

Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus

Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus

Volume 1

How to Study the Historical Jesus

Edited by

Tom Holmén and Stanley E. Porter

BRILL

LEIDEN • BOSTON
2011

This book is printed on acid-free paper.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication-Data

Handbook for the study of the historical Jesus / edited by Tom Holmén and Stanley E. Porter.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and indexes.

ISBN 978-90-04-16372-0 (hardback : alk. paper) 1. Jesus Christ—Historicity—
Study and teaching. I. Holmén, Tom. II. Porter, Stanley E., 1956–
BT303.2.H364 2010
232.9'08071—dc22

2010038765

ISBN Vol. 1: 978 90 04 17091 9

Vol. 2: 978 90 04 17092 6

Vol. 3: 978 90 04 17093 3

Vol. 4: 978 90 04 17094 0

Set: 978 90 04 16372 0

Copyright 2011 by Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, The Netherlands.

Koninklijke Brill NV incorporates the imprints Brill, Hotei Publishing, IDC Publishers, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers and VSP.

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, translated, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without prior written permission from the publisher.

Authorization to photocopy items for internal or personal use is granted by Koninklijke Brill NV provided that the appropriate fees are paid directly to The Copyright Clearance Center, 222 Rosewood Drive, Suite 910, Danvers, MA 01923, USA.

Fees are subject to change.

PRINTED IN THE NETHERLANDS

CONTENTS

VOLUME 1

HOW TO STUDY THE HISTORICAL JESUS

Introduction: The Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus in Perspective .....	xv
TOM HOLMÉN AND STANLEY E. PORTER

PART ONE

CONTEMPORARY METHODOLOGICAL APPROACHES

How to Marginalize the Traditional Criteria of Authenticity .....	3
DALE C. ALLISON, JR.
Fourth Quest? What Did Jesus Really Want? .....	31
ERNST BAASLAND
The Search for Jesus' Special Profile .....	57
JÜRGEN BECKER
The Historical Jesus: How to Ask Questions and Remain Inquisitive .....	91
JAMES H. CHARLESWORTH
Method in a Critical Study of Jesus .....	129
BRUCE D. CHILTON
Context and Text in Historical Jesus Methodology .....	159
JOHN DOMINIC CROSSAN
Remembering Jesus: How the Quest of the Historical Jesus Lost its Way .....	183
JAMES D. G. DUNN
Jesus-in-Context: A Relational Approach .....	207
RICHARD A. HORSLEY
Sources, Methods and Discursive Locations in the Quest of the Historical Jesus .....	241
JOHN S. KLOPPENBORG
Basic Methodology in the Quest for the Historical Jesus .....	291
JOHN P. MEIER

Jesus Research as Feedback on His Wirkungsgeschichte .....	333
PETR POKORNÝ
The Role of Greek Language Criteria in Historical Jesus Research .....	361
STANLEY E. PORTER
From the Messianic Teacher to the Gospels of Jesus Christ .....	405
RAINER RIESNER
The Gospel of the Historical Jesus .....	447
JAMES M. ROBINSON
Scholarly Rigor and Intuition in Historical Research into Jesus .....	475
JACQUES SCHLOSSER
Critical Feminist Historical-Jesus Research .....	509
ELISABETH SCHÜSSLER FIORENZA
Historical Scepticism and the Criteria of Jesus Research: My Attempt to Leap Over Lessing's Ugly Wide Ditch .....	549
GERD THEISSEN
A Metalanguage for the Historical Jesus Methods: An Experiment .....	589
TOM HOLMÉN

PART TWO

VARIOUS ASPECTS OF HISTORICAL
JESUS METHODOLOGY

With the Grain and against the Grain: A Strategy for Reading the Synoptic Gospels .....	619
COLIN BROWN
Form Criticism and Jesus Research .....	649
ARLAND J. HULTGREN
Tradition Criticism and Jesus Research .....	673
GRANT R. OSBORNE
The Criteria of Authenticity .....	695
STANLEY E. PORTER
Alternatives to Form and Tradition Criticism in Jesus Research .....	715
TOBIAS NICKLAS
Social-Scientific Approaches and Jesus Research .....	743
BRUCE J. MALINA

New Literary Criticism and Jesus Research .....	777
ELIZABETH STRUTHERS MALBON
Memory Theory and Jesus Research .....	809
ALAN KIRK
The Burden of Proof in Jesus Research .....	843
DAGMAR WINTER

VOLUME 2

THE STUDY OF JESUS

Introduction: The Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus in Perspective .....	xv
TOM HOLMÉN AND STANLEY E. PORTER

PART ONE

THE ONGOING QUEST FOR THE HISTORICAL JESUS

The Quest of the Unhistorical Jesus and the Quest of the Historical Jesus .....	855
COLIN BROWN
Futures for the Jesus Quests .....	887
BENGT HOLMBERG
The Parable of the Goose and the Mirror: The Historical Jesus in the Theological Discipline .....	919
SCOT MCKNIGHT
Historical Jesus Research in Global Cultural Context .....	953
TERESA OKURE
Diverse Agendas at Work in the Jesus Quest .....	985
CLIVE MARSH
Jesus of Nazareth and the Christ of Faith: Approaches to the Question in Historical Jesus Research .....	1021
SVEN-OLAV BACK
The Jesus Quest and Jewish-Christian Relations .....	1055
DONALD A. HAGNER
Historic Jesuses .....	1079
CEES DEN HEYER

PART TWO

CURRENT QUESTIONS OF JESUS RESEARCH

Jesus and Cynicism .....	1105
F. GERALD DOWNING
Jesus and the Scriptures of Israel .....	1137
STEVE MOYISE
Implicit Christology and the Historical Jesus .....	1169
EDWIN K. BROADHEAD
Jesus and the “Partings of the Ways” .....	1183
MICHAEL F. BIRD
Prophet, Sage, Healer, Messiah, and Martyr: Types and Identities of Jesus .....	1217
CRAIG A. EVANS
Jesus im Licht der Qumrangemeinde .....	1245
HEINZ-WOLFGANG KUHN
Jesus without Q .....	1287
MICHAEL GOULDER
Dispensing with the Priority of Mark .....	1313
DAVID L. DUNGAN
The Role of Aramaic in Reconstructing the Teaching of Jesus ...	1343
MAURICE CASEY
The Quest for the Historical Jesus in Postmodern Perspective: A Hypothetical Argument .....	1377
MOISÉS MAYORDOMO AND PETER-BEN SMIT
Why Study the Historical Jesus? .....	1411
COLIN BROWN

PART THREE

PERSISTING ISSUES ADJACENT TO THE JESUS QUEST

The Context of Jesus: Jewish and/or Hellenistic? .....	1441
STANLEY E. PORTER
The Transmission of the Jesus Tradition .....	1465
SAMUEL BYRSKOG
Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes, Herodians .....	1495
ÉTIENNE NODET
The Son of Man in Ancient Judaism .....	1545
JOHN J. COLLINS

Jewish Apocalyptic and Apocalypticism .....	1569
CRISPIN FLETCHER-LOUIS
Anti-Judaism and the New Testament .....	1609
LUKE TIMOTHY JOHNSON
The Writings of Josephus: Their Significance for New Testament Study .....	1639
STEVE MASON
Rabbinic Writings in New Testament Research .....	1687
DAVID INSTONE-BREWER
Synagogue and Sanhedrin in the First Century .....	1723
LESTER L. GRABBE
Echoes from the Wilderness: The Historical John the Baptist ....	1747
KNUT BACKHAUS
Historiographical Literature in the New Testament Period (1st and 2nd centuries CE) .....	1787
EVE-MARIE BECKER

VOLUME 3

THE HISTORICAL JESUS

Introduction: The Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus in Perspective .....	xv
TOM HOLMÉN AND STANLEY E. PORTER

PART ONE

JESUS TRADITION IN INDIVIDUAL DOCUMENTS

The Historical Jesus in the Gospel of Mark .....	1821
JOANNA DEWEY
Jesus Tradition in non-Markan Material Common to Matthew and Luke .....	1853
CHRISTOPHER TUCKETT
The Special Material in Matthew's Gospel .....	1875
DONALD SENIOR, C.P.
Luke and Acts .....	1901
JOHN NOLLAND
The Non-Synoptic Jesus: An Introduction to John, Paul, Thomas, and Other Outsiders of the Jesus Quest .....	1933
MICHAEL LABAHN

Jesus Tradition in the Gospel of John .....	1997
D. MOODY SMITH
Jesus Tradition in the Letters of the New Testament .....	2041
DAVID WENHAM
The Thomas-Jesus Connection .....	2059
EDWIN K. BROADHEAD
Traditions about Jesus in Apocryphal Gospels (with the Exception of the Gospel of Thomas) .....	2081
TOBIAS NICKLAS
Jesus Tradition in Early Patristic Writings .....	2119
RIEMER ROUKEMA
Jesus Tradition in Classical and Jewish Writings .....	2149
ROBERT E. VAN VOORST

PART TWO

FUNDAMENTALLY ABOUT JESUS

The Historicity of Jesus: How Do We Know That Jesus Existed? .....	2183
SAMUEL BYRSKOG
Background I: Jesus of History and the Topography of the Holy Land .....	2213
JAMES H. CHARLESWORTH
Background II: (Some) Literary Documents .....	2243
MARTIN MCNAMARA
Background III: The Social and Political Climate in which Jesus of Nazareth Preached .....	2291
WOLFGANG STEGEMANN
The Chronology of Jesus .....	2315
HAROLD W. HOEHNER
The Birth of Jesus .....	2361
RICHARD T. FRANCE
The Death of Jesus .....	2383
JOEL B. GREEN
The Resurrection of Jesus .....	2409
PHEME PERKINS
Family, Friends, and Foes .....	2433
JOEL B. GREEN

The Language(s) Jesus Spoke .....	2455
STANLEY E. PORTER
The Self-Understanding of Jesus .....	2473
MATHIAS KREPLIN
The Message of Jesus I: Miracles, Continuing Controversies .....	2517
GRAHAM H. TWELFTREE
The Message of Jesus II: Parables .....	2549
ARLAND J. HULTGREN

PART THREE

JESUS AND THE LEGACY OF ISRAEL

Jesus and God .....	2575
MARIANNE MEYE THOMPSON
Jesus and The Sabbath .....	2597
SVEN-OLAV BACK
Jesus and the Temple .....	2635
JOSTEIN ÅDNA
Jesus and the Shema .....	2677
KIM HUAT TAN
Jesus and the Purity Paradigm .....	2709
TOM HOLMÉN
Jesus and the Law .....	2745
WILLIAM LOADER
Jesus and the Holy Land .....	2773
KAREN J. WENELL
Jesus and Sinners and Outcasts .....	2801
BRUCE CHILTON
Jesus and Israel's Eschatological Constitution .....	2835
STEVEN M. BRYAN
Jesus, Satan, and Company .....	2855
DARRELL BOCK
Jesus and Apocalypticism .....	2877
CRISPIN FLETCHER-LOUIS

VOLUME 4

INDIVIDUAL STUDIES

Introduction: The Handbook for Study of the Historical Jesus in Perspective .....	xv
TOM HOLMÉN AND STANLEY E. PORTER
The “Dark Side of Power”—Beelzebul: Manipulated or Manipulator? Reflections on the History of a Conflict in the Traces Left in the Memory of its Narrators .....	2911
MICHAEL LABAHN
Did Jesus Break the Fifth (Fourth) Commandment? .....	2947
PETER BALLA
Did Jesus Stay at Bethsaida? Arguments from Ancient Texts and Archaeology for Bethsaida and et-Tell .....	2973
HEINZ-WOLFGANG KUHN
Flawed Heroes and Stories Jesus Told: The One About a Man Wanting to Kill .....	3023
CHARLES W. HEDRICK
Jesus and Magic: The Question of the Miracles .....	3057
BERND KOLLMANN
Jesus and the Greeks: A Semiotic Reading of John 12:20–28 .....	3087
JOSEPH PATHRAPANKAL
Jesus and the Synagogue .....	3105
GRAHAM H. TWELFTREE
Jesus and the Ten Words .....	3135
HERMUT LOEHR
Jesus as Moving Image: The Public Responsibility of the Historical Jesus Scholar in the Age of Film .....	3155
CLIVE MARSH
Jesus’ “Magic” from a Theodicean Perspective .....	3179
TOM HOLMÉN
Jesus’ “Rhetoric”: The Rise and Fall of “The Kingdom of God” .....	3201
JAMES M. ROBINSON
Jewish Galilee .....	3221
ETIENNE NODET
On Avoiding Bothersome Busyness: Q/Luke 12:22–31 in its Greco-Roman Context .....	3245
GERALD DOWNING

Poverty and Wealth in Jesus and the Jesus Tradition .....	3269
HEINZ GIESEN
The Question of the Baptists' Disciples on Fasting (Matt 9:14–17; Mark 2:18–22; Luke 5:33–39) .....	3305
RAINER RIESNER
Riddles, Wit, and Wisdom .....	3349
TOM THATCHER
Three Questions about the Life of Jesus .....	3373
CHRISTIAN-BERNARD AMPHOUX
Why Was Jesus Not Born in Nazareth? .....	3409
ARMAND PUIG I TÀRRECH
Words of Jesus in Paul: On the Theology and Praxis of the Jesus Tradition .....	3437
PETR POKORNÝ
Index of Ancient Sources .....	3469
Index of Modern Authors .....	3605

INTRODUCTION

THE HANDBOOK FOR THE STUDY OF THE HISTORICAL JESUS IN PERSPECTIVE

TOM HOLMÉN AND STANLEY E. PORTER

A hundred years ago, Albert Schweitzer gathered the bulk of the most important (mostly German) Jesus research done during the preceding two centuries (the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries) within one cover and made an assessment of it. Today, to write a summa historica of Jesus studies is not an undertaking that one person could embark on and realistically hope to accomplish (not even two people), but requires a collaboration of a legio of the best minds from across many countries and cultures. Albert Schweitzer's Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung<sup>1</sup> marked a significant milestone in historical Jesus scholarship, a movement that has continued in various forms and in diverse ways, but in all events unabated, until today. As a result, in a 1994 article, James Charlesworth, who himself has been actively involved in the recent expansion of historical Jesus study, asserted that historical Jesus study was expanding with "chaotic creativity."<sup>2</sup> While an apt and appropriate description of the condition of the times, this characterization is all the more accurate today, fifteen years later. Since its latest renaissance in the 1980s,<sup>3</sup> historical Jesus study has continued to expand, drawing into its broadening scope more and more scholars of the New Testament and cognate areas. There is an abundance of Jesus studies today that displays an almost overwhelming diversity of methods, approaches, hypotheses, assumptions, and results. While creativity and fecundity are theoretically

---

<sup>1</sup> A. Schweitzer, Von Reimarus zu Wrede: Eine Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1906). The second edition was simply entitled: Die Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung (1913). The English translation was entitled: The Quest for the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede, trans. W. Montgomery, with a preface by F. C. Burkitt (London: Adam and Charles Black, 1910).

<sup>2</sup> J. H. Charlesworth, "Jesus Research Expands with Chaotic Creativity," in Images of Jesus Today, ed. J. H. Charlesworth and W. P. Weaver (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1994), 1–41.

<sup>3</sup> See M. J. Borg, "A Renaissance in Jesus Studies," TheoIT 45 (1988): 280–292.

to be welcomed, chaotic creativity works against the scholarly pursuit of orderly understanding, and the sheer mass of material threatens to overwhelm even the heartiest of participants in the quest. However, in some instances such creativity can spur on and nourish various forms of enquiry that result in unpredictable and unplanned results. The future of historical Jesus study rests with the community of scholars being able to harness this chaotic creativity to its service, and to create order out of a morass of growing detail.

What are the purposes of Jesus research? The first one is clearly an abiding academic purpose. This has always been regarded as important and has, together with the latest renaissance of Jesus study, only grown in importance. In fact, if “academic” and “historical” can be seen to correlate, many scholars would claim that this is what the study of Jesus today is all about. According to many representative Jesus questers, a main characteristic of current Jesus research is that it is being spurred and guided by an outspoken historical interest. Indeed, Jesus lies at the juncture of many interests and phenomena that are crucial to understanding great lines of historical development and that form the basis of understanding the world today. There is therefore no doubt about the great historical and academic value of Jesus research. However, several other purposes, motivations, and aspirations obviously feed into the historical pursuit of Jesus. Among these are religious, political, cultural, artistic, fictional, romantic, psychological, financial, apologetic, and simply personal reasons to engage in conversing about Jesus of Nazareth. We merely state this as an observable fact: such purposes for Jesus research exist and are being pursued in practice. Unfortunately, sometimes scholars too easily classify such purposes as either well- or ill-founded. In the post-colonial, post-Einsteinian, post-modern, post-structural (some say even post-human) etc. world of ours, who can be so clear as to be able to tell the difference between relevant and irrelevant motivations, not to speak of labeling them as either good or bad? Nevertheless, in all this it is vital to genuinely retain the concepts of historical Jesus and historical Jesus research around which the variegated conversation centers and revolves. How this happens and is realized may not be an easy or altogether straightforward thing to do.

The Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus (HSHJ) was designed to be one, important means of handling both the growing abundance and the increasing diversity of Jesus scholarship. Such is not an easy task, as we the editors have grown to appreciate in the course of creating this set of volumes. Putting the diversity on display in a controlled, manageable, and understandable fashion, while acknowledging the numerous and diverse major issues, and ensuring that as many as possible of the important adjacent themes are recognized, has been a significant task. The HSHJ seeks to offer a convenient, even if still circuitous, route through the maze of current historical Jesus research, so that scholars and other interested parties can appreciate the broad and diverse spectrum of current opinion.

There have been a number of recent efforts to survey the history of historical Jesus scholarship, which we have taken into account in planning these volumes. Some of these publications have included individual essays that try to cover the range of major topics, although no effort to date has included as many as this set of volumes.<sup>4</sup> Several of these studies are retrospective accounts that anthologize past statements of significance in the study of the historical Jesus, but they lack the contemporary coordinating force of the HSHJ.<sup>5</sup> Even those publications that attempt to address the contemporary issues in historical Jesus research in a coordinated fashion, because of their encyclopedic nature, are unable to provide the kind of depth and even breadth of exposure that these volumes contain.<sup>6</sup> Whatever merits such previous volumes may have, and they have many, none of them is designed to accomplish the same goals as the Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus.

There are many distinguishable features of the HSHJ. This collection of four volumes of essays first of all seeks to be thorough and inclusive. We realize that there are always other opinions that could be included in volumes such as these, but we have tried to solicit and elicit as much of that diverse opinion as was available for publication. We want this collection to serve, not only as a historical encapsulation of the topics of their day, but as a worthy expression of the range of viable thought currently available in historical Jesus studies.

Besides the inclusive nature of these volumes, we have sought for HSHJ to be international in scope, not simply for the sake of diversity,

---

<sup>4</sup> E.g. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, eds., Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, NTTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994).

<sup>5</sup> See, e.g., H. K. McArthur, ed., In Search of the Historical Jesus (New York: Scribners, 1969); G. W. Dawes, ed., The Historical Jesus Quest: A Foundational Anthology (Leiden: Deo, 1999); C. A. Evans, ed., The Historical Jesus: Critical Concepts in Religious Studies, 4 vols. (London: Routledge, 2004); J. D. G. Dunn and S. McKnight, eds., The Historical Jesus in Recent Research, Sources for Biblical and Theological Study 10 (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2005).

<sup>6</sup> E.g. C. A. Evans, ed., Encyclopedia of the Historical Jesus (London: Routledge, 2007).

but so that multiple voices can be ably represented in the discussion. The approximately one-hundred contributors to this project come from around twenty different countries. Some countries no doubt are represented more heavily than others, and some other important nationalities may be under-represented or not represented at all. This was not by design, as our purpose from the start has been to try to free the discussion of Jesus from regional or local agendas and schools of thought.

Besides the multiplicity of voices from a wide range of places and people, in the HSHJ we have sought to free study of the historical Jesus from the trammels of a variety of other restraints. We have been conscious that study of Jesus in the past has been directly linked to particular forms and contents of higher education, and even specific methodologies, and that such study has often gone hand-in-hand with particular religious, cultural or even political traditions and histories. This set of volumes has been created to move beyond, or perhaps even rise above, such artificially imposed constraints. As a result, though ideologies will no doubt be present in the individual contributions, the volumes as a whole are not reacting or responding to any particular local or even nationally determined situation with regard to historical Jesus study. Our primary criterion in selecting and welcoming the contributors has been their expertise and their addressing a topic of relevance. Despite our best efforts, there is no doubt that most of the contributors are still “white male western Europeans and European-Americans” (as Richard Horsley states).<sup>7</sup> We accept this comment, while acknowledging also that our best efforts were put into attempts not to fall victim to this as an inevitable conclusion. Nevertheless, it is probably a realistic observation of the situation that prevails in historical Jesus studies to this day. Whether it will be different in the future, we must wait and see.

The efforts above have been undertaken so that we could focus these volumes on what we consider the most important elements in current study of the historical Jesus. In order to do this, we have divided the essays into four structured volumes.

As a result of this process of assessment, what became evident was that one of the most important sources of continued diversity in historical Jesus study is the element of methodological divergence. Methodological diversity entails the formulation of varied and disparate conscious approaches to the study of Jesus. Questions of method are inevitably confronted at the outset of any scientific or historical investigation, and usually indicate the significant parting of the ways between differing approaches to the same body of data. Consequently, volume one of the HSHJ is dedicated to questions of method. Realizing and being knowledgeable of the different methodological starting points in historical Jesus study not only facilitates one's determination and understanding of the results, but also gives important and necessary insight into the reasons for the results and their implications. In other words, attention to method forces us to ask the question of why it is that a particular scholar comes to a specific set of conclusions, as opposed to a different set of conclusions. In this regard, the first volume of HSHJ itself speaks volumes about historical Jesus research. In this volume, we have attempted to assemble many of the world's leading experts on methodological questions regarding the study of Jesus. They present their approaches to study of the historical Jesus as a means of introducing us to the fundamental issues at stake. This is not to deny that there is some challenging reading to be had in this volume, but within this one volume the reader has easier access than before to the range of methods currently at play in historical Jesus studies. By using this volume, scholars and students alike will be able learn about methods with which they are less familiar, compare the major features of these methods, and determine how the varied hypotheses about the historical figure of Jesus are rooted in methodological choices made at the early stages of thinking and research.

---

<sup>7</sup> See his article in volume one.

The first volume is, therefore, divided into two parts. The first part includes a wide range of distinct methodological statements by advocates of those methods. This part encompasses the methods that are distinct to historical Jesus study as it has been practiced over the last twenty to thirty years. It is here that we gain further insight into the approaches that have been adopted by a wide range of scholars who have had influence within historical Jesus study, as they have tried to define the nature and characteristics of the study and its results. Part two of this volume extends the range of methodologies to the interaction between historical Jesus study and methods that have proven themselves in other areas of New Testament and cognates studies. Some of these are the traditional methods of biblical study, while others are recent innovations influenced by the rise of various types of social-science criticism. The interface of Jesus study and these methods has provided a range of results that help to ensure that the study of Jesus will not soon grow quiescent.

The second volume of HSHJ focuses on the history and future of historical Jesus research, by identifying many if not most of the specific issues of contention that have been raised in the broad and long history of Jesus study. This volume is divided into three parts. The first part deals with the notion of quests for the historical Jesus. One of the points of continued contention in study of Jesus is not only whether there are periods in such study, but how current study relates to previous study, in terms of both its methods and its results. Here various authors address the relation of Jesus study to the various quests that have been proposed. The second part of the volume brings to the fore questions that are being asked in the contemporary climate of historical Jesus studies. These include the questions that are currently and recurrently at the forefront of discussion, often suggesting in their questions an alternative to the course that previous research has taken. Part three of this volume addresses some of the perennial topics in Jesus research. In some ways, these are issues that are either assumed or regularly taken into account in formulating various hypotheses about Jesus. They form the convenient and necessary intellectual background for pursuing historical Jesus studies.

The third volume of HSHJ brings Jesus himself as a historical figure directly into the discussion. There are three parts in this volume as well. The first part treats Jesus in regard to primary documents of the ancient world, such as the canonical gospels, other portions of the New Testament, and non-canonical works. The second part of this volume takes the elements of the life of Jesus and exposes them to rigorous critical and scholarly scrutiny. Rather than examine Jesus in terms of how he is depicted in one of the biblical books (as in the previous section of this volume) or in terms of a particular issue, this section dissects the life of Jesus in terms of its logical and necessary components, from issues of historicity to his teaching and message, and many if not most places in between. It is in studies such as these that one realizes the importance of the previous studies and approaches for the explication of these subject areas. These topics bring to bear the variety of issues previously discussed. The third part of this volume relates Jesus to the legacy of Israel. Jesus' Jewish roots and relations have long been an essential item of discussion and contention in historical Jesus studies. In this part, various key elements of his relationship to Israel are scrutinized. The result of this set of studies is to place Jesus firmly within his Jewish context, a desideratum of much recent historical Jesus scholarship.

The fourth and final volume of HSHJ is a collection of individual studies by a range of scholars. It is a positive comment on the state of current historical Jesus study that, even with the best planning and intention, it is difficult, if not impossible, to plan and anticipate all of the necessary topics for such a comprehensive study. Therefore, we have designed this fourth volume to include important studies that we have solicited and have had submitted for which there was no other place in the volume, but that warranted a position in a compendium of scholarship such as this handbook attempts to be. There is a wide range of valuable research to be found in this fourth volume. Some of the studies explore areas for which there has been very little previous Jesus research but in which the author shows there is a lamentable lacking and oversight in the discipline. Others of the studies take topics on the fringe of either Jesus studies or contemporary culture and try to bridge the two in creative and insightful ways. Finally, some of the studies are designed to focus on particular and specific issues that would otherwise have been overlooked in the course of this study, but that a perceptive scholar realized would make a contribution to the final product.

The results of a project such as this are many and varied. We do not doubt that many of the significant contributions to scholarship found in these volumes will establish themselves as standards in the field and continue to have warranted influence on the study of the historical Jesus. Such studies may well be found in any or all of the volumes. We further believe that there are a number of essays that will have uncovered or discovered or even re-discovered insights that have been lost or lost sight of or not yet sighted, and that will bring these into consideration on the broader canvas of historical Jesus studies. There are other essays within these volumes that have broken some boundaries and will establish themselves as new and innovative ways forward in the discussion. The problem is that it is not easy to tell which essays are which, and what the significance of each individual contribution will be. We are confident, however, that these volumes contain, as much as is possible within the parameters of such a project, a responsible and representative, and in some cases even forthright or contrarian, presentation of the current state of historical Jesus scholarship. Such scholarship is the backbone of a project such as this, and is a mainstay of how one approaches contemporary New Testament scholarship. There are essays within this collection that will prove to be seminal for study of the historical Jesus, as they force both sympathetic and unsympathetic readers to contemplate issues and perspectives in ways that were unanticipated. Such scholarship helps to pave the way forward for further research. Its place of final repose cannot be predicted or estimated.

PART ONE

CONTEMPORARY METHODOLOGICAL APPROACHES

HOW TO MARGINALIZE THE TRADITIONAL CRITERIA OF AUTHENTICITY

DALE C. ALLISON, JR.

For several decades now, multiple attestation, dissimilarity, embarrassment, and coherence have been the tools of choice for many scholars seeking to separate the authentic Jesus from the ecclesiastical chaff. One understands why: the standard criteria seem to derive from common sense. For instance, that a tradition should not be thought authentic unless it coheres with traditions otherwise regarded as genuine—the criterion of consistency—seems self-evident. Again, that we may confidently assign a unit to Jesus if it is dissimilar to characteristic emphases both of ancient Judaism and of the early church—the criterion variously known as (double) dissimilarity or distinctiveness or discontinuity—has an initial plausibility. So too does the criterion of embarrassment, according to which a fact or saying is original if there is evidence that it troubled early Christians. And who would challenge the criterion of multiple attestation, according to which the more widely attested a complex is in independent sources, the more likely it is to have originated with Jesus? This is just the old rule of journalism, that each fact should be attested by at least two witnesses.

Reflection, however, foments serious misgivings, and I for one have finally come to believe that our usual criteria are not so useful.<sup>1</sup> There is, for example, nothing objective about coherence. Two assertions that make for harmony in the eyes of one exegete may seem to clash for another. According to some, if Jesus taught his disciples to love their enemies because God loves everyone, including the wicked, then it is unlikely that he also taught anything much about eschatological judgment or hell, despite abundant testimony in the tradition to the contrary.<sup>2</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> In addition to what follows see my earlier discussion in Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1998)—although in the interim I have become even more pessimistic.

<sup>2</sup> James M. Robinson, “The Critical Edition of Q and the Study of Jesus,” in The Sayings Source Q and the Historical Jesus, ed. A. Lindemann, BETL 158 (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 2001), 27–52. The conviction is an old one and already appears in Percy Bysshe Shelley, “On Christianity,” in The Prose Works of Percy Bysshe Shelley,

One understands the point and even sympathizes with the sentiment. Yet what is the justification for assuming that Jesus, who was no systematic theologian or critical philosopher, must have been, to our way of thinking, consistent—especially when Q, Matthew, and Luke are, in this particular matter, not consistent? One can always, as should be obvious in this age of deconstructionism, find tensions or contradictions between two texts. Commentators since Origen have knit their brows over the presence in Paul's letters of justification by faith and judgment by works. Many have espied here a "contradiction," others a "paradox."<sup>3</sup> Whatever the resolution to the issue, Pauline theology is, in one significant respect, in seeming tension with itself. Now students of Paul are stuck with the problem because some of the relevant passages belong to undisputed letters. But who can doubt that, if those letters were instead known to be the end products of an oral tradition that mixed the teachings of Paul with the thoughts of his admirers, some critics would confidently inform us that the remarks on judgment by works, being in conflict with those on justification by faith, must be secondary, or vice versa? The thesis, although reasonable enough, would be erroneous. Likewise erroneous may be our judgments about the many tensions scholars have espied in the Jesus tradition—for example, that between the futurity of the kingdom and its presence<sup>4</sup>—and then used to eject material from its originating source.

The criterion of double dissimilarity, which like our commercials implicitly equates new with improved, is no less troublesome than the criterion of consistency.<sup>5</sup> Its recent Niedergang is long overdue.<sup>6</sup> As oth-

---

vol. 1, ed. E. B. Murray (Oxford: Clarendon, 1993), 246–271. See further my book, Resurrecting Jesus (London: T&T Clark, 2005), the excursus on "Percy Bysshe Shelley and the Historical Jesus," 100–110.

<sup>3</sup> Rudolf Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, vol. 1 (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1951), 75: "It is noteworthy and indicative of the extent to which Paul keeps within the framework of general Christian preaching, that he does not hesitate, in at least seeming contradiction to his doctrine of justification by faith alone, to speak of judgment according to one's works"; H. A. A. Kennedy, St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1904), 201: Paul's invocation of the last judgment is part of a "profound paradox".

<sup>4</sup> Note Robert W. Funk, Roy W. Hoover, and the Jesus Seminar, The Five Gospels: The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus (New York: Macmillan, 1993), 136–137.

<sup>5</sup> For its ideological background, see David S. du Toit, "Der unähnliche Jesus: Eine kritische Evaluierung der Entstehung des Differenzkriteriums und seiner geschichts- und erkenntnistheoretischen Voraussetzungen," in Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. Jens Schröter and Ralph Brucker (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002), 89–129.

<sup>6</sup> See David du Toit, "Erneut auf der Suche nach Jesus: Eine kritische Bestandsaufnahme der Jesusforschung am Anfang des 21. Jahrhunderts," in Jesus im 21. Jahrhundert:

ers have often remarked, it can at best tell us what was distinctive of Jesus, not what was characteristic. Because Jesus lived and moved and had his being within the Jewish tradition, the criterion is not a net that catches fish of every kind: it can find only things that Jesus did not take from elsewhere. All too often, however, dissimilarity has been misused as a means of separating the authentic from the unauthentic, that is, a way of eliminating items from the corpus of authentic materials.<sup>7</sup> The result, as so many now recognize, is a Jesus cut off from both his Jewish predecessors and his Christian followers. Beyond this, and even more importantly, we just do not, despite all our labors and recent discoveries, know enough about either first-century Judaism or early Christianity to make the criterion reliable: the holes in our knowledge remain gaping. Why then pretend to prove a negative? My own judgment is that Morna Hooker some time ago persuasively exposed the flaws of the criterion of dissimilarity,<sup>8</sup> and it is a blight on our field that, upon publication of her conclusions, most of us continued to call upon dissimilarity whenever we pleased instead of letting the thing fall into its deserved oblivion.<sup>9</sup>

The criterion of embarrassment is more promising. Certainly historians in other fields have often reasoned according to its logic—as when scholars of Islam have affirmed that the so-called “Satanic verses” rest upon an historical episode because Moslems did not invent a story in which Mohammed mentions the names of three goddesses. Similarly, much of the invective in the Jesus tradition—Jesus is a drunkard and glutton, a friend of toll collectors and sinners, for instance—must preserve memories. The scope of such material is, however, quite limited. And there is yet another problem. We must face the surprising fact that

---

Bultmanns Jesusbuch und die heutige Jesusforschung, ed. Ulrich H. J. Körtner (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 2002), 114–116. Yet note that Jürgen Becker, Jesus of Nazareth (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1998), 13–14, still considers dissimilarity foundational.

<sup>7</sup> See esp. Tom Holmén, “Doubts about Double Dissimilarity: Restructuring the Main Criterion of Jesus-of-History Research,” in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. Bruce Chilton and Craig A. Evans, NTTS 28.1 (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 47–80. Holmén rightly argues that dissimilarity from Judaism is irrelevant if dissimilarity from the church can be established.

<sup>8</sup> Morna Hooker, “Christology and Methodology,” NTS 17 (1971): 480–487; idem, “On Using the Wrong Tool,” Theology 72 (1972): 570–581.

<sup>9</sup> The rebuttal by Reginald H. Fuller, “The Criterion of Dissimilarity: The Wrong Tool?” in Christological Perspectives: Essays in Honor of Harvey K. McArthur, ed. Robert F. Berkey and Sarah A. Edwards (New York: Pilgrim Press, 1982), 41–48, was hardly adequate.

all of the supposedly embarrassing facts or words are found in the Jesus tradition itself. This means that they were not sufficiently disconcerting to be expurgated. This hints at the pluralism of the early church, and it suggests that what may have flustered some may have left others unperturbed. It is telling that sometimes Matthew preserves a Markan saying that Luke, out of what we must guess to be embarrassment, drops, or vice versa. Matthew, for instance, retains Mark 13:32 (the Son does not know the day or the hour) whereas Luke does not. Furthermore, the church fathers, just like Luke, found Mark 13:32 problematic: the logion limits the Son's knowledge. Should we then urge that the saying must go back to Jesus because it bothered many early Christians? Or does its preservation in Mark and Matthew show us that some were comfortable with a less-than-omniscient Jesus, and that such people could have composed Mark 13:32 and assigned it to Jesus without any anxiety? Many modern scholars, observing that the Jesus of Mark 13:32 uses the absolute "the Son" of himself, have not hesitated to judge the saying a post-Easter creation.<sup>10</sup>

Mark 12:35–37 supplies another illustration of the problem. If one were, along with some exegetes, to read this passage so that Jesus denies his descent from David, one could then urge that, as early Christians regarded Jesus as the Davidic Messiah, the passage must be informed by a real incident from the life of Jesus, despite its implicit designation of him as "Lord."<sup>11</sup> The problem with this line of arguing, however, is that one can scarcely envisage tradents for whom Jesus was the Davidic Messiah passing down a text that refuted one of their important convictions. One could maintain that they just misunderstood the passage, but then some group before them must have formulated the text, and would we not then guess that that earlier group at least did not take Jesus to be the Son of David? And why are matters different for other traditions that modern scholars think conflict with the theology of the canonical evangelists or other early Christians? That is, why not take the perceived tensions between various texts to reflect different Christian traditions rather than a disagreement between Jesus and all subsequent Christians? What justifies the tacit assumption of the criterion of embarrassment that it is more plausible to postulate instead that early Christians handed down traditions that they misunderstood or found uncongenial?

<sup>10</sup> E.g., Wilhelm Bousset, Kyrios Christos (Nashville: Abingdon, 1970), 81–82.

<sup>11</sup> See Joel Marcus, Mark 9–16, AYB 27A (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2009), 847–848.

Even the principle of multiple attestation is not immune to criticism. The more frequently a complex is attested, the more congenial, one naturally infers, it was to early Christians. But the more congenial a complex was to early Christians, surely the less likely it is, for the critical, skeptical historian, that Jesus composed it. Conversely, the less congenial a tradition, the more likely its origin with Jesus and the less likely its multiple attestation.<sup>12</sup> Here the criterion of multiple attestation is in a tug-of-war with the criterion of dissimilarity: they pull the same unit in opposite directions. Some look at the many Son of man sayings and insist that, given the title's frequent appearances in the Jesus tradition and its relative scarcity outside of it, Jesus must have used the idiom. Others have inferred, in part because of the great quantity of sayings, that some segment of the early church must have had a Son of man Christology, and that the relevant sayings reflect its ideology, not the outlook of the historical Jesus.<sup>13</sup>

This rapid survey of objections to the standard criteria shows why I believe that they are not equal to the task for which they were invented: they are promises without fulfillment. One might suppose that some support for my skeptical view can be gathered from the recent contribution of Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter.<sup>14</sup> Their very helpful work is surely the most extended and most judicious exploration of our criteria to date, and in many respects they are critical. Yet in the end Theissen and Winter seem to offer but a revised version of criteria already known.<sup>15</sup> Although they take themselves to be dismissing the criterion of dissimilarity, what they are in fact dismissing is only the criterion of double dissimilarity, that is, dissimilarity from both Judaism and the church. They still defend the proposition that "those elements within the Jesus tradition that contrast with the interests of the early Christian sources, but are handed on in their tradition, can claim varying degrees of historical plausibility."<sup>16</sup> This does nothing to circumvent

---

<sup>12</sup> See further Dale C. Allison, Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1998), 24–27.

<sup>13</sup> For a survey of opinion, see Delbert Burkett, The Son of Man Debate: A History and Evaluation, SNTSMS 107 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999). Burkett himself seems to deny that Jesus spoke of "the Son of man."

<sup>14</sup> Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter, The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002).

<sup>15</sup> See the helpful review by Tom Holmén in JTS 55 (2004): 216–228.

<sup>16</sup> Theissen and Winter, Quest, 211.

the decisive objection that “we do not know enough about Jesus to allow us to construct a clear account of the primitive church because we do not know enough about the primitive church to allow us to construct a clear account of Jesus.”<sup>17</sup> Perhaps it is our professional pride that blinds us to the obvious, which is that our knowledge of early Christianity is, like our knowledge of early Judaism, woefully incomplete. Maybe one can, with a holographic plate, reconstruct the whole image from a part; but it is otherwise with our fragmentary knowledge of the early church.

Theissen and Winter also promote what they call the “coherence of sources,” which focuses on recurrent themes in different streams of the tradition. Although this proposal is promising and related to the one I shall make below, it becomes obscured by their twin contentions that “what Jesus intended and said must be compatible with the Judaism of the first half of the first century in Galilee,” and that “what Jesus intended and did must be recognizable as that of an individual figure within the framework of the Judaism of that time.”<sup>18</sup> Although it would be foolhardy to disagree with these generalizations, they are simply too large. The synoptics contain very little that cannot be made to fit within first-century Galilean Judaism, about which, despite the relevant extant texts and on-going archaeological discoveries, we still know so little. Again we are victims of our own ignorance. In the end, then, the proposals of Theissen and Winter, which they fuse together under the label of “the criterion of historical plausibility,” are like a trap in a forest that catches only the occasional passerby: their suggestions at best work on just some items; most of the tradition remains beyond firm evaluation. No one would deny that a reconstructed Jesus should be plausible within his Galilean environment and not look too much like a Christian. Yet recognizing these two circumstances is not going to enable us to peer across the darkness of two thousand years and discern if he did or did not speak about a coming Son of man, or whether the pigs really did run over the cliff.

Given that the work of Theissen and Winter, although the best we have on its subject, still comes up far short, my own judgment is that we should not be trying to refine our criteria but should rather be marginalizing them and experimenting with other methods. I find it disappointing that a scholar as wise as Jacques Schlosser can be fully aware of the limitations of our criteria, urge that they are less “proofs” than ways of introducing some rigor into our work, and yet not attempt to offer much substantial in their place.<sup>19</sup> It is time to quit making excuses for them, time to move the standard criteria from the center of our discussion to the periphery. It is not that this or that criterion is problematic or needs to be fine tuned but that the whole idea of applying criteria to individual items to recover Jesus is too often unworkable and so of quite limited utility.

---

<sup>17</sup> F. Gerald Downing, The Church and Jesus: A Study in History, Philosophy and Theology, SBT 2.10 (London: SCM, 1968), 51.

<sup>18</sup> Theissen and Winter, Quest, 211.

Let me bolster my contention that it is time to move on to other things by briefly defending seven propositions: (i) that Jesus said X or did Y is of itself no reason to believe that we can show that he said X or did Y; conversely, that he did not say X or do Y is of itself no reason to believe that we can show such to be the case; and the criteria do not contain within themselves any promise of what percentage of the tradition can be traced to its source, and in practice that percentage turns out to be small; (ii) our criteria have not led us into the promised land of scholarly consensus, so if they were designed to overcome subjectivity and bring order to our discipline, then they have failed: the hopelessly confusing parade of different Jesuses goes on; (iii) the fact that the criteria can be in conflict with themselves, that is, that some criteria can favor the authenticity of a unit while other criteria favor the inauthenticity of the very same unit, demonstrates their unreliability; (iv) running units through the gauntlet of the traditional criteria presupposes that there is a clear distinction between what is authentic and what is not, which is a very misleading proposition; (v) most of us have not consistently heeded the criteria we claim to heed anyway; (vi) our criteria are not strong enough to resist our wills, which means that we tend to make them do what we want them to do; (vii) when we focus on criteria for individual units we can easily lose the more important larger picture, which is the place to start and the place to end.

i. The gap between what happened and what we can discover to have happened is much larger than we care to imagine. Aristotle seemingly preferred to speak of Pythagoreans in general instead of Pythagoras in particular because he found it too hard to extract the historical philosopher from the apocryphal material assigned to him. Might not an analogous circumspection be called for from historians of early Christianity? Maybe the Canadian mounted police can claim, “We always get our man,” but we all know that some crimes go unsolved; and why should we think that contributing apocryphal material to the Jesus tradition is a deed that we can, two thousand years after the fact, regularly detect?

---

<sup>19</sup> Jacques Schlosser, Jésus de Nazareth (Paris: Agnès Viénot Éditions, 1999), 79–89.

It is the fragmentary and imperfect nature of the evidence as well as the limitations of our historical-critical tools that should move us to confess, if we are conscientious, how hard it is to recover the past. That something happened does not entail our ability to show it happened, and that something did not happen does not entail our ability to show that it did not happen. I emphasize this assertion, obvious and trite, because too often those who wield the criteria come to definite conclusions. This makes me suspicious, for my experience is altogether different. Time and time again I have looked at a complex and weighed the arguments on both sides—and there are almost always arguments pro and con, indeed good arguments pro and con—and been unable to come up with more than: Well, Jesus could have said it, but it might also come from the church.

Consider Mark 9:43–48, the series of sayings warning against sins of the hand, foot, and eye: “If your hand causes you to stumble, cut it off; it is better for you to enter life maimed than to have two hands and to go to hell, to the unquenchable fire, etc.” This does not satisfy the criterion of multiple attestation: there is no parallel in Q, M,<sup>20</sup> L, or John. There is, however, a Christian parallel in Col 3:5 (“Put to death then the members that are on the earth”) and an amazingly close Jewish text in b. Nid. 13b: “Have we here learned a law as in the case where R. Huna [really] cut off someone’s hand [see b. Sanh. 58b]? Or is it merely an execration? Come and hear what was taught: R. Tarfon said, ‘If his hand touched the membrum let his hand be cut off upon his belly.’ ‘But,’ they said to him, ‘would not his belly be split?’ He said, ‘It is preferable that his belly shall be split rather than that he should go down into the pit of destruction.’” In both Mark and b. Nid. 13b the hand that sins should be cut off. In both this act of mutilation is preferable to going to “the pit of destruction” or “Gehenna.” And in both the thought is expressed in the “better . . . than” form.<sup>21</sup> So the criterion of dissimilarity hardly establishes the authenticity of Mark 9:43–48. One also cannot obviously invoke the criterion of embarrassment to any effective end here, so all we seem to be left with is coherence. Some would argue that this is fulfilled because Jesus was morally earnest, used hyperbole, called for uncompromising self-sacrifice, and invoked eschatological judgment as a motive for right behavior. Others, however, would observe that coherence by itself is a pretty weak indicator; and if, in addition, they are among those who believe that all the other references to eschatological judgment are secondary, then they will return the same verdict here. The Jesus Seminar, which regards the cutting off of bodily members as excommunication and so reflective of an ecclesiastical context, does not color our unit red or pink but gray.<sup>22</sup>

---

<sup>20</sup> Although some assign Matt 5:29–30 to M or Q, this is far from clear; see W. D. Davies and Dale C. Allison, Jr., A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel According to Saint Matthew, 3 vols., ICC (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1988, 1991), 1:523.

My own strong intuition has always been that Mark 9:43–48 is from Jesus, but if I am honest I am not really sure what arguments I can muster to persuade others of this.<sup>23</sup> I can say that the language is vivid and shocking. My mind’s eye sees a bloody stump and an empty eye socket when it encounters these words—from which it follows that if Jesus did say something like Mark 9:43–48, it would stick in the memory. But this begs the question: Did he really speak it?

As I have over the years worked through the tradition, I have ended up with three piles of materials. There are some traditions that obviously betray themselves as secondary because they are redactional or clearly contain post-Easter convictions (e.g. Matt 3:15; 28:18–20). There are other traditions that are almost certainly historical either because Paul and the gospels agree on the point (e.g. the prohibition of divorce [1 Cor 7:10–11] and the instruction that missionaries live by the gospel [1 Cor 9:14]) or because church invention is wildly implausible (e.g. the accusation that Jesus was a glutton and drunkard). But those two piles are relatively small. The vast majority of traditions—the golden rule (Matt 7:12 = Luke 6:31 [Q]), the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16:19–31), the command not to let the left hand know what the right hand is doing (Matt 6:3), the parable of the wicked tenants (Mark 12:1–12), the healing of a leper (Mark 1:40–45), etc., etc.—are neither obviously of pre-Easter origin nor obviously post-Easter

---

<sup>21</sup> See further Will Deming, “Mark 9.42–10.12, Matthew 5.27–32, and b. Nid. 13b: A First Century Discussion of Male Sexuality,” NTS 36 (1990): 130–141.

<sup>22</sup> Funk et al., The Five Gospels, 86.

<sup>23</sup> For my best attempt see Allison, Jesus of Nazareth, 187–188.

fictions. They can only be classified as “possibly authentic.”<sup>24</sup> In other words, my experience has taught me that applying our criteria to the various units leaves us uncertain about most of the material we are dealing with.

ii. Many have remarked upon the diverse conclusions of scholars publishing books and articles on the historical Jesus. The diversity perhaps bothers me less than some others, because I do not think that we are scientists, and I do not expect consensus on any large matter within the humanities. The point here, however, is that our criteria, which we employ to help take us a bit beyond our subjectivity, so that we might be more like those in the so-called hard sciences, do not appear to bring any uniformity of result, or any more uniformity of result than would have been the case had we never heard of them. Dissimilarity, multiple attestation, coherence, and embarrassment have been used to concoct many different sorts of figures. One might place the blame on the users rather than the tools, but the bad results—all the diversity requires that some are writing bad history—are due to the tools as well as the users. Does anyone seriously believe that, if we could only further refine our criteria, some sort of authentic consensus about something important would finally emerge?<sup>25</sup> Certainly doing history, which is an art requiring imagination and conjecture, cannot be identified with the mechanical observance of rules.

iii. What follows from the fact that our criteria are often in conflict? Let me offer an illustration. One can attribute the words of Jesus at the Last Supper to the church on these grounds: (a) they come from the church’s liturgy and so do not satisfy the criterion of dissimilarity; (b) they do not fit a Palestinian environment, for no Palestinian Jew would have spoken of others eating his body or drinking his blood; and (c) they interpret Jesus’ death as an atonement, which not only gives Jesus clear foreknowledge of his fate but also places upon it a meaning otherwise scarcely attested in the Jesus tradition; in other words, it flunks the criterion of consistency. Yet these arguments are seemingly balanced by others: (a) the words of institution are attested in Paul, in Mark, and in an independent tradition in Luke; so we have early and multiple attestation; (b) it was Jesus' habit to say shocking and outrageous things for the sake of effect, and one may interpret the words about eating and drink in that light; and (c) the eschatological content of Mark 14:25 ("I will never again drink of the fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it new in the kingdom of God") harmonizes with Jesus' expectation of martyrdom within the context of his eschatological Naherwartung. All of which is to say: multiple attestation points one way (for), the criterion of dissimilarity the opposite way (against), while coherence points both ways at once (for and against). There are of course additional arguments in the literature, and it goes without saying that they too do not all point exclusively in one direction rather than another.

---

<sup>24</sup> For this category see Eckhard Rau, Jesus—Freund von Zöllnern und Sündern: Eine methodenkritische Untersuchung (Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 2000), 69–74.

<sup>25</sup> But Dennis Polkow, “Method and Criteria for Historical Jesus Research,” in Society of Biblical Literature 1987 Seminar Papers, ed. Kent Harold Richards (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1987), 336–356, leaves me with this impression.

How should we respond to this disparity, or to similar cases—including Mark 9:43–48, discussed above—in which the criteria do not speak with united voice? One could I suppose argue that we should simply do the math. If, for instance, three criteria favor authenticity and one criterion favors inauthenticity, we should go with the former. Such an unimaginative, mechanical approach would, however, not speak to the issue of an apparent tie, as in the case of the Lord's Supper. One might, alternatively, urge that one criterion carries more weight than another. Again being mechanical, maybe multiple attestation is more important than dissimilarity, or coherence than embarrassment.

But all this would be to miss the obvious, which is this: if the criteria point in different directions for the very same unit, then they are just not reliable indicators. What more proof does one need? If Jesus said something and yet there are a couple of criteria that go against this conclusion, or if Jesus did not say something attributed to him and yet there are a couple of criteria indicating that he did say it, we have demonstrated that our criteria are not dependable.

iv. Sorting the tradition with the standard criteria presupposes that there is a clear distinction between an authentic item and an inauthentic item. But everything is instead a mixed product, that is, a product of Jesus and the church.<sup>26</sup> Mark tells us that Jesus came into Galilee proclaiming the good news of God and saying, “The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God has come near; repent, and believe in the good news” (1:14–15). What do we make of this unit? Many now reasonably ascribe it to Markan redaction. But those of us who believe that Jesus (a) taught in Galilee, (b) thought that the time of Satan’s rule was coming to its end,<sup>27</sup> (c) proclaimed the imminence of the kingdom of God, (d) called for repentance, and (e) associated his ministry with the prophecies of Deutero-Isaiah<sup>28</sup> might well regard Mark 1:14–15 as a fair summary of Jesus’ proclamation. So even if it is redactional and not from Jesus, it rightly remembers some things and so is a witness to who he was. Put otherwise, Jesus contributed as much to Mark 1:14–15 as did the evangelist.

---

<sup>26</sup> Allison, Jesus of Nazareth, 58–60; Ferdinand Hahn, "Methodologische Überlegungen zur Rückfrage nach Jesus," in Rückfrage nach Jesus: Zur Methodik und Bedeutung der Frage nach dem historischen Jesus, ed. Karl Kertelge, QD 63 (Freiburg: Herder, 1974), 29–30; Jürgen Habermann, "Kriterienfragen der Jesusforschung," in "... was ihr auf dem Weg verhandelt habt." Beiträge zur Exegese und Theologie des Neuen Testaments: Festschrift für Ferdinand Hahn zum 75. Geburtstag, ed. Peter Müller, Christine Gerber, and Thomas Knöppler (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener, 2001), 23.

Consider also Matt 4:1–11 = Luke 4:1–13 (Q), the temptation story. Most modern scholars have rightly judged this to be unhistorical, an haggadic fiction produced through reflection upon scripture. Yet whoever composed it clearly did so in the knowledge that Jesus was (a) a miracle worker who (b) sometimes refused to give signs, (c) thought himself victorious over demonic forces, (d) was steeped in the scriptures, (e) had great faith in God, and (f) was a person of the Spirit. So what we seem to have in Q 4:1–13 is an illustration of the obvious fact that historical fiction can instruct us about history.<sup>29</sup> The story, which narrates events that probably never happened, nonetheless rightly catches Jesus in several respects. Here the inauthentic incorporates the authentic.

The point of all this is just to underline how facile is the usual assumption that a complex originated either with Jesus or with the early church.<sup>30</sup> But this insight is lost when everything is viewed through

---

<sup>27</sup> For this interpretation of Mark 1:15, see Joel Marcus, “‘The Time Has Been Fulfilled!’ (Mark 1:15),” in Apocalyptic and the New Testament: Essays in Honor of J. Louis Martyn, ed. Joel Marcus and Marion L. Soards, JSNTSup 24 (Sheffield: JSOT, 1989), 49–68.

<sup>28</sup> For the dependence of “believe in the good news” upon Deutero-Isaiah, see Bruce D. Chilton, God in Strength: Jesus’ Announcement of the Kingdom, SNTU B.1 (Freistadt: F. Plöchl, 1979), 92–95.

<sup>29</sup> See further my article, “The Temptations of Jesus,” in Authenticating the Activities of Jesus, ed. Bruce Chilton and Craig A. Evans (Leiden: Brill, 1998), 195–214.

<sup>30</sup> There may be a parallel here with a Pauline conundrum. John Barclay, Colossians and Philemon, New Testament Guides (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997), 35, has written: “It turns out... that the differences are not large between Paul himself writing this letter [Colossians], Paul writing with the aid of a secretary, Paul authorizing an associate to write it, and the letter being composed by a knowledgeable imitator or pupil of Paul. Perhaps with our intense concern to demarcate ‘Paul’ from ‘non-Paul’ we are working with an artificial or anachronistic notion of individual uniqueness: was Paul completely different from his contemporaries and associates, or did he typically work with others, influencing them and being influenced by them? Have we created criteria which attempt to sort fiction from nonfiction, as though all the later additions must be misleading or be bad interpretation. It could well be the case, and I think it is the case, that much in the tradition is strictly nonhistorical yet helpfully informs us about Jesus. It is thus foolhardy to ignore it—and emphasis upon the criteria hides this important fact from us.

v. We have often been guilty of not consistently following the methods we claim to follow. The words about turning the other cheek, loving one's enemy, and going the extra mile, Matt 5:38–48 = Luke 6:27–36 (Q), supply an instructive illustration. With very few exceptions, almost all scholars working on the gospels believe that this extended composition or collection preserves some things Jesus said, that it gives us his spirit, that it preserves something importantly characteristic about him.

Yet this conviction, that Matt 5:38–48 = Luke 6:27–36 derives from Jesus and is distinctive of him, a conviction common for the last two hundred years at least, and one with which I do not disagree, has survived despite the popularity and indeed predominance of the criterion of dissimilarity, a criterion which many scholars have in other cases used to eliminate or cast doubt upon materials attributed to Jesus.<sup>31</sup> The criterion of dissimilarity should of course never have been used to exclude material as well as to include material; but the only point here is that scholars who have used it in this way on some sayings have not done so when examining this passage.<sup>32</sup> The teaching common to Matthew 5 and Luke 6 is, to illustrate, comfortably at home in the early church. It sounds very much like what Paul, without attributing his words to Jesus, has to say in Rom 12:14, 17, 21; 1 Cor 4:12; and 1 Thess 5:15. It is also closely related to the complexes in Did. 1.3–5; 1 Clem. 13:2; and Polycarp, Ep. 2.2–3.<sup>33</sup> So half of the criterion of dissimilarity—distance from the church—is hardly satisfied in this case: Matt 5:38–48 = Luke 6:27–36 closely resembles several early Christian texts.

---

a Paul of utter uniqueness in line with the peculiarly modern cult of the individual? Whether by Paul, by a secretary, by an associate or by a pupil, Colossians is clearly a 'Pauline' letter."

<sup>31</sup> See, e.g., Norman Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (New York: Harper & Row, 1967), 196, 200.

<sup>32</sup> An exception: J. Sauer, "Traditionsgeschichtliche Erwägungen zu den synoptischen und paulinischen Aussagen über Feindesliebe und Wiedervergeltungsverzicht," ZNW 76 (1985): 1–28.

<sup>33</sup> See further Dale C. Allison, Jr., The Jesus Tradition in Q (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1997), 86–92.

The passage also seemingly fails to pass the test of dissimilarity from characteristic emphases within Judaism. The following appears in b. Šabb. 88b and b. Git. 36b: “Our rabbis taught: Those who are insulted but do not inflict them, who hear themselves being reviled and do not answer back, who perform [religious precepts] out of love and rejoice in chastisement, of them the Scripture says, ‘And they who love him are as the sun when he goes forth in his might [to shine upon all]’” (Judg 5:31). This is indeed very close to the synoptic texts attributed to Jesus, so close that it cannot be unrelated. Similarly, Jesus’ imperative to be merciful because God is merciful (Luke 6:26; cf. Matt 5:48) has parallels in Tg. Ps.-J. on Lev 22:28 (“My people, sons of Israel, just as I am merciful in heaven, so will you be merciful on earth”) and y. Ber. 5:3 = y. Meg. 4:10 (“R. Yose b. R. Bun said: ‘It is not good to imply that God’s traits [are derived from his attribute of] mercy. Those who translate [Lev 22:28 as follows:] ‘My people, sons of Israel, just as I am merciful in heaven, so will you be merciful on earth: A cow or a ewe you will not kill both her and her young in one day’—that is not good, for it implies that God’s traits [are derived from the attribute of] mercy”). A tradition common to Sifra Leviticus 200 and t. Sotah 9.11 is also relevant: “‘And you shall love your neighbor as yourself.’ Rabbi Akiba said: ‘This is the great principle in the Torah.’ Ben Azzari said: ‘This is the book of the generation of Adam, when God created man he made him in the likeness of God (Gen 5:1) is an even greater principle.’” Clearly the point of this last is that whereas Akiba’s great principle fails to specify the scope of “neighbor,” Ben Azzari’s proof text, just like Jesus’ command to love enemies, goes one better and envisages all of humanity.

There is yet another strong parallel, a pre-Christian text, Let. Aris. 207, which contains this advice for a king: “As you wish that no evil should befall you, but to share in every good thing, so you should act on the same principle towards your subjects, including the wrongdoers, and admonish the good and upright also mercifully. For God guides all in kindness.” Using Luke’s text for the comparison, one can see the parallels at a glance:

Golden rule

Luke 6:31: “As you wish that people would do to you, do so to them”
Let. Aris. 207: “As you wish that no evil should befall you, but to share in every good thing, so you should act on the same principle towards your subjects”

Mercy/kindness

Luke 6:36: "Be merciful"

Let. Aris. 207: "admonish the good and upright also mercifully"

God as model of universal mercy/kindness

Luke 6:35: God raises the sun on the evil as well as the good

Let. Aris. 207: "God guides all in kindness"

No restriction on human mercy/kindness

Luke 6:32–34: "If you love those who love you...?"

Let. Aris. 207: "act on the same principle towards your subjects, including the wrongdoers"

The common coalescence of themes is undeniable.

It would seem, then, that the criterion of double dissimilarity might have discouraged scholars from assigning Matt 5:38–48 = Luke 6:27–36 to Jesus, or at least have given them some doubt about its foundational character. One can certainly cite many instances where critics have cited Jewish and Christian parallels to cast doubt on the Jesuanic origin of this or that utterance in the synoptics. Yet almost without exception this has not happened with Matt 5:38–48 = Luke 6:27–36. Norman Perrin, who was quite capable of using the criterion of dissimilarity to jettison items from the original tradition, did not do so here. He wrote: "That Jesus challenged his followers in these terms is not to be doubted and, indeed, is never doubted."<sup>34</sup> One wonders, Why not? It cannot be because of multiple attestation, for there are no variants to Matt 5:38–48 = Luke 6:27–36 in Mark, M, L, or John; and the parallels in Paul—our earliest literary witness to the tradition—are not attributed to Jesus. Furthermore, one could wield the criterion of coherence to make a case against Matt 5:38–48 = Luke 6:27–36. If Jesus fervently attacked the scribes and Pharisees, as so many traditions indicate, how could he have counseled charity for enemies? And if he believed that God was good to the unjust as well as to the just, how could he often speak of eschatological judgment and warn of some flunking the final assize? On the whole, the traditional criteria do not obviously support the near universal conviction that Matt 5:38–48 = Luke 6:27–36 goes back to Jesus.

It is intriguing that, despite all the parallels that are known to everyone, some have argued that Matt 5:38–48 = Luke 6:27–36 does indeed satisfy the criterion of dissimilarity if we just look a bit further: (a) the precise words, "Love your enemy," do not appear in any ancient Jewish source; (b) Christian texts before the third century also fail to quote those words;<sup>35</sup> (c) Paul's usage lacks the utopian, eschatological dimension present in Matthew and Luke.<sup>36</sup> All this is true enough, yet the upshot is not a clear verdict in favor of Matt 5:38–48 = Luke 6:27–36 going back to Jesus; rather do we have here a lesson about the ambiguity of dissimilarity. One can always discern dissimilarities between two different texts—otherwise they would be the same text. So it is no surprise that, if one looks at something in the Jesus tradition long enough, one will usually be able to find ways in which it differs from all other early Jewish and early Christian texts (just as one can almost always find parallels if one hunts long enough). One can also undertake the same exercise with the sentences in other ancient sources. How then do we determine what differences are significant and which not? I cannot see that this question has been seriously raised, much less answered—and precisely because it cannot be answered. In the present case, why does the lack of an exact parallel to “Love your enemies” outweigh all the extensive parallels that we do find? Or should we conclude that only “Love your enemies” goes back to Jesus? But this hardly works given that it is an integral part of a unit that in its entirety rewrites Leviticus 19.<sup>37</sup> We seem to be left in a muddle.

---

<sup>34</sup> Perrin, Rediscovering, 148.

vi. While it is true that “formality has its place in guiding one along suitable paths of argument” and that “most of us need some guidance,”<sup>38</sup> the use of criteria to cast a scientific aura over our questing for Jesus is not very effective, for our criteria are sufficiently pliable as to be unable to resist our biases and prior inclinations. So when we use them, they can become a mask for our own preconceived ideas. In other words, we can go through all the motions and yet end up with precisely what we wanted or expected. The criteria then become justification ex post facto, although we hide the fact from ourselves and from others. If we would examine ourselves honestly, could we confess that, when we sit down to look at a unit, we really have a completely open mind and do not know ahead of time which way we want the criteria to move that

---

<sup>35</sup> Heinz-Wolfgang Kuhn, “Das Liebesgebot Jesu als Tora und als Evangelium,” in Vom Urchristentum zu Jesus: Für Joachim Gnilka, ed. Hubert Frankemölle and Karl Kertelge (Freiburg: Herder, 1989), 194–230.

<sup>36</sup> Holmén, “Doubts,” 67–70.

<sup>37</sup> Dale C. Allison, Jr., The Intertextual Jesus: Scripture in Q (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 2000), 29–38.

<sup>38</sup> D. V. Lindley, A. Tversky, and R. V. Brown, “On the Reconciliation of Probability Assessments,” Journal of the Royal Statistical Society, series A, vol. 142, no. 2 (1979): 177.

unit, to Jesus or away from him? Here I recall some words Harvey McArthur once wrote:

It may be that the most creative scholars do not carry out research by establishing rules and then obeying them. When they encounter an item of evidence their total knowledge of the situation is brought into play, and suddenly this new item falls into place with a little click in one or another of the available slots. The rules of the game, or criteria, then serve as rationalizations for what has happened. For the outsider they serve also as a check on the plausibility of the almost unconscious decision made by the creative researcher.<sup>39</sup>

This evaluation is on target. Our criteria are typically rationalizations we employ to keep a clear conscience as we defend an image of Jesus we had come to believe in before wielding criteria. This is largely why two different scholars applying the same criteria to the same saying or event often come up with different results, and why all the discussion and attempted refinement of criteria over the last several decades have brought us no closer to wide agreement on very much of importance.

How do we really develop our images of the historical Jesus? Surely not by using criteria in an unbiased fashion. Imagine with me a young graduate student in a department of religion. She becomes convinced, let us say, that Albert Schweitzer's reconstruction of Jesus was close to the truth—or, as the case may be, not close to the truth—because a revered professor, whose arguments she has not the means to rebut, persuades her of this. Once her paradigm about Jesus is in place, a cognitive bias will also be in place. We all see what we expect to see and want to see—like highly prejudicial football fans who always spot more infractions committed by the team they are jeering against than by the team they are cheering for.<sup>40</sup> If we hold a belief, we will notice confirming evidence, especially if we are aware that not everyone agrees with us. Disconfirming evidence, to the contrary, makes us uncomfortable, and so we are more likely to miss, neglect, or critically evaluate it.<sup>41</sup> We do not see things as they are but as we construe them to be. After a period of time, then, one might anticipate that our graduate

---

<sup>39</sup> Harvey K. McArthur, "The Burden of Proof in Historical Jesus Research," ExpTim 82 (1971): 119.

<sup>40</sup> See Albert H. Hastorf and Hadley Cantril, "They Saw a Game: A Case Study," Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology 49 (1967): 129–134.

<sup>41</sup> See Charles G. Lord, Lee Ross, and Mark Lepper, "Biased Assimilation and Attitude Polarization: The Effects of Prior Theories on Subsequently Considered Evidence," Journal of Personality and Social Psychology 37 (1979): 2098–2109. They begin by claiming that people who hold strong opinions on complex issues "are likely to examine student will have collected her own evidence for her professor's belief and become all the more persuaded of its correctness. As soon, moreover, as she communicates her views in public fashion, say by tutoring undergraduates or publishing a paper, she may be set for life—especially as one's self-perception as an expert, the psychologists tell us, typically enlarges self-confidence.<sup>42</sup> The prospect of embarrassment from publicly admitting error can make it hard to admit error to oneself, to undertake the difficult cognitive task of rearranging data into a new pattern after one has long been looking at an old pattern.

Now at some point our student will have run across discussions of the criteria of authenticity and will have begun to fret about them. My claim is threefold: first, serious attention to criteria will have arisen only at a secondary stage of reflection, after a bias in favor of a particular Jesus was already in place; second, her conclusions about the criteria will not change her mind about Jesus; third, her own use of the criteria will confirm her prior inclinations.

Moving from the hypothetical, my guess is that my graduate student fairly represents a large number of real-life New Testament scholars. Speaking candidly for myself, my own Jesus was apocalyptic and millenarian by the time I was twenty. I have learned much since then and nuanced my position, but that position remains basically the same. In my own case, my picture of Jesus was developed long before I much worried about the details of method, and long before I went on record as espousing this or that view of the criteria of authenticity. Moreover, and as one would cynically expect, the method that I developed later led straight to a Jesus congenial to the judgments of my youth. This I find disturbing, and my history cannot be atypical. Surely no one started with method. The implication seems to be that developing and deploying our criteria serve less to help us make truly new discoveries than to help us to confirm inclinations already held in advance.

---

relevant empirical evidence in a biased manner. They are apt to accept 'confirming' evidence at face value while subjecting 'discomforting' evidence to critical evaluation, and as a result to draw undue support for their initial positions from mixed or random empirical findings" (2098). On p. 2108 they affirm that "once formed, impressions about the self, beliefs about other people, or theories about functional relationships between variables can survive the total discrediting of the evidence that first gave rise to such beliefs. . . . Beliefs can survive the complete subtraction of the critical formative evidence on which they were initially based." These should be sobering thoughts for all of us.

<sup>42</sup> James V. Bradley, "Overconfidence in Ignorant Experts," Bulletin of the Psychonomic Society 17 (1982): 82–84.

We are all very biased observers, and given how biased we are, it is no wonder that our criteria so often give us what we want. We try to get a leash around the various units so that we can then drag them toward or away from our reconstruction of Jesus—which is already in our minds before we employ our criteria. If it were otherwise, I doubt that the judgments about Jesus would be as diverse as they are. This takes me to my final complaint.

vii. Fishing for Jesus in the sea of tradition using criteria of authenticity wrongly privileges the part over the whole. When we look back upon our encounters with others, our most vivid and reliable memories are often not precise but general. I may, for instance, not remember exactly what you said to me last year, but I may recall approximately what you said, or retain what we call a general impression. It is like vaguely recollecting the approximate shape, size, and contents of a room one was in many years ago—a room which has, in the mind's eye, lost all color and detail. After our short-term memories have become long-term memories they suffer progressive abbreviation. I am not sure I remember a single sentence that either of my beloved grandparents on my father's side ever said to me. But I nonetheless know and cherish the sorts of things that they said to me.

All of this matters for study of the Jesus tradition because it goes against universal human experience to suppose that early Christians, let us say, accurately recorded many of Jesus' words—they may well have—but somehow came away with false general impressions of him. If the tradents of the Jesus tradition got the big picture or the larger patterns wrong then they also got the details—that is, the sentences—wrong. It is precarious to urge that we can find the truth about Jesus on the basis of a few dozen sayings deemed to be authentic if those sayings are interpreted contrary to the general impressions conveyed by the early tradition in its entirety. If Jesus was, for example, either a violent revolutionary or a secular sage, then the traditions about him, which on the whole depict neither a violent revolutionary nor a secular sage, are so misleading that we cannot use them for investigation of the pre-Easter period—and so we cannot know that Jesus was either a violent revolutionary or a secular sage.<sup>43</sup> Here skepticism devours itself.

---

<sup>43</sup> On the problem of using "secular" with reference to Jesus, see further Allison, Resurrecting Jesus (New York: Continuum, 2005), 19–23.

But what is the alternative to skepticism?

The early Jesus tradition is not a collection of totally disparate and wholly unrelated materials. On the contrary, certain themes and motifs and rhetorical strategies are consistently attested over a wide range of material. Surely it is in these themes and motifs and rhetorical strategies, if it is anywhere, that we are likely to have some good memories. Indeed, several of these themes and motifs and strategies are sufficiently well attested that we have a choice to make. Either they tend to preserve pre-Easter memories or they do not. In the former case we have some possibility of getting somewhere. But in the latter case our questing for Jesus is not just interminable but probably pointless and we should consider surrendering to ignorance. If the tradition is so misleading in its broad features, then we can hardly make much of its details.

Consider, as illustration, the proposition that Jesus and his disciples saw his ministry as effecting the defeat of Satan and demonic spirits.<sup>44</sup> This conviction is reflected in sundry sources and in divers genres—parables, apocalyptic declarations, stories of exorcism, etc.:

1. The temptation story, in which Jesus bests the devil; Mark 1:12–13; Matt 4:1–11 = Luke 4:1–13 (Q)
2. Stories of successful exorcism; Mark 1:21–28; 5:1–20; 7:24–30; 9:14–20; Matt 12:22–23 = Luke 11:14 (Q); Matt 9:32–34; cf. the passing notices of successful exorcisms in Mark 1:32, 34, 39; 3:22; Matt 8:16; Luke 13:32
3. Jesus' authorization of disciples to cast out demons; Mark 3:15; 6:7; cf. 6:13; Matt 7:22; Luke 10:19–20
4. Saying about Satan being divided; Mark 3:23–27; Matt 12:25–27 = Luke 11:17–19 (Q)
5. Parable of binding the strong man; Mark 3:28; Matt 12:29 = Luke 11:21–22 (Q); Gos. Thom. 35
6. Story of someone other than a disciple casting out demons in Jesus' name; Mark 9:38–41
7. Declaration that Jesus casts out demons by the finger/Spirit of God; Matt 12:28 = Luke 11:20 (Q)
8. Report of Jesus' vision of Satan fall like lightning from heaven; Luke 10:18

---

<sup>44</sup> With what follows cf. C. H. Dodd, History and the Gospel (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1938), 92–110.

Even John has sentences that forward this theme:

9. Announcement that the ruler of the world has been driven out; John 12:31; 16:11 (cf. 14:30)

One infers from all this material not only that Jesus was an exorcist but also that he and others saw his ministry in its entirety as a successful conflict with Satan. This holds whatever one makes of the individual units, at least some of which (for example, the temptation story) are difficult to think of as historical. What counts is not the isolated units but the patterns they weave, the larger images they form. Indeed, even if one were, against good sense, to doubt the truth of every individual story and saying just listed and count them all creations of the community, one might still reasonably retain a certain faith in the whole of them taken together and suppose that the recurring motif tells us something about Jesus' ministry.

One can draw an analogy here with medical experiments. Taken by itself, even perfectly devised double-blind, randomized trials count for little. What matters is replication. And in areas where issues are particularly controverted, what finally matters is meta-analysis, the evaluation of large collections of results from numerous individual studies, including those with possible design flaws. It is the tendency of the whole that counts, not any one experiment or piece of evidence. It should be the same with questing for Jesus. We should proceed not by looking at individual units microscopically but by gathering what may be called macro samples of material. We might even find that collectives display features or a Gestalt not discernible in their individual components. For example, one could not generalize about Jesus' relationship to the Pharisees from one controversy story; but from a collection of such, some generalizations might be drawn. Similarly, consider the proposition that Jesus had a pre-Easter follower named Peter. Let us say that, after examination of all the relevant materials, someone decides that every single story or saying in which he appears is a creation of the community and without pre-Easter foundation. What would follow? While the evidence would be consistent with denying to Peter a pre-Easter role or even doubting his historicity, those would be rash conclusions. Joseph was surely the name of Jesus' father, even if none of the stories in which he appears is historical. Similarly, it would probably be wisest to take Peter's frequent appearance in various complexes from various sources as best explained on the supposition that, despite all the legendary elements, Jesus did have a follower named Peter.

The motif of victory over Satan and the presence of Peter throughout the early sources, canonical and extra-canonical, are only two of a large number of recurring themes and motifs and items. To cite some of great importance: God as a caring father;<sup>45</sup> the requirement to love, serve, and forgive others;<sup>46</sup> special regard for the unfortunate;<sup>47</sup> the dangers of wealth;<sup>48</sup> extraordinary requests and difficult demands;<sup>49</sup> conflict with religious authorities;<sup>50</sup> disciples as students and assistants;<sup>51</sup> and Jesus as miracle worker.<sup>52</sup>

It is not naive or precritical to urge that we should probably regard all of these as being rooted in the teaching and ministry of Jesus. Either the tradition instructs us that Jesus often spoke about God as a father, <sup>45</sup> The canonical data on God as father are collected in Joachim Jeremias, The Prayers of Jesus, SBT 2.6 (London: SCM, 1967), 11–65. The Gospel of Thomas uses “Father” often of God—e.g., 3, 40, 44, 50, 79, 83, 98, 99.

<sup>46</sup> See Matt 5:43–44 = Luke 6:27–28 (Q); Matt 7:12 = Luke 6:31 (Q); Matt 5:45–48 = Luke 6:32–36 (Q); Matt 6:12–13 = Luke 11:4 (Q); Matt 18:15, 21–22 = Luke 17:3–4 (Q); Mark 9:35; 10:41–45; 12:28–34; Matt 5:23–24; 6:14–15; 18:23–35; 19:19; 23:11–12; 25:31–46; Luke 10:25–28, 29–37; 13:15–17; 22:24–26; Acts 20:35; John 13:1–35; 14:15–17; 15:12–17; Gos. Thom. 25, 26, 48, 95; Gos. Heb. according to Jerome, Comm. Eph. 5:4; etc.

<sup>47</sup> See Matt 5:2–6 = Luke 6:20–21 (Q); Matt 11:4–5 = Luke 7:22 (Q); Matt 9:32–33 = Luke 11:14 (Q); Matt 20:16 = Luke 13:30 (Q); Matt 22:1–8 = Luke 14:15–24 (Q); Mark 1:40–45; 2:15–17; 3:1–6; 5:1–20, 25–34; 7:31–37; 8:22–26; 9:14–29; 10:46–52; 14:3–9; Matt 25:31–46; Luke 13:10–17; 14:1–6, 12–14; John 4:1–38; 5:2–9; 9:1–12; 13:29; Gos. Thom. 54, 69; etc.

<sup>48</sup> See Matt 5:3 = Luke 6:20 (Q); Matt 5:40, 42 = Luke 6:30 (Q); Matt 10:9–10 = Luke 10:4 (Q); Matt 6:22–23 = Luke 11:34–36 (Q); Matt 6:25–33 = Luke 12:22–31 (Q); Matt 6:24 = Luke 16:13 (Q); Mark 1:16–20; 2:14; 4:19; 6:8–9; 8:34–37; 10:17–31; 12:41–44; 14:3–9; Matt 13:44–46; Luke 6:24–26, 33–34; 11:41; 12:13–21; 14:12–14; 16:1–9, 10–12, 19–31; Gos. Thom. 36, 42, 54, 56, 63, 64, 78, 81; P. Oxy. 655; etc.

<sup>49</sup> See 1 Cor 7:10; 9:14; Matt 5:38–43 = Luke 6:27–30 (Q); Matt 7:1–2 = Luke 6:37–38 (Q); Matt 8:18–22 = Luke 9:57–60 (Q); Matt 10:37–38 = Luke 14:26–27 (Q); Matt 5:32 = Luke 16:18 (Q); Matt 18:21–22 = Luke 17:3–4 (Q); Mark 1:16–20; 2:14; 6:8–9; 8:34, 35; 9:42–48; 10:11–12, 17–27; Matt 5:33–37; 19:10–12; 23:9; Luke 14:12–14, 23, 28–33; Gos. Thom. 42, 55, 95, 101; P. Oxy. 1224; etc.

<sup>50</sup> See Matt 23:1–2, 4–7, 13, 23, 25–28, 29–36 = Luke 11:39–52 (Q); Mark 2:15–17, 23–28; 3:1–6; 7:1–23; 12:13–17, 18–27; 14:53–65; Matt 15:12–13; 23:8–12, 15, 16–22; Luke 11:37–38, 53–54; 13:10–17; 14:1–6; 16:14–15; 18:9–14; John 4:1–3; 7:32, 45–52; 9:13–34; 11:45–53; 18:1–32; Gos. Thom. 39, 102; P. Oxy. 1224; etc.

<sup>51</sup> See Matt 5:3 = Luke 6:20 (Q); Matt 8:18–22; 10:1–14; 11:21–22 = Luke 9:57–10:15 (Q); Matt 19:28 = Luke 22:28–30 (Q); Mark 3:7–12; 4:10; 6:6–13, 35–41; 7:17–23; 8:27–38; 9:30–41; 10:10–12, 23–31; 13:1–37; Matt 10:5–6, 23, 40–42; 13:36–43, 51–52; 15:12–13; 16:17–19; Luke 9:51–56; 10:17–20; 11:1–2; 22:35–38; John 4:2; 6:60–71; 11:7–16; 13:1–17; 26; Gos. Thom. 6, 12, 13, 18, 20, 22, 24, 37, 43, etc.

<sup>52</sup> See Matt 8:5–9, 13 = Luke 7:1–10 (Q); Matt 11:2–5 = Luke 7:18–22 (Q); Matt 10:7–8 = Luke 10:9 (Q); Matt 12:22–30 = Luke 11:14–20 (Q); Mark 1:21–28, 29–31, 32–34, 40–45; 2:1–12; 3:1–6, 22; 5:1–20, 21–43; 6:30–44, 47–52; 7:24–30, 31–37; 8:22–26; 9:14–29; 10:46–52; Matt 9:27–31; 14:28–33; 26:53; Luke 13:32; 14:1–6; John 2:1–11; 5:2–9; 9:1–12; 11:28–44; etc.

showed special regard for unfortunates, and had disciples who followed him around, or the tradition is so corrupt that it is not a useful source for Jesus and the quest for him is hopeless. I admit that this conclusion is contained in my premise, which is that memory, if anywhere, must be in the larger patterns; but then nothing but this premise allows research to proceed.

It is in favor of what I am saying that scholars often conduct business as though what I am saying is true. They do not eliminate the Kingdom of God sayings or Jesus' use of "father" for God from the teachings of Jesus or the exorcisms from the ministry, despite their failure to pass the criterion of double dissimilarity. They continue to assign these items to Jesus I suspect simply because they are so frequently attested across most of the tradition. This is not a question exactly of multiple attestation—a particular saying or event being attested at least more than once in more than one source—but rather of recurrent attestation, by which I mean a theme or motif that is repeatedly attested throughout the tradition. Surely this is why we are confident that Jesus spoke about God as "father" and of the eschatological utopia as "the kingdom of God." By the same token, this is why we do not regard the baptismal command in Matt 28:18 as authentic. Nowhere else does Jesus speak of ritual baptism or sound like a proto-Trinitarian. The truth is that one could, if so inclined, urge that Matt 28:18 satisfies the criterion of double dissimilarity: Jewish sources certainly nowhere speak of baptism in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, and (aside from Matthew) first-century Christian sources also here fail us: they rather know of baptism in the name of Jesus. Yet this would be a specious argument for the authenticity of Matt 28:18.

The main point to take away from this discussion is that if we have memory in the tradition, then the first and most likely place to look for it is not in individual sayings that our traditional criteria seemingly endorse but in themes and motifs—as well as in rhetorical strategies such as the use of parables and hyperbole<sup>53</sup>—that recur across the sources. This must be our foundation, if we are going to think in these terms. This judgment certainly does not, let me emphasize here, imply that individual sayings and events do not go back to Jesus. I am rather making a statement about our own inability to authenticate most of the smaller bits out of which the whole is made. I doubt that we can very often mount much of a demonstration that this or that saying goes back to Jesus even if it does, or that he did this or that thing even if he did, or that this or that event happened to him even if it did. For the most part, I think the most we can safely do is to try and answer such questions as, Did Jesus say this type of thing? or Did he do this type of thing?

---

<sup>53</sup> See further Allison, Jesus of Nazareth, 49–50.

If the isolation of major, recurring themes and motifs and rhetorical strategies is where the reconstruction of Jesus ought naturally to begin, if it is to begin anywhere at all, we will need to correlate those themes and motifs and rhetorical strategies with whatever circumstances about his life we can recover with assurance, examples of which are: his rough dates (ca. 7–5 BCE–30/33 CE), his baptism by John the Baptist, his (last or only?) journey from Galilee to Jerusalem, his arrest and condemnation at the hands of the Romans, and his crucifixion. Whatever knowledge we have of his first-century Jewish world—although again I wish to emphasize this is quite imperfect—also belongs here.

There is one further thing that the evidence allows us to do. This is to posit a general religious type for Jesus, which we can do without recourse to the criteria of authenticity or disputable tradition-histories. For the last hundred years perhaps most New Testament scholars have approached the sayings of Jesus with the paradigm of Jesus as apocalyptic prophet. I am among those who buy into this paradigm, and I have on several occasions set forth my reasons for so thinking.<sup>54</sup> Let me here offer a summary of some of them:

i. Passages from a wide variety of sources show us that many early followers of Jesus thought the eschatological climax to be near. Consider the following, from six different first-century Christian writers:

- Acts 3:19–21: “Repent, therefore, and turn to God so that times of refreshing may come from the presence of the Lord, and that he may send the Messiah appointed for you, that is, Jesus, who must remain in heaven until the time of universal restoration that God announced long ago through his holy prophets.”
- Rom 13:11: “Besides this, you know what time it is, how it is now the moment for you to wake from sleep. For salvation is nearer to us now than when we became believers.”

---

<sup>54</sup> Dale C. Allison, Jr., “A Plea for Thoroughgoing Eschatology,” JBL 113 (1994): 651–668; idem, “The Eschatology of Jesus,” in The Encyclopaedia of Apocalypticism, 3 vols., ed. John J. Collins and Bernard McGinn (New York: Continuum, 1998), 1:267–302; idem, Jesus of Nazareth, 1–171; idem, “Jesus Was an Apocalyptic Prophet,” and “Response,” in The Apocalyptic Jesus: A Debate, ed. Robert J. Miller (Santa Rosa, CA: Polebridge Press, 2001), 17–29, 83–105.

- 1 Cor 16:22: "Our Lord, come!" (a traditional formulation; cf. Rev 22:20).
- Heb 10:37: "In a very little while, the one who is coming will come and will not delay."
- Jas 5:8: "You must also be patient. Strengthen your hearts, for the coming of the Lord is near."
- 1 Pet 4:17: "For the time has come for judgment to begin with the household of God..."
- Rev 22:20: "The one who testifies to these things says, 'Surely I am coming soon.'"

We also know that, in the pre-Easter period, Jesus himself was closely associated with John the Baptist, whose public speech, if the synoptics are any guide at all, featured frequent allusion to the eschatological judgment, conceived as imminent (see Matt 3:7–12 = Luke 3:7–17 [Q]). Jesus indeed was baptized by John. Obviously then there must have been significant ideological continuity between the two men.<sup>55</sup> So, as many have observed again and again, to reconstruct a Jesus who did not have a strong eschatological or apocalyptic orientation entails discontinuity not only between him and people who took themselves to be furthering his cause but also between him and the Baptist, that is, discontinuity with the movement out of which he came as well as with the movement that came out of him. Is not presumption against this?<sup>56</sup>

ii. The canonical gospels, traditions in Acts, and the letters of Paul are united in relating that at least several pre-Easter followers of Jesus, soon after his crucifixion, declared that "God [had] raised Jesus from the dead" (cf. Mark 16:6; Acts 2:24; Rom 10:9; 1 Thess 1:10) or vindicated him by "the resurrection of the dead ones" (Acts 4:2; cf. Rom 1:4). Their combined testimony on this matter is not doubted by anyone, so we may ask why people made this claim, why they affirmed the occurrence of an eschatological event. The best explanation is that several influential individuals came to their post-Easter experiences, whatever they were, with certain categories and expectations antecedently fixed, so that they already, because of Jesus' teaching, envisaged the general resurrection to be imminent.<sup>57</sup> This is why “resurrection” was for many the chief category by which to interpret Jesus’ vindication.

---

<sup>55</sup> More than usually admitted: Dale C. Allison, Jr., "John and Jesus: Continuity and Discontinuity," JSHJ 1 (2002): 6–27.

<sup>56</sup> This is an old and popular argument; the earliest appearance of it that I can recall is in Heathcote William Garrod, The Religion of All Good Men (New York: McClure, Phillips, 1906), 138. John Dominic Crossan, although he does not accept my conclusions, candidly recognizes the strength of this particular argument: "Assessing the Arguments," in Apocalyptic Jesus, ed. Miller, 122–123.

iii. According to Mark 15:33, when Jesus died there was a strange darkness (cf. Amos 8:9–10). According to Matt 27:51–53, there was also a strong earthquake (cf. Zech 14:5) and a resurrection of the dead (cf. Ezekiel 37; Zech 14:4–5). According to John’s Gospel, Jesus’ death was “the judgment of the world” (12:31) and brought down the reign of Satan (16:11). According to Paul, Jesus is “the first fruits of those who have died” (1 Cor 15:20)—a metaphor which assumes that the eschatological harvest is underway, that the resurrection of Jesus is only the beginning of the general resurrection of the dead. Given its multiple attestation in Paul, the synoptics, and John, the habit of associating the end of Jesus with eschatological motifs must go back to very early times.<sup>58</sup>

What explains this habit? The best answer is that, while Jesus was yet with them, his followers—as Luke 19:11 plainly tells us—“supposed that the kingdom of God was to appear immediately” (cf. Acts 1:6). They foresaw apocalyptic suffering followed by eschatological vindication, tribulation followed by resurrection.<sup>59</sup> So when Jesus was, in the event, crucified and seen alive again, his followers, instead of abandoning their apocalyptic hopes, did what one would expect them to do: they sought to correlate expectations with circumstances. This is why they believed that in Jesus’ end the eschaton had begun to unfold, and why early Christian texts associate the death and resurrection of Jesus with what appear to be eschatological events.<sup>60</sup>

iv. The Roman world of the first century was, in the words of Helmut Koester, “dominated by prophetic eschatology,” and the apocalyptic writings of Judaism, which share “the general eschatological spirit” of the Roman imperial period,<sup>61</sup> put us in touch with a type of eschatology that was well known in Jesus’ time and place. Not only did the sacred collection itself contain apocalyptic materials—for example, Isaiah 24–27, Daniel, Zechariah 9–14—but portions of 1 Enoch, some of the Jewish Sibylline Oracles, and the Testament of Moses were in circulation in Jesus’

<sup>57</sup> Cf. Walter Schmithals, “Jesus und die Apokalyptik,” in Jesus Christus in Historie und Theologie, ed. Georg Strecker (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1975), 67–68.

<sup>58</sup> See further Dale C. Allison, Jr., The End of the Ages Has Come: An Early Interpretation of the Passion and Resurrection of Jesus (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985).

<sup>59</sup> Allison, Jesus of Nazareth, 136–151.

<sup>60</sup> See further Allison, End, 142–162.

<sup>61</sup> Helmut Koester, “Jesus: The Victim,” JBL 111 (1992): 10–11.

day; and the decades after Jesus saw the appearance of 4 Ezra, 2 Baruch, and the Apocalypse of Abraham. His time was also when the Dead Sea Scrolls, so many of which are charged with apocalyptic expectation,<sup>62</sup> were presumably being composed or copied and studied. The point, reinforced by Josephus's remarks on the general popularity of the apocalyptic book of Daniel (Ant. 10.268), is simply that the sort of eschatology that Johannes Weiss and Albert Schweitzer and many after them have attributed to Jesus was indeed flourishing in Jesus' day. Social and political circumstances were perhaps ripe for the production of a millenarian movement; in any event the sense of an imminent transformation appears to have been shared by many. We can make the inference from the New Testament itself. For in the words of Barnabas Lindars, "the rapid expansion of Christianity would really be inexplicable except against the background of a widespread feeling amongst Jews of the day that they were living in the End Time. For it is . . . only because of the pre-understanding of the Bible in this eschatological sense, attested not only in Qumran and apocalyptic, but also to some extent in rabbinic sources, that the church's application of the whole range of Old Testament to Jesus could be felt to be a plausible undertaking and find acceptance."<sup>63</sup> The point for us is this: to propose that Jesus thought the end to be near is just to say that he believed what many others in his time and place believed.

v. Several New Testament texts compare Jesus with some of his contemporaries. In Matt 11:18–19 = Luke 7:33–34 (Q) Jesus compares his own ministry with the ministry of John the Baptist. In Mark 6:14 Herod Antipas says that Jesus is John the Baptist risen from the dead. Mark 8:28 reports that "people" thought Jesus to be like John the Baptist. And according to Acts 5:35–39, Rabbi Gamaliel compared Jesus and his followers with Theudas and his movement, as well as with Judas the Galilean and his movement. Now John the Baptist, Theudas, and Judas the Galilean were moved by eschatological expectation or hope for Jewish restoration. John proclaimed a near end—even Origen recognized that John's words in Luke 3 most naturally refer to "the end of time"<sup>64</sup>—and was thought of as a prophet. Theudas claimed to be a prophet,

---

<sup>62</sup> John J. Collins, Apocalypticism in the Dead Sea Scrolls (London: Routledge, 1997).

<sup>63</sup> Barnabas Lindars, "The Place of the Old Testament in the Formation of the New Testament," NTS 23 (1976): 62.

<sup>64</sup> Origen, Hom. Luke 23 SC 87, ed. Crouzel, Fournier, and Périchon, 312.

acted as a new Moses, and was viewed as a threat by the Romans. Judas the Galilean, according to Josephus, Ant. 18.5, sought independence for the Jewish people with the help of God. What follows? The comparisons in the canonical gospels and Acts, most of which are attributed to outsiders and which would be unlikely to have been generated by insiders, would be natural if Jesus was remembered as an apocalyptic prophet who proclaimed that God's kingdom would replace the Roman kingdom. They are not easily explained if he was not so remembered.

The five arguments just introduced are straightforward and powerful. They involve neither special pleading nor any questionable argumentation. They are, moreover, mutually reinforcing. That Jesus was baptized by an eschatological prophet and had among his followers people who proclaimed a near end, that certain followers of Jesus proclaimed his resurrection soon after the crucifixion, that his passion and vindication were associated with eschatological motifs, that many first-century Jews expected an apocalyptic scenario to unfold in their near future, and that our sources compare Jesus with others who believed in such a scenario or at least expected God soon to rule Palestine—these indisputable facts together tell us that Jesus held hopes close to those Weiss and Schweitzer attributed to him.

Where does all this leave us with respect to the many sayings and stories that stubbornly remain in the “possibly authentic” category? I believe that we need to admit that, as historians of the Jesus tradition, we are story-tellers. We can do no more than aspire to fashion a hypothetical narrative that is more persuasive than competing narratives, one that satisfies our aesthetical and historical sensibilities because of its apparent ability to clarify more data in a more satisfactory fashion than its rivals. Such a narrative will inevitably draw upon the various individual sayings and events to illumine points, but we will have to give up pretending to authenticate most of them. That is, “possibly authentic” sayings and events will serve us, not as foundations to build upon, but rather as illustrations of the apocalyptic paradigm and the larger patterns across the documents.

FOURTH QUEST? WHAT DID JESUS REALLY WANT?<sup>1</sup>

ERNST BAASLAND

Is it possible to find a new approach to Jesus research? After approximately 250 years of such research and at a point of time where the extent of such research has never been greater, it seems indeed difficult to find a new approach. Nevertheless, I do believe it is both feasible and necessary to single out a direction for the Jesus research in the years to come. This paper provides a sort of program and a few indications about such a direction, shedding some light also on the predecessors of this approach.

The trace or clue to finding this direction is to inquire about the purpose of Jesus, Jesus' motive—in other words asking the question, what did Jesus want? Influential people have a sort of program or vision. If they do not have an agenda, we become rather skeptical and assume a hidden agenda. Therefore we look carefully for words which express their program. According to the Gospel of Mark, Jesus does very clearly express his visions and wishes. In this article a more comprehensive study of Mark is not possible, where I have to examine the possibilities for finding the intention (purpose/vision) of Jesus. I try to discover the very purpose of Jesus through three steps of argument:

1. arguing from research-history, in order to show that this question is neglected,
2. tracing a methodological perspective, showing how necessary this question is,
3. developing some suggestions based on the Gospel of Mark.

1. A View of the History of Jesus Research

1.1. The Start of the Research History, Focusing the Aims of Jesus

From the perspective given in this paper, Jesus research started out very promisingly. Since A. Schweitzer's famed inventory of Jesus research<sup>2</sup> it has been a commonplace to say that Jesus research begins with H. S. Reimarus. There was indeed Jesus research also before that time,<sup>3</sup> and one may argue that the contribution of the Machiavelli-admirer Reimarus was not intensely groundbreaking. Nonetheless, Reimarus was the very first to intensively put forth the question—what did Jesus (and the disciples) want?<sup>4</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> The article is based on a paper given in August 2002 in the Jesus seminar at the SNTS meeting in Durham, England.

The follow-up to Reimarus's work, however, was greatly overdue. The critics of Reimarus's work did not focus on the same question. They tried to find a different battleground, that of source criticism. Thus another 201 years would pass before the next book on this topic arrived, The Aims of Jesus, written by the Canadian Ben Meyer.<sup>5</sup> I shall return to this book at a later stage in this article.

Reimarus/Lessing provoked a debate that shocked not only conservative Christians but also liberals. Consequently, both directions now pursued a new groundwork for the existing research, and that foundation was found in source criticism. On the basis of sound scientific backing, the Gospel of Mark was considered the oldest such source. Since the Gospel of Mark more often than the other evangelists alludes to the emotions of Jesus, the research conducted principally centred on the inner life of Jesus, arguably to the extent where the researcher assumed the role of a psychiatrist, more so than what the sources actually permitted. From a historic, theoretical perspective, there was a peculiar mixture of explanations based on motives and explanations resting on psychological virtues.

Schweitzer was early on critical of the psychological explanations. Moreover, W. Wrede had convinced Schweitzer that the Gospel of Mark did not reflect the historical Jesus, but rather the theology of the ancient church. He therefore wanted to provide research with an entirely new point of departure and, like Reimarus, Schweitzer focused on a direction leading to explanations based on motives. Already at the age of 25 he claimed to have discovered Jesus' true intention. While doing his obligatory military service in the idyllic surroundings of Guggenheim, Schweitzer read the "Commissioning of the Twelve" in Matthew 10. All of a sudden it struck him that the true vision of Jesus

<sup>2</sup> Albert Schweitzer, Geschichte der Leben-Jesu Forschung (Tübingen: Mohr, 1906).

<sup>3</sup> W. P. Weaver, The Historical Jesus in the Twentieth Century: 1900–1950 (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1999).

<sup>4</sup> Vom Zwecke Jesu und seiner Jünger (1778). Introduction and translation by George Wesley Buchanan as The Goal of Jesus and His Disciples (Leiden: Brill, 1970).

<sup>5</sup> Ben F. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus (London: SCM, 1979).

was to preach the supernatural kingdom of God, as opposed to a political and military kingdom, and to promote this message through the disciples.<sup>6</sup> According to Schweitzer, this was what Jesus really wanted. Jesus did not want to communicate a praiseworthy message about brotherly love and societal change, as the liberal theologians claimed.

Schweitzer's interpretation was inadequate from a methodological perspective. His research was, however, auspicious in the sense that he put the question of Jesus' motives and intentions back on the agenda. Odd as it may seem, Schweitzer's book actually somewhat benumbed the progress of Jesus research. In fact, so much so that the period from 1901–54 is labeled the No-Quest phase.

1.2. The Historical Jesus Research in the Twentieth Century

W. Barnes Tatum<sup>7</sup> has proposed the following sequence: Pre-Quest (before 1778), Old Quest (1778–1906), No Quest (1906–1953), New Quest (1953–85) and Post-Quest (1985–2000), whereas G. Theissen (and A. Metz)<sup>8</sup> presented a similar but different sequence: Critical Jesus-Quest (1774–1830), Liberal, optimistic Jesus research (1830–1901), The crisis of the Life of Jesus research (1901–1950), New Quest (1950–1980) and The so-called “Third Quest” (1980–).

A. Schweitzer and R. Bultmann spread, indeed, reluctance and pessimism concerning the results of Jesus research, but did not stop the production of scholarly Jesus books. In fact, more than 500 books on Jesus were published in this period. Only within the Bultmann school was it somehow noteworthy, as the “New Quest” became an important effort in New Testament scholarship. The name and the whole effort has primarily been linked to Bultmann's student (and critic), Ernst Käsemann. Käsemann's programmatic lecture in 1953 used the title “Neue Jesusfrage.” The label “New Quest” was, however, coined by James M. Robinson in his programmatic essay in 1959.<sup>9</sup> “New Quest” relates <sup>7</sup> In Quest of Jesus (Atlanta: John Knox, 1982; Nashville: Abingdon Press 2nd ed., 1999). On this basis many reviews of Jesus research have been written, and Jesus research in the last century is thus pictured as three waves: Old Quest (-1920), New Quest (1950–1980), Third Quest (1985–2000).

<sup>6</sup> Das Messianitäts- und Leidensgeheimnis: Eine Skizze des Lebens Jesu (Tübingen: Mohr, 1901).

Like the waves in the ocean Jesus research went through ups and downs, and the peaks of the waves came in the 1880's in the 1950's and in the 1990's.

<sup>8</sup> Der historische Jesus (1996). Translated as The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1998).

<sup>9</sup> A New Quest of the Historical Jesus (London: SCM, 1959).

naturally to “Old Quest”, which indeed was the very intention behind the New Quest. The New Quest gave a different and better approach than the Old Quest. In the research conducted after 1954, attention was centered on the classic historic question of what it is that we know for certain about Jesus. That at least was Käsemann’s starting point, but G. Bornkamm, E. Fuchs and G. Ebeling moved a step further by trying to trace the links between the teaching of Jesus and the preaching of the Kerygma,<sup>10</sup> which to a certain extent raises the question of Jesus’ intentions.

The representatives of the New Quest claimed, however, that the quest was “based upon new premises, procedures and objectives,”<sup>11</sup> but the question remains whether there is any difference between the “New Quest” and the premises put forth in some of the Jesus books from the period of 1920–50, i.e. the books of Bultmann and Dibelius. In my opinion, no striking difference can be traced.<sup>12</sup> However, some obvious features show the differences between the Old Quest and New Quest:

- No “Life of Jesus” in the sense of a biography can be written;
- No “Life of Jesus” in the sense of psychology (inner life) of Jesus can possibly be reached;
- No optimism concerning reaching the goal of the basic reality of the life of Jesus (i.e. the concept of L. Ranke: “was eigentlich gewesen ist”);
- The use of form criticism became crucial in the New Quest;
- The reconstruction of the personality of Jesus is impossible.

From this perspective, the question of Jesus’ intentions became rather dubious, and was indeed neglected by the representatives of the New Quest.

---

<sup>10</sup> G. Bornkamm, in his famous book Jesus von Nazareth (Stuttgart: Urban, 1956), saw Jesus’ “Unmittelbarkeit,” his vision of God and man without any apocalyptic or casuistic argumentation whatsoever. For E. Fuchs, e.g., in Jesus: Wort und Tat (Tübingen: Mohr, 1971), the way Jesus showed compassion for sinners, expressed in words and acts, as the core and as the bridge to the preaching of righteousness. G. Ebeling saw Jesus’ faith as the trust in God which transformed even death into hope, in “Die Frage nach dem historischen Jesus und das Problem der Christologie,” ZThK 36 (1959): 14–30.

<sup>11</sup> Bornkamm, Jesus, 2.

<sup>12</sup> Theologie und Methode: Eine historiographische Analyse der Frühschriften Rudolf Bultmanns (Wuppertal: Brockhaus, 1992), 423–433.

In the so-called No Quest period, ongoing Jesus research continued after 1950, although not to the same extent. It is one of the many paradoxes in scholarship that more Jesus books came out in the No Quest period than in the New Quest period. Particularly outside German scholarship and apart from the Bultmann school (e.g., J. Jeremias, E. Stauffer, L. Goppelt, O. Betz)<sup>13</sup> Jesus research flourished. Scholarship in the UK remained largely uninfluenced by German discussions. Broadly speaking, in the eyes of the Bultmann school this scholarship was uncritical, whereas the English scholars found a number of exaggerations and overstatements in German scholarship. German scholarship more or less excluded the christological titles as keys to understanding Jesus. Apart from C. H. Dodd,<sup>14</sup> and a few others, the opposite is the case in British scholarship (e.g., W. Manson,<sup>15</sup> T. W. Manson,<sup>16</sup> V. Taylor,<sup>17</sup> C. D. F. Moule,<sup>18</sup> and others<sup>19</sup> emphasised different titles).

In the years around 1960 there came a major shift in American scholarship. Reaction from the previous period was still present in the 1950's through H. Cadbury, J. Knox<sup>20</sup> and other representatives of the Chicago-school, such as E. Goodspeed. In the 1960's the dialogue within German and European scholarship became more intense. The universities in the USA started to recruit more professors from Europe (H. Koester, D. Georgi, N. A. Dahl, H. D. Betz, and others), and many American scholars (e.g. J. M. Robinson, R. H. Fuller) entered into dialogue with Jesus research within the Bultmann school. In the 1960's and 1970's there was relatively little to report on American Jesus research,<sup>21</sup> and this opened up the gap to be filled by the Third Quest in the 1980's.

<sup>13</sup> Was wissen wir von Jesus (Stuttgart: Kreuz Verlag, 1967).

<sup>14</sup> The Founder of Christianity (London: Macmillan, 1970).

<sup>15</sup> Jesus the Messiah (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1943).

<sup>16</sup> The Teaching of Jesus (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1931; 2nd ed., 1935); and H. D. A. Major, T. W. Manson, and C. J. Wright: The Mission and Message of Jesus (New York: Dutton, 1938; 1946).

<sup>17</sup> E.g., The Life and Ministry of Jesus (London: Macmillan, 1953).

<sup>18</sup> The Origin of Christology (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1977).

<sup>19</sup> C. J. Cadoux, The Historic Mission of Jesus (London: Lutterworth, 1941); H. E. Turner, Jesus: Master and Lord (London: Mowbray, 1953); R. H. Fuller, The Mission and Achievement of Jesus (London: SCM, 1954); I. H. Marshall, The Work of Christ (Exeter: Paternoster, 1969/1981).

<sup>20</sup> The Humanity and Divinity of Christ (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1967; repr., 1999).

<sup>21</sup> J. Reumann, Jesus in the Church's Gospels: Modern Scholarship and the Earliest Sources (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1968); I. H. Marshall, I Believe in the Historical Jesus (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1977). It was particularly important that J. A. Fitzmyer and R. E. Brown opened up a new type of scholarship, not only at the Catholic seminaries.

On the European continent, French (e.g., M. Goguel,<sup>22</sup> X. Léon-Dufour,<sup>23</sup> L. Cerfaux, E. Trocmé)<sup>24</sup> and Scandinavian scholarship (e.g., A. Fridrichsen,<sup>25</sup> H. Riesenfeld,<sup>26</sup> B. Gerhardsson, N. A. Dahl)<sup>27</sup> made substantial contributions to Jesus research, and from the German Catholic universities many important impulses were created (e.g., by R. Schnackenburg, F. Mussner, A. Vögtle, W. Trilling).<sup>28</sup> Generally speaking, Jesus research outside the Bultmann school had in mind not only the reconstruction of the historical facts but also somehow the intentions of Jesus.

In the 1980's and particularly through the organizing of the "Jesus Seminar" in 1985, the "Third Quest," a new wave of historical Jesus research, developed, in which the overriding question was what we know for certain about the historical Jesus.<sup>29</sup>

The representatives of the Third Quest gave indeed some new premises for the discussion compared with the New Quest:

- Skepticism about the criterion of dissimilarity;
- Emphasizing more the Jewishness of Jesus;
- Using archaeology;
- Using models from sociology and social anthropology, and emphasizing the socio-cultural setting for Jesus, particularly the Galilean and also the Hellenistic context;
- Using Q as a main witness;
- Using the Gospel of Thomas (i.e. extra-canonical writings) extensively.

<sup>22</sup> Jésus et les origines du christianisme (Paris: Payot, 1932/1950; 1946; 1947).

<sup>23</sup> Les évangiles et l'histoire de Jésus (Paris: Editions de Seuil, 1963).

<sup>24</sup> Jésus de Nazareth vu par les témoins de sa vie (1971). Translated as Jesus as Seen by His Contemporaries (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1973).

<sup>25</sup> Vem ville Jesus vara? Kristustrons historiska grundval enligt nutida bibelforskning (Stockholm: Bonnier, 1931). A. Friedrichsen's Jesus book has the title "Who Did Jesus Want To Be?" and in a number of articles he raises the question: "Does Jesus want to be the Messiah?"

<sup>26</sup> Jésus transfiguré (Copenhagen: Munksgaard, 1947).

<sup>27</sup> The Crucified Messiah and Other Essays (Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1974); Jesus in the Memory of the Early Church (Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1976).

<sup>28</sup> Fragen der Geschichtlichkeit Jesu (Düsseldorf: Patmos, 1966).

<sup>29</sup> The Third Quest has been reviewed by M. J. Borg, Jesus in Contemporary Scholarship (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1994); B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, eds., Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research (Leiden: Brill, 1994); Ben Witherington III, The Jesus Quest: The Third Search for the Jew of Nazareth (Carlisle: Paternoster, 1995); B. Holmberg, Människa och mer: Jesus i forskningsens ljus (Malmö: Arcus, 2001).

In spite of the disputed voting procedure on the authenticity of the Jesus traditions, the research gave many new impulses and insights, particularly through the focus on the socio-historical environment<sup>30</sup> and the Jewishness of Jesus.<sup>31</sup> Some were inspired by the works of G. Theißen who gave the sociological perspective a new foundation,<sup>32</sup> and by G. Vermes who gave new insights into the Jewish background of Jesus.<sup>33</sup> The Third Quest was from the very beginning a disparate movement (i.e. in the evaluation of authenticity, of the importance of the Gospel of Thomas, of the degree of Hellenistic impact on Judaism in the time of Jesus). They moved in different directions when it came to methodological approaches and to the actual theological interpretations.<sup>34</sup>

However, generally in the Third Quest one claimed to have a purely historical approach, denying any dogmatic interest. For most, but not all scholars, this filtered out the question of the intentions of Jesus as a part of the historical question.

1.3. A Sidewalk in the Research History: Scholars Focusing on the Aims of Jesus

Both the New Quest and the Third Quest concentrated on the reconstruction of the historical Jesus, asking primarily: What did Jesus say, <sup>30</sup> J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1991); idem, Jesus: A Revolutionary Biography (San Francisco: Harper, 1994); F. G. Downing, Christ and the Cynics: Jesus and Other Radical Preachers in First Century Tradition (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1988); M. Borg, Conflict: Holiness and Politics in the Teaching of Jesus (New York: Mellen, 1984); idem, Jesus: A New Vision (San Francisco: Harper, 1987); R. A. Horsley, Sociology and the Jesus Movement (New York: Crossroad, 1989); R. A. Horsley and J. S. Hanson, Bandits, Prophets and Messiahs: Popular Movements of the Time of Jesus (Minneapolis, MN: Winston, 1985).

<sup>31</sup> E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985); idem, The Historical Figure of Jesus (London: Allen Lane, 1993); J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew, vols. 1–3 (New York: Doubleday, 1991/1994/2001); J. Charlesworth, Jesus within Judaism (New York: Garden City, 1988); idem, ed., Jesus' Jewishness: Exploring the Place of Jesus in Early Judaism (New York: Crossroad, 1991).

<sup>32</sup> Soziologie der Jesusbewegung: Ein Beitrag zur Entstehungsgeschichte des Urchristentums (Munich: Kaiser, 1977). Translated as The First Followers of Jesus (London: SCM, 1978); Studien zur Soziologie des Urchristentums (Tübingen: Mohr, 1979). Translated as Sociology of Early Palestinian Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978).

<sup>33</sup> G. Vermes, Jesus the Jew: A Historian's Reading of the Gospel (London: Collins, 1973); idem, The Religion of Jesus the Jew (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1993).

<sup>34</sup> Some of the main tendencies are: (a) Jesus as a unique Jewish-Hellenistic (Cynic) wisdom teacher (J. D. Crossan, F. G. Downing, B. Witherington III, S. Patterson, L. Vaage, E. Schüssler Fiorenza), (b) Jesus as a marginal Jew, doing signs and wonders (J. P. Meier), or having a policy of compassion (M. Borg), (c) Jesus as a Galilean (R. A. Horsley, S. Freyne), a Galilean peasant (J. D. Crossan), (d) Jesus preaching the restoration of Israel (B. Meyer, E. P. Sanders, P. Fredriksen).

what happened, who was Jesus? Other scholars deal more extensively (mostly implicitly though) with the issue of Jesus' intentions:

- Particularly in the research that dealt with the Jewish roots of Jesus, scholars were forced to approach the question of understanding the intention of Jesus within a Jewish framework. Although light was not shed on the question of motive, this research set sound premises for an eventual proper understanding of this question. The question is at least implicitly raised in J. H. Riche's book Jesus and the Transformation of Judaism.<sup>35</sup>
- Many books on "synoptic theology" often tended to reveal more about the intention of Jesus than books that directly debated the historical Jesus. It may be argued that this is bound to happen when one focuses on the totality of Jesus' preaching and on the inner correlation of Jesus' preaching, while concurrently attempting to analyze the inner correlation of Jesus' deeds and words.
- Scholars who focus on the social history are forced to deal with the question of Jesus' intentions. After (however, also before)<sup>36</sup> 1968 some scholars gave a political interpretation of Jesus' intentions mostly based on the following facts: the cleansing of the temple, the sword word, the zealot among the disciples, the events leading to crucifixion and the very fact of a Roman crucifixion.

Concerning the question of Jesus' intentions, the contributions from representatives of the Third Quest have been minor at best. In spite of the title, even M. Borg's book Jesus, A New Vision<sup>37</sup> does not really face this question. Somehow independently of the efforts of the Third Quest, Ben Meyer raised the question about the purpose of Jesus in a philosophical and methodological fashion. Meyer claimed that Jesus' intention was to restore Israel. This point of view was, in turn, adopted by E. P. Sanders,<sup>38</sup> and the line back to books underlining the Jewish roots of Jesus is clear. However, Sanders is also trapped by the classic and necessary question: What do we know for certain about Jesus?

<sup>35</sup> (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1980).

<sup>36</sup> S. G. F. Brandon gave new arguments for the political interpretation of Jesus' intentions. His interpretation was rejected in very thorough analyses by O. Cullmann, M. Hengel, R. T. France.

<sup>37</sup> The content is more expressed in the rest of the title, Spirit, Culture, and the Life of Discipleship (San Francisco: Harper, 1987).

<sup>38</sup> Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985) and more so in his book The Historical Figure of Jesus (London: Penguin, 1993).

A. E. Harvey<sup>39</sup> opened up a broader perspective on Jesus' intentions, using the perspective of the constraints of history: Every man meets the constraints of his time and context, and Jesus met the political and religious constraints of his time. On this basis Harvey can raise the question of both Jesus' and his adversaries' intentions (in contrast to Reimarus who focused only on the intention of Jesus and his disciples).

The efforts of Meyer, Sanders and Harvey are on a broad basis followed up by N. T. Wright.<sup>40</sup> Meyer and Wright seem to see their effort as within the framework of the New Quest and Third Quest, even though they disagree with many of the premises in the two quests. Many of their methodological considerations and the way of questioning are indeed close to what I in this paper call the "Fourth Quest."

1.4. A Perspective on the History of Jesus Research

The Old Quest, the New Quest, and the Third Quest all aspired to conduct their research on an unmitigated historic-scientific foundation.<sup>41</sup> The effort in all three quests was and is to answer the question: What facts can Jesus research deliver? The three quests aim to sort the undisputable facts about the historical Jesus. One assumes the role of an observer who distinguishes the real and historical from more recent supplements. The individual standards and assumptions of the researcher were not to be amalgamated with such research. Indeed, Ranke's old conception of the ideal historian,<sup>42</sup> one who is able to discern what really happened independently of his or her own perspective, is still alive in New Testament research—even though Jesus research is an example of the very opposite. If there is any field of research where individual and trendy ideas are able to sneak in and take a place, it is in Jesus research.

---

<sup>39</sup> Jesus and the Constraints of History (London: Duckworth, 1982).

<sup>40</sup> The New Testament and the People of God (Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1992); Jesus and the Victory of God (Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1996); The Original Jesus (Oxford: Lion, 1996); The Challenge of Jesus (London: SPCK, 2000). B. Holmberg pushes Jesus research in the same direction, Människa och mer: Jesus i forskningsens ljus (Malmö: Arcus, 2001), 192–194.

<sup>41</sup> For a different approach see Gerd Theissen and A. Merz, Der historische Jesus: Ein Lehrbuch (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1996), operating with five periods in the Jesus research. Also G. Theissen and D. Winter, Die Kriterienfrage in der Jesusforschung: Vom Differenzkriterium zum Plausibilitätskriterium (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997), 1–3.

<sup>42</sup> For a critical evaluation, see W. P. Fuchs, "Was heisst das: 'bloss zeigen, wie es eigentlich gewesen ist,'" GWU 30 (1979): 655–667.

Bultmann reflected on a deeper level than the assumption of an observer and a subject-object perspective. He was well aware that the researcher is a participant, a part in the process who affects the object being studied. In his source-critical and form-critical work Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition he indeed sorted out the historical from the unhistorical traditions. In his book Jesus (1926) he focused more on the intentions of Jesus, sometimes using “unhistorical traditions” to illuminate these intentions. Thus, Bultmann’s Jesus book is one of the predecessors to the Fourth Quest.

In my study of Bultmann’s methodology I go a step further and show that the perspective of the researcher appears on the two main levels of historical methodology:

- even at the contemplation of sources (Quellenkunde / Quellenbeurteilung) there is a correspondence between (pre)assumptions about Jesus and the evaluation of the sources. I myself have documented this in my studies of the methodology Bultmann used in Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition.<sup>43</sup>
- even more so when the theory of history (Geschichtstheorie) is applied (or not). Up to now, these aspects have hardly featured in the debates within Jesus research. In this paper, I wish to contribute to the discussion one aspect of the theory of history, viz. explanations.

In a forthcoming study I argue that the historians leave their observer role most clearly on a third level of historical methodology:

- the presentation of history (Geschichtsschreibung), a stage that exegetes generally overlook but one that in recent times has received much attention from historians.<sup>44</sup> Since this aspect is particularly important, I shall deal with it in this paper.

I am convinced that an analysis of this level of historical methodology gives a new perspective on the history of Jesus research.

---

<sup>43</sup> Baasland, Theologie und Methode, 162–400.

<sup>44</sup> J. Rüsen, Für eine erneuerte Historik (Stuttgart: Frommann, 1976).

1.5. The Presentation of the Jesus of History seen from Hayden White's Categories

Much of the research of history consists of presenting the reconstructed history and, as the British historian Hayden White has shown,<sup>45</sup> the political perception belonging to the historian is inclined to color his or her presentation of history. White argues that such researchers tend to utilise the various literary styles, including tragedy, satire and comedy, when presenting history.

Emplotment	Explanation	Ideological Implication
Tragedy	Mechanistic	Radical
Satire	Contextualist	Liberal
Comedy	Organicist	Conservative
Romance	Ideographic	Anarchist

It is not difficult to see that historians use the above mentioned literary styles when they write history.

A tragedy operates within the category of “necessity”: Something has to happen, events unfold according to a given direction as if obeying a law. The old Greek tragedies contain some of this fatalism and Reimarus, D. F. Strauss, A. Schweitzer, R. Bultmann and most other scholars with a hypercritical evaluation of the gospels tend to see the life of Jesus from the perspective of tragedy. Despite Jesus’ own intentions, Jesus moves inevitably towards his death.

The Gospel of Mark is seemingly written in the form of tragedy. The event unfolds with a heavy inner necessity. Towards the end of the gospel Jesus cries out: “Father, Father, why have you abandoned me?” The fact that the Gospel of Mark also deals with another matter, namely the resurrection narratives, is somehow overlooked by both Reimarus and Schweitzer.

A great many Jesus books are written in the form of satire: Jesus’ intention is often portrayed as noble and good, but events took a different turn. Indeed, all the noble intentions safely guided him towards a meaningless death, and the church, in turn, emerged and created a theology that was incompatible with Jesus' own motives. This is the central focus of attention in the numerous discussions of the topic: What was Jesus and what has the church made him into?

<sup>45</sup> Hayden White, Metahistory: The Historical Imagination in Nineteenth-Century Europe (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1973), 29–31; also in his book Tropics of Discourse: Essays in Cultural Criticism (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1978), 66–68.

This question was raised early on by Reimarus and, at this point, there is a certain cohesion between the radical and liberal Jesus research. Both of these fields claim that events unfold differently from what the main character had expected. The situation thus forcefully creates solutions that often are contrary to intentions.

This is the very difference between these two directions and a history writing in the category of comedy, which many scholars tend to label as a more conservative history writing. Here the transformation that took place through the death and resurrection of Christ is not overlooked. The differences are viewed from the perspective of continuity. There is a bridge, not a breach, between the historical Jesus and the Jesus of the church. Therefore, more conservative writers of history lean towards the form of comedy.

Comedy, moreover, must of course be understood in the most banal sense of the word, as a play dominated by (entertaining) comedy. Within the field of literature, a comedy is a story that ends on a higher level than its starting point. Tensions are released, and this in turn brings about reconciliation and a form of higher unity. I, for one, would certainly write a Jesus book according to this form. However, in order to prevent the decision to choose this form from appearing random, the reasons behind such a decision need to be established. I shall do this in a rather pretentious manner by outlining a fourth direction in Jesus research and, furthermore, I shall also propose a methodology and provide a framework for a "life of Jesus."

2. Methodological Considerations

2.1. Is it Possible to Find Jesus' Intention?

It is quite audacious to claim that we are now in need of a new round of life of Jesus research. However, I am convinced that there indeed exists a need to further explore the historical Jesus that I encounter through the theory of history, a search which at the same time allows the historical, sociological and the theological perspectives to blend into the essential question: What did Jesus really want? What was Jesus' intention?

The very question of "intention" is not very precise. The frequently used terms like aim, goal, intention, vision, mission, etc., are only occasionally defined. The difficult task of definition need not surprise us. People do have a will to do different things. They have a variety of intentions, different motives and motivations for doing things, and a variety of plans and goals, etc. Often one's aims and intentions change through the years. Hardly anybody will speak about one's intention, and for a historical person it is even more difficult.

In the case of Jesus, theological or ideological premises are at stake and often intermingled in historical research:

- Some would argue: Jesus was in essence without will; he was bound by a divine plan that had to be followed. Such an argument is basically a presupposition, and is also in contrast with the pattern of thought in the Old Testament. It is a very consistent element in the scripture that God's plan changes according to people's responses. The same pertains to Jesus. If people had reacted and responded differently, the destiny of Jesus would also have been different.
- Others embrace a completely opposite point of view: Jesus was exposed to several random occurrences in the way that we are. In other words, incidental situations are essentially more determinative than the intentions of the individual. However, such approaches are not very productive. We need to presume that Jesus' intention to a large extent is reflected in Jesus' own words and deeds.

One may object against this task that this approach has too much in common with the struggle in the Old Quest for finding Jesus' self-consciousness (Selbstbewusstsein) or the inner life of Jesus. One must indeed avoid the psychological and otherwise subjective hypotheses in the Old Quest, which should be possible at this more developed stage of scholarship. Nonetheless, one must concede that it is not easy to answer the question at hand. Indeed, endeavours to provide an answer to this very question tend to yield more subjective answers than any other questions raised in Jesus research. Consequently, we are in need of a new method.

2.2. Methods in Jesus Research

Jesus research is still based on a methodology that is somehow different from the methodology in the science of history. In New Testament scholarship one has developed two main tools: A cluster of "methods" (literary, form, tradition and redaction criticism) differently understood and applied, and a list of criteria of authenticity,<sup>46</sup> also applied and understood in various ways. Both the methods and the criteria are in some respect strange in comparison with the methods used in the science of history. The problem with using a different methodology from general historical research is a challenge, and New Testament scholars must give their methods and results a better explanation or try to approach the current methods in general historical research. In this article I prefer the second option, but in this article I focus on only some aspects of the theory of history (Geschichtstheorie). The investigation of sources (Quellenkunde / Quellenbeurteilung) has of course vital importance for Jesus research, and must in the future be analyzed more in the categories of general history theory.<sup>47</sup> However, in a relatively short article I have to focus on the topic of general historical theory, which is overlooked in New Testament scholarship and might be a helpful tool in Jesus research.

2.3. Explanations of Motive are Essential in the Theory of History

The following distinctions are normally made within historical research:

- Causal explanations, covenant laws
- Motive explanations
- Functional explanations

In Jesus research, the first and last explanations have dominated.

Causal explanations

The most basic explanation for historians is that of giving causes for different events, and these kinds of explanations have indeed dominated the study of early Christianity.<sup>48</sup> In Jesus research, however, one rarely discusses this type of explanation. Therefore, explanations of causes tend to enter the research scene in more direct fashion, often in the shape of classification. When Jesus acted or preached the way he did, an explanation is to be found in his background, and Jesus is explained by means of classifications. The “causal explanations” are widespread in

---

<sup>46</sup> I.e., K. Kertelge, ed., Rückfrage nach Jesus, QD 63 (Freiburg: Herder, 1974); and my book Theologie und Methode, 230–261; and more extensively in Theissen and Winter, Die Kriterienfrage in der Jesusforschung.

<sup>47</sup> I give a review in my book Theologie und Methode, 163–191.

<sup>48</sup> C. G. Hempel’s groundbreaking article, “The Function of General Laws in History,” Journal of Philosophy 39 (1942): 35–48, gave impulses to many different debates. Examples from New Testament scholarship are given in my book Theologie und Methode, 390–400.

Jesus research. Sometimes they are very loosely introduced when scholars claim that Jesus is “influenced by,” “dependent on,” often so that Jesus is seen in the light of well-known parties: Jesus is a zealot, is influenced by Qumran, is a Pharisee, a Cynic preacher or a Galilean village preacher.<sup>49</sup> The problem with all classification is the openness of mostly all the categories mentioned here.

Functional explanations

In the Third Quest the functional explanations play a central role.<sup>50</sup> Theissen made the first attempt to incorporate such explanations in his book The Sociology of the Jesus-movement.<sup>51</sup> He suggests the following outline:

	Isolation/protest	Protest	Adaptation
Disintegrated	Immigrants	Thieves	Beggars
Integrated	Qumran	Zealots	Pharisees

According to Theissen, Jesus has elements from all of these methods of reaction, and he gives good reasons for this. Generally, however, in the “Third Quest” the functional explanations tend to be more simplistic: One assumes, and even postulates, certain needs that Jesus both reflects and responds to. For instance: Social grief leads to Jesus’ social message, political suppression leads to a zealous attitude, religious crisis leads to religious reformation.

Motive explanations

There exists, however, only a weak undercurrent in the research that deals with explanations of motive, as we have shown, following the path through 200 years (from Reimarus to Ben Meyer) of <sup>49</sup> J. Reumann gives in his article “Jesus and Christology” in New Testament and Its Interpreters, ed. E. J. Epp and J. D. MacRae (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1989), 501–564, esp. 521–523, a comprehensive list of possible categories: 1. Apocalyptic Messiah. 2. Great teacher. 3. Existentialist rabbi. 4. The Church’s resurrected Lord. 5. The prophetic Suffering Servant-messiah. 6. Essene-like Teacher of Righteousness. (7. Sacred Mushroom.) 8. Nazorean scheming Messiah. 9. Political revolutionist. 10. Pacifist. 11. Marxist-atheist interpretation. 12. Romantically involved pro-feminist. 13. The Magician. 14. A Jew, a Hasidic tsaddiq. The list shows how differently the cause-category functions.

<sup>50</sup> On a broader basis, see G. A. Cohen, “Functional Explanations, Consequence Explanation, and Marxism,” Inquiry 25 (1982): 27–56. Also W. Dray, Laws and Explanation in History (Oxford: Clarendon, 1957).

<sup>51</sup> Quoted from the German edition Soziologie der Jesusbewegung (Munich: Kaiser, 1977), 32–46.

Jesus research. B. F. Meyer still approached the question about intentions to some extent from a psychological perspective, using R. Collingwood's distinction between "actions" (intention, inside) and "events" (terms of bodies, outside).<sup>52</sup> However, I also intend to eventually move slightly beyond Ben Meyer, i.e., to avoid a psychological or even philosophical misunderstanding of the concept of "intentions."

There is indeed a fundamental difference between:

- intentions an acting person has, and
- intentions observed by an outside person.

An outside person will most often assume different intentions from the acting person himself. Our task is, however, as far as possible to reach the intentions of the acting person.

In general and from a historical point of view, this task is very difficult to investigate:<sup>53</sup>

- a person can have both open and hidden motives, and
- not every intention will be fulfilled in acts,
- a person can have more than one intention, and
- the aim can change during his lifetime.
- every motive/intention will meet limitations. Some historians distinguish between subintentional causality (a person's intentions are restricted by his background) and suprainentional causality (a person's intentions are restricted by his contemporaries and social context).<sup>54</sup>

As we see, motives are often complex in character, and a motive of an acting person has to be related to causality, and motive is often a cause for certain acts and situations.

From a theological point of view, some would argue that Jesus was in essence without will. An historian must always be on the lookout for a person's motive, seeking out the reasons for acting the way the historian does. The people that the historian consults and works with may have

---

<sup>52</sup> The Idea of History, 3rd ed. (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 3rd ed., 1970), a distinction supported by R. Bultmann, Geschichte und Eschatologie (Tübingen: Mohr, 1956), 155–163. Also P. Gardiner, The Nature of Explanation (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1961), esp. 46–50.

<sup>53</sup> Gardiner, The Nature of Explanation, 113–140.

<sup>54</sup> J. Elster, Strong Feelings: Emotion, Addiction and Human Behavior (Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1999).

other motives and this creates the tension through which history is played out. For this very reason, we cannot avoid the following questions, even though they may be the most difficult ones to answer:

- Did Jesus' adversaries also have noble motives?
- To what extent did Jesus make his motives known, or did Jesus in fact have "a hidden agenda"?
- If Jesus was not a regular human being but God's son, do we have any chance of grasping the true motives of Jesus?

Indeed, this last point of view may have contributed to creating a barrier to other relevant and necessary questions pertaining to Jesus' motives and intentions:

- his vision and wishes;
- his starting point and agenda;
- his preferences and premises;
- his situation, problems and debates among his contemporaries (his "constraints");
- his structure of thought.

2.4. Seeking a Consistent Methodology

We should therefore move to give a foundation for a possible new wave of Jesus research, trying to find a more unifying and more consistent methodology. Further research has to integrate many of the insights and premises from both the New Quest and the Third Quest. There are however two common and disputable assumptions in the two quests.

1. The effort of reconstructing a "critical minimum." The research follows two different steps: first reconstructing the authentic sayings, the "critical minimum," then understanding who Jesus is or what he wanted. E. Käsemann and E. P. Sanders, as influential members of the two quests (and many representatives of the Third Quest), aspired to conduct research on an unmitigated historic-scientific foundation in order to sort the undisputable facts about the historical Jesus.

2. The literary approach common to the two "Quests."<sup>55</sup> This is not an approach which starts with the phenomenon of orality. Bultmann's

---

<sup>55</sup> R. W. Funk and R. W. Hoover, eds., The Five Gospels: The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus (New York: Macmillan, 1993).

Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition was the very foundation for the New Quest as a highly literary approach, although the book was meant to be a form history for oral traditions.<sup>56</sup>

In both the New Quest and the Third Quest the Q-material comes in the first place in the reconstruction of the historical Jesus, and both treat Q as a literary source or rather as literary sources (Q<sup>1</sup>, Q<sup>2</sup>, Q<sup>3</sup>).

In addition there are various problems related to the two quests.

3. The Jewishness of Jesus was neglected in the New Quest, but has in the Third Quest (programmatically for example in E. P. Sanders) been important for the understanding of Jesus. The Jewishness of Jesus has to be a common premise in future research.

4. Consequently one has to give a better list of criteria used in the Jesus research. The main criterion in the New Quest, the criterion of dissimilarity, is correctly avoided in the Third Quest. The Third Quest has, however, neglected a further discussion of this topic.

5. The importance of the Gospel of Thomas must reach a higher level of agreement. The Gospel of Thomas was neglected in the New Quest and has become very important in the Third Quest, particularly in the “Jesus Seminar” branch of the Third Quest.

6. The very different conclusions about key issues like the evaluation of the apocalyptic teaching of Jesus are a problem for scholars. Can future scholarship give premises and methods which produce less diverse interpretations?

2.5. What about the Criteria of Authenticity?

There is plenty of material to be found in the gospels at which we shall now take a closer look. First, however, allow me to make a final

---

<sup>56</sup> See my extensive investigation in Theologie und Methode, 163–165, 180–182, 192–220, 262–303.

Also E. Güttgemanns, Offene Fragen der Formgeschichtlichen Methode (Munich: Kaiser, 1970). In his presidential address at the SNTS meeting in Durham 2002, J. D. G. Dunn was re-envisaging the early transmission of the Jesus tradition in “Altering the Default Setting: Re-envisaging the Early Transmission of the Jesus Tradition,” NTS 49 (2003): 139–175. He argued for “altering the default setting” of the literary presuppositions, stressing that the Jesus tradition was a living tradition. He assumes five characteristics of oral culture to be relevant also for the transmission of Jesus; 1. Oral performance is different from reading a literary text. 2. Presupposes a performer/story-teller/teacher. 3. Essentially communal in character. 4. Subverts the idea(l) of an “original” version. 5. Oral tradition—a combination of fixity and flexibility, of stability and diversity. It is interesting to compare Dunn’s lecture with H. Riesenfeld’s famous lecture at SNTS in 1957; see The Gospel Traditions and Its Beginnings: A Study in the Limits of Formgeschichte (London: Mowbray, 1957). He argued very similarly, but presupposed stronger the rabbinic parallels, and these parallels were thoroughly worked out by B. Gerhardsson in Memory and Manuscript, ASNU 22 (Lund: Gleerup, 1964).

methodological remark: While many of the old criteria of authenticity have been abolished, two of these have renewed relevance:

1. The criterion of coherence: All that is repeated in different forms of Jesus' words and, moreover, is illustrated through the acts of Jesus, must be historical.
2. The criterion of consequence: All that explains the emergence of the Jesus tradition, that Jesus is the only teacher, Jesus' death, as well as the emergence of the ancient congregation and the first Christian mission, must be historical.

In other words, research must also consider Jesus' actions when it wishes to say something about the motives and intention of Jesus. Jesus' intention must explain the following:<sup>57</sup>

- Jesus' death (including the motives of other participants, Jews and Romans, for wanting to get rid of Jesus):
- Jesus' actions in the temple, often referred to as the cleansing of the temple, must be explained: Was this a significant deed for Jesus and, if so, why?
- Jesus' meals with various groups, and finally the Last Supper with the ones closest to him parallel with the Jewish Passover meal;
- Jesus' miracles;
- Jesus' extensive teachings;
- Jesus' baptism by John the Baptist;
- Jesus' association with synagogue and temple.

Some researchers will claim that some of these characteristics are unhistorical. Based on the criteria of coherence and consequence, however, they become historically conceivable.

3. Some Suggestions about Jesus' Intentions Based on the Gospel of Mark

It is possible to start or end up with the Messiah question, as many scholars do who in a limited manner seek to find Jesus' intentions.<sup>58</sup> I think, however, that this question has to function more as a control.

---

<sup>57</sup> For this type of argument, see N. A. Dahl, Jesus the Christ: The Historical Origins of Christological Doctrine, ed. Donald H. Juel (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1991).

<sup>58</sup> G. Lohfink, Wie hat Jesus Gemeinde gewollt? (Freiburg: Herder 1982), has a limited approach, but has many observations relevant to the question of the intention of Jesus.

In the first place we have to find indirect evidence. In order not to let a specific method but rather the argumentation itself direct us, we choose an inductive path. What kind of indications do we find in the Gospel of Mark?

In this article I have to limit myself to putting forward some suggestions (without any deeper argumentation and without any discussion with other scholars)<sup>59</sup> and I have to focus on four observations.

3.1. Agenda Words

We must start by looking for words expressing Jesus' visions and wishes and in the Gospel of Mark we immediately come across them:

Mark 1:15: καὶ λέγων ὅτι
Πεπλήρωται ὁ καιρὸς καὶ ἤγγικεν ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ· μετανοεῖτε καὶ πιστεῦετε ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ

This is immediately followed up by Jesus' call to the first disciples:

Mark 1:17: καὶ εἶπεν αὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰησοῦς,
Δεῦτε ὀπίσω μου

These agenda-words are seldom labeled as unhistorical (leaving aside the formulation πιστεῦετε ἐν). Most scholars deal of course mostly with the content of these important words. The very fact, however, that Jesus formulated agenda words in which he utters his visions and program, is of particular interest in the present context.

The keyword "God's kingdom" is indeed a very significant feature in Jesus' teaching, and in spite of its openness for different interpretations, the term has a semantic core, which is also the core of Jesus' vision. The semantic core is the following pattern:<sup>60</sup> Here Jesus introduces us to another (apocalyptic/eternal) reality. People are drawn into a kingdom which belongs to God, where God alone is king.

<sup>59</sup> Some aspects are more elaborated in my article "Markus als Volkserzähler," in H. Gehrke, M. Hebler, and H.-W. Stork, eds., Wandel und Bestand: Festschrift Bernd Jaspert (Paderborn: Bonifatius, 1995), 15–32.

<sup>60</sup> Exhaustive analysis is given by B. Chilton, God in Strength: Jesus' Announcement of the Kingdom (Freistadt: Plöchl, 1979); M. Hengel and A. Schwemer, eds., Königsherrschaft Gottes und himmlischer Kult im Judentum und Christentum und in der hellenistischen Welt (Tübingen: Mohr, 1991). For a brief review of my own semantic interpretation: "Basileia tou theou: Jesu Verkündigung vom Reich Gottes," in Reich Gottes und Kirche, ed. H. Foerster, Veröffentlichungen der Luther-Akademie Ratzeburg B.12 (Erlangen: Martin-Luther-Verlag, 1988), 15–35.

God's kingdom/the kingdom of heaven is now offered as a gift and, at the same time, is a dynamic power. Jesus' mission was to present the coming of this kingdom, to offer it as a gift, to demonstrate its power through powerful words and deeds. Jesus' power was, however, demonstrated through powerlessness so that the power of love would be victorious.

The agenda words in Mark 1:14–17 correspond to the programmatic words in Mark 8:31–33. Most scholars tend to divide the Gospel of Mark into two main parts and at the beginning of the second part (8:26–28) Mark puts another agenda word:

He began to teach them that the Son of Man must suffer many things and be rejected. (Mark 8:31).

The historicity of this logion is disputed, particularly the reference to the resurrection (“after three days rise again”). The extraordinary saying about a suffering of the Son of Man fits, however, into the pattern given in the following agenda word, which (apart from the phrase ἔνεκεν ἐμοῦ καὶ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου) is generally recognized as a Jesus-saying:

Mark 8:35: ὃς γὰρ ἐὰν θέλῃ τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ σῶσαι ἀπολέσει αὐτήν· ὃς δ' ἂν ἀπολέσει τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ ἔνεκεν ἐμοῦ καὶ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου σώσει αὐτήν.

As in the first part, a main agenda word is accompanied by a call for others to follow his calling. Jesus provides us with a new sense of belonging through the radical call for others to follow.

3.2. The “I”-sayings

When attempting to grasp Jesus' motives and intention, it is necessary to take a particularly close look at the words through which Jesus according to the gospels implies what he wants. There are, in fact, a substantial number of words directly from Jesus indicating his intention.

In the synoptics alone, for instance, one may find approximately 70 words where Jesus places an emphasis on “I,” and many of these are formulated “I have come to,” “I have been sent to.” In Jesus research, words such as these have received remarkably little attention, in spite of the fact that a number of them are seen as historical even in the very critical tradition criticism.<sup>61</sup>

<sup>61</sup> E. Arens, The HΛΘON-Sayings in the Synoptic Tradition: A Historico-Critical Investigation, OBO 10 (Freiburg: Universitätsverlag, 1976). R. Bultmann focused on these words in Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition, 161–176 (see my critical review in Theologie und Methode, 246–248, 271–273, 290).

In Mark two types of “I have come to”-words are to be found:

1. Words indicating that Jesus would preach to and eat with groups or company one would not immediately associate with him:

Mark 1:38: εἰς τοῦτο γὰρ ἐξῆλθεν

Mark 2:17: οὐκ ἦλθον καλέσαι δικαίους ἀλλὰ ἁμαρτωλούς

Mark 10:45: καὶ γὰρ ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου οὐκ ἦλθεν διακονηθῆναι ἀλλὰ διακονῆσαι καὶ δοῦναι τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν.

The last saying has of course been disputed from a historical perspective, particularly the phrase λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν. The pattern that Jesus sees himself as a servant and powerful preacher, however, appears to be more general, and conveys Jesus’ own intentions.

2. Words marking Jesus’ unity with his disciples:

Mark 9:37: Ὃς ἂν ἔν τῶν τοιούτων παιδίων δέξηται ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματί μου, ἐμὲ δέχεται· καὶ ὃς ἂν ἐμὲ δέχεται, οὐκ ἐμὲ δέχεται ἀλλὰ τὸν ἀποστείλαντά με.

Similar sayings in Matt 10:40 and Luke 10:16 reflect the other side of the (coined) “follow me” sayings. Jesus identifies himself with the people he calls into discipleship.

Outside the Gospel of Mark we find two other types of “I”- sayings:

- Sayings showing him as a true Jew (Matt 5:17; 15:24)
- Sayings showing his radical demands (Luke 12:49–50; Matt 10:34–36)

The “I”-words in Mark are in effect only an elaboration on what has been called Jesus’ vision. A few contours, however, become even clearer:

- We see a new and unexpected God’s people, a group including publicans and sinners alongside more righteous individuals;
- Jesus turns our judgment scale upside down. The servant becomes the master, the powerless become powerful, the poor get rich, the weak strong.

3.3. Jesus’ Way of Teaching: Challenges and Questions!

As we know, the Gospel of Mark contains very few speeches and words of Jesus compared to the other evangelists while it, at the same time, more often stresses that Jesus taught and lectured (διδασχῆ, διδάσκειν κηρύσσειν etc. are frequently found in Mark).

However, even though we do not hear much about the content itself, Jesus' form of rhetoric nonetheless becomes clearer. Different areas of the research conducted throughout the past century have fairly stated that the form is essential in the way the content is understood. In the Gospel of Mark, the form is quite clear, and according to Mark two ways of learning (appellatives and questions) are characteristic:

1. The Challenges, appellatives. A few examples are found already in the beginning of the Gospel:

Mark 1:15: μετανοεῖτε καὶ πιστεύετε ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ.

Mark 1:17: Δεῦτε ὀπίσω μου, καὶ ποιήσω ὑμᾶς γενέσθαι ἀλιεῖς ἀνθρώπων.

Mark 1:25: Φιμώθητι καὶ ἔξελθε ἐξ αὐτοῦ.

Mark 1:44: Ὅρα μηδενὶ μηδὲν εἶπης, ἀλλὰ ὑπαγε σεαυτὸν δεῖξον τῷ ἱερεῖ καὶ προσένεγκε περὶ τοῦ καθαρισμοῦ σου ἃ προσέταξεν Μωϋσῆς, εἰς μαρτύριον αὐτοῖς.

I shall halt here, although I could keep going through the entire Gospel of Mark. This form is yet another expression of Jesus' unwillingness to theorize. Jesus wanted to move people. Jesus wanted people to understand what he himself so clearly illustrated: that words and deeds go hand in hand.

2. The Questions. Jesus wanted people to question their actions. Thus, he often asked his listeners questions they had to answer:

Mark 2:8: Τί ταῦτα διαλογίζεσθε ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις ὑμῶν;

Mark 2:19: Μὴ δύνανται οἱ υἱοὶ τοῦ νυμφῶνος ἐν ᾧ ὁ νυμφίος μετ' αὐτῶν ἐστὶν νηστεύειν; ὅσον χρόνον ἔχουσιν τὸν νυμφίον μετ' αὐτῶν οὐ δύνανται νηστεύειν.

Mark 2:25: Οὐδέποτε ἀνέγνωτε τί ἐποίησεν Δαυὶδ ὅτε χρεῖαν ἔσχεν καὶ ἐπέπεισεν αὐτὸς καὶ οἱ μετ' αὐτοῦ

Mark 3:4: Ἐξεστὶν τοῖς σάββασις ἀγαθὸν ποιῆσαι ἢ κακοποιῆσαι, ψυχὴν σῶσαι ἢ ἀποκτεῖναι; οἱ δὲ ἐσιώπων.

Indeed, we could go on like this up to Jesus' final words, again in the form of a question:

Mark 15:34: Ελωι ελωι λεμα σαβαχθاني; ὅ ἐστιν μεθερμηνεύομενον Ὁ θεός μου ὁ θεός μου, εἰς τί ἐγκατέλιπές με;

A few similarities may actually be found between Jesus and Socrates, for example in the way that they wanted to set people in motion. The way in which people thought had to be set in motion, and Jesus does this by asking simple, yet challenging and key questions. It is not incidental that even the parables of Jesus often end up posing a question.

The challenges and questions are not arbitrary forms. The forms are very much related to his vision statements, the challenges go from and the questions lead to his vision. Many of these questions and appeals will incite an internal revolution. Due to the fact that many appellatives and questions deal with the theme of purity, we can illuminate Jesus' vision of an internal revolution through these sayings.

Form and content: The concept of purity as an example

K. Berger<sup>62</sup> and other scholars have in more recent times pointed to the contradiction between, on the one hand, a restrictive and, on the other, an attacking concept of purity. It was easy for a Jew to believe that sacredness and purity come from within. With his attacking concept of purity, Jesus represents something entirely new.

Within this context one must also understand the cleansing of the temple. Jesus asks (Mark 11:17): "Is it not written: 'My house will be called a house of prayer for all nations'? (But you have made it a den of robbers)."

There are many ways in which this event may be understood:<sup>63</sup>

Zealotic	Priestly	Restorational	Prophetic	Christological
Protest against those who cooperate with Romans	Renewal of the old cult	Condemnation of the present cult and appeal for an eschatological renewal	Call for repentance and opening up for new people	Replace the temple and its cult with his atonement

The event itself is not intelligible and Jesus does not at this point explicitly provide us with any clues as to his vision. However, when examined in a correlation with Jesus' words and deeds, only the last three interpretations are relevant. From the perspective of the attacking concept of purity, on other hand, the last two appear the most conceivable.

3.4. The Theocentric Orientation

Did Jesus have personal ambitions, did he have underlying human intentions (political, social, religious), or did he not want to follow

<sup>62</sup> "Jesus als Pharisäer und frühe Christen als Pharisäer," NovT 30 (1988): 231–262.

<sup>63</sup> All five interpretations have a long history. E. P. Sanders has, however, in his recent books renewed the restoration theory, whereas J. Ådna in his book, Jesu Kritik am Tempel: Eine Untersuchung zum Verlauf und Sinn der sogenannten Tempelreinigung Jesu, Markus 11, 15–17 und Parallelen, WUNT 2.119 (Tübingen: Mohr, 1995), 376–432, has given the christological interpretation a new foundation.

God's will? The fact that the contradiction God-human plays a key role in the Gospel of Mark has been given far too little attention,<sup>64</sup> and we need an extensive exegetical investigation of at least three types of sayings:

- Sayings of Jesus, in which he stresses that God's will is the sum and substance:

Mark 3:35: ὃς ἂν ποιήσῃ τὸ θέλημα τοῦ θεοῦ, οὗτος ἀδελφός μου καὶ ἀδελφὴ καὶ μήτηρ ἐστίν.

- Sayings about Jesus' agenda that correspond to God's will:

Mark 14:36: Take this cup from me. Yet not what I will, but what you will (οὐ τί ἐγὼ θέλω ἀλλὰ τί σύ).

Mark 15:34: ἐβόησεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς φωνῇ μεγάλῃ, Ελωι ελωι λεμα σαβαχθاني; ὁ ἐστὶν μεθερμηνευόμενον Ὁ θεός μου ὁ θεός μου, εἰς τί ἐγκατέλιπές με; (also Mark 12:14).

- Sayings about the difference between God's will and the will of human beings:

Mark 8:32: He rebuked Peter: "Get behind me Satan", he said, ὅτι οὐ φρονεῖς τὰ τοῦ θεοῦ, ἀλλὰ τὰ τῶν ἀνθρώπων

Mark 9:31: Ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου παραδίδοται εἰς χεῖρας ἀνθρώπων

The Gospel of Mark tells us that Jesus' intention was to fulfill God's will and plan. This happens even though other individuals had completely different motives.

The listed features are clearly typical for the Gospel of Mark. However, all three synoptic gospels have the same features, but not as predominantly as in Mark. Matthew and Luke convey the traditions from Mark, but in the material that is peculiar to Matthew and Luke, we have fewer occurrences of the listed characteristics.

A "multiple attestation" does not necessarily prove that the features are historical. But even if we use Bultmann's critical view of the tradition as an "Occam's razor," most of the instances mentioned here are perceived to be historical. Bultmann evaluates seven of the "I-words" as historical.<sup>65</sup> This strengthens my argument in this article that the intention of Jesus can be reconstructed, and the question about what

<sup>64</sup> John R. Donahue, "A Neglected Factor in the Theology of Mark", JBL 101 (1982) 363–394.

<sup>65</sup> Geschichte der Synoptischen Tradition, 164–168, and my analysis—also of Bultmann's growing skepticism, in Theologie und Methode, 246 ff.

Jesus really wanted can in light of recent research and with a better methodology be given a clear answer.

4. Conclusion: The Need for a 'Fourth Quest'

The history of Jesus research shows that every new wave levels out and the scholarly effort reaches certain impasses. The "Third Quest" is definitely at this stage, and needs to be replaced by a "Fourth Quest." I have attempted to outline this fourth path in Jesus research. The article has endeavoured to argue the following:

- That it is both possible and of scholarly importance to search for Jesus' motive and intention;
- That a revised methodological foundation is needed;
- That a cluster of forms and contents give us an obvious pattern of thought, which is the very core of Jesus' intention;
- That Jesus research thus far has not come far enough on this point and a broad effort in a "Fourth Quest" movement can move Jesus research into a new path.

This research can be based on the following principles:

- Using methods which are not specific to New Testament scholarship but in common with methods used in general history;
- having a methodology for investigating motives;
- emphasizing the criteria of consequence and consistency;
- emphasizing the Jewishness of Jesus in a Hellenistic environment;
- using archaeology and
- combining social anthropology, sociology, narrative analysis and rhetorical criticism;
- using both Mark and Q as primary sources;
- focusing on the intentions and the vision of Jesus.

Based on these principles Jesus research will concentrate on Jesus' focus, his program and vision, which he accomplished in both words and deeds. Through this way of questioning, the "Fourth Quest" might give us not only a new wave, but a new era in Jesus research.

THE SEARCH FOR JESUS' SPECIAL PROFILE

JÜRGEN BECKER

1. The Problem

In a strictly private and anonymous manner, on the basis of rationalistic theology, a professor in Hamburg began to share the first Leben Jesu with a limited circle of readers. After the author's death, G. E. Lessing published his posthumous papers, without however revealing his name; a century passed before D. F. Strauß identified the unknown scholar as H. S. Reimarus. Reimarus could have no idea of the impact his observations Von dem Zwecke Jesu und seiner Jünger ("On the goal of Jesus and of his disciples") would make. From this modest rivulet, a mighty stream has grown by stages, becoming ever more diversified, especially in the last generation, so that today there is no continent, (almost) no religion, no Christian denomination or confession, no important cultural or societal trend, and no professional group producing academic literature, poetry, music, or films, which is not involved in this undertaking. It is impossible for one single person to have an overview of this staggering plurality.

Many presentations of Jesus discuss the methodological path that their authors have taken, and this essay will focus exclusively on this aspect. When we look for innovative statements in the contemporary scene, it is natural to turn to the authors who belong to the so-called "Third Quest."<sup>1</sup> The dynamism in this most recent trend in the historical investigation of the life of Jesus has given a new impetus to pluralism, but it has also taken over a number of epicenters of discussion, including the following:

First, the study of new sources and the extension of the field of research, e.g. by taking into account the agrapha and those gospels which have become apocryphal, the texts found at Qumran and Nag Hammadi, the archaeological discoveries in the Mediterranean area (including epigraphical texts), and the history of the territory of Galilee and Judea.

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. the overviews in Cilliers Breytenbach, "Jesusforschung: 1990–1995," BThZ 12 (1995): 226–249; Marcus J. Borg, Jesus in Contemporary Scholarship (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1994); and Mark A. Powell, How Modern Historians View the Man from Galilee (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998).

Secondly, new methodological approaches, e.g. the discussion of the gospels from the viewpoint of literary history, which studies the stages of development in various directions; investigations of the structure of ancient societies from the perspective of social and cultural history, including cultural anthropology and similar specific fields; and a discussion of the criteria to be applied in the search for the oldest material about Jesus and in making differentiations within this material.

Thirdly, the new evaluation of traditional problems, e.g. the relationship between written texts and orality; the investigation of Q; the option in favor of a Jewish understanding of Jesus; and the (frequent) detachment of research into Jesus from the history of Christianity.

Fourthly, a perspective on Jesus suggested by contemporary questions, e.g. feminism, gender research, and the Christian-Jewish dialogue.

This overview indicates where the methodological focal points lie. We shall now look at the most important of these.

2. The Sources

Like the Baptist and other early Jewish prophets, Jesus and his circle of disciples worked in a non-literary context, and this is why we have no written testimony from Jesus or his circle comparable to that which we possess for Josephus or Philo, the Teacher of Righteousness, or Bar Kochba. According to Luke 4:16–30, Jesus could read; but this probably reproduces Luke's own view, since it is he who elaborates Mark 6:1–6 here and introduces this motif. Luke relates that Jesus was handed a scroll of Isaiah in the synagogue. At any rate, the way in which early Judaism treated the Hebrew Bible excludes the possibility that Jesus and his circle had parts of the Bible in their private possession and carried these texts around with them. This means that Jesus' knowledge of the Bible is the work of his memory; it does not involve literary quotation. Nor did the disciples of Jesus express themselves in literature (cf. Acts 4:13). Attempts to claim them as authors must be judged unsuccessful: when the headings of early Christian literature present names from the group of Twelve, these attributions are intended to guarantee the authority of the works in question. They tell us nothing about the authorship. In other words, Jesus lived with his disciples in an oral culture.

This accords with the observation that the narrative sections in the gospel literature do not have the style of first-person or eyewitness accounts, but are expressed in the way that those who are not themselves eyewitnesses draw up an account and tell this to others. This is not the case with the transmission of logia in the gospels. Here, we frequently find the first-person style, with Jesus as the speaker, and this makes it more likely that we can come close to Jesus' own words here, even if we encounter problems when we seek to test this possibility—since it is clear that even the transmission of logia, no matter how stable this may have been in individual cases, is embedded in literature which is chronologically and personally remote from Jesus' activities (which for the authors of this literature belong to the past).

What testimony do we in fact possess when we study Jesus? We find Roman information after 100 CE in Pliny the Younger, Tacitus, and Suetonius. They tell us very little about Jesus: they inform us that he lived, when he lived, and where he lived, and that he was executed under Pilate.

The Jewish literature is likewise unhelpful for our task: the two passages in Josephus (Ant. 18.63–64; 20.200) are disputed,<sup>2</sup> and are probably Christian interpolations. At any rate, the more important passage, in Ant. 18, can be ascribed to Josephus only if one excises the Christian clauses. The only argument in favor of doing so is their Christian character; but since the passage is otherwise syntactically smooth and well structured, this is not the best of arguments. Nor do we have any early rabbinic statements about Jesus from the Tannaitic period.<sup>3</sup> In sum, this is a meager harvest.

The historian is thus compelled to rely exclusively on the Christian testimonies. Since the biblical canon cannot function as a limitation on historical research, we must in principle take heed of:

1. the four canonical gospels;
2. the gospels which later became apocryphal;<sup>4</sup>
3. the transmission of individual scattered traditions about Jesus from various sources;<sup>5</sup>

---

<sup>2</sup> Cf. James H. Charlesworth, Jesus within Judaism (New York: Doubleday, 1988): 90–102; Dieter Sänger, "Auf Betreiben der Vornehmsten unseres Volkes," in Das Urchristentum in seiner literarischen Geschichte: Festschrift Jürgen Becker, ed. Ulrich Mell and Ulrich B. Müller (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1999), 1–25.

<sup>3</sup> Joseph Maier, Jesus von Nazareth in der talmudischen Überlieferung, EdF 82 (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1978).

<sup>4</sup> Dieter Lührmann, Fragmente apokryph gewordenen Evangelien, MThSt 59 (Marburg: N. G. Elwert, 2000).

<sup>5</sup> Including some additions in manuscripts of the canonical gospels, e.g., after Luke 6:4 and John 7:53–55.

4. individual pieces of information in early Christian writings apart from the gospels.<sup>6</sup>

This sequence indicates their relative importance. Point 4 refers to a small quantity of data which the gospels in point 1 can confirm in some instances. Although the number of traditions under point 3 is extensive, a closer examination shows that only a few merit serious consideration when an historical methodology is applied to the study of Jesus. One who ignores these traditions will not be overlooking any otherwise unknown aspect of the figure of Jesus.

This is not the case with point 2. It is regrettably true that, with the exception of the Nag Hammadi texts, these gospels are fragmentary and hence hard to date. It is particularly difficult to get a sufficiently clear picture of the concept which guides their presentation; at most, one can attempt a vague estimate of the processes of reception, e.g. of texts from point 1. This is why many scholars are right to criticize the high evaluation and early dating which have been proposed by J. D. Crossan.<sup>7</sup> Things are different with the gospels discovered at Nag Hammadi, since the favorable conditions of transmission offer a better basis for an interpretation.

This is particularly true of the Gospel of Thomas.<sup>8</sup> Here too, however, the arguments in favor of an early dating are weak, since it ought to be possible for scholars to agree that the final stage of the tradition and the final redaction have an ascetic, early gnostic character and that the synoptic influence is obvious in some passages. This means that the Gospel of Thomas in its present form must be dated to the period after the synoptics were written. The autonomous arrangement of the logia makes it clear that the Gospel of Thomas cannot have borrowed its structure from the synoptics, but is independent of them. An examination of the individual logia and the smaller groups of logia shows that they too in general bear witness to an independent history of reception, but the question how far this development reaches back into the history of Christianity is a matter of vigorous controversy. It can only be discussed on the basis of individual instances. We can sum up the discussion as follows: there has been no scholarly consensus about attributing to Jesus any logion in the Gospel of Thomas which offers material not found in the synoptics, since such an attribution is possible only via a series of hypothetical arguments. There is a greater likelihood of success in the case of some parallels to the synoptics, where one can discuss whether the better version survived in particular formulations, sentence structures, or omissions in the Gospel of Thomas—but such examples are not numerous, and the substantial results for the reconstruction of Jesus' preaching are modest. There is no instance in which entire groups of logia from the Gospel of Thomas could be made the starting point of an account of the preaching of Jesus. This means that the Gospel of Thomas will not play a primary role in our discussion of methodology.

<sup>6</sup> I.e., information which is not influenced by the canonical gospels, e.g., Acts 2:36; 3:13; 18:25; Rom 1:3; 1 Cor 1:13, 17–18; 11:23–25; 1 Thess 2:14–15; 1 Tim 6:13; Rev 11:8.

<sup>7</sup> John D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1991).

<sup>8</sup> Jens Schröter, Erinnerung an Jesu Worte, WMANT 76 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1997), with an overview of scholarship on pp. 122–124. Cf. also Christopher Tuckett, "Thomas and the Synoptics," NovT 30 (1988): 132–157; Helmut Koester, Ancient Christian Gospels: Their History and Development (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990), 75–128; Risto Uro, ed., Thomas at the Crossroads: Essays on the Gospel of Thomas (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1998).

This leaves us with the texts under point 1 as the basis for our investigation. In this group, John has a position apart, since it offers a type of proclamation which is fundamentally different from that of the synoptics. The Johannine perspective is incompatible with the synoptics, since the one who is sent, who comes from the Father and returns to him, makes himself the subject of his own proclamation in a dualistic world and (with the exception of John 3:3,5) ignores the entire proclamation of the synoptic Jesus, who said that he brought the realization of the rule of God. Since John is the Gospel with the most highly developed christology, we must decide in favor of the synoptics. This position has been broadly accepted since H. J. Holtzmann. Some breaches in the dam have been made recently,<sup>9</sup> but the choice is ineluctable: either Jesus spoke logia such as John 6:35; 10:30; 11:25–26; and 14:2–3, 6, which are embedded in the christology of the one sent by the Father, or else (as in the synoptics) he interpreted and brought about the reign of God.

It is difficult to explain the genesis of the special development in the Johannine circle, but we must assume that such a development took place, since all the recognizable traditions about Jesus outside the canonical gospels, where these can be dated to the first two generations of earliest Christianity, accord with the synoptic type of logia, whether they are given a literary form (as in Paul) or can be traced back to this period (e.g. Jas 5:12 = Matt 5:33–34.). How are we then to explain the Johannine phenomenon? This must be connected with the understanding of the Spirit that is expressed in John 14:16–25, i.e. with the emphasis on the immediacy of the Son in the Spirit. The other Christian groups took a different path. They too believed that the Spirit was the voice of Christ, who gave the communities the ability to bring the Jesus tradition up to date and to give this a new form; but the link to the historical Jesus remained much more stable.

---

<sup>9</sup> Klaus Berger, "Kriterien für echte Jesusworte," ZNT 1 (1998): 52–58.

In addition to a small number of parallels to the synoptics, John's transmission of the words of Jesus also includes narrative parts which are similar to the synoptics. Here—especially in the tradition about John the Baptist, in some miracle stories, and in the passion narrative—we find information which may possibly correct the synoptic accounts; at the very least, these cases must be discussed. Nevertheless, it remains true that one who wishes to see the basis which makes it possible to approach the activity of Jesus will choose the synoptics.

These are not mutually isolated, independent witnesses. The well known two-source theory remains the best account of their interdependence.<sup>10</sup> This affirms that Mark is the first gospel, most of which was taken over by Matthew and Luke, who retained the sequence of Mark's narrative. They also integrated in independent and various ways the so-called logia source (Q, for the German word Quelle) into their own narratives, once again respecting its sequence; each evangelist also integrated special material into his concept. The two-source theory does not resolve all the problems, but we can come to terms with some of these if we assume that Matthew and Luke found their pre-texts in somewhat different forms. Without going into details here, I note that the other attempts to explain the close relationships between the synoptic gospels have not achieved a consensus, and that they have created more problems than they solved.

This limits the group of texts which constitute the basis for historical research into Jesus to Mark, Q, and the special material in Matthew and Luke, as well as some pieces of information in John. The next step must be to give a more precise description of Mark and Q, because it is these texts which decide the “window” we use when we look at Jesus.

---

<sup>10</sup> Cf. Udo Schnelle, Einleitung in das Neue Testament (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2nd ed., 1996), 200–214.

3. The Activity of Jesus as the Event which Initiates the End-Time

Until the European Enlightenment, it was universally accepted that, apart from a few uncertain details which were in any case insignificant, the gospels presented the facts about Jesus' life. The Enlightenment prompted a controversial debate about the extent to which the criticism of dogma must also be applied to the gospels. Must one not subject the early Christian sources themselves to a critical inquiry? One result of this discussion (which continues even today) is that we must clarify methodologically the specific manner in which the gospels relate history.

In their discussion of this question, scholars concentrate on Mark, where they try out recent theories about the nature of history and concepts drawn from the contemporary theory of literature. So many varieties of this kind of investigation flourish today that some have felt the need to point out its problematic aspects.<sup>11</sup> One cannot object to a discussion of methodologies per se, but one must ask whether these new methodologies actually take us anywhere. And we are in fact entitled to doubt this, since often all that these theses do is to select a new understanding of history or a new literary theory with its conceptual roots in today's culture as a means of approaching ancient texts, without recognizing the inherent problem: viz. that the culture of classical antiquity was based on different principles. One who does this reduces the ancient texts to mere instances for the application of the modern theory x. And this proceeding scarcely differs from the rationalism of the past which submitted the miracles in the gospels to the court of its own understanding of reason, and did not bother to examine the presuppositions on which the understanding of reality was based in classical antiquity.

Let me give two examples of this procedure. The gospels present an understanding of history which sees a person, who is described in numinous terms, bringing about the last days and continuing to determine this epoch. On such a view of reality, the reign of God which comes into being through Jesus is not merely a way of living in the immediate present, i.e. a plan for society. It determines God's eschatological relationship to the world, which results in a reordering of the world. One who understands this theological complex only as the dream of an individual, and then dismisses it as irrelevant (because reality can be defined only in societal terms),<sup>12</sup> no longer allows the texts to say what they want to say. We must deal with this foreignness of the texts in such a way that they are described correctly and are then treated as contributions to a discussion of the understanding of reality.

---

<sup>11</sup> Andreas Lindemann, "Exegese für Theologie und Kirche," in Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft, ed. Eve-Marie Becker, UTB 2475 (Tübingen: A. Francke, 2003), 64–71, at 69.

Similarly, most modern theories about literature take for granted an understanding of authorship, of the mode of production, and the manner of reception which is common in the study of texts today; but the ancient world did not share this understanding. For example, contemporary theories are based on the following approach: one author creates a new and homogeneous text, and individual recipients everywhere in the world read this text by discovering its unified textual genres, its plots, and its many internal relationships through the act of reading (which may be repeated if necessary). In classical antiquity, however, in addition to the never very numerous group of writers and those with a literary education, there also existed the widespread phenomenon of many-layered texts which came into being through the reinterpretation of individual traditions, of collections, or of texts which had taken on a literary form, so that these became “sources.” These were given new literary contextualizations in a new, larger text—but not even this text was regarded as sacrosanct. Its appearance could be changed by means of additions and revisions. I have already mentioned that Q circulated in various versions. Mark too was still open for revisions, as is indicated by the minor agreements and the material found only in Mark. The canon of the prophets and early Jewish literature offer many examples of this kind of textualization. This is how traditions take on a written form. Texts grow in a variety of ways within a community, and they belong to this community as a whole. The authors and revisers withdraw into anonymity. In principle, one who accepts the two-source theory includes the synoptic gospels in this literary category, despite the fortunate circumstance that they are the product of a far less complex history than for example the Book of Isaiah, and that their authors, especially Luke, are in fact very similar to “authors” in the classical sense. Recipients such as the Christian communities “overlook” or dismiss as irrelevant those signs of literary growth which remain. Nor do they have an overview of the lengthy texts in their totality, since they usually hear (and seldom themselves read) selected parts of a work—and they do not read these with the eyes of modern literary critics, but perceive them as a substantial strengthening of their own faith-convictions.<sup>13</sup> Authors (or groups of authors) who are aware of this will not write in the same way as Umberto Eco. These are indicators of another different understanding of texts than that found in the modern period. However, exegetes who apply modern textual theories often fail to interpret texts on the basis of the ancient understanding of texts, and to reflect on the cultural difference between then and now.

---

<sup>12</sup> Cf. Crossan, Jesus.

Let us now come to Mark itself! Mark is a narrative text,<sup>14</sup> with one single person at its center. Does this make Mark a biography in the ancient sense? If one answers in the affirmative, the historical value of Mark must be discussed on the analogy of the ancient biographies. However, biographical elements on their own do not automatically make the gospel one sort of biography. Scarcely anyone today would deny that the gospels contain (popular) biographical traits,<sup>15</sup> but Mark is not simply telling the story of a figure who can be set alongside other outstanding persons in world history: He is telling the story of a figure who is absolutely exceptional, since Jesus occupies an exceptional christological position (Mark 1:1; 14:62–63). His appearing on the scene is due to the divine plan and promise (1:2–3), and this event is eschatological, because it brings about the irruption of God's eschatological reign. This divine sovereignty is established definitively by means of the expulsion of demons, healing, the forgiveness of sins, and meals eaten in common (1:14–15). This establishes a caesura vis-à-vis the past; and for all future time, this Son of God with his activity remains the central figure of

---

<sup>13</sup> On this, cf. Jürgen Becker, "Das vierte Evangelium und die Frage nach seinen externen und internen Quellen," in Fair Play: Diversity and Conflicts in Early Christianity: Essays in Honour of Heikki Räisänen, ed. Ismo Dunderberg et al. (Leiden: Brill, 2002), 203–241, at 234–236.

<sup>14</sup> On recent research into narrative, cf. the overview by Katrin Zuschlag, Narrativik und literarisches Übersetzen (Tübingen: Gunter Narr, 2002), 9–108.

<sup>15</sup> On the discussion, cf. Albrecht Dihle, "Die Evangelien und die biographische Tradition der Antike," ZThK 80 (1983): 33–49; Ferdinand Hahn, ed., Die Erzähler des Evangeliums, SBS 118/119 (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1985); Dirk Flickenschmidt, Evangelium als Biographie, TANZ 22 (Tübingen: Francke, 1997); Detlev Dormeyer, Das Markusevangelium als Idealbiographie von Jesus Christus, dem Nazarener, SBS 43 (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1999); Reinhard von Bendemann, Zwischen Doxa und Stauros, BZNW 101 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2001), 354–356, with further bibliography; Paul-Gerhard Klumbies, Der Mythos bei Markus, BZNW 108 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002); Michael E. Vines, The Problem of Markan Genre, SBLAB 3 (Leiden: Brill, 2002).

the end-time, thanks to his glorification by God (13:14–16; 14:62–63). Within the end-time, he calls together the group of disciples through whom the foundation of the community is prepared. He lays down norms for the path that the community's life is to take in the end-time (Mark 7; 12). We may call this christological concept the event which initiates the end-time. It goes far beyond the bios of an ordinary human person, for the point of this concept is precisely to demonstrate the absolute exclusiveness of this figure. The notion of a christological event which initiates the end-time has its presuppositions in classical antiquity in the Greek idea of an arkhê, viz. an event in primal time which is handed on as a mythical narrative which manifests contemporary reality.<sup>16</sup> The conviction is that what happened before time began is present again and again as that which allows the present-day world and history to come into being. Obviously, the history of Jesus is not an event in primal time which would generate mythical interpretations, and it is also true that the Hellenistic-Roman world no longer lived directly in the sphere of myth. But it was precisely this that made it possible to employ the interpretative power of mythical thinking in another way, in order to interpret reality.

Vergil's fourth Eclogue offers an illustrative example of how contemporary history is understood as arkhê. In this encomium of the ruler, Vergil describes how, at the imminent birth of a child, a scion sent forth from the heights of heaven will enter into contemporary history. He is announced beforehand by the Sibyl. His appearing makes the age of the world the golden age, i.e. the end-time in which the whole of reality will be changed for the better. His dominion brings definitive peace to the world. Let us prescind from the question whether Vergil is indulging in poetic exaggeration here; all that matters is the observation that if we examine the form which Vergil and Mark give to what they have to say, we find that their interpretation of reality is structured in the same way. In order to show how one particular event signifies a fundamental transformation of the world, the present (or a very recent past) is interpreted as the story of a beginning which is to leave its mark on the future. Because of the similar understanding of reality, the Middle Ages saw Vergil as the pagan prophet who had foretold the birth of Jesus.

---

<sup>16</sup> On this, cf. Kurt Hübner, Die Wahrheit des Mythos (München: C. H. Beck, 1985), 135–137. On the fundamental questions involved here, cf. Klumbies, Mythos, whose methods and exegeses have however prompted much criticism.

In Vergil, this interpretation is the poetically exaggerated expectation of a son who will be born to the ruler. In the case of Mark, however, one cannot simply say that he has evaluated Jesus in this way only post eventum, nor that he employs the style appropriate to an exaggerated encomium, since all he does, in harmony with earliest Christianity, is to develop post-Easter elements that are basically presented by Jesus himself.<sup>17</sup> The tradition of Jesus' logia shows in an impressive manner that he understood his activity on behalf of God's sovereignty as a constitutive condition for the inauguration of the end-time (Luke 11:20), and that this activity meant a caesura vis-à-vis all previous history (Matt 11:11; 13:16–17). Ancient expectations were now being fulfilled (Matt 11:4–6). The harvest that will pass over into the definitive state of salvation is the fruit of his activity (Mark 4:26–32), and it is his will that establishes the norms for life under the eschatological rule of God (Matt 5:44–45). In other words, there is a decisively important continuity between Jesus and the post-Easter community.

The thesis sketched in the previous paragraph would certainly repay elaboration, but all we can do here is to ask how Mark tells the story of Jesus from this perspective. In principle, all Christians after Easter were absolutely convinced that Jesus' public ministry had been carried out in the radiant light of the events which had just taken place. This means that no account of this history, which centers on one single person, can omit the biographical dimension of Jesus' life; accordingly, many narrative conventions of classical antiquity are represented in the gospels. However, the gospels contain more than this. It is impossible to tell this story without understanding the life of Jesus as an arkhê, an event which constitutes an origin, and this dimension demands to be taken into due account in the presentation of "the events which have happened" (cf. Luke 1:1). Mark is therefore under a double obligation in his interpretation of the figure of Jesus, viz. the biographical perspective and the perspective of the arkhê. Both of these together ensure that an account is given of the salvific eschatological presence of God in the historical reality of Jesus. Both of these together are the Gospel, viz. a narrative, with a biographical orientation, of the christological origin of the end-time.

---

<sup>17</sup> I have set this out in greater detail in my book Jesus von Nazaret, de Gruyter Lehrbuch (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1996), 21–36.

We can now go on to clarify how Mark (and earliest Christianity as a whole) forms, transmits, and contextualizes traditions about Jesus from this perspective. As a general rule, we may say that the interesting point is not precisely when or where, in what particular circumstances or with what intentions Jesus did something or other. In this area, we tend to find a conventional mode of narration which concentrates on the typical features of events. This can be seen very clearly in the miracle stories, where chronological dates or indications are often either lacking or imprecise. Geographical information is less concrete than in Josephus; often, one looks for it in vain. No evangelist gives us an itinerary that makes sense.<sup>18</sup> There is only a small quantity of circumstantial data that could scarcely have been invented. The formalizing tendency means that one must be very cautious about attributing an historical value to the brief information about the “setting” of scenes. In far too many cases, we learn little about the persons involved: the enemies of Jesus are simply there, a group which acts like a single person, and the disciples are frequently mere “extras,” an undifferentiated unit. Even in the case of Jesus, the protagonist of the story, it is often assumed that everyone knows who he is and why he appears in a particular scene. And all this means that those elements in the gospels which we include under the heading of “the biographical dimension” are not to be simply equated with the historical activity of Jesus.

The important aspect is rather the future of Jesus’ activity, i.e. those elements in his activity which became constitutive of the end-time: to what extent is he the central figure of the end-time? This is why the gospels concentrate on his words and deeds ad extra, rather than on his private sphere, and on the striking events rather than on the things he did every day. His character, his consciousness, or his hidden ponderings are unimportant. All that is related is the view from outside. We see his dealings with other people in the public sphere.<sup>19</sup>

---

<sup>18</sup> Nor do we find in Q the idea that Jesus’ path to Jerusalem was already planned. It is only Mark and John who offer competing information about this; but both already presuppose the knowledge of Jesus’ death.

<sup>19</sup> The question posed by Ulrich Luz, “Warum zog Jesus nach Jerusalem?” in Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. Jens Schröter and Ralph Brucker, BZNW 114 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002), 408–427, moves on terrain on which I cannot erect any hypothetical constructions. I too would love to know the answer to his question, but the knowledge provided by our sources gives no answers here: it leaves us only with questions.

All that is of interest is the total outcome of his public life, and this is why one will look in vain for any development in Jesus during his ministry. With his baptism, he is fully “the Son of God,” and only this total view is significant. We should also note that Mark, Q, and John are completely uninterested in his life before this event; and although Matthew and Luke relate infancy narratives, they do not cover the gap between the small child and the adult man. Besides this, Matt 1–2 and Luke 1–2 are legends which arose at a late date and contribute nothing to an historical consideration of Jesus.<sup>20</sup> The collective memory of the communities knew nothing about the childhood and youth of Jesus, and even for the period between his baptism and death all we can do is to trace the total perspective in such a way that we see the typical, recurrent aspects of his activity (miracles, table fellowship, an itinerant life with the Twelve) and read his words in the “static totality” of a “systematization.” The only access to Jesus for the historian lies on the path dictated by this perspective; but the historian can lend greater clarity to what he or she sees here through knowledge of Jewish and Hellenistic history, society, culture, and religion. This is why the investigation of this terrain has such great potential. It is indeed absolutely essential. And this means that the historian knows much more about Jesus than we can ever learn about many other figures of classical antiquity.

The earliest Christians, guided by their culture, imposed a structure on Jesus' activity by means of two headwords: what Jesus “did” and what he “said” (Luke 24:19; Acts 1:1; John 15:22). The activities of a person are arranged under the headings of his actions and his words, as we see in the praise of the fathers Moses, Nathan, Solomon, Elijah, and Elisha (Sir 44–46.). Using this distinction, one can vary the emphasis: now the one aspect, now the other. Whereas Mark gives a privileged place to Jesus' actions, Matthew and Luke (as well as John) place the primary accent on his words. This emphasis is related to the goal which the author chooses for his narrative—it does not entail a theological devaluing of the other aspect. This is not the case with the Gospel of Thomas, however, which places such a consistent emphasis on the perennially valid contents of the words of Jesus that even implicit indications of time and place and historical reminiscences of Jesus' activity are eliminated.

---

<sup>20</sup> Jürgen Becker, Maria: Mutter Jesu und erwählte Jungfrau, BG 4 (Leipzig: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 2001), 94–196.

This gospel goes to work methodically: now, the historical place of Jesus is accidental and unimportant.<sup>21</sup>

The situation in Q is different again. Like Mark, Q begins with a biographical introduction to Jesus' appearance in the public sphere, and then concentrates on the tradition of logia, which however speak so distinctly of Jesus' deeds and the end of his life that it is only by means of these that we can describe the connection of the rule of God with Jesus' thaumaturgic actions and his table fellowship. There is one other striking difference vis-à-vis Mark: Q speaks only indirectly of Jesus' death (Q 11:47–52; 13:34–35) and exaltation (11:29–30; 12:8–9). Instead of Mark's tripartite division of the public activity of Jesus (initially with the Baptist; Jesus' activity in Galilee; the trial and death in Jerusalem), Q has a twofold structure (the narrative initial event; the public preaching) in which the Baptist's discourse about judgment at the beginning forms an inclusio with Jesus' discourse about judgment at the end. Q's concept is thus independent of Mark's.

The appearance of the Baptist at the beginning of Q is more than just a customary biographical introduction. It is also intended to be read as a christological event which inaugurates the end-time, since John is the forerunner (Q 7:27), and that which is new posits a breach between John and Jesus (7:29; 10:23–24). The past and the time of Jesus are related to one another as the time of promise and the time of fulfillment (7:22–25), and this means that Jesus' activity is constitutive of the end-time. Q thus constructs its christology on the same basis as Mark. Although Q gives preference to the tradition of Jesus' words, since it intends to present the missionaries to Israel with their code of conduct and their preaching as an authoritative directive from Jesus, it remains oriented to the activity of Jesus as a whole, and makes no move (unlike the Gospel of Thomas) to detach Jesus from his own specific history.

What I have said here about Mark and Q can be applied to the other gospels too. They all intend to describe the history of the beginning of the end-time by relating the significance of this event as something that constitutes the future. This gives us a double advantage, which is not to be underestimated, when we attempt to investigate the historical reality of Jesus. First, we are not dependent on one single source, but can assemble from several texts the knowledge about Jesus which was preserved in the early Christian communities. If we had to reconstruct Jesus' activity with the aid of Mark alone, the picture would be much more meager than in our present situation, where we have Q, Mark, and the material found only in Matthew and Luke. Secondly, we can compare and evaluate the autonomous material in these textual strata. For example, we can assess the limitations of the way in which each source looks at Jesus; we can uncover the processes of reinterpretation and contextualization in the various ways in which the same material is treated, and even transfer these insights to material to which we have no parallels. By means of comparisons, we can shed light in many cases on the options which govern the reception of the tradition in the texts, thereby distinguishing between the interpretation and the antecedent material which is interpreted. This means that we know more, both quantitatively and qualitatively, than one single source offers us. Naturally, even such comparisons do not allow us to ask meaningfully how Jesus "really" was. But if we can set up a conversation between the texts, we can differentiate within the ensemble of our sources and attempt with good reason to come closer to the historical Jesus.

---

<sup>21</sup> On the differences between Q and the Gospel of Thomas, cf. Schröter, Erinnerung, 459–486.

Up to this point, we have discussed the historian's approach to Jesus on the basis of the literary texts which were composed more than one generation after Jesus. The question is whether the historian must be content with this constellation. Is it possible with the aid of form and tradition criticism to shed light on the period between the death of Jesus and the composition of Q and Mark? This brings us to a central problem in today's scholarly discussion.

4. The Oral Phase of the Tradition

The form-historical method of Martin Dibelius and Rudolf Bultmann won virtually complete acceptance in Germany, and spread (with some modifications) to other countries too. In recent years, exegetes have discussed three areas which suggest a rethinking.

1. The inherent presuppositions of the form-historical method are often criticized, with the intention of calling into question this method as such.
2. Text-linguistic and literary-historical methods propagate an approach which looks at the text in its present form and function; questions of its origin are declared irrelevant or impossible to determine. Indeed, such questions are sometimes explicitly forbidden.

3. It is claimed that ethnological investigations of oral traditions arrive at different conclusions from those assumed by form criticism. It is alleged that oral tradition is so fluid that it can no longer be perceived as a stable tradition, and this means that it can no longer be investigated as a process of interpretation.

In the first case, the questions concentrate on the connection of the fixed form with its social function (the Sitz im Leben) and on the intention to reconstruct as far as possible a pure original form from the tradition. Let me only remark here that many genres have in fact either no special Sitz im Leben, or more than one, since they are used in a multi-functional way. It is also correct to point out, with regard to the synoptic tradition, that scholars often reached the “pure” original form only by declaring on insufficient grounds that particular elements in the text entered it at a later date. Mixed forms and broken-off forms do not per se entitle us to engage in decomposition. They can have a charm of their own, and we often find them in literary and oral contexts. Besides this, these two criticisms are an invitation to improve form criticism. They do not pose a fundamental question mark against it, for here too the classic rule applies: abusus non tollit usum.

In the second case, we have the new methodologies which understand the work of an author synchronically and in a manner immanent to the work itself, and which seek to define the relationship between author and reader synchronically. Here, the diachronic provenance of the texts is declared unimportant; the very question may be dismissed as meaningless. First, however, it is worth asking whether the alternative between synchronic and diachronic may not distract from the gain in methodological understanding which these methodologies provide; certainly, one is led to doubt the benefits of these new approaches when one sees how much energy is spent on the construction of hypotheses which apply a synchronic perspective to smooth out those difficult points in the text which had led earlier scholars to conduct diachronic investigations. The sober verdict must be that synchronic and diachronic exegesis must accept each other’s objections—for otherwise, too many hypotheses must be constructed, and surely no one wishes to build towers of hypotheses reaching up to heaven merely for the sake of an exegetical principle. Just as synchronic work on the text tends to declare everything that disturbs coherence as a clever arrangement by the author, so diachronic analysis tends to take everything that disturbs a smooth text as an invitation to a diachronic analysis. Checks and balances from the other approach can minimize the inherent tendencies here. Secondly, the synchronic and diachronic procedures both employ the same investigative path, in epistemological terms; it is only the specific questions that differ. The diachronic question looks for the traditions and sources which are implicit in the text, while the synchronic question looks for the implicit author and his readers. Neither implication is prompted directly by the text; neither implication exists independently of the text. Rather, they are extrapolated by a hypothetical calculation. Those who follow the same procedure ought in fact to cooperate with each other. Thirdly, the sheer variety of synchronic methodologies and results, which is increasing all the time, is itself a corrective to the high assessment of the potential of these methodologies to yield results. The relativities of the old methodologies no longer look quite so faded. And this makes it possible to live in a common relativity and a complementary coexistence.

This is all the more important, because early Christian authors and recipients were not ahistorical monads who were linked to each other only once, by means of one synchronous moment of communication. Mark and his communities belong together in a communicative fellowship which had already existed for a long time, and both share in the collective knowledge about Jesus. Mark makes a selection from this knowledge and writes his Gospel as a new interpretation of Jesus. The community understands this text by comparing the substance and manner of Mark's work with its own knowledge, thereby experiencing both well known matter in a new narrative form and new matter. Naturally, the example of Mark can be applied to all the gospels. Let us imagine that Q was known to the Matthean community, because this concept had been used in missionary work among this group. The community will react to Matthew by noticing how this author gives a new form to the material from Q. If we assume that every community also knew oral units with a stable form and autonomous contents which gave information about Jesus, the same will be true with regard to this community knowledge: when they hear a gospel in which such traditions are contextualized, the community will recall the familiar material and notice the new interpretation. In literary production and reception of this kind, however, it is vital not to neglect the diachronic question, because otherwise we would pay insufficient attention to the dialogue between author and reader, which would be left in an unhistorical abstraction.

A further consequence is that one could not entirely acquit Mark of the old charge of form criticism, viz. that he is a “collector.” There can be no doubt that there is something qualitatively new in the composition of a gospel, but we can still see how “collected” traditional material has preserved a relative autonomy, thanks to the signs of weak contextualization in Mark and to the many tensions in his arrangement of the material.

One can accept such arguments, yet still remove the sting from the questions of literary criticism and the history of tradition, e.g. by asserting that although it is possible to reconstruct the essence of Q, since we can reconstruct this source from two independent gospels, this is a positive exception, since there is no hope of reconstructing sources from only one surviving text. The answer to this position involves two steps.

Q is not in the least an exception in the sense described in the preceding paragraph. In the case of the narrative connection which links the activity of John the Baptist to the beginning of Jesus’ ministry at the start of Mark, Q, and John, we have in fact three independent variants of the narrative.<sup>22</sup> The next step is therefore to test whether we have an early narrative complex here; this would at any rate be older than Q and would give a deep insight into the prehistory of the gospels. The same is true of the end of Jesus’ life. Mark and John, independently of each other, have passion narratives which converge in the sequence of scenes and in individual details. The reshaping in John means that the common basis is not so easy to identify as in the case of Q, but here (unlike the long middle section in Mark) we have a sequence of scenes where one logically follows the other. Their chronological and substantial sequence cannot be altered. In other words, one scene is not simply added on loosely to the next; they could not have a different order. Ought not the next step to be an investigation of the contours of an early passion narrative? The exegete who follows this path to the beginning and the end of Jesus’ life has one considerable advantage: he can see that long before Mark and Q, the interpretation of the story of Jesus was structured by the two public events which marked the beginning and end of his ministry. In other words, the restriction of attention to what we might call the “publicly discernible Jesus” is an option that goes back to the period before Mark.

---

<sup>22</sup> On this, cf. Jürgen Becker, Johanneisches Christentum: Seine Geschichte und Theologie im Überblick (Tübingen: Mohr, 2004), section 7.1.

Naturally, the reconstruction of an older compositional complex from one single text is more hypothetical than the cases we have just considered. But we are not justified in dismissing this a priori as generally impossible—for that is a dogmatic assertion. Here, we must judge each case on its own merits. The debate about the strata in Q,<sup>23</sup> which almost inevitably generates further hypotheses about the history of earliest Christianity and the ministry of Jesus, shows how complex the discussion of the diachronic history of an individual text can be. There is scarcely anyone who doubts that Q came into being by stages, but this process is very difficult to grasp, because we can no longer define precisely the contents and wording of Q, which probably still possessed textual flexibility in the period when Matthew and Luke incorporated it into their gospels.<sup>24</sup> It is one thing to describe the contours of a source that has been incorporated into a text which survives—but it is a different task to take a source which has been approximately reconstructed and then analyze this into various strata. We have a better starting point for an investigation of Mark, where we possess the text, than in the case of Q. The possibility of recognizing pre-Markan collections such as groups of three (Mark 4:3–8, 26–32) or two (Mark 6:32–52; cf. John 6:5–21) involves a hypothetical quality that we can assess. This is also true of the suggestion that the basis of Mark 13 is an independent apocalypse.

Another strategy for defining the boundaries of diachronic investigations appeals to ethnological studies of the oral transmission of traditions. The primary fields of study here are Homer, the mediaeval epics, and the Serbo-Croat region, and this brings us to the third question mark which has been posed against form criticism. These researches are relevant to the assessment of the synoptic tradition because of the thesis that those who proclaim texts in oral cultures do not produce variants on an original form, but generate new products each time using already-existing structures and formulaic phrases. These new creations cannot be understood on the model of the transmission of a stable antecedent text: rather, they are evanescent phenomena of the moment. An original form does not exist.<sup>25</sup> If we accept this as an appropriate analogy which offers a convincing explanation of how we are to evaluate oral traditions wherever these occur—and hence also applies to the synoptics—the result is that we can no longer subject the oral tradition to analysis. The search for an original form is the search for a phantom.

---

<sup>23</sup> The proposal by John S. Kloppenborg, Excavating Q: The History and Setting of the Sayings Gospel (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2000), which he had often presented in earlier publications, has given rise to much scholarly discussion.

<sup>24</sup> Cf. the cautious remarks about the conclusions of the International Q Project in Paul Hoffmann and Christoph Heil, eds., Die Spruchquelle Q: Studienausgabe Griechisch und Deutsch (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 2002).

Let us be clear about what this means. Only the literary level of the texts would be a relevant resource for the construction of a picture of Jesus. With the aid of a general historical theory, e.g. about the role of memory in narrative, or by means of a simple hypothesis, one could formulate a general verdict about the historical reliability of Mark or Q in this instance; or else one could abstain from any historical judgment. But it would no longer be possible to get behind the gospels themselves.

At this point, we must demand to know why the results of these ethnological studies should be preferred to all the individual analyses of the synoptic gospels and every detailed insight into the milieu of the first Christians, especially when we bear in mind that it is always difficult to use analogies. And we must demand an explanation of why it should be taken for granted that researches from quite different cultural spheres should tell us what was the case in earliest Christianity. Those who posit this are implicitly presupposing that history—in this instance, the oral culture of all peoples—always and exclusively follows the same laws. And this is contradicted by the historical experience of plurality, contingency, and mutability.

If researches into orality are to be applied to the study of Jesus and earliest Christianity, the following conditions must be satisfied.

1. At the beginning of the formation of a tradition, there should be a person whose message has precise contents.
2. This tradition should consist of a “taciturn” and briefly formulated transmission; it should not have an epic breadth.
3. In general, the transmission should not be addressed to people from a large cultural sphere; it should involve a milieu of small social forms.
4. The group of active transmitters of the tradition should not be too large, and they should remain in contact with one another.

---

<sup>25</sup> Cf. Werner H. Kelber, “Anfangsprozesse der Verschriftlichung im Frühchristentum,” ANRW II 26.1 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1992), 3–62; idem, “Jesus and Tradition,” Semeia 65 (1995): 139–167; idem, “Markus und die mündliche Tradition,” LingBibl 46 (1979): 5–58; Schröter, Erinnerung, 40–59.

5. The transmission of the tradition should be measured in terms of two (or at most three) generations.
6. Both the group of transmitters and the community must regard the person at the origin of the tradition as an authority whose normative significance is certain; in this way, the tradition will enjoy high respect and will provide an important orientation for the life of the group.

Under these conditions, ethnological research soon proves to be unhelpful in providing analogies. And this means that we are once again free to look for analogies to the synoptic tradition.

When we look for possible comparisons which could meet the conditions set out in the preceding paragraph, we must consider prophets, philosophers, teachers of wisdom, and physicians; in the particular case of Judaism, we have prophets and teachers of wisdom who also had pupils and groups that handed on their teaching. These protagonists, with the traditions which circulated under their names, express themselves in rhythmic language in which the poetical form and the well thought-out contents are mutually related, and one basic idea finds pointed expression. This form is typical: in very few words, it takes hold of the hearers directly, unerringly, and purposefully. Such words are like "goads for oxen" and "nails firmly fixed" (Qoh 12:9–11), they are "seasoned with salt" (Col 4:6) or "a burning oven" (Sir 48:1). The addressees' attention is to be caught, and they must be able to retain these words in their memory. The more pointed the formulation, the more stable is the transmission; variant forms will be few. The community hands on the aphorisms which the wise proclaim (Sir 44:5, 15). We read that the prophets themselves ensured that their message would be preserved (Isa 8:1, 16; 30:8; etc.). Fixing something in one's memory and handing it on to others was a basic aspect of education and existential orientation in antiquity, both in professional work and in life in general. Traditional cultures live much more on the basis of preservation than of individual innovation.

When we look at the time of Jesus and the prophecy in his days, we see that the Baptist before him (Matt 3:7–10 par.) and Jesus ben Haniah after him (Josephus, War 6.300–301) expressed their distinct message by summarizing it concisely in a rhythmic language with few words. These have analogies in the Old Testament prophets and are good examples of the unity of form and contents which fashioned a genre that could be preserved and handed on to others.

There can be no doubt that the first community believed that Jesus had spoken in the same way. The transmission and reception of the Jesus tradition may have been a many-sided process involving every possibility from verbatim preservation, actualization, and selection to the new production of logia;<sup>26</sup> but Paul is evidence at an early date that the tradition which was known as Jesus tradition always possessed a special authority (cf. e.g. 1 Cor 7:10–11, 25). In keeping with this, all the gospels look back on the total impression that Jesus made on his contemporaries and portray this as an impression of compelling authority (Mark 1:22, 27 par.). The answers he gave in disputes reduced the other party to silence (Mark 12:34 pars). It is true that this picture of Jesus reflects the horizon of the earliest community, but an examination of affirmations such as Matt 5:21–22, 27–28; Luke 9:58, 60, 62; 11:5–6, 11; 13:21–22 makes it clear that Jesus himself spoke with authority. An authoritative tradition does not necessarily and exclusively lead to a verbatim transmission of his words, but the authoritative character ensures a basic tendency to preservation, just as we see in Old Testament prophecy.

This judgment is confirmed when we look at the contents of the tradition in the gospels. Let me exemplify this by means of three phenomena. In the transmission of tradition, there are enough cases where the community clearly felt that one particular tradition displayed a successful unity of form and substance; this was not reshaped, but was expounded by adding a commentary (Mark 4:3–8, 13–20; 7:14–15, 17–23; Luke 16:1–7, 8–13). This shows another way of treating tradition than the act of continual generation involved in the presentation of variable material. And the best explanation of the phenomenon of the double reworking of individual traditions is the hypothesis of a basis in stable oral tradition. All the synoptics offer examples of how one tradition is contextualized with slight variations in two passages in one and the same gospel (Mark 9:35 and 10:43–44, or Matt 5:29–30 and 18:8–9). John too is a witness to the shaping and rounding off of tradition. The attempt to demonstrate that the traditions in John 2–12 which are close to the synoptics derive directly from those gospels is unconvincing,<sup>27</sup> and the agreements between John and the other gospels in miracle narratives and the transmission of logia must be explained in terms of the history of tradition. These are indicators of a very solid and stable Jesus tradition which remains relatively fixed even in the Johannine group in which the formation of tradition otherwise allowed itself great freedoms.

---

<sup>26</sup> I remain unconvinced by the attempts of Birger Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript, 2nd ed., ASNU 22 (Uppsala: Almqvist & Wiksells, 1964); Rainer Riesner, Jesus als Lehrer, 2nd ed., WUNT 2.7 (Tübingen: Mohr, 1984); and Peter Stuhlmacher, Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments 1, 2nd ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997), 44–46, to use the transmission of the rabbinic tradition as a model for the praxis of Jesus and his disciples. I find no hard evidence in the synoptics for such an institutionalization of the transmission of tradition. On the contrary, the breadth of variation in the Jesus tradition argues against this idea.

If we assume that the classic form and tradition criticism had the correct approach to an understanding of the oral tradition in the synoptics, we can trace the path back to Jesus much more precisely and concretely, paying greater attention to individual cases. Naturally, this path is not free from difficulties; but it offers a greater possibility of making historical judgments than the approach which boldly moves directly from the literary level to draw direct conclusions about Jesus' activity.

Let me mention three special problems on this path. Once again, we have the problem of perspective, i.e. the limitation of the tradition to specific sectors. It is obvious that Jesus did not only speak in rhythmic words—but these are the only words to which we now have access. Conversations with the disciples or at mealtimes and discursive addresses to large gatherings have not been handed on, clearly because it was not possible to hand these on. And this is why the evangelists are obliged later on to compose dialogues (Mark 8:27–38), conversation at meals (Luke 14:1–24), or public discourses (Matt 5–7), using rhythmic materials. Nor can we assess how complete this “formed” tradition is. At any rate, the processes of selection which we can observe in the evangelists suggest that some traditions were lost. We can however attempt to get a holistic view of Jesus on the basis of what survives, and I believe that such an investigation permits us to present the basic outlines of what Jesus did and said.

We have discussed the oral tradition, which concentrates on the logia—for it is obvious that Jesus did not create any narrative miracle tradition. In other words, he did not create an account in the first person singular of miracles such as we find at Matt 8:5–13; Luke 7:1–10; and John 4:36–53. All we possess here are third-person accounts, which the community thought worth handing on because they were stories about Jesus. They were also capable of being handed on, because their conventional mode of narration, their almost identical structure, and the brevity of their presentation could be committed to memory. This allowed them to have their share in the process of preservation, actualization, selection, and production. However, a conventional act of narration like this always entails a distance from the specific activity of Jesus.

---

<sup>27</sup> Becker, “Das vierte Evangelium,” 209–227.

When we analyze the Jesus tradition in this way, we encounter a further problem, viz. the transition from the western Aramaic which Jesus spoke to the Hellenistic Greek of the communities. Languages represent a culture, and this is why the transition from one language to another means stepping into a new world. How reliably did the Christians translate traditions about Jesus? The Semitic tendencies in the Greek of the synoptics suggest that bilingual persons with Aramaic as their mother tongue undertook this transformation: in other words, they thought in Aramaic and translated this into Greek, and this may be regarded as a pointer to a relatively correct translation. In view of the scanty evidence of Hellenistic influence on the Galilean region, we must dismiss the idea that Jesus and his disciples possessed the bilingual competence necessary in order to be active as translators.<sup>28</sup> We should envisage Jewish Christians of the first generation who were familiar with Greek, rather than Galilean eyewitnesses of Jesus' public ministry.

Let us conclude by asking what is our goal, when we try to identify small units (genres) which were transmitted by word of mouth? The aim is to shed so much light on the processes by which the Jesus tradition was transmitted that the entire process of transmission, with its driving forces of preservation, interpretation, and new creation, takes on clearer outlines, and that we can describe as exactly and as amply as possible the material which stands at the origin of this process. This tradition-critical work will look primarily at the history of those units which have a rounded-off form and contents, without however forgetting that even traditions which have been extensively reworked and came into being at a late date may contain headwords, semantic fields, motifs, modes of argumentation, and basic ideas which accord well with the original material.

Once this work has been done, we must look for criteria which we can apply to the material which stands at the origin of the process of tradition, in order to identify those traditions which have best preserved the activity of Jesus.

---

<sup>28</sup> Eric M. Meyers, "Jesus und seine galiläische Lebenswelt," ZNT 1 (1998): 27–39.

5. The Discussion of Criteria

In the light of the available sources, which criteria allow us to draw close to Jesus? Here, today's scholarly debate is marked by profound disagreements. Space prevents the discussion of every position. Let us begin with three fundamental questions.

1. Some scholars ask: Ought we not to abandon the search for a catalogue of criteria for differentiations in the material about Jesus?
2. Who has the burden of proof, and who is obliged to propose criteria which support his claims?
3. What kind of criteria ought these to be?

In the first question, doubt is expressed about the functional capacity of all criteria, because we keep on finding instances where the criteria are unhelpful. There is also a great danger of circular argumentation. This means that one ought, at least for the time being, to do without the criteria and their application.<sup>29</sup> However, criteria are not mathematical formulae which invariably lead as a matter of course to unambiguous results when they are applied to the complexity of history; and no historical research can do without circular arguments. In principle, criteria minimize a subjective arbitrariness and allow others to understand a scholar's argumentation. One who dispenses with criteria is inevitably even harder pressed to justify the positions he takes.<sup>30</sup>

Another variant develops the basic principle of Rudolf Bultmann that the preaching of Jesus belongs only to the presuppositions of faith, by applying rather crude criteria of selection to excise whole blocks of tradition. All that is allowed to count as early material is the tradition of Jesus' logia, which however can no longer be analyzed by means of positive criteria. Accordingly, all we can do is to sketch the basic outlines of Jesus' preaching, without making any differentiations in the texts of the logia. We should accept this bleak result with equanimity, since faith lives from the kerygma, not from the historical Jesus.<sup>31</sup> This position is based on antecedent decisions which are no longer shared by everyone.

<sup>29</sup> This is proposed by Berger, "Kriterien."

<sup>30</sup> The truth of this proposition can be demonstrated without any great difficulty: it suffices to read Klaus Berger's book Wer war Jesus wirklich? (Stuttgart: Quell Verlag, 1995).

<sup>31</sup> This is the position taken by Walter Schmithals, "Gibt es Kriterien für die Bestimmung echter Jesusworte?" ZNT 1 (1998): 59–64.

It so smoothly executes a program which has been decided in advance that the texts themselves have no chance of making their objections heard. And this makes the reader suspicious, since the outcome is nothing other than what was posited a priori.

Finally, we meet the claim that it is impossible to apply criteria of authenticity to get back to the historical Jesus, since these are based on an understanding of history which needs to be revised: it is an illusion to think that we can get behind the texts to investigate historical reality.<sup>32</sup> When one dispenses with criteria, however, all one can do is to postulate historical recollection without making any differentiations, since one no longer has any means of distinguishing between good recollection, literary fiction, or false recollection. We can exemplify this by means of the beginning of Mark, Q, and John. These texts contain three variants of a relatively stable narrative structure. There are striking differences between the variants—what are we to take as historical recollection here? Or may we no longer pose such a question, since that would mean a relapse into a positivistic understanding of history? On the other hand, who has the right to forbid a comparison of the three texts, if such a comparative study also includes questions about construction, fiction, error, and good recollection? The question: “Who was Jesus really?” is indeed positivistic, but this label cannot be attached to the study of whether and how it is possible to get some approximate knowledge of Jesus in these three variants.

The second question is always posed when a scholar presupposes in principle and a priori the faithfulness of the tradition and asserts that the burden of proof lies on those who do not share this judgment.<sup>33</sup> For methodological reasons, however, one can admit only an argumentation which (a) judges the value of a tradition by means of the analysis of individual texts, and (b) begins without a conclusion, and presents the conclusion only at the end of the investigation.

The third question discusses whether individual phenomena such as linguistic observations (Aramaisms), striking verbal statistics and rhetorical traits (phrases such as the amen at the beginning of a sentence, typical words such as Abba), genres (parables, antithetical forms), or double transmissions which are formally symmetrical and are constructed in such a way that they are mutually related although their contents differ, can be employed as criteria.<sup>34</sup> The answer must be negative, since even if we assume that these phenomena originated with Jesus, we cannot exclude the possibility that the early communities simply imitated them; and some of these suggestions are not free of ambiguity, since it is not certain that they did originate with Jesus. Nevertheless, this discussion is valuable, because it supplies arguments which can help evaluate the process of transmission in individual cases, and thus allows us to assess better the path that leads to the oldest traditional material about Jesus.

---

<sup>32</sup> This is the view of David S. du Toit, “Der unähnliche Jesus,” in Der historische Jesus, ed. Schröter and Brucker, 89–129. His position has a forerunner in Erhardt Gütgemans, “Erzählstrukturen in der Fabel von Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart’s ‘Zauberflöte,’” LingBibl 31 (1974): 1–42. For Gütgemans, Jesus is only a literary figure in narrative structures.

<sup>33</sup> This question has been frequently discussed, e.g., by Joachim Jeremias, Neutestamentliche Theologie 1: Die Verkündigung Jesu, 2nd ed. (Gütersloh: Mohn, 1973), 46; and Stuhlmacher, Theologie, 44–46.

However, criteria ought not to designate individual phenomena. Rather, they should define the tendency of scholarly argumentation. They must be open in principle to the transmission as a whole, and guarantee a general equal treatment. Three current proposals seek to meet these conditions.

1. The oldest stratum of the Jesus tradition is identified on the basis of the age of the literary context in which an item is found and the frequency with which it is attested in independent sources. This stratum as a whole is acknowledged to have the greatest proximity to Jesus. De facto, one other criterion is employed in this procedure, viz. the harmonious insertion into the context of classical antiquity.<sup>35</sup>
2. Orientation is sought in various combinations of the criteria of "difference" and "coherence."<sup>36</sup>

---

<sup>34</sup> On this, cf. Becker, Jesus, 16–17; Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter, Die Kriterienfrage in der Jesusforschung, NTOA 34 (Fribourg: Universitätsverlag, 1997), 8–19. For lists of such phenomena, cf. Jeremias, Theologie, 19–45; T. W. Manson, The Teaching of Jesus, 2nd ed. (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1955), 54–56; Petr Pokorný, "Lexikalische und rhetorische Eigentümlichkeiten der ältesten Jesustradition," in Der historische Jesus, ed. Schröter and Brucker, 393–408; Marius Reiser, Die Gerichtspredigt Jesu, NTA NF 23 (Münster: Aschendorf, 1990), 194–196.

<sup>35</sup> Crossan, Jesus, argues for this position.

<sup>36</sup> This discussion of this approach goes back to the beginnings of research into the historical Jesus. It was formulated with particular clarity by Ernst Käsemann, "Das Problem des historischen Jesus," ZThK 51 (1954): 125–153, at 142, and has appeared since then in many variants. A particularly helpful overview is given by Dieter Lührmann,

3. This second bifurcated possibility is integrated into a holistic unity and a new approach, drawn from the theory of history, is taken: this leads to a “criterion of historical plausibility” which embraces both the aspect of continuity and the perspective of individuality.<sup>37</sup>

Before we examine these proposals, let me mention one fundamental problem, viz. that all criteria are expressions of a particular understanding of reality. To put this more specifically: the criteria reveal something of the way in which those who propose them understand history. Everyone who interprets history, with or without a catalogue of criteria, is in the same situation: he always treats historical reality from a concrete position. This is inevitable, but one can employ criteria to guide the process of historical research, by using them as a control on one's work. Three possibilities of this kind ought to play a role in research into the historical Jesus.

First, the history of the church and of our culture can lead us to “establish contact” between Jesus and our own world in such a way that we pay too little attention to the distance between then and now. Many scholars have noted that the Jesus of J. D. Crossan is reminiscent of one particular Californian culture, but he is not alone here. The contemporary discussion of Jesus by scholars in the USA often displays a Jesus who reflects basic traits of American society. This may well be why they prefer a “sapiential” Jesus to an “eschatological” Jesus<sup>38</sup> and emphasize the shape which Jesus gave to society rather than his theological message.<sup>39</sup> Since religion is a “private matter” in today's culture, and eschatology is something alien, the portrait of the historical Jesus is drawn (whether automatically, or with a conscious intention) on the basis of these antecedent

---

“Die Frage nach Kriterien für ursprüngliche Jesusworte—eine Problemskizze,” in Jésus aux origines de la Christologie, ed. Jacques Dupont, BETL 40 (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1975), 59–72. Cf. also the overview by John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew, vol. 1 (New York: Doubleday, 1991); Becker, Jesus, 17–19; Theissen and Winter, Kriterienfrage, 28–174; Jürgen Habermas, “Kriterien der Jesusforschung,” in “... was ihr auf dem Weg verhandelt habt”: Festschrift Ferdinand Hahn, ed. P. Müller et al. (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 2001), 15–26; du Toit, “Der unähnliche Jesus,” 96–100.

<sup>37</sup> This is proposed by Theissen and Winter, Kriterienfrage, 175–217.

<sup>38</sup> These scholars postulate a sequence from an eschatological (apocalyptic) John the Baptist via an exclusively sapiential Jesus to an eschatological early Christian community, but this is unconvincing.

<sup>39</sup> Jesus' message has a primarily religious character. It concerns the sovereignty of God which is being realized through him, and this implies aspects of a new fellowship of life. Cf. Becker, Jesus, 122–398.

decisions. These examples are conspicuous, but they are not in the least exceptional. This is why we must make use of a list of criteria in order to promote respect for that which is historically different and to underline as strongly as possible the need for the interpreting subject to examine carefully what he is doing.

This is why I am reluctant to use the word "plausibility," since its general usage alludes too strongly to the acceptance and reception of a thesis. It is perfectly clear that the rationalists found the rationalistic picture of Jesus plausible! Today, however, we realize that that picture of Jesus is inappropriate. The opposite position would be to emphasize, not the reception, but the perception of history as something "foreign." This would allow us to see the antithesis between historical plausibility and plausibility in terms of reception, and this may even signify a greater closeness to the historical truth.

Secondly, criteria are helpful when they keep in mind both the original conditions of an historical phenomenon and its later consequences. Jesus is perceived as an historical person only where he is interpreted in view of his religious, cultural, and social home and also in view of the impact he made on history. And both these contexts are marked by continuity and innovation. We cannot integrate Jesus totally into Christianity and make his Jewish roots a matter of indifference; nor can we interpret Jesus exclusively in a Jewish context and strip him of the impact he made on history. The second path was the option taken by Reimarus, viz. to understand Jesus wholly on Jewish terms and detach him from earliest Christianity. There are too many pictures of Jesus up to the present day which follow Reimarus, even if only in the mild form which refuses to submit to the "crosscheck," i.e. the question whether and how the picture of Jesus which they have constructed could be understood as the historical foundations on which earliest Christianity is based. This allows them to paint an arbitrary portrait with a freedom inappropriate to genuine historical study, and the result is an inability to explain the subsequent historical impact made by Jesus. To sum up: criteria must serve the double aim of understanding Jesus' relationship to Judaism under the dialectic of continuity and innovation, and of identifying a relationship between Jesus himself and his impact on history.

Thirdly, theories of history and society are very fashionable at the moment. They are often applied without nuances, as if they were rigid laws. We must however be aware that all these theories are relative. It is not a good idea to base one's conclusions on one theory alone, instead of relying on basic insights which are drawn from the total discussion of the historical and societal dimension of reality and are capable of generating a consensus. Similarly, it is inappropriate to degrade texts to the status of mere exemplifications of a theory. This is why criteria should draw attention to those elements which cannot be subsumed under a theory, or which can be integrated into it only with difficulty. In this way, they permit us to observe the theory itself from a critical distance.

This indicates how we should judge the proposals about a list of criteria. In the first case, two observations—which already had a supplementary function in the discussion of authenticity—have been raised to the status of decisive criteria. But early attestation is no automatic proof of closeness to Jesus: it is possible that new Jesus traditions were formed immediately after Easter, and it is always possible that a later tradition comes substantially closer to Jesus than an early tradition. Frequent attestation may be due to the interests of the community, and thus be an indicator that the community has formed a particular tradition; a unit of tradition which is attested only once, and is inherently awkward (i.e., incompatible with the community situation), may point us directly to Jesus himself. Nor does the combination of these two criteria improve the situation, for simple reasons of logic. The situation changes somewhat where one can appeal to other, substantial reasons for positing that one particular tradition is close to Jesus, and then support this argument by demonstrating early and/or multiple attestation, since this is then an additional indicator. One who does not wish to appeal to this additional factor loses nothing, since the real justification for the claim lies elsewhere. We should also note that this proposal consists of criteria which offer no help in achieving the three desired effects of intensification.

This is not the case with the second and third proposals. The second is the most widespread, but its linguistic and substantial unclarity has led to criticism. The most important objections are the following: 1. The descriptions of difference are based on a limited knowledge of Judaism and are therefore problematic. 2. The term “difference” (“underivability” or “dissimilarity”) is often left without a precise definition, and opens the way to historical images (e.g. the idea of a “personality who leaves his mark on history”) which must be criticized. 3. Historical dissimilarity has often been elevated to the status of an essential difference. The next step is to assert that this “difference” guarantees the special quality of Christianity: in other words, an historical judgment becomes a christological judgment. 4. Critics allege that the emphasis on “difference” encourages anti-Judaism. Since Jesus can at best have been only marginally Jewish, his reconstructed figure embodies a concealed dogmatics. In view of this criticism, the third proposal holds that the second proposal must be abandoned. It takes over important aspects of the second proposal and attempts to obviate the criticism by a new approach. It argues that historical plausibility must be demonstrated in two contexts. (a) This plausibility must be seen primarily in the sense of a contextual correspondence to Judaism: no matter how individual the figure of Jesus may have been, he can only have said and done things that other figures within Judaism could have said and done. He belongs in the center of Judaism.<sup>40</sup> (b) The other primary context for the discussion of plausibility is the "awkwardness" which goes against the stream of earliest Christian history.<sup>41</sup>

In our evaluation of these two proposals, we begin with the criticism that has been leveled at the second proposal. Limited knowledge is a basic problem of all historical work. If one were to infer from this that it is impossible to describe the basic outlines of the figure of Jesus, one would either have to give up this historical investigation or else state how severe the limitation would have to be before one abandoned the task. I believe that our knowledge of early Judaism is not in fact so poor. The second argument implies that whoever speaks of "difference" must define his understanding of this term; but the implication is that it would be better to dispense with it altogether. We may at any rate say that "difference" designates the personal profile which is embedded historically in the context of Jesus' life and in the subsequent history of the impact he made. This includes the special contents of his preaching and his activity, and of course the particular reasons which led to his crucifixion and the events surrounding it. Jesus worked in concrete historical circumstances and attracted considerable attention of various kinds. If the criterion of "difference" is understood in this way, I fail to see how it can reasonably be accused of proposing dogmas, or condemned as anti-Jewish.

It is possible to guard against the misuse of this criterion when it initiates the process of investigation, but is not misunderstood as the exclusive goal of a total interpretation. Proverbs in many languages affirm that the first step is the hardest, and this applies also to the initial search for aspects of the individual profile of Jesus. When one assembles a jigsaw puzzle, one begins by looking for striking segments with strongly individual features; then one finds other pieces which fit onto these; it is only at the end that one integrates less readily distinguishable pieces. The advantage of beginning in this way, i.e. with the individual profile of Jesus, is that we do not level his special characteristics, as we would if we began by comparing him with a type (the itinerant Cynic preacher, the teacher of wisdom, the apocalyptic teacher, or the Pharisee) and thus seeing him in the context of general historical phenomena. It is of course meaningful to compare Jesus with existing types. But this should be done only after his individuality has been identified.

---

<sup>40</sup> Theissen and Winter, Kriterienfrage, 139, 183–188, 212–213.

<sup>41</sup> Ibid., 176–180.

The beginning requires a continuation, and this is guided by the principle of coherence, which states that the individual characteristics which we have identified at the outset are complemented by less striking elements and by general aspects, where this makes sense. The total outcome is always a mixture of the general and the individual.

This indicates the point at which (despite a large measure of agreement) I diverge from the third proposal. There are two reasons for this. First, the term “plausibility” (like “difference”) covers a large spectrum of variations. Let us assume that the plausibility envisages not just an emotional assent on the part of the addressees, who are to identify with what the text says, but also a substantial conviction which is open to examination. Let us also assume that the phenomenon which must be interpreted is not a collection of fictional texts, but the history which is preserved in these texts, and that the argumentative interpretation of this history must convince the addressees. We must then ask: What kind of arguments can one use to create this plausibility? Substantial criteria are required if we are to answer this question, and this brings us back to the second proposal about the list of criteria.

The second reason is connected with the asymmetrical approach in the two fields of the historical impact made by Jesus and the context in which he lived. If one emphasizes the primary importance of looking for conformity to the Jewish context, because Jesus belongs in the center of Judaism, one has defined in advance the results of one’s investigation—and this approach is every bit as “dogmatic,” methodologically speaking, as the approach of the scholar who declares in advance that Jesus was a marginal figure in Judaism. One will also face problems in dealing with Jewish Christianity. This too belongs in the Jewish context, but a different approach is used in studying it: the primary interest is in identifying the “awkward” things that run against the stream, rather than in identifying its conformity to its historical context. In addition to this methodological criticism, one must also bear in mind the substantial collisions in the life of Jesus which the gospels relate, as well as the continuation of conflicts in Jewish Christianity which led to the deaths of Christians,<sup>42</sup> and the decision (unparalleled in early Judaism) by the Antiochene community, only half a generation after the death of Jesus, to leave Judaism, and the decision of the “council” at Jerusalem to respect this step. No doubt, each of these pieces of information must be analyzed separately. But a considerable expenditure of energy on arguments and hypotheses is needed, before one can neutralize these texts in such a way that Jesus unquestionably belongs in the center of Judaism. An outcome decided in advance is thus unacceptable, not only from a methodological perspective, but in substantial terms: a method must leave open the substantial results to which it leads. Naturally, Jesus had Jewish parents. He understood himself all his life as a Jew. He died as a Jewish provincial. But why should we exclude a priori the possibility that Jesus lived on the margins of Judaism, or that he tested out the margins of Judaism here and there—especially since those margins were not rigid boundaries? Is he allowed to be an outsider only in his way of life, but not in his convictions? Did he not show that he was capable of distancing himself, e.g. in his relationship to John the Baptist and to his own family clan?

The discussion of criteria has taken the path from the literary sources to the traditional material which is close to Jesus and to the evaluation of this material. It thus presents the prolegomena to a portrait of Jesus of Nazareth, and we could now begin to paint this portrait. This cannot be done here; let me only note that the goal of such a portrait would be to take a middle path between historical skepticism and an excessive confidence in the historical reliability of the gospels.<sup>43</sup>

---

<sup>42</sup> For the details, cf. Becker, Jesus, 73–91, 410–421, 425–431.

<sup>43</sup> This essay was completed in November 2003. English translation: Brian McNeil.

THE HISTORICAL JESUS: HOW TO ASK QUESTIONS AND REMAIN INQUISITIVE

JAMES H. CHARLESWORTH

Who was Jesus? What was his purpose? What was his essential message? What reliable historical information do we have concerning him? Did he attempt to establish a new religion that would be different from the Judaism he knew? Why was he crucified? Did the Palestinian Jesus Movement not end with his death, as reflected in the dashed hopes of Cleopas: “We had hoped that he is (or was) the one about to redeem Israel” (Luke 24:21)?

A new study of Jesus began about 1980. In contrast to the previous study of Jesus it is not confessional or theologically motivated. It seeks to ask questions using the highest form of scientific precision and honesty. Some results are disappointing, others are possible or probable. Experts in Jesus research are not expected to agree but to discuss methods and conclusions, and in the process, by keeping an eye on questions, to improve research.

There is a broad consensus among Jesus research experts that we can know a considerable amount about the historical Jesus, and far more than just the fact that he died on a cross outside the walls of Jerusalem. Thanks to the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, ancient Jewish texts not shaped and modified by Christian scribes, and the international renewed study of the Old Testament apocrypha and pseudepigrapha, as well as the often amazing and unexpected discoveries made by archaeologists, it has become clear that what Jesus did and said makes eminent sense within pre-70 Palestinian Judaism. This discovery of Jesus’ actions and authentic teachings also reveals considerable continuity from his time to the time of the evangelists.

1. Introduction: Five Phases

The five phases of the study of Jesus of Nazareth are as follows:

26–1738	Worship of Jesus as the Christ
1738–1906	The Old Quest of the historical Jesus

1906–1953	Some denigration of the historical search for Jesus
1953–ca. 1970	The New Quest of the historical Jesus
1980–present	Jesus research

The study of the historical Jesus was not always a study. Interest in Jesus began as worship of him as the Christ and the assumption (or proclamation) that the intra-canonical gospels were composed by Jesus' disciples or the followers of Peter or Paul. Phase One covered the years from 26, when Jesus probably began his public ministry, to 1738. A. Schweitzer attributed the origin of the "Old Quest" to Reimarus (1694–1768),<sup>1</sup> but surely the English Deists are the real precursors of critical Jesus study. The works of John Locke, Matthew Tindal, and Thomas Chubb shaped the world's culture as they sought a "reasonable Christianity." In London and in 1738 Chubb published The True Gospel of Jesus Christ Asserted. Chubb discovered that Jesus' true message was the imminent coming of God's Rule (the Kingdom of God) and the true gospel was to be found in Jesus' preaching of good news to the poor.<sup>2</sup>

In 1835 D. F. Strauss composed the first "life of Jesus": his Das Leben Jesu (The Life of Jesus).<sup>3</sup> The worship of Jesus was shifting in many cities in the West to a quest for what can be known reliably about the Jesus of history. The Old Quest (1738–1906) was clearly motivated by theological concerns. Many of the authors assumed they could write a biography of Jesus, and the attempt to do so was motivated frequently to provide such a life for those in the pews of the church.

In 1906 A. Schweitzer showed that the results of so-called critical research on Jesus in the nineteenth century was simply the announcement of having found what was desired or assumed.<sup>4</sup> Schweitzer's influence caused a moratorium on the Quest for Jesus in many circles. Most

<sup>1</sup> See the convenient collection of Reimarus's fragments: Reimarus, Fragments, ed. C. H. Talbert, trans. R. S. Fraser (Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1985; issued previously by Fortress, 1970).

<sup>2</sup> I am indebted to Hugh Anderson and Walter Weaver for many conversations on Jesus and the English Deists. See esp. Anderson, ed., Jesus (Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1967), 10–11. Also see Weaver, "Who Killed the Old Quest? Reshaping a Paradigm," to be published in a forthcoming volume in the Faith and Scholarship Series (published by Trinity Press International).

<sup>3</sup> D. F. Strauss, The Life of Jesus Critically Examined, ed. P. C. Hodgson, trans. G. Eliot, Lives of Jesus (1835; repr., Philadelphia: Fortress, 1972).

<sup>4</sup> A. Schweitzer, Von Reimarus zu Wrede: Eine Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung (Tübingen: Mohr, 1906). The English translation appeared in 1910, was translated by W. Montgomery, and was entitled The Quest of the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of scholars who have assessed this period assume that Schweitzer's influence was universal and that he not only influenced all scholars but they were convinced by him. This is certainly true of the Bultmannian School and the life of Jesus published by H. Conzelmann.<sup>5</sup> In England Schweitzer's influence was barely noticeable in many universities. Books were written on Jesus as if Schweitzer had never published his work or that he was simply incorrect. Notable among the books on Jesus written by English scholars are T. W. Manson's The Teaching of Jesus (1931)<sup>6</sup> and C. H. Dodd's The Parables of the Kingdom (1935).<sup>7</sup>

Even in Germany the life of Jesus by M. Dibelius, published in 1939,<sup>8</sup> and his book on the Sermon on the Mount (1940),<sup>9</sup> and the numerous books by A. Schlatter—especially his Die Geschichte des Christus (2nd edition appeared in 1923)<sup>10</sup> and Kennen Wir Jesus? (1937)<sup>11</sup>—proceed on the assumption that one can know much about the historical Jesus and that such knowledge is essential for authentic faith.

Nevertheless, in contrast to the nineteenth century and the period since 1980, the era from 1906 to 1953 is singularly devoid of a fascination with the Jesus of history. That era was shaped by Bultmann, Barth, Brunner, and Bonhoeffer, as well as Tillich—they simply were interested in Christian theology and built their theological edifices on the “Christ of faith.” None of these giants in theology were interested in archaeology, historiography, or a search for the Jesus of history behind the Christ of the gospels. These theologians were not so much influenced by Schweitzer as by the effects of “The Great War,” as World War I was

---

Its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede. Also see the translation of Schweitzer's second, larger edition of The Quest of the Historical Jesus, trans. J. Bowden (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2001).

<sup>5</sup> H. Conzelmann, Jesus, ed. J. Reumann (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973).

<sup>6</sup> T. W. Manson, The Teaching of Jesus: Studies of Its Form and Content (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1963; 2nd ed., 1931).

<sup>7</sup> C. H. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom (London: Collins, rev. ed., 1961).

<sup>8</sup> M. Dibelius, Jesus, trans. C. B. Hedrick and F. C. Grant (London: SCM, 1963; English ed., 1949).

<sup>9</sup> M. Dibelius, The Sermon on the Mount (New York: Scribner's Sons, 1940). Dibelius's warning rings clear again today: in the face of the danger of a world that is denying Christian values “a vague Christian idealism is insufficient as a basis for the witness we must bear” (143).

<sup>10</sup> A. Schlatter, Die Geschichte des Christus (2nd ed., 1923; 3rd ed., Stuttgart: Calwer Verlag, 1977, with a foreword by H. Stroh and P. Stuhlmacher). Also see the publication of Schlatter's essay edited with a foreword by R. Riesner: Schlatter, Jesus—der Christus (Giessen: Runnen Verlag, 1978).

<sup>11</sup> A. Schlatter, Kennen Wir Jesus? (Stuttgart: Calwer Verlag, 4th ed., 1980, with a foreword by H. Stroh).

called (and is called in many parts of Great Britain today), by the Great Depression, and by the Nazis. One may report that a partial denigration of the historical Jesus continued from 1906 until 1953.<sup>12</sup>

In 1953, E. Käsemann demonstrated before Bultmann and his other students that the intra-canonical gospels do contain reliable information regarding the historical Jesus, that we do know more about the historical Jesus than Bultmann and most of his followers assumed, and that such knowledge is relevant for authentic Christian faith.<sup>13</sup> The “New Quest of the Historical Jesus” continued from 1953 until sometime in the seventies.

In 1980 a new trend can be discerned to have emerged. It is a scientific study of Jesus in his time, in light of all relevant data, literary and non-literary—including archaeology and topography. While the Old Quest, New Quest, and even the partial moratorium on the quest, were all motivated by theological agendas and concerns, “Jesus research” (or the Third Quest) began without such allegiances.<sup>14</sup> Thus, this more scientific study of Jesus is led by Jews (such as D. Flusser<sup>15</sup> and G. Vermes<sup>16</sup>), by liberal Christians (such as E. P. Sanders),<sup>17</sup> by more conservative thinkers (as M. J. Borg,<sup>18</sup> N. T. Wright<sup>19</sup> and J. D. G. Dunn<sup>20</sup>),

<sup>12</sup> See the insightful study by W. P. Weaver, The Historical Jesus in the Twentieth Century: 1900–1950 (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1999).

<sup>13</sup> E. Käsemann, “The Problem of the Historical Jesus,” in Essays on New Testament Themes, trans. W. J. Montague, SBT 41 (Naperville, IL: Allenson, 1964), 15–47.

<sup>14</sup> As G. Theissen and D. Winter state, a “grounding in scholarly historical study rather than theological considerations is typical of the approach of the Third Quest.” Theissen and Winter, The Quest of the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria, trans. M. E. Boring (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 2002), 164.

<sup>15</sup> D. Flusser with R. S. Notley, Jesus (Jerusalem: Magnes, 2nd ed., 1998).

<sup>16</sup> See esp. Vermes, Jesus the Jew: A Historian’s Reading of the Gospels (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973); idem, Jesus and the World of Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983). See esp. idem, The Changing Faces of Jesus (London: Allen Lane, 2000); idem, The Authentic Gospel of Jesus (London: Allen Lane, 2003); idem, Jesus in His Jewish Context (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2003).

<sup>17</sup> E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985); idem, The Historical Figure of Jesus (London: Penguin Books, 1993).

<sup>18</sup> M. J. Borg, Conflict, Holiness and Politics in the Teaching of Jesus, Studies in the Bible and Early Christianity 5 (New York: Edwin Mellen Press, 1984); idem, Meeting Jesus Again for the First Time: The Historical Jesus and the Heart of Contemporary Faith (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1994; 1995).

<sup>19</sup> N. T. Wright, Who Was Jesus? (London: SPCK; Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1992); idem, Jesus and the Victory of God, Christian Origins and the Question of God 2 (London: SPCK, 1996); idem, The Challenge of Jesus: Rediscovering Who Jesus Was and Is (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1999).

<sup>20</sup> For the latest, see J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered, Christianity in the Making 1 (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003).

by Roman Catholics (such as the priest J. P. Meier<sup>21</sup> and the free-thinking J. D. Crossan<sup>22</sup>), and by others not so easy to categorize (including G. Theissen,<sup>23</sup> B. Chilton,<sup>24</sup> P. Fredriksen,<sup>25</sup> and myself<sup>26</sup>).<sup>27</sup> Today, it is no longer possible to say that Jesus research is primarily scientific (no one ever claimed it was purely scientific). Many experts in this field of research are able to work with scientific rigor and also affirm the essential need of this scientific and historical research for Christian faith today. A consensus may be discerned among these experts in Jesus Research: there is continuity from the teachings of Jesus to the preaching by his earliest followers. The study of Jesus now flourishes so that a new journal has been launched: Journal for the Study of the Historical Jesus (2003–).

I would want to push the historical influence further back. Bultmann claimed that Jesus' teaching was a presupposition of New Testament theology. I perceive the issue quite differently. The ideas developed within Second Temple Judaism fundamentally shaped Jesus' message and self-understanding, and are the presuppositions of Jesus. Likewise, New Testament theology is founded on Jesus' words about God and about himself. Those who wish to remove from the historical Jesus eschatology and apocalyptic thought are not adequately informed: these ideas are regnant in Jesus' traditions and they are pregnant for us today in a world terrorized by suicide bombers.

---

<sup>21</sup> J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 4 vols. (New York: Doubleday, 1991–2009).

<sup>22</sup> In particular, see J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1991).

<sup>23</sup> See G. Theissen, The Shadow of the Galilean, trans. J. Bowden (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); idem, The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide, with A. Merz, trans. J. Bowden (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1998).

<sup>24</sup> Note esp. B. Chilton, Rabbi Jesus: An Intimate Biography (New York: Doubleday, 2000).

<sup>25</sup> See esp. P. Fredriksen, Jesus of Nazareth: King of the Jews (New York: Knopf, 2000).

<sup>26</sup> Notably, Charlesworth, Jesus within Judaism: New Light from Exciting Archaeological Discoveries, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1988); idem, ed., Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1992).

<sup>27</sup> An annotated bibliography on most of these books, and others, is found in Charlesworth, Jesus within Judaism, 223–423; idem, ed., Jesus' Jewishness: Exploring the Place of Jesus in Early Judaism (New York: The American Interfaith Institute and Crossroad, 1991), 271–279.

2. The Four Gospels: How Were They Composed and Why Were They Chosen?

2.1. How Were the Intra-Canonical Gospels Composed?

In the fourth century BCE, Alexander the Great, who was taught by Aristotle, united the western world and established Greek culture as the ideal and the Greek language as the lingua franca. Although Jesus' native speech was Aramaic, and most of his teachings were in Aramaic, the intra-canonical gospels were composed in Greek. Clearly, behind the Greek gospels one can detect Aramaic sources, which are certainly oral and perhaps (at times) written tracts.

Caveats

Some caveats are necessary. The focused research of New Testament experts has disclosed the following discoveries:

1. We do not know who composed "Matthew," "Mark," "Luke," or "John."
2. Tradition regarding the authors of the gospels is late and appears for the first time about one hundred years after Jesus, in the second century CE.
3. It is not clear if the titles given to the intra-canonical gospels belong to the text of the documents, as some experts contend (viz. Hengel)<sup>28</sup> or were added later, most likely after 150 CE (as Koester concludes).<sup>29</sup>
4. The author of Luke admits that he was not an eyewitness to Jesus' life (Luke 1:1–4). Only the Gospel of John claims to have an eyewitness to Jesus' life and teachings.<sup>30</sup>
5. We do not have one fragment of the New Testament from the first century. The earliest fragment of any intra-canonical gospel is P52. It contains words from the Gospel of John and dates from perhaps 125.

---

<sup>28</sup> M. Hengel, The Johannine Question, trans. J. Bowden (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1989), 74. For more reflection and research, see Hengel, Die johanneische Frage, WUNT 67 (Tübingen: Mohr [Siebeck], 1993), 205.

<sup>29</sup> H. Koester, Ancient Gospels: Their History and Development (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990).

<sup>30</sup> See Charlesworth, The Beloved Disciple: Whose Witness Validates the Gospel of John? (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1995).

6. Three of the four intra-canonical gospels portray Jesus' life with the same perspective; the synoptics are Mark, Matthew, and Luke; the latter two depend on Mark, according to almost all New Testament scholars. The Gospel of John presents a different perspective.

Probing Questions

A study of the four intra-canonical gospels awakens in the reader some inconsistencies. Note the following questions:

- Was Jesus born in Bethlehem [Matt, Luke] or Nazareth [Mark, John]?
- Were wisemen [Matt] or shepherds [Luke] at Jesus' birth [or neither]?
- Was Jesus baptized by John the Baptist [Mark] or not [Luke 3:19–21]?
- Was Jesus' ministry one year [Mark, Matt, Luke] or three [John]?
- Was Jesus' teaching about the Kingdom of God [Mark, Matt, Luke] that was offered in challenging parables or was it about "I am" proclamations [John]?
- Is the Lord's Prayer authentic to Jesus [only in Matt and Luke and different]?
- Did Jesus lament in Gethsemane [esp. Luke] or not [John]?
- Did he carry his own cross [John] or did Simon of Cyrene carry it for him [Mark, Matt, Luke]?
- Were Jesus' last words "My God, my God, why . . . ?" [Mark] or "it is finished" [John]?
- Were his first resurrection appearances in Jerusalem [Luke, John] or Galilee [Mark, Matt]?
- Did Magdalene [John] or Peter [Paul (1 Cor 15), cf. Matt 28:9] see the resurrected Jesus first?

Shaping of the Gospel Tradition

Today Protestants, Jews, and Roman Catholics have basically agreed on how the intra-canonical gospels took shape. At the beginning, of course, are Jesus' life and his teachings (c. 6 BCE to 30 CE). These were remembered by those who knew him and were shaped by teaching (didache) and proclamation (kerygma) in the Palestinian Jesus Movement (any reference to a "church" is anachronistic). Some early tracts of Jesus' traditions were probably written since such documents seem to explain the clustering of parables (Mark 4) and miracles (Mark 6:30–56) in the Gospel of Mark. A Signs Source may lie behind the Gospel of John. A lost document containing sayings of Jesus probably was used by Matthew and Luke. All these documents antedate the intra-canonical gospels. They probably took shape between 30 and 50 CE.

The first written gospel seems to be the Gospel of Mark, which was composed in the late sixties or early seventies. The Gospel of John has evolved through numerous editions. The first one may antedate 70 CE. Matthew was composed around 85. The “final” edition of John is dated about 95. The composition of Luke-Acts is usually dated around 80–90, though some experts now are suggesting perhaps between 90–110.

Key Question. A key question is now central in the study of all gospels and in Jesus Research. Scholars are sharply divided as they seek to answer this question: “How much tradition and how much addition shape the Jesus traditions in the gospels?” The minimalists claim that the evangelists have given us only their own editing of Jesus traditions. The maximalists contend that the evangelists have almost always preserved the message of Jesus and that Jesus’ own voice (ipsissima vox Iesu) can be heard in some passages. Clearly, in my judgment, the intra-canonical gospels are edited accounts of what Jesus said and did, but that edition is possible only because of the presence of tradition. The synoptics present somewhat accurately Jesus’ fundamental message (as I shall indicate later).

2.2. Why were Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John Chosen?

We have no clear and direct evidence of how and why four gospels were chosen. There was no church council that voted on what should be included and what should be excluded. Obviously, apostolic authorship or authority was important in many centers in which Christianity was influential. In such areas practice by the leaders and the average Christian was important as they chose the gospels that were “true.” Such a rule (= canon) to define and shape faith was necessary, since dozens of gospels were circulating by about 200 CE. The names of some of these extra-canonical gospels are the Gospel of Peter, the Gospel of Thomas, the Gospel of Judas, and the Gospel of Mary.

Some of the criteria for deciding what is authoritative (or canonical) reflect a growing recognition by the masses of the accepted gospels. Frequently, custom and not theological insight was dominant. For example, Irenaeus, Bishop of Lyon, about 180 CE claimed that it was essential to have four gospels since there are four winds: “It is not possible that the Gospels can be either more or fewer in number than they are, since there are four directions of the world in which we are, and four principal winds...” (Adv. Haer. 3.11.8). One should note that much earlier Adronicus in Athens demonstrated that there are more than four winds and that Irenaeus included in his canon as “Scripture” the Shepherd of Hermas.

The limits of the canon were not defined in many areas until the Middle Ages. While the Festal Letter of 367 by Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria, defines a canon that is virtually identical to that used today in the West, it was not definitive in the fourth century. The Revelation of John was not accepted by the Greek Orthodox Church until about the tenth century. And this apocalypse is not “canonical” in the Syriac vulgate (the Peshitta).

3. Is it Possible to Obtain Reliable Information Regarding Jesus of Nazareth?

How does one discern Jesus’ own traditions among the Jesus traditions preserved by the evangelists? In particular, how do we assess Jesus’ unique teachings?<sup>31</sup> This has been a vexing problem for New Testament specialists. They have often worked on Jesus traditions by focusing only on the New Testament. Yet, only a historian of Judaism of the first century CE can answer the questions we are now raising.<sup>32</sup> When one does not know early Jewish theology that antedates 70 CE, one can easily claim that certain expressions and concepts, such as the Son of Man theology and the Rule of God (the Kingdom of God), were created by Jesus or his earliest followers. These terms and concepts are now clearly evident in pre-70 Jewish thought; the Son of Man in 1 Enoch 37–71 (which is certainly Jewish and pre-70) and the Rule of God in many documents (viz. in the Angelic Liturgy).

Uniqueness does not lie in what is not found in a thinker’s context. Uniqueness resides in what words have been chosen and which words are stressed. A cluster of words, or concepts, indicates the creativity of thinkers who are always constrained by the images, symbols, concepts, terms, and words used by those in their own time and culture. Hence, Jesus’ unique words were shaped by contemporary Jewish thought and especially by the interpretation of scripture by his fellow Jews. Jesus' words in turn shaped the minds of those who composed the gospels.

---

<sup>31</sup> One of the best ways to discern and comprehend Jesus’ uniqueness is to focus on a question and explore it without seeking Jesus’ uniqueness. A good example of this methodology is found in T. Holmén’s “Jesus, Judaism and the Covenant,” JSHJ 2.1 (2004): 3–27. Holmén discovers (and I think correctly) that “Jesus was rather detached from the covenant thinking of his contemporaries” (26).

<sup>32</sup> See esp. the comments by Bultmann in The Theology of the New Testament, trans. K. Grobel (New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1951), 1:26 (“Only the historian can answer this question. . .”). Bultmann went on to stress that faith as a personal decision “cannot be dependent upon a historian’s labor.”

Many scholars commence with assuming that a Jesus-tradition is inauthentic until proven authentic. This tends to interject into scientific research a bias against authenticity. Should we not rather assume a tradition is authentic until evidence appears that undermines its authenticity? Does not this position better reflect the intentionality of the evangelists? Should we ignore the fact that within a few decades of Jesus' death his followers (some of whom were certainly eyewitnesses to what he said and did) attributed the examined saying to him?

Hillel-traditions are almost always written more than two centuries after he lived. The Jesus-traditions, in contrast, originated in and took a written form in the century in which he lived.<sup>33</sup> Learned persons claimed in the first century and even before 70 CE that Jesus had said and done what is recorded in Mark and the earliest sections of Matthew, Luke, and John. And the communities of the evangelists included those who contended that a witness to Jesus was trustworthy (cf. John 19:35, 21:24, and 1:14b).

The question, nevertheless, remains as to how much historical veracity we acknowledge to be with such witnesses. In my judgment, Jesus' earliest followers were often gifted and well trained. They were not poor ignorant peasants or rustic fishermen as earlier critics assumed. I am convinced that we need to pay more heed to the context in which a Jesus saying appears. It is often within a few decades of his life and the author is living within a polemical ambience in which it would be foolhardy to fabricate traditions. The honesty of the evangelists is apparent in their report that Jesus had been crucified and that Peter had denied him.

A perception of the polemical ambience in which the Jesus traditions took shape helps us comprehend the process of transmission. Yet, we should avoid an assumption that there was a "college" of scholars in Jerusalem in the thirties and forties who were authenticating Jesus' traditions. We should not fail to observe that the evangelists certainly did take incredible liberties in shaping the Jesus tradition.

We need to avoid all indications that are positivistic. Almost always suspicions about inauthenticity appear. That is, it soon becomes readily apparent to the attentive researcher that traditions about Jesus often are shaped by the belief in his resurrection. The transmitters of tradition and compilers of the gospels were never interested first and foremost in giving us an un-interpreted life of Jesus. They proclaimed the one who had been the consummate Proclaimer.

---

<sup>33</sup> See Charlesworth and L. L. Johns, eds., Hillel and Jesus (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1997).

We also have come to recognize that the human does not have the ability to present a life of someone without interpretation. Most of us would admit that even if such an impossibility might be possible that we would not be interested in it. It would be as dull and dead as many of the papyri and ostraca that I have studied. There is little interest for me in a saying such as the report that “Qausyehab, crushed wheat: 6 seah, 1 qab.”<sup>34</sup> I really have little interest in finding out who is “Qausyehab” and why it is important to report that he crushed some wheat.

As most of those who study the intra-canonical gospels, I am interested in learning something significant about Jesus. And I do not want simple reports that he was able to crush some wheat. I need reliable and meaningful information regarding Jesus’ message and actions. What did he say and how do his actions help us comprehend what he intended to accomplish?

How does a scholar move from what Jesus really taught (ipsissima verba Jesu) to the voice of Christ speaking to the believer (ex ore Christi)? It is clear that the evangelists did not ask such questions and did not make distinctions necessary today. Already by about 100 or 125 in the Odes of Solomon there is no distinction between ex ore Christi and poetic compositions by a Christian Jew. The Odist moves from his own words to Christ’s words without any clear indication that another speaker is being represented.

Scholars are aware that all extant gospels are edited versions of Jesus traditions. No one should wish to confuse what evangelists thought with what Jesus taught. Hence, criteria for discerning within the gospels the deeds and sayings of the historical Jesus have developed.<sup>35</sup> What are the most reliable methods for discerning Jesus’ own traditions from the Jesus traditions recorded by the evangelists?<sup>36</sup>

<sup>34</sup> See I. Eph’al and J. Naveh, Aramaic Ostraca of the Fourth Century BC from Idumaea (Jerusalem: Magnes Press, 1996), 66; see the facing plate.

<sup>35</sup> See esp. Theissen and Winter, The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria. Also see the important contributions to B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, eds., Authenticating the Words of Jesus, NTTTS 28.1 (Leiden: Brill, 1999).

<sup>36</sup> Those methods not discussed now include an exhortation to search (cf. Matt 9:12–13; Matt 20:22; and Mark 10:38) and low Christology (esp. Jesus’ claim that “something

1. Dissimilarity. Sayings of Jesus that are dissimilar to early Jewish thought or cannot be attributed to Jesus' followers likely derive from Jesus himself (this is, of course, my own definition of the method). R. Bultmann used a form of this criterion,<sup>37</sup> and N. Perrin called it the "strongest" method for discerning Jesus' own traditions among the Jesus traditions.<sup>38</sup>

The problem with this method is obvious; the net is too loose. Much authentic Jesus data is lost by focusing only on dissimilarity. It is clear today that Jesus was a Jew, deeply influenced by his own religion. He also had followers who were devoted to him and significantly influenced by his teachings and actions. Jesus' parables are some of his most obvious creations; yet, parables abound in early Judaism. He crafted beatitudes, but beatitudes are now found among the Dead Sea Scrolls (viz. 4Q525). Some critics imagine that the Lord's Prayer was fashioned by Jesus' followers who knew he referred to God as "Abba," Father; yet the Lord's Prayer is in many places identical with early rabbinic prayers.<sup>39</sup>

Despite these recognitions, the criterion of dissimilarity is one of our strongest methods. It should be employed with perception and with knowledge of early Judaism, the Palestinian Jesus Movement, and in light of other methods.

2. Embarrassment. This method notes that some sayings and deeds of Jesus were an embarrassment to the evangelists. The polemical ambience of the transmission of Jesus traditions is important. The gospel record developed with the proclamation that the crucified Jew was the Messiah. The proclamation was often directed to those who had rejected his teachings and had seen him publicly humiliated.

Certain sayings and historical events were embarrassing to Jesus' followers. As we observe how the record was embarrassing to the evangelists we discern that a saying or action is most likely authentic. Our proof greater than Solomon is here" [Matt 12:42 and Luke 11:31] and why do you call me good? [Mark 10:18]), and explanatory expansion (cf. John 12:33).

---

<sup>37</sup> R. Bultmann, Jesus and the Word, trans. L. P. Smith and E. H. Lantero (London: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1934), see esp. 17; also see idem, History of the Synoptic Tradition, trans. J. Marsh (Oxford: Blackwell, 1963), 40. For a penetrating study of Bultmann, see Weaver, The Historical Jesus, 104–105.

<sup>38</sup> N. Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (New York: Harper, 1967), 38.

<sup>39</sup> See the contributions in Charlesworth, M. Harding, and M. Kiley, eds., The Lord's Prayer and Other Prayer Texts from the Greco-Roman Era (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1994).

is often evident in Matthew and Luke's editing of Mark. For example, Jesus' claim that God's Rule (the Kingdom of God) would dawn while some of his hearers were still alive was an embarrassment to Matthew and Luke so that they were forced to edit and alter the meaning of Mark 9:1. Only Mark clearly reports that John the Baptist baptized Jesus (Mark 13:32). Luke, for example, places John in prison so as to avoid the embarrassing claim that John was thereby superior to Jesus, since the superior almost always baptizes the inferior (the polemic against the followers of John the Baptist also shapes the narrative in John 1–4).

I am convinced that the two most important criteria for authenticity are the criterion of dissimilarity to the christology and theology of the members of the Palestinian Jesus Movement, and the criterion of embarrassment to his followers. That is, if a saying or act is dissimilar to his followers' way of thinking or embarrassing to them, then it most likely did not arise with them. Since it is attributed to Jesus by the evangelists it may well have originated with him.

3. Multiple attestation. A third major criterion is multiple attestation. That is, a saying or action attributed to Jesus preserved in two or more independent primary sources is more probably original to Jesus than if it were found in only one source. Thus, it becomes clear by studying Mark, John, and the Gospel of Thomas (which in my judgment does contain some sayings of Jesus that are free from the editing [redaction] of the intra-canonical evangelists) that Jesus' teaching was shaped by Jewish apocalyptic thought and was eschatological.<sup>40</sup>

Yet, multiple attestation also has its limits. Sometimes it is clear that an authentic saying of Jesus was misunderstood, misleading, or embarrassing, and was then omitted by others. The best example seems to be regarding the seed growing secretly which is found in Mark 4:26–29 but not in Matthew, Luke, or John (cf. Gos. Thom. 21).

4. Coherence. Why is this parable of the seed growing secretly probably authentic? Because of the criterion of coherence. That is, the saying is coherent to many sayings already discerned to be authentic to Jesus, including the apocalyptic and eschatological thrust of Jesus' message.

It has become widely acknowledged by Jesus scholars that a biography of Jesus is impossible.<sup>41</sup> As we search the sources for reliable traditions that may originate with him, we should always remember that Mark, whoever he was, never knew Jesus. That means he could not appeal to his own memory for clarifying when and where Jesus said or did something. The earliest evangelist (known as Mark) was forced to create an order for Jesus' life. Mark's task may be compared to the attempts of someone who had broken a woman's pearl necklace and was forced to put the pearls back in the original order. That is as impossible as it was for Mark to recreate the order of Jesus' traditions.

---

<sup>40</sup> See esp. the definitive study on Jesus' apocalyptic and eschatological message by D. C. Allison, "The Eschatology of Jesus," in The Encyclopedia of Apocalypticism, ed. J. J. Collins (New York: Continuum, 1999), 1:267–302.

<sup>41</sup> Two works stand out, in my view, as admirable portraits of Jesus' life and teaching.

What is possible for us today? First, we must not let our own wishes and desires dictate methods or conclusions. If we ask honest questions then we must honestly seek to answer them. That means being true to the questions without regard to any possible answer. Otherwise we deceive ourselves into thinking we are honest. If our method is not informed and honest we become incapable of learning what are the most probable answers.

3.1. Actions

Was Jesus a revolutionary? In the sixties there was a keen interest in Jesus and revolution; obviously the tenor of the age (and anti-establishment) sparked this interest. The leading, and popular, books included S. G. F. Brandon's Jesus and the Zealots (1967), and O. Cullmann's Jesus and the Revolutionaries (1970).<sup>42</sup> Brandon claimed that Jesus was a political revolutionary. Cullmann claimed he was not. What are the most important data to ascertain an informative answer?

Those who conclude that Jesus was a political revolutionary emphasize the following positions:

1. From Herod's death in 4 BCE to 66 CE, when open revolt exploded, Palestinian Jews grew increasingly more hateful of Roman occupation. Jesus died in 30, and his crucifixion indicates that at least some thought he was politically motivated.

---

They are G. Bornkamm's Jesus of Nazareth, trans. I. and F. McLuskey with J. M. Robinson (New York: Harper & Row, 1960); and C. H. Dodd's The Founder of Christianity (New York: Collier Books, 1970). It is no accident that both scholars were balanced in their approach and wrote the work near the end of a career characterized by historical erudition and perception. Each knew the sources and requisite methodology.

<sup>42</sup> S. G. F. Brandon, Jesus and the Zealots: A Study of the Political Factor in Primitive Christianity (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1967); O. Cullmann, Jesus and the Revolutionaries (New York: Harper & Row, 1970).

2. The pregnant apocalyptic eschatology produced a militant attitude (cf. the War Scroll). Some of the revolutionaries are known by name, e.g. Theudas, who is mentioned in Acts and Josephus's works.
3. Jesus was associated with John the Baptist who was killed by Herod Antipas.
4. Simon Zelotes was one of Jesus' disciples, and the Zealots were active by at least 6 CE.
5. Judas was called "Iscariot," because the Greek sikarios means an "assassin." That Judas was attracted to Jesus indicates that "assassins" were among his group.
6. Peter had a sword in Gethsemane and cut off the ear of the servant of the high priest.
7. Jesus taught that there is no king but God, and he demanded absolute allegiance to God alone. He warned that one could not serve two masters.
8. Jesus taught the "Lord's Prayer" and told his followers to pray "thy kingdom come on the Land as in heaven."
9. Jesus taught his followers to "render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's and to God the things that are God's." Jesus knew that his followers would comprehend that this demanded open revolt against Roman oppression and occupation.
10. Jesus said, "I have not come to bring peace, but a sword" (Matt 10:34).
11. Jesus also told his followers that two swords are "enough" (Luke 22:38).
12. Jesus was against the "establishment" and received spies from Jerusalem.
13. Jesus was accompanied by "crowds" that were politically dangerous.
14. According to the Fourth Evangelist, Jesus was hailed "king" after the feeding of the 5000.
15. Jesus went triumphantly to Jerusalem at Passover, the most volatile time.
16. Jesus was crucified; that is, the Romans concluded he was a danger to Rome. The Emperor Tiberius and Prefect Pontius Pilate had him killed between two "thieves" who were revolutionaries.
17. The title on Jesus' cross hailed that he aspired to be "King of the Jews."
18. The evangelists' editing reveals the attempt to shift the blame for Jesus' death to "Jews"; this indicates their attempt to remove Jesus' anti-Roman message.

19. Josephus's account about Jesus discloses that Jesus was one who disturbed the peace.

These nineteen points have led some experts to conclude that Jesus was a failed revolutionary. Christian theologians who have been influenced by such reasoning conclude that Christians must forget the Jesus of history and hold only to the Christ of faith.

Other scholars conclude differently, by looking at the same data and interpreting it differently. They contend that Jesus knew the dangers of political revolution and warned against it. These are their arguments:

1. Jesus' teachings are clearly anti-revolutionary.
2. He taught his followers to turn the other cheek and to love their enemies.
3. Jesus stressed a theological, not a political, thought in the Lord's prayer: "thy kingdom come on earth as in heaven"; thus, Jesus did not desire revolt but peace on earth.
4. Jesus warned the revolutionaries: "all who take the sword will perish by the sword" Matt 26:52 [bis].
5. Jesus exhorted his followers to take the soldier's pack two miles (not the required one mile).
6. Jesus told his disciples to render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's; the coin he referred to contained Caesar's portrait.
7. Jesus knew Roman soldiers were young and human, and he had cordial relationships with a centurion.
8. Jesus and his followers could not be Zealots since this group within Judaism did not appear before 66 CE.
9. Judas' name "Iskariot" derives from the name of his village, Iskariot.
10. Jesus' statement "For if they do this when the wood is green, what will happen when it is dry?" (Luke 23:31) indicates that Jesus compared himself to wood that would not burn and unlike the hot heads who wanted revolt against Rome.
11. Jesus expected to be stoned by Judeans, not crucified by Romans.

How can we adjudicate between these two hypotheses? Was Jesus a political revolutionary or not? First, we should perceive that politics and religion are intertwined in early Judaism and within the Palestinian Jesus Movement. Second, it is relatively certain that Jesus chose twelve disciples and thus envisioned a new Israel. Thus, the question becomes, 'what kind of a revolution did Jesus have in mind?'

There is no simple solution to a question that is based upon such complex data. And moreover, these sources are available only in a highly edited (redacted) form. Two observations seem certain to me: Jesus could not have been oblivious to the political ramifications of his life and teachings, and he refused to lead a militant revolution.

Let us review the judgments of those who were leaders in this hot debate that exploded in the sixties. In Jesus and the Zealots (1967), Brandon argued that an investigation is necessary “in the light of the new evaluation of the Zealots, but that it also will help in understanding the historical Jesus, who chose a Zealot for an apostle, and who died crucified between two men, probably Jewish resistance fighters, who had challenged Rome’s sovereignty over Israel” (xiv). In Jesus and the Revolutionaries (1970), Cullmann retorted with the argument that Jesus is “much more radical” than the Zealots, his “goal and norms are ‘not of this world,’ as is the case for the Zealots” (57).

Scholars are almost all now convinced, over thirty years later, that Jesus was not a Zealot and he did not strive to lead a rebellion against Rome or support such a revolt. Why? There are three areas to review.

First, today we have a much better understanding of Jesus’ time, thanks to a more careful study of scripture, the discovery of early Jewish texts, and the startling discoveries by archaeologists. The high priest when Jesus was crucified was Joseph Caiaphas. He was the last high priest appointed by Valerius Gratus, and he held the high priestly office for almost twenty years (18–36 CE). That means he continued in office and had political power only because he pleased the Romans. Caiaphas was certainly trusted by the Roman authorities. Any attempt to understand the motives behind Jesus’ crucifixion should be informed by the fact that the Roman governor and the high priest had some political bond after Judea became a Roman province in 6 CE.

The Zealots as a group or sect did not appear within Judaism until the revolt began in the sixties.<sup>43</sup> Josephus is our main source for this information, and he was not only an eyewitness but a participant in the revolt. Thus, since there were no “Zealots” prior to the sixties, neither Jesus’ disciples nor he can be perceived to be Zealots.

Some of the tensions that led to the revolt of 66–73/4 were certainly operative during the time of Jesus. The revolt, however, was a result of many political and sociological developments that postdate Jesus. The prefects became procurators during the early 40's, and the procurators without provocation destroyed some Jewish villages. The Romans failed to relate sensitively to the upper echelon of Jewish society. Over 10,000 workers were out of work in and near Jerusalem in the mid 60's when the renovation of the Temple was completed. The bandits and wild men that appeared sporadically during the time of Jesus became more desperate. The harsh methods of punishing riots known during the time of Pilate (26–36 CE) became more exacerbating to Jews. Of course, the influence of apocalypticism may have become more militant during the first half of the first century CE (cf. Testament of Moses).

---

<sup>43</sup> See D. M. Rhoads, Israel in Revolution, 6–74 CE: A Political History Based on the Writings of Josephus (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976).

Second, we have a more informed appreciation of the process of editing of the intra-canonical gospels. Brandon was correct to point to the pro-Roman tendencies of the evangelists. That, however, does not warrant the conclusion that the Jesus portrayed in them camouflaged a militant Zealot called Jesus. How Jesus was crucified indicates that the Romans judged him to be seditious; but it does not indicate that Jesus was a militant Zealot.

Third, scholars who are trained to interpret New Testament texts recognize the arguments that support the first hypothesis, that Jesus was a revolutionary; but they have indicated in numerous ways why the insights supporting the second hypothesis are more learned and carefully balanced. In particular, for me, Jesus' statement that aligns him with green wood and disassociates him from the dry wood makes best sense when interpreted in light of his claim that he who lives by the sword will die by the sword (coherency principle; Matt 26:52).

Jesus was then, not "a Jewish Resistance leader of a type not unique in this period," as H. Maccoby thought;<sup>44</sup> he was a revolutionary in a spiritual sense. This point is made, not by a Christian theologian; it is developed by a leading Jewish historian. In The Rise and Fall of Jewish Nationalism (1992), D. Mendels wisely points out that according to Matt 22:41–46, "Jesus dissociates himself publicly from David, who was viewed as a political, nationalistic king."<sup>45</sup> In Images of Jesus Today (1994)

---

<sup>44</sup> H. Maccoby claims that the evangelists distorted the political dimensions of Jesus' life and teaching, and that Jesus' claim to be the Messiah and arguments for the Kingdom of God disclose that he was a Jewish resistance fighter. See Maccoby, Revolution in Judaea: Jesus and the Jewish Resistance (London: Orbach and Chambers, 1973), esp. 124.

<sup>45</sup> D. Mendels, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Nationalism, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1992), 228.

Mendels concludes that “one thing is certain, that Jesus thought neither of the Heavenly Kingdom, nor of himself, in terms of a king with an army, servants, conquests, and territory. He wanted to be some kind of spiritual king, not a physical and political one.”<sup>46</sup> In Jesus and the Spiral of Violence: Popular Resistance in Roman Palestine, R. A. Horsley correctly shows that Jesus did not himself advocate or organize “the kind of armed rebellion that would have been necessary to free the society from the military-power of the Roman Empire.”<sup>47</sup>

Jesus was a revolutionary. He was involved in religion and politics, but he was mistakenly crucified as a political revolutionary because of the time, Passover, and his popularity among the Jews that aroused crowds. These became mobs which threatened social norms and peace. Jesus led a movement that sought to renew Israel as did the prophets centuries before (esp. Isaiah and Jeremiah). The Jesus of history was a bold man of incredible integrity, vision, and dedication to God.

3.2. Sayings

What was Jesus’ method of teaching and what was his fundamental Message?

1. Means: The Parables. Jesus’ speech was simple and direct. He preferred to clothe his theological reflections in pictorial speech. His sayings were typically shaped into parables which often, but not always, make one major point of comparison. Almost everything in his parables is true to normal life and nature. A remarkable realism characterized his thought and mental pictures. As C. H. Dodd stated, Jesus could have said “beneficence should not be ostentatious.” But he used language that was real and hence permanent in a fertile mind. So, Jesus said, “when you give alms, do not blow your trumpet.”<sup>48</sup> As Theissen and Merz report, “It is generally agreed that the parables are the characteristic form of Jesus’ teaching.”<sup>49</sup> Thus, parables are one of the major means of discerning the authentic teaching of Jesus.<sup>50</sup>

<sup>46</sup> Mendels, “Jesus and the Politics of His Day,” in Images of Jesus Today, ed. Charlesworth and W. P. Weaver, Faith and Scholarship Colloquies 3 (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1994), 98–112; the quotation is on pp. 106–107.

<sup>47</sup> R. A. Horsley, Jesus and the Spiral of Violence: Popular Resistance in Roman Palestine (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987), 321.

<sup>48</sup> C. H. Dodd, Parables of the Kingdom, rev. ed. (London: Nisbet, 1936), 16–17.

<sup>49</sup> Theissen and Mertz, The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide, 316.

<sup>50</sup> One should be aware of a danger. Parables were illegitimately transferred to Jesus, as we know from the study of the transmission of the Apocryphon of Ezekiel.

Parables were not invented by Jesus. He inherited them from both ancient scripture and contemporary Jewish thought. A parable may be discerned in Nathan's story which helped David to realize he was guilty within a law that is above the king (cf. 2 Sam 12:1–7). Parables invite the attentive one to become involved and make a judgment that will unexpectedly include the one judging. Parables are frequently found in rabbinic writings and appear in early Jewish texts, such as The Parables of Enoch (1 Enoch 37–71).

Jesus' parables can be organized into three classes, according to length. The shortest are mere figurative sayings (Bildwörter). Examples are "make yourself purses that do not wear out," "if the blind lead the blind, both fall into the pit," and it "is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter God's Kingdom."

Parables are sometimes of medium length. They tell a mini story (Gleichnisse). Some of the best examples are the following:

No one lights a lamp and puts it under the bushel, but on a lamp stand; then it gives light to all in the house. (Matt 5:15)

Why do you see the splinter in your brother's eye, but do not notice the log in your own eye? Or how can you say to your brother, 'Brother let me take out the splinter that is in your eye,' when you yourself do not see the log in your own eye? (Luke 6:41)

The longest parables are stories that are well known. Among these are short stories such as parables of the Lost Sheep, Lost Coin, Costly Pearl, and the full blown parables such as the Prodigal Son, Good Samaritan, and Laborers in the Vineyard

The parables are like windows into Jesus' mind. He tried to help his hearers, who included common folk (am ha-aretz), to perceive abstract ideas and concepts through pictures and images familiar to them. Thus, Jesus' parables are not so much focused on making one point; they create a world of meaning and invite the listeners to enter this world, and usually make a personality altering decision. Jesus' mind perceived truth not in abstractions but in concrete images. It is clear that Jesus was a poetic genius imbued with prophetic insight and a gift for engaging language.

2. What was Jesus' fundamental message? It was the proclamation of the dawning of God's Rule (the Kingdom of God). Perrin claimed that this concept—the Rule of God or the Kingdom of God—was not found within Judaism and was thus unique to Jesus. Perrin was not adequately informed of early Jewish thought. God's Kingdom, The Rule of God or "the Kingdom of God" appears in numerous Jewish documents that slightly antedate Jesus; even the expression “the Kingdom of our God” is found in the Psalms of Solomon 17.4.<sup>51</sup>

What is the key question that is raised among scholars by Jesus’ proclamation of the coming of God’s Rule? It concerns the time of this cataclysmic event. A. Schweitzer argued that Jesus’ view was thorough-going eschatology.<sup>52</sup> Jesus looked to the future. C. H. Dodd argued that Jesus held a “realized eschatology”; that is, Jesus believed that God’s Rule was actively dawning in his own time. I would argue that Dodd overreacted to Schweitzer, and that Jesus himself experienced a realizing eschatology.<sup>53</sup> As the dawning of a new day precedes the rising sun, so Jesus thought about the breaking into the present of God’s future day. His teaching is often a mixture of realizing eschatology and futuristic eschatology (as in Qumran’s Thanksgiving Hymns). As B. Chilton states in his superb study of Jesus’ proclamation of God’s Rule (Kingdom of God), “in that his vision included a hope for the future, it was irreducibly eschatological.”<sup>54</sup>

Does that mean Jesus knew when the hour of God’s Rule would dawn? An answer would depend on how one understands the relation between Mark 9:1, which attributes to Jesus the belief that some of his associates would not die until God’s Rule was present in their midst, and Mark 13:32, which indicates that only God knows the time of the fulfillment of God’s Rule.

I take both statements to be authentic to Jesus. Mark 9:1 did not occur and so both Matthew and Luke were forced to edit it. Mark 13:32 also seems to be authentic to Jesus since it attributes ignorance to Jesus. Both of Jesus’ statements seem authentic because they were an embarrassment to his followers and the evangelists. One should also note that Uriel must confess to Ezra that an archangel often does not have the knowledge that a human requires (4 Ezra).

We have seen that Jesus’ authentic message was fundamentally eschatological.<sup>55</sup> His parables and teachings, and the prayer he taught (the

---

<sup>51</sup> Charlesworth, “The Historical Jesus in Light of Writings Contemporaneous with Him,” ANRW II 25.1 (1982): 451–476.

<sup>52</sup> Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus.

<sup>53</sup> Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom.

<sup>54</sup> B. Chilton, Pure Kingdom: Jesus’ Vision of God (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1996), 142.

<sup>55</sup> For a different perspective, see M. J. Borg, “Jesus and Eschatology: A Reassessment,” in Images of Jesus Today, 42–67.

“Lord’s Prayer”), contain the perspective that the present time is impregnated with the power of the end of time. Rather than draining the present of meaning, Jesus’ proclamation charged the present with power and meaning. All time, past and present, was focused on the immediate present.

4. What can be Known about the Historical Jesus and with What Degree of Certainty?

What then might be known historically about Jesus? To answer this focused question succinctly I shall present a list, with an indication of where the historical datum might be placed on the spectrum of probability, since the historian’s approximation to certainty is a mere “highly probable.” The spectrum is thence as follows (from the least to the most certain): barely conceivable, conceivable, possible, probable, and highly probable.

As I have already indicated, the intra-canonical gospels took shape within decades of Jesus’ death. They reflect the years in which Jesus’ traditions—that is, the traditions that originated with him—evolved or developed into Jesus traditions that reflected the need to proclaim the Proclaimer, as Bultmann and many New Testament specialists have showed. Many of the most cherished traditions in the Jesus story were created by the needs of the Palestinian Jesus Movement. They thus did not originate with Jesus and are fabricated Jesus traditions (that is, words and actions illegitimately attributed to Jesus).

As David Friedrich Strauss pointed out in his The Life of Jesus Critically Examined, which appeared in 1835, some of these Jesus traditions are myths that developed out of three human perspectives. First, some originated as philosophical or theological truths. Second, others evolved from poetic imaginations. Third, some, perhaps many, were grounded in real historical events, and these were of such momentous importance they are possible to relate only via myths. We commence, then, by looking at the legendary portrayal of Jesus and move towards the relatively reliable historical information about Jesus of Nazareth.

4.1. The Story

This section lists the legendary and perhaps mythological aspects of Jesus’ life and teaching that are full of meaning christologically but probably did not happen historically as described. These aspects of the Jesus story were most likely composed to celebrate Jesus as the Christ or Son of God. In assessing these invaluable dimensions of the Jesus traditions, we should remember that his followers were an insignificant sect that was persecuted, and some members even martyred, by the dominant priestly establishment in Jerusalem.<sup>56</sup> Moreover, there are truths in myths; in fact truth often demands such a vehicle.

The virgin birth derives from mythological traditions found in Jewish as well as Roman traditions. It is not found in Mark or John. The genealogies are the creation of scribes. It is conceivable that there may be some historical facts behind them. They are not found in Mark or John. It is unlikely that wise men attended Jesus' birth. This story is found only in Matthew.

Luke's unique story of the singing of a heavenly chorus is pure embellishment. It seems relatively certain that Jesus' exodus from Egypt, in Matthew, was created out of the conviction that scripture so indicated he was God's son. It is unique to Matthew and reflects his narrative style and theological tendency.

The story of Satan's temptation is most likely fabricated out of ancient biblical traditions. Since it is placed in the wilderness (Mark 1:12) it might be a theological means of narrating how Jesus was prepared for his life work, since in biblical theology "wilderness" denotes the place of preparation.

Legends and myths probably created the account of Jesus' speaking with Wisdom in the Temple as a youth.<sup>57</sup> The story is unique to Luke. Mythological reflections have created the idea that Jesus turned water into wine. The story is found only in John and the account does not describe any action by Jesus that would cause water to become wine.

Christological reflections have led to the contention that Jesus walked on the water. The purpose of the story is to draw attention to Jesus and is thus motivated by christology and not history.

---

<sup>56</sup> I am convinced that we can use the word "sect" in describing three Jewish groups: the Samaritans, the Essenes (including the Qumranites), and the Palestinian Jesus Movement, but we need to jettison the often pejorative overtones of a "sect." These three Jewish groups were "sects," because they separated from the larger body, were perceived as different from the larger social group, and were persecuted by some representatives from that larger body. See R. Scroggs, "The Earliest Christian Community as Sectarian Movements," in Christianity, Judaism, and Other Greco-Roman Cults, ed. J. Neusner (Leiden: Brill, 1975), 1–23; B. Wilson, "The Sociology of Sects," in Religion in Sociological Perspective (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1982), 89–120.

<sup>57</sup> B. Witherington urges us to contemplate Jesus in light of the Wisdom traditions; see his Jesus the Sage: The Pilgrimage of Wisdom (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1994).

The Transfiguration serves to elevate Jesus' status and is mythological christology. That is, the motive behind the story is not history; it is christology and celebration.

It is improbable that Jesus raised Jairus's daughter, the widow of Nain's son, and Lazarus from the dead. Such stories elevate Jesus and seem to reflect the early kerygma (proclamation) that stressed his divine or messianic qualities.

Christology has created the account of Jesus' calming of the storm and sea. Again, the motive is to proclaim Jesus as lord of the cosmos.

It is improbable that Jesus established the institution of the Eucharist as described in the synoptics. The liturgies in early Judaism and in the Palestinian Jesus Movement certainly helped shape this account.

Beliefs in Jesus as the charismatic miracle worker probably created the accounts of his feeding 4000 and 5000. Surely, the motive is not history; it is christology and motivated by "The Great Man" sociology.

The needs of the confessing community seem to have created the accounts in which Jesus predicts he will be crucified. If Jesus predicted his crucifixion, then why do his disciples seem so ill-prepared for the event? If he predicted his crucifixion, then how does one explain the dire scene in Gethsemane and Jesus' cry from the cross? The gospels at this point were clearly written from the resurrection faith and backward to the crucifixion and then to the early years of Jesus.

Unbridled enthusiasm has led to the expansionistic descriptions of Jesus' resurrection appearances (esp. John 21). These accounts clearly reflect the resurrection faith of Jesus' followers. The resurrection faith of Jesus' followers was one of the main catalysts for proclaiming the "good news" and writing the gospels.

One should not evaluate these elements as if they are not important. They reveal the importance, and historicity, of the belief in Jesus' resurrection by his followers (cf. Rom 1:1-6).

4.2. A List of Possible Aspects of Jesus' Life and Teaching

In contrast to the former category, some aspects of Jesus' life are relatively reliable historically. Historians have successfully shown that numerous sayings and actions of Jesus are less creations of the evangelists, or Jesus' followers, and more a dimension of Jesus' history. I shall now present my list of the most important ones.

1. Jesus may have been born in Bethlehem, despite Matthew's and Luke's use of scripture to prove it.

2. He was most likely related to the Baptist and could have been of priestly lineage.
3. He may have been a Davidian. At least three strata (Paul, Matthew, Luke) preserve this tradition.
4. He possibly went to Jerusalem for his Bar Mitzvah, since he was very Jewish.
5. Jesus may not have been a “carpenter,” and his parables connect him more with farming and fishing. This conclusion derives from studying all four gospels, and examining the important variant in Mark 6:3.
6. It is conceivable Jesus may have worn a tsitsith (cf. Num 15:39 “You shall have it as a fringe...”), and conceivably a phylactery. The woman with a hemorrhage seems to have touched Jesus’ fringe garment (Matt 9:20, Luke 8:44; cf. Mark 6:56 and Matt 14:36). If he wore a tsitsith then he most likely wore a phylactery, at least on special religious occasions.
7. It is perhaps likely that he spent all night in prayer dedicated to God (Luke 6:12). The habit is clearly stated in Luke, reflected in Mark, and explains the sleeping disciples in Gethsemane on Jesus’ last night.
8. It is possible that Jesus had a messianic self-understanding; and it is conceivable that he may have considered he was the designated Messiah. These aspects of his life permeate virtually all sources. Jesus’ messianic self-understanding may entail that he therefore could not proclaim it or acknowledge it; only God knows and can disclose who is the Messiah (Pss. Sol. 17, 4 Ezra).
9. Despite the embellishments in the triumphal entry, Jesus may have entered Jerusalem on an animal and with public fanfare. The action makes sense in terms of our study of pilgrimages and sociological studies of Jerusalem at Passover time in Jerusalem.<sup>58</sup>
10. Some members of the Sanhedrin were perhaps behind his arrest, but they may not have contemplated his death. The evidence is again well attested by the gospels and comments by Josephus.
11. It is only barely conceivable that Jesus contemplated a place for Gentiles in his community. It is not impossible that the stories about the Syrophoenician woman and the centurion indicate some change in his attitude to Gentiles. But Peter's inability to defend himself in Acts (a book that is pro-Gentile) with the inclusion of the centurion, remains a major obstacle against the hypothesis that Jesus eventually included Gentiles.

---

<sup>58</sup> Still one of the best studies of life in Jerusalem during the time of Jesus is J. Jeremias’s Jerusalem during the Time of Jesus: An Investigation into Economic and Social Conditions during the New Testament Period, trans. F. H. and C. H. Cave (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1967).

12. It is barely conceivable that Jesus predicted the Temple's destruction when he overturned the tables of the money changers.

4.3. Relatively Certain Aspects of Jesus' Life and Teaching

Thanks to careful research by scholars in Germany, France, Sweden, England, Israel, and the United States, and since the end of the seventeenth century, we can report that some aspects of Jesus' life and teaching are relatively certain.

1. Jesus was born in Palestine, probably in or near Nazareth. He was never called Jesus of Bethlehem but frequently Jesus of Nazareth.
2. Nothing can be known with any probability about the years before his public ministry. The intra-canonical gospels and Josephus make no mention of his childhood or youth.
3. He was probably not born into a poor family. If he knew scripture as well as his contemporaries claimed, he must have spent vast amounts of time studying, and that is not possible if he was a peasant.
4. Unlike many learned persons (notably Polybius, Philo, Paul, and Josephus), Jesus did not travel widely. It is highly improbable that he left "the Land of Israel," or ancient Palestine.
5. Jesus joined John the Baptist, who was probably his teacher. The traditions preserved in the intra-canonical gospels, and especially Mark and John, have proved to be relatively reliable regarding Jesus' relation with John the Baptizer.
6. If the Fourth Gospel preserves reliable historical information about Jesus' early ministry, he led a baptist movement for an indeterminate amount of time.
7. Jesus was baptized by John the Baptizer. The embarrassment in many places in the New Testament about this episode confirms its historicity.
8. Jesus probably interpreted Isa 40:3 differently from John the Baptist and the Qumranites. Unlike them he did not think a Voice had called him into the wilderness. For Jesus, the Voice was calling from the wilderness.

9. He left the wilderness and taught on the outskirts of cities and villages.
10. Jesus was charismatic, an eloquent speaker, and powerfully influenced many Jews.
11. Jesus was gifted as a story teller and poet.
12. He spoke with uncommon authority and directly, without citing authorities.<sup>59</sup>
13. He was not a student of Hillel, and was certainly not the Righteous Teacher of Qumran.
14. He was politically anti-revolutionary and he was not a Zealot,<sup>60</sup> but it is also absurd to assume, or to conclude, that Jesus had no political agenda.<sup>61</sup> After all, John the Baptist was beheaded by a Herodian ruler and Jesus was put to death by the command of a Roman governor.
15. Jesus was often invited to elaborate dinners, and knew the joy of companionship and wine.
16. Some Pharisees admired him, sought his company, and probably warned him about problems.
17. Other Pharisees sought to entrap him, especially those from Judaea and Jerusalem.
18. Jesus taught in Galilee and Judaea, and probably in Samaria.
19. He performed miracles, notably the healing miracles, because his opponents affirmed that point by explaining how he was able to do miracles. They said he was possessed of a devil or was the Devil. For the evangelists, Jesus' miracles revealed that he had been sent to them by God.<sup>62</sup>

---

<sup>59</sup> As R. Riesner points out, the messianic authority-motif is a pre-Easter part of Jewish theology. See Riesner, Jesus als Lehrer, WUNT 2.7 (Tübingen: Mohr [Siebeck], 2nd ed., 1984), 352. Also see Riesner, "Jesus as Preacher and Teacher," in Jesus and the Oral Gospel Tradition, ed. H. Wansbrough, JSNTSup 64 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1991), 187–209.

<sup>60</sup> For an informed study of Jesus and the revolutionaries of his day, see R. A. Horsley, Jesus and the Spiral of Violence: Popular Jewish Resistance in Roman Palestine (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987).

<sup>61</sup> See esp. two major books on Jesus and politics: E. Bammel and C. F. D. Moule, eds., Jesus and the Politics of His Day (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984); and Mendels, The Rise and Fall of Jewish Nationalism, esp. 209–242. Mendels demonstrates how the concept of kingship changes in the period from 63 BCE to 135 CE.

<sup>62</sup> See especially P. Fiebig, Jüdische Wundergeschichten des neutestamentlichen Zeitalters (Tübingen: Mohr, 1911); and R. Heiligenthal, Werke als Zeichen, WUNT 2.9 (Tübingen: Mohr [Siebeck], 1983).

20. Jesus spoke primarily Aramaic, but he knew Hebrew, Greek, and a little Latin.
21. The beatitudes in Matthew and Luke probably derive ultimately from Jesus. Beatitudes have been found in the Dead Sea Scrolls (as well as in 1 Enoch and 2 Enoch); hence this manner of speaking was not created by his followers.
22. His favorite means of speaking was in parables and they ring true to his intentionality; that is, God's Kingdom was now dawning in the present. Jesus' parables are closest to those of the Pharisees. It seems evident that only Jesus and the Pharisees used parables in significant ways as a means of teaching.<sup>63</sup> We derive the conclusion that Jesus' favorite form of teaching was the parable from the synoptics and the Gospel of Thomas.
23. Jesus most likely taught a love command that was unique. Jesus elevated the concept of love and made it central in his teachings; he even seems to have taught that his followers should love their enemies. Ironically, perhaps, the best elucidation of this point is by the Jew David Flusser in his chapter "Love" in the revision of his Jesus.<sup>64</sup> We arrive at this solid conclusion by studying all four intra-canonical gospels, the Gospel of Thomas, and the letters of Paul (esp. 1 Cor 13).
24. Jesus probably quoted only scripture that is now canonized, but he was influenced by other sacred Jewish writings.
25. He was obsessed with God. He did not proclaim himself, but was emphatically monotheistic.
26. Some of his statements indicate that he probably thought the Kingdom would dawn in his lifetime (Mark 9:1). Yet, as shown earlier, Jesus probably did not know the precise time of the end of time (Mark 13:32).
27. Jesus certainly demanded absolute commitment to God's Rule. This point readily appears from the study of the intra-canonical gospels and the Gospel of Thomas.
28. He probably taught a form of the Lord's Prayer. Since the differences between Matthew's and Luke's versions of the Lord's Prayer

---

<sup>63</sup> See S. Safrai, who rightly states, Jesus "employed educational techniques such as the parable that were common only in Pharisaic teaching. . . ." See Safrai, "Jesus and the Hasidim," Jerusalem Perspective 42, 43, 44 (January/June 1994): 3–22.

<sup>64</sup> D. Flusser with R. S. Notley, Jesus (Jerusalem: Magnes, 1997; aug. ed., 1998); see esp. "Love," 81–92.

- are numerous and significant, it seems to follow that Matthew and Luke, at this point, derive from two independent sources.<sup>65</sup>
29. Jesus most likely thought he was “the Son of God,” but it is far from clear what that meant to him. This title is found in his parables and in other early strata, including the Parable of the Wicked Tenant Farmers in two independent sources, Mark and the Gospel of Thomas. Jesus’ self understanding of himself as “God’s Son” must not be confused with the Nicene formula.<sup>66</sup>
  30. Unlike the Qumranites Jesus had low, even no, social barriers and virtually no requirements for “admission” into his group.
  31. At least during portions of his ministry he included only Jews; and it is barely conceivable, at best, that he thought his mission also included Gentiles.
  32. Jesus included women in his group, and probably broke with many in his culture about their status in society. This conclusion derives from studying the intra-canonical gospels, especially the Gospel of John.<sup>67</sup>
  33. Jesus probably never broke the Sabbath according to the Torah, but he certainly broke Sabbath legislations developed by some of the Jewish groups or sects.
  34. Jesus was a very devout Jew. In fact, he was more Jewish than Philo, who mixed Jewish traditions in the caldron of Greek ideals and myths, and Josephus, who explained Jewish theology as if it was like Greek philosophy.
  35. Jesus may have been married;<sup>68</sup> he certainly was close to Mary Magdalene. Why did the Fourth evangelist have Jesus say to Mary, “Do not touch me?” (John 20:1)? The text is usually mistranslated, “Do not hold me.”
  36. It is virtually certain that Jesus chose twelve disciples. Otherwise it is inexplicable why his followers would have created that tradition and placed Judas within it. Thus, it is possible that Jesus had

---

<sup>65</sup> See the chapters in Charlesworth, Harding, and Kiley, eds., The Lord’s Prayer and Other Prayer Texts from the Greco-Roman Era.

<sup>66</sup> For further reflections, see Charlesworth, Jesus within Judaism, 131–164.

<sup>67</sup> Among the many excellent books on the subject of Jesus and women is B. Witherington’s Women in the Ministry of Jesus, SNTSMS 51 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984).

<sup>68</sup> For the argument that Jesus was married, see W. E. Phipps, Was Jesus Married? (New York: Harper & Row, 1970), esp. 13–14, 187.

more than a mere spiritual revolution in mind. This conclusion derives from the application of the criterion of embarrassment.

37. It seems likely that James and John, the sons of Zebedee, requested thrones beside him. The embarrassment of the tradition is obvious when one sees how Matthew shifts Mark's request from them to their mother.
38. Jesus did not found the "church," but he probably called into being a special eschatological group. This conclusion is apparent from a study of the intra-canonical gospels, the Gospel of Thomas, and Josephus.
39. His disciples seemed to misunderstand him, and Peter most likely denied him. Again, multiple attestation tends to prove this conclusion.
40. Jesus' involvement with the Baptist, who was killed by the political ruler named Herod Antipas (4 BCE–39 CE), and his crucifixion, according to the Roman governor's orders, prove that some leaders saw him as a political person and threat.
41. Jesus probably developed a view of purity that was diametrically opposed to that espoused by the leading priests in the Temple, notably Annas (6–15 CE) and Joseph Caiaphas (18–36 CE), who were influenced by the rules for purification that can be found, for example, in the Temple Scroll, col. 50. These rules took the laws in the Torah (Old Testament) and exaggerated them so that the average Jew could not afford them.

It is also evident that the Galilean Jesus intentionally—and thereby polemically—opposed some of the purity laws being promulgated by the priestly establishment in Jerusalem, as indicated by Mark 7:1–23.<sup>69</sup> Archaeological excavations in Lower Galilee and Judea reveal miqvaoth (Jewish ritual baths) that are sometimes massive and often numerous, and stone vessels (cups, plates, pitchers, and large vessels [cf. John 2:6]). These miqvaoth and stone vessels are fashioned—often at great expense—for the observance of the Jewish rules for purity that began to develop shortly before the time of Jesus. The gospels record that Jesus was tested in Galilee, even persecuted, by Pharisees and scribes sent out from Jerusalem by the priests in authority (cf. Mark 7:1).

---

<sup>69</sup> I continue to be impressed with M. J. Borg's claim that Jesus substituted "mercy for holiness as the paradigm for Israel's collective life." Borg, Conflict, Holiness and Politics in the Teaching of Jesus, 261.

42. Jesus taught in the Temple and admired it.
43. Jesus probably revered most aspects of the cult in the Temple. He probably called the Temple “my Father’s house” (John 2:26). The evidence indicates that his followers were created by and did not originate such traditions. For example, after Jesus’ death Peter and John ascend to the Temple “at the hour of prayer, the ninth hour”<sup>70</sup> (see esp. Acts 3:1).
44. Jesus went to Jerusalem in order to fulfill the injunction of the Torah and to celebrate Passover in the Holy City. That seems to be an obvious inference from a study of the intra-canonical gospels and a perception of Jesus’ Jewishness.
45. He probably overturned the tables of the money changers, and it is conceivable that he was protesting some excesses of the cult and the excessive demands for ritual purity. This interpretation makes best sense of all the data we possess, especially the Jewish writings from the time of Jesus.
46. It is highly probable that he thought he might be murdered. He seems to think he may be stoned outside Jerusalem as had the miracle worker named Honi, but it is unlikely that he ever contemplated he would be crucified. This insight seems to derive from the texts that suggest he had an intuition he might be stoned, and from a study of the four gospels and the Gospel of Thomas.<sup>71</sup>
47. It is probable that Jesus feared the coming danger and death when he prayed before his arrest, looking down on the Temple from the Garden of Gethsemane.
48. It is not absolutely certain that Judas “betrayed” him. The witness of the Fourth Gospel must be neither ignored nor exaggerated. Since the authorities obviously were able to recognize Jesus, Judas did not betray Jesus’ identity, but then what did he betray?
49. During his Last Supper Jesus probably celebrated a meal with Passover in mind and said something similar to that found in Paul (1 Cor 11:23–25 [v. 26 is Paul’s addition]), but stressing the dawning of God’s Rule and the importance of the Twelve within it.<sup>72</sup> Obviously, central to his words was a plea to remember him:

---

<sup>70</sup> The “ninth hour” is also the hour when Jesus died, according to Mark (15:34). How much theology has shaped that tradition?

<sup>71</sup> For further reflections, see Charlesworth, “Jesus’ Concept of God and His Self-Understanding,” in Jesus within Judaism, 131–164.

<sup>72</sup> See the similar reflections in P. Fredriksen, From Jesus to Christ (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1988), 115.

“Do this in remembrance of me.” The remembrance of the pre-crucified figure is central to the Eucharist. We know this from a study of the traditions in Paul’s authentic letters and the four intra-canonical gospels.

50. Jesus was condemned to die from crucifixion by Pilate who was most likely staying in Herod’s palace in the Upper City of Jerusalem, as the three names praetorium (the governor’s residence), lithostroton (the large public elegantly stone pavement), and gabbatha (the Hebrew equivalent of the Greek lithostroton) signify.<sup>73</sup>
51. He was tied or nailed to the cross by Roman soldiers.<sup>74</sup> We obtain this information from the four intra-canonical gospels, from archaeological research, and from early traditions in the Gospel of Peter.
52. Jesus seems to have died confused and his last words were most likely “My God, my God, why...?” The criterion of embarrassment helps at this point.
53. After Jesus’ crucifixion his followers fled. Some probably went back to Galilee (John 21). Many who were earlier bonded to him most likely looked back on his life and admitted “we had hoped” (the Emmaus story in Luke 24:[12]13–27). The embarrassment of his followers and multiple attestation lift this point to a very high level of probability.
54. It is possible, but faith is necessary to affirm, that Jesus was raised by God. Some leading Jews, especially Lapide and Flusser, contemplate this confession as possible historically.<sup>75</sup> The resurrection faith of Jesus’ followers makes sense in light of early Jewish theology (esp. Dan 12, 4Q521 On Resurrection, and the Amidah). Belief in Jesus’ resurrection by God is well attested in the intra-

---

<sup>73</sup> Still vividly memorable are the days spent with P. Benoit in the Old City of Jerusalem. During that time he convinced me that these three terms must refer to Herod’s Palace and not to the Antonia Fortress. See Benoit, “Praetorium, Lithostroton and Gabbatha,” in Jesus and the Gospel, trans. B. Weatherhead (New York: Seabury, 1973), 1:167–188.

<sup>74</sup> See the study by J. Zias and Charlesworth in Charlesworth, ed., Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls.

<sup>75</sup> P. Lapide, The Resurrection of Jesus: A Jewish Perspective, trans. W. C. Linss (Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1983); Flusser, Jesus, 175–177 and in private conversations. Contrast Bishop Spong’s contention that the resurrection is built on out-dated cosmology. J. Spong, This Hebrew Lord (New York; Seabury, 1974), 164–166, 179–181.

canonical and extra-canonical gospels, Paul, and other very early sources.

55. Mary Magdalene, not Peter, was probably the first to see him after the resurrection.<sup>76</sup> The criterion of embarrassment and the tendencies of the sources help us comprehend this probability. That is, the New Testament theologian as well as the New Testament historian should perceive that the tradition regarding Magdalene's experience of the resurrected Jesus is primary and was later replaced by the tradition regarding Peter. Those who proclaimed the crucified was the Messiah would be publicly ridiculed by the claim that a woman made the confession and not the leader of Jesus' group.

Summary. It has been difficult to resist the temptation to turn each entry in these three lists into a separate study. The three lists contain some new discoveries and perspectives that appeared unexpectedly as I focused on the levels of assurance that might be possible regarding the fruits of Jesus Research.<sup>77</sup>

5. How Do My Conclusions Compare with Those Offered by Other Experts?

With E. P. Sanders, D. Flusser, G. Vermes, and N. T. Wright—as with many other specialists in Jesus research—I wish to stress that Jesus' life and teachings must be understood within the world of Second Temple Judaism, that we can know a lot about him, and that what we are learning makes eminent sense within what is now clear regarding early Jewish thought and practice. With virtually all scholars who are focusing on Jesus research, and not motivated by questing for a Jesus that is attractive to faith, I conclude that Jesus' message is deeply indebted to Jewish apocalyptic thought and is fundamentally eschatological. One needs to obtain a balance between noting that Jesus' message must not be confused with that of the evangelists and the perception that there is continuity between Jesus and them.

---

<sup>76</sup> For further reflections and data, see Charlesworth, "Is It Conceivable that Jesus Married Mary Magdalene?" (in press).

<sup>77</sup> The reader may find some insights by comparing my list with one published by Sanders in his Jesus and Judaism, 326–327.

With B. Chilton I am persuaded that topography is important and the place where Jesus was with John the Baptizer is precisely the spot that ancient traditions associate with Elijah's ascent into heaven. Perhaps here in such a spot so electric with imagined ascents, Jesus and the Baptizer might have had "apocalyptic moments." Chilton also seems correct to suggest that Jesus had problems with the charge that he was a mamzer (not so much a "bastard" as one who could not prove to the demanding Jewish authorities that he had a certified Jewish father and mother).<sup>78</sup>

I was surprised to discover that Jesus most likely chose twelve men (my research is thus in harmony with the independent discoveries of Sanders and Meier). With J. P. Meier, and many others, I conclude that Jesus was baptized by John the Baptizer. I am convinced that Meier incorrectly jettisons the use of the so-called apocrypha and pseudepigrapha of the New Testament in understanding Jesus' message. While I am sensitive to J. D. Crossan's inclusion of the extra-canonical gospels, I think he exaggerates their importance.<sup>79</sup>

While I find much that is appealing and pioneering in Dunn's Jesus Remembered, I must part company with him when he claims that "the Fourth Gospel" has "been effectively knocked out of the quest" (p. 41). I sense a breakup of the scholarly consensus that the Gospel of John is irrelevant for Jesus research and that it contains valuable records of pre-70 Jerusalem and the historical Jesus. Quite surprisingly, during the millennium celebration in Jerusalem, focused on Jesus and archaeology, numerous archaeologists voiced the opinion that the Fourth Gospel is full of valuable details and insights that are essential for reconstructing the social setting of Jesus, his life and his teachings.<sup>80</sup>

I find too anachronistic or misleading both Crossan's claim that Jesus should be portrayed as a Mediterranean peasant and the title of Meier's volumes that Jesus was a marginal Jew. I do not think a study of the economics of Galilee permits us to imagine peasants.<sup>81</sup> Small farms and

<sup>78</sup> See my further reflections in "Jesus and Psychobiography" (in press).

<sup>79</sup> See Charlesworth, "Research on the New Testament Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha," Aufstieg und Niedergang der Römischen Welt II 25.5 (1988): 3919–3968, esp. 3934–3940.

<sup>80</sup> See Charlesworth, ed., Jesus and Archaeology (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2006).

<sup>81</sup> See the methodological problems in reconstructing ancient economies by M. I. Finley, The Ancient Economy, Sather Classical Lectures 43 (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973); D. E. Oakman, Jesus and the Economic Questions of His Day, Studies in the Bible and Early Christianity 8 (Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1986); E. W. Stegemann and W. Stegemann, "The Economic Situation of Ancient Mediterranean Societies," in The Jesus Movement: A Social History of Its First Century, trans. O. C. Dean, Jr.

fishing villages do not suggest a “peasant” economy, if we understand a “peasant” as one who is a rustic of limited economic means. In contrast to Judea, the major means of commerce in Lower Galilee was the barter system, and one could avoid taxations by swapping commodities, such as olives and fish which were plentiful. It is also clear that there were many different cultures in the Mediterranean area.

Likewise, to portray Jesus as a “marginal” Jew, as placarded in the title (but not the contents) of Meier’s volumes, suggests that Jesus was not deeply religious and a devout Jew and that he was on the fringes of Jewish society. Yet, it has become obvious to many experts that Jesus was a devout Jew and belongs within the mainstream of early Jewish thought, sharing insights and commitments especially with Pharisees (like Hillel) and also with Essenes, as well as with the baptist groups, the Samaritans, the mystics, the Enoch groups, and Jews who were not highly educated.

I am impressed how much of a consensus has developed among some of the leaders in Jesus Research. From different perspectives the leading experts in the study (not search) of the historical Jesus are convinced that scholars today have far more reliable historical knowledge about what Jesus said and did than our teachers had been willing to admit.

6. Conclusion

During much of the nineteenth century it has been vogue to report in the academy and in the seminary—but certainly never in the church—that we know practically nothing about Jesus. This was the conclusion of Bultmann and his influential school in Germany and America. About all that could be known was the sheer isolated fact that Jesus had existed and been crucified. Notice these words of Bultmann:

I do indeed think that we can now know almost nothing concerning the life and personality of Jesus, since the early Christian sources show no interest in either, are moreover fragmentary and often legendary; and other sources about Jesus do not exist.<sup>82</sup>

---

(Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1999), 15–52. While the economy of Palestine, especially Lower Galilee, was simple—agrarian and pastoral—the success of farming and fishing allowed for reserves necessary to observe the sabbatical year. See E. Gabba, “The Social, Economic and Political History of Palestine 63 BCE–CE 70,” in The Cambridge History of Judaism (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999), 3:94–167, esp. 107.

<sup>82</sup> Bultmann, Jesus and the Word, 14.

When I have cited this passage from Bultmann scholars have told me I misquoted Bultmann. They were convinced that Bultmann claimed only that we could know almost nothing about Jesus' personality.

I cannot agree with Bultmann that the "early Christian sources show no interest" in Jesus' life, while I would agree that they were not interested in his personality—that is, in the modern psychological meaning of the term. Bultmann developed this position before the discovery of the Nag Hammadi Codices and the Dead Sea Scrolls, and so the question arises what difference they make. For Bultmann they did not make a difference.

For me they do make a significant difference. I would stress two points: Among the Nag Hammadi Codices the Gospel of Thomas is clearly a source for Jesus research. And while the Dead Sea Scrolls are not "sources about Jesus"—that is, none of the Dead Sea Scrolls mention Jesus or any of his disciples—they are "a source" for this research, providing terms, perspectives, and methods of interpreting scripture that help us understand him.<sup>83</sup>

A moratorium on the quest of the historical Jesus is the hallmark of the Bultmannian School; yet we should not forget the inconsistencies in some of Bultmann's work. While he did stress that faith requires only the givenness of Jesus (the dass) he did write a major book on Jesus. In this book he argued that we can know quite a lot about Jesus' teaching concerning the coming of God's kingdom and about the will of God.

Since 1980, "Jesus Research"—as noted at the outset—is the technical term that defines the work of many New Testament scholars, such as E. P. Sanders, J. Meier, G. Vermes, D. Flusser, D. Mendels, and myself. We are not primarily interested in, or blinded by, theological concerns. In contrast the term "the Third Quest of the historical Jesus" characterizes the work of some New Testament scholars, like M. J. Borg, who are seeking to discern Jesus' meaning for Christian faith.<sup>84</sup> While the distinction between historians and theologians in Jesus Research was evident in the eighties, it is not so clear today, as more and more scholars are interested in the study of the historical Jesus in terms of secular history and the theology of the evangelists.

---

<sup>83</sup> Most of these are discussed in Charlesworth, Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls.

<sup>84</sup> See Borg's Meeting Jesus Again for the First Time. The Christian and theological content of the book derives from the lectures Borg presented to a conference of the United Church of Christ. For a succinct and sensitive critique of Borg and others in the Jesus Seminar, see L. R. Donelson, "Safe in the Arms of Jesus," Insights (Spring 1997): 3–13, 47. For a scathing dismissal of the Jesus Seminar, see L. T. Johnson, The Real Jesus (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1996).

Of course, I am also interested in theology, but I am aware of how too often, over the past 200 years, theological issues contaminated historiography. Literary and non-literary studies have given us many valuable insights into the historical Jesus. Jesus is not some unknown person hidden behind the confessions in the gospels.<sup>85</sup> Along with many scholars, I have concluded that we know more about Jesus than about almost any other first-century Jew, with the exceptions of Paul and Josephus, both of whom—unlike Jesus—wrote numerous epistles or books. We certainly know far more about Jesus than his near contemporary Hillel.<sup>86</sup>

Some Christians—especially Roman Catholics<sup>87</sup>—are shocked to learn that Jesus actually lived and was a Jew from Galilee. Others find such conclusions difficult to relate to their contention that Christianity is pure theology untainted by historical issues. For Jews, Jesus research, let alone the quest, can be irrelevant. For others, like D. Flusser in his Jesus (1997, 1998), Jesus' message and life are powerful and perhaps the greatest moments in the history of religions.

The process of learning is not to move from questions to assured results. The educated person is one who begins to grasp how much can never really be known about the past. The savant is one who has moved from rather insignificant questions to a world of questioning. Historians will never be able to provide data and insights that will cause all readers to answer in similar fashion such questions as “Who was Jesus? What was his purpose?” A surprising consensus has developed, thanks to two hundred years of intensive historical research, that Jesus' fundamental message was centered in the proclamation that God's Rule (the Kingdom of God) was beginning to dawn during his life and ministry. Many specialists in Jesus research agree that we do have reliable historical information concerning a man from Nazareth called Jesus the Son of Joseph. He certainly did not attempt to establish a new religion that would be different from the Judaism that nurtured him. He set in motion a new movement for the renewal of Judaism that was similar to other

---

<sup>85</sup> See the same point made by J. Pelikan, Jesus through the Centuries (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1985), 10.

<sup>86</sup> See the chapters in Charlesworth and Johns, eds., Hillel and Jesus.

<sup>87</sup> I know this not from reading books but from talking to Roman Catholics who are disillusioned about the church's failure to teach them what might be known, historically and sociologically, about Jesus.

renewal movements within Judaism that likewise—in various ways and with different intensities—stressed the intensification of Torah observance: the Pharisees, the Essenes, the Enoch groups, and the freedom fighters.<sup>88</sup>

We need to continue to explore such questions as these: “Why was he crucified? How and in what ways was Jesus influenced by contemporary Jewish ideas? How reliably do the evangelists report pre-70 Jewish thinking? Who was the first Christian?” Such questions have ushered in a new phase of Jesus research.

---

<sup>88</sup> G. Theissen drew attention to these renewal movements; I have added the Enoch groups that were influential within Palestinian Judaism from about 300 BCE until 70 CE, at least. See Theissen, Sociology of Early Palestinian Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978).

METHOD IN A CRITICAL STUDY OF JESUS

BRUCE D. CHILTON

1. Aim

Confusion has inhibited critical understanding of Jesus.

Within the study of the New Testament reference to Jesus is unavoidable; the effort of neo-orthodoxy to rely on the “Christ of faith” trumping “the historical Jesus” has failed.<sup>1</sup> The only decision to be made is how reference to Jesus is to be developed, not whether it can be avoided.

Since the Enlightenment it has been evident that the Jesus of the canonical texts is not identical with the Jesus of Christian doctrine, although some scholars still try to square history with the circle of faith.<sup>2</sup>

Familiarity with Judaism is rudimentary within New Testament research; some scholars still assert that any similarity with a rabbinic institution must be attributed to Jesus, rather than his followers (who—it is supposed—were non-Judaic Hellenists<sup>3</sup>). Yet figures in history are generally of significance owing to their distinctiveness among their contemporaries. If Jesus were indistinguishable from other rabbis of his period, it seems unlikely he would be an object of study, much less of worship.

Still less defensibly, some scholars persist in assuming that any similarity between Jesus and Judaism must be a late import, ignoring the

---

<sup>1</sup> For discussion, see Redeeming Time: The Wisdom of Ancient Jewish and Christian Festal Calendars (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2002), 1–20. (For the purpose of this article, authorship is attributed to the present writer unless otherwise indicated.) As ever in scholarship, there are attempts to revive eclipsed fashions; see Luke Timothy Johnson, Living Jesus: Learning the Heart of the Gospel (San Francisco: HarperSan Francisco, 1999).

<sup>2</sup> See Leander E. Keck, Who Is Jesus? History in Perfect Tense (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2001), and the review in TJT 19 (2003): 80–82; B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, eds., Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, NTTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994; paperback, 1998).

<sup>3</sup> See Geza Vermes, Jesus in His Jewish Context (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2003), and the review in Int 58, no. 2 (2004): 210. For a survey of similar attempts and efforts to correct them, see “Jesus and Judaism,” New Blackfriars 63 (1982): 237–244; “Jesus within Judaism,” in Judaism in Late Antiquity: Part Two, Historical Syntheses, ed. J. Neusner, HO 17 (Leiden: Brill, 1995), 262–284.

depth of the analogies between Judaic sources and Christian writings of all periods and all stages of their composition.<sup>4</sup> The teachers we call rabbis were masters (to varying degrees) of parable and exposition and judgment and ethics and purity and health and healing and other aspects of covenantal wisdom. It has long been commonplace in the field to acknowledge that the formalism of a rabbinate, including a concern for succession and a notion of a syllabus to be mastered by disciples, only prevailed with the emergence of rabbis as the basis of systemic redefinition of Judaism in the period after 70 CE.<sup>5</sup>

It is therefore not surprising that there are analogies between the gospels and Judaic literature, including literature of the rabbinic period, and that Jesus is called “rabbi” more than any other name in the gospels.<sup>6</sup> The dating of all the sources, and the relationships among the documents, naturally need to be taken into account, but the fact of comparable materials remains.

Comparison has been thwarted, however, by a positivist approach to literary sources that is in its way as crude as a positivist approach to Jesus. Attention has been limited to the issue of whether the gospels borrow from Judaic literature. That limitation is further obscured by referring to this concern as a search for “parallels,” although the very definition of parallel lines is that they do not meet at all. Our discipline’s continuing affliction with obscurantist language reveals its difficulty of coming to terms with Judaism.

In fact, borrowings between Christianity and Judaism go both ways insofar as the written evidence attests.<sup>7</sup> Whether borrowings occur from

---

<sup>4</sup> See John Dominic Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (Edinburgh: T&T Clark; San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1991). His book may be read as an extended attempt to construct a portrait of Jesus without reference to Judaism. “Jesus within Judaism” criticizes this approach.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. H. Lapin, “Rabbi,” ABD 5: 600–602. As a matter of interest, we might note that the earlier article of P. Parker (“Rabbi, Rabbouni,” IDB 4:3) comes to much the same conclusion. See also A Galilean Rabbi and His Bible: Jesus’ Use of the Interpreted Scripture of His Time (Wilmington, DE: Glazier, 1984), also published with the subtitle, Jesus’ Own Interpretation of Isaiah (London: SPCK, 1984), 34–35; John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, ABRL 3 (New York: Doubleday, 1991).

<sup>6</sup> See “Judaism,” 398–405; “Rabbinic Traditions and Writings,” 651–660; “Targums,” 800–804; in Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels, ed. J. B. Green, S. McKnight, and I. H. Howard (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1992); Rabbi Jesus: An Intimate Biography (New York: Doubleday, 2000); “Jesus, A Galilean Rabbi,” in Who was Jesus? A Jewish-Christian Dialogue, ed. P. Copan and C. A. Evans (Louisville: Westminster; John Knox, 2001), 154–161.

<sup>7</sup> “The Aqedah: A Revised Tradition History,” written with P. R. Davies, CBQ 40 (1978): 514–546; “Isaac and the Second Night: A Consideration,” Bib 61 (1980): 78–88;

document to document is usually not provable, since the proportion of writings that has survived is small, and the relationship of written sources to substantial interaction among teachers (Christian, Judaic, and others) is unknown. In any case, the adjudication between what is “borrowed” and what is “original” has proven susceptible to apologetics.

What we can ascertain is that there are analogies between the gospels and Judaic literature. These analogies might be matters of comparable thought or expression, of common cultural reference (for instance, to the Temple), of mutual exegesis (of Isaiah, say), or of joint usage of a tradition that links them (the proverbial truth that you are measured with the measure you measure with, for example).<sup>8</sup> However analogies are characterized, no finding for or against what is usually called the historicity of the gospels can be buttressed by observing them, but the simple fact of a relationship with Judaic literature has been well established.

The gospels refer back to Jesus as their source, but there is no “historical Jesus” in the sense of a person whose deeds and character are accessible by means of verifiable public evidence. Expectations of that positivist kind have been disappointed for more than a century, but for the most part history is no longer defined in that reductionist way in any case.<sup>9</sup>

---

“Irenaeus on Isaac,” in Studia Patristica XXIII, ed. E. A. Livingstone (Oxford: Pergamon, 1982), 643–647; “John xii 34 and Targum Isaiah lii 13,” NovT 22 (1980): 176–178; Targumic Approaches to the Gospels: Essays in the Mutual Definition of Judaism and Christianity, Studies in Judaism (Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1986), 81–84.

<sup>8</sup> See “Targumic Transmission and Dominical Tradition,” Gospel Perspectives 1 (1980): 21–45; “A Comparative Study of Synoptic Development: The Dispute between Cain and Abel in the Palestinian Targums and the Beelzebul Controversy in the Gospels,” JBL 101 (1982): 553–562; “Sennacherib: A Synoptic Relationship among Targumim of Isaiah,” in Targumic Approaches to the Gospels, 163–177, and Society of Biblical Literature 1986 Seminar Papers, ed. K. H. Richards (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1986), 544–554; “Reference to the Targumim in the Exegesis of the New Testament,” in Society of Biblical Literature 1995 Seminar Papers, ed. E. H. Lovering (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1995), 77–82; “Four Types of Comparison between the Targumim and the New Testament,” JAB 2 (2000): 163–188.

<sup>9</sup> See “Biblical Authority, Canonical Criticism, and Generative Exegesis,” in The Quest for Context and Meaning: Studies in Biblical Intertextuality in Honor of James A. Sanders, BIS 28 (Leiden: Brill, 1997), 343–355. An exception to this general rule is the program of “The Jesus Seminar”; see R. W. Funk and R. W. Hoover The Five Gospels: The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus, eds., (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1993). The volume’s dedication to Thomas Jefferson makes its Enlightenment perspective evident.

Only the literarily historical Jesus is a fact of reading. We cannot understand the documents unless we identify the Jesus they believe they are referring to. That Jesus, of course, is an object of their belief. He becomes historical for us in the literary sense when we discover that we must suppose facts about Jesus (for example, his teaching of the kingdom with an eschatological meaning<sup>10</sup>) in order to explain the generation of a given text. For that reason, Jesus is a figure of critical history to the extent, and only to the extent, that he permits us to explain how certain texts arose in their mutual relations and in their literary and cultural milieus.

Literary comparison of the New Testament with other sources (Jewish, Hellenistic, Ugaritic, Egyptian, or Persian) by itself does not solve “the problem of the historical Jesus,” but it can proceed in a way which does not exacerbate it, and which may be productive for further analysis. Finally, the “historical Jesus” is a variable in the overall equation of how the New Testament arose; for that reason, comparative study with other sources may be expected to provide that variable with more specific value than is possible in positivistic assertions about Jesus. That next stage of comparison, historical rather than literary, involves inference on the basis of the sources that refer to Jesus.

2. A Generative Exegesis: Six Types of Eucharist in the New Testament

A generative exegesis maintains a particular focus among the many critical questions that arise in the course of reading. The issue of generation is: in association with what practices and in which communities did a text arise, so as to attest those practices, their emotional valences, and the meanings attributed to them? That issue is cognate with the task of sorting out the purposes, development, and dating of ancient Judaic literature, and the analogies it offers can prove helpful.<sup>11</sup>

---

<sup>10</sup> See Pure Kingdom: Jesus' Vision of God: Studying the Historical Jesus, vol. 1 (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans; London: SPCK, 1996).

<sup>11</sup> See “Varieties and Tendencies of Midrash: Rabbinic Interpretations of Isaiah 24:23,” Gospel Perspectives 3 (1983): 9–32; The Glory of Israel: The Theology and Provenience of the Isaiah Targum, JSOTSup 23 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1982); The Isaiah Targum: Introduction, Translation, Apparatus, and Notes, AB 11 (Wilmington, DE: Glazier; Edinburgh: Clark, 1987); “Shebna, Eliakim, and the Promise to Peter,” in The Social World of Formative Christianity and Judaism, ed. J. Neusner, P. Borgen, E. S. Frerichs, and R. Horsley (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1989), 311–326; “Commenting on the Old Testament (with Particular Reference to the Pesharim, Philo, and the Mekhilta),” in It Is Written: Scripture Citing

In the case of the Eucharistic texts of the New Testament, the diversity of extant witnesses alerts us to the possibility that a variety of practices and communities might be reflected. The breadth and depth of the textual distribution invite us to take up the case of Eucharistic praxis here.

For over a decade, I have developed an account of the development of Eucharistic praxis within primitive Christianity, beginning with

---

Scripture, Essays in Honour of Barnabas Lindars, ed. D. A. Carson and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988), 122–140; “Recent and Prospective Discussion of Bar Enash,” in From Ancient Israel to Modern Judaism: Intellect in Quest of Understanding: Essays in Honor of Marvin Fox, ed. J. Neusner, E. S. Frerichs, and N. S. Sarna, Brown Judaic Studies 173 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1989), 119–137; “A Coin of Three Realms: Matthew 17:24–27,” in The Bible in Three Dimensions: Essays in Celebration of Forty Years of Biblical Studies in the University of Sheffield, ed. D. J. A. Clines, S. E. Fowl, and S. E. Porter, JSOTSup 87 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1990), 269–282; “[hos] phragellion ek skhoinion [John 2:15],” in Templum Amicitiae: Essays on the Second Temple Presented to Ernst Bammel, ed. W. Horbury (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1991), 330–344; “The Son of Man: Human and Heavenly,” in The Four Gospels 1992: Festschrift Frans Neirynek, ed. F. van Segbroeck, C. M. Tuckett, G. van Belle, and J. Verheyden, BETL 100 (Leuven: Peeters, 1992), 203–218, also published in Approaches to Ancient Judaism: Religious and Theological Studies, ed. J. Neusner, South Florida Studies in the History of Judaism 81 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1993), 97–114; “Typologies of Memra and the Fourth Gospel,” Targum Studies 1 (1992): 89–100; “Jesus and the Question of Anti-Semitism,” in Anti-Semitism and Early Christianity: Issues of Polemic and Faith, ed. C. A. Evans and D. A. Hagner (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1993), 39–52; “God as ‘Father’ in the Targumim, in Non-canonical Literatures of Early Judaism and Primitive Christianity, and in Matthew,” in The Pseudepigrapha and Early Biblical Interpretation, ed. J. H. Charlesworth and C. A. Evans, JSPSup 14 (Sheffield: JSOT, 1993), 151–169; “Reference to the Targumim in the Exegesis of the New Testament”; “Salvific Exile in the Isaiah Targum,” in Exile: Old Testament, Jewish, and Christian Conceptions, ed. J. M. Scott, JSJSup 56 (Leiden: Brill, 1997), 239–247; “Two in One: Renderings of the Book of Isaiah in Targum Jonathan,” in Writing and Reading the Scroll of Isaiah: Studies of an Interpretive Tradition 2, ed. C. C. Broyles and C. A. Evans, VTSup 70.2 (Leiden: Brill, 1997), 547–562; “Prophecy in the Targumim,” in Mediators of the Divine: Horizons of Prophecy, Divination, Dreams and Theurgy in Mediterranean Antiquity, ed. R. M. Berchman, South Florida Studies in the History of Judaism 163 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1998), 185–201; “The Brother of Jesus and the Interpretation of Scripture,” in The Use of Sacred Books in the Ancient World, ed. L. V. Rutgers, P. W. van der Horst, H. W. Havelaar, and L. Teugels (Leuven: Peeters, 1998), 29–48; “Yochanan the Purifier and His Immersion,” TJT 14, no. 2 (1998): 197–212; “The Targumim and Judaism of the First Century,” in Judaism in Late Antiquity, part 3, Where We Stand: Issues and Debates in Ancient Judaism, vol. 2, ed. J. Neusner and A. J. Avery-Peck, HO 41 (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 15–150; “Jesus und die Frage der Antisemitismus,” in Studien zu einer neutestamentlichen Hermeneutik nach Auschwitz, ed. P. Fiedler and G. Dautenberg, SBAB.NT 27 (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1999), 31–52; “Temple Restored, Temple in Heaven: Isaiah and the Prophets in the Targumim,” in Restoration: Old Testament, Jewish, and Christian Perspectives, ed. J. M. Scott (Leiden: Brill, 2001), 335–362; “John the Purifier: His Immersion and His Death,” Teologiese Studies 57:1–2 (2001): 247–267; “Theodicy in the Targumim,” in Theodicy in the World of the Bible, ed. Antti Laato and Johannes C. de Moor (Leiden: Brill, 2003), 728–752.

the contributions of Jesus as a conscious practitioner of Judaism. I engaged initially with the work of anthropologists of sacrifice, in order to assess Jesus' position in relation to the sacrificial cult in Jerusalem.<sup>12</sup> My principal concern was to evaluate Jesus' attitudes toward and his actions within the Temple itself. But in the course of the work, I saw the direct connection between Jesus' last meals with his followers and his action in the Temple. The Eucharist emerged as a surrogate of sacrifice. Encouraged by several scholars, notably Bernhard Lang, I then undertook an exegetical study<sup>13</sup> in order to detail the evolution of the texts within the typical practices of the first Christians.

Here I wish briefly to explain the six types of Eucharist attested within the New Testament that I have identified on exegetical grounds. These types characterize the particular groups that produced them. The types attest fluidity in ritual acts, different constituent communities, and distinctive accounts of meaning. Even Jesus, on my reading, developed not one but two types of Eucharist during his life.

The Mishnah, in an effort to conceive of a heinous defect on the part of a priest involved in slaughtering the red heifer, pictures him as intending to eat the flesh or drink the blood (m. Para 4:3). If Jesus' words are taken with their traditional, autobiographical meaning, his Last Supper can only be understood as a deliberate break from Judaism. Either Jesus himself promulgated a new religion, or his followers did so in his name, and invented "the Last Supper" themselves. Both those alternatives find adherents today among scholars, and the debate between those who see the gospels as literally true reports and those who see them as literary fictions shows little sign of making progress.

---

<sup>12</sup> The Temple of Jesus: His Sacrificial Program within a Cultural History of Sacrifice (University Park: The Pennsylvania State University Press, 1992). See also "The Purity of the Kingdom as Conveyed in Jesus' Meals," in Society of Biblical Literature 1992 Seminar Papers, ed. E. H. Lovering (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1992), 473–488; "A Generative Exegesis of Mark 7:1–23," Journal of Higher Criticism 3, no. 1 (1996): 18–37; "Jesus' Dispute in the Temple and the Origin of the Eucharist," Dialogue 29, no. 4 (1996): 17–28; Jesus in Context: Temple, Purity and Restoration, with Craig A. Evans, AGJU 39 (Leiden: Brill, 1997); "Jesus, Levitical Purity, and the Development of Primitive Christianity," in The Book of Leviticus: Composition and Reception, ed. R. Rendtorf and Robert Kugler with S. S. Bartel, VTSup 43 (Leiden: Brill, 2003), 358–382.

<sup>13</sup> A Feast of Meanings: Eucharistic Theologies from Jesus through Johannine Circles, NovTSup 72 (Leiden: Brill, 1994). Lang himself has taken up my theory and extended it into an analysis of later practices and theologies in B. Lang, Sacred Games: A History of Christian Worship (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997). Professor Lang and I have both contributed to the recent volume edited by Albert Baumgarten, Sacrifice in Religious Experience, NumenSup 43 (Leiden: Brill, 2002).

But in either case, the nagging question remains: if the generative act was indeed anti-sacrificial (whether that act was literal or literary), how did the cycles of traditions and the texts as they stand come to their present, sacrificial constructions?

The gospels are composite products of the various social groups that were part of Jesus' movement. When we place Eucharistic practices within the social constituencies that made the gospels into the texts we can read today, we can understand the original meaning Jesus gave to the Last Supper, and how his meaning generated others.

The Last Supper was not the only supper, just the last one. In fact, "the Last Supper" would have had no meaning apart from Jesus' well-established custom of eating with people socially. There was nothing unusual about a rabbi making social eating an instrument of his instruction, and it was part of Jesus' method from the first days of his movement in Galilee.

Many sorts of meals are attested in the literature of early Judaism. From Qumran we learn of banquets at which the community convened in order of hierarchy; Pharisees took meals within fellowships at which like-minded fellows would share the foods and the company they considered pure. Ordinary households might welcome the coming of the Sabbath with a prayer of sanctification over a cup of wine, or open a family occasion with a blessing over bread and wine.

For Jesus, eating socially with others in Israel was an enacted parable of the feast in the kingdom that was to come. The idea that God would offer festivity for all peoples on his holy mountain (see Isa 2:2–4) was a key feature in the fervent expectations of Judaism during the first century, and Jesus shared that hope, as may be seen in a saying from the source of his teaching conventionally known as "Q" (see Matt 8:11 = Luke 13:28, 29<sup>14</sup>):

Many shall come from east and west, and feast with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of God.

Eating was a way of enacting the kingdom of God, of practicing that rule. As a result, Jesus accepted as companions people such as tax agents and others of suspect purity, and received sinners at his meals. Meals for him were signs of the kingdom of God, and all the people of God, assuming they sought forgiveness, were to have access to them.

---

<sup>14</sup> Because my interest here is in the traditional form of the saying, prior to changes introduced in Matthew and Luke, I give a reconstructed form; see God in Strength: Jesus' Announcement of the Kingdom, SNTU 1 (Freistadt: Plöchl, 1979; repr., Biblical Seminar 8, Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987), 179–201; Pure Kingdom, 12–14.

Jesus' practice coincided to some extent with the Pharisees', although his construal of purity was unusual. Given the prominence accorded wine in his meals,<sup>15</sup> we might describe the first type of his meals—the practice of purity in anticipation of the kingdom—as a meal of sanctification, a kiddush of the kingdom. Indeed, there is practically no meal of Judaism with which Jesus' meals do not offer some sort of analogy, because the meal was a seal and an occasion of purity, and Jesus was concerned with what was pure. Both the nature of his concern and the character of his meals were distinctive: Israel as forgiven and willing to provide of its own produce was for him the occasion of the kingdom. That was the first type in the development of the Eucharist.

Jesus also brought his teaching into the Temple, where he insisted on his own teaching of purity. The incident that reflects the resulting dispute is usually called the "Cleansing of the Temple" (Matt 21:12–13 = Mark 11:15–17 = Luke 19:45–46 = John 2:13–17). From the point of view of the authorities there, what Jesus was after was the opposite of purification. He objected to the presence of merchants who had been given permission to sell sacrificial animals in the vast, outer court of the Temple. His objection was based on his own view of purity: Israel should offer, not priest's produce for which they bartered, but sacrifices that they brought into the Temple. He and his followers drove the animals and the sellers out of the great court with the use of force.

Jesus could not simply be dispatched as a cultic criminal. He was not attempting an onslaught upon the Temple as such; his dispute with the authorities concerned purity within the Temple. Other rabbis of his period also engaged in physical demonstrations of the purity they required in the conduct of worship. One of them, for example, is said to have driven thousands of sheep into the Temple, so that people could offer sacrifice in the manner he approved of (see Besah 20a–b in the Babylonian Talmud). Jesus' action was extreme, but not totally without precedent, even in the use of force.

The trigger of Jesus' arrest by the authorities of the Temple was not only his raid in the great court, but also the new meaning he imputed to his meals after that incident. He continued to celebrate meals as a foretaste of the kingdom, just as he had before. But his bid to change Temple praxis having failed, Jesus said of the wine, "This is my blood," and of the bread, "This is my flesh" (Matt 26:26, 28 = Mark 14:22, 24 = Luke 22:19–20 = 1 Cor 11:24–25 = Justin, 1 Apology 66.3).

---

<sup>15</sup> See the order of wine followed by bread in 1 Cor 10:16; Luke 22:19–20; Did. 9.1–5, and the particular significance accorded the wine in Mark 14:25; Matt 26:29; Luke 22:18.

In Jesus' context, the context of his confrontation with the authorities of the Temple, his principal point was that, in the absence of a Temple that permitted his view of purity to be practiced, wine was his blood of sacrifice, and bread was his flesh of sacrifice. This meaning of "the Last Supper," then, actually evolved over a series of meals after Jesus' occupation of the Temple. During that period, Jesus claimed that wine and bread were a better sacrifice than what was offered in the Temple: at least wine and bread were Israel's own, not tokens of priestly dominance.

In essence, Jesus made his meals into a rival altar, and we may call such a reading of his words a ritual or cultic interpretation. This second type of Eucharist offered wine and bread as a mimetic surrogate of sacrifice. The cultic interpretation has two advantages over the traditional, autobiographical interpretation as the meaning Jesus attributed to his own final meals. The first advantage is contextual: the cultic interpretation places Jesus firmly with the Judaism of his period and the final dispute of his life, and at the same time accounts for the opposition of the authorities to him. The second advantage is the explanatory power of this reading: the cultic interpretation enables us to explain sequentially four subsequent developments in the understanding of Eucharist within earliest Christianity.

The third type is that of Petrine Christianity, when the blessing of bread at home, the berakhah of Judaism, became a principal model of Eucharist. A practical result of that development was that bread came to have precedence over wine, and Acts refers to the ritual as the "breaking" of bread (see Acts 2:42–47). The circle of Peter conceived of Jesus as a new Moses, who gave commands as Moses did on Sinai, and who also expected his followers to worship on Mount Zion in memory of the covenant.

As compared to Jesus' practice (in its first and second stages), Petrine practice represents a double domestication. Adherents of the movement congregated in the homes of their colleagues, rather than seeking the hospitality of others. Further, the validity of sacrifice in the Temple was acknowledged. Both forms of domestication grew out of the new circumstances of the movement in Jerusalem and fresh opportunities for worship in the Temple; they changed the nature of the meal and the memory of what Jesus had said at the "Last Supper."

The fourth type of Eucharist, which I associate with the circle of James (the brother of Jesus), pursued the tendency of domestication further. The Eucharist was seen as a Seder, in terms of meaning and chronology (see Mark 14:12–16, and the contradictory timing indicated in vv. 1–2). So understood, only Jews in a state of purity could participate fully in Eucharist, which could be fully recollected only once a year, at Passover in Jerusalem among the circumcised (see Exod 12:48). The Quartodeciman controversy (concerning the timing of Easter) of a later period, fierce though it appears, was but a shadow cast by a much more serious contention concerning the nature of Christianity. The Jacobean program was to integrate Jesus' movement fully within the liturgical institutions of Judaism, to insist upon the Judaic identity of the movement and upon Jerusalem as its governing center. Nonetheless the Jacobean "Last Supper" does not supplant the other types of Eucharist in the New Testament.

Paul and the synoptic gospels represent the fifth type of Eucharist. Paul vehemently resists Jacobean claims, by insisting Jesus' last meal occurred on the night in which he was betrayed (1 Cor 11:23), not on Passover. He emphasizes the link between Jesus' death and the Eucharist, and he accepts the Hellenistic refinement of the Petrine type that presented the Eucharist as a sacrifice for sin associated with the Temple (see, for example, Rom 3:25).

In the synoptic gospels the heroism of Jesus is such that the meal is an occasion to join in the solidarity of martyrdom.<sup>16</sup> The synoptics insist by various wordings that Jesus' blood is shed in the interests of the communities for which those gospels were composed, for the "many" in Damascus (Matt 26:28) and Rome (Mark 14:24), on behalf of "you" in Antioch (Luke 22:20). The synoptic strategy is not to oppose the Jacobean program directly; in fact, the Passover chronology is incorporated (producing internal contradictions). But any limitation of the benefits of Eucharist to circumcised Israelites is superseded by the imperative to join Jesus' martyrdom and its sacrificial benefits.

The feeding of the five thousand—understood as occurring at Passover—is taken up in John 6 in a fully paschal sense. Jesus identifies himself as the manna, miraculous food bestowed by God upon his people. Paul had articulated the motif (1 Cor 10:1–4, an analogy that trumps the claims of the Jacobean circle), but John develops it to construe the Eucharist as a Mystery,<sup>17</sup> in which Jesus offers his own flesh and blood (carefully defined to avoid a crude misunderstanding; John 6:30–58). That autobiographical reading of Jesus' words—as giving his personal body and blood in Eucharist—had no doubt already occurred to Hellenistic Christians who followed synoptic practice and appreciated its sacrificial overtones.

---

<sup>16</sup> I would not deny that a sense of impending martyrdom suffused Jesus' last meals with his disciples; see Rabbi Jesus, 253–268. The elevation of that sense to the predominant meaning, however, appears to me a later development.

The Johannine practice made that meaning as explicit as the break with Judaism is in the Fourth Gospel. The sixth type of Eucharist can only be understood as a consciously non-Judaic and Hellenistic development. It involves participants in joining by oath (sacramentum in Latin, corresponding to mysterion within the Greek vocabulary of primitive Christianity; John 6:60–71) in the sacrifice of the Mysterious hero himself, separating themselves from others. Eucharist has become sacrament, and involves a knowing conflict with the ordinary understanding of what Judaism might and might not include.<sup>18</sup>

“The Last Supper” is neither simply Jesus' “real” Seder nor simply a symposium of Hellenists to which the name of Jesus happens to have been attached. Such reductionist regimens, which will have the gospels be only historical or only fictive, starve the reader of the meanings that generated the texts to hand. The engines of those meanings were diverse practices, whose discovery permits us to appreciate the richness of tradition. A generative exegesis of Eucharistic texts may not conclude with a single meaning that is alleged to have occasioned all the others. One of the principal findings of such an approach is rather that meaning itself is to some extent epiphenomenal, a consequence of a definable practice with its own initial sense being introduced into a fresh environment of people who in turn take up the practice as they understand it and produce their own meanings. The sense with which a practice is mediated to a community is therefore one measure of what that community will finally produce as its practice, but the initial meaning does not determine the final meaning.

Eucharist was not simply handed on as a static tradition. Eucharistic traditions were rather the catalyst that permitted communities to crystallize their own practices in oral or textual form. What they crystallized was a function of the practice that had been learned, palpable gestures with specified objects and previous meanings, along with the meanings and the emotional responses that the community discovered in Eucharist. There is no history of the tradition apart from a history of meaning, a history of affective response, a history of practice: the practical result of a generative exegesis of Eucharistic texts is that practice itself is an appropriate focus in understanding the New Testament.

---

<sup>17</sup> See Dennis E. Smith, From Symposium to Eucharist: The Banquet in the Early Christian World (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2003), 78–79, 167–168.

<sup>18</sup> In this regard, see Reimund Bieringer, Didier Pollefeyt, and Frederique Vandecasteele-Vanneuville, eds., Anti-Judaism and the Fourth Gospel (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2001), reviewed in Shofar 22.3 (2004): 150–152.

3. Sources of Meaning

A generative exegesis properly focuses on the issue of meanings itself, but the corollary concerns of cultural milieu and the agency of sources cannot be avoided. Consequently, circles of meaning have already been characterized: dominical, Petrine, Jacobean, synoptic and Pauline, Johannine. By means of inference, it is possible to speculate on the periods in which their traditions emerged, how they interacted, and (in some cases) who the likely tradents were.

The Eucharistic teachings of Jesus did not, it goes almost without saying, exert a direct influence upon the text of the gospels. They were already incorporated, and given a new meaning, within a cycle of narrative catechesis associated with Peter and his fellow “pillars.” The Petrine cycle must have been available in Aramaic by ca. 35 CE, in time for Paul to be informed of it at the time of his visit to Jerusalem (Gal 1:18). But the very name “Peter” attests early translation into Greek, in association with the wide field of activity that apostle ploughed. The Petrine cycle substantially included the initial call of the first disciples, the healing of Jairus’s daughter, the confession at Caesarea Philippi, the Transfiguration, the Eucharist, and the struggle in Gethsemane. By design and in fact, the Petrine usage of narrative for the purpose of catechesis established a paradigm in the primitive church; the synoptic gospels are a monument to that narrative strategy.

The purpose of the Petrine teaching of the Eucharist is indicated by the sense of “covenant” in Matt 26:28; Mark 14:24. “New covenant” in Luke 22:20; 1 Cor 11:25 represents a Hellenistic phase of the Petrine cycle. The reference to the covenant represents the meal as under the type of Moses’ covenantal sacrifice of sharings (Exod 24), so that Jesus is accorded foundational importance, but any perception of competition with the Temple is avoided. Towards the same end, the “memorial” in Luke 22:19; 1 Cor 11:24, 25 links Jesus’ action to what is immolated on the altar for the purpose of a sacrifice such as Moses offered.

Passover became the principal association with Eucharist in the circle of James. However emphatic the association (Matt 26:17–20; Mark 14:12–17; Luke 22:7–14), it is also artificial (see Matt 26:1–5; Mark 14:1, 2; Luke 22:1, 2, 15, 16), an example of interpretation by addendum. In a stroke, the meal was more tightly linked to the liturgical year than it ever had been before, and its only possible occasion was in Jerusalem. The dominical and Petrine meals were repeatable anywhere and frequently. The Jacobean transformation of what is now a last Passover could only truly be enacted “between the evenings” of 14 and 15 Nisan, and in the vicinity of the Temple, where the paschal lambs were slain.

What was produced within James’ circle was not an independent cycle, but substantial recastings of the Petrine cycle and the source of sayings known as “Q.” Both the Petrine cycle and the Jacobean revision of that cycle were known in Antioch prior to the council in Jerusalem that took place ca. 46 CE (see Galatians 2). The Jacobean revision itself may be dated ca. 40 CE, since it went through some development before Paul became acquainted with it in Antioch, although he was not apprised of it at the time of his visit with Peter ca. 35 CE.

The source of Jesus’ sayings known as “Q” has contributed little to the Eucharistic texts as they may be read today. But Jesus’ wistful statement that he had greatly desired to eat the Passover (but could not), attested only in Luke 22:15–17, manifests no incorporation within the Jacobean program. In its earliest phase, “Q” was a collection of sayings in the nature of a mishnah which a rabbi’s disciples might learn, virtually contemporaneous with the Petrine cycle. In the present case, the mishnaic source confirms that, prior to the Petrine cycle, Jesus was understood to refer to the wine before he referred to the bread. From its origins in Jesus’ movement as instruction of the twelve, the source known as “Q” developed in the environment of Syria in a markedly apocalyptic direction.

The Jacobean revision of the Petrine cycle was promulgated in Greek by Joseph Barsabbas and Silas in Antioch (see Acts 15:22–33). After 70 CE, “the little apocalypse,” a Syrian addition to the Jacobean revision, was composed; it is a response to James’ martyrdom and the Temple’s destruction. The compiler may have been Silas, who under a more current form of his name (Silvanus) was involved in several sorts of apocalyptic speculation (cf. 1 Thess 1:1; 2 Thess 1:1; 1 Pet 5:12). In any case, the Jacobean revision of the Petrine cycle would have included (prior to any apocalyptic addendum) the insistence that the twelve alone could provide the sense of the parables, a collection of such parables, a note of Jesus' rejection by his own neighbors, a commissioning of the twelve, and the paschal interpretation of the Eucharist within a more anecdotal story of the passion than the Petrine cycle had offered.

The primitive cycles or revisions of tradition (Petrine, Jacobean, instructional ["Q"], and apocalyptic) were amalgamated into the Hellenistic catechesis reflected in the synoptic gospels, probably first of all in Antioch. The most likely exponent of the unified catechesis is Barnabas. His standing is consistent with the wide acceptance of the synoptic tradition, and the greater accommodation to Jacobean influence in the synoptics as compared to Paul would be characteristic of Barnabas. But the synoptic Eucharist addresses the needs of its overwhelmingly Hellenistic constituency, in presenting the Last Supper as a well-ordered symposium, a sacrifice for sin that offered its benefits to all who joined themselves to the heroic martyr's witness.

The synoptic catechesis was a paradigm that was then developed and published in Rome (Mark, ca. 73 CE), Damascus (Matthew, ca. 80 CE), and Antioch itself (Luke, ca. 90 CE). The spine of each gospel is the narrative catechesis of the Petrine cycle, supplemented by Jacobean revision of that catechesis, the apocalyptic addendum of Joseph Barsabbas and Silas, and the instruction of the twelve with its addenda ("Q"). Their similarities and differences are best understood as functions of the particular sort of catechesis (preparation of catechumens) that was current in each community. No gospel is simply a copy of another; rather, each represents the choices among varying traditions, written and/or oral, and the development of those traditions that had taken place in a given locality.

Thomas (from Edessa, during the second century) represents a different ordering principle, based upon the mishnaic genre of the instruction of the twelve, rather than the Petrine catechesis. The same cannot quite be said of John. Although there is formally no counterpart of the Last Supper, the substance and theology of the synoptic tradition (if not of the synoptic gospels themselves) are reflected. Neither John nor Thomas represents a single source of Jesus' teaching, but both documents show that the genre of instruction proved to be a useful vehicle of theological reflection.

The identification, tracing, and dating of documents and sources is evidently a matter of inference. The procedure of reading, from text through its levels of generation, differs from the historical logic of starting at the beginning. But a generative exegesis uses the ordinary criteria of redaction criticism—diction, syntax, and meaning—in order to sort out one string of tradition from another.<sup>19</sup> The result looks more like strings than the beads or atoms of an earlier, form-critical orientation, because no assumption is made that we know what the shape of tradition was before we encounter it in its written form.<sup>20</sup> Within the assessment of their relationships, reference to Jesus is only appropriate sporadically, within the generative patterns discerned. That reference may be sharpened with reference to Jesus' cultural environment.

We are presented in our principal sources (the gospels of the New Testament and Thomas) with ways of seeing Jesus within the communities that each gospel was intended for. Identifying the view of Jesus each one takes, we can infer how Jesus must have acted to produce that view of him, together with the distinct views of him the other sources take. We are dealing, not only with four or five documents, Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, and Thomas, but with the groups of followers of Jesus that produced materials for those documents.

Use of the so-called criteria of authenticity represents an obstacle to knowledge, because they are not criteria, and they do not measure authenticity as far as Jesus is concerned. They are refugees from the time when the existence of precise "forms" of tradition was taken as established in some schools of thought.<sup>21</sup> Remove that assumption, and it is obvious that (1) we have no categorical assurance of how traditions developed (so: the "criteria" are not criteria), and further that (2) the relationship among traditions measures their development, not historical data concerning Jesus (so: "authenticity" is not measured).

The issue of how Jesus stands in relation to the gospels cannot be resolved by imagining Jesus on the one hand, and four or five authors

---

<sup>19</sup> See Profiles of a Rabbi: Synoptic Opportunities in Reading about Jesus, BJS 177 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1989).

<sup>20</sup> See God in Strength, 11–23.

<sup>21</sup> For treatments of this and related questions, see B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, eds., Authenticating the Words of Jesus: NTTS 78.1 (Leiden: Brill, 1999) and B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, eds., Authenticating the Activities of Jesus, NTTS 78.2 (Leiden: Brill, 1999).

composing documents on the other hand. Between Jesus and the texts there were groups of teachers, each of which generated its own view of Jesus. We need to address the generative question—how did the texts emerge?—by attending to how Jesus must have acted and how communities much have reacted to their memory of him and their own circumstances in bringing their gospels to voice. The unfolding of the sources themselves is a fascinating question, but our concern here is a step beyond that and at the same time a narrowing of the generative concern: what we must infer of Jesus within his Jewish environment to explain how the texts emerged in their variety and in their agreement.

4. Material and Social Contexts of Jesus

Until recently Jewish Galilee has been as mysterious as Jesus himself. A largely oral culture, as resistant to change as it was to the Romans who occupied it, Jewish Galilee condemned itself to silence from the point of view of history.

In 1997, a book appeared that conveys the range of excavations that have been conducted recently in Galilee.<sup>22</sup> That evidence underscores the isolation of rural Galilee from Hellenistic urban culture, and attests the cultural integrity of Galilean Judaism. This characterization complements much literary evidence.<sup>23</sup>

Galilean villages persistently attest a great concern for purity, the definition of who belongs to Israel and of how contact with those outside Israel should be regulated. Stone vessels for purificatory washing are typically found. They are characteristic of Jewish practice, and quite unlike vessels for cooking or the large cisterns used to store water for drinking. They are more persistent in Galilee than the miqveh, the stepped bathing pool, or the synagogue, but all of them have been found, and they lead to the conclusion that Jewish Galilee had established institutions and practices that question any supposed assimilation within Greco-Roman culture.

---

<sup>22</sup> Douglas R. Edwards and C. Thomas McCollough, eds., Archaeology and the Galilee: Texts and Contexts in the Graeco-Roman and Byzantine Periods, South Florida Studies in the History of Judaism 143 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1997).

<sup>23</sup> See Richard A. Horsley, Archaeology, History, and Society in Galilee: The Social Context of Jesus and the Rabbis (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1996), 67–70.

All these finds have shattered the myth of a purely Hellenistic Jesus living in an urbanized Galilee.<sup>24</sup> Until a synagogue was found in Galilean Gamla, it was routinely claimed that synagogues were only a post-Christian institution.<sup>25</sup> Before miqvaoth were discovered in several towns, bathing was often dismissed as purely the elitist practice of aristocrats and Pharisees in Judea. Indeed, it was often said that Jesus spoke Greek, rather than Aramaic, but the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls shows that Aramaic was used during the first century and earlier, and the discovery of scrolls near Qumran establishes that the usage of Aramaic persisted until the second century CE.

The archaeological Galilee is a Jewish Galilee, as far as Jesus and his movement are concerned; philo-Roman urban enclaves such as Sepphoris are notable for their absence from Jesus' itinerary in the gospels. Archaeological and textual scholarship has revolutionized how we should think about Galilee and about Judaism, and that means the once fashionable (and in some circles, still fashionable) picture of Jesus as an Athenian in Jewish dress must change.

Various forms of Judaism vied with one another, both in Israel and the Diaspora, and in their competition they shared a kindred hope: the hope that God would personally and actively intervene on behalf of his people. That was just the hope that Jesus articulated when he announced, in the Galilean dialect of Judaism, the kingdom of God. His dialect of Judaism was one among many, and they were to varying degrees Hellenistic (as well as Egyptian and Ethiopian and Latin and Libyan and Persian, among other cultural influences). Judaism was an international religion during the first century, and it is impossible to reduce it to a single cultural form.

Galilee produced Jesus, not just in the happenstance of his life, but at the center of his religious identity. Once we have understood his environment within the context of Galilee, we can place him within the unfolding of his unique religious vision. By properly evaluating that, we will see him in his distinctiveness, and at the same time appreciate the fundamental commonality of Judaism and Christianity.

---

<sup>24</sup> As is very forcefully shown, for example, by Horsley in Archaeology, History, and Society in Galilee. More recently, the same point has been made by Jonathan L. Reed, Archaeology and the Galilean Jesus: A Re-examination of the Evidence (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2000). This is a much more critical work than John Dominic Crossan and Jonathan L. Reed, Excavating Jesus: Beneath the Stones, Behind the Texts (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 2001). See "Review Essay: Archaeology and Rabbi Jesus," BBR 12.2 (2002): 273–280.

<sup>25</sup> For what archaeology has now taught us about synagogues and miqvaoth, see D. Urman and P. V. M. Flesher, eds., Ancient Synagogues: Historical Analysis and Archaeological Discovery, SPB (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995).

Jesus was Jewish not only in the circumstances of his life, but in his dedication to that identity. Confronted with the increasing certainty that he was to die for his beliefs, Jesus taught his followers a carefully crafted teaching (a kabbalah) of suffering. Kabbalah refers particularly to a discipline of the vision of God that can be passed on from one person to another, and Jesus' characteristic kabbalah made human hardship into a crucible for experiencing the divine. His development of that kabbalah made the gospels possible, and perhaps made Christianity inevitable.

5. The Kabbalah of Rabbi Jesus

Development is the proper perspective of biography. In the case of Jesus, his religious impact will never be understood until we can identify what the pivots of transition were in his unlikely journey from a Galilean boy accused of irregular birth<sup>26</sup> to a popular rabbi who challenged the operation of the Temple in Jerusalem, directly confronting both the high priest of the time and the representative of Rome's power in the process. How was that possible, and why should the shameful result of that confrontation, Jesus' crucifixion, have resulted in the conviction that God had raised him from the dead?

Development is key to addressing all such questions. The focus cannot be just what is usually called "the life and teaching of Jesus." Typically, scholarly studies deal only with the public side of his activity in the year or two prior to his death. This has been justified on the basis of the foreshortened perspective of time in the gospels, but that is a function of their catechetical purposes, not a concern for history. The result is that Jesus becomes a two-dimensional icon: there is the height of his teaching and the breadth of his action, but no depth of character. Now that we know more about Judaism and about Galilee, we no longer have to accept that situation. Rather, we can understand how he emerged as the figure he did, how he developed and changed over time, and how his activity set in motion the generation of the relevant sources.

---

<sup>26</sup> See "Jésus, le mamzer (Mt 1.18)," NTS 46 (2001): 222–227.

But why speak of kabbalah, and then link that to Jesus? The “Kabbalah,” as that term is commonly used, refers to a movement of Jewish mysticism from the twelfth century through the Renaissance (in its classic flowering).<sup>27</sup> Its focus was on the mystical union with God, in a way analogous to the paths advocated by Christian mystics such as Julian of Norwich and Johannes Eckhart. Its character included an intellectual discipline, literary focus on the precise wording of the Torah, and even an academic rigor in the description of the divine spheres into which the initiate was to enter with great care. What relation might that have to a rabbi of the first century from Galilee, whose attainments did not include the ability even to write, and whose references to the Hebrew Bible were so imprecise as to indicate he was illiterate?

Although kabbalah indeed can be used with a restrictive meaning, its underlying orientation is nothing other than the approach of God’s Merkabah, the heavenly chariot throne from which divine power and wisdom emanated for the ordering of all creation. The conception of that Merkabah is much more ancient, profoundly rooted in the theology of Israel, than the development of kabbalistic techniques during the Middle Ages and later. Indeed, the ascent to the divine throne is older than Israel itself.

From Mesopotamia, from the twenty-third century BCE and the fifteenth century CE, stories are told of kings and courtiers entering into the palace of heaven and receiving visions and empowerment there.<sup>28</sup> Israel learned these royal traditions from Babylon and converted them into prophetic authorization, especially during the time of Ezekiel (in the sixth century CE). Ezekiel himself related his classic vision of the throne of God as a chariot, a Merkabah, and what is usually called Merkabah mysticism derives from his vision (in Ezekiel 1). After Ezekiel, at least part of the Book of Enoch and the book of Daniel (ch. 7) detailed this vision further, and by Jesus’ time fragments from Qumran demonstrate the rich development of these traditions.

---

<sup>27</sup> See Gershom Scholem, “Kabbalah,” in EJ (Jerusalem: Keter, 1972), 10: 489–653 and the fine introduction of Joseph Dan in The Early Kabbalah: The Classics of Western Spirituality (New York: Paulist, 1986), 1–41. Among many more recent works, reference should be made to Moshe Idel, Kabbalah: New Perspectives (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1988); Elliott R. Wolfson, Through a Speculum That Shines: Vision and Imagination in Medieval Jewish Mysticism (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1994).

<sup>28</sup> See Bernhard Lang, “Die grosse Jenseitsfahrt,” Paragana 7, no. 2 (1998): 24–42, here 32; Stephanie Dalley, Myths from Mesopotamia (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000), 182–187; and James D. Tabor, “Heaven, Ascent to,” ABD 3: 91–94.

The book of Genesis says of Enoch only that “he walked with God, and he was not” (Gen 5:22). This disappearance is taken in the Book of Enoch as a sign that Enoch enjoyed a vision by ascent into the multiple heavens above the earth, and was authorized to relate its wisdom to Israel, indeed to act as an intermediary to the angels who had disobeyed God. From Ezekiel, through Daniel and Enoch and on to John and Jesus, there is a growing tradition, a kabbalah (something received), which reflects a deep commitment to the disciplined practice of the vision of God’s throne. The fragments of Enoch at Qumran are found in Aramaic, which suggests that the book was used, not just by the Essenes (who tended to guard their sectarian documents in Hebrew), but by a wider audience, which included the Essenes.<sup>29</sup> In fact, the Book of Enoch is also quoted at a later stage in the New Testament, so that there can be no doubt of its widespread use. Another work found in Hebrew at Qumran and widely attested elsewhere, the Book of Jubilees, also presents Enoch as a figure of revelation: he himself knows the Torah later communicated to Moses by angelic communication.

The development of these traditions is obviously not independent: there is a successive building and borrowing from one to the other. The ascent to the divine throne was an aspiration that was “received” or “taken,” one source from others. To “receive” or to “take” in both Aramaic and Hebrew is expressed by the verb qabal, from which the noun qabbalah is derived, and the noun is used in both Mishnah and Talmud to refer to ancient tradition, including the Prophets and the Writings within the Bible of Israel (as distinct from the Torah).<sup>30</sup> What is qabaled might be any sort of authoritative tradition, but it is tradition concerning the Merkabah that is our concern here. When Paul wishes to underline that authority of his teaching concerning the Eucharist, he says, “For I received from the Lord what I also delivered over to you,” and he goes on to speak both of Jesus’ last meal with his followers and its significance and correct observance (1 Cor 11:23–33). The sources of Paul’s authority include what he learned from primitive Christians (especially Peter, see Gal 1:18), but more importantly what he calls the apokalypsis, the uncovering, of Christ Jesus (Gal 1:12). That disclosure occurred in a supernatural realm, the third heaven, the paradise to which Paul says he was once snatched up, where he was told unutterable wisdoms (2 Cor 12:1–4<sup>31</sup>).

<sup>29</sup> For an introduction and translation, see E. Isaac, “1 Enoch,” OTP I: 5–89.

<sup>30</sup> See the article by Cecil Roth appended to Scholem’s EJ (Jerusalem: Keter, 1972), 10: 653–654.

The confidence of Paul that this ascent was a self-evident aspect of his authorization that his readers would appreciate invites us to look back, to seek traces of the Merkabah in the gospels. As in the case of treating generative exegesis, only a couple of examples can be cited here, which emerge from my long-standing collaboration with Jacob Neusner and from my narrative treatment of Jesus.<sup>32</sup>

Traces of the Merkabah are perhaps plainest in Jesus' baptism, and in what that reception of the Holy Spirit produced in him. That takes us back to Jesus' association with John called the "immerser" (the baptistes in Greek).

From the writings of Josephus, we know that John was not the only such figure; Josephus refers to his own study with another immerser, named Bannus.<sup>33</sup> Pilgrims' local miqvaoth (immersion pools, if they even had access to one) might not correspond to the Pharisaic design, and would be much less luxurious than those of the Sadducees, less elaborate than those of the Essenes. But John offered them purification in God's own water, and the assurance that this was the science of Israel's true purity. Then what they faced in Jerusalem was less daunting; the claims and counter claims of various factions would be put into perspective by the confidence that one had already been purified by God's own living waters.

Immersion, for John, was no once for all act, as in later Christian baptism. In the practice of the primitive church, after the resurrection, believers felt that they received the Spirit of God when they were immersed in the name of Jesus. That conviction was only possible after the resurrection, because it stemmed from the belief that Jesus was alive and at the right hand of God, so as to be able to dispense divine spirit. In Peter's speech at Pentecost (the Magna Carta of baptismal theology), Jesus, having been exalted to the right hand of God, receives the promise of the Holy Spirit from the Father and pours it out on his

---

<sup>31</sup> See Victor Paul Furnish, II Corinthians, AB (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1984), 542–554; B. Chilton, Rabbi Paul: An Intellectual Biography (New York: Doubleday, 2004).

<sup>32</sup> See Comparing Spiritualities: Formative Christianity and Judaism on Finding Life and Meeting Death, with Jacob Neusner (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2000); Rabbi Jesus.

<sup>33</sup> See Josephus, Life 11. For a discussion of John and Bannus and their methods of purification as related to Jesus, see Jesus' Baptism and Jesus' Healing: His Personal Practice of Spirituality (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1998).

followers (Acts 2:33). Once received by a Christian, that Spirit did not come and go. Subsequent immersion could not top up a lack of Spirit. A Christian lived in the power of God's Spirit; its influence might increase or decrease, but the fact of its presence was irrevocable. But in John's practice, as in Judaism as a whole, purification was a routine requirement, and people might return to John many times, and they naturally engaged in many forms of purification other than John's, whether in their villages or at the Temple. Impurity was a fact of life, and therefore so was purification. But John was there in the wilderness to attest that the natural, living water provided by God would achieve acceptability before God, provided that immersion was accompanied by repentance.<sup>34</sup>

But for the talmidim of John, this continual immersion—as well as the immersion of others—was more than a matter of simple repentance. Within that activity, there was an esoteric meaning. John conveyed a definite understanding of the final significance that his purification for Israel offered. The sources are plain: for John, immersion brought one to the point that one could understand what God was about to do with Israel. As John himself expressed it, immersing oneself in water prepared one to receive the Spirit of God himself, which was to drench all Israel with its sanctification. The key to John's preparation for God himself lies in the wording attributed to him, "I immerse you in water, but he himself will immerse you in Holy Spirit" (Mark 1:8; see Matt 3:11; Luke 3:16). Within the context of Christianity after the resurrection, those words are fulfilled by what the risen Jesus endows the believer with; but that assumes Jesus' identification with God at that point, because only God himself can give of his own Spirit. Within the context of John the immerser, however, what is at issue is the purification that prepares the way for divine Spirit. The link between purification with water and the vindicating presence of God's Spirit is explicitly made in the book of Ezekiel, the same book that is the locus classicus of the Merkabah (Ezek 36:22–27):

Therefore, say to the house of Israel: So says the Lord, the LORD: Not for your sake am I acting, house of Israel, but for my holy name, which you have profaned among the peoples you came to. I will sanctify my great name, although profaned among the peoples among whom you have profaned it, and the peoples will know that I am the LORD, says the Lord, the LORD, when I am sanctified among you before their eyes. I will take you from the peoples, and gather you from all the lands, and bring you to your land. I will sprinkle on you clean waters and cleanse you from all your uncleannesses and from all your idols I will cleanse you. I will give you a new heart and a new spirit I will put in your midst, and remove the heart of stone from your flesh and give you a heart of flesh. My Spirit I shall put in your midst and I will make you walk according to my statutes and keep my judgments and do them.

---

<sup>34</sup> See Joan Taylor, The Immerser: John the Baptist within Second Temple Judaism: Studying the Historical Jesus (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1997).

The close and causal connection between water and Spirit here has led to the insight that we have here an important scriptural precedent of John's immersion.<sup>35</sup>

John practiced a kabbalah of envisioning the throne of God, which backed up his practice of immersion. He and his talmidim saw the Spirit of God before the Merkabah, ready to drench Israel, just as Israel was drenched in the waters of purification. The careful discipline of these talmidim, their repetitive, committed practice, their sometimes inadequate diet and exposure to the elements all contributed to the vividness of their visions of God's throne. John Allegro suggested some years ago that the ingestion of psychotropic mushrooms was a part of this discipline.<sup>36</sup> While the influence of herbs and grasses, as well as mushrooms, on people's psychological state cannot be discounted, the greater influence of these visions was the kabbalah itself, its intentional recollection and envisioning of the throne of God. From Qumran a fragment praises God as the apex of a heavenly panoply:

He is God of gods of all the heads of the heights and king of kings for all eternal councils.<sup>37</sup>

The foundation of kabbalah is putting the intent of the mind into envisaging the heavenly throne.

<sup>35</sup> See Otto Böcher, "Johannes der Täufer," TR 17 (1988): 172–181, 175. This insight, suggested to me by Bernhard Lang, is worked out more fully in Jesus' Baptism and Jesus' Healing.

<sup>36</sup> J. Allegro, The Sacred Mushroom and the Cross: A Study of the Nature and Origins of Christianity within the Fertility Cults of the Ancient Near East (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1970). His suggestion that "Jesus" was simply a name for a mushroom assured Allegro a frosty reception, and his attempt to see Jesus as entirely mythical (indeed, hallucinatory) reads as a desperate attempt not to place him within an historical context. Nonetheless, his approach still finds a hearing; see Carl A. P. Ruck, Blaise Daniel Staples, and Clark Heinrich, The Apples of Apollo: Pagan and Christian Mysteries of the Eucharist (Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 2001), and the review in The Classical Bulletin 78.2 (2002): 261–263.

<sup>37</sup> The fragment was found in the fourth cave from near Qumran (its designation is 4Q403 frg. li). E. Glicker Chazon of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem showed me a copy.

Jesus' skill in this vision made him one of John's most prominent talmidim, but it also led to Jesus' break with John. The gospels all relate the baptism of Jesus in a way that adumbrates baptism in early Christianity. But they also refer to the particular vision of Jesus, which not every baptized Christian could or did claim (Matt 3:13–17; Mark 1:9–13 Luke 3:21–22).

As Jesus was immersed for purification, he came to have an increasingly vivid vision, of the heavens splitting open, and God's spirit coming upon him. And a voice: "you are my son, beloved; in you I take pleasure." Each of these elements is resonant with the Israelite kabbalah of the divine throne.

The heavens are viewed as multiple, hard shells above the earth, so that any real disclosure of the divine must represent a rending of those firmaments. But once opened, Jesus' vision is not of ascending through the heavens, as in the case of Enoch, but of the Spirit, as a dove, hovering over him and descending. That image is a vivid realization that the Spirit of God at creation once hovered over the face of the primeval waters (Gen 1:2), as a bird. The bird was identified as a dove in rabbinic tradition, and a fragment from Qumran supports the association.<sup>38</sup> The Spirit, which would one day come to Israel, in Jesus' vision was already upon him, and God took pleasure in him as a "son."

Jesus' vivid experience within his practice of John's immersion, a persistent vision occurring many times, may be contrasted with a story about Hillel, an older contemporary of Jesus. Hillel was held in such high esteem that he was thought worthy to receive the Holy Spirit. That estimate appears all the more exalted, but also strangely wistful, when it is borne in mind that the rabbis held that the Spirit had been withdrawn since the time of the last prophets of Scripture. These motifs are drawn together in a rabbinic story:<sup>39</sup>

Until the dead live, namely Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, the latter prophets, the Holy Spirit has ceased from Israel. Yet even so, they made them hear bath qol. An example: the sages gathered at the house of Guria in Jericho, and they heard a bath qol saying, There is here a man who is predestined for the Holy Spirit, except that his generation is not righteous for such. And they put their eyes on Hillel the elder, and when he died, they said of him, Woe the meek man, Woe, the faithful disciple of Ezra.

<sup>38</sup> See Dale C. Allison, "The Baptism of Jesus and a New Dead Sea Scroll," BAR 18.2 (1992): 58–60.

<sup>39</sup> Tosefta Sotah 13:3. For a discussion, see Profiles of a Rabbi, 77–89.

With the withdrawal of Spirit until the prophets live again, God's favor is made known by an angelic echo, a bath qol ("daughter of a voice"). But the poignancy of this story is that, for all Hillel's merit, the Spirit itself is withheld. Jesus' approach to the Merkabah by means of John's kabbalah had opened the prospect that the gates of heaven were open again for the Spirit to descend upon Israel.

Another case where stories concerning divine voices find resonance in the New Testament is the Transfiguration (Matt 16:28–17:8; Mark 9:2–8; Luke 9:27–36). The narrative structure is reminiscent of Moses' ascent of Sinai in Exodus 24. At the close of that story, Moses is said to ascend the mountain, where God's glory, as a cloud, covered it (v. 15). The covering lasted six days (v. 16), which is the amount of time between the Transfiguration and the previous discourse in both Matthew (17:1) and Mark (9:2). After that time, the Lord calls to Moses from the cloud (Exod 24:16b), and Moses entered the glory of the cloud, which is like a devouring fire (vv. 17–18). Earlier in the chapter, Moses is commanded to select three worshippers (Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu) together with seventy elders, in order to confirm the covenant (vv. 1–8). The result is that just these people (v. 9) see the God of Israel in his court (v. 10) and celebrate their vision with a meal. The motifs of master, three disciples, mountain, cloud, vision and audition recur in the Transfiguration.

Other details in the presentation of the story cohere with Exodus 24. Matthew 17:2 uniquely refers to Jesus' face shining like the sun, like Moses' aspect in Exod 34:29–35. In more general terms, Mark's reference to the whiteness of Jesus' garments also establishes a heavenly context. A variation in Luke is more specific and more interesting. Luke puts a distance of eight days, rather than six, between the previous discourse and the Transfiguration. Although that has baffled commentators, in rabbinic interpretation that variation is meaningful. In the Targum Pseudo-Jonathan (Exod 24:10–11), Nadab and Abihu are struck by God, because their vision contradicts the principle that "man will not see God and live" (Exod 33:30). But their punishment (narrated in Num 3:2–4) is delayed until the eighth day.

In this heavenly vision two figures of rabbinic tradition who were understood not to have tasted death, Moses and Elijah, also make their appearance. Elijah, of course, is the primordial prophet of the Merkabah. Elijah's talmid, Elisha, sees Elijah taken up into the heavens with God's "chariot of fire and horses of fire" (2 Kgs 2:11; the term for "chariot" here is rekhev, simply the masculine form of the feminine Merkabah).

At least from the time of Josephus, Moses was also held to have been taken up alive into the heavenly court.<sup>40</sup> Taken together, then, Elijah and Moses are indices of Jesus' access to the heavenly court. Peter's apparently inept suggestion to his rabbi, of building "lodges," also corresponds to the enclosure for God's glory on earth which Moses is commanded to build in the chapters of Exodus after chapter 24. Taken as a whole, the Transfiguration at its generative moment attests Jesus' introduction of his talmidim to a vision of the divine throne comparable to his own at his baptism.

Jesus' conscious framing of a kabbalah, an approach to the divine Merkabah for himself and for his own talmidim, naturally includes an understanding of his own identity. All three synoptic gospels have Jesus propelled by the Spirit into the wilderness, in order to be pressed to the limit by Satan (Matt 4:1; Mark 1:12; Luke 4:1), and Matthew and Luke both include three itemized temptations at this point (Matt 4:1–11; Luke 4:1–13). In all three, the sense is conveyed that one's possession of the Spirit of God in baptism brings one into conflict with the primordial source of resistance to that Spirit. That catechetical logic is at odds with the simple observation that Jesus can only be tested with these particular temptations near the end of his life, by which time he had actually experienced power in various idioms.

After the story of his temptations,<sup>41</sup> Luke alone has Jesus return "in the power of the Spirit into Galilee" (Luke 4:14). There can be no question, then, but that at this paradigmatic moment, as Jesus commences his public activity, the issue of the Spirit is uppermost in the reference to Jesus' divine identity within Luke. The inauguration of this activity takes place—only in Luke—by means of an appearance in a synagogue in Nazareth, where his citation of the book of Isaiah is pivotal (Luke 4:14–30).

The utility of this passage within the overall structure of Luke-Acts has led to the finding that it has been synthesized by the editorial work that went into those two documents. And the utility of the passage within Luke-Acts cannot reasonably be denied. The entire pericope, from v. 14 until v. 30 in Luke 4, sets up a model—of reading Scripture in a synagogue, enjoying some success but then violent rejection, a rejection that leads to a turning to non-Jews—which corresponds to the pattern of presentation of Paul and Barnabas in the book of Acts, especially at Pisidian Antioch in Acts 13:13–52.<sup>42</sup> Together, Luke 4 and Acts 13 set out a pattern for the church of Luke-Acts. The name “Antioch” is a key to the importance of the latter passage, just as the verb “to anoint” in the former passage is profoundly evocative. The two are as if violins in an orchestra set at a quaver distance, at which one instrument causes the other to resonate. For Luke-Acts, Paul and Barnabas resonate with the purpose, program and authorization of Jesus himself.

<sup>40</sup> See Ant. 4.326. For further discussion, see "The Transfiguration: Dominical Assurance and Apostolic Vision," NTS 27 (1980): 115–124; "Transfiguration," ABD 6: 640–642.

<sup>41</sup> The story of itemized temptations is the contribution of the source called "Q"; for an account of the contents of "Q," cf. Pure Kingdom, 107–110.

The words cited from Isaiah begin, “The Lord’s Spirit is upon me, forasmuch as he anointed me.” Here, then, is the specification of how the Spirit has been with Jesus since the moment of his baptism. The Spirit is his anointing. Jesus is Messiah because the Spirit is upon him, and the text from Isaiah becomes an itinerary of his activity.

Just here, however, the dissonance between Jesus’ own typical activity and the text of Isa 61, cited by Luke, becomes evident. The simple facts are that Isa 61:1, 2 refers to things Jesus never did, such as releasing prisoners from jail, and that Jesus did things the text makes no mention of, such as declaring people free of impurity (see Matt 8:2–4; Mark 1:40–45; Luke 5:12–16). This dissonance cannot be a Lukan creation, because the pattern of the gospel is to make the correspondence to the Septuagint in biblical citations as close as possible. As the text stands, moreover, a change from any known form of the biblical text results in a lost opportunity to relate directly to the activity of Jesus, as well as introducing an element of greater dissonance. The phrase “to bind the broken of heart” is omitted from the citation, and wording similar to Isa 58:6, a reference to setting the oppressed at liberty, has been inserted.

Although Luke’s gospel presents the wording—evidently inspired from Isaiah—as a routine reading in a synagogue, it evidently was not so in the tradition prior to Luke. Jesus’ “citation” is no citation at all, but a freer version of the biblical book than could have been read. The wording of the passage in the Old Syriac gospels (in a language closely related to Jesus’ indigenous Aramaic) is freer still:

The spirit of the Lord is upon you, on account of which he has anointed you to message triumph to the poor;

---

<sup>42</sup> I have worked out this correspondence in some detail in God in Strength, 123–156.

And he has sent me to preach to the captives release, and to the blind sight —and I will free the broken with release—and to preach the acceptable year of the Lord.

The oddities Luke preserves are present, together with what has been homogenized in Luke: the radical change in pronouns.<sup>43</sup> By speaking these words, Jesus portrays himself as responding to a divine charge: “The spirit of the Lord is upon you, on account of which he has anointed you to message triumph to the poor.” Then he emphatically accepts that charge: “And he has sent me to preach to the captives release, and to the blind sight—and I will free the broken with release—and to preach the acceptable year of the Lord.” Both the charge and the emphatic acceptance are produced by the signal changes in pronouns, which are italicized above. They are part and parcel of a conscious alteration of the language taken from the book of Isaiah, an alteration that voices the text in a way that makes it akin to the baptismal bath qol and the bath qol at the Transfiguration.

The alteration is typical of Jesus’ style of employing scripture, especially the book of Isaiah (and especially in a targumic form).<sup>44</sup> His aim was to use the scripture as a lens of his own activity on behalf of God, such that the wording focused on how God was active in what he said and did, without suggesting a complete fit between the text and what Jesus referred to. The scripture was a guide to the experience of God in the present, but that experience was more important than the text, and could be used to refashion the text.

Clearly, the association of Jesus as Messiah with the Spirit gained currency after and as a consequence of the resurrection, as we have already seen. But its currency is very difficult to explain, as Marinus de Jonge points out, if “Jesus himself avoided this designation and discouraged his followers from using it.”<sup>45</sup> Some consistent usage of messianic language would likely have been in the background of Jesus’ teaching for the term to emerge as the primary designation of Jesus. In that Luke’s gospel was composed in Antioch around 90 CE in a community in which both Greek and Aramaic were spoken, it is the most likely source among the synoptics to have indicated what this background might have been. The tight connection between the Spirit of God and the verb “anoint,” as in Jesus' reference to Isaiah 61 in Luke 4, provides us with just the indication that fills out the picture of the development of early Christian usage. Anointed by the Spirit of God, Jesus viewed himself as enacting and articulating the claims of God's sovereignty ("the kingdom of God"). His teaching indeed does not spell out the content of being "Messiah" by means of a precise program drawn from biblical or pseudepigraphic literature, but it does relate the Spirit to his own activity, and in Luke 4 that relationship involved explicitly messianic language.

<sup>43</sup> For a full discussion, see God in Strength, 157–177.

<sup>44</sup> See A Galilean Rabbi and His Bible, 148–198.

<sup>45</sup> Marinus de Jonge, Early Christology and Jesus’ Own View of His Mission: Studying the Historical Jesus (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1998), 101.

The Lukan presentation is precisely what makes the form of the "citation" of Isaiah 61 all the more surprising. As a Lukan invention, the reference would have accorded with the Septuagint. Indeed, the Old Syriac gospels provide an insight into the shape of the reference to Isaiah 61 by Jesus before it was partially accommodated to the Septuagint within the Lukan presentation. The fractured reference to Isaiah 61 focuses Jesus' messianic identity on the issue of the Spirit, and that was the point of departure for the development of primitive christology.

Luke provides us with a centered view of Jesus' christology, focused on the Spirit of God. Within the recent study of Jesus, two discarded pictures of his christology have emerged again, and I would suggest in closing that they are likely to be discarded again. The first stresses the undoubted importance of the political challenge to the identity of Israel within the first century. Jesus then becomes the "Davidic messiah," a ruling figure who sets up his throne in association with the Temple.<sup>46</sup> This, despite the portrayal of Jesus in the Temptations as rejecting a picture of such rule, and despite his own rhetorical question, "How do the scribes say the messiah is David's son?" (Mark 12:35, together with Matt 22:42; Luke 20:41). That question assumes a tradition of identifying the Messiah and the ben David, but it also—and obviously—refutes it.<sup>47</sup> Any messianic theology inherently involved a political dimension, but to make that dimension the only index of meaning runs against the grain of Jesus' contention that Davidic and messianic claims were not simply identifiable. Another view, derived ultimately from Albert Schweitzer's picture of Jesus as a failed apocalypticist, imagines Jesus as personally taking on himself all the conditions of the covenant with Israel, in a desperate attempt to get God to fulfill the covenantal promises.<sup>48</sup> This, despite the fact that the term “covenant” within sayings of Jesus only appears in a single case, in what seems to be a liturgical addition to the meaning of the cup of wine in the context of his last meals in Jerusalem. Peter and Paul were undoubtedly theologians of this covenant, because they had directly to face the issues of who was and was not of the people of God. Jesus, however, does not appear to have confronted that question in covenantal terms.

---

<sup>46</sup> For a sophisticated argument to this effect, see Richard A. Horsley, Sociology and the Jesus Movement (New York: Crossroad, 1989), 105–145.

<sup>47</sup> See "Jesus ben David: Reflections on the Davidsohnfrage," JSNT 14 (1982): 88–112.

But once Jesus’ approach to the Merkabah, on the basis of his endowment with Spirit, is seen to be the pivot of his experience and his program of activity, his care in defining how he was and how he was not messiah acquires its sense. His messianic identity was a function of his self-consciousness and the awareness of his talmidim that his kabbalah offers the vision of God in his glory because divine Spirit makes that vision possible. The historical Jesus is a reading of all the available evidence that permits us to explain, in religious terms, the emergence of Christianity out of Second Temple Judaism.

---

<sup>48</sup> For this neo-orthodox re-reading of Schweitzer, see N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1993).

CONTEXT AND TEXT IN HISTORICAL JESUS METHODOLOGY

JOHN DOMINIC CROSSAN

The classic distinction between the Jesus of history and the Christ of faith has never been for me either informative or normative. That distinction, separation, or even opposition may be the conclusion of historical research but how can it be the presumption with which it begins? Short of a priori prejudice, how do I know before I begin that the Christ of faith is not exactly the same as the Jesus of history? Short of a priori bias, how do I know that there was not historically a Jesus of faith, that is, an individual who made fundamental claims about the meaning of his life and the destiny of his people?<sup>1</sup> That classic distinction may once have been necessary to release historical research from dogmatic constraint but, having served that inaugural purpose, it should now be honorably buried.

By the historical Jesus, therefore, I mean our best present reconstruction of that individual's life within the accepted procedures of historical study. No more and no less. History is the past reconstructed interactively by the present through argued evidence in public discourse. That is still my definition.<sup>2</sup> Interactive research is distinct from, on the one hand, narcissistic research and, on the other, positivistic research. Narcissism is an illusion claiming to see the past while only seeing the reflected present. Positivism is a delusion claiming to see the past without any interference from its own viewing eyes. Interactivism is our destiny. It is a conversation between past and present in which neither should ever be monologue but both form a constant dialogue.

---

<sup>1</sup> For example, how can John P. Meier take as his fifth criterion for deciding historicity that "of Rejection and Execution"—how does one know that Jesus was rejected and executed before one begins research? That can be, at best, a retrojective confirmation showing that reconstructed life and reconstructed death are coherent and even unified (that is, if they are). See vol. 1, The Roots of the Problem and the Person (1991), 177, and vol. 2, Mentor, Message, and Miracles (1994), 6, in A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 3 vols., ABRL (New York: Doubleday). Furthermore, criteria, no matter how many or how correct, are ambiguous unless organized into a method based on a methodology.

<sup>2</sup> The Birth of Christianity (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1998), 20.

That is why methodology is so important. Unlike an ordinary conversation in which the dominant partner may at least be interrupted by the other one, the past can only be as interactive as our historical conscience will allow. Method is how you do something and methodology is why you do it that way and not some other way. The function of methodology is at least to give interactivity an honest chance, at least to let the past challenge the present from the silence of its grave. There are times we can only get alternative perspectives on the same event. And there are always alternative perspectives even when we do not hear them. But history as argued public reconstruction is possible because it is necessary. We reconstruct our past to project our future. And it is, unfortunately, not possible not to do it. In historical study or on jury duty.

Finally, I presume that every scholar must have a position on all those questions of dependence and independence among intra-canonical and extra-canonical gospel texts raised within the last two hundred years. For example, I agree that Mark and Q are the basic sources for Matthew and Luke. On still disputed matters, I consider that John has its own independent saying and miracle tradition but that the Gospel's start with John the Baptist and end with Death-Resurrection are under synoptic influence; and that the Gospel of Thomas is basically independent from the canonical gospels.<sup>3</sup> If two hundred years of scholarship had concluded that the four canonical gospels were completely independent versions, my methodology would be completely different. That would probably demand a presumption, for example, that the best data was to be found where all four agreed. But, to the contrary, my methodology presumes texts that are especially characterized not by independent trajectories but by a dependent stream of tradition.

1. Formal Procedures and Material Investments

My methodological basis is to separate formal procedures from material investments so that they can be debated separately. It is possible for others to agree on the former, on the latter, on both, or on neither. By formal procedures I mean something like due processes in legal proceedings.

---

<sup>3</sup> I disagree with any attempt to ignore all those preliminary decisions. N. T. Wright has claimed that one can and should "bypass" all those problems and simply work with the four canonical gospels as independent sources. For our debate about methodology, see J. D. Crossan, "What Victory? What God? A Review Debate with N. T. Wright on Jesus and the Victory of God," SJT 50 (1997): 345–358; N. T. Wright, "Doing Justice to Jesus: A Response to J. D. Crossan: 'What Victory? What God,'" SJT 50 (1997): 359–379.

In terms of formal procedures, I propose these five steps and, in what follows, the term “text” can be taken orally and/or scribally:

1. The separation and double-blind study of historical context and gospel text in which neither can influence decisions about the other.

2. The study of context before text: the historical context of Antipas’s Galilee in the 20’s should be established before the study of the Christian gospel texts.

3. The study of context without text: that historical content should be established apart from any Christian gospel. Since a Christian gospel, from its nature and purpose as “good news,” always involves a highly creative reinterpretation of given tradition, the context of the 20’s–90’s CE are collated steadily and progressively together. In such a situation, and as a safety precaution, the context of the historical Jesus should be established totally without Christian gospel information. We would know, for example, from Josephus, Tacitus, and later Roman sources that Jesus was a Galilean who died under Pilate and that furnishes the contextual place and time as Antipas’s Galilee between 26 and 36 CE.

4. The establishment of context by an interdisciplinary and interactive model of cross-cultural anthropology at the most general level, Judeo-Roman history at the intermediate level, and Galilean archaeology at the most specific one.

5. Turning from context to text but still within formal procedures, how do I determine the data-base of the historical Jesus to be studied against that context? This is surely the hardest part of any method and it is often simply avoided in recent research on the historical Jesus. On the one hand, because of my double-blind principle I cannot simply choose whatever traditions seem best to fit with that already-established context. On the other, I cannot simply study the synoptic Jesus and call it the historical Jesus.<sup>4</sup> There is only one way I can establish that data-base in a somewhat “objective” fashion and that is by asking these two questions. (1) What are the earliest units of tradition one discerns in terms of dating by sources? (2) Do those earliest units cohere closely with that pre-established context?

---

<sup>4</sup> With all extra-canonical gospels avoided and John bracketed, the data-base is often simply the undifferentiated mass of the synoptic tradition so that, in effect, the historical Jesus cannot be other than the synoptic Jesus. That is implicit for N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, vol. 2 of Christian Origins and the Question of God, whose indexes give 25 columns of synoptic references but only 1½ columns of Johannine references (London: SPCK, 1996), 717–726. It is explicit for James D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered, vol. 1 of Christianity in the Making, whose indexes give 57½ columns of synoptic references but only 8½ columns of Johannine references (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003), 987–1009, but who also says programmatically that “my concern is always with the Gospel (primarily synoptic tradition)” but in oral and scribal interaction (335).

In asking these questions, I am emphatically aware of the following factors. (1) The earliest unit of tradition is not in itself any more original or authentic than the latest one. A Jesus-quotation in John may be even more historical than one in Paul but I cannot decide that in any individual case except by some a priori presumption. I am simply trying to avoid the “subjectivity” of such a decision. Earliest means earliest, no more and no less. (2) The earliest unit discernible, even if accepted by all, may not get us back to the 20’s with the historical Jesus. It is utterly possible, for example, that our earliest data might stem from the ending 30’s or starting 40’s when the experience of Caligula’s statue and Agrippa I’s ascendancy could have restated or recreated the entire Jesus tradition in answer to those most serious threats. I ask, as an open question, do your earliest textual data cohere closely with your established contextual situation? If the answer is no, then the historical Jesus of the 20’s is lost forever behind the gospel-screens of the 40’s to 90’s. If the answer is yes, then that is the best historical research can accomplish with evangelical data.

Finally, then, I turn to make my own material investments within those formal parameters. I repeat that somebody else may reject those preceding steps and, even if they accept them, negate their proposed investments. I simply challenge my colleagues to make that formal/material distinction or rebut it and, if it be accepted, to adopt or adapt, refine or replace it with their own earliest texts.

2. Context

My first principle is to bracket later Christian text and begin with original historical context. The four canonical gospels are, as they openly and correctly state, “gospels” and not histories or autobiographies (even within the ancient meanings of those terms). In other words, they take the data of the 20’s and make their “good news” relevant to different times and places, individuals and communities, in the 70’s, 80’s, and 90’s CE. There is therefore a quite deliberate and appropriate conflation of context between the first and last quarters of that century.

Granted such material, my first methodological move is to bracket completely all gospel information and focus on context from an exclusively extra-Christian standpoint. Accepting from Jewish and Roman sources that Jesus died under Pontius Pilate (26–36 CE) and was called a “Galilean,” I focus context as follows. Prepare a description, as thick as possible, on life under Herod Antipas, in Lower Galilee, in the 20’s CE but without using any Christian texts. To do that I create an interdisciplinary and interactive matrix from a base-layer of cross-cultural anthropology, a medial-layer of Roman-Jewish history, and an upper-layer of Galilean archaeology. All of that works from the more general at the bottom to the most specific at the top.

2.1. Cross-Cultural Anthropology

This is simply the most general foundation for my reconstructed context and I take the following three elements as constitutive for that foundation.

First, working within the cross-hairs of ecology and technology, the Roman Empire was an agrarian, as distinct from either a horticultural or industrial empire.<sup>5</sup> Deep soil and iron plow vastly increase the agricultural productivity of such an empire along with increasing urbanization of the environment, scribalization of the administration, and monetization of the economy. All of that vastly increases the social discrepancy between the haves and the have-nots as a widening chasm opens up between the aristocracy and the peasantry.

Second, agrarian empires may be distinguished into traditional and commercializing ones.<sup>6</sup> The point is whether they maintain an ancient division between haves and have-nots or seek to maximize their landed possessions by various methods of commercialization. Example would be the reduction of freeholders into tenant farmers and the consolidation of family farms into steward-run agribusinesses. The point is that as commercialization rises, so also does resistance. A peasantry, having experienced change for the worse, may think about change for the better—even for some utopian ideal or eschatological dream.<sup>7</sup>

---

<sup>5</sup> Based on Gerhard E. Lenski, Power and Privilege: A Theory of Social Stratification (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1966). For example: “One fact impresses itself on almost any observer of agrarian societies, especially on one who views them in a broadly comparative perspective. This is the fact of marked social inequality” (210, with italics original).

<sup>6</sup> Based on John H. Kautsky, The Politics of Aristocratic Empires (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1982). For example: “Lenski’s... agrarian societies include societies where merchants have become so powerful that they are no longer purely traditional but commercialized or more or less modern, like the late Roman empire... I distinguish traditional aristocratic empires from more or less ‘modern’ commercialized, colonial, and industrial societies” (20–21, italics added).

<sup>7</sup> Kautsky, Politics, 318: “Only the changes to which commercialization subjects peasants makes them capable of believing that they can bring about social change.

Third, open violent rebellion is but the iceberg-tip of normal everyday resistance to oppressive situation.<sup>8</sup> Only the former may achieve mention in the literate history of male aristocracy but the latter is always there to sustain the dignity and integrity of the downtrodden. You act dumb, you do not understand, you go slowly, and you perform works of minor sabotage. You tell symbolic stories, you sing disguised songs, you celebrate religious hopes. You imagine a king of justice, a God of righteousness, a future imminent or distant but always utopian. Your ideal world is a mirror-image opposite of your everyday one.

When dealing, therefore, with that increasing discrepancy between the haves and have-nots in agrarian empires and especially with resistance sparked by commercialization, I watch for all and every form of non-violent resistance and do not restrict opposition to violent revolt.

2.2. Judeo-Roman History

On top of that cross-cultural basis, I place a layer of Judeo-Roman history interactive with it and guided by this over-riding question. From the post-exilic return to the arrival of the Romans there was only a single revolt against imperial control over the Jewish homeland and that under the supreme provocation of Greco-Syrian religious persecution. Why, then, were there four major rebellions in the first 200 years of Roman imperial domination—in 4 BCE under Augustus, 66–74 CE under Nero and Vespasian, 115–117 CE under Trajan, and 132–135 CE under Hadrian? What went so spectacularly wrong with the Roman program of urbanization for commercialization in the Jewish homeland—even from the Roman point of view?

2.2.1. The Roman Empire

Rome was the world's first territorial empire.<sup>9</sup> A dominational empire, like Persia, maintained a strong center protected by the army and, as long

---

Having suffered adverse changes, they can demand favorable ones, and these may now go far beyond the restoration of older forms of exploitation all the way to communistic utopias.”

<sup>8</sup> Based on James C. Scott, The Moral Economy of the Peasant: Subsistence and Rebellion in Southeast Asia (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1976); “Protest and Profanation: Agrarian Revolt and the Little Tradition,” Theory and Society 4 (1977): 1–38, 211–246; Weapons of the Weak: Everyday Forms of Peasant Resistance (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1985); Domination and the Arts of Resistance: Hidden Transcripts (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1990).

<sup>9</sup> Based on Michael Mann, The Sources of Social Power, 4 vols. (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986–). See especially vol. 1: A History of Power from the Beginning

as the periphery paid tribute and avoided revolt, it ran its own affairs. But a territorial empire, like Rome, placed its legions on the periphery and organized all within that military screen into a unified operation. In other words, for better and for worse, Rome interfered much more intensely in local affairs, lives, customs, and traditions.

Rome greatly increased and tightly integrated the four strands of social power better than any earlier empire. Military power was based on those peripherally-based legions with their all-weather networks of well-paved roads (no mud) and high-arched bridges (no flood). Notice, for example, that Josephus's description of a legionary's kit involved far more construction tools than military weapons.<sup>10</sup> Economic power marched in lock-step with military power. Not only legionary forces but commercial interests moved through those Roman ports, along those Roman roads, and over those Roman bridges. Also, legionary wages and expenditures monetized the periphery. Political power involved a highly self-conscious aristocratic class in which provincials could become not only Roman senators but even Roman emperors and patronal relationships structured the entire process. Ideological power or Roman imperial theology was, finally and most importantly, the theoretical glue that held that whole world together. Augustus, for example, was Divine, Son of God, God, and God of God. He was Lord, Redeemer, Liberator and Savior of the world. In texts and inscriptions, images and structures, Rome's program was first victory, then peace, or: peace through victory. Its mantra was, more fully: religion, war, victory, and peace.<sup>11</sup> Violence, in other words, has always been the drug of choice for human civilization.

---

to A.D. 1760 (1986), 1–33, esp. 250–300. I also presume much from these two books: Edward N. Luttwak, The Grand Strategy of the Roman Empire: From the First Century A.D. to the Third (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1976); and Geza Alföldy, The Social History of Rome, trans. David Braund and Frank Pollock (London: Croom Helm, 1985).

<sup>10</sup> Josephus, War 3.95, on the ordinary legionaries: “the regiments of the line [carry] a javelin and oblong buckler; the[ir] equipment further includes a saw, a basket, a pick and an axe, not to mention a strap, a bill-hook, a chain and three days' rations, so that an infantry man is almost as heavily laden as a pack-mule.”

<sup>11</sup> For Roman imperial theology, see Simon R. F. Price, Rituals and Power: The Roman Imperial Cult in Asia Minor (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984); Paul Zanker, The Power of Images in the Age of Augustus, trans. Alan Shapiro, Jerome Lectures 16 (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1990). For its opposite, see Richard A. Horsley, ed., Power and Empire: Religion and Power in Roman Imperial Society (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1997); Paul and Politics: Ekklesia, Israel, Imperium, Interpretation: Essays in Honor of Krister Stendahl (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2000); Paul and the Roman Imperial Order (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2004); also Richard A. Horsley, Jesus and Empire: The Kingdom of God and the New World Disorder (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2004).

I emphasize most strongly that Rome was no more and no less than the normalcy or even the cutting-edge of civilization in its Mediterranean place and first-century time. But throughout all of human history, civilization has been hierarchical inside and imperial outside. “Civilization was a complex whole of insulating and caging factors,” in the words of Michael Mann, “emerging fairly suddenly together. . . . in four literate, urban, and ceremonially centered groups that seem to have arisen independently of one another” along irrigated alluvial rivers in Mesopotamia, Egypt, India, and China.<sup>12</sup> Opposition to Rome or to any other empire, therefore, was and is either superficial or fundamental. By superficial, I mean resistance from those who would replace one empire by another, replace their rule by our rule. By fundamental, I mean resistance against any imperial rule, that is, against the insistent violence, injustice, and oppression of civilization itself.

2.2.2. The Jewish Tradition

In that first century CE, Jewish tradition did not present a monolithic response to the challenge of Greek cultural internationalism or Roman political imperialism. On the one hand, it advocated collaboration as Josephus argued that God had given imperial power to Rome, to the Flavian dynasty, and to Vespasian as the Messiah.<sup>13</sup> On the other, it advocated resistance both violent<sup>14</sup> and non-violent<sup>15</sup> to that imperial ascendancy and it did so by command of the same God that demanded collaboration. There was, however, one element deep in that tradition placing the Jewish God and the Roman Empire on an inevitable collision course.

The tradition insisted that God was one of “justice and righteousness,” that is, a God not only of personal and individual justice but especially of structural and systemic justice, a God not just of retributive justice

---

<sup>12</sup> Mann, Sources, 74. That is not, by the way, a philosophical statement about human nature but an historical one about human civilization. “The general capacities of human beings faced with their earthly environment gave rise to the first societies—to agriculture, the village, the clan, the lineage, and the chiefdom—but not to civilization, stratification, or the state. Our thanks, or curses, for that are due to more particular historical circumstances” (40).

<sup>13</sup> On Jewish collaboration: War 5.378, 412; on the Roman Empire: War 2.390; 5.367; on the Flavian dynasty; War 5.2; on Vespasian as Messiah: War 6:312–313.

<sup>14</sup> The Sicarii, for example: War 2.254–257 and Ant. 20.164–165, 208–210.

<sup>15</sup> Against Pilate’s iconic standards in Jerusalem, 26 CE, in War 2.169–174 = Ant. 18.55–59; and against Caligula’s divine statue in the Temple, 40–41 CE, in War 2.185–203 = Ant. 18.261–309; Philo, Embassy to Gaius 203–348.

but especially of distributive justice, a God who demanded that all get a fair share of an earth that belonged only to God. That distributive justice applied first and foremost to the Land of Israel itself. Since land was the very material basis of life itself, “the land shall not be sold in perpetuity, for the land is mine; with me you are but aliens and tenants” (Lev 25:23).<sup>16</sup> Without that special safeguard, there would be those “who join house to house, who add field to field, until there is room for no one but you, and you are left to live alone in the midst of the land” (Isa 5:8).

In Torah, God’s distributive justice is very much concerned with mortgaging and foreclosing on land as the obvious circumvention of the inability to buy and sell it. This shows up in forbidding interest, controlling collateral, remitting debts, freeing slaves, and reversing dispossessions.<sup>17</sup> In the Prophets, we often speak of social justice but it is fundamentally a matter of divine justice, a matter of their insistent attempt to hold Israel faithful to its covenant with a God of distributive justice.<sup>18</sup> Most significant is their refusal, in the name of God, ever to allow worship as a replacement for justice; to be holy as God was holy meant to be just as God was just. Worship was empowerment for justice and was impossible in a state of injustice.<sup>19</sup>

Finally, in Psalm 82, for example, all of that is extended from the land of Israel to all the world. The Supreme God indicts the sub-divinities that rule the world for not maintaining global justice, they seem unaware that that was their function, and, because of that, “all the foundations of the earth are shaken” (82:5).

If, in other words, any first-century Jew took those covenantal traditions seriously, their God would be in absolute conflict with the normalcy of Roman imperial policy. God: the land belongs to me and must be administered justly. Rome: the land belongs to us and will be administered imperially. That clash in fundamental theology may be the best explanation for those multiplied revolts in and around the Jewish

<sup>16</sup> The classic example is Naboth’s vineyard in 1 Kgs 21:1–15.

<sup>17</sup> (1) Interest: Exod 22:25; Deut 23:1; Lev 25:35–37; (2) Collateral: Exod 22:26–27; Deut 24:6,10–11; (3) Debt: Deut 15:1–2, 7–11; (4) Slavery: Exod 21:2, 7–11; Deut 15:12–15, 18; (5) Dispossession: Lev 25:8–13, 23, 29–31.

<sup>18</sup> Amos 2:6–8; 5:7, 10–12; 8:4–7; Hos 4:1–3; 5:10; 12:7–9; Isa 3:14–15; 5:7b–9; 33:14–15; Mic 2:1–2; 3:1–3; 6:10–12; 7:2; Jer 4:4; 5:26–28; 22:3, 13–17; Ezek 18:5–9; 34:4, 16–17; 45:9–12; Zech 7:9–10.

<sup>19</sup> Amos 4:1, 4–5; 5:21–24; Hos 6:6; Isa 1:10–17; Mic 6:6–8; Jer 7:5–7, 26:2–6.

homeland in Rome's first 200 years there. But, of course, that puts God against the normalcy of civilization as incarnated then in the Roman Empire. It was not at all that Rome was particularly brutal or savage. It was simply that its territorial nature made it intrude more efficiently and cooperatively into local political and economic realities.

2.3. Galilean Archaeology

This final layer of the interdisciplinary and interactive contextual matrix is extremely important. If the variable of commercialization is correlative with the variable of resistance and if Romanization worked by urbanization for commercialization, did all or any of that apply to Lower Galilee in the 20's CE? I focus first on the rule of Herod the Great as King of the Jews, second on the rule of Herod Antipas as tetrarch of Galilee and Perea, and finally on Herod Antipas as actual and potential King of the Jews.

2.3.1. Herod, Caesarea, and Jerusalem

Apart from the city of Rome as one giant project, the two greatest constructions in that contemporary world were undertaken by Herod the Great in the generation before Jesus. One was his creation of the great city and all-weather port of Caesarea on his country's mid-Mediterranean coast.<sup>20</sup> It was "Herod's show-piece city; it was a major outlet to the Mediterranean, home for the Judean navy, the largest harbor in the Mediterranean. It rearranged trade patterns in the area."<sup>21</sup> That harbor "was composed of three basins, one inside the other... the outer basin, the largest of the three [around 25 acres], was created by constructing two breakwaters to enclose a vast area of open sea—an engineering operation that was the first of its kind in history."<sup>22</sup>

Another giant construction project was the enlargement of the Temple courts to include a court of the women and a court of the Gentiles.<sup>23</sup> It was a "truly staggering" project<sup>24</sup> as "the area of the enclosure," at 35–36 acres, was "exceptionally large, compared with other well-known

<sup>20</sup> Josephus's descriptions are in War 1.401; Ant. 15.380–425.

<sup>21</sup> Peter Richardson, Herod: King of the Jews and Friend of the Romans, Studies on Personalities of the New Testament (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1996), 178.

<sup>22</sup> The New Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land, ed. Ephraim Stern, Ayelet Lewinson-Gilboa, and Joseph Aviram, 4 vols. (Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society & Carta; New York: Simon & Schuster, 1993), 287.

<sup>23</sup> Josephus; descriptions are in War 1.408–414; Ant. 15.331–337; 16.136–141.

<sup>24</sup> Richardson, Herod, 185.

sacred enclosures in the classical world” and the “construction of such a large artificial area in a hilly region, where building conditions were far from favorable, was remarkable.”<sup>25</sup> Those two projects were not unconnected. That huge court of the Gentiles meant that thousands of pious pagan pilgrims or curious pagan tourists could come in through Caesarea’s great port and go up to Jerusalem’s great temple. Herod had managed not only to commercialize the land but also the religion of his people. He had succeeded where Antiochus IV Epiphanes had failed utterly. He had commercialized Jerusalem and nobody, as far as we know, had protested.

Here, however, is the most striking point. Herod had, as just seen, thoroughly commercialized Judea. He had also built temples to Roma et Augustus at Caesarea Maritima in Judea, Sebaste in Samaria, and Panias, later Caesarea Philippi, in the far north of his kingdom. In other words, he had more or less skipped Lower Galilee altogether. It was certainly part of his realm but, after its initial resistance to his ascendancy, he undertook no major construction there either to avoid provocation or to exact punishment. In other words, Romanization by urbanization for commercialization only began strongly in Lower Galilee under Herod the Great’s son and local heir, the tetrarch Herod Antipas.

2.3.2. Antipas, Sepphoris, and Tiberias

First, in 4 BCE at the start of his rule, Antipas, according to Josephus, “fortified Sepphoris to be the ornament of all Galilee, and called it Autocratoris”<sup>26</sup> in honor of the emperor who recorded in his Res Gestae Divi Augusti, “I was twenty-one times saluted as imperator,” that is in Greek, autocrator, or in English, victor or conqueror.<sup>27</sup> Earlier, again according to Josephus, but so far without any confirming archaeological evidence, Roman legionary forces from Syria “captured and burnt the city of Sepphoris and reduced its inhabitants to slavery.”<sup>28</sup> Whatever the final decision on that point, it is certain that Antipas (re)built Sepphoris as his capital city along Roman lines as best he could with his limited resources.<sup>29</sup>

<sup>25</sup> New Encyclopedia, 737.

<sup>26</sup> Ant. 18.27.

<sup>27</sup> Peter A. Brunt and J. M. Moore, Res Gestae Divi Augusti: The Achievements of the Divine Augustus (London: Oxford University Press, 1967), 19.

<sup>28</sup> War 2.68 = Ant. 17.289.

<sup>29</sup> Apart from the article on Sepphoris in the New Encyclopedia, 1324–1345, see the following studies: Stuart S. Miller, Studies in the History and Traditions of Sepphoris, Studies in Judaism in Late Antiquity 37 (Leiden: Brill, 1984); Eric M. Meyers, Ehud Netzer, and Carol L. Meyers, “Sepphoris, ‘Ornament of all Galilee,’” BA 49 (1986): 4–19; Stuart S. Miller, “Intercity Relations in Roman Palestine: The Case of Sepphoris and

Second, around twenty years later and twenty miles to the east, Antipas created a new city on the mid-western shore of the Sea of Galilee. He called it Tiberias after the new emperor and its planning must have started upon Tiberius's accession in 14 CE. It replaced Sepphoris as the new capital of Antipas's territories.<sup>30</sup> Josephus notes that the city was built on a graveyard making its inhabitants "unclean for seven days" according to Jewish Law in Num 19:11–16 and that its palace "contained representations of animals" against Jewish Law in Exod 20:4.<sup>31</sup> None of that sounds very credible since Antipas, who ruled successfully for 43 years, was usually sensitive to such details. Those accusations were more likely evidence of popular opposition to Tiberias's very existence (urban libel, as it were) rather than proof of Antipas's provocative location of his city and decoration of his palace.

The constructions at Sepphoris and Tiberias were the minuscule Galilean counterparts of those gigantic Judean constructions at Caesarea and Jerusalem. They were, of course, but pale shadows and feeble miniatures of those world-class projects and could not be compared with them except as their almost trivial extensions. Still, and on however small a local scale, Romanization by urbanization for commercialization began in Lower Galilee under Herod Antipas in the generation of Jesus.<sup>32</sup> That process must also be specified even more exactly. The Tiberias," Association for Jewish Studies Review 12 (1987): 1–24; Eric M. Meyers, Ehud Netzer, and Carol L. Meyers, Sepphoris (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1992); Stuart S. Miller, "Sepphoris, the Well Remembered City," BA 55 (1992): 74–83; Eric M. Meyers, "Roman Sepphoris in Light of New Archeological Evidence and Recent Research," in The Galilee in Late Antiquity, ed. Lee I. Levine (New York: The Jewish Theological Seminary of America, 1992 [Papers from the First International Conference on Galilean Studies in Late Antiquity, Kibbutz Hanaton, Lower Galilee, Israel, August 13–15, 1989]), 321–338; James F. Strange, "Six Campaigns at Sepphoris: The University of South Florida Excavations, 1983–1989," in Galilee, ed. Levine, 339–355; Rebecca Martin Nagy, Carol L. Meyers, Eric M. Meyers, and Zeev Weiss, Sepphoris in Galilee: Crosscurrents of Culture (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns; Raleigh: North Carolina Museum of Art, 1996); Eric M. Meyers, "Sepphoris on the Eve of the Great Revolt (67–68 CE): Archaeology and Josephus," in Galilee through the Centuries: Confluence of Cultures, ed. Eric M. Meyers, Duke Judaic Studies 1 (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1999 [Papers from the Second International Conference on Galilee in Antiquity, Duke University, Durham, and the North Carolina Museum of Art, Raleigh, January 25–27, 1997]), 109–122.

---

<sup>30</sup> In Josephus's Life 37, the rebel faction in Tiberias claimed "that their city had always been the capital of Galilee, at least under its founder, Herod the tetrarch, whose intention was that the city of Sepphoris should be subordinate to Tiberias." That, they said, was only reversed under Nero due to the pro-Roman stand of Sepphoris.

<sup>31</sup> Josephus, War 2.168 = Ant. 18.36–38; Life 65.

<sup>32</sup> For general background, see Jonathan L. Reed, Archaeology and the Galilean Jesus: A Re-examination of the Evidence (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2000).

creation of Tiberias as Antipas's new capital by the start of the 20's CE meant that his commercialization was now extended to the lake itself. He was not there for view or breeze but, having learned to multiply loaves in the rich valleys around Sepphoris, he now intended to multiply fishes in the rich waters of the lake. By the 20's, it must have been impossible to fish, launch, catch, or beach without tetrarchal taxes and, even then, those catches might have had to be sold to Antipas's fish-factories to be dried, salted, or made into sauce.<sup>33</sup>

Finally, I cite that ancient Galilean boat as a symbol but not of course as a proof of those economic pressures around Antipas's lake. It was nursed along with a keel half of good and half of bad timber and with planks made with bits and pieces of various woods. Then, when it was finally no longer viable, it was stripped of everything salvageable—including every single nail—and pushed offshore to sink in the mud.<sup>34</sup> But what exactly was Antipas's overall purpose? What can we conclude from the archaeological data?

2.3.3. Herod, Antipas, and Kingship

First, just before his death Herod the Great made two contradictory modifications of his will. He first named Antipas as his royal heir but later changed it to Archelaus, both sons by the Samaritan Malthace.<sup>35</sup> Upon Herod's death, Antipas counter-claimed against Archelaus and received wide support in Judea and Rome but, ultimately, Augustus gave half the kingdom to Archelaus as ethnarch and one quarter each to Antipas and Philip as tetrarchs.<sup>36</sup> In other words, in 4 BCE, Antipas failed in his plans to succeed his father as King of the Jews.

---

Apart from the article on Tiberias in the New Encyclopedia, 1464–1473, see also Michael Avi-Yonah, "The Foundation of Tiberias," IEJ 1 (1950): 160–169; Yizhar Hirschfeld, "Tiberias: Preview of Coming Attractions," BAR 17.2 (March–April 1991): 44–51; idem, A Guide to the Antiquity Sites in Tiberias (Jerusalem: Israel Antiquities Authority, 1992).

<sup>33</sup> Compare the rather unlikely entrepreneurial economic interpretation in Jerome Murphy-O'Connor, "Fishers of Fish, Fishers of Men," BR 15.3 (June 1999): 22–27, 48–49, with the much more likely imperial economic interpretation in K. C. Hanson, "The Galilean Fishing Economy and the Jesus Tradition," BTB 27 (1997): 99–111.

<sup>34</sup> Shelley Wachsmann, "The Galilee Boat: 2,000-Year Old Hull Recovered Intact," BAR 14.5 (September–October 1988): 18–33; The Sea of Galilee Boat: An Extraordinary 2000 Year Old Discovery (New York: Plenum, 1995); Shelley Wachsmann et al., The Excavations of an Ancient Boat in the Sea of Galilee (Lake Kinneret), 'Atiqot (English Series) 19 (Jerusalem: Israel Antiquities Authority, 1990).

<sup>35</sup> The former will is in Josephus, War 1.646 = Ant. 17.146; the latter one is in War 1.664 = Ant. 17.188, sons by Malthace in War 1.562 = Ant. 17.20.

<sup>36</sup> Josephus, War 2.14–38, 80–100 = Ant. 17.219–249, 299–323.

Second, under Augustus and maybe especially after the exile of his brother Archelaus in 6 CE, Antipas remained rather quiet. But with Augustus's death and Tiberius's accession he began, as mentioned above, to plan a new capital city named Tiberias and to expand his tax-base by commercializing both land and lake. My interpretation is that Antipas wanted to accomplish under Tiberius what he had failed to achieve under Augustus, namely, to become King of the Jews by Roman appointment. That interpretation is confirmed by two moves made by Antipas, an external one for his Roman masters and an internal one for his Jewish subjects.

Third, for external consumption among his Roman peers, when the Roman legate Vitellius met to negotiate a treaty with the Parthian Artabanus, Antipas "gave a feast for them in a luxurious pavilion which he constructed in the middle of the river" Euphrates.<sup>37</sup> Antipas as international statesman!

Fourth, for internal consumption among his Jewish subjects, Antipas married a Hasmonean princess. His father, Herod the Great, had also created a Hasmonean-Herodian axis by marrying Mariamme but he later executed her and her son Aristobulus.<sup>38</sup> The latter's daughter Herodias married Herod Philip who was, like Antipas, a son of Herod the Great but by a different wife. "Falling in love with Herodias," says Josephus, Antipas "broached to her the subject of marriage,"<sup>39</sup> and each abandoned their former spouses. Whatever about sexual love, the social logic was very clear and I interpret it as Antipas's continuing move to become King of the Jews. Notice, by the way, that Antipas had planned that marriage with Herodias before making a visit to Rome and concluded it on his return. What was he doing in Rome at that point?

Finally, to confirm that preceding analysis of Antipas's long-term plans, when Herodias's brother Herod Agrippa I was given the territory of her ex-husband Herod Philip with the title not of tetrarch but of king, she and Antipas appeared before the new emperor Gaius Caligula to ask for a similar rank. But Agrippa I accused him of storing arms towards some anti-Roman conspiracy and Gaius exiled them both to either Gaul

---

<sup>37</sup> Ant. 18.102.

<sup>38</sup> Mariamme in War 1.443–444 = Ant. 15.230–231; Aristobulus in War 1.550–551 = Ant. 16.394.

<sup>39</sup> Ant. 18.110.

or Spain.<sup>40</sup> Josephus blames everything on Herodias—it was all her idea and her fault. But he also thinks that Antipas simply wanted to become “king” of his own territories just as Agrippa I was now “king” of Philip’s former domains. I omit his blame-the-woman and am convinced Antipas and Herodias had bigger plans. Antipas admitted, for example, about his arms-buildup but that was surely not to revolt against Rome but to prepare for his new role as King of the Jews. In any case, it was all over, Tiberius was dead, Gaius was emperor, Antipas and Herodias were in exile, and Herod Agrippa I became King of the Jews.

3. Text

The data-base I test against that context is the earliest dated materials in the Jesus tradition. I determine that inventory with two presuppositions. First, Q exists and should be dated to the 50’s CE. Second, anything in Q and in one or more independent sources is earlier than Q. I insist that nobody can avoid such decisions about sources and dependencies. Even to avoid those questions entirely is to make a decision and adopt a position. In the limited space of this article, I exemplify with three cases involving Q and independent materials, one small, one larger, and one very large indeed.

3.1. Jesus and the Prohibition of Divorce

For a single isolated saying, this is an excellently attested one. It is found in Q at Matt 5:31–32 = Luke 16:18, in Paul at 1 Cor 7:10–11, and in Mark 10:2–12 = Matt 19:3–9. “Granted the limited scope of this essay,” said John Meier in a recent article, “I simply accept the consensus of scholars that the historical Jesus, in some way or other, in some formulation or other, prohibited divorce (and remarriage).”<sup>41</sup> That is probably the best way to put it in any case. What was retained originally in oral memory from Jesus was a strikingly absolute proscription against divorce itself let alone remarriage afterwards. That at least is the logic of that Gen 2:24 citation in Mark 10:6–7 = Matt 19:4–5.

But even as that was transmitted in different forms, sources, and formulations, it was also muted back from original radicality to relative normalcy. Matthew added the qualification of “except for unchastity” to both his Q source in 5:32 and to his Markan source in 19:9. Paul added the qualification of an unwilling pagan married to a Christian believer in 1 Cor 7:15. Both those exceptions allow not only divorce but remarriage. How could the tradition retain an absolute prohibition from Jesus recorded in three independent places but also negated with exceptions in two of them? Does that indicate a certain understanding of Jesus' purpose? Put another way, why did Jesus ever issue that absolute proscription? Was there rampant divorce among his contemporary Galilean peasantry? Or does something else in that context of Galilee make better sense of this text from Jesus? What about Antipas?

<sup>40</sup> War 2.182–183 = Ant. 18.240–255.

<sup>41</sup> John P. Meier, “The Historical Jesus and the Historical Law: Some Problems within the Problem,” CBQ 65 (2003): 52–79, esp. 64–79; citation from 69 n. 38.

Almost everything had gone wrong for Antipas, not only externally with regard to his Roman masters<sup>42</sup> but internally with regard to his Jewish subjects. They had libeled his new city and its new palace and they had attacked his Hasmonean connection. That was not just one more political divorce and marriage so typical among both the Julio-Claudian emperors and the Herodian rulers. It was vital that his subjects accept Herodias, grand-daughter of Mariamme, as the new Mariamme (notice those many babies named Mary in that first-century Jewish homeland). And then came two recalcitrant prophets not just to accuse him personally but to destroy him socially, to endanger the Hasmonean-Herodian conjunction he and Herodias had carefully planned.

John the Baptist criticized the marriage as illegal in Mark 6:17–18 = Matt 14:3–4 = Luke 3:19 according to the Jewish law of Lev 18:16, “You shall not uncover the nakedness of your brother’s wife; it is your brother’s nakedness.”<sup>43</sup> Such a criticism might have been brushed aside by a Herodian ruler at another time or place—Herod the Great, for example, had made Henry VIII seem both monogamous and merciful. But within Antipas’s plans for Herodias as a popular Hasmonean queen and for Antipas-Herodias as a renewed Herodian-Hasmonean combination, that criticism would have been intolerable, would have destroyed the entire program of internal Jewish acceptance for himself as next King of the Jews. John was imprisoned and executed.

---

<sup>42</sup> He had been defeated in battle by Aretas IV for having divorced his daughter to marry Herodias, according to Ant. 18.113–115; and he had angered Vitellius by sending details of that Roman-Parthian treaty to Tiberius on his own authority, according to Ant. 18.104–105.

<sup>43</sup> Josephus made the same judgment in Ant. 18.136: Herodias “taking it into her head to flout the way of our fathers, married Herod, her husband’s brother by the same father, who was tetrarch of Galilee.”

Jesus' criticism was just as bad and went even deeper. It appealed not to law but to creation and had God forbid divorce itself, forbid not just the remarriage but its very basis in a double divorce. That criticized the whole normalcy of imperial, royal, and aristocratic marriages and divorces as political alliances. Jesus himself was probably saved from reprisal by Antipas's shrewd analysis of how many popular prophets he could execute within any given period of time. Recall that Antipas's defeat by Aretas IV was regarded by "some of the Jews" as a "divine vengeance, and certainly a just vengeance, for his treatment of John, surnamed the Baptist."<sup>44</sup>

Finally, that conjunction of context and text may possibly be confirmed by one other consideration. In a recent article, John Meier denied that either the texts of the Qumran scrolls or the debates between the Houses of Hillel and Shammai help us to understand Jesus' prohibition.<sup>45</sup> But that omits completely the royal realities of Hasmonean and Herodian normalcy that form the context for any and all of those texts. Divorce and remarriage is forbidden the ideal future king in the Temple Scroll and all Essenes in the Damascus Document.<sup>46</sup> And the House of Shammai is stricter than that of Hillel not just in legal matters as internally juridical but as externally socio-political as well. All of that is specifically confrontational with the Hasmonean-Herodian use of divorce and remarriage for political and imperial purposes.

I suggest, therefore, that Jesus' prohibition of divorce was not directed at the local peasantry for whom it may well have been an economically unlikely event but at Antipas himself as part of popular resistance to his royal plans for palace (illegal!), city (illegal!), and marriage (illegal!). It was an intuitive understanding of this limited focus that allowed Matthew, Paul, and Christianity after them to add exceptions and make interpretations to what prima facie looks like an absolute prohibition.

---

<sup>44</sup> Ant. 18.116.

<sup>45</sup> Meier, "Historical Jesus and the Historical Law," 52–79. He concludes that, "With Qumran and the Mishna out of the picture, Jesus' prohibition of divorce seems to come out of nowhere in Judaism and to go nowhere in Judaism. Even its reception in Christianity is ambiguous, where Paul in 1 Corinthians 7, makes history in first-generation Christianity by being the first to create some 'wiggle room' around the problem" (79).

<sup>46</sup> Meier notes that, in the latter case, "Many commentators, with an eye to the lifestyles of the rich and powerful in Israel, suggest that polygyny is the primary, if not the only, target. If any type of divorce is censured, it seems to be divorce plus remarriage during the lifetime of the first spouse" ("Historical Jesus and the Historical Law," 73). Divorce and/or remarriage was probably more an aristocratic actuality than a peasant possibility.

3.2. Jesus and the Radicalization of the Golden Rule

I turn next to a cluster of sayings that, in my judgment, appears independently both in Q as Luke 6:27–36 = Matt 5:39b–48; 7:12 and the Did. 1.2c–5b. That independence is, once again, a position to be accepted, rejected, but not ignored. In other words, one must decide for independence,<sup>47</sup> dependence,<sup>48</sup> or some mixture of both situations.<sup>49</sup> And, as always, if one is wrong on that decision, one is wrong on all that follows from it—for each of those alternative positions. These are the six sayings that appear in both Q and the Didache and in augural teaching positions in each case:

Q/Matthew 5	Q/Luke 6	Didache 1
The Other Cheek (39b–41)S	Love your Enemies (27–28)P	The Golden Rule (2c)S/n
Give without Return (42)S	The Other Cheek (29, 35a)S	Love your Enemies (3ac)P
Love your Enemies (44)P	Give without Return (30, 35b)S	Better than Sinners (3b)P
Better than Sinners (46–47)P	The Golden Rule (31)P/p	The Other Cheek (4b)S
As your Father (48)	Better than Sinners (32–34)P	Give without Return (5a)S
The Golden Rule (7:12)P/p	As your Father (36)	As your Father (5b)

<sup>47</sup> Jean-Paul Audet, La Didaché: Instructions des apôtres, Études Bibliques (Paris: Gabalda, 1958); Willy Rordorf and André Tuilier, La doctrine des douze apôtres (Didaché), SC 248 (Paris: Cerf, 1978); Jonathan Draper, “The Jesus Tradition in the Didache,” in Gospel Perspectives, vol. 5, The Jesus Tradition Outside the Gospels, ed. David Wenham (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1985), 269–287; Willy Rordorf, “Does the Didache Contain Jesus Tradition Independently of the Synoptic Gospels?” in Jesus and the Oral Gospel Tradition, ed. Henry Wansbrough, JSNTSup 64 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press [JSOT Press], 1992), 394–423; Ian H. Henderson, “Didache and Orality in Synoptic Comparison,” JBL 111 (1992): 83–306; Aaron Milavec, The Didache: Faith, Hope, and Life of the Earliest Christian Communities, 50–70 C.E. (New York: Newman Press, 2003).

<sup>48</sup> (1) Dependence on the synoptic tradition: Christopher M. Tuckett, “Synoptic Tradition in the Didache,” in The New Testament in Early Christianity: La réception des écrits néotestamentaires dans le christianisme primitif (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1989), 197–230. (2) Dependence on Q: Richard Glover, “The Didache’s Quotations and the Synoptic Gospels,” NTS 5 (1958–1959): 12–29. (3) Dependence on the synoptic tradition but only for Did. 1.3b–2.1: Helmut Koester, Synoptische Überlieferung bei den Apostolischen Vätern, TU 65 (Berlin: Akademie, 1957); Bentley Layton, “The Sources, Date and Transmission of Didache 1.3b–2.1,” HTR 61 (1968): 343–383.

<sup>49</sup> Clayton N. Jefford, The Sayings of Jesus in the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, VCSup 11 (Leiden: Brill, 1989); Kurt Niederwimmer, Die Didache, Ergänzungsreihe zum kritischegetischen Kommentar über das Neue Testament: Kommentar zu den Apostolischen Vätern 1 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1989).

First, the cluster's six sayings appear in different arrangements as Matthew and Luke reshape that inaugural address from Q within their own new compositions. Second, on the one hand, The Other Cheek and Give without Return always appear as a set and, on the other, Love your Enemies and Better than Sinners may have been a set in Q and is such in the Didache. Third, some of the sayings are singular (=S) while others are plural (=P) and that patterning is similar in all three versions for those sets just mentioned—the former set is singular, the latter plural. My conclusion from that patterning is that Q and the Didache are performancial variations on a written document, not an oral tradition. I do not think oral recall would have maintained that disjunction of tenses. Fourth, The Golden Rule also appears as either plural (=P) or singular (=S) and as either positive (=p) or negative (=n). Finally, therefore, I propose that there existed behind those Q and Didache clusters, a small written catechism which radicalized The Golden Rule by using those other sayings as commentary on it.

There are four points of major importance about that catechism. It is profoundly non-violent as it advocates non-violence even under attack, non-violence not only by non-attack but even by non-defense. It is non-violence based on the character of God. It is utterly eschatological but in a present rather than a future or even imminent sense. It proposes a here-and-now share-life in total opposition to the normalcy of Roman greed-life. It is, therefore, not just about non-violence but, presuming non-violence, it is about positive life-style resistance<sup>50</sup> to the normalcy of human civilization as then and there incarnated in Rome's Antipas, Antipas's Galilee, and Galilee's lake. It is about living within the Kingdom of God here and now on earth and not just hereafter in heaven.

3.3. Jesus and the Proclamation of the Kingdom

This final and most important example presupposes once again the existence of Q but also the independence of the Gospel of Thomas.

---

<sup>50</sup> Think of Jesus' programmatic living in the Kingdom under and against the Roman Empire as a parallel to Václav Havel's programmatic living in the truth under and against the Soviet empire. His two essays The Power of the Powerless from October 1978 and Politics and Conscience from February 1984 are both available in Living In Truth: Twenty-Two Essays Published on the Occasion of the Award of the Erasmus Prize to Václav Havel, ed. Jan Vladislav (London: Faber & Faber, 1987), esp. 89, 92, 93, 99, 104, 113, 137–138, 153. For general commentary see Jonathan Schell, The Unconquerable World: Power, Nonviolence, and the Will of the People (New York: Henry Holt [Metropolitan Books], 2003), 186–215.

That last point can, of course, be debated but, as I see it, nobody can escape such preliminary source-decisions—to affirm, deny, or ignore them are all decisions.

There are, calculating most conservatively, 37 units of tradition independently present in Q and Thomas.<sup>51</sup> By calculating most conservatively I exclude from this inventory any units in the Gospel of Thomas with parallels only in Luke or only in Matthew even though some (many? most? all?) of such units may have been in Q as well.<sup>52</sup> I refer to that complex of 37 units as the Common Sayings Tradition and it constitutes about one third of each document.<sup>53</sup> Since there is absolutely no evidence of a common order for those 37 units in the two documents, I presume general oral tradition rather than any written source-text behind them. They are, in fact, our best glimpse of a large complex of orally retained tradition still visible behind the texts into which it eventually disappeared.

<sup>51</sup> (1) Ask, Seek, Knock: (a) Gos. Thom. 2 (P. Oxy. 654.5–9) = 92:1 = 94; (b) Q/Luke 11:9–10 = Matt 7:7–8. (2) When and Where: (a) Gos. Thom. 3:1–3 (P. Oxy. 654.3:1–3) = 51 = 113; (b) Q/Luke 17:23 = Matt 24:26. (3) Hidden Made Manifest: (a) Gos. Thom. 5:2 (P. Oxy. 654.29–30) = 6: 5–6 (P. Oxy. 654.38–40); (b) Q/Luke 12:2 = Matt 10:26. (4) The Golden Rule: (a) Gos. Thom. 6: 3 (P. Oxy. 654.36–37); (b) Q/Luke 6:31 = Matt 7:12. (5) Mission and Message: (a) Gos. Thom. 14:4; (b) Q/Luke 10:4–11 = Matt 10:7, 10b, 12–14. (6) Peace or Sword: (a) Gos. Thom. 16; (b) Q/Luke 12:51–53 = Matt 10:34–36. (7) Eye, Ear, Mind: (a) Gos. Thom. 17; (b) Q/Luke 10:23–24 = Matt 13:16–17. (8) The Mustard Seed: (a) Gos. Thom. 20; (b) Q/Luke 13:18–19 = Matt 13:31–32. (9) Knowing the Danger: (a) Gos. Thom. 21:5–7 = 103; (b) Q/Luke 12:39–40 = Matt 24:43–44. (10) Speck and Log: (a) Gos. Thom. 26 (P. Oxy. 1.1–4); (b) Q/Luke 6:41–42 = Matt 7:3–5; (11) Open Proclamation: (a) Gos. Thom. 33:1 (P. Oxy. 1.41–42); (b) Q/Luke 12:3 = Matt 10:27. (12) Lamp and Bushel: (a) Gos. Thom. 33:2–3; (b) Q/Luke 11:33 = Matt 5:15. (13) The Blind Guide: (a) Gos. Thom. 34; (b) Q/Luke 6:39 = Matt 15:14b. (14) Strong One's House: (a) Gos. Thom. 35; (b) Q/Luke 11:21–22 (= Matt 12:29); (15) Against Anxieties: (a) Gos. Thom. 36 (P. Oxy. 655, col.i.1–170); (b) Q/Luke 12:22–31 = Matt 6:25–33. (16) On Hindering Others: (a) Gos. Thom. 39:1–2 (P. Oxy. 655, col.ii.11–19) = 102; (b) Q/Luke 11:52 = Matt 23:13. (17) Have and Receive: (a) Gos. Thom. 41; (b) Q/Luke 19:26 = Matt 25:29. (18) All Sins Forgiven: (a) Gos. Thom. 44; (b) Q/Luke 12:10 = Matt 12:32. (19) Trees and Hearts: (a) Gos. Thom. 45; (b) Q/Luke 6:43–45 = Matt 7:16–20. (20) Greater Than John: (a) Gos. Thom. 46; (b) Q/Luke 7:28 = Matt 11:11. (21) Serving Two Masters: (a) Gos. Thom. 47:1–2; (b) Q/Luke 16:13 = Matt 6:24. (22) Blessed the Poor: (a) Gos. Thom. 54; (b) Q/Luke 6:20 = Matt 5:3. (23) Hating One's Family: (a) Gos. Thom. 55:1–2a = 101; (b) Q/Luke 14:25–26 = Matt 10:37. (24) Carrying One's Cross: (a) Gos. Thom. 55:2b; (b) Q/Luke 14:27 = Matt 10:38. (25) Taken or Left: (a) Gos. Thom. 61:1; (b) Q/Luke 17:34–35 = Matt 24:40–41. (26) Father and Son: (a) Gos. Thom. 61:3; (b) Q/Luke 10:22 = Matt 11:27. (27) The Feast: (a) Gos. Thom. 64; (b) Q/Luke 14:15–24 = Matt 22:1–13. (28) Blessed the Persecuted: (a) Gos. Thom. 68 = 69:1; (b) Q/Luke 6:22–23 = Matt 5:11–12. (29) Blessed the Hungry: (a) Gos. Thom. 69:2; (b) Q/Luke 6: 21a = Matt 5:6. (30) Harvest Is Great: (a) Gos. Thom. 73; (2) Q/Luke 10:2 = Matt 9:37–38. (31) Treasure in Heaven: (a) Gos. Thom. 76:3; (b) Q/Luke 12:33 = Matt 6:19–20. (32) Into the Desert: (a) Gos. Thom. 78; (b) Q/Luke 7:24–27 = Matt 11:7–10. (33) Foxes Have Holes: (a) Gos. Thom. 86; (b) Q/Luke 9:57–58 = Matt 8:19–20. (34) Inside and Outside: (a) Gos. Thom. 89; (b) Q/Luke 11: 39–40 = Matt 23:25–26; (35) Give without Return: (a) Gos. Thom. 95; (b) Q/Luke 6:30, 34, 35b = Matt 5:42. (36) The Leaven: (a) Gos. Thom. 96:1–2; (b) Q/Luke 13:20–21 = Matt 13:33. (37) The Lost Sheep: (a) Gos. Thom. 107; (b) Q/Luke 15:3–7 = Matt 18:12–14.

<sup>52</sup> Thus, for example, Stephen J. Patterson, from whom—with gratitude—I took this idea, counts those Q/Thomas parallels at 49 units—many more than my minimalist list in the preceding footnote. See his “Wisdom in Q and Thomas,” in In Search of Wisdom: Essays in Memory of John G. Gammie, ed. Leo G. Perdue, Bernard Brandon Scott, and William Johnston Wiseman (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1993), 187–221. Helmut Koester had also noted that those Q/Thomas parallels may be “possibly as many as forty-five, if one includes the Q-Mark overlaps and those sayings

Since I seek to stay as close to the “objectively” earliest data, I leave aside any attempt to analyze either Q<sup>54</sup> or the Gospel of Thomas into earlier and later strata.<sup>55</sup> I focus only on that Common Sayings Tradition. Within that inventory, granted present limitations of space, I focus here on one extremely important unit: Mission and Message in Gos. Thom. 14:4 and Q/Luke 10:4–11 = Matt 10:7, 10b, 12–14. My reasons for privileging this unit are fourfold. It cuts across the distinction of word and deed in the that Luke may have drawn from Q, although there are no Matthean parallels.” See p. 55 in his “Q and Its Relatives,” in vol. 1 of Gospel Origins and Christian Beginnings and Gnosticism and the Early Christian World: In Honor of James M. Robinson, ed. James E. Goehring, Charles W. Hedrick, and Jack T. Sanders, with Hans Dieter Betz, 2 vols, Forum Fascicles 1–2 (Sonoma, CA: Polebridge Press, 1990), 49–63.

---

<sup>53</sup> To be more exact: 28% or 37 out of 132 units in the Gospel of Thomas have parallels in Q and 37% or 37 of 101 units in Q have parallels in the Gospel of Thomas.

<sup>54</sup> John Kloppenborg has insisted, quite correctly, that his stratification of Q into earlier and later layers is not a question of tradition-history but simply of composition-history: “To say that the wisdom components were formative for Q and that the prophetic judgment oracles and apophthegms describing Jesus’ conflict with ‘this generation’ are secondary is not to imply anything about the ultimate tradition-historical provenance of any of the sayings. It is indeed possible, indeed probable, that some of the materials from the secondary compositional phase are dominical or at least very old, and that some of the formative elements are, from the standpoint of authenticity or tradition-history, relatively young. Tradition-history is not convertible with literary history, and it is the latter which we are treating here.” See his The Formation of Q: Trajectories in Ancient Wisdom Collections, Studies in Antiquity and Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1987), 244–245.

<sup>55</sup> April D. DeConick has proposed earlier and later strata in the Gospel of Thomas in which “kernel sayings” were developed by “multi-authors who layered the text with new source materials over a lengthy period of time.” See p. 180 in “The Original Gospel of Thomas,” VC 46 (2002): 167–199. She concluded that “just over fifty percent of the sayings in the kernel gospel are paralleled in Q. Not even one saying with a Q parallel, however, can be found in the later layers. This also cannot be coincidence. It suggests to me that the sayings in the kernel Gospel of Thomas are some of our oldest witnesses to the Jesus traditions” (198). On the one hand, she is surely correct that “it is not until the later layers of Thomas that we find the non-apocalyptic (or better: ‘de-apocalypticizing’) materials introduced into the kernel in order to reinterpret the strong eschatological hopes” (195). On the other hand, the later and non-kernel interpretations in Gos. Thom. 3:1–3 = 51–113 do have a parallel in Q/Luke 17:23 = Matt 24:26. The question is what exactly is that common unit denying and what is it thereby affirming—is it all eschatology or only some specific forms of that hope.

Jesus tradition—it is, in fact, a word about deed, a saying about doing. It has an independent parallel in Mark 6:7–13 = Matt 10:1, 8–10a,11 = Luke 9:1–6 and, in integrating their Q and Mark sources, Luke keeps them somewhat separate while Matthew conflates them into unity. But that triply independent sourcing means that anything in Q and Thomas or Q and Mark is part of that earliest layer of the Jesus tradition on which I focus as my text. It is also reflected in Paul at 1 Cor 9:14 and 10:27 as well as in the Did. 11.(3)4–12 and 1 Tim 5:18b. It shows clearly that Jesus had not only a vision and theory of the Kingdom of God but also a program and practice for participation in its present actualization.

3.3.1. Eating and Healing

This double-theme is common to all three of the major independent sources: (1) Gos. Thom. 14:4b has “eat what they set before you, heal the sick among them.” (2) Q appears in Luke 10:7–9a as, “remain in the same house, eating and drinking whatever they provide.... eat what is set before you; cure the sick who are there.” (3) Mark commands that, “wherever you enter a house, stay there until you leave the place” (6:10) and narrates how “they cast out many demons, and anointed with oil many who were sick and cured them” (6:13). In copying his Markan source, Luke adapts that as “to heal” and to “stay” (9:2, 4). In other words, they bring healing and receive eating in return.

The theme of rejection is also mentioned, by the way, in those three sources: “if they do not receive you...” (Gos. Thom. 14:4a, Q Luke 10:6, 10 = Matt 13–14; Mark 6:11).

3.3.2. Kingdom of God

This theme was explicit in Q/Luke 10:9 = Matt 10:7, not present in Gos. Thom. 4:4. but implicit in Mark 6:12, “so they went out and proclaimed that all should repent.” That recalls Mark 1:15’s summary of Jesus’ message that, “the time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God has come near; repent, and believe in the good news.” Luke, for example, correctly adapts Mark’s “repent” as “he sent them out to proclaim the kingdom of God” (9:2) and concludes that, “they departed and went through the villages, bringing the good news and curing diseases everywhere” (9:6).

3.3.3. Staff and Violence

The items not to be worn by them or taken with them fall generally into two classes: some emphasize absolute inter-dependency with those whom they heal and with whom they eat; and others emphasize their absolute defenselessness. They are not only non-violent in not attacking others, they are non-violent even in not defending themselves from attack. None of this is in the Gospel of Thomas but Q has “no staff” in Luke 9:3 = Matt 10:10.

Mark, in flat contradiction, says that Jesus, “ordered them to take nothing for their journey except a staff” (6:8). In other words, Mark knew and changed that earlier prohibition. Indeed, a staff for a journey would be so normal that Mark’s permission would be enough even by itself to presume some prior prohibition. The same, of course, goes for the change from “no sandals” in Q/Luke 10:4 = Matt 10:10 to “sandals” in Mark 6:9.

The absolute and programmatic non-violence, be it offensive or even defensive, of that “no staff” has been muted back to the defensive normalcy of “staff” in Mark. But, as in that preceding sayings cluster, so also in this selected example from the Common Sayings Tradition, the incarnated and communal program of Jesus is that one can and must enter the Kingdom of God here and now on this earth by forming a community that shares in mutuality the basic spiritual power of healing and the basic physical power of eating. That rebuilds Jewish society upwards from an equal and non-violent base in positive alternative and not just negative opposition to the hierarchical and violent normalcy of Roman imperialism (and all human civilization) working from the top downward.

REMEMBERING JESUS: HOW THE QUEST OF THE HISTORICAL JESUS LOST ITS WAY

JAMES D. G. DUNN

Jesus Remembered<sup>1</sup> was the product and climax of some thirty years of engagement with what is almost universally known as ‘the Quest of the Historical Jesus.’ During the course of the research for the book itself I became increasingly dissatisfied with three key methodological presuppositions which have determined the course of the Quest, all three of them more or less from its inception. In reaction I found it necessary to engage in the Quest from a different starting point, with a different perspective on the source material, and with a different objective in analysing that material. These three protests and proposals are somewhat scattered and easily missed or lost to view in the scope and detail of the volume (900 pages!). In this essay I will attempt to bring them to clearer view, though it will be understood that the relative brevity of the essay permits neither the detail nor the nuance of the larger volume. Nevertheless, the attempt to focus more sharply on the three protests and proposals may help to make the methodological issues clearer and to highlight their importance. Each of my protests is double-barreled. My proposals do not fall into such a neat repeating pattern.

Protest One

My first protest is directed in the first place against the assumption that ‘the Christ of faith’ is a perversion of ‘the historical Jesus’; that faith is something which prevents a clear historical view of Jesus. The objective of the first phase of the Quest was to find the man behind the dogma, the historical Jesus, the real Jesus. The assumption was that the real Jesus must have been different from the Christ of faith. The real Jesus was obscured by layers of faith and dogma, hidden behind the Christ of the creeds, the God-man, the second person of the Trinity, the Pantocrator, like an original masterpiece obscured by layers of later 'improvements' and centuries of pollution. The Quest was motivated by the conviction that these layers of dogma could be stripped away to reveal a more human Jesus, a Jesus more believable by 'modern man.'

---

<sup>1</sup> J. D. G. Dunn, Christianity in the Making, vol. 1, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003). This chapter summarizes the main points of the three lectures published as A New Perspective on Jesus: What the Quest for the Historical Jesus Missed (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker; London: SPCK, 2005).

The first to pose the antithesis between the historical Jesus and the Christ of faith in these terms was D. F. Strauss<sup>2</sup> in his sharp critique of Schleiermacher's Life of Jesus.<sup>3</sup> Schleiermacher's lectures had been based primarily on John's Gospel, particularly the discourses of Jesus in that Gospel, and had been delivered thirty-two years earlier, prior to Strauss's own Life of Jesus in which Strauss had seriously questioned the historical value of the Johannine discourses.<sup>4</sup> So Strauss's reaction to the publication of Schleiermacher's lectures was predictable.

Schleiermacher's Christology is a last attempt to make the churchly Christ acceptable to the modern world... Schleiermacher's Christ is as little a real man as is the Christ of the church.

The illusion... that Jesus could have been a man in the full sense and still as a single person stand above the whole of humanity, is the chain which still blocks the harbour of Christian theology against the open sea of rational science.

The ideal of the dogmatic Christ on the one hand and the historical Jesus of Nazareth on the other are separated forever.<sup>5</sup>

Strauss, then, marks the beginning of the devaluation of the historical value of John's gospel which has been a principal feature of the Quest for well over a century. And the critical determinant was that John's gospel expressed so clearly the developed faith of the early church: John presents the Christ of faith rather than the Jesus of history.

If Strauss insisted that John should be placed on the faith side of the history/faith divide, the later nineteenth-century liberals were equally insistent that Paul should be placed on the same side. According to Adolf Harnack, Jesus had preached a simple gospel centered on the

---

<sup>2</sup> D. F. Strauss, The Christ of Faith and the Jesus of History (1865; ET: Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977).

<sup>3</sup> F. D. E. Schleiermacher, The Life of Jesus (1864; ET: Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975).

<sup>4</sup> D. F. Strauss, The Life of Jesus Critically Examined (1835–1836; 1846; ET: 1846, Philadelphia: Fortress, 1972), 365–386. The decisive consideration for Strauss was the fact that the style of speech in the gospel was everywhere the same, whether that of the Baptist, or of Jesus, or of the evangelist himself, pointing to the conclusion that the style, both of speech and thought, was that of the evangelist (385).

<sup>5</sup> Strauss, Christ of Faith, 4, 5, 169.

fatherhood of God, the infinite value of the human soul, and the importance of love. It was Paul who had turned the religion of Jesus into a religion about Jesus. It was Paul who had transformed the simple moralizing message of Jesus into a religion requiring redemption by bloody sacrifice.<sup>6</sup> Here again it was faith, the faith already of the first Christians, which had begun to obscure the clearer outlines of the historical Jesus.

The late nineteenth-century liberals were not worried about dating so early the beginning of the process whereby faith had progressively obscured the lineaments of the historical Jesus. For they were confident that in the synoptic gospels, in Mark in particular, they still had direct access to the mind (messianic consciousness) and message of Jesus himself. William Wrede punctured that confidence in a rebuttal which largely determined the attitude of critical scholarship to the synoptic gospels for the rest of the twentieth century. He argued that the motif of 'the messianic secret,' so integral to Mark's gospel, was clear evidence of a later, faith, perspective on Jesus; for example, the designation of Jesus as 'Son of God' by demoniacs already expressed Christian faith in Jesus.<sup>7</sup>

In short, then, faith pervaded the New Testament writings and their presentation of Jesus. No single gospel could be set over against the others as more historical and less theological. This critical perspective thus established a century ago has continued to dominate the way the gospels are approached and the use made of them in the quest of the historical Jesus. Subsequent to Wrede, Bultmann simply abandoned the Quest (at least for the life and personality of Jesus)<sup>8</sup> and focused attention on the kerygmatic Christ. To be sure, his disciples insisted that faith too was interested in the historical Jesus, but could never quite manage to cut a through way round the roadblock of faith. It was not simply that the writers of the New Testament expressed their faith in and through their writings. It was more the case that the Easter message, Easter faith, had so transformed their apprehension of Jesus that everything they said about Jesus expressed that faith. As Gunther Bornkamm, the classic expression of the so-called 'second quest of the historical Jesus' put it:

---

<sup>6</sup> A. Harnack, What Is Christianity? (1900; ET: London: Williams & Norgate, 1901).

<sup>7</sup> W. Wrede, The Messianic Secret (1901; ET: Cambridge: Clarke, 1971).

<sup>8</sup> R. Bultmann, Jesus and the Word (1926; ET: New York: Scribners, 1935), 8.

We possess no single word of Jesus and no single story of Jesus, no matter how incontestably genuine they may be, which do not embody at the same time the confession of the believing congregation, or at least are embedded therein.

In every layer, therefore, and in each individual part, the tradition is witness of the reality of his history and the reality of his resurrection. Our task, then, is to seek the history in the Kerygma of the gospels, and in this history to seek the Kerygma.

Nothing could be more mistaken than to trace the origin of the gospels and the traditions collected therein to a historical interest apart from faith... Rather these gospels voice the confession: Jesus the Christ, the unity of the earthly Jesus and the Christ of faith.<sup>9</sup>

If the second questers tried to retrieve the situation, the latest phase of the Quest as represented by the Jesus Seminar marks a reversion to the simplifications of the liberal quest, compounded by the radical scepticism of Wrede and Bultmann. For Robert Funk, the leading spokesman of the Seminar, the task is as it was 150 years ago: to rescue Jesus from Christianity, to free the historical Jesus from the prisons in which faith has incarcerated him.<sup>10</sup> The method is straightforward: whatever resonates with early Christian faith can be discarded.<sup>11</sup> The desired result is a Jesus amenable to questers' values and prejudices.<sup>12</sup>

In short, then, throughout the history of the quest of the historical Jesus, leading participants have all accepted as a methodological given the twofold proposition: that Christian (post-Easter) faith pervades all our chief sources for the life and mission of Jesus; and that this faith prevents the present-day quester from seeing Jesus as he was, or even as he was seen by his disciples pre-Easter. It is against this twofold proposition that I direct my first protest.

---

<sup>9</sup> G. Bornkamm, Jesus of Nazareth (1956; ET: London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1960), 14, 21, 23.

<sup>10</sup> R. W. Funk, Honest to Jesus (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1996), 300.

<sup>11</sup> R. W. Funk and R. W. Hoover, The Five Gospels: The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus (New York: Macmillan, 1993); see, e.g., the references to the Jesus Seminar in the author index of Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 959.

<sup>12</sup> More extensive criticism in Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 58–65.

Proposal 1

In direct contrast to this deeply rooted suspicion of faith as a barrier to and perversion of any historical perspective on Jesus, my proposal is that the quest should start from the recognition that Jesus evoked faith from the outset of his mission and that this faith is the surest indication of the historical reality and effect of his mission.

One thing we can be sure about: that Jesus made an impact in and through his mission. There were people who became his disciples; this we can be sure of, since otherwise no one would have remembered this Jesus or have wanted to do so, and he would have quickly disappeared in the soon gathering mists of history. The fact that Jesus made disciples is generally recognized. What has not been given sufficient recognition or weight, however, is the effect of this impact. These disciples encountered Jesus as a life-transforming experience: they followed him; they left their families; they gave up their livelihoods. Why? Because they had believed Jesus and what he said and taught. Because they believed in Jesus. They entrusted their lives and futures to him. Such a response cannot be denied the characterization 'faith.' Their discipleship was a faith commitment, already before Easter. Of course it was not yet Easter faith. And Easter faith transformed the pre-Easter faith. But the faith of discipleship was still faith.

The point is obvious. The earliest faith of the first Christians is not a hindrance or barrier to our perceiving the reality of what Jesus did and said and the effect he had. On the contrary, the impact thus made by Jesus is itself the evidence needed by those who want to appreciate the character and effectiveness of Jesus' mission. But what of the challenge posed by Bornkamm? Has that evidence been diluted or overlaid by the subsequent post-Easter faith? To some extent the answer must be Yes. But the second part of my first proposal is that the original impact of Jesus' mission on his first disciples is, nevertheless, still clearly evident in the tradition preserved by the synoptic gospels.

Here I draw particularly on a neglected article by Heinz Schürmann to the effect that the beginnings of the sayings tradition in the gospels must lie in the pre-Easter circle of disciples, and thus, as Schürmann added, with Jesus himself.<sup>13</sup> The claim can easily be documented. Consider only the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 5–7) or the parallel material in the Lukan Sermon on the Plain (Luke 6:17–49): the beatitudes, the call to love the enemy and not retaliate, the demand to give to those who beg from you, the warning against judging others, about the speck in someone else's eye and the log in one's own, the tree known by its fruits, the parable of the wise man and foolish man. Which of these shows traces of post-Easter embellishment or perspective? Arguably one or two, but not the bulk of them. Of course, within the present gospels they are retold within a gospel context, that is, as part of a story climaxing in Jesus' death and resurrection (Bornkamm's chief point). My point, however, is that their form and content show no signs of being originated or shaped by post-Easter faith. Who, for example, in a post-Easter context would have deemed it sufficient to challenge disciples to build their lives on Jesus' teaching (Matt 7:24–27/Luke 6:47–49) rather than on Jesus Christ himself (as in 1 Cor 3:11)? In other words, here we have material which has been given its still enduring content and shape prior to the rise of Easter faith.

---

<sup>13</sup> H. Schürmann, "Die vorösterlichen Anfänge der Logientradition: Versuch eines formgeschichtlichen Zugangs zum Leben Jesu," in Der historische Jesus und der kerygmatische Christus, ed. H. Ristow and K. Matthiae (Berlin: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1961), 342-370.

The difference between the two perspectives, the one against which I protest and the one I propose, is well illustrated by their different responses to the hypothetical Q document. Two features of this document are generally agreed among Q specialists. One is that the traditions generally assigned to this document have a marked Galilean character, as indicated by the story of the centurion's servant (Matt 8:5–13/Luke 7:1–10) and the woes on Chorazin and Bethsaida (Matt 11:21–24/Luke 10:13–15), and illustrated by the characteristically agrarian setting of many of the traditions, assuming the daily reality of debt, day labourers, absentee landlords and the like. The other is the lack of a passion narrative, such a prominent motif in all four canonical gospels. From one perspective the explanation of these features is obvious. Assuming that the character of the Q document tells more about its own provenance and the faith of its compilers than about Jesus, the features point to communities/churches in Galilee which did not know the passion narrative or were even opposed to a gospel which climaxed in the crucifixion of Jesus, as in Mark.<sup>14</sup> From my perspective the more obvious explanation for these features is that the Q material first emerged in Galilee and was given its lasting shape there prior to Jesus' death in Jerusalem. That is to say, it expresses the impact made by Jesus during his Galilean mission and before the shadow of the cross began to fall heavily upon either his mission or the memory of his teaching.

---

<sup>14</sup> See particularly J. Kloppenborg, Excavating Q: The History and Setting of the Sayings Gospel (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2000), chs. 4 and 5.

The third part of my first proposal is the straightforward corollary that we can discern Jesus from the impression he left on/in the Jesus tradition. Here I wish to take up in my own terms the protest made against the nineteenth century Quest by Martin Kähler. His protest is embodied in the title of his famous essay, Der sogenannte historische Jesus und der geschichtliche, biblische Christus.<sup>15</sup> Kähler's point was that 'the historical Jesus' was a creation of the questers. The gospels themselves do not give enough information to write the sort of Life of Jesus to which the nineteenth-century questers aspired. Lacking that information, they had to fill in the gaps from another source, a fifth gospel—themselves, their own values and aspirations. Hence the 'so-called historical Jesus.' In Kähler's view the gospels give access only to the geschichtliche Christus, the 'historic Christ,' that is, Jesus recognized in and by his historical significance.

It is at this point that I part company with Kähler, since by the 'historic Christ' he meant the preached Christ, that is, Christ seen in his post-Easter significance, the crucified and risen Christ seen through the eyes of post-Easter faith. But his protest can be reformulated to express the outcome of my first proposal. That is to say, if we take seriously the undeniable fact that Jesus made an impact on his first disciples, and that that impact is still clearly recognizable in the content and form of the traditions by which Jesus' teaching and practice were remembered, then two things follow.

One is Kähler's point that we cannot realistically expect to find a Jesus different from the Jesus of the Jesus tradition. Welcome as it would be for a historian, we simply do not have any other substantive sources for Jesus' mission.<sup>16</sup> We have no first hand testimony from Caiaphas or from Pilate. We do not know how Jesus impacted others. What we do know is how he impacted his disciples. If we want to strip away all faith from the traditions as part of our critical analysis of these traditions, we condemn ourselves to impotence and failure; for nothing will be left. If we want to find a Jesus who did not inspire faith, or who inspired it differently, we chase a will-o'-the-wisp. But if we take seriously the evidence of the faith-creating impact of Jesus it becomes a means to our even now being able to discern the effect of Jesus' mission and during his mission.

---

<sup>15</sup> M. Kähler, The So-Called Historical Jesus and the Historic Biblical Christ (Leipzig: A. Deichert, 1892; ET: Philadelphia: Fortress, 1964).

<sup>16</sup> Further details and discussion in my Jesus Remembered, ch. 7.

The other is that by means of and through this impact we can discern the one who made the impact. As one can discern the shape of the seal from the mark it leaves upon the paper, so we can discern the shape of Jesus' mission from the impression he left on his first disciples. Not the 'historical Jesus,' as though he was some objective artefact which we could prise from the traditions and from whom we could then brush off the dirt (faith) of the intervening ages. But the 'historic Jesus,' the one who left the impact still evident in the gospels, the one who transformed fishermen and tax collectors into disciples. For historians who want to understand better the ways in which and the reasons why Christianity emerged, what more could be desired as outcome for 'the quest of the historical Jesus'?

Protest 2

My second protest is against a twofold assumption which has been more pervasively determinative of the findings of the Quest than is usually appreciated. The first assumption is that the only way to understand both the relation of the traditions in the synoptic gospels and the earliest transmission of the Jesus tradition is in literary terms. My protest is against the assumption that the processing of the tradition of Jesus' teaching and activities from its first hearers to the written gospels has to be conceived almost entirely, or even exclusively, as a process of copying and editing earlier written documents.

This should be plain to anyone who is familiar with the history of the Quest. Inextricably interwoven with that history is the progress of gospel criticism. The two have gone hand in hand, often to the disadvantage of both. An obvious first step in the Quest was to ascertain what were the sources for the information about Jesus provided by the gospels. Source criticism was conceived for the most part, and in effect almost exclusively, in terms of written documents. The relations between the synoptic gospels, which obviously overlap to a considerable extent in the material they use, were most readily conceived in terms of evangelists using each other's gospels or a common written source now lost. A synopsis demonstrated that one evangelist must have been dependent on another, by copying or abbreviating, or expanding, or otherwise editing his source. The dominant solution to the synoptic problem was and still is the ‘two-document hypothesis’—Mark as the earliest gospel, Matthew and Luke drawing on Mark and on a sayings source (Q).<sup>17</sup> B. H. Streeter’s authoritative treatment of the synoptic problem cautioned against studying the synoptic problem “merely as a problem of literary criticism,” but in the event resolved the question of Matthew’s and Luke’s additional material in terms of two further writings (M and L)—hence the “four document hypothesis.”<sup>18</sup>

The main alternatives offered to the dominant two-document hypothesis have been those of William Farmer<sup>19</sup> and Michael Goulder.<sup>20</sup> Both continue to exemplify a modern mind-set which can conceptualize the history of the Jesus tradition only in terms of copying or editing an earlier written source. And the re-emergence of interest in the Q source in the last twenty years has likewise operated entirely from the working hypothesis that Q was a document written in Greek. The most influential analysis of Q, by John Kloppenborg, has even found it possible to stratify the hypothetical Q document into three layers or editions, Q<sub>1</sub>, Q<sub>2</sub> and Q<sub>3</sub>.<sup>21</sup> In short, the challenge of tracing the tradition history of the gospel materials, and thus of finding the earliest or most original information for any historical account of Jesus’ mission, has been conceived purely as a problem of literary dependency and resolved in the same terms.

The second assumption which I wish to protest against is the assumption that oral tradition functioned like written tradition; or that it is no longer possible to say anything about the oral phase of the gospel tradition; or that only written tradition is reliable. It is not entirely true that the literary paradigm for analyzing the Jesus tradition has completely dominated the analysis of the history of that tradition. Voices were raised early on in favour of recognizing an oral period for the tradition, even

---

<sup>17</sup> See, e.g., W. G. Kümmel, The New Testament: The History of the Investigation of Its Problems (ET: Nashville: Abingdon, 1972), 146–151; Kloppenborg, Excavating Q, 295–309.

<sup>18</sup> B. H. Streeter, The Four Gospels: A Study of Origins (London: Macmillan, 1924), ch. 9 (quotation from 229).

<sup>19</sup> W. Farmer, The Synoptic Problem (New York: Macmillan, 1964).

<sup>20</sup> M. Goulder, Luke: A New Paradigm, 2 vols., JSNTSup 20 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1989), in his attempt to dispense with Q (particularly vol. I ch. 2).

<sup>21</sup> J. Kloppenborg, The Formation of Q (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987). For critique see my Jesus Remembered, 147–160.

oral sources for the gospels. And form criticism emerged in the 1920's as an attempt to penetrate behind the written sources into the oral period.<sup>22</sup> The trouble was that the most influential exponent of form criticism, Rudolf Bultmann, assumed that oral and written tradition were transmitted in the same way. He conceived the whole tradition about Jesus as "composed of a series of layers."<sup>23</sup> The conception was of each layer being constructed on the basis of the preceding layer—a conception no different in effect from that of successive editions of a document. But is such a way of conceptualizing oral tradition and transmission realistic? Bultmann apparently never saw the need to ask such a question.

Others have assumed that oral tradition and transmission would have been so fluid, and anyway are now lost behind the relative fixity of the written traditions of the gospels, that it is no longer possible to reconstruct any tradition in its oral phase and not worth the trouble to try.<sup>24</sup> Since it is actually technically possible to explain every divergence in the synoptic tradition in terms of literary editing, then what need have we of any further hypothesis? Others take the modern standpoint that oral material is unreliable and only written material is reliable. Consequently it becomes important for them to argue that the writing down of Jesus' teaching began very early, even already during his mission.<sup>25</sup> Matthew, the tax collector, is the most obvious candidate for the role of a literary disciple (one who could read and write), who, conceivably, could have taken notes during Jesus' preaching and teaching sessions. What has obviously not been sufficiently appreciated is the fact that in the ancient world the prejudice was reversed: written material was not trusted, because it could be so easily lost, or destroyed, or corrupted in the copying; much preferable was it to have the teaching or story firmly lodged in one's own mind, retaining the living voice of the teacher.

The consequences of these assumptions are extensive and of a seriousness too rarely recognized. For if there was an 'oral period' at the

---

<sup>22</sup> E.g., R. Bultmann (with K. Kundsinn), Form Criticism (1934; ET: New York: Harper Torchbook, 1962), 1.

<sup>23</sup> Bultmann, Jesus and the Word, 12–13.

<sup>24</sup> See particularly B. W. Henaut, Oral Tradition and the Gospels: The Problem of Mark 4, JSNTSup 82 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993).

<sup>25</sup> See particularly A. Millard, Reading and Writing in the Time of Jesus, BS 69 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), 223–229; also E. E. Ellis, The Making of the New Testament Documents (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 24, 32, 352.

beginning of the history of the Jesus tradition, lasting, say, for about twenty years, and if it is not possible to penetrate into that period with confidence, and if oral tradition is inherently unstable and unreliable, then the quest of the historical Jesus is confronted with a yawning and unbridgeable gulf between the tradition as we still have it and the Jesus to whom it bears witness. Here and there we may find some sayings or a motif which reaches out some way over the gulf, but the questers who rely on them to inch back towards 'the historical Jesus' are likely to suffer a severe attack of critical vertigo, and the chances of establishing a firm link on the other side of the gulf become ever more tenuous the further they try to reach back.

This is the burden of my second protest against the traditional assumptions which have governed the quest of the historical Jesus. The literary mind-set of the nineteenth to twenty-first centuries has conditioned the very way in which we conceptualize the processes by which the Jesus tradition first emerged and was initially transmitted. We think in a box of literary dependency, of copying and editing. And we are the more confident of the results of our analysis of that tradition because they are so containable within the box. But the box is one constructed by the fifteenth century invention of printing and it prevents us from seeing outside of its containment. We shut out the reality of what an oral society must have been like, and have failed to think through the character of the traditioning process in an oral society. We think that the results of reconceptualizing the processes of oral transmission would be destructive of our grasp of the tradition's 'authenticity' because of orality's inherent instability. And the outcome is that we cut ourselves off from the Jesus we want to rediscover and hear again afresh in his own terms.

Proposal 2

In direct contrast to the blinkeredness of the literary paradigm, I affirm, first, the necessity of taking the oral phase of the history of the Jesus tradition with all seriousness. And second, in direct response to any resignation before the difficulty of gaining real access to the tradition in its oral phase, I maintain that it is in fact possible to envisage the oral phase of the Jesus tradition.

First, it is necessary that we do make an attempt to envisage the way an oral society functions, not least in regard to the traditions it regards as important. For first-century Palestine certainly was an oral rather than a literary culture. Those who have inquired most closely into the subject tell us that literacy in Palestine at the time of Jesus would probably have been less than 10%.<sup>26</sup> And even if we can argue that a Jewish society would have prized the skills of reading and writing more highly than others, the increase in percentage may not have been very great. The reason why we read so much about ‘scribes’ in Palestine, as well as more widely in the ancient world, is because literary skills were the prerogatives of a relatively small group of professionals. We have to assume, therefore, that the great majority of Jesus’ first disciples would have been functionally illiterate.<sup>27</sup> And even allowing for the possibility that one or two of Jesus’ immediate disciples were able to read and write (Matthew) and may even have kept notes of Jesus’ teaching, it remains overwhelmingly probable that the earliest transmission of the Jesus tradition was by word of mouth.

Second, the extensive study of oral communities and of how oral tradition functions has been greatly advanced over the latter decades of the twentieth century. Classic treatments of Yugoslavian epics, of folklore and of oral tradition for example in Africa,<sup>28</sup> have given us a clearer idea of what it must have meant to live in a community where information, knowledge and wisdom were all or mostly retained within an oral framework of memory and tradition in and on behalf of the community. I found Kenneth Bailey’s accounts of his more than thirty years experience of <sup>26</sup> Recent estimates are of less than 10% literacy in the Roman Empire under the principate, falling to perhaps as low as 3% literacy in Roman Palestine; see particularly W. V. Harris, Ancient Literacy (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1989); M. Bar-Ilan, “Illiteracy in the Land of Israel in the First Centuries CE,” in Essays in the Social Scientific Study of Judaism and Jewish Society, ed. S. Fishbane and S. Schoenfeld (Hoboken, NJ: Ktav, 1992), 46–61; C. Hezser, Jewish Literacy in Roman Palestine (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001).

---

<sup>27</sup> Kloppenborg properly reminds us that “literacy” itself admits of various levels: signature-literacy; the ability to read simple contracts, invoices and receipts; full reading literacy; the ability to take dictation; and scribal literacy—the ability to compose (Excavating Q, 167).

<sup>28</sup> Particularly A. B. Lord, The Singer of Tales (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1978); J. M. Foley, Immanent Art: From Structure to Meaning in Traditional Oral Epic (Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1991); J. Vansina, Oral Tradition as History (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1985); I. Okpewho, African Oral Literature: Backgrounds, Character and Continuity (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1992); A. Dundes, Holy Writ as Oral Lit: The Bible as Folklore (Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 1999).

the oral culture of Middle East village life particularly insightful.<sup>29</sup> From this material I deduce five important characteristics of oral tradition and oral transmission.<sup>30</sup>

1. Oral performance is different from reading a text. The reader can pause in the reading for reflection, can turn back to check something, can look forward to anticipate the outcome. The reader can take the book away and read it again. The editor can take the literary manuscript and make changes to the text, and so on. Nothing of this is possible for the hearer of an oral tradition being retold. The hearing is an event, not a thing; the individual hearer cannot press a pause button or put the performance into reverse. It is evanescent, past and gone, and cannot be taken away for later perusal, or returned to for checking. It is not a written text which can be revised or edited. This very basic fact at once compels us to adopt a very different attitude towards the Jesus tradition in its pre-literary state. What was happening to the tradition in that important phase of its history? Was every performance different in content and character from its predecessors? Did changes occur then which significantly altered or randomly transformed the tradition prior to its being written down? At the very least, recognition of the oral phase of the traditioning process should cause us to look twice at explanations of differences between the synoptic traditions which rely exclusively on a literary model.

2. We can assume a communal dimension for oral tradition. Contemporary literary criticism inclines us to think of an individual author writing with a view to being read by an individual reader—hence such terms as ‘implied reader’ and ‘reader response.’ We can think without effort of the sole reader at a desk or curled up on a sofa having a one-to-one encounter with the text. But oral tradition is characteristically community tradition. This was recognized by the pioneers of form criticism in the 1920’s but its significance was lost to sight by those locked into the literary mind-set. Here Bailey’s anecdotal accounts are helpful, as he envisages village communities gathering in an evening to share news and to recall and celebrate tradition that was important to them—what he calls the haflat samar. So present day attempts to envisage the earliest disciple groups need to remember that there would have been no newspapers, no radio or television or cinema screen to provide a focal point for the gathering, and in most cases no scrolls of Torah or prophet to be read or consulted, but only the shared memories of what Jesus had said and done and shared experiences of their discipleship. Furthermore, as the community's tradition, it was not the property of any individual, to modify or develop at will. Where the tradition was important to the community, to its identity, there would be a natural concern to maintain the community-determining character of the tradition through all its varied performances.<sup>31</sup>

---

<sup>29</sup> K. E. Bailey, “Informal Controlled Oral Tradition and the Synoptic Gospels,” Asia Journal of Theology 5 (1991): 34–54; also “Middle Eastern Oral Tradition and the Synoptic Gospels,” ExpTim 106 (1995): 363–367.

<sup>30</sup> I draw here on my “Altering the Default Setting: Re-envisaging the Early Transmission of the Jesus Tradition,” NTS 49 (2003): 139–175 (here 150–155); repr. in A New Perspective on Jesus, 79–125.

3. At the same time it is also important to note that an oral community designates or recognizes particular individuals to bear the main responsibility (on behalf of the community) to retain and recite the community tradition as appropriate on occasions when the community came together. In the absence of dictionaries or encyclopedias, the bard, or apostle, or elder, or teacher would serve as the community's resource, the storage cistern for the community's reserves of story and wisdom built up and handed down over the years.<sup>32</sup> Luke almost certainly has this sort of thing in mind when he refers to "the apostles' teaching" in Acts 2:42. And the prominence of teachers (e.g. Acts 13:1; Rom 12:7; 1 Cor 12:28–29; Gal 6:6; Jas 3:1) and of tradition (e.g. Phil 4:9; Col 2:6–8; 1 Thess 4:1; 2 Thess 3:6) in the earliest communities points clearly in the same direction. For the 'tradition' would be the particular responsibility of the 'teachers,' and since it was the Jesus tradition which really marked out the assemblies of the first disciples, a large part of that responsibility must have included the rehearsal and performance of the Jesus tradition at such assemblies.

4. In the performance of oral tradition we find a characteristic combination of stability and diversity, of fixity and flexibility. In the words of E. A. Havelock, "Variability and stability, conservatism and creativity,

---

<sup>31</sup> Although I entitle my study of Jesus Jesus Remembered, my interest here and in that volume is in the way the tradition of Jesus emerged, not in theories of 'collective or social memory.' For interaction with Bengt Holmberg and Samuel Byrskog on the latter subject I may refer to my response to their critiques of Jesus Remembered in "On History, Memory and Eyewitnesses," JSNT 26 (2004): 473–487.

<sup>32</sup> E.g., E. A. Havelock, The Muse Learns to Write: Reflections on Orality and Literacy from Antiquity to the Present (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1986), speaks of an oral "encyclopedia" of social habit and custom-law and convention (57–58).

evanescence and unpredictability all mark the pattern of oral transmission—the “oral principle of ‘variation within the same.’”<sup>33</sup> There is the same story, or the story of the same event; it is the same teaching, in substance at least; but the telling of the story, or the repeating of the teaching may be very diverse, the diversity determined by such factors as the circumstances of the occasion, or by the desire of the teacher to bring out a particular emphasis or point. A modern parallel is the punch-line joke—itsself as near as we may be able to come to modern experience of oral tradition. The build-up to the punch line can be wholly diverse, but if the joke is to ‘work,’ the punch line has to be ‘word-perfect’ and delivered with due attention to the timing. And this is what we find repeatedly in the synoptic tradition of Jesus’ mission: the same story, but told differently, and often with inconsequential difference of detail; the same teaching, but often in different wording and set in different contexts. It is this feature of the synoptic tradition which has always intrigued me about the Jesus tradition, and I have found no better explanation for it than in terms of performance variation, “variation within the same.”<sup>34</sup>

5. A final important characteristic of orally performed tradition is that there is no original version equivalent to an original edition of a written text. That there was an originating event in the mission of Jesus, or a particular teaching which he gave, I have no doubt, at least in most cases. But the witnesses would have seen and heard differently; the event or words would have impacted them differently. And their reporting or sharing of that impact would have been different. So there probably would not have been a single original version of any specific tradition; original/originating event is not to be confused with original report of the event. And if Jesus had given the same teaching or parable more than once, and in different terms (one thinks, for example, of the parable of the talents/pounds—Matt 25:14–30/Luke 19:11–27), then there may never have been a single original/originating form of words. The immediate corollary has extensive repercussions. For it at once indicates that the search for an original version, as though that alone was ‘authentic’ or ‘historical,’ is misguided. Likewise, diverse forms of particular traditions are in principle not a problem, they do not constitute a 'contradiction,' they are not proof that the tradition has (been) developed away from 'the true.' On the contrary, they probably represent well the ways in which the Jesus tradition was performed in disciple groups and churches, and from the first.

---

<sup>33</sup> W. H. Kelber, The Oral and the Written Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983), 33, 54; quoting E. A. Havelock, Preface to Plato (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1963), 92, 147, 184, passim.

<sup>34</sup> Examples in my “Altering the Default Setting,” 160–169, and throughout Jesus Remembered.

What I envisage, then, for the beginning of the Jesus tradition, is that those whose lives were transformed by the impact of Jesus' mission, who became disciples, including those who did not literally follow Jesus, would have shared their experiences when they came together, talking among themselves. In such gatherings the impact made by what Jesus did and said would have been put into words, and the oral tradition of these doings and teachings would thus begin to take shape—essentially the shape which it still has in its enduring form. As already noted above, the enduring forms of so much of Jesus' teaching still bear the stamp of his Galilean mission, prior to the climax in Jerusalem. That stamp must have been given to it in such disciple gatherings, no doubt with the chief disciples (the twelve) having a prominent say in the basic shaping of the tradition. And no doubt the performance tradition after Jesus' departure would have become more varied. But if I am right, the tradition was varied from the first, and the variations which have been preserved in the now-written texts seem again and again to be no different in kind from the variations which we can safely hypothesize as characteristic of the performance tradition from the first.

In other words, it is possible to penetrate back into the oral period of the Jesus tradition. For the bridge being pushed over the gulf does not come only from one side. The impact made by Jesus on the disciples, and expressed more or less from the beginning in oral tradition, means that the bridge can in effect be constructed from the other side as well. So long as we do not allow ourselves to be enticed and misled by the will-o'-the-wisp of an 'original version,' and are content with recognizing a clear but diverse impression made by Jesus still evident in the tradition as we now have it, then we can be much more confident than before of gaining a clear sight of the one who made that impression.

Protest 3

My third protest is against the working assumption that the Quest must look for a Jesus who was distinctive or different from his environment. Not only would 'the historical Jesus,' it was assumed, be different from 'the Christ of faith,' but he must also and nevertheless have stood out from his fellows. Now, I do not wish to play down the distinctiveness of Jesus. That Jesus made a distinctive impact is my own first proposal, an impact attested in the content and character of the Jesus tradition itself. But the assumption to which I object here is that only if Jesus can be distinguished from his context is he worthy of our attention (he cannot surely have been just another Jewish teacher); only if his message was different from that of other teachers can we be sure we have the authentic voice of Jesus (and not just the accumulated wisdom of Jewish sages).

This assumption has in part been a sad corollary to Christianity's long and disgraceful history of anti-Semitism. Until recently, Christian biblical scholarship simply reflected that anti-Jewish tendency, by consistently downplaying or denigrating the continuity between Jesus and his native Judaism. As Susannah Heschel observes, liberal theologians painted "as negative a picture as possible of first-century Judaism" in order "to elevate Jesus as a unique religious figure who stood in sharp opposition to his Jewish surroundings."<sup>35</sup> A classic example is Ernest Renan, who wrote: "Fundamentally there was nothing Jewish about Jesus"; after visiting Jerusalem, Jesus "appears no more as a Jewish reformer, but as a destroyer of Judaism... Jesus was no longer a Jew."<sup>36</sup> And Albrecht Ritschl drew a line in the sand, which was not decisively questioned for most of the twentieth century, when he pronounced that Jesus' "renunciation of Judaism and its law... became a sharp dividing line between his teachings and those of the Jews."<sup>37</sup> The neo-liberal quest of the last two decades has not been so brash in its anti-Judaism. But a guiding presumption that Jesus was not, could not have been, influenced by Jewish apocalyptic thought, and a tendency to align him more with Hellenistic Cynic critique of establishment ethos and religiosity, produced a not greatly different result—a Jesus more recognizable by (and acceptable to) those concerned to find a non-particularist philosophy and life-style.<sup>38</sup>

---

<sup>35</sup> S. Heschel, Abraham Geiger and the Jewish Jesus (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998), here 9, 21. See also H. Moxnes, "Jesus the Jew: Dilemmas of Interpretation," in Fair Play: Diversity and Conflicts in Early Christianity: Festschrift H. Räisänen, ed. I. Dunderberg et al. (Leiden: Brill, 2002), 83–103.

<sup>36</sup> Heschel, Abraham Geiger, 156–157.

<sup>37</sup> Ibid., 123.

<sup>38</sup> Notably B. L. Mack, A Myth of Innocence: Mark and Christian Origins (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); and J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: Harper, 1991).

My own much used example of the dismaying trend to distance Jesus from his Jewish context is the word Spätjudentum; this was a common way of referring to the Judaism of Jesus' time well into the second half of the twentieth century, and it still occurs in some German textbooks. Why should late Second Temple Judaism be described as 'late Judaism'? It is not simply that the term is ridiculous, in view of Judaism's continuing history; if first-century Judaism is 'late Judaism,' what on earth do we call twentieth or twenty-first century Judaism?! But the issue is much more serious than a verbal faux pas. For the term actually encapsulates Christianity's historic denigration of Judaism. It expresses the theological view that Judaism's function was solely to prepare for the coming of Christ, of Christianity. As soon as Christ came, Judaism's role was complete. As soon as Christianity was established, Judaism was finished. Hence late Judaism, for from that perspective first-century Judaism was the last Judaism! The protest at this point is long overdue.

A second working assumption follows. If first-century Judaism was so marked by false religiosity, legalism and hypocrisy, if it was merely preparatory for the climactic revelation which came through Jesus, then the Jesus whom the Quest should be looking for would be different from that; he would stand out against his environment. Hence the concern of the Quest, as renewed in the 1950's, to find a distinctive Jesus. This working assumption came to particular expression in the criterion of dissimilarity.<sup>39</sup> To be recognized as a saying which derived from Jesus, the saying had to show itself dissimilar from first-century Judaism; the logic being that a saying which expressed concerns typical of Judaism might have been derived from Judaism; the assumption being that to be recognizable at all, Jesus had to be distinctive. In consequence the Quest majored on finding particular sayings which could not be attributed either to Judaism or to the later church(es), and which therefore stood out as different, or which would have been too embarrassing for Jew or Christian to attribute to Jesus had he himself not uttered it.<sup>40</sup>

Hence the typical concern of the second questers to find some saying which would meet this criterion and which could serve as the sure base on which to build a convincing reconstruction of the historical

---

<sup>39</sup> Classically defined by N. Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (London: SCM, 1967), 39.

<sup>40</sup> The criterion of embarrassment has been given some prominence by J. P. Meier, The Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, vol. 1 (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 168–171.

Jesus. Since the kingdom of God and son of man motifs are so well embedded in the Jesus tradition, a typical objective in the second half of the twentieth century was to find which saying was most secure, and to build out from that. Good examples from the post-Bultmannian generation were the assumption of H. E. Tödt and Ferdinand Hahn that Luke 12:8–9 was the most secure of the Son of Man sayings,<sup>41</sup> Werner Kümmel's argument that Mark 9:1 clearly indicated Jesus' expectation that the coming of the kingdom was imminent,<sup>42</sup> and Heinz Schürmann's conclusion that the Lord's prayer for the kingdom to come (Matt 6:10/Luke 11:2) is the surest way into Jesus' understanding of the kingdom.<sup>43</sup> But the whole attempt was wrong-headed in that a single saying or motif could never provide a sufficiently substantial base on which to build a substantive reconstruction of Jesus' message. It was like building an inverted pyramid, with a resultant and unavoidable tendency for the construction to topple over at the first probing of the base. Or to change the metaphor, the claims and counter-claims regarding different sayings were always liable to lead the Quest into a quagmire from which it would be difficult to extricate itself.<sup>44</sup>

Proposal 3

Once again in direct contrast, my proposal is that the quest of the historical Jesus should come at the task from a different angle.

In the first place we should look first of all for the Jewish Jesus rather than the non-Jewish Jesus. This does not mean that we should make the opposite assumption that Jesus' mission was wholly in conformity with the Judaism of his day. Controversies with at least some Pharisees are a prominent theme in the Jesus tradition, and Jesus was crucified with

---

<sup>41</sup> H. E. Tödt, The Son of Man in the Synoptic Tradition (1963; ET: London: SCM, 1965), 42, 55–60; F. Hahn, Christologische Hoheitstitel: Ihre Geschichte im frühen Christentum (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1963; 1995), 24–26, 32–42, 457–458. A. Vögtle, Die 'Gretchenfrage' des Menschensohnproblems, QD 152 (Freiburg: Herder, 1994), continued to regard Luke 12:8–9 as the key to unlocking the problem of 'the Son of Man.'

<sup>42</sup> W. G. Kümmel, "Eschatological Expectation in the Proclamation of Jesus," in The Future of our Religious Past: Festschrift R. Bultmann, ed. J. M. Robinson (ET: London: SCM, 1971), 29–48 (here 39–41).

<sup>43</sup> H. Schürmann, Gottes Reich—Jesu Geschick: Jesu ureigener Tod im Licht seiner Basileia-Verkündigung (Freiburg: Herder, 1983), 135, 144.

<sup>44</sup> I echo a comment to the same effect of E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985), 131.

at least the acquiescence of the Jewish authorities. But against that we must recall that Jesus was brought up as a pious Jew in Galilee, reciting the Shema, observing the Sabbath, attending the synagogue, respecting the Torah. The a priori that Jesus belonged within Judaism is a more secure starting point for any quester than the assumption that he must have differed from Judaism. On this point I am wholly at one with what I regard as the main thrust of the so-called 'third quest of the historical Jesus,' as illustrated, for example, by the work of E. P. Sanders, James Charlesworth and N. T. Wright.<sup>45</sup> The old question, 'Was Jesus the last Jew or the first Christian?', speaks not only of the traditional Christian denigration of Judaism ('the last Jew'), but also forces the question into an unnatural polarization which is neither historical nor helpful in the Quest. The points of continuity are as important as the points of discontinuity and their importance for Christian self-understanding as well as for Jewish/Christian relations should not be ignored.

In the second place, we would be much wiser to seek out the characteristic Jesus, rather than the distinctive Jesus.<sup>46</sup> The logic here is straightforward: any material within the gospels which is characteristic through and across the gospels is likely to reflect characteristic features of Jesus' own mission. It is, of course, quite possible that particular elements within the Jesus tradition, or particular stylistic features reflect the way the tradition was performed and retold by some highly influential apostle or teacher. But motifs, emphases and stylistic features which run throughout the tradition in the various branches which have come down to us or which we can still discern are most obviously to be attributed to a single originating or shaping force. And the only real candidate for that role is Jesus himself. Here my proposal obviously ties back into the first two, since what we are obviously talking about is the characteristic impact made by Jesus on those who initially formulated and began to pass on the tradition of Jesus' mission.

It is not at all difficult to nominate the features of the characteristic Jesus as reflected in the characteristic motifs of the Jesus tradition. Characteristic forms, best exemplified by parables and aphoristic sayings, most probably reflect Jesus' own style; whatever else he did, he was a parabolist, a teacher of wisdom. Characteristic (and distinctive) idioms, such as “Amen” and “son of man,” most likely reflect Jesus’ own speech mannerisms. Characteristic motifs like the “kingdom of God” and exorcisms most probably reflect characteristic emphases of Jesus’ own preaching and activity.<sup>47</sup> It would be flying in the face of all historical probability to doubt that Jesus spoke in parables or had a well founded reputation as a successful exorcist. The phrase “the son of man” is so distinctive of Jesus’ speech that it beggars belief to argue, as some have, that the whole idiom was retrojected into the Jesus tradition—and that, ex hypothesi, by a community which otherwise shows no evident interest in the term! Likewise the attempt to play off one emphasis in the kingdom of God tradition against the other, the kingdom as already present and the kingdom as yet to come, flies in the face of the deep-rootedness of both emphases in the Jesus tradition, and tells us more about modern impatience with emphases which we find hard to reconcile than proper respect for characteristic features of the Jesus tradition.

---

<sup>45</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism; J. H. Charlesworth, Jesus within Judaism: New Light from Exciting Archaeological Discoveries (New York: Doubleday, 1988); N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (London: SPCK, 1996).

<sup>46</sup> I here follow the advice of L. E. Keck, A Future for the Historical Jesus (Nashville: Abingdon, 1971), 33.

Recognition that a characteristic theme in the synoptic tradition is best seen as reflecting a characteristic theme of Jesus’ mission does not mean that every element in that theme is an unelaborated memory of Jesus’ teaching and activity. A characteristic motif is likely to have been extended in the retellings of the tradition, precisely because it was characteristic. The historical value of a characteristic feature of the Jesus tradition will not depend on the historicity of particular sayings or narratives. At the same time, the fact that a particular saying or action attributed to Jesus belongs to a characteristic feature of the tradition of Jesus’ mission increases the probability that the particular item does record something that Jesus said or did. That is to say, the burden of proof shifts against those who insist on approaching every element of the Jesus tradition with a systematic scepticism. Nor, contrariwise, does my proposal imply that we can be wholly confident of the detail of what Jesus said or did in any specific teaching or event. Bearing in mind my earlier proposals, it is important to remember that what we see of Jesus, we can see only through the eyes of diverse witnesses, and that what we hear of Jesus we can hear only with the ears of assemblies who listened to such retellings and recitals of the Jesus tradition.

---

<sup>47</sup> For fuller details I refer in each case to my Jesus Remembered: see subject index, “Parables of Jesus,” “Jesus, wisdom of,” “Amen,” “Son of Man,” “Kingdom of God,” “Jesus, exorcist.”

Nevertheless, the point of my proposal is that the characteristic emphases and motifs of the Jesus tradition give us a broad, clear and compelling picture of the characteristic Jesus.<sup>48</sup> A Jesus who called Israel to repentance and disciples to faith, one through whose ministry the blessings of God's final reign were experienced, one who was heard as speaking for God and with the authority of God, and one who antagonized the priestly authorities and was crucified by the Romans. I could go on, but hopefully enough has already been said to indicate how extensive is the portrayal of Jesus which results, a portrayal which sits firmly within the diversity of first-century Judaism, which has clear outlines and emphases, and which goes a long way to explaining how the impact of Jesus and his mission set in motion a movement whose impetus has never waned.

In conclusion, not least of value in approaching the Jesus tradition in the ways I have advocated is that we thereby gain much more of a sense of that tradition as living tradition. The memory of what Jesus said and did as formulated in the Jesus tradition was not regarded as a kind of sacred relic, to be shut up in some reliquary or encased in perspex to be venerated and carried in procession before reverent assemblies. It was their life-blood, their living breath. It enabled them to re-experience the remembered Jesus, to hear him afresh and to witness for themselves what he had said and done. It was living because they lived by it and it enabled them to live lives of discipleship.

The classic examples, which exemplify the difference between the old way of questing for Jesus and the way advocated above, are the Lord's Prayer and the words of the Last Supper. Typical of the traditional Quest is to treat these as written texts, to assume that they were known only as written texts, to separate away as much as possible of the faith which preserved these texts, to inquire after their (written) sources and the redaction which has brought them to their present shape, and to look for the distinctive features of each by setting it over against the typical features of Jewish prayer and Passover tradition. But to assume that Matthew or Luke only knew the text because they had access to a written text (Q or Mark), and had not known the words until they read them in written form, simply attests a blinkeredness of historical imagination on the part of those who cannot extricate themselves from the literary mind-set. It is much more plausible that these words were known because they were used regularly within the gatherings of Jesus' disciples from earliest days, more or less from the first as part of the embryonic liturgy by which the first churches called to memory and re-enacted two of the most important elements of the heritage passed down from Jesus. Rather than to be regarded as cadavers suitable only for clinical dissection, the differing traditions and the developing traditions, as attested not least in the manuscript tradition of these texts, should have been seen as evidence of traditions much used and much beloved, whose development still bears witness to the symbiotic relation between the living tradition and the living church. The fact that precisely these texts, the Lord's Prayer and the words of institution of the Lord's Supper, the Eucharist, continue to develop, with differing forms familiar in the various liturgies of Christian worship now current, and still with their origins in the Jesus tradition clearly recalled, simply confirms that the tradition can retain its living character without losing its roots down through many generations.

---

<sup>48</sup> C. H. Dodd, The Founder of Christianity (London: Collins, 1971), expressed my point well: "The first three gospels offer a body of sayings on the whole so consistent, so coherent, and withal so distinctive in manner, style and content, that no reasonable critic should doubt, whatever reservations he may have about individual sayings, that we find here reflected the thought of a single, unique teacher" (21–22).

This suggests in turn that those who still experience the Jesus tradition as living tradition may well be best placed to appreciate the initial stages of the traditioning process, that it is the ear of faith which is likely to hear the gospels most effectively, and that the living quality of the Jesus tradition is most likely to be experienced by those who in effect sit with these early assemblies in sharing their memories of Jesus and in seeking to live by them.<sup>49</sup>

---

<sup>49</sup> For further discussion of oral tradition in relation to the historical Jesus, see J. D. G. Dunn, "Social Memory and the Oral Jesus Tradition," in Memory in the Bible and Antiquity, ed. S. C. Barton, L. T. Stuckenbruck, and B. G. Wold, WUNT 212 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2007), 179–194; idem, "Eyewitness and the Oral Jesus Tradition," JSHJ 6 (2008): 85–105; and idem, "Kenneth Bailey's Theory of Oral Tradition: Critiquing Theodore Weeden's Critique," JSHJ 7 (2009): 44–62 (in response to T. J. Weeden, "Kenneth Bailey's Theory of Oral Tradition: A Theory Contested by Evidence" JSHJ 7 [2009]: 3–43).

JESUS-IN-CONTEXT: A RELATIONAL APPROACH

RICHARD A. HORSLEY

1. Introduction

In attempting to develop a more genuinely historical approach to Jesus of Nazareth as an historical figure in his historical context I am finding it necessary to question and often abandon some of the basic assumptions, methods, and concepts of standard theologically based New Testament scholarship. This is an uncomfortable position for one who earnestly desires to engage colleagues in critical discussion. Yet hopefully at least some of my revered colleagues will be open to some serious consideration of the implications of recent research on subjects that impinge on the historical Jesus and to some serious rethinking toward what might be more defensible historical assumptions and methods. Recent investigations of a number of interrelated subjects and issues in the history and literature of peoples under the Roman Empire are challenging us to question and in key cases abandon some of the most basic assumptions, scholarly constructs, and approaches of our academic field, biblical/New Testament studies.

In my own research and writing I have been struggling to come to grips with these recent investigations and their implication for the understanding of gospel literature as sources, the historical context of Jesus' mission, and the mission of Jesus of Nazareth. All of my recent major projects have had a dual purpose. The subject matter and issues involved in these projects are important in themselves: to acknowledge the presence of the Judean and Galilean peasants who constituted the vast majority of the populace and the distinctively Israelite renewal movements they mounted against their rulers; to examine what we do not know and might be able to know about Galilee, including from archaeological explorations as well as textual sources; to understand the earliest gospel texts, Mark's gospel and the Q speeches, in their own integrity as oral-derived texts performed in group contexts; and to understand how the Israelite tradition operated in popular oral communication as well as among scribal circles. In addition to these subjects being important in their own right, however, all of these research projects are also building-blocks toward a more comprehensive relational and contextual approach to the historical Jesus. Given the limitations of an article, I will be able only to sketch some of these components of a relational and contextual approach to the historical Jesus below, and will refer to these other projects and publications where my fuller researches and reflections can be found.<sup>1</sup>

Many involved in what has been called the “third quest” for the historical Jesus surely think of themselves as engaged in a genuinely historical inquiry by comparison with the heavily theological discussions among the Bultmannian German Lutherans of the “new quest.” If we look at the concepts in which the supposedly historical inquiry of the “third questers” is conducted, however, it is still heavily determined by Christian theology. Participants in the “quest” are now more “ecumenical” than before, since Catholics and conservative Protestants as well as liberals have joined the quest. But the terms of discussion are still Christian, indeed western Christian. This is understandable since, in the academic division of labor, study of Jesus and the Christian gospels developed as part of New Testament interpretation, a basic area of theological education. Those with a burning interest in Jesus were, also understandably, Christian theologians, clergy, and laity. Because of the western European separation of religion from politics, however, Christian theology was confined mainly to religion, and Jesus became, by definition, mainly a religious figure. In the Christian theological construction of religious history, Jesus functioned as the pivotal figure in the epoch-making shift from “Judaism,” as the parochial and overly political religion, to “Christianity,” the universal and spiritual religion. Because of the dominant influence of bourgeois individualism, Jesus was understood mainly in individual terms, compounding the Christian doctrine that he was a unique human being. Influenced, as well as placed on the defensive, by the Enlightenment rationalism that came to dominate western European culture, moreover, theologically rooted interpreters of Jesus tended to retreat from his divine derivation and miraculous actions to his teachings as the only secure basis for a “historical” Jesus who could be intelligibly discussed. Jesus’ teachings were, accordingly, abstracted from their gospel containers, like individual artifacts taken from an archaeological site and displayed in museum cases.

---

<sup>1</sup> All of my earlier projects on Jesus, the gospels, the historical context in Roman Galilee and Judea, and critical approaches to them turn out to have been building-blocks for the relational and contextual approach to the historical Jesus that I am now attempting to develop. In addition to many articles, these include the following books: Bandits, Prophets, and Messiahs: Popular Movements at the Time of Jesus, with John S. Hanson (Minneapolis, MN: Winston Press, 1985; Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1999); Jesus and the Spiral of Violence: Popular Jewish Resistance in Roman Palestine (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987); Sociology and the Jesus Movement (New York: Crossroad, 1989); Galilee: History, Politics, People (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1995); Archaeology, History, and Society in Galilee: The Social Context of Jesus and the Rabbis (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1996); Whoever Hears You Hears Me: Prophets, Performance, and Tradition in Q, with Jonathan Draper (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1999); Hearing the Whole Story: The Politics of Plot in Mark's Gospel (Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 2001); Scribes, Visionaries, and the Politics of Second Temple Judea (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 2007); and Jesus in Context: Power, People and Performance (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2008). Instead of a detailed apparatus of notes below, I will try to give appropriate short references to my pertinent fuller exploration for each section in this sketch for those who might be interested.

These key theological determinants persist in recent interpretation of “the historical Jesus” even when the discussion has become more complex and sophisticated. Jesus is still more or less confined to the religious sphere. The political-economic context in which he taught and the political implications of his teachings may be acknowledged, but little or no attention is given to a potential political role. Jesus is still discussed mainly in terms of a religious context and religious issues, those of “Judaism.” Since the jolt of the Holocaust Christian scholars are more likely to allow that Jesus was a “Jew,” but they still assume that significant historical reality in ancient Roman Judea, Samaria, and Galilee can be thought of as “Judaism.” Jesus is still understood mainly as an individual. The third quest thus perpetuates what is more of a theological quest than a genuinely historical one. Moreover, although his activity as an individual healer of individuals is discussed seriously in recent decades, Jesus is interpreted mainly as an individual teacher/revealer of individuals. This is done by focusing on the individual teachings of Jesus, individual sayings or “pericopes” taken out of literary contexts, which are the principal guides to their original social context, and displayed like artifacts to be rearranged and interpreted—by the modern “Jesus-scholar.” This procedure is, of course, still rooted in the standard way the scriptural texts of the gospels and other biblical books have long been analyzed and interpreted in New Testament studies.

None of the various “historical Jesuses” constructed by this procedure, however, can have been a historical figure in first-century Galilee. The separation of religion from other aspects of life such as politics and economics is a distinctively modern western development. Pretending that Jesus was (only) a religious figure thus tends toward an anachronistic modern reductionism and domestication. The Christian concept “Judaism” is similarly a modern Christian construction. As Jewish and Israeli historians begin to recognize the diversity of groups and the complex historical realities of Judean, Samaritan, and Galilean society under Roman rule, they must resort at least to the plural, "Judaisms," including various versions of "sectarian Judaism." Attempting to accommodate the political realities some scholars now write in terms of "nation" and "nationalism," apparently not realizing that these too are modern western developments that then spread to other regions of the world during the anti-colonial struggles. To approach Jesus as a more complete historical figure in a more complete historical context, therefore, it is necessary to shift to historically valid assumptions and by-pass or cut through standard Christian theological constructs of religion as separate from politics and economics and of Judaism. Similarly, an individualistic Jesus without at least communicative interaction with other people and genuine engagement with the historical conditions cannot have been historical. Real people, including religious revealers, do not run around uttering isolated aphorisms. Genuine communication, especially communication of lasting significance for groups of people, happens in concrete historical contexts. Figures come to have historical significance by communicating and acting in concrete historical contexts.

To begin to imagine what a more historical approach to a significant historical figure might consist of, we can look to how regular historians proceed. It is difficult to imagine historians approaching highly significant historical figures such as Abraham Lincoln or Martin Luther King or Joan of Arc as individual teachers of individuals, i.e., by focusing on their individual teachings, short statements or stories separated from literary context. To begin with, historians attempt to assess their sources critically, on their own terms in the historical situation to which they belong. Documentary/literary context and historical/social context are crucial in evaluating information given in the sources. Then, since history and historical figures are contextual and relational, we can imagine (from the historical treatments we have read and without going into details in a given case) that historians would develop a contextual and relational approach. At the risk of oversimplification, I can imagine summarizing such an approach in terms of five interrelated aspects or factors. First, there is need for significant historical leadership to emerge in highly problematic situations, in situations of historical crisis. It does not matter what the leader is "really like" as a person or precisely what s/he said in a particular place. Rather, and therefore second and third, what matters is the way the leader and followers interact such that the leader's basic/general message and/or actions resonate with followers (and perhaps generate a movement) in the crisis situation. Fourth, the interaction of leader and followers/movement, moreover, happens in terms of a particular cultural tradition out of which the leader speaks and acts and the followers resonate. Fifth, the leader and followers interact in terms of roles or offices that are determined by the historical situation and cultural tradition in which they are acting.

That is about the most concise way I can currently summarize the complex contextual and relational multidisciplinary approach I am now attempting to develop for further historical inquiry into Jesus-in-movement-in-context. If further justification is needed for making a shift away from theologically determined assumptions, concepts, and procedures towards those that are standard in general historical inquiry, the reasons and advantages are primarily three. First, continuing to use standard theological terms and discourse privileges concepts developed subsequent to the New Testament documents and diverts our understanding of the gospel sources from the historical context in which they originated. Second, taking the theological doctrine of the incarnation seriously implies that we should seek a full understanding of Jesus in concrete historical context. Accordingly, third, if we are seriously interested in approaching and reconstructing a historical figure in historical context, then we must move to the ordinary language of history.

Moving toward the ordinary language of history from theological discourse also has serious political-economic and hermeneutical implications. The more we recognize the diversity and divisions in ancient Judean and Galilean society and the imperial power relations in the Roman Empire generally, along with the political-economic-religious conflicts dramatized in the gospel sources, the more difficult it will be to domesticate the gospel sources and Jesus as if they belonged to us. Most of the scholars engaged in research on and interpretation of Jesus (as illustrated in the list of contributors to this volume) are white male western Europeans and European-Americans who, by education and income, belong to the cultural elite. As recent academic self-criticism has made clear, we have been trained in intellectual disciplines and ideologies that are the products of western European academics during the heyday of western colonialism and imperialism. Increasing recognition that the gospels are the ancient equivalent of “third world” stories about a leader among a people subject to imperial rule will make it more difficult to proceed as if the gospels and Jesus somehow belong to us. This will presumably mesh with the hermeneutical and political-religious agenda of those of us concerned to illuminate and alleviate the conditions of subject peoples. It will also, of course, make all the more important a further hermeneutical concern to explain and mediate the implications of historical research on Jesus-in-context for those heavily invested in domesticated constructions of Jesus.

Let me now sketch the complex contextual and relational approach further in four successive steps that combine some of the interrelated facets outlined just above.

2. The Problematic Historical Context

It tells us something, but not very much, when Jesus is located in a scheme of social stratification as a “peasant,” one who reached out to “expendables” further down the ladder. Besides not telling us very much, however, those classifications do as much to obscure as to explain Jesus in his historical relations. It would be more appropriate to say that generally speaking Jesus, along with those “expendables,” belonged to the (Galilean) peasantry or peasant society. Neither Jesus nor those expendables, however, were peasants strictly speaking, since they were not (or no longer) supporting themselves and rendering up a portion of their crops by working the land. How and why had they been forced off the land, yet still in interaction with those who were still working the land, may be far more significant historical information. A structural-functional approach such as that of Lenski begs the all-important question of the power relations between the productive Galilean peasantry among whom Jesus lived and worked, on the one hand, and the high priestly, Herodian, and imperial rulers whose wealth and power depended on the resources they extracted from the peasants, on the other. Schemes of social stratification, moreover, rarely ask the historical question of the changing conditions of the peasantry, whether they were able to maintain their subsistence living or were slipping under, much less ask questions about the cultural traditions according to which peasants evaluate their exploitation. Classifications of social stratification, even analyses of political-economic structure, moreover, usually do not examine fundamental social forms and the effects of historical changes impacting them. While comparative studies of political-economic structure and social forms may be helpful in posing historically appropriate questions, however, reconstruction of the conditions of and for Jesus and the movement(s) he catalyzed must be done from literary and archaeological sources for Roman Galilee and Judea in the broader context of the Roman Empire.

2.1. Political-Economic Structure (not just stratification) and Power-Relations<sup>2</sup>

Literary sources and archaeological evidence agree that the political-economic structure in which religion was embedded involved a decisive divide, indeed a gaping gulf, between the rulers and the ruled in late Second Temple (early Roman) Judea and Galilee. The increasingly magnificent mansions of the high priestly families in the Upper City of Jerusalem were funded by resources they derived from the Judean peasantry. Herod the Great funded his massive building projects, the imperial cities of Caesarea and Sebaste as well as the grandly rebuilt Temple, from taxation of his subjects. Antipas depended on revenues taken mainly from Galilean villagers to rebuild the fortress city of Sepphoris as his jewel and, within twenty years, yet another capital city dedicated to the emperor Tiberius. Josephus repeatedly reminds us how the wealthy and powerful elite despised and abused the very peasantry on whose economic exploitation their positions of power and privilege depended. It is not clear that the Herodian rulers ever enjoyed any legitimacy among Judeans and Galileans; they were “kings” by the power of Rome, not the grace of God. Also evident in Josephus is how the high priestly families steadily lost any legitimacy they might have had from occupying the august high priestly offices, partly because they were the appointees of the Herodians and Romans. When active opposition to the Jerusalem and Herodian rulers erupted, however, as at Herod’s death in 4 BCE, the Romans simply restored the imperial order by brutal force of arms.

Josephus’s accounts and several references in the gospels make clear that the Pharisees and high ranking scribes served as staff and representatives of the temple-state through which the Romans continued to “govern” and tax the Judean populace. One of their principal roles was as the “most accurate” interpreters of “the law” according to which the high priestly regime “governed” the people and extracted revenues. That the most prominent Pharisees appear as integral figures in the high priestly junta that took over control after the initial phase of the great revolt in the summer of 66 CE indicates that the Pharisees were far more than a pious eating club at the time of Jesus. It is also significant that most residents of the city of Jerusalem would have made their living serving the needs of the Temple and the high priestly families in some capacity or another. The people of Jerusalem were thus economically dependent on the Temple apparatus as the center of the Judean economy. The dynamics of their relations with the Herodian, high priestly, and Roman rulers, however, was still such that they periodically mounted protests and outright resistance.

---

<sup>2</sup> Fuller exploration of various aspects of the following section in Jesus and the Spiral; Sociology and the Jesus Movement; and Galilee.

It is thus historically reductionist and obscurantist to continue to discuss the historical Jesus in terms of his engagement with “Judaism.” That essentialist modern Christian construct simply obscures important political-economic-religious conflicts in which Jesus and his movement(s) may have been involved. It prevents us from investigating and interpreting the issues involved in Jesus’ mission and the prophetic declarations he made and actions he took. Ironically our sources are far more precise in historical terms than our conceptual apparatus often allows us to discern. Since the dominant conflict was the structural one of the power relations between rulers and ruled, it is diversionary to perpetuate the old dichotomy of cultural essentialisms, Judaism versus Hellenism. Cultural conflict was an important aspect of the dominant historical conflict, but it was embedded with and inseparable from the dominant political-economic-religious conflict. Neither Jesus and his movement(s) nor contemporary Galilean and Judean movements and groups can be understood simply as “Jewish” cultural reaction to the incursions of “Hellenistic” culture. Nor can Jesus’ mission be understood as an attempt to transcend a parochial “Jewish” culture in the direction of a more cosmopolitan and universal “Hellenistic” culture—even in its latest packaging in terms of Jesus having been a “countercultural” (Jewish) “Cynic” “sage.”

2.2. Fundamental Social (Political-Economic-Religious) Forms: Temple-State, Village, Family<sup>3</sup>

Scholars trained in theology and faithful church-goers are understandably interested primarily in the religious dimension of Jesus’ mission. But historically religion was embedded in political-economic-community life. Insofar as religion was inseparable from economics and politics, Jesus dealt with far more than religion. His focus in the Lord’s Prayer, for example, was economic, concerned with subsistence bread and the cancellation of debts. Similarly, in contrast with the individualism of modern western life, historically persons were embedded in the fundamental social forms of family and village community. Most of most people's lives were involved with production for and the reproduction of the family, ideally on the land that comprised its inheritance (a gift from God). Much of family life involved interaction with other families in village communities comprised of a smaller or larger number of families. Interaction among families involved certain modes of cooperation and mutuality as well as frequent tensions and conflicts. Cooperation in matters such as water supply and mutual support as well as tensions and conflicts were managed by local village assemblies, called synagogues in the gospels and contemporary Judean literature (knesset in rabbinic literature). These forms of local self-government and cohesion in the semi-independent village communities met once or twice a week for prayers, delegation of task-forces, e.g., to repair the water-works, and appointment of courts to settle local conflicts.

---

<sup>3</sup> Fuller exploration in Galilee and Jesus and the Spiral.

Investigation of gospel sources to understand the historical mission of Jesus depends heavily on understanding what was happening in these fundamental social forms in which the people among whom he worked lived their lives. According to the canonical gospels at least, Jesus carried out his teaching and healing in village assemblies and delegated his envoys to stay with and receive support from families while they worked expanding his mission of preaching and healing/exorcism in village communities. We would thus expect that his teaching and healing had something to do with what was happening to people's lives that were embedded in those fundamental forms of family and village.

The other basic social (political-economic-religious) form, more remote from the lives of most people, was the Temple in Jerusalem. Most basically the Temple, along with the priesthood, was the institution at the center of the religious political-economy of Judea (and at times other areas of Palestine), to which the people were expected to give their tithes and offerings. The Temple and the pilgrimage festivals celebrated there also supposedly provided symbols and expressions of the unity of the Judean (and more widely the Israelite) people. Practically, physically, of course, only a fraction of the Judean people could participate in any one of the festivals at one time. And the vast majority of what went on in the Temple sanctuary, the daily sacrifices and offerings, was ritual witnessed only by the priests who conducted the rituals. Nevertheless, the people, including often at least some Judean peasants from nearby villages as well as Jerusalemites, cared enough about what went on in the Temple to protest vociferously and repeatedly. Although we have little evidence for earlier, from at least the time that Jesus took action in the Temple, popular protest and serious conflict was ever more frequent and beyond the capacity of the priestly aristocracy and even the Roman governor and his military to control easily. As noted, the high priestly incumbents, initially put in place by Herod and then appointed by the Roman governors, increasingly lost their legitimacy. And, of course, Herod had begun the massive rebuilding of the Temple in grand Roman-Hellenistic style, at great cost to the peasantry. A significant indicator of the increasing opposition to the high priestly incumbents was the emergence at mid-century of a terrorist group (the sicarii) among scribes and teachers who supposedly worked for and represented the temple-state. They began assassinating high priestly figures during festival times, apparently to counter their collaboration with the Roman authorities and abuse of the people. But they are only extreme activists in a more general sense of disillusionment with the Temple and its incumbent high priestly families. Most Judean literature in late second temple times is sharply critical of the high priests and, to a degree, of the Temple itself.

Clearly it makes little sense to continue to think in terms of “Judaism,” as if there were a unitary “religion” in which “the Jews” all participated. Nor does it make any sense to think of some sort of Jewish “nationalism,” or to think of the high priests as “leaders.” At the time of Jesus, the temple high priesthood did not unite the people—unless it was against their illegitimacy and predatory behavior. Nevertheless, Jerusalem and the Temple had become the symbolic center or “capital” of Judea and, to a degree, Israel, even if that symbol worked ambiguously for a people who viewed it ambivalently. Perhaps the most obvious conclusion to draw from this brief sketch of political-economic-religious structure, power-relations, and basic social forms in Roman Palestine is that we need to understand how historical developments impacted the basic social forms in which people’s lives were embedded such that anyone would be interested in a preacher and healer such as Jesus. After all, with all due respect to Albert Schweitzer, John the Baptist’s and Jesus’ visions of divine judgment and the kingdom of God did not just come “out of the blue” by otherworldly inspiration, but also in response to problematic circumstances that set up intolerable tensions and discontents, and yearning for restoration as well as revelation.

2.3. Historical Developments—Including Regional Differences between Galilee and Judea<sup>4</sup>

The historical developments that conceivably make the greatest difference for how we investigate and understand Jesus and his mission concern the distinctive history of Galilee in second temple times, a history that is related to but different from that of Judea and Jerusalem. Merely to acknowledge the reality of that different history raises numerous questions that have heretofore gone unasked as well as unanswered. For example, since the Holocaust, Christian scholars have finally been more willing to think of Jesus as a “Jew,” as belonging to “Jewish society.” Besides being vague, however, those are problematic terms historically. As indicated again and again in the histories of Josephus, Jesus’ contemporaries of Israelite heritage who lived in Palestine apparently thought of themselves and each other in more regional terms: Judeans, Samaritans, and Galileans (perhaps somewhat as many residents of the UK think of themselves as English, Scottish, Welch, etc). Outsiders such as the Romans apparently thought of all in the area (previously) ruled by Herod the Great as “Judeans”—hence executed Jesus of Nazareth as “king of the Judeans.” The high priests in Mark, on the other hand, mock him as “king of Israel,” which usage meshes with the later rabbis, who understand the people generally as “Israel.” If we trust our gospel sources, including legends of infancy, Jesus was known to be from Nazareth, a village near Sepphoris, and to have carried out much of his mission among Galileans. He was thus not a Judean proper, but a Galilean. And that is no insignificant piece of information if we attend to the different regional history of Galilee during second temple times.

Galilee and Galileans were presumably independent of Jerusalem rule for many centuries, supposedly from the time that the ten northern tribes rebelled against the Davidic monarchy in 922 BCE until the Hasmonean high priestly regime took over the area a hundred years before Jesus was born. That is, Galileans had cultural traditions of rebellion and independence from Jerusalem rule. Galileans were not under the Jerusalem temple-state established by the Persian regime, presumably had no direct exposure to scrolls of Judean literature (such as the books of the Torah and Prophets) composed by scribal circles of the temple state at some point under the Persian or Hellenistic empires, and did not participate in the Maccabean revolt that became a watershed event for many Judeans in the early second century BCE. According to the only evidence available, only after the Hasmoneans conquered the Idumeans to the south and the Samaritans to the north, did they expel the Itureans from Galilee and force the inhabitants “to live according to the laws of the Judeans” (in 104 BCE). Galileans remained under Jerusalem rule during the chaotic decades of Alexander Jannaeus’s foreign conquests and brutal suppression of domestic revolts, and the prolonged attempts by the Romans to quash civil war among rival Hasmoneans. They resisted Herod’s conquest of his realm for three years. And they joined in the widespread revolts at the death of Herod in 4 BCE. Thereupon the Romans appointed Herod Antipas as ruler of Galilee. Galilee was thus no longer under the direct jurisdiction of the Jerusalem temple-state during the lifetime of Jesus.

---

<sup>4</sup> On various aspects of the following section see the relevant chapters of Galilee; Bandits, Prophets, and Messiahs; Jesus and the Spiral; and the more recent treatment in Horsley, Jesus and Empire: The Kingdom of God and the New World Disorder (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2003).

Galileans had thus been drawn under the same Jerusalem rule as their Israelite cousins in Samaria and Judea. This may well have revived and enhanced their sense of belonging to the people of Israel. Yet Galileans, living at considerable distance from Jerusalem, could hardly have participated much in the pilgrimage festivals celebrated in the Temple. During the chaotic decades of Jerusalem rule prior to Herod the Great, moreover, it is quite unclear how the Jerusalem authorities would have “socialized” Galileans in the semi-autonomous village communities into “the laws of the Judeans.” It seems difficult to imagine that Galileans would have developed much of an attachment to the Temple and the scrolls of the written Torah during the century prior to the birth of Jesus. These historical events and circumstances, however, provoke the question (to be addressed briefly below) of just what the cultural tradition of the Galileans may have been and how it may have been related to that embodied in the proto-scriptural scrolls laid up in the Temple in Jerusalem or left in jars in caves by the Qumranites in the Judean wilderness. They should also provoke the question of why, when Galilee was no longer under the jurisdiction of the Temple, Jesus would have marched up to Jerusalem to confront the Temple authorities, as portrayed at least in the canonical gospels.

The next most important historical development for understanding Jesus’ mission is surely the Roman conquest and imperial rule of Galilee and Judea, for two major reasons. While initially not all that destructive, repeated Roman attempts to “pacify” Judea and Galilee wrought considerable destruction of villages, slaughter and enslavement of the populace, and further terrorization of the remaining people by crucifixion of rebel leaders. Recent genocide in Bosnia and Kosovo has heightened our sensitivity to the lasting effects of collective trauma such as that wrought by Roman armies in the region of Magdala in 53–52 BCE and that of Sepphoris in 4 BCE, i.e., precisely areas of Jesus' origin and activity.

The lasting effects of repeated Roman and Herodian conquest, moreover, were compounded by the disintegrative effects of economic pressures on families and village communities, the basic social forms in which people's lives were embedded and supported. Once the Hasmonean regime had freed the Jerusalem high priesthood from obligation for imperial tribute, Judeans and subsequently Galileans as well remained subject to only one layer of rulers and taxation. The Roman conquest brought a second layer and the demand for tribute on top of tithes and offerings to the Temple. The Roman appointment of Herod the Great then in effect established a third layer of rulers and taxes, since Herod maintained the Temple and high priesthood intact as instruments of his rule. Multiple layers of rulers and their demands for revenues would have placed serious pressures on the ability of families to reproduce themselves while also satisfying the demands of multiple layers of rulers for revenues.

These effects of multiple layers of rulers and taxation were further compounded in Galilee by the Roman imperial imposition of Antipas. For the first time in their history, Galileans now had their ruler living directly in Galilee, and not at considerable distance. That greatly enhanced the ability of the regime to collect taxes efficiently from the villages of Galilee, nearly every one of which was within sight of one of Antipas's new capital cities. And Antipas needed every measure of grain, oil, and wine he could extract from his Galilean and Perea subjects to fund those massive building projects engineered within the first twenty years of his reign and Jesus' lifetime. Economic conditions of the Galilean peasantry must have been deteriorating more steadily under Antipas than under his father, generating precisely the indebtedness and hunger that Jesus seems to presuppose and address in many gospel traditions. Is it conceivable that working toward greater precision on historical developments at the time of Jesus might enable us to address questions such as why Jesus' mission and the emergence of Jesus movement(s) occurred just at the time and in the place they did?—as well as, of course, questions that we have already raised but cannot yet answer adequately, such as how Jesus' teaching and activities address the circumstances of Galileans' lives?

From the “underside” of history, where Jesus and his movement were located, as the people’s response to imperial invasion and the disintegrative effects of the imperial impact, came repeated popular resistance unmatched elsewhere in the Roman Empire. It could easily be argued that what was driving history in Roman Palestine in the period around the time of Jesus was not the ruling elite who usually comprise the subject of history, but the resistance to the imperial order by popular revolts and movements, with the elite regularly in the position of reacting to popular initiatives. The period is framed by widespread popular revolts in the Maccabean Revolt, the revolts against Herod in 40–37 and again in 4 BCE, prior to Jesus’ mission and movement, and the great revolt of 66–70 and the Bar Kokhba Revolt afterwards. During and in between those revolts occurred many popular movements, including the many that took one of the two distinctively Israelite forms of “prophetic movements” and “messianic movements.” Thus Jesus and his movement(s) must be understood to belong to a period of extensive and intensive resistance to the Roman imperial order in Judea and Galilee. The movements of distinctively Israelite form and their leaders, moreover, may offer important cases of similar responses to the same circumstances for a basis of potentially helpful comparison and contrast. Furthermore, these movements may provide evidence for the cultural pattern(s) adapted by Jesus and his movement(s).<sup>5</sup>

3. Cultural Context and Tradition

Roman imperial rule, including that of the Herodian and high priestly aristocracy, was not merely a matter of Roman military might and brutality. And popular resistance in revolts and movements was not motivated solely by the poverty and hunger of the people. Both domination and resistance had important cultural dimensions and motivations. Recent researches in several related connections, however, have pulled the rug out from under previous assumptions that Israelite cultural tradition can be directly accessed by merely reading the books of the Hebrew Bible. It has simply been assumed that “the Jews” were a “people of the book,” that most were literate, and that they had access to a stable written text of “the Law and the Prophets.” Those assumptions have all now proven to be ungrounded. Many of the basic assumptions, concepts, and approaches of biblical studies in general and our approach to the gospels and “the Law and the Prophets” as sources and to how we move from texts to the historical Jesus have been thrown into question or simply rendered obsolete.

---

<sup>5</sup> See further Hearing the Whole Story, ch. 10.

3.1. Orality and Literacy<sup>6</sup>

As a few pioneers in New Testament studies have pointed out in the last few decades, communication in ancient Galilee, Samaria, and Judea, as in the Roman Empire generally, was predominantly oral. Wider recent research now makes this unavoidably clear. Literacy in the Roman Empire was confined to about 15% of the population, with a far lower rate in rural areas. Contrary to older assumptions about “the Jews” being a “people of the book,” the literacy rate in Judea and Galilee was far less, perhaps less than 10% or 5%. Villagers, who were the vast majority of the populace, had little need for literacy, which was confined largely to scribal circles. Scrolls, which were extremely cumbersome and expensive, therefore relatively rare, were deposited in the Temple, with some in the possession of scribal groups. But, as recent research is explaining, even scribal circles, such as the Pharisees, the Qumran yahad, and the rabbis, cultivated their most cherished “texts” orally. They did not so much read from the text inscribed on scrolls as recite from the same text “inscribed” on memory. And texts were memorized by oral recitation, somewhat as described in later rabbinic texts.

3.2. The Multiformity and Instability of the (Proto-)Scriptures<sup>7</sup>

Given that both literacy and the availability of written texts were limited and confined mainly to elite scribal circles it is perhaps not surprising to learn that the written text of the books that only later were canonized as the Hebrew scripture was still multiform, unstable, and developing in late Second Temple times. Close examination of the scrolls of books of the Pentateuch and the Prophets found among the Dead Sea Scrolls concludes that such texts still co-existed in multiple versions none of which had yet come to be stabilized in wording. In addition to the variant versions of the Pentateuch and Prophets still circulating among scribal circles, also found at Qumran were different versions of Torah, alternative law-books that are not simply “rewritten Torah,” such as the Temple Scroll and 4QMMT. It is thus clear that the Hebrew scripture had not yet come into any stabilized form and written text. Different versions of Israelite cultural tradition clearly still coexisted and perhaps competed, even in elite scribal circles.

---

<sup>6</sup> See further the important researches in William V. Harris, Ancient Literacy (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1989); Catherine Hezser, Jewish Literacy in Roman Palestine (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001); Martin Jaffee, Torah in the Mouth (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001); Jesus in Context, chs. 3, 4; the implications for Q and Mark are drawn in Whoever Hears You Hears Me and Hearing the Whole Story.

<sup>7</sup> See especially Eugene Ulrich, The Dead Sea Scrolls and the Origins of the Bible (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1999); implications for late second-temple times in Scribes, Visionaries, chs. 5, 6.

3.3. Popular Tradition and Elite Tradition

There was thus no stable text of the Hebrew scriptures, much less scrolls available and the ability to read them available to the peasantry at the time of Jesus. This is compounded for Galilean villagers who were not even introduced to “the laws of the Judeans” until a hundred years before Jesus’ birth. Their lack of literacy, however, does not mean that peasants are ignorant, that they lack cultural tradition. Peasants of Israelite heritage, Galileans as well as Judeans, were deeply rooted in their cultural tradition. We can discern Israelite tradition’s formative role in the emergence of several movements that were all in various ways patterned after the same memories of earlier acts of deliverance led by Moses and Joshua or modeled on the acclamation of the young David as the messiah to lead the people’s resistance to outside rulers.

To begin to understand how Galilean and Judean villagers were rooted in Israelite tradition it may help to adapt a distinction developed by anthropologists and sociologists to understand similar societies in which the ordinary people and the elite have different versions of their cultural tradition. I have found most helpful a suggestive theoretical and cross-cultural study by James C. Scott that explains how peasants in many different areas of the world cultivate and act out of what he and others call “little traditions,” which differ in varying degrees from the “great traditions” cultivated by their rulers. The “little tradition” is comprised by the distinctive patterns of belief and behavior valued by the peasantry, while the “great tradition” is the corresponding patterns among the society’s elite, sometimes embodied in written documents.<sup>8</sup>

In a society such as Second Temple Judea these variant traditions were parallel, with considerable overlap and considerable interaction. What we know as the books of the Pentateuch and the Deuteronomic history had taken up stories, victory songs, “common law,” and legends that had originally been cultivated among the Israelite peasantry, such as ancestral narratives, exodus legends, the Song of Deborah and stories of Elijah and Elisha. Insofar as a “book of the law” may well have been, at points, recited aloud to the people assembled in the Temple courtyard, law-codes and histories composed in scribal circles would, in turn, have reached and influenced villagers. As Josephus explains and an episode in Mark reflects, one of the responsibilities of the Pharisees was to promulgate rulings not written in the books of Moses, rulings that, depending on their relations with the high priesthood, were included in the state law of the temple-state. “The laws of the Judeans” imposed on the Galileans by the Hasmonean regime and the scrolls of the various textual traditions of the Pentateuch left behind by the scribal-priestly community at Qumran should be understood as partial embodiments of the Judean great tradition based in Jerusalem. The little tradition, even more pluriform, since cultivated orally over a long span of generations in village communities, would have focused on memories important to the people’s cultural identity, struggles for subsistence, and conduct of local community life. The many local customs mentioned in passing in rabbinic literature are probably reflections of the latter. Judean villagers, having lived for centuries under the official tradition (“laws of the Judeans”) sponsored by the Jerusalem temple-state, would have been relatively better acquainted with it. Galilean villagers, having come under Hasmonean rule and “the laws of the Judeans” only a hundred years prior to the birth of Jesus, would have been relatively less acquainted with the great tradition based in Jerusalem. But the Galileans apparently were solidly grounded in the Mosaic covenant and its principles. My close examination of the incidents in Josephus previously claimed as evidence of the “Torah” in Galilee showed instead that the Galileans in each of these cases were acting to defend one of the basic “commandments” of the Mosaic covenant, not more focused rulings of scribally composed law codes included in the Pentateuch.<sup>9</sup>

---

<sup>8</sup> James C. Scott, “Protest and Profanation: Agrarian Revolt and the Little Tradition,” Theory and Society 4 (1977): 3–32, 159–210; implications for ancient Judean texts and Jesus in context in Scribes, Visionaries, chs. 4, 5, 6; Whoever Hears You Hears Me, ch. 5; and Jesus in Context, chs. 3, 7, 10.

Because much of the popular (little) version of Israelite tradition paralleled and overlapped with the official (great) version based in Jerusalem, the differences would have resided in the way events or stories or celebrations were understood and acted upon. For example, the celebration of the exodus from bondage in Egypt in the Passover festival had long since been centralized in Jerusalem. For the high priests and their representatives this celebration functioned as a way of centralizing revenues in Jerusalem, unifying the people by focusing celebration of their legend of origins on the Temple, and maintaining order in the society. But for the ordinary people who went up to the Temple for the festival, judging from Josephus's accounts, the celebration focused their attention on liberation from foreign rule, and often led to demonstrations that threatened to get out of control. In response the Roman governors posted Roman soldiers on the porticoes of the Temple courtyard—which would only have exacerbated the conflict between the popular celebration of their past liberation from foreign rule and the threatening presence of armed foreign troops above their heads to maintain order in the ruling institution now backed by their foreign rulers (Ant. 20.108).

---

<sup>9</sup> Galilee, 147–157.

Since there was no stable and standardized written scripture yet and since both literacy and written scrolls would have been rare among popular movements, it seems unwarranted to continue thinking of our gospel sources as “quoting” or “interpreting” scripture. Yet the existence of “scripture” in the Temple or in scribal circles, even particular books, was known among popular circles, even if they did not have access to or knowledge of the precise written text. The rich allusions and references to great cultural heroes and heroines, famous places, memorable events, and prophetic oracles in (oral-derived) gospel texts such as Mark and Q, however, can be understood instead in terms of the continuing interaction between great and little traditions. This enables us to discern how Israelite tradition was being contested, between “the scribes and Pharisees” on the one hand, and the stories and speeches of Jesus cultivated in communities of Jesus followers, on the other.

3.4. Cultural Patterns<sup>10</sup>

The instability of the scriptural text among scribal circles in late Second Temple times presents a startling contrast with the way we have all been trained in biblical studies. With our focus on biblical verses, “pericopes,” <sup>10</sup> See further Whoever Hears You Hears Me, esp. chs. 9–10; Hearing the Whole Story, esp. chs. 8 and 10; Bandits, Prophets, Messiahs, chs. 3–4; and Jesus in Context, chs. 6, 7.

---

Jesus “sayings,” and even more narrowly on particular words and “titles,” we are clearly working on the assumptions of print culture. Now we must recognize that our assumptions based on print culture are anachronistic and inapplicable to how Israelite tradition was operating at the time of Jesus. Prominent among the inapplicable assumptions and approaches is our focus on particular verses in particular chapters of the Bible. As indicated repeatedly in rabbinic rulings, elite literate circles (although probably working orally) appropriated their cultural tradition in separate statements, even phrases. As indicated in both rabbinic literature and in the gospels, the tradition could be referenced by adaptation of a particular proverb or line of prophecy into a new context. What we have been missing because of our focus on chapter-and-verse, however, is broader cultural patterns. The appearance of such broad cultural patterns as the Mosaic covenantal structure that are attested in certain extended passages in the Hebrew Bible (Exodus 20, Joshua 24) and then reappear, somewhat adapted, in the Community Rule and Damascus Rule from the Dead Sea Scrolls, should have alerted us. Having been trained to work with written texts we are understandably reluctant to allow any possibility outside of what is written in a text we can see. But there is no reason why people who communicate orally cannot also follow and perpetuate distinctive cultural patterns. I argued some time ago that this is what we see behind and in the popular prophetic movements and messianic movements, patterns still detectable from Josephus’s accounts of the actions taken by popular prophets and their followers. More recently I have argued that we can discern a Mosaic covenant pattern similar to that in the Community Rule in certain speeches in Q, elaborated and more obvious in Matthew’s Sermon on the Mount. It may seem like more of a stretch, but I have also suggested that in the overall plot and sequences of episodes of Mark’s story (read/heard as a whole story) we can detect adaptations of some of those same cultural patterns, of the prophetic and messianic movements and of the Mosaic covenant. Being open to broader cultural patterns underlying and implicit in the gospel sources and in contemporary Judean literature and in Judean, Samaritan, and Galilean movements corresponds closely with the shifts I believe we need to make in the way we read, or rather hear, and use gospels and gospel materials as sources for the historical Jesus (see below).

4. Leader-Follower/Movement Relations: Roles and "Scripts"<sup>11</sup>

At the center of research on and reconstruction of "the historical Jesus" has been a fundamental misunderstanding of the relationship between the gospel sources and Jesus. The gospels do not provide (reliable or unreliable) information (or a record) of what Jesus said and did, but of what resonated and continued to resonate with his followers in their performance of stories about him and representation of his speech. The gospel sources provide not evidence for Jesus himself, but rather for the effects of the interaction between Jesus and those who responded to him. The standard approach of focusing on isolated sayings or pericopes/stories in order to evaluate what might be "authentic" bits of evidence for what Jesus himself said or how he acted is inappropriately individualistic. It imposes anachronistic modern assumptions about an individual separate from social relations. It is influenced also by Christian concerns that Jesus must be a unique person, who is not constituted by (or, god-forbid) reducible to social relations. But Jesus was historically significant, and remembered and represented, only insofar as he had a particular impact on other people, who took significant historical action.

Leaders generally make a significant impact and take historical action by acting in particular roles or offices in relation to followers and/or a broader movement or society. Abraham Lincoln was not a significant historical figure merely as an Illinois farmer or lawyer. He was elected Senator and then President of the US and took significant action in that office at a time of major crisis. In the cases of popular leaders such as Jesus, they do not step into formally institutionalized office, but do step into recognized social roles. We come right to the threshold of recognizing this in New Testament studies insofar as we inquire whether Jesus was an "eschatological prophet" or was given the "title" of "messiah" or "son of man." Now the title of "President" may well have been assimilated into Lincoln's public persona during his lifetime, and certainly became part of his historical persona after his assassination. But it is important to remember that a public or historical persona is relational, indeed is constituted by interaction between the one who serves in the office or acts in the role and the followers. It is not particularly significant historically that Jesus may have uttered a certain saying. Significant is that his speech or action resonated with followers such that they experienced restoration to whole personal and communal lives, took action for themselves and others, revitalized community relations, gained a sense of hope in a seemingly hopeless situation. We are not searching for Jesus the individual in himself, but for Jesus-in-relationship, Jesus-in-interactive-role(s).

---

<sup>11</sup> See the provisional sketches in Jesus and Empire, ch. 3; Hearing the Whole Story, ch. 10; and Jesus in Context, chs. 6, 7.

A focally important aspect of a relational and contextual approach to Jesus is attempting to discern what interactive roles he was playing or in which he was being placed by his followers/movement(s). The potential roles that Jesus may have adapted or in which he may have been placed were given in the cultural tradition out of which both Jesus and his followers were working and were determined by the social structural power relations in Judea and Galilee. It is important then not to mistake ideas articulated in Judean scribal literature such as the Psalms of Solomon for roles in popular movements, and not to project what may be roles mainly at an aristocratic or scribal level, but not among the peasantry. We would have to find compelling reason to posit a role among the peasantry for which we have no evidence.

Were we to apply such criteria for the question of the interactional roles that Jesus may have adapted, then many of the currently discussed roles or titles must disappear from the discussion—if we are after Jesus-in-relations-in-historical-context. Apocalypses (Daniel; Enoch literature, etc.) were composed in scribal circles. Strictly speaking we have no evidence of “apocalypticism” among peasant movements. Although scribally-produced apocalyptic literature adapted many prophetic themes and motifs, we have no evidence of an “apocalyptic prophet” even among scribal circles. “Apocalyptic prophet” is apparently a modern scholarly construct, not an ancient Judean or Galilean popular role. Similarly, “eschatological prophet” is a modern scholarly construct. The wisdom book of Jesus ben Sira gives us fairly rich evidence of the role of the sage at the level of scribal circles working for the priestly aristocracy or temple-state. Although there is much evidence of sabia, or wise women, among European peasants of the late Middle Ages, no evidence available as yet offers evidence of a sage at the popular level among Galilean and Judean peasants. Strictly speaking, it looks like there was no such role to be adapted.

Scarce as the evidence for the Judean and Galilean peasantry is, there is nevertheless enough to detect a few roles that were very much alive in popular circles. Josephus’s accounts of the prophets Theudas and “the Egyptian” are evidence of prophets like Moses and/or Joshua who led movements of renewal of Israel at the popular level. The credibility of this role is enhanced by parallel evidence from the scribal level, in the “prophet like Moses” in Deuteronomy and the Moses-like portrayals of the Righteous Teacher in Qumran literature. Josephus’s accounts of Jesus ben Hananiah (and perhaps of John the Baptist) provide evidence of oracular prophets among Judean (and Galilean) peasants. Moreover, the accounts in Josephus and rabbinic literature of popularly acclaimed “kings” or “messiahs” such as Judas son of Hezekiah, Simeon, and Athronges in 4 BCE, Simon bar Giora during the great revolt, and Simon bar Kokhba, leader of the Bar Kokhba revolt, provide convincing evidence for the role of popular messiahs leading movements of independence and renewal. More of a stretch is to move from textual references to Elijah to a confident positing of a role such as a new Elijah. The most convincing evidence for such a role, since Elijah’s memory must have been derived originally from northern popular tradition, would be the gospels themselves, which understand both John the Baptist and Jesus in terms of Elijah. It is difficult to judge how to use references to the future role of Elijah, such as that by Malachi, a Judean prophet closely attached to the Temple, and Ben Sira, the Judean scribe who lavishes praise on the Oniad high priests. The combination of these elite and popular indications of the memory of Elijah and his role in gospel traditions may be sufficient to project a role of a prophet like Elijah, one very much like that of Moses and Joshua.

That Mark, Q speeches, Matthew and John all represent Jesus so prominently as resembling or imitating Moses and Elijah in both his actions and his speeches makes it all the more inviting to reason back toward Jesus’ adaptation of such roles. His prophetic pronouncements against the Temple and high priestly rulers are reminiscent of that other, later peasant prophet Jesus son of Hananiah; and several of his prophetic pronouncements clearly take traditional Israelite prophetic forms. Yet Jesus of Nazareth’s role(s) surely transcend that of an oracular prophet like the son of Hananiah. And Mark’s ambivalence about, Q’s avoidance of, Jesus in the role of a (popular) messiah suggest some confusion in that connection, perhaps tension between Jesus and some of his followers.

5. The Gospels as Historical Sources

As integral components of the Christian Scriptures, the canonical gospels belong to today’s Christian churches in the north Atlantic countries where most “Jesus-scholars” reside as much as they did to the church councils that canonized them in late antiquity. As sources for the historical Jesus-in-movement-in-context, however, they do not belong to us. This became vividly evident to me when two Zulu ministers who had already received a European-oriented theological education in South Africa took courses with me at Harvard Divinity School in the early 1990’s. At the beginning of the term it was evident from their comments in class discussions that they understood the Gospel of Mark as a European text that had come to Zulu people as part of European colonization. Not until later in the term did it finally hit them that Mark’s story might be more of a “third world” story that had originated among other imperially-ruled people. Historical-critical study of biblical texts had the stated intention of allowing biblical literature its own integrity in its own historical context of origins and/or composition. Yet biblical scholarship has remained a prisoner of its own cultural assumptions to a considerable degree and in key determinative ways. If we are to use the canonical and other gospel literature as historical sources, then they must be allowed to stand in their own historical reality and context.

The critical editions of the Greek texts of gospels that we use in standard New Testament study are the creations of modern scholars, the products of modern print culture and its assumptions. Intensive meticulous scholarly effort has been expended to ascertain the “original” “reading” of discrete words and phrases of each verse in the gospels. Translations from the Greek are then printed, not only codified by chapter and verse, but formatted in paragraphs that have titles (sometimes even in Greek and bi-lingual editions). Such formatting corresponds with the deeply ingrained habits in biblical studies of focusing on individual verses or sayings of Jesus and/or on pericopes, which are often weekly scripture lessons. This approach was reinforced in the last generation by the “New Criticism” that many gospel scholars had learned in their college study of literature, an approach that focused on close reading of text-fragments of poetry or prose. In this same tradition of biblical study, study of “the historical Jesus” tends to be heavily influenced by form criticism (even if in reaction to it), in which it was simply assumed that the basic unit was the individual saying or story. Perhaps the most telling illustration of the assumptions and approach that dominate this standard use of the gospels as sources is the persistent understanding of “Q” as, by definition, “the Synoptic Sayings Source” or the “Sayings Gospel”—not to mention the unquestioned assumption that its original text can be reconstructed by a team of expert scholars from the parallel sayings in Matthew and Luke. The gospels are thus treated as containers of individual sayings and (pronouncement or healing) stories, which are the basic units that (potentially) contain the words of Jesus or information about the words and actions of Jesus, the focus of scholars' examination.

This focus on text-fragments understood on the assumptions of modern print culture is, ironically, closely linked with a modern individualistic "copy and save" model of memory and transmission of the "oral tradition" of Jesus' sayings and stories (which is also conceived on a print-culture model). The teachings of Jesus as individual sayings delivered to individuals were supposedly remembered and transmitted (repeated to other individuals) for many years before they were finally written down in their current gospel containers. The "form-history" as originally developed by Bultmann and Dibelius did include the function of synoptic gospel units of tradition in a particular Sitz im Leben (der Kirche). In recent scholarship on Jesus, even that supposed ecclesial context has been left largely unattended. Oral transmission is imagined basically as abstracted from social context, i.e., from a context in the fundamental social forms of family and village community (or a movement based in them). (The extreme form of this approach even imagines a handful of individuals who had abandoned family, yet who somehow engaged in some vague kind of "group-formation" of new communities—which sounds more like Paul.) A vivid example of how the transmission of Jesus traditions is understood according to the "copy and save" model of memory is the procedure of the Jesus Seminar: those who tend to trust copy-and-save transmission vote 'red' or 'pink,' while skeptics tend to vote 'gray' or 'black,' with the ballot determining the "authenticity" of Jesus' sayings and actions.

These assumptions and this standard procedure, seriously problematic in a number of respects, have three closely related fatal flaws that make them inappropriate for historical investigation. First, by trusting in the questionable modern "copy-and-save" theory of memory, they effectively by-pass the process of communication in which Jesus' teaching and practice would have become significant to others, and would therefore have been repeated and repeatedly retold. Jesus' teachings would have been remembered only insofar as they were significant to, resonated with, other people in particular contexts. Help may be available from other fields of study, however. Sociolinguistics can help us understand communication as a social/relational process involving not simply a speaker but hearers in an immediate social context and a larger cultural context. Recent studies in social/cultural memory can help us understand memory also as a social/relational process in which a continuing community of rememberers is actively involved.<sup>12</sup>

Second, it seems highly doubtful that anyone, including Jesus, can communicate in individual sayings or aphorisms. Such fragments are something less than genuine units or messages of communication, without indication of meaning context. Focusing on individual Jesus-sayings as abstracted artifacts is thus a dead-end street that will not lead to the historical figure. The units or messages of communication must have been larger than individual sayings or (pronouncement or healing) stories. They must have been at least the length of short speeches, such as the “mission discourse” or the “Beelzebul discourse,” or sets of healing and other episodes (in and behind Mark 4–8). I am still struggling even to address this question. Again help may be available from other fields of study such as sociolinguistics and cross-cultural studies of oral tradition. It may be that, until we have persuasive criteria to discern intermediate-length units such as short “discourses,” we must focus mainly on complete “texts” such as the whole story of Mark’s Gospel or the whole sequence of speeches in Q.

Third, however, the assumptions and procedure of standard studies of Jesus do not allow the gospels their own integrity as texts. The Gospel of Mark, for example, far from being a mere container of sayings and brief “stories,” is a sustained narrative of Jesus engaged in multiple conflicts, with the Pharisees and chief priests and the Roman governor, with the unclean spirits and Satan, and even with his own disciples. The narrative proceeds in a series of brief episodes. As the narrative proceeds, however, earlier episodes anticipate subsequent episodes and appear in a different perspective as a result of subsequent episodes. Matthew’s and Luke’s gospels, which most believe followed Mark’s narrative, are more complex stories that both incorporate the same speeches of Jesus as well as distinctive material of their own. Recent literary analysis of the synoptic gospels and John have helped us appreciate the gospels as whole stories with settings, characters, and plots. Most of this analysis, however, has been working on the model and assumptions of modern prose-fiction written by individual authors and mass-printed for private reading. Modern assumptions and models, for example, of authorship, plot development, and character development do not fit ancient stories such as the gospels. On the other hand, some are finally beginning to recognize that Q, the “source” from which many believe that Matthew and Luke derived their parallel speech-materials, is not a collection of sayings but a sequence of Jesus-speeches on various subjects such as mission, the Pharisees, and anxiety about subsistence. This can be seen by critical comparison with the newly discovered Gospel of Thomas, which is a collection of (pairs of) sayings and parables, with its own distinctive hermeneutics of meditation-and-enlightenment.

---

<sup>12</sup> Important in these connections are M. A. K. Halliday, Language as Social Semiotic: The Social Interpretation of Language and Meaning (London: Edward Arnold, 1978); Jan Assmann, Das kulturelle Gedächtnis: Schrift, Erinnerung und politische Identität in frühen Hochkulturen (Munich: Beck, 1992); James Fentress and Chris Wickham, Social Memory (Oxford: Blackwell, 1992); now being applied to synoptic gospel materials in articles by Werner Kelber, Alan Kirk, and Richard Horsley in Memory, Tradition, and Text: Uses of the Past in Early Christianity, ed. Alan Kirk and Tom Thatcher, Semeia Studies (Atlanta: SBL, 2005); and Horsley, Jesus in Context, chs. 5, 6, 7.

What assumptions are valid for the gospels in their own historical context? Because we are only recently becoming aware of some of the most fundamental aspects of the communication situation in antiquity, the following discussion is necessarily somewhat tentative. Nevertheless, sufficient basic research has been done recently to enable us to draw some conclusions on fundamental points.

Most basic is to recognize that communication in ancient Galilee, Judea, and all areas of the Roman Empire was overwhelmingly oral. Thus even where written copies of texts were available, they were recited orally in a group setting. Even more among non-literate ordinary people, texts were recited or performed in group settings. Closely related recent research has explained that composition of texts was not only done for performance but was often integrally related with performance. To put it starkly for those of us accustomed to the assumptions of print culture, composition was usually a separate operation from transcription, which was often done by dictation (as known from Paul's letters). In the historical context of their composition, therefore, the gospels were performed in group settings, even if/after they existed in written form.

Although, as biblical scholars devoted to interpretation of the sacred text, we are woefully unprepared to understand the gospels as oral performance, recent studies and theory of “oral derived texts,” oral performance, and oral tradition offer some suggestive possibilities for fruitfully rethinking our approach. Studies by classicists, medievalists, anthropologists, and theorists on oral and epic poetry have borrowed heavily from sociolinguistic theory and the ethnography of performance. Theory developed by John Miles Foley in particular fits handily with the relational-contextual approach to ancient history sketched above.<sup>13</sup> Oral performance, with or without a written text, is highly relational and embedded in social context and cultural tradition. Performance involves a performer and hearers, who participate in and contribute to a performance through their interaction with the performer. The performer sings or narrates a text, the performance takes place in a context (place, group, occasion, etc.), and the performance of the text resonates with/in the hearers by metonymically (part for whole) referencing the tradition in which they (and the performer) are rooted. Our standard approach to Jesus sayings has been to establish the “what” of the meaning of given sayings. Meaning, in oral performance, is not a what, but a significant relationship between text and audience in a context and the cultural tradition in which they live. Or more adequately stated, we are looking for the work done in oral performance as the text resonates with the audience by referencing the cultural tradition. This way of approaching the gospels provides us some criteria for sorting out what the units of communication may have been and for appreciating the meaning generated in the audience in its historical context. This may become clearer with some further reflection on the various facets or components of oral performance.<sup>14</sup>

5.1. Text (The Message in Communication)

A “reader” or performer recited a particular message, in a particular context, which resonated with an audience out of their common cultural tradition. Even in modern print culture it is evident, on a moment’s reflection, that the meaningful unit of communication is the overall message of which particular statements are components. Ironically the scholars who spent so much time and energy isolating and studying particular “sayings” of Jesus would be the first to insist that their statements should not be “taken out of context” in their articles or books, which form the overall message they want to communicate. We can get a bit closer to “texts” that were performed or read aloud to groups, such as Q and the Gospel of Mark, however, by analogy with oral performances of “oral derived texts” in other societies where oral communication prevailed. Old English poets or South Slavic singers of epics, for example, insisted that their “words” were not only and not primarily individual statements or lines, but a speech, a scene, or a whole song or narrative poem. By analogy, we might imagine that both particular speeches (such as the mission discourse) in Q and the overall sequence of speeches (Q as a whole), and perhaps the particular episodes as well as the overall story in Mark, were “texts” (meaningful messages).<sup>15</sup>

---

<sup>13</sup> See esp. John Miles Foley, Imminent Art: From Structure to Meaning in Traditional Oral Epic (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1991); and The Singer of Tales in Performance (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1995).

<sup>14</sup> See further Whoever Hears You Hears Me; Hearing the Whole Story; and Jesus in Context, chs. 3, 4.

We may gain another angle on the issue from a study of Lutshootseed narrative (Salish people in the Puget Sound area). Of the rich collection of stories and songs among the people, most of which were known by a given storyteller, the storyteller would never tell all of them on one occasion. Also, different story tellers and even the same story teller had different versions of a given story. By analogy we might suggest that Q and Mark represent particular “texts” composed from a far wider and richer repertoire of Jesus-speeches and Jesus episodes known in the Jesus-movement(s) and that the parallel speeches/episodes of the Beelzebul, mission, and ‘followers on trial’ discourses found in Mark and Q were different versions of particular components of that wider repertoire of Jesus-speeches and episodes.<sup>16</sup>

Yet another set of observations about comparative performances opens another dimension to our potential understanding of what constitutes the “text” in the case of our Q and Mark sources for Jesus-and-followers. South Slavic singers and other performers, while insisting that they were singing the exact same “text” with no variations, in fact presented different length recitations and variations in the wording and length of particular episodes while maintaining the same basic overall story-line across different performances. This has two important implications for Q and Mark as “texts.” First, it suggests that even though particular component speeches of Q and particular episodes in Mark could have constituted basic messages or units of communication in themselves on occasion, they would usually have constituted components of a larger message/text of which Q and Mark are examples (the only ones known to us). That is, component speeches and episodes were usually combined in some way and had their meaning in connection with others in a sequence or narrative. Second, it is the overall story in Mark and a full series of speeches in Q that were the basic or most important texts, messages, and units of communication. Standard study of the synoptic gospel tradition and investigations of the historical Jesus focused on isolated sayings and “pericopes,” strive to establish and then interpret the precise wording of each in itself. All the factors we have considered, however, indicate that meaningful communication is carried or evoked by “texts”/messages that are much larger and more complex than individual sayings. We are thus led to focus in almost the diametric opposite way as standard study of the synoptic tradition. That is, we must focus on the overall series of speeches in Q and the overall story in Mark, in order to understand not only “the whole picture” but also the way each component of the overall series or story functioned in and constituted the whole picture.

---

<sup>15</sup> See Whoever Hears You Hears Me, 163, and references there.

<sup>16</sup> See ibid., 167–168, and references there.

5.2. Context (of Communication)

A performer recites and an audience hears a message in a particular context. In fact, context determines what is to be communicated and context cues the audience into hearing what is communicated in a certain way. At a funeral we expect to hear music and discourse appropriate to a funeral and the presiding priest or minister prepares a message of consolation and eulogy. The term “register” is often used for the mode of communication appropriate to a particular context. At a protest demonstration we would not expect to hear words of praise for the target of the protest. Complex texts, however, may have a variety of sub-contexts at different times or levels. For example, in overall celebration of the mass or a church worship service, within the overall context of worship, are several sub-contexts of praise, confession, words of assurance, hearing of the word, preaching, and the offering of and by the people. As the worshippers shift from one sub-context to another, the register of the message changes accordingly. Something similar happened in civil rights rallies, the different sub-contexts as the appropriate setting for singing freedom songs, remembering fallen comrades, or hearing an inspiring exhortation to continuing struggle. We can detect something similar with regard to the sequence of speeches in Q. The context of the overall series of speeches must have been community meetings of a Jesus movement. Within those meetings, however, must have been sub-contexts, such as a commissioning of envoys as the sub-context of the mission discourse or preparation for group prayer as the sub-context of the short speech on prayer (including the Lord’s Prayer). The context for hearing the Gospel of Mark must have been community meetings of a Jesus movement.

In attempting to understand the gospels in historical context and as sources for Jesus-in-context, however, we must surely consider a much wider context of communication. The gospels, Q and Mark in particular, were the communicative products and media of a recently arisen, dynamic and growing movement. For the movement to have begun in the first place and to have rapidly expanded the message must have resonated with people who formed or joined the movement and must have continued to resonate with the people who continued in the movement. We must thus consider the historical social context as well as the community-movement context. For example, beyond the immediate context of the mission discourse in the movement's meeting to commission envoys to expand Jesus' project of preaching and healing in village communities, we must consider the historical context (crisis) that led them to begin and continue sending out such envoys. Or, more broadly, besides the community meetings in which the Gospel of Mark was recited, we must consider the historical crisis in response to which the gospel originated and which it continued to address, in which expanding numbers of people resonated to that text in expanding communities. We want to understand why it resonated with certain people at a certain historical crisis.

5.3. Tradition

The text/message resonates with the hearers by referencing the cultural tradition out of which they live. This is true to a degree with any communication, including much in writing. But it is perhaps the most important key to understanding oral performance of "texts." Even those of us whose lives are spent predominantly in print culture have experiences that illustrate what is usual in oral communication. Hearing (on the radio or TV) even a brief "sound-bite" of Martin Luther King's voice saying, in his inimitable preaching style, "I have a dream" or "I have been to the mountain-top," evokes memories of the whole civil rights movement and era for Americans who lived through the 1960's. For those deeply involved in the struggle for civil rights hearing King voice those phrases may evoke even deep feelings, vivid memories of particularly tense confrontations, the death of colleagues in the struggle, and a recommitment to the values represented by the freedom movement. Hearing JFK's voice saying "Ask not what your country can do for you, but what you can do for your country" evokes similar memories and feelings in many Americans old enough to have lived in the early 1960's.

And even an orally voiced written text of Abraham Lincoln saying “Four score and seven years ago” evokes in memory not only the larger text of the Gettysburg address, but a whole important segment of American cultural tradition. What all of these examples illustrate is how a performed “text,” even a fragment from a whole, resonates in the hearers by referencing the hearers’ cultural memory and tradition.

The key to how the text resonates with the hearers by referencing the cultural tradition is that a part stands for the whole, “metonymically.” “I have a dream” evokes the whole African American struggle for civil rights. When the Gospel of Mark tells of Jesus making sea crossings and performing feedings in the wilderness when no food was available it evokes in those hearers familiar with Israelite tradition the whole tradition of Moses leading the exodus and arduous journey of Israel through the wilderness toward its land. Even before the audience hears that Moses and Elijah appeared with the transfigured Jesus on the mountain, the text of Mark has given the audience unmistakable clues that Jesus is a prophet like Moses and Elijah leading a renewal of Israel. This illustrates how the text resonates with the audience by evoking its cultural memory, the shared body of tradition in which it is rooted (or has recently become rooted). Or, to state that more comprehensively than its surface cognitive dimension, the portrayal of Jesus making sea crossings and wilderness feedings evokes, by referencing the hearers’ shared Israelite cultural tradition, the confidence or trust/faith that Jesus was another prophet like Moses who was carrying out a new deliverance of Israel from foreign oppression.

Again we are developing an approach virtually the opposite of that previously pursued by standard study of the gospels and “research” into the historical Jesus. Although scholars of the historical Jesus were students of the Enlightenment in their rationalistic assessment of the gospels as historical sources, they retained much of their basic theological commitment. In traditional Christian theology, Jesus was the agent or mouthpiece of revelation. Under the influence of Enlightenment Reason, revelation was understood especially in terms of teachings. Revelation, of course, meant something new, something that had not been heard or known before. And insofar as modern scholars and readers focused on the isolated sayings of Jesus in themselves, abstracted from the context and relationships in which they were embedded, that meant the sayings-in-themselves had to be new—and somehow revelatory (a tall order!). Almost by definition Jesus’ teachings had to be new over against “Judaism” (and the subsequent “early church”). Thus, using the criterion of “dissimilarity” Jesus-scholars researched Jewish literature not to understand Jesus’ teachings in their historical context, but rather to set the “authentic” sayings over against “conventional” Jewish norms, customs, and other cultural content.

A relational-contextual approach to Jesus-in-movement in no way excludes revelation. That would be as reductionist as pretending that Jesus was only religious. In a relational-contextual approach, however, revelation is understood relationally-historically. Revelation would be not something new in itself, but would be revelation about (a new possibility in or dimension of) the historical situation to people in that situation, e.g., the difficult circumstances with no apparent way out that the people are facing. In the gospel texts and, presumably, in Jesus’ speech and action, revelation was that God was acting to change the situation and to change the people in that situation, so that they can act. A relational-contextual approach, rather than separate certain Jesus sayings-in-themselves from the Israelite tradition that comprised an important aspect of the historical context, attempts to discern how the text of Mark or Q references Israelite tradition in a way that provides revelation for people involved in the problematic historical situation.

This suggests that the key for modern readers’ appreciation of gospel materials is to become as familiar as possible with the Israelite tradition (as well as the context) out of which the historical audience (implied in the text) heard the text. Only if we as modern readers make the connection between text and metonymically signaled references to Israelite tradition can we construe the text within the range of possibilities it implies. This gives special importance to the question of what cultural tradition consisted of for the audience of the gospels and, behind them, for the audience of Jesus, and how we can gain access to it.

As should be clear by now, in the standard terms of New Testament studies, using the gospels as sources for the historical Jesus (-in-movement) will require what would commonly be called analysis of the historical context, viewpoint, and hermeneutics of every document to be used. This places a great burden on understanding the gospels themselves in their respective historical situations (contexts of performance). For this we can draw on previous investigation and analysis of gospels (including literary criticism). But those must be complemented by analysis of their provenance informed by the new researches sketched above.

6. Moving from Gospels as Sources to the Historical Jesus

In the remaining space I can only draw some implications from the above discussion and merely outline some of the steps that might be taken to move from the gospels as sources to the historical Jesus (-in movement-in-context).

Since complete gospel documents provide the meaning-context of their respective components (episodes, speeches), they must be taken as whole stories and sets of speeches, with each component understood in the context of the whole (in contrast with the procedure of the Jesus Seminar and other critical liberal scholars). Each gospel source (Matthew, Luke, John, Thomas, Peter, etc., as well as Mark and Q, used as illustrations above) will thus offer certain representations of Jesus-in-mission/movement-in-context. Those representations can then be evaluated in their own historical context, then compared and contrasted against the background of what we know of the historical context of Jesus-in-mission in Galilee and Judea. This might be characterized as a series of “triangulations” from broad general portrayals in whole oral-performed texts.

Understanding the gospels as oral performance and in terms of social memory leads toward a greater sense of both the continuity and the discontinuity between Jesus in his movement in historical context and the various gospel narratives and speeches in their respective situations. The old problem of transmission simply disappears into the ongoing process of social memory and repeated performance, insofar as Jesus-speeches and episodes continued to be remembered and performed only insofar as they were relevant to and resonated in similar and new situations. Once we recognize the complicating dimensions of the historical context of Jesus, the relational reality of Jesus’ mission and movement, and the gospels as sources, we cannot simply return to standard assumptions, concepts, and procedures. And it will take many years and sensitive analyses and studies even to begin to formulate an adequate approach to Jesus-in-movement-in-context that is both contextual and relational.

SOURCES, METHODS AND DISCURSIVE LOCATIONS IN THE QUEST OF THE HISTORICAL JESUS

JOHN S. KLOPPENBORG

1. Why the Quest?

“The historical and substantive presupposition for modern research into the life of Jesus is emancipation from traditional Christological dogma on the basis of the principle of reason.”<sup>1</sup> So began Hans Conzelmann’s classic entry in the third edition of Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (1959), which offered a brief portrait of the historical Jesus based on the results of the post-Bultmannian ‘New Quest of the historical Jesus.’ In a few pages Conzelmann chronicled the progress of the quest from D. F. Strauss’s overthrow of dogmatically-based pictures of Jesus, through the late nineteenth-century liberal search to discover the “personality” of Jesus as a religious genius, to his own day when the tools of redaction criticism joined with source and form criticism to permit a more responsible investigation of the Jesus of history.

The collapse of dogmatically-grounded portraits of Jesus had in fact begun at least a half a century before Strauss’s Das Leben Jesu: Kritisch bearbeitet<sup>2</sup> with the Fragmente of Hermann Samuel Reimarus (1694–1768), whose skeptical method combined synoptic comparison of the four gospels with a concerted effort to locate Jesus within the world of Second Temple Judaism as it was then known.<sup>3</sup> Reimarus’s results are well known: the evangelists had fabricated fantastic and contradiction-riddled accounts of their hero, a rather unexceptional apocalyptic prophet and preacher of repentance, whose body the disciples had stolen and invented the tale of his resurrection and the prediction of an imminent glorious

---

<sup>1</sup> H. Conzelmann, “Jesus Christus,” RGK 33 (1959): 620; Jesus (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973), 5.

<sup>2</sup> (Tübingen: C. F. Osiander, 1835–1836). Translated by G. Eliot as The Life of Jesus Critically Examined, ed. and introd. P. C. Hodgson, Lives of Jesus Series (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1972).

<sup>3</sup> H. S. Reimarus, Fragmente des Wolfenbüttelschen Ungenannten, ed. G. E. Lessing (Berlin: Sandersche Buchhandlung [C. M. Eichhoff], 1774–1778; 4th ed., 1835); Fragments, Lives of Jesus Series (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1970).

return. Although most of the details of Reimarus's thesis were quickly repudiated, he had succeeded in two important respects. The contradictions to which he so forcefully drew attention made it clear that even if it was not a matter of outright deception, the gospel accounts could no longer be harmonized into a coherent picture and used naively as the basis for later Christian dogma—since credible Christian beliefs could hardly be founded on deceptions or vagaries. And the dissonance between the gospels' accounts of Jesus and contemporary Jewish beliefs raised the possibility that a significant gap existed between the historical Jesus and the gospels' representations. Thus Reimarus had driven two wedges, one between the gospels and Christian dogma and another between the historical Jesus and his first biographers.

Reimarus's essays were not only bold but timely. Lessing, who published the seventh of the "anonymous Wolfenbütteler's" Fragmente ("Von dem Zwecke Jesu und seiner Jünger") ten years after Reimarus's death, accompanied the essay with a rejoinder where he advanced his own theory of gospel composition, which took into account the internal disagreements that Reimarus had interpreted as signs of falsification and which presented the evangelists as essentially reliable narrators.<sup>4</sup> Lessing in effect used Reimarus's devastating attack on the foundations of Christian dogma and the credibility of the gospel accounts to allow him the space to advance his own views, which showed significant sympathies with Reimarus's criticism of naive use of the gospels by dogmatic theology and which acknowledged the critical problem of divergence in the gospel tradition without resorting to Reimarus's drastic solution.

The struggle to disentangle historical scholarship on the gospels from ecclesiastical and dogmatic agendas and the endeavour to produce a historically defensible portrait of Jesus continued throughout the nineteenth century, so that by the publication of Schweitzer's Von Reimarus zu Wrede: Eine Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung (1906) most of the key (German) contributors to the Quest claimed that at the levels of presupposition and method, the Quest observed a strict separation between historiographic goals and theological interests in Jesus. Of course it is often doubted that this separation was as strictly observed as advertised. But the wedges that Reimarus had driven between dogma and the gospels and between the gospels and Jesus remained and

---

<sup>4</sup> G. E. Lessing, "Neue Hypothese über die Evangelisten als bloss menschliche Geschichtsschreiber betrachtet," in Theologischer Nachlass (orig., 1778; Berlin: Voss, 1784), 45–72, translated as "New Hypothesis Concerning the Evangelists Regarded as Merely Human Historians," in Lessing's Theological Writings (London: Black, 1956), 65–81.

Lessing's proposal to treat the evangelists as "merely human historians" prevailed as a scholarly paradigm.

Although the 'New Quest of the Historical Jesus,' of which Conzelmann's Jesus book is an example, is now sometimes treated as a theologically-driven quest,<sup>5</sup> this was certainly not Conzelmann's view, as the quotation that opens this chapter makes clear. On the contrary the tools of source, form and redaction criticism and application of the principle of dissimilarity on the one hand afforded a prophylaxis against the historian's theological inclinations (since the criterion filtered out those features of the tradition that agreed too closely with later Christian affirmations) and on the other, allowed the historian to distinguish reliable Jesus tradition from later accretions and thus to construct a credible portrait. Nevertheless, Conzelmann argued that fortuitously the advent of new historical criticism was able to solve a theological problem, by closing the chasm that had been opened by form criticism, between the historical Jesus and the faith-infused tradition of the early Jesus movement. Without denying the very significant transformations of the Jesus tradition that occurred during the process of oral transmission and with the redactional activities of the evangelists, Conzelmann argued that material continuities could nonetheless be traced from the beliefs of the early Jesus movement back to the Existenzverständnis of Jesus.

The messianic portrait of dogmatics seems in its essential features to be traced back to Jesus himself. Faith thereby appears to have gained a historical foundation.<sup>6</sup>

---

<sup>5</sup> Ernst Käsemann's seminal essay, "The Problem of the Historical Jesus" ("Das Problem des historischen Jesus," ZTK 51 [1954]: 125–153, translated as "The Problem of the Historical Jesus," in Essays on New Testament Themes, SBT 41 [London: SCM, 1964], 15–47) indeed began with a theological problem: that the nature of Christian theological beliefs means that "we cannot do away with the identity between the exalted and the earthly Lord without falling into docetism and depriving ourselves of the possibility of drawing a line between the Easter faith and myth" (34). Käsemann nevertheless proceeded to sketch a new picture of the historical Jesus, not based on the assumption of continuity between the 'earthly' Jesus and post-Easter confessions, but on the basis of a historiographic criterion, the criterion of dissimilarity: "when there are no grounds either for deriving a tradition from Judaism or for ascribing it to primitive Christianity, and especially when Jewish Christianity has mitigated or modified the received tradition, as having found it too bold for its taste" (37). That the criterion of dissimilarity may itself betray some theological bias should not be allowed to obscure the point that Käsemann did not think that he was beginning with dogmatic assumptions. Rather, his was a historical inquiry with theological relevance. Käsemann's declaration has been construed, nonetheless, as a "very definite theological agenda" (N. T. Wright, Christian Origins and the Question of God, vol. 2, Jesus and the Victory of God [Minneapolis, MN: Fortress; London: SPCK, 1996], 23) and contrasted with the "Third Quest's" "attempt to do history seriously" (84) and "pursuit of truth—historical truth..." (87).

<sup>6</sup> Conzelmann, Jesus, 10.

Today the situation has not changed much, at least as far as overt claims are concerned. No one seriously engaged in the quest of the historical Jesus admits to employing methods expressly informed by theological affirmations (although accusations that others' reconstructions are burdened with theological baggage abound). In this respect the revolution initiated by Reimarus and Lessing is complete, so that the claims of dogmatic theology regarding Jesus are disallowed from the outset in the quest of the historical Jesus. But just as Conzelmann recognized a coherence between the results of the New Quest and the tenets of dialectical theology, it should be obvious that interest in the historical Jesus, whether in the nineteenth, twentieth, or twenty-first century, is driven by the conviction that the exercise of discussing what can be said responsibly of Jesus continues to have conceptual, political, or social relevance. Otherwise it would be difficult to account for the flood of books on Jesus, or the vehemence and even acrimony with which the debate is conducted.<sup>7</sup>

The role of theological interest has been understood variously by recent authors. Wright suggests that a significant difference between the 'New Quest' and the so-called 'Third Quest' (from which he distinguishes the works of the Jesus Seminar, Crossan and Mack as continuations of the New Quest)<sup>8</sup> is that representatives of the Third Quest "have no united theological or political agenda, unlike the quite monochrome New Quest and its fairly monochrome renewal."<sup>9</sup> Apart from the final

---

<sup>7</sup> Compare T. Holmén, "A Theologically Disinterested Quest? On the Origins of the 'Third Quest' for the Historical Jesus," ST 55 (2001): 188: "I would contend that theological interest is actually the source from which the pursuit of studying Jesus substantially originates today. It may also be that the whole 'renaissance in Jesus studies,' which has become known as the 'Third Quest,' has from the outset been generated by theological motives." This is probably a fair statement provided that 'theological' is meant broadly and includes theoretical, conceptual, and socio-political interests.

<sup>8</sup> See Wright, Jesus, 28–82, 84, who contrasts the skeptical legacy of Wrede, with whom he identifies the Jesus Seminar, B. Mack, J. D. Crossan, and M. Borg, with the apocalyptic legacy of Schweitzer: G. B. Caird, S. G. F. Brandon, O. Betz, M. Hengel, G. Vermes, B. Meyer, B. Chilton, J. Riches, A. Harvey, G. Lohfink, M. Borg (listed as a borderline figure between the New Quest and the Third Quest), E. P. Sanders, D. Oakman, G. Theissen, R. Horsley, S. Freyne, J. Charlesworth, B. Witherington, J. Meier, and M. de Jonge. I use the term 'Third Quest' only because it seems to have some currency at the moment. As will become clear, I do not think that the way the 'Third Quest' has been defined vis à vis earlier or contemporaneous quests will survive scrutiny. On this point, see S. E. Porter, The Criteria for Authenticity in Historical-Jesus Research: Previous Discussion and New Proposals, JSNTSup 191 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), 51–55, for an incisive criticism of Wright's term.

<sup>9</sup> Wright, Jesus, 89. The final clause, insofar as it applies to Mack, members of the Jesus Seminar, Crossan, and Borg, is both stunning and utterly unsupported by clause, this seems an apt assessment. The New Quest was associated with a relatively small group of students of Bultmann who embraced dialectical theology and insights taken from the later Heidegger; only the word ‘agenda’ is misleading, for Käsemann, Conzelmann and their colleagues would have distinguished sharply between the theological legitimacy and relevance of the Quest, and its historiographic methods and assumptions. It is also true that those whom Wright includes in the so-called ‘Third Quest’ represent rather diverse interests and confessional backgrounds. But it is overly optimistic to assert that the “diverse backgrounds” of practitioners of the Third Quest provide a sort of system of checks and balances so that the Third Quest is no longer in danger of drifting “around the archipelago of theologically-motivated methods and criteria,”<sup>10</sup> since practitioners of the ‘Third Quest’ with a few notable exceptions<sup>11</sup> eschew any reflection on the conceptual or theological significance of their views.<sup>12</sup> argument or evidence. It would be difficult to posit anything remotely approximating a “monochrome” theological set of views common to Mack, Funk, Crossan, Borg, Scott, Cameron, Smith, Miller, Hoover, etc.

---

<sup>10</sup> Wright, Jesus, 89.

<sup>11</sup> Crossan (not considered by Wright to be representative of the ‘Third Quest’) has discussed theological and ideological issues in various of his publications: Who Killed Jesus? Exposing the Roots of Anti-Semitism in the Gospel Story of the Death of Jesus (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1995); “What Victory? What God? A Review Debate with N. T. Wright on Jesus and the Victory of God,” SJT 50 (1997): 345–358, and in Jesus and Faith: A Conversation on the Work of John Dominic Crossan, ed. J. Carlson and R. A. Ludwig (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1994). Similarly Borg, in M. J. Borg, Jesus in Contemporary Scholarship (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1994), and Wright, Jesus, 8–9, 117–121, 659–662, on which see C. Marsh, “Theological History? N. T. Wright’s Jesus and the Victory of God,” JSNT 69 (1998): 87–88: “Wright’s claim is this continuity [between Jesus and Christian interpretation] is fully historically legitimate, and for that very reason theologically significant (pp. 661–662). The Jesus of history/Christ of faith split is so disastrous, he declares, because it fails to enable people to draw the necessary theological conclusions from the historical evidence available. Perhaps; but at this point I wonder whether his own critical realism has not slipped into a form of the nineteenth-century positivism which he goes to such lengths to oppose. However much Wright may claim that he is merely constructing a comprehensive hypothesis (on critical-realistic lines), one of the driving forces of his undertaking appears clearly to be to maximize the historical data available, in the defence of theological assertions (made in the first century, even if not today) point for point. Even if this is not historical positivism, it is certainly theological positivism in the nineteenth-century sense” (emphasis original).

<sup>12</sup> Ironically, it is those whom Wright excludes from the ‘Third Quest’—scholars associated with the Jesus Seminar—who have been the most active in thinking about ideological investments in the quest of the historical Jesus: R. J. Miller, ed., The Apocalyptic Jesus: A Debate (Santa Rosa, CA: Polebridge, 2001); “Can the Historical Jesus Be Made Safe for Orthodoxy? A Critique of The Jesus Quest by Ben Witherington III,” Journal of Higher Criticism 4.1 (1997): 120–137; The Jesus Seminar and Its Critics

Although a few such as Crossan, Borg and Wright are prepared to consider the relationship between the results of historical scholarship and theology—or in my terms, to consider what might be at stake conceptually in historical scholarship—the majority of recent researchers seem to welcome a complete divorce. Thus Evans describes as one of the advances of the Third Quest that it “is not driven by theological-philosophical concerns” and that consequently “Life of Jesus research is characterized today more by an interest in history than in faith.”<sup>13</sup> Similarly, Theissen claims as distinguishing characteristics of the Third Quest the “(re-)emancipation of the historical quest for Jesus from the field of theology and Christology” and its secular-historical orientation.<sup>14</sup>

But if we are to avoid the suspicion of historical positivism, such declarations ought to be nuanced. Theissen’s own survey of the genesis of the Third Quest shows that far from being a matter of purely historical interest, scholarship on the historical Jesus belongs to several larger (Santa Rosa, CA: Polebridge, 1999); J. S. Kloppenborg, “A Dog among the Pigeons: The ‘Cynic Hypothesis’ as a Theological Problem,” in From Quest to Quelle: Festschrift James M. Robinson, ed. J. Asgeirsson, K. deTroyer and M. W. Meyer, BETL 146 (Leuven: Peeters, 1999), 73–117; J. S. Kloppenborg and J. W. Marshall, eds., Apocalypticism, Anti-Semitism, and the Historical Jesus: Subtexts in Criticism, JSHJSup 1 (New York: T&T Clark International, 2004). Robert Funk, in fact, distinguishes the ‘Third Quest’ from the ‘Renewed Quest’ on three grounds: (a) whether the quest takes seriously a distinction “between the historical Jesus and the Jesus of the gospels”; (b) whether the quest limits itself to canonical sources; and (c) whether “anything is at risk in the quest. Are any of the Christian claims about Jesus immune to historical investigation? The scholar for whom nothing in the creed or in church dogma is at issue is a pretend quester” (Honest to Jesus: Jesus for a New Millennium [San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1996], 64–65). It is doubtful that all of those included in Wright’s list of the ‘Third Quest’ (above, n. 8) could be included in Funk’s implied ‘pretend quest’; but it seems fair to say that little is at stake theologically in the quest for either Wright or Witherington; neither makes a sharp distinction between the historical Jesus and the representation of Jesus in the gospels; and neither strays outside of canonical sources.

---

<sup>13</sup> C. A. Evans, Jesus and His Contemporaries: Comparative Studies, AGJU 25 (Leiden: Brill, 1995), 11, 12 (emphasis original).

<sup>14</sup> G. Theissen and D. Winter, The Quest for a Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2002), 142–143. Similarly, J. H. Charlesworth, ed., Jesus’ Jewishness: Exploring the Place of Jesus within Early Judaism (Philadelphia: The American Interfaith Institute; New York: Crossroad, 1991); Jesus within Judaism: New Light from Exciting Archaeological Discoveries, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1988; London: SPCK, 1989), 26–27. John P. Meier (A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, vol. 1, The Roots of the Problem and the Person [New York: Doubleday, 1991], 6) acknowledges his own confessional location but treats it as a potential problem of bias (“My greatest temptation... will be to read back anachronistically the expanded universe of later church teaching into the ‘big bang’ moment of Jesus’ earthly ministry”) and endorses a strict Thomistic separation of what is known on the basis of historical research and what is known by faith.

theoretical projects. The recovery of Jesus' identity as a first-century Palestinian Jew, begun with Klausner's Jesus of Nazareth and reiterated forcefully by such recent authors as Vermes and Sanders, does important conceptual work both in the context of post-Shoah theologizing of western liberalizing Christian churches and in the context of modern Jewish efforts at reconceiving the collective past.<sup>15</sup> A Jewish Jesus is a bulwark against the supersessionism that infected much of Christian theologizing and which led to the demonizing and, ultimately, the extermination of Jews. A Jewish Jesus is also a significant figure of Second Temple Judaism who might contribute to Jewish identity no less than Yohanan ben Zakkai or the Teacher of Righteousness or Eleazar ben Ya'ir. Those treatments of Jesus that emphasize his identity as a 'peasant' (or at least as one of the non-élite, colonized and exploited underclass), despite many significant disagreements, patently belong to a larger field of discourse concerned with issues of social power, stratification, class struggle, colonialism and the arts of resistance.<sup>16</sup> And the debate over whether and in what respect Jesus held apocalyptic beliefs, in particular about his own role and identity, plays a significant role in the larger conceptual debate over Christian claims to the ultimacy of Christian claims and the incommensurability of Jesus.<sup>17</sup> To claim that historical <sup>15</sup> Among the most influential books by Jewish scholars emphasizing Jesus' Jewish identity: J. Klausner, Jesus of Nazareth: His Life, Times, and Teaching, trans. and preface H. Danby (New York: Macmillan, 1925; repr., 1927; 1929); G. Vermes, Jesus the Jew: A Historian's Reading of the Gospels (London: Collins, 1973); The Religion of Jesus the Jew (London: SCM; Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1993); H. Falk, Jesus the Pharisee: A New Look at the Jewishness of Jesus (New York: Paulist, 1985); D. Flusser, Jesus, collaborator R. S. Notley (Jerusalem: Magnes, the Hebrew University, 1997). For non-Jewish scholars: E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985); J. H. Charlesworth, Jesus within Judaism; Jesus' Jewishness; Meier, Marginal Jew, vol. 1, Rethinking the Historical Jesus, vol. 2, Mentor, Message, and Miracles, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1994); T. Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, BIS 55 (Leiden: Brill, 2001).

---

<sup>16</sup> E.g., R. A. Horsley, Jesus and the Spiral of Violence: Popular Jewish Resistance in Roman Palestine (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987); Sociology and the Jesus Movement (New York: Crossroad, 1989); J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1991); W. R. Herzog, Parables as Subversive Speech: Jesus as Pedagogue of the Oppressed (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1994); L. E. Vaage, Galilean Upstarts: Jesus' First Followers According to Q (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1994); W. E. Arnal, Jesus and the Village Scribes: Galilean Conflicts and the Setting of Q (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2001).

<sup>17</sup> On the latter, see J. P. Galvin, "I Believe... in Jesus Christ, His Only Son, Our Lord": The Earthly Jesus and the Christ of Faith," Int 50.4 (1996): 373-382, and especially his comments on Crossan's Jesus. On apocalypticism in general, see J. S. Kloppenborg, "As One Unknown, Without a Name: Coopting the Apocalyptic Jesus," in Apocalypticism, Antisemitism, and the Historical Jesus, ed. Kloppenborg and Marshall.

Jesus scholarship belongs to these larger conceptual fields is not to make any claim about the personal motivations of those scholars who engage in this form of scholarship. I have little or no direct knowledge of their motivations nor would knowledge of those motivations have much relevance to our debate. Rather, it is to notice the relationships between certain trends in historical Jesus scholarship and contemporary thinking about identity, difference, the mechanisms of social power, colonialism, racism, and so forth. The quest of the historical Jesus continues to do conceptual work in the context of these broader conceptual frameworks, just as in the nineteenth century the Quest functioned in the contexts of a struggle to redefine the nature of (religious) authority and the articulation of the autonomy of reason.<sup>18</sup>

My claim is also not that recent Jesus scholarship is in fact an essentially apologetic enterprise whose results are dictated by a priori 'theological convictions' about Jewish-Christian relationships, or the politics of exploitation, or Christian claims to ultimacy, or the nature of religious authority; modern Jesus scholarship is not any more overtly apologetic than the Old Quest or the New Quest. Most scholars have strained to avoid adopting explicitly theological starting points or theologically-freighted criteria. Rather, the point is that it is naive to suppose that Jesus scholarship is not interested in, and driven by, larger theoretical (though not necessarily theological) concerns, whether individual scholars expressly acknowledge such concerns or not. It is in fact such humanistic concerns that make it worthwhile discussing the historical Jesus in the first place.

The fact that historical Jesus scholarship is 'interested' also means, as T. Holmén has rightly observed, that the scholar's interest will often if not inevitably have a substantive effect on the selection and application of historical criteria. Although Holmén describes this as "a predetermined theological viewpoint . . . influenc[ing] the reasoning,"<sup>19</sup> I think it better to treat the phenomenon as the normal shaping of the scholar's operating procedures by the general discursive field within which she moves, rather than treating it as a matter of 'predetermined' outcomes.

---

<sup>18</sup> See on this G. W. Dawes, The Historical Jesus Question: The Challenge of History to Religious Authority (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2001).

<sup>19</sup> Holmén, "Theologically Disinterested Quest," 188 (emphasis added). Holmén argues that both Sanders (Jesus and Judaism) and Bruce Chilton ("Jesus within Judaism," in Judaism in Late Antiquity, part 2, Historical Syntheses, ed. J. Neusner, HO 1. [Leiden: Brill, 1995], 262–284), in reacting to the invidious application of the criterion of dissimilarity that rendered Jesus too dissimilar to Judaism, move too far in the opposite direction and disallow any tradition that displays dissimilarity. "This is understandable, perhaps even acceptable to some extent, but cannot be characterized as 'purely historical' or 'theologically disinterested'" (182). Similarly, he observes that the rigorous application of the other side of dissimilarity (dissimilarity from

What this implies is that rather than declaring the most recent Quest to be free of theological (or theoretical) interests and thereby falsely implying a purely antiquarian 'objective' interest in the figure of Jesus, it would be preferable to ask a scholar to make clear, along with her approach to sources, criteria and procedures, the broader discursive field within which her Jesus scholarship is situated, that is, to explain what theoretical 'work' historical Jesus scholarship is doing.<sup>20</sup> Is that field informed by the theological problematic of continuity created by dialectical theology, as it was for Käsemann or Conzelmann? Or by the Shoah and the history of inhumanity to the Jews? Or by Marxist and post-Marxist political analysis? This is not a simple request; it is far easier to recognize the discursive fields and ideological frames of earlier generations than one's own. It is relatively simple to see, for example, German Kulturoptimismus, Romanticism and the celebration of human progress as the context in which Harnack's Das Wesen des Christentums was penned; or to relate the so-called 'no Quest' period of Bultmann and Dibelius to the situation immediately after World War I, characterized by the collapse of this optimism, by the profound sense that the world was no longer at humankind's disposal, and by the influence of dialectical or neo-orthodox theology. If the contemporary quest of the historical Jesus is to make substantial theoretical progress, it must become self-aware of its own location(s) in human discourse, explain how it matters to speak of the historical Jesus,<sup>21</sup> and eschew the pretended claims to 'objectivity' and 'neutrality.' To this point I shall return at the end of this essay.

---

later Christian beliefs) by the Jesus Seminar "means that the quest for the historical Jesus must challenge the Christian doctrine" (185). Finally, he observes apropos of Wright's Jesus that "seeing how nicely [Wright's] enterprises, among others, succeed in fulfilling the agenda of conservative Christianity, refuting some of the more radical findings of this and the previous quest and recognizing, further, that at least a part of that success comes from incoherent thinking that materializes in uncritical attitude[s] towards the sources, it seems evident that theological predilections are at work" (188).

<sup>20</sup> On the problem of 'objectivity' as a method of understanding, see T. Nagel, The View from Nowhere (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986).

<sup>21</sup> This self-awareness, presumably, must not be framed in insular Christian terms, but as public discourse. Funk (Honest to Jesus, 298) observes: "If what we have to say about Jesus does not matter to those outside the precincts of traditional Christianity, it probably will not matter at all, at least not for the long term."

2. The Sources of the Jesus Tradition

The starting point for reconstructing the historical Jesus is clearly the early 'Jesus tradition'—the bulk of literary sources (for we have nothing else) containing sayings of Jesus and reports about Jesus. There is general acknowledgement that these sources bear the impress of their tradents and redactors and therefore should not be used naively, even though some recent authors appear to use these sources more credulously than others. There are several methodological issues connected with the use of the Jesus tradition, however.

1. A first methodological problem arises from the sheer bulk of sayings ascribed to Jesus and stories told about him. Crossan's inventory of the Jesus tradition (both sayings of Jesus and anecdotes about Jesus) comprises more than five hundred items and contains materials from both intra-canonical and early noncanonical gospels.<sup>22</sup> Especially noteworthy in the latter category are items from the Gospel of Thomas, the Gospel of Peter, the Egerton Gospel and P. Oxy. 1224. No one would seriously propose a portrait of Jesus based on the whole of this inventory, especially since there are many conflicting sayings and stories within this set of materials. The critical issue is how to define the corpus of Jesus traditions so as to ensure that significant data are not omitted from consideration, but also that the portrait of Jesus is not skewed by irrelevant or idiosyncratic materials.

The simplest and least legitimate expedient is to dismiss noncanonical sources, a strategy common in German scholarship.<sup>23</sup> Gnifka, for example, acknowledges that a few authentic sayings of Jesus have been

---

<sup>22</sup> J. D. Crossan, Sayings Parallels: A Workbook for the Jesus Tradition, Foundations and Facets: New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986) lists 502 discrete sayings, some of them multiply attested, while his later inventory of the "Jesus tradition" (which includes stories as well as sayings) contained 522 items. See Crossan, Historical Jesus, 434–450.

<sup>23</sup> The most notable exceptions are T. Zöckler, Jesu Lehren im Thomasevangelium, Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies 47 (Leiden: Brill, 1999); H.-M. Schenke, "On the Composition History of the Gospel of Thomas," Forum 10.1–2 (1994): 9–30. The most important influence in the rejection of the pertinence of the Gospel of Thomas is W. Schrage, Das Verhältnis des Thomas-Evangeliums zur synoptischen Tradition und zu den koptischen Evangelienübersetzungen: Zugleich ein Betrag zur gnostischen Synoptikerdeutung, BZNW 29 (Berlin: Alfred Töpelmann, 1964). Schrage's argument was that Thomas's Coptic showed dependence on the Coptic translations of the New Testament. Yet Schrage's later study of the Oxyrhynchus fragments ("Evangelienzitate in den Oxyrhynchus-Logien und im koptischen Thomas-Evangelium," in Apophoreta:

preserved in intra-canonical writings outside the gospels (e.g., Acts 20:35), in text-critical variants to the gospels and Acts,<sup>24</sup> and in the Apostolic Fathers,<sup>25</sup> but dismisses more substantial collections of sayings such as the Gospel of Thomas as products of fantasy and heretical (gnostic) developments.<sup>26</sup> Schnackenburg's treatment of the evangelists' representations of Jesus sidesteps extra-canonical gospels by declaring that the traditions contained in these second-, third- and fourth-century documents cannot be compared with those in the four intra-canonical gospels,<sup>27</sup> while Becker simply declares that noncanonical gospels are of little assistance in the discussion of the historical Jesus.<sup>28</sup> Other scholars do not even discuss the noncanonical gospels as sources or proceed as if they were simply irrelevant.<sup>29</sup>

---

Festschrift für Ernst Haenchen zu seinem siebzigsten Geburtstag, ed. W. Eltester and F. Kettler, BZNW 30 [Berlin: Töpelmann, 1964], 251–268) showed that these displayed less similarity to the Greek texts of the gospels, inviting the obvious inferences that either the process of translation of Greek Thomas into Coptic was accompanied by an assimilation of its sayings to Coptic versions of the gospels, or that mutual assimilation occurred during the translation of gospels (both intra-canonical and extra-canonical) into Coptic.

<sup>24</sup> For a convenient tabulation, see J. Delobel, "The Sayings of Jesus in the Textual Tradition," in Logia: Les paroles de Jésus—The Sayings of Jesus: Mémorial Joseph Coppens, ed. J. Delobel, BETL 59 (Leuven: Peeters and Leuven University Press, 1982), 431–457.

<sup>25</sup> H. Köster, Synoptische Überlieferung bei den apostolischen Vätern, TU 65 (Berlin: Akademie Verlag, 1957); J.-M. Sevrin, ed., The New Testament in Early Christianity: La réception des écrits néotestamentaires dans le christianisme primitif, BETL 86 (Leuven: Peeters and Leuven University Press, 1989).

<sup>26</sup> J. Gnillka, Jesus of Nazareth: Message and History (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1997), 12–25, esp. 15.

<sup>27</sup> R. Schnackenburg, Jesus in the Gospels: A Biblical Christology (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1995), 323.

<sup>28</sup> J. Becker, Jesus von Nazareth (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1995), 11–12 treats the matter in a single sentence: "In general the discussion of [noncanonical] sources, apart from the four canonical gospels, has led to the result that it is sometimes possible in individual cases to clarify the exegesis of the synoptics with their help, but taken as a whole this tradition is of little help in the depiction of the proclamation of Jesus." Becker (ibid., 12 n. 15) notes that Crossan holds a different view but does not engage Crossan in any meaningful way.

<sup>29</sup> P. Grelot (Jésus de Nazareth, Christ et Seigneur. Tome 1 [Paris: Cerf, 1997], 215, 264) cites the Gos. Thom. twice, but only to note that it contains parallels to synoptic sayings. Wright (Jesus, 47–48) notes Crossan's use of Gos. Thom. and refers copiously to the gospel at many points throughout his treatment (see 728 s.v. "Gospel of Thomas"). But since he never engages the source-critical issue of whether Thomas preserves early independent tradition, his citations of Thomas play no critical function in his argument whatsoever. At no point do Thomas's sayings make any difference. Wright's treatment of the Gos. Thom. in Christian Origins and the Question of God, vol. 1, The New Testament and the People of God (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress; London: SPCK, 1992), 435–439, likewise avoids the issue of source criticism.

The dismissal of the noncanonical gospels is troubling for several reasons. First, it confuses a theological category (canon) with a historiographic category (materials bearing on an historical figure). There are no a priori grounds for supposing that noncanonical gospels are less reliable historically simply because, for whatever reasons, they did not find their way into the Christian canon. Nor is it justified to suppose that intracanoncial documents are more historically reliable simply because they came to be regarded in the late second century as theologically authoritative. Second, the fact that the manuscripts of noncanonical gospels are second century or later is true but irrelevant. The earliest manuscript of the Egerton Gospel is from the early second century, precisely the same time as our first scrap of the Fourth Gospel.<sup>30</sup> The earliest manuscripts of the Gospel of Thomas (P. Oxy. 1; 655) and the Gospel of Peter (P. Oxy. 2949; 4009) date from about 200 CE, or about the same time as our earliest manuscripts of Matthew and Luke.<sup>31</sup> The latest manuscript attestations for gospels are for Mark (early III CE), P. Oxy. 840 (III or IV CE), the Fayûm Gospel (P. Vindob. G 2325; III CE), P. Merton 51 (III CE) and P. Oxy. 1224 (early IV CE), although Irenaeus's citations of Mark bring the terminus ad quem for Mark to the late II CE. Needless to say, those who dismiss the Gospel of Thomas do not dismiss the intracanoncial gospels merely because their first manuscript attestations come from the late second or early third centuries. Yet Thomas and Peter are routinely brushed aside on just these specious grounds. Third, even if noncanonical gospels were composed (say) in the early second century, the traditions they embody might well be considerably earlier, just as the traditions contained in Matthew and Luke, composed towards the end of the first century or beginning of the second, nonetheless contain historically reliable data. Finally, to observe, as Gnilka and others do, that the Gospel of Thomas is influenced by gnostic thought—an assertion which is itself debatable<sup>32</sup>—settles nothing at all, since all of our gospels betray the theological influences of their editors. It is normal to take into account the theology of an evangelist and to adjust for it when isolating historical tradition; in this regard the Gospel of Thomas is no different from any other gospel.

<sup>30</sup> P. Egerton 2 (before 150 CE); a second fragment of the Egerton Gospel is found in P. Köln V 608 (III CE). P52 (time of Hadrian) is the earliest attestation of the Fourth Gospel; but see the article of A. Schmidt, "Zwei Anmerkungen zu P. Ryl. III 457," APF 35 (1989): 11–12, who suggests a later date for P52 on palaeographical grounds.

<sup>31</sup> Matthew: P104 = P. Oxy. 4404 (second half of the second century); P64, 67; P77 = P. Oxy. 2683 + 4405 (late II CE); P103 = P. Oxy. 4403 (late II/early III CE); P101 = P. Oxy. 4401 (III CE); Mark: P45 (first half of III CE); Luke: P75 (early III CE); Gos. Peter: P. Oxy. 2949 (late II/early III CE); Gos. Thom.: P. Oxy. 1 (ca. 200 CE); 655 (early III CE); P. Oxy. 1224 (early IV CE).

<sup>32</sup> See S. L. Davies, The Gospel of Thomas and Christian Wisdom (New York: Seabury, 1983).

In contrast to these hasty, even a priori dismissals of noncanonical gospels, North American scholarship has with some exceptions<sup>33</sup> adopted a more careful position. Sanders suggests that “only some of the sayings in the Gospel of Thomas are worth consideration.”<sup>34</sup> Meier devotes an entire chapter to agrapha and apocryphal gospels, but concludes that upon analysis these documents offer nothing new or authentic that is independent of the intra-canonical gospels.<sup>35</sup> Meier’s conclusions regarding both the Gospel of Peter and the Gospel of Thomas are based on an argument that these documents betray knowledge of the redactional elements of the synoptics and therefore must be posterior to them.<sup>36</sup>

---

<sup>33</sup> E.g., L. T. Johnson, The Real Jesus: The Misguided Quest for the Historical Jesus and the Truth of the Traditional Gospels (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1996), 89; and Ben Witherington (The Jesus Quest: The Third Search for the Jew of Nazareth [Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1995]), who cites R. J. Bauckham’s (“Gospels [Apocryphal],” Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels, ed. J. B. Green and S. McKnight [Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1992], 286–291) “balanced” comment to the effect that Thomas is substantially independent of the canonical gospels, but then concludes “it is my own judgment that only very rarely does Thomas provide an earlier form of a saying that is also found in the Synoptics” (49). He also suggests (without discussing any texts) that “of the sayings in Thomas that have no parallels in the Synoptics, a few may be authentic” (49; emphasis original). This admission is both ironic and moot: Witherington chides the Jesus Seminar for overrating the Gos. Thom., but the Jesus Seminar did not consider any of the sayings in Thomas lacking a synoptic parallel to be ‘red’ (undoubtedly authentic) and treated only two (sayings 97 and 98, both parables) as ‘pink’ (probably authentic). But Witherington’s conclusion has no force, since whatever he says about the authenticity of the sayings in the Gos. Thom., it does not figure in his portrait of Jesus at all.

<sup>34</sup> E. P. Sanders, The Historical Figure of Jesus (Harmondsworth: Penguin Books, 1993), 64. Similarly, James H. Charlesworth, in “Jesus in the Agrapha and Apocryphal Gospels,” in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. J. H. Charlesworth and C. A. Evans, NTTTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 478–533, citing the cautiously positive evaluation of some sayings in the Gos. Thom. by B. Chilton, “The Gospel According to Thomas as a Source of Jesus’ Teaching,” in The Jesus Tradition Outside the Gospels, ed. D. Wenham, Gospel Perspectives 5 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1985), 155–175.

<sup>35</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew I, 112–166, esp. 139–140. Meier’s position, however, is quite moderate: “I will always keep one eye on the sayings in this Gospel [the Gos. Thom.] as a check on my own interpretation of the data in the canonical Gospels. Even if the Gospel of Thomas represents only a gnostic reworking of the synoptic tradition, what Thomas does to that tradition may highlight certain aspects of it that otherwise might be overlooked.”

<sup>36</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew I, 123–139; “Dividing Lines in Jesus Research Today: Through Dialectical Negation to a Positive Sketch,” Int 50.4 (1996): 357, referring to the work

The issue that Meier raises—whether the Gospel of Thomas reflects the editorial features of the synoptics—is the pertinent one, but Meier’s conclusions can be disputed. All of the instances he cites of Thomas’s alleged knowledge of Matthean redactional features<sup>37</sup> involve Matthean special material where it is not possible to say with certainty that these are Matthew’s redactional creations. Indeed, Meier equivocates, saying that “some of the M passages may be Matthew’s own redactional creations,” that they “sound suspiciously Matthean,” and that they are “possibly redactional.”<sup>38</sup> Similarly, Thomas’s agreement with Lukan special material proves nothing about dependence unless one can establish that Luke created these sayings. On the other hand, where it is possible to control Matthean and Lukan redaction, such as in the Parable of the Tenants (Mark 12:1–12 || Gos. Thom. 65–66), Thomas’s version of the story not only lacks all the elements of Matthean and Lukan redaction; it also lacks the elements that C. H. Dodd long ago suspected as Markan editing: Mark 12:5, which disrupts the folkloric triad of three sendings; the designation of the son as ἀγαπητός (Mark 12:6); and the probable of C. M. Tuckett, “Thomas and the Synoptics,” NovT 30.2 (1988): 132–157; see also idem, “Q and Thomas: Evidence of a Primitive ‘Wisdom Gospel?’ A Response to H. Koester,” ETL 67 (1991): 346–360; B. Dehandschutter, “L’Évangile de Thomas comme collection de paroles de Jésus,” in Logia: Les Paroles de Jésus—The Sayings of Jesus, ed. Delobel, 507–515; “Recent Research on the Gospel of Thomas,” The Four Gospels 1992: Festschrift Frans Neirynck, ed. F. VanSegbroeck, C. Tuckett, G. VanBelle, and J. Verheyden, BETL 100 (Leuven: Leuven University Press and Peeters, 1992), 2257–2262.

<sup>37</sup> Meier (Marginal Jew I, 135) cites Matt 6:1–18 / Sayings 6, 18 (sayings on almsgiving, prayer and fasting); Matt 13:47–50 / Saying 8 (the parables of the net); Matt 13:44 / Saying 109 (the parable of the treasure); Matt 13:44–46 / Saying 76 (the parable of the pearl); Matt 18:20 / Saying 30 (“where two or three are gathered”); Matt 10:16b / Saying 39 (the proverb about being shrewd as snakes); Matt 15:13 / Saying 40 (the uprooting of foreign plants); Matt 13:24–30 / Saying 57 (the parable of the weeds); Matt 11:28–30 / Saying 90; Matt 7:6 / Saying 93.

Meier adds saying 33 (Q 12:3), 34 (Q 6:39), 99 (Matt 12:50; cf. Mark 3:35), all of which have Q or Markan parallels. None of these latter texts is decisive: in the case of Saying 33, the International Q Project (IQP) reconstructs Q with Matthew rather than Luke, which means that Thomas agrees with both Matthew and Q, not with an element of Matthean redaction; in the case of Saying 34, the differences between Thomas and Matthew are much more extensive than the one point of similarity (the use of a conditional) (see S. J. Patterson, The Gospel of Thomas and Jesus, Foundations and Facets: Reference Series [Sonoma, CA: Polebridge, 1993], 34); and in the case of Saying 99, the agreement of Thomas with Matthew in the use of “my father” (paiewt) rather than “God” (so Mark) is scarcely significant, since Thomas’s ordinary term for God is “my father.”

For the IQP text of Q, see J. M. Robinson, P. Hoffmann, and J. S. Kloppenborg, eds., The Critical Edition of Q, Hermeneia Supplements (Leuven: Peeters; Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2000).

allusion to the destruction of Jerusalem (Mark 12:9b).<sup>39</sup> Thomas also lacks the details in Mark 12:1 borrowed from Isa 5:1–7 which, because they are irrelevant to the narrative itself, Jeremias regarded as secondary enhancements that allegorize the parable.<sup>40</sup> In this case at least, it is very difficult to maintain that Thomas knew the synoptics, since then it would be necessary to make the unlikely supposition that Thomas also identified and excised all elements of Matthean, Lukan and Markan redaction. The more probable hypothesis is that Thomas is here independent of the synoptics.

This conclusion of course should not automatically be extrapolated to the Gospel of Thomas as a whole, much less to other noncanonical gospels. Since the Gospel of Thomas has a complex transmission history, involving early Greek and later Coptic recensions, one has to reckon with the possibility that versions of sayings from the intra-canonical gospels influenced the transmission and/or translation of Thomas, just as early manuscripts of the intra-canonical gospels already display the scribal tendency to harmonize one gospel with another. It should be kept in mind that the Coptic version of Thomas dates from the same time as Codex  $\aleph$  and B, both of which also display some harmonizing readings. That Coptic Thomas contains both readings independent of the synoptics and readings harmonized with the synoptics should not surprise us. The sayings in the Gospel of Thomas (and other noncanonical gospels) must be examined individually to determine the extent of interference from the synoptic gospels. And they must be subjected to the same tests of authenticity that are applied to the synoptic sayings. Such examination has indeed made a strong case that the Gospel of Thomas does contain some independent material, including some authentic Jesus tradition.<sup>41</sup> Such material provides another window on the early Jesus tradition.

<sup>38</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew I, 135 (emphasis added).

<sup>39</sup> C. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom, rev. ed. (London: James Nisbet, 1961) 98. On the secondary nature of Mark 12:9 (missing in Thomas), see J. S. Kloppenborg, "Self-Help or Deus Ex Machina in Mark 12:9?" NTS 50 (2004): 495–518.

<sup>40</sup> J. Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus, rev. ed. (based on 8th 1970 German ed.; London: SCM; New York: Scribner's, 1972), 70–71. On the Septuagintal character of the Isaian allusions, see J. S. Kloppenborg, "Egyptian Viticultural Practices and the Citation of Isa 5:1–7 in Mark 12:1–9," NovT 44.2 (2002): 134–159. Both Mark and Thomas associate a quotation of Ps 118:22–23 with the parable, but Thomas treats it as a separate saying, introduced by "Jesus said" while Mark integrates the quotation into the parable itself. Patterson (Gospel of Thomas and Jesus, 50–51) rightly regards Thomas's loose association as more primitive than Mark's more elegant form.

<sup>41</sup> See F. T. Fallon and R. Cameron, "The Gospel of Thomas: A Forschungsbericht and Analysis," ANRW II 25.6 (1988): 4195–4251; C. W. Hedrick, "Thomas and the

The inclusion of noncanonical materials in the database raises the possibility that some sayings or stories completely unattested in the intra-canonical gospels might contribute to a portrait of Jesus and indeed might decisively affect it. In practice, however, only a very small number of such sayings have survived scrutiny and even these do not introduce a radically new perspective on Jesus.<sup>42</sup> The more important effect of considering noncanonical gospels is to underscore through multiple attestation the widespread currency of certain sayings or aspects of Jesus' teachings. In doing so, they also provide an indication of the extent to which some sayings already known from the synoptics have been subordinated to other interests in the intra-canonical gospels or even filtered out of later portraits of Jesus, perhaps because they did not fit the tendencies of the theologies of the second and subsequent centuries.

Crossan's use of the Gospel of Thomas neatly illustrates the point. Crossan begins his discussion of the reign of God in Jesus' preaching with two multiply attested sayings, the saying about children and the kingdom, which has four independent attestations (Gos. Thom. 22; Mark 10:13–16; Matt 18:3; John 3:1–10) and the blessing of the poor, with three independent attestations (Q 6:20b; Gos. Thom. 54; Jas 2:5). These two units exemplify for Crossan a fundamental aspect of Jesus' view of the kingdom as a "Kingdom of Nobodies"—a view of the kingdom in sharp contrast to the triumphalistic views espoused in some other sectors of Second Temple Judaism.<sup>43</sup> These sayings units are foundational in Crossan's treatment precisely because multiple independent attestation indicates their wide impact on independent streams of gospel (and other) compositions, even if each gospel interpreted the sayings somewhat differently. When one turns to scholars who ignore or downplay noncanonical gospels—Sanders, Meyer, Gnilka, Witherington and Wright<sup>44</sup>—the contrast with Crossan is striking. While all of these authors cite Q 6:20b (though only passingly), Mark 10:13–16 and its parallels are not used at all as part of an effort to characterize Jesus' view of the reign of God.

Synoptics: Aiming at a Consensus," SecCent 7.1 (1990): 39–56.

<sup>42</sup> See above n. 33, on Gos. Thom. 97, 98. Funk (Honest to Jesus, 331) adds to these only Gos. Thom. 42 ("Become passersby") on which the Jesus Seminar was evenly divided (and hence treated it a "gray").

<sup>43</sup> Crossan, Historical Jesus, 265–276.

<sup>44</sup> B. F. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus (London: SCM, 1979). On Witherington, see above

The effect of ignoring Mark 10:13–16 is noteworthy. By itself Q 6:20b can be read as an expression of the expectation that God will intervene in the near future on behalf of the poor and oppressed.<sup>45</sup> But when Q 6:20b is interpreted alongside Mark 10:13–16, what becomes more visible is the contrast between statuses: the rich (who are usually thought to be blessed) versus the poor, and adults and other persons with status versus insignificant, non-statused persons. Thus, the kingdom as characterized by Q 6:20b and Mark 10:13–16 is not just about God’s eventual elevation of the poor and lowly, but an implicit threat in the present to the customary valuations of hierarchy, wealth and power. Crossan’s “Kingdom of Nobodies” includes a critical nuance that is lacking in the more usual constructions of the Kingdom based on Q 6:20b. Without using noncanonical gospels to import new sayings, Crossan’s procedure allows him to lift up authentic intra-canonical sayings which, because of their radical character, are in danger of being ignored by those who base their portraits solely on the intra-canonical gospels.

2. A second problem also has to do with the relationship among sources. In an earlier era influenced by form criticism, gospel material was treated rather indiscriminately, as if the order of composition of the gospels did not matter much. This was due to the assumption of form criticism that the evangelists contributed little to the gospels apart from the juxtaposition of individual units of tradition. With the advent of redaction criticism, the editorial contribution of the evangelists became more important and, with it, the issue of the synoptic problem potentially took on new significance.

The degree to which solutions to the synoptic problem have been influential on historical Jesus scholarship has varied widely. For Schweitzer (a student of Holtzmann), the saying that played a fundamental role was Matt 10:23, an unparalleled saying which, from a compositional view, was secondary to Matthew’s combining of Mark with Q. Even Käsemann’s groundbreaking 1954 essay that inaugurated the so-called New Quest of the historical Jesus—written at the beginning of the era of redaction criticism—took as paradigmatic Matthew’s antitheses, which are largely if not completely the product of Matthew’s editing of Mark, Q and his own special material.<sup>46</sup> In other historical Jesus scholarship

n. 33; on Wright, see n. 8.

<sup>45</sup> Cf. Meier (Marginal Jew II, 317–336), who, unlike Sanders, Meyer, Gnilka, Witherington and Wright, gives Q 6:20b considerable attention and makes it a fundamental part of his characterization of the kingdom.

the special Lukan parables played a dominant role while Mark and Q are given second position.

Dieter Lührmann once observed that despite the very widespread acceptance of the two-document hypothesis, with its corollaries of the priority of Mark and Q, historical Jesus scholarship has turned again and again to Matthew's portrait of Jesus and privileged the Matthean issues of Jesus and the Torah.<sup>47</sup> This methodological inconsistency has been faced in some of the newer wave of historical Jesus scholarship. Integral to the fabric of Crossan's method is careful attention to stratigraphy and source criticism. He disciplines himself by a rigorous adherence to the principle of multiple, early, and independent attestations of traditions about Jesus. This means that traditions attested in several independent documents (e.g., Mark and Q and the Gos. Thom.) are weighted more heavily than singly attested materials (e.g., the Lukan Parable of the Good Samaritan). His attention to stratigraphy, which parcels out the tradition into several strata, is expressly connected to his acceptance of the two-document hypothesis and of the essential independence of the Gospel of Thomas from the synoptics. Whether one agrees with these source-critical judgments or not is not the point here; rather, the point is that for Crossan, the synoptic problem has affected his understanding of the Jesus tradition in a way that it did not in earlier generations of historical Jesus scholarship and some contemporary Jesus scholarship.<sup>48</sup>

The influence of source criticism can also be seen on E.P. Sanders' recent The Historical Figure of Jesus. Sanders does not adhere to the two-document hypothesis but instead adopts a version of the Mark-without-Q hypothesis, which asserts Markan priority but holds that Matthew used Mark and that Luke used both.<sup>49</sup> This helps to account for the fact

<sup>46</sup> Above, n. 5.

<sup>47</sup> D. Lührmann, "Die Logienquelle und die Frage nach dem historischen Jesus" (Unpublished paper presented at the Fall 1991 Meeting of the Westar Institute, Edmonton, Alberta, October 24–27, 1991).

<sup>48</sup> Although B. L. Mack's A Myth of Innocence: Mark and Christian Origins (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988) was intended as a book on Mark (despite widespread misreadings that took it to be a book on Jesus), Mack's brief treatment of Jesus (53–77) took source criticism seriously in a way not seen since the time of Harnack. See further, B. L. Mack, "Q and a Cynic-Like Jesus" (Paper presented at the Annual Meeting of the C.S.B.S., Ottawa 1993), in Whose Historical Jesus? ed. W. E. Arnal and M. Desjardins, Etudes sur le christianisme et le judaïsme/Studies in Christianity and Judaism 7 (Waterloo, ON: Canadian Corporation for Studies in Religion/Corporation canadienne des sciences religieuses by Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1997), 25–36.

<sup>49</sup> This is sometimes called the Farrer hypothesis, or Farrer-Goulder hypothesis. For a justification of "Mark without Q," see J. S. Kloppenborg, "On Dispensing with Q?"

that Sanders' book follows essentially the outline of Mark (although he is far from uncritical in his use of Mark). Similarly, William Farmer's The Gospel of Jesus privileges Matthew in what he says about Jesus for the reason that Farmer advocates the Two-Gospel hypothesis, which places Matthew first, makes Luke directly dependent on Matthew, and Mark a conflation of Matthew and Luke.<sup>50</sup> The point here, again, is not whether either the Mark-without-Q or the Two-Gospel hypothesis is an adequate description of synoptic relationships; I do not think that they account for the data as adequately as the two-document hypothesis. But both Sanders and Farmer have taken seriously their own source-critical convictions in a way that most others have not.<sup>51</sup>

3. A final comment on the sources of the Jesus tradition brings us back to the issues of extragospel sources and the synoptic problem. Elsewhere I have suggested that a method of 'triangulation' be employed, judging various modern construals of the significance and character of the Jesus tradition against the interpretive commonalities of traditions that appear independently in multiple streams of tradition.<sup>52</sup>

This presumes that usage of the Jesus tradition was essentially conservative—conservative not in relation to macrosocietal values but in relationship to usage in the Jesus movement. That is, while Mark and Q, for example, might (and in fact do) deploy sayings (or stories such as the Temptation account) somewhat differently, it would require Goodacre on the Relation of Luke to Matthew," NTS 49.2 (2003): 210–236.

<sup>50</sup> W. R. Farmer, The Gospel of Jesus: The Pastoral Relevance of the Synoptic Problem (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1994).

<sup>51</sup> It is important not to confuse taking solutions to the synoptic problem seriously (i.e., not basing a portrait of Jesus on what in terms of a compositional theory is redactional and tertiary), with a naive use of synoptic problem conclusions (i.e., that on the two-document hypothesis only Mark and Q, or the earliest compositional strata of Mark and Q, need be considered in a portrait of Jesus). Elsewhere I have insisted that composition history should not be confused with tradition history, i.e., that one should not confuse conclusions about, e.g., the composition history of Q with the issue of what in Q goes back to Jesus: The Formation of Q: Trajectories in Ancient Wisdom Collections, Studies in Antiquity and Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987; 2nd ed., Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2000), 245; Excavating Q: The History and Setting of the Sayings Gospel (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress; Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 2000), 351–352. Similarly, J. Schröter, "Anfänge der Jesusüberlieferung: Überlieferungsgeschichtliche Beobachtungen zu einem Bereich urchristlicher Theologiegeschichte," NTS 50 (2004): 75: "Daß die Frage nach den Anfängen der Jesusüberlieferung von der Lösung des synoptischen Problems zu unterscheiden ist, ist weithin anerkannt und wird durch das hier Dargelegte noch einmal unterstrichen. Frühe Stufen der Jesusüberlieferung können sich in verschiedenen, kanonisch ebenso wie apokryph gewordenen Schriften finden."

<sup>52</sup> J. S. Kloppenborg, "Discursive Practices in the Sayings Gospel Q and the Quest of the Historical Jesus," in The Sayings Source Q and the Historical Jesus, ed. A. Lindemann, more effort to overcome the inertia of received usage and interpretation and to give to a saying of Jesus or anecdote about Jesus a radically different meaning.<sup>53</sup> I do not mean to say that reinterpretations—even significant reinterpretations—were not possible and did not sometimes occur; only that we should a priori expect more by way of continuity than discontinuity.<sup>54</sup> The corollary of this is that when one observes two or three independent deployments of a saying of Jesus, each offering the same general construal, it would be perverse to conclude that the ‘original’ meaning differed substantially from the view taken in two or three independent textualizations.

A case in point is the macarism concerning the poor, which occurs in Q 6:20, Gos. Thom. 54 and in a refracted form in Jas 2:5. Meier offers a futuristic interpretation of the Q beatitudes which borders on anti-Pelagian: God alone “acts in the end time to establish his kingdom...; humans can only wait for it”; the kingdom will indeed reverse the plights of the poor and downtrodden, but this reversal will be God’s gratuitous act. The proclamation of the kingdom does not imply any program of social or political resistance.<sup>55</sup> By contrast, Marcus Borg sees Q 6:20b as a challenge to “the connection between righteousness and prosperity made by conventional wisdom”<sup>56</sup> and thus regards it as a saying which quite directly engaged social and political values and implied an alternate program. Indeed, Borg suggests that the Jesus group, organized around BETL 158 (Leuven: Leuven University Press and Peeters, 2001), 149–190.

<sup>53</sup> M. I. Finley, The World of Odysseus, 2nd rev. ed. (New York: Viking; London: Chatto & Windus, 1978), 145, comments on the ‘control’ an audience exerts on composition: “one rule of oral composition before an audience is that the poem must satisfy the requirement of verisimilitude—I do not say truth—over which the audience exercises extensive control.” See also F. G. Downing, “Word-Processing in the Ancient World: The Social Production and Performance of Q,” JSNT 64 (1996): 29–48.

<sup>54</sup> Compare B. T. Viviano, “The Historical Jesus in the Doubly Attested Sayings: An Experiment,” RB 103.3 (1996): 367–410, esp. 408, who suggests an approach to the historical Jesus by isolating and analyzing 31 Mark-Q overlap texts. Viviano makes several important observations, for example, that the substantial overlap between Mark and Q indicates that the “Jesus tradition was more carefully controlled than, say, the lives of Byzantine saints” (where much more variation is attested between independent versions of a saint’s life).

<sup>55</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew II, 330–331. “If the unhappy are paradoxically happy, it is precisely because of the imminence of the kingdom of God, because God is about to seize his rightful rule over his rebellious creation and people and set things right. The beatitudes make no sense without, indeed demand as their proper context, Jesus’ proclamation of the imminent coming of the kingdom of God... We begin to see why Jesus was not interested in and did not issue pronouncements about concrete social and political reforms, either for the world in general or for Israel in particular. He was not proclaiming the reform of the world; he was proclaiming the end of the world.”

<sup>56</sup> M. J. Borg, Jesus, A New Vision: Spirit, Culture, and the Life of Discipleship (San

the “politics of compassion,” is unlikely to have been characterized by gross economic inequities among its members.<sup>57</sup> Patterson and Crossan give a yet more radical reading, but one that is clearly more consonant with those of Borg and Horsley than with Meier. The beatitude in Q and the Gospel of Thomas is an instance of countercultural wisdom and cultural critique.<sup>58</sup> Q 6:20b belongs to a cluster of sayings that variously valorize the poor, expendables and degraded, criticize wealth and employ a series of dubious metaphors by which to describe the kingdom: weeds, leaven and ill-gotten treasures. This kingdom was not simply a hope for the future but entailed a concrete set of social practices and countercultural behaviours.

We are fortunate to have three textualizations of the first beatitude, Q 6:20b (21–23, 27–35), Gos. Thom. 54 and Jas 2:5. The Gospel of Thomas has three of the four Q beatitudes (Gos. Thom. 54, 69b, 68, 69a), although they are not serialized in the way they appear in Q 6:20b–23 while Jas 2:5 appears to allude to the saying, although not in its form as a beatitude.<sup>59</sup> What is important to note is that while none of the three independent inscriptions of the beatitude propose quite the radical interpretation assigned it by Patterson and Crossan, each suggests a rhetoric of social critique (pace Meier). Moreover, there is no reason to think that imminent eschatological beliefs are part of the framework of the Gospel of Thomas, and in the case of James the point of James’ argument in 2:1–13 is not to endorse a futuristic eschatology but to encourage a social practice in the present that is based on a reevaluation of values.<sup>60</sup> Q itself uses the beatitude in the context of a larger argument encouraging specific transformative behaviours: reevaluation of enmity, insult, victimization and requests for loans (Q 6:27–35), concluded with the appeal to a god whose children are known by the fact that they emulate the generosity or mercy of God (6:35). Thus whatever one might think of Q 6:20b in isolation, in the rhetorics of Q 6:20b–35, Jas 2:1–13 and the Gospel of Thomas it is not about an apocalyptic fantasy of reversal of economic states brought about solely by God’s future action; rather, it belongs to the elaboration of a critique of existing social states and the proposal for an experiment in transformative behaviour.

Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987), 136.

<sup>57</sup> Borg, Jesus, A New Vision, 137. Similarly, Horsley, Spiral of Violence, 248–251.

<sup>58</sup> Patterson, Gospel of Thomas and Jesus, 207, 220; Crossan, Historical Jesus, 273–274.

<sup>59</sup> See P. J. Hartin, James and the “Q” Sayings of Jesus, JSNTSup 47 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1991), 149–150; D. B. Deppe, “The Sayings of Jesus in the Epistle of James” (D.Th. diss., Free University of Amsterdam; Ann Arbor, MI: Bookcrafters, 1989), 89–91.

I have no interest in playing future eschatology against a present eschatology or in arguing that these sayings are exclusively one or the other. There are no doubt unrealized (i.e., future) aspects to the kingdom, especially in Q 6:20b and Jas 2:5. The point is, rather, that the blessing of the poor, as it has been inscribed in the rhetorical practice of several distinct groups in the Jesus movement, is used to articulate a critique of existing structures and to undergird alternate patterns of behaviour. That at the Jesus level this saying was meant as a bald affirmation of the “gratuitous nature of God’s eschatological saving action” is not logically impossible; but that is not the way we encounter it in independent and early discursive formations. It is these early deployments, I suggest, that serve as the most reliable guide to any hypothetical earlier uses.

What I am proposing here is an approach to the Jesus tradition which attends to the rhetorical inscriptions of sayings and stories in later documents—not merely the canonical gospels, but in other texts of the early Jesus movement—and which uses these inscriptions as an index of earlier, perhaps dominical usage.

3. The Criteria and their Application

For most of the last quarter of the twentieth century it was Norman Perrin’s designation and enumeration of the criteria of authenticity that set the agenda for discussion.<sup>61</sup> Perrin, a student of Jeremias and strongly influenced by Bultmann, stressed the importance both of Aramaic as the linguistic environment of Jesus, a preoccupation of Jeremias, and of the necessity of reconstructing a history of the Jesus tradition, the legacy of Bultmann. But Perrin’s main criteria were ‘dissimilarity,’ which isolated a small core of highly distinctive materials, and ‘coherence,’ logically dependent upon dissimilarity, which allowed for an expansion of this small core by materials that cohered with the dissimilar sayings and accounts. Perrin was more dubious that multiple attestation would help much when it came to sayings of Jesus, but allowed that multiply attested motifs (e.g., Jesus’ association with sinners) likely pointed to authentic tradition.<sup>62</sup>

<sup>60</sup> For details of the argument, see Kloppenborg, “Discursive Practices,” 180–186.

<sup>61</sup> See D. Polkow, “Method and Criteria for Historical Jesus Research,” in Society of Biblical Literature 1987 Seminar Papers, ed. K. H. Richards, SBLSP 26 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1987), 336–356.

<sup>62</sup> N. Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (New York: Harper & Row, 1967),

At least three different problems have dogged the application of Perrin's criteria.

3.1. Tradition-history

The first concerns both the reconstruction of a tradition history of each saying and story and judging the extent to which a particular saying or story is dissimilar from the characteristic interests of the early Jesus movement. There is still general agreement that it is necessary to discount material that is, in Sanders' words, "too much with the grain" of the editorial interests of the evangelists.<sup>63</sup> For example, a saying such as Mark 13:10, predicting a Gentile mission, is so congenial with Mark's interests that they cannot easily be ascribed to Jesus. But what of Mark 7:24–30, which includes a derogatory saying about Gentiles (Mark 7:27) but which concludes with Jesus granting a Gentile request for an exorcism? Sanders argues that at least the saying, Mark 7:27, is "highly probable" as an authentic saying, and uses this to support his contention that while Jesus may have occasionally encountered Gentiles, his primary orientation was to Jews. In its consideration of the entire Markan pericope, the Jesus Seminar "concluded that there was probably a historical core to Mark's version," although curiously they raised more doubts about the saying itself.<sup>64</sup>

While the saying by itself seems to be "against the grain" of Mark's interests, it may be wondered whether the saying ever had an existence apart from the story in which it is embedded. Funk and Hoover, summarizing the earlier discussion of the Jesus Seminar of the saying alone (Mark 7:27), observed that it is nowhere attested as an independent aphorism.<sup>65</sup> If the saying is indeed inseparable from the context, then the story taken as a whole is not so uncongenial with Mark's interests,

39–49. —

<sup>63</sup> E. P. Sanders and M. Davies, Studying the Synoptic Gospels (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1989), 304–315.

<sup>64</sup> R. W. Funk and The Jesus Seminar, The Acts of Jesus: What Did Jesus Really Do? (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1998), 96–97. The report indicates that the fellows of the seminar thought it unlikely that Jesus' followers would have invented a story in which Jesus was outwitted by a woman, but were dubious about the geographical setting, the saying in Mark 7:27, and whether the original story attributed the success of the exorcism to the woman's wit or to her trust in Jesus. This creates an apparently contradictory situation, however: the argument for authenticity pertains to the nature of the exchange between Jesus and the woman and presupposes that she is non Jewish; yet the particulars of the exchange (Mark 7:27) and its setting (in a Gentile region) are doubted.

<sup>65</sup> R. W. Funk and R. W. Hoover, The Five Gospels: What Did Jesus Really Say? (San

since in the end a Gentile wins Jesus' favour. Indeed, this is just what Meier argues: Mark 7:24–30 fits very well with Mark's overall framework in Mark 7, which concerns the relationship of Gentiles to Jews, and "carries the heavy freight of later Christian theology, specifically a theology of mission."<sup>66</sup> In particular, Meier sees the affirmation of Mark 7:27, ἄφες πρῶτον χορτασθῆναι τὰ τέκνα, as reflecting Paul's missionary dictum, "first to the Jews, then the Greeks."<sup>67</sup> Thus while some sayings straightforwardly can be assigned to later stages of the tradition of the Jesus movement and show themselves to be too congenial with its interests to be treated as authentic, it is much more difficult in other cases to decide whether a saying is indeed 'against the grain' and therefore belongs to an early, dominical stratum, or in fact served the interests of later tradents. And here we cannot appeal to multiple attestation to show that the story had any significant pre-Markan circulation.

Recent scholarship on Q has raised another problem pertaining to writing a history of the tradition and the test of dissimilarity. The Twelve Thrones saying in Q 22:28–30 has often been ascribed to the historical Jesus on the basis of dissimilarity. Dupont's reasoning is typical:

Le logion qui nous occupe reflète cette situation, qui va se modifier après Pâques; se rapportant à un jugement d'Israël, corrélatif à une mission concernant Israël, il se rattache à une période qui n'est plus celle de l'Église primitive et de la première expansion du christianisme. Cet "archaïsme" est une garantie de sa valeur historique.<sup>68</sup>

As is well known Matt 19:28 || Luke 22:28–30 figures importantly in Sanders' reconstruction, since it buttresses his contention that Jesus anticipated the restoration of Israel.<sup>69</sup>

Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1993), 70.

<sup>66</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew II, 660.

<sup>67</sup> Wright (Jesus, 192, 195, 445, 533) treats both the exorcism and the saying as authentic without argument. Similarly, Horsley, Spiral of Violence, 252 (on Mark 7:27). B. Witherington, The Christology of Jesus (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1990), 124–126 does not comment on Mark 7:27 but argues that Matt 15:24 and Matt 10:6 are not likely to have been the creations of Matthew because they are "at odds with the universalist thrust of the First Gospel." Matt 15:24 is, however, a Matthean addition to the Markan story (7:24–30) and patterned on Matt 10:6. Sanders and Davies (Studying, 311–312) treats Mark 7:27 as authentic but Matt 10:6 and 15:24 as nonauthentic.

<sup>68</sup> J. Dupont, "Le Logion de douze trônes (Mt 19, 28; Lc 22, 28–30)," Bib 45 (1964): 355–392. This argument is followed by G. R. Beasley-Murray, Jesus and the Kingdom of God (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans; Exeter: Paternoster, 1986), 277. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 98–106, treats the saying because of its use of the term "twelve." He considers Matthew's ἐπὶ δώδεκα θρόνους to be original, arguing that Luke deleted δώδεκα because of embarrassment about the betrayal of Judas.

But the saying, which probably concluded Q,<sup>70</sup> is also deeply embedded in the rhetoric of Q as a document. As a saying promising a forensic role to the followers of Jesus vis à vis the people of Israel, this saying is at the intersection of several rhetorical developments. First, threats of judgment are prominent in the redactional framing of the document, appearing at the beginning (Q 3:2, 7–9, 16–17), in redactional transitions (e.g., 10:12; 11:49–51), and variously throughout (10:13–15; 11:31–32; 11:49–51; 13:28–29, 34–35).<sup>71</sup> Since Q opens with John’s judgment saying threatening the “children of Abraham,” the mention of the Twelve Tribes in Q 22:28–30 represents an inclusio. Second, Q 22:28–30 recapitulates and extends the motif of the judgment of “this generation” or Jesus’ contemporaries that has been voiced at several points: Q 7:31–35; 10:12, 13–15; 11:31–32; 11:49–51. The saying, in fact, is part of a subtle logic in which the judgment of John’s Coming One, who in Q 7:18–22 is identified with Jesus, is transferred to Jesus’ followers, whom Q has already identified as representatives of Jesus (Q 10:16). Finally, Q 22:28–30 functions as the conclusion of a smaller cluster of sayings (17:23–24, 26–27 [28–29] 30, 34–35, 37; 19:12–26) which begins by evoking terrifying spectres of a judgment and destruction that cannot be anticipated, calculated, or rationalized.<sup>72</sup> Q 22:28–30 provides the rhetorical counterbalance for these spectres by assuring Jesus’ followers (ὕμεῖς οἱ ἀκολουθήσαντές μοι) that they, like those who “bring forth fruit worthy of repentance” (3:8), will not suffer the fate of 17:26–27 and 19:24 but will share corregency with Jesus.

While it is true that Q 22:28–30 is not congenial with the interests of Matthew or Luke insofar as it reflects a situation prior to “l’extension universelle de la mission,” this saying is completely congenial with the interests of Q, whose horizon of interest does not extend much beyond Jewish Palestine and which uses Gentiles either as negative stereotypes or as rhetorical instruments to shame Jews. The fact that the expression of judgment fits so well with Q’s redactional framing ought to raise

<sup>69</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 98–106. Similarly, Horsley, Spiral of Violence, 199–208.

<sup>70</sup> E. Bammel, “Das Ende von Q,” in Verborum Veritas: Festschrift für Gustav Stählin zum 70. Geburtstag, ed. O. Böcher and K. Haacker (Wuppertal: Brockhaus, 1970), 39–50.

<sup>71</sup> For details, see Kloppenborg, Excavating Q, 118–122, and earlier, the influential study of D. Lührmann, Die Redaktion der Logienquelle, WMANT 33 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1969).

<sup>72</sup> The terrifying nature of Q’s conclusion is often overlooked. See J. S. Kloppenborg, “Jesus and the Parables of Jesus in Q,” in The Gospel behind the Gospels: Current Studies serious suspicions about the authenticity of the saying.<sup>73</sup> Thus it is not only necessary to ask whether a particular saying is congenial with the interests of the synoptic evangelists or dissimilar to them, but also to ask the same question about intervening strata of tradition such as Q. Q can no longer be treated as a neutral repository of sayings of Jesus but must be treated analogous to Mark, taking into account Q's own editorial tendencies and discounting any sayings that are too much "with the grain" of Q's interests.<sup>74</sup>

3.2. The Criterion of Dissimilarity

A second problematic area concerns the criterion of dissimilarity (also called "discontinuity" [Meier] or "uniqueness" [Sanders]).<sup>75</sup> This criterion isolates materials that are dissimilar, both to the characteristic emphases of contemporary Judaism and of primitive Christianity. Thus, for example, the injunction "let the dead bury the dead" in response to a request of a would-be follower first to bury his father (Luke 9:59–60) is shocking in the context of Second Temple Judaism (and, indeed, the Mediterranean world). It is hardly a piece of common lore taken over from the culture and placed on Jesus' lips, and it would hardly have been formulated by the early Jesus movement, which displayed no inclination to challenge contemporary burial practices.

Closely related to dissimilarity is Meier's criterion of "embarrassment," which looks for materials that proved embarrassing to early Christians—e.g., the fact that Jesus was baptized by John—and which the evangelists tried to rationalize in various ways. The embarrassment felt by the evangelists is a good indication that such traditions would not have been invented by early Christians but came from Jesus himself. The criterion of dissimilarity and embarrassment isolates a small set of highly distinctive materials—indispensable for any portrait, but insufficient in themselves for a comprehensive picture of Jesus.

on Q, ed. R. A. Piper, NovTSup 75 (Leiden: Brill, 1995), 295–300.

<sup>73</sup> For details, see Kloppenborg, Excavating Q, 118–153.

<sup>74</sup> Thus I reject entirely Meier's characterization of Q as a "grab bag" (Meier, Marginal Jew II, 181; repeated in Meier, "Dividing Lines in Jesus Research Today: Through Dialectical Negation to a Positive Sketch," 358). Meier, Marginal Jew II, 178–180, tries to justify this view by exaggerating the disparities within Q, in contrast to much recent Q research of all stripes, which has stressed the overall coherence of the collection. For a survey, see J. S. Kloppenborg, "The Sayings Gospel Q: Literary and Stratigraphic Problems," in Symbols and Strata: Essays on the Sayings Gospel Q, ed. R. Uro, Suomen Eksegeettisen Seuran Julkaisuja, Publications of the Finnish Exegetical Society 65 (Helsinki: Finnish Exegetical Society; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1996), 1–66.

<sup>75</sup> Polkow, "Method and Criteria," 347–350; Meier, Marginal Jew I, 171–174; Sanders

There are two concerns related to the criterion of dissimilarity, one having to do with its applicability in certain cases, and the other to its appropriateness in the first place. Among those who accept the validity of the criterion there are important disagreements over whether particular sayings qualify. For example, many critics treat Mark 7:15 (on what defiles) as authentic because it stands out so sharply in the context of the dietary practices of Second Temple Judaism.<sup>76</sup> But the decision turns both on the interpretation of the saying and how much dissimilarity the critic is prepared to allow Jesus. Both Funk and Witherington, for example, understand Mark 7:15 to be an explicit rejection of kashruth, and Witherington even thinks that Jesus declared portions of the Torah to be invalid.<sup>77</sup> Mark's Gentile community, which did not observe kashruth in the first place, would have had no reason to invent the saying and the saying is hardly a commonplace placed on Jesus' lips. Hence for Witherington the saying meets the criterion of dissimilarity. Sanders also takes the saying to be about kashruth (as Mark plainly does) but concludes that the saying is "too revolutionary" to have come from Jesus.<sup>78</sup> Thus the debate seems to be about the extent to which Jesus could have been explicitly and programmatically at odds with contemporary Second Temple practice.

Other scholars, however, accept Sanders' key point that an explicit rejection of food laws by Jesus would render the later controversy in Acts 15 and Galatians 2 unintelligible, but argue either that the saying and Davies, Studying, 316–323; Funk, Honest to Jesus.

<sup>76</sup> M. J. Borg, Conflict, Holiness and Politics in the Teachings of Jesus, Studies in the Bible and Early Christianity 5 (New York: Edwin Mellen, 1984; repr., Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1998), 96–99; Witherington, Christology, 63–65; Crossan, Historical Jesus, 262, 436; Meier, Marginal Jew I, 173; Funk and Hoover, Five Gospels, 69; B. Chilton, Pure Kingdom: Jesus' Vision of God, SHJ 1 (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1996), 123; Funk, Honest to Jesus, 204, 246–247, 330; Wright, Jesus, 397; Gnllka, Jesus of Nazareth, 215–217.

<sup>77</sup> Funk, Honest to Jesus, 204–206; Witherington, Christology, 63–64. Both suggest that this reading of Mark 7:15 is not contradicted by the controversy in Acts 15 and Galatians (see below), suggesting that some of Jesus' sayings were not immediately understood by his disciples. Wright (Jesus, 396) also sees the matter as directly touching food laws: Jesus insisted that "genuine purity is a matter of the heart, for which the normal laws of purity... are irrelevant."

<sup>78</sup> E. P. Sanders, Jewish Law from Jesus to the Mishnah: Five Studies (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990), 28. In Jesus and Judaism (266) he argues that the later positions of the "false brethren" of Galatians would be unintelligible had Jesus actually made a statement such as Mark 7:15, and in Studying, 314 he adds that the saying is not multiply attested (but see Gos. Thom. 14!). Holmén ("Doubts about Double Dissimilarity: Reconstructing the Main Criterion of Jesus-of-History Research," in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTTS 28 [Leiden: Brill, 1999], 72–73)

only reflects an intramural debate with the Pharisees rather than a frontal attack on kashruth<sup>79</sup> or that without intending a rejection of purity laws, the saying is part of a critique of the Pharisees' "legalistic morality."<sup>80</sup> Borg suggests that Mark's interpretation misses the real point, which is to deny the equation of holiness with separation. The saying challenges Pharisaic table fellowship.<sup>81</sup> For Crossan, Mark 7:15 was not directed exclusively at the Pharisees, although it surely would have offended them. Rather, it belongs to a nexus of sayings having to do with open commensality (Q 14:16–24; Mark 2:16–17a; Q 11:39–41)—a practice that inevitably negates hierarchies and social distinctions.<sup>82</sup> Chilton regards Mark 7:15 as part of a larger discursive formation having to do with the anxieties triggered by the fact that Israel found herself in the midst of Gentiles. In this context, the saying counsels against separatism and is designed to assure Jews that their purity is not compromised by contact with Gentiles, since the "contagion of impurity was a matter of what one did, not one's contacts."<sup>83</sup> Hence the saying presupposes rather than rejects kashruth. For Borg, Crossan and Chilton the saying is not about whether Jesus was "for" or "against" the Torah, but rather has to do with the meaning of holiness (Borg), a vision of a nonhierarchical kingdom (Crossan), or the identity and purity of Israel among the nations (Chilton) which only later modulated into a more abstract theological debate about the Torah. Thus for Borg, Crossan and Chilton, the saying is still dissimilar, but it does not partake in the stark dissimilarity that persuades Witherington and that Sanders finds incredible.

Theissen has drawn attention to a more general problem with the criterion of dissimilarity, namely its tendency to set Jesus over against 'Judaism' and to conceive of any conflict as "conflict with Judaism" rather than "conflict within Judaism."<sup>84</sup> Indeed one can find many statements concerning Mark 7:15 that display just this tendency. Bultmann treated Mark 7:15 as a conflict saying that "express[es] in parable-form argues similarly to Sanders.

<sup>79</sup> Flusser, Jesus, 60.

<sup>80</sup> Gnilka, Jesus of Nazareth, 216.

<sup>81</sup> Borg, Conflict, Holiness and Politics, 97–99.

<sup>82</sup> Crossan, Historical Jesus, 263: although the first generation of Christians could debate whether "Jesus was for or against the ritual laws of Judaism... [h]is position must have been, as it were, unclear... [H]e did not care enough about such ritual laws either to attack or to acknowledge them. He ignored them, but that, of course, was to subvert them at a most fundamental level."

<sup>83</sup> Chilton, Pure Kingdom, 80–82, here 81.

the attitude of Jesus to Jewish piety<sup>85</sup> while for Käsemann the saying points to a man who is striking at the presuppositions and the plain verbal sense of the Torah and at the authority of Moses himself . . . , who is removing the distinction . . . between the temenos, the realm of the sacred, and the secular, and it is for this reason that he is able to consort with sinners.<sup>86</sup>

Both statements illustrate the way such sayings as Mark 7:15, interpreted in as confrontational a fashion as possible, are attributed to Jesus and then employed to elevate him above 'Judaism' and the Torah of Moses, both reified and objectified as monolithic entities.<sup>87</sup> It should be obvious how implausible and anachronistic such views are, rather like trying to set Socrates against "Athenianism."

One of the major advances of many recent treatments of the historical Jesus is rejection of earlier urges to set Jesus against 'Judaism' or to imagine Jesus as programmatically opposed to Jewish practices. There is indeed every reason to suppose that Jesus kept kashruth. In an inland peasant economy where swine are not raised, where shellfish are unavailable, where meat consumption is in any event low, where trading zones for staple foods are restricted (and hence a low probability of purchasing foodstuffs from non-Jewish producers),<sup>88</sup> and where culinary habits are traditional rather than innovative—cream sauces for meats would not even be imagined!—, it is not in fact an easy matter to violate kashruth. Considerations of pure and impure foods arise principally in situations where there is a real possibility of commercial contact with Gentiles and the possibility of eating impure foods—which is precisely the situation reflected in Acts 10–11, 15; Galatians 2 and in such Mishnaic tractates as Hullin and Bekhoroth, which treat situations of buying animals

<sup>84</sup> Theissen and Winter, Plausible Jesus, 167–171, 180, and passim.

<sup>85</sup> R. Bultmann, The History of the Synoptic Tradition, rev. ed. (Oxford: Blackwell, 1968), 147 (emphasis added).

<sup>86</sup> Käsemann, "Problem," 39. Similarly, Perrin, Rediscovering, 150: "Mark 7.15 is, therefore, completely without parallel in either rabbinic or sectarian Judaism, and, more than this, it completely denies a fundamental presupposition of Jewish religion: the distinction between the sacred and the secular."

<sup>87</sup> A salutary study of the subtleties of Mosaic discourse which rejects such reification can be found in H. Najman, Seconding Sinai: The Development of Mosaic Discourse in Second Temple Judaism, JSJSup 77 (Leiden: Brill, 2003).

<sup>88</sup> The high costs of overland shipping made for relatively closed economies, where most goods and services were marketed within 25 km. of their site of production. This is confirmed by the distribution patterns of pottery from Kefar Hananya (D. Adan-Bayewitz and I. Perlman, "The Local Trade of Sepphoris in the Roman Period," IEJ 40.2–3 [1990]: 153–172). On long-distance trade in general, see M. I. Finley, The

from Gentiles. There is little to suggest that such concerns formed part of Jesus' horizons. To be sure issues of the purity of individual foodstuffs and situations affecting individual foodstuffs were debated; but that is not what Mark 7:15 is about. Rather, Mark 7:15 rejects the entire notion that food can defile.<sup>89</sup>

The phrasing of Mark's saying should not be ignored: it does not say that 'what comes from inside' is more defiling than 'what comes from outside or even that 'what comes from outside' does not render unclean; it says that these cannot render unclean (οὐδέν ἐστιν ἕξωθεν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου εἰσπορευόμενον εἰς αὐτὸν ὃ δύναται κοινῶσαι αὐτόν). Despite this frontal rejection of kashruth, Theissen mitigates its force by observing that the aphorism is not connected by an imperative. Thus the saying represents a kind of mental reservation that Jesus had with respect to kashruth; but, one can share this conviction and nevertheless observe the commandments about cleanness, not because of the unclean and clean qualities of things and foods, but out of respect for a tradition or in order to avoid scandal.<sup>90</sup>

Such an account, however, leaves the saying in Jesus' mouth without any practical force or application and Theissen would have to assume that it was transmitted, again without any practical application, until Mark's day when it was recognized as usefully applying to the issue of the relation of Gentiles to Jews. Interestingly, we have no grounds for supposing that it was used in connection with the controversy in Acts 10–11, 15 and Paul knows nothing of it in Galatians 2. But the idea of a saying being transmitted orally which has nothing but speculative or abstract content is difficult indeed to embrace and violates the notion of oral censorship that Theissen has elsewhere stressed.

The other remedy has been suggested by Dunn, who offers a compelling tradition-historical analysis of the saying. Dunn recognizes that

Ancient Economy (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973), 126.

<sup>89</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 266: "What goes in' must surely be food itself—nothing else goes in and comes out—, and the statement does not respond to the question of whether or not Jesus' disciples should become haberim, laypeople who accept special purity rules. The point of the saying, in fact, is so clear that the positions of the 'false brethren', Peter and James becomes impossible to understand if the saying be considered authentic." Even sayings such as Ps-Phocylides 228 (ἀγνεΐη ψυχῆ, οὐ σώματός εἰσι καθαρμοί, "purifications are healings for the soul, not for the body") and Philo, Spec. 3.208–209 (ἀκάθαρτος γὰρ κυρίως ὁ ἄδικος καὶ ἀσεβής. "For the unjust and impious man is in the truest sense unclean"), do not imply an abrogation of purity rules.

<sup>90</sup> G. Theissen and A. Merz, The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide (London: SCM; Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1998), 366. Similarly, Theissen and Winter, Plausible

Mark's formulation is blunt and radical; but he argues that Matthew's redactional reformulation betrays knowledge of another form of the tradition, less radical insofar as it lacks Mark's ἔξωθεν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου and ὁ δύναται κοινῶσαι, and independently paralleled by Gos. Thom. 14.4.<sup>91</sup> He speculates that the earliest (authentic) tradition consisted of Mark 7: 1–2, 5 + Matt 15:11 which arose from Jesus' controversy with the Pharisees about handwashing and whose aphoristic answer, Matt 15:11, was not intended as a rejection of purity but rather as a "dialectical negation" which "set inward purity antithetically against ritual purity" and which "challenged the normal understanding of (Palestinian) Judaism on boundary issues, that is, on the sensitive questions of who and what were acceptable or unacceptable on religious grounds."<sup>92</sup>

Both Theissen and Dunn seek to save a version of Mark 7:15 for Jesus and to keep Jesus from crossing one of the basic markers of Jewishness.<sup>93</sup> Theissen's solution seems casuistic, predicated on a distinction between critical but non-enacted opinions Jesus held and his essentially conformist behaviour, while Dunn's solution is based on a speculative reconstruction of the earliest tradition. But to recall my earlier proposal on "triangulation" (above, p. 259), it should be noted that we have two independent textualizations of the two or three independent aphorisms, Mark 7:15 and Matt 15:11, both textualized using a Markan frame, and Gos. Thom. 14:4, framed as a saying on mission. Both the synoptic and the Thomasine forms present the aphorism as having to do with the permissibility of eating non-kosher foods. This is patent in Mark, regardless of the secondary character of the gloss in Mark 7:19b; it is true of Matt 15:11–20, despite Matthew's softening of Mark's antithetical aphorism and his omission of Mark 7:19b; and it is true of Gos. Thom. 14:4, which uses the aphorism as the motive clause for the injunction,

Jesus, 181.—

<sup>91</sup> J. D. Dunn, "Jesus and Ritual Purity: A Study on the Tradition History of Mark 7:15," in A cause de l'évangile: Études sur les Synoptiques et les Actes: offertes au P. Jacques Dupont, O.S.B. à l'occasion de son 70e anniversaire, LD 123 (Paris: Cerf, 1985), 261–264.

<sup>92</sup> Dunn, "Jesus and Ritual Purity: A Study on the Tradition History of Mark 7:15," 266–268, 274–275. Dunn repeats this argument in "Jesus and Purity: An Ongoing Debate," NTS 48 (2002): 462–465, without including the speculation that the original tradition consisted of Mark 7:1–2, 5, 15. He concludes that "Jesus was recalled as speaking on the subject of purity, and as insisting that purity of heart is more important than ritual purity" (464).

<sup>93</sup> S. J. Cohen, The Beginnings of Jewishness: Boundaries, Varieties, Uncertainties, Hellenistic Culture and Society (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999), 54–55,

And when you go into any region and walk through the countryside (ἡνῆχώρα), when people receive you, eat what they serve you and heal the sick among them! For what goes into your mouth will not defile you; rather, it is what comes out of your mouth will defile you.<sup>94</sup>

When all of our textualizations of the inside-outside aphorism are framed as permissions to eat foodstuffs not permitted to Jews, it seems mistaken to propose a different, less radical interpretation that is nowhere textualized. The conclusion that I draw from this is that Mark 7:15, Matt 15:11 and Gos. Thom. 14:4 circulated as an aphorism about eating and that they had their most natural Sitz im Leben in the context of debates about table fellowship between Jews and Gentiles, something that can hardly have arisen in Jesus' day.

3.3. Multiple Attestation

Although Perrin downplayed the utility of multiple attestation except where it concerned multiply attested motifs, the implication of the foregoing is that the multiple attestation of individual sayings (and stories) is important in two respects. First, it serves as a counterbalance to the individual scholar's inclination to privilege certain sayings or stories—e.g., the disruption of the Temple (Sanders); the Good Samaritan (Funk);<sup>95</sup> Matt 10:23 (Schweitzer)—and make them the anchor of her reconstruction.<sup>96</sup> One of the curious facts of 'lives of Jesus' is that very often they are built around a handful of sayings and stories deemed to be key and neglect or subordinate significant swathes of the Jesus tradition even when these swathes include sayings and stories with credible claims to authenticity. Cases in point are: the saying concerning children and the kingdom, appearing in multiple sources: in Mark (10:13–16), special Matthean material (18:3), the Gospel of Thomas (22) and in John (3:3, 5); the parable of the mustard seed (Q 13:18–19; Mark 4:30–32; Gos. Thom. 20); Jesus' saying on divorce (Mark 10:11–12; Q 16:18; 1 Cor 7:10–11); and Jesus' association with toll collectors, found in call stories (Mark

59, 61–62. —

<sup>94</sup> Compare Q 10:7: ἐν αὐτῇ δὲ τῇ οἰκίᾳ μένετε ἐσθιόντες καὶ πίνοντες τὰ παρ' αὐτῶν· ἄξιός γάρ ὁ ἐργάτης τοῦ μισθοῦ αὐτοῦ. Thomas appears to envisage his addressees travelling in the χώρα—the hinterland outside of large towns and cities where one could not depend on one's native food customs being observed.

<sup>95</sup> Funk, Honest to Jesus, 165–196.

<sup>96</sup> I do not wish to suggest that such choices are arbitrary; on the contrary, Sanders, Funk, and Schweitzer provided credible reasons for their choice of sayings. The point, rather, is that alongside these sayings, there are also other equally defensible starting points if one begins with a criterion of dissimilarity or historical plausibility, and in this respect

2:14), controversy chriae (Mark 2:16–17), aphorisms (Q 7:34), parables (Luke 18:10–13) and anecdotes (Luke 19:1–11). Yet it is only Crossan's approach, which privileges multiple and early independent attestation, that copes methodologically with this phenomenon and ensures that materials that are widely and independently attested will not only be mentioned, but will figure into the basic construction of the portrait of Jesus. While Crossan's discussion includes all of these multiply attested units, the saying on children and the kingdom is ignored by Sanders, Meyer, Gnilka, Wright and Meier<sup>97</sup> and the parable of the mustard seed is not discussed by either Sanders or Meier.<sup>98</sup> Funk does not treat the divorce saying<sup>99</sup> and Wright mentions it only in passing. On the other hand, Crossan's procedure means that a saying such as Luke 9:60, which Sanders and Funk treat as indubitably authentic, is not discussed at all because it is attested in only one source (Q).

Of course the mere fact that a particular motif is multiply attested does not mean every occurrence of that motif is authentic. Nor does the multiple attestation of a story or saying imply that there are not elements in those units that are redactional or secondary. But multiple attestation does indicate that the saying or motif in question is not simply the creation of the evangelist, and it shows that it was commonly enough associated with Jesus to have become part of several streams of tradition or types of sayings. The virtue of Crossan's procedure is that it carries with it a measure of objectivity<sup>100</sup> insofar as it requires the interpreter to face numerically well-attested traditions and discourages the founding of a portrait of Jesus on a singly-attested saying or story, as Schweitzer did with Matt 10:23.

the choice of one starting point over another is more difficult to defend.

<sup>97</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew II, 353 n. 3 includes Mark 10:15 in a list of future kingdom sayings which "some critics would want to include in our initial list of sayings about the future kingdom or... that refer to entering the kingdom of God" but excludes it from consideration, apparently on the grounds that although it may go back to Jesus, "there is the further problem of determining whether the kingdom of God referred to is understood to be future, present, or possibly both." But for precisely this reason, it would seem germane to consider such sayings. Funk (Honest to Jesus, 334) lists Mark 10:14b as an authentic saying, but it does not figure into his analysis of the historical Jesus in the body of his book.

<sup>98</sup> It may be that Meier will treat the sayings omitted from vols. 1–3 (e.g., Q 13:18–19; 16:18; Mark 2:16–17) in his next volume; but the point remains that these multiply attested sayings are not used to construct the basic outlines of Jesus' teachings.

<sup>99</sup> Funk, Honest to Jesus, 331, lists the divorce saying as authentic, but it is not integrated into his discussion of the historical Jesus.

<sup>100</sup> Cf. H. K. McArthur, "The Burden of Proof in Historical Jesus Research," ExpTim 82 (1971): 116–119, esp. 118, who regards multiple attestation as the most objective

One might also argue that the materials that are multiply attested are not necessarily the most distinctive or characteristic aspects of Jesus, only what happened to be most widely disseminated. But this is in fact not the case with the blessing of the poor, the saying on children and the Kingdom, and the divorce saying, all of which would appear also to display dissimilarity, and so ignoring them is all the less justified.

The second contribution of multiple attestation is, as argued above, that it affords a control on the historian's imagination regarding what was the 'original' intention and significance of Jesus' sayings. As I have suggested, independent rhetorical deployments of a particular saying or story provide an index to how that saying or story was remembered. If two or three independent deployments of the saying agree in significant respects, as they do in the case of the macarism concerning the poor (see above, p. 260) and in the case of the inside-outside aphorism (above, p. 270), it is highly problematic to propose an 'original' interpretation of the saying that differs substantially. Of course, when we encounter two dramatically different deployments of a saying, as is the case of the Markan parable of the Tenants (and its successor versions in Matthew and Luke) and the contrasting version in Gos. Thom. 65, one must rely on other considerations to determine which (if any) more likely goes back to Jesus.<sup>101</sup> And this consideration is of no help at all in the case of singly attested materials.

In the end there is no objective or neutral application or balance of the criteria of authenticity. What we can aim at, however, is developing a series of controls to discipline the ingenuity and imagination of the historian. These controls should include (1) careful attention to the implications of solutions to the synoptic problem and, in particular, the significance of the documentary nature of Q and its redactional constructions. As the discussion of Q 22:28–30 has argued, this saying should not naively be attributed to Jesus simply because it does not obviously cohere with the editorial interests of Matthew or Luke; for it coheres rather well with the redactional framing of Q.<sup>102</sup> (2) Second, I have suggested criticism and as the proper starting point for arguments for authenticity.

<sup>101</sup> I have sketched an approach to this problem in J. S. Kloppenborg, "Ideological Texture in the Parable of the Tenants," in Fabrics of Discourse: Essays in Honor of Vernon K. Robbins, ed. D. Gowler, G. Bloomquist, and D. F. Watson (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2003), 64–88.

<sup>102</sup> If other solutions to the synoptic problem are adopted (and defended appropriately), it would likewise be necessary to take the compositional implications of those solutions seriously. For example, on Michael Goulder's understanding of the Mark-without-Q hypothesis, Matthew functioned as a midrashist for Mark, and Luke copied Mark, then that multiple attestation should be privileged methodologically and that portraits of Jesus necessarily take into account—that is, consider critically—those traditions that enjoyed the broadest circulation. This does not exclude employing the singly attested, perhaps highly distinctive sayings and stories, but it will avoid the manifest problems of beginning (and often ending) with a handful of singly attested sayings. (3) Third, rather than assume that in principle the evangelists misunderstood the sayings and stories they received—though sometimes it seems likely that they did—it is necessary to pay careful attention to their construals of those sayings and stories, and take their consensus seriously, when such a consensus exists. (4) Finally, and perhaps most importantly, it will be necessary for the next generation of Jesus studies to engage in a more theoretically sophisticated discussion of its own location in intellectual discourse about antiquity and its significance.

4. Some Locations of Jesus Scholarship

Some of the disagreements in scholarly reconstructions of Jesus derive from differences over the methodological issues noted above—whether one includes noncanonical gospels or not, whether one adopts the two-document hypothesis or not (and takes its implications seriously), and whether one privileges multiple attestation or dissimilarity. These disagreements account for many of the differences in current portraits of Jesus. Other variations derive from the fact that since our sources are fragmentary and since the available data have ‘blanks’ that must be filled in, the blanks can be filled in a variety of ways. There is, however, another dimension of the problem, one which has to do with the way scholars move from the isolation of authentic Jesus materials to the synthetic effort to produce a coherent portrait. This involves many decisions that are functions of theoretical, conceptual, or ideological commitments.<sup>103</sup>

Matthew, creating his own special material largely as a kind of haggadic development of materials from the Hebrew Bible. Thus, presumably, almost nothing peculiar to Luke could be ascribed to the historical Jesus. On the Two Gospels hypothesis almost nothing peculiar to Mark could be attributed to Jesus, since Mark is essentially a conflation of Matthew and Luke.

<sup>103</sup> I do not wish to suggest a uni-directional relationship between the technical phase of isolating historical Jesus tradition and the construction of synthetic portraits; in actual practice, one never comes to the technical phase tabula rasa and, conversely, the results of historical criticism have the potential to influence one’s ideological and conceptual

In saying this I wish to make clear that I am not speaking about personal commitments or about individual psychology (though a few recent reviewers seem tempted to reduce disagreements to such factors). Most of those who have contributed major works to historical Jesus scholarship are well trained scholars who employ critical methods precisely to obtain a measure of control on their own tendencies and preferences.<sup>104</sup> To reduce disagreements among scholars to personal “preferences” trivializes their work and needlessly impugns their integrity as scholars. What I have in mind instead are the larger interpretive frameworks within which portraits of Jesus are offered and the fundamental choices that define these frameworks—choices that do not derive directly from historical data. Let me illustrate.

A representative selection of current portraits of Jesus reveals differing emphases regarding several basic issues, of which I will mention three: (1) whether Jesus’ “eschatology” should be treated as a defining issue and whether Jesus expected an imminent and dramatic intervention by God and a corresponding transformation of human affairs; (2) whether the principal locus of transformation represented by the reign of God (whatever it was and whenever it was expected) should be seen as individual and personal, or whether it pertained more broadly to “Israel” or some other large entity? Related to this is the question of whether Jesus’ “reign of God” was something to be awaited more or less passively, or whether it was to be expressed in a set of social, political and economic transformations in the lives of its adherents; and (3) whether the data of the Jesus tradition should be read against the background of “Judaism” (and if so, which “Judaism”), Galilean regionalism, or the typicalities of Mediterranean peasant culture.

Put so starkly, these beg many questions of definition and represent false dichotomies. To take only the last issue: Jesus, of course, was a Jew, a Galilean, and lived in an eastern Mediterranean culture. The Torah was a key part of Israelite identity, as were the typical Mediterranean dynamics of honor and shame, patronage and the notion that all goods (material and nonmaterial) were in a limited supply. The interpretive issue, however, is which of these frameworks the interpreter chooses commitments.

<sup>104</sup> See the remarks of Meier (Marginal Jew I, 6; Marginal Jew II, 5–6), who acknowledges that the application of the criteria of authenticity forced him to conclusions he had not foreseen. For similar remarks, see Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 334–335, and to privilege as primary. Nothing in the data about Jesus tells us how to frame our reconstruction; there is no neutral or objective or self-evidently correct framework. The choice of frameworks is interpretive and a function of the theoretical issues that each interpreter sees as at stake in historical Jesus scholarship.

This point perhaps is clearest when one takes an approach to historical Jesus scholarship that is expressly cross-cultural. In The Crucified Guru, Thomas Thangaraj proposes to view Jesus through the lens of the concept of the guru in the Saiva Siddhanta philosophy of Tamilnadu in Southern India.<sup>105</sup> Thangaraj's "Jesus" is a teacher with disciples, but one who is neither a member of a scribal school nor a purveyor of esoteric teaching. Rather, Jesus engaged in a public project of teaching, relating to disciples on the basis of persuasion and a "loving invitation." As a "guru" he had a "praxis oriented pedagogy": he enacted his own words and enjoined followers to do the same.

There is of course no question of Jesus' being a guru or of invoking the language and practices of Hinduism. Thangaraj's comparison of Jesus with the practices of gurus, however, makes clear how the interest of the interpreter serves to focus the act of reconstruction. Without doing violence to the results of historical criticism and without forcing the evidence significantly, Thangaraj's configuration of the data allows him to address particular problems in his world: the inadequacy of earlier Indian approaches to christology which adapted the notion of an avatar to the incarnation of the Logos.<sup>106</sup> Viewing Jesus as a guru allows Thangaraj to underscore the soteriological significance of Jesus for an oppressed humanity. It may be that Thangaraj's description of Jesus, which highlights Jesus' practice with respect to disciples, is susceptible to the objection that it downplays other significant data, for example, Jesus' eschatology. But such data is not ignored; it is only configured in such a way as to play a role secondary to Thangaraj's focus on Jesus' praxis-oriented pedagogy.

The theoretical point has been put most succinctly by Jonathan Z. Smith in relation to the act of comparison:

Crossan, Historical Jesus, xxviii.

<sup>105</sup> M. T. Thangaraj, The Crucified Guru: An Experiment in Cross-Cultural Christology (Nashville: Abingdon, 1994).

<sup>106</sup> Such an approach, argues Thangaraj, is inadequate both for Tamil Saivites, who reject the notion of divine incarnation, and for Tamil Christians, since it endangers Christ's

[C]omparison does not necessarily tell us how things 'are' (the far from latent presupposition that lies behind the notion of the 'genealogical' with its quest for 'real' historical connections); like models and metaphors, comparison tells us how things might be conceived, how they might be 're-described'. . . . A comparison is a disciplined exaggeration in the service of knowledge. It lifts out and strongly marks certain features within difference as being of possible intellectual significance, expressed in the rhetoric of their being 'like' in some stipulated fashion. Comparison provides the means by which we 're-vision' phenomena as our data in order to solve our theoretical problems.<sup>107</sup>

Reconstruction involves acts of comparison with three dimensions. The scholar first decides which data are most reliable on the basis of the criteria indicated above. Then, she sets these data within a comparative framework (Second Temple apocalyptic Judaism; early scribalism; Mediterranean village culture; Graeco-Roman Cynicism), noting similarities and certain differences. Thus, one can conclude that Jesus was "like" a classical Hebrew prophet or a Cynic or an apocalypticist in certain specifiable ways, notwithstanding clear differences. But such a comparison is done for specific (though often unstated) theoretical reasons.<sup>108</sup> This third side in the comparative triangle, the scholar's theoretical interests, helps to render intelligible why a certain comparison is ventured and what interpretive interest is being served. It is necessary to insist that it is not possible (or even theoretically desirable) to work without such interests. The presence of such interests does not render the comparative work to be "subjective" or otherwise flawed. Indeed, the scholar's theoretical interests are what make the comparison productive of meaning.

4.1. Jesus and Apocalyptic Eschatology

Much recent historical Jesus scholarship has given special prominence to a link between Jesus' preaching and imminent eschatological expectation. It is not that Jesus expected the "end of the world" in the sense of the dissolution of the cosmos; rather, the reign of God he expected humanity and leads to a docetism.

<sup>107</sup> J. Z. Smith, Drudgery Divine: On the Comparison of Early Christianities and the Religions of Late Antiquity, Jordan Lectures in Comparative Religion 14 (London: The School of Oriental and African Studies; Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990), 52 (emphasis original).

<sup>108</sup> "[C]omparison, in its strongest form, brings differences together solely within the space of the scholar's mind. It is the individual scholar, for his or her own good theoretical reasons, who imagines their cohabitation, without even requiring that they be consenting involved a decisive intervention of God in human history and an empirically visible (and dramatic) transformation. Among those who underscore this feature of Jesus' expectations there are disagreements as to whether Jesus can be described as an apocalypticist who (mistakenly) expected this transformation in the near future, or whether he had a less specific, but nonetheless definite, temporal expectation. Allison and Sanders are willing to embrace a Jesus who made such a mistake.<sup>109</sup> Gnilka and Meier, on the other hand, avoid the difficulty of Jesus being wrong about the coming of the kingdom by rejecting such obviously predictive sayings as Mark 9:1; 13:30 and Matt 10:23 as nonauthentic. They insist, nonetheless, on a twofold character of Jesus' preaching: first, that Jesus expected the future coming of the reign of God and second, that he also thought that reign of God was somehow being actualized or mediated in his own activities.

Other scholars, however, significantly downplay Jesus' eschatology. Borg observes that the consensus of modern scholarship rejects the authenticity of the future Son of Man sayings (e.g., Mark 8:38; 13:27; 14:62; Matt 10:23; Q 12:40; 17:24, 26–30), which formerly had been employed to illustrate Jesus' futuristic orientation. Without such sayings to provide an interpretive context, Jesus' sayings about the reign of God lose any strong connection with imminent end-expectation.<sup>110</sup> It is not that the kingdom sayings are not about a crisis, but for Borg that crisis is the "end of the world of conventional wisdom as a basis for existence, as well as the threatened end of the 'social world' of Judaism (including the threat of war and the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple)."<sup>111</sup> Rather than being an apocalypticist, Borg's Jesus is a teacher of "world-subverting wisdom."

What is at stake in this debate? Schweitzer proposed an apocalyptic Jesus, basing this understanding on the apocalyptic documents of Second Temple Judaism. His Jesus was thus consistent with the supposedly thoroughly apocalyptic climate of the first century. Schweitzer's adults..." (Smith, Drudgery Divine, 115).

<sup>109</sup> E.g., D. C. Allison, "A Plea for Thoroughgoing Eschatology," JBL 113 (1994): 651–668, who is critical both of those who embrace an imminent eschatology but who reinterpret such sayings as Mark 9:1 and Mark 13:30 in order to avoid the "humiliating discovery" that Jesus proclaimed a divinely wrought end of the world (e.g., Wright and Witherington), and of those who deny or attenuate the futuristic component to Jesus' preaching (e.g., Crossan, Borg, and Mack).

<sup>110</sup> The most obvious exceptions are Mark 1:15 and 9:1. Most scholars treat Mark 1:15 as a redactional summary, and many (including Meier) consider 9:1 as nonauthentic. Borg (Jesus in Contemporary Scholarship, 54) notes that even if it is authentic (which he doubts) it is slender evidence upon which to base an entire reading of the Kingdom sayings.

Jesus, however, was a stranger to the world of the early 1900's, for at the time Schweitzer wrote apocalypticism was alien to European culture and was regarded with distaste and disdain. Even for Schweitzer, it was not the mistaken apocalypticist of the remote past who was theologically important, but the "spiritual Christ" who continued to animate the Christian church. Schweitzer's use of apocalyptic eschatology as a descriptive category, on the one hand, underscored the commonalities between Jesus and his environment, and the profound distance between that Jesus and early twentieth-century Christian theology, on the other. Schweitzer's historical Jesus was part of first-century culture but not part of ours.

Ironically, since Schweitzer's time a complete reversal has occurred. The terms "eschatological" and "apocalyptic"—usually stripped of their most blatantly predictive aspects—are regularly used in order to distinguish Jesus from his environment.<sup>112</sup> Thus, for example, Hengel's study of discipleship uses the category of "eschatological charismatic," rendering Jesus incomparable and unique within Judaism and the Hellenistic world.<sup>113</sup> But at the same time, eschatology was elevated to a central theological category by such systematic theologians as Pannenberg and Moltmann, so that Jesus' announcement of an imminent and decisive transformation of human reality happily coincides with what is seen to be at the heart of the Christian theological project. Hence, the emphasis on the eschatological orientation of Jesus serves to cement the historical

—<sup>111</sup> Borg, Jesus in Contemporary Scholarship, 59.

<sup>112</sup> A propos of Bultmann, Dieter Georgi observed: "Whereas for the history-of-religions school the term 'eschatological' described the foreignness of Jesus and of the early church—together with Jewish apocalypticism and other comparable ancient eschatologies—for Bultmann... the term 'eschatological' stands for the novelty of Christianity, its incomparable superiority, the uniqueness of the victorious religion, deservedly victorious. Wherever a comparison is ventured, wherever analogies lift their head, wherever challenges are heard from other religious options but the canonical ones, the invocation of the 'eschatological' is made, and the demons, the shadows have to disappear. Historical criticism thus turns into exorcism." See D. Georgi, "Rudolf Bultmann's Theology of the New Testament Revisited," in Bultmann, Retrospect, and Prospect: The Centenary Symposium at Wellesley, ed. E. C. Hobbs, HTS 35 (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985), 82.

<sup>113</sup> M. Hengel, The Charismatic Leader and His Followers, trans. J. Greig (Edinburgh: T&T Clark; New York: Crossroad, 1981), 69: "Quite certainly Jesus was not a 'teacher' comparable with the later rabbinical experts in the Law, and he was a great deal more than a prophet. Even within the characterization we have preferred, of an 'eschatological charismatic,' [Jesus] remains in the last resort incommensurable, and so basically confounds every attempt to fit him into the categories suggested by the phenomenology or sociology of religion. Consequently, the centrality, in the discussion, of the phenomenon

Jesus to contemporary Christian theological interests rather than to distance him from modern sensibilities.

John Galvin observes that the portraits of Jesus produced by Meier and Gnilka, both of whom try to balance future and present aspects of Jesus' expectations, allow traditional christological affirmations to be seen "as a plausible, though not rationally compelling, interpretation of Jesus and of the events of his public ministry."<sup>114</sup> For Galvin it is essential that there be both future and present dimensions to Jesus' message and that the message have a definitive (eschatological) character.<sup>115</sup> An historical reconstruction of Jesus that failed to include the proclamation of a unique and unsurpassable intervention by God would lack ultimacy and one that lacked any indication that Jesus saw his own activity in the present as connected with the reign of God (cf. Q 11:20) would seriously jeopardize christology. Galvin does not require Jesus to have explicitly employed christological titles; but Jesus' self-assessment as "God's definitive salvific representative" is a necessary condition of christology.

Seán Freyne is one of the rare exegetes to declare his theological interests in the historical Jesus. The insistence on the eschatological nature of Jesus' career, he says, arises from my concern regarding the claims of ultimacy that Christian faith makes in terms of Jesus.... In the absence of an eschatological dimension to Jesus' utterances it would be impossible to see how any christological claims could be grounded in his earthly life, which is precisely of the derivable nature of Jesus' authority, is fully justified" (emphasis original).

<sup>114</sup> Galvin, "I Believe," 375.

<sup>115</sup> J. P. Galvin, "From the Humanity of Christ to the Jesus of History: A Paradigm Shift in Catholic Christology," TS 55 (1994): 264–265. The use of eschatology in relation to "uniqueness" and Christology is explicit in Pannenberg: W. Pannenberg, "Religious Pluralism and Conflicting Truth Claims: The Problem of a Theology of the World Religions," in Christian Uniqueness Reconsidered: The Myth of a Pluralistic Theology of Religions, ed. G. D'Costa (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1990), 100–101: "In fact, Jesus' emphasis on the anticipatory presence of God's kingdom in his own activity (Lk 11:20) involved his own person in a way that essentially implies what later on was explicated by incarnational language and by titles like Son of God. But then, the uniqueness attributed to Jesus by the incarnational theology of the church was already characteristic of his own eschatological message and activity.... Those who relegate the claim to uniqueness to the 'deification' of Jesus in later Christian interpretation do not take seriously the eschatological finality claimed by Jesus himself.... The Christian claim to uniqueness is not based on any Christian experience. If this were so, it would be fair to argue that there are other experiences of uniqueness within world religions. But the claim to uniqueness concerning the person of Jesus is bound up with his own eschatological message, espe-

the issue that gave rise to the quest for the historical Jesus in the first place as both an ecclesial and academic exercise.<sup>116</sup>

Freyne's statement is weighty for it makes clear the theoretical interest—christology and ultimacy—which Freyne sees as being served by highlighting Jesus' eschatology. "Eschatology" stands as a cipher for finality and ultimacy. Freyne expresses hesitations about this admission, fearing that it will destroy the credibility of his historical reconstruction. It should have no such effect. In Freyne's case there is little danger of him being accused of engaging in covert apologetics or of smuggling theology into his historical analysis. But his statement clarifies why eschatology—however it is construed—has achieved so central a place in some treatments of the historical Jesus.<sup>117</sup>

In making this observation, I want it to be clear that I am not suggesting that those reconstructions which underscore the future aspects of the "reign of God" necessarily do so out of a theoretical concern for christology. Sanders, for example, stresses the future aspects of Jesus' proclamation and thinks that Jesus probably regarded himself as God's agent, but doubts that he thought the reign of God to be especially present in his own ministry or that he can be thought to be unique.<sup>118</sup> Sanders' theoretical concern seems not to be christological, however; rather it is to root Jesus and his activities firmly within Second Temple Judaism and to disallow a portrait of Jesus as "against" or "superseding" "Judaism." While Sanders might approve of Hengel's category of "eschatological charismatic," that designation makes him comparable and commensurable, not incommensurable and unique.

Eschatology can be stressed in a portrait of Jesus for a number of reasons. Some might have to do with understanding the relation between cially the eschatological finality of God's kingdom as becoming present in his activity."

<sup>116</sup> S. Freyne, "Galilean Questions to Crossan's Mediterranean Jesus," in Whose Historical Jesus? ed. Arnal and Desjardins, 90 (emphasis added).

<sup>117</sup> It does not seem to me self-evident that christological discourse is compromised by Borg's nonapocalyptic Jesus (and Borg himself certainly does not think so). Traditional christologies, which underscore the mediational nature of Jesus' activity, might be endangered by Crossan's Jesus (who proclaims a brokerless kingdom). Galvin ("I Believe," 375) argues that Crossan's view "seems to preclude in principle any mediation of that kingdom and thus any foundation for christological doctrine," although he concedes that Crossan himself (Historical Jesus, 421–424) finds no contradiction in the Christian seeing in Jesus the "unmediated presence of the divine."

<sup>118</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 153, 240. Sanders (ibid., 154) suggests that part of the reason that scholars emphasize the presence of the kingdom in Jesus' teaching is that thereby Jesus' message is rendered more relevant and the "problem of his mistake about

Jesus' activities and traditional christological assertions; or, they may have to do with an effort to root Jesus firmly in the life and expectations of Second Temple Judaism and thus obviate the strong tendency of New Testament scholars (at least in the past) to define Jesus over against "Judaism."

On the other hand, those portraits that do not stress future eschatology are not necessarily devoid of christological interests. Future expectations play little role in Schüssler Fiorenza's treatment of Jesus. Instead, she focuses on Jesus' liberative practice in the present, his critique of patriarchy (also in the present) and his retrieval of Wisdom theology and his role as a prophet of Sophia.<sup>119</sup> Borg, perhaps the most vocal advocate of a nonapocalyptic Jesus, offers an alternate portrait of Jesus as a "holy person," "person of the Spirit, and "charismatic wisdom prophet"—each with evident christological potential. For both Schüssler Fiorenza and Borg, Jesus' concrete engagement with social and political realities of his day is essential to any portrait of the historical figure and to any christology that flows from that portrait. The standard portrait of an apocalyptic prophet too easily disconnects Jesus from that environment.<sup>120</sup>

To observe that theoretical interests are at work in the construction of various portraits of Jesus is not necessarily to imply that the various reconstructions are reducible to those interests; it is, however, to suggest that a critical reading of those reconstructions must attend to the comparative project that is being ventured.

4.2. A Revolutionary Kingdom?

A second obvious difference in historical Jesus scholarship concerns whether Jesus is understood as engaged in a project of corporate renewal of Israel (or some "large" entity) or whether his appeal was mainly to individual persons. Entangled with this question is another one: whether the kingdom Jesus proclaimed was to be awaited passively, or whether it symbolized a set of alternate, perhaps radical or revolutionary, postures.

the immediate future is muted."

<sup>119</sup> E. Schüssler Fiorenza, Jesus: Miriam's Child, Sophia's Prophet: Critical Issues in Feminist Christology (New York: Continuum, 1995).

<sup>120</sup> Borg (Jesus in Contemporary Scholarship, 194) suggests that the construal of Jesus as an "eschatological prophet"—and, one might add, the attempts to make Jesus incomparable—has led to theological appropriations which either rendered Jesus silent or which, via existential interpretation, "generated a highly individualized and internal-

Sanders argues that Jesus stood in a tradition of restorationist prophecy. In Sanders' view, the action against the temple and the calling of the Twelve were symbolic actions that pointed to the imminent restoration and renewal of Israel.<sup>121</sup> As noted above, Sanders rejects the idea that Jesus programmatically opposed the Torah. What set him off from other sectors of Second Temple Judaism was his view on repentance. Whereas repentance and observance of the commandments were normally assumed to be a precondition for entry into the Kingdom, Sanders' Jesus held that "God showed his mercy to those who heard and responded to him and his message even while they lived outside the framework of at least some of the Mosaic ordinances; that is, while they were still 'tax-gatherers and sinners.'"<sup>122</sup>

Despite the fact that Jesus' reign of God according to Sanders would involve a future renewed social order in which sinners were included and a reversal of important social values,<sup>123</sup> there is little evidence from Sanders' description that in the present the kingdom implied any social transformations. This is because Sanders thinks that the reign of God involved so dramatic a set of transformations—including the "miraculous" recreation of Israel and reconstitution of the ten lost tribes—that it would be unimaginable that Jesus could have thought that this would be accomplished by mere social and political reforms.<sup>124</sup> It is the miraculous and otherworldly nature of the coming kingdom that pushes out any meaningful anticipation of the kingdom that is less than miraculous and this-worldly. In the end, Sanders' portrait is more interested in expectations and theological ideas—the covenant and its restoration, repentance and divine mercy—than in social or political postures.

The same is true of Meier's Jesus. Meier thinks that Jesus' ministry had the corporate aim of reconstituting the scattered people of God and that he expected a dramatic intervention by God in which the poor would be exalted and justice established. But for Meier, Jesus expected God alone to act; "humans can only wait for it"; the reign of God "is a revolution ized understanding of the message of Jesus."

<sup>121</sup> Similarly, Meyer, The Aims of Jesus.

<sup>122</sup> E. P. Sanders, "Jesus, Paul and Judaism," ANRW II 25.1 (1982): 425.

<sup>123</sup> See esp. Sanders, Historical Figure, 196–204, discussing perfectionism.

<sup>124</sup> Sanders, Historical Figure, 176, 179, 185. Sanders is far more willing than scholars such as Meier and Gnilka to admit that Jesus expected an imminent and dramatic transformation of the world and was wrong (see ibid., 180, 183). He is also skeptical concerning the assertions that Jesus thought the kingdom to be especially connected wrought by God alone as this present world comes to an end.”<sup>125</sup> Thus Jesus was neither a revolutionary nor a social reformer.<sup>126</sup>

A very different portrait emerges in the works of Borg and especially Horsley. It is perhaps significant that neither emphasizes the futuristic and otherworldly character of the reign of God; indeed, Borg argues against this. Borg’s Jesus is a visionary with “world subverting wisdom” who was critical of “the politics of holiness”—a set of social and political arrangements predicated on distinctions of pure and impure. In its place, Jesus advocated “compassion as alternate paradigm for the transformation of Israel’s life.”<sup>127</sup> Jesus’ critique challenged the dangerous nationalism driven by the politics of holiness and, in this sense, Jesus’ social vision constituted a real threat to the established order.<sup>128</sup>

Horsley provides an even more nuanced reading of the Jesus tradition through the lens of the politics of agrarian societies under foreign control. Understanding the basic fault lines of Jewish Palestine to run between the taxers and the taxed, the governors and the governed, Horsley views Jesus as invoking the covenantal and prophetic traditions of Israel in support of the plight of the poor. Horsley is critical of readings that suppose that Jesus expected a “miraculous change,” arguing that these are designed to divert attention from the social and political dimensions of Jesus’ message. Since “religion” in the ancient world was not a realm separate from political and social relations, such a diversion is also anachronistic. According to Horsley, apocalyptic texts are not fantasies about future transformations but have a historical orientation and must be given a socio-political reading. They express “in ordinary language eager hopes for an anti-imperial revolution.”<sup>129</sup> Thus, for example, the prediction of the destruction of the temple and other anti-temple sayings amount to a judgment of the ruling institutions of Israel and an attack on the ruling families.<sup>130</sup> In place of a hierarchical, imperial and exploitative model of society, Jesus substituted a model of local (village) cooperation that encouraged solidarity (rather than with his own activities (Jesus and Judaism, 153; Historical Figure, 176).

<sup>125</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew II, 331. Further, “Reflection on Jesus-of-History Research Today,” in Jesus’ Jewishness: Exploring the Place of Jesus Within Early Judaism, ed. J. H. Charlesworth (Philadelphia: The American Interfaith Institute; New York: Crossroad, 1991), 84–107, esp. 90–92.

<sup>126</sup> Similarly, Witherington, Jesus Quest, 236.

<sup>127</sup> Borg, Jesus in Contemporary Scholarship, 26–27; Conflict, Holiness and Politics, passim. For a critique, Chilton, “Jesus within Judaism,” 270–271.

<sup>128</sup> Borg, Jesus, A New Vision, 180–184.

<sup>129</sup> Horsley, Spiral of Violence, 160.

the divisive social relations created by exploitation), debt-cancellation, local autonomy and a form of egalitarianism.<sup>131</sup>

It is unfair to both Borg and Horsley to caricature their view of Jesus as that of a “social reformer.” The term presupposes the structures of modern politics and modern compartmentalizing of “religion,” “politics,” and “economics” into discrete and separate divisions of culture—something that was not part of the ancient Mediterranean world. Both Borg and Horsley, however, see concrete social and political implications in the message of Jesus and hence do not postpone his “revolution” to the apocalyptic future. Whereas those who see Jesus as primarily oriented to a proclamation of a future transformation can locate the opposition to Jesus in theological ideas, for Borg and Horsley Jesus was a far more concrete social and political threat to established powers.

It is not difficult to see that just as theoretical concerns to relate Jesus to later christological assertions, or to the theological streams of “Judaism” are supported by reconstructions that underscore Jesus’ eschatology, so the reconstructions of Borg, Horsley and Schüssler Fiorenza are designed to address the question of how and where Jesus fit (or failed to fit) into the politics of Jewish Palestine. Part of the reason for differing configurations of the data is that the questions are different. Borg, Horsley and Schüssler Fiorenza begin with socio-political rather than theological or ideological questions. Such questions are a needed correction to the tendency of earlier generations of biblical scholars who often treated “theology” as the central aspect of texts, ignoring the intimate relationship between theological assertions and social location and treating discourse about the “reign of God,” debt/sin forgiveness, poverty, justice, food and clothing as if it could be detached from the present social and political realities.

4.3. Which Judaism?

A third theoretical issue that informs scholarly constructs of the historical Jesus concerns the issue, which “Judaism” provides the most suitable interpretive framework for understanding Jesus: early scribalism? apocalyptic movements? Qumran? Galilean village culture? As I have suggested above, nothing tells us which one is the most appropriate; in fact different comparative frameworks are appropriate to different tasks.

<sup>130</sup> Horsley, Spiral of Violence, 285–317.

It is a truism that Jesus was a Jew. Most interpreters accordingly pay attention to the history and culture of Jewish Palestine at least in general terms. Most recognize important differences between the culture(s) of Palestine and those of other parts of the empire and some are aware of finer distinctions, e.g., between Greek cities and Roman cities or colonies, between autonomous (e.g., Tyre) and nonautonomous cities (e.g., Jerusalem and Tiberias) and between the cities (poleis), their attached city-regions and the hinterland. Sophisticated analyses now understand that we can no longer divide the Mediterranean into two cultural spheres—Jewish and Hellenistic—as earlier generations of scholars did; we must be prepared to see multiple competing cultures and layers of culture, both outside Palestine and within Jewish Palestine. Judaism in rural Galilee was not identical with the Judaism of urban elites of Jerusalem, or of rural Judaea, or of the inhabitants of Qumran, or of Caesarea Maritima, or Sepphoris and so forth. The selection of one of these cultures as the comparative framework for understanding Jesus has important consequences, both in what may become visible and in what is obscured.

To insist that Jesus be situated firmly within Second Temple Judaism reflects in part a salutary resolve to guard against the earlier tendencies to see Jesus as transcending and even rejecting fundamental aspects of “Judaism” and as somehow not, or no longer “Jewish.” The Shoah has made painfully clear the hideous consequences of supersessionist readings of the Jesus tradition. The works of Sanders and others who have underscored Jesus “within” Judaism are important efforts to rid historical Jesus studies of the toxic waste of anti-Semitism. In this regard, it must be observed that the perfectly legitimate historiographical goal of understanding how Jesus may have been distinct in his context can easily slip into caricatures of Jewish culture(s), especially when the inquiry is tied to theological concerns to make Jesus unique. Christian scholarship on Jesus has often been criticized as potentially or actually anti-Semitic and, more recently, some have observed that feminist treatments of Jesus’ liberative praxis are sometimes constructed at the expense of “Judaism,” which is caricatured as “patriarchal” and “oppressive.”<sup>132</sup>

---

<sup>131</sup> Horsley, Spiral of Violence, 192, 246–284.

<sup>132</sup> A.-J. Levine, “Lilies of the Field and Wandering Jews: Biblical Scholarship, Women’s Roles, and Social Location,” in Transformative Encounters: Jesus and Women Re-viewed,

To agree that Jesus belongs to Second Temple Judaism does not, however, settle the issue of a more specific historical location. Vermes and Sanders have shown by careful comparison of Jesus' sayings with the first century antecedents of rabbinic Judaism that Jesus' views of the Torah would hardly have placed him outside the orbit of first-century Judaism. Although some have even attempted to make of Jesus a liberal Pharisee, a more compelling portrait treats Jesus as a non-Pharisaic teacher whose view of the Torah, nonetheless, was either fully within the range of Second Temple discussions of the Torah (Vermes) or largely so (Sanders).<sup>133</sup>

A seemingly divergent portrait of Jesus has been offered by Crossan and Mack, who compare Jesus with Graeco-Roman Cynics.<sup>134</sup> The comparison is not intended to constitute a claim that Jesus was "influenced" by Cynics or was a "member" of a Cynic "school." In fact, no unified Cynic "school" existed. Neither Crossan nor Mack is oblivious to differences between largely urban Cynics and the Jesus of Galilean town and village culture: Jesus and the Jesus movement had, unlike the Cynics, something of a social vision and social program.<sup>135</sup> Nevertheless, the comparison with Cynicism serves to underscore the countercultural, even "deviant" character of Jesus' activity. This portrayal represents in many ways only an extrapolation of earlier representations of Jesus as embodying "novel," "striking," "countercultural," "marginal," or "world-subverting" sayings and practices—depictions that are nearly ubiquitous in historical Jesus scholarship.

The reaction engendered by the "Cynic hypothesis" is striking in its vigor; clearly, a deep nerve has been probed. Extraordinary efforts have

ed. I. R. Kitzberger (Leiden: Brill, 2000), 329–352.

<sup>133</sup> Sanders ("Jesus, Paul and Judaism," 411–418) insists that none of Jesus' Sabbath sayings represents a challenge to the sanctity of the Sabbath; the sayings on divorce do not challenge Deut 24:1, since Jesus only makes the teachings on divorce more strict than the Torah; and Mark 7:15, which Mark takes as implying the abolition of the food laws (7:19b), is not authentic. Only Q 9:59–60 enjoins disobeying a commandment of the Torah. Vermes (The Religion of Jesus the Jew, 11–45) doubts that even Q 9:59–60 should be interpreted as a rejection of Torah commandments regarding the burial of the dead.

<sup>134</sup> Crossan, Historical Jesus, 417–422; Mack, "Q and a Cynic-Like Jesus," 25–36. Strictly speaking, Mack does not write about the historical Jesus, but the character of the earliest Jesus movement. Yet he argues that "the Cynic-like data from Q and Mark are as close as we shall ever get to the real Jesus of history" (36).

<sup>135</sup> Crossan (Historical Jesus, xii) speaks of Jesus' "ecstatic vision and social program [which] sought to rebuild a society upwards from its grass roots but on principles of religious and economic egalitarianism, with free healing brought directly to the peasant homes and free sharing of whatever they had in return." Mack ("Q and a Cynic-Like Jesus," 34–35) argues that the Jesus movement "took a Cynic-like stance towards the world at large, but been taken to “demonstrate” that no Cynics were present in Galilee (something that the “Cynic hypothesis” does not in fact require). Indeed, the proponents and opponents of the hypothesis often argue at cross purposes: thus, it is asserted that Jesus was a Jew, as if this somehow means that he could not have been Cynic-like. But, as William Arnal rightly observes, “the issue cannot be whether Jesus was either ‘Jewish’ or ‘cynic/Hellenistic,’ in spite of it being framed this way far too frequently; it is instead what kind of Jew Jesus was.”<sup>136</sup>

The assertion that “Jesus was a Jew” of course rightly locates Jesus in the history, culture and institutions of Israel. But all too often it also embodies a tacit assumption that “Jew” mean “religious Jew” and that “religion” is a discrete and bounded realm of cultural discourse, separate from social (family, village) and political structures. Thus, the assertion serves to isolate Jesus, not only from the context of the other cultural discourses of the Mediterranean, but from the social and political culture of Jewish Galilee. The Cynic comparison, by contrast, assumes that religion was “embedded” in other cultural and social forms and hence, that the tensions between Jesus and his culture which the criterion of dissimilarity isolates should not be interpreted as narrowly-defined “religious” opposition, isolated from other cultural possibilities. Without ceasing to be a Galilean Jew, Jesus may also have been simultaneously part of an intersecting discourse critical of certain institutions and patterns of his culture and analogous to (not: influenced by) Cynic criticism of Greek urban culture.<sup>137</sup> The Cynic comparison implicitly resists compartmentalization, either of “religion” with ancient society, or of “Judaism” within the ancient world, but instead attempts to locate Jesus at the conjunction of multiple intersecting discourses.

5. Conclusion

The purpose of this survey of methodological and interpretive problems in historical Jesus scholarship has not been to encourage readers to “pick and choose” among the various divergent portraits of Jesus, but with respect to one another they were experimenting with a thoroughly social notion.”

<sup>136</sup> W. E. Arnal, “Making and Re-making the Jesus-Sign: Contemporary Markings on the Body of Christ,” in Whose Historical Jesus? ed. Arnal and Desjardins, 309 (emphasis original). I have tried to analyze the reaction to the ‘Cynic hypothesis’ in “Dog among the Pigeons.”

<sup>137</sup> See L. E. Vaage, “The Scholar as Engagé,” in Whose Historical Jesus? ed. Arnal

to understand, first, the somewhat differing methodological foundations on which such portraits are constructed and, second, the important theoretical questions that drive the quest of the historical Jesus.

While it seems unreasonable to imagine a consensus developing in the near future concerning Jesus, it is perhaps not too much to hope that continued debate will bring more agreement, even on such issues as the relevance of the Gospel of Thomas or the role of the synoptic problem in historical Jesus scholarship. Considerable progress has been made in recognizing the latent anti-Semitism in the application of the criterion of dissimilarity, with the result that in many recent reconstructions of the historical Jesus, Jesus is no longer quite the stranger to his own culture that he was a generation or more ago. There is even some hope that a careful application of the criterion of multiple attestation will eliminate the excessive narrowness that has affected some reconstructions of Jesus.

The other set of problems represents a more difficult problem. For until scholars are prepared to acknowledge why particular comparisons are ventured and how they enlighten particular aspects of the Jesus tradition, historical Jesus scholarship may be forever locked in a war of competing Jesuses, each having special explanatory power with respect to a given theoretical problem (the foundations of christological doctrine, the history of Christian anti-Semitism, or significance of "religion" within culture), but each seemingly, though not, I think, in fact, completely opposed to the others.

BASIC METHODOLOGY IN THE QUEST FOR THE HISTORICAL JESUS<sup>1</sup>

JOHN P. MEIER

1. Basic Concepts: The Real Jesus and the Historical Jesus

The historical Jesus is not the real Jesus. The real Jesus is not the historical Jesus. I stress this paradox from the start because endless confusion in the “quest for the historical Jesus”<sup>2</sup> arises from the failure to distinguish these two concepts clearly.

1.1. The Real Jesus

What do we mean when we say we want to investigate the “real” Jesus or the “real” Nero or the real anybody in ancient history? The notion of “real” is a tricky one that needs careful distinction, whether we are dealing with ancient or modern history. In historical research there are different gradations in the sense of “real.”

1. Obviously we cannot mean the total reality of that person, everything he or she ever thought, felt, experienced, did, and said. Even today, despite all the printed government records, TV news tapes, and biographies available, one could not know the total reality of, say, Richard Nixon or Ronald Reagan. Indeed, how could these individuals themselves—let alone anyone else—ever know their total reality, defined in such sweeping, all-encompassing terms?

---

<sup>1</sup> This essay is based on chs. 1 and 6 of John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, vol. 1, The Roots of the Problem and the Person (New York: Doubleday, 1991).

<sup>2</sup> More traditionally, one spoke of the quest “of” the historical Jesus; a major influence here is the title of the English translation of Albert Schweitzer’s classic Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung: The Quest of the Historical Jesus, trans. W. Montgomery (New York: Macmillan, 1910; repr., 1968; the original title of Schweitzer’s work, first published in German in 1906, was Von Reimarus zu Wrede [Tübingen: Mohr]; since 1913 it has borne the title Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung). But the wording “The Quest of the Historical Jesus” can lead to a misunderstanding among the uninitiated (who is questing for whom? subjective or objective genitive?); hence the unambiguous “for.” James H. Charlesworth (Jesus within Judaism, ABRL [New York: Doubleday, 1988]) thinks the words “quest” and “search” are loaded, as though in a dark room we had lost something we might or might not find by fumbling around; he prefers the neutral term “Jesus research.” I agree with his point but despair of changing the speech habits of close to a century of scholars. In this essay “quest,” “search,” and “Jesus research” will be used interchangeably.

2. Still, when it comes to modern public figures, the historian or biographer can usually assemble a “reasonably complete” picture. We will probably debate from now to doomsday the great talent and tragic flaws of Richard Nixon, but there is no debating the mountain of empirical data that public archives, military records, nightly newscasts, election tallies, presidential press conferences, Watergate tapes, congressional hearings, and presidential libraries supply ad nauseam. Wading through and interpreting the facts is a monumental task, but at least the facts are there. The “total reality” of Richard Nixon will continue to elude us as it eluded him. But we have and can hope to refine a “reasonably complete” portrait and record of the “real” Richard Nixon. Passionate and biased interpretations are inevitable, but the vast fund of verifiable facts does exercise some control over wild hypotheses. In this limited, sober sense, the “real” Richard Nixon—and any recent public figure—is in principle available to the historian. The real and the historical do not coincide, but there is considerable overlap.

3. Not so with Jesus of Nazareth. Jesus lived for roughly thirty-five years in first-century Palestine. Each of those years was filled with physical and psychological changes. Even before he began his public ministry, many of his words and deeds would have been witnessed by his family and friends, his neighbors and customers. In principle, these events were available at the time to the interested inquirer. Then, for the last three years or so of his life, much of what Jesus said and did occurred in public or at least before his disciples, especially those who traveled with him. Again, in principle, these events were recoverable at the time to a zealous inquirer.

And yet the vast majority of these deeds and words, the “reasonably complete” record of the “real” Jesus, is irrevocably lost to us today. This is no new insight of modern agnostic scholars. Traditionally Christianity has spoken of “the hidden years” of Jesus’ life—which amounted to all but three or four of them! The apocryphal gospels of the patristic period, mystical visions of medieval times, and modern speculation have sought to fill in the gap, but to no avail. The “real Jesus,” even in the Richard Nixon sense of a reasonably complete record of public words and deeds, is unknown and unknowable. The reader who wants to know the real Jesus should stop reading this essay right now, because the historical Jesus is neither the real Jesus nor the easy way to him. The real Jesus is not available and never will be. This is true not because Jesus did not exist—he certainly did—but rather because the sources that have survived do not and never intended to record all or even most of the words and deeds of his public ministry—to say nothing of the rest of his life.

4. I emphasize this insight about the real Jesus not simply to revel in subtle scholastic distinctions or to set up a theological shell game I can then win on my own terms. The point I am making is true of most figures of ancient history. The life and ideas of Socrates or Pythagoras amounted to much more than we can know today. Indeed, the further back we go, usually the more meager the sources become and the less we can say. Many rulers of Babylon and Egypt are only names to us, although in their own day they loomed like giants and their impact was immense. An expert in Greco-Roman history once remarked to me that what we know with certitude about Alexander the Great can be fitted onto a few pages of print.<sup>3</sup> This simply reminds us that what really occurs in history is much broader than the history recoverable by a historian.<sup>4</sup>

5. Granted, some of the great figures of ancient history, such as Julius Caesar or Cicero, have left us a store of autobiographical writings and public records that allow some access to the “real” person. Hence we must distinguish from the mass of human beings in ancient history the special case of certain well-known public figures.<sup>5</sup> To take a clear example: in Marcus Aurelius (reigned 161–180 CE) we have the rare case of a Roman emperor who wrote down his innermost musings in

---

<sup>3</sup> Some of the ancient biographers of Alexander the Great were themselves aware of the difficulty of conflicting sources and of the selectivity of their own presentations. For a sample of the ancient lives, see Diodorus Siculus, book 17 of his Historical Library, LCL 422 (London: Heinemann; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1963); Quintus Curtius Rufus, The History of Alexander (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1984); Plutarch, “Alexander,” in The Age of Alexander (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1973), 252–334; and Arrian’s The Campaigns of Alexander (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1971). On the problem of historiography in the case of Alexander, see N. G. L. Hammond, Three Historians of Alexander the Great (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983); earlier fragmentary evidence is surveyed in L. Pearson, The Lost Histories of Alexander the Great, Philological Monographs 20 (New York: American Philological Association, 1960). For a recent biography, see A. B. Bosworth, Conquest and Empire: The Reign of Alexander the Great (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988); note the bibliography of both ancient sources and modern authors, pp. 295–314.

<sup>4</sup> On the application of this principle to the quest for the historical Jesus, see Edward Schillebeeckx, Jesus: An Experiment in Christology (New York: Seabury, 1979), 67–71.

<sup>5</sup> To this extent, I must disagree with Marcus J. Borg’s assertion that “we can in fact know as much about Jesus as we can about any figure in the ancient world,” including Caesar (see his Jesus: A New Vision [San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987], 15 and 21 n. 29).

a book called The Meditations. This, plus large amounts of correspondence, official records, ancient histories, coins, and archaeology, allow the noted historian Anthony Birley to write a fairly full biography. Yet even here there are certain years in which it is unclear where Marcus was or what he was doing.<sup>6</sup>

Sir Moses Finley constantly warned us about the severe limitations historians face in studying Greco-Roman history, including even the long and glorious reign of Augustus.<sup>7</sup> Indeed, Finley felt so strongly the lack of “hard” data, including reliable statistics, that he concluded that the study of ancient history is in no significant sense a science.<sup>8</sup> Perhaps it is wiser to distinguish between the “hard” sciences like chemistry and physics and the “soft” sciences, including the humanities, especially ancient history (softer, surely, than modern history). Ancient history is much less quantifiable, much more dependent on inference based on such rough rules of thumb as the best explanation available, the more or most probable explanation, particular criteria for judging historicity, and analogy.<sup>9</sup> At any rate, Finley’s basic caution is well advised. With

---

<sup>6</sup> Anthony Birley, Marcus Aurelius: A Biography, rev. ed. (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1987). Complaints about the scarcity and ambiguity of sources are a common thread in most biographies of Roman emperors; see, e.g., Michael Grant, Nero (New York: Dorset, 1970), 14–15, 209–214; Anthony A. Barrett, Caligula: The Corruption of Power (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1989), xv–xxiii, 244. Reading through Michael Grant’s The Roman Emperors (New York: Scribner’s, 1985) reminds us how little we know about many of the men who ruled the ancient Mediterranean world in the first Christian centuries.

<sup>7</sup> Moses I. Finley, Ancient History: Evidence and Models (New York: Viking, 1985), 10–11.

<sup>8</sup> Finley, Ancient History, 27, 104.

<sup>9</sup> On this point, with reference to Jesus research, see the methodological discussion of Ben F. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus (London: SCM, 1979), 23–110. For more general methodological considerations on the justification of historical judgments, see C. Behan McCullagh, Justifying Historical Descriptions (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984). In ch. 3, “Justifying Singular Descriptions: II Statistical Inferences” (45–73), McCullagh considers various mathematical formulas for quantifying historical probabilities—and the grave difficulty of applying such an approach thoroughly becomes obvious for ancient history in general and the fragmentary data on the historical Jesus in particular. Hence, I will content myself with such general judgments as “very probable,” “more probable,” “less probable,” “unlikely,” etc. To try to assign exact percentages to my assertions (e.g., very probable = 95–80 percent) and then to add, subtract, multiply, and divide percentages to arrive at the overall percentage of probability for a given judgment is to pretend to a mathematical accuracy that is not to be had when the data base is so meager.

I feel a similar unease with regard to the procedures of the Jesus Seminar sponsored by the Westar Institute of Sonoma, California (founded in 1985 by Robert Funk). A group of scholars met regularly to vote on whether Jesus actually said certain things contained in the gospels. Four categories were used: Jesus certainly said this, Jesus probably said this, Jesus probably did not say this, Jesus definitely did not say this. The aim the exception of a relatively few great public figures, the “real” persons of ancient history—be they Hillel and Shammai or Jesus and Simon Peter—are simply not accessible to us today by historical research and never will be.<sup>10</sup>

I stress this point because scholars pursuing the Jesus of history often begin their treatments with the difficulties posed by the four canonical gospels and—especially if they are spiritual descendants of Rudolf Bultmann—with the danger of trying to legitimize faith by historical research. All that may be true, but it is necessary to begin one step further back: the difficulty of knowing anything about Jesus must be placed in the larger context of the difficulty of knowing anything about Thales, Apollonius of Tyana, or anyone else in the ancient world. David Noel Freedman has rightly pointed out that the same problem holds true for those engaged in Old Testament studies. He observes: “While no one questions that people like David and Solomon actually lived and reigned, there is not, to my knowledge, a single piece of evidence outside of the Bible to attest to their existence, much less anything about their noteworthy achievements. Neither one is mentioned in any record of any nation known to us.”<sup>11</sup> Thus, the problem is not unique to Jesus or the sources that narrate his story. Indeed, in comparison to the many shadowy figures of ancient history, it is surprising how much we can know about Jesus.

---

of the project was an edition of the “five gospels” (including the Coptic Gospel of Thomas from Nag Hammadi) which would print the sayings of Jesus in four colors (red, pink, gray, and black) to represent the four categories, ranging from certainly historical to certainly not. While these procedures both appeal to our democratic sympathies and give an air of scientific accuracy, I do not think they really add anything new to our knowledge. For over a century scholars have been exchanging opinions and papers as they debated the historicity of individual sayings of Jesus, formed various schools of thought, and then left some schools to form others. Gathering a particular group in one place to express their opinion by a vote and then printing the majority opinion in colors does not generate a fundamentally new method or new data. For the results, see Robert W. Funk, Roy W. Hoover, and The Jesus Seminar, The Five Gospels: The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus (Sonoma, CA: Polebridge; New York: Macmillan, 1993); cf. also Robert W. Funk and The Jesus Seminar, The Arts of Jesus: The Search for the Authentic Deeds of Jesus (San Francisco: Harper San Francisco, 1998).

<sup>10</sup> In one sense, the situations of Paul of Tarsus or Ignatius of Antioch come closer to those of Caesar or Marcus Aurelius in that Paul and Ignatius have both left us a number of letters written by themselves and containing autobiographical information. Needless to say, such information contains personal biases, but it nevertheless constitutes a uniquely privileged source of historical knowledge. In each case, we are aided further by biographical information (of varying quality) from later writers (Luke for Paul, Eusebius for Ignatius)—hence the paradox that the “real” Paul or “real” Ignatius is more accessible to the modern historian than is Jesus or Simon Peter.

<sup>11</sup> In a written communication to the author (letter dated Oct. 15, 1990).

To summarize the upshot of these various distinctions about “real” figures in history: (1) The total reality of a person is in principle unknowable—despite the fact that no one would deny that such a total reality did exist. This simply reminds us that all historical knowledge about human persons is limited by the very nature of the case. We may take some comfort from the thought that a good deal of the total reality of a person would be irrelevant and positively boring to historians even if it could be known. (2) For many public figures of modern history, the mounds of empirical data available make possible a “reasonably complete” portrait of the “real” person, while varying interpretations of the data naturally remain. (3) While the amount of source material is much less extensive, students of ancient history can sometimes reconstruct a reasonably complete portrait of a few great figures (e.g., Cicero, Caesar). (4) However, we lack sufficient sources to reconstruct a reasonably complete portrait for the vast majority of persons in ancient history; the “real” Thales or Apollonius of Tyana is simply beyond our grasp. It is in this last category that Jesus of Nazareth falls. We cannot know the “real” Jesus through historical research, whether we mean his total reality or just a reasonably complete biographical portrait. We can, however, know the “historical Jesus.”

1.2. The Historical Jesus

Having abandoned the naive hope of knowing the “real” Jesus by means of historical criticism, what do we mean when we say that we are pursuing the “historical Jesus” or the “Jesus of history”?<sup>12</sup> In brief, the Jesus of history is a modern abstraction and construct. By the Jesus of history I mean the Jesus whom we can “recover” and examine by using the scientific tools of modern historical research.<sup>13</sup> Since such research <sup>12</sup> At times, a distinction between the two phrases, “the Jesus of history” and “the historical Jesus,” has been suggested. But in an area where many esoteric distinctions are already in play, I prefer to use the two terms interchangeably.

<sup>13</sup> This definition is not some arbitrary invention of mine; it is the commonly accepted one in present Jesus-of-history research. The same definition or its equivalent can be found in scholars who otherwise differ widely in their views, e.g., Schillebeeckx, Jesus: An Experiment in Christology, 67; and James M. Robinson, A New Quest of the Historical Jesus, SBT 25 (London: SCM, 1959), 26. While Robinson (28–29) emphasizes—quite rightly—that “objective” historical research cannot grasp the peculiarly existential, human aspect of history (e.g., the stance and outlook from which a person acts, the understanding of existence “behind” what a person does), I am rather focusing on the frequent absence of even objective data when we try to investigate figures of ancient history. This difficulty is not one of principle but of fact: data that might once have been arose only with the Enlightenment in the eighteenth century (Hermann Reimarus [1694–1768] being the first famous example of a “quester”), the quest for the historical Jesus is a peculiarly modern endeavor and has its own tangled history, from Reimarus to E. P. Sanders and lesser lights.<sup>14</sup> Of its very nature, this quest can reconstruct only fragments of a mosaic, the faint outline of a faded fresco that allows of many interpretations. We constantly have to be reminded that not only are there no DVDs or Sony cassette recordings of what Jesus said or did. For better or for worse, there are no Watergate tapes of Jesus’ trial before Pilate. Worse still, this marginal Jew in a marginal province at the eastern end of the Roman Empire left no writings of his own (as Cicero did), no archaeological monuments or artifacts (as Augustus did), nothing that comes directly from him without mediators. A moment’s reflection on available are not so today. Simon Peter knew a great deal more about the daily habits, sayings, and thoughts of Jesus than has been preserved in written documents. And what has not been preserved has been—in all probability—irretrievably lost.

---

<sup>14</sup> In the past it was almost de rigueur to begin any book on the historical Jesus with a history of modern research. Indeed, whole books have been dedicated to such a review. Besides Schweitzer’s Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung, which summed up the entire history from the late eighteenth century (Reimarus) to the beginning of the twentieth (William Wrede), see the handy summary (from a conservative point of view) in Charles C. Anderson, Critical Quests of Jesus (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1969); or still more schematically, John S. Kselman, “Modern New Testament Criticism,” in Jerome Bible Commentary 2 (New York: Prentice Hall, 1990), 7–20. A 116-page bibliography, introduced by a 111-page sketch of the chief questers, can be found in Warren S. Kissinger, The Lives of Jesus (New York: Garland, 1985). A more general bibliography on christology, including sections on the historical Jesus, is available in Leland Jennings White, Jesus the Christ: A Bibliography (Wilmington, DE: Glazier, 1988). The most recent full review of literature since 1950 can be found in W. G. Kümmel’s Dreissig Jahre Jesusforschung (1950–1980), BBB 60 (Bonn: Hanstein, 1985). This great scholar of Jesus research continues his work in recent volumes of Theologische Rundschau (see, e.g., “Jesusforschung seit 1981. I. Forschungsgeschichte, Methodenfragen,” TR 53 [1988]: 229–249). A useful annotated bibliography is supplied by Craig A. Evans, Life of Jesus Research, NTTS 13 (Leiden: Brill, 1989). Some trenchant critiques of the unexamined presuppositions of many “questers” can be found in Meyer’s The Aims of Jesus and in James P. Mackey’s Jesus the Man and the Myth (New York: Paulist, 1979), esp. 10–51. Further methodological considerations and caveats can be found in Joachim Gnilka, Jesus von Nazaret: Botschaft und Geschichte, HTKNT 3 (Freiburg: Herder, 1990), 11–34; and Ben Witherington III, The Christology of Jesus (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1990), 1–31.

It is perhaps symptomatic of a newer, different approach that E. P. Sanders does not begin his work Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985) with a lengthy history of all research on the subject. Rather, in a “State of the Question” (23–58), he reviews and criticizes positions of major twentieth-century scholars. For those who would like to read the key works of major questers, these are available in English thanks to the Lives of Jesus Series, ed. Leander E. Keck (Philadelphia: Fortress Press).

these stark facts makes clear why my initial paradox has to be true: the historical Jesus is not the real Jesus, and vice versa. The historical Jesus may give us fragments of the “real” person, but nothing more.<sup>15</sup> Thus, the two terms, “real Jesus” and “historical Jesus,” are relatively clear-cut, even though some theologians like Hans Küng tend to confuse them.<sup>16</sup>

More ambiguous is the phrase “the earthly Jesus” or “Jesus during his life on earth.” While the four gospels do not and do not claim to portray the real Jesus with the full range of everything he ever said or did in public or before his disciples in private (see John 20:30; 21:25), and while they obviously do not provide a modern hypothetical reconstruction (the historical Jesus), they do present us with “the earthly Jesus,” i.e., a picture—however partial and theologically colored—of Jesus during his life on earth. The ambiguity of this term “earthly Jesus” lies in the fact that it can also be used, with different nuances, of the real Jesus and the historical Jesus: they too refer to Jesus on earth. The ambiguity is compounded by the fact that, to a theologian, the very phrase “earthly Jesus” may imply existence in heaven either before the incarnation or after the resurrection.<sup>17</sup> Because of this lack of clarity in the concept, I will not use “earthly Jesus” as a major category in this chapter.

One important ramification of these distinctions is that scholars should not write glibly that, in a given story, the gospels depict or fail to depict “the historical Jesus.” That is a hopeless anachronism. During most of their narrative (excluding John 1:1–18 and most resurrection appearances), the gospels portray Jesus on earth (in the sense I have

---

<sup>15</sup> Hence the appropriateness of the title of John Dominic Crossan’s book, In Fragments: The Aphorisms of Jesus (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1983).

<sup>16</sup> Of course, one must allow for the fact that Küng’s famous work Christ sein (On Being a Christian) was written for a wide audience. Nevertheless, in describing the Jesus we can know through historical-critical research, Küng interchanges “real” (wirklich), “true,” “original,” and “historical” (both historisch and geschichtlich) with abandon. This does not make for clear expression of thought, either in German or in English. For a striking example of this inter-change of terms, see his Christ sein, 6th ed. (Munich: Piper, 1975), 148–153 (ET: On Being a Christian [Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1976], 156–161). (The reader should be warned that the English translation is not entirely reliable: e.g., the German phrase Rückfrage nach Jesus—roughly the equivalent of our “quest for the historical Jesus”—is regularly translated by the strange “counterquestion about Jesus.”) just explained), not the historical Jesus.<sup>18</sup> To be sure, the gospels serve as the chief sources for our reconstruction of the historical Jesus; but to speak of the gospel writers as presenting or intending to present the historical Jesus transports them in an exegetical time machine to the Enlightenment.

<sup>17</sup> One could pursue this point further: some of the resurrection appearances present the risen Jesus as living and acting “on earth,” e.g., the Emmaus story (Luke 24:13–35; cf. Acts 1:1–5). In the Emmaus story, is the risen Jesus at the same time “earthly” insofar as he is interacting and conversing with others on earth?

1.3. Historical and Historic

Real, historical, earthly—these are the distinctions I shall use in an attempt to bring some terminological clarity into the murky debate about the historical Jesus. In doing this, I purposely choose not to lean on the classic distinction found in many German authors, who distinguish the “historical” (historisch) from the “historic” (geschichtlich).<sup>19</sup> The “historical” refers to the dry bare bones of knowledge about the past, with the researcher prescinding from any possible relevance to or influence on our present-day life and quest for meaning. Imagine, for instance, an expert in ancient Babylonian history, driven by nothing except a thirst for exactitude, trying to draw up a precise chronology of the reigning kings of Babylon in a given century. Such a “historical” study aims at the past as dead past, viewed with the cold eye of objective research, interested in pure, verifiable data for their own sake. The “historic,” in contrast, refers to the past as it is meaningful and challenging, engaging and thought-provoking for present-day men and women. Imagine, for instance, a black college student writing a thesis on Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. The young scholar might be quite careful in researching the facts; but the figure of King could never be for that student simply a datum embalmed in the past. Inevitably, the student would select, arrange, and underscore certain data insofar as they seemed to speak to the problems and promises of today.

In principle, this distinction of historical and historic can be applied to Jesus just as much as to any other great personage of the past. In theory, he can be made the object of a coolly distant scientific investigation, or he can be approached as the highly significant source and center of Christian thought and life down through the ages, a figure still worshiped by millions today.

---

<sup>18</sup> Curiously, Schillebeeckx uses “earthly” as a synonym for “real” after censuring its use as a synonym for “historical”; see Jesus, 67–68 (cf. the Dutch original, Jezus, het verhaal van een levende, 3rd ed. [Bloemendaal: Nelissen, 1975], 54–55). (The reader is warned that the English translation of Jesus is often unreliable; hence the recourse to the Dutch original here.)

<sup>19</sup> Of course, in doing this German exegetes continue a learned word game played by many German theologians, namely, taking two words, one from a Teutonic root and the other from a Latin root—both of which are used more or less interchangeably in common speech—and creating a fine philosophical distinction between them.

Although this distinction of historical (historisch) and historic (geschichtlich) is often repeated in Jesus research (especially among those strongly influenced by the Bultmannian tradition), I remain doubtful of its usefulness for English-speaking scholars today, for four reasons. (1) After close to a century of use, the distinction remains ambiguous and varies in meaning or function from author to author, with even some Germans not observing it. (2) The distinction, while supposedly employed to facilitate objective research, often carries with it the extra baggage of theological or ideological agendas. (3) The twofold distinction does not do justice to the complexity of the situation. (4) While defensible in theory, it is useless in the real world—even the “real” world of scholars.

First of all, the distinction does not always mean the same thing or function in the same way even among the various writers who use it. Martin Kähler (1835–1912), who applied the distinction to Jesus in the nineteenth century, did so in defense of a particular kind of “critical pietism” in late nineteenth-century German Protestantism—and even he did not always observe his own distinction with strict rigor.<sup>20</sup> His ultimate goal seems to have been the protection of basic traditional Christian teachings about Jesus Christ (e.g., true divinity and true sinless humanity) from the inroads of historical criticism.<sup>21</sup>

---

<sup>20</sup> A good critical edition of Kähler’s pivotal work (first published in 1892), with annotations giving reactions by other scholars as well as Kähler’s responses and additions, can be found in Martin Kähler, Der sogenannte historische Jesus und der geschichtliche, biblische Christus, ed. E. Wolf, Theologische Bücherei 2, 4th ed. (München: Kaiser, 1969). A translation, with a foreword by Paul Tillich and a helpful introduction by the translator, Carl E. Braaten, can be found in The So-Called Historical Jesus and the Historic Biblical Christ (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1964). For further reflections on Kähler’s relation to more recent quests, see Carl E. Braaten, “Martin Kähler on the Historic Biblical Christ,” in The Historical Jesus and the Kerygmatic Christ, ed. Carl E. Braaten and Roy A. Harrisville (New York: Abingdon, 1964), 79–105. On p. 84 of Der sogenannte historische Jesus, Kähler affirms the divinity of Jesus—although elsewhere he makes clear that theologians are not bound to the wording and concepts of conciliar dogmas and later systematic theology. As Otto Michel observes, Kähler thought his position on Jesus as “true God and true man” was “pre-dogmatic”; see Michel’s “Der ‘historische Jesus’ und das theologische Gewissensproblem [sic, probably for Gewissensproblem],” EvT 15 (1955): 349–363, esp. 352–353. For varying views on Kähler’s key categories of geschichtlich and übergeschichtlich, see Heinrich Leipold, Offenbarung und Geschichte als Problem des Verstehens: Eine Untersuchung zur Theologie Martin Käblers (Gütersloh: Mohn, 1962); and Johannes Wirsching, Gott in der Geschichte: Studien zur theologiegeschichtlichen Stellung und systematischen Grundlegung der Theologie Martin Käblers, Forschungen zur Geschichte und Lehre des Protestantismus 10.26 (München: Kaiser, 1963).

This was not exactly the driving concern of Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976) when he took over the distinction in his twentieth-century synthesis of Christianity and Martin Heidegger's brand of existentialism.<sup>22</sup> Bultmann is one with Kähler in emphasizing the central Christian proclamation (kerygma) of Jesus' death and resurrection and in rejecting the historical Jesus as the basis or the content of Christian faith. Bultmann, however, pushes the distinction in a direction that Kähler would hardly have followed. For Bultmann, it makes no difference whether Jesus actually broke down and despaired on the cross;<sup>23</sup> the mere fact that Jesus died on the cross is sufficient for Christian faith, i.e., for the encounter between the believer and God.<sup>24</sup> While something can be known of Jesus' teaching, "we can now know almost nothing concerning the life and personality of Jesus, since the early Christian

---

<sup>21</sup> It is often claimed that Kähler invented the historical/historic distinction. But, at least by way of negative reaction, he owes something to Wilhelm Herrmann's distinction between the basis of faith (everything about the earthly Jesus that is accessible to natural knowledge) and the content of faith (the exalted Christ); see Braaten, The So-Called Historical Jesus, 14. Slenczka (Geschichtlichkeit, 281–295) points out that Herrmann's distinction is not to be equated with the distinction between the Jesus of history and the Christ of faith (275).

<sup>22</sup> See his Theology of the New Testament, 2 vols. (London: SCM, 1952), especially ch. 1, "The Message of Jesus," 3–32. A famous lecture on the subject became the monograph Das Verhältnis der urchristlichen Christusbotschaft zum historischen Jesus, 3rd ed. (Heidelberg: Winter/Universitätsverlag, 1962); a brief synopsis of the monograph appeared as "Das Verhältnis des urchristlichen Christuskerygmas zum historischen Jesus," in Der historische Jesus und der kerygmatische Christus, 233–235; an English translation of the lecture can be found in "The Primitive Christian Kerygma and the Historical Jesus," in The Historical Jesus and the Kerygmatic Christ, ed. Braaten and Harrisville, 15–42. An earlier form (first published in 1926) of Bultmann's thought on Jesus' teaching (with heavy existentialist overtones) is Jesus and the Word (London: Fontana [Collins], 1958). In general, note that at times Bultmann will use "kerygmatic" in place of "historic," an echo of his "kerygmatic" theology.

<sup>23</sup> "The greatest embarrassment to the attempt to reconstruct a portrait of Jesus is the fact that we cannot know how Jesus understood his end, his death. . . . We cannot tell whether or how Jesus found meaning in it. We may not veil from ourselves the possibility that he suffered a collapse" ("The Primitive Christian Kerygma and the Historical Jesus," 23–24).

<sup>24</sup> As Braaten points out ("Martin Kähler on the Historic Biblical Christ," 101), Kähler would not have agreed with Bultmann that the New Testament kerygma needs only the bare fact of Jesus and his cross. As R. Hermann points out in the article on Martin Kähler in the 3rd ed. of RGG (vol. 3, cols. 1082–1084), "a tendency to 'demythologize' was far from the mind of Kähler" (col. 1082).

sources show no interest in either, are moreover fragmentary and often legendary. . . .”<sup>25</sup> At this point, the reader may get the uneasy feeling that the historic Christ, the kerygmatic Christ, the Christ of faith exalted by Bultmann, looks suspiciously like a timeless gnostic myth or a Jungian archetype, no matter how much Bultmann stresses historicity and the identity of the crucified Jesus with the kerygma that is preached.<sup>26</sup>

Hence it is not surprising that some German theologians, notably Paul Althaus (1888–1966), sought to reclaim Kähler’s historical/historic distinction for a more conservative school of thought.<sup>27</sup> Yet, as Heraclitus observed, no one can put his foot into the same stream twice. Faced with the historical skepticism of Bultmann, and appropriating the “new quest” of Bultmann’s pupils (e.g., Günther Bornkamm),<sup>28</sup> Althaus

---

<sup>25</sup> Bultmann, Jesus and the Word, 14. In fairness to Bultmann, two points should be noted. First, in the text quoted, Bultmann is reacting against the excesses of the heavily psychologizing nineteenth-century “liberal lives” of Jesus. Second, Robinson (A New Quest, 19–22) detects a shift in Bultmann’s position, in a later article (“Allgemeine Wahrheit und christliche Verkündigung,” ZTK 54 [1957]: 244–254): Bultmann sees some continuity between Jesus and the Christian kerygma on the question of law and grace (251–254). Be that as it may, the article in no way changes his basic position on the historisch/geschichtlich distinction.

<sup>26</sup> Bultmann himself rejects the claim that he destroys the continuity between the historical Jesus and the kerygma. Nevertheless, one is not encouraged when in a key essay he specifies that he will treat only the continuity between the historical Jesus and the primitive Christian proclamation “and not, between the historical Jesus and the Christ. The Christ of the kerygma is not a historical figure which could enjoy continuity with the historical Jesus” (“The Primitive Christian Kerygma and the Historical Jesus,” 18). At the same time, even Bultmann’s great opponent Paul Althaus admits that Bultmann never went to the extreme of some theologians who, deeply influenced by German idealism, distinguished between the historical person of Jesus and the concept or ideal of a symbolic Christ: the former is not unconditionally tied to the latter and can ultimately be dispensed with. For Althaus’s criticism of Martin Werner, Fritz Buri, and like-minded theologians, see his The So-Called Kerygma and the Historical Jesus (Edinburgh: Oliver and Boyd, 1959), 13–18.

<sup>27</sup> See Paul Althaus, Der gegenwärtige Stand der Frage nach dem historischen Jesus, Bayerische Akademie der Wissenschaften, Philosophisch-Historische Klasse, Sitzungsberichte 6 (München: Verlag der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, 1960), 3–19; idem, The So-Called Kerygma and the Historical Jesus, ed. Braaten and Harrisville, esp. 38–42, where he criticizes what he considers the undue narrowing of the meaning of geschichtlich in the Bultmannian camp.

<sup>28</sup> There is no reason to go into the precise positions of the various post-Bultmannians like Bornkamm and Conzelmann, since that would not alter my basic point, namely, the wide variation in meaning and use of the historical/historic distinction. For a representative sample of the post-Bultmannians, see Günther Bornkamm, Jesus of Nazareth (New York: Harper & Row, 1960); Hans Conzelmann, “The Method of the Life-of-Jesus Research,” in The Historical Jesus and the Kerygmatic Christ, ed. Braaten and Harrisville 54–68; idem, Jesus (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973); Ernst Fuchs, Studies of the Historical Jesus, SBT 42 (Naperville, IL: Allenson, 1964); Herbert Braun, “The Significance of Qumran looks to historical research for the guarantee that the Christ of faith is not just another great myth of world religions.<sup>29</sup> So, while rejecting Bultmann's approach, Althaus takes a basically positive stance toward the new quest of post-Bultmannians like Bornkamm since, "by its very nature, Christian faith has a burning interest in what scientific history can know about Jesus."<sup>30</sup> One cannot imagine Kähler saying this about the German "liberal lives of Jesus" in the nineteenth century. Thus, although Althaus, in his opposition to Bultmann, seeks to remain the faithful interpreter of Kähler, the distinction between historical and historic receives a new twist.<sup>31</sup>

What makes the historical/historic distinction even more problematic is that some key scholars within twentieth-century German Lutheranism (and German Lutheranism was the source of the distinction) reject its validity or simply ignore it. Most curious is the treatment given the distinction by Albert Schweitzer (1875–1965), the great chronicler and critic of the "liberal lives." On the one hand, Schweitzer shows no knowledge of Kähler or his work and does not utilize Kähler's distinction in his own presentation.<sup>32</sup> On the other hand, while treating early twentieth-century disputes over the historicity of Jesus, Schweitzer notes in passing the position of G. Wobbermin, a professor at Breslau, who "goes off on a dangerous path."<sup>33</sup> Wobbermin's dangerous path is for the Problem of the Historical Jesus," in The Historical Jesus and the Kerygmatic Christ, 69–78; idem, Jesus of Nazareth: The Man and His Time (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979). Ernst Käsemann is widely acknowledged to be the "father" of the new quest among post-Bultmannians; his two most important essays on the topic are "The Problem of the Historical Jesus," in Essays on New Testament Themes, SBT 41 (London: SCM, 1964), 15–47; and "Blind Alleys in the 'Jesus of History' Controversy," in New Testament Questions of Today (London: SCM, 1969), 23–65. See also his Der Ruf der Freiheit, 4th ed. (Tübingen: Mohr [Siebeck], 1968). The standard survey of the "new quest" of the post-Bultmannians is James M. Robinson's A New Quest of the Historical Jesus; note especially the section on "the ambiguous term 'historical Jesus'" on pp. 26–32.

---

<sup>29</sup> Note the telling use of Gewähr (guarantee, surety, warrant) on p. 14 of Der gegenwärtige Stand.

<sup>30</sup> Althaus, De gegenwärtige Stand, 19. Althaus hastens to add, in the spirit of Kähler, that such historical knowledge cannot be the basis of faith.

<sup>31</sup> Althaus implicitly admits his shift and the reasons for it in The So-Called Kerygma, 25.

<sup>32</sup> However, the great scholar of Jesus research, John Reumann, has suggested to me in an oral communication that Schweitzer may well have known of Kähler's distinction but purposely suppressed Kähler's work on the subject, so as not to disturb the pattern and development Schweitzer wanted to see in the history of Jesus research.

<sup>33</sup> The translations of the quotations about Wobbermin are my own and rest upon the text of Schweitzer's Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung, published in 1966 (vols. 77/78, 79/80; München: Siebenstern Taschenbuch), 520–521.

his “attempt” to distinguish between the historical (historisch) and the historic (geschichtlich) Jesus. The distinction is understood roughly in the sense Kähler proposed, but Schweitzer will have none of it. With sarcastic indignation he points out that the historic Jesus has been responsible for untold evils down through the ages, from the destruction of ancient culture to the very fact of the Middle Ages to Catholicism’s attempt to destroy “the many progressive achievements of the modern state.” Who would want to give up the historical Jesus for this historic figure?<sup>34</sup>

Closer to our own day, Joachim Jeremias (1900–79), one of the twentieth century’s greatest experts on the historical Jesus, simply refused to operate with the historical/historic distinction.<sup>35</sup> Thus, we are left asking ourselves: With such a variety of uses or nonuses among German scholars, is the distinction all that vital or useful among English-speaking scholars?

A second problem with the distinction is that, almost inevitably, it leads to a “good guy/bad guy” presentation. Either the historical Jesus is exalted in order to dethrone a Christ of faith that was merely a fraudulent creation of the church (so many from Reimarus to Hollenbach), or the historic Christ is extolled over the oscillating and contradictory reconstructions of the historical Jesus (so Kähler and followers, including many “dialectical” theologians like Barth and Bultmann after World War I). Granted, the distinction need not be accompanied by value judgments and theological programs, but such has been the case for about a century. All that seems to happen is that new agendas (e.g., liberation theology) replace the old ones; the game of good guy/bad guy continues.

A third problem is that the dichotomy of historical/historic, while applicable to most well-known figures of the past, does not do justice to the complexity of the case of Jesus. Norman Perrin<sup>36</sup> pointed out that a three-part distinction fits the special situation of Jesus better. (1) One can collect descriptive historical knowledge (“hard” knowledge) about a person of the ancient past called Jesus of Nazareth; this is the level of the “historical.” (2) One can then proceed to highlight and appropriate those aspects of this historical knowledge that would be significant for us today. This is the level of the “historic.” However, one could do the same thing in the case of Socrates, St. Augustine, or Sigmund Freud. Any great thinker and actor of the past can be studied on the level of cold disconnected facts and bare chronology or on the level of a meaningful synthesis of his or her thought and action, seen as relevant and challenging for people today. In that sense, one could be committed to the “program” of Socrates or Freud, one could be entranced and gripped by the person of Thomas More or Thomas Jefferson; in the same way one can be personally fascinated by the historic Jesus, whether one is a Jew, a Buddhist, or an agnostic. (3) Hence the second level must be carefully distinguished from a third level, namely faith-knowledge of Jesus as Lord and Christ, the faith-stance that prompts me to call Jesus my Lord and my Savior. This level, in the eyes of the believer, is the unique and exclusive territory of Jesus; unlike the first and second levels, it cannot be applied to other figures of ancient history.

---

<sup>34</sup> In light of Schweitzer’s voluminous knowledge of the nineteenth-century literature on the historical Jesus, it is astounding that he was ignorant of Kähler’s contribution. One might speculate that, if it had not been for Bultmann’s recycling of Kähler’s distinction, the latter’s work might have been lost to large sectors of the theological world.

<sup>35</sup> Joachim Jeremias, “Der gegenwärtige Stand der Debatte um das Problem des historischen Jesus,” in Der historische Jesus und der kerygmatische Christus, ed. Ristow and Matthiae, 12–25 (ET: The Problem of the Historical Jesus, FBBS 13 [Philadelphia: Fortress, 1964]). At one point, the English translation misses a nuance when Jeremias implicitly equates Historie and Geschichte, instead of engaging in the Kähler/Bultmann distinction: “For the kerygma—God was in Christ and reconciled the world with himself—refers to a historical (historisches) event. God was revealing himself in a happening in history (Geschichte)” (“Der gegenwärtige Stand,” 19). (This way of putting things may also reflect the fact that, in ordinary German, Historie would not be used all that often, being largely an academic loanword from Latin.)

Perrin’s three-part model seems to fit the complex situation better than the simple dichotomy of historical/historic,<sup>37</sup> but unfortunately it introduces further muddle into the already muddled terminology. As Perrin himself admits,<sup>38</sup> Kähler uses the term “historic” for what Perrin calls faith-knowledge, while Perrin restricts “historic” to the second-level knowledge

---

It is characteristic that Jeremias did not regularly employ the adjective geschichtlich of Jesus when he described his own theological program; he rather spoke of the historical Jesus and the faith-witness of the early church. John Reumann has pointed out to me that this usage mirrors Jeremias’s own theological agenda: revelation is to be found in the historical Jesus, not in the later, post-Easter response of the Christian church.

For a full presentation of what Jeremias thought could be said about the historical Jesus, see his New Testament Theology, part 1, The Proclamation of Jesus (London: SCM, 1971). Interestingly, Küng has shown a similar distaste for a firm distinction between historisch and geschichtlich; see his Christ sein, 148–153.

<sup>36</sup> Norman Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (London: SCM, 1967), 234–238.

<sup>37</sup> For further comments on Perrin’s approach, see Amos N. Wilder, “Norman Perrin and the Relation of Historical Knowledge to Faith,” HTR 82 (1989): 201–211, with the literature cited there.

<sup>38</sup> Wilder, “Perrin,” 238.

of any past figure that is relevant to our existence today.<sup>39</sup> Complicating the picture even further is the fact that, actually, Kähler's discussion starts out with an existential meaning of "historic" similar to Perrin's second level, only to slide quickly into the use of "historic" for faith-knowledge of Jesus as the Lord (Perrin's third level).<sup>40</sup> The ambiguity inherent in the terminology thus stems from Kähler himself; indeed, it aroused strong objections in his own day.<sup>41</sup> Perrin's refinement, while justified in theory, only increases the confusion in practice.

Apart from these difficulties caused by the usage of Kähler and Perrin, there is a final problem in the distinction between "historical" and "historic" that makes its application to Jesus not very serviceable. The distinction presupposes that some scholars do or at least could study Jesus' life and teaching in detail without any interest in its impact on subsequent history or on thoughtful people today. While that may be theoretically possible in the University of Phnom Penh or for a visiting professor from Mars, is it really conceivable that a scholar in the western world—Christian, Jew, or agnostic—could approach a detailed study of the historical Jesus without a philosophical or religious interest in—or antipathy toward—the material under the microscope? Jesus continues to be studied in all parts of the world because Marxists, Buddhists, and agnostics are all intrigued—for very different reasons—by this enigmatic

---

<sup>39</sup> It is intriguing that, while Perrin claims that his position is that of Bultmann, he admits that Bultmann was prepared "to describe almost all of the faith-knowledge in terms of historic knowledge" (Wilder, "Perrin," 240 n. 1). In effect, does this not grant that Bultmann's distinction was basically the twofold one of Kähler, not the threefold one Perrin is urging?

<sup>40</sup> It is remarkable how quickly Kähler leaps from the general sense of "historic," applicable to any person who has been influential in molding posterity, to the exclusivistic sense in which he applies the term to Jesus as Lord, whose influence in molding posterity consists precisely in the creation of the Easter faith in his disciples; see Kähler, The So-Called Historical Jesus, 63–64. In a sense, Kähler is operating by way of theological analogy: from the use of "historic" for any influential figure of the past, relevant to us today, he moves to the uniquely influential figure of Jesus, relevant to Christianity as its only Lord. The linchpin of the analogy is that, in Jesus' case, his influence is the creation of a unique, exclusivistic faith. No doubt it is this "slide" which both opens up the possibility of a three-part distinction for Perrin and also creates difficulties for him.

<sup>41</sup> It is significant that Willibald Beyschlag, Otto Ritschl, and Ferdinand Kattenbusch all found Kähler's concept of the historic Christ objectionable because it seemed to put Jesus on the same level as, e.g., Francis of Assisi vis-à-vis later Franciscans. Kähler replied that Jesus' unique historic impact flows from the revelation of him as the Risen One; hence the historic Jesus is not to be compared with Francis of Assisi or Ignatius of Loyola as the founding fathers of the Franciscans or the Jesuits respectively. See the excerpts of the arguments in the footnotes in the German edition of Kähler's essay, Der sogenannte historische Jesus, 38–39 n. a.

Jew. As Bultmann never tired of saying, all of us come to the exegesis of scripture with our own presuppositions, biases, and interests. This amounts to admitting that our quest for the historical Jesus contains from the beginning something of an interest in the historic Jesus as well. Perrin's first and second levels are hopelessly intertwined in the flesh-and-blood world of human scholars.

What can and must be bracketed for the time being, for the sake of the scientific method employed, is the third level, i.e., faith-knowledge. Bracketed, I say, not betrayed. We abstract from Christian faith because we are involved in the hypothetical reconstruction of a past figure by purely scientific means: empirical data from ancient documents, sifted by human minds operating by inference, analogy, and certain specific criteria. Both method and goal are extremely narrow and limited; the results do not claim to provide either a substitute for or the object of faith. For the moment, we are prescinding from faith, not denying it, although later on a correlation between our historical quest and the stance of faith may be possible. For the time being, we will be focusing on the theoretical construct I have called "the historical Jesus," with the realization that in practice one cannot adequately disentangle him from the "historic Jesus." In reality, the one flows too much into the other. While the scholar may try to prescind from a specifically Christian or ecclesiastical commitment, a more general "existential commitment," a concern about what Jesus may mean for human life today, necessarily energizes the historical quest.

We come back to where we started: the historical Jesus is not the real Jesus, but only a fragmentary hypothetical reconstruction of him by modern means of research.

2. Criteria: How Do We Decide What Comes from Jesus?

I have elsewhere argued that, in our quest for the historical Jesus, we are dependent, for the most part, on the four canonical gospels.<sup>42</sup> Since these gospels are suffused with the Easter faith of the early church and were written from forty to seventy years after the events narrated, we are left asking: How can we distinguish what comes from Jesus (Stage I, roughly 28–30 CE) from what was created by the oral tradition of the early church (Stage II, roughly 30–70 CE) and what was produced by the editorial work (redaction) of the evangelists (Stage III, roughly 70–100 CE)?<sup>43</sup> All too often, popular books on Jesus pick and choose among the gospel stories in a haphazard way, the authors deciding at any given moment that what strikes them as reasonable or plausible is therefore historical.<sup>44</sup> More technical books usually enunciate rules for judging the gospel material (“criteria of historicity”), but the rules sometimes seem to be forgotten when the gospel pericopes are treated in detail.<sup>45</sup> In this section, I will spell out which rules of judgment (i.e., “criteria”) are helpful in reaching a decision about what material comes from the historical Jesus.<sup>46</sup>

---

<sup>42</sup> See Meier, A Marginal Jew I, 41–166.

Granted the nature of ancient history in general and the nature of the gospels in particular, the criteria of historicity will usually produce judgments that are only more or less probable; certainty is rarely to be had.<sup>47</sup> Indeed, since in the quest for the historical Jesus almost anything is possible, the function of the criteria is to pass from the merely possible

---

<sup>43</sup> This is a schematic statement of the problem. The actual situation was naturally much more complex: e.g., some disciples of Jesus may have begun to collect and arrange sayings of Jesus even before his death (Stage I), and the oral tradition continued to develop during the period of the redaction of the gospels (Stage III).

<sup>44</sup> Even the fine book by the historian Michael Grant does not entirely escape this tendency; see his Jesus: An Historian's Review of the Gospels (New York: Scribner's, 1977); the appendix outlining his approach to criteria (197–204) is disappointing. Still weaker in the area of criteria is James Breech's The Silence of Jesus: The Authentic Voice of the Historical Man (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983). While the book does at times use familiar criteria (embarrassment, discontinuity), the argument largely depends on scholarly consensus combined with aesthetic intuition about literature. The results cannot help but be highly subjective.

<sup>45</sup> This is even the case with the judicious work of Meyer, The Aims of Jesus. The first part of the book (23–113) spells out method and “indices” of judgment with great care; but, as the book proceeds, more and more of the redactional theology of the evangelists is declared to come from the historical Jesus, leaving one wondering how useful the indices really are.

<sup>46</sup> René Latourelle (“Critères d'authenticité historique des Evangiles,” Greg 55 [1974]: 609–637, esp. 618) rightly warns against confusing criteria with proof. Criteria are rules or norms that are applied to the gospel material to arrive at a judgment.

<sup>47</sup> In the quest for the historical Jesus, sometimes certainty is more easily had about “secondary” circumstances than about the words and deeds of Jesus himself. For example, the converging evidence of the four gospels and the Acts of the Apostles, Josephus, Philo, Tacitus, and the Caesarea Maritima inscription (found in 1961) makes it at least morally, if not physically, certain that Pontius Pilate was the Roman governor of Judea in 28–30 CE. Even here, though, moral certitude is really just a very high degree of probability. The fact of Pilate's governorship is not absolutely or metaphysically certain, for it is not theoretically or metaphysically impossible that Josephus is mistaken or that the references to Pilate in Philo are Christian interpolations or that the Caesarea Maritima inscription is a fraud. But since any of these possibilities (not to mention all of them together) is so extremely unlikely, we are justified in considering to the really probable, to inspect various probabilities, and to decide which candidate is most probable. Ordinarily, the criteria cannot hope to do more.<sup>48</sup>

Scholars seem to vie with one another to see who can compile the longest list of criteria.<sup>49</sup> Sometimes a subtle apologetic motive may be at our conclusion morally certain, especially since, in daily life, we constantly make firm theoretical judgments and practical decisions on the basis of high probability. Any talk about “proof” of authentic Jesus material must be understood within this context of a range of probabilities.

---

<sup>48</sup> Sometimes scholars seek to distinguish between “criteria” and “indices” or even to substitute the word “index” for “criterion”; see, e.g., Latourelle, “Critères d’authenticité historique des Evangiles”; Meyer, The Aims of Jesus, 86; and Rainer Riesner, Jesus als Lehrer, WUNT 2.7 (Tübingen: Mohr [Siebeck], 1981), 86–96, esp. 86–87; Francesco Lambiasi, Lautenticità storica dei vangeli, 2nd ed., Studi biblici 4 (Bologna: EDB, 1986), 189–190. However, scholars favoring some sort of distinction do not always agree among themselves as to what constitutes the distinction. Sometimes “criterion” indicates what allows a fairly certain judgment, while “index” suggests a lower level of probability (so Latourelle; Lambiasi adds a third category, namely “motive,” an argument that indicates verisimilitude). Others use indices for individual observations relevant to the question of authenticity, while criteria refer to more general rules (so Riesner). Meyer prefers to drop the language of “criteria” in favor of “indices.” Personally, I see no great value in the various distinctions or changes in terminology. My own view is that our judgments about authenticity deal for the most part with a range of probabilities; I do not claim that the use of the criteria I propose will generate absolute certitude. Hence, I see no need to distinguish “criteria” from “indices”; the former term will be used throughout what follows.

<sup>49</sup> The reader who follows up the bibliographical references will soon discover a wearisome repetition in much of the literature. I have therefore restricted the bibliography to a few contributions that say all that need be said on the issue. In addition to the works of Latourelle, Riesner, and Meyer, see Charles E. Carlston, “A Positive Criterion of Authenticity,” BR 7 (1962): 33–44; Harvey K. McArthur, “A Survey of Recent Gospel Research,” Int 18 (1964): 39–55, esp. 47–51; idem, “The Burden of Proof in Historical Jesus Research,” ExpTim 82 (1970–1971): 116–119; William O. Walker, “The Quest for the Historical Jesus: A Discussion of Methodology,” ATR 51 (1969): 38–56; Morna D. Hooker, “Christology and Methodology,” NTS 17 (1970–1971): 480–487; idem, “On Using the Wrong Tool,” Theology 75 (1972): 570–581; Rudolf Pesch, Jesu Ureigene Taten? QD 52 (Freiburg: Herder, 1970), esp. 135–158; D. G. A. Calvert, “An Examination of the Criteria for Distinguishing the Authentic Words of Jesus,” NTS 18 (1971–1972): 209–219; Fritzleo Lentzen-Deis, “Kriterien für die historische Beurteilung der Jesusüberlieferung in den Evangelien,” in Rückfrage nach Jesus, QD 63 (Freiburg: Herder, 1974), 78–117; Neil J. McLeney, “Authenticating Criteria and Mark 7:1–23,” CBQ 34 (1972): 431–460; Francesco Lambiasi, Criteri di autenticità storica dei Vangeli sinottici: Rassegna storica e tentativo di sistematizzazione dei contributi di criteriologia degli ultimi venti anni (1954–1974) (diss.; Rome: Gregorian University, 1974); idem, Lautenticità storica dei vangeli; idem, Gesù di Nazaret: Una verifica storica, Fame della Parola (Monferrato: Marietti, 1983), 63–68; Schillebeeckx, Jesus, 81–100; Joseph A. Fitzmyer, “Methodology in the Study of the Aramaic Substratum of Jesus’ Sayings in the New Testament,” in Jésus aux origines de la christologie, ed. J. Dupont, BETL 40 (Leuven: Leuven University Press; work: so many criteria surely guarantee the results of our quest! More sober scholars, instead, are no doubt seeking as many controls as possible over the difficult material. Often, however, what is naturally a single criterion is “chopped up” to create a number of criteria; and what are at best secondary, if not dubious, criteria are mixed in with truly useful ones. I agree with Occam that categories are not to be multiplied without necessity. Hence I prefer to distill five “primary” criteria from the many suggested. After we have looked at these five, we will consider five “secondary” (some would say “dubious”) criteria; some of these secondary criteria may at times offer post-factum confirmation of decisions we have already reached on the basis of the five primary criteria.

2.1. Primary Criteria

2.1.1. The Criterion of Embarrassment

The criterion of “embarrassment” (so Schillebeeckx) or “contradiction” (so Meyer) focuses on actions or sayings<sup>50</sup> of Jesus that would have embarrassed or created difficulty for the early church. The point of the

---

Gembloux: Duculot, 1975), 73–102; Ernst Käsemann, “Die neue Jesus-Frage,” in Jésus aux origines de la christologie, ed. J. Dupont, BETL 40 (Leuven: Leuven University; Gembloux: Duculot, 1975), 47–57; D. Lührmann, “Die Frage nach Kriterien für ursprüngliche Jesusworte—eine Problemskizze,” in Jésus aux origines de la christologie, ed. Dupont, 59–72; David L. Mealand, “The Dissimilarity Test,” SJT 31 (1978): 41–50; Helge Kjaer Nielsen, “Kriterien zur Bestimmung authentischer Jesusworte,” SNTU 4 (1979): 5–26; Robert H. Stein, “The ‘Criteria’ for Authenticity,” in Gospel Perspectives, vol. 1, ed. R. France and D. Wenham (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1980), 225–263; Reginald Fuller, “The Criterion of Dissimilarity: The Wrong Tool?” in Christological Perspectives: Festschrift H. K. McArthur, ed. R. Berkey and S. Edwards (New York: Pilgrim, 1982), 42–48; Giuseppe Ghiberti, “Überlegungen zum neueren Stand der Leben-Jesu-Forschung,” MTZ 33 (1982): 99–115; E. Earle Ellis, “Gospels Criticism: A Perspective on the State of the Art,” in Das Evangelium und die Evangelien, ed. P. Stuhlmacher, WUNT 28 (Tübingen: Mohr [Siebeck], 1983), 27–54; Breech, The Silence of Jesus, 9, 22–26, 66–85; Dennis Polkow, “Method and Criteria for Historical Jesus Research,” Society of Biblical Literature Seminar Papers 26 (1987): 336–356; M. Eugene Boring, “The Historical-Critical Method’s ‘Criteria of Authenticity’: The Beatitudes in Q and Thomas as a Test Case,” in The Historical Jesus and the Rejected Gospels, ed. Charles W. Hedrick, Semeia 44 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988), 9–44. For a history of the development of thought about the criteria, see Lambiasi, L'autenticità storica dei vangeli, 19–110.

<sup>50</sup> While the criteria are usually aimed at the sayings of Jesus in particular, it must be remembered that they can also be applied to the actions of Jesus. In some forms of the quest, the actions of Jesus and their relation to his sayings are almost ignored. Morton Smith (Jesus the Magician [New York: Barnes & Noble, 1978]), E. P. Sanders (Jesus and Judaism), and Joseph A. Fitzmyer (“Methodology,” 73) rightly protest against this one-sided emphasis. As Nielsen (“Kriterien,” 21) notes, the tradition of words and the tradition of works can act as a reciprocal check. For one reason why the sayings tradition tends to be emphasized, see Lührmann, “Die Frage,” 64–65.

criterion is that the early church would hardly have gone out of its way to create material that only embarrassed its creator or weakened its position in arguments with opponents. Rather, embarrassing material coming from Jesus would naturally be either suppressed or softened in later stages of the gospel tradition, and often such progressive suppression or softening can be traced through the four gospels.<sup>51</sup>

A prime example is the baptism of the supposedly superior and sinless Jesus by his supposed inferior, John the Baptist, who proclaimed “a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins.”<sup>52</sup> Mysterious, laconic, stark Mark recounts the event with no theological explanation as to why the superior sinless one submits to a baptism meant for sinners (Mark 1:4–11). Matthew introduces a dialogue between the Baptist and Jesus prior to the baptism; the Baptist openly confesses his unworthiness to baptize his superior and gives way only when Jesus commands him to do so in order that God’s saving plan may be fulfilled (Matt 3:13–17, a passage marked by language typical of the evangelist). Luke finds a striking solution to the problem by narrating the Baptist’s imprisonment by Herod before relating the baptism of Jesus; Luke’s version never tells us who baptized Jesus (Luke 3:19–22). The radical Fourth Evangelist, John, locked as he is in a struggle with latter-day disciples of the Baptist who refuse to recognize Jesus as the Messiah, takes the radical expedient of suppressing the baptism of Jesus by the Baptist altogether; the event simply never occurs in John’s Gospel. We still hear of the Father’s witness to Jesus and the Spirit’s descent upon Jesus, but we are never told when this theophany occurs (John 1:29–34). Quite plainly, the early church was “stuck with” an event in Jesus’ life that it found increasingly embarrassing, that it tried to explain away by various means, and that John the Evangelist finally erased from his gospel. It is highly unlikely that the church went out of its way to create the cause of its own embarrassment.

A similar case is the affirmation by Jesus that, despite the gospels’ claim that he is the Son who can predict the events at the end of time, including his own coming on the clouds of heaven, he does not know the exact day or hour of the end. Almost at the conclusion of the eschatological discourse in Mark 13, Jesus says: "But concerning that day or hour no one knows, neither the angels in heaven, nor the Son, but only the Father" (Mark 13:32). It is not surprising that a few later Greek manuscripts simply dropped the words "nor the Son" from the saying in Mark.<sup>53</sup> A significantly larger number of manuscripts omit "nor the Son" in the parallel verse in Matthew (Matt 24:36), which was more widely used in the patristic church than Mark—hence the desire to suppress the embarrassing phrase especially in Matthew.<sup>54</sup> The saying is simply not taken over by Luke. In John, not only is there nothing similar, but the Fourth Evangelist goes out of his way to stress that Jesus knows all things present and future and is never taken by surprise (see, e.g., John 5:6; 6:6; 8:14; 9:3; 11:11–15; 13:1–3, 11). Once again, it is highly unlikely that the church would have taken pains to invent a saying that emphasized the ignorance of its risen Lord, only to turn around and seek to suppress it.

---

<sup>51</sup> This phenomenon is sometimes listed as the separate criterion of either “modification” or “tendencies of the developing synoptic tradition.” What I think valid in these two suggested criteria I have subsumed under the criterion of embarrassment. For the criterion of modification, see Walker, “The Quest for the Historical Jesus,” 48; Boring, “The Historical-Critical Method’s ‘Criteria of Authenticity,’” 21. The criterion is usually attributed to Ernst Käsemann, “The Problem of the Historical Jesus,” in Essays on New Testament Themes, SBT 41 (London: SCM, 1964), 15–47, esp. 37.

<sup>52</sup> On the baptism of Jesus as a test case for the criterion of embarrassment, see Breech, The Silence of Jesus, 22–24.

An intriguing corollary arises from these cases of "embarrassment." All too often the oral tradition of the early church is depicted as a game of "anything goes," with charismatic prophets uttering anything or everything as the words of the Lord Jesus and storytellers creating accounts of miracles and exorcisms according to Jewish and pagan models. The evangelists would simply have crowned this wildly creative process by molding the oral tradition according to their own redactional theology. One would get the impression that throughout the first Christian generation there were no eyewitnesses to act as a check on fertile imaginations, no original-disciples-now-become-leaders who might exercise some control over the developing tradition, and no striking deeds and sayings of Jesus that stuck willy-nilly in people's memories. The fact that embarrassing material is found as late as the redaction of the gospels reminds us that beside a creative thrust there was also a conservative force in the gospel tradition.<sup>55</sup> Indeed, so conservative was this force that a string of

---

<sup>53</sup> The few manuscripts that omit "nor the Son" in Mark include codex X (tenth century).

<sup>54</sup> The manuscripts that drop "nor the Son" in the Matthean version of the saying include the codices K, L, W, and the vast majority of later texts; the first scribe who sought to correct this text in codex Sinaiticus also omitted the phrase.

<sup>55</sup> As Stein ("The 'Criteria' for Authenticity," 227) notes, another indication of the conservative force of the Jesus tradition is that several of the major problems that the early church encountered never show up in the sayings of Jesus; a glaring case is the absence of any explicit pronouncement of Jesus on the question of circumcision embarrassing events (e.g., baptism by John, betrayal by Judas, denial by Peter, crucifixion by the Romans) called forth agonized and varied theological reflection, but not, in most cases, convenient amnesia.<sup>56</sup> In this sense, the criterion of embarrassment has an importance for the historian far beyond the individual data it may help verify.

Like all the criteria we will examine, however, the criterion of embarrassment has its limitations and must always be used in concert with the other criteria. One built-in limitation to the criterion of embarrassment is that clear-cut cases of such embarrassment are not numerous in the gospel tradition; and a full portrait of Jesus could never be drawn with so few strokes. Another limitation stems from the fact that what we today might consider an embarrassment to the early church was not necessarily an embarrassment in its own eyes. A prime example is Jesus' "cry of dereliction" from the cross: "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" (Mark 15:34; Matt 27:46; the words are a citation of Ps 22:1). At first glance, this seems a clear case of embarrassment; the unedifying groan is replaced in Luke by Christ's trustful commendation of his spirit to the Father (Luke 23:46) and in John by a cry of triumph, "It is accomplished!" (John 19:30).

But the matter is not so simple. True, the cry of dereliction does not fit the later theological agendas of Luke or John. But form-critical studies of the passion narrative show that the earliest stages of the passion tradition used the Old Testament psalms of lamentation, especially the psalms of the suffering just man, as a primary tool for theological interpretation of the narrative.<sup>57</sup> By telling the story of Jesus' passion in the words of these for Gentiles. In a letter to me dated Oct. 13, 1990, David Noel Freedman points out an Old Testament analogy. From the viewpoint of the Deuteronomistic Historian(s), Hezekiah and Josiah were the two best kings of Judah after David. Their military defeats, which raise questions about Yahweh's rewarding of the just, are not denied but rather explained theologically in somewhat contorted fashion.

---

<sup>56</sup> My proviso "in most cases" takes cognizance of the Fourth Gospel's suppression of the baptism of Jesus.

<sup>57</sup> See, e.g., C. H. Dodd, According to the Scriptures (London: Collins, Fontana, 1965), 96–103. Eduard Schweizer (Lordship and Discipleship, SBT 28 [Naperville, IL: Allenson, 1960], 34) holds that "to the early church the first book of the Passion of Jesus was formed by the Psalms of the suffering of the Righteous One. This is even true of the Gospel according to John. . . ." While Lothar Ruppert criticizes Schweizer for an undifferentiated, homogenized treatment of Old Testament, pseudepigraphic, and rabbinic texts, his own thesis supports the basic point I am making. See Ruppert's Jesus als der leidende Gerechte? SBS 59 (Stuttgart: KBW, 1972), 58: "... the motif of the suffering just man is dominant in the older form of the Passion Narrative. . . . The motif points us . . . to the tradition of the primitive community." This monograph is in turn an expanded psalms, the narrative presented Jesus as the one who fulfilled the Old Testament pattern of the just man afflicted and put to death by evildoers, but vindicated and raised up by God. Allusions to, rather than direct quotations of, these psalms are woven throughout the passion narrative. A good example is the dividing of Jesus' garments. The words of Ps 22:19 are made part of the narrative in Mark 15:24, Matt 27:35, and Luke 23:34; only John marks off the words as a citation of scripture (John 19:24).

Therefore, it is not very surprising, from a form-critical point of view, that the dramatic first words of Psalm 22 supply the climax of the crucifixion and Jesus' last words in Mark's gospel. The cry is by no means so unedifying or even scandalous as moderns might think. The Old Testament psalms of lamentation regularly direct forceful complaints to God; their strong—to our ears, irreverent—address to God expresses neither doubt nor despair, but the pain of one who fully trusts that a strangely silent God can act to save if he so chooses. The very bitterness of the complaint paradoxically reaffirms the closeness the petitioner feels to this God he dares confront with such boldness. From the Babylonian exile to Auschwitz, pious Jews have used the words of Psalm 22 and other laments without being accused by their fellow religionists of impiety or despair.

Granted the roots of the passion narrative in the psalms of lamentation, as well as the bold address to God in those psalms—well understood by early Christian Jews but often misunderstood since—there is no reason for thinking that the earliest Christians (Jews who knew their scriptures well) would have found the “cry of dereliction” at all embarrassing. Whether or not Jesus actually spoke Ps 22:1 on the cross, the criterion of embarrassment, taken in isolation, cannot establish the historicity of those words. It is not impossible that all of the “seven last words”—including the “cry of dereliction”—represent the theological interpretation of the early church and the evangelists. The point here is that the criterion of embarrassment—like any other criterion—must not be invoked facily or in isolation.

2.1.2. The Criterion of Discontinuity

Closely allied to the criterion of embarrassment,<sup>58</sup> the criterion of discontinuity (also labeled dissimilarity, originality, or dual irreducibility) focuses form of the last chapter of another work by Ruppert, Der leidende Gerechte, FB 5 (Würzburg: Echter/KBW, 1972). Rudolf Pesch has accepted this theory in his treatment of the passion narrative in Mark; see his Das Markusevangelium. II. Teil, HTKNT 2.2 (Freiburg: Herder, 1977), 25.

---

<sup>58</sup> Allied, but not reducible to discontinuity; in this I disagree with Polkow, “Method and Criteria,” 341.

on words or deeds of Jesus that cannot be derived either from Judaism at the time of Jesus or from the early church after him.<sup>59</sup> Examples often given are his sweeping prohibition of all oaths (Matt 5:34, 37; but cf. Jas 5:12), his rejection of voluntary fasting for his disciples (Mark 2:18–22 pars.), and possibly his total prohibition of divorce (Mark 10:2–12 par.; Luke 16:18 par.).

This criterion is at once the most promising and the most troublesome. Norman Perrin hails it as the fundamental criterion, the basis of all reconstructions, since it gives us an assured minimum of material to work with.<sup>60</sup> But the criterion is not without its detractors. Morna Hooker complains that the criterion presupposes what we do not possess: a sure and full knowledge of what Judaism at the time of Jesus and Christianity right after him were like, and what they could or would not say.<sup>61</sup>

Her objection does remind us of the healthy modesty required of any historian delving into the religious scene of first-century Palestine. Yet historical-critical work of the last two centuries has made notable advances in our understanding of first-century Judaism and Christianity. Moreover, one cannot overlook the glaring difference between knowledge about Jesus on the one hand and knowledge about first-century Judaism and Christianity on the other. We do have first-century documents coming directly from the latter movements—Qumran, Josephus, and Philo for Judaism, most of the New Testament for Christianity—to say nothing of important archaeological finds. We have no such documents coming directly from Jesus. Indeed, Professor Hooker's own work on the Son of Man title presupposes that we know something about early Judaism and Christianity and can apply such knowledge to outstanding problems. No doubt our present-day judgments will need correction by future generations of scholars. But if we were to wait until we possessed a fullness of knowledge that excluded later revision, we would postpone all New Testament scholarship until the parousia.<sup>62</sup>

---

<sup>59</sup> In his masterful essay ("The Historical-Critical Method's 'Criteria of Authenticity,'" 17–21), Boring highlights the methodological problem of whether we should speak of material that can be derived from Judaism or Christianity or material that must be so derived. I think it is preferable to speak in terms of "can."

<sup>60</sup> Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus, 39–43.

<sup>61</sup> Hooker, "Christology and Methodology," 480–487; idem, "On Using the Wrong Tool," 570–581. Ellis ("Gospels Criticism," 31) complains that the criterion of discontinuity assumes "that a Gospel traditioner or a Christian prophetic oracle could not have used a unique idea or expression. . . ."

<sup>62</sup> For critiques of Hooker's position, see Mealand, "The Dissimilarity Test," 41–50; Nielsen, "Kriterien," 10–11.

A more serious objection is that the criterion of discontinuity, instead of giving us an assured minimum about Jesus, winds up giving us a caricature by divorcing Jesus from the Judaism that influenced him and from the church that he influenced. Jesus was a first-century Jew whose deeds and sayings the early church revered and handed on.<sup>63</sup> A complete rupture with religious history just before or just after him is a priori unlikely. Indeed, if he had been so “discontinuous,” unique, cut off from the flow of history before and after him, he would have been unintelligible to practically everyone. To be an effective teacher (which Jesus seems to have been by almost every scholar’s admission) means adapting oneself to the concepts and positions of one’s audience, even if one’s purpose is to change those concepts and positions. No matter how original Jesus was, to be a successful teacher and communicator he would have had to submit himself to the constraints of communication, the constraints of his historical situation.<sup>64</sup> To paint a portrait of Jesus completely divorced from or opposed to first-century Judaism and Christianity is simply to place him outside of history.

Imagine, for the sake of argument, that in the sixteenth century Martin Luther had delivered all his teachings orally and that they had been written down only later on by his disciples. If we excluded from the record of Luther’s words and deeds everything that could be paralleled in late medieval Catholic authors before him or in seventeenth-century Lutheran theologians after him, how much would remain—and would it give anything like a representative portrait of Luther?

Hence, while the criterion of discontinuity is useful, we must guard against the presupposition that it will automatically give us what was central to or at least fairly representative of Jesus’ teaching. By focusing narrowly upon what may have been Jesus' "idiosyncrasies," it is always in danger of highlighting what was striking but possibly peripheral in his message.<sup>65</sup> Especially with this criterion, complementary and balancing insights from other criteria are vital.

---

<sup>63</sup> The emphasis on Jesus’ connections with the Judaism of his time is common in scholarship today and is well documented by Daniel J. Harrington, “The Jewishness of Jesus: Facing Some Problems,” CBQ 49 (1987): 1–13. It is curious that even skeptical scholars use the language of “handing on the Jesus tradition” and engage in tradition criticism. Yet if there really was a complete rupture in history between Jesus and the earliest Christians, there can be no talk of handing on tradition. However one defines the exact relationship between Jesus and the early church, it is a fact of history, disputed by almost no scholar, that shortly after the death of Jesus some Jews, including people who had been his closest followers during his public ministry, gathered together to revere and celebrate him as Messiah and Lord, to recall and hand on his teachings, and to spread his teachings among other Jews.

<sup>64</sup> This point is argued at length by A. E. Harvey, Jesus and the Constraints of History (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1982); see in particular 1–10. The failure to appreciate this point is one of the weaknesses of Breech’s The Silence of Jesus (see, e.g., 10).

Of course, the same need for balance and correction holds true for the emphasis on Jesus' historical continuity with Judaism and early Christianity. In the case of Judaism in particular, we always have to pose the question: With what sort or branch or tendency of Judaism was Jesus "continuous" in a given saying or action? Moreover, just as we are not to decide that Jesus must have been discontinuous with the Judaism of his day in this or that matter, so we cannot decide a priori that he must have been in agreement with Judaism in all things. History does have its Luthers and Spinozas. One is surprised, for instance, to read E. P. Sanders' summary judgment on the historicity of Jesus' statement that all foods are clean (Mark 7:15). Without going into detailed arguments, Sanders simply declares: "In this case the saying attributed to Jesus... appears to me to be too revolutionary to have been said by Jesus himself."<sup>66</sup> In a sense, Sanders simply takes Perrin's view of the primacy of the criterion of discontinuity and stands it on its head. Instead of "if it is discontinuous, it must be from Jesus," we now have "if it is discontinuous, it cannot be from Jesus." Obviously, dogmatism in either direction must give way to a careful testing of claims in each case.

A further problem that often bedevils the criterion of discontinuity is a terminological one. Scholars will claim that this criterion isolates what is "unique" to Jesus. "Uniqueness" is a slippery concept in historical investigation. In some sense, Beethoven may be hailed as a "unique genius" in music, but that hardly means that individual aspects of his music cannot be found in composers like Bach before him or Mahler after him. Indeed, while it is hard enough for an individual like Beethoven to be "uniquely" different from anyone who has preceded him, it is asking far too much to require as well that he be "uniquely" different from all who follow. The gifted individual could hardly control that, and the more outstanding he was, the more likely he would be to have imitators.<sup>67</sup> Perhaps Beethoven's uniqueness is to be located instead in the special configuration of his personality, talent, production, and career, seen as a whole in a particular historical context, rather than in any one aspect of his work, seen in isolation.

---

<sup>65</sup> So rightly Walker, "The Quest for the Historical Jesus," 48: "Unique features are not necessarily the most characteristic features..."; cf. Boring, "The Historical-Critical Method's 'Criteria of Authenticity,'" 21. We might add that even what was strikingly characteristic about Jesus' message may not have been at the very heart of his message.

<sup>66</sup> E. P. Sanders, Jewish Law from Jesus to the Mishnah: Five Studies (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990), 28.

Something similar might be said of the uniqueness of Jesus. When dealing with an individual saying or deed of Jesus, perhaps it is better to speak of what is "strikingly characteristic" or "unusual" in Jesus' style of speaking or acting, instead of claiming uniqueness at every turn. This distinction is especially important when we treat such characteristic phrases as "Amen, I say to you" or "Abba" addressed to God in prayer. Since we are not terribly well informed about popular Jewish-Aramaic religious practices and vocabulary in early first-century Galilee, modesty in advancing claims is advisable. Similarly, when we deal with the public actions of Jesus, it may be wiser to speak of "the sort of things Jesus did" (e.g., exorcisms, faith healings) instead of asserting that a particular story tells us precisely what Jesus did on one particular occasion. The same distinction can be applied to the sayings tradition taken as a whole. We can have some hope of learning the basic message of Jesus, the "kind of thing" he usually or typically said (the ipsissima vox).<sup>68</sup> Rarely if ever can we claim to recover his exact words (the ipsissima verba).

2.1.3. The Criterion of Multiple Attestation

The criterion of multiple attestation (or "the cross section") focuses on those sayings or deeds of Jesus that are attested in more than one independent literary source (e.g., Mark, Q, Paul, John) and/or in more than one literary form or genre (e.g., parable, dispute story, miracle story, prophecy, aphorism).<sup>69</sup> The force of this criterion is increased if

---

<sup>67</sup> This problem was pointed out to me in a letter by David Noel Freedman, dated Oct. 15, 1990. For Freedman, to be unique, "it would be enough to be markedly different from those who preceded. What happened afterwards would not affect that status."

<sup>68</sup> See Stein, "The 'Criteria' for Authenticity," 228–229.

<sup>69</sup> The qualification "independent" is important. The mere fact that Peter's confession that Jesus is the Messiah is recorded in Mark, Matthew, and Luke does not satisfy the criterion of multiple attestation, since both Matthew and Luke are dependent on Mark for the basic narrative (though Matthew may be relying on a separate tradition for Jesus' praise and commission of Peter in 16:17–19). There is only one independent source for the core of the story. If the focus were broadened to "some sort of confession that Peter addresses to Jesus at a critical moment in the public ministry," then John 6:66–71 could be used; but we could no longer speak of Peter's confession of faith in Jesus precisely as the Messiah; both the location and the content of the confession in John's Gospel are different.

a given motif or theme is found in both different literary sources and different literary forms.<sup>70</sup> One reason that critics so readily affirm that Jesus did speak in some sense of the kingdom of God (or kingdom of heaven) is that the phrase is found in Mark, Q, special Matthean tradition, special Lukan tradition, and John,<sup>71</sup> with echoes in Paul, despite the fact that “kingdom of God” is not Paul’s preferred way of speaking.<sup>72</sup> At the same time, the phrase is found in various literary genres (e.g., parable, beatitude, prayer, aphorism, miracle story). Granted this wide sweep of witnesses in different sources and genres, coming largely from the first Christian generation, it becomes extremely difficult to claim that such material is simply the creation of the church.<sup>73</sup>

When one moves from general motifs and phrases to precise sayings and deeds, one cannot usually expect such a broad range of attestation. Still, such key sayings as Jesus’ words over the bread and wine at the Last Supper (Mark 14:22–25; 1 Cor 11:23–26; cf. John 6:51–58) and his prohibition of divorce (Mark 10:11–12; Luke 16:18 [= Q]; 1 Cor 7:10–11) are found in two or three independent sources.<sup>74</sup> Then, too, we may find “cross-referencing” between sayings dealing with a particular topic and actions of Jesus that also touch on that topic—e.g., sayings about the

---

<sup>70</sup> Some count multiple attestation in sources and multiple attestation in forms as two different criteria. Like Polkow (“Method and Criteria,” 341), I think that they are better dealt with together under one criterion.

<sup>71</sup> Once again I must stress that I do not accept the a priori exclusion of John from consideration as a possible source for knowledge of the historical Jesus; see Walker, “The Quest for the Historical Jesus,” 54.

<sup>72</sup> Those who accept the Coptic Gospel of Thomas as another independent source would naturally add it to this list (so Boring, “The Historical-Critical Method’s ‘Criteria of Authenticity,’” 13, 25–28; more cautiously, McArthur, “The Burden of Proof,” 118). For my skepticism on this subject, see my remarks on the Gospel of Thomas in A Marginal Jew I, 123–139.

<sup>73</sup> McArthur (“The Burden of Proof,” 118) claims that the following motifs are witnessed to by all four strands of the synoptic tradition (i.e., Mark, Q, M, and L): Jesus’ proclamation of the kingdom of God, the presence of disciples around Jesus, healing miracles, a link with John the Baptist, use of parables, concern for outcasts, especially tax collectors and sinners, a radical ethic, emphasis on the love commandment, a demand that the disciples practice forgiveness, clashes with his contemporaries over Sabbath observance, sayings about the Son of Man, and the Hebrew word “Amen” used to introduce Jesus’ sayings.

<sup>74</sup> I do not bother to list the “peeling away” of additions and modifications made by the oral tradition and the final redactor, since I consider such judgments a necessary part of the use of the criterion of multiple attestation. One would like to say that such judgments are simply “preliminary criteria” that precede the use of the “primary criteria” (so Polkow, “Method and Criteria,” 342–345). But actual practice of the historical-critical method shows that all the way through the process one is constantly testing and revising one’s judgments about modifications made by the oral tradition and the redactor.

destruction of the Jerusalem temple and Jesus' prophetic "cleansing" of the temple. The example of the destruction of the temple is all the more forceful when we notice that both sayings and dramatic action are witnessed in more than one source and context (e.g., Mark 13:2; 14:58; John 2:14–22, esp. v. 19).

Harvey K. McArthur was so taken with the force of the criterion of multiple attestation that he asserted that it was "the most objective" criterion and should be given first place.<sup>75</sup> Yet even McArthur admitted that multiple attestation was not an infallible indicator of historicity. In an individual case it is not a priori impossible that a saying invented early on by a Christian community or prophet met the needs of the church so perfectly that it rapidly entered into a number of different strands of tradition.<sup>76</sup> Then, too, the mere fact that a saying occurs only in one source is no proof that it was not spoken by Jesus.<sup>77</sup> For example, the Aramaic invocation Abba ("my own dear Father") occurs on the lips of Jesus only once in all four gospels (Mark 14:36), yet many critics ascribe it on other grounds to the historical Jesus. Once again, we are reminded that no criterion can be used mechanically and in isolation; a convergence of different criteria is the best indicator of historicity.

2.1.4. The Criterion of Coherence

The criterion of coherence (or consistency or conformity) can be brought into play only after a certain amount of historical material has been isolated by the previous criteria. The criterion of coherence holds that other sayings and deeds of Jesus that fit in well with the preliminary "data base" established by using our first three criteria have a good

---

<sup>75</sup> McArthur, "A Survey of Recent Gospel Research," 48; idem, "The Burden of Proof," 118. He makes the statement about giving it first place in conscious opposition to Perrin's emphasis on the criterion of discontinuity. In agreement with McArthur's view is Stein, "Criteria," 230.

<sup>76</sup> G. Petzke puts it quite bluntly in his article, "Die historische Frage nach den Wundertaten Jesu," NTS 22 (1975–1976): 180–204, esp. 183: there is no reason to think that something is more reliable historically because it is reported "a number of times" (mehrfach). Petzke's use of phrases like "a number of times" and "multiple appearances in early Christian tradition" points to a weakness in his argument. Petzke does not seem to take seriously enough the weight of a plurality of early independent literary sources and a plurality of literary genres, all acting as vehicles of a single given tradition. At one point, with a rhetorical wave of the hand, he dismisses the question of attestation in a number of independent traditions by observing that we cannot be certain about which early Christian sources were independent. Yet he himself proceeds to analyze the story of the cure of the "lunatic boy" (Mark 9:14–29 pars.) with the tool of the two-source theory.

<sup>77</sup> So rightly Polkow, "Method and Criteria," 351.

chance of being historical (e.g., sayings concerning the coming of the kingdom of God or disputes with adversaries over legal observance). As can be readily seen, this criterion, by its very nature, is less probative than the three on which it depends.<sup>78</sup> Since we should not conceive of the earliest Christians as totally cut off or different from Jesus himself, there is no reason why they could not have created sayings that echoed faithfully his own “authentic” words. In a loose sense such derived sayings could be considered “authentic” insofar as they convey the message of the historical Jesus;<sup>79</sup> but they cannot be considered “authentic” in the technical sense, i.e., actually coming from Jesus himself.<sup>80</sup>

Despite this limitation, the criterion of coherence has a certain positive use, namely, broadening an already established data base. One must, however, be wary of using it negatively, i.e., declaring a saying or action inauthentic because it does not seem to be consistent with words or deeds of Jesus already declared authentic on other grounds. Jesus would hardly be unique among the great thinkers or leaders of world history if his sayings and actions did not always seem totally consistent to us.<sup>81</sup> Moreover, we must remember that ancient Semitic thought, much more than our western tradition of Aristotelian logic, delighted in paradoxical statements that held opposites in tension. (Even in our own day, American and European professors are often befuddled when they find out that students from Asia, while fiercely intelligent, may not subscribe to the western philosophical principle of noncontradiction.) Then, too, Jesus was a popular preacher addressing a wide range of audiences on particular occasions with great oral skill;

---

<sup>78</sup> Obviously, the conclusions drawn by the criterion of coherence are as good as the data base on which they depend. Carlston, a great proponent of the positive use of this criterion, uses it to discern authentic parables of Jesus: they will fit reasonably well into the eschatologically based demand for repentance that was characteristic of Jesus' message (“A Positive Criterion,” 33–34). That is fine, provided one does not agree with revisionist exegetes who claim that Jesus' basic message was not essentially eschatological (e.g., Marcus J. Borg) or that repentance did not play a large role in Jesus' preaching (e.g., E. P. Sanders). Thus, one sees the vital importance of being as certain as possible about the data base created by the first three criteria before one proceeds to the criterion of coherence.

<sup>79</sup> Nielsen, “Kriterien,” 14.

<sup>80</sup> I should make clear that it is in this technical and restricted sense that I use the word “authentic” when discussing criteria of historicity; cf. Stein, “The ‘Criteria’ for Authenticity,” 228. The word must not be taken to mean that, from the viewpoint of faith, what the oral tradition or final redaction contributed to our gospels is any less inspired, normative, or true.

<sup>81</sup> Cf. Hooker, “Christology and Methodology,” 483; Stein, “The ‘Criteria’ for Authenticity,” 250.

we should hardly seek in the various expressions of his teaching the type of systematic presentation expected of a written treatise.<sup>82</sup> Hence the debate between those scholars who stress the eschatological nature of Jesus' core message and those who portray Jesus teaching a wisdom tradition bereft of any eschatological slant may be misplaced. There is no reason why the preaching of Jesus may not have contained elements of both apocalyptic eschatology and traditional Israelite wisdom. Both Jesus and his contemporaries might have been surprised by the charge (a very modern academic one) that such a message would be inconsistent or incoherent. In short, the criterion of coherence has a certain positive value; but its negative use, to exclude material as inauthentic, must be approached very cautiously.

2.1.5. The Criterion of Rejection and Execution

The criterion of Jesus' rejection and execution is notably different from the first four criteria.<sup>83</sup> It does not directly indicate whether an individual saying or deed of Jesus is authentic. Rather, it directs our attention to the historical fact that Jesus met a violent end at the hands of Jewish and Roman officials and then asks us what historical words and deeds of Jesus can explain his trial and crucifixion as "King of the Jews."<sup>84</sup> While I do not agree with those who turn Jesus into a violent revolutionary or political agitator, scholars who favor a revolutionary Jesus do have a point. A tweedy poetaster who spent his time spinning out parables and Japanese koans, a literary aesthete who toyed with first-century deconstructionism, or a bland Jesus who simply told people to look at the lilies of the field—such a Jesus would threaten no one, just as the university professors who create him threaten no one. The historical Jesus did threaten, disturb, and infuriate people—from interpreters of the Law through the Jerusalem priestly aristocracy to the Roman prefect

---

<sup>82</sup> These considerations should make one wary about declaring a priori that Jesus could not possibly have spoken of the kingdom of God as both present and future or that he could not possibly have prophesied both a coming kingdom and a coming Son of Man. It is a matter of fact that the evangelists, and probably the gospel traditions before them, did just that. Nor are Paul's authentic letters totally devoid of paradoxes that strike some as blatant contradictions.

<sup>83</sup> Hence I would not say that it is simply "the resultant historical data shown by Dissimilarity..., Modification..., Embarrassment..., Incongruity..., and Hermeneutical Potential ..." (Polkow, "Method and Criteria," 340). On 341, Polkow finally lists execution as merely a variation of discontinuity (or dissimilarity); cf. Lührmann, "Die Frage," 68.

<sup>84</sup> On this criterion, see Schillebeeckx, Jesus, 97; cf. Walker, "The Quest for the Historical Jesus," 55.

who finally tried and crucified him. This emphasis on Jesus' violent end is not simply a focus imposed on the data by Christian theology. To outsiders like Josephus, Tacitus, and Lucian of Samosata, one of the most striking things about Jesus was his crucifixion or execution by Rome. A Jesus whose words and deeds would not alienate people, especially powerful people, is not the historical Jesus.

2.2. Secondary (or Dubious) Criteria

2.2.1. The Criterion of Traces of Aramaic

Joachim Jeremias and many of his disciples point to traces of Aramaic vocabulary, grammar, syntax, rhythm, and rhyme in the Greek version of the sayings of Jesus as signs of an authentic saying. Used negatively, this criterion would cast doubt on a saying that could not be easily retroverted from Greek into Aramaic.<sup>85</sup> At first glance, this criterion seems scientific, since it rests on a vast fund of philological data developed in the twentieth century by such experts in Aramaic as Jeremias, Matthew Black, Geza Vermes, and Joseph Fitzmyer.

Yet this criterion is not without serious problems. First of all, a good number of the earliest Christians were Palestinian Jews whose native tongue was the same Aramaic Jesus spoke. These Aramaic-speaking Christian Jews continued to exist in Palestine throughout the first century. Presumably, if Christians elsewhere in the Mediterranean world developed and sometimes created words of Jesus, Aramaic-speaking Jews in Palestine did the same.<sup>86</sup> Suppose, then, that some scholars are trying to discover an Aramaic substratum beneath a particular Greek saying in our gospels. Even if they succeed, how—simply on the grounds of the Aramaic—are they to distinguish a saying first spoken in Aramaic by Jesus in 29 CE from a saying first spoken in Aramaic by a Christian Jew in 33 CE? The mere fact that the saying has an Aramaic substratum gives no criterion for making such a distinction. The problem is complicated still further by the fact that the Jerusalem church was both Aramaic- and Greek-speaking from its beginning (cf. the Hellenists in Acts 6).

---

<sup>85</sup> While Jesus may have known and even used some Greek (e.g., during his trial before Pilate), there is no indication that the sayings tradition in our gospels was rooted, even in part, in sayings spoken by Jesus in Greek (so rightly Fitzmyer, "Methodology," 87). For a general overview of languages used in Palestine at the time of Jesus, see Joseph A. Fitzmyer, "The Languages of Palestine in the First Century A.D.," in A Wandering Aramean: Collected Aramaic Essays, SBLMS 25 (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1979), 29–56.

<sup>86</sup> For a similar observation, see Walker, "The Quest for the Historical Jesus," 43.

The translation of Jesus' sayings into Greek is therefore not something that happened only at a later stage of the tradition.<sup>87</sup>

Secondly, the mere fact that a particular Greek saying can be retroverted into Aramaic with ease—or, on the other hand, only with great difficulty—does not give us a sure indication that the saying existed originally in Aramaic or originally in Greek. One Aramaic saying might be translated with great skill into elegant Greek, the translator aiming at sense-equivalence rather than a word-for-word rendering.<sup>88</sup> Another Aramaic saying might be translated by another translator in a very literalistic, wooden fashion. The ease with which the two sayings could be retroverted into Aramaic might lead the unwary critic to judge quite wrongly that the first saying did not exist in Aramaic while the second did. Compounding the problem is that many Greek-speaking Christians knew very well the Greek translation of the Old Testament, the Septuagint, and could imitate the biblical Greek of the Septuagint, thus giving their original Greek composition a Semitic tone. This may have been the case with the Gospel of Luke.<sup>89</sup> Confusing the situation still further is the fact that scholars have become increasingly aware in recent decades that usages in the New Testament that we once considered “Semitisms” (i.e., vocabulary or grammar showing Hebrew or Aramaic influence) may actually reflect the normal koine Greek of the less educated level of the population.<sup>90</sup>

<sup>87</sup> Riesner, Jesus als Lehrer, 93.

<sup>88</sup> One must be especially sensitive to this possibility in the case of a saying that occurs only in Matthew or Luke. It is not impossible that an Aramaic saying was first translated into rough, Semitic Greek during the oral stage of the special Lukan tradition and then was given a more elegant Greek form when Luke incorporated it into his Gospel; cf. Riesner, Jesus als Lehrer, 93.

<sup>89</sup> While not claiming to decide all instances once and for all, Fitzmyer seems to lean in the direction of explaining Luke's “Semitisms,” especially his “Hebraisms,” by reckoning “with a great deal of influence from the LXX” (Joseph A. Fitzmyer, The Gospel According to Luke (I–IX), AB 28 [Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1981], 125).

<sup>90</sup> So Walker, “The Quest for the Historical Jesus,” 44; cf. Fitzmyer, “Methodology,” 95 (citing R. M. Grant, A Historical Introduction to the New Testament [New York: Harper & Row, 1963], 41); idem, “The Study of the Aramaic Background of the New Testament,” in A Wandering Aramean, 1–27, esp. 10–15. The question of the existence and extent of Semitisms (both Hebrew and Aramaic) in the New Testament is hotly debated today. For a short history of the debate, see Elliott C. Maloney, Semitic Interference in Marcan Syntax, SBLDS 51 (Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1981), 1–25. Maloney's conclusions, summarized on pp. 244–245, show how complex and varied Semitic influence may be. In particular, he notes “that much grammatical usage in Marcan Greek which various authors have claimed to be the result of Semitic interference is, in fact, quite possible in Hellenistic Greek.... On the other hand, certain constructions which various authors have argued are acceptable in Jeremias tries to mount a particular form of the “Aramaic argument” by pointing out that Jesus tended to deliver his teaching in Aramaic sayings that had a distinctive rhythm, that employed rhetorical tools like antithetic parallelism, alliteration, assonance, and paronomasia, and that employed the passive voice to avoid the frequent mention of God’s name (“the divine passive”).<sup>91</sup> While all this may be true, we again run into methodological problems. First, Jeremias’s argument cannot entirely avoid being circular. He can tell us what is characteristic of Jesus’ sayings only if from the start he can presume that a certain amount of sayings are authentic and then proceed to abstract from them the characteristics he lists. To be sure, such a list could legitimately arise from a lengthy process of isolating, collating, and examining authentic sayings of Jesus from a stylistic viewpoint. But such a list cannot be the starting point for deciding which sayings are authentic, for it would be presuming what is to be proven.<sup>92</sup> Second, if the list does reflect striking characteristics of Jesus’ speech, would it be all that unusual if early Christian Jewish teachers and preachers in Palestine imitated the style of their master? Or did Jesus have a monopoly on rhythmic speech and antithetic parallelism in first-century Palestine? Was Jesus the only gifted and imaginative teacher among Jews and Christian Jews during this period? The same sort of questions may be asked about the supposed “poetic” quality of Jesus’ Aramaic, all the more so since we are poorly informed about what first-century Palestinian Aramaic poetry looked like.<sup>93</sup>

At best, then, this criterion of Aramaic traces can provide additional support for an argument for historicity—but only when the material in question has already given indications of being authentic on the grounds of other criteria.

2.2.2. The Criterion of Palestinian Environment

A criterion much like the Aramaic one, this criterion of Palestinian environment affirms that sayings of Jesus that reflect concrete customs, Greek have been shown to be quite abnormal, or even totally unattested in Hellenistic Greek, whereas their appearance in Semitic is normal (sometimes only possible). These are true Semitisms” (244–245).

---

<sup>91</sup> Joachim Jeremias, New Testament Theology, part 1, The Proclamation of Jesus (London: SCM, 1971), 3–29.

<sup>92</sup> If these linguistic characteristics were first abstracted from sayings that had been declared authentic on other grounds, and if these characteristics were then applied to a new group of sayings to judge their authenticity, we would have a form of the criterion of coherence. Even then, however, the second methodological problem I indicate in the text would remain.

<sup>93</sup> Fitzmyer, “Methodology,” 97–98.

beliefs, judicial procedures, commercial and agricultural practices, or social and political conditions in first-century Palestine have a good chance of being authentic. Put negatively, a saying that reflects social, political, economic, or religious conditions that existed only outside Palestine or only after the death of Jesus is to be considered inauthentic. This criterion is much more useful in its negative guise. To take a well-known example that applies the criterion theologically rather than socially: parables that reflect concern about the delay of Jesus' parousia, the mission of the church to the Gentiles, or rules for church leadership and discipline are post-Easter creations, at least in their final, gospel form.<sup>94</sup>

The positive use of this criterion is more problematic, for the same reasons mentioned under the Aramaic criterion. The Palestine inhabited by Christian Jews in 33 CE was not all that different from the Palestine inhabited by Jesus in 29 CE. Pilate remained prefect in Judea until 36 CE, Herod remained tetrarch in Galilee until 39 CE, and Caiaphas remained high priest until 36 or 37 CE. Basic commercial, social, and religious conditions naturally remained much longer. Hence, the Palestine reflected in sayings created by Christian Jews in 33 CE would hardly differ from the Palestine reflected in the sayings of Jesus in 29 CE.<sup>95</sup>

2.2.3. The Criterion of Vividness of Narration

In the narratives of the gospels, liveliness and concrete details—especially when the details are not relevant to the main point of the story—are sometimes taken to be indicators of an eyewitness report. Although he was not as uncritical in using this criterion as some of his followers, Vincent Taylor inclined to accept vivid, concrete details in Mark's gospel as signs of high historical value.<sup>96</sup> Faithful to the early oral tradition, Mark had the special advantage of hearing Peter's preaching.<sup>97</sup> Taylor

---

<sup>94</sup> See, e.g., the treatment of Joachim Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus, rev. ed. (London: SCM, 1969), 48–66. Of course, it is possible that behind the final form of such gospel parables a scholar might discover, by means of form criticism, an earlier form without these ecclesiastical interests.

<sup>95</sup> See also the observations of Walker ("The Quest for the Historical Jesus," 44), who adds: "Many apparent reflections of Palestinian life, however, may be derived from the Old Testament or other Jewish literature or reflect merely an acquaintance of sorts with the area on the part of a writer or transmitter of the tradition."

<sup>96</sup> Vincent Taylor, The Gospel According to St. Mark, 2nd ed. (London: Macmillan; New York: St. Martin's, 1966), 135–149.

<sup>97</sup> Taylor, Mark, 148. Other conservative commentators take a similar tack; see, e.g., William L. Lane, The Gospel According to Mark, NICNT (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1974), 10–12. Mark's dependence on Peter is also defended by Martin Hengel, Studies in the Gospel of Mark (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985), 50–53.

himself is aware of the basic objection to this criterion: any skilled narrator can confer vividness on any story, however unhistorical. If liveliness and concrete details were in themselves proofs of historicity, many great novels would have to be declared history books.<sup>98</sup>

In reply to this objection, Taylor first admits that some concrete details may indeed be the result of Markan redaction. But Taylor goes on to make two points: (1) Some of the details seem to serve no point in the narrative and apparently are included by Mark simply because they were in the tradition. (2) More importantly, a number of key episodes in the gospel, episodes ripe for dramatic exploitation, are surprisingly jejune and bereft of concrete details: e.g., the choice of the Twelve (3:13–19b), the suspicion held by Jesus' family that he has gone insane (3:21), the plot by the priests (14:1–2), and the treachery of Judas (14:10–11). Taylor argues that the presence of these terse though important narratives shows that Mark did not indulge in massive creative rewriting; on the whole, some narratives are laconic and others detailed because that is the way they were in the early oral tradition that Mark has faithfully followed.<sup>99</sup>

Taylor's arguments do not seem as strong today as they might have appeared in the early 1950's. Redaction criticism and contemporary narrative criticism have taught us to appreciate Mark as a talented author who may have his own theological and artistic reasons for alternating sparse and detailed narratives.<sup>100</sup> Moreover, not all critics would concede Mark's direct dependence on the preaching of Peter. If instead Mark is simply passing on oral traditions that come to him from many sources, can we not attribute the liveliness of some pericopes to the skill of

---

<sup>98</sup> What makes the question even more complex is that what we consider a key sign of a historical novel—the creation of dialogue or the use of nonhistorical characters—was permissible in ancient historical writings. Hence the lines between what we would consider history and the historical novel are blurred in ancient literature.

<sup>99</sup> This image of Mark as a conservative redactor of large amounts of early tradition has been revived and pushed to the extreme by Rudolf Pesch, Das Markusevangelium, HTKNT 2.1–2 (Freiburg: Herder, 1976, 1977); see, e.g., 1:63–67; 2:1–25.

<sup>100</sup> In sharp opposition to the picture of Mark as a conservative redactor are the redaction-critical approaches represented by most of the authors in Werner H. Kelber, ed., The Passion in Mark (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976); and the rhetorical, narrative, and structural approaches represented by, e.g., Joanna Dewey, Markan Public Debate, SBLDS 48 (Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1980); Robert M. Fowler, Loaves and Fishes, SBLDS 54 (Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1981); Jack Dean Kingsbury, The Christology of Mark's Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); Vernon K. Robbins, Jesus the Teacher (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984); and Elizabeth Struthers Malbon, Narrative Space and Mythic Meaning in Mark (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1986).

certain early Christian preachers or storytellers, with the irrelevant details being explained by the untidy nature of oral as opposed to written composition? Perhaps the vividness of narration gets us behind Mark to his oral tradition. But does it get us back to Jesus himself?

A further problem arises from the succinct narratives that Taylor also finds in Mark. The terse, streamlined nature of particular dispute stories, miracle stories, and pronouncement stories may result, not from their unhistorical nature, but from the very fact that they fit well into a particular form or genre. This neat “fit” may have caused some historical events to have been “slimmed down” to the “bare bones” of a particular genre in the oral tradition. In short, just as vividness in itself does not prove historicity, so too a pale skeletal narrative is not necessarily unhistorical.

Thus, as with the other secondary criteria we have seen so far, this criterion can never serve as the main argument for historicity. At best, it may support the impression already created by one or more of the primary criteria.

2.2.4. The Criterion of the Tendencies of the Developing Synoptic Tradition

At this point we begin to consider criteria that, in my view, are highly questionable. The form critics like Bultmann thought they could isolate the laws of development within the synoptic tradition. For instance, as the synoptic tradition developed from Mark to Matthew and Luke, there supposedly was a tendency to make details more concrete, to add proper names to the narrative, to turn indirect discourse into direct quotation, and to eliminate Aramaic words and constructions. Bultmann suggested that, once these laws governing the transmission of tradition were discovered by analyzing changes in the synoptic gospels, they could be applied to the development of the tradition redacted by Mark and Q.<sup>101</sup> By extension, some critics have suggested, these laws might help us reconstruct original events or sayings coming from Jesus.

However, the whole attempt to formulate laws of the developing synoptic tradition and then to apply them to the earlier oral tradition is dubious. First of all, one cannot establish that such firm laws exist. As

---

<sup>101</sup> Rudolf Bultmann, “The New Approach to the Synoptic Problem,” in Existence and Faith (Meridian Books; Cleveland: World, 1960), 34–54, esp. 41–42 (= JR 6 [1926]: 337–362); similarly in his “The Study of the Synoptic Gospels,” in Form Criticism, by Rudolf Bultmann and Karl Kundsinn (New York: Harper & Row, 1962), 32–35; and in his The History of the Synoptic Tradition, trans. J. Marsh [Oxford: Blackwell, 1968] 307–317 (= Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition, [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1970] 335–346).

E. P. Sanders has pointed out, we can find examples of the tradition becoming longer and shorter, of discourse becoming both direct and indirect, and of proper names being dropped as well as added. The tendencies run in both directions.<sup>102</sup> Moreover, even if we could discover firm laws among the synoptic gospels, we would still be dealing with redaction of the written Gospel of Mark by two other writers, Matthew and Luke. Whether and to what degree such laws would apply to the pre-Markan oral stage of the gospel tradition is by no means clear.<sup>103</sup> In my opinion, the one negative use that can be made of a criterion based on “tendencies” is to discern the redactional tendency of each evangelist and to exclude from consideration those sayings or narratives which are massively suffused with the characteristic vocabulary and theology of the evangelist.

2.2.5. The Criterion of Historical Presumption

This criterion brings us squarely into the debate about where the “burden of proof” lies: on the side of the critic who denies historicity or on the side of the critic who affirms it? Critics who stress the decades between the original events and the writing of our gospels, as well as the obvious cases of modifications or creations by the oral tradition or the evangelists, conclude that anyone claiming to isolate an authentic saying or action of Jesus must bear the burden of proof.<sup>104</sup> On the opposite side, critics who stress that eyewitnesses of Jesus’ ministry were the leaders in the early church and that in any historical investigation credence is given to early historical reports until the opposite is proven conclude that the burden of proof is on those who wish to discredit a particular saying or event as inauthentic (“in dubio pro tradito”). This is called by Neil J. McEleney the criterion of historical presumption.<sup>105</sup> If accepted,

---

<sup>102</sup> E. P. Sanders, The Tendencies of the Synoptic Tradition, SNTSMS 9 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1969).

<sup>103</sup> On the whole problem of the difference between oral and written tradition, see Werner H. Kelber, The Oral and the Written Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983). I think, however, that Kelber exaggerates the gap between the oral and written forms of the gospel.

<sup>104</sup> So Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus, 39: “...the nature of the synoptic tradition is such that the burden of proof will be upon the claim to authenticity” (this statement is set entirely in italics in Perrin’s book). McArthur (“The Burden of Proof,” 118–119) attempts a compromise stance: Initially the burden is on the person affirming historicity; but if a particular motif is supported by three or four synoptic sources (multiple attestation), then the burden shifts to the person denying historicity.

<sup>105</sup> McEleney, “Authenticating Criteria,” 445–448; cf. Ellis, “Gospels Criticism,” 32. McEleney’s easy and undifferentiated use of the terms “reporter” and “history” (446–447) while discussing the gospels does not inspire confidence. As Latourelle correctly it could cut the Gordian knot in cases where the arguments are finely balanced and the final result seems to be permanent doubt.

However, common sense and the rules of logical argument seem to be on the side of critics like Willi Marxsen and Ben Meyer, who state the obvious: the burden of proof is simply on anyone who tries to prove anything.<sup>106</sup> In effect, this means that critics must allow a galling but realistic third column for a vote of “not clear” (non liquet). There will always be some difficult cases in which no criterion applies or in which different criteria apply but point in opposite directions. Such conundrums cannot be resolved by the deus ex machina of the criterion of historical presumption. In the convoluted case of the canonical gospels, such a criterion simply does not exist.<sup>107</sup>

2.3. Conclusion

Our survey indicates that five suggested criteria of historicity or authenticity are really valuable and deserve to be ranked as primary criteria: embarrassment, discontinuity, multiple attestation in sources or forms, coherence, and Jesus’ rejection and execution. I have stressed the limitations and problems inherent in each criterion lest any single criterion seem a magic key unlocking all doors. Only a careful use of a number of criteria in tandem, with allowances for mutual correction, can produce convincing results.<sup>108</sup> observes (“Critères d’authenticité,” 618), this “criterion” actually expresses an attitude of the exegete vis-à-vis the text rather than a criterion; similarly, Lambiasi, L’autenticità storica dei vangeli, 101, 137–138.

---

<sup>106</sup> See Meyer, The Aims of Jesus, 83 and 277 n. 8, where he quotes Willi Marxsen, The Beginnings of Christology: A Study of Its Problems (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969), 8. Hooker (“Christology,” 485) expresses herself in a similar fashion, though she tends to dismiss the whole problem as not very profitable. This commonsense approach seems preferable to the subtle distinction Lambiasi tries to make between skeptical-systematic doubt and methodological-dynamic doubt (L’autenticità storica dei vangeli, 229).

<sup>107</sup> Latourelle (“Critères d’authenticité,” 628) claims that the most important of the fundamental criteria, though often ignored, is the criterion of “necessary explanation” (explication nécessaire). Actually, instead of being a precise criterion for judging the special material of the four gospels, this “criterion” is more like the “argument to the best explanation,” which is one of the basic forms of all historical argumentation (McCullagh, Justifying Historical Descriptions [Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984] 15–44). In a similar vein, Lambiasi (L’autenticità storica dei vangeli, 140) considers the criterion of necessary explanation to be basically the principle of the sufficient reason, a transcendent philosophical principle. We are all attracted by calls to a “holistic” approach (so Walker, “The Quest for the Historical Jesus,” 54–56). But until we have at least a vague idea of what parts might qualify as belonging to the historical whole, a “holistic” approach remains a distant ideal.

<sup>108</sup> I have omitted from consideration two further criteria suggested by Boring (“The Historical-Critical Method’s ‘Criteria of Authenticity,’” 23–24): (1) plausible

Despite their exaltation in some quarters, the criteria of Aramaic traces, Palestinian environment, and vividness of narrative cannot yield probative arguments on their own, even when all three are taken together. They can act as secondary, supportive criteria, reinforcing the impressions gained from one or more of the primary criteria. Finally, the criteria of the tendencies of the synoptic tradition and historical presumption are, for all practical purposes, useless.<sup>109</sup>

As many a weary quester has remarked before, the use of the valid criteria is more an art than a science, requiring sensitivity to the individual case rather than mechanical implementation.<sup>110</sup> It can never be said too many times that such an art usually yields only varying degrees of probability, not absolute certitude. But, as we have already seen, such judgments of probability are common in any investigation of ancient history, and the quest for the historical Jesus cannot apply for a special exemption. Since moral certitude is nothing but a very high degree of probability, and since we run most of our lives and make many of our theoretical and practical judgments on the basis of moral certitude, we need not feel that the results of our quest will be unusually fragile or uncertain. They are no more fragile or uncertain than many other parts of our lives.<sup>111</sup>

---

Traditionsgeschichte and (2) hermeneutical potential. (1) The criterion of plausible Traditionsgeschichte seeks to draw up a genealogy of the various forms of a saying. While this is a laudable goal, I do not think it a practical one for many of the sayings in the Jesus tradition. Even when attempted, the reconstruction of the tradition history must remain very hypothetical. (2) The criterion of hermeneutical potential looks at the variety of forms generated by the original form and asks what this original must have been in order to generate such variety. Again, the quest is a valid and laudable one; but, granted the paucity of data, I feel that the results must be highly subjective and hardly probative.

<sup>109</sup> The one exception here is the negative use of the criterion of an evangelist's redactional tendencies.

<sup>110</sup> So, e.g., McArthur, "A Survey," 47; Walker, "The Quest for the Historical Jesus," 53 (who extends the observation to historiography in general); and Boring, "The Historical-Critical Method's 'Criteria of Authenticity,'" 35–36.

<sup>111</sup> I might add here that, naturally, any scholar must be in dialogue with his or her peers and be respectfully attentive to their consensus on the authenticity of various gospel material. However, I would not be willing, as Polkow is ("Method and Criteria," 355), to elevate scholarly consensus to another criterion. It should be noted in fairness to Polkow that he stresses that scholarly consensus can only be a corroborative criterion and can be used only when all else is said and done. I wonder, though, whether it is properly a criterion at all. A scholar must be prepared at any moment, because of the force of data and arguments, to go against a scholarly consensus on any issue. The heavy reliance on scholarly consensus from the very start weakens the whole approach of Breech (The Silence of Jesus, 9).

JESUS RESEARCH AS FEEDBACK ON HIS WIRKUNGSGESCHICHTE

PETR POKORNÝ

1. What is being Debated in the Question about the Historical Jesus

1.1. The Subject of the Discussion

The 'early quest,' which began in the eighteenth century, understood its task to involve the rediscovery of Jesus free of any preconceptions and especially apart from teachings about his divine nature. However, when Albert Schweitzer (1875–1965) reviewed the Jesus books that were written during the nineteenth century, his conclusion about attempts to write a biography of Jesus was negative.<sup>1</sup> Most of the scholars did not resist the temptation to interpret the limited set of data from the point of view of their own ideas.

This was one of the reasons that the New Quest of the Historical Jesus, which was the title of a seminal monograph by James M. Robinson that was published in 1959, intentionally stressed the role of 'pre-understanding' (Vorverständnis) in Jesus research. Phenomenology and existential philosophy rediscovered the cognitive role of human subjectivity (the 'positive prejudice') in scholarly research, as well as in daily life. Furthermore, Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976) described many biblical texts as being kerygmatic, i.e., as belonging to the sort of Christian proclamation that evokes a response from the addressee. Preconceptions (prejudices) can be mastered only when they are admitted, and only then can the singularity of the interpreted texts be recognized. Scholars engaged in the 'new quest' analyzed the Jesus tradition of the gospels, and discovered a similar analogy between the sayings of Jesus and the Easter proclamation of the church.<sup>2</sup> They explained the role of Jesus research by stating that we must study Jesus as the key to christology.

---

<sup>1</sup> Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung, repr. of 2nd ed. (München: Siebenstern, 1966; orig. 1906), 620.

<sup>2</sup> Eberhard Jünger, Paulus und Jesus, BHTh 2 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1962), 273–275.

The new quest indirectly supported new interest in Jesus among systematic theologians (Wolfgang Pannenberg, Edward Schillebeeckx, Walther Kasper), and Jesus research began to play a role in ecumenical and inter-religious discussions. The best theological statement regarding this role of Jesus research was provided by Eberhard Jüngel (“Extra Christum nulla salus—als Grundsatz natürlicher Theologie?”):<sup>3</sup> If we consider Jesus to be the revelation of God, we have a practical criterion, which is applicable to all people of all cultures, for what corresponds to God’s will. According to Jüngel, Jesus’ teaching and behavior, as an authentically humanistic phenomenon, can introduce new themes into the contemporary global dialogue about human hopes and values.

The third quest, which was initiated by the Jesus Seminar that was held in California during the last two decades of the twentieth century, did not discuss the fact that the real Jesus is both a historical phenomenon and the Risen Lord of the Christian faith. Even secular scholars know about Jesus’ other dimension.<sup>4</sup> In fact, Jesus research<sup>5</sup> is only one dimension of efforts to interpret the person of Jesus and his impact on the present history of humanity. We have mentioned the thesis that Jesus is the hermeneutical key to christology. This hypothesis was proposed by Gerhard Ebeling.<sup>6</sup> Following the resurrection, there was a period of spiritual enthusiasm and various groups of Jesus’ followers understood his key role in different ways. It became necessary to distinguish different responses to the Christian proclamation. In 1 John 4:2 and 2 John 7, the readers are invited to “test” the “spirits” (who profess to offer inspired proclamation) in order to determine whether they proclaim the Jesus who came in the flesh, i.e., the earthly Jesus who is accessible to human memory (anamnesis, mnemosynon).<sup>7</sup> The composition, the liturgical use,

<sup>3</sup> Originally appeared in 1977, last edition in Eberhard Jüngel, Entsprechung: Gott-Wahrheit-Mensch (Munich: Kaiser, 1980), 178–192.

<sup>4</sup> See Hans Küng, “Wie treibt man historische Theologie?” (1979), in Theologie im Aufbruch, ed. Hans Küng (Zürich: Piper, 1987), 129–152.

<sup>5</sup> See James H. Charlesworth’s detailed proposal regarding terminology in “The Foreground of Christian Origins and the Commencement of Jesus Research,” in Jesus’ Jewishness: Exploring the Place of Jesus within Early Christianity, ed. James H. Charlesworth (New York: Crossroad, 1991), 63–83.

<sup>6</sup> Theologie und Verkündigung (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1962), 52; for a similar formulation, see Ernst Käsemann, “Sackgassen im Streit um den historischen Jesus,” in Exegetische Versuche und Besinnungen II, ed. Ernst Käsemann, 2nd ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1965), 31–64, here 67.

<sup>7</sup> I think that this is what James D. G. Dunn intended to express when he wrote: “The only realistic objective for any ‘quest of the historical Jesus’ is Jesus remembered.” In Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003), 335.

and, later, the canonization of the gospels by the church is the most notable manifestation of this tendency. Historical criticism can also be defined as a method of remembering that uses contemporary tools and intellectual procedures. And since the impact of Jesus transcends the ecclesiastical realm, Jesus research may also serve as feedback of all the secular or non-ecclesiastical images of Jesus.

1.2. Individual Themes

The main clusters of problems and themes are: Jesus and John the Baptist, teachings about the Kingdom of God (including research on the Lord's Prayer), Jesus and the Law (and the Temple), Jesus' messianic self-consciousness, Jesus' symbolic prophetic acts, Jesus' miracles, Jesus' trial, Paul and Jesus, the role of Q and the Gospel of Thomas in Jesus research, the contributions of archeology, the earthly Jesus in ecclesiastical confessions and, I would like to add, the rhetorical analysis of the Jesus traditions.

2. The Sources and Their Nature

The main sources are of Christian origin: the synoptic gospels, the Sayings of Jesus (Q—a reconstructed source), the Gospel of John, the Gospel of Thomas, Papyrus Egerton 2, minor fragments of traditions (especially P. Oxy. 1224 and 840), and individual sayings of Jesus (some of which are included in individual New Testament texts, such as John 7:53–8:11, according to the majority of the Byzantine and Latin manuscripts), and the letters of Paul of Tarsus.

The following non-Christian texts can also be regarded as sources for Jesus research: Tacitus, Annales 15.44.3; Pliny the Younger, Epistulae 10.96; Suetonius, Vitae/Vita Claudii 25.4; the Letter of Mara bar Serapion and a few rabbinic sources (especially, b.Sanh. 43a). The testimonium Flavianum (Josephus, Ant. 18.63–64) must also be mentioned since it is likely to be a Christian expansion of an original, brief notice about Jesus (see Josephus, Ant. 20.200).

The problem with Christian sources is that (a) they all see Jesus through the eyes of post-resurrection faith and that (b) the synoptic gospels, which contain 80% or more of the material we have to work with, are composed of sources (Mark, Q, and special sources of Matthew and of Luke [SMt and SLk that each consist of one or more sources]) which overlap in only a few cases. (Parallels between Q and Mark, Q and the Gospel of Thomas, and Paul and Q are especially important.) Thus, much of our material is found in only one source.

3. Resultant Ways of Dealing with These Sources and the Question of Authenticity

3.1. Jesus Research and Easter Confessions

What we mentioned in the first paragraph (see page 333) may also be of use as we discuss the method of our research. The Jesus books were attempts to give a nomological explanation of Jesus' impact on history. According to this interpretation, Jesus was only incidentally linked to an ideology that reflected the needs of the oppressed classes of his time. That was one of the Marxist hypotheses regarding the origins of Christianity.<sup>8</sup> From this perspective, the connections between Jesus and post-resurrection christology were arbitrary. However, if we critically examine the earliest traditions, their statements about Jesus can be divided into various christological schools. This means that, at the beginning, there was no ideology. The only common denominator that could have influenced the post-resurrection confessions was the person of Jesus.

Admitting this means that Jesus research must ask: What in Jesus' teaching and life evoked such a response? We may identify this method as involving critical reflection on the relation between post-resurrection christologies and the earthly Jesus.<sup>9</sup>

As can be deduced from what we said in the first paragraph (see page 333), the analysis of post-resurrection christologies not only rules out the nomological interpretation of Jesus' story; it is also an important means of keeping Jesus from being swallowed by later christological theories.

---

<sup>8</sup> I found the best expression of this tendency in the work of Czech Marxist philosopher Ivan Sviták, Středověká filosofie (Prague: Svoboda, 1955); earlier, the nomological view was represented by the work of Arthur Drews (1865–1935), Die Christusmythe (Jena: E. Diederichs, 1924). Drews maintained that the figure of Jesus is only a construct based on myth.

<sup>9</sup> Walter Kasper, Jesus der Christus (Mainz: Matthias Grunewald, 1974), 168–170.

3.2. Methods of Critical Research

Since all historical research must be based on information derived from two independent sources, it is obvious that such texts have priority in our research. However, only part of Jesus' teachings, most of which are found in the Gospel of Mark and Q, meet this criterion.<sup>10</sup>

Thus, Jesus research had to develop a methodology that could serve as a substitute for the second independent source. A generally accepted rule of historical criticism holds that the second witness can be dispensed with if those who provided the first witness had no interest in creating such a text. The slanderous statements about Jesus and John the Baptist that are mentioned in Luke (Q) 7:33 pars. provide a typical example of a text that includes a good deal of an authentic information. Admittedly, we must take into account the negative prejudice; however, this is clearly visible, whereas the 'positive prejudice' which has shaped our civilization is recognizable only after a critical deconstruction of the traditional post-resurrection patterns.

In Jesus research, we also use the criterion of (double) dissimilarity. In fact, this is a specific example of the theory concerning the authenticity of a witness who is not interested in developing the information that he has provided.<sup>11</sup> Traditions that can be derived neither from Judaism nor from the objectives of the early church must be considered to have come from Jesus.

For example, the authenticity of the intent and the main narrative structure of some of the famous parables of Jesus (such as the parable of the Merciful Samaritan [Luke 10:25–37] or that of the Prodigal Son [Luke 10:11–32]), which are found in the special Lukan source (SLk), can be supported by means of the criterion of dissimilarity.<sup>12</sup> This is how the criterion of dissimilarity may function.<sup>13</sup>

---

<sup>10</sup> For a summary of the argument for the independence of Q and Mark, see Christopher M. Tuckett, "Mark and Q" in The Synoptic Gospels, ed. C. Focant, BETL 110 (Leuven: Leuven University Press–Peeters, 1993), 149–175, esp. 174–175.

<sup>11</sup> Ernst Käsemann, "Das Problem des historischen Jesus," in Exegetische Versuche und Besinnungen I, ed. Ernst Käsemann, 2nd ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1960), 188–214, here 205; Norman Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus 2nd ed. (1967; London: SPCK, 1976), 43–44.

<sup>12</sup> See the analysis of these parables in Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 383–384.

<sup>13</sup> A pioneer in this type of research was N. Perrin, The Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus (London: SCM, 1963), 183.

I have paid special attention to another application of the criterion of dissimilarity, i.e., to the analysis of the stylistic and rhetorical peculiarities of the early Jesus traditions (see 4.5).

The criterion of dissimilarity was subjected to heavy criticism. According to that criterion, Jesus would have had constantly uttered ingenious statements and would have been permanently isolated from all traditions. Actually, his Sitz im Leben was that of a pious Jew living within the Hellenized Mediterranean milieu of the first century CE. He also participated in the conventional human wisdom that is expressed in proverbs (see 4.5) and used universally valid metaphors (universal anthropological ideas), such as “being lost” (to refer to a life without future), “heaven” (to refer to the key position), and so forth.

This does not mean that the criterion of dissimilarity should be abandoned. It only means that the rule of two independent witnesses, together with positive criteria that may compensate for the second witness (which have just been described), can and should have their necessary counterpart in the criterion of coherence. This is a secondary, interpretative criterion. A text is coherent if its individual parts (segments) make sense or have a similar meaning at a deeper (cognitive) level. This criterion can also be applied to a group of texts that are bound together by a similar theme. We can ask about their referents and examine the less documented texts to see whether they complement the content that has been found to be authentic according to the positive criteria, or at the very least, to make sure that they do not contradict it.

A special sort of criterion of coherence is the criterion of congruence or the criterion of cumulative circumstantial evidence. According to this criterion, content can be accepted as being authentic if observations deduced from other data indirectly invite similar conclusions.

We may also subsume coherence with Jesus’ social and historical setting under the criterion of coherence. This does not mean that we deny the criterion of dissimilarity; however, we must ask whether the new phenomenon was recognizable as an innovation in traditional patterns and whether it was communicable in Jesus’ setting (contextual individuality). Gerd Theissen calls this combination of positive and interpretative criteria the criterion of contextual plausibility (Kontextplausibilität).<sup>14</sup>

---

<sup>14</sup> Gerd Theissen and Anette Merz, Der historische Jesus, 2nd ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997), 117–119.

The validity of the criterion of multiple attestation is limited, and I would almost warn against it. If we were to use frequency as an argument, we would abandon the task of critical testing. We must also consider the singular traditions, especially if the rule of replacing the second witness (see above) is applied. In his Jesus book, J. D. Crossan does not mention the parable of the Prodigal Son (Luke 15:11–32), apparently because it occurs only once in the synoptic tradition.<sup>15</sup> However, that parable contains a feature that is typical of Jesus' teachings and has a parallel in the 'argument,' as well as in the literary genre and structure, of the parable of the workers in the vineyard that is found in Matt 20:1–16.

The criterion of analogy in present experience<sup>16</sup> is not valid since it rules out any phenomena (especially Jesus' healings) which have no analogy in our Sitz im Leben.

In summary, data supported by the criteria of positive evidence provide basic verification, while data that fit the criterion of coherence may offer secondary information.<sup>17</sup> It is clear that if we use this method, we may discard some data that may be authentic. However, it is better to have some blank spaces in the image of Jesus than it would be to construct a face with false features. A sound critical deconstruction is always better than a false reconstruction.

4. A Particularization and Concretization of Conclusions that Have Been Reached up to Now

In sketching an image of Jesus, we start by analysis of Pauline evidence and of data from the synoptic and Johannine tradition provided by the new methodologies. We will offer only a brief survey of the established evidence that is accepted by a wider group of scholars.

---

<sup>15</sup> J. Dominic Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: Harper, 1991).

<sup>16</sup> The criterion of analogy in present experience was included in the set of criteria for historical criticism that was proposed by Ernst Troeltsch, "Über historische und dogmatische Methode in der Theologie," in Gesammelte Schriften II, ed. Ernst Troeltsch (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1913), 729–753.

<sup>17</sup> This is the main reason for Jack T. Sanders' warning against overestimating the criterion of coherence in "The Criterion of Coherence and the Randomness of Charisma: Poring Through Some Apories in the Jesus Traditions," NTS 44 (1998): 1–25.

4.1. Pauline Evidence

Paul is a meager source with regard to Jesus' life. Jesus was important to Paul as the crucified and Risen Lord. Yet, Paul's letters were written about twenty years earlier than the Gospel of Mark, and he may have obtained some first-hand knowledge about Jesus from Peter, whom he is said to have interviewed (Gal 1:18). (Histoiresai means to get information<sup>18</sup> [testimony]; cf. historia.) According to Gal 1:19, Paul also met James the Righteous, and did not hesitate to mention that James was the brother of the Lord (ho adelphos tou kuriou). This is a decisive argument in favor of Jesus' historicity. When Paul proclaimed that "we do not know Jesus according to the flesh (kata sarka)" in 2 Cor 5:16b, the "according to the flesh" must refer to the act of knowing (ginoskein—to know), instead of to Christ, as many older translations suggested.

Having anchored Jesus in history, we may identify additional information about his life that is included in the Pauline epistles and is also found in the gospels. Jesus was a Jew (Gal 4:4). He had at least two brothers (adelphoi tou kuriou [1 Cor 9:5]), one of whom was James (Gal 1:19; cf., 1 Cor 15:7). He called disciples, one of whom was Cephas (Gal 2:14; 1 Cor 9:5; cf., 15:5a), who was also known as Peter (a Greek version of the same name, Gal 2:7–8), and another of whom was John (Gal 2:9). Peter and John were part of the inner core of Jesus' followers who were known as "the Twelve" (1 Cor 15:5b). Jesus died (1 Cor 15:3) on a cross (Phil 2:8), which, at that time, was used to punish criminals. Paul knew that Jesus' cross is an offense (Gal 5:11), a "foolishness" (1 Cor 1:18); however, he insisted on its proclamation (1 Cor 1:23).

Shortly before his betrayal (and arrest), Jesus spoke about the meaning of his death during his last meal ("the institution of the Lord's Supper," 1 Cor 11:23–26). When breaking the bread, he declared that his death would be on behalf of his disciples (huper humôn), and when he took the cup of wine after the meal, he spoke about the new covenant in terms of his blood. Parallels with synoptic texts are apparent (Mark 14:22–25, Matt 26:26–29, and Luke 22,15–20, which is dependent on Mark and a special source of Luke; cf. Justin, I Apol. 66.3). Paul claimed that he had received this tradition from the Lord. Since Paul never met Jesus during his earthly life, his assertion must be understood in a spiritual sense, as representing the Risen Lord's confirmation of the tradition regarding Jesus. Nevertheless, Paul used the verb paradidonai (to hand over) here (as well as in 1 Cor 15:1–3 where he presents the 'formula of faith'). In this case, paradidonai is obviously related to the chain of transmission (in Latin, traditio). This means that in 1 Corinthians 11, paradidonai has a double meaning. Paul had learned the tradition about the Institution of the Lord's Supper from Jesus' closest disciples, and the Risen Lord had confirmed that it was his living heritage (in prayer and through his epiphany).

<sup>18</sup> George D. Kilpatrick, "Galatians 1:18 ICTOPHCAI KEFAN," in New Testament Essays: Studies in Memory of T. W. Manson, ed. A. J. B. Higgins (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1959), 144–149, esp. 149; J. D. G. Dunn, "The Relationship between Paul and Jerusalem According to Galatians 1 and 2," NTS 28 (1982): 461–478; and J. D. G. Dunn, "Once More—Gal 1:18: ICTOPHCAI KEFAN," ZNW 76 (1985): 138–139.

Passages which present Jesus as being a descendant of the family of David are problematic (Rom 1:3; cf. Luke 2:4). Since such statements may have been deduced from the title 'Messiah' or from the designation of Jesus as the Son of David (Mark 10:47 par.; Matt 1:1), the expected king of the Jews (Mark 15:2,9; Matt 2:2), we cannot prove that Jesus actually came from the family of David. What can be proved is that he was considered to be the Messiah and a descendant of David by some of his followers, as well as by his adversaries. (Cf. the inscription on Jesus' cross, according to Mark 15:26 par. [John 19:19–20] and the discussion in Mark 12:35–37 par.). In John 7:42, we read a polemic against confessing that Jesus was the Messiah: "Has not the Scripture said that the Messiah is descended from David and comes from Bethlehem?" This must have been a strong argument against the confession that Jesus is the Messiah. Jesus' adherents would not have mentioned this if it had not been necessary to respond to this issue. Their most successful answer was that Jesus is the "Lord" referred to in Ps 110:1 and, therefore, is more than a Davidic Messiah (Mark 12:35–37 par.).

We know that Paul mentioned two sayings of the Risen Lord, which were obviously rooted in the ancient Jesus tradition, when addressing the internal order of his congregations (1 Cor 7:10–11; cf. Matt 5:32 par., Mark 10:11–12 par., and 1 Cor 9:14 [9:4]; cf. Matt 10:10b par.). Since Paul distinguishes these directives from his own prophetic statements, which have been inspired by God's spirit (1 Cor 7:8, 7:10,25), they must have belonged to a clearly defined collection of sayings.<sup>19</sup>

---

<sup>19</sup> Hans W. Kuhn, "Der irdische Jesus bei Paulus als traditionsgeschichtliches und theologisches Problem," ZThK 67 (1970): 295–320, here 296–298; Nikolaus Walter, "Paul and the Early Christian Tradition" (1982), in Paul and Jesus, ed. A. J. M. Wedderburn, JSNTSup 37 (ET: Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1991), 51–80, here 54–55.

In 1 Thess 4:15–17, Paul makes a statement “in the name of the Lord,” i.e., supported by the authority of the Lord. This saying may, but does not necessarily, belong to the same collection. The role that Jesus’ sayings played in Paul’s arguments is supported by Luke in Acts 20:35c, where Paul is said to have quoted a saying of the Lord (an agraphon) in Miletus.<sup>20</sup>

But why does Paul not quote more sayings of the Lord,<sup>21</sup> especially in support of his teachings about the Christian’s liberty from the Mosaic Law?<sup>22</sup>

We know that there are other allusions to, or indirect quotations of, Jesus’ sayings that reveal a deeper knowledge of the Jesus tradition.<sup>23</sup> There is mention of Abba (Father) in Gal 4:6a and Rom 8:15. This has a parallel in Jesus’ prayer in Gethsemane (Mark 14:36 par.), and may also be the beginning of the Lord’s Prayer (Luke 11:2 and Matt 6:9) in Aramaic.

Paul’s puzzling restraint in Rom 12:14, 17–21 is striking. This seems to be a passus, inspired by Jesus’ exhortation to love one’s enemies in Luke 6:27–29 and Matt 5:39–41 (Q).<sup>24</sup> “Do not be overcome by evil, but overcome evil with good” (Rom 12:21) seems to be a bold new interpretation of the exhortation to love one’s enemies (Luke 6:27–28 pars [Q]) and of the exhortation to not resist those who are evil (Matt 5:39).

<sup>20</sup> Fritz Neugebauer, “Geistsprüche und Jesuslogien,” ZNW 53 (1962): 218–228, here 222–223. Neugebauer argues that Pauline sayings that are attributed to the Lord are dependent on the ancient Jesus tradition; cf., M. Eugene Boring, Sayings of the Risen Christ, SNTSMS 46 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982), 12, 34, 127.

<sup>21</sup> The theory that there were two kinds of Jesus traditions, an explicit and an anonymous one, is not convincing. See E. K. C. Wong, “The De-radicalization of Jesus’ Ethical Sayings in 1 Cor.,” NTS 48 (2002): 181–194, esp. 194.

<sup>22</sup> There is no evidence of other direct citations of Jesus’ sayings in Paul’s writings. See Frans Neirynek, “Paul and the Sayings of Jesus,” in L’Apotre Paul, ed. A. Vanhoye, 265–321.

<sup>23</sup> Scholars who have dealt with this phenomenon include: Rainer Riesner, Jesus als Lehrer, WUNT 2.7 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1981), 423–425; D. C. Allison, Jr., “The Pauline Epistles and the Synoptic Gospels: The Pattern of the Parallels,” NTS 28 (1982): 1–32 (This essay contains a list of possible quotations from the Jesus tradition that may be found in Paul’s writings); M. Thompson, Clothed with Christ: The Example and Teaching of Jesus in Romans 12:1–15:13, JNTSup 59 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1991); D. Wenham, Paul: Follower of Jesus or Founder of Christianity? (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1995); Rainer Riesner, “Paulus und die Jesus-Überlieferung,” in Evangelium—Schriftauslegung—Kirche: Festschrift P. Stuhlmacher (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997), 347–365.

<sup>24</sup> Petr Pokorný, “Römer 12,14–21 und die Aufforderung zur Feindesliebe (Q 6,27 Par.) und zum Gewaltverzicht (Q 6,29f. Par. und Mt 5,39a),” in Dummodo Christus annuntietur: Festschrift Jozef Heriban (Rome: Univ. Salesiana, 1999), 105–112. (This essay includes a list of secondary literature.)

It is commonly known that in 1 Cor 13:2b, Paul calls one of the best known sayings of Jesus, which refers to faith moving mountains, into question (Mark 11:23 par.; Matt 17:20 [Q]; Gos. Thom. 48).

Obviously, some of Jesus' sayings were used in polemics against Paul. In 1 Corinthians 4, an enthusiastic group in the Pauline community proclaimed that the Kingdom of God had already come, and that they were spiritually enjoying the promises of the Beatitudes. They already were kings who were satiated and rich (4:8).<sup>25</sup> The same pattern can be assumed to underlie the argument of the people who, according to 1 Cor 15:12, denied the resurrection (because they had already experienced it in a spiritual way). There was a spiritual struggle among various groups of Jesus' post-resurrection followers who were concerned about the interpretation of his sayings about the Kingdom of God. Paul argued against an enthusiastic (docetic, pre-gnostic) interpretation of those sayings. However, the docetic tendency is visible in some extra-canonical texts (see 4.5), and is also implicitly operative in the Johannine texts (e.g., John 5:24). Paul's reluctance to use Jesus' sayings to support his arguments may partially be influenced by the way in which some Christian thinkers used Jesus' (the Lord's) sayings to argue against Paul's interpretation of the gospel. It would have been difficult for Paul to argue against the enthusiasts' use of Jesus' sayings and to use the same weapons against his adversaries. If he had done this, Paul would have raised questions about his own firm foundation: the kerygma of the crucified and Risen Lord.<sup>26</sup>

Pauline practice has enabled us to illustrate the fact that the transmission of Jesus' sayings involved a significant amount of creativity. The sayings were gathered, selected, translated, interpreted, developed, combined, and applied to new problems.<sup>27</sup> The entire tradition was influenced by post-resurrection spiritual enthusiasm and cannot be understood in terms of its analogy with rabbinic teachings.<sup>28</sup> Nevertheless, the dispute

<sup>25</sup> James M. Robinson, "Kerygma und Geschichte im Neuen Testament," in Entwicklungslinien durch die Welt des frühen Christentums, ed. H. Köster et al. (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1971), 21–66, esp. 41–43.

<sup>26</sup> See Nikolaus Walther, "Paul and the Early Christian Tradition," 78–79.

<sup>27</sup> Interesting comparative material regarding the method of arguing from Scripture can be found in Pseudo-Philo, Liber Antiquitatum. See J. R. Levison, "Prophetic Inspiration in Pseudo-Philo's Liber Antiquitatum Biblicarum," JQR 85 (1995): 297–329.

<sup>28</sup> This puts into question some of the central theses of Birger Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript: Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity, 2nd ed., ASNU 22 (Lund: Gleerup, 1964), 262–264; Birger Gerhardsson, Tradition and Transmission in Early Christianity, CN 20 (Lund: Gleerup, 1964), 39–41;

about the underlying tradition continued; the Jesus tradition was not created ex nihilo. At its very core, it was based on witness, and polemics within the canon represented a struggle for an authentic interpretation of the Jesus tradition.<sup>29</sup> So-called “conservative” scholars have not only assembled useful observations; we must also take seriously their conviction that, in principle, it is possible to distinguish between the Jesus tradition and its interpretations, even if it is impossible to separate these from one another.<sup>30</sup>

4.2. Jesus’ Life According to Critical Scholarship

Widely accepted data regarding Jesus’ life include the following facts:

- Jesus was from Nazareth in Galilee. The narratives about Jesus’ birth in Bethlehem in the gospels of Matthew and Luke are legends supporting the confession regarding his Davidic origin and his messianic role. Their authenticity is theological, rather than historical. The literary nature of these texts does not allow us to use the star, the census, or Herod to date Jesus’ life.
- Aramaic was Jesus’ mother tongue; however, as a pious Jew, he also read Hebrew<sup>31</sup> and probably spoke Greek.<sup>32</sup> The gospels are dependent on several Aramaic traditions, but, as literary texts, they were written in Greek. Thus, it is not possible to use them as a basis for reconstructing their hypothetical older Aramaic layers.<sup>33</sup>

---

Samuel Byrskog, Jesus the Only Teacher: Didactic Authority and Transmission in Ancient Israel, Ancient Judaism and the Matthean Community, ConBNT 34 (Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1994), 142–149.

<sup>29</sup> According to T. Söding, Das Liebesgebot bei Paulus, NTA 26 (Münster: Aschendorff, 1995), 210–211, 285, some of the sayings of Jesus have been transformed into a Christian wisdom tradition—a harmonizing solution.

<sup>30</sup> For a balanced discussion, see Heinz Schürmann, “Die vorösterlichen Anfänge der Logientradition,” in Der historische Jesus und der kerygmatische Christus, ed. H. Ristow and K. Matthiae (Berlin: EVA, 1961), 342–366, esp. 356–358; and Traugott Holtz, “Jesus-Überlieferung und Briefliteratur,” in Traugott Holtz, Geschichte und Theologie des Urchristentums, WUNT 57 (Tübingen: Mohr, 1991), 17–30, esp. 25–27.

<sup>31</sup> John A. Emerton, “The Problem of Vernacular Hebrew in the First Century A.D. and the Language of Jesus,” JTS NS 24 (1973): 1–17.

<sup>32</sup> Aramaic was not spoken in Decapolis. Cf., Mark 5:20; 7:31; William Sanday, “The Language Spoken in Palestine at the Time of Our Lord” (1878!), in Sanday, Essays in Biblical Criticism and Exegesis, ed. Craig A. Evans and Stanley E. Porter, JSNTSup 125 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001), 80–93; R. Riesner, Jesus als Lehrer, WUNT 2.7 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1981), 391–392; Stanley E. Porter, Criteria for Authenticity in Historical Jesus Research, JSNTSup 191 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000).

<sup>33</sup> Compare this view with that of Maurice Casey, Aramaic Sources for Mark’s Gospel,

- Jesus became a follower of John the Baptist, a prophet, and the most popular representative of the Baptist movement. (There were other such prophets; see Sib. Or. 4.162–167.) In addition, Jesus was baptized by John. This was a puendum of the early church, so that in the Gospel of Matthew John had to say: “I need to be baptized by you, and you come to me?” (Matt 3:14). According to Luke 3:20–22 John the Baptist apparently was in prison when Jesus was baptized, and according to John 1:29, John even said: “Here is the Lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world!” without baptizing Jesus at all. Jesus’ baptism by John was a turning point, probably linked to Jesus’ sense of having been given a special mission by God himself. Soon after his baptism, Jesus parted from John the Baptist, primarily because he had a different concept of salvation. This can be deduced from the total picture that we have of their teachings, and especially, from slanderous statements about them that are quoted in Matt 11:18–19 (Luke 7:33–34 [Q]). John is charged with being an extreme ascetic, and Jesus is accused of being a bonvivant (a glutton and a drunkard). John emphasized his message about God’s judgment by means of his ascetic way of life. He intended to change human beings and to prepare them for the arrival of the Age to Come by this type of “shock therapy” (cf. Luke 3:9). Baptism was an anticipation of the Last Judgment, which would come as a flood (Gen 6–9; cf. 1 Pet 3:2). Unlike John, Jesus chose a positive strategy. Like Socrates, he participated in symposia, and proclaimed some decisive sayings in such settings (Luke 7:48: “Your sins are forgiven”; cf. 19:9a).<sup>34</sup> The symposia were anticipations of the eschatological table fellowship in the Kingdom of God (Mark 14:25 par.; Luke 22:15–18; cf., Luke 14:16–24 [Q] par.; Gos. Thom. 64), to which people would “come from east and west, from north and south” (Luke 13:29–30 par. [Q]), where the poor would be filled (Luke 6:20 par. [Q])<sup>35</sup> and would have the gospel preached to them (Luke 7:22 par. [Q]) during a time that would be like a wedding feast (Mark 2:19 par.). In

---

SNTSMS 102 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999). Semitisms are not more frequent in the gospels than in Lucian’s writings, for example.

<sup>34</sup> Michael Wolter, “‘Gericht’ und ‘Heil’ bei Jesus von Nazareth und Johannes dem Täufer,” in Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. J. Schröter and R. Brucker, BZNW 114 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002), 355–392.

<sup>35</sup> See János Bolyki, Jesu Tischgemeinschaften, WUNT 2.96 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1998), 228–229.

the short metaphorical passage that precedes Luke 7:33 (Q), John's preaching is likened to mourning at a funeral and Jesus' proclamation is compared to the piping of a flute which invites its hearers to dance (7:32) as it was at the wedding feasts. According to Luke 7:33, John and Jesus are on the same side, while the other side consists of adversaries who reject both of them. Yet, the difference between Jesus and John is clearly visible.

- Jesus performed symbolic actions, similar to those of the prophets in Israel (1 Kgs 11:29–39; Jer 19:1–13, etc.). He established a group of “Twelve” from among his disciples (Mark 3:13–19 par.), thereby symbolizing his mission to reform the entire nation of Israel with its twelve tribes. Furthermore, he entered Jerusalem on a donkey (Mark 11:1–11 pars.), like the messianic king described by the prophet Zechariah (9:9). Since the donkey was no longer an animal used for battle, this was a metaphor in a double sense. The same can be said about Jesus' cleansing of the temple (Mark 11:15–17 pars.), which symbolized his anticipation of a new eschatological temple (Ezek 40:1–44:3). Jesus' table fellowship can also be understood as consisting of symbolic actions.
- Jesus performed miraculous healings and exorcisms, which, according to our contemporary criteria, could be interpreted as shamanism. They do not fit any category of healing that we know from Jesus' day or from our time; yet, they are so well corroborated that we must take them seriously (see 3.) and must leave the question of their interpretation open.<sup>36</sup>
- Jesus did not hesitate to associate with sick people, outcasts (lepers), the poor, and women, children, and foreigners (Samaritans). Women were also among his disciples (Mary Magdalene) and supporters (Luke 8:1–3).
- Some of his Jewish contemporaries considered Jesus to be the Messiah in a more or less political sense, although he did not accept this role.
- Jesus was aware of the imminent danger to his life; yet, he went to Jerusalem for the Passover, most probably, in 30 CE. He pondered the positive meaning that his death might have. (See 4.4)
- He was sentenced to death and executed on a cross like a criminal.

---

<sup>36</sup> John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew II, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1994), 617–619, cf. 516, 535–537, 617–619, 678–680, 907, and 968; Berndt Kollmann, Jesus und die Christen als Wundertäter, FRLANT 170 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1996), esp. 314–316.

In general, Jesus may be understood to have been a prophet who intended to reform Israel, like his teacher John the Baptist or the Righteous Teacher who was a candidate for the post of high priest more than one and a half centuries before. A generation earlier, Rabbi Hillel and Rabbi Shammai also wanted to reform Israel, but they were teachers with no prophetic ambitions.

Jesus did not succeed in reforming Israel. His early followers tried to continue his efforts to reform Israel, but in the 70's CE, they lost the battle to the pharisaic party. The Pharisees reformed Israel in a way that, in principle, remains valid to this very day.

4.3. The Message and Teachings of Jesus

We have already identified the Kingdom of God as being a key phrase in Jesus' proclamation and teaching (see 3.1),<sup>37</sup> as being a matter of debate in Pauline theology (see 4.1), and as conveying an understanding of eschatological salvation that was different from the one that John the Baptist preached (see 4.2).

Jesus' proclamation was not based on a new morality. In their simpler formulation in Luke 6:20–21, the Beatitudes are only a promise. The poor are blessed, not because they are better than other people, but because the announcement of their changed position provides a vivid illustration of the new social structure of the Kingdom.<sup>38</sup> The poor, the hungry, and those who weep are not mentioned incidentally: "The poor have the good news brought to them" (Luke 7:22 par. [Q]). Social deprivation surely is the worst type of on-going humiliation that human beings can experience. This has been confirmed throughout history.

It is understandable that the oppressed hate the rich. In history, this hatred has repeatedly corrupted the movements of poor people and has escalated their alienation.<sup>39</sup> Thus, a special feature of the Jesus tradition is that the promise to the poor is linked with the exhortation to love one's enemies. This love (agape; Hebr. a-h-b) is not mere sentiment; it involves wanting others to also share the hope that we have received.

<sup>37</sup> For anyone who is interested in Jesus' understanding of the Kingdom of God, an essential collection of material and valuable observations is the voluminous work of Jacques Schlosser, Le règne de Dieu dans les dits de Jésus I-II (Paris: J. Gabalda, 1980).

<sup>38</sup> The "woes" in Luke 6:24–25 are a secondary, symmetrical development of the Lukan tradition, whereas Matthew's account of the Beatitudes (Matt 5:3–10) is a liturgical version intended for internal use by a group which had voluntarily chosen to follow Jesus.

<sup>39</sup> Communist totalitarianism also began as a movement of the poor.

The command to “bless those who curse you, pray for those who abuse you” (Luke 6:28 par.; cf. Matt 6:14) is clearly related to eschatological salvation. This does not preclude admonishing one’s adversaries and preventing them from harming others; however, the adversaries are not identified with evil itself (or with the evil one). The connection between the promise to the poor and the exhortation to love one’s adversaries is an internally coherent structure in Jesus’ teaching,<sup>40</sup> whose import has not yet been fully appreciated.

The consequence of this tradition is that since sinners themselves are victims of the evil one, it is necessary and possible to separate the sinner from his sin. This is the essence of the forgiveness that Jesus extended to individual persons in the name of God (Mark 2:5–7 par.; Luke 7:47–48). It is striking that if we analyze Jesus’ exorcisms, we discover an analogous structure: the possessed are liberated from the unclean spirits (daimonion, pneuma akatharton) that had dominated them (Mark 5:2 par.; Matt 17:18). The sinner appears on the same plane as the sick. Every analogous act of liberation is an anticipation of the Kingdom (Matt 12:28 par.). From this perspective, there are not good people and bad people, but only individuals who are dominated by evil and persons who have been liberated from it.

The fact that Jesus expected that the Kingdom of God would soon come in fullness remains a problem. According to Matt 10:23, he expected that this would happen in a few months.<sup>41</sup> This expectation was not fulfilled. Jesus’ miscalculation has been denied because Christian teachings about Jesus developed in a semi-docetic direction, according to which Jesus was a divine being clothed in a human body. From this perspective, it is not possible to ascribe any error to Jesus. However, by exploring why Jesus achieved such critical significance in spite of his miscalculation, we can better understand the core of his teaching.

The impact of Jesus’ miscalculation can be reduced by a few observations. In the first place, the apocalyptic genre was not the only form that Jesus used to express his message. His exhortations often issued from the grace of the heavenly Father who makes his sun rise on the evil and on the good (Matt 5:45). This was one of the reasons that one group of scholars stressed the sapiential features of Jesus' teaching and viewed him as being a wandering Cynic and sage who quoted proverbs, initiated dialogues, used parables, discussed universal problems, and thoughtfully interpreted apocalyptic traditions.<sup>42</sup> Jesus anticipated the Kingdom through his symbolic acts (see 4.2), as well as in his parables, which not only illustrated his teaching, but were also part of the new reality.<sup>43</sup> The emphasis often shifted from expectations about the future to the present time. Where we read that the Kingdom of God has come near (in Greek eggizein, cf. Matt 4:17, etc.), the Kingdom's future dimension is clearly discernible; where we read that the Kingdom has come (ephthasen, Matt 12:28 [Q] par.; cf. "is among you" [entos humôn estin] in Luke 17:21, cf. Gos. Thom. 113), its present dimension is in the foreground.

<sup>40</sup> For an exegetical analysis of this inherent coherence, see Petr Pokorný, “Die Bergpredigt/Feldrede als supra-ethisches System,” in Ja und Nein: Christliche Theologie angesichts Israels: Festschrift W. Schrager, ed. K. Wengst and G. Sass (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1998), 181–193.

<sup>41</sup> The best discussion of the evidence that I have encountered is in Werner G. Kümmel, “Die Naherwartung in der Verkündigung Jesu,” in Heilsgeschehen und Geschichte, ed. Werner G. Kümmel, Marb ThSt 3 (München: Kaiser, 1965), 457–470, esp. 465.

The most important argument against the 'apocalyptic Jesus' is the fact that the climax of apocalyptic expectation—when Jesus' significance was expressed in apocalyptic terms—did not occur until after his death.

Some scholars have observed that the sayings about the coming of the Son of Man, which were considered to be the main argument in favor of the 'apocalyptic Jesus,' do not appear in any sayings about the Kingdom of God<sup>44</sup> and can be explained as being a later commentary on other sayings of Jesus.<sup>45</sup> Nevertheless, we must take seriously the fact that the

---

<sup>42</sup> The most important studies of this kind include: Francis G. Downing, The Christ and the Cynics (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1988); Francis G. Downing, "The Social Context of Jesus the Teacher: Construction or Re-construction," NTS 33 (1987): 439–451; Burton L. Mack, A Myth of Innocence: Mark and Christian Origins (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); J. Dominic Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: Harper, 1991), esp. 76, 103–104; J. Dominic Crossan, The Birth of Christianity (San Francisco: Harper, 1998), 305. A similar portrait of a 'non-eschatological Jesus' is offered by Marcus L. Borg, Conflict, Holiness and Politics in the Teaching of Jesus (New York: Edwin Mellen, 1984). Critics of this interpretation stressed Jesus' involvement in the practical issues of religion (which was not typical for Cynics), his openness to the advent of an eschatological future, and his firm belief that the Kingdom of God would arrive in fullness. See Martin Ebner, Jesus—ein Weisheitslehrer, HBS 15 (Freiburg: Herder, 1998), 428.

<sup>43</sup> See Jünger, Paulus und Jesus, 135 ("Die Basileia kommt im Gleichnis als Gleichnis zur Sprache").

<sup>44</sup> Philipp Vielhauer presented this observation in "Gottesreich und Menschensohn in der Verkündigung Jesu," in Aufsätze zum Neuen Testament, ed. Philipp Vielhauer (München: Kaiser, 1965), 55–91.

<sup>45</sup> See Heinz Schürmann, "Beobachtungen zum Menschensohn-Titel in der Redequelle" (1975), in Gottes Reich-Jesu Geschick, ed. Heinz Schürmann (Freiburg: Herder, 1983), 153–182, esp. 176, 179; Joachim Wanke, "Bezugs- und Kommentarworte" in den synoptischen Evangelien, EThS 44 (Erfurt: St. Benno Verlag, 1981), 108–110. (Although designation 'Son of Man' disappears from texts that clearly originated during the post-resurrection period. New evidence from Qumran (e.g., 4QTestAmram) regarding the concept of eschatological judgment in Aramaic texts supports the theory that expectations about the Son of Man were prominent in Jesus' time.<sup>46</sup>

In summary, although expectations regarding an imminent social and cosmic change<sup>47</sup> do not lie at the core of Jesus' message, their impact cannot be denied. Jesus' followers had to deal with the delay in the "second coming" by: (a) postponing the date (Mark 13:30 par.; Mark 9:1 par.), (b) stressing its incalculable character (Mark 13:32 par.), (c) identifying the Kingdom with Jesus Christ (Luke 17:21), or (d) spiritualizing its character (the Kingdom of Heaven).<sup>48</sup>

The problem of the delayed parusia did not substantially threaten the early church; however, we must discuss it. Only when we admit Jesus' miscalculation can we learn why he nevertheless became so influential in history. The reason for this was not only the structure of the Easter confessions, which we cannot analyze in this essay, but also Jesus' own proclamation. We have mentioned Jesus' insight into critical problems of history (social problems and the question of evil); we have also discussed the fact that he addressed God as Father (Abba). That word does not signify a familiar relationship; instead, it points to a bond that is intensive<sup>49</sup> and respectful.<sup>50</sup> Jesus' deep personal relationship to God as these monographs are rarely mentioned in American research, J. P. Meier is a notable exception); Douglas R. A. Hare, The Son of Man Tradition (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1990), 258–260. (This study raises questions about the titular meaning of the "Son of Man.") For persuasive conclusions, see Adela Yarbro Collins, "The Origin of the Designation of Jesus as the 'Son of Man,'" HTR 80 (1987): 391–407.

---

<sup>46</sup> Jiří Mrázek, Transformace mesianismu v aramejských textech z Kumránu (diss., Charles University, Prague, 1990), 36–37, 76–78.

<sup>47</sup> The monograph of E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985), stressed the role played by the eschatological restoration that Jesus expected (61–63, 91, 145). A similar conclusion was drawn by John P. Meier, "Reflections on Jesus-of-History Research Today," in Jesus' Jewishness, ed. J. H. Charlesworth (New York: Crossroad, 1991), 84–107, esp. 92.

<sup>48</sup> We may add e. the argument regarding the difference between human and divine time (2 Pet 3:8), which came later. In the early church there was no period that could be identified as "the" time of addressing the questions raised by the delayed parusia. On the one hand, there were several waves of enthusiastic expectation (including the Montanist movement in the second century), and on the other hand, there were ecstatic experiences of the immediacy of salvation (1 Cor 4 and 12; gnosticism). These were radical expressions of the two dimensions of Christian experience (i.e., the "two-sided" or "telescopic" aspects of eschatology). Jesus' miscalculation was not the main source of these.

<sup>49</sup> This should be understood as a Semitic intensification.

<sup>50</sup> Jesus lived in a patriarchal society.

the Creator, together with his openness toward the future, which has to be in God's hands ("Father . . . thy kingdom come"), served as the firm foundation, which survived the delay of the coming of the Kingdom of God and became the starting point for post-Easter reinterpretations.

No doubt, Jesus wanted to reform Israel.<sup>51</sup> However, his innovations were so radical that they not only integrated various Jewish traditions;<sup>52</sup> they also transcended the historical dimensions of Israel's identity. The bracketing of some of the rules regarding purity (Mark 7:18–23 par.) and the exhortation to love one's enemies (Luke 6:27 par.) must have been viewed as being provocative. Even the burial of the dead, which was such an important rite in the Jewish community (1 Sam 31:12; Tob 1:16–2:9) and in all human civilizations (Sophocles, Antigone 454–455 [theon nomima]), had to take a back seat to following Jesus, who had come to teach people about the Kingdom of God (Matt 8:22 [Q] par.).<sup>53</sup> The climax of these developments is represented by the declaration that many will come from east and west to eat with Abraham in the Kingdom of heaven, while the sons of the kingdom will be cast out (Matt 8:11–12 [Q] par.). This proclamation transcends the 'Israel-centric' vision of eschatological renewal that is common to all of the other prophets and reformers.<sup>54</sup>

4.4. Jesus' Self-Understanding and the Reason for His Death on the Cross

Jesus was called "teacher" (rabbi, didaskalos), and according to Mark 14:14, he spoke of himself as teacher.<sup>55</sup> However, his self-understanding was a prophetic one. This conclusion is not only supported by Jesus' association with the prophet John the Baptist; first and foremost, it is also confirmed by his claim to be intimately related to God and to have God's Spirit. (See Luke 13:33, with "prophet" as his self-designation.)

<sup>51</sup> This is how Jesus was interpreted by E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985).

<sup>52</sup> After reading James H. Charlesworth's general comments about Qumran, we may conclude that, in some sense, Jesus' teaching also incorporated some aspects of Qumran's spiritual heritage: "The Dead Sea Scrolls and the Historical Jesus" in Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls, ed. James H. Charlesworth (New York etc.: Doubleday, 1992), 37–40; "Dead Sea Scrolls and Christian Faith," in Dead Sea Scrolls and Christian Faith, ed. James H. Charlesworth and W. P. Weaver, 58–72, esp. 71.

<sup>53</sup> A sentence about proclaiming the Kingdom has been added in Luke 9:60.

<sup>54</sup> Michael Wolter, "Reich Gottes bei Lukas," NTS 41 (1995): 541–563, here 546–548.

<sup>55</sup> Riesner, Jesus als Lehrer, 246–248.

The Pharisees could not accept such claims because they were convinced that the age of the Spirit had ended.

Jesus considered his time to be the era when the prophecy that Third Isaiah had articulated in Isa 61:1–3 would be fulfilled.<sup>56</sup> Jesus' idea of mission was a centripetal one: to prepare Israel for the anticipated pilgrimage of the nations to Jerusalem (Isa 11:10; Isa 60; Mic 4:1–8, etc.). That is why he concentrated on Israel's reform (Matt 10:5–6; 7:24).<sup>57</sup> He certainly had a sense that a special mission had been given to him by God, a mission higher than the prophetic one, which would be the start of a new era in salvation history (Luke 16:16 [Q] par.). However, Jesus never referred to himself as the Messiah<sup>58</sup> and, according to Mark 8:27–30 par. (cf. 33), he did not accept the designation "Messiah" from the mouth of Peter. In the parallel text in Matt 16:16–17, where Peter is praised, the disciple's statement was transformed into a typical post-resurrection confession about Jesus being the Son of God. Jesus obviously tried to dissociate himself from certain kinds of political messianism, which—by the way—have proved to be dangerous throughout human history. That is why he cannot be understood in terms of political subversion or revolution.<sup>59</sup> The tradition about the coexistence of faith in God and political power (Rom 13:1–7; 1 Tim 2:1–4; 1 Pet 2:12–17) has its roots in the question about paying taxes that is part of the Jesus tradition (Mark 12:13–17 par.; Gos. Thom. 100; P. Egerton 2). Jesus created an alternative social substructure which consisted of two components: he and his disciples, on the one hand, and the committed followers who supported them, on the other.<sup>60</sup> Jesus did not intend to set up a militant opposition. His program was "a religious movement with social and <sup>56</sup> Isa 61 was a popular prophecy that was related to Jesus after the resurrection (see Luke 4:18). However, although the Beatitudes in Luke 6 (Matt 5) are inspired by Isa 61, this connection is not explicitly identified as constituting an argument from Scripture. This fact speaks in favor of the theory that Isa 61 was an authentic part of Jesus' self-understanding.

<sup>57</sup> Petr Pokorný, "From a Puppy to the Child': Some Problems of Contemporary Exegesis Demonstrated from Mark 7.24–30 Par.," NTS 41 (1995): 321–334, esp. 326.

<sup>58</sup> For a discussion of messianic ideas in Jesus' time, see Gerber Oegema, The Anointed and his People, JSPSup 27 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998); and the summary by James H. Charlesworth, "Introduction: Messianic Ideas in Early Judaism," in Qumran Messianism, ed. J. H. Charlesworth, H. Lichtenberger, and G. S. Oegema (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1998), 1–8, and most of the other essays included in that volume.

<sup>59</sup> This idea was developed by Robert Eisler and Samuel G. F. Brandon, Jesus and the Zealots (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1967); Karl Kautsky was a Marxist philosopher who formulated a similar hypothesis in 1908.

<sup>60</sup> Gerd Theissen, Die Soziologie der Jesusbewegung, TEH 194 (Munich: Kaiser, 1977).

political commitments.”<sup>61</sup> Luke 7:22–23 (Q) par. reflects an early tradition,<sup>62</sup> which interpreted Jesus’ activity in terms of some of Isaiah’s eschatological expectations regarding social restitution (Isa 35:5; 61:1).

Critical research cannot prove that Jesus embraced the role of being the suffering Servant of the Lord (Isa 53), the Passover lamb, or the sacrifice necessary for atonement. Only one fact is certain: during the final period of his public activity, Jesus must have been aware that he was risking his life; thus, he pondered the meaning of his impending death. The words (ta legomena) of the institution of the Last Supper (1 Cor 11:23–25; Mark 14:22–25 par.; Luke 22:15–20) may have been fundamentally re-shaped as a result of their liturgical use. However, the act of sharing a single cup with everyone has no analogue in the Jewish setting. (According to the tractate b. Pes. 10.5, each of the participants in table fellowship had their own cup.) Therefore, Jesus’ gesture may support the theory that he was convinced that his imminent death would be significant for others,<sup>63</sup> i.e., that his personal fate would become part of his proclamation. During the same period, Jesus apparently faced the threat of death with the help of a proverb about losing and saving life, which had military origins (Mark 8:35 par.; Luke 17:33 [Q] par.; cf., Hermas, Sim. 9.26.3). (According to Plato, Socrates also alluded to that proverb [Apol. 42a].)<sup>64</sup> This saying enabled Jesus’ followers to combine post-Easter confessions regarding his resurrection with a positive (inclusive) understanding of his death (using the pattern ‘died—has been raised’).<sup>65</sup>

The reason that Jesus was sentenced to death by the Roman authorities constitutes a serious problem. The gospels try to blame the Jewish

<sup>61</sup> François Bovon, “A Review of John Dominic Crossan’s The Birth of Christianity,” HTR 94 (2001): 369–374, here 374.

<sup>62</sup> The authenticity of this tradition cannot be denied; for a discussion of this passage, see Ulrich Luz, Das Evangelium nach Matthäus (Mt 8–17), EKK I.2 (Zürich: Benzinger; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1990), 163–170; Jörg Frey, “Der historische Jesus und der Christus der Evangelien,” in Der historische Jesus, ed. Schröter and Brucker, 273–336, here 315.

<sup>63</sup> Heinz Schürmann, Gottes Reich—Jesus’ Geschick (Freiburg: Herder, 1983), 185–187; John P. Meier, “Reflexions on Jesus-of-History Today,” in Jesus’ Jewishness: Exploring the Place of Jesus within Early Judaism, ed. J. H. Charlesworth (New York: Crossroad, 1991), 84–107, at 103.

<sup>64</sup> William A. Beardslee, “Saving One’s Life by Losing It,” JAAR 47 (1979): 57–72; Petr Pokorný, “Luke 17,33 und ein (damals) bekanntes Sprichwort,” in For the Children, Perfect Instruction: Festschrift H. M. Schenke, ed. H. G. Bethge, St. Emmel, K. L. King, and J. Schlatterer, Nag Hammadi and Manichean Studies 54 (Leiden: Brill, 2002), 387–398.

<sup>65</sup> Petr Pokorný, “Postmodernes Ostern im Neuen Testament,” in Bonner akademische Reden 82 (Bonn: Bouvier, 1999), 29–40.

leaders for Jesus' condemnation, but even if that were true, it is absolutely false to say that the Jews put Jesus on the cross. We may only say that the Jewish leaders of that time were co-responsible. It is difficult to say why Jesus was crucified as the king of the Jews since he refused to accept the role of being a political Messiah. Geza Vermes is one of the few scholars who has realized the depth of this problem. However, Vermes' answer that Jesus' contemporaries did not take him seriously<sup>66</sup> is not satisfactory.<sup>67</sup> It is more likely that the proximate reason (or pretext) for Jesus' condemnation was the act of cleansing the temple (which was a prophetic symbol [Mark 11:15–19]).<sup>68</sup> The Romans used to influence the self-administration of the Jews through their hierarchy. Thus, the priests could have used the scene in the temple as the basis for accusing Jesus of blasphemy. However, the main reason for Jesus' crucifixion was deeper: his condemnation was a consequence of his authority, precisely because his inner authority meant that in his plan for salvation he himself had to play a decisive role. He did not expect any messianic figure except the transcendental Son of Man, with whom he identified himself, at least as to the Son of Man's basic function as the eschatological key person.

Jesus did not philosophically accept his death with Socratic inner harmony. He may have expected that the Kingdom would arrive before his execution, or he may have thought that he would be assumed into heaven as Enoch and Elijah had been.<sup>69</sup> The fear of death that he voiced in Gethsemane is deeply human (Mark 14:32–42 par.; John 12:27; Heb 5:7–8). The framework of this pericope, which was added in the style of a chreia, may be a secondary element. However its content, which would never have been created by a post-resurrection community of Jesus' followers, supports the authenticity of this tradition. Unlike the prayer in Gethsemane, most of Jesus' words from the cross reflect the confession and theology of the gospel writers or of their believing communities. Only the cry of dereliction, whose depth and challenge are partially blunted

<sup>66</sup> Jesus the Jew, 3rd ed. (London: SCM, 2001), 138.

<sup>67</sup> Berndt Schaller, "Jesus, ein Jude aus Galiläa. Zur Trilogie von Geza Vermes," EvTh 57 (1997): 552–559, here 559.

<sup>68</sup> E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985), 71–73. The hypothesis that the Gospel of Peter is the oldest witness to Jesus' death cannot be substantiated. (See J. Dominic Crossan, especially the study entitled The Cross That Spoke [San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1988].) It is very difficult to separate the story of the cross from the Gospel of Peter, and it is even more difficult to date that text in the first century.

<sup>69</sup> Günther Haufe, Jesu persönliche Zukunftserwartung und der Ursprung der ältesten Osterterminologie (diss., Leipzig University, 1959), extract in ThLZ 85 (1960): 467–468.

when it is understood as being a quotation of Psalm 22, suggests that Jesus' death was the failure of his expectations and desires, as well as the complete severance of his personal relationship with God. The Kingdom of God had not yet come. However, the Easter proclamation means that at the very moment of Jesus' passivity, the authenticity of his mission is proven: he has not been forgotten, and God really is on the side of suffering and mortal human beings. According to the Easter promise, the link between Jesus and the Risen Lord of the Christian faith is the faith of Jesus, i.e., his respect for God's otherness and "good will," which, in the end, transcended his own expectations and even his own sentiments. His whole "story," not just his self-understanding, is a theological "revelation"—a parable of God in history.<sup>70</sup> This is the gospel, which lies outside the realm of exact verification and can only be grasped by means of testimony.<sup>71</sup> In spite of the distance from statements of faith that a scholar has to maintain, he must be aware of the fact that, in some sense, Jesus thrived in history.

4.5. Stylistic and Rhetorical Peculiarities of the Ancient Jesus Tradition

In my opinion, one possible application of the criterion of dissimilarity involves using it to investigate and analyze the lexical and stylistic singularities of texts containing the oldest Jesus traditions.

For the most part, this method provides us with only indirect information; however, it may help us to see some of the features of Jesus' teaching more clearly.<sup>72</sup>

We have discussed (see 3.2) the metaphorical term the Kingdom of God (basileia tou theou) and its frequent combination with statements about its arrival. Another frequently used phrase is "to enter the Kingdom of God" (eiserchesthai, eisproeuesthai, proagein) (Mark 9:47; 10:15, 23; Matt 23:13 [Q]; Matt 5:20; 7:21; 21:31 [all SMt]). This expression calls to mind the reference to entering the inherited land that is found in Josh 19:49–51<sup>73</sup> (cf. the phrase “to inherit the Kingdom of God” in Gal 5:21; 1 Cor 6:9–10; 15:50; Eph 5:5). The term “kingless race” (Hippolytus, Refut. 5.8.2 [Naasean Tractate]; Cod. Berol. Gnost. 3.108.13 [SJC], NHC II, 5; 125:2, 6; 127:10–15 [Or Mundi]),<sup>74</sup> which refers to the role of believers who are spiritual co-rulers in the Kingdom of God, appears only in later non-canonical texts. Nevertheless, Jesus’ Beatitudes bequeathed the Kingdom of God to the poor (Luke 6:20b), and he promised his disciples that, during the Last Judgment, they would be his ‘co-judges’ (Luke 22:29–30; Matt 19:28). Thus, references to the “kingless race” may reflect Jesus’ spiritual legacy. The church was reluctant to develop this theme because, according to 1 Cor 4:8, Jesus’ promise had been misinterpreted as corroborating the spiritual superiority of the elect.

<sup>70</sup> Used by E. Fuchs, E. Schillebeeckx, E. Schweizer, et al. This is a valid theological statement, provided that we understand the term "parable" in a metaphorical sense; see Petr Pokorný, "Jesus als Gleichnis Gottes: Möglichkeiten und Grenzen einer These," EvTh 57 (1997): 401–407 (this essay includes an overview of this issue).

<sup>71</sup> Regarding the hermeneutics of testimony, see Paul Ricoeur, "The Hermeneutics of Testimony," in Essays on Biblical Interpretation, ed. Paul Ricoeur (London: SPCK, 1981), 119–154.

<sup>72</sup> I attempted to launch such an investigation in my paper "Stilistische und rhetorische Eigentümlichkeiten der ältesten Jesustradition," in Der historische Jesus, ed. Schröter and Brucker, 393–408.

Jesus’ frequent intransitive (absolute) use of the verb pisteuein (to believe) or of pistis (faith) (Luke 17:6 [Q]; Mark 11:22–23 par.) is significant since, in the church, pisteuein was used to introduce the Easter confession. The authenticity of this use is supported by the appearance of newly created terms, such as oligopistos or oligopistia ([of] little faith: Luke 12:28 [Q] par.; Matt 8:26; cf., Mark 4:40; Matt 14:31 [SMt]; 16:8), which obviously is a translation of an expression based on the Hebrew root a-m-n (see “Amen” in the Jesus sayings)<sup>75</sup> for which the Greek did not have a suitable lexical equivalent.<sup>76</sup> In some cases, pistis seems to be a simple confidence in miracles, a credulity (Mark 2:4–5 par.). However, an analysis of terms that express the opposite of faith reveals a deeper meaning: in this context, faith is the opposite of uncertainty, doubt, anxiety, and preoccupation with daily cares (Mark 11:23—diakrinessthai; Luke 12:22–28 [Q] par.—merimnan). Since the “Kingdom of God” is the ultimate horizon, human beings are free from the heaviest burden of worry: “Do not worry about your life” (Luke 12:22 [Q] par.).<sup>77</sup>

<sup>73</sup> In the Septuagint, poreuesthai—embateuein.

<sup>74</sup> Similar motifs are found in NHC II, 7; 145:14–15 (Book of Thomas the Contender); NHC V, 4; 56:4–5. (Second Apocalypse of James); NHC V, 5; 82:19–20 (Apocalypse of Adam) and Apoc 3:21.

<sup>75</sup> Matt 21:31b [SMt]; Mark 14:25; Matt 24:47 [Q] par.; cf., Joachim Jeremias, “Kennzeichen der ipsissima vox Jesu,” in Joachim Jeremias, Abba (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1966), 145–52.

<sup>76</sup> G. Ebeling, “Jesus und Glaube,” in Wort und Glaube, ed. G. Ebeling, 2nd ed. (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1962), 203–254, esp. 232–233.

<sup>77</sup> Anachronistically, Jesus’ sayings about overcoming daily cares (merimna) may be considered to be a kind of counterbalance to Martin Heidegger’s philosophy, in which mortality is the source of everyday human Sorge (cares and sorrows).

We have already mentioned the metaphoric explication of the term “Kingdom of God” in Jesus’ parables (see 4.3). Jesus’ unexpected response to neglected or even contemptible groups of people like children, sinners, and people from the ‘east and west’ serves an equally provocative role.

The ‘immoral parables,’<sup>78</sup> such as the one about the Dishonest Steward (Luke 16:1–8), the original form of the parable of the Ten Pounds (Luke 19:11–27 [Q?] par.) (the Jews did not charge interest at that time),<sup>79</sup> the parable about the Treasure Hidden in a Field (Matt 13:44; the version in Gos. Thom. 109 has a different aim), and the parable about a terrorist in Gos. Thom. 65, are puzzling. What should Jesus’ hearers learn from these bad people? Not their wickedness, but obviously their consistent and resolute acting.

It is striking how rich the language of the Jesus tradition is as a means of addressing its hearers compellingly. The Beatitudes are expressed in the second person (Luke 6:20b–23; Gos. Thom. 54, 68),<sup>80</sup> and Jesus addresses God as Abba (see 4.3). Other examples of the use of vivid language include hyperbolic expressions (exaggerations), like the one in the following exhortation: “If anyone strikes you on the cheek, offer the other also” (Luke 6:29 [Q] par.; cf. Matt 5:41 [SMt]); the saying about cutting off the hand and tearing out the eye (Mark 9:43, 47 par.); the caution that it is easier for a camel to go through an eye of a needle than for a rich person to enter the Kingdom of God (Mark 10:25 par.); the well-documented saying about faith moving mountains (Matt 17:20 [Q] par.; Mark 11:22–23 par., but also 1 Cor 13:2b!); and the exhortation to love one’s enemies (Luke 6:27 [Q] par., P. Oxy. 1224; Did. 1.3).

In keeping with the Socratic method, Jesus often asked ‘counter-questions’ to his disciples, as well as to his opponents (Mark 3:33; 10:18 par.; 11:29 [“I will ask you one question... ”]; Mark 12:16 par., Luke 10:36, Gos. Thom. 18 and 43, etc.). There are also several proverbs and metaphors, belonging to both the Jewish (e.g., “It is enough for the disciple to be like the teacher. . .” Matt 10:25) and the Greek traditions (e.g., “a fruitless olive tree,” “to sow on stone”). Some of these are like ‘immoral proverbs' (e.g., "Those who have will be given more; and from those who have nothing, even what they have will be taken away" [Mark 4:25–27]).<sup>81</sup>

<sup>78</sup> See Timm Schramm and K. Löwenstein, Unmoralische Helden: Anstössige Gleichnisse Jesu (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1986), esp. 148–150.

<sup>79</sup> Christoph Kähler, Jesu Gleichnisse als Poesie und Therapie, WUNT 87 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1995), 180–182.

<sup>80</sup> Beatitudes were customarily expressed in the third person; e.g., see Ps 1:1–3.

The following conclusions can be deduced from these observations. In his proclamations about the Kingdom of God, Jesus modified most of the Jewish eschatological expectations of his time, and particularly transformed 'Israel-centric' eschatology. Eschatology simultaneously became more universal and more personal (individual). However, some apocalyptic features are incontrovertible. The Kingdom of God will usher in a supra-individual change, comparable to a harvest, an assault, a discovery, or the end of the present state of affairs. All of the exhortations to repentance and inner renewal presuppose this transformation, and thus, do not fit the theory which describes Jesus as being comparable to the Cynics.<sup>82</sup> The "immoral parables," which we just discussed, may have meaning only in the context of the imminent, supra-individual movement. The "children of the Kingdom" should be as "wise" in their mission as the wicked people are in their wickedness. They will be on the victorious side of the cosmic struggle, which the devil, the evil "strong man" cannot win (cf. Mark 3:27–28): "I watched Satan fall from heaven..." (Luke 10:18; cf. Rev. 12:7; John 12:31<sup>83</sup>). Otherwise, the exorcisms could not be successful (cf. Luke 11:19–20 [Q]).<sup>84</sup> The exhortation to love is not just any moral teaching; love is a pragmatically based, supra-ethical phenomenon. Jesus' prophetic exaggerations underscore that his eschatological message must be taken very seriously. The puzzling sayings about fire and suffering (Luke 12:49–50; Gos. Thom. 10, 16, 82) heighten awareness of the fact that the apocalyptic movement is focused on the

<sup>81</sup> For a list of such parables, see Petr Pokorný, "Griechische Sprichwörter im Neuen Testament," in Bibelauslegung als Theologie, ed. Petr Pokorný and J. B. Souček, WUNT 100 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1997), 147–154.

<sup>82</sup> Cf., Jens Schröter, Erinnerung an Jesu Worte, WMANT 76 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1997), 482–484; for a detailed discussion of this matter, see Pokorný, "Stilistische und rhetorische Eigentümlichkeiten," 406.

<sup>83</sup> The context and content of the parallel passages rule out the interpretation which holds that Jesus used this saying to warn his disciples against triumphalism (S. Gathercole, "Jesus' Eschatological Vision of the Fall of Satan: Luke 10:18 Reconsidered," ZNW 94 [2003]: 38–67). It is true that the struggle continues, but the saying is not a warning about the struggle; instead, it declares that Satan has lost his power in heaven, which is the critical sphere. Thus, he has "no future."

<sup>84</sup> Michael Labahn, "Jesu Exorzismen (Q 11,19–20) und die Erkenntnis der ägyptischen Magier (Ex 8,15)," in The Saying Source Q and the Historical Jesus, ed. A. Lindemann, BETL 98 (Leuven: Leuven University Press–Peeters, 2001), 617–633; Martin Rese, "Jesus und die Dämonen im Matthäusevangelium," in Die Dämonen. Demons, ed. A. Lange, H. Lichtgenberger, and K. F. D. Römfeld (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 2003), 463–475.

judgment and the fulfillment of history (Luke 12:52; Gos. Thom. 16). Jesus' apocalyptic gospel, which is now recognizable in only some of its features, must be interpreted, not discarded. The core of Jesus' mission is neither a higher moral or social consciousness nor a series of apocalyptic images; instead, it is focused on the victorious arrival of the Kingdom of God. In one sense, this expected victory gives positive value to all human efforts that correspond to Jesus' activities (see 1.1); yet, at the same time, this victory is being realized in a way that Jesus himself could not have imagined.

5. Comparison with Others' Conclusions

I have admitted my "positive prejudice," since that is an essential feature of hermeneutics. Furthermore, more than most other contemporary scholars, I have stressed the complex nature of the Jesus tradition, in which Jesus and his post-resurrection impact are closely linked. I have tried to fructify Jesus' "christological" dimension, while simultaneously seeking to avoid presenting a harmonizing image of his teaching and life.

I fully acknowledge archeology's contributions to New Testament studies, but texts are the main sources that we regularly have at our disposal. In my opinion, the central task of Jesus research is to reconstruct Jesus' theology and to identify its relationship to his activities. Texts are also our primary source for reconstructing of some of the facts about Jesus' life since most of the texts have an explicitly referential character.<sup>85</sup>

---

<sup>85</sup> For an excellent discussion of the referential function of texts, see P. Ricoeur, "The Canon between the Text and the Community," in Philosophical Hermeneutics and Biblical Exegesis, ed. P. Pokorný and J. Roskovec (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 2002), 7–26, here 8–9.

THE ROLE OF GREEK LANGUAGE CRITERIA IN HISTORICAL JESUS RESEARCH

STANLEY E. PORTER

1. Introduction

For some historical Jesus scholars—especially those who practice what Thomas Kuhn would describe as normal science<sup>1</sup>—it may come as a surprise to discover that there is a language criterion for historical Jesus study that is not primarily concerned with Aramaic. Such scholars are accustomed to perusing lists of the so-called criteria for authenticity and finding criteria related to the use of the Aramaic language as the language-based criterion for differentiating authentic from inauthentic Jesus material. It has not always been so. In fact, there was a time in previous research even during the so-called critical period when both Greek and Aramaic or Semitic language criteria co-existed, often being utilized by the same scholars. In the intervening period, the Greek language criterion was completely overshadowed by extravagant claims for the Aramaic criterion, and the Greek language criterion did not seem to respond with robust defenders—at least until recently.<sup>2</sup>

Although I am far from being the first person to propose one or more, or even a set, of Greek language criteria for study of the historical Jesus, I have probably developed such criteria in the most robust fashion. I will expand upon pertinent developmental cruxes below, but my own development of such criteria began with my study of the multilingual milieu of the ancient Mediterranean world, including Palestine at the time of Jesus.<sup>3</sup> On the basis of this research, I became convinced that, rather than there being significant Semitic (including Aramaic) influence upon the Greek of the New Testament, the Greek of the New Testament reflected the non-literary (not to be confused with

---

<sup>1</sup> T. Kuhn, The Structure of Scientific Revolutions, 2nd ed. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1970), 10–42.

<sup>2</sup> The above synopsis is defended and exemplified in the discussion below.

<sup>3</sup> S. E. Porter, Verbal Aspect in the Greek of the New Testament, with Reference to Tense and Voice, SBG 1 (New York: Lang, 1989), 111–156; cf. S. E. Porter, “Introduction: The Greek of the New Testament as a Disputed Area of Research,” in The Language of the New Testament: Classic Essays, ed. S. E. Porter, JSNTSup 60 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1991), 11–38.

sub-literary or un-literary) koine of the time, as found in a number of other contemporary authors.<sup>4</sup> I later extended this research, and became convinced that even the eastern Mediterranean, including Palestine and the Galilee region, were linguistically integrated with the complex multilingualism of the eastern Roman Empire, to the point that many inhabitants of the time, including Jews and especially a Jewish teacher, would have been functionally bilingual, to the point of using Greek for simple communication, and even possibly for extended discourse.<sup>5</sup> My task then became one of developing criteria by which such a judgment could be applied to specific instances as found in the New Testament. As a result, I developed three Greek language criteria: the criterion of Greek language and its context, the criterion of Greek textual variance and the criterion of discourse features.<sup>6</sup> These were all applied to the New Testament, and a number of passages were identified in which one could, with varying degrees of certainty, establish that Jesus spoke Greek. Since that time, I have added to the number of passages, responded to criticism, and come to believe that there is more reason than not to apply such criteria to larger passages than simply dialogues between Jesus and others.<sup>7</sup> I originally suggested that Mark 13 was one such possible passage,<sup>8</sup> and I have come to the point of positing that such a passage as the Sermon on the Mount was delivered—at least on the occasion as it is recorded in Matthew's gospel—in Greek.<sup>9</sup> Responses to these

<sup>4</sup> Porter, Verbal Aspect, 141–156.

<sup>5</sup> See, e.g., S. E. Porter, “Did Jesus Ever Teach in Greek?” TynBul 44.2 (1993): 199–235 (updated in my Studies in the Greek New Testament: Theory and Practice [New York: Peter Lang, 1996], 139–171); “Jesus and the Use of Greek in Galilee,” in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 123–154; “The Greek Language of the New Testament,” in Handbook to Exegesis of the New Testament, ed. S. E. Porter, NTTS 25 (Leiden: Brill, 1997), 99–130.

<sup>6</sup> I first proposed and developed these in S. E. Porter, The Criteria for Authenticity in Historical-Jesus Research: Previous Discussion and New Proposals, JSNTSup 191 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), 126–237. The second of the three criteria, Greek textual variance, was anticipated in S. E. Porter and M. B. O'Donnell, “The Implications of Textual Variants for Authenticating the Words of Jesus,” in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTTS 28.1 (Leiden: Brill, 1998), 197–133; cf. Porter and O'Donnell, “The Implications of Textual Variants for Authenticating the Activities of Jesus,” in Authenticating the Activities of Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTTS 28.2 (Leiden: Brill, 1998), 121–151.

<sup>7</sup> See, e.g., S. E. Porter, “Luke 17.11–19 and the Criteria for Authenticity Revisited,” JSHJ 1.2 (2003): 201–224; “Reading the Gospels and the Quest for the Historical Jesus,” in Reading the Gospels Today, ed. S. E. Porter, McMaster New Testament Studies (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2004), 27–55; “The Criterion of Greek Language and Its Context: A Further Response,” JSHJ 4.1 (2006): 69–74.

<sup>8</sup> Porter, Criteria for Authenticity, 210–37.

<sup>9</sup> Porter, “Reading the Gospels,” 48–49. See also below for further discussion.

criteria have been mixed,<sup>10</sup> although I believe that it is generally recognized that I have—if not convinced all scholars of the validity of my ultimate conclusions—shown that it is likely if not probable that Jesus spoke Greek, at least on occasion, and that we may even have some indication of when Jesus did so.<sup>11</sup>

In this paper, I wish to do several things in terms of the above criteria that I have developed. I wish to (1) trace the history and development of the criteria regarding language, both Greek and Semitic, including Aramaic, (2) develop in more detail the three criteria that I have mentioned above, and (3) then apply these criteria in some detail to new passages.

2. Previous Discussion of Greek and Aramaic Language Criteria

In the critical post-Enlightenment era, the indiscriminating are easily led to believe that there has only been one language criterion, that of Semitic or Aramaic language. For example, if one picks up Albert Schweitzer's major work on the development of historical Jesus discussion from Reimarus to Wrede, his section on language is devoted almost entirely to those who discuss Semitic languages. He includes, especially, F. Delitzsch, J. T. Marshall, E. Nestle, J. Wellhausen, A. Meyer and G. Dalman.<sup>12</sup> Recent discussions are not much different. There have been a number of articles and chapters that have reviewed the criteria used in historical Jesus research,<sup>13</sup> and not one of them, to my knowledge, acknowledges anything but a Semitic or Aramaic language criterion. The same is true in the several book-length treatments that have sections

---

<sup>10</sup> Positive response is found, for example, in H. W. Shin, Textual Criticism and the Synoptic Problem in Historical Jesus Research: The Search for Valid Criteria (Leuven: Peeters, 2004), passim; S. McKnight, Jesus and his Death: Historiography, the Historical Jesus, and Atonement Theory (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2005), 45; while a negative response is found in J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered, Christianity in the Making 1 (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003), 82–83.

<sup>11</sup> See, e.g., B. Witherington III, The Jesus Quest: The Third Search for the Jew of Nazareth (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1995), 257 n. 42; C. A. Evans, "Life of Jesus," in Handbook to Exegesis, ed. Porter, 427–475, esp. 447; Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 315 and n. 289; Shin, Textual Criticism, 200–201; and M. J. McClymond, Familiar Stranger: An Introduction to Jesus of Nazareth (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2004), 51–52.

<sup>12</sup> A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of Its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede, trans. W. Montgomery (London: A. & C. Black, 1910), 270–277.

<sup>13</sup> E.g., W. O. Walker, "The Quest for the Historical Jesus: A Discussion of Methodology," ATR 51 (1969): 38–56; N. J. McEleney, "Authenticating Criteria and Mark 7:1–23," CBQ 34 (1972): 431–460; F. Mussner, "Methodologie der Frage nach dem historischen Jesus," in Rückfrage nach Jesus: Zur Methodik und Bedeutung der Frage nach dem historischen Jesus, ed. K. Kertelge, QD 63 (Freiburg: Herder, 1974), 118–147; repr.

on the criteria.<sup>14</sup> Thus, it is understandable that many would have the impression not only that there is only one language criterion, but in fact that there is only one language that was in use by Jesus and his followers in first-century Palestine. Both assumptions are demonstrably false, and merit correction.

Discussion of the development of both Semitic and Aramaic criteria and Greek criteria is warranted, to set the stage for discussion of recent developments of Greek language criteria. I will begin with a brief overview of the Semitic criteria.

2.1. Semitic Language Criteria

There are three recent stages in the development of Semitic and more particularly Aramaic language criteria that are worth mentioning. There is no doubt that there were many earlier who recognized that Semitic languages, including Aramaic, were used by the early church.<sup>15</sup> However, in the modern era, there are three quantifiable stages of significance.<sup>16</sup>

2.1.1. Translational Literalism

The first stage in the development of the Semitic language criteria came about as a result of linguistic discoveries in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. As a result of the development of comparative philology, there emerged a recognition of the genetic relationship between what came to be called the Indo-European languages, to the point of developing a in Mussner, Jesus von Nazareth im Umfeld Israels und der Urkirche: Gesammelte Aufsätze, ed. M. Theobald, WUNT 111 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1999), 13–42; R. H. Stein, “The ‘Criteria’ for Authenticity,” in Gospel Perspectives: Studies of History and Tradition in the Four Gospels, vol. I, ed. R. T. France and D. Wenham (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1980), 225–263; D. Polkow, “Method and Criteria for Historical Jesus Research,” in Society of Biblical Literature 1987 Seminar Papers, ed. K. H. Richards, SBLSP 26 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1987), 336–356; C. A. Evans, “Life of Jesus,” in Handbook to Exegesis, ed. Porter, 441–446.

---

<sup>14</sup> E.g., R. S. Barbour, Traditio-Historical Criticism of the Gospels, Studies in Creative Criticism 4 (London: SPCK, 1972); R. Riesner, Jesus als Lehrer: Eine Untersuchung zum Ursprung der Evangelien-Überlieferung, WUNT 2.7 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1981; 4th ed., 1994), 87–96; S. McKnight, Interpreting the Synoptic Gospels, Guides to New Testament Exegesis (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1988), 59–69; J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 4 vols., ABRL (New York: Doubleday; New Haven: Yale University Press, 1991–2009), 1:167–195; C. A. Evans, Life of Jesus Research: An Annotated Bibliography, rev. ed., NTTTS 24 (Leiden: Brill, 1996), 127–146; idem, Jesus and His Contemporaries: Comparative Studies, AGJU 25 (Leiden: Brill, 1995), 13–26 (these reflect his earlier article, “Authenticity Criteria in Life of Jesus Research,” CSR 19 [1989]: 6–31). The exception of course is my own treatment of the topic, where I am developing Greek language criteria.

<sup>15</sup> See Schweitzer, Quest of the Historical Jesus, 270–274; Porter, Verbal Aspect, 111.

<sup>16</sup> The history of this debate is traced in Porter, Verbal Aspect, 112–117; “Introduction,” 11–37; Criteria for Authenticity, 89–99.

complex genetic tree that traced these Indo-European languages back to their earlier forms, and culminating in the hypothesized Proto-Indo-European.<sup>17</sup> Along with this discovery came the recognition that there were other languages that were not Indo-European in nature, and that some of these languages also enjoyed genetic relationships. These languages and their relationships helped to explain a number of linguistic phenomena related to linguistic geography, such as the relationship between a number of peoples and language groups of the ancient near east. Out of this study grew an interest specifically in the language of the Jewish people, including the Jews of the first century, and more particularly the relationship between Hebrew and Aramaic as Afro-Asiatic languages.<sup>18</sup> There came to be a widespread recognition of the importance of Aramaic (or Chaldean as it was often called) for the Jewish people of the first century, while questions were also raised about the quick transformation that had occurred from a nation that spoke Hebrew to one that spoke Aramaic in the short period of the exile (from 550 BC on). This involved recognition of the relationships between these various Semitic languages, as well as the question (still unresolved) of the continuing role that Hebrew played in the post-exilic period, and in particular in the liturgical and common lives of Jewish inhabitants of Palestine in the first century.<sup>19</sup>

Discussion of the role of Aramaic in relation to study of Jesus in the nineteenth and early twentieth century, by such scholars as A. Meyer, J. Wellhausen, E. Nestle, G. Dalman, F. Blass, and C. C. Torrey,<sup>20</sup> focused upon what I am calling translational literalism. The assumption seemed <sup>17</sup> See D. Crystal, Linguistics (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1971), 37–51. Cf. T. Bynon, Historical Linguistics (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1977); N. E. Collinge, “Language as It Evolves: Tracing Its Forms and Families,” in An Encyclopaedia of Language, ed. N. Collinge (London: Routledge, 1996), 866–916.

---

<sup>18</sup> See W. P. Lehmann, Historical Linguistics: An Introduction (New York: Holt, Rinehart, and Winston, 1962), 41–42; Collinge, “Language as It Evolves,” 906.

<sup>19</sup> On some of these issues, see my forthcoming paper, “The Greek of the Jews and Early Christians: The Language of the People.”

<sup>20</sup> A. Meyer, Jesu Muttersprache: Das galiläische Aramäisch in seiner Bedeutung für die Erklärung der Reden Jesu und der Evangelien überhaupt (Freiburg: Mohr Siebeck, 1896); J. Wellhausen, Einleitung in die drei erste Evangelien (Berlin: G. Reimer, 1905; 2nd ed., 1911); E. Nestle, Philologica Sacra: Bemerkungen über die Urgestalt der Evangelien und Apostelgeschichte (Berlin: Reuther & Reichard, 1896); G. Dalman, Grammatik des jüdischpalästinischen Aramäisch (Leipzig: Hinrichs, 1894); idem, The Words of Jesus Considered in the Light of Post-biblical Jewish Writings and the Aramaic Language, trans. D. M. Kay (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1909); idem, Jesus-Jeshua, Studies in the Gospels, trans. P. P. Levertoff (London: SPCK, 1929); F. Blass, Philology of the Gospels (London: Macmillan, 1898); C. C. Torrey, “The Translations Made from the Original Aramaic Gospels,” in Studies in the History of Religions: Festschrift C. H. Toy, ed. D. G. Lyon and G. F. Moore (New York: Macmillan, 1912), 269–317.

to be that the Jews of the first century—at least for the sake of this linguistic exercise—were functionally monolingual. However, it was clearly recognized that the gospels themselves were in Greek. Therefore, there had to be a relationship posited between these two. The theory that emerged was one of translational literalism, that is, that there was what amounted to an iconistic relationship between Semitic and Greek usage. This theory was aided, or rather complicated, by the fact that knowledge and recognition of post-classical Greek, and in particular the koine Greek of the first century, was only gradually emerging. The discipline of classical philology, which studied the literary artifacts of the ancient world, had not yet turned its attention to non-standard and later dialects, and the documentary papyri found in vast amounts in Egypt had only recently been discovered and not yet appreciated for New Testament study.

As a result, when a reader of the Greek New Testament encountered language in Greek that was not of classical standard, it was tempting to posit that this reflected some sort of translation out of a Semitic language, and in particular Aramaic. Especially in cases where the Greek linguistic phenomena seemed particularly odd, the hypothesis posited that here was not just a literal translation, but perhaps even a literal mistranslation. These translations and mistranslations provided the material for a number of results. Some scholars were content to note Semitic and Aramaic features as they appeared in the New Testament. Others went further and were intent on retroverting the Greek of the New Testament into the original or underlying Aramaic substratum or Vorlage. There was some flexibility permitted in this, as there was not proportionately much Aramaic to which to compare, allowing a range of proposals to be made. Still others took this as a signal of a theological tendency at work, in that it was not believed that such poor translation could have been made, and thus these translations into Greek were made to invite an understanding of the underlying Semitic language.

2.1.2. Paraphrase and Environment

Increased knowledge of the Semitic languages and literatures led to a revision of the translational literalism hypothesis, by such scholars as M. Black, M. Wilcox, and, perhaps most importantly for this criterion, J. Jeremias.<sup>21</sup> The Targums were especially important in this regard. The

---

<sup>21</sup> M. Black, An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1946; 2nd ed., 1954; 3rd ed., 1967); M. Wilcox, "Semitisms in the New Testament," ANRW II 25.2, 978–1029; and J. Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus, trans. S. H. Hooke

Targums, as Aramaic paraphrases of the Hebrew Bible, provided both a body of literature for comparison and examples of the type of translation that occurred. There were a number of problems with using these targumic data, related to such issues as dating of the sources in terms of their original composition and the date of the manuscripts. These have only been partly addressed by recent Dead Sea Scrolls discoveries, as the amount of Aramaic from Qumran is very limited. Nevertheless, the evidence such as it was necessitated a revision in the original optimism of the translational literalism hypothesis. Examination of the comparative material revealed that it was difficult if not impossible to posit a literalistic translation of the original Aramaic into the Greek of the New Testament. This revision to the hypothesis was concurrent with developments in translational theory. Whereas translational theory itself had been dominated by a literalistic method, there came to be recognition that whereas there is literalistic translation, there is and can be other types of translation as well, ones that make it highly difficult to posit a simple one for one equation between linguistic phenomena. Examples from the targumic material and other sources showed that it was difficult to predict a particular pattern of translational transfer from source to receptor, but that translators were able to use a range of linguistic items in their linguistic repertoire when rendering the source language into the target.

The result of this recognition of linguistic complexity was twofold. The first was a recognition that the literalistic analysis of a previous period would simply not function in terms of differentiating material potentially influenced by Semitic languages. This came about through an increasing recognition of the difficulties of interlingual translation and the difficulties of testing the results in terms of ancient Aramaic. As a result, there was a modification of the claims for widespread detection of Semitic influence, to the point of recognition that in many instances the most one could assert was that a passage in the Greek New Testament may—even in passages attributed to Jesus—be only an approximation or a paraphrase of what it was that was originally written or said. The second was that there was still a persistence to attribute a number of linguistic peculiarities to Semitic influence. These peculiarities were not necessarily translational idiosyncracies, but included such phenomena as special words or phrases (e.g. “son of man,” abba, etc.) that indicated the underlying substratum. These peculiarities were seized upon as indicators of the authentic material that underlay especially the words of Jesus. In many ways this approach has continued to be dominant in much discussion of the historical Jesus, despite warnings to the contrary, even by those who at one time might have been expected to endorse such a hypothesis.

---

(London: SCM, 1972); idem, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus (London: SCM, 3rd ed., 1966); idem, New Testament Theology, trans. J. Bowden (London: SCM, 1971), esp. 3–37.

2.1.3. Revivalism

The paraphrase stage clearly was more nuanced and restrained in its assertions than was the previous literalistic period. However, the paraphrase stage did not lead to the kinds of advances that one might have expected. A number of other factors entered into discussion as well. These included the discovery of potentially instructive sources for discussion, such as the Dead Sea Scrolls; a greater knowledge of and appreciation of the role that Hellenistic culture played in Mediterranean life, including Jewish life in the eastern Mediterranean; a wider recognition of the development of Christianity as it spread outside of Palestine; recognition of the fact that the Aramaic hypothesis did not in fact provide the solid foundation regarding the original words of Jesus that it claimed to do but only indicated that the early church may have been an Aramaic using one; among others. Nevertheless, despite efforts to moderate the impact of the Semitic language hypothesis, there was a resistance to such a position, as if the original hypothesis had to be salvaged, even if the evidence upon which it was based (as I shall mention further below) was not as compelling as was required. As a result, there was a revival of the Semitic language hypothesis, or rather hypotheses, in a number of different forms. I will mention two of them here.

One of the revivals was a rejuvenation of the original literalistic translational equivalent hypothesis, in the work of M. Casey.<sup>22</sup> As a result of work on the various Semitic, and in particular Aramaic sources, a few scholars came to believe that there was a firmer foundation for assertion of the literalistic hypothesis. These few scholars came to believe that the evidence of the use of Aramaic as seen in the Dead Sea Scrolls, other especially inscriptional evidence of use of Aramaic, theories regarding the interlingual translational milieu of first-century Palestine, and theories regarding the nature of the translation process itself, provided for a secure basis for retroversion from Greek to Aramaic. There are few who are willing to revive this hypothesis directly, although the indirect potential is nevertheless present. However, as the foundation upon which this theory is founded is fundamentally flawed—the supposed new evidence is in fact quite limited and does not provide the basis for testing retroversions, and the linguistic theory that is sometimes invoked is often misstated—the results must be taken with considerable caution.<sup>23</sup>

---

<sup>22</sup> M. Casey, Aramaic Sources of Mark's Gospel, SNTSMS 102 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998); "An Aramaic Approach to the Synoptic Gospels," ExpTim 110.7 (1999): 275–278; cf. idem, "In Which Language Did Jesus Teach?" ExpTim 108.11 (1997): 326–328.

The second approach is the invocation of the targumic hypothesis. There are a number of scholars who claim that the targumic traditions had a significant influence upon the ministry and teaching of Jesus, such as Chilton and Evans.<sup>24</sup> Even if the Targums that we now have are later, there is claimed to be substantial evidence of the use of Targums during the time of Jesus. This targumic material is invoked in a number of ways. The influence of the Targums is seen in terms of dictional correspondence, thematic correspondence, and exegetical correspondence. In the first, some of the words of Jesus are seen to reflect the wording of the Targums, when, for example, he is cited as quoting an Old Testament passage, especially in Isaiah (the Isaiah Targum is the one most widely drawn upon). In the second, going beyond simple verbal correspondence, the New Testament passage is said to reflect conceptual patterns found in the targumic material. Lastly, Jesus and others, including various biblical writers, are seen to reflect the kind of exegetical practice that is demonstrable from the targumic material. All of these factors, functioning at different levels, at different times and in different ways, are said to create the firm basis for an Aramaic hypothesis, in which it can be established how and in what ways Jesus (as well as others) taught.<sup>25</sup>

As a result, there are still a number of scholars who in effect—despite words of warning to the contrary—practice the paraphrase approach to Aramaic influence on the words of Jesus, and a growing number

<sup>23</sup> See Porter, Criteria for Authenticity, 164–180.

<sup>24</sup> B. Chilton, A Galilean Rabbi and His Bible: Jesus' Use of the Interpreted Scripture of His Time (Wilmington, DE: Glazier, 1984), 70–71, 90–137; C. A. Evans, "From Gospel to Gospel: The Function of Isaiah in the New Testament," in Writing and Reading the Scroll of Isaiah: Studies of an Interpretive Tradition, ed. C. C. Broyles and C. A. Evans, 2 vols., VTSup 70.1–2, Formation and Interpretation of Old Testament Literature 1 (Leiden: Brill, 1997), 2:651–691, esp. 667–674.

<sup>25</sup> Chilton (Galilean Rabbi, 71, 89–90) himself claims that the targumic tradition had an influence on the wording of Jesus' sayings. In a recent public lecture, speaking on the topic, Chilton said that he did not believe that there was direct relevance of the targumic material for the question of the historical Jesus.

who are either attempting to return to the more optimistic days of retroversion, while still others invoke the targumic approach. In effect, all of these approaches have a number of assumptions in common that provide a misleading picture of the linguistic landscape of first-century Palestine. The way in which these theories function gives the impression that there were no other languages being used in the linguistic situation of the time. In other words, the way the Aramaic hypothesis works, the assumption seems to be that any evidence that points toward linguistic interference or influence has to be attributed to Aramaic (or another Semitic language, such as Hebrew) and to Aramaic alone. Another assumption is that the sociolinguistic context would have determined that the influence would have moved from Aramaic to Greek. A third is that this movement of influence worked at all levels of language—phonology, morphology, syntax, lexis, etc.—in the same way. A fourth is that linguistic retroversion is possible in ways that can establish with some degree of meaningful certainty what the original language was—although the assumption from the start is that it was Aramaic, and now the task is simply to demonstrate this assumed conclusion.

2.2. Greek Language Criteria

Even though Schweitzer gives the impression that those who were concerned with language in first-century Palestine were primarily if not exclusively concerned with Semitic languages, in particular Aramaic, this is not true, even for those whom he discusses. One feature that becomes clear in all of the discussion of the relationship of Greek to the teaching of Jesus is that prior to the contemporary discussion there was, to my knowledge, no reference to a Greek language criterion. Nevertheless, this lack of direct reference does not mean that various construals of the evidence were not providing what is tantamount to a criterion regarding the Greek language. The discussion of various Greek language criteria so defined can also be found in three stages.<sup>26</sup>

2.2.1. Textual and Contextual Assumption

The first stage of discussion is one that assumed that Greek was a language of Jesus within a multilingual environment. During the nineteenth century, there were a number of scholars who, without necessarily derogating the use of Aramaic or another Semitic language, assumed that one of the languages of Jesus was Greek, such as Dalman and Sanday.<sup>27</sup> There were some who took the evidence further and asserted that the primary, if not the exclusive, language of Jesus and his first followers was Greek, such as Roberts.<sup>28</sup> In both cases, there were a number of factors that led a number of scholars to begin with this assumption. The first, and perhaps the most important, was that the New Testament itself, and the gospels in particular, were all written in Greek. Not only were the gospels written in Greek, the earliest evidence of them known at the time was that they were written in Greek, and had been in that form from the start. Papias's statement regarding Semitic logia notwithstanding,<sup>29</sup> all of the early indicators were that the gospels were written in Greek, and by extension the material contained in them must have been put into Greek early on, either by Jesus or his closest followers, that is, within a context in which Greek was widely used. The fact that the Greek found in the gospels and on the lips of Jesus was not in the classical dialect could serve as further support that it reflected the language of Jesus. If it was not a special inspired form of Greek given for just such a purpose, it certainly was not Greek that had been recast in classical form, and hence it had the air of authenticity. A second factor was that all of the major evidence of the early church fathers was that they were Greek speakers. Before the discovery of the papyri, which provided a new basis for comparison of the Greek of the New Testament, linguistic comparison was of necessity based upon literary sources. There were a number of literary authors who provided useful comparative language—a type of Greek that did not conform to classical standards, but was more paratactic in style—and the most abundant source of such language was the early church. Discoveries of

---

<sup>26</sup> The history of this debate is traced in Porter, Verbal Aspect, 112–117; “Introduction,” 11–37; Criteria for Authenticity, 127–141; “Did Jesus Ever Teach in Greek?” 199–235; “Jesus and the Use of Greek,” 123–154.

---

<sup>27</sup> Dalman, Jesus-Jeshua, 1–37; W. Sanday, “The Language Spoken in Palestine at the Time of Our Lord,” The Expositor 7 (1878): 81–99; idem, “Did Christ Speak Greek?—A Rejoinder,” The Expositor 7 (1878): 368–388 (Sanday's essays are reprinted in W. Sanday, Essays in Biblical Criticism and Exegesis, ed. C. A. Evans and S. E. Porter with S. N. Dolf, JSNTSup 225 [Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001], 80–93, 94–107).

<sup>28</sup> A. Roberts, “That Christ Spoke Greek,” The Expositor 6 (1877): 81–96, 161–176, 285–299, 307–383; “That Christ Spoke Greek—A Reply,” The Expositor 7 (1878): 278–295; Greek, the Language of Christ and His Apostles (London: Longmans, Green, 1888); A Short Proof That Greek was the Language of Christ (Paisley: Alexander Gardner, 1893).

<sup>29</sup> The indication is that there was no demand for such an Aramaic document. See R. O. P. Taylor, The Groundwork of the Gospels (Oxford: Blackwell, 1946), 91–95 (written by G. A. Smith), esp. 92–93.

such writings as the Shepherd of Hermas and the Epistle of Barnabas as recently as in the Sinaiticus Codex (published in 1862) illustrated useful points of linguistic comparison. Even though some later church fathers self-consciously utilized a higher register of Greek, the rhetorical purposes for which they used it (along with their statements to this effect) gave an explanation for the developments in their style. A third factor to consider was the context in which the discussion took place in relation to the ancient world. Much of the discussion of the language environment of the ancient Mediterranean world was taking place in multilingual Europe. Whether one was part of the Germanic world of Northern Europe, or the Germano-Slavonic world of the Austro-Hungarian empire, multilingualism was simply the norm, with code-switching between dialects the rule rather than the exception. The recognition of this linguistic multilingualism made it easy for scholars of the time to accept that multilingualism would have been the norm in the ancient world as well, one in which Rome had conquered the Hellenistic world that had come to occupy and control the various local people groups of Egypt, Palestine, Syria, Anatolia, and beyond. Thus, despite widespread failure to note scholars who take this position, there is an abundance of recognition in the late nineteenth century that Greek—even if it was not clear the type of Greek—was a possible language of Jesus and the early church.

2.2.2. Koine Correlation

The influence of some of the German scholars on study of the historical Jesus at the beginning of the twentieth century diverted attention away from discussion of Palestinian multilingualism. Such neglect took a decided turn, however, as a result of the work of Adolf Deissmann and James Hope Moulton.<sup>30</sup> Deissmann was responsible for first making the widespread recognition that the language of the documentary Greek papyri discovered in abundance in Egypt had fundamental correspondence to the language found in the Greek of the New Testament. Deissmann's work concentrated primarily on lexical correlations. Whereas previous thought had often found it difficult to understand how it was that the Greek of the New Testament used particular lexical items with senses that they did not have in early Greek, Deissmann showed that virtually all of the lexemes in such a list had the attested sense in the papyri. The work of Deissmann was extended by Moulton, first into Greek lexis, but, perhaps even more importantly, also into Greek syntax. The two-pronged approach was important for several reasons. The area where most linguistic shift between dialects or language varieties would be expected is in terms of the lexicon. Deissmann, and with him Moulton, showed that even in this area where one might expect Greek to be influenced by a Semitic language in a Palestinian or other Semitic milieu, the result was that the Greek of the New Testament was reflecting senses of words that were found in the independent linguistic milieu of Egypt. Furthermore, in many instances the kinds of linguistic peculiarities that had often been cited by those arguing for the Aramaic hypothesis were syntactical ones, such as a particular use of a preposition, or an unusual word order. Moulton was able to show that even in such cases the papyri bore witness to syntactical phenomena on the phrase and clause level that were not classical but also were not Semitic: they were part of the koine or common Greek that was in widespread use throughout the Mediterranean world, apparently as a result of the spread of Greek by Alexander the Great and his mercenary army and their followers, and encouraged and developed by the Hellenistic rulers and then the Roman occupation, with its need for a lingua franca. However, despite the influence of Deissmann and Moulton on the linguistic scene in both Britain and continental Europe,<sup>31</sup> the major voices of the koine hypothesis and the use of this Greek to understand the New Testament were muted with the death within a relatively short space of time (1917–37) of its two major proponents.

---

<sup>30</sup> E.g., A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, trans. A. Grieve (1895; 1897; Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1901); J. H. Moulton, "Grammatical Notes from the Papyri," Classical Review 15 (1901): 31–39, 434–442; among many works.

2.2.3. Revivalism

Within the last twenty years there has been a revival of the Greek hypothesis in terms of Greek being one of the possible languages of Jesus, and at the least one of the languages of the complex Palestinian multilingual milieu that merits further study. The revival of this hypothesis, by such scholars as Koester, Silva and Porter,<sup>32</sup> derives from a number of significant factors. These factors include, first, an appreciation for the range of evidence of the use of Greek in the eastern Mediterranean. Sometimes this use of Greek is equated with penetration of Hellenistic culture. There is no doubt that Hellenistic culture cannot be separated from what it meant to be Jewish in Palestine in the first century due to a variety of historical and related factors. However, the fact of a vibrant Hellenism in which the Jewish people participated does not necessarily mean a minimizing of Jewish practice and belief (although it clearly did in some instances). It was possible, and in fact was the case, that Jewish practice and belief occurred in Greek-speaking contexts with as much apparent fervor and vibrancy as they did elsewhere. This includes not only Egypt (as the Septuagint attests), but in Galilee and even in Palestine, as the evidence from a variety of sources and practices attest, such as Josephus. The evidence includes a variety of literary and documentary sources. The literary sources include works of Jewish literature written in Greek during this time, including in Palestine; other Jewish authors; and statements by Jewish authors about their literary practice. The documentary sources include a range of different types of inscriptions and related evidence, including papyri. The accumulation of evidence, especially when compared with the artifactual evidence for the other languages, is significant.

---

<sup>31</sup> Other important advocates include H. St. J. Thackeray, A Grammar of the Old Testament in Greek According to the Septuagint (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1909); G. Milligan, The New Testament Documents: Their Origin and Early History (London: Macmillan, 1913); and E. C. Colwell, The Greek of the Fourth Gospel: A Study of Its Aramaicisms in the Light of Hellenistic Greek (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1931).

The second major strand of evidence concerns growth in knowledge of the factors that influence multilingualism. Recent research has paid greater attention to issues of active and passive bilingualism, the difference between functional and complete fluency or bilingualism, and the relationship between written and spoken language, along with the question of reading and writing.<sup>33</sup> There is sometimes the expectation that to say that Jesus or any of his followers knew Greek is the same as saying that they were completely bilingual. This may be true, but it could also be true that Jesus could be said to be a user of Greek if he had an active and functional fluency that allowed him to carry on conversations, even if he could not deliver an extended oration.

---

<sup>32</sup> See H. Koester, Introduction to the New Testament, I (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982), 103–113; M. Silva, “Bilingualism and the Character of Palestinian Greek,” Bib 61 (1980): 198–219. There are also a number of classical scholars who examine the multilingual environment.

<sup>33</sup> See, e.g., H. Baetens Beardsmore, Bilingualism: Basic Principles, 2nd ed., Multilingual Matters 1 (Clevedon: Multilingual Matters, 1986), 1–42.

Even if he could deliver an extended oration, this would not mean that he could read. Even if he could read, it would not mean that he could write a treatise. The relationship of these multilingual factors is complex and not easily solved. When seen in these terms, making the claim that Jesus could use Greek is a modest one that demands further exploration that the Greek language criteria attempt to provide. There are also issues related to the relationships between languages, especially the influence of prestige languages upon non-prestige languages.<sup>34</sup> There has been debate about the prestige language within Palestine, and even within various ethnic communities. These discussions have tended to obscure the issue that the prestige language is the one that people wish to learn so that they can enhance their standing by linguistic means—not simply the language that they have always known or is attached to their tradition. In these terms, Greek would have been the prestige language to which those of Palestine would have had access, and that would have given them access to economic and political spheres otherwise closed to them. Once that is established, the clear tendency is for structural changes to be transferred from the prestige language to the non-prestige, not vice versa, even if there are lexical transfers both ways. A third and final factor to consider here is the early church. Several scholars in their recent work have pointed out, or perhaps repeated, that all of the early evidence indicates that Jesus and his followers would have had exposure to Greek. The early church fathers wrote in Greek, the gospels as well as the rest of the New Testament were written in Greek from the start, and any translation that would have occurred would have had to occur incredibly early, if it happened at all. This raises the question of why it happened, except if the milieu in which early Christianity found itself demanded that its important writings be in Greek, for communicative purposes. In effect, Greek has always been the language of the New Testament, and in fact of the Jesus of the New Testament.<sup>35</sup>

In a number of ways, the discussion regarding Semitic and Greek language criteria has proceeded down parallel tracks. Those who are advocates of the Semitic and in particular Aramaic hypothesis rarely give recognition to the fact that there are serious advocates of a Greek language criterion hypothesis. Those who are advocates of the Greek language hypothesis, especially in recent times, have of necessity had to recognize the Aramaic or Semitic hypothesis, even if they do not wish to accept it wholly or partially. Nevertheless, even though I have not gone into detail regarding this, there has been significant overlap and interaction between the two. Early advocates of the Greek language criterion were also often advocates of the Aramaic hypothesis as well. So a scholar such as Dalman can recognize that the linguistic environment of Palestine was trilingual, with Aramaic, Greek and Hebrew (probably in that order of frequency)—even though Dalman's work today is virtually only known for his influence on the Aramaic hypothesis.<sup>36</sup> Advocates such as Deissmann and Moulton recognized, especially in a work like the Septuagint, that there was the influence of Semitic languages on Greek.<sup>37</sup> They assumed that this was the case, as they made their case for the predominant influence of the koine Greek that they saw the biblical writers using. Matthew Black is often invoked as the most well-known advocate of the Aramaic hypothesis, but he recognized that there were few if any places in the New Testament that one could point to with anything approaching certainty to establish translation from Aramaic into Greek.<sup>38</sup> Even though we remain in what I would characterize as an Aramaic period of historical Jesus thought—despite scholars such as Meier advocating downgrading the criterion to a lower level of dubious or secondary criteria<sup>39</sup>—I believe that the Greek language criteria can bring insight to the discussion by not only recognizing the multilingual linguistic realities of first-century Palestine, but by providing a means of differentiating places where Greek was in all likelihood actually used by Jesus or his followers.

---

<sup>34</sup> See Porter, Verbal Aspect, 154–156; Criteria for Authenticity, 174–176.

<sup>35</sup> See H. D. Betz, “Wellhausen’s Dictum ‘Jesus Was Not a Christian, But a Jew’ in Light of Present Scholarship,” ST 45 (1991): 83–110; repr. in his Antike und Christentum: Gesammelte Aufsätze IV (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1998), 1–31, esp. 15–16.

3. Three Criteria regarding the Greek Language

There are three major criteria regarding the Greek language that I have developed. These are not meant as criteria that replace other language

<sup>36</sup> Dalman, Jesus-Jeshua, 1–37.

<sup>37</sup> A. Deissmann, "Hellenistic Greek with Special Consideration of the Greek Bible," in Realencyklopädie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche, ed. A. Hauck (Leipzig: Hinrichs, 3rd ed., 1899), 7:627–639; trans. in Porter, ed., Language of the New Testament, 39–59, esp. 49–51, 55–56; J. H. Moulton, "New Testament Greek in the Light of Modern Discovery," in Essays on Some Biblical Questions of the Day, ed. H. B. Swete (London: Macmillan, 1909), 461–505, esp. 472.

<sup>38</sup> Black, Aramaic Approach, 274.

<sup>39</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew, 178–180.

criteria. To the contrary, these criteria recognize the complex linguistic milieu in which Jesus taught and acted, and attempt to bring into play those factors that are related to a Greek-language background. These criteria attempt to do justice to all of the dimensions of the multilingualism of first-century Palestine and environs. Furthermore, these criteria do not necessarily preempt other criteria used in discussion of the historical Jesus. To the contrary, these criteria fit within the panoply of the developed criteria for studying the historical Jesus. These criteria have a legitimate place within the history of historical Jesus research, and admittedly a number of limitations on their usefulness, but these criteria are not necessarily attempting to circumvent such criteria, even where they go beyond them or function alongside them. Nevertheless, these criteria are developed as independently of such criteria as is possible, so as to establish definable and separate criteria.

All of the three criteria assume that the Palestinian linguistic milieu was multilingual, and that Jesus could have spoken Greek. Here is not the place to attempt to prove what has long been recognized<sup>40</sup>—apart from by some recent New Testament scholars. The evidence is overwhelming, and includes literary, non-literary and documentary, epigraphic, and sociolinguistic evidence, along with evidence from the Greek-speaking early church. This includes Galilee. Even if Galilee, and such places as Sepphoris, were less Hellenistic than has sometimes been thought, that does not mean that Judaism was less Greek-speaking. The evidence is too pervasive and multivariate to conclude otherwise. As a result, one must consider the nature of the multilingualism. Greek was the first language for many in Palestine, but certainly a second or acquired language for many more. There were many who had a passive or receptive ability with Greek, while a significant number, especially those who were engaged in business or had significant contact with non-Jews, had active or productive capacities. The evidence indicates that, while Jesus' first language was Aramaic, he was productively bilingual, with Aramaic and Greek, and possibly Hebrew, with Greek and possibly Hebrew being acquired or second languages.<sup>41</sup> This sociolinguistic description best reflects the linguistic situation of Mediterranean life in the first century.

The assumption of this level of linguistic competence is that Jesus could have spoken Greek on occasion, and possibly even taught in it.

---

<sup>40</sup> Scholars who recognize the multilingual environment of first-century Palestine are relatively numerous. See Porter, Criteria for Authenticity, 165–166 n. 105, for discussion.

<sup>41</sup> Porter, Criteria for Authenticity, 134.

The question then becomes whether there are suitable criteria to prove that he did so on any given occasion. This formulation of Jesus' assumed ability and the possibility of productive Greek usage provides the context for discussion of three Greek language criteria.

3.1. Criterion of Greek Language and its Context<sup>42</sup>

This first criterion depends upon three stages in its definition and implementation. These three stages provide increasing specification so as to establish a level of probability regarding establishing whether Jesus did or did not speak Greek on a given occasion.

3.1.1. The Participants in an Event and their Linguistic Background

The first stage is, in a given situation, to determine the participants besides Jesus, and on the basis of this determination to establish whether the background of such participants would have been conducive to conversation in Greek with Jesus. The participants who would have come into linguistic contact with Jesus' could theoretically have ranged from their inability to speak or even understand Greek to their being monolingual Greek speakers, and all positions in between. Geography is an important factor in this formulation, as levels of Greek usage seem to have varied according to region, as well as according to other factors. There is a range of Greek linguistic ability recognized. In Jerusalem, Hengel has estimated that 10–15 or 20% of the resident Jews spoke Greek as a first language.<sup>43</sup> Along the coastal plain, linguistic usage would have varied, depending upon the background and situation of the participant. In the Decapolis cities near the Galilee region, the percentage speaking Greek would have been highest, as these were cities with Greek foundations that attracted Hellenists. We do not know the percentage of those in these areas that spoke Greek as first or second language, but even among Jews it must have been high, as a number of Jesus' disciples were given Greek names, such as Philip, Andrew, and even Peter (by Jesus?), and Simon, Bartholomew and Thaddaeus may have had names derived from Greek.<sup>44</sup>

<sup>42</sup> See Porter, Criteria for Authenticity, 141–163; “Luke 17.11–19,” 210–223.

<sup>43</sup> M. Hengel with R. Deines, The Pre-Christian Paul, trans. J. Bowden (London: SCM, 1991), 55; M. Hengel with C. Marksches, The “Hellenization” of Judaea in the First Century after Christ, trans. J. Bowden (London: SCM, 1989), 10.

<sup>44</sup> Hengel with Marksches, “Hellenization” of Judaea, 16–17; Hengel with Deines, Pre-Christian Paul, 55–56.

In my original formulation of this criterion, I cautiously worked from the standpoint that the assumption was that the primary language of a participant was Aramaic, and that, if Greek were spoken, it was a second language. I then looked for evidence that Greek may have been a functional language. This procedure had an inherently cautious approach, and resulted in conservative results. As a result, a number of potential situations were identified in which the participants, in the light of their backgrounds, may have spoken Greek to Jesus. These include Jesus speaking with:

1. Pharisees and Herodians (those connected to the Hellenistic household of Herod) though in Jerusalem (Mark 12:13–17; Matt 22:16–22; Luke 20:20–26)
2. The Roman centurion in Capernaum in Galilee (Matt 8:5–13; cf. Luke 7:1–10; John 4:46–54)<sup>45</sup>
3. Pilate, a Roman official (Mark 15:2–5; Matt 27:11–14; Luke 23:2–4; John 18:29–38)
4. A Syrophenician or Canaanite Gentile woman in Tyre/Sidon (Mark 7:25–30; Matt 15:21–28)
5. “Certain Greeks” who approached Jesus in Jerusalem (John 12:20–28)
6. A Samaritan woman in Samaria (John 4:4–26)
7. Jesus’ own disciples but in the northern Galilean region at Caesarea Philippi (Mark 8:27–30; Matt 16:13–20; Luke 9:18–21)
8. Samaritan lepers as Jesus passes between Samaria and Galilee (Luke 17:11–19)
9. Levi/Matthew near Capernaum in Galilee (Mark 2:13–14; Matt 9:9; Luke 5:27–28)
10. A demon-possessed man in Gerasa or Gadara in the Gaulanitis region, in the eastern Decapolis (Mark 5:1–20; Luke 8:26–39; Matt 8:28–34)
11. A mixed crowd from Jerusalem, Idumea, beyond the Jordan, and Tyre and Sidon (Mark 3:8)

---

<sup>45</sup> Some (e.g., Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 315 n. 289) question whether the centurion was a Gentile. However, Dunn cannot decide (216 nn. 200, 201). There is no indication that he would have spoken a local language for communication within the military hierarchy, but he would have spoken Greek. This would even have been true in the ranks of the thoroughly Hellenized Herod Antipas. The context, especially in Luke, indicates a foreigner (see Luke 7:5).

12. A mixed crowd from Galilee, the Decapolis, Jerusalem, Judea, and beyond the Jordan (Matt 4:25), and Tyre and Sidon (Luke 6:17)

In each of these episodes, there are participants who may have spoken Greek, and some indication that the background of the participants would have invited Jesus to speak in Greek. The Herodians were supporters or part of the thoroughly Hellenized household of Herod Antipas, and Pharisees, such as Paul, could be from anywhere in the Jewish world; the Roman centurion, no matter his race, would have communicated with Greek, especially as the prestige language, to the subservient Jews; the Roman governor, with no indication of an interpreter, would have spoken Greek, not the local indigenous language, with Jesus and the Jewish leaders; the Syrophenician woman from Tyre or Sidon came from a Hellenized area that had eradicated indigenous languages; Samaria had been a multilingual area, with increasing Greek dominance, since the third century BCE; the Greek speakers were probably Gentiles who spoke Greek; the disciples, a mixed group with many from Galilee, were speaking near an ancient and thoroughly Hellenized city of the north; a tax collector for the Herods or Romans would have needed to know Greek for administrative purposes; Gerasa and Gadara were both thoroughly Hellenized cities in the Decapolis; and each of the mixed audiences (possibly reflecting the same crowd) includes thoroughly and long-standing Hellenized areas where indigenous languages would have been unknown, thus requiring the lingua franca Greek. However, the varying levels of specificity do not yet show the probability that Jesus would have spoken Greek on a particular occasion. This requires further refinement.

3.1.2. The Linguistic Context and Theme of the Discussion

More than simply the participants and their background must be considered in establishing whether Jesus spoke Greek on a given occasion. There must be a consideration of the linguistic context, including the theme of their discussion, to determine whether Greek constituted the linguistic medium. The linguistic context and the theme of discussion include a number of further factors for consideration, covering a broad range of items, such as theology, politics, social dynamics, and the like. This sub-criterion in most instances refines the broad list that was first established on the basis of the participants and their context. However, one must still be open to the fact that the linguistic context and theme of discussion may suggest the use of Greek, even if one does not get such an indication from the participants involved with Jesus. As a result, the following situations, in which the participants in conversation with Jesus suggest a linguistic context and theme of discussion, may have involved Greek. The theme of discussion involved:

1. A Roman coin and Roman taxes with Herodians and Pharisees (Mark 12:13–17; Matt 22:16–22; Luke 20:20–26)
2. Personal affairs with a centurion in Capernaum in Galilee (Matt 8:5–13)
3. Political questions with Pilate as the Roman representative (Mark 15:2–5; Matt 27:11–14; Luke 23:2–4; John 18:29–38)
4. Mundane issues of daily life with the Syrophoenician or Canaanite Gentile woman of Tyre/Sidon (Mark 7:25–30; Matt 15:21–28)
5. The approach of “certain Greeks” (John 12:20–28)
6. Water (including Greek plays on words related to water) with the Samaritan woman (John 4:4–26)
7. Theological matters with his disciples in Caesarea Philippi, the use of Greek being consistent with Jesus’ widespread use of Greek as reported in the gospels (Mark 8:27–30; Matt 16:13–20; Luke 9:18–21)
8. The situational factors in which the single Samaritan leper who is healed returns (Luke 17:11–19)
9. Words of command addressed to a tax collector named Levi/Matthew (Mark 2:13–14; Matt 9:9; Luke 5:27–28)

Out of an original group of twelve passages, there is supporting linguistic context and thematic indicators that Greek may have been spoken in nine passages. The Roman coin and Roman taxes are clearly Roman topics; the personal issue of a sick son being talked of in Greek is consistent with reversion to one’s first language in a time of crisis;<sup>46</sup> Pilate would only have been prepared to discuss such issues in Greek; mundane issues demand Greek when there is no obvious alternative; the “certain Greeks” are designated by this description as being from a Greek region and bring that foreignness to the situation; the wordplay of the topic demands Greek, consistent with the linguistic orientation of the region; the theological matters are spoken of in a context influenced by the Septuagint; the Samaritan leper discusses religion, but from a viewpoint that reflects his cultural background; and the conversation with the tax collector occurs within a linguistic context of tax collection within Galilee.

---

<sup>46</sup> This seems to be the case with the Beth She’arim inscriptions. See Porter, Criteria for Authenticity, 173 n. 138.

3.1.3. Determination of the Words of Jesus

A complete determination would analyze whether the participants besides Jesus spoke in Greek. This criterion, however, is designed simply to determine within contexts in which Jesus speaks whether it is reasonable to posit that Greek was spoken by Jesus and the degree of probability that this took place. In conjunction with this criterion, traditional criteria for authenticity can be invoked, not as a substitute for the criterion, but in further support of it. On the basis of this criterion, as well as other supporting criteria, one can classify these instances in terms of a reasonably high probability that Jesus used Greek on the occasion, a reasonable probability, and some probability. Of the nine episodes noted above, there are eight in which Jesus speaks with the participants, classified below according to the scheme just mentioned.

Reasonably High Probability:

1. Jesus and his disciples converse in Caesarea Philippi over theological matters (Mark 8:27–30; Matt 16:13–20; Luke 9:18–21)
2. Jesus responds to Pilate at his interrogation (Mark 15:2–3; Matt 27:11–14; Luke 23:2–4; John 18:29–38)
3. Jesus converses with the Roman centurion (Matt 8:5–13; John 4:46–54)
4. Jesus converses with the Syrophenician or Canaanite Gentile woman (Mark 7:25–30; Matt 15:21–28)

Reasonable Probability:

1. Jesus converses with the Pharisees and Herodians over the Roman coin and taxes (Mark 12:13–17; Matt 22:1–22; Luke 20:20–26)
2. Jesus calls Levi/Matthew (Mark 2:13–14; Matt 9:9; Luke 5:27–28)

Some Probability:

1. Jesus converses with the Samaritan woman (John 4:4–26)
2. Jesus converses with the Samaritan lepers, especially the one who returns healed (Luke 17:11–19)

The episodes that indicate a reasonably high probability of Jesus speaking Greek have a number of features that support such an estimation. (1) The episode in Caesarea Philippi involves Jesus and his disciples, a number of whom came from Galilee and who had Greek names. They speak about a number of theological issues, including the nature of the “son of man,” a phrase that reflects Greek wording. There are strong reasons for seeing the Matthean account as having priority at least in Matt 16:17–19, a section that includes a number of distinctly Greek formulations (e.g. “flesh and blood,” the naming of Peter with Πέτρος, the play on Peter’s name with πέτρα, the use of “church,” and the syntax of binding and loosing).<sup>47</sup> In support of this formulation are the traditional criteria of multiple attestation with the synoptic parallels, embarrassment or moving against the redactional tendency, including telling no one that Jesus is the Christ and the use of a number of non-Matthean linguistic items. A third criterion is that of historical plausibility in terms of Jesus discussing his identity with his disciples. (2) Jesus’ appearance before Pilate recounts how Pilate—without the use of a translator, which would have been the usual case for a Roman governor<sup>48</sup>—interrogates Jesus regarding his identity. Jesus speaks only two words in the synoptic accounts (though more in John). The criteria of multiple attestation, movement against the redactional tendency in which Jesus uses language not used elsewhere by him, historical plausibility in which the appearance before Pilate is reasonably expected, and execution or historical consequence in which Jesus’ execution follows on from his positive answer to Pilate’s question, are all in further support of this episode. (3) Jesus’ conversation with the Roman centurion regarding his ill servant (or son of a commander in John) reflects the kind of social dynamics of the time, in which the centurion recognizes his power and authority, but has approached Jesus nevertheless. This episode is supported by the criteria of multiple attestation, embarrassment or movement against the redactional tendency in which Jesus commends a non-Jew for a faith not seen elsewhere in Israel and there is even a possible complicity on Jesus’ part with the Romans, and historical plausibility in which Jesus notes the fact that those outside of Israel are more faithful than those within. (4) The final episode to note here is Jesus’ encounter with the Syrophenician or Canaanite Gentile woman. Though the topic is mundane, the witty interplay is reflective of operative social relations. Supporting criteria include multiple attestation, embarrassment or movement against the redactional tendency in which Jesus is engaged and then challenged by a person in need,<sup>49</sup> and historical plausibility in which a plausible account of Jesus' interaction with Gentiles is recorded.

---

<sup>47</sup> See Porter, Criteria for Authenticity, 159–161.

<sup>48</sup> See ibid., 178, citing H. Marrou, A History of Education in Antiquity, trans. G. Lamb (London: Sheed & Ward, 1956), 256.

Those passages that have a reasonable probability of recording authentic words of Jesus in Greek are two. (1) Jesus' conversation with the Pharisees and Herodians over the coin with Caesar's image is not as highly probable as the above, because there is less certainty that the participants involved were distinctly Greek speakers, and the language itself does not clearly confirm this through various linguistic features. Nevertheless, the reasonable probability that Greek was spoken is supported by possible multiple attestation (see the next section), embarrassment or movement against the redactional tendency in which Jesus is seen as being in possible collusion with the Romans, execution or historical consequence in which Jesus' failure to side with Israel leads him into opposition with the Jewish religious leaders, and historical plausibility in which the animosity to Jesus is built up over such episodes. (2) Jesus' two words with Levi/Matthew are the second episode. These words delivered in their Galilean context to a tax collector were probably given in Greek, but the number of words is small, and not distinct as Greek words. They are supported in their authenticity by the criteria of embarrassment in which Jesus willingly associates with—and even welcomes into his closest followers—those who have alienated themselves from their own people and become employed in a disreputable profession, and historical plausibility in which Levi/Matthew's being one of Jesus' closest followers is accounted for.

The final category includes two passages where there is some probability that the authentic Greek words of Jesus are recorded. (1) Jesus' conversation with the Samaritan woman is dependent upon wordplay in Greek over what constitutes "living water." The supporting criteria include embarrassment or movement against the redactional tendency in which Jesus is seen to be exhausted and in need of physical revitalization and he contacts a woman to help him in this, and historical plausibility in which the religious tensions of the times, Jesus' contact with non-Israelites and the antagonism of the Jewish leaders towards him are all established. (2) Jesus' conversation with the Samaritan lepers and in particular the healed leper who returns involves discussion of religious themes, but in the context of one who comes from a culture in which Greek had grown in increasing importance. The supporting criteria include double dissimilarity in which Jesus' contact with Samaritans is not a developed theme in early church preaching or a supported motif in Jewish thought, the criterion of embarrassment or movement against the redactional tendency in which Jesus' healing, though successful, only warrants the return of one grateful recipient and Jesus' resulting surprise, and historical plausibility in which this episode reflects the religious tensions of the time and Jesus' mission to those other than Israel.

---

<sup>49</sup> It is usually taken that Jesus is bested in his conversation with the Syrophenician woman, as in M. D. Hooker, The Gospel According to Saint Mark, BNTC (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991), 182. I am skeptical that this is the case, as Jesus instigates the challenge by characterizing the non-Jewish woman as a "dog." This invites her response in terms of placing herself as a "dog" in a lower position than the Jews, but yet still making a claim on help. Jesus seems to recognize that she has understood accurately his perspective on his ministry as coming first to his own people.

3.2. Greek Textual Variance<sup>50</sup>

The second criterion is that of Greek textual variance. This criterion recognizes that Greek-language based textual criticism of the words of Jesus has not played a significant role in historical Jesus research. There are instances where scholars note that there are textual variants in the Jesus tradition, but there have been very few attempts to analyze these variants as they reflect upon the authenticity of that Jesus tradition. Because the vast majority of historical Jesus scholars begin with the assumption that Jesus taught (virtually exclusively) in Aramaic, there is therefore not a significant need to analyze these textual variants to any extent with an eye on their influence on establishing the ipsissima verba Jesus, as they would at best simply reflect variation in the later tradition once it had already been translated into Greek. This formulation is clearly in conformity with the Aramaic or Semitic language hypothesis. However, the Aramaic hypothesis has recently been called into question for a number of reasons. One is that the criterion itself does not actually address the issue of whether the words are authentic to Jesus, as presumably this criterion is reliant upon the entire early church speaking Aramaic.<sup>51</sup> Therefore, all it can attempt to prove is that someone in the early church may have used Aramaic, but not necessarily Jesus. A second criticism is in terms of retroversion itself (as already noted above). Typically the Aramaic hypothesis has utilized the ease of retroversion as an indication of authenticity in

---

<sup>50</sup> See Porter, Criteria for Authenticity, 182–207.

<sup>51</sup> See Meier, Marginal Jew, 179.

Aramaic. The complexity of the translation process indicates that ease of retroversion, or the fact that retroversion can take place at all, has little to no bearing on the language of the original statement.<sup>52</sup> A third criticism relates to the lack of evidence for Jesus' or the early church's direct use of Aramaic. If Aramaic was the language of Jesus and his first followers, the transition to Greek occurred almost immediately, so that all of the early written evidence is in and supportive of Greek.<sup>53</sup> The Aramaic language hypothesis is called into further question by any evidence that Jesus may have used Greek.<sup>54</sup> Recent research has further supported the evidence for Jesus' use of Greek.

In the light of this the criterion of Greek textual variance and the Greek words of Jesus is appropriate to discuss. This criterion moves beyond the question of whether Jesus may on occasion have used Greek to try to establish what the words were that Jesus did use on such an occasion. This criterion uses the stability of the transmitted Greek textual tradition in a context in which Jesus plausibly used Greek to try to establish the words that Jesus not only may have used, but probably did use on the occasion. This criterion utilizes the traditional criterion of multiple traditions or attestation as a basis for proceeding. This criterion utilizes the evidence from two or more independent traditions, and the degree of variation within that tradition, as a means of establishing the stable core within that tradition. Thus the greater the variation in the tradition the further removed the current wording is from the original utterance, and the less the variation and the greater the stability the more likely that the tradition preserves tradition closer to the original source. It is axiomatic that the common source of two similar independent traditions is earlier than either of them, and has a reasonable and probable claim to authenticity. This criterion also assumes the standard criteria of textual criticism, although it often utilizes them in ways that differ from the ways that traditional criteria in Jesus research are used.<sup>55</sup> One of the major tendencies is to use the criteria in ways that move opposite of expectation. Several traditional criteria for authenticity tend to rely upon the notion of similarity (e.g. coherence, plausibility, multiple attestation). Textual criticism tends to rely upon the notion of variance. This difference in perspective must be taken into consideration when examining the textual evidence.

---

<sup>52</sup> See L. D. Hurst, "The Neglected Role of Semantics in the Search for the Aramaic Words of Jesus," JSNT 28 (1986): 63–80.

<sup>53</sup> Betz, "Wellhausen's Dictum," 1–31.

<sup>54</sup> Dalman, Jesus-Jeshua, 6, who recognizes such instances.

<sup>55</sup> See Shin, Textual Criticism, 135–220.

There are a number of advantages of utilization of this criterion. One of these is that it utilizes the text as we have received it in the tradition, that is, in Greek, rather than having to go back behind the Greek text to some posited (hypothetical) earlier Aramaic source. Another is that this criterion recognizes that, even if one asserts that the Aramaic tradition is predominant (though not exclusive), we have a critical mechanism by which we can attempt to establish the stable original tradition. A third advantage is that this criterion goes a long way toward minimizing the limitations of the criterion of multiple attestation or multiple traditions. Rather than simply attempting to analyze the ipsissima vox of Jesus, this criterion provides a means by which one can attempt to establish and analyze the ipsissima verba of Jesus. Historical Jesus research has long despaired of establishing the ipsissima verba of Jesus, and been content to speak in terms of the ipsissima vox. In many, perhaps most, cases, such priorities may continue. However, if a method can be devised by which the original words of Jesus may be captured—since in the recorded words of the New Testament Jesus is depicted as speaking—then it behooves scholars to undertake such an endeavor. This criterion is designed to aid in such a task by transforming the criterion of multiple attestation into a criterion of singular establishment, that is, the multiple sources are seen to indicate the established singular tradition that goes back to Jesus.

We begin with the passages from criterion one, Greek language and its context, in which it can be plausibly established that Jesus spoke Greek. This criterion must be established first before we can proceed to analyze the texts in question to see if any of them lead back to an earlier stage in the Greek tradition that might plausibly reflect the original words of Jesus. We noted above that there are eight such passages that have been established with varying degrees of reasonable probability. Furthermore, this criterion is dependent upon the criterion of multiple attestation, in which we rely upon two or more versions of the same wording to indicate through their similarity and variance the stable core of the tradition. This reduces the number of passages to four. I will treat them in order of rising certainty and significance.

3.2.1. Jesus' Conversation with the Syrophoenician or Canaanite Gentile Woman (Mark 7:25–30; Matt 15:21–28)

These two accounts only have two places where there is significant verbal parallelism. These two places include Jesus' parabolic words to the Syrophoenician woman, and her reply to him (Mark 7:27–28; Matt 15:26–27). Many scholars have recognized the independence of these two accounts on the basis of a number of variant features in the two pericopes (the location, Jesus' entering into the house of the woman, Jesus' incognito traveling, the disciples' role in Matthew's account, the Jewish features of Matthew's account), indicating to most scholars a Markan and Q account.<sup>56</sup> Within the parallel portions, there is one portion of Jesus' words that overlaps (Mark 7:27; Matt 15:26). Within this section of words, there are several slight variants regarding word order (e.g. ἔστιν καλὸν, βαλεῖν τοῖς κυναρίοις). As a result, I believe that it can be established that the following words were used by Jesus: οὐκ<sup>57</sup> ἔστιν καλὸν λαβεῖν τὸν ἄρτον τῶν τέκνων καὶ τοῖς κυναρίοις βαλεῖν (or βαλεῖν τοῖς κυναρίοις). Though parabolic, these words suit the context, and their invariable status within the tradition indicates authenticity.

3.2.2. Jesus' Conversation with the Pharisees and Herodians over the Roman Coin with Caesar's Head (Mark 12:13–17; Matt 22:16–22; Luke 20:20–26)

There is debate over whether there is multiple attestation of this episode, or whether Matthew and Luke have simply taken over the Markan account.<sup>58</sup> There are some variances in wording that may indicate that there are two independent traditions here (e.g. Matt 22:19a and Luke 20:24 agree against Mark 12:15). If so, there are three blocks of wording that overlap, although usually with only two of the sources agreeing at any given point: (1) Jesus' question of the Pharisees and Herodians, with Matt 22:18 and Mark 12:15 agreeing in Jesus' question, against Luke; (2) wording concerning the coin and inscription, with Mark 12:15 and Luke 20:24 referring to the coin as a Denarius, and Matt 22:19 using the general term νόμισμα; there being several terms for "take"; and Matt 22:20 and Mark 12:16 agreeing that Jesus asked a different question than does Luke 20:24; and (3) Jesus' pronouncement. It is only in this third block that all three gospels generally agree regarding what Jesus says, with only a few variations (connecting words, the article before Caesar, and word order). Taking these variants into account, the following is what Jesus probably pronounced on the occasion: ἀπόδοτε τὰ Καίσαρος Καίσαρι καὶ τὰ τοῦ θεοῦ τῷ θεῷ (with Mark reading: τὰ Καίσαρος ἀπόδοτε Καίσαρι καὶ τὰ τοῦ θεοῦ τῷ θεῷ).

<sup>56</sup> See W. E. Bundy, Jesus and the First Three Gospels: An Introduction to the Synoptic Tradition (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1955), 280–281.

<sup>57</sup> Mark 7:27 has γάρ.

<sup>58</sup> See Bundy, Jesus and the First Three Gospels, 440; F. W. Beare, The Earliest Records of Jesus (Oxford: Blackwell, 1964), 212.

3.2.3. Jesus' Conversation with his Disciples at Caesarea Philippi (Mark 8:27–30; Matt 16:13–20; Luke 9:18–21)

Even if one accepts Matthean priority for this passage, there are only two blocks of material where there is multiple attestation of two or more gospels (and none of it in the statement in Matt 16:17–19). The first block of material (Mark 8:27; Matt 16:13; Luke 9:18) has several textual variants, but the stable core tradition is clear: τίνα με λέγουσιν οἱ ἄνθρωποι ὄχλοι εἶναι; (Matthew has: τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου). The second block of material (Mark 8:29; Matt 16:15; Luke 9:20) agrees in wording: ὑμεῖς δὲ τίνα με λέγετε εἶναι;.

3.2.4. Jesus' Interrogation by Pilate (Mark 15:2–5; Matt 27:11–14; Luke 23:2–4; John 18:29–38)

Jesus' interrogation by Pilate contains two blocks of spoken material that have multiple attestation in all four traditions. A major question is whether this represents one, two or three independent traditions. There are indications that it represents at least two, if not three, separate traditions, including Mark and Matthew, John, and probably Luke.<sup>59</sup> The first block of material has no textual variants or variation in wording, and attests to the words of Pilate: σὺ εἶ ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν Ἰουδαίων;. The second block of material contains Jesus' answer, and it too has no textual variants or variations in the tradition: σὺ λέγεις. The significance of the words of Jesus is enhanced, when it is realized that these words are only found at these three places in the synoptic gospels, and do not represent a redactional tendency of any of the synoptic authors. In John's Gospel, the two words are found elsewhere, but only in questions, not in a statement as here.

In these four passages, I believe that we have found the words of Jesus in Greek (as well as the words of Pilate). They not only fulfill traditional criteria for authenticity, but they can be analyzed on text-critical grounds to establish a stable core tradition that indicates the ipsissima verba of Jesus.

3.3. Criterion of Greek Discourse Features<sup>60</sup>

The third and final criterion concerns Greek discourse features. This criterion perhaps departs the furthest from traditional criteria in that it introduces into exegetical analysis a method of Greek-language based discourse analysis (or textlinguistics). Discourse analysis is predicated upon the analysis of units larger than the clause. These units include not only clauses and groups of clauses (or clause complexes), but paragraphs and larger units, all the way up to the discourse itself.

<sup>59</sup> See Porter, Criteria for Authenticity, 204.

<sup>60</sup> See ibid., 210–237.

There are a number of possible ways to proceed in developing a discourse model for analyzing not only the Greek of the New Testament, but issues related to study of the historical Jesus, and more particularly the words of Jesus. In an ideal context, one will be able to provide a macro- and micro-level analysis of a given gospel, and then linguistically to compare, for example, the words of Jesus against the surrounding narrative, or the parables of Jesus against the other sayings of Jesus, from one gospel to another. The OpenText.org project (www.opentext.org) is attempting to make it possible to gather such data, but so far we simply do not have the resources available to do so. We are limited in the gathering and ability to analyze the data. We are only now developing the kinds of models that can function within the appropriate linguistic restraints on such data, such as the lack of native informants, and even sample sizes.

In the light of these limitations, I have developed the criterion of Greek discourse features in terms of what at first appears to be a much more modest project, but that is more rich with data than one can imagine. I have taken a model of systemic-functional grammar and extended it in terms of register analysis to create a linguistically sensitive and flexible discourse model, and then have applied it in the first instance to Mark 13:5–37, the single largest discourse within the gospel. I will summarize the results of my study in terms of the three register metafunctions.

3.3.1. Mode of Discourse and Textual Metafunction

The mode of discourse includes all of the features that go to making a discourse a discourse, including the medium and means by which the text is constituted as text. One of the major features of the textual metafunction is cohesion.

Cohesion is studied by means of a number of different linguistic features, including especially the use of conjunctions. In Mark's gospel, of the 88 sections in the Westcott-Hort edition, eighty of those units begin with the conjunction καί and six with δέ. According to Westcott-Hort, Mark 13:1 begins with καί, and Mark 14:1 begins with δέ. Mark apparently uses καί as a means of creating textual cohesion by linking and instigating successive units. These figures can be refined further. According to the Nestle-Aland text, καί begins a new section in 114 of 143 sub-sections of Mark's gospel (including Mark 13:1, 3). This is roughly 80% of all sub-sections in Mark's gospel. καί is used in only one of nine sub-sections, or 11%, in Mark 13:5–37. By contrast,  $\delta\acute{\epsilon}$  is used in five of the nine instances (56%), with asyndeton and  $\acute{\alpha}\lambda\lambda\acute{\alpha}$  used in the others.

Information flow is another feature of the mode of discourse. Information flow, though usually treated in terms of the ideational component of discourse, indicates some patterns of usage that exemplify how the author coheses a discourse. Mark's characteristic vocabulary, according to Hawkins, consists of 41 words (used a total of 357 times throughout the gospel), of which only four instances occur in Mark 13:5–37.<sup>61</sup> Mark's rate of use of his characteristic vocabulary is roughly 1:31 words used, whereas these characteristic words only occur in a ratio of 1:132 words used in Mark 13:5–37. Mark 13 apparently is not typical of Markan vocabulary.

3.3.2. Tenor of Discourse and Interpersonal Metafunction

The tenor of discourse addresses the interpersonal metafunction, that is, how the participants in the discourse are instantiated and linguistically related to each other. Participants can be introduced in terms of grammaticalized, reduced and implied forms, and related to each other and reality in terms of causality and attitude.

The directive force of the frame narrative in Mark's gospel just before the discourse of Mark 13 is from the disciples to Jesus (see Mark 13:1–4). Within the discourse, however, Jesus becomes the instigating and directive force, especially by means of use of the imperative form for commanding. The use of the imperative form illustrates the directional shift from the disciples to Jesus. In Mark 13:1–4, the disciples address Jesus with two commands, to which he replies merely with a question and a statement. Within the discourse itself, there is a larger number of imperatives than in any other chapter of Mark's gospel (19 in Mark 13:5–37). The ratio is 1:1.7 verses, with other chapters having ratios at least double that. The commanding language that is not typical of the rest of Mark's gospel results in Jesus being depicted as the one who instigates directive statements with regard to his followers.

3.3.3. Field of Discourse and Ideational Metafunction

The field of discourse focuses upon the ideational metafunction, or what a discourse is about in terms of the information that it conveys. There are a number of means of analysis of the ideational component, including the subject matter and transitivity, or how the grammatical structure configures the ideational component.

---

<sup>61</sup> J. C. Hawkins, Horae Synopticae: Contributions to the Study of the Synoptic Problem, 2nd ed. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1909), 10–15.

There are two linguistic features to discuss here. The first is transitivity, akin to Markan syntax. The transitivity patterns in Mark 13 are significantly different from those found in the rest of the Gospel. An analysis of Markan syntax identifies fourteen syntactical features that distinguish Markan syntax. Mark 13:5–37 only has three of these features used in five instances. These include the use of parenthetical clauses (Mark 13:10, 14b), use of “I say that...” in two instances (Mark 13:6, 30), and explanatory “for” (Mark 13:11b).

In terms of subject matter, it has been noted previously that the vocabulary of Mark 13 has a number of identifiable patterns of usage that distinguish it from the vocabulary of the rest of the gospel. For example, Perrin has noted that there are 165 words in the Nestle text of Mark 13:5–37, but that 35 (21.2%) do not appear elsewhere in the gospel; fifteen of these words do appear in the book of Revelation.<sup>62</sup> This and other studies tend to show that the discourse of Mark 13 has a unique, apocalyptic vocabulary that is distinct from the rest of the gospel. Some of Perrin’s findings have been called into question by drawing parallels to Mark 4,<sup>63</sup> but the result is that these findings show that Mark 13 and Mark 4, the second longest discourse in the gospel, have lexical items and hence subject matter in common.

A fuller treatment of these features could go into more detail regarding various features of register found in Mark 13 in relation to the rest of Mark’s gospel. This summary suffices, however, to show how various linguistic features can be used to establish the discourse integrity of a block of language. All of the major factors indicate that Mark 13:5–27 has distinguishing features of textual coherence and information flow, directive language used in higher proportion, and distinctly apocalyptic language that unites the discourse together. This does not necessarily establish that the discourse is authentic to Jesus. However, in a context in which Jesus could have used Greek to deliver a discourse, the concatenation of distinct linguistic features at the least indicates a unified discourse distinct from the surrounding gospel context, and possibly originating with Jesus.

<sup>62</sup> N. Perrin, The Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus (London: SCM, 1963), 131.

<sup>63</sup> E.g., K. D. Dyer, The Prophecy on the Mount: Mark 13 and the Gathering of the New Community (Bern: Peter Lang, 1998), 75–77.

4. Application of the Greek Language Criteria

In this final major section, I wish to turn to a section of text that has not been studied in great detail using the Greek language criteria: the so-called Sermon on the Mount. The sermon must be considered both in terms of its content itself (Matt 5:3–7:27) and the introductory words of Matt 4:25 (cf. also Luke 6:17), which set the stage for the discourse.

4.1. Criterion of Greek Language and its Context

I begin with application of the first criterion, to establish if there are participants, a linguistic context and thematic material that would suggest the use of Greek by Jesus.

4.1.1. Participants and Context

In Matt 4:25, Matthew states that large crowds followed Jesus from a number of different places. These include: Galilee, the Decapolis, Jerusalem, Judea and beyond the Jordan. Luke 6:17 adds the region of Tyre and Sidon to this list. There appears to be a Markan parallel in 3:7–13, in which a crowd from similar places (Mark includes Idumea) gathers around Jesus. In Matthew and Luke, with the crowd gathered, Jesus then proceeds to speak, in Matthew the entire sermon, and in Luke the beatitudes. Mark has Jesus go to a mountain where he appoints his disciples. This may be a parallel, but it may also indicate that there were other occasions when a mixed crowd gathered around Jesus. As there are no further words of Jesus that follow from the Markan passage, I will concentrate upon Matthew with reference to Luke.

In Matthew, when Jesus saw the crowd that was composed of these people, he sat down and began to teach. It is ambiguous whether he was teaching his disciples or the crowd, but the proximity of the huge crowd seems to indicate that he was teaching both. The nature of this context demands that we examine this passage in terms of the possible languages of the participants.

The first factor to note is that those who gathered were from a number of different places, with different linguistic backgrounds. (1) Jerusalem, though traditionally the principal city and the heart of Judaism, was a metropolis with a population of 10–15 or 20% Jews, according to Hengel's estimate (see above), whose primary or first language was Greek. We know from a range of inscriptional and documentary evidence—such as the Theodotus inscription, the temple inscription, etc.<sup>64</sup>—literary evidence—such as that of Josephus from his account of the first Jewish War—and New Testament evidence—Acts 6:1 refers to Hellenistic Jews, probably distinguishing them on the basis of language<sup>65</sup>—that there was significant usage of Greek even in Jerusalem.<sup>66</sup> Although Aramaic would have been used, perhaps as the Semitic or Jewish language (see Acts 21:40, where, though recognizably knowing Greek, Paul chooses to use Aramaic), there were many other languages used. Pentecost, for example, drew people together in Jerusalem from Jewish communities throughout the Mediterranean, including natives from Parthia, Medea, Elam, Mesopotamia, Cappadocia, Pontus, Asia, Phrygia, Pamphylia, Egypt, Libya including Cyrene, Rome, Crete and Arabia, perhaps among others (Acts 2:9–11). The only language that could have unified such a crowd gathered in Jerusalem at that time was Greek.<sup>67</sup> (2) Judea was clearly multilingual, especially if Judea was defined as it was in Roman times as a province including Samaria. There is widespread and extended evidence of the influence of Greek upon Judea, even though Aramaic would have been widespread as well. There is epigraphic and documentary evidence, literary evidence, and biblical evidence (including it being the place of writing of apocryphal and pseudepigraphal works) of the widespread use of Greek in Judea.<sup>68</sup> (3) The Decapolis was a loose confederation of ten cities founded on Greek principles and maintaining Greek traditions and practices, including the use of Greek.<sup>69</sup> (4) Galilee has come under recent scrutiny in terms of how much Jewish culture permeated Galilee or was displaced by Hellenism.<sup>70</sup> To some extent these determinations do not affect the

<sup>64</sup> Roughly 40% of all inscriptions found in Jerusalem are in Greek, and half of all epitaphs. See Porter, Studies in the Greek New Testament, 158; Criteria for Authenticity, 172, esp. citing P. W. van der Horst, Ancient Jewish Epitaphs: An Introductory Survey of a Millennium of Jewish Funerary Epigraphy (300 BCE–700 CE) (Kampen: Kok Pharos, 1991), 22–24.

<sup>65</sup> See Porter, Studies in the Greek New Testament, 149 n. 34.

<sup>66</sup> See Taylor, Groundwork of the Gospels, 98–99; Porter, Criteria for Authenticity, 169–171, 176–178; idem, “Reading the Gospels,” 47 n. 59.

<sup>67</sup> So Taylor and Smith, Groundwork of the Gospels, 94; V. Tcherikover, Hellenistic Civilization and the Jews, trans. S. Applebaum (1959; repr., New York: Atheneum, 1975), 347; Porter, Criteria for Authenticity, 138 n. 28.

<sup>68</sup> Idem, Studies in the Greek New Testament, 148–160; “Jesus and the Use,” 134–147; “Luke 17.11–19,” 213–218; summarized in Idem, Criteria for Authenticity, 140–141, 169–174.

<sup>69</sup> See Idem, Studies in the Greek New Testament, 149–150.

<sup>70</sup> See M. A. Chancey, Greco-Roman Culture and the Galilee of Jesus, SNTSMS 134 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2005), 122–165. However, Chancey raises more questions than he provides answers or evidence. He does show a trajectory of development of Greek, but very little evidence for Aramaic in comparison, and rejects use of sociolinguistics. His discussion tends to be disjunctive, rather than recognizing levels of multilingual competence.

issue of the use of Greek in Galilee, because the use of Greek is not directly or only dependent upon high levels of Hellenization. The use of Greek was a linguistic phenomenon of Jewish life—e.g. the one language that could unite those at Pentecost was Greek, Greek was widespread in Egypt and resulted in production of the Septuagint—including Galilee, as is evidenced through a range of epigraphic and documentary, literary and biblical evidence. (5) The region beyond the Jordan perhaps refers to what was then known as Arabia or even Nabatea. Though Nabatean was used by the native inhabitants of Nabatea, there was also widespread use of Greek since the early first century when the area came under the domination of Rome.<sup>71</sup> The Babatha archive illustrates that a woman had to do her business in Greek through the Roman legal process in the late first century (before Nabatea became a Roman province in 106 CE) to guarantee that her property was protected.<sup>72</sup> (6) Tyre and Sidon had been Hellenized since the third century BCE, so that there was no more use of indigenous languages in the region, and Greek had become the language of administration and commercial communication.<sup>73</sup>

This quick overview of these various places indicates that Greek would have been the only language that could have linked people from these areas together. If we assume that they were able to understand what Jesus spoke, the only language that he could have spoken to be understood by all of them would have been Greek. Aramaic would have excluded people from Tyre and Sidon, probably those from the Decapolis and the other side of the Jordan, quite possibly those from Galilee and Judea, and even some perhaps from Jerusalem.

In terms of the participants involved, there is some reason to think that the mixed crowd that gathered around Jesus and heard the Sermon on the Mount heard the sermon in Greek.

4.1.2. Linguistic Context and the Theme of the Discussion

There is the further consideration of the linguistic context and theme of the sermon. This is not the place to undertake a thorough examination of all of the dimensions of the sermon to establish those portions that

---

<sup>71</sup> See G. W. Bowersock, Roman Arabia (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1983), 28–58.

<sup>72</sup> See S. E. Porter, “The Greek Papyri of the Judaean Desert and the World of the Roman East,” in The Scrolls and the Scriptures: Qumran Fifty Years After, ed. S. E. Porter and C. A. Evans, JSPSup 26 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997), 293–316, esp. 313.

<sup>73</sup> See A. H. M. Jones, Cities of the Eastern Roman Provinces (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1998), 227–295.

reflect a Greek linguistic context, and possibly Greek themes. However, there are several features to note that merit further attention.

1. Use of the Old Testament. Jesus is recorded as using the Old Testament in a number of places in the Sermon on the Mount, including Matt 5:21, 27, 31, 33, 38 and 43. According to Gundry, all of these reflect the Septuagint, except the quotation in Matt 5:31, which is a mix of Septuagintal and non-Septuagintal features.<sup>74</sup> The logic is usually that the author of Matthew's gospel placed the Septuagint citations into Jesus' mouth. There are two considerations that argue for further consideration of this assertion. The first is that what is being indicated by Gundry's analysis is that there is a determinable difference between the Septuagint and other versions of the text used (in particular the Masoretic text). Rather than Jesus simply being seen to cite the Septuagint on occasion, he does so consistently and throughout the sermon. This indicates that the use of the Septuagint is integral to the larger context of the sermon, and that a redactor could not simply hope to place the Septuagintal version into the sermon at all of these points without affecting the meaning of the sermon. The second consideration is that it is not beyond belief, and in fact is the simpler and more elegant explanation, to posit that Jesus—like other Jews of the time, who knew Greek and used the Septuagint, such as Paul—used the Septuagint version and quoted the Greek version when he gave his sermon in Greek.

2. Macarisms. The macarisms at the beginning of the sermon (Matt 5:3–11) work much better in Greek than they do in Aramaic. These appear to have been originally constructed and delivered, and then written, in Greek on the basis of a number of linguistic features. These features include the choice of lexis, the parallelism with the articular participles, alliterative use of initial /p/ for the subject of the macarism,<sup>75</sup> and the parallel causal clauses. There is also a Greek and Roman literary tradition of this type of macarism.

3. Lord's Prayer. The Lord's prayer (Matt 6:9–13) has a number of features that indicate that it was formulated and delivered, and then written, in Greek. These features include the syntax, in which there is a shift from Predicator–Subject structure in the first three primary clauses, to Complement–Predicator–Adjunct structure in v. 11 before returning to Predicator–Complement/Adjunct structure in the final two primary clauses. This places v. 11 as the turning point of the prayer, from focus in the first half upon adulation of God to imploring God for provision. A second feature is some of the alliteration, including the play on the sounds of words for “debt” and “forgive” in v. 12.

<sup>74</sup> R. H. Gundry, The Use of the Old Testament in St. Matthew's Gospel with Special Reference to the Messianic Hope, NovTSup 18 (Leiden: Brill, 1975), 149; cf. also D. S. New, Old Testament Quotations in the Synoptic Gospels, and the Two-Document Hypothesis, SCS 37 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1993), 94–98.

<sup>75</sup> See J. Kloppenborg, Excavating Q: The History and Setting of the Sayings Gospel (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 2000), 106. Kloppenborg notes an attempt to defend the alliterative features of the supposed earlier Aramaic, but these attempts are forced (106 n. 106 by Michaelis).

4. Use of the Word Gehenna. Roberts makes the point that the fact that Gehenna remains in the Greek form of the sermon indicates that it was originally delivered in Greek. Following the line of thought of Lytton, Roberts notes that Gehenna indicated a terminal punishment for the wicked, rather than an interminable punishment as indicated by the word “hell.” Lytton, according to Roberts, argues strongly for not confusing the two, and appeals to the fact that Jesus himself provided the example as to how to use these words. Roberts believes that this indicates that the original Sermon on the Mount was delivered in Greek, as indicated by the fact that Gehenna is retained in Matt 5:22, 29, 30, rather than translated into a Greek equivalent (for which there was none), as it would have been along with all of the other Aramaic phrasing if originally delivered in Aramaic.<sup>76</sup>

4.1.3. Determination of the Words of Jesus

One of the major objections to the proposal above—besides the fact that there is an inherent presumption against wanting to consider whether Jesus delivered the sermon in Greek—is the widespread belief that the sermon was not delivered on a single occasion but that it is a composite of a number of statements redacted by the author of the gospel, perhaps compiled from Q or perhaps found in another form.<sup>77</sup> Not all have accepted this theory,<sup>78</sup> however, and perhaps some of the linguistic considerations will enable scholars to take another look at such a discourse with another linguistic framework governing analysis. On the basis of the criteria above, I would say that it is probable that Jesus spoke at least part of the Sermon on the Mount in Greek (see below).

<sup>76</sup> Roberts, Greek, 104–111.

<sup>77</sup> See, e.g., Kloppenborg, Excavating Q, 90; C. M. Tuckett, Q and the History of Early Christianity: Studies on Q (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1996), 36–37.

<sup>78</sup> There is a long tradition of seeing the Sermon on the Mount as a unified and singular document, perhaps delivered by Jesus. See, e.g., C. W. Votaw, “Sermon on the Mount,” in Dictionary of the Bible: Extra Volume, ed. J. Hastings (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1906), 1–45, esp. 1–9; among recent interpreters, J. Lambrecht, The Sermon on the Mount: Proclamation and Exhortation (Wilmington, DE: Glazier, 1985), 39–40; cf. H. D. Betz, Essays on the Sermon on the Mount (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985), 1, 18, who argues for a pre-Matthean composition.

4.2. Criterion of Greek Textual Variance

This criterion is dependent upon multiple attestation. There is sufficient recognition by scholars that there are two bodies of material at play in the Sermon on the Mount and the parallel Lukan material—whether one believes that the Matthean version is composite or not—to perform an elementary analysis of Greek textual variance.

I do not present all of the textual variants, but produce what I think appears to be the stable core of the sermonic material, as found in relation to Matthew's Gospel, with some appropriate textual notes.

Matthew 5:3 μακάριοι οἱ πτωχοὶ ὅτι αὐτῶν [ὑμετέρα] ἐστὶν ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ.<sup>79</sup>

6 μακάριοι οἱ πεινῶντες ὅτι χορτασθήσονται.

11 μακάριοί ἐστε ὅταν ὀνειδίσωσιν ὑμᾶς.<sup>80</sup>

12 χαίrete, ὁ μισθὸς ὑμῶν πολλὸς ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς.<sup>81</sup> followed by a word about prophets.

13 A statement about salt

14–16 A statement about light

17–20 A statement about the law and the prophets

21–26 A statement on judging

27–32 A statement on adultery and divorce

32 πᾶς ὁ ἀπολύων τὴν γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ . . . ποιεῖ αὐτὴν μοιχευθῆναι, followed by a statement regarding remarriage and adultery

38–42 A statement on retaliation

44 ἐγὼ δὲ λέγω ὑμῖν,<sup>82</sup> ἀγαπάτε τοὺς ἐχθροὺς ὑμῶν καὶ προσεύχεσθε for those who are opposed,

46 ἐὰν γὰρ ἀγαπήσητε<sup>83</sup> τοὺς ἀγαπῶντας ὑμᾶς, τίνα μισθὸν ἔχετε;<sup>84</sup> followed by a statement on greeting/loving.

6:9 προσεύχεσθε· πάτερ, ἁγιασθήτω τὸ ὄνομά σου, 10 ἐλθέτω ἡ βασιλεία σου. 11 τὸν ἄρτον ἡμῶν τὸν ἐπιούσιον δός<sup>85</sup> ἡμῖν σήμερον· 12 καὶ ἄφες ἡμῖν τὰ ὀφειλήματα<sup>86</sup> ἡμῶν, ὡς καὶ ἡμεῖς ἀφήκαμεν τοῖς ὀφειλέταις ἡμῶν.<sup>87</sup> 13 καὶ μὴ εἰσενέγκῃς ἡμᾶς εἰς πειρασμόν,

19–21 A statement on treasures

<sup>79</sup> There is a variant over whether the kingdom is “of heaven” or “of God.” Matthew uses “heaven,” but God is probably original.

<sup>80</sup> There is a variant regarding word order with the pronoun.

<sup>81</sup> There is a variant concerning the use of the singular or plural for “heaven/s.”

<sup>82</sup> There are variants regarding the conjunction and the word order of the object.

<sup>83</sup> Here an aorist subjunctive, but in Luke 6:27 a present imperative.

<sup>84</sup> Luke uses different wording for the same notion.

<sup>85</sup> Luke uses the present imperative. See Porter, Verbal Aspect, 347–350.

<sup>86</sup> Luke uses the word for “sins.”

<sup>87</sup> Luke uses the word for “sins,” as well as changed word order.

22 ὁ λύχνος τοῦ σώματος ἐστὶν ὁ ὀφθαλμός. ἐὰν (οἱ ὅταν) οὖν ᾗ ὁ ὀφθαλμός σου ἀπλοῦς,<sup>88</sup> ὅλον τὸ σῶμά σου φωτεινὸν ἔσται· 23 ἐὰν (οἱ ἐπὶ) δὲ πονηρὸς ᾗ, τὸ σῶμά σου σκοτεινὸν. τὸ φῶς τὸ ἐν σοὶ σκότος ἐστίν...

24 οὐδεὶς δυσὶ κυρίοις δουλεύει· ἢ γὰρ τὸν ἓνα μισήσει καὶ τὸν ἕτερον ἀγαπήσει, ἢ ἐνὸς ἀνθέξεται καὶ τοῦ ἑτέρου καταφρονήσει· οὐ δύνασθε θεῷ δουλεύειν καὶ μαμωνᾷ.

25 διὰ τοῦτο λέγω ὑμῖν, μὴ μεριμνᾶτε τῇ ψυχῇ τί φάγητε, μηδὲ τῷ σώματι ὑμῶν τί ἐνδύσησθε· ἡ<sup>89</sup> ψυχὴ πλεῖον ἐστὶν τῆς τροφῆς καὶ τὸ σῶμα τοῦ ἐνδύματος; 26 Statement about birds ὅτι οὐ σπεύρουσιν οὐδὲ θερίζουσιν... καὶ θεὸς<sup>90</sup> τρέφει αὐτά/αὐτούς· οὐχ<sup>91</sup> ὑμεῖς μᾶλλον διαφέρετε αὐτῶν/τῶν πετεινῶν; 27 τίς δὲ ἐξ ὑμῶν μεριμνῶν δύναται προσθεῖναι ἐπὶ τὴν ἡλικίαν αὐτοῦ πῆχυν;<sup>92</sup> 28 περὶ ἐνδύματος/τῶν λοιπῶν τί μεριμνᾶτε;<sup>93</sup> Statement on lilies. 29 λέγω δὲ ὑμῖν οὐδὲ Σολομῶν ἐν πάσῃ τῇ δόξῃ αὐτοῦ περιεβάλετο ὡς ἐν τούτων. 30 εἰ δὲ τὸν χόρτον τοῦ ἀγροῦ σήμερον ὄντα<sup>94</sup> καὶ αὐριον εἰς κλίβανον βαλλόμενον ὁ θεὸς οὕτως ἀμφιέννυσιν, πολλῶ/πόσῳ μᾶλλον ὑμᾶς, ὀλιγόπιστοι; 31 Statements on not troubling over eating, drinking or clothing. 32 πάντα γὰρ ταῦτα<sup>95</sup> τὰ ἔθνη ἐπιζητοῦσιν· οἶδεν γὰρ ὁ πατὴρ ὑμῶν<sup>96</sup> ὅτι ζητεῖτε τούτων. 33 ζητεῖτε τὴν βασιλείαν καὶ ταῦτα προστεθήσεται ὑμῖν.

7:1 μὴ κρίνετε, ἴνα (οἱ οὐ) μὴ κριθῆτε· 2... ἐν ᾧ μέτρῳ μετρεῖτε (ἀντι)μετρηθήσεται ὑμῖν. 3 τί δὲ βλέπετε τὸ κάρφος τὸ ἐν τῷ ὀφθαλμῷ τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ σου, τὴν δὲ ἐν τῷ... ὀφθαλμῷ δοκόν<sup>97</sup> οὐ κατανοεῖς; 4 πῶς ἐρεῖς/δύνασαι λέγειν τῷ ἀδελφῷ σου, ἄφες ἐκβάλλω τὸ κάρφος σου...; 5 ὑποκριτά, ἔκβαλε πρῶτον τὴν δοκὸν ἐκ τοῦ ὀφθαλμοῦ σου, καὶ τότε διαβλέψεις ἐκβαλεῖν τὸ κάρφος ἐκ τοῦ ὀφθαλμοῦ τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ σου.<sup>98</sup>

7 αἰτεῖτε, καὶ δοθήσεται ὑμῖν· ζητεῖτε, καὶ εὕρησεται· κρούετε, καὶ ἀνοιγήσεται ὑμῖν. 8 πᾶς γὰρ ὁ αἰτῶν λαμβάνει καὶ ὁ ζητῶν εὕρισκει καὶ τῷ κρούοντι ἀνοιγήσεται. 9–10 Asking and receiving. 11 εἰ οὖν ὑμεῖς πονηροὶ ὄντες οἴδατε δόματα ἀγαθὰ διδόναι τοῖς τέκνοις ὑμῶν, πόσῳ μᾶλλον ὁ πατὴρ ὑμῶν ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς<sup>99</sup> δώσει ἀγαθὰ<sup>100</sup> τοῖς αἰτουῦσιν αὐτόν.

<sup>88</sup> There is a difference in word order in Luke.

<sup>89</sup> Luke has the conjunction γὰρ, while Matthew has the negative particle (with a question) οὐχί.

<sup>90</sup> Matthew has ὁ πατὴρ ὑμῶν ὁ οὐράνιος.

<sup>91</sup> Luke has πόσῳ and a slight change of word order.

<sup>92</sup> Luke has a slight change of word order.

<sup>93</sup> Luke has a slight change of word order.

<sup>94</sup> There is variation in word order in this phrase, but the same lexical elements, with slight adjustments.

<sup>95</sup> Luke has a change of word order.

<sup>96</sup> Luke has a slight change of word order.

<sup>97</sup> Luke has a slight change of word order.

<sup>98</sup> Luke has several changes of word order in these clauses.

<sup>99</sup> Luke has the singular “from heaven.”

<sup>100</sup> Luke has “holy spirit.”

- 12... θέλητε ἵνα ποιῶσιν ὑμῖν οἱ ἄνθρωποι, ποιεῖτε αὐτοῖς·
 13 Entering through the narrow gate.
 24–27 Hearing and doing

This brief analysis of the Sermon on the Mount illustrates that there are at least two levels of core tradition related to the sermon. There are those passages where Matthew and Luke have substantially the same wording, with only minor lexical or syntactical variation, that indicates a core stable tradition. There are also a number of places where the wording might be substantially different (although in many of these instances there are a few similar lexical key items) but the topics are the same, and developed in similar ways.

4.3. Criterion of Greek Discourse Features

As a final deliberative and demonstrable exercise, I wish to present a brief analysis of some key discourse features of Matt 5:3–27.<sup>101</sup>

4.3.1. Mode of Discourse or Textual Metafunction

There are two dimensions to consider in examining the mode of discourse in Matthew's gospel in relation to Matt 5:3–27.

1. Cohesion. Textual cohesion is established through a number of means, one of the primary ones being the use of clausal-level conjunctions. Matthew's Gospel uses a range of means to create cohesion. In the Nestle-Aland text, the conjunctions include these six as the most widely used: δέ (69x), καί (51x), asyndeton (38x), τότε (31x), οὖν (6x), and γάρ (4x). By contrast (and not included in the numbers above), the most frequent conjunctions for Matt 5:3–27 are: asyndeton (19x), δέ (4x), γάρ and οὖν (2x each), and καί (1x). Thus cohesion within the sermon is created primarily on the basis of the use of asyndeton, which accounts for two-thirds of the conjunctive relations. This stands out in comparison to the rest of the Gospel, where asyndeton is less than one in five of the instances.<sup>102</sup>

2. Information flow. Hawkins has isolated the distinctive words and phrases that are characteristic of Matthew's gospel.<sup>103</sup> Of those, he notes fourteen that merit special attention as the most distinctive and important. These words are underrepresented in the sermon. However, these words are often more highly represented in Matthew 1–2, material that is typically thought to originate with the author of the gospel. The statistics for the fourteen words are as follows:

<sup>101</sup> On the register metafunctions, see Porter, Criteria for Authenticity, 215–218, with bibliography.

<sup>102</sup> On conjunctions in Matthew, see S. L. Black, Sentence Conjunctions in the Gospel of Matthew, JSNTSup 216 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002).

<sup>103</sup> Hawkins, Horae Synopticae, 4–8.

ἀναχωρέω—this word appears ten times, four times in Matthew 1–2, but only one time in the Sermon on the Mount at Matt 7:23.

βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν—this phrase appears thirty-two times in Matthew's gospel, no times in Matthew 1–2, but five times in the Sermon on the Mount at Matt 5:3, 10, 19, 20; 7:21.

ἰδοῦ after a genitive absolute—this construction occurs eleven times in the gospel, and four times in Matthew 1–2, but no times in the sermon.

λεγόμενος with names—this construction occurs thirteen times in the gospel, and twice in Matthew 1–2, but no times in the sermon.

πατήρ with a following genitive pronoun—this construction occurs twenty times in the gospel (no times in Matthew 1–2), and sixteen of those are in the sermon at Matt 5:16, 45, 48; 6:1, 4, 6 (twice), 8, 9, 14, 15, 18 (twice), 26, 32; 7:11.

πατήρ ὁ ἐν (τοῖς) οὐρανοῖς—this construction appears thirteen times in the gospel (no times in Matthew 1–2), and six times in the sermon at Matt 5:16, 45; 6:1, 9; 7:11, 21.

πατήρ ὁ οὐράνιος—this construction appears seven times in the gospel (no times in Matthew 1–2), and four times in the sermon at Matt 5:48; 6:14, 26, 32.

πληρώω used of Scripture—this verbal construction occurs twelve times in the gospel, and four times in Matthew 1–2, but only one time in the sermon at Matt 5:17.

προσέρχομαι—this verb occurs fifty-two times in the gospel (no times in Matthew 1–2), and no times in the sermon.

ῥηθέν—this verbal form occurs thirteen times in the gospel and four times in Matthew 1–2, but no times in the sermon.

τί σοι/ὑμῖν δοκεῖ—this phrase occurs six times in the gospel (no times in Matthew 1–2), but no times in the sermon.

τότε—this word is used ninety times in the gospel, and three times in Matthew 1–2, but only three times in the sermon at Matt 5:24; 7:5, 23.

ὑποκριτής—this word is used thirteen times in the gospel (no times in Matthew 1–2), but no times in the sermon.

ὡσπερ—this word is used ten times in the gospel (no times in Matthew 1–2), but no times in the sermon.

The pattern that we see here is that information flow of the gospel is carried forward by particular vocabulary. This vocabulary is noticeably absent in the Sermon on the Mount, except for terms regarding God as father. In fact, the usage of God as father in the sermon is what constitutes this language in Hawkins' calculation as distinctively Matthean vocabulary. If these terms were not counted in the sermon, they would not qualify as distinctive vocabulary.

4.3.2. Tenor of Discourse or Interpersonal Metafunction

The tenor of the discourse is structured around the shift in person. Lambrecht has provided an outline of the sermon.<sup>104</sup> He notes that the introduction or prologue consists of Matt 5:3–16, the middle part (or body, although he does not use this term) of Matt 5:17–7:12, and the conclusion or epilogue of Matt 7:13–27. The sermon maintains a consistent use of person in each of these sections. The introduction is in the third person plural from 5:3–10, with the macarisms, until the final one is addressed to “you” plural. The introduction of the second person plural at the end of the list of macarisms is an implied reference. However, in Matt 5:13 the you is grammaticalized in a reduced (pronominal) form. The “you” is never explicated further within the sermon, ostensibly because it relies upon the audience established in Matt 4:25 (cf. Luke 16:7). The entire body of the sermon is in the second person (usually) plural, in so far as Jesus as speaker addresses his words to a “you” audience (e.g. Matt 5:20; 6:25), the main verb of a new paragraph is in the second person plural (passim), or an Old Testament quotation is introduced with ἐπέθη. The only exceptions are at Matt 6:22, 24. In the first, the gnomic statement is made first, but then it is applied in the second clause to “you” singular. In the second instance, a series of general statements is made, before the concluding statement in the second person plural (“you are not able...”). The conclusion begins in the second person plural (Matt 7:13, 15), but then shifts to the third person singular (Matt 7:21, 24).

4.3.3. Field of Discourse or Ideational Metafunction

The ideational component is often related to choice of vocabulary and transitivity. I wish here to include several other factors for consideration.

1. Quotations from the Old Testament. Quotations from the Old Testament are an important part of the ideational content of Matthew’s gospel, as they are seen to be providing support from scripture for the events unfolding in the gospel account.<sup>105</sup> However, there are also ways that the quotations are presented, and the nature of the quotations themselves, that indicate that the function of the Old Testament quotations may vary, and that may point to unique use within the

<sup>104</sup> Lambrecht, Sermon on the Mount, 28.

<sup>105</sup> See Gundry, Use of the Old Testament, 193–204.

Sermon on the Mount. Hawkins notes that there are a number of quotations of the Old Testament that are ostensibly introduced by the gospel's author or editor (see Matt 1:23; 2:15, 18, 23; 4:15, 16; 8:17; 12:18–21; 13:35; 21:5; 27:9–10). Hawkins notes that these quotations do not agree as closely with the text of the Septuagint as do other quotations introduced elsewhere in the Matthean narrative.<sup>106</sup> However, the quotations within the Sermon on the Mount have two peculiarities. The first is that all of the quotations in the Sermon on the Mount are introduced by the word ἐπέθη (Matt 5:21, 27, 31, 33, 38, 43).<sup>107</sup> The second is (as noted above) that these quotations do conform closely to the Septuagint for the most part.

2. Matthean forms of expression (syntax). Transitivity is part of the ideational metafunction. Hawkins notes that there are a number of distinctly Matthean phrases that are used by the author. He notes fourteen that are peculiar to Matthew's gospel, and not found in the other synoptics. Of the fourteen examples that he cites (totaling thirty-one instances), only one of them is found one time (so one instance) in the Sermon on the Mount. At Matt 5:17, the phrase μὴ νομίσητε ὅτι is found (cf. Matt 10:34, its only other occurrence in Matthew's gospel).<sup>108</sup> On the basis of this, one can see a unique syntax in the Sermon on the Mount that does not rely upon peculiarly Matthean formulaic phrasing. However, Hawkins goes on to note a number of other features as well. Besides these unique or peculiar formulas, he notes instances where a form of expression is found in both Matthew and one of the other synoptic gospels, but also in Matthew in another context. These forms of expression apparently illustrate both that the author of Matthew's gospel was cognizant of the synoptic tradition, but also that he was able to use it elsewhere within his gospel, thereby enhancing its synoptic content by means of uses of these forms of expression. Hawkins notes nineteen such forms of expression in Matthew's gospel, with a total of fifty-two instances in all.<sup>109</sup> None of the examples that he cites is found in the Sermon on the Mount. Lastly, Hawkins notes forms of expression that he claims are placed in different places by Matthew and the other gospel writers. In relation to Matthew and Mark's gospels, Hawkins cites four examples, none of which occur in the Sermon on the Mount. In relation

---

<sup>106</sup> Hawkins, Horae Synopticae, 154.

<sup>107</sup> Ibid., 155.

<sup>108</sup> Ibid., 168–169.

<sup>109</sup> Ibid., 170–171.

to Matthew, Mark and Luke's gospels, Hawkins cites two examples, neither of which occurs in the Sermon on the Mount.<sup>110</sup>

These several studies provide preliminary results regarding the textual, interpersonal and ideational metafunctions of the Sermon on the Mount in relation to Matthew's gospel. There are a number of indications of textual unity of the Sermon, and identifiable features that distinguish it from the rest of the narrative of Matthew's gospel. One plausible explanation of this distinct unity within the diversity of the gospel is that the Sermon originated earlier, possibly as an entire discourse, and, within a context of Greek language usage, given by Jesus.

5. Conclusion

This paper attempts to outline criteria for Greek language research into the authenticity of sayings of the historical Jesus. The history of discussion of the language of Jesus goes back to the earliest times of discussion of the historical Jesus, in so far as modern critical thought is concerned. During that time, there have been changing fortunes for thought regarding the language of Jesus. In recent times, Greek language criteria have been widely neglected. In recent work I have attempted to rejuvenate such criteria by introducing three criteria that hold out promise. These criteria attempt to establish a linguistic environment in which Jesus may have been presumed to use Greek in his communication. Once this assumption is reached, then further examination of key passages can be made to establish the words that may have been spoken on such an occasion. Furthermore, it is possible to use various discourse-based criteria to attempt to establish the coherent nature of a given discourse. For the most part this paper has reviewed and further refined previous research. However, further use of these criteria suggests that there are other New Testament passages that merit examination by means of these Greek language criteria. Such a preliminary attempt has been made here regarding the Sermon on the Mount. In any case, this paper constitutes an effort to re-introduce Greek language criteria into historical Jesus research by demonstrating both method and results.

---

<sup>110</sup> Hawkins, Horae Synopticae, 172–173.

FROM THE MESSIANIC TEACHER TO THE GOSPELS OF JESUS CHRIST

RAINER RIESNER

“Jesus habebat scholam ambulantiem”
(J.A. Bengel, Gnomon to Matt 8:23)

1. The Present: The “Third Quest” for the Historical Jesus

Since the 1980's scholars started speaking of the “Third Quest” for the Historical Jesus.<sup>1</sup> This quest was to be distinct from the liberal Leben-Jesu-Forschung and also from the form-critical approaches, particularly those connected with the names of R. Bultmann<sup>2</sup> and M. Dibelius.<sup>3</sup> The characteristics of the new approach would be fourfold: to take into serious consideration (1) the Jewish context, (2) the social history, (3) the extra-canonical traditions, and (4) a downplaying of christological preconceptions.<sup>4</sup> The following approach to the synoptic tradition was first published as a doctoral thesis at the University of Tübingen in 1981 with the title Jesus als Lehrer: Eine Untersuchung zum Ursprung der Evangelien-Überlieferung.<sup>5</sup> The reactions were extremely mixed, but

---

<sup>1</sup> The term was coined by T. Wright in S. Neill and T. Wright, The Interpretation of the New Testament 1861–1986, 2nd ed. (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988), 379. Cf. also B. Witherington, The Jesus Quest: The Third Search for the Jew of Nazareth (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1995); M. A. Powell, Jesus as a Figure in History: How Modern Historians View the Man from Galilee (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998); D. L. Bock, Studying the Historical Jesus (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 2002), 141–152; J. Schröter and R. Brucker, eds., Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, BZfW 114 (Berlin: De Gruyter, 2002).

<sup>2</sup> Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition, FRLANT NF 12 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1921; 2nd ed., 1931).

<sup>3</sup> Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1919; 2nd ed., 1933).

<sup>4</sup> G. Theissen and D. Winter, Die Kriterienfrage in der Jesusforschung: Vom Differenzkriterium zum Plausibilitätskriterium, NTOA 34 (Freiburg: Universitätsverlag; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997), 145–157.

<sup>5</sup> WUNT 2.7 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1981; rev. ed. 1983 and 1988). A completely revised 4th edition with a new subtitle “Jüdische Volksbildung und Evangelien-Überlieferung” will be published in 2011.

even those critical of my general approach, such as W. H. Kelber<sup>6</sup> and G. Theissen,<sup>7</sup> could recognize the value of this alternative to classical form criticism. Following the publication of the thesis, I wrote various summaries and produced more detailed analyses of various aspects of the early Jesus tradition.<sup>8</sup> My approach recognizes both the successes and problems inherent in the representation of the Historical Jesus and his teachings in the “Third Quest.”

1.1. Jewish Context

Even in 1982 one reviewer was to strongly criticize what he saw as an overemphasized use of the Jewish context of Jesus.<sup>9</sup> But those who want to trace the development from the Historical Jesus to the gospels must first ask how, in contemporary Judaism, traditions were formulated and transmitted. When my thesis appeared, it could claim to be the most comprehensive examination of Jewish education in the Second Temple period (JaL §6–9).<sup>10</sup> In the meantime there have been many publications on this subject—some making matters clearer and others raising further problems. The synagogue and the connected elementary schools were a revolution in the religious history of antiquity. Even in pre-rabbinic Judaism teaching and learning was not a question of class “superiority” but of piety (1 En. 83.1; Jub. 7.38–39; 4 Macc. 18.10–19). With all this in mind, it is important to stress that Jesus started his career as a preacher in synagogues and Paul also based his missions strategy around

<sup>6</sup> “Die Anfangsprozesse der Verschriftlichung im Frühchristentum,” in ANRW II 26.1, ed. W. Haase (Berlin: De Gruyter, 1992), 3–62, at 36.

<sup>7</sup> “Nachwort” to R. Bultmann, Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition, 10th ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1995), 409–452, here 416–417. The thesis is seldom so misrepresented as by H. W. Hollander, “The Words of Jesus: From Oral Traditions to Written Record in Paul and Q,” NovT 42 (2000): 340–357, here 342–343.

<sup>8</sup> R. Riesner, “Der Ursprung der Jesus-Überlieferung,” TZ 38 (1982): 493–513; “Jesus as Preacher and Teacher,” in Jesus and the Oral Gospel Tradition, ed. H. Wansbrough, JSNTSup 64 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1991), 185–210; “Teacher,” in Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels, ed. J. B. Green, S. McKnight, and I. H. Marshall (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1992), 807–811; “Rückfrage nach Jesus,” TBei 30 (1999): 328–341; 31 (2000): 152–162; 37 (2006): 42–49, 326–333; Der Ursprung der Jesus-Überlieferung, 3rd ed. (Bad Liebenzell: Liebenzeller Mission, 2003). My apologies to the readers that due to the limitations of space I refer so often to my own publications. The references to paragraphs in the text refer to the paragraphs in Jesus als Lehrer (abbreviated as JaL). The paragraph numbering remains valid for all revised editions.

<sup>9</sup> W. Schmithals, RefKZ 124 (1983): 136–137.

<sup>10</sup> Jesus als Lehrer (1981), 197–205. Because there was no English translation of the book this fact was not widely recognized.

them (Acts 9:20; 13:5 etc.). It is also significant that Jewish (Jas 2:2; cf. Heb 10:25) and even Gentile Christians (Ignatius, Pol. 4.2; Herm. 43.9) called their places of assembly “synagogues” (συναγωγαί).

1.2. Social History

Classical form-criticism claimed to be a sociologically orientated method, but this claim was unjustified. The circle of Jesus’ disciples was not really recognized as a sociological entity and consequently as a possible Sitz im Leben for the pre-Easter Jesus tradition. The form-critical pioneers postulated that the first Christian transmitters of tradition suffered from a complete lack of education, but this incorrect assumption was uncritically inherited from Romanticism (JaL §2.2). Today the majority of scholars believe that there were some educated people, at least in the communities founded in the Pauline missions (cf. 1 Cor 1:26; Rom 16:23 etc.).<sup>11</sup> But as will be shown, even for the primitive community in Jerusalem we find a state of affairs different from what the early form-critics assumed. Regarding the importance of teaching and learning in early Christianity, the ancient historian E. A. Judge can speak of a “scholastic community.”<sup>12</sup> At a time when the socio-historical criticism of the New Testament was not generally accepted, I, on the other hand, openly applauded the method.<sup>13</sup> One reviewer valued “Jesus als Lehrer” as the most thorough socio-historical study of the framework of Jesus’ teaching.<sup>14</sup> Another reviewer even found in the book a new “milieuvergleichende Methode,”<sup>15</sup> i.e. a new method of comparing Jesus and his Jewish context.

1.3. Extra-Canonical Traditions

The references to Jesus in non-Christian historians, like the Jew Flavius Josephus (Ant. 17.63–64; 20.200) and the Roman Tacitus (Ann. 15.44.5), bear witness to his basic historicity.<sup>16</sup> The other extra-canonical sources

<sup>11</sup> Cf. W. A. Meeks, The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1983), 51–73; R. Stark, The Rise of Christianity: A Sociologist Reconsiders History (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1996), 29–38.

<sup>12</sup> “The Early Christians as a Scholastic Community,” JRH 1 (1960/1961): 4–15, 125–137.

<sup>13</sup> “Neues Testament und Soziologie,” TBei 17 (1986): 213–222.

<sup>14</sup> E. Baasland, TTK 54 (1983): 203.

<sup>15</sup> F. Mussner, Theologische Berichte 13 (1985): 173–174.

<sup>16</sup> Cf. G. Theissen and A. Merz, The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide (London: SCM, 1998), §3:1, 4.

are, on the other hand, either unhelpful or even misleading.<sup>17</sup> This is true for the apocryphal gospels including the Gospel of Thomas.<sup>18</sup> The strong belief of some scholars that they can find the oldest layers of Jesus tradition in these extra-canonical sources is not an advancement of historical-critical study of the gospels. An analysis of the apocryphal material using the same strict criteria as with the canonical gospels will hardly produce more fragments of reliable Jesus traditions than has already been detected by J. Jeremias (e.g. Gos. Thom. 82; Origen, In Jerem. Hom. 3.3 [GCS 33.312]).<sup>19</sup> Not even the most recent attempts to understand Jesus against the background of Cynic wandering preachers, something already tried by some German scholars in the past,<sup>20</sup> succeed in making the case more convincing by use of a hypothetical reconstruction of the redaction history of the hypothetical source Q.<sup>21</sup> In relation to the shared themes in Q and Mark, the truly existing “Q” materials do not differ substantially from the traditions behind Mark’s Gospel.<sup>22</sup>

1.4. Christology

The counsel to avoid reading one’s christological agenda into historical Jesus research must be heeded. But the demand of some adherents of the “Third Quest” to refrain from every christological interpretation of Jesus is in itself not a historically viable position. Even a cursory look at Josephus (War 2.56; Ant. 17.273–276 etc.) and Tacitus (Hist. 5.9) shows

<sup>17</sup> Cf. C. A. Evans, “Jesus in Non-Christian Sources,” in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 443–478.

<sup>18</sup> Cf. N. Perrin, Thomas and Tatian: The Relationship between the Gospel of Thomas and the Diatessaron, AcadBib5 (Atlanta: SBL; Leiden: Brill, 2002); H. J. Klauck, Apokryphe Evangelien: Eine Einführung, 2nd ed. (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 2005); and also J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus I (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 112–166.

<sup>19</sup> Unknown Sayings of Jesus, rev. ed. (London: SCM, 1964). Cf. also O. Hofius, “Unknown Sayings of Jesus,” in The Gospel and the Gospels, ed. P. Stuhlmacher (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1991), 336–360.

<sup>20</sup> So already E. Wechssler, Hellas im Evangelium (Berlin: Metzger, 1936; 2nd ed., Hamburg: Schroeder, 1947), 242–266; C. Schneider, Geistesgeschichte des Christentums I (Munich: Beck, 1954), 31–45.

<sup>21</sup> For J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (Edinburgh: Clark, 1991); R. W. Funk, R. H. Hoover, and the Jesus Seminar, The Five Gospels: The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus (New York: Macmillan, 1993), cf. R. Riesner, TBei 31 (2000): 155–157; and also N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1996), 44–74; C. A. Evans, Fabricating Jesus: How Modern Scholars Distort the Gospels (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2006), 100–222.

<sup>22</sup> Cf. E. P. Meadors, Jesus the Messianic Herald of Salvation, WUNT 2.72 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1995).

that messianic hopes played a more important role in Second Temple Judaism than is today often accepted.<sup>23</sup> In his public activity, Jesus was frequently confronted with such expectations (Mark 12:35–37; Luke 3:15).<sup>24</sup> The development of a “high” christology, even in earliest Jewish Christianity, cannot be explained solely by their faith in the resurrection of Jesus but only if aspects of his own proclamation pointed in this direction.<sup>25</sup> Concerning the gospels, the questions of christology and the transmission of the traditions are inseparably intertwined: The claim of Jesus to be, to use the expression of M. Hengel, “the Messianic Teacher of Wisdom,”<sup>26</sup> is something asserted even before Easter—and all the more so after. This provided crucial motivation for the transmission of his traditions (JaL §3.3).

2. Background: Jewish Elementary Education

The question of an oral tradition behind the gospels was not a new discovery of the so-called “Form-critical school.” Before literary criticism blossomed in the second half of the nineteenth century, scholars studied this phenomenon (JaL §3.4). People like J. C. L. Gieseler,<sup>27</sup> A. Schlatter,<sup>28</sup> J. Weiß,<sup>29</sup> J. Ranft<sup>30</sup> and B.S. Easton<sup>31</sup> pointed to the rabbinic

<sup>23</sup> Cf. J. H. Charlesworth, ed., The Messiah: Developments in Earliest Judaism and Christianity (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1992); W. Horbury, Jewish Messianism and the Cult of Christ (London: SCM, 1998).

<sup>24</sup> Cf. C. A. Evans, Jesus and His Contemporaries: Comparative Studies, AGJU 25 (Leiden: Brill, 1995), 53–212.

<sup>25</sup> Cf. L. W. Hurtado, Lord Jesus Christ: Devotion to Jesus in Earliest Christianity (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003); idem, How on Earth Did Jesus Become a God? Historical Questions about Earliest Devotion to Jesus (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2005); and also R. Riesner, “Christologie in der Jerusalemer Urgemeinde,” TBei 28 (1997): 229–243.

<sup>26</sup> “Jesus as Messianic Teacher of Wisdom and the Beginnings of Christology,” in Studies in Early Christology, ed. M. Hengel (Edinburgh: Clark, 1995), 73–118. According to M. Ebner, Jesus—ein Weisheitslehrer? Synoptische Weisheitslogien im Traditionsprozeß, HBS 15 (Freiburg: Herder, 1998), Jesus, as a simple carpenter, was outside of any Jewish teaching tradition. Cf. the critical comments by R. Riesner, TBei 30 (1999): 334–335. Writing from an interesting, but rather narrow, pedagogical point of view is J. T. Dillon, Jesus as a Teacher: A Multidisciplinary Case Study (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995).

<sup>27</sup> Historisch-kritischer Versuch über die Entstehung und die frühesten Schicksale der schriftlichen Evangelien (Leipzig: W. Engelmann, 1818), 104–105.

<sup>28</sup> Jochanan Ben Zakkai: Der Zeitgenosse der Apostel, BFChTh 3.4 (Gütersloh: Bertelsmann, 1899), 8.

<sup>29</sup> Die drei älteren Evangelien, SNT 1 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1907), 54.

<sup>30</sup> Der Ursprung des katholischen Traditionsprinzips (Würzburg: Triltsch, 1931), 113–178.

<sup>31</sup> “The First Evangelical Tradition,” JBL 50 (1931): 148–155.

tradition system as an analogy for the transmission of the Jesus tradition. This approach was later developed by B. Gerhardsson,<sup>32</sup> and his thesis was made known by his teacher H. Riesenfeld through a lecture at the SNTS congress at Oxford in 1957.<sup>33</sup> Gerhardsson was criticized for anachronistically projecting the developed rabbinical tradition techniques of the second to fifth centuries AD into New Testament times.<sup>34</sup> In the meantime his work was received positively by the well-known expert in Jewish studies J. Neusner.<sup>35</sup> Gerhardsson had himself begun to stress the importance of the Jewish school system starting in the second century BCE (1 Macc 1:13–14; 2 Macc 4:9–12).<sup>36</sup> Jesus als Lehrer employed the approach of the Scandinavian scholars and attempted to further develop it in the areas of Jewish popular education (JaL §6–9) and Jesus' authority (JaL §10–12) and methods (JaL §13–19) as the Messianic Teacher.

2.1. The Synagogue

In spite of some opposing voices the majority of scholars accept the existence of synagogues in the Diaspora and in Erez Israel in the Second Temple period (JaL §7).<sup>37</sup> Importantly, the only Palestinian inscription we have from a synagogue of Herodian times, renovated by a certain Theodotos in Jerusalem,<sup>38</sup> determined the main purpose of the building as “the teaching of the laws” (ΕΙΣ ΔΙΔΑΧΗΝ ΕΝΤΟΛΩΝ) (CIJ no. 1404 [332]). In a similar vein, Philo of Alexandria described

---

<sup>32</sup> Memory and Manuscript: Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity, ASNU 22 (Lund: C. W. K. Gleerup; Copenhagen: E. Munksgaard, 1961; 2nd ed., 1964).

<sup>33</sup> “The Gospel Tradition and Its Beginnings,” in Studia Evangelica: Papers Presented to the International Congress Held at Christ Church, Oxford, ed. K. Aland and F. L. Cross, TU 73 (Berlin: Akademie-Verlag, 1959), 43–65 (repr. in The Gospel Tradition [Oxford: Blackwell, 1970], 1–29).

<sup>34</sup> M. Smith, “A Comparison of Early Christian and Early Rabbinic Tradition,” JBL 82 (1963): 169–176.

<sup>35</sup> “Foreword” to B. Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript with Tradition and Transmission in Early Christianity (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1998), xxv–xlvi.

<sup>36</sup> Tradition and Transmission in Early Christianity, CN 20 (Lund: C. W. K. Gleerup, 1964), 16. A summary of his present position is given by B. Gerhardsson, The Reliability of the Gospel Tradition, ed. D. A. Hagner (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2001).

<sup>37</sup> Cf. only L. I. Levine, The Ancient Synagogue: The First Thousand Years (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2000).

<sup>38</sup> Cf. R. Riesner, “Synagogues in Jerusalem,” in The Book of Acts in Its Palestinian Setting, ed. R. Bauckham, A1CS 4 (Carlisle: Paternoster; Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1995), 179–211.

the function of the Diaspora synagogues as “coming together for the expositions of the laws (συνάγεσθαι πρὸς τὰς τῶν νόμων ὑφηγήσεις)” (Leg. Gai. 157). The focus of the synagogue service on the reading and expounding of holy scriptures distinguished Judaism from all the other religions of antiquity and this fact made it attractive for non-Jews.<sup>39</sup> Philo could call the synagogues “teaching houses” (διδασκαλεῖα) and the Sabbath service a kind of “philosophizing (φιλοσοφεῖν)” (Opif. 128; Decal. 98.100; Spec. 2.61–62; Mos. 2.215–216). In the synagogues, Torah and prophets were not only read and expounded on the Sabbath, but those interested could also study the scrolls in the building during the week (cf. Acts 17:10–11; b. Qidd. 66a). When the Essene community of Qumran organized a daily study of the holy scriptures (1QS VI, 6–8) they realized an Old Testament ideal (Josh 1:8; Ps 1:2) that other pious people were also striving for. In the region where Jesus was mainly active we know of synagogues in Tiberias (Josephus, Life 280) and Nazareth (Mark 6:1–2; Luke 4:16) from literary sources. There is archaeological evidence for one also in Gamla and Magdala (known since 2009) and probably Capernaum (Mark 1:21).

2.2. Elementary Schools

Even as early as the pre-Maccabean hasidim can one find a program designed for “popular education” (11QPs<sup>a</sup> 154 XVIII, 5–8). Their desire was that all should hear and understand the Torah so that they could live it out in daily life. In the Essene communities not only the adults but also the young people were required to learn (1QSa I, 4–5). Outside Essene circles every Jew that had reached the age of religious maturity could take an active part in the synagogue service. This “democratization of religion” resulted in the development of a system of elementary education (JaL §8).<sup>40</sup> Under the scribe Shimon Ben Shatah and Queen Alexandra Salome (76–67 BCE), the latter being very sympathetic towards the Pharisees, there was even an attempt to make education in synagogue schools compulsory for boys (y. Ket. 8:11 [32c]). When the reform failed, because the Pharisees lost political influence, they, and other pious groups, had to take the initiative themselves.<sup>41</sup> In Tannaitic sources the close relationship of synagogue and elementary school is completely self-evident (b. Hag. 15a–b; b. Taan. 23b etc.). However, archaeological evidence can probably show a connection to have existed before AD 70. A small room adjoining the synagogue of Gamla was equipped with stone benches along the walls and this suggests that it was used as a classroom.<sup>42</sup>

<sup>39</sup> Cf. R. Riesner, “A Pre-Christian Jewish Mission?” in The Mission of the Early Church to Jews and Gentiles, ed. J. Ådna and H. Kvalbein, WUNT 127 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000), 211–250.

<sup>40</sup> Cf. M. Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism I (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974), 78–83.

Recently C. Hezser put forward the argument that the ability to read and write in Judaism before 70 BCE was as uncommon as or even less common than in the rest of Hellenistic-Roman society.<sup>43</sup> To the contrary, A.R. Millard points to literary sources and above all to archaeological findings that imply a higher degree of literacy in Palestine in the Second Temple period.<sup>44</sup> A. I. Baumgarten rightly stresses the fact that in Jewish parties like the Essenes and Pharisees there existed strong religious motivation for education.<sup>45</sup> This point is illustrated by Josephus when he writes (although with some exaggeration):

But, should anyone of our nation be questioned about the laws, he would repeat them all more readily than his own name. The result of our learning by heart (ἐκμανθάνοντες) of the laws from the first dawn of intelligence is that we have them, as it were, engraven (ὥσπερ ἐγκεχαραγμένους) on our souls.<sup>46</sup>

Even a Roman anti-Semite like Seneca was forced to admit that the general Jewish population had a good religious education (De superstitione [Augustine, De Civ. 6.10]). Furthermore, facing the catastrophe of military defeat (and certain death) at the hands of the Romans, the

---

<sup>41</sup> Cf. R. Deines, Die Pharisäer: Ihr Verständnis im Spiegel der christlichen und jüdischen Forschung seit Wellhausen und Graetz, WUNT ser. 2.101 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1997), 520–526.

<sup>42</sup> Cf. D. D. Binder, Into the Temple Courts: The Place of the Synagogue in the Second Temple Period, SBLDS 169 (Atlanta: SBL, 1999), 434.

<sup>43</sup> Jewish Literacy in Roman Palestine, TSAJ 81 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001). C. Hezser is heavily reliant on W. Harris, Ancient Literacy (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989). Cf. the discussion in M. Beard and others, Literacy in the Roman World, JRAS 3 (Ann Arbor, MI: Roman Archaeology Society, 1991).

<sup>44</sup> Reading and Writing in the Time of Jesus, BS 69 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000).

<sup>45</sup> The Flourishing of Jewish Sects in the Maccabean Era: An Interpretation, SPB 55 (Leiden: Brill, 1997), 114–136.

<sup>46</sup> Apion, 2.178; cf. Ant. 4.210. For ἐκμανθάνειν ediscere as “learning by heart” cf. J. P. Small, Wax Tablets of the Mind: Cognitive Studies of Memory and Literacy in Classical Antiquity (London: Routledge, 1997), 133–134.

Zealot defenders of Masada renovated the synagogue and apparently built a class room in one of the palatial buildings.<sup>47</sup>

2.3. Family and Religious Groups

The measure of religious elementary education a Jewish son received was dependent on the piety of his family (Jal §6). There is some suggestion that the small village of Nazareth was founded by a clan of the Davidic family when, in the first century BCE, Galilee was resettled by Jews.<sup>48</sup> The name of Nazareth, which means “(village of the) branch”, was intentionally given by the settlers to recall the prophecy of the messianic “branch” (נֶצֶר) in Isa 11:1 (cf. Matt 2:23; Julius Africanus [Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 1.7.14]).<sup>49</sup> In the wider family of Jesus lived Enochic traditions (cf. Jude 14) and an exposition of scripture that reminds one of the style of exegesis found in the Dead Sea Scrolls.<sup>50</sup> The religious outlook of Jesus’ family seems to be a Hasidic Judaism<sup>51</sup> which came to the forefront during the Maccabean crisis (1 Macc 7:12–17) but which, nevertheless, had its roots deep in the Persian era (cf. Ps 149:1).<sup>52</sup> Not every Hasidic group chose the separatist way of the Essenes of Qumran. Such groups produced literature like the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs and the Similitudes of Enoch. In this context G. Boccaccini speaks of an “Enochic Judaism” as part of a pluralistic “Middle Judaism.”<sup>53</sup>

An ancient Jewish proverb (y. Rosh. HaSh. 1 [57b]) speaks about the deep scriptural knowledge of carpenters (סִיָּרְיָיִם), the profession of both Joseph and Jesus (Matt 13:55; Mark 6:3 [τέκτων]). Behind the saying found in Matt 11:27 and Luke 10:22 stands a picture of the father as teacher (cf. 3 En. 45.2; 48[E].7) suggesting that Joseph gave

<sup>47</sup> Cf. Y. Yadin in M. Avi-Yonah, Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land III (Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society, 1977), 809–810.

<sup>48</sup> Cf. B. Pixner, Paths of the Messiah, ed. R. Riesner (San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 2010), 169–176, 380–393; and also É. Nodet and J. Taylor, The Origins of Christianity: An Exploration (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical, 1998), 154–155.

<sup>49</sup> Cf. R. Riesner, “Nazaret/Nazoräer,” in Neues Bibel-Lexikon II, ed. M. Görg and B. Lang (Zürich: Benziger, 1995), 908–112.

<sup>50</sup> Cf. R. Bauckham, Jude and the Relatives of Jesus in the Early Church (Edinburgh: Clark, 1990).

<sup>51</sup> Cf. O. Betz and R. Riesner, Jesus, Qumran, and the Vatican: Clarifications (London: SCM, 1994), 141–147; and also P. Sacchi, “Recovering Jesus’ Formative Background,” in Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls, ed. J. H. Charlesworth (New York: Doubleday, 1992), 123–139.

<sup>52</sup> Cf. O. Plöger, Theokratie und Eschatologie, WMANT 2 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchner, 1959), 19–36.

<sup>53</sup> Beyond the Essene Hypothesis: The Parting of the Ways between Qumran and Enochic Judaism (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1998).

elementary instruction in the Torah to Jesus. In Nazareth there existed not only a synagogue but also a synagogue attendant (ὕπηρέτης [Luke 4:20]). According to the Mishnah this hazzan (חָזָן) could also function as an elementary teacher (m. Shab. 1:3–4). There is no real argument to cause doubt that Jesus attended the local synagogue regularly (JaL §9.3) and read publicly from the scriptures (Luke 4:16–20). The regular preaching and teaching of Jesus in the synagogues (Mark 1:22–23, 39; 3:1 etc.) was, even for R. Bultmann, one of the most historically trustworthy elements of the gospels.<sup>54</sup> The Sabbath readings from the Hebrew Old Testament normally had to be learnt by heart in order that they could be recited without errors and pauses (Tanh. Jithro 90a [Str-B 4.1, 158]). The regular reading of the texts served also to impress them into the memory of the listeners (Josephus, Apion 2.175; Ant. 4.210–211). From an analysis of the sayings of Jesus it is possible to conclude that he must have memorized important parts of the Old Testament.<sup>55</sup>

3. Origin: Jesus as Teacher

3.1. Teaching Authority

Josephus reports the likely widespread impression of his contemporaries when he called Jesus a “wise man (σοφὸς ἀνὴρ)” and “teacher (διδάσκαλος)” (Ant. 18:63).<sup>56</sup> In all the four gospels Jesus is addressed as “teacher (διδάσκαλε)” even when such a christological characterization was not necessarily sufficient for the evangelists—shown by the fact that the address was often substituted with “Lord (κύριε)” (Matt 8:25 compared with Mark 4:38 etc.)<sup>57</sup> or “Master (ἐπιστάτα)” (Luke 8:24 compared with Mark 4:38 etc.). It has been kept in the historical records that Jesus was addressed as “Rabbi” (רַבִּי, ῥαββί) by his followers and those not so closely associated with him (Mark 9:5; Matt 26:25, <sup>54</sup> Jesus, 2nd ed. (Tübingen: Mohr 1929), 43–44 (ET: Jesus and the Word [London: Nicholson & Watson, 1935]).

<sup>55</sup> Cf. R. T. France, Jesus and the Old Testament: His Application of Old Testament Passages to Himself and His Mission (London: Tyndale, 1971); and also B. F. Meyer, “Appointed Deed, Appointed Doer: Jesus and the Scriptures,” in Authenticating the Activities of Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 155–176.

<sup>56</sup> For the originality of these phrases in the Testimonium Flavianum cf. G. Vermes, “The Jesus Notice of Josephus Re-examined,” JJS 38 (1987): 2–10.

<sup>57</sup> In a Semitic language milieu this change was very easy. Cf. B. T. Viviano, “Rabbouni and Mk 9,5,” RB 97 (1990): 207–218.

49; John 1:38 etc.). In Palestine in the first century CE the address was used mainly, although not exclusively, for teachers.<sup>58</sup> Behind some of the other references to Jesus as “Teacher” (Mark 12:14; Matt 23:10; cf. CD XX, 1) might stand the Hebrew term moreh (מוֹרֶה), which we know as the name of honour for the Essene “Teacher of Righteousness” (CD I, 9–11; 1QpHab II, 3, 8 etc.).<sup>59</sup> Jesus himself did not shy from the self-identification as “prophet” (Mark 6:4; Luke 13:33), and was also received as such by his listeners (Mark 8:28). Such a claim in no way contradicts the description of Jesus as a teacher (JaL §11), as the prophets of Israel functioned for the people (Isa 28:9), and even more so in the circle of their disciples, as teachers (Isa 8:16–18).<sup>60</sup>

The messianic claim of Jesus was known to the inner circle of Jesus’ disciples (JaL §12) at least since Peter’s “confession” at Caesarea Philippi (Mark 8:27–30).<sup>61</sup> The expectation that the Messiah would teach with divine wisdom is found in very different Jewish traditions from this period.<sup>62</sup> This theme exists in the writings of the Qumran Essenes (CD VI, 11; VII, 18; 4QFlor I, 11; 4Q541 etc.),<sup>63</sup> also in the probably Pharisaic Psalms of Solomon (Pss. Sol. 17.42–43; 18.4–9), in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (T. Judah [A]21.1–4; T. Levi 18.2–6), in Samaritan literature (Memar Marqa 4:12; cf. John 4:25), in the relatively old Isaiah Targum (to Isa 53:5, 11) and also in rabbinic material (Midr. Ps. 21 [90a] etc.). Jesus himself affirmed in various ways that his teachings did not stand on the same level as those of other Jewish teachers (JaL §12.3–4): His words are a revelation of the heavenly Father (Matt 11:25–26 / Luke 10:21) and divine wisdom (Matt 12:42 / Luke 11:31; Matt 23:37–39 /

<sup>58</sup> Cf. A. F. Zimmermann, Die urchristlichen Lehrer: Studien zum Tradentenkreis der didaskaloi im frühen Urchristentum, WUNT 2.12 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2nd ed., 1988), 69–91.

<sup>59</sup> Cf. C. Spicq, “Une allusion au Docteur de Justice dans Matthieu, XXIII.10?” RB 66 (1959): 387–396; J. Morgenstern, “Jesus the Teacher,” in Some Significant Antecedents of Christianity, SPB 10 (Leiden: Brill, 1966), 1–7.

<sup>60</sup> Cf. S. Byrskog, Jesus the Only Teacher: Didactic Authority and Transmission in Ancient Israel, Ancient Judaism and the Matthean Community, CBNTS 24 (Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1994).

<sup>61</sup> Cf. P. Stuhlmacher, Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments I: Grundlegung: Von Jesus zu Paulus, 3rd ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2005), 110–124; R. T. France, The Gospel of Mark, NIGTC (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans; Carlisle: Paternoster, 2002), 326–331.

<sup>62</sup> Cf. also J. J. Collins, The Scepter and the Star: The Messiahs of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Other Ancient Literature (New York: Doubleday, 1995), 102–122.

<sup>63</sup> Cf. J. Zimmermann, Messianische Texte aus Qumran: Königliche, priesterliche und prophetische Messiasvorstellungen in den Schriftfunden von Qumran, WUNT 2.104 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1998), 268–277.

Luke 13:34–35; Matt 11:28–30). They will remain after heaven and earth pass away (Matt 24:35 / Mark 13:31 / Luke 21:33) and will serve as a criterion for the final judgment (Mark 8:38 / Luke 9:26). Some of these aspects are combined in a carefully structured parable (Matt 7:26–29 / Luke 6:47–49):

Everyone who hears these words of mine and acts on them will be like a wise man who built his house on rock.
The rain fell, the floods came.
And the winds blew and beat on that house,
but it did not fall,
because it had been founded on rock.

And everyone who hears these words of mine and does not act on them will be like a foolish man who built his house on sand.
The rain fell, and the floods came,
and the winds blew and beat against that house, and it fell—
and great was its fall.

Even in pre-Easter times there were not only practical reasons to conserve Jesus' words, but all the more so due to the messianic authority motif.

3.2. Languages

The insight of G. Dalman,<sup>64</sup> that to best understand the words of Jesus one needs to take into account the three languages, Aramaic, Hebrew and Greek, remains valid (JaL §14). However, due to our increasing knowledge of the matter, the relative prominence of each must be changed a little.<sup>65</sup> After Dalman and the extensive research of M. Black,<sup>66</sup> New Testament studies tended toward a "Pan-Aramaism," an overemphasis on the Aramaic element. Since the Qumran findings, however, we know that Hebrew was not only the holy language of the scholars and the Old Testament, but also was spoken in Judea and Jerusalem as a middle-Hebrew, primarily but not only by the tradition-faithful Jews.<sup>67</sup> A fair assumption is that Jesus, while in Galilee, taught in the everyday language of Aramaic, but, in Judean and/or scribal contexts, a Hebrew original version should be seriously considered. For example, some of the parables were not directed to the people in general, but originated from scribal debates (e.g. Mark 12:1–12).<sup>68</sup> In this respect one can find many valuable observations from the great Israeli scholar D. Flusser, even if his argument for a predominantly Hebrew original version goes too far.<sup>69</sup> The role of Greek in Palestine (cf. John 19:20) is also stronger than Dalman considered;<sup>70</sup> but at the same time its importance for the teaching of Jesus should not be overestimated either.<sup>71</sup> However, the first translation of Jesus' words into Greek could have already begun in pre-Easter times, for example in Jerusalem where there were Greek-speaking synagogues (Acts 6:9). In any case, that such translation appeared shortly after Easter is evidenced by the fact that Jerusalem's earliest Christian community was bilingual from the start (Acts 6:1). With this in mind, it is important to note that, for the first post-Easter Jesus tradition, there were plenty able to use more than one language without difficulty.

<sup>64</sup> Jesus—Jeschua: Die drei Sprachen Jesu (Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1922; Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1967).

<sup>65</sup> Cf. J. A. Lund, "The Language of Jesus," Mishkan 17/18 (1992/1993): 139–155.

<sup>66</sup> An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts, 3rd ed. (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1967).

3.3. Teaching Forms

Within the synoptic word-tradition it is possible to distinguish about 246 independent units, and these in turn, from a formal point of view, divide into a further two groups (JaL §15). About 80% of the independent units are short (an average of four stanzas) and are arranged in any form of parallelismus membrorum. The longer units which make up approximately 56% of the extent of the synoptic tradition are almost entirely parabolic. This dichotomy corresponds to the different uses in

<sup>67</sup> E. Qimron, The Hebrew of the Dead Sea Scrolls, HSS 29 (Atlanta: SBL, 1986), 117–118.

<sup>68</sup> Cf. H. P. Rüger, "Das Problem der Sprache Jesu," ZNW 59 (1968): 111–122.

<sup>69</sup> Jesus (with R. S. Notley; Jerusalem: Magnes, 1997), 22. Cf. D. Flusser, Judaism and the Origins of Christianity (Jerusalem: Magnes, 1988); idem, Entdeckungen im Neuen Testament I/II (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchner, 1987; 1999). Cf. also M. Lowe and D. Flusser, "Evidence Corroborating a Modified Proto-Matthean Synoptic Theory," NTS 29 (1983): 25–47; B. H. Young, Jesus and His Jewish Parables: Rediscovering the Roots of Jesus' Teaching (New York: Paulist, 1989).

<sup>70</sup> Cf. M. Hengel (with C. Marksches), The "Hellenization" of Judaea in the First Century after Christ (London: SCM, 1989).

<sup>71</sup> For a rather widespread use see S. E. Porter, "Jesus and the Use of Greek in Galilee," in Studying the Historical Jesus, ed. Chilton and Evans, 123–154.

the preaching of Jesus. The short units are, as regards content, very dense teaching summaries. In these summaries Jesus combined what he considered fundamental propositions that he wanted to impress into the memory of his listeners.<sup>72</sup> G. A. Kennedy, an expert in ancient rhetoric, reckons that Jesus set these summaries either at the beginning or at the end of longer speeches and presumably repeated the elements throughout (cf. Mark 7:1–15).<sup>73</sup> He could also have drawn attention to these summaries by raising his voice (Luke 8:8; 10:21), or by using special introductory formulae. Indeed, one often reads the request to “listen (ἀκούειν)” (Mark 4:3; 7:14 etc.). The corresponding Hebrew word (שמע), in certain contexts, would serve to impress what will be said into the memory or even to mark the words as something to be memorized (Deut 6:4; Prov 1:8; Sir 16:24 etc.). Jesus’ non-responsorial use of the word “Amen” is, stylistically speaking, without analogy. The “Amen” introduction stood, for Jesus, in place of the prophetic speech formula “Thus says the Lord” and indicates the revelatory nature of what he was to say.<sup>74</sup>

The teaching summaries are not only formed by parallelism, but also often by rhythm, rhyme, alliterations, assonances, paronomasia and word-plays.<sup>75</sup> The representatives of the form-critical school have labelled these elements as merely “decorative,”<sup>76</sup> and hence they have remained largely undervalued. However, M. Black has summarized the sense of these forms, as follows:

Jesus did not commit anything to writing, but by His use of poetic form and language He ensured that His sayings would not be forgotten. The impression they make in Aramaic is of carefully premeditated and stud-

---

<sup>72</sup> So already, e.g., E. Haupt, “Das Leben Jesu von B. Weiß kritisch beleuchtet,” TSK 57 (1884): 7–79, here 26; T. Soiron, Die Logia Jesu: Eine literarkritische und literarhistorische Untersuchung zum synoptischen Problem, NtA 6.4 (Münster: Aschendorff, 1916), 139; K. Bornhäuser, Die Bergpredigt: Versuch einer zeitgenössischen Auslegung, BFChTh 2.7 (Gütersloh: Bertelsmann, 1923), 11.

<sup>73</sup> New Testament Interpretation through Rhetorical Criticism (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984), 68.

<sup>74</sup> W. Grundmann, Das Evangelium des Matthäus, THK 2 (Berlin: EVA, 7th ed., 1977), 114.

<sup>75</sup> Cf. especially Black, An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts, 143–185; J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology: The Proclamation of Jesus (New York: Charles Scribner’s, 1971), §2; R. H. Stein, The Method and Message of Jesus’ Teachings, 2nd ed. (Louisville: Westminster & John Knox, 1994); and also G. Mussies, “Jesus’ Idiolect,” TD 26 (1978): 254–258.

<sup>76</sup> Bultmann, Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition, 2nd ed. (1931), 73: “ornamentale Motive.”

ied deliverances; we have to do with prophetic utterance of the style and grandeur of Isaiah, cast in a medium which can express in appropriate and modulated sound the underlying beauty of the sentiment or the passion out of which the thought arose...<sup>77</sup>

As also for the prophets, the “aesthetic” element of Jesus’ words acted in the service of forcefulness and memorability.

The longer parabolic units also were not, as a rule, spontaneous creations, but were consciously formed small “works of art.” A more exact analysis of these traditions points to the fact that they often have a strophic structure. Also not totally lacking are elements of parallelism. But the memorable nature of these units consists mainly in their pictorial and narrative elements.<sup>78</sup> Some parables have, like the teaching summaries, a straightforward didactic purpose. However, the perception that Jesus’ parables were only illustrations of his teaching in an easy to understand form, an argument stressed by A. Jülicher, was too one-sided. Exaggerated and unreal elements in these parables cannot simply be explained as creations of the early churches’ allegorical interpreting, but rather most can be seen as originating from Jesus himself—used in order to illustrate the different quality and subversive nature of the “kingdom of God” (βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ).<sup>79</sup> Mark didn’t get it completely wrong in claiming that many of the parables were part of the messianic “secret” (Mark 4:10–12 [μυστήριον τῆς βασιλείας]). The element of “riddle” that is often found in the parables could suggest to those “who have an ear to hear” that such words should be understood as apocalyptic revelation.<sup>80</sup> When Matthew writes that Jesus “presented a parable to them (παραβολὴν παρέθηκεν αὐτοῖς)” (Matt 13:24, 31), he used terminology that was already employed in the Old Testament (אֲפֹרֹתַי [Exod 19:7; 21:1; Deut 4:8]) and later in the New Testament (παρατιθέναι [1 Tim 1:18; 2 Tim 2:2]) in connection with the transmission of tradition. The memorable forms of the parables made it possible for the listeners to later meditate over what was said and not simply to hear it once... and

<sup>77</sup> Black, An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts, 3rd ed. (1967), 185.

<sup>78</sup> Cf. A. D. Baum, “Bildhaftigkeit als Gedächtnishilfe in der synoptischen Tradition,” TBei 35 (2004): 4–16.

<sup>79</sup> Cf. C. L. Blomberg, Interpreting the Parables (Leicester: Apollos, 1990), 29–70; and also H. J. Klauck, Allegorie und Allegorese in synoptischen Gleichnistexten, 2nd ed., NtA 13 (Münster: Aschendorff, 1986).

<sup>80</sup> Cf. E. Lohmeyer, “Vom Sinn der Gleichnisse Jesu [1938],” in Gleichnisse Jesu: Positionen der Auslegung von Adolf Jülicher bis zur Formgeschichte, ed. W. Harnisch, WdF 366 (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1982), 154–179.

forget it. Nevertheless, the greater number of variations in the synoptic parables points to the fact that the longer and less strictly formed units, while existing only as oral traditions, were treated more flexibly than the shorter teaching summaries.

3.4. Locally Settled Sympathizers

Only a small number of Jesus' followers actually accompanied him on his wanderings. Most of the people who believed in his message of the in-breaking kingdom of God remained at home, with the rest of their family members, either in Galilee (Mark 1:30–31; 5:35–43) or Judea (Mark 14:3).<sup>81</sup> For these local circles of sympathizers the separation from the authoritative teacher himself was not only a post-Easter problem (JaL §20). The memorizing of the Jesus traditions could help to deal with this deficiency. The story of Mary and Martha (Luke 10:38–42), a tradition which stems from older Jewish Christianity,<sup>82</sup> could be a reflection of the memory of the special instruction that such locally settled sympathizers received: When Jesus was present it was considered the most important thing (Luke 10:42), taking the typical posture of a student (Acts 22:3; m. Abot. 1:4), “to sit at his feet” and “to listen to his word (ἀκούειν τὸν λόγον αὐτοῦ)” (Luke 10:39). As some members of the upper class were on sympathetic terms with Jesus (Mark 15:43; Luke 19:1–9 etc.), it is not completely out of place if some researchers consider it possible that, even before Easter, some written notes were made of the words of Jesus.<sup>83</sup>

3.5. The Circle of Disciples

The tradition that Jesus gathered a circle of men around himself who permanently accompanied him (JaL §17) belongs to the most historically authentic material found in the gospels (Mark 1:16–20; 3:13–15). Their “discipleship” (ἀκολουθεῖν, ἔρχεσθαι ὀπίσω from the Hebrew אַחֲרָיָהוּ) was more than the usual Jewish teacher–student relationship.<sup>84</sup> The disciples of Jesus did not choose their teacher but were rather selected by him (Matt 8:19–22 / Luke 9:57–62). It was not possible for the disciples to change this teacher either, for Jesus was their “only teacher” (Matt 23:8–10). Moreover, the disciples had to be ready to share the fate of their teacher—even if this meant martyrdom (Mark 8:34–37; Matt 10:24–25 / Luke 6:40). This level of faithfulness was something usually only expected for commitment to the Torah (Mark 8:35 diff. b. Ber. 63b). All of these unusual features point back to the messianic claim of Jesus. However, the pre-Easter circle of disciples was not only a theological but also a sociological entity. H. Schürmann has therefore correctly pointed out that this group was both receiver and carrier of the pre-Easter traditions of Jesus.<sup>85</sup>

<sup>81</sup> Cf. now also R. W. Gehring, House Church and Mission: The Importance of Household Structures in Early Christianity (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2004), 28–61.

<sup>82</sup> Cf. D. L. Bock, Luke 9:51–24:53, BECNT (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1996), 1037–1039.

<sup>83</sup> E. E. Ellis, “New Directions in Form Criticism,” in Prophecy and Hermeneutic in Early Christianity, WUNT 78 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1978), 237–253, here 242–247; Millard, Reading and Writing in the Time of Jesus, 221–229.

The circle of disciples distinguished itself in some characteristics from other Jewish forms of schooling, but this did not make it a completely unique phenomenon. Contemporaries could compare the disciples of Jesus with those of John the Baptist or disciples of pharisaic teachers (Mark 2:18). In the gospels, the chosen disciples of Jesus are labelled with the Greek expression μαθηταί. This is a term that points back to the Hebrew or Aramaic word for “student” (תַּלְמִיד / תַּלְמִידָא). This name Jesus himself had given them (Matt 10:24 / Luke 6:40; Luke 14:26) in order to make clear the important task they now had, namely to “learn” (μανθάνειν, לַמַּד) from his word and behaviour (Matt 11:28–30). This learning happened spontaneously by the fact that the disciples, as constant companions of Jesus, heard his teaching summaries and parables over and over again before different audiences. The disciples, however, received their own instruction, in which Jesus impressed upon them his sayings to matters relating to their behaviour towards each other (Mark 10:41–45 etc.) and towards outsiders (Luke 6:32–35 / Matt 5:45–47 etc.). Jesus had them memorize the prayer (Luke 11:1–4)<sup>86</sup> that distinguished the circle of his disciples from the followers of the Baptist (Jal §17.7).

<sup>84</sup> Cf. M. Hengel, The Charismatic Teacher and His Followers (Edinburgh: Clark, 1981); and also M. J. Wilkins, Discipleship in the Ancient World and Matthew's Gospel (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1995).

<sup>85</sup> “Die vorösterlichen Anfänge der Logientradition: Versuch eines formgeschichtlichen Vorgangs zum Leben Jesu,” in Der historische Jesus und der kerygmatische Christus, ed. H. Ristow and K. Matthiae (Berlin: EVA, 1960), 342–370 (enlarged in H. Schürmann, Jesus—Gestalt und Geheimnis: Gesammelte Beiträge, ed. K. Scholtissek [Paderborn: Bonifacius, 1994], 85–104, 380–397).

<sup>86</sup> Cf. also J. J. Vincent, “Did Jesus Teach His Disciples to Learn by Heart?” TU 88 (1964): 105–118.

3.6. The Pre-Easter Mission

Jesus sent out his disciples in Galilee, at least once but possibly more times (JaL §18), in order to preach about the in-breaking of the kingdom of God (Matt 10:1 / Mark 6:7 / Luke 9:1; Luke 10:1; cf. 1 Cor 9, 16).<sup>87</sup> In the process the disciples themselves were to teach (cf. Matt 5:19). However, they acted and spoke not in their own authority, but “in the name of Jesus” (cf. Mark 9:38; Luke 10:17), in the name of the one who had “commissioned” (ἀποστέλλειν, ἄψ) them (Matt 10:16 / Luke 10:3). Whether Jesus used the word shelihim (שְׁלִיחִים) or not (cf. Mark 3:16; Luke 6:13 [ἀπόστολοι]) is not important, because for all practical purposes the disciples were his “sent ones,” who, when they were asked, had to be able to answer with the words of their Sender. This is the reason why Jesus said (Luke 10:16):

Whoever listens to you listens to me, and whoever rejects you rejects me,
and whoever rejects me rejects the one who sent me
(τὸν ἀποστειλάντά με).<sup>88</sup>

Jesus built, as it were, a chain of tradition that reached from God, through himself to the disciples and then onto their listeners. This commissioning of the disciples happened in a way analogous to the sending of the prophets of Israel (Matt 10:16 / Luke 10:3; cf. Luke 11:49–51). One of the most important speech-forms of the prophets was the so-called messenger formula “Go and say to X, thus says Y...” with the words of the sender following.<sup>89</sup> Even as early as the 1930’s, B. S. Easton correctly writes:

[Jesus] trained his disciples... for a popular preaching that was to echo his own as closely as possible; the various ‘mission charges’ in our gospels take the content of the disciples message so completely for granted that only its manner of delivery is described.<sup>90</sup>

<sup>87</sup> Cf. E. J. Schnabel, Early Christian Mission I: Jesus and the Twelve (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, Press; Leicester: Apollos, 2004), 263–315.

<sup>88</sup> For the originality of the Lukan form, cf. J. A. Fitzmyer, The Gospel According to Luke X–XXIV, AB 28A (New York: Doubleday, 1985), 856–857.

<sup>89</sup> Cf. C. Westermann, Basic Forms of Prophetic Speech (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1967).

<sup>90</sup> Christ in the Gospels (New York: Charles Scribner’s, 1930), 41.

Indeed, the only example found in the gospels of guidance that Jesus gave with regard to the content of the disciples' message (Matt 10:7 / Luke 10:9) is a self-citation (Mark 1:15 / Matt 4:17; Matt 12:28 / Luke 11:20). Special instructions for the disciples before their commission are not only mentioned in the context of the commissioning traditions, but also presupposed in a saying like Luke 12:3 (cf. Matt 10:27). In these instructions Jesus did not only regulate the manner in which the messengers were to present themselves, but he could also remind them of his parables and teaching summaries so that they could repeat them to their listeners.

3.7. Esoteric Instructions

The "woes" pronounced over the villages of Chorazin, Bethsaida and Capernaum (Matt 11:21–24 / Luke 10:13–15) show that the so-called "Galilean crisis" was not merely a construction of Mark, but a reality of Jesus' time.<sup>91</sup> Obviously, one reaction to this was the founding of the circle of the twelve (cf. John 6:66–70) by means of which Jesus wanted to uphold his right to God's people of Israel throughout the crisis (Matt 19:28 / Luke 22:30). The prophet Isaiah, who, after his preaching was rejected, "bound (צֹרֵר תְּעוּדָה) up the testimony and sealed the teaching among his disciples (הַתּוֹמִים תּוֹרָה כְּלִמְדֵי)" (cf. Isa 8:16). In the same way Jesus withdrew into his closest circle of followers to give esoteric instructions (JaL §19) to them (Mark 9:28 etc.; cf. 4:11–12). These instructions included, most notably, themes such as his claim to be the messianic Son of Man (Mark 8:27–33), the judgment over Israel and the world (Mark 13) and also the announcement and meaning of his forthcoming suffering and expiatory death (Mark 14:17–25). T. W. Manson has shown that the key concepts "kingdom of God" and "Son of Man" are expressed in very different terms.<sup>92</sup> If one does not want to dispute Jesus' authorship of one of the two themes,<sup>93</sup> two different situations or phases of his activity have to be assumed. And this is exactly what the gospels describe, although in different ways. According to R. A. Culpepper, some of the main features of ancient “schools” are admiration for the founding figure, community life, teaching and learning activities, esoteric instruction and a sense for tradition.<sup>94</sup> Therefore it is possible, in light of the above, to speak of the pre-Easter circle of Jesus’ disciples as a “school.”

<sup>91</sup> Cf. B. F. Meyer, Christus Faber: The Master Builder and the House of God (Allison Park, PA: Pickwick, 1992), 25–40; F. Mussner, "Gab es eine galiläische Krise?" in Jesus von Nazareth im Umfeld Israels und der Urkirche, ed. M. Theobald, WUNT 111 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1999), 74–85.

<sup>92</sup> The Teaching of Jesus: Studies in Its Form and Content, 2nd ed. (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1935), 320–329.

<sup>93</sup> Against this speaks already the combination of both in Dan 7:13–14. Cf. C. C. Caragounis, The Son of Man, WUNT 2.38 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1986); B. Witherington, The Christology of Jesus (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1990), 179–278.

4. Transmission: Pre-Synoptic Traditions

4.1. Personal Continuity

R. Bultmann didn’t really discuss the question of whether memories of eyewitnesses were preserved in the synoptic tradition (JaL §3.1). This prompted the ironic remark of V. Taylor: “If the Form-Critics are right, the disciples must have been translated to heaven immediately after the resurrection.”<sup>95</sup> However, M. Dibelius considered more seriously the likelihood of such memories, and hence his respect for the trustworthiness of the tradition was greater.<sup>96</sup> M. Albertz, the third but forgotten pioneer of classical form criticism, was even more positive about the consistent continuity between the pre- and post-Easter tradition.<sup>97</sup> As a result of the seminal article by H. Schürmann about the pre-Easter beginnings of the sayings tradition (note 85), one is nowadays generally more inclined to see some sort of continuity. G. Theißen postulates, as the most important bearers of tradition, a very hypothetical circle of “itinerant charismatics.”<sup>98</sup> K. E. Bailey,<sup>99</sup> and following him J. Dunn,<sup>100</sup> find in the rural Galilean

---

<sup>94</sup> The Johannine School: An Evaluation of the Johannine-School Hypothesis Based on an Investigation of the Nature of Ancient Schools, SBLDS 26 (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1975), 258–259. T. Schmeller, Schulen im Neuen Testament? Zur Stellung des Urchristentums in der Bildungswelt seiner Zeit, HBS 30 (Freiburg: Herder, 2001), does not treat the pre-Easter circle of disciples.

<sup>95</sup> The Formation of the Gospel Tradition, 2nd ed. (London: Macmillan, 1935), 41.

<sup>96</sup> Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums, 295.

<sup>97</sup> Die Botschaft des Neuen Testaments I/1: Die Entstehung des Evangeliums (Zollikon: Zwingli, 1947); and already M. Albertz, Die synoptischen Streitgespräche: Ein Beitrag zur Formgeschichte des Evangeliums (Berlin: Trowitzsch, 1921), VI.

<sup>98</sup> Sociology of Early Palestinian Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978).

<sup>99</sup> “Informal Controlled Oral Tradition and the Synoptic Gospels,” Asia Journal of Theology 5 (1991): 34–54; “Middle Eastern Oral Tradition and the Synoptic Gospels,” ExpTim 106 (1995): 563–567.

<sup>100</sup> “Altering the Default Setting: Re-envisaging the Early Transmission of the Jesus Tradition,” NTS 49 (2003): 139–175; Christianity in the Making 1: Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003), 239–245, 881–884.

communities the Sitz im Leben of an “informal controlled tradition.” However, both conceptions still maintain the notion of anonymous collectives, an assumption so prominent in classical form-criticism. Contrary to this, S. Byrskog, following modern research on Oral History, stresses the important role of individual witnesses and points to the examples of Peter and James, the brother of the Lord.<sup>101</sup> To this R. Bauckham adds the circle of the Twelve, Cleopas (Luke 24:18; cf. John 19:25) and specifically named women like Mary Magdalene and others (Mark 15:40–41; Luke 8:1–3). Bauckham sums up his comprehensive study of the subject in the following conclusion:

This stress in the Gospels on the eyewitness qualifications of those who were with Jesus from beginning to end, whether the Twelve as a group or particular disciples highlighted in particular Gospels, is an interesting point of correspondence with the best principles of Greek and Roman historiography, for which the best informant or (better) author was one who had extensive personal experience on the subject.<sup>102</sup>

Like Polybius (17.27.3) and Lucian (Hist. Conscr. 47), Luke (Luke 1:1–4) and Papias of Hierapolis (in Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.39.3–4) emphasized the importance of eyewitnesses.

In 1 Cor 15:3–5 Paul cites a tradition (εὐαγγέλιον) that combines both the passion and resurrection stories of Jesus, and which, in its basic form, reaches back into the first couple of decades of the early church in Jerusalem (cf. 1 Cor 15:11).<sup>103</sup> This makes it clear that since the earliest period of church history the content of tradition was bound up with particular names and groups of “tradition-transmitters” like Peter and the Twelve (1 Cor 15:5), or James as representative of the family of Jesus (1 Cor 15:7). In the extended form of the tradition, as Paul passes this on to the Corinthians, it is hinted that there were, besides Jerusalem, two other areas in which Jesus tradition was fostered: Galilee, where

---

<sup>101</sup> Story as History—History as Story, WUNT 123 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000). An updated summary in S. Byrskog, “Das Lernen der Jesusgeschichte nach den synoptischen Evangelien” in Religiöses Lernen in der biblischen, frühjüdischen und frühchristlichen Überlieferung, ed. B. Ego and H. Merkel, WUNT 180 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2005), 191–210.

<sup>102</sup> “The Eyewitnesses and the Gospel Traditions,” JSHJ 1 (2003): 28–60, here 59. This article is a summary of Jesus and the Eyewitnesses: The Gospels as Eyewitness Testimony (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2006).

<sup>103</sup> Cf. C. Wolff, Der erste Brief des Paulus an die Korinther, THK 7 (Berlin: EVA, 1996), 355–361; and also R. Riesner, “Chronologie und Theologie bei Paulus,” JET 10 (1996): 110–122.

one is to obviously situate (cf. Matt 28:16–17) the appearance to the five hundred (1 Cor 15:6),<sup>104</sup> and the churches founded in the Pauline missions, in which stories were circulated about the Christophany experience of Paul (1 Cor 15:8; cf. Acts 9:1–9). With this in mind, one ought not to neglect the geographical factor in relation to the question of the early passing on of tradition.

In a groundbreaking work about oral tradition, J. Vansina specifies two different conditions necessary for the possibility of reliable tradition: (1) the existence of fixed and possibly even “esoteric” transmitters and (2) the use of mnemonic techniques as aids to the securing of the tradition.<sup>105</sup> As regards the pre- and post-Easter nature and treatment of the words of Jesus, both of these conditions were met, thus qualifying them as fostered tradition (JaL §3.6). The highly memorable sayings of Jesus, but also many of the deliberately formed narratives, cannot be classified as fluid folklore, but rather as teaching tradition. The influence of Christian prophets on the shaping of the Jesus tradition has been completely overestimated.<sup>106</sup> In the Gospel of Mark it is particularly the “Twelve” around Peter that are depicted as prototypes of transmitters.<sup>107</sup> Indeed, they built a living bridge of tradition between pre- and post-Easter times. Nevertheless, conservative scholars have often not paid enough attention to the fact that the existence of eye and ear witnesses is, although a necessary condition, not a sufficient one to secure a reliable transmission of a word tradition. Even memorable tradition suffers from the natural limitations of human memory.<sup>108</sup> Such deficiencies can mainly be overcome by means of repetition and the use of written notes.

<sup>104</sup> Cf. E. F. F. Bishop, “The Risen Christ and the Five Hundred Brethren,” CBQ 18 (1956): 341–344; H. J. Klauck, 1. Korintherbrief, NEB 7 (Würzburg: Echter, 1984), 110; D. Häusser, Christusbekenntnis und Jesusüberlieferung bei Paulus, WUNT 2.210 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006), 131–135.

<sup>105</sup> Oral Tradition: A Study in Historical Methodology (London: Kegan & Paul, 1965), 31. Cf. also R. Finnegan, Oral Poetry: Its Nature, Significance and Social Context (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1977), 52–87; W. J. Ong, Orality and Literacy: The Technologizing of the Word (London: Routledge, 1982), 62–63; D. C. Rubin, Memory in Oral Traditions (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1995), 75–88.

<sup>106</sup> Cf. D. E. Aune, Prophecy in Early Christianity and the Ancient Mediterranean World (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1983), 233–246; Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 186–192.

<sup>107</sup> Cf. K. Stock, Boten aus dem Mit-Ihm-Sein: Das Verhältnis zwischen Jesus und den Zwölf nach Markus, AnBib 70 (Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1975).

<sup>108</sup> Cf. R. McIver and M. Carroll, “Experiments to Determine Distinguishing Characteristics of Orally Transmitted Material by Literary Means, and Their Potential Implications for the Synoptic Problem,” JBL 121 (2002): 667–687.

4.2. Cultivated Tradition

Philo took it for granted that the training of the memory (μνήμη) was a necessary part of egkyklios paideia (Somn. 1.205). M. Carruthers provides the following picture of an educated man in Hellenistic-Roman antiquity:

The choice to train one's memory or not for the ancients and medievals was not a choice dictated by convenience: it was a matter of ethics. A person without a memory, if such a thing could be, would be a person without moral character and, in a basic sense, without humanity.<sup>109</sup>

Although, on the one hand, to memorize something often meant no more than to have the gist of that something memorized, this is not the whole picture. On the other hand, not only in the instruction of educated families (Xenophon, Symp. 3.5), but in all levels of Hellenistic schooling, learning by heart played an important role (Plato, Euthydemus 276D; Horace, Ep. 1.18.12–14).<sup>110</sup> The pedagogue Quintilian makes it clear that schoolboys memorized large parts of classical literature in order to have examples at hand for imitation (Inst. Orat. 2.7.2–4). We know of many gnomic school texts from antiquity.<sup>111</sup> In rhetoric schools the memory was also trained (Cicero, De Inv. 1.9), and exemplary texts were learnt by heart (Isocrates, Soph. 12–13). R. Finnegan, the acclaimed expert on oral tradition, wrote:

The demonstration that rote-memory need not be important in oral poetry has sometimes misled students of the subject (myself included) to assume that it is never important. Parry and Lord did not go so far as this, but their works can be read as implying it.<sup>112</sup>

Importantly, she stresses that verbatim transmission was not unusual with ritualized, religious oral “texts.” The practice of memorizing something verbatim was far more common in the societies of antiquity that had developed systems of scribes and schools,<sup>113</sup> as in Second Temple

---

<sup>109</sup> The Book of Memory: A Study of Memory in Medieval Culture (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990), 13.

<sup>110</sup> Cf. K. Berger, “Hellenistische Gattungen im Neuen Testament,” in ANRW II 25.2, ed. W. Haase (Berlin: De Gruyter, 1984), 1031–1432, at 1296–1299.

<sup>111</sup> Cf. T. Morgan, Literate Education in the Hellenistic and Roman Worlds (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998), 120–151.

<sup>112</sup> Oral Poetry, 73.

<sup>113</sup> Cf. J. Goody, The Interface between the Written and the Oral (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987), 167–190; L. Schwienhorst-Schönberger, “Den Ruf der

Judaism. Josephus took pride in his exceptional ability to memorize (Life 8). According to Philo the Jews “trained from their earliest years” to have “the commandments enshrined in their souls (ἐν ταῖς ψυχαῖς ἀγαλματοφοροῦσι)” (Legat. 210; cf. Josephus, Apion 2.178). Even the Roman satirist Juvenal confirmed that the Jews “learnt the Law of Moses by heart (Iudaicum ediscunt... ius Moyses)” (Sat. 14.101–102 [ed. Stern 2.102]).

Scholars rarely consider it possible that there were some educated believers before the foundation of the Pauline communities. Contrary to this, however, one should take note of two special groups, apparently connected with each other, in the primitive community of Jerusalem. (1) Joseph Barnabas and also his nephew (or cousin) John Mark were of Levitical descent (Acts 4:36–37; 12:12). Levites not only had teaching tasks in Old Testament times (Deut 31:9–13; Neh 8:9 etc.), but they also played an important role in the Essene communities (1QS 1–2 etc.).<sup>114</sup> (2) R. Schnackenburg<sup>115</sup> and A. T. Lincoln<sup>116</sup> discovered, with a degree of surprise, that, possibly at a rather early stage, some Essene Christian converts exercised a certain degree of influence on the baptismal catechesis. The Book of Acts provides some clues that members of the Essene quarter of Jerusalem (Josephus, War 5.145)<sup>117</sup> joined the primitive community in its formative years (Acts 2:4; 6:7).<sup>118</sup> In early monasticism, the memorizing of the Holy Scriptures was highly valued (Pachomius, Praecepta 139–140).<sup>119</sup> The roots of this life-style go back to the circle of Jesus’ disciples and to Christian ascetics influenced by Weisheit hören: Lernkonzepte in der alttestamentlichen Weisheitsliteratur,” in Religiöses Lernen, ed. Ego and Merkel, 69–82, here 76–78.

---

<sup>114</sup> Cf. G. J. Brooke, “Levi and the Levites in the Dead Sea Scrolls and the New Testament,” in The Dead Sea Scrolls and the New Testament (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2005), 115–139; R. Riesner, “Der ‚neue Bund‘ und die Überlieferungsströme im Urchristentum,” in Jesus als Bote des Heils, ed. L. Hauser, F. R. Prostmeier, and C. Georg-Zöllner, SBB 60 (Stuttgart: Katholischen Bibelwerk, 2008), 277–293.

<sup>115</sup> Der Brief an die Epheser, EKK 10 (Zürich: Benziger; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchner, 1982), 227.

<sup>116</sup> Ephesians, WBC 42 (Dallas: Word, 1990), 327.

<sup>117</sup> Cf. E. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ II, ed. G. Vermes, F. Millar, and M. Black (Edinburgh: Clark: 1979), 563 n. 5; B. Pixner, “Mount Zion, Jesus, and Archaeology,” in Jesus and Archaeology, ed. J. H. Charlesworth (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2006), 309–322.

<sup>118</sup> Cf. R. Riesner, “Jesus, the Primitive Community, and the Essene Quarter of Jerusalem,” in Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls, ed. Charlesworth, 198–234; idem, Essener und Urgemeinde in Jerusalem: Neue Funde und Quellen, BAZ 6 (Gießen: Brunnen, 1998); idem, “Essener und Urkirche auf dem Südwesthügel Jerusalems (Zion III),” in Laetare Jerusalem, ed. N. C. Schnabel, JThF 10 (Münster: Aschendorff, 2006), 200–234.

<sup>119</sup> Cf. W. A. Graham, Beyond the Written Word: Oral Aspects of Scripture in the History of Religion (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987), 126–140.

Essenism.<sup>120</sup> The liberal scholar P. Wernle pointedly declared: “Upon joining the community every Christian learnt the most important words of the Lord by heart.”<sup>121</sup>

The tradition-terminology in 1 Cor 15:3a (παραδόναί, παραλαμβάνειν) has a direct parallel (לְקַבֵּל, רָסַמ) in the rabbinic literature (m. Ab. 1:1) and this suggests a deliberate passing on with the effort to remain true to the original, even in wording (τινὶ λόγῳ [1 Cor 15:1–2]). For an educated Christian like Papias, the Gospel of Mark indicated that Peter had taught the Jesus tradition in memorable units (πρὸς τὰς χρεῖαις ἐποίετο τὰς διδασκαλίας [Hist. Eccl. 3.39.15]).<sup>122</sup> The memorization of chreiai (χρεῖαι) by repetition was not only practiced by schoolboys but also by adults (Dio Chrysostomus, Or. 72.11; cf. Seneca, Ep. 33.7). According to the Pseudo-Clementine Recognitions (2.1 [MPG 1:1249]), Peter was “recalling and repeating (recolens ac retexens) the words of the Lord” in order “to keep them in memory (memoriter tenere).” Concerning the words of his teacher Polycarp, Irenaeus wrote: “I repeat them constantly in genuine form (γνησίως ἀντὰ ἀναμαρτωμῶμαι)” (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 5.20.7 [ed. Schwartz 208]). It is probable that these two passages from the second century AD only make explicit what was commonly practiced in the first century AD. The letters of Paul and James are important witnesses of the state of affairs between Jesus and the synoptic gospels.

4.3. Paul

The different components of the formula in 1 Cor 15:3–5 are best understood as (types of) headlines indicating the use of certain Jesus traditions.<sup>123</sup> Paul, the pupil of Gamaliel (Acts 22:3),<sup>124</sup> was accustomed

<sup>120</sup> Cf. F. C. Joest, “Vom Ursprung des Mönchtums,” Edith Stein Jahrbuch 8 (2002): 21–33.

<sup>121</sup> Die synoptische Frage (Freiburg: Mohr, 1899), 221: “Die wichtigsten Herrenworte hat damals jeder Christ beim Eintritt in die Gemeinde auswendiggelernt.” Cf. also R. Riesner, “Taufkatechese und Jesus-Überlieferung,” in Logos—Logik—Lyrik, ed. V. A. Lehnert and U. Rösen-Weinhold, ABG 27 (Leipzig: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 2007), 305–339.

<sup>122</sup> Cf. J. Kürzinger, Papias von Hierapolis und die Evangelien des Neuen Testaments, EichM 4 (Regensburg: F. Pustet, 1983), 43–68; Bauckham, Jesus and the Eyewitnesses, 205–217; and already R. O. P. Taylor, The Groundwork of the Gospels (Oxford: Blackwell, 1946), 26–30.

<sup>123</sup> J. Roloff, Apostolat—Verkündigung—Kirche: Ursprung, Inhalt und Funktion des kirchlichen Apostelamts nach Paulus, Lukas und den Pastoralbriefen (Gütersloh: Gütersloher, 1965), 48.

<sup>124</sup> Cf. M. Hengel, The Pre-Christian Paul (with R. Deines; London: SCM; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1991), 40–53.

to using such simanim (סִמָּנִים) in summarizing traditions.<sup>125</sup> As is shown by 1 Cor 11:23–24, this is not a mere hypothesis. Paul started with the same transmission terminology and, after a kind of headline “On the night he was betrayed,” cited the Eucharistic words of Jesus (cf. Luke 22:19–20). It is a matter of debate how much knowledge of the Jesus tradition is presupposed in the letters of Paul.<sup>126</sup> One should not be too perplexed that the apostle explicitly refers to the words of Jesus only on rare occasions (certainly in 1 Cor 7:10; 9:16; 11:23; 1 Thess 4:15, but also very likely in 1 Cor 10:33–11:1; Rom 14:14). Even the First Epistle of John did not explicitly cite or refer to the words of Jesus, a fact made all the more remarkable because the Gospel of John was written in the same circle. If there existed a controlled Jesus tradition, as is witnessed by Paul (1 Cor 11:23; 15:1–3), then it would have been possible to allude to it in letters etc. The use of the Old Testament in the New Testament is a comparable phenomenon. We have many more allusions, whether loose or clear, than direct citations. Without a clear picture of the person and activity of Jesus (cf. Gal 3:1), Paul’s preaching would not have been understood. A thorough analysis of his letters shows that they presuppose a remarkable number of Jesus traditions.<sup>127</sup> For example, he knew the ransom logion (1 Cor 9:19–21; 10:33–11:1; cf. 1 Cor 7:22–23; Rom 5:15), something of central importance for the claims and aims of Jesus (Mark 10:45 / Matt 20:28; cf. Acts 20:28, 35).<sup>128</sup> The argumentation of a whole passage like 1 Corinthians 8–10 is guided by the words (cf. 1 Cor 9:14) and the example of Jesus (1 Cor 11:1).<sup>129</sup> This is all the more remarkable as the problem of food sacrificed to idols was not something directly touched upon by Jesus. In cases like this Paul applied Jesus traditions in a similar way, by means of analogy, since the “command of the Lord (ἐπιταγή τοῦ κυρίου)” had more authority than his own opinion (1 Cor 7:10–12, 25).

<sup>125</sup> Cf. Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript, 299–300.

<sup>126</sup> Cf. R. Riesner, “Paulus und die Jesus-Überlieferung,” in Evangelium—Schriftauslegung—Kirche: Festschrift für Peter Stuhlmacher, ed. J. Ådna, S. Hafemann, and O. Hofius (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997), 346–365.

<sup>127</sup> Cf. especially M. B. Thompson, Clothed with Christ: The Example and Teaching of Jesus in Romans 12.1–15.13, JSNTSup 59 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1991); D. Wenham, Paul: Follower of Jesus or Founder of Christianity (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1995); S. Kim, “The Jesus Tradition in Paul,” in Paul and the New Perspective: Second Thoughts on the Origins of Paul’s Gospel, WUNT 140 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2002), 259–292.

<sup>128</sup> Cf. R. Riesner, “Back to the Historical Jesus Through Paul and His School (The Ransom Logion—Mark 10.45; Matthew 20.28),” JSHJ 1 (2003): 171–199.

<sup>129</sup> Cf. S. Kim, “Imitatio Christi (1 Corinthians 11:1): How Paul Imitates Jesus Christ in Dealing with Idol Food (1 Corinthians 8–10),” BBR 13 (2003): 193–226.

Most of the allusions and citations are nearer to the Lukan form of the tradition. Second in frequency are allusions which approximate to a Matthean form. However, occasionally one even finds agreements with Mark (Rom 14:14 / Mark 7:15 etc.) and John (1 Cor 15:36–37 / John 12:24 etc.). For a long time it was believed that Paul received his traditions mainly from the community in Antioch. Today, however, there exists a critique of this “Pan-Antiochenism,”<sup>130</sup> and more attention is given to the Damascus community whose importance for Paul had already been stressed by O. Cullmann.<sup>131</sup> That Paul in his letters was so near to the Lukan special tradition is best explained by the fact that this was the form of tradition he received in the first messianic community he belonged to (cf. Acts 9:17–18). The apostle, of course, had other opportunities to learn Jesus tradition. One such possibility is when he met with Peter and James, the Brother of the Lord, around AD 33/34 in Jerusalem (Gal 1:18).<sup>132</sup> At a later meeting with these two figures Paul also mentions John, the Son of Zebedee, as one of the “pillars” (στυλοὶ) in the temple of the eschatological people of God (Gal 2:9). It is probably not going too much out on a limb to suggest that around this important Christian leader and witness to the Historical Jesus was a group fostering its special form of tradition. In respect to Paul’s acquaintance with Jesus tradition, one should not forget the role of Barnabas of Jerusalem as his companion on the first missionary journey (Acts 13–14; cf. Gal 2:1–13). That in 1 Thessalonians Paul is rather near to a Matthean form of tradition could be due to the influence of Silas, the Jerusalem Hellenist and co-author of this letter (1 Thess 1:1).<sup>133</sup>

4.4. James

The numerous allusions in the Letter of James to the Jesus tradition are widely recognized. Today there are new adherents to the thesis that

<sup>130</sup> M. Hengel and A. M. Schwemer, Paul between Damascus and Antioch: The Unknown Years (London: SCM, 1997), 286. Cf. even G. Strecker, Theologie des Neuen Testaments, ed. F. W. Horn (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1996), 70.

<sup>131</sup> Die Tradition als exegetisches, historisches und theologisches Problem (Zürich: Zwingli, 1954), 15–16. Cf. also R. Riesner, “L’héritage juif de Paul et les débuts de sa mission,” in Paul, une théologie en construction, ed. A. Detwiler, J. D. Kaestli, and D. Marguerat (Geneva: Labor et Fides, 2004), 135–155, here 148–152.

<sup>132</sup> Cf. R. Riesner, Paul’s Early Period: Chronology, Mission Strategy, Theology (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1998), 319–323.

<sup>133</sup> Cf., E. G. Selwyn, The First Epistle of St. Peter, 2nd ed. (London: Macmillan, 1947), 369–375; and also H. Binder, “Paulus und die Thessalonicherbriefe,” in The Thessalonian Correspondence, ed. R. F. Collins, BETL 87 (Leuven: Peeters, 1990), 87–93.

the letter was composed either by James himself or by those in a circle closely associated with him.<sup>134</sup> The form of the Jesus tradition in the letter shows a certain relationship to the Lukan special tradition (Jas 5:1 / Luke 6:24–25 etc.).<sup>135</sup> It appears that this was the form of tradition that was particularly fostered in the wider family of Jesus. This is confirmed by an analysis of the language and content of the Lukan special tradition, and especially by geographical and personal clues found in the text.<sup>136</sup> The tradition is characterized by a Hebraized language and by aspects that betray a certain contact with Judea and Jerusalem. Particularly stressed are themes such as poverty, Holy Spirit and Israel as the people of God. Some sources of this tradition are hinted at in the text, namely: Mary, the Mother of Jesus (Luke 2:19, 51), his uncle Cleopas (Luke 24:18; cf. John 19:25; Hegesippus [Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.11]), and also some women followers (Luke 8:1–3; cf. Acts 1:14).<sup>137</sup> It is possible to explain why Paul, in Damascus, learnt this form of tradition. The community was founded by Jewish Christians, with Hasidic or Essene background (εὐλαβῆς from יְהוֹשֻׁעַ בֶּן יוֹסֵפִי), who had contacts with the relatives of Jesus (Acts 22:12; cf. Luke 2:25).<sup>138</sup> K. Berger suggests that similarities between the letters of Paul and the Johannine writings go back to a common Damascene tradition.<sup>139</sup> As it is generally recognized, there exist some striking agreements between the Gospel of John and the Lukan special tradition. Where Paul and John are, thematically and in

<sup>134</sup> Cf. especially L. T. Johnson, The Letter of James, AB 37A (New York: Doubleday, 1995); R. Bauckham, James: Wisdom of James, Disciple of Jesus the Sage (London: Routledge, 1999).

<sup>135</sup> Cf. R. Riesner, "James," in The Oxford Bible Commentary, ed. J. Barton and J. Muddiman (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001), 1255–1263.

<sup>136</sup> Cf. R. Riesner, "Luke's Special Tradition and the Question of a Hebrew Gospel Source," Mishkan 20 (1994): 44–52; idem, "James's Speech (Acts 15:13–21), Simeon's Hymn (Luke 2:29–32), and Luke's Sources," in Jesus of Nazareth: Lord and Christ: Essays on the Historical Jesus and New Testament Christology: Festschrift Howard Marshall, ed. J. B. Green and M. Turner (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans; Carlisle: Paternoster, 1994), 263–278; idem, "Das Lokalkolorit des Lukas-Sonderguts: Italisches oder palästinisch-judenchristlich?" SBFLA 49 (1999): 51–64.

<sup>137</sup> Cf. R. Riesner, "Die Emmaus-Erzählung (Lukas 24,13–35): Lukanische Theologie, judenchristliche Tradition und palästinische Topographie," in Emmaus in Judäa: Geschichte—Exegese—Archäologie, ed. K. H. Fleckenstein, M. Louhivuori, and R. Riesner, BAZ 11 (Gießen: Brunnen, 2003), 150–207; and also R. Bauckham, Gospel Women: Studies of the Named Women in the Gospels (London: Routledge, 2002), 257–310.

<sup>138</sup> Cf. R. Riesner, Bethanien jenseits des Jordan: Topographie und Theologie im Johannes-Evangelium, BAZ 12 (Gießen: Brunnen, 2002), 113–117.

<sup>139</sup> Theologiegeschichte des Urchristentums: Theologie des Neuen Testaments, 2nd ed. (Tübingen: Francke, 1995), 233–236.

terms of language, rather close, one mostly finds a pre-Lukan tradition as a common denominator.<sup>140</sup>

4.5. Early Written Notes

Books in antiquity served as aids to commit the subject matter to memory (cf. Josephus, Ant. 20.118). For this reason they were normally read aloud (cf. Acts 8:30). However legendary his story might be, Clement of Alexandria provides a realistic picture of the practises of antiquity when, according to him, some Roman knights requested from Mark a written gospel in order that they “could commit to memory what was said (ut possent quae dicebantur memoriae commendare)” (Adumbrationes ad 1 Pet 5:13 [GCS 17.206]). Later, in the fourth century AD, Augustine took for granted that he himself and some Christian catechists had memorized all of the four gospels by heart: “totumque evangelium... ad verbum edidicimus” (De catechizandis rudibus 5). Paul did not have anything to stop him writing down, around 54 CE, a Jesus tradition like the Eucharistic words (1 Cor 11:23–24). It is generally believed that the sayings source Q was written down in about the year 50 CE.<sup>141</sup> But the obvious question arises: Why so late?

G. Theißen suggests that due to the severe crisis under Caligula in the years 40/41 CE, the substance of the synoptic apocalypse (Mark 13) and passion narrative were fixed in written form.<sup>142</sup> According to R. Pesch, even before the high priest Caiaphas was forced to leave his post in 37 CE, there was, he postulates, a pre-Markan passion narrative written down in Jerusalem, starting with the confession of Peter (Mark 8:27–30).<sup>143</sup> It was very common in educated circles of the Hellenistic-Roman times to take notes (ὑπομνήματα, commentarii).<sup>144</sup> For C. H. Roberts it was self-evident: “No doubt the oral [gospel] tradition was

<sup>140</sup> Cf. R. Riesner, “Genesis 3,15 in vorlukanischer und johanneischer Tradition,” SNTU A 29 (2004): 119–178.

<sup>141</sup> Cf. U. Schnelle, Einleitung in das Neue Testament, 5th ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2005), 226–227.

<sup>142</sup> Lokalkolorit und Zeitgeschichte in den Evangelien: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition, NTOA 8 (Freiburg: Universitätsverlag; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1989), 133–211.

<sup>143</sup> Das Evangelium der Urgemeinde (Freiburg: Herder, 1979); Das Markusevangelium II, 4th ed., HTK 2.2 (Freiburg: Herder, 1991), 1–27.

<sup>144</sup> Cf. G. A. Kennedy, “Classical and Christian Source Criticism,” in The Relationships among the Gospels: An Interdisciplinary Dialogue, ed. W. O. Walker (San Antonio: Trinity University Press, 1978), 125–155, here 130–137.

reinforced, as it was in Judaism, with notes.”<sup>145</sup> Even a critic of F. C. Baur like H. W. J. Thiersch defended such a hypothesis.<sup>146</sup> Also F. D. E. Schleiermacher, while developing his “Diegesen-Hypothese” from Luke 1: 1–4 (πολλοὶ ἐπεχείρησαν ἀνατάξασθαι διήγησιν), pointed in the same direction.<sup>147</sup> We know of the gospels only in the form of the papyrus-codex. Since this was one of the typical forms of the notebook (cf. 2 Tim 4:13), one could suggest that the gospels were edited with the help of informal notes.<sup>148</sup> In the light of that contemporary background one can say that, probable as such notes are, it is equally improbable that any will be discovered. Since they were only meant for private use and not published works (ἐκδόσεις) for distribution, they have not been preserved.<sup>149</sup> One can only try to conceive of the existence of some pre-synoptic sources by combining literary analysis and historical reconstruction.

5. Publication: The Synoptic Gospels

5.1. Literary Analysis

In the 1960’s, for most scholars, the two-document hypothesis seemed to be an assured result. Today it is still the most popular solution,<sup>150</sup> but there is now serious competition (JaL §1).<sup>151</sup> The new Griesbach

<sup>145</sup> “Books in the Graeco-Roman World and the New Testament,” in The Cambridge History of the Bible I: From the Beginnings to Jerome, ed. P. R. Ackroyd and C. F. Evans (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970), 48–66, here 55. For the use of written notes in the redaction of the Mishnah cf. M. S. Jaffee, Torah in the Mouth: Writing and Oral Tradition in Palestinian Judaism 200 BCE–400 CE (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001), 100–125.

<sup>146</sup> Versuch einer Herstellung des historischen Standpuncts für die Kritik der neutestamentlichen Schriften (Erlangen: C. Heyder, 1845), 84.

<sup>147</sup> “Über die Schriften des Lukas, ein kritischer Versuch [1817],” in Exegetische Schriften, ed. H. Patsch and D. Schmid (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2001), 1–180.

<sup>148</sup> Cf. the discussion in S. Enste, Kein Markustext in Qumran: Eine Untersuchung der These: Qumran-Fragment 7Q5 = Mk 6,52–53, NTOA 45 (Fribourg: Universitätsverlag; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2000), 86–94; G. N. Stanton, “Why Were Early Christians Addicted to the Codex?” in Jesus and Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004), 165–191; and also M. McCormick, “The Birth of the Codex and the Apostolic Life-Style,” Scriptorium 39 (1985): 150–158.

<sup>149</sup> Cf. also L. Alexander, “Ancient Book Production and the Circulation of the Gospels,” in The Gospels for All Christians: Rethinking the Gospel Audiences, ed. R. Bauckham (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans; Carlisle: Paternoster, 1998), 71–112.

<sup>150</sup> Especially influential is F. Neirynck, Evangelica: Gospel Studies—Études d’Évangile I/II, BETL 82 and 94 (Leuven: Peeters 1982; 1991), etc.

<sup>151</sup> Cf. E. P. Sanders and M. Davies, Studying the Synoptic Gospels (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1989), 51–119; R. E. Brown, An Introduction to the New Testament (New York: Doubleday, 1997), 111–125; D. L. Dungan, A History of the Synoptic hypothesis,<sup>152</sup> the Farrer hypothesis<sup>153</sup> and the multiple-source hypothesis<sup>154</sup> have now been applied to the entire synoptic tradition. One is certainly correct to also stress the importance of the oral factor in the formation of the synoptic tradition,<sup>155</sup> even if the tradition hypothesis cannot explain the entire synoptic phenomenon (cf. Matt 24:15 / Mark 13:14 [ὁ ἀναγινώσκων νοεῖτω]). Indeed, the camp of the Two-Document-Hypothesis supporters is not united. Some doubt that Q was a unified document.<sup>156</sup> Others propose that Q was a proto-gospel, including narratives with minor agreements (strong Mark-Q overlaps) and perhaps even a passion narrative.<sup>157</sup> There are now some strong voices among younger scholars that dispense with Q altogether.<sup>158</sup> Given

---

Problem: The Canon, the Text, the Composition, and the Interpretation of the Gospels (New York: Doubleday, 1999), 345–394; D. A. Black and D. R. Beck, eds., Rethinking the Synoptic Problem (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 2001); M. Goodacre, The Synoptic Problem: A Way through the Maze, The Biblical Seminar 80 (London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001); D. A. Carson and D. J. Moo, An Introduction to the New Testament (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 2005), 88–103.

<sup>152</sup> H. Riley, The Making of Mark (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1989); A. J. McNicol (with L. O. Cope, D. L. Dungan, W. R. Farmer, D. Peabody, and P. L. Shuler), Beyond the Q Impasse: Luke's Use of Matthew (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1996); D. B. Peabody, L. O. Cope, and A. J. McNicol, eds., One Gospel from Two: Mark's Use of Matthew and Luke (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2002).

<sup>153</sup> E. Franklin, Luke, Interpreter of Paul, Critic of Matthew, JSNTSup 92 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1994); M. Goodacre, The Case Against Q: Studies in Markan Priority and the Synoptic Problem (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2002).

<sup>154</sup> P. Benoit and M. É. Boismard, Synopse des quatre évangiles I–II, 2nd ed. (Paris: Cerf, 1973).

<sup>155</sup> Cf. A. D. Baum, “Oral Poetry und synoptische Frage: Analogien zu Umfang, Variation und Art der synoptischen Wortlautidentität,” TZ 59 (2003): 17–34; idem, Der mündliche Faktor und seine Bedeutung für die synoptische Frage: Analogien aus der Antiken Literatur, der Experimentalpsychologie, der Oral Poetry-Forschung und dem rabbinischen Traditionswesen, TANZ 49 (Tübingen: Francke, 2008); T. C. Mournet, Oral Tradition and Literary Dependency: Variability and Stability in the Synoptic Tradition and Q, WUNT 2.195 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2005).

<sup>156</sup> Cf. T. Bergemann, Q auf dem Prüfstand: Die Zuordnung des Mt/Lk-Stoffes zu Q am Beispiel der Bergpredigt, FRLANT 158 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1993).

<sup>157</sup> Cf. H. Fledderman, Mark and Q: A Study of Overlap Texts, BETL 122 (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1995); E. Franklin, “A Passion Narrative for Q?” in Understanding Studying, and Reading: New Testament Essays in Honour of John Ashton, ed. C. Rowland and C. H. T. Fletcher-Louis, JSNTSup 153 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1998), 30–47; S. Hultgren, Narrative Elements in the Double Tradition: A Study of Their Place within the Framework of the Gospel Narrative, BZNW 113 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002); H. M. Humphrey, From Q to “Secret” Mark: A Composition History of the Earliest Narrative Theology (New York: T&T Clark, 2006); and also J. Schröter, “Anfänge der Jesusüberlieferung: Überlieferungsgeschichtliche Beobachtungen zu einem Bereich urchristlicher Theologiegeschichte,” NTS 50 (2004): 53–76.

<sup>158</sup> M. Goodacre and Nicholas Perrin, eds., Questioning Q: A Multidimensional Critique (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2004), with a foreword by N. T. Wright (IX–XI).

the far-reaching implications of certain forms of the Q hypothesis for the understanding of Jesus and early Christianity<sup>159</sup> this seems to be a rather dramatic development. Absolute Markan priority is doubted by proponents of a Proto-Mark<sup>160</sup> or a Deutero-Mark.<sup>161</sup> Some believe that Matthew used Luke and others, quite the opposite. In order to create a plausible synoptic model, one should integrate as many literary phenomena as possible, and should ensure that it is compatible with the known history of early Christianity (JaL §3). There are so many hypotheses suggested because everyone can explain parts of the related problems plausibly. If one is to suggest a hypothesis that could even approach a complete solution it should combine elements of different proposed models. This reasoning would require a somewhat complex model, something like a combination of the tradition hypothesis and a multiple-source hypothesis.

In the following a combined model is proposed, individual elements of which proponents of other models might accept.<sup>162</sup> (1) Double expressions in Mark speak strongly for the possibility that it was created from two parallel sources (cf. Mark 1:32 etc.).<sup>163</sup> Both sources go back to an older source that comprises the material common to Matthew, Mark and Luke (traditio triplex). One edition of this “proto-Mark” was enlarged by material common to Matthew and Mark, which concentrated on Galilee and was of interest to Jewish Christians (Mark 6:45–8:21 / Matt 14:22–16:12). The other edition of “Proto-Mark” was characterized by

<sup>159</sup> Cf. only J. S. Kloppenborg, Excavating Q: The History and Setting of the Sayings Gospel (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2000).

<sup>160</sup> W. Schmithals, Einleitung in die drei ersten Evangelien (Berlin: De Gruyter, 1985), 404–431; H. Koester, Ancient Christian Gospels: Their History and Development (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990), 273–285.

<sup>161</sup> A. Fuchs, Spuren von Deuteromarkus I–IV, SNTU B4 (Münster: LIT, 2004); Schnelle, Einleitung in das Neue Testament, 190–198.

<sup>162</sup> A more thorough argument will be given in another publication. As has only recently been drawn to my attention, the model I propose is close to that of R. Devreese, Les Évangiles et l'Évangile (Paris: Fleurus, 1963). There are noteworthy similarities to, e.g., D. Guthrie, New Testament Introduction, 4th ed. (Leicester: Apollos; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1990), 1029–1045; R. Minnerath, De Jérusalem à Rome: Pierre et l'unité de l'église apostolique, ThH 101 (Paris: Beauchesne, 1994); P. Rolland, L'origine et la date des évangiles: Les témoins oculaires de Jésus (Paris: Saint Paul, 1994); H. J. Schulz, Die apostolische Herkunft der Evangelien: Zum Ursprung der Evangelienform in der urgemeindlichen Paschafeier, QD 145 (Freiburg: Herder, 3rd ed., 1997).

<sup>163</sup> Cf. P. Rolland, Les premiers évangiles: Un nouveau regard sur le problème synoptique, LD 116 (Paris: Cerf, 1984), 59–157; D. Burkett, Rethinking the Gospel Sources: From Proto-Mark to Mark (New York: T. & T. Clark, 2004).

small textual alterations common to Mark and Luke. These modifications are mainly stylistic improvements, some of which would have been helpful for Gentile Christians to better understand the text (Mark 2:7 / Luke 5:21; Mark 12:12 / Luke 20:19 etc.). (2) Q by definition is a sayings source, but the story of the centurion of Capernaum (Matt 8:5–13 / Luke 7:1–10) shows it contained at least one miracle story. Of course, this was a text of special interest for Gentile Christians. Other narrative texts with strong minor agreements cannot be excluded a priori from the hypothetical source. This means that Q develops into a full gospel. Since this source follows the structure of Mark it is fair to assume that it is an edition of “Proto-Mark” that has been enlarged by sayings material. (3) The special tradition of Luke consisted not only in material unique to him. Material found in the triple tradition and in “Q” that is characterized by a Hebraizing, Judean-Jewish-Christian tendency, should also be included.<sup>164</sup> Luke has combined this special source with the Gentile Christian edition of “Proto-Mark.” The minor and major agreements (“Q”) of Luke with Matthew point to a common dependency on that Greek source, which combined “Proto-Mark” with the sayings tradition. It is a more complicated matter to define the relationship between the Lukan special tradition on the one hand, and this combined source and the Greek “Proto-Mark” on the other hand. The similarities in material and structure could even be explained by a common source, i.e. a Semitic “Proto-Mark.” (4) Before and after these gospel-like sources, there also existed smaller written collections of sayings (Mark 13), parables (Mark 4), conflict stories (Mark 2:1–3:6) and even passion narratives.<sup>165</sup>

5.2. Historical Reconstruction

An explanatory model should be as complex as is necessary and, at the same time, as simple as possible. The following diagram illustrates the most important stages of the tradition as it develops from its origin with Jesus right up till the publication in the canonical gospels. This combined hypothesis simplifies, without a doubt, a far more complex reality marked by relatively good mobility between the early Christian communities.<sup>166</sup>

<sup>164</sup> Cf. T. Schramm, Der Markus-Stoff bei Lukas: Eine literarkritische und redaktionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung, SNTSMS 14 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1971); R. Riesner, “Prägung und Herkunft der lukanischen Sonderüberlieferung,” TBei 24 (1993): 228–248.

<sup>165</sup> Cf. H. A. Gamble, Books and Readers in the Early Church: A History of Early Christian Texts (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1995), 21–30; U. Schnelle, Einleitung in das Neue Testament, 5th ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2005), 251–252.

<sup>166</sup> Cf. M. B. Thompson, “The Holy Internet: Communication between Churches in the First Christian Generation,” in The Gospels for All Christians, ed. Bauckham, 49–70.

(1) At the origin of tradition stood Jesus himself who condensed his preaching in teaching summaries and parables. His disciples were thus able to memorize this material. (2) The “Twelve” around Peter were appointed by Jesus as judges of the people of Israel. After his resurrection they gathered, in Jerusalem, the eschatological community. The Holy City became the hub of the messianic movement partly because it was from Jerusalem that the eschatological Torah for Israel and the nations (Isa 2:1–5 / Mic 4:1–3) should proceed (cf. Acts 2:17; 1 Cor 14:36; Melito, Paschal Homily 7). The “teaching of the apostles (διδασκαλίαν τῶν ἀποστόλων)” (Acts 2:42) included a witness to the activity of Jesus “from his baptism by John until his resurrection” (Acts 1:21–22). The “Twelve” were “servants of the word” (ὑπηρέται τοῦ λόγου) in a unique way (Luke 1:2; cf. Acts 6:4). They were “eyewitnesses (ἀυτόπται)” and, as a consequence, better equipped to “transmit” (παραδιδόναι) the “story” (διήγησις) of Jesus (Luke 1:1–2). Matthew, the former tax collector (Matt 9:9), may have played a role in the production of the first written record of the sayings and deeds of Jesus (Papias [Hist. Eccl. 3.39.16]).<sup>167</sup> Probably Peter was involved when, in the earliest Christian community in Jerusalem, a primary passion narrative was formed under the influence of Isaiah 53 (cf. 1 Cor 15:3–4).<sup>168</sup> (3) The short Gospel of Mark was preserved primarily because of its connection with the Petrine tradition (Papias [Hist. Eccl. 3.39.15]).<sup>169</sup> The Book of Acts shows John Mark in contact with Peter already before 44 CE in Jerusalem (Acts 12:12). It is possible that, as early as the first couple of decades of the primitive community, John Mark was active as a scribe creating a Greek translation of an enlarged passion narrative. A presentation of the story of Jesus, divided geographically into his Galilean and Jerusalem ministries, was possibly even part of the early Christian catechesis (cf. Acts 10:36–43; 13:23–31).

(4) Since the Primitive community in Jerusalem was composed of, at least, Aramaic/Hebrew and Greek speakers it was necessary to translate the Jesus traditions into Greek. The bilingual John Mark would have been able to produce a Greek “Proto-Mark.” When the Hellenists (Ἑλληνισταί) were driven out of the Holy City around 31/32 CE

<sup>167</sup> Cf. R. H. Gundry, Matthew: A Commentary on His Literary and Theological Art (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1982), 609–622.

<sup>168</sup> Cf. M. Hengel, The Four Gospels and the One Gospel of Jesus Christ: An Investigation of the Collection and Origin of the Canonical Gospels (London: SCM, 2000), 153–157.

<sup>169</sup> Cf. M. Hengel, “Literary, Theological, and Historical Problems in the Gospel of Mark,” in The Gospel and the Gospels, ed. Stuhlmacher, 209–251.

(Acts 11:19),<sup>170</sup> they took with them Greek Jesus traditions.<sup>171</sup> In Antioch, where, soon after this, a big community developed consisting of both Jews and Gentiles (Acts 11:20–26), there existed a special need for such translated traditions. A source like the Greek “Proto-Mark” combined with sayings of Jesus would have been a great help in instructing the community members. (5) We do not know much about the communities in Galilee (Acts 9:31), but their need for the Jesus tradition goes without saying. Their need could be met by a “Proto-Mark” that was enlarged with material that would have been of special interest for Jewish Christians in Galilee. Since Galilee bordered Greek-speaking territories like Phoenicia, Gaulanitis, Decapolis and Caesarea, this makes all the more plausible the early transition from Aramaic to Greek. (6) Paul could learn further Jesus tradition while on his mission to Cyprus as he was accompanied by John Mark (Acts 13:4–13). Later on John Mark played a certain role in the Pauline communities of Asia Minor (Phlm 24; Col 4:10). In the context of the synagogue preaching of Barnabas and Paul in Cyprus, Mark is given the title of ὑπηρέτης (Acts 13:5; cf. 4:16; Luke 1:1–4). This term recalls the concept of “servant of the word” (Luke 1:2) and serves to distinguish Mark as a carrier of Jesus tradition.<sup>172</sup> A Greek “Proto-Mark,” revised for Gentile Christians, could have functioned as a memory aid for those teaching in the Pauline communities.

(7) Luke suggests that, even in the earliest period of the Jerusalem community, not only those gathered around the Twelve but also the family of Jesus played an important role (Acts 1:12–14). This is a picture confirmed by Paul (Gal 1:19; 2:9, 11; cf. 1 Cor 15:6). The members of this group assembled in a location different from the Greek-speaking believers (cf. Acts 12:12, 17). The Lukan special tradition matches, as regards the philological questions, particularly the tradition of the “Hebrews” (Ἑβραῖοι) and, as regards content, the interests of the family of Jesus. According to the oldest church tradition relating to the Epistle “to the Hebrews (πρὸς Ἑβραίους),” Barnabas was the author of the letter (Tertullian, De pudicitia 20).<sup>173</sup> It is striking that the Jesus tradition in this letter has some points of contact with the Lukan special

<sup>170</sup> Cf. Riesner, Paul's Early Period, 59–74.

<sup>171</sup> Cf. M. Hengel, “Between Jesus and Paul,” in Between Jesus and Paul: Studies in the Earliest History of Christianity (London: SCM, 1983), 1–29, here 26–29.

<sup>172</sup> Cf. B. T. Holmes, “Luke’s Description of John Mark,” JBL 54 (1935): 63–72.

<sup>173</sup> Cf. R. Riesner, “Der Hebräer-Brief nach altkirchlichen Zeugnissen,” European Journal of Theology 11 (2002): 15–29.

tradition.<sup>174</sup> Barnabas acted as a go-between connecting Jerusalem and the Hebraic community in Damascus (Acts 9:26–27) and the Hellenistic community of Antioch (Acts 11:22–26). (8) The oldest church tradition about Luke connects him with Antioch (Antimarcionite Prologue [ed. Harnack 324–325]) and denotes the evangelist as a sometime companion of Paul (Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. 3.1.1). Both aspects of this tradition are confirmed by the Book of Acts.<sup>175</sup> As a member of the community in Antioch, Luke could have become acquainted with the Greek “Proto-Mark” enlarged by sayings of Jesus. He could also have become familiar with the edition of “Proto-Mark” revised for Pauline and other Gentile Christian communities through direct contact with John Mark (Phlm 24; Col 4:10, 14).<sup>176</sup> A Greek translation of his special source, going back to the circles around James and other members of the family of Jesus, could have been obtained from Barnabas. Presumably, at a rather early stage, there must have existed a connection between this special tradition and the pre-Johannine tradition.<sup>177</sup>

5.3. Mark, Luke, and Matthew

The three synoptic gospels, unlike their predecessors, were preserved because they were edited books. This is made particularly clear by the dedication in Luke’s gospel that obliged Theophilus to make copies (cf. Luke 1:1–4). The genre of the gospels is more comparable with ancient biography than could have been allowed by classical form criticism.<sup>178</sup> (1) As indicated by an old church tradition, the Gospel of Mark was

<sup>174</sup> Cf. F. Dibelius, Der Verfasser des Hebräerbriefes: Eine Untersuchung zur Geschichte des Urchristentums (Strasbourg: Heitz & Mündel, 1910), 14–30.

<sup>175</sup> Cf. C. J. Thornton, Der Zeuge des Zeugen: Lukas als Historiker der Paulus-Reisen, WUNT 56 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1991); R. Riesner, “Lukas,” in Hauptwerke der Geschichtsschreibung, ed. V. Reinhardt (Stuttgart: Kröner, 1997), 391–394; J. Jervell, Die Apostelgeschichte, KEK 3 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1998), 79–86. Even the question of a medical training of Luke (Col 4:14) must be discussed anew. Cf. A. Weissenrieder, Images of Illness in the Gospel of Luke: Insights of Ancient Medical Texts, WUNT 2.164 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2003).

<sup>176</sup> For a life-setting of the letters to Philemon and to the Colossians in an Ephesian imprisonment of Paul cf. E. Schweizer, Der Brief an die Kolosser, 3rd ed., EKK 12 (Zürich: Benziger; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchner, 1989), 20–28; N. T. Wright, Colossians and Philemon, TNTC (Leicester: InterVarsity Press; Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1989), 21–39.

<sup>177</sup> Cf. R. Riesner, “Versuchung und Verklärung (Lukas 4:1–13 und Johannes 12:20–36),” TBei 33 (2002): 197–207.

<sup>178</sup> Cf. D. Dormeyer, Evangelium als literarische und theologische Gattung, EdF 263 (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1989); R. A. Burridge, What Are the Gospels? A Comparison with Graeco-Roman Biography, SNTSMS 70 (Cambridge: Cambridge written in Rome (Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. 3.1.1; Clement, Hypotyposesis VI [Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 6.14.6–7]). This is confirmed by evidence within the Gospel: Mark was written after the death of Peter, for which the earliest possible date is 64 CE, and, as good as certain, before the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 CE.<sup>179</sup> In the sixties of the first century CE it seems that there were, in Rome, tensions between Jewish and Gentile Christians (cf. Rom 9–14; 1 Clement 5:2–5). In such a situation it would have been helpful to publish a gospel uniting the Jewish and the Gentile Christian version of “Proto-Mark.”<sup>180</sup> In such a light, our canonical Mark would then have functioned like a first gospel harmony. (2) The Gospel of Luke and the Acts of the Apostles were designed for the Pauline communities around the Aegean (Antimarcionite Prologue [ed. Harnack 324–325]), giving Ephesus a prominent place (cf. Acts 19–20). Indeed, the position of A. von Harnack,<sup>181</sup> that Luke-Acts was written before the end of the Jewish War (in spite of Luke 21:20–24), should not be lightly discarded.<sup>182</sup> (3) The Gospel of Matthew was written in Syria (cf. Matt 4:13–17, 24) for Jewish Christian communities open to the idea of mission to the Gentiles (Matt 28:16–20). A composition before 70 CE is not completely out of the question.<sup>183</sup> For the early Christians, the sixties of the first century CE were a time of upheaval and transition. The three leading apostles, James the Brother of the Lord, Paul, and Peter, were killed as martyrs, and Jerusalem could no longer function as a centre of tradition. The Papias reference makes clear that the Gospel of Mark was to preserve the apostolic Jesus tradition associated with Peter (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.39.15). The Gospels of Luke and Matthew were able to do the University Press, 1993); D. Frickenschmidt, Evangelium als Biographie: Die vier Evangelien im Rahmen antiker Erzählkunst, TANZ 22 (Tübingen: Francke, 1997); and also R. Riesner, “Das lukanische Doppelwerk und die antike Biographie,” in Lebensgeschichte und Religion, ed. D. Dormeyer, H. Mölle, and T. Ruster (Münster: LIT, 2000), 131–144; B. Orth, Lehrkunst im frühen Christentum: Die Bildungsdimension didaktischer Prinzipien in der hellenistisch-römischen Literatur und im lukanischen Doppelwerk, Beiträge zur Erziehungswissenschaft und biblischen Bildung 7 (Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 2002).

---

<sup>179</sup> Cf. M. Hengel, Studies in the Gospel of Mark (London: SCM, 1985), 1–30.

<sup>180</sup> Cf. the scenario in D. L. Dungan, “The Purpose and Provenance of the Gospel of Mark According to the ‘Two-Gospel’ (Owen-Griesbach) Hypothesis,” in New Synoptic Studies, ed. W. R. Farmer (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1983), 411–440.

<sup>181</sup> Neue Untersuchungen zur Apostelgeschichte und zur Abfassungszeit der synoptischen Evangelien (Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1911).

<sup>182</sup> Cf. Carson and Moo, An Introduction to the New Testament, 207–210, 296–300; A. Mittelstaedt, Lukas als Historiker: Zur Datierung des lukanischen Doppelwerks, TANZ 43 (Tübingen: Francke, 2006).

<sup>183</sup> Cf. D. A. Hagner, Matthew 1–13, WBC 33A (Dallas: Word, 1993), LXXIII–LXXV.

same for Christian communities in distant areas like the Aegean and Syria. These historical and geographical circumstances may explain why the synoptics are not directly dependent on each other.

6. Assessment: Criteria of Authenticity

Even a tradition deserving general trust with respect to its origin and transmission must be assessed in detail. Among the criteria presently discussed in gospel exegesis,<sup>184</sup> the following should be particularly emphasized (JaL §5): (1) Attestation in multiple sources and/or traditions: According to our reconstruction there existed at least four important streams of tradition, namely, “Proto-Mark,” that common to Luke and Matthew (Q-material and pericopae with strong minor agreements), Lukan special tradition and a Galilean tradition behind parts of Mark and Matthew. My reconstruction shows a certain similarity with the four-document hypothesis of B. H. Streeter,<sup>185</sup> once so influential in English exegesis. (2) Different genres: It is a sign of authenticity if themes and statements are found both in the sayings of Jesus and in narratives about him, and also in teaching summaries and parables. (3) Language: A Semitic colouring is an indication of old tradition and Hebraisms, in particular, suggest a Palestinian origin. (4) Mnemonics: If a tradition was formed with the use of mnemonic techniques it had a greater chance of remaining consistent in form and content. (5) Environmental and period sensitive influences: A tradition is of reliable quality if it coheres well with our knowledge of the political, religious and cultural realities of the time. (6) Unique and characteristic features: Some phrases, like addressing God as abba or using amen in a non-responsorial way, and conceptualizations such as the original combining of the Servant of the Lord and the Son of Man—are all unique to the Historical Jesus. On the other hand, stylistic features, like the use of antithetical parallelism, and concepts, like the Kingdom of God, were also characteristic of him. (7) Historical coherence: A tradition gains credibility in so far as it can be integrated with the known history of Jesus. (8) Consistency of content:

---

<sup>184</sup> Cf. S. E. Porter, Criteria for Authenticity in Historical-Jesus Research: Previous Discussion and New Proposals, JSNTSup 191 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 2000); T. Holmén, “Doubts about Double Dissimilarity: Restructuring the Main Criterion of Jesus-of-History Research,” in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 47–80.

<sup>185</sup> The Four Gospels: A Study in Origins (London: Macmillan, 1924; 2nd ed., 1930).

A tradition is trustworthy if it agrees with other authentic tradition. All of these criteria can be used for authenticating traditions but only some of them (No. 3, 5, 7, 8) for falsifying.

7. Collection: The Four-Gospel Canon

7.1. Tradition and Theology in John

Although the Fourth Gospel has points of connection with the synoptic tradition, especially in its Lukan form, it is rooted in a largely independent tradition.<sup>186</sup> In the Gospel of John, history and theology are more strongly intertwined than in the synoptics. Nevertheless, it is possible, using appropriate criteria, to detect very old layers of tradition.<sup>187</sup> We may trace some of the stations on the long journey of the Johannine tradition from its origin until its final fixed form in the Fourth Gospel:<sup>188</sup> (1) Fairly precise local knowledge<sup>189</sup> and partly Hebraizing Greek<sup>190</sup> suggest an origin for this tradition in Jerusalem and Judea.<sup>191</sup> (2) Good local knowledge and a remarkable interest in the mission to the Samaritans suggest that Samaria was an important area for the Johannine tradition (John 4).<sup>192</sup> (3) The Fourth Gospel struggles with followers of John the Baptist who lived east and west of the Jordan (John 1–3). We find, particularly in the region of Batanaea (John 1:28), a peculiar mix of Baptist circles, Essene groups, and Johannine communities.<sup>193</sup> (4) The old church traditions unanimously testify to the publication of the Fourth Gospel in Ephesus (Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. 3.1.1). There we meet not only disciples of John the Baptist (Acts 19:1–9) and Essenizing Jewish priests (Acts 19:13–16), but also, at the end of the first century CE, a certain

<sup>186</sup> Cf. M. Theobald, Herrenworte in Johannes-Evangelicum, HBS 34 (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 2002).

<sup>187</sup> Cf. P. W. Ensor, Jesus and His "Works": The Johannine Sayings in Historical Perspective, WUNT 2.85 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1996); E. E. Ellis, The Making of the New Testament Documents, BIS 39 (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1999), 143–182; C. L. Blomberg, The Historical Reliability of John's Gospel: Issues and Commentary (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2001).

<sup>188</sup> Cf. Riesner, Bethanien jenseits des Jordan, 132–167.

<sup>189</sup> Cf. B. Schwank, Evangelium nach Johannes (St. Ottilien: Eos, 1996).

<sup>190</sup> Cf. K. Beyer, Semitische Syntax im Neuen Testament I: Satzlehre, 2nd ed., SUNT 1 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1968), 17–18.

<sup>191</sup> Cf. M. Hengel, The Johannine Question (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1989), 109–113.

<sup>192</sup> Cf. O. Cullmann, The Johannine Circle (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1976).

<sup>193</sup> Cf. R. Riesner, "Bethany beyond the Jordan (John 1:28)," TynBul 38 (1987): 29–63.

Jewish Christian by the name of Cerinthus (Adv. Haer. 3.3.4), whose docetism the Fourth Gospel combated.<sup>194</sup>

7.2. The Four-Gospel Collection

The Gospel of John makes a bold claim to embody a tradition of the highest authority (John 19:35; 20:30–31). Thus it may have come to supplant the three older synoptic gospels. The papyri P<sup>4</sup>, P<sup>64</sup> and P<sup>67</sup> possibly are fragments of a Four-Gospel-Codex from the end of the second century CE.<sup>195</sup> One may even trace back such a collection as early as the school of Justin Martyr situated in Rome around 150 CE (Dial. 103:8).<sup>196</sup> T. Zahn argued that the collection of the four canonical gospels was arranged in the circle of John's disciples in Ephesus at the beginning of the second century CE.<sup>197</sup> By being part of this collection it was made clear that the Fourth Gospel was supplementing and even surpassing the synoptics, but was never meant to replace them. Recently, T. Heckel took up Zahn's hypothesis and further developed it.<sup>198</sup> The later added chapter, John 21, betrays an intention to connect, through the references to the Beloved disciple and Peter, the Johannine and synoptic traditions. Irenaeus, through his teacher Polycarp of Smyrna, had access to information from the Johannine circle (Adv. Haer. 3.3.4), a fact that could explain why the Four-Gospel-Canon was never, for him, a matter of doubt (Adv. Haer. 3.11.7–9).

8. Conclusion: Trustworthy Tradition

In order to have a historically trustworthy record, whether written or oral, it is a basic requirement to lay bare the process from eyewitnesses to the final form.<sup>199</sup> If the arguments given here are by and large correct, then

<sup>194</sup> Cf. F. Neugebauer, Die Entstehung des Johannesevangeliums: Altes und Neues zur Frage seines historischen Ursprungs, ATh 1.36 (Stuttgart: Calwer, 1968); H. Cazelles, "Johannes: Ein Sohn des Zebedäus, 'Priester' und Apostel," IKZ 31 (2002): 479–484.

<sup>195</sup> Cf. T. C. Skeat, "The Oldest Manuscript of the Four Gospels?" NTS 43 (1997): 1–34.

<sup>196</sup> Cf. G. N. Stanton, "The Fourfold Gospel," in Jesus and Gospel, 63–91.

<sup>197</sup> Grundriß der Geschichte des Neutestamentlichen Kanons, ed. U. Swarat (Wuppertal: R. Brockhaus, 1985; 2nd ed., Leipzig: A. Deichert, 1904).

<sup>198</sup> Vom Evangelium des Markus zum viergestaltigen Evangelium, WUNT 2.120 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1999).

<sup>199</sup> K. Koch, Was ist Formgeschichte? Methoden der Biblexegese, 5th ed. (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchner, 1989), 145.

we have good reason to maintain the continuity of the Jesus tradition between his own proclamation right up to the publication of the synoptic gospels. The origin of the tradition and its authoritative preservation in writing are separated by less than a single generation, thus ensuring that the tradition was developed and transmitted in close contact with ear and eye witnesses. We know through the apologist Quadratus that, even as late as 100 CE, eyewitnesses of the ministry of Jesus were still living (Apology [Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 4.3.1–2]). Through the use of mnemonic devices by Jesus, his disciples and the early church catechesis there resulted a considerable consistency throughout transmission, especially in the sayings tradition. The early use of written notes could reinforce this consistency. Yet even the present approach does not exclude a reformulation of traditions. Indeed one cannot deny the existence of variants. Yet one ought to ask whether, without the cultivated tradition assumed here, we should find far more divergent traditions than actually exist. If the historian had to reconstruct the activity and teaching of Jesus solely from the Gospels of Thomas, Philip and Peter, he would be in a state of despair. On the contrary, to attempt a reconstruction by comparing the synoptics and even the Gospel of John remains a promising enterprise. In many cases we can expect to know more than the mere gist of what Jesus actually said. The third section of this paper (pp. 414–424) includes a reconstruction of the ministry and the message of Jesus in nuce.<sup>200</sup> Apart from the many variations in the tradition and the many unresolved questions over this and that detail, the canonical gospels impress upon their readers a clear picture of Jesus of Nazareth.

---

<sup>200</sup> Cf. also R. Riesner, “Jesus von Nazaret,” in Die Stifter der großen Weltreligionen, ed. E. Brunner-Traut, 3rd ed. (Freiburg: Herder, 1998), 62–93. Closely associated representations are B. F. Meyer, Christus Faber: The Master-BUILDER and the House of God (Allison Park, PA: Pickwick, 1992); M. Bockmuehl, This Jesus: Martyr, Lord, Messiah (Edinburgh: Clark, 1994); R. H. Stein, Jesus the Messiah: A Survey of the Life of Christ (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1996); O. Betz, Was wissen wir von Jesus? Der Messias im Licht von Qumran, 4th ed. (Wuppertal: R. Brockhaus, 2000); U. Wilckens, Theologie des Neuen Testaments I/1: Geschichte des Wirkens Jesu in Galiläa, I/2: Jesu Tod und Auferstehung . . . (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchner, 2002; 2003). My gratitude goes to Chris Tilling (St. Mellitus College, London) for his help in preparing the English translation.

THE GOSPEL OF THE HISTORICAL JESUS

JAMES M. ROBINSON

Each generation of scholarship has introduced one or more methods that have proven valid enough to achieve some lasting results.<sup>1</sup> Succeeding scholarship has built on them, even though introducing new methods to provide correctives, fill in blind spots, undo excesses, etc. But new methods that simply reject or ignore the history of scholarship have by and large turned out to be themselves invalid. My own preferred method, with its center in the Sayings Gospel Q, builds on and dialogues with the history of the discipline. In part this is a dialogue with my own involvement in the quest of the historical Jesus over the past half-century.<sup>2</sup>

1. The Two-Document Hypothesis

The first problem solved by modern scholarship was to explain why Matthew, Mark, and Luke stand over against John. For they present the public ministry of Jesus with much the same material in much the same order, and hence are called the synoptic gospels, whereas John goes its own way. The solution was that the synoptic gospels are similar because Matthew and Luke used Mark as a source, whereas John did not.

But this solution left one problem dangling: There are many sayings in Matthew and Luke that occur in much the same sequence with much the same wording, but nonetheless cannot be derived from Mark, since they are not present in Mark at all. This problem led to the postulate of a second source shared by Matthew and Luke, what we today call the Sayings Gospel Q. This basic solution to the synoptic problem has stood the test of time, in spite of a minority of scholars who have proposed various mutually-exclusive and unconvincing alternatives.

---

<sup>1</sup> See my essay, "Nineteenth Century Theology as Heritage and Fate," The Drew Gateway 44 (1974): 54–71.

<sup>2</sup> Most of my essays cited in the notes of the present essay have been republished in my collected essays: The Sayings Gospel Q: Collected Essays, ed. Christoph Heil and Joseph Verheyden (Leuven: University Press; Dudley, MA: Peeters, 2005).

Perhaps the most grandiose illustration of failing to build on the solid foundation of the two-document hypothesis, as it came to be known, has been Albert Schweitzer's presentation of the public ministry of Jesus as an apocalypticist.<sup>3</sup> For he questioned the priority of Mark and the existence of Q, and instead took Matthew's Mission Instructions (Matt 10) as a verbatim record, "historical as a whole and down to the smallest detail," in which Jesus hastily sent out his apostles to evangelize as many Jewish villages as possible before the apocalyptic cataclysm he expected to take place at the next harvest season. Jesus never expected to see the apostles again in this age. Hence their return to report on their "successful" mission was his first experience of reality: "The actual history disavowed the dogmatic history." Since the mission failed to trigger the apocalypse, Jesus marched on Jerusalem to force God's hand and thus to effect his apocalyptic goal.

But, far from being a verbatim record of Jesus' instructions to his apostles, Matthew 10 is a pastiche of excerpts from the Mission Instructions of Mark 6:7–11 and the Mission Instructions of Q 10:3–12, 16, into which have been interpolated excerpts from the Markan apocalypse (Mark 13:9, 11–13) and other Markan material (Mark 3:16–19; 9:41), as well as other Q sayings (Q 6:40; 12:2–9, 11–12, 51, 53; 14:26–27; 17:33) and special Matthean traditions about confining the mission to Jews

---

<sup>3</sup> For detailed documentation of this criticism of Schweitzer see my "History of Q Research," in The Critical Edition of Q: Synopsis Including the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, Mark and Thomas with English, German, and French Translations of Q and Thomas, ed. James M. Robinson, Paul Hoffmann, and John S. Kloppenborg (Leuven: Peeters; Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2000), xix–lxxxi, especially "Matthew without Q: Schweitzer's Jesus the Apocalypticist," xxxiii–xxxviii. The same presentation, slightly abbreviated, and without the foreign language quotations, is presented in my "Introduction" to The Sayings Gospel Q in Greek and English with Parallels from the Gospels of Mark and Thomas, ed. James M. Robinson, Paul Hoffmann, and John S. Kloppenborg (Leuven: Peeters; Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2002), 11–72, especially "5. Matthew Without Q: Jesus the Apocalypticist," 30–35. Similarly in slightly abbreviated form in my essay, "The Image of Jesus in Q," in Jesus Then and Now: Images of Jesus in History and Christology, ed. Marvin Meyer and Charles Hughes (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2001), 7–25, especially "Jesus the Apocalypticist," 9–12, reprinted in The Sayings Gospel Q, 645–662, especially 648–655. See also my earlier dismantling of Schweitzer's position based on his history of the quest, both in German ("Einführung," Die Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung, Taschenbuch-Ausgabe [München: Siebenstern Taschenbuch, 1966], 7–24, with reprints) and English ("Introduction," The Quest of the Historical Jesus [New York: Macmillan, 1968], xi–xxxiii, with reprints), and with the title, "Albert Schweitzer's Quest of the Historical Jesus Today," in my slightly revised reprint, A New Quest of the Historical Jesus and Other Essays (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983), 172–195. Most recently see my "Methodological Prolegomena to the Jesus Project," ed. R. Joseph Hoffmann, CSER Review 1.2 (Winter/Spring 2006/2007): 28–31.

(Matt 10:5–6, 23). So what Schweitzer interpreted as the most important turning-point in Jesus' public ministry simply never happened.

Schweitzer thought his brilliant presentation of Jesus' apocalyptic actions could wipe out a century of pedantic source criticism. But now, a century later, no scholar accepts Schweitzer's presentation of Jesus' apocalyptic conduct. Instead, the two-document hypothesis for the solution of the synoptic problem has become the standard position used in textbooks and the ongoing scholarly discussion.

2. Jesus the Jew

Adolf Harnack elevated the teachings of Jesus in Q into the "essence of Christianity," "religion itself." But Julius Wellhausen and Rudolf Bultmann made the point that Jesus was a Jew and so has to be understood as a Jew, not as a Christian.<sup>4</sup> Hence Bultmann's book Jesus and the Word presented Jesus as exemplifying authentic existence, but not Christian faith; his book Primitive Christianity described Jesus' preaching not in the chapter on "primitive Christianity," but rather in the chapter on "Judaism"; his Theology of the New Testament presented Jesus as a presupposition of New Testament theology, but his teachings were not part of that Christian theology; and his debate with the new quest presented at the Heidelberg Academy of Sciences in 1960 insisted that Jesus "ought not to be described as the subject of Christian faith, though he is nevertheless its object." Karl Barth, in his 1923 debate with Harnack, had already argued that what Harnack called "the heart of the gospel" (love for God and one's neighbor) was the heart "not of the gospel, but of the law."

Barth and Bultmann were able to avoid the theological problem inherent in the historical Jesus being a Jew by the fact that their theology was not based on the historical Jesus, but rather, for Barth, on Paul (cf. Barth's Epistle to the Romans), leading to Barth's Church Dogmatics, and for Bultmann, on the kerygma, leading to Bultmann's Theology of the New Testament. Their circumvention of the historical Jesus was supported methodologically by form criticism, which argued that the traditions about Jesus were first and foremost documentation for the role they played in the life of the primitive church, and only secondarily, if at all, documentation for the historical Jesus. For all practical purposes, the historical Jesus is beyond the historian's reach. Between the two World Wars, the quest of the historical Jesus was suspended.

---

<sup>4</sup> For detailed documentation of this debate with Harnack, see my "History of Q Research," especially the section "Q as the Essence of Christianity or the Kerygma: Harnack vs. Wellhausen, Barth, and Bultmann," xxxviii–xlvi; my "Introduction," especially section "6. The Essence of Christianity as Q or the Kerygma," 35–39; and my essay, "The Image of Jesus in Q," especially "Q or the Kerygma," 13–14.

3. The New Quest of the Historical Jesus

When it became obvious to Bultmann's pupils that this solution was equivalent to a modern version of the heresy of docetism, they opened a new quest of the historical Jesus, led by Ernst Käsemann, and epitomized in Günther Bornkamm's Jesus of Nazareth.<sup>5</sup> Its main concern was to build a bridge between Jesus and the kerygma, by finding in Jesus an implicit christology that became explicit after Easter, or an indirect christology that became direct. Hans Conzelmann posed it as "the problem of the continuity between Jesus and the community, i.e. the basic problem of New Testament theology as a whole."<sup>6</sup> In this way the overall orientation of scholarship to the Bultmannian kerygma or even to Barthian neo-orthodoxy remained in place. But this opening of a new quest of the historical Jesus, having achieved its theological purposes of vindicating the full humanity of Jesus in the age of historicism and building a bridge from Jesus to the church, was itself short-lived.

4. The Third Quest of the Historical Jesus

The "third quest" of the historical Jesus has had its center in the English-language world:<sup>7</sup>

<sup>5</sup> See my review of the German edition of Bornkamm's book, Jesus von Nazareth, in JBL 76 (1957): 310–313. For more detailed documentation of the whole post-Bultmannian development see my small book, A New Quest of the Historical Jesus, SBT 25 (London: SCM; Naperville, IL: Alec R. Allenson, 1959, and numerous re-impressions). The German translation is an enlargement: Kerygma und historischer Jesus, trans. Heinz-Dieter Knigge (Zürich: Zwingli, 1960). The second German edition is revised and again enlarged, 1967.

<sup>6</sup> Hans Conzelmann, "Gegenwart und Zukunft in der synoptischen Tradition," ZThK 54 (1957): 279.

<sup>7</sup> Of course there have been important German works, such as Jürgen Becker, Jesus von Nazaret (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1995), ET: Jesus of Nazareth (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1998); and Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, Der historische Jesus: Ein Lehrbuch (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1996), ET: The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1998), for which one may see my review, RBL 2 (2000): 361–363.

Robert W. Funk's the "Jesus Seminar" finally published the outcome of its voting on each saying ascribed to Jesus.<sup>8</sup> The voting method has been misleading, though not because of its notorious black-balling use of colored balls (a voting procedure which soon became too slow and cumbersome, and so was discontinued, except when TV cameras were present). Rather, it was other factors that have led to non-objective conclusions. For those who are members of the Jesus Seminar are not a cross-section of the discipline, as they would more nearly have been if the Jesus Seminar had become part of the Society of Biblical Literature, which was originally envisaged. But this option was closed out when the Executive Secretary of SBL fired Funk from his position as head of Scholars Press, whereupon Funk withdrew from SBL and set up his own private Polebridge Press and Westar Institute to host the Jesus Seminar. Thus the Jesus Seminar, rather literally, moved out of the mainstream of American New Testament scholarship, to become, instead, more of a group of dissidents.

Also the procedure of the Jesus Seminar often tended not to produce a conclusion representing the present status of the discipline: One member prepared an essay on the saying in question, which was circulated to the others, and then voted on at the next meeting. But rather than all members doing their own research on the saying in question, and reaching their own conclusions, they at best came to the meeting having read the assigned essay. Then, depending on how persuasive, not to say domineering, the author of that essay was in oral discussion, one usually voted with him or her.<sup>9</sup>

Its co-chair, John Dominic Crossan, whose work pre-dated considerably the Jesus Seminar itself,<sup>10</sup> has continued to publish, on his own, very high-quality and popular books on Jesus.<sup>11</sup> He has built largely on

---

<sup>8</sup> Robert W. Funk, Roy W. Hoover, and the Jesus Seminar, The Five Gospels: The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus (New York: Macmillan, 1993). For the outcome, as seen by various members, see Profiles of Jesus, ed. Roy W. Hoover (Santa Rosa, CA: Polebridge, 2002). For my brief report, "What Jesus Had to Say," which triggered the volume, see 15–17.

<sup>9</sup> For devastating critiques from the evangelical viewpoint, see Ben Witherington III, The Jesus Quest: The Third Search for the Jew of Nazareth (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1995), and N. T. Wright, The Challenge of Jesus: Rediscovering Who Jesus Was and Is (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1999).

<sup>10</sup> John Dominic Crossan, In Parables: The Challenge of the Historical Jesus (New York: Harper & Row, 1973).

<sup>11</sup> John Dominic Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1991); Jesus: A Revolutionary Biography (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1994); The Essential Jesus: Original Sayings and Earliest Images (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1995).

the basis of the multiple-attestation method, giving priority to sayings attested in more than one of the oldest sources. For him, this boils down to the Sayings Gospel Q and the Gospel of Thomas, both of which he pushes back toward the middle of the first century, clearly prior to the synoptic gospels and John. But the final form of Q, as used by Matthew and Luke and hence available to us, presupposes the siege or fall of Jerusalem (Q 13:34–35). And the Gospel of Thomas, at least as we know it in Coptic translation from a mid-fourth-century codex, not only has archaic materials (see below), but also in some cases betrays influence from the synoptic gospels, which may or may not be due to secondary scribal corruption.<sup>12</sup> Hence it is more difficult, and more controversial, to follow Crossan's basic methodological presupposition than would seem to be the case at first glance.

Over the past generation evangelical churches have flourished, and main-line denominations, whose theological seminaries were the Sitz im Leben of the historical-critical method of biblical scholarship, have declined accordingly. As a result, a reekerygmaticized "historical" Jesus has flourished, since it presents a Jesus who is reassuringly close to what the church has always preached and believed about him. This program is laid on the line in the title of one such work, The Real Jesus: The Misguided Quest for the Historical Jesus and the Truth of the Traditional Gospels.<sup>13</sup> Massive, multivolume works by John P. Meier<sup>14</sup> and N. T. Wright<sup>15</sup> have carried this method to its ultimate outcome, in rendering the literal, physical resurrection a fact proven by this reekerygmaticizing "historical" method. This should surely satisfy any doubting Thomas (John 20:25):

<sup>12</sup> E.g., for the dependence of Saying 16 on the Gospel of Luke, see my argument in Q 12:49–59: Children against Parents—Judging the Time—Settling out of Court, ed. Shawn Carruth, Documenta Q: Reconstructions of Q through Two Centuries of Gospel Research Excerpted, Sorted, and Evaluated (Leuven: Peeters, 1997), 119–121.

<sup>13</sup> Luke Timothy Johnson, The Real Jesus: The Misguided Quest for the Historical Jesus and the Truth of the Traditional Gospels (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1996). See my alternative, "The Real Jesus of the Sayings Gospel Q," Princeton Seminary Bulletin, NS 18.2 (1997): 135–151, reprinted in German, "Der wahre Jesus? Der historische Jesus im Spruchevangelium Q," Protokolle zur Bibel (Salzburg) 6.1 (1997): 1–14, and, with footnotes, ZNT 1 (1998): 17–26. The German edition is republished in The Sayings Gospel Q, 519–534.

<sup>14</sup> John P. Meier, a three-volume series: A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1991; 1994; 2001); The Roots of the Problem and the Person; Mentor, Message, and Miracles; Companions and Competitors.

<sup>15</sup> N. T. Wright, a three-volume series: Christian Origins and the Question of God (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1992; 1996; 2003): The New Testament and the People of God; Jesus and the Victory of God; The Resurrection of the Son of God. In abbreviated form: The Contemporary Quest for Jesus (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2002).

“Unless I see in his hands the print of the nails, and place my finger in the mark of the nails, and place my hand in his side, I will not believe.” But this then raises the problem of true faith posed by the Fourth Evangelist, or, as these authors would have to say, by the resurrected Jesus himself (John 20:28): “Have you believed because you have seen me? Blessed are those who have not seen and yet believe.” For the Johannine Jesus had already reproached the centurion whose boy was ill (John 4:48): “Unless you see signs and wonders you will not believe.”

Over against this rekerygmaticizing method of changing the historical Jesus back into the kerygmatic Christ, it is refreshing to find a distinguished Jewish authority on the historical Jesus who brings us back to Jesus the Jew.<sup>16</sup> He has unsurpassed knowledge of Jewish Aramaic (e.g. on the idiom “son of man”), complete mastery of the Jewish sources (e.g. his translation of all the Dead Sea Scrolls) and of the methods accredited in the quest of the historical Jesus; freedom from the apologetic necessity to change Jesus from a Jew into a Christian; and forty years of research on the historical Jesus behind him. His most recent book summarizes in its twenty-page epilogue what can be known objectively about Jesus, a presentation far more valid and reliable than the endless tomes of those who have to do something with Jesus the Jew other than let him be what he was.

5. Non-Canonical Manuscript Discoveries

During my lifetime, the Ugaritic clay tablets discovered in the royal palace at Ras Shamra on the coast of Syria revealed the Semitic language and culture behind the Hebrew scriptures.<sup>17</sup> The Qumran scrolls discovered near the Dead Sea revealed the Judean apocalypticism of the time of Jesus. And the Nag Hammadi codices discovered near Nag Hammadi in Upper Egypt revealed Christian Gnosticism as presented in its own texts, whereas it had previously been known almost exclusively through

---

<sup>16</sup> Geza Vermes, The Authentic Gospel of Jesus (London: Allen Lane, an imprint of Penguin Books, 2003). This is the quintessence of his previous four books on Jesus: Jesus the Jew: A Historian's Reading of the Gospels (London: Collins, 1973); Jesus and the World of Judaism (Pittsburgh, PA: Trinity Press International, 1983); The Religion of Jesus the Jew (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1993); The Changing Faces of Jesus (New York: Viking, 2001); Jesus in His Jewish Context (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2003).

<sup>17</sup> See my eulogy, “Claude Frédéric-Armand Schaeffer-Forrer (1898–1982): An Appreciation,” BAR 9.5 (1983): 56–61.

the myopic, tendentious, and invidious excerpts of heresiologists bent on portraying it in its worst light.

The Dead Sea Scrolls have contributed surprisingly little to our understanding of Jesus,<sup>18</sup> although much has been made of the occasional parallels that have occurred. Perhaps what is most significant, even if usually overlooked, is the absence of the two idioms most distinctive of Jesus: “kingdom of God” and “son of man.” Since both idioms had usually been ascribed to Jewish apocalypticism at the time the scrolls were discovered, their absence should tell us something about Jesus’ use of these terms. In fact their use by Jesus is no longer considered apocalyptic (see below).

The monopolizing of the Dead Sea Scrolls<sup>19</sup> led to the bizarre thesis of Robert Eisenman that the founder of the sect, the “teacher of righteousness,” a circumlocution for “just teacher,” was none other than Jesus’ brother, James “the just” (as he is called in the Gospel of Thomas, Saying 12). Eisenman postulated that the unpublished fragments contained the missing documentation for his hypothesis. He claimed that the fragments in question had been suppressed by the Roman Catholic Church, fearing that such evidence, by proving that Jesus’ own brother insisted on conforming to Jewish law, would pull the rug out from under Gentile Christianity. So Eisenman somehow obtained in Israel a copy of the photographs of the unpublished fragments that were supposed to contain the damaging evidence. I helped him publish them, he to prove his thesis, I to disprove it.<sup>20</sup> Of course the unpublished fragments, once they became available, have not provided any support for Eisenman’s speculation. In any case, his thesis would have required a redating of Hebrew script and of Palestinian pottery, so as to move the teacher of righteousness and the founding of the Qumran community down a

---

<sup>18</sup> But see my essay, “Die Hodajot-Formel in Gebet und Hymnus des Frühchristentums,” in Apophoreta: Festschrift für Ernst Haenchen, trans. Gustav-Alfred Picard, BZNW 30 (Berlin: Töpelmann, 1964), 194–235. My English retroversion, “The Hodayot Formula in Prayers and Hymns of Early Christianity,” is published for the first time in The Sayings Gospel Q, 75–118.

<sup>19</sup> See my essay, “Ethics in Publishing Manuscript Discoveries: Panel Discussion,” in Methods of Investigation of the Dead Sea Scrolls and the Khirbet Qumran Site: Present Realities and Future Prospects, ed. M. O. Wise et al., Annals of the New York Academy of Sciences 722 (New York: New York Academy of Sciences, 1994), 468–471. Also my essay co-authored with George J. Brooke, “A Further Fragment of 1QSb: The Schøyen Collection MS 1909,” JJS 46 (1995): 120–133.

<sup>20</sup> Robert H. Eisenman and James M. Robinson, A Facsimile Edition of the Dead Sea Scrolls, 2 vols. (Washington, DC: Biblical Archaeology Society, 1991; 2nd rev. impression 1992).

couple of centuries into the first century AD. Qumran is simply not a Jewish-Christian monastery.

6. The Gospel of Thomas

Among the Nag Hammadi texts, it is especially the Gospel of Thomas, Tractate 2 in Codex II, that has proven to be most relevant for the quest of the historical Jesus.<sup>21</sup> This is true in several regards:

There are three ways in which Thomas has begun to make an impact on the quest for the historical Jesus: by providing new sayings to be considered as sayings of Jesus; by offering independent versions of sayings already known from the tradition, so that their history and development can now be understood better; and by adding another perspective from which to view the overall development of the Jesus tradition, and so better to understand its origins.<sup>22</sup>

With regard to the first way listed by Patterson, “providing new sayings to be considered as sayings of Jesus,” the results have been disappointingly meager:

Joachim Jeremias thought that Thom. 82 and 98 might be authentic sayings of Jesus. Johannes Bauer added Thom. 81, 58, 51, and 52 to this list. R. McL. Wilson considered Thom. 39, 102, and 47 as possible candidates. The Jesus Seminar voted no new sayings in Thomas into the “red” category (= authentic), but did consider Thom. 97, the parable of the broken jar, “pink” (= probably authentic).<sup>23</sup>

With regard to the second way listed by Patterson, sayings “offering independent versions of sayings already known from the tradition,” a striking instance is Saying 65, the Parable of the Wicked Husbandmen familiar from Mark 12:1–12. For the Markan parable is obviously an allegory of Heilsgeschichte, with the owner of the vineyard clearly identified as God, who plants the vineyard with allusions to Isa 5:1–7. Thus the

---

<sup>21</sup> See my address, “Nag Hammadi: The First Fifty Years,” in The Nag Hammadi Library after Fifty Years: Proceedings of the 1995 Society of Biblical Literature Commemoration, ed. John D. Turner and Anne McGuire, Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies 44 (Leiden: Brill, 1997), 3–33. Abridged reprint in Stephen J. Patterson, James M. Robinson, and Hans-Gebhard Bethge, The Fifth Gospel: The Gospel of Thomas Comes of Age (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1998), 77–110. The most thorough monograph is by Patterson, The Gospel of Thomas and Jesus (Sonoma, CA: Polebridge, 1993).

<sup>22</sup> Patterson, “Understanding the Gospel of Thomas Today,” in The Fifth Gospel, 33–75, at 71.

<sup>23</sup> Patterson, “Understanding the Gospel of Thomas Today,” 71–72.

husbandmen, representing Israel, are the wrongdoers, from whom God finally takes the vineyard, so as to turn it over to Gentile Christianity. But Saying 65 lacks all these allegorical allusions to Heilsgeschichte, and instead tells a real parable. Since Jesus did not tell allegories, but did tell parables, the Gospel of Thomas may well present an independent, older tradition of this parable than does the Gospel of Mark.

There is a lacuna in the opening of the parable, which has usually been restored to read “A [good person] owned a vineyard.” But this restoration, clearly reflecting the allegorical identification of the owner with God, has come to be challenged, since another restoration reads “A [userer] owned a vineyard.” The merciless exploitation of the peasantry by wealthy landowners could well have been criticized by Jesus in the parable. Of course, the murderous response of the husbandmen would not have met with Jesus’ approval, but a number of the parables of Jesus narrate wrong conduct as part of the story line, without the assumption that Jesus approved of such wrongdoing. John S. Kloppenborg has done papyrological research on the actual conditions to which such peasants were subjected, in support of the view that the parable may have been intended by Jesus as a criticism of the owner of the vineyard, in support of the poor.<sup>24</sup> In any case, it would seem to be clear that the parable as found in the Gospel of Thomas is presupposed in, rather than being dependent on, Mark 12:1–12. Thus we find here an instance of the Gospel of Thomas having an older tradition than that in the New Testament.

An even more striking instance of a reading in the Gospel of Thomas that is older than the corresponding saying in the New Testament is the presence in Saying 36 of the Gospel of Thomas of an original reading that has been corrupted by a scribal error already in the Sayings Gospel Q (and hence in Matthew and Luke), at Q 12:27: “Observe the lilies, how they grow: They do not work nor do they spin.” Whereas in the Coptic translation in Nag Hammadi Codex II this saying has been abbreviated, and so the place in question is not even present for discussion, Saying 36 is by good fortune extant in the Greek original of the Gospel of Thomas in P. Oxy. 655. Here it reads: “[You are] far better than the lilies, which do not card nor spin.” This reading is also attested in Matt 6:28 in the Codex Sinaiticus, though the first corrector erased it and replaced it with the standard text. “Do not card” is in Greek

<sup>24</sup> John S. Kloppenborg, The Tenants in the Vineyard: Ideology, Economics, and Agrarian Conflict in Jewish Palestine, WUNT 195 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 2006).

[οὐ ξάινει], whereas “grow” in Greek is spelled very similarly, [αὐξάνει]. Apparently at some juncture in the scribal copying of Q (or a precursor of Q) a scribe misread and hence miscopied. For the reading in P. Oxy. 655 and Codex Sinaiticus, negating the first chore in the making of clothing by hand, “do not card,” fits much better the listing of things that (ravens and) lilies do not do, thereby illustrating the carefree lifestyle to be emulated by the Q movement.<sup>25</sup> The scribal error reading “they do not card” as “they grow” at a very early stage in the transmission of the saying is easy to understand as a slip of the eye.

With regard to the third way listed by Patterson, “adding another perspective from which to view the overall development of the Jesus tradition, and so better to understand its origins,” the very fact that the Gospel of Thomas is a sayings gospel has of course drawn attention to

---

<sup>25</sup> This solution was first proposed by T. C. Skeat, “The Lilies of the Field,” ZNW 37 (1938): 211–214. It has been revived by myself and Christoph Heil, “Zeugnisse eines griechischen, schriftlichen vorkanonischen Textes: Mt 6,28b ✠*, P. Oxy. 655 I, 1–17 (Ev Th 36) und Q 12,27,” ZNW 89 (1998): 30–44. This essay was promptly followed by two further articles I wrote, “A Written Greek Sayings Cluster Older Than Q: A Vestige,” HTR 92 (1999): 61–77; “The Pre-Q Text of the (Ravens and) Lilies: Q 12:22–31 and P. Oxy. 655 (Gos. Thom. 36),” in Text und Geschichte: Facetten historisch-theologischer Arbeitens aus dem Freundes- und Schülerkreis. Dieter Lührmann zum 60. Geburtstag, ed. Stefan Maser and Egbert Schlarb, Marburger Theologische Studien 50 (Marburg: Elwert, 1999), 143–180. The result of these investigations was published in an “Excursus on the Scribal Error in Q 12:27,” in The Critical Edition of Q, xcix–ci. See also the photographic reproductions of the relevant sections of P. Oxy. 655 and Codex Sinaiticus on the endpapers. This position was criticized by Jens Schröter, “Vorsynoptische Überlieferung auf P. Oxy. 655? Kritische Bemerkungen zu einer erneuten These,” ZNW 90 (1999): 265–272, to which Heil and I responded in two essays, “Noch einmal: Der Schreibfehler in Q 12:27,” ZNW 92 (2001): 113–122; and “The Lilies of the Field: Saying 36 of the Gospel of Thomas and Secondary Accretions in Q 12:22b–31,” NTS 47 (2001): 1–26. Schröter responded in two essays, “Verschrieben? Klärende Bemerkungen zu einem vermeintlichen Schreibfehler in Q und tatsächlichen Irrtümern,” ZNW 92 (2001): 283–289; and “Rezeptionsprozesse in der Jesusüberlieferung: Überlegungen zum historischen Charakter der neutestamentlichen Wissenschaft am Beispiel der Sorgensprüche,” NTS 47 (2001): 442–468. Stanley E. Porter has entered the discussion, “P.Oxy. 655 and James Robinson’s Proposals for Q: Brief Points of Clarification,” JTS NS 52 (2000): 84–92, to which Heil and I responded, “P.Oxy. 655 und Q: Zum Diskussionsbeitrag von Stanley E. Porter,” in For the Children, Perfect Instruction: Studies in Honor of Hans-Martin Schenke on the Occasion of the Berliner Arbeitskreis für koptisch-gnostische Schriften’s Thirtieth Year, ed. Hans-Gebhard Bethge et al., Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies 54 (Leiden: Brill, 2002), 411–423. Then Robert H. Gundry joined the discussion, “Spinning the Lilies and Unravelling the Ravens: An Alternative Reading of Q 12:22b–31 and P.Oxy. 655,” NTS 48 (2002): 159–180. I published a final response in the essay presented at the Conference on the Gospel of Thomas (University of Laval, 2003), “A Pre-canonical Greek Reading in Saying 36 of the Gospel of Thomas,” in Bibliothèque copte de Nag Hammadi, section Études 8 (Leuven: Peeters, 2006), 517–559. All seven of these articles by myself (and Heil) are republished in a section to themselves, “Essays on the Original Reading behind Q 12:27 in Codex Sinaiticus and P.Oxy. 655,” in The Sayings Gospel Q, 711–883.

sayings collections, in addition to narrative gospels, as a way in which Jesus traditions were transmitted. This has led to the designation of Q as the “Sayings Gospel Q” in distinction from the “narrative gospels” Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John.<sup>26</sup> And older sayings collections embedded in Q have been a topic of lively discussion.<sup>27</sup>

Part of the methodological issue has to do with the use of non-canonical texts in New Testament scholarship. An anecdote from the meeting of the Society for New Testament Studies in Basel on Aug. 21, 1984 can serve to illustrate the problem:<sup>28</sup> Nikolaus Walter presented a paper on “Paul and the Primitive Christian Jesus Tradition,” to which I was the assigned respondent. He presented a thorough tabulation and analysis of all parallels from the canonical gospels found in the letters of Paul, to which one could hardly take exception. Hence my first criticism was: “It is arbitrary to consult only the canonical texts. Jesus traditions known to Paul could be attested in non-canonical sources such as the Gospel of Thomas.” Walter responded by asking whether I could give an example. What occurred to me on the spot was 1 Cor 2:9: “But, as it is written, ‘What no eye has seen, nor ear heard, nor the heart of man conceived, what God has prepared for those who love him.’”

---

<sup>26</sup> See my programmatic essay on the sayings gospel genre, “ΛΟΓΟΙ ΣΟΦΩΝ: Zur Gattung der Spruchquelle Q,” in Zeit und Geschichte: Dankesgabe an Rudolf Bultmann zum 80. Geburtstag, ed. Erich Dinkler (Tübingen: Mohr, 1964), 77–96, revised and enlarged in Entwicklungslinien durch die Welt des frühen Christentums (Tübingen: Mohr, 1971), 216–250, ET: “ΛΟΓΟΙ ΣΟΦΩΝ: On the Gattung of Q,” in Trajectories through Early Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971; paperback, 1979), 20–70, reprinted in The Sayings Gospel Q, 37–74. On the discussion it engendered, see my essay “On Bridging the Gulf from Q to The Gospel of Thomas (or Vice Versa),” in Nag Hammadi, Gnosticism and Early Christianity, ed. Charles W. Hedrick and Robert Hodgson, Jr. (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1986), 127–175, especially section “IV. The Genre of Q and the Gospel of Thomas,” 164–175, with 166–167 addressing the criticism of B. Dehandschutter and Werner Georg Kümmel, republished in The Sayings Gospel Q, 203–258, especially 245–258, here 247–248. See also my essay “The Sayings Gospel Q” in The Four Gospels 1992: Festschrift Frans Neirynck, BETL 100 (Leuven: Leuven University Press and Peeters, 1992), 1:361–388, especially 371 n. 12, in response to the criticism of Heinz Schürmann, reprinted in The Sayings Gospel Q, 319–348, especially 329–340 n. 12. Further, my essay “Die Bedeutung der gnostischen Nag-Hammadi Texte für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft,” in Religious Propaganda and Missionary Competition in the New Testament World: Essays Honoring Dieter Georgi, ed. Lukas Bormann, Kelly Del Tredici, and Angela Standhartinger, NovTSup 74 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 23–41.

<sup>27</sup> See my essay, “The Q Trajectory: Between John and Matthew via Jesus,” in The Future of Early Christianity: Essays in Honor of Helmut Koester, ed. Birger A. Pearson (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1991), 173–194, especially the section “Helmut Koester’s Early Sapiaential Layer in Q,” 184–189, reprinted in The Sayings Gospel Q, 285–307, especially 296–302.

<sup>28</sup> See James M. Robinson, “The Study of the Historical Jesus after Nag Hammadi,” in The Historical Jesus and the Rejected Gospels, ed. Charles W. Hedrick, Semeia 44 (Atlanta: SBL, 1988), 45–55, reprinted in The Sayings Gospel Q, 275–284.

Walter had mentioned this text only as an instance of Paul citing vaguely the Old Testament (to which the quotation formula “as it is written” is often assumed to refer, though the precise text is missing from the Old Testament—the margin of Nestle-Aland lists Origen’s reference to the Apocalypse of Elijah). But Walter did not even mention the fact that this unidentified “Old Testament” quotation is cited as a saying of Jesus in the Gospel of Thomas (Saying 17): “Jesus said, ‘I shall give you what no eye has seen and what no ear has heard and what no hand has touched and what has never occurred to the human mind.’”<sup>29</sup> Thus this saying is part of the Jesus tradition that Walter purported to be treating exhaustively in relation to Pauline parallels. For by “Jesus tradition” he does not mean just “authentic” sayings of Jesus, but rather all sayings ascribed to Jesus.

When I drew to his attention this saying ascribed to Jesus by the Gospel of Thomas, he pointed out that in 1 Cor 2:9 the saying is not introduced as a saying of Jesus, and hence need not be included in his presentation. But I then pointed out that he included a whole section devoted to “contacts with logia from the Jesus tradition that are not directly identified [as such] by Paul himself,” such as occur in Romans 12 and 1 Corinthians 4, where Walter listed several parallels to the Sermon on the Mount/Plain. According to Walter’s paper, a complete tabulation of Pauline parallels to Jesus traditions, such as he was providing, should include non-canonical parallels comparable to these, even though Paul in no way identified them as parallel to sayings in the Jesus tradition, so that one cannot even know whether Paul recognized the parallels. So I made the point that to limit such a complete tabulation of parallels to the canon, which is what Walter in fact had done, seemed arbitrary, from a purely historical point of view. Obviously Paul did not limit himself to the canonical gospels, since they did not exist when he wrote.

Walter responded to my appeal to his own policy of including parallels not identified by Paul as sayings of Jesus by conceding that the parallel between 1 Cor 2:9 and Saying 17 of the Gospel of Thomas should indeed have been included in his survey. But the subsequently published text of his presentation (in NTS 1985) left the typescript used at the meeting unaltered at this point, though in other regards the text had been updated prior to publication. He did not even go to the pains of arguing, e.g., that the text was known to Paul not as a saying of Jesus but as derived from some “Old Testament” text unrelated to the Jesus tradition.

---

<sup>29</sup> It is also ascribed to Jesus in the Dialogue of the Savior (NHC III, 5; 140).

This anecdote illustrates the problem in our discipline today: Many are wearing blinds that limit their survey to the canonical gospels, a limitation of course facilitated by the limitations of the concordances and standard reference works such as commentaries, where the pre-Nag-Hammadi data is already conveniently collected, thus perpetuating in our day the limitations of previous generations. But these traditional confines of the discipline are immediately transcended by anyone who knows how to surf the web. Yet this outdated method is no doubt fostered by some vague awareness that once one moves beyond the familiar canonical confines, a vast and undefined terrain is opened up, in which one is perhaps not trained, and for which one has no empathy or inclination.

Perhaps the problem lies in large part in the fact that the Gospel of Thomas was discovered in the gnostic library of Nag Hammadi, and, apart from the Bultmannian tradition, Gnosticism has usually been excluded from New Testament scholarship. But it has become clear that not all the Nag Hammadi texts are in fact gnostic. The Teachings of Silvanus (VII, 4) is simply wisdom literature, with what could be considered an anti-gnostic polemic! A section of Plato’s Republic (VI, 5) is of course not gnostic, nor are the Sentences of Sextus (XII, 1), both of which are already known apart from the Nag Hammadi discovery, and so are free of any “guilt by association.” But so is the Gospel of Thomas! For P. Oxy. 1, 654, and 655 are three (very fragmentary) copies of the Greek original of the Gospel of Thomas that are a century older than the Coptic copy, without any gnostic context at all. Whether the Gospel of Thomas is to be considered gnostic is highly contested in scholarly literature. This is in part a matter of definition. The standard gnostic myth is not present. The nearest one might come to assuming that Gnosticism is presupposed would be Saying 50:

Jesus says: “If they say to you: ‘Where do you come from?’ (then) say to them: ‘We have come from the light, the place where the light has come into being by itself, has established [itself] and has appeared in their image.’ If they say to you: ‘Is it you?’ (then) say: ‘We are his children, and we are the elect of the living Father.’ If they ask you: ‘What is the sign of your Father among you?’ (then) say to them: ‘It is movement and repose.’”

But most of the sayings in the Gospel of Thomas that are not found in the New Testament (about half of the sayings) cannot be explained as secondary “gnostic” creations, but are more like the sayings found in the New Testament.

The debate about the dating of the original composition of the Gospel of Thomas also has a hidden agenda. The older it is thought to be, the higher its status is among sources for the historical Jesus (exemplified e.g. by Crossan). The later it is thought to be, the less it needs to be considered a standard part of the discipline (exemplified e.g. by Ménard and many others, especially if one may appeal to the argument from silence).

Of course another problem is the Coptic language in which the only rather complete copy of the Gospel of Thomas has survived. There is only one chair of Coptic Studies in the world, held first by Martin Krause, then by his successor Stephen Emmel, at the University of Münster. So when Coptic is taught, it is usually by a person whose main occupation lies elsewhere, and when it is learned, it is usually as an elective. Coptic has not been a standard language of New Testament scholarship, with the possible exception of an occasional textual critic. Since it is a ground rule of the discipline, that one master the foreign languages of the discipline, the Gospel of Thomas is by this (il-)logic not to be included in the discipline.

If it were the Greek Oxyrhynchus papyri that were complete, and the Coptic Nag Hammadi copy that consisted only in a few fragments, or if a second-century copy of the Greek text had been discovered not near the Nile but near the Jordan, the discipline would have been unanimous in including it, as in the case of the Didache, among the most important non-canonical Christian texts relevant to New Testament studies. That is to say, its de facto exclusion from the discipline is arbitrary.

7. Biblical Archaeology

Ever since Constantine’s mother Helena went to the promised land and located the site of Jesus’ crucifixion and burial, in order to build there the church of the Holy Sepulcre, many pilgrimage sites have given rise to constructions commemorating what is supposed to have happened there. But though the pilgrimage sites themselves may be older than the ruins of the constructions built over them, it is naïve to assume that they are therefore the actual locations where the event took place, and, even if they were, that they would be relevant to the study of Jesus. The shrines built over the original sites would in any case have destroyed any relevant evidence.

Pilgrim buses usually stop for lunch in the Franciscan hostel at the “Mount of the Beatitudes,” so that the pilgrims can see where Jesus preached the Sermon on the Mount (which, time permitting, is read aloud at the site). The problem is that the location on a “mount” is derived not from the memory of the disciples, but from Matthew borrowing the hillside location of the calling of the twelve from Mark 3:13. Furthermore, the “Sermon” was never presented by Jesus as a speech, but is a collection of his sayings made by his followers. In this case, a pilgrimage site cannot provide the basis for the conjecture that this is the original location for what happened in Jesus’ lifetime, since his preaching of the Sermon on the Mount did not happen at all.

Somewhat more possible, but still quite conjectural, is the Franciscan “house of Peter” that is the main pilgrim attraction next to the synagogue in Capernaum. For Peter’s mother-in-law was healed in her home after the healing of the demon-possessed person in the synagogue of Capernaum (Mark 1:23–31). Indeed, this is where Jesus’ public ministry began. Capernaum would seem to have been his headquarters, where he is reported to have been “at home” (Mark 2:1). If Peter’s home became Jesus’ home, that would account for Peter’s prominence.

But such pilgrimage sites do not bring one any nearer to Jesus, unless one has the good fortune to find there a true piece of the cross (since most pieces are already in European cathedrals). When Ernst Renan called Palestine “the fifth gospel,” what he had in mind was not such pilgrimage sites, but rather the village life of the native Arab population, which he thought had changed but little since the time of Jesus. In comparison with the Paris life of a century ago, no doubt this was to a large extent true.

When archaeology began in modern times, it was apologetic in nature, to prove that the Bible was right after all. So the walls of Jericho were located, fallen down as they were supposed to be: “So they blew the trumpets, and when the army heard the trumpet sound, they raised a great shout, and down fell the walls” (Josh 6:20). But this dramatic proof of Joshua’s conquest later turned out to be walls that came tumbling down centuries before Joshua’s time. His next victory was at Ai: “Joshua burnt Ai to the ground, and left it the desolate ruined mount it remains to this day” (Josh 8:28). Its Hebrew name, like its Arab name, el-tell, means simply “the ruins.” But modern dating has now shown that it was already in ruins long before Joshua. Apparently local ruins were simply used to create (very successfully) the story of the conquest. Today the “conquest” is conceived of as a much more peaceful immigration and assimilation.

Archaeology by its very nature is destructive, literally removing most of the evidence on which its conclusions are based. Archaeologists have had a very bad track record of publishing only “preliminary reports,” but dying before publishing their “final report.” The American Schools of Oriental Research have tried to correct this situation by requiring that more-nearly-final reports be published after a few seasons, before further field work is approved.

Archaeological method has undergone major improvements over recent generations. Rather than a whole tell being excavated (and thus destroyed), a trial trench is first dug, both so as to limit the damage, if any, to something that should not be cut through, and also so that one can get a profile of the layering and dating of the tell itself. For a straight and clean balk reveals the layers of each successive destruction and rebuilding of the site, so that the archaeologists can determine if it is a promising site to continue excavating. Furthermore, the site is not completely excavated, but some areas are left for future archaeology, so that the results of the excavation can later be verified, when the more advanced methods of future generations of archaeologists can be employed.

The dating of the sites is decisive with regard to their relevance to Jesus. Potsherds are the basis of chronology, since they are found everywhere, whereas other datable artifacts, such as coins or cartouches, are rare. The dating of pottery has become a science, for “indicator sherds” of the lip, handle, or base of a pot can be dated to within a half-century. Of course, Christian construction did not take place in Jesus’ time, and so most Christian sites date from the Byzantine period and are hence irrelevant for the study of the historical Jesus.

Galilee is littered with synagogues, and Jesus is reported to have preached and healed in synagogues. But no synagogues contemporary with Jesus have been located in Galilee. (Gamla, where there seem to be ruins of an early synagogue destroyed in the war with Rome and not rebuilt, is on the eastern side of the Jordan.) One has to postulate either that the synagogues have not yet been located or excavated (perhaps inaccessible under later synagogues, as in Capernaum), or that the “synagogues” (literally: assemblies) that Jesus visited were not in buildings constructed as synagogues (to which Luke 7:5 refers), but in homes used for the assemblies. Q never reports Jesus going to a synagogue at all, but the Mission Instructions say one is to go to houses (Q 10:5–7).

The most impressive Galilean constructions from Jesus' time that are still visible are the Roman amphitheaters and gymnasia for the entertainment of troops stationed e.g. in Sepphoris and Capernaum. But they do no more than provide a setting for the pejorative appellation "hypocrite" (Q 6:42), literally "actor," or illustrate the off-duty lifestyle of the centurion whose boy Jesus healed (Q 7:1–10). Stone inscriptions found in Galilee are usually in Greek, not Hebrew or Aramaic.

A fishing boat of approximately Jesus' time has been found relatively intact in the Sea of Galilee and preserved on dry land for pilgrims to see. Its little museum is of course an attraction for pilgrims, but adds little to our actual knowledge about Jesus. The existence of fishing vessels in which Jesus could hitch a ride across the Sea of Galilee (Mark 4:35–41; 6:45–52) has never been doubted.

Perhaps the most relevant archaeological discoveries for understanding Jesus have to do with the Jewishness of Galilee. For it has been common, and of course to an extent valid, to distinguish Galilean Judaism from the Judaism of Judea and Jerusalem. After the death of Solomon, the north, the state of Israel, separated itself off from the south, the state of Judea. The north was conquered earlier, and its captives never returned, whereas the captives from the south were permitted to return and rebuild. Samaria separated the two. The Maccabees who liberated the south from the Romans and ruled there from 166 to 37 BCE orchestrated forced circumcisions in the north to Judaize the region, but the conversion may have been only skin-deep. In any case, such considerations have been brought into play to minimize Jesus' Jewishness. After all, Nazareth was a hamlet near the city of Sepphoris, which the Romans had destroyed for insurrection and then rebuilt in Jesus' time, as a Hellenistic city (see the beautiful floor mosaic of the "Mona Lisa" excavated and preserved as a small museum there).

Recent archaeology has, however, tended to point in the other direction, by pointing out distinctively Jewish traits in Galilee:<sup>30</sup> At the doorways to homes in Sepphoris one has often found the small Jewish cisterns for washing before entering the house. Bones of pigs, forbidden for Jews to eat, are conspicuous by their absence. Large stone pots, preferred by Jews for purity reasons (see John 2:6), are common in Capernaum. So archaeology has tended to confirm the Jewishness of Jesus' world. The gospels never mention him going to the cosmopolitan, more Greek-speaking, more Gentile, Galilean cities of Sepphoris, Tiberias, and Scythopolis.

---

<sup>30</sup> See such works as those by the archaeologists who have excavated Bethsaida, Jean J. Rousseau, and Rami Arav, Jesus and His World: An Archaeological and Cultural Dictionary (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1995), to which I provided a "Foreword: A Down-to-Earth Jesus," xiii–xviii. See also more recently Jonathan L. Reed (who has excavated at Sepphoris), Archaeology and the Galilean Jesus: A Re-examination of the Evidence (Pittsburgh, PA: Trinity Press International, 2000); and John Dominic Crossan and Jonathan Reed, Excavating Jesus: Behind the Texts (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 2001).

8. Feministic Studies

The text of Q, and therefore presumably Jesus, do not do justice to the modern feminist sensitivity as to the full equality of women.<sup>31</sup> The most that is usually said is that male-female pairs are present in Q, with which both men and women can hence identify. The male Ninevites are paired with the Queen of the South standing in judgment against Israel (Q 11:31–32); a man sowing a field with mustard seed (Q 13:18–19) is paired with a woman making bread out of yeast (Q 13:20–21); the shepherd seeking a lost sheep (Q 15:4–5, 7) is paired with a woman seeking a lost coin (Q 15:8–10); two males on a couch (Q 17:34) are paired with two females grinding at a mill (Q 17:35). Pairings may be implicit, even if less visible, in such formulations as bread (baked by a woman) and fish (caught by fishermen) in Q 11:11–12, and ravens (in contrast to men working in the fields) and lilies (in contrast to women making clothing) in Q 12:24, 27–28. The Q movement's disruption of family ties between generations involves the women as well as the men (Q 12:53; 14:26). Though such pairings thus recognize women as well as men, no inclusive point is explicitly scored. The patriarchal culture is tacitly presupposed, in such formulations as "marrying and giving in marriage" (Q 17:27), and in addressing God as "Father" (Q 10:21 bis; 11:2; cf. 6:36; 10:22 bis; 11:13; 12:30).<sup>32</sup> But Q does have the most nearly explicit beginnings of a truncated female Sophia christology (Q 7:35; 11:31, 49).<sup>33</sup>

<sup>31</sup> James M. Robinson, "The Image of Jesus in Q," in Jesus Then and Now, ed. Meyer and Hughes, 7–25, here 8–9, reprinted in The Sayings Gospel Q, 645–662, at 647–648.

<sup>32</sup> Luise Schottroff, Itinerant Prophetesses: A Feminist Analysis of the Sayings Source Q, Occasional Papers 21 (Claremont, CA: Institute for Antiquity and Christianity, 1991); Schottroff, "Wanderprophetinnen: Eine feministische Analyse der Logienquelle," EvT 51 (1991): 332–344. Decidedly critical is Helga Melzer-Keller, Jesus und die Frauen: Eine Verhältnisbestimmung nach den synoptischen Überlieferungen, HBS 14 (Freiburg: Herder, 1997), "Teil IV: Jesus und die Frauen in der Logienquelle," 330–353; Melzer-Keller, "Frauen in der Logienquelle und ihrem Trägerkreis: Ist Q das Zeugnis

Mary Magdalene is unfortunately not mentioned in Q; but also none of the male disciples are mentioned by name in Q. She is of course the center of attention today, especially since the publication of the best-seller The Da Vinci Code,<sup>34</sup> where there are enough references to scholarship to obscure where fact leaves off and fiction takes over: She is not only Jesus' wife and mother of his child, but even the ancestress of the French royal family (which thus also has a famous ancestor)! We limit ourselves to what has some affinity to the facts:

Mary was from the village of Magdala on the edge of the Sea of Galilee. She was one of the "women who had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities," the one "from whom seven demons had gone out" (Luke 8:3). But Luke reports this bit of information immediately following his story of an anonymous "woman of the city, who was a sinner": When Jesus was having dinner at a Pharisee's house in Galilee, she came to Jesus with "an alabaster flask of ointment" (Luke 7:36–50, especially v. 38):

Standing behind him at his feet, weeping, she began to wet his feet with her tears, and wiped them with the hair of her head, and kissed his feet, and anointed them with the ointment.

This is Luke's version of the story that Mark (14:3–9) located in the home of Simon the leper in Bethany, where there are no negative comments about the woman, whom Jesus commends. This woman immediately disappears completely from the story, and yet this kind of body language has been too much for some to let pass. The result has been that, down through the ages, Mary Magdalene has been falsely identified as a repentant prostitute.

---

einer patriarchatskritischen, egalitären Bewegung?" in Wenn Drei das Gleich sagen... Studien zu den ersten drei Evangelien, ed. Stefan H. Brandenburger and Thomas Hieke, Theologie 14 (Münster: Lit, 1998), 37–62; Melzer-Keller, "Wie frauenfreundlich ist die Logienquelle?" BK 54 (1999): 89–92.

<sup>33</sup> See my essay "Jesus as Sophos and Sophia: Wisdom Traditions and the Gospels," in Aspects of Wisdom in Judaism and Early Christianity, ed. Robert L. Wilken, University of Notre Dame Center for the Study of Judaism and Christianity in Antiquity 1 (Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1975), 1–16, reprinted in The Sayings Gospel Q, 119–130; and my presentation "Very Goddess and Very Man: Jesus's Better Self," at the feminist conference I initiated in the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity I directed, published in Images of the Feminine in Gnosticism, ed. Karen King, Studies in Antiquity and Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988), 113–127, reprinted in The Sayings Gospel Q, 259–273.

<sup>34</sup> Dan Brown, The Da Vinci Code: A Novel (New York: Doubleday, 2003).

This view received (all-too-faint) support from the fact that a similar story is told in the Gospel of John about a completely different Mary, the sister of Lazarus and Martha, during a meal at their home in Bethany of Judea (John 11:2; 12:3). The identification of Mary Magdalene with the prostitute has finally been repudiated officially by the Roman Catholic Church at the Second Vatican Council.

What do we know about the real Mary Magdalene? She was named after her home town: The town's name, Magdala, produced the term Magdalene, just as Gadara produced Gadarene (Matt 8:28) and Nazara (Matt 4:13 = Luke 4:16 = Q 4:16) produced Nazarene (Mark 1:24; 10:47; 14:67; 16:6; Luke 24:19). Women in that day were usually named after the dominant male in their life, such as the father or husband: "Joanna wife of Chusa, Herod's steward" (Luke 8:3), "Mary (mother) of James the younger and of Joses" (Mark 15:40), Mary the (wife) of Clopas" (John 19:25), "Mary the mother of John called Mark" (Acts 12:12). But among Jesus' female supporters, Suzanna (Luke 8:3) and Salome (Luke 8:3; Mark 15:40; 16:1) also lack any such identification, though in one text (Matt 27:56 parallel to Mark 15:40) "Salome" is replaced by "the mother of the sons of Zebedee." Perhaps Mary Magdalene did not have any such dominant male relative(s) after whom she was named, as the use of the name of her village to identify her might suggest. Or she may have lost her family identity on being abandoned due to her severe emotional condition,<sup>35</sup> or when she became a follower of Jesus (though others retained such designations).

Luke lists Mary Magdalene as first in a list that included "Joanna, the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward, and Susanna, and many others, who provided for them out of their means" (Luke 8:3). Thus Mary Magdalene is part of the larger female entourage accompanying Jesus, who supported his itinerant ministry as best as they could. Hence she is among the women who witnessed the crucifixion (Mark 15:40–41; John 19:25). The women continued to be present even after the crucifixion (Mark 15:47): "Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of Joses saw where he was laid."

They take the lead in the empty tomb stories: After the Sabbath they went to the tomb to perform the burial rites usually performed by women (Mark 16:1). Much to their amazement, they found the tomb empty. But they saw a young man dressed in a white robe (Mark 16:5), or an angel (Matt 28:2), or two men in dazzling apparel (Luke 24:4), who told them that Jesus had risen from the dead. They were commissioned, in a formula familiar from the Old Testament (Mark 16:7): “But go, tell his disciples and Peter that he is going before you to Galilee; there you will see him, as he told you.” Mark reported they were scared to tell the disciples (Mark 16:8), but Luke elaborated (Luke 24:10–11):

---

<sup>35</sup> As in the case of the Gerasene demoniac, Mark 5:1–20, who "lived among the tombs" (v. 3) until cured, whereupon he wanted to follow Jesus (v. 18), but Jesus told him to "go home to your own" (v. 19).

Now it was Mary Magdalene and Joanna and Mary the mother of James and the other women with them who told this to the apostles, but these words seemed to them an idle tale, and they did not believe them.

It was the Gospel of John (20:1–18) which at this point becomes the most important regarding Mary Magdalene. For John lists her coming alone to the tomb before dawn, and on finding it empty, running to tell Peter and the beloved disciple, who run and see it to be empty, and then return to their lodgings (v. 10). But Mary Magdalene stays at the tomb. Jesus appears to her. She mistakes him for the gardener, until he calls her by name, whereupon she recognizes him. He tells her, “Do not hold me, for I have not yet ascended to the Father” (v. 17). He sends her to the disciples, to whom she announces: “I have seen the Lord” (v. 18). All this attests to the importance of Mary Magdalene in Easter traditions, irrespective of what does or does not lie behind such stories as historical fact.

From all these references to Mary Magdalene, it is clear that she was pre-eminent among the women accompanying Jesus, down to the very end. But any romantic overtones one wishes to find in these references to her have to be read into the text, and probably say more about the one who hears such overtones than about Mary Magdalene herself. Jesus functioned in his society as a “holy man,” and no doubt was treated as such. He called upon his disciples to renounce family ties (Q 9:59–60; 12:51–52; 14:26), as he himself had done (Mark 3:19–21, 31–35; 6:4; Matt 4:13).

9. The Lost Gospel of Jesus

The focus of my engrossment with the historical Jesus has over the years shifted from finding a viable transition from Jesus to the kerygma to rediscovering the gospel he brought to Galilee... and perhaps even to us.

Our basic problem with Jesus is that the church has envisaged for him a different gospel from what he envisaged for himself. The Apostles' Creed, shared among almost all branches of Christianity, poses the problem clearly, even if unintentionally: It presents Jesus as the central figure in the trinity in heaven, rather than as the individual he was in Galilee. It simply skips over the historical Jesus, by moving from what was done for him: "...conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the virgin Mary," directly to what was done against him: "suffered under Pontius Pilate, crucified, dead and buried..." But between birth and death, Bethlehem and Golgatha, the Creed is completely silent: Missing is what was done by Jesus, whatever Jesus himself actually did or said by way of gospel. One would not even know that he was a Galilean, or a Jew.

The quest of the historical Jesus has sought to bring to the surface the missing Galilean Jew Jesus. Especially over the past generation that quest has been renewed with valuable new or improved tools at its disposal. The actual circumstances of Galilee under Roman control have been brought increasingly into view (see above). If thus the context into which Jesus is to be placed has become much more nuanced and reliable, the Jesus placed in that context tends to be increasingly lost in the mass of circumstantial evidence. Of course, we know we cannot take him out of his world and transplant him into our world, lest we make him into what he was not. We have been warned some time ago to avoid "the peril of modernizing Jesus."

Yet Jesus seems to have been a profound person, grappling with the human dilemma as he experienced it in his cultural context. He found a solution to it, which he implemented in his own life and urged anyone who would listen to implement in their life. This was of course couched in the language and options of his cultural situation, which is not ours. But the dilemma he confronted is still our dilemma, even though now recast in new language and modern alternatives.

His cause in life was not improving fishing conditions on the Sea of Galilee, or evading Roman taxation, or avoiding Gentile pollution, or many other issues he knew about as a Galilean Jew, but all of which are issues that are not our issues today. His basic issue was that most people have solved the human dilemma for themselves at the expense of everyone else, putting them down so as to stay afloat oneself. This vicious, anti-social way of coping with the necessities of life only escalates the dilemma for the rest of society.

All of us know the result all too well, for we have experienced it ourselves in one form or the other: In the break-down of mutually-supportive human relations into haves and have-nots; the ruling class subjugating the serfs, share-croppers, blue-collar workers; the battle of the sexes; dictatorships of one kind or the other; exploitation at the work place; colonialism; and on and on.

The problem of understanding the gospel of Jesus is to interface between his cultural situation and ours, his specifics and ours, his language and ours, so as to be able really to listen to him and think through for ourselves what he had to say. This applies both to the forms that the human dilemma took in his situation and ours, and to the solution he offered in his, and our translation of that into ours.

Jesus deserves more than being shelved as just a lofty curiosity in our cultural heritage. He needs to be taken seriously, really to be heard.

10. The Sayings Gospel Q

The primary source for knowing Jesus is to be found in the pithy and memorable sayings he used to move his listeners into action. They are what lived on after him, in that his disciples continued to proclaim them, in spite of their having experienced his utterly appalling execution, which one might think would have crushed their faith in all that Jesus had said, and silenced even their best intentions. It was these sayings that kept alive stories about what he had done, indeed engendered more and more stories ascribed to him.

But the sayings—of course not all of them, but the oldest layer—do go back to those who remembered what Jesus said and why he said it. Indeed, they were preserved not just as nostalgic memories of a past leader, but rather as the true message that his followers continued to announce in Jesus' name. The sayings scored their point when Jesus said them, and when his disciples repeated them. And they can score that same point when we hear them today. The Sayings Gospel Q is thus the primary source for the gospel of Jesus.

Of course the reader is interested to know about what Jesus did, not just what he said. But the Sayings Gospel Q presents him as a person who did precisely the kind of things the narrative gospels report: His role as faith healer is made clear in Q by the narration of the healing of the centurion's boy (Q 7:1–10). His role as exorcist is made clear in the exorcism initiating the Beelzebul controversy (Q 11:14–15).

Q launched the proof that Jesus is the “One to Come” that John had predicted, by calling on John’s disciples to see and hear what Jesus was doing. Q even provided the list of things Jesus had done that prove it (Q 7:22). It is indeed odd that a sayings gospel would list, as its evidence as to who Jesus is, first his healings, before mentioning what he said. Furthermore, Q reports that “mighty works” were performed in Chorazin and Bethsaida (Q 10:13). And the Mission Instructions in Q call on the disciples to heal the sick (Q 10:9), making clear that Jesus’ healing power was carried over to them. Thus Jesus’ role as faith healer and exorcist is as clear in the Sayings Gospel Q as it is in the narrative gospels. More important still, it is the Jesus of Q who also gives his explanation for the faith healings and exorcisms: It is God reigning.

Of course there is no final proof that even the oldest layer of sayings attributed to Jesus do in fact go back to him. His disciples, in continuing his message after his death, inevitably repeated them in such a way as to avoid misunderstandings that may have arisen, and to make clear what they were sure was Jesus’ intent. But it has become possible to a very large extent to detect such “improvements,” and hence to get behind them to the earlier formulation.

The reader of the canonical gospels, and even of Q, must avoid both extremes in assessing the reliability of the sayings ascribed to Jesus: Later reformulations, or even new sayings put on Jesus’ tongue, should not be ascribed to him, even though they may well be our favorite sayings. Furthermore, Jesus spoke Aramaic, and the gospels are all in Greek, so one is not talking about verbatim quotations, what Joachim Jeremias advocated as the “ipsissima verba Jesu.” But the oldest layer of sayings ascribed to him should not be considered unreliable, but should in fact be what we use to talk about Jesus, as even Rudolf Bultmann insisted. Otherwise Jesus quite unnecessarily disappears from the pages of history, or “Jesus” becomes an empty category into which wild fantasies can be poured.

11. What Jesus Has to Say: God is Reigning

To begin with the best-known text in Q, the Lord’s Prayer: Matthew has glossed the prayer several times, to embellish it according to the more liturgical usage of his own congregation. One of these Matthean additions is the petition (Matt 6:10): “Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven.” Apparently the petitions originally ran as follows (Q 11:2–4):<sup>36</sup>

Let your reign come;
 Our day’s bread give us today;
 and cancel our debts for us, as we too have cancelled for those in debt to us;
 and do not put us to the test!

The Lord’s Prayer is clearly not a prayer about the afterlife or another world, but about the here and now. Indeed, the interpretation of the Lord’s Prayer, which follows directly in Q, makes this abundantly clear (Q 11:9–13). Jesus hardly meant that as surely as a human parent gives bread and fish in the here and now, the heavenly Father will give pie in the sky by-and-by. The clear meaning is that God will answer the petition “our day’s bread give us daily” in the here and now, daily.

Perhaps this present reality of God reigning is made most clear in the case of exorcism (Q 11:20): “But if it is by the finger of God that I cast out demons, then there has come upon you God’s reign.” The abnormal symptoms of a disease that led it to be called possession by a demon or an evil spirit are in the here and now (Mark 9:17–18, 20, 22). Of necessity the exorcism, as the coming of God’s reign, is also in the here and now.

The extent to which a day’s bread and exorcisms are already God reigning is made clear in the Mission Instructions (Q 10:8–9): “And whatever town you enter and they take you in, eat what is set before you, and cure the sick there, and say to them: ‘The kingdom of God has reached unto you.’”

Actually, the Q people thought they were already “in” the kingdom (Q 7:28): “There has not arisen among women’s offspring anyone who surpasses John. Yet the least significant in God’s kingdom is more than he.” Similarly, the woe pronounced against exegetes of the Law, who shut people out of the kingdom, does not just refer to closing access to the kingdom in the afterlife, when one might otherwise have hoped to enter it, but refers to these exegetes of the Law as themselves not having entered the kingdom already now (Q 11:52): “...for you shut the kingdom of God from people; you did not go in, nor let in those trying to get in.”

---

<sup>36</sup> Q 11:2b–4, ed. Shawn Carruth (Leuven: Peeters, 1996). This is the first in the series Documenta Q: Reconstructions of Q Through Two Centuries of Gospel Research Excerpted, Sorted, and Evaluated.

Another saying in Q indicates rather precisely the point in time when the kingdom has entered into history, namely just after the law and the prophets and John, for since then, perhaps beginning with John's death, the kingdom is violated and plundered (Q 16:16): "The law and the prophets were until John. From then on the kingdom of God is violated and the violent plunder it." Similarly, the parables of the kingdom present God's reigning as beginning already now. To be sure, this is not intended as a given status, like the "established church," as if God reigning had been turned over to a sometimes all-too-human hierarchy to run. Rather God reigning is something that actually happens from time to time, as God participates in the living experience of people. For God inspires his children to act as he does, and thus through them does his reigning (Q 6:27–28, 35):

Love your enemies and pray for those persecuting you, so that you may become sons of your Father, for he raises his sun on bad and good and rains on the just and unjust.

Jesus rejected the idea of locating any given place where the kingdom can be expected to come, since in fact it is already present in the here and now (Q 17:20–21):

But on being asked when the kingdom of God is coming, he answered them and said: 'The kingdom of God is not coming visibly. Nor will one say: Look, here! Or: There! For look, the kingdom of God is within you!'

Again, this saying should not be misunderstood, as if it had in view just a mystic inwardness. Though the rare preposition translated here "within" does seem to mean inside in contrast to outside,<sup>37</sup> the meaning would not seem to be far from the alternate translation, "among you" or "in your midst," since it does mean "inside" society, standing over against some never-never land "out there." The point of the saying is that the kingdom is not something that will take place somewhere sometime, but is a reality in the present experience of people in the world of today.

Jesus called on people to "seek" the kingdom (Q 12:31): "But seek his kingdom, and all these shall be granted to you." This is anything but hunting for some future cosmic event, which Jesus had explicitly rejected. Rather, this seeking is set over against the other kind of seeking, which anxiety-laden Gentiles do, when they ask (Q 12:30): “‘What are we to eat?’ Or: ‘What are we to drink?’ Or: ‘What are we to wear?’”

---

<sup>37</sup> T. Holmén, "The Alternatives of the Kingdom: Encountering the Semantic Restrictions of Luke 17:20–21 (ἐντὸς ὑμῶν)," ZNW 87 (1996): 214–229.

Hence “seeking” for the kingdom returns full circle to the petition, “let your reign come,” in the Lord’s Prayer: One does not need to be anxiety-laden about scrounging for such physical necessities as food to eat, because one can trust in God reigning, that is to say, answering the petition for God’s reign to come, in the concrete form of someone providing our day’s bread.

Thus the kingdom of God, the one clearly recognizable “technical term” in Jesus’ vocabulary, in a sense elevates to religious relevance much of everyday living, such as sickness, the need for food and clothing, the evil with which people are always struggling. It is in the very real everyday world that God reigning is very good news (Q 7:22), Jesus’ gospel.

SCHOLARLY RIGOR AND INTUITION IN HISTORICAL RESEARCH INTO JESUS

JACQUES SCHLOSSER

When Justin of Rome speaks of “our Jesus,”<sup>1</sup> he shows that the crucified Lord fully belongs to history (Dial. 46.1); but he perceives him from one particular perspective (“our Jesus”) which cannot be detached from the faith which recognizes in him “the Christ” (116.1), “the Son of God” (116.2), “our savior Jesus Christ” (1 Apol. 33.5) according to the teaching imparted by those who have cultivated the remembrance of Jesus (1 Apol. 33.5). The same is true of Origen in his refutation of Celsus.<sup>2</sup>

The historian who studies Jesus of Nazareth inevitably encounters this perspective inspired by faith, but he will not allow himself to be inspired by it when he attempts to specify as an historian who this man was, what he did, and what he said. He is aware that “the hypothesis of an action of providence eludes science,”<sup>3</sup> and he will keep to those instruments which the customary praxis of history offers him. If necessary, he will make it clear that the Jesus of history is in fact only the Jesus reconstructed by the academic discipline known as history—not what we might call the “real” Jesus. And this means that despite the reservations which one sees on this point among theologians (including some exegetes),<sup>4</sup> a secular approach, i.e. one carried out in a purely historical perspective, seems to me legitimate and possible.

1. An Undertaking which Is Both Legitimate and Possible

According to E. M. Laperrousaz, “There was a time, not so very long ago, when it was the done thing—for the sake of prudence—to cast

---

<sup>1</sup> Dial. 33.1; 116.1. Cf. also “our Christ,” 111.2 and 113.1.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. Contra Celsum 1.25, 29, etc.

<sup>3</sup> Marc Bloch, Apologie pour l'histoire ou métier d'historien (critical edition prepared by Étienne Bloch; Paris: Armand Colin, 1993), 88.

<sup>4</sup> Cf., e.g., Pierre Grelot, Jésus de Nazareth, Christ et Seigneur 1, LD 167 (Paris: Cerf, 1997), 12–13.

doubt on the real existence of the founders of religious and other movements in classical antiquity. Today, with the development, the deeper knowledge, and the greater sophistication of our knowledge of the ancient history of the eastern Mediterranean Basin, who would dare to call into question the real existence of persons such as Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, Jesus, and... the Teacher of Righteousness who founded the Essene community of Qumran...?"<sup>5</sup> If Jesus is an undisputed historical personage, it seems normal that one should study him in a rational manner which has recourse exclusively to the methods and approaches which are employed in the customary praxis of history. In this case, we are moving above all in the realm of ancient history, where we have a variety of sources on which to draw: historical, literary, or epigraphic texts, archaeological discoveries such as figurative artistic objects, and the contribution made by numismatics (to mention only a few of the available resources).<sup>6</sup> Sometimes, the researcher who studies Jesus as an historian is also a believer, but this situation is not without its parallels: other historians too have an existential relationship to the object of their researches. Just as some of his colleagues must take care to keep their political or ideological commitment in check, so too the Christian historian will endeavor to prescind from his personal faith and to concentrate on those things which can be observed and verified and thus form the object of a common undertaking which is independent of the personal convictions of the individual scholar. In addition to intellectual honesty, respect for methodology constitutes a useful and indeed indispensable safeguard here. For no matter what differences may exist among the various schools of historians, they all have the critical method in common, and the historical enterprise implies that all who are involved in this rational procedure "take care to verify facts, cultivate precision, and seek complete information," without forgetting the fundamental ingredients, viz. the criticism of one's sources and the establishing of the facts.<sup>7</sup> When the academic study of the Bible concentrates on the historical aspect, it must be conducted according to the same rules. This means that "it is not obvious why faith should be

---

<sup>5</sup> "Quelques questions primordiales concernant Jésus," Historiens et Géographes 374 (May 2001): 121.

<sup>6</sup> Cf. Jean-Nicolas Corvisier, Sources et méthodes en histoire ancienne (Paris: PUF, 1997).

<sup>7</sup> Antoine Prost, Douze leçons sur l'histoire (Paris: Seuil, 1966), 285, 287; cf. also 290–293.

a necessary component of the historical criticism of the Bible.”<sup>8</sup> It follows that “Jesus and his companions are historical personages and can therefore be studied historically by anyone who has the competence to do so.”<sup>9</sup> This means that the legitimacy of an historical study of Jesus is indubitable—but is it possible?

The severity with which Schweitzer concluded his famous dossier of the nineteenth-century quest of the historical Jesus<sup>10</sup> has sometimes been interpreted as ruling out in principle any research into Jesus, but this is not correct. Schweitzer himself proposes a synthesis which we could describe as a falsification of the liberal portrait of Jesus and the proposition of a substitute hypothesis.<sup>11</sup> It is above all Rudolf Bultmann who is supposed to be the chief representative of radical skepticism. Some of his affirmations certainly seem to go in this direction, such as the famous sentence in his book about Jesus: “I believe that we can know virtually nothing about the life and the personality of Jesus, because the Christian sources which we possess are very fragmentary and invaded by legends, and they displayed no interest on this point—and there is no other source for Jesus.”<sup>12</sup> Subsequently,<sup>13</sup> Bultmann himself corrected the misunderstanding which had arisen because readers of his book confused “person” with “personality.” He specified that the evangelists are indeed interested in the “person” of Jesus.<sup>14</sup> From time to time, voices are raised in ironic congratulation of the scholars’ courage. Such critics believe in reality that it is somewhat naïve and irresponsible to engage in historical research into Jesus, and they suggest that this rash enterprise should be abandoned altogether. It seems to them doomed to failure a

---

<sup>8</sup> Jean-Noël Aletti, “Exégète et théologien face aux recherches historiques sur Jésus,” RSR 87 (1999): 423–444, at 439.

<sup>9</sup> Gérard Rochais, “Jésus: entre événement et fiction,” Lumière et Vie 248 (2000): 7–18, at 16.

<sup>10</sup> Albert Schweitzer, Die Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung, 5th ed. (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1933).

<sup>11</sup> On the role of falsification in historical research, cf. Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter, Die Kriterienfrage in der Jesusforschung: Vom Differenzkriterium zum Plausibilitätskriterium, NTOA 34 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht; Fribourg: Éditions Universitaires, 1997), 207–209.

<sup>12</sup> From the French translation: Rudolf Bultmann, Jésus: Mythologie et Démythologisation (Paris: Seuil, 1968), 35.

<sup>13</sup> For more details, cf. Jacques Schlosser, “Le débat de Käsemann et Bultmann à propos du Jésus de l’histoire,” RSR 87 (1999): 373–395, esp. 376–377.

<sup>14</sup> Cf. the response of Bultmann to E. Foerster, published by Walter Schmithals, in Rudolf Bultmanns Werk und Wirkung, ed. Bernd Jaspers (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1984), 70–80.

priori, thanks to the special character of the gospels which undoubtedly remain the principal sources for every investigation of Jesus.

It is obvious that a remote past is accessible only through the sources. The question is therefore whether the available documentation is sufficient to reconstruct the historical figure of Jesus. But the first step to be taken by the scholar, especially when he realizes that he is in fact an amateur (since he does not himself belong to the body of professional historians), is to ask the specialists about the methods and practices of history. I believe that the most fruitful results will be gained from examining those historians who are themselves familiar with the problems of biblical exegesis.<sup>15</sup>

2. Some Notes on Historical Praxis<sup>16</sup>

I do not propose here to present the conceptions and the praxis which were current in the historians of antiquity, although it is certainly useful to know about these.<sup>17</sup> All I wish to do is to give some information about how historians work today, so that we will be aware of the problems that those who begin an historical enquiry may face.

It was in the nineteenth and the early twentieth centuries that history acquired the status of a university discipline,<sup>18</sup> first in Germany (more precisely, in Prussia), then in France; its outstanding representatives were Leopold von Ranke in Germany and Charles Seignobos in France. The slogan with which a later age summed up the historical studies practiced at that period is borrowed from Ranke: wie es eigentlich gewesen ist, “how things actually were.” This gives the impression that those historians were primarily interested in facts and indeed obsessed with the objectivity of those facts. As always,<sup>19</sup> this slogan expresses the truth by means of a caricature. If we read Ranke’s words in their

<sup>15</sup> E.g., Henri-Irénée Marrou, De la connaissance historique, 6th ed. (Paris: Seuil, 1975); or Marie-Françoise Baslez, Bible et histoire : Judaïsme, hellénisme, christianisme (Paris: Fayard, 1998).

<sup>16</sup> I develop here the sketch presented in my Jésus de Nazareth, 2nd ed. (Paris: Agnès Viénot Éditions, 2002), 13–18.

<sup>17</sup> Cf. L’histoire d’Homère à Augustin: Préfaces des historiens et textes sur l’histoire réunis et commentés par François Hartog, traduits par Michel Casevitz (Paris: Seuil, 1999).

<sup>18</sup> There were of course precedents: on this, cf. Jacques Le Goff, Histoire et mémoire (Paris: Seuil, 1988), 305–325; and Paul Ricoeur, La mémoire, l’histoire, l’oubli (Paris: Seuil, 2000), 217–218, who emphasizes the important role of Lorenzo Valla.

<sup>19</sup> We should recall that classical antiquity knew similar formulations: e.g., Flavius Josephus, Apion 1.37; and Lucian (quoted in L’histoire, n. 17 above, 236).

immediate context,<sup>20</sup> we see that the objectivism commonly associated with these words is much attenuated. It is in fact the expression of a genuine modesty vis-à-vis the lofty mission which some scholars of that time attributed to history, which was supposed to judge the past, teach our contemporaries, and prepare the future. The adherents of positivist history do indeed emphasize facts, public affairs, individuals, and events, thus exposing themselves to the risk of illusions and short-sightedness: this school “immobilized history in events and eliminated duration.”<sup>21</sup> When taken to excess, it tended to promote “an erudite ‘positivist’ ideal which fled from ideas and banished from the historical enterprise the task of investigating causes.”<sup>22</sup> It has been said that Seignobos wanted “to reconstruct the knowledge of reality. But this always eludes him, because he only substitutes fragmentary, uncertain, and misleading traces for reality instead of interpreting this.”<sup>23</sup> But the “methodical school” (to use an expression dear to A. Prost, which P. Ricoeur has reprinted)<sup>24</sup> does not deserve all the criticisms to which it has been subjected.<sup>25</sup> The adherents of this school were perfectly well aware that facts and data do not fall ready cooked onto their plates (so to speak) and that the historian too is personally implicated in what he does.<sup>26</sup> There can be no doubt that their honesty, their erudition, and their concern about facts are permanent values.

Nevertheless, the historians of the first part of the twentieth century distanced themselves from their predecessors, who in some cases had been their own teachers. More work was devoted to the long-term perspective, to economic and social realities, and to “mentalities.” I would emphasize here the following characteristics, which are interlinked: the insistence on the indissoluble bond between the historian and the history which he produces, the treatment of facts, and the role of questions, of hypotheses, and of the imagination.

---

<sup>20</sup> Cf. the complete sentence in Prost, Leçons, 289, or in Le Goff, Histoire, 270.

<sup>21</sup> Le Goff, Histoire, 54.

<sup>22</sup> Le Goff, Histoire, 234.

<sup>23</sup> Bertrand Müller, Lucien Febvre, lecteur et critique (Paris: Albin Michel, 2003), 226 n. 2.

<sup>24</sup> Mémoire, 217–218 n. 42.

<sup>25</sup> Cf. the clarifications by Gérard Noiriel, Sur la “crise” de l’histoire (Paris: Belin, 1996), 111–121 and 127; and by J. Glénisson in Dictionnaire des Sciences Historiques, ed. André Burguière (Paris: PUF, 1986), 630–631.

<sup>26</sup> Cf. the texts by Seignobos quoted by Prost, Leçons, 65–66 and 266 n. 3; and the remarks by Le Goff, Histoire, 276.

“History is inseparable from the historian.” This is the title of one chapter in a masterly book which continues to be used as a work of reference;<sup>27</sup> it also represents a shared conviction. Marrou’s reaction against positivism is particularly noticeable, and this accounts for the excessive vigor with which he makes some of his points.<sup>28</sup> The scholar is not in a vacuum; to a large extent, he is what he is because of his education and his social environment; he has his own personality, his preferences, and his passions. Nor is it so certain that the historian gains anything by adopting an attitude of coldness and suspicion with regard to the object of his researches. Marrou (rather overplaying his hand) advises him to trust his interlocutor from the past (pp. 92–94), since sympathy is “the source and precondition of comprehension,” and friendship allows one to see clearly. Marrou sums up his position by saying that good history demands an existential commitment: “Against the strict objectivism of the old positivism, which would have liked to be able to reduce the attitude of the historian to a frozen and basically indifferent look at a dead past, history has seemed to us to be the fruit of an action, of an endeavor, and of a creative sense which brings into play the living powers of the human spirit, as these are defined by the historian’s abilities, his mentality, his technical equipment, and his cultural level. History is an adventure of the spirit, in which the total personality of the historian is involved...” (p. 197). This position has its limits, and Marrou himself nuances it when he specifies that the historian must “silence his own passions, beginning by calming those passions which his existential commitment kindles in him.” He must be aware of his subjectivity, but this is “in order that he may learn to keep watch over it, so that he may never be tricked by his own self. He must put himself in the best possible condition to see and hear, to comprehend” (p. 212). Since the “foaming of the feelings” risks suffocating the scholar’s lucidity, it is essential to balance this attitude of sympathy “by elements which are less intuitive, and more rational and certain.”<sup>29</sup> In order to avoid all ambiguity, Marrou states his belief that the academic undertakings of the nineteenth century—philology, the criticism of texts and of testimonies, and the recourse to auxiliary sciences—retain all their value.<sup>30</sup>

<sup>27</sup> Marrou, Connaissance. For a synthesis of the historical work of Marrou, cf. Pierre Riché, Marrou: Historien engagé (Paris: Cerf, 2003), esp. 167–198.

<sup>28</sup> According to Ricoeur (Mémoire, 440), Marrou certainly ought to have followed up his denunciation of an objectivity which was too naïvely conceived, by “a parallel critique of subjectivity.” We must distinguish between a “good subjectivity” and a “bad subjectivity,” and the moi de recherche, the “I who studies,” must not be a moi pathétique, an “I moved by feelings.”

<sup>29</sup> Prost, Leçons, 95 and 108.

The historians of the first part of the twentieth century, especially those who belonged to the school of the Annales, agreed about the necessity to “construct” the facts, and this point of view now seems generally accepted. Summing up the thought of Marc Bloch, one of the founders of the Annales, Jacques Le Goff writes: “The facts are not objective phenomena which exist outside the historian, but are the result of the work and the construction of the historian, who is the creator of the historical facts.” He adds: “the historical fact is not a ‘positive’ datum, but an active construction by” the historian.<sup>31</sup> We no longer have direct access to the reality of the past. We discover its traces, “i.e., the mark, perceptible to the senses, which has been left by a phenomenon that cannot be grasped in itself,”<sup>32</sup> and we attempt to reconstruct the facts by means of the traces which they have left, since “historical research understands every document as the symptom of that which produced it.”<sup>33</sup> But realistically, we are obliged to recognize that in his concrete work, the scholar must work on facts which have already been constructed by the research of his predecessors, since “no historian hesitates to take over ready-made facts from other historians, provided that they are well made and that he can reuse them in his own construction.”<sup>34</sup>

At first sight, a common sense view<sup>35</sup> will be that historical work consists of two stages. First of all, one collects the documentation, and then one makes use of it. My remarks above about “facts” show that

---

<sup>30</sup> “We only seem to criticize the axioms of the positivist method. In reality, our theory integrates these...” (Marrou, Connaissance, 229). Marrou clearly wished to distance himself from the excesses of historicism, where in extreme cases the historian renounced “science in order to abandon himself to intuition... or to art for art’s sake”: O. Dumoulin in Burguière, ed. Dictionnaire, 330.

<sup>31</sup> Cf. the preface by Jacques Le Goff in Bloch, Apologie, 7–32, at 10 and 15. Le Goff returns to this point several times in his own work: Histoire, 20, 183, 197.

<sup>32</sup> Bloch, Apologie, 103.

<sup>33</sup> Michel de Certeau, L’écriture de l’histoire (2nd ed., 1975; repr., Paris: Gallimard, 2002) 27.

<sup>34</sup> Prost, Leçons, 73.

<sup>35</sup> In history—perhaps even more than in other disciplines—the recourse to “plain common sense” is a temptation against which one must be on one’s guard. This is affirmed by Bloch, Apologie, 100: common sense is often “nothing more than a conglomerate of irrational postulates and of hastily generalized experiences”; and Prost, Leçons, 64.

this view is extremely naïve,<sup>36</sup> since “history is not a fish in a net; the historian does not cast out his net in a random manner to see if he will catch any fish—and only then look to see what kind of fish he has caught!”<sup>37</sup> From the outset, the historian selects and examines the data, and from the outset he is guided by an antecedent understanding, a provisional image of the past, a particular point of view, and questions “which predetermine all the enquiry and provide its orientation.”<sup>38</sup> Experience not infrequently shows that new questions are generated by new perspectives which are dominated by present-day concerns and which entail inter alia a new reading and a different evaluation of sources which have been known for a long time. This means that the questions, and even the explanatory hypotheses, are active at the very moment when the work begins, and there is a permanent dialogue between the questions and the hypotheses on the one hand and the way in which the documentation is treated on the other. This applies to the Bible too: “in order to carry out research into the persons of the Bible, one must discover the right questions,” and “in order to define the right questions, one must have access to the right tools.”<sup>39</sup>

In somewhat exaggerated terms,<sup>40</sup> Lucien Febvre posited an antithesis between the traditional historians “who lived in a respect for the ‘fact’ which was as puerile as it was devout” and the innovators for whom the basis of academic work consisted in “asking questions and formulating hypotheses.” The first group saw this new option as a betrayal which amounted to “allowing the Trojan horse of subjectivity to penetrate the city of objectivity...” Today, there is a general consensus that questions and initial explanatory hypotheses play an indispensable role,<sup>41</sup> but the

<sup>36</sup> Cf. Bloch, Apologie, 109.

<sup>37</sup> Prost, Leçons, 75.

<sup>38</sup> Marrou, Connaissance, 201.

<sup>39</sup> Baslez, Bible et histoire, 13.

<sup>40</sup> This is probably due to the context in which he made these remarks—in this case, a public lecture. The text is printed in Charles-Olivier Carbonell and Jean Walch, eds. Les sciences historiques de l'Antiquité à nos jours (Paris: Larousse, 1994), 216–226, at 219.

<sup>41</sup> Cf. especially the “lesson” about “The historian’s questions” in Prost, Leçons, 81–100; Ricoeur, Mémoire, 225–226. On the “classics,” cf. Bloch, Apologie, 109–111; François Simiand and Lucien Febvre, quoted by Müller, Febvre, 235 and 408: “The work of research and of elaboration, of analysis and construction, of positive information and of an inductive and systematic utilization, is one single and indivisible task” (F. Simiand); “there is no scholar in any science who begins his work without a hypothesis, who sets about gathering facts without a hypothesis, or who structures and clarifies the facts which he has assembled without a hypothesis” (L. Febvre); Marrou, Connaissance, 201–202 and passim.

method works only if one takes one's precautions. It goes without saying that a hypothesis can always be revised as one's work progresses, and one must guard against gradually transforming a hypothetical given into a probable truth, and then into a certainty, unless a synthesis of the arguments justifies this. We are rather more reluctant to attribute a positive role to the imagination because of the connotations of pure fantasy, delirium, or dreaming which are sometimes attached to this word (a French expression calls the imagination la folle du logis, which we might translate as "the madwoman in the attic"). Nevertheless, we must have recourse to the imagination, once we acknowledge that we cannot carry out research without antecedent questions, and when we attempt to formulate our working hypotheses. When the imagination is kept under control, it can help provide a concrete perception of the past; above all, the imagination—the "scientific imagination" which is active through our ability to form abstract pictures—is needed in every academic enterprise.<sup>42</sup> Where we cannot carry out laboratory experiments, we employ a kind of mental experiment, although I am convinced that we ought not to go in for too many lines of argument based exclusively on "one may well imagine that..." or "it is not impossible that..." in order to explain the inexplicable. And we must be aware of the surreptitious transformations which occur only too often: "a possibility that cannot be excluded automatically acquires the status of a demonstrated possibility," and "the base metal of mere possibility is regularly and miraculously transmuted into the gold of real probability."<sup>43</sup> I agree with those who hold that one should not stick one's neck out too far when one is working without a safety-net, and I would be happy to put my own signature to the principle which Louis Duchesne deduced from Rom 12:3, "I prefer to go less far and to walk in safety."<sup>44</sup> No doubt, "one always dislikes saying: 'I do not know, I cannot say.' One should say this only after having searched energetically, indeed desperately. But there are moments when the most urgent duty of the scholar, after he has tried every avenue, is to accept his ignorance and to admit it honestly."<sup>45</sup>

---

<sup>42</sup> Here, I follow closely Le Goff, Histoire, 208–209. Cf. also the nuances in Prost, Leçons, 185.

<sup>43</sup> Jerome Murphy O'Connor, RB 108 (2001): 297 and 298.

<sup>44</sup> According to Marrou, Connaissance, 139.

<sup>45</sup> Bloch, Apologie, 106.

The great masters, especially M. Bloch, recommend that the historian subject the traces of the past to a subtle and indirect reading. The concrete examples exist in order to illustrate that reading. When we pay attention to that which someone “gave, to understand without wishing to tell it” directly, we learn much more about the past than it itself “judged it right to let us know.”<sup>46</sup> This point of view goes further than the classic distinction between voluntary and involuntary testimonies, because the historian is now seeking precisely “to treat voluntary testimonies as involuntary testimonies and to interrogate them about something other than they themselves wished to say.”<sup>47</sup> It is in this manner that the parables in the Gospel offer us information which the social sciences employ to reconstruct their socio-economic environment.

In their work on the basis of documents,<sup>48</sup> which they exploit with rigor and subtlety with the help of the techniques summarized in the terms “methodical school,” “critical method,” or “historical-critical” method, historians agree that they are not simply looking for factual data, but also for connections and for the interplay of cause and effect. Even those who are most sensitive to the subjective implication recognize that history is not the tower of Babel: “two historians who ask a question in the same way, and possess the same documentary data and the same technical and cultural equipment which permits them to get to work on these data, are not going to arrive at different answers: they are not going to construct two separate histories. The historian is not imprisoned within his subjectivity...”<sup>49</sup> The insistence on the personal involvement of the historian in his work has not rendered the words “objective” and “objectivity” taboo. The subjectivity which is acknowledged to exist on the part of the historian “must not lead to a fundamental skepticism with regard to historical objectivity, nor to the abandonment of the notion of truth in history.”<sup>50</sup> Nevertheless, the vocabulary of “objectivity” is perhaps not the best suited today, since it seems to retreat from the close links between the historian and the history which he produces, and to revive the old vulgar positivism.

<sup>46</sup> Bloch, Apologie, 108–109. Cf. also 125.

<sup>47</sup> Prost, Leçons, 63. According to Michel Foucault (quoted by Le Goff, Histoire, 294), the traces “say in silence something other than they say.”

<sup>48</sup> I use this term in its common meaning, without entering here into the very complex discussion of the differences between “monuments” and “documents,” or between “facts” and “events.” Cf. Ricoeur, Mémoire, 226–229.

<sup>49</sup> Marrou, Connaissance, 218.

<sup>50</sup> Le Goff, Histoire, 22 (his italics), cf. also 10 and 194–200.

One may prefer to speak of “distancing oneself,” of “impartiality,” or perhaps simply of “truth,” provided we accept that “in history, truth is that which is proved.”<sup>51</sup> Although it may seem somewhat pedantic, my own preference is for a vocabulary which evokes the consensus which scholars reach on the basis of observations or arguments which all agree to be relevant: “intersubjectivity” and “intersubjective.”<sup>52</sup> We must also take into account the varying “levels of the scientific character of history.” It is fairly easy to reach such a consensus on the basic data, the collection and interpretation of each individual document, but less easy when we engage in “explanatory history” (dealing with social, economic, and political forces); and it becomes truly difficult on the level of the “poetic” history which deals with the vast ensembles which serve “to help a nation understand itself by means of its foundational narratives.”<sup>53</sup>

This means that the emphasis of contemporary historiography on subjectivity and on the personal involvement of the historian inevitably warns the scholar to be extremely prudent—and prudence is all the more necessary when we bear in mind that the available sources themselves to a very large extent have a Christian origin. But is there really a contradiction between an approach which seeks to be rigorously scientific and the work undertaken by an historian who finds himself “addressed personally”<sup>54</sup> because of his faith? This specific issue is one element in a wider debate which took place in France after the First World War,<sup>55</sup> but is not limited to any one place or time. It concerns the impartiality which is necessary, the distance which must be kept, and the tension between personal involvement and the freedom to look afresh at the questions. The difficulty is due to the fact that this commitment can help the scholar to see more clearly in a matter which he knows from the inside with a “knowledge born of friendship” (to use Marrou’s phrase); at the same time, however, this commitment can equally well lend itself to nationalistic and political excesses.

<sup>51</sup> Prost, Leçons, 266–268 and 288–293, at 289.

<sup>52</sup> Le Goff, Histoire, 196, points out the advantages of this vocabulary.

<sup>53</sup> Paul Ricoeur, La critique et la conviction (Paris: Calmann-Lévy, 1995), 131–132.

<sup>54</sup> On this question, cf. the nuanced reflections by Jean-Paul Michaud, “Jésus de l’histoire et Jésus des évangiles : À l’occasion du Jésus de Nazareth de Jacques Schlosser,” Theoforum 32 (2001): 223–233, at 232–233.

<sup>55</sup> Cf. Müller, Febvre, 325–330.

3. The Sources

“Without documents, there is no history.” It is difficult to disagree with this principle of the two masters of the methodical school, Langlois and Seignobos.<sup>56</sup> The value of the historian’s work depends on the wealth and quality of his sources—but also on their diversity, since often the light can come only “from the converging rays of testimonies of a very diverse nature.”<sup>57</sup> Traditionally, the historian’s tool par excellence has been the cross-checking of his sources.<sup>58</sup> In this respect, the historian who studies Jesus finds himself at a disadvantage, since the object of his researches belongs to local history, which seldom offers many documents (especially epigraphic sources), and where archaeology, though not silent, does not have the important role which it plays in other sectors.<sup>59</sup>

By rediscovering to some extent “Jesus the Jew,” recent research has naturally enough emphasized the study of his environment. Many investigations into Galilee have been carried out from the general perspective of the social sciences, and the exploitation of the countless pieces of information which we find in the works of Flavius Josephus is a significant documentary enrichment of our knowledge of the environment in which Jesus lived.<sup>60</sup> More directly, in addition to what Josephus tells us about James and John the Baptist, the passage about Jesus himself (Ant. 18.63–64) has taken on a new value, since recent analyses have shown convincingly that we may now consider this, not as a completely secondary addition, but as a text of Josephus with some

---

<sup>56</sup> It is quoted by Le Goff, Histoire, 297.

<sup>57</sup> Bloch, Apologie, 111; Marie-Françoise Baslez, in the introduction to a collection she has edited: Les premiers temps de l’Eglise de saint Paul à saint Augustin (Paris: Gallimard, 2004), 8. Cf. also the personal testimony by Le Goff, Histoire, 217.

<sup>58</sup> Marie-Françoise Baslez, Les sources littéraires de l’histoire grecque (Paris: Armand Colin, 2003), recalls this repeatedly. Her book is also a fine illustration of the information which the historian can find in a great variety of texts if he knows how to practice the indirect reading mentioned above.

<sup>59</sup> Cf. Jonathan L. Reed, Archaeology and the Galilean Jesus: A Re-examination of the Evidence (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2002), especially his summary on 212–220. Not even important centers such as Sepphoris and Capernaum furnish many epigraphic texts (121 and 156).

<sup>60</sup> This benefit can be seen with particular clarity in Martin Ebner, Jesus von Nazareth in seiner Zeit: Sozialgeschichtliche Zugänge, SBS 196 (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 2003).

Christian interpolations.<sup>61</sup> The progress of Palestinian archaeology has supplied numerous indirect data.<sup>62</sup>

In another field, the “neo-liberal” wing of the Third Quest<sup>63</sup> has paid remarkable attention to the non-canonical Christian documentation, with a general tendency to attribute an earlier date to these writings than is customary, and to insist on their independence vis-à-vis the canonical sources. These texts must certainly be taken into consideration, but their contribution remains limited by their fragmentary state of conservation. The promotion of the Secret Gospel of Mark and the “Cross Gospel” as independent and very ancient texts is based on indications that are very fragile; at any rate, prudence warns against locating these works (if they actually ever existed as such) at the origins of the trajectory of the gospels.<sup>64</sup> The Gospel of Thomas, on the other hand, deserves a serious consideration, but no global judgment about its value and its relevance is genuinely convincing: one cannot claim that it is a gnostic text, nor that it is wholly free of gnostic passages, and it is impossible to prove either that it is completely dependent on the synoptics or that it is always independent of them. If the Gospel of Thomas is to be given its appropriate place in the historical study of Jesus, the best path seems to be to concentrate on the individual logia and to analyze them separately.<sup>65</sup> In this way, the historian can base his

---

<sup>61</sup> For the essential elements of the debate, cf. Craig A. Evans, Life of Jesus Research: An Annotated Bibliography, rev. ed., NTTTS 24 (Leiden: Brill, 1996), 280–284. For detailed argumentation, cf. John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus 1: The Roots of the Problem and the Person (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 59–69 with footnotes; Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, Der historische Jesus: Ein Lehrbuch (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1996), 75–82; Ebner, Jesus von Nazareth, 26–27. However, the optimistic judgment of Étienne Nodet (cf. most recently his Histoire de Jésus? Nécessité et limites d'une enquête [Paris: Cerf, 2003], 225–228) about the historical value of the Slavonic version of this text is not likely to meet with a scholarly consensus any time soon.

<sup>62</sup> Cf. Reed, Archaeology; and K. C. Hanson and Douglas E. Oakman, Palestine in the Time of Jesus: Social Structures and Social Conflicts (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1998).

<sup>63</sup> This term is repeatedly used by James D. G. Dunn, Christianity in the Making 1: Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003).

<sup>64</sup> Cf. especially the presentation and criticisms by Meier, A Marginal Jew I, 114–116; and Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 167–172.

<sup>65</sup> Cf. the arguments of Jean-Daniel Kaestli, “L'utilisation de l'Évangile de Thomas dans la recherche actuelle sur les paroles de Jésus,” in Jésus de Nazareth: Nouvelles approches d'une énigme, ed. Daniel Marguerat, Enrico Norelli, and Jean-Michel Poffet, 2nd ed., Le Monde de la Bible 38 (Geneva: Labor et Fides, 2003), 373–395; David E. Aune, “Assessing the Historical Value of the Apocryphal Jesus Traditions: A Critique of Conflicting Methodologies,” in Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der arguments on a supplementary element in individual instances, when he seeks to define the genesis and growth of a tradition of the synoptic type; both for that part of the tradition behind Thomas which does not confirm the synoptics and for that part where independence is probable (despite a relationship of some kind to the synoptics), there will thus be an extra attestation to evaluate when he applies the criterion of multiple attestation. This would be particularly useful in the study of the parables.<sup>66</sup>

No sound historical methodology can contest the fact that the major sources remain the canonical gospels. There is no need to spell out in detail the few resemblances and the numerous differences which come to light when one compares the synoptics with John.<sup>67</sup> The differences are so weighty that the principle so vigorously formulated by Albert Schweitzer remains basically valid with regard to the reconstruction of Jesus' preaching: John is a world of its own, and the differences vis-à-vis the synoptics are irreconcilable. This means that the scholar is forced "to decide from the outset in favor of one source or the other. Here, 'no one can serve two masters!'"<sup>68</sup> Naturally, this verdict must be nuanced, not only because John contains some elements of teaching of a synoptic type,<sup>69</sup> but above all because he supplies original and precious data of a geographical and historical nature. But the classic position is fundamentally correct to say that the reconstruction of the teaching of Jesus, its vocabulary, its categories, and its dominant themes must rely on the synoptics as the primary sources.

Form criticism emphasized the apologetic, polemic, missionary, and disciplinary tendencies of the tradition, and redaction criticism, taking up the intuitions of William Wrede, drew attention above all to the creative theological work carried out by the authors of the gospels; but this has surely led to an excessive neglect of the historical intention of gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. Jens Schröter and Ralph Brucker, BZNW 114 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002), 243–272.

---

<sup>66</sup> We may recall that many parables are attested only in the special tradition of Matthew or of Luke, and that Q contains very few parables. This frequently means that the criterion of multiple attestation cannot be used.

<sup>67</sup> Obviously, the difference did not escape the scholars of the nineteenth century. Cf., e.g., the remarks by David Friedrich Strauss which are recalled by Werner Georg Kümmel, Das Neue Testament: Geschichte der Erforschung seiner Probleme, 2nd ed. (Freiburg: Karl Alber, 1970), 152–154.

<sup>68</sup> Schweitzer, Geschichte, 6.

<sup>69</sup> On the logia, cf., e.g., Jacques Schlosser, "Les logia johanniques relatifs au Père," RevSR 69 (1995): 87–104.

these texts, forgetting that each gospel purports to be a narrative about a person belonging to the past, and that they certainly intend to locate Jesus within history (Ernst Käsemann). It remains true that they are written in such a way that the paschal triumph of the protagonist is made manifest by means of his portrait: in other words, what they offer us is certainly a testimony of faith. Their authors were not eyewitnesses of events that had taken place fifty or sixty years earlier, nor do they make such a claim. Besides this, they transpose into the past situations and preoccupations which could only have arisen after Easter, e.g. how to handle conflicts in a community which has grown in size and is obliged to organize its life (Matt 18:15–18). This is only one elementary example of the numerous traits which pose problems for anyone who wishes to use the gospels directly as sources for the reconstruction of the historical figure of Jesus. At the very least, one must inquire into their genesis, taking into account the various degrees of probability.

Although it has never achieved a consensus on every point of detail, the classic “two-source theory” provides the best starting point. Here, the literary relationships between the texts are certain, and their analysis permits us to regard the priority of Mark as established. On a less certain level—for the simple reason that this is a scholarly hypothesis—the existence of the document “Q,” a collection of logia utilized by Matthew and Luke, is highly probable. Despite the enormous amount of work dedicated to this project from the early 1970’s onwards, the restoration of its contents resembles a road full of pitfalls. This reached a plausible but provisional conclusion with the publication of the “critical edition.”<sup>70</sup> The reconstruction of the genesis of the document Q in two or three stages which can be identified in its text is a much more hypothetical matter. Equally (or even more) uncertain is the reconstruction of a hypothetical “signs source” of a more or less synoptic character which is allegedly reused in the Gospel of John; the same applies to the reconstruction of hypothetical pre-Markan collections. This uncertainty has only one genuine irritating consequence: it weakens the criterion of multiple attestation; otherwise, the elements themselves do not disappear when questions are posed about the existence of one particular literary composition. We are simply left with isolated traditions, and I believe that form criticism, despite the more or less justified criticisms leveled in recent years,<sup>71</sup> has supplied (at least implicitly) a methodology for dealing with such texts which remains valid in its essential points.

---

<sup>70</sup> James M. Robinson, Paul Hoffmann, and John S. Kloppenborg, The Critical Edition of Q (Leuven: Peeters, 2000).

The synoptic gospels—the fundamental texts which are the necessary starting point for the historian’s work—are not neutral, since they come from groups which already regarded Jesus as the “Lord Jesus,” the Son of God. The commitment here is strongly accented, but it is not unique: it can be observed everywhere in the historiography of classical antiquity, and scholars have drawn attention to particular instances which well exemplify this trait.<sup>72</sup> For example, when Xenophon writes his Constitution of the Lacedaemonians, he produces “a militant literature which cannot be read as a direct contribution to the history of Sparta.” In his parallel Lives, Plutarch presents “models of virtue and of an irrational lack of proportion,” and this “is impossible without an edifying prejudice from which one must free oneself, if one wishes to employ these texts as documentary sources.” Diogenes Laertius’s Lives of the Philosophers include “developments of a hagiographical character.” Since the gospels are documents which profess their authors’ belief, and take into account the needs of the believing community in an anachronistic and unstated manner, they too must be submitted to a critical analysis. This task is not without its difficulties.

4. A Complex Task

According to the traditional vocabulary of classical times, the work of the historian consists in collecting the actions and putting into a proper form the words of the heroes.<sup>73</sup> This duality characterizes the canonical gospels, but not the extra-canonical gospels; it applies only to a small extent to Q,

---

<sup>71</sup> Cf., e.g., Walter Schmithals, Einleitung in die drei ersten Evangelien (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1985), 298–318; David du Toit, “Erneut auf der Suche nach Jesus: Eine kritische Bestandsaufnahme der Jesusforschung am Anfang des 21. Jahrhunderts,” in Jesus im 21. Jahrhundert: Bultmanns Jesusbuch und die heutige Jesusforschung, ed. Ulrich H. J. Körtner (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener, 2002), 91–134, at 132–133, with bibliography in n. 164; idem, “Redefining Jesus: Current Trends in Jesus Research,” in Jesus, Mark and Q: The Teaching of Jesus and Its Earliest Records, ed. Michael Labahn and Andreas Schmitt, JSNTSup 214 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001), 82–124, at 122–123, with bibliography in n. 160.

<sup>72</sup> Cf. Baslez, Sources, 66 and 194–195 (the quotations in the text are taken from these pages).

<sup>73</sup> Cf. Thucydides, Peloponnesian War 1.22; Flavius Josephus, Apion 1.9, claims to know everything about the events he describes, since he was an eyewitness; Acts 1:1 belongs to the same tradition.

where the words predominate. There is no reason a priori to prefer one of these two series of materials rather than the other, but until recently, the logia (or, to put it briefly, the preaching of Jesus) have enjoyed a privileged position, for the following reasons. In the rather rare instances where the New Testament writings other than the gospels refer explicitly or implicitly to Jesus, it is primarily his words that are evoked.<sup>74</sup> But above all, if we look at the texts of the gospels themselves, we can see that the words which Jesus spoke (or is supposed to have spoken) are transmitted with greater care and precision than the narratives about him. For this reason, I continue to believe that the logia as a whole are historically more reliable than the narratives about Jesus.<sup>75</sup> In order to verify this reliability, two approaches have been traditionally employed, and these are more closely linked than my presentation suggests, viz. the reconstruction of the primitive form of a logion by means of literary analysis, and the application of the criteria of authenticity in order to test historical reliability.

The first approach has become more precarious today. Whereas an earlier generation could practice it on a large scale without being troubled by methodological considerations, the idea that literary analysis can be employed to reconstruct the primitive form seems to have lost its credibility today, thanks to the considerable variations which we observe in the scholars' affirmations. Let me illustrate this by means of a few examples where the divergences in the analyses are extraordinarily persistent. Did the logion about the exorcisms of Jesus in Luke 11:20 par. Matt 12:28 refer to the "finger" of God or to the "Spirit" of God? In the eschatological judgment to which Luke 12:8 par. Matt 10:32 alludes, is the one who vouches for the believer (the defense witness) the "I" of Jesus (Matthew) or the Son of Man (Luke)? And what is the "correct version" of the logion about divorce, or of the words spoken at the Last Supper? E. P. Sanders believes that the consensus of the exegetes covers too few texts to permit "a full depiction of Jesus" and that the analysis of the discourse material does not succeed in giving us a convincing picture of Jesus which answers important historical questions.<sup>76</sup> He is probably not the only scholar to think that “the material was subject to change and may have changed, but... we do not know just how it changed” (p. 15). But perhaps we should go one step further, and ask about the appropriateness of a model which supposes that the path of tradition always runs via the contacts between various written texts<sup>77</sup> and that in any case, if an oral tradition did exist, it was very soon replaced completely by the written tradition. It is doubtless nearer the truth to assume that the oral tradition persisted for a long time alongside the written transmission—and this is no new discovery.<sup>78</sup> The words of Papias quoted by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 3.39.4) are often cited in this context: “If anyone chanced to come who had actually been a follower of the elders, I would enquire as to the discourses of the elders, what Andrew or what Peter said, or what Philip, or what Thomas or James, or what John or Matthew or any other of the Lord’s disciples; and the things which Aristion and John the elder, disciples of the Lord, say. For I supposed that things out of books did not profit me so much as the utterances of a voice which lives and abides.”<sup>79</sup> On the basis of some practices which had become institutionalized in traditional societies,<sup>80</sup> it has often been thought that oral tradition is characterized by an extreme fixity, but this is not correct. “The memory which is transmitted by apprenticeship in societies without writing is not a memory ‘word for word,’” and it seems rather that “the specialists of the tradition can innovate, whereas a written text on the contrary can have a ‘magical’ character which makes it more or less untouchable. This means that we should not posit an antithesis between an oral history which would be a history of fidelity and immobility on the one hand, and a written history on the other which would be a history of malleability and perfectibility.”<sup>81</sup> Recent exegesis benefits from

<sup>74</sup> Here I have in mind especially the Corpus Paulinum, James, and 1 Peter.

<sup>75</sup> Here I agree with Dieter Lührmann, "Die Logienquelle und die Leben-Jesu-Forschung," in The Sayings Source and the Historical Jesus, ed. Andreas Lindemann, BETL 158 (Leuven: Leuven University Press and Peeters, 2001), 191–206, despite the reservations by Jens Schröter, "Die Frage nach dem historischen Jesus," in the same volume, 207–254, at 245–246.

<sup>76</sup> E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985), esp. 3–18 (quotation from 4) and 133.

---

<sup>77</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, has recently insisted very strongly on this point in his ample chapter on tradition (173–254).

<sup>78</sup> Cf. O. Cullmann’s article (1925) reprinted in his Vorträge und Aufsätze 1925–1962 (Tübingen: Mohr–Siebeck; Zurich: Zwingli, 1966), 41–89 (at 55–59).

<sup>79</sup> ET: Hugh Jackson Lawlor and John Ernest Leonard Oulton, Eusebius: The Ecclesiastical History and the Martyrs of Palestine 1 (London: SPCK, 1927), 99. Cf., e.g., Samuel Byrskog, Story as History—History as Story: The Gospel Tradition in the Context of Ancient Oral History, WUNT 123 (Tübingen: Mohr–Siebeck, 2000), 244–245.

<sup>80</sup> In our context, the rabbinic tradition has often been proposed as a relevant example, especially by the Scandinavian school represented by names such as H. Riesenfeld, B. Gerhardsson, and S. Byrskog. For information, cf. Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 197–198.

<sup>81</sup> Le Goff, Histoire, 113–114 and 225–226. He refers to Jack R. Goody, La raison graphique : La domestication de la pensée sauvage (Paris: Minuit, 1979), but it should be borne in mind that this book is a study of a society without writing.

these perspectives, even though our sources were not born in a society without writing.<sup>82</sup>

One other point of view should be taken into consideration, when we recall the specific manner in which Jesus himself said what he had to say. He did not sit in an academy, imparting his teaching to a group of disciples who had chosen to enroll in his school. Whatever one may think of the idea of “itinerant radicalism,” it is certain that Jesus moved from place to place and that he offered his message to a variety of persons in particular circumstances. Everything suggests that he possessed a real pedagogical talent and that he formulated his teaching for the specific persons who were listening to him. We often see him reacting to an event, and although the mise-en-scène may be due to the work of composition carried out by the agents of the tradition on the basis of the literary genre of the ethical maxim (chreia), there must also be cases which reflect historical reality, such as Luke 13:1–5. As Heinz Schürmann has demonstrated so brilliantly in a remarkable article which unfortunately is largely forgotten, there must have been typical situations before Easter, linked for example to the life of the group of disciples, situations which led Jesus to intervene several times on one and the same topic in order to appeal for constancy or to recommend mutual service.<sup>83</sup> Finally, we must not forget an obvious point to which O. Cullmann explicitly drew attention in 1925<sup>84</sup> and which J. D. G. Dunn has forcefully recalled in the very title of his book Jesus Remembered, viz. that the sources give us access only to the impact which the words of Jesus made on his disciples and to the impression which these words made on them.<sup>85</sup> All these observations suggest reservations vis-à-vis the model supplied by textual criticism: in this perspective, there is not one single authentic reading with secondary variants.

Under these conditions—and without even mentioning the discrepancies which are unavoidable when one passes from the original

---

<sup>82</sup> Cf. Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 192–210.

<sup>83</sup> Heinz Schürmann, “Die vorösterlichen Anfänge der Logientradition,” in Der historische Jesus und der kerygmatische Christus: Beiträge zum Christusverständnis in Forschung und Verkündigung, ed. H. Ristow and K. Matthiae (Berlin: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1962), 342–370, reprinted in H. Schürmann, Jesus: Gestalt und Geschichte: Gesammelte Beiträge, ed. Klaus Scholtissek (Paderborn: Bonifatius, 1994), 380–397 (first part) and 85–103 (second part).

<sup>84</sup> Cf. Cullmann, Vorträge und Aufsätze 1925–1962, 75.

<sup>85</sup> Cf. also James D. G. Dunn, “‘All That glistens is not Gold’: In Quest of the Right Key to unlock the Way of the historical Jesus,” in Der historische Jesus, ed. Schröter and Brucker, 131–161.

Aramaic to the Greek translation—it is sensible to abandon the idea of reconstructing every last verbal detail of the words of Jesus (except in those few privileged cases where the documentation permits this) and to concentrate instead on the subject matter, or quite simply the contents, the meaning of his words.<sup>86</sup> There are however special instances where we can hear the ipsissima vox Iesu—Theissen and Winter speak of “clues to particularity.”<sup>87</sup> These are akin to what Marc Bloch calls the “truly exceptional expressions” which alone “can reveal the identity of an author.”<sup>88</sup> I believe however that as a general rule, we should press the analysis of the exact verbal forms as far as possible, in order to avoid the risk of accepting too easily a thematic equivalence. It is not especially important to know whether the demons were expelled “by the finger of God” or “by the Spirit of God”—in each case, the language refers to the power of the intervention. But it is not irrelevant to know precisely who or what was expected to come: the Son of Man in or with his kingdom (Matt 16:28), or the kingdom of God himself (Mark 9:1).

In order to be able to attribute to Jesus himself the words which are reconstructed in this way, sometimes in their exact verbal form or at least in their characteristic tone,<sup>89</sup> but more frequently in their contents, we must take the second step, which aims at establishing the authenticity of the logia (it applies equally to the facts related in the gospels) at least in the minimal perspective evoked, not without humor and with a measure of skepticism, by Sanders:<sup>90</sup> “An ‘authentic’ saying is one which we have good reason to believe is as close to something that Jesus said as we can hope for.” “Good reasons” can be discovered by means of the various approaches which constitute the historical method in general: above all, the cross-checking and comparison of one’s sources, but also the investigation and confirmation of a possible connection between the events/cause and the events/result. The criteria which were gradually assembled by historical research into Jesus, and have been subject

---

<sup>86</sup> Theissen and Winter, Kriterienfrage, 194–206.

<sup>87</sup> Ibid., 190–191.

<sup>88</sup> Apologie, 149.

<sup>89</sup> The French word ton suggests something that is difficult to define precisely. From a more general point of view, Gérard Rochais sensitively paints an evocative picture of what ton means: “Du bricolage exégétique,” Religiologiques 9 (Spring 1994): 139–155, at 146: “The tone is not the voice of the writer, nor his style, nor the interest and the quality of his language, but his particular way of expressing himself, which imposes silence on the common language by rising up above this.”

<sup>90</sup> Jesus and Judaism, 357 n. 30.

to reconsideration in recent years,<sup>91</sup> are basically an adaptation of the rules governing all historical work to the particular case of research into Jesus and the birth of Christianity.

Examples are the criterion of multiple attestation, and what V. Fusco calls the criterion of “sufficient explanation” because its starting point is the observed effects, from which it argues back to the necessary causes: basically, one must understand and explain “how and why things happen.”<sup>92</sup> This criterion overlaps with what J. P. Meier calls the criterion of rejection.<sup>93</sup> According to Fusco,<sup>94</sup> we must see the “sufficient explanation” as “the criterion par excellence. If the criteria of ‘multiple attestation,’ of ‘coherence,’ and . . . of ‘discontinuity’ are to become genuinely effective, they must come down to this criterion. The criterion of ‘discontinuity’ is merely one particular application of the criterion of ‘sufficient explanation’: for the reason why we must attribute to Jesus something that contrasts with the tendencies of Judaism and of earliest Christianity is precisely because we would lack a sufficient explanation of such a phenomenon.”

It is the criterion of double difference that has generated the most extensive debate. We sometimes hear that this criterion has almost completely vanished in the most recent research—for example, G. Theissen and D. Winter assert that the Third Quest has abandoned in principle that part of the criterion which refers to the difference vis-à-vis Judaism, and has applied in a more controlled manner that part which refers to the difference vis-à-vis Christianity.<sup>95</sup> This affirmation seems somewhat exaggerated.<sup>96</sup> There has nevertheless been a clear tendency in the Third <sup>91</sup> Here I mention only a few major works: Theissen and Winter, Kriterienfrage; Bruce Chilton and Craig A. Evans, eds. Authenticating the Activities of Jesus, NTTS 28.2 (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1999); idem, eds. Authenticating the Words of Jesus, NTTS Vol. 28, no. 1 (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1999); Stanley E. Porter, The Criteria for Authenticity in Historical- Jesus Research: Previous Discussion and New Proposals, JSNTSup 191 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002).

---

<sup>92</sup> Prost, Leçons, 306.

<sup>93</sup> Cf. A Marginal Jew I, 177.

<sup>94</sup> Vittorio Fusco, “La quête du Jésus historique. Bilan et perspectives,” in Jésus, ed. Marguerat et al., 25–57, esp. 55–56.

<sup>95</sup> Kriterienfrage, 173. David du Toit, “Erneut auf der Suche nach Jesus,” 115, takes the same position; cf., however, idem, “Der unähnliche Jesus: Eine kritische Evaluierung der Entstehung des Differenzkriteriums und seiner geschichts- und erkenntnistheoretischen Voraussetzungen,” in Der historische Jesus, ed. Schröter and Brucker, 89–139, at 90–91.

<sup>96</sup> Here I mention only the fact that this criterion is still employed, in a controlled manner, by Jürgen Becker, Jesus von Nazareth (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1996), 17–18; and by Meier, A Marginal Jew, 171–174; cf. also the remarks by Porter, Criteria, 122. As Ingo

Quest, at least on the part of some scholars, to take the opposite path to the Second Quest, which was concerned to underline the relationship between the preaching of Jesus and the kerygma of the church and therefore liked to emphasize the relationship between Jesus and Christianity, heightening his originality vis-à-vis Judaism. Today, the tendency is to underline heavily the integration of Jesus into Judaism and, correlatively, to insist on the discontinuity which exists between Jesus and earliest Christianity.<sup>97</sup> In its extreme form, found in some publications intended for a mass readership, this tendency states that the gospels have nothing to do with the history of Jesus and that they are merely an ideological construction, a discourse.<sup>98</sup>

Enough has been said about the absurdities to which the strict application of the isolated criterion of radical originality can lead; it is certainly correct to say that “we cannot imagine a Jesus who was always in disagreement with Judaism and a church which was always in disagreement with Jesus.”<sup>99</sup> Käsemann himself was perfectly aware of this, when he presented his classic definition of this criterion and immediately added that it was of course powerless to show us what united Jesus to Judaism and to earliest Christianity.<sup>100</sup> There was also a general agreement to restrict the validity of this criterion: “the criterion is valid in a positive not negative application.”<sup>101</sup> It serves to maintain, not to exclude, and it can be applied only in privileged instances. Many scholars however find these precautions insufficient.

The strongest criticism, supported by a rigorous logic, has been made by T. Holmén, who argues that we must deconstruct this criterion and reject its first half, since “dissimilarity to Judaism furnishes no indication

---

Broer has shown with his customary precision on points of detail, the criticism which has been leveled at this criterion is far from wholly convincing: “Die Bedeutung der historischen Rückfrage nach Jesus und die Frage nach deren Methodik,” in Jesus von Nazaret—Spuren und Konturen, ed. Ludger Schenke et al. (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 2004), 19–41, at 32–36.

<sup>97</sup> du Toit, “Erneut auf der Suche,” 116 n. 106.

<sup>98</sup> We find the same tendency in a more general manner wherever the slogan resounds that there are no basic differences between writing history and writing a novel. For illustrations, cf. Prost, Leçons, 283–284.

<sup>99</sup> Vittorio Fusco, “Introduzione generale ai Sinottici,” in Vangeli sinottici ed Atti degli apostoli, ed. Mauro Lâconi et al., Logos, Corso di studi biblici 5 (Turin: Elle Di Ci, 1994), 33–132, at 124.

<sup>100</sup> Ernst Käsemann, “Das Problem des historischen Jesus,” in Exegetische Versuche und Besinnungen 1, ed. Ernst Käsemann (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1964), 187–214, at 205.

<sup>101</sup> Craig A. Evans, “Recent Developments in Jesus Research: Presuppositions, Criteria, and Sources,” in Jesus and His Contemporaries: Comparative Studies, AGJU 25 (Leiden: Brill, 1995), 1–49, at 21.

of authenticity and has, as a principle, nothing to do with the question of authenticity.”<sup>102</sup> It is in fact a logical error to overlook the possibility that the community may of its own accord have accentuated the originality of Jesus in order to justify its own positions. The second half of the criterion, regarding the difference vis-à-vis nascent Christianity, remains entirely valid and can be used effectively. When the criterion is reduced in this way, Holmén sees it as a somewhat toned-down variant of the criterion of ecclesiastical embarrassment.<sup>103</sup> I find the disqualification of the difference vis-à-vis Judaism excessive. It is of course perfectly possible that the community enhances the status of its own novelty vis-à-vis Judaism by attributing this to Jesus—all the more so, since earliest Christianity displays a number of different tendencies. For example, it is possible that the logion Q 16:17 was introduced into the tradition by a group which wished to oppose all laxity with regard to the law; in this case, given that Jesus does not appear to be overly concerned about individual details of the law, we might indeed have to refuse the attribution of this logion to Jesus, and ascribe it to another Jew.<sup>104</sup> It would however still be necessary to base this assertion on evidence of the positive interest of the community in some particular situation. Let us simply note that it regulated the problem of circumcision without attributing to Jesus one single word on the subject (with the exception of Gos. Thom. 3); and that the controversies and logia about the Sabbath are presented in the gospels, but the epistolary literature does not provide even slight indications—Gal 4:10 and Col 2:16 are not exceptions—about the problem which the Sabbath may have posed to the Christian community. In other words, the dissimilarity vis-à-vis Judaism ought to be invoked as a criterion of authenticity in cases where Christianity does not reveal any particular interest in one or other topic.

The demolition and reorganization of the criterion of double dissimilarity lead to a new and rather complex construction by G. Theissen and his collaborators.<sup>105</sup> They argue that we must salvage a few solid elements from this criterion and then abandon it. It must be transformed

---

<sup>102</sup> Tom Holmén, “Doubts about Double Dissimilarity: Restructuring the Main Criterion of Jesus-of-History Research,” in Authenticating the Words, ed. Chilton and Evans, 47–80, at 75.

<sup>103</sup> For the various names given to this criterion, cf. Porter, Criteria, 106–107.

<sup>104</sup> Theissen and Winter, Kriterienfrage, 21.

<sup>105</sup> Cf. Ibid., esp. 175–217; Theissen and Merz, Der historische Jesus, 117–120.

by the integration of coherence or multiple attestation, thus becoming a criterion of historical plausibility which can be defined as follows: “an historical reconstruction of Jesus is historically credible only if it is plausible against the background of the Judaism of his time and if it makes plausible the evolution which leads from Jesus to earliest Christianity.”<sup>106</sup> Data in the sources merit our confidence when they are both plausible in the Jewish context and comprehensible as an effect generated by Jesus. A high value is thus attached to the harmony revealed by a comparison of the gospel sources with Jewish data. The expectation underlying the criterion of dissimilarity was that it would be possible to bring to light the ruptures and hence the originality of Jesus; the position now is that Jesus could have said and done only what a charismatic Jew of the first century CE could have said and done.<sup>107</sup> Similarly, while aware that the community probably altered the pre-Easter traditions in order to adapt them to its new situation, the scholar will be attentive to the continuity between Jesus and the community. In particular, he or she will emphasize the value of those elements which the community preserved despite the fact that they no longer had any interest in them, or even found them embarrassing. Here, the argument about difference is taken up anew under the form of the criterion of embarrassment. It can be seen that the sources have taken over data which were in accord with the interests of the community, as well as other data which ran contrary to these interests. It can be useful here to bear in mind the complementary points of view which are relevant to the question of plausibility in relationship to a specific context (in the sense of a social environment).

The insertion into a context can consist both of conformity and of originality. There is no antithesis between conformity to an environment and the originality of an historical personage. Individuality should be understood, not as opposition to a shared context (i.e., in keeping with the criterion of dissimilarity), but as difference within a shared context.

In this construction, everything seems well thought out and logically put together.<sup>108</sup> Nevertheless, I have serious doubts about its practical

---

<sup>106</sup> I borrow this happy formulation from Daniel Marguerat, “La troisième quête du Jésus de l’histoire,” RSR 87 (1999): 327–421, at 417.

<sup>107</sup> Theissen and Merz, Der historische Jesus, 119.

<sup>108</sup> Cf. however the acute criticism by Holmén, “Doubts,” 73–74 n. 106; and the reservations of Porter, Criteria, 121–122.

usefulness: is it really possible to employ this criterion? We should no doubt bear in mind that the criterion of historical plausibility, when constructed in this elaborate manner, does not offer us a test that we must apply to individual texts; rather, it is an invitation to take account of the complexity of reality. In general, it must be said that the term “criterion” is inappropriate, since it suggests a rigorously academic test following a procedure that must be applied in order that precise facts may be established beyond any doubt. Would it not be better to speak of simple safeguards which stake out the path for the investigation, and help the scholar—not without making use of his intuition<sup>109</sup>—to organize some of his “odd jobs around the house”? We touch at this point on a debate that is probably inexhaustible, viz. the question of the very nature of history: is it an art or a science? Doubtless it is both, as Bloch so elegantly puts it: “The critique of testimony has as its object realities of the psyche, and will therefore always remain an art involving subtle sensitivity. There is no book of recipes for it to consult. But it is also an art involving the reason, based on the methodical practice of some great operations of the human spirit.”<sup>110</sup> In part, at any rate, the historian functions like a professional worker with his own specific know-how, and the word “household tasks” (bricolage) is perfectly appropriate here, provided we strip it of its negative connotations and see in this “odd-job man” (bricoleur) one who is “skilful, ingenious, an all-rounder, imaginative, and an artist.”<sup>111</sup> This term helps evoke one particular dimension of the historian’s work and does justice to “the feeling that there is no rule that can be applied automatically and systematically, that everything is a question of the correct dosage, of feeling one’s way, of learning to understand.”<sup>112</sup>

5. Constraints and Freedom

One of the main difficulties encountered by historical research into Jesus is achieving the correct balance between an emphasis on particular texts or traits and the appreciation of the indirect information which may be

---

<sup>109</sup> Theissen and Winter, Kriterienfrage, 191, suggest this (“often very intuitive”) with reference to the total figure of an historical person, which must be discerned by combining different elements.

<sup>110</sup> Bloch, Apologie, 139 (my italics).

<sup>111</sup> Rochais, “Bricolage,” 142.

<sup>112</sup> Cf. Prost, Leçons, 146–151, at 147.

furnished by “global paradigms,”<sup>113</sup> holistic patterns which are available in the biblical or Jewish tradition, where these are regarded not merely as a background but as sources in the strict sense of the term, and where one therefore draws largely on them—as is legitimate in historical research. Examples of such globalizing pictures are the Deuteronomistic motif of the persecuted prophets,<sup>114</sup> the heroic exploit of the exodus which culminates in the entry into the promised land,<sup>115</sup> the apocalyptic paradigm reconstructed by Johannes Weiss and Albert Schweitzer, and the image of the exile from which the people hope to be delivered.<sup>116</sup>

This is why the model of the “restoration of Israel,”<sup>117</sup> alone or in combination with the motif of the exile, has often been used in recent years<sup>118</sup> to explain the future dimension of the kingdom of God and the nature of the salvation to be expected when God’s reign is fully accomplished.<sup>119</sup> According to N. T. Wright, the Israel of the Second Temple was in a state of exile and hoped for the restoration of the symbols of a life in accordance with the covenant: the temple would be rebuilt, the country cleansed, and Torah would be observed perfectly (p. 280). All this is envisaged as taking place in this world, and Israel is interested in tangible realities: the temple, the country, the law, the race, the economy, and justice (p. 285). The expected resurrection would lead to a bodily life here below, with bodies capable of enjoying the very tangible benefits linked to peace and prosperity (p. 286). In short, the fundamental

---

<sup>113</sup> This expression is coined by Prost, Leçons, 234, à propos Marxism and structuralism.

<sup>114</sup> Odil Hannes Steck, Jesus und das gewaltsame Geschick der Propheten: Untersuchungen zur Überlieferung des deuteronomistischen Geschichtsbildes im Alten Testament, Spätjudentum und Urchristentum, WMANT 23 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1967).

<sup>115</sup> This depiction seems important, if we are to understand the prophets of action in the first century CE about whom we read in Josephus. Cf., e.g., E. P. Sanders, Judaism: Practice and Belief 63 BCE–66 CE (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1992), 286.

<sup>116</sup> For a synthesis and critique of this model, which has been employed above all by N. T. Wright, cf. Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 472–477.

<sup>117</sup> On this subject, cf. James M. Scott, ed. Restoration: Old Testament, Jewish, and Christian Perspectives, JSJSup 72 (Leiden: Brill, 2001).

<sup>118</sup> It is not however new, as we see from the plea by Helmut Flender, Die Botschaft Jesu von der Herrschaft Gottes (München: Kaiser, 1968), 30–51, in favor of a “realization of salvation here on earth.”

<sup>119</sup> Cf. above all Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, esp. 123–211 and 319–340; John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus 3: Companions and Competitors (New York: Doubleday, 2001), 125–197; Scot McKnight, A New Vision for Israel: The Teaching of Jesus in National Context (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1999); idem, “Jesus and the Twelve,” BBR 11 (2001): 203–231; N. T. Wright, The New Testament and the People of God (London: SPCK, 1992).

hope of Israel concerns freedom from oppression, the restoration of the country, and the rebuilding of the temple (p. 299): for the age to come, Israel awaited liberation from the Roman yoke, the restoration of the temple, and delight in its own land (p. 300). E. P. Sanders has noted similar elements, which he incorporates into a larger synthesis.<sup>120</sup> He describes the following distinctive traits of an eschatology of restoration: (1) the gathering of all Israel, i.e. of the twelve tribes, which implies the theme of the land; (2) the conversion of the Gentiles or their extermination; (3) the reconstruction of Jerusalem and of the temple in a new glory; (4) the purity of the eschatological cult and the uprightness of the people's life, which involves or implies faithfulness to the law. D. E. Aune and E. Stewart see the following elements as constitutive here: the restoration of the country and of the kingship, the gathering of the people, the restoration of the temple and of Jerusalem, paradise lost and regained, and the restoration of creation.<sup>121</sup>

A number of scholars have applied this model with varying degrees of intensity to the eschatology of Jesus. The variety is not surprising, given the semantic breadth of the word "restoration," which covers both the re-establishing of a situation which no longer exists and a renewal which may perhaps be purely spiritual. Let me illustrate this variety by briefly presenting two positions. According to E. P. Sanders,<sup>122</sup> the lack of homogeneity between the deeds which Jesus is recorded to have performed and the words which he is recorded to have said means that we cannot affirm without further ado—i.e., as if it were an obvious fact!—that his eschatology is in continuity with the Jewish expectation of the restoration of Israel. Nevertheless, the priority given to the facts—i.e., the baptism by John, the group of the twelve, the action of cleansing the temple accompanied by the threat of its destruction, and finally the persistence even after Easter of the idea of the restoration of Israel (cf. Acts 1:6)—permits us to consider this hypothesis as probable. We must however note the absence of the political and nationalist dimension; nor does Jesus issue a general appeal to the Jewish nation to repent.<sup>123</sup>

<sup>120</sup> Jesus and Judaism, 77–116; Practice and Belief, 289–295.

<sup>121</sup> D. E. Aune with Eric Stewart, "From the Idealized Past to the Imaginative Future: Eschatological Restoration in Jewish Apocalyptic Literature," in Restoration, ed. Scott, 147–177.

<sup>122</sup> Jesus and Judaism, esp. 106–119.

<sup>123</sup> Cf. also the prudent presentation of this question in E. P. Sanders, The Historical Figure of Jesus (London: Viking, 1994).

According to Scot McKnight, a resolute follower of the position taken by Wright,<sup>124</sup> the Jesus tradition as a whole is profoundly shaped by the model of the restoration of Israel. This applies to Jesus' vision of God, his eschatology, and his ethics. McKnight frequently recalls the distinctive traits of the underlying picture: the nation of Israel, its land, the twelve tribes, liberation from foreign dominion, the restoration of the temple, and purification.<sup>125</sup> Globalizing concepts such as covenant, salvation, liberation, deliverance from exile, and theophany are proposed as hermeneutical keys.<sup>126</sup>

Obviously, we cannot begin a detailed exegetical discussion of such a complex question here. Let me simply mention some facts which suggest prudence. The Jewish tradition itself contains evocations of the future which are not centered on the restoration of Israel in any very realistic sense. In order to express their hope, these employ Greek motifs which speak of a more transcendent dimension<sup>127</sup> or else, as in some apocalyptic texts, have recourse to astral motifs in a completely utopian perspective.<sup>128</sup> In the specific case of the Jesus tradition—considered as an identifiable complex within Judaism—the evidence adduced in favor of an interpretation of Jesus' eschatology in terms of the restoration of Israel is of unequal value.

The most important piece of evidence is certainly the choice of the twelve. It is scarcely possible to doubt the historicity of this action by Jesus, and it makes sense only on the basis of the twelve tribes of Israel.<sup>129</sup> The existence of the twelve and their participation in the mission of

---

<sup>124</sup> I find the following remarks typical: the absence of the vocabulary of exile in the Jesus tradition is irrelevant because "kingdom language is 'end of exile' language; 'end of exile' is negative to the positive 'kingdom'": New Vision, 83 n. 51.

<sup>125</sup> Cf. esp. McKnight, New Vision, 9–14, and the theses proposed on 120, 129, and 155.

<sup>126</sup> McKnight, New Vision, 80. For an analogy, cf. Nodet, Histoire de Jésus, 206: "The totality of the public life of Jesus is integrated into a symbolic geography linked to his homonym Joshua."

<sup>127</sup> Cf. the texts from Philo (Life of Moses 2.288) and Josephus (Ant. 18.14, 16, 18; War 1.650; 2.154–155, 164–165; 3.374–375; 7.343–346; Apion 2.218) cited by Sanders, Practice and Belief, 298–301.

<sup>128</sup> Cf., e.g., Dan 12:3; 1 Enoch 104.2; Ps.-Philo, L.A.B. 19.12–13. Émile Puech, La croyance des esséniens en la vie future: immortalité, résurrection, vie éternelle? Histoire d'une croyance dans le judaïsme ancien, EB 21 and 22 (Paris: Gabalda, 1993), has underlined the tremendous variety of beliefs about the modalities of the future life, with particular emphasis on the evidence of a spiritual and transcendent conception.

<sup>129</sup> The essay by John P. Meier, "Jesus, the Twelve, and the Restoration of Israel," in Restoration, ed. Scott, 365–404, concentrates on this point. Most of this text takes up the arguments in his A Marginal Jew III, 125–197.

Jesus mean that he centered his activity on Israel.<sup>130</sup> But what about their function in the kingdom, once this is set up? At first sight, the traditions in Q 22:28–30 par. and Mark 10:35–40 give a clear answer: they will sit beside Jesus and are called to exercise an official function. The difficulties begin when we try to define this more precisely. In the logion about the thrones, are we to read “thrones” or “twelve thrones,” and are we to understand krinein as “governing” or (in the more obvious sense of the verb) “judging,” or even “condemning”? And is the authenticity really as certain as scholars assure us?<sup>131</sup> One piece of evidence which suggests caution, or even a negative judgment,<sup>132</sup> is the clear presence of the messianic kingdom (in the broad sense of this term) in Mark 10:37, 40, as well as elements of redactional interpretation which frame the brief fragment of Q which is reconstructed on the basis of Matt 19:28 par. Luke 22:28–30. We must beware of confusing the messianic kingdom with the kingdom of God. The two are nowhere else attested together in the gospel texts, and the messianic kingdom plays scarcely any role in the preaching of Jesus—unless one wishes to employ the language of the commentators (which is not the language of the texts themselves) to express the place and the role of Jesus in the kingdom of God by means of the phrase “messianic kingdom” (e.g. Q 11:20). Aristotle observed that “one swallow does not make a summer,” especially if it flaps its wings; and perhaps not even two swallows are enough. I am not convinced by the evidence which is often adduced in confirmation of the implications of Mark 10:35–40 and Q 22:28–30.

Did Jesus associate the coming kingdom with a concrete temple which would function as such? This seems to me far from certain, since not all the versions of the logion about the temple contain the positive clause announcing a new construction (this is lacking in Acts 6:14 and Gos. Thom. 71), and also because the double symbolism of the temple in earliest Christianity—both christological (exploited in John 2:21–22) and ecclesiological—would account very well for the insertion of the reconstruction into the other versions (Mark 14:58 par.; 15:29; John 2:19).<sup>133</sup> Some

<sup>130</sup> Sanders rightly emphasizes this trait: Jesus and Judaism, esp. 98–106; cf. also McKnight, New Vision, passim; and idem, “Jesus and the Twelve.”

<sup>131</sup> Cf. especially the very positive judgment by Meier, A Marginal Jew III, 137–138.

<sup>132</sup> For information, cf. Dieter Zeller, “Jesus, Q und die Zukunft Israels,” in Sayings Source, ed. Lindemann, 362–365.

<sup>133</sup> For an analysis, cf. Jacques Schlosser, “La parole de Jésus sur la fin du Temple,” NTS 36 (1990): 398–414.

of the elements in the Jewish picture of the restoration of Israel and of its background play only a very minor role in the Jesus tradition,<sup>134</sup> and although it is always difficult to interpret a silence, this fact invites us not to gloss over the differences between the traditional Jewish expectation and that of Jesus.<sup>135</sup> Let me mention only the almost complete absence of the theme of the land—all the more striking, in that the Christian tradition employs the “logia of entering” into the basileia,<sup>136</sup> as Jesus himself had sometimes done. The expression “to enter the basileia,” which almost amounts to a formula, was entirely appropriate as an evocation of the fulfillment of Israel’s national hope. But the logia in question (cf. in particular Mark 9:47 and 10:25) cannot be understood in this light, nor can another very characteristic series in which the basileia is portrayed as a gift of God to certain categories of persons, e.g. the “poor” in the first beatitude (Q 6:20b) or the children (Mark 10:14 par.; 10:15 par.). The criterion of coherence thus leads me to be cautious about accepting the above-mentioned interpretation of Mark 10:35–40 and Q 22:28–30. Besides this, although there is no reason to doubt Jesus’ openness vis-à-vis Israel, we must not forget the fact that the addressee of his words, his demands, or his promises, is often the individual.

More precisely still, the logion at Mark 9:47, one of the best examples of the individual appeal by Jesus, points in a different direction than the realistic idea of the restoration of Israel, since it envisages a place beyond death.<sup>137</sup> This can be seen even more clearly in the way in which Mark 12:25 (part of a text which is probably authentic)<sup>138</sup> evokes the

<sup>134</sup> There is a brief survey of this question in Jacques Schlosser, “Der Gott Jesu und die Aufhebung der Grenzen,” in Der Gott Israels im Zeugnis des Neuen Testaments, ed. U. Busse, QD 201 (Freiburg: Herder, 2003), 58–79, at 60–63.

<sup>135</sup> As an illustration, cf. the clear-cut verdict by Rudolf Bultmann, Die Theologie des Neuen Testaments, ed. Otto Merk, UTB 630 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1980), 3.

<sup>136</sup> The epistolary literature of the New Testament and the apostolic fathers bear witness to a spiritualization of the idea of the kingdom, which is in effect identified with heaven. In this context, they like to use the images which express in the Jewish tradition the idea of entering or inheriting the land.

<sup>137</sup> Cf. Sanders, Historical Figure of Jesus; McKnight, New Vision, 112. Cf. also the older study by Johannes Theissing, Die Lehre Jesu von der ewigen Seligkeit: Ein Beitrag zur neutestamentlichen Theologie (Breslau: Müller & Seiffert, 1940), 49.

<sup>138</sup> Cf. above all Otto Schwankl, Die Sadduzäerfrage (Mk 12,18–27 parr): Eine exegetisch-theologische Studie zur Auferstehungserwartung, BBB 66 (Frankfurt am Main: Athenäum, 1987), 466–587; and John P. Meier, “The Debate on the Resurrection of the Dead: An Incident from the Ministry of the Historical Jesus?” JSNT 77 (2000): 3–24; idem, A Marginal Jew III, 431–444 and 479–487. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 237, leaves this question open.

condition of “those who rise from the dead” in terms which exclude a terrestrial conception of salvation.<sup>139</sup> The resurrection from the dead gives access to a “new type of life similar to that of the angels,” which implies “a transcendence of this present world, not simply an improvement of it.”<sup>140</sup> Nor should we forget that the apocalypse—from which we probably cannot dissociate Jesus completely—had reshuffled the cards by relativizing the election of Israel and opening up a universal perspective.

These remarks do not pose a radical question mark against the model of restoration; at the very least, however, they show that it has not supplied the universal key and that it does not function in the most pointed definition that has been given, viz. the revolutionary and political dimension in which the liquidation of the enemy is the condition sine qua non of the restoration of Israel. If this model is not to turn into a bulldozer, one must analyze the individual texts, and I myself am inclined to give a wider application to the principle which John P. Meier has formulated with regard to the social sciences: “abstract models... will not supply concrete data that are otherwise lacking.”<sup>141</sup> I entirely agree that the meaning of a symbol such as the “kingdom of God” must be discerned on the basis of its current usage and of its employment by Jesus himself.<sup>142</sup> I am however inclined to attach more weight to the second factor than to the first.

We encounter here one of the classic problems in history, viz. the creativity of an individual who is caught in the constraints of his environment. Since I lack the sufficient philosophical equipment, all I can do here is to offer a few modest remarks by way of a conclusion. The historians of the nineteenth century, influenced both by Idealism and by Romanticism, accorded a disproportionate importance to the individual, especially to the “hero.”<sup>143</sup> With the development of sociology, the social sciences, the history of “mentalities,” and cultural anthropology, the opposite tendency gained ground, and historians insisted much more strongly on the constraints of the environment and on the conditioning

---

<sup>139</sup> Sanders, Historical Figure of Jesus; McKnight, New Vision, 186, makes the same point more clearly.

<sup>140</sup> Meier, A Marginal Jew III, 443.

<sup>141</sup> Meier, A Marginal Jew 27.

<sup>142</sup> Marius Reiser, “Eschatology in the Proclamation of Jesus,” in Jesus, Mark and Q, ed. Labahn and Schmidt, 216–238, esp. 226–227.

<sup>143</sup> Cf. du Toit, “Der unähnliche Jesus,” 107–110.

linked to a lengthy passage of time. For example, F. Simiand demanded that the study of human facts should not concentrate on singular facts, but on those that are repeated. This means “removing the accidental in order to cling to that which is regular, eliminating the individual in order to study the social.”<sup>144</sup> L. Febvre reproached his friend Marc Bloch, the author of La société féodale, for “a kind of return to a schematic way of thinking—to something that can only be called sociologism” that was perceptible in his book, from which “the individual is almost completely absent.”<sup>145</sup> As a reaction to a history which “left little space for the freedom of the agents” and reduced their possibilities of intervention, we have more recently seen a “rehabilitation of the agents.”<sup>146</sup> The historian must show “that in reality, nothing is ever completely laid down in advance, and that the human person can modify the conditions which are laid down for him” (W. Kula).<sup>147</sup> Bearing this mind, I fail to be convinced by a number of trenchant affirmations in studies of Jesus—for example, (1) since Jesus was a Jew, he must have been married, because the rabbis were married;<sup>148</sup> (2) Jesus could not have spoken a logion such as Mark 7:15, for the simple reason that this was too revolutionary for Judaism;<sup>149</sup> and (3) according to Theissen (quoted above), Jesus could not have gone beyond the limits laid down for charismatic persons in his own age.

Given the necessarily limited character of our information, one can never affirm with certainty that something is without analogy in a given epoch.<sup>150</sup> This means that we cannot exclude the possibility that

---

<sup>144</sup> Text quoted by Prost, Leçons, 191.

<sup>145</sup> Cf. André Burguière, “Marc Bloch, historien des mentalités,” in Marc Bloch: L'historien dans la cité, ed. Pierre Deyon, Jean-Claude Richez, and Léon Strauss (Strasbourg: Presses Universitaires de Strasbourg, 1997), 43–55, at 44.

<sup>146</sup> Cf. Prost, Leçons, 229–231.

<sup>147</sup> This text is quoted with approval by Le Goff, Histoire, 351.

<sup>148</sup> Schalom Ben-Chorin, Bruder Jesus: Der Nazarener in jüdischer Sicht, 11th ed. (München: DTV/List, 1988), 103–106.

<sup>149</sup> E. P. Sanders, Jewish Law from Jesus to the Mishnah: Five Studies (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990), 228. On this subject, I agree with Meier, A Marginal Jew I, 173.

<sup>150</sup> Theissen and Winter, Kriterienfrage, 188. Taking the position of an historian, i.e., eschewing all dogmatic orientations, they emphasize the impossibility of affirming that something is without analogy in a given epoch. I believe that the same criticism should be made of the affirmation that it was impossible in principle for Jesus to distance himself from Judaism. This question should be discussed primarily on the basis of the texts.

Jesus took a particular and original position.<sup>151</sup> We have been told often enough that the Judaism of the first century was polymorphous, and that it is very difficult to give a positive definition of this Judaism; at any rate, it should not be unconsciously identified with rabbinic Judaism. We should not close this dossier too quickly.<sup>152</sup>

---

<sup>151</sup> Broer, "Bedeutung" 37, is right to insist on this point.

<sup>152</sup> English translation: Brian McNeil.

CRITICAL FEMINIST HISTORICAL-JESUS RESEARCH<sup>1</sup>

ELISABETH SCHÜSSLER FIORENZA

Since the focus of this volume is on method, I want to state from the outset that I see the problem of Historical-Jesus<sup>2</sup> research not only as one of methods of investigation, i.e. “how scholars ferret out information about Jesus,” but also as one of epistemology, i.e. the theory of “how we know what we know,” and methodology, i.e. how scholars make meaning out of the “data” which we in turn construct with the help of technical research methods.<sup>3</sup> A critical feminist approach requires us to foreground the epistemological assumptions that guide scholarly choices of methodologies, how we proceed to implement particular methods, and how we get in touch with the historical imagination and legitimizing ideologies that determine our choices of reconstructive models and metaphors. In order to address these questions I will discuss two different methodological areas which seem to be crucial for the transformation of scientific positivist malestream<sup>4</sup> into critical scientific feminist Historical-Jesus research.

1. Historical-Jesus Research as a Scientific Discourse

If it is correct that historiography does not just produce information but serves to generate and form national, religious, communal, and personal identities<sup>5</sup> then the discussion of and the controversy around the

---

<sup>1</sup> This article was completed in August 2004. I am grateful to Professor Melanie Johnson-Debaufre for the careful reading of the manuscript and constructive suggestions for its improvement. I also want to thank my research assistant Ms. Katrina Garcia Eveloff for checking my text and notes for possible mistakes and Germanisms.

<sup>2</sup> I write Historical-Jesus research in this way in order to indicate that the Historical-Jesus is a scholarly construct.

<sup>3</sup> Sandra Harding, “Is There a Feminist Method?” in Feminists and Methodology, ed. Sandra Harding (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987), 1–14.

<sup>4</sup> I use this term in a descriptive way to indicate that Scripture, tradition, church, and society have been and still are determined and dominated by elite educated white men.

<sup>5</sup> As long as Historical-Jesus research continues this search for identity a critical Historical-Jesus must be conducted much more self-critically on the level of theory formation and methodology than has been the case until now.

1.1. Critical Methodology and Perspective

Methodology (Grk. meta = after; hodos = way; logos = word/teaching) usually refers to the critical scientific level of reflection at which basic decisions are made. It not only invites us to ask how Historical-Jesus research deals with the fact that it is a societal, religious, and institutional discourse whose contextuality always already determines its studies about Jesus.<sup>6</sup> It also invites us to ask why Historical-Jesus research is not able to acknowledge that it has promoted and continues to reinscribe Christian Eurocentrism, anti-Judaism, and the marginalization of wo/men.<sup>7</sup> Hence, it is important that scholars reflect on the preconstructed<sup>8</sup> ideological frameworks which are tacitly mediated through scientific methods.

Although the history of Jesus research has amply documented that scholars always reconstruct Jesus in their own image,<sup>9</sup> many still claim feminist interpretation must critically assess it and articulate alternative reconstructions. The power of historical narrative is overlooked, for example, by scholars who argue against a feminist egalitarian reconstruction of the Jesus movement. See for instance the dissertation of Helga Melzer-Keller, Jesus und die Frauen: Eine Verhältnisbestimmung nach den synoptischen Evangelien (Freiburg: Herder, 1997), 440–441; Manuela Kalsky, Christophanien: Die Re-Vision der Christologie aus der Sicht von Frauen in unterschiedlichen Kulturen (Gütersloh: Chr. Kaiser Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 2000); Kathleen E. Corley, Women and the Historical Jesus: Feminist Myths of Christian Origins (Santa Rosa, CA: Polebridge Press, 2002), 146.

---

<sup>6</sup> Anette Noller, Feministische Hermeneutik: Wege einer neuen Schriftauslegung (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1995), 70–75.

<sup>7</sup> I write wo/men in this way not only to indicate the instability of the meaning of the term but also to signal that when I say wo/men I mean to include subordinated men. For the problematic meaning of the term woman/women see Denise Riley, "Am I That Name?": Feminism and the Category of Women in History (Minneapolis, MN: University of Minnesota Press, 1988); Judith Butler, Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity (New York: Routledge, 1990).

<sup>8</sup> For this expression see Rosemary Hennessy, Materialist Feminism and the Politics of Discourse (New York: Routledge, 1993).

<sup>9</sup> To mention just a few references: James H. Charlesworth, "Annotated Bibliography," in Jesus' Jewishness: Exploring the Place of Jesus within Early Judaism, ed. Martin J. Borg (New York: Crossroad/The American Interfaith Institute, 1991); James H. Charlesworth, "From Barren Mazes to Gentle Rappings: The Emergence of Jesus Research," The Princeton Seminary Bulletin 7.3 (1986): 221–230; John F. O'Grady, "The Present State of Christology," Chicago Studies 32.1 (April 1993): 77–91; Werner G. Kümmel, "Jesusforschung seit 1981," Theologische Rundschau N.F. 53 (1988): 229–249 and 54 (1989): 1–53; Daniel Korsch, that they can produce the true correct meaning of the Historical-Jesus as a “fact of history” with scientifically controlled methods.<sup>10</sup> However, such a claim overlooks the epistemological difficulty presented by the rhetoric<sup>11</sup> of our sources. No universal, objectively given and detectable Historical-Jesus can be distilled once and for all from our sources and texts since texts are multivalent and allow for a multiplicity of valid readings. Hence, a critical feminist methodology does not so much ask whether and how one can establish scientific proofs that Jesus actually said this or did something but rather inquires as to how scientific Historical-Jesus discourses know what they claim to know and how they authorize their historical reconstructions as “true,” “scientific,” and “reliable.”

In other words the rich array of Historical-Jesus reconstructions calls for a critical inquiry into the rhetoricity<sup>12</sup> of scientific Historical-Jesus discourses, probing how they can say what they say and for whom and “Neue Jesusliteratur,” Bibel und Kirche 48 (1993): 40–44; Ferdinand Hahn, “Umstrittenes Jesusbild?” Münchener Theologische Zeitschrift 44 (1993): 95–107; Jesus and Faith: A Conversation on the Work of John Dominic Crossan, Author of The Historical Jesus, ed. Jeffrey Carlson and Robert A. Ludwig (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Press, 1994); Luke T. Johnson, The Real Jesus: The Misguided Quest for the Historical Jesus and the Truth of the Traditional Gospels (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1966); Robert W. Funk, Honest to Jesus: Jesus for a New Millennium (San Francisco: Harper Collins, 1996); cf. Werner Kelber, “The Quest for the Historical Jesus: From the Perspectives of Medieval, Modern, and Post-Enlightenment Readings, and in View of Ancient Oral Esthetics,” in The Jesus Controversy, ed. Werner Kelber (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1999); and Marcus J. Borg, Jesus in Contemporary Scholarship (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1994). See also my book Jesus and the Politics of Interpretation (New York: Continuum, 2000).

---

<sup>10</sup> For such a positivist rhetoric see for example Robert W. Funk, Roy W. Hoover, and the Jesus Seminar, The Five Gospels: The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus (New York: Macmillan, 1993), 34–35: “To be a critical scholar means to make empirical, factual evidence—evidence open to confirmation by independent, neutral observers—the controlling factor in historical judgments.... Critical scholars adopt the principle of methodological skepticism: accept only what passes the rigorous tests of the rules of evidence....”

<sup>11</sup> Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza, Rhetoric and Ethic: The Politics of Biblical Studies (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1999).

<sup>12</sup> For the theoretical underpinnings of this approach see, e.g., Jane Sutton, “The Death of Rhetoric and Its Rebirth in Philosophy,” Rhetorica 4 (1986): 203–226; Richard Harvey Brown, Society as Text: Essays on Rhetoric, Reason, and Reality (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987); John S. Nelson, Allan Megill, and Donald McCloskey, eds., The Rhetoric of the Human Sciences: Language and Argument in Scholarship and Public Affairs (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1987); Robert L. Scott, “On Viewing Rhetoric as Epistemic: Ten Years Later,” in Methods of Rhetorical Criticism: A Twentieth Century Perspective, ed. B. L. Brock, R. L. Scott, and J. W. Chesebro, 3rd rev. ed. (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1989), 140–141; Susan C. Jarratt, Rereading the Sophists: Classical Rhetoric Refigured (Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1991), 63; Michèle Barrett, The Politics of Truth: From Marx to Foucault (Stanford:

to what ends scholars produce Historical-Jesus research. The nexus between reconstructions of Jesus and those theoretical, historical, cultural, and political conceptual frameworks that shape academic Historical-Jesus discourses needs to become conscious.

The theoretical discourse from within which I approach the task of Historical-Jesus research is that of a critical feminist theory and theology of liberation. Since, however, malestream academic discourses do not explicitly state their research perspective and interests, they pass themselves off as “unmarked” scientific discourses in contrast to those marked as feminist, post-colonial, or Christian. By claiming to have produced a scientific history of the “historical” Jesus<sup>13</sup> which, unlike theological-religious or feminist, post-colonial, and liberationist reconstructions, is allegedly a truly scientific account of Jesus, malestream scholars obfuscate the fact that contextuality and ideological interests also shape their own research. As William Arnal has observed:

Identity- and minority based criticisms and readings of the biblical texts are normally assigned to the abyss of tendentious hypotheses, in part because we can read their ideological subtext with all too much ease. . . . But the ideological subtext of the dominant culture or of the broader social totality, which encompasses even marginal groups, is normally much harder for us to read, simply by virtue of its proximity, of our own embeddedness in it. We have memorized the texture and foliage of the individual trees, without even an inkling that we could also map out the parameters of the forest in which they stand.<sup>14</sup>

---

Stanford University Press, 1991); Raymond A. Morrow with David D. Baron, Critical Theory and Methodology (Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage Publications, 1994); Jennifer Tolbert Roberts, Athens On Trial: The Antidemocratic Tradition in Western Thought (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1994); Lorraine Code, Rhetorical Spaces: Essays on Gendered Locations (New York: Routledge, 1995); Cheryl Glenn, Rhetoric Retold: Regendering the Tradition from Antiquity through the Renaissance (Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1997); John Louis Lucaites, Celeste Michelle Condit, and Sally Caudill, eds., Contemporary Rhetorical Theory: A Reader (New York: The Guilford Press, 1999); Jane Sutton, “The Taming of Polos/Polis: Rhetoric as an Achievement without Women,” in Introduction to Contemporary Rhetorical Theory: A Reader, ed. John Louis Lucaites, et al. (New York: The Guilford Press, 1999), 101–127.

<sup>13</sup> Cf. John Meier, “The Bible as a Source for Theology,” in Catholic Theological Society of America: Proceedings of the 43rd Annual Convention, ed. George Kilcourse (Toronto, 1988), 1–12. See also his book A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, ABRL 2 (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 4, where he distinguishes between the “real” Jesus and the Historical-Jesus: “in contrast to the ‘real Jesus,’ the ‘historical Jesus’ is that Jesus whom we can recover or reconstruct by using the scientific tools of modern historical research.”

<sup>14</sup> William E. Arnal, Jesus and the Village Scribes: Galilean Conflicts and the Setting of Q (Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Fortress, 2001), 64–65.

In order to map out the parameters of the forest, in which Historical-Jesus research stands I propose that one adopts a critical feminist analytic which, however, is not the same as studying the so-called “wo/man and Jesus” question. It is generally assumed that “woman” or “gender”<sup>15</sup> is the only research object and analytic category of feminist studies. However, this is only partially correct. Critical feminist studies—in contrast to women’s studies or gender studies—do not simply take “woman” or “gender” either as their only object of inquiry or as their sole analytic category. Rather critical feminist studies utilize a critical social theory and critical methods of analysis, which are able to comprehend the socio-political structures of domination and oppression that have determined wo/men’s lives in antiquity and continue to do so today.

In short, critical feminist, ideology critical or post-colonial studies insist that when one wishes to find out about the Historical-Jesus, one needs to investigate whether Historical-Jesus research is conscious of its permeation with hegemonic knowledge and interests of domination and critically analyze the discursive frameworks and heuristic models used to explain the world and reality. One must look at the competing ideological and economic interests and theological frameworks which determine the development and the results of Historical-Jesus research. One must become conscious of how Historical-Jesus discourses overlook, marginalize, or caricaturize wo/men and re-inscribe the hegemonic structures of domination such as gender, race, class, and imperialism.

As a critical methodology<sup>16</sup> feminist analysis focuses especially on those factors in Historical-Jesus research which govern and determine the use of its scientific methods. Not only are the subjects, basic concepts, re-constructive models, presuppositions, and audiences of critical feminist studies different from malestream social-scientific Historical-Jesus studies, but also their goals. Critical feminist studies insist with Jürgen Habermas that questions of power are central not only for the understanding of language, tradition, and canon, but also for Historical-Jesus research itself. Habermas distinguishes three basic forms of knowledge: the empirical-analytical, the hermeneutic-historical, and the critical-emancipatory. We search for knowledge in order to control social situations and the facts of nature (empirical-analytic), to understand and appreciate historical realities (hermeneutic-historical), and to change our individual and collective knowledge of reality (the critical-emancipatory form) so that human potential and possibilities for freedom and equality can be maximized.<sup>17</sup>

---

<sup>15</sup> Cf., e.g., the contributions in Stephen D. Moore and Janice Capel Anderson, eds., New Testament Masculinities, Semeia Studies 45 (Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2003).

<sup>16</sup> For a perceptive discussion of my critical approach see Marsha Aileen Hewitt, “The Feminist Liberation Theology of Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza as a Critical Theory,” in Toward a New Heaven and a New Earth: Essays in Honor of Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza, ed. Fernando F. Segovia (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 2003), 443–458.

Whereas mainstream Historical-Jesus research claims to be interested primarily in the first and maybe in the second form of knowledge production, critical feminist research is concerned especially with the third form of knowledge about the world. It seeks not just to understand but also to change relations of inequality. In and through the process of a hermeneutics of suspicion it problematizes and questions the functions and claims of scientific Historical-Jesus studies. In a feminist perspective, one must ask, does social-scientific Jesus research contribute to change and transformation or does it seek to maintain the status quo? In short, inquiring into the rhetoricity of Historical-Jesus research one must ask by whom, why, and in whose interests social-scientific Historical-Jesus knowledge is produced.

Patricia Hill Collins has outlined three epistemological criteria for developing a critical self-reflexivity that could sustain emancipatory oppositional practices.<sup>18</sup> Adapting these criteria to Historical-Jesus study one would need to ask:

1. Does a reconstruction of the Historical-Jesus “speak truth to people about the reality of their lives” and the lives of wo/men in the first century? Who are the experts, what are the standards they use and what counts as knowledge? Who decides and why do we accept or reject what the Jesus experts say?
2. What is the “stance toward freedom” in a particular source text as well as in a particular rendition of the Historical-Jesus? What are its visions of emancipation and the strategies of change it suggests? Does it encourage people to resist relations of domination and can it engender social and religious change?

---

<sup>17</sup> Cf. the discussion of critical theory by Raymond A. Morrow with David D. Baron, Critical Theory and Methodology (Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage Publications, 1994).

<sup>18</sup> Patricia Hill Collins, Fighting Words: Black Women and the Search for Justice (Minneapolis, MN: University of Minnesota Press, 1998), 398–99.

3. Does a particular Historical-Jesus reconstruction move people to struggle or does it advocate the status quo? Does it provide an ethical foundation and framework grounded in notions of justice and authority for struggle? How effectively does it provide moral authority to the struggles for self-determination?

In short, one needs to critically inquire into the politics of meaning-making that determine Historical-Jesus research and pay special attention to how much historical reconstructions of Jesus function either to undo or to continue the marginalization and erasure of wo/men and other non-persons from historical records and consciousness. Since Historical-Jesus research has served the interests of western colonization and hegemony, one must problematize the theories, theologies, or ideologies that have fostered colonization and domination and which are re-inscribed through biblical texts and interpretive discourses on Jesus. In a situation of ever-increasing globalization of communication and concomitant impoverishment of peoples, critical feminist Historical-Jesus research scrutinizes all scientific Historical-Jesus discourses as to how much they promote or undermine the politics of exclusivity, inferiority, prejudice, and dehumanization that determine cultural or religious identity formations. Consequently it is important to investigate Historical-Jesus research as a discursive formation.

1.2. Historical-Jesus Research as a Discursive Formation

The dictionary definition of the term “discourse” stresses that the general sense of this term is “to speak, talk, converse, discuss.” It also can mean “speech” and “treatise.” However, such a generalized definition suppresses that at least since Foucault<sup>19</sup> discourse and discursivity must be understood as related to context and power. Discourses do more than just designate things; they are practices “that systematically form the objects of which they speak.”<sup>20</sup> The notion of discourse allows one to attend to the processes that govern its construction. The task is to understand how power is at work in research practices and operates in specific methods and categories. Power is something that is exercised and dispersed in language rather than something that is simply possessed.<sup>21</sup>

---

<sup>19</sup> Michel Foucault, Power/Knowledge: Selected Interviews and Other Writings, 1972–1977 (Brighton: Harvester, 1980); idem, The Archaeology of Knowledge (London: Routledge, 1972).

<sup>20</sup> Michèle Barrett, The Politics of Truth: From Marx to Foucault (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1991), 130.

Historical-Jesus research can be studied as a discursive formation that systematically shapes the object, the Historical-Jesus, of which it speaks. Hence, one can investigate how its discourses manufacture the Historical-Jesus as a symbolic scholarly construct and as an ideologically produced subject position that elite men are able to inhabit and in relation to which wo/men always are positioned in and through practices of subordination and/or romance. As a scientific discursive formation Historical-Jesus research re-arranges the information and “data” derived from its sources and places them in a reconstructive historical framework or model that, consciously or not, is determined by the experience and interests of the scholar at work. “To the extent that discourse configures what it indicates, it is a fiction as much as a representation.”<sup>22</sup>

As a scientific discursive practice, Historical-Jesus research can be investigated as “the study of the construction of the subject, the extent to which and the mechanisms through which individuals are attached to identities,” as well as an investigation of the role that the process of identity construction “plays in the disruption or stabilization of political formations and the relation of all these processes to distinctions of gender, ethnicity, and class.”<sup>23</sup> In other words, one is able to investigate Historical-Jesus research as a discursive practice that, like historiography on the whole, seeks to constitute the identity of the Historical-Jesus and thereby Christian religious and western cultural identity in terms of scientific positivism<sup>24</sup> as well as cultural androcentrism or, better, kyriocentrism.

Historical-Jesus discourse is characterized by a paradoxical rhetoric that stresses the capability of its scientific methods to produce a reliable account of the “real” Historical-Jesus. Yet, this claim has been unjustified in its results since Historical-Jesus research has produced a host of different and often competing images of Jesus. Since the multiplicity and variety of Historical-Jesus images and approaches is not a controverted but a scientifically verifiable “fact,” it is necessary, I argue here, to look

---

<sup>21</sup> Barrett, Politics, 135.

<sup>22</sup> Mark Poster, Cultural History + Postmodernity: Disciplinary Readings and Challenges (New York: Columbia University Press, 1997), 9.

<sup>23</sup> Poster, Cultural, 10.

<sup>24</sup> See Collins, Fighting Words, 92.

more closely at how Historical-Jesus research and its social-scientific rhetoric<sup>25</sup> is produced and to study Historical-Jesus research as a discursive formation. Hence, one must always engage not only in historical re-construction but also in ideological criticism. By ideology I do not mean simply “false consciousness” or misrepresentation and mystification of reality. Rather, I understand ideology first in the broader sense of a practice and politics of meaning-making.

Feminist ideology critique is a mode of investigation that recognizes the contesting interests at stake in the scientific construction of the Historical-Jesus. It conducts its investigation from a committed position within a social analytic whose legitimacy is argued for not on the grounds of its scientific Truth but on the basis of its explanatory power and its commitment to emancipatory social change.<sup>26</sup> Conceptualizing Historical-Jesus discourses as ideology, i.e. as meaning-making under certain socio-political and religious conditions, allows one to investigate Historical-Jesus discourse or “history making” as an intellectual critical practice. In short, I argue that Historical-Jesus research has to enter a fourth ideology-critical quest for the Historical-Jesus, it must become Post-Quest Historical-Jesus research.

It is well known that Historical-Jesus research is a child of the European Enlightenment. According to Albert Schweitzer Historical-Jesus research in the nineteenth century had as its goal the liberation of the Jesus of History from the tyranny of church dogma and ecclesiastical institutions with the help of rationalist science.<sup>27</sup> However it is less recognized that because of these beginnings Historical-Jesus research also shares in the ideological assumptions of Eurocentric colonialist, racist, and antifeminist scientific discourses.

Scholarship generally has come to distinguish four periods of Historical-Jesus research and three quests for the historical Jesus. Whereas three of the four Quests have doggedly pursued the Historical-Jesus in various ways and with differing methods in positivist scientific terms, the interlude

---

<sup>25</sup> For the historical context of this rhetoric see Roy A. Harrisville and Walter Sundberg, The Bible in Modern Culture: Theology and Historical-Critical Method from Spinoza to Käsemann (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1995).

<sup>26</sup> Rosemary Hennessy, Materialist Feminism and the Politics of Discourse (New York: Routledge, 1993), 15.

<sup>27</sup> Albert Schweitzer, The Quest for the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of Its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede (New York: Macmillan, 1910), 3–4, stresses that the critical investigation of the life of Jesus is the “greatest achievement of German theology.”

of the No-Quest period lasted roughly sixty years during which the search for the Historical-Jesus was virtually abandoned and the kerygmatic Christ took center stage. The No-Quest period was the period between the First and the Second Quests beginning with the work of Martin Kähler in 1896<sup>28</sup> and ending with Ernst Käsemann's revival of Historical-Jesus research in 1953.<sup>29</sup> It was actually a declaration against liberal "life of Jesus scholarship"<sup>30</sup> that claimed to represent the "real" Historical-Jesus free from all dogmatic overlay.

The Third Quest<sup>31</sup> has emerged primarily among North American scholars in the past twenty-five years.<sup>32</sup> The Third Quest is not kerygmatic but historical and social scientific in intent. It is characterized by interest in social history, integration of Jesus into Judaism, and attention to non-canonical sources.<sup>33</sup> However, it is split into two directions, those who advocate a non-eschatological understanding of Jesus (Mack, Crossan, Vaage et al. in the Jesus Seminar) and those who defend the eschatological Millenarian Jesus who hoped for the restoration of Judaism (Sanders, Theissen/Merz, Allison, Meier, Horsley et al.).

The Third Quest was facilitated through new studies of early Jewish writings, research of the Qumran scrolls, the Nag Hammadi discovery and archeological finds. Whereas these studies have amply documented that Judaism in the first century CE was variegated and pluralistic, the arguments on Jesus' Jewishness often seem to presuppose a unitary patriarchal form of Judaism. If scholars use not a sociological conflict but an integrationist model for their reconstruction of Jesus, they are not able to imagine Jesus as a member of a variegated Jewish basileia

---

<sup>28</sup> Martin Kähler, The So-Called Historical Jesus and the Historic, Biblical Christ, ed. and trans. Carl Braaten (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988).

<sup>29</sup> This paper was published by Ernst Käsemann, "The Problem of the Historical Jesus," in his Essays on New Testament Themes, trans. W. J. Montague (London: SCM, 1964).

<sup>30</sup> See Barry W. Henaut, "Is the 'Historical Jesus' a Christological Construct?" in Whose Historical Jesus?, Studies in Christianity and Judaism = Études Sur Le Christianisme et le Judaïsme; No. 7, ed. William E. Arnal, Michel R. Desjardins, and Canadian Corporation for Studies in Religion (Waterloo, ON: Published for the Canadian Corporation for Studies in Religion by Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1997), 241–268.

<sup>31</sup> The coinage of the term Third Quest is attributed to S. Neill and T. Wright, The Interpretation of the New Testament 1861–1986 (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988), 379–381.

<sup>32</sup> David S. du Toit, "Redefining Jesus: Current Trends in Jesus Research," in Jesus, Mark, and Q: The Teaching of Jesus and Its Earliest Records, ed. Michael Labahn and Andreas Schmidt (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001), 83–124.

<sup>33</sup> See the very helpful chart in Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1988), 12.

movement that was inclusive of wo/men and stood in conflict with the hegemonic kyriarchal structures of the Roman Empire of which hegemonic Judaism also was a part. In short, they are not able to articulate a reconstructive frame of reference that can fully conceptualize the emergent Jesus movement and its diverse articulations as participating in popular Jewish and Greco-Roman movements of cultural, political, and religious survival, resistance, and change.

Finally, the Third Quest for the Historical-Jesus seeks to establish its scientific character in terms of the quantitative method of stratigraphy with its segmentation of the text and its reassembly in vast databases. It also adopts social-scientific models derived from cultural anthropology or quantitative sociology for authorizing its scientificity. By taking over such quantitative methods, Historical-Jesus research also appropriates the theoretical assumptions that shape and govern scientific discourse on the whole.

1.3. The Socio-Political Location of Historical-Jesus Research

It is well known that biblical studies in general and Historical-Jesus discourses in particular emerged on the scene together with other disciplines in the humanities that sought to articulate their discourses as scientific practices in analogy to the natural sciences. Sandra Harding has pointed to a three-stage process in the emergence of science shaping and determining scholarly discourses, their presuppositions and their intellectual frameworks.

The first stage consisted in the breakdown of feudal labor divisions and slave relations. This breakdown made the scientific method of experimental observation possible. According to Harding, "Science's new way of seeing the world developed from the perspective of the new kind of social labor of artisans and the inventors of modern technology."<sup>34</sup>

The second stage is exemplified in the New Science Movement of the seventeenth century that flourished in Puritan England and brought forth a new political self-consciousness with radical social goals. "Science's progressiveness was perceived to lie not in method alone but in its mutually supportive relationship to progressive tendencies in the larger society.”<sup>35</sup> Scientific knowledge was to serve the people and to be used for redistributing knowledge and wealth.

---

<sup>34</sup> Sandra Harding, The Science Question in Feminism (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1986), 218, with reference to Edgar Zilsel, "The Sociological Roots of Science," American Journal of Sociology 47 (1942).

The third stage produced the notion of purely technical and value-neutral science. The progress which science represents is based entirely on scientific method. The emergence of this third stage in the development of science also spelled the end of the collaboration between science and social, political, or educational reform—a price paid for institutionalization and political protection. The institutionalization of science meant the separation of science’s cognitive and political aims and the restriction of “true” science and scientists to the former.

This understanding of science goes hand in hand with value-neutrality, which captures what is real through impersonal, quantitative language; and method, understood as norms, rules, procedures, and scientific technologies. Scientific values are trans-historical human values; they are not particularistic, local, partial, or political. Historically and culturally specific values, emotions, and interests must be kept separated from de-politicized transcendental scientific practices. Abstract thinking, mathematical intelligibility, and mechanistic metaphors become the hallmarks of true science.

It is also at this third stage of development that academic scientific disciplines emerged, producing the discourses of domination—racism, heterosexism, colonialism, class privilege, ageism—as “scientific” discourses.<sup>36</sup> While previously discourses of colonization were developed on the grounds of Christian religion, now science takes the place of religion and continues its work of hegemonic legitimization. These scientific discourses of domination are formed as elite discourses that justify relations of ruling. Hence, “soft” academic disciplines such as history, sociology, and anthropology, in their formative stage, developed discourses of domination in order to prove that they also belonged to the “hard” sciences. Thus academic social-science disciplines supported European colonialism and capitalist industrial development.

It has long been recognized that the discipline of cultural anthropology and ethnology has been developed in the interest of western colonialism. For instance Radcliffe-Brown, one of the founding fathers of functionalist social anthropology which stresses stability, unity, integration, and equilibrium as most important for the functioning of a society, states this link between anthropology and colonialism quite openly:

---

<sup>35</sup> Harding, Science Question, 219.

<sup>36</sup> See Ronald T. Takaki, “Aesclepius Was a White Man: Race and the Cult of True Womanhood,” in The Racial Economy of Science: Toward a Democratic Future, ed. Sandra Harding (Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1993), 201–209; Nancy Leys Stepan and Sander L. Gilman, “Appropriating the Idioms of Science: The Rejection of Scientific Racism,” ibid., 170–193; and Nancy Leys Stepan, “Race and Gender: The Role of Analogy in Science,” ibid., 369–376.

Now I think this is where social anthropology can be of immense and almost immediate service. The study of the beliefs and customs of the native peoples, with the aim not of merely reconstructing their history but of discovering their meaning, their function, that is, the place they occupy in the mental, moral and social life, can afford great help to the missionary or the public servant who is engaged in dealing with practical problems of the adjustment of the native civilization to the new conditions that have resulted from our occupation of the country....<sup>37</sup>

However, what is often less recognized is the function of social anthropology not only in the service of colonial administrations in the last century but also in the service of US economic and political hegemony today. As the world's only remaining "Super Power" US military institutions and governmental agencies use social scientists in the interest of American imperialism for controlling so-called third world developing nations.

Cultural anthropology still provides the theories and materials for managing the world today. Insofar as western social scientists study those peoples who are either poor or living under neo-colonialism but not the elites of their own society and culture, they always produce knowledge that can be used against the oppressed and exploited who are studied. Imperialism, "to survive, must counterattack with ever more sophisticated weapons, hard and 'soft.' It must understand the people it domineers, so as to understand how to prevent them from overthrowing that domination."<sup>38</sup> Recognizing the permeation of anthropological theories and frameworks with imperialist interests, social-scientific Historical-Jesus research must investigate the world view and normalizing function of the models and theories adopted from the social sciences rather than simply take over anthropological theories in order to prove Historical-Jesus studies to be scientific.

---

<sup>37</sup> A. R. Radcliffe-Brown, "The Methods of Ethnology and Social Anthropology," South African Journal of Science 20 (1923): 124–147, 142–143.

<sup>38</sup> Jack Stauder, "The 'Relevance' of Anthropology to Colonialism and Imperialism," in The Racial Economy of Science: Toward a Democratic Future, ed. Sandra Harding (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993), 425–426.

Moreover, not only cultural anthropology but also philology and history as scientific disciplines worked in the nineteenth century in the interest of colonial domination. Comparative philology, for example, contrasted Hebrew/Semitic and Aryan/Indo-European languages, since it considered languages to be the “best mirror of the human mind” and the “most ancient monument of peoples.”<sup>39</sup> Jean-Pierre Vernant has pointed out that the function of the Hebrew-Aryan language myth was the justification of racism, anti-Semitism, and colonial domination:

As scholars established the disciplines of Semitic and Indo-European studies, they also invented the mythical figures of the Hebrew and the Aryan, a providential pair which, by revealing to the people of the Christianized West the secret of their identity, also bestowed upon them the patent of nobility that justified their spiritual, religious, and political domination of the world.<sup>40</sup>

The nineteenth-century professionalization of history also fostered scientific practices advocating commitment to an objectivity above the critical scrutiny of such categories as class and gender, along with strict use of evidence, less rhetorical style, the development of archives, libraries, peer reviews, and professional education. Scientific historical discourses created an intellectual space inhabited by an “invisible and neutered I” which was considered a “gender- and race-free” community of scholars. At the same time science was producing discourses of exclusion such as racism, heterosexism, and colonialism, thus barring women from the professions and turning them into objects of research.

American sociology in its formative years exhibits the same symptoms as scientific philology and historiography.<sup>41</sup> It was influenced by European anthropological discourses that emerged with imperialism and understood colonized peoples as “primitives” who were considered to be more natural, sexual, untouched by civilization, and inferior because of their innate biological differences—for instance, their allegedly smaller brains. In the US, Indigenous Americans and African Americans were those who represented the “primitive” in sociological

---

<sup>39</sup> Leibniz as quoted by Maurice Olender, The Languages of Paradise: Race, Religion and Philology in the Nineteenth Century (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1992), 5.

<sup>40</sup> Jean-Pierre Vernant, “Foreword,” in Olender, The Languages of Paradise, x. He also points to the anti-Judaism engendered by this debate which foreshadows the death camps of the Holocaust.

<sup>41</sup> Cf. Randall Collins, Four Sociological Traditions (New York: Oxford University Press, 1994), 3–46.

and anthropological scientific discourses. They were construed on biological and cultural grounds to be either violent or childlike or both. People who were Not-white and Not-male were praised as “noble savages” or feared as “bloodthirsty cannibals.” Blacks and White women were viewed as childlike, a factor used to explain their supposedly inferior intelligence.

White women and Blacks were also seen as more embodied, “natural,” and controlled by their physical, biological essences. Both were viewed as having an inherent “nature” of some sort—for blacks violence, for White women passivity. Collectively, these comparisons generated a situation in which race and gender gained meaning from one another, situated within economic class hierarchies that drew upon these ideas.<sup>42</sup>

This third stage in the development of science constructs a sharp dualism between science and theology, or scientific discourse and ideology, in order to prove its objective character. A series of structuring dualisms<sup>43</sup> and dichotomies between science and politics, history and theology, knowledge and fiction, past and present, rationality and faith, male and female, white and black, Caucasian and Asian, and so on, determine the western scientific world view.

Scientific Historical-Jesus discourses re-inscribe such structuring dualisms as a series of oppositions between Historical-Jesus and kerygmatic Christ, Mediterranean culture and US society, itinerant prophets and sedentary householders, Jesus and Judaism, or Jesus and wo/men. As a scientific discourse Historical-Jesus research thus participates in the discourses of domination which were produced by science.

1.4. Historical-Jesus Research and its Rhetorical Context of Domination

The rhetoric of Historical-Jesus discourses belongs to the third stage of the history of science. As Dieter Georgi,<sup>44</sup> Shawn Kelly,<sup>45</sup> Kwok Pui-Lan<sup>46</sup>

<sup>42</sup> Collins, Fighting Words, 100–101.

<sup>43</sup> For a comprehensive interpretation of Q scholarship see, e.g., Richard Horsley, Whoever Hears You Hears Me: Prophets, Performance and Tradition in Q (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1999); and Burton L. Mack, The Lost Gospel: The Book of Q and Christian Origins (San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1993).

<sup>44</sup> Dieter Georgi, “The Interest in Life of Jesus Theology as a Paradigm for the Social History of Biblical Criticism,” HTR 85 (1992): 51–83.

<sup>45</sup> Shawn Kelly, Racializing Jesus: Race, Ideology and the Formation of Modern Biblical Scholarship (New York: Routledge, 2002).

<sup>46</sup> Kwok Pui-Lan, “Jesus/the Native: Biblical Studies from a Postcolonial Perspective,” in Teaching the Bible: The Discourses and Politics of Biblical Pedagogy, ed. Fernando and others have shown convincingly, Historical-Jesus research has participated in fashioning and legitimating the cultural-scientific discourses of domination that were conditioned on the absence of wo/men who were non-elite, non-white, and non-male. The image of Jesus, the extraordinary (white) man or “noble savage” who as an especially gifted and powerful individual transcends all normal boundaries, corresponds to the liberal ethos of elite western men. Hence, malestream historical and social-scientific Jesus discourses must be critically analyzed as European-American discourses that have functioned in the service of western domination and Christian mission. They continue to reproduce not only the kyriocentric self-understanding and religious horizon of Christians but also that of western culture if they do not critically question the ideological functions of their own methods and theoretical lenses.

In addition, the political context and rhetorical situation in which feminist as well as malestream Historical-Jesus research takes place today is constituted by the resurgence of the religious Right claiming the power to name and to define the true nature of religion.<sup>47</sup> Right wing, well-financed think tanks are supported by reactionary political and financial institutions that seek to defend kyriarchal capitalism.<sup>48</sup> Right-wing movements around the globe have insisted on the figuration of emancipated wo/men as signifiers of western decadence or of modern atheistic secularism and have presented masculine power as the expression of divine power.<sup>49</sup>

---

Segovia and Mary Ann Tolbert (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1998); see also her “Engendering Christ,” in Toward a New Heaven and a New Earth, ed. Segovia, 300–313.

<sup>47</sup> See the variegated contributions in Hans Küng and Jürgen Moltmann, eds., Fundamentalism as an Ecumenical Challenge (Concilium; London: SCM Press, 1992).

<sup>48</sup> For an excellent critical analysis of the involvement of religion in this global struggle see especially the work of the late Penny Lernoux, Cry of the People (New York: Penguin, 1982); eadem, In Banks We Trust (New York: Penguin, 1986); Sara Diamond, Spiritual Warfare: The Politics of the Christian Right (Boston: Southend Press, 1989); Jerome Himmelstein, To the Right: The Transformation of American Conservatism (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990); Margaret Lamberts Bendroth, Fundamentalism and Gender, 1875 to the Present (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1993); Betty DeBerg, Ungodly Wo/men: Gender and the First Wave of American Fundamentalism (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1990); Walter H. Capps, The New Religious Right: Piety, Patriotism and Politics (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1990); Lawrence Grossberg, We Gotta Get Out of This Place: Popular Conservatism and Postmodern Culture (New York: Routledge, 1992); Martin E. Marty and R. Scott Appleby, eds., Fundamentalism Observed (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991); Michael Barkun, Religion and the Racist Right: The Origins of the Christian Identity Movement (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1994).

<sup>49</sup> See especially the declaration of the Division for the Advancement of Women on

The proliferation of “new” scientific Historical-Jesus books does not undermine but sustains the literalist desire of biblical fundamentalism for an “accurate,” reliable biography of Jesus as a firm foundation of western culture and Christian religion. Hence, scientific Historical-Jesus scholarship does not threaten religious positivism but functions politically as the reverse side of the fundamentalist literalist coin. Like Historical-Jesus research, fundamentalist interpretations seek to “fix” the pluriform expressions of Christian scriptures and traditions, to unify the variegated texts and ambiguous metaphors of Jesus the Christ, and to filter them into a “common sense” realistic narrative about the man Jesus.

As long as the Third Quest tacitly and often unknowingly assumes that Christian (male) identity remains bound up with a positivist “scientific” reconstruction of the Historical-Jesus, the heroic patriarchal Man, it cannot but produce the historical “fact” of Jesus’ maleness as an objectified historical given that is constitutive for hegemonic Christian western (male) identity. Therefore, it is necessary to interrogate not only the gender constructions of social-scientific Historical-Jesus research but especially also its theoretical horizon of positivism. Both strategies, the analysis of the ideological undergirding of positivist biblical scholarship, and the problematization and deconstruction of Jesus’ masculinity as an objectively given fact of history, are necessary in order to recognize the functions in the service of domination which historical-social-scientific Jesus research often unwittingly performs.

Consequently, critical feminist Historical-Jesus research insists that judicious reflection on the social contextualization, theoretical perspective, and rhetorical situation of scholars must become an integral part of research. Considering the race, gender, and national-social location of most biblical scholars, it is not surprising that the historical man Jesus is in the center of scholarly interest. Consequently, the social and religious “International Standards of Equality and Religious Freedom: Implications for the Status of Women,” in Identity Politics and Women: Cultural Reassertions and Feminisms in International Perspective, ed. Valentine M. Moghadam (Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1994), 425–438; Rebecca E. Klatch, “Women of the New Right in the United States: Family, Feminism, and Politics,” in Identity Politics and Women, ed. Moghadam, 367–388. Most of the contributions in Identity Politics and Women are on women and Islam in different parts of the world. However, see Sucheta Mazumdar, “Moving Away from a Secular Vision? Women, Nation, and the Cultural Construction of Hindu India,” ibid., 243–273; and Radha Kumar, “Identity Politics and the Contemporary Indian Feminist Movement,” ibid., 274–292; see also the three-part award-winning PBS series God and Politics in which Bill Moyers explores the connections between state and church and its impact on US foreign policy.

---

location of Historical-Jesus researchers must become an area of critical investigation since it always already determines research itself. From a scientific-epistemological point of view, a clear-cut reconstitution of the world of Jesus and his historical influence that is not affected by the person of the interpreter and her/his social-political situation is intellectually impossible and theoretically outdated.

Students of culture and sociology, as for instance Pierre Bourdieu, have demanded that the subjects of research, the intellectuals, must become first ethnologists of their own discipline and analysts of their own status in society if they want to work scientifically. Those who intend to work sociologically must always first engage in a “sociology of sociology” in order to become conscious of their own social location, of the notions and pre-constructions which they use, and of their interests or dependencies as well as to arrive at a theory of scientific praxis.

When reading many sociological works, I find it regretful that people whose profession it is to objectify the social world are so little able to objectify themselves and that they do not see, that what comes to the fore in their allegedly scientific discourses is precisely not the object but much more their relation to the object, resentment, envy, social desire, unconscious strivings, a whole lot of unanalyzed things.<sup>50</sup>

In sum, the refusal of the Third Quest to problematize its own methodological assumptions and ideological interests as well as its sophisticated advocacy of historical positivism corresponds to political conservatism. Its emphasis on the “realia” and “facts” of history and the reliability of its methods serves to promote scientific fundamentalism. Its universalizing discourses obfuscate that historians select and interpret archeological artifacts and textual evidence as well as incorporate them into a scientific model and narrative framework of meaning.

For that reason, the numerous reviews of the genealogy of Historical-Jesus research usually do not mention the works on the Jesus of history that have emerged around the globe parallel to the Third Quest but were inspired by different interests and methodologies. Among others, Grant LeMarquand<sup>51</sup> has pointed to the ignorance of the western academy about African, Asian, Oceanian, Indigenous, Latin American, and North American minority Historical-Jesus scholarship.<sup>52</sup> Although African,

<sup>50</sup> Pierre Bourdieu, Homo Academicus (Frankfurt am Main: Suhrkamp, 1989), 12.

<sup>51</sup> Grant LeMarquand, “The Historical Jesus and African New Testament Scholarship,” in Whose Historical Jesus? ed. Arnal et al., 161–180.

<sup>52</sup> See, e.g., Kwesi A. Dickson, Theology in Africa (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1984);

Asian, Latin American, and post-colonial biblical scholars are well aware of the issues raised by western Historical-Jesus scholarship, they frame and shape their own discourses on Jesus differently. Their major concern is not Historical-Jesus research but to deconstruct colonialist interpretations of Jesus and to establish the common ground between their own cultures and the Jesus of history. They focus on the Jesus of history not only because his culture comes in many respects very close to their own but also because their own cultures were constructed as inferior and even “satanic” by western missionaries in the name of Jesus.

Thus, the western scientific historiography of Historical-Jesus research is constituted in and through the exclusion of the discourses of the “others” and characterized by Euro-American-centrism. The “scientific” self-understanding of Historical-Jesus research justifies such exclusions of the discourses of the “others.” One wonders whether it is an historical accident that the Third Quest for the Historical-Jesus exploded not only during the resurgence of the political right and the revival of religious fundamentalism but also in a time when the wo/men’s and Third-World liberation movements gained ground and developed rhetorical power in the churches and the academy.

Since my book In Memory of Her appeared in the early eighties it belongs to both the beginning stage of the Third Quest of Historical-Jesus research and to global liberationist Jesus research which emerged at the same time. It does not subscribe to the methodological positivism of the Third Quest but adopts a critical feminist and liberationist perspective. In opposition to the Second Quest and in line with the ethos of the Third Quest I stressed not only the sayings but also the narrative traditions and was concerned to reconstruct the Jesus movement as an egalitarian Jewish movement of wo/men. However, I argued against topical studies on “women and Jesus” which frame their research in terms of the cultural model of patriarchal romance<sup>53</sup> between the great

---

Robert Schreiter, ed., Faces of Jesus in Africa (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1991); Priscilla A. Pope-Levison and John R. Levison, Jesus in Global Contexts (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1992); Jon Sobrino, Jesus the Liberator (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1993); R. J. Sugirtharajah, ed., Asian Faces of Jesus (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1993); Jon Sobrino, Christ the Liberator: A View from the Victims (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 2001); Doris Strahm, Vom Rand in die Mitte: Christologie aus der Sicht von Frauen in Asien, Afrika und Lateinamerika (Luzern: Exodus Verlag, 1997); Robert Lasalle-Klein, “A Postcolonial Christ,” in Thinking of Christ: Proclamation, Explanation, Meaning, ed. Tatha Wiley (New York: Continuum, 2003), 135–153.

<sup>53</sup> For the impact of such reading see Janice A. Radway, Reading the Romance: Women, Patriarchy, and Popular Literature (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1991).

Man Jesus and his women followers. Consequently, I sought to replace the Historical-Jesus research framework that takes the study of “Jesus and women” as its object with a feminist framework that focuses on wo/men as historical agents. Looking as a wo/man (i.e., from a wo/man scholar’s social location) and from a feminist perspective (i.e. with a hermeneutics of suspicion rooted in a feminist social analytic) at the Historical-Jesus is quite different from concentrating on wo/men as objectified research objects.

In Memory of Her begins with a theoretical exploration of three methodological issues: theological hermeneutics, androcentric language and texts, and the writing of feminist history. In discussion with social world studies and feminist historiography, the book sought to articulate a critical feminist theoretical model for the reconstruction of the Jesus movement and early Christian history that is conscious of its discursive character. However, with the exception of a short discussion by Marcus Borg,<sup>54</sup> Raymond Martin,<sup>55</sup> David du Toit<sup>56</sup> and a selective reception by Richard Horsley,<sup>57</sup> my methodological proposals and critical historiographical explorations<sup>58</sup> seem to have been virtually overlooked, although key elements of my Historical-Jesus reconstruction<sup>59</sup> such as equality, commensality, execution, and the Roman imperial context, have been confirmed by the research of leading Historical-Jesus scholars such as Borg, Crossan, or Horsley. One wonders whether this is because my work makes its feminist interests explicit and thereby challenges the positivist and empiricist ethos of the discipline or because the non-discussion of feminist work allows for its appropriation without citation.<sup>60</sup>

---

<sup>54</sup> Marcus Borg, “Portraits of Jesus in Contemporary North American Scholarship,” HTR 84 (1991): 1–22.

<sup>55</sup> Raymond Martin, The Elusive Messiah: A Philosophical Overview of the Quest for the Historical Jesus (Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1999), 71–95.

<sup>56</sup> David S. du Toit, “Redefining Jesus: Current Trends in Jesus Research,” 83–124.

<sup>57</sup> Richard A. Horsley, Sociology and the Jesus Movement (New York: Crossroad, 1989).

<sup>58</sup> See especially chs. 2 and 3 of In Memory of Her (New York: Crossroad, 1983).

<sup>59</sup> See my article “The Rhetorics and Politics of Jesus Research: A Feminist Perspective,” in Jesus, Mark, and Q: The Teaching of Jesus and Its Earliest Records, 259–282. However, whereas I sought to depict the movement to which Jesus belonged and its expansion and modification in the cities of the Roman Empire, Historical-Jesus books generally seek to reconstruct Jesus as an unequaled individual.

<sup>60</sup> Jane Schaberg, “A Feminist Experience of Historical-Jesus Scholarship,” in Whose Historical Jesus? ed. Arnal et al., 146, has pointed to the “ignoring, censoring, dismissing, silencing and trivializing of feminist scholarship, as well as its appropriation without attribution” as a form of silencing.

To understand Jesus research as a critical practice of remembering the struggles for equality and justice<sup>61</sup> rather than as a quest for scientific data engenders a shift from a rhetoric of scientific or theological positivism that seeks to produce scientific certainty and theological normativity to one that aims at critical retrieval and articulation of memory. Memory as a reconstructive frame of meaning does not require one to construe a dualistic opposition between history and theology, objectivity and interestedness, Jesus and Judaism, Jesus the exceptional individual and Jesus shaped by his community, between the pre-Easter and the post-Easter Jesus, or the historical Jesus and the kerygmatic Christ. If the memory of Jesus' execution, understood as an instance of unjust human suffering, is at the heart and center of this memory, then the critical ethical line must be drawn between injustice and justice, between the world of domination and a world of freedom and well-being.

One might object that historical and theological re-constructions of the Historical-Jesus that are conceptualized as rhetorical practices of memory function as "myth," that is, as stories of "pristine" beginnings because they again place Jesus the great individual at the center of attention. However, such an objection overlooks the different power relations that determine hegemonic and critical feminist interests in Historical-Jesus research. It also neglects that the interest of historical re-construction understood in terms of memory is not the same as that of neo-orthodox canonical apologetic interpretation or the liberal quest for the historical Jesus, the "great heroic individual." It is not the same because its rhetoric is neither that of scientific positivism nor that of normative identity construction. Rather, it seeks to understand the Historical-Jesus in terms of Sandra Harding's second stage of scientific research where reflection upon the effects of science is part of the condition of science itself.<sup>62</sup>

---

<sup>61</sup> See In Memory of Her, 92: "The sociological-theological model for the reconstruction of the early Christian movement suggested here should, therefore, not be misread as that of a search for true, pristine, orthodox beginnings which have been corrupted either by early Catholicism or by 'heresy,' nor should it be seen as an argument for an institutional patriarchalization absolutely necessary for the historical survival of Christianity. The model used here is that of social interaction and religious transformation, of Christian 'vision' and historical realization, of struggle for equality and against patriarchal domination." See also my retrospect "Re-visioning Christian Origins: In Memory of Her Revisited," in Christian Beginnings: Worship, Belief and Society, ed. Kieran O'Mahony (London: Continuum International, 2003), 225–250.

<sup>62</sup> Wolfgang van den Daele, "The Social Construction of Science," in The Social

2. Transforming Historical-Jesus Research

The following four methodological issues are controverted but crucial for the transformation of Historical-Jesus research from a purely technical and value-neutral science to one that is socially progressive and feminist which I will discuss with respect to others' and my own approach: the understanding of language and text as rhetorical, the question of "criteria of authenticity," the chosen systemic analytic, and the critical reflection on reconstructive models.

2.1. The Rhetoricity of Language and Texts

A foundational methodological contribution of critical feminist studies to social theory and scientific understanding consists of the recognition of the rhetoricity and kyriocentric function of grammatically masculine, so-called generic language. As postmodern literary theory, so also critical feminist theory questions and renders problematic the understanding of language presupposed by Historical-Jesus research which tends to understand androcentric, or, better, kyriocentric, language as a window to the world of the Historical-Jesus and to presuppose that texts reflect and represent reality objectively. However, kyriocentric language does not simply reflect reality but constructs and prescribes it. It creates the symbolic worlds that it pretends to depict. Language is not just descriptive-reflective-pragmatic but also prescriptive-performative-political. Kyriocentric language serves kyriarchal interests; conversely, kyriarchal interests determine the meanings of kyriocentric language.

Grammatically masculine languages such as Hebrew, Greek or Latin function as generic languages that supposedly include wo/men under terms such as men, disciples, or Jews. They mention wo/men explicitly only if they are exceptions, pose a problem, or if individuals need to be marked by gender identification. Thus kyriocentric languages not only inscribe and prescribe gender but also other hierarchies of domination. Since, for instance, slave wo/men are subsumed under slaves and Jewish wo/men under Jews, they are effectively made invisible in our historical source "data." How grammatically masculine generic languages are to be understood can only be decided with reference to the social reality which in turn is linguistically produced. The texts about wo/men are like the tip of an iceberg indicating what we have lost but they are not comprehensive reflections of reality.

---

Production of Scientific Knowledge, ed. Everett Mendelsohn, Peter Weingart, and Richard Whitley (Dordrecht: Reidel, 1977), 38.

Hence, on feminist methodological grounds the topical approach that focuses on “Jesus and women” has been problematized. Nevertheless, books on “Jesus and Women” seem to proliferate and works of the Third Quest still “segregate” wo/men and read only the women passages as referring to them as though wo/men did not belong to the disciples of Jesus or to the members of other Jewish movements. For instance, after discussing the Jesus movement in general Theissen and Merz have a special section on women.<sup>63</sup> Stegemann and Stegemann<sup>64</sup> in turn headline their two special sections on women with “women among the followers of Jesus” assuming the generic masculine for followers of Jesus. Such an “add and stir” approach is well intended but continues to marginalize wo/men by reinscribing the ideological tendencies of kyriocentric language.

Social-scientific Jesus research continues to neglect the methodological problem posed by the recognition of kyriocentric language because it does not recognize and adapt a feminist social analysis that can lay open the structures of domination in antiquity and today. Following Max Weber, scientific Historical-Jesus accounts understand language as transparent and do not recognize the possible gap between subjective meanings and objective social practices. The andro-kyriocentric text becomes script in a positivistic posture of Historical-Jesus research that pretends to describe the “real” Jesus or “what actually happened.” The gaps, omissions, breaks, and partial truths of the andro-kyriocentric text are filled in with reference to the conventions, knowledges, and practices of a kyriarchal society which are not interrogated but understood as common sense. The literary critic Catherine Belsey has identified such a scientific-positivist understanding of language as “expressive realism”:

The strategies of the classic realist text divert the reader from what is contradictory within it to the renewed recognition (misrecognition) of what he or she already ‘knows’, knows because the myth and signifying systems of the classic realist text re-present experience in the ways in which it is conventionally articulated in our society.<sup>65</sup>

---

<sup>63</sup> Gerd Theissen and Anette Merz, The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1998).

<sup>64</sup> Ekkehard W. Stegemann and Wolfgang Stegemann, The Jesus Movement: A Social History of the First Century (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress 1999).

<sup>65</sup> Catherine Belsey, Critical Practice (New York: Methuen, 1980), 128.

According to Belsey such “expressive realism” is at home in the period of industrial capitalism. Itumeleng Mosala in turn has pointed out that such “expressive realism” is also operative in social-scientific biblical research and works hand in glove with neo-capitalist tendencies of reification.<sup>66</sup>

In short, I argue, scientific Jesus research still needs to recognize that androcentric language and kyriocentric knowledge are rhetorical and perspectival, that is, they are articulated by certain people for a certain audience and readership and they operate grammatically with certain articulated or unacknowledged kyriarchal interests. Hence an intra- and intertextual analysis of language and text does not suffice. It must be bolstered by a critical-systemic analysis of religious-political structures of domination.

In light of the ideology-critical feminist analysis of language and symbolic worlds that normalize and legitimate socio-political and religious systems of domination as “common sense,” scientific Historical-Jesus research can no longer claim to tell us “what really happened” as the subtitle “Discovering What Happened...” of Crossan’s The Birth of Christianity<sup>67</sup> promises. It can no longer assert that it describes the reality of the Historical-Jesus as objectively and scientifically as possible. Instead, scientific Historical-Jesus studies must critically reflect on the social theories that shape their work in order to make good on their claim to scientific objectivity.

2.2. Sources and Criteria of “Authenticity”

The generative discursive problem that Historical-Jesus research seeks to overcome or fruitfully transform is the simple fact that the Christian canon has not one but four gospels—that is, four quite different narratives about Jesus. Moreover, there are many other gospel writings that did not make it into the canon but must be used as historical sources.<sup>68</sup> It is the hermeneutical problem posed by the multiplicity of the gospels and source-traditions that has spawned attempts to reduce the pluriform gospels to one uniform gospel message or to reconstruct a unified picture of Jesus. In addition, the linguistic turn in biblical studies has driven home that texts do not have a single, definite meaning and a “final solution.”<sup>69</sup> The rhetoricity of discourse understands the textuality of texts as a construct rather than as a mirror reflecting pre-existing reality. Language is not a mere vehicle for the transmission of social and historical facts but the producer of meaning.

<sup>66</sup> Itumeleng Mosala, “Social Scientific Approaches to the Bible: One Step Forward, Two Steps Backward,” Journal of Theology for Southern Africa 55 (1986): 15–30.

<sup>67</sup> Dominic Crossan, The Birth of Christianity: Discovering What Happened Immediately After the Execution of Jesus (New York: HarperCollins, 1998).

<sup>68</sup> Whereas Historical Jesus scholars generally agree on using the reconstructed source Q, they are divided in their evaluation and use of extra-canonical sources. However, the exclusion or inclusion of, for instance, the Gospel of Thomas in one’s source base leads to quite different reconstructions of the Historical Jesus.

Archival and other sources, therefore, are not just quarries for factual information but transmit historical meaning produced by scholars. In short, the rhetoricity of our sources poses the rhetorical problem that Historical-Jesus research seeks to overcome. Such an understanding of text and language as rhetorical and constructive challenges the epistemological dichotomy between scientific and creative writing, between fact and fiction. In light of the linguistic turn to rhetoric, the Third Quest for the Historical-Jesus therefore seems to be a step backwards from the methodological achievement of redaction and narrative criticism, since it appears to be less apt to do justice to the textuality and rhetoricity of our canonical and extra-canonical sources.

Historical-Jesus research has developed criteria of authenticity<sup>70</sup> for adjudicating the multivoiced information of our sources. The Second Quest, dubbed the New Quest by James Robinson, has insisted that it is possible to extract or distill the Historical-Jesus from early Christian sources like a kernel from a husk. In order to be regarded as authentic, words and deeds of Jesus must firstly, be documented in more than one source (the criterion of multiple attestation). Secondly they must not be found in the Jewish culture of the time or be explainable as stemming from the interests of the early church (the double dissimilarity or difference—criterion which would be better called the exclusivity—criterion). And thirdly they must cohere with the material previously judged as authentic (the coherence criterion).<sup>71</sup> In other words, the Second Quest adopts a reductionist historical method which does not <sup>69</sup> See, e.g., Alicia Suskin Ostriker, Feminist Revision and the Bible (Cambridge: Blackwell, 1993).

---

<sup>70</sup> Cf. Tom Holmén, “Doubts about Double Dissimilarity: Restructuring the Main Criterion of Jesus-of-History Research,” in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. Bruce Chilton and Craig A. Evans (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 47–80.

<sup>71</sup> Norman Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (New York: Harper & Row, 1967), 39–40, who has labeled the criterion of exclusivity as criterion of dissimilarity.

take into account the fact that historiography must evaluate and place texts and artifacts into a coherent frame of meaning or reconstructive model in order to tell a story about Jesus that makes sense. All history is a reconstruction.

Moreover, this reductionist method assumes that Jesus is totally different from both Judaism and from his followers, the early churches. He is the totally Other. In order to establish the historical uniqueness of Jesus and his ethics, the Second Quest, like the First, needed a negative depiction of Judaism as its foil. Jesus supposedly knew that his teaching undermined the fundamentals of Jewish belief. The Roman imperial authority allegedly executed him because of his conflict with a ritualistic and legalistic Judaism. This anti-Jewish framework has also determined many studies on "Jesus and Women" and is still operative in many popular works.<sup>72</sup>

Since the Third Quest justifiably has rejected the Second Quest's reductionistic criteria of authenticity and has placed Jesus firmly in his Jewish context, it needed to develop new methods and criteria of evaluation. To that end the Jesus Seminar, whose members are mostly white male and Christian,<sup>73</sup> has adopted forms of opinion research and voting practices in order to stratify the traditions about Jesus. Other scholars have developed the plausibility criterion, which judges materials as authentic on the grounds of whether their content can be made plausible historically and be understood as fitting into the time and culture of Jesus.<sup>74</sup>

However, this criterion overlooks that what is regarded as "common sense" or plausible in a culture depends on the hegemonic ideological understandings of "how the world is." For instance, the assumption that wo/men were marginal or second class citizens in all forms of first-century Judaism makes it impossible to assert plausibly that they were

---

<sup>72</sup> See my discussion in Jesus: Miriam's Child, Sophia's Prophet: Critical Issues in Feminist Christology (New York: Continuum, 1994), 67–96.

<sup>73</sup> For the intent of the Jesus Seminar and the controversy surrounding it see Mark Allan Powell, Jesus as a Figure in History: How Modern Historians View the Man from Galilee (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 1998), 65–82.

<sup>74</sup> This hermeneutical circle between a preconstructed image of Jesus and evaluations of individual texts is recognized by Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter, Die Kriterienfrage in der Jesusforschung: Vom Differenzkriterium zum Plausibilitätskriterium (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997), 206: "Ein zutreffendes historisches Gesamtbild ist eine Idealvorstellung, ein Grenzwert, dem wir uns immer nur in Form von Plausibilität annähern können." However, they do not critically question the plausibility criterion on the basis of this insight.

equal members in the Jesus movement if one understands it as a Jewish movement. The inability of such discourses to plausibly discuss the possibility of understanding the Jesus movement as a Jewish movement that sought to abolish kyriarchal domination and believed in the basic equality of all the children of G*d not only bespeaks antifeminist but also anti-Jewish tendencies since it can not imagine egalitarian tendencies within Judaism.

Hence, I have suggested that the reductionist double criterion of dissimilarity or exclusivity of the Second Quest and the conservative criterion of plausibility of the Third Quest should be replaced with the criterion of “historical possibility.” What is “thinkable” or “possible” historically must be adjudicated in terms of an emancipatory reconstructive model of early Christian beginnings and how it utilizes its source-information and materials. Instead of asking whether it is likely or plausible that wo/men shaped the Jesus-traditions, one must ask if it is historically possible and thinkable that they did so. This shift requires scholars to prove that such a possibility did not exist at the time. To make such an argument would presuppose that scholars have studied not only hegemonic historical formations but also the emancipatory elements in Greco-Roman and Jewish societies. In using the criterion of historical possibility one must, however, be careful not to answer it with reference to what is deemed “plausible” and “common sense” truism.<sup>75</sup>

Such a change of theoretical framework from one that uncritically reinscribes “what has happened” to one that imagines “what was historically possible” makes it conceivable that the agency and leadership of Jewish and Roman, free and enslaved, rich and poor, elite and marginal wo/men could have shaped the Jesus traditions and early Christian beginnings. Those who hold the opposite view, for instance that slave wo/men or Jewish wo/men were not active shapers of early Christian life, would have to argue their point. A feminist reconstructive historical model of egalitarian possibility, I suggested with In Memory of Her, is able to place the beginnings of the Galilean prophetic-wisdom-basileia movement around Jesus within a broader cultural-religious historical frame of reference. It allows us to trace the tensions and struggles between emancipatory understandings and movements inspired by the radical democratic logic of equality on the one hand and the dominant kyriarchal structures of society and religion in antiquity on the other.

---

<sup>75</sup> This is the primary mode of arguing by Stegemann and Stegemann, The Jesus Movement, 361–409, when discussing wo/men’s leadership in the Jesus movement.

A possible emancipatory reconstruction of early Christian beginnings as egalitarian does not mean that the extant early Christian sources do not also allow for a hegemonic kyriarchal reconstruction of the Jesus movements. The opposite is the case because all of our sources are written in andro-kyriocentric language and by the historical winners. It only means that one needs to show methodologically that a feminist egalitarian reconstruction is “possible,” if one reads the extant sources with a hermeneutics of suspicion, and that it is preferable with respect to the Christian identity construction which Historical-Jesus research engenders. In other words, scholars no longer can justify their reconstructive readings in a positivist scientific fashion but need to stand accountable for them and their political functions in light of the values and visions they have promoted in the past and continue to promote today.

2.3. Systemic Analysis

From its beginnings social-scientific research has worked with the analytic category of patriarchy, particularly Ernst Troeltsch’s notion of love-patriarchalism,<sup>76</sup> but it has never developed this category theoretically. For instance, the macrosociological societal model of Gerhard Lenski is widely used in Historical-Jesus studies but this model does not consider patriarchal relations of domination. Rather, it seeks to model how to balance the twin warring emphases of functional and conflictual analysis within the social sciences. Functionalists emphasize common interests, common advantages, consensus and cooperation; conflictualists emphasize dividing interests, domination, exploitation, and coercion.<sup>77</sup>

Whereas Stegemann and Stegemann, for example, acknowledge Mayer-Schärtel’s contention that the introduction of gender analysis would change Lenski’s model,<sup>78</sup> they themselves do not make such changes.<sup>79</sup>

---

<sup>76</sup> Ernst Troeltsch, The Social Teachings of the Christian Churches (New York: Macmillan, 1931), 1–19.

<sup>77</sup> Crossan, The Birth of Christianity, 153.

<sup>78</sup> They refer to her dissertation (cf. Barbara Mayer-Schärtel, “Die Frau ist in jeder Hinsicht schwächer als der Mann”: Eine sozialgeschichtliche und kulturanthropologische Untersuchung zum Frauenbild des Josephus [Neuendettelsau, 1994]) but not to her published work.

<sup>79</sup> Stegemann and Stegemann, The Jesus Movement, 65–67.

Crossan also recognizes that Lenski's model does not structure gender into its typology but argues that it does not do so because it is a model of social class.<sup>80</sup> He seeks to remedy this by integrating Lenski's model with an anthropological model of gender roles that was developed in the late 1970's. This model is therefore not able to take into account the extensive feminist discussions on the sex/gender system which have taken place in the last decade.

While in the 1970's feminist theorists used as key analytic categories androcentrism/gender (= male-female dualism) and patriarchy (= the domination of the father/male over women) and distinguished between sex and gender roles, such a dualistic gender analysis has been seriously questioned by feminist theorists in the 1980's and 1990's who have pointed to the multiplicative, intersecting structures of domination determining wo/men's lives. In order to theorize structures of domination in antiquity and the multiplicative intersection of gender, race, class, and ethnicity in modernity, I have sought to articulate a heuristic model that replaces the notion of patriarchy/patriarchalism with that of kyriarchy as a key analytic category. While at first glance this model seems to be similar to Lenski's it is not a simple class or "dual systems" model. This can be seen if one looks at Lenski's class stratification model as developed by Stegemann and Stegemann in light of a kyriarchal stratification model.

Kyriarchy means the domination of the lord, slave master, husband, elite freeborn educated and propertied man over all wo/men and subaltern men. It is to be distinguished from kyriocentrism which has the ideological function of naturalizing and legitimating not just gender but all forms of domination. Kyriarchal relations of domination are built on elite male property rights over wo/men and other subordinates as well as wo/men's dependency, subordination, obedience, and second class citizenship.

Hence, it is important to see gender as one among several systems of domination and to conceptualize the formation of gender in terms of power relations. Gender is structured and constructed as it is because it serves to sustain the hegemonic sexual/economic/racial/cultural/national/religious unequal distribution of power and wealth. If Historical-Jesus research would recognize and work with the analytic concept of kyriarchy, it would be able not only to analyze its own imbrication with colonialist and Christian western elite male interests but also construct its key analytic model of Mediterranean society and culture differently.

---

<sup>80</sup> Stegemann and Stegemann, The Jesus Movement, 151.

Kyriocentric ideology and systemic kyriarchy is not characteristic of only modern western societies. Already Aristotle had argued that the freeborn, propertied, educated Greek man is the highest of moral beings and that all other members of the human race are defined by their functions in his service. Kyriarchal relations of domination and subordination are explicitly articulated in western political philosophy in the context of Greek democracy and Roman imperialism. They have been mediated by Christian scriptural-theological traditions and have decisively determined modern kyriarchal forms and ideologies of democracy.

It is often maintained that the re-constructive model of Mediterranean society that works with the dualism of “honor-shame” adequately describes the reality of the ancient world. In using it, researchers are supposedly protected from projecting their own modern ideas and presuppositions unto the past. However, this maneuver obscures that Mediterranean society in antiquity would be more adequately comprehended with the social analytic of kyriarchy since the dualism “honor-shame” is only one, though an important, feature of the kyriarchal ethos of antiquity.

Mediterranean area studies that stress “honor-shame” culture not only fail to adequately describe the ancient world, they also prevent contemporary interpreters from engaging in “cross-cultural” dialogue because they project the “honor-shame” system onto “other” cultures but do not explore it for their own cultural context. Such studies identify Mediterranean culture as a totally alien culture. This culture allegedly favors being over doing, cultural dyadic relations over individualism, the present or past over the future, subordination over mastery, a view of human nature as a mixture of good and bad elements over a view of human nature as exclusively good or bad.<sup>81</sup> For instance, Pilch and Malina argue:

Thus in the United States, males generally are expected [emphasis added] to achieve (doing) and only secondarily permit themselves to be spontaneous (being), women in general are primarily expected to be spontaneous, and only secondarily to be dedicated to achieving. In Mediterranean society relative to this same area of concern, men are primarily socialized to spontaneity, while women are primarily socialized to achievement, doing, “work.”<sup>82</sup>

---

<sup>81</sup> John J. Pilch and Bruce J. Malina, eds., Biblical Social Values and Their Meaning (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1993), xxii.

<sup>82</sup> Pilch and Malina, eds., Biblical Social Values, xxiii–xxiv.

By constructing this dualistic oppositions the authors effectively re-inscribe gender dualism as a social reality and as a fact rather than problematizing it as an ideological structure.

Halvor Moxnes concedes that those cultural anthropologists who have initiated Mediterranean studies have more recently distanced themselves from the understanding of the Mediterranean as a “fixed cultural area.” Yet, despite recognizing the constructedness of the “Mediterranean,” he nevertheless insists on gender dualism as its main characteristic:

But it is the specific relationship between the honor-and-shame code and male and female roles, that has been put forward as distinctive for the Mediterranean region. It is this theory that is at the center of the current discussion. Both linguistically and conceptually languages in the Mediterranean divide the world into masculine and feminine domains, and “male” and “female” thus become metaphors for other types of divisions.<sup>83</sup>

It is curious that Moxnes does not reflect on the fact that not just Mediterranean languages but all western languages are gendered and as such “divide the world up into masculine and feminine.” Hence, such a relationship is not distinct to Mediterranean cultures but is a characteristic of kyriarchal western cultures. Rather than problematize this reconstructive model of the Mediterranean, the Social-Scientific Context Group insists that one can engage in intercultural dialogue and avoid ethnocentrism only if one constructs the Mediterranean biblical world as totally different from our own. Thus they juxtapose biblical and US culture as exclusive opposites, without recognizing that much of US culture operates by honor-shame as do Native, European, African, or Asian cultures.

If one were to use not a contrast but an equivalence analogical model of re-construction one could see that “honor-shame” as well as its concomitant gender dualism are not particular to Mediterranean biblical culture. Most of the characteristics listed by Pilch and Malina as pertaining to Mediterranean culture could also be found in US culture if one looked at both cultures in terms of kyriarchal relations of domination. Moreover, one cannot simply compare cultures without taking the intersection of race, class, gender, ethnicity, and social locations into account.

Rather than construct the dualistic binaries Mediterranean-US culture, past and present culture, one needs to look at kyriarchal domination and democratic equality in both the Mediterranean biblical and our own contemporary cultures. If one were to pay attention to changing relations of kyriarchal domination one could trace their change throughout western history, albeit in ever varying forms. Gender dualism is not something peculiar to Mediterranean culture but is produced by all socio-cultural systems of domination.

---

<sup>83</sup> Halvor Moxnes, “Honor and Shame,” in The Social Sciences and New Testament Interpretation, ed. Richard L. Rohrbaugh (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1996), 33.

In addition, both historical-critical and social-scientific studies presuppose almost as a dogma that a deep chasm exists between people of the past and people of today.<sup>84</sup> The interpretive model used by critical-historical and social-scientific studies is not that of the neighbor or the ancestor but that of the alien. According to this hermeneutical model the people of the first century are not just foreigners but “aliens” who come from a different world. This distancing move, however, obscures on the one hand that we can comprehend historical worlds and societies only through the means of contemporary languages, perceptions, theories, or analogies, and on the other hand that history is written by and for people today about people of the past.

To think of the past in terms of neighbor would prevent us from turning the other into the same and at the same time allow us to appreciate and respect the other as different. To replace the model of the “other” with that of the “neighbor” would enable scholars to highlight both the differences and the similarities of past and present cultures and peoples. Insisting on the total otherness of people in antiquity and their cultures obscures the fact that we cannot understand the past if we do not stand in relationship and continuity with it. Heuristic models of the past are always articulated in the present. Whether they are acknowledged as scientific depends not only on their power of persuasion but also on the communicative relations of power in which they are embedded. Hence, social-scientific historiography like any other historiography serves ideological interests and must be accounted for in terms of an ethics of interpretation.

2.4. Reconstructive Models

Scientific Historical-Jesus research often obfuscates the linguistically constructed and prescriptive character of both its kyriocentric language and source materials and its reconstructive models. The reality of the first century looks different, for instance, if one uses a sociological model of integration or if one employs a crisis model with respect to Roman imperialism and hegemonic Greco-Roman culture. It looks different if one describes the relationship of the Jesus movement to its mother culture, Judaism, in terms of an integrative re-constructive model or in terms of a conflictive crisis model. Both assumptions are possible, but result in quite different re-constructions of the Historical-Jesus and in quite different historical scenarios. Equally, the groups affiliated with Jesus look different if they are understood as social movements that are in conflict with the dominant society they seek to transform or if they are understood as sectarian splinter groups in conflict with Judaism.

---

<sup>84</sup> Pieter F. Craffert, “Relationships between Social-Scientific, Literary, and Rhetorical Interpretation of Texts,” BTB 26 (1996): 45–55.

2.4.1. Methodology

According to Malina<sup>85</sup> the method and examination process of social-scientific inquiry recognizes three steps: postulating, testing, and changing the explanatory model. The first step consists of postulating a model (theory, or paradigm). At this point a critical scrutiny of the construction and selection of models becomes necessary. The second step requires testing the model with respect to actual experience in the “real” world, to which the model refers. But, how can a model be tested if it cannot be measured against the experience of the first century, since such actual experience is no longer available to us?

The third step in the process of critical examination consists of changing the model according to one’s test results in order to correct its deficiencies. Here scholars use three types of methodology: social-scientific criticism, polling and stratigraphy. Since social-scientific Jesus research cannot prove its hypotheses with reference to the experience of the Historical-Jesus and his compatriots in the first century CE, the criterion of plausibility or probability is introduced which argues with reference to our knowledge and “common sense” understanding of the world today. However, such a methodological move does not sufficiently take into account that what seems plausible depends on one’s overall understanding of the world. Our “common sense” understandings have ideological and naturalizing functions. Hence, the plausibility or probability criterion is always already implicated in discourses of domination that have become “common sense.”

Moreover, since Jesus scholars are not able to test their theoretical re-constructive models with reference to the Historical-Jesus and his experience, they have developed criteria that would enable them to retrieve as much as possible from the “authentic” historical figure of Jesus. While the Jesus Seminar has resorted to the consumer evaluation model of polling in order to sort out the “authentic” materials about Jesus, Dominic Crossan, one of its leaders, has perfected the archaeological method of stratigraphy as a scientifically controlled means to reconstruct Jesus as a peasant leader who announced the brokerless kingdom.<sup>86</sup>

---

<sup>85</sup> Bruce Malina, The New Testament World: Insights from Cultural Anthropology (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1993).

The scientific method of stratigraphy advocated by Crossan proceeds in a threefold manner: it insists that Historical-Jesus re-constructions must be placed into context by way of Greco-Roman history and cross-cultural anthropology. Crossan, for instance, discusses the Millennialism paradigm as such a cross-cultural model. Then, he argues, one must make a scientific inventory of the Jesus materials and he does so first by dating the sources, secondly by stratifying them into time periods (the first stratum from 30 to 60 CE; the second from 60 to 80 CE, the third from 80 to 120 CE, and the fourth from 120 to 150 CE). Finally, Crossan sorts out and groups the extant materials into one of four categories: those attested only once, those that are independently attested twice or three times and those independently attested more than three times.

In so doing Crossan hopes to determine what materials precisely go back to the Historical-Jesus. It is appropriate, he argues, to begin with the first stratum but to bracket materials that are attested only once in one source. Moreover, in the first stratum “everything is original” until it is argued otherwise.<sup>87</sup> Those materials that go back to Jesus and are deemed to be “authentic” are marked with a plus (+) sign, those that do not are marked with a minus (–) sign and those that do not lend themselves to such “positivistic simplifications”<sup>88</sup> are marked with both signs.

Dale Allison discusses Crossan’s scientific method extensively and deconstructs its procedures point by point. He not only questions the very unstable and inconclusive method of dating but also the chronological delineation of the four stratigraphic layers. For instance, if one were to extend the period of the first stratum to 70 rather than 60 CE and the second to 100 rather than 80 CE the extant sources would need to be evaluated quite differently and hence a different “authentic” Historical-Jesus would emerge. Allison concludes “that we can never

---

<sup>86</sup> John Dominic Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1991), xxvii–xxviii.

<sup>87</sup> Ibid., xxxii.

<sup>88</sup> Ibid., xxxiv.

demonstrate that our sources do in fact contain enough authentic material—however much that might be—to make questing a promising activity.”<sup>89</sup>

2.4.2. The Millenarian Model

Nevertheless Allison does not want to give up the quest for the Historical-Jesus although he is less sure of its scientific character. He goes on to propose the Millenarian movement model for his own re-construction of Jesus as a thoroughly eschatological figure who is best understood in social-scientific terms as a Millenarian prophet. Over and against those who reconstruct a non-eschatological Jesus as, for instance, Burton Mack, Marcus Borg, and Dominic Crossan do, Allison, following the lead of Wrede, Schweizer, and Sanders, paints a picture of a thoroughgoing eschatological Jesus.

This Millenarian or Millennial cross-cultural model is widely utilized in Jesus research.<sup>90</sup> Dennis Duling defines Millennialism as:

A social movement of people whose central belief is that the present oppressive world is in crisis and will soon end, usually by some cataclysmic event, and that this world will be replaced by a new, perfect, blissful and trouble free world, often believed to be a restoration of some perfect time and place of old.<sup>91</sup>

Cultural anthropologists have synthesized this cross-cultural model of Millennialism by isolating “common themes” emerging from different times and places and in diverse social environments. Their social-scientific explanation of Millenarianism is either political, military, economic, heroic (the great man theory), cultural, psychological, or all of these.

Although I agree with Allison’s rigorous critique of the stratigraphic method and his assertion that interpretation and re-construction of the Historical-Jesus must adopt an organizing theoretical framework, I do not think it is methodologically correct to use the social-scientific re-constructive model of Millenarian movements to prove one’s own

---

<sup>89</sup> Dale C. Allison, Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1998), 35.

<sup>90</sup> Dennis C. Duling, “Millennialism,” in The Social Sciences and New Testament Interpretation, ed. Rohrbaugh, 198–201 mentions among others the work of Isenberg, Gager, Horsley, Meeks, Jewett, Theissen, and Kloppenborg for the final version of Q. Cf. also Paul W. Hollenbach, “Recent Historical Jesus Studies and the Social Sciences,” SBLSP (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1983), 61–78; and Bengt Holmberg, Sociology and the New Testament: An Appraisal (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1990).

<sup>91</sup> Duling, “Millennialism,” 183.

re-construction of an eschatological Jesus as he does. In order to corroborate his Millenarian re-construction Allison points to the social-scientific parallel of Millenarian movements. In so doing he stands social-scientific method on its head. Since he cannot test out the social-scientific Millenarian model in light of the “authentic” materials about Jesus which we can never find with historical certainty, he seeks to prove his re-construction of a thoroughgoing eschatological Jesus by parallelizing and “proof-texting” it with reference to the cross-cultural model of Millennialism.<sup>92</sup>

Moreover, all Jesus scholars do not share his stress on imminent eschatology. Marcus Borg,<sup>93</sup> for instance, has argued that the scholarly consensus around the eschatological Jesus is in the process of breaking down. Allison in turn seeks to utilize the model of Millenarian movements in order to halt this breakdown and to reassert the Wrede-Schweitzer-Sanders imminent eschatology tradition.

To adjudicate this debate on the eschatological or non-eschatological Jesus,<sup>94</sup> I suggest, one cannot simply marshal textual evidence in one or the other direction. Instead one must question the theoretical model of Millenarianism. Although the Millenarian research model has been formulated by anthropologists and ethnologists and not primarily by biblical scholars, it still has been formulated by western scholars thinking within a Jewish and Christian symbolic universe though they may have long rejected Christianity or Judaism. It is noteworthy that Christopher Columbus and other discoverers of the “New World” were influenced by Millenarian ideas. As Massynbaerde Ford points out, “Adherents of this eschatological tradition anticipated a new age which would be ushered in by spiritual persons, thus supplying a powerful incentive to colonize the ‘New World.’”<sup>95</sup>

2.4.3. Social Change Movement Model

In light of the discussion on the political function of social anthropology as an academic discipline serving colonialist ends, it is necessary

<sup>92</sup> Allison, Jesus, 81–94.

<sup>93</sup> Marcus Borg, Jesus in Contemporary Scholarship (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1994), 18–43.

<sup>94</sup> For an excellent contextualization of the eschatology debate cf. Melanie Johnson-DeBaufre, Jesus Among Her Children: Q, Eschatology, and the Construction of Christian Origins, HTS 55 (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2005).

<sup>95</sup> Josephine Massynbaerde Ford, “Millenium,” Anchor Bible Dictionary IV (New York: Doubleday, 1992), 834.

to question the Millenarian reconstructive model and to replace it with that of actual “social movements” for change such as the workers’ movement, the Civil Rights movement, the feminist movement, or the ecological movement, among others. While apocalyptic hopes, dreams, and expectations of justice and restoration are central to social movements for change, I have suggested<sup>96</sup> that they have a rhetorical rather than a predictive function. They envision a different world in the interest of mobilizing resistance and revolt against unjust situations and oppressive structures here in the present. To understand social movements and their hopes and dreams the way Millennialism does is to misunderstand their pathos for bringing about justice. Hence, I suggest that in order to serve as an appropriate paradigm for Historical-Jesus research the re-constructive social-scientific model of Millennialism is best replaced with a social-scientific model that focuses on social political movements for change.

In contrast to the scientific construct of Millenarian movement social movements for change are not always inaugurated by a charismatic leader nor do they expect that change will benefit only their own group, the “elect.” For instance, Dr. Martin Luther King did not initiate the Civil Rights movement, nor was it considered to be “his” movement. Rather, he was a part of the Civil Rights movement and provided the rhetorical leadership that galvanized the movement. In a similar fashion, grassroots wo/men’s movements are generally not organized around a single charismatic leader but around a vision for changing situations of injustice and dehumanization. Hence, they provide an historical model for Historical-Jesus research that does not center on Jesus the “great Man” and hero.

How the Millenarian model with its stress on imminent eschatology depoliticizes interpretation can be seen from the ways scholars understand the key notion in Jesus’ preaching, the basileia tou theou. If one looks at the debate on the eschatological or non-eschatological Jesus one is struck by the fact that the leading antagonists E. P. Sanders<sup>97</sup> and Burton Mack<sup>98</sup> agree on one point: Jesus was apolitical and not concerned with changing his social-religious worlds.<sup>99</sup> In such an apolitical reading the basileia tou theou becomes a purely religious eschatological or a

---

<sup>96</sup> See my book Revelation: Vision of a Just World (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1991).

<sup>97</sup> E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985).

<sup>98</sup> Burton L. Mack, A Myth of Innocence: Mark and Christian Origins (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988).

<sup>99</sup> Borg, Jesus in Contemporary Scholarship, 21.

non-eschatological ethical notion. For instance, Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz argue that God's kingdom is the establishment of his ethical will, the kingdom is to be understood dynamically as rule. . . . If the "kingdom of God" is an image for the establishment of God's ethical will, there is even more of a demand on the human ethical will.<sup>100</sup>

Since the "kingdom" extends into the realm of death because the dead ancestors are envisioned as sharing its eschatological table community, Theissen and Merz conclude that it is certainly not a "political kingdom" but "a religious expectation with political relevance."<sup>101</sup> Hence, over and against Perrin,<sup>102</sup> they argue that the basileia of G*d is not a symbol and does not refer to any well-defined myth. Instead, it is a "living metaphor." While an apolitical reading of the basileia of G*d as metaphor or religious symbol is possible if the issue is articulated as the problem of whether Jesus' preaching was eschatological or non-eschatological, it is not possible if one foregrounds the aspect of social movement, since social movements only emerge if there is an actual or perceived crisis and a need for socio-political change. However, one must be careful not to apply such a crisis model primarily to Judaism but rather to its domination by Roman imperialism. Depoliticizing the Millenarian model unavoidably leads to Christian anti-Jewish re-constructions of the Jesus movements.

While most scholars agree that basileia tou theou is central to the message of Jesus and hence represents the "authentic" Jesus, they disagree on the translation of the term and its meaning context. With Theissen and Merz the majority of scholars understand basileia to mean "kingly rule and reign," although we have clear instances where Jesus speaks of it in a spatial sense as "entering the basileia." In this interpretation G*d becomes the king and sovereign whose will is law and must be obeyed. Such a stress on G*d's kingly ruling is often explicated in terms of domination.

In contrast, a translation of basileia in a spatial sense as "royal realm," or in a collective sense as "kingdom," focuses on the people who constitute the basileia because according to ancestral tradition Israel was a covenant partner, a “kingdom of priests” (Exod 19:6; Isa 61:6).<sup>103</sup> That is, this tradition speaks in monarchical symbols about a radical egalitarian democratic polity. Still, such a political translation of basileia further depends on its meaning context. If basileia is contextualized in terms of Millennialism’s imminent or thorough-going eschatology it becomes a vision of the “other world,” a vision of “pie in the sky” that perpetually is disappointed by historical developments.

<sup>100</sup> Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1998; German, 1996), 275.

<sup>101</sup> Theissen and Merz, Historical Jesus, 276.

<sup>102</sup> I surmise this inference since their text does not refer to Norman Perrin, Jesus and the Language of the Kingdom (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976), who adopted the symbol theory of Wheelwright and argued that the "kingdom of G*d" was a tensive symbol of ancestral range.

However, it has been convincingly argued that none of the early basileia sayings attributed to Jesus bespeaks such an otherworldly expectation.<sup>104</sup> Hence the meaning of basileia must be contextualized differently. If contextualized in the socio-political paradigm of social and religious movements for justice, basileia becomes a critical political term. Its meaning context is the Roman imperial system, which also was termed basileia, and Israelite liberation movements. Basileia becomes the hallmark of the movement around Jesus as an anti-imperialist egalitarian movement that seeks change for all those living at the bottom of the kyriarchal pyramid of domination—the poor, the dehumanized, the powerless, the outsiders and wo/men.

The crucial question in this contextual model of social movement is not whether Jesus and the movements gathered in his name did or did not expect the imminent end of the world. Rather, the crucial research question is whether they were compelled by a vision of a basileia different from that of the Roman Empire, a basileia that would radically change the oppressive situations in which they found themselves and that demanded the abolishment of all status privileges among them.

2.4.2. In Conclusion

I have suggested a social-movements-for-change model as an alternative to Millennialism that allows one to reconstruct the movements gathered in Jesus’ name that inspire political-religious change rather than spiritualizing and de-politicizing them. Social-scientific Historical-Jesus study would become more rather than less scientific and objective if it would engage critical feminist questions and methodologies. Critical feminist Jesus studies bring to the conversation their insistence on a hermeneutics of suspicion that scrutinizes the ideological frameworks and political functions of research in the discourses of domination as well as their engagement of a hermeneutics of re-construction that places wo/men in the center of attention. I have offered here methodological reflections that would facilitate such a collaboration of critical feminist and socio-cultural-religious Historical-Jesus research in the interest of emancipation and liberation.

---

<sup>103</sup> See my dissertation Priester für Gott: Zum Herrschafts- und Priestermotiv in der Apokalypse (Münster: Aschendorff, 1972); as well as Sheldon R. Isenberg, “Millenarianism in Greco-Roman Palestine,” Religion 4 (1974): 26–46; idem, “Power through Temple and Torah in Greco-Roman Palestine,” in Christianity, Judaism, and Other Greco-Roman Cults, ed. Jacob Neusner, vol. 3 (Leiden: Brill, 1975), 24–52; and Jacob Neusner’s extensive work, especially his First Century Judaism in Crisis (Nashville: Abingdon, 1975).

<sup>104</sup> Borg, Jesus in Contemporary Scholarship, 69–97.

HISTORICAL SKEPTICISM AND THE CRITERIA OF JESUS RESEARCH: MY ATTEMPT TO LEAP OVER LESSING'S UGLY WIDE DITCH<sup>1</sup>

GERD THEISSEN

The subtitle of this essay may perhaps suggest that there exists a kind of theological sport: “competitive jumping across Lessing’s ditch”—i.e., over the deep ditch of historical criticism. But this is a sport with no winners. No one has yet succeeded in leaping over this ditch; despite various approach runs, everyone up to now has landed in it. But then one discovers something unexpected: the ditch may be full of water, but it is fun to swim in it. This is why I would like to invite the reader to spring into the ditch. We will reach the far bank, not in a competitive leap, but by swimming. We may perhaps need a helping hand to draw us up onto the shore, but we must not refuse to take hold of that hand. This metaphor makes my most important point; let us therefore take a little time to interpret the image and comment on it.

What ditch is this, and what are its dimensions? It is the ditch between historical knowledge and faith. Faith is absolute certainty, a courage for life and for death, which is based on the person of Jesus and bears the imprint of this person. However, all that we know about Jesus is mediated by historical sources, and their interpretation will always remain a matter of dispute. Our knowledge of Jesus is more or less hypothetical, for one can always say: things may have been different. Faith, however, affirms apodictically: this is how things are. The problem is: how can conditional historical knowledge become the basis of unconditional certainty?

This was the problem Lessing tackled when he published his little treatise Über den Beweis des Geistes und der Kraft in 1777. He was not a radical skeptic in his evaluation of the traditions about Jesus, but he was aware that there are no necessary judgments in the sphere of historical science. There are only “accidental truths of history,” which always entail the reservation that things may in fact have been different. Lessing’s age knew unconditional certainty only in the form of “necessary truths of reason,” and he saw a deep gulf separating the two: “Accidental truths of history can never become the proof of necessary truths of reason.” In the face of this gulf, he cried out: “This, this is the nasty wide ditch that I cannot cross, no matter how often and seriously I have attempted to leap. If anyone can help me get across to the other side, then let him do so; I ask him, indeed I beseech him. He will earn his reward from God for what he does for me.”<sup>2</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> This essay first appeared in English under the title “Historical Scepticism and the Criteria of Jesus Research,” SJT 49 (1996): 147–176. A revised German version was published in G. Theissen and D. Winter, Die Kriterienfrage in der Jesusforschung: Vom Differenzkriterium zum Plausibilitätskriterium, NTOA 34 (Freiburg: Universitätsverlag; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997), 233–269. The present essay was translated by Brian McNeil from a subsequent revised and expanded version: “Historische Skepsis und Jesusforschung. Oder: Meine Versuche über Lessings garstigen breiten Graben zu springen,” in Gerd Theissen, Jesus als historische Gestalt: Beiträge zur Jesusforschung, ed. Annette Merz, FRLANT 202 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2003), 327–363.

After more than two centuries of historical-critical research, the ditch has grown deeper, longer, and broader.

First, the ditch has grown deeper. The historical criticism of sources has become more radical. Anyone who has read historical-critical scholarship knows that all the sources about Jesus are the work of human beings; they are one-sided, tendentious, and may perhaps be unhistorical in many ways. We will never have the opportunity to check these sources against the events themselves; all we can do is to compare them with other sources, but these in turn are one-sided and tendentious. Historical knowledge is a fallible reconstruction based on fallible sources.

Secondly, the ditch has become more complicated. Even if we possessed an historically accurate picture of Jesus and knew that this is how things were—and not otherwise—we would still be faced with a second problem, viz. that everything we know about Jesus is derivable knowledge, in the sense that it has analogies and genealogies. Everything is embedded in an historical context; nothing is absolute. The problem of historical relativism threatens to dissolve the uniqueness of Jesus. The ditch which leads to him, leads us in fact into a labyrinth of ditches in which everything is connected with everything else, and we cannot find the path to the exit.

---

<sup>2</sup> Cf. G. E. Lessing, Über den Beweis des Geistes und der Kraft, in Lessings Werke III, Schriften II, ed. K. Wölfel (Frankfurt: Insel, 1967), 307–312, with the commentary by K. Beyschlag, ibid., 638–640; the metaphor of the “ditch” is found on p. 311 (ET: B.McN.). Lessing makes two linked distinctions. First, there is the rationalistic distinction between necessary truths of reason and accidental truths of history, which goes back to Leibniz’s distinction between vérités de fait and vérités de raison. Secondly, within the vérités de fait, there is a distinction between those facts which we can directly experience, and those facts which we know only through the mediation of witnesses and sources. This distinction comes from an empiricist tradition. Lessing would be happy if facts which are indirectly attested were confirmed by substantial analogies that many could directly experience today—for example, if miracles were performed not only in the days of Jesus, but at the present day too. The tension between the rationalistic and the empiricist ways of thinking is emphasized by L. P. Wessel, G. E. Lessing’s Theology: A Reinterpretation: A Study in the Problematic Nature of the Enlightenment (The Hague: Mouton, 1977), 106–108, 119–121. A. Schilson offers a short sketch of Lessing’s theology in Lessings Christentum, KVR 1463 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1980).

Thirdly, the ditch has grown broader, as an experiment will show: let us suppose for a moment that we could solve the problem of historical relativism, i.e. that we could identify something completely distinctive, underivable, and unique in the traditions about Jesus. We would still have the problem of historical distance: the Jesus who drove out demons and prophesied the end of the world belongs to a vanished ancient world, and every day that passes puts a greater distance between his world and ours. The academic ethos of every historian entails the acknowledgment that Jesus' world is alien to us. The historian fears nothing so much as the accusation that he is modernizing Jesus<sup>3</sup> and interpreting him on the principle that, "if one understands Jesus correctly, he was basically saying all along what I myself think to be true." We must take seriously the foreignness and the otherness of Jesus.

These three problems which I have sketched briefly—the problems of the historical criticism of sources, of historical relativism, and of historical distance—explain why no one can leap over Lessing's ditch. No one can win the gold medal in the theological discipline which might be defined as "competitive jumping across Lessing's ditch." But what are we in fact looking for, when we attempt to leap over the ditch? What would be the first prize in such a competition? We are looking for certainty about an historical person, in order responsibly to base a religious interpretation of life and an existential praxis on this person. This means that we are in fact asking two questions: the historical question of how we can come into contact with history, and the religious question of how we can come into contact with God. Lessing made a distinction between the two questions, but they go together in the Christian faith. The question is whether historical certainty is the necessary but insufficient condition for establishing religious faith. Does this faith find its starting point in historical certainties, and then go beyond these—while remaining vulnerable, if the historical events should in fact turn out to have been otherwise than they have been presented to us up to now?

---

<sup>3</sup> H. J. Cadbury, The Peril of Modernizing Jesus (New York: Macmillan, 1937; London: SPCK, 1962).

Would one then be compelled to understand the faith in a new and different manner? Or can the two questions be combined differently? Is it a necessary condition for the Christian faith that one comes into contact with God—and a sufficient condition, that one links this religious certainty to an historical character? In this case, is it irrelevant to what extent this character is genuinely historical? Could it be enough for this character to touch our history in some way or other—even if this point of contact is shrouded in myth and legend? Since two questions are involved in the search for historical and religious certainty, we will discuss these in turn. We ask first: is there an historical certainty in Jesus research that can become the basis of religious certainty? Then we reverse the question, and ask: is there a religious certainty in the relationship to the biblical Jesus that can be convincingly linked to historical knowledge?

1. The Possibility of Historical Certainty in Jesus Research

How did Lessing solve the problem? He held that the personal certainty which he sought could be generated only by the agreement of accidental historical facts with the “necessary truths of reason,” i.e. by truths which the reader of the historical sources possesses a priori. He saw the commandment to love as one such obvious truth of reason. This convinced him even in the form of the unhistorical legend of the testament of John, which is said to have consisted of only a few words: “My little children, love one another!”<sup>4</sup> Lessing’s solution cannot be ours, for the simple reason that we doubt the very existence of necessary truths of reason (with the exception of formal and tautological sentences). Nevertheless, our solution can begin with his. We can summarize the theoretical presuppositions of this solution in three points.

First, certainty never arises exclusively through external data (whether these be empirical material or historical sources), but only through the agreement of axiomatic convictions in ourselves with accidental external data. Axiomatic convictions (or ideas) are all those propositions which we find it unnecessary to justify. Since we believe that these are never untrue, we use them to justify other propositions. The experience of certainty is generated when already existing certainties are “confirmed” by external data.<sup>5</sup>

---

<sup>4</sup> G. E. Lessing, Das Testament Johannis (1777), in Lessings Werke III, Schriften II, ed. K. Wölfel (Frankfurt: Insel, 1967), 313–318.

Secondly, axiomatic convictions which make certainty possible are not innate in history, but are acquired in an historical process. Convictions which constitute modern historical consciousness in the aftermath of the Enlightenment make the historical “ditch” seem so impassable; these are above all the three convictions sketched above, viz. that all sources are the work of fallible human beings, that all events are embedded in analogies and genealogies, and that no anachronistic projections back into the past can ever grasp the reality of an historical person. We do not acquire these convictions only as a result of our work with concrete sources. Rather, we possess them a priori and bring them to bear on our analysis of the sources. And they prove their value over and over again: these are tried and proven convictions, ideas that have been tested empirically.

Thirdly, we cannot arbitrarily suspend the axioms of the historical consciousness and make faith possible by postulating infallible (inspired) sources, events to which there are no analogies, or eternal truths. We must find certainty in our approach to the historical Jesus, not against our axiomatic convictions, but with them! In what follows, I shall seek to demonstrate how these three axioms contain an inherent dialectic. If one reflects on their own logic, one will see that they also embrace their own antitheses, thereby making possible a self-limitation on historical skepticism, historical relativism, and historical foreignness. This does not of itself make them the basis of a religious certainty, but they no longer form a barrier to such a certainty. We attain those certainties which are in fact accessible to us, not by leaping over the axioms, but by jumping into them, as one jumps into cold water.

The hypothesis which I shall elaborate is that the three axioms of modern historical research are connected to the criteria of Jesus research. These criteria do not indeed form a bridge that would allow us to cross Lessing’s nasty ditch dry-shod, but they are a life belt (so to speak) that will prevent us from drowning as we swim through the waters of the ditch.

Let us recall the criteria which have guided research until now. The criterion of dissimilarity established a minimum of historical and authentic material through a comparison with Judaism and earliest Christianity. This was complemented by the criterion of coherence, which declared as authentic all the traditions whose contents agree with this minimum. The third criterion was the multiple attestation of traditions, which argued for the authenticity of still other traditions, or at any rate made their historicity more probable. I believe that this catalogue of criteria should be replaced by a criterion of historical plausibility. What is to be considered genuine? Not that which is different from the Jewish environment and from earliest Christianity, but that which can be given a plausible Sitz im Leben as an individual phenomenon in its Jewish context, and can plausibly explain the historical impact of Jesus on earliest Christianity.<sup>6</sup> The intention of this new formulation of the criteria is not to replace the old criteria by a completely new set; rather, the elements of the old catalogue are rearranged and supplemented by a greater attention to the historical context and the historical impact. I shall now attempt to show that my new formulation of the criterion of Jesus research corresponds to the basic axiomatic convictions of modern (secular) historical research.

---

<sup>5</sup> On axiomatic convictions, cf. D. Ritschl, “Die Erfahrung der Wahrheit: Die Steuerung von Denken und Handeln durch implizite Axiome,” in Konzepte: Ökumene, Medizin, Ethik. Gesammelte Aufsätze, ed. D. Ritschl (München: Kaiser, 1986), 147–166.

The idea of human imperfection and fallibility finds its appropriate expression in the criterion of "plausible impact." The task of historical research is to interpret sources in such a way that they can be perceived as the consequence of the story to which they bear witness (or of the impact of the authors of these sources). In other words, the task of historical research is not only to relate reconstructed events, but to relate them in such a way that it is possible to comprehend the sources which bear witness to them as the consequence of these events. In Jesus research, therefore, we must explain and interpret the historical impact made by Jesus, as we find this in the form of the sources which bear witness to him. Human imperfection and fallibility mean that these sources never give us a completely coherent picture of events; but it is also rare for the picture to be completely incoherent. We find both elements, and incoherencies are a valuable indicator for us. Where they go back to something that contradicts dominant tendencies in the Christian sources, they are an indicator of historical memory. For example, anything that has survived against the tendency to see in Jesus a divine being, probably goes back to the historical Jesus. This is the old criterion of dissimilarity vis-à-vis earliest Christianity, now made concrete (as a sub-criterion of the plausibility of historical impact) as the criterion of "running contrary to tendencies.” The other sub-criterion is the evaluation of the agreement in the picture of Jesus which we find in various sources, provided that these are mutually independent. This is the old criterion of coherence. History itself can continue to make an impact through an element that survives in a cross-section of different sources.

---

<sup>6</sup> Cf. Theissen and Winter, Die Kriterienfrage.

The second fundamental axiomatic conviction of modern historical research, the idea of the relativity of all events, finds its expression in the criterion of contextual plausibility. We must relativize all the traditions about Jesus in an historical sense, i.e. locate them within their Jewish context, and then investigate both agreements with this context and divergences from it. Here, we take up the traditional criterion of dissimilarity vis-à-vis Judaism and reformulate it as a criterion of contextual historical individuality. This is the first sub-criterion of contextual plausibility, and it is supplemented by a second sub-criterion, viz. the search for what explicitly agrees or generally accords with the Jewish context. Only that which is conceivable in the concrete Jewish context of the first century of the Common Era can be ascribed to the historical Jesus, who does not stand in history in some “absolute” detachment, but is woven into the history of the Judaism of his period. Precisely this is his “relativity.” And this is precisely what the basic idea of historical relativism postulates for every historical fact in relation to its own specific context.

The third fundamental modern conviction of historical research is that all events have a foreign character a priori, and that we must evaluate events on their own terms, even where they seem to run contrary to our own convictions. This principle does not lead to the formulation of particular criteria. One cannot in the least maintain that, the more foreign an event is, the better its claim to historical authenticity. The autonomy and integrity of history mean that we cannot reconstruct it either as a positive correspondence or as a negative counterfoil to our own historical world, for neither of these would be an evaluation of the past on its own terms. The autonomy of history is appropriately taken into account only when we consciously choose a methodology that can free us from our own preconceptions. In short, this third fundamental conviction of the historical consciousness means that we must keep on looking for new criteria of what is “historical,” and improve and refine these.

This then is how we propose to attempt to get across Lessing’s nasty ditch. We will leap into it, but we will not drown if we follow methodological criteria.

1.1. The Problem of the Criticism of Historical Sources

All source criticism is based on an implicit anthropological axiom, viz. that human beings are fallible. They never transmit the historical truth per se (to the extent that this exists), but present stories in the light of their own interests, tendencies, and intentions. This is why the sources contradict each other so much. And this is why it is necessary to read sources critically and to interpret them first of all as the expression of the circumstances in which they came into being, before we evaluate them as documents of the events which they relate. This means that we must approach all our sources, even the best and most reliable, with a methodologically disciplined distrust. Nevertheless, there undoubtedly exist historical certainties. No one doubts that Caesar or Luther lived and worked. No one doubts the existence of a man called Pontius Pilate. But whence comes this certainty, if all historical knowledge is said to be relative and hypothetical?

In the attempts to leap over Lessing's ditch, we encounter an interesting dialectic at this point. All historical criticism is based on the axiomatic conviction of universal human fallibility—yet precisely this conviction preserves us from a total skepticism. If people are too imperfect to be able to transmit the truth per se, then they are also too imperfect to be able to orchestrate (consciously or unconsciously) a complete deception about historical facts.<sup>7</sup>

Let us suppose that there had existed in the first century CE a committee for the leading astray of future historians, and a conspiracy aimed at leaving us a fictitious picture of Palestine at that period and of the events which took place there. Not even the most powerful committee would be mighty enough to exercise a genuine control over all the sources and relics and impose on these a particular view of things. Did they really make an agreement to hide various coins of Pontius Pilate in the soil of Palestine, or to chisel out an inscription by Pilate which was preserved for later generations because it was used as a stair in the theater at Caesarea and thus escaped notice? Did the committee persuade Philo, Josephus, and Tacitus (or the copyists of their texts) to insert various pieces of information about Pilate scattered throughout their works? Did it prompt the evangelists to write about Pilate in a way which does not actually contradict those scattered pieces of information, but on the other hand can scarcely be derived from Philo, Josephus, or Tacitus? This is quite impossible! Any historian who studies the very accidental sources about Pilate will become intuitively certain that he was an historical person. No one doubts the historicity of Pilate. The imperfect ability of human beings to hand on the truth pure and unvarnished also means that they are unable to rewrite everything completely. We are axiomatically convinced today of human fallibility before we have studied even one single concrete source; and the same axiom protects us a priori from the suspicion that everything these sources relate is a product of the imagination, provided of course that we have a sufficiently complex body of sources available.

---

<sup>7</sup> Some of the following ideas are inspired by M. Bloch, Apologie der Geschichte oder Der Beruf des Historikers, Anmerkungen und Argumente 9 (Stuttgart: Klett, 1974).

This brings us to a re-evaluation of Lessing's problem. He identified the historical contingency of the tradition as the reason for the shattering of the certainty of faith. Every tradition implicitly tells the critical reader: things could have been otherwise. We have however noted that if historical certainty exists at all, it is based on the contingent character of the tradition. The more convincingly this contingency emerges in the tradition, the stronger will be our intuitive certainty that we are encountering genuine history. It is indeed true that the accidental truths of history cannot be the basis of the necessary truths of reason (the existence of which is in any case disputed, with the exception of logical and mathematical truths). But accidental truths of history are the only possible basis of historical certainty, and we cannot achieve more than such an historical certainty about historical objects. This is what we mean when we say that we must leap right into the ditch of historical contingency, and that we should have no qualms about doing so. For it is only in the midst of historical contingency that we can arrive at historical certainty.

Leaping into the water of historical contingency means studying the sources which have accidentally survived. It is only where these are sufficiently complex that we can activate in both directions the axiom of the human person's limited capacity vis-à-vis both total truth and total falsification. Our thesis is that the human person's incapacity to tell the historical truth per se can be seen in the many contradictions and disagreements of the historical sources; and the incapacity to falsify the historical truth totally can be seen in the fact that, in many cases, such incoherencies can be given a coherent interpretation. Incoherencies which can be coherently interpreted are the best indicator that we are drawing close to the historical truth. Let us now look at both of these: the contradictions and their coherent interpretation.

We cannot compare the sources with the historical reality they portray, but we can compare the various sources themselves. When we do so, we almost always find contradictions. These are fruitful when they can be interpreted as an indication that source A is independent of source B, for we then have a twofold access to the historical reality, two windows through which we can get a glimpse of it. In this sense, Jesus research is well supplied with sources. Even if we leave aside the gospels of John and Thomas,<sup>8</sup> literary criticism today agrees that we possess two mutually independent ancient sources, the Gospel of Mark and the logia source Q, in addition to two mutually independent bodies of tradition, viz. the specifically Matthean and Lukan materials. The classical Formgeschichte increased the number of sources by considering each small unit as a tradition that could be potentially isolated, and attributed a specific perspective to each genre. This means that we possess a large amount of data with observable small tensions. If it is possible, on the basis of the final form of these traditions, to take this network of incoherent data and sketch a coherent picture of Jesus—something every book about Jesus does!—then the situation with regard to our sources cannot be wholly unfavorable.

These considerations confirm the necessity of reformulating the traditional criterion of coherence. The very concept of “coherence” is misleading, for as we have seen, the criterion functions because the sources contain a mixture of coherent and incoherent elements. We can examine the coherent traits against the background of incoherent elements and interpret the former as indicators of the historical reality; or else we can isolate the incoherent elements against the background of relatively coherent tendencies in the sources, and identify precisely in these awkward elements relics of a history which lies behind the sources. In other words, we can attach importance either to the coherence of our sources or to those elements which run contrary to identifiable tendencies. The two sub-criteria are mutually independent.

---

<sup>8</sup> We should make a distinction here between “autonomy” and “independence.” Thomas certainly represents an autonomous tradition, the specific character of which can be explained without recourse to the canonical gospels. This does not exclude the possibility that the canonical gospels have exercised a secondary influence on some traditions or on the textual history of Thomas. Cf. the discussion of this problem by S. J. Patterson, The Gospel of Thomas and Jesus (Sonoma, CA: Polebridge Press, 1993).

1.1.1. The Criterion of Coherence of the Sources

The agreement of our sources<sup>9</sup> can be an indicator of historical reality above all when the sources are mutually independent, and their mutually divergent tendencies can be interpreted as peculiarities of the source in question (e.g. as typically Johannine traits).<sup>10</sup>

1. This applies to the so-called cross-section proof, which looks for recurrent topoi, forms, and contents in various streams of tradition. If constant traits of Jesus recur again and again despite all distortions, these are relics of the historical man. If we find something in the specific Matthean and Lukan materials, Q, Mark, John, and Thomas, this is most likely based on history itself. For example, we find everywhere the concept of the kingdom of God (the Matthean variant speaks of the “kingdom of heaven”). This is a central concept in Jesus’ preaching. With the exception of the gospels of John and Thomas, all the sources speak of God’s reign in apocalyptic colors. This is a marvelous new state of affairs in which the whole world will be transformed; it lies beyond the immanent history of the world, for even the deceased patriarchs will be present in the kingdom of God (Matt 8:11–12). When John and Thomas speak of the kingdom of God as a present reality, or when it becomes in Thomas a cipher for the true, heavenly self of the human person, this is partly a development of those aspects in Jesus’ proclamation of the basileia which refer to the present time, and partly the effect of tendencies related to gnosis which have reshaped the image of the historical Jesus. But we can be fairly certain that Jesus proclaimed the basileia in a conceptual framework with apocalyptic colors, although of course he transcended this framework when he announced that the future reign of God was already a present reality.<sup>11</sup>

<sup>9</sup> “Agreement” and “coherence” are not timeless criteria. What we regard as coherent can be incoherent in the eyes of others, and vice versa. The letters of Paul are full of contradictions, although a glance at the Letter to the Romans will remind us that he is one of the “systematic” New Testament authors. There may well be an even greater number of contradictions in the utterances of persons (including Jesus himself) who thought less systematically. We must develop a sensitivity to what was felt to be “coherent” and contradictory at the various periods of history. A comparison between the two historical works of Josephus (the Jewish War and the Antiquities) shows the extraordinary divergences that are possible in one and the same author when he writes about the same events, sources, and traditions!

<sup>10</sup> We take up here the traditional criterion of coherence, but there is one important difference: this was dependent on the criterion of dissimilarity, whereas our criterion can be applied to sources without first employing the criterion of dissimilarity to distinguish authentic from inauthentic elements.

<sup>11</sup> I am aware of the tendency in contemporary American exegesis to deny the apocalyptic and cosmic elements in Jesus’ eschatology. Cf. M. J. Borg, Jesus in Contemporary

2. In the case of elements which do not depend on one single genre, we likewise reckon with historical material. When various genres and forms contain comparable and mutually coherent elements, these may be historical. For example, we hear about Jesus' miracles both in the form of miracle stories (i.e., in a narrative genre) and in the form of logia by Jesus (i.e., in the verbal tradition). The miracle stories lack traits which are characteristic of the verbal tradition, viz. the proclamation of God's reign, the summons to repentance, the idea of following Jesus. This incoherence can be explained:<sup>12</sup> even during Jesus' lifetime, people talked about his miracles—independently of whether they actually followed his call to repentance in view of the imminence of the basileia. This is why we find Jesus portrayed in some popular tales as a wonder-worker in the light of the general belief in miracles in the classical period, without any specifically Christian traits. The verbal tradition, on the other hand, was transmitted by those who followed Jesus, i.e., by disciples who shared his lifestyle. Like Jesus, they were homeless, they had often abandoned their families, and they were poor. They handed on the logia which suited their lifestyle: words about the imminent transformation of the whole world, about the universal summons to repentance, and the call to a few persons to follow Jesus. Miracles too formed a part of their message: in their tradition of logia, the miracles are linked to the preaching of the basileia (Matt 12:28 par.), to the summons to repentance (Matt 11:20–24), and to the decision taken for or against Jesus (Matt 11:2–6 par.). Since their own way of life accorded with that of Jesus, these followers, the “wandering charismatics,” saw no need to adapt his words to another mentality, and this is why there is a good chance that they did in fact hand on the words of Jesus in the spirit in which he had originally spoken them. The verbal tradition also confirms that the miracles of Jesus were accessible even to people who had not become his adherents (Matt 11:20–24; 12:22–24). His enemies too knew about them, and this allows us to suppose that it was not only his followers who spoke about his miracles. These indicators make plausible the emergence of a miracle tradition in narrative form which was not specifically Christian. We may therefore conclude that a historical-critical reconstruction of the activity of Jesus can explain the genesis of two distinct blocks of sources, the miracle narratives which reached the people, and the tradition of Jesus' words which remained restricted to his disciples. Jesus was experienced differently by the people and by his disciples. It is thus possible to offer a coherent interpretation of the incoherencies of the Jesus tradition in the miracle tradition. In this case, the two genres are not equidistant from history; the miracle stories, which spread to a wide public, distanced themselves from the historical reality more quickly than the tradition of Jesus' words.

---

Scholarship (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1994), 47–68, 69–96. I believe that D. C. Allison, Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1998), is correct to protest against this denial of Jesus' eschatology.

<sup>12</sup> On what follows, cf. G. Theissen, Lokalkolorit und Zeitgeschichte in den Evangelien: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition, NTOA 8 (Freiburg: Universitätsverlag; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1989), 119–121.

3. The principle that incoherencies in the sources can be interpreted as pointers to a coherent history is also the basis of the traditional criterion of multiple attestation. This criterion leads to one-sided positions. When a scholar constructs a picture of Jesus exclusively on multiply attested traditions in both canonical and non-canonical texts,<sup>13</sup> he makes himself dependent on two factors: (a) on the chance survival of some logia and deeds of Jesus on papyrus fragments, and (b) on the tendentious selection of logia of Jesus in the Gospel of Thomas. Since Thomas contains the picture of a "non-eschatological Jesus," one will end up with a picture of the historical Jesus that is not eschatological (in the apocalyptic sense). Besides this, multiple attestation is in principle a weaker criterion than cross-section proof and the presence of an element in various genres, since multiple attestation permits us to draw conclusions about the historical reality only when we can evaluate various attestations of one and the same tradition as two mutually independent points of access to the historical reality—in other words, only where we have two separate eyewitnesses.<sup>14</sup> This is never completely impossible, but it is difficult to prove. Where we find related material in various streams of tradition and genres (i.e., in the cross-section proof and the elements which are not restricted to one single genre), it is a priori more probable that this goes back to several independent "contacts" with the historical reality.

---

<sup>13</sup> J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1991), is based almost exclusively on the criterion of multiple attestation.

<sup>14</sup> The same reservation is made by N. Perrin, The Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus (London: SCM, 1975). The criterion of multiple attestation was applied above all by T. W. Manson, who presupposed two sources which he believed were the work of eyewitnesses: he saw the authority of Peter behind the Gospel of Mark, and the authority of the apostle Matthew behind Q. Naturally, if this is presupposed, the criterion of multiple attestation becomes an outstanding criterion of authenticity; but scarcely anyone accepts these presuppositions today.

1.1.2. The Criterion of Material Running Contrary to a Tendency

This criterion<sup>15</sup> illustrates well the reason why the historical search for the truth profits from the human imperfection vis-à-vis the truth: although we are conditioned by our own tendencies in all the narratives and stories we tell, we cannot prevent the survival of elements which run contrary to these tendencies. Accordingly, anything in the earliest Christian sources which contradicts their general tendencies may be historical. Let us look at some examples.

The baptism of Jesus contradicts the tendency of early Christianity to venerate Jesus as a divine being. It presupposes a confession of sin, which Jesus too probably pronounced. The early Christian tradition seeks to limit the damage here. The Gospel of John admits that Jesus bore sins when he came for baptism, but only in order to underline that he was bearing the sins of the world, not his own (John 1:29). It transforms the story of the baptism into the story of a meeting of the Baptist with Jesus.

Some of the criticism of Jesus runs contrary to tendencies, both his enemies' criticism that he is in league with Satan (Matt 12:24) and the criticism of the people, who see in him a glutton and a drunkard (Matt 11:19). The fear of Herod Antipas that Jesus may be the Baptist, risen from the dead (Mark 6:14), also runs contrary to tendencies, since both the high esteem for the Baptist which this presupposes and the idea of resurrection as a return to earthly life are improbable after Easter.

Above all, Jesus' death on the cross runs contrary to all the tendencies to venerate him in a religious sense: it was not easy to interpret the execution of a criminal as the death of a redeemer. The early Christians were well aware that the cross was a skandalon (1 Cor 1:18–26).

A particularly favorable instance is statements which run in contrary directions: where both friend and foe assume the same facts, these are likely to be historical. For example, Jesus' exorcisms were interpreted by his adherents as signs of the emergence of God's reign (Matt 12:28), but by his enemies as the working of a demonic power (Matt 12:24). Both sides presuppose the existence and the religious relevance of the exorcisms, and this makes their concordant testimony all the more weighty.

---

<sup>15</sup> Cf. P. W. Schmiedel, "Gospels," EB(C) II (1901), cols. 1761–1898; idem, Das vierte Evangelium gegenüber den drei ersten, RV I.8 and I.10 (Halle: Gebauer-Schwetschke et al., 1906). The "columns" on which Schmiedel wanted to base historical research into Jesus are passages which run contrary to a tendency. In E. P. Sanders and M. Davies, Studying the Synoptic Gospels (London: SCM; Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1989), 304–306, we find the same criterion under the heading: "Strongly against the grain; too much with the grain."

This last example shows how the search for elements which run against tendencies often coincides with the search for agreements. The baptism of Jesus corresponds to the criterion of “source coherence.” We have several pieces of independent testimony (Mark 1:9–11 pars; Gospel of the Hebrews 2; John 1:32–34), and it is attested in several genres, both in the synoptic baptismal narrative and in a summary (Acts 10:37; cf. 1:22). This means that we have a certain “coherence of the tradition.” At the same time, however, some aspects of the baptismal narrative clearly run contrary to tendencies, e.g. the dependence of Jesus on the Baptist (which is toned down in Matt 3:14) or the confession of sins on the occasion of baptism (which is consciously denied in frag. 2 of the Gospel of the Nazareans). In concrete historical work, we apply both criteria simultaneously, and understand both the agreements and the elements which run against tendencies as an expression of the historical impact made by Jesus.

The criterion of plausible effect is however insufficient, since the question remains: how can we be sure that the early Christian religious imagination did not create a picture of Jesus after Easter, and that this picture has survived in various strands of the tradition and sources? What guarantees that we encounter the historical Jesus, rather than an early picture of him? Are not in principle all the sources colored by the religious convictions of earliest Christianity, which profoundly restructured its recollection of the historical Jesus in the light of the Easter experience? A second criterion is necessary, that of contextual plausibility.<sup>16</sup> The more convincingly we can uncover Jesus’ ties to his Jewish context, the more will we be certain that we can get behind the post-Easter Christian pictures of Jesus to discern the pre-Easter historical reality; and the more will we be certain that Jesus is a product, not of the early Christian imagination, but of the history of Judaism. This presupposes that everything in Jesus is “relative”—i.e., related to his specific Jewish context. This is why we must discuss the criterion of Jesus’ contextual ties in the framework of the problems connected with historical relativism.

---

<sup>16</sup> The criterion of “contextual plausibility” is found in various forms in almost all the catalogues of criteria, e.g., as “environmental criterion.”

1.2. The Problem of Historical Relativism

Historical relativism says that all historical phenomena are linked: they are “in relation” or “relative” to one another. All must be derived from their pre-history, explained on the basis of their own situation, and illuminated by means of analogies. Nothing is “underivable,” since everything is the result of development. Nothing is incomparable, since there are analogies to everything. Nothing is absolute. However, the Christian faith is based on Jesus as the mediator of an absolute certainty, viz. that through him we are confronted with God. Lessing’s nasty wide ditch opens up anew between this certainty of faith and the historical relativity of Jesus. In Lessing’s own period, the real extent of this ditch could not yet be seen. It was only the nineteenth-century research into the history of religions that made us aware how much Jesus is embedded in his own period and in religious history.

Nevertheless, the historical research into Jesus has based the criterion of dissimilarity on the supposition that Jesus is a unique figure. Does not the certainty of his distinctiveness and underivability contradict the basic conviction of historical relativism that everything is linked to everything else, and that nothing is completely singular? Doubts about the criterion of dissimilarity are only strengthened when we discover that it is impracticable and misleading. It is impracticable, because it contains a universal negative judgment which we cannot verify;<sup>17</sup> and it is misleading, because it leaves out of account everything that Jesus had in common with Judaism and early Christianity. Accordingly, we cannot escape from historical relativism by simply appealing to the criterion of dissimilarity which is practiced in Jesus research, since this is too problematic. And yet, behind this criterion lies a justified idea, viz. the conviction of the individuality of historical persons and events.

It is precisely historical relativism that helps us to justify and assert this conviction of the individuality of historical phenomena, in two ways. The principle that everything is connected with everything else means that one may never interpret particular elements in an historical phenomenon in isolation, but only in connection with all the other co-existing elements—irrespective of whether this phenomenon is a text, a human being, or a social movement. Once again, we encounter here an internal dialectic: although some individual elements may be “derivable,” this does not entitle us to say that the combination of these elements is “derivable.” It could be singular. The more elements we find combined, the less probable is it that we will find a substantially comparable phenomenon at some other point in world history. In the case of human beings, this seems excluded a priori, since each one is such a complex phenomenon that a “repetition” is excluded. This is why we always approach historical reality on the basis of an axiomatic faith in its individuality.

---

<sup>17</sup> In order to demonstrate the underivability of a tradition about Jesus from the environment in which he lived, we would need to possess a complete picture of this environment. This was pointed out nearly four decades ago: cf. M. D. Hooker, “Christology and Methodology,” NTS 17 (1970): 480–487: “Use of this criterion seems to assume that we are dealing with two known factors (Judaism and Early Christianity) and one unknown—Jesus; it would perhaps be a fairer statement of the situation to say that we are dealing with three unknowns, and that our knowledge of the other two is quite as tenuous and indirect as our knowledge of Jesus himself” (482).

Historical relativism contains however a second idea, which likewise functions as an axiomatic conviction, viz. the idea of development. The principle that everything is linked to everything else holds not only of synchronic relationships between elements in one and the same historical phenomenon, but also for the diachronic sequence of elements (of traditions, ideas, or motifs). Historical relativism affirms that everything can be derived from earlier units, and this is why we can sort all historical material into a sequence of earlier and later elements. If all the elements were equal in every respect, it would be impossible to arrange them in a temporal sequence, and we would be unable to distinguish various stages within this sequence. The idea of development implies the idea of the singularity of every individual moment in this development, for we can conceive of development only if we can distinguish earlier and later stages, preceding and subsequent elements. In this sense too, historical relativism necessarily implies the axiomatic faith in historical individuality; and both these ideas were in fact elaborated in the history of ideas at the same period, in the age of historicism in the nineteenth century. They belong together.<sup>18</sup>

Let us sum up the argumentation hitherto. Behind historical relativism lies a very elementary axiom: everything must be interpreted in context. This leads (a) to a relativization of all historical phenomena, since these are embedded in diachronic and synchronic contexts; and (b) to an individualization of each historical phenomenon, thanks to its singular place in diachronic developments and to its complexity as a synchronic structure. If everything is linked to everything else, then everything is both relative and individual.

---

<sup>18</sup> Cf. F. Meinecke, Die Entstehung des Historismus, Werke III (Munich: Oldenbourg, 1959).

If we apply this general historical conviction to the concrete figure of Jesus, we come to the conclusion that his singularity consists in a singular combination of Jewish traditions as well as in the fact that his words and deeds represent a distinctive stage in the development that leads from Judaism to early Christianity.

The traditional criterion of dissimilarity does not do justice to this affirmation, since its methodology pays attention only to the differences, not to the agreements between traditions about Jesus and the Jewish context. The criterion of "contextual plausibility" embraces both aspects, and it is only in this way that we can avoid the dilemma of being compelled to formulate negative universal statements which in principle are unverifiable. We can never prove that some element in the tradition about Jesus is never attested anywhere in Judaism, is not derived from anything in Judaism, or is inconceivable anywhere in Judaism. We can however make positive judgments about connections between a limited quantity of Jewish sources and the tradition about Jesus. By comparing this tradition with a limited amount of source material, we can identify singular traits in the tradition, or else locate their distinctive place within a concrete trajectory of development. In other words, we can investigate how they are embedded in concrete synchronic or diachronic contexts, and demonstrate their contextually bound individuality within these contexts.

This idea of an internal dialectic of historical relativism also contradicts the conviction (born of the criticism of theology) that Jesus cannot in any sense be "singular" and "lacking analogies." If one takes the logic of this axiom of relativism to its own conclusion, it becomes self-limiting, as we see in the development of the "history of religions" research into early Christianity.

For a long time, it was considered a sign of "unenlightened" ties to church dogma, when the singularity of the phenomenon of Jesus was defended against all attempts to derive it from the history of religions, and theologians refused to employ consistently the analogies from the history of religions as the key to understand both Jesus and early Christianity, or to classify these phenomena unreservedly in terms of developments in the history of religions. Today, the perspective has changed: the exaggerated evaluation of analogies and trajectories of development in the history of religions is perceived as an (often unconscious) dogmatic insistence on the singularity of Jesus and on the centrality of his position in the history of religion and of the world. This is because the old "history of religions" research unconsciously began by subjecting many of the analogies it examined to an interpretatio christiana, before going on to apply these successfully (on the basis of such a reinterpretation) to the explanation of early Christian phenomena. For example, scholars were convinced that dying and rising deities were worshiped in the mystery cults; today, we see that although the yearning for a new life (before or after death) is indeed expressed in the mystery cults, one can speak only at a much later date of a “resurrection” of the deities whom they worshiped. Originally, all that we find are compromises between death and life.<sup>19</sup> Persephone (or Kore) must remain in the underworld for a third of the year; she is permitted to return to the world of the divine life only in the remaining two-thirds. The corpse of Attis remains dead, but it does not decompose; only his little finger moves. Osiris rules in the underworld, and this means that he himself is one of the dead; but corn grows out of his corpse. Mithras, since he is not a dying god, provides no analogy. Rather, his figure is an “alternative scenario” to the way in which the experience of death and the hope of life were “staged” in other mystery cults. As far as we know at present, only early Christianity had a deity who died and rose again. The preaching of this deity doubtless found an echo in people who expressed their longing for new life in their myths of dying deities; but it is only in early Christianity that this longing is expressed in the form of a resurrection from death. In other words, the older “history of religions” research unconsciously took the figure of Christ as its model when it interpreted the deities in the mystery cults: these scholars saw Christ as the key to the history of religions. And this is an unconscious survival of Christian dogmatics which makes it more difficult to perceive and evaluate each individual phenomenon on its own terms.

The same is true of the classification of phenomena in terms of developments in the history of religions. It is not by chance that a rather conservative “biblical theology” has attached importance to demonstrating such developmental sequences from the Old Testament to the New. Here too, we must ask whether it is not being suggested a priori that all the trajectories in the Old Testament and early Judaism were leading up to the one unique figure of Jesus of Nazareth. For example, the few texts about the Son of Man in Dan 7, Ethiopian Enoch 37–71, and 2 Esdras 13 are read as “preliminary stages” leading to the early Christian statements about the Son of Man; or Leviticus 16 and Isaiah 53 are read as pointing to faith in the expiatory death of Jesus, although it was perhaps only an interpretatio christiana (though doubtless an impressive piece of exegesis) that discovered in the scapegoat ritual of Leviticus 16 an existential representation of the sinful human being in the goat which is killed and driven out of the camp; or messianic affirmations are discovered everywhere in the Old Testament and in the intertestamental Jewish literature, and interpreted to suggest that the expectation of the Messiah was central to the Jewish religion. In reality, this was only one variant of eschatological hopes. It is only from a Christian perspective that one can read the so-called “messianic” testimonies in such a way that they increase in intensity and rise up to an ever more sublime expectation of the Messiah. Biblical messianism is one trajectory among others, not the only one; it was only for the first Christians that it became the central perspective.

---

<sup>19</sup> Cf. D. Zeller, “Die Mysterienkulte und die paulinische Soteriologie (Röm 6,1–11): Eine Fallstudie zum Synkretismus in Neuen Testament,” in Suchbewegungen: Synkretismus—kulturelle Identität und kirchliches Bekenntnis, ed. H. P. Siller (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1991), 42–61; idem, “Hellenistische Vorgaben für den Glauben an die Auferstehung Jesu?” in Von Jesus zu Christus, Festschrift: P. Hoffmann (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1998), 71–91. Against this position, G. Baudy reconstructs a close connection between the cult of Tammuz and the early Christian message: “Das Evangelium des Thamus und der Tod des ‘großen Pan’: Ein Zeugnis romfeindlicher Apokalyptik aus der Zeit des Kaisers Tiberius?” ZAC 4 (2000): 13–48.

The awareness of relativity in the field of the history of religions leads scholars today to “relativize” analogies which were adduced without sufficient pause for reflection and trajectories of development which were constructed with a breathtaking boldness. Today, it is precisely the investigation of the individuality of all phenomena that counts as the expression of an enlightened critical historical awareness. For the theological assertion that no analogies exist to the singularity of Jesus is in fact no more “dogmatic” than the attempts (born of a critique of theology) to posit so many analogies and developmental sequences that one of the most outstanding characters in history ultimately becomes indistinct.

1.2.1. The Criterion of Contextual Correspondence

The more a tradition about Jesus fits the context of contemporary events and local circumstances, Jewish tradition and Jewish mentality, the less can Jesus be a figment of the early Christian imagination. For the main difference between a fictional character and an historical person is that we can date and localize the latter and establish links to other historical figures and persons.<sup>20</sup>

---

<sup>20</sup> Cf. R. G. Collingwood, The Idea of History (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1946; Oxford University Press, 1956), 246–247.

We have mentioned above some examples of traditions about Jesus which run contrary to tendencies, and these can also illustrate the criterion of contextual correspondence: the baptism of Jesus at the beginning of his public activity, the criticism of his enemies during this activity, and his crucifixion at the end of his ministry. The baptism, criticism, and execution of Jesus are linked to John the Baptist, Herod Antipas, and Pontius Pilate. We meet all three figures in non-Christian sources too,<sup>21</sup> so that we can use these as a check on the Christian sources. Such a comparison shows that we undoubtedly possess historically reliable information in the Christian sources about these three persons, even if it comes from a particular perspective. By analogy, we may conclude that if the tradition possesses an historical background with respect to these three contemporary figures, it will possess an historical background of roughly the same extent with regard to Jesus himself.

Another aspect of contextual correspondence is traditions about Jesus which are embedded in a specific local context.<sup>22</sup> We find local color when we hear about a baptism in the wilderness (cf. Mark 1:4)! This is a paradoxical statement: where is one to find water in the wilderness? But some stretches of the Jordan are surrounded by the desert, with only a narrow water-meadow separating them.

Above all, however, we can connect traditions about Jesus to Jewish traditions and Jewish mentality. The Assumption of Moses was edited anew shortly before the beginning of Jesus' public ministry. It expresses an expectation of the kingdom of God in a non-violent form: the pious wait for God to prevail over Satan. Jesus' preaching is similar: he too sees God's reign becoming a reality in his own exorcisms (Matt 12:28), and here too this takes place without human violence. The Assumption of Moses offers us a glimpse of the environment in which Jesus preached. At the same time, however, we find differences. In the Assumption of

---

<sup>21</sup> The sources are: (1) for John the Baptist, Josephus, Ant. 18.116–119; Matt 3:1–17 pars. (2) For Herod Antipas: Josephus, Ant. 18.36–38, 101–105, etc.; Matt 14:1–12 pars.; Luke 13:31–32; Luke 23:6–12; Antipas is also mentioned, without being named, by Dio Cassius, 55.27.6. Two of his inscriptions survive (cf. OGIS 416 and 417); for his coins, see Y. Meshorer, Jewish Coins and the Second Temple Period (Tel Aviv: Am Hasefer, 1967), 72–75, 133–135. (3) Pilate is attested by Josephus, Ant. 18.35, 55–59, 62, 64, 87–89; War 2.169–177; an inscription has been found in Caesarea (cf. J. Lemonon, Pilate et le gouvernement de la Judée, Textes et documents, EtB [Paris: Gabalda, 1981], 23–32). For his coins, cf. Meshorer, Jewish Coins, 102–106.

<sup>22</sup> On the basis of his earlier studies, S. Freyne offers an overview of the Galilean environment in “The Geography, Politics, and Economics of Galilee and the Quest for the Historical Jesus,” in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. B. D. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 75–121.

Moses, God's kingly rule is opposed to the Gentiles, but this antithesis disappears in the tradition about Jesus. On the contrary, he says that people from all the four corners of the world will stream into the kingdom of God. He is probably thinking of the Jewish Diaspora, but the Gentiles too are included (Matt 8:11–12). The second half of our criterion of contextual plausibility draws our attention to such individual traits within one and the same context.

1.2.2. The Criterion of Contextual Individuality

Every comparison between Jesus and his environment includes both similarity and dissimilarity. Here, as is always the case, we recognize a person by means of his individual traits, or more precisely by a combination of traits which we often grasp only on the intuitive level. In daily life, we require only small sections of someone's physical appearance, a few movements, the voice, etc., in order to identify him or her; we need not engage in an intellectual reflection on whether our identification is justified. Similarly, we encounter "indicators of specificity" of this kind in the historical tradition about Jesus, recurrent traits which we find nowhere else. Here too, the indicators are often complex, as we see in the following two examples. The first is based on synchronic relationships between a number of elements, the second on the special position of one element within a diachronic development.

The first example concerns Jesus' vocabulary of forms. Even if we are uncertain whether particular logia genuinely go back to Jesus or not, we are astonishingly certain that we know the linguistic forms he employed in his preaching, viz. that unique combination of literary (oral) forms, topoi, and structures which is linked to Jesus. If we demonstrate the authenticity of one single example of each form of the tradition about Jesus, we have demonstrated that Jesus employed this genre as a whole. Usually, several examples of a genre could be authentic, and this means that even if we are uncertain whether we are correct in one particular instance to pronounce a logion authentic, our judgment may be correct in another instance. It is usually improbable that none of the numerous examples of one particular genre is authentic. We may make this point as follows: although we are uncertain whether we can identify the paroles of Jesus in each individual case, we know his langue very well. We know that Jesus employed parables and metaphors, cries of woe and macarisms, aphorisms and warnings. We find parallels to all these forms elsewhere in Judaism, but their combination is unique. We know of no other contemporary Jewish teacher who fashioned this combination of structures and literary forms—and who also exercised a charismatic activity as worker of miracles and leader of a group of disciples.

Secondly, let us mention once again Jesus' eschatology, which retains its distinctive position in a diachronic line of development. God's reign is often established in the course of a war against the Gentiles or other foes; one may recall here the War Scroll from Qumran. The Assumption of Moses adapts this concept to a more peaceful age, at the beginning of the first century CE. Here, the pious in Israel are completely non-violent. They react to a great religious persecution by withdrawing to a cave to await death and the beginning of the kingdom of God. Jesus continues this line of thinking: he holds that the kingdom of God can coexist with the imperium romanum in the present day, since it is beginning now, i.e. at a time when Roman rule is unchallenged.

Jesus too sees the people who belong to God's kingdom as non-violent, indeed as committed to non-violence, since it is the kingdom itself that suffers violence—whether from its adversaries or its adherents (Matt 11:12–13). According to Jesus, the kingdom begins with John the Baptist. After Easter, the Christians went one step further, and identified the beginning of the eschatological events with the raising of Jesus from the dead. Along this trajectory from a kingdom of God in the future tense to an eschatology in the present and aorist tenses, the logion about those who seize the kingdom by violence occupies a unique position. It adopts tendencies which already existed in Judaism, takes these further, and then in turn is developed by the faith of the early Christians.

The more deeply we study the tradition about Jesus in this way, the more unshakable is our certainty that the trajectories which come to light here, and their specific vocabulary of forms, are not found anywhere else. This certainty is justified, even if it contains a somewhat a priori element, viz. the ideas of historical development and individuality.

Let us return to our criterion of plausibility. We have seen that the traditional criterion of dissimilarity contains a correct kernel when it pays due heed to individuality. This is a well tested and proven "idea," and it should not be surreptitiously weighed down with a much more far-reaching religious (or theological) idea, viz. that in Jesus, a transcendental reality irrupts into our world. It is not of course correct to make an antithesis here between pure "empiricism" on the one hand and pure "faith" on the other; rather, in both cases a priori ideas are at work, and both forms of approach to Jesus are legitimate. Historical "ideas" (which guide the search for knowledge in every historical methodology) give us access to historical reality, while religious ideas seek to give us access to a transcendental reality. The knowledge which we attain along the historical path is asked to bear too much weight when the idea of “revelation” (i.e., of an irruption of transcendence) is introduced into the historical idea of individuality—and this is implicit in the criterion of dissimilarity, where “dissimilarity” means underderivability from either Judaism or Christianity, i.e. an underderivability from history. This is why we replace the criterion of dissimilarity with a criterion of plausibility which says that traditions about Jesus are authentic when they can be recognized as something individual in the Jewish context of the first century CE and can be plausibly interpreted as the origin of an historical impact which we find in the early Christian sources.

In our present context, the decisive point is that we arrive at knowledge of the individuality of Jesus only by affirming historical relativism. Here, this individuality is relativized in the framework of Judaism, but this is no disadvantage, theologically speaking, since the relationship of Christianity to Judaism belongs to the essence of Christianity. Historical relativism is initially a deep ditch, but the leap into this ditch is profitable. We must plunge into the cold water of historical relativism. This water links Christianity and Judaism—and in fact all religions.

1.3. The Problem of Historical Strangeness

This does not yet solve all our problems. Let us suppose that we had an historically reliable picture of the historical Jesus which did justice to his individuality in the framework of Judaism; we should still have the problem of his historical strangeness. The tradition about Jesus takes us into another world. There is nothing exceptional about this: with every day that passes, every historical tradition moves twenty-four hours further away from us. The strangeness of past history is not some special problem of the tradition about Jesus. Modern historical consciousness is fundamentally convinced that every tradition is historically strange. In the case of traditions with which we think we are familiar, this consciousness is skeptical about whether they are truly as close to us as it seems; is it not possible that chance agreements with the world in which we live have seduced us into discovering something of ourselves in those traditions? Accordingly, the postulate of historical strangeness is applied to every tradition, even to those we think we know well. This is an axiomatic conviction of historical knowledge, which has repeatedly proved its worth in the study of history.

This is why there is no greater sacrilege in historical science than the “modernization” of foreign environments and phenomena, instead of understanding them in their own context and on their own terms.<sup>23</sup> This is all the more true when people today are interested in deriving orientations from the past for the present—and in interpreting the past in the context of the present.

This is precisely what happens with Jesus. The Christian faith makes the figure of Jesus the center of its existential orientation, and a strict scientific ethos must regard this as guaranteeing from the outset that all genuinely neutral work will be sabotaged here. One may claim that the past is being actualized, but it looks like a rape of history. Once again, Lessing’s wide ditch opens up before us—and this time in a particularly intimidating form, since the fact that this historical distance increases every day makes every attempt to overcome it seem hopeless.

We should note that the conviction of the foreignness of past history is an axiomatic idea which we always bring to bear on the study of the sources. And here we find the same situation as with other axiomatic ideas of the historical consciousness: if we pursue them to their logical conclusions, they develop a dialectic which reveals that they necessarily include their opposites. It is only if we insist upon the foreignness of the historical tradition that we can discover in it a closeness that allows us to understand it as an expression of the same cultural activity in which people today are also engaged. But how is this possible?

Let us try the following experiment. Let us suppose that all we found in historical texts was our own familiar environment, or that their environment was still identical with our own. The consequence would be that we no longer experienced this existential environment as an “historical” world (i.e., as an environment which changes, and which we ourselves can change), but as a natural world which remains the same in its fundamental structures, and necessarily is the way it is. It is only the foreignness of history that makes us aware that historical “existential environments” are worlds of meaning constructed by the human person, like our own modern world. Paradoxically, it is only a foreign element in history that makes us aware of how we are contemporaneous with all human persons in the past and in the future, viz. by means of the cultural human activity of bestowing meaning. The human person never lives in a natural environment, but always in a constructed existential environment which he himself constructs by means of interpretations and convictions, institutions and technologies, and which displays an immense variety.

---

<sup>23</sup> Cf. Cadbury, The Peril of Modernizing Jesus.

Once again, we must not attempt to counter the modern axiom of the foreignness of history by looking for some access to the past which would appeal (for example) to timeless truths which are found only in historically mutable forms. Rather, we must unreservedly accept this foreignness, even if it seems to push Jesus out to the uttermost edges of our own culture. For the more foreign an historical figure initially is, the greater is the possibility that the serious encounter with his or her foreignness will disclose new dimensions of our own cultural activity of bestowing meaning. This will not merely confirm our own understanding of human culture, but also expand it and deepen it.

Can this dialectic of distance and closeness, foreignness and familiarity be demonstrated in the concrete example of the figure of Jesus? Our thesis is that the foreignness of Jesus, which we see in his exorcisms, his radicalism, and his apocalyptic expectations, does indeed remove him to the margins of our culture. But it is precisely these bizarre traits that can be interpreted as the expression of a protest that lays bare the heart of our own culture, its hidden center and its secret program.

1.3.1. The Foreignness of the Historical Jesus

The foreignness of the historical Jesus can be seen in his expectation of a comprehensive cosmic revolution. He believed that the kingdom of God was already present in a hidden manner, and that it would transform everything in the near future. After that, nothing would be as it was before. This comprehensive revolution could be spoken of in parables and images, as well as in general apophthegms. It appeared as a mysterium fascinosum with unclear outlines; the only clear point is that the kingdom of God would be preceded by a definitive judgment, since not everyone would attain this kingdom. The judgment threatened everyone, but one could be saved by repentance. Among Jesus' closest followers, this repentance entailed a bizarre ethical radicalism: willingness to renounce all resistance and to love one's enemies, a carefree attitude to earning one's own living, the renunciation of possessions, poverty, a break with one's family and with familial pietas—even one's own father should be left unburied, if the kingdom of God demanded this. Compared with the kingdom, everything else (normal life with work and a profession, a house and a family) was unimportant. This kingdom of God brought salvation for those who now were outsiders:

those possessed by unclean spirits were healed, the devil seemed to have been conquered, demons fled away. Sick people were healed in strange miracles, those inflicted with a moral stigma were accepted, the poor and children were to come to power in the kingdom of God. But this central element in Jesus' preaching, the rule of God, was not "fulfilled" by history: it did not come. Jesus went up to Jerusalem, perhaps in expectation of the kingdom of God; he may have consciously accepted the risk that he would suffer a violent death. The Jewish aristocracy handed him over to the Roman authorities, who executed him. After his death, the disciples had apparitions which convinced them that he had risen from the dead. Who was this Jesus? Partly a sensitive poet, partly an apocalyptic prophet, partly a miracle-worker and exorcist, as well as a charismatic leader and the proponent of an extreme ethic! If the tradition about him were not already so familiar to us, we would experience his strangeness even more strongly.

1.3.2. The Closeness of the Historical Jesus

And yet it is precisely this Jesus, who remains foreign to our modern world, who can draw close to us in a surprising way. All we need to do is to relate the meaning which is given to the world and to life in the traditions about Jesus to the task which is incumbent on all human culture, viz. to reduce the pressure for selection. Culture begins with the fact that human life is made possible where it would be impossible under natural conditions. It is made possible by technology which is brought to bear on the environment, by social institutions which create a balance, and by ethically motivated convictions. Culture begins where the weak person, who per se has no (or only slight) possibilities for life, receives a new (or better) possibility for life through conscious human behavior. As soon as this happens, the human person has left the realm of nature and entered the realm of culture. He crosses a threshold, although it is always possible for him to fall back.<sup>24</sup>

In the Bible, this cultural obligation to reduce the pressure for selection takes the form of a harsh protest against the very principle of selection. This protest begins in the Old Testament and finds its clearest expression in Jesus of Nazareth. As Friedrich Nietzsche acutely saw, the principle underlying the Christianity which Jesus founded is the very antithesis of selection,<sup>25</sup> for here the weak are not only protected, but are accorded priority: in the kingdom of God, the poor, the sick, the starving, and the children are to occupy prominent places. We may perhaps find the miracle stories bizarre, but they make an unconditional protest against the natural distribution of the chances for life, by giving a chance even to those lives which are guttering out or are permanently reduced. Jesus' ethic may appear radical to us, but all it does is to break with biological evolution up to that time. He poses a question mark against the family solidarity which is based on biology, i.e. love for those to whom one is genetically related. Instead, he demands something that runs counter to biological behavioral tendencies, viz. love of one's enemies, love for those to whom one is not genetically (or culturally) related. The apocalyptic expectation of an incipient cosmic revolution which is already beginning in a hidden manner may seem bizarre and illusory, but it corresponds precisely to the situation of the human person on the threshold between biological and cultural evolution, between the realm of nature and freedom. Wherever a person rises up against the power of the principle of selection, he has already crossed this threshold—in many individual actions, hidden in the midst of a world which as a whole runs according to very different laws. Many dimensions of the new sphere which such a person enters remain alien to him: the expectation of the judgment, with its separation of the good and the evil, seems archaic and cruel. One might of course say that all this does is to portray the pressure of selection which rules over all human life, and makes its impact on morality too: the evil person is to have less chance of life than the good person. But in fact, the tradition about Jesus puts a question mark against this simple distribution of good and evil: only those who repent will survive the judgment, only those who admit their sins—i.e., admit that they do not in fact have any chance—will be saved. The irritating element of the early Christian paschal message fits this picture, and indeed gives it a new center, because this message makes a failure, a powerless man, the origin of life. That which is eliminated from life becomes the embodiment of a new life. Selection means death and life, i.e. diminished chances of life and survival. But the overcoming of death is the overcoming of selection.

---

<sup>24</sup> For a further elaboration of these ideas, cf. G. Theissen, Biblischer Glaube in evolutionärer Sicht (München: Kaiser, 1984).

---

<sup>25</sup> Cf. F. Nietzsche, Der Antichrist, §7, in F. Nietzsche, Werke: Kritische Gesamtausgabe VI.3, ed. G. Colli and M. Montinari (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1969). He defines Christianity as a religion of compassion, and writes: "Taken as a whole, compassion runs contrary to the law of development, which is the law of selection. It keeps alive what is ripe for death" (trans.: B.McN.).

If we see in the figure of Jesus—and precisely in those elements which we find bizarre and foreign—an expression of the protest against selection, then this figure moves from the outer margin of our culture into its center, at any rate for those who are committed to the program of reducing selection for weaker or less well “assimilated” persons. Nothing guarantees that this “program” will be followed, and nothing guarantees that the obligation to do so will be accepted. National Socialism was a public betrayal of this program, which however was not only betrayed by one particular ideology, but often enough by Christian churches too. Such betrayal has always led to immense suffering. Human culture is not simply the overcoming of the pressure for selection, but rather the potential for its overcoming; and at the same time, human culture is exposed to the risk of collective cruelties which artificially intensify selection.

Let us sum up: personal certainty in relation to the historical Jesus arises through the encounter between axiomatic convictions and those sources which happen to have survived. Initially, the axiomatic convictions of the modern historical consciousness deepen the ditch between ourselves and the historical Jesus. The three premises—the fallibility of all historical sources, the historical relativity of all phenomena, and the foreignness of all past history—lead to historical skepticism, relativization, and distance. The historical Jesus seems to vanish from sight in an inaccessible past. However, these same premises contain an inherent dialectic which necessarily includes their opposites. The logical consequence of the fallibility of all human sources sets a limit to our historical skepticism; the fact that the phenomenon of Jesus belongs in specific historical contexts opens our eyes to his individuality; and if we examine his provocative foreignness, we discover that he is surprisingly close to us today. The ditch which separates us from the historical Jesus remains wide, long, and deep: and we cannot leap over it. But if we fall into it, that is no catastrophe, since we can swim in it and thus draw nearer to Jesus. All our knowledge, even the greatest certainty accessible to us, is hypothetical, and at every point there is a reservation: things could also have been otherwise. We have however shown that personal certainty is nevertheless possible, thanks to axiomatic convictions. These axiomatic convictions have themselves become historical; they do not possess a timelessly necessary character, even if we cannot imagine employing any other premises in our approach to historical objects. For us, what we learn in the light of these convictions is “certain”—as certain as human certainty can be. But not even this certainty is unconditional. There remains an element of the hypothetical; Lessing’s ditch is not filled in. How can we come to accept this ditch?

Or, to put the same question differently, how can we come to accept the hypothetical character of all knowing and believing? Or is there perhaps something that points beyond the hypothetical?

2. The Possibility of Religious Certainty in the Christian Faith

Our first question must be: what are the paths on which theology up to now has attempted to come to terms with the relativity of historical knowledge, and to overcome Lessing's ditch by means of arguments? We can sketch four paths briefly.

2.1. The Orientation to the Biblical Picture of Jesus

All historical reconstructions of Jesus have an aura of the hypothetical. Why should one not prefer the biblical picture of Jesus to these constructs of the scholarly imagination—trusting that this biblical picture reflects the impact made by the historical Jesus? Do we not possess the “real Jesus” in the “image” which he “brought about”? In his classic book Der sogenannte historische Jesus und der geschichtliche, biblische Christus (1892), Martin Kähler pleaded for this “biblicist” solution. Even here, however, the question remains: Why do we recognize an absolutely compelling truth precisely in this biblical Christ—an enigmatic figure who descended from heaven and returned thither, who became a human person and then triumphed over all the powers in heaven and earth as a divine being, who suffered a violent death in order to make possible life and love? Only a convincing answer to this question would show that we had really overcome Lessing's ditch! But is not the biblical image of Christ, like other images of redeemers and deities, every bit as disputed, every bit as relative, and every bit as foreign as the historical Jesus?

2.2. The Attempt to Guarantee the Authenticity of the Picture of Jesus

This need has often been felt, and this endeavor became a program with the “positive-critical” researchers into the history of Jesus, Joachim Jeremias, Leonhard Goppelt, and Werner Georg Kümmel. In the midst of a welter of hypotheses and uncertainties, it was expected that historical research would provide guaranteed results: “Only the Son of Man himself and his word can give authority to our preaching.”<sup>26</sup> The positive-critical solution fails to convince, however, because it must continually leap over the hurdle of the relativizing power of the hypothetical: it makes faith dependent on shifting historical hypotheses. And even if one were to leave this problem aside, we should still have the question: Why do we recognize in one particular selection of the logia of Jesus a voice that addresses us in an absolutely binding manner? Is not the interpretation of all the potentially authentic logia a matter of dispute? And even if they were indisputably authentic, are they not all historically conditioned and potentially foreign?

---

<sup>26</sup> J. Jeremias, “Der gegenwärtige Stand der Debatte um das Problem des historischen Jesus,” in Der historische Jesus und der kerygmatische Christus: Beiträge zum

2.3. The Reduction of the Picture of Jesus in Kerygmatic Theology

Those who have little confidence in the agreed results of historical research, and do not want to make the Christian faith dependent on the shifting hypotheses of scholarship, can follow Rudolf Bultmann's kerygmatic theology and reduce the relationship of the Christian faith to history to the formal "fact" that Jesus has come. In preaching and in living the Christian faith, one refers to the biblical picture of Jesus, but theological argumentation and reflection refer to an invisible point of reference. But the reduction carried out by kerygmatic theology is untenable, because the reduction of the historicity of Jesus to the mere "fact" that he has come presupposes a prior consensus that the one who has come (whoever he may be) possesses absolute significance. If his significance remains invisible within history, it can be expressed only in a myth which transcends history.

We can illustrate this by means of an image: kerygmatic theology sees the human person in the situation of one who is buried alive. For such a person, salvation consists in the simple fact that other people get through to him. It does not matter what they look like, where they come from, or what their motivation may be; the only thing that matters is that they re-establish the link to the world of light and of life. This does however presuppose a certain knowledge of this world of light and of life; it also presupposes that the rescue squad arrive on the scene with the genuine intention of rescuing the one who is buried alive. Similar presuppositions lie behind the reduction in kerygmatic theology. It presupposes the conviction of a "world" of God which lies beyond this world, and the certainty that salvation can be brought about through contact with this "world of God." For only after this is clear, is it possible for the utterly decisive event to occur, viz. that someone from God's world enters into history. Accordingly, it is only within the course of history that the “mere fact” is a “mere fact”: in the framework of the comprehensive myth which transcends history, this “fact” is filled with content from the outset. It is the “fact” that a redeemer has come.

---

Christusverständnis in Forschung und Verkündigung, ed. H. Ristow and K. Matthiae, 2nd ed. (Berlin: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1961), 12–25, at 25.

2.4. The Symbolic Understanding of the Picture of Jesus

A symbolic understanding detaches itself even more consistently from history. Poetic and metaphorical texts possess their truth in themselves, irrespective of their historicity and authenticity. Why may one not interpret the New Testament witness to Jesus as an image and likeness of timeless truths? May one not discover in these texts the insight that the human person in his existence and freedom lives on the basis of a grace that he does not himself control? This internal truth requires no external confirmation. This means that the picture of Jesus is not only “demythologized,” but also “dekerygmaticized”: it is transformed from a message rooted in one particular historical situation into a timeless cipher. On the basis of Karl Jaspers’ philosophy, F. Buri has pleaded for this solution.<sup>27</sup> The symbolic solution may seem the antithesis of the biblicist solution, but it shares the same inadequacy. Both protest against a critical attitude of the modern mentality vis-à-vis historical sources, viz. the methodology which wishes to make a distinction between historical reality and the witnesses to this reality. But we cannot be content (on the basis of an expanded concept of reality) with the affirmation that all the biblical testimony bears witnesses to something “real” in the sense of historical reality. Nor can we be content with an expanding concept of symbol which tells us that all the statements in the Bible—even where they clearly refer to unique historical events—have exclusively a timeless, symbolic meaning. Both approaches are right to affirm that we can prize the traditional texts on their own terms, and that they contain real experiences as well as the experience of something “real”—independently of the historical reality they may contain. But what impels us, when we make affirmations about historically unique events, to see an extra symbolic meaning that points beyond every relative, transitory, and contextually determined meaning? Must we not already have had contact with the eternal, if we perceive something as a symbol of the eternal?

At the close of this essay, all I can attempt is a personal answer, or more precisely, two answers. There is a tension between them. The first answer says: the inextricably hypothetical character of all our knowledge compels us to come to terms with this hypothetical character. This first answer leads to an acceptance of our fragmentary and limited human existence. But the second answer says that the unconditional character of religious faith allows us to put a question which goes beyond all that is hypothetical, since we have in us a “sense” for that which is unconditional, for the eternal, for freedom. This answer leads to the affirmation that we have a “sense” in us which points beyond our fragmentary human existence.

---

<sup>27</sup> F. Buri, “Entmythologisierung oder Entkerygmatisierung der Theologie,” in Kerygma und Mythos II, ed. H. W. Bartsch, ThF 2 (Hamburg: Reich, 1952), 85–101.

2.5. The First Answer: The Hypothetical Character of All Knowledge and Faith

One can come to terms with the hypothetical character of our knowledge and faith. Let me mention four reasons for doing so: a hermeneutical, a philosophical, an aesthetic, and a religious reason.

First, there is a hermeneutical reason, understanding this adjective comprehensively, to mean reflection on all the procedures of intellectual and historical science. In research into the person of Jesus, everything is more or less hypothetical. But in the course of every construction of a hypothesis there necessarily emerges one certainty, viz. that it is meaningful to develop historical hypotheses about Jesus, weighing up the various possibilities and giving preference to those that are more probable. It is precisely the hypothetical relativization—“Things could have been different!”—that gives us the certainty that “There is something that could have been different,” for otherwise it would be meaningless to continue to elaborate hypotheses about this particular object. Even the conviction of his historicity, i.e. of his “mere fact,” is formed by the hypothetical weighing up of the possibilities about what Jesus could have been. Paradoxically, therefore, the consistently hypothetical element in research into Jesus can become the basis of a certainty.

The second reason is philosophical, or more precisely, metaphysical, since it presupposes a picture of the whole of reality. We are well aware that such pictures are bold anticipations of something that we cannot know definitively; the decisive point in our present context is that not only our knowledge, but the whole of our life has a hypothetical character. The stream of life is a process of trial and error which attempts to correspond to the God-given basic conditions of reality. Thus, the world and all of life is a hypothesis which seeks to correspond to the will of God—and this includes our knowledge, just as it includes the New Testament and the Christian religion. Everything is hypothetical, everything can be superseded and rendered obsolete. And precisely for this reason, we can accept the hypothetical character of our knowledge and our faith.

A third answer is based on aesthetic experience. All knowledge has a preliminary character, including our knowledge of Jesus, but we can give this knowledge an aesthetic form which rounds it off in a manner which remains valuable, even if our knowledge is transitory. This is why our pictures of Jesus ought to have an aesthetic character. Poetry reconciles us to the fact that our knowledge will one day be superseded.

The fourth and decisive answer is based on religious faith. All knowledge is a hypothesis—and all life is a hypothetical attempt to respond to God. Every hypothesis is exposed to the risk of failure. But the Christian faith is convinced that God accepts even those variants of life that fail. All life seeks to respond to him—and this response is in fact God's own gift. In his Word, he offers us that which is in accordance with his own self—without prior conditions and in a manner which is absolute and valid for all eternity.

2.6. The Second Answer: A Sense for the Unconditional Element in Knowledge and Faith

Our second answer is generated almost dialectically by the first answer. We must come to terms with the hypothetical character of our thinking and indeed of everything. But this “reconciliation” would be superfluous, if there were not in us something that rebelled against the transitory, relative, and limited character of human existence: a sense for the unconditional and eternal, a sense that protests when it is confronted with reality. Might it not be this sense in us that is activated by some of the traits in the picture of the historical and biblical Jesus, and that makes the historically relative significance of this picture transparent to something that concerns us in an unconditional way? Is this why Christians hear the Word of God in an historically contingent event—i.e., because this sense has been activated in them? The Word of God is a contingent event, and it is as “underivable” as the existence of the world itself. But does it perhaps awaken in us in a subjective manner possibilities of understanding which allow us to ask questions that go beyond the realm of the hypothetical? Objectively speaking, the Word of God encounters us in the New Testament in the form of the person of Jesus Christ, a divine being who lived under the conditions of finitude. May not this christology correspond in a surprising way to these possibilities of understanding in the human person? We will take up these questions at the end of my essay: first, the subjective presuppositions for understanding, and then the objective traits of early Christian christology.<sup>28</sup>

The Word of God creates for itself an internal evidential character in the human person because it corresponds to internal conditions of the human person. What are these a priori conditions? I believe that every claim to validity presupposes three convictions of which one may not necessarily be conscious de facto, but of which one can become conscious. These are the transcendental presuppositions of religious certainty.<sup>29</sup>

2.6.1. The First Insight

A statement that something is true or false claims that it will be true or false even in  $x + n$  years from now. Every claim to validity includes a “claim to eternity.” Even if one relativizes this claim to validity and says that it is limited to particular places and times, one demands for this relativizing assertion itself an unlimited claim to validity for  $x + n$  years. Thus, in all claims to validity we implicitly attest a sense for that which is “eternal,”<sup>30</sup> even if we explicitly deny the existence of such a sense—and will continually and necessarily tend to deny it in view of the overwhelming experience of transitoriness. But even the defiant affirmation that everything is relative would be an empty insight if it did not correspond to an unquenchable search of the human person for that which is not relative.

2.6.2. The Second Insight

All claims to validity include an element of absoluteness. When we measure something against a norm, we give preference to that which corresponds to the norm, not to that which contradicts it.<sup>31</sup> We must

---

<sup>28</sup> In what follows, I present ideas that I have developed in G. Theissen, Die Religion der ersten Christen: Eine Theorie des Urchristentums (Gütersloh: Kaiser, 2000; 3rd ed., 2002), 400–405.

<sup>29</sup> Cf. R. Schaeffler, Fähigkeit zur Erfahrung: Zur transzendentalen Hermeneutik des Sprechens von Gott, QD 94 (Freiburg: Herder, 1982). This book does not simply argue for the existence of God on the basis of transcendental presuppositions in human consciousness. Rather, in historically contingent situations, these presuppositions can be severely shaken, and the collapse of the experiential world which they had constructed allows one to experience that which makes all experience possible.

<sup>30</sup> Cf. A. Nygren, Die Gültigkeit der religiösen Erfahrung (Gütersloh: Bertelsmann, 1922), on the “eternal” as the transcendental basic category of the “religious.”

<sup>31</sup> W. Windelband, “Das Heilige” (extracts in C. Colpe, ed., Die Diskussion um das “Heilige”, WdF 305 [Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1977], 29–56), defines the place of religion not as a sphere alongside logic, ethics, and aesthetics, but as a consciousness of the norms which operate in these spheres in contradiction of that which de facto exists. The “antinomistic coexistence of the norm and of that which give preference to that which we have subjectively recognized as the truth, not to that which we have recognized as an error. One who nevertheless prefers illusion to the truth can do so only because he accords preference to other values, rather than to the cognitive criteria of truth and falsehood: that which serves life or other values is more valuable in his eyes than that which serves the truth. And this means that he too acknowledges the unconditional precedence of the higher norm. Accordingly, wherever we make normative judgments, we are activating an unconditional element in our thinking—even when we explicitly deny that such an element exists.

2.6.3. The Third Insight

When we claim that a statement is valid, we claim that we ourselves take responsibility for it. If our statement was exclusively determined by factors lying in the past, we could do no more than record the fact that we have made a statement: we could never claim validity for it, and a discussion of claims to validity would consist of waiting to see whether we might be “determined” in the future differently than in the present. Even the thesis that everything is determined does not claim to be completely determined by causal factors in the past. It claims to have been formulated in freedom and “responsibility.”

This sense for the eternal, the unconditional, and responsibility becomes productive in religion. With the help of images drawn from the world in which we live, it constructs spaces which go far beyond that environment. In a long historical process of trial and error, religious history has generated symbols and images which correspond exactly to the a priori conditions of religious experience. Above all, we find the traces of such a transcendental poetic work, going beyond everything that belongs to the empirical sphere, in the early Christian belief in Christ.

The human person possesses a priori a sense for the eternal, the unconditional, and responsibility, but experiences himself empirically as transitory, conditioned, and determined. He lives in a split with himself. From the very outset, this sense for the eternal, the uncondicontradicts the norm in one and the same consciousness” (31) leads to the experience of the holy. “The holy, as the consciousness of the normality of the true, the good, and the beautiful, is experienced as transcendental reality” (35; italics original). I would take a more cautious position: the normative consciousness is not religious per se, but it is a necessary presupposition of religious experience. In order for such a normative sensitivity to become religion, further “sufficient” conditions are required.

---

tional, and responsibility helped to shape early Christian christology, and perhaps this helps us understand why the historical Jesus is exalted to the status of a deity. On the basis of a religious a priori, a transitory phenomenon, i.e. a man who lived under limiting conditions and in whose life determinative societal and political factors are recognizable, was acknowledged as a manifestation of something eternal and unconditional that challenges us to take responsibility, and this man was clothed in the mythical aura that is appropriate to a divine being.<sup>32</sup> But the phenomenon of Jesus was not totally absorbed into this mythical aura. People remembered that Jesus was also mortal, conditioned, and not free, i.e. that he was a concrete figure of earthly history. When we ask why his picture was so plausible in the eyes of the first Christians, may not the answer be that this christology corresponds to the structure of the human self—a human self which has a sense for the eternal, the unconditional, and responsibility, but at the same time is exposed to transitoriness, conditions, and coercions? When the gnostic groups interpreted Christ as a symbol of the human self, their insight was correct; the problem was that they denied the unity of the eternal and the transitory, of unconditional and conditioned, of freedom and coercion in this symbol, and maintained a somewhat narcissistic view of the self, which ought in principle to know that it had been set free from this world of the transitory, the conditioned, and the determined.

I believe that it is only the activity of a wholly formal a priori of the eternal, the unconditional, and freedom that explains why human beings in their religious constructions continually transcend the finite empirical world and perceive something eternal in the transitory, something unconditional in the conditioned, and the appeal to assume responsibility in an inexorable fate—a perception with a strong evidential character. It is only when we presuppose such a religious sense in the human person that the nasty wide ditch of G. E. Lessing opens up between the realm of the unconditional (which is the objective of this religious sense) and the realm of the historical.

Let me explicitly emphasize that a transcendental category denotes only that we necessarily develop the idea of something “eternal.” But since we automatically and necessarily develop this idea, we are always uncertain whether any objective reality corresponds to it: a sense for the “eternal” is not in itself proof of the evidence of the “eternal.” It is however clear that without a formal sense for the “eternal,” it would be impossible for substantial ideas about the “eternal” to be generated in the religious imagination, or to find belief. More specifically, the insight into the “eternity” of logical structures is no basis for religious experience; but without the sense for the “eternal” which is articulated in those structures, there would be no wider-reaching religious experience of the eternal.

---

<sup>32</sup> We find a formally comparable interpretation of the early Christian christology as the outcome of the elaboration of indisputably historical facts by a religious a priori in R. Otto, Das Heilige (München: Beck, 1917), 183–184: Jesus is “the holy in its manifestation,” which can be affirmed with an inner evidential character thanks to a religious a priori in the human person.

The early Christian religion offered more than a plausibility based on its correspondence to transcendental categories of the human consciousness. It had such a strong evidential character because it was able at the same time to cope with the shattering of such categories. We can consciously deny something that is presupposed a priori in our consciousness as a transcendental category, because overwhelmingly powerful experiences argue against it. The sense for the eternal contradicts the experience of transitoriness, the sense for responsibility contradicts the experience of coercion and dependence, the sense for the unconditional contradicts the experience that everything is relative. The transcendental categories of our consciousness do not automatically win acceptance in our experience. They can be shaken to their foundations, and a whole world can collapse along with them. In borderline experiences, that which “automatically” determines our consciousness can be “de-automatized.”<sup>33</sup> That which seems utterly obvious is called into question. In the early Christian religion, this shattering of the “self” is portrayed in impressive images, perhaps most impressively in the gnostic metaphors and myths. Here, the “self” of the human person is a spark that has been thrown into a hostile world and subjugated to transitoriness and bodiliness, although it bears in itself a spark (often buried) of the “eternal,” the “unconditional,” and “freedom.” The Christianity in the mainstream communities adopted ideas which lay close to gnosis. In the affirmations of the Gospel of John, Christ is the only gnostic who knows whence he comes and whither he goes (John 8:14), and all Christians can understand their own “self” if they take him as their model. Through <sup>33</sup> The intuitive gnostic experience of the self as a phenomenon related to a divine being is one variant of mystical experiences. In the case of mystical experiences, scholars have rightly drawn attention to the great importance of the de-automatization of the perception and the processing of impressions. Cf. N. G. Holm, Einführung in die Religionspsychologie, UTB 1592 (München: Reinhardt, 1990), 72–75.

---

Jesus, a little light of eternity has been rekindled in them; through him, an unconditional value has entered the world; through him, freedom has been bestowed. And in his figure—in his failure, his suffering and dying—people found the strength to endure the shattering to which the transcendental depths of our self are exposed.

We began by speaking of Lessing's wide ditch. This is the ditch between hypothetical knowledge and unconditional faith. At the end of our reflections, we can say that this is a double ditch. The first ditch prevents us from finding a certain approach to history; the second prevents us from finding a confident approach to God. And yet, we have seen that certainty can arise at the meeting point between axiomatic certainty and contingent external factors. In historical science and in faith, however, this axiomatic certainty has a different nature. In history, the basic axioms are a product of history: they are based on the experience of studying history, and are in principle discovered a posteriori, although they function as an indisputable a priori in historical reconstruction. In religion, on the other hand, these axiomatic certainties are based on formal a priori categories which we bring with us (so to speak). In both cases, we must activate subjective presuppositions in ourselves, if we are to be successful. But nothing can spare us from leaping into the ditch and swimming to the other shore. There, a helping hand may perhaps reach out to us. Generations of Christians have experienced this hand, as the grace of God which accepts even our hypothetical attempts; and sometimes also as an inner light which continues to shine even in our failures. The philosophy of religion can show that the encounter with the contingent Word of God activates a religious sense in us, a sense for the eternal, the unconditional, and freedom. This makes us sensitive to the encounter with the Word. For many people, this sensitivity makes the Bible a potential place of dialogue with the living God, and thus the medium of a certainty which goes far beyond historical plausibility and transcendental reflection.

A METALANGUAGE FOR THE HISTORICAL JESUS METHODS: AN EXPERIMENT

TOM HOLMÉN

1. Introduction

The reader who has scrupulously worked through the different methodological approaches incorporated into this volume can scarcely have avoided noticing their great diversity. Indeed, the diversity is highlighted to such an extent that in this respect at least, the volume can safely be regarded as having reached its goal. One of the ideas underlying this volume has been to manifest the methodological heterogeneity of current historical Jesus research.<sup>1</sup> Such a display should put us in a better position to analyze the multiple viewpoints, to create ways of handling their diversity, and perhaps even to dismiss unnecessary multiformity and variegation, thus promoting more enlightened learning.

The analysis of the diversity can take several forms. While it would be an interesting and important undertaking to evaluate the presented approaches as functional methods, assess their pros and cons etc., the target of this essay lies elsewhere. The approaches teem with various terms, concepts and expressions which aim to illuminate the viewpoints to the problem of the historical Jesus suggested in each given approach. The fact, however, that the approaches almost always introduce new terminology and, on the other hand, often use common terms and concepts with diverging purposes, poses a serious threat to the pursuit of illumination.<sup>2</sup> Even trained scholars often find it difficult to grasp fully the niceties of a given approach that its terminology indicates—and, in particular, to understand them in relation to the fine points of the other approaches. This essay seeks to improve this situation by suggesting a tool that would, in the first place, promote easier and more exact analysis and comparison of the various historical Jesus methods. To this end, the essay devises a second-order vocabulary in relation to which the different technical terms, concepts and expressions employed in the approaches (i.e., the first-order vocabulary) are arranged.<sup>3</sup> However, the tool cannot remain a simple glossary. It must be fashioned in such a way that it can also accommodate the structures that bind together the first-order words. Hence, I propose a metalanguage. As a second-order analytical method, it should enable a more accurate discussion of the different historical Jesus methods.

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Introduction to this volume.

<sup>2</sup> To put it pointedly, in order to gain a full command of all the methods one needs to learn previously unknown words with previously unknown meanings, previously known words with previously unknown meanings, previously unknown words with previously known meanings, and previously known words with previously known but different meanings. And this varies from one approach to another. A situation like this is typical of an evolving methodology, but can also reflect scholarship which after a pause heads for new directions.

In the absence of previous treatments along these lines (as far as I know), this presentation takes the character of an experiment.

2. The Basic Scheme<sup>4</sup>

Fundamentally, the metalanguage can be divided into (a) vocabulary, also called “lexemes”, and (b) structure. The structure, in turn, comprises (b1) relationships between the various lexemes and (b2) orders of observance of the lexemes and their relationships. I will approach the metalanguage from the point of view of the lexemes. It is these that mostly require elaboration on the theoretical level. The structure, i.e., relationships and orders of observance, will mainly be reflected in the example analyses. For the sake of terminological transparency I will assemble the metalanguage out of lexemes that more or less closely resemble the vocabulary of the object language. The structure of the metalanguage, again, should flexibly emulate the structures of the historical Jesus methods. All in all, I propose to work with this basic scheme:

---

<sup>3</sup> In the present article, accordingly, the technical words used in the approaches are not in fact compared with each other or organized in relation to each other. Rather, they are compared within and organized in relation to the second-order vocabulary.

<sup>4</sup> The knowledge base on which I draw in this presentation covers all kinds of literature. However, the foremost context of the metalanguage is formed by the approaches of the present volume, and my references to the object language largely relate to them.

Naturally, what the scholars ask ('Question') and how they regard the results ('Answer') are highly relevant to the pursuit of historical Jesus research. Hence, I emphasize their significance by including columns I and III in this scheme. However, it is column II that most centrally comes into view in methodological discussions. Although I will also consider the impacts of the 'Question' and the 'Answer' on the work of a historical Jesus scholar, the investigation he or she pursues, the clear focus of this essay will be on the column II issues.<sup>5</sup>

I will now zoom, phase by phase, more and more deeply into the texture of the metalanguage. On the level of what I call the basic lexemes (i.e., when "zoomed out") I suggest the following second-order terms and concepts (cf. a): the 'context of the scholar,' the 'sources for Jesus,' the 'manipulation of the sources,' 'information,' 'Jesus' historical context,' 'organizing the information,' and 'interpretation.' The relative transparency of this vocabulary immediately allows us to study the most elementary mutual relationships of these terms (cf. b1).<sup>6</sup> 'Sources for Jesus' are indispensable to every investigation into the historical Jesus, because they contain the 'information' about Jesus. In order to find the 'information' in the 'sources for Jesus,' modern critical scholarship has required 'manipulation of the sources.' An 'interpretation' is sought by viewing the 'information' within 'Jesus' historical context' and by 'organizing the information' into a coherent picture of Jesus. (One should note that a categorical distinction between information and interpretation is possible only within the confines of the metalanguage. Thus, no positivistic understanding of historiography is implied here.) All this is given perspective by a reflective consideration of the 'context of the scholar' himself or herself.

---

<sup>5</sup> Thus, it remains an open possibility that 'Question' and 'Answer' could in turn be divided into further lexemes.

<sup>6</sup> Please note that the following explication does not yet aim to put observation of the relationships in any deliberate order.

Nevertheless, this explication of relationships is only one alternative among many, although on this level we are looking only at the basic lexemes. For some scholars, observing 'Jesus' historical context' belongs—either additionally or exclusively—to the 'manipulation of the sources.' Further, while some scholars do not place much emphasis on the 'context of the scholar,' others pay considerable attention to this. Again, while 'organizing the information' plays no visible role at all in some methods, it is included in others. There are also differences with regard to what scholars think should be included in 'interpretation.'

A basic order for observing the lexemes and their relationships (cf. b2) is also unproblematical. Often, scholars begin with the 'sources for Jesus,' proceed to the 'manipulation of the sources,' and then to 'information.' This, indeed, is the vocabulary and structure of the historical Jesus method in its very rudiments, and it serves as the applied scheme in the approaches of many scholars. The need to make the metalanguage all-inclusive with respect to the object language has led me to include as many as seven items in column II. Next, the most usual addition to the structure and observation order is 'Jesus' historical context.' As I have pointed out, this sometimes forms part of the 'manipulation of the sources'; sometimes it is presupposed by 'interpretation,' and sometimes both usages coexist. Hence, 'Jesus' historical context' may be second (and is then included in the 'manipulation of the sources') and/or come after 'information' (which is third). In the latter case, it can appear alone or in conjunction with 'organizing the information.' Consequently, these two take either the fourth or fifth place. 'Interpretation' can take either the fourth place (i.e. in the rudimentary structure) or fifth or sixth (i.e. if some combination of 'Jesus' historical context,' the 'manipulation of the sources,' and/or 'organizing the information' is included). Finally, the methods which on the whole take 'the context of the scholar' into account most often consider it first: i.e. this is their starting point, rather than the 'sources for Jesus.' This pushes the other lexemes back on the list: e.g., 'interpretation' can come seventh at most.

In this way, even a brief explication of the observation orders in the various methodological approaches produces a considerable complex of alternatives. And even more alternatives exist; the more we go into detail, the more alternatives will we see. We need not elaborate them theoretically; see the appendix, where I have set out in full the discussed orders of observation.<sup>7</sup> Otherwise the relationships and orders of observation will again come into view in the examples of concrete analysis to follow later on below.

3. An Elaborate Vocabulary

At this point, the next step forward (or “zooming in”) is the further explication of the vocabulary we have used so far, viz. the basic lexemes. From this point on, however, the elaboration of the second-order vocabulary becomes too abstract to be pursued without references to the first-order terms and concepts. We thus need to ask: What are the concrete representations of the metalanguage lexemes in the object language and what further lexemes are required?

3.1. Sources for Jesus

‘Sources for Jesus’ is naturally understood to denote the ‘documents,’ such as the synoptic gospels, their sources, the Gospels of John and Thomas as well as some other writings that scholars have suggested. However, there are even other types of materials that are employed as ‘sources for Jesus.’ For example, sociology sometimes takes on such a role, with statements about Jesus being extrapolated from the sociological data of Jesus’ time and place. Further along this line of methodological thinking, we find various sociological models used to explain and describe Jesus. Partly related to these are various role categories, such as prophet, sage, teacher, Cynic itinerant, charismatic, miracle worker, or messianic claimant, which sometimes help complement the picture of Jesus which is based on information acquired elsewhere and justifies identifying him with some specific role category. Finally, archaeology, topography etc. can in principle be employed as independent ‘sources for Jesus,’ although they are most often integrated into the sociological approaches. The ‘sources for Jesus’ can thus be divided into ‘documents’ and other materials which I call ‘extrapolative sources.’ With this latter type of ‘sources for Jesus,’ one must always examine carefully whether they are genuinely used to increase the ‘information’ about Jesus, i.e. whether they genuinely serve as ‘sources for Jesus,’ or merely guide the ‘interpretation’ of the ‘information,’ i.e. whether they offer data for

---

<sup>7</sup> See Appendix 1.

‘Jesus’ historical context.’ Sometimes, however, these alternatives are merely semantic.

3.2. Information

‘Information’ means that material of the ‘sources for Jesus’ which is deemed useable in a scholarly reconstruction of the historical Jesus. This pragmatic formulation is chosen in order to avoid getting involved in the discussion about the concepts of authenticity or historicity and the tricky questions of certainty, objectivity, a positivistic understanding of historiography, etc., which are often attached to these concepts. Ultimately, the important point is that a scholar uses some particular material in drawing a picture of Jesus. ‘Information’ is the material a given scholar believes it possible to utilize in this task.

We must observe a distinction within ‘information,’ viz. ‘specific’ vs. ‘general information.’ For instance, the Q-pericope Matt 12:28 / Luke 11:20 tells about the relation between Jesus’ exorcisms and the kingdom of God. This I would categorize as ‘specific information.’ On the other hand, there is the overall motif of the kingdom of God which, irrespective of the details of any particular pericope or individual tradition, finds expression across the length and breadth of the sources. This overall motif is clearly ‘general information.’ Hence, we can look at Matt 12:28 / Luke 11:20 in two ways, seeking either ‘specific’ or ‘general information.’ Another example is the texts Luke 17:20–21 and Matt 12:28 / Luke 11:20. They share the particular motif of Jesus’ speaking of the kingdom as present (best classified as ‘specific information’). Naturally, they also share the overall motif of the kingdom (‘general information’).

I shall refer to this distinction, which is evaluated variously in the different methods, as the ‘type of information.’ The distinction is especially important with respect to the ‘manipulation of the sources.’

3.3. Manipulation of the Sources

‘Manipulation of the sources’ is performed in order to identify the ‘information’ in the ‘sources for Jesus.’ This denotes the procedures by means of which the various methods decide on what material offered by the ‘sources for Jesus’ can be used in reconstructing a scholarly portrait of the historical Jesus. Obviously, ‘manipulation of the sources’ can take very various forms. This is also dependent on various issues:

First (i), ‘manipulation of the sources’ will take different forms, depending on what kind of ‘sources for Jesus’ one proposes to utilize. Many of the more commonly known procedures involved in ‘manipulation of the sources,’ such as the so-called criteria of authenticity or tradition criticism, are designed to be applicable to ‘documents,’ but not to ‘extrapolative sources.’ Still, clearly, if one intends to employ the ‘extrapolative sources,’ one should also determine a methodological approach to them which is appropriate to critical research. We do not use ‘documents’ without discrimination, nor should we use ‘extrapolative sources’ without reflecting on how we critically and methodologically ‘manipulate’ them in order to obtain ‘information.’ The ‘extrapolative sources’ indeed require a specific methodological approach of their own type.<sup>8</sup> In this field, however, work has still to begin.<sup>9</sup>

Secondly (ii), ‘manipulation of the sources’ depends on the ‘type of information’ one primarily searches for in each given situation. While some forms of ‘manipulation of the sources’ are suitable for the detection of general level ‘information,’ others are required for ferreting out specific ‘information.’ For instance, ‘manipulation’ that can establish as ‘information’ that Jesus was known as a miracle-worker and exorcist will not necessarily work with one particular miracle or exorcism story (and vice versa).

Thirdly (iii), in the specific case of ‘documents,’ one can concentrate on ‘manipulating’ either fragments or larger quantities of the source material. The first alternative can be illustrated by an analysis (cf. ‘manipulation’) of Mark 2:18–20 which tries to determine its

---

<sup>8</sup> As far as I know, this observation, prompted by the metalanguage, has not been made so clearly before now. Judged on the basis of scholarly discussion, many scholars are skeptical about the use of sociological and similar methods because of the lack of criteria for determination of how the available sociological and comparable (sc. what I call “extrapolative”) knowledge about Jesus’ time and place can also be seen to pertain to Jesus specifically. On the other hand, frustration over the criteria of authenticity has sometimes turned scholars’ attention from ‘documents’ to ‘extrapolative sources.’ The solution of the metalanguage is to treat the knowledge acquired by sociology, archaeology etc. as ‘sources for Jesus,’ not as ‘information.’ This inevitably subjects the output of those methods to ‘manipulation’ of some kind.

<sup>9</sup> Although a lively debate continues about the authenticity criteria and the other tools needed to gauge ‘documents’—in other words, no consensus is in sight—there is a prior tradition of discussion in which scholars can participate. As to the ‘extrapolative sources,’ however, no such comparable tradition is available; the methodological apparatus, i.e., the ‘manipulation of the sources’ suited to gauging sociological data or models etc. as ‘sources for Jesus’ which yield ‘information,’ needs to be determined almost from scratch.

authenticity (cf. ‘information’). An example of the ‘manipulation’ of larger quantities of source material is the analysis of the entire parable tradition.<sup>10</sup>

One central difference between ii and iii is thus that ii deals with the purpose of ‘manipulation,’ i.e., ‘manipulation’ in order to (sc. identify particular ‘type of information,’ namely general or specific), while iii is concerned with what is being ‘manipulated,’ i.e., ‘manipulation’ of (sc. a certain proportion of source material, namely fragments or larger quantities).<sup>11</sup> In principle, one can ‘manipulate larger quantities’ in order to find ‘specific information’ or ‘manipulate fragments’ in order to find ‘general information.’ Usually, however, ‘manipulation of larger quantities’ is more apt to yield ‘general information’ and, correspondingly, ‘manipulation of fragments’ to yield ‘specific information.’

The result is a somewhat idiosyncratic vocabulary, but I believe that the distinctions made are justified and necessary with respect to the functionality of the metalanguage since, as a matter of fact, ‘manipulation of the sources’ is the lexeme mostly in view in the object language discussions.

‘Manipulation of the sources’

- ‘manipulation of extrapolative sources’ and
- ‘manipulation of documents’ → (i)
- ‘manipulation of fragments’ and
- ‘manipulation of larger quantities’ → (iii)
- ‘manipulation for general information’ and
- ‘manipulation for specific information’ → (ii)

---

<sup>10</sup> One could also point out the resistance of some scholars to deal with short units and individual pericopes on their own. Most notably in this volume, see the remarks by Horsley: “Focusing on individual Jesus-sayings as abstracted artifacts is thus a dead-end street that will not lead to the historical figure... We are thus led to focus in almost the diametrically opposite way to standard study of the synoptic tradition. That is, we must focus on the overall series of speeches in Q and the overall story in Mark, in order to understand not only ‘the whole picture’ but also the way each component of the overall series or story functioned in and constituted the whole picture.” Cf. also many remarks by Kirk.

<sup>11</sup> In theory, one could suppose that a different kind of ‘manipulation’ is required in every combination of ii and iii: ‘manipulation’ of fragments in order to identify general information, ‘manipulation’ of larger quantities in order to identify general information, ‘manipulation’ of fragments in order to identify specific information, and ‘manipulation’ of larger quantities in order to identify specific information.

3.4. Jesus' Historical Context

This lexeme comes very near to the object language. Of course, many things are examined in the concrete study of the historical context, and this makes several second-order distinctions evident. There are, on the one hand, sources for Jesus' context, i.e. the material that provides information about the context. On the other hand, there are also particular ways of looking at this material, i.e. different centers of attention depending on the perspective from which the information provided by the sources is sifted and sorted out. Among the sources I count, first, the literature of the period of the given context, second, archaeology and comparable sciences (e.g., paleography), and third, social-scientific and cognate methods. I call these 'context materials.' There are four centers of attention: topics (e.g., cultural, economical, political, psychological and religious contexts), locations (e.g., Jerusalem, Nazareth, Galilee, Judea and Palestine), influences (e.g., Jewish, Roman and Hellenistic), and perspectives (e.g., individual, group, inside, outside, the marginal, the essential, the oppressed, the oppressors). I shall name these 'context vantage points.'

3.5. Organizing the Information

This mainly deals with the problem of relating the part to the whole and vice versa. One should observe that what is being addressed here is the 'information,' i.e. that material of the 'sources for Jesus' which, thanks to 'manipulation of the sources,' has been deemed useable in a scholarly reconstruction of the historical Jesus.<sup>12</sup> Surprisingly few scholars have put any greater effort into finding out how to properly and orderly collect and appraise the pieces of information that have been obtained about the historical Jesus. Nonetheless, this can be highly relevant, especially when painting a full-length portrait of Jesus. There are always several alternative choices with regard to emphasizing the parts in the whole and identifying the relationships between the parts, and all this adds up to a particular interpretation of the parts and the whole alike. Naturally, when a scholar focuses only on one more specific motif or aspect of Jesus life, 'organizing the information' must be done in a somewhat different way. It is usual to try to enhance understanding of the motif or aspect under scrutiny by viewing it against the background of selected wider themes of Jesus' proclamation, especially such themes that the motif or aspect in question can be regarded as forming part of or being essentially related to.<sup>13</sup> There are thus two basic modes of 'organizing the information': 'full-scale' and 'selective.'

---

<sup>12</sup> Thus, not all kinds of data about Jesus are included here. In common parlance, one would speak of material that has been deemed authentic. The concept of authenticity is, however, usually related to 'documents' only.

3.6. Interpretation

This is how scholars believe they should understand the 'information' contained by the 'sources for Jesus.'<sup>14</sup> In concrete research work, presuppositions always attach to information, thus generating an interpretation. In other words, in reality there never exists completely uninterpreted, "pure" or "raw" data. The proposed second-order language seeks to accommodate this reality through the lexemes 'Jesus' historical context,' 'organizing the information' and the 'context of the scholar.' The last of these lexemes should be seen to regulate all the others, so it is properly given an independent position. Formally, thus, 'information' is turned into 'interpretation' through illumination by an assessment of 'Jesus' historical context' and/or 'organizing the information.'

There are, in principle, two types of 'interpretation': 'descriptive' and 'imperative.' These categories seek to name the possible uses of the research results. What should we think about the function of the results? Is it only to supply a historical description of Jesus, or also to draw further conclusions from this?<sup>15</sup> One should be careful neither to equate nor to confuse these categories with the motives which prompt research into the historical Jesus. One ongoing discussion has addressed the problematic of theological motives vs. historical interest. In principle, 'descriptive' and 'imperative interpretations' can both be inspired by both of these motives. However, the discussion of motives is not properly a concern of 'interpretation.' Instead, the metalanguage locates this discussion in the 'context of the scholar.'

---

<sup>13</sup> For example, an investigation into Jesus' conception of the Sabbath is viewed against the wider theme of Jesus and the law.

<sup>14</sup> 'Information' comes close to 'Question,' but I prefer to deal with them as basically separate lexemes.

<sup>15</sup> For examples of such further conclusions, see "Some Elementary Translation" below. 'Imperative interpretation' does not mean, for instance, using the scholarly picture of the historical Jesus to explain the emergence of early Christianity.

3.7. Context of the Scholar

Since the scholar is the one who applies the method, the ‘context of the scholar’ should be seen to affect every other lexeme in the metalanguage vocabulary. By the same token, since it is the scholar who applies the method, the lexeme could also simply be entitled ‘scholar,’ for it is through the scholar that his or her context likewise becomes operational. However, I prefer to employ the concept of “context” for the reference to the outside influence on the scholar which it offers.

In real life, there are almost innumerable things that can count as constituents of the ‘context of the scholar,’ i.e., factors that can potentially influence the scholarly work via the scholar himself or herself. While it is essential to realize their variety and actuality, it is also possible to outline some categories among them, e.g. permanent and transient factors, as well as innate capacities (basically permanent) and acquired capacities (permanent and transient). A list grouped according to these divisions could look like this:

permanent factors

- innate capacities (gender, color, talents, nationality, personality, penchants)
- acquired capacities (personality, penchants, skills, learned knowledge, convictions, profession, religiosity, ideology, experiences, habits)

transient factors

- place of employment, life situation, social relationships, health, mood, environment

One should naturally assume that the boundaries between the categories are more or less shifting.<sup>16</sup> For example, the permanency of acquired capacities is relative. The same is true even of some innate capacities.<sup>17</sup>

This brings us to the end of the elaboration of the second-order vocabulary. For the purpose of clarification, Appendix 2 displays all the lexemes with the references to the object language. Following the work of “zooming in,” I will now seek to “translate” some of the methodological approaches included in the present volume into the metalanguage.

---

<sup>16</sup> Wealth and class are difficult to categorize at all, and they are not included in the above list.

<sup>17</sup> Ultimately, whether some of the innate capabilities mentioned here can also be regarded as transient depends on the anthropology one prefers.

4. Some Elementary “Translations”

One should observe that the renderings given below are intentionally rudimentary. No complete unraveling of the methods is attempted, for this would require considerably longer treatments than are possible here. Also, one should not produce a finished assessment of a scholar’s historical Jesus method on the basis of only one piece of writing, at least when this was not composed with a view to producing an account of the historical Jesus method with a comprehensiveness approximating to that of the metalanguage. In particular, I will not offer a critique of the methodological approaches, although this is one potential use of the metalanguage. Instead, the goal of the following discussion is merely to exemplify the analysis of historical Jesus methods by means of the metalanguage, to help us evaluate how, in more specific terms, the metalanguage can facilitate analysis and comparison of methods, and what other uses it could have.

In reading the following discussion, it is advisable to consult Appendix 2. Please observe that I occasionally use abbreviated forms of the metavocabulary (as throughout in this article, the words belonging to the second-order vocabulary are signaled by single quotation marks). My procedure is simple: I first list the lexemes of main relevance to the given methodological approach, then describe the relationships and orders of observation.

4.1. Dale C. Allison

The central vocabulary employed by D. Allison consists of the ‘documents,’ the ‘extrapolative source’ of role categories, ‘general information,’ ‘manipulation for general information,’ ‘manipulation of larger quantities,’ ‘Jesus’ historical context,’ ‘selective organizing of the information,’ and ‘acquired capacities’ of the scholar.<sup>18</sup> Allison emphasizes that it is mainly ‘general information’ the ‘documents’ really can yield. He argues for this on the basis of ‘acquired experiences of the scholar.’<sup>19</sup> He seeks to shape the 'manipulation of the sources' accordingly, underlining the importance of 'manipulation for general information' as well as 'manipulation of larger quantities'<sup>20</sup> and lending further support to this decision by an appeal to 'acquired convictions of the scholar' which he claims frustrate the 'manipulation of fragments.'<sup>21</sup> He also sees considerable problems in the inherent methodology of the 'manipulation of fragments.'<sup>22</sup> To 'manipulation for general information' and 'manipulation of larger quantities' he adds 'manipulation of extrapolative sources' of role categories,<sup>23</sup> 'Jesus' historical context' and 'selective organizing of the information.'<sup>24</sup> Allison's current approach addresses 'interpretation' in his attempt at minimizing the role of the 'context of the scholar,' that is, at excluding as much as possible the influence from 'acquired convictions of the scholar.'<sup>25</sup>

---

<sup>18</sup> Hence, whenever listing the main lexemes, I am not yet seeking to imply any order of observation.

<sup>19</sup> The followers were likely to remember the big picture and to have got the general impression right. This is in general how the human memory works.

4.2. Jürgen Becker

Becker's main lexemes are 'Question,' 'manipulation of documents,' 'context of the scholar,' 'organizing the information,' 'manipulation of extrapolative sources,' 'Jesus' historical context,' and 'sources for Jesus.' For Becker, the 'sources for Jesus' are 'documents,' and the discussion of how to deal with them in an appropriate way takes a central place in his approach. Becker allows for both 'manipulation for general information' and 'manipulation for specific information,' and he accepts 'manipulation of fragments' as being in line with the nature of the 'sources.' At the same time, he shows a somewhat critical attitude to 'manipulation of larger quantities.' He is also cautious about including 'Jesus' historical context' in 'manipulation of the sources.' Becker sees an integral link

---

<sup>20</sup> If anything can be trusted in the 'documents,' it is the general motifs and themes that are recurrently attested in the tradition. Allison also mentions giving preference to a narrative that is able to clarify more data in a more satisfactory fashion than its rivals.

<sup>21</sup> The criteria of authenticity (included by Allison in the 'manipulation of fragments' and therefore not well suited to general motifs and themes recurring in the tradition) cannot reverse a scholar's previous convictions ("prior inclinations") about Jesus. These criteria tend only to be utilized as means of justifying them ex post facto.

<sup>22</sup> The criteria are also contradictory and contain many inherent weaknesses.

<sup>23</sup> "The paradigm of Jesus as apocalyptic prophet."

<sup>24</sup> Correlating the major, recurring themes and motifs with certain circumstances about Jesus' life that can be recovered with confidence: rough dates, baptism by John the Baptist, the journey from Galilee to Jerusalem, arrest and condemnation, and crucifixion.

<sup>25</sup> This attempt results in discarding the 'manipulation of fragments' and opting for other forms of 'manipulation of the sources.'

between the ‘Question’ and the need to elaborate a proper ‘manipulation of the sources.’ Furthermore, a proper ‘manipulation of the sources’ can enable the scholar to gain some control of the influence of the ‘context of the scholar.’ The ‘manipulation’ also makes the scholar aware of this influence. Despite focusing on ‘documents,’ Becker briefly considers ‘manipulation of extrapolative sources.’ Here he also pays some attention to ‘organizing the information.’

4.3. John D. Crossan

Crossan’s methodological approach displays lexemes such as ‘cultural vantage point,’ ‘political vantage point,’ ‘locations,’ ‘context materials,’ ‘documents,’ ‘manipulation of documents’ and ‘Jesus’ historical context.’ Crossan deals with ‘documents’ and sees the ‘manipulation of documents’ as including both ‘manipulation of larger quantities’ and ‘manipulation of fragments.’<sup>26</sup> In particular, however, ‘Jesus’ historical context’ is a constituent of Crossan’s ‘manipulation of sources.’<sup>27</sup> With this in mind, Crossan articulates ‘Jesus’ historical context’ carefully and systematically, using mainly the lexemes of ‘cultural vantage point,’ ‘political vantage point,’ and ‘locations.’ He is also selective in his choice of the ‘context materials,’ including mainly certain ‘context literature.’<sup>28</sup> ‘Context archaeology’ is mentioned. Further, Crossan pays attention both to the ‘context of the scholar’ and to the ‘Question.’<sup>29</sup>

4.4. Richard A. Horsley

The two all-important lexemes of Horsley’s vocabulary are ‘Jesus’ historical context’ and ‘manipulation of larger quantities.’ Horsley emphasizes the importance of a minute and comprehensive study of ‘Jesus’ historical context’ involving virtually all conceivable ‘context materials’ and ‘context vantage points.’<sup>30</sup> For Horsley, the ‘sources for Jesus’ are mainly ‘documents’ (some weight is also given to the ‘extrapolative source’ of role categories), which must be considered along the lines

---

<sup>26</sup> The starting point is Q. The earliest material (which alone will be used) is to be found both in Q and in one or more independent sources. The examples give traditions with only a few attestations and with attestations in a larger amount of material.

<sup>27</sup> The earliest material (to be found both in Q and in one or more independent sources) is tested against ‘Jesus’ historical context.’

<sup>28</sup> The gospels must not be used as the ‘context materials.’

<sup>29</sup> He opts for interactivism and for not distinguishing between the “Jesus of history” and the “Christ of faith” at least as the presumption of historical research.

<sup>30</sup> See the discussion in his chs. 1 and 2.

of the ‘manipulation of larger quantities.’<sup>31</sup> An essential element in this manipulation is the careful and variegated assessment of ‘Jesus’ historical context,’<sup>32</sup> which also helps counteract the ‘context of the scholar.’<sup>33</sup>

4.5. John P. Meier

The prime lexemes of Meier’s approach are ‘Question,’ ‘documents,’ and ‘manipulation of fragments.’ Meier discusses carefully what exactly is the ‘Question’<sup>34</sup> and sees the ‘manipulation of the sources’ as a logical outcome of this discussion.<sup>35</sup> Here he concentrates on ‘documents’ and pursues mainly the ‘manipulation of fragments.’ However, ‘manipulation of larger quantities’ is also within the range of Meier’s methodological thinking, with the differentiation of ‘manipulation for general information’ and ‘manipulation for specific information.’<sup>36</sup>

4.6. Jacques Schlosser

Schlosser’s key vocabulary consists of the ‘context of the scholar,’ ‘documents,’ the ‘explorative source’ of religious tradition, ‘manipulation of fragments’ and ‘Question.’ According to Schlosser, the ‘context of the scholar’ is not simply a factor whose influence should be minimized; it can also make a positive contribution to scholarly work and aid in the ‘manipulation of the sources.’<sup>37</sup> Schlosser’s ‘sources for Jesus’ are mainly ‘documents.’ He does consider the ‘explorative sources’ (explicitly that of religious tradition) but remains still largely skeptical of them, inter

---

<sup>31</sup> Horsley strongly criticizes the basis of form criticism’s work on short units, sayings and pericopes.

<sup>32</sup> “Those representations can then be evaluated in their own historical context, then compared and contrasted against the background of what we know of the historical context of Jesus-in-mission in Galilee and Judea.”

<sup>33</sup> Apprehension of ‘Jesus’ historical context’ reduces the domestication of the gospel sources and Jesus “as if they belonged to us.” Much of Horsley’s approach here is obstructed by the fact that the article only seeks to present its rough outlines: “It will take many years and sensitive analyses and studies even to begin to formulate an adequate approach to Jesus-in-movement-in-context that is both contextual and relational.”

<sup>34</sup> Real, earthly, historical and historic Jesuses?

<sup>35</sup> Picturing the historical Jesus requires critical and methodical use of the ‘sources for Jesus.’

<sup>36</sup> Cf. the examples of the general motif of the kingdom of God attested by a “wide sweep of witnesses in different sources and genres” and the precise words and actions of the Last Supper.

<sup>37</sup> Among other things, he advocates the scholar’s sympathy towards the sources, since this is a precondition of comprehension.

alia because of the way in which he sees the ‘Question.’<sup>38</sup> Further, he concentrates on the ‘manipulation of fragments.’<sup>39</sup>

4.7. Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza

Schüssler Fiorenza’s vocabulary centers on lexemes such as ‘context of the scholar,’ ‘extrapolative sources,’ ‘interpretation,’ ‘Question,’ and ‘Answer.’ Central to Schüssler Fiorenza’s methodological thinking is the ‘context of the scholar,’ which she elaborates in various ways. The central constituents of the ‘context’ seem to be ‘innate capacities’ such as gender, color and nationality, although other aspects too figure prominently. Unlike many authors, Schüssler Fiorenza sees the ‘context of the scholar,’ not as a factor whose influence one should seek to rule out (as far as possible), but as something one should articulate and allow to participate in the work of the scholar in a controlled manner. The exact purport of “controlled” is derived from those contemporary values that one regards as correct.<sup>40</sup> So strong is the control of the ‘context of the scholar’ that it partially takes on the role of the ‘manipulation of the sources.’<sup>41</sup> It also largely dictates how one views ‘Jesus’ historical context.’<sup>42</sup> Further, it participates in defining the sociological model that is utilized as an ‘extrapolative source.’<sup>43</sup> Here some attention is given to ‘manipulation of extrapolative sources’ as well. Because of the particular understanding of the ‘context of the scholar,’ ‘interpretation’ emerges as crucial. Obviously, ‘interpretation’ must be ‘imperative.’ While the ‘context of the scholar’ almost becomes one with the ‘Question,’ ‘interpretation’ closely identifies with the <sup>38</sup> The individual has made a comeback as the object of historical research. Accordingly, Jesus should be granted a certain degree of autonomy, which renders extrapolations from general circumstances and constraints of Jesus dubious.

---

<sup>39</sup> This is required by the nature of the ‘documents.’

<sup>40</sup> For otherwise, some other modern interpretative framework takes over. Thus, the central question is the ethics of interpretation.

<sup>41</sup> A criterion of historical possibility instead of the criterion of plausibility: a feminist egalitarian reconstruction is to be preferred unless one can prove that it is impossible. Usually the procedure is an opposite one, i.e., scholars turn to ‘manipulation of the sources’ in order to exclude the influence of the ‘context of the scholar.’

<sup>42</sup> What is thinkable or possible within Jesus’ historical context must be adjudicated in terms of an emancipatory reconstructive model of early Christian beginnings.

<sup>43</sup> It is necessary to replace the millenarian reconstructive model (suggested for instance by Allison) with that of actual “social movements” for change such as the workers’ movement, the Civil Rights movement, the feminist movement, or the ecological movement. As an appropriate paradigm for Historical-Jesus research, a social-scientific model that focuses on social political movements for change does not center on Jesus the “great Man” and hero.

‘Answer.’ But because of its dominant role, the ‘context of the scholar’ can to some extent be associated with the ‘Answer’ too.<sup>44</sup>

4.8. Gerd Theissen

Theissen’s central vocabulary includes ‘manipulation of the sources,’ ‘Question,’ ‘interpretation,’ and the ‘context of the scholar.’ A dialogue between the ‘Question’ and the ‘sources for Jesus,’ which for Theissen are ‘documents,’ generates a view of the ‘manipulation of the sources.’<sup>45</sup> Always in reference to this dialogue, Theissen observes manipulation of both ‘larger quantities’ and ‘fragments,’ as well as manipulation for both ‘general’ and ‘specific information.’<sup>46</sup> For Theissen, ‘Jesus’ historical context’ belongs essentially to the ‘manipulation of the sources,’<sup>47</sup> although it also plays a natural part in ‘interpretation.’<sup>48</sup> Theissen attaches some clear ‘imperative’ features to ‘interpretation,’ partly because of how he views the ‘Question.’ Likewise, there is a close link between the ‘Question,’ the ‘sources for Jesus,’ and the ‘Answer.’<sup>49</sup> He sees the ‘context of the scholar’—in the form of religiosity—as actually formative with regard to the ‘Question’ (and the ‘Answer’).<sup>50</sup> However, on the whole it is to be kept from interfering with the scholar’s work, and this is the precise aim of the dialogue between the ‘Question’ and the ‘sources for Jesus’ (resulting in the ‘manipulation of the sources’).

I recall once more the limitations of this survey: None of the methodological approaches included in the present volume, and thus none of those analyzed above, can be taken as a comprehensive presentation of the methodological thinking of the writer. It is probable that the

---

<sup>44</sup> The social-movements-for-change model allows one to reconstruct the movements gathered in Jesus’ name that inspire political-religious change.

<sup>45</sup> The axioms of modern historical research are connected to the criteria of Jesus research.

<sup>46</sup> This comprehensiveness is warranted by the view that the sources are of a rather complex character (including a large number of data with observable small tensions). On the other hand, this is the very fact that makes them suited to answering historiographical questions.

<sup>47</sup> Jesus’ ties to his Jewish context display him as a product of the history of Judaism, not of early Christian imagination. Cf., in particular, the criterion of contextual plausibility.

<sup>48</sup> The historical strangeness of Jesus is attained through understanding him in his own context.

<sup>49</sup> Cf. Theissen’s ch. 2, “The Possibility of Religious Certainty in the Christian Faith.”

<sup>50</sup> Leaping over Lessing’s ditch means looking for certainty about a historical person in order responsibly to base a religious interpretation of life and an existential praxis on this person.

scholars in question would allow for further lexemes, basic-level or “zoomed in,” if they were challenged to respond to the metalanguage that has been proposed here.<sup>51</sup> Consequently, the analyses of the eight selected approaches do not intend to be exhaustive or normative. They could no doubt be adjusted and be more detailed. What these analyses should do is to exemplify how the metalanguage could promote the methodological discussion, if it were put into general usage. Here, I can see two different basic applications.

5. Two Main Applications of the Metalanguage

The first is the way in which the metalanguage, in an elementary guise, has been employed in the above examples, namely as an analytical tool. As such, the metalanguage serves the analysis of the various methodological approaches and their comparison with each other, and can yield the following vantage points:

1. We get a clear picture of the main methodological elements (represented in the metalanguage by the basic lexemes) that are in play. Since the repertoire of the main elements included varies from one approach to another, the scholarly discussion is guided to inquire about the necessity (or not) of particular elements, viz. those which appear in some approaches but not in all: Should these elements be ignored or, rather, always be taken into account? In other words, what main methodological elements must an approach include, if it is to be considered valid and cogent? What are the optional elements, and under what circumstances should they be excluded/included? For example—I refer here to the analyses above—is there a case for methodological solutions that practice ‘manipulation for general information’? Some approaches pay attention to this lexeme, while some others do not.<sup>52</sup> Should we interpret its absence as a deficiency or its presence as a redundancy? Or are there methodological circumstances that vary and can render ‘manipulation for general information’ necessary or unnecessary? Similar requests for clarification can be presented vis-à-vis the 'manipulation of fragments',<sup>53</sup> 'extrapolative sources',<sup>54</sup> 'organizing the information',<sup>55</sup> and so on. Up to now, methodological discussion has been rather unreceptive to these kinds of explanations.

---

<sup>51</sup> And we know from their other writings that further lexemes are relevant to them. However, these writings have not been utilized as data bases here. Thus, the readers are supposed to have acquainted themselves with the presentations included in this volume alone. In other words, the treatments in this chapter have sought to be illustrative rather than comprehensive.

<sup>52</sup> Observed by Allison, Becker, Meier, and Theissen. Not observed by Crossan, Horsley, Schlosser, and Schüssler Fiorenza.

2. We get a clear picture of the relative functions with which scholars invest the different methodological elements, i.e. of how they see the function of a given methodological element in its relation to others. (In the metalanguage, these functions are represented by the relationships and orders of observation of the lexemes.) For example, in many approaches the influence of the 'context of the scholar' should always be barred.<sup>56</sup> Accordingly, it is to be counteracted, and the usual tool for this purpose is 'manipulation of the sources',<sup>57</sup> although other means can also come into question.<sup>58</sup> In other approaches, the 'context of the scholar' can sometimes make a constructive contribution and aid 'manipulation of the sources',<sup>59</sup> or even form an essential part of this lexeme.<sup>60</sup> How can this be so, and what other lexemes and their relationships are involved in producing such diverse outlooks? Indeed, such questions have not yet been explicitly discussed; but they have a key role in elucidating the roots of the methodological diversity of historical research. Consequently, the questions play a key role even in the attempt to understand the diversity of the results of research.

Obviously, the views offered by these two vantage points often coalesce. For example, sometimes the necessity of a methodological element is justified by its relational function,<sup>61</sup> and the same can be said of the question about the optional elements of methodology.

When we move from the level of the main methodological elements or basic lexemes to a more specific level, we enter upon an analysis and comparison which would simply be too intricate to handle without the conceptual language proposed here. The following reflections accompany and deepen the first two points:

---

<sup>53</sup> For example: not accepted by Allison and Horsley; used by Crossan and Meier.

<sup>54</sup> For example: not quite accepted by Schlosser nor used by Theissen; used in a very limited way by Becker and without constraints by Schüssler Fiorenza.

<sup>55</sup> Used by Allison and Becker; ignored by others.

<sup>56</sup> See Allison.

<sup>57</sup> See Becker and Theissen.

<sup>58</sup> Horsley: 'Jesus' historical context.'

<sup>59</sup> Schlosser.

<sup>60</sup> Schüssler Fiorenza.

<sup>61</sup> See, for instance, how Allison's 'acquired experiences of the scholar' becomes a necessary lexeme because it leads to the important conclusion that one should mainly seek 'general information.'

3. The more elaborate second-order vocabulary allows us to make a comprehensive list of the methodological elements and sub-elements (and even sub-sub-elements) that are used in the scholarly methodological discussion. The questions asked on the basis of this inventory are basically the same as in point 1 above, viz. the necessity (or not) of the elements that appear in some methodological approaches but not in some others, etc. However, it is important to observe that this question can properly be posed here only after an understanding of the issues raised in the two previous points, since otherwise the field of vision remains much too narrow. A typical example is the intense debate about the so-called criteria of authenticity. While in itself quite justified and important, this debate concerns only one small sector of the methodological problematic as we now see it through the wide-angle lens of the metalanguage.<sup>62</sup> The debate lacks its methodological context, i.e. the other lexemes. At the same time, it fails to do justice to the many intricate connections and relative functions between the various lexemes, leading from the basic vocabulary level to the elaborate and vice versa, that are seen only when we “zoom in” through the metalanguage. This takes us to vantage point

4., which concerns precisely the many-sided relations between the more specific methodological elements represented by the more elaborate second order vocabulary.

Hence, in all these issues the metalanguage can be made into a common, shared system that enables us to formulate our questions and comments precisely. The metalanguage ensures that we know what we are talking about. Naturally, this will be helpful even if we are not aiming at a comprehensive analysis of methods, but wish to concentrate on some particular element, assessing, for instance, different views on that element among several scholars. Take again the example of the authenticity criteria which are an expression of ‘manipulation of sources.’ We see that scholars (a) employ different criteria, (b) evaluate the individual criteria differently, and (c) appreciate the use of criteria in general differently. We might then be able to point out that as far as ‘documents’ are concerned, viz. as ‘sources for Jesus,’ the criteria of authenticity have usually proven worthwhile, for they have so far been developed particularly with ‘documents’ in view. But where a scholar tends to distrust ‘documents’ and prefers ‘extrapolative sources’ as ‘sources for Jesus,’ the criteria are bound to appear less important.<sup>63</sup>

<sup>62</sup> ‘Manipulation of documents’ within ‘manipulation of sources.’

<sup>63</sup> Cf. here (c).

Further, scholars' varying repertoires of criteria and their perception of some particular criterion or criteria as more important than others might be explicable on the basis of the 'type of information' they are looking for, and whether they aim at the manipulation of 'fragments' or of 'larger quantities.'<sup>64</sup> Differences may also be occasioned by the influence of other basic lexemes. Many scholars see 'Jesus' historical context' as a significant factor in the 'manipulation of the sources.'<sup>65</sup>

Even where we cannot account for all the differences between scholars' methodological approaches by showing how different lexemes are actualized in the approaches, the metalanguage lets us carry out the analysis and comparison on a deeper level and in a more controlled way than could ever be the case if we stayed on the level of the object language. Actually, having reached the limits of the metalanguage, we are in a situation analogous to that where the analysis usually begins, and we are therefore still capable of putting further analytical questions.

All in all, a substantially greater analytical perceptiveness emerges from the utilization of the metalanguage. Naturally enough, the metalanguage gives us a far more comprehensive view of the methodological discussion than could be achieved on the basis of any existing methodological approach. When these observations are put together we arrive at the second basic use of the metalanguage, viz. as a conceptual matrix for molding a new historical Jesus method!

Indeed, why not start from the metalevel, with the aim of achieving a new concrete approach, an applied instance of the metalanguage? The construction of a method in this way would certainly benefit from the perceptiveness and comprehensiveness of the metalanguage, and it could build upon the experiences learned from the analyses of the existing methodological approaches, i.e. from the first usage of the metalanguage. Without going into further details, the main concern here should be to bring the new method into a responsible relationship with all the lexemes (methodological elements) and their relationships (relative functions) involved in the metalanguage. As a suggestion, one could begin with the basic lexemes and their relationships and orders of observation, then proceed to the more specific level of the second-order vocabulary and, finally, engage a dialectic between these two levels as in the hermeneutic circle. One should also reflect continuously on the metalevel meaning of the solutions made regarding the concrete method-to-be.

---

<sup>64</sup> Cf. (a) and (b).

<sup>65</sup> It is, for example, an integral element of Theissen's authenticity criteria.

To be sure, despite taking greater care in the genesis of a method constructed in a new way, there will never be a time when there is one Method with which everyone would agree. There will always be reasons for divergences of opinion. But if such reasons could be reduced by employing a metalevel model, why not give it a try? The different methods arrived at would have an improved quality, thanks to their illumination by the metalanguage. They would probably also be found to be mutually applicable to a greater degree than hitherto.

Naturally, as an analytical tool the metalanguage also provides better means for the evaluation and criticism of existing historical Jesus methods, and a brief example of such a use would seem to be in order. I will not pass judgments on the methodological approaches included in this volume from the point of view of the metalanguage.<sup>66</sup> Instead, I wish to criticize my own methodological thinking. In the light of the metalanguage, what can I say of my own methodological solutions to the problem of the historical Jesus? I have presented these mainly in Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking and in the encyclopedia article “Authenticity criteria.”<sup>67</sup> Typically, my emphasis has very much been on the criteria of authenticity. There are obvious reasons why the encyclopedia article stresses this aspect, but even in the monograph most space is given to the elaboration of the various criteria. On the whole, however, lexemes to which I pay at least some attention are ‘documents,’ ‘general and specific information,’ ‘manipulation of documents,’ ‘manipulation for general information,’ ‘manipulation for specific information,’ ‘manipulation of larger quantities,’ ‘manipulation of fragments,’ ‘Jesus’ historical context,’ and ‘Answer.’ The basic lexemes I completely ignore are ‘organizing the information,’ ‘interpretation,’ and the ‘context of the scholar.’ As to more specific vocabulary, I lack ‘extrapolative sources’ and their ‘manipulation.’ In addition, I am rather unspecific about the ‘context vantage points’ of ‘Jesus’ historical context,’ although I seem to observe many of them in the concrete analysis: 'Jesus' historical context'<sup>68</sup> is not properly dealt with where I discuss the method in the monograph, although it does play an important role in the study.<sup>69</sup>

---

<sup>66</sup> As I have stated above, they come unprepared for such a questioning.

<sup>67</sup> Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking (Leiden: Brill, 2001), 24–36; “Authenticity Criteria”, in Encyclopedia of the Historical Jesus, ed. C. A. Evans (New York: Routledge, 2008), 43–54. See further, for example, “Doubts about Double Dissimilarity”, in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 47–80; “Knowing about Q and Knowing about Jesus: Mutually Exclusive Undertakings?” in The Sayings Source Q and the Historical Jesus, ed. A. Lindemann (Leuven: Peeters, 2001), 497–514.

This rudimentary inventory of the methodological elements and sub-elements (cf. points 1 and 3 above) included in my historical Jesus method as I have presented it earlier, is not a detailed critique; but I think that if I were to embark on a new, more extensive study of Jesus, I would need to look at things more comprehensively and also articulate the method more precisely. I also think that the metalanguage would enable me to do precisely that. At any rate, I am obliged to explain (to myself at least) why I have not included in the method any of the methodological elements that now appear to be missing. Observing the above points (2) and (4), and performing the critical analysis more properly, would probably lead to further "revelations" like this.

6. Concluding Words

Scholarship is always in need of strategies that can increase clarity and exactness. This is particularly true of the methodological discussion of historical Jesus research, where no such opportunity should be bypassed unexamined. Therefore I am so bold as to wish that the contours of a metalanguage proposed here could be accepted for consideration. In my view, all uses of the metalanguage present new, promising centers of attention for future methodological dialogue. The study of the metalanguage could suggest ways of improving those methods that are already in use. Scholars who engage in historical Jesus research for the first time could learn a better understanding of the existing methods by using the metalanguage as an analytical tool, and pursue the definition of their own method with the metalanguage as a conceptual matrix. In this way, gradually, the diverse traits of methodological thinking in historical Jesus research could be brought closer to each other. This would facilitate the discussion and increase the common applicability of both the methods and the results to which they lead.

No doubt, the metalanguage itself still requires further development and adjustment. Hopefully, work in this area is now beginning.

---

<sup>68</sup> Note that this is a lexeme which stands for a methodological element. It does not denote the contents of the context, viz. what the context actually was like.

<sup>69</sup> Hence, this applies to Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking.

APPENDIX 1

SOME OBSERVATION ORDERS OF LEXEMES AND THEIR RELATIONSHIPS*The rudimentary structure:*

1.a.

sources for Jesus (first)→ manipulation of the sources (second)→ information (third)

1.b.

sources for Jesus (first)→ manipulation of the sources (second)→ information (third)→ interpretation (fourth)More comprehensive structures:

2.a.i

sources for Jesus (first)→ manipulation of the sources (second)→ information (third)→ Jesus' historical context (fourth)→ interpretation (fifth)

2.a.ii

sources for Jesus (first)→ manipulation of the sources (second)→ information (third)→ organizing the information (fourth)→ interpretation (fifth)

2.b.i

sources for Jesus (first)→ manipulation of the sources (second)→ information (third)→ Jesus' historical context (fourth)→ organizing the information (fifth)→ interpretation (sixth)

2.b.ii

sources for Jesus (first)

- manipulation of the sources (second)
  - information (third)
    - organizing the information (fourth)
      - Jesus' historical context (fifth)
        - interpretation (sixth)

3.a

sources for Jesus (first)

- manipulation of the sources (including Jesus' historical context) (second)
  - information (third)
    - interpretation (fourth)

3.b.i

sources for Jesus (first)

- manipulation of the sources (including Jesus' historical context) (second)
  - information (third)
    - Jesus' historical context (fourth)
      - interpretation (fifth)

3.b.ii

sources for Jesus (first)

- manipulation of the sources (including Jesus' historical context) (second)
  - information (third)
    - organizing the information (fourth)
      - interpretation (fifth)

3.c.i

sources for Jesus (first)

- manipulation of the sources (including Jesus' historical context) (second)
  - information (third)
    - Jesus' historical context (fourth)
      - organizing the information (fifth)
        - interpretation (sixth)

3.c.ii

sources for Jesus (first)

- manipulation of the sources (including Jesus' historical context) (second)
- information (third)
  - organizing the information (fourth)
  - Jesus' historical context (fifth)
  - interpretation (sixth)

A full structure (alternatives as in 1.–3.):

4.

context of the scholar (first)

- sources for Jesus (second)
- manipulation of the sources (third)
- information (fourth)
  - Jesus' historical context (fifth)
  - organizing the information (sixth)
  - interpretation (seventh)

APPENDIX 2

THE SECOND-ORDER VOCABULARY
(BASIC PLUS ELABORATE LEXEMES)

'Sources for Jesus'

- 'documents' (e.g., Mark, Q, Matthew<sup>s</sup>, Luke<sup>s</sup>, the Gospel of John, the Gospel of Thomas)
- 'extrapolative sources' (e.g., sociological data, sociological models, role categories, archaeology, topography, religious tradition)

'Information'

- 'type of information'
  - 'general information' (overall motif of the kingdom of God)
  - 'specific information' (e.g., the relation between Jesus' exorcisms and the kingdom; cf. Matt 12:28/Luke 11:20)

'Manipulation of the sources'

- 'manipulation of extrapolative sources'
- 'manipulation of documents'
  - 'manipulation of fragments' (e.g., analysis of Mark 2:18–20)
  - 'manipulation of larger quantities' (e.g., analysis of the parable tradition)
  - 'manipulation for general information' (resulting 'information,' e.g.: the historicity of Jesus as miracle-worker)
  - 'manipulation for specific information' (resulting 'information,' e.g.: the historicity of a particular miracle story)

'Jesus' historical context'

- 'context materials' (e.g. literature, archaeology, social-scientific methods)
- 'context vantage points'
  - 'topics' (e.g., cultural, economical, political, psychological and religious contexts)
  - 'locations' (e.g., Jerusalem, Nazareth, Galilee, Judea and Palestine)
  - 'influences' (e.g., Jewish, Roman and Hellenistic)
  - 'perspectives' (e.g., individual, group, inside, outside, the marginal, the essential, the oppressed, the oppressors)

‘Organizing the information’

- ‘full-scale organizing of the information’
- ‘selective organizing of the information’

‘Interpretation’

- ‘descriptive’
- ‘imperative’

‘Context of the scholar’

- ‘permanent factors’
  - ‘innate capacities’ (e.g., gender, color, talents, nationality, personality, penchants)
  - ‘acquired capacities’ (e.g., personality, penchants, skills, learned knowledge, convictions, profession, religiosity, ideology, experiences, habits)
- ‘transient factors’ (e.g., place of employment, life situation, social relationships, health, mood, environment)

PART TWO

VARIOUS ASPECTS OF HISTORICAL JESUS METHODOLOGY

WITH THE GRAIN AND AGAINST THE GRAIN: A STRATEGY FOR READING THE SYNOPTIC GOSPELS

COLIN BROWN

John P. Meier concludes his account of “The Criterion of Rejection and Execution” with the comment: “A Jesus whose words and deeds did not threaten or alienate people, especially powerful people, is not the historical Jesus.”<sup>1</sup> Traces of rejection and affirmation can be found in the scant references to Jesus in Josephus, Pliny, Tacitus, and Lucian of Samosata.<sup>2</sup> They abound in the gospels. Why did Jesus inspire veneration in some and bitter antagonism in others?

My answer takes the form of an exercise in hermeneutics and intertextuality. The reason is the need to penetrate a world different from ours. Concepts of purity and holiness, and authority, patronage, and life under “exile” conditions are like rules of a game that are followed but not seen. Those who lived in the world of Second Temple Judaism followed them instinctively. But we have to discover them.

The question of the historical Jesus is not just one of material evidence. It is a hermeneutical question insofar as it turns on how the same evidence is interpreted from opposing standpoints. Instead of reading the text as a linear narrative, I shall try to identify currents and cross-currents in light of the perspectives of the evangelists and those of Jesus’ adversaries. Both viewed Jesus intertextually—the perspectives of both sides were conditioned and shaped by the Hebrew Scriptures. It was not simply a matter of searching for proof texts. It was a question of halakhah—the fulfillment of the Torah as the way in which Israel should “walk” (Exod 18:20) in a culture which held that, because God was holy, his people and land should also be holy. It raised the question of which profiles found in the Law and the Prophets fitted Jesus of Nazareth.

---

<sup>1</sup> John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus 1, The Roots of the Problem of the Person (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 177.

<sup>2</sup> Josephus, Ant. 18.63–64; Pliny, Letter 10.96; Tacitus, Annals 15.44; Lucian, The Passing of Peregrinus 11; cf. Meier, A Marginal Jew I, 56–111; Robert E. van Voorst, Jesus outside the New Testament: An Introduction to the Ancient Evidence (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2000).

Because of their distinctive perspectives, it is necessary to examine each gospel separately. I shall consider Mark first since Mark is generally held to be a source for Matthew and Luke. Because of limitations of space I shall not examine their extensive debt to Mark, but shall focus on distinctive emphases.

1. Reading with the Grain and against the Grain

To read with the grain is to go along with the claims of a narrative. To read against the grain is to question those claims in light of embarrassing material and counter claims. The gospels highlight three spheres of conflict where Jesus appears to cross boundaries: religion, family, and society.<sup>3</sup> Traditional piety copes with charges against Jesus by insisting that they were unfounded. Critical scholarship builds them into its “criterion of embarrassment” on the assumption that the unintentional presence of embarrassing material indicates historicity.<sup>4</sup> A third way—which is what I propose here—is to suggest that one of the reasons why the gospels were written was to confute the charges, smears, and embarrassing features.

For some years I have been experimenting with a heuristic device in order to identify and account for the currents and cross currents in the gospels. It uses two theses. Thesis A represents the standpoint of the evangelists, and Thesis B that of Jesus’ adversaries. Both interpret the same sayings and actions of Jesus, but from opposing standpoints.<sup>5</sup> I shall deal first with Thesis B for two reasons. Chronologically the first “confessions” in the gospels were hostile—“He has gone out of his mind” and “He has Beelzebul, and by the ruler of the demons he casts out demons” (Mark 3:21–22). “Christian” confession came later amid a background of conjecture. My second reason is that Thesis A not only affirms Jesus but seeks to confute Thesis B. Just as there was an oral tradition about Jesus in early Christianity,<sup>6</sup> ongoing polemic against Jesus indicates written and oral traditions in Judaism.<sup>7</sup>

<sup>3</sup> Jerome H. Neyrey, “The Idea of Purity in Mark’s Gospel,” Semeia 35 (1986): 91–128; Bruce J. Malina and Neyrey, Calling Jesus Names: The Social Value of Labels in Matthew (Sonoma, CA: Polebridge, 1988); David Rhoads, “Social Criticism: Crossing Boundaries,” in Mark and Method, ed. Janice Capel Anderson and Stephen D. Moore (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1992), 135–161.

<sup>4</sup> Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter, The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria, trans. M. Eugene Boring (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002), 174.

<sup>5</sup> Colin Brown, “Synoptic Miracle Stories: A Jewish Religious and Social Setting,” Forum 2.4 (1986): 55–76; Colin Brown, “The Jesus of Mark’s Gospel,” in Jesus Then and Now: Images of Jesus in History and Christology, ed. Marvin Meyer and Charles Hughes (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2001), 26–53.

Thesis B has two forms. Thesis B1 is based on the directives of the Torah regarding prophets who lead astray by signs and wonders. Deut 13:1–5 states that if a prophet arises and offers a sign or wonder and says, “Let us go after other gods,” the people are not to go. They are to know that the Lord their God is testing them to see if they love the Lord with all their heart and soul. Only the Lord’s voice is to be obeyed. The prophet should be put to death that the evil may be purged from their midst, so that “all Israel shall hear and be afraid and never again do any such wickedness” (Deut 13:11). The same fate awaited the medium and wizard.<sup>8</sup> A trajectory reaffirming the directive concerning deceiving prophets may be traced through Philo, the Temple Scroll, the Damascus Document, the Mishnah tractate Sanhedrin, the Talmud, and Jewish attitudes reflected in Christian writings.<sup>9</sup>

Thesis B1 proposes that, when Jewish authorities saw Jesus attracting large crowds by his healings and exorcisms while propounding deviant teaching and crossing the boundaries of purity, they sought guidance from the Torah,

<sup>6</sup> Henry Wansbrough, ed., Jesus and the Oral Gospel Tradition, JSNTSup 64 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1991); James D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003).

<sup>7</sup> Justin, Dialogue with Trypho 69, 102, 106–107; First Apology 30; Origen, Contra Celsum 1.38, 68; Eusebius, Demonstration of the Gospel 3; Acts of Thomas 96; b. Sanh. 43a; cf. Graham N. Stanton, “Jesus of Nazareth: A Magician and a False Prophet Who Deceived God’s People?” in Jesus of Nazareth, Lord and Christ: Essays on the Historical Jesus and New Testament Christology, ed. Joel B. Green and Max Turner (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1994), 164–180; Eugene V. Gallagher, Divine Man or Magician? Celsus and Origen on Jesus, SBLDS 64 (Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1982); Harold Remus, Pagan-Christian Conflict over Miracle in the Second Century (Cambridge, MA: Philadelphia Patristic Foundation, 1983); Frederick W. Norris, “Eusebius on Jesus as Deceiver and Sorcerer,” in Eusebius, Christianity and Judaism, ed. Harold W. Attridge and Gohei Hata (Leiden: Brill, 1992), 523–540.

<sup>8</sup> Deut 13:6–18; 17:2–7, 12; 18:20–22; Lev 20:27.

<sup>9</sup> Philo, Special Laws 1.65, 315–317; m. Sanh. 7:4, 10; 11Q Temple Scroll LIV; CD XII, 2–3; b. Sanh. 43a; Justin, Dialogue with Trypho 69, 108; T. Levi 16.3; Acts of Thomas 20, 48, 96, 104, 106, 107; Acts of Pilate, Prologue 1; cf. David E. Aune, “Magic in Early Christianity,” ANRW II, 23.2 (1980): 1507–1557; Johann Maier, Jesus von Nazareth in der talmudischen Überlieferung (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1978); Maier, Jüdische Auseinandersetzung mit dem Christentum in der Antike (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1982); Günter Schlichting, Ein jüdisches Leben Jesu: Die verschollene Toledot Jeschu-Fassung Tam u-mu’ad, WUNT 24 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1982); William Horbury, Jews and Christians in Contact and Controversy (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1998).

and found that Jesus fitted the profile of the prophet who performs signs and wonders in order to lead astray, and the wizard empowered by an alien spirit. They saw no alternative but to “purge the evil” from their midst.<sup>10</sup>

Thesis B2 focuses on disobedience. Deut 21:18–21 lays down the procedure:

If a man has a stubborn and rebellious son, who will not obey the voice of his father or the voice of his mother, and, though they chastise him, will not give heed to them, then his father and his mother shall take hold of him and bring him out to the elders of his city at the gate of the place where he lives, and they shall say to the elders of his city, ‘This our son is stubborn and rebellious, he will not obey our voice; he is a glutton and a drunkard.’ Then all the men of the city shall stone him to death with stones; so you shall purge the evil from your midst; and all Israel shall hear, and fear (RSV).

Jacob Milgrom observes:

In the biblical view the Decalogue would fail were it not rooted in a regularly observed ritual, central to home and table, and impinging on both senses and the intellect, thus conditioning reflexes into patterns of ethical behavior.<sup>11</sup>

David Noel Freedman sees Deut 21:18–21 as the embodiment of the fifth commandment (Deut 5:16) in the form of case law. In the formation of the canon of the Hebrew Bible Freedman argues that violation of the ten commandments played a significant part in the ordering of <sup>10</sup> Calvin appealed to Deut 13 in rejecting truth claims of the Catholic Church based on contemporary miracles (Institutes of the Christian Religion, Prefatory Address [1536]). Hobbes (Leviathan, ch. 37 [1651]) and Spinoza (Tractatus Theologico Politicus, ch. 6 [1670]) cited the passage in rejecting miracles in general as a basis for truth claims (Colin Brown, Miracles and the Critical Mind [Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1984], 15, 32–33, 46). Perhaps the first modern theologian to contemplate that Deut 13 might be applied to Jesus was Hugo Grotius (The Truth of the Christian Religion [1627], book 5, §6). Grotius rejected the application on the grounds that Jesus forbade worship of false gods.

Modern scholars who see the relevance of Deut 13 include Ethelbert Stauffer, Jerusalem und Rom im Zeitalter Jesu (Bern: Franke Verlag, 1957); Stauffer, Jesus and His Story, trans. Richard and Clara Winston (New York: Knopf, 1960); August Strobel, Die Stunde der Wahrheit: Untersuchungen zum Strafverfahren gegen Jesus, WUNT 21 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1980); Otto Betz, “Probleme des Prozesses Jesu,” ANRW II 25.1 (1982): 565–647; D. Neale, “Was Jesus a Mesith? Public Response to Jesus and His Ministry,” TynBul 44.1 (1993): 89–101. Joseph Klausner argued that Judas betrayed Jesus, when he came to see Jesus as the false prophet who had come to the Holy City to demonstrate his claims by mighty works. Judas saw it as his religious duty to deliver the deceiver to the authorities so that the evil could be exterminated (Jesus of Nazareth: His Life, Times and Teaching, trans. Herbert Danby [London: Allen & Unwin, 1925], 325).

<sup>11</sup> Jacob Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16 (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 736.

the books. Rebellion is a central theme of Deuteronomy. An account of the violation of the fifth commandment in the fifth book of the canon has a special significance.<sup>12</sup>

Thesis B2 proposes that in the eyes of some contemporaries—including those of his mother, brothers, and sisters—Jesus fitted (or was dangerously close to fitting) the profile of the “stubborn and rebellious son.” In the event, Jesus’ relationship with his family became dysfunctional.

Thesis A seeks to rebut Theses B1 and B2 by means of the Spirit christology outlined by Peter at Pentecost and Caesarea.

“You that are Israelites, listen to what I have to say: Jesus of Nazareth, a man attested to you by God with deeds of power, wonders, and signs that God did through him among you, as you yourselves know” (Acts 2:22). “You know the message he sent to the people of Israel, preaching peace by Jesus Christ—he is Lord of all. That message spread throughout Judea, beginning in Galilee after the baptism that John announced: how God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Spirit and with power; how he went about doing good and healing all who were oppressed by the devil, for God was with him” (Acts 10:36–38).

Thesis A proposes that Jesus’ activity is to be attributed to the anointing of the Spirit, in virtue of which he was the “Christ.”

Each gospel has its own perspective in developing this thesis. All three have what may be called an “upfront” Spirit christology, accompanied by a developing word christology, and in the case of Matthew and Luke a word and wisdom christology.

The gospels focus on Jesus’ activity in Galilee and Judea. Gentiles hardly come into the picture.<sup>13</sup> The power of Rome remains in the background, but it is pervasive. It surfaced with the question of giving tribute to Caesar. Jewish rulers existed at the pleasure of the Roman prefect. Would Jesus prove to be the Son of David who would drive out the Romans and restore the Davidic kingdom? Words like “gospel,” “Son of God,” and “savior,” which we today assume to be characteristically Christian, turn out to be derived from inscriptions memorializing deified Caesars.<sup>14</sup> It is therefore necessary to add Thesis C.

<sup>12</sup> David Noel Freedman, The Unity of the Hebrew Bible (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1991), 24–25.

<sup>13</sup> Leander E. Keck, Who Is Jesus? History in Perfect Tense (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2001); Sean Freyne, Jesus: A Jewish Galilean (London: T&T Clark International, 2004), 74–91.

<sup>14</sup> Craig A. Evans, Mark 8:27–16:20 (Nashville: Nelson, 2001), lxxx–xciii; Hans-Josef Klauck, The Religious Context of Early Christianity: A Guide to Graeco-Roman Religions, Thesis C proposes that in their choice of terms and incidents the canonical gospels present Jesus as the true Son of God, and the Kingdom of God as the reign of God in conscious opposition to Roman rule.

2. Rereading the Gospels

2.1. Mark

Mark is seen increasingly as ancient biography.<sup>15</sup> In my judgment it has the form of a tragic-epic in five acts with a prologue and epilogue, intended to be declaimed.<sup>16</sup> The Prologue (1:1–13) contains the elements of what is to come. The opening sentence introduces the themes of Thesis A and Thesis C: “The beginning [ἀρχὴ]<sup>17</sup> of the good news [τοῦ εὐαγγελίου] of Jesus Christ, the Son of God [Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ υἱοῦ θεοῦ]”<sup>18</sup> (1:1; cf. 1:14–15). The term gospel/good news is found in numerous inscriptions including the Priene inscription (9 BCE): “the birthday of the god [Augustus] meant for the world the beginning of the message of peace [εὐαγγελίον] which has him as its author.”<sup>19</sup> Mark’s opening sentence not only introduces hearers to Jesus Christ, but also advances his claims over Caesar’s. Use of the Latin name Jesus became conventional in the early church. It has the advantage of contextualizing him for the Roman world. But in so doing it obscures the allusions contained in the Semitic forms Yeshu or Yehoshua, which connected him with the Joshua of the Hebrew Bible.

---

trans. Brian McNeil (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 2000), 288–313. The term euangelion “gospel” is found once in the Old Testament (2 Sam 4:10), but frequently in inscriptions, papyri, and Josephus.

<sup>15</sup> Dirk Frickenschmidt, Evangelium als Biographie: Die vier Evangelien im Rahmen antiker Erzählkunst (Tübingen: Francke, 1997); Richard A. Burridge, What Are the Gospels? A Comparison with Graeco-Roman Biography, 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2004).

<sup>16</sup> Colin Brown, “The Jesus of Mark’s Gospel,” in Jesus Then and Now, 26–53; cf. David Rhoads and Donald Michie, Mark as Story: An Introduction to the Narrative of a Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); Richard A. Horsley, Hearing the Whole Story: The Politics of Plot in Mark’s Gospel (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2001); Whitney Shiner, Proclaiming the Gospel: First-Century Performance of Mark (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2003).

<sup>17</sup> In Aristotle arche means a prologue (Poetics 1450b 27–28). Ancient biography had a beginning (arche) dealing with the subject’s origins, a middle (akme) concentrating on highlights, and end (telos) dealing with the subject’s demise and possible vindication (Frickenschmidt, Evangelium als Biographie, 192–209).

<sup>18</sup> υἱοῦ θεοῦ is omitted from some manuscripts. If it is an early insertion, its inclusion may be due to a scribe’s noticing its political significance. The identification of Jesus as God’s Son (1:11; 15:39) has a political dimension.

<sup>19</sup> Klauck, The Religious Context of Early Christianity, 298.

In the Prologue Christ appears as a virtual surname. But it is actually a title that lies at the heart of the controversy. Christos, like the Heb. mashiach (Messiah), means “anointed.” It raises the question: “Anointed by whom?” Mark’s answer is given in his account of the descent of the Spirit on Jesus after his baptism, when Jesus is identified as God’s son by the “voice from heaven” (1:10–11). I share the view that Christ probably meant “the anointed one” without further connotations.<sup>20</sup> It has a double reference: to Jesus as “the anointed one,” and to the Spirit as the agent of the anointing and empowerment.

The Prologue contains three sets of prophecy. The first two identify the Baptizer as the messenger preparing the way for Yahweh’s return (1:2–3; cf. Mal 3:1; Isa 40:3), signifying the end of the exile which, despite the return from Babylon and the rebuilding of the Temple, many Jews felt to be ongoing.<sup>21</sup> The third is John’s prophecy: “I have baptized you with water; but he will baptize you with the Holy Spirit [ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ]” (1:8). Traditionally this prophecy has been taken to refer to Pentecost. But the prophecy is not addressed to the disciples (Acts 1:5; 11:16), but to the Jews who have come to John for baptism. Tradition has turned Jesus’ activity into an interlude prior to the prophecy’s posthumous fulfillment. As such it has no relevance to Mark’s narrative. My counterproposal argues that Mark wants us to see Jesus’ activity as fulfillment of John’s prophecy.

Baptism is a rite of purification and consecration. The activities of Mark’s Jesus were directed at the purification and consecration of Israel through “baptism” with the Holy Spirit with a view to preparing Israel for Yahweh’s return and the establishment of God’s reign. Before this can happen Jesus must be consecrated by John’s baptism and the descent of the Spirit (1:9–11). Jesus’ preparation is completed by the Spirit driving him into the wilderness, where he overcomes Satan’s temptations (1:12–13). It may be noted that the term “Holy Spirit” occurs only three times in the Hebrew Scriptures (Ps 51:11; Isa 63:10–11). Its common use in the New Testament may be to counter Thesis B1 by emphasizing that the Spirit that empowered Jesus was not Satan but the Holy Spirit of God.

<sup>20</sup> Anthony Harvey, Jesus and the Constraints of History, Bampton Lectures 1980 (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1982), 80–82, 139–143, 149–143.

<sup>21</sup> Craig A. Evans, “Jesus and the Continuing Exile of Israel,” in Jesus and the Restoration of Israel: A Critical Assessment of N. T. Wright’s Jesus and the Victory of God, ed. Carey C. Newman (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1999), 77–100; James M. Scott, ed., Exile: Old Testament, Jewish and Christian Conceptions, JSJSup 36 (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997); Scott, ed., Restoration: Old Testament, Jewish, and Christian Conceptions, JSJSup 72 (Leiden: Brill, 2001).

The stage is set for Jesus' proclamation of "the good news [εὐαγγέλιον] of God... 'The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God has come near; repent, and believe in the good news [ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ]" (1:14–15). "Act 1" may be called "The Beginnings of Conflict" (1:14–4:34). Following the call of the disciples, they went to Capernaum, where Jesus taught on the Sabbath and was accosted by a man "with an unclean spirit [ἐν πνεύματι ἀκαθάρτῳ]" (1:23).<sup>22</sup> The expression mirrors that in John's prophecy (1:8). In exorcising the unclean spirit Jesus performs his first act of baptizing with the Holy Spirit.

Mark 1 narrates sundry exorcisms and healings. The climax is reached with the healing of the leper, where the motif of cleansing is stressed (1:40–45). Jesus' act of touching the leper would be expected to make Jesus unclean. But his action is an instance of what Klaus Berger terms "offensive holiness" which conveys purity in virtue of Jesus' anointing by the Spirit.<sup>23</sup> Jesus' command to the leper to show himself to the priest follows the instructions of the Torah, but the failure to heed the injunctions sows the seeds of estrangement.

The healing of the paralytic (2:1–12) introduces another facet of cleansing: forgiveness of sin. It brings into the open the opposition I have sought to identify under Thesis B. Jesus' pronouncement, "Son, your sins are forgiven" (2:5), prompts the thought, "Why does this fellow speak in this way? It is blasphemy! Who can forgive sins but God alone?" (2:7). The blasphemy consists in Jesus' presumption to act as God's agent. It anticipates the charge on which Jesus was eventually condemned (14:64). Tension mounts over Jesus' eating with sinners and tax collectors (2:15–17) and the disciples' plucking corn on the Sabbath (2:23–28). The healing of the man with the withered hand in the synagogue on the Sabbath prompts the Pharisees to conspire with the Herodians on how to destroy Jesus (3:1–6).

<sup>22</sup> Graham H. Twelftree, Jesus the Exorcist: A Contribution to the Study of the Historical Jesus, WUNT 54 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1993), 57–71. Peter G. Bolt sees the demons as the spirits of the departed ("Jesus, the Daimons and the Dead," in The Unseen World: Christian Reflections on Angels, Demons and the Heavenly Realm, ed. Anthony N. S. Lane [Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1996], 75–102). Such incidents are part of Jesus' epic struggle with death (Bolt, Jesus' Defeat of Death: Persuading Mark's Early Readers, SNTSMS 125 [Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003]). Paul W. Holtenbach sees the phenomenon as the outcome of colonial oppression ("Jesus, Demoniacs, and Public Authorities: A Socio-Historical Study," JAAAR 49 [1981]: 567–588).

<sup>23</sup> "Jesus als Pharisäer und frühe Christen als Pharisäer," NovT 30 (1988): 231–262.

The outcome is a delegation of Torah experts from Jerusalem deputed to investigate Jesus' activities. Their verdict—"He has Beelzebul, and by the ruler of the demons he casts out demons" (3:22)—coincides with Thesis B1. Jesus' parables about the strong man are capped by the saying, "whoever blasphemes against the Holy Spirit can never have forgiveness, but is guilty of an eternal sin" (3:29). Mark's comment—"for they had said, 'He has an unclean spirit'" (3:30)—makes it clear that it is the accusers who are the blasphemers by attributing to Satan the manifest work of God's Spirit (Thesis A).

The action of Jesus' mother and brothers calling to Jesus (3:31–32) points to Thesis B2. Although the charge expressed in Thesis B1 has failed—for the time being—Jesus remained vulnerable to the charge that he was a "stubborn and rebellious son" who would not listen to the voice of his mother. Jesus' family had tried to restrain him when people began to say that he was out of his mind (3:21). Their call to him outside the house (3:31–32) was either a renewed attempt to get him to abandon his activity or a public dissociation. It met with the rebuke: "Who are my mother and my brothers?... Here are my mother and my brothers. Whoever does the will of God is my brother and sister and mother" (3:33–35). The parables of 4:1–33 serve as comment on responses to Jesus. The implication that Jesus is the sower of the word (4:14) points to Jesus as God's agent and spokesman (1:27, 38–39; 2:2, 5, 10, 19–22, 27; 3:4–5, 23–30, 33–35).

"Act 2" "The Conflict Spreads (4:25–7:23)" begins and ends with sea crossings, marking Jesus' tactical retreat from the territory ruled by Herod Antipas, and his return as a second Joshua about to engage in a new conquest. Mark's account of the stilling of the storm (4:35–5:1) echoes the story of Jonah. Like Jonah, Jesus was asleep, and the disciples like the sailors feared for their lives. Like Jonah, he was a prophet under judgment. Matthew and Luke detach the story from the Beelzebul charge. But in Mark it is a reprise of Thesis B1. If the boat had sunk, it would have been seen as a judgment on Jesus and vindication of his accusers. Jesus' rebuke takes the same form as that he used earlier with the unclean spirit (4:39; cf. 1:25).

Three stories develop the theme of purity. That of "Legion" (5:2–20) is located in the Decapolis, a Roman foundation. Political and religious motifs are intertwined (Thesis C). The tenth legion, stationed in Syria since 6 CE, had an image of a boar on its standards.<sup>24</sup> From the standpoint of the Torah, anything idolatrous should be devoted to destruction (Deut 13:17–18). The destruction of the pigs might be seen as symbolic of national aspirations to drive the Romans into the sea. The story combines aspects of demon possession noted earlier: demons as the spirits of the departed and political servitude.<sup>25</sup> The description of Legion as a man “with an unclean spirit [ἐν πνεύματι ἀκαθάρτῳ]” (5:2) echoes that in 1:23. The fact that no shackles could subdue him suggests that the only power strong enough to overcome him is the Holy Spirit.

<sup>24</sup> Gerd Theissen, The Gospels in Context: Social and Political History in the Synoptic Tradition, trans. Linda M. Maloney (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1991), 110.

Jairus’s daughter (5:21–24, 35–43) and the woman with the flow of blood (5:25–34) raise the question of ritual impurity.<sup>26</sup> Like the story of Legion, they show Jesus crossing the boundaries. All three are linked with death, and physical contact would have brought defilement. Instead of being defiled, Jesus bestows purity and life. On returning to his hometown Jesus taught in the synagogue on the Sabbath, prompting the question: “Where did this man get all this? What is this wisdom that has been given to him? What deeds of power are being done by his hands!” (6:2). But Jesus could do no such deed there because of unbelief. He then sent out his disciples to preach repentance with authority over unclean spirits (6:7–13).

A retrospective interlude assesses the impact of Jesus and John and their threat to Herod Antipas (Thesis C). Whereas some saw Jesus as Elijah or one of the prophets, Herod saw him as the beheaded John raised to life (6:16). A detail in the story of the feeding of the five thousand (6:30–44) throws light on its political significance. Mark notes that Jesus had compassion on the crowd “because they were like sheep without a shepherd” (6:34). When Moses was dying, he feared for the future of Israel and asked, “who shall go out before them and come in before them, who shall lead them out and bring them in, so that the congregation of the Lord may not be like sheep without a shepherd” (Num 27:17). Whereupon, the Lord told him, “Take Joshua son of Nun, a man in whom is the spirit, and lay your hands upon him” (Num 27:18). Herod Antipas had proved himself to be unfit to be the shepherd of Israel. John the Baptizer had been a righteous leader, but Herod had beheaded him. It fell to Jesus to be the new Joshua, the shepherd of Israel.

<sup>25</sup> Gerd Theissen conjectures that the demons were the spirits of fallen fighters (The Miracle Stories of the Early Christian Tradition, ed. John Riches, trans. Francis McDDonagh [Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983], 255).

<sup>26</sup> Craig A. Evans, “‘Who Touched Me?’ Jesus and the Ritually Impure,” in Jesus in Context: Temple, Purity, and Restoration, by Bruce Chilton and Craig A. Evans, AGJU 39 (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997), 353–376.

Following the feeding, Jesus embarked on a journey that would eventually lead to the cross. It was a second conquest, led by a pacific “Joshua” who sought to purify the people of Israel in preparation for God’s reign. The journey began with Jesus “walking on the sea” (6:45–52). The idea of walking on water has prompted suggestions of a displaced resurrection narrative or an epiphany.<sup>27</sup> J. D. M. Derrett’s provocative article “Why and How Jesus Walked on the Sea”<sup>28</sup> gives a more down-to-earth explanation. Derrett suggests that Jesus was reenacting Joshua’s crossing of the Jordan at the original conquest. As Joshua sanctified himself and communed with Yahweh before crossing the Jordan (Josh 3:8), Jesus went up the mountain to pray alone (6:46–47). Jesus then made his way along the edge of a shelf across the lake<sup>29</sup> in order to stand like Joshua with his feet in the Jordan (6:48; cf. Josh 3:8), before joining his disciples in the boat and crossing to Gennesaret on the west bank (6:53).

The ensuing debate with the Pharisees centers on purity (7:1–23).<sup>30</sup> From the perspective of Thesis B, Jesus is a subverter of the law in his disregard of ritual purity. Mark’s explanation for Gentile hearers takes up the language of baptism: “they do not eat anything from the market unless they wash [βαπτίσωνται] it; and there are also many other traditions that they observe, the washing [βαπτισμοῦς] of cups, pots, and bronze kettles” (7:4). Mark’s Jesus insists that it is not what passes through the stomach that defiles, but what comes out of the heart (7:21–23). “Thus he declared all foods clean” (7:19).

“Act 3” “The Climax (7:24–10:45)” begins with Jesus seeking refuge in the region of Tyre, and performing an exorcism on the daughter of the Syrophenician woman (7:24–30). The healing of the deaf mute (7:31–37) is followed by the feeding of the four thousand (8:1–10), which is widely regarded as a doublet of the earlier feeding. It appears to be set in predominantly Gentile Decapolis. If the boy were a local <sup>27</sup> “He meant to pass them by” (6:48) is the language of epiphanies (Exod 33:19, 22; 34:6; 1 Kgs 19:11); cf. J. P. Heil, Jesus Walking on the Sea: Meaning and Functions of Matt. 14:22–33, Mark 6:45–52 and John 6:15–21, AnBib 87 (Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1981), 67–75; Theissen, The Miracle Stories, 186–187.

<sup>28</sup> J. D. M. Derrett, Studies in the New Testament (Leiden: Brill, 1986), 4:92–111.

<sup>29</sup> Derrett’s account of the geological formation is confirmed by The Holy Land Satellite Atlas, ed. Richard Cleave (Nicosia: Rohr, 1994), 24–25, 34–45, which gives images taken by NASA Landsat 5 on January 18, 1987.

<sup>30</sup> Roger P. Booth, Jesus and the Laws of Purity: Tradition History and Legal History in Mark, JSNTSup 13 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1986); James D. G. Dunn, “Jesus and Ritual Purity: A Study of the Tradition-History of Mark 7:15,” in Jesus, Paul, and the Law: Studies in Mark and Galatians (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1990), 37–60.

Gentile, Jesus' action would be another example of crossing boundaries and imparting purity.<sup>31</sup>

The Pharisees' request for "a sign from heaven" (8:11) is frequently taken at face value as a plea for conclusive evidence. But in light of the Beelzebul charge, it is difficult to envisage how any further empirical evidence would be acceptable. In light of Thesis B1, all signs were to be seen as tests of fidelity to Yahweh. If Jesus were to perform a sign—especially one like the feeding just reported—the Pharisees would have hard evidence before impeccable witnesses (themselves) that Jesus fitted the profile of the sign-working apostate prophet of Deuteronomy 13.

It would be anachronistic to read into Peter's confession the christologies of the ecumenical councils. "You are the Christ" (8:29) means the one anointed by the Spirit (Thesis A). The confession is the climax and the turning point of the narrative. Elements of Thesis C begin to appear. The choice of Caesarea Philippi (given by Augustus to Herod the Great and dedicated to Caesar) with its famous grotto dedicated to Pan carries an implicit political and religious challenge. The region was close to ancient Dan, which was reputed to be the source of the Jordan. As such it proved to be the starting point for a new conquest from north to south, as in the traditional phrase "from Dan to Beersheba." Instead of publicizing Jesus, the disciples are ordered to secrecy (8:30). More ominous are the passion predictions (8:31–33; 9:30–32; 10:31–34). The question, "Are you able to drink the cup that I drink, or be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?" (10:38) sounds puzzling as Jesus had already been baptized. The cup that Jesus was about to drink was the cup of wrath and judgment.<sup>32</sup> From the standpoint of Thesis B, Jesus' death would be an act of judgment and cleansing. As such it would be a "baptism." From the standpoint of Thesis A, it would be "a ransom for many" (10:45).

"Act 4" "The Dénouement (10:46–13:37)" begins with Jesus' final act of healing. The story of blind Bartimaeus (10:46–52) contrasts with the hostility of the Jerusalem authorities. Blindness was an impurity that many regarded as a disqualification from entering the Temple.<sup>33</sup> Jesus' action would qualify him to enter the Temple. The cry "Jesus, Son of David, have mercy on me!" has messianic kingly implications (Thesis C) but also connotations of healing (Thesis A) in light of traditions concerning David and Solomon.<sup>34</sup> The turning point comes with the "cleansing" of the Temple (11:15–19). Jesus' action fits both Thesis A and Thesis B. When asked about his authority, Jesus gave an apparently evasive answer: "Did the baptism of John come from heaven, or was it of human origin? Answer me" (11:30). Jesus' interrogators rightly perceive that, if they were to acknowledge that John's baptism was from God, the next question would be, "Why then did you not believe him?" John had preached a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins, but this was in preparation for the baptism of one who "will baptize you with the Holy Spirit" (1:8). In this light Jesus' action could be described as the baptism of the Temple. But to the authorities Jesus' actions were those described under Thesis B1 (11:18; 12:12).

---

<sup>31</sup> J. D. M. Derrett sees further parallels with Joshua ("Crumbs in Mark," in Studies in the New Testament, 4:82–91). The incident of the blind man from Bethsaida seeing men "like trees walking" (8:24) may be an ominous vision of soldiers carrying lumber to make a palisade (Derrett, "Trees Walking, Prophecy, and Christology," in Studies in the New Testament, 3:107–29).

<sup>32</sup> Isa 51:17–22; Jer 25:15; Ezek 23:31–33; Hab 1:16.

The encounters that follow—questions about tribute to Caesar, resurrection, the first commandment, warnings about scribes, and the widow casting all she had—all have to do with pure religion. In light of Thesis B1 the question about the first commandment (12:28; cf. Deut 6:4–5; 13:3) was a test of Jesus' orthodoxy. Jesus' addition of "You shall love your neighbor as yourself" (12:31; cf. Lev 19:18) elicits the scribe's comment that the two commandments are "much more important than burnt offerings and sacrifices" (11:33; cf. 1 Sam 15:22; Hos 6:6; Mic 6:6–8). It has the effect of relativizing the Temple, just as 7:19 relativized the dietary laws. From the standpoint of Thesis B1 the scribe was putting himself in danger of being accused of being led astray by Jesus.

The cosmic language of the so-called "apocalyptic discourse" (13:1–37) is not about the end of the world but about the impending judgment that will occur within the lifespan of "this generation" (13:30).<sup>35</sup> The warnings about false messiahs and false prophets performing signs and omens echo the language of Deuteronomy 13 and Thesis B1. They found fulfillment in the sign-prophets in the period leading up to the war with Rome.<sup>36</sup>

<sup>33</sup> Lev 21:17–24; 2 Sam 5:6–8; John 9:1; Acts 3:1–5; 1Qsa II, 3–10; 4QMMT LII–LVII; 11Q Temple Scroll XLV, 12–14.

<sup>34</sup> 1 Sam 16:13–23; Josephus, Ant. 6.166–169; 8.42–49; Dennis Duling, "Solomon, Exorcism, and the Son of David," HTR 68 (1975): 235–252; Duling, "The Promises to David and Their Entrance into Christianity—Nailing Down a Likely Hypothesis," NTS 20 (1974–1975): 55–77; L. R. Fisher, "Can This Be the Son of David?" in Jesus and the Historian, ed. F. T. Trotter (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1968), 82–97; David E Aune, ANRW II 23.1 (1980): 1586; Bruce Chilton, "Jesus ben David: Reflections on the Davidssonfrage," JSNT 14 (1982): 88–112.

<sup>35</sup> Colin Brown, Jesus Then and Now, 39–40.

“Act 5” “The Catastrophe (14:1–15:3)” begins with the decision to arrest and kill Jesus, though the impending Passover poses a problem. Events move rapidly from the anointing (14:3–9), Judas’ deal with the chief priests (14:10–11), the Passover meal with the Twelve (14:12–21), and Jesus’ arrest in Gethsemane (14:26–52). With regard to the night interrogation (14:53–65) Otto Betz observes: “The Sadducees who were charged with political responsibility for law and order were more sensitive towards a prophetic criticism of the political and moral state of Israel, delivered in the spirit of holy Scripture.... They too applied the criteria of Deut. 13 and in addition 21:22–23 to the actions and claims of Jesus, according to which false messianic claims which endangered the people, the city, and the temple constituted a blasphemy against God.”<sup>37</sup> August Strobel sees the charge of being a false prophet linked with the more serious one of leading the people astray as the important issue.<sup>38</sup>

Running throughout the passion narrative are the related themes of prophecy and signs. False witnesses testify, “We heard him say, ‘I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and in three days I will build another, not made with hands’” (14:58). However, the witnesses could not agree. Jesus himself provides the grounds for his condemnation with his prophecy of a sign that the high priest himself would see. “Again the high priest asked him, ‘Are you the Messiah, the Son of the Blessed One?’ Jesus said, ‘I am; and you will see the Son of Man seated at the right hand of the Power, and ‘coming with the clouds of heaven’” (14:61–62). In a symbolic gesture on hearing the blasphemy the high priest tore his clothes (m. Sanh. 7:5), and the assembly concurred with the capital charge (14:63–64). The blasphemy appears to have several facets, but the central factor is Jesus’ claim to be the Lord’s Anointed and that the high priest would see Jesus seated alongside God, as they rode on the clouds in judgment.<sup>39</sup>

<sup>36</sup> Josephus, War 2.258–264; Ant. 20.97–98, 168–172; cf. Rebecca Gray, Prophetic Figures in Late Second Temple Jewish Palestine: The Evidence from Josephus (New York: Oxford University Press, 1993).

<sup>37</sup> Betz, “Probleme,” ANRW II 25.1, 595 (author’s translation).

<sup>38</sup> Strobel, Die Stunde der Wahrheit, 81–86.

<sup>39</sup> Brown, Jesus Then and Now, 41. The answer appropriates the imagery of Psalm 110 and Dan 7:13, embellished by that of Exod 14:20; Num 10:34; Ps 104:3; Isa 19:1.

The motif of Thesis B1 is maintained in the incidents of the blindfold and taunts to prophesy (14:65; cf. Isa 11:3–4),<sup>40</sup> the challenge to come down from the cross (15:29), and the presumed call to Elijah (15:35–36). Thesis C comes back into play in handing Jesus over to Pilate who asks him, “Are you the King of the Jews?” (15:2). The theme of kingship is played out in Pilate’s appeal to the crowd who prefer Barabbas who had committed murder during the insurrection (15:7) to “the man you call the King of the Jews” (15:6–15); the clothing and crowning of the scourged Jesus with a purple robe as King of the Jews (15:16–20); the triumphal procession to the cross (15:21–24);<sup>41</sup> and the titulus inscription “King of the Jews” (15:26).

The rending of the Temple veil was a sign indicating that the sanctuary was now vulnerable to the invasion of the profane and that God was no longer present.<sup>42</sup> It has been interpreted as a fulfillment of John the Baptist’s prophecy (1:8).<sup>43</sup> In death, the Spirit that had come upon Jesus after his baptism left him [ἐξέπνευσεν] to become the breath of divine judgment (15:37; cf. Isa 11:4; 27:8; Job 4:9; Wis 11:20).<sup>44</sup> To the Roman centurion it was an omen indicating divinity, “Truly this man was God’s Son!” (15:39). The comment is a counterpart to 1:11, bringing Mark’s narrative full circle. The words are not a confession of faith but of defeat.<sup>45</sup>

The narrative proper ends in tragedy, but Mark’s epilogue (15:40–16:8) transforms tragedy into triumph. The best manuscript tradition

<sup>40</sup> W. C. van Unnik, “Jesu Verhöhnung vor dem Synedrium (Mc xiv 65 par),” in Sparsa Collecta: The Collected Works of W. C. van Unnik, NovTSup (Leiden: Brill, 1973) 1:3–5; Betz, “Probleme,” ANRW II 25.1, 638.

<sup>41</sup> Thomas Schmidt, “Mark 15:16–31: The Crucifixion Narrative and the Roman Triumphal Procession,” NTS 41 (1995): 1–18; Schmidt, “Jesus’ Triumphal Procession March: The Sacred Way as Roman Procession,” BRev 13.1 (1997): 30–37.

<sup>42</sup> Raymond E. Brown, The Death of the Messiah: From Gethsemane to the Grave, A Commentary on the Passion Narratives of the Four Gospels (New York: Doubleday, 1994), 2:1101, noting similarities with the departure of the glory of God from the Temple (Ezek 10) just before the invading Babylonians destroyed Jerusalem.

<sup>43</sup> B. M. F. van Iersel, “He Will Baptize You with the Holy Spirit: The Time Perspective of Baptisei,” in Text and Testimony: Essays on New Testament and Apocryphal Literature in Honour of A. F. J. Klijn, ed. T. Baarda, A. Hilhorst, G. P. Luttikhuisen, and A. S. van der Woude (Kampen: Kok, 1988), 132–141.

<sup>44</sup> ἐκπνέω is a common word for expire (BDAG, 38). It is related to πνεῦμα, spirit. Since Jesus had a unique relationship with the Holy Spirit, 15:37 may refer to breathing out the Holy Spirit.

<sup>45</sup> John Pobee, “The Cry of the Centurion—A Cry of Defeat,” in The Trial of Jesus: Cambridge Studies in Honour of C. F. D. Moule, ed. Ernst Bammel, SBT 2.13 (London: SCM, 1970), 91–102.

ends with 16:8:<sup>46</sup> “So they [the three women who had brought spices to anoint the corpse] went out and fled from the tomb, for terror and amazement had seized them; and they said nothing to anyone, for they were afraid [ἐφοβοῦντο γάρ].” Three main reasons have been proposed for the alleged unsatisfactory state of affairs. It seems grammatically odd to end a work with a conjunction. To end on a note of fear seems to be psychologically unfulfilling. The desire to know more is attested by the various shorter and longer endings attached to Mark, and the fact that other gospels (canonical and uncanonical) give us more.

Yet these reasons miss the point. Examples of sentences ending with conjunctions are well attested.<sup>47</sup> The motif of fear is a recurrent theme (4:41; 5:15, 33, 36; 6:20, 50; 9:32; 10:32; 11:18, 32; 12:12; 16:8). It played an important role in Aristotle’s contention that tragedy and epic should arouse pity and fear in order to produce catharsis in spectators and hearers.<sup>48</sup> In biblical religion fear is a most appropriate response to divine acts (Deut 5:29; 13:4; 31:12–13; Ps 2:11; Prov 1:7). It may be that Mark deliberately left his gospel open ended, for the reason that the life and activity of Jesus is unending. As elsewhere in Mark, what is important lies in what is not said. A tacit element throughout Mark is the question of purity and impurity. It plays a major role in Mark’s epilogue. A young man/angel is in the tomb clothed in a white robe (16:5), reminiscent of Jesus’ transfiguration (9:3). Evidently, he is not defiled. Nor are the women. But in Jewish tradition corpses and graves defile.<sup>49</sup> The implication is that Jesus has cleansed the grave from its defiling power and strength. Far from being an anticlimax, Mark’s story of the women is the climax of the gospel. What has taken place is the ultimate act of cleansing. Mark’s narrative has moved from the conquest of individual spirits to the conquest of death itself.

2.2. Matthew

The character and composition of Matthew has received much attention in recent years.<sup>50</sup> Many agree with Benjamin W. Bacon in seeing Matt 13:51–52 as a self-portrait of the author—a “scribe who has been <sup>46</sup> Patrick D. Miller and Beverly Roberts Gaventa, eds., The Ending of Mark and the Ends of God: Essays in Memory of Donald Harrisville Juel (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2005); cf. Colin Brown, Jesus Then and Now, 52 n. 106.

<sup>47</sup> BDAG 190, 1060. LXX examples include Gen 18:15; 45:3.

<sup>48</sup> Poetics 1449b 25–28.

<sup>49</sup> Num 6:6; 19:14–22; Lev 21:1–2; Mishnah Ohalot. Graves were marked to avoid causing defilement (Matt 23:29; Luke 11:44; m. Sheq. 1:1).

<sup>50</sup> Graham N. Stanton, “The Origin and Purpose of Matthew’s Gospel: Matthean made a disciple of the kingdom of heaven... like unto a man that is a householder, who bringeth forth out of his treasure things new and old."<sup>51</sup> Bacon comments: Matthew is "‘a converted rabbi.’ His ideal, his methods, his stereotyped phraseology, his delight in numerical groupings, his proverbial sayings, all show the characteristics of a trained teacher of the synagogue. He has become a church catechist; but he has not discarded the methods of his training nor greatly altered its ideals."<sup>52</sup> In his "unbounded reverence for the Law" Matthew arranged his gospel in five books like the Pentateuch.<sup>53</sup> Matthew's development of Mark and Q was retrograde, since it reduced Jesus to a second Moses, laid down commandments for higher righteousness while missing Jesus' vital sympathy with the prophets, and substituted book religion for the living God of goodness and truth.<sup>54</sup>

A more sanguine view is taken by Dale C. Allison, Jr., who argues that Matthew was written "by a man with an almost Jeremian sense of foreboding, a man who solemnly undertook to write a powerful and persuasive book which would endorse the pre-Christian past and prohibit the dissociation of Christianity from Judaism, a book which would demonstrate that the Messiah himself followed in the footsteps of the lawgiver, and therefore to abandon Moses is to abandon Jesus."<sup>55</sup>

A significant body of scholars takes the opposite view: Matthew and his community have already parted ways with formative Judaism.<sup>56</sup> Graham N. Stanton compares Matthew with the Damascus Document:

---

Scholarship from 1945 to 1980," ANRW II 25.3 (1985): 1889–1951; Stanton, A Gospel for a New People: Studies in Matthew (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1992), 23–210; Stanton, ed., The Interpretation of Matthew, 2nd ed. (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1995); Ulrich Luz, The Theology of the Gospel of Matthew (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995); David R. Bauer and Mark Allan Powell, eds., Treasures Old and New: Contributions to Matthean Studies, SBLSS 1 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1996), 27–68.

<sup>51</sup> Benjamin W. Bacon, Studies in Matthew (New York: Henry Holt, 1930), 131.

<sup>52</sup> Bacon, Studies in Matthew, 132; cf. Ernst von Dobschütz, "Matthew as Rabbi and Catechist" (1928), in The Interpretation of Matthew, ed. Stanton, 27–38.

<sup>53</sup> Bacon, Studies in Matthew, xxx–xxiv.

<sup>54</sup> Benjamin W. Bacon, "Jesus and the Law: A Study of the First 'Book' of Matthew," JBL 47 (1928): 203–231.

<sup>55</sup> Dale C. Allison, The New Moses: The Matthean Typology (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2003), 290; cf. J. Andrew Overman, Matthew's Gospel and Formative Judaism: The Social World of the Matthean Community (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1990); Anthony J. Saldarini, Matthew's Jewish Christian Community (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994); David C. Sim, The Gospel of Matthew and Christian Judaism: The History and Social Setting of the Matthean Community (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1996).

<sup>56</sup> C. F. D. Moule, "St. Matthew's Gospel: Some Neglected Features," in Essays in New Testament Interpretation (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982), 67–74; Krister Stendahl, The School of St. Matthew and Its Use of the Old Testament, 2nd ed. (Lund: Gleerup, 1968); Craig A. Evans and Donald A. Hagner, eds., Anti-Semitism and kinship with the parent body is acknowledged, but the offspring is estranged from the parent. Matthew is the only evangelist to speak of Jesus' ἐκκλησία (16:18; 18:17), which is separate from "their synagogues" (4:23; 9:35; 10:17; 12:9). Disciples are not to be called "rabbi" (23:7–8). In denouncing the scribes and Pharisees, Matthew's Jesus declares: "Therefore I send you prophets, sages, and scribes, some of whom you will kill and crucify, and some you will flog in your synagogues and pursue from town to town" (23:34). The temple will be left desolate (23:38), but with the coming of Jesus "something greater than the temple is here" (12:6).<sup>57</sup>

While Bacon's theory of a fivefold structure has attractions, Matthew does not correspond to the Pentateuch. More attractive is Jack Dean Kingsbury's identification of a three-book structure.<sup>58</sup> Matthew arranged his materials in three books identified by "superscriptions." The first—"The book of the genesis of Jesus Christ, Son of David, Son of Abraham" (1:1)—tells of the origin and significance of Jesus (1:1–4:16). The other two begin with "from that time," and indicate new phases in Jesus' activity. The second phase (4:17–16:20) begins with "From that time Jesus began to proclaim, 'Repent, for the kingdom of heaven has come near.'" It denotes the nature and effect of his proclamation to Israel. The third phase (16:21–28:20) is introduced by "From that time on, Jesus began to show his disciples that he must go to Jerusalem and undergo great suffering at the hands of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed and on the third day be raised." This last phase deals with the consequences of the rejection of Jesus' proclamation. "The events surrounding Jesus are, in the eyes of Matthew, of ultimate meaning for Israel and all humankind."<sup>59</sup>

Corresponding to this threefold division on a macro-level, W. D. Davies and Dale C. Allison, Jr., have identified forty-four triads in Matthew on the micro-level of Jesus' teaching.<sup>60</sup> Glenn H. Stassen observes that the internal triadic structure of the triads has largely been missed because scholars have been thinking in terms of dyadic antitheses. Stassen characterizes the triadic structure of Jesus' teaching as consisting in (1) a description of traditional piety which is unable to deal adequately

---

Early Christianity: Issues of Polemic and Faith (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1993), 55–79; Donald A. Hagner, Matthew 1–13 (Dallas: Word, 1993), lxxv–lxxiii; Luz, The Theology of the Gospel of Matthew, 17–21, 129–141.

<sup>57</sup> Stanton, A Gospel for a New People, 96–98.

<sup>58</sup> Jack Dean Kingsbury, Matthew: Structure, Christology, Kingdom, 2nd ed. (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1989), 1–39.

<sup>59</sup> Kingsbury, Matthew: Structure, Christology, Kingdom, 36–37.

<sup>60</sup> The Gospel According to Saint Matthew, ICC (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1988), 1:86–87.

with (2) the vicious circle of destructive behavior, but which can be broken by (3) the “transforming initiative” of Jesus’ radical teaching.<sup>61</sup> This point brings us to the fundamental issue of hermeneutics, which comes to the fore in Matthew. According to Theses B1 and B2, Jesus’ adversaries viewed him in terms of the profiles found in the Torah of the wonder-working prophet who leads astray and the stubborn and rebellious son. Matthew rebuts these charges by presenting Jesus as fulfiller of the law and the prophets: “Do not think that I have come to abolish the law or the prophets; I have come not to abolish but to fulfill” (Matt 5:17).<sup>62</sup>

Thesis C and Thesis A come to the fore in Matt 1:1–4:16, which is “The book of the genesis of Jesus Christ, Son of David, Son of Abraham.” The genealogy (1:2–16) contains allusions to Davidic descent and kingship.<sup>63</sup> But there are also allusions to the Holy Spirit as the ultimate source of Jesus’ identity (1:18, 20). When Mary was found with child, Joseph “being a righteous man” planned to dismiss her quietly, but the angel of the Lord appeared to him in a dream and said, “Joseph, son of David, do not be afraid to take Mary as your wife, for the child that is born in her is from the Holy Spirit [ἐκ πνεύματός... ἁγίου]. She will bear a son, and you are to name him Jesus, for he will save his people from their sins” (1:20–21).

Four observations may be made. First, whatever kingly descent Jesus may have, his mission is to save his people from their sins. Second, there is a play on words linking the Hebrew form of Jesus’ name (Yeshua, a shortened form of Yehoshua, i.e. Joshua) with the promise that he will save his people from their sins.<sup>64</sup> Although many scholars

<sup>61</sup> Glenn H. Stassen, “The Fourteen Triads of the Sermon on the Mount (Matthew 5:21–7:12),” JBL 122 (2003): 267–308.

<sup>62</sup> Birger Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript: Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity, 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1998), 328.

<sup>63</sup> Matt 1:1 “functions to dispute the truthfulness of the imperial claims, suggesting Rome’s demise, offering some present relief and proclaiming an alternative and just social vision under way now but yet to be fully realized in the future new creation through Jesus Christ son of David, son of Abraham” (Warren Carter, “Matthaeian Christology in Roman Imperial Key: Matthew 1:1,” in The Gospel of Matthew in Its Roman Imperial Context, ed. John Riches and David C. Sim, JSNTSup 276 [Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2005], 165); cf. M. D. Johnson, The Purpose of the Biblical Genealogies with Special Reference to the Setting of the Genealogies of Jesus, SNTSMS 8 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1969), 139–229; Raymond E. Brown, The Birth of the Messiah: A Commentary on the Infancy Narratives in the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, 2nd ed. (New York: Doubleday, 1993), 57–95.

<sup>64</sup> Yehoshua means “Yahweh saves” or “May Yahweh save” (Meier, A Marginal Jew I, 205–208).

see in Matthew a Moses typology, Jesus' name points to a Joshua typology. Dale C. Allison, Jr., comes close to making the point in his observation: "Surely it would be a dull and uninformed reader who does not recognize that the life of Joshua is to a significant degree a replay of the life of Moses. Joshua completed the work left undone by his predecessor, with the result that the conquest of Canaan fulfilled the promise of the exodus from Egypt. We may say that the conqueror of the land is 'almost a second Moses.'"<sup>65</sup> As Matthew's narrative unfolds, Jesus the new Joshua is not only the teacher of Israel but her anointed leader engaged in a new conquest—not bloody like Joshua's—but one of peace to purify and heal Israel in preparation for the kingdom of God.

My third observation brings us back to the genealogy, which is arranged according to three groups of fourteen generations: from Abraham to David, from David to the deportation to Babylon, and "from the deportation to the Messiah" (1:17). The fact that no mention is made of a return from exile accords with the view that the exile was still going on, and the hope that the Messiah would bring it to an end. My fourth observation is that the assumption that the Spirit played a male role in Jesus' conception is not supported by Matthew. The formula denoting the male role in the genealogy is "Abraham begat, Isaac begat Jacob," etc. Five women are mentioned—all victims of sexual abuse or degraded circumstances—Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, the wife of Uriah the Hittite, and Mary "of whom Jesus was born, who is called the Messiah" (1:16). In each case the preposition ἐκ/ἐξ ("of") is used—the same preposition which is used in the two descriptions of the conception of Jesus "of the Holy Spirit" (1:18, 20). The implication is that the Holy Spirit played a female role in the conception of Jesus.<sup>66</sup>

The angel's word is followed by the explanation: "All this took place to fulfill what had been spoken by the Lord through the prophet: 'Look, a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and they shall name him Emmanuel,' which means, 'God is with us'" (1:22–23). Christian tradition has taken this as a proof-text predicting the virgin birth. But in context Isa 7:14 promises a sign that before the child is weaned the danger posed by two invading kings will be past. Like other instances of fulfillment in Matthew (e.g. 2:18; 12:17), it is a case of history being repeated in an ultimately significant way. R. E. Watts contends: “(a) Matthew’s citation of Isa 7:14 not so much serves as a proof text supporting Jesus’ miraculous birth as constitutes a warning of the dire consequences should Israel respond faithlessly to the salvation he inaugurates and (b) the twofold naming—Jesus (salvation) and Immanuel (potential disaster if Yahweh’s intervention is met with unbelief)—is programmatic for the gospel’s larger literary and theological schema.”<sup>67</sup>

<sup>65</sup> Allison, The New Moses, 26. Allison notes 8 parallel accounts from what might be called The Parallel Lives of Moses and Joshua.

<sup>66</sup> Meier, A Marginal Jew I, 221. The Greek word for Spirit (πνεῦμα) is neuter, but in biblical Hebrew טְהָרָה is feminine.

I argued that Mark understood John’s prophecy that “he will baptize with the Holy Spirit” (1:8) as programmatic for Jesus’ ministry of purification. The Q form of the prophecy adds the words “and with fire” (Matt 3:11; Luke 3:16). James D.G. Dunn concludes that the words “must have been a metaphor of judgment.”<sup>68</sup> However, the following verse indicates a two-stage process of gathering the wheat and burning the chaff (3:12). But first Jesus must “fulfill all righteousness” and receive baptism from John, after which “suddenly the heavens were opened to him and he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove.”<sup>69</sup> And a voice from heaven said, “This is my son, the Beloved, with whom I am well pleased” (3:15–17). The words of the Bat Qol allude to the kingship ritual in which the king is addressed as “my son” (Ps 2:7, Thesis C) and to the role of the anointed one (Isa 42:1, Thesis A).

As in Mark, the Spirit leads Jesus into the wilderness where he undergoes testing reduplicating the testing of Israel during the wilderness wanderings.<sup>70</sup> Where Israel failed, Jesus overcame. The threefold testing—to turn stones into bread, to throw himself from the Temple pinnacle, and to worship Satan in return for the kingdoms of the world—are tests of Jesus’ new status as Son of God. Each is met with a citation from Deuteronomy (8:3; 6:16; 6:13). The narrative is a preemptive rebuttal of the Beelzebul charge (Thesis B1).

Matthew’s second “book” (4:16–16:20) deals with Jesus’ proclamation of the kingdom to Israel and its reception. Jesus is not only the

<sup>67</sup> R. E. Watts, “Immanuel: Virgin Birth Proof Text or Programmatic Warning of Things to Come (Isa. 7:14 in Matt. 1:23),” in From Prophecy to Testament: The Function of the Old Testament in the New, ed. Craig A. Evans (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2004), 92–113. Isa 7:17 is cited in CD A 7.11.

<sup>68</sup> J. D. G. Dunn, “The Birth of a Metaphor—Baptized in Spirit,” in The Christ and the Spirit, 2, Pneumatology (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1998), 103–117, here 105; Dunn, “Spirit-and-Fire Baptism,” in Pneumatology, 93–102.

<sup>69</sup> Leander E. Keck, “The Spirit and the Dove,” NTS 17 (1970–1971): 41–67.

<sup>70</sup> Birger Gerhardsson, The Testing of God’s Son (Matt. 4:1–11 and Par): An Analysis of an Early Christian Midrash (Lund: Gleerup, 1966).

teacher of Israel in delivering the Sermon on the Mount; he is also her healer and purifier through his “mighty acts.”<sup>71</sup> Jesus’ healing activity begins after the Sermon on the Mount<sup>72</sup> with the story of Jesus touching the leper and saying, “Be made clean!” (8:3). Repeated references to cleansing maintain the theme of purity. The instruction, “See that you say nothing to anyone; but go, show yourself to the priest, and offer the gift that Moses commanded, as a testimony to them” (8:4), shows how Jesus “fulfilled” the law, despite breaking it by touching the leper.

The story of the centurion’s servant (Matt 8:5–13 and Luke 7:1–10, but not in Mark) contrasts the faith of the centurion with the unbelief of Israel. As a man “under authority” the centurion sees Jesus as a man under authority, empowered to speak the healing word. From the standpoint of Thesis C, Jesus serves an authority with power that Rome cannot match. Matthew notes that Jesus was “amazed” at his faith. The story concludes with Jesus saying that he has not found such faith in Israel, and predicting that many will come from the east and west to eat with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom, while its heirs will be thrown into outer darkness. The centurion is told, “Go; let it be done for you according to your faith.” The servant was healed the same hour (8:10–13).<sup>73</sup>

The healing of Peter’s mother-in-law, the casting out the spirits with a word curing all the sick “that evening” (8:14–16) are interpreted as the fulfillment of “what had been spoken through the prophet Isaiah, ‘He took our infirmities and bore our diseases’” (8:17; cf. Isa 53:4). The stilling of the storm is detached from its Markan context, and becomes a rescue miracle with wider implications of dangers facing disciples.<sup>74</sup>

Mark’s story of Legion becomes a condensed story of two unnamed men (8:28–34). It is followed by the healing of the paralytic (9:1–8), the objection of the Pharisees to Jesus eating with tax collectors and sinners (9:9–13) and Jesus’ response (9:14–17), Jairus’s daughter and the

<sup>71</sup> Birger Gerhardsson, The Mighty Acts of Jesus According to Matthew (Lund: Gleerup, 1979); Lidija Novakovic, Messiah, Healer of the Sick: A Study of Jesus as the Son of David in Matthew, WUNT 170 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2003).

<sup>72</sup> Hans Dieter Betz, The Sermon on the Mount, ed. Adela Yarbro Collins (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1995).

<sup>73</sup> Ralph P. Martin, “The Pericope of the Healing of the ‘Centurion’s’ Servant/Son (Matt. 8:5–13 par. Luke 7:1–10): Some Exegetical Notes,” in Unity and Diversity in New Testament Theology: Essays in Honor of George E. Ladd, ed. Robert A. Guelich (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1978), 14–22.

<sup>74</sup> Günther Bornkamm, “The Stilling of the Storm in Matthew,” in Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew, by Günther Bornkamm, Gerhard Barth, and Heinz Joachim Held, trans. Percy Scott (London: SCM, 1963), 52–57.

woman with a hemorrhage (9:18–26), two blind men (9:27–31), and a demoniac (9:32). The amazed crowds say, “Never has anything like this been seen in Israel” (9:33). But the Pharisees respond with the first intimation of Thesis B1: “By the ruler of demons he casts out demons” (9:34). A warning is given in Jesus’ mission charge to the Twelve: “If they have called the master of the house Beelzebul, how much more will they malign those of his household!” (10:25). A hint of Thesis B2 is given in Jesus’ sayings about his role in family estrangement (10:34–39). All this is countered by the disclosure of Jesus’ identity as the father’s agent in the saying, “Whoever welcomes you welcomes me, and whoever welcomes me welcomes him who sent me” (10:40; cf. 11:27–30).<sup>75</sup>

The question sent by John from prison—“Are you the one who is to come, or are we to wait for another?” (11:3)—presupposes the expectations raised by the Servant Song about the one on whom God had put his Spirit (Isa 42:1–4; cf. Matt 3:17; 12:8–21). He was expected to “bring out the prisoners from the dungeon, from the prison those that sit in darkness” (Isa 42:7). But Jesus was not a militant. His answer drew on a variety of Isaianic passages: “Go and tell John what you hear and see: the blind receive their sight, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, and the poor have good news brought to them. And blessed is anyone who takes no offense at me” (11:4–6; cf. Isa 29:18–19; 35:5–6; 61:1).

In his appraisal of John Jesus observed: “For John came neither eating nor drinking, and they say, ‘He has a demon’; the Son of Man came eating and drinking, and they say, ‘Look, a glutton and a drunkard, a friend of tax collectors and sinners!’ Yet wisdom is vindicated by her deeds” (11:18–19; cf. Deut 21:20). The expression “a glutton and a drunkard” is part of the formula identified under Thesis B2 for denouncing a “stubborn and rebellious son.” This leads to Jesus denouncing the cities in which most of his “deeds of power” had been done for their lack of repentance (11:20–24).

As in Mark, the conspiracy of the Pharisees to destroy Jesus (11:14) is preceded by the incident in the cornfields (12:1–8), and the healing on the Sabbath of the man with a withered hand (12:9–13). But Matthew inserts a passage which attributes the healings of Jesus to the

---

<sup>75</sup> Anthony Harvey, “Christ as Agent,” in The Glory of Christ in the New Testament: Studies in Christology in Memory of George Bradford Caird, ed. L. D. Hurst and N. T. Wright (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1987), 239–250; cf. the rabbinic saying “A man’s agent is as himself” (b. Ber. 5:5).

Spirit in line with Thesis A: “This was to fulfill what had been spoken through the prophet Isaiah: “Here is my servant, whom I have chosen, my beloved, with whom my soul is well pleased. I will put my Spirit upon him, and he will proclaim justice to the Gentiles. He will not wrangle or cry aloud, nor will anyone hear his voice in the streets. He will not break a bruised reed or quench a smoldering wick until he brings justice to victory. And in his name the Gentiles will hope” (12:18–21; cf. Isa 42:1–4).<sup>76</sup>

After healing a demoniac who was blind and mute, the crowd asks, “Can this be the Son of David?” to which the Pharisees respond: “It is only by Beelzebul [ἐν τῷ Βεελζεβοῦλ], the ruler of the demons, that this fellow casts out the demons” (12:24). Thesis A and Thesis B1 are brought into sharp juxtaposition. Matthew reproduces the essential elements of Mark’s account, including warning against blasphemy against the Spirit (12:31–32), but inserts two new comments, apparently drawn from Q like the ensuing wisdom teaching. “If I cast out demons by Beelzebul [ἐν Βεελζεβοῦλ], by whom do your own exorcists cast them out? Therefore they will be your judges” (12:27). “But if it is by the Spirit of God [ἐν πνεύματι θεοῦ] that I cast out demons, then the kingdom of God has come to you” (12:28). The juxtaposition ἐν Βεελζεβοῦλ and ἐν πνεύματι θεοῦ leaves no doubt that Jesus’ accusers are guilty of blasphemy by attributing to Beelzebul the manifest work of God’s Spirit.<sup>77</sup> The work of the Spirit through Jesus manifests the kingdom, God’s presence in power. The episode closes with the incident involving Jesus and his mother and brothers (12:46–60, Thesis B2).

Matthew’s wisdom christology, hinted at in 11:19, now comes into the open.<sup>78</sup> Jesus has already replaced the yoke of Torah-based wisdom by inviting the weary and heavy laden to take his yoke and learn from him (11:28–30; cf. Sir 51:23–26)—an act which could be construed as leading astray. Matthew’s Jesus responds to the Pharisees’ request for a sign by saying that no sign will be given “an evil and adulterous generation” except the sign of Jonah, but something greater than Jonah is here

<sup>76</sup> Cf. Richard Beaton, Isaiah’s Christ in Matthew’s Gospel, SNTSMS 123 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002).

<sup>77</sup> Stanton, A Gospel for a New People, 177–178.

<sup>78</sup> M. Jack Suggs, Wisdom, Christology, and Law in Matthew’s Gospel (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1970); James M. Robinson, “Jesus as Sophos and Sophia: Wisdom Tradition and the Gospels,” in Aspects of Wisdom in Judaism and Early Christianity, ed. Robert L. Wilken (Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press, 1975), 1–16; Celia M. Deutsch, Lady Wisdom, Jesus, and the Sages: Metaphor and Social Context in Matthew’s Gospel (Valley Forge: Trinity Press International, 1996).

(12:38–41; cf. 16:4). “The queen of the South will rise up at the judgment with this generation and condemn it, because she came from the ends of the earth to listen to the wisdom of Solomon, and see, something greater than Solomon is here!” (12:42).

Matthew’s third “book” (16:21–28:20) follows Peter’s confession. “From that time on, Jesus began to show his disciples that he must go to Jerusalem and undergo great suffering at the hands of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and on the third day be raised” (16:21).<sup>79</sup> The course of events leading up to Jesus’ execution broadly follows Mark. Two issues call for comment. Both have bearing on Thesis B1. In Mark the Greek of Peter’s confession (8:29) and the high priest’s question (14:61) contain identical words: σὺ εἶ ὁ χριστὸς.<sup>80</sup> Matthew’s account is more complex—both Peter and Caiaphas used the phrase “the living God” but in different ways. Peter confesses, “You are the Messiah, the Son of the living God [σὺ εἶ ὁ χριστὸς ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦ ζῶντος]” (16:16). The high priest says to Jesus, “I put you under oath before the living God [ἐξορκίζω σε κατὰ τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦ ζῶντος], tell us if you are the Messiah, the Son of God [σὺ εἶ ὁ χριστὸς ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ]” (26:63). While ἐξορκίζω was used in the general sense of putting under an oath, it was also used in exorcism.<sup>81</sup> If so the high priest was thinking that he was dealing with the demonic, invoking the living God.

Also in line with Thesis B1 is the request to Pilate by the chief priests and Pharisees: “Sir, we remember what that impostor [πλάνος] said while he was still alive, ‘After three days I will rise again.’ Therefore command the tomb to be made secure until the third day; otherwise his disciples may go and steal him away, and tell the people, ‘He has been raised from the dead,’ and the last deception [πλάνη] would be worse than the first” (27:63–64).

<sup>79</sup> This verse appears to be an expansion of the cryptic oracle “the gates of Hades will not prevail against [the church]” (Colin Brown, “The Gates of Hell and the Church,” in Church, Word, and Spirit: Historical and Theological Essays in Honor of Geoffrey W. Bromiley, ed. James E. Bradley and Richard A. Muller [Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1987], 15–44; Brown, “The Gates of Hell: An Alternative Approach,” in SBL 1987 Seminar Papers [Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1987], 357–367).

<sup>80</sup> Colin Brown, “The Hermeneutics on Confession and Accusation,” CTJ 30 (1995): 460–471.

<sup>81</sup> BDAG, 351; cf. PGM IV 1227–1264 (The Greek Magical Papyri in Translation, Including the Demotic Spells, ed. Hans Dieter Betz, 2nd ed. [Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992], 62).

2.3. Luke

It is widely recognized that Luke is the first of a two-volume work,<sup>82</sup> which either drew on Q or directly on Matthew,<sup>83</sup> in addition to Mark. Robert C. Tannehill observes: “One of the richest ways of reading Luke and Acts is as the story of God’s promise to Israel—a promise given to Abraham and made more specific to David—concerning the salvation of Israel through a Messiah who will also be the savior of all nations.”<sup>84</sup>

Luke’s Spirit christology begins with his pre-history. It includes the annunciation, which resonates both with Thesis C in the promise of Davidic kingship, and with Thesis A in the angel’s assurance to Mary: “The Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow [ἐπισκιάσει] you; therefore the child to be born will be holy; he will be called Son of God” (1:30–35).<sup>85</sup> As with the songs of Mary (1:46–55) and Zechariah (1:67–79), the annunciation might have raised hopes of a warrior king like David. Such expectations are dashed by Jesus’ pronouncements in the synagogue in Nazareth.

The census decreed by Augustus when Quirinius was governor of Syria provoked the uprising led by Judas the Galilean,<sup>86</sup> but Luke is more interested in locating Jesus in the time-frame of world history (2:1–2; cf. 3:1). He wants to show how the politics of Rome worked “hand in hand with God’s divine purpose for salvation.”<sup>87</sup> Those who wondered whether John was the Messiah were told, “I baptize you with <sup>82</sup> H. J. Cadbury, The Making of Luke-Acts (repr., London: SPCK, 1958); Robert C. Tannehill, The Narrative Unity of Luke-Acts: A Literary Interpretation, 2 vols. (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); David P. Moessner, ed., Luke the Interpreter of Israel 1: Jesus and the Heritage of Israel (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1999); Joseph B. Tyson, Luke, Judaism, and the Scholars: Critical Approaches to Luke-Acts (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1999).

<sup>83</sup> Allan J. McNicol, David L. Dungan, and David B. Peabody, eds., Beyond the Q Impasse—Luke’s Use of Matthew (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1996); Mark Goodacre, The Case Against Q: Studies in Markan Priority and the Synoptic Problem (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2002). For reconstruction of the Lukan material see Kim Pfaffenroth, The Story of Jesus According to L, JSNTSup 147 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997).

<sup>84</sup> R. C. Tannehill, “The Story of Israel with the Lukan Narrative,” in Luke the Interpreter of Israel, ed. Moessner, 325–339, here 325.

<sup>85</sup> ἐπισκιάζω means to overshadow (Matt 17:5; Mark 9:34; Luke 9:34) and is used figuratively of providential care (Ps 91:4; 140:7); cf. Jane Schaberg, The Illegitimacy of Jesus: A Feminist Theological Interpretation of the Infancy Narratives (New York: Crossroad, 1990), 114–117; BDAG, 378–379; Max Turner, Power from on High: The Spirit in Israel’s Restoration and Witness in Luke-Acts (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996).

<sup>86</sup> Josephus, War 2.117–118, Ant. 18.1–3.

<sup>87</sup> Helen K. Bond, Pontius Pilate in History and in Interpretation, SNTSMS 100 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998), 140.

water; but one who is more powerful than I is coming; I am not worthy to untie the thong of his sandals. He will baptize you with the Holy Spirit and fire. His winnowing fork is in his hand, to clear his threshing floor and to gather the wheat into his granary; but the chaff he will burn with unquenchable fire” (3:16–17).

The equation of John’s prophecy with Acts 1:5 and 11:16 led to the assumption that it was fulfilled at Pentecost, resulting in failure to see its relevance to the earthly Jesus. Baptism in the Holy Spirit in Acts is a continuation of Jesus’ baptism in the Spirit in Luke. To make this possible, Jesus must be baptized by John, be anointed by the Spirit, and hear the assurance, ‘You are my Son, the Beloved; with you I am well pleased” (3:21–22).

Sandwiched between the baptism and the temptations is the genealogy which traces Jesus’ lineage back to “Adam, son of God” (3:38). As in the other gospels, Son of God is a messianic title, bestowed in virtue of his anointing. Satan’s temptations<sup>88</sup> turn on the reality of that anointing. The point is strengthened by Luke’s observation that Jesus was “full of the Holy Spirit” when he “was led by the Spirit in the wilderness” (4:1), and that he returned to Galilee “filled with the power of the Spirit” (4:14).

Thesis A receives further confirmation by Jesus reading from the Isaiah scroll on the Sabbath in the synagogue at Nazareth. “The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he has anointed me to bring good news to the poor. He has sent me to proclaim release to the captives and recovery of sight to the blind, to let the oppressed go free, to proclaim the year of the Lord’s favor” (4:18–19; cf. Isa 61:1–2). Jesus added: “Today this scripture has been fulfilled in your hearing” (4:21). What prevented a violent uprising is the omission of the words “and the day of vengeance of our God” (Isa 61:2).

John Howard Yoder and others have read into the episode a program for implementing the jubilee year (Lev 25), in which property lost through debt was returned, the land was to lie fallow, and Israelite slaves but not others were released.<sup>89</sup> Several considerations militate against the idea. Jubilee year terminology does not appear in Luke. Proclaiming release is not confined to the jubilee (Lev 25:10; cf. Jer 34:8, 15, 17). Jesus refused to participate in redistribution of family wealth (12:13). Yoder's description of the Lord's Prayer as "jubiliary"<sup>90</sup> works better for Matthew than for Luke! Matt 6:12 has "forgive us our debts [ὀφειλήματα]," whereas Luke 11:4 has "sins [ἁμαρτίας]." In the one case of release—rescuing John from prison (7:18–23)—Jesus did nothing! Zacchaeus's restoration of money had to do with defrauding—not release from debt (19:8). Jesus' response focuses on salvation, "For the Son of Man came to seek out and to save the lost" (19:9–10). Jesus' identification of himself in terms of Isa 61:1–2 fits better the theme of ending exile—which was the original context of the prophecy.

<sup>88</sup> Susan R. Garrett, The Demise of the Devil: Magic and the Demonic in Luke’s Writings (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1989).

<sup>89</sup> J. H. Yoder, The Politics of Jesus: Vicit Agnus Noster, 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1994); Sharon Ringe, Jesus, Liberation, and the Biblical Jubilee (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985).

Initial amazement at Jesus' gracious words (4:22) rapidly turned to rage, when Jesus reminded his hearers that there were many widows in Israel, but Elijah was sent only to a widow at Zarephath in Sidon, and there were many lepers in the time of Elisha, but only Naaman the Syrian was cleansed (4:26–27). When the implications sank in, the hearers tried to hurl Jesus over a cliff (4:28–30).

D. Neale sees the action as implementation of Deut 13:1–11 (Thesis B1).

Their intent was evidently to stone Jesus, for which throwing the offender from a cliff 'twice the height of a man' (M. San. 6.4) was the first step. The attempted stoning is in complete accord with rabbinic prescriptions for the treatment of the mesith [one who entices away from Yahweh to idolatry]. To the inhabitants of Nazareth the rejection of Jesus was probably viewed as an act of religious and civic responsibility, an act of obedience to Torah and community. . . . Following this episode Jesus could not return home and the saying in Luke 9:58 that the Son of Man had nowhere to lay his head may have been quite literally true.<sup>91</sup>

In this light the move to Capernaum (4:31) and from there to other cities where Jesus "must proclaim the good news of the kingdom of God" (4:43) was strategic. In what follows Luke gives his version of stories found in Mark and Matthew. An exception is the raising of the widow of Nain's son [7:11–17]. S. John Roth sums up: "In Luke's Gospel. . . Jesus is found associating with and expressing God's favor toward the lame, the blind, and the others, and toward sinners. . . . It is the task of Luke's narrative to undermine the LXX-nourished, traditional rejection of sinners."<sup>92</sup>

<sup>90</sup> Yoder, The Politics of Jesus, 62.

<sup>91</sup> D. Neale, "Was Jesus a mesith? Public Response to Jesus and His ministry," TynBul 44.1 (1993): 99–100. The verbal form of mesith is found in Deut 13:6 (MT 13:7).

<sup>92</sup> S. J. Roth, The Blind, the Lame, and the Poor: Character Types in Luke-Acts, JSNTSup 144 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997), 218–219.

The first intimation of Thesis B2 (8:19–21) comes before the Beelzebub charge. A hint is given by Jesus' reputation as "a glutton and a drunkard," which is met by an intimation of wisdom christology—"Nevertheless, wisdom is vindicated by all her children" (7:34–35; cf. 11:24–33; Matt 11:18–19; Deut 21:20). Thesis B1 comes to the fore in 11:14–23 where the Beelzebub charge is linked with a request for a sign from heaven (11:16). It is met by a reductio ad absurdum. "If Satan also is divided against himself, how will his kingdom stand? —for you say that I cast out the demons by Beelzebub [ἐν Βεελζεβοὺλ]" (11:23; cf. Matt 12:25; Mark 3:18). The threefold repetition of ἐν Βεελζεβοὺλ (11:15, 18, 19) as the presumed source of Jesus' power is grammatically similar to, but theologically diametrically opposite of "by the finger of God [ἐν δακτύλῳ θεοῦ]." The implied blasphemy is stated later (12:20). Jesus' activity is the intimation of God's kingdom. "But if I with the finger of God cast out devils, no doubt the kingdom of God is come upon you" (11:20).<sup>93</sup>

Thesis B2 lies at the heart of Jesus' tensions with the Pharisees who grumbled at the way Jesus welcomed and ate with sinners (15:1). In response Jesus told the parables of the lost sheep, the lost coin, and the lost son. The latter (15:11–32), commonly called the Parable of the Prodigal Son, is based on the stubborn and rebellious son.<sup>94</sup> Initially the younger son behaves like the glutton and drunkard described (Deut 21:18–21) and his wisdom counterpart (Prov 23:19–25; 28:7; 29:1–3). The language (15:29–30) echoes that of Deut 21:20. In extremity the younger son returns from the dead (15:23–24, 32), and is welcomed by his rejoicing father. But the elder son who never broke his father's command rebukes his father, and refuses to join the festivities (15:25–30). The parable poses the question, "Which son was the stubborn and rebellious son?"

The Parable of the Unjust Steward (16:1–9) extends the theme.<sup>95</sup> At first the steward looks like a junk-bond artist. The parable is transformed if we remember two points. First, the debts that the steward drastically reduces represent usurious interest attached to loans.<sup>96</sup> By removing the unlawful interest the steward was enacting the Torah's teaching that loans to fellow Jews should not require interest (Deut 15:7–8; 23:20–21; Exod 22:25; Lev 25:36–37). Second, the steward was Jesus himself whose mandate included proclaiming release (4:18–19; 5:20; 7:47–49), which the Pharisees protested. The parable is a defense of Jesus, who wins his master's commendation (16:8) in the face of those who would remove him.

<sup>93</sup> Edward J. Woods, The "Finger" of God in Luke-Acts, JSNTSup 204 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001). Woods traces "finger of God" to Exod 8:19; 31:18; Deut 9:10 (90–98). It is similar to "hand of God," and has the sense of divine power in action, creative omnipotence, which in other contexts are identified with God's Spirit (cf. Matt 12:28).

<sup>94</sup> Colin Brown, "The Parable of the Rebellious Son(s)," SJT 51.4 (1998): 391–405.

<sup>95</sup> Colin Brown, "The Unjust Steward: A New Twist?" in Worship, Theology and Ministry in the Early Church: Essays in Honor of Ralph P. Martin, ed. Michael J. Wilkins and Terence Paige, JSNTSup 87 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1992), 121–145.

Perhaps because he was writing for a Gentile audience, Luke omits mention of blasphemy at the Jewish preliminary hearing (22:66–71). The real trial is before Pilate who pronounces Jesus innocent three times (23:4, 14, 22), but finally gives way to demands (23:24) to release the guilty Barrabas and crucify the innocent Jesus.<sup>97</sup> Luke's stance (Thesis C) is neither anti-Semitic nor pro-Roman. It reveals how Roman might and Jewish hostility are used by God in his saving purpose for the salvation of Israel and the nations (24:25–27, 44–49).

3. Postscript

Thesis C is about Christian and Gentile relations, but Theses A, B1 and B2 are about internal Jewish relations. Needless to say, canonical reading of the texts is not the same as recovering the historical Jesus. But it is an important preliminary step. The next is to figure out the history behind the Theses.

---

<sup>96</sup> J. D. M. Derrett, "The Parable of the Unjust Steward," in Law in the New Testament (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1970), 48–72.

<sup>97</sup> Bond, Pontius Pilate, 141–149.

FORM CRITICISM AND JESUS RESEARCH

ARLAND J. HULTGREN

Readers of the synoptic gospels often become aware that there are small units within the gospels that have striking similarities in the ways that they tell things. The similarities are strong enough to prompt the reader to give names to the units. Some of the most easily recognizable units having similarities are miracle stories, debates between Jesus and opponents, and parables.

As soon as a person begins to classify and name materials in this way, that person has entered into the field of gospel research known as form criticism. Form criticism, as applied to the gospels and to Jesus research specifically, is a discipline that, at a minimum, classifies gospel materials according to forms that can be discerned as the vehicles by which the traditions about Jesus were conveyed from the oral stages of transmission into the written gospels, such as miracle stories, parables, and more. In practice, however, form-critical work of New Testament scholars has not limited itself to classification. It has gone beyond that to have major significance for Jesus research. In fact, form criticism has had a truly revolutionary impact on Jesus research since early in the twentieth century. With the rise of form criticism, the study of the historical Jesus took on a new vigor. Its practitioners sought new criteria for determining what can be traced back to Jesus as “authentic” material (meaning traditions from or about Jesus that can be considered as historically accurate as can be expected) and what cannot. Its results have provided a veritable data base concerning Jesus that some have considered the building blocks to use in constructing a picture of the historical Jesus. To be sure, some scholars have regarded form criticism as misguided or to have run its course as a method for historical research. Nevertheless, the methods and results of form criticism are constantly being employed as a matter of course in studies about the words and deeds of Jesus. In spite of some challenges to it, there has been no “turning back the clock” to pre-form-critical work in assessing the historicity of traditions from and about Jesus.

The English term “form criticism” is adapted—not actually translated—from the term coined by the German-language pioneers of the method, namely, Formgeschichte. A literal translation of the word would be “form history” or “history of form.” Yet those terms provide only partial insight into actual form-critical work in modern times. When applied to the study of the gospels, it is more helpful to think of form criticism as a discipline that seeks to discern the history of the formation of traditions about Jesus in the pre-literary stages of gospel transmission.

The basic viewpoint of form criticism is that the traditions about Jesus, both narratives and teachings, circulated in oral form for decades prior to being written down. They were composed, preserved, and formed (shaped, given form) for practical needs in the life and mission of the early church. Those processes have left their marks on the traditions, affecting the ways that the traditions were told, and those ways can still be discerned in our reading of the gospels today. An awareness of those ways, in turn, has implications for the reconstruction of the actual (or “authentic”) sayings and deeds of Jesus.

1. The Origins of Form Criticism

Prior to its use in biblical studies, form criticism originated in—and was practiced first—in the study of folklore. In the field of biblical studies it was taken up and applied first in the study of the Old Testament.<sup>1</sup> It made its appearance most notably in the work of the German Old Testament scholar Hermann Gunkel (1862–1932) in his studies of Genesis and the Psalms. In the case of Genesis, he sought to inquire about the origins of its various stories in their pre-literary, oral settings. He classified the materials according to their forms (aetiological legends, ethnological legends, etymological legends, ceremonial legends, geographical legends, and mixed legends) and suggested that the various units were shaped, or given form, through their telling within various settings in the historical and social life of Israel.<sup>2</sup> In regard to the Psalms, he classified them into several types (hymns, community laments, songs of the individual, thank offering songs, laments of the individual, entrance liturgies, Torah songs, blessings, and royal psalms) and proposed that they arose in various liturgical and other contexts.<sup>3</sup> The work of Gunkel has been furthered by a good number of other Old Testament scholars, and its vitality and impact continue in the present.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> For a brief survey and bibliography, cf. John Barton, “Form Criticism (OT),” ABD 2:838–841.

<sup>2</sup> Hermann Gunkel, The Legends of Genesis: The Biblical Saga and History (New York: Schocken Books, 1964), 25–36. The German edition was Die Sagen der Genesis (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1901).

<sup>3</sup> Hermann Gunkel, The Psalms: A Form-Critical Introduction (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1967).

Form criticism soon became applied to the study of the synoptic gospels, beginning in the early part of the twentieth century. Once again the earliest form-critical works were produced by German scholars. The earliest influential volume was written by Martin Dibelius (1883–1947), published in 1919, and the second by Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976), published in 1921.<sup>5</sup> The major pioneer outside of Germany was the British scholar Vincent Taylor (1887–1968), whose influential book appeared in 1933.<sup>6</sup> Burton Scott Easton was an early interpreter of form criticism in the United States, whose work was published in 1928, and E. Basil Redlich was an interpreter in England by means of his book on form criticism in 1939.<sup>7</sup> Easton reviewed the works of Dibelius and Bultmann (Taylor's book had not yet been published), offered a critique of them, and presented some observations of his own. Redlich did the same but incorporated some of Taylor's work—then in published form for only a few years—into his survey.

2. Assumptions and Assertions of Form Criticism

By the time that form-critical investigations of the synoptic gospels arose in the first part of the twentieth century there were some commonly held views among New Testament scholars that formed the foundation upon which the form critics built (their assumptions). In carrying out their own work they held to and developed some additional views that they had to promote (their assertions).

---

This brief book was based on an article published in Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 2nd ed., ed. Hermann Gunkel, 6 vols. (Tübingen: Mohr, 1927–1932), 4:1609–1630.

<sup>4</sup> For an assessment and bibliography, see Rolf Knierim, "Criticism of Literary Features, Form, Tradition, and Redaction," in The Hebrew Bible and Its Modern Interpreters, ed. Douglas A. Knight and Gene M. Tucker (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985), 123–165.

<sup>5</sup> Martin Dibelius, Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums (Tübingen: Mohr, 1919), ET: From Tradition to Gospel (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1934); Rudolf Bultmann, Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition, FRLANT 29 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1921), ET: History of the Synoptic Tradition (New York: Harper and Row, 1963; 2nd ed., 1968). Hereafter these will be designated, respectively, as Tradition to Gospel and Synoptic Tradition (2nd ed. of the latter).

<sup>6</sup> Vincent Taylor, The Formation of the Gospel Tradition (London: Macmillan, 1933; 2nd ed., 1935).

<sup>7</sup> Burton Scott Easton, The Gospel before the Gospels (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1928); E. Basil Redlich, Form Criticism: Its Value and Limitations (London: Gerald Duckworth, 1939).

The assumptions commonly held by the form critics during the first decades of the twentieth century included the acceptance of (1) the two-source theory concerning the synoptic gospels as the best way to account for their similarities and differences; (2) the priority of the Gospel of Mark among the three; and (3) the view that all three gospels were written well into the last half of the first century AD, preceded by decades of oral transmission of the gospel tradition. In addition to these common assumptions, other points were assumed or had to be asserted, including the following.

1. The work of Karl L. Schmidt, a contemporary of Dibelius and Bultmann, confirmed what had been considered for some time already.<sup>8</sup> That is that the synoptic gospels contain traditions that have been put into a framework (made up of geographical settings and chronological links) designed by the first evangelist (Mark). The framework of Mark's gospel is due, in other words, to the redaction (editing work) of the first evangelist. It was he who ordered the material into its present sequence in his own gospel, and Matthew and Luke generally adopted that framework, supplementing it with additional materials and editorial work of their own. Two main points can be derived from this that have vital importance for form criticism. First, the gospel narrative of Mark is not necessarily based on "historical reporting" of when and where Jesus of Nazareth went in the conduct of his ministry; rather, the narrative was designed primarily by the evangelist. Second, a distinction can be made between "tradition" and "redaction" in the gospels.

2. The gospel tradition is made up of independent units. Each "pericope" (a small unit, such as a miracle story or parable) circulated independently in the oral period of transmission prior to the writing of the gospels.<sup>9</sup> These units were brief narratives about Jesus or compact teachings from him (or attributed to him at least). Although some pericopes may well have been gathered together in sequential arrangements, such as a primitive version of the passion narrative (reflected in Mark 14:1–15:47 and parallels), and perhaps a few other blocks of materials sharing similarities in form or content (such as the five conflict stories in Mark 2:1–3:6), most were not gathered together prior to the writing of the gospels. In general it can be said, from the form-critical point of view, that the evangelists were “only to the smallest extent authors,” for they were primarily “collectors” of traditions.<sup>10</sup>

---

<sup>8</sup> Karl L. Schmidt, Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu: Literarkritische Untersuchungen zur ältesten Jesusüberlieferung (Berlin: Trowitzsch, 1919; repr., Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1964). The book has not been published in English translation.

<sup>9</sup> M. Dibelius, Tradition to Gospel, 178; Rudolf Bultmann, "The Study of the Synoptic Gospels," in Form Criticism: Two Essays on New Testament Research, by Rudolf Bultmann and Karl Kundsinn (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1962), 25, 64; Taylor, Formation, 174–175.

3. The units of tradition were composed, shaped, and transmitted by teachers and preachers in the early church, not by historians or biographers of Jesus. Those who composed them did not do historical work as modern historians or biographers would do to verify the words and deeds of Jesus. A modern biographer would be interested in many questions that a reading of the gospels does not answer, such as how much schooling Jesus had, what religious training he had, how many languages he could speak or understand (Aramaic, Hebrew, Greek, etc.), and details of his relationship to his parents, siblings, and teachers. These and other equally simple questions intrigue the historian and biographer of modern times. But the persons who transmitted the words and deeds of Jesus, including the gospel writers, seem to have had no interest in them.

4. Every unit of tradition contained in the gospels came into being and continued to exist because of its usefulness in the early church’s life and teaching. They bear witness to the significance of Jesus in his own time and place, to be sure, but they also bear witness to his significance as the Christ for the early Christian communities of faith. The units of tradition were employed for teaching (catechesis), apologetics (defense of Christian belief and behavior), worship, and preaching.

5. Since one can observe the development of traditions about Jesus at a literary level, one can expect the same to have happened during the pre-literary stages of their transmission. For example, at Mark 8:27 Jesus is with his disciples at Caesarea Philippi, and he asks them, “Who do people say that I am?” But at Matt 16:13—presumably based on Mark’s account, but at a later time—the question of Jesus to his disciples is, “Who do people say that the Son of Man is?” The simple first person of Mark’s Gospel (“I”) has been altered by the use of a christological title (“Son of Man”) in the Gospel of Matthew. Another example is within the account of the Stilling of the Storm (Mark 4:35–41//Matt 8:23–27). Jesus is asleep, and the disciples come to wake him. In Mark’s Gospel they say to him, “Teacher, do you not care that we are perishing?” (4:38). But apparently for the evangelist Matthew, one does not address Jesus with such a pedestrian title (“teacher”). The disciples awaken Jesus with the words, "Lord, save us! We are perishing!" (Matt 8:25). Jesus is the Lord, and he can save. And so a reverential approach is made, and a christological title ("Lord") is used. Many other examples of the growth of traditions can be shown at a literary level. One should expect the same at the pre-literary level where, presumably, there would have been fewer "controls" on what was being transmitted.

---

<sup>10</sup> Dibelius, Tradition to Gospel, 3.

6. Each pericope, as a unit composed for the life and mission of the church, portrays Jesus then not simply as the Jesus of history, but also as the Christ of faith. The event of Easter colors everything. The terms "Jesus of history" and "Christ of faith" are modern and would have had little or no meaning to first-century Christians. But that is precisely the point. Christians of the first century melded the two together. To be sure, the gospel traditions contain historical information—a lot of information—about Jesus, but the interests and efforts of the composers and transmitters are not given to retrieval for its own sake. The gospel traditions are already at the pre-literary level "kerygmatic," and they remain so in the written gospels as well. Calling the traditions "kerygmatic" (derived from the Greek word kerygma, "proclamation") means that they are proclamatory; they proclaim the Christ of faith. Without being pejorative, form critics have therefore spoken of the aim of the traditions within the gospels as "propaganda."<sup>11</sup>

7. The gospel tradition is made up of both "authentic" material which can be recovered and material that can be designated "secondary." The latter is due to "church composition," "community formulation," or "redaction." By "authentic" tradition is meant that which can most likely be attributed to Jesus himself (as in a teaching) or to those who observed him (as in reports of his deeds). Various criteria have been worked out to test whether a given unit is authentic or not.

3. The Work of Form Criticism of the Gospels

There are three operations typically taken in form-critical work: (1) classification of a unit of tradition according to form; (2) assignment of that unit to a Sitz im Leben (literally, "setting in life," but expressed better in English as "life situation," the creative milieu in which it came to be; the plural form of the German term is Sitze im Leben); and

<sup>11</sup> Dibelius, Tradition to Gospel, 15, 37–38, 288; Bultmann, Synoptic Tradition, 368.

(3) assessment of its historical value. In a precise sense, form criticism can (and some say should) be carried on without the third operation listed. The assessing of the historical value of a unit can more properly be called “tradition criticism” (German: Traditionsgeschichte). In spite of that, however, form-critical work has included historical assessment from its very beginning.

3.1. The Forms of the Gospel Tradition and Their Pre-Literary Settings

Two points need to be made at the outset of the following discussion. First, for the sake of efficiency in presentation, and to avoid repetition, it is helpful to combine the first two operations (classification and assignment to Sitz im Leben) into a single discussion. They are actually interdependent in form-critical work, since it is assumed that the specific use to which a unit was put (the Sitz im Leben, such as preaching, apologetics, etc.) determined its form.

Second, a discussion of the forms and their various Sitze im Leben can become complicated, since the major form critics in the beginning of the twentieth century organized their materials differently and used different terminology. What follows is an attempt to make a general, comprehensive presentation with only a minimum amount of differentiation. Since the work of Bultmann is the most comprehensive and systematic, his outline will be followed, and his terms will be used as headings, and those of Dibelius and Taylor will be incorporated. For more detailed discussion, one has to examine the works themselves.

The materials in the gospels can be divided into two broad categories: sayings and narratives. The “forms” exist within each of those larger categories. Within the larger category of sayings are the following forms:

1. Apophthegms (German: Apophthegmen). The term “apophthegm,” used by Bultmann, is obscure, but it is used rather broadly in literary criticism to refer to a terse, pointed saying. Regarding material under this form, Dibelius used the term “paradigms” (German: Paradigmen), and Taylor used the term “pronouncement stories.” Bultmann divided the “apophthegms” into three smaller categories: controversy dialogues, scholastic dialogues, and biographical apophthegms. The most formal of these are the “controversy dialogues,” sometimes called “conflict stories” (for they are stories, not simply dialogues). Typically these stories have a three-part structure: (1) a narrative, in which it is obvious that a clash (a controversy or conflict) is coming; (2) a question or verbal attack by an opponent (or opponents) of Jesus; and (3) a dominical (= from the Lord) saying. There are five conflict stories gathered in Mark 2:1–3:6. Using one of the shortest as an illustration, the three parts can be seen in Mark 2:18–20: “[Introductory Narrative:] Now John’s disciples and the Pharisees were fasting; and people came and said to him, [Opponents’ Question:] ‘Why do John’s disciples and the disciples of the Pharisees fast, but your disciples do not fast?’ [Dominical Saying:] Jesus said to them, ‘The wedding guests cannot fast while the bridegroom is with them, can they? As long as they have the bridegroom with them, they cannot fast. The days will come when the bridegroom is taken away from them, and then they will fast on that day.’”

According to Bultmann, these units had their formal origins (Sitz im Leben) “in the discussions the Church had with its opponents, and as certainly within itself, on questions of law.”<sup>12</sup> Scholastic dialogues are those in which questions are asked of Jesus by his disciples or others (e.g., the Question from John concerning Jesus, Matt 11:2–6//Luke 7:18–23), and their origins would have been primarily in teaching, dealing with some question of interest.<sup>13</sup> The biographical apophthegms (e.g., Jesus Blessing the Children, Mark 10:13–16//Matt 19:13–15//Luke 18:15–17) arose primarily in preaching for the sake of edification, presenting Jesus as a living contemporary and thereby comforting and admonishing the church.<sup>14</sup> Dibelius, writing earlier than Bultmann, did not make a three-fold distinction among the paradigms. According to him, the gospel tradition as a whole was composed and conveyed in early Christian preaching,<sup>15</sup> and that was certainly true in the case of paradigms, which served as illustrative material for sermons.<sup>16</sup> Taylor used the term pronouncement story because in the units under discussion “everything leads up to the final word of Jesus, which for the early Christians must have had the force of a pronouncement” that had a “bearing on some aspect of life, belief, or conduct.”<sup>17</sup> Concerning their life setting in the early church prior to being written down, Taylor’s verdict was that those would have been apologetics and preaching.<sup>18</sup>

2. Parables. In the manner of others before him in German scholarship, Bultmann subdivided the parables of Jesus into three subgroups.

<sup>12</sup> Bultmann, Synoptic Tradition, 41.

<sup>13</sup> Ibid., 55.

<sup>14</sup> Ibid., 61.

<sup>15</sup> Dibelius, Tradition to Gospel, 14, 61.

<sup>16</sup> Ibid., 43, 61–62, 69, 131.

<sup>17</sup> Taylor, Formation, 65, 30.

<sup>18</sup> Ibid., 62, 170.

Those three are “similitudes” (German: Gleichnisse), which consist of a brief comparison introduced by “is like” (or something similar) and lacking narrative (e.g., The Leaven [Matt 13:33//Luke 13:20–21]); “parables” (German: Parabeln), which include a narrative (e.g., The Two Sons [Matt 21:28–32] and The Unjust Judge [Luke 18:2–8]); and “exemplary stories” (German: Beispiel Erzählungen), which provide examples for human conduct (The Good Samaritan [Luke 10:29–37], The Rich Fool [12:16–21], The Rich Man and Lazarus [16:19–31], and The Pharisee and the Tax Collector [18:9–14]). For Bultmann, many of the parables can be attributed to Jesus, but most have been reworked by preachers and teachers interested in interpreting (including allegorical interpretation) and applying them to live issues in the early church.<sup>19</sup> Dibelius treats the parables under the larger category of “exhortations” within the New Testament, asserting that they were used in hortatory preaching (broadly conceived to include comfort as well as demand).<sup>20</sup> Taylor treats the parables along with other sayings of Jesus, and contends that they were used (as with Jesus himself) to provoke “deeper thought on the problems of life and of faith” in preaching and teaching.<sup>21</sup>

3. Sayings of Jesus. In addition to the parables, there are sayings of various kinds that are more difficult to classify. The most precise system of classification is that, once again, of Bultmann. He classifies the remaining sayings of Jesus into four groups. These are (1) wisdom sayings, which are much like proverbs (e.g., Matt 6:27: “And which of you by being anxious can add one cubit to his span of life?”), (2) prophetic and apocalyptic sayings (e.g., the Beatitudes, Matt 5:3–11//Luke 6:20–23), (3) legal sayings (e.g., Mark 11:25: “Whenever you stand praying, forgive, if you have anything against anyone; so that your Father in heaven may also forgive you your trespasses”), and (4) “I” sayings, in which Jesus speaks of his own ministry (e.g., Matt 5:17: “Think not that I have come to abolish the law and the prophets; I have come not to abolish them but to fulfill them”). The uses to which the early church put such sayings varied a great deal, but in general they were put to use in instruction, and in the case of the legal sayings to establish guidance (even rules) in the early church.<sup>22</sup> Dibelius concludes that the sayings of Jesus were “originally gathered together for a hortatory end, to give

<sup>19</sup> Bultmann, “Study of the Synoptic Gospels,” 48.

<sup>20</sup> Dibelius, Tradition to Gospel, 249–259.

<sup>21</sup> Taylor, Formation, 102.

<sup>22</sup> Bultmann, Synoptic Tradition, 145, 149.

the Churches advice, help, and commandment by means of the Master's words."<sup>23</sup> Taylor holds that the sayings, for the most part, are based on reminiscences of the teachings of Jesus in communities "ready to be taught" (presumably a catechetical interest).<sup>24</sup>

In addition to sayings material in the gospels, there is an abundance of narrative material. Within that larger category are the following "forms."

1. Miracle Stories. The term "miracle stories" is used by Bultmann (German: Wundergeschichten) and Taylor. Dibelius uses another, and that is "tales" (German: Novellen). Typically the miracle stories have a three part structure: (1) a setting, in which there is a description of an illness or other kind of problem; (2) a cure or resolution of the problem at hand by a saying, gesture, or both by Jesus; and (3) a demonstration that the miracle has taken place.<sup>25</sup> A very brief example of a three-part miracle story is provided in Mark 1:30–31: "[Setting:] Now Simon's mother-in-law was in bed with a fever, and they told him about her at once. [Cure:] He came and took her by the hand and lifted her up. [Demonstration of the Cure:] Then the fever left her, and she began to serve them." Other brief examples can be observed at Mark 7:32–35 and 8:22–25. Bultmann classified miracles into four smaller categories: exorcisms, healings, raisings from the dead, and nature miracles. According to him, the miracle stories were employed to make claims concerning the messianic authority and divine power of Jesus.<sup>26</sup> For Dibelius they arose in story-telling, were told for "pleasure in narration," "to give early Christian miracle-workers examples and leading" for their own activities, and to demonstrate the preeminence of Jesus over all rival gods.<sup>27</sup> For Taylor they are more decidedly christological; they were told to illustrate the power and compassion of Jesus.<sup>28</sup>

2. Legends. Both Dibelius and Bultmann used this term (German: Legende), but Taylor chose to call the material simply "stories about Jesus" since, he says, the term "legend" tends to place a negative judgment on the materials in regard to their historicity.<sup>29</sup> Among the legends

<sup>23</sup> Dibelius, Tradition to Gospel, 246.

<sup>24</sup> Taylor, Formation, 93.

<sup>25</sup> Bultmann, "Study of the Synoptic Gospels," 37–39.

<sup>26</sup> Bultmann, Synoptic Tradition, 219, 226.

<sup>27</sup> Dibelius, Tradition to Gospel, 102, 196.

<sup>28</sup> Taylor, Formation, 133.

<sup>29</sup> Ibid., 32.

or stories about Jesus are the Infancy Narratives (Matt 1–2; Luke 1:5–2:52), the Baptism of Jesus (Mark 1:9–11//Matt 3:13–17//Luke 3:21–22), the Boy Jesus in the Temple (Luke 2:41–49), the Temptation (Mark 1:12–13//Matt 4:1–11//Luke 4:11–13), Peter’s Confession (Mark 8:27–30//Matt 16:13–20//Luke 9:18–21), the Transfiguration (Mark 9:2–8//Matt 17:1–8//Luke 9:28–36), the Triumphal Entry (Mark 11:1–10//Matt 21:1–9//Luke 19:28–38), the Last Supper (Mark 14:22–25//Matt 26:26–29//Luke 22:19–20), and the Resurrection Narratives (Mark 16:1–8//Matt 28:1–20//Luke 24:1–53). Bultmann speaks of their purpose in the early church as primarily “religious and edifying”<sup>30</sup> within the context of worship.<sup>31</sup> Dibelius and Taylor also concluded that worship was the setting in which the legends or stories flourished.<sup>32</sup>

Dibelius sets aside three of these narratives and gives them a name of their own, viz. “mythological narratives.” These are the Baptism of Jesus, the Temptation of Jesus, and the Transfiguration. His reason for doing so is that those stories include some action of God on the scene.<sup>33</sup> By using the term, however, he does not mean to undercut a historical basis for them.

3. Passion Narratives. Each of the four gospels has a passion narrative (Mark 14:1–15:47 //Matt 26:1–27:66 //Luke 22:1–23:56 //John 18:1–19:42), recalling the last days of Jesus’ ministry, suffering, and death. The form-critical judgment of Dibelius, Bultmann, and Taylor was that a primitive passion narrative existed prior to the writing of the gospels,<sup>34</sup> a view which has been supported by some scholars subsequently,<sup>35</sup> but challenged by others.<sup>36</sup> The Sitz im Leben of the passion narratives has been discussed widely. The pioneers of form criticism

<sup>30</sup> Bultmann, Synoptic Tradition, 244.

<sup>31</sup> Bultmann, “Study of the Synoptic Gospels,” 66–69.

<sup>32</sup> Dibelius, Tradition to Gospel, 132; Taylor, Formation, 145.

<sup>33</sup> Dibelius, Tradition to Gospel, 266, 271.

<sup>34</sup> Ibid., 23, 218; Bultmann, Synoptic Tradition, 279–280; Taylor, Formation, 44–45, 170 (but soon there were three versions, pp. 54–55).

<sup>35</sup> Raymond E. Brown, The Death of the Messiah, 2 vols., ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1994), 1:53–57, maintains that there was at least a “passion sequence” that could be preached prior to the writing of the gospels. For a survey, ending with support for a pre-Markan passion narrative (2:1523), cf. Appendix IX to Brown’s two-volume work by Marion L. Soards, “The Question of a Pre-Markan Passion Narrative,” 2:1492–1524.

<sup>36</sup> John R. Donahue, Are You the Christ? The Trial Narrative in the Gospel of Mark, SBLDS 10 (Missoula, MT: Society of Biblical Literature, 1973); Donald Senior, The Passion of Jesus in the Gospel of Mark (Baltimore: Michael Glazier, 1984); Frank J. Matera, Passion Narratives and Gospel Theologies (New York: Paulist, 1986); cf. also the essays in Werner H. Kelber, ed., The Passion in Mark (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976).

have suggested preaching,<sup>37</sup> apologetics,<sup>38</sup> and worship<sup>39</sup>—with some overlap between these.

3.2. The Historical Value of the Traditions about Jesus

As indicated already, the question of the historicity (often called “authenticity” or “genuineness”) of the units of gospel tradition falls, strictly speaking, to “tradition history.” Nevertheless, it was the pioneers of form criticism who articulated some basic criteria that have been commonly used in research on Jesus ever since, and the early form critics also made historical judgments in their various works.

To begin with, Dibelius articulated only one criterion. He was confident that early Christian preaching preserved the traditions about Jesus, and he said that that yields “a criterion of historicity; the nearer a narrative stands to the sermon the less is it questionable, or likely to have been changed by romantic, legendary, or literary influences.”<sup>40</sup> The confidence that Dibelius had in early Christian preaching as a medium by which the traditions were well preserved is reflected in the often-made remark about his view: “Am Anfang war die Predigt” (“In the beginning was the sermon”).<sup>41</sup> The way he expresses it, his criterion had to do with “narrative” material, but in fact he generalized from that to consider much of the “sayings” materials—since they were gathered for “hortatory” purposes—to have a high degree of authenticity as well.<sup>42</sup>

Bultmann produced a more rigorous criterion that has been used widely for the study of the sayings tradition of Jesus ever since. It has been known most often as “the criterion of dissimilarity” but also by a variety of other names (e.g., the criterion of “distinctiveness,” “discontinuity,” “double dissimilarity,” and “dual irreducibility”): “We can only count on possessing a genuine similitude of Jesus where, on the one hand, expression is given to the contrast between Jewish morality and piety and the distinctive eschatological temper which characterized the preaching of Jesus; and where on the other hand we find no specifically

<sup>37</sup> Dibelius, Tradition to Gospel, 178–179; Taylor, Formation, 170.

<sup>38</sup> Bultmann, “Study of the Synoptic Gospels,” 66; Taylor, Formation, 62.

<sup>39</sup> Georg Bertram, Die Leidensgeschichte Jesu und der Christuskult, FRLANT 32 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1922); Bultmann, “Study of the Synoptic Gospels,” 65–66.

<sup>40</sup> Dibelius, Tradition to Gospel, 61.

<sup>41</sup> Erich Fascher, Die formgeschichtliche Methode: Eine Darstellung und Kritik, BZNW 2 (Giessen: A. Töpelmann, 1924), 54.

<sup>42</sup> Dibelius, Tradition to Gospel, 246.

Christian features.”<sup>43</sup> Put more simply, the criterion can be expressed this way: if a saying is dissimilar to conventional Jewish teaching and dissimilar to typical Christian teaching, it can be considered authentic. In actual practice the criterion has often been used in a negative way to rule out materials, so that if anything does not pass the criterion, it must not be considered authentic. But that does not necessarily follow. Much that does not pass the criterion could be authentic. For example, the command to love one’s neighbor as oneself is attributed to Jesus (Mark 12:31//Matt 22:39; Luke 10:27), but since it is based on an Old Testament text (Lev 19:18), it is a traditional Jewish teaching; furthermore, it is a common early Christian teaching as well (Rom 13:9; Gal 5:14; Jas 2:8). But that does not mean that Jesus would never have uttered the command. The point of the criterion, as articulated by Bultmann and others who use it as a positive criterion, is that those sayings attributed to Jesus that stand out as distinctive can be considered authentic with a high degree of confidence, offering a collection by which to measure other things. But other sayings may well be authentic on other grounds.

Since the work of the pioneers in form criticism, other criteria for authenticity have been proposed and employed, of which the most well-known are the criteria of (1) linguistic and environmental tests, (2) coherence (or consistency), and (3) multiple-attestation (or cross-section method).<sup>44</sup> Discussion of these criteria (and others) need not be entered into here, since it is carried on in another chapter. But it should be said that the criteria spelled out here have been contested, and alternative approaches to evaluate the tradition have been proposed. The most important question to be raised is whether it is possible to analyze the oral tradition behind the written materials of the gospels at all, since there may be a discontinuity in the presentation of a tradition in its oral and written forms.<sup>45</sup>

The historical yield derived from the gospel tradition varies according to the form critics. Within the overall purview of the work of Dibelius, the paradigms and portions of the passion narrative are the most reliable historical materials. He considered many of the paradigms to have

---

<sup>43</sup> Bultmann, Synoptic Tradition, 205.

<sup>44</sup> For a comprehensive discussion of these and other criteria, cf. Stanley E. Porter, The Criteria for Authenticity in Historical-Jesus Research: Previous Discussion and New Proposals, JSNTSup 191 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000).

<sup>45</sup> Among other things, this is a point made by Erhardt Güttgemanns, Candid Questions Concerning Gospel Form Criticism, PTMS 26 (Pittsburgh: Pickwick, 1979); cf. also Werner H. Kelber, The Oral and Written Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983), 8.

been composed by eyewitnesses who could control and correct them as they were told and transmitted,<sup>46</sup> and although some units of the passion narrative have been constructed (some, for example, from Old Testament materials) and are therefore secondary, the basic story has a basis in eyewitness testimony.<sup>47</sup> The tales (miracle stories), he says, have less historical value than the paradigms,<sup>48</sup> and the legends have hardly any.<sup>49</sup>

Bultmann, in a relentless quest to seek whether the units of tradition have a historical basis to them, going item by item, finds a very mixed picture, which makes generalizations about his work nearly impossible. Two different sayings, for example, may have the same form (such as “prophetic saying”), but he might consider one to be authentic but not the other. Within the sayings tradition, Bultmann concludes that many of the controversy dialogues may well contain authentic sayings of Jesus, even if their narrative frameworks have been created artificially.<sup>50</sup> Other forms of sayings material that have a high degree of historical value are the parables, prophetic and apocalyptic sayings, some of the “I” sayings, and sayings concerning the law.<sup>51</sup> The saying that can be considered to have “the highest degree of authenticity which we can make for any saying of Jesus,” he says, is Luke 11:20 (“But if it is by the finger of God that I cast out the demons, then the kingdom of God has come to you”), which is an “I” saying, and the reason he gives is that “it is full of that feeling of eschatological power which must have characterized the activity of Jesus.”<sup>52</sup> Sayings that are ruled out include many of the biographical apophthegms, wisdom sayings, and the passion predictions.<sup>53</sup> Concerning the narrative material, Bultmann says that there might be a historical basis for some of the healings,<sup>54</sup> but he regards many miracle stories to have been created in the Hellenistic (Greek-speaking) church,<sup>55</sup> which rules out their origins among the (Aramaic-speaking) witnesses of Jesus’ ministry. The legends, he says,

---

<sup>46</sup> Dibelius, Tradition to Gospel, 59–62.

<sup>47</sup> Ibid., 204–205.

<sup>48</sup> Ibid., 102–103.

<sup>49</sup> Ibid., 108–109.

<sup>50</sup> Bultmann, “Study of the Synoptic Gospels,” 41–44.

<sup>51</sup> Bultmann, “Study of the Synoptic Gospels,” 48, 56, 58; idem, Synoptic Tradition, 150–163.

<sup>52</sup> Ibid., 162.

<sup>53</sup> Bultmann, “Study of the Synoptic Gospels,” 45, 55, 59.

<sup>54</sup> Bultmann, Synoptic Tradition, 228.

<sup>55</sup> Ibid., 240.

“instead of being historical in character are religious and edifying.”<sup>56</sup> The passion narrative in its primitive form “would have told very briefly of the arrest, the condemnation by the Sanhedrin and Pilate, the journey to the cross, the crucifixion and death.”<sup>57</sup> But in terms of the historicity of the narrative, Bultmann has written as follows:

As [Jesus] came up to Jerusalem with his followers his arrival was viewed by the procurator [Pilate] as politically dangerous. Whatever part the Jewish authorities took therein cannot now be made out, since the Passion Narrative is too thickly overgrown with legend.<sup>58</sup>

Taylor concludes that there is a historical basis for most of the materials in the gospels. He does not spell out any formal criteria in his book on form criticism but simply asserts a good deal of confidence in the process of transmission of the traditions from and about Jesus. The pronouncement stories, he says, ought to be esteemed “among the strongest and most stable elements in the Gospel tradition.”<sup>59</sup> Concerning the sayings and parables, he says that “what Jesus said was remembered,”<sup>60</sup> and “I have no hesitation in claiming that the tradition of the words of Jesus is far better preserved than we have any right to expect, and with much greater accuracy than is to be found in the record of the words of any great teacher of the past.”<sup>61</sup> In regard to the stories about Jesus, Taylor considers some to have “historical realism” and in general, he says, one can have “confidence in their historical value.”<sup>62</sup> The passion narrative has a “historical nucleus” consisting of a “primitive sketch” of the arrest, condemnation, crucifixion, and death of Jesus,<sup>63</sup> and it was shaped “by eyewitnesses and others who had knowledge of the original facts,” and repetition at worship “gave relative fixity to the Story, and yet not such a fixity as to leave no room for additions.”<sup>64</sup> Many of the healing miracles should be accepted as having a historical basis to them, but regarding the nature miracles, Taylor says, “we should at once explain them as legends, and look for natural events which have been given a miraculous interpretation.”<sup>65</sup>

---

<sup>56</sup> Bultmann, Synoptic Tradition, 244.

<sup>57</sup> Ibid., 279.

<sup>58</sup> Bultmann, “Study of the Synoptic Gospels,” 72.

<sup>59</sup> Taylor, Formation, 87.

<sup>60</sup> Ibid., 88.

<sup>61</sup> Ibid., 113.

<sup>62</sup> Ibid., 148, 166.

<sup>63</sup> Ibid., 58–59.

<sup>64</sup> Ibid., 170.

<sup>65</sup> Ibid., 135.

4. Specialized Form-Critical Works

Form-critical work has been carried on by a number of scholars in addition to the major scholars of the early period, whose works had covered both sayings and narrative traditions. The other studies have tended to be more specialized. Already at the time of Dibelius and Bultmann, Martin Albertz wrote an important book on the conflict stories (German: Streitgespräche) in the synoptic gospels, published in 1921,<sup>66</sup> which was a form not dealt with subsequently in a comprehensive way until the work of Arland J. Hultgren published fifty years later.<sup>67</sup> The passion narrative was analyzed form-critically by Georg Bertram, whose book was published in 1922.<sup>68</sup> The same block of material has been the subject of study by others, particularly by Raymond E. Brown, whose study published in 1994 deals with form-critical and other questions (such as questions of historicity and redaction by the evangelists).<sup>69</sup> The miracle stories have received form-critical analysis and attention by Reginald H. Fuller in his book of 1963.<sup>70</sup> The well-known and widely used book on the parables of Jesus by Joachim Jeremias, published in Germany in 1947 and in English translation for the first time in 1954,<sup>71</sup> presupposed the form-critical view of the gospel tradition, requiring an extensive discussion of criteria for judging the authenticity of the parables, or parts of them.<sup>72</sup> Form-critical work continues in the work of the Jesus Seminar, which has produced volumes on the sayings traditions and the narrative traditions of Jesus, published in 1993 and 1998, respectively.<sup>73</sup>

As these and other works have been published through the years, the form-critical categories of the early period have been considered

<sup>66</sup> Martin Albertz, Die synoptischen Streitgespräche: Ein Beitrag zur Formgeschichte des Urchristentums (Berlin: Trowitzsch, 1921).

<sup>67</sup> Arland J. Hultgren, Jesus and His Adversaries: The Form and Function of the Conflict Stories in the Synoptic Tradition (Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1979).

<sup>68</sup> Bertram, Der Leidensgeschichte Jesu und der Christuskult.

<sup>69</sup> Brown, The Death of the Messiah.

<sup>70</sup> Reginald H. Fuller, Interpreting the Miracles (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1963).

<sup>71</sup> Joachim Jeremias, Die Gleichnisse Jesu, ATANT 11 (Zurich: Zwingli Verlag, 1947); but published in subsequent, revised editions; ET: The Parables of Jesus (London: SCM, 1954); but also published in subsequent, revised editions.

<sup>72</sup> J. Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus, 2nd ed. (Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1972), 23–114.

<sup>73</sup> Robert W. Funk and Roy W. Hoover, eds., The Five Gospels: The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus (New York: Macmillan, 1993); Robert W. Funk, ed., The Acts of Jesus: The Search for the Authentic Deeds of Jesus (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1998).

insufficient. The range of forms has been enlarged to include aphorisms,<sup>74</sup> call and commissioning stories,<sup>75</sup> sentences of holy law,<sup>76</sup> and more.<sup>77</sup>

5. Form Criticism and Jesus Research

The form-critical movement has had a profound effect upon Jesus research ever since its rise early in the twentieth century. How that is so can be discussed here under two parts: first, a listing of some implications to be drawn from form-critical work that are now commonly accepted; and, second, a brief review of how these appear in some major works concerning the historical Jesus.

5.1. Some Implications for Research

1. The End of the “Old Quest.” The original “Quest of the Historical Jesus,” which had its beginnings with Hermann S. Reimarus (1694–1768), had actually come to an end by the time that Dibelius and Bultmann wrote their form-critical works. The book by Albert Schweitzer (1875–1965), Von Reimarus zu Wrede, published in German in 1906 (subsequently in English translation in 1910 under the title The Quest of the Historical Jesus), marked the end of that quest.<sup>78</sup> One can hardly say therefore that form criticism caused the end of the old quest. Nevertheless, it greatly aided the view that no one can write an orderly and connected account of Jesus’ career and development as a personality as the “old questers” sought to do. Additional “quests” have come on the scene since the demise of the “old quest,” but none has been carried on with the assumptions of the old one concerning the gospels and their sources.

---

<sup>74</sup> Howard C. Kee, Jesus in History: An Approach to the Study of the Gospels, 2nd ed. (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1977), 302; John D. Crossan, In Fragments: The Aphorisms of Jesus (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1983).

<sup>75</sup> Funk, The Acts of Jesus, 15.

<sup>76</sup> Ernst Käsemann, “Sentences of Holy Law in the New Testament,” in his New Testament Questions of Today (London: SCM, 1969), 66–81. Although most of these are in books other than the gospels, examples within the gospels cited by Käsemann include Mark 4:24; 8:38; Matt 5:19; 10:32–33.

<sup>77</sup> A comprehensive listing of forms throughout the New Testament is provided by Klaus Berger, Formgeschichte des Neuen Testaments (Heidelberg: Quelle & Meyer, 1984).

<sup>78</sup> Albert Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of Its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede (London: A. & C. Black, 1910; repr., Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2001).

2. The Gospel Tradition behind the Sources. Until the rise of form criticism, scholarly work on the question of what lay behind the gospels was devoted largely to "source criticism." It was assumed that the "sources" behind the gospels were the earliest and most reliable records that can be obtained. But after the rise of form criticism, there was a realization that investigations concerning the historical Jesus must penetrate further, going back even beyond the written sources. One could no longer, for example, take the Gospel of Mark as a source for producing an outline of Jesus' ministry, since that gospel was itself a collection of traditions that had circulated independently prior to Mark's composition of his gospel.

3. The Gospels as Kerygmatic Witnesses. The form-critical approach to the gospels emphasized that the gospels, and the traditions they convey, are kerygmatic. That is, they do not simply convey history concerning a person of the first century, but speak of him in light of the Easter gospel. While there is, to be sure, historical information within the traditions, the traditions have been so colored by those who transmitted them that Jesus is portrayed even in his earthly ministry as the Christ of Christian faith, which knows the outcome of his passion, death, and resurrection and affirms his present reign. This means that any research into the historical Jesus must be conscious of the kerygmatic nature of the gospels.

4. Words and Deeds. In light of the form-critical approach, in which it is assumed and asserted that the traditions of Jesus circulated independently of one another prior to being written down, one can no longer compose a biography of Jesus or even sketch out an account of "the life and teachings of Jesus." To do so presupposes the ability to figure out a chronology and to fit the teachings of Jesus within it. That is now seen to be impossible. The most one can do is compose accounts of "the words and deeds of Jesus" within some broad framework that begins with his baptism by John and ends with his crucifixion.

5. The Burden of Proof. The traditional view through most centuries has been that the gospels convey reliable information about the teachings, miracles, passion, death, and resurrection of Jesus. If one is to contest any part of the gospels, reasons would have to be given for doing so. But with the rise of form criticism all that has changed. In principle, the burden of proof now rests on anyone who claims historicity for any part of the gospel tradition.<sup>79</sup>

---

<sup>79</sup> Cf. the comment of Norman Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (New York:

6. The Need for Criteria of Authenticity. Both Dibelius and Bultmann articulated criteria by which to test whether a unit of gospel tradition can be considered authentic. Although form criticism can be carried on without that, it has nevertheless posed the question of criteria to anyone who does research on Jesus. Since the tradition was in oral form prior to its being written down, and since it was shaped and supplemented by preachers and teachers in the oral period of its development, the person who seeks to give an account of the words and deeds of Jesus must make some decisions concerning authenticity. Form criticism has thus not only proposed criteria for authenticity, such as the criterion of dissimilarity; it has made it necessary for the researcher to discuss the criteria being used in the historical project being carried out.

5.2. Form Criticism and Some Major Works

Many books have been written that presuppose and employ form-critical work, often adding additional criteria for historicity to those already mentioned. What follows is not an exhaustive survey, but a brief review of some of the more important books that have been produced that employ form criticism in an explicit way, following the chronological order in which they were published.

Among the first to write books on Jesus after the rise of form criticism were Bultmann and Dibelius themselves. Bultmann produced a book entitled Jesus that was published in German in 1926 (English version: Jesus and the Word, 1934), and says in his introductory discussion of “view-point and method” that what he has to say on critical matters can be found in his History of the Synoptic Tradition.<sup>80</sup> Basically, he says, the subject of his book is “not the life or the personality of Jesus, but only his teaching, his message.”<sup>81</sup> Consequently Bultmann gives no attention to the narrative material. Dibelius wrote a book called Jesus in both its German (1939) and English (1940) versions.<sup>82</sup> He devotes a chapter to “Sources” and within that larger discussion summarizes

---

Harper & Row, 1967), 39: “The nature of the synoptic tradition is such that the burden of proof will be upon the claim to authenticity.” For a similar viewpoint, cf. also E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985), 13.

<sup>80</sup> Rudolf Bultmann, Jesus and the Word (New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1934), 14. The German edition was Jesus (Berlin: Deutsche Bibliothek, 1926).

<sup>81</sup> Bultmann, Jesus and the Word, 12.

<sup>82</sup> Martin Dibelius, Jesus (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1949), 23–35. The German version was Jesus (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1939). Subsequent references are to the English version.

his earlier form-critical work, but he adds that a “biography” of Jesus is impossible, for “all we know is individual incidents.”<sup>83</sup> Of particular interest, however, is his statement: “It is proper to speak of non-genuine sayings only where the later circumstances, conditions, or problems of the already existing Church are clearly presupposed.”<sup>84</sup> That is to make a negative use of one part (the second part) of the “criterion of dissimilarity” (or “double dissimilarity”) mentioned above. Dibelius continues to assert the essential trustworthiness of the passion narrative and, unlike Bultmann, deals with narrative—the narrative of the passion in particular<sup>85</sup>—in addition to sayings traditions.

After the end of the “old quest” of the historical Jesus, and due in large part to the impact of form criticism, there was a time in which there was an eclipse in Jesus research. To be sure, there were several studies of Jesus by scholars whose works did not deal with the implications of form criticism,<sup>86</sup> although that was not true of all.<sup>87</sup> In any case, a new impulse came in 1953 with a challenging lecture, subsequently published, by Ernst Käsemann that is generally credited with initiating a “new quest” for the historical Jesus. Käsemann maintained that, even though a “life of Jesus” cannot be produced, Christian faith requires continuity between itself and the historical Jesus; the alternative is docetism.<sup>88</sup> The first major book of note in the new era was that of Günther Bornkamm, Jesus von Nazareth (1956; English version: Jesus of Nazareth, 1960). In many ways this was the most important book on Jesus produced in the second half of the twentieth century. According to Bornkamm, form criticism has taught the modern investigator “to look for the connection between the entire Jesus tradition and the faith and life of the Church, out of which that tradition arose and for which it was meant.”<sup>89</sup> The investigation would, of course, separate that which is authentic from that which is not; but that is possible, since

<sup>83</sup> Dibelius, Jesus, 29.

<sup>84</sup> Ibid., 26.

<sup>85</sup> Ibid., 33–34, 131–138.

<sup>86</sup> Among those that can be cited are Shirley Jackson Case, Jesus: A New Biography (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1927); and Edgar J. Goodspeed, A Life of Jesus (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1950; repr., Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1979).

<sup>87</sup> Especially important are the works of William Manson, Jesus the Messiah (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1946); and Maurice Goguel, The Life of Jesus (New York: Macmillan, 1949); the French version was much earlier, La vie de Jésus (Paris: Payot, 1932).

<sup>88</sup> Ernst Käsemann, “The Problem of the Historical Jesus,” in his Essays on New Testament Themes, SBT 41 (Naperville, IL: Alec R. Allenson, 1964), 15–47.

<sup>89</sup> Günther Bornkamm, Jesus of Nazareth (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1960), 20. The German version was Jesus von Nazareth (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1956).

the tradition “is itself very considerably concerned with the pre-Easter history of Jesus.”<sup>90</sup> Bornkamm discusses the teachings of Jesus in detail, particularly the kingdom of God and themes related to it. He gives scant attention to the miracles of Jesus, except to grant that Jesus performed healings.<sup>91</sup> He rules out a “messianic consciousness” and the possibility that Jesus made use of or accepted any messianic titles, since these are regarded by him as post-Easter.<sup>92</sup> He devotes an entire chapter to the passion narrative, analyzing it section by section concerning its history and theology, and has a section on the resurrection narratives. The resurrection narratives, he says, seek to give “empirical expression” to the Easter event.<sup>93</sup> The Easter message was prior to the stories, so one can hardly gain knowledge of what actually happened on the basis of the stories themselves.

Shortly after the publication of Bornkamm’s book on Jesus, two shorter compositions appeared which have also been widely influential and which make use of the methods and results of form criticism. One was an encyclopedia article written by Hans Conzelmann, published in 1959, which appeared in English translation in 1973 as a slim volume called Jesus. Conzelmann deals briefly with the matter of authenticity. According to him, the “core” of the passion narrative and the “core” of the parables can be considered reliable, and he places confidence in the “criterion of dissimilarity.”<sup>94</sup> The other study was by Reginald H. Fuller in a section of his introduction to the New Testament that was published in 1966. After discussing form criticism—including its “assured results,” its limitations, and the criteria for making judgments about authenticity—Fuller provides a succinct itemization (in less than four pages) of materials (both sayings and narrative) that he considers authentic.<sup>95</sup>

A major work on the sayings of Jesus, ignoring the narratives in the gospel tradition, was published in 1967, authored by Norman Perrin. Perrin says early on in his book that the views presented concerning the nature of the gospel tradition “are the results of what may loosely be called ‘form criticism,’” as well as tradition criticism and other things, all

---

<sup>90</sup> Bornkamm, Jesus of Nazareth, 22.

<sup>91</sup> Ibid., 59.

<sup>92</sup> Ibid., 172–174.

<sup>93</sup> Ibid., 183.

<sup>94</sup> Hans Conzelmann, Jesus (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973), 16, which is a translation of “Jesus Christus,” in Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. Kurt Galling, 7 vols., 3rd ed. (Tübingen: Mohr [Paul Siebeck], 1957–1965), 3:619–653.

<sup>95</sup> Reginald H. Fuller, A Critical Introduction to the New Testament (London: Gerald Duckworth, 1966), 99–102.

of which, he says, can be placed under “‘form-critical’ views.”<sup>96</sup> Moreover, he discusses the various criteria typically used in “form-critical” work and employs them throughout his book.<sup>97</sup> Other major books, such as Jesus: An Experiment in Christology by Edward Schillebeeckx (Dutch version, 1975; English version, 1981), Jesus and Judaism by E. P. Sanders (1985), and the massive four-volume A Marginal Jew by John P. Meier (1991–2009) discuss form criticism as a presupposition to their works and, in particular, the place of the criterion of dissimilarity within their own respective methodologies.<sup>98</sup> The same can be said for a good number of other books and essays, including the comprehensive, but at the same time compact, essay on “Jesus Christ” by Ben Meyer in the Anchor Bible Dictionary.<sup>99</sup>

Finally, with the work of the so-called Jesus Seminar, form criticism has been given a renewed interest and greater prominence. The two major volumes that have been produced on the traditions of Jesus—both the sayings in The Five Gospels, published in 1993, and the narratives in The Acts of Jesus, published in 1998—make use of form criticism on a grand scale, including the most wide array of criteria concerning historicity ever employed, and with controversial results.<sup>100</sup>

6. Concluding Comments

The major works cited are only a few out of the vast number of books written on the historical Jesus that show the impact of form criticism directly. Attention has not been given here to the challenges that have been put to form criticism over the years. Four things can only be mentioned. (1) There have been attempts to reimagine the gospel tradition, its transmission, and its reliability. Most notable is a proposal appearing in the works of Harald Riesenfeld and Birger Gerhardsson.<sup>101</sup> They have

<sup>96</sup> Norman Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (New York: Harper & Row, 1967), 25.

<sup>97</sup> Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus, 39–49.

<sup>98</sup> Edward Schillebeeckx, Jesus: An Experiment in Christology (New York: Crossroad, 1981), 92–95; he calls the criterion “the principle of irreducibility” and says it is basic to evaluating the tradition (95); Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 13–22; he uses and discusses it as “the test of double ‘dissimilarity’” (16–17); John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 4 vols. (New York: Doubleday, 1991–2001; New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2009), 1:166–195; he calls the criterion the “criterion of discontinuity.”

<sup>99</sup> Ben F. Meyer, “Jesus Christ,” ABD 3:773–796. An extensive bibliography is included.

<sup>100</sup> Funk, The Five Gospels, 25–34; idem, The Acts of Jesus, 9–16.

<sup>101</sup> Harald Riesenfeld, The Gospel Tradition and Its Beginnings: A Study in the Limits of “Formgeschichte” (London: Mowbray, 1957); Birger Gerhardsson, Memory and proposed that Jesus taught his disciples to memorize a tradition that was later guarded by them, assuring accurate transmission. Their viewpoint, however, has not been accepted beyond a small circle of scholars. (2) The forms proposed by the form critics have sometimes been found wanting. On formal grounds, for example, can a clear distinction be made between miracle stories and legends? Could not the former be classified more broadly among the latter—along with other materials that edify? And what does one make of the Healing of the Paralytic (Mark 2:1–12//Matt 9:1–8//Luke 5:17–26)? It is customarily classified as a conflict story (or pronouncement story), but it can also be classified as a miracle story; it even contains a prime example of a “choral ending” in which the crowds affirm that a miracle has happened (Mark 2:12//Matt 9:8// Luke 5:26). It becomes necessary, then, to recognize that not all materials in the gospels can be classified unambiguously into clear-cut forms, a fact which both Dibelius and Bultmann recognized.<sup>102</sup> As various critics have said, sometimes it appears that classifications are made more on the basis of content than form.<sup>103</sup> Nevertheless, one cannot totally separate form and content. For example, while an “I” saying (as in Matt 5:17, “I have come . . . to fulfill [the law and the prophets]”) and a legal saying (as in 16:18, “I will build my church [on this rock]”) may share much in common syntactically, formal differences do exist (even if not “differences in form,” if “form” means structure alone) because of their contents and signification. (3) There is disagreement concerning the proposed Sitze im Leben of the traditions. One sees that already in the differences between those proposed by Dibelius and Bultmann. Consequently the charge can be made that there is considerable speculation in the proposals made. (4) The criteria used by the major form critics (and others following them) to discern what is historical and what is not have been weighed, modified, and criticized.

Nevertheless, in spite of such reactions and criticisms, it must be concluded that the basic insights of form criticism concerning the shaping and transmission of the traditions from and about Jesus have endured, and they continue to have an impact on Jesus research.

---

Manuscript: Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity, ASNU 22 (Lund: Gleerup, 1961); idem, Tradition and Transmission in Early Christianity, ConBNT 20 (Lund: Gleerup, 1964).

<sup>102</sup> Dibelius, Tradition to Gospel, 43; Bultmann, Synoptic Tradition, 4.

<sup>103</sup> Easton, The Gospel before the Gospel, 74; Stephen Travis, “Form Criticism,” in New Testament Interpretation: Essays on Principles and Methods, ed. I. Howard Marshall (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1977), 158; Christopher Tuckett, Reading the New Testament: Methods of Interpretation (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987), 100.

TRADITION CRITICISM AND JESUS RESEARCH

GRANT R. OSBORNE

Tradition criticism is the step-child of form and redaction criticism, developed as a method for determining authentic Jesus material in the gospels and studying the history behind a text or idea in that material. "Tradition criticism" stems from the technical German term Traditionsgeschichte, which might better be translated "tradition history"<sup>1</sup> or "the history of the transmission of the traditions."<sup>2</sup> Form criticism deals with the identification and development of an individual gospel tradition; tradition criticism studies the use of that tradition in the Tendenz of the gospel itself; and redaction criticism studies how each evangelist modified the tradition sources in producing their own compositions.

The precursors to the discipline were D. F. Strauss, who stated that the stories about Jesus were created by the community along the lines of Greco-Roman myths; and W. Wrede, who argued that it was the needs of the community that were read into the developing traditions. The basic theory, however, was developed by the form critics, in particular K. L. Schmidt, M. Dibelius, and R. Bultmann in Germany in the 1920's and by V. Taylor and R. H. Lightfoot in Britain in the 1930's and 40's. By utilizing models developed via the study of ancient folk literature, they posited an oral period of thirty to forty years after the death of Jesus and creation of the community, during which the stories and sayings of Jesus floated as independent units through the preaching and teaching of the church. As oral traditions<sup>3</sup> they followed certain laws of

---

<sup>1</sup> David R. Catchpole, "Tradition History," in New Testament Interpretation, ed. I. H. Marshall (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1977), 165, who speaks of "an ongoing process of development in the form and/or meaning of concepts or words or sayings or blocks of material."

<sup>2</sup> William G. Doty, Contemporary New Testament Interpretation (Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1972), 75, drawing upon James M. Robinson, Theology as History (New York: Harper, 1967), ix-x.

<sup>3</sup> A good study is Øivind Andersen, "Oral Tradition," in Jesus and the Oral Tradition, ed. Henry Wansbrough, JSNTSup 64 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1991), 17-54. He traces topics like oral communication, oral culture, oral format, stability and reliability, and the movement from oral tradition to writing.

transmission derived from ancient folk literature (see next section) so that the details of the stories and sayings were continually altered, with new details or whole units added on the basis of the kerygmatic needs of the church. In studying the forms of these traditions, critics developed four tasks: analyzing the forms of the stories and sayings, reconstructing the original Sitz im Leben (situation in the life of the church) that accounted for the various details; working backward from the final form to elucidate the original, authentic nucleus of the tradition; and determining the history of the transmission of the tradition. The latter three constitute the discipline of tradition criticism.

1. The Tasks of Tradition Criticism

1.1. Sitz im Leben Analysis

The “life-setting” of gospel pericopae functions at two levels. First, at the macro-level critics have theorized that miracle stories developed in apologetic settings, primarily in Greco-Roman settings vis-à-vis divine man expectations, while pronouncement stories and parables developed in preaching contexts and sentences of holy law stemmed from church discipline situations. They believe that in many cases the nucleus may have come from the historical Jesus. However, as the stories and sayings floated from house church to house church and were preached in the weekly meeting as well as used in catechetical instruction and proclaimed in the church’s mission to the world, they were expanded to meet the new situations. Moreover, Christian prophets would create new sayings to meet new circumstances, believing them to be inspired by the exalted Christ.

At the micro-level there is also the life-setting of the individual pericope or added details. There the critic asks whether a detail or saying goes back to the historical Jesus or was added by the later church. For form critics this is determined by the form itself, seen in terms of four tendencies or laws of transmission: (1) a tendency for stories/sayings to expand as new material was added (Matt 16:13–23; Mark 8:27–33); (2) a tendency to clarify or qualify the original details (Mark 14:13; Luke 22:8); (3) a tendency to reduce Semitisms from the original (Matt 10:37; Luke 14:26); (4) a tendency to create new sayings to meet new needs in the community (Matt 10:18; Luke 9:62).<sup>4</sup> Critics will take a story from the gospels, go backwards to discover the historical nucleus (if any), and then try to re-enact the life situation in the early church where various details were added. There are thus two origins: the Sitz im Leben Jesu, the situation in the life of Jesus that gave rise to the original nucleus; and the Sitz im Leben der Kirche, the life setting in the early church that accounts for the expanded details. Redaction critics would add a third, the situation behind the community of the evangelist as he collected the stories, put them together in his composition, and made final changes to the stories and sayings to address the needs of his own community.

---

<sup>4</sup> The first three are from Scot McKnight, Interpreting the Synoptic Gospels (Grand

For instance, consider the discourse against the scribes and Pharisees in Matthew 23. Haenchen wrote a classic article<sup>5</sup> in which he argued that the original situation did not stem from the situation of Jesus but from the hostility between Jews and Christians in Palestine before the final war of 66–70 CE. It was Christian prophets in the light of extreme opposition who developed the woes of vv. 13–32, and then Matthew in the situation of his church added the call to humility in vv. 8–10. David Garland sees all three Sitze im Leben present in the chapter. The nucleus goes back to Jesus' rejection by the Jews of his day, then it also somewhat reflects the later historical hostility between Jews and Christians; but Garland finds the primary life situation in Matthew's pastoral warning to Christian leaders in his own day not to be like the Jewish leaders, lest the same judgment fall on them.<sup>6</sup> Finally, Kenneth Newport sees 23:2–31 in a pre-70 CE setting due to the Jewish legal details, while 23:32–39 (general to the nation as a whole) stems from Matthew's hand.<sup>7</sup> Of course, each passage is studied in turn to determine its particular background and origin, but on the whole this exemplifies how tradition critics determine life-settings.

1.2. Determining the Original Historical Nucleus

The search for "authentic" Jesus material means ascertaining what if anything in a pericope can be traced back to the historical Jesus, and Rapids, MI: Baker, 1988), 73. For a helpful presentation see also C. F. D. Moule, The Birth of the New Testament, 3rd ed. (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1981).

---

<sup>5</sup> Ernst Haenchen, "Matthäus 23," ZTK 48 (1951): 38–63. See also F. W. Beare, The Gospel According to Matthew (Oxford: Blackwell, 1981), who concludes that none of it stems from Jesus.

<sup>6</sup> David Garland, The Intention of Matthew 23, NovTSup 52 (Leiden: Brill, 1979), 215.

<sup>7</sup> Kenneth G. C. Newport, The Sources and Sitz im Leben of Matthew 23, JSNTSup 117 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995), 76–79.

what represents the later biblical Christ.<sup>8</sup> The general assumption in the 1940's to the 1960's was pessimistic (see below), believing the burden of proof to be upon affirming the authenticity of a passage. This has been continued in recent years by the Jesus Seminar that made this burden of proof one of "the seven pillars of academic wisdom."<sup>9</sup> In fact, J. M. Robinson has redefined the meaning of "authentic" in an existential direction when he says a saying Jesus never uttered "may well reflect accurately his historical significance, and in this sense be more 'historical' than many irrelevant things Jesus actually said."<sup>10</sup> He has in effect reversed the whole meaning of "authentic" as normally used.

However, many have not been so negative (e.g. Vincent Taylor, C. H. Dodd), believing each detail should be studied on its own merits. For example, consider the possible evolution of the term "Lord" from the time of Christ (= "Sir") to the early church, where it gained overtones of Messiah (Jewish Christianity) to universal, cosmic Lordship (Gentile Christianity). Moule studies the use of "Lord" within Luke, noting dialogue passages where "Lord" is used simply as a term of respect (from the Sitz im Leben of Jesus' ministry) and editorial passages where it has a titular sense (from the Sitz im Leben of the Lukan community). He uses this to demonstrate the historical veracity of Luke.<sup>11</sup> There is the further question as to whether the exalted sense arose in the post-Easter Palestinian church (so Moule) or the later Hellenistic Jewish church.<sup>12</sup>

Here of course the criteria for authenticity come into play.<sup>13</sup> Since they are covered in a separate article, I will here simply summarize their development and use. The first three, often called "the formal criteria," consist of dissimilarity (a saying is authentic only if it cannot be paralleled in either Judaism or the early church, lest it transfer Jewish ideas into <sup>8</sup> This distinction was first elucidated by Martin Kähler, The So-Called Historical Jesus and the Historic Biblical Christ, trans. C. E. Braaten (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1964; Ger. orig., 1892).

<sup>9</sup> Robert W. Funk and Roy W. Hoover, The Five Gospels: The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus (New York: Macmillan, 1993).

<sup>10</sup> James M. Robinson, A New Quest of the Historical Jesus (London: SCM, 1959), 99.

<sup>11</sup> C. F. D. Moule, The Phenomenon of the New Testament (London: SCM, 1967), 56–60.

<sup>12</sup> So Reginald H. Fuller, The Foundations of New Testament Christology (New York: Scribner's, 1965), 245–246.

<sup>13</sup> On these see Grant R. Osborne, "The Evangelical and Traditionsgeschichte," JETS 21.2 (1978): 117–130; Robert H. Stein, "The 'Criteria for Authenticity,'" in Gospel Perspectives I: Studies of History and Tradition in the Four Gospels, ed. R. T. France and David Wenham (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1980), 225–253; John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, vol. 1 (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 168–184.

Jesus or read back church dogma onto Jesus' lips); multiple attestation (if a saying carries over into a cross-section of primary sources such as Mark, Q, M, L, or John, it is more likely authentic); and coherence (if a passage is consistent with other material already deemed authentic, the tradition behind it is deemed authentic as well). The dissimilarity criterion has long been criticized for its overly pessimistic demand for an irreducible minimum, as if the historical Jesus could have no ties with Judaism and could supply no teaching for the early church.<sup>14</sup> Multiple attestation is a more positive tool and has value in showing likely authenticity, but does it mean that no passage appearing only once can be authentic? It must be used carefully as part of a larger whole and not made an end in itself. Coherence can often simply magnify previous mistakes, as decisions already made are applied to a passage. For instance, if Jesus' messianic self-consciousness is ruled out on the basis of the first criterion, then all passages related to it (e.g. Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi) are also rendered null and void.

The secondary criteria are more positive in scope and relate to material that can be authenticated and not just rejected. For instance, material that goes counter to the intentions of the evangelists and is in tension with Jesus' teaching (e.g. Schmiedel's "pillar sayings") are likely genuine. For instance, Mark 3:21 (Jesus' family thinks he's lost his mind) or 12:32 (Jesus' ignorance of the Eschaton) seem to denigrate Jesus' supernatural ability and point to authenticity. Also, the presence of Aramaisms points at least to early Palestinian tradition and could well demonstrate Jesus' own teaching. Jesus' principal language was certainly Aramaic, and when Mark 5:41 has Jesus say "Talitha koum" ("Little girl, rise"), we may well have ipsissima verba. Jeremias emphasized Palestinian customs and background as indicators of early origin in his study of parables,<sup>15</sup> and this too points to early formulation. Further, when the language and style of a passage is not that of the evangelist, it points to a source rather than to a redactional insertion. Of course, it cannot prove the passage goes back to Jesus, but it does highlight traditional material. This has been used to posit a signs source for John.<sup>16</sup>

<sup>14</sup> See Morna Hooker, "On Using the Wrong Tool," Theology 75 (1972): 570–581; R. S. Barbour, Traditio-Historical Criticism of the Gospels: Some Comments on Current Methods (London: SPCK, 1972), 6–8.

<sup>15</sup> Joachim Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus, trans. S. H. Hooke (London: SCM, 1963), 11–12.

<sup>16</sup> See Robert T. Fortna, The Gospel of Signs, SNTSMNS 11 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970); W. Nicol, The Semeia in the Fourth Gospel (Leiden: Brill, 1972).

Recently even more positive criteria have been developed. Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter provide a devastating critique of the dissimilarity principle in which they show that its “one-sided delimitation of Jesus over against Judaism... cannot be maintained in its traditional form” because “the historian is interested in determining the material relation of Jesus to his context and to the history of his effects.”<sup>17</sup> They propose a more positive “criterion of plausibility,” examining the “network of continuities” between Jesus and his context in terms of the history of effects in relation to both Judaism (its effect on him) and the early church (his effect on it). The result is “a ‘historical’ comprehensive picture of him that embraces his social context in Judaism as well.”<sup>18</sup>

John P. Meier speaks of the “criterion of embarrassment,” i.e. passages that would not fit the exalted claims of the early church. For instance, the baptism of the superior sinless Jesus by sinful John, especially in Mark’s stark portrayal (1:4–11) with no theological embellishment, could be evidence pointing to veracity.<sup>19</sup> N. T. Wright has developed the criterion of “double similarity and dissimilarity,” meaning that on the one hand Jesus certainly built on his Jewish roots and at the same time differed from them in developing his distinctive method and ministry. He uses the parable of the prodigal son as an example, arguing that it is in one sense similar to the Jewish context and early Christian worldview and at the same time is dissimilar to both, pointing to the unique message of Jesus. This, he believes, establishes an authentic story from the historical Jesus.<sup>20</sup> Finally, we would note J. D. G. Dunn, who speaks of the criterion of oral transmission of tradition, namely a stable core of traditions transmitted by faithful participants in the Jesus story. These multiple witnesses further enhance the viability of the synoptic portrayal.<sup>21</sup> He uses this to support the historical rootedness of the triumphal entry (Mark 11:1–11 par.), arguing that the local details as well as the acclamation evidence “the characteristics of oral transmission,” with the core being consistent in all four gospels.<sup>22</sup>

<sup>17</sup> Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter, The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria, trans. M. Eugene Boring (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002), 172.

<sup>18</sup> Theissen and Winter, Plausible Jesus, 188–189.

<sup>19</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew, 168–171.

<sup>20</sup> N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1996), 131–133.

<sup>21</sup> J. D. G. Dunn, Christianity in the Making, vol. 1, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003), 192–210.

<sup>22</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 640–642.

1.3. Determining the History of the Transmission of the Tradition

Bultmann established the basic principle that the oral tradition behind the gospels was transmitted according to certain “formal laws” and began with a pure form that was characterized by simplicity and then progressed in the history of transmission to greater complexity and detail.<sup>23</sup> The task of the tradition critic then is to strip away the layers of tradition and determine the history behind the development of the tradition unit. Bultmann divided the New Testament period into three rigid layers—the Palestinian period, the Hellenistic Jewish period, and the Hellenistic church. He believed he could classify the details historically and get behind the Hellenistic to the Palestinian.

This view of an uncontrolled process of development has been challenged by Birger Gerhardsson and Harald Riesenfeld, proponents of what has become known as the “Scandinavian hypothesis,” saying that the process of transmission was controlled by rabbinic methods of memorization and recital, so that the sayings took on a fixed form that was not so open to change and sought to be faithful to the teacher’s original message.<sup>24</sup> While they overstated their theory in terms of Jesus teaching by repetition (no evidence for this) and the stories having a very fixed form (the differences between the gospels make this difficult), their view has had a renaissance of late in terms of a more faithful transmission of Jesus’ teaching, as exemplified in the Lukan prologue (1:1–4). Sanders builds on two points: outside the gospels there is not a substantial set of Jesus traditions, while in the gospels there are “full texts not just essential points.”<sup>25</sup> Thus the assumption of floating material continually altered to meet the needs of the church becomes problematic. Full texts were transmitted, not just core material, and in many cases we can be certain that the text was preserved, such as the divorce saying (1 Cor 7:10–11; Matt 5:31–32, 19:9; Mark 10:11–12; Luke 16:18) and the words of institution (1 Cor 11:23–26; Matt 26:26–29 par.).<sup>26</sup>

<sup>23</sup> See Rudolf Bultmann, “The New Approach to the Synoptic Problem,” in Existence and Faith (1926; repr., London: Collins, 1964), 39–62, esp. 45–47.

<sup>24</sup> Harald Riesenfeld, “The Gospel Tradition and Its Beginning,” in The Gospel Tradition (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1957), 11–29; Birger Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript: Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity (Lund: Gleerup, 1961). For a defense of this position, see Rainer Riesner, Jesus als Lehrer: Eine Untersuchung zum Ursprung der Evangelien-Überlieferung, WUNT 27 (Tübingen: Mohr, 1981); and his “Jüdische Elementarbildung und Evangelien-Überlieferung,” in Studies of History and Tradition, ed. France and Wenham, 209–223.

<sup>25</sup> E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985), 14.

<sup>26</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 14–15.

The first to make a strong distinction between written and oral forms was Werner Kelber, who argued for preservation of the core message within an environment of retelling with features like paronomasia, alliteration, proverbs, parallelism, chiasm, and such, all features that can be distinguished in the final form of the gospels, so that Kelber believed that the written gospel took on the form of a fixed or frozen orality.<sup>27</sup> Dunn takes this to the next level by positing three things: a community would exert control over its traditions; the degree of control will depend on form and the importance of the tradition; and the core of the story would be the most firmly fixed element.<sup>28</sup>

The tendency in recent years has been to see the changes as the work of the evangelist more than of various strata in the church. The three stages above—the original setting in the life of Jesus, the setting of the developing church, and the setting in the production of the gospel by the evangelist—must all be taken into account, but the emphasis is shifting to the evangelist who took the traditions inherited and reshaped them by adapting, omitting, and adding details. Of course the great debate concerns the reliability of this redactional material.

This is a good place to discuss the fractious issue of burden of proof. Widely divergent views have been presented, e.g. Perrin's statement that the synoptic problem demands that "the burden of proof will be upon the claim to authenticity"<sup>29</sup> vs. Jeremias's claim that "it is the inauthenticity, not the authenticity, of the sayings of Jesus that must be demonstrated."<sup>30</sup> Sanders is certainly correct when he says, "The question of where the burden of proof falls, which has been so often discussed, is in fact very simple: it falls on the one who argues a case."<sup>31</sup> Both sides are equally responsible to prove their position. Nevertheless, we must agree with Stein that there is good evidence for accepting the basic trustworthiness of the gospel accounts: the presence of eyewitnesses to control the tradition; a center of leadership that would ensure careful transmission;

---

<sup>27</sup> Werner H. Kelber, The Oral and the Written Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983). See also his "Jesus and Tradition: Words in Time, Words in Space," in Orality and Textuality in Early Christian Literature, Semeia 65 (1994), 139–167.

<sup>28</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 209, building on Kenneth E. Bailey, "Informal Controlled Oral Tradition and the Synoptic Gospels," Asia Journal of Theology 5 (1991): 34–54.

<sup>29</sup> Norman Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (New York: Harper & Row, 1967), 39.

<sup>30</sup> Joachim Jeremias, New Testament Theology: The Proclamation of Jesus (New York: Scribner's, 1971), 37.

<sup>31</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 13.

the high view toward the Logia Jesu in the early church; the faithful way difficult sayings were preserved; the absence of many serious problems (from the later church) reflected in the gospel accounts — all show reluctance to make up material.<sup>32</sup>

The beatitudes of Matt 5:3–12 will provide a fine example. Ulrich Luz reconstructs the history of transmission as follows:<sup>33</sup> The first three beatitudes from Q may go back to Jesus in their Lukan form (due to the absence of explicit christology and of an ecclesiastical limitation); Q added a fourth (vv. 11–12) that stemmed from the community; between Q and Matthew's redaction came the addition of four more beatitudes (vv. 5, 7–9). So for him Matthew added a few redactional details but no beatitudes. Davies and Allison agree on the four Q beatitudes of Luz but believe the others (vv. 5, 7, 8, 9) also stem from Q and accept v. 10 as Matthean.<sup>34</sup> Yet Hagner believes that even though both Matthew's and Luke's versions are artistically constructed, they exhibit the kind of form and content that the early church would have memorized;<sup>35</sup> and Blomberg believes Jesus may well have spoken all eight beatitudes along with eight woes, with Matthew and Luke choosing to employ those that fit their message.<sup>36</sup> In other words, redaction does not have to mean non-historicity.

2. Stages in the Use of Tradition Criticism for Jesus Research

It is certainly true that tradition criticism has too often failed to open up new vistas of understanding of the historical Jesus or what constituted his ministry. In fact, we have to say that Schweitzer's classic rhetoric still fits:

Formerly it was possible to book through-tickets at the supplementary-psychological knowledge office, which enabled those traveling in the interests of life-of-Jesus constructions to use express trains, thus avoiding the inconvenience of having to stop at every little station, change, and run the risk of missing their connection. This ticket office is now closed. There

<sup>32</sup> Stein, "Criteria," 226–227.

<sup>33</sup> Ulrich Luz, Matthew 1–7, trans. W. C. Linss (Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1989), 227–228.

<sup>34</sup> W. D. Davies and Dale C. Allison, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel According to Matthew, 3 vols. (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1988), 1:434–435.

<sup>35</sup> Donald A. Hagner, Matthew 1–13, WBC 33A (Dallas: Word, 1993), 89.

<sup>36</sup> Craig Blomberg, The Historical Reliability of the Gospels (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1987), 144.

is a station at the end of each section of the narrative, and the connections are not guaranteed.<sup>37</sup>

The so-called “scientific” historicism of our day has not produced the results promised, and scholars still tend to recreate the historical Jesus in their own image. We have the existential Jesus of Bultmann and Käse-mann, the itinerant Cynic philosopher of Funk and Crossan, the Spirit-filled teacher of wisdom of Borg, the social activist of Horsley, the Sophia of Schüssler Fiorenza, all erected not so much on historical research as on the times in which we live. Let us trace the progress of the discipline, for that is where the hope lies. More and more, a new positive atmosphere is entering the halls of academia in which the traditions are given credence in developing the historical Jesus. I will trace three stages.<sup>38</sup>

2.1. The Great Gulf between History and Tradition (1900–1970)

The academic legacy of German scholarship in the nineteenth century saw a turning point in attitudes to the history behind the gospels and the early church. F. C. Baur (1792–1860) sought “objective historical truth,” which meant distinguishing “how it really was” from the biblical portrayal of it. His premise was that the traditions were controlled by the Tendenz of the early church and so both distorted the facts and misled later understanding. Thus Baur laid the foundation for tradition criticism.<sup>39</sup> It was Hermann Gunkel (1862–1932) who turned this into a science by positing the pre-history behind the traditions and seeing it influenced by the life-situation of the early movement.

To this must be added the historical principles of Ernst Troeltsch and the methodology of William Wrede. Troeltsch developed three principles of historiography: criticism (all historical judgments are uncertain and must be critically examined); analogy (ancient events are analogous to modern events and must be judged on the basis of everyday experience); and correlation (all events are interrelated and must be placed into the comprehensive wholeness of history).<sup>40</sup> This loss of certainty in

<sup>37</sup> Albert Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of Its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede (1906; repr., London: A. & C. Black, 1954), 333.

<sup>38</sup> Building upon my “History and Theology in the Synoptic Gospels,” TrinJ NS 24 (2003): 5–22.

<sup>39</sup> See Theissen and Winter, Plausible Jesus, 76–78.

<sup>40</sup> Ernst Troeltsch, “Historical and Dogmatic Method in Theology,” in Religion as History, trans. J. L. Adams and W. F. Bense (1898; repr., Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1991), 11–32; as found in Scot McKnight, “Jesus of Nazareth,” in The Face of New Testament Studies, ed. Scot McKnight and Grant R. Osborne (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 2004), 154.

historical enquiry led to the radical skepticism of critical scholarship as developed through the next fifty years; and it became an a priori. Wrede applied this to life of Jesus research; in his Das Messiasgeheimnis (ET The Messianic Secret, 1901) he argued that the early community created the messianic tradition rather than the other way around. So it was the church that made Jesus Messiah, not Jesus himself. This axiom controlled tradition criticism for a half century.

Rudolf Bultmann inherited and developed these principles even further. As Neill and Wright state:

...no ghosts are ever laid in Germany. In the writings of Bultmann we encounter the full procession of the ghosts. Here is Strauss telling us that the life of Christ cannot be written because the connecting thread between the individual events has been broken. Here is Baur, insisting on the radical difference between Jewish and Gentile Christianity. Here is Schweitzer (albeit with modifications) teaching us that Jesus of Nazareth supposed that the great act of God in him would mean the end of human history. Here is the radical skepticism of Wrede.<sup>41</sup>

Bultmann made a radical dichotomy between history and faith, and the gospel accounts were the product of the community and had little resemblance to the historical Jesus. As a result of his dialectical theology (in this he radicalized Barth), the historical facts of Jesus can never be the basis for faith, and as a result of his critical presuppositions that historical nucleus cannot be ascertained anyway. It is the historic biblical Christ as created by the early church that must be the basis of understanding. Bultmann was adamantly opposed to attempts at delineating the personality or actions of Jesus and considered him an eschatological prophet within Judaism who can only be known by the effects of his teaching (not the content). For him Jesus was only the presupposition of New Testament theology.<sup>42</sup> Faith is an existential decision and cannot be the product of historical reflection. R. H. Lightfoot summed up this perspective in his famous statement that the gospels “yield little more than a whisper of his voice; we trace in them but the outskirts of his ways.”<sup>43</sup>

<sup>41</sup> Stephen Neill and Tom Wright, The Interpretation of the New Testament: 1861–1986 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1988), 237–238.

<sup>42</sup> Rudolf Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, trans. K. Grobel, vol. 1 (New York: Scribner's, 1951), 3.

<sup>43</sup> R. H. Lightfoot, History and Interpretation in the Gospels (New York: Hodder & Stoughton, 1934), 225.

This was continued in the “new quest” for the historical Jesus. This began with Ernst Käsemann’s famous address in 1953 at the “Old Marburgers” (colloquy of Bultmann’s students) entitled “The Problem of the Historical Jesus.”<sup>44</sup> He accepted Bultmann’s rejection of historical Jesus research but said that the historical question itself was still valid, saying, “The quest of the historical Jesus is legitimately the question of the continuity of the gospel in the discontinuity of the times and in the variation of the kerygma.”<sup>45</sup> But it was a continuity of effect more than form, and what carried over had strong existential overtones, centering almost entirely on Jesus’ sayings rather than his deeds and producing a teacher of wisdom. Bultmann’s negative bias against Jesus research was overturned, but the negative criteria still controlled the process, and great amounts of traditional material were relegated to the dustbin of later theological creation. The continuity between the historical Jesus and the gospel records was still quite insubstantial.

Yet the degree of discontinuity depended upon the individual scholar. This can be seen in the founders of redaction criticism, all students of Bultmann. Conzelmann is the closest to Bultmann’s absolute disjunction, but Marxsen would allow more material, and Bornkamm was the most conservative of the group. Still Bornkamm said the critical task is to recover “those facts that are prior to any pious interpretation and which manifest themselves as undisturbed and primary.”<sup>46</sup> Another post-Bultmannian, Norman Perrin, developed most consistently the criteria for authenticity<sup>47</sup> and argued for three different kinds of knowledge: descriptive historical knowledge of Jesus of Nazareth; historic knowledge of Jesus that is significant for today; and knowledge of him that stems from faith that acknowledges him as Lord and Christ.<sup>48</sup> The question is how much is accessible to the historian, and moving from one level to the next (remembering that we are studying the same texts and asking questions at all three levels) is incredibly complex. Given the critical presuppositions of the Bultmannians, their pessimism was warranted.

The work of the Jesus Seminar must be discussed here. While belonging to a later era, its roots are in the Bultmannian school, as befits the

---

<sup>44</sup> Ernst Käsemann, “The Problem of the Historical Jesus,” in Essays on New Testament Themes (Naperville, IL: Allenson, 1964), 15–47.

<sup>45</sup> Käsemann, “Problem,” 46.

<sup>46</sup> Günther Bornkamm, Jesus of Nazareth (New York: Harper & Row, 1960), 26.

<sup>47</sup> Perrin, Rediscovering, 39–47.

<sup>48</sup> Ibid., 234–235.

fact that Robert Funk was one of Bultmann's last students. It has often been labeled a throwback to this earlier era. Their project resulted in five gospels because they believe that the Gospel of Thomas as well as Q predated the material in the four canonical gospels. They vote on the viability of a passage line by line using four colored marbles—red (authentic), pink (probably authentic), grey (doubtful and likely inauthentic), and black (definitely inauthentic), and most of the red material is found in either Q or Thomas. The one area where the Seminar differs from Bultmann is their stated desire to rediscover the historical Jesus and to situate him in his original social background (especially Crossan). Yet the older quest is firmly evident in it. As Wright says, the older program is seen in Burton Mack's emphasis on the fictitious nature of Mark and in his dichotomy between primitive Palestinian Christianity and "the Christ-cult of Paul" as well as the reconstruction of Q with its traditionsgeschichtliche underpinnings and in Crossan's approach, so like the new quest.<sup>49</sup>

2.2. Bridging the Gulf between History and Tradition (1970–85)

It must be recognized that pessimistic historical enquiry did not dominate all scholarship from 1830–1970. Baur's dialectical approach was overturned by the writings of Theodor Zahn in Germany and J. B. Lightfoot in England. Scholars like the Cambridge trio (Lightfoot, Westcott, Hort), or Zahn and Schlatter in Germany fought for a more conservative scholarship. Redaction criticism led to composition criticism and a more positive view of the worth of the gospels for history. In the 1970's this took a more positive turn in the world of scholarship. David Catchpole challenged the "assured results" regarding the distinction between Palestinian, Hellenistic-Jewish, and Hellenistic communities in the early church, pointing out three things. (1) Hellenistic influence was strong in Palestine, as seen in non-Semitic loan words, Hellenistic thought-patterns at Qumran, and the presence of a Hellenistic synagogue in Jerusalem (Acts 6:9). There was great variety in Judaism. (2) Differences within communities are as important as differences between communities, for widely divergent views were maintained in individual communities, as seen in the debates within Acts. (3) One cannot decide whether Semitic features belong to Jesus or the Aramaic-speaking community, so there are no clear criteria for demarcating such differences.<sup>50</sup> In short, the speculative nature of many tradition-critical decisions began to be realized, and a counter-movement away from skepticism and toward a greater openness to historical material started to appear.

---

<sup>49</sup> Wright, Victory of God, 34–35.

This can be exemplified in the evaluation of “thirteen objections by historical skeptics” on the part of Theissen and Merz:<sup>51</sup> (1) The silence of non-Christian sources about Jesus parallels that of others like Hillel or Bar Cochba. (2) The so-called mythical portrait of Jesus in Paul does not mean Paul was unaware of the earthly Jesus, as seen in the same dichotomy between John’s gospel and his epistles. (3) The contradictions between John and the synoptics do not mean the former is ahistorical. (4) The view that Easter faith has reshaped pre-Easter traditions is reductionistic, for the two are interdependent, e.g. John clearly notes a post-Easter understanding (2:22; 12:16). (5) The writing of the synoptic accounts years later does not make the traditions suspect, for the “local color” was quite faithful to the times of Jesus. (6) The belief that the Jesus tradition came from the needs of the later church does not fit the “historicizing elements” that point to the Sitz im Leben Jesu rather than that of the later community. (7) The view that the community needs produced the traditions also does not fit the fact that later issues like circumcision or structures of authority are not found in the gospels. (8) The extensive use of proof from scripture goes back to Jesus himself not just to the early church. (9) We know the “form” of the Jesus tradition with a high degree of probability, e.g. his use of admonitions, beatitudes, parables; the old skepticism is unwarranted. (10) The idea of Christian prophets creating sayings is only a critical abstraction and is unprovable. (11) The presence of the miraculous and of supernatural intervention must be based on fact, for they would not have developed in a vacuum, as shown by the criterion of multiple attestation. (12) The “mythical motifs” (virgin birth, transfiguration, resurrection et al.) parallel other ancient stories (e.g. Alexander, Augustus), and historians are generally open to historical background behind such stories. (13) The negative criteria are being replaced by positive criteria centering on historical plausibility, with a new openness to the Jesus traditions in their historical context.

---

<sup>50</sup> Catchpole, “Tradition History,” 172–174.

<sup>51</sup> Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide, trans. John Bowden (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1998), 91–121.

Two major sets of publications led to a reappraisal of the data. In 1970 I. Howard Marshall launched the first of a series arguing that history and theology are interdependent rather than contradictory, stating that Luke “was a faithful historian who wished to give a faithful portrait of the ministry of Jesus and the life of the early church,” as seen in the fact that Luke “was very much controlled by his sources.”<sup>52</sup> So Luke was interested in real events and chose those that fit his message and reconstructed them into a holistic narrative, thus showing that for Luke biblical faith is rooted in the historical and cannot be separated from it.<sup>53</sup> Three other books followed in a similar vein on Mark (Ralph Martin), John (Stephen Smalley), and Matthew (R. T. France), arguing similarly that the theologically interpreted data in the gospels stem from historical facts rather than later creations.<sup>54</sup>

The second set is the six-volume Gospel Perspective series, published from 1980–86, summed up in Craig Blomberg’s Historical Reliability of the Gospels (1987). The series was written to explore the Jesus traditions in light of the negative conclusions of critical scholarship and addressed especially the question of the evangelists adding stories and sayings to the Jesus tradition. For instance, Richard Bauckham compares the gospel traditions with midrashic expansions and concludes that “the Evangelist’s traditions, however ‘midrashic’ his procedure may be, could be historical in origin.”<sup>55</sup> France finds no evidence of a tendency to “create history out of Scripture,” saying “to observe a process of theological interpretation is not at all the same as to postulate the development of new elements of narrative.”<sup>56</sup>

2.3. The Interdependence of History and Tradition (1985 to the Present)

The “third quest” for the historical Jesus departed from the skepticism of the first two quests both in utilizing Jewish background alongside

<sup>52</sup> I. Howard Marshall, Luke: Historian and Theologian (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1970), 9.

<sup>53</sup> Marshall, Luke, 21–25, 32–37.

<sup>54</sup> Ralph Martin, Mark—Evangelist and Theologian (Exeter: Paternoster, 1972); Stephen Smalley, John—Evangelist and Interpreter (Exeter: Paternoster, 1978); R. T. France, Matthew—Evangelist and Teacher (Exeter: Paternoster, 1989).

<sup>55</sup> Richard Bauckham, “The Liber Antiquitatum Biblicarum of Pseudo-Philo and the Gospels as ‘Midrash,’” in Gospel Perspectives: Studies in Midrash and Historiography, ed. R. T. France and David Wenham (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1983), 67.

<sup>56</sup> R. T. France, “Postscript—Where Have We Got to, and Where Do We Go from Here?” in Studies in Midrash, ed., France and Wenham, 298.

Hellenistic<sup>57</sup> and in a new openness to the gospel traditions as historical data in their own right. The final thread of the dissimilarity criterion was broken, as Jewish background became a tool for discovering the historical Jesus. Theissen and Merz see three aspects:<sup>58</sup> (1) an interest in social history, centering on the “social continuity between the pre-Easter circle around Jesus and Christianity after Easter”; (2) the place of Jesus in Judaism, with Jesus preaching a “restoration eschatology” intended to restore the nation to God along with continuity between the historical Jesus and the kerygmatic Christ as “articulated with the help of the Jewish-biblical pattern of interpretation”; (3) attention to non-canonical sources, although with considerable debate as to whether the Gospel of Thomas and Q (so Crossan) are superior sources to the canonical gospels.

There were three precursors to the third quest: first the Jewish lives of Jesus were produced by Montefiore, Abrahams, and Klausner in the first half of the twentieth century and by Sandmel, Flusser, and Vermes in the second half. They singlehandedly forced attention back to the centrality of Jewish backgrounds for Jesus research.<sup>59</sup> Second, Ben Meyer’s The Aims of Jesus argued forcefully that both the event and its significance/theological relevance are the subject of historical enquiry, which should be conducted along the lines of critical realism as articulated by Bernard Lonergan, i.e. moving from hypothesis to verification and then validation. Meyer reversed the prevailing “methodological skepticism” and preferred the global supposition that the gospel accounts are historical.<sup>60</sup> He sought to study Jesus’ actions to ascertain his aims and purposes as a key to the historical Jesus. Third, A. E. Harvey believed that the Jesus of the gospels acted within his historical times and the forces of his day.<sup>61</sup> There is no narrowing of Jesus to Jewish eschatology or prophetic movements but a full-fledged examination of his life in light of his impact on the times in which he lived.

<sup>57</sup> For an informing portrayal of his odyssey from Hellenistic to Jewish background on the part of one of the pioneers, see W. D. Davies, “My Odyssey in New Testament Interpretation,” BRev 5 (1989) 10–18.

<sup>58</sup> Theissen and Merz, Historical Jesus, 10–11.

<sup>59</sup> See Donald A. Hagner, The Jewish Reclamation of Jesus: An Analysis and Critique of the Modern Jewish Study of Jesus (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1984).

<sup>60</sup> Ben F. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus (London: SCM, 1979), 78.

<sup>61</sup> A. E. Harvey, Jesus and the Constraints of History: The Bampton Lectures 1980 (London: Duckworth, 1982), 6–7.

The scholars who have contributed to the third quest are a veritable who's who in Jesus studies—Sanders, Theissen, Borg, Horsley, Brown, Bockmuehl, Meier, Witherington, Wright, Dunn, McKnight. I will center on perhaps the four most influential, with the goal to understand current attitudes toward historical Jesus research.<sup>62</sup> E. P. Sanders finds the negative criteria inadequate and demands that the Jesus traditions be placed within the context of Second Temple Judaism. In doing so he says, "We should trust this information unless we have good reason not to do so, that is, unless the stories in the gospels contain so many anachronisms and anomalies that we come to regard them as fraudulent."<sup>63</sup> He begins with the reality of Jesus' crucifixion and asks what kind of Jewish Jesus would cause him to be crucified by the Jewish leaders.<sup>64</sup> Then he turns to those events he believes are certain "facts" about Jesus' life—his baptism by John, that he was a Galilean preacher and healer, the calling of the twelve, confinement of his mission to Israel, his controversy over the Temple, his crucifixion, and the continuance of the movement by his disciples and Jewish opposition to them.<sup>65</sup> Next he examines other Jesus traditions to determine their fit with the Jesus phenomenon. For him the major theme is Jesus' "restoration eschatology," namely the renewal of the national hopes of Israel, not in terms of national repentance but in terms of the imminent inbreaking of the kingdom.<sup>66</sup>

John P. Meier creates an imaginary "unpapal enclave" of Catholic, Protestant, Jewish, and agnostic scholars in the basement of the Harvard Library, not to leave until they "have hammered out a consensus document on who Jesus of Nazareth was and what he intended in his own time and place."<sup>67</sup> He uses the criteria extensively but in a positive way to affirm historical traditions, arguing strongly that the primary sources are the canonical gospels themselves, including John. He accepts the three life-situations (material from Jesus, the early church, and the evangelists themselves), with decisions made via the criteria. He is generally more positive on results. For instance, on miracles he asserts that while <sup>62</sup> This does not mean there is a total consensus in a positive direction, as our discussion of the Jesus Seminar above shows. For one who still thinks the historical Jesus is beyond the purview of the historian, see Helmut Koester, "Redirecting the Quest for the Historical Jesus," HTR 23 (1993): 9–11.

---

<sup>63</sup> Sanders, The Historical Figure of Jesus (New York: Penguin, 1993): 54.

<sup>64</sup> Idem, Jesus and Judaism, 18.

<sup>65</sup> Ibid., 11.

<sup>66</sup> Ibid., 116–119, 150–156.

<sup>67</sup> Meier, A Marginal Jew I, 1.

historical enquiry cannot state with certainty that a miracle occurred, it can affirm that Jesus performed extraordinary deeds that those around him called miracles. Still, Meier accepts to some extent the older separation of history from theology, as when he says the resurrection of Jesus is not open to historical enquiry.<sup>68</sup> Here another new quester, Ben Witherington, demurs, saying every aspect of the Jesus traditions must be historically examined, including Jesus' theological assertions (e.g. regarding his resurrection): "the quest for the historical Jesus... may also involve evaluating whether or not he made certain theological claims about his words, deeds, and person. History and theology in such a case cannot be neatly separated."<sup>69</sup>

N. T. Wright has made the most extensive study of the methodology used for historical Jesus research. For him the gospels were ancient biographies describing the life of the historical Jesus and for the most part were reliable. Like Ben Meyer, he proceeds on the basis of critical realism, i.e. the expectation that there is something "real" there that is accessible to the historian but that needs "critical examination" to ascertain the reliability of the individual Jesus tradition. He states there are three stages in the process: a hypothesis that is tested by critical reflection to see if the theory "can survive the challenge and speak truly of reality."<sup>70</sup> For Wright, traditions regarding his universal lordship, deity, and death "for many" are not just later creations but theological beliefs that must be explained historically. He does this by taking seriously the "world-view" of first-century Judaism as a clue to the mindset of Jesus himself.<sup>71</sup> Wright dedicates himself to six questions: Jesus' fit in Judaism, Jesus' aims and their consistency, why he died, the reason for the gospels as they are, and the impact of these questions for the contemporary church.<sup>72</sup> Through these questions he hopes to give an adequate portrait of the historical Jesus as constructed from the Jesus traditions.

Finally, James D. G. Dunn has begun an ambitious project entitled Christianity in the Making, with the first volume Jesus Remembered. He has a threefold goal: to explain Jesus' impact on his day and why he was

<sup>68</sup> Meier, A Marginal Jew, 1:13.

<sup>69</sup> Ben Witherington III, The Jesus Quest: The Third Search for the Jew of Nazareth (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1995), 203.

<sup>70</sup> N. T. Wright, The New Testament and the People of God (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1992), 32–37.

<sup>71</sup> Ibid., New Testament, 38–44.

<sup>72</sup> Wright, Victory of God, 91–121.

crucified, to ascertain why the movement that emerged was unacceptable to the Judaism of his day, and to discover whether the second-century church was the same or different from the first-century version.<sup>73</sup> The methodology that Dunn establishes is similar to that of Wright. After a lengthy discussion of the inadequacies of the developing critical consensus (25–97), he establishes his own method, believing that hermeneutics is the third partner and the mediator between history and faith in Jesus research.<sup>74</sup> For him the task of historiography is to explain not only what happened but why it happened, and in determining both aspects it must remain at the level of probability rather than certainty. In this the principle of analogy must allow for the unusual, the extraordinary, in human experience, and there is room for the wondrous in Jesus. The closed-world nexus of Troeltsch and Bultmann is erroneous, and critical realism must be open to the larger world.<sup>75</sup>

For Dunn, hermeneutics provides the mode, for questions of history by nature involve interpretation. First, he challenges the postmodern view of the autonomy of the text, arguing for the “priority of plain meaning,” that is, language does portray reality, and there is a referential quality to texts. So the “reconstruction” of historical meaning depends on a probability decision regarding the data utilized.<sup>76</sup> To accomplish this Dunn utilizes the hermeneutical circle (though he prefers the metaphor of a conical spiral moving up to a verified decision) as the historian moves back and forth from the familiar contemporary horizon to the alien horizon of the text, sifting the evidence to determine the viability of the Jesus traditions for historical Jesus research.<sup>77</sup> So the historical Jesus “is the Jesus constructed by historical research,” seen through the memories of the eyewitnesses and writers of the Jesus narratives.<sup>78</sup>

3. An Agenda for Tradition Criticism in Jesus Research

The movement in tradition criticism has been a gradual replacement of the radical skepticism that predominated until the 1950’s with a cautious but studied optimism toward the historiographical study of the

---

<sup>73</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 3.

<sup>74</sup> Ibid., 99–100.

<sup>75</sup> Ibid., 101–111.

<sup>76</sup> Ibid., 111–118.

<sup>77</sup> Ibid., 118–125.

<sup>78</sup> Ibid., 125, 130–131.

Jesus traditions. In spite of the diversity of conclusions on the part of the third questers (see above), they all view the gospel records as historical accounts in their own right to be analyzed as to their viability as Jesus traditions. This is an important phenomenon, for it represents a shift from the centrality of the later communities and their life-situation to the centrality of the historical Jesus in the social milieu of Second Temple Judaism. The Sitz im Leben Jesu and the Sitz im Leben der Kirche are not conflicting settings but part of a unified tradition, and the focus is shifting from creation to selection and coloring of the traditions by the evangelists. As Wright says, the first-century Jews/Christians “understood more about the real nature of history, that is, about the complex interaction of ‘event’ and ‘meaning,’ than has been grasped by the ardent proponents of ‘scientific history’ in comparatively recent times.”<sup>79</sup>

The task of the historian is to work with both event and interpretation in the Jesus traditions, carefully sifting the aptness/plausibility of each detail for the first-century situation. When studying the temptation narrative, one must judge not only the Matthean and Lukan additions to Mark (the three temptations) but also the interpretation in all three of the event as a cosmic battle in which Jesus proved himself “Son of God” by besting Satan in open combat. Thus we have to ascertain the probability of what happened and what it meant for the early church, without prior assumptions as to what may or may not be accepted.

The methodology is complex, beginning with a judicious use of the critical criteria to decide which of the traditions are more probable and fit the atmosphere of the first-century situation. In doing so, the historian must interact with the tradition as a whole, bracketing critical presuppositions and seeking an openness to all the data. Theological interpretation by the later church/evangelist is part of the historical record and must be judged on its own merits. For example, the awe of the crowds at Jesus’ miracles must be taken seriously as pointing to the extraordinary deeds of Jesus. This awe will explain why the leaders did not arrest Jesus sooner; they were afraid of the reaction of the crowds (Mark 12:12; 14:2). In this light as well let us consider the texts that portray Jesus’ self-consciousness of his death as an atonement “for many” (Mark 10:45 par.; 14:24 par.). Scholars regularly consider these to be later additions. Yet due to the possible Semitisms in the texts and the unusual place of these significant statements (if they were a later church logion read back onto the lips of Jesus, one would expect the sayings to have much greater prominence in the Jesus story), a good case can be made for their authenticity.<sup>80</sup>

---

<sup>79</sup> Wright, People of God, 122.

Contrary to the opinions of many, redaction and narrative criticisms are the ally of historical verification rather than its enemy, for they help to identify the editorial choices of the evangelist and the overall narrative strategy at the macro-level and thereby aid the historical process. By seeing how the evangelists used the traditions they inherited, the settings are made more evident and the validation process made more viable. For instance, if the Sermon on the Mount in Matthew and the Sermon on the Plain in Luke are the same sermon (which is probable) then Matthew's "blessed are the poor in spirit" and Luke's "blessed are the poor" are redactional interpretations of the same logion spoken by the historical Jesus, stressing the spiritual and the economic sides, respectively. We are living in an exciting era for Jesus research, with a new honesty and openness to the whole panorama of Jesus material, and with a new methodology that takes the best of the past and weds it to the sociological discoveries of the present.

---

<sup>80</sup> See Sidney Page, "The Authenticity of the Ransom Logion (Mark 10:45b)," in Studies of History and Tradition, ed. France and Wenham, 137-161.

THE CRITERIA OF AUTHENTICITY

STANLEY E. PORTER

1. Introduction

The criteria of authenticity have established themselves within New Testament studies as the most widely used means by which material in the gospels—whether concerning the deeds or words of Jesus—are assessed as authentic.<sup>1</sup> By authentic is meant material that is thought to have originated with Jesus, or come as close as one can legitimately determine using the means at our critical disposal.<sup>2</sup> Despite the criteria having become widely accepted as the methodologically most responsible approach to assessing the authenticity of various episodes and sayings, there are still a number of issues that readily emerge when the criteria are subjected to critical scrutiny. This chapter will summarize some of the issues surrounding the criteria, including their development, their use in other historical disciplines, critical periods in treatment of the criteria, and assessments of the major criteria in use today.

2. Development of the Criteria of Authenticity

Most of the recent treatments of the criteria of authenticity take a synchronic, or even a-historical, view of the criteria, in which they are

---

<sup>1</sup> This essay draws upon previous work, including: S. E. Porter, The Criteria for Authenticity in Historical-Jesus Research: Previous Discussion and New Proposals, JSNTSup 191 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), esp. 63–123; “Luke 17.11–19 and the Criteria for Authenticity Revisited,” JSHJ 1.2 (2003): 201–224; “The Criterion of Greek Language and Its Context: A Further Response,” JSHJ 4.1 (2006); “Reading the Gospels and the Quest for the Historical Jesus,” in Reading the Gospels Today, ed. S. E. Porter (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2004), 27–55, esp. 49–54; “A Dead End or a New Beginning? Examining the Criteria for Authenticity in Light of Albert Schweitzer,” in Jesus Research: An International Perspective, ed. J. H. Charlesworth and P. Pokorný (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2009), 16–35; “Methodological Reflections on Discerning Criteria for Obtaining Reliable Historical Information about Jesus,” in Symposium on Jesus Research, II [provisional title], ed. J. H. Charlesworth and P. Pokorný (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, forthcoming).

<sup>2</sup> See Porter, Criteria, 144; E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985), 357 n. 30.

presented in synoptic form in order to be compared and contrasted.<sup>3</sup> As handy as such treatments may be in providing useful points of comparison among the criteria, such presentations have had the deleterious effect of bestowing on the criteria a universality and timelessness that simply cannot sustain critical analysis. The synchronic and synoptic presentations offer a variety of criteria that have originated in differing historical, literary and linguistic contexts and present them as all providing comparatively equal evaluative tools for assessment of Jesus tradition.<sup>4</sup> The result is that the important historical, cultural, theological,

<sup>3</sup> Some of the more important treatments include: W. O. Walker, "The Quest for the Historical Jesus: A Discussion of Methodology," ATR 51 (1969): 38–56; D. G. A. Calvert, "An Examination of the Criteria for Distinguishing the Authentic Words of Jesus," NTS 18 (1971–1982): 209–219; N. J. McLelene, "Authenticating Criteria and Mark 7:1–23," CBQ 34 (1972): 431–460; R. S. Barbour, Traditio-Historical Criticism of the Gospels, Studies in Creative Criticism 4 (London: SPCK, 1972); F. Mussner, "Methodologie der Frage nach dem historischen Jesus," in Rückfrage nach Jesus: Zur Methodik und Bedeutung der Frage nach dem historischen Jesus, ed. K. Kertelge, QD 63 (Freiburg: Herder, 1974), 118–147, repr. in F. Mussner, Jesus von Nazareth im Umfeld Israels und der Kirche: Gesammelte Aufsätze, ed. M. Theobald, WUNT 111 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1999), 13–42; R. T. France, "The Authenticity of the Sayings of Jesus," in History, Criticism and Faith: Four Exploratory Studies, ed. C. Brown, 2nd ed. (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1977), 101–143; R. H. Stein, "The 'Criteria' for Authenticity," in Gospel Perspectives: Studies of History and Tradition in the Four Gospels, ed. R. T. France and D. Wenham, vol. I (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1980), 225–263; R. Riesner, Jesus als Lehrer: Eine Untersuchung zum Ursprung der Evangelien-Überlieferung, WUNT 2.7 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1981; 4th ed., 1994), 87–96; D. Polkow, "Method and Criteria for Historical Jesus Research," in Society of Biblical Literature 1987 Seminar Papers, ed. K. H. Richards, SBLSP 26 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1987), 336–356; S. McKnight, Interpreting the Synoptic Gospels, Guides to New Testament Exegesis (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1988), 59–69; idem, Jesus and His Death: Historiography, the Historical Jesus, and Atonement Theory (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2005), 42–45; J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 4 vols., ABRL (New York: Doubleday; New Haven: Yale University Press, 1991–2009), 1:167–195, with useful bibliography on pp. 186–187 n. 7; C. A. Evans, Jesus, IBR Bibliographies (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1992), 52–67; idem, Life of Jesus Research: An Annotated Bibliography, rev. ed., NTTS 24 (Leiden: Brill, 1996), 127–146; idem, Jesus and His Contemporaries: Comparative Studies, AGJU 25 (Leiden: Brill, 1995), 13–26 (these three reflect his earlier article, "Authenticity Criteria in Life of Jesus Research," 24 CSR 19 [1989]: 6–31); idem, "Life of Jesus," in Handbook to Exegesis of the New Testament, ed. S. E. Porter, NTTS 25 (Leiden: Brill, 1997), 427–475, esp. 441–446; J. Gnillka, Jesus of Nazareth: Message and History, trans. S. S. Schatzmann (1993; ET: Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1997), 20–22; D. C. Allison, Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet (Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Fortress, 1998), 4–6; J. Becker, Jesus of Nazareth, trans. J. R. Crouch (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1998), 13–15; J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003), 81–83 and passim; idem, A New Perspective on Jesus: What the Quest for the Historical Jesus Missed (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 2005), 65–67; B. Pitre, Jesus, the Tribulation, and the End of the Exile: Restoration Eschatology and the Origin of the Atonement (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 2005), 26–29. This is far from a complete list.

<sup>4</sup> See, e.g., E. Schillebeeckx, Jesus: An Experiment in Christology (1974; ET: New York: Seabury, 1979), 62–100, bibliography 88–90; F. Lentzen-Deis, "Kriterien für die historische Beurteilung der Jesusüberlieferung in den Evangelien," in Rückfrage nach

linguistic and related factors involved in their development are often overlooked, or even dismissed. Those treatments of the criteria that place them within their historical context at least provide the opportunity for diachronic analysis that appreciates the contexts in and out of which the criteria developed.

In many ways, the highpoint in the utilization of the criteria for authenticity can be traced to the rise of German form criticism.<sup>5</sup> The result of such a linkage, as well founded as it is, is that two incongruous results are often put forward. One of these is the linkage of the criteria of authenticity to twentieth-century historical Jesus research, and the other is linkage of the rise of development of criteria to a purported low point in historical Jesus research, often referred to as the “no quest” period.

In response to this formulation, I treat the second result first. Recent historical Jesus research has tended to periodize the quest for the historical Jesus into several distinct epochs. These include: the original or first quest for the historical Jesus (the so-called Leben-Jesu-Forschung) from around 1778–1906, begun by Hermann Reimarus and terminated by Albert Schweitzer’s history of research; the no-quest period from 1906–1953, from the time of Schweitzer until Ernst Käsemann’s lecture delivered before the Marburgers; the new or second quest from 1953–1988, beginning with Käsemann and continuing until N. T. Wright’s pronouncement of a third quest; and the third quest from 1988 to the present, begun with Wright’s pronouncement and continuing to the present.<sup>6</sup> As more and more scholars are recognizing, this periodization of the quest of the historical Jesus is untenable and belied by all of the

---

Jesus, ed. Kertelge, 78–117, esp. 81–93; M. E. Boring, “The Historical-Critical Method’s ‘Criteria of Authenticity’: The Beatitudes in Q and Thomas as a Test Case,” Semeia 44 (1988): 9–44, esp. 9–12, cf. 12 n. 8; G. Theissen and D. Winter, The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria, trans. M. E. Boring (1997; ET: Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002), esp. 1–171; Porter, Criteria, 63–123.

<sup>5</sup> See Porter, Criteria, 56–57. As this essay illustrates, I wish to modify my position somewhat, recognizing that the criteria reached their highpoint in the form-critical period, even though many of them were developed before then.

<sup>6</sup> See Porter, Criteria, 28–62, for discussion of this periodization, often represented in the secondary literature. The major publications are: H. S. Reimarus, Reimarus: Fragments, ed. C. H. Talbert, trans. R. S. Fraser (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1970); A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of Its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede, trans. W. Montgomery (1906; ET: London: A. & C. Black, 1910); E. Käsemann, “The Problem of the Historical Jesus,” in his Essays on New Testament Themes, trans. W. J. Montague, SBT 41 (London: SCM, 1964), 15–47; S. Neill and T. Wright, The Interpretation of the New Testament 1861–1986, 2nd ed. (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988), 379.

pertinent facts.<sup>7</sup> These facts most importantly include the observations that, seeking after Jesus began long before Reimarus and has continued in an unbroken fashion today; if there were such a no quest period as is supposed, it only applied to a small group of German scholars; and rather than quests, there has been continuous writing about Jesus of Nazareth, from different and varied but constant perspectives. The rest of the scholarly world, including those in Britain, France, the Netherlands, the United States and elsewhere, continued to write about and explore the life and teachings of Jesus even during the so-called no-quest period. In fact, the no-quest period was not even an unproductive period for German form-critics of the time, as treatments of Jesus by such worthies as Rudolf Bultmann, K. L. Schmidt and Martin Dibelius so clearly illustrate.<sup>8</sup> Thus, the criteria are not necessarily to be linked to a depressed period in historical Jesus research, but continued to be developed during a time of continued study of Jesus.

In regard to the first result, one must recognize that the criteria are in fact not linked to the development of form criticism for their formulation and inception, but perhaps only for the development of some of the criteria. The standard treatments of the criteria, for example, cite the formulation(s) of Norman Perrin regarding the criterion of double dissimilarity.<sup>9</sup> However, it is important to notice that there were earlier proponents of such a criterion of dissimilarity. These include not only Käsemann and before him Bultmann, who are also cited by some <sup>7</sup> Besides Porter, Criteria, see W. P. Weaver, The Historical Jesus in the Twentieth Century: 1900–1950 (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1999); D. C. Allison, Resurrecting Jesus: The Earliest Christian Tradition and its Interpreters (London: T&T Clark, 2005), 2–4, 23–25; cf. W. O. Walker, “The Quest for the Historical Jesus: A Discussion of Methodology,” ATR 51 (1969): 38–56; R. J. Banks, “Setting ‘The Quest for the Historical Jesus’ in a Broader Framework,” in Gospel Perspectives: Studies of History and Tradition in the Four Gospels, ed. R. T. France and D. Wenham (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1981), 61–82, esp. 61; J. Reumann, “Jesus and Christology,” in The New Testament and Its Modern Interpreters, ed. E. J. Epp and G. W. MacRae (Philadelphia: Fortress 1989), 501–564, esp. 502, 504–505; S. E. Fowl, “Reconstructing and Deconstructing the Quest of the Historical Jesus,” SJT 42 (1989): 319–333; C. Brown, “Historical Jesus, Quest of,” in Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels, ed. J. Green, S. McKnight, and I. H. Marshall (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1992), 326–341, esp. 334–335; T. Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking (Leiden: Brill, 2001), esp. 346–347.

<sup>8</sup> R. Bultmann, Jesus and the Word, trans. L. P. Smith and E. Huntress (1926; ET: New York: Scribners, 1934); K. L. Schmidt, “Jesus Christ,” in Twentieth Century Theology in the Making, vol. 1, Themes of Biblical Theology, ed. J. Pelikan, trans. R. A. Wilson (London: Collins, 1969), 93–168, ET: of RGG III, 2nd ed. (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1929), cols. 110–151; M. Dibelius, Jesus, trans. C. B. Hedrick and F. C. Grant (1939; ET: Philadelphia: Westminster, 1949).

<sup>9</sup> E.g., Evans, Life of Jesus Research, 136; Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 81–82; cf. McKnight, Jesus and his Death, 42–45, who invokes but does not actually cite Perrin. See N. Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus, NTL (London: SCM, 1967), 39–43, esp. 39.

scholars, but before them Wilhelm Heitmüller (Bultmann's teacher), H.J. Holtzmann, Schweitzer (not mentioned by Theissen and Winter), Paul Schmiedel, David Friedrich Strauss, and Reimarus, as far back as Martin Luther.<sup>10</sup> In other words, rather than being a twentieth-century formulation, the criterion of dissimilarity can be traced back through many of the significant figures in historical Jesus research, and even earlier back to the Reformation itself. Similar observations can be made for other criteria that continue to be used. The criterion of Semitic language phenomena—including the issue of the language that Jesus spoke—goes back to the sixteenth century in studies by Johann Widmanstadt and Joseph Scaliger, and continuing forward to the work of Arnold Meyer, Gustaf Dalman, C. F. Burney, C. C. Torrey, Matthew Black, Joachim Jeremias, and more recently Maurice Casey, Bruce Chilton and Craig Evans, among others.<sup>11</sup> Though the criterion of least distinctiveness is usually traced to the first proponents of form criticism—e.g. Schmidt, Dibelius and Bultmann, followed by Vincent Taylor<sup>12</sup>—its origins go back earlier to those who first differentiated folk literature and attempted to characterize it, such as Hermann Gunkel in Old Testament studies, and before him back to the eighteenth century in Homeric studies.<sup>13</sup> The criterion of multiple attestation or the cross-section method was not first developed by German scholarship and in any case preceded the development of form criticism in the work first of F. C. Burkitt.<sup>14</sup> The

<sup>10</sup> All cited, along with others, in Theissen and Winter, Quest, 261–316. See also Schweitzer, Quest, 11, discussed in Porter, “Examining Criteria.”

<sup>11</sup> See Schweitzer, Quest, 270–277; S. E. Porter, Verbal Aspect in the Greek of the New Testament, with Reference to Tense and Mood, SBG 1 (New York: Lang, 1989), 111–112; idem, Criteria, 89–99. See my chapter on Greek Language Criteria in this volume.

<sup>12</sup> See K. L. Schmidt, Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu: Literarkritische Untersuchungen zur ältesten Jesusüberlieferung (Berlin: Trowitzsch, 1919); M. Dibelius, From Tradition to Gospel, trans. B. Woolf (1919; ET: London: Ivor Nicholson & Watson, 1934); R. Bultmann, History of the Synoptic Tradition, trans. J. Marsh (1921; Oxford: Blackwell, 2nd ed., 1968); and V. Taylor, The Formation of the Gospel Tradition (London: Macmillan, 1933).

<sup>13</sup> H. Gunkel, The Legends of Genesis: The Biblical Saga and History, trans. W. H. Carruth (1901; ET: New York: Schocken, 1964). It is interesting to note that around 1900 theories regarding the Iliad and Odyssey being composed of a number of definable “lays” were prominent, derived from the theories of F. A. Wolf (1795) (see R. C. Jebb, “Literature,” in A Companion to Greek Studies, ed. L. Whibley [Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1905], 89–162, esp. 96–97 [note that one of the other proponents of the “lay” hypothesis was Karl Lachmann]). By 1930, such theories had passed out of fashion, so that the two classic epics were considered the work of a single individual (see R. C. Jebb and A. T. Sinclair, “Literature,” in A Companion to Greek Studies, ed. L. Whibley, 4th rev. ed. [Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1930], 117–189, esp. 124–125), a theory that has held sway to the present.

<sup>14</sup> F. C. Burkitt, The Gospel History and Its Transmission (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1906), esp. 147–168.

criterion of embarrassment, though usually attributed to Käsemann, was earlier formulated by Schmiedel.<sup>15</sup> Similarly, composite criteria—whether double similarity (Wright) or historical plausibility (Theissen and Winter)<sup>16</sup>—while perhaps new in their particular formulation, can be seen as originating in the individual criteria that compose them.

3. Use of the Criteria in Other Historical Disciplines

The widespread use of the criteria of authenticity, and their origins throughout the development of biblical studies, including much earlier than the modern study of the historical Jesus, suggests a number of considerations. One is how these criteria relate to the criteria of historical study used in other historical studies of the ancient world. Without pretending to have made a complete study of ancient historiography and its methods, I can say that it appears that one of the major observable facts regarding the criteria of authenticity and their use in historical Jesus research is that they are essentially confined to use within this discipline, rather than finding acceptance outside the field of New Testament studies.<sup>17</sup> In his study of the philosophy of history, William Dray does not introduce the criteria as known in historical Jesus studies, even though they may have been supportive of his anti-positivist stance, and he does mention religious approaches to history.<sup>18</sup> Two treatments of historical method also do not mention the criteria. David Bebbington's analysis of modern historiography, including presentation of five different historical methods, does not invoke the criteria, even though he purports to offer a Christian view of the discipline.<sup>19</sup> In contrast to Bebbington's more British approach to the subject, David Potter offers an American perspective on Roman history, including mention of the gospels.<sup>20</sup> However, he does not mention the criteria of authenticity. In fact, though he does not mention them, several of the criteria seem to

<sup>15</sup> P. W. Schmiedel, "Gospels," in Encyclopaedia Biblica, 4 vols., ed. T. K. Cheyne and J. S. Black (London: A. & C. Black, 1899–1907), II (1901), cols. 1761–1898, esp. 1881–1883.

<sup>16</sup> On these, see below.

<sup>17</sup> One of the best articles on this topic remains A. R. Cross, "Historical Methodology and New Testament Study," Themelios 22.3 (1997): 28–51.

<sup>18</sup> W. Dray, Philosophy of History (New York: Prentice-Hall, 1964); cf. idem, Laws and Explanation in History (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1957).

<sup>19</sup> D. W. Bebbington, Patterns in History: A Christian View (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1979).

<sup>20</sup> D. S. Potter, Literary Texts and the Roman Historian (London: Routledge, 1999), 144–145.

violate the kinds of historians' fallacies that David Fischer has brought to the attention of historians.<sup>21</sup> These include (and some are discussed further below) the criterion of double dissimilarity possibly violating the fallacy of many questions (e.g. by asking two questions at once, begging the question, or framing a complex question that requires a simple answer) or of contradictory questions (e.g. when the two distinctives create an anomaly of a human unsuited to any world);<sup>22</sup> the criterion of least distinctiveness violating the reductive fallacy in demanding a linear approach to the development of literary forms, or generalization;<sup>23</sup> and the Semitic language criterion having potential problems in question framing, including question begging or creating a false dichotomy.<sup>24</sup>

As noted above, however, New Testament scholars have not been the only ones to study Jesus. There have also been secular historians who have undertaken to write about the life of Jesus. What is noteworthy is that their criteria for discussing Jesus often vary significantly from those of the theologians. Three examples I have come across make this point very well. The first treatment is by the well-known classical historian, T. R. Glover. Glover was a trained classical historian whose academic career was spent entirely within this field;<sup>25</sup> nevertheless, he also wrote upon such topics as Paul and Jesus, as well as the development of early Christianity. In his book on Jesus, entitled The Jesus of History,<sup>26</sup> he makes some statements about method in historical research: "There are three canons which may be laid down for the study of any human character, whether of the past or of to-day." Glover says that "They are so simple that it may hardly seem worth while to have stated them; yet they are not always very easy to apply." They are well worth stating, if for no other reason than the contrast they make with criteria in historical Jesus studies. "First of all," he states, "give the man's words his own meaning."<sup>27</sup> He applies this to moderns and ancients. "It is not easy to dissociate the language and the terms of others from the meaning one gives to them oneself; it means intellectual effort and

---

<sup>21</sup> D. H. Fischer, Historians' Fallacies: Toward a Logic of Historical Thought (New York: Harper, 1970).

<sup>22</sup> Ibid., 8, 34.

<sup>23</sup> Ibid., 172–175.

<sup>24</sup> Ibid., 8–12.

<sup>25</sup> See the biography by H. G. Wood, Terrot Reaveley Glover: A Biography (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1953).

<sup>26</sup> T. R. Glover, The Jesus of History (London: SCM, 1917). My copy is from 1931, by which time 110,000 had been printed.

<sup>27</sup> Ibid., 18.

intellectual discipline, a training of a strenuous kind in sympathy and tenderness; but if we are to be fair, it must be done.”<sup>28</sup> This statement is predicated upon Glover’s view of how to handle ancient sources. He says that “the distinction between Christian and secular writers is not one that will weigh much with a serious historian. Until we have reason to distinguish between book and book, the evidence must be treated on exactly the same principles. To say abruptly that, because Luke was a Christian and Suetonius a pagan, Luke is not worthy of the credence given to Suetonius, is a line of approach that will most commend itself to those who have read neither author.”<sup>29</sup> We see already a difference in emphasis between Glover and the studies of others. “The second canon is: Make sure of the experience behind the thought.”<sup>30</sup> Concerning Jesus, he says we must ask the question “What is the experience that leads Jesus to speak as he does, to think as he does?” For Glover this is “What has he found in God? what relations has he with God? what does he expect of God? what is God to him?”<sup>31</sup> There is no mention of Judaism, Hellenism, Greek or Roman thought in Glover’s analysis. “The third canon will be: Ask of what type and of what dimensions the nature must be, that is capable of that experience and of that language.”<sup>32</sup> Here Glover pushes the interpreter to look behind the account to the person who motivated it. Glover’s approach points to the fact that much contemporary historical Jesus study is less about Jesus than it is about the environment in which he lived. It is not a study in the life of a person, but in the examination of purported teachings and events interpreted in the light of their internal and external relations with each other, and within a restrictive environment in which they purportedly occurred. There is a clear favoring of one particular kind of environment for comparison, one that is clearly related to theological criteria for exploration, both in terms of distinguishing Jesus from Judaism and the early church, that is, his contemporaries and his followers, without as much regard for Jesus as the historical person who lived, acted and spoke within the ancient world.

A second classical scholar is Robin Lane Fox. In his The Unauthorized Version,<sup>33</sup> Lane Fox analyzes the entire Bible, and as a result makes

---

<sup>28</sup> Glover, Jesus, 19.

<sup>29</sup> Ibid., 17.

<sup>30</sup> Ibid., 19.

<sup>31</sup> Ibid., 20.

<sup>32</sup> Ibid., 20.

<sup>33</sup> Robin Lane Fox, Truth and Fiction in the Bible (New York: Knopf, 1992).

comments on the New Testament, and in particular the gospels and their accounts of Jesus. Besides the fact that he arrives at what would be seen by New Testament scholars as unorthodox or at least unusual conclusions,<sup>34</sup> Lane Fox utilizes a method for analysis that is untypical for historical Jesus studies but fully at home within classical studies. Lane Fox is less explicit about his criteria for historical discovery than is Glover, instead utilizing a method that is much more positively inclined. When he is discussing details in John's gospel, Lane Fox notes that "until he [i.e. John's gospel] is disproved, I am content to assume that his assumption here [regarding entering Pilate's residence] was correct."<sup>35</sup> Concerning Jesus' trial, Lane Fox establishes a "secure minimum" on the basis of the actions depicted in the gospels on which they all agree. Then he builds upon this minimum: "We can compare the four Gospels' accounts and give particular credit to facts or sayings on which agreement is most significant: one interesting test is also to look for agreements between the Gospels which are otherwise the least closely related, John and Luke, for instance, or even John and Matthew. Another method is to compare the 'secure minimum' with our knowledge of other 'criminals' who confronted Romans in Judaea before the war of 68–70," such as Josephus.<sup>36</sup> Lane Fox's method of proceeding, rather than being minimalistic and attempting to work the material down to an established core works in the other direction. He finds a means of establishing a secure minimum and then builds positively from this to a fuller account. If anything, this resembles the criterion of coherence, but Lane Fox, to my knowledge, does not use this terminology. Instead, he is much more reliant upon placing the New Testament material within its larger cultural and historical context, with the gospel sources being used as one would use other ancient texts.

A third classical scholar to consider is Michael Grant. After writing on a wide range of topics regarding the ancient world, it was inevitable that he would write a book on Jesus.<sup>37</sup> In an appendix on what he calls "Attitudes to the Evidence," he recognizes some of the difficulties in study of Jesus and the gospels—but has important words of advice for New Testament scholars. He states that "The extraction

---

<sup>34</sup> E.g., Lane Fox believes that John's gospel was written by the "disciple whom Jesus loved" and "is historically the most valuable" of the gospels. See Lane Fox, Unauthorized Version, 205.

<sup>35</sup> Ibid., 206.

<sup>36</sup> Ibid., 268.

<sup>37</sup> M. Grant, Jesus: An Historian's Review of the Gospels (New York: Scribners, 1977).

from the gospels of evidence about the life and career of Jesus is a singularly difficult, delicate process.” He emphasizes the need to develop method apart from direct work on the gospels: “Students of the New Testament, it has been suggested, would be well advised to study other, pagan fields of ancient history first—because they are easier! For the study of the highly idiosyncratic gospels requires that all the normal techniques of the historian should be supplemented by a mass of other disciplines, though this is a counsel of perfection which few students, if any, can even begin to meet.”<sup>38</sup> Grant gives a short synopsis of the kind of method that he envisions for the study of documents such as the gospels: “When, for example, one tries to build up facts from the accounts of pagan historians, judgment often has to be given not in the light of any external confirmation—which is sometimes, but by no means always, available—but on the basis of historical deductions and arguments which attain nothing better than probability. The same applies to the gospels. Their contents need not be assumed fictitious until they are proved authentic. But they have to be subjected to the usual standards of historical persuasiveness.”<sup>39</sup> Grant’s comments are noticeably consistent with those of Glover and Lane Fox, in which there is an acknowledgment of taking the religious and secular sources on the same level, judging the material in terms of its persuasiveness, and assessing words and events in terms of probabilities.

Grant then evaluates some of the traditional criteria usually used in gospel studies. Besides his placing this discussion in an appendix at the end of the book, what is interesting to note is first his beginning with the traditional criteria of authenticity, but then his move to a set of criteria that seek to find continuity and consistency, and that are in fact quite different from those of the traditional criteria. In a way, Grant’s criteria emerge out of, only to depart from, the standard criteria. Multiple attestation he dismisses as “valueless since the evangelists demonstrably shared so much material from common sources.” The related criterion of “multiple forms” he similarly labels as “not very decisive,” since stories can be traced to a single source.<sup>40</sup> He does not mention double dissimilarity, but does accept that the criterion that rejects “all material which seems to be derived from the days of the Christian Church as it existed after his death” qualifies as the “prin-

---

<sup>38</sup> Grant, Jesus, 197.

<sup>39</sup> Ibid., 201.

<sup>40</sup> Ibid., 201.

cial valid method of research.”<sup>41</sup> He interprets this criterion in terms of what he calls “surprises,” which sounds more like the criterion of embarrassment. However, what investigation of Jesus really boils down to for Grant, like Glover, is the character of Jesus and how it stands out from his environment: “the personality that emerges is so forceful and individual and satisfying” and it “conflicts” with what one might have expected the church to produce.<sup>42</sup> Grant cites Moule, who states that what comes through the gospel tradition “without exception” is a “remarkably firmly-drawn portrait of an attractive young man moving freely about among women of all sorts, including the decidedly disreputable, without a trace of sentimentality, unnaturalness, or prudery, and yet, at every point, maintaining a simple integrity of character.”<sup>43</sup> For Grant, the study is really about Jesus, and who he is. Grant thus concludes that “The consistency, therefore, of the tradition in their pages suggests that the picture they present is largely authentic.”<sup>44</sup> This is a radically different conclusion than the one often drawn by historical Jesus scholars. Nevertheless, it is one that gives credence to the primary sources and focuses upon the major historical character.

One of the constants that emerges from this discussion is the need for historians to create a coherent narrative about Jesus, one that integrates the various elements of his words and deeds into a communicative portrait. These historians are in effect arguing for what Harris has called an “integrationist perspective” to history, in which “words are neither labels for things nor labels for ideas, but integrated components of creative communicational endeavours.”<sup>45</sup> This would appear to offer the type of linguistic basis for successful historical writing, and a test against which the criteria invoked might be evaluated.

4. Critical Periods in Treatment of the Criteria

In a section above, we discussed the development of the criteria, and noted that their development does not follow the pattern typically used to describe them as originating with form criticism. Like the history

---

<sup>41</sup> Grant, Jesus, 202.

<sup>42</sup> Ibid., 203.

<sup>43</sup> C. F. D. Moule, The Phenomenon of the New Testament (London: SCM, 1967), 63–65.

<sup>44</sup> Grant, Jesus, 204.

<sup>45</sup> R. Harris, The Linguistics of History (Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 2004), 170. See my appropriation of Harris in Porter, “Methodological Reflections.”

of development, the history of discussion of the criteria of authenticity has progressed in various ways. One can see that there are at least four significant critical periods in treatment of the criteria by scholars.

The first period includes the time during which most of the criteria were developed. As noted above, a number of criteria were developed independently and individually. Perhaps the oldest in widespread and continuous use was various forms of the criterion of dissimilarity, which goes back at least to the time of Luther, and was used in various forms by many of the major figures in historical Jesus research, such as Reimarus, Strauss, Schweitzer, Bultmann, Käsemann and others, up to the present. Other criteria developed independently as well. These include: the criterion of Semitic language and features, which dates to the sixteenth century, but saw increased development in the nineteenth and into the twentieth century, with such figures as Meyer, Dalman, Burney, Black and Jeremias, up to the present; the criterion of least distinctiveness, which dates back to classical and especially Homeric, and then Old Testament, studies before entering New Testament studies with the form critics such as Schmidt, Dibelius, Bultmann, and Taylor; the criterion of embarrassment, which dates back to Schmiedel at the turn of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, and continues through Käsemann to the present; the criterion of multiple attestation or independent traditions, which was formulated near the beginning of the twentieth century by Burkitt and developed further by Dodd; the criterion of coherence or consistency, which dates to the rise of form criticism with such scholars as Bultmann.

Whereas the development of these criteria seems to have proceeded independently at first, the next stage in their development seems to have been the conscious use of multiple methods by a number of scholars. For example, Schmiedel linked both what we would now call the criteria of dissimilarity and embarrassment through his definition of nine "foundation-pillars for a truly scientific Life of Jesus," pillars which were unlikely to have been created by the post-Easter church (thus both were dissimilar and potentially embarrassing to it).<sup>46</sup> Bultmann included at least three criteria in his treatment of the synoptic tradition: the criterion of least distinctiveness with regard to the literary forms,

---

<sup>46</sup> Schmiedel, "Gospels," col. 1881; cf. cols. 1881–1883: about Jesus in general: Mark 10:17–18; Matt 12:31–32; Mark 3:21; Mark 13:32; Mark 15:34 = Matt 27:46; on Jesus' miracles: Mark 8:12 = Matt 12:38 = Luke 11:29; Mark 6:5–6; Mark 8:14–21; Matt 11:5 = Luke 7:22. See also P. W. Schmiedel, The Johannine Writings, trans. M. A. Canney (London: A. & C. Black, 1908), 25–30.

the criterion of dissimilarity in terms of the similitudes of Jesus, and the criterion of coherence or consistency with regard to Jesus' logia and his eschatological perspective<sup>47</sup>—though not together in one place. Käsemann directly linked the use of the criterion of dissimilarity and of embarrassment:

In only one case do we have more or less ground under our feet: [1] when there are no grounds either for deriving a tradition from Judaism or for ascribing it to primitive Christianity, and [2] especially when Jewish Christianity has mitigated or modified the received tradition, as having found it too bold for its taste.<sup>48</sup>

Perrin brought together multiple attestation and coherence, and then the criterion of dissimilarity at the end of the process of reconstructing the tradition history of Jesus.<sup>49</sup>

The third stage in developing the criteria was that of amalgamating and sifting. During this time many of the standard synoptic treatments of the criteria were produced, most of them attempts at bringing as many of the criteria together as possible into a definitive, if not necessarily coordinated list. A number of these treatments of the criteria—e.g. Walker, McEleney, Stein, Boring, Meier (five credible and five dubious) and Evans—had essentially ten criteria each.<sup>50</sup> However, there were other numbers as well. Barbour had four, McKnight had six, Evans had six, eight (six credible and two dubious) or nine criteria, depending on the treatment, Schillebeeckx had nine (five credible and four invalid); Calvert had eleven, and Polkow in his treatment began with a grand total of twenty-five criteria, from which he narrowed this list down to three primary and three secondary criteria (besides two preliminary).<sup>51</sup> One can see that there is some agreement among scholars, but still room for debate.

In an attempt to sort through some of this, as a part of the third stage, the process of determining primary and secondary criteria was developed by a number of scholars. Some of those worth noting are as

<sup>47</sup> Bultmann, Synoptic Tradition, 6, 205, 105.

<sup>48</sup> Käsemann, "Problem," 36–37.

<sup>49</sup> Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus, 15–49.

<sup>50</sup> Walker, "Quest," 38–56; McEleney, "Authenticating Criteria," 431–460; Stein, "Criteria," 225–263; Boring, "Historical-Critical Method's 'Criteria of Authenticity,'" 9–12; Meier, Marginal Jew I, 167–195; Evans, Jesus, 52–67.

<sup>51</sup> Barbour, Traditio-Historical Criticism, 3–5; McKnight, Interpreting the Synoptic Gospels, 59–69; Evans, "Life of Jesus," 441–446; idem, Jesus and His Contemporaries, 13–26; idem, Life of Jesus Research, 127–146; Schillebeeckx, Jesus, 88–100; Calvert, "Examination," 209–219; Polkow, "Method," 336–356.

follows. Schillebeeckx decided for the following five: (1) embarrassment or against the redactional tendency (traditions included “willy-nilly”), (2) double dissimilarity (dual irreducibility); (3) multiple attestation or cross-section; (4) coherence or consistency; and (5) Jesus’ execution.<sup>52</sup> Polkow arrived at three primary—(1) dissimilarity, (2) coherence, and (3) multiple attestation—and three secondary—(4) Palestinian context, (5) style (Semitic features) and (6) scholarly consensus.<sup>53</sup> Meier determines that there are five primary criteria: (1) embarrassment, (2) dissimilarity (discontinuity), (3) multiple attestation, (4) coherence, and (5) rejection and execution.<sup>54</sup> Evans, finally, notes six criteria: (1) historical coherence (Jesus’ rejection and execution), (2) multiple attestation, (3) embarrassment, (4) dissimilarity, (5) Semitisms and Palestinian background, and (6) coherence.<sup>55</sup> The sifting and sorting indicate that there are a number of criteria that are open for discussion. However, it is also significant to note that only three criteria are found in all four of these lists—(1) dissimilarity, (2) multiple attestation, and (3) coherence.<sup>56</sup> It is also significant to note that a number of criteria that are often invoked in historical Jesus research, even by some of the scholars most deeply involved in the discussion, do not make this essential list.<sup>57</sup>

A fourth stage is what in effect amounts to a reconceptualizing of the criteria from the negative orientation of previous study to what is at least an attempt at a more positive formulation. Wright formulates what he calls the criterion of “double similarity”: “when something can be seen to be credible (though perhaps deeply subversive) within first-century Judaism, and credible as the implied starting point (though not the exact replica) of something in later Christianity.”<sup>58</sup> Wright

<sup>52</sup> Schillebeeckx, Jesus, 88–98. I use language more familiar to recent discussion, but include his language in parentheses. The invalid criteria are: (1) linguistic or cultural context (i.e., Semitic language and environmental features); (2) distinctive character of the parables; (3) formulae, such as “truly, truly,” etc.; and (4) use of Abba (98–100).

<sup>53</sup> Polkow, “Method,” 346–355. He also has two preliminary criteria: discounting redaction and discounting tradition (342–346).

<sup>54</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew I, 168–177. He renders as secondary or dubious: (1) traces of Aramaic, (2) Palestinian environment, (3) vividness of narration, (4) developing synoptic tradition (least distinctiveness), and (5) historical presumption (178–183).

<sup>55</sup> Evans, Jesus and His Contemporaries, 13–24. He labels the following as dubious: (1) least distinctive features, and (2) proleptic eschatology (14–25).

<sup>56</sup> These are the three criteria that Theissen and Merz say that historical Jesus research has “orientated itself on” (G. Theissen and A. Merz, The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide, trans. J. Bowden [London: SCM, 1998], 115).

<sup>57</sup> Perhaps most noteworthy are: Semitic language features (see my chapter on Greek Language Criteria in this volume for further discussion), and least distinctiveness in terms of literary forms.

<sup>58</sup> N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1996), 131–133, at 132.

defines this complex criterion in terms of answering five “questions”: (1) “Jesus fits believably into first-century Judaism”; (2) his purpose is one of “regrouping Israel”; (3) he will draw “hostility” for his actions “from the Temple authorities,” but if “the Romans hear of a major renewal movement among the Jews, they too will want to stamp it out”; (4) Jesus’ vindication indicates the arrival of the kingdom; and (5) the story is told in “theologically consistent” terms.<sup>59</sup> Though Wright attempts to recast his double criterion in terms of a positive outcome, it is predicated upon knowing and recognizing dissimilarity—being subversive in relation to first-century Judaism and not being a replica of the early church. Even his five questions imply dissimilarity in at least three of them. Theissen and Winter, similarly, have created what they call the “criterion of historical plausibility.” This criterion consists of what they term “four partial criteria,” one set of factors revolving around coherence/agreement and incoherence/disagreement, and the other around plausibility of influence and context. Thus their four-fold criterion includes: (1) “plausible coherence of influence,” (2) “plausible influence contrary to the tendency,” (3) “correspondence of context,” and (4) “individuality of context.”<sup>60</sup> Theissen and Winter acknowledge drawing upon criteria of multiple attestation and resistance to the tradition (a form of the criterion of coherence) in formulating their criterion of historical plausibility.<sup>61</sup> Thus in these reformulations, Wright’s is simply a toned-down form of the criterion of double dissimilarity, in which he attempts to mediate degrees of difference and similarity. Theissen and Winter are similar in their conception of a set of criteria that mediate the criterion of dissimilarity by introducing multiple attestation and a form of the criterion of coherence. Thus, even in these reformulations the three criteria mentioned above continue to exert their influence.

5. Assessment of the Criteria Used in Current Historical Jesus Research

This concluding section assesses the most prominent criteria that are currently in use in historical Jesus research, although it is beyond the scope of this treatment to engage in widespread and detailed comment. Assessment as the concept is used here has at least two senses. One is in terms of assessing the place that a given criterion occupies within historical Jesus research in relation to the other criteria; another is assessing the criterion itself in terms of its being a valid criterion.

<sup>59</sup> Wright, Jesus, 132.

<sup>60</sup> Theissen and Winter, Quest, 172–201, for initial definition. I use the summary found in Theissen and Merz, Historical Jesus, 116–118, esp. 118 for quotations.

<sup>61</sup> See ibid., 116–117. See also S. E. Porter, Review of The Quest for the Plausible Jesus, JETS 47.3 (2004): 507–510, esp. 509–510.

Concerning the first, as noted above, there has been a lengthy development and refining process of the criteria of authenticity in historical Jesus research. If there are as many as twenty-five criteria that have been suggested (as Polkow derives on the basis of study of a number of predecessors), then one of the major developments within historical Jesus research is that of narrowing down and refining the criteria that are used. Three criteria have emerged as predominant: (a) dissimilarity, (b) multiple attestation and (c) coherence or consistency. There are several immediate implications of these results. One of the major implications is that the other criteria have not found anything close to universal acceptance. This means that criteria such as embarrassment, Jesus' arrest and execution, and especially Semitic language and context criteria, among potentially many others, have not commanded anything like widespread assent. A second is that even the attempts at reformulation of the criteria have not necessarily fared any better in devising criteria that command widespread acceptance—especially as they are dependent upon the previously developed criteria, including and most especially the three criteria noted above.

The second sense of assessment raises the question of the individual validity of each of the three criteria that have emerged as supposedly the most useful, in the light of what has been discussed above. I offer brief comments that summarize previous scholarly discussion.<sup>62</sup>

5.1. Criterion of Dissimilarity<sup>63</sup>

The criterion of dissimilarity originated with the attempt to distinguish authentic material because of its difference from either the developing church or early Judaism. It eventually became associated with double dissimilarity, that is, difference from both the early church and Judaism. The negative nature of the criterion, however, means that some continue to use it only in a singular form, in particular, dissimilarity to the early church, since similarity of Jesus to the Judaism of his day is thought by some as a necessary assumption to have a plausible and understandable Jesus.<sup>64</sup>

---

<sup>62</sup> That scholarly discussion is found in a variety of places, including the works noted above, especially in notes 1, 2, and 3. I refer below to my treatment in Criteria. However, my articles, "Examining Criteria" and "Methodological Reflections," contain further developments of my thought on the various criteria.

<sup>63</sup> See Porter, Criteria, 70–76.

This criterion has been criticized on a number of fronts. (1) This is a negative criterion in that it does not suggest authentic material but simply fails to endorse material by comparison to the early church and Judaism. In this sense, if the purpose of history is that of providing a narrative accounting of the past, which is done by creating an integrated scenario of communicative episodes, as Harris endorses, then the criterion of double dissimilarity—and single dissimilarity also—constitutes at best a highly limited method for gathering evidence and providing a sufficient basis for such an account, but is at worst completely misleading in its depiction. Further, this criterion cannot be used negatively, that is, a saying or event is not proven to be inauthentic by failure to be endorsed by this criterion. These are only some of the logical problems suggested for this criterion.<sup>65</sup> (2) This criterion addresses generic words and actions, rather than specific words and actions, because the point of comparison is what is known of the early church and Judaism. Hence this criterion also ends up equivocating over the meaning of the notion of dissimilar, and disputes degrees of difference, rather than differences in kind. (3) This criterion depends upon exhaustive—and some would argue currently inadequate—knowledge of the early church and Judaism. (4) The criterion fails to address how Jesus related to the Greco-Roman world of the time, confining itself to Judaism and the early church. (5) The minimalist Jesus that is delimited by this criterion is not a representative Jesus meaningfully related to either Judaism or the early church, but is one who verges on being incomprehensible and unintelligible in his environment, in part because there is too little of him. (6) This criterion is, ironically, a form of Christian dogmatics in the guise of objectivity, because it posits the uniqueness, originality and difference of Jesus.<sup>66</sup> (7) This criterion adds nothing in its dual form concerning Judaism, and may in fact have little to nothing to do

---

<sup>64</sup> E.g., B. F. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus (London: SCM, 1979), 86.

<sup>65</sup> On the logical problems of this criterion, see T. Holmén, “Doubts about Double Dissimilarity: Restructuring the Main Criterion of Jesus-of-History Research,” in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTTS 28.1 (Leiden: Brill, 1998), 47–80, esp. 54–56.

<sup>66</sup> Theissen and Merz, Historical Jesus, 115.

with the question of authenticity itself.<sup>67</sup> (8) This positivistic criterion commits the fallacies of what Fischer calls “many questions,” or, perhaps even more likely, “contradictory questions,” as noted above.<sup>68</sup>

5.2. Criterion of Multiple Attestation or Cross-Section Method<sup>69</sup>

This criterion, developed first outside the bounds of German form criticism, takes two forms. One is in terms of multiply attested independent traditions (Burkitt), and the other is in terms of multiple forms (such as aphorisms, parables, dialogues, miracle stories, poetical sayings, and the like; Dodd).<sup>70</sup>

This criterion, though widely used, has also garnered criticism. (1) This criterion has the major problem of defining what constitutes a source or independent form. The usual sources of historical investigation constitute integral sources in their own right, but in historical Jesus research the sources are sub-sources within larger sources. (2) As a result, the criterion may be subject to question begging as one posits independent sources for the purpose of attestation. (3) This criterion is better at indicating general events and the content of sayings than it is in determining what was actually done or said on a given occasion, because there may be discrepancies between episodes within the sources. (4) There is the question of defining the amount of difference between sources in order to determine whether a given episode or saying constitutes the same one as another. (5) This criterion is often linked to a particular theory of gospel origins, usually with Mark as the first gospel and the others in some way related to it. As long as this is accepted as a working assumption, the criterion may be invoked, but if this assumption is not held the criterion is left without a foundational basis. Even with an agreed theory of gospel origins, however, there are disputes over what constitute sources and their relations, and whether these can be used to establish multiple attestation. (6) Multiple attestation can indicate an earlier source, but it cannot necessarily indicate authenticity, by definition, as the common source is simply an earlier source, not the earliest.

<sup>67</sup> Holmén, “Doubts,” esp. 74–78.

<sup>68</sup> Fischer, Historians' Fallacies, 8, 34.

<sup>69</sup> Porter, Criteria, 82–89.

<sup>70</sup> See C. H. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom (London: Nisbet, 1935), 26–29; idem, History and the Gospel (London: Nisbet, 1938), 91–102, although he attributes the method to E. Hoskyns and N. Davey, The Riddle of the New Testament (London: Faber & Faber, 1931), 162–207.

Therefore, this criterion is dependent upon other criteria to determine whether an earlier source is authentic.<sup>71</sup>

5.3. Criterion of Coherence or Consistency<sup>72</sup>

The criterion of coherence or consistency probably refers to two closely related notions, the one being coherence and the other consistency. Nevertheless, they are usually used without differentiation. The criterion appears to go back to the early days of form criticism, and claims that material that coheres with other authentic material is itself authentic.

This criterion continues to be widely used, but is subject to a number of shortcomings. (1) This is not a criterion of authenticity, but is a derivative criterion that depends on other criteria of authenticity, as it cannot establish authenticity independent of a coherent or consistent relationship. (2) This criterion, as a result, functions in relation to the criterion of dissimilarity, and hence is subject to some of the same strictures noted above.<sup>73</sup> (3) The use of this criterion invokes difficulty in defining what constitutes coherence or consistency, and how much legitimate variation is allowed before two episodes or statements no longer cohere. One could well argue that coherence demands that all material in the gospels be accepted, because they were placed in the gospels by an author/redactor who believed that the material, at least on some level, was coherent. (4) This criterion can be applied to non-historical sources as well as historical ones, and thus provides no differentiation between authentic and inauthentic material. Fictional texts may be expected to be at least as coherent or consistent as non-fictional texts.

6. Conclusion

The criteria of authenticity will probably continue to be widely used in historical Jesus research. In the light of what has been said above, whether this should be the case or not is a highly debatable point. There are a number of factors that indicate that the criteria are not as firm as is sometimes indicated in reading various treatments of the historical Jesus. These factors include the observation that these criteria are

---

<sup>71</sup> Theissen and Merz, Historical Jesus, 115.

<sup>72</sup> Porter, Criteria, 79–82.

<sup>73</sup> Theissen and Merz, Historical Jesus, 115.

particular and peculiar to historical Jesus study. This is not a problem in and of itself, except that it puts the discipline at odds with other historical disciplines with common goals and objectives. More attention perhaps ought to be given to developing historical methods that are at least on similar conceptual platforms with other ancient studies disciplines. Another factor is that there is a range of discussion of the criteria, but that only three criteria appear to be at the heart of most treatments. Much interpretive weight is being put on these criteria, and therefore further scrutiny is in order to ensure that they are able to deliver the results that are demanded of them. A third observation is that the three major criteria that have emerged in recent discussion are not necessarily coordinated with each other. They are thus unable to deliver the kinds of results that are consistent with each other and that deliver the necessary results for establishing a firm foundation for historical Jesus research.

ALTERNATIVES TO FORM AND TRADITION CRITICISM IN JESUS RESEARCH

TOBIAS NICKLAS

The birth of a critical awareness of the problems involved in research into the historical Jesus in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries<sup>1</sup> necessarily entailed the discussion of the criteria which make it possible to construct a reliable picture of the “historical Jesus” that is as “objective” and methodologically viable as possible. Much of twentieth-century Jesus research found a central point of reference (viewed either positively or negatively) in the criterion of difference or dissimilarity, the “critical principle of selection” which was formulated on the basis of German form and tradition criticism by Ernst Käsemann in his debate with Rudolf Bultmann. In his lecture on the “Problem of the Historical Jesus,” which has become a “classic” text, Käsemann said:<sup>2</sup>

We have fairly certain ground under our feet only in one single case: when, for whatever reasons, a tradition can neither be derived from Judaism nor ascribed to earliest Christianity, especially when Jewish Christianity found the tradition which it had taken over to be excessively audacious and either toned it down or altered the point.

Scholars believed that the application of this criterion would make it possible to discern a minimal amount of “genuine” tradition about Jesus, around which one could then group other elements of the Jesus

---

<sup>1</sup> Important names here are H. S. Reimarus (1694–1768) and D. F. Strauß (1808–1874). On the methodological approaches of these two scholars and for further information, cf., e.g., G. Theissen and A. Merz, Der historische Jesus: Ein Lehrbuch (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1996), 22–24. In his historical review, J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered, Christianity in the Making 1 (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003), 17–24, begins as early as the Renaissance.

<sup>2</sup> This lecture was held in 1953 and published in the following year: E. Käsemann, “Das Problem des historischen Jesus,” ZThK 51 (1954): 125–153, here 144; cf. also idem, Exegetische Versuche und Besinnungen 1 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1964), 187–214. One of the best known formulations of the criterion in English is by N. Perin, What is Redaction Criticism? (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969), 71: “Material may be ascribed to Jesus only if it can be shown to be distinctive to him, which usually will mean dissimilar to known tendencies in Judaism before him or the church after him.”

tradition as historically reliable, with the help of further criteria such as the “criterion of coherence.” At least from the perspective of German-speaking research, it can be affirmed that Käsemann’s ideas prompted a flood of studies of the “historical Jesus.”<sup>3</sup> But I believe that the criterion of dissimilarity has made a wider impact on the investigation of the historical Jesus, and that it profoundly influences the “third phase” too, since a great deal of the new work can be seen, if one so chooses, as a countermovement to the criterion of dissimilarity.<sup>4</sup> Käsemann emphasizes the singularity of the figure of Jesus of Nazareth, which he distinguishes from the traditions about ancient Judaism and earliest Christianity (and above all from Jewish Christianity, which is implicitly disqualified in this context)—this, however, ultimately means that this figure loses all historical relevance.<sup>5</sup> To a large extent, we can understand the driving force behind the “Third Quest” as the recognition that the historical Jesus can be grasped only as a part of his own world, i.e. as a man embedded in the history of Jewish and Christian tradition.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>3</sup> Historians of research tend to call this phase the New Quest, after the No Quest phase which began with the collapse of Leben-Jesu-Forschung. On this, cf., e.g., N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1996), 21–25. For a critical view of the customary division into historical phases, cf. S. E. Porter, The Criteria for Authenticity in Historical-Jesus Research: Previous Discussion and New Proposals, JSNTSup 91 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), 28–62.

<sup>4</sup> A critical analysis and discussion of the criterion of dissimilarity can be found in a large number of recent publications. Cf., e.g., T. Holmén, “Doubts about Double Dissimilarity: Restructuring the Main Criterion of Jesus-of-History Research,” in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTTS 28.1 (Leiden: Brill, 1998), 47–80; D. S. du Toit, “Der unähnliche Jesus: Eine kritische Evaluierung der Entstehung des Differenzkriteriums und seiner geschichts- und erkenntnistheoretischen Voraussetzungen,” in Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. J. Schröter and R. Brucker, BZNW 114 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002), 89–129 (with bibliography). The development of this theme by G. Theissen and D. Winter against the background of questions of social history is very important: Die Kriterienfrage in der Jesusforschung: Vom Differenzkriterium zum Plausibilitätskriterium, NTOA 34 (Freiburg: Universitätsverlag; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997) (with a detailed overview of the history of research).

<sup>5</sup> As long ago as 1974, F. Mußner, “Methodologie der Frage nach dem historischen Jesus,” in Jesus von Nazareth im Umfeld Israels und der Urkirche, WUNT 111 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1999), 13–42, wrote: “We must note that a human being acquires his own profile not only by distinguishing himself from the surrounding world, but also by identifying with this world” (27). The same point is made even more clearly by M. Ebner, Jesus von Nazaret in seiner Zeit: Sozialgeschichtliche Zugänge, SBS 196 (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 2003), 17: “When the criterion of dissimilarity is applied, we discern the outlines of an historical Jesus who made by definition no abiding impact on earliest Christianity—and who appears to have no roots in Judaism.”

<sup>6</sup> A good example here is the development of the so-called “criterion of plausibility” by Theissen and Winter, Kriterienfrage.

Attempts are made on various levels today to “re”-construct this world: the numerous approaches by means of social history, the dialogue with the results of archaeological investigations, the embedding of Jesus in Judaism and in the Hellenism of his time, are all attempts to do this.<sup>7</sup> This means that although the two phases of research tackle the problem in an antithetical manner, they ultimately have one thing in common: they are concerned to evaluate traditions about Jesus of Nazareth which are linked to the Jewish and Christian history of tradition (whether they seek to distinguish him from this tradition, or to integrate him into it). Besides this, irrespective of the particular phases in the history of research, the criteria of “coherence” and of “multiple attestation” continue to play an enormous role in the quest for the historical Jesus. Both are closely connected with questions about the history of tradition:

First, the “criterion of coherence” presupposes the existence of a certain amount of Jesus tradition, which is regarded as authentic on the basis of other criteria (especially that of dissimilarity). Other material which can be judged consistent with the authentic material can likewise be accepted as authentic.<sup>8</sup>

Secondly, where affirmations about words or deeds of Jesus of Nazareth are made in mutually independent sources in a similar or closely comparable manner, it is highly probable that these sources have recourse to old traditions. The more numerous and older these independent traditions (handed on in as great a variety of forms as possible) are,<sup>9</sup> the more likely it is that the affirmations genuinely contain authentic material about the historical Jesus. We need not discuss in detail the

---

<sup>7</sup> G. Theissen and A. Merz offer an impressive sketch of the trajectories linking social-historical questioning and the classic skepticism of form and tradition criticism: “Der umstrittene historische Jesus. Oder: Wie historisch ist der historische Jesus?” in Theissen and Merz, Jesus als historische Gestalt: Beiträge zur Jesusforschung, FRLANT 202 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2003), 3–32, esp. 8–9.

<sup>8</sup> On this, cf. the classic formulation by N. Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (London: SCM, 1967), 43: “Material which is consistent with, or coheres with, material established as authentic by other means may also be accepted.” This criterion must not be applied negatively. Its implicit assumption that all the deeds and words of an historical person must display an inner coherence is problematic, since this is contradicted by the possibility of the inner development of a personality and above all by the idea that identity and personality do not necessarily exclude contradictory and incoherent elements.

<sup>9</sup> C. H. Dodd was the first to point out the significance of the transmission in a variety of forms: History and Gospel (New York: Scribners, 1937), 91–101. Dodd constructed a specific criterion on this basis, but this is usually applied in connection with the “criterion of multiple attestation.”

methodological problems of this criterion, which has the potential to uncover the salient features which run through the activity of the historical Jesus (e.g. his concern for the societal outsiders) and which can supply arguments for the authenticity of specific logia of Jesus (down to the details of vocabulary) which may be stronger than those supplied by other criteria. Let me only mention that this criterion is obliged to build upon literary hypotheses and reconstructions of sources. The least disputed of these is the synoptic question; but in many fields, there is no general consensus among scholars.<sup>10</sup>

In both phases, therefore, the investigation and evaluation of the history of tradition is a central anchor in the quest for the historical Jesus. It is around this that the historical constructions are made. This, however, becomes a problem once it is recognized that the attempt to go behind an existing form of written texts to inquire about their development within the tradition (and from there, to evaluate stages of tradition which one has established as a working hypothesis) is extremely problematic from a methodological point of view.<sup>11</sup> This naturally prompts the question whether one is fully justified in speaking of alternatives to form and tradition criticism in the quest for the historical Jesus, since at any rate the most important of the criteria which scholars discuss in this quest are more or less closely connected to the questions posed by tradition criticism.<sup>12</sup> However, other dimensions of methodological work should certainly not be neglected.

---

<sup>10</sup> For example, the question of the literary relationship of the apocryphal Gospel of Thomas to the canonical gospels remains a matter of intense debate. On the problems which arise in this context, cf., e.g., T. Nicklas, "Fragmente christlicher Apokryphen und die Textgeschichte des Neuen Testaments," ZNW 96 (2005): 129–142. Nor is any consensus in sight in the question of the literary relationship between John and the synoptics. For a detailed overview, cf. M. Labahn and M. Lang, "Johannes und die Synoptiker: Positionen und Impulse seit 1990," in Kontexte des Johannesevangeliums: Das vierte Evangelium in religions- und traditionsgeschichtlicher Perspektive, ed. J. Frey and U. Schnelle, WUNT 175 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2004), 443–515.

<sup>11</sup> T. Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, BIS 55 (Leiden: Brill, 2001), 26, writes: "The traditio-critical analysis working backwards from a text's present form to an earlier tradition is often most hazardous. There are no general 'laws' of how a tradition might develop. Traditions can either grow or become shorter, they can gain tensions or be smoothed, details can be added or reduced. Semitic features may appear and disappear."

<sup>12</sup> In this context, cf. the interesting thesis of J. D. G. Dunn, "All that glitters is not gold! In Quest of the Right Key to Unlock the Way to the Historical Jesus," in Der historische Jesus, ed. Schröter and Brucker, 131–161, esp. 147–156. He sees the key to the path to the historical Jesus in a realistic assessment of the Jesus tradition. For

1. The Language(s) of the Historical Jesus

1.1. Attempts to Reconstruct Aramaic “Pre-Forms” of Greek Logia of Jesus

The gospels are written in Greek; and for a long time, it was assumed that the language of the historical Jesus was Palestinian (more precisely, Galilean) Aramaic. The attempts to use alleged or genuine Aramaisms in the texts of the New Testament, above all the gospels, to reconstruct Aramaic or even Hebrew sources which would originally have preserved the original words spoken by Jesus himself have met with very little success.<sup>13</sup> However, many scholars have looked at least in some individual logia for traces which point to original Aramaic forms.<sup>14</sup> Where the texts either contain individual Aramaic words or can be translated back into Aramaic, scholars have concluded with a large measure of certainty that this must be at least very old, if not indeed authentic material going back to the historical Jesus.<sup>15</sup>

One of the best known examples, which illustrates both the hermeneutical presuppositions for the application of the criterion and its link to the criterion of dissimilarity, is the address of God as Abba, which more detail, cf. his reflections on the history of tradition in idem, Jesus Remembered, 139–336.

---

<sup>13</sup> As far as I know, the most nuanced approaches in recent scholarship to the reconstruction of Aramaic sources behind the synoptic gospels are offered by M. Casey, Aramaic Sources of Mark's Gospel, SNTSMS 102 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998), with an elaborate methodology in seven steps (cf. 73–110), and idem, An Aramaic Approach to Q: Sources for the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, SNTSMS 122 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002), with modifications to the methodological approach used in the first volume (60–63).

<sup>14</sup> M. Black, An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts, 3rd ed. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1967), has been particularly influential. The German translator, G. Schwarz, who has likewise published several studies related to this question, asks a rhetorical question which is typical of this approach: “If it is true—and there is no need to doubt it—that Jesus primarily spoke Aramaic, Galilean western Aramaic, in his public preaching, in the instruction of his disciples, in the controversies with his enemies, and in his prayer to God, then ought it not to be a matter of course that one goes back to the Aramaic when investigating the Gospels?” M. Casey offers a detailed overview of research in his Aramaic Sources, 1–72.

<sup>15</sup> For example, J. Jeremias expected great things of this method. In his influential book Die Gleichnisse Jesu, 5th ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1965), 21, he wrote: “Jesus spoke Galilean Aramaic. The translation of his words into Greek, which began at an early date, necessarily means that in many cases the meaning... was displaced. This is why the translation of the parables back into Jesus' mother tongue is a fundamentally important, indeed perhaps the most important instrument for the recovery of their original meaning.”

survives in Aramaic at Mark 14:36. An interpretation of this address which remains popular even today was put forward and widely diffused above all by Joachim Jeremias in the second half of the twentieth century: the word abba was used by a child when addressing his father intimately.<sup>16</sup> According to Jeremias, in the Judaism of Jesus' days there is no evidence of such an address of God, and it would have been unthinkable. Jeremias thus emphasizes the allegedly fundamental difference between the way in which the historical Jesus addressed God and that of his Jewish contemporaries, thereby also stressing the distinctiveness of Jesus' relationship to God; he also emphasizes the significance of this form of address as "the very heart of Jesus' relationship to God."<sup>17</sup> This uniqueness led Jeremias to infer the authenticity of this address.<sup>18</sup> He writes:<sup>19</sup>

A Jew would have found it irreverent and therefore unthinkable to address God with this intimate family word. It was something new and unheard-of when Jesus dared to take this step. He spoke with God as simply, intimately, and confidently as a child speaks with its father.

The probability that the historical Jesus addressed God as Abba can no doubt be demonstrated, but the consequences which Jeremias deduces from this, and the implications of his argumentation, are no longer tenable today, for two reasons.

First, Jeremias's theses have been revised, at least in part, on the linguistic level.<sup>20</sup> The form can indeed be explained as a vocative, and the Greek New Testament offers the earliest evidence of the concept in a

---

<sup>16</sup> J. Jeremias, Abba: Studien zur neutestamentlichen Theologie und Zeitgeschichte (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1966), 63–64, protests against the idea that the text merely reproduces the babbling utterance of a small child.

<sup>17</sup> J. Jeremias, Neutestamentliche Theologie, vol. 1, Die Verkündigung Jesu (Gütersloh: Gerd Mohn, 1971), 73. Cf. also on the same page: "It is in the address of God as Abba that the ultimate mystery of Jesus' mission finds expression. He was conscious of being authorized to communicate the revelation of God, because God had made himself known to Jesus as Father (Matt 11:27 par.)."

<sup>18</sup> Cf. Jeremias, Abba, 59: "In the Jewish prayer literature, there is not one single piece of evidence that God was addressed as Abba. But Jesus... always addressed God in this way. This is therefore a completely unambiguous characteristic of the ipsissima vox Jesu." A similar view is taken by F. Hahn, Christologische Hoheitstitel: Ihre Geschichte im frühen Christentum, FRLANT 83 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1963), 320.

<sup>19</sup> Jeremias, Abba, 63. Cf. the similar remarks by O. Cullmann, Das Gebet im Neuen Testament (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1994), 54–56.

<sup>20</sup> For a critical position, cf., e.g., G. Schelbert, "Sprachgeschichtliches zu 'Abba,'" in Mélanges Dominique Barthélemy: Études offertes à l'occasion de son 60e anniversaire, ed. P. Casetti et al., OBO 38 (Fribourg: Universitätsverlag; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck &

vocative sense, but this fact does not permit us to say how much earlier this vocative occurred in Palestinian Judaism. It is also important to note that the form abba may not simply be equated with the intimate address of a father by his child (“Daddy”).

Secondly, the idea that the address of God as “my Father,” which is attributed to Jesus, is not attested in ancient Judaism, or even that this is unthinkable, has since been refuted by examples which prove the opposite.<sup>21</sup>

We may sum up: the argumentation combines elements from the history of language and from the history of tradition, but it is viable only on the basis of an historically untenable negative picture of ancient Judaism—which until a few decades ago was usually called “late Judaism” and was alleged to have moved far away from its origins by the time of Jesus and to have become “rigid.” This picture is employed as the backdrop to the portrayal of Jesus’ relationship to God.<sup>22</sup>

In principle, one further aspect of the criterion of dissimilarity can be discerned in the search for authentically Aramaic words of Jesus: the “genuine” historical Jesus in his language and environment must be separated from the Greek narrative world of the evangelists and from the linguistic world of the earliest Christians to whom we have access. This makes this criterion extremely problematic per se; nor are its presuppositions tenable, for the following reasons.

First, even if it could be proved that one particular logion was originally transmitted in Palestinian Aramaic, this would not entitle us to Ruprecht, 1981), 395–447; J. A. Fitzmyer, “Abba and Jesus’ Relation to God,” in According to Paul: Studies in the Theology of the Apostle (New York: Orbis, 1993), 47–63.

---

<sup>21</sup> Fitzmyer, “Abba,” 55, writes: “When he [i.e., Jeremias] writes, ‘For Jesus to address God as “my Father” is therefore something new,’ he is no longer right. It would be better formulated, however thus: There is no evidence in the literature of pre-Christian or first-century Palestinian Judaism that ‘abbā’ was used in any sense as a personal address for God by an individual Jew—and for Jesus to address God as ‘abbā’ or ‘Father’ is therefore something new.” For a brief overview, cf. also, e.g., M. Philonenko, Das Vaterunser: Vom Gebet Jesu zum Gebet der Jünger (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2002), 38–42.

<sup>22</sup> This is why it is scarcely surprising that the earliest representatives of this particular exegesis included authors who were closely linked to the National Socialist ideology. One example is G. Kittel, art. ἄββα, ThWNT 1 (1933): cols. 4–6, esp. 6: “Jewish linguistic usage shows how the early Christian relationship to God, like that between a father and his child, far surpasses the possibilities of intimacy which were established in Judaism, and replaces these with something new.” Cf. the illuminating essay by W. A. Meeks, “A Nazi New Testament Professor Reads His Bible: The Strange Case of Gerhard Kittel,” in The Idea of Biblical Interpretation: Essays in Honor of James L. Kugel, ed. H. Najman and J. H. Newman, JSJSup 83 (Leiden: Brill, 2004), 513–544.

conclude that it goes back to the historical Jesus—since he was not the only person who spoke that language. And not even the early date of the tradition would be attested, since our evidence for the existence of a Palestinian Christianity in which Aramaic was spoken is not limited only to the earliest and early periods.<sup>23</sup>

Secondly, the inference from the mere fact (a) that a logion transmitted in Greek can be translated back into Aramaic to the affirmation (b) that it first existed in an original Aramaic version is logically unacceptable. We may however with some degree of probability assume that a logion has Semitic roots when it is possible to explain the incomprehensibility of a Greek text on the hypothesis that it has been incorrectly translated from Aramaic.<sup>24</sup> A relatively high probability exists also in logia where an Aramaic version reveals plays on words to which nothing in the Greek corresponds.<sup>25</sup> Nevertheless, even here we must always ask whether a process within the Greek can account for the genesis of the logion.<sup>26</sup>

Thirdly, the possible existence of Semitisms in New Testament Greek is answered much more cautiously today than even only a few decades

---

<sup>23</sup> On this, cf. Justin's testimony to persecutions of Christians at the period of the Bar Kokhba war (132–135): 1 Apol. 31.5–6; and the later testimony of Eusebius: Hist. Eccl. 4.5–6.

<sup>24</sup> On this, cf., e.g., M. Casey, Aramaic Sources, 107, where he discusses the word ἐπιβολών in Mark 14:72.

<sup>25</sup> One such example may be the logion at Matt 23:24 in the context of the discourse against the Pharisees: ὀδηγοὶ τυφλοὶ, οἱ διυλίζοντες τὸν κόνωπα, τὴν δὲ κάμηλον καταπίνοντες. On this, cf. M.-J. Lagrange, Évangile selon Saint Matthieu, ÉtB (Paris: Gabalda, 1947), 447; he does not infer any further-reaching conclusions about the authenticity of the logion from this possibility. It is just as likely to have its genesis in early Christian polemic as on the lips of the historical Jesus. This indicates a second problem. The meaning of the logion clearly changes, depending on whether it is spoken by the historical Jesus, by a Palestinian Judaeo-Christian, or after the separation from the synagogue! At least in the last case (but not in the first two), we would have to understand it as “anti-Jewish.”

<sup>26</sup> One extreme example: in P. Oxy. V 840, the fragment of an unknown gospel, lines 32–35, Jesus accuses his opponent, the Pharisaic chief or high priest, of having washed in stagnant waters in which “dogs and swine” lie by day and night. Since it is difficult to interpret this accusation, it has been proposed that the text can be explained on the basis of a translation error (in this case from Hebrew). However, it is obvious that the resulting hypothesis—viz. that the original text spoke of “cuttlefish and thorns”—contributes nothing to a clarification of the meaning. Cf. however A. Sulzbach, “Zum Oxyrhynchus-Fragment,” ZNW 9 (1908): 175–176, esp. 176. Casey, Aramaic Sources, 40–55, offers a critical discussion of a large number of examples, most of which certainly deserve to be taken more seriously.

ago.<sup>27</sup> Many linguistic forms which were once explained as Semitisms can be plausibly accounted for without the hypothesis of a translation from Hebrew or Aramaic.<sup>28</sup> We must therefore assume that in many instances the sheer delight in discovery has led scholars all too quickly to trace Greek texts back to their alleged Aramaic roots.

Above all, however, two of the basic assumptions which are implicit in this thesis are false:

Fourthly, this criterion is based on the idea that the formation of tradition in earliest Christianity began in a more or less uniform manner in a Palestinian Judaeo-Christian group which spoke Aramaic and was centered on the “earliest community” in Jerusalem, and that it was only from some specific point in time onwards that translations of various units of this tradition were made into Greek. This idea is untenable, not because we must assume that Judaeo-Christian tendencies survived for a lengthy period in Palestine and elsewhere, but primarily because we cannot assume that there was ever a time when the Jesus tradition was transmitted exclusively in Aramaic.<sup>29</sup> It is more likely that both lines of tradition ran alongside one another (and influenced one another) from the very beginning. This is closely connected to the following point:

Fifthly, the source material which is at present available indicates that Greek (and doubtless Latin too, though to a lesser extent) played a

---

<sup>27</sup> Cf. J. A. Fitzmyer, “The Study of the Aramaic Background of the New Testament,” in The Semitic Background to the New Testament (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1997), 5: “Semitism can be abused and can turn out to be a weasel-word. . . . It is obviously legitimate to use it in a generic sense to refer to Jewish or Old Testament traditions or to expressions which are clearly different from classical or Hellenistic Greek, but which are common to both Aramaic and Hebrew.”

<sup>28</sup> In principle, this does not contest the de facto occurrence of Semitisms. Methodologically, however, the Greek of the New Testament (or more precisely, koinè Greek) should not simply be measured against the grammar of classical Greek. This is emphasized by T. J. Kraus, Sprache, Stil und historischer Ort des zweiten Petrusbriefes, WUNT 2.136 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001), 44–50. For further information on the problem of Semitisms in the New Testament, cf. the classic studies by K. Beyer, Semitische Syntax im Neuen Testament, vol. 1, Satzlehre 1, SUNT 1 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1968); and M. Wilcox, “Semitisms in the New Testament,” ANRW II 25.2 (1984): 979–1029. For a critical view, cf. G. H. R. Horsley, “The Fiction of ‘Jewish Greek,’” NewDocs 5 (1989): 5–40, esp. 26–37. T. J. Kraus emphasizes the importance of being aware of the problems: “Grammatisches Problembewusstsein als Regulativ für angemessene Sprachbeurteilung—das Beispiel der griechischen Negation und 2Petri,” FN 14 (2001): 87–99, esp. 87–89, 94, 98–99.

<sup>29</sup> We prescind here from the further problem of the exact linguistic form of Aramaic which we may suppose Jesus of Nazareth to have spoken. For further details, cf. A. Piñero and J. Peláez, The Study of the New Testament: A Comprehensive Introduction, Tools for Biblical Study 3 (Leiden: Deo, 2003), 122–126 (with bibliography).

much greater role in the Palestine of Jesus' period than scholars had long assumed.<sup>30</sup> With some degree of probability, therefore, we can assume not only that the historical Jesus understood Greek, but that—at least in certain situations of his life, e.g. in the trial before Pilate—he also made active use of this linguistic knowledge.

1.2. Lexical and Rhetorical Characteristics of the Language Used by Jesus?

P. Pokorný has made a suggestion with regard to the language used by the historical Jesus.<sup>31</sup> He begins with the independent transmission of Jesus traditions in sources that are as early as possible.<sup>32</sup> Basically, his strategy is to link this with the criterion of dissimilarity (although the latter is not explicitly mentioned); he speaks of the “innovation of well known traditions and ideas” by Jesus of Nazareth.<sup>33</sup> Within this material, Pokorný now elaborates lexical and rhetorical linguistic characteristics of the logia of Jesus. He does not believe that it is possible “to identify the textual segments which reflect the Greek” of Jesus himself, and he dismisses the idea of “reconstructing the oldest Aramaic stratum of the discourses of Jesus.”<sup>34</sup> Instead, he concentrates on traces of the language

<sup>30</sup> Among older scholarship, this problem is discussed by J. N. Sevenster, Do You Know Greek? How Much Greek Could the First Jewish Christians Have Known? NovTSup 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1968); J. A. Fitzmyer, “The Languages of Palestine in the First Century AD,” CBQ 32 (1970): 501–531; and H. B. Rosén, “Die Sprachsituation im römischen Palästina,” in Die Sprachen im Römischen Reich in der Kaiserzeit, ed. G. Neumann and J. Untermann, BoJ 40 (Cologne: Rheinland-Verlag, 1974), 215–239. For the more recent period, cf. especially the essays by S. E. Porter, “Did Jesus Ever Teach in Greek?” TynBul 44.2 (1993): 199–235; “Jesus and the Use of Greek in Galilee,” in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTTS 19 (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994), 123–154; and “The Functional Distribution of Koine Greek in First-Century Palestine,” in Diglossia and Other Topics in New Testament Linguistics, ed. S. E. Porter, JSNTSup 193 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), 53–78. Cf. also J. M. Watt, “The Current Landscape of Diglossia Studies: The Diglossic Continuum in First-Century Palestine,” in Diglossia and Other Topics, 18–36, esp. 25–34.

<sup>31</sup> Cf. P. Pokorný, “Lexikalische und rhetorische Eigentümlichkeiten der ältesten Jesustradition,” in Der historische Jesus, ed. Schröter and Brucker, 393–408. An older study argues on the same lines as Pokorný: H. Schürmann, “Die Sprache des Christus: Sprachliche Beobachtungen an den synoptischen Herrenworten,” BZ 2 (1958): 54–84. Schürmann attempts to identify characteristics of the idiolect of Jesus on the basis of the synoptic logia.

<sup>32</sup> He counts texts such as the Gospel of Thomas or the apocryphal fragments of P. Oxy. 840, P. Oxy. 1224, and P. Egerton 2 among these sources: cf. Pokorný, “Eigentümlichkeiten,” 394.

<sup>33</sup> Pokorný, “Eigentümlichkeit,” 394; other secondary criteria are “frequency and congruence.”

<sup>34</sup> Both quotations: Pokorný, “Eigentümlichkeit,” 395.

of Jesus which are discernible even in translation—surely not the most tangible of criteria. In his essay, Pokorný takes his starting point in Jesus' phrase "the kingdom of God" (which he believes goes back to the historical Jesus himself),<sup>35</sup> and he looks for characteristic turns of phrase and ideas linked to this (e.g. "the drawing near of the kingdom" or "entering into the kingdom").<sup>36</sup> The argumentation on the theme of "faith" shows how Pokorný proceeds here:<sup>37</sup>

Clearly, Jesus... employed derivatives from the root  $\text{יָדַע}$ , and indeed himself formed a new expression from these derivatives: 'of little faith' or 'the condition of having little faith' which stuck out (so to speak) when they were translated into Greek, just like the address 'Abba.' In this case, the first Hellenistic Christians translated the concept by means of a newly formed Greek word:  $\text{ὀλιγόπιστος}$ ,  $\text{ὀλιγοπιστία}$  (Luke 12:28 par. [Q]; Matt 8:26; cf. Mark 4:40 [Mk]; Matt 14:31 [special Matt]; 16:8 [?]).

Here, the linguistic investigation in the context of the quest for the historical Jesus is linked to the use of the criterion of dissimilarity. Accordingly, we cannot speak in this context of an alternative to the questions posed by tradition criticism; at most, perhaps, we could speak of a complement or of a special perspective.

1.3. The "Criterion of Greek Language and its Context"

Unlike the above-mentioned authors, S. E. Porter turned the old criterion "upside down" and detached it from the criterion of dissimilarity in his monograph The Criteria for Authenticity in Historical-Jesus Research, published in 2000. Porter describes Jesus as a person with an active knowledge of the Greek and Aramaic languages, as well as possibly of Hebrew (actively or passively) and Latin (passively).<sup>38</sup> This is the basis on <sup>35</sup> Basically, he infers this with the help of the criterion of dissimilarity: cf. Pokorný, "Eigentümlichkeit," 396.

<sup>36</sup> Cf. Pokorný, "Eigentümlichkeit," 395–398. Other observations refer to the concepts of "belief—'having little faith'" (398–399), the "metaphorical interpretation of the basic metaphor" of "the kingdom of God" (399–401), "intensifications" (401–404), and "proverbs" (404–405).

<sup>37</sup> Pokorný, "Eigentümlichkeit," 398. Unfortunately, no information is provided here to back up Pokorný's linguistic argumentation. Are the concepts of  $\text{ὀλιγόπιστος}$  and  $\text{ὀλιγοπιστία}$  really hapax legomena in the linguistic field of the Greek New Testament (as is affirmed by W. Bauer, Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament, ad loc.)? Is anything corresponding to these concepts known in the Aramaic of Jesus' period—and if not, why not?

<sup>38</sup> Cf. Porter, Criteria, 134.

which he constructs his “criterion of Greek language and its context”<sup>39</sup> in order to investigate whether particular characteristics of episodes in the New Testament texts permit the inference that the participants in the scene or the events related or the subjects discussed are connected to a Greek-speaking context of the scene in question. In other words, given the historicity of a scene, is there a strong likelihood that Greek was spoken in this scene, or not?<sup>40</sup> Porter proposes a step-by-step process involving the following questions:

First, when the gospels relate a dialogue, which persons take part? How strong is the likelihood that this dialogue was conducted in Greek? It is not very likely that Jesus spoke Greek in a dialogue with Jews in Jerusalem, but in the case of Jews outside Palestine, it is clearly more probable that dialogues were in fact conducted in Greek. And in the case of Roman officials, we can scarcely assume that they had a (sufficient) knowledge of Aramaic.<sup>41</sup>

Secondly, in what context are the participants speaking, and what is the topic? Here, the attempt is made to establish a link between the subject of a conversation and the possibilities of speaking about this topic in Greek.<sup>42</sup>

Third, is it conceivable that the words of Jesus in this context are authentic? Here, one can also employ the old criteria such as multiple attestation and the “embarrassing tradition.”<sup>43</sup>

Porter himself identifies seven episodes in the canonical gospels in which a Greek linguistic context is to be expected, or where words of Jesus are transmitted (Matt 8:5–13 par. John 4:46–54; John 4:4–26; Mark 2:13–14 par.; Mark 7:25–30 par.; Mark 12:13–17 par.; Mark 8:27–30 par.; Mark 15:2–5 par.).<sup>44</sup> Naturally, this does not constitute proof of the authenticity of these scenes, but it opens up the possibility that the Greek logia of Jesus transmitted in these scenes may in fact be ipsissima verba of the historical Jesus—in their original linguistic form, without the barrier of a translation. Porter writes:<sup>45</sup>

<sup>39</sup> Cf. Porter, Criteria, 126–140.

<sup>40</sup> Cf. ibid., 142–143.

<sup>41</sup> For greater detail, cf. ibid., 144–154 (with examples).

<sup>42</sup> Cf. ibid., 155–157.

<sup>43</sup> Cf. ibid., 157–158.

<sup>44</sup> Cf. ibid., 158.

<sup>45</sup> Ibid., 163.

This criterion of Greek language constitutes an important means of beginning discussion of whether the Greek words of Jesus in a passage are authentic, but it cannot on its own determine whether the words recorded are the exact words of Jesus... This, therefore, is a general criterion that delimits episodes that capture the authentic flavour of the words of Jesus, not a specific criterion that establishes the actual wording. Nevertheless, this criterion can expand the perspective for the discussion of the criteria in an attempt to determine the weight of probability that Jesus spoke Greek on a given occasion, and that the words recorded were in fact something similar to those in the Gospel accounts.

On its own, the criterion which Porter formulates in this way does not suffice to permit a decision whether an authentic logion of Jesus is transmitted in one particular New Testament text; nor does it seek to do so. Rather, this criterion seeks to clarify whether a text satisfies the conditions for the potential transmission in the original language of the logion of Jesus which it contains. In Porter's view, it is only other criteria that can decide whether or not an ipsissimum verbum is present. One of these criteria is connected with the variations of transmission in the textual history; another lies on the level of language, viz. the "criterion of discourse features" (for both of these, see below).<sup>46</sup>

