historian on his profession.”<sup>51</sup> His main concern is to show that history is basically a narrative discourse, both found and invented.<sup>52</sup>

<sup>47</sup> The main positions in the so-called “realism-debate” are sketched in Marcus Willaschek, ed., Realismus, UTB 2143 (Paderborn: Ferdinand Schöningh, 2000).

<sup>48</sup> Cf. Berkhofer, Beyond the Great Story, 29–30, 38–39, 65; also in “The challenges of poetics to (normal) historical practice,” Poetics Today 9 (1988): 435–452 = Jenkins, Postmodern History Reader, 139–155. Lines moving in both directions indicate reciprocal influence, dashed lines signal an indeterminate relation.

<sup>49</sup> Cf. The Order of Things: An Archaeology of the Human Sciences (New York: Random House, 1970; French: 1966); Discipline and Punish: The Birth of the Prison (New York: Vintage, 1977; French: 1975); “Nietzsche, Genealogy, History,” in Language, Counter-Memory, Practice: Selected Essays and Interviews, ed. D. F. Bouchard (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1977; French: 1971), 139–164.

<sup>50</sup> White’s three main works are: Metahistory (1973), Tropics of Discourse (1978) and The Content of the Form (1987). For the ongoing debate cf. Hans Kellner, “White’s Linguistic Humanism,” History and Theory, Beiheft 19 (1980): 1–29; Wulf Kansteiner, “Hayden White’s Critique of the Writing of History,” History and Theory 32.3 (1993): 273–295; Jenkins, What is History, 134–179.

<sup>51</sup> Phyllis Grosskurth in a review of White’s Metahistory in Canadian Historical Review 56 (1975): 193, as quoted in Richard T. Vann, “The Reception of Hayden White,” History and Theory 37 (1998): 143–161; here 146.

<sup>52</sup> The narrativity of history has been the object of many studies before and after White: Cf. (in chronological order) Arthur C. Danto, Analytical Philosophy of History (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1965), revised as: Narration and Knowledge

An early foray into postmodern theory is White's essay "The Burden of History," in which—following Nietzsche, Burckhardt, Schopenhauer and European existentialists—he calls into question the notion that history is guided by rationally deducible laws and thus can be interpreted in one meaningful way.<sup>53</sup> The writing of history is a way of “imposing upon the chaos of the world a momentary form.”<sup>54</sup> This concept of history-without-meaning is one of White’s fundamental axioms.<sup>55</sup> His own history of historiography leads him to the conclusion that it was not until the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries that liberal as well as conservative historians tried to make the past amenable to their corresponding ideologies by driving a wedge between history and rhetoric:

(New York: Columbia University Press, 1985); Roland Barthes, "The Discourse of History," Comparative Criticism 3 (1981): 7–20 (translated by Stephen Bann; French: 1967); also translated by Peter Wexler in Michael Lane, ed., Structuralism: A Reader (London: Jonathan Cape, 1970), 145–155; Lawrence Stone, "The Revival of Narrative," Past & Present 85 (1979): 3–24 = The Past and the Present (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1981), 77–96; Ankersmit, Narrative Logic; Paul Ricoeur, Time and Narrative, 3 vols. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984–1988; French: 1983–1985), esp. 1:91–295 ("History and Narrative"), 3:99–240 ("Poetics of Narrative: History, Fiction, Time"); Peter Burke, "History of Events and the Revival of Narrative," in New Perspectives on Historical Writing, ed. Peter Burke, 2nd ed. (University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2001), 283–300.

[F]or both the Left and the Right this same aesthetics of the beautiful presides over the process in which historical studies are constituted as an autonomous scholarly discipline. It takes little reflection to perceive that aestheticism is endemic to what is regarded as a proper attitude towards objects of historical study in a certain tradition, deriving from Leopold von Ranke and his epigones [...]. For this tradition, whatever ‘confusion’ is displayed by the historical record is only a surface phenomenon: a product of lacunae in the documentary sources, of mistakes in ordering the archives, or of previous inattention or scholarly errors.<sup>56</sup>

On the basis of this notion of history as chaos, White develops his main thesis that historical study can only articulate itself in the form of a narrative discourse which both finds its content and imagines or invents it.<sup>57</sup> He does not negate the existence of historical facts as given; but these facts can be made significant only by weaving them into a picture of the past which again presupposes a notion of totality.<sup>58</sup> The problem, though, is that the complete past context cannot simply be recovered like a treasure from the ocean depths. The historian does not imagine

---

<sup>53</sup> History and Theory 5.2 (1966): 111–134; reprinted in Tropics of Discourse, 27–50.

<sup>54</sup> Tropics of Discourse, 44.

<sup>55</sup> Cf. Content of the Form, 72: “[M]odern ideologies [...] impute a meaning to history that renders its manifest confusion comprehensible to either reason, understanding, or aesthetic sensibility. To the extent that they succeed in doing so, these ideologies deprive history of the kind of meaninglessness that alone can goad living human beings to make their lives different for themselves and their children, which is to say, to endow their lives with a meaning for which they alone are fully responsible.” Curiously, White uses the chaotic openness of the past as an impulse for taking responsibility for our present choices.

<sup>56</sup> Content of the Form, 70.

<sup>57</sup> Tropics of Discourse, 82; Metahistory, 2.

<sup>58</sup> Despite claims to the contrary, no historian connected to postmodernism, and certainly not Hayden White, argues that past or present are not endowed with a material existence. What has been called “textualism” is not an essence of the past but our basic condition for approaching and constructing the past (cf. Jenkins, What is History, 29–33).

facts, but has to imagine all the missing bits of those contexts which make facts meaningful for us. On the other hand, by telling a story, historians tend to believe that they are actually retelling the life stories of individuals or groups from the past. But there are good reasons to doubt that people in the past simply lived “stories” which can be reproduced in later times. The dilemma is that historians cannot avoid narrative form, but precisely in narrating history, they also fictionalize it.<sup>59</sup>

White tries to describe the narrative grammar, the so-called “meta-history,” which forms the basis of history.<sup>60</sup> He distinguishes between “the following levels of conceptualization in the historical work: (1) chronicle; (2) story; (3) mode of emplotment; (4) mode of argument; and (5) mode of ideological implication.”<sup>61</sup> Chronicle and story form the “primitive elements” of every historical account. Whereas the former arranges events and people without plot-interconnections, the latter is marked by inaugurations, processes and end points according to a “hierarchy of significance.”<sup>62</sup> Historians cannot remain in the state of a simple chronicler and have thus to “translate” the raw primitive material into a story by deciding what to include, by arranging and interconnecting events, thus assigning relevance or irrelevance to each element within an imagined plot structure.

- (1) A b c d e...n
- (2) a B c d e...n
- (3) a b C d e...n                      (and so on)

As events have no unambiguous inherent story, the operations which transform a chronicle into a story are partly instructed by the subjectivity of the historian.<sup>63</sup> There are no critical methods capable of controlling this transformation from chronicle to narrative.<sup>64</sup> The most

---

<sup>59</sup> Cf. for a similar view F. R. Ankersmit, “Reply to Professor Zagorin,” History and Theory 29 (1990): 275–296; Hans Kellner, “Narrativity in History: Post-Structuralism and Since,” History and Theory, Beiheft 26 (1987): 1–29.

<sup>60</sup> The following refers mainly to the introductory chapter “The Poetics of History” in Metahistory, 1–42.

<sup>61</sup> Metahistory, 5.

<sup>62</sup> In its simplest form a chronicle would record: “The Queen dies. The King dies.” Whereas a story would read: “The queen died and then the King died.”

<sup>63</sup> Cf. his article “The Historical Text as Literary Artifact,” in Tropics of Discourse, 81–100.

<sup>64</sup> The notion that history has no method, no controllable modes of explanation, is one of the main threads in Paul Veyne’s stimulating Writing History: Essay on Epistemology (Middletown, CN: Wesleyan University Press, 1984; French: 1971).

basic operation in the writing of history, emplotment, is an implicit form of explanation guided by culturally sanctioned types of narration.<sup>65</sup> Following literary critic Northrop Frye, White distinguishes four archetypal modes of emplotment:

romance	drama of self-identification, stressing the triumph of good over evil (e.g. victory of democracy over fascism)
satire	opposite of romance, human beings as captives in the world rather than masters, decay and death are the end of everything, suffering does not lead to redemption (e.g. the Holocaust)
comedy	at least for a time, human beings can triumph over their situations and celebrate this; although things can go wrong, there is a harmony between the natural and the social tragedy	human beings learn through resignation to work within the limitations of the world

Two other means of explanation are through argument and ideology: In order to grasp the historical field historians use four modes of argument: (1) the precise description of a reduced set of objects by classifying them according to their uniqueness, variety and color (“formism”), (2) the setting of broader contexts by analyzing trends and eras (“contextualism”), (3) the Hegelian-like synthesis of the whole field (“organicism”) and (4) the mechanistic reduction to universal causal laws (“mechanism”). Historians are furthermore led to argue on the basis of the ideologies they hold, which may be conservative (history moves naturally for the better), liberal (progression as the result of law, government and market), radical (revolution as means to bring about the better future) or anarchist (only destruction will lead to a new community).<sup>66</sup>

Since history does not have its own, unique technical vocabulary (like physics or mathematics) historians can only use the normal figurative language of ordinary educated speech according to the rhetorical tropes natural to every form of communication.<sup>67</sup> Again, White finds four basic types:

<sup>65</sup> The importance of emplotment is also emphasized by Berkhofer, Great Story, 106–137.

<sup>66</sup> White builds upon Karl Mannheim’s classic Ideology and Utopia: An Introduction to the Sociology of Knowledge (New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1968; German: 1929).

<sup>67</sup> Metahistory, 34: “[Tropes] are especially useful for understanding the operations by which the contents of experience which resist description in unambiguous prose representations can be prefiguratively grasped and prepared for conscious apprehension.”

Trope	Explanation	Argument	Relation	Example
metaphor	one phenomenon is compared or contrasted to another in the manner of analogy or simile	formist	representational	working classes as "saviours of humanity"
metonymy	reduction of the whole to the part (e.g., "sail" for "ship")	mechanist	reductionist	individual acts as general "resistance to colonialism"
synecdoche	extension of a part in order to symbolize the quality of the whole (e.g. "he is all heart")	organicist	integrative	class struggle is to be found in every human act
irony	literal meaning makes no sense, examples are paradox (oxymoron) or "manifestly absurd" (catachresis)	comedy / tragedy	negational	working classes as "saviours" (?) of humanity

All in all, the writing of history as the narrativization of a primitive chronicle is conditioned by a whole set of factors:

mode of emplotment	mode of argument	mode of ideology	poetic structure (tropes)
romance	formist	anarchist	metaphor
comedy	organicist	conservative	metonymy tragedy	mechanistic	radical	synecdoche
satire	contextualist	liberal	irony

White's positions lead to a number of conclusions which can be considered typical of postmodern historiography: (1) Since the past carries no meaning in itself, it is not possible to approach it from an ideologically neutral point of view which by-passes the task of interpretation. (2) Historiography always has a hidden agenda, an interest vis-à-vis the present as its practitioners perceive it. (3) Those who claim to be doing “proper” history—as opposed to “ideological” history—displace their ideologies into the narrative, where they nevertheless remain visible. (4) Consequently, “[o]ne must face the fact that when it comes to apprehending the historical record, there are no grounds to be found in the historical record itself for preferring one way of construing its meaning over another.”<sup>68</sup> (5) The best that historians can do is to tell different stories from different perspectives.<sup>69</sup>

3. The Postmodern in Historical Jesus Studies

In what follows, we aim to offer a representative rather than an exhaustive overview of recent historical Jesus research, focusing on its attitude towards postmodern epistemological considerations. It can well be read as an illustration of Schröter’s thesis that “in the more recent discussion the hermeneutical question about the appropriation of the past has [...] largely receded into the background.”<sup>70</sup>

<sup>68</sup> “The Politics of Historical Interpretation: Discipline and De-Sublimation,” Critical Inquiry 9 (1982): 113–137 = Content of the Form, 58–82, at 75.

<sup>69</sup> White’s textual relativism has been recently criticized in the light of the problems surrounding the historical representation of the Holocaust and the scandal of its denial (!); cf. Saul Friedlander, ed., Probing the Limits of Representation: Nazism and the “Final solution” (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1992). Cf. also Dominick LaCapra, ed., Representing the Holocaust: History, Theory, Trauma (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1994), the special number “Representing the Holocaust” of History and Theory 33.2 (1994) with the response by Berel Lang, “Is It Possible to Misrepresent the Holocaust?” History and Theory 34.1 (1995): 84–89 (= Jenkins, Postmodern History Reader, 426–433) and Passmore, “Poststructuralism and History,” 134–136.

<sup>70</sup> Jens Schröter, Jesus und die Anfänge der Christologie: Methodologische und exegetische Studien zu den Ursprüngen des christlichen Glaubens, BThS 47 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener, 2001), 13: “Die hermeneutische Frage nach der Aneignung der Vergangenheit ist in der neueren Diskussion dagegen weitgehend in den Hintergrund getreten.” Cf. further on Schröter, Jesus, 14–36; “Die Frage nach dem historischen Jesus und der Charakter historischer Erkenntnis,” in The Sayings Source Q and the Historical Jesus, ed. Andreas Lindemann, BETL 158 (Leuven: Peeters, 2001), 207–254; “Von der Historizität der Evangelien: Ein Beitrag zur gegenwärtigen Diskussion um den historischen Jesus,” in Der historische Jesus, ed. Schröter and Brucker, 163–212; “Überlegungen zum Verhältnis von Historiographie und Hermeneutik in der neutestamentlichen Wissenschaft,” in Philosophical Hermeneutics and Biblical Exegesis, ed. Petr Pokorný and Jan Roskovec, WUNT 153 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2002), 191–203; “Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft jenseits des Historismus: Neuere Entwicklun-

Postmodern epistemological and historiographical questions have not been ignored in biblical studies or theology, generally speaking.<sup>71</sup> Our focus will be on the way these questions have (or have not) been integrated into the discussion of the historical Jesus, which is, to a certain extent, a rather particular field in biblical studies, as here the question of “historical truth” has arguably been regarded as more central than elsewhere.<sup>72</sup> The following overview covers works ranging from those that more or less ignore the postmodern agenda to those where there is self-conscious application of postmodern hermeneutical insights to historical Jesus research.

1. No interaction with postmodern theories:

Many (recent) influential works on the historical Jesus, written well within the “postmodern era” remain, surprisingly, without the respective historiographical considerations. They tend rather to use “modern” and “enlightened” epistemology with more or less theoretical foundation. Certainly, without otherwise discrediting their achievements, this gen in der Geschichtstheorie und ihre Bedeutung für die Exegese urchristlicher Schriften,” ThLZ 128 (2003): 855–866; “Konstruktion von Geschichte und die Anfänge des Christentums: Reflexionen zur christlichen Geschichtsdeutung aus neutestamentlicher Perspektive,” in Konstruktion von Wirklichkeit: Beiträge aus geschichtstheoretischer, philosophischer und theologischer Perspektive, ed. Jens Schröter and Antje Edelbüttel, TBT 127 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2004), 201–219.

---

<sup>71</sup> Since they have provoked similar reactions to those sketched above for the field of historical criticism, no broad survey of them is required here. Cf. Kevin J. Vanhoozer, ed., The Cambridge Companion to Postmodern Theology (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003), and further contributions by authors such as A. K. M. Adam, George Aichele, David J. A. Clines, Stephen D. Moore (from the exegetical guild), John D. Caputo, Don Cupitt, Brian D. Ingraffia, Mark C. Taylor, David Tracy, Graham Ward, Edith Wyschogrod (from the field of systematic theology). The Bible and Culture Collective, The Postmodern Bible (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1995), outlines different postmodern hermeneutical models and the ways they have been (or could be) applied to biblical studies. A. K. M. Adam, ed., Postmodern Interpretations of the Bible: A Reader (St. Louis: Chalice Press, 2000), gives a representative overview. Reflections on postmodern historiography from exegetes (besides Schröter) are found in Burnett, “Historiography,” 106–112; Eckart Reinmuth, Neutestamentliche Historik: Probleme und Perspektiven, ThLZ Forum 8 (Leipzig: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 2003), 40–47.

<sup>72</sup> Cf. the statements of the influential Jesus scholars Lüdemann, Crossan and Funk, for whom the “enlightened” conception of truth in terms of historical truth has become part of a creed—precisely what they seek to avoid. All three authors bear the marks of this quest for the (historical) truth about Jesus in their biographies: they all moved from a confessional setting to a (non-confessional) academic context. Cf. Robert W. Funk, Honest to Jesus: Jesus for a New Millennium (San Francisco: Harper San Francisco, 1996), 1–14; for Lüdemann, cf. www.user.gwdg.de/~gluedem/ger/index.htm (May 2005), and for Crossan, cf. www.westarinstitute.org/Periodicals/4R\_Articles/Crossan\_bio/crossan\_bio.html (May 2005).

may be said about the contributions of Sanders,<sup>73</sup> Flusser,<sup>74</sup> Becker,<sup>75</sup> Crossan,<sup>76</sup> Lüdemann,<sup>77</sup> and Funk.<sup>78</sup> Similarly, some recent studies in

<sup>73</sup> Ed P. Sanders, The Historical Figure of Jesus (London: Penguin Press, 1993).

<sup>74</sup> David Flusser, Jesus (in collaboration with R. Steven Notley; Jerusalem: Magnes Press, 2nd ed., 1998).

<sup>75</sup> Jürgen Becker, Jesus von Nazaret (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1996), cf. for his methodology: 1–20.

<sup>76</sup> John Dominic Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1992), xxvii–xxxiv, in spite of his remark that “methodology in Jesus research at the end of this century is about where methodology in archaeological research was at the end of the last” (xxviii). His undertaking, however, is not exempt from his own “suspicion that historical Jesus research is a very safe place to do theology and call it history, to do autobiography and call it biography” (xxviii). Later on Crossan acknowledged his neglect of epistemological considerations, which had been pointed out by N. T. Wright, “Taking the Text with Her Pleasure: A Post-Post-Modernist Response to J. Dominic Crossan The Historical Jesus,” Theology 96 (1993): 303–310, and Susan Lochrie Graham and Stephen D. Moore, “The Quest for the New Historicist Jesus,” BibInt 5 (1997): 438–464. In his reaction (“Our Own Faces in Deep Wells: A Future for Historical Jesus Research,” in God, the Gift and the Postmodern, ed. John D. Caputo and Michael J. Scaloni [Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1999], 282–310) he notes that “when I wrote The Historical Jesus in 1991 I did not think it necessary to defend the validity of that enterprise. I considered historical Jesus research an established part of the scholarly landscape. I concentrated there on the how of methods and the what of the results” (283). However, in this later essay he proposes a theory of various types of gospels, which interact with one another, without taking into consideration postmodern historiographical thought. Crossan emphasizes the importance of history for what he terms “Catholic Christianity,” as opposed to “Gnostic Christianity.” Similarly Piet A. Geysler, “Historicity and Theology, and the Quest for the Historical Jesus,” HTS 55 (1999): 827–844, takes into account postmodern concerns, but finally does not move beyond the statement that Christian theology cannot do without either the historical Jesus or the kerygmatic Christ (844).

<sup>77</sup> Gerd Lüdemann, “Fakten und Fantasien in der neuen Jesus-Literatur und im Neuen Testament,” in Jesus von Nazareth und das Christentum: Braucht die pluralistische Gesellschaft ein neues Jesusbild?, ed. Sigurd Daecke and Peter R. Sahn (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener, 2000), 130–152, makes a clear distinction between “facts” and “fantasies” and postulates: “Aber hinter eine Einsicht kommen wir nicht mehr zurück: Wer ihm [= Jesus] näherkommen will, muß kritisch mit den Quellen umgehen, Vorsicht vor übereilten Schlüssen walten lassen und sich seiner Voraussetzungen mit dem Ziel größtmöglicher Objektivität bewußt werden” (131). His “objective” and “critical” approach brings as a result: “Von den biblischen Erzählungen über Jesus sind nach meiner Einschätzung nur ca. 15 Prozent echt. Alles andere ist Gemeindegemachtheit...” (149). After making his case that Christianity cannot be based on the historical Jesus he closes with a flaming plea for the blessings of rationality and enlightenment: “So bleibt nur der Blick nach vorn, wo allein Aufklärung dem überall pulsierenden Leben auf dieser Erde eine bleibende Statt bereiten kann. Denn die in der Vernunft gegründete Aufklärung samt ihrer Kritik an Offenbarungsansprüchen und Erkenntnisprivilegien jeglicher Art bleibt ein fester Bestandteil der modernen Welt. Allein Aufklärung ermöglicht einen konstruktiven Dialog zwischen den Angehörigen verschiedener Nationalitäten und Kulturen, und sie allein dürfte in der Lage sein, in dem kommenden Jahrtausend Frieden zwischen den Menschen unterschiedlichster Ideologien und Religionen anzubahnen” (152). This is clearly a profession of faith in modernism!

<sup>78</sup> Funk, Honest.

the methodology of historical Jesus research remain silent about post-modern challenges.<sup>79</sup>

2. Contributions which seem to move towards postmodern positions, but in the end turn back towards “classical” historiographical axioms:

In his brief discussion of the problem of constructing reasonably correct pictures of people from the past, Meier does not explicitly address issues of postmodern historiography.<sup>80</sup> However, he clearly distinguishes between the “real” (now lost) Jesus and the historical one,<sup>81</sup> which is of significance for the way he perceives his own undertaking, though without integrating it explicitly into the discourse we are interested in here.

Similarly, Theissen and Merz offer a brief hermeneutical reflection, using the term “historical imagination,” but still concluding, in the best of classical historiographical traditions, that scholarly discussions of the life of Jesus are “relativ willkürfreie, an Quellen korrigierbare und in ihren Voraussetzungen durchschaubare Gebilde.”<sup>82</sup> Through this statement, the importance of imagination is blotted out again.

---

<sup>79</sup> Cf. e.g. Christopher Tuckett, “Sources and Methods,” in The Cambridge Companion to Jesus, ed. Markus Bockmuehl (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001), 121–137; James Carleton Paget, “Quests for the Historical Jesus,” in Cambridge Companion to Jesus, ed. Bockmuehl, 138–155; Ben Witherington III, The Jesus Quest: The Third Search for the Jew of Nazareth (Downers Grove: InterVarsity, Press, 1995), esp. 233–248; Stanley E. Porter, The Criteria for Authenticity in Historical-Jesus Research: Previous Discussion and New Proposals, JSNTSup 191 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000); Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter, Die Kriterienfrage in der Jesusforschung: Vom Differenzkriterium zum Plausibilitätskriterium, NTOA 34 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997); Bruce Chilton and Craig A. Evans, eds., Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the Current Research, NTTS 29 (Leiden: Brill, 1994). Cf. in the latter volume esp. Marcus J. Borg, “Reflections on a Discipline: A North American Perspective” (9–31), and William R. Telford, “Major Trends and Interpretative Issues in the Study of Jesus,” (33–74, merely mentioning “philosophical questions” on pp. 61–62). In Bruce Chilton and Craig A. Evans, ed., Authenticating the Words of Jesus, NTTS 28.1 (Leiden: Brill, 1999) Evans, Chilton, Malina, Holmén, and Porter with O’Donnell offer methodological considerations. Cf. also the contributions to the sister volume: Authenticating the Activities of Jesus, NTTS 28.2 (Leiden: Brill, 1999).

<sup>80</sup> John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, I, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 21–31.

<sup>81</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew I, 21–26.

<sup>82</sup> Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, Der historische Jesus, 3rd ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2001), 31. This impression is confirmed by their co-authored introductory essay “Der umstrittene historische Jesus. Oder: Wie historisch ist der historische Jesus” in Gerd Theissen, Jesus als historische Gestalt: Beiträge zur Jesusforschung, ed. Annette Merz, FRLANT 202 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2002),

Allison includes, in good postmodern fashion, an “unscientific post-script” in the methodological section of his study on the historical Jesus, thereby blurring scholarly with “unscientific” writing. He dwells for a long time on the (problems of) historical-critical methodology and includes—in discussion with the Jesus Seminar—considerations about the important role of personal convictions and personality in research, but at the end he concludes that “our goal should [...] be to emulate the judge, whose hard business it is to look for the truth.”<sup>83</sup>

3. Scholars who do not subscribe explicitly to postmodern historiographical concerns, but come on the basis of very similar assumptions to conclusions which differ little from “postmodern” ones:<sup>84</sup>

Johnson, in his manifesto against the work of the Jesus Seminar, has drawn attention to the limits of historical research in a twofold way: first, with respect to the available sources, and, secondly, on an epistemological level, suggesting that there is much less to “know” than the Jesus Seminar claims. Without engaging with postmodern historiographical theories Johnson makes nevertheless a quite “postmodern” point.<sup>85</sup>

Dunn offers an extensive epistemological discussion, analyzing the postmodern condition before outlining his own historiographical stance:<sup>86</sup>

[T]he model of historical study as a dialogue between present and past, is the one which has always appealed to me, not least because it recognizes that the historian not only asks the questions, but, in genuine engagement with the subject matter, often finds him/herself put in question.<sup>87</sup>

Without explicitly using a postmodern epistemology, Dunn has taken on board quite a few typically “postmodern” concerns; his emphasis

---

3–32, esp. 7–12, where various criteria are discussed without touching upon the larger epistemological picture.

<sup>83</sup> Dale C. Allison, Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998), 77, after extensive methodological considerations (1–77).

<sup>84</sup> One reason is perhaps that these contributions also apply the questions asked by the “Enlightenment” to historical research once more.

<sup>85</sup> Luke Timothy Johnson, The Real Jesus: The Misguided Quest for the Historical Jesus and the Truth of the Traditional Jesus (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1996), 81–104.

<sup>86</sup> James D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered, Christianity in the Making 1 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003), 92–97. His position is strongly influenced by Lonergan’s “critical realism.”

<sup>87</sup> Dunn, Jesus, 111. See for the whole of his considerations 99–136.

on “Jesus remembered” is one of the most significant of these.<sup>88</sup> In spite of the size of his work, he presents it as a modest proposal, acknowledging its relativity.<sup>89</sup>

“There is [...] no such thing as ‘mere history’.”<sup>90</sup> Although this statement is taken from the work of an author who is not particularly willing to allow postmodern historiography to enter his own methodological considerations,<sup>91</sup> it is precisely Wright whose whole enterprise sails under the flag of one fundamental postmodern insight, amply illustrated not only in the preceding quotation, but especially in the following:

The underlying argument of this book is that the split [between history and theology] is not warranted: that rigorous history (i.e. open-ended investigation of actual events in first-century Palestine) and rigorous theology (i.e. open-ended investigation of what the word ‘god,’ and hence the adjective ‘divine,’ might actually refer to) belong together, and never more so than in discussion of Jesus. If this means that we end up needing a new metaphysic, so be it.<sup>92</sup>

This statement succinctly formulates one consequence of letting postmodern epistemological considerations enter the field of historical Jesus research: acknowledging that both christology and “historical research” are legitimate ways of imagining Jesus, i.e. of telling a story about a past (lost!) person.

Furthermore, Rau, in a critical discussion of the preoccupation of historical Jesus research with criteriology rather than historiography,

---

<sup>88</sup> For the historiographical importance of “memory” cf. e.g. Frank R. Ankersmit, “Die postmoderne ‘Privatisierung’ der Vergangenheit,” in Der Sinn des Historischen, ed. Nagl-Docekal, 201–234; Jan Assmann, Das kulturelle Gedächtnis: Schrift, Erinnerung und politische Identität in frühen Hochkulturen, 2nd ed. (München: Beck, 1997); Paul Ricoeur, Memory, History, Forgetting (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2004; French: 2000).

<sup>89</sup> Bengt Holmberg, “Questions of Method in James Dunn’s Jesus Remembered,” JSNT 26 (2004): 445–457, argues that Dunn’s concern to remain at the level of “memory” does not go far enough: the historian has indeed to reconstruct the “real Jesus.” Samuel Byrskog, “A New Perspective on the Jesus Tradition. Reflections on James D. G. Dunn’s Jesus Remembered,” JSNT 26 (2004): 459–471, questions Dunn’s concept of memory. Cf. Dunn’s reply: “On History, Memory and Eyewitnesses: In Response to Bengt Holmberg and Samuel Byrskog,” JSNT 26 (2004): 473–487, where he acknowledges that his emphasis on memory and recollection has much to do with history as a creative undertaking (cf. e.g. 475).

<sup>90</sup> Cf. N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, Christian Origins and the Question of God 2 (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996), 5–6.

<sup>91</sup> Cf. e.g. Wright, “Taking” and Victory, 3–124.

<sup>92</sup> Wright, Victory, 8.

takes up one important point, which has already been made by Schweitzer in his radical contextualisation and deconstruction of much of the nineteenth-century quest for the historical Jesus: the heuristic value of the interpreter's subjectivity and the necessity of imagination, when attempting to imagine a person from the past.<sup>93</sup> Rau does not so much present this as a postmodern insight, although this emphasis on the positive value of subjectivity and imagination—and thus contextuality—fits well into postmodern thinking. This position comes very close to that of Evans, who argues that scholars are only an interpretative community (“tribe”), “that has a right and a duty to put forward its views into the conversation, but one which has no right to disparage and consider illegitimate other communities of interpretation, particularly religious ones.”<sup>94</sup>

4. Contributions addressing postmodern epistemology directly in view of historical Jesus research.

Schröter<sup>95</sup> has offered a strong and well-argued plea for considering postmodern historiographical concerns. To begin with, the epistemological problem should (again) be regarded as a theological problem, more precisely: the “quest” should be redefined as a “vergegenwärtigende Erinnerung an Jesus im Sinne der Orientierung und Identitätsbildung in der Gegenwart.”<sup>96</sup> Furthermore, it belongs to the task of theology to outline the significance of Jesus through images of him (“Jesusdarstellungen”),<sup>97</sup> as do scholars such as Rösen, recognizing their fundamentally narrative character.<sup>98</sup> Still, this scholarly project can distinguish between possible and impossible (or no longer possible) images of Jesus, while at the same time safeguarding a plurality of

---

<sup>93</sup> Cf. Eckhard Rau, Jesus—Freund von Zöllnern und Sündern. Eine methodenkritische Untersuchung (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 2000), 74–75; cf. also Leif E. Vaage, “Recent Concerns: The Scholar as Engagé,” in Whose Historical Jesus?, ed. William E. Arnal and Michael Desjardins, Studies in Christianity and Judaism 7 (Waterloo: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1997), 181–187.

<sup>94</sup> Cf. C. Stephen Evans, The Historical Christ & The Jesus of Faith: The Incarnational Narrative as History (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996), 346, arguing on the basis of Jon D. Levenson, The Hebrew Bible, the Old Testament, and Historical Criticism: Jews and Christians in Biblical Studies (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 1993).

<sup>95</sup> Schröter, “Frage.”

<sup>96</sup> Ibid., 252.

<sup>97</sup> Cf. ibid., 253.

<sup>98</sup> Cf. Jörn Rösen, “Anmerkungen zum Thema Christologie und Narration,” in Gegenwart des Absoluten. Philosophisch-theologische Diskurse zur Christologie, ed. Klaus-Michael Kodalle (Güterloh: Gerd Mohn, 1984), 90–96.

these images,<sup>99</sup> all in the context of an overarching process of existential orientation.<sup>100</sup>

A similar proposal has been put forward by Marsh in his new historicist critique of the Third Quest and its self-perception.<sup>101</sup> By contextualizing it he uncovers hidden agenda(s),<sup>102</sup> including its key christological one.<sup>103</sup> At the same time, having de-privileged this western historical approach, he champions the inclusion of other voices in the debate, i.e. voices with different agendas.<sup>104</sup>

In this context reference should also be made to two further contributions: Arnal stresses the fundamentally ideological character of historical Jesus research qua historical research.<sup>105</sup> Kelber notes that the privileging of “historical truth” over “narratives” implies the denial of plurality and is thus, in view of the history of earliest Christianity, all too reductionist.<sup>106</sup>

In the final considerations of his recent contribution Knight includes historical images of Jesus into the “existential” and interreligious debate about his significance,<sup>107</sup> agreeing thereby with Marsh’s conclusion concerning the inevitability of christology. A similar direction is taken by Watson<sup>108</sup> and by Borg in his effort to bring personal

---

<sup>99</sup> Cf. Schröter, “Frage,” 253. Unfortunately, it remains relatively unclear how precisely this should work.

<sup>100</sup> Ibid., 253–254.

<sup>101</sup> Clive Marsh, “Quests for the Historical Jesus in New Historicist Perspective,” BibInt 5 (1997): 403–437.

<sup>102</sup> Partially based on the insights of Dieter Georgi’s fundamental contribution “Leben-Jesu-Theologie/Leben-Jesu-Forschung,” TRE 20 (1990): 566–575 and idem, “The Interest in Life of Jesus Theology as a Paradigm for the Social History of Biblical Criticism,” HTR 85 (1992): 51–83. A similar undertaking is Joel Willitts, “Presuppositions and Procedures in the Study of the ‘Historical Jesus’: Or, Why I Decided Not to be a ‘Historical Jesus’ Scholar,” JSHJ 3 (2005): 61–108, arguing (e.g. 108) that in view of the fact that both the gospels and the output of “Historical Jesus research” are historical narratives, there is no good reason to replace the gospels with these newer narratives.

<sup>103</sup> Cf. Marsh, “Quests,” 430–433.

<sup>104</sup> Cf. Marsh, “Quests,” 428.

<sup>105</sup> William E. Arnal, “Making and Re-Making the Jesus-Sign: Contemporary Markings on the Body of Christ,” in Whose Historical Jesus?, ed. Arnal and Desjardins, 308–319, at 317.

<sup>106</sup> Cf. Werner H. Kelber, “Der historische Jesus. Bedenken zur gegenwärtigen Diskussion aus der Perspektive mittelalterlicher, moderner und postmoderner Hermeneutik,” in Der historische Jesus, ed. Schröter and Brucker, 15–66, at 60.

<sup>107</sup> Cf. Jonathan Knight, Jesus: An Historical and Theological Investigation (London: Continuum, 2004), 244–245.

<sup>108</sup> Cf. Francis Watson, “The Quest for the Real Jesus,” in Cambridge Companion to Jesus, ed. Bockmuehl, 156–169.

relationship to Jesus<sup>109</sup> and scholarly research together by showing how christology, faith and the quest for the historical Jesus can merge.<sup>110</sup>

A different form of interacting with postmodern historiographical theory is offered by Bauckham, who pits his own understanding of the Jesus story as an open, non-suppressing meta-narrative against Lyotard's conception of meta-narratives and their postmodern end, on the basis of "Jesus' loving self-identification with all, which reached its furthest point in his death."<sup>111</sup> In other words, the Jesus story can withstand Lyotard's postmodern critique, as it is a different kind of meta-narrative.

5. Finally, two contributions should be mentioned, since they present themselves as postmodern approaches. By taking them as examples, other accounts of the historical Jesus may be regarded as postmodern too.

One quite unique contribution to the discussion is that of William Hamilton,<sup>112</sup> who while undertaking a search for a "post-historical Jesus," has, in fact, achieved a kind of postmodern construction (or: narrative, or: pastiche) of Jesus. By treating artistic and historical representations of Jesus as peers he moves beyond viewing artistic voices merely as props on the stage of the history of reception of a text.<sup>113</sup>

A quite different example of an attempt to integrate most (referentiality remains significant) implications of postmodern historiographical theory is the work of Schüssler Fiorenza, especially Jesus and the

<sup>109</sup> Not to be understood in pietistic terms only: it is all about relating personally to the object of one's interest, which has, in the case of Jesus (but certainly in many other cases too), to do with one's own passion and worldview.

<sup>110</sup> Marcus J. Borg, Meeting Jesus Again for the First Time: The Historical Jesus & the Heart of Contemporary Faith (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1994), esp. 119–137, under the heading "Images of Jesus and Images of the Christian Life."

<sup>111</sup> Richard Bauckham, "The Future of Jesus Christ," in Cambridge Companion to Jesus, ed. Bockmuehl, 265–280, at 279.

<sup>112</sup> William Hamilton, A Quest for the Post-Historical Jesus (New York: Continuum, 1990).

<sup>113</sup> More recently, Hamilton's work has gained companions in the form of other books especially on Jesus and film, which share his concern for imagination and narratives. Cf. e.g. Richard Walsh, Reading the Gospels in the Dark: Portrayals of Jesus in Film (Harrisburg: Trinity Press International, 2003); Georg Langenhorst, Jesus ging nach Hollywood: Die Wiederentdeckung Jesu in Literatur und Film der Gegenwart (Düsseldorf: Patmos, 1998). The discussion around Mel Gibson's Passion, as documented in e.g. Kathleen E. Corley and Robert L. Webb, eds. Jesus and Mel Gibson's, "The Passion of the Christ": The Film, the Gospels and the Claims of History (London: Continuum, 2004), is certainly a christological one.

Politics of Interpretation.<sup>114</sup> She reads the quest for the historical Jesus consciously in terms of the exercise of and struggle for influence and power, in this context raising the voice of a liberationist, feminist biblical scholar. One of the results of this enterprise, which aims at unmasking the innocence of historical research, is the dissolution of the fundamental difference between historical Jesus scholarship and christology. Of course, many ideology-critical Jesus books, such as those by Segundo,<sup>115</sup> Sobrino,<sup>116</sup> and other liberation theologians could be added here, but Schüssler Fiorenza's contribution is probably the most recent and most striking.

4. Imagining a Postmodern Historical Jesus

In view of the considerations offered above, we venture to formulate some "postmodern" perspectives for further explorations in the study of the historical Jesus.

4.1. Jesus as Object of History—Absent, Fragmented, Multilayered

Postmodern historiography clearly destabilizes the notion that Jesus as the object of history can be approached by a simple combination of facts, sources and historical reconstruction. The implicit belief in the historian's ability to "rewind" the linear process of history by reading back from the sources to the "real" Jesus (aided, of course, by a set of unambiguous criteria of authenticity) is highly suspect as the possible fruit of naïveté and/or wishful thinking. Even within a classical historiographical paradigm the approach to Jesus faces insurmountable problems. The whole history that has led from the "original" events through a labyrinthine process of memory, tradition, translation, narrativization, transmission, circulation, selection, and canonization

---

<sup>114</sup> Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza, Jesus and the Politics of Interpretation (New York: Continuum, 2000), esp. 1–29, cf. also her earlier Jesus: Miriam's Child, Sophia's Prophet. Critical Issues in Feminist Christology (London: SCM, 1994), 3–31, again consciously merging christology and research into the historical Jesus.

<sup>115</sup> Cf. Juan Luis Segundo, Jesus of Nazareth Yesterday and Today, 2: The Historical Jesus of the Synoptics, trans. J. Drury (Maryknoll: Orbis Books, 1985), consciously approaching the historical Jesus with a liberation theological agenda (cf. esp. 3–41).

<sup>116</sup> Cf. Jon Sobrino, Jesus the Liberator: A Historical-Theological View, trans. P. Burns and F. McDonagh (Maryknoll: Orbis Books, 1993), esp. 36–63, emphasizing (63), that he sees a "mutual relationship of doing theology by writing history and writing history by doing theology."

to our direct source material in form of eclectic critical editions has moved through many critical stages where the past breaks, transforms, changes into a new mode and reappears wrapped with layers of fictionality. Whereas a “modern” approach would perceive this state of affairs negatively as an impasse for the historical profession or positively as a challenge with which every serious historian should undertake all possible efforts to cope, postmodern historiography would not regard this as a deficient situation at all. The complexities inherent in the whole Jesus tradition are a heuristic playground for the postmodern combinatorics in its longing for disruptions, voices and traces.

4.2. Jesus With and Without “Background”

One of the few methodological innovations of the so-called “third quest” may be the special status that the socio-historical “context” in which Jesus lived has gained.<sup>117</sup> The emphasis which is put on historical embedding is a coin with two sides: It serves to secure the Jewishness of Jesus, marking out a common “neutral” territory for Christian and Jewish Jesus studies to co-operate. However, once a context is delimited, every aspect of Jesus’ teaching which cannot be accounted for within this “reconstructed” frame becomes an outstanding attribute of his uniqueness, a sign of Jesus’ implicit christology and a “historical” explanation for the place of Jesus as the point of origin of worldwide Christianity.<sup>118</sup> Postmodern historiography invites us to rethink the lines of demarcation between individual and context, agency and structure. Arguments which rest on a neat construction of “foreground and background,” “individual genius and social structure,” “the extraordinary and the ordinary” presuppose a linear development within a coherent whole on the basis of rational laws, which alone would allow us to point out analogies and influences as well as breaks and peculiarities. If the past were chaotic and unpredictable,

---

<sup>117</sup> Most modern lives of Jesus include sections on “context.” There is, though, an inherent problem in every social-historic approach which centers on a single person: By assigning to Jesus the role of “object of investigation” and to “first-century Judaism” the role of “shedding light on the figure of Jesus,” historians are building from the outset a stage for a single performer.

<sup>118</sup> The possibility of tracing a line between the remarkable and the “normal” on the basis of historical analogies looks like a historicist replica of the christological understanding of Jesus as God and man.

there could be no analogies on which to decide what is especially remarkable about a person.<sup>119</sup> A further problem lies in the sheer possibility of arriving at a total picture of the “historical background” of Jesus. In view of the scarcity of “sources,” Hayden White’s position that the historical past is informed both by a selection of given evidence and by an act of imagination seems to hit the mark. Thus, the context which historians use as their stage for Jesus is not only influenced by imagined pictures of an abstract entity called “first-century Judaism” but, once it is dislocated from the realm of “historical laws,” it says virtually nothing about what Jesus could have been able to say and do.

4.3. Historical Jesus as Jesus-Story

Having gone that far, the study of the historical Jesus can no longer control the boundaries between history and literature, science and art. If we follow Hayden White’s assertion that history always blends the given and the invented, fact and fiction, then the difference between the gospels and the products of modern historical Jesus research has to be reconsidered: We may perceive a quantitative difference (with respect to the amount of data being considered) or a formal difference (with respect to the rhetorical modes of presentation). But it would be difficult to point out a qualitative difference concerning the notion of being “more” or “less” near to the “historical Jesus” as he “really” was. Once the borders are open a whole set of corollaries follow:

- a. Jesus historians could lose the basis for an important ideology-critical strategy which has been in use since the days of the father of modern Jesus research, Hermann Samuel Reimarus (1694–1768), viz. to employ the “historical Jesus” as the critical cornerstone against all totalitarian claims of politics, church and theology, and finally, also as the external Archimedean point over against the theological constructs of the canonical gospels.

---

<sup>119</sup> Although we should be fair enough to recognize that it is very difficult for historians to dispense with the idea of an ingenious individual—and even more so for theologians in the case of the figure of Jesus.

- b. The presentation of a history of Jesus could open up to a plurality of genres, especially to those which include narrative forms.<sup>120</sup> In what may be called a search for the “post-historical Jesus”<sup>121</sup> we may take into consideration other sources of historical imagination as well, at least as equally legitimate ways of imagining Jesus. This would include film, literature, other visual arts, sermons, etc. Whether all proposals should be regarded as equally valid, is a question which cannot be answered on the basis of “historical reasoning,” but belongs rather to the field of ethical considerations.<sup>122</sup>
- c. As a further consequence and in line with the considerations of scholars such as Wright, Schröter and Marsh, the opposition between “theological” christological proposals and reconstructions of the “historical Jesus” should be given up as artificial, i.e. as a by-product of the privileging of the “historical” narrative over all others.<sup>123</sup> The quest for the historical Jesus is first and foremost a christological undertaking.<sup>124</sup>
- d. One final consequence may be to drop the term “historical Jesus” altogether and move toward the radical questioning of the “origin-myth” of Christianity. It should be stressed, however, that we should

---

<sup>120</sup> Gerd Theissen’s The Shadow of the Galilean: The Quest of the Historical Jesus in Narrative Form (Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress, 1987) has, significantly, been labelled “a cross between a novel and a work of scholarship” (Stephen Neill and Tom Wright, The Interpretation of the New Testament 1861–1986, 2nd ed. [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988], 396). Theissen himself brings up the problems of a scholar writing literature in his fictive correspondence with a skeptical colleague (e.g. 1–2). What looks like a soliloquy is a form of revoking the creative character of his book. From a postmodern perspective this would be a perfectly fitting form of doing history—without any need for implicit apologies!

<sup>121</sup> With Hamilton, Quest.

<sup>122</sup> Cf. in this respect Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza, Rhetoric and Ethic: The Politics of Biblical Studies (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1999), esp. 17–81, presenting an emancipatory, liberationist ethic of interpretation; Daniel Patte, Ethics of Biblical Interpretation: A Reevaluation (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 1995). More generally Richard A. Cohen, Ethics, Exegesis and Philosophy: Interpretation after Levinas (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001).

<sup>123</sup> In view of the emancipation of biblical studies from systems of theological and political closure in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries this option for the “historical” was a necessary strategy.

<sup>124</sup> Cf. Ulrich H. J. Körtner, “Historischer Jesus—geschichtlicher Christus: Zum Ansatz einer rezeptionsästhetischen Christologie,” in Lesen und Leben: Drei Essays zur Grundlegung einer Lesetheologie, ed., Klaas Huizing, Ulrich H.J. Körtner and Paul Müller (Bielefeld: Luther-Verlag, 1997), 99–135: “Der geschichtliche Jesus der Evangelien [...] ist der erzählte Jesus” (104). Reinmuth, Neutestamentliche Historik, 59–63 speaks consistently of “Jesus-Christus-Geschichte.”

not necessarily question the procedure of relating to the (lost) past by means of historical research. Within a society, or community of interpretation, which still considers itself a “child of the Enlightenment” such that it chooses to use the norm of historicity to decide over the value of a certain account of the historical Jesus, the concerns will probably not change the narrative and (in the broadest sense of the word) “intertextual” praxis of historical research. What is being questioned, though, is its self-perception, to the extent that it claims universal validity.

4.4. Rethinking the Rhetorical and Political Discourse of Jesus Studies

If we apply Foucaultian sensibilities about the operations of power to the current Life-of-Jesus-research, we may start anew from “the recognition of the inescapable operations of power in the creation of historical discourse, in short by an understanding of the politics of academic history.”<sup>125</sup> The fascination with “history” and with the figure of Jesus is so prominent in the Western mind that whoever can control the production of meaning within this field of study holds a position of power.<sup>126</sup> Ignoring the institutional, ideological, cultural and political implications of current historical Jesus studies is a luxury which after Marxist, feminist, liberationist (cf. Schüssler Fiorenza), and a fortiori postmodern challenges historians can no longer afford.

4.5. Imagination as Mediation—Imagination’s Contextuality

In a way, postmodern historiographical theory invites us to take seriously Albert Schweitzer’s seminal work once more. This not so much in terms of his own portrayal of Jesus as an apocalyptic preacher but rather in his strong argument against most nineteenth-century images of and narratives about the historical Jesus, dismantling them as the artefacts of a highly “bourgeois” (bürgerlich) society, whose view of history and of the historical Jesus functioned mainly to cement its own identity.<sup>127</sup> Schweitzer’s argument in this respect could profitably be (re)conceptualized in terms of—now more generally accepted—hermeneutical insights. In fact, his analysis of the nineteenth century's quest for the historical Jesus recognizes its fruits largely as a broadly self-legitimizing narrative, i.e. the legitimation of a society's discourse at large, thus radically contextualizing it and refusing to acknowledge its authority, but rather replacing it with his own image of (the historical) Jesus. The insights of Schweitzer and others imply that any enquiry into the shape and significance of the historical figure Jesus of Nazareth should be presented with due humility, restriction, and an awareness of the fact that it is inscribed in the personal and general vocabulary of the scholar and of his or her context. Every construction reveals as much as it hides about Jesus, thus making it possible to relate one's image to the discourse one is part of, with all the unavoidable limitations this entails. This would not mean discouraging research into the historical figure Jesus of Nazareth, but rather acknowledging fundamentally its contextuality and learning to live with it, indeed even appreciating it, as these insights open new horizons of (scholarly) interaction.

<sup>125</sup> Joyce, “Return of History,” 210.

<sup>126</sup> By emphasizing right from the outset the paramount importance and great complexity of their object of study, many Jesus-historians establish themselves as one of the few able to control this field of knowledge. It would be interesting to analyze some of the classics of historical Jesus research from a Foucaultian or Whitean angle.

<sup>127</sup> Cf. for an explicit attempt in this direction Georgi, “Leben-Jesu-Theologie.”

4.6. The Interpreter's Freedom and Responsibility: Ethical Considerations

A question which is raised in the wider field of historiography, and will be of concern in the field of historical Jesus studies as well, is that of the ethics of interpretation. The privileged historical point of reference to evaluate proposals is lost, and nothing has yet replaced it. This question cannot be definitively answered here, though it forces oneself upon the researcher, who can no longer hide behind a generally acknowledged, objective method and methodology, but will have to take responsibility for his or her account of the historical Jesus. The person of the interpreter comes to the fore, and thereby also his or her responsibility.

5. Afterword

At this point we can pause. The strategy of assuming a positive hypothesis concerning postmodern historiography has proven hermeneutically rewarding, since it allows us to realize more clearly what sort of questions are raised, what avenues are opened and what common operations are questioned— in short: what can be gained and what can be lost. Any decision concerning the undertaking of a “postmodern historical Jesus” can thus be taken on the basis of a proper examination of the issues at stake. For some this will reinforce their conviction that ignoring postmodern historiography entails no disadvantage for their own research. For others this may open up a legitimate possibility for struggling, decentering, displacing, dismantling and delegitimizing current metanarratives.<sup>128</sup> For others again, operating in the tradition of Foucault and White, this may lead to respect for the contingency, fragility and sublimity of history and to an “ethos” of looking at “objects” with patience, self-criticism and a deep awareness for the intricacies of the discourses of which we form a part.<sup>129</sup>

---

<sup>128</sup> All these concepts appear on just two pages in Victor Taylor’s “General commentary” to Postmodernism, ed. Taylor and Winqvist, 1: xi–xii.

<sup>129</sup> The present article was finished in June 2005.

WHY STUDY THE HISTORICAL JESUS?

COLIN BROWN

This article is a companion piece to my article on “The Quest of the Unhistorical Jesus and the Quest of the Historical Jesus.” In both quests the results were mixed. The driving factor of the quest of the unhistorical Jesus is summed up by the Reformer, Philip Melanchthon: “[T]o know Christ means to know his benefits... For unless you know why Christ put on flesh and was nailed to the cross, what good will it do you to know merely the history about him?”<sup>1</sup> The downside is that orthodoxy moved increasingly on a trajectory away from the historical Jesus in pursuit of “christology from above.” All too often the quest of the historical Jesus led to a makeover of Jesus with a modern image. Harnack’s was seen as “the reflection of a Liberal Protestant face seen at the bottom of a deep well.” Schweitzer’s Jesus turned out to be Nietzsche’s “superman” in Galilean garb, “the one immeasurably great Man who was strong enough to think of Himself as the spiritual ruler of mankind.” Dominic Crossan’s Jesus is a subversive Cynic who combated colonial oppression with magic and meal. With such confusion can we hope to get at the truth? My answer is an argument in four stages which explores reasons for studying the historical Jesus and what they entail.

1. Reasons for Studying the Historical Jesus

1. Incredible as it may seem for a man aged barely thirty who died the death of a criminal, Jesus of Nazareth is the most compelling figure in history. Although he may not have intended to found a new religion, he not only gave rise to Christianity, but also has a place in Judaism and in Islam. With the world becoming increasingly a global village in which Moslems, Jews, and Christians are next-door-neighbors, it is more than ever important to investigate the identity of the historical Jesus.

---

<sup>1</sup> Philip Melanchthon, Loci Communes (1521), Melanchthon and Bucer, LCC 19, ed. Wilhelm Pauck (London: SCM, 1969), 21–22.

2. John P. Meier, author of the magisterial A Marginal Jew, draws sharp distinctions between the “real Jesus,” the “theological Jesus,” and the “historical Jesus.” The “real Jesus” denotes the totality of what Jesus ever was and did. Because of distance in time and limited materials, it is impossible to recover the “real Jesus.” The “theological Jesus” is the Christ of Christian theology. The “historical Jesus” is the construct of critical history.<sup>2</sup> Meier goes on to say that, “the Jesus of history is not and cannot be the object of Christian faith . . . More than a millennium and a half of Christians believed firmly in Jesus Christ without having any clear idea of or access to the historical Jesus as understood today, yet no one will deny the validity and strength of their faith. The same can be said of many pious Christians in developed as well as undeveloping countries today.”<sup>3</sup> Moreover, “the constantly changing, often contradictory portraits of the historical Jesus served up by scholars, however useful in academia, cannot be the object of Christian faith for the universal Church.”<sup>4</sup>

I agree with Meier over the “real Jesus,” but question his determination to keep apart the “theological Jesus” and the “historical Jesus.” As a Roman Catholic he may defer to the Church’s Magisterium. But as a Protestant, an Episcopal priest, and a professor of systematic theology since 1978, I shudder at the thought of leaving theology to the theologians. Nor can I treat Jesus studies as a pastime for academics. Meier points to the changing and contradictory portraits of the historical Jesus. But one can equally point to the constantly changing and often contradictory portraits presented by orthodoxy. One needs only think of the feuding schools of Antioch and Alexandria, the patchwork compromise formula of Chalcedon, the Apostles’ Creed which reduces the life of Jesus to a mere comma between “born of the Virgin Mary” and “suffered under Pontius Pilate,” and John Henry Newman’s bizarre insistence that Jesus was not “in the English sense of the word, a man.”

---

<sup>2</sup> John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, I: The Roots of the Problem of the Person (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 21–26.

<sup>3</sup> A Marginal Jew I, 197.

<sup>4</sup> A Marginal Jew I, 198.

The object of faith of the millions who lived in the pre-critical age and of many today is certainly not the Christ of the formula of Chalcedon, but the Christ who comes to them through the scriptures. The passage of time has caused us to forget the feuds that shaped orthodoxy and its shortcomings. The Spirit was given a decisive role in the prenatal life of Jesus but not afterwards. Orthodoxy systematically eliminated the Jewishness of Jesus from the time when he was given a Latin name to more recent times when the Jewish religion was made a foil for Christianity. In so doing Christians have misrepresented Judaism, and they have misrepresented Jesus. We do not have to choose between the Jesus of faith and the Jesus of history. We cannot have one without the other. We need the study of the historical Jesus to correct these omissions and misrepresentations, and to inform faith.

3. I sometimes think that encountering the world of the gospels is like my first encounter with baseball. In 1973 I was a visiting professor from England at a seminary outside Chicago. High on my list of things-to-do was to live the American experience and see a major league baseball game. It was an unforgettable experience for one who had been brought up on cricket (but was never any good at it). I thought that I could understand some of the plays, but in fact I didn't. Much that was going on before my eyes lacked meaning.

So much of the religious and social world of the gospels lies in structures that are hidden from us. Like Jewish concepts of purity and holiness, the structures and conventions of the ancient world are not immediately visible. They are like rules of a game that are followed, but not seen. Those who lived in the world of Jesus followed them, but we today have to learn them by study. Among the conventions are honor and shame, patronage and clientage, meals, concepts of time, and the ancient economy. These issues played no part in the first two quests—or for that matter in traditional Christian theology—but are vital if we are to penetrate the world of Jesus.

4. We need to study the historical Jesus as a corrective to habits of thought. A common way of resolving moral dilemmas is to ask, "What would Jesus do?" Too often the answer is based on imaginative projection and feelings rather than on a study of the teaching and praxis of the historical Jesus.

The study of the historical Jesus is needed in both Christian devotion and Christian preaching. As a priest in the Anglican Communion and part-time associate rector of my parish church for over twenty years, I find that congregations are enriched by learning about the historical Jesus and his world.

The study of the historical Jesus is needed by systematic theology. Too often systematic theology is reduced to the inculcation of the systems of bygone centuries, presented as solutions to today's problems. Perhaps the biggest curse of systematic theology is what in German is called Sachexegese and in English is euphemistically translated as "theological exegesis."<sup>5</sup> "Theological exegesis" claims that it is the "matter [Sache]" of scripture that is important—not its scriptural form. Invariably the "matter" turns out to be the theologian's way of looking at things, which he uses to justify discarding the "scriptural form" or treating it in a selective way. We need to study the historical Jesus in order to discover the real "matter" of scripture.

5. We need to study the historical Jesus in order to help sort fact from fiction. The original quest spawned a vogue in fictitious lives of Jesus. Their names mean nothing today, but in the early years of the first quest Karl Friedrich Bahrtdt and Karl Heinrich Venturini made a stir with their revelations of Jesus' involvement with secret societies and Essene plots to manipulate society.<sup>6</sup> History is currently repeating itself, except that now movies give fantasy a new level of vividness and plausibility. Since its publication in 2003 Dan Brown's The Da Vinci Code<sup>7</sup> remained long at the top of the bestseller lists. Soon Hollywood turned it into a blockbuster movie. The novel reads like a James Bond story, with the action shifted from Cold War struggles for world control to conspiracies within the Roman Catholic Church. At stake is the truth about Jesus, known by a secret society and encoded in the work of Leonardo Da Vinci. The only thing that seems to be lacking—until I read to the end—is the evil genius of a superrich mastermind. The book poses questions like: Was Jesus really married to Mary Magdalene? Did they have a family? Did the church really suppress important gospels that contradict the canonical gospels? The Da Vinci Code implies an affirmative answer to these questions. To see them in perspective

---

<sup>5</sup> Rudolf Bultmann, "The Problem of Theological Exegesis" in The Beginnings of Dialectic Theology, ed. James M. Robinson, trans. Keith R. Crim and Loius De Grazia (Richmond, VA: John Knox Press, 1968), 236–256; Jürgen Moltmann, Experiences in Theology: Ways and Forms of Christian Theology, trans. Margaret Kohl (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2000), xxi–xxii.

<sup>6</sup> Colin Brown, Jesus in European Protestant Thought, 1778–1860 (Durham, NC: Labyrinth Press, 1985; reprint Pasadena, CA: Fuller Seminary Press), 163–164.

<sup>7</sup> Dan Brown, The Da Vinci Code (New York: Doubleday, 2003).

we need to turn to books like Bart D. Ehrman's Truth and Fiction in The Da Vinci Code<sup>8</sup> and Darrell L. Bock's Breaking The Da Vinci Code.<sup>9</sup>

On another level is Mel Gibson's blockbuster movie The Passion of the Christ with its seemingly endless harrowing scenes of Jesus being scourged. For added authenticity the characters speak Aramaic. The movie begins with Jesus in the Garden of Gethsemane with a female Satan hovering in the background. A shot of a snake being stamped on evokes echoes of Gen 3:15. Later on Pilate's wife takes linen cloths to Mary Magdalene to wipe the sacred blood from the floor. Throughout the film flashbacks give glimpses of Jesus' earlier life. But the abiding impression is of cruelty, evil, and suffering on a scale without precedent. It is so vivid that we feel that we are actually witnessing the passion of Jesus as related by the gospels. But are we?

Before I saw the movie my attention was drawn by my colleague Dr. Charles Scalise to the fact that one cannot fully comprehend Mel Gibson's view of the passion without understanding his dependence on the works of the recently beatified Sister Anna Katharina Emmerich (1774–1824).<sup>10</sup> In 1803 she entered an Augustinian order of nuns in Westphalia, where she aroused the dislike of the laxer members on account of her spiritual fervor and ecstatic visions. Around 1812 she received the stigmata of Christ. She fell seriously ill and her last years were spent in the home of the poet Clemens Brentano (1778–1842). Her "Meditations on the Passion," written down by Brentano after sickbed visits, were published as Das bittere Leiden unseres Herrn und Heilandes Jesus Christus (1833).<sup>11</sup> Scenes in Jerusalem are pictured in such vivid detail that they were later used as a guide by visiting pilgrims. Following Brentano's death guidebooks to Jerusalem were found in a wardrobe.

The most balanced and thorough appraisal that I have come across is Jesus and Mel Gibson's The Passion of the Christ: The Film, The Gospels and the Claims of History, edited by Kathleen E. Corley and

---

<sup>8</sup> B. D. Ehrman, Truth and Fiction in the Da Vinci Code: A Historian Reveals What We Really Know about Jesus, Mary Magdalene, and Constantine (Oxford New York: Oxford University Press, 2004).

<sup>9</sup> D. L. Bock, Breaking The Da Vinci Code: Answers to the Questions Everyone's Asking (Nashville: Nelson, 2004).

<sup>10</sup> Life and bibliography in ODCC, 3rd ed., 1997, 544.

<sup>11</sup> The Dolorous Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ (1862) is available in various editions.

Robert L. Webb.<sup>12</sup> Dominic Crossan observes that in the interests of accuracy “the opening credit should read: ‘A Mel Gibson Film’, followed by ‘Based on the Book by Anne Catherine Emmerich.’”<sup>13</sup> For detailed analysis I recommend Robert L. Webb’s chapter on “The Passion and the Influence of Emmerich’s The Dolorous Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ.”<sup>14</sup> All this shows two facts, first, that there is intense interest in the historical figure of Jesus both inside and outside the church, and second, that in order to take part in the ongoing conversation we need to be familiar with the culture and we need to study the historical Jesus.

6. We have to admit that the many portraits of Jesus contain contradictory features. But there is also much overlap. My experience is that even those with which I disagree contain much to stimulate. The quest of the historical Jesus is a work in progress—all the more reason to study the historical Jesus.

2. What is History?

John P. Meier whimsically envisages an “unpapal conclave,” convened not to elect a Pope, but to reach a consensus on the historical Jesus. “[A] Catholic, a Protestant, a Jew, and an agnostic—all honest historians cognizant of first-century religious movements—are locked up in the bowels of the Harvard Divinity School library, put on a Spartan diet, and not allowed to emerge until they have hammered out a consensus document on Jesus of Nazareth.” An essential requirement is that the document would be based on “purely historical sources and arguments.”<sup>15</sup>

---

<sup>12</sup> Kathleen E. Corley and Robert L. Webb, eds., Jesus and Mel Gibson’s The Passion of the Christ: The Film, The Gospels and the Claims of History (London New York: Continuum, 2004).

<sup>13</sup> Ibid., 17.

<sup>14</sup> Ibid., 160–72.

<sup>15</sup> A Marginal Jew II, 5–6; cf. I, 1; II, 509; III, 9. The criteria are (1) embarrassment, suggesting that the church would not have invented embarrassing material; (2) double discontinuity; (3) multiple attestation; (4) coherence with other accepted material; (5) rejection and execution—“A Jesus whose words and deeds did not threaten or alienate people, especially powerful people, is not the historical Jesus” (1:167–84; 2:5–6).

At the other end of the spectrum, when the original quest was at its height, Martin Kähler denounced the whole undertaking. “The real Christ, that is, the Christ who has exercised an influence in history, with whom millions have communed in childlike faith, and with whom the great witnesses of faith have been in communion—while striving, apprehending, triumphing, and proclaiming—this real Christ is the Christ who is preached. The Christ who is preached, however, is precisely the Christ of faith.”<sup>16</sup> In our day the Roman Catholic scholar, Luke Timothy Johnson, has devastatingly critiqued the Jesus Seminar and what he calls “the misguided quest of the historical Jesus.”<sup>17</sup> “History is a limited mode of human knowing... If the expression the real Jesus is used, it should not refer to a historically reconstructed Jesus. Such a Jesus is not ‘real’ in any sense, except as a product of scholarly imagination.”<sup>18</sup> “The ‘real’ Jesus is first of all the powerful, resurrected Lord whose transforming Spirit is active in the community... The ‘real Jesus’ is therefore also the one who through the Spirit replicates in the lives of believers faithful obedience to God and loving service to others.”<sup>19</sup>

I am in sympathy with both sides, but cannot go along with either. I suspect that Meier’s “unpapal conclave” might yield only the most minimal statement, like the passing reference to Jesus made by Tacitus in his account of Nero’s treatment of Christians following the great fire of Rome in 64 CE. “Christus, the founder of the name [Christians], had undergone the death penalty in the reign of Tiberius, by sentence of the procurator Pontius Pilatus.”<sup>20</sup> Tacitus’s next remark is unlikely to command the assent of Meier’s Catholic and Protestant scholars, even if his Jew and agnostic were inclined to agree with it. “[A]nd the pernicious superstition [exitiabilis superstitio] was checked for a moment, only to break out once more, not merely in

---

<sup>16</sup> The So-Called Historical Jesus and the Historic Biblical Christ (1896), trans. and ed. Carl E. Braaten with foreword by Paul Tillich (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1964), 66 (Kähler’s emphasis).

<sup>17</sup> The Real Jesus: The Misguided Quest of the Historical Jesus and the Truth of the Traditional Gospels (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1996); cf. Johnson, Living Jesus: Learning the Heart of the Gospel (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1998).

<sup>18</sup> The Real Jesus, 167.

<sup>19</sup> Ibid., 166.

<sup>20</sup> Annals 15.44, trans. John Jackson, cited from Tacitus 4 (1937), 283 (LCL).

Judea the home of the disease, but in the capital itself where all things horrible or shameful in the world collect and find a vogue.” What has happened is that Tacitus has moved from “fact” to interpretation. To be more precise, one would have to say that he has moved from what is generally accepted as a historical fact (that Jesus underwent the death penalty in the reign of Tiberius by sentence of Pontius Pilate—which coheres with the gospel evidence) to an interpretation (that Jesus was the originator of a pernicious superstition—magic) which he proffers as self-evident justification for Pilate’s action.

Facts are not like fish swimming around in the sea—there to be caught if one has the right net. Philosopher Alasdair McIntyre observes that the modern notion of facts was a seventeenth-century invention like telescopes and wigs for gentlemen. It is misleading “to conceive of a realm of facts independent of judgment or of any other form of linguistic expression, so that judgments or statements or sentences could be paired off with facts, truth or falsity being the alleged relationship between such paired items.”<sup>21</sup> McIntyre prefers the Thomistic notion of truth as the adequacy of the mind to the thing.<sup>22</sup>

I find myself in agreement with the critical realism of the Thomist philosopher Bernard Lonergan who held that knowledge is more than taking a look and seeing what is there. It involves experiencing, understanding, judging and believing.<sup>23</sup> Lonergan’s thinking on method has also influenced Ben F. Meyer,<sup>24</sup> N. T. Wright, and James D. G. Dunn.

---

<sup>21</sup> Whose Justice? Which Rationality? (Notre Dame, IN.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1988), 357–358.

<sup>22</sup> “Truth is the equalizing of the thing and the mind [veritas est adaequatio rei et intellectus]; “Accordingly truth is defined as conformity between intellect and thing [conformatatem intellectus et rei veritas]” (Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologiae 1.16.1 and 1.16.2, trans. Thomas Gornall [New York: McGraw-Hill, 1964], 78, 81).

<sup>23</sup> “Knowing... is not just seeing; it is experiencing, understanding, judging and believing. The criteria of objectivity are not just the criteria of ocular vision; they are the compounded criteria of experiencing, of understanding, of judging, and of believing. The reality known is not just looked at; it is given in experience, organized and extrapolated by understanding, posited by judgment and belief” (Bernard J. F. Lonergan, S.J., Method in Theology [London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1972], 238). Lonergan developed his epistemology in Insight: A Study of Human Understanding (New York: Philosophical Library, 1958; 3rd ed., 1970). It is summed up in “Cognitive Structure,” in Collected Works of Bernard Lonergan, 4. Collection (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1993), 205–221.

<sup>24</sup> The Aims of Jesus (London: SCM, 1979); Critical Realism and the New Testament, Princeton Theological Monograph Series 17 (Allison Park: Pickwick Publications, 1989); Christus Faber: The Master-BUILDER and the House of God, Princeton Theologi-

Wright sees critical realism as “the process of ‘knowing’ that acknowledges the reality of the thing known, as something other than the knower (hence ‘realism’), while also fully acknowledging that the only access we have to this reality lies along the spiralling path of appropriate dialogue or conversation between the knower and the thing known (hence ‘critical’).”<sup>25</sup> Dunn adds that the notion of a dialogue between the historian and history has always appealed to him, “not least because I recognize that the historian not only asks questions, but, in genuine engagement with the subject matter, often finds him/herself put in question.”<sup>26</sup> I would want to add that this process is not a solitary dialogue between the historian and the texts but a collective, ongoing conversation between many partners, past and present (as the writings of Wright and Dunn abundantly show). Lonergan’s critical realism does not offer a set of techniques for getting at the “facts.” It is more an anatomy of knowledge, which involves experiencing, understanding, judging, and believing.

Martin Kähler has been hailed as the theologian who rescued Jesus from the hands of the critical historian. But it is a Pyrrhic victory, for it is not as if anyone has direct access to Jesus. The access that we have is always mediated in some way or other—by hymns, prayers, mystical experiences, sermons, liturgy, sacrament. The Jesus to whom we have access is mediated by those who composed them, by their choice of words and images, and by how they are used now, and by what they evoke. Our access to Jesus may be mediated by our reading of the New Testament. In any case, it will be affected by what we bring to our reading—our knowledge of the language and world of the gospels, our personal situations, which cause us to relate to some passages more than others, our world-view, and our ability to interpret. Contemporary hermeneutics and reader-response criticism are making us increasingly aware that all reading involves interpretation, and that texts cal Monograph Series 29 (Allison Park: Pickwick Publications, 1992); Reality and Illusion in New Testament Scholarship: A Primer in Critical Realist Hermeneutics (Collegeville, MN: Michael Glazier, 1994). See further the work of my doctoral student, Donald L. Denton, Jr., Historiography and Hermeneutics in Jesus Studies: An Examination of the Work of John Dominic Crossan and Ben F. Meyer, JSNTSup 262 (London: T&T Clark International, 2004), <sup>25</sup> The New Testament and the People of God: Christian Origins and the Question of God 1 (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1992), 35.

---

<sup>26</sup> Jesus Remembered: Christianity in the Making 1 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003), 111.

speak to us only as interpreted texts. In short, the choice is not between what the historians say and a direct knowledge of Jesus that we can get for ourselves. Rather, it is a question of which interpretation we follow. If we look again at Kähler's remark, it can be read to mean that it is not the historical Jesus as a person who has made an impact on history, but the Christ that is proclaimed in preaching. In that case, Christ has been taken out of the hands of the historian only to be placed in the hands of the preacher.

There is something troubling about "liberating" Jesus from the historian only to put him into the hands of the preacher. I am reminded of recent American presidential elections, which pushed the art of image making to new heights, and the man who pushed it highest ended up the winner. The dubious logic of Kähler's statement is made apparent, if we make a name substitution. Take, for example, the 1992 election. "The real George W. Bush, that is the George W. Bush who has exercised an influence in history, with whom millions have communed in childlike faith... this real George W. Bush is the George W. Bush who is preached."<sup>27</sup> The same holds good if, instead of George W. Bush, we write in Bill Clinton, or the names of other candidates. Nor is image making confined to America. Sooner or later the public ask probing questions—historical questions about whether the image that they have been led to believe really fits. The same is true in religion—not least in the case of Jesus and the charges leveled against him. We cannot avoid historical questions. But if they are faced squarely, the outcome can only be beneficial.

Perhaps the most-quoted remark ever made by a historian is Leopold von Ranke's declaration that his aim was to show wie es eigentlich gewesen—"how it actually was."<sup>28</sup> Today the remark is seen as naïve and pretentious. In context it was a disclaimer of the idea that the historian should draw lessons from the past. Even so, the fact remains that history is not exactly a reconstruction of the past.<sup>29</sup> The past no

---

<sup>27</sup> Cf. Colin Brown, "Christology and the Quest of the Historical Jesus," in Doing Theology for the People of God: Studies in Honor of J. I. Packer, ed. Donald Lewis and Alister McGrath (Downers Grove: InterVarsity Press, 1996), 67–83 (72–74).

<sup>28</sup> Geschichte der romanischen und germanischen Völker, 1494–1535 (Berlin: Reimer, 1824), preface.

<sup>29</sup> Colin Brown, History and Faith: A Personal Exploration (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1987), 51–60; cf. E. H. Carr, What is History? (London: Macmillan, 1961); Alan Richardson, History—Sacred and Profane, Bampton Lectures 1962 (London: SCM, 1964); Van A. Harvey, The Historian and the Believer: The Morality of Historical longer exists. The dead cannot be brought back for an action replay. We may get fragments from the past (buildings, ruins, artifacts, records, texts), but we cannot go back into the past. The nearest that we might get is TV “virtual history”—virtual being the operative word. Actors dressed up as look-alikes deliver lines in a film crafted to persuade. Inevitably there is selection and interpretation. The great British authority on eighteenth-century politics, Sir Lewis Namier, compared the role of a historian with that of a painter. “To distinguish a tree you look at its shape, its bark and leaf; counting and measuring the branches would get you nowhere. Similarly what matters in history is the great outline and the significant detail; what must be avoided is the deadly mass of irrelevant narrative.”<sup>30</sup>

The gospel narratives present their versions of the great outline and the significant detail of the historical Jesus. They are not verbal videos. Consider the statement: “They went to Capernaum; and when the Sabbath came, he entered the synagogue and taught” (Mark 1:21 NRSV). Mark is not transferring to our minds the picture that he saw in his mind, for we cannot see what he and his sources saw. We do not know what the synagogue looked like—or, for that matter, what Jesus looked like. We do not know how many people were there, what time it was, or how or what Jesus taught.

Words are not photographs. They are more like computer codes that activate our memory banks. We have some idea of the meaning of words like “Capernaum,” “they,” “he,” “Sabbath,” “synagogue,” and “taught.” When put together to form a sentence they activate our memory banks, and we are able to form some idea of what they refer to. The outcome might be described as a verbal model. In speaking of models we must acknowledge the limitations of the imagery. Nevertheless, the concept of the model has proved its worth in helping to envisage what scientists are doing in constructing theories about the physical world.<sup>31</sup> It is also useful in historical work. A distinction may be drawn between primary, secondary, and tertiary models. Primary models consist of primary sources. Secondary models are the interpretative constructs of critical historians. Tertiary models are our reader-response to the primary and secondary models.

---

Knowledge and Christian Belief (New York: Macmillan, 1966); Fritz Wagner, Geschichtswissenschaft, 2nd ed. (Freiburg: Karl Alber, 1966); Fritz Stern, ed., The Varieties of History: From Voltaire to the Present, 2nd ed. (London: Macmillan, 1970); David Carr, Time, Narrative and History (Bloomington / Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1991); Georg G. Iggers, Historiography in the Twentieth Century: From Scientific Objectivity to the Postmodern Challenge (Hanover, NH: Wesleyan University Press, 1997).

<sup>30</sup> “History,” in Avenues of History (1952), cited from Stern, The Varieties of History, 379 (emphasis mine).

This model-making process is continuous. It is not that the latest critical construct supersedes earlier models, or that the primary models can ever be dispensed with. Nor can we avoid making our own constructs, whether they are technical and critical, or unreflective. Critical constructs attempt to correct unreflective understanding and to see earlier constructs in new perspective and depth. They proceed by successive approximation, as they seek to discern the intelligibility of events, actions, and people. We must admit that no single account can represent the historical Jesus, for no single account can represent every perspective. But we can approach Jesus historically.

The goal of the study of history is not model making as an end in itself but the apprehension and understanding of reality through it. Wilhelm Dilthey saw history as a means of transcending the bounds of our limited experience.<sup>32</sup> R. G. Collingwood described it as “the re-enactment of past experience.”<sup>33</sup> But we can never know whether our experience is the same as the narrated past experience. Marc Bloch remarked, “When all is said and done, a single word, ‘understanding,’ is the beacon light of our studies.”<sup>34</sup> I myself prefer to describe history as the attempt to replicate the past with a view to apprehending and understanding its reality. In pursuing the historical Jesus I am not ruling out the Christ of faith, but am trying to see how the two are related.

---

<sup>31</sup> R. B. Braithwaite, Scientific Explanation (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1953); Max Black, Models and Metaphors: Studies in Language and Philosophy (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1962); Ian G. Barbour, Myths, Models and Paradigms: the Nature of Scientific and Religious Language (New York: Harper & Row, 1974).

<sup>32</sup> “Plan der Fortsetzung zum Aufbau der christlichen Welt in den Geisteswissenschaften,” in Gesammelte Schriften 7 (Leipzig: Teubner, 1927), 215.

<sup>33</sup> Title of §4 of ch. 5 of R. G. Collingwood, The Idea of History (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1946), 282–302; cf. John P. Hogan, Collingwood and Theological Hermeneutics (Lanham / New York / London: University Press of America, 1989).

<sup>34</sup> The Historian's Craft, trans. Peter Putnam (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1954), 143.

3. The Quest for Credible Criteria

The quest for credible criteria is considerably older than the quest of the historical Jesus. Its roots may be traced to Pyrrho of Elis (c. 360–275 BCE) who would not commit himself to any judgment that went beyond empirical observation. His teaching was preserved in the Hypotyposes (Outlines of Pyrrhonism) and Adversus Mathematicos of Sextus Empiricus (fl. 200 CE). An account of his life was included by Diogenius Laertius in his Lives of Eminent Philosophers. The sixteenth and seventeenth centuries experienced a revival of Pyrrhonism—the belief that no firm knowledge of anything was possible—which forms the background for the great debates over skepticism involving rationalism, empiricism, and deism.<sup>35</sup> It set the agenda for questioning the truth claims of science and religion—not least those regarding the identity of Jesus.

David Hume advocated “a more mitigated skepticism,” using “a small tincture of Pyrrhonism.”<sup>36</sup> Ever since his celebrated essay “Of Miracles,” analogy has been an important tool in critical history for determining what is feasible. It underlies Hume’s definition of miracles, which encapsulates his reasons for rejecting them. “A miracle is a violation of the laws of nature; and as a firm and unalterable experience has established these laws, the proof against a miracle, from the very nature of the fact, is as entire as any argument from experience can possibly be imagined.”<sup>37</sup> Hume had not proved that miracles could not happen, but that they were so tenuously attested, and so at variance with normal expectations that they could not be used to legitimate the Christian belief system. Analogy would prove to be a key factor in subsequent debates about the historical Jesus.

---

<sup>35</sup> Richard Popkin, The History of Skepticism, From Savonarola to Bayle (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003); Jonathan I. Israel, Radical Enlightenment: Philosophy and the Making of Modernity 1650–1750 (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001); Colin Brown, Christianity and Western Thought: From the Ancient World to the Age of Enlightenment (Downers Grove: InterVarsity Press, 1990).

<sup>36</sup> Enquiry Concerning Human Understanding, §129 (Hume’s Enquiries Concerning Human Understanding and Concerning the Principles of Morals, ed. L. A. Selby-Bigge, 3rd ed. revised by P. H. Nidditch [Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1975]).

<sup>37</sup> Enquiry, §90. Hume uses the word analogy in §89. Cf. R. M. Burns, The Great Debate on Miracles, From Joseph Glanvill to David Hume (Lewisburg: Bucknell University; London: Associated Universities Presses, 1981); Colin Brown, Miracles and the Critical Mind (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984).

Ernst Troeltsch declared that, "Analogy with what happens before our eyes and comes to pass in us is the key to criticism... The universal power of analogy includes the essential homogeneity [Gleichartigkeit] of all historical events."<sup>38</sup> Commitment to this principle underlies the modern secularization of history. But to Wolfhart Pannenberg wholesale use of analogy in this way is fundamentally flawed. "The cognitive power of analogy depends upon the fact that it teaches us to see contents of the same kind in nonhomogeneous things [das Gleichartige im Ungleichartigen]. If the historian keeps his eye on the nonexchangeable individuality and contingency of an event, then he will see that he is dealing with nonhomogeneous things, which cannot be contained in any analogy."<sup>39</sup> "That a reported event bursts analogies with otherwise usual or repeatedly attested events is still no ground for disputing its facticity. It is another matter when positive analogies to forms of tradition (such as myths and even legends) relating to unreal objects, phenomena referring to states of consciousness (like visions) may be found in the historical sources... [A negative] judgment will be rendered not because of the unusualness of something reported about, but rather because it exhibits a positive analogy to some form of consciousness which has no objective referent."<sup>40</sup> In Pannenberg's theology the resurrection is a historical event, which bursts analogies with usual and repeatedly attested events, and establishes Jesus' unity with God.<sup>41</sup>

Analogy played a role in the criterion of dissimilarity used in the Bultmann era by the New Quest—Jesus had to be dissimilar to Judaism and to the early church whose picture of Jesus was colored by its Easter faith. For teaching to qualify as authentic, it had in addition to bear the marks of Aramaic.<sup>42</sup> Whereas Hume used analogy negatively to

---

<sup>38</sup> "Über historische und dogmatische Methode" (1898), in Ernst Troeltsch, Gesammelte Schriften 2 (Aalen: Scientia Verlag, reprint of 2nd ed. [1922], 1962), 729–53, at 732; author's translation).

<sup>39</sup> "Redemptive Event and History," in Wolfhart Pannenberg, Basic Questions in Theology, trans. George H. Keim (London: SCM, 1970), 1:15–80, at 46.

<sup>40</sup> Basic Questions in Theology, 1:48–49.

<sup>41</sup> Jesus—God and Man, trans. Lewis L. Wilkins and Duane A. Priebe (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1968), 53–114; Pannenberg, "Die Auferstehung Jesu—Historie und Theologie," ZTK 91 (1994): 318–328.

<sup>42</sup> Reginald H. Fuller, The Foundations of New Testament Christology (London: Lutterworth Press, 1965), 18; Norman Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (London: SCM, 1967), 42–43. Perrin added what he called "the principle of coherundermine Christian truth claims, the New Quest used it to filter out Jewish and Christian influence in the interests of constructing a historically “scientific” account of Jesus. But it soon became apparent that the enterprise was unrealistic, and the New Quest ended as abruptly as it had begun.

Whereas the Old Quest was bent on tearing Jesus from his Jewish roots to the point of being anti-Semitic,<sup>43</sup> the Third Quest seeks to locate Jesus in the context of Second Temple Judaism.<sup>44</sup> Any account of the historical Jesus must depict him as a plausible figure in the worlds of Galilee and Jerusalem. It must also show how Christian belief may plausibly be traced back to this figure. Over against the criterion of dissimilarity N. T. Wright proposes a criterion of double similarity and double dissimilarity: “It is thus decisively similar to both the Jewish context and in the early Christian world, and at the same time importantly dissimilar... [W]hen something can be seen to be credible (though perhaps deeply subversive) within first-century Judaism, and credible as the implied starting point (though not the exact replica) of something in later Christianity, there is a strong possibility of our being in touch with the genuine history of Jesus.”<sup>45</sup>

The most extensive treatment of criteria is that of Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter, The Quest for the Plausible Jesus (2002).<sup>46</sup> They begin

---

ence”: “material from the earliest strata of the tradition may be accepted as authentic if it can be shown to cohere with material established as authentic by means of the criterion of dissimilarity.” For a critique see Morna D. Hooker, “Christology and Methodology,” NTS 17 (1971): 480–487.

<sup>43</sup> Susannah Heschel, Abraham Geiger and the Jewish Jesus, Chicago Studies in the History of Judaism (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998), reviewed by Colin Brown in Shofar 18.4 (2000): 138–141.

<sup>44</sup> William Telford, “Major Trends and Interpretative Issues in the Study of Jesus,” in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. Bruce Chilton and Craig A. Evans, NTTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 33–74; Ben Witherington, III, The Jesus Quest: The Third Search for the Jew of Nazareth, 2nd ed. (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1997).

<sup>45</sup> Jesus and the Victory of God, Christian Origins and the Question of God 2 (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1996), 132; cf. 85–86.

<sup>46</sup> The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria, trans. M. Eugene Boring (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 2002). See also Gerd Theissen, Sociology of Early Palestinian Christianity, trans. John Bowden (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978); Theissen, The Miracle Stories of the Early Christian Tradition, trans. J. Bowden (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); Theissen, The Shadow of the Galilean: The Quest of the Historical Jesus in Narrative Form, trans. John Bowden (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1987); Theissen, The Gospels in Context: Social and Political History in the Synoptic Tradition, trans. Linda M. Maloney (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1991); Gerd Theissen with a survey of the quest for criteria in Jesus research, and plot in detail the history of the criterion of dissimilarity from the Renaissance to the present. Theissen and Winter see their enterprise as a refinement of the criterion of dissimilarity. They identify two main criteria, both with two subcriteria. The first is the “criterion of historical plausibility [Wirkungsplausibilität].” “It is the responsibility of historical research to interpret texts so that they can be perceived as the effects of the history they report (or the history of their authors). In other words historical research not only has the assignment of narrating the events but of narrating them in such a way that the sources generated by them can be understood as the effects of these events (or, in the case of unreliable sources, that they can be understandable in these terms). This means that in Jesus research we must explain and interpret the historical effect of Jesus as presented to us in the form of the sources generated by him.”<sup>47</sup>

The first of the subcriteria is “opposition to traditional bias [Tendenzwidrigkeit].” Historical credibility may be given to “unintentional evidence that is not influenced by the tendency of its source.”<sup>48</sup> The second subcriterion is “coherence of sources [Quellenkohärenz].” “When sources independently of each other testify to the same event, the prospect that we are dealing with authentic material is enhanced... When particular characteristics of Jesus’ words and deeds have survived in most of the complexes of tradition, we could then have the effects of Jesus himself.”<sup>49</sup>

In developing this idea Theissen and Winter use two further terms. “Cross-section evidence [Querschnittsbeweis]” refers to “recurring items of content, or formal motifs and structures in different streams and Annette Merz, The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide, trans. John Bowden (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1998); and Annette Merz, ed., Jesus als historische Gestalt: Beiträge zur Jesusforschung. Zum 60. Geburtstag von Gerd Theissen, collected articles by Theissen, FRLANT 202 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2003).

---

<sup>47</sup> The Quest for the Plausible Jesus, 231.

<sup>48</sup> Ibid., 174. This seems close to the criterion of “embarrassment” (see above). The examples given appear to fit this category, e.g. the attempt by Jesus’ family to seize him as though he were out of his mind (Mark 3:21). “Embarrassment” seems to be a broader category, because it allows the embarrassing material to be either intentional or unintentional. Theissen and Winter opt for the latter, but it is possible that the evangelists had reasons for including the embarrassing material.

<sup>49</sup> Ibid., 177.

of tradition.”<sup>50</sup> “Genre-constancy [Gattungsinvarianz]” refers to “features and motifs that have maintained themselves in different genres.” The motif of seeking the lost is found in the parables of Luke 15:1–32, apothegms connected with Jesus’ mixing with publicans and sinners (Mark 2:15–17), and Jesus being sent to the lost sheep of Israel (Matt. 15:24). “The motif is so well documented and present in such different genres that nothing speaks against its attribution to the historical Jesus.”<sup>51</sup>

The second main criterion is “contextual plausibility [Kontext-plausibilität].” “The more a Jesus tradition fits into the context of contemporary events, local circumstances, Jewish traditions, and Jewish mentality, the more confidence develops within us that Jesus cannot be the creation of early Christian imagination.”<sup>52</sup> The point is amplified by the subcriterion of “contextual correspondence [Kontextentsprechung],” and by turning the criterion of dissimilarity vis-à-vis Judaism into the subcriterion of contextual “historical individuality [historische Individualität].”<sup>53</sup>

“Contextual plausibility” requires that the historical Jesus be located in a Jewish context. What is plausibly “Jewish” enjoys a high degree of historical plausibility in being traced back to the historical Jesus. At least, “authentic” Jesus material must be material that in the broadest sense can be integrated into the multi-sided picture of the Judaism of his time. This is what we call “Jewish contextual plausibility.”<sup>54</sup> “[C]orrespondence with its Jewish context is a necessary (though not a sufficient) condition for the recognition and identification of sayings as authentic sayings of Jesus.”<sup>55</sup> The subcriterion of “historical individuality” addresses Christian traditional plausibility. Traditions that do not fit a Jewish context but “can well be explained from the history of early Christianity are to be regarded as inauthentic. Conversely, an authentic tradition is one that does fit into our (so far reconstructed) picture of Jesus and his Jewish context but is in tension with the

<sup>50</sup> The Quest for the Plausible Jesus, 178.

<sup>51</sup> Ibid., 178, where attention is drawn to C. H. Dodd who anticipated this point in History and the Gospel (London: Nisbet, 1938), 90–101.

<sup>52</sup> The Quest for the Plausible Jesus, 246

<sup>53</sup> Ibid., 232.

<sup>54</sup> Ibid., 206.

<sup>55</sup> Ibid., 207.

tendencies of early Christianity, or is repeatedly found despite the variety of tendencies in different streams of Christianity.”<sup>56</sup>

The furthest we can go is to attempt to present plausible accounts of Jesus. Theissen and Winter frankly admit that “the concept of plausibility contains a probability factor. Probability is based on comparison of different possibilities.”<sup>57</sup> Pictures of Jesus are subject to revision and falsification. “A naïve ‘falsificationism’ would be satisfied with evidence of the inauthenticity of individual Jesus traditions and would suppose that such evidence had refuted the picture of Jesus that presumes the disputed traditions to be authentic. In contrast to this, we plead for an intelligent falsificationism (‘sophisticated falsificationism’): ‘Contrary to naïve falsificationism, no experiment, experimental report, observation statement or well-corroborated low level falsifying hypothesis alone can lead to falsification. There is no falsification before the emergence of a better theory.’ This double demand of an intelligent falsification can be adopted by Jesus research at two levels: the level of the comprehensive picture of Jesus and the level of concrete individual traditions.”<sup>58</sup>

There remains a further consideration—the strangeness of Jesus. “Who was this Jesus? In part, a sensitive poet, in part an apocalyptic prophet, in part a miracle worker and exorcist, and besides that, a charismatic leader and ethical extremist! We would experience his strangeness even more, if the Jesus tradition were not already so familiar to us.”<sup>59</sup>

Despite their thoroughness Theissen and Winter have not put the question of criteria to rest. While welcoming the many insights contained in their work especially the discussion of historical plausibility, Tom Holmén finds confusing the claim that their criteria with their elaborate terminology represent a replacement for the criterion of dis-

---

<sup>56</sup> The Quest for the Plausible Jesus, 209.

<sup>57</sup> Ibid., 202.

<sup>58</sup> Ibid., 203, citing Imre Lakatos, “Falsification and the Methodology of Scientific Research Programmes,” in Criticism and the Growth of Knowledge, ed. Imre Lakatos and Alan Musgrave (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970), 119 (Lakatos’s emphasis). As an example, Theissen and Winter suggest that it is not enough to overthrow the model of “the eschatological Jesus” by showing that individual eschatological sayings are inauthentic. Rather, one must present a more credible model of “a non-eschatological Jesus.” Such a model might be a Jewish Cynic Jesus, but Theissen and Winter remain unconvinced.

<sup>59</sup> The Quest for the Plausible Jesus, 254.

similarity.<sup>60</sup> The word “criterion” is used in such a variety of ways that one is left wondering whether some are criteria in the strict sense of the term. Holmén’s most serious challenge is to question the criterion of double dissimilarity.<sup>61</sup> “The criterion of dissimilarity is not suited for cases where there is no dissimilarity.”<sup>62</sup> Following the lead of Ben F. Meyer, Holmén argues that, “dissimilarity to the views of the primitive Church alone suffices as an indication of authenticity.”<sup>63</sup> Dissimilarity to Judaism does not guarantee that a saying preserves the authentic words of Jesus; it may indicate that it is “a secondary fabrication.”<sup>64</sup> The criterion of dissimilarity should consist of only one principle: “Sayings or deeds of Jesus which are discontinuous with the views of the primitive Church have a claim for authenticity.”<sup>65</sup> But it needs to be supplemented by other tools, especially the criterion of embarrassment, as illustrated by the discussions of James Breech, John P. Meier, and Craig A. Evans.<sup>66</sup>

Also needed are better guidelines for defining what is Jewish so that we might determine more precisely what kind of a Jew was Jesus.<sup>67</sup> Holmén proposes the use of what he calls “covenant path searching.” The many forms of Judaism in Jesus’ day were characterized by the search for the right path for keeping faithful to the covenant. Jesus refrained from this activity. The eschatological covenant prophesied by Jeremiah 31:34, 32:40 and Ezekiel 11:19–20, 36:27, 37:24 foretold a restoration of Israel bringing with it direct knowledge of God’s will. Jesus’ distinctive behavior appears to have been characterized by his

---

<sup>60</sup> Review of The Quest for the Plausible Jesus, JTS 55.1 (2004): 216–228.

<sup>61</sup> “Doubts about Double Dissimilarity: Restructuring the Main Criterion of Jesus-of-History Research” in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. Chilton and Evans, 48–80.

<sup>62</sup> Ibid., 50.

<sup>63</sup> Ibid., 51; cf. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus, 86.

<sup>64</sup> Authenticating the Words of Jesus, 73.

<sup>65</sup> Ibid., 75.

<sup>66</sup> Ibid., 75; cf. James Breech, The Silence of Jesus: The Authentic Voice of the Historical Man (Philadelphia: Fortress, [1983] 1987), 22–26; Meier, A Marginal Jew I, 168–71; Craig A. Evans, “Recent Developments in Jesus Research: Presuppositions, Criteria, and Sources,” in Jesus and His Contemporaries: Comparative Studies, AGJU 25 (Leiden: Brill, 1995), 1–49, at 18–19.

<sup>67</sup> Holmén, “The Jewishness of Jesus in the ‘Third Quest,’” in Jesus, Mark and Q: The teaching of Jesus and its Earliest Records, ed. Michael Labahn and Andreas Schmidt, JSNTSup 214 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001), 143–62; Holmén, “A Theologically Disinterested Quest? On the Origins of the ‘Third Quest’ for the Historical Jesus,” Studia Theologica 55 (2001): 175–197.

embrace of this vision of Judaism.<sup>68</sup> Holmén's proposal makes it possible to study the link between covenant and kingdom at the Last Supper (Mark 14:24–25) from this vantage-point.

A richly referenced work that deserves to stand alongside that of Theissen and Winter is Stanley E. Porter's The Criteria for Authenticity in Historical-Jesus Research.<sup>69</sup> Porter does not buy into the Old Quest, No Quest, New Quest, Third Quest scenario. "One cannot help but question the advisability of referring to anything other than a single multi-faceted quest of the historical Jesus, with various modifications and adjustments in approach, some of them perhaps influenced by method and others perhaps by personality or nationality."<sup>70</sup>

Despite its entrenched status, the criterion of dissimilarity turns out to be not as useful as was thought. Sayings that do not meet this criterion are "not thereby proved to be inauthentic, since it is not possible to prove a negative such as this." The criterion cannot address specific words of Jesus but only the content of his teaching in comparison with that of Judaism and the early church. "This is a knowledge that scholarship arguably still does not possess to the degree that is required to make sure pronouncement using this criterion. One needs only to compare how much more is known of Judaism contemporary with Jesus after the discovery and publication of the Dead Sea Scrolls than was known before to appreciate the strength of this criticism."<sup>71</sup>

The criteria of coherence and multiple attestation fare scarcely better. The former claims that material that coheres with previously established material should be regarded as authentic. But it is highly subjective, and by its nature depends upon material established by other criteria.<sup>72</sup> Multiple attestation may indicate earlier stages in the tradition, but it does not guarantee authenticity. Some scholars see Q as the earliest record of the Jesus movement, while others reject Q altogether and thus exclude Q as an independent source.<sup>73</sup>

---

<sup>68</sup> "Jesus, Judaism and the Covenant," JSHJ 2.1 (2004): 3–27; Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, BIS 55 (Leiden: Brill, 2001).

<sup>69</sup> The Criteria for Authenticity in Historical-Jesus Research: Previous Discussion and New Proposals, JSNTSup 191 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000).

<sup>70</sup> Ibid., 56.

<sup>71</sup> Ibid., 74.

<sup>72</sup> Ibid., 81.

<sup>73</sup> Ibid., 86–89.

From time to time scholars have attempted to retrovert the Greek of the New Testament into Aramaic in the belief that this step will bring us closer to the words of Jesus. Among the most notable Aramaic scholars in recent times are Matthew Black, Joseph A. Fitzmyer, Bruce Chilton, and Maurice Casey.<sup>74</sup> Yet the enterprise is fraught with problems. Among them is the polysemous nature of words—the capacity for multiple meanings—within languages.<sup>75</sup> Mathew Black believed that translation from Aramaic could be considered only with regard to the words of Jesus. Even so, in the case of the longer parables the translation was not literal but literary.<sup>76</sup> Maurice Casey claims to have made an advance on previous attempts at retroversion by using the Aramaic of the Dead Sea Scrolls to reconstruct the Aramaic of Jesus' day. But his work has not met with universal acclaim, not least by his beginning with passages with purported mistakes in the Greek—which raises questions like how one recognizes a mistranslation and checks the Aramaic reconstruction.<sup>77</sup> But the biggest issues are the assumptions that Jesus spoke exclusively in Aramaic, and that the Aramaic environment was the sole source of his teaching.<sup>78</sup>

Porter belongs to a growing number of experts who contend that Jesus, like many of his followers, was multilingual. Jesus certainly spoke Aramaic, but probably also Greek, the lingua franca of Mediterranean society, and possibly classical Hebrew when debating with scribes and Pharisees.<sup>79</sup> With this in mind, Porter develops new proposals for criteria based on the Greek language and its context,<sup>80</sup>

---

<sup>74</sup> The Criteria for Authenticity, 89–99; cf. Matthew Black, An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts (1946), 3rd ed. with introduction by Craig A. Evans (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1998); Joseph A. Fitzmyer, S.J., The Semitic Background of the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); Bruce Chilton, A Galilean Rabbi and His Bible: Jesus' Use of the Interpreted Scripture of His Time (Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1984); Maurice Casey, Aramaic Sources of Mark's Gospel, SNTSMS 102 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998).

<sup>75</sup> The Criteria for Authenticity, 94; cf. L. D. Hurst, "The Neglected Role of Semantics in the Search for the Aramaic Words of Jesus," ISNT 28 (1986): 63–80; reprinted in Craig A. Evans and Stanley E. Porter, eds., The Historical Jesus: A Sheffield Reader, BibSem 33 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995), 219–236.

<sup>76</sup> The Criteria for Authenticity, 95; cf. Black, An Aramaic Approach, 274.

<sup>77</sup> The Criteria for Authenticity, 96.

<sup>78</sup> Ibid., 99; cf. "Excursus: A Response to Maurice Casey on the Languages of Jesus," 164–180.

<sup>79</sup> Ibid., 126–141.

<sup>80</sup> Ibid., 126–141.

Greek textual variance,<sup>81</sup> and discourse features.<sup>82</sup> The first seeks to establish that Jesus spoke Greek on particular occasions, but does not determine with certainty what his words might have been. The second seeks to determine specific wording. The third relies on recent work in discourse analysis combined with traditional stylistic analysis. Porter believes that it will allow us to determine whether any given episode may be authentic to the Jesus tradition. If Porter is right, historical Jesus studies are about to undergo a paradigm shift.

4. A Way Forward

Looking back on all this, it strikes me that no one has succeeded in making a portrait of Jesus that will drive out all rivals. There are multiple portraits that complement each other. The same is true of methods and criteria. They constitute a work in progress. In the end we have to make judgment calls and commitments of faith. In closing I wish to offer some comments on the criterion of embarrassment. The criterion refers to episodes that one might expect to be suppressed since they appear to put Jesus in a bad light. It is presumed that the material found its way into the gospels because it belonged to tradition, which would not have been preserved if deemed inauthentic.

John P. Meier lists the baptism of Jesus by John, which was “a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins” (Mark 1:5, 9—a point softened in the other gospels), Jesus’ admission that he did not know the day or hour of the coming of the Son of Man (Mark 13:32), and the cry “My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?” (Mark 15:34; Matt 27:46).<sup>83</sup> To this shortlist other examples can be added: the blasphemy charge (Mark 2:7), the attempt to lynch Jesus (Luke 4:29), his family’s attempt to restrain him for people were saying “He has gone out of his mind” (Mark 3:21),<sup>84</sup> the charge that Jesus was casting out demons by Beelzebul, the ruler of the demons (Mark 3:22), the second attempt by the family to restrain him and Jesus’ repudiation of them (Mark 3:31–35), Jesus’ disruptive action in the Temple (Mark 11:15–

---

<sup>81</sup> The Criteria for Authenticity, 181–209.

<sup>82</sup> Ibid., 210–237.

<sup>83</sup> A Marginal Jew I, 168–71.

<sup>84</sup> For the sake of economy I am not attempting to give references to parallels.

18, 27–33), his condemnation for blasphemy (Mark 14:64) and subsequent execution as a criminal. “Cross section evidence” from John includes the accusation that Jesus was leading the people astray (7:12), the charge that he was a Samaritan who had a demon (8:48), and the high priest’s capital charge that Jesus was a sign-working prophet who, if not liquidated, would lead the whole nation astray and bring down the wrath of the Romans (11:47–48; cf. Deut 13:1–5). In addition, there are the numerous instances where Jesus appears to cross the bounds of purity.<sup>85</sup> Actions like touching a leper, a woman with a flow of blood, and the corpse of a girl, healing on the Sabbath, consorting with tax collectors and sinners, and challenging dietary laws appear to threaten Temple-centered piety.<sup>86</sup>

John P. Meier observes that his list of embarrassing material is not enough to make a full portrait of Jesus, but adds as a separate criterion based on Jesus’ violent end, “The Criterion of Rejection and Execution.” “A Jesus whose words and deeds would not alienate people, especially powerful people, is not the historical Jesus.”<sup>87</sup> Theissen and Winter see embarrassing material as “unintentional evidence that is not influenced by the tendency of its source.”<sup>88</sup> By and large, Christian tradition has shrugged off the embarrassing material and painted a portrait of a gentle Jesus who gave himself for humanity in love. None of these interpretations is satisfactory. Meier’s “criterion of rejection and execution” focuses on Jesus’ violent end, but does not link up with the litany of charges against Jesus that date from his early days. Theissen and Winter assume that the embarrassing material is unintentional, and that it goes against the general tendency of the evangelists’ aims. The pietistic portrait of Jesus is selective in its reading of the gospels, and assumes that the charges against Jesus were simply unfounded. But what if they were true?

---

<sup>85</sup> David Rhoads, “Social Criticism: Crossing Boundaries,” in Mark and Method, ed. Janice Capel Anderson and Stephen D. Moore, 2nd ed. (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2008), 145–179.

<sup>86</sup> James D. G. Dunn, “Jesus and the Temple,” in The Partings of the Ways Between Christianity and Judaism and their Significance for the Character of Christianity (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1991), 37–56.

<sup>87</sup> A Marginal Jew I, 170, 177.

<sup>88</sup> The Quest for the Plausible Jesus, 174.

In order to do justice to the gospels, we have to read them with what I call a bifocal vision—we need to read them through the eyes of the evangelists and we need to read them through the eyes of Jesus' adversaries. Another way of putting it is to read them with the grain and against the grain. It also means a holistic reading of the narratives both individually and as a whole.<sup>89</sup> John Dominic Crossan and N. T. Wright represent opposite extremes. Crossan's synthetic portrait of Jesus is based on his stratified inventory of canonical and non-canonical texts detached from their context of meaning.<sup>90</sup> But it is precisely the context and use of texts that give them their meaning. The other extreme is exemplified by Wright's Jesus and the Victory of God, which moves from gospel to gospel in a manner reminiscent of the old gospel harmonies.

Before we can achieve a synthesis, I believe that we need to read texts as wholes in order to determine their tendencies—what they are aiming to promote and what they are trying to refute. For some years now I have been experimenting with a heuristic tool in order to lay bare these tendencies. I call it Thesis A and Thesis B. Thesis A represents the standpoint of the evangelist, and Thesis B represents that of Jesus' adversaries. It is important to realize that both theses are trying to look at the same events, but from opposing standpoints.<sup>91</sup>

Thesis A identifies the activity of Jesus in terms of a Spirit christology, which sees great significance in the coming of the Spirit on Jesus after his baptism and the determinative role of the Spirit throughout Jesus' public activity. It is this anointing by the Spirit that makes Jesus the Christ. The gospels may be said to be an elaboration of Acts 10:38, recalling "how God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Spirit and with power; how he went about doing good and healing all who

---

<sup>89</sup> An example is Robin Griffith-Jones, The Four Witnesses: The Rebel, the Rabbi, the Chronicler, and the Mystic (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 2000).

<sup>90</sup> The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Peasant (San Francisco: Harper SanFrancisco, 1991), xxvii–xxxiv, 427–466.

<sup>91</sup> Colin Brown, "Synoptic Miracle Stories: A Jewish Religious and Social Setting," Foundations and Facets Forum 2.4 (1986): 55–76; Brown, "The Jesus of Mark's Gospel," in Jesus Then & Now: Images of Jesus in History and Christology, ed. Marvin Meyer and Charles Hughes (Harrisburg: Trinity Press International, 2001), 26–53. The term "tendency" is evocative of F. C. Baur's Tendenzkritik (cf. Brown, Jesus in European Protestant Thought, 210–16), but whereas Baur used it to differentiate and date the gospels, my use of it focuses on details of narrative with a view to determining their content and character.

were oppressed by the devil, for God was with him.” Jesus is presented as God’s agent who prepares Israel for the end of the exile, the kingdom of God—God’s presence in power. He does this through a ministry of purification in which the unclean are made clean, unclean spirits are cast out through the power of the Spirit of God, and God’s word is proclaimed in purity.

The other side of the coin is presented by Thesis B, which attempts to see Jesus through the eyes of his critics. When they saw Jesus violating the Sabbath and the purity laws, propounding deviant teaching, and gaining a following through his healings and exorcisms, they naturally turned to the Torah for guidance. In light of instructions concerning prophets who perform signs and wonders in order to lead astray (Deut 13:1–8; 18:20–22), they concluded that Jesus fitted this profile. The result was the Beelzebul charge, which identified Beelzebul as “the other God” whom Jesus was serving. Implied here is also an undercurrent of magic, which was also a capital offence (Lev 19:31; Deut 18:10). The expression “a glutton and a drunkard” (Matt 11:19; Luke 7:34) is not merely a description of Jesus’ eating habits; it is a code word for “the stubborn and rebellious son” (Deut 21:18–21) who disobeys the voice of his father and mother. Both the Beelzebul charge and “the stubborn and rebellious son” charge carried with them the penalty of death by stoning so that the evil might be purged from the midst of the people. There is reason to think that the procedure for dealing with “the stubborn and rebellious son” forms the subtext for Jesus’ mother and brothers coming to him (Mark 3:31–35) and for the parable that we call the parable of the Prodigal Son, which is full of echoes of the language of Deut 21:18–21. It poses the riddle: Which son is really the stubborn and rebellious son?<sup>92</sup>

The question of the historical Jesus is not just a question of material evidence. It is a hermeneutical question. It may even be said that Jesus was executed over a question of hermeneutics. The hermeneutical question was one that divided Jesus’ contemporaries, and divides people today. John P. Meier observes that, “a full portrait of Jesus could never be drawn” on the basis of his shortlist of embarrassing items.<sup>93</sup> But a negative portrait of Jesus could be drawn from my far from complete list of embarrassing episodes. Two conclusions follow. The first is that this negative material provides the roots for the negative images of Jesus in Jewish tradition.<sup>94</sup> The second is that the preservation of embarrassing material may not be accidental. It is sometimes said that history is always written from the standpoint of the winners. This was not so in the case of the gospels, which belong to “the parting of the ways” of Judaism and Christianity at time when Christianity was a persecuted minority religion. It may be noted that the gospels are increasingly seen as ancient biography.<sup>95</sup> Jonathan Z. Smith observes that the characteristic of every major religious biography in the Greco-Roman era is a “double defense against the charge of magic—against the calumny of outsiders and the sincere misunderstanding of insiders.”<sup>96</sup> These observations point to the conclusion that the embarrassing material was deliberately included for the reasons that Smith gives: the gospels were polemical vindications of Jesus.

---

<sup>92</sup> Colin Brown, “The Parable of the Rebellious Son(s),” SJT 51.4 (1998): 391–405.

<sup>93</sup> A Marginal Jew I, 170.

A word must be said about genre and rhetoric.<sup>97</sup> My example is based on my study of Mark. At first I was inclined to follow Raymond E. Brown’s straightforward suggestion that Mark falls into two parts: a ministry of healing and preaching in Galilee and the narrative of

---

<sup>94</sup> William Horbury, Jews and Christians in Contact and Controversy (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1998); and more briefly S. David Sperling, “Jewish Perspectives on Jesus,” in Jesus Then & Now, ed. Meyer and Hughes, 251–59.

<sup>95</sup> Graham N. Stanton, Jesus of Nazareth in New Testament Preaching, SNTSMS 27 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1974), 117–36; David E. Aune, The New Testament and its Literary Environment (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1987), 17–76; Richard A. Burridge, What Are the Gospels? A Comparison with Graeco-Roman Biography, SNTSMS 70 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, [1992] 1995); Dirk Frickenschmidt, Evangelium als Biographie: Die vier Evangelien im Rahmen antiker Erzählerkunst (Tübingen: Francke, 1997).

<sup>96</sup> “Good News is No News: Aretology and the Gospel,” in Christianity, Judaism and Other Graeco-Roman Cults: Studies for Morton Smith at Sixty, ed. Jacob Neusner, SJLA 12 (Leiden: Brill, 1975), 1:21–38, at 24–25; cf. David E. Aune, “Magic in Early Christianity,” ANRW II 23.2 (1980): 1507–1557, at 1540.

<sup>97</sup> John Goldingay, Models for Interpretation of Scripture (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995); Joel B. Green, ed., Hearing the New Testament: Strategies for Interpretation (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995); Stanley E. Porter and Thomas Olbricht, eds., The Rhetorical Analysis of Scripture: Essays from the 1995 London Conference, JSNTSup 146 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996); Craig A. Evans and Shemaryahu Talmon, eds., The Quest for Context and Meaning: Studies in Biblical Intertextuality in Honor of James A. Sanders, BIS 28 (Leiden: Brill, 1997); Anders Eriksson, Thomas H. Olbricht, and Walter Übelacker, eds., Rhetorical Argumentation in Biblical Texts: Essays from the Lund 2000 Conference, Emory Studies in Early Christianity 8 (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2002).

Jesus' death in Jerusalem, joined by a brief travel period containing Peter's confession and Jesus' passion predictions.<sup>98</sup> But turning to Martin Hengel for a second opinion, I was pointed in the direction of reading Mark as a tragic epic, which follows the canons laid down by Aristotle's Poetics and Horace's Poetic Art.<sup>99</sup>

Aristotle viewed epic and tragedy as an "imitation" of life. The rules were basically the same, except that tragedy was acted and epics were declaimed. The aim was to arouse pity and fear in order to produce a catharsis. Whereas the poet describes what might happen, the historian describes what has happened. Tragedy and epic are characterized by three elements: "discovery" or "recognition," "reversal," and "suffering." Mark has them in abundance. I have come to see Mark as an epic intended to be declaimed. The five acts are separated by teaching sections that function like a chorus giving comment on what has happened and linkage to what follows. The prologue (Mark 1:1–15) sets up the dynamic for what follows. The epilogue (Mark 15:40–16:8) transforms what would have been bleak tragedy into triumph. Jesus is a new Joshua, empowered by the Spirit, engaged in a pacific conquest of purification in preparation for the kingdom of God. He is the messianic Son of God whose gospel and divine sonship challenge and surpass those of Caesar (Mark 1:1; 15:39).

The fact that Mark has the form of an epic defense of Jesus does not necessarily undermine the underlying history. It means that we are dealing with a literary work which has a form appropriate for an oral first-century defense of Jesus. Inevitably there is selection and development. Mark's chronology, his choice of events, and his geographical settings are doubtless affected by his story line. Repeated visits to Jerusalem recounted by John would not fit very well into Mark's narrative of Jesus' momentous journey to Jerusalem with its dénouement in the Temple, followed by the catastrophe of Jesus' arrest, interrogation, and hideous death. Each of the canonical gospels has its own perspective and literary form, which must be factored into the ongoing quest of the historical Jesus.<sup>100</sup> But this is a theme for another article in another volume.

<sup>98</sup> An Introduction to the New Testament (New York: Doubleday, 1997), 127.

<sup>99</sup> Martin Hengel, Studies in the Gospel of Mark, trans. John Bowden (Philadelphia: Fortress, 185), 34–37; Brown, "The Jesus of Mark's Gospel," 29–30, at 47, where details of primary and secondary literature are given. Subsequent literature includes Whitney Shiner, Proclaiming the Gospel: First-Century Performance of Mark (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2003).

---

<sup>100</sup> Matthew is even more explicit in developing Spirit christology (Matt 12:17–21, citing Isa 42:1–4). It is accompanied by a wisdom christology. Matthew is structured in three books stressing Jesus as the teacher of Israel, a new Moses delivering a new law for the new people of God, an Isaianic Christ. See Jack Dean Kingsbury, Matthew: Structure, Christology, Kingdom (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1975); Graham N. Stanton, A Gospel for a New People: Studies in Matthew (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1992); Dale C. Allison, Jr., The New Moses: A Matthean Typology (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); Richard Beaton, Isaiah's Christ in Matthew's Gospel, SNTSMS 123 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002).

Luke is part of a two-volume work, locating Jesus in world history from Adam to the time of writing. Jesus is the fulfiller of the promise made in the Babylonian exile about the one on whom God would put his Spirit, because he has anointed him to proclaim good news to the poor, release to the captives, recovery of sight to the blind, and to proclaim the year of the Lord's favor (Luke 4:18–19, citing Isa 61:1–2). See Robert C. Tannehill, The Narrative Unity of Luke-Acts: A Literary Interpretation, 2 vols. (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); Max Turner, Power from on High: The Spirit in Israel's Restoration and Witness in Luke-Acts (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996); David P. Moessner, ed., Jesus and the Heritage of Israel: Luke's Narrative Claim on Israel's Legacy (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1999); Joseph B. Tyson, Luke, Judaism and the Scholars: Critical Approaches to Luke-Acts (Columbia, SC: University of South Carolina Press, 1999).

All four gospels contain the negative elements that I have identified by Thesis B. But John goes furthest by structuring the entire gospel as a cosmic lawsuit between God and the world modeled on the Old Testament lawsuits brought by Yahweh against Israel. John is replete with legal language: multiple witnesses, charges and counter charges, judgment, the casting out of the ruler of this world, the Spirit as “another advocate” who will convict the world of sin, righteousness and judgment (John 14:16–17; 16:8–11). In addition, elements of Greek tragedy have also been detected in John—structure, speeches as action, dramatis personae, and the illusion of identity. See Allison A. Trites, The New Testament Concept of Witness, SNTSMS 31 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1977), 78–127; A. E. Harvey, Jesus on Trial: A Study in the Fourth Gospel (London: SPCK, 1976); Margaret Davies, Rhetoric and Reference in the Fourth Gospel, JSNTSup 69 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1992); Andrew T. Lincoln, “Trials, Plots and the Narrative of the Fourth Gospel,” JSNT 56 (1994): 3–30; idem, Truth on Trial: The Lawsuit Motif in the Fourth Gospel (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2000); Robert T. Fortna and Tom Thatcher, eds., Jesus in Johannine Tradition (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 2001); Jo-Ann A. Brant, Dialogue and Drama: Elements of Greek Tragedy in the Fourth Gospel (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2004).

PART THREE

PERSISTING ISSUES ADJACENT TO THE JESUS QUEST

THE CONTEXT OF JESUS: JEWISH AND/OR HELLENISTIC?

STANLEY E. PORTER

1. Introduction

The formulation of the title of this paper poignantly illustrates one of the major and recurring problems of recent historical Jesus research. In determining the context for the proper study of Jesus, the question is virtually always almost immediately raised whether the context should be one that is seen to be primarily Jewish or primarily Hellenistic, or is to be seen as both, as if these are two equally viable options that with equanimity mesh together while retaining their individual identities. In approaching this problem, there are a number of issues that require attention. First is to discuss briefly the significance of raising the question at all. The second is to address a number of subsidiary definitional issues that figure into this equation. These include: (a) the issue of context; (b) the logical question of what constitutes “or” and “and”; (c) what is meant by Judaism; and (d) what is meant by Hellenism. Once these are addressed, as a third step we can briefly consider various possibilities and ways of answering the question of the relation between the two, before concluding regarding the appropriate context for the study of Jesus, that is, whether that context is Jewish and/or Hellenistic.

2. The Third Quest and the Jewishness of Jesus

One of the major claims of the so-called Third Quest for the historical Jesus is that this quest—unlike the previous ones—appreciates the Jewishness of Jesus. For example, N. T. Wright, apparently the first to coin the term Third Quest,<sup>1</sup> outlines the distinctive features of the

---

<sup>1</sup> Apparently in N. T. Wright, “Towards a Third ‘Quest’: Jesus Then and Now,” ARC: The Journal of the Faculty of Religious Studies, McGill University, Montreal, Canada 10:20–27. Needless to say, this relatively unknown journal (there is no reference to it in the SBL list of abbreviations) did not get much circulation. The “public”

Third Quest in relation to the Second or New Quest. He says that the previous quest “made no real effort to locate Jesus, the early communities or the evangelists within Judaism itself as we know it from the Scrolls, Josephus, and so on. Indeed, it often seemed concerned to keep Jesus at arm’s length from anything too obviously Jewish. The third Quest, on the contrary, sees that the Jewish background is vital...”<sup>2</sup> Wright is one of many who make similar statements regarding the importance of studying the Jewish context of Jesus.<sup>3</sup> Wright lists a number of specific features of what, to him, would constitute a Jewish orientation to the study of Jesus, although he subsumes all of these under the rubric of “Jewish background.”

---

announcement was in S. Neill and T. Wright, The Interpretation of the New Testament 1861–1986, 2nd ed. (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988), 379, with discussion on 379–403. 1988 is the effective date of naming the Third Quest. Interestingly, in his first significant treatment, Wright names four who exemplify the Third Quest: B. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus (London: SCM Press, 1965); A. E. Harvey, Jesus and the Constraints of History (London: Duckworth, 1982); M. J. Borg, Conflict, Holiness and Politics in the Teachings of Jesus (Lewiston, NY: Mellen, 1984); and E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985). Apparently rethinking his choices, in his Jesus and the Victory of God (London: SPCK, 1996), 84, Wright gives a list of now twenty authors he considers important to the Third Quest. One might expect that they would all date since his 1988 venture, but only five do. Instead, Wright goes back and names authors as early as the 1960’s as important to the Third Quest (G. B. Caird, Jesus and the Jewish Nation [London: Athlone Press, 1965]; S. G. F. Brandon, Jesus and the Zealots: A Study of the Political Factor in Primitive Christianity [Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1967]; and O. Betz, What Do We Know about Jesus? trans. M. Kohl, (London: SCM, 1968 (1965))). In other words, within fifteen years of the New Quest beginning, unbeknownst to anyone (until Wright informs us), and going on for nearly thirty-five years before its being identified, was the Third Quest, while, according to Wright, the New Quest also continued (Wright, Jesus, 28–82).

<sup>2</sup> Neill and Wright, Interpretation, 397.

<sup>3</sup> A sample of others who repeat what is now almost a platitude includes: Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 1; C. Brown, “Historical Jesus, Quest of,” in Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels, ed. J. B. Green, S. McKnight, I. H. Marshall (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1992), 326–341, at 337; J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, III: Companions and Competitors (New York: Doubleday, 2001), 3 (but who notes neglect among some Third Quest practitioners to focus on Jesus’ Jewishness!); B. Witherington III, The Jesus Quest: The Third Search for the Jew of Nazareth (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1995), 41; J. D. G. Dunn, “Can the Third Quest Hope to Succeed?” in Authenticating the Activities of Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NCTS 24 (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 31–48, esp. 33; L. M. McDonald and S. E. Porter, Early Christianity and its Sacred Literature (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2000), 104; C. A. Evans, “Assessing Progress in the Third Quest of the Historical Jesus,” JSHJ 4.1 (2006): 35–54, esp. 36–43.

There are several possible responses to Wright's claim. One that has been recently promoted and developed is simply to call into question the entire tripartite schematic outline that ends up positing a Third Quest. This language is meaningful only in terms of the stylized outline that proceeds from the original eighteenth- and nineteenth-centuries' First Quest for the historical Jesus (so-called Life-of-Jesus research or Leben-Jesu-Forschung), to the no-quest period of the first half of the twentieth century, to the New or Second Quest of the 1950's to 1980's, and then to the Third Quest. A number of scholars have recently called major parts of this programmatic analysis into serious question, including the reality of a Third Quest.<sup>4</sup> If this schematic outline falls, then the question of a Third Quest is moot. However, a second response, and one more pertinent to this essay, is to address the issue of whether, according to the evidence, the claim can be sustained that study of Jesus' Jewish context or background only really began with the Third Quest, dating such a quest to the 1980's (not the 1960's!).

Despite the claims of Third Questers to the contrary, the evidence simply does not bear out the claim that there was not "serious" study of the Jewishness of Jesus before the Third Quest. Craig Evans himself claims that "it has been Jewish scholars themselves who have tried to correct this neglect and distortion."<sup>5</sup> Although he says that they merely

---

<sup>4</sup> E.g. W. O. Walker, "The Quest for the Historical Jesus: A Discussion of Methodology," ATR 51 (1969), 38–56; R. J. Banks, "Setting 'The Quest for the Historical Jesus' in a Broader Framework," in Gospel Perspectives: Studies of History and Tradition in the Four Gospels II, ed. R. T. France and D. Wenham (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1981), 61–82, esp. 61; Brown, "Historical Jesus, Quest of," 334–335; S. E. Fowl, "Reconstructing and Deconstructing the Quest of the Historical Jesus," SJT 42 (1989): 319–333; J. Reumann, "Jesus and Christology," in The New Testament and its Modern Interpreters, ed. E. J. Epp and G. W. MacRae (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1989), 501–564, esp. 502; W. Telford, "Major Trends and Interpretive Issues," in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 33–74, esp. 55–61; M. Bockmuehl, This Jesus: Martyr, Lord, Messiah (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1994), 6; idem, Seeing the Word: Refocusing New Testament Study (Grand Rapids: Baker, 2006), 200–201; R. H. Stein, Jesus the Messiah: A Survey of the Life of Christ (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1996), 13; C. Marsh, "Quests of the Historical Jesus in New Historicist Perspective," BibInt 5 (1997): 403–437; W. P. Weaver, The Historical Jesus in the Twentieth Century: 1900–1950 (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1999); S. E. Porter, The Criteria for Authenticity in Historical-Jesus Research: Previous Discussion and New Proposals, JSNTSup 191 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), 28–62; D. C. Allison, Resurrecting Jesus: The Earliest Christian Tradition and its Interpreters (London: T&T Clark, 2005), esp. 1–4; F. Bermejo Rubio, "The Fiction of the 'Three Quests': An Argument for Dismantling a Dubious Historiographical Paradigm," JSHJ 7 (2009): 211–253.

<sup>5</sup> Evans, "Assessing Progress," 36.

“adumbrate things to come,”<sup>6</sup> every one of them pre-dates the Third Quest. These include Joseph Klausner, who published his work on Jesus in Hebrew in 1922, with an English translation in 1925 (which appeared in both American and British editions).<sup>7</sup> This book has a chapter devoted to sources, including pp. 18–24 devoted to Jewish sources.<sup>8</sup> Evans claims that Klausner’s book “unfortunately had little impact in Europe.”<sup>9</sup> This may be so, but someone was paying attention to it. Not only did it appear in an English version in 1925, but it was translated into German in 1930 and French in 1933.<sup>10</sup> Evans further singles out several scholars that Klausner notes. In fact, Klausner offers a thorough survey of historical Jesus research (pp. 71–124), and then singles out Jewish scholars in particular (pp. 106–24).<sup>11</sup> He lists Joseph Salvador,<sup>12</sup> Heinrich Graetz,<sup>13</sup> H. G. Enelow,<sup>14</sup> C. G. Montefiore,<sup>15</sup> Abraham Geiger,<sup>16</sup> and four works by “converted Jews”: Alfred

<sup>6</sup> Evans, “Assessing Progress,” 38.

<sup>7</sup> J. Klausner, Yeshu ha-Notzri, 2 vols. (Jerusalem: Shtibel, 1922); ET: Jesus of Nazareth: His Life, Times, and Teaching, 3rd ed. (London: Macmillan, 1925; 1952).

<sup>8</sup> It is hard to fault Klausner for not referring to the Dead Sea Scrolls, as they had not yet been discovered when his book was first published. He does have a section (pp. 67–70) devoted to apocryphal and non-canonical sources, another of the supposed hallmarks of the Third Quest (see Allison, Resurrecting Jesus, 11).

<sup>9</sup> Evans, “Assessing Progress,” 37.

<sup>10</sup> J. Klausner, Jesus von Nazareth: Seine Zeit, sein Leben und seine Lehre (Berlin: Jüdischer Verlag, 1930); Jésus de Nazareth: Son temps, sa vie, sa doctrine (Paris: Payot, 1933). My US edition indicates that the book was reprinted in 1927, reissued in 1929, and then reprinted in 1943, 1944, 1945, 1946. Someone was buying this book!

<sup>11</sup> The information below is primarily from Evans’s article and Klausner’s book. Unfortunately, I have not been able to secure complete information for each author.

<sup>12</sup> J. Salvador, Jésus Christ et sa doctrine: Histoire de la naissance de l’église, de son organisation et de ses progrès pendant le premier siècle, 2 vols. (Paris: A. Guyot et Scribe, 1838); Das Leben Jesu und sein Lehre: Die Geschichte der Entstehung der christlichen Kirche, ihrer Organisation und Fortschritte während des ersten Jahrhunderts (Dresden: Walther’s, 1841).

<sup>13</sup> H. Gaetz, Geschichte der Juden, III (Leipzig: Institut zur Förderung der Israelitischen Literatur, 1856); History of the Jews (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1891–98).

<sup>14</sup> H. G. Enelow, A Jewish View of Jesus (New York: Macmillan, 1920; repr. 1931)

<sup>15</sup> C. G. Montefiore, The Synoptic Gospels, 2 vols. (London: Macmillan, 1909). Montefiore also wrote The Old Testament and After (London: Macmillan, 1923) and Rabbinic Literature and Gospel Teachings (London: Macmillan, 1930).

<sup>16</sup> A. Geiger, Das Judentum und seine Geschichte in zwölf Vorlesungen, 3 vols. (Breslau: Schletter, 1864).

Edersheim,<sup>17</sup> Daniel Chwolsohn,<sup>18</sup> M. De Jonge,<sup>19</sup> and Paul Levertoff.<sup>20</sup> Other significant scholars can be added as well. Dale Allison traces the study of Jesus as a Jew back to such scholars as John Lightfoot<sup>21</sup> and Johann Salomo Semler,<sup>22</sup> and then names others also.<sup>23</sup>

I think that it is worth recounting some of the most important scholars in the history of interpretation who have been concerned with the relationship of Jesus and Judaism. It is far from an insignificant group, and certainly not one that has been neglected or simply adumbrated more recent developments. I do not pretend to include a full or complete list, but here are a number that I have come across and note. One can begin as far back as J. A. Bengel and his Gnomon Novi Testamenti,<sup>24</sup> and Jacob Wettstein, with his New Testament text with full apparatus and ancient parallels.<sup>25</sup> In more recent times, the

---

<sup>17</sup> A. Edersheim, The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, 2 vols. (London: Longmans, 1883), as well as other books, such as Sketches of Jewish Social Life in the Days of Christ (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1904) and The Temple: Its Ministry and its Services (London: Longmans, 1883). Evans describes Edersheim's Life as "rich with Jewish background" in his Life of Jesus Research: An Annotated Bibliography, NTTS 24 (Leiden: Brill, 1996), 251, one of only two of these authors included in his bibliography (the other is Montefiore).

<sup>18</sup> D. Chwolsohn, Das letzte Passamahl Christi und der Tag seines Todes (St. Petersburg: St. Petersburg Academy of Sciences, 1892; 2nd ed., Leipzig, 1908 [1875 in Russian]).

<sup>19</sup> M. de Jonge, Jeschua, der klassische jüdische Mann: Zerstörung des kirchlichen, Enthüllung des jüdischen Jesus-Bildes (Berlin, 1904).

<sup>20</sup> P. Levertoff, Ben ha-Adam: Hayye Yeshua ha-Mashiach u-po'alav (London: Edut leYisrael 1904; repr. Jerusalem: Dolphin, 1968). This is the "first book written on Jesus and Christianity's early beginnings by a Jewish scholar in Modern Hebrew" (J. Quinónez, "Paul Phillip Levertoff: Pioneering Hebrew-Christian Scholar and Leader," MISHKAN 37 [2002]: 21–34, at 25).

<sup>21</sup> J. Lightfoot, Horae Hebraicae et Talmudicae, 6 vols. (Cambridge and London, 1658–78; repr. ed. R. Gandell; 4 vols.; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1859).

<sup>22</sup> J. S. Semler, Abhandlung von freier Untersuchung des Canon, 4 vols. (Halle: Hemmerde, 1771–75).

<sup>23</sup> Allison, Resurrecting Jesus, 12.

<sup>24</sup> J. A. Bengel, Gnomon Novi Testamenti, in quo ex nativa verborum vi simplicitas, profunditas, concinnitas, salubritas sensuum coelestium indicatur (1742); ed. M. E. Bengel and J. Steudel, 2 vols. (Tübingen: Fues, 1850); Gnomon of the New Testament, trans. J. Bandinel and A. R. Fausset, ed. A. R. Fausset, 5 vols. (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1866).

<sup>25</sup> J. J. Wettstein, Novum Testamentum Graecum editionis receptae cum lectionibus variantibus codicum MSS., Editionum aliarum, Versionum et Patrum nec non commentario pleniore, Ex Scriptoribus veteribus Hebraeis, Graecis et Latinis, Historiam et vim verborum illustrante opera et studio Joannis Jacobi Wettsteinii (Amsterdam: Dommerian, 1751–52). W. G. Kümmel, The New Testament: The History of the Investigation of its Problems, trans. S. McL. Gilmour and H. C. Kee (Nashville: Abingdon, following scholars should be considered, including a number of Jewish scholars, converted or otherwise. I also include a number of works on Josephus in relation to the New Testament. These authors include: Paul Fiebig,<sup>26</sup> Gustaf Dalman,<sup>27</sup> Israel Abrahams,<sup>28</sup> Adolf Schlatter,<sup>29</sup> C. F. Burney,<sup>30</sup> Henry St. John Thackeray,<sup>31</sup> F. J. Foakes Jackson,<sup>32</sup> Bennett Harvie Branscom,<sup>33</sup> T. W. Manson,<sup>34</sup> W. O. E. Oesterley,<sup>35</sup> C. Guignebert,<sup>36</sup> Matthew Black,<sup>37</sup> Jakób Jocz,<sup>38</sup> Morton Smith,<sup>39</sup> Joachim 1972), 49, says that Wettstein includes “a collection of parallel passages from classical and Jewish literature, unsurpassed to this day...”

---

<sup>26</sup> P. Fiebig, Der Menschensohn: Jesu Selbstbezeichnung mit besonderer Berücksichtigung des aramäischen Sprachgebrauches für “Mensch” (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1901); Altjüdische Gleichnisse und die Gleichnisse Jesu (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1904).

<sup>27</sup> G. Dalman, The Words of Jesus, Considered in the Light of Post-Biblical Jewish Writings and the Aramaic Language, trans. D. M. Kay (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1909 [1898]); Jesus-Jeshua: Studies in the Gospels, trans. P. P. Levertoff (London: SPCK, 1929 [1922]); cf. Jesaja 53 das Prophetenwort vom Sühnleiden des Gottesknechtes, SIJ 13 (Leipzig: Hinrichs, 1914). The use of the study of Aramaic as a tool in talking about Jesus goes back to the sixteenth century. See the chapter on criteria in these volumes, and Porter, Criteria, 89–99.

<sup>28</sup> I. Abrahams, Studies in Pharisaism and the Gospels (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1917).

<sup>29</sup> A. Schlatter, Die Geschichte des Christus, 2nd ed. (Stuttgart: Calwer, 1923).

<sup>30</sup> C. F. Burney, The Poetry of our Lord: An Examination of the Formal Elements of Hebrew Poetry in the Discourses of Jesus Christ (Oxford: Clarendon, 1925).

<sup>31</sup> H. St. J. Thackeray, Josephus: The Man and the Historian (1929), preface by G. F. Moore, introduction by S. Sandmel (New York: KTAV, 1967).

<sup>32</sup> F. J. Foakes Jackson, Josephus and the Jews: The Religion and History of the Jews as Explained by Flavius Josephus (London: SPCK, 1930).

<sup>33</sup> B. H. Branscomb, Jesus and the Law of Moses (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1930).

<sup>34</sup> T. W. Manson, The Teaching of Jesus: Studies of its Form and Content (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1939 [1931]).

<sup>35</sup> W. O. E. Oesterley, The Gospel Parables in the Light of their Jewish Background (London: SPCK, 1936).

<sup>36</sup> C. Guignebert, The Jewish World in the Time of Jesus, trans. S. H. Hooke (London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner, 1939).

<sup>37</sup> M. Black, An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1946).

<sup>38</sup> J. Jocz, The Jewish People and Jesus Christ: A Study in the Relationship between the Jewish People and Jesus Christ (London: SPCK, 1949).

<sup>39</sup> M. Smith, Tannaitic Parallels to the Gospels, JBLMS 6 (Philadelphia: SBL, 1951).

Jeremias,<sup>40</sup> Eric Bishop,<sup>41</sup> Samuel Sandmel,<sup>42</sup> Sherman Johnson,<sup>43</sup> Paul Winter,<sup>44</sup> Morton Enslin,<sup>45</sup> R. J. H. Shutt,<sup>46</sup> François Amiot, Jean Daniélou, Amédée Brunot and Daniel-Rops,<sup>47</sup> W. D. Davies,<sup>48</sup> Asher Finkel,<sup>49</sup> David Flusser,<sup>50</sup> Günther Baumbach,<sup>51</sup> and a host of others who have small sections in their books devoted to the Jewish background or context of the gospels or Jesus. As Allison nicely expresses it: “we may now regard their use of Jewish sources as less sophisticated than our own; and Christian scholars may further—with the guilt of the Holocaust hanging over our heads and the modern spirit of relativism urging us not to reckon our religion better than any other—see more continuity with Judaism, whereas our predecessors saw less. Yet we are not walking down some new, hitherto-undiscovered path but rather just going further down the old one.”<sup>52</sup>

In terms of the issue of the introduction of the study of Jesus’ Jewish background that helps set the agenda for this paper, we can say with some certainty that this is not a new topic of discussion. In fact, it is

---

<sup>40</sup> J. Jeremias, Das Abendmahlsworte Jesu, 3rd ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1960 [1935]); The Parables of Jesus, trans. S. H. Hooke (New York: Scribners, 1972 [1947]); The Prayers of Jesus, SBT Second Series 6 (London: SCM, 1967); Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus: An Investigation into Economic and Social Conditions during the New Testament Period, trans. F. H. and C. H. Cave (London: SCM, 1969).

<sup>41</sup> E. F. F. Bishop, Jesus of Palestine: The Local Background to the Gospel Documents (London: Lutterworth, 1955).

<sup>42</sup> S. Sandmel, A Jewish Understanding of the New Testament (Cincinnati: Hebrew Union College Press, 1957).

<sup>43</sup> S. E. Johnson, Jesus in his Land (New York: Scribners, 1957).

<sup>44</sup> P. Winter, On the Trial of Jesus, SJ (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1961).

<sup>45</sup> M. S. Enslin, The Prophet from Nazareth (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1961).

<sup>46</sup> R. J. H. Shutt, Studies in Josephus (London: SPCK, 1961).

<sup>47</sup> F. Amiot, J. Daniélou, A. Brunot, H. Daniel-Rops, The Sources for the Life of Christ (London: Burns & Oates, 1962), with a chapter on the Dead Sea Scrolls (pp. 22–32).

<sup>48</sup> W. D. Davies, The Setting of the Sermon on the Mount (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1964).

<sup>49</sup> A. Finkel, The Pharisees and the Teacher of Nazareth: A Study of their Background, their Halachic and Midrashic Teachings, the Similarities and Differences, AGSU (Leiden: Brill, 1964).

<sup>50</sup> D. Flusser, Jesus (1968; in collaboration with R. S. Notley; Jerusalem: Magnes Press, The Hebrew University, 1997).

<sup>51</sup> G. Baumbach, Jesus von Nazareth im Lichte der jüdischen Gruppenbildung (Berlin: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1971).

<sup>52</sup> Allison, Resurrecting Jesus, 12. I cannot help observing that many of these scholars wrote during the supposed “no quest” period, and, perhaps in an effort to force the tripartite schematic, their work is intentionally pushed out of view.

quite surprising that scholars can even say that it is something distinctive of the Third Quest when it so clearly is not. The study of the Jewish background or context of the New Testament has been an agenda item for New Testament study since the development of historical criticism, and has been a part of the discussion of the historical Jesus from its earliest times.

3. Definitional Issues

As stated above, the second major task is to address a number of subsidiary definitional issues that figure into this equation. These include: (a) the issue of context; (b) the logical question of what constitutes “or” and “and”; (c) what is meant by Jesus being Jewish; and (d) what is meant by Jesus being Hellenistic. I will take them in order.

3.1. The Issue of Context

Defining context continues to be one of the most difficult tasks in exegesis of the New Testament. In works on exegesis, it can be used in a wide variety of ways, even within the same work.<sup>53</sup> One notes above that the title of this essay uses the word “context,” but the formulation in terms of historical Jesus research often uses the term “background.” I believe that in most contexts they are used roughly synonymously. However, in several ways this is a terminological imprecision that should be corrected for three reasons. One reason is that approaches to exegesis often make a distinction between context and background. A second is that the notion of background, as it is often used, implies a secondary backdrop against which to distinguish the primary subject. One could speak of the Jewish background of Jesus as a way of distinguishing Jesus from that background that has already been determined. That does not seem to be the focus of those discussing the issue in historical Jesus studies. A third is that the notion of background seems to imply a predetermined conceptualization of what this background is. This is probably truer to the orientation of much historical Jesus research, although, as I will argue below, it probably is not the best approach to the issue. Therefore, the use of “background” does not seem to be the best formulation of the issues involved.<sup>54</sup>

---

<sup>53</sup> E.g. R. J. Erickson, A Beginner's Guide to New Testament Exegesis: Taking the Fear out of Critical Method (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2005).

The use of the notion of context is, itself, not without its own problems, however. In linguistics, as in historical and literary studies, defining context is not an easy task. A quick survey of a range of volumes on exegesis shows that the notion of context is treated in any number of ways. These range from no treatment at all to a brief paragraph to highly nuanced treatments.<sup>55</sup> The best formulation of the concept of context is probably found in those works that make a workable distinction between what might be termed immediate context, literary context and historical context (these terms are sometimes further differentiated as well).<sup>56</sup> Immediate context, similar to what is in some linguistic circles referred to as co-text,<sup>57</sup> indicates the immediate linguistic environment. The literary context is the one created by the particular literary work under discussion, and involves knowledge of a variety of larger literary issues. The historical context is the larger context in which the literary work is found, and involves knowledge of a variety of larger historical, cultural, religious and related issues.<sup>58</sup> Although at its best historical Jesus research will ideally make use of all levels of context in the course of its analysis of Jesus, the one that

---

<sup>54</sup> See also T. Engberg-Pedersen, “Paul beyond the Judaism/Hellenism Divide,” in Paul beyond the Judaism/Hellenism Divide, ed. T. Engberg-Pedersen (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2001), 1–16, at 1–2.

<sup>55</sup> It is odd that one author, after treating “immediate context” (pp. 102–104), has a section on “absence of context” (pp. 112–113). See A. B. Mickelsen, Interpreting the Bible (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1963).

<sup>56</sup> See, e.g., W. C. Kaiser, Jr., Toward an Exegetical Theology: Biblical Exegesis for Preaching and Teaching (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1981), 69–85; D. A. Hagner, New Testament Exegesis and Research: A Guide for Seminarians (privately published, 1992), 3–4; D. McCartney and C. Clayton, Let the Reader Understand: A Guide to Interpreting and Applying the Bible (Wheaton, IL: Victor, 1994), 141–46; G. R. Osborne, The Hermeneutical Spiral: A Comprehensive Introduction to Biblical Interpretation, rev. ed. (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2006), 37–56, esp. 39; H. A. Virkler and K. G. Ayayo, Hermeneutics: Principles and Processes of Biblical Interpretation, 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids: Baker, 2007), 81–92.

<sup>57</sup> See J. T. Reed, A Discourse Analysis of Philippians: Method and Rhetoric in the Debate over Literary Integrity, JSNTSup 136 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997), 42. I do not mean to imply that these are exactly the same, but the literary context is in some ways similar to the context of situation and the historical situation to the context of culture.

<sup>58</sup> See, e.g., the three chapters on cultural, religious and political background (pp. 489–544) in D. S. Dockery, K. A. Mathews, and R. B. Sloan, eds., Foundations for Biblical Interpretation: A Complete Library of Tools and Resources (Nashville: Broadman & Holman, 1994).

seems most pertinent to the discussion at hand is the historical context. The historical context involves the world surrounding the text, in the sense of the world in which the text is placed, the world out of which it was written, and the world in which it was read.

The question regarding the context of Jesus is, then, on the basis of the written documents that we have, within the larger historical context, what is the appropriate context for understanding Jesus? The formulation of historical Jesus research in terms of “Jewish background” seems to imply a singular answer to this question. I would suggest that this is a problematic notion, as it seems to imply that we know exactly what Judaism was at the time, and that that is the pertinent context. I believe that both are questionable presuppositions to bring to the discussion.

3.2. The Logical Question of “or” and “and”

This is not the place for an extended discussion of formal logic. However, the language used in the chapter title, and how this is formulated in actual practice, does bear some attention. I would suggest that both “or” and “and” are problematic for getting at the context of Jesus.

The use of “or,” whether explicitly or implicitly, runs the risk of the logical fallacy of the false disjunction or excluded middle. As David Hackett Fischer states, “The law of the excluded middle may demand instant obedience in formal logic, but in history it is as intricate in its applications as the internal revenue code. Dichotomy is used incorrectly when a question is constructed so that it demands a choice between two answers which are in fact not exclusive or not exhaustive. But it is used often by historians in this improper way.”<sup>59</sup> The title of this essay formulates this question in a potentially disjunctive manner. Leaving the use of “and” out of the discussion for a moment, we see that it asks us to decide in exclusive terms whether the proper context for Jesus was either Jewish or Hellenistic. This formulation suggests several things: that these are two equal and viable choices, and that they are categorically and distinctly different from each other so that to be one is not to be the other. By choosing one, one is saying that Jesus' context cannot be the other. Logically, this formulation asks us to believe that there was no interplay between Judaism and Hellenism, as if they existed in splendid isolation. From a logical standpoint, however, is it not possible to think of Jewish forms of Hellenism or Hellenistic forms of Judaism, or even a Jewish-Hellenism? All of these are logical possibilities that such a formulation excludes. What if, pushing this further, on the basis of historical evidence, we were to find evidence that there was such a thing as Hellenistic Judaism or Jewish forms of Hellenism, even some of them in Palestine? From a historical standpoint as well, the false disjunction hinders exploration of the question. One notices, however, that in the formulation by Wright above there is no disjunction stated. In fact, Wright's formulation offers no choice. It simply asserts that one must choose the Jewish context (he uses the term "background") as the appropriate sphere for discussion. In that sense, there is a suppressed choice already made that answers the question before it is even asked, without leaving open the possibility that there is something other than a simple bifurcation at play. I would contend that, from a logical (and historical, as we shall see below) standpoint, we should reformulate the question regarding the context in which to place Jesus.

---

<sup>59</sup> D. H. Fischer, Historians’ Fallacies: Toward a Logic of Historical Thought (New York: Harper, 1970), 10. Cf. D. A. Carson, Exegetical Fallacies, 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1996), 90–92, 105–106; J. D. Fantin, “Background Studies: Grounding the Text in Reality,” in Interpreting the New Testament Text: Introduction to the Art and Science of Exegesis, ed. D. L. Bock and B. M. Fanning (Wheaton, IL: Crossway, 2006), 167–196, esp. 170–171.

The use of "and" is no doubt designed to aid this by introducing a further set of considerations, and in that sense is definitely an improvement. Rather than simply being confined to the disjunctive choice between a Jewish and Hellenistic context, the use of "and" indicates that we may combine them in some way. This is a step forward, as it introduces the possibility of Judaism and Hellenism being the proper context for the study of Jesus. However, there are further problems with this formulation. The use of "and" with two elements seems to indicate that the two are equal choices, in the sense that they are two things of a similar type and sort that one can, rather than choosing between them, combine on the same terms and possibly in equal measure. Logically, this may make some sense, but this type of formulation may need to be rethought in terms of historical, cultural and other realities of the ancient world.

As I show below, I think that it is better to formulate the proper context for the study of Jesus as one of Judaism within Hellenism. More than just addressing the logical issues, this formulation addresses the historical, cultural and related realities of the ancient world, including that of Palestine. This formulation indicates a relationship in which Judaism, however it is defined, is seen as an entity in and of itself, but one that is to be understood within the larger world of Hellenism.

3.3. What is Meant by Judaism

This is not the place to describe all of the features of Judaism at the time of Jesus. The facts of the Judaism of Jesus' time are sufficiently well-known—note above that there has been serious study of Jesus and Judaism for well over one hundred years—to not require it here. What is worth noting, however, are some of the features of that Judaism as they would be pertinent in terms of the relation of Judaism to Hellenism.

One of the most important factors to realize is that Judaism, without necessarily using the term Judaisms in the plural, had a number of different expressions of what has come to be called “common Judaism.”<sup>60</sup> These expressions were evident in a number of different ways.

1. They manifested themselves in different forms of religious expression. Support for Temple worship was apparently a fundamental Jewish belief, so that those of the Diaspora desired to come to Jerusalem to worship and quite possibly even sent money for the cult, as did those in Palestine.<sup>61</sup> However, apparently not all were pleased with the religious practices associated with the Temple, and so it is likely that this precipitated those of the Qumran community to withdraw from the cult in Jerusalem.<sup>62</sup>

2. There were different languages of Judaism. Most Jews indigenous to Palestine probably spoke Aramaic, the language that Judaism learned during the exile. Most Jews indigenous to the Diaspora probably spoke Greek, the lingua franca of the Greco-Roman world, since the time of Alexander.<sup>63</sup> This was true not only in Egypt, where the Old Greek

---

<sup>60</sup> This common Judaism is seen in the work of G. F. Moore, Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era: The Age of Tannaim, 2 vols. (repr. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1997 [1927]) and continued in E. P. Sanders, Judaism: Practice and Belief 63 BCE–66 CE (London: SCM, 1992).

<sup>61</sup> See Sanders, Judaism, 51–54.

<sup>62</sup> See J. J. Collins, Seers, Sibyls and Sages in Hellenistic-Roman Judaism (Leiden: Brill, 1997), 239–260, esp. 247–248. Discussion of these issues continues. See, e.g., G. Boccaccini, ed., Enoch and Qumran Origins: New Light on a Forgotten Connection (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005).

<sup>63</sup> See V. Tcherikover, Hellenistic Civilization and the Jews, trans. S. Applebaum (New York: Atheneum, 1970), 347–348.

(Septuagint) version was translated, but elsewhere in the Mediterranean world, including in Palestine, where there were always a number of Greek-speaking Jews. A few Jews, perhaps for religious purposes, whether they were in Palestine or the Diaspora, probably spoke Hebrew. The number that knew Hebrew was not great, either inside or outside Palestine. Jews throughout the Roman empire probably also spoke local indigenous languages in some outlying places where the influence of Greek had not fully permeated.<sup>64</sup>

3. There were different literatures of Judaism that were considered important to their respective groups (i.e., scriptural and possibly scriptural, if not finally canonical).<sup>65</sup> These can be classified in different ways—for example, by language of composition (for the most part Hebrew or Greek, but also Aramaic), place of composition (e.g. outside Palestine, inside Palestine, within the Qumran or another sectarian community), and type of text (e.g. biblical, rewritten or expanded Bible, history, wisdom literature, testaments, oracular literature, apocalyptic literature, strictly sectarian literature, and psalms, hymns and prayer material).<sup>66</sup> It is clear that we are in a period before the fixing of the scriptural canon, and during a time when various groups used a variety of different texts that had at least what appears to be scriptural significance.<sup>67</sup>

4. There were different messianic expectations. Debate continues on the amount of continuity and diversity in messianic expectation in Judaism at the turn of the eras.<sup>68</sup> Even if one finds a common core to messianic expectation, there certainly seems to be evidence of a number of different conceptions of the Messiah, most of them finding their

---

<sup>64</sup> See J. M. G. Barclay, Jews in the Mediterranean Diaspora: From Alexander to Trajan (323 BCE–117 CE) (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1996), 24–25.

<sup>65</sup> For discussion and classification, see G. W. E. Nickelsburg, Jewish Literature between the Bible and the Mishnah: A Historical and Literary Introduction (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981).

<sup>66</sup> These categories are taken from M. Stone, ed., Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period, CRINT 2 (Assen: Van Gorcum, 1984). See also Nickelsburg, Jewish Literature, passim.

<sup>67</sup> The most obvious, but not the only, group were those at Qumran. See J. VanderKam, The Dead Sea Scrolls Today (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994), 29–70. Not all the sectarian texts at Qumran probably originated with the group.

<sup>68</sup> For continuity, see W. Horbury, Jewish Messianism and the Cult of Christ (London: SCM, 1998), 64–108; for discontinuity, see J. J. Collins, “Jesus, Messianism and the Dead Sea Scrolls,” in Qumran-Messianism: Studies on the Messianic Expectations in the Dead Sea Scrolls, ed. J. Charlesworth, H. Lichtenberger and G. Oegema (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1998), 100–119, esp. 101.

roots in earlier biblical thought. There are images of a royal Messiah following in the line of David, a prophetic Messiah following in the line of Moses, a priestly Messiah in the line of Melchizedek,<sup>69</sup> and a variety of messianic depictions in the Dead Sea Scrolls, including a possible two Messiahs.<sup>70</sup>

5. There were different currents of thought and behavior that joined certain groups together within Judaism. Grabbe has identified three that are of significance here.<sup>71</sup> The first is the textual current, that is, those who emphasized interpretation of scripture. These include the priests and scribes who were responsible for cultic practice, the Pharisees, the Sadducees and the Essenes. The second current is the revolutionaries. These included the Sicarii and the Zealots who fomented the first Jewish Revolt. The third current is eschatological Judaism, which held to an apocalyptic viewpoint and expected a heavenly Messiah at the end times.

6. There were different theological beliefs, even among those who were interpreters of scripture. The priests were perhaps those who are to be linked with the Wisdom tradition.<sup>72</sup> The Pharisees had an oral tradition besides the Hebrew Bible,<sup>73</sup> were concerned with application of their law and traditions to everyday life,<sup>74</sup> and, like many Jews of the time, held to expectation of resurrection or life after death.<sup>75</sup> The Sadducees held to a written scripture only, and denied an oral tradition, they did not believe in resurrection because they probably had a smaller canon of scripture, and they were probably of smaller numbers

---

<sup>69</sup> C. A. Evans, Jesus and his Contemporaries: Comparative Studies, AGJU 25 (Leiden: Brill, 1995), 53–81; cf. 83–154, for messianic texts from Qumran.

<sup>70</sup> See J. J. Collins, The Scepter and the Star: The Messiahs of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Other Ancient Literature (New York: Doubleday, 1995), 74–101; C. A. Evans, “The Messiah in the Dead Sea Scrolls,” in Israel’s Messiah in the Bible and the Dead Sea Scrolls, ed. R. S. Hess and M. D. Carroll R. (Grand Rapids: Baker, 2003), 85–101, esp. 94–95.

<sup>71</sup> L. L. Grabbe, An Introduction to First Century Judaism: Jewish Religion and History in the Second Temple Period (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1996), 29–93.

<sup>72</sup> Grabbe, Introduction, 36–37.

<sup>73</sup> See E. P. Sanders, Jewish Law from Jesus to the Mishnah: Five Studies (London: SCM, 1990), 97–130.

<sup>74</sup> Grabbe, Introduction, 44. Grabbe links the Pharisees with trying to imitate the Temple cult at home. See A. C. Thiselton, The Two Horizons: New Testament Hermeneutics and Philosophical Description (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980), 12–15.

<sup>75</sup> See G. Stemmerger, Jewish Contemporaries of Jesus: Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes, trans. A. W. Mahnke (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995), 70–73.

than the other groups and possibly of a higher socio-economic status.<sup>76</sup> The Essenes, who probably lived at Qumran, and elsewhere in Judea, had their own method of interpreting scripture, as well as their own communal documents.<sup>77</sup>

Though we may speak of a “common” Judaism, there is plenty of diversity within this concept to include a number of factors that might prove instructive in the larger historical context in which Jesus lived, and that might more or less easily find a relationship with Hellenism. Not all of it is suitable as providing a context for Jesus, but much of it has some bearing on understanding him.

3.4. What is Meant by Hellenism?

Recent research has widely accepted the notion that Judaism outside of Palestine was Hellenistic, or perhaps better Hellenistic-Roman, because of the obvious fact that, even if Jews attempted to live in community within the larger Greco-Roman world, they could not help but be in the midst of and interact with such a world. There have been numerous studies that have addressed the various questions associated with this, in terms of cultural, educational, linguistic, social, economic, and related assimilation.<sup>78</sup> Admittedly Hellenism was not a homogeneous cultural phenomenon that embraced or overwhelmed all peoples similarly,<sup>79</sup> but certain facts seem to emerge in terms of Judaism and Hellenism. These are that Jews, like others in the Mediterranean world of the time, used Greek as their lingua franca, participated in the wider cultural, social, economic and even military functions of life, and had

---

<sup>76</sup> Grabbe, Introduction, 45–46. See A. J. Saldarini, Pharisees, Scribes and Sadducees in Palestinian Society: A Sociological Approach (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans and Livonia, MI: Dove, 2001), 304.

<sup>77</sup> Grabbe, Introduction, 46–48. On Qumran interpretation, see J. VanderKam and P. Flint, The Meaning of the Dead Sea Scrolls (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 2002), 221–223, 293–307.

<sup>78</sup> E.g. Tcherikover, Hellenistic Civilization, esp. 39–265; M. Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism: Studies in their Encounter in Palestine during the Early Hellenistic Period, trans. J. Bowden (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974); Hengel with C. Marksches, The ‘Hellenization’ of Judaea in the First Century after Christ, trans. J. Bowden (London: SCM, 1989). For broader perspectives, see W. Tarn, Hellenistic Civilization, ed. G. T. Griffith, 3rd ed. (London: Arnold, 1952); M. Cary and T. J. Haarhoff, Life and Thought in the Greek and Roman World (London: Methuen, 1940). On the pre-Alexandrian period in particular, see M. Smith, Palestinian Parties and Politics that Shaped the Old Testament (London: SCM, 1987), 43–61.

<sup>79</sup> See F. W. Walbank, The Hellenistic World (Glasgow: Fontana, 1981), 60–78.

various levels of religious separatism and assimilation as they confronted a highly religious Roman world.

The question of the Hellenism of Palestine has been a more highly contested issue, however. There are certainly significant amounts of evidence that have been discussed in relation to Hellenism and Palestine. The question is how one assesses this evidence to see whether it indicates that the culture had become Hellenized. As a result, there have been various attempts to marshal and assess evidence regarding Hellenism in relation to the Jews of the first century. Jonathan Goldstein has formulated six criteria that he believes would claim common consent:<sup>80</sup>

1. Hellenism, to him “implies that some Greeks are present, and that the non-Greeks have some contacts with them,” even in an environment that is not expressly Greek.<sup>81</sup>
2. There is some knowledge and use of Greek as a language.
3. There was development of “rational philosophies” that were often “skeptical of traditional religion.”
4. Hellenism “typically produced highly emotional epic, dramatic, and lyric poetry.”
5. Greek gymnasias were built for purposes of athletics and education.
6. There were Greek architectural products, such as stadiums and theaters.

Goldstein has discussed these six criteria in terms of four strategic periods in the history of Judaism. There are several conclusions that he reaches that are of importance in determining whether the context of Jesus was Hellenistic.

---

<sup>80</sup> See J. A. Goldstein, Semites, Iranians, Greeks, and Romans: Studies in their Interactions, BJS 217 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1990) 6. This essay was earlier published as “Jewish Acceptance and Rejection of Hellenism,” in Jewish and Christian Self-Definition, II: Aspects of Judaism in the Graeco-Roman Period, ed. E. P. Sanders with A. I. Baumgarten and A. Mendelson (London: SCM, 1981), 64–87. Cf. Barclay, Jews in the Mediterranean Diaspora, 88–90.

<sup>81</sup> I take it that Goldstein means here by Greeks not only Greeks proper but those who are non-Jews and part of the Greco-Roman world, and who spoke Greek, as he includes Herod in his discussion. There were relatively few actual Greeks in the Roman world of the time, with the vast majority of those who were promoters of Hellenism not being Greek at all (e.g. Alexander himself).

1. Goldstein finds that none of the six criteria is forbidden expressly in the Hebrew Bible.<sup>82</sup> Even though some Jews would reject such cultural influence, others would embrace it, but there was nothing expressly forbidding it.

2. There were others of the first century who resisted Hellenism. Goldstein cites a number of what he calls “conservative Romans” who resisted such influence. There are cases where Greek communities in Italy were isolated and efforts were made to expel them. There were complaints about the use of Greek, even in Rome, and a general contempt for Greek philosophy, even among Roman thinkers such as Cicero, as well as some Greek literature. There was also a resistance to the Greek gymnasium and other forms of architecture.<sup>83</sup>

3. Goldstein notes that there are a number of statements within Jewish literature against non-Jews; however, he further notes that they never reproached things Greek.<sup>84</sup>

In terms of the overall pattern of Hellenism, Goldstein concludes that “The general picture is that the Jews regarded each one—with the exception of participation in the gymnasium and unlimited association with Greeks—as permissible and sometimes even desirable.”<sup>85</sup> It is worth assessing the evidence more closely, if only briefly.

1. Greeks, or at least those who were not Jews and who spoke Greek as a first language, were present in Judea, Galilee and other northern areas in the first century and came into contact with non-Greeks. In the New Testament, we find those called Greeks (e.g. John 12:20–22, where several of Jesus’ disciples are connected with these Greeks; Mark 7:26, where Jesus speaks with a “Greek” woman),<sup>86</sup> Roman officials such as Pilate and centurions (e.g. Acts 21:37), and the Herods and their families and followers, who were Hellenophiles.<sup>87</sup> Jesus is recorded as having many points of contact with Hellenized areas, such as the

<sup>82</sup> Goldstein, Semites, 7.

<sup>83</sup> Ibid., 8–11.

<sup>84</sup> Ibid., 11, 29.

<sup>85</sup> Ibid., 29.

<sup>86</sup> Two other episodes where Jesus encounters Greeks may be his healing of the demoniac on the east side of the Sea of Galilee (Matt 8:28–34), on the basis of a herd of swine being present; and Jesus’ healing a deaf mute (Mark 9:14–27) in the region of the Decapolis. See W. Fairweather, Jesus and the Greeks, or Early Christianity in the Tideway of Hellenism (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1924), 250 n. 1.

<sup>87</sup> On the love of things Greek by the Herods and those around them, see N. Kokinos, The Herodian Dynasty: Origins, Role in Society and Eclipse, JSPS 30 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998), esp. 79–84.

Decapolis, Tyre, Bethsaida (the home of Andrew, Peter and Philip, according to John 1:44; 12:21), and Caesarea Philippi in Gaulanitis, among others, that surrounded Galilee.<sup>88</sup> Extra-biblical evidence notes that there were numerous trade routes through Judea and Galilee, which brought non-Jewish traders from the surrounding Hellenized areas of Roman Egypt and Syria into contact with the local population.<sup>89</sup> Jerusalem itself was an international metropolis,<sup>90</sup> and the courts of Herod, Philip, Archelaus and Antipas attracted visitors from throughout the Roman empire to such cities as Jerusalem, Caesarea, the Hellenized Caesarea Philippi (Pnias), and Sepphoris and Tiberias, both Greek poleis.<sup>91</sup>

2. There was use of Greek throughout Judea and Galilee. The Roman officials, such as Pilate and his commanders (see Acts 21:37), used Greek.<sup>92</sup> The three sons of Herod who came to rule, Archelaus, Philip and Antipas, like their father, were thoroughly Hellenized, having been educated in Rome where they would have learned Greek,<sup>93</sup> and Herod's official historiographer was Nicolaus of Damascus, whose Greek writings have now been virtually lost.<sup>94</sup> There is significant evidence from throughout the territories concerned that Greek was in use. The New Testament records incidents where it is likely that Greek was spoken by Jesus and his followers (e.g. Pilate in Mark 15:1–5 and parallels; the Syro-Phoenician "Greek" woman in Mark 7:24–30),<sup>95</sup> and Acts 6:1, 9 bear witness to Greek-speaking Jews and a synagogue

<sup>88</sup> See H. Hoehner, Herod Antipas (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1972), 317–318, 320–323, 326–327; P. Richardson, Herod: King of the Jews and Friend of the Romans (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1999), 303–304.

<sup>89</sup> See Tcherikover, Hellenistic Civilization, 90, 91–116 on Greek towns in Palestine. For maps of the trade routes, see J. Monson, Student Map Manual: Historical Geography of the Bible Lands (Jerusalem: Pictorial Archive, 1979) maps 12–1, 12–2, 12–3.

<sup>90</sup> Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus, 58–71, esp. 63–64, where he notes, among others, that Herod had Thracian (Greek) soldiers as his bodyguards (see Josephus, Ant. 17.198; War 1.672).

<sup>91</sup> Hengel, Hellenization, 14; cf. Hoehner, Herod Antipas, 84–87, 90–100.

<sup>92</sup> H. I. Marrou, A History of Education in Antiquity, trans. G. Lamb (London: Sheed and Ward, 1956), 256.

<sup>93</sup> Marrou, History of Education, 255–256; cf. Kokkinos, Herodian Dynasty, 123–126.

<sup>94</sup> See E. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ, 3 vols., rev. G. Vermes et al. (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1973–87), 1:28–32.

<sup>95</sup> I argue in more detail for these and other episodes in Porter, Criteria for Authenticity and "Luke 17.11–19 and the Criteria for Authenticity Revisited," JSHJ 1.2 (2003): 201–224. See also the article on Jesus and the Use of Greek in these volumes.

in Jerusalem. There are also a number of important first-century Greek inscriptions from the territories concerned.<sup>96</sup> Most of these inscriptions make sense only if there were those who used Greek in these areas to read and respond to them. The Temple inscription warned foreigners in Greek to stay outside of the Temple precinct,<sup>97</sup> the pre-70 CE Theodotos inscription indicates that a Greek-speaker was a benefactor of a synagogue,<sup>98</sup> an imperial decree found in Nazareth warns in Greek against desecrating tombs,<sup>99</sup> and a significant percentage (c. 40%) of the funerary inscriptions from the early Roman period in Jerusalem are in Greek,<sup>100</sup> among other possible evidence.<sup>101</sup>

3. Two examples of the kind of rationalistic philosophies Goldstein mentions can be cited. One is the influence of such thought on the Essenes and more particularly on the Qumran documents. Hengel notes that the War Scroll reflects Hellenistic military tactics, the Qumran community assumed the shape of what resembles a private association, they adopted the “doctrine of two spirits,” they took on a wide variety of astrological and magically related practices and beliefs, and the Temple Scroll has systematic features reflecting Hellenistic

---

<sup>96</sup> M. A. Chancey (Greco-Roman Culture and the Galilee of Jesus, SNTSMS 134 [Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2005], 135–137) wants to minimize the Greek evidence from inscriptions in Galilee. However, by his own reckoning there are fewer Semitic inscriptions. He also must admit: “... few, if any, scholars would argue that Greek was spoken nowhere in Galilee” (124) and “Obviously, at least some Herodian administrators and supporters did [use Greek]. The use of Greek on Herodian coins shows that officials could speak and/or read it... At least some elites in Sepphoris and Tiberias had facility in Greek” (162). He claims to wish to dispute the notion that use of Greek was “widespread” (124). At the end of his discussion of language, he notes that the direct linguistic evidence is limited, but refuses to believe that sociolinguistics can aid discussion (164).

<sup>97</sup> OGIS 2.598; SEG 8.169; CIJ 2.1400. See L. Boffo, Iscrizioni Greche e Latine per lo Studio della Bibbia (Brescia: Paideia, 1994), 283–290.

<sup>98</sup> SEG 8.170; CIJ 2.1404. Boffo, Iscrizioni, 274–282.

<sup>99</sup> SEG 8.13. Boffo, Iscrizioni, 319–333. Chancey (Greco-Roman Culture, 56–58) takes this inscription as post AD 44, when the Romans took direct power in Galilee. However, C. A. Evans (Jesus and the Ossuaries [Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2003], 35–37) dates it to the age of Augustus.

<sup>100</sup> See P. W. van der Horst, Ancient Jewish Epitaphs (Kampen: Kok Pharos, 1991), 129–130.

<sup>101</sup> E.g. the first-century Goliath family of Jericho, with over half of its funerary epitaphs in Greek, and the first-century Nicanor tomb inscription: see R. Hachlili, Jewish Funerary Customs, Practices and Rites in the Second Temple Period (Leiden: Brill, 2005), 178–188, 172–173; and pagan temple inscriptions from Mount Hermon dating to the first or second centuries CE: S. Dar and N. Kokkinos, “The Greek Inscriptions from Senaim on Mount Hermon,” PEQ (January-June 1992): 9–25.

rationalism.<sup>102</sup> The second example is Ben Sira, who reflects Stoic thought with his use of the two ways doctrine.<sup>103</sup>

4. As for the literature of the time, Goldstein himself cites the example of translating the book of Esther from Hebrew into Greek, into a work that fits “the patterns of Greek romances.”<sup>104</sup> Other examples that can be cited: 1 Maccabees, which Hengel characterizes as a “piece of Hasmonaean propaganda,” was probably translated in Palestine; 1 Esdras was probably translated in Palestine, and there given its “novelistic additions,” according to Hengel; Jason of Cyrene “composed a highly rhetorical work in five books” (used by 2 Maccabees), writing outside of Palestine though as an eyewitness to events there; the Tobiad Romance is preserved by Josephus (see Ant. 12.154–224, 228–238); and the Testament of Joseph appears to have “strong echoes of the Greek Phaedra legend in the version in Euripides’ Hippolytus.”<sup>105</sup> Other works might be cited as well.<sup>106</sup>

5. The construction of gymnasia is the one area where Goldstein believes that there is no confirmed evidence during the time with which we are concerned. There was a gymnasium in Jerusalem in the second century BCE (see 2 Macc 4.7–10). Most scholars believe this institution had disappeared by the time of the first century; however, Duane Roller thinks that the xystos mentioned by Josephus (War 2.344) as being near the Temple (War 5.144) was “perhaps the Hellenistic gymnasium of the second century BC.”<sup>107</sup> We do know that Herod brought games to Jerusalem.<sup>108</sup> Herod built a number of gymnasia elsewhere (e.g. Ptolemais and Damascus),<sup>109</sup> but apparently he did not build any in Judea or Galilee. It is perhaps possible that in the

<sup>102</sup> Hengel, Hellenization, 47–48. See also M. Hengel, “Qumran and Hellenism,” in Religion in the Dead Sea Scrolls, ed. J. J. Collins and R. A. Kugler (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2000), 46–56.

<sup>103</sup> Hengel, Hellenization, 48.

<sup>104</sup> Goldstein, Semites, 29. See E. J. Bickerman, “The Colophon of the Greek Book of Esther,” in his Studies in Jewish and Christian History, 2 vols. (Leiden: Brill, 2007), 1:218–237.

<sup>105</sup> On the above examples, see Hengel, Hellenization, 25–28 (quotations, pp. 25, 28). On the Tobiad Romance, see E. J. Bickerman, The Jews in the Greek Age (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1988), 231–234.

<sup>106</sup> See Schürer, History, 3.509–566, for possibilities.

<sup>107</sup> D. W. Roller, The Building Program of Herod the Great (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998), 178.

<sup>108</sup> Schürer, History, 2.55.

<sup>109</sup> See Schürer, History, 2.47.

first or second century a gymnasium was built at Tiberias, although this is open to dispute.<sup>110</sup>

6. The Herodian building program is well known, with many stadiums and theaters being built, including in Judea and Galilee.<sup>111</sup>

The evidence certainly seems to confirm a high degree of Hellenization of Judaism, even during the first century CE, and throughout Judea and Galilee.

4. The Relation of Judaism and Hellenism: Reformulation of the Dichotomy

Rather than thinking of Judaism or Hellenism as the context for Jesus, or even Judaism and Hellenism as the proper context, I would suggest that a reformulation of the dichotomy is necessary. There are several ways that this might be done. One fairly recent book is entitled: The Jews among the Greeks and Romans.<sup>112</sup> This is one way of formulating the relationship of Judaism and Hellenism. I believe that this still perhaps retains a divide that should be rethought. Another, as already noted above, would be to think in terms of Judaism within Hellenism. There are a number of implications of this reformulation that are worth broaching, even if they cannot be explored in sufficient detail here.

1. Hellenism is seen to constitute the larger world in which Judaism was a part. We have focused in this essay upon the Judaism and Hellenism of Judea and Galilee, but this could be extended to include Judaism and Hellenism within the larger Mediterranean world of the first century. In either case, I believe that it is proper to think of Judaism as within Hellenism. Hellenism provides the overarching cultural, linguistic, educational and socio-economic framework in which Judaism existed, wither inside or outside of Palestine.

---

<sup>110</sup> See Chancey, Greco-Roman Culture, 89.

<sup>111</sup> See Richardson, Herod, 197–202, for a list. See also Roller, Building Program, 125–238, for a catalogue of his building achievements.

<sup>112</sup> M. H. Williams, The Jews among the Greeks and Romans: A Diasporan Sourcebook (London: Duckworth, 1998).

2. This framework retains the distinctive features of Judaism. Judaism retains its own identity within the larger Hellenized world of which it is a part. There will be different dimensions of Judaism that will relate to Hellenism in various ways. As noted above, there was resistance to the kind of public display associated with the gymnasium, which probably accounts for the relatively little evidence of building of gymnasia in Palestine in the first century. However, in other regards, Judaism was more closely integrated with the prevailing culture, such as its economy, its politics, and even its creation of literature in Greek. The formulation does not prejudge how these various factors relate to each other, but it does force a recognition and individualized treatment of them.

3. Finally, this formulation creates a meaningful prioritization regarding how to discuss the two. One can discuss Hellenism without necessarily discussing Judaism, except as one wishes to focus on one particular geographical location (e.g. Jews in Rome or Corinth), or one particular ethnic group within the larger empire. However, one cannot speak of Judaism of the first century without seeing it within the larger framework of Hellenism. In that sense, Judaism is not simply “among” the Greeks and Romans, as if it can be sifted out, but “within” the Greeks and Romans, intertwined in ways that interface with each other.

In her summary of the issues, Tessa Rajak acknowledges that the evidence marshaled by those in support of Hellenism is overwhelming, yet she also acknowledges that on specific issues Judaism retained its identity. As she states, “if the debate about the Hellenization of the Jews has seemed inconclusive, this, I would further suggest, is because both sides are right in their own terms. The quest for resolution may then be superfluous, since the agendas are simply disparate.” By this she means that the “cumulative impact” of the data regarding Hellenism is “incontrovertible,” but that one may still select instances of “difference between the Jews and their conquerors, or even their neighbours.”<sup>113</sup> This perhaps strikes the best balance between the two. It is not simply either/or or both/and; it is instead yes, but...

---

<sup>113</sup> T. Rajak, The Jewish Dialogue with Greece and Rome: Studies in Cultural and Social Interaction (Leiden: Brill, 2001), 5.

5. Conclusion

Within the framework of Judaism within Hellenism, one must then ask the question where Jesus fits. As the history of scholarship above shows, in one sense the on-going quest for Jesus in terms of his relation to his surrounding cultures has always recognized and explored the Jewishness of Jesus. This is not something new to a supposed Third Quest, but has been a factor for at least one hundred or more years. If anything, appreciation for the Hellenistic context in which Jesus lived has been brought to the fore over the last thirty to forty years, as scholars have explored the post-classical world and come to terms with the spread of Hellenism to the furthest reaches of the Roman empire. It is within this context that the question of Jesus' relation to Judaism and Hellenism must be asked and answered.

THE TRANSMISSION OF THE JESUS TRADITION

SAMUEL BYRSKOG

It is a curious phenomenon of recent research into the historical Jesus that the contours of how the Jesus tradition emerged and developed rarely are given much attention. The criteria for historical reconstruction have aroused considerably more interest. They are dealt with in separate studies by scholars engaged in the third quest and regularly discussed in books about the historical Jesus.<sup>1</sup> These criteria need to be corroborated with a view as to how tradition functions. The debate about the tradition history is however mostly conducted independently of the history-of-Jesus research and only casually incorporated into this field of study. James D. G. Dunn's recent book on Jesus is a splendid exception and stands out precisely as an attempt to apply consistently an articulated perspective on the Jesus tradition. It is significant, however, that his history of research concerning oral tradition lists mainly scholars who have not conducted extensive study of the historical Jesus.<sup>2</sup> This very modest discussion among scholars of the third quest is all the more remarkable as there is no consensus about tradition and transmission in early Christianity.

Even if no consensus is in view, and precisely because of this, each person with a scientific interest in the historical Jesus needs to declare how s/he looks at the pre-gospel tradition. Almost no scholar would deny that the documents which we employ as sources betray a use of traditional material and that this material presents the avenue from the gospels back to Jesus. History is available in the form of traditional accounts, and to enter the road of tradition means entering into a landscape of intricate and subtle means of communication. It is appropriate therefore to try as clearly as possible to give a view of the contours of that landscape.

---

<sup>1</sup> The most influential book on this subject is by Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter, Die Kriterienfrage in der Jesusforschung: Vom Differenzkriterium zum Plausibilitätskriterium, NTOA 34 (Freiburg [CH]: Universitätsverlag and Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997).

<sup>2</sup> Jesus Remembered, Christianity in the Making 1 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003), 192–210. Dunn mentions J. G. Herder, Rudolf Bultmann, C. F. D. Moule, Helmut Koester, Birger Gerhardsson, Werner Kelber, Richard A. Horsley and J. Draper, and Kenneth Bailey.

1. Tradition and Tradition—Definitions

A basic point is what we mean by tradition and transmission. For the sake of theoretical clarity, it is appropriate to speak of “tradition” as that which is being transmitted and “transmission” as denoting the process of preserving and handing on the tradition.<sup>3</sup> However, the two words—lat. traditum and traditio—describe something which cannot be strictly separated.<sup>4</sup> There is no tradition without transmission and there is no transmission without tradition. They define each other mutually to the extent that the characteristics of the one determine the other, producing a kind of circular tradition-historical development. The more or less technical the tradition, the more or less technical its transmission; the more or less technical the transmission, the more or less technical the tradition tends to become. There is a constant interchange between the two.

1.1. Tradition Between the Past and the Present

Tradition can be many things. The sociologist Edward Shils, who cared deeply about the traditional character of modern societies, defined it as “anything which is transmitted or handed down from the past to the present.”<sup>5</sup> This is a broad definition. The decisive criterion of tradition is temporal, focusing on it as something that existed before the situation arises.<sup>6</sup> Not only the pastness of tradition, but also its present dimension is important. The constitutive temporal feature of tradition is precisely that it connects the past with the present. This sociological view is congruent with what is to be learned from socio-cultural anthropology. Jan Vansina stresses the double temporal aspect of

---

<sup>3</sup> The term “transmission” may be replaced with less technical expressions when the actual communication (performance) of tradition is in view.

<sup>4</sup> I am here developing some insights from my study Jesus the Only Teacher: Didactic Authority and Transmission in Ancient Israel, Ancient Judaism and the Matthean Community, ConBNT 24 (Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1994), 20–21.

<sup>5</sup> Tradition (London: Faber and Faber, 1981), 12.

<sup>6</sup> So also Øivind Andersen, “Oral Tradition,” in Jesus and the Oral Gospel Tradition, ed. Henry Wansbrough, JSNTSup 64 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1991), 17–58, at 26.

(oral) traditions: “They are the representations of the past in the present.”<sup>7</sup> They are of the present, he insists, because they are told in the present; and they embody a message from the past, because they are expressions from the past at the same time. One cannot deny either the past or the present in them.

It is important to notice what tradition is not. The definition suggested above is free from a number of characteristics that often are attached to a tradition as it is being used and developed in different settings, but which are not constitutive of it as such. While tradition comes from the past, it does not have to speak about the past or to speak at all; while it might become the manifestation of the collective memory and identity of a group, it does not have to be embraced by a large number of people; while it might be normative for an individual or a group, it does not necessarily carry inherent claims to immediate acceptance; while it can survive the changes of time, it does not have to span over several generations; while it might conform to present concerns, it is not empty of diachronic dimensions. The Jesus tradition integrated several of these characteristics, but when speaking of the material as tradition we are essentially classifying it only as something which is handed down from the past to the present.

1.2. Verbal and Behavioral Tradition

Biblical scholars mostly think of tradition as words conveyed orally or in writing. We tend to discuss it as an object consisting of verbal utterances. This is a narrow understanding of tradition. It springs perhaps from our belief in the written and spoken word as a superior means of communication.

I have suggested that tradition is anything which is handed down from the past to the present, and that it does not have to be written or orally communicated at all. It is essential to realize that verbal tradition is a part of a broader landscape of tradition. It is an expression of inner convictions and values and inextricably connected to other such <sup>7</sup> Oral Tradition as History (London: James Currey, and Nairobi: Heinemann Kenya, 1985), xii. Vansina distinguishes oral tradition from oral history, but there is a significant overlapping between the two. See Samuel Byrskog, Story as History—History as Story: The Gospel Tradition in the Context of Ancient Oral History, WUNT 123 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000, 2001, and Leiden: Brill, 2003), 30–33.

---

traditional manifestations in the form of behaviors and institutions.<sup>8</sup> The words of tradition are not isolated items unto themselves, but interact with various kinds of practices in the context of the collective identity of groups and communities. The transmitters are involved to the extent that the tradition affects their behavior and sense of belonging. These practices and identity formations are also entities of tradition, not merely a form of conveying the verbal tradition, and they form a body of behavioral tradition. They differ from verbal tradition in being appropriated by imitation and social internalization.

2. Form Criticism Revisited

Form criticism constituted the most sustained and influential method of tradition history during the last century. It was essentially an attempt to methodologically trace the traditions of the words and the deeds of Jesus and the narration about him back to their earliest forms. Separate studies of the Gospel of Mark had prepared its way. William Wrede claimed that the framework of the Markan story was the author's own creation.<sup>9</sup> The author had imposed his own patterns on independently circulating units. Karl Ludwig Schmidt examined the Markan framework more thoroughly and came to the conclusion that the gospel narrative is chronologically and geographically unreliable.<sup>10</sup> The words and the narration had to be strictly separated in terms of their traditionality and historicity. Rudolf Bultmann brought these insights further. He divided his analysis of the history of the synoptic tradition into a study of the words and the deeds of Jesus, and the narration about him, and stressed the importance of the various activities in the early church for the creation and development of its differ-

---

<sup>8</sup> Birger Gerhardsson distinguishes between the inner and the outer tradition. The inner tradition has to do with basic convictions and values. The outer tradition manifests the inner tradition as verbal, behavioral, institutional, and material tradition. The material tradition, which was not part of the early Christian tradition, has to do with localities, clothes, equipment, etc., which became necessary for the efficient function of tradition. See Gerhardsson, The Reliability of the Gospel Tradition (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2001), 89–143.

<sup>9</sup> Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien: Zugleich ein Beitrag zum Verständnis des Markusevangeliums (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1901).

<sup>10</sup> Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu: Eine literarkritische Untersuchung zur ältesten Jesusüberlieferung (Berlin: Trowitzsch & Sohn, 1919).

ent parts.<sup>11</sup> Martin Dibelius diverged on several points from Bultmann, being more positively inclined towards tradition in its pastness.<sup>12</sup> Yet his central idea was that all tradition first existed in the preaching directed to non-Christians, to Christians, and to converts and later added to by more developed forms adaptable to other needs in the community.

2.1. Early Critique

Form criticism failed for several reasons as a way to trace the origin and development of the Jesus tradition.<sup>13</sup> Erich Fascher was one of the most outspoken German critics at the time of its advance in Europe and elsewhere. As early as 1924, he questioned the use of form and Sitz im Leben as analytical categories and pointed to the narrow circulus vitiosus of the form-critical method.<sup>14</sup> Fascher's critique went largely unheard at the time. Form criticism was not seriously questioned until Krister Stendahl and Birger Gerhardsson realized that the more advanced use of the Old Testament and the Jesus tradition implied a separate Sitz im Leben of transmission and a more complex correlation between this setting and the formation of traditional units.<sup>15</sup> Ed P. Sanders' attention to the irregularities of transmission was a further

---

<sup>11</sup> Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition, FRLANT 29, 2nd ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1931).

<sup>12</sup> Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums, 2nd ed. (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1933). His sensitivity to the pastness of tradition is evident in a statement concerning paraenesis: "Wie sich im Urchristentum von Anfang an neben enthusiastischen auch nomistische Gedanken gezeigt haben, so steht neben dem pneumatischen Interesse, für das alle christliche Paränese den einen göttlichen Ursprung hat, die Wertschätzung der Tradition, der Authentie und der Autorität" (243).

<sup>13</sup> Rhetorical criticism might be regarded as a modified kind of form criticism. Cf. Klaus Berger, Formgeschichte des Neuen Testaments (Heidelberg: Quelle & Meyer, 1984). The monograph develops insights from Berger's extensive article "Hellenistische Gattungen und Neues Testament," ANRW II 23.2 (1984): 1031–1432.

<sup>14</sup> Die formgeschichtliche Methode: Eine Darstellung und Kritik. Zugleich ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des synoptischen Problems, BZNW 2 (Gießen: Alfred Töpelmann, 1924).

<sup>15</sup> Krister Stendahl, The School of St. Matthew and its Use of the Old Testament, ASNU 20 (Lund: Gleerup, 2d ed., 1968; 1st ed., 1954); Birger Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript: Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity, ASNU 22 (Lund: Gleerup, 1964, reprint of the 1961 ed.; republished: Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, and Livonia: Dove, 1998).

call for caution.<sup>16</sup> Today, the form-critical method has been strongly modified as a method of diachronic inquiry.<sup>17</sup>

2.2. The Notion of Orality

The fundamental correlation between the form of a tradition and its Sitz im Leben was based on a notion of orality which did not take seriously the more advanced and sophisticated strategies of composition and communication in the gospels. Such strategies do not easily yield to a one-dimensional connection between a form and its Sitz im Leben, which was basic to the form-critical method, even less to any attempt to strip away the secondary modifications and trace the tradition back to its pure form.<sup>18</sup>

The insights from folkloristic is still of significance,<sup>19</sup> most recently in Dunn's use of Kenneth E. Bailey's study of the performance of tradition in the gatherings of Arab villages as an explanatory model of the Jesus tradition.<sup>20</sup> It remains unclear how this kind of orality relates to the more advanced patterns of oral composition and communication which have been unveiled in recent studies of the narrative and rhetorical dimensions in the gospels.

2.3. The Concept of Community

The confidence of the form critics in the creative dynamics of the community blinded them to the presence of individuals. What Peter, James,

---

<sup>16</sup> The Tendencies of the Synoptic Tradition, SNTSMS 9 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1969).

<sup>17</sup> The criticism is spelled out more fully in my review of Rudolf Bultmann, The History of the Synoptic Tradition, JBL 122 (2003): 549–555.

