<sup>18</sup> For a survey and evaluation of the use of the expression "Sitz im Leben," see my article "A Century with the Sitz im Leben: From Form-Critical Setting to Gospel Community and Beyond," ZNW 98 (2007): 1–27.

<sup>19</sup> Werner H. Kelber was of vital importance for initiating a renewed interest in orality among New Testament scholars. See his book The Oral and the Written Gospel: The Hermeneutics of Speaking and Writing in the Synoptic Tradition, Mark, Paul, and Q, Voices in Performance and Text (with a new introduction by the author; Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997). The book was first published in 1983. Kelber has developed and modified his view in several articles.

<sup>20</sup> Jesus Remembered, 205–210. Bailey envisioned also other settings where tradition was transmitted. See his "Informal Controlled Oral Tradition and the Synoptic Gospels," Asia Journal of Theology 5 (1991): 34–54; idem, "Middle Eastern Oral Tradition and the Synoptic Gospels," ExpT 106 (1995): 363–367. For a critique of Dunn on this point, see Samuel Byrskog, "A New Perspective on the Jesus Tradition: Reflections on James D. G. Dunn's Jesus Remembered," JSNT 26 (2004): 459–471.

Mary, and others recalled was insignificant in comparison to the ingenious kerygmatic performances of the Christian communities.

It is still fashionable to point out—rightly so—that communal and social structures are decisive for how the past and the present reality is perceived and interconnected. While the stress on the community today recurs in the attempt to understand tradition and the process of recall as a kind of social or collective memory,<sup>21</sup> the notion that the community created and shaped tradition solely on the basis of future-oriented interests has given way to an attention to the boundaries of the collective force of perception. One such boundary would have been the existence of important eyewitnesses during the initial stages of the Jesus tradition.<sup>22</sup> Their presence does not imply a straight way from tradition back to Jesus, to be sure. Each act of observation and recall involves interpretation.<sup>23</sup> But it is important precisely as a reminder of the interactive nature of individual and communal components in the Jesus tradition and a call for further precision in estimating the social and the collective dimension of memory.<sup>24</sup>

---

<sup>21</sup> Cf. for instance Cillers Breytenbach, “MNHMONEYEIN: Das ‘Sich-Erinnern’ in der urchristlichen Überlieferung. Die Bethanienepisode (Mk 14,3–9/Jh 12,1–8) als Beispiel,” in John and the Synoptics, ed. Aldebert Denaux, BETL 101 (Leuven: University Press and Peeters, 1992), 548–557; Jens Schröter, Erinnerung an Jesu Worte: Studien zur Rezeption der Logienüberlieferung in Markus, Q und Thomas, WMANT 76 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1997), 462–466; Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 173 n. 1, 209, passim. There is a volume dealing with the subject extensively: Alan Kirk and Tom Thatcher, eds., Memory, Tradition, and Text: Uses of the Past in Early Christianity, SBLSS 52 (Atlanta: SBL, 2005). For informative surveys of research, see Jeffrey K. Olick and Joyce Robbins, “Social Memory Studies: From ‘Collective Memory’ to the Historical Sociology of Mnemonic Practices,” Annual Review of Sociology 24 (1998): 104–140; Barbara A. Misztal, Theories of Social Remembering (Philadelphia: Open University Press, 2003). For a recent theoretical discussion of memory, cf. Alan Kirk, “Memory,” in Jesus in Memory: Traditions in Oral and Scribal Practice, ed. Werner H. Kelber and Samuel Byrskog (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2009), 155–172.

<sup>22</sup> The possibility that eyewitnesses exerted influence on the tradition was an obstacle to the form-critical approach. Dennis Nineham tried to refute their significance. Cf. his three interrelated articles entitled “Eye-Witness Testimony and the Gospel Tradition,” JTS 9 (1958): 13–25; JTS 9 (1958): 243–252; JTS 11 (1960): 253–264. For critique, see Byrskog, Story as History, 133–134, 247–253, 274–275, 297–299. Cf. now Richard Bauckham, Jesus and the Eyewitnesses The Gospels as Eyewitness Testimony (Grand Rapids Eerdmans, 2006).

<sup>23</sup> Cf. my review articles, “The Eyewitnesses as Interpreters of the Past: Reflections on Richard Bauckham’s, Jesus and the Eyewitnesses,” JSHJ 6.2 (2008): 157–168; and “A ‘Truer’ History: Reflections on Richard Bauckham, Jesus and the Eyewitnesses The Gospel as Eyewitness Testimony,” Nova et Vetera 6 (2008): 483–490.

<sup>24</sup> The social and the collective memory are often confused. For clarification, see Eviatar Zerubavel, “Social Memories: Steps to a Sociology of the Past,” Qualitative Sociology 19 (1996): 283–299 (293–295). I have explained my view on social memory

2.4. The Dichotomy Between Sayings and Narratives

Another point, which is still not taken fully into account, is that the transmission of the Jesus tradition has its peculiar characteristic in that it hands down material which relates a vital message of revelation to the life of a historical person. It is insufficient, therefore, to approach and conceptualize the initial stages of transmission only from the viewpoint of how abstract forms of teaching are conveyed, because such models often fail to appreciate the narrative dynamics at work when the tradition concerns words and actions intrinsically bound to each other in the life story of a venerated person.

The tendency to dichotomize the sayings material and the narrative material at a pre-synoptic stage fails to consider how ancient orality and communication function. The oral mind-set, in its different manifestations, tends to recall and speak about the past as episodes. Moreover, the narrative character of the Jesus event itself probably fostered a kind of tradition that held together smaller and larger units of words and happenings and initiated an integration of verbal and behavioral tradition. Some of Jesus' sayings would be incomprehensible without an episodal frame and, vice versa, his behavior was an important part of his teaching and proclamation. His miracles were themselves a kind of visual teaching. The Hellenization of Palestine makes it unlikely that such narrative elements can be ascribed to late Hellenistic redaction, as the early form critics believed. Narrative material in the double tradition also points to a narrativizing tendency even in clusters which were predominantly focused on sayings;<sup>25</sup> and it is likely that any kind of collection of sayings at this time—whether Q or the Gospel of Thomas—was part of an oral environment of narrative comment and elaboration. In addition, the pre-Markan tradition was not void of narrativity. The form-critical conviction that Markan apophthegms can be reduced to bare dominical sayings is not mandatory as soon as they are seen as elaborations of chreiai, which by definition were reminiscences relating sayings or acts to particular persons.<sup>26</sup> The gospel writers were not the first ones interested in the

---

and the Jesus tradition more fully in "A New Quest for the Sitz im Leben: Social Memory, the Jesus Tradition and the Gospel of Matthew," NTS 52 (2006): 319–336.

<sup>25</sup> Stephen Hultgren, Narrative Elements in the Double Tradition: A Study of Their Place within the Framework of the Gospel Narrative, BZNW 113 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002).

<sup>26</sup> See my article "The Early Church as a Narrative Fellowship: An Exploratory Study of the Performance of the Chreia," TTKi 78 (2007): 207–226.

narrative dimension of the Jesus tradition, though they were the first to employ the flexibility of the bios genre for the purpose of the narrative.<sup>27</sup> For all we know, in early Christianity the Jesus tradition was, from the beginning, recalled as a grand narrative event.

Gerd Theissen's influential idea that itinerant charismatics cared for the sayings material in the context of discipleship while other people transmitted brief episodes concerning Jesus' miracles is a more recent extension of form-critical thinking.<sup>28</sup> It is weakened precisely by the kind of dichotomy assumed between sayings and narrative material. We have little evidence that wandering charismatics played such a significant role at an early time.<sup>29</sup> The contours of the persons with narrative competence among the ordinary folk are likewise very vague. Theissen reconstructs the social situation of tradition on the basis of who plays the significant role and whose ideological, geographical, and temporal perspective is represented in the various units of the gospels. It is only by setting the sayings and episodes into the contexts which Theissen presupposes that he is able to interpret them as he does.

3. The Beginnings

If form criticism failed in its attempt to trace the Jesus tradition back to the collective activities of the early church, the endeavor to find its beginnings before Easter becomes interesting. It is unfortunate that this work is occasionally conceived as a theological defense of the historical reliability of the Jesus tradition. Some of its advocates may regard it as such, to be sure, but it constitutes essentially a modification and diachronic extension of some form-critical insights.<sup>30</sup> The old

---

<sup>27</sup> Dirk Frickenschmidt, Evangelium als Biographie: Die vier Evangelien im Rahmen antiker Erzählkunst, TANZ 22 (Tübingen: Francke Verlag, 1997); Richard A. Burridge, What are the Gospels? A Comparison with Graeco-Roman Biography, 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004).

<sup>28</sup> Cf. for instance Gerd Theissen, Lokalkolorit und Zeitgeschichte in den Evangelien: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition, 2nd ed. (Freiburg [CH]: Universitätsverlag and Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1992), 25–131.

<sup>29</sup> For an evaluation, cf. Markus Tiwald, Wanderradikalismus: Jesu erste Jünger—ein Anfang und was davon bleibt, Österreichische Biblische Studien 20 (Frankfurt a.M.: Lang, 2002).

<sup>30</sup> In Story as History, 6, 306, I tried to point out that my own interest is not in the reliability of the Jesus tradition. In fact, the historicity of tradition in terms of its correlation with the “brute facts” of history is of little theological importance to me. The dynamic of existing within the interactive matrix of the past, the present, and the future is more fascinating. I have indicated this interest in the article “Exegetisk teologi notion that a tradition relates to a setting is still of significance, but in a different and less one-dimensional way.

3.1. Teacher and Disciples

There are two basic sociological factors recorded in the gospels which indicate that the Jesus tradition had its beginning in the ministry of Jesus: first, he appeared as a teacher; secondly, he gathered a group of devoted followers. The role of a teacher implies a consistent attempt to communicate comprehensibly; the followers are sustained in their social and collective identity by reference to what the master said and did.

The data are impressive.<sup>31</sup> The terms used for “teacher”—ῥαββί or ῥαββουνί and διδάσκαλος—occur sixty-five times in address to Jesus (except John 8:4). Luke also employs ἐπιστάτης didactically seven times.<sup>32</sup> On four or five occasions people speak about him in the third person as teacher;<sup>33</sup> on six occasions he refers to himself as teacher.<sup>34</sup> We find the verb “to teach” (διδάσκειν) fifty-six times (except John 8:2) and the noun “teaching” (διδασχὴ) nine times, both of them almost always referring to the activity of Jesus.

The term “disciple” (μαθητής)—“student,” “the one taught” (דַּרְשָׁן)—is used in the gospels 234 times, mostly for the Twelve, but also for the adherents of other teachers (e.g. Matt 9:14; 22:16; Acts 9:25) and—in Lukan material—for additional followers of Jesus and Christians in general (e.g. Luke 6:17; Acts 9:1; 11:26). In John the Jews are disciples of Moses (John 9:28). The verb “to make disciples” (μαθητεύειν) is never employed in the active mode to describe what i nytestamentligt perspektiv: Reflektioner kring bibelvetenskapens uppgift vid en teologisk högskola,” Tro & Liv 62 (2003): 10–14. I discuss it partly in reference to the important philosophical hermeneutics of Hans-Georg Gadamer in “Räisänen through Theissen: A Program and a Theory,” in Moving Beyond New Testament Theology? Essays in Conversation with Heikki Räisänen, ed. Todd Penner and Caroline vander Stichele, Publications of the Finnish Exegetical Society 88 (Helsinki: Finnish Exegetical Society and Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2005), 197–220.

---

<sup>31</sup> For more complete lists of references, see Rainer Riesner, Jesus als Lehrer: Eine Untersuchung zum Ursprung der Evangelien-Überlieferung, 3rd ed., WUNT 2.7 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1988), 246–276; Byrskog, Jesus the Only Teacher, 202–204, 221–224.

<sup>32</sup> Luke 5:5; 8:24 (bis), 45; 9:33, 49; 17:13.

<sup>33</sup> Matt 9:11; 17:24; Mark 5:35; John 11:28. Cf. John 3:2.

<sup>34</sup> Mark 14:14 pars.; Matt 10:24–25/Luke 6:40 (bis); Matt 23:8; John 13:13–14 (bis).

Jesus does, only for what the disciples themselves and Paul and Barnabas do (Matt 28:19; Acts 14:21), but it is twice found in the passive mode—or possibly medium—in reference to persons who have become disciples of Jesus (Matt 13:52; 27:57). Three times we find the verb “to learn” (μανθάνειν) describing the appropriation of something that Jesus refers to (Mark 13:28 par.; Matt 9:13; 11:29). This is however not a prominent term in the gospels. Primarily the disciples learn by following (ἀκολουθεῖν) Jesus, that is, by hearing, seeing, and imitating their master.

These data in the gospels become significant when compared with the rest of the New Testament. While leaders in the early Christian congregations are called teachers, Jesus is never given this didactic label outside the gospels. The rest of the New Testament is surprisingly reserved in this regard. Only Acts 1:1 describes his activity didactically, and perhaps Paul alludes to him as an exemplary teacher in Rom 6:17, but these instances are exceptions and provide no evidence for the use of the term “teacher” in regard to Jesus. By the same token, the terms “disciple” and “to make disciples”—or “to become a disciple”—are employed only in the gospels and Acts. It never became a prominent label for the early Christians.

3.2. Jesus the Teacher

By the standards and criteria of historical-Jesus research, this strikingly statistical feature is a clear indication of Jesus’ own didactic role. Rainer Riesner’s attempt to situate the origin of the Jesus tradition within Jesus’ didactic identity and activity has been criticized on account of its picture of the transmission process,<sup>35</sup> but it is to his merit to have placed Jesus’ teaching role on firm footing. Scholars who minimize the importance of his didactic appearance and place him in other roles which allegedly spurred the beginning of the Jesus tradition have to confront the data outlined above.

In stressing the didactic aspect of Jesus’ person and mission we single out one dimension of his appearance and the narrative interpretation of him. Didactic categories were intrinsically related to prophetic roles. It is not to be denied that he exhibited also significant charismatic traits. Moreover, each gospel has incorporated the notion of

---

<sup>35</sup> Jesus als Lehrer. Cf. also idem, “Jesus as Preacher and Teacher,” in Jesus and the Oral Gospel Tradition, ed. Wansbrough, 185–210.

Jesus as teacher into its characteristic plot and added significance to it, integrating the teaching into the revelatory importance of Jesus' person and ministry. In the gospels Jesus is both the subject and—implicitly—the object of teaching, the teacher and the one taught.<sup>36</sup> The author of Matthew, in particular, enhanced it into a didactic christology of his own.<sup>37</sup> We should also note that each and every occurrence of ῥαββί and ῥαββουví cannot be regarded as a reflection of a didactic designation of Jesus, as these terms were employed as full-blown titles only after 70 CE.

3.3. The Disciples as a Jesus Community

While Riesner established the didactic role of the historical Jesus, Heinz Schürmann had already given the group of disciples its contours as a transmitting body of Jesus followers.<sup>38</sup> He had the ambition of bridging the gulf between the post-Easter community and the pre-Easter group of disciples. It was essential for him to establish a sociological continuity between the two in order to substantiate the idea of the post-Easter act of remembrance as a careful act of transmission. This continuity becomes formally and substantially evident, he argued, once we realize that both settings consisted of groups which confessed their alliance to Jesus' words and to the eschatological event of his person. The confessional character of the pre-Easter group of disciples served as the form-critically important typical situation and condition and thus resembled sociologically, despite the differences, the post-Easter community. Schürmann further distinguished between the inner and the outer Sitz im Leben of the pre-Easter group of disciples. Internally the group found its identity as confessing students caring for the words of Jesus for their own sake and forming them in accordance with their perception of him. Externally the group was motivated to transmission by the typical situation and condition of their preaching of the Kingdom and their life together.

<sup>36</sup> This is the basic argument in Samuel Byrskog, "Das Lernen der Jesusgeschichte nach den synoptischen Evangelien," in Religiöses Lernen in der biblischen, frühjüdischen und frühchristlichen Überlieferung, ed. Beate Ego and Helmut Merkel, WUNT 180 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2005), 191–209.

<sup>37</sup> Byrskog, Jesus the Only Teacher; idem, "Jesus as Messianic Teacher in the Gospel According to Matthew: Tradition History and/or Narrative Christology," in The New Testament as Reception, ed. Mogens Müller and Henrik Tronier, JSNTSup 230 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002), 83–100; Mogens Müller, "The Theological Interpretation of the Figure of Jesus in the Gospel of Matthew: Some Principal Features in Matthean Christology," NTS 45 (1999): 157–173. Cf. also John Yueh-Han Yieh, One Teacher: Jesus' Teaching Role in Matthew's Gospel Report, BZNW 124 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2004).

<sup>38</sup> Heinz Schürmann, "Die vorösterlichen Anfänge der Logientradition: Versuch eines formgeschichtlichen Zugangs zum Leben Jesu" (1960), in idem, Traditionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen zu den synoptischen Evangelien, KBANT (Düsseldorf: Patmos-Verlag, 1968), 39–65.

Schürmann's article is important because it extends the locus of tradition diachronically back to the ministry of Jesus, while at the same time acknowledging the basic tenets of the form-critical correlation between a literary form and the typical situation and condition of a group. He takes seriously the basic insight that tradition often relates to recurring activities of a group of people with a keen interest in conveying the tradition to others. In this sense he is a (neglected) forerunner of the modern emphasis on tradition as the manifestation of social or collective memory, but with a more consistent focus on memory as a deliberate medium of transmission and a more modest interest in the popular kind of orality inherent in the tradition process.<sup>39</sup> To be sure, the continuity he calls for has to be tested from case to case—devotion can produce both close adherence to and pious elaboration of tradition—and we could question whether the commissioning of the disciples played such a dominant role, considering the possibility that Jesus was teaching them on several other occasions. Nonetheless, Schürmann has established a social basis for assuming that the teaching of Jesus did not become tradition only after Easter and independently of that teaching, but in close proximity to his own ministry as a teacher of a devoted group of followers.

4. Teaching Becoming Tradition

The role of a teacher implies that a teaching is conveyed to one or several attentive students. This is the beginning of tradition and transmission. The teaching becomes tradition at the moment it is communicated in a meaningful way and received by others. Few scholars today doubt that Jesus in fact drew a circle of more intimate followers to be with him. He might even have chosen to limit the number to twelve.<sup>40</sup> It is significant that he deliberately selected disciples, instead of their selecting him as teacher (Matt 8:18–22/Luke 9:57–62). Following him meant being deliberately chosen by him and for ever and exclusively attached to him. This kind of relationship provides the best possible condition for an emerging tradition.

---

<sup>39</sup> Schürmann subsequently argued for the involvement of pneumatically inspired teachers. See his article "... und Lehrer": Die geistliche Eigenart des Lehrdienstes und sein Verhältnis zu anderen geistlichen Diensten im neutestamentlichen Zeitalter," in idem, Orientierungen am Neuen Testament: Exegetische Gesprächsbeiträge, Kommentare und Beiträge zum Alten und Neuen Testament (Düsseldorf: Patmos-Verlag, 1978), 116–156.

4.1. The Impact of Jesus

Unless the students are sufficiently affected by the teaching, it is unlikely that it is conveyed further to others. It has to make an impact in order to turn into tradition. By the same token, a devoted group of followers may remember thoughts, feelings, and experiences from their time with the master, but unless the master spoke and acted comprehensibly, it is unlikely that their thoughts, feelings, and experiences would be reasonably handed on to others. The impact has to be grounded in successful communication in order to become tradition. It is therefore essential to have a synoptic view of Jesus as teacher and the disciples as his devoted followers. Both are necessary in order for the tradition to emerge. The gospels, as we have seen, provide sufficient data for assuming that these conditions were at work in the ministry of Jesus and suggest that there existed, in the midst of other activities, a teach-and-learn situation.

Dunn rightly stresses that the initial impact of Jesus was decisive for the beginning of the Jesus tradition as an act of remembering and oral performance.<sup>41</sup> The impact and the shared experience of it included the formation of the tradition to recall what had made that impact. The impacting word or event became the tradition of that word or event in a communal process and constituted the constants which successive retellings could elaborate. Dunn, like Schürmann, regards the preaching of the disciples as a particular occasion which stimulated the articulation of the disciple-effecting impact which they had experienced. The focus on the experience of Jesus' decisive impact holds together the tradition-forming role of words and events and avoids the outdated way of separating the two in the Jesus tradition. Memory tends to immediately narrativize the past into an integrated whole, and the disciples recalled the impact of a person whose deeds formed a message as vital as his words.

---

<sup>40</sup> John P. Meier, "The Circle of the Twelve: Did It Exist during Jesus' Public Ministry?" JBL 116 (1997): 635–672.

<sup>41</sup> Jesus Remembered, 239–245.

4.2. The Didactic Authority of Jesus

Dunn's notion of Jesus' impact has to be supplemented by a more consistent attention to Jesus' didactic authority and techniques. Dunn gives them only little attention and the step from initial impact and disciple response to traditioning therefore remains unclear.

Jesus' verbal teaching was impressive to the audience, but the gospels show that his impact often had to do with the unusual didactic authority emerging from his words coupled with his deeds. When he is teaching (περιπατεῖν, διδάσκειν) in the temple the Jewish leaders ask him by what authority he is doing (ποιεῖν) the things previously narrated (Mark 11:27–33 pars.). He was a teacher who not only taught his students words of wisdom, but who also did remarkable things. That authority was intrinsically related to the unusual impact he made when teaching and performing deeds of power in the synagogues on the Sabbath (Mark 1:21–28 par.; Mark 6:1–6 par.).<sup>42</sup> Jesus was different from an ordinary teacher, to be sure, but it was precisely when he transcended the didactic conventions that he appeared as a teacher with an extraordinary authority and made the most profound impact. The gospel authors report that his fame began to spread as a result (Mark 1:28 par.). The authority they were asking about in the temple was a didactic authority which expressed itself in words and unexpected deeds.

4.3. The Didactic Techniques of Jesus

Jesus taught publicly not only in the synagogues and the temple, but also in other places: in private houses—meals could have been important occasions for teaching (cf. Luke 7:36–47; 14:1–24)—and in the open air. In the saying in Mark 1:38 (par.) he programmatically envisions himself as a wandering teacher.<sup>43</sup>

<sup>42</sup> Cf. Mark 3:1–6 pars.

<sup>43</sup> Cf. also Matt 8:20, 22/Luke 9:58, 60.

His public impact was not made only casually. The form of the verbal teaching was deliberately impressive.<sup>44</sup> He made use of exaggeration,<sup>45</sup> play on words,<sup>46</sup> proverbs,<sup>47</sup> obscure and paradoxical sayings,<sup>48</sup> irony,<sup>49</sup> questions,<sup>50</sup> and—above all—parables, most of them formulated in Aramaic and Hebrew, but some perhaps tentatively in Greek.<sup>51</sup> They all, even the parables,<sup>52</sup> functioned as pedagogical means to convey the teaching in a way that made a profound impression and promoted further reflection and understanding.<sup>53</sup>

The teaching was followed up in the circle of disciples. His impressive words and deeds in public were likely to be commented upon and transformed into a meaningful message and embryonic tradition within the smaller setting of disciples. The synoptic gospels several times depict situations where the disciples ask Jesus for private explanation, especially concerning the difficult parables,<sup>54</sup> but also about other matters,<sup>55</sup> and where he takes them aside in order to teach them.<sup>56</sup> The custom of conveying special (esoteric) teaching to a group of selected people was wide spread in Jewish and Greco-Roman antiq-

<sup>44</sup> I cannot discuss the authenticity of each saying separately, but list examples that are accepted as characteristic of Jesus' teaching by a majority of scholars.

<sup>45</sup> E.g. Matt 10:37/Luke 14:26; Matt 5:29–30.

<sup>46</sup> E.g. Matt 16:18; 23:24 (Aram.: כְּלִמָּא or קְלִמָּא, “vermin,” and גַּמְלָא “camel”).

<sup>47</sup> E.g. Mark 3:24 pars.; 6:4 pars.; Matt 6:21/Luke 12:34; Matt 6:34c; 26:52b.

<sup>48</sup> E.g. Matt 11:11/Luke 7:28; Matt 11:12/Luke 16:16; Luke 13:32.

<sup>49</sup> E.g. Matt 11:16–19/Luke 7:31–35; Matt 16:2–3 (cf. Luke 12:54–55).

<sup>50</sup> E.g. Mark 4:30 par.; 8:27–29 pars.; 9:50 pars.; 11:29–30 pars.

<sup>51</sup> The major argument in favor of Jesus teaching in Greek is circumstantial, namely, the bilingual character of Palestine. We should also note the passages claiming that Jesus spoke to others who plausibly did not understand a Semitic language (Mark 7:26–30 par.; 15:2–5 pars.; Matt 8:5–13/Luke 7:2–10; John 12:20–28). Cf. Stanley E. Porter, “Jesus and the Use of Greek in Galilee,” in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. Bruce Chilton and Craig A. Evans, NTTTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 123–154. The study by Mark A. Chancey, The Myth of a Gentile Galilee, SNTSMS 118 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002), shows that the arguments for the heavy influence of Greek language and culture in lower Galilee have to be reconsidered.

<sup>52</sup> See Birger Gerhardsson, “Illuminating the Kingdom: Narrative Meshalim in the Synoptic Gospels,” in Jesus and the Oral Gospel Tradition, ed. Wansbrough, 266–309.

<sup>53</sup> See Robert H. Stein, The Method and Message of Jesus' Teaching (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1978), 7–25, 27–59; Riesner, Jesus als Lehrer, 353–498, 510–512; PHEME PERKINS, Jesus as Teacher, Understanding Jesus Today (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990), 38–61.

<sup>54</sup> Mark 4:10 pars.; 4:34; 7:17 par.; Matt 13:36.

<sup>55</sup> Mark 9:11 par.; 9:28 par.; 10:10; 10:26 pars.

<sup>56</sup> Mark 9:30–31; 9:35; 10:32 pars.

uity. The curious saying in Matt 10:26–27/Luke 12:2–3—with a similar saying also in Mark 4:22 par.—was perhaps related to Jesus’ own practice of teaching the disciples “in the dark.” Possibly Jesus withdrew from public more often as the opposition towards him increased. However, the synoptic gospels indicate that it was an intentional procedure of Jesus that the disciples should be given (to know) the secret(s) of the Kingdom (Mark 4:11 pars.).<sup>57</sup> This certainly implies revelation, and the saying is quite similar to the (other?) one from the Q-material that the Son reveals the Father to whom he chooses (Matt 11:25–26/Luke 10:21–22). But revelation may come in unveiled words of instruction for those attentive to the teaching. The private teaching could take place in a house or outside.<sup>58</sup> In Jerusalem, the garden at the western slope of the Mount of Olives seems to have been a place which Jesus regularly visited together with his disciples (Luke 22:39; John 18:1–2).

We have no indication that the disciples made written notes of the teaching.<sup>59</sup> Considering the low appreciation of written material in Jewish and Greco-Roman antiquity in general, and the preference for the viva vox rather than the written word in some Christian circles of the early second century (Papias in Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.39.4),<sup>60</sup> it is unlikely that such notes played any significant role.<sup>61</sup> Even if they existed to some limited extent, they were probably, as most ancient

---

<sup>57</sup> There are significant agreements between Matt 13:11/Luke 8:10 as against Mark 4:11, but they do not affect the point that the disciples are recipients of a special secret.

<sup>58</sup> The mention of a house for Jesus’ activity in Mark and Matthew is peculiar. Matthew does not repeat any of the references to it in Mark 2:1; 3:20; 7:17, 24; 9:28, 33; 10:10. Yet he adds it in 13:1 (cf. Mark 4:1) and includes it in special material in 9:28; 13:36; 17:25. At least Mark 9:33 (cf. Mark 1:29; 2:1; 3:20) and Matt 17:24 could indicate that he taught the disciples in a specific house in Capernaum.

<sup>59</sup> Differently Allan Millard, Reading and Writing in the Time of Jesus, BS 69 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), 223–229.

<sup>60</sup> See William V. Harris, Ancient Literacy (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1989); Catherine Hezser, Jewish Literacy in Roman Palestine, TSAJ 81 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001). We should however note that Second Temple Judaism put a great emphasis on reading and writing as part of the study of the Torah. I have surveyed the evidence for elementary and scribal schools in ancient Israel in Jesus the Only Teacher, 63–67. Cf. now also David M. Carr, Writing on the Tablet of the Heart: Origins of Scripture and Literature (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005).

<sup>61</sup> Luke reports that John and Peter “were uneducated and untrained men.” Although the text is strongly rhetorical, it indicates that the author of Luke-Acts would have been surprised to find such notes among that which was handed down to him.

writings, an integrated part of the oral currencies of discussion and performance.

5. Tradition Being Transmitted

The way of the tradition from Jesus and his disciples to the gospels is difficult to trace with precision. His death must have caused an abrupt pause in the process of his teaching becoming tradition. We are in the dark concerning what precisely happened to the emerging tradition immediately after the crucifixion. Regardless of how we estimate the reason for Jesus' death and the possibility that he intentionally went up to Jerusalem to meet his fatal destiny, from the earliest Passion narrative in Mark 14–16 we receive the impression that his followers—men and women—were disillusioned, afraid, and poorly motivated to transmit and celebrate what they had learned publicly and privately from him. The immediate impact of his presence was gone; there was no reason for the celebration of tradition. At this moment of crisis and strong cognitive dissonance among all those who had been closest to him, the initial Jesus tradition must have been at great risk.

5.1. Transmission Terminology

It is noteworthy that Jesus' disciples did not disband after his death. They kept their cohesive group and enlarged it. At some point they began to recall what Jesus had said and done and what had happened to him.

The Pauline letters indicate that in the 50's the Jesus tradition was established as something to be not only recalled and celebrated, but transmitted in a more technical sense. Scholars who emphasize the performance of the Jesus tradition often neglect the indications of a more deliberate kind of transmission.<sup>62</sup> The terms "deliver" (παράδιδόναι/מסר) and "receive" (παραλαμβάνειν/קבל) were, as is well known, technical terminology for the transmission of Torah in rabbinic Judaism. Mark 7:4–5, 13 show that they carried the connotation of handing on and receiving tradition (παράδοσις) already before 70 CE. It is difficult to escape the impression that this is exactly what Paul, the former proto-rabbi, has in mind when he twice uses both terms to describe what he received and passed on to the Corinthians (1 Cor 11:23; 15:3). The first time it concerns the Lord's Supper; the second time Jesus' death, resurrection, and appearances. Both passages point to something which Paul received and handed on. It is a matter of tradition and deliberate transmission.

---

<sup>62</sup> Cf. Gerhardsson's critique of Dunn in "Innan evangelierna skrevs," SEÅ 69 (2004): 167–189 (at 177); and "The Secret of the Transmission of the Unwritten Jesus Tradition," NTS 51 (2005): 1–18 (at 9). Dunn does not explain these indications, but stresses the living and adaptable character of the tradition as it was actually used. Cf. already his "Jesus Tradition in Paul," in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. Chilton and Evans, 155–178.

On other occasions Paul and his associates use similar and additional transmission terminology for what they had learned and delivered to the communities. This is clear from several passages:

- 1 Cor 11:2 (καθὼς παρέδωκα ὑμῖν τὰς παραδόσεις κατέχετε)
 Phil 4:9 (ἂ καὶ ἐμάθετε καὶ παρελάβετε καὶ ἠκούσατε καὶ εἶδετε ἐν ἐμοί, ταῦτα πράσσετε)
 Col 2:6 (ὡς οὖν παρελάβετε τὸν Χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν τὸν κύριον, ἐν αὐτῷ περιπατεῖτε)
 1 Thess 4:1 (παρελάβετε παρ' ἡμῶν τὸ πῶς δεῖ ὑμᾶς περιπατεῖν)
 2 Thess 2:15 (κρατεῖτε τὰς παραδόσεις ἃς ἐδιδάχθητε)
 2 Thess 3:6 (περιπατοῦντος... μὴ κατὰ τὴν παράδοσιν ἣν παρελάβοσαν παρ' ἡμῶν).

The transmission terminology occurs here in contexts of admonition. In addition to these passages, there are others where Paul attributes a tradition to the Lord (1 Cor 7:10–11; 9:14) and alludes to the Jesus tradition in his exhortations.<sup>63</sup> As it seems, the instruction of believers was the primary setting for communicating the Jesus tradition. This was the occasion when it was handed on, mostly orally but sometimes in epistolary form (2 Thess 2:15).

5.2. Transmission and Paraenesis

Thus we have indication that from early on the paraenesis in particular called for a more systematic account of the Jesus tradition.<sup>64</sup> The <sup>63</sup> Cf. e.g. Rom 12:14 and Matt 5:44/Luke 6:27–28; Rom 12:17 and Matt 5:39–42/Luke 6:29–30; Rom 14:14 and Mark 7:15; 1 Thess 5:2, 4 and Matt 24:43/Luke 12:39–40; 1 Thess 5:13 and Mark 9:50; 1 Thess 5:15 and Matt 5:39–48/Luke 6:27–38.

<sup>64</sup> Paraenesis can be many things. See Wiard Popkes, Paränese und Neues Testament, Stuttgarter Bibelstudien 168 (Stuttgart: Verlag Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1996), 13–29; idem, “Paraenesis in the New Testament: An Exercise in Conceptuality,” in teaching to believers probably fostered a disciplined act of transmission. To this end Paul must have employed teachers.<sup>65</sup> Their primary duty was to instruct others in matters of conduct. This duty related intrinsically to teaching the Jesus tradition, because the tradition was the essential point of reference concerning how to think and behave.

Paul's use of transmission terminology and references and allusions to tradition in these contexts concern primarily words of Jesus. Probably it was in this setting of instruction that an awareness of the special significance of the logia arose. This is not to say that there was no interest in what Jesus did and what was done to him, as we have noted. We have indications that Christ was presented as a pattern of ethical instruction (Rom 6:17) and that believers were encouraged with the use of various metaphors to act like him, as Paul did.<sup>66</sup> Although we have no direct evidence, it is also likely that recollections of a more narrative kind were handed down and served as important points of reference in matters of Christian conduct and were celebrated at important moments in the communities. It is however self-evident that those items of the tradition which could be ascribed directly to Jesus himself carried a different kind of authority in the paraenetic context than those episodes which by necessity must have been formulated by other persons.

It would be easy, with Dibelius, to equate paraenesis and transmission. But the matter is more complex. The paraenesis stimulates deliberate work with tradition; it uses and communicates tradition, as we have noted, but it is distinct from transmission in a more technical sense. The reason for this is that we never find the tradition explicitly quoted as Jesus tradition in paraenetic contexts. It is always only alluded to. The letter of James is instructive. It contains numerous intertextual links to Jesus sayings known from the gospels,<sup>67</sup> but the author never refers to them as Jesus tradition. He would surely, like

---

Early Christian Paraenesis in Context, ed. James Starr and Troels Engberg-Pedersen, BZNW 125 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2004), 13–46. Here I am thinking of its function to enforce the common norms by authoritatively admonishing one or several persons concerning the proper way of life.

<sup>65</sup> So Alfred F. Zimmermann, Die urchristlichen Lehrer: Studien zum Tradentenkreis der διδάσκαλοι im frühen Urchristentum, 2nd ed., WUNT 2.12 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1988).

<sup>66</sup> Cf. Rom 13:14; 15:1–5, 7; 1 Cor 11:1; Gal 6:2; Col 3:13.

<sup>67</sup> For a minimalist account, cf. Wesley Hiram Wachob and Luke Timothy Johnson, "The Sayings of Jesus in the Letter of James," in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. Bruce Chilton and Craig A. Evans, NTTS 28.1 (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 433–450.

the rabbis, have identified the sayings by reference to their originator, had he been concerned with transmission as such in the letter. Moreover, the parallels to the Jesus tradition concern not individual sayings merely, but are usually found in blocks of material—mostly Q material.<sup>68</sup> This suggests that the teachers employed tradition that had already been formally structured into a manageable body of tradition. The author could allude to this material in his paraenesis, and in this way use the Jesus tradition, but this was an act of communication which was distinct from the deliberate work with the tradition.

5.3. Transmission as Memorization

The core element of transmission in antiquity was the faculty of memory. It was a goddess to the Greeks. They cherished it and sought means to enhance and cultivate it.<sup>69</sup> In Judaism it became the outstanding mode of transmission of Torah. The rabbis developed advanced techniques to foster its accuracy.<sup>70</sup> Recent work on the Jesus tradition pays attention to the social or collective memory of early Christian groups. That memory, it is argued, was decisive for moulding and censoring the vision of the past in a way that conformed to the values of the group. While adding an important aspect to the formative role of the social environment, it is at odds with the criterion that a piece of information about Jesus has a claim to authenticity if it is dissimilar to the tendencies of early Christianity.

As we noted above, it is essential to keep in balance the individual and the communal components in the transmission of the Jesus tradition. On an individual level, memory has to do with memorization and recall. The rabbis were extreme, but we do not have to adopt the

---

<sup>68</sup> For discussion, see Patrick J. Hartin, James and the Q Sayings of Jesus, JSNTSup 47 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1991).

<sup>69</sup> I have indicated the most significant aspects in Story as History, 160–165. In addition to the literature referred to there, cf. also Jocelyn Penny Small, Wax Tablets of the Mind: Cognitive Studies of Memory and Literacy in Classical Antiquity (London: Routledge, 1997). I have compared this picture with Crossan's (modernized) notion of memory in "Talet, minnet och skriften: Evangelietraditionen och den antika informationsteknologi," SEÅ 66 (2001): 139–150, at 144–147.

<sup>70</sup> The standard work on this subject is still Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript. The critique against Gerhardsson's work has focused mainly on its second part, which deals with early Christianity, while the first part dealing with rabbinic Judaism has been widely appreciated. Cf. also Martin S. Jaffee, Torah in the Mouth: Writing and Oral Tradition in Palestinian Judaism, 200 BCE–400 CE (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001). For an extensive recent discussion of Gerhardsson's approach, see now Kelber and Byrskog, eds., Jesus in Memory.

very technical mnemonic system of rabbinic Judaism in order to appreciate the importance of individual memory in the Jesus tradition. The ideal of recalling something with uttermost accuracy was spread far beyond the rabbinic circles. Already Aristotle reflected systematically on memory and recall in a separate treatise, and insisted on the past reality of that which is being recalled (De Memoria et Reminiscentia). Pliny the Elder, in the first century CE, is a good example of how an experienced person thought of it at the time of the emerging Jesus tradition. He brings together an amusing anthology of memory stories about Cyrus, Lucius Scipio, Cineas, Mithridates, and Charmadas (Hist. Nat. 7.24.88–89). Their memory was truly exceptional and caused amazement and esteem. For Pliny, who had traveled and seen much, memory was the most necessary boon of life. He realized indeed that it was fragile, but he also knew of many people who had gained glory from it. Several of these stories are exaggerated and aimed mainly to glorify the person in question. Nevertheless, they show that a good and accurate memory was something precious and greatly admired and indicate the ability of named individuals to recall with a certain amount of precision. It comes as no surprise that the Greeks and the Romans had techniques for the memorization of significant words (memoria verborum) and deeds (memoria rerum), developing and practicing in different and sometimes tiresome ways the visual mnemonics of mental places and images initiated several centuries earlier by Simonides of Ceos, according to the legend,<sup>71</sup> and elaborated by Hippias and Theodectes the Tragedian.

We have no direct evidence that the Jesus tradition was memorized. The cumulative impression is however that at least some parts of it were memorized. (a) Paul's terminology suggests deliberate transmission of Jesus tradition. (b) The letter of James indicates that the Jesus tradition was transmitted in a technical sense and independently of its use in paraenetic and other situations. (c) Memory and memorization were cherished and practiced broadly in Jewish and Greco-Roman antiquity. (d) Those in antiquity who came to know most concerning deliberate transmission of teaching favored and developed its use further. The view of orality which recognizes memorization harmonizes with that part of the criterion of dissimilarity which is still recognized.

---

<sup>71</sup> For a possible scenario of its origin and development, cf. Stefan Goldmann, "Statt Totenklage Gedächtnis: Zur Erfindung der Mnemotechnik durch Simonides von Keos," Poetica 21 (1989): 43–66.

Things which did not fit the present concern of the group were not always censored and eliminated from tradition, but remembered and preserved as traditional archaisms dissimilar to the tendencies of early Christianity.

This is not to say that everything which the gospels tell us about Jesus has been memorized or that traditional units always were memorized exactly in the same way. One may choose to memorize an item in a slightly different form from the one which was received. It is memorization, but within a frame of variation. The difference between the gospels is no argument against the practice of memorization, as is often assumed, but shows that different people could choose to memorize the same thing in different ways and that memorization, while maintaining its distinctive preservative character, was never an entirely passive enterprise isolated from the social environment and activities of the larger group.

6. Tradition Being Performed

There is a tendency among biblical scholars to stress either that the Jesus tradition was faithfully handed on in separate acts of transmission or that it was regularly used and shaped in oral performance. This is an unfortunate polarization. Several studies of oral performance tend to equate transmission and performance, arguing that in orality one cannot differentiate strictly between diachronic and synchronic means of communication.<sup>72</sup> This way of arguing is as one-sided as the argument that transmission was always passive and entirely independent of oral performance. It is true in some purely oral cultures, but groups which communicate orally might indeed show a keen sense of pastness and do not always exhibit a functional, homeostatic attitude to tradition. More to the point, it hardly applies to the Jesus tradition. This tradition was surely handed on mainly orally, as was recognized long ago, but work remains to be done on investigating the various kinds of oralities and rhetorics that flourished in early Christianity and interacted with the rather sophisticated forms of textuality.<sup>73</sup> Is there a kind of oral performance which integrates the diachronic dimension into the present time of the narrative without demolishing the pastness of tradition? To put it differently, what kind of relationship existed between tradition and performance in the narrative proclamation of early Christianity?

---

<sup>72</sup> So for instance Kelber, The Oral and the Written Gospel, 43 n. 224.

<sup>73</sup> This is one of the desiderata emerging from Dunn's emphasis on the oral character of the Jesus tradition. See Byrskog, "A New Perspective on the Jesus Tradition," 470-471.

6.1. Preaching the Gospel as Tradition

In 1 Cor 15:3 the two technical terms of transmission are used in a clause which explains Paul's preaching (εὐαγγελίζεσθαι) of the gospel—the verse is introduced with “for” (γάρ). Preaching the gospel to the Corinthians was a kerygmatic performance of tradition, according to this text, and in this sense a kind of instruction. The performance, moreover, contains narrative elements. The tradition to which Paul refers did not include a mere accumulation of what Jesus had said, but a story of what happened to him and of his appearances. Perhaps he received it, in some form, from Peter in Jerusalem (Gal 1:18).<sup>74</sup>

The narrative substructure and dimension of Paul's kerygmatic activity concern more than what is recounted in 1 Cor 15:3–7.<sup>75</sup> His double use of transmission terminology in 1 Cor 11:23–25 places the words of Jesus within a narrative context and indicates a tradition in the form of a story concerning what happened on the night when he was betrayed. The opening of Romans shows that this narrative dimension was intrinsic to his mission to evangelize the Gentiles. When he defines the gospel he relies on material which perhaps comes from tradition and contains an implicit christological narrative

---

<sup>74</sup> Stuhlmacher detects significant correspondences between 1 Cor 15:3–5 and Peter's sermon in Acts 10:34–43. Peter's titular use of “Christ” (10:36) and his reference to the resurrection on the “third day” (10:40) and to scripture (the prophets) instead of the usual call to repentance (10:43) correspond to the tradition mentioned by Paul. See Peter Stuhlmacher, Das paulinische Evangelium 1: Vorgeschichte, FRLANT 95 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1968), 279 n. 1; idem, Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments, 2 vols. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1992, 1999), 1:169–70. For Gal 1:18, see James D. G. Dunn, “The Relationship between Paul and Jerusalem according to Galatians 1 and 2,” NTS 28 (1982): 461–78; idem, “Once More—Gal 1:18: ἱστορήσαι Κηφῶν. In Reply to Otfried Hofius,” ZNW 76 (1985): 138–139.

<sup>75</sup> For discussion of the narrative dimension in Paul's letters, cf. Bruce W. Longenecker, ed., Narrative Dynamics in Paul: A Critical Assessment (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 2002); Richard B. Hays, “Is Paul's Gospel Narratable?,” JSNT 27 (2004): 217–239.

(Rom 1:1–5). He presents in brief the narrative substructure of his entire epistolary argument.<sup>76</sup>

In the heat of debate he elsewhere refuses to acknowledge that he received (παράλαμβάνειν) the gospel from any man and that he was taught it, insisting that it came to him as revelation of (from) Jesus Christ (Gal 1:11–12). Here he seems to contradict his reliance on tradition and sees the dependence on other humans and on revelation as mutually exclusive. What is at stake, however, is not the preaching of the core elements of the gospel, but the preaching of the gospel as Paul understood it. He acknowledges, after all, that he laid before the leaders in Jerusalem the gospel which he proclaimed among the Gentiles (2:2). Presumably he wished to secure that his gospel was not foreign to the one cherished in Jerusalem, seeking to confirm from tradition the convictions about Jesus which had been revealed to him at his conversion and commissioning on the Damascus road.

For Paul the preaching of the gospel was, first, bound to tradition and, secondly, a narrative kind of performance about Jesus Christ.<sup>77</sup> This is how he looked at it, regardless of how he in fact employed tradition in his epistolary correspondence. Preaching the gospel was a tradition-bound and narrative activity. His use of transmission terminology in relation to his preaching and his definition of the gospel caution us against equating the kerygmatic and narrative dimension of the Jesus tradition with entirely flexible and innovative performances in the Christian communities, and calls for a balanced and carefully nuanced consideration of transmission as a cornerstone and prerequisite of early Christian performance.

6.2. Preaching and Teaching the Life of Jesus

Another indication of how tradition related to narrative performance comes from the book of Acts. It reports two things of importance for the understanding of the Jesus tradition: first, the Twelve devoted themselves to the service of the word (6:4) and began to preach;<sup>78</sup> secondly, they provided teaching for the converts (2:42). The word is the word of God (6:2) and to serve it means to speak it with boldness (4:29, 31). Moreover, this preaching involves, as the angel says, the telling of all the words “about this life” (5:20). Being a servant of the word is intimately bound with being a(n) (eye)witness of Jesus (Luke 1:2),<sup>79</sup> not only of his resurrection, but of his resurrection as the climax of his entire life (Acts 1:21–22; 10:39, 41). To preach about his life has to do with recalling what he said and did and what happened to him.

<sup>76</sup> Cf. Samuel Byrskog, “Epistolography, Rhetoric and Letter Prescript: Romans 1.1–7 as a Test Case,” JSNT 65 (1997): 27–46.

<sup>77</sup> There are good reasons to suspect that the genitives in Rom 3:22, 26; Gal 2:16, 20; 3:22; and Phil 3:9 are subjective in nature, serving as signals for an implicit story about Jesus’ faithfulness towards God. See Richard B. Hays, The Faith of Jesus Christ: The Narrative Substructure of Galatians 3:1–4:11 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2nd ed., 2002). I have presented my view in Romarbrevet 1–8, Kommentar till Nya testamentet 6a (Stockholm: EFS-förlaget, 2006), 98–99.

This kind of preaching relates to their activity of teaching. Preaching Jesus’ life means, for Luke, to teach it (5:21). The apostles’ teaching to the converts is separate from the outward preaching and includes the up-building of the community, but both relate to an activity of recalling what they had experienced during the time with Jesus. Preaching and teaching are not strictly separable. Being eyewitnesses of Jesus as well as servants of the word means recalling, teaching, and proclaiming the same decisive event in two related but separate apostolic activities.

This is a Lukan perspective. Recent scholarship has shown that the history of the early church conveyed throughout the book of Acts is colored by the rhetorical agenda of ancient history writing.<sup>80</sup> These studies neglect the diachronic dimension of rhetoric, failing to appreciate that the most persuasive performance of history was the one that relied on thorough familiarity with what went before.<sup>81</sup> Although several of the items mentioned above are strongly Lukan in character and

<sup>78</sup> Acts 2:14–36; 3:12–26; 4:8–12; 5:29–32; 10:34–43.

<sup>79</sup> Dibelius was correct to point out the curious juxtaposing of eyewitnesses and unknown ministers of the word (Formgeschichte, 10–12, 59). The two are described with expressions that relate to one and the same definite article.

<sup>80</sup> So Todd Penner, In Praise of Christian Origins: Stephen and the Hellenists in Lukan Apologetic Historiography, Emory Studies in Early Christianity (New York: Clark, 2004); Clare K. Rothschild, Luke-Acts and the Rhetoric of History: An Investigation of Early Christian Historiography, WUNT 2.175 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2004).

<sup>81</sup> This is my argument in “History or Story in Acts—A Middle Way? The ‘We’ Passages, Historical Intertexture, and Oral History,” in Contextualizing Acts: Lukan Narrative and Greco-Roman Discourse, ed. Todd Penner and Caroline vander Stichele, SBL Symposium Series 20 (Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2003), 257–283. Similarly also in “Performing the Past: Gospel Genre and Identity Formation in the Context of Ancient History Writing,” in History and Exegesis: New Testament Essays in Honor of E. Earle Ellis for His Eightieth Birthday, ed. Sang-Won Son (London and New York: Clark, 2006), 28–44.

included in the author's own summaries of how he interpreted the past, it is likely that at some point the disciples had begun to tell others of what they had experienced and that their observations and memories had been given special notice among those who converted to the new way of life.

Dibelius, as we noted, concluded that preaching was the all-important activity and setting of tradition. It plays indeed a crucial role in the Lukan account. But preaching to the converts was a kind of teaching that in a different way recalled the life of Jesus.<sup>82</sup> When addressing outsiders the preachers probably, as the Lukan Peter tells us (11:16),<sup>83</sup> recalled things and quoted sayings as they went along, while teaching Jesus' life to converts must have relied on a more deliberate process of remembering in the context of discussion and mutual attempts to apply the essential elements of the tradition. This is in line with Paul's use of transmission terminology in paraenetic contexts indicated above.

6.3. Preaching as Gospel Tradition

The preaching as recorded in Acts gives perhaps an indication of how the transmission of the Jesus tradition was narratively embedded and subsequently elaborated into the narrative performances of the written gospels. A persistent object of scholarly disagreement is how the transmission and performance of the Jesus tradition finally ended up in the gospels. Granted there was a body of traditions concerning Jesus, we may envision the gospels either as mosaic collections of tradition, or as entirely independent of tradition, or as textualized performances of previous narrative currencies.

The available data suggest that the activity of preaching was crucial as a means of bringing the Jesus tradition to the gospel authors. Just as the preaching of the disciples might have been in need of what Schürmann—in passing—called “Jesus-Geschichten,”<sup>84</sup> the preaching

---

<sup>82</sup> Dibelius calls it “katechetische Predigt” in distinction to “Missionspredigt” and “kultische Predigt” (Formgeschichte, 18). His translator writes “Unterweisung der Katechumenen” (“Evangelienkritik und Christologie” [originally in English 1935], in Botschaft und Geschichte: Gesammelte Aufsätze, ed. Günther Bornkamm and Heinz Kraft, 2 vols. (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1953, 1956), 1:292–358, at 307.

<sup>83</sup> The Lukan Peter recalls the important saying in Acts 1:5.

<sup>84</sup> “Der ‘Sitz im Leben’ eines Teils auch der Jesus-Geschichten wird schon hier im vorösterlichen Jüngerkreis zu suchen sein” (“Die vorösterlichen Anfänge der Logien-tradition,” 60 n. 88). Schürmann refers to Harald Riesenfeld. Riesenfeld's notion that in Acts reveals the skeleton outline of a story. Already Dibelius detected a pre-Lukan scheme in the sermons in Acts.<sup>85</sup> Noticing allusions to Paul's preaching and to tradition in the Pauline letters, C. H. Dodd extended Dibelius' scheme into a primitive kerygmatic narrative which helped structure the first gospel.<sup>86</sup> Peter's speech in Acts 10:34–43 is crucial in this reconstruction. Although the speech, like all the speeches in Acts, is steeped in Lukan theology, it is also quite unlike the author's own writing elsewhere in not mentioning at all Jesus' infancy and in employing four Old Testament passages (Ps 107:20; Isa 52:7; 61:1; Deut 21:22) and expressions such as "preaching peace through Jesus Christ," "hanging him on a tree," "raised on the third day," and "the living and the dead." It is also a speech of Peter, being placed within a sequence of episodes concerning Peter,<sup>87</sup> and Papias thought that the author of Mark was the interpreter of Peter's chreiai (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.39.15). If we add to this the striking similarities between Peter's speech and the Markan story,<sup>88</sup> the old hypothesis that the author of the first gospel based his story on a (Petrine) tradition which contained episodes concerning Jesus is as likely as the ones arguing that he created it from scattered collections of miracle stories, a synoptic apocalypse, disputations, didactic sayings, and parables, or that he composed an entirely new kind of textuality distinct from all that went before. Although there are several points of uncertainties in this reconstruction, it presents a plausible way of how the separately transmitted Jesus tradition became gospel tradition as it was used kerygmatically among the first Christians.

---

the disciples memorized and recited certain episodes as holy words ("The Gospel Tradition and Its Beginnings," SE 1 [TU 73] [1959]: 43–65) goes far beyond Schürmann's cautious discussion and leaves little room for evident elaborative tendencies in the tradition.

<sup>85</sup> Formgeschichte, 15. Cf. idem, "Die Reden der Apostelgeschichte und die antike Geschichtsschreibung" (1949), in Aufsätze zur Apostelgeschichte, ed. Heinrich Greeven, FRLANT 60 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1951), 120–162, at 142; idem, Geschichte der urchristlichen Literatur, ed. Ferdinand Hahn, TBü 58 (Munich: Kaiser Verlag, 1975), 131.

<sup>86</sup> "The Framework of the Gospel Narrative," ExpT 43 (1932): 396–400; idem, The Apostolic Preaching and its Developments: Three Lectures with an Appendix on Eschatology and History (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1936), 17–35, 46–52.

<sup>87</sup> Thus it is not an interpolation into a legend of the conversion of a centurion, as Dibelius thought ("Die Bekehrung des Cornelius" [1947], in Aufsätze zur Apostelgeschichte, ed. Greeven, 96–107, at 97).

<sup>88</sup> I have listed the most significant ones in Story as History, 286–288.

Acts 10:39b–41 immediately moves on to the passion of Jesus. In Mark, as is well known, the passion occupies a disproportionately large section. While the idea that the Markan narrative as a whole builds on a narrative outline has been met with skepticism, there is more acceptance for the likewise hypothetical notion that he employed an early coherent narrative about Jesus' passion. The evidence is somewhat less compelling, however, the strongest one being Paul's quotation of and allusions to traditional formulations related to the Lord's Supper (1 Cor 10:16–17; 11:23–25) and the handing over of Jesus (Rom 4:25; 8:32; 1 Cor 11:23; Gal 2:20).<sup>89</sup> Probably we have to decide the matter in more general terms. The death of Jesus must have been such a shocking experience to his followers that they soon began to formulate to themselves what had happened in an attempt to comprehend and interpret it in light of the Easter experiences. In that case Peter and the other preachers in Jerusalem must have known about it.

The kerygmatic dimension of the gospel tradition has sometimes been seen to conflict with the biographical character of the gospels. Such is certainly the case if we conceive of the evangelists as popular story-tellers with no individuality and literary ambition. But this is an outdated conception. It has little relevance once it is realized that the preaching was a narrative kind of performance which easily could be elaborated into a historicizing biographical story.<sup>90</sup>

In order to avoid the false impression that the Jesus tradition was transmitted only passively and with no concern to use and proclaim it, it is essential to remember this kind of narrative dynamic in the gospels. The lively kerygmatic activity makes it difficult, for instance, to separate in the present gospels the traditions of what Jesus said and did publicly in the synagogue and elsewhere from the traditions of what was specifically told and shown to the disciples. This distinction played a role during the initial stages of transmission, as we noted, but in preaching and in narrative composition it was irrelevant. It is a paradoxical fact that while we have indication that Jesus taught regularly in the synagogues, we have little concrete evidence of how he actually taught there.<sup>91</sup> He probably taught from the scriptures,<sup>92</sup> and he evidently also did mighty acts there, as we have seen, but the gospels only rarely indicate a synagogal form of instruction.

---

<sup>89</sup> Cf. the discussion and literature in my article "The Historicity of Jesus" in this Handbook.

<sup>90</sup> Robert Guelich advocates the "kerygmatic hypothesis" concerning the emergence of the gospel genre and distances this from the biographical writings of the Greco-Roman antiquity ("The Gospel Genre," in Das Evangelium und die Evangelien: Vorträge vom Tübinger Symposium 1982, ed. Peter Stuhlmacher, WUNT 28 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1983), 183–219). Burrige rightly criticizes Guelich on this point, but notes that Guelich later expressed himself in favor of linking the gospel to the biographical genre (What are the Gospels?, 87–88). I fail to see that the two positions are mutually exclusive (Byrskog, "Performing the Past," 28–44).

Evidently the early Jesus tradition was never void of narrative elements which could be kerygmatically performed and elaborated. From early on, the preaching was not merely a matter of conveying separate words and deeds of Jesus, but of speaking about history as story. The narrativization of the past started immediately, as soon as the disciples heard and observed Jesus. It captured the sustained impact of Jesus as a grand narrative event. Perhaps the vibrations of this impact were felt by the first gospel author as he heard the story being summarily performed by one of the followers of Jesus. This is more likely than the idea that he somehow managed to collect both scattered pieces of sayings from traveling charismatics and local sympathizers as well as episodes from different story-tellers among the ordinary folk, or that he created his story from his own imagination. The first gospel is neither the collection of diverse pieces of information nor the abrupt disruption of all previous performances, but the biographical synthesis of oral performances making use of the transmitted Jesus tradition, on the one hand, and the author's narrative and literary ambition, on the other.

---

<sup>91</sup> Luke 4:18–27 is a rather stylized entity.

<sup>92</sup> For the yelammedenu-midrash, cf. E. Earle Ellis, Prophecy and Hermeneutic in Early Christianity: New Testament Essays, WUNT 18 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1978), 247–253; idem, “Biblical Interpretation in the New Testament Church,” in Mikra: Text, Translation, Reading and Interpretation of the Hebrew Bible in Ancient Judaism and Early Christianity, ed. Martin Jan Mulder, CRINT 2.1 (Assen: Van Gorcum, 1988), 691–725, at 706–709. It is unclear how this exegetical pattern relates to Ellis's emphasis on the written character of the pre-Easter Jesus tradition.

PHARISEES, SADDUCEES, ESSENES, HERODIANS

ÉTIENNE NODET

The principal organized Jewish groups who are mentioned in the New Testament are the Pharisees and the Sadducees; we also hear of the Herodians, who however are not defined in any way. The nature of these groups is debated, since it is often difficult to form a coherent picture on the basis of the information that we have, and the interpretation of the sources depends largely on considerations external to the texts. As is so often the case, the works of Flavius Josephus are very useful here, and we shall begin with them; we shall also draw on the New Testament and the rabbinic sources. We shall endeavor to bear in mind the specific perspective of these sources, since they are never simple documents from an archive.

Four names which will not be examined here should nevertheless be mentioned, since their identification is not obvious. First, we have the Jews: here, it is often a delicate matter to determine where there is a clearly general sense and where the reference is more specific (Judeans, or the Jewish authorities). Then we have the Christians, since it is not certain that this term was originally coined to designate the disciples of Jesus. Thirdly, we have the Nazoreans, attached to the family of Jesus. And finally, we have the Samaritans, whose origin is complex.

1. The Traditional Syntheses and their Difficulties

The Pharisees are the best known, since the rabbinic sources are largely the work of this group, and Josephus declares himself their adherent.<sup>1</sup> They were very meticulous in their observance of the written law, but they had added supplements, known as the “oral law,” which they had imposed on the people (Ant. 13.297). John Hyrcanus attempted to get rid of these “ancestral customs” because of their influence on the nation as a whole, but after the disturbances during the reign of Alexander Jannaeus, they were reestablished by Alexandra (Ant. 13.408). The New Testament too bears witness to their importance (Matt 15:2 par.). A rabbinic aphorism sums up the point: “It is more serious to teach contrary to the precepts of the scribes than contrary to the written law” (m. Sanh. 11.3). The Pharisees, whom Josephus compares to the Stoics, profess a doctrine of retribution and resurrection which is already attested in Dan 12:2; they accept the existence of angels and spirits (cf. Acts 23:8); they believe that providence (or destiny, cf. War 2.163) cooperates in every act. They tended to be neutral on political issues; all they sought was obedience to the commandments. However, obedience to a foreign power posed a problem. For example, they refused to take an oath to Herod (Ant. 15.370), and the Zealot movements, which actively resisted every earthly power, were thought to have a Pharisaic origin (Ant. 18.4). Their name, which means “separated,” corresponds well to the picture we get from the New Testament and Josephus, i.e. a clearly defined sub-group within Judaism.

---

<sup>1</sup> For a summary and synthesis, cf. E. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People's The Age of Jesus Christ, ed. G. Vermes et al. (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1973–87), 2:381–403, 404–414, 555–590.

On the other hand, if we look at two very different literary blocks—Josephus and the rabbinic tradition—they also give the impression that the Pharisees represent ordinary Judaism, separated from the nations by the covenant in general and more specifically by dietary customs. Their name has very negative connotations in the church fathers, who knew only the New Testament. It is however possible that these negative associations existed earlier, since it is possible that the name comes from the Pharisees’ opponents, and it is a fact that the rabbinic sources give other names to the persons of whom they speak. We hear of brotherhoods of haverim who observe a scrupulous purity and are distinct from “the people of the land” who, though observant, are less strict; and we hear of the hassidim, who were revered in ancient times for their piety and often for their gifts as miracle workers or prophets. We first hear of the Pharisees as a party distinct from the people as a whole during the Maccabean crisis, when the assembly of the hassidim gives its support to Mattathias (1 Macc 2:42) or Judas Maccabeus (2 Macc 14:6). They supported the new Hasmonaeen regime until the breach under John Hyrcanus which I have mentioned above.

The Sadducees are less well known. Josephus writes that they were an aristocratic party (Ant. 13.298) who were close to the priests who had governed the people from the Persian period onwards. After the Hasmonaeans, the families of the chief priests belonged to this party (cf. Acts 5:17; Ant. 20.199). Their name comes from Zadok, the high priest in the days of Solomon. His descendants retained the high priesthood, especially after the Deuteronomist reform of Josiah, who centralized the cult in Jerusalem: cf. Ezek 40:46 and Sir 51:12 (Hebrew): "Praise him who chose as priests the sons of Zadok." In terms of doctrine, they were the opponents of the Pharisees, rejecting providence, resurrection, the unwritten traditions, and even respect for the teaching of the masters (Ant. 18.16); the church fathers mistakenly believed that the Sadducees, like the Samaritans, accepted only the Pentateuch as scripture. The Mishnah mentions their teachings several times; these often take a stricter line. In any case, the Sadducees are the oldest party, because they stuck close to the literal text of the Bible. At the time of the Maccabean crisis, Hellenism had already affected the priestly milieu, and hence also the Sadducees. They rejected both the revolt and the Hasmonaean regime (which was inspired by Pharisaism) until they were promoted by John Hyrcanus in order to counter the influence of the Pharisees. They lost their influence after the Pharisees returned to favor under Alexandra, and Josephus writes that even in their official functions, they were obliged to submit to the popular Pharisaic opinions (Ant. 18.17). They disappear from sight after the disaster of 70.

Since Josephus is our primary source of information about the Pharisees and Sadducees, we must mention briefly the Essenes, the third school which is always associated with the two others. They are related to the Qumran documents, but their name is not found there. Rather, they are the "sons of Zadok." Although their name is never mentioned in the New Testament, there are remarkable similarities to the Essene institutions: the imminence of the kingdom, a new foundation in the desert, a pedagogy centered on baptism, and the emphasis on Pentecost. Their history remains vague. Josephus says that their group came into existence under Jonathan, ca. 150 CE (Ant. 13.171), and one possible interpretation of their name in Aramaic has suggested their identification with the hassidim of 1 Maccabees 2. According to the allusions in the Damascus Document, the Teacher of Righteousness, their founder, seems to have been a legitimate heir of the Oniad family, the Zadokite high priests who held office before the Maccabean crisis. He may even have been the high priest who held office between the death of Alcimus in 159 and the promotion of Jonathan in 152.

Josephus and 1 Maccabees have a gap of seven years, but this may be due to a damnatio memoriae, since our sources reflect the Hasmonaean point of view. 4QPesherHabbakuk speaks of a “wicked priest” and rejoices at his fall; this is usually taken as a reference to Jonathan, who was killed by Tryphon in 143, but some scholars see it as speaking of his successor Simon, who was assassinated in 135.

This interpretative synthesis poses many difficulties. If the Sadducees formed a legitimist party who refused allegiance to the Hasmonaean regime (at least at the outset), they are analogous to the other “sons of Zadok,” i.e. to the Essenes. But while one group became the entourage of the high priest, the other group formed conventicles which despised the sanctuary in Jerusalem (Ant. 18.19 and 1QM II, 5–6). Another problem is that we do not know to which of these groups the “Sadducees” of the rabbinical sources belong. Besides this, if the hassidim are the common ancestors of the Pharisees and the Essenes, the confusion between the various parties becomes complete. We should note here that Josephus avoids mentioning the hassidim (Ant. 12.275); he does not link them to any of the schools. He sees them only as refugees in the desert who choose Mattathias as their leader. Further, rabbinic Judaism inherits something from all three parties. The essential point is the Pharisaic line, thanks to the federative policy of Gamaliel II, but the haverim have Essene traits;<sup>2</sup> and the spirit of the Sadducees can be seen in the firm desire—seen most typically in Aqiba—to attach the oral traditions to scripture in order to preclude the existence of “two Torahs” (cf. b. Zebah. 13a). This is the origin of the various systematic rules of exegesis and of the discussions of their authoritative character.

We must look afresh at our sources, taking our starting point with the party about which we know least, viz. the Sadducees. The sources are not numerous, but the literary difficulties which they present make a preliminary examination necessary.

---

<sup>2</sup> S. Lieberman, “The Discipline in the So-Called Dead Sea Manual of Discipline,” JBL 71 (1952): 199–206.

2. The Sadducees: Historical and Literary Problems

Let us begin by refuting two common affirmations: that the Sadducees were a legitimist Zadokite party, and that they constituted the milieu of the chief priests, which therefore disappeared after 70.

An examination of the lists of the priestly succession (cf. Appendix I) shows very clearly that the notion of a Zadokite dynasty in succession to Zadok is a fiction. First of all, in the Books of Samuel and the Kings, the high priests Zadok and Abiathar do not have any identifiable Aaronic genealogy; it is Josephus who identifies the two branches which descend from the sons of Aaron, although he does not explain the interruptions. According to 1 Chron 24:3, Zadok descends from Eleazar and Ahimelech from Ithamar, but both are on the periphery of the priestly classes. Finally, in the period of the kings, the lists are artificial; the most remarkable list is that which ends with Ezra. And it is strange that the high priest Jehoiada is not mentioned—for it was he who saved the Davidic dynasty from Athaliah and lived for one hundred and thirty years (according to 2 Chron 24:15).

Our information about the Persian period is scarcely better. We have a rather brief list in Neh 12:10–11, which can be coordinated (with some difficulty) with Josephus's list of succession of high priests in the Hellenistic period (Ant. 11.347). Then we have the Oniad family, who have links to Egypt. One of them, Simon the Just, is recognized by the rabbinic tradition as one of its ancestors (m. Abot 1.2, which does not mention his priestly rank).

There is no reason to suppose that the priestly families in the Roman period belonged to the Sadducees. Josephus explicitly mentions one exception. Ananus, the high priest who tried James and had him stoned in 62, was a Sadducee. His excessive rigor led to his deposition on the arrival of Albinus, the new governor (Ant. 20.197–203), but Josephus admits that, had he not been assassinated in 69, Ananus was a man of such standing that he could have averted the war (War 4.319–321).

The assertion that the entourage of the high priest was the Sadducee party (Acts 5:17) cannot be taken as a general statement of fact: the “western” textual variant calls him Annas, and the same Annas is mentioned as high priest alongside Caiaphas at Acts 4:6. Besides this, there are a number of anachronisms in the neighboring passages, especially the mention of the Sanhedrin, which had ceased to exist after the arrival of the Roman prefects in 6, and was not reestablished until 41 at the earliest, when Claudius bestowed Judea and Samaria on King Herod Agrippa. The account of the stoning of Stephen involves the Sanhedrin, but a literary analysis reveals the presence of doublets here.<sup>3</sup> The essential elements are the double accusation and the double stoning, both spontaneous (i.e., a lynching) and legal (in the presence of witnesses). The second stoning is linked to a formal trial for blasphemy, involving the high priest and the Sanhedrin, but Stephen's name is not mentioned here. This trial, with the vision of the Son of Man and the intercession for the people, is strikingly similar to that of James, some details of which are reported by Hegesippus (apud Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 2.23.3–4)—where the high priest in office is precisely Ananus the Sadducee, at a period when there is no Roman governor (since Festus has died, and his successor has not yet arrived). The execution of James by the very persons for whom he was interceding is a perfect illustration of the figure of the Suffering Servant in Isaiah 53, and this may explain the migration of the literary motif.<sup>4</sup>

But let us return to the Sadducees. They are neither the heirs of unidentifiable Zadokites nor the milieu surrounding the chief priests, with the possible exception of Ananus in 62. There is therefore no reason to think that they suddenly disappeared after 70—especially since we find traces of the Sadducees in the rabbinic literature. We must now consider their promotion on the occasion of the celebrated banquet of Hyrcanus. We shall also look at its context.

Scholars have long observed that the brief note about the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes at Ant. 13.171–173 is very strange, for at least three reasons. First of all, the schools are described only by means of one philosophical aspect, viz. their differing views about destiny; for further details, the author refers to the second Book of his Jewish History, i.e. the somewhat lengthy exposé in War 2.119–166, in the reigns of Herod and Archelaus. Secondly, this note is inserted immediately after the paraphrase of the letter of Jonathan to the Spartans (1 Macc 12:6–18), and has no visible link to the context. Thirdly, it comes in place of the letter of Areus, king of Sparta, which immediately follows that of Jonathan in 1 Macc 12:19–23, and which Josephus has reported in what he believes to be its correct chronological context, under Seleucus IV (187–175, cf. Ant. 12.225–227).

<sup>3</sup> Cf. the analyses by M.-É. Boismard and A. Lamouille, Les Actes des deux Apôtres, EB NS 12–14, 3 vols. (Paris: Gabalda 1990).

<sup>4</sup> See a fuller statement in É. Nodet, Le Fils de Dieu: Procès de Jésus et évangiles (Paris: Éd. du Cerf 2002), 330–341.

This note is certainly the work of Josephus himself, who refers explicitly to it shortly afterwards in his account of the banquet of Hyrcanus (Ant. 13.288–298). At the close of this episode, Hyrcanus, who is suspected by the Pharisees of being the son of a slave woman, parts company with them and associates henceforward with the Sadducees. Josephus completes the notes to which he has referred, by explaining the controversy between the Pharisees and Sadducees about the oral tradition, and concludes by referring once again to the second Book of his Jewish War.

There is nevertheless one strange point. In Ant. 15.371, when he mentions the exemptions from taxation which Herod had granted to the Pharisees and the Essenes, Josephus says that he will speak later about these schools, without referring to his note under Jonathan. He presents the schools in Ant. 18.11–22, in the time of Judas the Galilean, and he refers in this context to the parallel exposé in “the second Book of the War of the Jews.” He says that the schools have existed “from very remote times,” but he does not take the opportunity to refer his reader to the notes from the times of Jonathan and John Hyrcanus. In this new exposé, he briefly distinguishes the Pharisees from the Sadducees on the basis of their views about destiny, the immortality of the soul, and the observance of the laws. He then speaks of their societal impact. He summarizes what he has said in the War about these two schools and about the Essenes, without adding any new doctrinal element. The only place where he speaks clearly of the fundamental difference between Pharisees and Sadducees with regard to scripture and the oral tradition is the appendix to the banquet of Hyrcanus, which I have mentioned above.

All this is readily explained if we suppose a redaction of the Antiquities in various stages. Initially, Josephus will have simply followed the War step by step, elaborating or condensing as he does elsewhere, depending on the documentation that is available to him. This would account for the note in Ant. 18, which comes at the appropriate place. Later, Josephus will have inserted the two notes in Ant. 13, in close proximity to Hyrcanus’s banquet.—Let us compare the two texts.

---

War 1

(67) These successes of John [Hyrcanus] and of his sons made them be envied, and occasioned a sedition in the country. And there were many who got together, and would not be at rest until they broke out into open war, in which they were beaten. (68) So John lived the rest of his life very happily... He it was who alone had three of the most desirable things in the world—the government of his nation, and the high priesthood, and the gift of prophecy.

---

Antiquities 13

(288) This prosperous state of affairs moved the Jews to envy Hyrcanus;

but they that were the worst disposed to him were the Pharisees, who were one of the sects of the Jews, as we have informed you already (§ 172). They have so great a power over the multitude, that when they say anything against the king, or against the high priest, etc.

[289–298: the story of the banquet, at the close of which he is alienated from the Pharisees and comes closer to the Sadducees. This leads the people to hate him and his sons. A note about the customs of the schools.]

(299) When Hyrcanus had put an end to this sedition, he after that lived happily... He was esteemed by God worthy of three of the greatest privileges—the government of his nation, the dignity of the high priesthood, and prophecy.

---

The banquet is inappropriate to the context, which speaks of seditions and then of Hyrcanus's success on every level. With regard to the literary composition, a comparison of the two texts (see above) shows that this is the reprise of a passage from the War, into which the episode is inserted clumsily. The account in the War, although poorly documented, is coherent, but we cannot say the same of the parallel in the Antiquities. Something is missing between the envy of the Jews and the crushing of the sedition (299): the hatred of the people, which ensues upon the banquet, is not the same thing as a sedition that is crushed.

This means that the insertion of the banquet has disturbed the context somewhat, and this suggests a redactional revision.—The Talmud gives a very similar account of a banquet (b. Qid. 66a), but this is dated to the reign of Alexander Jannaeus. This corresponds better to the hatred of the people, who did not accept Alexander as high priest and also suspected him of having been born in unworthy circumstances. On his deathbed, Alexander recommends to his wife Alexandra that she restore power to the Pharisees, and this suggests that it was he who had removed them from the government (Ant. 13.401).—One final point: there is reason to believe that Josephus is mistaken, or else that one of his sources has led him into errors.<sup>5</sup>

J. Sievers has offered a good defense of the thesis that a large-scale redactional revision was made, extending as far as the note about the schools in the time of Jonathan.<sup>6</sup> First of all, the two passages (both of which are inserted in a bizarre manner) are linked by a cross-reference, although the Antiquities never subsequently refers to them. Secondly, the note about the schools is roughly as long as Josephus's version of the letter of Areus. The hypothesis is that the note replaced the letter of Areus in a text which was already "formatted" in columns, either because the letter had already been paraphrased twice (both in its chronological place and in its literary place), or because Josephus had decided to move it to another place. It was necessary to present the Pharisees and Sadducees before Hyrcanus's banquet, but an appropriate place had to be found. Another factor is Josephus's wish to emphasize that the schools were ancient institutions, as he had already affirmed at Ant. 18.11.

Why did Josephus undertake revisions of this kind? It may be that he had discovered new documents, but inserted these clumsily. It is also possible that the impression of clumsiness is mistaken: Josephus is attempting to eliminate a discontinuity in the Hasmonaean line, since there is no good explanation of the transition between John Hyrcanus, the exceptional high priest, and Alexander Jannaeus, a king whose provenance was suspect. At any rate, the fact that the note about the schools is inserted under Jonathan does not entitle us to conclude that the names “Pharisees” and “Sadducees” are attested at such an early date. The corrections proposed here mean that these names do not appear before Alexander Jannaeus (103–76 BCE).

---

<sup>5</sup> This is demonstrated by E. Main, "Les Sadducéens selon Josephé," RB 97 (1990): 161–206. The same view is taken by G. Stemberger, Pharisäer, Sadduzäer, Essener, SBS 144 (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk 1991), 100–102.

<sup>6</sup> J. Sievers, "Josephus, First Maccabees, Sparta, The Three Haireseis—and Cicero," JSJ 32 (2001): 241–251.

3. The Schools According to Josephus

After mentioning his own priestly origins, Josephus writes that he attended the schools of the Pharisees, the Sadducees, and the Essenes in his youth, before choosing to follow the Pharisees (Life 10). The order here is the same as in the note at War 2.119 which is reproduced at Ant. 13.171. At Ant. 18.11, although he refers the reader explicitly to the War, he gives the list in the reverse order, but this is easily explained. Josephus has just spoken of a fourth and most recent philosophical school, which has unfortunately been founded by Judas the Galilean and the Pharisee Zadok. It is therefore natural that he should move backwards in time to the earlier foundations. This seems to be confirmed by the next passage in the text, in which he describes the four schools and presents them in the customary order.

He also states clearly that the Essenes are more recent than the two others, and adds that the Pharisees constitute the “first” school and the Sadducees the “second” (War 2.162–164). When Josephus defines the Sadducees as an opposing school, this is always in relation to the Pharisees.

With the exception of the Essenes, he does not describe the functioning of the schools. He employs a varied terminology; the most typical designations are hairesis (War 2 and Ant. 13) and philosophia (Ant. 18). The latter term, which Josephus also employs about Philo and about his own philosophical intentions, comes from his apologetic concern to relate these schools to Greek models with which his readers will be familiar: the Pharisees are analogous to the Stoics (Life 12), the Essenes to the Pythagoreans (Ant. 15.371), and the Sadducees to the Epicureans. This third analogy is not expressed directly, but it can be inferred from the similarity of his descriptions. According to Josephus, the Epicureans “eliminate providence from life and do not believe that God is concerned with human affairs” (Ant. 10.278); later, he declares that the Sadducees “reject destiny, believing that it does not exist and that it plays no role in human affairs” (Ant. 13.173). Josephus does not push this comparison too far, since the Epicureans reject the idea of a creator God and a fortiori of a natural law, and this has very concrete consequences: those who held such views would no longer belong to Judaism. He writes polemically that the Epicureans “do not believe that everything is governed by the blessed and immortal Being in view of the permanence of the universe. They claim that the world moves on its own, without a conductor or guide” (Ant. 10.279). The ancient character and the permanence of a nation mean nothing to an Epicurean. Josephus’s argument against the Epicureans, which he elaborates on the basis of the visions of Daniel, is the success of prophecy.

The other term which Josephus employs, hairesis, refers more to the way in which the law is observed. He writes that the Sadducees are concerned to observe the law, but that they must submit to the opinions of the Pharisees, if they wish to be accepted by the people (Ant. 18.17). This is not a question of philosophy, but of practices and of legal decisions, since the usages of the Pharisees include non-biblical customs which have been received from “the tradition of the elders.” The same is true of the Essenes. Josephus writes that their way of life is very attractive, but their system of purity forbids them to have any contact with anyone, whether Jew or not, who does not belong to their group (War 2.150–158). Some of the Qumran texts show that the declared intention of the group was nothing less than a renewal of the covenant.

Josephus defines the relationship between the Pharisees and Sadducees as follows (Ant. 13.297): “The Pharisees have delivered to the people a great many observances by succession from their fathers, which are not written in the laws of Moses; and for that reason it is that the Sadducees reject them, and say that we are to esteem those observances to be obligatory which are in the written word, but are not to observe what is derived from the tradition of our forefathers.” Contrary to what is often asserted, Josephus does not say that the Pharisees have suddenly added something to Moses, but only that they have disseminated their non-scriptural traditions among the people, apparently for a very long time. Nor does he say that the Sadducees are opposed to a new attempt at dissemination or to a new kind of proselytism, but that they are reacting to an established situation in which the people have in fact accepted the customs to which they object. Josephus clearly depicts the Sadducees as more recent than the Pharisees. Although Josephus formulates in the Greek manner<sup>7</sup> the debate with the masters about wisdom, he indicates where the origins of this Sadducee school lie, viz. in the rejection of everything in the teaching of the masters that was not based on scripture. It is clear that the law of Moses does not say everything, either about customs or about penalties; besides this, it contains contradictions or at least incoherencies. It is therefore necessary to interpret it. The Sadducees' attitude is therefore one of criticizing the tradition of the masters (whether these were Sadducees or not) in order to select those things that can be linked to scripture and reject the rest. Josephus tells us that this led to vehement controversies (War 2.166). He also adds that the Sadducees were very strict in their verdicts, as we have seen in the case of Ananus (Ant. 20.199), while the Pharisees were more indulgent in meting out penalties (13.294). This somewhat sectarian attitude, governed by a considerable intolerance vis-à-vis differences in customs, offers a very good parallel to the attitude of the Essenes, although the style is different. In both cases, the breach is the result of a position taken with regard to the written law of Moses. The Pharisees, on the other hand, were "very devoted to one another and seek to remain in communion with the entire nation" (War 2.166). This statement seems at first sight hard to accept, for Josephus speaks in other passages of the religious extremism of the Pharisees, and the name itself means "separated." But this problem is resolved when we bear in mind that the Pharisees, as the oldest non-priestly school, served as a point of reference on many matters.

---

<sup>7</sup> Cf. D. Daube, “Rabbinic Methods of Interpretation and Hellenistic Rhetoric,” HUCA 22 (1949): 239–264.

We must therefore conclude that the Sadducees emerged at a later date than the Pharisees. As for the Essenes, we have two indications of a certain age. First, Philo knows and appreciates them, although he has nothing at all to say about the Pharisees and the Sadducees. Given the extreme importance which he attaches to scripture—properly interpreted—we must admit that he saw the same priority in the Essenes. Secondly, War 1.78–80 mentions an aged Essene named Judas, who made a prediction that came true in the reign of King Aristobulus, i.e. before Alexander Jannaeus and the affair of the Sadducees. This supposes that the movement had already reached a measure of maturity by that date. Nevertheless, we must distinguish between the chronology of the appearance of the names (which were bestowed by outsiders) and the origin of the schools themselves.

One question remains unclear. Both the Essenes and the Sadducees claimed the authority of Zadok, although these two schools were very different. Since the data in Josephus shed no light on this question, we must look at the other sources, as well as at the status enjoyed by scripture.

4. Scripture and the Pharisees

The Sadducees insisted on tracing everything back to scripture. But how was the authority of scripture to be determined? This was certainly not a matter of course, as the classical example of Neh 13:1–3 shows. Here we are told that the book of Moses was read aloud in the presence of the people, “and it was found written that no Ammonite or Moabite should ever enter the assembly of God . . . When the people heard the law, they separated from Israel all those of foreign descent.” However, if we read the passage quoted here, Deut 23:3–6, in context, the most obvious meaning is on the contrary that strangers should be welcomed—with the notable exception of the Ammonites and Moabites. This sudden discovery of the law of Moses recalls the novel character of the law of Moses which was proclaimed earlier by the Babylonian Ezra and then interpreted in his presence (Neh 8:13). The conclusion that is drawn from the law seems arbitrary, for there is no apparent principle of interpretation; this however can be discerned in the following passage. On his second journey from Babylon to Jerusalem, Nehemiah sees Jewish men who are married to women from Ashdod, Ammon, and Moab. He deplores the fact that “half of their children speak the language of Ashdod, and they could not speak the language of Judah.” After severely reprimanding them, Nehemiah “cleanses” the people “of everything foreign” (13:30). Nehemiah does not put forward any argument from scripture in support of this reform or of the others that he undertakes. A principle of interpretation can be discerned: the reformers Ezra and Nehemiah impose their traditional customs without reference to scripture, and then place their work under the authority of a verse to which an ad hoc meaning is attributed.

It is not difficult to see the Nehemiah of this second mission as an ancestor of the Pharisees with their unwritten (i.e., non-scriptural) Babylonian traditions. It was only at a subsequent stage that he himself or his successors were confronted with the growing authority of scripture—which might be called the preoccupation of the Sadducees in embryonic form.

The Books of the Maccabees provide other indications of the emergence of the authority of scripture. According to 2 Macc 2:13–14, Nehemiah “founded a library and collected the books about the kings and prophets, and the writings of David, and letters of kings about votive offerings. In the same way Judas also collected all the books.” The first thing we notice is the absence of the name of Moses. Secondly, the person of Nehemiah, whether or not he is a “front man” here, expresses the link between non-scriptural Babylonian traditions and important writings which were circulating in Judea. Finally, we may wonder whether Judas Maccabeus, who is portrayed here as Nehemiah’s successor, was not himself a man of Babylonian culture, at least in 2 Maccabees, since he is not attached in any way to the priest Mattathias of Modein, and we hear of the very oriental feast of Purim (2 Macc 15:36).

When the crisis broke out, 2 Macc 5:23–6:2 explains that the nation had two temples, which were profaned symmetrically by the Seleucid armies. Josephus adds to these narratives the information that Onias, the high priest who was in office in Jerusalem before the crisis (or his son),<sup>8</sup> left for Egypt and founded at Heliopolis a temple similar to that in Jerusalem. The most remarkable fact is this multiplicity of sanctuaries, which is contrary to the express stipulations of Deuteronomy, which insists on one single sanctuary where the name of Yahweh will dwell,<sup>9</sup> but does not say where this is to be built. This means that the Book of Deuteronomy did not enjoy any great authority in the period of the crisis, but it seems to have acquired greater authority at the time of the redaction of 1 Maccabees, which contains no references either to Onias or to Garizim.

This problem of the uniqueness of the sanctuary reappears a little later under a different form. Josephus reports, immediately after the foundation by Onias, a quarrel between Jews and Samaritans at Alexandria (Ant. 13.74–79). The former maintained that the temple built according to the laws of Moses was that in Jerusalem, while the latter held that Garizim was this temple. They brought their disputes before <sup>8</sup> Cf. War 1.33 and 7.423–425. According to Ant. 13.61–64, it is his son, since the high priest died before the crisis (12.237), as 2 Macc 4:30–35 also indicates; according to Ant. 20.236, it is his nephew. There is in fact a considerable amount of confusion in Josephus’s sources, and he attempts to unify the lists of disparate names (cf. 12.237–240).

---

<sup>9</sup> Elie Bickerman, “Un document relatif à la persécution d’Antiochus IV Épiphane,” RHR 115 (1937): 188–223 (E. J. Bickerman, Studies in Jewish and Christian History, trans. B. McNeil, 2nd ed. [Leiden: Brill, 2007] 376–407), seeks to explain the difference in the Seleucid persecutions of the Jews and of the Samaritans. He holds that the two groups considered the rededication of the two temples to Zeus (2 Macc 6:1–2)—an equal treatment, strictly speaking—as only a minor point; and this is presupposed by the context. Once again, however, this implies that the constant precept of Deuteronomy that Yahweh “makes his name to dwell there,” and not any other name, was not authoritative.

Ptolemy VI Philometer himself (180–145), demanding that he put the adherents of the false temple to death. The representatives of the two camps, whose names are given in the narrative, swear that the only evidence they will put forward is taken from the law. Josephus writes that the Jews were made uneasy by this menace to their temple, and then reports the allegedly decisive argumentation of their spokesman, viz. the precise succession of the high priests and their good reputation with the kings of Asia, whereas no one knows the temple of Garizim. These, however, are not scriptural proofs. At this time, then, there is no longer room for two temples—but this seems to be something new, or else repristinated.

Another passage indicates that the Hasmonaeans had a new relationship to scripture, taken as a whole. According to 1 Macc 12:6–22, the high priest Jonathan (152–142) addresses to the Spartans the letter mentioned above, in which he proposes the renewal of an ancient treaty of friendship between the high priest Onias and their King, Areus. Jonathan writes that the Jews are willing to renew this alliance, “though we have no need of these things, since we have as encouragement the holy books which are in our hands.” An appendix to this letter quotes the ancient letter of Areus, in which he declares that he possesses a document which shows the Spartans and the Jews to be “brethren and of the family of Abraham.” The alliance which the text then proposes consists of making peace on the question of cattle. The ancient letter of Areus to Onias is an example of the well known genre called hieros logos, which was common in Ptolemaic Egypt, viz. an account of a foundation which appeals to a more or less mythical relationship from ancient times. In any case, this is far removed from what we read in the Bible. The important point here is that in the days of Jonathan, ca. 150, the high priest in Jerusalem, the first of the Hasmonaeon line, declares that he possesses the sacred books and ascribes to these a considerable authority.

Taken as a whole, then, these facts reveal a growing authority of scripture among the Jews in the second century, in the face of a system of Jewish customs which originated in Babylon and is represented by Nehemiah and Judas Maccabeus. Originally, there is no doubt that this ensemble, which we may call “proto-Pharisaic,” interested only limited groups such as those repatriated Jews who put their signature to the inaugural agreement according to Neh 10:1–40. The development of the Hasmonaeon state, with the official recognition of Simon by Rome in 142 (1 Macc 15:16–21) and the policy of expansion conducted by his son John Hyrcanus (134–104), made this the point of reference for an entire people, especially within the context of the Roman world, and this permits us to combine the two aspects of the Pharisees which Josephus relates: on the one hand, there is a widespread popular dimension, while at the same time these masters were the guardians of the spirit of Nehemiah and scrupulously preserved their separation. This is indeed the meaning of the term “Pharisee,” but it is not attested prior to Alexander Jannaeus, i.e. at the period when he resolved to establish the Hasmonaean state on other foundations.

If scripture did indeed assume a growing authority in the aftermath of Nehemiah, Judas Maccabeus, and the Hasmonaeans, we would expect the emergence of “reformers” who sought to go back to the strict letter of scripture, like the Qaraites at a later period. The Sadducees were one such group. But we must still explain their name.

5. The Sadducees in the New Testament

There are few references to the Sadducees in the New Testament: only 14, as opposed to 98 mentions of the Pharisees. All that we have is a narrative in the synoptic gospels of a discussion with Jesus about the resurrection and a few mentions in Matthew and Acts. Unlike the Pharisees, they are mentioned neither in John nor in the epistles. Instead of imagining that other names (the chief priests, the Herodians, or the scribes) conceal the Sadducees, let us simply look at the explicit references.

It is after the passage about the taxes owed to Caesar that the synoptic gospels present the discussion between the Sadducees<sup>10</sup> and Jesus about the resurrection (Matt 22:23–33; Mark 12:18–27; Luke 20:27–38). The only definition we are given is that they deny the resurrection of the dead. The argument they put forward is the law of levirate marriages, which prescribes that when a man dies and leaves a widow but no children, the posterity of the dead man is to be ensured by his brother, who must therefore marry the widow, his sister-in-law (Deut 25:5–6). The Sadducees set out a scholastic question involving seven brothers: the first marries and dies childless, then the second brother marries the widow but likewise dies childless. The same happens to the rest of the brothers. Finally, the woman too dies, without having remarried. This leads to the question: In the resurrection, whose wife will she be, since all seven had her?

---

<sup>10</sup> Cf. E. Main, “Les sadducéens et la résurrection des morts: comparaison entre Mc 12,18–27 et Lc 20,27–38,” RB 103 (1996): 411–432, with an extensive bibliography.

The thesis of the Sadducees is clear, and it has a perfect scriptural basis: the very idea of resurrection contradicts an explicit commandment of Moses. The point at issue is not the immortality of the soul, but the resurrection of the body, which appears to presuppose the continuation of the conjugal bond. The Sadducees play on the word “resurrection.” Deut 25:6 says: “The first son whom she bears [to the levirate husband] shall rise up<sup>11</sup> in the name of his brother who is dead”: “rise up” is the word used later for “to rise from the dead.” The verse is quoted by the Sadducees in a slightly different form: “He will raise up the posterity of his brother,” with the verb “raise up” which is at the center of the ensuing discussion. For the Sadducees, therefore, the survival of a human being, or his “resurrection,” is his posterity, and the idea of a final resurrection of bodies is meaningless—quite apart from the fact that it is not mentioned explicitly in scripture.

Jesus’ reply is given in two slightly different forms. In Matthew and Mark, we read: “You are mistaken, because you know neither the scripture nor the power of God.” Jesus goes on to explain that at the resurrection, people do not marry, and that they are like the angels in heaven: such is the power of God. As for scripture, Jesus suspects that they have not read Exod 3:6 very carefully—“I am the God of Abraham and the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob”—and he concludes: “He is not the God of the dead, but of the living.” This implies that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are alive today,<sup>12</sup> since their God is the God of the living. The Sadducees are reduced to silence, and the Pharisees (Matt 22:34) or the scribes (Mark 12:28) do not fail to notice this fact. This reconstruction of the reasoning does not in the least mean that Jesus affirms the immortality of the soul. If God is the God of the living, we must ask what a “living” person is when one is speaking of the dead. The answer is that this refers to those whose name has survived and is written in the “Book of Life” for which the law of Moses (the Pentateuch) may serve as an excellent metaphor: it is a “Book of Life” and the names of the patriarchs are written in it, together with their history.

<sup>11</sup> MT מִקְוִי; the LXX has κατασταθήσεται, “he will be established” (probably from מִקְוִי), without any visible link to the ἀνίστημι, ἀνάστασις of the synoptic gospels, which work directly from the Hebrew text.

<sup>12</sup> I.e., by the intermediary of their name. Similarly, at Acts 3:6, Peter restores health to the paralytic “in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth.” Baptism “in the name of Jesus” has a similar nature.

Luke’s version has somewhat different nuances and prolongs the reflection. Jesus begins as follows: “The sons of this age marry and are given in marriage; but those who are accounted worthy to attain to that age and to the resurrection from the dead neither marry nor are given in marriage, for they cannot die any more, because they are equal to angels and are sons of God, being sons of the resurrection.” The pivotal point of these words is the intervention of another authority who “judges worthy.” We are not told whether this is a judgment or an act of election, but the result is that those who are judged worthy are “sons of God.” Here too, therefore, it is not a question of the immortality of the soul as such; these are the “sons of God” who escape from death. When will this take place? Two indications are given: “that age” (“the other world”) and “the resurrection of the dead.” Let us look at the context: at the beginning of this pericope, the Sadducees put a difficult question about the final resurrection, but at the close, Jesus demonstrates by means of a verse from scripture that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are living today. By analogy, the “other world” is not located in some indeterminate future: it exists today. Luke emphasizes that Yahweh is the God of the living, who thus include Abraham and the others. The sphere of those sons of God who do not die is therefore the union of two elements which in principle are distinct, viz. the other world which is present now and the final resurrection.<sup>13</sup>

These observations are illustrated by another debate, this time between Pharisees and Sadducees, which is provoked by Paul (Acts 23:1–9). The tribune Lysias, wishing to know the nature of the accusations brought against Paul, has him brought before the Sanhedrin, where he causes a storm by declaring that he stands accused because of his Pharisaic positions, viz. “the hope and the resurrection of the dead.” Some Pharisees take Paul’s side, saying: “We find nothing wrong in this man. What if a spirit or an angel spoke to him?” This means that they understand “resurrection” not as a return to life by the dead at the end of time, but as the immediate manifestation of another life after death under the form of a spirit or an angel. At Acts 12:15, when

---

<sup>13</sup> Cf. M.-É. Boismard, Faut-il encore parler de “résurrection”? Les données scripturaires, Coll. “Théologies” (Paris: Éd. du Cerf 1995).

Peter (who was thought to be dead) comes and knocks at the door of Mary's house, some of the disciples refuse to admit that it is indeed the apostle, and declare: "It is his angel." They mean that it is the one who bears his name, since Peter has died the death of a just man. In the same way, when he speaks before the Sanhedrin, Paul takes care not to speak of Jesus, but only of "resurrection" in some form or other, so that he can win over the Pharisees and divide the assembly.

In this debate, the Sadducees have a simple and strictly rational position, almost a positivist stance. The Pharisees, who declare their belief in the resurrection, use various expressions to affirm that the just have another life after death. Here, they allude to angels and spirits; we have seen above that Jesus plays on a verse from scripture to conclude that the patriarchs are still alive. The formulations in Josephus are more or less happy: the Pharisees do not lose sight of the body, either in the present day or at the end of time. But he does not succeed in expressing this in the dualistic language, of Greek origin, which makes a distinction between the soul and the body. It is characteristic that the Athenians, when Paul speaks to them, refuse to listen to him once he speaks of the resurrection,<sup>14</sup> i.e. of an accidental disturbance of the immutable laws of nature (Acts 17:30–32). In view of these genuine difficulties, it is easy for the Sadducees to declare that neither the resurrection nor dualism is proved by scripture.

Let us sum up: in the two debates about the resurrection, one involving Jesus and the other before the Sanhedrin, the Pharisees and the Sadducees appear very close to the definitions which Josephus gives of them, but with some nuances which serve to cover the case of Jesus himself.

There are few other references to the Sadducees in the New Testament: four times in Matthew (but always together with the Pharisees) and twice in Acts (without the Pharisees, in the circumstances seen above). Let us look at the instances in Matthew.

In order to describe the redaction of Matthew, we must begin by noting that he is at least partly unaware of the opposition between Pharisees and Sadducees. After the discussion about the resurrection which we have examined above, Matt 22:34–35 says: "But when the Pharisees heard that he had silenced the Sadducees, they came together,”<sup>15</sup> and one of them<sup>16</sup> “asked him a question, to test him.” We could infer from this that the Pharisees and the Sadducees constitute two opposing schools, but this is not stated clearly. The only point which is stated unambiguously is their opposition to Jesus, which is thus not limited to the Sadducees alone. The parallel accounts present a different story. According to Mark 12:28, a scribe is delighted by Jesus’ reply to the Sadducees, and puts a question to him without polemic; it follows that this scribe agrees with Jesus against the Sadducees. At Luke 10:25, it is a lawyer who interrogates Jesus, and here too the aim is to put him to the test. But the context is different, without any definite link to the Sadducees, and the polemical note is rather restrained.

---

<sup>14</sup> These debates of Paul at Athens, in which Epicureans and Stoics take part (Acts 17:18), are analogous to the debate which Paul stirs up in the Sanhedrin: it suffices to follow Josephus, and compare the Pharisees to the Stoics and the Sadducees to the Epicureans. But scripture is replaced by the philosophical tradition.

Like the Sadducees, the Pharisees as an organized body are adversaries of Jesus. The synoptic gospels tell us that when John preached baptism, many people went to him: “Jerusalem and all Judea and all the region about the Jordan” (Matt 3:5); “all the country of Judea, and all the people of Jerusalem” (Mark 1:5); “the multitudes” (Luke 3:7). John meets them with invective: “You brood of vipers! Who warned you to flee from the wrath to come?” Matthew introduces these words as follows: “But when he saw many of the Pharisees and Sadducees coming for baptism, he said to them...” In Matthew, the invective is directed specifically against the Pharisees and the Sadducees together.

In Matt 16:1–4, the Pharisees and the Sadducees ask Jesus for a sign from heaven, in order to put him to the test. This passage forms a doublet with 12:38–39, where it is the scribes and the Pharisees who ask for a sign. In both cases, Jesus replies that the only sign they will receive is that of Jonah. If we bring in the definitions by Josephus at this point (even if only in a summary fashion), we may judge the request by the Pharisees for a sign from heaven to be plausible, but the same request on the lips of Sadducees is highly abnormal, since it accords very badly with their refusal to accept any kind of providence.

At Matt 16:6, Jesus warns his disciples against the leaven of the Pharisees and the Sadducees; the same phrase recurs in v. 11. In the explanation given in v. 12, this “leaven” is defined as “the teaching of the Pharisees and Sadducees.” This doctrinal agreement is otherwise unheard-of. At Mark 8:15, Jesus warns against “the leaven of the Pharisees and the leaven of Herod,” making a better distinction between two different spheres. Luke 12:1 speaks of “the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy.” This confirms what we have said above. The Pharisees and the Sadducees are known primarily from their controversies, at least according to the other sources. Their common doctrine, to the extent that this was distinct from average Judaism, is nowhere defined as such. The only identifiable point they share is their opposition to Jesus.

<sup>15</sup> This is a rather clear allusion to Ps 2:2 LXX, συνήχθησαν ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτό, where the kings and leaders assembled in one and the same place against the Lord and against his Anointed.

<sup>16</sup> The Ecumenical French translation of the Bible specifies: “a lawyer,” which is a lectio difficilior.

We may sum up the results of our examination of Matthew’s Gospel: to begin with, there is no clear doctrinal opposition between Pharisees and Sadducees. Secondly, the two schools constitute a joint opposition either to Jesus himself or to his later disciples. And finally, these two schools are inseparable; or more precisely, whenever Jesus debates with the Sadducees, the Pharisees too are present. But there is no reciprocity here. In many scenes, the Pharisees appear without any allusion to the Sadducees.

We have thus two very separate situations. Most frequently, we find the opposition between Jesus and the Pharisees alone; more rarely, the opposition is between Jesus and the block of “Pharisees and Sadducees.” This block appears especially in the admonitions which Jesus addresses to his disciples. We must therefore ask whether the name “Pharisees” is used in two very distinct contexts: they are the adversaries of Jesus when they are alone, and the adversaries of his later disciples when they are coupled with the Sadducees. This would be a reference to tensions in Judea, since one form of this gospel was handed on by the Nazoraeans and the Ebionites.<sup>17</sup> And Josephus himself relates that when he was in Galilee, Simon b. Gamaliel went to the chief priests Ananus and Jesus to convince them that he was going to attack Jerusalem (Life 189–195); Ananus initially hesitated because of the popularity of Josephus, but then let himself be bribed and dispatched troops to Galilee. This was the high priest Ananus whose virtues are praised by Josephus at War 4.319–321; this praise becomes very vague when Josephus shows that the execution of James was a serious error (Ant. 20.197–203), and now, more than twenty-five years later, he depicts a hostile collusion between two of the principal leaders, a Pharisee and a Sadducee, something that he does not mention explicitly in his first redaction (War 2.627). Since Josephus's autobiography sets out his claims to be recognized as the guide of his nation, we must conclude that this collusion still had a significance at the time of writing; the doctrinal divergences between the two men play no part in this matter. It is possible—since the Sadducees had not disappeared—that Josephus envisaged here the groups associated with Jabne-Jamnia at the period of their foundation by Gamaliel II, the son of this Simon.

---

<sup>17</sup> This is the “Gospel according to the Hebrews” of which Eusebius speaks (Hist. Eccl. 3.27.4).

6. Sadducees, Zadukim, bene Zadok

We must now see what the Hebrew sources have to tell us about the zadukim or bene Zadok, the “sons of Zadok” or “Zadokites.”

The rabbinic zadukim have long been identified with the Sadducees of Josephus and the New Testament, but this identification has never supplied a clear synthesis, thanks to the difficulty of reconciling the Sadducee milieu—seen as Hellenized, Epicurean, and close to the chief priests—with the rabbinic zadukim who engage in controversies about the fine points of the law. The discovery in the Cairo Geniza of the Damascus Document (CD) at the end of the nineteenth century generated some discussion, but without firm conclusions, since this text is both very strict with regard to the law and clearly “Zadokite” in the sense that it seeks to promote a community of “sons of Zadok.” Some scholars judged it to be a Sadducee document, because of this name, but others could not accept this rapprochement of marginal persons with the allegedly Hellenized milieu of the chief priests, and appealed to a number of rabbinic parallels to support their claim that the text came from Pharisaic circles. Others envisaged “Sadducee Christians.”<sup>18</sup>

The discoveries at Qumran, which include fragments of CD, have shed a new light on this question, because some major documents tend to show that the group in Qumran considered themselves bene Zadok, and hence “Sadducees.” However, the rapprochements between these new documents and the Essenes of Josephus and Philo are incontestable, and this led to the specter of a strange identification between “Sadducees” and “Essenes.”

---

<sup>18</sup> Cf. the prudent introduction by R. H. Charles, Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament (Oxford: Clarendon 1913), 2:785–797. Charles tends towards the position that the text comes from a party of reformed Sadducees.

The rabbinic sources speak of the zadukim and the beithusin. These are two kinds of apostates, since they are placed in the same category as the Epicureans and Boethus, who was appointed to the high priesthood by Herod the Great ca. 20 BCE and who married his own daughter. Boethus came from Alexandria and may be considered close to Philo. However, these interpretations conceal the ancient debates. Let us look here only at a few significant texts.

According to m. Abot 1.8, the maxim which guided Antigonus of Soko, the successor of Simon the Just at the beginning of the second century, was: "Do not be like slaves who serve their master on condition that they receive their fixed ration,<sup>19</sup> but be like slaves who serve their master unconditionally. May the fear of Heaven be upon you, and your salary will be doubled in the world to come."<sup>20</sup> The first part of this aphorism can be interpreted in two ways: either as an invitation to an uncalculating confidence in providence, so that the second part announces benefits to be bestowed at an undefined date; or else as a denial of the resurrection, so that the second part is a later addition. The commentary elaborates the latter meaning: some disciples declared that the ancient doctrine was better, and this led to the formation of two dissident groups, the zadukim and the beithusin.

A different view was held by the Qaraite Qirqisani in the tenth century. He took over this tradition and reported the opinions of Zadok and Boethus on a number of points of the law; he also related that Zadok had written a book. This means that he regarded the Sadducees and Boethusians as dissidents, but not in the least as apostates. Obviously, he was defending his own position, because the Qaraites, who emerged in Egypt in the eighth century, advocated a return to sola scriptura. They were greatly encouraged by the discovery at this period of biblical manuscripts in the caves of Qumran (including Sirach and the Damascus Document). In one sense, they were neo-Sadducees. The Book of Zadok which Qirqisani cites has been identified beyond any doubt with the Damascus Document.<sup>21</sup>

Qirqisani's testimony allows us to get behind the rabbinic sources and see that the origin of the Sadducees and the Boethusians involved more than the dissidences of apostate groups. Let me mention some examples.

<sup>19</sup> Cf. E. J. Bickerman, "The Maxim of Antigonus of Soko," HTR 45 (1951): 153–155.

<sup>20</sup> The last clause is attested only in 'Abot. R. Natan A.5; the scholion makes Zadok and Boethus disciples of Antigonus.

<sup>21</sup> Cf. A. Paul, Écrits de Qoumran et sectes juives au premiers siècles de l'Islam. Recherches sur les origines du Qaraïsme (Paris: Letouzey 1969), 71.

The Boethusians disagreed with the Pharisees about the date of Pentecost. After the regulations about the Passover and the seven days of unleavened bread, Lev 23:11 says that the offering of the first sheaf of the harvest must be made “on the morrow after the sabbath.” The date of Pentecost is then fixed at the end of “seven full weeks” from the day of this offering. But there are several ways of understanding this computation, since the term “sabbath,” which also had the meaning “full moon,” can also be applied to the Passover of 15th Nisan; besides this, the seven full weeks can either begin on any day in the week, or else be intact, i.e. begin on a Sunday. The rabbinic tradition, Philo, Josephus, and some targums hold that in this text, “the sabbath” means the Passover. This means that the harvest and the offering of the sheaf took place on the 16th. The Boethusians, however, declared that the rite of the sheaf could be carried out only on the day after the “feast day” (m. Menah. 10.3). Since the “feast day” in question was the Passover, they carried out the offering of the sheaf on the day after the sabbath which followed the Passover (b. Menah. 65b). However, this simple interpretation did not fit the lunar calendar, since on average, the Passover falls on a sabbath one year in seven, and this means that the day after the sabbath is also the day after the feast. There is one obvious solution: if the Boethusians followed the calendar of the Book of Jubilees, where 1st Nisan (the first month) is always a Wednesday,<sup>22</sup> the same is necessarily true of the Passover feast on the 15th, and there is thus no difficulty about offering the sheaf on the day after the sabbath which follows the 15th, i.e. on the 19th of the month; we could even go as far as the sabbath which falls on the 26th, if we assume that the seven days of unleavened bread are all “feast days.” This gives us precisely the date envisaged by the calendar of Jubilees, as has long been noted.<sup>23</sup>

The rabbinic sources present numerous controversies involving the zadukim, especially about questions of purity. The case of the sacrifice of the red heifer is particularly significant. According to Num 19:9, Eleazar the son of Aaron burnt a red heifer and then prepared a lustral waster with its ashes, in order to treat impurities caused by corpses. At a much later period, m. Parah. 3.7 tells us that when the high priest went to sacrifice this heifer on the Mount of Olives, beyond the brook Kidron, the “elders of Israel” went before him and ensured that he incurred ritual impurity. He was then obliged to make an ablution to purify himself, before he could begin the rite at daybreak. This maneuver was meant to be seen, in order to prevent the zadukim from claiming that he could not be pure before sundown (as scripture prescribes)—for this would have obliged him to postpone the rite until the following day. According to t. Parah 3.6, the high priest Ishmael b. Phiabi (who was a hostage at Rome in 61), sacrificed two red heifers, in accordance with both doctrinal opinions. But a Qumran document (4QMMT),<sup>24</sup> which deals with a number of legal questions, especially the calendar of Jubilees, defends several opinions attributed to the zadukim, including this instance of the red heifer.

<sup>22</sup> The details of this calendar are set out by A. Jaubert, La Date de la Cène: Calendrier biblique et liturgie chrétienne, EB (Paris: Gabalda 1957), 23ff.

<sup>23</sup> Cf. H. Albeck, The Book of Jubilees and the Halakha (Berlin: Weidmann, 1930), 16.

The documents from the Judean desert are culturally close to the ancient rabbinic sources.<sup>25</sup> We find the zadukim there. There is an explicit reference to Zadok in CD III, 18–IV, 4:

As God ordained for them by the hand of the prophet Ezekiel, saying, The priests, the Levites, and the sons of Zadok<sup>26</sup> who kept the charge of my sanctuary when the children of Israel strayed from me, they shall offer me fat and blood [Ezek 44:15]. The priests are the converts of Israel who departed from the land of Judah, and (the Levites are) those who joined them. The sons of Zadok are the elect of Israel, the men called by name who shall stand at the end of days.

The expression “sons of Zadok” designates a quality, not membership in a family. Another text, Ezek 48:11, says that only those consecrated priests who are sons of Zadok are entitled to exercise the priesthood, because of their proven fidelity; once again, this is a personal quality. The reference here is to the final temple; it is possible that there may be a recollection here of the Zadok who was high priest when Solomon’s temple was inaugurated. Nevertheless, the societal form of the

<sup>24</sup> E. Qimron and J. Strugnell, Qumran Cave 4. V—Miqqat ma’aseh ha-torah, DJD 10 (Oxford: Clarendon 1994).

<sup>25</sup> Cf. S. Lieberman, “The Discipline”; Y. Sussman, “The History of the Halakha and the Dead Sea Scroll,” Tarbiz 59 (1989): 11–76, with numerous references. S. Schechter, Documents of Jewish Sectaries, 1: Fragments of a Zadocite Work (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1910), had already drawn this conclusion after the discovery of the Damascus Document. [English trans.: G. Vermes, The Dead Sea Scrolls in English, rev. ed. (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1968), 100.]

<sup>26</sup> The MT and the LXX read: “the Levitical priests, the sons of Zadok.”

Essenes is very special and owes nothing to the biblical precedents, which always center on a people. At the same time, there are interesting parallels in the Greek world. Following Pythagoras, Plato sketches the model of the life to be led by those who are charged with the defense of the city (Rep. 406d): they will co-opt new members; they will have no private property, and will have no private living quarters inaccessible to others; and they will be united by the same sentiments.<sup>27</sup> It is difficult to deny the similarity to the Essenes, especially when we add that they considered themselves the guardians of the covenant in the name of the entire people (of the city). However, it is clear that the Essenes are not Neo-Platonists: they follow the law of Moses with an integral system of purity, and the agriculture which they practice gives them a special bond to the earth. The channel of this Greek influence is probably Egypt in the second century BCE, but (in keeping with Josephus's account) their arrival in Judea may have been later.

As for the Sadducees properly so-called, they too may lie concealed behind the rabbinic zadukim, but their reference to the high priest Zadok is clearer, at least under Alexander Jannaeus. We should note that, according to Ant. 13.373, Alexander Jannaeus was attacked by the people when he wished to officiate as high priest. He then surrounded the altar and the sanctuary with a barrier of wood which only the priests could cross. However, Josephus had already written (at 8.95) that this non-biblical arrangement existed in the temple of Solomon. The model of the priest Zadok is not far off.

7. The Herodians

The gospels inform us of a collusion between Pharisees and Herodians when Jesus is asked about the tax due to Caesar (Matt 22:16; Mark 12:13). This scene is set in Jerusalem. In his commentary on Matthew ad loc., Jerome mocks "some of the Latins" who declare that these Herodians believed Herod to be the Messiah. These "Latins" are none other than the treatise Against all the Heresies of Ps.-Tertullian, which <sup>27</sup> Cf. W. Tylloch, "Les thèses et la communauté de Qoumrân," in Fourth World Congress of Jewish Studies (Jerusalem 1967), 1: 225–228; J. J. Taylor, Pythagoreans and Essenes: Structural Parallels (Leuven: Peeters 2004).

---

Jerome explicitly quotes elsewhere (qui Herodem Christum esse credebant). In any case, Jerome believes that the Herodians were simply partisans of Herod Antipas, the tetrarch of Galilee, who (as Origen had observed in his own commentary on Matthew ad loc.) could not be suspected of refusing the payment of taxes to Caesar.

This opinion continues to be held,<sup>28</sup> but it is not without its difficulties. To begin with, Herod Antipas was an insignificant figure (much to the displeasure of Herodias), and he could scarcely have created a party of his own, on which the Romans would have bestowed a Latin name. Besides this, the presence of such Herodians in Jerusalem is not a matter of course, especially alongside the Pharisees; and indeed, the same collusion of Pharisees and Herodians in the synagogue at Capernaum, according to Mark 3:6, is even stranger, because there was an absolute opposition in Galilee between the Pharisaic countryside (Capernaum) and the capital cities of Herod Antipas (Sepphoris, Tiberias) where we may assume that the pro-Roman Herodians lived.

Nevertheless, Epiphanius of Salamis, who was not a Latin, declares that the Jews obstinately persist in regarding Herod as the Messiah (Panarion 20.2).<sup>29</sup> This idea is absolutely foreign to rabbinic Judaism, and it is hard to extract it from Matt 2:3–5, when Herod, the king of Jews, is profoundly disturbed to learn that the Magi are looking for the “king of the Jews”—for we see that he needs to seek information about the coming of the Messiah. There is no indication that he himself was regarded as the Messiah; at most, one might wonder why the star which the Magi follows should stop first at Jerusalem before going on to Bethlehem.—However, the Slavonic version of Josephus’s Jewish War evokes this belief in various ways (cf. Appendix II). First of all, we have one passage where the Greek equivalent is unintelligible (War 6.312–313). After the defeat in 70, Josephus comments as follows on the blindness of the Jews, which drove them to war:

---

<sup>28</sup> Cf. E. J. Bickerman, “Les Hérodiens,” in idem, Studies in Jewish and Christian History (Leiden: Brill, 1986), 3:22–33 (Eng. trans. in 2nd ed., [Leiden: Brill, 2007], 656–669). In view of the rarity of Greek transcriptions of Latin adjectives ending in -ianus (such as christianus), Bickerman judges (with some hesitation) that this term applies not to partisans or soldiers of Herod Antipas, but to his servants. The only real reason he has for rejecting the “messianization” of Herod is that this is “difficult to imagine.”

<sup>29</sup> Eusebius mentions the same belief (Hist. Eccl. 1.6.1), which is also recorded by Byzantine writers.

Slavonic version	Greek textus receptus
They were driven to war by an ambiguous prediction found in the sacred books, which said that in those days one from the land of Judea would reign over the whole universe. <sup>30</sup>	(312) But the main cause that had incited them to the war was an ambiguous prophecy which was also found in the sacred scriptures which announced that in those days a man from their land would become master of the universe.
With regard to this, there are several interpretations:	(313) The Jews believed that this referred to one of their own, and many of their wise men interpreted it erroneously,
some believed that it was Herod, others believed that it was this crucified worker of miracles, still others believed that it was Vespasian.	since in reality the oracle was announcing the principate of Vespasian, which was proclaimed while he was in Judea.

The “worker of miracles” is an allusion to a preceding narrative, inserted after War 2.174; it is clear that this refers to Jesus, although he is not named explicitly. The Slavonic text presents two further narratives dated to the reign of Herod (see Appendix II). One concerns a star which Persian astronomers follow, and the other is a discussion, in terms that recall rabbinic debates, about whether Herod is the Messiah.

It is not easy to determine exactly what a Herodian party would have looked like immediately after the death of Herod. His kingdom was divided by Augustus among his three surviving sons, Philip, Herod Antipas, and Archelaus, and we do not know which of these three could have enjoyed the support of a Herodian party. On the other hand, when Archelaus was deposed by the Romans and replaced by a prefect (Ant. 17.342), it is possible that a Herodian party emerged anew, aiming at the restoration of a Jewish kingdom—as happened with Agrippa in 41. His desire to appear as a god (which proved fatal: Ant. 19.345) may have been linked to a tendency to see himself in messianic terms. In any case, Jesus’ warning to his disciples to steer clear of the “leaven of Herod” (Mark 8:15) is very meaningful, since it is clear that they all hoped for the restoration of a kingdom in Israel.

<sup>30</sup> This prophecy is also reported by Tacitus, Hist. 5.13, and Suetonius, Vespasian 4. They write that the Jews failed to understand that the prophecy concerned Vespasian, the conqueror in Judea: it was there that his soldiers began to proclaim him emperor (as Josephus also writes: War 4.601–604). The prophecy in question, which is unintelligible if it is narrowed down to Vespasian, is given in Gen 49:10 (Targum Onqelos): “The scepter will not depart from Judah until the coming of the Messiah to whom the kingdom belongs, and the nations will hearken to him.”

Appendix I
Genealogies of the High Priests from Aaron until the Return from Exile

NB. Josephus gives the most complete list. Ezra 7 is very short, but the supplement which 1 Chronicles 5 offers between Azariah and Shallum contains imported elements (indicated by an asterisk on the left) or elements repeated by papponomy (indicated by an asterisk on the right).

1 Chron 5:30-41 (cf. 6:35-36)	Josephus, Antiquities	Ezra 7:1-5
Aaron	Aaron (5.361; 20.228)	Aaron
Eleazar	Eleazar *Ithamar	Eleazar
Phinehas	Phinehas	Phinehas
Abishua	Abiezer (Joseph, cf. 8.12)	Abishua
Bukki	Bukki	Bukki
Uzzi	Uzzi	Uzzi
Zerahiah	*Eli (5.318)	Zerahiah
Meraioth	*Ahijah (6.107)	Meraioth
* Amariah		Azariah
*Ahitub	*Ahitub (6.122)	Ahitub
	*Ahimelek (6.242)
*Zadok	Zadok *Abiathar (7.110)	Zadok
Ahimaaz	Ahimaaz (10.152-153)
Azariah*	Azariah
Johanan*	Joram
	Isos (?)
Azariah*	Axioram (Ahioram ?)
Johanan*	Phideas (?)
Azariah*	Sudeas (?)
	Joel
* Amariah	Jotham
* Ahitub	Uriah
* Zadok	Neriah
	Udeah (Hodaiah ?)
Shallum	Shallum	Shallum
Hilkiah	Hilkiah	Hilkiah
Azariah	(Azariah ?)	Azariah
Seraiah	Seraiah	Seraiah
Jehozadak	Jehozadak	Ezra

Joshua, under Cyrus: cf. Neh 12:10-11

Appendix II
The Slavonic Version of the Jewish War

A Slavonic (Old Russian) version of Josephus's Jewish War was discovered in 1866. It is roughly 15% shorter than the Greek textus receptus, but it also includes some supplements, running in length from a few words to several pages. It has given rise to vigorous debates, since the most important additions concern New Testament personages—Herod, John the Baptist, Jesus—but they have a strange quality.

The intention of this Appendix is to argue in favor of the authenticity of this version, which goes back to an initial version of the Jewish War in Greek, written by Josephus himself.

1. Recent Scholarship

Thanks to characteristic errors, scholars have established that the translation was made from a Greek original in the eleventh or twelfth century, a period at which other Greek works were translated into Slavonic. The first critical edition was published in the 1930's, accompanied by a French translation.<sup>31</sup> In 1958, under difficult circumstances, N. Meščerskij published a critical edition in Russia which took account of Istrin's work.<sup>32</sup> A new tool for work has recently been published:<sup>33</sup> a synopsis which presents the classic translation from the Loeb series with an English translation of Meščerskij's edition. E. Hansack<sup>34</sup> has pointed to a paradox. On the one hand, he notes the meticulous, <sup>31</sup> V. M. Istrin, A. Vaillant, and P. Pascal, La "Prise de Jérusalem" de Josèphe le Juif, 2 vols. (Paris: Institut d'Études slaves, 1934–1938). The introduction and commentaries by Istrin, who died in 1937, were never published. An incomplete translation had earlier been made: A. Berendts and K. Grass, Flavius Josephus, Vom Jüdischen Kriege Buch I–IV, nach der slavischen Übersetzung deutsch herausgegeben und mit dem griechischen Text verglichen, 2 vols. (Dorpat, 1924–1927). A few extracts, translated into English and French, have been published as an appendix to modern translations of the Jewish War (in the Loeb and Reinach series respectively).

---

<sup>32</sup> N. A. Meščerskij, Istorija Iujeskoj Vojny Iosifa Flavija v drevnerusskom perevode (Moscow and Leningrad, 1958). Cf. S. Szyszman, RQ 1 (1959): 451–458; A. Vaillant, Semitica 9 (1959): 89–93.

<sup>33</sup> H. Leeming and K. Leeming, Josephus' Jewish War and Its Slavonic Version: A Synoptic Comparison, AGJU 46 (Leiden: Brill, 2003).

<sup>34</sup> E. Hansack, Die altrussische Version des "Jüdischen Krieges": Untersuchung zur Integration der Namen, Slavica 1 (Heidelberg: Universitätsverlag C. Winter, 1999). As a philologist, he has great reservations about Meščerskij's edition.

indeed servile character of the translation: the translator employs circumlocutions which simply transpose the Greek into Slavonic, a phenomenon analogous to what might be called the "Septuagintal style," where the original is very transparent. On the other hand, however, he observes the extreme freedom of the translator, who excises or moves around entire passages, adds others, and occasionally slips in brief glosses. The contrast is so plain that he feels obliged to envisage two separate phases, first a faithful translation of the Greek textus receptus, then a major reworking by a reviser who does not have the original text in his possession and who adapts the text in view of a specific readership. It is a remarkable fact that this reviser nevertheless adapts completely to the work of the translator, whose style and phraseology he employs.

We may therefore surmise that the translation, which was made at one single period, is faithful to its Greek source.

2. The Authenticity of the Source of the Slavonic Version

In the prologue to the Jewish War, Josephus relates that he first wrote "in the language of his fathers" for eastern barbarians, but then translated his work into Greek for the Roman world. Later, he writes that assistants had helped him improve his style; and it is in fact the case that this work, in its Greek textus receptus, has a literary quality which far surpasses that of his other works, which were written without assistants. Besides this, we find some small errors which suggest that the author was not well acquainted with Judaism, the geography of Judea, and even the Aramaic language. Nevertheless, he boasts of having been an exceptionally gifted adolescent: at the age of fourteen, he received teachers of the law who came to consult him. We must admit that in his latest works (the Antiquities and the Against Apion) he knows his religion very well. He was born in 37, and was about forty years old when the Jewish War was published; it is unlikely that he started from zero at that age and arrived sixteen years later at the mastery which he displays in the Antiquities, all the more so, since he declares that his compatriots recognized his superiority in doctrinal matters. This declaration is not made by chance: a number of pointers suggest that after he came to Rome, he wished to propose to Judaism a future under Roman protection; he acted like a priest, although he wanted to be recognized as a Pharisee.

These considerations permit us to draw a very precise conclusion. Josephus must have given his literary assistants in Rome a first draft of his work in Greek, which he himself had taken the pains to write. Accordingly, between the original Aramaic and the Greek textus receptus, there was an initial Greek translation made by the author. We may even imagine that he introduced new documents at each stage of this process, for that is what we see him doing later on: when he takes up anew in the Antiquities matters about which he has already written in the Jewish War (i.e., the entire narrative which runs from the Maccabean crisis to the events leading up to the War in 66), he introduces numerous data drawn from archives. This sometimes leads to redactional difficulties, where these documents contradict the earlier, more legendary accounts. In any case, these circumstances suffice to explain both the qualities and the defects of the version of the War which was produced by his collaborators.

3. Omissions and Additions in the Slavonic Version

Let us look at some examples of the divergences between what we will now call the Greek and the Slavonic texts. These fall into three categories.

First, omissions. For the sake of simplicity, we mention only the omission of entire passages.

The Slavonic text omits the prologue which I have already cited (War 1.1–30), in which Josephus attacks the inaccurate accounts of the war which have been given by earlier authors. He explains that, as an eyewitness of the facts, he is their best historian, and then gives a summary of the contents of the seven Books. The ensuing narrative begins with the Maccabean crisis (167–164 BCE) and opens with a characteristic sentence: “While Antiochus surnamed Epiphanes was fighting against Ptolemy VI for domination over Syria, a quarrel broke out among leading Jews.” Josephus was certainly not a direct eyewitness of this crisis; he is simply beginning his narrative with the leitmotiv that the troubles of the Jews were always due to internal divisions. By standing back from the latest crisis and using as his frontispiece a crisis which found a solution, he is suggesting a kind of model for the contemporary war and the outcome for which he hopes. In doing so, he follows the Jewish tradition, for which the prophet is an historian and the historian a prophet; but this contradicts what he says in the prologue, where he follows Thucydides and Greco-Roman historiography, who acknowledge only direct testimony, not the re-writing of ancient sources. We may suspect that this prologue was not found in the Aramaic version.

Some historical points are treated differently. For example, after the death of Herod, Archelaus endeavors in Rome to get Augustus to confer the kingship on him. This would be the confirmation of his father's last testament (War 2.37–38). But the situation is confused, and Augustus hesitates.

Slavonic	Greek
While he reflected thus,  a letter was brought from Varus, the governor of Syria, saying: "The Jews are revolting, since they do not wish to be under the power of the Romans. Take measures!"	(39) Before Caesar took a decision on this matter, the mother of Archelaus, Maltake, died, and Varus sent from Syria letters about the defection of the Jews.
And when Caesar entrusted this charge to Varus,	(40) Varus had foreseen this event. After the departure of Archelaus (for Rome), he had gone up to Jerusalem... and had left a legion in the city... then had returned to Antioch. [[41–54: Sabinus, the procurator of Syria, is in Jerusalem [§16–19]; he wishes to seize the temple treasure, and this provokes a revolt; Sabinus hopes for aid from Varus.]] [[55–65: Varus puts down the insurrections.]] [[66–74: Varus finally arrives in Jerusalem.]]
Varus took a regiment and marched against those who were guilty of rebellion. He fought with many (troops). Many of the Romans and of the Jews died. Later, the Jews submitted	All he had to do was to display his forces, in order to disperse the camp of the Jews. As for Sabinus, since he was unable to face thought of appearing before Varus, he had earlier left the city and reached the coastal district.

Table (cont.)

Slavonic	Greek
and promised to hand over the leaders. Varus sent to have them seized and brought before him. He threw into prison those who were older; he crucified two thousand of those who were younger.	(75) Varus spread out a part of the army in the countryside to seize the authors of the uprising, many of whom were brought before him. He kept in prison those who seemed less zealous; he crucified around two thousand of those who were guiltier.

The narrative in the Slavonic text amounts to less than one-tenth of the length of the Greek text. It is simple and clear: Varus, the governor of Syria, crushes a rebellion against Rome and punishes the guilty. In the Greek, the origin of the rebellion is Sabinus, who—according to two earlier passages (War 2.16–18 and 23)—is in league with Antipas against Archelaus with a view to seizing the treasure, although Varus has explicitly forbidden him to do so. This leads to a rebellion by the Jews which Sabinus is unable to quell until the arrival of Varus, whose presence suffices to reestablish order. However, Sabinus disappears. In fact, the Jews did not in the least rebel against Rome on this occasion: for shortly afterwards, they requested the eviction of Archelaus and the direct Roman administration. The narrative in the Greek text is long and complex, but the Slavonic is not a résumé of it, since the fact that it does not mention Sabinus means that it has a very different logic. This can be explained either on the hypothesis that the Slavonic has systematically suppressed the mention of Sabinus in a series of unconnected passages, without leaving the story incoherent in any way; or on the hypothesis that the Greek text has introduced in three distinct places new documentation about Sabinus's plot, adding this to the story of Varus's repression (the two thousand crucified men in the Slavonic text). When we examine these two hypotheses, we see that the second possibility is more natural, because we would otherwise be compelled to assume that the Slavonic translator had a systematic aim of shortening and transforming this particular account in a drastic manner that he nowhere else displays. The political and military narratives are usually intact in the Slavonic, and indeed are sometimes decorated with highly picturesque small details.

Secondly, we find small additions. Prescinding from stylistic effects which are difficult to evaluate, we can classify these under two headings.

First, in some instances the Slavonic gives information unknown to the Greek text. For example, War 1.340 states that Herod, after a battle, wanted to take a bath and was alone; the Slavonic specifies that he “spent the evening in a village named Aulon, where there was a hot spring.” According to War 2.503, Cestius the governor left Antioch with an army and arrived in Galilee at a place named Zebulon; the Slavonic adds: “named Andron.” However, we cannot exclude the possibility that such supplements are due to accidents by copyists or translators, if the text on which they were working contained illegible glosses or words.

Secondly, in other instances we can diagnose the presence of glosses attributable either to the translator or to later copyists. For example, Hansack notes a number of double translations of one and the same word. This phenomenon may be due to the meticulous quality of the translator’s work, which we have mentioned above; or, where a gloss had explained in the margin the meaning of an obscure or obsolete word, a copyist subsequently inserted it into the text itself. An example of a different type is War 5.567, which speaks of Mannaëus son of Eleazar, who seeks refuge with Titus. The Slavonic reads: “Mannaëus the nephew of Lazarus, whom Jesus had raised from the tomb while he was already decomposing.” The mention of the name of Jesus indicates the presence of a gloss (see below), but we do not know whether this was already present in the text which the translator had before him. In same way, we find the title “John the forerunner” before a passage about an unnamed “savage”; this title varies in the manuscripts, but we can always recognize (often deformed) the Russian transcription of πρόδρομος, “forerunner.”

Thirdly, there are lengthy additions. The most extensive of these concern Herod and the principal personages of the New Testament; the most curious are those concerning Abraham.

a. Antipater, the son of Herod, plotted to murder his father, but he was unmasked and condemned (War 1.640). The Slavonic adds a digression about divine providence:

We must admire the divine dispensation which renders evil for evil and good for good. And no one, whether just or unjust, can escape His all-powerful right hand. However, His marvelous eye reposes principally on the just. Abraham, the ancestor of our race, was removed from his own country because he had behaved unjustly towards his brother when their domains were divided between them. And he was punished by the very matter in which he had sinned. But later, thanks to his obedience, God gave him the promised land.

This interpretation of Abraham's departure from his native land as punishment for defrauding his brother has little in common with the biblical story, and it is hard to see why a Christian interpolator should have thought it up. However, we find it elsewhere in Josephus: at Ant. 1.281, he explains that Abraham was chased away by his family and that God led him to Canaan. When Josephus paraphrases Genesis, he follows the biblical narrative more closely: he says that Abraham was forced to leave Ur because he had criticized the idolatry of the Chaldaeans. Another passage proves that Josephus knew other non-biblical traditions about Abraham. In his discourse to his besieged compatriots in 70, Josephus takes Abraham as his example when he wishes to demonstrate the inefficacy of the armed struggle (War 5.379–381):

Nekao king of Egypt, who was also called Pharaoh, went out with a great army and snatched Sarah, the queen and ancestress of our race, from her husband. On that occasion, did Abraham—her husband and our ancestor—take up weapons in order to avenge himself upon the one who had insulted him? You know that he had one hundred and eighteen generals, each of whom commanded innumerable troops. Despising all these, he invoked the assistance of God and, raising his pure hands towards the very place which you have just besmirched, he moved the invisible Helper to fight. And at the beginning of the first night, the queen was sent back untouched to her husband, and the Egyptian adored this place which you have besmirched with the blood of your compatriots. He fled, trembling before the nocturnal visions and dreams, and honoring with silver and gold the Hebrews who were beloved by God.

b. The Slavonic adds two lengthy texts of a legendary character about Herod the Great. The first (after War 1.369), situated shortly after Herod's arrival in Jerusalem at the close of two years of civil war in Galilee and Judea (39–37 BCE), reports a secret debate among the teachers of the law, with the aim of discovering whether or not Herod is the Messiah. The subject is the fulfillment of some prophecies concerning the messianic signs (Gen 49:10; Deut 17:5; Isa 35:5–6; Dan 9:24–27; Zech 9:9), and the doctors of the law conclude that Herod does not fulfill these in any way. A certain Levi, who is faithful to Herod, seeks in vain to counter these arguments. He then denounces them to the king, who has them slaughtered. This episode presupposes that the question was in fact raised, and it is true that Herod had the messianic star (from Balaam's prophecy, Num 24:17) depicted on some of his coins; the Herodians who are mentioned in the gospels were still his partisans one generation later (see above). The origin of this claim on Herod's part must be sought in Rome. When he acquired the kingship in Rome in 40 BCE, the situation was one of great urgency, since the Parthians had conquered Judea; but this was also the year that saw the reconciliation between Octavian and Antony which put an end to the interminable civil wars, and Virgil had composed a poem with a strongly messianic character about an heir who was to be born (the fourth Eclogue).

The second narrative concerns an analogous theme. Persian astronomers have seen a star ascending above Jerusalem, indicating the birth of one who is to be a master of the world. They arrive after a year and a half of observation, but they do not find anything, and the star disappears. Then it reappears, and they show it to Herod, who gives them an escort to follow the star. However, it vanishes once again, and they obtain permission to follow it on their own, after promising to return. After one year, they have still not returned, and the teachers of the law explain that according to the prophecies of Balaam and Daniel, a master will appear, born without a father. Herod makes enquiries in Judea in order to find such a child who is aged less than three years, and promises to adopt him—but in vain. The same Levi suggests that all the children be massacred, but the teachers argue successfully that according to Mic 5:1, the Messiah is to be born in Bethlehem, and that it therefore suffices to kill all the children there. Herod does so. This story, with the intermittent appearances of the star, follows the career of Herod: the star, followed by infallible astronomers, approaches him, then goes elsewhere after two eclipses. The master born without a father may be an allusion to the legends which Suetonius reports about the virginal birth of Augustus, the son of a god (i.e. Apollo) and master of the world. The origin of this passage is uncertain. Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 1.8.5) and Photius (Bibliotheca 238) both affirm that Josephus wrote about the massacre of the Holy Innocents in Bethlehem.

c. Finally, we have the information about John the Baptist and Jesus; or more exactly, we can identify the protagonists in these passages by a comparison with the gospels, since neither of them is named. The principal passages are the following.

Immediately after Augustus's nomination of Archelaus as ethnarch of Judea (War 2.110), the Slavonic gives a description of a savage dressed in animal skins who wandered through Judea inviting the Jews to liberty. He baptized in the Jordan and said: "God has sent me to show the path of the law, by means of which you will be saved from having many masters. You will no longer have any mortal master over you, but only the Most High who has sent me." This could well sound like a Zealot sedition, and the man is brought before Archelaus; but he does not succeed in convincing the teachers of the law, and he declares to them: "I shall not reveal to you the mystery which is among you, because you have not wished this. And thus an invincible perdition has come upon you, by your own fault." Then he flees to the far shore of the Jordan.

After the deposition of Archelaus, Herod's two other sons, Antipas and Philip, retain and consolidate their respective tetrarchies (War 2.168); at this point, the Slavonic inserts another passage about the same savage, who explains a dream to Philip and predicts that because of his greed, he will lose both his province and his wife. Philip dies at once, and Antipas marries his wife, Herodias. This was contrary to the law, since he could not appeal to the institution of the levirate: Philip had four children. The teachers of the law are scandalized but do not dare to speak of this. The savage accuses Antipas unceasingly in public until the tetrarch loses patience and has him imprisoned (or cuts off his head, according to some manuscripts).

Later, under Pilate (War 2.174), the Slavonic speaks of "a man, if it is allowed to call him a man. His nature and his exterior were those of a man, but his appearance was more than human, and his works were divine." He worked mostly on the Mount of Olives and performed miracles by his word, even on the sabbath. This led to controversies, since he obtained results (and thereby broke the sabbath), but without any physical action (and thereby respected the sabbath). His hundred and fifty servants urged him in vain to massacre the Romans and to reign over them. When they heard of this, the leaders of the Jews thought it best to denounce him to Pilate, since they were afraid that terrible reprisals would follow if the governor were to hear of a movement of this kind. Pilate captured the worker of miracles, but when he saw that he did not aspire to the kingship, he released him, "for he had healed his wife, who was dying." Some time after this, the teachers of the law, who were jealous, purchased from Pilate the right to put to death the worker of miracles, "and they crucified him, in contradiction of the law of the ancestors." Let us note in passing, for what it may be worth, that some tendencies in the Judaism of that period accepted the idea that an exceptional human being could be of divine rank; it was the rabbinic tradition which later proscribed every opinion of this kind.

When King Agrippa I died in 44, leaving no child old enough to reign, Claudius appointed Roman procurators in Judea while maintaining the judicial authority of the Jewish institutions such as the Sanhedrin; under Augustus, after the deposition of Archelaus, and then again under Tiberius, this judicial authority had been transferred in its entirety to the prefects. After mentioning the procurators Fadus and Tiberius Alexander (War 2.220), the Slavonic text inserts a passage about the disciples of the worker of miracles, which is so short that it can be quoted here in full:

If anyone deviated from the letter of the law, this was made known to the teachers of the law. He was tortured and expelled, or else he was sent to Caesar. And under these procurators, there appeared numerous servants of the worker of miracles whom we have described above, and they told the people that their master was living, although he had died: "And he will free you from slavery." And many among the people listened to their words. They lent their ears to their commandments. This was not because of their renown, for they were simple people, some of them sail-cutters [or: tent-makers], others shoemakers or artisans; but they wrought truly marvelous signs, as many as they wished.

When these noble procurators saw that the people were being led astray, they plotted together with some scribes to seize them and kill them: for a small matter ceases to be small when it leads to a great matter. But they felt shame and fear in the presence of the signs. They said that magic did not work so many miracles; if these people had not been sent by the providence of God, they would soon be put to confusion. And they were given permission to move around freely. Later, at the urgent request of those persons [i.e., the scribes], they dispersed them, sending some to Caesar and others to Antioch to stand trial, and dispatching others again to distant regions.

4. A Discussion of Authenticity

Hansack calls all these supplements "christological," including even the visit of the Persians who follow the star, although the texts are in fact not particularly Christian. The most obvious anomalies are as follows: the star of the Persians does not arrive over Jesus; the clean separation between the worker of miracles and the savage, who is not in any sense a forerunner; the complete absence of any biblical title or scriptural allusion in the case of the worker of miracles. Finally, the narrative of the disciples certainly represents a Jewish movement of workers of miracles in Judea, largely parallel to what we read in the Acts of the Apostles, but it stops just before the fundamental episode of Peter's visit to the enemy officer Cornelius, where new—and specifically Christian—horizons open up. We must not confuse Christianity with a "Jesus movement."<sup>35</sup>

This means either that a reviser of Josephus's text (a Byzantine scholar, or the Slavonic translator, or a later redactor), on the basis of the information supplied by the New Testament, has succeeded in imagining the kind of narratives that a Jew like Josephus could have written; or that everything must be ascribed to the first Greek draft which Josephus gave his assistants. In the former case, we must attempt to understand the forger's intention, for far from confirming the narratives in the gospels, he casts a number of doubts on their substantial accuracy. In the latter case, we must obviously explain how a testimony as important as that of Josephus could disappear for a thousand years, although so many authors sought confirmation in impartial witnesses for the affirmations of the evangelists—and Josephus was considered the most important of these impartial witnesses.

R. Eisler, who published the most thorough study of the Slavonic text in 1929,<sup>36</sup> realized that the supplements cited above are not particularly Christian. He ascribes them to a Greek translation of the first Aramaic version of the War, which he dates to 71. He describes the Slavonic translator as a Judaizer, perhaps an heir to the Jewish kingdom of the Khazars, who wished to produce anti-Christian propaganda. H. Thackeray, the leading specialist in Josephus at that period, was initially astonished, then genuinely interested in this hypothesis;<sup>37</sup> but he died in 1930 before he could offer a definitive opinion. It cannot be denied that Eisler's work contains exaggerations, and it received a generally cool welcome, though for two distinct reasons. Catholic scholars disliked it because it called into question the accuracy of the gospels just as the church was emerging with difficulty from the Modernist crisis; and Protestant scholars held that the Slavonic supplements were necessarily Christian interpolations by virtue of the simple fact that they spoke of Jesus (even if only under a veiled form). These Protestant scholars, whose contemporary heir is Hansack, found valuable support in an article by E. Bickerman, who shared the same presupposition.<sup>38</sup>

<sup>35</sup> Nodet, Le Fils de Dieu.

<sup>36</sup> R. Eisler, 'ИНСОУС ВАСІАЕУС 'ОУ ВАСІАЕУСАС. Die messianische Unabhängigkeitsbewegung vom Auftreten Johannes des Täufers bis zum Untergang Jakobus des Gerechten usw., 2 vols. (Heidelberg: C. Winter, 1929).

<sup>37</sup> Cf. H. St. J. Thackeray, Josèphe, l'homme et l'historien, adapted from the English (1929) by É. Nodet, with an appendix on the Slavonic version of the Jewish War (Paris: Éd. du Cerf, 2000).

In general terms, the passages which we have cited have a distinctly Jewish coloring, and this accords with the acknowledged competence of Josephus. We can make this point more specific by means of three different examples.

First, there is oriental evidence that the Aramaic version circulated. Shortly after the sack of Seleucia by the Romans in 165, a certain Mara Bar Serapion wrote in Aramaic a letter of encouragement to his son, inviting him to study philosophy. In the extract quoted here, he draws a parallel between what happened after the deaths of Socrates, Pythagoras, and a wise king of the Jews. This is Jesus, but Mara knows him through a non-Christian source, which can scarcely be any other author than Josephus—especially since the Slavonic text (War 5.195) mentions a trilingual inscription which speaks of “Jesus the king who did not reign, crucified by the Jews because he announced the ruin of the city and the desolation of the temple”:

But what else can we say, when the wise men are systematically eliminated by tyrants, when their wisdom meets only insults, and their thoughts are attacked with no possibility of defense? What advantage did the Athenians draw from having put Socrates to death? This brought upon them famine and plague. Or the people of Samos, from burning Pythagoras at the stake? Their land was covered with sand in one single hour. Or the Jews, from having [killed] their wise king? Their kingdom was taken away from them at precisely that epoch. God has made recompense for the wisdom of these three men. The Athenians died of famine; the Samians were submerged by the sea; the Jews, deposed and driven out of their own kingdom, are scattered among all the nations. But Socrates is not dead, thanks to Plato; nor is Pythagoras dead, thanks to the statue of Juno; nor is the wise king dead, thanks to the new laws which he instituted.

---

<sup>38</sup> E. J. Bickerman, “Sur la version vieux-russe de Flavius Josèphe,” Annuaire de l’Institut de philologie et d’histoire orientales et slaves de Bruxelles 4 (1936): 53–84; republished almost unchanged in idem, Studies in Jewish and Christian History (AGJU 9), Leiden: Brill 1985, 3:172–195 (Eng. trans. in 2nd ed. of this work [Leiden: Brill, 2007], 832–589).

Secondly, in the passage about the Essenes in the Slavonic text, we find at least two specific details which agree with documents found at Qumran. First, the nocturnal prayers (War 2.128) are also found in the Community Rule (1QS VI, 6–8): “And the Congregation shall watch in community for a third of every night of the year, to read the Book [i.e., Torah] and to study Law and to pray together.”<sup>39</sup> The Greek goes on to speak of the “repose of the periods of seven days”—a very vague term, since it simply means series of seven days—but the Slavonic gives details of all the rhythms which are framed by the sabbath and the sabbath year and are perpetual, or at least multiple. Some of the Qumran documents (4QMMT, 11QT) speak explicitly of series each of fifty days after Pentecost, corresponding to the first fruits of bread, of wine, and of oil.

Slavonic	Greek
In relation to the deity, they are above all pious. They scarcely ever rest, and they rise at night to sing the praises of God and to pray.	(128) Their piety towards the deity takes particular forms.
They observe in a particularly emphatic manner the seventh day, the seventh week, the seventh month, and the seventh year. On the sabbath, they prepare no food, kindle no fire, move no utensils, do not relieve themselves.	(147) They observe the repose of the periods of seven days, since it is not enough for them to prepare their food on the previous evening, so that they need not kindle a fire on that day: they do not dare to move any utensil nor even to satisfy their natural needs.

<sup>39</sup> Eng. trans.: Vermes, Dead Sea Scrolls, 81.

Thirdly, at the moment of ruin, Josephus relates a number of oracles which had predicted it. In the Greek text, they are difficult to understand (War 6.311–312), but the Slavonic shows us where we can find help in scriptural passages. The “prophecy of the quadrangle” fits both the crucifixion and the temple, when we bear in mind that the suppression of a vertical element (either the condemned man, or the Antonia Tower) leaves us with a quadrangular structure (though not a square: the cross with the titulus, or crux parvis) and that this permits a more effective resistance to an invasion. Let us now look at Dan 8:22: “As for the horn that was broken, in place of which four others arose, four kingdoms shall arise from his nation (מַגֵּן), but not with his power.” In context, the thing broken and replaced is a “horn” (קֶרֶן), which may be the designation of a king: Alexander was replaced by the Diadochoi. But the same word can also designate an angle (cf. “the horns of the altar”). If we forget the context, we can make sense of the interpretations in the Slavonic text, which plays on these two meanings of the noun “horn,” viz. “king” or “angle.” In the case of the worker of miracles, a king was broken and then replaced by four angles; in the case of the temple, the Antonia formed an excrescence (a horn), or even a fifth angle. We should note that this interpretation can be made only on the basis of the Hebrew text.

Slavonic	Greek
(see below)	(311) Thus the Jews after the destruction of the Antonia fortress, reduced the temple to the form of a quadrangle,
Although there existed among the Jews this prophecy that the city and the temple would be laid waste by the quadrangular form, they themselves set to work to make crosses for the crucifixion, which entails the quadrangular form of which we have spoken, and after the ruin of the Antonia they made the temple quadrangular.	although they could see written in their book that the city and the temple would be taken once the sacred precincts had the form of a quadrangle.
	[no parallel]
	(see above)

Table (cont.)

Slavonic	Greek
They were driven to war by an ambiguous prediction found in the sacred books, which said that in those days one from the land of Judea would reign over the whole universe.	(312) But the main cause that had incited them to the war was an ambiguous prophecy which was also found in the sacred scriptures which announced that in those days a man from their land would become master of the universe.
With regard to this, there are several interpretations: some believed that it was Herod, others believed that it was this crucified worker of miracles, still others believed that it was Vespasian.	(313) The Jews believed that this referred to one of their own, and many of their wise men interpreted it erroneously, since in reality the oracle was announcing the principate of Vespasian, which was proclaimed while he was in Judea.

The biblical prophecy about the master of the world who is to come forth from Judea is virtually unintelligible in the Greek (we find it also in Tacitus and Suetonius); but the mention of Herod by the Slavonic text points us to the discussion of his messianic status which we have cited above. And this brings us to the blessing of Judah by Jacob (Gen 49:10), provided that we take it in one of the forms attested by the targum and by Justin, Dial. 120.3–4: “The scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor the ruler’s staff from between his feet, until there comes the Messiah to whom the kingdom belongs [Justin reads: “until the one comes for whom it is reserved”], and the nations will hearken to him.” This text thus refers to the appearance in Judah (Judea) of an exceptional personage, who may be either the last king of Judea or another man who takes the place of the kingdom that has fallen. Vespasian was in Judea when he became emperor; as for Herod, who was appointed king after the collapse of the Hasmonaean dynasty, he was not a Jew, and according to this prophecy he would possess legitimacy only if he was in fact the Messiah.

5. Attempt at an Interpretation

With regard to Herod, Jesus, and John the Baptist, we must begin by interpreting a strange progression. The Slavonic has the passages mentioned above, with only a faint Christian coloring. The Greek contains no additional information about these personages, and more generally, it has no passage from which one might infer a messianic doctrine or hope. Finally, the Antiquities, which set out the Jewish doctrines at length, have nothing to say about an eschatological perspective (the posterity of David is lost to sight after Zerubbabel), but this work does have one passage about Jesus and another about John the Baptist, both of whom are named clearly. Let us look at these briefly. The passage about John the Baptist (Ant. 18.116–119) comes not before Pilate (as in the Slavonic text), but towards the end of the reign of Tiberius, well after Jesus. There are two obvious reasons for this major displacement: first of all, Josephus knew a dossier about Vitellius, the governor of Syria, which shows that Philip died in 34, and this entails that the affair of Herodias and Antipas occurred later; and secondly, Josephus maintains a link between this affair and the death of John the Baptist. However, he does not offer any real information about John's life. He gives an extremely precise description of his baptism, but without linking it to the Jordan.<sup>40</sup> Under these conditions, we may wonder whether he actually wished to efface the prophetic profile of John and every allusion to his role as Jesus' forerunner.

The passage about Jesus (Ant. 18.63–64) is the famous testimonium de Iesu. This is in fact testimony to a confession of the Christian faith in Rome, which mentions the passion and resurrection in accordance with the prophets, somewhat in the manner of the "word of salvation" at Acts 13:27–31. This passage, which begins like the Slavonic text, describes Jesus' activity very briefly: "Around the same time, there appeared Jesus, an able man—if indeed one should call him a 'man.' For he was a worker of miracles and the master of those who delight in welcoming strange things. He won over many Jews and also many from the hellenistic world." This text admits that Jesus worked miracles, but he is evaluated negatively, since his bizarre teaching created a school in which Jews and Greeks mingled in the name of scripture; and this means that the denunciation to Pilate was justified. This is an anachronism, as far as Jesus is concerned, but it shows us what was unacceptable to Josephus, who concludes as follows: "And the wretched group of the Christians, named after him, has not disappeared up to the present day." The criticism is clear, but the language remains prudent.

---

<sup>40</sup> On any hypothesis, Josephus has struggled to combine sources which were not very coherent: cf. É. Nodet, Flavius Josèphe: Baptême et résurrection (Paris: Éd. du Cerf, 1999), 83–98.

This passage is rather brief, and it does not give the impression that it relates important events in Judea. Nevertheless, at Ant. 20.197–203, Josephus reports that the only notable action taken by the high priest Ananus was the legal stoning of "James, the brother of Jesus called the Christ." This was a political error which led to his deposition, since the execution served only to increase the renown of James. This Ananus was not just anybody: in the Jewish War, he is presented as a model, and Josephus writes that if he had not been assassinated in 69, he would have been capable of averting the catastrophe thanks to his outstanding political ability (War 4.316–321). Ananus, the only known Sadducean high priest, thought that he could get away with eliminating James, who was important enough to be a threat to his position—for according to Hegesippus (quoted by Eusebius), some milieus actually regarded James as high priest. This means that both Ananus and James were very prominent men; but James is defined by means of his relationship to Jesus in this passage of undisputed authenticity. This suggests that Jesus himself must have been even more important than James—and this means that Josephus is not saying all that he knows.

The next step in our argumentation is the observation that Josephus calls the Christians "disciples" of Jesus, who is defined in a sentence that has disturbed the commentators, who judge it to be an interpolation: "It was he who was the Christ." Since the verb is in the past tense, this can only be a Christian profession of faith. Besides this, the term christianos, which is a Latin formation (not Greek), has an origin that owes nothing to Jesus: initially, this was the criminological name for a Jewish messianic agitation which began under Caligula, when he planned to have his statue erected in the temple at Jerusalem. These protests are attested at Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch. Suetonius (Claudius 25) writes that when Claudius took power, he expelled the Jews from Rome, since they were continually provoking unrest "at the instigation of 'Chrestus' (impulsore chresto)." These were not disciples of Jesus, but groups who expected the imminent coming of the Messiah. At Antioch, we read that Barnabas and Paul were caught up in a similar tumult and were described as “Christians” (Acts 11:26). Subsequently, this term was retained in the communities associated with Paul, where both Jews and Gentiles mingled with one another. This led to a complete identification between “Christ” and “the risen Jesus,” despite a considerable distance from the Messiah whom the Jews expected: and this brings us to the words of Josephus. This identification can also be seen in Tacitus’s account of the execution of the “Christians” under Nero: these were not necessarily exceptionally angelic persons, since they denounced each other.

These remarks permit us to formulate a simple hypothesis about the evolution of Josephus. On his arrival at Rome in 67, he may have heard of christiani, but they were certainly far removed from his own social circle, and he had no immediate reason to associate them with the worker of miracles in Judea and his movement, of which he could not have been ignorant. We can therefore envisage three phases.

First, there is a retrospective enthusiasm for the worker of miracles and a severe view of the consequences of his clumsy execution; this stage would be represented by the Aramaic Jewish War, which Mara bar Sarapion knew, and the Greek draft.

Later, around 75, when he discovered that the active posterity of Jesus was nothing other than the Christian rabble which posed a danger to the Jewish identity, he realized that he had said too much. This may have led him to withdraw quickly the copies of his work which were already in circulation and to “cleanse” the dossier which he entrusted to his assistants. This “dossier” contains nothing evocative of messianism. He received the formal approval of Titus for the final version of the Jewish War, and this presupposes that it was read by censors.

Finally, when he compiled the Antiquities under Domitian (ca. 93), the Christian movement had expanded in Rome to such an extent that Josephus was obliged to mention it. However, he did this prudently, isolating the movement from every specifically Jewish school.

This hypothesis of an urgent recall of the first Greek version permits us to explain a number of phenomena, while avoiding the hypothesis of an unusual creativity on the part of the Byzantine scholars or the Slavonic translators. First of all, we can grasp why Judaism inflicted the damnatio memoriae on Josephus for having spoken rashly, although his surrender to the Romans was scarcely different from that of his contemporary Johanan ben Zakkai, the ancestor of the rabbinic tradition. At a later period, there remained a kind of rumor in the Christian church that he had said important things: for example, Eusebius claims that he is following Josephus when he links the beginning of the troubles in Judea to the death of Jesus, although he does not give an exact quotation.

How is the presence in Byzantium of a copy of the Greek draft to be explained? This must be attributed either to chance or to an error. We have seen that Photius, the initiator of the Slavonic mission of Cyril and Methodius, seems to have known an echo of this text, with regard to the children in Bethlehem. In any case, the copy later translated into Slavonic certainly came from Byzantium.<sup>41</sup>

---

<sup>41</sup> Eng. trans.: Brian McNeil.

THE SON OF MAN IN ANCIENT JUDAISM

JOHN J. COLLINS

1. Introduction

The expression ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, literally, the son of the man, occurs more than 70 times in the gospels with reference to Jesus.<sup>1</sup> The expression is clearly a Semitism, corresponding to Hebrew בן אדם or Aramaic בר אנשא, either of which means, normally, “human being” or “someone.” The plural, בני אדם, is commonly used to refer to humanity at large. In the Book of Ezekiel, the prophet is addressed 93 times as בן אדם. The determinate form of the singular, בן האדם, is not attested in the Hebrew Bible. In Aramaic, the expressions בר (א)נשא and בר (א)נשא refer to human beings in a generic sense. In the gospels, however, ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου evidently refers to a specific individual, at least in most cases. Several of these references envision the “Son of Man” coming on the clouds of heaven, a clear allusion to the vision in chapter 7 of the Book of Daniel.

For much of the twentieth century, scholars sought to explain this usage of “Son of Man” with reference to an individual, supernatural, figure, by appeal to a supposedly widespread myth of a Primal Man, of Iranian origin. Speculation about this Primal Man, or Urmensch, is associated especially with the “History of Religions School” (die Religionsgeschichtliche Schule) in the early part of the twentieth century.<sup>2</sup> This approach to scholarship was prompted by the discovery of ancient religious texts, from Egypt to Iran, in the nineteenth century. Much of the discussion focused on late Hellenistic and even later Mandaean and Gnostic materials that date from the third to the sixth centuries CE, but it also drew on studies of kingship ideology in the ancient Near East. In the words of Sigmund Mowinckel, "Conceptions of a more or less divine Primordial Man were widespread in the ancient east. Apparently there is a historical connexion between the varying figures of this type, which seem to be derived, directly, or indirectly, from Iranian or Indo-Iranian myths."<sup>3</sup> The Jewish conception of "the Son of Man" was "a Jewish variant of this oriental, cosmological, eschatological myth of Anthropos."<sup>4</sup> Little attention was paid to the distinctive aspects and historical circumstances of the different bodies of literature. The most recent exponent of this approach to the "Son of Man" problem, F. H. Borsch, summed up his thesis as follows:

---

<sup>1</sup> A. Yarbro Collins, “The Origin of the Designation of Jesus as ‘Son of Man,’” HTR 80 (1987): 391–408, at 396, reprinted in eadem, Cosmology and Eschatology in Jewish and Christian Apocalypticism (Leiden: Brill, 2000), 139–158, at 145.

<sup>2</sup> Important works in this school include R. Reitzenstein, Poimandres: Studien zur griechisch-ägyptischen und frühchristlichen Literatur (Leipzig: Hinrichs, 1904); Reitzenstein and H. H. Schaeder, Studien zum antiken Synkretismus, aus Iran und Griechenland (Berlin: Teubner, 1926).

it is our contention that we have good cause for suspecting that there was a mythical conception of relative antiquity concerning a primal hero, conceived of as Man who was once on earth, whose story contains some reference to defeat or death. Yet somehow he was also regarded as one who was or who was very closely allied with a glorious, cosmic Man figure of the heavens. While such legendary beliefs are never found in exactly the same guise and often appear only in fragmentary forms, and while we do not necessarily postulate some one original myth, there is reason to believe that the variant descriptions are related.<sup>5</sup>

Even at the time when Borsch wrote, however, this approach had begun to seem dated. There was a growing realization that composite myths cannot be constructed from fragmentary sources in different religious traditions, and then retrojected to a time centuries earlier than the extant sources. The problems with the religionsgeschichtlich approach were pointed out decisively in a monograph by Carsten Colpe in 1961.<sup>6</sup> Colpe concluded "not that traditions of a cosmic heavenly macroanthropos, a protoplast put in the end-time, or an archetypal primal man were adopted, but rather that Jewish apocalyptic itself had been fruitful in developing the figure of the Son of Man."<sup>7</sup> So while Colpe was much more careful than the scholars of the religionsgeschichtliche Schule in avoiding anachronism and focus-

<sup>3</sup> S. Mowinckel, He That Cometh: The Messiah Concept in Israel and Later Judaism (Nashville: Abingdon, 1956; reprint, Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005), 422.

<sup>4</sup> Mowinckel, He That Cometh, 425.

<sup>5</sup> F. H. Borsch, The Son of Man in Myth and History (London: SCM, 1967), 87.

<sup>6</sup> C. Colpe, Die religionsgeschichtliche Schule: Darstellung und Kritik ihres Bildes vom gnostischen Erlösermythus (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1961). See also his article "ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου," TDNT 8 (1972): 400–477, esp. 408–415.

<sup>7</sup> Ibid., 419–420.

ing the discussion within specific historical and cultural limits, he affirmed the existence of a “Son of Man concept” in Judaism around the turn of the era.

Other scholars went farther. In 1968, Ragnar Leivestadt had declared the apocalyptic Son of Man to be a phantom.<sup>8</sup> A few years later he reformulated his thesis in English: “Exit the Apocalyptic Son of Man.”<sup>9</sup> Geza Vermes argued that “no titular use of the phrase ‘the son of man’ can be substantiated” from the Jewish sources, and that “the association between ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου and Dan 7:13 constitutes a secondary midrashic stage of development, more understandable in Greek than in Aramaic.”<sup>10</sup> Norman Perrin argued that “there is no ‘Son of Man’ concept, but rather a variety of uses of Son of Man imagery.”<sup>11</sup> Barnabas Lindars is typical of much recent scholarship when he declares the “Son of Man” concept to be “a modern myth.”<sup>12</sup>

Insofar as the “Son of Man” concept is understood in terms of a syncretistic Anthropos myth, pieced together from late Hellenistic and Gnostic sources, the critical reaction is certainly justified. Moreover, it is unwarranted to suppose that all Jewish witnesses to the “Son of Man” draw on a composite myth that encompasses them all. It is now readily granted that “the Son of Man” was not a fixed title in Judaism in the first century CE. The significance of this point should not be exaggerated, however. The text of Daniel’s vision was well known, and it inspired further reflections and imaginative elaborations. It is not necessary to posit the existence of any “Son of Man” myth beyond what we find in the texts. Later authors adapt Daniel’s vision in ways that are quite creative, and are by no means simple reproductions of the original vision. There were, however, some widely held assumptions about the nature of the figure in Daniel’s vision, and these go beyond what is explicit in the biblical text. Whether or not these assumptions are thought to amount to a “Son of Man concept,” they are important for the context of the early Jesus tradition and for the designation of Jesus as ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου.

<sup>8</sup> R. Leivestadt, “Der apokalyptische Menschensohn ein theologisches Phantom,” Annual of the Swedish Theological Institute 6 (1967–68): 49–109.

<sup>9</sup> Leivestadt, “Exit the Apocalyptic Son of Man,” NTS 18 (1971–72): 243–267.

<sup>10</sup> G. Vermes, Jesus and the World of Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984), 96–98.

<sup>11</sup> N. Perrin, A Modern Pilgrimage in New Testament Christology (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974), 26.

<sup>12</sup> B. Lindars, Jesus, Son of Man (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1983), 3.

2. Daniel 7

Fundamental to any expectation of a heavenly “Son of Man” figure is the vision reported in Aramaic in Daniel 7. Daniel, we are told, had a dream, in which “the four winds of heaven stirred up the great sea.” Then four great beasts came up out of the sea. All were terrible, but the fourth was most terrible of all. Then, while Daniel watched: “thrones were set, and an Ancient of Days took his seat.” This figure is evidently divine, and is attended by an entourage of “ten thousand times ten thousand.” He presides over a judgment scene. The fourth beast is slain before him. Then, the vision continues, “I watched in the visions of the night, and behold, one like a son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and he approached the Ancient of Days and was presented before him.” He is given an indestructible kingdom and everlasting dominion over all the nations.<sup>13</sup>

The expression “one like a son of man” in this passage is more properly translated as “one like a human being.” His human form contrasts with that of the beasts from the sea. But he is not said to be human. The imagery of a figure riding on the clouds strongly suggests that the figure in question is divine. In the words of John Emerton: “The act of coming with clouds suggests a theophany of Yahwe himself. If Dan vii.13 does not refer to a divine being, then it is the only exception out of about seventy passages in the O. T.”<sup>14</sup> The anomaly of this passage in a Jewish context is that there is already a divine figure seated on the throne, who clearly has priority over the figure associated with the clouds.

While this imagery is anomalous in a Jewish context, however, it is quite intelligible against the background of Canaanite mythology, known to us from texts from the second millennium BCE, found at Ugarit.<sup>15</sup> There El is the white-headed “father of years,” while Baal is the fertility god and rider of the clouds. Moreover, one of Baal’s great adversaries is the Sea (Yamm), while in Daniel the figure on the clouds is contrasted with the beasts that rise from the sea. (The Sea is also associated with monsters in the Canaanite tradition, notably Lotan, the biblical Leviathan, and Shilyat of the seven heads.) The imagery is adapted in a novel way in Daniel's vision. Four beasts are said to rise from the sea, to allow for a correlation with four world kingdoms. Most significantly, the rider of the clouds does not engage the beasts in battle. Rather, they are condemned by a heavenly court, and everything is decided by divine decree. Nonetheless, the configuration of imagery strongly suggests that Daniel's vision is indebted to Canaanite mythology. What is important is the pattern of relationships: the opposition between the sea and the rider of the clouds, the presence of two godlike figures, and the fact that one who comes with clouds receives everlasting dominion.<sup>16</sup>

<sup>13</sup> For commentary on this passage see J. J. Collins, Daniel: A Commentary on the Book of Daniel, Hermeneia (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993), 274–324.

<sup>14</sup> J. A. Emerton, “The Origin of the Son of Man Imagery,” JTS 9 (1958): 225–242, at 231–232. Yahweh is the rider of the clouds in such passages as Deut 33:26; Ps 68:5; Ps 104:3.

<sup>15</sup> Colpe, “ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου,” 415–419; Collins, Daniel, 286–294.

The suggestion that Daniel was indebted to Canaanite mythology has met with a certain amount of scholarly resistance.<sup>17</sup> On the one hand, some scholars are reluctant to believe that a pious Jewish author would use symbolism derived from a Canaanite source. We are increasingly aware, however, that Canaanite traditions were indigenous in Israel,<sup>18</sup> and so the visionary may not have thought of this imagery as foreign at all. Alternatively, the vision may have been intended to subvert the worship of Baal Shamem, which was introduced into the Jerusalem temple by Antiochus Epiphanes, sparking the crisis that forms the context of Daniel's visions. A more difficult problem is presented by the fact that we do not know how Canaanite traditions were transmitted in the Hellenistic period. There can be little doubt, however, that many more traditions were current in Second Temple Judaism than are now extant. Glimpses of such traditions can be seen in the so-called Apocalypse of Isaiah (Isaiah 24–27), which alludes to Leviathan (27:1), the destruction of Mot or Death (25:8) and an enigmatic punishment of the host of heaven (24:21–23). Other mythological traditions come to light in extrabiblical writings

---

<sup>16</sup> See J. J. Collins, "Stirring Up the Great Sea: The Religio-Historical Background of Daniel 7," in idem, Seers, Sibyls, and Sages in Hellenistic-Roman Judaism, JSJSup 54 (Leiden: Brill, 1997), 139–155.

<sup>17</sup> See e.g. L. F. Hartman and A. A. DiLella, The Book of Daniel, AB 23 (New York: Doubleday, 1978), 212; M. P. Casey, Son of Man: The Interpretation and Influence of Daniel 7 (London: SPCK, 1979), 35–38; A. J. Ferch, The Son of Man in Daniel 7 (Berrien Springs MI: Andrews University Press, 1979), 40–107.

<sup>18</sup> See especially the ground-breaking work of F. M. Cross, Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1973); J. Day, God's Conflict with the Dragon and the Sea (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985).

such as 1 Enoch, and in the Dead Sea Scrolls. It is not implausible, then, that Daniel could have drawn on traditions that are not attested in the Hebrew Bible and that are ultimately of Canaanite origin.

To say that the imagery of Daniel 7 is ultimately derived from Canaanite imagery is not, however, to say that the author or original readers understood the “one like a son of man” as Baal, or that Baal was the proto-type of the “Son of Man.” The identification and meaning of the figure must be assessed within the context of Daniel’s vision. The vision is interpreted for Daniel by an angel: “As for these great beasts which are four: four kings will arise from the earth. The holy ones of the Most High will receive the kingdom and will possess the kingdom forever and forever and ever” (Dan 7:17–18). Later, in 7:27, we are told that the kingdom will be given to “the people of the holy ones of the Most High.”

Many scholars have inferred from this interpretation that “the holy ones of the Most High” are the Jewish people, and that the “one like a son of man” is a collective symbol for them.<sup>19</sup> This inference is not well founded. The adjective “holy ones,” when used substantively, nearly always refers to angels, in the Hebrew Bible and in the Dead Sea Scrolls. There is only one clear exception in the Hebrew Bible (Ps 34:10). Moreover, the Aramaic קד׳יִשׁ׳ן is used of heavenly beings in Dan 4:14, and the singular is found in 4:10, 20. In the Hebrew part of the book, Daniel hears one “holy one” speaking to another in 8:13, and these are clearly members of the heavenly court. So, while “the people of the holy ones” in Dan 7:27 are plausibly identified as the Jewish people, the holy ones who initially receive the kingdom are their heavenly counterparts. There is, of course, correspondence between the earthly and heavenly realms. In Daniel 10:13, 20–21 we are told of struggles between Michael, “prince” or patron angel of Israel, aided by Gabriel, on the one hand, and the “princes” of Persia and Greece on the other. The Similitudes of Enoch, a book heavily indebted to Daniel, distinguishes between “the holy ones who dwell in the heavens” and the righteous and holy on earth. After death, the human righteous have “their dwelling with the angels and their resting places with the holy ones” (1 En. 39:5). A similar correspondence of earthly and heavenly holy ones is found in the Dead Sea Scrolls. To identify the “holy ones of the Most High” simply as the Jewish people is to miss the more complex metaphysical understanding of the situation implied in the ancient texts.

---

<sup>19</sup> See e.g. Hartman and DiLella, The Book of Daniel, 218–219.

The holy ones in Daniel 7 correspond to the Jewish people in some way, but they are not simply identical with them. Neither is the “one like a son of man” adequately understood as a collective symbol for the holy ones, either angelic or human. While the interpreting angel in Daniel 7 says explicitly that the four beasts are four kings (or kingdoms), he does not say that the “one like a son of man” is equivalent to the holy ones. There are several other instances where Daniel sees in his visions figures that have the appearance of a man. In 8:15, he sees one standing before him “in the likeness of a man” (כַּמְרֵאָה גִבֹּר). The figure is identified as the angel Gabriel. This figure reappears in 9:21, where he is introduced as “the man Gabriel” (הָאִישׁ גַּבְרִיאֵל). In ch. 10 he sees “a certain man dressed in linen” who is also evidently an angel. Finally, two angelic figures, one of whom is a man dressed in line, appear in 12:5–7. There were plenty of precedents for the depiction of angels in human form in the Hebrew Bible.<sup>20</sup> The closest parallels to Daniel are found in Ezekiel. In Ezekiel 1, the deity appears “in the likeness, as it were, of a human form” (1:26). In Ezek 8:2 a similar figure appears, who is probably an angel. In Ezekiel 9–10 a “man clothed in linen” appears, who is evidently the prototype for the similar figures in Daniel. Angels also appear as men in the visions of Zechariah (1:8; 2:5), and, closer to the time of Daniel, in the Animal Apocalypse in 1 Enoch.

In light of this usage, the “one like a son of man” in Daniel 7 is most plausibly interpreted, not as a collective symbol for the holy ones, but as their leader and representative, most probably Michael, who appears in Daniel 10–12 as the “prince” of Israel. The exaltation of Michael in heaven bespeaks the exaltation of Israel on earth, but it is not equivalent to it without remainder. A clear parallel to the scenario envisioned in Daniel can be found in the War Scroll from Qumran, which says that God “will exalt the authority of Michael above all the gods and the dominion of Israel over all flesh” (1QM XVII, 7–8).

It should be noted that all the earliest interpretations and adaptations of the “one like a human being,” Jewish and Christian alike, assume that the phrase refers to an individual and is not a symbol or a collective entity.<sup>21</sup> We shall see that this is the case in the Similitudes of Enoch and in 4 Ezra 13, the major adaptations of Daniel 7 in the pseudepigrapha. There is no hint of a collective interpretation in the New Testament. In Rev 14:14 the visionary sees “seated on the cloud was one like a son of man, with a golden crown on his head and a sharp sickle in his hand.” In this case, however, the “one like a son of man” is one of several angelic figures in a vision of destruction, and not identified with Christ (in contrast to Rev 1:13).<sup>22</sup> This passage, then, is an interesting witness to an angelic interpretation of “one like a son of man.” While the “Son of Man” figure in the Similitudes of Enoch and 4 Ezra is heavenly, he is also identified as “messiah.” The messianic interpretation prevails in rabbinic literature, and is still the majority interpretation among the medieval Jewish commentators.<sup>23</sup>

<sup>20</sup> E.g. Gen 18:2; Josh 5:13; Judg 13:6, 8, 16.

3. The Similitudes of Enoch

The most important and extensive portrayal of a figure called “Son of Man” in a Jewish text, apart from Daniel 7, is found in the Similitudes of Enoch (1 Enoch 37–71). This section of 1 Enoch is not attested in the Dead Sea Scrolls, and some doubts exist about its date and its Jewish origin.<sup>24</sup> It is hardly conceivable, however, that a Christian author would have written about a figure called “Son of Man” without identifying him explicitly as Jesus. Neither is it likely that a Jewish author would have used this imagery after the Christian identification of Jesus as Son of Man became current. Moreover, the “Son of Man” passages in the Gospel of Matthew (Matt 19:28 and 25:31), which refer to a “glorious throne,” are plausibly thought to depend on the Similitudes.<sup>25</sup> These considerations suggest a date prior to 70 CE. The allusion to the Parthians in 1 En. 56.5–7 is usually assumed to imply a date after the Parthian invasion in 40 BCE, while the reference to hot springs that serve the kings and the mighty in 67.5–13

<sup>21</sup> See Collins, Daniel, 72–105.

<sup>22</sup> See A. Yarbro Collins, “The ‘Son of Man’ Tradition and the Book of Revelation,” in eadem, Cosmology and Eschatology, 159–197.

<sup>23</sup> Collins, Daniel, 307.

<sup>24</sup> See the reviews of scholarship by D. W. Suter, “Weighed in the Balance: The Similitudes of Enoch in Recent Discussion,” Religious Studies Review 7 (1981): 217–221, and Sabino Chiala, Libro delle parabole di Enoc, Studi Biblici 117 (Brescia: Paideia, 1997), 39–51.

<sup>25</sup> J. Theisohn, Der auserwählte Richter (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1975), 149–182.

may be prompted by Herod's attempt to cure himself in the waters of Callirhoe.<sup>26</sup> So, while the evidence is less than conclusive, a date in the early or middle first century CE seems likely.<sup>27</sup>

The Similitudes consist of three "parables" (chs. 38–44; 45–57; and 58–69).<sup>28</sup> Chapter 37 introduces the entire composition as a "vision of wisdom." Chapter 38 introduces the first parable by asking where the dwelling of sinners will be when "the Righteous One appears in the presence of the righteous." This is followed in ch. 39 by recollection of the ascent of Enoch on a whirlwind (cf. 1 Enoch 14). The wisdom, then, is based on what he saw when he ascended to heaven: the dwellings of the righteous (39.5–6) and the dwelling of the Chosen One. He also sees the archangels and the judgment that is to come. Finally, he is shown various cosmological secrets, such as the storehouses of the sun and moon, and is told that he has been shown a parable about the holy ones that live on earth and believe in the name of the Lord of Spirits.

The second parable is "about those who deny the name of the dwelling of the holy ones and the Lord of Spirits." These, we are told, will neither ascend to heaven nor come on earth. The main focus of the parable, however, concerns the judgment day when the Chosen One will sit on his throne of glory. This scene is clearly modelled on Daniel's vision, although the older scene is adapted freely. Enoch sees "one who had a head of days, and his head was like white wool. And with him was another, whose face was like the appearance of a man; and his face was full of graciousness like one of the holy angels" (46.1). Enoch proceeds to inquire about "that Son of Man." Again, he is shown the destiny of the righteous and wicked and various cosmological secrets.

The third parable is said in ch. 58 to be about the righteous and the chosen and their destiny. Again, Enoch is shown cosmological secrets, but again a significant segment of the parable is devoted to the "Son of Man" figure and the judgment (chs. 61–64).

<sup>26</sup> Josephus, Ant. 17.171–173; War 1.657–658.

<sup>27</sup> So also D. W. Suter, Tradition and Composition in the Parables of Enoch, SBLDS 47 (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1979), 32.

<sup>28</sup> G. W. E. Nickelsburg, "Discerning the Structure(s) of the Enochic Book of Parables," and M. A. Knibb, "The Structure and Composition of the Book of Parables," in Enoch and the Messiah Son of Man, ed. G. Boccaccini (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007), 23–47 and 48–64, respectively. Citations from the Similitudes follow G. W. E. Nickelsburg and J. C. VanderKam, 1 Enoch: A New Translation (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2004).

It is apparent, then, that the “Son of Man” plays a central role in the Similitudes, and this is all the more apparent if we recognize that he is one and the same as the figure referred to as the Righteous, or the Chosen.<sup>29</sup> The clearest allusion to Daniel’s vision is in 46.1, cited above. Again in 47.3, the books are opened before the Head of Days, who is surrounded by his court in the manner of Daniel 7. The Son of Man is initially introduced as one “whose face was like the appearance of a man.” This formulation does not suggest that Son of Man was a well-known title. The figure in question is subsequently referred to as “that son of man”—that is, the figure with human appearance who appeared with the “Head of Days.” Despite his human appearance, he is not a man, at least in the usual sense of the word. He is “like one of the holy angels” (46.1). While he is distinguished from other angels (Michael in 60.4–5; 69.14; 71.3; the four archangels in 71.8, 9, 13), his rank is higher than theirs.

The exalted nature of the Son of Man is especially in evidence in 48.2–3: “And in that hour that son of man was named in the presence of the Lord of Spirits, and his name before the Head of Days. Even before the sun and the constellations were created, before the stars of heaven were made, his name was named before the Lord of Spirits.” The passage continues in 48.6: “For this (reason) he was chosen and hidden in his presence before the world was created and forever.” While the context of 1 En. 48.2 is either eschatological or the time of Enoch’s ascent, 48.6 seems to state unequivocally that the Son of Man existed before the world was created. Similarly, in 1 En. 62.7 we read:

For from the beginning the son of man was hidden, and the Most High preserved him in the presence of his might,
and he revealed him to the chosen.

It is sometimes suggested that pre-existence here only means “a project in the mind of God,”<sup>30</sup> or that what was hidden was merely his identity.<sup>31</sup> But it is difficult to see why his identity would need to be hidden if he did not yet exist. The clearest parallel for a pre-existent

---

<sup>29</sup> J. C. VanderKam, “Righteous One, Messiah, Chosen One, and Son of Man in 1 Enoch 37–71,” in The Messiah: Developments in Earliest Judaism and Christianity, ed. J. H. Charlesworth (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992), 169–191.

<sup>30</sup> T. W. Manson, “The Son of Man in Daniel, Enoch and the Gospels,” BJRL 32 (1949–50): 183–185.

<sup>31</sup> VanderKam, “Righteous One,” 180.

figure in pre-Christian Judaism is the portrayal of wisdom in Prov 8:22–31.<sup>32</sup> It would seem that the Similitudes here have developed the identity of the Son of Man well beyond anything that we found in Daniel, by applying to him language that is elsewhere used of wisdom.

The Similitudes also develop the role of the Son of Man beyond what was found in Daniel in other significant ways. Besides the association with wisdom, he is said to be “the light of the nations” like the servant in Second Isaiah.<sup>33</sup> The spirit of wisdom and insight that dwells in him (49.1–4) recalls the messianic oracle in Isaiah 11.<sup>34</sup> Moreover, the kings of the earth are condemned in 48.10 for having denied “the Lord of Spirits and his Anointed One,” in language reminiscent of Psalm 2. Again in 52.4, Enoch is told that all that he has seen “will serve the authority of his Anointed One.” It is not suggested that the Son of Man is a human descendent of David, but he is the Anointed, or Messiah, of the Lord, who takes over the functions of the Davidic king vis-à-vis the nations. He is also installed on a glorious throne, and takes over the function of eschatological judge (61.8; 62.2). Here again he functions in a manner reminiscent of the traditional messiah: “and the spirit of righteousness was poured out upon him, and the word of his mouth will slay all the sinners” (62.2).

Up to the end of the third parable there is no hint that the “Son of Man” might actually be identical with the visionary Enoch. Not only is there no suggestion that Enoch is seeing himself, but the fact that the Son of Man was hidden before creation would seem to preclude an identification. Nonetheless, the question of an identification is raised in the epilogues to the Similitudes. In 71.14, when Enoch ascends to heaven, he is greeted by an angel: “You are that son of man who was born for righteousness, and righteousness dwells on you, and the righteousness of the Head of Days will not forsake you.” It is generally held that this passage identifies Enoch with the Son of Man whom he has seen in his visions. There is sharp disagreement,

---

<sup>32</sup> Theisohn, Der auserwählte Richter, 126–139. The affinity with wisdom is also emphasized by H. S. Kvanvig, “The Son of Man in the Parables of Enoch,” in Enoch and the Messiah Son of Man, ed. Boccaccini, 179–215. He notes that wisdom is also associated with the Son of Man in 1 En. 49.1–4 and 51.3.

<sup>33</sup> For other allusions to the servant passages in 2 Isaiah, see Theisohn, Der auserwählte Richter, 114–126; VanderKam, “Righteous One,” 189.

<sup>34</sup> Theisohn, Der auserwählte Richter, 138.

however, as to whether this identification was intended throughout the Similitudes.

A major factor in this debate concerns the interpretation of 70.1–2. There are in fact two epilogues to the Similitudes.<sup>35</sup> 70.1–2 constitutes a brief statement in the third person. 70.3–71.17 is narrated in the first person. It is possible to view 70.3–4 as distinct from 71.1–17, and, in effect, as a third epilogue.<sup>36</sup> 1 Enoch 70.1–2 is translated as follows by George Nickelsburg:

And after this, while he was living, his name was raised into the presence of that son of man and into the presence of the Lord of Spirits from among those who dwell on the earth. He was raised on the chariots of the wind, and his name departed from among them.

This translation, based on the majority reading in the manuscripts, makes a clear distinction between Enoch and the Son of Man. In 1976, Maurice Casey proposed a different understanding of the passage based on one important manuscript, Abbadianus 55 (U), and two late MSS, which lack the word baxaba (or baxabehu in some MSS), “into the presence,” before “that son of man.”<sup>37</sup> The text could then be rendered: “the name of that son of man was raised into the presence of the Lord of Spirits,” thus permitting an identification of Enoch with the Son of Man.<sup>38</sup> (The translation “to the son of man” is also possible). Since this proposal relied primarily on one manuscript, which was known for capricious omissions, there was little reason to regard it as anything but a scribal mistake. In the meantime, however, four, and possibly five, other manuscripts have come to light that support the minority reading.<sup>39</sup> Whether this reading is to be preferred, however, remains uncertain. Prima facie, the majority reading should still be preferred as the lectio difficilior;<sup>40</sup> the minority

<sup>35</sup> See Nickelsburg, “Discerning the Structure(s);” Knibb, “The Structure and Composition.”

<sup>36</sup> So Nickelsburg, “Discerning the Structure(s).”

<sup>37</sup> P. M. Casey, “The Use of the Term ‘Son of Man’ in the Similitudes of Enoch,” JSJ 7 (1976): 11–29.

<sup>38</sup> Compare M. Black, The Book of Enoch or 1 Enoch, SVTP 7 (Leiden: Brill, 1985), 67, who translates: “the name of a son of man (i.e. Enoch) was raised up to the Lord of Spirits.”

<sup>39</sup> Daniel C. Olson, “Enoch and the Son of Man in the Epilogue of the Parables,” JSP 18 (1998): 27–38, at 30–31.

<sup>40</sup> Pace A. Caquot, “Remarques sur les chapitres 70 et 71 du livre éthiopien d’Hénoch,” in Apocalypses et théologie de l’espérance, ed. L. Monloubou, LD 95 (Paris: Cerf, 1977), 111–122, and L. W. Walck, “The Son of Man in the Similitudes of Enoch reading can be explained as an attempt to remove the contradiction between this passage and 71.14. Daniel Olson has made a complex argument based on the different Ethiopic expressions for “Son of Man” in the two passages. The expression in 70.1, walda egwāla emmaḥeyāw, is the usual phrase for Son of Man in the Ethiopic New Testament. In 71.14, the phrase is walda beesi, an expression that is not used for Christ in Ethiopic literature, and is used only three other times in the Similitudes. Olson suggests that Ethiopic scribes found it unacceptable to identify Enoch as walda egwāla emmaḥeyāw, and changed the text. But in that case, we must wonder why an Ethiopic translator would have chosen this phrase for this passage in the first case.<sup>41</sup> It is simpler to assume that the majority reading was correct and that the omission of the word baxaba or baxabehu was merely a scribal mistake.

Olson notes that the reading walda beesi in 71.14 has traditionally been understood in the Ezekielian sense in the Ethiopian Church—that is, Enoch is not told that he is the Son of Man, but that he is a son of man who has righteousness. This is indeed a possible way of reading the Ethiopic.<sup>42</sup> This is one of only two passages in the Similitudes where “son of man” is used in direct address. The other passage is 60.10, where the Ethiopic is walda sabe, and the passage is universally understood as being in the manner of Ezekiel. There is then some reason to entertain the idea that Enoch is not being identified with the Son of Man in 71.14, but only being told that he is a righteous man. The fact that the language here echoes 46.3 (“this is the son of man [walda sabe] who has righteousness”) does not exclude this interpretation, as the Similitudes emphasize throughout the correspondence between the heavenly and earthly righteous (compare 38:2: “and when the Righteous One appears in the presence and the Gospels,” in Enoch and the Messiah Son of Man, ed. Boccaccini, 299–337, based on his dissertation, The Son of Man in Matthew and the “Similitudes of Enoch” (Ann Arbor, MI: UMI Dissertation Services, 1999), who suggest that Abb 55 has the lectio difficilior because it contradicts the presentation of the Son of Man as heavenly in the preceding parables.

---

<sup>41</sup> Moreover, Michael Knibb, “The Translation of 1 Enoch 70:1. Some Methodological Issues,” in Biblical Hebrew, Biblical Texts. Essays in Memory of Michael P. Weitzman, ed. A. Rapoport-Albert and G. Greenberg, JSOTSup 333 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001), 340–354, at 352–353 points out that 1 En. 71.14 in fact was given a christological interpretation in the Ethiopian writing Mashafa Milad.

<sup>42</sup> See my discussion in my essay, “The Son of Man in First-Century Judaism,” NTS 38 (1992): 448–466, at 456–457.

of the righteous”). A more weighty objection arises from the fact that Enoch was later identified with Metatron in Jewish tradition.<sup>43</sup> Identification with the Son of Man would seem to be a step in that development. It is probably simplest to accept that this identification was intended in 1 En. 71.14.

This passage, however, is part of a second epilogue, and stands in contradiction to the more probable reading of the first epilogue in 1 En. 70.1–2. This second epilogue is most readily explained as a secondary addition,<sup>44</sup> which may well have been added specifically to identify Enoch as the Son of Man. This identification, in turn, may have been suggested by the Christian appropriation of this title for Jesus. In the body of the Similitudes, however, there is no suggestion at all that the Son of Man ever had an earthly career. He is the heavenly representative and vindicator of the righteous on earth, but he is a heavenly figure, whose power and glory compensates for the lack of power of the righteous on earth.

4. 4 Ezra 13

Another major witness to the interpretation, or adaptation, of the Danielic “Son of Man” in ancient Judaism is found in 4 Ezra, an apocalypse written at the end of the first century CE. The apocalypse contains three dialogues and four visions.<sup>45</sup> In the third vision (ch. 13) Ezra reports:

Then after seven days I had a dream in the night. I saw a wind rising from the sea that stirred up all its waves. As I kept looking, that wind brought up out of the depths of the sea something resembling a man and that man was flying with the clouds of heaven...

The original language was certainly Semitic, but the composition survives only in translations, of which the Latin and Syriac are most important. The statement “that wind brought up out of the sea something resembling a man” is missing from the Latin, apparently

---

<sup>43</sup> See now A. A. Orlov, The Enoch-Metatron Tradition, TSAJ 107 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2005).

<sup>44</sup> So also Nickelsburg, “Discerning the Structure(s)”, Knibb, “The Structure and Composition”; Chiala, Libro delle parabole, 287.

<sup>45</sup> For introductory matters see M. E. Stone, Fourth Ezra: A Commentary on the Book of Fourth Ezra, Hermeneia (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990), 1–35; J. J. Collins, The Apocalyptic Imagination, 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1998), 195–210.

because of homoioteleuton. Most scholars assume that the missing passage read homo for “man” since this is what the Latin uses elsewhere in the chapter. The Syriac, however, reads ’ēk dmwt’ dbrnš’, and this suggests that the original may have read “son of man.” It can be argued that the author used the longer phrase initially and the shorter phrase subsequently. Even if 4 Ezra does not use the expression “Son of Man,” however, or use it as a title, it is clearly adapting and reworking Daniel’s vision.

There is a further textual problem regarding the relation of the wind and the man. The Ethiopic version reads “this wind came out of the sea in the resemblance of a man.” It has been argued that this is the lectio difficilior and that “wind” is a misreading of “spirit.”<sup>46</sup> This proposal is doubtful, however. Most scholars restore the Latin on the basis of the Syriac, so that the wind is said to bring the man up.

The image of the man flying with the clouds of heaven is a clear allusion to Daniel 7. There is also an explicit reference to Daniel 7 in the preceding chapter, 4 Ezra 12, where the interpreting angel tells Ezra explicitly: “The eagle you observed coming up out of the sea is the fourth kingdom that appeared in a vision to Daniel your brother. But it was not interpreted to him in the same way that I now interpret it to you” (4 Ezra 12.11). Moreover, the interpretation in chapter 13 provides a clear allusion to Daniel 2, when it says that the mountain on which the man takes his stand was “carved out without hands.” This detail was not mentioned in the vision.

The allusions to Daniel in 4 Ezra 13 are woven together with echoes of other sources. Anyone who hears the voice of the man from the sea melts like wax before a fire (compare the effect of theophany in Mic 1:4). Most importantly, a great host comes to make war on the man. He carves out a mountain for himself and takes his stand upon it. Then he destroys the onrushing multitude with the breath of his lips. The onslaught of the multitude recalls Psalm 2. The mountain is Zion, the holy mountain (Ps 2:6). The breath of his lips is the weapon of the messianic king in Isa 11:4. Taken together, these allusions suggest that the man from the sea has taken on the role traditionally ascribed to the messianic king. This impression is strengthened in the interpretation that follows, where the man is identified as “my son” (13.32, 37).<sup>47</sup>

---

<sup>46</sup> H. S. Kvanvig, Roots of Apocalyptic (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1988), 517–520.

Like the Similitudes of Enoch, 4 Ezra 13 is quite free in its adaptation of Daniel’s vision. Whereas in Daniel, the sea was the source of hostile monsters, here it is the man who rises from the sea. Apparently the sea has become an area of mystery rather than a well of chaos.<sup>48</sup> Nonetheless, the fact that the vision juxtaposes the sea with the man riding on the clouds shows the literary influence of Daniel 7.

The most important departure from Daniel 7, however, is the assimilation of the “Son of Man” to the traditional, Davidic messiah. Unlike the Similitudes of Enoch, 4 Ezra has a developed notion of a Davidic messiah. In 7.28–29 he is called “my son (or servant) the messiah.”<sup>49</sup> He is “revealed with those who are with him,” a formulation that seems to imply pre-existence. After a four hundred year reign, however, the messiah dies, and the world reverts to seven days of primeval silence, followed by the resurrection. The messiah, then, is human, despite his pre-existence. The heavenly character of the “Son of Man” as we have seen it in Daniel and the Similitudes, is significantly qualified here. Nonetheless, the understanding of the messiah is also modified by the correlation with the “Son of Man.” While the messiah is said to come from the line of David in 12.32, this is “a traditional element and not at all central to the concepts of the book.”<sup>50</sup> Despite his eventual death, the messiah is a preexistent, transcendent figure, whom the Most High has been keeping for many ages.

---

<sup>47</sup> See further J. J. Collins, The Scepter and the Star: The Messiahs of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Other Ancient Literature (New York: Doubleday, 1995), 184–185; M. E. Stone, “The Question of the Messiah in 4 Ezra,” in Judaisms and their Messiahs, ed. J. Neusner, W. S. Green and E. Frerichs (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987), 209–224.

<sup>48</sup> Kvanvig, Roots of Apocalyptic, 531, argues that the sea must have the same meaning in both Daniel and 4 Ezra, and identifies it with Apsu, the subterranean water, in both cases. For a critique of Kvanvig’s learned and complex proposal see my essay, “Genre, Ideology and Social Movements in Jewish Apocalypticism,” in Mysteries and Revelations: Apocalyptic Studies since the Uppsala Colloquium, ed. J. J. Collins and J. H. Charlesworth, JSPSup 9 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1991), 25–32 (“Appendix: A New Proposal on Apocalyptic Origins”).

<sup>49</sup> The Latin filius probably translates the Greek παῖς which could mean either “son” or “servant.” See Stone, Fourth Ezra, 207–213 (“Excursus on the Redeemer Figure”).

<sup>50</sup> M. E. Stone, Features of the Eschatology of Fourth Ezra (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1989), 131–132.

5. Common Assumptions

The relationship between 4 Ezra 13 and the Similitudes of Enoch is complex. The “man from the sea” is very different from the Enochic Son of Man. The one is a warrior, concerned with the restoration of Israel. The other is a judge enthroned in heaven, who does not appear on earth at all. Nonetheless, the two texts share some common assumptions about the interpretation of the “one like a son of man” in Daniel 7. Both assume that the figure in Daniel is an individual, not a collective symbol. Both identify him with the messiah, and describe his role in terms usually applied to the Davidic messiah, although they understand his role in different ways. Both the Enochic Son of Man and the man from the sea are pre-existent beings of heavenly origin. Both appropriate imagery that was traditionally reserved for God: the Enochic Son of Man sits on the throne of glory and the figure in 4 Ezra is portrayed in terms of the theophany of the divine warrior. This figure takes a more active role in the destruction of the wicked than was the case in the Book of Daniel. If “servant” rather than “son” is the original designation of the messiah in 4 Ezra, the possibility arises that both texts associate this figure with the servant of the Lord. The man from the sea, however, has little in common with the Isaianic servant. Neither he nor the Enochic Son of Man undergoes any suffering (apart from the death of the messiah in 4 Ezra 7). It would be quite misleading to speak of a suffering servant in this connection.

There is no allusion to the Similitudes in 4 Ezra, and no reason to posit literary influence between them. Precisely for that reason, they are independent witnesses to common assumptions about the meaning of Daniel 7 in first-century Judaism. Very similar assumptions underlie the use of Son of Man imagery derived from Daniel in the gospels.<sup>51</sup>

6. Other Possible Witnesses

While the Similitudes of Enoch and 4 Ezra are the primary witnesses to the interpretation and adaptation of Daniel 7 in first-century Judaism, a few other texts must also be taken into consideration.

---

<sup>51</sup> Compare T. B. Slater, “One like a Son of Man in First-Century CE Judaism,” NTS 41 (1995): 183–198.

The most intriguing of these is the so-called “Son of God” text from Qumran (4Q246).<sup>52</sup> This is a fragmentary Aramaic text of which part of two columns survives. In the first column, only the second half of the lines survives. Much of the second column is intact. It speaks of a figure who will be called “Son of God” or “Son of the Most High.” There will be a period of strife, when people will trample on people and city on city, until the people of God arises and all rest from the sword. The text goes on to say that “his (or its) kingdom is an everlasting kingdom,” God will be his strength, and his (or its) sovereignty will be an everlasting sovereignty.

Scholarly opinion has been sharply divided as to whether the figure who is called “Son of God” should be viewed as positive or negative. The negative interpretation attaches much weight to the fact that some space is left blank before the reference to the people of God, which is then interpreted as a turning point in the text.<sup>53</sup> Against this, it is observed that “Son of God” and “Son of the Most High” are explicit messianic titles in the Gospel of Luke, and the extant text gives no hint that the title “Son of God” is inappropriate.<sup>54</sup> The general situation of an interpreter before a king is reminiscent of Daniel, so much so that the text was initially regarded as a pseudo-Daniel text. The clearest echoes of Daniel are at 2:5, “his kingdom is an everlasting kingdom” (compare Dan 3:33; 7:27) and 2:9, “his sovereignty will be an everlasting sovereignty” (compare Dan 4:31; 7:14). The conflict between nations is reminiscent in a general way of Daniel 11, but such conflict is commonplace in apocalyptic literature, notably also in 4 Ezra 13. Another possible allusion to Daniel lies in the use

---

<sup>52</sup> E. Puech, “246. 4Qapocryphe de Daniel ar,” in G. Brooke et al., Qumran Cave 4. XVII. Parabiblical Texts, Part 3, DJD 22 (Oxford: Clarendon, 1996), 165–184.

<sup>53</sup> E.g. E. Puech, “Some Remarks on 4Q246 and 4Q251 and Qumran Messianism,” in The Provo International Conference on the Dead Sea Scrolls, ed. D. W. Parry and E. Ulrich, STDJ 30 (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 548–549, and E. Cook, “4Q246,” BBR 5 (1995): 43–66, both of whom identify the “Son of God” figure as Antiochus Epiphanes. The negative interpretation was initially proposed by J. T. Milik in a lecture at Harvard in December 1972. Puech now accepts the messianic interpretation of the text.

<sup>54</sup> See my discussion in The Scepter and the Star, 154–172, and my response to Cook, “The Background of the ‘Son of God’ Text,” BBR 7 (1997): 51–62. See also F. M. Cross, The Ancient Library of Qumran, 3rd ed. (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995), 189–191. J. A. Fitzmyer, “The Aramaic ‘Son of God’ Text from Qumran Cave 4,” in idem, The Dead Sea Scrolls and Christian Origins (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2000), 41–62, holds the peculiar position that the “Son of God” is an eschatological heir to the Davidic throne, but not a messiah.

of the word “to trample” at 2:3. The same word is used with reference to the fourth beast in Daniel 7.

The analogies with Daniel may shed some light on the relation between the one who is called “Son of God” and the people of God. In Daniel 7, the eternal kingdom is explicitly given both to the “one like a son of man” and to the people of the holy ones. In the same way, the tensions in 4Q246 can be resolved if the “Son of God” is understood as a messianic king, so that the kingdom is given simultaneously both to him and to the people. If the text is read in this way, the figure of the Son of God fits well within the spectrum of messianic expectations around the turn of the era. He will exercise judgment and subdue the nations by the power of God.

In light of this situation, it is tempting to suggest that the “Son of God” represents an early interpretation of the “one like a son of man” in Daniel 7. If this were so, this would be the earliest instance of the messianic interpretation of the “one like a son of man,” which is attested in the Similitudes, well established in 4 Ezra, and dominant in rabbinic Judaism. It would also mitigate the strange absence of interpretations of Daniel 7 in the Dead Sea Scrolls. This interpretation of 4Q246, however, is uncertain. The “Son of God” text is certainly not an exposition of Daniel 7. While some words and phrases are drawn from that source, most elements of the biblical vision are ignored. The vision that is being interpreted is not preserved, but it seems to be the vision of a king rather than of a visionary like Daniel. There are no explicit allusions to the interpretation of Daniel here, such as we find in 4 Ezra 12. Accordingly, the possibility that this text is an interpretation, or adaptation, of Daniel 7 is no more than that.<sup>55</sup> The possibility should not be discounted, but it must await confirming evidence.

Another possible witness to early Jewish interpretation of Daniel 7 is found in the fifth Sibylline Oracle. This book is a collection of oracles from the early second century CE, which predicts the coming of a savior figure at various points.<sup>56</sup> The most important passage for our purposes is found in Sib Or 5.414–43, which speaks of “a blessed man from the expanses of heaven with a scepter in his hands which God gave him” in “the last time of holy ones.” The reference to holy ones brings Daniel to mind,<sup>57</sup> but the passage lacks the specific motifs (such as riding on the clouds, or association with an ancient figure) that might enable us to confirm the allusion. The notion of a king from heaven is not necessarily derived from Jewish sources at all. The Oracle of Hystaspes, a Hellenistic-Persian composition of the last century BCE, says that when the righteous are under duress, God “will send from heaven a great king to rescue and free them, and destroy all the wicked with fire and sword.”<sup>58</sup> It is difficult to have confidence that the Sibyl’s concept of a king from heaven is derived from Daniel.

---

<sup>55</sup> Pace J. D. G. Dunn, “‘Son of God’ as ‘Son of Man’ in the Dead Sea Scrolls? A Response to John Collins on 4Q246,” in The Scrolls and the Scriptures: Qumran Fifty Years After, ed. S. E. Porter and C. A. Evans, JSPSup 26 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997), 198–210, I have never claimed that this was more than a possibility. Dunn holds to the “negative” view of the “Son of God.”

<sup>56</sup> J. J. Collins, “The Sibylline Oracles, Book 5,” in The Old Testament Pseude-

Finally, the Testament of Abraham is sometimes adduced in this context.<sup>59</sup> Abraham is given a tour before his death by the archangel Michael, and is shown a judgment scene, in which “a wondrous man, bright as the sun, like unto a son of God” sits in judgment on a fiery throne. He is told that this is “the son of Adam, the first-formed, who is called Abel, whom Cain the wicked killed.” This figure recalls the Son of Man in the Similitudes of Enoch (rather than the “one like a son of man” in Daniel), by the fact that he sits on a glorious throne and has a transcendent, divine appearance. The identification of this figure with Abel may arise from the fact that the latter is “son of Adam,” which is to say בן אדם or “Son of Man.” If this passage is indeed indebted to the Similitudes, it represents a relatively late stage in the tradition, similar to what we found in 1 Enoch 71, when people were searching for figures with whom the “Son of Man” might be identified. The Testament of Abraham is usually assigned to Egypt

---

pigrapha, ed. J. H. Charlesworth, 2 vols. (New York: Doubleday, 1983, 1985), 1:390–392; The Apocalyptic Imagination, 234–238.

<sup>57</sup> So W. Horbury, “The Messianic Associations of ‘The Son of Man,’” in idem, Messianism among Jews and Christians (London and New York: T&T Clark, 2003), 140.

<sup>58</sup> Lactantius, Div. Inst. 7.17. See John R. Hinnells, “The Zoroastrian Doctrine of Salvation in the Roman World: A Study of the Oracle of Hystaspes,” in Man and His Salvation. Studies in Memory of S. G. F. Brandon, ed. E.J. Sharpe and J. R. Hinnells (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1973), 125–148.

<sup>59</sup> See Chiaie, Libro delle parabole, 333–336, and especially P. B. Munoa, Four Powers in Heaven: The Interpretation of Daniel 7 in the Testament of Abraham, JSPSup 28 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998).

around the late first or early second century CE,<sup>60</sup> but the evidence for date and provenance is quite slight.

7. Jesus and the Son of Man

In the New Testament, it is clear that the evangelists identified Jesus as the Son of Man. Some of the passages in question refer to the Second Coming of Jesus, in language that is directly indebted to Daniel. So, for example, Mark 13:26 speaks of “the Son of Man coming in clouds with great power and glory.” Other passages, however, refer to the betrayal and suffering of the Son of Man, in a way that has no precedent in the Jewish texts and clearly refers to the experience of Jesus. For example, Mark 8:31 says that “the Son of Man is to be betrayed into human hands, and they will kill him, and three days after being killed, he will rise again.” A third category of sayings is more general, and refers to present realities, e.g. “the Son of Man has authority to forgive sins on earth” (Mark 2:10 par.).<sup>61</sup>

It is widely believed that many statements found in the gospels originated in the early Christian movement, in light of belief in the resurrection, and were retrojected into the lifetime of Jesus. The Danielic “Son of Man” sayings, such as the one quoted from Mark 13, presuppose that the Son of Man will come from heaven. It is difficult to suppose that anyone would have thought of Jesus as the Son of Man coming from heaven while he was present on earth. Moreover, the sayings about the suffering of the Son of Man are most easily explained as being formulated with hindsight, after Jesus had in fact suffered and died. Consequently, many scholars doubt that any of the “Son of Man” sayings can be attributed to the historical Jesus.<sup>62</sup> And yet the idiom occurs primarily in the synoptic gospels, in

---

<sup>60</sup> E. P. Sanders, “Testament of Abraham,” in The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, ed. Charlesworth, 1.874–876. D. Allison, The Testament of Abraham (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2003) prefers a date in the early second century CE.

<sup>61</sup> This division of the sayings was proposed by R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, trans. K. Grobel (New York: Scribners, 1951), 1:30.

<sup>62</sup> See e.g. P. Vielhauer, “Gottesreich und Menschensohn in der Verkündigung Jesu,” in idem, Aufsätze zum Neuen Testament (Munich: Kaiser, 1965), 55–91, and “Jesus und der Menschensohn: Zur Diskussion mit Heinz Eduard Tödt und Eduard Schweizer,” Aufsätze, 92–140; N. Perrin, A Modern Pilgrimage: Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (New York: Harper & Row, 1967), 154–206.

sayings attributed to Jesus, and is conspicuously absent in the writings of Paul.<sup>63</sup>

A new and influential approach to the problem was proposed by Geza Vermes in 1967.<sup>64</sup> Vermes argued that the Son of Man sayings originated in Jesus' use of a Semitic idiom, "a son of man" or "the son of man," in a generic sense, or specifically as a circumlocution for "I." It is generally recognized that this idiom can be used in an indefinite sense, to mean "a man" or "someone." The novelty of Vermes's proposal lay in the alleged circumlocutional use, to refer to the speaker when a direct statement about himself would have seemed immodest. This thesis was of immediate relevance to a number of Son of Man sayings that have no apparent link to Daniel 7. These include such sayings as "that you may know that the Son of Man has authority to forgive sins on earth" (Mark 2:10 par.), "foxes have holes, and birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man has nowhere to lay his head" (Matt 8:20; Luke 9:58), or "the Son of Man is lord also of the sabbath" (Mark 2:28 par.). In Vermes's view, these non-Danielic sayings were authentic. The use of "son of man" to refer to a heavenly figure was a secondary development.

Vermes's proposal has been widely criticized. Not only is his comparative material late, being drawn from rabbinic and targumic writings,<sup>65</sup> but none of his examples necessarily supports his thesis. Rather, the Aramaic idiom refers to "a human being" in general, and to the speaker only as a particular example of the general rule.<sup>66</sup> The

<sup>63</sup> G. W. E. Nickelsburg, "Son of Man," ABD 6.137–150 claims that Paul reflects knowledge of the Son of Man tradition found in the synoptics, in 1 Thessalonians and 1 Corinthians 15.

<sup>64</sup> G. Vermes, "The Use of בֶּר אִנְשׁ (א) נֶשׂ / בֶּר אִנְשׁ (א) נֶשׂ in Jewish Aramaic," Appendix E in M. Black, An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts, 3rd ed. (Oxford: Clarendon, 1967), 310–330; idem, Jesus the Jew: A Historian's Reading of the Gospels (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973), 160–191.

<sup>65</sup> This point has been emphasized especially by J. A. Fitzmyer, S.J., "The New Testament Title 'Son of Man,' Philologically Considered," in idem, A Wandering Aramean (Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1979), 143–160 (reprinted in The Semitic Background of the New Testament [Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997]); "Another View of the Son of Man Debate," JSNT 4 (1979): 58–65. For a review of the debate, see J. Donahue, "Recent Studies on the Origin of 'Son of Man' in the Gospels," CBQ 48 (1986): 486–490.

<sup>66</sup> See A. Yarbro Collins, "Daniel 7 and the Historical Jesus," in Of Scribes and Scrolls. Studies on the Hebrew Bible, Intertestamental Judaism, and Christian Origins, ed. H. W. Attridge et al. (Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1990), 187–193, esp. 189.

thesis has continued to be influential, however, in modified form. Maurice Casey claims that a statement like Mark 2:10 (“the Son of Man has authority to forgive sins on earth”) has two levels of meaning: one a general statement that healers could forgive sins and the second that Jesus, specifically, could do so.<sup>67</sup> Barnabas Lindars, who also recognized the problem with Vermes’s formulation, took the idiom to mean “a man in my position,” which is, however, a dubious restriction of the reference.<sup>68</sup> In fact, it is doubtful whether any of the gospel sayings can be construed as a statement about humanity in general, with Jesus as a specific instance. There is no parallel for the suggestion that humanity in general has the authority to forgive sins on earth, or that humanity in general is lord of the Sabbath. It may be more satisfactory, then, to explain the use of the expression “Son of Man” in these cases as a specific title for Jesus which is derived secondarily from the Danielic usage.

In view of the strong association of the expression “son of man” with Jesus in the tradition, however, the suspicion that he used the expression remains. Bultmann argued that a few Son of Man sayings that seem to distinguish between Jesus and the Son of Man may be authentic.<sup>69</sup> These included Luke 12:8–9 (“everyone who acknowledges me before men, the Son of Man will also acknowledge before the angels of God”), and Mark 8:38 (“those who are ashamed of me and my words in this adulterous and sinful generation, of them the Son of Man will also be ashamed when he comes in the glory of his Father with the holy angels”). Against this, it has been argued that these sayings presuppose the setting after the death of Jesus, when his followers were called on to confess or deny their faith in him.<sup>70</sup> There are, however, other sayings that do not explicitly identify Jesus with the Son of Man, and which allow for a distinction. These include Matt 24:27 par. (“for as the lightning comes from the east and flashes as far as the west, so will be the coming of the Son of Man”), Matt

---

<sup>67</sup> Casey, Son of Man, 228–229. See also his essay, “Idiom and Translation: Some Aspects of the Son of Man Problem,” NTS 41 (1995): 164–182, which concludes by affirming that Jesus used the idiom as “a normal Aramaic term for ‘man’, in general statements which referred particularly to himself” (182).

<sup>68</sup> Lindars, Jesus, Son of Man, 22–24.

<sup>69</sup> R. Bultmann, The History of the Synoptic Tradition (New York: Harper & Row, 1968), 112, 122, 128, 151–152.

<sup>70</sup> So Vielhauer, “Gottesreich und Menschensohn,” 76–79; “Jesus und der Menschensohn,” 102–107.

24:37–39 (“for as the days of Noah were, so will be the coming of the Son of Man”) and Matt 24:44 par. (“for the Son of Man is coming at an unexpected hour”).<sup>71</sup> Of course, these sayings could also be understood as sayings of the early church, with reference to the coming of Jesus as the Son of Man. Whether in fact Jesus spoke of a coming Son of Man (with whom he might or might not be identified) depends on broader judgments about the nature and purpose of his mission. The prominence of apocalyptic expectation, and specifically of speculation about the Danielic Son of Man, among his earliest followers, is more easily explained if Jesus himself had shared such views. But an overall assessment of the character of Jesus’ message lies far beyond the scope of this essay.

We can, however, draw some conclusions about the availability of ideas about the “Son of Man” in Judaism around the turn of the era. While the old syncretistic “Son of Man” concept has been rightly laid to rest, we have seen that there is good evidence for ongoing speculation about the “one like a son of man” in Daniel’s vision. This speculation went well beyond what was explicit in the biblical text, and the different witnesses to it share some common assumptions. Noteworthy embellishments include the identification of this figure as “messiah,” and his role as judge, especially in the Similitudes of Enoch. The depiction of the Son of Man in the gospels shares with contemporary Jewish texts the expectation of a heavenly savior figure, and also casts him in the role of judge.<sup>72</sup> There is no reason in principle why Jesus should not have shared such expectations, based on the ongoing speculation about Daniel’s vision. Whether or in what sense he did share them is something of which we may never be certain.

---

<sup>71</sup> See Yarbro Collins, “The Origin of the Designation,” 402–403 (= Cosmology and Eschatology, 152). Compare Nickelsburg, “Son of Man,” 149.

<sup>72</sup> The latter point is emphasized by Nickelsburg, “Son of Man,” 149.

JEWISH APOCALYPTIC AND APOCALYPTICISM

CRISPIN FLETCHER-LOUIS

1. Introduction

During the last century most followed A. Schweitzer (and J. Weiss) in thinking that Jesus expected a dramatic divine intervention—the essence of apocalypticism, through the agency of the glorious and heavenly Son of Man, that would bring in the utterly otherworldly Kingdom of God known also from Jewish apocalypses.<sup>1</sup> However, there have always been dissenters and now there are many, especially in North America, who reject the notion that Jesus was an apocalyptic visionary. The dispute depends to a great degree on the understanding of Jewish apocalyptic literature and thought with which individual scholars operate. A survey of the history of study of the Jewish material illuminates the disagreements among Jesus historians and an appreciation of recent advances points towards resolutions of contested issues.

2. The History of the Study of Apocalyptic

The last book in the New Testament canon is called an “apocalypse (ἀποκάλυψις).” This is usually taken not just as a reference to a particular literary genre, but as a statement about the specific content of the book. Whilst the book contains “words of prophecy” (1:3, cf. 22:7, 10, 18–19), rather than ordinary prophecies of events within history, the book reveals the very end of history. Accordingly, most have thought that the word “apocalypse” means a piece of literature with a particular kind of eschatology, an “apocalyptic eschatology,” and that this eschatology is attested in contemporaneous ancient Jewish texts with a visionary form (in particular: 1 Enoch, 2 Enoch, Daniel, 4 Ezra, 2 Baruch, Apocalypse of Abraham).

---

<sup>1</sup> J. Weiss, Jesus' Proclamation of the Kingdom of God (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971 [1892]); A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus, 2nd ed. (London: SCM, 2000 [1906]).

After the initial impetus set by Weiss and Schweitzer it is possible to discern two distinct phases of apocalyptic scholarship. The first phase continues up until the 1970's and is coterminous with the New Quest of the historical Jesus. It is marked by synthetic treatment of the literature, some debate over interpretive issues, but broad consensus on the nature of apocalyptic. During this period there are some differences between the approaches taken in Germany and in the English-speaking world. In Germany, where the Bultmann school is prevalent, there is a tendency towards systematization of apocalypticism as a distinct religious worldview. English scholarship tends to be more descriptive, more sympathetic to the theology of the individual texts and less keen to see in them a sharply distinct religious system.

During this phase an "apocalypse" is seen as a piece of literature that has at its core a particular kind of eschatology—"apocalyptic eschatology"—around which there is a distinctive theology—sometimes called "apocalypticism."<sup>2</sup> In turn, such texts and their theology are thought to emanate from a particular social context: one of crisis. An "apocalyptic eschatology" is set against the prophetic hopes of the Old Testament. "The prophets foretold the future that should arise out of the present, while the apocalypticists foretold the future that should break into the present... The apocalypticists had little faith in the present to beget the future."<sup>3</sup> Israel's prophets have a largely parochial vision: they expect God to act for Israel and against the surrounding nations. Apocalyptic texts, by contrast, reveal a cosmic vision in which all humanity and all of creation is climactically brought under God's hand of judgement. Inspiration for these theological novelties is widely reckoned to come from sources outside the immediate Israelite context, in particular from Persian Zoroastrianism.

---

<sup>2</sup> For the picture that follows see, for example, G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology (Edinburgh: Oliver and Boyd, 1962), 2.301–306; M. Rist, "Apocalypticism," in The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, ed. G. A. Buttrick (New York: Abingdon Press, 1962), 157–161; P. Vielhauer, "Apocalypses and Related Subjects: Introduction," in New Testament Apocrypha, ed. E. Hennecke and W. Schneemelcher (Louisville, KY: Westminster, 1965), 581–600, esp. 587–600; James D. G. Dunn, Unity and Diversity in the New Testament (London: SCM, 1977), 309–316.

<sup>3</sup> H. H. Rowley, The Relevance of Apocalyptic: A Study of Jewish and Christian Apocalypses from Daniel to the Revelation (London: Lutterworth Press, 1947), 38.

In this first phase there is also general agreement (even if only implicit) that these immediate characteristics reflect a more fundamental worldview trait, viz. dualism.<sup>4</sup> At the one extreme, in the account, for example, of Bultmann's pupil Philip Vielhauer, the role of dualism is effectively thoroughgoing in the description of apocalypticism's conceptual structure.<sup>5</sup> First, there is what might be called an ontological dualism: a sharp divide between God and man; between creation and the being and action of God. This divide tends to be antagonistic, with human nature being viewed more pessimistically than the biblical writers envisage; so much so that human society and politics are no longer the arena for God's action. This pessimism reflects the experience of crisis, in which the righteous find themselves persecuted by a far stronger political and religious power; in these circumstances there is a loss of confidence in the human ability to bring about the prophetic future. Then there is a temporal (or "eschatological") dualism: the present age is radically different from the future one when there will be a new heaven and a new earth, in which space and time are transformed. The normal, historical experience of temporality and spatial limitation—of social institutions and politics—will be utterly transcended: a new Jerusalem from heaven will appear, the enemies of God's people will suddenly be annihilated, and the dead in their graves will rise to new life (or eternal damnation). The transition from the present to the new age will be marked by upheavals and trials, but God will intervene decisively and imminently. The difference between this age and the age to come is a consequence of a cosmic dualism: whilst the age to come will be ruled by the good and loving God, there are opposing forces almost equal in power (the devil, Satan, Belial, Mastema, and their minions) who rule the present irredeemably evil age. These demonic forces exacerbate the sense of ontological dualism according to which the righteous are trapped in a world of corruption, unable to live in the freedom that God would have for them. Lastly, the ideational map of apocalypticism is complicated by one more dualism: a soteriological dualism between the “elect” who, though currently oppressed, will be vindicated in the age to come, and “the damned” who at the judgement will be set aside for destruction.<sup>6</sup> An apocalypse is intended to encourage this righteous group; to give them comfort in the sure knowledge that God will intervene and to exhort them to remain faithful to their God-given ethic.

---

<sup>4</sup> The literature of this period does not use the word "dualism" in so systematic a fashion as I do here. I have adopted this approach bearing in mind several recent discussions (N. T. Wright, The New Testament and the People of God [London: SPCK, 1992], 252–256, 297–299; G. W. E. Nickelsburg, 1 Enoch 1: A Commentary on the Book of 1 Enoch Chapters 1–36, 81–108 [Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress, 2001], 40–41).

<sup>5</sup> Vielhauer, "Apocalypses."

For the dualistically thoroughgoing account of apocalyptic, the peculiar character of apocalypticism is appreciated when it is compared to biblical religion: it is something quite different. So much so that it may be right to think of the apocalypticist’s “god” as quite different to the one of biblical Israel. Whereas the Pentateuch envisages “salvation” through Torah and Temple piety, apocalypticism is either disinterested in Torah and Temple piety or, more strongly, it opposes it. The prophets promise God’s action within history, where he, not Satan, is in control: the prophets’ fulfilment of the divine promise comes through historical events. Apocalypticism expects imminent salvation through the in-breaking of an otherworldly Kingdom of God that bypasses existing institutions. Where the spokesperson for Torah is Moses, instead the apocalyptic seers—Daniel and Enoch, for example—supersede Moses and the prophets through visionary authority. In the Bible—especially the theology of the Deuteronomist—history is determined as much by human responsibility as it is by divine action. By contrast, for apocalyptic everything is pre-determined by God: history has a well-defined timetable (four, seven, ten or twelve parts; weeks of years or jubilees). For prophecy the perspective is national: even where oracles are directed against the wider nations, Israel’s fate stands centre stage. For apocalypticism, on the other hand, there is a movement away from a narrowly national perspective. The vision of the future is universal and cosmic in scope: all of creation is to be wound up and if there is a future life it is one that has left the earthly Jerusalem and its geographical environs far behind. At the same time, “just as the fate of all mankind is drawn into the apocalyptic drama, so man no longer stands as a member of the sacred Jewish race, or of the heathen nations, but as an individual before God.”<sup>7</sup>

---

<sup>6</sup> O. Plöger, Theocracy and Eschatology (Oxford: Blackwell, 1968 [1959]) is particularly influential in this regard.

<sup>7</sup> Vielhauer, “Apocalypses,” 590. For this distinction see R. K. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament (London: SCM, 1952 [1948]), 4–5.

Within this dualistic conceptual framework apocalyptic is thought to have a distinctive “messianism.” Whilst the royal messiah of older, prophetic texts is the saviour of Israel (the nation), the apocalypses give their redeemer a universal mission. Whereas the non-apocalyptic messiah is an earthly, thoroughly human figure—a warrior perhaps—the apocalyptic redeemer is transcendent: he is pre-existent, descends from heaven in angelic glory and brings salvation through purely supernatural means. Over against Israel’s king there stands the transcendent Son of Man of Dan 7:13, of the Similitudes of Enoch (1 Enoch 37–71), and of 4 Ezra (ch. 13).

By setting their theology so firmly against that of biblical religion the apocalypticists found themselves at the margins of Jewish society. Indeed, their crisis mentality, along with their hope for an imminent divine judgement, has been seen as the product of an oppressed and sectarian sociology. Because the authors of the apocalypses are unable to cope with the real world, they imagine a future bliss described through (to us) bizarre and fantastical imagery. They see hidden forces—angels and demons—controlling the drama of history from another stage—the heavenly world above, parallel to, but clearly distinct from, the earthly world below.

According to this view apocalypticism is essentially an intellectual reality, a system of thought, the pre-eminent feature of which is a world-ending eschatology as a consequence of dramatic divine intervention. If this apocalyptic theology is the product of a particular experience, it is a social psychology; the crisis (real or imagined) of the sect or the oppressed movement.<sup>8</sup> This movement produces particular texts—apocalypses—whose features are generically inseparable from their Sitz im Leben.<sup>9</sup> More precisely, that life setting has sometimes been viewed as the world of eschatologically enthusiastic circles opposed to, and oppressed by, the cultic and legal theology of the Jerusalem priesthood.<sup>10</sup>

---

<sup>8</sup> See Plöger, Theocracy; M. Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism, 2 vols. (London: SCM, 1974 [1969]), 1:194–196.

<sup>9</sup> See e.g. D. S. Russell, The Method and Message of Jewish Apocalyptic, 200 BC–AD 100, OTL (London: SCM, 1964), 104–139; K. Koch, The Rediscovery of Apocalyptic (London: SCM, 1972), 28–33.

<sup>10</sup> See especially Plöger, Theocracy; Vielhauer, “Apocalypses,” 598 and P. D. Hanson, The Dawn of Apocalyptic: The Historical and Sociological Roots of Jewish Apocalyptic Eschatology (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979 [1975]). On this reading, apocalyptic literature anticipates a Protestant critique of Catholic institutionalism.

Apocalypses, of course, purport to be genuine visionary experiences. But if the centre of apocalypticism is an intellectual belief in a particular kind of eschatology, then a text that lacks the visionary form but which contains that eschatology should be judged a principal witness to the phenomenon. This means, for example, that Isaiah 24–27, Testament of Moses (esp. ch. 10), parts of the Jewish Sibylline Oracles and the Qumran War Scroll are often covered by the definition, and various post-exilic prophetic texts are mined in the search for “proto-apocalyptic” (Isa 56–66, Joel, Malachi, Zech 9–14). By the same token, New Testament scholars spoke of Mark 13 as “the little apocalypse” even though its prophecy is not mediated through a vision or its content explained by an angel, as in the canonical Apocalypse. There is little real interest in what role actual religious experiences might have in the creation of an “apocalypse” or in the formation of apocalyptic thought.<sup>11</sup> Of course, it is hard to know whether in any given instance an apocalypse is actually a record of some individual’s “genuine” religious experience. The fact that so many of the apocalypses are pseudonymous counts against that possibility and pseudonymity can be explained as an artifice to gain authority for what is, in fact, a mixture of traditional literary material and the author’s own new ideas.<sup>12</sup>

During the first phase much British scholarship differs in several respects from that in Germany.<sup>13</sup> British scholars incline to think that apocalyptic is a child of biblical prophecy, whilst minimizing its debt to foreign religious influence. They play down the extent to which apocalyptic thought is dualistic and pessimistic: although God is expected to act decisively from without history, human agency within history remains important. Apocalyptic is committed to political activity, and, if necessary, to violent protest and, invariably, to the thoroughly this-worldly hope for national Israel and Jerusalem.<sup>14</sup> Apocalyptic theology is, furthermore, entirely compatible with Torah piety.<sup>15</sup> In

<sup>11</sup> D. S. Russell, Divine Disclosure: An Introduction to Jewish Apocalyptic (London: SCM, 1992) is an exception here.

<sup>12</sup> See e.g. Rist, “Apocalypticism,” 158.

<sup>13</sup> See further T. F. Glasson, “Schweitzer’s Influence: Blessing or Bane?” JTS 28 (1977): 289–302.

<sup>14</sup> This point emerges particularly strongly in the work of G. B. Caird (e.g. his The Language and Imagery of the Bible [London: Duckworth, 1980], 260–266).

<sup>15</sup> See esp. W. D. Davies, “Apocalyptic and Pharisaism,” in Christian Origins and Judaism (London: SPCK, 1962 [1948]), 19–30.

this scholarly tradition then, there is no thoroughgoing systematization of apocalyptic thought around a “dualistic” core. And there is a reluctance to see apocalyptic arising from a particular movement and social context.

One consequence of the British reluctance to see thoroughgoing dualism in apocalyptic literature is a particular stance on the Son of Man problem. The man figure in Dan 7:13 is not an individual heavenly being—an angel.<sup>16</sup> Since the work of H. Gunkel an angelic “one like a son of man” thesis has been nurtured by the belief that in Daniel 7 there is the influence of an ancient Near East mythological complex surrounding a divine warrior and his battle with chaos.<sup>17</sup> In older British scholarship there is an instinctive aversion—partly for theological reasons—to the claim that this mythology has influenced a text such as Daniel, which appears in all other respects ardently orthodox in its defence of the Jewish faith.

In this British tradition the Danielic man figure is simply a symbol of the people of God: just as the beasts from the sea symbolize kings (7:17) or kingdoms (7:23), the man figure symbolizes the saints of the Most High (7:18, 25, 27) and his coming to God means their vindication over their bestial persecutors. This symbolic interpretation makes sense where the existence of another, transcendent world above the earthly one is played down. For a thoroughgoing dualistic view of apocalypticism, on the other hand, it is natural to think there really is an angelic “one like a son of man” who receives divine sovereignty in the heavenly realm above; on behalf of the righteous on the earth below.

2.1. The Second Phase in the Study of Jewish Apocalyptic

In the 1970's a new chapter opened in the study of Jewish apocalyptic.<sup>18</sup> At this time, primary texts from among the Dead Sea Scrolls provide fresh material and new editions and tools for the study of the pseudepigrapha are produced, which facilitate a vigorous new study of the subject. It is now realized that there are fundamental unresolved problems and these are addressed with new vigour.<sup>19</sup> This new chapter coincides with the beginnings of the Third Quest of the historical Jesus and it shares its concern for a more accurate and dispassionate understanding of the ancient Jewish world.

<sup>16</sup> See, for example, Russell, Method, 324–352; T. W. Manson, “The Son of Man in Daniel, Enoch and the Gospels,” BJRL 32 (1950): 171–93.

<sup>17</sup> H. Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1895), 323–335.

<sup>18</sup> The provocative book by Klaus Koch, Ratlos vor der Apokalypik (Gütersloh: Mohn, 1970) (Eng. trans.: The Rediscovery of Apocalyptic), was a significant catalyst for change.

The problems that surface in the 1970's are principally three. First, the subject is, until this time, beset by terminological confusion. On the one hand, "apocalypse" is being used to define a literary work of a particular type. On the other hand, the word "apocalyptic" is being used as both an adjective and a noun and, along with the word "apocalypticism," it is being simultaneously used to describe something more than a literary genre: a theology, worldview or sociology.<sup>20</sup>

Secondly, it is realized that there is a mismatch between the texts—"apocalypses"—and the theology they are supposed to represent—a transcendent eschatology and its associated dualisms.<sup>21</sup> Those texts which exhibit the long-accepted generic features of an apocalypse (vision, angelic mediation and so forth) have other interests besides a transcendent eschatology: astronomy, calendrical measurement, meteorology, cosmic geography, the periodization of history, the throne of God and its angelic entourage; matters of a mystical and speculative kind. Such concerns were ignored or dismissed in older scholarship.<sup>22</sup> Also, the expectation of a transcendent climax to history—the "apocalyptic eschatology" regularly treated as the heart of "apocalypticism"—is by no means confined to those texts which share the generic features of an "apocalypse": it may be identified in parts of the Sibylline Oracles, the Testament of Moses and, perhaps, some Qumran texts. But none of these are generically apocalypses.

---

<sup>19</sup> For conferences and working parties see J. J. Collins, ed., Apocalypse: The Morphology of a Genre, Semeia 14 (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1979) D. Hellholm, ed., Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World and the Near East: Proceedings of the International Colloquium on Apocalypticism, Uppsala, August 12–17, 1979 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1983) and J. J. Collins and J. H. Charlesworth, eds., Mysteries and Revelations: Apocalyptic Studies since the Uppsala Colloquium, JSPSup (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1991).

<sup>20</sup> The problem is identified by Koch, Rediscovery, 18–35, see also J. Barr, "Jewish Apocalyptic in Recent Scholarly Study," BJRL 58 (1975–76): 9–35, at 15–19.

<sup>21</sup> See M. E. Stone, "Lists of Revealed Things in Apocalyptic Literature," in Magnalia Dei: The Mighty Acts of God. Essays on the Bible and Archeology in Memory of G. Ernest Wright, ed. F. M. Cross, W. Lemke and P. D. Miller (New York: Doubleday, 1976), 414–452, esp. 439–441, and C. Rowland, The Open Heaven: A Study of Apocalyptic in Judaism and Early Christianity (New York: Crossroad, 1982), 23–48.

<sup>22</sup> For dismissal see, e.g., Vielhauer, "Apocalypses," 587.

The third problem arises out of the first two. Whilst the “apocalypses” contain much else besides the transcendent eschatology that is supposed to define apocalypticism, some appear to be practically devoid of a transcendent eschatology. This, Michael E. Stone pointed out, is the case for the first and third parts of 1 Enoch—the Book of Watchers (chs. 1–36) and the Astronomical Book (chs. 72–82), most of 2 and 3 Baruch and the Apocalypse of Abraham. The problems posed by this Enochic material are felt acutely at this time because, by now, Enochic material has gained a more prominent position in the study of pre-Christian apocalyptic than once it had had. Before the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls Daniel was regularly reckoned to be the earliest apocalyptic text and as such the benchmark for the form and content of a Jewish apocalypse. With J. T. Milik’s publication of fragments of Aramaic copies of 1 Enoch it became clear that the earliest portions of that apocalyptic text antedated Daniel.<sup>23</sup> Whilst it had, until this time, been assumed that the apocalyptic thought world was well represented by the eschatological concerns of Daniel and Revelation, it now emerges that an “apocalypse” is as often as not preoccupied with the revelation of secrets that need have nothing to do with the end of history. In short, ancient Jewish apocalypses are as concerned with the vertical axis—revelation of that which is above (and below)—as they are with the horizontal axis—the revelation of the future (and the past).

How have these problems been addressed? There have been, broadly speaking, two responses: one under the auspices of the (North American based) Society of Biblical Literature has been proposed by a group with John J. Collins at their head, and the other in Britain has been the work of Christopher Rowland. The former can be seen, to some extent, as a continuation of the German tradition that finds a distinct conceptual system in ancient pre-Christian Judaism. The latter takes seriously the history of religions material in the apocalypses that English scholarship had tended to marginalize, but nevertheless resists the inclination to find in them a thoroughly dualistic theology.

The group led by John Collins worked throughout the 1970’s for a clear definition of matters apocalyptic. They took several decisive methodological steps. First, they made a three-fold division between a literary genre—"apocalypse," "apocalyptic eschatology"—the particular, transcendent eschatology of the apocalypses, and "apocalypticism"—the worldview born of the particular social context of the apocalypses "in which supernatural revelation, the heavenly world, and eschatological judgment played essential parts."<sup>24</sup> And the Semeia volume provided a working definition of the genre apocalypse which has been widely accepted in subsequent study: an "apocalypse" is a genre of revelatory literature with a narrative framework, in which a revelation is mediated by an otherworldly being to a human recipient, disclosing a transcendent reality which is both temporal, insofar as it envisages eschatological salvation, and spatial insofar as it involves another, supernatural world.<sup>25</sup>

---

<sup>23</sup> J. T. Milik, The Books of Enoch (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1976), 6–7, cf. 26–31.

This definition attempts to identify the generic features that are "constitutive of all apocalypses," that "indicates the common core of the genre."<sup>26</sup> As such, it is now widely adopted, particularly in North America. It has obvious strengths. It is flexible: in its inclusion of both a vertical axis of revelation—"spatial in so far as it involves another, supernatural world"—alongside the traditional horizontal axis—"disclosing a transcendent reality which is... temporal, in so far as it envisages eschatological salvation"—it tries to embrace the cosmological and speculative (or "mystical") material to which Stone drew attention. It also drops any insistence on an imminent eschatological end, which is lacking in some of the primary texts. The implementation of this definition has also advanced the study of Jewish apocalyptic in several respects. There is now greater attention to the specific character of individual texts that tended to be lacking in earlier synthetic or thematically descriptive treatments.

However, there are features of the Collins-Semeia paradigm that remain highly problematic. In the first place, it can be objected that it does not satisfactorily address the problems of the mismatch between apocalyptic form and content. The definition demands that an apocalypse be concerned with a transcendent eschatology. However, there remain swathes of revelatory material in the apocalypses which have

---

<sup>24</sup> Collins' gloss (The Apocalyptic Imagination. An Introduction to Jewish Apocalyptic Literature, 2nd rev. ed. [Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998], 13) on the original Semeia segmentation (Collins, ed., Morphology, 3-4).

<sup>25</sup> J. J. Collins, "Introduction: Towards the Morphology of a Genre," in Apocalypse: The Morphology of a Genre, ed. Collins, 1-20, at 9.

<sup>26</sup> Collins, "Introduction," 5.

nothing to do with eschatology, nor an obviously “transcendent” kind of eschatology. This suggests that a “transcendent eschatology” is really only incidental to the genre and need not be present in every case.<sup>27</sup> The problem is acute in the case of Jubilees which is presented as a revelation to Moses by an Angel of the Presence. In Jubilees’ fifty chapters there are only two eschatological passages and only one of these—chapter 23—is labelled an apocalypse on the Collins definition.<sup>28</sup> Only a fraction of the material in the Book of Watchers and the Astronomical Book is eschatological (1.3–9 and parts of chs. 22, 25–26) and nothing points beyond the completion, blessing and perfection of this present world.<sup>29</sup>

This lack of correspondence between apocalyptic form and content is also a problem in the Testament of Levi. Testament of Levi 2–8 contains a succession of visionary passages which are formally apocalypses bound together by a narrative context. However, Collins only allows chs. 2–5 a place in the list of Jewish apocalypses. Although Levi sees in ch. 8 “another vision” like the one he had in chs. 2–5, since it contains nothing overtly eschatological it cannot be an apocalypse.<sup>30</sup> But, on close examination, the material in chs. 2–5 does not obviously contain a transcendent eschatology either. Of the two passages where Collins finds such thinking one is certainly Christian

---

<sup>27</sup> The definition excludes an appreciation of characteristically apocalyptic material in Zechariah 1–8 (for which see H. Gese, “Anfang und Ende der Apokalyptik dargestellt am Sacharjabuch,” ZThK [1973]: 20–49).

<sup>28</sup> J. J. Collins, “The Jewish Apocalypses,” in Apocalypse: The Morphology of a Genre, ed. Collins, 21–59, at 32–33. Collins has since changed his mind and allows Jubilees to be categorized as an example of a mixed genre (J. J. Collins, “Genre, Ideology and Social Movements in Jewish Apocalypticism,” in Mysteries and Revelations: Apocalyptic Studies since the Uppsala Colloquium, ed. J. J. Collins and J. H. Charlesworth [Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1991]: 1–32, esp. 14; Collins, Apocalyptic Imagination, 79–84). It is not entirely certain that Jub, 23:31 looks forward to life after death (see Rowland, Open Heaven, 167).

<sup>29</sup> It is not clear whether 10:17–11:2 looks forward to the time after the flood or another, future, eschatological state (see Rowland, Open Heaven, 161). There is a final judgement for the dead in ch. 22, but only the faintest hint of resurrection (in v. 13). Here and in other texts, the definition maintains the line that the apocalypses are essentially eschatological in character by allowing a looser definition of “transcendent eschatology” than would have been expected in earlier studies. For Collins it is not, in fact, the expectation of a new cosmos which need define the eschatology of the apocalypses; the belief, exemplified by Dan 12:1–3, that there is to be judgement at death and an afterlife can also indicate the presence of a transcendent eschatology. See J. J. Collins, “Apocalyptic Eschatology as the Transcendence of Death,” CBQ 36 (1974): 21–43; Collins, Apocalyptic Imagination, 6.

<sup>30</sup> Collins, “Jewish Apocalypses,” 40–41.

(4.1), and the other is missing in some manuscripts, does not have a particularly “transcendent” eschatology, and may well be Christian anyway (3.3).<sup>31</sup>

One more text—Joseph and Aseneth—deserves consideration since it reinforces the point that the Collins-Semeia definition does not deal adequately with the mismatch between the genre “apocalypse” and so-called “apocalypticism.” Whilst it has recently been argued that this is a Christian text,<sup>32</sup> the traditional view that it is a pre-Christian Jewish work remains the more likely.<sup>33</sup> And although this work, especially its first part (chs. 1–22), is rightly compared with Hellenistic Romances, it has all the defining features of an apocalypse; except, that is, a futurist transcendent eschatology. It presents a revelation to Aseneth in a narrative framework—the account of her encounter with Joseph, her conversion, courtship and marriage to the Jewish paragon. The revelation is mediated by an otherworldly being—the angel who appears to her, guides her through her conversion and interprets for her the allegory of the honeycomb (chs. 14–17). And the angel reveals to Aseneth a transcendent reality; the world of Jewish piety, “mystically” conceived, in which the life of paradise, an angelomorphic existence and immortality belong to all the faithful.<sup>34</sup>

There is a pointed irony in the failure to categorize this text as an apocalypse. The search for the genre apocalypse takes its starting point from the use of ἀποκάλυψις in Rev 1:1. No one would disagree

---

<sup>31</sup> 4.1 refers to Jesus’ Harrowing of Hell (cf. Matt 27:51–53; 1 Pet 3:19 and for later Christian references see H. W. Hollander and M. de Jonge, The Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs: A Commentary, SVTP 8 [Leiden: Brill, 1985], 139–140) and echoes Matt 27:45–54; Rev 9:20 and 16:8. In some mss—but not all—3.3 refers to “hosts of armies ordained for the day of judgement against the spirits of error and of Belial” in the second heaven. The problems here are not recognized by Collins and they contradict his claim (Collins, Apocalyptic Imagination, 138) that “there is little evidence of Christian influence in these chapters.”

<sup>32</sup> By R. Kraemer, When Aseneth Met Joseph: A Late Antique Tale of the Biblical Patriarch and His Egyptian Wife, Reconsidered (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998).

<sup>33</sup> See now G. J. Brooke, “Men and Women as Angels in Joseph and Aseneth Tradition,” JSP 14 (2005): 159–177.

<sup>34</sup> For apocalyptic material in Joseph and Aseneth see H. C. Kee, “The Socio-Cultural Setting of Joseph and Aseneth,” NTS 29 (1983): 394–413, at 406–408; E. M. Humphrey, *The Ladies and the Cities: Transformation and Apocalyptic Identity in Joseph and Aseneth, 4Ezra, and the Apocalypse and the Shepherd of Hermas*, JSPSup 17 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995), 35–56; G. Bohak, Joseph and Aseneth and the Jewish Temple in Heliopolis, Early Judaism and Its Literature 10 (Atlanta: Scholars, 1996), 17; E. M. Humphrey, Joseph and Aseneth (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), 41.

that the author of Rev 1:1 must be thinking his book is to be shelved along with others such as 1 Enoch, Daniel, Jubilees (or an excerpt thereof), 2 Enoch and 4 Ezra. But, apart perhaps from one Greek translation of Daniel,<sup>35</sup> the words ἀποκάλυψις, ἀποκαλύπτω or foreign cognates, are not used to designate the peculiar revelatory content of such works before the word appears in Rev 1:1 itself. But this language is used in Joseph and Aseneth. In 16.14 the angel interprets Aseneth's experience with the words: "the unspeakable mysteries of the Most High have been revealed to you (ἀπεκαλύφθη σοι τὰ ἀπόρητα μυστήρια τοῦ ὑψίστου)", a statement couched in terms used elsewhere of apocalyptic disclosure.<sup>36</sup>

So, generically, there is a good case for thinking that Joseph and Aseneth is the kind of text with which the author of Revelation wants his work to be compared. The fact that the Collins-Semeia genre definition restrains the possibility of such a comparison takes us to one of its most problematic aspects. At first it might seem that the definition treats genre—apocalypse—and apocalyptic eschatology, along with apocalypticism, as quite discrete entities. But this is not so. The typology is explicitly designed to identify texts that have both the form of an apocalypse and the content that is indicative of a transcendent eschatology.<sup>37</sup> Collins agrees that a strictly generic study could include "apocalypses" (revelations of heavenly mysteries) that do not attest an apocalyptic eschatology, but he rejects the value of such an exercise.<sup>38</sup> Why? He does not explain this judgement in detail, but some indications are given at various points in his writings.<sup>39</sup> First, he starts with an unquestioned interpretative judgement that in Rev 1:1 the

<sup>35</sup> Theodotion uses the verb ἀποκαλύπτω at Dan 2:19, 22, 28, 29, 30, 47; 10:1; 11:35.

<sup>36</sup> For the "unspeakable mysteries of the Most High" cf. T. Levi 2.10; 3 Apoc. Bar. 1.6, 8; 2.6 and compare Mark 4.11; 2 Cor 12:4. In 22.13 it is the priestly Levi who, we are told, "used to see letters written in the heavens, and he would read them and he would reveal (ἀποκαλύπτειν) them to Aseneth privately."

<sup>37</sup> As Collins explains in "Genre, Ideology and Social Movements," 15.

<sup>38</sup> Collins, "Jewish Apocalypses," 27: "The common features of these writings in both manner of revelation and content [sic] justify their classification in the one genre 'apocalypse.'" See especially his comments in Collins, "Genre, Ideology and Social Movements," 15: "The analysis of the genre in Semeia 14, which was based on content as well as form, argued that there is indeed a common content, which is broadly constitutive of a worldview, which was both distinctive and significant in late antiquity."

<sup>39</sup> In "Genre, Ideology and Social Movements," 15, Collins implies that such an openness would necessarily mean calling all the visions in the Hebrew Bible "apocalypses." It need not. On grounds other than eschatological content it might be author uses the word ἀποκάλυψις to define both form and content: “the term ‘apocalypse’ is...commonly used in a...restricted sense, derived from the opening verse of the book of Revelation...to refer to ‘literary compositions which resemble the book of Revelation, i.e., secret divine disclosures about the end of the world and the heavenly state’.”<sup>40</sup> If that is what Rev 1:1 means then the search for similar such texts is entirely reasonable. However, it is far from certain that this is how the author of Rev 1:1 intends the word ἀποκάλυψις. The use of this word might simply mean that the author wants his work to be classified as the record of a particular kind of revelatory experience (a visionary or angelophanic experience, for example). The fact that the book pertains, in part, to “eschatological” matters might be incidental to its generic classification. And, indeed, that Revelation has to do with future history and its climax might well be the reason why its author felt the need to add in 1:3 the further identification of its contents as a “prophecy.”

Secondly, the expression “commonly used” in the sentence just cited points to a flaw in the method. Later on in his introductory essay to Semeia 14, Collins says “the strategy employed in this volume has been to begin by examining all the writings which are either called apocalypses or are referred to as apocalyptic by modern authors [sic].”<sup>41</sup> Again, in a recent defence of the method, Collins says “the procedure was simply to line up all the texts that were commonly regarded [sic] as apocalyptic, and see what they had in common and where they differed.”<sup>42</sup> This means the method falls short of historiographic objectivity and it is unhelpfully circular. The starting point for a robustly historical search for an ancient genre should be the conventions, expectations and intentions of ancient authors, not the twentieth-century judgements of modern scholars who may, in fact, inhabit an entirely different worldview and be guilty of their own back-projections onto the ancient texts. The properly historical questions are, then, “What did Rev 1:1 mean by the word ἀποκάλυψις?” and “Which other texts would his (intended) readers have thought of decided that the visions of Joseph, Isaiah, Ezekiel and others are generically different from those in later “apocalypses.”

---

<sup>40</sup> Collins, “Introduction,” 2. Collins is citing Koch, Rediscovery, 18.

<sup>41</sup> Collins, “Introduction,” 4–5.

<sup>42</sup> Collins, “Proposals of Lester Grabbe,” 45.

when categorizing the book as a distinct type of literature?" The Semeia method is unhelpfully circular because by starting with a working definition of "apocalypse" which is essentially eschatological, material that is not eschatological is excluded from the survey and so inevitably the result is no more than a refined definition that is essentially eschatological.<sup>43</sup> Semeia 14 does not provide a definition of a genre, but a putative sub-type of a genre, a sub-type with a particular eschatological content. But was anyone in the ancient world really conscious of such a subtype? Or, by analyzing the generic features of texts that are "commonly regarded" as apocalyptic, is the exercise anything more than a study of a modern construct, refracted through the artificial lens of arbitrarily chosen ancient texts?

Unlike older presentations of matters apocalyptic, in the Semeia volume and in his subsequent full-length treatments of the "Apocalyptic Imagination" Collins does not lay out a fully developed, synthetic or systematic view of apocalypticism. His studies are focused on individual texts and their discrete character. Discussions of "apocalyptic eschatology" and "apocalypticism" are terse; the discussion of the genre far fuller. As in the Third Quest, theological concerns—that were so prominent in the pre-1970's phase of the study of Jewish apocalypticism and in the New Quest—have receded into the background. But this does not mean they are not there.

Collins and others who work with his definition in the field of Jewish studies remain attached to the view that apocalypticism is a dualistic worldview, distinct from Israel's older (prophetic) religion.<sup>44</sup>

---

<sup>43</sup> Lester Grabbe ("Introduction and Overview," in Knowing the End from the Beginning: The Prophetic, the Apocalyptic and their Relationships, ed. L. L. Grabbe and R. D. Haak [London: T&T Clark, 2003], 2–43, esp. 22) also points to the circularity of the Collins method.

<sup>44</sup> See e.g. J. J. Collins, "The Place of Apocalypticism in the Religion of Israel," in Ancient Israelite Religion: Essays in Honor of Frank Moore Cross, ed. P. D. Miller, P. D. Hanson and D. S. McBride (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987), 539–558; J. J. Collins, "From Prophecy to Apocalypticism: The Expectation of the End," in The Encyclopedia of Apocalypticism, 1: The Origins of Apocalypticism in Judaism and Christianity, ed. J. J. Collins (New York: Continuum, 2000), 129–161, at 147; G. W. E. Nickelsburg, "The Apocalyptic Construction of Reality in 1 Enoch," in Mysteries and Revelations: Apocalyptic Studies since the Uppsala Colloquium, ed. Collins and Charlesworth, 51–64. And see the recent criticisms of Nickelsburg's view of 1 Enoch in K. Koch, "Response to 'The Apocalyptic Construction of Reality in 1 Enoch,'" in George W. E. Nickelsburg in Perspective: An Ongoing Dialogue of Learning, ed. J. Neusner and A. J. Avery-Peck (Leiden: Brill, 2003), 44–59.

The picture is nuanced, sometimes softened, with recognition of the variety of perspectives within the primary sources, but the contours are the same. The apocalypses have an interventionist eschatology: they expect “the world to be changed by divine action rather than by human action.”<sup>45</sup> This, of course, means that typically their political stance is quietist: Daniel for example has a clearly different stance on political action to that of the Maccabees and the literature that celebrates them.<sup>46</sup> The apocalypses look not for the national, political and this-worldly future of earlier prophecy, but for a thoroughly transcendent and universal reality.<sup>47</sup> Between the present time and the time to come there will be a sharp division: the apocalypses entail a temporal dualism.<sup>48</sup> The mythological language of an otherworldly realm is taken at dualistic face value: heaven and earth are immiscible realms, and there is the ontological dualism of an “absolute distinction between divine beings and humans.”<sup>49</sup> Before the eschaton, the earth is beset by a cosmic dualism in which the earth is overwhelmed and corrupted by malevolent demons.<sup>50</sup> The social context of the apocalypses tends to be sectarian, even where the group in question cannot be securely identified.

Even though the extant Jewish apocalypses written after the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE are enthusiastic proponents of Torah piety, in 4 Ezra “the wisdom of the wise consists not in their knowledge of the Mosaic law but in the apocalyptic wisdom that comes from additional revelation.”<sup>51</sup> The early Enochic tradition is rather disinterested in Torah and Temple. To the extent that Temple language is used in

---

<sup>45</sup> J. J. Collins, “Temporality and Politics in Jewish Apocalyptic Literature,” in Apocalyptic in History and Tradition, ed. C. Rowland and J. Barton (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002), 26–43, at 37–38.

<sup>46</sup> E.g. J. J. Collins, “Daniel and His Social World,” in Interpreting the Prophets, ed. J. L. Mays and P. J. Achtemeier (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985), 249–260. Collins recognizes a partial exception here in parts of the early Enochic tradition (“Temporality,” 38).

<sup>47</sup> J. J. Collins, “The Eschatology of Zechariah,” in Knowing the End from the Beginning: The Prophetic, the Apocalyptic and their Relationships, ed. Grabbe and Haak, 74–84; Collins, “Proposals of Lester Grabbe,” 47–50.

<sup>48</sup> See, e.g., Nickelsburg, 1 Enoch, 40 on the apocalypticism of 1 Enoch.

<sup>49</sup> Ibid., 40.

<sup>50</sup> Ibid., 40; G. Boccaccini, Beyond the Essene Hypothesis: The Partings of the Ways between Qumran and Enochic Judaism (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998), 12–13.

<sup>51</sup> Collins, Apocalyptic Imagination, 210.

Enoch's heavenly ascent (1 Enoch 14) and in the account of the fallen watchers the point is to criticize the existing Jerusalem Temple and to offer alternative access to the divine throne by means of mystical ascent.<sup>52</sup> George W. E. Nickelsburg and David W. Sutter go further: the Book of Watchers is as a sectarian polemic against the Jerusalem priesthood, whose dissolute and irresponsible behaviour is reflected in the portrayal of the fallen watchers.<sup>53</sup> The Enochic tradition offers an alternative form of piety and salvation to that provided through the laws of Moses.<sup>54</sup> Although Daniel espouses a certain Torah piety (see 1:8–16), “Daniel and his friends are not primarily teachers who study the Torah.”<sup>55</sup> Daniel's view that the Temple of the sixth-century restoration did not fulfil exilic prophecies of restoration (ch. 9) means he is unlikely to have been close to the contemporary Jerusalem establishment.<sup>56</sup>

The weight given to the conceptual realities that Collins calls a “transcendent eschatology” and “apocalypticism” is evident in the way he sets out his studies. The scope of discussion embraces texts which though not formally apocalypses (lacking as they are in a visionary mode and an otherworldly mediator) do have a transcendent eschatology. This is the way the older textbooks proceeded before there was an attempt to carefully demarcate a genre “apocalypse.” These “related” texts belong in the discussion because it is really a theology that defines the subject.<sup>57</sup> Indeed, already in discussion of the genre in Semeia 14, Collins found an integral conceptual connection between the genre—with its disclosure of a “transcendent reality”—and content—“transcendent eschatology.” There he postulates an inner coherence between the “manner” of revelation of a

---

<sup>52</sup> Collins, Apocalyptic Imagination, 54.

<sup>53</sup> G. W. E. Nickelsburg, “Enoch, Levi, and Peter: Recipients of Revelation in Upper Galilee,” JBL 100 (1981): 575–600; D. Suter, “Fallen Angel, Fallen Priest: The Problem of Family Purity in 1 Enoch,” HUCA 50 (1979): 115–135.

<sup>54</sup> Nickelsburg, 1 Enoch, 50–56; Collins, Apocalyptic Imagination, 48–49; J. J. Collins, “Theology and Identity in the Early Enoch Literature,” Henoch 24 (2002): 57–62. Collins and Nickelsburg agree in rejecting E. P. Sanders' view that 1 Enoch is a representative of “covenantal nomism.”

<sup>55</sup> Collins, “Daniel,” 252.

<sup>56</sup> Ibid., 252–253. Here Collins rejects the arguments of others for a close proximity to the Temple.

<sup>57</sup> See Collins, “Jewish Apocalypses,” 44–49; Collins, Apocalyptic Imagination, 93–114, and cf. Collins' recent study of Apocalypticism in the Dead Sea Scrolls (London: Routledge, 1997).

transcendent reality that requires “mediation of an otherworldly being” and the hope for salvation in a “transcendent eschatology.”<sup>58</sup> This is a telling judgement.<sup>59</sup> It reinforces the sense that it is a dualistic worldview that is at the heart of it all. Although the Semeia volume speaks of “transcendence” rather than “dualism,” since the transcendence is not balanced by any essential immanence and since the transcendence of the genre bespeaks the utter transcendence of the eschaton that “lies beyond...the present world and stands in sharp discontinuity with it,”<sup>60</sup> it is really the transcendence of an ontological and temporal dualism that the definition has in mind. So, when the genre definition speaks of “a transcendent reality” that is “spatial insofar as it involves another, supernatural world,” is this not just another way of describing the putative ontological dualism of the apocalyptic worldview? Semeia 14 set out to define the genre “apocalypse” in separation from apocalyptic eschatology and apocalypticism. But, on close inspection, it seems, the formula is inherently a definition of the apocalyptic worldview itself.<sup>61</sup> It may be, of course, that it is simply impossible to separate form and content. But the point here is that anyone using the Semeia definition of the genre is inevitably buying into a particular view of its content, a view that on other grounds is problematic.

That the work of Collins and his colleagues is a continuation of the older view that the phenomenon is essentially a matter of a dualistic way of thinking can also be seen in its relative disinterest in religious experience. There is some recognition of the continuities with later

---

<sup>58</sup> See Collins, “Introduction,” 10–12, 27. If I understand him correctly, presumably this would be a fundamental reason to reject the value of identifying a “corpus of texts which are ‘revelations of heavenly mysteries’ that are not exclusively eschatological in content (Collins, “Genre, Ideology and Social Movements,” 15). See also Nickelsburg, “Apocalyptic Construction of Reality,” 2.

<sup>59</sup> Contrast the brief comments of M. E. Stone, “Apocalyptic Literature,” in Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period, ed. M. E. Stone, CRINT 2.2 (Assen: Van Gorcum, 1984), 383–441, at 393–394 on the separation of “apocalypse” and “apocalypticism,” which conclude: “‘apocalypticism’ should be regarded as a pattern of thought, primarily eschatological in character... It does not supply a key to the understanding of the particular literary forms of the apocalypses...” (394, italics added).

<sup>60</sup> Collins, “Jewish Apocalypses,” 27.

<sup>61</sup> In recent debate Collins has vociferously rejected the use of the word “apocalyptic” as a noun (Collins, “Proposals of Lester Grabbe,” 44–46). In British scholarship this continues, in part, precisely because there is a reluctance to accept the ideological construct that “apocalypticism” entails.

Jewish mysticism.<sup>62</sup> But still it is the texts' ideas that form the core of their message.<sup>63</sup> Persian religion has influenced some apocalyptic texts.<sup>64</sup> And there is sympathy for a sociological explanation of apocalyptic thought. This, too, requires some comment.

The Semeia definition adopts a theoretical detachment of literary genre from social context.<sup>65</sup> In subsequent discussion Collins has been careful to point to the variety of social contexts from which apocalypses emerge. However, he is insistent that there are no ancient Jewish apocalypses that are written from a central group in a position of power.<sup>66</sup> Furthermore, the apocalypses are "typically written under foreign dominion or in some cases produced in circles that were marginal within Jewish society."<sup>67</sup> There is never a realized and triumphalist eschatology in the Jewish apocalypses.<sup>68</sup> Around Collins there is widespread confidence that the apocalypses must be explained as the consequence of an experience of social deprivation.<sup>69</sup> And in maintaining this position there continues considerable sympathy for the social theory of Max Weber and his followers as an explanation of apocalyptic literature and thought.<sup>70</sup>

However, if we allow Joseph and Aseneth its proper place as a witness to the genre we find there an apocalypse with an essentially realized eschatology. And if G. Bohak is right in his recent argument that this text is an apology for the Leontopolis temple in Egypt at the

---

<sup>62</sup> For example Collins, Apocalyptic Imagination, 57 says of 1 Enoch 1–36 that although "the possibility that the author had a mystical experience cannot be discounted," Collins prefers to treat the text as a piece of literature with a particular social function and setting (57).

<sup>63</sup> See, for example, Collins' recent encyclopaedia article: Collins, "Prophecy to Apocalypticism."

<sup>64</sup> See e.g. Collins, Dead Sea Scrolls, 41–43, 101–103.

<sup>65</sup> Collins, "Introduction," 4.

<sup>66</sup> See Collins, "Temporality," 28–33 in response to the arguments of S. L. Cook, Prophecy and Apocalypticism: The Postexilic Social Setting (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1995).

<sup>67</sup> Collins, "Temporality," 33.

<sup>68</sup> Collins, "Introduction," 11; idem, "Temporality," 29–33.

<sup>69</sup> E.g. G. W. E. Nickelsburg, "Social Aspects of Palestinian Jewish Apocalypticism," Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World, ed., Hellholm, 641–654; D. E. Aune, "Transformations of Apocalypticism in Early Christianity," in Knowing the end from the beginning: The Prophetic, the Apocalyptic and their Relationships, ed. Grabbe and Haak, 54.

<sup>70</sup> See the recent review of this approach in Cook, Prophecy and Apocalypticism, 1–54.

hands of Oniad Jews who held privileged positions in the Ptolemaic state of the second century BCE, that realized eschatology carries a degree of political triumphalism.<sup>71</sup>

Collins' contribution to the study of the apocalypses at the end of the twentieth century is rivalled only by R. H. Charles at its beginning. His magisterial command of the texts—coupled to an integrative understanding of “apocalypticism”—has, of course, influenced the study of the subject as it relates to the search for the historical Jesus. But his understanding belongs within a particular conceptual—or “theological”—tradition.

2.2. Christopher C. Rowland: An Alternative Approach

In the late 1970's a number of European scholars voiced an alternative approach to the understanding of apocalyptic literature to that adopted in the past and by the emerging North American community. Pre-eminent among these contributions is Christopher Rowland's The Open Heaven: A Study of Apocalyptic in Judaism and Christianity (1982), which proposes a number of new and distinctive theses.<sup>72</sup>

For Rowland, an apocalypse is simply a “revelation of the divine mysteries through visions or some other form of immediate disclosure of the heavenly mysteries, whether as the result of vision, heavenly ascent or verbal revelations.”<sup>73</sup> This is how the word is used, not just in Rev 1:1, but in other New Testament texts.<sup>74</sup> No distinctively eschatological content is therefore required by the word (see esp. 1 Cor 14:26; 2 Cor 2:10; 12:1; Gal 1:12, 16; 2:2, cf. Rom 1:18; Phil 3:15; Eph 1:17). As far as Jewish texts are concerned this means that Jubilees is

<sup>71</sup> Bohak, Joseph and Aseneth.

<sup>72</sup> See also J. Carmignac, “Qu'est-ce que l'Apocalyptique? Son emploi à Qumrân,” RevQ 10 (1979): 3–33 and H. Stegemann, “Die Bedeutung der Qumranfunde für die Erforschung der Apokalypstik,” in Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World and the Near East, ed. Hellhom, 495–530, and cf. C. Rowland, Christian Origins: An Account of the Setting and Character of the Most Important Messianic Sect of Judaism (London: SPCK, 1985), 56–64; C. C. Rowland, “Apocalyptic: the Disclosure of Heavenly Knowledge,” in The Cambridge History of Judaism. Volume Three: The Early Roman Period, ed. W. Horbury, W. D. Davies and J. Sturdy (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999), 776–797.

<sup>73</sup> Rowland, Open Heaven, 70–71, cf. generally 9–22, 68–71.

<sup>74</sup> Ibid., 377–380; idem, “Apocalypse, Prophecy and the New Testament,” in Knowing the End from the Beginning: The Prophet, the Apocalyptic and their Relationships, ed. Grabbe and Haak, 149–166, at 151–152.

an unproblematic example; its relative disinterest in matters eschatological in no way bars its inclusion in the generic category.<sup>75</sup> There is no intrinsic connection between an apocalypse and so-called “apocalyptic eschatology.” Eschatology is just one of the interests of the apocalypses, but hardly a dominant one,<sup>76</sup> and there is far less evidence of a distinctively “transcendent eschatology” than is sometimes thought.<sup>77</sup> The usual expectation is for a restored, transformed or glorified present world order centred on Jerusalem, and considerable attention is directed to history for its own sake, in order that it might be understood in relation to the past and the future.<sup>78</sup>

Like his British predecessors, Rowland plays down the notion that there is a sharp break between older prophetic literature and the apocalypses: the latter do not represent a radically new theological stance, a new dualistic worldview. The apocalypses contain no essential temporal or eschatological dualism. There remains considerable continuity between the ages and, insofar as there is a disjuncture between them in 4 Ezra and 2 Baruch, these works belong to a particular situation of crisis after the fall of the Temple in 70 CE.<sup>79</sup> The “scientific” interest in creation and its origins in some apocalypses tells against a negative attitude towards this present age and order.<sup>80</sup> Rowland discusses the possibility of human transformation in the apocalypses: both particular individuals and, in the case of the Dead Sea Scrolls, whole communities, can attain a heavenly, glorious or angelic identity.<sup>81</sup> This phenomenon hardly supports the view that there is a rigid ontological dualism between God and humanity: it points to the fact that heavenly and earthly realms are permeable and miscible. As for the commonly alleged cosmic dualism of the apocalypses, Rowland goes so far as to say that the language of the apocalypses can appear extremely dualistic, but it is sometimes

---

<sup>75</sup> Rowland, Open Heaven, 51–52.

<sup>76</sup> Ibid., 23–48, 71.

<sup>77</sup> Ibid., 37–48, 160–189.

<sup>78</sup> See esp. Ibid., 189.

<sup>79</sup> Ibid., 134–135, cf. 455 n. 15. And, in any case, in these texts the presence of a messianic age demonstrates the importance of traditional, this-worldly hope (47).

<sup>80</sup> Ibid., 146–155.

<sup>81</sup> Ibid., 106–120.

“monistic” since the power of darkness can be located within the heavenly world.<sup>82</sup>

Whilst the apocalypses do not contain the dualism that the term “apocalypticism” has traditionally ascribed to them, they contain, or presuppose, a number of key theological concepts. The apocalypses take it for granted that the heavenly world is one in which past, present and future is available. “Heaven is a kind of repository of the whole spectrum of human history which can be glimpsed by the elect.”<sup>83</sup> The heavens contain all of time present before God. So, access to heaven makes possible access to the (eschatological) future. But, equally, it allows a revelation of the past. In fact, “whatever pertains to the heavens and the earth, its past or its future could be and was included in the apocalypses.”<sup>84</sup> This means that the study of the apocalypses and their contents is appropriately organized according to the taxonomy of mystical speculation given in the Mishnah, tractate Hagigah 2:1: “what is above, what is beneath, what was before-time, and what will be hereafter.”<sup>85</sup> The whole of reality is present and laid bare before God and this gives us a clue to one of their principal functions: the unveiling of God’s perspective—an eternal perspective—for a situation of present distress.<sup>86</sup>

What, for Rowland, is the formative life setting or impulse of the apocalypses? It is not Persian religion—a theory of which he has no need since he does not think the apocalypses dualistic.<sup>87</sup> Neither is he enamoured of the thesis that the apocalypses are the product of a sociology of crisis and marginalization.<sup>88</sup> This erroneously assumes eschatology is the definitive heart of the genre and there is too much else which seems not to emanate from a situation of distress: “The interest in the world as it is speaks more of reflection and the quest for knowledge than urgent expectation of the end of the world, where such interests would be superfluous.”<sup>89</sup> Instead of these two—highly

---

<sup>82</sup> Rowland, Open Heaven, 92 with reference to 2 Enoch 18, 42; T. Levi 3.2 and Asc. Isa. 7.9. See further Rowland’s discussion of Apoc. Abr. 23.13 where Azazel’s power in the world is entirely contingent upon human sin and “those who will to do evil” (127).

<sup>83</sup> Ibid., 56.

<sup>84</sup> Ibid., 55.

<sup>85</sup> Ibid., 75, introducing the arrangement of material in 73–189.

<sup>86</sup> E.g. ibid., 13–14.

<sup>87</sup> The suggestion receives one passing mention (ibid., 203).

<sup>88</sup> Ibid., 194–203.

<sup>89</sup> Rowland, “Disclosure of Heavenly Knowledge,” 126.

influential—hypotheses, Rowland proposes the apocalypses can be explained above all by two phenomena: genuine religious experiences of the kind they purport to record and the cosmology of Israel's Temple.

The former proposal is expounded at length.<sup>90</sup> Briefly, Rowland shows that the roots of the genre apocalypse are to be found in visionary texts such as Isaiah 6; 1 Kings 22:19; Ezekiel 1, 40–48 and Zechariah 1–8. Just as those passages are to be taken seriously as records of genuine experiences, so too are the apocalypses. The principal impediment to this view is their pseudonymous character. However, a strong case can be made that the apocalypses are the product of meditation on scriptural texts in which a visionary “sees again” what their Old Testament hero saw. In any case, there is indisputable evidence that: (a) the apocalypses report the kind of ascetic experiences (such as fasting) that comparative study shows accompany ecstasy; (b) these “techniques of ecstasy” are joined by accounts of experiences which suggest the altered states of consciousness familiar to students of later western mysticism; and (c) there are important continuities of literary form and setting between the apocalypses and later Jewish mystical texts. Since the latter should be treated seriously for their accurate witness to mystical praxis (Merkabah Mysticism and Hekhalot Mysticism), so should the former. In any given instance, it is hard to tell whether a particular text is, as it purports to be, a genuine religious experience, or whether, in fact it is a stereotypical literary account of what such an experience was believed to entail. But Rowland suggests some criteria by which the matter might be judged.<sup>91</sup>

The second proposal is undeveloped, but is of considerable significance for subsequent apocalyptic studies. There are two instances where Rowland thinks Temple cosmology and Israel's cultic experience have made a direct impact on an apocalypse. The first is Enoch's heavenly ascent in 1 Enoch 14 where the description of the tripartite heavenly sanctuary that Enoch enters is modelled on the three-fold division of the Solomonic Temple (devir, hekhhal and ulam).<sup>92</sup>

<sup>90</sup> Rowland, Open Heaven, 214–247, 271–357. The thesis finds confirmation in the study of Christian origins (358–411).

<sup>91</sup> Ibid., 235.

<sup>92</sup> See ibid., 463 n. 16 and n. 18. Rowland is indebted to J. Maier (Vom Kultus zur Gnosis: Studien zur Vor- und Frühgeschichte der “jüdischen Gnosis” [Salzburg:

Secondly, Rowland suggests that apocalyptic traditions of human transformation, exemplified by material in the Dead Sea Scrolls, have their formative context in the priestly and cultic context where heaven and earth meet and God manifests his presence.<sup>93</sup>

As we shall see, Rowland's approach has been supported in subsequent research. However, there is perhaps a weakness that undercuts a thoroughgoing development of his own insights: he works with a particular but limited understanding of the religious experiences that the apocalypses describe. In his view apocalyptic visions are essentially "direct" and unmediated.<sup>94</sup> Whilst there is no necessary intrinsic difference between apocalyptic and non-apocalyptic attitudes towards the law,<sup>95</sup> there is a contrast between indirect modes of discernment, such as the interpretation of scripture, and a direct Spirit-inspired revelation that can be found in the apocalypses.<sup>96</sup> This judgement appears to constrain Rowland from a full appreciation of the function of Temple cosmology in the apocalypses. For example, the role of Temple and priestly symbolism in the formation of Enoch's ascent suggests, in fact, that the revelation is by no means "direct" and unmediated: it takes place at a particular time and place and Enoch's role anticipates that of the priest in mediating divine instruction. In short, Rowland's "immediate disclosure of heavenly mysteries" sounds a little too like a back projection of modern (particularly Protestant) accounts of pure "charismatic" revelation that are defined in contradistinction to institutional (or "Catholic") structures.

It should also be noted that Rowland does not apply his inclination for a non-dualistic apocalyptic conceptual framework systematically. In his reading of Daniel 7 he agrees with the older history of religions approach: along with John Collins, Rowland thinks the "one like a son of man" is a reference to a future angelic redeemer, not a human messiah.

---

O. Müller, 1964], esp. 125–128), and J. Maier ("Das Gefährdungsmotiv bei der Himmelfahrt in der jüdischen Apokalyptik und "Gnosis", Kairos 5 [1963]: 18–40).

<sup>93</sup> Rowland, Open Heaven, 18–119.

<sup>94</sup> Ibid., 9–11, 17; idem, "Disclosure of Heavenly Knowledge," 780.

<sup>95</sup> Rowland, Open Heaven, 29–37; idem, "Disclosure of Heavenly Knowledge," 783–84.

<sup>96</sup> Rowland, Open Heaven, 9–10, 68–69; idem, "Disclosure of Heavenly Knowledge," 780.

3. A New Perspective on Jewish Apocalyptic

In the wake of the Semeia 14 attempt to detach genre from worldview and filling out, in particular, some of the lines drawn in Rowland's approach in the light of subsequent work, it is possible to offer a "new perspective" on Jewish apocalyptic. As the use of the root (ἀποκαλυπτ-) in other early Christian texts shows, "apocalyptic" literature is not a matter of eschatology but a particular revelatory genre, with a variety of concerns. Apocalyptic and Jewish eschatology overlap but are really two separate subjects, and apocalypses contain no one kind of eschatology: in some, eschatology is future and "transcendent," in others not so transcendent (Jubilees, Apocalypse of Abraham, cf. T. Levi 2–8), elsewhere it can be "realized" (e.g. Joseph and Aseneth) or "inaugurated" (Book of Watchers, 2 Enoch).

Rowland's argument for genuine religious experience behind the apocalypses has received support from the subsequent study of 4 Ezra by Michael Stone, who has shown that that text is best understood as the product of an individual's own transformative experience in the world without the Temple and its related institutions that followed the disaster of 70 CE.<sup>97</sup> However, the new perspective stresses the degree to which the apocalypses are otherwise a product of a priestly and cultic milieu.<sup>98</sup> This is obvious in the case of Jubilees, the Testament of Levi 2–8, the Apocalypse of Abraham, and 2 Enoch, and accords with anticipations of the genre in older visionary material in the Hebrew Bible (Ezekiel and Zechariah).<sup>99</sup> Once the reader enters the imaginative world of the Jewish priesthood and Temple it is also clear in Daniel, 1 Enoch, Joseph and Aseneth and in Revelation itself. In the Enochic tradition this is evident in the interest in the correct calendar, the Day of Atonement as the means of removing sin and its effects (1 Enoch 10–14), cultic halakhah and lore (1 Enoch 3; 26–32; 2 Enoch 2; 9.1; 45–46; 51.4; 59; 61.4–62.3; 64; 66.1–5; 68.3, 5–6; 69–72), the hero's character as a prototypical high priest and the competition between Jerusalem and rival sanctuaries, particularly those in the north (at Hermon and Shechem).<sup>100</sup> 4 Ezra is exceptional in this and several respects: it represents a move away from the priesthood in the wake of the cataclysm of 70 CE.<sup>101</sup> We will discuss Daniel further below.<sup>102</sup> And, of course, the presence of several apocalyptic texts among the Dead Sea Scrolls is entirely consistent with the Qumran community's priestly character. The particular religious experiences attested in the apocalypses are, then, not so much a reflection of individual para-institutional mysticism, but an expression of the divine encounter believed to take place in and through priestly offices, worship and the Temple. In all this, Temple cosmology—the belief that cultic space and time is a sacramental model of the universe—facilitates the experiences of transcendence, especially ascent to heaven, that so define apocalyptic literature. Enoch, the “second Adam,” ascends to heaven at the cosmic mountain: the high priest

---

<sup>97</sup> See M. E. Stone, "On Reading an Apocalypse," in Mysteries and Revelations: Apocalyptic Studies Since the Uppsala Colloquium, ed. Collins and Charlesworth 65–78 and Collins' comments thereon (Apocalyptic Imagination, 199–200).

<sup>98</sup> For the priestly character of Jewish apocalyptic see Gese, "Anfang und Ende"; I. Gruenwald, "Priests, Prophets, Apocalyptic Visionaries, and Mystics," in From Apocalypticism to Gnosticism: Studies in Apocalypticism, Merkavah Mysticism and Gnosticism (Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1988), 125–144; L. L. Grabbe, "The Social Setting of Early Jewish Apocalypticism," JSP 4 (1989): 27–47, at 32–35; M. Himmelfarb, Ascent to Heaven in Jewish and Christian Apocalypses (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1993); M. Barker, "Beyond the Veil of the Temple: The High Priestly Origins of the Apocalypses," SJT 51 (1998): 1–21; D. Frankfurter, "Jüdische Apokalyptik," RGK 4th ed., 1 (1998): 592–594. For the priestly character of the earlier, biblical material see Cook, Prophecy and Apocalypticism, and M. A. Sweeney, "The Priesthood and the Proto-Apocalyptic Reading of Prophetic and Pentateuchal Texts," in Knowing the End from the Beginning: The Prophet, the Apocalyptic and their Relationships, ed. Grabbe and Haak, 167–178.

---

<sup>99</sup> The Apocalypse of Abraham is indebted to the following cultic and priestly texts: Gen 15; Exod 7–8; 28:36–9; Lev 16 and Josh 3 (see Himmelfarb, Ascent to Heaven, 62–66; L. L. Grabbe, “The Scapegoat Ritual: A Study in Early Jewish Interpretation,” JSJ 18 (1987): 152–167, at 156–158, and R. Rubinkiewicz, Die Eschatologie von Henoch 9–11 und das Neue Testament, Österreichisches Biblische Studien 6 (Klosterneuburg: Österreichisches Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1984), 101–102 and 110–113.

<sup>100</sup> Grabbe, “Scapegoat Ritual”; Himmelfarb, Ascent to Heaven, 29–46; D. C. Olson, “1 Enoch,” in Eerdmans Commentary on the Bible, ed. J. D. G. Dunn and J. W. Rogerson (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003), 904–941, at 906–907, 910, 912, 914–915; D. C. Olson, Enoch: A New Translation (North Richland Hills, TX: BIBAL Press, 2004), 7, 9, 14. For the rivalry between Enochic Jerusalem and the Samaritans see E. J. C. Tigchelaar, Prophets of Old and the Day of the End: Zechariah, the Book of Watchers and Apocalyptic, OS 35. (Leiden: Brill, 1996), 198–203; C. H. T. Fletcher-Louis, All the Glory of Adam: Liturgical Anthropology in the Dead Sea Scrolls, STDJ 42 (Leiden: Brill, 2002), 24–27.

<sup>101</sup> 2 Baruch still reflects older traditions of Temple cosmology (see esp. chs. 2–10).

<sup>102</sup> For Joseph and Aseneth's priestly context see Bohak, Joseph and Aseneth, and for Revelation see M. Barker, The Revelation of Jesus Christ (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 2000).

enters heaven to meet with God in the holy of holies. All the revelation and wisdom that are available to one who goes to heaven are also available to the priest who enters the inner sanctuary.

Since the apocalypses reflect the particular religious experience that Israel's cult provides, it is not surprising that their theology is essentially biblical. They are not dualistic. Again, 4 Ezra's negative anthropology and its sharp disjuncture between the present and future ages reflects its particular historical context as a reaction to the Temple's destruction and the failure of the war of independence.<sup>103</sup>

The lack of dualism in pre-Christian apocalypses is seen most starkly in the prominence given to the experience of human transformation.<sup>104</sup> The purpose of ascent to heaven is not simply the gaining of knowledge; it is also transformation and the recovery of humanity's originally intended heavenly and divine identity. Enoch both recapitulates the Adamic identity (as his seventh descendent) and transcends human mortality; he is exalted to divine Glory (1 Enoch 37–71, cf. Gen 5:22–24) and is dressed as true high priest (2 Enoch 22, cf. Ben Sira 49:16).<sup>105</sup> Enoch's own exaltation anticipates that of his people (see especially 1 Enoch 37–71). Daniel is the true image of God, worthy of human veneration (Dan 2:48–49),<sup>106</sup> who has direct access to heavenly mysteries (Dan 2–6) and who sees the eschatological restoration of God's image in Israel and her representative (Dan 7). In Jubilees Israel is the true Adam whose life is written into the fabric of

---

<sup>103</sup> For the lack of dualism in 2 Baruch see J. F. Hobbins, "The Summing Up of History in 2 Baruch," JQR 89 (1998): 45–80.

<sup>104</sup> See M. Himmelfarb, "Revelation and Rapture: The Transformation of the Visionary in the Ascent Apocalypses," in Mysteries and Revelations: Apocalyptic Studies Since the Uppsala Colloquium, ed. Collins and Charlesworth, 79–90; C. R. A. Morray-Jones, "Transformational Mysticism in the Apocalyptic-Merkabah Tradition," JJS 43 (1992): 1–31; C. H. T. Fletcher-Louis, Luke-Acts: Angels, Christology and Soteriology, WUNT 2.94 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1997), 109–215; idem, All the Glory of Adam, 1–55; M. Barker, "The High Priest and the Worship of Jesus," in The Jewish Roots of Christological Monotheism, ed. C. C. Newman, J. R. Davila and G. S. Lewis, JSJSup 63 (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 93–111.

<sup>105</sup> For the centrality of this particular theological anthropology within 1 Enoch see Olson, "1 Enoch," 905–906; Olson, Enoch, 5–6.

<sup>106</sup> Fletcher-Louis, All the Glory of Adam, 102–103, cf. idem, "The Worship of the Jewish High Priest by Alexander the Great," in Early Christian and Jewish Monotheism, ed. L. T. Stuckenbruck and W. S. North, JSNTSup 63 (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 2004), 71–102, at 79.

the cosmos, to whom God speaks clearly through his angels and in dreams (32.1, 16–26). In Joseph and Aseneth Israel is a divine and heavenly race, enjoying the life of Eden, by virtue of her peculiar cultic constitution. Arguably, the anthropology of these texts is mainstream and biblical. In any case, there is here an inextricable connection between the form of the apocalypses and their theological content. The apocalypses are distinctive in their proclamation that as the image of God, it is the true humanity—Israel and her representatives—that rightfully receives divine revelation. In contrast to the idolatrous (mantic) alternatives adopted by her neighbours, Israel alone (as the true humanity) has genuine access to the ecstatic experiences by which the creator god communicates his reality, wisdom and perspective on history.<sup>107</sup> Daniel, not the Chaldean diviners, is privy to the secrets of a man's dream-life and the future course of history. Through his dreams and entry into the heavenly sanctuary Enoch demonstrates the theologically correct form of revealed wisdom over against its Mesopotamian mantic rivals.<sup>108</sup> Aseneth rejects the cultic apparatus of her pagan past and joins the Jewish community and the fellowship of those to whom and through whom the mysteries of heaven are revealed (Joseph and Aseneth especially 5.5–6; 16.14; 22.13; 23.8).<sup>109</sup>

The non-dualistic theology of the apocalypses is evident in their profound ecological concern. As in the Hebrew Bible, creation is prone to manifestations of pre-creation chaos. God brings about a return to order and fertility as he has done in the past; and in this the Temple as the sacramental centre and bulwark against chaos plays a vital role. The story of the fallen watchers in 1 Enoch (chs. 6–14) anticipates the Day of Atonement as the day of cosmic purgation and repristination. Daniel laments the manifestation of pre-creation chaos in Israel's enemies (7.1–8), the attack on sacred time (7.25), and the

---

<sup>107</sup> For the sharp differences between the revelatory experiences in the apocalypses and the techniques of mantic wisdom employed in non-Israelite societies see A. Bedenbender, "Jewish Apocalypticism: A Child of Mantic Wisdom?" Henoch 24 (2002): 189–196.

<sup>108</sup> For the relationship between 1 Enoch and Mesopotamian mantic wisdom see J. C. VanderKam, Enoch and the Growth of an Apocalyptic Tradition, CBQMS 16 (Washington, DC: Catholic Biblical Association of America, 1984).

<sup>109</sup> This theme finds expression in the Apocalypse of Abraham in the contrast between Abraham the true worshipper of God who is taken up into the liturgy of heaven (chs. 12–18) and his idolatrous family from whose house he is rescued (chs. 1–8).

desolation of the Temple that otherwise binds together heavenly (angelic) and human (priestly) hosts (8.9–14). Indeed, a proper appreciation of the Jewish Temple's role in the provision of cosmic cohesion now provides a resolution to the vexed problems in the interpretation of Daniel 7.

3.1. Daniel 7

The ill-effects of the modern dualistic paradigm are nowhere more painfully felt than in the the struggle to agree an identification of the “one like a son of man” of Dan 7:13 who stands behind so many gospel passages that speak of Jesus as the Son of Man.<sup>110</sup> Broadly speaking, commentators take one of two positions: either the “one like a son of man” is an angel (e.g. J. J. Collins) or he is a human figure, a mere symbol for God's people, Israel (the older English view now perpetuated by N. T. Wright and others).<sup>111</sup> For a minority of conservative scholars, he is an individual royal messiah, but there is so little evidence in the text that Daniel is interested in royalty that this third option can be discounted at the outset.

As for the two principal positions, both sides marshal an impressive list of exegetical observations in their favour. Each also has to dispense with the exegetical observations of the other. On the one hand, those who adopt a symbol-for-Israel interpretation fail to recognize the importance of the old ancient Near Eastern and biblical Chaoskampf motif that puts the man figure in the position of divine warrior. They ignore or explain away: the significance of the use of a divine and heavenly mode of transport (clouds); the fact that in v. 14 the man figure receives that which is elsewhere the preserve of God alone (cf. 3:33; 6:27); the indications that the human figure is an angelic individual, not a corporate symbol,<sup>112</sup> and the earliest evidence in the text's Rezeptionsgeschichte that he is meant to be a divine individual.<sup>113</sup> On the other hand, those who think he is an angel cannot fully accommodate the fact that the echoes of creation in the rest of the chapter put the man figure in the position of the true Adam (vv. 2–8, cf. Gen 1:2; v. 14 cf. Gen 1:26–30) and the stage directions separate him from the surrounding angelic throng. They also play down the degree to which the angelic interpretation (vv. 16–28) orients the decoding of the dream to the human, Israel, level of reality: the man figure's reception of dominion and authority (v. 14) betokens Israel's reception of authority (vv. 18, 22, 27). There is no parallel in contemporary texts for an angel riding on clouds, let alone entering God's presence by such means, nor for an angel fulfilling the role of a divine warrior. And none of the text's earliest interpreters thought the "one like a son of man" was an angel: they are unanimous in thinking he is a human being and a messiah (Similitudes of Enoch, synoptic gospels, Acts, Revelation and 4 Ezra).<sup>114</sup>

---

<sup>110</sup> For what follows see C. H. T. Fletcher-Louis, “The High Priest as Divine Mediator in the Hebrew Bible: Dan 7:13 as a Test Case,” SBLSP (1997): 161–193 and idem, “The Revelation of the Sacral Son of Man: The Genre, History of Religions Context and the Meaning of the Transfiguration,” in Auferstehung—Resurrection: The Fourth Durham-Tübingen-Symposium: Resurrection, Exaltation, and Transformation in Old Testament, Ancient Judaism, and Early Christianity, ed. F. Avemarie and H. Lichtenberger, WUNT 135 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 2001), 247–298, esp. 257–261.

<sup>111</sup> Wright, People of God, 291–297, cf. M. Casey, Son of Man: The Interpretation and Influence of Daniel 7 (London: SPCK, 1979); J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003), 729.

Scholarly positions have become entrenched. But a strict decision between an angelic or human identification of the "one like a son of man" of 7:13 is unnecessary. The existence of evidence for both positions is entirely explicable in the non-dualistic worldview of Second Temple Judaism where various individuals (Adam, Noah, Enoch, Melchizedek, Jacob-Israel et al.) are thought of as divine and/or angelic and, simultaneously, thoroughly human. On numerous counts the best candidate for the heavenly-human part that the "one like a son of man" plays is the high priest. In Daniel's second-century Jewish world it is the high priest who dominates the political and religious landscape.<sup>115</sup> Daniel as a whole is barely interested in kingship, but is consumed by the crisis facing the defiled Temple and the broken line of legitimate high priests (see esp. 8:9–14; 9:24–27). The

<sup>112</sup> The expression "one like a son of man" anticipates that used for angels in Dan 8:15; 10:16.

<sup>113</sup> The Old Greek (OG) translation says that the man figure comes "as (ὡς)" the Ancient of Days and both the Similitudes of Enoch (1 Enoch 37–71) and 4 Ezra (ch. 13) take him to be a pre-existent and divine messiah.

<sup>114</sup> The hypothesis that the historical Jesus or pre-synoptic tradition thought "the Son of Man" was an angel is entirely hypothetical.

<sup>115</sup> See discussion of this point in C. H. T. Fletcher-Louis, "Jesus as the High Priestly Messiah: Part 1," JSHJ 4 (2006): 155–175; "Jesus as the High Priestly Messiah: Part 2," JSHJ 5 (2007): 57–79.

mythological landscape of Daniel 7 centres on Zion and the Temple. The usual pattern in the biblical, as in the wider ancient Near East world, is for the conflict with chaos to come to a head at a Temple, the place where divine presence and cosmic stability are guaranteed (cf. Pss 46; 48; Ezek 38–39; Joel 3 and Zech 14). The chaos monsters arise from the Mediterranean (“the great sea,” 7:2) and the Chaoskampf comes to a climax at Israel’s holy mountain, where God’s throne is set in her Temple (vv. 9–11). This is roughly the same staging as that used in the salvation-historical drama of ch. 2, with which ch. 7 stands in literary parallelism.

The crisis faced by Israel’s Temple state under Antiochus IV’s persecution is cosmic because the cult is the bond of heaven and earth (cf. 8:9–14). The monsters Daniel sees embodying the nations are impure Mischwesen (cf. Lev 11) whose pollution comes from the watery abyss that makes desolate God’s sanctuary. Yet God’s sanctuary is also the point at which that cosmic chaos is defeated and its impurity removed when the true high priest is brought before God on the Day of Atonement; the day of purgation on which creation is reconstituted. Just as the high priest comes to God on that day surrounded by clouds of incense (Lev 16) that represent the clouds of heaven in Israel’s cultic symbolic alphabet (cf. Exod 40), so too the man figure of Daniel 7 goes to the Ancient of Days with the clouds of heaven.<sup>116</sup> That the arrival of the “one like a son of man”—the true human set over against the bestial nations—recalls the creation of Adam in Genesis 1 is fitting because the high priest is the true Adam, the image of God.<sup>117</sup> There is now mounting evidence that the high priest, like Israel's king before him, was required to play the role of divine warrior on the cultic stage.<sup>118</sup> And, of course, by virtue of his wearing the names of the tribes upon his breastpiece and shoulders the high priest represents Israel, the people to whom the kingdom is given in the rest of Daniel 7.<sup>119</sup>

<sup>116</sup> On this point see too Barker, “The High Priest,” 95–96.

<sup>117</sup> For the Adamic contours of the high priestly office: compare Exod 28 and Ezek 28:12–16, see the priestly characterization of Adam in Gen 2–3 (discussed by, e.g. G. J. Wenham, “Sanctuary Symbolism in the Garden of Eden Story,” in I Studied Inscriptions from before the Flood: ANE Literary and Linguistic Approaches to Gen 1–11, ed. R. Hess and D. T. Tsumura [Winona Lake: Eisenbrauns, 1994], 399–404), and consider the identification of the high priest in Ben Sira 50 with Adam through the parallelism between 50:1 and 49:16 (discussed, with parallels, in C. T. R. Hayward, The Jewish Temple: A Non-Biblical Sourcebook [London: Routledge, 1996], 45–46, at 45). For the high priest as the image of God see also Fletcher-Louis, “Alexander the Great”; idem, “The Temple Cosmology of P and Theological Anthropology in the Wisdom of Jesus ben Sira,” in Of Scribes and Sages: Early Jewish Interpretation and Transmission of Scripture, ed. C. A. Evans, LSTS 50, SSEJC 9 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2004), 69–113 and idem, “The Image of God and the Biblical roots of Christian Sacramentality,” in The Gestures of God: Explorations in Sacramentality, ed. C. Hall and G. Rowell (London: Continuum, 2004), 73–89.

Parallels between Daniel 7 and, for example, 1 Enoch 14 and 11QMelchizedek (to which interpreters frequently turn for help) confirm this priestly/cultic reading. In 1 Enoch 14 Enoch is the prototypical high priest who comes to the Great Glory in his sanctuary to deal with the fallen watchers (led by Asael/Azazel) in the same way that the high priest comes before God on the Day of Atonement to rid the world of pollution through the scapegoat לְעִזָּאזָל. In 11QMelchizedek, again, the hero is a divine, but human, (king-)priest who appears on the Yom Kippur of the eschatological Jubilee (11QMelch II, 6–8). The earliest interpretation of Dan 7:13, outside of the (very Jewish) New Testament, is the Similitudes of Enoch. There the identification of the “one like a son of man” with Enoch is intended throughout and is natural, given that both are priests. Features of the Similitudes, such as the description in the second parable of the punishment of Azazel (ch. 55) which alludes to Yom Kippur and the dating of the third parable to the eve of Tabernacles (60.1), also corroborate the New Year festival reading of Daniel 7.

3.2. The Politics and Sociology of Apocalyptic Literature

A proper understanding of the role of Temple cosmology and the particular theological anthropology that is evident in the apocalypses has broader implications for questions of Torah piety, social location, political perspective, messianic hope and eschatological expectation.

The passion for Torah in 4 Ezra and 2 Baruch is self-evident. From their earliest exemplars onwards apocalyptic texts are neither a rival nor an alternative to Torah. Only if Torah is construed in narrowly Deuteronomistic terms and the interconnections between Torah-Temple and cosmos are ignored does this seem otherwise. Once the priestly and cultic material in the Pentateuch is considered, along with its complex coordination with God-ordained cosmology, the apocalypses emerge as utterly faithful to Israel's covenantal piety.<sup>120</sup> Nor is there any concrete evidence for a distinctive sectarian consciousness in apocalyptic texts. Though at times apocalypses might be written or cherished by particular communities there is nothing in the genre's defining form or theological content that requires such a social location. We know of no Jewish groups whose eschatological views conform to or have been usefully explained by the sociologists' "millenarian prophet." Rather, the imposition of social theory onto the primary sources has distracted a generation of commentators from their priestly, Temple-centred content and life-setting in the mainstream of Jewish society. They also tend to reflect a scribal milieu. Though the illiterate may well have composed oral apocalypses, none are extant and there are indications that, in any case, the apocalypses that do exist satisfied the aspirations of the poor, not just the rich and powerful in Jewish society.<sup>121</sup>

<sup>118</sup> See Barker, “The High Priest”; Fletcher-Louis, “High Priest as Divine Mediator,” 186–192; idem, All the Glory of Adam, 81–83, 222–251; idem, “Temple Cosmology of P,” 102–103; idem, “Alexander the Great,” 86–87.

<sup>119</sup> The slippage between the individual “one like a son of man” and corporate righteous Israel in the movement from vision to interpretation is simply a function of the sacramental worldview of the text's cultic life-setting: “one like a son of man” is to “the people of the saints of the Most High” what the high priest is to Israel. In each case identities overlap within the grammar of the Temple's sacramental theology. But the “one like a son of man” is no more equated with Israel tout court than the high priest is simply Israel without remainder.

There is no clear evidence for a pacifist political stance in the apocalypses and much else points to the belief that human activity, whether on the battlefield or in the Temple, will be necessary to appropriate, if not also to activate, God's action in the world. In 1 Enoch both the Animal Apocalypse (90.9–19) and the Epistle of Enoch (91.12, cf. v. 11) endorse the Maccabean revolt. This is consistent with the role of visions and the angelic realm in Maccabean historiography (see 2 Macc 2:21; 3; 5:1–4; 10:29; 11:8; 3 Macc 6:18–19). The necessity of military force is clearly endorsed in Jubilees (e.g. ch. 30; 31.18–20), in the midst of the apocalyptic portions of T. Levi (5.3; 6.1–11), in Joseph and Aseneth (ch. 27), in the Apocalypse of Abraham (29.19) and in 2 Baruch (72.6).

If at times it appears that God (or his angels, or suprahuman divine mediators), not human beings, are responsible for the action it must be remembered that there is a synergy between the heavenly and earthly horizons and an identity overlap between divine and human characters. For the divine and angelic Israel, human violence is transcendental violence.<sup>122</sup> In the case of Daniel, in ch. 7 the turning of the ages depends upon the coming of a true priest and the effecting of a proper cult.<sup>123</sup> The evidence from Josephus is that some revolutionaries in the first revolt were fired by Daniel, in particular.<sup>124</sup> Sadly, we know little about the “messianic” and prophetic movements described in Josephus and it is hard to gauge who among them had an apocalyptic spirituality and beliefs.<sup>125</sup> But that apocalyptic visions accompanied fighting on the ground is clear (see e.g. Josephus, War 6.288–300; Tacitus, Hist. 5.13). The view that “apocalypticists” were reluctant to fight because they waited patiently for God himself to act is an unnecessary presumption arising from a dualistic construal of apocalyptic thought.<sup>126</sup> From a multiplicity of sources (archaeological, rabbinic and patristic texts) we know a good deal more about the leader of the third Jewish revolt, Simeon bar Kosiba, and recent study has highlighted the continuity between his own ideology and that of the revolutionary movements in the pre-70 CE situation.<sup>127</sup> Simeon was both a military leader of notable physical strength and, as his nickname Bar Kochba (“son of a star”) reveals,<sup>128</sup> he was believed to be the incarnation of a heavenly power, in fulfilment of Num 24:17: “a star shall arise from Jacob and a scepter... from Israel” (y. Ta’an

<sup>120</sup> See, for example, D. Bryan, Cosmos, Chaos and the Kosher Mentality, JSPSup 12 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995) for a study of the role of purity regulations in Dan 7 and 1 Enoch 85–90.

<sup>121</sup> See, for example, G. W. E. Nickelsburg, "Riches, the Rich, and God's Judgement in 1 Enoch 92–105 and the Gospel according to Luke," NTS 25 (1978–79): 324–344.

<sup>122</sup> For a detailed exposition of this ideology in an eschatological, but not strictly apocalyptic, text see Fletcher-Louis, All the Glory of Adam, 395–474 on the War Scroll.

<sup>123</sup> There is no need to see in 11:34 a derogatory comment on the Maccabean use of violence (so rightly J. E. Goldingay, Daniel, WBC 30 (Dallas: Word Books, 1989), 303, pace J. J. Collins, Daniel: A Commentary on the Book of Daniel (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993), 386, and D. Smith-Christopher, “The Book of Daniel,” in The New Interpreter’s Bible (Nashville: Abingdon, 1996), 17–152, at 144–146.

<sup>124</sup> See Wright, People of God, 312–320.

<sup>125</sup> Note the possible reference to angelic help in the military vision of the Fourth Philosophy in Josephus, Ant. 18.4.

<sup>126</sup> For this presumption see, for example, J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1993), 108–109, 116, 158–159, 161, 168 who consistently denies the veracity of Josephus’s own statements about the use of arms.

<sup>127</sup> See, for example, P. Schäfer, “Bar Kokhba and the Rabbis,” in The Bar Kochba War Reconsidered: New Perspectives on the Second Jewish Revolt against Rome, ed. P. Schäfer (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 2003), 1–22, at 15–22.

<sup>128</sup> For this name, which is consistent with the use of the star on the coins minted by the revolutionaries, see Justin Martyr, Apol. 1.31.6.

4:8 68a). In the words of Eusebius, Simeon “claimed to be a luminary who had come down to them from heaven” (Eccl. Hist. 4.6.1–4). This picture of a military leader operating with transcendent, heavenly consciousness is entirely in accord with the non-dualistic thinking of the Similitudes of Enoch, 4 Ezra and 2 Baruch, all of which combine heavenly and earthly features in their messianic expectations.<sup>129</sup>

4. Jewish Eschatology

Eschatological expectation in and outside the apocalypses is variegated. In the Hebrew Bible there is an expectation that creation will come to an end,<sup>130</sup> but this is hardly related to God’s purposes for humanity, which are worked out within history. Where, in later literature, creation is transformed or undone and remade, invariably the socio-political character of the new order remains present: Israel’s national, land, Jerusalem and Temple-focused aspirations remain to the fore. There is also a hope for a transcendence of mundane history: corruptibility is replaced by paradisaical plenty,<sup>131</sup> the dead are brought back to life, the wicked are judged, the righteous vindicated and given a transformed, angelic identity, all evil—its causes and manifestations—are removed,<sup>132</sup> ordinary time is no more,<sup>133</sup> darkness disappears and is replaced by eternal light, and so forth. On the one hand, these manifestations of a transcendental reality coexist and are in continuity with Israel’s socio-political ideals. On the other hand, they are certainly not speaking about the mere continuity of history as we know it. It is hard to see how, to the extent that the primary sources describe a transcendence of mundane time and space, their language is merely metaphorical, not literal: the abolition of Satan and his works can only mean just that, even if various metaphors are used to express such an idea. In the older biblical material historical events are invested with cosmological significance and there is limited

<sup>129</sup> The latter two are generally reckoned to be close in time and social location to the Bar Kochba revolt and perhaps to have informed its combatants.

<sup>130</sup> E.g. Ps 102:25–26; Isa 51:6.

<sup>131</sup> Sib. Or. 3.744–755, 787–795; 2 Bar 73.1–74:1, cf. 1 Enoch 25.

<sup>132</sup> Jub. 5.6; 10.7–11; 23.29; 1 En. 91.14; 2 En. 65.9; T. Mos. 10.1; 4 Ezra 6.27; 8.53; 2 Bar. 73.1–5; 73.6–7; Sib. Or. 3.751–55.

<sup>133</sup> 2 Bar. 51.9; 74.1–2; 2 En. 65.7–8, cf. Zech 14.7.

evidence that, on occasion, such language could be used metaphorically in the post-biblical period.<sup>134</sup>

It is hard to find any evidence in the apocalypses themselves of an expectation of literal cosmic destruction that is wholly negative.<sup>135</sup>

Whilst all types of literature envisage cosmic disturbances (whether metaphorical or literal),<sup>136</sup> it is only outside the apocalypses that literal cosmic destruction is intimated.<sup>137</sup> This is not surprising since, at its core, apocalyptic literature is world affirming with a high view of human life and culture.

Not just in the apocalypses, but in other texts containing eschatological material, it is hard to find unequivocal evidence for the belief that the righteous must sit back and wait since God will intervene without human assistance.<sup>138</sup> Certainly, there is the presupposition that the arrival of the eschaton is dependent upon Israel's faithfulness to Torah,<sup>139</sup> and divine judgement is usually worked out through a messiah who is both human and sometimes clearly divine.<sup>140</sup>

<sup>134</sup> With Isa 13:9-10, 13; Ezek 32:5-8; Zeph 1:8; 3:8; Hag 2:6 compare Sib. Or. 5.152, where, after Nero allegedly "seized the divinely built Temple (of Jerusalem) and burned the citizens" (150), "on his appearance the whole creation was shaken."

<sup>135</sup> Collins cites the Ethiopic of 1 En. 91.14, "the world is written down for destruction" in the ninth week of the ten weeks of history (Collins, Apocalyptic Imagination, 65; Collins, "Temporality," 40). But this is the reading of only some Ethiopic manuscripts. Others and the Qumran Aramaic text show that the original had "all the deeds (or 'doers') of wickedness will vanish from the whole earth and descend to the eternal pit" (see Milik, Books of Enoch, 266-267; Nickelsburg, 1 Enoch, 434, 437).

<sup>136</sup> E.g. 1 En. 80.4; T. Mos. 10.46; Sib. Or. 3.675-684.

<sup>137</sup> The strongest expressions of expected cosmic destruction are to be found in: Sib. Or. 2.196-213; 3.75-92; 4.171-192; Josephus, Ant. 1.70; Latin Life of Adam and Eve 49.3-50:1. Cf. Apocalypse of Adam 5.8-14. However, Sib. Or. 2.196-213 is surrounded by obviously Christian material (2.179-191 and 2.241-251), so we cannot be certain that it is not in fact Christian too (pace D. C. Allison, "Jesus & the Victory of Apocalyptic," in Jesus & the Restoration of Israel: A Critical Assessment of N. T. Wright's Jesus and the Victory of God, ed. C. C. Newman [Carlisle: Paternoster, 1999], 126-141, esp. 139). A good case has been made that Sibylline Oracles Book 4 originates from the end of the second century CE, not, as is usually thought, the end of the first century (S. A. Redmond, "The Date of the Fourth Sibylline Oracle," Second Century 7 [1989-90]: 129-149).

<sup>138</sup> T. Mos. 9-10 expresses this view only if the text is assumed to espouse a dualistic worldview. Collins, for example, thinks that in 10.2 the Kingdom is implemented through an angel (nuntius) (Collins, Apocalyptic Imagination, 131). But the text more likely refers to a heavenly-but-human priest, since specifically priestly language is used for his ordination ("then will be filled the hands") and elsewhere in T. Mos. the Latin nuntius is used of the angelic Moses (11.16). See further Fletcher-Louis, All the Glory of Adam, 31-32.

<sup>139</sup> E.g. Jub. 19.25; 23.24-31; T. Mos. 9.1-7; 2 Bar. 44.7; 77.6; 78.7; 84.2; 85.4.

<sup>140</sup> See A. Chester, "Jewish Messianic Expectations and Mediatorial Figures and

In both biblical and later literature the disruption of the cult is a matter of cosmology and, by the same token, the fulfilment of God's purposes for creation will depend on the existence and proper functioning of a Temple.<sup>141</sup> The destruction of the Temple (along with the capital city) entails a return to pre-creation chaos.<sup>142</sup> The completion of a (new or renewed) Temple means the completion, recreation or renewal of heaven and earth. This is already the case in the Priestly material in the Pentateuch and is reiterated in prophetic literature (see esp. Isa 65:17–25; Hag 1). The relationship between cosmos and Temple can be viewed in one of two ways. Because the Temple is a microcosm of the universe, its destruction or building metaphorically equates to the destruction or recreation of the cosmos.<sup>143</sup> Alternatively, because the Temple is thought to have a sacramental power, its existence is efficacious for cosmic stability and ecological order. So, for example, in Jub. 23.16–31 disobedience to Torah and Temple brings about ecological collapse and a shortening of human life. Torah and Temple faithfulness brings about longevity and the complete destruction of evil. Those in Israel who properly keep to Israel's cosmologically attuned laws and festivals "serve to establish heaven and to strengthen the earth and to renew all of the lights which are above the firmament" (19.25, cf. 1.29 and 11QTS XXIX, 8–10). The first two chapters of Joel are perhaps best read in a similar fashion: a plague of locusts threatens the supply of sacrifices in the Temple which in turn threatens cosmic meltdown; the sun and moon darkening and the stars withdrawing their shining (2:10). Intensification of cultic activity in sympathy with the mourning land

---

Pauline Christology," in Paulus und das antike Judentum, ed. M. Hengel and U. Heckel, WUNT 58 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1991), 17–89; W. Horbury, Jewish Messianism and the Cult of Christ (London: SCM, 1998), 36–108; Fletcher-Louis, All the Glory of Adam, 9–13, 412–449. The absence of messianism has been exaggerated, not least because a dualistic framework has removed much of the evidence from discussion.

<sup>141</sup> For what follows see J. D. Levenson, Creation and the Persistence of Evil: The Jewish Drama of Divine Omnipotence (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1988), esp. 78–127; C. H. T. Fletcher-Louis, "Jesus, the Temple, and the Dissolution of Heaven and Earth," in Apocalyptic in History and Tradition, ed. Rowland and Barton, 116–141, and idem, All the Glory of Adam, 61–68.

<sup>142</sup> See Jer 4:23 and D. G. Johnson, From Chaos to Restoration: An Integrative Reading of Isaiah 24–27, JSOTS 61 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1988), 20–47 on Isa 24:1–13.

<sup>143</sup> For this see Isa 24, perhaps Jer 4:23 and Isa 65:17–25. In Daniel 7 the disruption to the proper Temple worship is viewed as a manifestation of pre-creation chaos.

solicits a divine response, ecological restoration and the aversion of complete cosmic collapse.<sup>144</sup>

Given this sacramental understanding of Israel's Temple it is quite reasonable that the seer in 2 Baruch should ask whether the Temple's destruction does not mean that "the universe will return to its original state and the world go back to its primeval silence" (3.7). The answer God gives is telling: the world will not be consigned to oblivion (4.1) because, although the city will be delivered up for a time, there is another city (and Temple) that is hidden with God in heaven (4.2–6, cf. 59.4). Eventually, after the destruction of the Second Temple, there will be a renewed, glorious and eternal Temple which will also mean the renewal of creation (32.4, 6).<sup>145</sup> The First and Second Temples were not illegitimate per se.<sup>146</sup> Whilst the seer seems to accept that total cosmic catastrophe will not follow the Temple's destruction he nevertheless believes it requires an appropriate response from the ecosystem and heavenly bodies: the earth and vine should withhold fruit, the heavens their waters;

And you, sun, withhold the brightness of your rays, and you, moon, conceal the brilliance of your light; for why should any light again be seen where the light of Zion is darkened? (10.11–12)

All of creation feels the pain of the Temple's fate.<sup>147</sup>

In view of the interconnection between cosmology and Temple it is not surprising that three of the clearest references in contemporary Jewish literature to a "Kingdom of God" have a cultic orientation (The Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice, Wis 10:10 and 2 En. 1.3).<sup>148</sup>

<sup>144</sup> For this reading see Fletcher-Louis, "Dissolution of Heaven and Earth," 130–139.

<sup>145</sup> Hobbins, "Summing Up of History," 62: "Expectations about Zion and the cosmos co-inhere in 2 Baruch because they co-inhere already in biblical revelation: the renewal of Zion will usher in the renewal of the cosmos."

<sup>146</sup> The angelic removal of the First Temple's cultic apparatus (ch. 6) affirms its sacramental power.

<sup>147</sup> Note also the eclipse at the death of the priest Matthias in Josephus, Ant. 17.167 and the sense of cosmic revulsion at the Temple's defilement in Josephus, War 5.562–566.

<sup>148</sup> Sabbath Songs = 4Q400–407; 11Q17 and Mas1k (on which see A.M. Schwemer, "Gott als König und seine Königsherrschaft in den Sabbatliedern aus Qumran," in Königsherrschaft Gottes und himmlischer Kult im Judentum, Urchristentum und in der hellenistischen Welt, ed. M. Hengel and A. M. Schwemer, WUNT 55 [Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1991], 45–118, and Fletcher-Louis, All the Glory of Adam, 252–393). When Wis 10:10 says that Jacob was shown the "Kingdom of God" it has in mind his experience of the angels at Bethel, the gate of heaven (Gen 28). The particularity of the context and the similarity to the Sabbath Songs is missed by Crossan, Mediterranean Peasant, 290: Wis 10:10 is certainly not thinking of "the kingdom of Wisdom eternally present, available... to anyone who heeds her call."

Jewish apocalyptic literature cannot be understood apart from the peculiar cosmology of Israel's Temple theology and the religious experiences it offers. The same is true of the developed eschatology of late Second Temple Judaism, though that is a distinct and separate phenomenon to the one that creates texts which can be labelled apocalypses.

ANTI-JUDAISM AND THE NEW TESTAMENT

LUKE TIMOTHY JOHNSON

The language of the New Testament has proven to be powerful in both positive and negative ways. Positively, it has generated and supported lives and communities transformed by the mind of Christ. Negatively, it has equally generated and supported hostile attitudes and oppressive actions with regard to women, homosexuals, and most of all, Jews. Christianity's long history of anti-Jewish behavior cannot be separated from the portrayal of Jews in the New Testament.<sup>1</sup> And no discussion of the New Testament with respect to Judaism can be isolated from the ways in which the Christian canon can continue to foster attitudes and actions dangerous to Jews.<sup>2</sup> Any treatment of the subject must pay attention both to the complexity of the issues and to the enormity of the stakes in dealing with the issues precisely and honestly.

1. The Nature of the Issues

It is important from the first to distinguish three levels of concern, which might be called the historical, the exegetical, and the hermeneutical. The historical concerns the actual Jews of the first century as the New Testament compositions report on their attitudes and actions. The question here concerns the accuracy of the New Testament's report. Did Jews of the first century have the concerns the New Testament claims? Can it be relied on as one of our earliest sources for formative Judaism? More critically, did Jews of the first century oppose Jesus, have a role in putting him to death, and persecute early Christians?

---

<sup>1</sup> For a rapid survey, see S. Grayzel, A History of the Jews, rev. ed. (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1968), 303–473, and T. M. Parker, Christianity and the State in the Light of History (London: A&C Black, 1955); for the roots of Christian anti-semitism, see J. G. Gager, The Origins of Anti-Semitism (New York: Oxford University Press, 1985), 3–34, and C. A. Evans and D. A. Hagner, eds., Anti-Semitism and Early Christianity: Issues of Polemic and Faith (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); for the period after the New Testament, see M. Simon, Verus Israel: A Study of Relations between Jews and Christians in the Roman Empire, trans. H. McKeating (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986), esp. 135–236; for documentary evidence of the medieval period, see J. R. Marcus, The Jews in the Medieval World: A Source-Book: 315–1791 (New York: 1969), 3–181.

<sup>2</sup> C. Klein, Anti-Judaism in Christian Theology, trans. E. Quinn (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978).

The exegetical issue concerns the meaning of the New Testament's statements with regard to Jews. Whether or not such statements are historically accurate (much less verifiable), what is their significance within the compositions of the nascent Christian movement? How should they be understood within the rhetoric of community formation in antiquity? At this level, the goal is not determining the facts of history but interpreting the meaning of literature.

The hermeneutical issue is concerned not so much with what happened, or with the language used to describe Jews, as with what contemporary readers—both Jews and Christians—are to think about such language and how to act in light of such language.<sup>3</sup> This issue is more complicated for Christians than for Jews. For Christians, the compositions of the New Testament are not simply artifacts from antiquity. They are Sacred Scripture, bearing with them a burden of authority and claims of inerrancy that contemporary readers are required to negotiate.

While there is an obvious connection between these levels of concern, it is of the first importance that they not be confused. The New Testament compositions might be mined for historical statements without any appreciation for their rhetoric, and the rhetoric might be studied without serious attention given to the historical facts. Even more important, even if one determined that the New Testament's statements concerning Jews were historically indefensible, such a determination would not by itself solve the hermeneutical issue, for that is connected, not to the facts, but to the language of the New Testament texts. Historical determinations, to be sure, can well have an effect on those engaged in the hermeneutical enterprise, urging them to assess their canonical texts in one way rather than another.

---

<sup>3</sup> For consideration of the hermeneutical dimension generally, see L. T. Johnson, Scripture and Discernment: Decision Making in the Church (Nashville: Abingdon, 1996), and for the hermeneutical challenge posed by the language about Jews, see R. B. Hays, The Moral Vision of the New Testament: Community, Cross, and New Creation (San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1996), 407–433.

2. The Complexity of the Issues

Before considering those aspects of the New Testament that can, in one fashion or another, be called “Anti-Jewish,” it is important to assert the overwhelmingly Jewish character of the New Testament compositions themselves. Whatever the New Testament has to say about “the Jews,” it does so not from a detached position, but from a place within the complex conversation that was first-century “Judaism.” The writers of these compositions proclaimed as “Messiah and Lord” a first-century Palestinian Jew, Jesus of Nazareth, who preached and worked wonders for a short period of time in Galilee and then in Judea, was crucified under the authority of the Roman Prefect Pontius Pilate, and then, according to his followers, was exalted to the “right hand” of God (Ps 110:1) as “life-giving Spirit” (1 Cor 15:45). To make their extraordinary claims convincing—not only to those Jews who found the crucifixion a “stumbling block” to recognizing Jesus as Messiah, and his proclamation as “Lord” offensive to monotheistic sensibilities, but also to themselves—the Christian writers engaged in a rereading and reinterpretation of Torah in light of their experience and conviction so systemic and pervasive that the New Testament can fairly be called a form of first-century Jewish literature.<sup>4</sup>

The “Jewish” character of the New Testament is not simply a matter of its compositions’ thoroughgoing engagement with scripture through citation, allusion, echo, and literary mimesis, or even that its major characters are identified as Jews both by birth and by commitment. It is also a matter of first-hand knowledge of Jews and their practices both in Palestine and in the Diaspora. Paul the Apostle is our earliest datable member of the Pharisaic party. The gospels (and Acts) remain, after Josephus, our most important source of knowledge of Jewish sects in the first century. The net effect of the astonishing archaeological discoveries of the last century, not least that at Qumran, is not the discrediting of the New Testament’s knowledge of first-century Jews, but instead the confirmation of many things that older generations of critical scholars had dismissed. Apart from the extraordinary claims made for Jesus and the earliest churches—and even these claims can be seen as less outrageous in light of the Qumran literature—the writings of the New Testament fit comfortably within the framework of Jewish life and literature of the first century.

---

<sup>4</sup> See L. T. Johnson, The Writings of the New Testament: An Interpretation, rev. ed. (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1999), 1–151.

A final preliminary comment is necessary if we are to properly assess the meaning of “Anti-Judaism” in the New Testament, namely the ambiguity of the term “Judaism” itself with reference to the period when the bulk of New Testament writings was written. I have already suggested that, whatever we mean by “Jewish,” the New Testament fits within it. But even the designation Ioudaios is polyvalent. It can designate a “Judean” in the narrow, geographical sense (as opposed, say, to a “Galilean”). But it can also—and at the same time—denote a “Jew” in the social/political/religious sense (as someone who claims the heritage of Abraham and is committed to the symbolic world of Torah).<sup>5</sup>

The term “Judaism,” in contrast, suggests a stable, clearly defined ethnic/social/religious reality that the writers of the New Testament could stand apart from (as in, “Christianity” did not equal “Judaism”), and stand over against (as in, “Christianity” was against “Judaism”). The difficulty of this way of speaking is that neither Christianity nor Judaism was such a well-defined entity in the first century. It was, rather, precisely the conflict and competition among rival Jewish claimants to the heritage of Israel through the first century, as well as the consequences of the catastrophic events associated with the Jewish war against Rome, that led to the eventual emergence of two discrete traditions claiming to represent the authentic Israel, that called Christianity—based on the experience of the crucified and raised Messiah Jesus—and that called (now non-anachronistically) Judaism—based on the observance of Torah according to the traditions of the Pharisees.

That point leads to the most complicating factor of all, namely the state of our sources. First, as sources for first-century Jewish life and practice, the New Testament compositions are contemporary to the writings of Philo and those produced by the sectarians at Qumran, but they predate by a small margin the writings of Josephus and some of the important apocalyptic writings (with the substantial exception of

---

<sup>5</sup> The suggestion of a purely geographical meaning in the Fourth Gospel was suggested by M. Lowe, “Who Were the IOUDAOI?” NovT 18 (1976): 101–130, and is discussed by J. Ashton, Understanding the Fourth Gospel (Oxford: Clarendon, 1991); see also W. Gutbrod, “Ioudaios, etc.,” in TDNT 3:369–91.

I Enoch), and by a large margin the compositions out of which we can construct the earliest stages of the “formative Judaism” based on Pharisaic conviction and Scribal expertise. What makes this situation embarrassing for historical reconstruction is that the New Testament and the Jewish writings contemporary to it do not speak directly to the same realities, whereas Josephus and the rabbinic writings cover much the same material as the New Testament writings, but from the perspective of a period slightly or considerably later than that of the New Testament.

The consequences of this situation are real. The gospel portrayal of the trial of Jesus before the Sanhedrin is sometimes declared unhistorical, for example, on the basis of the legislation found in the Mishnah’s tractate Sanhedrin.<sup>6</sup> Despite the oral tradition lying behind the composition of the Mishnah in 200 by Rabbi Judah the Prince, however, the Mishnah cannot serve that function, for two reasons: first, legislation written in 200 CE cannot be assumed to be in force in 30 CE; second, written legislation expresses a legal ideal, and cannot be used to preclude actual human behavior.

The second aspect of dating that complicates the discussion of “Anti-Judaism and the New Testament” is that involving the composition and subsequent canonization of the New Testament writings themselves. Let us stipulate that Jesus interacted with other Jews within Palestine between 28–30, that early communities such as those described in the Acts of the Apostles interacted with Jews in Palestine and the Diaspora between ca. 30–ca. 60, that Paul and his communities had dealings with Jews in the Diaspora between ca. 45–64, and that after the Jewish War in 70, tensions among Messianist and non-Messianist Jews intensified considerably. No New Testament writing is composed from the period of Jesus. Only the letters of Paul, the Letter to the Hebrews, and the Letter of James can reasonably be dated between 45–64, and, as epistolary literature, can be read as reporting on contemporary experiences. Similarly, the letters found in chs. 1–3 of the Book of Revelation speak of contemporary situations in Asia Minor ca. 96. The material in these compositions would be more valuable, if we could be sure that in all cases they are actually speaking about Jews or Judaism, but in at least some of Paul's letters, the rhetoric concerns "Judaizers," or Gentile believers who seek to be circumcised and live as Torah-observant Jews.

---

<sup>6</sup> See, for example, P. Winter, On the Trial of Jesus (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1961); E. Bammel, ed., The Trial of Jesus (Naperville, IL: Allenson, 1970); G. Sloyan, Jesus on Trial (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973). On the critical issue of Sanhedrin competence, see especially A. N. Sherwin-White, Roman Society and Roman Law in the New Testament (London: Oxford University Press, 1963), 24–47.

The situation with the gospels is more complicated. Although oral tradition and the composition of written sources like the hypothetical Q establish a genuine material link between Jesus and the gospels, it is now universally acknowledged that the selection and shaping of those materials in the gospels (composed between 70–90) are profoundly affected by the on-going experiences of communities. With respect to what the gospels report concerning Jews, this means that the struggles of nascent Christian communities with "the Synagogue down the street" between 50–90 affect the selection and shaping of traditions concerning Jesus' interaction with Jews in 28–30.<sup>7</sup> Understanding this helps in the interpretation of the rhetoric concerning Jews in the gospels, for it emerges from a context of contemporary conflict and competition. But it makes historical determinations concerning the period of Jesus more difficult. Can the importance given to the Pharisees as leaders of the people and as opponents of Jesus be taken as reliable, or should it be modified in light of the fact that the story of Jesus is being told in the context (and light) of the church's conflict with the "Synagogue down the street"?

The consequences of canonization are even more profound and potentially distorting. By the time the informal collections of Christian writings began to become standard—by the late second century CE—the separation between "Christianity" and "Judaism" is definitive, as Justin's Dialogue with Trypho makes clear. And by the fourth century, when official canonical lists ratified the collection that had become standard, Judaism was widely regarded by Christians as a religion of the past, superseded by the "New Covenant," whose claim to represent the true people of God was validated by the events of history (the conversion of the Gentiles, the destruction of the temple and the city). Christian "supersessionist" theology found its support in the compositions of the New Testament.<sup>8</sup> But now, those compositions were read, not as documentation of a struggle between rival claimants to Israel's heritage, but as the inspired and inerrant word of God. Now, for the first time, the New Testament's statements about Jews were taken as proclamations on "Judaism" as a religion, and were taken as divinely-sanctioned truth. More than that, the narrative roles and attitudes ascribed to Jews by the gospels were thenceforth taken as historically true.

---

<sup>7</sup> This is especially the case with the Gospel of Matthew: see Johnson, Writings of the New Testament, 187–211, and J. A. Overmann, Church and Community in Crisis: The Gospel according to Matthew (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1996).

<sup>8</sup> Classic early expressions of supersessionist theology are found in Origen's Against Celsus and Tertullian's Against the Jews.

Because such ways of reading the New Testament supported the hostile and often enough murderous behavior of Christians toward Jews over the centuries, it is natural, particularly after the horrific events of the Holocaust, that Christian scholars and theologians in particular, moved by moral revulsion at such results, should seek to correct the causes.<sup>9</sup> Some suggest the deconstruction of the canon and the consequent demotion of the New Testament from Sacred Scripture to classic texts.<sup>10</sup> Some advocate the abandonment of "Christology," since making claims about Jesus as Messiah and Lord are inevitably anti-Jewish.<sup>11</sup> Some recommend censorship, either through altering translations so that they appear less anti-Jewish, or through refusing authority to any text that seems to be anti-Jewish in character.<sup>12</sup> Such censorship, in fact, is practiced by many Christian churches through such translations and through the shaping of lectionaries used for liturgical proclamation of scripture. Still other scholars seek a remedy through historical correction of textual misattribution: texts that sound anti-Jewish are not directed to real Jews but to Gentile Judaizers;<sup>13</sup> Jesus was not opposed by good Pharisees from the School of Hillel, but by bad Pharisees from the School of Shammai;<sup>14</sup> no Jews were involved in the death of Jesus, but only Romans.<sup>15</sup>

---

<sup>9</sup> See, for example, the collection of essays in T. Linafelt, ed., A Shadow of Glory: Reading the New Testament after the Holocaust (New York: Routledge, 2002).

<sup>10</sup> For example, A. R. Eckhardt, Jews and Christians: The Contemporary Meeting (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1986).

<sup>11</sup> For example, R. R. Ruether, Faith and Fratricide: The Theological Roots of Anti-Semitism (New York: Seabury Press, 1974), esp. 246–251.

<sup>12</sup> See N. A. Beck, Mature Christianity: The Recognition and Repudiation of the Anti-Jewish Polemic of the New Testament (London and Toronto: Associated University Presses, 1985).

<sup>13</sup> Gager, The Roots of Anti-Semitism, esp. 112–117.

<sup>14</sup> H. Falk, Jesus the Pharisee: A New Look at the Jewishness of Jesus (New York: Paulist Press, 1985), esp. 148–161. The lack of human frailty among Jewish leaders is the theme of a number of statements collected by S. Van Tilborg, The Jewish Leaders in Matthew (Leiden: Brill, 1972), 25–26.

<sup>15</sup> See G. Vermes, Jesus and the World of Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress,

While such expedients are understandable, none of them adequately addresses the full complexity of the issues, above all because they do not deal sufficiently with the literary and rhetorical character of the New Testament compositions themselves. The present essay, therefore, does not offer a solution, but instead proposes a way of thinking through the complex tangle presented by the innocent-sounding title, "Anti-Judaism and the New Testament." I propose to approach the subject in three stages, considering first the question of historical and narrative roles ascribed to Jews; second, the rhetoric of vilification applied to Jews; and third, statements in the New Testament concerning the law or first covenant that could be taken as supporting supersessionism.

3. Historical and Narrative Roles

The distinction between the possible historical role Jews may have played with respect to Jesus and the early Christian movement, and the narrative depiction of that activity is a critical one, for the power of narrative goes considerably beyond the possible importance of the historical fact.

According to the gospels and Acts, some Jews (especially Pharisees and Scribes) opposed Jesus during his ministry, the Jewish leadership of Jerusalem was implicated in Jesus' execution, the Jewish leadership actively persecuted the first Christian community in Jerusalem and later sought Paul's death, and, according to Acts and Paul's letters, Jews of the Diaspora persecuted Paul. The impression given by these narratives that dominate the New Testament canon is that Jewish opposition to Jesus and his followers was total, consistent, and violent. Christians traditionally have taken these accounts as fully historical. To what extent do they have a historical basis, and to what extent do they represent an exaggeration?

Although it is certain that the final and formal responsibility for Jesus' execution by crucifixion lies with the Roman Prefect, a strong historical case can be made for the involvement of some Jewish leaders in the death of Jesus.<sup>16</sup> This is not to say that the narrative accounts concerning that involvement are in every respect accurate—there is no reason, for example, to claim a formal hearing before the Sanhedrin, when a “night court” session would have served as well—but only to say that there is high probability that elements of the Sanhedrin were involved in Jesus’ arrest and handing over to Pilate. The basis for regarding some such participation as basically historical is not simply the four canonical gospels, but three other converging lines of explicit evidence.

---

1983), and J. D. Crossan, Who Killed Jesus? Exposing the Roots of Anti-Semitism in the Gospel Story of the Death of Jesus (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1995).

The first support is Paul’s statement in 1 Thess 2:13–16. He tells the Thessalonians, “you suffered the same things from your countrymen that they [the churches in Judea] did from the Jews (Ioudaioi), who killed both the Lord Jesus and the prophets, and drove us out...” While some scholars regard this passage as an interpolation,<sup>17</sup> the arguments are not convincing. Even if not from Paul, furthermore, the statement is surely very early evidence for a view of Jesus’ death outside the gospel narratives. The second bit of evidence is Josephus’s statement in Antiquities of the Jews 18.64, which, stripped of its obvious Christian interpolations, provides a brief sketch of Jesus that includes these words, “And when Pilate, because of an accusation made by the leading men among us, condemned him to the cross...”<sup>18</sup> The final statement is the strange passage in the Babylonian Talmud, Tractate Sanhedrin 43a, which states that Jesus was “hanged” on Passover after a (more than fair) Jewish trial determining that he should be stoned for “leading the people astray” into apostasy, and for “sorcery.”<sup>19</sup> These accounts differ dramatically in detail, to be sure, but precisely such differences (like those in the gospels themselves) tend to support the fact on which they converge.

---

<sup>16</sup> In the recent debate on this point, I find more plausible the position held by R. E. Brown, The Death of the Messiah: From Gethsemane to the Grave: A Commentary on the Passion Narrative of the Four Gospels, 2 vols. (New York: Doubleday, 1998), than that held by Crossan, Who Killed Jesus?

<sup>17</sup> See B. A. Pearson, “1 Thess 2:13–16: A Deutero-Pauline Interpolation,” HTR 64 (1971): 79–94; D. Schmidt, “1 Thess 2:13–16: Linguistic Evidence for an Interpolation,” JBL 102 (1983): 269–279.

<sup>18</sup> For the argument concerning the basic trustworthiness of the expurgated version, see J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 4 vols. (New York: Doubleday, 1991–2009), 1:56–88.

<sup>19</sup> For a discussion of the passage, see F. F. Bruce, Jesus and Christian Origins outside the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974), 55–57.

The persecution of early Christian communities reported in Acts, in turn, is supported by Paul's statements about his own past activity (Gal 1:13; Phil 3:6; 1 Cor 15:8; 1 Tim 1:12–13), his report of his own series of whippings and stoning “at the hands of the Jews (Ioudaioi)” (2 Cor 11:23–27), and his suggestion that he is “still being persecuted” for allowing Gentiles admittance without circumcision, and that those who advocate circumcision are seeking to avoid persecution for the cross of Christ (Gal 5:11; 6:12).<sup>20</sup>

Josephus shows how the Jewish leadership could be involved in violence toward a prophet in Jerusalem (War 6.300–309), and he provides a vivid account of a delegation of Pharisees associated with the Sanhedrin sent to Galilee to arrest or kill Josephus there (Life 107–203). That Jews of first-century Palestine and Diaspora were in fact often fanatical and violent is clear, if even a portion of what Josephus reports in The Jewish War is accurate (see 1.89; 1.150; 1.571; 2.8–13; 2.42; 2.65; 2.169–70; 2.223; 2.229–230; 2.264–265; 2.408–409; 2.417; 2.466; 4.135; 4.197–207; 4.310–318; 4.378; 4.509; 7.367; 7.409; 7.437–441). Such violence and persecution is reported as well by the sectarians at Qumran (see 1QpHab VIII–XII).

For the New Testament to report the involvement of some Jews in the death of Jesus or the persecution of the earliest church does not by itself constitute “Anti-Judaism.” Nor is it a form of Anti-Judaism for present-day scholars to regard these statements as part of the historical record. Indeed, to suppress such facts is itself a form of disservice to historical truth. Even when that is said, however, it also remains true that determining the specific ways in which Jews were so involved remains an extraordinarily difficult aspect of studying the historical Jesus as well as nascent Christianity.

In the gospels and Acts, however, these historical realities are expressed through realistic narratives, and it is in the narrative role assigned the Jews that we begin to approach what might be called “Anti-Judaism”—bearing in mind the cautions concerning the use of the term mentioned above.

Realistic (“history-like”) narratives are authorial constructions that contain both fact and fiction. The story may be based on a historical fact. But in order to construct narrative, fictional techniques are required. Authors choose which materials to include, and how they are put together. Most of all, authors supply transitions, authorial commentary, and the motives behind actions. In a word, the author is in charge of plot, but to an even greater extent—because it is less publicly known and therefore more malleable—characterization. With regard to the portrayal of the Jews in the gospels and Acts, the narrative role they are assigned, and the characterization they are given, inevitably moved far beyond what could reasonably be called “historical.” Precisely the many small differences among the gospel accounts help us recognize the degree of creativity they employed in their portrayals.

---

<sup>20</sup> Despite his many minimizing qualifications, D. R. A. Hare acknowledges the fact of such persecution, in The Theme of Jewish Persecution of Christians in the Gospel according to Saint Matthew, SNTSMS 6 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1967), 19–79.

In terms of narrative role, we see that the highly probable involvement of some Jewish leaders in Jesus’ arrest and death becomes, in the gospel story, a consistent and united Jewish opposition to Jesus from the beginning—in Matthew, extending all the way back to Jesus’ birth (Matt 2:1–12)—and culminating in a formal trial before the Sanhedrin. It is certainly possible that some Scribes (in Luke, “Lawyers”) and Pharisees debated with Jesus during his ministry.<sup>21</sup> But their unified and consistent presence in the gospel narratives surely owes much to the experience of the evangelists and the “Synagogue down the street,” especially since the matters debated by Jesus and the Pharisees so much correspond to the sort of issues dividing church and synagogue in the period before the final separation. And it is surely authorial creativity that has these Jewish leaders plot to kill him from the start of his ministry (Mark 3:6)!

The tendency to standardize “Jewish Opposition” reaches its fullest expression in the Fourth Gospel. In the synoptic gospels, Jesus confronts various groups (Herodians, Pharisees, Scribes, Sadducees), whose specific objections to him correspond to what we know historically about the sects (see Mark 12:13–37). These groups, in turn, tend to disappear in the passion account, replaced by the members of the Sanhedrin (chief priests, elders, and Scribes). In John’s Gospel, the differentiation between Jewish groups is minimal: mostly there are “the Jews,” who, together with Pilate, serve to represent within the narrative the unbelieving world that prefers the darkness to the light offered through the coming of God's son (John 9:18–22; 12:35–50). It is perhaps worth noting that Matthew and Luke each use the term Ioudaios five times, and Mark uses it six times. But in John, Ioudaios occurs some seventy-one times. In the same way, when Luke's narrative turns to the story of the early church, the use of Ioudaios accelerates, and reaches a total of some seventy-nine occurrences (contrast the twenty-six uses in all of Paul's letters). Such word-choice represents a form of identity-construction.

---

<sup>21</sup> It even becomes probable, if Jesus’ did in fact associate with “tax-collectors and sinners” (see Luke 15:1–2), and challenged the very probable Pharisaic preoccupation—before the destruction of the Temple—with purity in fellowship (see J. Neusner, From Politics to Piety: The Emergence of Pharisaic Judaism [Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1973], and A. J. Saldarini, Pharisees, Scribes and Sadducees in Palestinian Society: A Sociological Approach [Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1988]).

It is similarly an authorial decision on the part of Matthew to have all the people cry out in response to Pilate's protestation of innocence, "His blood be on us, and on our children" (Matt 27:25). And when John attributes the Jewish Council's decision to put Jesus to death to the fear of Rome's coming to destroy the holy place and nation (John 11:48), or when Luke attributes the persecution of the apostles to jealousy (zelos) on the part of Jews (Acts 5:17; 13:45; 17:5), we are far from sober historiography and into straightforward, if negative, character-construction.

The power of narrative is such that Christians through the ages who have found the positive character of Jesus disclosed through the gospels and have accepted that characterization as true, have also accepted as true the construction of the character of those who have been portrayed as a unified and consistent opposition to Jesus and his message. And if Jesus represents all that is good, it follows that those who oppose him must also represent the rejection of all that is good. When such perceptions are embedded in narratives that are regarded as inspired and infallible—without any critical engagement with those convictions—the conclusion can all too easily be drawn that the character of ancient Jews, thus portrayed, applies also to present-day Jews. The topic of characterization within New Testament narratives brings us to the wider issue of the negative language employed about Jews throughout the New Testament.

4. Anti-Jewish Slander and Ancient Rhetoric

The New Testament contains a considerable amount of slander directed against Jewish opponents, sometimes in the mouth of Jesus.<sup>22</sup> A classic example is Matt 23:1–39. Jesus attacks scribes and Pharisees, calling them hypocrites (23:13, 15, 23, 25, 27, 29), blind guides (23:16), white-washed tombs (23:27), serpents and brood of vipers (23:33), and children of hell (23:15). They are denounced as vainglorious (23:5–7), posturing in public (23:27–28), preoccupied with trivia rather than real religion (23:23–24), concerned for outer not inner righteousness (23:25–26), and as the murderers of the prophets and of Jesus' own emissaries (23:32–36). In addition to a passage parallel to Matthew's, addressed to lawyers and Pharisees (Luke 11:37–52), Luke adds that the Pharisees had "rejected God's plan for them" (7:30), and in an apparently gratuitous aside, calls the Pharisees "lovers of money" (16:14).

---

<sup>22</sup> A fuller treatment of this topic can be found in L. T. Johnson, "The New Testament's Anti-Jewish Slander and the Conventions of Ancient Polemic," JBL 108 (1989): 419–441.

John's Gospel contains a number of passages containing such characterizations. In dispute with those called simply "the Jews," for example, Jesus says, "You are of your father, the devil, and your will is to do your father's desires. He was a murderer from the beginning, and has nothing to do with the truth... He who is of God hears the words of God; the reason you do not hear them is that you are not of God" (John 8:44–47). John offers this explanation for Jesus' rejection: "...many even of the authorities believed in him, but for fear of the Pharisees they did not confess it, lest they should be put out of the synagogue, for they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God" (John 12:42–43). The Book of Revelation—also from Johannine Christianity—contributes this statement, placed in the mouth of the risen Jesus: "Behold, I will make those of the synagogue of Satan, those who say they are Jews, but are not and lie—behold I will make them come and bow before your feet and learn that I have loved you" (Rev 3:9).

Paul, despite the positive things he says about his "kinsmen by race" (see Rom 2:17–20; 3:1–2; 9:1–5; 11:28), can refer to those who read Moses without reference to Christ, this way: "even if our gospel is veiled, it is veiled only to those who are perishing. In their case, the god of this world has blinded the minds of unbelievers, to keep them from seeing the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the likeness of God" (2 Cor 4:3). In Romans, he says that a part of Israel (that has not converted to faith in Jesus) is, "as regards the gospel, the enemies of God, for your sake" (Rom 11:28). In the same letter, he says of Jews who know but do not keep the law, "The name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles because of you" (Rom 3:24). In Philippians, Paul refers to "the dogs, the evil-doers, who mutilate the flesh," and later to "the enemies of the cross of Christ, their end is destruction, their god is the belly, they glory in their shame, with minds set on earthly things” (Phil 3:1–2, 18–19). Concerning the Jews who killed Jesus and the prophets and drove him out, Paul tells the Thessalonians, they “displease God and oppose all men by hindering us from speaking to the Gentiles so that they might be saved—so as always to fill up the measure of their sin. But God’s wrath has come upon them at last” (1 Thess 2:15–16). Finally, the Letter of Titus refers to those “from the circumcision party” as teaching “for base gain what they have no right to teach,” as “giving heed to Jewish myths or commands of men who reject the truth,” and says: “to the corrupt and unbelieving, nothing is pure; their very minds and consciences are corrupted. They profess to know God, but they deny him by their deeds. They are detestable, disobedient, unfit for any good deed” (Tit 1:11–16).

Here we have “characterization” on a large scale, even apart from the playing of narrative roles. Since the power of such language to shape hostile and destructive attitudes and actions toward Jews is well documented, it is all the more important that we understand the origins and function of such language, in order better to assess how to think about it in contemporary circumstances. In the following section I will first sketch the historical and social context that generated such language. Then, I will place the polemical language of the New Testament against Jews (and, we remember, Judaizers) in the context of the conventional rhetoric of slander in the Hellenistic world. The question is, why did Messianists utter such slander, and how would their slander be heard back then?

4.1 Historical Circumstances

We must start by deconstructing the image of an imperially privileged, powerful, and Jew-persecuting Christianity of the fourth and subsequent centuries, and transport ourselves imaginatively to the years 35–100 of the Common Era. In that period, Judaism had every advantage in terms of age, presence, and authority, especially in comparison to a fledgling messianic sect. There were some seven million Jews in the empire, and only thousands of Messianists. In an age that honored antiquity, Jews traced a history of two thousand years, while the Christ cult was born yesterday. Jews had interacted with and influenced Hellenistic culture for hundreds of years; Christians would not even be noticed by a Roman writer until the early second century. Before its destruction, the Temple in Jerusalem was a wonder of the world; so were synagogues like that at Sardis. Messianists met in houses and lecture halls. If archaeological evidence alone counted, Christianity did not exist until the late second century.<sup>23</sup>

The first thing we might anticipate in New Testament rhetoric, therefore, would be a compensatory leap across this very real gap in power and prestige. Abuse tends to increase in power when it is powerless. A second predictable and unexceptional feature of the New Testament's rhetoric is its defensive quality, since the symbols of Torah so much more obviously belonged to and so much more evidently were in the control of the dominant group, rather than to the messianist upstarts. We might expect the New Testament's rhetoric also to reflect the hostility of the persecuted toward those who seek them harm; "affliction and persecution" entered early into the Christian psyche and remained there powerfully.

But even to make such "Judaism vs. Christianity" comparisons—however useful they are for adjusting our perspective and avoiding anachronism—is itself distorting and anachronistic, for in the period when the New Testament compositions were written there was not yet a stable "Christianity" nor for that matter a stable "Judaism."

4.2 A Diverse Messianic Movement

The messianic sect was diverse from the beginning.<sup>24</sup> Jews from all over the Diaspora were converted on Pentecost (Acts 2:1–41), and groups called "Hellenists" and "Hebrews" quickly emerged and fell into dispute (Acts 6:1–3). The sect's rapid spread across the empire was a stunning success story, but the consequences of such rapid expansion, without strong internal or external controls, was that Christianity was a new invention wherever it appeared. The few attempts at structural or ideological control were not notably successful (see Acts 15:6–29). There was no long period of stability during which self-definition could be consolidated, and for the first fifty years, there was no one realization that could be called “Christianity” as a standard by which to measure deviance. There was, rather, a loose network of assemblies on the fringe of synagogues and in lecture halls and households, whose boundaries of self-definition were vigorously debated.

---

<sup>23</sup> On the social status of first-generation Christians, see the standard treatment by W. A. Meeks, The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1983). If the revisionist view of J. J. Meggitt is accepted, the social status must be lowered even further; see Paul, Poverty and Survival (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1998).

<sup>24</sup> "It is now as much a dogma of scholarship as its opposite used to be: orthodoxy is not the presupposition of the church but the result of growth and development," G. W. MacRae, "Why the Church Rejected Gnosticism," in Jewish and Christian Self-Definition, 1: The Shaping of Christianity in the Second and Third Centuries, ed. E. P. Sanders (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980), 127.

The first concern of such communities was survival. Only energy left over from upkeep and maintenance could go into the reinterpretation of symbols shared with others calling themselves Jews. Rejection of the messianic claim from within the synagogue was an important stimulus for such reinterpretation of Torah. By the time the first Christian writings appear, however, even that stage is already passed. Only the residue of such apologetic remains, in the literary forms of testimonia and messianic midrash. A larger concern for such communities was the threat to stability caused by disagreements and disputes from within, disputes concerning eschatology, diet, sex, authority, status, work, and the use of possessions. Were they to be, for example, an egalitarian assembly? Or, were they to be like other cults, many-tiered, with multiple initiations and stages of perfection? Elitists such as “the strong” in Corinth, the ascetical mystics of Colossae, the legalists at Ephesus, and the Judaizers in Galatia and Crete, advanced such perfectionistic options, and threatened to split communities.

In response to these pressures, the greatest amount of New Testament polemic is turned inward against fellow members of the movement.<sup>25</sup> Outsiders are addressed only indirectly. Paul’s polemic in Galatians, for example, does not concern Judaism as such, but the specific claims of Gentile Messianists who seek to impose circumcision and Torah-observance on other Gentile believers. In plain fact, no New Testament writer was in a position to adjudicate “Judaism” as such. The main reason is that “Judaism as such” did not yet exist, but a second reason is that “Christianity as such” did not yet exist, either.

4.3 Diversity among First-Century Jews

The myth of normative Judaism is even harder to deconstruct.<sup>26</sup> Despite the overwhelming evidence that first-century Jews were diverse and

<sup>25</sup> So, correctly, Gager, Origins of Anti-Semitism, 112–117.

<sup>26</sup> The standard scholarly construction of “normative Judaism” is G. F. Moore, Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era, 2 vols. (New York: Schocken, even deeply divided, there remains a tendency to accept as historical the founding myth of the Pharisaic tradition—the myth that says things were before the fall of the Temple as they were after, that the formation of Mishnah and Talmud made nothing fundamentally new but only consolidated what had been there all along.<sup>27</sup>

In such a mythic understanding, the some five million Jews of the Diaspora were not quite “really Jewish,” although they outnumbered Jews in Palestine by two to one; the Essenes were a “deviant sect” and the Messianists were “not Jewish”—even though each of these groups claimed allegiance to the symbols of Torah. But such judgments defy the best historical evidence, which makes clear that the question, “Who is a real Jew?” was an open one, fiercely and even violently disputed by rival claimants throughout the first century. Even if Judaism is defined as an adherence to the symbols of Temple and Torah, the extant literature from the period shows that these symbols in particular were a matter of debate: Which Torah? Consisting in which books? In which language? Interpreted from what standpoint? Which Temple, and run by which priesthood?

A properly historical perspective recognizes that Jews in Alexandria were no less Jews because they used allegory rather than Midrash, nor that those who called themselves “the keepers” and observed Torah and awaited a prophet like Moses, were no less part of Jewish tradition because they worshipped in a rival temple at Mount Gerizim—and were not considered to be Jews by their Judean rivals. Similarly, the Essenes were no less Jews because they challenged the priesthood in Jerusalem and declared themselves to represent a “new covenant.” In such perspective, the Christian claims about the way to read Torah and the proper understanding of God’s Temple represent only one more voice in an already contentious conversation.<sup>28</sup> 1927). He states, “Much of what we otherwise know only in the rabbinic sources of the first and second centuries after our era was custom and law in the preceding centuries” (1:71).

---

<sup>27</sup> Even so sophisticated a scholar as G. Vermes, who is capable of refined methodological statements, can in practice operate according to the narrowed norm in Jesus and the World of Judaism, 74–77.

<sup>28</sup> For a survey of the practices and beliefs of all the Palestinian groups, including the “people of the land,” see E. P. Sanders, Judaism: Practice and Belief 63 BCE–66 CE (London: SCM, 1992). For some of the complexity involving Jewish self-definition in the first and second centuries, see the essays in E. P. Sanders, A. I. Baumgarten, and A. Mendelson, eds., Jewish and Christian Self-Definition, 2: Judaism in the Greco-Roman Period (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981).

Some of our best evidence for diversity and debate among Jews of the first century is found in the New Testament itself. The gospels and Acts sort out Scribes, Pharisees, Sadducees, and Samaritans, together with some notion of the disputations and mutual recriminations.<sup>29</sup> A still more diverse mixture is found in the earliest Christian letters, written decades before the war with Rome. Did Colossian ascetics get their inspiration from Essenes, or Merkabah mystics?<sup>30</sup> Were Paul's rivals in Corinth connected to a Hellenistic Jewish mission?<sup>31</sup> Were those influencing the Gentile "Judaizers" in Galatia Pharisees, and were they the same as those "from the circumcision party" in Crete?<sup>32</sup> Was the intended audience for "The Letter to the Hebrews" made up of Gentiles with only a literary interest in Torah, or Alexandrian Jews, or ex-priests, or former members of the Qumran sect, or Diaspora Jews on pilgrimage in Jerusalem?<sup>33</sup> We do not, and perhaps cannot, know the answers to these questions. But how odd it would be, if all the Jews encountered by the first Christians were not "real Jews" by the mythic reckoning. But they were real Jews, with all the complex coloration of genuine historical persons, rather than the monochromatic consistency of myth. And in addition there were those Jews whose opinions never reached literary expression, but nevertheless shared in a variety of ways in the complex cultural mix.<sup>34</sup>

In short, when the New Testament writings were composed, neither Christianity nor Judaism had reached the point of uniformity and separation that would characterize them in subsequent centuries. The Messianists were part of a much larger debate within Judaism, a debate

---

<sup>29</sup> Passages such as Mark 7:1–23, in fact, are essential for discerning a line of continuity within the Pharisaic tradition, since it shows the same concerns shown in m. Demai 2:3; see J. Neusner, "The Fellowship (chaburah) in the Second Jewish Commonwealth," HTR 53 (1960): 125–142.

<sup>30</sup> See the essays in W. A. Meeks and F. O. Francis, eds., Conflict at Colossae, SBS 4, rev. ed. (Missoula: Scholars Press, 1975).

<sup>31</sup> As in D. Georgi, The Opponents of Paul in 2 Corinthians: A Study of Religious Propaganda in Late Antiquity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985).

<sup>32</sup> See B. H. Brinsmead, Galatians—Dialogical Response to Opponents, SBLDS 65 (Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1982).

<sup>33</sup> See C. Spicq, L'Épître aux Hébreux, 2 vols., EB (Paris: J. Gabalda, 1952), and G. W. Buchanan, To The Hebrews, AB 36 (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1972), 255–267.

<sup>34</sup> See, for example, R. A. Horsley (with J. S. Hanson), Bandits, Prophets and Messiahs: Popular Religious Movements at the Time of Jesus (San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1985).

with many parties, concerning the right way to read Torah, the text that shaped this people.

With respect to the quest for the historical Jesus, this diversity within first-century Judaism is a fundamental problem in trying to “place” Jesus within first-century Palestine, and it must be said that researchers tend to give notional assent to the diversity while in practice isolating one strand that can be made sufficiently stable to enable something to be said about “Jesus the Jew.”<sup>35</sup>

4.4 The Social Setting of Rival Schools

The polemic of the New Testament becomes more intelligible if it is placed in the social context in which such slander was at home, and if the conventions of such slander are understood. The slander in the New Testament is typical of that found among rival claimants to a philosophical tradition, and it is found as widely among Jews as among other Hellenists. The way the New Testament talks about Jews is the way all opponents talked about each other in antiquity. The language appears more shocking to contemporary readers precisely because they do not understand the context or the conventions.

The basic adjustment here is to think of first-century Judaism as a philosophy. But this is, in fact, the way it was perceived, both by outsiders and Jews themselves. Josephus describes the sects of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes as philosophies not only because he was hellenized, but because they were (War 2.119–66; Ant. 18.11–25). According to Artapanus (Frag. 3.4) and Eupolemus (Frag. 1), Judaism was the oldest and best philosophy. Philo’s entire literary production was based on the same premise. The social arrangements of teachers and students, the activities of reading and interpreting and memorizing, the patterns of fellowship, are all uniform across the Hellenistic world. When we speak of the House of Hillel, then, we speak of a philosophical party. When we speak of the School of Saint Matthew, or the Pauline School, we mean, or ought to mean, the same thing.

---

<sup>35</sup> A classic example is found in the work of N. T. Wright. In The New Testament and the People of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994), he carefully nodded toward diversity within Judaism, but quickly reduced his focus to Palestine and the prophetic/Pharisaic stream; then in Jesus and the Victory of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996), he develops his portrait of Jesus completely against this static—and deeply non-historical—Jewish backdrop. See L. T. Johnson, “A Historiographical Response to Wright’s Jesus,” in Jesus and the Restoration of Israel: A Critical Assessment of N. T. Wright’s Jesus and the Victory of God, ed. C. C. Newman (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1999), 206–224, 315–316. The same tendency is found in a milder form in E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985) and in a more acute form in G. Vermes, Jesus the Jew: A Historian’s Reading of the Gospels (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973) and M. Borg, Jesus a New Vision: Spirit, Culture and the Life of Discipleship (San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1987). It is less present in J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1991), and is missing entirely in Meier’s A Marginal Jew.

The nature of philosophy in the Hellenistic period perfectly matched the character of Judaism. Philosophy had become less a matter of metaphysics than of morals. One converted to the philosophical life by leaving vice and seeking virtue. Philosophy was a way of life embraced by many with religious fervor; salvation was at stake. But while the general character and goals of philosophy were universally acknowledged, the best way to realize that character and reach those goals was a matter of fierce disputation.<sup>36</sup> The ancient schools of the classical period continued to win adherents and debate their respective doctrines and practices. And since philosophers appeared in a variety of social roles (court advisors, school masters, wandering preachers), both theory and life-style were matters of frequent debate. School teachers tended to see street preachers as charlatans, while Cynics saw school-teachers as armchair critics. Over the centuries, a stereotyped polemic developed in which such disputes found conventional expression. This is the context, and these are the conventions, that best explain the language about Jews in the New Testament.

4.5 The Rhetoric of Vilification

In the space available, only a taste of the actual rhetoric can be provided. We can begin with the rivalry between public speakers. Dio of Prusa had been a rhetorician before his conversion to philosophy (Oration 13), but castigates his former colleagues as “ignorant, boastful, self-deceived” (Or. 4.33)...“evil-spirited” (4.38)...“liars and deceivers” (12.12). They preach for the sake of gain and glory and only their own benefit (32.30), are flatterers, charlatans, and sophists (23.11), boastful and shameless (55.7), and demagogues (77/78. 27). He can say all these things even though he admits that some rhetoricians act for good (35.9–10). His polemic has to do not with specific actions but with typical ones. Any teacher of whom you disapprove can be a sophist or charlatan. Rhetoricians were more than able to answer. In the second of his Platonic Discourses, for example, Aelius Aristides defends the public-spiritedness of sophists, attacking in turn those calling themselves philosophers: “they despise others while being themselves worthy of scorn. They criticize others without examining themselves. They make a great show of virtue and never practice it” (307.6). He says they have the outward form of virtue but are inwardly corrupt (307.10), they are only after pleasure and wealth (307.15). Like Dio, he issues a disclaimer: he is not against philosophy, only those who abuse it (310.8).

---

<sup>36</sup> A classic, and highly readable, treatment of philosophy in its various social contexts is S. Dill, Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius (1907; reprint, New York: Meridian, 1956), 289–440.

The disputes between philosophical schools concerning the merits of their respective doctrines often descended to attacks on character. Plutarch, priest of Apollo at Delphi, was the most urbane and learned of ancient philosophers, wide in his sympathies. Although he considers Jews to exemplify superstition, for example (Superstition 8), he shows only mild curiosity about their customs and shows no real hostility toward them (Table-Talk 4.4–6.2). What this shows is simply that Jews did not matter to him. When it came to rival schools that he took seriously, the tolerant Plutarch could turn ugly. Colotes, a disciple of Epicurus, had high-handedly attacked some of Plutarch’s philosophical heroes, calling them “buffoons, charlatans, assassins, prostitutes, nincompoops” (Reply to Colotes, Mor. 1086E). In his angry retort, Plutarch repeats the gossip that Epicureans had prostitutes in their community (Mor. 1129B), and the standard charge that the essence of Epicureanism is its “lack of friends, absence of activity, irreligion, and indifference” (Mor. 1100C). They are “sophists and charlatans” (Mor. 1124C). We find such language everywhere. Epictetus declares to Epicureans, “your doctrines are bad, subversive of the state, destructive of the family, not fit even for women” (Discourse 3.7.21).

Such charges became standard, so that certain things were said about all opponents. Their teaching was self-contradictory, or trivial, or led to bad morals. Their behavior could be criticized in two different ways. Either they preached but did not practice (showing they were hypocrites), or they lived as they taught, and their manner of life showed the falsity of their doctrines (like the Epicureans). Certain vices were indiscriminately applied to opponents on every side: they were all lovers of pleasure, lovers of money, lovers of glory.<sup>37</sup>

---

<sup>37</sup> For love of pleasure (philedonia), see Epictetus, Discourse 1.9.19–21; 2.4.1–11; Lucian, Timon 84; for the love of money (philargyria), see Philostratus, Life of

The purpose of such polemic is not so much the effective rebuttal of opponents as their discrediting in the eyes of one's own party. Polemic was primarily for internal consumption. This makes more intelligible the secondary, literary use of such polemic within protreptic discourses that encouraged someone to follow a certain philosophy. In these discourses, polemic is used to provide a negative counter-image to the positive ideal of the true philosopher (as in Lucian, Demonax; Dio, Oration 77/78). This is the way Paul uses such polemic in Philippians 2–3 and 2 Timothy 2–3.<sup>38</sup>

And the same protreptic purpose is clear in Matthew 23, the classic text containing abuse against Jewish teachers. Its literary and rhetorical function is turned inward to Matthew's messianic readers.<sup>39</sup> Matthew's attack on Scribes and Pharisees is an attack on rival teachers, and serves to frame the positive instructions of messianic disciples (mathetai = students) in 23:8–11. They are to be the "Scribes of the kingdom" (Matt 13:51; 23:34) in the "School of Saint Matthew," who do not call their teacher "Rabbi" but have as their one instructor (kathēgetes) the Messiah (23:10). Familiarity with the debates among Hellenistic philosophers makes instantly recognizable the reference to the "chair of Moses" (23:2) occupied by these rival Jewish teachers, who "preach but do not practice" (23:3), who love the place of honor at feasts (23:6), and who are "hypocrites" (23:13), outwardly righteous but inwardly full of iniquity (23:28).

4.6 Jewish Rhetoric of Vilification

Since Judaism considered itself to be and was perceived as a philosophy, it is not surprising to find the same polemical conventions in Jewish literature, most obviously in Hellenistic Jewish writings. Josephus responds to the scurrilous attacks of Apion, for example, by using such standard slander. Apion has "the mind of an ass and the impu-

---

Apollonius 1.34; Dio Chrysostom, Or. 32.9; 35.1; for love of glory (philodoxia), see Dio Chrysostom, Or. 32.10–11; Lucian, Peregrinus 20, 42.

<sup>38</sup> On 2 Timothy, see L. T. Johnson, "II Timothy and the Polemic against False Teachers: A Re-Examination," JRS 6/7 (1978–79): 1–26.

<sup>39</sup> See S. Freyne, "Vilifying the Other and Defining the Self: Matthew's and John's Anti-Jewish Polemic in Focus," in To See Ourselves as Others See Us: Christians, Jews, "Others" in Late Antiquity, Scholars Press Studies in the Humanities (Chico, CA: Scholars Press), 117–143.

dence of a dog, which his countrymen are wont to worship" (Apion 2.86), he is a liar (2.12; 2.86), engages in "malicious slander" (2.89), and has a "mendacious character" (2.12). He is a low charlatan (2.3; 2.136), ignorant (2.26), a fool (2.37), and stupid (2.142). His mind is "blinded" (1.142). He and his fellow attackers of Jews are "reprobate sophists and deceivers of youth," and "crazy fools" (2.236; 2.254). Philo also can use such language about Gentile opponents. He calls Alexandrians "promiscuous and unstable rabble" (Lejat. 18.120), "more brutal and savage than fierce wild beasts" (19.131), they are "adepts at flattery and imposture and hypocrisy" (25.162), a "seed bed of evil" (26.166).

Jews in Alexandria also knew how to strike first. Philo disparages the idol worship of the Egyptians, calling it incurable folly, and those who practice it, blind (Contempl. 1.8–9; 2.10). And the Wisdom of Solomon provides a virtual catalogue of slander against pagan Egyptians in its attack on "those who do not know God" because they are "foolish by nature" (Wis 13:1): they "live in great strife due to ignorance...they kill children in their initiations...they no longer keep themselves or their marriages pure, but they either treacherously kill each other or grieve one another by adultery...theft and deceit, corruption, faithlessness, tumult, perjury...sex perversion, disorder in marriage, adultery and debauchery...their worshipers either rave in exaltation, or prophesy lies, or readily commit perjury" (Wis 14:22–28). Both Jewish and Christians are so inured to such "attacks on idolatry" that they do not hear the inflammatory character of such language directed to one's neighbors. In the Diaspora, the language was rough both ways, and thoroughly within the conventions of Hellenistic slander.

We must also ask how Jews spoke about each other when they disagreed. Josephus again gives us the fullest evidence. He castigates Justus of Tiberius as "a charlatan and a demagogue and a deceiver" (Life 9). His most sustained attacks are against the Zealots and Sicarii, whom he blames for the war with Rome and the profanation of the Temple: "What have you done that is blessed by the lawgiver, what deed that he has cursed have you left undone...in rapine and murder you vie with one another...the Temple has become the sink of all, and native hands have polluted those divine precincts" (War 5.400–402). The Sicarii are "imposters and brigands" (2.264), "slaves, the dregs of society, and the bastard scum of the nation" (5.433–444).

They are more wicked than Sodom (5.566), for their “cruelty... avarice... atrocities,” and their “lying... oppression... evil” (7.255–258). Among them were “charlatans and false prophets” (6.288). Josephus says that the Zealots have profaned the Temple so that it is no longer God’s dwelling place (5.419), so that the destruction of the Temple is a punishment from God (6.110), a vengeance from heaven for the guilt of the Zealots (2.455).

When we turn to Jews in Palestine, we encounter the familiar problem of sources. Apart from some apocalyptic writings, the Qumran Scrolls, and the New Testament itself, direct evidence from the first century is fragmentary, especially for the Pharisaic movement. The pieces that remain, however, are sufficient to suggest the same sort of many-voiced and contentious polemic we have seen in the Hellenistic Jewish writings, particularly when placed in the context of Josephus’s vivid portrayal of divided and fratricidal population. We have hints of Judean polemic against Samaritans (Josephus, War 3.308; Sir 50:28; John 4:9; 8:48; m. Ned. 3:10; m. Qidd. 4:3; m. Git. 1:5; m. Nid. 7:4, 4:1–2; m. Ber. 8:8; m. Demai 3:4, 5:9; m. Seb. 8:10). There are a few passages regarding am-ha-aretz that suggest a history of polemic now turned to protreptic use (see m. Hor. 3:9; Abot R. Nat. 2:6; 5:10). And there is the (often quite bitter) Jewish polemic from the side of “the pious” against those called “sinners” or “unrighteous” found in texts such as 4 Ezra 7.17–25; 1 En. 12.5; 15.9–10; 94.6–11; 95.4–7; 96.4–8; 104.7–13; and Pss Sol. 2.3–18; 4.1–20; 8.10–18; 14.6–10; 15.8–14.

The relative paucity of such materials from other groups is more than compensated by the sectarians at Qumran, who expressed an extreme hostility toward all outsiders, not excepting those Jews who did not agree with their interpretation of themselves as God’s new covenant. The group’s ideology divided the world between the “sons of light,” who belong to the sect, and “sons of darkness” who do not (1 QS I, 10; III, 13; 1 QM I, 7). At Qumran, it was impossible to say enough bad things about outsiders. They are “sons of the pit” (1 QS IX, 16; CD VI, 15; XIII, 14), who come from the spirit of falsehood and are ruled by an angel of darkness (1 QS III, 9–21; V, 2, 10). God hates them and has a vengeance planned for them. The Community Rule regards outsiders as having “greed and slackness in the search for righteousness, wickedness and lies, haughtiness and pride, falseness and deceit, cruelty and abundant evil, ill-temper and much folly and brazen insolence, abominable deeds committed in a spirit of lust, and ways of lewdness in the service of uncleanness, a blaspheming tongue, blindness of eye and dullness of ear, stiffness of neck and heaviness of heart, so that a man walks in all the ways of darkness and guile" (1QS IV, 9–14).

One of the rituals of the sect involved shouting curses against such "men of the lot of Satan" in this manner: "Be cursed of all your guilty wickedness! May he deliver you up to torture at the hands of all the wreakers of revenge! Be cursed without mercy because of the darkness of your deeds! May God not hear when you call upon him, nor pardon you by blotting out your sin! May he raise his angry face toward you for vengeance! May there be no peace for you in the mouths of those who hold fast to the fathers!" (1QS II, 4–10). All of this, it should be emphasized, is directed not against the Kittim, the Gentiles, but against other Jews who do not match the sectarians' ideas of purity, those whom the War Scroll calls "the ungodly of the covenant" (1QM I, 2).

The New Testament polemic against Jews appears in a new light when placed in the context of the conventional rhetoric used in disputes between ancient schools, and enables several conclusions. First, the New Testament's polemic appears more intelligible. The great problem with the "historical vindication" approach is that it leaves the New Testament polemic unmotivated: if Jews were so blameless, why were the Christians so nasty? But this survey shows such language used everywhere in the diverse and disputatious tradition called Judaism in the first century. Readers today hear the New Testament's polemic as inappropriate because the other voices are silent. Historical imagination can restore them.

Second, by the measure of Hellenistic conventions, and certainly by the measure of contemporary intra-Jewish polemic, the New Testament's slander against fellow Jews is remarkably mild. Indeed, the New Testament's rhetoric against Gentiles—where, in fact, it makes use of standard Jewish polemic against Gentiles—is far harsher (see Matt 6:7, 32; Rom 1:18–32; 1 Cor 6:9–11; Eph 2:11–12; 1 Thess 4:5, 13; Tit 1:12; 1 Pet 1:14, 18; 4:3–4), as is the polemic used against those regarded as deviant within the messianic movement (see 2 Cor 11:1–6, 14–21; 2 Tim 2:14–3:9; 2 Pet 2:1–22; Jude 5–19; 1 John 2:18–25; 2 John 7; Rev 2:13–29).

Third, the conventional nature of the rhetoric means that its chief import is connotative rather than denotative: the polemic simply signifies that these are opponents and such things can and should be said about them. The attempt either to convict first-century Jews of hypocrisy or vindicate them from it is irrelevant as well as futile.

Fourth, grasping the historical situation and social setting within which such language was shaped helps us understand it as a function of community-identification among disputants to a shared tradition. Once that context is lost, and the New Testament is taken as speaking inerrantly about the nature of Jews (or Gentiles) with such language, then real mischief can arise.

5. Declarations on Law, Covenant, and People

The final aspect of “Anti-Judaism and the New Testament” has to do with the various statements made by the New Testament that would seem to support a supersessionist theology. Some of these are narrative statements that speak of the rejection of Jews because of their rejection of Jesus or the gospel. Others take the form of propositions concerning law and covenant within epistolary arguments.

An example of the first is the application of Isa 6:9–10 (which speaks of the blindness of the people preventing their conversion) to Jewish characters. In Mark 4:12, it is made part of Jesus’ speech in regard to his speaking in parables; in Matt 13:14–15, Jesus cites the passage in full as being “fulfilled” in those who do not understand his teaching, in contrast to those insiders who do understand (13:16–17). In John 12:38–43, the passage is cited by the evangelist at the end of Jesus’ public ministry in support of the position that “the Jews” loved the praise of men more than the praise of God. Luke does not cite the passage in his gospel narrative, but saves it for the end of Acts, where Paul applies the full citation to the Jewish brethren whom he was trying to persuade, and where, again, it stands in contrast to a positive statement, “Let it be known to you, then, that this salvation of God has been sent to the Gentiles. They will listen” (Acts 28:25–28).

Another example is Jesus’ parable of the wicked husbandmen in the synoptic gospels. In Mark 12:1–11, the story of the tenants who reject the owner’s emissaries and then kill his son concludes with the statement, “What will the owner of the vineyard do? He will come and destroy the tenants and give the vineyard to others” (12:9). This statement is followed by the citation of Ps 118:22–23 (understood in terms of the rejection of Jesus), and the authorial comment that “They perceived that he had told the parable against them” (12:12). Luke’s version (Luke 20:1–18) mitigates the harsh application of the parable: the people take it as a warning and say “God forbid,” but the Scribes and chief priests sought an opportunity to arrest him “for they perceived that he had told this parable against them.” Matthew, in contrast, exacerbates the implication of the parable’s conclusion by having Jesus state, “Therefore I tell you, the kingdom of God will be taken away from you and given to a nation producing the fruits of it” (Matt 21:33–44).

Such harsh passages do not stand alone, and can be countered by other passages that express a more positive view of Jews within God’s plan. In the narrative logic of Acts, for example, the restored Israel includes thousands of Jews, so that the mission of the Gentiles is seen as an extension rather than a replacement of the historical Israel (see Acts 15:15–19). And Paul’s argument in Romans 9–11 hopes for this culmination of God’s work in history, “Thus all Israel will be saved” (Rom 11:26). But although Paul answered his own question, “Has God rejected his people?” (Rom 11:1) in the negative, it must be acknowledged that the statements with the opposite point predominate and their effect must seriously be considered.

In assessing such narrative statements, everything that was said in this essay earlier about historical context and narrative roles needs to be kept in mind. The gospels are written out of a context of intense conflict and competition with rival forms of Jewish conviction. Their statements about God rejecting those who reject them have exactly the same historical motivation as the assignment of all non-sectarians to the everlasting pit by the devout at Qumran. It must be clearly recognized, however, that all such materials formed the “scriptural” basis for the powerful supersessionist theology that did come to dominate Christianity virtually up to our own day. The statements attributed to Jesus (above all those which spoke of the destruction of the Temple) were taken as divine prophecies that were fulfilled in the Jew’s loss of their Temple, city, and land under the Romans, the mass conversion of the Gentiles, and finally, the imperial recognition of Christianity as the authentic representation of “biblical religion.”

The statements made by Paul and the author of Hebrews concerning law and covenant should be regarded in the same way. When “Christianity” and “Judaism” not only emerged as distinct religious systems, but also as religions with their power relationship reversed, it was easy to see statements that had been made in the midst of controversy over community self-definition as divinely revealed declarations concerning “the religion of Law.” And when Christian systematic theologians subsequently used such statements, not as situational responses, but as universal truths, it was perhaps inevitable that Christianity tended to be defined in large measure by the ways in which it was “not Jewish.” Thus Paul’s defensive opposing of “gift” and “faith” on the side of the experience of Jesus Christ, and of “works” and “law” on the side of those seeking circumcision and Torah-observance in Galatians, becomes in the hands of systematic theologians, a definition of Christianity that is all “grace” and “faith” standing against law. The procedure not only distorts the import of the statements that are thus used, but also leads to the neglect of Paul’s language that is positive concerning both works and law. Understood in its historical context, Paul’s language cannot be taken as “anti-Jewish,” but Paul’s language as taken up into certain forms of Christian theology certainly can be read as “anti-Jewish.”

Perhaps the most difficult case—because of the relatively dispassionate and detached character of its rhetoric—is presented by the Letter to the Hebrews. Not only does it develop a consistent “lesser to greater” argument that establishes the superiority of the priesthood of Jesus to that of the levitical cult, but argues as well that Christ is the “mediator of a new and better covenant” than that of Moses, a covenant promised by the prophet Jeremiah (31:31–34) and realized in Christ (Heb 8:6–12; 9:15; 12:24). And in the process, Hebrews makes statements with an apparently absolute character concerning the law and first covenant. “If the first covenant had been faultless,” the author declares, “there would have been no occasion for another” (8:7); and, after quoting Jeremiah to the effect that God did find fault with the people under the first covenant in his promise of a new one written in human hearts, states, “In speaking of a new covenant, he treats the first as obsolete. And what is becoming obsolete and growing old is ready to vanish away” (8:13). Later, speaking of the cult under the law, he states, “He abolishes the first in order to establish the second” (10:9).

These statements are startling, to be sure, but they should be read within the context of competing claims within a Jewish conversation, rather than as a “Christian” claim to replace “Judaism.” Once more, it is important to remember that a contemporary Jewish sect at Qumran was also claiming to be a “new covenant” as well as a living temple offering spiritual sacrifices to God that were superior to those carried out by the illegitimate priesthood of the Temple in Jerusalem. And in both Paul and Hebrews, the challenge to the adequacy of the law of Moses is placed within a deep commitment to the more fundamental commitment to the covenant God made with Abraham (Gal 3:6–29; Rom 4:1–25; Heb 6:13–20; 11:1–12:3). In neither author does God choose another people to replace the Jews. For Paul, the inclusion of the Gentiles is part of God’s plan to draw all of Israel to salvation, “for the gifts and call of God are irrevocable” (Rom 11:29). For Hebrews, there is not even a suggestion that it is anyone but the “descendants of Abraham” with whom God is concerned, or for whom the promises are intended (Heb 2:16; 6:15).

6. Conclusion

The language about Jews in the New Testament is difficult, above all in light of changed historical circumstances. History can no longer be regarded as testimony to the truth of Christian claims and the cancellation of Jewish rights. Indeed, if anything, history has had the opposite lesson in recent years. The Holocaust has shown the tragic results of supersessionism carried to a demonic extreme. And in the post-Enlightenment rejection of religion, Christianity has been the pre-eminent target for attack. In a very real sense, Christian readers in particular are in a new position. They must re-evaluate their own practice and their way of reading their sacred texts, now no longer as having a right to define other people’s place in history, but as themselves trying to define an identity that does not depend on a false supersessionism.<sup>40</sup>

This essay, then, leads to the following simple conclusions:

1. It is inappropriate and anachronistic to call the New Testament compositions “Anti-Jewish.”
2. It is the case that the language of the New Testament can and has been used in an anti-Jewish fashion within Christian apologetics and theology that can virtually be defined in some cases as “Anti-Judaism.”

---

<sup>40</sup> See L. T. Johnson, “Christians and Jews: Starting Over,” Commonweal (130:2): 15–19, and “Reading after the Holocaust: A New Testament Scholar Responds to Emil Fackenheim,” in A Shadow of Glory, ed. Linafelt, 216–231.

3. The best way of liberating the New Testament from an inappropriate hermeneutics with regard to its language about Jews is through historical, social, and rhetorical analysis.
4. The task of an appropriate hermeneutics with regard to the New Testament's language concerning Jews remains a difficult challenge for Christian readers.

THE WRITINGS OF JOSEPHUS: THEIR SIGNIFICANCE FOR NEW TESTAMENT STUDY

STEVE MASON

It can no longer be necessary to make the case that Josephus is relevant for the study of the New Testament. Even lay readers of the Christian canon know that when specialists look outside it for illumination—concerning Herod the Great and his descendants, the Roman governors of Judea, the temple in Jerusalem, the Pharisees and Sadducees, the geography of Judea-Galilee, and much else—they rely heavily on Josephus’ Judean War, Antiquities-Life, and Against Apion. Readers are accustomed to seeing “Josephus reports that...” before statements in New Testament Introductions and reference works. That scholars often turn to Josephus not so much from choice as from bitter necessity, as he might have put it (Life 27), in view of his presumed moral deficiencies,<sup>1</sup> does not weaken the dependence itself.

To be sure, a substantial library of other Jewish writings from the same period (say, 200 BCE to 200 CE) has survived, including the Dead Sea Scrolls, Philo, apocalyptic and wisdom literature, and the earliest rabbinic texts. But that material was composed almost entirely for Jews,<sup>2</sup> who did not need to be educated about the conditions in which they lived. Because Josephus, by contrast, undertook to write self-consciously historical narratives for non-Jews, his work is plainly of the first importance for historians as for New Testament readers. The archaeology of first-century Judea and Galilee constitutes an increasingly valuable resource for understanding the general environment.<sup>3</sup> But for specific human actions and intentions, which are the

---

<sup>1</sup> E.g. G. A. Williamson, The World of Josephus (Boston: Little, Brown, 1964), 307: “Josephus the writer deserves our warmest thanks; Josephus the man—not lovable, not estimable, barely tolerable—remains an enigma, but a fascinating one.”

<sup>2</sup> V. Tcherikover, “Jewish Apologetic Literature Reconsidered,” Eos 48 (1956): 169–193.

<sup>3</sup> Accessible archaeological surveys include E. Meyers, Galilee through the Centuries: Confluence of Cultures (Winona Lake: Eisenbrauns, 1999), A. Berlin & A. Overman, The First Jewish Revolt: Archaeology, History, and Ideology (London: Routledge, 2002), and M. Aviam, Jews, Pagans and Christians in the Galilee. 25 Years of Archaeological Excavations and Surveys: Hellenistic to Byzantine Periods (Rochester: University of Rochester Press, 2004). Galilean archaeology in particular has recently been stuff of history, Josephus remains indispensable to New Testament readers. Chronology reinforces the bond, for he composed his thirty volumes in the very period to which the canonical gospels and Acts are usually dated (70–100 CE).

Since another appeal concerning Josephus' importance would be superfluous, my purpose here lies elsewhere. Namely, given that the works of Josephus are important, how should the New Testament student regard and use them? The shorter of his histories, the seven-volume War, is nearly as long as the entire New Testament, and wading through his twenty-volume Antiquities (about the length of the Old Testament) is a formidable task. Curious readers often purchase Josephus' collected works—for Anglophones, often the 1737 translation by W. Whiston—only to find them impenetrable. Arcane details prove impossible to remember; Eleazars, Menachems, Aristobuluses, and Agrippas appear with disconcerting frequency in unrelated places; long speeches and details of geography, even botany, can be as boring as the moralizing is tedious. How does one find what one needs in this mass? And once one finds it, how should one understand it? Perhaps most important: What may the New Testament reader fairly expect from Josephus?

In what follows I describe three approaches to exploiting Josephus' works for New Testament study. The first is the route most commonly taken: using Josephus as a historical reference manual. In this model, to which I devote about half of the essay, reading Josephus and doing history are assumed to be parts of a single operation. Even if one does not believe everything he reports, he is expected to transmit recoverable facts. Recently, however, some scholars have been working to separate the interpretation of Josephus' compositions from reconstruction of the historical phenomena they describe. These critics draw attention to the artistry of the narratives and insist that historical deductions reckon fully with the nature of the evidence they seek to explain, which is a richly woven tapestry. While generally supporting that second approach against the first, I propose here a further step.

---

applied to the study of the historical Jesus by M. A. Chancey, The Myth of a Gentile Galilee (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002), S. Freyne, Jesus, a Jewish Galilean: A New Reading of the Jesus Story (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 2004), M. Sawicki, Crossing Galilee: Architectures of Contact in the Occupied Land of Jesus (Harrisburg: Trinity Press International, 2000) and J. D. Crossan and J. Reed, Excavating Jesus: Beneath the Stones, Behind the Texts (New York: HarperSanFrancisco, 2001).

Namely: the greatest benefit for New Testament readers in studying Josephus may come not from areas of overlap in what the two corpora refer to, but from the access Josephus affords to values and assumptions that shaped the conceptual world of the New Testament writers.

1. Josephus as Historical Manual for New Testament Readers

The use of Josephus as a reference work on matters Judean has ancient roots, among his immediate audiences in Rome and later in the church fathers. In some respects this use fulfills the author's dream that "the whole Greek-speaking world" would learn about his culture from him (Ant. 1.5; cf. War 1.6). Yet the Christian readers who preserved Josephus into modern times were not interested in his expositions of Judean culture as such: they were concerned only with the background of the early Christian story.<sup>4</sup> (Jewish scholars of the ancient and medieval periods preferred to forego his portraits of Judaism for other reasons.) Because the use of Josephus for New Testament interpretation is not a new issue, but has been with us for nearly two millennia, we ought to ponder the changing methodological bases for such use. That survey will tell us something about Josephus' historiographical assumptions and about those of his ancient and modern users.

1.1. Authority and Truth in Ancient Historiography

In the Roman world, knowledge of most things, including the past, was mediated by trusted authorities. Notwithstanding occasional impulses toward empirical investigation (e.g., with Thucydides and Aristotle centuries earlier), the deeply ingrained Roman social system, in which members of the elite dominated all discourse, affected every branch of knowledge. Although Roman authors had potential sources of reliable information about foreign peoples and lands, for example, their geographical and ethnographical traditions display a tenacious resistance to change, precisely because they instinctively preferred established and trusted authorities.<sup>5</sup> The physician Galen in the second century was still deploring the fideism of his peers, as he called for empirically grounded reasoning. Tellingly, he compared this widespread trust in authorities to the “undemonstrated laws” of the Jews and Christians—i.e., “the school of Moses and Christ” (Puls. diff. 2.4).

---

<sup>4</sup> E.g. H. Schreckenberg, Die Flavius-Josephus-Tradition in Antike und Mittelalter (Leiden: Brill, 1972), and the essays on Christian use of Josephus in Josephus, Judaism, and Christianity, ed. G. Hata and L. H. Feldman (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1987).

In history, above all, it mattered a great deal who was telling the story, and who the historian’s friends and patrons were. Historians were not professionals. They were rhetorically trained members of the elite or their retainers. These men, who had typically held military, political, civic, and religious posts, felt able to write and speak in any genre they pleased: political treatise, philosophical dialogue, tragedy, poetry, oratory, literary correspondence, ethnography, geography, biography, or history.<sup>6</sup> The same friends would gather to hear each other recite in any of these modes. And when they chose one genre, they typically laced their compositions with elements of the others: so their histories contain philosophical, geographical, oratorical, and moralizing asides. In such an elite literary environment, acceptance and trustworthiness flowed in large measure from the writer’s evident stature, influence, and circle of friends—his auctoritas.<sup>7</sup>

Ancient techniques for getting books into the public sphere (“publication”) reinforced the importance of the author’s status. New compositions normally found their intended audiences locally, in the author’s immediate environs.<sup>8</sup> For modern writers, our audiences must

---

<sup>5</sup> J. S. Romm, The Edges of the Earth in Ancient Thought: Geography, Exploration, and Fiction (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1992), 41–44, 93–109; S. P. Mattern, Rome and the Enemy: Imperial Strategy in the Principate (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999), 24–80.

<sup>6</sup> Cf. J. Marincola, Authority and Tradition in Ancient Historiography (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997), 19. Aelius Theon, in the first century, points out that graduates of his rhetorical programme will be expected to write in a variety of genres (Prog. 60, 70). Tacitus’ Dialogue on Oratory, set in the reign of Vespasian, shows the result: groups of friends who freely compose across different fields. The deliberations by Pliny the Younger, famous senator, orator, and letter-writer, as to whether he should embark on writing history, are revealing (Ep. 3.5): the issue of qualification does not arise. So too Cicero, Leg. 1.9.

<sup>7</sup> E.g., C. Salles, Lire à Rome (Paris: Les Belles Lettres, 1992), 43–89; E. Fantham, Roman Literary Culture: From Cicero to Apuleius (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1996), 183–185.

<sup>8</sup> P. White, “The Friends of Martial, Statius, and Pliny, and the Dispersal of Patronage,” Harvard Studies in Classical Philology 79 (1975): 265–300; idem, “Amicitia and the Profession of Poetry in Early Imperial Rome,” Journal of Roman Studies 68 (1978): 74–92; T. P. Wiseman, Roman Studies: Literary and Historical (Liverpool: F. Cairns, 1987), 252–56; R. J. Starr, “The Circulation of Texts in the Ancient World,” Mnemosyne be abstractly envisaged in our minds. Whether a few associates read or hear preliminary drafts is an entirely discretionary matter, and in any case not part of our main effort to reach the audience. Our books begin to reach their audiences and elicit responses (e.g., through reviews) only when they are printed, bound, and marketed by the publisher. In the first century, conditions were more or less reversed, since neither printing nor publishing houses existed. Composition was a much more social affair, conducted among elite groups who knew what their peers were writing.<sup>9</sup> Authors met their audiences—auditors in the proper sense—at dinner parties or readings. They recited their work in progress or shared drafts with friends, who would have their slaves read them aloud.<sup>10</sup> Catherine Salles observes: “The success of a literary work depended equally on the activity of the coterie, the public readings, and the representations of the author to his associates; but in all this, dissemination remained in a ‘closed circuit’.”<sup>11</sup> This process of presentation and review, in ever widening circles, was the crucial part of “publication,” a process so different from ours that we should perhaps avoid the word when speaking of ancient conditions.<sup>12</sup>

Because each new copy required a human hand, the concept of finishing a work could not be as definitive then as it is for us. Every new copy was in principle a new version, even if the changes were only scribal accidents.<sup>13</sup> When an author stopped making deliberate changes and presented copies of his work to a few friends, this “handing over” (ἔκδοσις) marked the beginning of the end of his ability to interact with a clearly envisaged audience.<sup>14</sup> Even if they aspired to create a literary monument for posterity, ancient authors thus wrote necessarily for real local groups, whose knowledge, values, and prejudices they knew and could manipulate. They also wrote with a view to oral

---

4.40 (1987): 213–223; W. V. Harris, Ancient Literacy (Cambridge MA: Harvard University Press, 1989); C. Salles, Lire à Rome (Paris: Les Belles Lettres, 1992); Marincola, Authority, 19–33; D. S. Potter, Literary Texts and the Roman Historian (London: Routledge, 1999), 23–44.

<sup>9</sup> Tcherikover, “Jewish Apologetic,” 173.

<sup>10</sup> C. W. Fornara, The Nature of History in Ancient Greece and Rome (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983), 31; E. Fantham, Roman Literary Culture: from Cicero to Apuleius (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1996), 202–203, 214–216; Potter, Literary Texts, 106–110.

<sup>11</sup> Salles, Lire à Rome, 156, my translation.

<sup>12</sup> Starr, “Circulation of Texts,” 215 n. 18.

<sup>13</sup> Potter, Literary Texts, 29–37.

<sup>14</sup> Ibid., 32.

performance, whether in their own recital of the work or in the subsequent reading aloud by someone's slave, and therefore with attention to the sound of phrases. Like every other genre, historiography was governed by the general rules of rhetoric (see section 3 below).

In the status-conscious city of Rome, therefore, factual accuracy (which could not usually be checked) was not among the main criteria for literary acceptance, unless such accuracy happened to coincide with the interests of the audience. In the absence of universities or research funded for its own sake, this was not an atmosphere in which anonymous researchers could survive. There was no culture of disseminating new discoveries; the scope for true novelty, especially in history, was severely constrained.<sup>15</sup> New facts came to light incidentally, as they were assembled and interpreted in conventional ways by trusted authorities.

Early Christians may not have recognized the same status criteria as the larger society, for spiritual authority was not a strict correlative of social standing,<sup>16</sup> but they shared the general assumption that truth was validated by its source rather than by a free enquiry scientifically tested: "good trees produce good fruit." Only outsiders, such as Celsus and Porphyry, marginal pedants, Jews, or those deemed "heretics" undertook something approaching historical investigations into Christian origins. The bulk of surviving Christian literature reveals instead a preoccupation with identifying trustworthy authorities and their texts, and a parallel urgency to exclude those perceived as threatening. This long march toward an approved "canon" was well on the way by Clement of Rome and Ignatius of Antioch, if not already by Paul's time (1 Cor 4:15–21; 2 Cor 10–13; Gal 4:11–19).

It is true that ancient historians use the language of "truth" (ἀλήθεια), "accuracy" (ἀκρίβεια), and "reliability" (ἀσφάλεια) in ways that sound as though they imply rigorous research and testing. Yet the contexts of such language indicate a different meaning. What historians are really speaking about in these cases is not objectivity or neutrality of perception, recording, and analysis, but impartiality of reporting. The opposite of truth here is not falsity—bare facts have no determinative value in the rhetoricized mentality of antiquity—but bias.<sup>17</sup> This claim to impartiality, ubiquitous in Roman historiography, made perfect sense in a world in which scholarship came to light through the exercise of personal patronage and social networks. It was assumed that historians would seek to flatter their powerful friends and further belittle the friends' enemies, especially if they had been conquered.<sup>18</sup> Since contemporary values put a premium on the virtue of fearless freedom in speech (παρρησία), however, historians constantly reassured their audiences that they were writing without fear of, or favour toward, those who might help or hurt them. To do this—to avoid mere encomium or invective—was to speak the truth.

---

<sup>15</sup> Marincola, Authority and Tradition, 14: the goal of composition was "to be incrementally innovative within a tradition."

<sup>16</sup> Note, however, that the wealthier members among Paul's followers, those who owned houses (for meeting) and slaves (as emissaries) tended to assume prominent roles: Philemon, Chloe, Stephanas, Phoebe.

There was a potential overlap here with factual truth, on the underlying logic that the historian was motivated not by audience gratification but by compelling events that cried out for a reporter (cf. Josephus, Ant. 1.1–4). Yet ancient historians did not put their facts to a public test by disclosing the basis of their knowledge (i.e., who observed, at what proximity, and with what interests?). The standard proof of impartiality was simply that any praise and blame, which remained the heart and soul of history-writing, was justified by reported behaviour and not gratuitously inserted. Thus balance, non-partisanship, and even-handedness were deemed necessary qualities by the better historians, but a positivist concept of facts that impose their meaning on neutral observers or classifiers, that “speak for themselves,” was entirely different—and a long way off.

As he composed his histories in Rome, Josephus was very much part of this world of social status, rhetoric, and moral lessons (see also the language of Luke 1:1–4). When he speaks about writing the truth (ἀλήθεια) with precision or accuracy (ἀκρίβεια) (War 1.6, 9, 17, 30; 7.454; Ant. 1.4; Life 360–361, 364–367; Apion 1.6, 50), his meaning becomes clear from the context. Whereas other writers have taken the predictable course of flattering those now in power (the Flavians) in their fawning accounts of the Judean war (War 1.2, 6–8), he will set the record straight—that is: he will not overcompensate by exorbitantly praising his own compatriots, but will give due credit and blame to both sides (1.9). He is in a unique position to write this way because he, a Jerusalem priest who knew the Judean side intimately, was after his capture compelled to observe from the Roman side (War 1.3).

<sup>17</sup> See A.J. Woodman, Rhetoric in Classical Historiography: Four Studies (London: Croom Helm, 1988), ch. 2 on Cicero, and Marincola, Authority and Tradition, 158–174.

<sup>18</sup> Lucian's mid-second-century essay on writing history is largely occupied with ridiculing such partiality (in recent accounts of the recent Parthian war), both the flattery and the invective.

Admittedly, eyewitness knowledge is a crucial component of Josephus' proffered credentials in the War. But his claim is vaguely conceived and undocumented in that work; it relies more upon the audience's willingness to trust this captured foreign nobleman (1.2–3; cf. Suetonius, Vesp. 5.6) than upon rigorous demonstration. He does not certify his detailed knowledge of X because he has meticulously investigated sources A through J according to method Z. He must in fact have used many sources, for he could not personally have known events before he reached maturity or those that occurred where he was not present (thus, at least half of the War). Yet he does not name even one source, much less describe his method in using them. Instead, he declares his aim to provide a comprehensive theory of the war supported by appropriate moral evaluations (1.8–10). A uniquely cultivated Judean, he asserts his prerogative to render an authoritative interpretation of the catastrophe that befell his great city, with unassailable verdicts (1.3, 9). His language precludes any modern notion of detachment. He will not (cannot?), for example, sympathetically explore the minds of the "tyrants" or "bandit-chiefs" who brought catastrophe on Jerusalem. "Accuracy" means for him refraining from unjustified praise or blame, and especially from joining the chorus of Rome's flatterers.

1.2. Josephus' Prestige as Basis of his Later Authority

Josephus' assumptions about the relationship between authority and status were shared by readers of the following generations. For a variety of reasons, his work became part of the Christian canon in its broader sense: the approved guide to first-century Judea. Since he was not a Christian, this acceptance could not issue from spiritual authority; it had other bases.

Initially, Josephus' work found its audiences through the agency of his powerful friends in Rome. Various descendants of Herod the Great who were residing in the capital, especially King Agrippa II (d. 92–93 CE?), facilitated dissemination of the work; Josephus adduces a flurry of correspondence with the king concerning his War (Life 364–367). We see vividly here the assumption that the status of one's friends is a guarantee of truth. Once Josephus had completed his work, sponsorship by the imperial family of Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian (Life 361–363; Apion 1.50) ensured its availability for generations in Rome’s libraries and perhaps a few private collections or the occasional bookseller.

After that initial boost, a curious thing happened, though it is also understandable in light of the values described above. On the one hand, Josephus’ own Jewish-Judean community declined utterly to show an interest in their famous son. This neglect apparently resulted from his lack of standing in that community after the war. No matter how good his information might have been, he was perceived as a coward, traitor, quisling, or worse, and therefore as an untrustworthy guide (see already War 3.438–442; Life 416, 425). Christian authors, by contrast, took up his work with enthusiasm. They found him as morally congenial as his compatriots found him objectionable: here was a Jerusalemite of impeccable qualifications who had severely castigated the Judean rebels, describing in lurid detail the horrifying consequences of their actions—thereby demonstrating the fulfillment of Jesus’ predictions (e.g., Origen, C. Cels. 2.13.68–85).

Josephus, of course, made no connection between the fall of Jerusalem and Christian claims, but it seemed easy enough for Christians to find in him a kindred spirit, to insinuate that he shared their view of 70 CE as divine punishment for the Jews’ rejection of Jesus and their execution of James. His stomach-churning account of a mother’s cannibalism during the siege of Jerusalem (War 6.201–213) received great play in Christian literature and theatre, and he won high praise for his truthful witness.<sup>19</sup>

Josephus’ ongoing defence and celebration of Judean culture presented a paradox for his Christian users. On the one hand, it was plainly beneficial that an outsider, a notable Judean free of Christian bias, should (allegedly) testify to Christian truth.<sup>20</sup> On the other hand, it was a potential problem that this clarity of vision did not actually extend to recognizing the truth of Christianity.<sup>21</sup> Origen lamented the latter; still, he credited Josephus with recognizing the righteousness of James and with being “not far from the truth” (C. Cels. 1.47; Comm. Matt. 10.17). In the late fourth century, an unknown Christian felt strongly enough about the authority of Josephus’ witness (“an outstanding historian”) yet also about his being too Jewish (if only “he had been as attentive to religion and truth as to tracking down events”; he shared in “the treachery of the Jews”), that he recast the War in a proper Christian version.<sup>22</sup> It would take another 1,350 years for the Cambridge mathematician and heterodox theologian William Whiston to make room for Josephus within the Christian fold—as an Ebionite bishop.<sup>23</sup>

<sup>19</sup> Schreckenberg, Flavius-Josephus-Tradition, 186–203.

<sup>20</sup> E.g., Ps-Hegesippus, De excidio 2.12: “If the Jews do not believe us, let them at least believe their own writers. Josephus, whom they esteem a very great man, said this [the testimony to Jesus, Ant. 18.63–64]... However, it was no detriment to the truth that he was not a believer; but this adds more weight to his testimony, that while he was an unbeliever, and unwilling that this should be true, he has not denied it to be so.”

It was no doubt important to Christian commentators that Josephus was a Judaeon with putative inside knowledge. But just as he had made no effort to justify his claims, they were not concerned to critically assess or verify them. At least a dozen Christian authors of the second and third centuries, from Theophilus of Antioch to Tertullian and Origen, cite Josephus as a self-evident authority,<sup>24</sup> but they do not explain why they credit his works above others. Eusebius (early fourth century CE) is important because he not only makes extensive use of Josephus,<sup>25</sup> but also deals explicitly with the question of his credentials.

Eusebius first mentions Josephus as “the most distinguished of historians (ἐπισημώτατος ἱστορικῶν) among the Hebrews”<sup>26</sup> (Hist. Eccl.

---

<sup>21</sup> In the same passage from Ps-Hegesippus as in the previous note: “he was no believer because of the hardness of his heart and his perfidious intention.”

<sup>22</sup> Passages cited here are from the opening paragraph of the work. A concise introduction to “Pseudo-Hegesippus” is A. J. Bell, “Josephus and Pseudo-Hegesippus,” in Josephus, Judaism, and Christianity, ed. G. Hata and L. H. Feldman (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1987), 349–61.

<sup>23</sup> So Dissertation 1 attached to Whiston’s translation of Josephus.

<sup>24</sup> M. E. Hardwick, Josephus as an Historical Source in Patristic Literature through Eusebius (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1989), 10, 31, 34, 49, 60.

<sup>25</sup> H. W. Attridge and G. Hata, eds., Eusebius, Christianity, and Judaism (Leiden: Brill, 1992); S. Inowlocki, “The Citations of Jewish Greek Authors in Eusebius of Caesarea’s Praeparatio Evangelica and Demonstratio Evangelica” (Faculty of Oriental Studies, University of Oxford, 2001); G. Hata, “Eusebius and Josephus: The Way Eusebius Misused and Abused Josephus,” Patristica: Proceedings of the Colloquia of the Japanese Society for Patristic Studies, supp. 1 (2001), 49–66. Eusebius’ extensive use of Josephus does not appear to be only the result of the small number of extant texts. The tenth-century Suda Lexicon (entry, “Jesus [Ἰησοῦς], Christ and our God,” item 229, line 164) identifies Josephus as the historian to whom Eusebius often referred.

<sup>26</sup> For the positive valuation of “Hebrew” in Eusebius, see Inowlocki, “Citations of Jewish Greek Authors,” 52–64, 112–121.

1.5.3; cf. 1.6.9). Later, after uncritically endorsing Josephus' claims to comprehensive eyewitness knowledge (War 1.3), he explains that the historian was:

the most renowned (ἐπιδοξότατος) man of the Judeans at that time, not only with his compatriots but also among the Romans, such that he himself was honoured by the erection of a statue in the city of the Romans, and the works composed by him were thought worthy of [deposit in] the library. (Hist. Eccl. 3.9.1–2)

Eusebius reinforces Josephus' credibility (πιστεύεσθαι) by endorsing Josephus' claims against his rival Justus of Tiberias (Hist. Eccl. 3.9.3), accepting his source's assurance that King Agrippa and his family as well as the imperator Titus all vouched for the War's accuracy (3.9.10–11; cf. Life 361–363). This is obviously not a disinterested investigation of Josephus' accuracy, but a wholly circular process of certification by fame resulting from prior endorsement. Josephus' authority sprang ultimately from the high esteem in which powerful Romans had first held him.<sup>27</sup>

Justus of Tiberias presents a telling contrast. Although Justus wrote an account of the war that challenged Josephus in various ways (Life 336), making it extremely valuable for historical investigation, and even Josephus credits him with literary talent (Life 40–41, 340), Justus found no real uptake among Christian authors. Why? He had lost the competition for status. Josephus commanded an initial prestige that carried over until the Christian apologists could establish his worth on theological grounds, and once he was established as the source for Judea, Justus had no future. Eusebius's adoption of Josephus' moral critique of Justus without quibble (Hist. Eccl. 3.10.8) shows that the contest had long since been settled. The ninth-century Patriarch Photius claims to have read Justus' work, but he similarly repeats with enthusiasm Josephus' dismissal of the contender:

But Josephus, even though he had taken this enemy in hand many times, impassively—and with words only—reproached him, [insisting that he] leave off his crimes. And they say that the history which that man [Justus] wrote happens to be mostly fabricated, especially in what concerned the Roman war against the Jews and the capture of Jerusalem. (Bibl. 33; italics added)

---

<sup>27</sup> Hardwick, Josephus as an Historical Source, 74.

The “they” who say are Josephus, and this highly partisan verdict from Photius may have sealed the fate of Justus’s legacy (if his work had survived intact until then).<sup>28</sup> By the time of the Suda Lexicon in the following century, the compiler’s entry on Justus appears to depend entirely on Josephus: “[Justus] took it upon himself to compile [NB: this is Josephus’ language: Life 40, 338] a Judean history and write up certain commentaries, but Josephus exposes this fellow as a fraud—he was writing history in the same period as Josephus.” In winning the fathers’ confidence, Josephus’ works rendered superfluous all other evidence.

1.3. The Modern Preference for Anonymous, Objective Facts

Modern manuals of the New Testament world continue to use Josephus as their Companion to the New Testament, but their rationale is markedly different from that of the church fathers. As the basis for esteem, Josephus’ personal prestige has given way to a conception of raw facts presumed to be embedded in his accounts. Here is an index of the shift from ancient and medieval assumptions, for if Justus’ work had survived to the modern period we may be sure that it too would have been welcomed for its facts, employed as a critical counterweight to Josephus. Because Justus’ work did not survive, however, Josephus’ position as sole source created a methodological short-circuit.

Anticipated by intellectual currents in the Renaissance, Reformation, and the Age of Reason, the eighteenth-century Enlightenment represented in principle the repudiation of knowledge derived from authorities. Common reasoning applied to repeatable observation became the only acceptable way of knowing in this newly grown-up world.<sup>29</sup> Philosophical and scientific inquiry burgeoned as recent discoveries in astronomy, world exploration, biology, physics, and engineering were assimilated into brave new conceptions of the cosmos and of human life. History was also being rethought, as another discipline that needed to be rescued from accrued, sacred tradition.

---

<sup>28</sup> For Photius as gatekeeper of book preservation in Byzantium, see N. G. Wilson, Photius, The Bibliotheca: a selection (London: Duckworth, 1994), 6–7. Although Wilson’s point is the positive one that Photius’s recognition of a book may have ensured its preservation, the negative corollary seems to follow: his disapproval (in relation to a more trustworthy account) would encourage disdain and neglect.

<sup>29</sup> Immanuel Kant’s Was ist Aufklärung? (1784) is a classic statement. The opening paragraph declares: “‘Have the courage to use your own understanding’ is therefore the motto of the Enlightenment.”

Josephus' historic role as companion to the New Testament meant that his fate in this rethinking of history was married with the urgent reinvestigation of Christian origins. The charter story that had been handed down by church authorities (both Catholic and Protestant) for at least a millennium and a half was being uprooted. Voltaire's reflections on ancient history<sup>30</sup> and Thomas Paine's Age of Reason are representative products of eighteenth-century Deism. They both rejected all historical propositions about Jesus and his first followers that were based on tradition but contrary to common reasoning derived from experience of the world. Enlightenment scholarship and its heirs would be no "respecters of persons" or authorities. Once the clear-sighted critic had burned away the fog of tradition and clerical orthodoxy, it was hoped, the plain facts of astronomy, biology, physics, geography, and history—for Deists, facts were the word of God—would impose themselves on honest thinkers and demand a new view of the world.

Ancient history did not, however, immediately take up the positive "scientific" logic of the Enlightenment agenda. The philosophes of the eighteenth century (e.g., Hume, Voltaire, Robertson), in a curious parallel to their ancient elite counterparts, saw history as but one of their many encyclopaedic pursuits, and they shunned pedantic specialization in the field. (The difference was that Pliny and Tacitus were part of an aristocratic elite who wrote under the general method of rhetoric, whereas the philosophes were an anti-aristocratic, intellectual elite writing under the banner of philosophy.) Though often diligent in examining sources, they tended to write sweeping interpretative histories that, assuming the commonality of all human experience, lent themselves to clear moral assessment. In their animus against Christianity and tradition they were hardly objective, though they believed their harsh assessments justifiable in the service of obvious truth.<sup>31</sup> Some were also duly cautious about the application of scientific models to ancient history, as Voltaire:

But to attempt to paint the ancients; to elaborate in this way the development of their minds; to regard events as characters in which we may accurately read the most sacred feelings and intents of their hearts—this is an undertaking of no ordinary difficulty and discrimination, although as frequently conducted, both childish and trifling. (Philos. Dict., “History” pt. III)

---

<sup>30</sup> E.g., in the entry on "History" in his Philosophical Dictionary.

<sup>31</sup> An excellent analysis, with vastly more nuance, is in P. Gay, The Enlightenment: An Interpretation. The Science of Freedom (New York: Norton, 1969), 368–396.

The full accommodation of history to science came chiefly in the nineteenth century. Historians such as B. G. Niebuhr and Leopold von Ranke insisted, against the generalist synthesizers and moralizers, on studying the details of particular places and times without assuming common standards or universal moral criteria—and on withholding moral assessment. The prime directive was to get the particular facts correct and only with great care, where possible, to move up from the particular to the general. Ranke drove a particularly a sharp wedge between historical facts and their evaluation. He made extensive use of non-literary documents from newly accessed archives, which seemed to offer facts without the sort of interpretative overlay found in historical narratives. The momentum in historical study was moving decisively towards the atoms thought to constitute the surviving evidence, whether these were found in material remains and non-literary documents or in sources distilled from the literary texts (a specialty of Niebuhr).

The scientific turn in history was greatly enhanced in the later nineteenth century as thousands of material remains from antiquity were found, catalogued, and interpreted: coins, papyrus documents of ordinary life, funerary and civic inscriptions, and remains of monuments. This gathering of new evidence under rigorously scientific principles of stratification and classification was highly productive: it generated dictionaries, encyclopaedias, and other reference works of hitherto unimaginable quality, considerably refining our understanding of social, cultural, legal, and linguistic variation.

A problem, however, was that the new enthusiasm for “raw data” implied that all such data could be treated alike no matter where they originated, and this conditioned the interpretation of ancient literary texts, including Josephus’. The scholar’s aim was to get past the subjective, moralizing interpretation to the facts beneath or, if not the facts, to the earliest sources behind the extant writings. Although the presence of two or more overlapping literary sources for a given period appeared to make the task of extracting facts eminently reasonable, for one text could be weighed against the other, the problem of what to do when only one narrative survived—most often the case with Josephus—would take decades to be recognized as a problem. In the meantime, Josephus or his sources tended to be accepted by default, if there was no specific reason to reject them, as if they also inscribed or mirrored the realities of life in some sort of neutral, value-free language. Scholars were confident that Josephus could be compelled by a sufficiently scientific method to yield up his facts.

This distinctively modern adoption of Josephus as preserver of facts is embodied in the greatest background manual for New Testament readers ever produced: Emil Schürer's The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (1886–90), which had first appeared in the previous decade as a Manual of New Testament Backgrounds. Schürer's History remains a standard reference work, following extensive revision in the 1970's by an Oxford-based team. As the title and Introduction make clear, his purpose was to assist the New Testament scholar in relating "Jesus and the Gospel" to "the Jewish world of his time."<sup>32</sup> Strikingly absent from the Introduction, however, was any mention of Josephus, his credentials or fame—or statue. Rather, the German historian implied that he was dealing with facts in themselves, not with the messy problems of human perspective.

So, for example, his second paragraph begins with a confident historical pronouncement: "The chief characteristic of this period was the growing importance of Pharisaism." But how does he know that? Though Schürer does not disclose it, this ostensible fact comes mainly from the stories of Josephus.<sup>33</sup> Because it was not a rigorously argued historical conclusion, but only a borrowing from literary portraits, it could easily be doubted in later scholarship.<sup>34</sup> Josephus had become for Schürer an anonymous quarry or fund, a "source" he would say, of neutral data.

Before beginning his historical account, Schürer surveys all the sources on which it will be based—archaeology, coins, inscriptions, and writers other than Josephus—and finally comes to describe Josephus. After allowing that our author is "the main source for the

---

<sup>32</sup> E. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 BC.–AD 135) (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1973–1987), 1:1.

<sup>33</sup> War 1.110; Ant. 13.297–298; 17.41–45; 18.15, 17. Cf. S. Mason, Flavius Josephus on the Pharisees: A Composition-Critical Study (Leiden: Brill, 1991).

<sup>34</sup> E.g., M. Smith, "Palestinian Judaism in the First Century," in Israel: Its Role in Civilization, ed. M. Davis (New York: Harper and Brothers, 1956), 67–81; E. P. Sanders, Judaism, Practice and Belief, 63 BCE–66 CE (London: Trinity Press International, 1992), 7, 386; L. L. Grabbe, Judaism from Cyrus to Hadrian (Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress, 1992), 470–471, 616.

history studied here,”<sup>35</sup> he describes the “facts” of Josephus’ life, briefly reviews the chronological and material coverage of each work by Josephus, and finally considers Josephus’ own sources. The striking omission here, from more recent perspectives, is any concern about why Josephus wrote, what his interests were, the artistic arrangement or structure of each account, the sort of language he employed, how freely he retold stories—in short, what his evidence for the past might mean in its narrative context. This is the short-circuit mentioned above: an attempt to link story to fact directly, a procedure that succeeds only in putting out the light.

Schürer’s method was to tackle each new historical period or problem by first identifying the “sources” as if they were a palette of coloured paints (i.e. facts), which he could then harmoniously combine in a single picture. Problems of contradiction, error, and omission among the sources were relegated to the notes (much enhanced by the Oxford team), as incidental to the main project of certifying the factual history. For most of the post-Hasmonean history, his sources turned out to be chiefly or exclusively the relevant passages in Josephus, which Schürer simply took over as neutral fact.

A few sentences (emphasis added) will illustrate the point. “Antipater was now all-powerful at court and enjoyed his father’s absolute confidence. But he was not satisfied. He wanted total power and could hardly wait for his father to die.”<sup>36</sup> “But Sabinus, whose conscience was uneasy because of the Temple robberies and other misdeeds, made off as quickly as possible.”<sup>37</sup> “His [Philip’s] reign was mild, just, and peaceful.”<sup>38</sup> How can we know about such motives and moral qualities, which we would hesitate to attribute even to our contemporaries, about whom we have considerable independent information? Schürer’s famous model made it acceptable to treat Josephus’ gripping stories as facts. He did not explain how he made this transition, or whether he recognized that a transition was involved.

Such handling of Josephus, now regarded as an information portal (often called “the ancient sources”), drove the New Testament-backgrounds industry of the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Thus, the scholarly biographies of King Herod before Peter Richardson’s

---

<sup>35</sup> Schürer, History of the Jewish People, 1:43; italics added.

<sup>36</sup> Ibid., 1:324.

<sup>37</sup> Ibid., 1:332.

<sup>38</sup> Ibid., 1:339.

1996 study were to a large degree paraphrases of Josephus: thoughts attributed to the king by Josephus for the sake of a compelling story were assumed to reflect the monarch's actual motives and views. Two textbooks deserve special attention in this essay because they frame themselves as guides to Josephus for the New Testament reader.

The scholar who translated Josephus' War and Eusebius' Church History as Penguin paperbacks addressed his The World of Josephus (1964) itself to the typical British school graduate who knew the New Testament stories from religion class, but assumed that the sacred history told therein was quite distinct from any secular context.<sup>39</sup> Josephus was worth this reader's attention, G. A. Williamson proposed, because his remarkable life had bonded the Judean world of the New Testament to its larger Roman canvas.<sup>40</sup>

Although the conception of this book as Josephus' world, rather than as the history of New Testament times, might seem to promise a departure from Schürer, Williamson betrays the same positivistic method when in the Introduction, before mentioning Josephus, he describes the Judean-Roman war in ostensibly factual terms: "On the other [Judean] side was a motley host, torn by dissension and bloody strife, and led by rival self-appointed chieftains lusting for power..."<sup>41</sup> Yet this merely translates Josephus' distinctive, thematic lexicon of στάσις, λησταί, and τύραννοι. Williamson is not about to accept everything Josephus says, but his opening critical questions reflect the limits of his scepticism. Are Josephus' narratives "as objectively true as we would wish them to be?... Is it within our power to separate the true from the false, to distinguish the sober statement from the gross exaggeration?"<sup>42</sup> This already implies that a "sober statement" may be taken as factual; at least, that facts are present among whatever else is there.

As his account unfolds, Williamson occasionally introduces doubt about Josephus' veracity: in those rare cases where competing versions of the same events survive from other authors<sup>43</sup> and where Josephus himself provides contradictory stories.<sup>44</sup> Where there is no such reason to doubt, however, Williamson accepts Josephus in whole and part—events, motives, and moral assessments: the priests' devoted observance

---

<sup>39</sup> Williamson, World of Josephus, 15.

<sup>40</sup> Ibid., 19.

<sup>41</sup> Ibid., 17.

<sup>42</sup> Ibid., 21.

<sup>43</sup> Ibid., 280.

<sup>44</sup> Ibid., 166–176.

of the Sabbath in Pompey's time (72); Herod's putative relationship to Augustus and M. V. Agrippa (80); the character of the various governors of Judea (130)—Gessius Florus was "heartless, dishonest, disgusting; he filled Judaea with misery, accepting bribes from bandits" (145); the minutes of a secret meeting among the Zealots reported by Josephus (207); the speeches of various actors (204–6); and in general their motives, deeds, and ends. Yet these are all ingredients of Josephus' story, not simply "what happened." In some cases, Williamson accepts Josephus on the curious ground that his is the only story we have.<sup>45</sup>

A nicely illustrated and well researched study entitled The Topical Josephus: Historical Accounts that Shed Light on the Bible (1992) employs a similar method. Under the headings "People," "Institutions," and "Events," Cleon Rogers quotes and paraphrases Josephus' account, supplementing it now and again with notes on archaeology or contemporary literature, to create an ostensibly historical record. For example, he cites Josephus' assessment of Herod's military virtue (War 1.230) and proceeds to "demonstrate the validity" of this assessment by citing examples of Herod's valour—from Josephus!<sup>46</sup> Yet this demonstrates only that Josephus' narrative holds together, not that it reflects reality. The paraphrase of Josephus as fact continues: "When Nero heard the news of Roman losses in Judea, he was inwardly very much upset, even though he outwardly tried to conceal these concerns (War 3.1–3)."<sup>47</sup> Again, "When Titus entered the city, he was amazed at the strength of the fortifications... 'God indeed,' he exclaimed, 'has been with us in the war. God it was who brought down the Jews from these strongholds.'"<sup>48</sup> But how could Josephus have had access to Nero's or Titus's inner thoughts? As for speeches, ancient historians normally composed them for their characters.<sup>49</sup>

---

<sup>45</sup> "But as we have no other sources of information, we must take his account as it stands" (Williamson, World of Josephus, 121; this, in reference to Josephus' early life).

<sup>46</sup> C. L. Rogers, The Topical Josephus: Historical Accounts That Shed Light on the Bible (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1992), 18–20.

<sup>47</sup> Ibid., 121.

<sup>48</sup> Ibid., 201.

<sup>49</sup> Already Voltaire ("History" part III, Dictionary): "Many of the ancients adopted the method in question [composing speeches for their characters], which merely proves that many of the ancients were fond of parading their eloquence at the expense of truth."

While narrating, Rogers inserts explanatory Greek words in parentheses,<sup>50</sup> as if this historical “record” is drawn from a master text. It is, and the text is Josephus! Such statements have no standing as independently verified history; they are excerpts from Josephus, silently transmogrified into what objectively happened.

Although most scholars nowadays are more cautious than Williamson and Rogers, this is a quantitative rather than qualitative difference: they doubt more.<sup>51</sup> Few hesitate to reproduce as facts those passages they consider unproblematic reflections of reality, overlooking problems of structure and language (below). The Compendia Rerum Iudaicarum ad Novum Testamentum series is a partial exception, for it includes expert essays by H. W. Attridge<sup>52</sup> and Louis H. Feldman<sup>53</sup> on the artistry of Josephus’ works. But those essays have no discernible effect on the use of Josephus for facts in the rest of the collection.

I have said that the new factual mindset did not accept everything in Josephus. In fact, its mandate of painstaking comparative research led some attentive German critics to identify for the first time many perceived contradictions and other shortcomings in our author. But they assumed that these too could be neutralized, by proper scientific (wissenschaftlich) means, which could recover sources and facts. Indeed, the greater Josephus’ incompetence and the more ineffectual he was imagined to be as a compiler, the more useful he became for historians. How so?

It is beyond dispute that Josephus depended heavily on written sources and oral traditions, as we have seen. Even for the War, he was not present in the besieged Galilean/Gaulanite towns after Jotapata fell, or in Jerusalem or Masada; much less did he have direct knowledge of Judean politics before about 50 CE, when he turned 14. German scholars of the late nineteenth century became acutely sensitive to his

---

<sup>50</sup> E.g., Rogers, Topical Josephus, 91, 129.

<sup>51</sup> An example is the influential Sanders, Judaism, where apparent confusions between Josephus’ story and history are frequent: pp. 92, 140–41, 380–85.

<sup>52</sup> H. W. Attridge, “Josephus and his Works,” in Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period: Apocrypha, Pseudepigrapha, Qumran Sectarian Writings, Philo, Josephus, ed. M. E. Stone (Assen: Van Gorcum, 1984), 185–232.

<sup>53</sup> L. H. Feldman, “Use, Authority and Exegesis of Mikra in the Writings of Josephus,” in Mikra: Text, Translation, Reading and Interpretation of the Hebrew Bible in Ancient Judaism and Early Christianity, ed. M. J. Mulder and H. Sysling (Assen: Van Gorcum, 1988), 455–518.

changes in diction, seeming redundancies or doublets, awkward editorial remarks, or apparent contradictions, and cited these as proof of editorial seams: places where Josephus had tried to bond his disparate sources together.<sup>54</sup> They contended that he took over his sources with such a lack of comprehension, skill, and editorial intervention that we can still recover them, to a large degree, by peeling off his meager additions. Identifying the clumsy joins would allow specialists to undo them, recreating Josephus' own desktop,<sup>55</sup> as it were. Therefore, irrespective of Josephus' own competencies, not to mention his morals, one could use him with great profit as transmitter of facts.

This approach was widely paralleled at the time in the criticism of classical authors such as Polybius, Diodorus, and Livy, and in the source and form criticism of Old Testament and New Testament texts. It seemed particularly promising in the case of Josephus, a parochial Judean priest and Pharisee (as it was thought), whose native language was Aramaic, and who was surely incapable of writing most of what has been transmitted under his name. By the time of Gustav Hölscher's 1916 essay for the Pauly-Wissowa Realencyclopädie,<sup>56</sup> it seemed reasonable to explain almost all of Josephus' writings on the basis of his sources, which he had retouched only lightly with editorial bridges. That most of these putative sources were "anonymous" only abetted the illusion of dealing in impersonal facts.

An expression of this approach commonly still found is the proposition that Josephus' editorial summary statements (e.g., about the influence of the Pharisees, which had so impressed Schürer) should be discounted for historical purposes because it was easy for him to skew those editorial remarks, whereas his more reliable source material comes through in the narrative itself, which he often took over bodily.<sup>57</sup>

---

<sup>54</sup> So H. Bloch, Die Quellen des Flavius Josephus in seiner Archäologie (Leipzig: B. G. Teubner, 1968 [1879]); J. von Destinon, Die Quellen des Flavius Josephus in der Jüd. Arch. Buch XII–XVII—Jüd. Krieg. Buch I (Kiel: Lipsius, 1882), G. Hölscher, "Josephus," PWRE 18 (1916): 1934–2000. More recent examples of the method are D. R. Schwartz, "Josephus and Nicolaus on the Pharisees," Journal for the Study of Judaism 14 (1983): 157–171; idem, Agrippa 1: The Last King of Judea (Tübingen: Mohr, 1990), and R. Bergmeier, Die Essener-Berichte des Flavius Josephus: Quellenstudien zu den Essentertexten im Werk des jüdischen Historiographen (Kampen: Kok Pharos, 1993).

<sup>55</sup> The image is used by D. R. Schwartz, Studies in the Jewish Background of Christianity (Tübingen: Mohr, 1992), 2.

<sup>56</sup> Hölscher, "Josephus."

<sup>57</sup> Sanders, Judaism, 7; Grabbe, Judaism, 470–471.

A related principle for distinguishing gold from dross in Josephus holds that wherever he talks about his own life (especially in War 2–3 and Life) he should not be trusted, whereas in the narrative devoted to other matters he was usually a conscientious historian—i.e., preserving sources intact.<sup>58</sup> This is in effect another way of accepting Josephus' sources while setting aside his own contributions.

1.4. Composition, Language, and Fact

Any simple programme for isolating facts in Josephus or disambiguating sources from the existing narrative faces problems related to the nature of the texts and also the problem of language. On the texts: it is an antecedent theoretical possibility that he used his sources as an anthologist would, binding them together with editorial seams and summaries but not otherwise touching them much. Anthologies existed in the Roman world, from Alexander Polyhistor's On the Judeans in the first century BCE to Eusebius' various compendia. In a few places Josephus has cross-references to an earlier writing that we do not possess, and some scholars took these as proof that he had carelessly taken over even such references from his sources.<sup>59</sup> Yet Josephus does not claim (as did Polyhistor and Eusebius) to be anthologizing, and several developments make it impossible to view him as an anything other than a writer-composer in the fullest sense.

First, in 1920 Richard Laqueur showed that the main disparities in Josephus' narratives are not well explained by recourse to different sources because those disparities are most evident in the two accounts of his own life story (in War 2–3 and the Life). In autobiography as in describing the Hasmoneans, Herods, and governors, Josephus plainly felt free to retell the same stories in dramatically different ways. Although Laqueur's explanation, that Josephus rewrote stories because of systematic changes in his loyalties later in life, is also impossible to maintain from the evidence, his essential point endures: Josephus (and not new sources) was chiefly responsible for these changes.

Second, since Laqueur's time many new resources have appeared to facilitate the study of Josephus' language. Among these are the Complete Concordance to Flavius Josephus (1983) edited by K. H. Rengstorf, studies of the manuscript tradition by Heinz Schreckenberg,<sup>60</sup> and the electronic databanks of the Perseus Project and Thesaurus Linguae Graecae. Analysis of Josephus' language with the aid of these tools disallows at least the more extreme source-critical images of Josephus as mere copyist. For it emerges that across the range of his works, in spite of his experimentation with different styles, he writes with care and even artistry, consistent in his main preoccupations, key terminology, preferred phrases, literary devices, and historiography. In his magnificent paraphrase of the Bible (Ant. 1–11), where we know his ultimate source, Josephus has refashioned his material at macro- and micro-levels to reflect themes that pervade the whole work.<sup>61</sup> It is therefore not possible to recover his sources from his narratives, even if we know that he used sources, any more than it is possible to reconstitute the eggs from a cake.

<sup>58</sup> Williamson, World of Josephus, 302–3.

<sup>59</sup> These did not bother Eusebius, who matter-of-factly assumed that Josephus had written other books that did not survive: Hist. Eccl. 3.9.8.

If the nature of Josephus' narratives precludes the old supposition that we could recover sections of other writers in Josephus, a more general reflection on human language and historical method should caution us against hoping that we might find simple historical facts anywhere in literary texts. When we speak or write, we spin out an elaborate web of language, a world of discourse that is uniquely our own. In what I have written above, though I aspire to tell the truth, I have inevitably used my own conscious and unconscious forms of expression: a structure, diction, and syntax that have meaning for me. I may even have chosen a few expressions playfully, because of their significance for me, without expecting my envisaged readers to know that personal significance. At any rate, my language is no one else's; it is not objective, and it cannot merely reflect historical reality. The past furnishes no neutral language of its own, and every writer must interpret it in his or her own words.<sup>62</sup> Josephus is no different. The research tools mentioned above invite us to marvel at the depth and subtlety of

---

<sup>60</sup> Schreckenberg, Flavius-Josephus-Tradition, 173.

<sup>61</sup> See C.T. Begg, Josephus' Account of the Early Divided Monarchy (AJ 8,212–420): Rewriting the Bible (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1993); idem, Josephus' Story of the Later Monarchy (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 2000); L. H. Feldman, Josephus' Interpretation of the Bible (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998); idem, Studies in Josephus' Rewritten Bible (Leiden: Brill, 1998).

<sup>62</sup> On the impossibility of neutral, unbiased language in contemporary newspaper reporting, see D. Okrent, "The War of the Words: A Dispatch from the Front Lines," New York Times ("Week in Review"), Sunday March 6, 2005.

his discourse. But this helps us not at all with the problem of recovering facts.<sup>63</sup>

An example will help to make these abstract considerations concrete. Pontius Pilate is an important figure for New Testament readers, who understandably wish to know what Josephus says about him. From a variety of independent sources (gospels and pastorals, Philo, Josephus, archaeology) we may be confident that Pilate had been the governor of Judea for a significant period—at least ten and perhaps eighteen years<sup>64</sup>—preceding Josephus' birth in 37 CE. (If he came in 19 CE, he was governor of Judea through Jesus' entire adult life.) Such a long tenure would have decisively shaped the atmosphere of Judean-Roman relations in which Josephus grew up. Yet in the War Josephus relates only two episodes from Pilate's long Judean career: one concerning the governor's introduction into Jerusalem of military standards bearing images of Caesar, the other involving his appropriation of temple funds to build an aqueduct for the city (2.169–177). Since these events occurred before Josephus' birth, he must have known them through traditions or sources from his parents' generation.

Careful examination of the War's two episodes on Pilate, however, should give the historian pause. First, Josephus has thoroughly assimilated this figure to his larger narrative tendencies, which include the celebration of such Judean virtues as courage and endurance<sup>65</sup> and the portrayal of all Roman governors as low-level and unworthy “procurators”<sup>66</sup> (though they were “prefects,” reporting to the legates of Syria). Second, Josephus' diction throughout the two episodes is neither neutral nor self-evident, imposed by the events on a neutral observer, but is typical of his distinctive writing style: “huge disturbance” (ταραχή μεγίστη), “set [a disturbance] in motion” (κινέω), an event as spectacle or “sight” (ὄψις), “trampling on the laws” (πατέω... τοὺς νόμους), “representation [of an image]” (δείκηλον), “[the masses move] in close order” (ἀθρόος), “fall down prone” (καταπίπτω πρηνής), “hold out” (διακαρτερέω), “bare their swords” (γυμνῶ τὰ ξίφη), “incline [their necks]” (παρακλίνω), “transgress the law” (παραβαίνω τὸν νόμον), <sup>63</sup> Helpful observations in a similar vein are made by J. S. McLaren, Turbulent Times? Josephus and Scholarship on Judaea in the First Century (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998), 18, 67, 76–7, 179–218, though I find his solution difficult to pursue (264–288).

<sup>64</sup> See Schwartz, Studies in the Jewish Background, 182–217.

<sup>65</sup> War 2.171; cf. 1.138.

<sup>66</sup> War 2.169; cf. 2.118.

and “calamity” (συμφορά). Most of these terms are unattested or rarely found before Josephus, and yet he uses them to shape his narrative in the desired directions: they are part of his meaning-charged lexicon.

Third, and most problematic, although the underlying substance of the two Pilate episodes appears quite different in kind—the first describing a provocative measure that occurred during a single night, the second a response to a public benefaction that must have required months at least—in the retelling Josephus has assimilated each story to the other. He achieves this partly by parallel structures: they both involve life-threatening protests by aggravated masses before Pilate and his soldiers, secret plans and signals, encirclements involving weapons, a hearing before the governor’s tribunal-platform (βῆμα), and fatal consequences. Josephus drives home this assimilation by repetitive diction in the two accounts: “disturbance,” “aggravation,” “rabble,” “prone,” “tribunal-platform,” “surrounding,” “concealed,” “sword,” “agreed signal,” “trampled.” This repetition is partly for the sake of dramatic irony: the concealed standards anticipate concealed weapons; the trampling of the laws leads to the physical trampling of Judeans; and whereas the Roman forces must train hard to remain in close order, the indignant Judean masses move in close order spontaneously; they also instinctively act “as if by an agreed signal,” whereas the soldiers need secret signals to be carefully planned. Our narrator has plainly fashioned the two episodes to convey a certain atmosphere.

Now, are these accounts reliable or unreliable? How may we extract from them a historical kernel? Where do the plain facts reside? If we ask what constitutes these accounts, what they are made of, there can be only one answer: Josephus’ creative language. It is not possible to remove his language—even “and” and “but” are carefully chosen and manipulated—to expose any neutral, historical core. When Josephus is removed from his narrative, no residue remains.

It seems obvious, if these examples may stand for the whole, that we can have little confidence in any supposition about the historical realities underlying Josephus’ artful accounts. In the Pilate stories of War he bends whatever material was at his disposal (it is no longer at ours!) to make his points. We may well have our suspicions: that the masses could lie motionless for five days and nights (2.171); that the long project of aqueduct-building—Ant. 18.60 blithely halves War’s 80 km. length—really sparked a single massive demonstration (on completion? at an initial public announcement?); or that this public work was seen by everyone as misuse of temple funds. We may harbour suspicions, but we have no means of refining this story to produce what actually or probably happened: what exactly Pilate did and why, how he went about planning it, the local political conditions, and the reaction of leading figures in the Jerusalem establishment. We can neither embrace Josephus' story as fact nor excise his language, since we have no other language to substitute.

None of this deterred Schürer. He had the historical Pilate beginning his career with the standards episode (because it is the first of the two stories in Josephus), the masses besieging Pilate for five days and nights at his residence, Pilate's clever plan and signal, the Jews' defiance with bared necks, the shrieking mob protesting against the aqueduct, the concealed clubs, and the merciless beating of the people.<sup>67</sup> Although he related all this material from Josephus as if it were simple fact, Schürer became curiously guarded when he came to the New Testament episodes concerning Pilate, recognizing their limitations and biases.<sup>68</sup>

Now, we can confirm from contemporary literature (the gospels and Philo) and from a rare piece of material evidence—the tiberieum inscription from Caesarea—that there was a Pontius Pilatus in Judea under the principate of Tiberius. We can even confirm from the inscription and other indications that Pilate's title was "prefect," and not Josephus' "procurator." But what Pilate did during his long stay in Judea, and why he did it, the nature of his tenure as governor, are impossible to recover—even here where we have such independent evidence. For the vast majority of episodes in Josephus, where he is our sole source, there is a fortiori little or nothing we can know with confidence. People really did things in the first century, of course, and for various reasons, but for us today those facts exist only as refracted, sampled, interpreted, and structured within Josephus' world of discourse. Our situation is much like that of an audience for a historical film "inspired" by real events. We know that events lie behind the film but, in the absence of other information, we do not know where. Just as we would not walk up to a cinema screen and expect to draw out real objects and people, realizing that the film is a composition with its own integrity and criteria and different from the underlying reality, so in Josephus' narratives we meet an artful production that is opaque in relation to underlying historical realia. Where other evidence of the back-story exists, we might have a chance to get behind Josephus, though the example of Pilate does not encourage great optimism even there.

---

<sup>67</sup> Schürer, History of the Jewish People, 1:384–385.

<sup>68</sup> Ibid., 1:385.

The fundamental problem of Josephus' compositional art has usually been ignored by scholars eager to use his works for information about first-century Judea and New Testament backgrounds. In spite of occasional cautionary remarks about his biases, they still leave the impression that those biases might somehow be bypassed or evaporated off to leave a residue of fact. Josephus' narrative is assumed to present facts with the same neutrality of language as might be conveyed by "the colour blue"—something that all observers could agree on having seen if they had been present. If Josephus had been interested in describing the physical features of his characters, which could be indicated by relatively neutral terms, then we might indeed debate his accuracy. Did he accurately give the height of Titus or John of Gischala? Was he correct about their hair or eye colour? Did they carry the scars that he claimed? Like most other authors of his time, however, Josephus says not a word about such things. His history is mainly about interpreting the actions of his characters in terms of their motives, describing the outcomes, and offering explicit or implicit evaluation. Objective language for such portraiture does not exist. Therefore, there is no possibility of refining his narratives to produce neutral facts. Historians must proceed differently.

1.5. "Historical Accuracy, Reliability"

To clarify the problem, it may be useful to unpack the category of Josephus' "historical reliability" into several discrete components. Others could be adduced, but these will suffice.

- a. Scenic elements that can be measured and described in the neutral language of size, shape, colour, and technical nomenclature. Did the places that Josephus mentions actually exist? The landscape features, buildings, and landmarks? Were the groups and institutions he mentions operative at the time to which he dates them? Can we confirm the existence of the persons he names along with the roles and titles he gives them?

- b. Events in general. Did a roughly parallel event happen where and when he claims? E.g., Did Pilate authorize an aqueduct for Jerusalem, or introduce offensive images into the city on military standards? Did Eleazar son of Ananias halt the temple sacrifice for foreigners (War 2.409–410)?
- c. Event details. Exactly who did what, when, and in relation to what other actions? (If Eleazar did halt the sacrifice for foreigners, how did he do it exactly—in consultation with whom, and by what process? What happened to the animals? Were there specific stimuli not mentioned by Josephus? What role did Eleazar’s opinion play in the decision: was it his initiative or a compromise with others? Was it planned as a permanent measure or a temporary protest?) Did Josephus know and/or divulge all or most of the relevant information that we would have known if we had been there? How can we know whether he did? Through Josephus or not, can we have any confidence that we have enough contextual information to assess what was done in relation to what else?
- d. Motives, values, and interests. If we could travel back in time and interview the actors whose names appear in the narrative, would they explain their intentions and values much as Josephus does? (If Eleazar halted the sacrifice, what was his aim in doing so? What were the aims of his associates and advisers? Were these all the same?) No matter what they said, should we believe either them or Josephus? (Do we believe our own politicians and business leaders when they explain their motives?) How can we know their actual motives, or extract these from Josephus?

If we separate out even these elements of the stories, we see immediately a problem with incommensurate categories. Whereas (d) constitutes the heart of Josephus’ history, and (c) provides a narrative basis for his moral evaluations, modern historians tend to speak almost exclusively about (a), with a dash of (b), when they declare him “credible” or “reliable.”<sup>69</sup> That is because only material in (a) and to some extent (b) can easily be verified by archaeology, which has become since the 1960's the primary basis for confirming Josephus' "trustworthiness."

---

<sup>69</sup> E.g., M. Broshi, “The Credibility of Josephus,” Journal of Jewish Studies 33 (1982): 379–384; M. Aviam, “Yodefāt/Jotapata: The Archaeology of the first Battle,” in The First Jewish Revolt: Archaeology, History, and Ideology, ed. A. M. Berlin and J. A. Overman (New York: Routledge, 2002), 121–133; D. Dyon, “Gamla: City of Refuge,” in First Jewish Revolt, ed. Berlin and Overman, 134–153.

But if Josephus can be proven largely correct about the physical realities of his homeland—distances between familiar places, landscape features, major Herodian structures—that only puts him on the level of a good historical novelist. Even the fairly spectacular finds at Gamala and Jotapata, which confirm that the inhabitants tried to reinforce the walls before being overrun by the Romans,<sup>70</sup> cannot prove his accounts of who did what, when, and why—the stuff of his history. We may not say: he was right about the scenic elements and therefore he was probably right about the history itself. Given that his narratives are woven from his own linguistic and conceptual threads, what could it mean to declare them either "reliable" or "inaccurate"? We are not able to assume Josephus' world-view, perspective, prejudices, and language, even if we wished to do so. It is therefore meaningless to say that we either affirm or reject these accounts. We can only try to understand them.

Since critics do not often explain how they find reliable material in Josephus, it seems that most often they trust their instincts, accepting a story against the criterion: "Why would he make up something like this?" But instinct is of little use in historical scholarship, which requires us to describe our reasoning so that our steps may be traced by others examining the same evidence. Instinct cannot be reproduced, and it is also contra-indicated by the evidence of Josephus. Almost any given story in War, about the Hasmoneans or Herods or Josephus in Galilee, may seem plausible enough within that narrative. Josephus wrote in order to be plausible. Yet of the hundreds of episodes in Antiquities-Life that represent retellings of stories from the War, almost all have been significantly changed—with respect to date, immediate context, numbers and amounts, dramatis personae, and motives.<sup>71</sup> When read on their own, the later stories too seem plausible. But two contradictory narratives cannot accurately reflect the same events. Josephus' freedom in retelling suggests a comparable freedom in the first telling, which should make us doubt any and all accounts.

<sup>70</sup> See the essays by Aviam and Syon in previous note.

<sup>71</sup> A quick impression of the problems may be gained from Appendix C in S. Mason, Life of Josephus: Translation and Commentary. Vol. 9 of Flavius Josephus: Translation and Commentary, ed. S. Mason (Leiden: Brill, 2001).—S. J. D. Cohen, Josephus in Galilee and Rome: His Vita and Development as a Historian (Leiden: Brill, 1979), explores the problems in great detail. See further section 3 below.

In some important recent studies, intuition has been brought to bear upon apparent contradictions in the narrative: where Josephus contradicts his narrative interests, it is proposed, he must be preserving a reliable fact, for although he would have a satisfactory motive (in his historian's conscience) for including factual material that stood in some tension with his literary aims, he would have no motive for introducing false information to undermine his agenda.<sup>72</sup> The problem here is that identifying what contradicts Josephus' biases assumes an adequate account of those biases, whereas the contradictions proposed by these studies often turn out to be minor or contrapuntal themes within Josephus' highly textured narratives.<sup>73</sup>

Alas, the widely shared hope of transforming one kind of material (Josephus' artful narrative) into something quite different (real human actions and their motives) has more to do with alchemy than with history. Whether we are interested in the events themselves or content ourselves with Josephus' sources, the urgency of our need to know does nothing to remove the problem that we have no reasonable way of recovering these things from Josephus.

2. Josephus and the New Testament Narratives as Parallel, Crafted Stories

Although the traditional Christian use of Josephus and the modern humanist sequel had very different philosophical underpinnings, they shared two important features. First, they depended upon, and trusted, Josephus to transmit reliable, more or less ready-made facts. Reading Josephus and doing history were parts of the same operation, even if one conceded that not everything in Josephus was factual. Second, paradoxically, in spite of their eager and comprehensive embrace of

---

<sup>72</sup> Especially M. D. Goodman, The Ruling Class of Judaea: The Origins of the Jewish Revolt against Rome AD 66–70 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987), 20–21 and J. J. Price, Jerusalem under Siege: The Collapse of the Jewish State, 66–70 CE (Leiden: Brill, 1992), 33, 186.

<sup>73</sup> See S. Mason, "Flavius Josephus in Flavian Rome: Reading on and Between the Lines," in Flavian Rome: Culture, Image, Text, ed. A. J. Boyle and W. J. Dominik (Leiden: Brill, 2003), 559–589.

Josephus, neither model had the slightest interest in what Josephus actually wrote about: stories with beginnings, middles, ends, plots, and characters. As recently as 1988, in a thoroughly researched conspectus of Josephus studies Per Bilde was unable to cite much if any scholarship concerning the aims, structures, and dominant themes of Josephus' two major works.<sup>74</sup> So much use; so little reading! This shocking state of affairs highlighted the prepossessions of both traditional and modern scholarship.

Bilde himself was a significant catalyst in bringing about a new view of Josephus—as a competent and even sophisticated author.<sup>75</sup> This view has inescapable consequences for the project of doing history with Josephus, for if his narratives are wholly crafted artistic compositions, requiring interpretation, then historical reconstruction must be fully decoupled from reading, and become an entirely distinct intellectual exercise. This is not to say that the interpreter does not already have historical questions in mind—while reading. As in reading any text, we always maintain a dialectic between the words and the things to which the words refer, as a stimulus to interpretation. But attending to one story about the past, such as Josephus', is a different enterprise from reconstructing that past in itself; the latter task is driven not by any narrator's interests but by the investigator's questions, and hypotheses, and systematic interpretation. A new view of Josephus and history has necessarily reframed the subset problem of using Josephus for New Testament study.

---

<sup>74</sup> P. Bilde, Flavius Josephus Between Jerusalem and Rome: His Life, His Works and Their Importance (Sheffield: JSOT, 1988), 71, 92, 102, 118.

<sup>75</sup> An early work respecting Josephus' literary talents, which unfortunately had little impact on English-language scholarship at least, was B. Brüne, Flavius Josephus und seine Schriften in ihrem Verhältnis zum Judentume, zur griechisch-römischen Welt und zum Christentume, mit griechischer Wortkonkordanz zum Neuen Testamente und I. Clemensbriefe nebst Sach- und Namenverzeichnis (Wiesbaden: M. Sändig, 1969 [1913]). Henry St. John Thackeray also stood back from source-critical ambitions in his famous published lectures, H. St. John Thackeray, Josephus: The Man and the Historian (New York: Ktav, 1967 [1929]). He still removed the narratives from Josephus' authorial control, however, with his theory that industrious literary assistants were responsible for the War and the last quarter of the Antiquities. Other crucial works before Bilde, which in various ways portended the shift of scholarly interest, included H. Lindner, Die Geschichtsauffassung des Flavius Josephus im Bellum Judaicum (Leiden: Brill, 1972), H. W. Attridge, The Interpretation of Biblical History in the Antiquitates Judaicae of Flavius Josephus (Missoula: Scholars Press, 1976), and T. Rajak, Josephus: The Historian and His Society (London: Duckworth, 1983).

The scholar who arguably did the most to force the question of doing history with Josephus was Horst Moehring of Brown University. Already in his 1957 Chicago dissertation he showed that the novelistic-erotic elements that had already been found in Josephus' biblical paraphrase,<sup>76</sup> which could have come only from the author and not from his sources because they matched larger tendencies throughout the Antiquities, persevered also in the narratives of the Herodian period and first century CE (War 1–2; Ant. 14–18). Josephus was, therefore, truly the author of the works that bear his name.

Moehring reflected that since Josephus fashioned these later narratives, which had usually been considered "historical," with as much art as he had applied to the biblical paraphrase, we must accept that his narratives are literary creations with no necessary connections to what actually happened.<sup>77</sup> In a review discussing the work of a scholar who had attempted to wring historical facts from Josephus, albeit in a fairly sophisticated way, Moehring declared: "every single sentence of Josephus is determined and coloured by his aims and tendencies... To assume that what Josephus added to the facts is fiction merely indicates a complete misunderstanding of Hellenistic historiography."<sup>78</sup> And in his own major essay on Josephus' exploration of Judean-Roman relations, for Aufstieg und Niedergang (1984), Moehring would similarly caution: "It is entirely useless to make any attempts to separate in Josephus any supposedly 'objective' passages from any supposedly 'subjective' interpretations."<sup>79</sup> His position was a forthright repudiation of the fact/value distinction that had been the defining characteristic of modern historiography since Ranke.

Welcoming Josephus into the ranks of real authors, and the resulting radical separation between the task of his interpreters and that of historians finally catches up with some basic insights of many related disciplines: philosophy of language, hermeneutics, literary criticism, and philosophy of history. We lack the space to explore these here, but the question of historical method is crucial. As R. G. Collingwood (among others) observed, anyone who systematically ponders history

---

<sup>76</sup> M. Braun, Griechischer Roman und hellenistische Geschichtschreibung (Frankfurt a.M.: V. Klostermann, 1934).

<sup>77</sup> H. R. Moehring, Novelistic Elements in the Writings of Flavius Josephus (Ph.D. thesis, Faculty of the Division of the Humanities, University of Chicago, 1957), 64, 87, 144.

<sup>78</sup> Ibid., 241.

<sup>79</sup> Ibid., 868.

soon realizes that the historian cannot be in the business of taking some existing tailored account and declaring it accurate or inaccurate as it stands—or even in part. That would amount to another form of knowledge via authority. Even were the authoritative text treated critically, it would remain the source for—and therefore circumscribe the boundaries of—all possible knowledge about the events in question. Its concerns would become our concerns.

Collingwood argued rather that the historian, like an investigating detective, begins with a carefully formulated problem of his (or her) own. The historian's task is to assemble all relevant evidence, literary or material, and first understand that evidence in its own context. What were this author's aims and interests? Why does he/she include any information about the problem I am investigating? What sort of access did this person have to the people and events in which I am interested? What language does he/she use for these events, and why? Only when all the evidence is thus understood in situ is the detective-historian in a position to test hypotheses that might explain how the range of evidence came into being: what actually happened. History is therefore a fully autonomous exercise, in keeping with the spirit of the Enlightenment, not a mere christening of some traditional accounts as (more or less) "accurate."<sup>80</sup>

With the 1990's, after the Josephus Concordance and the first forms of electronic textual-analysis tools had appeared, came a number of efforts to work out the principle that Josephus and the New Testament are parallel corpora, which should be read first and foremost for their literary and rhetorical structures. Gregory Sterling's revised dissertation on historiography and self-definition in Josephus and Luke-Acts (1992) explored the parallels of genre—"apologetic historiography"—between these two important Jewish and Christian authors. Sterling was interested much more in the forms and functions of the compositions than in the external referents or underlying events. His was a truly historical study all the same, but with history now including the contexts and conditions of literary production.

Also in 1992 came Lester Grabbe's two-volume reference work, Judaism from Cyrus to Hadrian. Although he did not write for New Testament scholars in particular, Grabbe was responding directly to the positivist reference-work tradition embodied by Schürer. Rejecting any naïve quest for historical facts in the sources, his work distinguishes itself by its method. Whereas Schürer's procedure had been to list the primary sources and bibliography, and then move quickly to an ostensibly reliable historical narrative, Grabbe's configuration reflected his keen sensitivity to problems of method. For each period he touched upon (through seven centuries), he first presented a bibliographical guide and then a description of each kind of primary evidence in context: its aims, themes, and character. With this preliminary understanding of the evidence in hand, he specified the historical issues relevant to the period in question that seemed to demand resolution. One can follow here all the stages of historical inquiry: circumscribing the investigation, gathering evidence, understanding it in situ, and posing specific problems. Only with these steps completed did Grabbe attempt to work out historical hypotheses that would solve the problems and explain the evidence.

---

<sup>80</sup> R. G. Collingwood, The Idea of History (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1976 [1946]), 256–257.

The methodological chasm separating Grabbe's method from Schürer's is evident in his willingness to concede, at the end of several attempts at synthesis, that the evidence does not permit us to state with any confidence what happened.<sup>81</sup> The message is clear: historical work is not merely or even primarily about determining facts. Even where we cannot reach that ultimate goal, the process itself becomes a goal. Interpreting texts and material evidence responsibly is a fundamental historical exercise, though it is conceptually different from trying to verify events mentioned in the ancient texts.

Like Schürer, Grabbe realized the unique importance of Josephus for Judean history and devoted special space to him in the Introduction. But his method was different in principle. With an eye on Schürer he remarked that, "the Jewish historian's works have often been misused and cited without actually being read."<sup>82</sup> Unfortunately, Grabbe's important study fell short in exploring the character of Josephus' narratives in the depth suggested by his Introduction, especially in one significant chapter.<sup>83</sup> Still, his work marked a conceptual shift in dealing with the nature of the evidence and the problem of history.

Still another product of 1992 was the first edition of my Josephus and the New Testament. I aimed to introduce the New Testament reader to Josephus in keeping with the sort of methodological considerations

---

<sup>81</sup> E.g., Grabbe, Judaism, 93, 98, 111, 268, 281.

<sup>82</sup> Grabbe, Judaism, 10.

<sup>83</sup> The admirable method is abandoned in ch. 8 (e.g., Grabbe, Judaism, 468–482).

indicated above. Of the six chapters, accordingly, the first three were devoted to Josephus alone, on his own terms and for his own sake: his use in western tradition, his life story, and an overview of each composition. My point was that it is impossible to use any part of Josephus for other purposes, including New Testament interpretation, if one does not first have some idea of what the part means in light of the whole. Each element of Josephus' narratives was there to serve some larger interests, which must be understood before the item can be "used."

The latter three chapters took up, within that framework, issues prompted by New Testament study: figures important in the New Testament world, early Christian figures mentioned by Josephus, and the relationship between Josephus and Luke-Acts. Also in this latter half I wanted to present Josephus' works not as a source of historical data that could be plucked out by New Testament readers, but as contemporary, parallel narratives of extraordinary interest, that (taken as a whole) opened up new possibilities for understanding the New Testament and its world. The historical realities underlying the texts I mainly left untouched, though in a couple of cases (e.g., with John the Baptist) I undertook a preliminary historical probe as an illustration of how such an inquiry might look—if one first paid attention to all relevant narratives. My overriding argument was that reading Josephus and the New Testament contextually, irrespective of the facts referred to in the stories, is already enlightening historical work.

The method employed in Josephus and the New Testament was continuous with my earlier, more technical study of Josephus' Pharisees (1991). That book argued that historical claims about the Pharisees, which had proliferated for more than a century and which were often contradictory, should await a reasonable grasp of Josephus' portraits of the group. Rather than drawing out his statement that Pharisees were "reputed to be the most precise interpreters of the laws" and taking it as Josephus' obvious endorsement, for example, I tried to show that in context this Josephan language had other connotations. Sayings of Josephus were not independent data to be used at will, but components of a story. Others had already examined the Pharisees in rabbinic literature and in each of the gospels and Acts, but characteristically Josephus had not yet been thought worthy of interpretation. Scholars were still using his narratives as if they were immune from standard principles of language and historiography.

Jacob Neusner had much earlier paved the way for such a treatment of the Pharisees with a small textbook (1973) that first surveyed each text's portrait on its own terms; he was followed by Anthony Saldarini (1988) and Günter Stemberger (1991 [ET 1995]).<sup>84</sup> Such an approach is rapidly becoming de rigueur in studying figures and events from the New Testament period. The scholar first interprets each of the relevant narratives (or pieces of material evidence if available), only then proceeding to historical problems and hypotheses that might explain the whole range of evidence.

A promising field for such comparison between Josephus and the earliest Christian texts that I did not include in my book is his elaborate biblical interpretation. About a third of Josephus' corpus (Ant. 1–11 and several sections of Against Apion) is given over to biblical interpretation: the laws or “constitution” given by Moses and events in ancient Israel/Judah. This material has been the subject of intense and highly illuminating analysis over several decades, chiefly by Louis H. Feldman and Christopher Begg.<sup>85</sup> Although the use of scripture is of course a basic issue for the study of Christian origins, Josephus' biblical paraphrase has rarely been brought to bear on New Testament interpretation. It is odd that the enigmatic Dead Sea Scrolls, as well as Philo's abstruse allegories, should seem more relevant for New Testament scholars than Josephus' compelling and systematic reinterpretation.

Another large arena for comparative-narrative analysis includes the social, economic, and political history of first-century Judea and Galilee: the social structures of Jerusalem and the Galilean towns and villages, pre-war conditions in these places, the identity of the Galileans, sicarii, and countless others. Although these questions have of course been taken up in many reference works since Schürer, as also in recent studies of Galilean and Judean society, the use of Josephus still tends toward the positivistic. Instead of using his narrative as background, or passing critical judgement on the truth or falsity of his claims, I am proposing something different: trying to enter his narrative world in order to understand how the players, places, and events function within his stories, and how they would have been understood by his first readers. His perspectives<sup>86</sup> on the phenomena described above are, again, not facts but ingredients of a world-view that merits close consideration before one asks about the historical phenomena themselves.

---

<sup>84</sup> E. Rivkin, A Hidden Revolution (Nashville: Abington, 1978) should also be mentioned as a formal model of the procedure, though in execution he tended strongly toward assimilation of all the texts to his theory of the Pharisees.

<sup>85</sup> Feldman, Josephus's Interpretation; idem, Studies in Josephus' Rewritten Bible; idem, Judean Antiquities 1–4. Vol. 3 of Flavius Josephus: Translation and Commentary, ed. S. Mason (Leiden: Brill, 2000); Begg, Josephus' Account; idem, “Solomon's Apostasy (1 Kgs. 11,1–13) According to Josephus,” Journal for the Study of Judaism 28 (1997): 294–313; idem, Judean Antiquities 5–7. Vol. 4 of Flavius Josephus: Translation and Commentary, ed. S. Mason (Leiden: Brill, 2004).

3. Rhetoric and Historiography in Josephus and the New Testament

The ways in which scholars have sought to illuminate the study of the New Testament with the help of Josephus, described thus far, may be schematized as follows. In antiquity and the Middle Ages, he was regarded as a prestigious and approved guide:

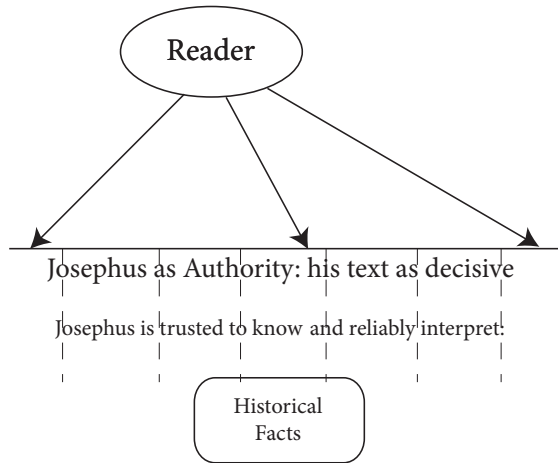

Figure 1

In the post-Enlightenment period, it was not Josephus' prestige but the facts and sources he was thought to transmit that established his value. Scholars imagined they could read through Josephus to realities beyond the text—events and sources:

<sup>86</sup> A preliminary effort for some of these issues is S. Mason, "Chief Priests, Sadducees, Pharisees and Sanhedrin in Acts," in The Book of Acts in its Palestinian Setting, ed. R. Bauckham, The Book of Acts in its First Century Setting, 4 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995), 115–77.

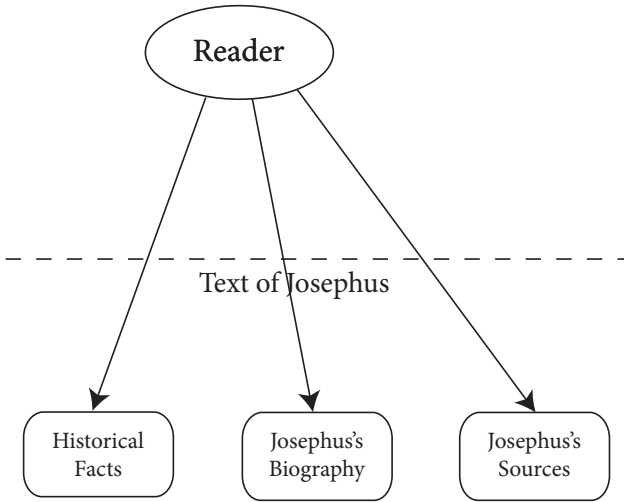

Figure 2

More recently, careful study of Josephus' narratives has rendered them largely opaque (in the absence of other evidence) to underlying realities, generating the increasingly accepted principle that interpreting Josephus and reconstructing history are distinct operations, the former being a necessary condition of the latter:

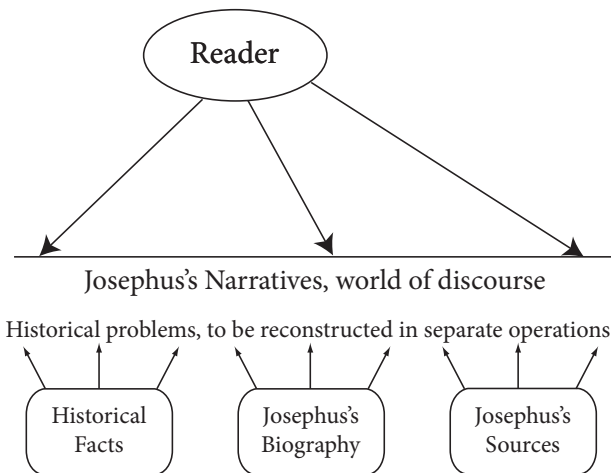

Figure 3

In this final section I would like to propose yet another model, which (following the same visual logic) might look like this:

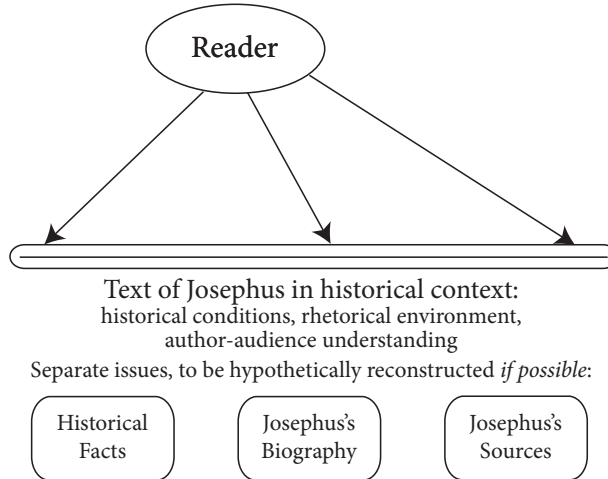

Figure 4

This is a significant refinement of the approach described in the previous section. There, the investigator was still focused ultimately on the events recounted in Josephus' narratives, but the problem of interpreting Josephus was recognized as a major obstacle. The New Testament reader interested in Pontius Pilate, the Pharisees and Sadducees, the temple leadership, or Herod's descendants had first to understand the functions of these groups and individuals in Josephus (as in each relevant text) before proceeding to a hypothetical reconstruction. But a further realignment of scholarly interests may turn out to be more productive for New Testament and Josephus scholars alike.

Three questions prompt this kind of refinement, namely: What is a text? What is historical? And what (from Josephus) will be most useful for New Testament study?

Just as facts do not speak for themselves, neither do texts. A text is a medium, a set of codes created by an author to communicate with specific envisaged audiences. Neutral, self-interpreting texts are inconceivable. Most obviously, the author must choose a language (Greek, Aramaic, English, Chinese) and a dialect of it that the envisaged audience will know. And that is only the beginning of the decisions: the author must then choose the pitch or register (e.g., high-literary, middle-brow, vernacular), the attitude or tone (e.g., dispassionate, passionate), the voice (omniscient observer, participant), the vocabulary (challenging, varied, neologistic; fashionably contemporary, evocative of classics; plain, emotive, highly symbolic; repetitive, formulaic), and the syntax—for example—that will reach particular audiences in desired ways if communication is to succeed. An important consideration is the audience's prior knowledge and value systems: What will need to be explained? At what point might explanation become condescending? What will make them laugh or shock them? What can be evoked (and with how much effort, or by what techniques?), possibly by way of satire or irony? All texts are media of communication, and Josephus is no exception.

We have seen (section 1) that Josephus composed in the first instance for audiences where he lived, in Flavian Rome.<sup>87</sup> Given the function of the text as medium between author and audience, we need a new kind of investigation of his narratives as themselves historical events: as transactions between author and audience (signaled in the diagram above by the penumbra around the text line). We are in a fairly promising position to learn about the political, social, and literary environment in Flavian Rome during the Flavian period (70 to 96 CE), through material and literary remains.<sup>88</sup> Once we abandon a textual fundamentalism that would expect a text to be all-sufficient and self-interpreting, once we take seriously its function as medium of communication with a real audience, the text may come alive again for us. Such dynamic analysis opens our imagination to literary devices understood by author and audience, unspoken cues and allusions that may have been more effective than a static reading of the text would suggest. Whereas a static reading of Josephus, as if his works were intended to be all-sufficient statements for all possible readers, predisposes us to lament his obscurities and contradictions, reading his works as transactions with Flavian audiences puts things in a different light. We need, in brief, to recover and re-enter the rhetoricized mentality of first-century Rome.

---

<sup>87</sup> For Josephus' audience: S. Mason, "Of Audience and Meaning: Reading Josephus' Bellum Iudaicum in the Context of Flavian Rome," in Flavius Josephus Between Jerusalem and Rome, ed. J. Sievers and G. Lembi (Leiden: Brill, 2005): 71–100.

<sup>88</sup> A. J. Boyle and W. J. Dominik, eds., Flavian Rome: Culture, Image, Text (Leiden: Brill, 2003), and J. S. Edmondson, S. Mason and J. B. Rives, eds., Flavius Josephus and Flavian Rome (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005) begin to gather this evidence.

Admittedly, such a reorientation of our historical interests from underlying facts to the world of the text makes a virtue of necessity. Even in our own time we find it difficult or impossible to assess the motives of politicians, entertainers, and other celebrities. Investigations of recent crimes, even where copious evidence appears to exist, often seem unable to determine what really happened, and carefully mounted prosecutions fail. How, then, shall we claim to know with probability who did what and why two millennia ago, on the basis of a single artful interpretation of sources unknown? Although we ought certainly to try where it is feasible to reconstruct specific phenomena from the past, a reorientation from the events behind the texts to the historical world of the text will pay dividends for the New Testament reader as for other students of antiquity.

Let me offer four examples of the ways in which the study of Josephus' historical world might be beneficial for the New Testament reader: architectonic literary structure, paraphrastic freedom, serious playfulness, and loyalty to patrons. Although countless other ancient texts also afford access to the ancient assumptions and values involved here, Josephus' proximity in time and interest makes his narratives particularly helpful for the New Testament reader.

3.1. Architectonic Literary Structure

Rhetoric, which was the pinnacle of the ancient educational system and which provided the orientation also for lower-level study, was grounded in a combination of memory, imitation, and mental versatility.<sup>89</sup> In a literary culture that was still to a large extent oral and aural, techniques for memorization of large bodies of material had wide currency. A basic principle was to organize one's mental material as the rooms of a large house, with resources of a similar kind kept in a given <sup>89</sup> Excellent recent studies are J. P. Small, Wax Tablets of the Mind: Cognitive Studies of Memory and Literacy in Classical Antiquity (London: Routledge, 1997), R. Criboire, Gymnastics of the Mind: Greek Education in Hellenistic and Roman Egypt (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2001), and N. T. Habinek, Ancient Rhetoric and Oratory, Blackwell Introductions to the Classical World (Malden, MA: Blackwell, 2005).

---

room or place (locus or topos), to which one could then resort as needed to draw them out for the purpose of persuasive argument.<sup>90</sup>

This architectural visualization of literature, coupled with the Greek and Roman taste for symmetry, suggested a technique for patterning literary-rhetorical creations, especially narratives and plays. The text would develop gradually towards a central pivot or fulcrum and then move away from it, so that the end balanced the beginning. A writer might structure the progression more or less densely, the degree of “concentricity” depending upon the number of parallel stops along the way. Josephus displays an awareness of the principle when he recalls in the prologue to the Antiquities (1.6–7) that he opted not to include the ancient history of the Judeans in the War because he wished to balance off (συμμετρέω) the beginnings and end of that work proportionately.

Each of his compositions, it turns out, is constructed around a pivotal episode, with matching beginning and end as well as parallel interim stops. In the War the central panel is the murder of the chief priests Ananus and Jesus in Jerusalem (4.314–333), which Josephus makes the decisive turn toward tyranny and banditry in the city. In the Antiquities the centre is the destruction of the first temple at the end of book 10, which anticipates the eve of the second destruction in book 20. In the Life, the central panel is that book’s only dream revelation to Josephus (208–209), which persuades him to stay and care for the Galileans. In the Apion, the end of book 1 and beginning of book 2 comprise his defence against Egyptian-Alexandrian writers, bounded on either side by the positive celebration of Judean culture. Although I lack the space to show it here, each work reveals also a fuller pattern of concentricity, with the two extremities and various points in between matched symmetrically in the two halves.<sup>91</sup>

As is well known, each of the gospels reveals comparable structural concerns. This is perhaps most easily noticeable in John, where the raising of Lazarus in chapter 11 is pivotal to the work in many respects, and in the two-volume Luke-Acts, in which the steady movement toward Jerusalem throughout the gospel (since Luke 9:51), the scene of Jesus’ death, resurrection, and ascension (Luke 24/Acts 1), is matched by the deliberate move away from that centre in Acts (e.g., 1:8). Peter's confession in Mark 8:27–30, after which the mood of the narrative sharply changes in anticipation of Jesus' crucifixion and resurrection, more or less bisects that story. And Matthew 13 hosts the third of that gospel's five concentrically patterned speeches. In none of these cases does the concentric structure necessarily dictate the work's primary meaning, for other structures, including the dramatic development to a climax nearer the end, are intertwined with it. Josephus' works illustrate, nonetheless, the ways in which a Greek-speaking author contemporary with the evangelists could overlay multiple structural patterns.

<sup>90</sup> Small, Wax Tablets, 81–116; Criboire, Gymnastics of the Mind, 166–167.

<sup>91</sup> See the third chapter of S. Mason, Josephus and the New Testament (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publishers, 1992; rev. ed. 2003).

In addition to such macro-structures in his compositions, Josephus frequently uses micro-structures within units, such as the A-B-A pattern. This can have several functions, for example: to introduce or seed a character, group, or theme, that will become more important later, or to build suspense. A striking example of the latter comes in War 2, where Josephus begins the story of King Herod's succession hearings before Augustus in Rome, but then abruptly breaks off the narrative to describe in detail the revolt of 4 BCE in Judea, before returning to conclude the succession hearings (War 2.1–100). Such patterns are well known in both Paul (e.g., 1 Cor 8–9–10) and the gospels—especially in the famous Marcan “sandwich” technique.

3.2. Paraphrastic Freedom

An axiom of rhetorical training was that one should never tell the same story twice in the same way. The prime directive in the art of persuasion was not to bore audiences, and the chief prophylactic against boredom was variety: of voice pitch and volume in speeches; of content, person, location, perspective, diction, and style in writing. The standard preparatory exercises in rhetoric included many forms of manipulating an episode or saying (chreia): rewriting it in each grammatical case-set; rebuttal and confirmation of its moral position; the application of encomium and invective to various behaviours; and—what interests us most—rewriting (παράφρασις).

The rhetorical handbooks (e.g., Theon, Prog. 62–64, 107–110; Quintilian, Inst. 1.9.2; 10.5.4–11) explain paraphrase as “changing the form of expression while keeping the thoughts.” According to Theon of Alexandria, one might do this in four ways: change of syntax, addition of words and phrases, subtraction and substitution of the same.

Although this may appear to be a fairly conservative undertaking (“keeping the thoughts”), we have numerous examples of the ways in which sayings, incidents, and stories were actually retold, and these reveal substantial differences of location, date, persons involved, and forms of sayings. Plainly, maxims and chreiai were heavily worked over for manifold uses, attributed to different individuals and contexts.<sup>92</sup> Among historically sensitive writers, Plutarch provides much material for us to track different versions—sometimes very different—of the same material as he reused it in his biographies and moral essays.<sup>93</sup>

Josephus is perhaps more directly relevant to the New Testament reader because he rewrote entire narratives from the War in the Antiquities-Life. Hardly any of the rewriting is verbatim, and much of it matches Theon’s four techniques for changing a story while keeping to the same thoughts. Yet there are also major differences between War and Antiquities-Life, as I have mentioned above. It may be helpful to consider one example, because it intersects with the concern for concentric structure just discussed.

In War 2.614–625, Josephus relates how the people of Tiberias revolted from his leadership at the instigation of his arch-rival John of Gischala. At the end of that story, Josephus (the character in the story) gathers the names of John’s followers and threatens their families and property if they do not yield to him (War 2.624–625); this produces thousands of defections and leads directly to John’s appeal to Jerusalem for help against Josephus (War 2.626), which produces a delegation from Jerusalem to oust him. When Josephus retells this episode in his Life, however, he clones it so that two very similar Tiberias-revolt stories now appear: at the one-quarter and three-quarter points of the narrative, respectively (Life 85–103, 271–308), thus enhancing the volume’s symmetry. The first part of War’s story (2.614–619) finds a close match to the first Tiberian revolt in the Life (85–103). Between the two Life stories, the dramatis personae, dramatic details, diction, and denouement are conspicuously similar. But the rounding up of John’s followers described in the single War story cannot occur at story of the first revolt in the Life, for John still has a large role to play there. It occurs instead near the end of the Life (369–372), after the delegation from Jerusalem has come and failed, and long after the first Tiberian revolt (85–103), appearing now as a delayed consequence of the second revolt (271–308).

---

<sup>92</sup> V. K. Robbins, Ancient Quotes and Anecdotes: From Crib to Crypt (Sonoma: Polebridge Press, 1978); Criore, Gymnastics of the Mind, 238; C. Pelling, Literary Texts and the Greek Historian (London: Routledge, 2000), 49–52.

<sup>93</sup> See Pelling (previous note).

Thus, what the War describes in a single episode would cause problems for the story line in the Life, and Life's two revolts could not fit in the War. Evidently Josephus has, for literary reasons, split one conflict into two for the later work. This bifurcation illustrates the lengths to which even a conscientious historian could go to sustain literary patterns.

This is not the place to rehearse the many differences among the synoptic gospels' accounts of parallel events: famously, Jesus' birth, trial, and resurrection, but also hundreds of smaller details. I wish only to suggest that the rhetorical mindset of ancient authors, illustrated by Josephus' sometimes radical reworking of stories, might provide fruitful ways of thinking about the literary assumptions and values of the New Testament writers.

3.3. Serious Playfulness

The study of Josephus as narrative is only now at a point that was reached by scholarship on many other classical and biblical texts decades ago, namely: taking his compositions seriously enough to look for their structures, ongoing themes, characteristic phrasing, and literary devices. The mere recognition that Josephus should be read in earnest has been a long time coming. But almost immediately after gaining that summit, we begin to realize that writing in ancient Rome was not entirely earnest, that rhetorical training inculcated—even for the most serious discussions—a sort of playfulness with words. Ancient speakers and their educated audiences were much more attuned than we normally are to the possibilities of language for figures of speech and particularly for double meaning, irony, and sarcasm.<sup>94</sup> In the case of the New Testament, although scholars have explored linguistic play and irony in some texts (notably in John), the great burden of the scholarly and theological traditions still predisposes readers to look always for earnest ideas and propositions. Perhaps the coming of age in Josephus studies can have a beneficial effect also here for New Testament study.

---

<sup>94</sup> E.g., F. Ahl, "The Art of Safe Criticism in Greece and Rome," American Journal of Philology 105 (1984): 174–208; S. Bartsch, Actors in the Audience: Theatricality and Doublespeak from Nero to Hadrian (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1994); V. Rudich, Political Dissidence under Nero: The Price of Dissimulation (London: Routledge, 1993); idem, Dissidence and Literature under Nero: The Price of Rhetoricization (London: Routledge, 1997); W. J. Dominik and J. Garthwaite, Writing Politics in Imperial Rome (Leiden: Brill, 2005); S. Mason, "Figured Speech and Irony in the

Space permits only a few examples of the sort of thing that Josephus can do with language. In the Life as a whole, as in parts of his other works, he establishes an ironic context from the start: the Jerusalem leaders know that Rome cannot be defeated, but they also know that it is futile or dangerous to oppose the masses when they desire war, and so they embark on a deliberate programme of doublespeak: thinking one thing but saying another (Life 17–22). Some of the ways in which this plays out are humorous for the knowing reader, for example in the interplay between Josephus and the Jerusalem delegation as they exchange diplomatic letters with each other that try to mask their true intentions (Life 216–31). More abstractly, throughout his works Josephus deploys to great effect the Platonic contrast between what merely seems or appears to be the case (one kind of appearances in the petty grasping after titles by tyrants and pretenders) and what really is the case (e.g., the lack of authority exercised by titled rulers) (War 1.110–112, 209, 561, 648; 2.2, 208; Ant. 17.41; 19.332; Apion 1.18, 67).

On a different level, Josephus enjoys playing with various meanings of the same word, sometimes picking up a term, reusing it in different ways, and then dropping it.<sup>95</sup> Again, he has fun—even in serious contexts—with people’s names. So, the two most disreputable and faithless leaders of Tiberias (Life 35–36) are Justus and his father Pistus (“righteous” and “faithful”). A crooked viceroy is named Varus (“twisted, crooked”), who is replaced by a sort of white knight, Aequus Modius (“fair measure”) (Life 61).

New Testament scholars are familiar with similar devices in gospels, from Matthew’s plays on genesis in the birth narratives (Matt 1:1, 18) to the ironic situation established by the authoritative prologue to John (1:1–18), which exposes many subsequent speakers as foolish or

---

Works of T. Flavius Josephus,” forthcoming in Edmondson, Mason and Rives, Flavius Josephus.

<sup>95</sup> Just one example: δημοσιόω appears only twice in all of Josephus, once meaning publication of a book (Life 363) and a few sentences later (Life 370) meaning the confiscation of property—two very different kinds of “making public.”

mendacious. The seeming/being contrast comes to the fore in numerous places, not least in Paul's disparaging description of the Jerusalem leaders as "those who (merely?) appear to be something" (Gal 2:6) and throughout Hebrews. As for names: it seems that Paul is having some serious fun at Apollos' expense when he finds a biblical passage in which God threatens (in Greek translation), "I will destroy (ἀπολω) the wisdom of the wise" (1 Cor 1:19).<sup>96</sup>

3.4. Patronage and Loyalty

The last area I shall mention in which Josephus' works may throw light on the New Testament texts has to do with questions of patronage and loyalty. Nowadays most New Testament readers know something of how important social networks were in the Roman world, and of the mainly unwritten system of benefactions flowing from the more to the less powerful, in exchange for unswerving loyalty.<sup>97</sup> It is one thing to describe the system in theory, another to see it in practice. Roman literature abounds with examples, but the Judean aristocrat Josephus also provides vivid instances of many aspects of patron-client relationships in actual life—that is, in the life-like situations related by his narratives.

On the one hand, he is the appropriately grateful, indeed boastful recipient of honours from his undisputed social betters: Nero's consort Poppaea Sabina, Vespasian, Titus, Domitian, and Domitian's wife Domitilla (Life 16, 414–430). Tokens of recognition from the most powerful, along with his putative illustrious ancestry and sterling character (Life 1–6), are understood to enhance his status immeasurably by ancient standards. On the other hand, he is an exemplary patron himself, the powerful man who freely exercises his authority to rescue and assist his less fortunate friends in time of need, especially after the Roman conquest of Jerusalem, when prisoners were being processed (Life 418–421). It is a telling sign of our different social assumptions that this story, no doubt related by Josephus to illustrate his reliable role as patron, has been read by modern readers in the opposite way: as an indictment of his character for failing to care about those he could not help.<sup>98</sup>

<sup>96</sup> For Apollos as interloper in Corinth, cf. 1 Cor 1:11; 3:10–15; 4:15; 16:12.

<sup>97</sup> E.g., R. P. Saller, Personal Patronage under the Early Empire (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982).

<sup>98</sup> Williamson, World of Josephus, 303.

Perhaps most interesting for New Testament readers is Josephus' palpable sense of grievance when those who he thinks should be his grateful clients turn on him to follow other patrons. We see this throughout his Life. Even though he has treated the Galileans kindly and with restraint, managing their problem with bandits, facilitating travel for family contacts, and providing for their every need (as he presents it), time and again he encounters defection to a rival who seems temporarily more persuasive (87–103, 104–111, 122–125). Many of the tactics that Josephus employs to win his people back, as a military commander (e.g., Life 170–178), were not available to Paul, though the traveling preacher does threaten a group in Corinth—now favouring another leader who has interfered in Paul's territory—that he might come “with a rod” (1 Cor 4:21). Paul seems to be keenly aware of a principle that groups established by him belong to him: he will not interlope on others' turf (Rom 15:20), and he becomes furious when others impose themselves on his groups (1 Cor 4:15–21; 2 Cor 10:13–11:23; Gal 1:6–9; 4:10–20). He also seems to be trying to trick the Corinthians into contributing to his collection for Jerusalem in 2 Cor 9:1–5, by citing his earlier assurances to the Macedonians concerning their willingness to give, in a manner that the wily Josephus, who used many feints to subdue the Tiberians (Life 128–144), might well have admired. At any rate, in both cases one can see similar emotions of offence and outrage at the defection of groups that should belong to the founding patron.

4. Conclusions

The main point of this essay may be succinctly stated. Traditional use of Josephus for illumination of the New Testament began with a trust in his work because of his prestige. In modern times his authority remained undiminished, but for the very different reason that he was thought to preserve excellent sources or even raw data. Notwithstanding the many refinements in the contemporary study of other ancient texts, including the New Testament, it seemed marvelously possible still to gain from Josephus at least snippets of fact—even if these needed to be cautiously removed from their tainted packaging. Recent approaches to Josephus, by contrast, are preoccupied with his writings as sophisticated artistic productions. This shift of perspective has created new possibilities for using Josephus in relation to the New Testament: both corpora are seen as highly wrought collections that must be studied patiently if the parts are to make sense in terms of the whole. Historical reconstruction of the underlying events and personalities in both or either set of texts depends upon such careful interpretation of the evidence.

This paper has argued, however, that possibly the greatest value for New Testament readers in studying Josephus lies in less obvious places. We may never, without future discoveries, reach much certainty about many of the persons, groups, institutions, and events to which Josephus and the New Testament both refer, a fortiori those that figure only in Josephus. Yet we do have the very rich texts themselves, and in the case of Josephus we know a good deal about the general environment in which he wrote. If we stop looking for a “quick fix” from these compositions, for bits of reliable information, and undertake the more ambitious project of understanding his works in light of their audiences and social situations, we shall begin to rediscover a large corpus of texts produced in one of history’s most portentous moments: Rome’s Flavian era. Seeing how another prolific writer with connections to Judea’s history and scriptures expressed himself in Flavian Rome can only enhance our reading of the New Testament.

RABBINIC WRITINGS IN NEW TESTAMENT RESEARCH

DAVID INSTONE-BREWER

1. The Use of Rabbinic Literature

The use of rabbinic literature for the study of the gospels has been hugely influenced, for good and ill, by John Lightfoot's Horae Hebraicae et Talmudicae.<sup>1</sup> He used the model of a commentary to collate passages from rabbinic literature which contained parallels and background material. This was successful at adding colour and context to the gospels with regard to the Temple cult and, to some extent, the manner of Jewish teaching, but fell short on theological background. This deficiency was partly due to Lightfoot's self-conscious rejection and reaction against Jewish theology, but it was also due to the nature of the available texts which were largely concerned with rules for life rather than the meaning of life.

New Testament scholars have largely inherited Lightfoot's program, his attitude to rabbinic theology and the limitations of the literature which is available. A. Edersheim's works<sup>2</sup> can be regarded as a useful popular reformulation of Lightfoot's findings. During the last century the amount of available information has increased monumentally, with the massive projects by Emil Schurer revised by Vermes,<sup>3</sup> Paul Billerbeck,<sup>4</sup> George Foot Moore,<sup>5</sup> and Safrai's CRINT

---

<sup>1</sup> Easily accessible in English as John Lightfoot, A Commentary on the New Testament from the Talmud and Hebraica, Matthew—I Corinthians (Peabody: Hendrickson, 1989).

<sup>2</sup> Principally Alfred Edersheim, The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah (London: Longmans, 1900). Also useful for New Testament studies: The Temple: Its Ministry and Services (Peabody: Hendrickson, 1994) and Sketches of Jewish Social Life (Peabody, Mass: Hendrickson, 1994).

<sup>3</sup> Emil Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1986).

<sup>4</sup> Hermann Leberecht Strack, von Hermann L. Strack and Paul Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrasch (München: Beck, 1922–1961).

<sup>5</sup> George Foot Moore, Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era: the Age of the Tannaim (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1927–1930).

project.<sup>6</sup> Schurer succeeded in putting rabbinic literature into an historical context, while Billerbeck pulled together the strands in a first attempt to show historical development within Jewish traditions and Moore highlighted the variety of Judaisms in the first century. The recent CRINT project attempts to use rabbinic materials in a more historico-critical way, though in practice it falls short of this aim. It does, nevertheless, represent a tremendous compendium of the information which has been amassed so far. Ongoing studies include revisions of Billerbeck (by the Orion centre and by Neusner, Chilton et al.) and the TRENT project.<sup>7</sup> The revisions of Billerbeck aim to complete the task of Lightfoot and to address the problem of dating, as well as applying historico-critical criteria to the choice of texts and to the method of applying 'parallels' for illustrating the New Testament. The TRENT project does the reverse, by systematically dating the early rabbinic material and presenting it in its own context, whether or not a 'parallel' can be demonstrated with the New Testament.

The pursuit for a theology of Judaism has proved much more difficult than working out the laws and practices of Judaism, because classical rabbinic literature contains so little theology. This task was helped vastly by the rediscovery of apocalyptic Jewish texts, Qumran documents, Nag Hammadi texts and others which were much more concerned with theology than the classical rabbinic literature was. These discoveries have been somewhat distracting because they presented scholars with a bewildering variety of Judaisms, mostly from the fringes of mainstream society. It was tempting to extrapolate a theology of normative Judaism from the vast treasures preserved by the Qumran community, by apocalyptic sects or by second and third century Jewish Gnostic groups. The theologies of these fringe groups have therefore exerted an undue influence on New Testament scholarship simply because, by an accident of history, their documents were preserved. While these documents undoubtedly provide invaluable insights into the theology of the New Testament, it has been too easy to ignore the beliefs of those against whom these minority groups were campaigning so loudly.

---

<sup>6</sup> S. Safrai and M. Stern, eds., Compendia rerum Iudaicarum ad Novum Testamentum (Assen: Van Gorcum, 1974–76).

<sup>7</sup> D. Instone-Brewer, Traditions of the Rabbis in the Era of the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005–).

Some scholars have attempted to present the theology of those Jews who did not go off into the desert to keep pure, or into secret circles to await the imminent end. This task is much more difficult because the documents preserving the theology of the majority were edited much later than the first century and the earlier documents are largely concerned with how to interpret the legal codes of the Old Testament. Montefiore and Lowe<sup>8</sup> collected rabbinic texts which give indications concerning rabbinic theology and categorised them into subjects for easy use. Their aim was more apologetic than historical, to counter the crass caricatures of rabbinic theology which were too often perpetrated by New Testament scholars, so they largely ignored the problems of dating other than stating the time when named authors were living. This work has been repeated in a more dispassionate way by Neusner.<sup>9</sup> Urbach in his Sages<sup>10</sup> attempted to isolate the theology of the sages living before 70 CE (i.e. the “rabbis” before they were called “Rabbi,” which is roughly equivalent to the “Pharisees”). He succeeded in giving a believable presentation of their theology largely because he approached them with sympathy and understanding, which enabled him to stand beside them and view the world through their eyes. In a task like this one, which involved reading between the lines as much as interpreting actual texts, and where imagination is more important than analysis, Urbach’s sensitive and sometimes uncritical approach is perhaps necessary. However, it is often difficult to know when the influence of later orthodoxy helps him project future theological tidiness into the variety of first-century schools and sects.

Most of these studies, of both Jewish practice and theology, have failed to present Judaism within its own context, either because they were written from the perspective of the New Testament, or because they have consisted of a list of texts rather than a study of the literature as a whole. Also, they often fail to distinguish between sources originating after 70 CE and the minority of traditions which originated before 70 CE. The destruction of the Temple and near

---

<sup>8</sup> C. J. G. Montefiore and H. Loewe, A Rabbinic Anthology (London: Macmillan, 1938).

<sup>9</sup> Jacob Neusner, The Theology of the Oral Torah: Revealing the Justice of God, McGill-Queen’s Studies in the History of Religion (Montreal: McGill-Queen’s University Press, 1999).

<sup>10</sup> Ephraim E. Urbach, The Sages: Their Concepts and Beliefs, trans. Israel Abrahams (Jerusalem: Magnes Press, 1979).

extinction of all Jewish leadership marked a cataclysm which not only forced Judaism to change its view of the cult (now that sacrifices and many other rites were impossible) but encouraged a consolidation of theology and practice. Virtually all of the few Jewish leaders who survived this tragedy were Hillelite Pharisees. This meant not only that all of Judaism came to resemble that of the Hillelites, but also that the history of Judaism was recorded in terms of agreement or disagreement with what now became orthodoxy.

There was also a new effort after 70 CE to rein in the diversity of opinions, and work towards a unified consensus. There is little indication that non-Hillelites were coerced into uniformity, though it is difficult to be certain because history is written by the victors. It seems that unity was literally voted for by the majority. Although a majority can tyrannise minorities through democratic processes, the process of voting was not simply to oppress the few Shammaites or Sadducees who remained, because even a venerable scholar like Eliezer ben Hyrcanus was punished with temporary excommunication for failing to follow a majority vote. This emphasis on unity was probably a popular effort to overcome the disunity which they perceived to be one cause of their downfall, so that it was in everyone's interest to have a common theology and practice.

One consequence of all this was an unconscious rewriting of history. No-one set out to write a history of the majority viewpoint, but it was inevitable that all the records of the past (which were written for the first time only after the end of the second century), were interpreted through the eyes of the new orthodoxy. This makes it very difficult to know which beliefs and particularly what variety of beliefs existed before 70 CE.

Clearly, the only traditions which might be said to have influenced the writers of the gospels or their readers were those which originated before 70 CE. Later traditions can still be useful if they represent beliefs or practices which continued unchanged before and after 70 CE, but in order to use later traditions we need to know how ideas and practical situations changed over time. The task of unravelling this history is very different for the four major forms of rabbinic literature: halakhah, aggadah, parables and targums, which will now be addressed in turn.

2. Sources of Rabbinic Traditions

2.1. Halakhic Traditions

Halakhic literature is concerned with the interpretation and application of the laws of the Torah. The separation of this from aggadic literature (which is concerned with stories and exegesis of non-legal portions of Scripture) is often untidy and apparently arbitrary, because the two forms of tradition were usually transmitted together and by the same people, but the distinction is useful because of the different ways in which these traditions were treated. When there was a dispute about the accuracy of a halakhic tradition, it was common for another scholar to interrupt and state his version, and the ensuing debate was often recorded. Before 70 CE each school could have a different interpretation of legal scripture texts, though no individual or school could live with indecision about their own interpretation, but after 70 CE a single interpretation had to be accepted by all of Israel.

The exact wording of aggadic traditions, by contrast, was a matter of indifference, and a different version was merely regarded as an interesting variation, without any concern about which one was correct. A non-legal scripture could have a large number of interpretations, and they were often collected together in a list where each is introduced as simply “Another interpretation...”

These differences between halakhah and aggadah were due mainly to their different purposes and partly due to the different realms in which they were discussed. Halakhah belonged in the realm of the schoolhouse or courthouse, where debate was encouraged as a learning method, while aggadah belonged in the realm of the synagogue where one listened politely to sermon illustrations without interrupting. Aggadah was often used to spice up halakhic teaching, and halakhot were included in sermons, so they were usually mixed together, but they remained distinctive because they had different purposes. Halakhah determined the specific way in which Scripture should be obeyed, and even accidental disobedience necessitated a sin offering (while the Temple stood) plus repentance on the Day of Atonement. Aggadah determined ethics and theology which, according to some, determined one’s standing in eternity, but there was no immediate consequence for disobedience.

2.1.1. Dating Halakhic traditions

The earliest written collections of halakhic traditions are the Mishnah and Tosephta which were edited about 200 and 400 CE respectively.<sup>11</sup> These works contain many traditions which are attributed to people who lived before 70 CE. The Jerusalem and Babylonian Talmuds are later commentaries on these works, edited about 400 and 500 CE respectively,<sup>12</sup> though they occasionally contain early traditions which were not included in Mishnah or Tosephta. The so-called halakhic midrashim (the earliest are Mekhilta, Sifra and Sifré,<sup>13</sup> edited about 250 CE) are less reliable for dating because their realm is closer to the synagogue than the courthouse or schoolroom.

Mishnah is a collection of legal traditions which appear to be summaries of debates ending in conclusions decided by a majority vote or by consensus. A single topic may be as short as one unchallenged ruling or as long as a debate extending for several generations. The final decision or summary might be stated by a respected rabbi, or as an anonymous consensus or, if it is contrary to a ruling by a named rabbi, it is stated as a decision made by “the Sages”—i.e. a majority vote.

The traditions in Tosephta are similar to those in Mishnah, though the debates are not so structured and often do not end with a clear conclusion. This has led to the conjectures that it is a commentary on

---

<sup>11</sup> Mishnah has been translated into good flowing English by Herbert Danby, The Mishnah (London: Oxford University Press, 1933); in conformity with Jewish traditions by Philip Blackman, Mishnayoth, 7 vols., 2nd rev. ed. (New York: Judaica Press, 1963–64); and into literal American by Jacob Neusner, The Mishnah: a new translation (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1988). Tosephta has only been translated into English by Jacob Neusner, The Tosefta, 6 vols. (New York: Ktav, 1977–1986).

<sup>12</sup> English translations of the whole are by Isidore Epstein, The Babylonian Talmud, 18 vols. (London: Soncino Press, 1948–1952), often known as the “Soncino Talmud,” and by Jacob Neusner, The Talmud of Babylonia, 16 vols. (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1984). The Jerusalem Talmud is only fully available in English by Jacob Neusner, The Talmud of the Land of Israel, a Preliminary Translation and Explanation, 35 vols. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1982), though another good flowing translation is becoming available by Heinrich W. Guggenheimer: Edition, translation and commentary by Heinrich W. Guggenheimer, The Jerusalem Talmud (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2003–).

<sup>13</sup> These and almost all other non-Talmudic rabbinic collections edited up to the end of the third century are translated in the series by Jacob Neusner, The Components of the Rabbinic Documents: From the Whole to the Parts, 32 vols. (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1997). Midrash Pirke de Rabbi Eliezer is missing from this series—this is translated by Gerald Friedlander, Pirke de Rabbi Eliezer: (The chapters of Rabbi Eliezer the Great) According to the Text of the Manuscript Belonging to Abraham Epstein of Vienna (London: Bloch, Paul, Trench, Trubner, 1916).

Mishnah, or (more likely) a Mishnah-like project put together by a school which disagreed with the Mishnah's conclusions, or (most likely) a collection of 'left-over' traditions which have been set within a structure identical to that of Mishnah so that the reader can identify their original context.

The stages in these debates are difficult to date because a large proportion of the opinions are anonymous and the attributions to named individuals cannot be accepted uncritically. Jacob Neusner, who has been the most vocal critic of pre-critical methodology,<sup>14</sup> has also done much of the groundwork which eventually provided some validation for these attributions. Through voluminous and detailed work on the structure of arguments and progression of debates in Mishnah, he showed that the relative chronology represented by the attributions were essentially accurate. By analysing the form and progression of individual units he showed that traditions which were attributed to earlier authorities were virtually always antecedent to traditions which were attributed to later ones.

A relatively secure conclusion from studies by Neusner and others is that traditions attributed to a particular scholar in Mishnah can normally be assumed to originate from that scholar or possibly another scholar from the same time. This conclusion has two major caveats: it only holds true for halakhic traditions, and it becomes less reliable with time. Long periods of time make it less likely that rulings have been transmitted faithfully, and this problem was exacerbated by the practice of attributing important anonymous ruling to a highly revered individual from the distant past—such as handwashing before meals which is attributed to Solomon (b. Sabb. 14b). Therefore it is unsafe to accept an honorific story concerning a famous rabbi (though a story which is the sole basis for a halakhah may perhaps be safe, with supplementary evidence), or a ruling by someone before the first century CE, or a ruling by someone in the first century CE which is recorded in Talmud but not in Mishnah or Tosephta.

Many anonymous halakhic traditions can also now be dated by fitting them into the logical progression of other rulings which can be dated on the basis of attributions and Neusner has even stated the expectation that the majority of anonymous material can one day be dated.<sup>15</sup> The TRENT project is making a first attempt at systematically identifying all the halakhic material which can be dated before 70 CE, and it is likely that, on the basis of these findings, a more detailed chronological development of legal traditions will be built up by means of which many more anonymous traditions can be dated. Occasionally even lost rulings can be dated, such as the suspension of Sabbath prohibitions in situations of mortal danger, which is found nowhere in rabbinic literature though it is referred to by R. Mathia b. Heresh (m. Yom. 8:6, early second century) and Eliezer b. Hyrcanus (t. Sabb. 15:16, just after 70 CE). They both refer to it as a principle which everyone accepts, so it must be older than both of them, and this is confirmed by the Qumran ruling that one can rescue “a living man who has fallen into water” though not a corpse (4Q265 VI, 6).<sup>16</sup>

---

<sup>14</sup> A seminal statement of this criticism was his on "The Use of the Later Rabbinic Evidence for the Study of First-Century Pharisaism" in Approaches to Ancient Judaism: Theory and Practice, ed. William Scott Green, Brown Judaic Studies 1 (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press for Brown University, 1978), 215–225.

However, one must always be aware that editing can take place at several stages before the final written form, so even a tradition which appears to be datable may contain layers from more than one time period. These layers have to be examined by form critical and tradition history methods which can help to identify a core from which the rest of the tradition developed. Fortunately the legal editors worked with the motive of preservation not emendation, because rabbinic law was built up in the manner of case law, where more recent rulings rest and rely on the foundation of former rulings. Therefore, although editors might shorten a tradition by removing redundant elements, they were keen to keep former opinions intact because even if they disagreed with them, these opinions were necessary for the understanding and framework of later rulings.

The first example illustrates some of the problems of edited layers within a tradition, while the second shows the impact which an understanding of the development of halakhic traditions can have on our understanding of the gospels.

---

<sup>15</sup> Neusner, A History of the Mishnaic Law of Purities, Studies in Judaism in Late Antiquity 3 (Leiden: Brill, 1974–97), 4: 244.

<sup>16</sup> Details in TRENT II chapter on Shabbat.

2.1.2. Example of Halakhah: Stone Jars

The ruling about stone jars at Mishnah Kelim 10.1 is an interesting test case for these dating techniques, because although the dating of this ruling is extremely difficult and tenuous, the result of this dating finds remarkable confirmation in archaeology. It is also an interesting test case for the pervasiveness of rabbinic rulings, because although it is expensive and difficult to apply this ruling the archaeological findings suggest that first-century Palestinians generally obeyed it.

The following shows the likely history of this tradition by separating out different stages of editing.

<sup>1</sup> | <sup>2</sup> | <sup>3</sup> - stages of editing

These utensils protect [from impurity if they are closed] with a tight lid:

Utensils of dung, utensils of stone, utensils of soil utensils of earthenware, utensils of alum crystal, or of fish bones or skin {this line is absent from some eds.}

or of sea mammal bones or skin or utensils of wood which are clean.

They protect whether [the lid] is at their [top] opening or at the side;

whether [the utensil] is standing on its base or leaning on its side.

[If] they are inverted on their opening, they protect everything under them as far as the deep.

R. Eliezer [b. Hyrcanus] [rules in this case that] they are impure.

And [so] they protect everything, except for earthenware utensils which protect nothing except the foods and liquids [inside them] and the earthenware utensils [themselves].

The whole of this tradition is anonymous, except for the disagreement by Eliezer, whose comments normally date from soon after 70 CE. The tradition appears to have been enlarged by editing in at least two stages (and probably more) from a core ruling which is marked in bold.

The first three types of utensil can be identified as a unit of tradition by themselves because they occur in other traditions, including later ones, without any of the rest of the list (m. Ohal. 5:5; 6:1; m. Parah. 5:5; m. Miqw. 4:1; m. Yad. 1:2). At Qumran there is also evidence of a three-fold list, but it is slightly different: wood, stone and dust (CD XII, 15–17). This may indicate that there was a point of contention on this matter between Qumran and rabbinic Judaism, or (more likely) that the rabbinic three-fold list developed after the Qumran sectarians had separated from the rest of Judaism. The rest of the list probably grew gradually when scholars debated this passage. It is noteworthy that glass and metal vessels are not listed, because by the first century these were already declared unable to protect against impurity (though this is not recorded in any work earlier than the Talmuds—b. Sabb. 14b; y. Sabb. 1:4 = y. Pesah. 1:6 = y. Ketub. 8:11).

The second half is a discussion about closing the vessel, and the whole of it can be seen as a discussion of the words, “They protect whether [the lid] is at their opening or at the side.” The wording is curious because one would expect it to say “at the top or the side,” but instead of “top” it says “mouth” or “opening.” Presumably it originally referred to a vessel with its main opening at the top but also one at the side, such as a vessel with a side spout which was commonly used in the first century (see illustrations in Magen). Later generations interpreted this ruling in two different ways: first, it did not matter whether the container was standing upright (with the opening at the top) or leaning (with the opening at the side); second, it did not matter at all where the opening was, so the vessel could even be upside down. This last point is the one which Eliezer disagreed with, so it was probably being debated shortly after 70 CE.

We might expect the summary at the end to be the latest element of this tradition, but it is actually taken from the Shammaite position in a debate with the School of Hillelites (see m. Ed. 1:14). Although this school debate does not appear to have been preserved in its original form, there is no reason to doubt that it represents an actual debate, because if it had been invented (i.e. mis-remembered) at a later date we would expect the Hillelite position to conform to the accepted view here. It is therefore likely that this summary was already well-accepted by 70 CE, so that it was impossible to change it. Therefore it is likely that this summary comes from the mid-first century at the earliest. The summary contains a reference to earthenware utensils, so it presumably originated from a time after this type of utensil was added to the original list of three. This helps to confirm that the original list of three date from the early first century.

This detailed and somewhat tenuous reasoning which is needed to substantiate the dating of this tradition is not typical, because most datable traditions can be identified with far less complexity and guesswork. At the end of this process we have a ruling which is likely to come from the early first century:

Utensils of dung, utensils of stone, [and] utensils of soil protect [from impurity] whether [the lid] is at their [top] opening or at the side.

This ruling is very significant because it enables a householder to draw water before a Sabbath or a Holyday (a Yom Tov) and then keep it safe from impurity. If the water was in an earthenware vessel and someone with impurity (such as someone who had had sexual relations in the previous night) walked past and overshadowed it, they could render the whole day's water supply unfit for use. If this happened on a Sabbath, it was impossible to fetch replacement water. This rabbinic ruling says that a tightly stoppered utensil could keep the water safe from such impurity if it was made of these specific materials. Also, when these vessels came into contact with impurity, they could be cleansed by immersion, whereas earthenware ones had to be smashed.

This concern for purity was only necessary if the meal included holy food, such as a Passover lamb, a peace offering, fellowship offering or food bought with second tithe (i.e. the one tenth of one's income which was spent on food during festivals at Jerusalem). Although such purity was not strictly necessary at other times, many households tried to live up to these standards of purity for all special meals (such as Sabbath meals or when guests were present, cf. the stone jars at the Cana wedding, John 2:6), and some households tried to maintain these standards at all times (cf. m. Demai. 2:1-3).

These concerns about purity at meals were only important during the time of the Temple, because after its destruction there were no meals which included holy things. Some people would still have continued to try and eat every meal in purity, but this started to become meaningless when the ashes of the red heifer ran out, which were needed to purify from death—the prime source of impurity, and one which could be passed from person to person. Very soon all of Israel would have shared the same impurity as the Gentiles, so there was little point in using expensive vessels to guard from this ceremonial and now largely theoretical impurity.

Stone utensils were very expensive, so this rabbinic ruling was probably an attempt to enable poorer people to keep these standards of purity by allowing the use of utensils which were made from dry moulded dung (as still used in some Arab villages) or unfired clay. These were probably allowed because neither of them were specifically named in Torah as being susceptible to impurity, and later scholars found other exceptions which were added to the list. The list at Qumran includes “stone utensils” but the other two categories are different (though perhaps the Qumran “dust” means the same as the rabbinic “earth”).<sup>17</sup> Stone vessels were therefore undisputedly the best way to guard from impurity because they were acceptable to all Jews.

The use of stone vessels has been confirmed by archaeological finds of limestone or chalk vessels throughout Palestine in the first century and (to a lesser extent) in the second century up to the Bar Kokhba revolt, but not before or after this period. Extensive excavations have also been carried out at quarries and workshops for manufacturing limestone vessels near Jerusalem. Magan, who has carried out and written up much of this work<sup>18</sup> pointed out the significance of it:

Unlike other elements of the Jewish material culture during the Second Temple period, such as pottery, wooden, metal and glass vessels and other implements that were conceived in previous periods and that remained a part of the material culture after the destruction of the Temple, chalk vessels are the only components of the material culture that appear suddenly in the late first century BCE and vanish after the destruction of the Second Temple and the Bar Kokhba Revolt, without remaining in use and without returning to the material culture of the Land of Israel in succeeding periods...all the industrial areas engaged in chalk vessel production are connected with Jewish regions and settlements, both in Judea and in Galilee...[and] chalk vessels were found in every Jewish settlement in Galilee that was excavated.<sup>19</sup>

These archaeological findings demonstrate the importance of rabbinic rulings for ordinary people in first-century Palestine. Even in Galilee, where it might have been easy to ignore the stringent demands of rabbinic Judaism, every Jewish domicile which has been excavated employed stone vessels, even though it would have been far cheaper to use earthenware. The use of stone was not a matter of using mate-

---

<sup>17</sup> See Hanan Eshel, “CD 12:15–17 and the Stone Vessels Found at Qumran,” <http://orion.msc.huji.ac.il/symposiums/3rd/papers/Eshel98.html#fnref2>. Eshel points out that although Qumran documents indicate that oil can make a stone vessel impure, they still believed that they otherwise guarded from impurity.

<sup>18</sup> Yitzhak Magan, The Stone Vessel Industry in the Second Temple Period: Excavations at Hizma and the Jerusalem Temple Mount (Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society, 2002), based on the Hebrew version, The Stone Vessel Industry in Jerusalem during the Second Temple Period (Jerusalem: Society for the Preservation of Nature, 1988). The significance of this for biblical studies was first pointed out by Roland Deines in Jüdische Steingefäße und pharisäische Frömmigkeit (Tübingen: Mohr, 1993).

<sup>19</sup> Magan, Eng. ed., 1–2.

rials which were more hardy or better looking because these chalk vessels were thicker, heavier, more fragile, and less easy to decorate than their earthenware equivalents. The only advantage of using stone vessels was to enable the keeping of halakhah.

We cannot conclude that the Mishnah represents precisely the halakhah which was kept by these householders, because Qumran and presumably other Jewish groups also agreed that stone vessels provided protection from impurity, but it does mean that the general population was concerned with such issues. And the fact that stone vessels were used during this narrow timeframe confirms the dating of the rabbinic rulings which gave rise to this use, and thereby help to confirm the methods by which those rulings were dated.

2.1.3. Example of Halakhah: Healing on the Sabbath

Sabbath rulings developed greatly during the first century. It is significant that the Sabbath controversies in the gospels mirror the same concerns which were developing during the first century before 70 CE, i.e. harvesting (Mark 2:23//Matt 12:1), carrying (John 5:10—see the discussion in TRENT 2), bringing up from a pit (Matt 12:11; Luke 14:5), whether God works on a Sabbath (John 5:17), Temple cult on a Sabbath (Matt 12:5), and (overwhelmingly) the matter of healing on the Sabbath.<sup>20</sup>

The prohibition of healing on a Sabbath presumably developed from the prohibition of any labour which was involved in healing, such as straightening a limb or any washing which was more than normal (m. Sabb. 22:6), but it gradually included anointing or taking medicine (m. Sabb. 14:3–4), and later even included taking normal food or drink which had a curative property (m. Sabb. 14:3–4). The Shammaites were strict about this from the start, and forbade even praying for the sick on the Sabbath (t. Sabb. 16:22a), which suggests that it was part of the debate about whether God should be made to work on the Sabbath (cf. Philo, Cher. 86–90).

---

<sup>20</sup> See details in Lutz Doering, Schabbat: Sabbathalacha und -praxis im antiken Judentum und Urchristentum (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1999), and in TRENT vol. 2, forthcoming. On whether or not God works on the Sabbath, see also Doering, “The concept of the Sabbath in the book of Jubilees,” in Studies in the Book of Jubilees, ed. Matthias Albani, Jörg Frey, and Armin Lange (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1997), 179–205.

The fact that “healing” is not listed among the 39 categories of forbidden “labour” (m. Sabb. 7:2), and the presence of mildly contradictory rulings and even counter-arguments in rabbinic literature about healing on a Sabbath, all suggest that this prohibition was in the process of development and consolidation in the early first century. New doctrines often become a touch-stone of orthodoxy, so it is not surprising to find that Pharisees express severe anger at Jesus’ rejection of this teaching (Mark 3:6//Matt 12:12//Luke 6:11; John 5:16; 7:23).

However, it is likely that Jesus was not the only one to criticise these new regulations, because some rabbis after 70 CE tried to find ways to relax these rulings. One early second-century rabbi even allowed treatment of a sore throat by applying the principle that mortal danger overrides the Sabbath (m. Yom. 8:6). Eliezer b. Hyrcanus (just after 70 CE) reasoned that if circumcision overrides the Sabbath then surely healing did too (t. Sabb. 15:16). He argued that: “Circumcision overrides the Sabbath because neglect of it is liable to extirpation. If one may override the Sabbath for a single part of a person, is it not logical that one may override the Sabbath for the whole of him?”

Eliezer’s logic is the same as that attributed to Jesus at John 7:23: “if on the Sabbath a man receives circumcision so that the law of Moses may not be broken, are you angry with me that on the Sabbath I made a whole man healthy?” Jesus’ phrase “whole man” (ὅλον ἄνθρωπον) and Eliezer’s “the whole of him” (kulo, כּוּלוֹ) are both used in exactly the same context to argue the same point of view, so this is very unlikely to be coincidental. Also, they both reasoned by means of a minore ad maius and based this on the principle that if circumcision does not take place on the eighth day, the law has been broken and punishment is due. These exact parallels make it likely that this was a common argument which was “around” at the time, though it was not the majority view.<sup>21</sup>

---

<sup>21</sup> Barrett mistakenly thought that Eliezer was expressing the majority view that healing of a critically ill “whole man” was allowed; see C. K. Barrett, The Gospel of John and Judaism, Franz Delitzsch Lectures, 1967 (London: SPCK, 1975), 264–265. However, the context of the rabbinic debate shows the other rabbis thought that Eliezer (who was famous for his unorthodox rulings) was trying to find a loophole for people who were not critically ill. According to a later tradition, Eleazar b. Azariah made Eliezer’s argument orthodox by adding the stipulation that the man must be critically ill (b. Yoma. 85b), so perhaps Barrett thought that this accurately represented Eliezer’s view.

There has been much debate about Jesus' central teaching on the Sabbath—did he deliberately heal on the Sabbath in order to put aside the law of the Sabbath, or did he merely disagree about the exceptions and definitions within Sabbath law?<sup>22</sup> The history of the development of rabbinic rulings suggests that the discussions of the Sabbath in the gospels can be regarded as criticisms of the developing Oral Law, not a rejection of the Sabbath law in the written Torah. This has profound implications for the question of Jesus' central message and the core of his conflict with the various bodies of the Jewish establishment.

2.2. Aggadic Traditions

Aggadic literature is probably best defined in the negative sense of not being halakhah. It consists of the biographical stories, moral guidelines, Scripture expositions and any other elements which are not directly concerned with the obedience of commandments in Scripture. These elements occur sparsely in Mishnah and Tosephta, more frequently in the Talmuds and Halakhic midrashim, and throughout the aggadic midrashim.

As stated above, the distinction between halakhah and aggadah is important because of the different way in which they were regarded and treated. It would be too simple to say that aggadah was not regarded as a vehicle of truth, though no-one expressed any concern when one aggadic tradition contradicted another. Perhaps the best modern equivalent would be the sermon illustration, which might not be true (because it contains a fictitious anecdote or a misquoted aphorism), but is still expected to convey a truth. This makes it almost impossible to decide when an honorific story about someone is hagiography or biography, and when a moral teaching is based on generally accepted theology or on deliberately provocative ideas.

2.2.1. Dating Aggadic traditions

Transmission of aggadic traditions was not carried out with the same care afforded to halakhic traditions, mainly (as suggested above) because of the different realm in which they were passed on, and also because they were not perceived to have the same importance. Nevertheless, the fact that they were preserved and passed on from generation to generation indicates that they were considered to be worth preserving and we may assume that many of them have survived relatively intact from the early first century. One difficulty is knowing whether to trust the attributions because, unlike halakhic traditions which can often be placed in a relative chronological order, there is usually no way to test the relative age of an aggadic saying. Another difficulty is that aggadic traditions are largely found in written works which were edited much later than Mishnah, so there was much more time for changes to occur.

---

<sup>22</sup> The various viewpoints of different scholars are summarised well in Sven-Olav Back, Jesus of Nazareth and the Sabbath Commandment (Åbo: Åbo Akademis Förlag, 1995), 3–13.

Biographical stories about the rabbis are especially problematic, because almost none of them exists in the Mishnah, so the earliest written versions are normally found in works which were edited at the end of the third century or later. Much more frustrating for the New Testament scholar is the fact that the same problem exists for almost all theological discussions and statements. When, in the near future, we will have a collection of traditions which can be safely dated before 70 CE (like that being compiled in the TRENT project), it may be possible to identify some early characteristics of vocabulary or style which could be used to help identify early traditions. However, this method will always be relatively unsafe because there is always the possibility of editing, and because they are liable to be written in deliberately archaic forms.

Nevertheless, it is possible to find valuable indications of both theology and history in aggadic traditions, especially when they convey events which are unflattering to those who have preserved them. The following example shows that even seemingly apologetic propaganda can convey historical information.

2.2.2. Example of Aggadah: Jesus hanged on Passover Eve

A few passages in the Babylonian Talmud concerning Jesus and Christians were censored out of Blomberg's printed edition of 1520. This became the basis of all subsequent editions, so the only source of these censored traditions are the few surviving manuscripts, the most complete of which are found at Munich, Florence and the Vatican.<sup>23</sup> One of these censored passages contains what appears to be a very old historic tradition, mixed with later editing. It is normally cited as occurring at b. Sanh. 43a, which is where it would be in Blomberg's folio pages if it had not been omitted.

---

<sup>23</sup> These censored passages are collected in Hebrew/Aramaic by R. T. Herford in Christianity in Talmud and Midrash (Williams & Norgate: London, 1903). He has

<sup>1</sup> | <sup>2</sup> | <sup>3</sup> - stages of editing

On the Eve of Passover they hung Yesu the Notzeri.

And the herald will go out before him for forty days:

"Yesu the Notzeri will go out to be stoned for sorcery and deception and enticing Israel [to idolatry].

Any who know [anything] in his defence must come and declare concerning him."

But none was found in his defence and they hung him on the Eve of Passover.

Ulla said: Would it be expected that the revolutionary [had] a defence?

He was a "deceiver," and the Merciful said:

"You shall not spare and shall not hide him" [Deut 13:8(9)].

But it was not [so for] Yesu the Notzeri for he was close to the kingdom.

Most of this tradition is late, but the words in bold probably originate from before 70 CE or soon after. The rest appears have been added in at least two stages. Stage "3" is attributed to the time of Ulla bar Ishmael at the start of the fourth century. There is no clue about the age of the second stage, but it appears to be added in order to deal with the difficulties posed by the oldest tradition (as detailed below).

The early origin of the first stage is suggested by the difficulties it caused, and also by the fact that it contains the same two charges recorded by Justin Martyr, who said that the Jews "dared to call him a magician and a deceiver of the people" (μάγρον. . και λαοπλάνον—Dial. 69). The order of the charges is the same in both accounts, and this is significant because it is opposite to the order found in both Deuteronomy and in Mishnah (Deut 13:6–11; 18:10; m. Sanh. 7:10, 11).<sup>24</sup> The wording of this earliest layer is also confirmed by two quotations of it in other censored Talmudic passages: "they hung him on the Eve of the Passover" (b. Sanh. 67a) and "sorcery and enticing Israel" (b. Sanh. 107b). It is therefore possible that the official Jewish translated them into English (or occasionally Latin, when sexually explicit language is involved) and commented on them. The translations here are my own.

---

<sup>24</sup> This was first pointed out by William Horbury, "The Benediction of the Minim and Early Jewish-Christian Controversy," Journal of Theological Studies NS 33 (1982): 19–61, at 55.

charge which was publicly proclaimed against Jesus has been preserved by Justin and by this censored tradition.

The rest of the passage can be seen as an attempt to solve various problems which this early tradition raised, especially where it contradicted the rulings of Mishnah. Mishnah said that a herald had to call for defence witnesses for at least thirty days (m. Sanh. 3:8; 6:1). The herald was given forty days in this tradition, which inspired a later debate about the reason for this leniency (at stage 3). They concluded that Jesus had friends among the Romans—"he was close to the kingdom"—a phrase which is used elsewhere to explain why Gamaliel's family were allowed to converse in Greek, because they had to speak with Roman officials (b. B Qam. 83a).

The Eve of Passover was a very unlikely day for Jews to choose to carry out capital punishment, so the editors would want to explain why Jesus was killed on this day, without admitting (or remembering) that the death penalty was totally outside their control. Perhaps the claim that Jesus had forty days to find a defence was an early explanation—i.e. they allowed him extra time and waited till the very last moment before the start of the Passover week, in order to emphasise that he was given every opportunity to find mitigating evidence.

This early tradition says that he was "hung," but stoning was the punishment for both enticement to idolatry (m. Sanh. 7:10) and sorcery (m. Sanh. 7:4). Mishnah already helped to solve that problem because Eliezer said that those who are stoned, are hung (m. Sanh. 6:4). Eliezer either meant that those who are stoned are also hung afterwards, or he meant that they accepted Roman crucifixion as an equivalent to stoning because they did not have sufficient jurisdiction to carry out the death penalty. In later Talmudic times they assumed that he meant the former—they were stoned and then their corpse should be hung on a pole to indicate God's curse (b. Sanh. 45b). However, until at least the second century they assumed that "hung" meant "crucified" (cf. t. Sanh. 9:7 where Meir identifies crucifixion with the curse of "hanging" in Deut 21:23). Whichever view prevailed at second stage of editing this tradition, they wanted to emphasise that Jesus deserved the biblical punishment of stoning, so the herald proclaims that this is his sentence.

Another major problem with this early tradition is that it attributed real power to Jesus, because according to Mishnah the death penalty is only warranted if the sorcerer performed genuine wonders and not just illusions (m. Sanh. 7:11). The distinction between illusions and reality is not discussed in Mishnah, but even in the early third century, when belief in magic was rampant among Jews, they exhibited a healthy scepticism, as illustrated in b. Sanh. 67b: “Rab said to R. Hiyya: ‘I myself saw an Arabian traveller take a sword and cut up a camel; then he rang a bell, at which the camel arose.’ He replied, ‘After that, was there any blood or dung? But that was merely an illusion’.”

Early Jewish apologists may have been content to accuse Jesus of sorcery, i.e. getting power from the Devil (cf. Mark 3:22//Matt 12:24//Luke 11:15), but this later introduced two problems. First, Jesus might be venerated by Jews in order to obtain healing or other miracles, and they might include his name among all the angels and other powers whom they called upon in magical papyri, incantation bowls and amulets.<sup>25</sup> Second, if this power was attributed to the Devil it implied that not all power resided with the Creator. In answer to this second problem, post-Talmudic traditions (as encapsulated in the medieval Toledoth Jesu, “Generations of Jesus”), said that Jesus used the power of God illegally by stealing the secret of the Name.<sup>26</sup> Already in the third century they appear to counter the claim of Jesus’ resurrection by saying that it was done by stealing the name of God: “Woe to him who makes himself live by the Name of God” (Simeon b. Lakish, late 3rd century, b. Sanh. 106a).<sup>27</sup>

In this tradition of b. Sanh. 43a, the editors at stage 2 attempted to downplay the power of Jesus by implying that he was “deceiving” people. They imported this word from Deut 13:6(7) which is where the charge of “enticing” comes from (“If he deceive you...saying ‘Let us serve other gods’...you shall stone him...for he sought to entice you from the LORD”—Deut 13:6–8[7–9]), and in that context it carries the connotation of “lead you into idolatry.” However, it is likely that they used the ambiguity of this word to imply that the miracles were part of a deception. This supposition gains extra weight from Justin’s translation of the Jewish charge by the word “deceiver” (from πλανάω). This word does not come from the LXX of Deuteronomy 13, so he presumably chose it because it was the closest to the meaning of the charge as the Jews of his day interpreted it.

<sup>25</sup> One magical papyrus includes “I conjure you by the god of the Hebrews, Jesus” (PGM IV 3019–20). This suggests that “Jesus” was one of the names which Gentiles had learned from Jews—see W.L. Knox, “Jewish Liturgical Exorcism,” HTR 31 (1938) 193–194.

<sup>26</sup> This was based perhaps on t. Sabb. 11:15 “Eliezer: Did not Ben Stada learn only in this way [by cutting marks in his flesh]?” I.e. he tattooed the secret Name which he would otherwise be forced to forget. “Ben Stada” is also used elsewhere as a cipher for Jesus at t. Sanh. 10:11; b. Sanh. 67a, 104b.

<sup>27</sup> See the discussion in Herford, Christianity in Talmud, 47–48. Jews of the third century were well aware of Christian claims, e.g. “If a man says to you: ‘I am God’, he is a liar; if ‘I am the son of man’, in the end people will laugh at him; if ‘I will go up to heaven’, he says it but will not perform it”—Abahu, late third century, y. Ta’an. 65b.

Therefore it is possible that the official Jewish charge against Jesus has been preserved in this tradition, along with later glosses which were intended to address all the problems associated with it. Although this cannot be verified with any certainty, the parallel in Justin and the many problems which rabbinic authorities had with this tradition help to confirm that it is very old indeed.

2.3. Parables

Parables are very common in rabbinic literature and although they are usually categorised as aggadah, strictly speaking they are a third category. Meir (mid second century, b. Sanh. 38b) used to divide his lectures into three parts: halakhah (also called shema’etta), aggadah and parables (mashal). A mashal can include anything from a simile or analogy to a long story with many points of reference, but it normally consists of a story with a single “twist” (a point of surprise which is humorous or alarming) which is where the didactic point of the story lies. The most common subjects for parables are stories about kings, fables about animals, similes concerning plants, and illustrations from everyday life. The introduction to the following parable refers to all three types of teaching:

When R. Ammi and R. Assi were sitting before R. Isaac the Smith, one of them said to him: “Will the Master please tell us some legal points [shema’etta]?” while the other said: “Will the Master please give us some homiletical instruction [aggadah]?” When he commenced a homiletical discourse he was prevented by the one, and when he commenced a legal discourse he was prevented by the other. He therefore said to them: I will tell you a parable [mashal]: To what is this like? A man had two wives, one young and one old. The young one used to pluck out his white hair, and the old one used to pluck out his black hair. He thus finally remained bald on both sides. (b. B. Qam. 60b, based on Soncino)

2.3.1. Dating parables

Like almost all parables in rabbinic literature, the example told by R. Isaac has been preserved in Hebrew, the language of the older Mish-nah and Tosephta, despite the fact that most of the Talmud is written in Aramaic (including the story which introduces this parable). The use of Hebrew does not imply that every parable dates from pre-Talmudic times, but it does indicate a wish to pass on parables in a traditional form.

Unlike halakhic rulings, parables are not transmitted as the property or creation of individual rabbis, but they are regarded as community property. Scholars were not known for writing parables but for collecting them, like Yohanan b. Zakkai who was well known for collecting fox fables and other parables (b. Sukkah. 28a//b. B. Bat 134a). This parable, for example, was not created by R. Isaac, but was adapted by him (or someone else) from Aesop's story of the man with two mistresses.<sup>28</sup> However, parables can be retold with subtle differences which mirror changes in theology or society. For example, R. Isaac changed Aesop's two mistresses into two wives, so it would be false to infer that the original parable came from a society where polygamy was permitted. We must therefore take great care when making theological inferences from undatable parables.

Unfortunately, only a handful of rabbinic parables can be dated before 70 CE. This has not prevented scholars like Jeremias, Stern and Young<sup>29</sup> from doing useful work with them because, as indicated above, the origin of a parable may long predate the telling of it. There are probably no parables which can be dated before 70 CE with certainty, though there is some evidence for the following:

2.3.2. Early parables

Parable of the wholesale market traders

Bar Hé Hé [said] to Hillel: What [means] the text, "And you will return and distinguish between the righteous and the wicked, between him who serves God and him who serves him not" [Mal 3:18]? The "righteous" [appears to be] the same as "he who serves God" and the "wicked" the same as "he who serves him not."

Hillel said to him: "He who serves" and "he who serves not" are both [included in the category of] those who are perfectly "righteous". But one should not equate him who repeats his chapter a hundred times with him who repeats his chapter a hundred and one times [to memorise it better].

<sup>28</sup> See Brad H. Young, The Parables: Jewish Tradition and Christian Interpretation (Peabody: Hendrickson, 1998), 17.

<sup>29</sup> Joachim Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus, trans. S. H. Hooke (London: SCM, 1963); D. Stern, Parables in Midrash, 2nd ed. (Cambridge, MA: Harvard, 1994); Young, Parables.

[Bar Hé Hé] said to him: And because of a single [extra] time he is called “he who serves him not”?

[Hillel] said to him: Yes, go and learn from the market of the ass drivers—Ten portions for a single zuz; Eleven portions for two zuz. (b. Hag. 9b)

Ben Hé Hé and Hillel (first century BCE) both denied the concept of parallelism in Scripture, believing that God would not include redundant words or phrases.<sup>30</sup> Hillel explained this apparent parallelism by saying that the second line describes two different degrees of being “righteous,” though they are both “righteous.” The person “who serves not” is like a scholar who puts slightly less effort into memorising his lesson, though they have both memorised it. Even a small difference can make a large difference, like when you go to the wholesale market (where the ass drivers go) and try to buy eleven portions of something which is sold in bundles of ten.

The whole debate is recorded late, but the concern about parallelism faded after 70 CE, so it is likely that this originated before 70 CE, though it is uncertain whether it goes back to Hillel himself. The first parable (of the two scholars) is almost certainly part of the original tradition, though the second (of the ass-driver’s market) may have been added later.

Parable of earth as God’s footstool

The School of Shammai say: The heavens were created first and after that the earth was created, as it is said: “In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth” [Gen.1.1].

And the School of Hillel say: The earth was created first and then the heavens, as it is said: “In the day the LORD God made earth and heavens”.

The School of Hillel said to the School of Shammai: According to your words a man builds the upper-chamber and after that he builds the house, as it is said, “He who builds in the heavens his steps and founded his firmament over the earth” [Amos 9:6].

---

<sup>30</sup> See David Instone Brewer, Techniques and Assumptions in Jewish Exegesis before 70 CE, Texte und Studien zum antiken Judentum, 30 (Tübingen: Mohr, 1992), 56–57.

The School of Shammai said to the School of Hillel: According to your words, a man makes a footstool and after that makes a throne, as it is said: "Thus says the Lord: Heaven is my throne and earth the stool of my feet" [Isa 66.1]. (b. Hag. 12a)

The parables at the end of this dispute may be later additions, and the proof texts were almost certainly added later. Nevertheless, it is possible that these examples of mashal originated with these first century Schools.

Yohanan's parable of the wise and foolish invited to a feast

R. Johanan b. Zakkai said: This may be compared to a king who summoned his servants to a banquet without appointing a time. The wise ones adorned themselves and sat at the door of the palace. ["Ffor,"] said they, "is anything lacking in a royal palace?" The fools went about their work, saying, "can there be a banquet without preparations?" Suddenly the king desired [the presence of] his servants: the wise entered adorned, while the fools entered soiled. The king rejoiced at the wise but was angry with the fools. "Those who adorned themselves for the banquet," ordered he, "let them sit, eat and drink. But those who did not adorn themselves for the banquet, let them stand and watch." (b. Sabb. 153a, Soncino)

It is difficult to date this before 70 CE with any certainty because although Yohanan's ministry started before this, his main influence came after the destruction of the Temple. It is included because it is one of the few "typical" parables which can dated this early, and because of the very clear gospel parallels. Before Yohanan went to Jerusalem he spent some decades in Galilee (traditionally, forty years) which meant he may have met Jesus and certainly knew the same synagogue traditions and probably the same synagogue congregations as Jesus.

Parable of the Forgotten Sheaf

A certain pious man [hasid] forgot a sheaf in the middle of his field. He said to his son, "Go and offer two bullocks on my behalf, for a burnt offering and a peace offering." His son said to him, "Father, why are you more joyful at fulfilling this one commandment than all the other commandments in Torah?" He said to him, "The Lord gave us all the commands in Torah to obey intentionally, but he only gave us this one to obey accidentally."

For if we obeyed this deliberately before the Lord, we would not be fulfilling the command. He said to him: It says, "When you reap the harvest of your field, and have forgotten a sheaf in the field, you shall not go back and get it; it shall be for the stranger, the fatherless and the widow” [Deut 24:19]. Scripture thereby sets out a blessing. (t. Pe’ah. 3:8).

The law of the forgotten sheaf (Deut 24:19) was the only law which could not be fulfilled intentionally or deliberately, so this pious man is overjoyed to find that he has accidentally forgotten a sheaf which enables him to fulfil this law. His joy is so great that he offers a hugely costly sacrifice—one bullock for total consumption on the altar (the burnt offering) and one to share with his family and friends in a celebration meal (the peace offering).

The exceptional value of these sacrifices which he offered for this seemingly minor occurrence puts this incident in the realm of storytelling. If an individual had really done this, it is unlikely that his name would have gone unmentioned. The original parable probably consisted of only the first paragraph, because this is complete in itself and it ends on the crux or the twist, like a short story or parable should. The second paragraph adds the explanation and gives the scripture, just like a preacher would do. But this addition spoils the structure and force of the parable, like preachers often do when they explain the moral too clearly at the end of a story.

This parable cannot be dated reliably, but it is likely that it originated from Palestine in Temple times because the man gave thanks by offering sacrifices rather than by donating something to the synagogue. A sermonic or moral story is much more powerful if it concerns normal contemporary events, because this makes it more relevant and less easy to dismiss by the hearer. Therefore it is unlikely that the person who invented this parable would have deliberately added archaic practices from Temple times. However, if the story was originally told in this form, it is unlikely to be updated—just as we still talk about the parable of the sower and not the parable of the tractor.

This parable has a very similar form to many gospel parables. It concerns “a certain man,” without any details to tie it to an individual, and it unfolds a puzzling scenario about the man’s strange behaviour which would have the listeners leaning forward to hear the explanation. The story builds up emotional tension by the huge size of the man’s offering (comparable to the value of two tractors today), by the joyful celebration which is implied by the peace offering (which would have been large enough to make a feast for most of the village to share) and by the extreme joy which he exhibits. The reason for his joy is given in the very last line, as in any good short story. The editorial addition, which has spoiled the ending somewhat, is similar to the comments and explanations which have been appended to many of Jesus' parables.

The explicit message is that God has allowed us to experience the joy of obeying commandments and we should thank him for that privilege. However, the implicit theology and attitude behind this parable are much more interesting for gospel research, because they tell us what beliefs the parable's author can assume that all of his hearers will already have. The implicit theology is that it is good to try and obey as many commandments as possible; and the implicit attitude is that it is fun to try and complete a full set, almost like collecting baseball cards. The man does not give thanks that God saved him from accidental disobedience, but gives thanks that God allowed him to accidentally experience the joy of obedience. The author of this parable assumed that his hearers were legalistic, in the sense that obeying the law was at the heart of their religion, but their legalism was based on the joy of living out the Law rather than a fear of breaking it.

2.4. Targumic Literature

Targums are Aramaic paraphrases which followed the reading of the Hebrew Bible in Aramaic-speaking synagogues. They mostly adhere to the Hebrew text but also contain glosses, additional phrases and even extra sentences in order to add explanations or avoid potential misunderstandings.<sup>31</sup>

The "official" rabbinic targums are Targum Onkelos on the Pentateuch (sometimes known as "The Targum") and Targum Jonathan on the rest of the Hebrew Bible. The Palestinian Targum to the Pentateuch, which was hardly known outside Palestine before the eleventh century, was published in two versions in the sixteenth century, the Fragmentary Targums (previously called the "Fragment Targum") and Targum Pseudo-Jonathan (so called because it had been falsely called Targum Jonathan due to an early misunderstanding of the abbreviation T.J.—“Targum of Jerusalem”). More versions of the Palestinian Targum were found in the twentieth century in the Vatican Library (Targum Neofiti, covering the whole Pentateuch), in the Cairo Geniza (fragments of TgPsJon and fragments from a variant of the Fragmentary Targums) and Qumran (fragments from targums of Job and Leviticus).

---

<sup>31</sup> The best English translations of the Targums is now the series edited by Martin McNamara, The Aramaic Bible (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1992-).

Targum Onkelos adheres most closely to the Hebrew text, while Targum Pseudo-Jonathan has much more additional material and deviations from the Hebrew. Targum Neofiti is similar to Pseudo-Jonathan but it lacks much of the additional material, though some of it has been added in the margins.

2.4.1. Dating targumic traditions

Like other rabbinic literature, there was initially a reluctance to record targums in a written form, lest it became confused with “Written Torah”—cf. the story of Gamaliel II (beginning of second century), who was happy to read a written targum of Job but then buried it to destroy it, unlike his grandfather in the mid first century who buried it without reading it (b. Sabb. 115a). However, the transmission of targums was remarkably conservative and Targum Neofiti, which was copied in 1504, is often identical to quotations from targums in Genesis Rabba, including some by R. Nathan (late second century, Gen. Rab. 31:8) and R. Jonhanan (mid-third century, Gen. Rab. 70:16)—though these may have been edited to conform to a well-known targum tradition. The Aramaic of the targums (which is still being studied) may give a clue to their dating. However, it is likely that the language would be updated at the time of copying because one of the aims of targum was to make the text accessible to unlearned congregations.

It is difficult to know whether the large number of interpretive additions in Targum Pseudo-Jonathan indicate that this version is late, or whether Targum Onkelos was a later revision which was corrected back towards the Hebrew text. Comparisons of these additions with rabbinic halakha have proved inconclusive.<sup>32</sup> The only datable yardstick we can apply is the Qumran fragment 4QtgLev (4Q156) which follows Targum Onkelos very closely, but does not have any of the additions found in Targum Pseudo-Jonathan. This suggests that the additions are later, but they do not necessarily incorporate only later ideas. Therefore traditions in targums should only be identified as early if they mirror interpretations found elsewhere, such as in the LXX or early extra-biblical literature. But if these interpretations are only found in later rabbinic literature, the targums are likely to have been influenced by this, so an early date becomes less likely.

<sup>32</sup> McNamara briefly lists the work in this area and warns against making firm conclusions from this uncertain data (Aramaic Bible, IA, 41–42).

2.4.2. Example of targum: Polygamy or monogamy

The Palestinian Targums of Genesis 2:24 read “and they two shall become one flesh” (i.e. Targum Pseudo Jonathan and Targum Neofiti), though the Masoretic text and Targum Onqelos read “and they shall become one flesh”. The reading of the Palestinian Targums is reflected in the LXX translations, Syriac translation, Samaritan Pentateuch, Vulgate and New Testament (Matt 19:5; Mark 10:8; 1 Cor 6:16). Unfortunately there are no Qumran fragments covering this passage. Ancient rabbinic traditions follow the Masoretic text on the two occasions when this text is cited (by R. Akiba, early second century, b. Sanh. 58a and by R. Issi, early third century, Gen. Rab. 18:5).

Therefore there is a strong tradition among the versions for inserting the word “two” into this verse, perhaps as an inference from the word “one.” The reason for doing this is not made clear in any of the versions, but it is likely to be part of a movement against polygamy which is seen at Qumran (CD IV, 20–V, 6) and in Jesus’ preaching (Mark 10:6–8//Matt 19:4–6).<sup>33</sup> The Damascus Document argues from the phrase “male and female” which occurs both in the creation narrative (Gen 1:27) and with regard to the animals which went in to the Ark “two by two” (Gen 7:9). They conclude from this, by the rabbinic method of gezera shavah, that “the foundation of creation” was also based on two. Jesus uses semantically identical terminology (ἀρχῆς κτίσεως, “the beginning of creation”) and cites one of these two proof texts (Gen 1:27). The similarities are too striking to be accidental, though there is no reason to believe that there is any dependency. In both cases the argument is stated in such an abbreviated form that it is unlikely to convince anyone who was not already familiar with it, so it is likely that this exegesis was already widespread and they were both referring to it.

---

<sup>33</sup> D. Instone-Brewer, “Jesus’ Old Testament Basis for Monogamy,” in The Old Testament in the New Testament: Essays in Honour of J. L. North, ed. Steve Moyise, JNTSSup 189 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), 75–105.

Polygamy was allowed in Mosaic Law<sup>34</sup> and was still practised in Palestine in the first century (Exod 21:10–11; Deut 21:15–17). The practice continued to be part of rabbinic law for several centuries, though only in special circumstances,<sup>35</sup> and was finally ended in the eleventh century.<sup>36</sup> Rabbinic teaching recognised that polygamy was sometimes necessary in order to fulfil the law of the levirate wife, though they tried to limit the burden of this law by finding circumstances which made it unnecessary.

The conservative reading in Targum Onqelos may reflect a distancing from the new campaign against polygamy, though it is more likely to reflect the relatively literal translation of the Hebrew text which generally characterises this Targum. Citations of Hebrew Bible in rabbinic literature almost always reflect the text preserved by the Masoretes, so it would be surprising if they included the word “two”. What is surprising is the fact that the Damascus Document, unlike Jesus, fails to cite Genesis 2:24 with the word “two” when it is presenting arguments against polygamy. Perhaps they thought that the argument based on “male and female” was sufficient, while Jesus did not. More likely they were constrained by the fact that they were writing in Hebrew, so adding the word “two” might be perceived as an alteration to the divine text, whereas Jesus was speaking in Aramaic or Greek so the addition of a word would be perceived as a targumic interpretation. Qumran was not averse to quoting variant forms of the Hebrew text, and they seem to have made a habit of collecting variants, but perhaps they were reluctant to construct variants which did not already exist.

We may therefore come to the tentative conclusions that this reading in the Palestinian Targum reflected a growing rejection of polygamy which had already started at the time of the Damascus Document and was gaining momentum among some streams of

<sup>34</sup> Exod 21:10–11; Deut 21:15–17.

<sup>35</sup> Justin Martyr says that Jews practised polygamy (Dial. 141). A few rabbis had more than one wife: Tarphon (early second century, t. Ketub. 5:1), Rab, and R. Nahman (early third and start of fourth century respectively, b. Yoma. 18b//b. Yebam. 37b). Tarphon (from a priestly family) betrothed three hundred girls so that they could eat priestly food in a time of famine. Rab and Nahman had a second wife in another city which they visited regularly, probably so that they could provide hospitality for visitors.

<sup>36</sup> The Herem of R. Gershom of Mayence (960–1040) finally prohibited it (Responsa “Asheri” 42.1), probably in 1030 at Worms (the document has not survived).

Judaism before 70 CE. After 70 CE, the orthodox position of Torah reasserted itself for a few centuries, albeit with some unease.

2.4.3. Example: Rachel weeping for children killed by Herod

Sometimes traditions which are impossible to date help us with texts which are difficult to understand, like the three Old Testament citations in Matthew 2. Modern readers find little connection between these citations and the story, other than isolated words or ideas, so they are generally dismissed as “proof texts.” But for readers who were familiar with the stories told in Aramaic-speaking synagogues, these three texts concerned an ancient story about Laban and highlighted its links with the star, the infanticide, the dream, and coming out of Egypt.

Laban was a supernatural enemy of Jacob and his children in a popular intertestamental story which we can piece together from allusions to it in Targum Pseudo-Jonathan.<sup>37</sup> He became his enemy probably because his daughter Rachel stole his idols when she fled from Laban with her husband Jacob (Gen 31:30–35). In Genesis, Laban and Jacob eventually part peacefully, but in the stories alluded to by Targum Pseudo-Jonathan Laban still had murderous intentions towards Jacob’s family (Tg. Ps.-J. Gen 32:3). When Rachel died at Bethlehem of Ephrath, Jacob’s family encamped nearby at the Tower of the Sheep (Gen 35:16–21), which is where the Messiah will be revealed (Mic 4:8; Tg. Ps.-J. Gen 35:18). To preserve the future Messiah, God told Jacob in a dream to take his family to Egypt for safety from Laban (Tg. Ps.-J. Gen 45:27–46:4). When they left Egypt, Laban (who was now called Balaam—Tg. Ps.-J. Num 22:5)<sup>38</sup> attacked them and killed many of them, and Rachel wept over them (Jer 31:15[14]). She was, of course, long dead, so either she was resurrected (as suggested by some later rabbis)<sup>39</sup> or she foresaw it when weeping on her deathbed.<sup>40</sup>

<sup>37</sup> This story was first pieced together by Daube who also used sources outside the Targum. See David Daube, “The Earliest Structure of the Gospels,” in New Testament Judaism: Collected Works of David Daube, ed. Calum Varmichael, 2 vols. (Berkeley: University of California, 2000), 329–341.

<sup>38</sup> Later rabbis suggested that Balaam was Laban’s son (b. Sanh. 105a), perhaps in a vain attempt to overcome the chronological impossibilities of this story.

<sup>39</sup> See Gen. Rab. 84:11. Rachael was dead even before they went into Egypt, but Joseph had dreamed that his mother and father would bow down to him, so she must have been resurrected by that time in order to fulfil the dream.

<sup>40</sup> Gen 35:17–18 says the midwife tried to comfort her, but she called her boy

The following translations are based on Michael Maher's in McNamara's Aramaic Bible series in which italics indicate variation from the Hebrew text.

Gen 35:18: As [Rachel's] soul departed—for death came upon her—she called his name “Son of my Agony”; but his father called him Benjamin. 19. And Rachel died and was buried on the way to Ephrath, that is Bethlehem... 21. Jacob journeyed on and pitched his tent beyond the Tower of the Flock, the place from which the King Messiah will reveal himself at the end of days.

Gen 45:27—46:4: When [Jacob's sons] recounted to him all the words that Joseph had spoken with them, and when he saw the carriages that Joseph had sent to take him, the spirit of prophecy which had departed from him when they sold Joseph, returned and rested upon their father Jacob. 28. And Israel said, “The Lord has done many good things for me; he delivered me from the hands of Esau and from the hands of Laban, and from the hands of the Canaanites who pursued me; and I have seen and expected to see many consolations. But this I did not expect: that my son Joseph was still alive. I will go then, and see him before I die.” 46.1. Israel set out with all that was his, and came to Beer-sheba, and offered sacrifices to the God of his father Isaac. 2. The Lord spoke to Israel in a prophecy of the night and said, “Jacob! Jacob!” He said, “Here I am.” 3. And he said, “I am God, the God of your father. Do not be afraid to go down to Egypt because of the slavery which I decreed with Abraham; for there I will make of you a great nation. 4. It is I who in my Memra will go down with you to Egypt. I will look upon the misery of your sons, but my Memra will exalt you there; I will also bring your sons up from there.

Num 22:5. [Balak] send messengers to Laban the Aramaean, that is, Balaam (for he sought to swallow the people of the house of Israel), the son of Beor, who acted foolishly from the greatness of his wisdom. He did not spare Israel, the descendants of the sons of his daughters.

When God told Jacob in the dream to take his son to Egypt, he said “I will also bring your sons up from there” (Tg. Ps.-J. Gen 46:4). One particular son is in mind because at Exodus 1:15 the targumist has the Egyptian magician tell Pharaoh: “A son is to be born in the assembly of Israel, through whom all the land of Egypt is destined to be destroyed.” The messianic interpretation was prompted perhaps by the use of singular “seed” in 46:7,<sup>41</sup> in the light of the collective singular “seed” (זרע) which God promised to Abraham (e.g. Gen 12:7; 15:5, 18; 17:7, 9; 22:17; 26:24; 28:14).<sup>42</sup>

---

“Son of my Agony” (אֹנִי). Jeremiah appears to create a midrash from this when he says she “refused (בָּאִנָּה) to be comforted for her children who are not (אִנָּה).”

<sup>41</sup> Other uses of singular “seed” with a messianic interpretation are found in 2 Sam 7:12 and 4QFlor = 4Q 174, X-XI; cf. Gal 3:16.

Matthew provides all the links for this story without having to tell it, because his readers would already be familiar with it, and he uses Old Testament quotations to remind them of the various scriptures which contribute to this story. The Laban story is linked to Matthew’s narrative by the star (which was prophesied by Balaam, Num 24:17), the prophecy about Bethlehem of Ephrath, the dream telling them to escape to Egypt till God calls his son out of Egypt, and Rachel bewailing the children killed by Herod who is like Laban. This last comparison is perhaps the whole point of the links with the story of Laban, because it suggests that the act of Herod himself has been prophesied.<sup>43</sup>

Although dating these targumic traditions is impossible, their antiquity can be verified in a circular way. The fact that these traditions reveal a unified structure and message for a chapter which otherwise appears to contain disparate and unrelated citations, suggests that it is close to what was in the mind of the author. He presumably assumed that his readers would be familiar with these stories, so the allusions he made were sufficient for them to follow his line of thought. We do not know when Targum Pseudo-Jonathan was finally edited, but much of the editing was probably done soon after 70 CE. These traditions must be older than the editing of the Targum because the story is never told but only alluded to, so the readers of the Targum must have been already familiar with it. These traditions are also linked to the messianic expectations which had been identified in the collective singular “seed” in the promises to Abraham, which was already known by the time of Paul (Gal 3:16). Therefore it is likely that these traditions in Targum refer to a story which was already well known in the first century.

<sup>42</sup> Arguments based on the singular and plural of “seed” are also found in m. Sabb. 9:2, 7 in traditions which date from late first century and second century, as well as Gal 3:16.

<sup>43</sup> Daube points out that Laban is often called “the Aramean” (as in Tg. Ps.-J. Num 22:5) while Herod was often called the Idumean (to remind everyone that he was only a Jew by annexation of a neighbouring country) and these two are very similar (ארמי and אדמי respectively).

3. Results So Far, and the Way Ahead

It is too glib to complain, as Crossan does, that the use of Jewish background has merely resulted in a multitude of different versions of Jesus. He lists “Jesus as a political revolutionary by S. G. F. Brandon (1967), as a magician by Morton Smith (1978), as a Galilean charismatic by Geza Vermes (1981, 1984), as a Galilean rabbi by Bruce Chilton (1984), as a Hillelite or proto-Pharisee by Harvey Falk (1985), as an Essene by Harvey Falk (1985), and as an eschatological prophet by E.P. Sanders (1985).”<sup>44</sup> To this could be added presentations of Jesus as a peasant by Meier, as a sage by Ben Witherington, as a torah-observant rabbi by Crossley, and of course as an itinerant philosopher by Crossan himself!<sup>45</sup>

It is not surprising that aspects of Jesus’ teaching and lifestyle should be mirrored in a multitude of ways in the multi-faceted textures of Judaism which existed in early first-century Palestine. If, instead, we found that Jesus was a straight-forward character with a single simple message and a lifestyle which clearly illustrated it, then we might suspect that his life story been invented as a vehicle for that message. But if Jesus was indeed an historical person, and not just a fictional construct by a sect, then we would expect to see him interacting with the various different subcultures and religious mindsets of this complex society. If he was a sensitive teacher, he would modify his language and actions to communicate to the audience he was addressing. And if he was a truly original thinker we would find him melding one concept from here with another from there in a unique and self-coherent way. In other words, the more we find out about the society he lived in, the more facets of his teaching and actions we are likely to recognise as interactions with and reflections of the thoughts and actions of others.

---

<sup>44</sup> John Dominic Crossan The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: HarperCollins; Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1991), xxvii–xxviii, referring to S. G. F. Brandon, Jesus and the Zealots: A Study of the Political Factor in Primitive Christianity (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1967); Morton Smith, Jesus the magician (London: Gollancz, 1978); Geza Vermes, Jesus the Jew: a Historian’s Reading of the Gospels, rev. ed. (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981), and Jesus and the World of Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984); Bruce D. Chilton, A Galilean Rabbi and his Bible: Jesus’ Use of the Interpreted Scripture of His Time (Wilmington, DE: Glazier, 1984); Harvey Falk, Jesus the Pharisee: a New Look at the Jewishness of Jesus (New York: Paulist Press, 1985); E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985).

<sup>45</sup> John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 4 vols., (New York: Doubleday, 1991–2009); James G. Crossley, The Date of Mark’s Gospel: Insight from the Law in Earliest Christianity, JSNTSup 266 (London: T&T Clark, 2004); Ben Witherington, Jesus the Seer: The Progress of Prophecy (Peabody: Hendrickson, 1999).

Rabbinic traditions have been previously neglected, mainly due to the problem of dating, but progress is now being made in this area, so the situation looks hopeful. Careful dating is especially important for studying rabbinic theology, as illustrated by the work of Young on the parables.<sup>46</sup> The theology which he found in rabbinic parables is so similar to that of Jesus in almost every respect that one is left wondering why Jesus experienced any conflict with his contemporaries. But most of these parables come from after 70 CE, when Yohanan b. Zakkai had started the process of restating Jewish theology on the basis of “God requires mercy, not sacrifice” (Hos 6:6 cited at Abot R. Nat. 4),<sup>47</sup> exactly as Jesus had done forty years previously (Matt 9:13; 12:7). Comparing the theology of post-70 CE Judaism with that of Jesus is therefore like looking at the writings of the Catholic Counter Reformation and wondering why the Church had problems with Luther’s teaching.

The pervasiveness of rabbinic law in Palestinian society has also been doubted in the past, because it was felt that peasants and traders would not be concerned with the minor disputes of insular and fanatical religious scholars. A greater awareness of the Islamic world has enabled us to see societies where religious topics are part of normal conversation and where scholars play a central role in guiding everyday decisions. Archaeology has demonstrated the presence of expensive stone vessels throughout Palestine, and immersion pools carved out of the limestone in the basement of almost every excavated dwelling, which suggest that the whole nation was concerned to keep purity laws, even in private.

<sup>46</sup> Young, Parables.

<sup>47</sup> Abot R. Nat. 4: “Once as Rn. Johanan b. Zakkai was coming forth from Jerusalem, R. Joshua followed after him and beheld the Temple in ruins. ‘Woe unto us!’ R. Joshua cried, ‘That this, the place where the iniquities of Israel were atoned for, is laid waste!’ Rn. Johanan b. Zakkai said to him, ‘My son, be not grieved; we have another atonement as effective as this. And what is it? It is acts of loving-kindness, as it is said, For I desire mercy, and not sacrifice (Hos 6:6).” The saying is attributed to R. Johanan b. Zakkai [T1] by R. Joshua [T2]. The attribution is probably for polemic reasons and is unlikely to be accurate, and so it should be dated to R. Joshua who wished to discourage the coming war by those who wanted to rebuild the Temple; see Jacob Neusner, Development of a Legend: Studies on the Traditions concerning Yohanan Ben Zakkai, Studia post-biblica 16 (Leiden: Brill, 1970), 113–114.

The Mishnah, too, demonstrates the assumption that even non-pious individuals carry out the stipulations of the Written Torah, though not necessarily the Pharisaic Oral Torah. The tractate of Demai (“doubtful” tithing) is concerned to make sure that people set aside the 1% minor heave offering (i.e. a tithe of the first tithe), and helps the pious to cope with food where this may not have been done. However, the tractate assumes that the major heave offering (which is clearly demanded in Torah, unlike the minor heave offering) has been removed from all foodstuff grown in Palestine, even by the so-called “people of the Land” (am ha-eretz), and not even those who practise extreme purity needed to worry about it.

It would be wrong to assume that the scholarly rabbinic disputes were of general interest to the population, except where they had public practical consequences, but these disputes tell us a great deal about what the general population did practice and believe. The fact that the Hillelites and Shammaites disputed about the latest date when one was allowed to work a field before the Sabbath Year (m. Seb. 1:1, 2:1; t. Seb. 1:5), suggests that only the details were disputed and the Sabbath Year itself was generally observed in Palestine (as confirmed by Josephus, Ant. 14.475). This may explain why Paul made a collection for a famine which would have been over by the time he delivered the money—if the famine occurred world-wide in a year before the Sabbath year, he would know that Palestine would be desperately needy during the next year. The fact that Hillel and Shammai disputed whether a dough offering was required from a small batch of loaves (m. Ed. 1:2) suggests the general belief that large batches were liable. This general observance of putting aside a dough-offering may explain the “fragments” which were carefully collected after feeding the thousands, because significant quantities of dough offering could not be destroyed or left for the birds but had to be taken to the Temple for distribution to the priests.<sup>48</sup>

Some scholarly disputes were of great importance to the general population, such as whether or not one may rescue or heal people on a Sabbath (as discussed above). Many people would also be affected by the Shammaite criticism of the new ground for divorce called “Any Cause” which started to be used almost universally during the early first century.<sup>49</sup> It is not surprising that Jesus was specifically asked about this, nor that he sided with the Shammaite plain reading of the Torah against the atomistic exegesis of the Hillelites.<sup>50</sup> Other rulings of Oral Torah caused severe practical problems for poorer people, such as the rules about tithing herbs (m. Ma'as. 4:5), which required separate tithing vessels to be kept pure for each tiny portion (t. Ter. 2:5). This ruling was being introduced during the early first century, so it is not surprising that Jesus commented on it (Matt 23:23; cf. Luke 11:42), and on this occasion his view was closer to that of the Hillelites who looked for ways to limit the number of herbs which required tithing (m. Ma'as. S. 2:3–4).

---

<sup>48</sup> These issues are discussed in detail in TRENT 1, 221–258.

In some matters, rabbinic traditions merely add colour to the gospel accounts, and in others they are essential for understanding them. If we did not know that collecting boxes had a trumpet-shaped inlet on which you can bounce your coin into the hole (m. Seqal. 2:1; 6:5), we might miss the significance of Jesus warning about “trumpeting” your offering (Matt 6:2). If we did not know about the general belief that the reward for good deeds was “treasure in heaven” plus an “interest payment” of good things in this life (m. Pe'ah 1:1; t. Pe'ah 4:18), we would not notice the pointed absence of this “interest payment” in Jesus’ teaching (Matt 6:19–21//Luke 12:33–34; Matt 19:21//Mark 10:21//Luke 18:22).

These examples illustrate both the potential for rabbinic literature to flesh out a historical Jesus of the gospels, but also the danger of glibly using sources which originate after the writing of the gospels. Although such dating of rabbinic traditions is often difficult, the attempt is necessary if we are to understand the historical Jesus in relation to the large sections of Jewish society which are revealed in this literature.

<sup>49</sup> Philo, Spec. 3.30 (II 304), “Another commandment is that if a woman after parting from her husband for any cause whatever...” (καθ’ ἣν ἂν τύχη πρόφασιν); Josephus, Ant. 4.253, “He who desires to be divorced from the wife who is living with him, for whatsoever ground...” (καθ’ ἁσθηποτοῦν αἰτίας); first century rabbinic dispute, “The School of Shammai says: A man should not divorce his wife except if he found indecency in her, since it says: For he found in her an indecent matter [Deut 24:1]. And the School of Hillel said: Even if she spoiled his dish, since it says: [Any] matter.” (Sifré Deut. 269. See also m Git. 9:10; y. Sotah. 1:2, 16b).

<sup>50</sup> David Instone-Brewer, Divorce and remarriage in the Bible: The social and literary context (Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 2002), 110–117.

SYNAGOGUE AND SANHEDRIN IN THE FIRST CENTURY

LESTER L. GRABBE

The synagogue and the Sanhedrin are two Jewish institutions that the gospel tradition associates in one way or another with Jesus. Yet each had its own origin, history, and place in first-century Jewish society. Each will, therefore, be treated in a separate section in this article. Yet it should be kept in mind that each has been controversial in recent scholarship, with a variety of interpretations.

1. Synagogue

It was once common to believe that the synagogue was a central institution in the Jewish community already at an early time, perhaps as early as the exilic period or even during the time of the Judahite monarchy. Many standard references continue to perpetuate such views as if they were axiomatic, yet already a quarter of a century and more ago, voices began to be raised questioning this view.<sup>1</sup> Although one still sees more than one substantial reconstruction, recent studies<sup>2</sup> have had a common framework of understanding which is also argued for here.

---

<sup>1</sup> My own objections to this interpretation were presented publicly in the mid-1980's (though when the paper was first read, it received a good deal of oral criticism): "Synagogues in Pre-70 Palestine: A Re-assessment," JTS 39 (1988): 401–410. A collection bringing together some of these early studies is Dan Urman and Paul V. M. Flesher, eds., Ancient Synagogues: Historical Analysis and Archaeological Discovery, Studia Post-Biblica 47 (Leiden: Brill, 1995).

<sup>2</sup> E.g., Donald D. Binder, Into the Temple Courts: The Place of the Synagogues in the Second Temple Period, SBLDS 169 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1999); Stephen Fine, ed., Sacred Realm: The Emergence of the Synagogue in the Ancient World (Oxford: Oxford University Press; New York: Yeshiva University Museum, 1996); idem, ed., Jews, Christians, and Polytheists in the Ancient Synagogue: Cultural Interaction during the Greco-Roman Period, Baltimore Studies in the History of Judaism (London/New York: Routledge, 1999); idem, This Holy Place: On the Sanctity of the Synagogue during the Greco-Roman Period, Christianity and Judaism in Antiquity 11 (Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame, 1997); Heather A. McKay, "Ancient Synagogues: The Continuing Dialectic Between Two Major Views", CR:BS 6 (1998) 103–142; C. Perrot and A. Contessa, "Synagogue," in Supplément au Dictionnaire de la Bible, ed. Jacques Briand and Michel Quesnel (Paris: Letouzey & Ané, 2003) 13:653ff.

The importance that the synagogue acquired for Jewish communities in the early centuries of the Common Era is not in question. The synagogue is attested both literarily and archaeologically from the second or third centuries CE as playing a central role in most Jewish communities, functioning not only as a center of worship but also of community life, whether in Palestine, Egypt, the Greco-Roman world, or Babylonia. There are two questions: when and where did the synagogue originate and, if that was not in Palestine, when did it become a major institution in the Jewish homeland? The following relevant points have become recognized: (1) for many centuries the temple seems to have been the center of public worship, and the substitute of some other form of public worship is not likely to have come about very suddenly; (2) when worship outside the temple is mentioned in early sources, the references are to prayer and the like in the context of the home; (3) no source refers to the synagogue or anything like it until the third century BCE; that is, there is no archaeological, epigraphical, or literary attestation to the existence of the synagogue before that time. Let us look at these points in more detail:

1. For many centuries the temple seems to have been the center of public worship, and the substitute of some other form of public worship is not likely to have come about very suddenly.

The biblical literature gives a consistent picture that the proper place of worship was a temple, usually the Jerusalem temple.<sup>3</sup> Even after the temple had been destroyed and left in ruins for many decades, the paramount concern was presented as rebuilding it (Hag 1:1–8; Zech 4; Ezra 1–6), not in establishing other meeting places or places of worship. The Greek writer Hecateus of Abdera, in a treatise on the Jews (or at least including the Jews) in about 300 BCE, makes the society of the Jews in Palestine revolve around the temple and its priesthood.<sup>4</sup> In the time of the Maccabees, what caused the Jews to rise up in revolt in an unprecedented way was the desecration of the temple. The restoration of the temple to its former status was demanded at a painful price, but the Palestinian community was willing to pay it. In none of these passages is there any suggestion of another means or place of worship or public assembly apart from the temple.<sup>5</sup>

---

<sup>3</sup> Here and there are passages that admit—often tacitly—that other places of worship or altars existed (e.g., 1 Kings 12:26–31; 18:30; 2 Kings 12:4; 15:4).

<sup>4</sup> See further n. 26 below.

2. When worship outside the temple is mentioned in early sources, the references are to prayer and the like in the context of the home.

The early literary sources that mention Jews worshipping outside Jerusalem always picture them as doing so in the privacy of their homes. In Tobit prayer is conducted and the festivals celebrated in the home (2:1–3); there is no hint of a community institution. Similarly, both Daniel (6:11) and Judith (8:36–10:2) picture their protagonists as praying in their homes (cf. also Acts 1:13–14). Ben Sira, 1–3 Maccabees, and the Letter of Aristeas are silent about worship outside the temple, but they are also silent on the existence of the synagogue. The first references to anything like synagogues in literature come in fact from the first century CE. The first of these is Philo of Alexandria (proseuchē: Flaccus 47–49, 53; Legat. 132–134, etc.). Josephus mentions synagogues in Caesarea (sunagogē: War 2.285), Dora (sunagogē: Ant. 19.300–5), as well as in Tiberias (proseuchē: Life 54 277), though not elsewhere in Palestine. (The New Testament also contains a number of relevant references that can be dated to the first century CE, as will be discussed below.)

3. No source refers to the synagogue or anything like it until the third century BCE. There is no archaeological, epigraphical, or literary attestation to the existence of the synagogue before that time.

Important as literary sources are, they are sometimes secondary; that is, they are removed in time from the situation that they claim to describe, or they might even be picturing a hypothetical scenario. This is why archaeological and epigraphical sources are generally more trustworthy. We are fortunate that a good deal of study has been made of synagogue remains in recent years. The earliest physical evidence for the synagogue comes in the mid-third century BCE in Egypt.<sup>6</sup> At that time we start to find buildings with inscriptions that speak of a <sup>5</sup> There may also have been occasional assemblies, such as is hinted at in 1 Macc 3:46, but this has no evident connection with the synagogue. On this passage, cf. Philip R. Davies, “A Note on 1 Macc. III. 46,” JTS 23 (1972): 117–121.

<sup>6</sup> J. Gwyn Griffiths, “Egypt and the Rise of the Synagogue,” JTS 38 (1987): 1–15; reprinted in Ancient Synagogues: Historical Analysis and Archaeological Discovery, ed. Urman and Flesher 1:3–16; Rachel Hachlili, “The Origin of the Synagogue: A Re-assessment,” JSJ 28 (1997): 34–47.

“prayer house” (proseuchē) of the Jews.<sup>7</sup> This is hardly surprising because Jewish communities in the areas far away from Palestine had no easy access to the Jerusalem temple. Pilgrims came each year in great numbers to worship at Jerusalem during the annual festivals (Philo, Spec. 1.69–70; Josephus, War 6.420–427), yet this was still only a small minority of Jews the world over. A wealthy Jew such as Philo of Alexandria mentions only once traveling to Jerusalem (De Providentia 2.64). Perhaps he went more than once in his lifetime, but the impression left is that it was not very frequent. Thus, the diaspora communities would have felt a need for some means of expressing their religion in a community fashion.

Archaeologically, the remains of synagogues have been found in a variety of sites in the Palestinian area and from other places like Dura Europa and Stobi, but most of these are from the second to seventh centuries CE. Surprisingly few actual remains of synagogue buildings have been identified for the pre-70 period. In the diaspora, the only two sites so far known are from Ostia and Delos.<sup>8</sup> On the other hand, one of the main reasons for identifying some buildings as synagogues is the presence of inscriptions that state this or at least suggest it, and a number of these exist. In Egypt several official documents make reference to the site of a proseuchē (e.g., in Arsinoë-Crocodilopolis and Alexandrou-Nesos).<sup>9</sup> There is also a variety of actual synagogue inscriptions dedicating the institution to God on behalf of the current rulers of Egypt, the earliest of these dating to the mid-third century BCE.<sup>10</sup> Inscriptions in Cyrenaica refer to a sunagogē, and two others mention that members of the local Jewish community (politeuma) met in an amphitheatre, which might possibly be a reference to the same building.<sup>11</sup>

With regard to Palestine, where many remains of later synagogues are well documented, it has been difficult to find pre-70 remains of synagogue buildings. Ruins of synagogues are thought to have been found in Gamla to the northeast of the Sea of Galilee, in Herodium, and Masada. Not everyone is willing to concede that the archaeology

---

<sup>7</sup> Some of these inscriptions are collected in Jewish Inscriptions of Graeco-Roman Egypt, ed. William Horbury and David Noy (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992), nr. 9; 13; 22; 24; 25; 27; 28; 105(?); 117; 125; 126.

<sup>8</sup> Binder, Into the Temple Courts, 228–229.

<sup>9</sup> Ibid., 236–240.

<sup>10</sup> Ibid., 240–249; see also the inscriptions cited in n. 7 above.

<sup>11</sup> Ibid., 256–263.

is certain, however.<sup>12</sup> There are no inscriptions identifying them as synagogues, for example. As for Magdala and Capernaum, not enough concrete data are available to affirm the existence of pre-70 synagogues.<sup>13</sup> Nevertheless, most scholars are willing to accept that the synagogue is attested as an institution in Palestine by the first century CE. This is consistent with the literary sources which suggest that the synagogue was imported into Palestine after the Maccabean revolt.

A further indication for synagogues in Palestine, however, is the Theodotus inscription, found in Jerusalem in 1913. This inscription states that the synagogue in question goes back to the time of the author's grandfather and served as a place for reading the law and giving hospitality to travelers:

Theodotos, (son) of Vettenos, priest and archisynagōgos, son of an archisynagōgos, grandson of an archisynagōgos, built the synagōgē for the reading of the law and the teaching of the commandments, and the guest-chamber and the rooms and the water installations for lodging for those needing them from abroad, which his fathers, the elders and Simonides founded.<sup>14</sup>

Most scholars accept that the Theodotus inscription is pre-70. H. Kee is almost alone in arguing that it is post-70, but a number of scholars who would otherwise be sympathetic with the idea of the synagogue in Palestine being late have still criticized Kee on this point.<sup>15</sup> The question seems to have been given a definitive answer by J.S. Kloppenborg Verbin's thorough study: the inscription is most likely pre-70 and provides evidence for a synagogue in Jerusalem about the turn of the era.<sup>16</sup>

The New Testament is the earliest set of writings that specifically locates synagogues in the central regions of Palestine, including Jerusalem. Many passages in the gospels and Acts describe Jesus or the early Christians attending and even speaking in the synagogues.

---

<sup>12</sup> M. J. S. Chiat, Handbook of Synagogue Architecture, BJS 29 (Atlanta: Scholars, 1982), 116–118, 204–207, 248–251, 282–284.

<sup>13</sup> Perrot, "Synagogue," cols. 676–677.

<sup>14</sup> The inscription is found in a variety of collections that discuss the synagogue. The translation given here is taken from Binder, Into the Temple Courts, 104.

<sup>15</sup> Pieter W. van der Horst, "Was the Synagogue a Place of Sabbath Worship before 70 CE?" in Jews, Christians, and Polytheists in the Ancient Synagogue, ed. Steven Fine, 18–23; Binder, Into the Temple Courts, 104–109.

<sup>16</sup> John S. Kloppenborg, "Dating Theodotus (CIJ II 1404)," JJS 51 (2002): 243–80.

Perhaps one of the most detailed descriptions is found in Luke 4:16–29. Here Jesus is pictured as reading a passage from the book of Isaiah and then expounding it. Some have tried to extract a detailed description of a synagogue service from it. There are two problems with such an interpretation. First, the passage actually gives little that is specific: no connection with a specific time of year; no suggestion that a lectionary of readings is being followed; no statement that the format in this passage was one regularly followed, whether in Nazareth or elsewhere. Secondly, Luke is writing well after 70 CE. We do not know whether he had any knowledge of pre-70 synagogues or even whether Nazareth had a synagogue during Jesus' lifetime.

We have some indication of what sorts of activities went on in synagogues, but we know rather less than some have suggested: the data are insufficient to give a full picture. The sources vary from primary inscriptions to alleged official decrees and letters in literary sources to statements in literary sources. These are not all on the same level of credibility. For example, Josephus's apologetic concerns make some of his data suspect, and the New Testament statements have some problems associated with them. But the same broad picture tends to emerge from the various sources; the consistent synagogue activities were:

- Reading scripture.
- Prayer.
- Teaching and homiletic activity.

These seem to have been the main sort of activities in synagogues, but it is difficult to go beyond that with any certainty.

The synagogue as a place of prayer and worship has been generally accepted, but it was recently challenged.<sup>17</sup> The difficulties of determining precisely what the synagogues did from the available sources have already been commented on. Yet there are several arguments that point to one function being that of prayer and worship:<sup>18</sup> (1) the earliest name in inscriptions is proseuchē, "(place of) prayer, prayer (house)," which seems an odd name to give a building which had nothing to do with prayer; (2) Agatharchides of Cnidus states that the

---

<sup>17</sup> Heather A. McKay, Sabbath and Synagogue: The Question of Sabbath Worship in Ancient Judaism, Religions in the Graeco-Roman World 122 (Leiden: Brill, 1994).

<sup>18</sup> van der Horst, "Was the Synagogue a Place of Sabbath Worship before 70 CE?" 23–37; Binder, Into the Temple Courts, 404–415.

Jews “pray with outstretched hands in the temples (hiera) until the evening.”<sup>19</sup> Although his focus is on the Jews of Jerusalem, he is likely drawing on his experience of synagogues in Alexandria (where he lived most of his life) and elsewhere in the Diaspora.

Another synagogue activity was evidently the reading of Scripture. The Theodotus inscription speaks only of reading and study of scriptures (as well as hospitality). The reading of the Torah and Prophets seems to have been carried out in many synagogues, if not in all. This is implied by several New Testament passages (Luke 4:16–19; Acts 13:15; 15:21). We have no information to go beyond this basic statement that biblical reading took place. Despite the occasional argument that a biblical reading was done according to a fixed lectionary cycle, this seems unlikely; even rabbinic literature does not attest a fixed cycle until quite late.<sup>20</sup> The same applies to the translation of the biblical readings into Aramaic. Although targumizing apparently took place in synagogue services during the rabbinic period, no evidence has so far been produced that targums or translating into Aramaic had a place in the pre-70 synagogues.

Summary

What can we say about the synagogue in the first century CE? It appears to have developed first in the Diaspora because of the remoteness of the temple and its cult from many Jews outside Palestine, but this was rather later than many assume: about the mid-third century BCE. It eventually reached Palestine, though this was even later: the first century BCE or possibly even only in the first century CE. The Jews of Palestine had rather easier access to the temple and thus did not feel the need for another institution in which to practice the communal aspects of their religion. But apparently even those in the holy land itself saw some value in having a place for reading the law and public prayer on a regular basis. Once Jerusalem was destroyed, the synagogue became much more important because there was nothing else: it no longer had a rival in the form of the temple. The synagogue became a central religious institution in most Jewish communities in the post-70 period.

<sup>19</sup> Quoted in Josephus, Contra Apionem 1.209.

<sup>20</sup> Grabbe, “Synagogues in Pre-70 Palestine,” 408–409.

2. Sanhedrin

The gospels and Acts speak of “the” Sanhedrin (e.g., Matt 5:22; Mark 14:55; Acts 23:20), as if there was only one. Several recent discussions have argued, however, that there was more than one institution. The reason is that the data from the different sources are so diverse that it seems difficult to reconcile them to one judicial body. For example, both A. Edersheim and G. F. Moore spoke of one body,<sup>21</sup> while an early study by A. Büchler, as well as more recently H. Mantel argued for two: a “religious” Sanhedrin and a “secular” one.<sup>22</sup> The most recent study, by David Goodblatt, argues that no regular body known as the Sanhedrin existed.<sup>23</sup> It was a creation of the rabbis long after the temple was destroyed and the high priest no longer had a function. Although various councils met on an ad hoc basis at different points in the Second Temple period, these did not constitute a permanent body. Rather, the high priest was the central religious authority.

Goodblatt quite rightly put his finger on the essential problem: trying to reconcile the description of the Sanhedrin in the Mishnah tractate Sanhedrin with the passages found in actual Second Temple sources. A number of studies drew on rabbinic literature as if it was a Second Temple source, when in fact it is centuries after the destruction of the temple in 70 CE and often represents a quite different social and political situation. More on this later. The significance of this is that the Mishnaic “Sanhedrin” should be taken out of the equation in the initial study. The question of the existence—or non-existence—of the Sanhedrin needs to be determined from Second Temple sources and only then should the rabbinic picture be examined.

We begin our investigation with the Persian period. There are large gaps in our knowledge of the Persian period, but we have some hints

---

<sup>21</sup> Alfred Edersheim, The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, 2nd ed. (London: Longmans, Green, and Co., 1886), 2:553–558; George Foot Moore, Judaism in the First Three Centuries of the Christian Era, 3 vols. (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1927–30), 1:82, 85; 3:32–34.

<sup>22</sup> On Büchler, see Eduard Lohse, “συνέδριον”, TDNT 7:863 n. 17. See also H. Mantel, Studies in the History of the Sanhedrin (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1961); “Sanhedrin,” IDBSup (1976): 784–86.

<sup>23</sup> David Goodblatt, The Monarchic Principle: Studies in Jewish Self-Government in Antiquity, Texte und Studien zum Antiken Judentum 38 (Tübingen: Mohr [Siebeck], 1994), 130. See also his earlier article, “Sanhedrin,” Encyclopedia of Religion (New York and London: Macmillan, 1987), 13:60–63.

about the structure of authority in the religious community.<sup>24</sup> No such institution as the Sanhedrin is described, but several interesting points emerge when the situation is studied. Where the high priest is mentioned in the Old Testament, he is often presented as acting in conjunction with other priests—a natural situation if he was seen as the head of the priests (2 Kings 23:4; 2 Chron 26:16–20). Yet the high priest also often brought in others under his leadership to help carry out necessary tasks or worked with others outside the priesthood (2 Kings 11; 12:8–11; 22:8–14; 2 Chron 23; 24:4–11; 34:14–22). One of the Elephantine papyri suggests that the leadership of the community in Judah includes not only the governor and the high priest but also the other priests and the nobility: “We sent a letter to our lord [Bagohi the governor of Judah] and to Yehohanan the high priest and his companions the priests who are in Jerusalem and to Ostan the brother of Anan and the nobles of the Jews.”<sup>25</sup> In sum, it is likely that any ruler would have had his advisers, whether they were “official” or not. Although the Elephantine letter suggests that the high priest involved others in his work, we have too little information to be certain that a formal body already existed in the Persian period. It does seem, though, that the roots of “the Sanhedrin” might be found here.

In the first century and a half of the Hellenistic period, between Alexander and the Maccabees, we have several references to the administrative structure of the Jews in Judah. It is abundantly clear that the high priest is not only the religious leader but also represents the Jewish community in its relationship to the Greek overlords and in the context of other political activities. The Greek historian Hecataeus of Abdera, writing about 300 BCE, had one of the few descriptions of the Jewish people in Palestine and one of the earliest in Greek.<sup>26</sup> He

---

<sup>24</sup> For a recent treatment of the whole period, see Lester L. Grabbe, A History of the Jews and Judaism in the Second Temple Period, 1: Yehud: A History of the Persian Province of Judah, LSTS 47 (London and New York: T&T Clark International, 2004). A discussion of the question of the high priest and the Sanhedrin is found at 230–235.

<sup>25</sup> Bezalel Porten and Ada Yardeni, Textbook of Aramaic Documents from Ancient Egypt: 1–4, Hebrew University, Department of the History of the Jewish People, Texts and Studies for Students (Jerusalem: Hebrew University, 1986–99), A4.7:18–19//A4.8:17–18 = A. Cowley, Aramaic Papyri of the Fifth Century B.C. (1923; reprinted Osnabruck: Otto Zeller, 1967), 30:18–19//31:17–18.

<sup>26</sup> Apud Diodorus Siculus, 40.3.1–8. For text, translation, and commentary, see Menahem Stern, Jews and Judaism in Greek and Latin Literature, 3 vols. (Jerusalem: Israel Academy of Arts and Sciences, 1974–84), 1:26–35. For a survey of the most

describes a Jewish ethnic and national community centering on Jerusalem in which the priests provide leadership and act as judges, as well as running the cult and teaching the law. Chief authority is invested in the high priest. A little later, about the middle of the third century BCE, the high priest Onias II refused to pay a tribute of twenty talents of silver to the Ptolemaic court. A relative by marriage, a man from a powerful family named Joseph Tobiad, intervened to pay the sum owed.<sup>27</sup> The precise significance of this story is disputed, but it serves to illustrate that the high priest's power was not necessarily a constant over the centuries.

After conquering Palestine in 200 BCE, the Seleucid ruler Antiochus III rewarded the Jews who had helped him to defeat the soldiers of Ptolemy by opening the gates of Jerusalem to him. Antiochus issued a decree which listed the temple personnel and relieved some of their taxes temporarily so the temple could be repaired of war damage. The decree is as follows:<sup>28</sup>

King Antiochus to Ptolemy [a Seleucid official, not the king of Egypt], greeting. Inasmuch as the Jews, from the very moment when we entered their country, showed their eagerness to serve us and, when we came to their city, gave us a splendid reception and met us with their senate [meta tēs gerousias] and furnished an abundance of provisions to our soldiers and elephants, and also helped us to expel the Egyptian garrison in the citadel, we have seen fit on our part to requite them for these acts and to restore their city which has been destroyed by the hazards of war, and to repeople it by bringing back to it those who have been dispersed abroad... And all the members of the nation shall have a form of government in accordance with the laws of their country, and the senate [gerousia], the priests, the scribes of the temple and the temple-singers recent scholarship on the work, see Bezalel Bar-Kochva, Pseudo-Hecataeus, On the Jews: Legitimizing the Jewish Diaspora, Hellenistic Culture and Society 21 (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996), 7–43. Unfortunately, the quotations in Josephus are not likely to be authentic, as Bar-Kochva has now demonstrated.

---

<sup>27</sup> Ant. 12.160–166; on doubts about this and also the details of the Joseph Story, see Dov Gera, Judaea and Mediterranean Politics, 219 to 161 B.C.E., Brill's Series in Jewish Studies 8 (Leiden: Brill, 1998), ch. 2; idem, "On the Credibility of the History of the Tobiads", in Greece and Rome in Eretz Israel: Collected Essays, ed. A. Kasher, U. Rappaport, and G. Fuks (Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society, 1990), 21–38. Without entering into a debate on this issue, I would note that even fictional accounts can reflect the general functioning of institutions in society.

<sup>28</sup> Quoted in Josephus, Ant. 12.138–46 (translation from H. St. J. Thackeray, et al., eds., Josephus, LCL [London: Heineman; Cambridge: Harvard, 1926–65], 7:71–75).

shall be relieved from the poll-tax and the crown-tax and the salt-tax which they pay.

Unfortunately, this document is known only from its quotation in Josephus. This immediately raises the question of whether it is authentic or is only perhaps a Jewish invention. It has been widely accepted as basically authentic overall, though perhaps it contains a couple of later additions.<sup>29</sup> A problem still remains in its failure to mention the high priest (who is usually thought to be Simon II at that time). There are several possible explanations for this: Antiochus may have wanted to concentrate on the institutions (the “senate”) rather than individuals; or Simon may have opposed Antiochus (but then why was he allowed to continue in office?); or there was no high priest at the time of the invasion, perhaps because the high priest was killed in the fighting over Jerusalem; and Simon came to the office only after Antiochus had entered the city. These are only suggestions, but the lack of mention of Simon, while a puzzle, is not fatal to the decree’s authenticity.

The books of Maccabees are a major source for information about Judea and its people in the middle of the second century BCE. Not only can they be dated and to some extent cross checked with Greco-Roman sources, but they also give some of the most detailed information available to us. They provide a number of references to a “council of elders” or “senate,” known in the Greek sources as the gerousia (unfortunately, we have no Semitic language sources for this time). Such an institution definitely existed as part of the Hellenistic city established by Jason, and was likely to have been an official body of the Greek polis of Jerusalem. This is clear from 2 Macc 4:43–50, which states:

Charges were brought against Menelaus about this incident. When the king came to Tyre, three men sent by the senate [gerousia] presented the case before him . . . Menelaus, the cause of all the trouble, he [Antiochus] acquitted of the charges against him, while he sentenced to death those unfortunate men, who would have been freed uncondemned if they had pleaded even before Scythians.

---

<sup>29</sup> On the question of authenticity, see the discussion and bibliography in Lester L. Grabbe, “Jewish Historiography and Scripture in the Hellenistic Period,” in Did Moses Speak Attic? Jewish Historiography and Scripture in the Hellenistic Period, ed. L. L. Grabbe, JSOTSup 317 = European Seminar in Historical Methodology 3 (Sheffield Academic Press, 2001), 129–155, esp. 139–142.

A gerousia was not the traditional governing body for Greek cities which more often had officials known as archons and an assembly of citizens known as the ekklēsia. Thus, Jason seems to have continued a pre-existing Jewish body, even if he reconstituted it.<sup>30</sup>

Also of significance are the series of letters quoted in both 1 and 2 Maccabees. Probably not all of them are authentic, but some of them are likely to be. In any case, even literary creations would have attempted to imitate actual models of letters at the time. First, we look at the alleged letter of Jonathan to the Spartans (1 Macc 12:5–6):

This is the copy of the letter that Jonathan wrote to the Spartans: “The high priest Jonathan, the senate [gerousia] of the nation, the priests, and the rest of the Jewish people to their brothers the Spartans, greetings.”

Josephus, who is drawing on a version of 1 Maccabees for his account in the Antiquities, gives a slightly different wording but with much the same picture (Ant. 13.166):

Jonathan, high priest of the Jewish nation, and the senate [gerousia] and council of priests [variant: “council of the Jews”] to their brothers, the ephors and senate and people of Lacedaemon, greeting.

At the beginning of 2 Maccabees are letters ostensibly from Judas Maccabeus. The first is sent in the name of Judas and the gerousia (1:10):

The people of Jerusalem and of Judea and the senate [gerousia] and Judas,
To Aristobulus, who is of the family of the anointed priests, teacher of King Ptolemy, and to the Jews in Egypt, Greetings and good health.

Even if this letter is fictitious, as is generally agreed, the question is whether the writer has simply invented the council alongside Judas or whether he is reflecting the situation in his own time. Another letter, this time from Antiochus IV during the Maccabean conflict and thought to be authentic, is addressed to the “senate” (gerousia) of the Jews (2 Macc 11:27):

To the nation the king’s letter was as follows:

“King Antiochus to the senate [tē gerousia] of the Jews and to the other Jews, greetings. If you are well, it is as we desire. We also are in good health. Menelaus has informed us that you wish to return home and look after your own affairs.”

---

<sup>30</sup> Cf. Emil Schürer, The Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ, revised G. Vermes, et al.; 3 vols. in 4 (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1973–87), 2:202.

3 Maccabees was probably written later than 1 and 2 Maccabees, though its precise dating is debated. 3 Maccabees is a curious mixture. On the whole, it describes a situation that is likely to be unhistorical, whether the attempt by Ptolemy IV Philopater (221–204 BCE) to enter the temple when he visited Jerusalem or his persecution of the Jews subsequently. Nevertheless, the author is knowledgeable about the battle of Raphia in 218 BCE (3 Macc 1). In 1:6–8 is described the invitation given to Ptolemy by the Jews:

With the plot against him thwarted, Ptolemy now decided to visit the neighboring cities and offer them encouragement. When he had done this and distributed gifts to their shrines, he made his subjects feel secure. When the Jews sent a delegation of the council [apo tēs gerousias] and the elders to greet him and offer him friendly gifts and congratulate him on his achievements, he was all the more eager to visit them as soon as possible.

Where he got his information about the “council of the Jews” is unknown, but it may reflect an actual source or some sort of personal knowledge relating to the writer’s own time.

The book of Judith ostensibly describes an invasion of Judah by Nebuchadnezzar. The book is a work of fiction with many errors about the historical situation during the Neo-Babylonian period. However, this would not prevent the author from knowing about Jewish society in his own time (second century BCE?). In several passages the book mentions a decision-making body associated with the high priest. Judith 4:6–8 (NRSV) gives the reaction of the Jews to the invasion of Holophernes:

The high priest, Joakim, who was in Jerusalem at the time, wrote to the people of Bethulia... So the Israelites did as they had been ordered by the high priest Joakim and the senate [gerousia] of the whole people of Israel, in session at Jerusalem.

The book of Judith also assumes that the Jerusalem “senate” would make decisions on cultic matters. The following is taken from an alleged speech of Judith to Holophernes (11:14 NRSV):

Since their food supply is exhausted and their water has almost given out, they have planned to kill their livestock and have determined to use all that God by his laws has forbidden them to eat. They have decided to consume the first fruits of the grain and the tithes of the wine and oil, which they had consecrated and set aside for the priests who minister in the presence of our God in Jerusalem—things it is not lawful for any of the people even to touch with their hands. Since even the people in Jerusalem have been doing this, they have sent messengers there in order to bring back permission from the council of elders [gerousia]. When the response reaches them and they act upon it, on that very day they will be handed over to you to be destroyed.

Another passage notes that “Joakim the high priest and the gerousia of the Israelites” who lived in Jerusalem came to see the wonderful things done by the Lord on Israel’s behalf (15:8).

To sum up the passages looked at so far, they suggest that a “council” operated alongside the high priest. The high priest appears to work with or lead the council, and none clearly states that the council made decisions independently of the high priest or could overrule him. The passages do suggest that the “council” was a continuing institution of the Judah’s administration and not just an ad hoc assembly called on occasion by the high priest.

We now come to the important source of the Jewish historian Josephus. He gives a number of references to what seems to be an institution in the government or administration of Judah at various points in its history. He uses a number of terms: gerousia (“council of elders,” “senate”), sunedrion (“assembly,” “meeting,” “council”), and boulē (“council”). Whether these all refer to the same thing or to separate entities should emerge after considering the passages in which the various terms are used.

The early part of the Antiquities is based on the biblical text, but some of the interpretations there are likely to have been reflections of Josephus’s own experience. For example, Ant. 4.218 states that hard cases which cannot be decided by the local judges are to go to the holy city for the high priest, the prophet, and gerousia to judge. This is based on Deut. 17:8–9 which mentions only the “Levitical priests” and the judge, so Josephus’ statement represents a re-interpretation of the passage. Ant. 4.224 adds that the king is to do nothing without the high priest and “the council of his senators” (tōn gerousiastōn). Ant. 5.23 has the gerousia among those that make a circuit of the walls of Jericho. These passages seem to put a collective body or council alongside the high priest.

The next term used by Josephus is sunedrion (which was borrowed into Hebrew to become sanhedrin). An important passage is Ant. 14.163–184. In this particular episode, some complained of Herod’s actions as governor of Galilee, because he had executed certain “brigands.” The issue focused on the fact that he had done this without permission of “the council” (tou sunedriou [Ant. 14.167]). He himself was called to answer before this council under the chairmanship of Hyrcanus II, the high priest (Ant. 14.168–80). Later on Herod is alleged to have executed many members of that body (Ant. 14.175).<sup>31</sup> This passage gives the definite impression that “the council” (to sunedrion) is a pre-existing body, with a variety of prominent Jews as members (both priestly and lay) and chaired by the high priest.

There are two problems, however: first, there are a number of differences between the two accounts in the War and the Antiquities. In the previous paragraph, all references are from the Antiquities; however, the earlier account in the War is somewhat different: the term sunedrion is not mentioned in the version in the War, the story of Samaias the Pharisee is absent from the War, and the details regarding the outcome of Herod’s trial are somewhat different in the two. However, these differences are not unusual, since the War and the Antiquities often differ in details where they are parallel. One of the consistent differences is that of length, with the War’s account usually being rather shorter, but there are also tendencies in the Antiquities based on Josephus’s own proclivities or prejudices.<sup>32</sup>

Secondly, some passages have been thought to be secondary, especially the story of Samaias the Pharisee.<sup>33</sup> Granted the difference between the two accounts, is the one in the Antiquities “a story whose historical value is highly suspect”?<sup>34</sup> As suggested, the story of Samaias

<sup>31</sup> Goodblatt (The Monarchic Principle, 111) states that this assertion is mistaken because Josephus later says that Herod killed forty-five of Antigonus’s men (Ant. 15.6). However, there is no evidence that either episode has anything to do with the other. It is Goodblatt who asserts that they are two versions of the same episode; the text nowhere suggests that.

<sup>32</sup> For example, I noted the tendency for Josephus to include the Pharisees as actants at various points in the Antiquities where the War was silent about them (Judaism from Cyrus to Hadrian, 304, 470–472). Cf. also Lester L. Grabbe, “The Sadducees and Pharisees”, in Judaism in Late Antiquity, 3: Where We Stand: Issues and Debates in Ancient Judaism 1, ed. Jacob Neusner and Alan J. Avery-Peck, HdO: Erste Abteilung, der Nahe und Mittlere Osten 40 (Leiden: Brill, 1997), 3.35–62.

<sup>33</sup> This second point is argued by Goodblatt (The Monarchic Principle, 112–113) who refers to it as “a fictionalized account of the events, created in Pharisaic circles and preserved by Josephus at JA 14.” Similar views are expressed by Ralph Marcus (Josephus, LCL, 7:540) and E. P. Sanders (Jesus and Judaism [Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985] 313).

<sup>34</sup> Quotation from Goodblatt, The Monarchic Principle, 113.

may indeed be a Pharisaic tradition that Josephus has gained from somewhere. However, anyone who reads the two accounts will see that they are essentially the same in the main features: Herod is accused by the families of the victims, he is tried before Hyrcanus, he escapes being condemned, and many other elements of the story are more or less the same. We must also keep in mind that Josephus does sometimes have genuine additional information in the later account (perhaps because the earlier one extensively compressed the sources in some cases). Most significantly, although sunedrion does not occur in relevant passage in the War, there are several references to a trial. Before whom was this trial conducted? There is nothing to rule out the sunedrion of the Antiquities, and the presence or absence of the Samaias story does not change this.<sup>35</sup> On the contrary, the existence of “the sunedrion” does not depend on the Samaias story but is referred to throughout the account in the Antiquities and is compatible with the War. If there was no such institution, why would Josephus have put it in? Where did he get the idea, if he invented it, and what was his motive?

King Agrippa II (who was not king over Judah but had considerable influence with regard to the Roman province of Judaea) was asked for a ruling on a priestly matter about the year 64 CE (Ant. 20.216–217):

Those of the Levites—this is one of our tribes—who were singers of hymns urged the king to convene the Sanhedrin [sunedrion] and get them permission to wear linen robes on equal terms with the priests, maintaining that it was fitting that he should introduce, to mark his reign, some innovation by which he would be remembered. Nor did they fail to obtain their request; for the king, with the consent of those who attended the Sanhedrin [to sunedrion], allowed the singers of hymns to discard their former robes and to wear linen ones such as they wished.

The question is whether Agrippa was being asked to convene a pre-existing body or to appoint an ad hoc group to advise on the question. What sort of ad hoc council would Agrippa have called? Who would be on it? After all, this was a priestly matter; on the other hand, the priests might have seen the request as a threat. It seems most likely that Agrippa would have used an official body if one already existed. However, the first occurrence of the word sunedrion is without the definite article. Should the phrase be translated, “to convene an (ad hoc) council”? This might indeed be the case, and one should recognize it, but the absence of the definite article does not automatically lead to a meaning which would take the indefinite article in English.<sup>36</sup> The convening of an already existing group is grammatically possible, is implied by the context, and would certainly fit without any problem.

---

<sup>35</sup> The Monarchic Principle, 113. There is no basis for Goodblatt’s assertion, “Thus the reference to an ongoing institution of nation-wide jurisdiction called ‘the sunedrion’ may be no more historical than the account of Samaias’ rebuke.”

A number of passages use another term: boulē. It was widely used for one of the main ruling bodies within a semi-independent Greek city (alongside the ekkēsia or “assembly of citizens”). The question is, what is its precise connotation in these passages? V.A. Tcherikover argued that it was not the city council, as one might think, but was a Jewish body that had responsibility for the nation rather than just the city of Jerusalem.<sup>37</sup> We also read of a building in which the boulē met (War 5.144; 6.354) and of the “secretary of the boulē” (War 5.532).

According to Josephus (Ant. 20.10–14) the emperor Claudius wrote to the Jews. The specific issue was allowing them control of the high priestly garments at Agrippa I’s request (up until then the Romans kept the garments in custody until just before they were needed during festivals in the temple, as a means of controlling the Jews), but this is not of major relevance:

Claudius Caesar Germanicus, in the fifth year of tribunician power, designated consul for the fourth time, Imperator for the tenth time, Father of his country, to the rulers [archoi], council [boulē], and people [dēmos] of Jerusalem and to the whole nation of the Jews, greeting.

During Florus’s term of office (about 66 CE), when there was trouble the Roman governor assembled “the chief priests, the nobles, and the most eminent citizens” to have certain individuals handed over who had insulted him (War 2.301). He later sent for the “chief priests and leading citizens” (War 2.318). Later, he called “the chief priests and the boulē” to tell them he was leaving the city, “since it was they who were clearly responsible for civic order in Jerusalem’ (War 2.15.6 §331; cf. 2.16.2 §336). Shortly afterward the Jewish king Agrippa II attempted to avert the friction between the Romans and Jews by having “the rulers and members of the council [bouleutai]” go out and collect taxes to pay the arrears to the Romans (War 2.17.1 §§405, 407).

---

<sup>36</sup> The significance of the presence or absence of the article in Greek is not always easy to define; cf. Herbert Weir Smyth, Greek Grammar, revised Gordon M. Messing (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1956), 288–292; Friedrich Blass and Albert Debrunner, Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Griechisch, revised Friedrich Rehkopf; 14th fully revised ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1976), 201–227; F. Blass and A. Debrunner, revision of 9th–10th German ed. by Robert W. Funk (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1961), 131–145; Nigel Turner, Vol. III: Syntax in A Grammar of New Testament Greek, ed. James Hope Moulton (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1963), 172–184.

<sup>37</sup> V. A. Tcherikover, “Was Jerusalem a ‘Polis?’” IEJ 14 (1964): 61–78.

In some of these passages, the boulē might be a city body, but the last passage seems to have to do with collecting taxes over a much wider area. Also, the association of the “chief priests” with the boulē seems strange if it was only a city council. On the other hand, the chief priests are associated in other passages with the gerousia and sunedrion. This suggests that the boulē is another name for the same body rather than a separate body.

We now come to the references in the New Testament. A number of the passages in the gospels suggest an existing body with the powers of judgment and under the control of the high priest or the chief priests. The Sermon on the Mount asserts, “Whoever says to his brother, ‘Raka,’ will be liable to ‘the council’ [to sunedrion]” (Matt 5:22). John 11:47 states that “the chief priests and the Pharisees” called together “the council” (sunedrion) to plot against Jesus. Later, the trial of Jesus included a trial before the “the council” (to sunedrion: Mark 14:55; 15:1//Matt 26:59//Luke 22:66). Joseph of Arimathea was alleged to have been a member of the council (bouleutēs: Mark 15:42–43//Luke 23:50–51). The book of Acts is the source giving what seems to be the most direct information on how the council was supposed to have functioned. In Acts 4 and 5 the apostles Peter and John are pictured as being called before the council to account for their actions:

[4:1] While Peter and John were speaking to the people, the priests, the captain of the temple, and the Sadducees came to them...[4:5–6] The next day their rulers, elders, and scribes assembled in Jerusalem, with Annas the high priest, Caiaphas, John, and Alexander, and all who were of the high-priestly family...[4:8] Then Peter, filled with the Holy Spirit, said to them, “Rulers of the people and elders...” ...[4:15] So they ordered them to leave the council [exō tou sunedriou] while they discussed the matter with one another.

[5:21] When the high priest and those with him arrived, they called together the council [to sunedrion] and the whole body of the elders of Israel, and sent to the prison to have them brought.

A somewhat similar picture emerges in Acts 22–23. In this case, the apostle Paul is brought before the council:

[22:30] But on the morrow, desiring to know the real reason why the Jews accused him, he unbound him, and commanded the chief priests and all the council [to sunedrion] to meet, and he brought Paul down and set him before them. And Paul, looking intently at the council [tō sunedriō], said... [23:6] But when Paul perceived that one part were Sadducees and the other Pharisees, he cried out in the council [en tō sunedriō]... [23:12] When it was day, the Jews made a plot and bound themselves by an oath neither to eat nor drink till they had killed Paul. There were more than forty who made this conspiracy. And they went to the chief priests and elders, and said, "We have strictly bound ourselves by an oath to taste no food till we have killed Paul. You therefore, along with the council [sun tō sunedriō], give notice now to the tribune to bring him down to you..."

Despite the diverse traditions, the New Testament presents a remarkably consistent picture of the Sanhedrin. The gospels all seem to be post-70, even if many of the traditions are earlier. As for Acts, its authorship is almost universally assigned to Luke who is writing probably toward the end of the first century CE. We do not know what his sources of information were, but his picture broadly fits with the other sources surveyed. In spite of the fact that the temple was now in ruins and the high priest probably now had little or no power within the country, the New Testament writings seem to know of a body headed by the high priest that had some judicial function within Judah at the time.

It is important to take note of this consistency, at least in the broad outlines, of the sources considered so far. Some of the passages have only mentioned information in passing, and several different terms have been used. In spite of this, source after source makes reference to some sort of council led by or associated with or existing alongside the high priest that makes decisions and seems to have some sort of administrative function in Judah. These data cannot be simply dismissed.

We now to come to considering the final source—a source with which some treatments begin—the Mishnah. The Mishnaic tractate Sanhedrin gives a description that clearly presupposes a "large Sanhedrin" of 71 members which met in the Chamber of Hewn Stone, and local institutions of 23 members each. There were also allegedly other courts in Jerusalem, though their precise relationship to one another is not completely clear. On the surface, it might seem plausible to accept the picture, but there are reasons to be cautious.<sup>38</sup> One of the main reasons is that the Mishnah was written well after the Second Temple period and clearly presupposes the destruction of the temple in 70 CE; the compilation of the Mishnah is commonly accepted to have been completed about 200 CE.<sup>39</sup> It also talks about the place of the king in legal judgment, which suggests not a reality but a theoretical position. Although some of the Mishnah traditions are much earlier than the final form of the Mishnah, the situation is complicated. J. Neusner argues that the contents of tractate Sanhedrin began to develop in the Ushan period.<sup>40</sup>

The question is, then, whether rabbinic literature describes anything other than the fertile imagination of later rabbinic figures who present an idealized picture rather than the historical reality. That this is an idealized picture is indicated by the following quotation from m. Sanh. 11:4:

He was not condemned to death either by the court that was in his own city or by the court that was in Jabneh, but he was brought up to the Great Court that was in Jerusalem.<sup>41</sup>

The reference to the “court in Jabneh” alludes to the post-70 situation when the center of Judaism had shifted from Jerusalem to Yavneh, a town near the coast.<sup>42</sup> Furthermore, all the descriptions of the Sanhedrin seem to be theoretical. As J. Efron notes,

---

<sup>38</sup> The intensive study of rabbinic literature in recent years, including the question of its value for historical and sociological data, cannot be dealt with here. I have tried to summarize some of the issues and give some of the main bibliography in Judaism from Cyrus to Hadrian (13–16) and Judaic Religion in the Second Temple Period (116–117). The work of Jacob Neusner is, of course, central to the new perspectives. What it means is that older secondary studies are generally quite unreliable in their use of rabbinic sources for historical purposes.

<sup>39</sup> E.g., Jacob Neusner, Introduction to Rabbinic Literature, Anchor Bible Reference Library (New York: Doubleday, 1994), 97.

<sup>40</sup> Jacob Neusner, Judaism: The Evidence of the Mishnah (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1981), 62, 95–97, 143–150.

<sup>41</sup> The translation is from Herbert Danby, ed. The Mishnah, translated from the Hebrew with Introduction and Brief Explanatory Notes (Oxford: Clarendon, 1933). See also Jacob Neusner, The Mishnah: A New Translation (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1988).

<sup>42</sup> See especially Jacob Neusner, “The Formation of Rabbinic Judaism: Yavneh (Jamnia) from AD 70 to 100,” ANRW II 19.2 (1979), 3–42; also Grabbe, Judaic Religion of the Second Temple Period, 116–126.

Throughout all those generations, from the Zugot (“Pairs”) to the end of the Second Temple, there is not one mention of a specific act of the Great Sanhedrin meeting in the Chamber of Hewn Stones. Its actual appearance is not interwoven in the variegated memories stored in the Eretz Israel talmudic tradition. . . Its existence is not recognized or implied in the duties or activities of the Pharisee leaders, in the conduct or dicta of Rabban Gamaliel, the elder, and his son, nor in the company of Rabban Yoh*anan b. Zakkai and his disciples. Such a total void cannot be filled by contrived excuses, nor can its significance be ignored.<sup>43</sup>

The Sanhedrin of rabbinic literature appears to be an idealized creation of the rabbis. There may be some genuine memories of Second Temple times, but as a whole it does not fit the society of Judea or Judaism before 70. The rabbinic picture should thus be omitted from the reconstruction of the historical body.

Summary

Because of the nature of the sources and the apparent difficulty in reconciling them, some recent studies have proposed several different Sanhedrins, while one major study has rejected the existence of such a body. A chronological study of the sources, however, yields a fairly consistent picture in outline (not necessarily in the details) up to the first century CE. When we come to rabbinic sources, beginning with the Mishnah about 200 CE, though, the picture changes. Because of this and because of the nature of rabbinic literature, we should accept that such late sources cannot be used to reconstruct the institution.

What our earlier sources show is a body, whether formal or informal, headed by the high priest that advises the latter and assists in making decisions for the wider community. This body is attested for the third century, second century, and first centuries BCE (Josephus, books of Maccabees, Judith) and the first century CE (Josephus, NT). There are also hints that it might be earlier, even as early as the fifth century BCE (Elephantine papyri; Hecateus of Abdera). The exact relationship between the power of the high priest and that of the Sanhedrin is not always clear, though one would expect it to have varied for an institution that operated through a number of centuries. Sometimes the high priest is pictured as acting alone, in which case the Sanhedrin would have had no more than an advisory role; at other times, it seems to have made collective decisions, though whether this would ever go against a firmly held opinion of the high priest is not known. For example, Herod is called to answer a charge before (and in essence to be tried by) the Sanhedrin, but according to one account the high priest cleared him out of fear of Herod's power.

---

<sup>43</sup> Joshua Efron, “The Great Sanhedrin in Vision and Reality”, in idem, Studies on the Hasmonean Period, SJLA 31 (Leiden: Brill, 1987), 287–339, at 298–299.

Herod took away most of the power and authority of the high priest and the Sanhedrin, but with the return of Judah to Roman rule in 6 CE the place of the high priest and apparently also the Sanhedrin became important once again. They represented the Jewish community to the Roman authorities. The references to the Sanhedrin in the New Testament seem to reflect the situation in which the high priest and Sanhedrin had a certain power to make decisions, even if the specific situations described might be of doubtful historicity (the New Testament passages being probably written after 70 CE). With the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, the power of the high priest quickly evaporated and the Sanhedrin as a body ceased to exist. With the rise of rabbinic Judaism, a symbolic but fictional body was created as an expression of the new form of Judaic religion.

3. Conclusions

The synagogue and the Sanhedrin were both religious institutions associated with pre-70 Judaism, but they were quite different from each other in nature, function, and operation. What our investigation also showed was that many popular views about them—still to be found in literature about early Christianity—have no historical basis or at least are problematic. It is important to keep the context of Judaism always in mind. Many argue that “Judaism,” meaning or including Jewish religion, began in the post-exilic period (i.e., the Persian period, ca. 539–331 BCE). If we accept this assumption for convenience, the core of Judaic religion was originally the temple and the sacrificial cult, operated by the priesthood with the high priest acting as the overall leader. Furthermore, this high priest was also the accepted leader of the Jewish community from at least the time of Alexander, if not before, and the representative of the Jews to the Greek rulers.

This means that neither the synagogue nor the Sanhedrin was a central institution until the late Second Temple period at least. The synagogue first arose in the diaspora, evidently in the third century BCE, as a means of community worship for those who were far removed from the temple. It apparently did not spread to Palestine itself until probably the first century BCE at the earliest and may not have become an important institution until this time or perhaps even until after the fall of the temple in 70 CE. In the light of what we know, the references to synagogues in the gospels and Acts seem to be possible in general outline, though the details may be anachronistic in some cases (e.g., Luke 4).

The Sanhedrin may have its roots in the Persian period. Its function seems to have been basically an advisory body to the high priest, though its place and power would—not surprisingly—have varied over the space of the several centuries that it existed. Although headed by the high priest, it does appear to have made collective decisions in a number of episodes reported in the books of Maccabees, Josephus, and the New Testament. The institution ceased with the destruction of the temple, and the Tractate Sanhedrin in the Mishnah seems to describe a hypothetical body with few of the details going back to the pre-70 institution.

ECHOES FROM THE WILDERNESS: THE HISTORICAL JOHN THE BAPTIST*

KNUT BACKHAUS

The prime mover of the Jesus movement was the baptizer John. Jesus himself ascribed the initiative in the drama to him and contemporary observers shared this view.<sup>1</sup> Thus, the Baptist is, in the strict sense of the word, ἀρχὴ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου. The cultural memory of the early Christians is surprisingly convergent at this point: Q, the synoptics, and the Fourth Gospel place the Baptist at the narrative pole position; Acts raises John's baptism to the state of an official starting point of the apostolic era (1:22, cf. 10:37), and in Christian self-understanding John becomes a principal character on all the stages between birth (Luke 1; Prot. Jas. 22–24) and death (Mark 6:17–29), pre-existence (Pistis Sophia 1:7) and descent (Gos. Nic. 18:2) of Christ.

Looking for the historical John the Baptist, therefore, we engage in the archaeology of Christianity. Archaeological facts lie on firm ground and many a Jesus researcher hears the spade crunching when it strikes historical stone. But however hard archaeological facts may be, without documentary evidence they are less than clear-cut. The documentary evidence we have on John the Baptist is to a great extent part of the Christian drama script. In order to understand the first layer we have to set aside this drama without giving up those fragmentary structures that may guide our excavation.

Archaeology does not uncover characters, but problematic finds. Starting from an outline of modes and methods of Baptist research I shall inspect the site with its most intriguing problems, trying to trace who he was that moved on the first layer.

---

* I would like to thank two colleagues with whom I am privileged to share my exegetical work in Munich: Professor A. J. M. Wedderburn has indefatigably corrected my English and Professor G. Häfner has given useful comments on the draft. Twenty years ago I was introduced into Baptist research by Professor Josef Ernst, Paderborn. I warmly dedicate this article to him on occasion of his 80th birthday.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Q 7:31–35; 16:16; Mark 6:14–16; 11:27–33.

1. Baptist Research: Modes and Methods

1.1. A Short History of Research

What Reimarus says on the relationship between the “cousins” John and Jesus may be applied to the respective fields of research: Consanguineous as they were, they knew and supported each other, they began just at the same time and showed the same language and purpose.<sup>2</sup> As a matter of fact, Baptist research often served as a forerunner of the Jesus quest and prepared its tortuous paths.<sup>3</sup>

In the very beginning of Leben-Jesu-Forschung, H. S. Reimarus (1694–1768) considered John the proton pseudos of Christianity for it was in seditious machinations that he prepared the public way for the Messiah Jesus, who, in due return, introduced him as (his!) prophet to the people. The early novel-like Lives of Jesus (C. F. Bahrdt, K. H. Venturini)—books so weirdly undead because their reanimated corpses reappear again and again in the guise of bestsellers—saw John under the influence and instruction of the mysterious order of the Essenes, which explained whatever had appeared unexplainable before. David Friedrich Strauß’s (1808–1874) recourse to the category of myth was an important step forward in historical insight. Excluding the Fourth Gospel from his reconstruction and making use of Josephus’s account, he saw John in his own right, not coloured in “mythical light.” As far as Jesus’ relationship to John is concerned, Strauß laid the foundation of what still dominates exegetical minds: Jesus was baptized by John, lived perhaps as his disciple in his narrower circle for some time, and did not stop appreciating his mentor when he had found his own way. More than researchers today, Strauß was prepared to deny the historical character of the critical spot in the relations between John and Jesus, i.e. the Baptist's delegated inquiry from prison, which he preferred to interpret as a Christian fiction securing that the Baptist would not leave this world without having given at least a token of his nascent acknowledgment of Jesus' messianic status.<sup>4</sup> The liberal and philanthropic Life-of-Jesus research discovered a Baptist who was not too philanthropic and liberal, but formed the austere background against which Jesus' liberalism and philanthropy would shine the lighter and brighter.<sup>5</sup> If Jesus was the friendly figurehead of Cultural Protestantism, John was in some way its Jewish shadow man. With Wilhelm Bousset (1892) this dualistic view attained higher honours in the history-of-religions school.<sup>6</sup> Biblical scholarship has never really abandoned this typological contrast, even when its roots in christology were overgrown with the seed of a more critical phase.

---

<sup>2</sup> Hermann Samuel Reimarus, “Von dem Zwecke Jesu und seiner Jünger: Noch ein Fragment des Wolfenbüttelschen Ungenannten (1778),” in G. E. Lessing, Werke, vol. 2, ed. H. Göbel (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1996), 492–604, at II §§ 3–4; cf. I § 16–17.

<sup>3</sup> Surveys on the history of Baptist research are given in John Reumann, “The Quest for the Historical Baptist,” in Understanding the Sacred Text: Festschrift M. S. Enslin, ed. J. Reumann (Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1972), 181–199; Stephanie von Dobbeler, Das Gericht und das Erbarmen Gottes: Die Botschaft Johannes des Täufers und ihre Rezeption bei den Johannesjüngern im Rahmen der Theologiegeschichte des Frühjudentums, BBB 70 (Frankfurt-am-Main: Athenäum, 1988), 16–31; Robert L. Webb, “John the Baptist and His Relationship to Jesus,” in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTTs 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 179–229, at 179–185; Gary Yamasaki, John the Baptist in Life and Death: Audience-Oriented Criticism of Matthew’s Narrative, JSNTSup 167 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998), 12–32, but also Albert Schweitzer, Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung, 9th ed. ([1906/1913] Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1984), is still helpful.

A reason for this may be that this critical phase did not strike Baptist research in the same measure as its "cousin branch." It was ushered in with Albert Schweitzer's study on the "Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung" in 1906, and it is here that the paths of Jesus and Baptist research diverge for a while. Schweitzer's study, to be sure, did not finish off the Jesus quest (Schweitzer himself developed a historical theory, according to which John and Jesus attributed to one another the role of the eschatological Elijah);<sup>7</sup> it did not even do away with Jesus monographs (after all Bultmann himself wrote one), but it marked the end of any serious attempt, or theological desire, to draw the historical Jesus into our times. There had certainly never been any interest to draw the historical John into our times, and that is why Baptist research maintained its continuity whereas the "Jesus quest"

---

<sup>4</sup> Cf. David Friedrich Strauß, Das Leben Jesu, kritisch betrachtet, 2 vols. (1835/36; Tübingen: C. F. Osiander, 4th ed., 1840), 1:339–398.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. e.g. (with different accents) Daniel Schenkel, Das Charakterbild Jesu: Ein biblischer Versuch (1864, Wiesbaden: C. W. Kreidel, 3rd ed. n.d.), 29–36; Karl Hase, Geschichte Jesu: Nach akademischen Vorlesungen (Leipzig: Breitkopf & Härtel, 1876), 294–315; Leopold von Ranke, Weltgeschichte, vol. 3 (1863; München: Duncker & Humblot, 4th ed. 1921), 86–87.

<sup>6</sup> Cf. Wilhelm Bousset, Jesu Predigt in ihrem Gegensatz zum Judentum: Ein religionswissenschaftlicher Vergleich (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1892), esp. 48–56.

<sup>7</sup> Schweitzer, Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung, 32–36, 402–450, 605–609.

seemed to have been interrupted until Käsemann's famous address in 1953 was to introduce the "New Quest."

Meanwhile, studies on John prepared the methodological ways for subsequent Jesus research: Martin Dibelius, one of the forerunners of form criticism, based his pioneer monograph (1911) on the fragmentarised logia tradition.<sup>8</sup> The "master and disciple"-model, which until today dominates "Lives of Jesus," was elaborated by Maurice Goguel (1928).<sup>9</sup> An early variant of John as "prophet of eschatological restoration" was put forward by Ernst Lohmeyer (1932).<sup>10</sup> The focus shifted to history-of-religions issues not later than in the early 1950's: in particular, Qumran research tested its applicability to the New Testament with the case of John.<sup>11</sup> Especially Jewish scholars anticipated the reintegration of John into first-century Judaism. The protagonists of redaction criticism (e.g. W. Marxsen, W. Trilling, H. Conzelmann) centred their interest on gospel material concerning the Baptist, and it was Walter Wink (1968) who presented the first monograph on John that was on the whole indebted to this new method.<sup>12</sup>

The "Third Quest"—a term even less suitable for the in some way "questless" Baptist inquiry than for the different ways of recent Jesus research—sees John once again overtaken by his gifted disciple.<sup>13</sup> John

<sup>8</sup> Martin Dibelius, Die urchristliche Überlieferung von Johannes dem Täufer, FRLANT 15 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1911).

<sup>9</sup> Maurice Goguel, Au seuil de l'Évangile: Jean-Baptiste (Paris: Payot, 1928).

<sup>10</sup> Ernst Lohmeyer, Das Urchristentum, 1: Johannes der Täufer (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1932).

<sup>11</sup> A first thorough analysis of the Qumran milieu as background of John's activity was contributed by William H. Brownlee, "John the Baptist in the New Light of Ancient Scrolls," in The Scrolls and the New Testament, ed. K. Stendahl (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1957), 33–53. A comprehensive study of John within the Syro-Palestinian Baptist movement was presented by Joseph Thomas, Le mouvement baptiste en Palestine et Syrie (150 av. J.-C.-300 ap. J.-C.) (Gembloux: J. Duculot, 1935). Charles H. H. Scobie, John the Baptist (London: SCM, 1964), esp. 33–40, 163–177, accentuated the Samaritan and broader Baptist background.

<sup>12</sup> Walter Wink, John the Baptist in the Gospel Tradition, SNTSMS 7 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1968).

<sup>13</sup> In Californian air even John, "in light of the secondary character of apocalyptic imagination," sets out (in Q) to the marginal paths of Jewish cynicism, forgetting both his eschatological message and his purifying rite to smile at us in "a wisdom way of viewing the world" (62), cf. Ron Cameron, "What Have You Come out to See?: Characterizations of John and Jesus in the Gospels," Semeia 49 (1990): 35–69. The "Jesus Seminar" in general takes a more sophisticated view: that John spoke the words in Luke 3:16b, for instance, is "pink," Luke 3:16a.c, however, are only "grey," whereas 3:17 is "pink" again; that John "taught repentance apart from baptism" is even "black";

is less often understood as lonesome antithesis to Jesus. Instead, he shares his interest in restoring Israel now and follows him into their common cultural and social environment. I regard this approach as promising, though there are good reasons for loosening as far as our sources allow the ties that bind Baptist research to Jesus research. Thus, the state of art suggests a methodologically reflected reconsideration of the historical John that takes advantage of both the closer grasp of critical source evaluation and the broader view on late Second Temple Judaism.<sup>14</sup>

1.2. Sources

The material on John the Baptist is limited in volume, but broad in the range of relevant texts and text types. We have sayings of John or concerning John and/or narratives in Q,<sup>15</sup> all the synoptics with Acts,<sup>16</sup> the Fourth Gospel,<sup>17</sup> a surprisingly wide spectrum of early Apocrypha,<sup>18</sup>

---

see the report by W. Barnes Tatum, John the Baptist and Jesus: A Report of the Jesus Seminar (Sonoma, CA: Polebridge Press, 1994).

<sup>14</sup> Representative of the mainstream of current research are the balanced works by Josef Ernst, Johannes der Täufer: Interpretation—Geschichte—Wirkungsgeschichte, BZNW 53 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1989), with emphasis on redaction criticism, and Robert L. Webb, John the Baptizer and Prophet: A Socio-Historical Study, JSNTSup 62 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1991), focusing on the socio-historical horizon, as well as the multivolume Jesus monograph by John P. Meier, which seems to be the late crowning of the methodological circumspection that was one of the inspiring factors of the “New Quest”-period: A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 1: The Roots of the Problem and the Person ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1991); 2: Mentor, Message, and Miracles, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1994). Other approaches tend to stress John’s role as purifier and to qualify the conventional notion of the “eschatological prophet”: Joan E. Taylor, The Immerser: John the Baptist within Second Temple Judaism (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1997); Bruce Chilton, “John the Baptist: His Immersion and His Death,” in Dimensions of Baptism: Biblical and Theological Studies, ed. S. E. Porter and A. R. Cross, JSNTSup 234 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002), 25–44.

<sup>15</sup> Q 3:7–9, 16–17; 7:18–23, 24–28, (29–30), 31–35; 16:16 (I follow the mode of reference in the IQP edition).

<sup>16</sup> Mark 1:2–6 / Matt 3:1–6 / Luke 3:1–6; Mark 1:7–8 / Matt 3:11–12 / Luke 3:15–18; Mark 1:9–11 / Matt 3:13–17 / Luke 3:21–22; Mark 1:14 / Matt 4:12; Mark 2:18–22 / Matt 9:14–17 / Luke 5:33–39; Mark 6:14–16 / Matt 14:1–2 / Luke 9:7–9; Mark 6:17–29 / Matt 14:3–12 (cf. Luke 3:19–20); Mark 8:27–29 / Matt 16:13–16 / Luke 9:18–20; Mark 9:11–13 / Matt 17:10–13; Mark 11:27–33 / Matt 21:23–27 / Luke 20:1–8; Matt (3:14–15); (11:14–15); (21:28–32); Luke 1:5–25, 36, 39–56, 7–80; 3:10–14; (7:29–30); 11:1; Acts 1:5; 1:21–22; 10:37; 11:16; 13:24–25; 18:24–28; 19:1–7.

<sup>17</sup> 1:6–8, 15, 19–28, 29–34, 35–51; (2:1–11); 3:22–4:3; 5:33–36; 10:40–42.

<sup>18</sup> Gos. Naz. 2 (Jerome, Pelag. 3.2); Gos. Eb. 1 (Epiphanius, Pan. 30.13.6), 2 (Pan. 30.13.4–5), 3 (Pan. 30.13.7–8); Gos. Heb. 2 (Jerome, Comm. Isa. 4 in Isa 11:2); and at least some traditions in ancient Christian literature that may be traced back to the first century;<sup>19</sup> indirectly even Paul's Corinthian correspondence may (by way of Apollos) be connected to the Baptist movement.<sup>20</sup> What is more, we have, in Josephus's Antiquities (Ant. 18.116–119; cf. Origen, C. Cels. 1.47; Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 1.11.1–6), an authentic account for which Jesus researchers may envy us.<sup>21</sup> The origins of the Mandaean religion probably go back to the Syro-Palestinian Baptist milieu of the New Testament era, but after the "Mandaean fever" has receded in (German) scholarship, there is little enthusiasm for exploiting the comprehensive literature on John from "his own religion" with an historical intention.<sup>22</sup>

While this overview may seem encouraging at first sight, optimism is somewhat dampened when we take into account the selective character, the vested interests, and the suspicious bearers of this tradition. Forty years are regarded as a crucial threshold after which the communicative memory of the immediate witnesses of the recent past gradually fades away so that cultural memory-work may be perceived as a challenge and need.<sup>23</sup> Mark, in fact, wrote about 70 CE the first bios in order to document and interpret the fading memory of Jesus, but comparable documentary work has not been done in (postulated) Baptist circles, or, at least, the documents have never reached us. There has been, of course, an almost inflationary coinage of hypotheses con-

---

Gos. Thom. 46, 78, 104; cf. 52; Prot. Jas. 8.2–3; 10; 12; 22–24; cf. Genna of Mary (Pan. 26.12:1–4); P. Cair. 10735 verso (ed. W. Schneemelcher; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 5th ed. 1987). An infancy narrative collecting the legendary motifs so far was written in Garshuni probably towards the end of the fourth century and is ascribed to the Bishop Serapion of Thumis: Vita et miracula Ioannis Baptistae, ed. A. Mingana: "A New Life of John the Baptist," BJRL 11 (1927): 438–489.

<sup>19</sup> Justin, Dial. 49; 88; Ps.-Clem. Recog. 1.53.5–1.54.9; 1.60.1–4; Hom. 2.17 // Recog. 3.61; Hom. 2.23–24 // Recog. 2.8; Hom. 3.22.

<sup>20</sup> 1 Cor 1:12; 3:4–6, 21–22; 4:6; 16:12; cf. Acts 18:24–28; Titus 3:13.

<sup>21</sup> The authenticity of our passage is secured by Goguel, Au seuil de l'Évangile, 17–19; Webb, John the Baptizer, 39–41; Meier, Marginal Jew II, 19; for discussion, see Edmondo Lupieri, Giovanni Battista fra storia e leggenda, BCR 53 (Brescia: Paideia, 1988), 119–131; Ernst, Johannes der Täufer, 253–257; Webb, John the Baptizer, 31–39, 165–168; Meier, Marginal Jew II, 56–62. The Old Slavonic version of Josephus's Jewish War presenting John as a pre-cultural ascetic liberation preacher, which once impressed Robert Eisler, has lost its credibility as historical source; see Goguel, Au seuil de l'Évangile, 20–33; Ernst, Johannes der Täufer, 258–63; Webb, John the Baptizer, 43–44.

<sup>22</sup> For a survey, see Lupieri, Giovanni Battista, 193–395; Ernst, Johannes der Täufer, 372–383.

<sup>23</sup> Jan Assmann, Das kulturelle Gedächtnis: Schrift, Erinnerung und politische Identität in frühen Hochkulturen 1992; (München: Beck, 4th ed., 2002), 11, 50–51.

cerning original Baptist sources, traditions, and Christian (mirror-read) reactions,<sup>24</sup> but their purchasing power is low. Provided that the first Christian generation was to a considerable extent a continuation of the Baptist movement and rooted deeply in its milieu, there was from the very beginning a genuine interest in forming its own Baptist story. Even if we allow it to be plausible that the early Christians would have integrated sources from another group, which is often considered an antagonistic sect in notorious competition with Christians, it is methodologically inadmissible to draw any conclusion from the material in its present form as far as its historical provenance is concerned.<sup>25</sup> Thus, what has survived may be compared to the Baptist on the Isenheim altarpiece: He is standing under a cross he never saw, in Christian company he never met, with a lamb he never spoke of, and what the Christian painter is mostly interested in is his oversized finger pointing to Christ whereas his figure clothed in exotic garments steps back into the shadows of history. The dilemma is inescapable: As we try to form our judgement on John independently of early Christian interpretation, we are almost totally dependent on Christian tradition, save for Josephus, whose account, partial in itself, does not suffice for a critical control.

So if we are tempted to feel like one who is expected to recover the historical Jesus by exploring the Koran,<sup>26</sup> there is one circumstance that may reassure us: Not all the hazards and tendentiousness of the Jesus quest will vex Baptist research. While the early Christians could not deal with Jesus apart from christological premises, in the case of John they could and sometimes did. There are certainly massive christological premises as well as pragmatic tendencies in the early Christian material on John, but some texts—incidentally, even in the Fourth Gospel in spite of its endeavour to Christianize John<sup>27</sup>—are not associated with Jesus at all and may imply unbroken continuity with what

---

<sup>24</sup> E.g. Mark 6:17–29; Luke 1, esp. 1:46–55, 68–79; John 1:1–18; Sib. Or. 4.159–170; Matt 11:2–6 / Luke 7:18–23; Mark 2:18–22 parr.; Acts 19:1–7.

<sup>25</sup> For methodological criticism, see Wink, John the Baptist, 107–113; Knut Backhaus, Die "Jüngerkreise" des Täufers Johannes: Eine Studie zu den religionsgeschichtlichen Ursprüngen des Christentums, Paderborner Theologische Studien 19 (Paderborn: Schöningh, 1991), 11–19.

<sup>26</sup> Cf. Reumann, "Quest," 187.

<sup>27</sup> The Baptist tradition of the Fourth Gospel is certainly theologically (and polemically) styled, but it also shows peculiarly concrete and archaic-looking traces of what might be the social remembrance of the Johannine community competing with a community of Baptist adherents (John 1:35–51; 3:22–30; 4:1–3; 10:40–41).

once had been the eve of the Jesus movement. Sometimes they offer comparatively favourable conditions for applying the “criterion of dissimilarity” (against the background of early Christian tradition). It is the embarrassment of the Baptist memory within Christian contexts that may guide our way through the problematic material.

Before discussing the methods, however, a caution may be in place: The state of sources justifies Reumann’s scepticism, when he insists that “in the case of the Baptist we have only an echo (or echoes) of his whisper.”<sup>28</sup> Wherever John sings louder than Jesus in Godspell,<sup>29</sup> where scholars claim to know the religious profile of John, the history of his sect, the Baptist period in Jesus’ life (sometimes the only period in this non-biography taken at face value) so that they even share the vision he saw when he departed from his mentor (Luke 10:18), it may be the visions of the scholars themselves that fill out the gaps in so fragmentary a lore. Instead, Baptist research is an exercise in hearing the grass grow in the wilderness. The conceptual configuration “Historical Baptist” is not a man of flesh and blood and will never be: it is a knot of problems, a few of which perhaps may be solved.

1.3. Methods

There are, on the whole, two Johns pictured in the New Testament: one who stands by himself and one who stands beside Jesus. It is with relief that we notice that the two do not resemble each other.<sup>30</sup> It may easily be understood that the second one is part of early Christian self-definition; but it should not escape our notice that the first one has survived in a Christian interpretative framework from a pre-Christian era. As a general rule we may state: the closer a Baptist text is connected with Jesus tradition, the more probable is its having undergone an interpretatio Christiana et christologica; on the other hand, the more a Baptist tradition is devoid of christological tendencies, the

---

<sup>28</sup> Reumann, “Quest,” 187.

<sup>29</sup> See the grudging irony in Chilton, “John the Baptist,” 26–27, whose own reconstruction (26–39), to be sure, turns out to be sharper in tone than in argument since it is some general comparisons and speculation, guided by an altogether simplistic dichotomy between Josephus the historian and the synoptics as a “catechetical instrument” (cf. 43), that replaces the piecemeal source-oriented criticism so characteristic of Webb.

<sup>30</sup> Cf. Strauß, Leben Jesu, 398; Ernst Bammel, “The Baptist in Early Christian Tradition,” NTS 18 (1971/72): 95–128, at 95–96.

stronger is its historical reliability. In this regard both the prudendum character of the Baptist tradition and the social, religious and biographical continuity of the tradition bearers to John's movement encourage us to be optimistic.

We may profit and take our starting point from the ongoing discussion on the criteria in Jesus research<sup>31</sup> and adjust our tools to the special features of traditions concerning John. The following markers of historical reliability control our reconstruction of the historical Baptist:

- the criterion of cross-section: a tradition or motif (however worded) is attested in a multiplicity of texts and/or text types that are independent from each other (e.g. the motif “John was a popular baptizer”)
- the criterion of counter-tendency: a tradition or motif does not conform to, or even conflicts with, dominant early Christian tradition interests (e.g. the motif “John baptized Jesus”)<sup>32</sup>
- the criterion of contextual plausibility: a tradition or motif both contextualizes John in late Second Temple Judaism and explains his

---

<sup>31</sup> For comprehensive discussion, see Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter, Die Kriterienfrage in der Jesusforschung: Vom Differenzkriterium zum Plausibilitätskriterium, NTOA 34 (Freiburg [CH] and Göttingen: Universitätsverlag and Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997), esp. 175–194, 206–217; a précis is given in Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, Der historische Jesus: Ein Lehrbuch 1996; (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1996; 3rd ed. 2001), 116–120. For a critical summary of the usual criteria, see also Meier, Marginal Jew I, 167–195. For the further development of the separate debate on (literacy-orientated) criteria onwards to a theory of cultural memory, see Jens Schröter, Erinnerung an Jesu Worte: Studien zur Rezeption der Logienüberlieferung in Markus, Q und Thomas, WMANT 76 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1997), esp. 459–486; idem, Jesus und die Anfänge der Christologie: Methodologische und exegetische Studien zu den Ursprüngen des christlichen Glaubens, Biblisch-Theologische Studien 47 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 2001), 6–61, and in general the helpful volume by Jens Schröter and Ralph Brucker, eds., Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, BZNW 114 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002).

<sup>32</sup> I feel no difficulty in regarding this criterion as parallel to the criterion of dissimilarity and embarrassment, if correctly handled, not as a determinative or self-sufficient factor, but as an introductory and minimum description of counter-tendency to be complemented by factors of contextuality. I have argued elsewhere that in Jesus research the Baptist movement may allow a control of the criteria of dissimilarity and “rejection and execution” (Meier, Marginal Jew I, 177), since it locates Jesus in the most “similar” Jewish context he had (Backhaus, Jüngerkreise, 47–52). In this sense, the Baptist tradition offers an excellent basis for Jesus research (both in dissimilarity and contextuality), just as Jesus traditions make a poor basis for Baptist research.

individual (not “unique”!) impact on that context, including the possibility conditions of his reception into the conceptual framework of the Jesus movement (e.g. his eschatological preaching of judgment).

These criteria should—allowing for oral history trajectories<sup>33</sup>—be applied in the earliest reachable stage of tradition-history, they should be used complementarily, and they should guide us (within the bounds of what is historically possible) to a coherent comprehension of the Baptist and his milieu. We will start from the relatively securable data and then grope our way forward into more densely tangled thickets.

2. The Baptist John

2.1. Impact

The surest information we have about John is that he set a movement in motion. His attraction is attested in the broadest scope imaginable, it is related to both his baptism and his death, and it does not belong to the stuff christological imagination would create.

The synoptics report that John’s preaching of baptism drew large crowds from Judea and Jerusalem to the Jordan (Mark 1:5/Matt 3:5; cf. Matt 3:7/Luke 3:7; Matt 21:32; Luke 3:10; 7:29–30)—an impression the Fourth Gospel is concerned to modify (cf. John 3:23, 26–27, 30; 4:1–3; 5:35–36; 10:40–42). Although there is certainly some narrative dramatization as well as restoration eschatology in their accounts, the range of John’s impact must not be underestimated. Luke even mentions that interest “concerning John” grew among the people, “whether perhaps he were the Christ” (Luke 3:15; cf. Acts 13:24–25).<sup>34</sup> Granted, the redactor aims at the “answer” the narrated John gives (3:16) in order to fill up the gap between John's expectation and the church's messianic proclamation. Nevertheless, advanced expectations, in whatever form, are quite conceivable in the Baptist's environment, and we observe that they are not ascribed to sectarian circles of disciples but to broad sections of the population. Jesus in his controversy with the Jerusalem authorities refers—apparently in retrospect—to the Baptist or, strictly speaking, to John's baptism to substantiate his own heavenly ἐξουσία (Mark 11:27–33).<sup>35</sup> The counter-question he raises presupposes that John's rite was of heavenly origin. The authorities, champions of the central cult, are at a loss for an answer because of this marginal immerser's enduring fame. He still is, as the narrator (not without one of his hyperboles) states, a popular prophet in the strictest sense: “they were afraid of the people, for all held that John was a real prophet.” Twenty-five years or so after the Baptist had died there were still contemporaries in the Jewish-Christian milieu of Asia whose religious profile was marked by John's baptism (cf. Acts 18:24–28; 19:1–7);<sup>36</sup> via Apollos baptismal concepts of this kind may have even influenced the controversies in the Corinthian community (cf. 1 Cor 1:10–17).

---

<sup>33</sup> For a critical reappraisal of oral history in Jesus research, see Samuel Byrskog, Story as history—History as Story: The Gospel Tradition in the Context of Ancient Oral History, WUNT 123 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000). It is in fact quite obvious that a figure as popular as John had his sustained remembrance (non-fictional, but, of course, conditioned by the needs and circumstances of those who remembered) beyond Christian literacy (cf. e.g. Ant. 18.116, 119; Acts 19:1–7) and that this remembrance may in any stage have influenced, for instance, the narratives of John’s death or details of the infancy story. The methodological crux, however, is the lack of any possibility of counterchecking.

<sup>34</sup> As a rule, I translate with RSV or with IQP.

John's death obviously sparked widespread discussions. In the inclusio of his Baptist account Josephus, some 65 years later, refers to opinions among the Jewish population which assigned the defeat Herod Antipas suffered in his border war against the Nabatean king Aretas IV in about 36 CE to the fact that God had taken vengeance

---

<sup>35</sup> The arguments in favour of the historical authenticity of the kernel of this passage (Mark 11:28–30) are counter-tendency (the authority of Jesus is connected with the baptism of John: it is hard to imagine that this motif was created in an atmosphere of high christology or developing baptism theology) and contextual plausibility (Jesus proves to be embedded in the Baptist milieu, and this is coherent with his positive judgement on this movement in general); for more detailed argumentation, see Backhaus, Jüngerkreise, 83–89.

<sup>36</sup> For historical analysis and interpretation, see Backhaus, Jüngerkreise, 190–229; Friedrich Avemarie, Die Taufenzählungen der Apostelgeschichte: Theologie und Geschichte, WUNT 139 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2002), 68–81, 413–440. It is disputed whether τὸ βάπτισμα Ἰωάννου (Acts 18:25) or τὸ Ἰωάννου βάπτισμα (19:3) relates to the historical context of the Baptist or to some baptism practised beyond this context. The unequivocal usage in Acts (1:5, 22; 10:37; 11:15–16; 13:24) as well as in early Christianity refers back to the immediate social and symbolic context of John as well as to his exclusive charism (Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, “Gerichtsverzögerung und Heilsverkündigung bei Johannes dem Täufer und Jesus,” in Gerd Theissen, Jesus als historische Gestalt: Beiträge zur Jesusforschung, FRLANT 202, ed. by A. Merz [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2003], 229–253, at 234–235), so I prefer the first solution (pace Avemarie, Taufenzählungen, 73–74).

now for the unjust execution of the influential Baptist John (Ant. 18.116–119). Herod, Josephus explains, had feared John’s “eloquence that had so great an effect on mankind” and might have led to “some form of sedition, for it looked as if they would be guided by John in everything that they did” (Ant. 18.118).<sup>37</sup> In his only passage whose central figure is not Jesus, Mark seems to present some folkloric legend—a sort of “bazaar rumour”<sup>38</sup>—on the Baptist’s death (Mark 6:17–29). There also circulated opinions (ἔλεγον) in public—again not in a distinct “sect”—on the wonder-worker Jesus as the resurrected John, which possibly even reached the tetrarch’s court (Mark 6:14–16; 8:28).<sup>39</sup>

To summarize, John was popular in public life and lonesome death. The main reason for this mobilizing effect was, according to all strands of sources—with the eloquent exception of the Fourth Gospel—the baptism so closely connected with his character and gaining him—as far as we know, only him—the surname βαπτιστής.

2.2. Baptism

Baptism contextualises John within the first-century purification milieu, illuminates his impact on the nascent church, and reveals his own unmistakable style.

It is not seldom emphasized that we should not allow the later Christian ritual to shape our conception of John’s baptism.<sup>40</sup> I wonder, however, where the risk of anachronism really lies. The early Christians did not transfer the Baptist’s rite after years without baptism into their own system. Rather, they continued it after a short period—perhaps only months—of interruption, in fact in close social, individual, and, as we may suppose, ritual continuity. The post-Easter situation with its

<sup>37</sup> δείσας Ἡηράδης τὸ ἐπὶ τοσόνδε πιθανὸν αὐτοῦ τοῖς ἀνθρώποις μὴ ἐπὶ στάσει τινὶ φέροι, πάντα γὰρ ἐφίκεσαν συμβουλή τῇ ἐκείνου πράζοντες... The translation is taken from the LCL-edition by L. H. Feldman.

<sup>38</sup> Wink, John the Baptist, 10–11 n. 3; for diachronic analysis, see Backhaus, Jüngerkreise, 162–171.

<sup>39</sup> Mark 8:28 seems to be an abridged version of 6:14–16, whose kernel—popular rumours—mirrors historical tradition: the confusion of John with Jesus in the public eye and the motif of Jesus as the resurrected John are hardly likely to have been invented, whereas the connection of the rumours with Antipas may perhaps be due to the redactor’s hand. For more detailed analysis of tradition and historicity, see Backhaus, Jüngerkreise, 89–95.

<sup>40</sup> Webb, John the Baptizer, 181; Colin Brown, “What Was John the Baptist Doing?,” BBR 7 (1997): 37–49, at 37–38.

intense expectations was, after all, not too different from the pre-judgment situation which the Baptist's preaching presupposed. The problem is not how the Christians introduced baptism, but why Jesus had interrupted it.<sup>41</sup> The conceptual framework of baptism, which was to develop into the Christian sacrament of initiation, certainly changed, but the ritual practice probably remained similar: The Christians' Spirit baptism was of meta-ritual quality. The Ephesian disciples apparently failed to see any difference between John's and Christian baptism at all (Acts 19:1–4), and in the case of Apollos (and, if we may draw conclusions from the silence of the sources, in the case of Jesus' first followers as well) John's baptism obviously was considered sufficient (18:24–28). Christian baptism was nothing else but John's baptism in light of the message, fate, and impact of Jesus. From this unity in origin we may, without risk of anachronism, conclude similarity in rite.

This preliminary reflection is supported by the hard data we are given.<sup>42</sup> First of all, the "baptism of John" and "John the Baptist" explain one another: What this specific ritual purification means is understandable only in view of John's particular character and message; on the other hand, what John stands for becomes clear only in light of the rite he "preached" (Mark 1:4: κηρύσσω βάπτισμα μετανοίας εἰς ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν; cf. Ant. 18.117). John, the only "Baptist" among so many purifiers, is the active part in this rite: Not only has he instituted it (by divine call, as he certainly claimed), he is also in some way its minister: the lustration is not self-administered, it is he who baptizes (cf. Q 3:16; Mark 1:5, 8–9)—in an actually not too humble analogy to the heavenly baptizer to come.<sup>43</sup>

<sup>41</sup> See Backhaus, Jüngerkreise, 332–334.

<sup>42</sup> For more comprehensive discussion of John's baptism, see Hartwig Thyen, Studien zur Sündenvergebung im Neuen Testament und seinen alttestamentlichen und jüdischen Voraussetzungen, FRLANT 96 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1970), 131–145; Gerhard Barth, Die Taufe in frühchristlicher Zeit, Biblisch-Theologische Studien 4 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1981), 23–36; Ernst, Johannes der Täufer, 320–340; George R. Beasley-Murray, Baptism in the New Testament (1962 repr. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1990), 31–44; Simon Légasse, Naissance du baptême, LD 153 (Paris: Cerf, 1993), 27–55; Meier, Marginal Jew II, 49–56; Webb, "John the Baptist," 187–197; Klaus Berger, Theologiegeschichte des Urchristentums: Theologie des Neuen Testaments (1994; Tübingen: Francke, 2nd ed., 1995), 117–123; Taylor, Immerser, 49–100, and especially Webb, John the Baptizer, 93–216.

<sup>43</sup> We have no evidence what such an active role of the Baptist may have looked like, but the early Christian practice is probably again an instructive analogy. The baptismal conception in general may be understood as a combination of self-immersion and aspersion (by Levitical priests), see Friedrich Avemarie, "Ist die Johannestaufe ein Ausdruck von Tempelkritik? Skizze eines methodischen Problems," in Gemeinde

So two elements are fused: a bath, which integrates John into the context of the Jewish purification milieu, and God's dealing with those who are bathed (and those who are not), which gives John's "preached rite" its peculiar shape in this context and foreshadows his reception in early Christianity. The symbol of a religious bath speaks for itself: John acted as a purifier and the first function of his rite was a cleansing one. The Torah provided manifold forms of lustrations to (re-)establish the different states of Levitical purity. The bath that removed the cultic impurity of proselytes developed, probably not sooner than in early Christian times, to a rite de passage of its own, thereby paralleling circumcision. In the Syro-Palestinian milieu, particularly in the Jordan area, between 200 BCE and 300 CE, this symbolic system was radicalized by (only fragmentarily documented) Jewish (or Jewish-Christian) groups,<sup>44</sup> among which the Qumran people are the best known. As is often mentioned, Bannus, the lustrating eremite, with whom Josephus claims to have spent three years as a disciple (Josephus, Life 11–12), may be the figure who can most readily be compared with John—if we had only enough evidence to compare.<sup>45</sup> At any rate, from the cultic periphery the purgative act moves into the centre, thereby, conceptually or effectually, relativizing or replacing the soteriological relevance of animal sacrifice. Those groups, ascetically withdrawn from urban milieus and entertaining dualistic ideas of holiness, practised a religious life that was alternative to the dominant styles of religion in the urban and temple milieus.

The remarkable innovation was that John's bath stands for the cleansing from sin in a most comprehensive way. This fact is emphasized by the synoptics as well as by Josephus. Although their cultural horizons, their language, and points of view are evidently different, it becomes clear that the baptismal act stands between repentance and forgiveness (Mark 1:4/Luke 3:3; cf. Luke 1:16–17, 77; Gos. Naz. 2) or turning to ethical conduct and acceptability to God (Ant. 18.117). The

---

ohne Tempel—Community without Temple: Zur Substituierung und Transformation des Jerusalemer Tempels und seines Kults im Alten Testament, antiken Judentum und frühen Christentum, ed. B. Ego A. Lange, and P. Pilhofer, WUNT 118 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1999), 395–410, at 405.

<sup>44</sup> For an evaluation of the sometimes enigmatic (and on the whole not very reliable) accounts, see Thomas, Mouvement, esp. 2–60, 140–267; Kurt Rudolph, "The Baptist Sects," in The Cambridge History of Judaism, vol. 3, ed. W. Horbury, W. D. Davies, and J. Sturdy (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999), 471–500.

<sup>45</sup> See Thomas, Mouvement, 33–34; Webb, John the Baptizer, 112.

Jewish-Roman historiographer is, as usual, anxious to avoid any eschatological, magical, or political association and inserts here a hellenistic body-soul dichotomy, but it is not difficult to retranslate his account into the understanding of contemporary Palestinian Judaism. It was sin, violation (whether “moral” or “cultic” is an anachronistic question) of the Most Holy One’s covenant that made an unholy people unclean. John’s baptism was a “baptismally-expressed repentance,”<sup>46</sup> the embodiment of metanoia (genitivus qualitatis: βάπτισμα μετανοίας), the symbol-reality of throwing one’s life totally into the realm of God’s sanctity and his will as manifested in the Torah. That the baptism is “for (εἰς finale) the forgiveness of sins,” confessed by those who accept it (Mark 1:5/Matt 3:6), is certainly no Christian projection. It matches the milieu and embarrassed the Christians not only because Jesus himself was baptized by John, but also because the remission of sins was not easy to accept as a pre-Christian act.<sup>47</sup> How remission “functioned” we do not know. Probably John neither forgave sins by means of his baptism nor did he symbolize spiritual rebirth; rather, he mediated the eschatological status of the penitent. The term “eschatological sacrament” is misleading; the idea of a performative act of sealing which spares the penitent in the final fire judgment and makes him/her a candidate for the gift of God’s spirit is the most natural explanation.<sup>48</sup> It goes without saying that this act mediated a profound status of (moral/cultic) purity, too.<sup>49</sup>

A close analogy to what John’s preaching would sound like is probably to be found in the fourth book of the Sibylline Oracles, which was completed in the first century CE and may originate from the Syro-Palestine region: It warns the “wretched mortals” of God’s wrath and calls for repentance, sinless life, and bathing the whole body “in perennial rivers” so that God may forgive and refrain from destroying the world (Sib. Or. 4.159–178). This apocalyptic fire consuming the world seems in fact to be a variant of God’s more sophisticated (but not unfiery) procedure announced by John.<sup>50</sup>

<sup>46</sup> Webb, John the Baptizer, 189.

<sup>47</sup> Matthew transfers the motif from John’s baptism to the Last Supper (cf. Matt 3:1–2 diff. Mark 1:4; Matt 26:28).

<sup>48</sup> See Ernst, Johannes der Täufer, 334–336; Webb, John the Baptizer, 190–194; Meier, Marginal Jew II, 54–55.

<sup>49</sup> For this aspect, see Webb, John the Baptizer, 194–196.

<sup>50</sup> For interpretation, see Thomas, Mouvement, 46–59; Webb, John the Baptizer, 120–121.

Thus, as in the standard apocalyptic view, the situation is perceived as an inescapable crisis, the initiative is expected from God. The sinners—the baptizandi are sinners by definition—have to avail themselves of what is their final chance, going out into the wilderness (Q 7:24) for a baptismal act of conversion that is in itself the “fruit worthy of repentance” (Q 3:8 = Matt 3:8),<sup>51</sup> and so naturally bear “fruits worthy of repentance” in social and pious conduct, as both “Hellenizers,” Josephus as well as Luke (cf. 3:8, 10–14), hasten to underline. The way the early Christians continued the baptismal rite, the account of Jesus’ baptism, and the eschatological framework lead us to the conclusion that John’s baptism was a once-and-for-all act. The Baptist and his adherents may have practised other lustrations as well (as later the Jewish-Christian “baptists”) but even Josephus, who emphasizes the day-and-night lustrations of his mentor Bannus (Life 11–12), gives no hint in that direction, nor can the enigmatic verse John 3:25 bear the heavy weight of speculations.<sup>52</sup> The vocabulary (especially βαπτίζω as verbum intensivum of βάπτω) and the circumstances (especially the river) suggest that the rite was performed as an immersion administered by John (or an assistant).<sup>53</sup> Often the river Jordan plays its part in interpreting the symbolic dimension of John’s baptism.<sup>54</sup> With regard to the desert motif in John’s career in general it is not impossible that the Joshua tradition<sup>55</sup> or the Elijah

<sup>51</sup> Helmut Merklein, Jesu Botschaft von der Gottesherrschaft: Eine Skizze, SBS 111 1983, 3rd ed. (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1989), 31; Ludger Schenke, “Jesus und Johannes der Täufer,” in idem et al., Jesus von Nazaret: Spuren und Konturen (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 2004), 84–105, at 91–92; differently, Marius Reiser, Die Gerichtspredigt Jesu: Eine Untersuchung zur eschatologischen Verkündigung Jesu und ihrem frühjüdischen Hintergrund, NTAbh 23 (Münster: Aschendorff, 1990), 239–240.

<sup>52</sup> As for instance Webb, John the Baptizer, 196, mentions, John may have practised repeated ablutory rites, as many of his contemporaries did. Thus, this hypothesis does not really provide an innovative idea of a “recent interpretation” by Chilton or Taylor, as Evans presupposes: Craig A. Evans, “The Baptism of John in a Typological Context,” in Dimensions of Baptism: Biblical and Theological Studies, ed. Porter and Cross, 45–71, at 45. What is different in Webb’s proposal is his restraint in conjecturing beyond the available texts. Chilton (“John the Baptist,” 26–39) profiles the Baptist within what he takes to be the purity interest in early Judaism, thereby separating him inadequately from his prophetic and eschatological milieu; Evans steers a middle course, more consistently in general, but in his collection of several typologies, interpretations, and milieus too compromising.

<sup>53</sup> See Ernst, Johannes der Täufer, 331–332; Webb, John the Baptizer, 179–181.

<sup>54</sup> See e.g. Webb, John the Baptizer, 182–183, 360–366; Brown, “John the Baptist.”

<sup>55</sup> See e.g. Evans, “Baptism,” 50–52.

cycle (see below 2.4.) had some significance, but the Jordan was not the only place of John's activity, nor were there too many alternatives in that area, and the Jordan quite naturally drew both people and meanings to its banks.

Provided that the term "initiation" is reserved for those rites de passage that serve the (second) socialization into a clearly defined coherent group, John's baptism was no act of initiation. John addressed the people of Israel, and those who were baptized would anticipate the renewed Israel, but did not enter a new social body or any "remnant of Israel" as a socially discernible in-group. On the contrary, in some way baptism was an act of individualization.<sup>56</sup> The individuals, however, became what they were: Israelites placing their hope in Israel's God of old, and it is in this way that we may speak of John's activity as "generic purification."<sup>57</sup> This process of ritual gathering served its function, as we shall see, within the framework of eschatological restoration.

There is another nuance of "collectivism" in John's activity, which is not always wholly appreciated: John is both the offensive populariser and the resolute radicalizer of religious concepts and practices that would in Second Temple Judaism regularly be reserved for elitist circles. As the Qumranites amplified and radicalized Levitical ideas of purity, so John radicalized and amplified—in fact "preached" (Mark 1:4) and disseminated—the purity ideas of purification groups, as they were entertained for instance by Bannus or in Qumran, and gave them their soteriological dimension. It seems as if he concentrated these elitist ideas and the cultic practices of his day, lustrative as well as sacrificial ones, in a theocentric tour de force to form the single focus of his baptism. Thus, it is not unfair to suggest that he is what one could call the "great communicator" or grand simplificateur of the purification idea. At any rate, the mobilizing effects of so attractively simple a concept reached Jesus and those who were to be his disciples. The "forerunner's" movement eventually proved to be the broader highway without which there would have been no turning into the (narrower) way followed by the Jesus movement.

---

<sup>56</sup> For the "ecclesiological pretentiousness" of John's baptism, see Jürgen Becker, Johannes der Täufer und Jesus von Nazareth, BibS [N] 63 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1972), 38–40; Backhaus, Jüngerkreise, 321–322; differently (with many others), Webb, John the Baptizer, 197–202. For Josephus's phrase βαπτισμῶ συνιέναι (Ant. 18.117), which is the only textual evidence Webb can hint at, see Backhaus, Jüngerkreise, 268–272.

<sup>57</sup> Chilton, "John the Baptist," 38.

This leaves us with a last question: If John's baptism is a final (possibly even exclusive) chance of salvation, then John, introducing, preaching, and administering this chance, is in some way a mediator of salvation (and it was perhaps just this self-concept that would leave its marks on Jesus). His baptismal activity as a whole works as a theocratic redefinition of the means of salvation and thus functions as an alternative to, or the replacement of, the sacrificial system of the Jerusalem temple.<sup>58</sup> What we observe here is that a peripheral symbolic system enters into competition with the central cult so that the Jerusalem atonement machinery was—by programme or in practice—abandoned.<sup>59</sup> John, as well as the Jews he baptized, may have participated in the everyday cultic life further on, but he was, as far as we can see, not engaged in what has been called “covenantal path searching”<sup>60</sup> (Jesus' determined ambiguity at this point may be part of his Baptist heritage).<sup>61</sup> The path John tried to make straight runs beyond the boundaries of the temple system.

John's centring upon the baptismal act thus initiates two trajectories: his own religious role as harbinger of judgment and captain of salvation and a theocentric counter-definition of the symbolic system of Second Temple Judaism. John's baptism reduced the cultic—that means: the whole religious—system of his people to the basic point of God's judgment and grace.

2.3. Preaching

This zero point—impressively symbolized by the rocks out of which God can produce children for Abraham (Q 3:8)—was the essential

<sup>58</sup> This is the (somewhat exaggerated) overall idea in Lohmeyer's monograph; at any rate, Meier, Marginal Jew II, 55, is right: “this humble insignificant slave implicitly makes himself a pivotal, indispensable figure in the eschatological drama.”

<sup>59</sup> For a balanced view, see Webb, John the Baptizer, 203–205; Michael Tilly, Johannes der Täufer und die Biographie der Propheten: Die synoptische Täuferüberlieferung und das jüdische Prophetenbild zur Zeit des Täufers, BWANT 137 (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1994), 209–224; Avemarie, “Johannestaufer,” esp. 404–407.

<sup>60</sup> Cf. Tom Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, B15.55 (Leiden: Brill, 2001), esp. 37–87, 275–329.

<sup>61</sup> Perhaps the most direct affirmation of Jesus' continuity with John and his baptism (Mark 11:28–30) is placed, not without reason, within the Jerusalem temple in a discussion with the hierarchy (11:27). It was possibly Jesus' temple action that occasioned his utterance.

message into which John integrated his preaching. Before the last purifier was to clear what he had planted, his forerunner was prepared to lay bare in an enormous act of theocentric relativization the state of Abraham's descendants. It is the subject of impending divine wrath that organizes John's activity. And it is only the fruit worthy of repentance (Q 3:8a.9b) that makes the difference.

The Baptist's eschatological message is attested in Q 3:7b–9, 16b–17 only (cf. Mark 1:7–8),<sup>62</sup> but the least we can say is that it is obviously no vaticinium ex eventu. The best argument for the historical authenticity of John's proclamation of imminent "judgment" (i.e. God's final action in punishment of the sinners and reward of the just)<sup>63</sup> is that it never was fulfilled. God's wrath, which, to be sure, John and his adherents viewed as salvific, is impending like an ax laid to the root of the trees (Q 3:9). Although caution should be exercised in arguing from silence,<sup>64</sup> the period given to Israel seems to be reduced to such a minimum that there is no longer any space for ethnic or religious privileges (Q 3:8b),<sup>65</sup> cultic provisions, venerable traditions, or comforting glances at salvation history. The situation may be compared to a tower block about to be blown up: little explosive clouds are to be seen at the base of the building but it will stay for a few moments: it is in these moments that we live (as Otto Kuss put it).

---

<sup>62</sup> I cannot see that Risto Uro, "John the Baptist and the Jesus Movement: What Does Q Tell Us?," in The Gospel behind the Gospels: Current Studies on Q, ed. R. A. Piper, NovTSup 75 (Leiden: Brill, 1995), 231–257, has shaken the scholarly confidence the Q account enjoys. Admittedly, Q does not deep-freeze historical Baptist tradition without kerygmatic interest. It is precisely in Q 7:18–23 that the kerygmatic interest grapples with the Baptist's preaching by building a bridge to what John had preached. But just because this passage presents Q's interpretive handling of John's ministry, the accounts of the preaching itself in Q 3 seem reliable. The silence of Josephus as far as the eschatological aspect of John's preaching is concerned is part of his hellenization of the Jewish prophet and is easily understood in view of his politically motivated reserve towards any apocalyptic element. It has often been observed that the harmless doctrine of virtue, which Josephus ascribes to John, explains neither the people's enthusiasm nor the ruler's harsh reaction. On the other hand, there are attempts to ascribe the Baptist passage to a Markan version (e.g. Nikolaus Walter, "Wer machte Johannes den Täufer zum 'Vorläufer Jesu'?", in Text und Geschichte: Festschrift D. Lührmann, ed. S. Maser and E. Schlarb, Marburger Theologische Studien 50 [Marburg: N. G., Elwert, 1999], 280–293), but too many subsidiary hypotheses weaken the methodological consistency of these suggestions; for detailed discussion, see Frans Neirynck, "The First Synoptic Pericope: The Appearance of John the Baptist in Q?," ETL 72 (1996): 41–74. The relationship between the overlapping Baptist texts of Q and Mark is still under discussion; cf. Christopher M. Tuckett, "Mark and Q," in The Synoptic Gospels: Source Criticism and the New Literary Criticism, ed. C. Focant, BETL 110; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1993), 149–175, at 162–172; Harry T. Fleddermann, Mark and Q: A Study of the Overlap Texts, BETL 122 (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1995), 25–39.

<sup>63</sup> For a closer analysis of the different types and motifs of what we call "judgment," see Reiser, Gerichtspredigt, esp. 3–5, 133–152; Michael Wolter, "'Gericht' und 'Heil' bei Jesus von Nazareth und Johannes dem Täufer: Semantische und pragmatische Beobachtungen," in Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. Schröter and Brucker, 355–392, esp. 366–369. We should resist the temptation to presuppose the Christian understanding of "salvation" and "condemnation" within the framework of a forensic act with a twofold outcome. Nor should we presuppose a cosmic catastrophe: it is the end of the wicked, not of the world, that John announces; see Webb, John the Baptizer, 304. For the wide-spread motif of "fire" (e.g. Isa 30:27–28), see Reiser, Gerichtspredigt, 158–160.

Such moments need instruction. John's warnings aimed at clearing the building site and saving the people (or more exactly: his friends). Otherwise his baptism would be but a useless waste of time; after all, fiery destruction is not what post-conversional rhetoric would insist on. The destructive message thus aims at constructing Israel—or at least Israel as far as it puts itself at God's mercy symbolized by John's baptism. There is the explicit account by Josephus (Ant. 18.117) and there are traces in different synoptic strata (Q 3:8; 7:35; Mark 6:20; Matt 21:32; Luke 3:10–14) which let us conclude that John was not only the harbinger of final doom but also, under the circumstances of these final days, a teacher of Jewish ethics as well as a post-conversional instructor, even though nothing incontestable has survived (but yet may perhaps have survived incognito in the form of Jesus' and early Christian teachings).<sup>66</sup> Due to the typological contrast to Christ, John is often seen exclusively as the fierce judgment preacher, a New Testament Amos, a dark foil to the figure of Jesus, the New Testament Hosea.<sup>67</sup> To be sure, nothing is more suitable to build up movements than the expectation that those who do not take part will be cut down, and according to what Q has (fragmentarily) preserved,

---

<sup>64</sup> This seems to be the Achilles' heel in Becker's impressive reconstruction (Johannes der Täufer, esp. 16–37)—similarly Merklein, Botschaft, 28–33; von Döbeler, Gericht, 41–150—which tends to confuse the skeletal knowledge we have with the one-sidedness of John's preaching itself.

<sup>65</sup> We can only speculate whether such criticism of ethnic pride led the Baptist to address even people beyond the scope of Israel. Perea was a border region frequented by many and the accounts of John's Samaritan activity are plausible; see Webb, John the Baptizer, 36 (but cf. 201); Theißen and Merz, "Gerichtsverzögerung," 244–246.

<sup>66</sup> See Taylor, Immerser, 149–154; Gerd Theissen, "Das Doppelgebot der Liebe: Jüdische Ethik bei Jesus," in idem, Jesus als historische Gestalt: Beiträge zur Jesusforschung, 57–72, at 70–72, who even tries to trace Jesus' double commandment back to John's teaching of piety and justice documented by Josephus.

<sup>67</sup> For a careful reconsideration of the aspects of "condemnation" and "salvation" in John's and Jesus' preaching, see Wolter, "Gericht"; Theissen and Merz, "Gerichtsverzögerung," 230–233.

John's preaching was actually marked by straightforward accusation and aggressive threat. But we do not really know whom these fierce warnings were aimed at, and the question of John's addressees and the pragmatic function of the relevant accounts is surprisingly seldom asked.<sup>68</sup> Both Luke and Matthew adapt the audience to their redactional purpose and the rhetoric of accusation ("brood of vipers") may have many directions (cf. Matt 23:33).<sup>69</sup> On the historical stage, it was most probably the temple elite and the Sadducean circles with whom John came into dramatic conflict (cf. Mark 11:27–33; Matt 21:32), whereas he was broadly accepted in the marginalized strata of Jewish society (cf. Matt 21:31–32; Luke 3:10–14; 7:29). On the other hand, there may have been more common (Torah-)ground between Baptist and Pharisaic circles (cf. Mark 2:18–22; Gos. Eb. 2) than the gospels suggest, since they are preoccupied with the conflicts of their own times.<sup>70</sup>

In any case, the judgment John announced was a conditional one (comparable to the Sibylline text quoted above; cf. also e.g. 1 En. 91:18–19) and may be seen in the Deuteronomistic tradition of Israel's repentance.<sup>71</sup> The threshing floor—the land and people of Israel may be associated<sup>72</sup>—will be cleansed but not destroyed. The metaphorical framework of John's preaching clearly indicates both the dominant position of the judgment motif and the hopeful prospect that those who repent—i.e. who submit to John's baptism and adjust their lives to its conditions—would be spared. The imagery is taken from peasant

<sup>68</sup> See Wolter, "Gericht," esp. 364, 373–375, 381–385.

<sup>69</sup> See Webb, John the Baptizer, 175–178, who argues plausibly for the Sadduceans being the original addressees, although Q, to be sure, may have omitted any hint of particular groups (Neiryneck, "Pericope," 74).

<sup>70</sup> See Taylor, Immerser, 155–211; cf. Edmondo Lupieri, "The Law and the Prophets were until John: John the Baptist between Jewish Halakhot and Christian History of Salvation," Neot 35 (2001): 49–56; for historical and exegetical evaluation of Mark 2:18–22, see Backhaus, Jüngerkreise, 138–161.

<sup>71</sup> Merklein, Botschaft, 28–29, and von Dobbeler, Gericht, 83–101, stress John's almost apodictic re-interpretation of the Deuteronomistic view, but see also Ulrich B. Müller, Johannes der Täufer: Jüdischer Prophet und Wegbereiter Jesu, Biblische Gestalten 6 (Leipzig: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 2002), 25–28, who quotes Jesus, son of Ananias, as an example of how an apodictic announcement of destruction really sounds—differing significantly from John's preaching (cf. Josephus, War 6.300–309).

<sup>72</sup> Webb, John the Baptizer, 295–300.

experience and refers to Israel as God's very own plantation:<sup>73</sup> Rotten trees will be chopped down to be burned (Q 3:9), and at the end of the harvest the chaff will be burned and the wheat gathered into the granary (Q 3:17).<sup>74</sup> So what John envisages is the fiery destruction of the evil as well as the gathering of the just, in other words the eschatological restoration of Israel. It was this kind of fissile energy that gave John's activity its impact and risk.

John's baptism is a preparatory rite, his preaching is a preparatory instruction, in times to come he is seen as the great preparer, and in his own way he considers himself as such. So what did he prepare?

The textual evidence is relatively clear. It is the Q version<sup>75</sup> that shows the least marks of Christian interpretation and mirrors probably the historical Baptist's expectation:

I baptize you [[in]] water, but the one to come after me is more powerful than I, whose sandals I am not fit to [[take off]]. He will baptize you in holy spirit and fire. His pitchfork is in his hand, and he will clear (the grain on) his threshing floor and gather the wheat into his granary, but the chaff he will burn on a fire that can never be put out. (Q 3:16b–17)

Recently some exegetes plead in favour of the Markan wording: "he will baptize you with the holy spirit" (Mark 1:8),<sup>76</sup> but their case is altogether less than convincing. As far as the ipsissima intentio is concerned, we saw above that John, along with Jewish expectations of the day, threatened God's rage and (fiery) punishment to unrepentant Israel, and I see no reason why the Q tradition should have inserted the fire motif into an alien, "pneumatological" context.<sup>77</sup> The Markan

<sup>73</sup> For the imagery of God's plantation (e.g. Isa 21:10; 60:21; 61:3; Pss. Sol. 14.3–5), see Reiser, Gerichtspredigt, 161–164; for a depiction of the imagined procedure of threshing, see 165–169.

<sup>74</sup> It is this type of imagery that would develop its career in the symbolic universe of early Christianity; cf. e.g. Matt 7:15–20; Hermas, Sim. 2; 3; 4. A certain continuity between Baptist and Christian notions of ethics and eschatology cannot be overlooked.

<sup>75</sup> For discussion of the textual evidence, see Ernst, Johannes der Täufer, 48–55; Webb, John the Baptizer, 262–278; Uro, "John the Baptist," 234–239.

<sup>76</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew II, 35–39; Uro, "John the Baptist," 248–252 (who holds the Markan version to be the original idea of the saying without, however, considering it historical; instead he finds its roots in the early Christians' inclination to identify their charismatic champion with the "stronger one").

<sup>77</sup> Meier's speculation that the reference to fire in Q serves to frame an originally plain opposition of water and spirit baptism (Meier, 36–37) is merely aesthetic; to base the historical reconstruction on Uro's decomposed layers of the Baptist sayings in Q with their manifold pragmatic tendencies means building a house on quicksand.

wording (as well as the other references to the spirit only: Acts 1:5; 11:16; cf. John 1:31–34) is formed with the aorist tense (ἐβάπτισα) so that it offers a retrospect on the Baptist's ministry as a whole,<sup>78</sup> thereby contrasting two sorts of baptism (the first cultic, the second metaphorical!), which turned out to be necessary when the Christians began to resume what once had been the preparatory water baptism. Thus one might even entertain the idea that the spirit motif—or at least the epithet “holy”—has intruded into the Baptist tradition from Christian pneumatology and/or the Markan version,<sup>79</sup> but the criterion of multiple attestation (Mark 1:8/Matt 3:11/Luke 3:16; Acts 1:5; 11:16; John 1:33) is a persuasive counter-argument so far. In some respects, the first Christians later continued their Baptist heritage, and possibly their pentecostal experience may be seen against the background of John's expectations. In the Baptist's imagination, to be sure, the spirit probably was a tremendous and transforming power different from any friendly Paraclete and “baptizing,” i.e. purifying (cf. 1QS IV, 21), in a manner that was anything but metaphorical (cf. Acts 2:17–21 = Joel 3:1–5; 1QS III, 6–8; IV, 20–22; 1QH<sup>a</sup> VII, 6–7; XIV, 12–13; XVI, 2–3, 6–7; CD V, 11; VII, 3–4).<sup>80</sup>

---

We are, pace Meier, Marginal Jew II, 37–38; Uro, “John the Baptist,” 250–251 not allowed to press the address “you” so that the present audience is confronted with both reward and punishment. The Baptist, like other prophets, appeals to Israel as a whole (cf. Acts 13:25), and the words “cited” in Q represent his overall preaching.

<sup>78</sup> This observation refers to the symbolic world the Markan narrator shares with his readers; in the narrated world of the text we may imagine John's audience that has just been baptized, so that it is appropriate to address them as those who have found salvation; cf. Wolter, “Gericht,” 373–374.

<sup>79</sup> Ernest Best, “Spirit-Baptism,” NovT 4 (1960): 236–243; Merklein, Botschaft, 32; Reiser, Gerichtspredigt, 156, 173–174; Steve Mason, “Fire, Water and Spirit: John the Baptist and the Tyranny of Canon,” SR 21 (1992): 163–180, at 170–173; Fleddermann, Mark and Q, 35; Markus Öhler, Elia im Neuen Testament: Untersuchungen zur Bedeutung des alttestamentlichen Propheten im frühen Christentum, BZNW 88 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1997), 52–53; Müller, Johannes der Täufer, 33; Schenke, “Jesus,” 89–90. For critical discussion, see Ernst, Johannes der Täufer, 52–55; Simon Légasse, “L'autre ‘baptême’ (Mc 1,8; Mt 3,11; Lc 3,16; Jn 1,26.31–33),” in The Four Gospels 1992: Festschrift F. Neirynck, vol. 1, ed. F. van Segbroeck et al., BETL 100.1 (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1992), 257–273, esp. 266–8; Webb, John the Baptizer, 272–5, 289–95; James D. G. Dunn, “Spirit-and-Fire-Baptism (1972),” in idem, The Christ and the Spirit: Collected Essays, vol. 2 (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1998), 93–102; idem, “The Birth of a Metaphor: Baptized in Spirit (1977/78),” 103–117, at 104–107.

<sup>80</sup> Contemporary expectations, however, do not suggest that we should translate πνεῦμα with “(fiery) wind/storm” (e.g. Best, “Spirit-Baptism,” 240–243; cf. Schenke, “Jesus,” 89–90); see Webb in idem, The Christ and the Spirit, John the Baptizer, 275–276.

The most intriguing question is now as before open to discussion: Who is the imminent figure proclaimed by John? The impression the Q wording leaves is ambivalent. Does the logion proclaim God or another actor in the drama of the last days? There has been much debate on the Messiah and the eschatological prophet, but the imagery clearly hints at a heavenly figure.<sup>81</sup> Melchizedek or the angel Michael seems too farfetched, and although the Son of Man<sup>82</sup> is a judicial agent, he shows little affinity to the numinous baptizer. Current research, therefore, tends to postulate some mediator of God's judgment—unknown to us and perhaps even to the Baptist.<sup>83</sup>

I have some doubts about this proposal. An unknown mediator violates the methodological rule of economy according to which any additional sub-thesis weakens the point. So a balanced reconsideration of the pros and cons of the simple thesis "God is John's one to come" is required.

1. The first argument in favour of God as the imminent figure bases itself on the priority of literal context: ὁ θεός is the subject of the preceding saying Q 3:8b, and it is apparently Yahweh who is illustrated as a peasant farmer cutting and burning down rotten trees in the passivum divinum of Q 3:9. It is hard to imagine that such an important figure as the eschatological agent would be introduced in a veiled comparison with the Baptist and in a context so clearly marked by

---

<sup>81</sup> A helpful catalogue of judgment/restoration figures under discussion (Yahweh, the expected Davidic King/Messiah, the Aaronic Messiah, the Angelic Prince Michael/Melchizedek, the Son of Man, Elijah redivivus) is provided by Webb, John the Baptist, 219–260. In the relevant literature it is Yahweh who clearly meets all the demands (judging, purifying, and restoring Israel; coming; mighty; sends spirit and fire; imagery of water and threshing-floor), but Webb remains reluctant to identify the expected figure with Yahweh for reasons discussed below.

<sup>82</sup> Becker, Johannes der Täufer, 34–36; cf. Légasse, "L' autre 'baptême,'" 270–272.

<sup>83</sup> Webb, John the Baptist, esp. 282–278; Meier, Marginal Jew II, 33–35, 40; Webb, "John the Baptist," 200–202; Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 188–190. Exegetes who identify the imminent figure with Yahweh include Thyen, Sündenvergebung, 137; John H. Hughes, "John the Baptist: The Forerunner of God himself," NovT 14 (1972): 191–218; von Dobbeler, Gericht, 76–77, 144–147; Ernst, Johannes der Täufer, esp. 305–308; Merklein, Botschaft, 29; Reiser, Gerichtspredigt, 170–175; Hartmut Stegemann, "Erwägungen zur Bedeutung des Täufers Johannes im Markusevangelium," in Das Ende der Tage und die Gegenwart des Heils: Festschrift H.-W. Kuhn, ed. M. Becker and W. Fenske, AGJU 44 (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 101–116, at 105; Müller, Johannes der Täufer, 33–37; Nikolaus Walter, "Johannes und Jesus—zwei eschatologische Propheten: Das Selbstbild Jesu im Spiegel seines Bildes vom Täufer nach Q/Lk 7,24–35," in Jesus im 21. Jahrhundert: Bultmanns Jesusbuch und die heutige Jesusforschung, U. H. J. Körtner (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 2002), 135–151, at 139–140.

the imminent intervention of God. And it is still harder to see the whole eschatological stage in the possession of this unknown agent (note the possessive pronoun in “his pitchfork”—“his threshing floor”—“his granary”).

2. The second argument relates to the contemporary horizon, namely the theophanic scenario as it was developed in Jewish expectations of the day: Already in the prophetic literature the “Day of wrath” is in a specific sense God’s very own day (e.g. Isa 13:9–13; Zeph 1:14–18; cf. Isa 27:12–13), and so in the early Jewish adaptation: It is God who comes to carry out his fiery wrath (e.g. Jub. 9.15; 36.10; Pss. Sol. 15.3–6; Sib. Or. 3.71–73, 760–761; 4.167–177; 1 En. 102.1; 1QH<sup>a</sup> III, 25–36; 1QpHab X, 3–13) or to pour out his holy spirit (e.g. Jub. 1.23; 1QS IV, 20–22; 1QH<sup>a</sup> VII, 6–7) directly and, as a rule, without any mediating agent announced.<sup>84</sup> In this context the verb to come (for judgment!) serves more likely to describe God’s eschatological activity (cf. Isa 66:15–16; Mal 3:1–2; 1 En. 1.3b–9; As. Mos. 10.1–7; 4 Ezra 6.18–20) than to attribute some quasi-title or unknown function to a mediator.<sup>85</sup>
3. The self-conceptualization of John is the third argument: If he, as I will argue below, understood his ministry in the light of the prophecy of Isa 40:3 (cf. 1QS VIII, 12–14) as preparing “the way of the Lord” as well as in the light of the prophet Malachi announcing the “great and terrible Day of the Lord” (Mal 3:23 [4:5]), it may also be taken for granted that God is the one who comes “on the day when I act, says the Lord of hosts” (Mal 3:21 [4:3]; cf. Mal 3:1–3, 17; Sir 48:10; Luke 1:16–17, 76–77). In the Elijah-forerunner-model, embedded in the prophecy of Malachi, Elijah is not the forerunner of any other agent, but of God himself. After this last messenger, there is in John’s “realizing eschatology” no space for a very last agent.
4. The fourth argument refers to the lack of reception: It is hard to understand why the eschatological agent, who is said to dominate John’s proclamation, should vanish unwept and unsung. Instead, the adherents were either content with John as the final messenger, or it was Jesus who became God's eschatological agent; but his "Galilean style" did quite obviously not resemble the heavenly agency described in Q 3:16–17.

---

<sup>84</sup> See the thorough examination in Reiser, Gerichtspredigt, 9–152. Webb, John the Baptizer, 254–258, 284–288, works out that Yahweh may be the prime figure behind the eschatological events whereas his agent only executes his judgment. However, such a secondary figure, e.g. the Davidic Messiah, is normally clear-cut, and in the train of John’s preaching the expectation of such an (actually decisive!) agent was evidently never a subject of interest.

<sup>85</sup> See Reiser, Gerichtspredigt, 146, 171.

Few exegetes, however, feel easy with this solution. The objections are, at first sight, impressive: (1) Will Yahweh wear sandals? (2) Will John compare himself to Yahweh? (3) How could the Baptist in Q 7:18–19 regard it as possible that Jesus is "the coming one" when he expected Yahweh?

- (ad 1) Eschatological footwear is embarrassing in any case, not only for Yahweh, but also for any heavenly agent. Two considerations may set the imagery at the right place. (a) While the reference to God's sandals in the Old Testament literature (cf. Pss 60:10; 108:10)<sup>86</sup> may seem strained, it is certain that in the genuine milieu of the Baptist's movement nobody used more daring religious anthropomorphisms than Jesus (and/or his early followers), and the little we know about John's preaching itself is equally marked by very simple metaphors from peasant life. (b) An analogy refers to a particular common feature shared by phenomena otherwise completely dissimilar. It is regularly overlooked that Q 3:16 does not present a description of God, but an analogy concerning the self-consciousness of the Baptist, who is in the presence of this master not even worthy to fulfil slavish work.
- (ad 2) So the point in John's analogy is that although there is a relation between John's baptism and the baptism of the imminent figure, the baptizers themselves are not comparable. The relative clause Q 3:16b qualifies the comparative form ἰσχυρότερός (μου) in Q 3:16a, which is open to more than one interpretation: The positive ἰσχυρός commonly refers to God's power in early Jewish literature (e.g. 2 Sam 22:31–33 LXX; L.A.B. 11.8; 4 Ezra 13.23),<sup>87</sup> and instead of a difference in degree between <sup>86</sup> Hughes, "Forerunner," 196.

<sup>87</sup> See Reiser, Gerichtspredigt, 171–172. Therefore one might contemplate attributing the genitivus comparationis of the first person singular to early Christian reinterpretation (Ernst, Johannes der Täufer, 50–51; Müller, Johannes der Täufer, 33) but, for methodological reasons, it is safer to put aside this somewhat speculative idea.

“persons,” the comparative may simply mark the Deus semper maior, who will in spirit and fire exercise that power of his which is only weakly foreshadowed by John’s activity.

- (ad 3) The “coming one” in Q 7:18–19 shows so little similarity to the heavenly baptizer “coming” in Q 3:16–17 that the impression cannot be avoided that this pericope is an artificial link construed by the Q tradition to harmonize John’s expectation with Christian fulfilment. Well may it be that Q 7:18–19 is the first, still diffident attempt to Christianise John and to bend his apocalyptic expectations down to earth (see below 3).

To summarize, if John as a Baptist popularised and radicalized contemporary purification rites, as a preacher he radicalised and simplified the eschatological scenario of his day: Yahweh was to come immediately in order to destroy the wicked and to restore Israel, and this imminent revolution must involve the totality of life and qualify any human safeguard. In a religious landscape which he perceived as dried up and petrified, John announced the volcanic eruption. This eruption never did occur. But once preached it turned out to be the initiative of a most vivid rearrangement of theology.

2.4. Self-Enactment

According to the earliest documented perception of the Baptist’s personality and style he was generally classified as a “real prophet” (Mark 11:32; Q 7:24–28;<sup>88</sup> cf. Q 16:16; Mark 6:14–16; Luke 1:76). The data we have indicate that this classification corresponded to his self-assessment. He was in some way (not only in the eyes of Jesus, who related John’s activity to the basileia) “more than a prophet,” in that he was God’s last messenger as well as a mediator of salvation. This specific role found expression—as in the case of another influential prophetic figure, the “Teacher of Righteousness”—in a surname: “the baptizer.”<sup>89</sup> It is, however, not so much the particular message he brought but the pattern and style of his ministry that justifies seeing him in the line of those who seem to have in one way or other revived prophetic traditions of old in the peasant scene of first-century Judaism and whom biblical scholarship describes as oracular prophets.<sup>90</sup> John, intentionally and distinctively, behaved in a way that met the role expectation of a “prophet” developed in his cultural milieu and inspired by a stereotyped biographical tradition in biblical and contemporary Jewish literature: the desert as place of his activity, his individual nearness to Yahweh, his public and severe call for repentance in view of God’s mighty, just, and wrathful intervention, his distance to the Jerusalem cult, his specific life-style amid an apparently loosely organized group of disciples, his deadly conflict with the ruler. He led, cum grano salis, a typological sort of life. It was in such typologies that the biographical tradition was formed—from first rumours of the divine legitimization of a man of God who had met so violent an end through the biblically inspired Markan martyrdom story to the Lukan birth narrative in its full Old Testament colours.<sup>91</sup>

---

<sup>88</sup> Arguments for the historical basis of the Jesus logion Q 7:24b–26, 28 are: The classification shows no mark of christological reflection, it coheres with the overall impression of Jesus as an (independent) adherent of the Baptist movement, and the colouring of both language and cultural background points to the historical context of Jesus; for details, see Backhaus, Jüngerkreise, 56–62. For the “reed shaken by the wind,” an emblem that is to be found on Herod Antipas’s coins (replacing his effigy), see Gerd Theissen, Lokalkolorit und Zeitgeschichte in den Evangelien: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition, NTOA 8 (Freiburg [CH] and Göttingen: Universitätsverlag and Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1989; 2nd ed., 1992), 26–44.

Three features in John’s habit may figure in this prophetic self-stylization although the (non-suspicious) tradition is somewhat ambiguous: the wilderness John chose as his stage (Mark 1:2–4 parr.; Q 7:24; cf. John 1:23; Luke 1:80), the garment he wore (Mark 1:6/Matt 3:4; cf. Q 7:25), and the frugal food he consumed (Mark 1:6/Matt 3:4; cf. Q 7:33; Luke 1:15; Mark 2:18–22 parr.; Gos. Eb. 2; Justin, Dial. 88.7). What we may say with certainty is that these features, in some way forming a whole, were explicitly remembered not because they were characteristic of a personal peculiarity or Bedouin pragmatics but because they were factors of John’s symbolism and therefore markers of religious attention (cf. Mart. Isa. 2.8–11). What “felt value” did they embody? First of all, place, garment, and diet were a vital expression of distance from both urban civilization and dominant religious culture, including its tithing system. Possibly they also expressed some concern for purity (cf. 2 Macc 5:27). Along with that, they served as an acted parable of John's mere living in Yahweh's holy nearness as part of his attitude of repentance. His life-style depended totally on what nature—that means Yahweh—provided for him and thus embodied his “zero point” piety. In this regard John is comparable to the Qumranites and Bannus, who is said to have taken his clothing from the trees and his food from what grew of its own accord (Josephus, Life 11). Nevertheless, John's anxiety about impurity of food and dress seems to be considerably reduced and the evidence in general falls short of suggesting that John observed specific rules of some withdrawn religious group.<sup>92</sup>

<sup>89</sup> See Becker, Johannes der Täufer, 56–60.

<sup>90</sup> See Richard A. Horsley, “Like One of the Prophets of Old’: Two Types of Popular Prophets at the Time of Jesus,” CBQ 47 (1985): 435–463, at 450–454. Any listing of prophetic types, of course, only bundles together historical observations with regard to possible standardized expectations in specific social strata. For other classifications, see Becker, Johannes der Täufer, 41–62; Webb, John the Baptizer, 307–348.

<sup>91</sup> For a comprehensive examination of the relevant tradition with careful consideration of the history-of-religions context, see Tilly, Johannes der Täufer. For John’s prophetic role in general, see Ernst, Johannes der Täufer, 290–300; Webb, John the Baptizer, esp. 349–378; Webb, “John the Baptist,” 204–206.

The desert as well as the Jordan play their part in Israel's “first love” with Yahweh, and the Exodus and conquest traditions as well as the Elijah cycle are full of possible associations—which, to be sure, prevents us from connecting any particular meaning or rite to the setting.<sup>93</sup> John's dress from camel's hair probably functioned as a prophetic status symbol (Zech 13:4: אֲדָרְתַּי שֶׁעַר), which might more precisely, by way of combinations (1 Kgs 19:13, 19; 2 Kgs 2:8, 13–14: אֲדָרְתַּי; LXX: μηλωτή), form a bridge to the cloth of the “hairy man” Elijah (2 Kgs 1:8: בְּעֵל שֶׁעַר; cf. Heb 11:37; 1 Clem. 17:1), particularly since the leather girdle may be found in the Elijah tradition as well (2 Kgs 1:8 MT: אֲזוּר עוֹר אֲזוּר בַּמַּתְנִי; LXX: ζώνην δερματίνην περιεζωσμένος τὴν ὀσφὸν αὐτοῦ—“with a girdle of leather about his loins”).<sup>94</sup> Thus, while isolated motifs do not support interpreting John's garment as a reviving of the Elijah tradition, the symbolic horizon in general certainly may.

Abstaining from food and beverages sometimes served as an “acted parable” of God-given social independence and vicarious repentance in prophetic preaching and was regularly dramatized in legendary biographization (cf. Luke 1:15).<sup>95</sup> John's diet in particular leads us into the midst of halakic discussions of the day. Locusts or grasshoppers (cf. Lev 11:20–23; 11QT<sup>a</sup> XLVIII, 3–5; CD XII, 11–15; Philo, Leg. 2.105; m. Ter. 10:9) as well as honey (cf. Lev 2:11; CD XII, 12; Philo, Spec. 1:291–292; Congr. 169; b. Bek. 7b) did not violate kashrut but could easily be contaminated, so that human processing had its risks and observant groups were on the alert.<sup>96</sup> Notwithstanding its inspiring potential in Christian asceticism, cultural comparison dissuades us from investing John's diet with too much ascetic importance. It was simply a part of desert sustenance,<sup>97</sup> and it is in this way that it should be seen as a factor of John's prophetic presentation.

<sup>92</sup> For discussion, see Meier, Marginal Jew II, 43–49; J. Ian H. McDonald, “What Did You Go out to See?: John the Baptist, the Scrolls and Late Second Temple Judaism,” in The Dead Sea Scrolls in Their Historical Context, ed. T. H. Lim (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 2000), 53–64, at 55–58; Lupieri, “Law,” 50–53.

<sup>93</sup> See Tilly, Johannes der Täufer, 185–192. Scholarly literature is packed with imaginative suggestions concerning baptism as a second passage through the Jordan, the region as place of Elijah's ascension (and return) etc. See, pars pro toto, the “rite de passage” (in a most literal sense) suggested by Brown, “John the Baptist.” Speculations of such kind are doubtless stimulating but, lacking any documentary basis, far from verifiable.

<sup>94</sup> For discussion, see Ernst, Johannes der Täufer, 284–286; Tilly, Johannes der Täufer, 167–175.

I think we finally can endeavour to describe an overall pattern of John's self-presentation. It is reasonable to presume that John defined his activity, pivotal as it was, within an interpretative framework that was structured by scriptural tradition, and after all we have seen, a special affinity to prophetic books would hardly be surprising. That does not imply that John was engaged in scribal work or even that he was literate. There were many ways of familiarizing, memorizing, interpreting, performing, and reviving biblical matter in an oral or scribal culture.

Isa 40:3 LXX is a firm constituent of the earliest Christian definition of John (Mark 1:3/Matt 3:3 and, quoting Isa 40:3–5 in full, Luke 3:4–6; in a shorter, presumably independent version John 1:23; cf. Justin, Dial. 50:2–5), but since the wilderness is an essential element of John's activity and the title κύριος originally refers not to Christ, but to Yahweh, it is possible that the Christians have only Christianized what may originally have been the Baptist's self-definition. The same passage played its role in the scriptural self-localization of the Qumran covenant, its withdrawal from "the habitation of ungodly men" and its ministry in preparing the way of Yahweh (1QS VIII, 12–14; 4Q176 frg. 1; cf. 1QS IX, 19–20). It is entirely conceivable that John conceptualised his eschatological preparation in a way that was similar to that of the covenanters and in some way, as the popularized alternative (the baptized were not expected to stay secluded in their withdrawal “from ungodly men”), competing with it.<sup>98</sup>

<sup>95</sup> For discussion, see Ernst, Johannes der Täufer, 286–289; Tilly, Johannes der Täufer, 176–185.

<sup>96</sup> See Lupieri, "Law," 50–51.

<sup>97</sup> For a careful and comprehensive examination of the whole range of material on locusts/grasshoppers and uncultivated honey in Jewish and pagan literature, see James A. Kelhoffer, The Diet of John the Baptist: "Locusts and Wild Honey" in Synoptic and Patristic Interpretation, WUNT 176 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2005).

Whilst Isa 40:3 may have been used as an appealing catchword, there is one biblical book that in all probability was formative for John’s prophetic programme: Malachi.<sup>99</sup> Both Mark (1:2) and Q (7:27) quote Mal 3:1 (combined with Exod 23:20) in order to give, in the light of scripture, an overall description, prospective (Mark) or retrospective (Jesus in Q), of John’s figure (“Who was he?”) and ministry (“What did his activity mean?”).<sup>100</sup> Although the synoptic tradition refers the second person singular (“your face... your way”) clearly to Christ, the combination of Mal with Exod is also part of Jewish exegesis (Exod. Rab. 32 [93d])<sup>101</sup> and the synoptic wording is influenced by the Hebrew text more than by the Septuagint.<sup>102</sup>

So the divine announcement of Mal 3:1 seems to be connected with the Baptist in a very early stratum of tradition and is echoed in the archaic-sounding phrases of Luke 1:16–17, 76.<sup>103</sup> With different weight and in different contexts, all the synoptics develop the identification of John with Elias redivivus (Mark 9:11–13; more explicitly Matt 11:14; 17:10–13; Luke 1:17, 76; cf. Justin, Dial. 49), and some expectation of the prophet’s return was obviously in the air (cf. Mark 6:14–16; 8:28 parr.). Moreover, the Fourth Gospel with its in some way clearer, <sup>98</sup> For discussion of the influence of Isa 40, see Taylor, Immerser, 25–29; James D. G. Dunn, “John the Baptist’s Use of Scripture (1994),” in idem, The Christ and the Spirit: Collected Essays, vol. 2 (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1998), 118–129, at 119–122; McDonald, “John the Baptist,” 56–57; Evans, “Baptism,” 56–58.

<sup>99</sup> For this book, and the Elijah expectation derived from it, as background of John’s self-enactment, see Hartmut Stegemann, Die Essener, Qumran, Johannes der Täufer und Jesus: Ein Sachbuch, 2nd ed. (1993; Freiburg: Herder, 1993), 298–301; Jeffrey A. Trumbower, “The Role of Malachi in the Career of John the Baptist,” in The Gospels and the Scriptures of Israel, ed. C. A. Evans and W. R. Stegner, JSNTSup 104 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1994), 28–41, esp. 33–41; Öhler, Elia, esp. 62–65, 103–110; Evans, “Baptism,” 48–50, 53–56. A more sceptical view is taken by Ernst, Johannes der Täufer, esp. 295–297.

<sup>100</sup> For synoptic discussion, see Schröter, Jesus und die Anfänge der Christologie, 71–82.

<sup>101</sup> Cf. Str-B I, 597.

<sup>102</sup> Κατασκευάσει coincides with the Piel form of the verb פנה in the Masoretic text, ἐπιβλέγεται with the Qal form; see Öhler, Elia, 33–34.

<sup>103</sup> See Öhler, Elia, 34–35, 77–85, who ascribes (with many others) the enigmatic tradition to the even more enigmatic Baptist circles—a hypothesis, which in respect of the Jesus movement being an offshoot of the Baptist movement may (and should) fall a prey to Occam’s razor.

though polemical affinity to the Baptist movement explicitly denies that he is Elijah (John 1:21), so this identification (in its non-christological shape) had to be combated.<sup>104</sup>

As far as we know, in pre-Christian times Elijah was not expected to return as the forerunner of the Messiah.<sup>105</sup> We observe the gospels struggling hard to make the Elijah tradition congruent with Christian eschatology, so that in Mark and Matthew the fulfilment eventually precedes what the scribes are said to expect. Instead, Elijah was expected as the forerunner of the Lord of Hosts and the “coming great and terrible Day of Yahweh” (cf. Mal 3:1–5; 3:19, 23–24 [4:1, 5–6]; Sir 48:10). It is in this respect that the pertinent parallels between John the Baptist and the book of Malachi as well as the motif of Elias redivivus are distinct, manifold, and coherent. First of all, Malachi in general and its appendix (Mal 3:23–24 [4:5–6]) on Elias redivivus—or, more exactly, Elias reveniens—in particular<sup>106</sup> is marked by the Day of God coming for fiery and purifying judgment: “For behold, the day comes, burning like an oven, when all the arrogant and all evildoers will be stubble; the day that comes shall burn them up, says the Lord of Hosts, so that it will leave them neither root nor branch” (Mal 3:19 [4:1]). This judgment will let those who belong to Yahweh “once more distinguish between the righteous and the wicked, between one who serves God and one who does not serve him” (Mal 3:18). Even the peasant imagery reminds us of John’s preaching.<sup>107</sup> Judgment of the wicked is inescapable (Mal 3:15; cf. Q 3:7), but there is also a prospect of being spared for those who return, so that God may open “the windows of heaven for you and pour down for you an overflowing blessing” (Mal 3:10). Malachi’s main concern, in a general tone of reproach, is repentance (Mal 3:7: “Return to me, and I will return to you, says the Lord of Hosts”). Elijah’s task will be to lead Israel to both return and restoration (Mal 3:24 MT: הָשִׁיב). The harsh words against cultic abuse and priestly attitude, which form the bulk of the book

<sup>104</sup> For an intense examination of the early Christian material on Elijah, see Gerd Häfner, Der verheißene Vorläufer: Redaktionskritische Untersuchung zur Darstellung Johannes des Täuflers im Matthäus-Evangelium, SBB 27 (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1994), 343–382; Öhler, Elia, esp. 31–97, 111–288.

<sup>105</sup> See Horsley, “Prophets,” 439–441. An examination of the Elijah expectation in early Jewish literature is provided by Häfner, Vorläufer, 321–343, and Öhler, Elia, 1–30.

<sup>106</sup> This addition was made no later than in the early Hasmonean period when it was documented in 4QXII<sup>a</sup> (4Q 76); see Trumbower, “Role of Malachi,” 34.

<sup>107</sup> Reiser, Gerichtspredigt, 159–160, 168.

(Mal 1:6–2:9), may find an echo in John’s indifference to the Jerusalem cult, and the strikingly sensitive criticism of divorce (cf. Mal 2:14–16) finds its counterpart in the scanty material we have concerning John’s public activity (cf. Mark 6:17–18/Matt 14:3–4; cf. Luke 3:19–20). A sense of piety and social justice (e.g. Mal 3:5–10) is ascribed to the Baptist, too (Josephus, Ant. 18.117; Luke 3:10–14). Whether the “hairy” and leathern dress or the Jordan, as the place where Elijah had ascended and which commended itself for a return, were part of John’s Elijah revival<sup>108</sup> is hard to decide, but in light of the material concurrence the suggestion seems to make sense. It is, of course, chiefly the character of Elijah as forerunner of God’s judgment and mediator of restoration that will have influenced John. God’s announcement of his coming and of his sending his messenger “to prepare the way before me” (Mal 3:1) or the prophet Elijah before the Day of the Lord will come (Mal 3:23 [4:5]) seems to be the one side of the medal whose reverse shows the legend: “the one to come after me...” In this light, John’s baptismal activity—a baptism marked by the genitivus qualitatis “return” (שוב)—may be taken as a means of restoration. And it is indeed (ethical, social, and political) restoration of Israel which the other announcement assigns to Elijah: “designated in the prophecies of doom to allay God’s wrath before the fury breaks, to turn the hearts of fathers towards their children, and to restore the tribes of Jacob” (Sir 48:10 NJB).

To sum up, it seems plausible to assume that John the Baptist himself saw his baptismal activity in the scriptural tradition of (Isaiah and) Malachi, thereby re-enacting the role of the prophet Elijah as the forerunner of the “great and terrible day” when God was “to come.”<sup>109</sup> The interpretatio Christiana was able to link up with this self-definition, but it had to “re-arrange” it in order to integrate it into the eschatological sequence that had developed after Jesus had entered the stage. The original concept, however, survived in the milieu the Fourth Gospel had to deal with and which may very well have mirrored the macarism of old: “Blessed, those who will see you” (Sir 48:11 NJB).

<sup>108</sup> Thus Stegemann, Essener, 298–301; Trumbower, “Role of Malachi,” 36–37; Evans, “Baptism,” 48–50.

<sup>109</sup> It is difficult to figure out whether John saw himself or was seen as a personal re-incorporation of Elijah or as a functional (“in the spirit and power of Elijah”) fulfilment of a more loosely defined scriptural role (cf. Luke 1:16–17). The second possibility is the more probable one; for discussion, see Öhler, Elia, 108–110.

2.5. Biographical Fragments

Though a biography of John the Baptist will never be written, some features may be traced back. The most prominent feature of John's life is his death. Josephus and the Markan tradition (Mark 6:17–29/ Matt 14:3–12; cf. Luke 3:19–20; 9:9; Justin, Dial. 49.4–5) give accounts that seem rather different at first sight, but turn out to be complementary at a closer look. Josephus takes a more political view, while the folkloric Markan tradition reduces complex courses of events to individual relationships between fascinating persons. Factually, individuals and events are interwoven. When Herod Antipas (who ruled 4 BCE–39 CE) entered into domestic partnership with his relative Herodias, his then wife fled to her father, the Nabataean king Aretas IV (who ruled 9 BCE–40 CE). This scandal had its part in occasioning the border war between Herod Antipas and Aretas, in which the tetrarch's army took a heavy beating (around 36 CE) (Ant. 18.109–115). It is just at this point that Josephus inserts his account of the Baptist's activity and death, for which Herod's defeat was said to be God's vengeance. The fortress of Machaerus, in which John was eventually executed (Ant. 18.119), is located in Perea at the frontier to the Arab kingdom, where John preached. It was thus a most sensitive affair in which the influential prophet happened to intervene by criticizing Herod's marriage politics. The "oriental" colours of this affair occupy the Markan tradition. So what we can say is that the Baptist John was executed in Machaerus, probably by beheading, as a result of his public preaching, which was feared to be incendiary.<sup>110</sup>

The terminus ad quem of this execution is obviously 36 CE, but the relation between battle and religious rumours does not depend on chronology, but of social remembrance tending to give a long afterlife to popular prophets. If we, therefore, realize that public opinion perceived Jesus as successor of John (cf. e.g. Mark 6:14–16) and date Jesus' death to 30 CE, it was at the latest in about 29 CE that John died. Provided that the Lukan "synchronism" (cf. Luke 3:1–2) is correct (and there is, at least, no cogent reason for doubting this), "the word of God came to John the son of Zechariah in the wilderness" when

---

<sup>110</sup> For detailed discussion, see Lupieri, Giovanni Battista, 173–178; Ernst, Johannes der Täufer, 340–346; Webb, John the Baptizer, 373–377; Meier, Marginal Jew II, 171–176; Josef Ernst, "Johannes der Täufer und Jesus von Nazareth in historischer Sicht," NTS 43 (1997); 161–183, at 176–182.

Tiberius was emperor (14–37 CE), Pontius Pilate was governor of Judea (26–36/37 CE), Antipas (4 BCE–39 CE) and Philip (4 BCE–33/34 CE) were tetrarchs, and Caiaphas was high priest (18–36 CE). It was—more exactly, but open to some interpretation—“in the fifteenth year” of Tiberius’s rule that John appeared in public, which leaves us with a time frame between 26 and 29 CE. The year 28 is the best guess, and so we may cautiously conclude that John’s activity had a short, but most effective life.<sup>111</sup>

The place of John’s activity was the lower Jordan valley (Mark 1:4 parr.), which indeed was regarded as wilderness, and people would have found him at both river banks, in the Judean territory as well as in Perea (John 1:28; 10:40), where he eventually was captured by the territorial ruler. He was probably used to roaming between the fords (cf. Luke 3:3) and may have expanded his sphere of activity even to Samaria (cf. John 3:23; 4:38).<sup>112</sup>

As for John’s descent and his formative years, we find ourselves at the mercy of both ancient and modern legends. Provided that oral tradition may have conserved reliable details,<sup>113</sup> we may consider it possible that John was born to the family of a Judean rural priest (in the reign of Herod the Elder: 37–4 BCE), that his parents were named Zechariah and Elizabeth, and that he was kin to Jesus. At any rate, the only literary evidence we have is the colourfully drawn and christologically styled picture in the Lukan infancy narrative (cf. Luke 1:5–80), and there is no possibility of a critical countercheck. So any presumption seems precarious. It is rather the meaning than the memory which is dramatized in Luke 1.<sup>114</sup> Modern legends, confusing

---

<sup>111</sup> For chronological discussion, see Meier, Marginal Jew I, 374–375, 383–386; Taylor, Immerser, 255–259, and (with an unconvincing alternative) Chilton, “John the Baptist,” 39–43.

<sup>112</sup> For detailed topographic discussion, see Lupieri, Giovanni Battista, 164–172; Ernst, Johannes der Täufer, 280–284; Meier, Marginal Jew II, 43–46; Ernst, “Johannes der Täufer und Jesus von Nazareth,” 167–172; Taylor, Immerser, 42–48. A case for the desert of Samaria is made by Joshua Schwartz, “John the Baptist, the Wilderness and the Samaritan Mission,” in Studies in Historical Geography and Biblical Historiography: Festschrift Z. Kallai, ed. G. Galil and M. Weinfeld, VTSup 81 (Leiden: Brill, 2000), 104–117. An excessively conjectural reconstruction of the places of John’s and Jesus’ baptismal activity is presented by Jerome Murphy-O’Connor, “John the Baptist and Jesus: History and Hypotheses,” NTS 36 (1990): 359–374.

<sup>113</sup> The “Baptist circles” are not fitted to be witnesses to the reliability of the tradition for they themselves are not reliably attested.

<sup>114</sup> It is often alleged that John’s soteriological interests (and self-assessment) as well as his striking attitude towards the Jerusalem cult would correspond to a demand of a priestly biography, but this impression cannot bear the weight of proving the data.

similarity with genealogy, fill up the compositional link at Luke 1:80 with Qumran fiction, but what we really can say is that John and the Qumranites, as we have seen, shared common ground in the eschatologically inspired purification milieu of Second Temple Judaism.<sup>115</sup>

3. John and Jesus

It is beyond the scope of this article to describe the relationship between Jesus and John in detail. Doubtless John belongs to the “historical Jesus,” but Jesus hardly belongs to the “historical John.” There are seven points that should be fixed:<sup>116</sup> (a) Since the baptism for the forgiveness of sins was a form of embodied christological embarrassment, the tradition that Jesus has been baptized by John is most reliable. (b) Jesus was therefore religiously inspired by the Baptist in his formative time and was an adherent of the Baptist movement,<sup>117</sup> never withdrawing his loyalty from the one who was “more than a prophet.”<sup>118</sup> (c) This

---

As to the kinship between John and Jesus, we have to take into account that in the course of legendary development family bonds between the heroes of different narrative strata (Abraham—Isaac—Jacob) are often spun. On the other hand, the successive functions of John—Jesus—James might find a quite natural explanation in actual familial bonds (Webb, “John the Baptist,” 214 n. 125). For descent, birth, and youth in the typical Old Testament and early Jewish pattern of “prophetic life,” see Tilly, Johannes der Täufer, 146–158. For discussion of John’s descent and the Lukan infancy narrative, see Ernst, Johannes der Täufer, 268–277; Meier, Marginal Jew II, 23–27.

<sup>115</sup> For a balanced comparative examination, see recently McDonald, “John the Baptist.”

<sup>116</sup> I have developed my view in Backhaus, Jüngerkreise, esp. 21–112; for other, partially different reconstructions, see Becker, Johannes der Täufer, 66–106; Meier, Marginal Jew II, 100–233; Ernst, “Johannes der Täufer und Jesus von Nazareth,” 162–167, 172–176; Webb, “John the Baptist,” 211–229; Müller, Johannes der Täufer, 52–75; Walter, “Johannes und Jesus”; Schenke, “Jesus”; Daniel S. Dapaah, The Relationship between John the Baptist and Jesus of Nazareth: A Critical Study (Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 2005); a useful survey is given in Theißen and Merz, Jesus, 191–198.

<sup>117</sup> Baptist research usually differentiates sociologically between the wider circles of adherents, who return to their (renewed) everyday life, and the inner circle of disciples who shared the prophetic lifestyle and baptismal practice of their master; cf. e.g. Wink, John the Baptist, 107; Meier, Marginal Jew II, 25–26; Webb, “John the Baptist,” 218–219.

<sup>118</sup> Jesus’ appreciation of the Baptist’s person and ministry is coherently attested: Q 7:24–28, 31–35; Mark 11:27–33 parr.; Matt 21:32/Luke 7:29–30; perhaps Jesus saw in John the “sign of Jonah” (cf. Q 11:16, 29–30), see Theissen and Merz, “Gerichtsverzögerung,” 237–251. The most instructive explanation of Jesus’ Neuheitserfahrung and his way to his very own message is given by Ulrich B. Müller, “Vision und Botschaft: Erwägungen zur prophetischen Struktur der Verkündigung Jesu (1977),” in movement proves to be the social and religious background of Jesus' own activity, and its eschatology provided him with particular anthropological premises, theocentric perspectives, and ethical practice.<sup>119</sup> The first generation of Christians actually picked up the thread of this initial experience. (d) Jesus' own approach, the basileia to come, is apparently not rooted in the Baptist's preaching, but Jesus considered his message to be the Baptist's message as far as it was led to its destination in the light of his very own Abba-experience and in the presence of grace. The crucial (perhaps only) point of discontinuity is therefore the claim of (dramatic) fulfilment in Jesus as the "very last messenger" after God's last messenger John: "The difference between John and Jesus is Jesus."<sup>120</sup> (e) Although the emerging reality of the basileia caused Jesus not to continue John's severe and "preparatory" lifestyle, he was seen as John's successor in public opinion; his activity included a comparable segment of society and he probably recruited his disciples in the Baptist milieu, though hypotheses about his time as a disciple or lieutenant of John are methodologically less than secured.<sup>121</sup> (f) The only point of personal contact beside the baptism is the Baptist's inquiry in Q 7:18–23. Neither John's question nor Jesus' answer corresponds to John's eschatological framework and one may wonder why John should have regarded it as conceivable that the Galilean preacher was his announced master and the One to Come with heavenly power. The sending of messengers (Matt 11:2: from prison) idem, Christologie und Apokalyptik: Ausgewählte Aufsätze, Arbeiten zur Bibel und ihrer Geschichte 12 (Leipzig: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 2003), 11–41, although I doubt if Luke 10:18 may be biographized.

---

<sup>119</sup> See Merklein, Botschaft, 27–36; Backhaus, Jüngerkreise, 96–109; Webb, "John the Baptist," 226–229; Evans, "Baptism," 61–70; Wolter, "Gericht," 364–388; Theissen and Merz, "Gerichtsverzögerung"; Schenke, "Jesus," 96–101.

<sup>120</sup> Wolter, "Gericht," 386.

<sup>121</sup> With respect to chronology we have a period of months or weeks, with respect to evidence we have nothing at all: The Johannine tradition does not refer to Jesus as John's disciple or lieutenant, but to Jesus as an independent baptizer along with the evangelist's notorious tendency of comparing "light" and "lamp" (for historical discussion, see Barth, Taufe, 42–43; Backhaus, Jüngerkreise, 263–264). The argumentum e silentio that the early Christian tradition has "obviously" removed the non-christological remembrance is not convincing, for there is multiple attestation in this tradition that John had baptized Jesus with a baptism for the forgiveness of sins. Jesus' own religious profile may be explained sufficiently against the background of the Baptist movement in general. It is (it should be needless to add) not the sword of "apologetics" but again Occam's razor which I would like to use in this over-hypothesized context.

looks suspiciously like a fictional motif meant to establish at least an indirect face-to-face relation between both prophets; allowing the raising of dead (instead of exorcisms) within Jesus' life time and self-description means paying a high price for so apocryphal a tradition, and after all I am—contrary to a widespread scholarly opinion—very much inclined to explain the scene not as the last question of the historical Baptist but as the first (and hesitant) step to his interpretatio Christiana, serving in Q as a christological safeguard on the threshold of Jesus' appraisal of the Baptist.<sup>122</sup> (g) The Jesus movement defined itself to a large extent by reference to, and comparison with, John as God's very own initiative. From the point of view of Jesus and the early Christians, it is not unfair to suggest that John the Baptist had been "the beginning of the gospel" in a conceptual, social, and personal sense, although it is not impossible that he, on earth, himself had commented on this development by the question: "Jesus... who?"<sup>123</sup>

The rest is reception. The more the historical distance grows, the closer John and Jesus are connected and the less important is John's identity marker: his baptism. In the historical beginning Jesus is baptized and inspired by John—Mark profiles John as Jesus' forerunner—in Q John wonders if Jesus is the Coming One, and in Matthew he knows that he is—in Luke baptism (without Baptist) serves as a background of Jesus' praying and disclosure—in the Fourth Gospel John is no longer the Baptist but the witness of Christ. Eventually, the Baptist finds his early request "I need to be baptized by you" (Matt 3:14) granted: Jesus baptizes him (cf. Opus imperfectum in Matthaëum 4:15, PG 56:658).<sup>124</sup> So John keeps standing at the "beginning of the gospel"—not as a mighty figure in its historical dawning but as a humble usher in its portal inviting people to find their seats with the best view of Jesus.

Scepticism proved right: We only know "echoes of John's whisper." It is the manifold sound-waves that give the "voice in the desert" its impressive resonance over the centuries and may give him ecumenical overtones today: There were contemporaries who considered him the prophetic forerunner of God, a martyr, perhaps the Messiah; Antipas regarded him as an insurgent. According to Jesus, John is the greatest man ever born, but smaller than the least significant in the kingdom of God (Q 7:28). He was a pious teacher of virtue in the view of Josephus. He is, as Elias redivivus, the forerunner of Christ in the synoptic tradition and the fading witness of the Light in the Johannine theology. He is the pioneer of monastic holiness in early Christian hagiography and a symbol of carnal inferiority in Gnosticism (cf. Testim. Truth 30.18–31.5; Ps.-Clem. Hom. 2.17). He is one of the forerunners of Muhammad in Islam (Qur'an, sura 3:38–41; 6:85; 19:1–15; 21:89–90) and both Jesus' crucified partner and his disciple in the Toledoth.<sup>125</sup> He is the messenger of the divine Light against the dark teacher Jesus in "his own religion," the Mandaeans, and the standard-bearer (for good or bad) of ascetic movements from the Middle Ages to Oscar Wilde and Richard Strauss. Nobody knows how many heads of John the Baptist have been found by venerators of relics, but probably scholars have found even more. The prophet has become a symbol.

<sup>122</sup> For more detailed discussion, see Ernst, Johannes der Täufer, 315–319; Backhaus, Jüngerkreise, 116–137.

<sup>123</sup> Cf. Reumann, "Quest," 183–184 (referring to Morton S. Enslin).

<sup>124</sup> See Bammel, "Baptist," 119–120.

---

<sup>125</sup> See Ernst Bammel, "Johannes der Täufer in den Toledoth Jeschu," in idem, Judaica et Paulina: Kleine Schriften, vol. 2, WUNT 91 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1997), 15–22, at 16–21.

HISTORIOGRAPHICAL LITERATURE IN THE NEW TESTAMENT PERIOD (1ST AND 2ND CENTURIES CE)<sup>1</sup>

EVE-MARIE BECKER

The intention of the present essay is to present the themes and forms of historiographical literature in the New Testament period. I approach this as a literary-historical task,<sup>2</sup> i.e. as a thematical and form-specific contextualization of New Testament literature in the frame of ancient historiographical genres. So I shall describe the literary-historical framework in which the New Testament texts have their genesis, and against this background, I shall assess precisely this genesis of the New

---

<sup>1</sup> For fundamental bibliographical information with an overview of the literary history of Hellenistic historiography, cf. H. Lühken, "Synopsis der griechischen Literatur," in Einleitung in die griechische Philologie, H.-G. Nesselrath (Stuttgart: Teubner, 1997); H. Lühken, "Synopsis der römischen Literatur," in Einleitung in die lateinische Philologie, F. Graf (Stuttgart: Teubner, 1997); O. Lendle, Einführung in die griechische Geschichtsschreibung: Von Hekataios bis Zosimos (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1992); K. Meister, Die griechische Geschichtsschreibung: Von den Anfängen bis zum Ende des Hellenismus (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1990); D. Flach, Römische Geschichtsschreibung, 3rd ed. (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1998); A. Mehl, Römische Geschichtsschreibung: Grundlagen und Entwicklungen. Eine Einführung (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 2001); C. R. Holladay, ed., Fragments from Hellenistic Jewish Authors, 1: Historians, SBL.TT (Chico: Scholars Press, 1983); M. Landfester, ed., Geschichte der antiken Texte: Ein Werklexikon, DNPS 2 (Stuttgart: Metzler, 2007); R. Nickel, Lexikon der antiken Literatur (Düsseldorf: Artemis & Winkler, 1999); M. von Albrecht, Geschichte der römischen Literatur von Andronicus bis Boethius, 2 vols., 2nd ed.: Deutscher Taschenbuch Verlag, (München 1997); D. Gall, Die Literatur in der Zeit des Augustus (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 2006); C. Reitz, Die Literatur im Zeitalter Neros (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 2006); E.-M. Becker, Das Markus-Evangelium im Rahmen antiker Historiographie, WUNT 194 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006); C. Moreschini and E. Norelli, Early Christian Greek and Latin Literature: A Literary History, 1: From Paul to the Age of Constantine (Peabody: Hendrickson Publishers, 2005); W. Schneemelcher, ed., Neutestamentliche Apokryphen in deutscher Übersetzung, 1: Evangelien; 2: Apostolisches, Apokalyphen und Verwandtes (Tübingen: Mohr, Siebeck, 1990; 6th ed. 1997); A. Feldherr, ed., The Cambridge Companion to the Roman Historians (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2009); J. Frey et al., eds., Die Apostelgeschichte im Kontext antiker und Frühkristlicher Historiographie, BZNW 162 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2009).—Concerning intercultural studies in the literary development of historiography cf. recently, K.-P. Adam, ed., Historiographie in der Antike, BZAW 373 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2008).

<sup>2</sup> On literary-historical studies in the field of early Christian literature in recent years, cf. G. Theissen, Die Entstehung des Neuen Testaments als literaturgeschichtliches Problem, Schriften der Philosophisch-historischen Klasse der Heidelberger Akademie der Wissenschaften 40 (Heidelberg: Winter, 2007); Moreschini and Norelli, Literature.

Testament texts and writings as a literary-historical phenomenon,<sup>3</sup> i.e. as a process of a thematical and formal adaptation and transformation of certain types of ancient historiographical literary possibilities. The comparative criterion consists of stories which tell a story, i.e. historiographical texts in the narrower and broader senses of this term.<sup>4</sup> The New Testament period is understood as the space of time in which those early Christian texts and writings came into being which were later collected in the canon of the so-called New Testament, i.e. the first century and the first third of the second century of the Common Era.

In the first section of this essay (1), I shall describe the literary-historical presuppositions of the composition of historiographical literature in this period. These are determined by the Hellenistic period, culture, and literature.<sup>5</sup> In the second section (2), I present significant literary-historical developments and literary representatives of the historiographical literature in the so-called early Imperial period (ca. 30 BCE–ca. 120 CE) in the Greek-Hellenistic, Roman, and early Jewish spheres. In the third section (3), I shall discuss where early Christian texts, especially the gospel literature, belong in the framework of the literary history of Hellenistic historiography.

1. Themes, Types, and Forms of Hellenistic Historiography

1.1. Basic Questions

Historiographical literature in the Hellenistic age<sup>6</sup> produces a variety of themes, types, and forms. On the one hand, these display culturally specific features in the Greek, Roman, and early Jewish spheres, e.g. the literary elaboration of the period of Alexander and his successor

---

<sup>3</sup> K. Backhaus and G. Häfner, Historiographie und fiktionales Erzählen: Zur Konstruktivität in Geschichtstheorie und Exegese, BThSt 86 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 2007), choose a philological rather than a literary-historical approach.

<sup>4</sup> On the definition of historiographical texts, see below.

<sup>5</sup> For an introduction to the history of research into historiography, cf. Flach, Geschichtsschreibung, 1–3.

<sup>6</sup> The definition of “Hellenism” which is relevant to cultural and literary history follows the classic definitions in the study of the classical period since J. G. Droysen. Cf. e.g. D. Timpe, “Hellenismus I,” RGK 4th ed., 3 (2000): 1609–1610. Cf. most recently also B. Meißner, Hellenismus (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftlichen Buchgesellschaft, 2007).

kings in Greek historiography,<sup>7</sup> the culture of remembrance of the early Roman historians, influenced by annals (e.g. Q. Fabius Pictor),<sup>8</sup> and the narrative-legendary elaboration of biblical-historical narrative material in Jewish Hellenistic historiography (e.g. Eupolemus, Artapanus).<sup>9</sup> On the other hand, there is a linguistic and literary cultural transfer and cultural exchange precisely in Hellenism, and this can be seen both in the shaping of individual themes and forms and in the creation of mixed forms. The definition of the so-called Hellenistic age usually envisages a space of time which is defined by political events (ca. 330–30 BCE).<sup>10</sup> The following presentation aims to describe the cultural, intellectual, and literary panorama in which the Greek, Roman, and Early Jewish historiographers were working until the beginning of the Imperial period (from ca. 30 BCE).

The early Hellenistic period is marked by the hegemony of the Hellenes in the eastern Mediterranean region and neighboring lands in the aftermath of Alexander the Great, and by a considerable growth in literary production in the Greek language. At the end of the fourth and beginning of the third centuries, a social-historical transformation occurs in Greek historiography, which is also significant for the history of culture and literature: it is now that the figure of the so-called court historian emerges.<sup>11</sup> This transformation is the beginning of a close link between politics and historiography. Historiography had always been employed as a political instrument; but this new link now also generated a number of literary forms and genres.

<sup>7</sup> Cf. e.g. Lendle, Einführung, 180–181.

<sup>8</sup> Cf. Mehl, Geschichtsschreibung, 42–44.

<sup>9</sup> Cf. Holladay, Fragments.

<sup>10</sup> On this, cf. J. Bleicken, Verfassungs- und Sozialgeschichte des Römischen Kaiserreiches, 2 vols., UTB 838/839 (Paderborn: Schöningh, 4th ed., 1995 in 3rd ed., 1994), who dates the beginning of the Roman Imperial period to 31/27 BCE (1:9).

<sup>11</sup> “In the city state of the classical epoch of Greece, the historians were prosperous citizens, members of the leading classes of the Greek poleis. At the end of the classical epoch, when monarchies came into existence in the Greek world—and with the monarchies, courts—and with the courts” a new ruling society, “the figure of the historian who lived at court and was at the service of a ruler also came into existence”: B. Meißner, Historiker zwischen Polis und Königshof: Studien zur Stellung der Geschichtsschreiber in der griechischen Gesellschaft in spätklassischer und frühhellenistischer Zeit, Hyp. 99 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1992), 4–5.

The themes of Hellenistic historiography in its Greek and later Roman forms lie initially in the field of Persian, Macedonian, and Greek history; subsequently, they concentrate on the protagonists of this history, i.e. Alexander the Great and his successor kings. This means that Hellenistic historiography increasingly takes on biographical or person-centered traits, which we also find in Jewish Hellenistic historiography (e.g. the Moses fragment in Artapanus).<sup>12</sup> At the same time, a large number of historiographical methods and presentations developed in Hellenism; of these, only “tiny splinters have come down to us.”<sup>13</sup> Accordingly, every presentation of the literary history of the classical age is conditioned in advance by presuppositions which belong to textual history, i.e. by the transmission of the texts and writings available to us.<sup>14</sup>

1.2. Demarcations: Antiquarian Forms, or Literature and Historiography Orientated to Tradition<sup>15</sup>

We must draw a distinction between the so-called antiquarian literature of the classical period and historiography in the broader and narrower senses. The term antiquarian literature has been applied since the Renaissance (with an allusion to Varro's “Antiquities”) to all those historical forms which do not correspond “to the Herodotean-Thucydidean concept of the historiography which is based on the study of politics and war.”<sup>16</sup> It is in this way that antiquarian historical literature has been distinguished from historiography, at least from the beginning of the modern period onwards. This demarcation vis-à-vis antiquarian literature shows us one essential characteristic of historiographical literature: the latter is not limited to the mere collection of

<sup>12</sup> Cf. Holladay, Fragments, 208–210.

<sup>13</sup> Lendle, Einführung, 205. The following differentiations follow above all H.-G. Nesselrath, “Geschichte der griechischen Literatur. Die Kaiserzeit,” in idem, Einleitung in die griechische Philologie (Stuttgart: Teubner, 1997), 269–293, at 279–281.

<sup>14</sup> On the criteria on which the collection of the fragments of Greek historians by F. Jacoby (FGrHist) is based, cf. idem, “Ueber die Entwicklung der griechischen Historiographie und den Plan einer neuen Sammlung der griechischen Historikerfragmente,” Klio 9 (1909): 80–123.

<sup>15</sup> On this concept, cf. K. Sallmann, ed., Die Literatur des Umbruchs: Von der römischen zur christlichen Literatur 117 bis 284 n.Chr., Handbuch der Lateinischen Literatur der Antike 4 (München: C. H. Beck, 1997).

<sup>16</sup> A. Momigliano, Die Geschichtsschreibung: Griechische Literatur, ed. E. Vogt, NHL 2 (Wiesbaden: Akad. Vent.-Ges. Athenaian, 1981), 305–336, at 310.

historical information, but aims to present this in such a way that it is both systematized and interpreted. This applies already to the beginnings of Greek and Roman historiography, and to the Christian history of the church. Greek historiography is essentially a child of epic forms (myths) and of geographical forms (descriptions of the earth and travel narratives);<sup>17</sup> Roman historiography has its precursors in the annales maximi and the so-called fasti;<sup>18</sup> and ecclesiastical historiography has its starting point in the chronographical form of the lists of bishops.<sup>19</sup> This means that history by definition involves the systematization and interpretation of historical events and information.

1.3. The Definition of "Historiography" in the Broader and Narrower Senses

Against this background, how can we define the genre of historiographical literature? Let us first mention two traits which are significant for the definition of the theme or contents and the literary form of historiography. Thematically speaking, historiography is engaged in the narrative of historically relevant facts and events. From a literary-formal aspect, historiographical literature employs the form of prose from Herodotus onwards.<sup>20</sup> The presentation of history in the form of lists, myths, epics, or poetry can at best be called precursor forms of historiography; these do not genuinely belong to the macro-genre of "historiography."

---

<sup>17</sup> In general, cf. Meister, Geschichtsschreibung. Cf. also B. Meissner, "Anfänge und frühe Entwicklungen der griechischen Historiographie," in Die antike Historiographie und die Anfänge der christlichen Geschichtsschreibung, ed. E.-M. Becker, BZNW 129 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2005), 83–109.

<sup>18</sup> Cf. Mehl, Geschichtsschreibung. For a critical evaluation of the annales maximi, however, cf. H. Beck and U. Walter, "Die frühen Römischen Historiker 1: Selbstbewusstsein—Traditionsbildung—Experiment," in Die frühen Römischen Historiker 1: Von Fabius Pictor bis Cn. Gellius, trans. with commentary by H. Beck and U. Walter, TzF 76 (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 2001), 17–53. Cf. J. Rüpke, "Fasti. Quellen oder Produkte römischer Geschichtsschreibung?," Klio 77 (1995): 184–202.

<sup>19</sup> Cf. W. Wischmeyer, "Wahrnehmungen von Geschichte in der christlichen Literatur zwischen Lukas und Eusebius. Die chronographische Form der Bischofslisten," in Die antike Historiographie und die Anfänge der christlichen Geschichtsschreibung, ed. Becker, 263–276.

<sup>20</sup> Cf. W. Schadewaldt, Die Anfänge der Geschichtsschreibung bei den Griechen: Herodot—Thukydides, 4th ed. stw 389 (Frankfurt: Suhrkamp, 1995), 19–21.

A second differentiation is necessary at this point. The macro-genre of historiography—i.e. historiography in the broader sense—encompasses a variety of individual forms and genres, including historiography in the narrower sense. How can we define historiography in the broader sense and historiography in the narrower sense? Where does the line of demarcation run? One possible differentiating definition affirms that historiography in the broader sense includes those prose texts which are concerned in various individual genres and forms with the presentation of historical themes and events (e.g. as biography, autobiography, monograph, ethnography), while historiography in the narrower sense (following Hubert Cancik) designates an “especially highly developed form of historiography”<sup>21</sup> which must be distinguished specifically from biographical and autobiographical forms, etc.<sup>22</sup>

1.4. Defining the Distinctions between Historiography, Biography, and Autobiography

We shall now look in greater detail at the differentiation between historiography in the narrower sense and biography.<sup>23</sup> We must first of all locate the phenomenon of biographical literature in the context of history in general, and specifically of cultural history, since the growing importance of biographical literature has historical and political reasons: “With the decline of the city states and the rise of the monarchies... the reign of a ruler became the natural unit of time of political history: historiography became increasingly biographical.”<sup>24</sup> It is thus scarcely possible to use the self-understanding of the authors as a criterion for distinguishing between historiographical and biographical literature. For example, those who told the story of Alexander certainly understood themselves as historians, since the object of their work was the personality and the activity of Alexander as a theme

<sup>21</sup> H. Cancik, “Geschichtsschreibung,” NBL 1 (1991): 813–882, at 813–814.

<sup>22</sup> Cf. also Becker, Markus-Evangelium, 62–63.

<sup>23</sup> On this, cf. those definitions which are seldom the object of further reflection, e.g. in D. Dormeyer, review of E.-M. Becker, Das Markus-Evangelium im Rahmen antiker Historiographie, BZ 52 (2008): 132–135.

<sup>24</sup> Momigliano, Geschichtsschreibung, 317.

belonging to the history of events and to history in general (e.g. Cleitarchus of Alexandria, FG<sub>GrHist</sub> 137).<sup>25</sup>

At the same time, however, steps were taken already in antiquity to distinguish between historiography and biography.<sup>26</sup> For example, Polybius calls the bios as ἐγκωμιαστικός (cf. 2.56.11; 10.21.8). His intention is αὐξήσις, whereas history seeks the truth. Plutarch (Alex. 1, and frequently) explicitly wishes to write “history” in the form of βίος, since his intention is to portray the character of the human person (τὰ τῆς ψυχῆς σημεῖα), i.e. ἀρετή and κακία. Even in the so-called apodictic historiography, which makes use of the biographical excursus, the distinction between historiography and biography is preserved.<sup>27</sup> In Roman literature too, the distinction between historiographical writings in the narrower sense and biographical writings (which included the literature of the exitus illustrium virorum) was maintained at least until the third or fourth century (cf. e.g. Pliny, Ep. 8.12.4; 5.5.3).<sup>28</sup>

Finally, autobiographical forms (hupomnēmata and commentarii) are related to biographical literature.<sup>29</sup> Aratus of Sicyon (ca. 271–213 BCE) is known as one of the earliest authors of hupomnēmata in the

<sup>25</sup> Cf. Lendle, Einführung, 168–170.

<sup>26</sup> Cf. A. Dihle, Die Entstehung der historischen Biographie, SHAWPH 1986.3 (Heidelberg: Carl Winter, 1987); A. Momigliano, The Development of Greek Biography (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1971).

<sup>27</sup> “The apodictic historiography employed the biographical excursus to make historical causality clear, but it distinguished historiography from biography”: F. Winkelmann, “Historiographie,” RAC 15 (1991): 724–765, at 730. New Testament exegetes often fail to reflect consistently on the differentiation between historiography and biography and to offer an evaluation of this. Cf. e.g. D. Dormeyer, Plutarchs Cäsar und die erste Evangeliumsbiographie des Markus: Rom und das himmlische Jerusalem. Die frühen Christen zwischen Anpassung und Ablehnung, ed. R. von Haehling (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 2000), 29–52; idem, Das Markusevangelium als Idealbiographie von Jesus Christus, dem Nazarener, 3rd ed. SBB 43 (Stuttgart: Verlag Katholisches Bibelwerk, 2002).

<sup>28</sup> “It is only the imperial biography—with Suetonius as its ancestor—that... is made a vehicle of historiography in the third century CE.... But until the fourth century, its status as an historiographical form was disputed”; Winkelmann, “Historiographie,” 738.

<sup>29</sup> For an overview, cf. K. Meister, “Autobiographische Literatur und Memoiren (Hypomnemata),” in Purposes of History: Studies in Greek Historiography from the 4th to the 2nd Centuries B.C., ed. H. Verdin et al., StHell 30 (Leiden: Brill 1990), 83–89. Cf. also in general H. Sonnabend, Geschichte der antiken Biographie: Von Sokrates bis zur Historia Augusta (Stuttgart and Weimar: Verlag J. B. Metzler, 2002).

Hellenistic period (cf. FGrHist 231).<sup>30</sup> Autobiographical forms received a tremendous impetus in the sphere of Roman literature above all in the transition from the Roman Republic to the principate, thanks to the prominent works by Julius Caesar (Commentarii)<sup>31</sup> and Augustus (res gestae/Monumentum Ancyranum).<sup>32</sup> From the Hellenistic period onwards, experts in rhetoric “studied the form of the older historiography... in order to determine the canon and to distinguish... between history, biography, and antiquarian studies.”<sup>33</sup>

1.5. Types and Modes of Hellenistic Historiography

Hellenistic historiography displays a variety of literary types and modes which allow us to see something of the intellectual world and the rhetorical-literary schooling of the historiographers. We shall therefore give a brief description of some of these, e.g. the rhetorical-rhetoricizing, the mimetic, the apodictic, and the pragmatic historiography.

In the rhetorical historiography, the historical discourse takes the form of narration and argumentation, and the tradition possesses authority. The aim of historiography is to facilitate correct evaluations and decisions in the contemporary conflicts. In the first century BCE, Roman historiography is influenced by the Hellenistic-Peripatetic rhetorical historiography in the way in which it copes with the contemporary political crises. An important factor in the increase in the rhetorical tendencies of Roman historiography was the rhetoricization of historical narration which was demanded especially by Cicero (Orat. 2.54–56).<sup>34</sup>

<sup>30</sup> To a large extent, his writings can be regarded as unfalsified and devoid of literary artifice, although they have a subjective coloring. Cf. Lendle, Einführung, 192–194.

<sup>31</sup> Cf. Mehl, Geschichtsschreibung, 68–70.

<sup>32</sup> Cf. F. Blumenthal, “Die Autobiographie des Augustus,” Wiener Studien 35 (1913): 113–130 and 267–288, 36 (1914): 84–103. Most recently, cf. also K. Bringmann, ed., Augustus: Schriften, Reden und Aussprüche, WdF 91 (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche 2008 Beckgesellschaft).

<sup>33</sup> D. Harth, “Geschichtsschreibung,” Historisches Wörterbuch der Rhetorik 3 (1996): 832–870, at 837.

<sup>34</sup> The narrative form has a forensic component, since it takes place in an inductive form. This link is already found in Aristotle: cf. Ret. 2.1393a20. On Isocrates and Cicero, cf. also A. Demandt, Geschichte als Argument: Drei Formen politischen Zukunftsdenkens im Altertum (Konstanz: Universitätsverlag, 1972), 18–20 and 30–32. Cf. in general Harth, “Geschichtsschreibung”, 839–840.

In his debate with the so-called mimetic historiography of a Duris of Samos (born 330 BCE)<sup>35</sup> and the related pathetic historiography (e.g. Phylarchus),<sup>36</sup> as well as with the apodictic historiography of a Hieronimus of Cardia (third/second century),<sup>37</sup> Polybius propagates a presentation which concentrates on the relevant historical questions. He attacks rhetorical and dramatizing elements in historiography, and coins the concept of pragmatic historiography. Its methodological approach (the examination of written sources, “autopsy,” political action: cf. 12.25e1) is already found in Herodotus and Thucydides.<sup>38</sup> Unlike tragedy, history is interested in “truth and usefulness to the reader.”<sup>39</sup> Through this apodictic interest, Polybius establishes a demarcation line vis-à-vis the pathetic historiography of Phylarchus (cf. 2.56.11–12). Historiography has practical and moral goals (1.1.2):<sup>40</sup> Polybius sees its purpose as “contributing to the ability to act” in the political and military spheres (3.59.3–5; 12.8.1; 16.14.3–10; etc.).<sup>41</sup> In general, therefore, we find a basic moralizing and pragmatizing trait in the various types of Hellenistic historiography.

---

<sup>35</sup> We find reflections on the Hellenistic historiography at the beginning of the Makedonika (FGrHist 76 F1). Cf. also Aristotle, Poet. 14.1453b11/12, and Lendle, Einführung, 186–187. Duris of Samos “applied” the Aristotelian principles of the mimetic composition of fables “to history, in order to intensify the character of the narrative as an aesthetically effective and moral-didactic appeal”: Harth, “Geschichtsschreibung,” 836.

<sup>36</sup> Cf. also Winkelmann, “Historiographie,” 729, and Lendle, Einführung, 202. On pathos and emotionality in historiography in general, cf. most recently J. Marincola, “Beyond Pity and Fear: The Emotions of History,” Ancient Society 33 (2003): 285–315.

<sup>37</sup> FGrHist 154.

<sup>38</sup> Cf. Winkelmann, “Historiographie,” 729. Polybius’s manner of writing follows the rhetorical pattern narratio—probatio—applicatio (cf. Harth, “Geschichtsschreibung,” 836). On the historical method of Thucydides, cf. also most recently H. Sonnabend, Thukydides, Studienbücher Antike 13 (Hildesheim: Olms, 2004), esp. 55–57.

<sup>39</sup> Winkelmann, “Historiographie,” 729.

<sup>40</sup> Cf. H. Tränkle, Livius und Polybios (Basel and Stuttgart: Schwabe, 1977); A. M. Eckstein, Moral Vision in The Histories of Polybius (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995), esp. 272–274.

<sup>41</sup> B. Meißner, Historiker zwischen Polis und Königshof: Studien zur Stellung der Geschichtsschreiber in der griechischen Gesellschaft in spätklassischer und frühhellenistischer Zeit, Hyp. 99 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1992), 557.

1.6. Reflections in Classical Antiquity on the Theory and Method of Historiography

Scattered “methodological observations” are found in the works of the ancient historians,<sup>42</sup> especially when they discuss the exordium.<sup>43</sup> For example, Livy speaks critically of the relationship between historiography and poetry.<sup>44</sup> A number of theoretical discussions of the essence, significance, and function of historiography had a decisive influence on the form of historiographical works. In his conception of literary composition, Aristotle defines history as a chance narrative of events (Poet. 9.1451b). Since poetry communicates what could happen according to the rules of probability and necessity (καὶ τὰ δυνατὰ κατὰ τὸ εἰκὸς ἢ τὸ ἀναγκαῖον), it is “more philosophical” and more significant than historiography (διὸ καὶ φιλοσοφώτερον καὶ σπουδαιότερον ποίησις ἱστορίας ἐστίν, 1451a and b). Historiography inquires into what is specific, whereas poetry inquires into what is general (καθόλου).

Cicero’s discussion reflects the historiographical theories of the late Roman Republic. He understands history as magistra vitae, vita memoriae, and lux veritatis (Orat. 2.36), and as munus oratoris maximum (Orat. 2.62).<sup>45</sup> Contrary to the Roman tradition of the annales maximi, which was meant only to preserve the memory of places, times, human persons, and deeds, Cicero favors a rhetorically shaped form of historiography which is comparable to the Greek tradition (Orat. 2.51–53; Leg. 1.6–8). In the Flavian period, which brings a “classicistic reaction,”<sup>46</sup> Quintilian gives us glimpses of the historiographical theories of the Imperial period (Orat. Inst. 10.1.31).<sup>47</sup> He posits a close relation-

<sup>42</sup> Winkelmann, “Historiographie,” 732.

<sup>43</sup> Flach, Geschichtsschreibung, 9–11, refers to the following reflections on the theory of history in classical antiquity: Thucydides, 1.22.2–3; Cassius Dio, 53.19.4–5; Tacitus, Ann. 1.1.2f.; Hist. 1.1.2; Polybius, e.g. 12.25–27; 2.56.7–9.

<sup>44</sup> Cf. Livy, Praef. 1.13. Cf. also T. P. Wiseman, “History, Poetry, and Annales,” in Clio & the Poets: Augustan Poetry & the Traditions of Ancient Historiography, ed. D. S. Levine and D. P. Nelis, MnS 224 (Leiden: Brill, 2002), 331–362, at 331–333.

<sup>45</sup> K.-E. Petzold, “Cicero und Historie,” in idem, Geschichtsdenken und Geschichtsschreibung: Kleine Schriften zur griechischen und römischen Geschichte, Historia 126 (Stuttgart: F. Steiner, 1999), 86–109; M. Fleck, Cicero als Historiker, Beiträge zur Altertumskunde 39 (Stuttgart: Teubner, 1993), esp. 15–17.

<sup>46</sup> von Albrecht, Geschichte, 717.

<sup>47</sup> Cf. in general also A. D. Leeman, “Die römische Geschichtsschreibung,” in Römische Literatur, ed. M. Fuhrmann, NHL 3 (Frankfurt: Akademische Verlagsgesellschaft Athenaion, 1974), 115–146, at 134–135.

ship between historiography and poetry: historiography does not prove, but narrates in a literary form not bound by the rules of metre (... quodam modo carmen solutum est et scribitur ad narrandum, non ad probandum). “This makes it clear that Quintilian wishes to see an even stronger link between historiography and poetry than did Cicero.”<sup>48</sup> Quintilian is not the only one who takes this approach; he reflects the increased blurring of the distinction between historiography and poetry that we find in the Roman literature of the early Imperial period.<sup>49</sup> Tacitus emphasizes the moral and ethical character of historiography. He sets out his understanding of the praecipuum munus annalium of history at Ann. 3.65: “The passage... states first what history’s role should be in respect to good behaviour... and second what the purpose is in recording instances of bad behaviour.”<sup>50</sup>

Reflection on history in the sense of the elaboration of a technical ars historica is found only in Lucian,<sup>51</sup> who composed the only “systematic monograph on historiography”<sup>52</sup> that has survived from the classical period. He addresses his methodological, linguistic, and substantial demands to the historian—demands that are directed against the customary historiography of contemporary imperial military campaigns, which were nothing other than exaggerated panegyrics. Lucian defines the distinction between poetry and history by saying that a poet is driven by a deity and by the Muses, and is therefore permitted to relate incredible things (H.c. 8). The following aspects must also be borne in mind when one writes historical works: the historian is writing for the instruction of posterity (H.c. 40f.), and this means that the purpose of history is to be of service by presenting the truth (H.c. 8). The historian’s task is to present factual matters (H.c. 38–39). A good historian needs political acumen and skill in presentation (H.c. 34). The facts must be well chosen and critically evaluated; they should be based primarily on things one has personally witnessed, or on the

<sup>48</sup> Leeman, “Geschichtsschreibung,” 135.

<sup>49</sup> On this, cf. most recently Wiseman, “History,” esp. 353–354.

<sup>50</sup> T. J. Luce, “Tacitus on ‘History’s Highest Function.’: Praecipuum munus annalium (Ann. 3.65),” ANRW II 33.4 (1991): 2904–2927, at 2906–2907, emphasizing the difference from Livy, who offers instruction by means of examples. In Tacitus, we find the idea “that history can act as a deterrent” (2914).

<sup>51</sup> Cf. E. Keßler, “Ars historica,” Historisches Wörterbuch der Rhetorik 1 (1992): 1046–1048, at 1046. Cf. in general G. Avenarius, Lukians Schrift zur Geschichtsschreibung (Meisenheim: Hain, 1956).

<sup>52</sup> Winkelmann, “Historiographie,” 732.

testimony of credible witnesses (H.c. 47). The historian must begin by drawing up an outline of his presentation, which he then fills in with details (H.c. 48). The style should be generally comprehensible and simple (H.c. 43–45). The course of the narrative should be related briefly and precisely (H.c. 50, 56–57). An historical work needs no preface; a short summary of its contents is sufficient (H.c. 52). In these reflections, Lucian gives an interesting insight into the ancient theory about the production and reception of historiography and into the evaluation of the literary genre of “history” in classical antiquity.

1.7. Themes and Forms of Early Jewish Historiography

Jewish Hellenistic historiography<sup>53</sup> aims both at assimilation and at the preservation of the identity of the historiographical themes and forms of an Old Testament and Jewish character in the context of the mixed Hellenistic cultures. Early Jewish historiography thus lives in the tension between assimilation and the preservation of identity.<sup>54</sup> The diaspora Jews, who had largely lost their knowledge of Hebrew and Aramaic, established a historiography in Greek. Jewish Hellenistic historiography displays not only linguistic, but also formal influence on the part of Greek historiography. For example, 1 Maccabees contains some elements, such as the ethnographical chapter about Rome, which are related to Greek historiography. This book is based on various written sources, including letters and documents which the author may have consulted in an archive in Jerusalem. His presentation also relies on legendary and oral traditions.<sup>55</sup> 2 Maccabees “resembles much more strongly the popular Greek historiography with its pronounced love of miracles and remarkable events.”<sup>56</sup> 2 Maccabees, “as a work of <sup>53</sup> Cf. also the introduction in E. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 B.C.–A.D. 135). A New English Version, revised and ed. G. Vermes and F. Millar 1 (Edinburgh: Clark, 1973), 19–122.

<sup>54</sup> On this, cf. the overview by O. Wischmeyer, “Orte der Geschichte und der Geschichtsschreibung in der frühjüdischen Literatur,” in Die antike Historiographie und die Anfänge der christlichen Geschichtsschreibung, ed. Becker, 157–179. Cf. also G. E. Sterling, Historiography and Self-Definition: Josephos, Luke-Acts and Apologetic Historiography, NovTSup 64 (Leiden: Brill, 1992).

<sup>55</sup> Cf. e.g. K.-D. Schunck, 1. Makkabäerbuch, JSHRZ I/4 (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 1980), 291.

<sup>56</sup> Momigliano, Geschichtsschreibung, 326. “The fragments of Greco-Jewish histories from the first two centuries of the Hellenistic period offer a tantalizing glimpse into the process of assimilation and cultural polemics which were at work among Jews the pathetic and rhetorical historiography which aimed at great dramatic effects and was dominant in Hellenism,” conforms completely to “contemporary Greek historiography. Indeed, 2 Maccabees is the only work of this genre which has survived in its entirety.”<sup>57</sup> The historiographer Flavius Josephus, writing in the early Imperial period, follows even more directly the forms and elements of Greek historiography.

Despite linguistic and cultural processes of adaptation, i.e. the use of the Greek language and the consequences this had for early Jewish literature and historiography,<sup>58</sup> the literary products of Jewish Hellenistic historiography nevertheless largely preserve their own specific character. Religious aspects play a central role here,<sup>59</sup> as does the fact that there was little interest in individual historical themes and in history in general in Israel, and especially in Diaspora Judaism, in the second century BCE, with the exception of the Maccabean conflicts.<sup>60</sup> Instead of writing a continuous history of contemporary events, biblical traditions are elaborated into contemporary narratives<sup>61</sup> (cf.

---

during the period, but they make little or no contribution to the understanding of contemporary political developments. Such is the concern of the two major Jewish histories of the period, 1 and 2 Maccabees”: H. W. Attridge, “Historiography,” in Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period, ed. M. E. Stone, CRINT 2 (Assen: Van Gorcum, 1984), 157–184, at 171. On the significance of the Books of Maccabees for early Jewish historiography, cf. most recently also H. Lichtenberger, “Geschichtsschreibung und Geschichtserzählung im 1. und 2. Makkabäerbuch,” in Die antike Historiographie und die Anfänge der christlichen Geschichtsschreibung, ed. Becker, 197–212.

<sup>57</sup> C. Habicht, 2. Makkabäerbuch, JSHRZ I.3 (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus 1976), 189.

<sup>58</sup> “All the nations that came into contact with the Greeks in the Hellenistic age... produced books in Greek about their national history”: A. Momigliano, The Classical Foundations of Modern Historiography (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990), 24.

<sup>59</sup> Cf. also M. Pohlenz and P. Wendland, “Die griechische Prosa,” in Einleitung in die Altertumswissenschaft 1, Part 3, ed. A. Gercke and E. Norden, 3rd ed. (Leipzig: B. G. Teubner, 1927), 64–166, at 161–162.

<sup>60</sup> “On the one hand the postbiblical Jews really thought they had in the Bible all the history that mattered: superevaluation of a certain type of history implied undervaluation of all other events. On the other hand the whole development of Judaism led to something unhistorical, eternal, the Law, the Torah. The significance which the Jews came to attach to the Torah killed their interest in general historiography”: Momigliano, Foundations, 23. On the historical sources for early Jewish history, cf. Schürer, History, 19–43.

<sup>61</sup> Cf. also R. Doran, “The Jewish Hellenistic Historians Before Josephus,” ANRW II, 20.1 (1987): 246–297, at 295.

Artapanus).<sup>62</sup> This is why it is difficult to define the specific genre of the early Jewish historiographical writings and thus to demarcate them vis-à-vis the rest of early Jewish literature.<sup>63</sup> Historical themes are given an arbitrary literary form in other areas of early Jewish literature which are not counted among the “historical writings” in the broader sense (prophecy, apocalyptic, sapiential literature). These historical themes can be understood only against the background of the prophetic-apocalyptic coding (e.g. Dan 12) or of sapiential instruction (Sirach),<sup>64</sup> and are thus accessible only to specific groups.

Among the surviving Jewish Hellenistic historical works, we must distinguish between (a) those that have survived intact (1 Esdras, 1–3 Maccabees) and were included in the Septuagint and in the Vulgate canon, and (b) the mostly brief fragments of historical works which survive only in compilations by later writers. Eusebius (especially in Praeparatio evangelica 9), Clement of Alexandria, and Josephus were not the first to transmit fragments of the Jewish Hellenistic historiographers; this had been done earlier by the Hellenistic historiographer L. Cornelius Alexander Polyhistor (born 105 BCE) in his work On the Jews.<sup>65</sup> The fragments refer to writers who are orthonymous, but about whom scarcely any historical information survives; references to autonomous authors (Ps.-Eupolemus) or pseudepigraphical writers (Ps.-Hecataeus) are less frequent. Nevertheless, there is a tendency in <sup>62</sup> On this, cf. Becker, Markus-Evangelium, 178–180; idem, “Artapanos: ‘Judaica’. A Contribution to early Jewish Historiography,” in History and Identity: How Israel’s Later Authors Viewed Its Earlier History, ed. N. Calduch-Benages et al. DCLY 2005 (New York: de Gruyter, 2006), 297–320. Concerning a poetic author like Ezekiel the Tragedian who in his Exagoge also uses the Exodus-traditions cf. C. R. Holladay, ed., Fragments from Hellenistic Jewish Authors 2: Poets, SBLTT (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1989), 301–529. Cf. latest also: P. Lanfranchi, L’Exagoge d’Ezéchiel le Tragique: Introduction, texte, traduction et commentaire, Studia in Veteris Testamenti pseudepigrapha 21 (Leiden: Brill, 2006).

---

<sup>63</sup> Cf. U. Mittmann-Richert, Einführung zu den historischen und legendarischen Erzählungen, JSHRZ VI.1 (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 2000), 1: “The only works that can be called historical writings in the narrower sense of the term are 1 and 2 Maccabees...”

<sup>64</sup> Cf. the reflections on the historiographical character of some Qumran texts (e.g. the Damascus Document) and Sirach by B. Z. Wacholder, “Historiography of Qumran: The Sons of Zadok and Their Enemies,” in Qumran between the Old and New Testament, ed. F. H. Cryer and T. L. Thompson, JSOTSup 280 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998), 347–377.

<sup>65</sup> The fundamental study of this work is J. Freudenthal, Alexander Polyhistor und die von ihm erhaltenen Reste jüdischer und samaritanischer Geschichtswerke, Hellenistische Studien, vol. 1 and 2 (Breslau: H. Skutsch, 1875), esp. 16–18.

Jewish literature for authors to remain anonymous. We find the phenomenon of orthonymous authorship first in Sirach, and Martin Hengel has emphasized that this is connected with the “discovery of the individuality of the author” in the “Hellenistic period.”<sup>66</sup> (c) Josephus represents an independent type of historiographical literature, which must be evaluated in the context of Hellenistic Roman historiography.

2. Tendencies and Representatives of the Historiography of the Early Imperial Period

2.1. Basic Questions

As we have seen, Greek historiography in the Hellenistic Roman period displays a large number of historiographical conceptions and “an immense volume of production.” This makes it difficult to achieve an overview.<sup>67</sup> In terms of literary history, this leads to a mingling of the historiographical genres. A strict classification of the various types of historiography according to genre-specific elements is virtually impossible. At most, historiography in the Hellenistic-Roman period can be classified according to “trends” and “themes.”<sup>68</sup> In the second century BCE, a political upheaval replaced the hegemony of the Hellenes by the hegemony of the Romans; modern European scholars who thought in classicistic terms once wrote that “The standstill and decline of the productive intellectual powers of the Greek East meant that in this period, Rome overtook the leading role and set the tone in the field of literature too.”<sup>69</sup>

Roman historiography became more important than Greek historiography from the first century BCE onwards. In the Augustan period, the literature related to the Imperium Romanum—especially poetry, but also historiography—was produced in an affirmative or critical

<sup>66</sup> M. Hengel, Die Evangelienüberschriften, SHWPH 1984.3 (Heidelberg: C. Winter, 1984), 25.

<sup>67</sup> K. Meister, “Geschichtsschreibung II. Griechenland,” DNP 4 (1998): 992–996, at 993; idem, Geschichtsschreibung, 80: “There is an immense volume of production, a great diversity of themes, and considerable differences in the manner of presentation.”

<sup>68</sup> Cf. Meister, Geschichtsschreibung, 994.

<sup>69</sup> Pohlenz and Wendland, “Prosa,” 109.

proximity to the princeps (cf., e.g. Livy and Nicholas of Damascus);<sup>70</sup> Augustus promoted it and exercised an ideological influence on it.<sup>71</sup> The autobiographical activity of Augustus himself (the Res Gestae), which was imitated by the subsequent principes,<sup>72</sup> shows clearly that historiographical works were understood to have a programmatic function as mediators of the Augustan ideology, and that they were in fact employed in this way (cf. once again Nicholas). This tie was then loosened temporarily under the Julio-Claudian principes,<sup>73</sup> but it took on renewed intensity anew under the Flavians (69–96 CE), with a conscious reference back to the Augustan age (cf. Quintilian). It is against this background that the historiographical works of Flavius Josephus and Tacitus must be understood. This also explains the increasing significance of biographical literature (cf. Suetonius and C. Nepos), which generated the genre of imperial biographies (Historia Augusta).

A factor of social history also left its mark on the literature of the early Imperial period. At the beginning of this period, the cultural influence of the “Italic dynasties” declined. The “provincialization” of Latin literature meant that literary traditions were “often preserved in a purer form in peripheral regions than in the center, which was very much exposed to innovations.”<sup>74</sup> The literary tendencies of the historiography of the early Imperial period are mentioned by the Roman historians themselves in the transition from the republic to the principate. A high didactic and moral function is attributed to historiography (cf. Livy, Praef. 10), so that history is not only “the remembering of past deeds and charismatic... values which renders these present, but also a ‘lamp of truth’” (cf. Cicero, above).<sup>75</sup> Awareness

---

<sup>70</sup> “The Augustan regime, it seems, did not attempt to dominate historical writing as it did poetry”: G. B. Conte, Latin Literature: A History (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1994), 369.

<sup>71</sup> Cf. Conte, Literature, 251–253. On Augustan literature in general, cf. most recently the essays in Levine and Nelis, Clio & The Poets.

<sup>72</sup> On the commentarii literature of the early Imperial period, cf. J. Wilkes, “Julio-Claudian Historians,” CW 65 (1972): 177–203, at 181–183; R. G. Lewis, “Imperial Autobiography: Augustus to Hadrian,” ANRW II.34.1 (1993): 629–706. On the Hypomnemata/Commentarii of Vespasian and Titus, cf. HRR 2.108 and the references by Josephus, Apion 1.56; Life 342, 358; cf. also Schürer, History, 32–33. On the Hypomnemata of Herod the Great, cf. Josephus, Ant. 15.174, and Schürer, History, 26–27.

<sup>73</sup> Cf. in general Wilkes, “Historians.”

<sup>74</sup> Quotation from von Albrecht, Geschichte, 709.

<sup>75</sup> Harth, “Geschichtsschreibung,” 839.

of the auctoritas of the traditions permitted the historians to achieve the literary and stylistic synthesis of various forms of presentation.<sup>76</sup>

Thematically, the historiographical literature of the early Imperial period is concerned with Roman history; in literary-historical terms, it belongs to the tradition of Hellenistic historiography.<sup>77</sup> A good example of this position in the history of culture and of literature is Nicholas of Damascus.<sup>78</sup> He belongs in linguistic and literary terms to the Greek Hellenistic culture, and the circumstances of his life<sup>79</sup> and the subjects of his historiographical works belong firmly to the beginnings of the Roman Imperial period.<sup>80</sup>

2.2. Historiographical Authors in the Early Imperial Period (first/second century of the Common Era)

Tables (1)–(3) list historiographical authors who worked in the period relevant to the New Testament age, i.e. the early Imperial period, in the Greek Hellenistic, Roman, and early Jewish linguistic and cultural spheres. Those authors are listed who present historical themes in prose form.<sup>81</sup>

---

<sup>76</sup> “The normative view of the exemplary knowledge of tradition, indeed of a value untouched by change (auctoritas), gave the historians (Livy, Sallust, Tacitus) the freedom to combine and make a stylistic synthesis of various forms of presentation, in order to write persuasively: forms drawn from oratory, literature, and dialectics such as narrative, description, argumentation, dramatization, fictitious speech, the narrative of events, commentaries, aphorisms”: Harth, “Geschichtsschreibung,” 839.

<sup>77</sup> With regard to Tacitus, cf. the presentation by D. Flach, Tacitus in der Tradition der antiken Geschichtsschreibung, Hyp. 39 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck und Ruprecht, 1973), 14–16.

<sup>78</sup> In general, cf. R. Laqueur, “Nikolaos,” RE 17 (1937): 362–424.

<sup>79</sup> He is one of the Greek-speaking historians who “themselves worked in Rome” in increasing numbers from the late Republican period onward, “or at any rate were closely connected to the great men of Rome”: A. Dihle, Die griechische und lateinische Literatur der Kaiserzeit: Von Augustus bis Justinian (München: C. H. Beck, 1989), 153.

<sup>80</sup> On this, cf. also M. Kober, Die politischen Anfänge Octavians in der Darstellung des Velleius und dessen Verhältnis zur historiographischen Tradition: Ein philologischer Quellenvergleich. Nikolaus von Damaskus, Appianus von Alexandria, Velleius Paternulus, Epistemata 286 (Würzburg: Königshausen & Neumann, 2000); M. Toher, “The ‘Bios Kaisaros’ of Nicolaus of Damascus: An Historiographical Analysis: (unpublished Ph.O. dissertation. Brown University, 1985).

<sup>81</sup> For secondary literature, cf. n. 1 above.

(1) Historiographical Authors Who Wrote in Greek

1804

EVE-MARIE BECKER

Author	Dates	Historiographical works	Editions	Secondary literature
Strabo of Amaseia <sup>82</sup>	ca. 62 BCE–24 CE	Γεωγραφικά – Historika hypomnemata	– A. Meineke, 1852–1853; S. Radt, 2002–2005. – FGrHist 91	– W. Aly, Strabonis Geographica . Vol. 4, 1957. – Lendle, Einführung , 237–238.
Hypsistrates <sup>83</sup>	1st cent. BCE (?)	Fragments of an historical work	FGrHist 190	K. Meister, DNP 5 (1998), 821.
Teucros of Cyzigus <sup>84</sup>	1st cent. BCE	Inter alia Jewish History	FGrHist 274	K. Meister, DNP 12.1 (2002), 205.
Timagenes of Alexandria <sup>85</sup>	1st cent. BCE (?)	Περὶ βασιλείων	FGrHist 88	K. Meister, DNP 12.1 (2002), 573.
Gaius Iulius Iuba <sup>86</sup>	25 BCE–23 CE	– Homoioietes – Rhomaïke archaiologia	– FGrHist 275 – FGrHist 275	F. Jacoby, RE 9.2 (1916), 2384–2395.
Nicholas of Damascus <sup>87</sup>	* ca. 64 BCE	Ἱστορίαι – Vita des Augustus	– FGrHist 90 – FGrHist 90	– Lendle, Einführung , 244–246. – M. Toher, The 'Bios Kaisaros'
Plutarch <sup>88</sup>	ca. 45–120 CE	Βίοι	K. Ziegler et al., 1914–1932/ 1993–2005 (new ed.)	A. Dihle, Studien zur griechischen Biographie , 2nd ed. 1970.
Arrian of Nicomedia <sup>89</sup>	85/90–after 145/ 146 CE	– Ἀλεξάνδρου ἀνάβασις – Ἰνδική – Περὶ πλοῦς Εὐξείνου πόντου	A.G. Roos and G. Wirth, 1907–1928/ 2nd ed. 1967–1968.	– A. B. Bosworth, From Arrian to Alexander , 1988. – E. Schwartz, RE 2.1 (1896), 1230–1247. – P. A. Stadler, Arrian of Nicomedia , 1980.
Appian of Alexandria <sup>90</sup>	before 100–after 160 CE	Ρωμαϊκή	e.g. B. P. Viereck et al., 1962.	K. Brodersen, ANRW II.34.1 (1993), 339–363.
Pausanias <sup>91</sup>	ca. 130–180 CE	Περὶ ἡγήσις τῆς Ἑλλάδος	M. H. Rocha-Pereira, 1973–1981/ 2nd ed. 1989–1990.	C. Habicht, Pausanias und seine Beschreibung Griechenlands , 1985.

<sup>82</sup> Cf. M. Landfester, ed., Geschichte, 566f.; Nickel, Lexikon, 439.<sup>83</sup> Cf. Schürer, History, 24.<sup>84</sup> Cf. ibid., 40.<sup>85</sup> Cf. ibid., 22–23. It is however virtually impossible today to identify another historian mentioned by Schürer, History, 27–28—Ptolemy—cf. A. Dihle, art. “Ptolemaios von Askalon,” RE 23.2 (1959): 1863; S. Matthaos, “Ptolemaios aus Askalon,” DNP 10 (2001): 558.<sup>86</sup> Cf. Nickel, Lexikon, 442; 787.<sup>87</sup> Cf. ibid., 431–432; 858.<sup>88</sup> Cf. Landfester, Geschichte, 489–493.<sup>89</sup> Cf. ibid., 80–83.<sup>90</sup> Cf. ibid., 56–58.<sup>91</sup> Cf. ibid., 444–445.

(2) Historiographical Authors Who Wrote in Latin

Author	Dates	Historiographical works	Editions	Secondary literature
Livy <sup>92</sup>	59 BCE–17 CE	Ab urbe condita libri	R. S. Conway and W. F. Walters (Books 1–30); A. H. MacDonald (Books 31–35); P. G. Walsh (Books 36–40), 2nd ed. 1967; 1965; 1999.	von Albrecht, Geschichte , 659–686; E. Burck, Das Geschichtswerk des T. Livius , 1992.
Q. Dellius <sup>93</sup>	1st cent. BCE (?)	History of the Parthian Campaign	HRR 2.53	M. Strothmann, DNP 3 (1997), 393.
Augustus <sup>94</sup>	31 BCE–14 CE	Res gestae Divi Augusti	H. Volkman, 1969.	von Albrecht, Geschichte , 511–524.
Pompeius Trogus <sup>95</sup>	1st cent. BCE (?)	Historiarum Philippicarum libri XLIV	O. Seel, 2nd ed. 1972.	von Albrecht, Geschichte , 686–689; O. Seel, ANRW II 30.2 (1982), 1363–1423.
Asinius Pollio <sup>96</sup>	1st cent. BCE (?)	Historiae	HRR 2.67–70 (H. Peter)	von Albrecht, Geschichte , 655–658; G. Zecchini, ANRW II 30.2 (1982), 1265–1296.
Cremutius Cordus <sup>97</sup>	† 25 CE	Annales	HRR 2.87–90 (H. Peter)	M. Fuhrmann, DkP 1, 1333–1334.
Gaius (?) Velleius Paterculus <sup>98</sup>	20/19 BCE–after 30 CE	Historia Romana	W. S. Watt, 2nd ed. 1998.	von Albrecht, Geschichte , 841–845.

<sup>92</sup> Cf. Landfester, Geschichte, 362–365.

<sup>93</sup> Cf. Schürer, History, 24–25. It is virtually impossible today to identify another historian mentioned by Schürer, History, 27–28—Antonius Julianus—cf. also HRR 2.108–109.

<sup>94</sup> Cf. Nickel, Lexikon, 566. On the Hypomnemata/commentarii des Vespasian und Titus, cf. HRR 2:108 and n. 72 above.

<sup>95</sup> Cf. Nickel, Lexikon, 437.

<sup>96</sup> Ibid., 424.

<sup>97</sup> Ibid., 57.

<sup>98</sup> Cf. Landfester, Geschichte, 632–634.

Table (2) (cont.)

Author	Dates	Historiographical works	Editions	Secondary literature
Valerius Maximus <sup>99</sup>	1st cent. CE	Facta et dicta memorabilia	J. Briscoe, 1998.	von Albrecht, Geschichte , 852–859; G. Maslakov, ANRW II 32.1 (1984), 437–496.
Curtius Rufus <sup>100</sup>	1st cent. CE	Historiae Alexandri Magni regis Macedonum	E. Hedicke, <sup>2</sup> 1931.	von Albrecht, Geschichte , 859–869; W. Rutz, ANRW II 32.4 (1986), 2329–2357.
Pomponius Mela <sup>101</sup>	Mid-1st cent. CE	De chorographia libri III	A. Silberman, 1988.	von Albrecht, Geschichte , 984; F. Lasserre, DkP 4 , 1039–1040.
Pliny the Elder <sup>102</sup>	23/24 CE–79 CE	Bellorum Germaniae libri XX	Lost	von Albrecht, Geschichte , 1003–1011.
P. Cornelius Tacitus <sup>103</sup>	55–120 CE	– de vita et moribus Iulii Agricolae – de origine et situ Germanorum – Historiae – Annales	– J. Delz, 1983 – A. Ötnerfors, 1983 – K. Wellesley, 1986 – H. Heubner, 1978; 2nd ed. 1994.	von Albrecht, Geschichte , 869–908.
Gaius Suetonius Tranquillus <sup>104</sup>	ca. 70–140 CE	– de viris illustribus – de vita Caesarum	– R. A. Kaster, 1995 – M. Ihm, 1908, 1993 (reprint).	von Albrecht, Geschichte , 1104–1119; K. R. Bradley, ANRW II 33.5 (1991), 3701–3732.

<sup>99</sup> Cf. Landfester, Geschichte, 625–626.<sup>100</sup> Cf. ibid., 190–191.<sup>101</sup> Cf. Nickel, Lexikon, 197.<sup>102</sup> Cf. Landfester, Geschichte, 480–483.<sup>103</sup> Cf. ibid., 573–577.<sup>104</sup> Cf. ibid., 568–570.<sup>105</sup> Cf. ibid., 247–248.

(3) Historiographical Writers in So-Called Early Judaism (Greek-Speaking)

Author	Dates	Historiographical works	Editions	Secondary Literature
Philo of Alexandria <sup>106</sup>	ca. 15 BCE–50 CE	– In Flaccum – Legatio ad Gaium	L. Cohn et al., 1896–1915, 1962 (reprint).	W. Haase (ed.), ANRW II 21.1. (1984).
Justus of Tiberias <sup>107</sup>	1st cent. CE	– Ἰουδαίων βασίλεις οἱ ἐν τοῖς στέμμασιν – Ἰουδαϊκὸς πόλεμος	C. R. Holladay, Fragments , 382–387.	Schiirer, History , 34–37; T. Rajak, “ Josephus and Justus of Tiberias ” in idem , The Jewish Dialogue with Greece and Rome , 2001, 177–193.
Flavius Iosephus <sup>108</sup>	37/38–ca. 100 CE	– antiquitates Judaicae – de bello Iudaico	B. Niese, 1885–1895, 1955 (reprint).	P. Bilde, Flavius Iosephus Between Jerusalem and Rome , 1988.

<sup>106</sup> Cf. Landfester, Geschichte, 456–459.

<sup>107</sup> Cf. Holladay, Fragments, 371–381.

<sup>108</sup> Cf. Landfester, Geschichte, 328–330.

This means that this overview has the following boundaries. Authors such as Diodorus Siculus (Βιβλιοθήκη ἱστορική)<sup>109</sup> or Dionysius of Halicarnassus (e.g., Ῥωμαϊκὴ ἀρχαιολογία)<sup>110</sup> are not mentioned in the following tables, because the dates of their lives do not belong clearly to the transition to the first century of the Common Era (Diodorus: first century CE; Dionysius: ca. 60 BCE–after 7 CE). Authors such as Ovid (43 BCE–17 CE)<sup>111</sup> or the Alexandrian Dionysius Periegetes (first half of the second century CE)<sup>112</sup> are not included, because the works they wrote on historical themes are not composed in prose: the Fasti of Ovid is in elegiac distiches, and the Periegesis of Dionysius is in hexameters.

3. Early Christian Literature in the Framework of Ancient Historiography

3.1. Basic Questions

The Greek Hellenistic, Jewish Hellenistic, and Roman historiographies of the Hellenistic Roman period display distinctive characteristics not only in their language, but also in their ideas and choice of subjects. In its very origins, historiography is closely linked to culture and context. This also applies to the social status of the historian.<sup>113</sup> In the Hellenistic-Roman period, however, processes of assimilation begin.<sup>114</sup>

<sup>109</sup> Cf. Landfester, Geschichte, 201; Lendle, Einführung, 242–244.

<sup>110</sup> Cf. Landfester, Geschichte, 215–216; Lendle, Einführung, 239–241.

<sup>111</sup> Cf. Cf. Landfester, Geschichte, 424–425; Gall, Literatur, 151–153.

<sup>112</sup> Cf. Cf. Landfester, Geschichte, 213.

<sup>113</sup> For an exemplary study of the question of the social status of Josephus, cf. G. W. Bowersock, “Foreign Elites at Rome,” in Flavius Josephus and Flavian Rome, ed. J. Edmondson et al. (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005), 53–62. A wide field for sociological research opens up here, as H. Schneider has shown: “At present, the modern social history of classical antiquity displays a rich variety of themes... the level of education, e.g. the ability to write and read, and status symbols... are the object of a research which moves between the disciplines and is able to draw on the questions and methodologies of the modern social sciences”: “Sozial- und Wirtschaftsgeschichte,” DNP 15.3 (2003): 83–92, at 90.

<sup>114</sup> For the early Jewish area, following on the studies by V. Tcherikover (e.g. Hellenistic Civilization and the Jews [Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1959]), cf. the standard works, e.g. M. Hengel, “The Interpenetration of Judaism and Hellenism in the pre-Maccabean Period,” in The Cambridge History of Judaism 2, ed. W. D. Davies and L. Finkelstein (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989), 167–228; E. S. Gruen, Diaspora: Jews amidst Greeks and Romans (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2002).

The three cultural spheres—Greek, Roman, and Jewish—which were initially rather independent of each other came into contact and mingled. This cultural exchange and transfer took place in specific political constellations, first in the Hellenistic Macedonian hegemony, then in the period of the successor kings, and then in the imperial expansion of the Romans. This can be illustrated by some well-known examples:

- Diaspora Judaism speaks and writes Greek;
- the development of Roman literature finds its orientation in earlier Greek Hellenistic works;
- the Hellenistic historian Polybius discovers the significance of Roman history for the eastern Mediterranean region;
- the Greek Hellenistic compiler Alexander Polyhistor devotes his energies to the collection of Jewish historiographical works.

These processes of assimilation reach their peak thanks to the geographical expansion of the Roman empire under Augustus and to the consolidation of the political, military, and institutional structures in the early Imperial period. In this period, the shared elements of culture become important, and one can say that a new type of culture emerges, as can be seen (to a limited extent) in the Jewish Hellenistic literature of the first century CE. Here, we think first of all of Josephus,<sup>115</sup> but also of some writings by Philo of Alexandria which have at least a partly historiographical character (e.g. the Legatio ad Gaium and In Flaccum).<sup>116</sup> It is interesting to see that the Jewish Hellenistic literature shares the common Hellenistic syntheses especially in the field of historiography.

---

<sup>115</sup> For a structural comparison between historiographical elements in Josephus and in the Gospel of Mark, cf. Becker, Markus-Evangelium, 301–303. Only a few structural comparisons with regard to the literary-historical aspects in the historiographical writings of Josephus will be found in C. Böttrich and J. Herzer, eds., Josephus und das Neue Testament: Wechselseitige Wahrnehmungen, WUNT 209 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2007); cf. the essay by M. Vogel, “Geschichtsschreibung nach den Regeln von Lob und Tadel. Sterbeszenen bei Josephus und im Neuen Testament,” in Josephus, ed. Böttrich and Herzer, 535–546. On the essence and function of historiography in general, cf. D. E. Aune, “Historiography,” in idem, The Westminster Dictionary of New Testament & Early Christian Literature & Rhetoric (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 2003), 215–218.

<sup>116</sup> Cf. Table (3). On this, cf. also P. W. van der Horst, “Philo’s In Flaccum and the Book of Acts,” in idem, Jews and Christians in Their Graeco-Roman Context: Selected Essays on Early Judaism, Samaritanism, Hellenism, and Christianity, WUNT 196, (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006), 98–107; and in general, cf. also Schürer, History, 859–864.

The genesis of the earliest Christian texts coincides with this situation, which is determined politically by the conditions of the early Imperial period and in terms of cultural and literary history by the assimilation processes of the Hellenistic-Roman period. In what follows, I concentrate on the texts in the New Testament, and then refer only briefly (see section e) to extra-canonical texts (the so-called Apostolic Fathers, apocrypha, etc.) which are related to historiography and were written at roughly the same time as the New Testament texts.

3.2. The Gospels as Historiographical Literature—Example: The Gospel of Mark

From Gotthold E. Lessing onwards, the gospel literature, especially the synoptic gospels, have been read as history-oriented accounts of the life and work of Jesus of Nazareth.<sup>117</sup> Modern gospel research<sup>118</sup> also sees close links between the gospels and biographical literature: the gospels take up elements which are known from the official prophetic biography of the Old Testament (cf. Helmut Koester),<sup>119</sup> and their genre is comparable to that of the pagan biographies of classical antiquity (cf. Detlev Dormeyer).<sup>120</sup> The identification of a structural closeness between the gospels and biographical literature means that they belong to the genre of historiography in the broader sense (cf. also Richard A. Burridge).<sup>121</sup> Adela Yarbro Collins agrees in this basic classification of the gospels as historiographical literature, and has recently <sup>117</sup> Cf. G. E. Lessing, "Theses aus der Kirchengeschichte," in idem, Werke und Briefe in zwölf Bänden, 8: Werke 1774–1778, ed. A. Schilson (Frankfurt: Deutscher Klassiker Verlag, 1989), 619–627; idem, Neue Hypothese über die Evangelisten als bloß menschliche Geschichtsschreiber betrachtet, Wolfenbüttel 1778, in Werke und Briefe, 8:629–654.

<sup>118</sup> For an overview of research, cf. D. Dormeyer, Das Markus-Evangelium (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 2005), esp. 112–137; Becker, Markus-Evangelium, 37–29.

<sup>119</sup> Cf. H. Koester, "Überlieferung und Geschichte der frühchristlichen Evangelienliteratur," ANRW II 52.2 (1984): 1463–1542; idem, "Evangelium II. Gattung," RGG 4th ed., 2 (1999): 1735–1741.

<sup>120</sup> Cf. D. Dormeyer and H. Frankemölle, "Evangelium als literarische Gattung und als theologischer Begriff: Tendenzen und Aufgaben der Evangelienforschung im 20. Jahrhundert, mit einer Untersuchung des Markusevangeliums in seinem Verhältnis zur antiken Biographie," ANRW II 25.2 (1984): 1543–1704; Dormeyer, Markusevangelium, 1666–1668.

<sup>121</sup> Cf. e.g. H. Cancik, "Die Gattung Evangelium: Markus im Rahmen der antiken Historiographie," in idem, Markus-Philologie: Historische, literargeschichtliche und stilistische Untersuchungen zum zweiten Evangelium, WUNT 33 (Tübingen: Mohr [Paul Siebeck], 1984), 85–113; R. A. Burridge, What are the Gospels? A Comparison with

described the Gospel of Mark more precisely as an historical monograph with eschatological tendencies.<sup>122</sup> The literary-historical perspective which reads the gospel writings in the context of ancient historiography concentrates especially on the Gospel of Luke (see below); recently, the Gospel of John too has been read in this light (Richard Bauckham).<sup>123</sup>

The discussion of the historiographical character of the Gospel of Mark can be illustrated by a recent approach (2006): I agree that Mark should be classified under historiographical literature in the broader sense.<sup>124</sup> Unlike the approaches mentioned above, my approach demarcates the Gospel of Mark vis-à-vis biographical literature by highlighting its (sub-)historiographical character, which I describe as follows. First, on the basis of Mark 1:1, the theme of the Gospel of Mark is seen as an event-historical monographic narrative of the beginning of the gospel.<sup>125</sup> Secondly, the focus on the figure of Jesus is not primarily evaluated against the background of ancient biographies; it is seen as a person-centered presentational element which is known from Jewish Hellenistic historiography (Artapanus).<sup>126</sup> Thirdly, the way in which the Gospel of Mark employs its sources and the interpretation of the historical narrative makes it comparable to works of ancient historiography (e.g. Polybius and Sallust).<sup>127</sup> In particular, the integration of the passion narrative (Mark 14–16), which to begin with has clear biographical traits when compared to the ancient exitus literature,<sup>128</sup> into the total structure of the gospel presentation should be understood as a tendency to emphasize historiographical structures and to reduce

---

Graeco-Roman Biography, SNTSMS 70 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992).

<sup>122</sup> Cf. A. Yarbro Collins, Mark: A Commentary, Hermeneia (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2007), 42: "Mark as an Eschatological Historical Monograph"; idem, "Markusevangelium," RGG 4th ed., 5 (2002): 842–846.

<sup>123</sup> Cf. R. Bauckham, "Historiographical Characteristics of the Gospel of John," NTS 53 (2007): 17–36.

<sup>124</sup> Cf. Becker, Markus-Evangelium; idem, "The Gospel of Mark in the Context of Ancient Historiography," in The Function of Ancient Historiography in Biblical and Cognate Studies, ed. P. G. Kirkpatrick and T. Goltz (New York: T & T Clark, 2008), 124–134.

<sup>125</sup> Cf. Becker, Markus-Evangelium, 102–104.

<sup>126</sup> Cf. ibid., 178–180.

<sup>127</sup> Cf. ibid., 149–151; 213–215.

<sup>128</sup> Cf. e.g. U. Eigler, "Exitus illustrium virorum," DNP 4 (1998): 344–345; F. A. Marx, "Tacitus und die Literatur der exitus illustrium virorum," Phil 92 (1937): 83–103; A. Ronconi, "Exitus illustrium virorum," RAC 6 (1966): 1258–1268.

biographical narrative traits (cf. also Tacitus, Ann. 15.60–62).<sup>129</sup> This means that the Gospel of Mark is a sub-historiographical writing and forms a genre sui generis in the field of Hellenistic historiography in the broader sense.

3.3. The Lukan Writings as Historiographical Literature

The so-called Lukan double work has a special position in historiographical research. Here, Martin Dibelius<sup>130</sup> and Ernst Haenchen,<sup>131</sup> and most recently the studies by Eckhard Plümacher,<sup>132</sup> have interpreted the author Luke, especially in the Acts of the Apostles, as an historian.<sup>133</sup> In this context, the comparison with Hellenistic-Roman historiography has led scholars to make a detailed identification of historiographical narrative and stylistic elements (e.g. the motifs of miracles<sup>134</sup> and the topos of the praefationes).<sup>135</sup> Besides this, the following formal elements are “decisive” for the classification of the Acts

<sup>129</sup> Cf. Becker, Markus-Evangelium, 362–364.

<sup>130</sup> Cf. e.g. M. Dibelius, “Die Reden der Apostelgeschichte und die antike Geschichtsschreibung” (1949), in idem, Aufsätze zur Apostelgeschichte, ed. H. Greeven, 5th ed. FRLANT 42 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1968), 120–162.

<sup>131</sup> Cf. E. Haenchen, Die Apostelgeschichte, 6th ed. KEK 3 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1968), 81–83.

<sup>132</sup> Cf. E. Plümacher, “Lukas als griechischer Historiker,” RE.S 14 (1974): 235–264; idem, “Geschichtsschreibung IV. Biblisch 2. Neues Testament,” RGG 3rd ed. (2000): 808. Cf. also various essays in idem, Geschichte und Geschichten: Aufsätze zur Apostelgeschichte und zu den Johannesakten, ed. J. Schröter and R. Brucker, WUNT 170 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2004). Cf. most recently also idem, “Hellenistische Geschichtsschreibung im Neuen Testament. Die Apostelgeschichte,” in Geschichte und Vergangenheit. Rekonstruktion, Deutung, Fiktion, ed. U. H. J. Körtner (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 2007), 115–127.

<sup>133</sup> Cf. also D. E. Aune, The New Testament in Its Literary Environment (Cambridge: Westminster Press, 1987), 77–79; D. Dormeyer, Das Neue Testament im Rahmen der antiken Literaturgeschichte. Eine Einführung (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1993), 228–230; J. Schröter, “Lukas als Historiograph. Das lukanische Doppelwerk und die Entdeckung der christlichen Heilsgeschichte,” in Die antike Historiographie und die Anfänge der frühchristlichen Geschichtsschreibung, ed. Becker, 237–262.

<sup>134</sup> Cf. e.g. E. Plümacher, “Τερατεία: Fiktion und Wunder in der hellenistisch-römischen Geschichtsschreibung und in der Apostelgeschichte,” in idem, Geschichte und Geschichten, ed. Schröter and Brucker, 33–83.

<sup>135</sup> Cf. L. C. A. Alexander, “The Preface to Acts and the Historians,” in History, Literature and Society in the Book of Acts, ed. B. Witherington (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996), 73–103; D. E. Aune, “Preface,” in idem, The Westminster Dictionary of New Testament & Early Christian Literature & Rhetoric, 367–372, esp. at 369–371.

of the Apostles under historiographical literature: “a foreword, synchronization, speeches, and letters.”<sup>136</sup> In the case of the Gospel of Luke, the closeness of the author and his work to Hellenistic-Roman historiography is much discussed,<sup>137</sup> especially by Anglo-American exegetes.<sup>138</sup> In this context, the praefatio or prooemium at Luke 1:1–4 is significant, since it recalls the topos of ancient historiographers (cf. also Josephus, War 1.1–30).<sup>139</sup> We also find other individual narrative and compositional historiographical elements in the Gospel of Luke, e.g. the synchronisms in Luke 2:1 and 3:1, the speeches (Luke 6:20–22; 21:7–9), or the itinerary/περίπλους (Luke 9:51–53).<sup>140</sup>

3.4. Texts and Forms in the New Testament Literature Related to the Historiographical Genre

We now present texts and forms which display two characteristics that were described above as typical of historiography in the broader sense: these are texts written in prose, which are concerned with the interpretation of history. Unlike the gospel literature and the Acts of the Apostles, however, these are mostly shorter individual texts which are a part of a larger writing that cannot be classified under the macro-genre of historiography, because of its own specific characteristics. Such texts belong rather to the genre of letter or apocalypse.

<sup>136</sup> J. Jervell, Die Apostelgeschichte, KEK 3 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1998), 77. Jervell classifies Acts more precisely as “tragic historiography” (78).

<sup>137</sup> However, this question is not raised in the two most recent German commentaries on the Gospel of Luke, when they discuss the genre of the Gospel: cf. H. Klein, Das Lukasevangelium, KEK I.3 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2006); M. Wolter, Das Lukasevangelium, HNT 5 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2008).

<sup>138</sup> Cf. e.g. J. Fitzmyer, The Gospel According to Luke I–IX, AB 28 (New York: Doubleday, 1981), 171–173; F. Bovon, Das Evangelium nach Lukas. 1. Teilband (Lk 1,1–9,50), EKK III.1 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1989), 18–19; J. B. Green, The Gospel of Luke, NICNT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997), 1–6. Cf. also Aune, New Testament, 80–82.

<sup>139</sup> Cf. Fitzmyer, Gospel, 287–289; Green, Gospel, 33–35; and most recently Wolter, Lukasevangelium, 57–61. On research into the Lukan prologue, cf. in general L. Alexander, The Preface to Luke’s Gospel: Literary Convention and Social Context in Luke 1.1–4 and Acts 1.1 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993).

<sup>140</sup> Cf. most recently Wolter, Lukasevangelium, 364–366.

1. Autobiographical passages in Paul

To the extent that autobiographical narrationes have an historiographical tendency (cf. my remarks above on the hupomnēmata/commentarii), some passages in the Pauline letters come close in their intention to historiography.<sup>141</sup> Here, Galatians 1–2 and 2 Corinthians 11–12 are particularly relevant. The themes which Paul treats autobiographically vary between an account of his previous missionary activity (1 Thess 1; 3; 1 Cor 2–3) and a reflection on his own person in the light of his vocation (e.g., 1 Cor 15:3–5) and his apostolate or apostolic mode of life (e.g. 1 Cor 9).<sup>142</sup>

2. Prophecy, apocalyptic, and the interpretation of history

Prophetic and apocalyptic texts also come under the heading of historiographical literature, where they formulate a look back on history and/or eschatological scenarios which are the outcome of the perception and interpretation of historical events and experiences. This has prompted Georges Minois to see an historical and historiographical dimension in oracles and prophecies.<sup>143</sup> In the New Testament literature,<sup>144</sup> the most prominent apocalyptic texts are Mark 13 parr. and the Apocalypse of John.<sup>145</sup> These have the function of interpreting and coping with history. In the literature of the so-called Apostolic Fathers, the concluding chapter of the Didache (16) can be called an apocalyptic text.<sup>146</sup>

<sup>141</sup> On this, cf. E.-M. Becker, "Autobiographisches bei Paulus: Aspekte und Aufgaben," in Biographie und Persönlichkeit des Paulus, ed. E. M. Becker and P. Pilhofer, WUNT 187 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2005), 67–87, esp. 73–75; O. Wischmeyer, "Paulus als Ich-Erzähler: Ein Beitrag zu seiner Person, seiner Biographie und seiner Theologie," in Biographie, ed. Becker and Pilhofer, 88–105.

<sup>142</sup> On this overview, cf. Becker, "Autobiographisches," 82–83.

<sup>143</sup> Cf. G. Minois, Geschichte der Zukunft: Orakel, Prophezeiungen, Utopien, Prognosen (Düsseldorf and Zurich: Artemis and Winkler, 1998).

<sup>144</sup> On this, cf. P. Vielhauer and G. Strecker, "Einleitung," in Schneemelcher, Apokryphen 2, 491–515, esp. at 495–497.

<sup>145</sup> Cf. Vielhauer and G. Strecker, "Einleitung," 525–527. On the special question of the historical/temporal dimensions of the Apocalypse of John, cf. D. E. Aune, Revelation 1–5, WBC 52A (Dallas: Word Books, 1997), lxxxiv–lxxxv.

<sup>146</sup> Cf. Vielhauer and Strecker, "Einleitung," 535–537.

3.5. Texts and Forms in the New Testament Apocrypha Related to the Historiographical Genre

In conclusion, I mention the texts and writings from the field of the so-called New Testament apocrypha which are related to the historiographical genre and may have been composed in the New Testament period as this was defined above, i.e. no later than the mid-second century. Once again, these are prose texts which are concerned with the interpretation of history. These texts must be distinguished from others such as the Coptic Gospel of Thomas<sup>147</sup> and the Gospel of Philip,<sup>148</sup> which belong to the literary genre of the collection of logia or florilegium, from the Shepherd of Hermas, which is a parenetic text,<sup>149</sup> and from so-called revelation dialogues such as the Book of Thomas.<sup>150</sup> The overview in Table (4) attempts to classify the relevant texts and writings under the three literary forms and genres (gospel, Acts-literature, related forms/apocalypses) which we already find in the New Testament literature. This also brings to light literary-historical continuities and developments between New Testament literature and Christian literature outside the New Testament, and shows their closeness to the historiographical macro-genre.<sup>151</sup>

---

<sup>147</sup> Cf. B. Blatz, "Das koptische Thomasevangelium," in Schneemelcher, Apokryphen 1, esp. 93–97.

<sup>148</sup> Cf. H.-M. Schenke, "Das Evangelium nach Philippus," in Schneemelcher, Apokryphen 1, esp. 148–154.

<sup>149</sup> Cf. Vielhauer and Strecker, "Einleitung", 537–547; Moreschini and Norelli, Literature, 160–165.

<sup>150</sup> Cf. H.-M. Schenke, "Das Buch des Thomas," in Schneemelcher, Apokryphen 1, esp. 192–198.

<sup>151</sup> This article is dedicated to Wolfgang Wischmeyer, Vienna, on the occasion of his 65th birthday (5 October 2009).

(4.a) Historiographical Texts in Extra-Canonical Early Christian Literature (up to ca. mid-2nd century)<sup>151</sup>

Gospel literature	Acts literature <sup>152</sup>	Related forms: Apocalypses
Jewish Christian Gospels : <sup>153</sup>
- Gospels of the Nazaraeas	Acts of Andrew <sup>154</sup>	Ascensio Jesaiae <sup>155</sup>
- Gospel of the Ebionites
- Gospel of the Hebrews
Gospel of the Egyptians <sup>156</sup>	Acts of Thomas <sup>157</sup>	Apocalypse of Peter <sup>158</sup>
Gospel of Peter <sup>159</sup>	Pseudo-Clementines <sup>160</sup>
So-called Infancy Gospels , <sup>161</sup> e.g.:
Protevangelium of James <sup>162</sup>
Gospel of Bartholomew <sup>163</sup>
Acts of Pilate/Gospel of Nicodemus <sup>164</sup>
Gospel of Gamaliel <sup>165</sup>

<sup>151</sup> On this, cf. in general, where no other works are mentioned: Schneemelcher, Apokryphen 1 and 2; Moreschini and Norelli, Literature. For further secondary literature, cf. the individual articles in S. Döpp and W. Geerlings, eds., Lexikon der antiken christlichen Literatur, 3rd ed. (Freiburg: Herder, 2002). The great difficulties in dating this literature are well known; most of these texts are “flowing texts.” Since scholars often propose dates earlier than the mid-second century, however, they are included in this table.

<sup>152</sup> Cf. the general introduction in Moreschini and Norelli, Literature, 153–157.

<sup>153</sup> Cf. P. Vielhauer and G. Strecker, “Judenchristliche Evangelien,” in Schneemelcher, Apokryphen 1, 114–147; Moreschini and Norelli, Literature, 56–63.

<sup>154</sup> Cf. J.-M. Prieur and W. Schneemelcher, “Andreasakten,” in Schneemelcher, Apokryphen 2, 93–137.

<sup>155</sup> Cf. C. D. G. Müller, “Die Himmelfahrt des Jesaja,” in Schneemelcher, Apokryphen 2, 547–562; Moreschini and Norelli, Literature, 93–97.

<sup>156</sup> Cf. W. Schneemelcher, “Ägypterevangelium,” in idem, Apokryphen 1, 174–179; Moreschini and Norelli, Literature, 63–64.

<sup>157</sup> Cf. K. Schäferdiek and R. ó h Uiginn, “Johannesakten,” in Schneemelcher, Apokryphen 2, 138–193.

<sup>158</sup> Cf. C. D. G. Müller, “Die Himmelfahrt des Jesaja,” in Schneemelcher, Apokryphen 2, 562–578; Moreschini and Norelli, Literature, 97–100.

<sup>159</sup> Cf. C. Maurer and W. Schneemelcher, in Schneemelcher, Apokryphen 1, 180–188; Moreschini and Norelli, Literature, 71–74.

<sup>160</sup> Cf. J. Irmscher and G. Strecker, “Die Pseudoklementinen,” in Schneemelcher, Apokryphen 2, 439–488; Moreschini and Norelli, Literature, 148–153.

<sup>161</sup> Cf. O. Cullmann, “Kindheitsevangelien,” in Schneemelcher, Apokryphen 1, 330–372; Moreschini and Norelli, Literature, 148–153.

<sup>162</sup> Cf. O. Cullmann, “Kindheitsevangelien,” in Schneemelcher, Apokryphen 1, 330–372, esp. 334–338.

<sup>163</sup> Cf. F. Scheidweiler and W. Schneemelcher, “Bartholomäusevangelium,” Schneemelcher, Apokryphen 1, 424–440.

<sup>164</sup> Cf. F. Scheidweiler, “Nikodemusevangelium. Pilatusakten und Höllenfahrt Christi,” in Schneemelcher, Apokryphen 1, 395–424.

<sup>165</sup> Cf. M.-A. van den Oudenrijn, “Das Evangelium des Gamaliel,” in Schneemelcher, Apokryphen, 441–442.

<sup>166</sup> Cf. M. Dürst, “Hegesipp,” in S. Döpp and W. Geerlings, eds., Lexikon der antiken christlichen Literatur 1, 315.

(4.b) Others

Author	Dates	Historiographical works	Editions	Secondary Literature
Hegesipp <sup>166</sup>	2nd century CE	Hypomnemata	T. Zahn, Forschungen zur Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanons 6, 1900, 70–113. 228–249; E. Preuschen, Antilegomena , <sup>2</sup> 1905, 107–113; 210–216.	N. Hyldahl, StTh 14 (1960), 70–113.

Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus

Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus

Volume 3

The Historical Jesus

Edited by

Tom Holmén and Stanley E. Porter

BRILL

LEIDEN • BOSTON
2011

This book is printed on acid-free paper.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Handbook for the study of the historical Jesus / edited by Tom Holmén and Stanley E. Porter.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and indexes.

ISBN 978-90-04-16372-0 (hardback : alk. paper) 1. Jesus Christ—Historicity—
Study and teaching. I. Holmén, Tom. II. Porter, Stanley E., 1956–
BT303.2.H364 2010
232.9'08071—dc22

2010038765

ISBN Vol. 1: 978 90 04 17091 9

Vol. 2: 978 90 04 17092 6

Vol. 3: 978 90 04 17093 3

Vol. 4: 978 90 04 17094 0

Set: 978 90 04 16372 0

Copyright 2011 by Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, The Netherlands.
Koninklijke Brill NV incorporates the imprints Brill, Hotei Publishing, IDC Publishers, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers and VSP.

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, translated, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without prior written permission from the publisher.

Authorization to photocopy items for internal or personal use is granted by Koninklijke Brill NV provided that the appropriate fees are paid directly to The Copyright Clearance Center, 222 Rosewood Drive, Suite 910, Danvers, MA 01923, USA.
Fees are subject to change.

PRINTED IN THE NETHERLANDS

CONTENTS

VOLUME 1

HOW TO STUDY THE HISTORICAL JESUS

Introduction: The Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus in Perspective .....	xv
TOM HOLMÉN AND STANLEY E. PORTER

PART ONE

CONTEMPORARY METHODOLOGICAL APPROACHES

How to Marginalize the Traditional Criteria of Authenticity .....	3
DALE C. ALLISON, JR.
Fourth Quest? What Did Jesus Really Want? .....	31
ERNST BAASLAND
The Search for Jesus' Special Profile .....	57
JÜRGEN BECKER
The Historical Jesus: How to Ask Questions and Remain Inquisitive .....	91
JAMES H. CHARLESWORTH
Method in a Critical Study of Jesus .....	129
BRUCE D. CHILTON
Context and Text in Historical Jesus Methodology .....	159
JOHN DOMINIC CROSSAN
Remembering Jesus: How the Quest of the Historical Jesus Lost its Way .....	183
JAMES D. G. DUNN
Jesus-in-Context: A Relational Approach .....	207
RICHARD A. HORSLEY
Sources, Methods and Discursive Locations in the Quest of the Historical Jesus .....	241
JOHN S. KLOPPENBORG
Basic Methodology in the Quest for the Historical Jesus .....	291
JOHN P. MEIER

Jesus Research as Feedback on His Wirkungsgeschichte .....	333
PETR POKORNÝ
The Role of Greek Language Criteria in Historical Jesus Research .....	361
STANLEY E. PORTER
From the Messianic Teacher to the Gospels of Jesus Christ .....	405
RAINER RIESNER
The Gospel of the Historical Jesus .....	447
JAMES M. ROBINSON
Scholarly Rigor and Intuition in Historical Research into Jesus .....	475
JACQUES SCHLOSSER
Critical Feminist Historical-Jesus Research .....	509
ELISABETH SCHÜSSLER FIORENZA
Historical Scepticism and the Criteria of Jesus Research: My Attempt to Leap Over Lessing's Ugly Wide Ditch .....	549
GERD THEISSEN
A Metalanguage for the Historical Jesus Methods: An Experiment .....	589
TOM HOLMÉN

PART TWO

VARIOUS ASPECTS OF HISTORICAL
JESUS METHODOLOGY

With the Grain and against the Grain: A Strategy for Reading the Synoptic Gospels .....	619
COLIN BROWN
Form Criticism and Jesus Research .....	649
ARLAND J. HULTGREN
Tradition Criticism and Jesus Research .....	673
GRANT R. OSBORNE
The Criteria of Authenticity .....	695
STANLEY E. PORTER
Alternatives to Form and Tradition Criticism in Jesus Research .....	715
TOBIAS NICKLAS
Social-Scientific Approaches and Jesus Research .....	743
BRUCE J. MALINA

New Literary Criticism and Jesus Research .....	777
ELIZABETH STRUTHERS MALBON
Memory Theory and Jesus Research .....	809
ALAN KIRK
The Burden of Proof in Jesus Research .....	843
DAGMAR WINTER

VOLUME 2

THE STUDY OF JESUS

Introduction: The Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus in Perspective .....	xv
TOM HOLMÉN AND STANLEY E. PORTER

PART ONE

THE ONGOING QUEST FOR THE HISTORICAL JESUS

The Quest of the Unhistorical Jesus and the Quest of the Historical Jesus .....	855
COLIN BROWN
Futures for the Jesus Quests .....	887
BENGT HOLMBERG
The Parable of the Goose and the Mirror: The Historical Jesus in the Theological Discipline .....	919
SCOT MCKNIGHT
Historical Jesus Research in Global Cultural Context .....	953
TERESA OKURE
Diverse Agendas at Work in the Jesus Quest .....	985
CLIVE MARSH
Jesus of Nazareth and the Christ of Faith: Approaches to the Question in Historical Jesus Research .....	1021
SVEN-OLAV BACK
The Jesus Quest and Jewish-Christian Relations .....	1055
DONALD A. HAGNER
Historic Jesuses .....	1079
CEES DEN HEYER

PART TWO

CURRENT QUESTIONS OF JESUS RESEARCH

Jesus and Cynicism .....	1105
F. GERALD DOWNING
Jesus and the Scriptures of Israel .....	1137
STEVE MOYISE
Implicit Christology and the Historical Jesus .....	1169
EDWIN K. BROADHEAD
Jesus and the “Partings of the Ways” .....	1183
MICHAEL F. BIRD
Prophet, Sage, Healer, Messiah, and Martyr: Types and Identities of Jesus .....	1217
CRAIG A. EVANS
Jesus im Licht der Qumrangemeinde .....	1245
HEINZ-WOLFGANG KUHN
Jesus without Q .....	1287
MICHAEL GOULDER
Dispensing with the Priority of Mark .....	1313
DAVID L. DUNGAN
The Role of Aramaic in Reconstructing the Teaching of Jesus ...	1343
MAURICE CASEY
The Quest for the Historical Jesus in Postmodern Perspective: A Hypothetical Argument .....	1377
MOISÉS MAYORDOMO AND PETER-BEN SMIT
Why Study the Historical Jesus? .....	1411
COLIN BROWN

PART THREE

PERSISTING ISSUES ADJACENT TO THE JESUS QUEST

The Context of Jesus: Jewish and/or Hellenistic? .....	1441
STANLEY E. PORTER
The Transmission of the Jesus Tradition .....	1465
SAMUEL BYRSKOG
Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes, Herodians .....	1495
ÉTIENNE NODET
The Son of Man in Ancient Judaism .....	1545
JOHN J. COLLINS

Jewish Apocalyptic and Apocalypticism .....	1569
CRISPIN FLETCHER-LOUIS
Anti-Judaism and the New Testament .....	1609
LUKE TIMOTHY JOHNSON
The Writings of Josephus: Their Significance for New Testament Study .....	1639
STEVE MASON
Rabbinic Writings in New Testament Research .....	1687
DAVID INSTONE-BREWER
Synagogue and Sanhedrin in the First Century .....	1723
LESTER L. GRABBE
Echoes from the Wilderness: The Historical John the Baptist ....	1747
KNUT BACKHAUS
Historiographical Literature in the New Testament Period (1st and 2nd centuries CE) .....	1787
EVE-MARIE BECKER

VOLUME 3

THE HISTORICAL JESUS

Introduction: The Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus in Perspective .....	xv
TOM HOLMÉN AND STANLEY E. PORTER

PART ONE

JESUS TRADITION IN INDIVIDUAL DOCUMENTS

The Historical Jesus in the Gospel of Mark .....	1821
JOANNA DEWEY
Jesus Tradition in non-Markan Material Common to Matthew and Luke .....	1853
CHRISTOPHER TUCKETT
The Special Material in Matthew's Gospel .....	1875
DONALD SENIOR, C.P.
Luke <sup>s</sup> and Acts .....	1901
JOHN NOLLAND
The Non-Synoptic Jesus: An Introduction to John, Paul, Thomas, and Other Outsiders of the Jesus Quest .....	1933
MICHAEL LABAHN

Jesus Tradition in the Gospel of John .....	1997
D. MOODY SMITH
Jesus Tradition in the Letters of the New Testament .....	2041
DAVID WENHAM
The Thomas-Jesus Connection .....	2059
EDWIN K. BROADHEAD
Traditions about Jesus in Apocryphal Gospels (with the Exception of the Gospel of Thomas) .....	2081
TOBIAS NICKLAS
Jesus Tradition in Early Patristic Writings .....	2119
RIEMER ROUKEMA
Jesus Tradition in Classical and Jewish Writings .....	2149
ROBERT E. VAN VOORST

PART TWO

FUNDAMENTALLY ABOUT JESUS

The Historicity of Jesus: How Do We Know That Jesus Existed? .....	2183
SAMUEL BYRSKOG
Background I: Jesus of History and the Topography of the Holy Land .....	2213
JAMES H. CHARLESWORTH
Background II: (Some) Literary Documents .....	2243
MARTIN MCNAMARA
Background III: The Social and Political Climate in which Jesus of Nazareth Preached .....	2291
WOLFGANG STEGEMANN
The Chronology of Jesus .....	2315
HAROLD W. HOEHNER
The Birth of Jesus .....	2361
RICHARD T. FRANCE
The Death of Jesus .....	2383
JOEL B. GREEN
The Resurrection of Jesus .....	2409
PHEME PERKINS
Family, Friends, and Foes .....	2433
JOEL B. GREEN

The Language(s) Jesus Spoke .....	2455
STANLEY E. PORTER
The Self-Understanding of Jesus .....	2473
MATTHIAS KREPLIN
The Message of Jesus I: Miracles, Continuing Controversies .....	2517
GRAHAM H. TWELFTREE
The Message of Jesus II: Parables .....	2549
ARLAND J. HULTGREN

PART THREE

JESUS AND THE LEGACY OF ISRAEL

Jesus and God .....	2575
MARIANNE MEYE THOMPSON
Jesus and The Sabbath .....	2597
SVEN-OLAV BACK
Jesus and the Temple .....	2635
JOSTEIN ÅDNA
Jesus and the Shema .....	2677
KIM HUAT TAN
Jesus and the Purity Paradigm .....	2709
TOM HOLMÉN
Jesus and the Law .....	2745
WILLIAM LOADER
Jesus and the Holy Land .....	2773
KAREN J. WENELL
Jesus and Sinners and Outcasts .....	2801
BRUCE CHILTON
Jesus and Israel's Eschatological Constitution .....	2835
STEVEN M. BRYAN
Jesus, Satan, and Company .....	2855
DARRELL BOCK
Jesus and Apocalypticism .....	2877
CRISPIN FLETCHER-LOUIS

VOLUME 4*INDIVIDUAL STUDIES

Introduction: The Handbook for Study of the Historical Jesus in Perspective .....	xv
TOM HOLMÉN AND STANLEY E. PORTER
The “Dark Side of Power”—Beelzebul: Manipulated or Manipulator? Reflections on the History of a Conflict in the Traces Left in the Memory of its Narrators .....	2911
MICHAEL LABAHN
Did Jesus Break the Fifth (Fourth) Commandment? .....	2947
PETER BALLA
Did Jesus Stay at Bethsaida? Arguments from Ancient Texts and Archaeology for Bethsaida and et-Tell .....	2973
HEINZ-WOLFGANG KUHN
Flawed Heroes and Stories Jesus Told: The One About a Man Wanting to Kill .....	3023
CHARLES W. HEDRICK
Jesus and Magic: The Question of the Miracles .....	3057
BERND KOLLMANN
Jesus and the Greeks: A Semiotic Reading of John 12:20–28 .....	3087
JOSEPH PATHRAPANKAL
Jesus and the Synagogue .....	3105
GRAHAM H. TWELFTREE
Jesus and the Ten Words .....	3135
HERMUT LOEHR
Jesus as Moving Image: The Public Responsibility of the Historical Jesus Scholar in the Age of Film .....	3155
CLIVE MARSH
Jesus’ “Magic” from a Theodicean Perspective .....	3179
TOM HOLMÉN
Jesus’ “Rhetoric”: The Rise and Fall of “The Kingdom of God” .....	3201
JAMES M. ROBINSON
Jewish Galilee .....	3221
ETIENNE NODET
On Avoiding Bothersome Busyness: Q/Luke 12:22–31 in its Greco-Roman Context .....	3245
GERALD DOWNING

Poverty and Wealth in Jesus and the Jesus Tradition .....	3269
HEINZ GIESEN
The Question of the Baptists' Disciples on Fasting (Matt 9:14–17; Mark 2:18–22; Luke 5:33–39) .....	3305
RAINER RIESNER
Riddles, Wit, and Wisdom .....	3349
TOM THATCHER
Three Questions about the Life of Jesus .....	3373
CHRISTIAN-BERNARD AMPHOUX
Why Was Jesus Not Born in Nazareth? .....	3409
ARMAND PUIG I TÀRRECH
Words of Jesus in Paul: On the Theology and Praxis of the Jesus Tradition .....	3437
PETR POKORNÝ
Index of Ancient Sources .....	3469
Index of Modern Authors .....	3605

INTRODUCTION

THE HANDBOOK FOR THE STUDY OF THE HISTORICAL JESUS IN PERSPECTIVE

TOM HOLMÉN AND STANLEY E. PORTER

A hundred years ago, Albert Schweitzer gathered the bulk of the most important (mostly German) Jesus research done during the preceding two centuries (the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries) within one cover and made an assessment of it. Today, to write a summa historica of Jesus studies is not an undertaking that one person could embark on and realistically hope to accomplish (not even two people), but requires a collaboration of a legio of the best minds from across many countries and cultures. Albert Schweitzer's Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung<sup>1</sup> marked a significant milestone in historical Jesus scholarship, a movement that has continued in various forms and in diverse ways, but in all events unabated, until today. As a result, in a 1994 article, James Charlesworth, who himself has been actively involved in the recent expansion of historical Jesus study, asserted that historical Jesus study was expanding with "chaotic creativity."<sup>2</sup> While an apt and appropriate description of the condition of the times, this characterization is all the more accurate today, fifteen years later. Since its latest renaissance in the 1980s,<sup>3</sup> historical Jesus study has continued to expand, drawing into its broadening scope more and more scholars of the New Testament and cognate areas. There is an abundance of Jesus studies today that displays an almost overwhelming diversity of methods, approaches, hypotheses, assumptions, and results. While creativity and fecundity are theoretically

---

<sup>1</sup> A. Schweitzer, Von Reimarus zu Wrede: Eine Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1906). The second edition was simply entitled: Die Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung (1913). The English translation was entitled: The Quest for the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede, trans. W. Montgomery, with a preface by F. C. Burkitt (London: Adam and Charles Black, 1910).

<sup>2</sup> J. H. Charlesworth, "Jesus Research Expands with Chaotic Creativity," in Images of Jesus Today, ed. J. H. Charlesworth and W. P. Weaver (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1994), 1–41.

<sup>3</sup> See M. J. Borg, "A Renaissance in Jesus Studies," TheoIT 45 (1988): 280–292.

to be welcomed, chaotic creativity works against the scholarly pursuit of orderly understanding, and the sheer mass of material threatens to overwhelm even the heartiest of participants in the quest. However, in some instances such creativity can spur on and nourish various forms of enquiry that result in unpredictable and unplanned results. The future of historical Jesus study rests with the community of scholars being able to harness this chaotic creativity to its service, and to create order out of a morass of growing detail.

What are the purposes of Jesus research? The first one is clearly an abiding academic purpose. This has always been regarded as important and has, together with the latest renaissance of Jesus study, only grown in importance. In fact, if “academic” and “historical” can be seen to correlate, many scholars would claim that this is what the study of Jesus today is all about. According to many representative Jesus questers, a main characteristic of current Jesus research is that it is being spurred and guided by an outspoken historical interest. Indeed, Jesus lies at the juncture of many interests and phenomena that are crucial to understanding great lines of historical development and that form the basis of understanding the world today. There is therefore no doubt about the great historical and academic value of Jesus research. However, several other purposes, motivations, and aspirations obviously feed into the historical pursuit of Jesus. Among these are religious, political, cultural, artistic, fictional, romantic, psychological, financial, apologetic, and simply personal reasons to engage in conversing about Jesus of Nazareth. We merely state this as an observable fact: such purposes for Jesus research exist and are being pursued in practice. Unfortunately, sometimes scholars too easily classify such purposes as either well- or ill-founded. In the post-colonial, post-Einsteinian, post-modern, post-structural (some say even post-human) etc. world of ours, who can be so clear as to be able to tell the difference between relevant and irrelevant motivations, not to speak of labeling them as either good or bad? Nevertheless, in all this it is vital to genuinely retain the concepts of historical Jesus and historical Jesus research around which the variegated conversation centers and revolves. How this happens and is realized may not be an easy or altogether straightforward thing to do.

The Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus (HSHJ) was designed to be one, important means of handling both the growing abundance and the increasing diversity of Jesus scholarship. Such is not an easy task, as we the editors have grown to appreciate in the course of creating this set of volumes. Putting the diversity on display in a controlled, manageable, and understandable fashion, while acknowledging the numerous and diverse major issues, and ensuring that as many as possible of the important adjacent themes are recognized, has been a significant task. The HSHJ seeks to offer a convenient, even if still circuitous, route through the maze of current historical Jesus research, so that scholars and other interested parties can appreciate the broad and diverse spectrum of current opinion.

There have been a number of recent efforts to survey the history of historical Jesus scholarship, which we have taken into account in planning these volumes. Some of these publications have included individual essays that try to cover the range of major topics, although no effort to date has included as many as this set of volumes.<sup>4</sup> Several of these studies are retrospective accounts that anthologize past statements of significance in the study of the historical Jesus, but they lack the contemporary coordinating force of the HSHJ.<sup>5</sup> Even those publications that attempt to address the contemporary issues in historical Jesus research in a coordinated fashion, because of their encyclopedic nature, are unable to provide the kind of depth and even breadth of exposure that these volumes contain.<sup>6</sup> Whatever merits such previous volumes may have, and they have many, none of them is designed to accomplish the same goals as the Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus.

There are many distinguishable features of the HSHJ. This collection of four volumes of essays first of all seeks to be thorough and inclusive. We realize that there are always other opinions that could be included in volumes such as these, but we have tried to solicit and elicit as much of that diverse opinion as was available for publication. We want this collection to serve, not only as a historical encapsulation of the topics of their day, but as a worthy expression of the range of viable thought currently available in historical Jesus studies.

Besides the inclusive nature of these volumes, we have sought for HSHJ to be international in scope, not simply for the sake of diversity,

---

<sup>4</sup> E.g. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, eds., Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, NTTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994).

<sup>5</sup> See, e.g., H. K. McArthur, ed., In Search of the Historical Jesus (New York: Scribners, 1969); G. W. Dawes, ed., The Historical Jesus Quest: A Foundational Anthology (Leiden: Deo, 1999); C. A. Evans, ed., The Historical Jesus: Critical Concepts in Religious Studies, 4 vols. (London: Routledge, 2004); J. D. G. Dunn and S. McKnight, eds., The Historical Jesus in Recent Research, Sources for Biblical and Theological Study 10 (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2005).

<sup>6</sup> E.g. C. A. Evans, ed., Encyclopedia of the Historical Jesus (London: Routledge, 2007).

but so that multiple voices can be ably represented in the discussion. The approximately one-hundred contributors to this project come from around twenty different countries. Some countries no doubt are represented more heavily than others, and some other important nationalities may be under-represented or not represented at all. This was not by design, as our purpose from the start has been to try to free the discussion of Jesus from regional or local agendas and schools of thought.

Besides the multiplicity of voices from a wide range of places and people, in the HSHJ we have sought to free study of the historical Jesus from the trammels of a variety of other restraints. We have been conscious that study of Jesus in the past has been directly linked to particular forms and contents of higher education, and even specific methodologies, and that such study has often gone hand-in-hand with particular religious, cultural or even political traditions and histories. This set of volumes has been created to move beyond, or perhaps even rise above, such artificially imposed constraints. As a result, though ideologies will no doubt be present in the individual contributions, the volumes as a whole are not reacting or responding to any particular local or even nationally determined situation with regard to historical Jesus study. Our primary criterion in selecting and welcoming the contributors has been their expertise and their addressing a topic of relevance. Despite our best efforts, there is no doubt that most of the contributors are still “white male western Europeans and European-Americans” (as Richard Horsley states).<sup>7</sup> We accept this comment, while acknowledging also that our best efforts were put into attempts not to fall victim to this as an inevitable conclusion. Nevertheless, it is probably a realistic observation of the situation that prevails in historical Jesus studies to this day. Whether it will be different in the future, we must wait and see.

The efforts above have been undertaken so that we could focus these volumes on what we consider the most important elements in current study of the historical Jesus. In order to do this, we have divided the essays into four structured volumes.

As a result of this process of assessment, what became evident was that one of the most important sources of continued diversity in historical Jesus study is the element of methodological divergence. Methodological diversity entails the formulation of varied and disparate conscious approaches to the study of Jesus. Questions of method are inevitably confronted at the outset of any scientific or historical investigation, and usually indicate the significant parting of the ways between differing approaches to the same body of data. Consequently, volume one of the HSHJ is dedicated to questions of method. Realizing and being knowledgeable of the different methodological starting points in historical Jesus study not only facilitates one's determination and understanding of the results, but also gives important and necessary insight into the reasons for the results and their implications. In other words, attention to method forces us to ask the question of why it is that a particular scholar comes to a specific set of conclusions, as opposed to a different set of conclusions. In this regard, the first volume of HSHJ itself speaks volumes about historical Jesus research. In this volume, we have attempted to assemble many of the world's leading experts on methodological questions regarding the study of Jesus. They present their approaches to study of the historical Jesus as a means of introducing us to the fundamental issues at stake. This is not to deny that there is some challenging reading to be had in this volume, but within this one volume the reader has easier access than before to the range of methods currently at play in historical Jesus studies. By using this volume, scholars and students alike will be able learn about methods with which they are less familiar, compare the major features of these methods, and determine how the varied hypotheses about the historical figure of Jesus are rooted in methodological choices made at the early stages of thinking and research.

---

<sup>7</sup> See his article in volume one.

The first volume is, therefore, divided into two parts. The first part includes a wide range of distinct methodological statements by advocates of those methods. This part encompasses the methods that are distinct to historical Jesus study as it has been practiced over the last twenty to thirty years. It is here that we gain further insight into the approaches that have been adopted by a wide range of scholars who have had influence within historical Jesus study, as they have tried to define the nature and characteristics of the study and its results. Part two of this volume extends the range of methodologies to the interaction between historical Jesus study and methods that have proven themselves in other areas of New Testament and cognates studies. Some of these are the traditional methods of biblical study, while others are recent innovations influenced by the rise of various types of social-science criticism. The interface of Jesus study and these methods has provided a range of results that help to ensure that the study of Jesus will not soon grow quiescent.

The second volume of HSHJ focuses on the history and future of historical Jesus research, by identifying many if not most of the specific issues of contention that have been raised in the broad and long history of Jesus study. This volume is divided into three parts. The first part deals with the notion of quests for the historical Jesus. One of the points of continued contention in study of Jesus is not only whether there are periods in such study, but how current study relates to previous study, in terms of both its methods and its results. Here various authors address the relation of Jesus study to the various quests that have been proposed. The second part of the volume brings to the fore questions that are being asked in the contemporary climate of historical Jesus studies. These include the questions that are currently and recurrently at the forefront of discussion, often suggesting in their questions an alternative to the course that previous research has taken. Part three of this volume addresses some of the perennial topics in Jesus research. In some ways, these are issues that are either assumed or regularly taken into account in formulating various hypotheses about Jesus. They form the convenient and necessary intellectual background for pursuing historical Jesus studies.

The third volume of HSHJ brings Jesus himself as a historical figure directly into the discussion. There are three parts in this volume as well. The first part treats Jesus in regard to primary documents of the ancient world, such as the canonical gospels, other portions of the New Testament, and non-canonical works. The second part of this volume takes the elements of the life of Jesus and exposes them to rigorous critical and scholarly scrutiny. Rather than examine Jesus in terms of how he is depicted in one of the biblical books (as in the previous section of this volume) or in terms of a particular issue, this section dissects the life of Jesus in terms of its logical and necessary components, from issues of historicity to his teaching and message, and many if not most places in between. It is in studies such as these that one realizes the importance of the previous studies and approaches for the explication of these subject areas. These topics bring to bear the variety of issues previously discussed. The third part of this volume relates Jesus to the legacy of Israel. Jesus' Jewish roots and relations have long been an essential item of discussion and contention in historical Jesus studies. In this part, various key elements of his relationship to Israel are scrutinized. The result of this set of studies is to place Jesus firmly within his Jewish context, a desideratum of much recent historical Jesus scholarship.

The fourth and final volume of HSHJ is a collection of individual studies by a range of scholars. It is a positive comment on the state of current historical Jesus study that, even with the best planning and intention, it is difficult, if not impossible, to plan and anticipate all of the necessary topics for such a comprehensive study. Therefore, we have designed this fourth volume to include important studies that we have solicited and have had submitted for which there was no other place in the volume, but that warranted a position in a compendium of scholarship such as this handbook attempts to be. There is a wide range of valuable research to be found in this fourth volume. Some of the studies explore areas for which there has been very little previous Jesus research but in which the author shows there is a lamentable lacking and oversight in the discipline. Others of the studies take topics on the fringe of either Jesus studies or contemporary culture and try to bridge the two in creative and insightful ways. Finally, some of the studies are designed to focus on particular and specific issues that would otherwise have been overlooked in the course of this study, but that a perceptive scholar realized would make a contribution to the final product.

The results of a project such as this are many and varied. We do not doubt that many of the significant contributions to scholarship found in these volumes will establish themselves as standards in the field and continue to have warranted influence on the study of the historical Jesus. Such studies may well be found in any or all of the volumes. We further believe that there are a number of essays that will have uncovered or discovered or even re-discovered insights that have been lost or lost sight of or not yet sighted, and that will bring these into consideration on the broader canvas of historical Jesus studies. There are other essays within these volumes that have broken some boundaries and will establish themselves as new and innovative ways forward in the discussion. The problem is that it is not easy to tell which essays are which, and what the significance of each individual contribution will be. We are confident, however, that these volumes contain, as much as is possible within the parameters of such a project, a responsible and representative, and in some cases even forthright or contrarian, presentation of the current state of historical Jesus scholarship. Such scholarship is the backbone of a project such as this, and is a mainstay of how one approaches contemporary New Testament scholarship. There are essays within this collection that will prove to be seminal for study of the historical Jesus, as they force both sympathetic and unsympathetic readers to contemplate issues and perspectives in ways that were unanticipated. Such scholarship helps to pave the way forward for further research. Its place of final repose cannot be predicted or estimated.

PART ONE

JESUS TRADITION IN INDIVIDUAL DOCUMENTS

THE HISTORICAL JESUS IN THE GOSPEL OF MARK

JOANNA DEWEY

For the last hundred and fifty years, the Gospel of Mark has been a major resource for scholars' reconstructions of the historical Jesus. The Gospel contains much information about Jesus from the baptism by John, through the public ministry, to the passion narrative and the empty tomb. The episodes of Jesus' public ministry are organized geographically: Galilee (1:14–8:21), a journey from north of Galilee south to Jerusalem (8:22–10:52), and Jerusalem (11:1–13:37), with a promise of return to Galilee (14:28; 16:7). Within this overall geographical framework, the episodes are grouped according to general content. The Galilee section stresses Jesus' proclamation and enactment of the kingdom of God, portraying Jesus calling disciples, healing and exorcising, teaching, and eating, including controversies over his healing, eating and feedings of thousands in the desert. This section also shows the two reactions to Jesus: the favorable response of the disciples and crowds who enthusiastically follow and the negative reaction of the religious and political authorities who reject him from the start. The middle journey section concentrates on Jesus' prophecies of his coming death and resurrection and his teachings on discipleship and the new community. The Jerusalem ministry presents Jesus' provocative action in the temple, controversies between Jesus and Jewish groups about Jewish understandings, and finally Jesus' prediction of future events after his passion.

The Gospel itself, like all the gospels, is anonymous. For convenience, I call the composer "Mark." Mark's content provides a huge portion of the traditions we have about Jesus' ministry. Furthermore, it furnishes the basic chronology and much of the specific content for Matthew and Luke. These gospels include considerable additional teaching, both from Q, the hypothetical source containing material common to Matthew and Luke but absent from Mark, and also from special M and special L, teaching peculiar to Matthew or Luke. The basic framework and portrait of Jesus in Matthew and Luke, however, follow Mark's.

A fundamental question, then, for reconstructing Jesus is: “How accurate is Mark’s portrait?” or: “Can we trust Mark’s picture?” In the nineteenth century, the Gospel recovered from its long obscurity and emerged as a delightfully naïve, colorful, and quite reliable historical account. Since then, however, scholars have seen the steady erosion of faith in Mark’s historical reliability. The historical critical tools of source, form, and redaction criticism whittled away at the account’s reliability. The new literary criticism, in particular narrative and reader response criticisms, offered different and equally serious challenges. Last, orality studies have awakened us to the highly oral/aural media environment of the first century and the accompanying instability of texts. A recent attempt to rescue the general historicity of the oral tradition fails in its aim.<sup>1</sup> Is there anything solid left? Is there any wonder that Bultmann fifty years ago, or Luke Timothy Johnson recently, have rejected the historical Jesus as relevant for faith?

Furthermore, while there certainly have been some assured results of the various critical approaches, it has become increasingly clear that scholars are not in agreement about the Gospel of Mark, its authorship, provenance, date, or purpose, let alone its proper interpretation. Not only is the historical Jesus elusive, but so also is the Gospel of Mark.<sup>2</sup> Nonetheless, the Gospel remains today a major resource for Jesus’ earthly life. In order to reconstruct Jesus at all, we need to use Mark’s Gospel, and to use it with all the critical tools at our disposal.

In this article, in section 1, I give an overview of the understandings of the Gospel of Mark and of “Mark,” the evangelist, throughout the centuries. Then, I survey the various methodologies for studying the Gospel that have emerged over the last one hundred and fifty years and evaluate their implications for using Mark to reconstruct the historical Jesus. In section 2, I turn to contemporary scholarship’s views and uses of Mark to construct Jesus, summarizing present views on Mark’s authorship and provenance, addressing how current Markan commentaries treat the historical Jesus, and viewing how representative Jesus scholars use Mark. In section 3, I conclude with a few brief suggestions regarding the use of Mark in historical Jesus studies. I focus on the overall (un)reliability of Mark, rather than on evaluation of the historicity of particular episodes or themes.

---

<sup>1</sup> See below, section 1.9 Informal controlled oral tradition.

<sup>2</sup> For general overviews of the Gospel of Mark, see W. R. Telford, Mark, T&T Clark Study Guides (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995; repr. London: T&T Clark International, 2003) and Daniel J. Harrington, S.J., What Are They Saving About Mark? (New York: Paulist, 2005).

1. The Gospel of Mark through the Centuries

The name “Mark” has been associated with the Gospel since the second century. It seems probable that the composer was some otherwise unknown Mark, a common name in antiquity.<sup>3</sup> This Mark has had a checkered career in the church and in scholarship, “from Peter’s scribe, to a writing instrument in the hand of the Holy Spirit, to a reliable chronicler, to a front for an anonymous Christian community, to an editor, to a full-fledged author of a unified narrative, to a provoker of reader response,” to an oral storyteller.<sup>4</sup>

1.1. The Patristic Period: Peter’s Scribe

Papias, a second-century bishop in Asia Minor, provides our first reference to Mark. According to Eusebius, the fourth-century historian, Papias “used to say:”

Mark was the interpreter of Peter. He wrote down accurately, but without form [ou mentoi taxeí] what he remembered of the things said and done by the Lord. For neither did he hear the Lord, nor did he follow him, but later on, as I said, Peter—who fashioned the teachings according to the needs of the moment, but not as though he were drawing up a connected account of the Lord’s sayings. Thus Mark made no mistake in so recording some things as he remembered them. For he had one thing in mind, namely to omit nothing of the things he had heard and to falsify nothing among them.<sup>5</sup>

The tradition connecting Mark with the apostle Peter was quite widespread in antiquity: it is referred to in one form or another by Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Tertullian, and

---

<sup>3</sup> Paul J. Achtemeier, Mark, 2nd ed., Proclamation Commentaries (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986), 125, has suggested that the author could be a woman. I believe this is unlikely: a female composer is likely to have mentioned the women followers earlier than sixteen verses before the end of the narrative.

<sup>4</sup> Janice Capel Anderson and Stephen D. Moore, Mark and Method: New Approaches in Biblical Studies (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992), 19–20.

<sup>5</sup> Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.1–7, 14–17. The translation is by Donald H. Juel, The Gospel of Mark, IBT (Nashville: Abingdon, 1999), 18. I believe Juel is correct that ou mentoi taxeí refers not to chronological order but to the proper rhetorical form for literature.

Jerome, and the Anti-Marcionite Prologue.<sup>6</sup> The specifics of the tradition vary: before or after Peter's death; connected or not connected to some Mark mentioned in the New Testament, connected or not connected to Egypt.<sup>7</sup> The aim of these references seems to be to establish the apostolic authority of Mark's Gospel, since Mark was known not to have been a follower of Jesus.

The use of the Gospel of Mark dwindled drastically after the second century. In the second century there were some fourteen hundred patristic citations of Mark, in the third, only about two hundred and fifty.<sup>8</sup> The fact that some ninety-five per cent of Mark is found in Matthew and much also in Luke suggests that Mark could easily have ceased to be copied and to have been lost, as scholars suppose Q to have been lost. Yet, the Gospel was well enough known and had sufficient authority during the second century to be included as one of the four authoritative gospels or four-fold gospel first referred to by Irenaeus,<sup>9</sup> thus providing for its survival and inclusion in the New Testament.

1.2. From Augustine until the Nineteenth Century

Augustine of Hippo reflected the general disinterest in Mark's Gospel. Augustine wrote The Harmony of the Evangelists (De consensu evangelistarum), arguing that the four gospels are basically in agreement with each other and can be trusted. In this (and his other writings), he makes no reference whatsoever to the tradition that Mark was dependent on Peter. Rather, he wrote: "Mark followed him [Matthew] like a slave and seems his summarizer."<sup>10</sup> Clifton Black suggests that by

---

<sup>6</sup> For details, see Sean P. Kealy, Mark's Gospel: A History of Its Interpretation: From the Beginning Until 1979 (New York: Paulist, 1982), 11–25 and C. Clifton Black, Mark: Images of an Apostolic Interpreter (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1994), 77–127.

<sup>7</sup> For a detailed discussion on New Testament references to a person named Mark, see Black, Mark, 25–73.

<sup>8</sup> The second-century figures include Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian. The third-century figures exclude Origen. Brenda Deen Schildgen calculated these numbers from the lists in Biblia Patristica (Power and Prejudice: The Reception of the Gospel of Mark, [Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1999], 40–41). Schildgen notes that Mark was also ignored in the lectionaries (Power, 41).

<sup>9</sup> Irenaeus, Against Heresies, 3.11.8.

<sup>10</sup> De con. evang. 1.2.4. The translation is Sean P. Kealy's (Mark's Gospel, 27). Later in the same work, Augustine suggests that Mark may also have some dependence on Luke (De con. evang. 4.10.11).

400 CE, Augustine can assume the apostolic authority of Mark, and is struggling instead with the literary relationships of the gospels.<sup>11</sup> As the work of Peter's scribe, Mark's Gospel mattered; as the epitome of Matthew, it was of no interest. It languished, little used until the rise of higher criticism in the late eighteenth century.

1.3. Source Criticism: Reliable Chronicler

The rise of the Enlightenment with its emphasis on reason and scientific investigation brought a radical change to the view of Mark's Gospel. Through the efforts of German scholarship, Mark emerged not as an abbreviation of Matthew but as the earliest gospel, a major source for both Matthew and Luke. In the 1770's, J. J. Griesbach published a synopsis of the three synoptic gospels and suggested, contrary to all earlier tradition, that "little real profit can be gained from a harmonizing of the gospels."<sup>12</sup> Griesbach himself concluded that Mark was dependent on both Matthew and Luke, a view that has not been sustained.<sup>13</sup> In 1835, K. Lachmann demonstrated that Matthew and Luke agreed with each other in the order of material only when they also agreed with Mark's order. Further work in Germany and England solidified the belief in the priority of Mark and the two-source hypothesis of Mark and Q.<sup>14</sup> Various written sources were also posited for Mark, such as Mark 2:1–28 or –3:6 and the passion narrative. The classic statement of source criticism in English is that of B. H. Streeter in 1925.<sup>15</sup> Thus Mark became established as the earliest gospel, with Matthew and Luke not as independent witnesses to Jesus' life but dependent upon Mark. The

<sup>11</sup> Black, Mark, 130. He is following David Peabody, "Augustine and the Augustinian Hypothesis: A Reexamination of Augustine's Thought in De Consensu Evangelistarum," in New Synoptic Studies: The Cambridge Gospel Conference and Beyond, ed. William R. Farmer (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1982), 37–64, at 41–42.

<sup>12</sup> Kealy, Mark's Gospel, 60. For Griesbach's work, see Bernard Orchard and Thomas R. W. Longstaff, eds., J. Griesbach, Synoptic and Text Critical Studies, 1776–1976 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1978).

<sup>13</sup> A few scholars continue to argue for Griesbach's Matthean priority but with little effect on the general consensus of Markan priority. See David B. Peabody with Lamar Cope and Allan J. McNicol, eds., One Gospel from Two: Mark's use of Matthew and Luke: A demonstration by the Research Team of the International Institute for Renewal of Gospel Studies (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity International, 2002).

<sup>14</sup> For an overview of developments, see Kealy, Mark's Gospel, 72–74, 80–84.

<sup>15</sup> B. H. Streeter, The Four Gospels: A Study of Origins (New York: Macmillan, 1925). For a recent careful study comparing the various source theories with Greco-Roman writing practices, see R. A. Derrenbacker, Jr., Ancient Compositional Practices and the Synoptic Problem (Leuven: Peeters, 2005). His conclusions support Markan priority.

priority of Mark is a solid accomplishment of source criticism, standing the test of time.

The recognition of the priority of Mark moved the Gospel to center stage for the investigation of the historical Jesus. Indeed, what excited many nineteenth-century biblical scholars was their belief that they had gained access in Mark's Gospel to a trustworthy historical portrait of Jesus. The Gospel's naïve lively style, its inelegant Greek, and its apparent realism were all seen as indicators of the Gospel's historical reliability. For example, B. F. Westcott considered Mark "conspicuous for its vivid simplicity" and "essentially a transcript from life;" H. S. Holtzmann saw in Mark a reliable guide to Jesus' development of messianic consciousness; Paul Wernle thought it gave direct access to Peter's theology, giving the impression of an eyewitness report.<sup>16</sup> For a few decades in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, scholars thought Mark was neither the abridger of Matthew nor an original theologian, but rather a simple chronicler recording historical events. Thus was born the "Markan hypothesis," the belief that Mark was a generally reliable guide to the events, teachings, and chronological development of Jesus' ministry.

Those heady days were not to last. The first decade of the twentieth century brought two major challenges. First, William Wrede's The Messianic Secret called into question the theological naïveté of Mark and thus Mark's historical reliability.<sup>17</sup> Noticing the various commands to secrecy, Wrede argued Mark reconciled the fact that Jesus' life was known not to be messianic with the post-Easter understanding of Jesus as Messiah by presenting an earthly Jesus who kept his messiahship secret. Wrede noted an aspect of the Gospel which is important for the ongoing discussion of the historical Jesus in Mark: what Jesus says and does and what the other characters and the narrator say about Jesus do not fully cohere. The picture the Markan Jesus presents may be more historically accurate than what others in Mark say about Jesus. This discrepancy continues to give hope to historical Jesus critics that through Mark's portrayal of Jesus we may be able to get behind early Christianity to some knowledge of the historical Jesus. Yet, fundamentally, Wrede's work demonstrated that

---

<sup>16</sup> Quoted in Kealy, Mark's Gospel, 80–83.

<sup>17</sup> William Wrede, Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien. ET: The Messianic Secret, trans. J. C. G. Greig, Library of Theological Translations (Cambridge: James Clark, 1971).

Mark was a theologian, not a chronicler; however, it was another sixty years before Mark as author-theologian fully emerged.

The second challenge to reconstructing the historical Jesus came from Albert Schweitzer in The Quest of the Historical Jesus.<sup>18</sup> Schweitzer attacked not the historical reliability of Mark but the objectivity of scholars writing lives of Jesus; they produced portraits of Jesus that fitted their own diverse beliefs. Schweitzer insisted we needed to interpret Jesus against his own time, and he did so, reconstructing Jesus as a failed apocalyptic prophet. The immediate result of Schweitzer's work was to bring a temporary halt to Jesus scholarship. In the more long term, Schweitzer's insistence on studying Jesus as a first-century person has become foundational for Jesus' scholarship today. Unfortunately, however, Schweitzer's charge that scholarship on Jesus reflects the scholar as much as Jesus remains equally true today.

In summary, the work of source critics has resulted in general agreement on the priority of Mark. At first, this seemed to establish Mark as a direct window onto the Jesus of history. Recognition, however, of the subjectivity of Mark and the subjectivity of scholars reconstructing the historical Jesus has shown that the discovery of the priority of Mark does not provide direct access to the historical Jesus.

1.4. Form Criticism

After the First World War, the German scholars Martin Dibelius and Rudolf Bultmann studied the oral transmission of the synoptic material between the time of Jesus and the time of the writing of Mark and Q.<sup>19</sup> They identified typical forms of gospel pericopes, argued that the individual episodes traveled independently until compiled in Q and Mark, and speculated on their Sitz im Leben in early Christian communities, that is, for what purposes churches used particular forms. The results of form criticism challenged Mark's historical accuracy in three important ways. First of all, form critics noted the watershed of Easter. All traditions were inevitably interpreted in light of the Easter experience. We have in effect no pristine pre-passion, pre-Easter memories of

---

<sup>18</sup> Albert Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of Its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede, trans. W. Montgomery (New York: Macmillan, 1968).

<sup>19</sup> Martin Dibelius, From Tradition to Gospel, trans. Bertram Lee Woolf (New York: Scribner's Sons, n.d.); Rudolf Bultmann, The History of the Synoptic Tradition, trans. John Marsh (New York: Harper & Row, 1963). For other scholars involved in the development and debate over form criticism, see Kealy, Mark's Gospel, 115–158.

Jesus. Second, form critics stressed the creativity of the early church in developing traditions. For Bultmann in particular, Christian communities were responsible for creating whole sayings and stories.<sup>20</sup> Third, form critics argued that there was no connected narrative of Jesus' life and ministry until it was patched together by Mark. The literary analysis of Mark by K. L. Schmidt showing that Mark was constructed like pearls on a string was particularly influential on this point.<sup>21</sup>

Form criticism thus destroyed confidence in the order of Mark's narrative as revealing the development of Jesus' ministry. If indeed the traditions traveled independently in churches uninterested in chronology and were later compiled by Mark, then we have no information on the chronological development of Jesus' ministry. In 1932, C. H. Dodd tried to rescue the general sequence of Mark using the speeches of Acts, a catena of K. L. Schmidt's summaries, and the historical likelihood that Jesus would concentrate on his coming passion and on instructing the disciples as he turned toward Jerusalem.<sup>22</sup> Dodd's thesis did not receive general acceptance and was effectively demolished by D. E. Nineham in 1957.<sup>23</sup>

The conclusion that Mark's chronology is not historically reliable has made the task of historical reconstruction substantially more problematic. Luke Timothy Johnson writes:

It is necessary to fit these pieces [traditions about Jesus] into an alternative framework than the one provided by the Gospels. At this point, the subjective character of the entire enterprise becomes evident: the framework chosen often reveals as much about the investigator as it does about Jesus. . . one may well wonder whether anything more than a sophisticated and elaborate form of projection has taken place.<sup>24</sup>

---

<sup>20</sup> For a more conservative development of form criticism, see the work of the British scholar, Vincent Taylor, The Formation of the Gospel Tradition, 2nd ed. (London: Macmillan, 1964).

<sup>21</sup> Karl Ludwig Schmidt, Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu (Berlin: Trowitzsch & Sohn, 1919).

<sup>22</sup> C. H. Dodd, "The Framework of the Gospel Narrative," in New Testament Studies, ed. idem (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1959), 1–11. Clearly, Dodd accepted the Markan rather than the Johannine chronology as more historical. It is precisely the Gospel of John with its three-year multiple Jerusalem trip chronology that renders Mark's chronology more problematic.

<sup>23</sup> D. E. Nineham, "The Order of Events in St. Mark's Gospel—an Examination of Dr. Dodd's Hypothesis," in Studies in the Gospels: Essays in Memory of R. H. Lightfoot, ed. idem (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1957), 223–239.

<sup>24</sup> Luke Timothy Johnson, The Writings of the New Testament: An Interpretation, rev. ed. (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1999), 628–629.

For historians of Jesus, the loss of Mark's chronology has certainly complicated their task.

One cannot speak of the assured results of form criticism in the way one can of source criticism. Most scholars would agree that the classic form critics overstated the creativity of the early church at the expense of the creativity of Jesus on the one hand, and of Mark on the other. Further, developments in the study of orality call into question some major assumptions of form criticism, and aspects of it need to be rethought.<sup>25</sup> Yet form criticism fundamentally changed the way scholars view the gospel materials. If source criticism had brought Mark to center stage as the earliest of the written gospels and raised it in the eyes of many to a reliable account of Jesus' ministry, form criticism, while accepting Mark as the first gospel, seriously called into question its value as a historical source for the life and ministry of Jesus, demonstrating the creative roles of Christian communities and destroying the notion that we know the chronological development of Jesus' ministry.

1.5. Redaction Criticism: Mark as Editor

The third and last of the historically-oriented criticisms emerged following World War II, also in Germany. Scholars turned from studying the individual units of tradition to studying Mark's editing, how he put the units together and with what purposes in mind. The first major work was that of Willi Marxsen in 1956.<sup>26</sup> Form criticism had dismissed the evangelists as mere mechanical compilers: in Bultmann's words, Mark was "not sufficiently master of his material to venture on a systematic construction himself."<sup>27</sup> Marxsen, on the other hand, focused on Mark's accomplishment in working the disparate pieces of tradition into a unified whole. Since the narrative chronology of

---

<sup>25</sup> See Erhardt Güttgemanns, Candid Questions Concerning Gospel Form Criticism: A Methodological Sketch of the Fundamental Problematics of Form and Redaction Criticism, trans. William G. Doty, PTMS 26 (Pittsburgh: Pickwick, 1979); Werner H. Kelber, "Jesus and Tradition: Words in Time, Words in Space," in Orality and Textuality in Early Christian Literature, ed. Joanna Dewey, Semeia 65 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1995), 151–163; idem, "Jesus—Tradition—Gospels: Orality, Scribality, and Oral-Scribal Interfaces: Review and Present State of Research" (paper presented at SNTS, Halle, Germany, 2005).

<sup>26</sup> Willi Marxsen, Mark the Evangelist: Studies on the Redaction-History of the Gospel, trans. James Boyce et al. (New York: Abingdon, 1969).

<sup>27</sup> Bultmann, Synoptic Tradition, 350.

Mark's Gospel could no longer be attributed to historical memory, it could now be attributed to Mark's creative work. Thus began in earnest the investigation of the theology of Mark.<sup>28</sup>

Redaction criticism in the narrow sense consisted of the separation of tradition from Mark's redaction and then the evaluation of Mark's redaction alone for the meaning of the Gospel and for the construction of the historical situation of Mark's community.<sup>29</sup> This narrow focus gave way in face of two challenges. First, scholars could not agree sufficiently on what was tradition and what was redaction in Mark, since we have no source for comparison. Second, as scholars studied Mark with this new approach, their respect for Mark as an author grew. Scholars became increasingly aware that traditional material was selected and arranged by Mark and often shaped by him to particular ends. So redaction criticism became a broader enterprise, encompassing both tradition and redaction. Redaction criticism remains historically oriented: it views Mark as an author in control of his material, but studies the narrative not so much for understanding the Gospel, as for what the Gospel can tell us about the Christianity of its time and its own particular historical context. In the broad sense, this methodological approach is alive and well, represented in major recent commentaries from a variety of theological perspectives.<sup>30</sup> It is indeed probably the predominant approach to be found in contemporary commentaries on Mark.

Redaction criticism has presented further challenges to the reliability of Mark's account of Jesus. In the first place, scholars using the same methodology do not reach the same conclusions. In 1989, Clifton Black demonstrated that redaction critics using basically the

---

<sup>28</sup> There were earlier forays: In addition to Wrede noted above, see Ernst Lohmeyer in Germany (Galiläa und Jerusalem, FRLANT [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1936] and R. H. Lightfoot in England (Locality and Doctrine in the Gospels [London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1938]). Both drew attention to the theological significance of Galilee in Mark.

<sup>29</sup> See, for example, Theodore J. Weeden, Mark—Traditions in Conflict (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971) and Howard Clark Kee, Community of the New Age: Studies in Mark's Gospel (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1977).

<sup>30</sup> See, for example, Robert A. Guelich, Mark 1:1–8:26, WBC 34A (Waco: Word Books, 1989); Craig Evans, Mark 8:27–16:20, WBC 34B (Nashville: Nelson Reference and Electronic, 2001); Morna D. Hooker, The Gospel According to Saint Mark, BNTC (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991); Joel Marcus, Mark 1–8: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary, AB 27 (New York: Doubleday, 1999). See also Kealy, Mark's Gospel, 159–234.

same methodology still could not agree on Mark's view of the disciples, a major issue in Markan interpretation.<sup>31</sup> Schweitzer concluded about nineteenth-century lives of Jesus that they reflected the values of the author; so too redaction critics' interpretations of Mark are affected by their own views. Second, redactional studies have shown that Mark's editorial work was substantial in the traditional material; it is not easy to establish what was pre-Markan. In 1972, Frans Neirynck published Duality in Mark, a detailed study of the repetition or two-step progression to be found throughout the Markan narrative.<sup>32</sup> Neirynck concluded that Mark's hand was to be found everywhere. The pervasiveness of Mark's editorial hand included even the passion narrative, where a written source was often presupposed. Either there was no pre-Markan written source, or Mark has so modified the source that reconstruction of its contents is not possible.<sup>33</sup>

The pervasiveness of redaction in the Gospel inevitably raised a third issue: how much has Mark changed, adapted, or created traditions as he edited them? Form criticism once appeared to be a useful tool to study the development of tradition between Jesus and the gospels; now, at least as far as the Gospel of Mark is concerned, form-critical development appears to have been swallowed up in the evangelist's redaction. The Gospel of Mark seems an ever less reliable guide to the historical Jesus.

1.6. Literary Criticism: Narrative and Reader Response Approaches<sup>34</sup>

About thirty years ago, primarily in America, redaction criticism led naturally into literary criticism. If Mark's editorial hand was so pervasive throughout the Gospel, then it made sense to study Mark as a narrative whole, as one might study a short story or a novel. Critics turned to literary tools for analysis, using methods from secular literary criticism to study Mark. Norman Petersen and Robert Tannehill

---

<sup>31</sup> C. Clifton Black, The Disciples according to Mark: Markan Redaction in Current Debate, JSNTSup 27 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1989).

<sup>32</sup> Frans Neirynck, Duality in Mark: Contributions to the Study of the Markan Redaction (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1972).

<sup>33</sup> See also John R. Donahue, Are You the Christ? The Trial Narrative in the Gospel of Mark, SBLDS 10 (Missoula, MT: SBL, 1973); Werner H. Kelber, ed., The Passion in Mark (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976).

<sup>34</sup> It should perhaps be called "new literary criticism," since source criticism was initially called literary criticism.

presented ground-breaking work in the late 1970's.<sup>35</sup> Other works rapidly followed.<sup>36</sup> Literary readings of Mark took various approaches: reading Mark in the light of first-century literary conventions of biographies or romances;<sup>37</sup> reading Mark in terms of plot, character and surface structure, that is, with a focus on the text, now called narrative criticism in biblical studies;<sup>38</sup> reading Mark in terms of reader or audience response, that is, with a focus on the reader or hearer's role in creating meaning.<sup>39</sup> Other literary approaches evolved, such as feminist readings and deconstructive criticism.<sup>40</sup> All these readings have shown Mark to be a sophisticated coherent narrative. Form criticism called into question the historical reliability of the chronology of Mark; literary criticism assigned that chronology—narrative plotting—to Mark, not to history at all. Like redaction criticism, literary criticism of Mark is alive and well in contemporary biblical scholarship.<sup>41</sup>

Literary criticism of Mark does not ask historical questions; nonetheless, it is relevant to the use of the Gospel of Mark for reconstructing

---

<sup>35</sup> Norman R. Petersen, Literary Criticism for New Testament Critics, GBS (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978); Robert C. Tannehill, "The Disciples in Mark: The Function of a Narrative Role," JR 57 (1977): 386–405.

<sup>36</sup> For an overview of literary readings of Mark, see Janice Capel Anderson and Stephen D. Moore, Mark & Method: New Approaches in Biblical Studies (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992). Feminist criticism also raises questions of historical reliability: historically, women were probably more prominent than our written texts suggest. See Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza, In Memory of Her: A Feminist Theological Reconstruction of Christian Origins (New York: Crossroad, 1983).

<sup>37</sup> Vernon K. Robbins, Jesus the Teacher: A Socio-Rhetorical Interpretation of Mark, (Philadelphia: Fortress 1984); Mary Ann Tolbert, Sowing the Gospel: Mark's World in Literary-Historical Perspective (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989).

<sup>38</sup> David Rhoads, Joanna Dewey, and Donald Michie, Mark as Story: An Introduction to the Narrative of a Gospel, rev. ed. (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1999); Elizabeth Struthers Malbon, In the Company of Jesus: Characters in Mark's Gospel (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 2000).

<sup>39</sup> Robert M. Fowler, Let the Reader Understand: Reader-Response Criticism and the Gospel of Mark (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991).

<sup>40</sup> On feminist or gender-oriented readings, see Joanna Dewey, "The Gospel of Mark," in Searching the Scriptures: A Feminist Commentary, ed. Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza, vol. 2 (New York: Crossroad, 1994), 470–509; Amy-Jill Levine, ed., A Feminist Companion to Mark, Feminist Companion to the New Testament and Early Christian Writings 2 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001); for deconstruction, see Stephen D. Moore, Mark and Luke in Poststructuralist Perspectives: Jesus Begins to Write (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1992).

<sup>41</sup> Bas M. F. van Iersel, Mark: A Reader-Response Commentary, trans. W. H. Bisscheroux (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998); Elizabeth Struthers Malbon, Mark's Jesus: Characterization as Narrative Christology (Waco: Baylor University Press, 2009).

the historical Jesus. First, it suggests non-historical and non-theological reasons for the shape of material found in Mark. An episode may be narrated simply to enhance the plot or to hold audience interest. Second, the significance of an episode is found in its function in the larger narrative. Both narrative and reader response readings have shown that Mark does not consist of individual episodes haphazardly strung on a string, but of episodes placed in particular contexts and sequence in order to convey a larger meaning. Episodes do not have significance primarily in themselves, but find their full meaning within the narrative as a whole. Thus we need to understand Mark's literary construction as a preliminary to investigating earlier tradition history or the historical Jesus. Werner Kelber writes:

If we take the final literary gospel form seriously, we will be compelled to take yet another, crucial hermeneutical step. Not only will our interpretive focus rest on the text in its present form, but the plotted nature of this final text demands that we abstain—at least for the time being—from assumptions regarding antecedent sources, stages or layers before and until we have comprehended the present text's narrative construction.<sup>42</sup>

It is important methodologically to start with the final Gospel. We actually have a reasonably certain text of the Gospel, while—at best—we can only infer the history of tradition and the historical Jesus: let us begin our task with as much solid data as possible.<sup>43</sup> Furthermore, while the role of a pericope in the Markan narrative may or may not coincide with its uses in tradition or in the ministry of Jesus, it is nonetheless a starting point, and a demonstrable use of the pericope in early Christianity. Literary criticism does not provide direct historical information; it nevertheless can function as something of a control or check on historical imagination.

Third, like the historical methodologies before it, literary criticism does not provide unanimity of interpretation. Scholars continue to disagree. An understanding of the nature of narrative makes it clear that differences are not due only to individual biases. Rather, narratives are inherently polyvalent. While certainly not all interpretations are supported by a text, more than one interpretation generally can be. This is true of narrative criticism, and is explicit in reader-response criticism. Different readers/audiences—the implied reader, the ideal reader, different first-century hearers, different modern readers—will all interpret a text somewhat differently.<sup>44</sup> Lack of unanimity in interpretation is due not only to human bias or failure; it is due to the very nature of narrative, thus of the Gospel of Mark itself.

---

<sup>42</sup> Werner H. Kelber, "The Verbal Art in Q and Thomas: A Question of Epistemology," in Oral Performance, Popular Tradition, & Hidden Transcript in Q, ed. Richard A. Horsley, SemeiaSt 60 (Atlanta: SBL, 2006, 25–42).

<sup>43</sup> Actually, even the text is not all that certain. See D. C. Parker, The Living Text of the Gospels (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997); Elden Jay Epp, "The Multivalence of the Term 'Original Text' in New Testament Textual Criticism," HTR 92 (1999): 245–281.

Finally, literary criticism raises questions about Mark. Since the beginning of historical critical work on Mark in the eighteenth century, scholars have viewed the Gospel as clumsy, unliterary, and in decidedly poor Greek. Yet, the results of literary analyses of Mark, widely accepted in general among biblical scholars, have shown it to be a sophisticated coherent narrative. Can these both be true? This leads to the last methodological approach.

1.7. Orality Studies: First-century Media World

Critical biblical scholarship was born in the age of print. The methodologies described above have generally worked on the assumption of a fixed text read silently by solitary individuals. While antiquity was a world that had known writing for centuries, it was a world in which few were literate and even the literate relied heavily on memory and oral performance. The best estimates rate overall literacy at just three to five percent of the total population,<sup>45</sup> perhaps up to fifteen percent for urban males.<sup>46</sup> Most Christians were not literate; oral performance was central and manuscripts much less important in the spread of Christianity than those of us accustomed to print tend to assume.

---

<sup>44</sup> The importance of the reader's location, even that of a modern reader, can be seen in contemporary studies of Mark from perspectives other than the standard Western white academic approach. See, for example, Brian K. Blount, Go Preach! Mark's Kingdom Message and the Black Church Today (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1998); Hisako Kinukawa, Women and Jesus in Mark: A Japanese Feminist Perspective (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1994); Tai-siong Benny Liew, Politics of Parousia: Reading Mark Inter(textually) (Leiden: Brill, 1999). Some of these readings may be closer to assumptions of the first-century world than our Euro-American academic assumptions.

<sup>45</sup> William V. Harris, Ancient Literacy (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1989); Catherine Hezser, Jewish Literacy in Roman Palestine (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001).

<sup>46</sup> Harris, Ancient Literacy, 267.

In the last twenty-five years, sparked by Werner Kelber's seminal work, scholars have begun to recognize and incorporate in their thinking the very different first-century communication system.<sup>47</sup> For investigating the historical Jesus in Mark, two issues are important: first, understanding Mark as an oral narrative and the difference that makes; and second, a revisiting of the form-critical question of the reliability of oral transmission of Jesus traditions, raised by Kenneth Bailey.

1.8. Mark as Oral Narrative

Mark is not merely a good story, as narrative criticism has shown; it is an oral story in composition.<sup>48</sup> Studies of Mark in the light of oral literature show that it is composed in an oral style.<sup>49</sup> The story consists of happenings that can be easily visualized and thus readily remembered. These happenings are connected paratactically; the narrative is additive and aggregative. Teaching is not gathered into discourses according to topic, but rather embedded in short happenings (e.g., fasting in Mark 2:18–20). The plot is typical of oral composition.<sup>50</sup> It does not build toward a linear climax—the plot to kill Jesus is first introduced at Mark 3:6. Rather, it consists of repetitive patterns, series of parallel episodes, and concentric and chiasmic structures. Such patterns aid

---

<sup>47</sup> Werner H. Kelber, The Oral and the Written Gospel: The Hermeneutics of Speaking and Writing in the Synoptic Tradition, Mark, Paul, and Q (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983).

<sup>48</sup> On storytellers in antiquity, see Alex Scobie, "Storytellers, Storytelling, and the Novel in Graeco-Roman Society," Rheinisches Museum für Philologie 122 (1979): 229–259. For a recent collection and analysis of the literary remains of storytelling in Greco-Roman, Jewish, and Christian texts, see Holly E. Hearon, The Mary Magdalene Tradition: Witness and Counter-Witness in Early Christian Communities (Collegeville, MI: Michael Glazier, 2004), 37–73, 320–336. For oral performance style in antiquity, see Whitney Shiner, Proclaiming the Gospel: First Century Performance of Mark (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity International, 2003).

<sup>49</sup> For an overview of oral composition techniques, see Walter J. Ong, Orality and Literacy: The Technologizing of the Word (London: Methuen, 1982), 36–49. For analyses of the oral style of Mark, see Joanna Dewey, "Oral Methods of Structuring Narrative in Mark" Int 53 (1989): 32–44; idem, "The Gospel of Mark as Oral/Aural Event: Implications for Interpretation," in The New Literary Criticism and the New Testament, ed. Elizabeth Struthers Malbon and Edgar V. McKnight (Sheffield: Sheffield University Press, 1994), 145–163; Pieter J. J. Botha, "Mark's Story as Oral Traditional Literature: Rethinking the Transmission of Some Traditions about Jesus," HvTSt 47 (1991): 304–331; idem, "The Historical Setting of Mark's Gospel: Problems and Possibilities," JSNT 51 (1993): 27–55.

<sup>50</sup> Ong, Orality and Literacy, 141, 142–143; Dewey, "Oral Methods," 37–38.

performers and audiences in remembering and transmitting the material. It is recognition of Mark's oral style that makes sense of the combination of Mark's narrative sophistication and his inelegant Greek.<sup>51</sup>

Based on our knowledge of oral literature, there is no reason why Mark could not have been composed and transmitted in oral form and only later been committed to writing.<sup>52</sup> It could of course have been composed in writing, most likely by dictation. Oral style can be determined, but there is no foolproof way of deciding if a particular text was composed orally or in writing using an oral register.<sup>53</sup> Most likely, our text of Mark reflects repeated interaction of oral and scribal transmission, repeated new editions if you will, as is typical in a highly aural manuscript culture.

Recognition of the oral/aural nature of Mark's Gospel complicates further our attempts to use Mark to reconstruct the history of Jesus. First, we do not even know what we have in our text of Mark. How many different oral performances and written editions, all with variations, make up our text of Mark? How close is our Gospel to the original? Can we even speak of an original manuscript or performance? The British text critic David C. Parker writes, "the concept of a Gospel that is fixed in shape, authoritative, and final as piece of literature has to be abandoned."<sup>54</sup> Our Gospel itself appears ever more unstable. Second, even when a manuscript was in existence, performances were most likely "composed in performance," not read from a manuscript or recited from a memorized text. Oral performance is never verbatim performance. Further, a live audience immediately affects the performance. The first task of a performer is to keep the audience listening; he or she will shorten or lengthen a performance depending on audience interest and will adapt its praise or critique of

---

<sup>51</sup> The notion of Mark as oral in style is hardly new. B. H. Streeter (The Four Gospels, 163) wrote early in the last century, "But the difference between the style of Mark and of the other two is not merely that they both write better Greek. It is the difference which always exists between the spoken and the written language. Mark reads like a shorthand account of a story by an impromptu speaker—with all the repetitions, redundancies, and digressions which are characteristic of living speech."

<sup>52</sup> Joanna Dewey, "The Survival of Mark's Gospel: A Good Story?" JBL 123 (2004): 495–507.

<sup>53</sup> See John Miles Foley, Immanent Art: From Structure to Meaning in Traditional Oral Epic (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1991); idem, How to Read an Oral Poem (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2002).

<sup>54</sup> See Parker, Living Text, 93.

leaders and groups depending on who is in the audience.<sup>55</sup> Form criticism earlier recognized the needs of the community in shaping individual traditions; recognition of the oral nature of the gospel tradition as a whole makes even more central the current and changing needs of the community in shaping tradition.<sup>56</sup>

Last, the awareness of Mark as oral performance shifts the emphasis from content to experience, from information to emotion. Walter Ong writes that communication is “an invitation to participation, not simply a transfer of knowledge from a place where it was to a place where it was not.”<sup>57</sup> Thus, scholars’ readings of the gospel for the information it gives us about history read against the gospel’s genre of inviting emotional response. Further, it suggests that reasons for changes and adaptations of the story may have more to do with how to arouse the desired emotional response in a particular audience than with history or theology. In summary, recognition of the oral/aural nature of the Markan story renders the text ever more flexible according to the intellectual and emotional needs of performer and audience.

1.9. Informal Controlled Oral Tradition: An Attempt to Rescue Historicity

I argued above that orality studies add to the amount and shape of community influence and thus increase the uncertainty of the historicity of Mark’s Jesus. In the last fifteen years, however, a serious attempt has been made to argue for the general historical reliability of the transmission of the Jesus tradition prior to its incorporation in Mark (and Q). Kenneth E. Bailey, a New Testament scholar and long-time resident in the Middle East, has argued for the general accuracy of the synoptic tradition on the basis of his experiences in modern village story-telling situations.<sup>58</sup> He has presented a model of transmission which he calls “informal controlled oral tradition.” N. T. Wright and

---

<sup>55</sup> Walter J. Ong, Interfaces of the Word: Studies in the Evolution of Consciousness and Culture (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1977), 69.

<sup>56</sup> The field of social memory studies can be helpful. See Alan Kirk and Tom Thatcher, eds., Memory, Tradition, and Text: Uses of the Past in Early Christianity, SemeiaSt 52 (Atlanta: SBL, 2005).

<sup>57</sup> Ong, Interfaces, 118.

<sup>58</sup> Kenneth E. Bailey, “Informal Controlled Oral Tradition and the Synoptic Gospels,” AJT 5 (1991): 34–54 (available at www.biblicalstudies.org.uk/article\_tradition\_bailey.html); for a briefer overview, see idem, “Middle Eastern Oral Tradition and the Synoptic Gospels,” The Expository Times 106 (1994–95): 363–367.

James D. G. Dunn, major Jesus scholars, have both adopted Bailey's model, and his trust in the accuracy of the tradition.<sup>59</sup>

It is important to evaluate Bailey's model, for if Bailey should be correct, then Mark would be a far more reliable guide to the historical Jesus than scholars have argued for the last one hundred years. His model, however, does not hold up to critical scrutiny. On the positive side, Bailey does provide Western scholarship with a vivid picture of village storytelling, almost nightly gatherings in villages "for the telling of stories and the recitation of poetry," during which "the community is preserving its store of tradition."<sup>60</sup> Some such storytelling gatherings likely existed in the villages of Galilee and Jesus traditions were likely to have been retold. Bailey helps us to understand the important role of storytelling in peasant village cultures. The constant retelling of stories does indeed help preserve tradition. The question remains: is that tradition historically accurate?

Bailey, I would argue, drastically underestimates the degree of change that generally occurs between an historical event and a more-or-less stable story. Most change in tradition occurs in the first forty or fewer years of transmission.<sup>61</sup> Bailey's own examples call into question his conclusions about historical accuracy.<sup>62</sup> In one example, Bailey cites a village wedding at which a friend of the groom accidentally shot and killed the groom.<sup>63</sup> After about three days, the village decided this was an act of God ("The gun fired"), and told the police that a camel stepped on the groom. Bailey states that no deception was intended, that the police knew exactly what happened. Bailey

---

<sup>59</sup> N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (London: SPCK, 1996); James D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered: Christianity in the Making (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003), 1:210; idem, A New Perspective on Jesus: What the Quest for the Historical Jesus Missed (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Academic, 2005), 42–46, 92–93.

<sup>60</sup> Bailey, "Informal Controlled Oral Tradition," 40; italics his.

<sup>61</sup> Jan Vansina, Oral Tradition as History (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1985), 17. Social memory theory also posits a solidification of memory after a few decades (Alan Kirk, "Social and Cultural Memory," in Kirk and Thatcher, Memory, 1–24).

<sup>62</sup> For a careful—and damning—analysis of all of Bailey's evidence in terms of Bailey's own criteria for flexibility and for control, see Theodore J. Weeden, Sr., "Theories of Tradition: A Critique of Kenneth Bailey" (paper presented at Westar Meeting, Santa Rosa, CA, 2004). I am indebted to Weeden for his paper and for providing me with a copy of Rena Hogg's book. I wish to be clear that I believe Bailey was not deliberately intending to mislead, although he was careless in his use of the Hogg material.

<sup>63</sup> Bailey, "Informed Controlled Oral Tradition," 48–49.

adds, “Middle Eastern peoples communicate magnificently using a very sophisticated double-talk.”<sup>64</sup> True perhaps, but this makes discerning historical accuracy more difficult! This village story illustrates, in a very condensed period of time, the transformation of an historical event to a story that served the ongoing needs of the community. The needs of the community in its present overrode the facts of the historical event. This is the norm for and typical of oral transmission.<sup>65</sup>

A second example is what appears actually to have happened in the transmission of the stories about John Hogg, a nineteenth century missionary to southern Egypt. Bailey asserts that the stories told to Rena Hogg in her 1914 biography of her father<sup>66</sup> were essentially similar to the stories he heard in Egypt some fifty years later. And indeed the two stories found both in his article and Hogg’s biography (Hogg being urinated on from above, Hogg spending a night with robbers) read like oral variants with differences in setting, narrative, and function, but recognizably the same tradition. It would be as difficult to reconstruct accurate history from these twentieth-century variants as it is from gospel variants. They provide no direct road to historical event.

The more serious challenge to Bailey’s thesis, however, is the basic perspective in which Rena Hogg places her biography—that is, her understanding of what happened between the historical events and the traditions later heard by her. In her prologue, she writes, “The days of legend have not wholly fled;” “tales have been preserved which gain in glamour with the years;” “though love and legend have kept his memory as green as the Nile valley in December, there is a danger that the message of his life may be lost under a tangled mass of fact and fiction.”<sup>67</sup> In regard to the particular story about robbers (actually melon growers protecting their crop), she describes the story she heard as “a romantic tale” that existed in multiple versions.<sup>68</sup> Hogg’s biography provides evidence not of the historical accuracy of the oral traditions but of their development and change from the

<sup>64</sup> Bailey, “Informed Controlled Oral Tradition,” 49, italics his.

<sup>65</sup> See Vansina, Oral Tradition; Kirk, “Social and Cultural Memory.”

<sup>66</sup> Rena L. Hogg, A Master-BUILDER on the Nile: being a Record of the Life and Aims of John Hogg, D.D. (New York: Fleming H. Revell, 1914).

<sup>67</sup> Rena Hogg, Master-BUILDER, 13–14.

<sup>68</sup> Ibid., 214–217.

historical facts. The stories that Rena Hogg heard from a patriarch in the early twentieth century and that Bailey heard in mid-century bear more resemblance to each other than either does to the actual historical event as described by Rena Hogg on the basis of written accounts by Hogg and his companion. The story was transformed (and enhanced) to be of use to the community, and it is that changed story that became semi-fixed and retold. The actual history is lost in the oral retellings. Unfortunately, Bailey's theory of informed controlled oral tradition does not hold up: oral tradition is not concerned to preserve historical accuracy.<sup>69</sup> Those scholars who build upon Bailey's model are building on very shaky ground. The methodological challenges described above to the historicity of the Jesus tradition in Mark remain in force.

1.10. Summary of Methods

From the glory days of source criticism and the "Markan hypothesis," when it seemed that the Gospel of Mark was a reliable guide to the life and ministry of Jesus, the succeeding methodologies, form and redaction criticism, literary criticisms, and orality studies have consistently and ever more drastically undercut the historical reliability of the gospel. I turn now to the contemporary use of Mark for reconstructing Jesus. How do scholars cope with the challenges?

2. The Historical Jesus and Mark in Contemporary Scholarship

2.1. Contemporary Scholarship on the Author, Date, Provenance, and Social Context of the Gospel of Mark

As noted, the gospel was first considered to be Mark's recounting of what he had heard from Peter about Jesus and was then demoted to an abbreviation of Matthew. In modern scholarship, the Gospel emerged again as a vital work in its own right. If scholars could determine and agree upon the origin and setting of Mark, this would provide a more secure starting point for the use of the Gospel. This, however, has not proved possible.

---

<sup>69</sup> Weeden stresses, correctly, that there is evidence for informal controlled oral tradition, but it is concerned not to preserve history but rather to serve the present needs of the community ("Theories of Tradition").

2.2. Author

Scholarship is sharply divided today on whether or not to accept the connection of Mark to Peter posited by Papias. The somewhat defensive nature of Papias' tone in the relevant passage cited earlier and the unreliability of much of his other evidence make Papias' views questionable. The very possibility of connecting the "Mark" associated with the Gospel with the "my son, Mark" of 1 Peter 5:13 may have suggested the Petrine tradition. In order to accept the Gospel as authoritative, since "Mark" was not listed among the disciples, the early church needed to connect it to apostolic tradition, and 1 Peter, almost universally agreed to be late and pseudonymous, provided a way. The evidence overall for a Petrine connection is weak. Black's comment on scholarly opinion on Markan authorship is acerbic:

In general, critics have usually settled into one of two camps. More conservative researchers have perceived some correspondence between patristic claims about Mark the Evangelist and the Gospel according to Mark, sometimes interpreting such coherence as historical authentication of that Gospel's portrayal of Jesus. More liberal investigators have often discerned little or no such coherence and, not infrequently, have regarded patristic comment about Mark and the Second Gospel as historically worthless figments of early Christians' pious imaginations. Some caricature may lurk in this characterization, but I think not much.<sup>70</sup>

As always, scholars' biases play a role in our interpretations. In any case, a connection to Peter cannot serve as a guarantor of the historicity of Mark's Gospel.

2.3. Date

There is greater agreement among scholars as to the dating of Mark—sometime between the mid-sixties and the early seventies CE and in some connection to the Roman-Jewish War of 66–70 CE. But there is debate whether the persecution discussed in Mark reflects the Neronian persecution of Christians in Rome<sup>71</sup> or tensions from the Roman-Jewish war.<sup>72</sup> Recently, even earlier dates have been proposed.<sup>73</sup>

---

<sup>70</sup> Black, Mark, 195. For his discussion of the issues, see 195–214.

<sup>71</sup> So, van Iersel, Mark.

<sup>72</sup> So, Marcus, Mark 1–8.

<sup>73</sup> James G. Crossley, The Date of Mark's Gospel: Insight from the Law in Earliest Christianity, JSNTS 266 (London: T&T Clark, 2004); Hugh M. Humphrey, From Q to

Although the internal evidence in Mark is not extensive enough to determine any exact connection, I would argue that the importance of the temple material and the little apocalypse of Mark 13 suggest that the Roman-Jewish war is either in progress or is a vital living memory, so that a date around 70 CE is more probable.

2.4. Provenance

The tradition of the Roman provenance of the Gospel has fared somewhat better than the tradition of Mark as Peter's scribe, even though the connection to Rome in antiquity seems dependent on the connection to Peter. Scholars who give some credence to the Petrine connection naturally tend to locate the Gospel in Rome. Some other scholars continue to see Rome as a probable provenance independently of the Petrine connection.<sup>74</sup> Increasingly, however, scholars have rejected Roman provenance and located the Gospel in the Near East, on the basis of internal evidence. Ernst Lohmeyer first suggested Galilee in 1936. With the rise of redaction criticism from Marxsen on, many others have followed suit, locating Mark in Galilee or Syria—most recently, Joel Marcus and Richard A. Horsley.<sup>75</sup> Basically, there is no certain external evidence and the internal evidence is not sufficiently explicit for a firm conclusion. Morna Hooker's summary seems appropriate: "All we can say with certainty, therefore, is that the gospel was composed somewhere in the Roman Empire—a conclusion that scarcely narrows the field at all!"<sup>76</sup> Yet I favor a Galilean or Syrian provenance. The theological importance of Galilee—a pretty minor

---

"Secret" Mark: A Composition History of the Earliest Narrative Theology (London: T&T Clark, 2006).

<sup>74</sup> For arguments for a Roman provenance, see van Iersel, Mark, 30–57; Martin Hengel, Studies in the Gospel of Mark, trans. John Bowden (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980), 1–30, 117–138; Robert H. Gundry, Mark: A Commentary on His Apology for the Cross (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1993), 1026–1045. For an argument against Rome and for a Syrian provenance in dialog with Hengel, see Gerd Theissen, The Gospels in Context: Social and Political History in the Synoptic Tradition, trans. Linda M. Maloney (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991), 236–249. For an excellent overview up to 1992, see John R. Donahue, "The Quest for the Community of Mark's Gospel," in The Four Gospels 1992: Festschrift Frans Neirymck, ed. F. van Segbroeck et al. (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1992), 817–838.

<sup>75</sup> Joel Marcus, "The Jewish War and the Sitz im Leben of Mark," JBL 111 (1992): 441–462; idem, Mark 1–8, 25–39; Richard A. Horsley, Hearing the Whole Story: The Politics of Plot in Mark's Gospel (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 2001), 38–51.

<sup>76</sup> Hooker, St. Mark, 8.

outpost of the Empire—in the Gospel and its rural orientation do not seem to fit well with metropolitan Rome.<sup>77</sup>

Redaction critics in particular attempt not only to determine provenance but also to construct the Markan community that the Gospel addresses. Some readings have interpreted Mark as a direct window onto the Christianity of Mark's time. In the 1970's, Theodore Weeden and Werner Kelber interpreted Mark's negative portrayal of the disciples as Mark's attack on church leaders who claimed authority from Peter.<sup>78</sup> Narrative criticism, providing internal explanations, however, has seriously undermined these readings. Is there any point, then, in positing a provenance? Some would say no: Richard Bauckham has recently argued forcefully that the gospels were not written for specific communities but for all Christians.<sup>79</sup> Dwight N. Peterson has argued that the process for determining provenance is so circular—one uses the text to posit a situation and then the situation to interpret the text—as to make the entire enterprise futile.<sup>80</sup> While Peterson is surely correct about the circularity of argument, I would suggest that the method has its uses, if only heuristically. In his recent redactional commentary, Marcus posits that the Gospel was composed in Syria after the flight to Pella but in close connection, immediately before or after, to the destruction of the temple. He uses this provenance “as the basis for inferences about how the Gospel's audience would have heard particular passages.”<sup>81</sup> Marcus argues, “[h]istorical reconstructions are important in trying to interpret a writing such as Mark, because he and other NT authors did not think they were writing timeless philosophical treatises or works of art but messages on target.”<sup>82</sup> As noted above, van Iersel posits an original audience of Christian readers in Rome as his base for interpretation.<sup>83</sup> To the extent that their interpretations based <sup>77</sup> It could be argued, of course, that the rural orientation represents Mark's faithfulness to Jesus' historical situation. Given Mark's theological and literary sophistication and the less rural atmosphere of both Matthew and Luke, this seems unlikely.

---

<sup>78</sup> Weeden, Mark; Kelber, The Kingdom in Mark: A New Place and a New Time, (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974).

<sup>79</sup> Richard Bauckham, “For Whom Were the Gospels Written?” in The Gospels for All Christians: Rethinking the Gospel Audiences, ed. idem (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997), 9–48.

<sup>80</sup> Dwight N. Peterson, The Origins of Mark: The Markan Community in Current Debate (Leiden: Brill, 2000), 3–4 and passim.

<sup>81</sup> Marcus, Mark 1–8, 36.

<sup>82</sup> Ibid., 36–37, see also 25–28.

<sup>83</sup> van Iersel, Mark.

on different provenances shed new light on particular passages of the Gospel, and on the Gospel as a whole, we have learned more about it, about what is possible and, equally importantly, about what is not. Understanding Mark's use of the material is an important preliminary to the proper use of the material to reconstruct Jesus. Nonetheless, Peterson is correct: we cannot determine provenance with any certainty. The Gospel of Mark cannot be securely grounded in any historical person, specific time or place, or particular community.

2.5. Social Context

In addition to the standard issues of author, date, and provenance, it is worthwhile to ask the question of social context: what class or social level is the composer and the Gospel's intended audience? Are they rural peasants or poor urban workers who tell and hear the Gospel performed? Or are they somewhat higher on the social scale, people who are accustomed to having the Gospel performed for them from a manuscript? As usual, opinion is divided. Burton Mack pictured Mark as "a scholar," "at a desk in a scholar's study lined with texts."<sup>84</sup> Such a scenario, if it existed in antiquity at all, would be that of an educated member of the elite, such as a Philo or Plutarch. It is incompatible with Mark's inelegant Greek. On the other side, in analyzing the social location of Mark's audience, Richard L. Rohrbaugh concludes that the story would appeal primarily to peasants and to those even more marginalized: the degraded, the unclean, and beggars and day laborers.<sup>85</sup> Horsley also locates Mark in an oral peasant village setting.<sup>86</sup> Given the limited literacy in antiquity and the clumsy Greek and highly oral nature of Mark's Gospel, I would argue that the social location posited by Rohrbaugh and Horsley is far more probable.

2.6. Contemporary Commentaries on the Gospel of Mark

Through much of the twentieth century, Markan commentaries extensively addressed the historical Jesus. A half century ago, in his classic

---

<sup>84</sup> Burton L. Mack, A Myth of Innocence: Mark and Christian Origins (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988), 321–322. See also Mary Ann Beavis, Mark's Audience: The Literary and Social Setting of Mark 4.11–12 (Sheffield: JSOT, 1989), for an interpretation that stresses oral reading from manuscripts.

<sup>85</sup> Richard L. Rohrbaugh, "The Social Location of the Marcan Audience," BTB 23 (1993): 114–127.

<sup>86</sup> Horsley, Mark, 49–51.

and influential commentary, Vincent Taylor could still basically assume the general historicity of the Markan material.<sup>87</sup> While Taylor made extensive use of form-critical categories for his analysis, and even suggested that in some instances where the pericopes lack vividness, the construction—not the tradition—is due to Mark, he thought Mark used his traditional materials virtually unchanged.<sup>88</sup> The commentary on Mark by William L. Lane in 1974 in the evangelical New International Commentary on the New Testament is the last critical commentary able to assume the general historicity of the events and sayings contained in Mark and to interpret Mark on that basis.<sup>89</sup> Even so, Lane had to argue for it: “The assertion that Mark made historical events subservient to his theological purpose demands the affirmation that there were historical events . . .”<sup>90</sup>

Since then, approaches have changed. The response of current Markan scholars to the methodological developments of the twentieth century has been to ignore or at least to subordinate any interest in the historical Jesus while writing about Mark. Two Bible dictionary articles on Mark in the early 1990’s, one liberal and one conservative, both make almost no reference to the historical Jesus.<sup>91</sup> The days of viewing Mark as a window onto Jesus are past.

There has been an absolute explosion of commentaries on Mark in recent years.<sup>92</sup> These commentaries all use redactional, narrative, or

---

<sup>87</sup> Vincent Taylor, The Gospel According to St. Mark: The Greek Text with Introduction, Notes, and Indexes, 2nd ed. (London: Macmillan, 1966 [1st ed. 1952]).

<sup>88</sup> Taylor, St. Mark, 78–89, 112–113.

<sup>89</sup> William L. Lane, The Gospel According to Mark (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974).

<sup>90</sup> Lane, Mark, 7. Italics his.

<sup>91</sup> Paul J. Achtemeier, “Mark, Gospel of,” ABD IV: 541–557, stresses Mark’s lack of historical interest; R. A. Guelich, “Mark, Gospel of,” DJG 512–525, only mentions the historical Jesus as a possible explanation of why Mark has Jesus call himself “Son of man.”

<sup>92</sup> In addition to the commentaries discussed below, critical commentaries published in 2000 or later include Sharyn Dowd, Reading Mark: A Literary and Theological Commentary on the Second Gospel, Reading the New Testament (Macon, GA: Smyth & Helwys, 2000); Etienne Trocmé, L’évangile selon saint Marc, CNT (Geneva: Labor et Fides, 2000); Edwin K. Broadhead, Mark, Readings, A New Biblical Commentary (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001); Evans, Mark 8:27–16:10; Ben Witherington III, The Gospel of Mark: A Socio-Rhetorical Commentary (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); Elian Cuvillier, L’évangile de Marc (Paris: Bayard, 2002); John R. Donahue and Daniel J. Harrington, The Gospel of Mark, SP (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical, 2002); James R. Edwards, The Gospel according to Mark, Pillar New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002); Francis J. Moloney, The Gospel of Mark: A Commentary reader response approaches, or some combination thereof. None of these commentaries makes questions of the historical Jesus central, but some do deal with historical issues, often in their notes or footnotes.<sup>93</sup> I shall briefly compare three major recent commentaries, one mainline, one conservative, and one (French) Roman Catholic. The first is Joel Marcus' mainline first volume of the new Anchor Bible commentary on Mark.<sup>94</sup> He considers Mark "a creative shaper of inherited traditions" addressing an audience in Syria sometime between 69 and 74 CE.<sup>95</sup> The second is R. T. France's in the evangelical New International Greek Testament Commentary series.<sup>96</sup> France accepts the patristic connection to Peter and Rome, and generally assumes historicity. Yet his explicit aim is to write a commentary on the narrative of Mark based on the final Greek text. The third is Camille Focant's in the Roman Catholic French language series, Commentaire biblique: Nouveau Testament.<sup>97</sup> Focant intentionally focuses on the story world and not on history; he therefore seeks to explain any passage in terms of the entire text of Mark, rather than seeking explanations external to the text.<sup>98</sup> All three commentaries provide much the same information on the Palestinian background which is necessary for modern readers to understand Mark, such as descriptions of Palestinian roofing techniques for understanding Mark 2:1–12. France's commentary perhaps provides the most, and it often reads as if Mark is pretty transparent onto history. None of them, however, investigates what is or is not likely to be historically accurate about Jesus. This was not their aim. If we want information on what about Jesus is historical in Mark, we need to look elsewhere than Markan commentaries.

---

(Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2002); Ludger Schenke, Das Markusevangelium: Literarische Eigenart-Text und Kommentierung (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 2005).

<sup>93</sup> Evans, Mark 8:27–16:20, might perhaps be considered an exception. It provides extensive and helpful bibliography and analysis. But rather than investigating what is likely to be historical and what not, it seems to assume historicity as the default position.

<sup>94</sup> Marcus, Mark 1–8.

<sup>95</sup> Marcus, Mark 1–8, 59. See also 59–62.

<sup>96</sup> R. T. France, The Gospel of Mark: A Commentary on the Greek Text, NIGTC (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2002).

<sup>97</sup> Camille Focant, L'évangile selon Marc, Commentaire biblique: Nouveau Testament (Paris: Cerf, 2004).

<sup>98</sup> Focant suggests that John Mark of Jerusalem is the likely author; he sees no Petrine influence, but thinks the Gospel is probably from Rome. More importantly, he thinks Mark is writing for a wide audience, not a specific community. Therefore, his interpretation does not make use of his understanding of provenance.

2.7. The Use of Mark in Contemporary Scholarship on Jesus

If works on Mark do not shed light on what in the Gospel is historical, we need to turn to scholars of the historical Jesus to see if they provide any more assistance. What follows is an overview of the ways Mark is used in contemporary Jesus scholarship. Scholars tend to reconstruct Jesus with one of two approaches, either evaluating each pericope piecemeal and building a picture from the pieces, or by a more holistic approach, establishing an overview of events/type of person they consider historically solid and building from there. Examples, by no means exhaustive, of the fragmentary approach are the Jesus Seminar, John Dominic Crossan, and John P. Meier.<sup>99</sup> Examples of the holistic approach include E. P. Sanders, Ben Witherington, N. T. Wright, Dale Allison, Richard Horsley, and James G. D. Dunn.<sup>100</sup>

Those treating the material in fragments vary in their reliance on Mark. The Jesus Seminar found a smaller percentage of Mark's sayings to be historical, only 10.7% for Mark compared to 17% or higher for Matthew and Luke (and Thomas).<sup>101</sup> Crossan, in making his inventory of Jesus material, gave priority to material from his first stratum, up to 60 CE.<sup>102</sup> In effect, he privileged the sayings source, since Q is part of the first stratum while Mark is not. Crossan's method, based on literary <sup>99</sup> Robert W. Funk, Roy W. Hoover, and the Jesus Seminar, The Five Gospels: The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus (New York: Macmillan, 1993); Robert W. Funk and the Jesus Seminar, The Acts of Jesus: The Search for The Authentic Deeds of Jesus (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1998); John Dominic Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1991); John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 4 vols. (New York: Doubleday, 1991, 1994, 2001, 2009).

---

<sup>100</sup> E. P. Sanders, The Historical Figure of Jesus (New York: Penguin, 1995); Ben Witherington III, Jesus the Sage: The Pilgrimage of Wisdom (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); idem, Jesus the Seer: The Progress of Prophecy (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1999); N. T. Wright, The New Testament and the People of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); idem, Jesus and the Victory of God; Dale C. Allison, Jesus of Nazareth, Millenarian Prophet (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998); Richard A. Horsley, Jesus and Empire: The Kingdom of God and the New World Disorder (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003); James D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered. Christianity in the Making, vol. 1 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); idem, A New Perspective on Jesus: What the Quest for the Historical Jesus Missed (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Academic, 2005).

<sup>101</sup> That is, coded pink or red. The statistics are taken from Powell, Jesus, 67. They are based on the official voting records of the Seminar, published in Forum 6 (1990): 3–55. No summary data are available for their ranking of the acts of Jesus, since each act was often divided into multiple parts for balloting.

<sup>102</sup> Crossan, Historical Jesus, xxxi–xxxiv; 427–430. Crossan also includes in the first stratum a hypothetical miracles collection based on John and Mark.

sources, has no way of taking into account that narrative materials, such as miracle stories and parables, are much easier to remember orally and thus are less likely to be put in writing early. It should be noted, however, that apart from or in spite of his method of analyzing Jesus traditions, Crossan's portrayal of Jesus as a peasant in a highly stratified society corresponds most closely to Mark's portrayal: Matthew and especially Luke tend to upgrade Jesus' social status.

The multivolume work of Meier, however, shows that the piecemeal approach to gospel material need not subordinate Mark. Meier formulates explicit criteria for evaluation, many of which support various Markan passages as historical.<sup>103</sup> Much in Mark meets his criterion of embarrassment (Jesus' baptism by John, Jesus not knowing the time of the end), and the criterion of rejection and execution (Matthew and Luke soften Mark's portrayal of Roman involvement in Jesus' death). Much in Mark also meets Meier's "secondary or dubious" criteria: "the criterion of traces of Aramaic," "the criterion of Palestinian environment," and the "criterion of vividness of narration." Of the three—the Jesus Seminar, Crossan, and Meier—Meier's portrait of Jesus is the most conventional. My point here is that the piecemeal approach does not necessarily marginalize Mark, and as I note elsewhere, it does not provide agreement on results.

An equally diverse picture emerges among scholars who begin with a more holistic approach. Since Mark (among the synoptics) provides the basic picture of Jesus, it is perhaps inevitable that Mark's portrait of Jesus generally serves as more foundational for such scholars, and that these scholars generally but not always produce a more traditional or Markan portrait of Jesus than the "piecemeal" scholars. I shall first contrast Wright and Witherington, then contrast Dunn and Horsley. Wright explicitly argues for a methodology of hypothesis and verification, verification depending on how much data it includes and how much light it sheds.<sup>104</sup> His starting hypothesis is that Jesus was an eschatological prophet. His aim seems to be to include a maximum amount of data. So Wright's portrait of Jesus comes out looking very much like Mark's (or the synoptics') portrait of Jesus.

Similarly, Witherington proceeds with an image of Jesus and then investigates to see how much explanatory power it offers. In his Jesus the Sage (1994), he argues in detail that a sapiential view of Jesus has great explanatory power. While Jesus the Sage certainly included a great deal of Markan material, given its emphasis on wisdom, it was more dependent on Q sayings and resulted in a less Markan portrait of Jesus. Witherington's more recent work, Jesus the Seer (1999), explicitly relies on Mark's chronology to assert that Jesus acted as a Northern Israel prophet doing miracles in Galilee, and like a Southern Israel prophet speaking oracles of woe in Jerusalem. This naturally results in a more Markan Jesus, but it is subject to the serious criticism that Mark's organization most likely reflects his own theology of Galilee as the place of the in-breaking of the kingdom of God, and not necessarily the actual progress of Jesus' ministry. Once again, views differ. The hypothesis or image of Jesus selected by a scholar tends to determine how central Mark is to that scholar's reconstruction.

<sup>103</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew, 1:168–183.

<sup>104</sup> Wright, People of God, 98–109; idem, Victory of God, 133.

In their methodology, both Dunn and Horsley explicitly reject reliance on the criterion of dissimilarity, and both stress the importance of oral tradition and performance (over dissection of literary remains) as a major clue to understanding Jesus. Here, I argue they are making solid advances over other Jesus scholars in understanding the nature of the Jesus tradition. Furthermore, both have a relatively high respect for the general historical reliability of Mark. Yet they produce radically different portraits of Jesus. Dunn's view is generally traditional, affirming Jesus' eschatological mission, his call of disciples, etc. Horsley's view is not: he sets Jesus in the context of the empire; he does not view Jesus as eschatological. Rather, he understands Jesus as calling for social and economic village renewal through revival of the popular covenant tradition. Horsley ignores (or rather rejects) the Markan discipleship theme and thus the material on Jesus' and the disciples' and others' views of Jesus' status with God.<sup>105</sup> Dunn sees the Jesus tradition beginning during Jesus' ministry and Christian post-Easter tradition in continuity with Jesus' ministry; Horsley sees the authentic Jesus tradition in sharp contrast with post-Easter developments. Even starting from similar methodological principles, Dunn and Horsley, once again, produce quite different portraits of Jesus and different understandings of how the Gospel of Mark should be used in historical reconstruction.

---

<sup>105</sup> Horsley, Whole Story, 79–120.

Dunn writes, "it is my contention that the earlier quests have failed because they started from the wrong place, from the wrong assumptions, and viewed the relevant data from the wrong perspective."<sup>106</sup> Dunn believes that starting from different presuppositions—(1) the use of an oral rather than solely literary methodology, (2) the transmission of the Jesus tradition begins pre-Easter with disciple-faith, and (3) the stress on the characteristic Jesus, the Jesus of consistent emphases—will result in more agreement. This, I fear, is wishful fantasy. As I argued above, Dunn's faith in the core stability of oral tradition, which is dependent on Bailey's work, cannot be sustained. Further, Horsley would agree with Dunn's first two presuppositions, but he has a very different characteristic Jesus. I suspect many in addition to Horsley will continue to disagree with Dunn's view that "[t]here is no credible 'historical Jesus' behind the Gospel portrayal different from the characteristic Jesus of the Synoptic tradition."<sup>107</sup> Dunn's approach is no high road to agreement on the historical Jesus or to agreement on Mark as a source for the historical Jesus. Horsley's and Dunn's methodological advances, in moving away from reliance on the criterion of dissimilarity and in insisting on the importance of the oral transmission, may in fact make historical investigation even more problematic.

3. The Future of Mark in Historical Jesus Research

Perhaps the task of using Mark to reconstruct history is simply impossible. Writing about redaction criticism twenty-five years ago, Kelber said, "The fact is that the very project of redaction criticism methodologically precludes the quest for the historical Jesus... The historical Jesus forms the basis and presupposition of theology. Interestingly, what the gospels give us is not the presupposition but the theologues."<sup>108</sup> Literary criticism, both narrative and reader-response, has only increased the methodological difficulties of using Mark as a source for reconstructing Jesus, showing Mark to be a very creative storyteller and theologian, not an historian. Oral (and textual) studies have shown us how unstable even our text of the Gospel is.

<sup>106</sup> Dunn, A New Perspective, 15. See also idem, Jesus Remembered, 327–336.

<sup>107</sup> Dunn, A New Perspective, 78.

<sup>108</sup> Werner H. Kelber, "Redaction Criticism: On the Nature and Exposition of the Gospels," PRSt 6 (1979): 4–16, at 13–14.

In consequence, we need to accept that there is no way of achieving historical certainty or even general agreement. Our data do not permit it. The more sophisticated our methods become, the more distant Mark's Jesus is from accurate history. The Gospel of Mark cannot provide a sure guide to the historical Jesus. Furthermore, human diversity and subjectivity will continue to influence all our interpretations: scholars' conclusions vary even when using the same methodologies as objectively as possible. Varied interpretations are the rule even in reconstructing modern biographies, be it of a Ronald Reagan or a Princess Diana, where we have an abundance of data and much chronological information. It is even truer for Jesus where we have a paucity of data and virtually no certain chronology. We must be content with limited certainty and the inevitability of human bias.

Yet Mark remains (along with Q) our major source for information about Jesus; if we want to know anything about the historical Jesus, we must continue to use Mark. As long as Christianity remains an important world religion, our reconstructions of Jesus matter; they are not just of antiquarian interest. If Christians are to value human life on earth, they need to value Jesus' human life. So in spite of all the historical uncertainty and our inevitable human biases, investigating Jesus is a worthwhile pursuit. I would like to conclude with three observations about using Mark in reconstructing Jesus.

First, scholars have learned from Schweitzer to ground Jesus in his own time and place, a first-century Jew from Galilee, occupied territory within the Roman Empire. In fact, I would suggest that the greatest advances in our understanding of Jesus' historical ministry in the last century are the result of our greater knowledge of first-century Judaism, of Galilee in the first century, of the dynamics of empire, and of peasant cultures in general.<sup>109</sup> Of all our canonical and non-canonical sources for Jesus, the social context of the Gospel of Mark is closest to the social context of Jesus. We need to exploit Mark in this regard.

---

<sup>109</sup> There are of course very diverse reconstructions of first-century Galilee as well as of Jesus.

Second, in using Mark as a possible guide to Jesus' public ministry, we need to pay attention to all three plot lines of Mark's narrative.<sup>110</sup> The first level is the cosmic conflict, the conflict between God and Satan, along with Satan's representatives, the demons and unclean spirits. The second or middle level is the authorities' conflict, the conflict between Jesus and the political, social, and religious establishments. The third level is the followers' conflict, conflict between Jesus on the one hand, and the disciples and the broader group of those who welcome Jesus and the kingdom of God, on the other. Scholars studying Mark or reconstructing Jesus tend to focus on only one or two of these plot levels; they generally favor either the followers' conflict or the authorities' conflict.<sup>111</sup> A more balanced, and perhaps thus more historical, portrait of Jesus needs to pay attention to both of these conflicts as well as the cosmic conflict. Understanding Mark's narrative in its fullness can assist our reconstruction endeavors.

Finally, it is time again for a commentary on Mark that focuses on what is possible or not possible to be historically accurate about Jesus, one that brings together all our current knowledge about first-century Palestine, peasant cultures, and the effects of empire as they pertain to Mark's Gospel. For example, in evaluating the pericope about paying taxes to Caesar (Mark 12:13–17), we must ask: would Roman denarii even be found in Jerusalem? We have gained much knowledge about the first century and about peasant cultures in general; it would be helpful to relate this knowledge directly to Mark.<sup>112</sup>

The Gospel of Mark can provide no sure guide to the historical Jesus. Given the nature of our data and the nature of human biases we must be content with multiple reconstructions of Jesus. Yet Mark remains an exciting Gospel and a valuable source for the historical Jesus. Careful use of Mark's Gospel will enrich our historical reconstructions.

---

<sup>110</sup> Joanna Dewey and Elizabeth Struthers Malbon, "Mark," Westminster Theological Commentary (Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 2009): 311–324.

<sup>111</sup> Horsley and Crossan emphasize the authorities' conflict, most other scholars the followers' conflict.

<sup>112</sup> The publication of Adela Yarbro Collins' Mark: A Commentary, Hermeneia (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2007), should address much of this need. It was not yet available at the time of writing.

JESUS TRADITION IN NON-MARKAN MATERIAL COMMON TO MATTHEW AND LUKE

CHRISTOPHER TUCKETT

1. Introduction

The title of this essay (provided by the editors) cries out for some clarification and/or abbreviation. The body of material in the gospels comprising the “non-Markan material common to Matthew and Luke” might, for some, be more succinctly referred to as “Q”! Such a description would however beg a number of questions which are debated today in relation to the study of the relationship between the three synoptic gospels (the so-called Synoptic Problem). And this is presumably the reason why the present form of the title has been chosen. On the other hand, any study of material in the synoptic gospels will have to engage with issues concerning the Synoptic Problem at some stage of the discussion and will probably have to make some important assumptions (which, if nothing else, should be clarified for the reader). The present essay is no exception, and so at the start I lay out my own working assumptions (most of which will have to remain simply stated, since an essay about the historical Jesus is not the forum in which to argue in detail about the Synoptic Problem).

In fact, the title chosen for this essay by the editors has already made some implicit assumptions: by choosing (and asking a contributor) to focus on the “non-Markan material common to Matthew and Luke,” there is presumably an assumption that it is meaningful and sensible to distinguish between Markan and non-Markan materials in these two gospels. And behind this is presumably the presupposition of the theory of Markan priority, viz. that the agreements between Matthew and Luke in their Markan material are due to their common use of Mark. Such a theory is very widely (though not universally) held today;<sup>1</sup> it is one to which I myself would subscribe and will be presupposed here.<sup>2</sup>

The theory of Markan priority is often (but again not universally) taken as part of a broader theory, viz. the so-called Two Source Theory (2ST). This argues that the agreements between Matthew and Luke in the non-Markan material they share in common are to be explained by their common dependence on a shared source, or body of source material, usually known as “Q.” However, even amongst those who hold to a theory of Markan priority, such a Q theory is not held by all. Some would argue that any Q theory is unnecessary, and that the Matthew-Luke agreements are to be explained by the direct dependence of one gospel on the other (usually Luke dependent on Matthew).<sup>3</sup> Others might hold to a Q theory in very general terms, but thinking of “Q” as a fairly broadly defined “body of traditions” and without making any assumptions about whether this tradition existed in a unified form, let alone as a written “text,” prior to its use by Matthew and Luke. Others in turn would wish to argue that Q was indeed a unified body of tradition, perhaps written, and that it is indeed appropriate to think of it as a (single) “source.”

For myself, I have argued elsewhere that the evidence is perhaps best explained by the last of these three possibilities mentioned above, viz. that the nature of the Matthew-Luke agreements seems to demand the existence of a common source “Q,” and that this source probably existed in written form (probably in Greek).<sup>4</sup> In part such a theory arises from a common order discernible in the “Q” material,<sup>5</sup> as well

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. proponents of the Griesbach hypothesis, arguing that Mark is the third gospel to be written, not the first, and that Mark used both Matthew and Luke as sources. The general theory of Markan priority would also be questioned by those who hold to more complex solutions to the Synoptic Problem, e.g., recently D. Burkett, Rethinking the Gospel Sources. From Proto-Mark to Mark (London: Continuum, 2004).

<sup>2</sup> For arguments against the Griesbach Hypothesis, see my The Revival of the Griesbach Hypothesis (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983).

<sup>3</sup> In the modern debate, see e.g., M. D. Goulder, Luke—A New Paradigm (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1989); M. Goodacre, The Case against Q (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2002); and the essays in Questioning Q, ed. M. Goodacre and N. Perrin (London: SPCK, 2004).

<sup>4</sup> See my Q and the History of Early Christianity (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1996), ch. 1. Also J. S. Kloppenborg, Excavating Q. The History and Setting of the Sayings Gospel (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 2000), ch. 2.

<sup>5</sup> “Common” in the sense of an order common to both Matthew and Luke. However, one has to make allowances for Matthew’s evident policy of collecting material of Jesus’ teaching into the five major teaching “blocks” in his Gospel.

as the at times verbatim agreement in Greek between Matthew and Luke (cf. e.g., Q 3:7–9),<sup>6</sup> a number of common features which appear to be both characteristic and distinctive of this body of material within the synoptic tradition as a whole. In turn, this has led some to discern a possible “theology of Q” in this material, with the likelihood that those who assembled this material may have had their own distinctive ideas which affected their choice of what to include as well as possibly adapting and changing the tradition themselves as “redactors” (in the same way as Matthew and Luke redacted Mark).

One further refinement of the Q theory may also be mentioned here since it is argued by some to bear directly on the main topic of this essay. Many have argued that the body of Q material had already undergone a process of growth and development by the time it reached its “final” stage of being used by Matthew and Luke. Thus behind Q, some claim that we can detect earlier stages, or strata, of the Q document: hence behind Q there might be a Q<sup>1</sup>, a Q<sup>2</sup>, a Q<sup>3</sup> etc. This is above all the theory proposed by John Kloppenborg who suggests that three main strata are discernible within Q;<sup>7</sup> and others have endorsed his proposals enthusiastically whilst also modifying them at times (e.g., to vary the number of stages proposed).<sup>8</sup>

I have considered the general issue elsewhere and have argued that such theories are perhaps too optimistic and more precise than the evidence will legitimately allow. There can be little doubt that some/many of the individual Q traditions represent the end-point of what has been quite a complex development in the tradition (e.g., Q 7:18–35, or Q 10:1–16). But it is quite another matter to argue that the Q tradition as a unified whole underwent an identifiable development in the way suggested by Kloppenborg and others. Thus my own view would be that, in discussing “Q,” one should confine attention to the body of material as it appears to have been used by Matthew and Luke. Theories

---

<sup>6</sup> I follow what has become the standard practice of referring to Q traditions by “Q” + the chapter and verse numbers of the Lukan version: hence “Q 3:7–9” means the Q tradition found in Luke 3:7–9 and its Matthean parallel (here Matt 3:7–10).

<sup>7</sup> See J. S. Kloppenborg, The Formation of Q (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1987); the theory is repeated again, engaging fully with other critiques, in his Excavating Q, esp. ch. 3.

<sup>8</sup> Cf. e.g., below on the work of Mack.

about possible earlier editions of Q, or layers within Q, must remain somewhat hypothetical.<sup>9</sup>

However, whatever the merits or otherwise of Kloppenborg's theories about strata within Q, the relevance of such theories to the study of Jesus are probably severely limited. Kloppenborg's theories relate very strictly to the possible growth of the document Q: he argues that an early form of Q (a "Q<sup>1</sup>") containing primarily "sapiential" material was subsequently expanded by more polemical material, dominated by threats of prophetic judgement against "this generation," to form a "Q<sup>2</sup>" (with a further subsequent smaller expansion to form a "Q<sup>3</sup>"). But this is a theory about the growth of the literary text Q. It says—and should imply—nothing about the relative authenticity of different parts of Q in its "present" form. The theory presupposes that a Q<sup>2</sup> editor added in a body of material to an earlier collection (Q<sup>1</sup>) to create an expanded version of this earlier collection. But this makes no assumptions one way or the other about the authenticity of the material added by the putative Q<sup>2</sup> collector/editor, nor about the authenticity of the material assembled by the compiler(s) of Q<sup>1</sup>. It might be that the Q<sup>2</sup> material is inauthentic in large part, added to a basically authentic Q<sup>1</sup> collection. But equally, it could be that the Q<sup>2</sup> material is just as authentic as that in the proposed Q<sup>1</sup>. So too it could be that the Q<sup>1</sup> material is in large measure inauthentic and that the addition of the Q<sup>2</sup> material provides an expansion of this by essentially authentic material. Kloppenborg himself has made the point forcefully on more than one occasion.<sup>10</sup> However, this has not stopped others attempting to exploit

---

<sup>9</sup> See my "On the Stratification of Q," Semeia 55 (1991): 213–233; also my Q and the History, esp. 70–75. There is perhaps something of a growing reaction among Q scholars today against Kloppenborg's stratification model: whilst fully endorsing a Q theory (in the sense of advocating a view that Q was a single unified source), they would argue that Q should be treated as a single whole and not divided into strata too readily: so e.g., J. Schröter, Jesus und die Anfänge der Christologie: Methodische und exegetische Studien zu den Ursprüngen des christlichen Glaubens (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 2001); P. Hoffmann, "Mutmassungen über Q. Zum Problem der literarischen Genese von Q," in The Sayings Source Q and the Historical Jesus, ed. A. Lindemann, BETL 158 (Leuven: Peeters, 2001), 255–238; A. Kirk, The Composition of the Sayings Source: Genre, Synchrony and Wisdom Redaction in Q, NovTSup 91 (Leiden: Brill, 1998). See J. D. G. Dunn, "'All that glisters is not gold.' In Quest of the Right Key to unlock the way to the historical Jesus," in Der historische Jesus. Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. J. Schröter, BZNW 114 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002), 131–161, at 136.

<sup>10</sup> See e.g., his Formation, 244–245: "To say that the wisdom components were formative for Q and that the prophetic judgment oracles and apophthegms describing Jesus' his theories about the stratification of Q by applying them to study of the historical Jesus in the way suggested above, as we shall see.

This essay is of course meant to be about the historical Jesus and the contribution the Q material makes to studying Jesus. It is not intended to be an essay about Q for Q's own sake. However, the two areas of study—study of the historical Jesus and study of Q—were not always regarded as separate at all. In the late nineteenth century and early twentieth century, interest in Q and its possible existence arose as an aspect of the Synoptic Problem, and that problem was thought to be directly relevant to the quest for the historical Jesus.<sup>11</sup> Certainly within the early debates about the Synoptic Problem, the issue about gospel sources was believed to impinge directly and almost without remainder on study of Jesus. Thus the earliest sources, almost by virtue of being the earliest, could be taken as reliable in absolute terms in the sense of giving us immediate and direct access to the historical figure of the pre-Easter Jesus. For example, Holtzmann's postulated earliest source in Mark's Gospel was taken as ipso facto a reliable account of the life and ministry of the historical Jesus.<sup>12</sup> Similarly, the Q source as used and developed by scholars such as Harnack was taken as a reliable account of the teaching of the historical Jesus.<sup>13</sup> Equally too theories about a proto-Luke source, or a special source lying behind the Lukan passion narrative, were developed by scholars such as conflict with 'this generation' are secondary is not to imply anything about the ultimate tradition-historical provenance of any of these sayings. It is indeed possible, indeed probable, that some of the materials from the secondary compositional phase [= "Q<sup>2</sup>"] are dominical or at least very old, and that some of the formative elements [= "Q<sup>1</sup>"] are, from the standpoint of authenticity or tradition-history, relatively young. Tradition history is not convertible with literary history and it is the latter we are treating here." See also his Excavating Q, 351.

---

<sup>11</sup> See D. Lührmann, "Die Logienquelle und die Leben-Jesu-Forschung," in The Sayings Source Q and the Historical Jesus, ed. A. Lindemann, ed. A. Lindemann, BETL 158 (Leuven: Peeters, 2001), 191–206.

<sup>12</sup> H. J. Holtzmann, Die synoptischen Evangelien. Ihr Ursprung und geschichtlicher Charakter (Leipzig: Engelmann, 1863); cf. his "Lebensbild Jesu nach der Quelle A," 468–96 (for Holtzmann, his 'Quelle A' was very close to the Gospel of Mark).

<sup>13</sup> A. von Harnack, The Sayings of Jesus (ET: London: Williams & Norgate, 1908); cf. his claim: "Q is a compilation of discourses and sayings of our Lord, the arrangement of which has no reference to the Passion, with an horizon which is as good as absolutely bound by Galilee, without any clearly discernible bias, whether apologetic, didactic, ecclesiastical, national, or anti-notional" (171). Q thus gives us a presentation of the teaching of Jesus himself, almost totally uncontaminated by any later influences or people.

Streeter and Taylor to argue for the potential historicity of such (a) source(s).<sup>14</sup>

Today we are fully aware of the methodological difficulties involved in such a naïve equation between relative literary priority and absolute historical reliability. Programmatic here was undoubtedly Wrede's work on the "messianic secret" in Mark,<sup>15</sup> where Wrede showed that our earliest gospel account (Mark) is shot through with post-Easter ideas and influences (in the secrecy elements) and hence we cannot make a neat simple equation between the Jesus of Mark's Gospel and the historical Jesus. And as the source criticism of the nineteenth-twentieth centuries gave way in turn to form criticism and redaction criticism (and all the later "criticisms"!), the contribution of the evangelists and other early Christians in shaping, adapting and possibly at times creating the Jesus tradition has been widely recognised. And of course, in turn, this has led to the all-but-universal acknowledgement of the fact that recovering information about the historical Jesus is inherently problematic and not straightforward.<sup>16</sup>

Today it is taken as axiomatic that we cannot equate the Jesus of Mark with the historical Jesus without remainder. Yet what applies to Mark (and derivatively to Matthew and Luke) applies to the Q material as well. The studies on Q of the last 40 years or so have convinced many that Q, no less than Mark (or Matthew and Luke), is—at least potentially—influenced by the perspectives and situations of later (post-Easter) followers of Jesus. Hence we can no longer simply equate the Jesus of Q with the historical Jesus. As Kloppenborg has said, "The 'Jesus' of Q has the same status as the 'Jesus' of Mark."<sup>17</sup> The kind of move made by scholars such as Harnack and others in the past (effec-

---

<sup>14</sup> B. H. Streeter, The Four Gospels (London: Macmillan, 1924); V. Taylor, Behind the Third Gospel (Oxford: Clarendon, 1926).

<sup>15</sup> W. Wrede, Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1901); ET: The Messianic Secret (London & Cambridge: James Clarke, 1971). Wrede's work comes at the end of the so-called "old/first quest" for the historical Jesus; and although Albert Schweitzer is often credited with having brought this Quest to an end, Wrede's work was probably far more significant in this respect in showing that the methods and approaches of the "old quest" could no longer be sustained.

<sup>16</sup> Whatever one's beliefs about the relative reliability of different parts of the gospel traditions, no one today would seriously deny that the "problem" of the historical Jesus is a genuine problem!

<sup>17</sup> J. S. Kloppenborg, "Discursive Practices in the Sayings Gospel Q and the Quest of the Historical Jesus," in The Sayings Source Q and the Historical Jesus, ed. A. Lindemann, BETL 158 (Leuven: Peeters, 2001), 149–190, at 161–162.

tively equating Q's Jesus with the historical Jesus) is not really a live option for most studying the historical Jesus today. The fact that those responsible for producing the Q document, like Mark, may have been actively involved in shaping, selecting and possibly adapting the Jesus tradition means also that we have to take seriously the possibility that some parts of Q are due to the later redactional activity of (a) Q editor(s). And just as no one today would ascribe elements of Matthew's or Luke's redaction of Mark to the historical Jesus, so too we cannot ascribe elements which are (or might be) QR<sup>18</sup> to the historical Jesus either.<sup>19</sup>

On the other hand, we should bear in mind that, while the general principle (that QR elements cannot be ascribed to Jesus) may be theoretically unassailable, it may be less easy to apply in practice. First, it is by no means easy to identify QR elements. In the case of Matthew and Luke, identifying MattR/LukeR elements is relatively straightforward, at least in Markan material, in that we have direct access to Matthew's/Luke's source, viz. Mark; we can then make a direct comparison and see where Matthew/Luke has changed Mark.<sup>20</sup> In the case of Q, life is not so simple since we do not have Q's source materials to hand. We do not even have the text of Q itself extant in any manuscript but have to deduce it from the (indirect) evidence of its use by Matthew and Luke.<sup>21</sup> Thus we may not be able to identify QR elements

---

<sup>18</sup> I use the shorthand "QR" to refer to such "Q redactional" material.

<sup>19</sup> See J. S. Kloppenborg, "The Sayings Gospel Q and the Quest of the Historical Jesus," HTR 89 (1996): 307–344, at 326: Q is "a document whose editorial features must be noted and weighed before blithely ascribing its contents to Jesus. Clearly, elements of Q redaction cannot be employed in a reconstruction of Jesus."

<sup>20</sup> I say "relatively straightforward," though one should also bear in mind such complications as the fact that Markan priority is not universally accepted and secure; also, even assuming Markan priority, we cannot assume necessarily that the text of Mark used by Matthew or Luke was precisely the same as that of our Nestle-Aland text. Further some might wish to argue that, in individual pericopae, Matthew and/or Luke may have had access to independent versions of the same tradition: see e.g., J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003), raising the possibility that many of the parallels between Matthew, Mark and Luke might be explained by common dependence on oral tradition, rather than via direct literary dependence. For further arguments in relation to Q tradition, see his "Q<sup>1</sup> as oral tradition," in The Written Gospel: Festschrift G. Stanton, ed. M. Bockmuehl and D. Hagner (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2005), 45–69.

<sup>21</sup> If one is being precise, one should maybe also remind oneself that we do not have the "original" text of any of the gospels: all we have is later scribal copies, perhaps several stages removed from the original.

with anything like the same degree of certainty as in the cases of Matthew and Luke.

Given this situation, it has probably been more profitable within study of Q to focus more on what Kloppenborg has called the “invention” or “arrangement” of the Q material. By “invention,” Kloppenborg explicitly rejects any notion necessarily of “fabrication,” but means rather the strictly rhetorical sense, denoting the intellectual process of finding and arranging material germane to the conduct of an argument and the rendering plausible of a certain conclusion.<sup>22</sup>

The jargon we use may vary. For others, such an approach might be termed “composition criticism” rather than “redaction criticism,” paying attention to the way in which the total material is now presented, almost irrespective of its ultimate origin.<sup>23</sup>

In relation to study of the historical Jesus, this means however that QR elements, in the sense of elements actually created de novo by a Q editor, may only be identified as such relatively rarely in the search for a “Q theology” or in a “redaction-critical” approach to Q, using the term “redaction” very broadly.<sup>24</sup> And even if we can plausibly identify elements of Q’s particular theological concerns (“redaction” in a very broad sense), that may not tell us very much either way about the authenticity of the material and/or ideas in Q: for if the particular concerns of the Q editor emerge from a process of “finding and arranging,” quite as much as from any creating or adapting, there might well be considerable continuity between Q and Jesus rather than any radical discontinuity.

In assessing the authenticity of Q, or of individual parts of Q, we must of course also bear in mind that the Q material provides us with only a part of the total evidence of the Jesus tradition. Any judgements about the authenticity or otherwise of the Q materials, or of parts of Q, will have to mesh in with a broader judgement about the authenticity of otherwise of other parts of the tradition. I have already noted the dangers of equating (absolute) historical reliability with (relative) liter-

---

<sup>22</sup> “Sayings Gospel Q,” 326.

<sup>23</sup> See my Q and the History, 76–80.

<sup>24</sup> I.e., to refer to the particular interests and concerns that may have guided the Q editor(s), rather than to specific positive changes which any Q editor might have made to the tradition.

ary priority: the fact that Mark and Q are prior to Matthew and Luke does not make Mark or Q necessarily historically reliable in absolute terms. In the case of texts which are in a literary relationship with each other (Matthew/Luke with Mark/Q), it might well be appropriate to say that the earlier form of a tradition is more likely (relatively!) to be authentic than a later form which used the earlier one as a source. However, in the case of traditions which are not in a direct literary relationship with each other, such a judgement is potentially dangerous. We cannot necessarily privilege one source over against another which is independent of it, without further justification.

2. Some Recent Studies of Jesus and Q

In order to see how these general comments relate to study of Jesus, I consider briefly here some recent discussions which have made significant use of Q. Although few if any today would follow the example of someone like Harnack, simply equating Q with Jesus tout court,<sup>25</sup> some have tried to exploit more recent Q studies in a more sophisticated way, some in particular applying Kloppenborg's theories about strata within Q in writing about the historical Jesus. The most notable examples in recent years are probably James Robinson, Burton Mack and Dominic Crossan.

2.1. James M. Robinson

The work of James Robinson in recent years has been focused very much on Q, in particular his efforts to establish a "critical edition" of the Q text.<sup>26</sup> However, in a recent essay on "The Critical Edition of Q and the Study of Jesus,"<sup>27</sup> Robinson has sought to go further and develop what he sees as the implications of theories about Q for study of the historical Jesus. Robinson accepts wholeheartedly Kloppenborg's theories about strata within Q, distinguishing the older "sapiential" material in the oldest stratum from the later, "prophetic" or "judgemental" elements in the material possibly added later in the development of Q. However, in this essay, Robinson makes a further, methodologically significant, step, virtually equating what he calls "the archaic collections of Q" (by which he means the material broadly speaking in Kloppenborg's "Q<sup>1</sup>") with the historical Jesus without remainder; and conversely, material identified as coming from the later strata of Q (Kloppenborg's "Q<sup>2</sup>" material) is taken, virtually ipso facto, as inauthentic material which does not go back to the historical Jesus and is indeed quite foreign to the genuine picture of Jesus as derived from the "Q<sup>1</sup>" material. Thus in relation to the material deemed to be the oldest within Q, he writes:

<sup>25</sup> Though perhaps the approach of J. P. Meier is not far removed: see his A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus (New York: Doubleday, 1994), 2:177–181, and his reference to Q as a "grab-bag," as well as his negative views about attempts to discern a distinctive "theology" of Q or "community" behind Q. On Meier, cf. Kloppenborg, "Sayings Gospel Q," 326; "Discursive Practices," 155, 163f.

<sup>26</sup> See J. M. Robinson, P. Hoffmann, J. S. Kloppenborg, eds., The Critical Edition of Q (Minneapolis: Fortress and Leuven: Peeters, 2000).

<sup>27</sup> J. M. Robinson, "The Critical Edition of Q and the Study of Jesus," in The Sayings Source Q and the Historical Jesus, ed. A. Lindemann, BETL 158 (Leuven: Peeters, 2001), 27–52.

It is in the archaic collections embedded in Q that one can with the most assurance speak of material that goes back to sayings of Jesus himself.<sup>28</sup>

Any presentation of Jesus that lacks at its core these collections that comprise the oldest core of Q is to that extent deficient.<sup>29</sup>

He then drives at times a sharp wedge between the ideas of these collections and the (later) Q redaction (i.e. "Q<sup>2</sup>"), e.g., in relation to the latter's stress on the threat of judgement. Thus the Q redaction has in fact glossed over central dimensions in the archaic collections, as to how, in Jesus' view, one should think of God...<sup>30</sup>

One must take seriously the substantive—theological and ethical—tension between the two main layers of Q, that of the archaic clusters, and that of the final redaction. Jesus' vision of a caring Father who is infinitely forgiving... may have been lost from sight a generation later.<sup>31</sup>

In all this, then, a tension is seen between the outlook of Q<sup>1</sup> and Q<sup>2</sup>, and Q<sup>1</sup> is equated with the historical Jesus almost tout court. Thus for Robinson, the model of Kloppenborg can be exploited not only to reconstruct the earlier history of the Q tradition, but also to make important deductions about the nature and shape of the authentic Jesus tradition. In terms of substance, the focus of the historical Jesus on God as the infinitely forgiving, caring Father has been significantly

<sup>28</sup> "Critical Edition of Q," 44.

<sup>29</sup> Ibid., 45. His stress.

<sup>30</sup> Ibid., 39. My stress.

<sup>31</sup> Ibid., 42–43. My stress.

affected and changed by the inauthentic Q<sup>2</sup> material with its polemical and judgemental slant.

Related too is perhaps the move that Robinson also makes to focus attention almost exclusively on the Q material alone and to exclude other gospel materials (e.g., in Mark) from consideration as possible sources of information about the historical Jesus. Thus he appeals to K. L. Schmidt's work on the Markan narrative sequence as being secondarily added to the tradition, and hence not historical,<sup>32</sup> as the basis for the judgement that the prime evidence for Jesus should be "Sayings Gospels" and not "Narrative Gospels."<sup>33</sup>

Both these moves are highly questionable and open to potential criticism. For example, in relation to the last point, the fact that some (even all) of the framing elements in the Markan narrative may well be unhistorical does not mean that all the material in Mark as a "Narrative Gospel" is rendered worthless for recovering information about Jesus.<sup>34</sup> Schmidt's analysis relates primarily to (and only to) the outline as provided by Mark. It does not relate in the same way to the individual elements of the tradition as recorded in Mark; indeed in many ways, Schmidt's work can be taken as opening up the possibility that the prime evidence for information about Jesus should be sought precisely in the individual traditions and pericopes which are framed within the Markan outline. Certainly an appeal to Schmidt in no way justifies a move which excludes all the Markan material as effectively inauthentic, just because it appears in the context of a "Narrative Gospel." Such a move is open to the charge of privileging one source within the tradition over another without adequate justification.

Equally, within his use of the Q material, Robinson's approach is in danger of applying Kloppenborg's theories about the literary growth of Q to a quite different area of concern, viz. the study of the historical Jesus, and failing to heed Kloppenborg's own warnings (cf. above) that tradition history is not to be identified with literary history and that it is only the latter to which Kloppenborg's theories can really legitimately be applied as they stand. Thus the neat equation made between

---

<sup>32</sup> K. L. Schmidt, Die Rahmen der Geschichte Jesus (Berlin: Trowitzsch & Sohn, 1919).

<sup>33</sup> Robinson, "Critical Edition," 30–31.

<sup>34</sup> Cf. too J. Schröter, "Von der Historizität der Evangelien. Ein Beitrag zur gegenwärtigen Diskussion um der historischen Jesus," in Der historische Jesus. Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. idem, BZNW 114 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002), 163–212, at 180–181, 185.

the earliest stage/stratum in Q with authentic Jesus material, and conversely later additions in Q with inauthentic material, is too simplistic and simply not justified by the theories which allegedly buttress it.

2.2. Burton Mack

Methodologically, an approach very similar to Robinson's is adopted by Mack—and exactly the same criticisms can be brought to bear. In a number of recent studies, Mack has sought to develop the picture of Jesus as a Cynic-type aphorist,<sup>35</sup> and to a significant extent, his theories are based on theories about the nature of Q, in particular about stages within Q and the growth of Q.<sup>36</sup> Mack ostensibly builds his case on the work of Kloppenborg in claiming that the Q material can be divided into different strata and that these strata can be put into a chronological sequence.<sup>37</sup> He then effectively makes a fairly simple equation of the historical Jesus with the earliest layer in Q, and couples this with the negative converse that later strata in Q are deemed to be alien to the historical Jesus. Thus he writes about the material in the earliest stratum of Q which he identifies:

If we ask about the character of the speaker of this kind of material, it has its nearest analogy in contemporary profiles of the Cynic-sage. This is as close to the historical Jesus as Q allows us to get, but it is close enough for us to reconstruct a beginning of the movement that is both plausible and understandable.<sup>38</sup>

---

<sup>35</sup> Most clearly in The Lost Gospel. The Book of Q and Christian Origins, B. Mack, (San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1993).

<sup>36</sup> See Kloppenborg, "Discursive Practices," 160, for a defence of Mack, claiming that Mack's theories also depend on his theories about Mark, about kingdom sayings, and about Galilee. Nevertheless, it remains the case that theories about Q seem to be crucial in Mack's approach.

<sup>37</sup> In fact Mack's own stratigraphical analysis is different from Kloppenborg's (postulating ca. five, rather than three, stages) and the basis for such a division is by no means clear: certainly the ascription of some elements to one stratum rather than another is at times somewhat arbitrary and contradicts the very reasons for postulating a stratigraphy (e.g., by Kloppenborg) in the first place. For a detailed critique, see J. M. Robinson, "The History of Religions Taxonomy of Q: the Cynic Hypothesis," in Gnosisforschung und Religionsgeschichte: Festschrift K. Rudolph, ed. T. Schweer and S. Rink, (Marburg: Elwert, 1994), 247–65. Robinson's criticisms are perhaps slightly ironic, given that he makes a methodological move which is very similar to Mack's, identifying "early Q" as authentic, even though the detailed application is different.

<sup>38</sup> Mack, Lost Gospel, 203. It seems clear that the "plausible and understandable" picture is being equated with the historical Jesus without too many qualms or exceptions.

The strata he [= Kloppenborg] identified in the compositional history of Q as a document I have taken as a written record of the social history of the first followers of Jesus.<sup>39</sup>

Conversely, the division of material between “Q<sup>1</sup>” and “Q<sup>2</sup>,” with the former containing “aphoristic wisdom” and the latter “apocalyptic prediction and pronouncement of doom” suggests that aphoristic wisdom is characteristic of the earliest layer. This turns the table on older views of Jesus as an apocalyptic preacher and brings the message of Jesus around to another style of speech altogether.<sup>40</sup>

As with Robinson, an important methodological step is taken in seeing the earliest stratum within Q as determinative in any reconstruction of the historical Jesus. Kloppenborg’s own warnings here, about the dangers of confusing tradition history and literary history, are apparently being ignored, as are also all the dangers of focusing too closely on one and only one strand of the gospel tradition and ignoring others (such as Mark, M or L).

2.3. J. Dominic Crossan

Dominic Crossan’s work on the historical Jesus is one of the landmark studies in the recent spate of publications about Jesus which have appeared in recent years.<sup>41</sup> His theories about Jesus as a “Mediterranean Jewish peasant” are well known and have been much discussed. In terms of method, it is clear too that Crossan bases much of his work on the Q material in the gospels. Crossan is unusual in devoting an extensive amount of his discussion specifically to methodological issues and seeking to clarify and to justify the approaches he adopts in his study.

---

<sup>39</sup> Mack, “Q and a Cynic-like Jesus,” in Whose Historical Jesus?, ed. W. E. Arnal and M. Desjardins (Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press: 1997), 25–36, at 31; my stress. The equation seems quite explicit here between the (alleged) early/late literary stages of Q and the early/late stages of the (social) history of the community responsible for Q. Cf. too J.W. Marshall, “The Gospel of Thomas and the Cynic Jesus,” ibid., 37–60 (40): “Mack uses Kloppenborg’s stratigraphy and treats what Kloppenborg designates as primary in a literary sense as also historically primary. He makes no allowance for authentic Jesus sayings employed in the framing redaction.”

<sup>40</sup> B. Mack, A Myth of Innocence. Mark and Christian Origins (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988), 59.

<sup>41</sup> Probably the most influential study has been his The Historical Jesus. The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1991). For a restatement and further defence of many of his views (with further elaboration in relation to other matters), see his The Birth of Christianity (Edinburgh, T&T Clark, 1999).

In particular, his work in producing a “database,” or “inventory,” of materials in the gospels, and seeking to assess their historicity on the basis of some clearly defined criteria, is well known. Clearly too the Q material plays a highly significant role within Crossan’s overall reconstruction of Jesus, and Crossan also explicitly adopts Kloppenborg’s theories about strata within Q.

Whether in fact these stratification theories as such play a significant role in Crossan’s overall theories is however doubtful. In setting up the different sources which are to be placed within his “database,” Crossan does explicitly distinguish between “Q<sup>1</sup>” and “Q<sup>2</sup>,” and assigns material accordingly to these two, allegedly different, “sources.” On the other hand, an important aspect of Crossan’s overall methodology is to privilege (a) material that appears in the earliest sources, and (b) material which appears in more than one source. In this respect, the difference between “Q<sup>1</sup>” and “Q” becomes less important, since Crossan assigns both Q<sup>1</sup> and Q<sup>2</sup> to his earliest time period:<sup>42</sup> hence the two strata have equal status in terms of Crossan’s methodology. Further, given the importance for Crossan of the criterion of multiple attestation, Q attestation for an individual tradition counts as only one “vote.”<sup>43</sup> Hence, just as important for Crossan are his theories about the Gospel of Thomas, which as often as not provides possible independent attestation for material in the synoptics and again, as often as not, parallels material which appears in Q<sup>1</sup> (rather than Q<sup>2</sup> or Mark). Hence the fact that Q<sup>1</sup> material figures prominently in the material taken as authentic in Crossan’s overall depiction of Jesus is due as much to his other theories about the importance of a criterion of multiple attestation and about Thomas as it is about theories of Q’s possible stratification.

This is not the place to discuss issues about Thomas. Crossan’s theories about the independence of Thomas are at least questionable and others might wish to (and do!) argue that parallels between Thomas and the synoptics are not necessarily due to independent attestation of material thereby perhaps shown to be authentic, but rather due to Thomas’s dependence (at however many stages removed) on the synoptic gospels themselves.<sup>44</sup>

---

<sup>42</sup> Crossan assigns each of his sources to one of four time periods: 30–60, 60–80, 80–120 and 120–150 CE. See The Historical Jesus, 427–434.

<sup>43</sup> See Kloppenborg, “Discursive Practices,” 160.

<sup>44</sup> I have argued for this in my “Thomas and the Synoptics,” NovT 30 (1988): 132–157; also see my “The Gospel of Thomas: Evidence for Jesus?,” NTT 52 (1998): 17–32.

More important however here may be issues about dating. As is well known, Crossan assigns the various sources in his overall “inventory” to four different time spans, and then privileges material to be found in the earliest period. In this schema, Q (including both Q<sup>1</sup> and Q<sup>2</sup>), together with Thomas, are assigned to the earliest stage of the tradition (30–60 CE). Gospels such as Matthew, Mark or Luke are assigned to later time periods. All this is however somewhat arbitrary, as I have tried to show elsewhere.<sup>45</sup> The dating of Q and of Thomas are both highly controversial. Some would date Q rather later than 60 CE (the cut-off date for the end of Crossan’s earliest stratum).<sup>46</sup> So too many would date Thomas considerably later than 60 (especially those who would see this text as dependent on the finished versions of the synoptics: cf. above). Further, it is not at all clear why a date of 60 CE should be regarded as critical in this context: why not 70, or 75 CE (in which case a text like Mark might well come into the frame as a possible candidate for belonging to the earliest stratum)?

In addition to issues about chronology, Crossan’s appeal to source theories is highly selective: he accepts that behind Matthew and Luke lies a source Q (which he is confident enough to divide into earlier and later strata) and Q traditions are dated on the basis of the proposed date of Q; but other materials in the gospels are assigned simply to the gospels in which they now appear and their attestation is dated by the (presumed) date of that gospel. Hence e.g., material appearing only in Luke is dated on the basis of its attestation in Luke, even though some of this material may well go back behind Luke to earlier source(s). If one were being consistent and assigning material on the basis of the extant texts in which such materials now appear, then all the Q material would/should also be dated on the basis of the dates of the gospels of Matthew and/or Luke, not of a (non-extant postulated) source Q!<sup>47</sup> Thus built into Crossan’s methodology, in allowing Q as a separate, datable source but denying that possibility for other possible sources

---

<sup>45</sup> See my “The Historical Jesus, Crossan and Methodology,” in Text und Geschichte: Festschrift D. Lührmann, ed. S. Maser and E. Schlarb (Marburg: Elwert, 1999), 255–279.

<sup>46</sup> See e.g., P. Hoffmann, “QR und der Menschensohn: eine vorläufige Skizze,” in The Four Gospels 1992: Festschrift F. Neirynck, ed. F. van Segbroeck et al., BETL 100 (Leuven: Peeters, 1992), 421–456.

<sup>47</sup> This is in no way intended to question the Q hypothesis, but simply to argue that, when discussing all the material in the synoptic tradition, one perhaps ought to work with as level a playing field as one can!

behind the synoptic gospels, there is a privileging of Q which is hard to justify, and an implicit rejection of the value of other materials which may potentially have as much right to be considered as authentic Jesus material as Q does.<sup>48</sup> Crossan's work thus has the effect of privileging Q material (in relation to other material elsewhere in the synoptic tradition) in a way that is not necessarily justifiable.

3. Q and Eschatology

In the second part of this essay I consider one particular issue which has become very significant in relation to study of the historical Jesus, and where the evidence of Q (or perhaps Q<sup>1</sup> or QR) has been taken as having a significant effect on our understanding of Jesus and the Jesus tradition. This concerns the presence or absence of eschatology, especially an imminent futurist eschatology, in the teaching of the historical Jesus. The question is of course a very important one in modern Jesus study with, at one end of the spectrum, scholars like Crossan, Mack and others arguing that none of the authentic Jesus tradition implies an imminent end of the world, and others such as Dale Allison arguing for a thoroughgoing apocalyptic interpretation of Jesus.<sup>49</sup> Moreover, as we have seen, some of these arguments for a "non-eschatological Jesus" are based closely on the evidence of Q, with appeals being made to a Q<sup>1</sup> stratum as giving a more authentic picture of Jesus.<sup>50</sup> I have already tried to draw out some of the methodological weaknesses of some of these approaches earlier in this essay, especially in relation to the work of Crossan and Mack. However, the case for the possibility that the material implying an imminent eschatology might not be authentic has been developed recently with considerable sophistication in two recent essays by John Kloppenborg,<sup>51</sup> who is cer-

---

<sup>48</sup> Crossan's theories about Jesus also depend at critical points on the ways in which he describes and isolates the individual units of the tradition (what Crossan calls "complexes"). At various points, the identification (or non-identification) of what are taken as witnesses to such complexes has a profoundly significant effect on the overall picture of Jesus that results. See my "Historical Jesus, Crossan and Methodology," 266–268.

<sup>49</sup> Cf. D. C. Allison, Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1998). For Mack's and Crossan's major works on Jesus, see above.

<sup>50</sup> Though for Crossan, this is coupled with issues about the relative dates of other sources, as well as theories about Thomas, as we have seen.

<sup>51</sup> See Kloppenborg, "Sayings Gospel Q" and "Discursive Practices."

tainly fully aware of all the methodological problems of appealing to a possible Q<sup>1</sup> too quickly as giving us immediate access to the historical Jesus. It is therefore with Kloppenborg's two writings that I am engaging with primarily in the final section of this essay here.

Kloppenborg argues that the evidence of Q may have an important contribution to make to the debate about eschatology in the teaching of Jesus. In particular he argues that "it is impossible to deduce from Q a coherent temporal scenario of imminent cosmic transformation, as can be done in the case of Mark 13."<sup>52</sup> There are announcements of judgement,<sup>53</sup> some of which may be authentic, but "most, however, give no indication of how near such a judgment might be." Thus there is "no temporal horizon for Q 6:37–38 and 6:47–49. The first only indicates that judgment will occur, and the second, that non-adherence to Jesus' words will lead to disaster." Similarly, judgment sayings occur in 11:19 and 12:9, "indicating that it is certain; but there is no indication of its imminence."<sup>54</sup> Sayings such as 12:39–40; 17:26–27, 34–35 imply that judgment is "quite unpredictable... Such sayings seem, if anything, to be formulated against the expectations conjured up by Mark 13."<sup>55</sup>

In fact, Kloppenborg argues, "it is only the literary and redactional juxtaposition of these oracles with the Baptist oracle (Q 3:7–9, 16–17) that confers the impression of imminence at the level of Q redaction."<sup>56</sup> In addition the imminence of the judgement motif is enhanced in 10:9–15 by 10:12 which links the announcements of the kingdom with the judgement oracles of 10:13–15, but Q 10:12 is widely accepted as a QR creation. Similarly the doom oracle of 11:49–51 gains its note of imminence with the threat of judgement against "this generation" in v. 51b, but 11:51b is also widely regarded as a QR addition to the oracle. "The impression of imminent catastrophic judgment that it conveys is a function of Q's framing."<sup>57</sup> Sayings such as 12:49 may be a QR creation; the parable in Q 12:42–46 may be a secondary creation.<sup>58</sup> And

<sup>52</sup> "Discursive Practices," 165; "Sayings Gospel Q," 341.

<sup>53</sup> In "Sayings Gospel Q," Kloppenborg mentions Q 10:13–15; 11:19, 24–26, 31–32; in "Discursive Practices," he adds Q 6:37–38, 47–49; 10:12, 50, 51; 12:8, 9, 39–40, 42–46, 49, 58–59.

<sup>54</sup> "Discursive Practices," 165.

<sup>55</sup> Ibid.

<sup>56</sup> "Sayings Gospel Q," 341; cf. "Discursive Practices," 166.

<sup>57</sup> "Discursive Practices," 168.

<sup>58</sup> "Sayings Gospel Q," 341; "Discursive Practices," 168.

the saying 13:28–29 may imply an element of imminence with its second person plural address, “but the centre of gravity of this saying is not with the temporal aspect but rather with the inversion of social roles,”<sup>59</sup> contrasting those claiming privilege on the basis of kinship with outsiders, a theme which is prominent elsewhere in Q’s rhetoric.

Kloppenborg concludes that Q indeed implies an imminent judgement and an imminent intervention by God. But those features are conveyed by redactional elements. “It would be most unwise to base a conclusion that Jesus embraced an imminent catastrophic judgment on elements in Q that are either non-dominical or redactional.”<sup>60</sup> In his earlier essay, Kloppenborg is a little more positive. He says that in general terms one must assume an element of continuity between Jesus and Q and hence “the gap between Jesus and Q is probably not too great.”<sup>61</sup> Thus, “Q’s willingness to use the symbol of God’s kingship to undergird its social practice and its invocation of scenarios of judgment (to create ‘room’ for that practice) no doubt suggests that both aspects had roots in Jesus’ discourse.”<sup>62</sup> He cites Koester to the effect that a non-eschatological Jesus would make early Christianity, which is so eschatologically oriented, a “complete conundrum”; nevertheless, he claims that “a Schweitzerian Jesus reconstructed in the image of John makes the restraint of Q (to say nothing of the Gospel of Thomas) a yet more serious conundrum.”<sup>63</sup>

There is much here with which I have little quarrel. I would not dispute Kloppenborg’s claim that e.g., Q 12:49 and 12:42–46 may not be dominical.<sup>64</sup> So too I agree with Kloppenborg (and several others) that verses like Q 10:12 and 11:51b may well be QR creations. On the other hand, we should be clear what we are discussing or might be arguing or disagreeing about. That the eschatology of Q is rather different in tone from the eschatology of Mark, and especially of Mark 13, is undisputed and undeniable. (How far Q’s eschatology or “apocalyptic” is unusual in relation to a broader spectrum of Jewish “eschatological” or “apocalyptic” texts is more debatable and may depend on

<sup>59</sup> “Discursive Practices,” 169, cf. “Sayings Gospel Q,” 342.

<sup>60</sup> “Discursive Practices,” 169.

<sup>61</sup> “Sayings Gospel Q,” 343.

<sup>62</sup> Ibid.

<sup>63</sup> Ibid. Cf. H. Koester, “The Historical Jesus and the Cult of the Kyrios Christos,” HDB 24 (1995): 13–18 (14).

<sup>64</sup> Whether Luke 12:49 is relevant to the study of Q is another matter: there is no parallel in Matthew and hence its presence in Q is uncertain.

just what one allows as legitimate “apocalyptic” material.) Yet very few today would argue that the detailed apocalyptic timetable of e.g., Mark 13 is something that can confidently be traced back to the historical Jesus. That chapter is more likely to reflect the views and concerns of Mark, rather than of Jesus, and in turn may be concerned as much to dampen down any apocalyptic enthusiasm and expectation as it is to encourage such hopes.<sup>65</sup>

Equally we have to be aware of the limited nature of the evidence we have. Kloppenborg is right to refer to the fact that a number of sayings in the tradition refer to a future judgement but do not explicitly mention its imminence. On the other hand, we must ask whether one would expect to see such explicit references every time! No speaker, teacher or preacher spells out all the assumptions, presuppositions and a full statement of their views on each and every occasion: at times some things can be—and have to be—taken as read. In any case there is a sense in which the threats of judgement only have a sense of relevance and urgency if it is assumed that such judgement is imminent.

We also have to remember that no discourse—by Jesus, Q’s Jesus, or Mark’s Jesus—takes place in a vacuum. It is certainly the case that the threats of judgement in Q gain an (increased) note of imminence by being set in a (literary) context of the Baptist’s oracles. Yet any discourse of the historical Jesus requires a social context to give it meaning. Now it is widely accepted that part of the “social” or “religious” background of Jesus’ ministry is precisely the activity of John the Baptist. The baptism of Jesus by John is one of the best attested events in Jesus’ life;<sup>66</sup> and whatever the event may have meant for Jesus’ inner thought processes, it seems to imply at the very least an agreement by Jesus with John’s message and a willingness to align himself positively with John’s cause.<sup>67</sup> Further, it is (fairly) widely agreed that, of all the elements in the gospel tradition about John’s preaching, it is his eschatological preaching that is most likely to be authentic. This then suggests that placing Jesus within a context of John’s eschatological preaching is not only a result of Q’s editorial activity; it is something we can, with a certain amount of confidence,

---

<sup>65</sup> The interpretation of the chapter is much debated; for the above, see M. D. Hooker, “Trial and Tribulation in Mark XIII,” BJRL 65 (1982): 78–99.

<sup>66</sup> Few have disputed the historicity of the baptism of Jesus, especially in the light of the evident embarrassment it caused for early Christians.

<sup>67</sup> Cf. E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985), 91–95, 152–156.

trace back to the historical Jesus himself.<sup>68</sup> Q's literary activity in placing the teaching of Jesus in the context of John's preaching may thus be a reliable reflection of the context in which the teaching of Jesus should be placed.<sup>69</sup>

Thus any note of imminence in the Jesus tradition is not necessarily just a reflection of Q's redactional and literary activity. Whether we land up with a "Schweitzerian" Jesus is another issue which there is no space to discuss here. The nature and the role of eschatology, and of an imminent futurist eschatology, within the teaching of the historical Jesus, is obviously a topic which needs considerably more discussion and precision. Its presence in some shape or form is however certainly attested by Q; and even after making full allowance for the redactional and editorial activity by Q in reworking the Jesus tradition it received, there seems little to suggest that, in this respect, Q and Jesus were radically different from each other.

One may also consider here a slightly broader issue. The threats of catastrophic judgement are all part of the "Q" material (for those who accept the stratigraphical analysis of Q on which the terminology is based). I have earlier referred to the dangers of separating off the "Q<sup>1</sup>" material from "Q<sup>2</sup>" and assigning only the former to the historical Jesus, primarily in terms of methodology: such a procedure may be pressing literary-critical judgements into a tradition-critical area where they are in danger of being inappropriate if not irrelevant.

However, in relation to the material itself, other factors may also be relevant in this discussion. The "Q<sup>2</sup>" material contains much of the "apocalyptic" and/or "prophetic" material in the tradition, where Jesus is seen as being more polemical, attacking opponents etc. By contrast the Jesus of "Q<sup>1</sup>" is more irenic, perhaps the almost playful Cynic-sage of Mack, the Jewish Cynic peasant of Crossan, or the teacher of infinite forgiveness of Robinson.<sup>70</sup>

---

<sup>68</sup> Unless one postulates a change of mind on the part of Jesus and distinguishes between an "early Jesus" and a "later Jesus": cf. Crossan, Historical Jesus, 237–238, arguing that Jesus initially aligned himself with John but later changed his mind. Such a theory is of course possible, though it opens the floodgates to all kinds of possibilities and it is then hard to know what kind of controls one could have in assessing the evidence.

<sup>69</sup> For a generally positive view of the authenticity of the sayings about judgement in the synoptic tradition, see too M. Reiser, Jesus and Judgment. The Eschatological Proclamation in its Jewish Context (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1997).

<sup>70</sup> Indeed it was precisely this distinction between the more overtly polemical material and the more irenic appeals to the sensibilities of the audience that functioned as Yet, as I have sought to argue elsewhere, any attempt to reconstruct a picture of the historical Jesus has to pass a number of critical tests. Of course any sifting of the individual elements of the tradition has to go through the process of considering the “criteria for authenticity” such as dissimilarity, coherence, multiple attestation etc. in some shape or form. But any final result, any picture which claims to re-present the historical Jesus with any degree of accuracy, has to pass a further acid test in that it must “cohere” or “fit” with the unquestioned fact that Jesus was crucified.<sup>71</sup> No one has ever seriously doubted the fact of the cross. Explaining it in any detail is of course notoriously problematic. But at the very least, this brute fact has to be placed alongside any reconstruction of the historical Jesus and some attempt made to explain how the latter could end up crucified. And it may be a difficulty for some “Q<sup>1</sup>-based” historical Jesuses that the resulting picture is so unpolemical, and inoffensive, that it becomes all the harder to envisage why such a Jesus aroused such intense passion and hatred on the part of at least some sections of the population that he was executed in this way. Unless one goes down the route of saying that the cross was a complete accident of history, and that it bore no relationship at all to Jesus’ life and activity,<sup>72</sup> then it seems one needs an element of real polemic and offensiveness in Jesus’ teaching to explain his death (at least in very general terms). A reconstruction of Jesus who is too “Q<sup>1</sup>”-like is thus perhaps historically unpersuasive if only because alongside any such Jesus one has to put the brute fact of the cross.

4. Concluding Words

This essay has made no attempt to provide a comprehensive coverage of the Jesus tradition preserved in “Q,” nor to provide an analysis of how a Q editor might have imposed his/her own particular ideas on the tradition preserved. All I have tried to do is to highlight some of the problems in using Q to make deductions (positive or negative) about the historical Jesus. My final section has argued that, in broad terms, the criterion for distinguishing strata in Q at all: cf. Kloppenborg, Formation, 167, 238, and the appeals there to “projected/implied audience(s)” as distinguishing the strata.

---

<sup>71</sup> See my “Sources and Methods,” in The Cambridge Companion to Jesus, ed. M. Bockmuehl (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001), 121–137, at 136.

<sup>72</sup> Such a move is a theoretical possibility—Jesus was executed almost by accident—but few if any have felt comfortable with such a view.

there may be as much continuity between the historical Jesus and Q as there is discontinuity. However, one cannot simply identify Jesus and Q without remainder. The studies of Q in recent years have made it very clear that, as with Mark and the other gospels, the Q tradition must be treated with care and sensitivity and with due attention paid to the fact that those who assembled, preserved and transmitted the Q material were probably Jesus followers themselves: as such they may have influenced and affected the tradition in ways we have become accustomed to accept, at least in principle, in the case of the synoptic evangelists and their predecessors and/or communities. No doubt, between Q and Jesus there are elements of continuity and discontinuity. Sorting out where these are to be identified remains the task of all those engaged with the so-called quest for the historical Jesus.

THE SPECIAL MATERIAL IN MATTHEW'S GOSPEL

DONALD SENIOR, C.P.

The precise question addressed by this chapter is: To what extent does the "special material" in Matthew's Gospel provide historically reliable information about Jesus of Nazareth? The goal, therefore, is not to explain or interpret all of the special material found in Matthew's Gospel, but to survey special material that could potentially yield historical information about Jesus. In a most basic way, "special material" in Matthew would refer to any elements of the Gospel without parallel in Mark or Luke. However, this definition needs further refinement, because modern scholarship has assigned much of this so-called special material to the redactional activity of the evangelist rather than to pre-existing tradition, written or oral. Streeter's hypothesis, shared by other prominent English exegetes of the time, that the Matthean special material could be traced to a unified special source, originating in Jerusalem in the early 60's of the first century and strongly Palestinian in character, has few if any adherents today.<sup>1</sup>

A significant related question is one's working hypothesis about the interrelationship of Mark, Matthew and Luke. The dominance of the two-source theory continues to hold, despite some flurry of interest in the Griesbach or other theories.<sup>2</sup> Therefore, Mark and Q are considered as the primary sources for Matthew's Gospel. In the strictest sense, "special material" with a potential to yield historical information about Jesus of Nazareth would be only that material in the Gospel, whether sayings, narrative or other types of literary material, that cannot be assigned either to Mark or Q or to the literary creation of the evangelist.<sup>3</sup> The presence of Matthean vocabulary or style in special material does not necessarily rule out the presence of traditional

---

<sup>1</sup> B. H. Streeter, The Four Gospels (London: Macmillan, 1924).

<sup>2</sup> See the discussion in Frans Neirynck, "Synoptic Problem," in The New Jerome Biblical Commentary, ed. R. Brown, J. Fitzmyer, and R. Murphy (Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1990), 595.

<sup>3</sup> See the complete list of special material passage in The Gospel According to Saint Matthew, ed. W. D. Davies and Dale C. Allison, The International Critical Commentary, vol. 1, (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1988), 122-124.

elements. However, passages which show strong evidence of Matthean literary style, reflect the Gospel's characteristic theological interest, and whose presence may be prompted by editorial prompts or leads found in either Mark or Q, may have only a tenuous claim to be pre-Matthean traditional material.

Even special material that may be judged to have originated in pre-Matthean tradition may ultimately yield little or no historically reliable information about Jesus of Nazareth. Some of this material focuses on other characters in the Gospel (e.g., Matthew's account of the death of Judas in 27:3–10) or is more likely assigned to the level of post-resurrection ecclesial concerns rather than to the time of Jesus himself (e.g., the story about the temple tax in 17:24–27).

With these limitations in mind, this chapter will rapidly survey examples of special material in Matthew that at least have a potential for providing information about the historical Jesus, using some of the recent commentaries on Matthew's Gospel as a sampling of scholarly opinions.

1. A Catalogue of the Special Material in Matthew

Prior to assessing the historical value of specific material, it is useful to identify the most significant special material found in Matthew's Gospel. There are various ways the material can be sorted, e.g., by form, i.e., as discourse, narrative, isolated sayings, etc., or by content, e.g., infancy narratives, Petrine stories, passion narratives, etc. For example, Davies and Allison provide the following grouping in their commentary on the Gospel, once they have eliminated from the list what they consider purely redactional material:<sup>4</sup>

- (1) The infancy narratives: 1:18–2:23. The title of the Gospel is obviously Matthean redaction and the genealogy itself is drawn from I Chronicles and Ruth, although significantly edited by the evangelist. The remaining narratives dealing with the birth and naming of Jesus, as well as the visit of the magi, the threat of Herod, and the flight into Egypt, are without parallel in Matthew's main sources.

---

<sup>4</sup> Davies and Allison, The Gospel According to Saint Matthew, 1:124–127.

- (2) Parables: 13:24–30, 44–46, 47–50; 18:23–35; 20:1–16; 21:28–32; 22:1–14; 25:1–13, 14–30, 31–46. Virtually all of these parables coincide with the characteristic language and theological interests of Matthew's Gospel, yet they differ in style and function. Some may contain traditional materials.
- (3) Isolated sayings: 5:5, 7, 8, 9; 5:41; 7:6; 10:23; 11:28–30; 16:17–19. While grouped under a single heading, these sayings are quite diverse in form and content. Matt 5:5, 7, 8, 9 represent additions to the list of the beatitudes found in Luke (Q) as well as sayings added to the Sermon on the Mount (5:41; 7:6). The material in 11:28–30 appears to draw on wisdom traditions and is representative of Matthew's high christology, while 16:17–19 is linked to the Gospel's Petrine material (and could be included with other special narrative material about Peter such as 14:28–31 or 17:24–27).
- (4) Groups of Sayings: Davies and Allison identify three groups of sayings that may have been linked in tradition prior to their incorporation in the Gospel: the so-called antitheses in 5:21–24, 27–28, 33–37; the material on authentic piety in 6:1–18, and the strong critique of the scribes and Pharisees in 23:1–3, 5, 7b–10, 15–22. Davies and Allison contend that these three groups of sayings may all be drawn from a single, "anti-Pharisaic source which instructed Jewish Christians on the differences between themselves and the unbelieving members of the synagogues. It told the followers of Jesus to accept the words of the Jewish leaders (23:2–3) but to beware of imitating their hypocritical actions (6:5, 7, 16, 17; 23:3). It called for humility and purity of intention; it stressed that religious consciousness should be focused not on one's fellows but on the Father in heaven (6:1, 3–4, 6, 17–18; 23:8–12)."<sup>5</sup>
- (5) Narrative traditions about the passion and resurrection of Jesus: Davies and Allison group a number of special narrative materials found in the passion story (the death of Judas in 27:3–10, Pilate's wife in 27:19, the exchange between Pilate and the crowds in 27:24–25, the phenomena at the death of Jesus 27:51b–53, the guards at the tomb 27:62–66; 28:2–4, 11–15), and the appearance of the Risen Christ to the women (28:9–10).

---

<sup>5</sup> Davies and Allison, The Gospel According to Saint Matthew, 1:127.

David Hill arranges the special material in another way that highlights the content as well as the form of Matthew's additions, while emphasizing the major division between discourse and narrative.<sup>6</sup> His list, however, includes blocks of material that could be judged to be Matthean redaction rather than traditional material:

- a) Discourse material found in the Sermon on the Mount, chapter 23, and in special parables.
- b) Narrative materials found in a) the birth stories (chs. 1–2); b) Petrine stories (14:28–31; 16:17–19; 17:24–27; 18:15–22); c) Passion and Resurrection stories (26:52–54; 27:3–10, 19, 24–25, 51, 53, 62–66; 28:2–4, 9–20).
- c) Miscellaneous: 3:14–15 (exchange between Jesus and John the Baptist); 4:23 and 9:35 (summary of Jesus' mission); 15:22–24 (exchange with the Canaanite woman); 17:6–7 (addition to the story of the transfiguration); 21:10–11, 14–16 (additions to the entrance into Jerusalem).

Ulrich Luz observes that texts which should be assigned to Matthew's own composition show evidence of "greater intensity" in the use of characteristic Matthean language. He concludes that "almost all" the individual stories that Matthew adds to Markan parallels have been formulated in writing for the first time by the evangelist (he cites as examples Matt 17:24–27; 27:3–10). Likewise, the infancy narratives of Matt 1:18–2:23 were composed for the first time by the evangelist on the basis of oral traditions. On the other hand Matthew may have found some of his "larger unique" parables in a pre-existing written source as is also the case for some sections of the Sermon on the Mount (e.g., 5:21–14, 27–28, 33–37; 6:1–6, 16–18).<sup>7</sup>

Perhaps the most vigorous proponent of Matthew's own composition of the vast majority of the special material is Robert H. Gundry.<sup>8</sup> On the basis of a close examination of Matthean style, including vocabulary and typical grammatical expressions, as well as the recur-

---

<sup>6</sup> David Hill, The Gospel of Matthew, New Century Bible (London: Oliphants, 1972), 31–34.

<sup>7</sup> Ulrich Luz, Matthew 1–7: A Continental Commentary (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989), 48–49.

<sup>8</sup> Robert H. Gundry, Matthew: A Commentary on His Handbook for a Mixed Church under Persecution, 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994).

rence of characteristic Matthean motifs and appeals to Old Testament passages and motifs, Gundry concludes that, particularly in passages parallel to Mark or Q, the evangelist employed his redactional skill to amplify the material in his two sources. However, it should also be noted that Gundry believes that the scope of Q was far more extensive than usually recognized. Some of the passages that appear as special Matthean material are actually due to Matthew's more radical editing of Q. He believes this includes the nativity story and such material as the parable of the two sons (Matt 21:28–32), which is a Matthean version of the parable of the prodigal son in Luke 15:11–32.<sup>9</sup>

Obviously, these lists exclude passages that may be unique to Matthew, but which a majority of commentators do not believe are traditional materials. Such, for example, is the great commission scene at the end of the Gospel 28:16–20, which most interpreters view as an editorial summary on the part of the evangelist (with the possible inclusion of a traditional baptismal formula) and, as already noted, the genealogy of chapter 1, which is edited from Old Testament texts. There is a great deal of debate about the text type of the formula quotations and whether they were drawn from a pre-Matthean collection or, most likely, represent the redactional work of the evangelist himself.<sup>10</sup> In any case, these Old Testament quotations and their application by the evangelist yield no particular historical information about Jesus of Nazareth, but rather serve the theological perspective of Matthew's Gospel. Many other briefer additions and alterations throughout the Gospel are better assigned to the editorial activity of the evangelist in relation to his source material, and will not be considered in this survey.

2. Assessing the Special Material

To comprehensively evaluate even this more narrow range of material would require a study of every individual saying and narrative in Matthew that is without parallel in Mark or Luke, a task that exceeds the scope of an individual chapter. However, samplings of the various categories, especially in texts that might provide information about the historical Jesus, can give the reader a good indication of what is at stake.

---

<sup>9</sup> Gundry, Matthew, 4–5.

<sup>10</sup> See the discussion in Donald Senior, "The Lure of the Formula Quotations: Re-assessing Matthew's Use of the Old Testament With the Passion Narrative as Test Case," in The Scriptures in The Gospels, ed. C. M. Tuckett (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1997), 89–115.

As noted above, the hypothesis championed by Streeter and others that Matthew drew on a single traditional source for all of the special material has not found much support in subsequent scholarship. There are two reasons for this: (1) ongoing analysis of the language and characteristic interests of Matthew's Gospel has assigned significant amounts of special material to the evangelist rather than to tradition; and (2) special material found throughout the Gospel that may have a claim to some traditional source is not uniform in language and perspective. In fact, most commentators who do uphold some degree of traditional origin for Matthew's special material tend to judge that in most instances prior to Matthew's Gospel, the special material existed in oral form and was first put into written form by the evangelist and thoroughly adapted to his theological perspective and the contours of the Gospel.

2.1. Narrative Material

2.1.1. Infancy Narrative

Virtually all of chapters 1 and 2 of the Gospel are unique to Matthew. Except for the names of Jesus, Mary and Joseph, the affirmation of the virginal conception, the location of Jesus' birth in Bethlehem, and the ultimate location of the family in Nazareth (with different explanations of how the family came to be there), there are no parallels between the accounts of Matthew and Luke.

Most of the basic content of the Matthean infancy story can be traced to three potential sources:

(a) Reflection on Old Testament stories and popular Jewish traditions derived from the Old Testament

For example, the role of Joseph and his dreams and his protective role for the messiah and his family are evocative of the Genesis stories about Joseph the patriarch; the cruelty of Herod and his determination to eliminate a claimant to the throne evoke the story of Pharaoh and Moses; the identification of Bethlehem as the city of David echoes traditions in 1 Samuel 16 and Ruth; the appearance of the star recalls the blessing of Balaam in Numbers 24:7; the flight into Egypt and the return of the family evoke the Jacob and Exodus traditions. Likewise, the presence of the biblical genealogy and the presence of five formula quotations in these chapters (1:22–23; 2:5–6, 15, 17–18, 23) emphasize the major role that reflection on the Hebrew scriptures has played in the formulation of this material.

(b) Reflection on the public ministry of Jesus

The events of the infancy narrative foreshadow the public ministry of Jesus as presented in the body of the Gospel: e.g., the christological significance of the names of Jesus, which emphasizes the soteriological perspective of the Gospel (26:26), and Emmanuel, which reflects Matthew's emphasis on the presence of the Risen Christ in the community (see 18:20; 28:20); the identification of Jesus with Nazareth in Galilee (see 4:12–13); the hostility of the religious leaders and the threats of Herod, which foreshadow the polemical aspects of the Gospel and the passion narrative; the homage of the magi in contrast to the threats of the Jerusalem leaders, which foreshadows the reactions of benevolent Gentiles such as the Centurion of 8:5–13 and the Canaanite Woman (15:21–28) and the final endorsement of a Gentile mission (28:16–20; see also 21:43).

(c) Popular traditions available in Matthew's Jewish Christian community

This latter category is harder to pin down but may include such materials as the negative images of Herod and Archelaus; popular variations on biblical stories about the child Moses (such as those found in Josephus) applied to Jesus' own nativity and childhood; the unusual circumstances surrounding the conception of Jesus (with Joseph's erroneous surmise about Mary's pregnancy reflecting similar situations in the case of the women in the genealogy, particularly that of Tamar).<sup>11</sup>

In other words, Matthew's infancy narrative would appear to be a product of the evangelist's own literary activity, weaving together various inspirations from the Hebrew scriptures and popular interpretations of these applied to the origin of Jesus, reflections on the ultimate destiny of the adult Jesus available in traditions drawn from Mark and

---

<sup>11</sup> See the comments of Raymond E. Brown, The Birth of the Messiah: A Commentary on the Infancy Narratives in Matthew and Luke (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1977), 32–28.

Q, and the evangelist's own characteristic interpretation of Jesus' life and mission. This does not preclude the possibility of pre-Matthean Christian traditions about the nativity of Jesus to which the evangelist would have had access in his community. But it is probable that Matthew is the first to put these traditions into a coherent written narrative. In any case, little "reliable historical information" about Jesus of Nazareth can be drawn from this category of special material other than the rudimentary information already present in Matthew's two main sources.<sup>12</sup>

2.1.2. The Petrine Stories

Virtually all of the special Petrine narrative material found in Matthew should also be assigned to the redactional activity of the evangelist. In each instance, with the possible exception of 17:24–27, Matthew's material takes its cue from leads within the Markan parallel. In these materials too, there is little evidence of any firm historical tradition behind Matthew's additions, although some strongly assert the traditional character of 16:17–19.

The embellishment of the story of Jesus' walking on the water by the addition of material on Peter in 14:28–30 is a clear example of Matthew's redactional work, as was pointed out many years ago by Bornkamm in his pioneering work of redaction criticism which used this narrative as an illustration.<sup>13</sup> The language of this passage is characteristically Matthean and the function of the passage is clearly homiletic in tone, illustrating Peter's role as a representative disciple in the midst of crisis. The character of Peter amplifies in Matthean terms the fearful reactions of the disciples and Jesus' reassurance, which are already part of the Markan story (Mark 6:49–50). Whereas Mark's version ends by emphasizing the continuing obtuseness of the disciples, Matthew characteristically softens their response by labeling Peter's response as "little faith" (14:31; see also, 6:30; 8:26; 16:8; 17:20) and by having the story conclude with the acclamation of the disciples (contrast Mark 6:51).

---

<sup>12</sup> While conceding major redactional elements, Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1:190–195, also detect the presence of pre-Matthean tradition in addition to the fundamental historical elements noted above. They project a three-stage development of traditional material, beginning with a portrayal of Jesus' nativity on the pattern of popular stories about Moses, a second stage which expanded by means of elements of Davidic christology (e.g., the annunciation to Joseph and the legend of the magi and the star) and a third redactional stage where Matthew put these traditions in writing, blending in the formula quotations. Luz is less certain about the tradition history of the infancy narrative but emphasizes a major role for Matthean redaction. Oral traditions inspired by Moses stories and other traditions shared with the Lukan narrative were shaped by Matthew in writing for the first time (Matthew 1–7, 115–118).

<sup>13</sup> See G. Bornkamm, "The Stilling of the Storm in Matthew," in Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew, ed. idem, G. Barth, and H. Held (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1963), 52–57.

In part because of the passage's role in later ecclesial controversies, there is extensive debate about the traditional character of Matthew's special material concerning the confession and subsequent blessing of Peter in Matt 16:16–19, where the evangelist, although taking his cue from the parallel in Mark 8:27–30, gives Peter a more significant role.<sup>14</sup> Following the disciples' acclamation of Jesus in the conclusion to the story of walking on the water (Matt 14:33), Peter's confession of Jesus as "the Christ, the Son of the living God" is in accord with Matthew's christology and contrasts with the briefer confession in Mark of Jesus as "Christ" (Mark 8:29). Matthew's embellishments of the scene extend to the blessing of Peter in verses 16–19. While the sayings in 16:17–19 may be pre-Matthean, they echo Old Testament motifs and are in accord with Matthew's characteristic ecclesial interest (see the saying on binding and loosing extended to the community in 18:18). It should be noted that just as Matthew takes a Markan cue and intensifies the blessing of Peter, he will also intensify the condemnation of Peter following on Mark's trajectory (see 16:23 where Matthew adds the notion of "stumbling block" to the rebuke of Peter as "Satan" in Mark 8:33).

The assessment of the traditional character of this special material is mixed. Gundry judges that Matthew's material in 16:16–19 is completely redactional.<sup>15</sup> Luz, on the other hand, surmises that these sayings are traditional but do not go back to the historical Jesus. The key is the fact that in Matt 16:18 Jesus speaks of his "church"—an anachronistic statement traceable to post-Easter tradition.<sup>16</sup> Davies and

---

<sup>14</sup> On Matthew's development of the Petrine tradition, see R. Brown, K. Donfried, J. Reumann, eds., Peter in the New Testament (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1973), 75–107; Pheme Perkins, Peter: Apostle for the Whole Church (Columbia: University of South Carolina, 1994), 66–74.

<sup>15</sup> Gundry, Matthew, 330–331: "As in earlier passages peculiar to this gospel (e.g., 13:24–30, 36–43; 14:28–31), parallelistic structure, Matthew's favorite diction and theological motifs, OT phraseology, and echoes of other Matthean passages point to expansive composition by the evangelist himself and away from a special tradition known only to him."

<sup>16</sup> See Ulrich Luz, Matthew 8–20, Hermeneia (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2001), 357.

Allison, however, are convinced that this material is not only traditional but might be rooted in an event during the lifetime of Jesus. They suggest that in that case, Matthew's version of the entire Petrine story in 16:13–20 reflects an earlier version than that of Mark 8:27–30. Mark may have truncated the original story because of his hesitation about the extent of the blessing of Peter found in the traditional material, whereas Matthew—who is more interested in Petrine material—would have included the omitted passage.<sup>17</sup>

The unique story about the temple tax (17:24–27) coincides with the representational and spokesperson role that Peter plays in Matthew, but its connection to any lead in the Markan source is less obvious. Thompson and others have suggested that it serves as a lead into the community discourse of chapter 18 by introducing the topic of the privileges of those who are “sons” of the kingdom.<sup>18</sup> The topic of the story in its present form most likely concerns the payment of the half-shekel temple tax, and represents a post-resurrection ecclesial concern. The nucleus of the story at its origin could have been a parable (reflected now in v. 25 about the children of the kingdom being exempt from toll or tribute) which originally was not connected to the issue of the temple tax. Matthew may have built the story into its present form by fusing to the basic saying a popular story about Jesus and Peter that represented a practical solution to the dilemma posed by the tax.<sup>19</sup> The remarkable find of the coin in the mouth of the fish strikes most commentators as the kind of legendary element developed in popular story telling. In any case, most commentators agree that Matthew is responsible for putting the story into its present form and inserting it into the Gospel narrative.<sup>20</sup>

The role of Peter in the discussion about the limits of forgiveness in 18:21–22 is clearly redactional in nature. The question of Peter provides an introduction to the saying of Jesus and the special Matthean parable about the merciless servant in 18:23–35. As we will see below, the content and style of this morally didactic parable are characteristic of Matthew.

<sup>17</sup> Davies and Allison, The Gospel According to Saint Matthew, 2:602–615.

<sup>18</sup> W. G. Thompson, Matthew's Advice to a Divided Community. Mt. 17, 22–18,35, Analecta Biblica 44 (Rome: Biblical Institute, 1970).

<sup>19</sup> So Davies and Allison, The Gospel According to Saint Matthew, 2:741–742.

<sup>20</sup> Gundry, Matthew, 355; Luz, Matthew 8–20, 413–420, believes there is good reason to say that the entire story is a creation of the post-70 Jewish Christian community put into written form by Matthew.

Within the passion story, the additional materials about Peter are clearly redactional embellishments which take their cue from leads within the Markan narrative, are cast in characteristic Matthean language, and fit Matthew's overall portrayal of Peter (see 26:72b, 74b, 75b).<sup>21</sup>

Thus the Petrine narrative material, with the possible exception of 16:16–19, is substantially redactional and reflects Matthew's ecclesial interests. While the interaction with Peter in Matthew could suggest that during his lifetime Jesus gave Peter a significant leadership role, this can already be surmised by the prominent place of Peter in the rest of the Gospel materials. There seems to be little question that Jesus formed a band of disciples and projected them as a sign of the eschatologically renewed community of Israel.<sup>22</sup>

2.1.3. The Passion Narrative

The special material of the passion narrative has been the focus of considerable study.<sup>23</sup> In this section of the Gospel, Matthew follows the narrative of Mark closely with few exceptions other than typical stylistic changes. Some minor changes or additions are clearly the editorial work of the evangelist (e.g., the formal introduction to the passion story in 26:1–2; direct address by Judas and the addition of the number thirty in 26:15, the exchange between Jesus and Judas in 26:25, the addition of the reference to forgiveness of sins in 26:28, etc.). Other insertions, however, raise the question of source material.

The sayings of Jesus at the moment of the arrest in 26:52–54 may have some claim to be traditional, but it should also be pointed out that they coincide with other sayings material in Matthew such as the prohibition against retaliation in 5:38–42, 43–48 and the acclamation

---

<sup>21</sup> See Donald Senior, "Matthew's Special Material in the Passion Story: Implications for the Evangelist's Redactional Technique and Theological Perspective," ETL 63 (1987): 272–294 and a later follow-up in dialogue with Raymond Brown's work on the passion, "Revisiting Matthew's Special Material in the Passion Narrative: A Dialogue with Raymond Brown," ETL 70 (1994): 417–424.

<sup>22</sup> See John Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 3: Companions and Competitors (New York: Doubleday, 2001), esp. 148–163. "The basic intention of Jesus in creating the Twelve seems to have been more wide-ranging than simply providing a permanent example of discipleship. His intention apparently corresponded to the core of his proclamation to Israel: the coming of the kingdom of God, who would establish his rule definitively over Israel" (148).

<sup>23</sup> See above, n. 21.

about the son's unique relationship to the father in 11:25–27.<sup>24</sup> The addition of the sayings at this point in the narrative are surely prompted by the Markan account where one of those “who stood by” draws a sword and strikes the slave of the high priest (Mark 14:47). In fact, each of the evangelists chooses in slightly differing fashions to use this moment of sudden violence as an opportunity for teaching about reconciliation and non-retaliation (in addition to Matt 26:52–54, see Luke 22:51; John 18:11).

One of the most significant narrative additions to the Markan passion story is Matthew's special material about the death of Judas in 27:3–10.<sup>25</sup> The story shares one significant feature (other than the assertion that the betrayer committed suicide) with the account in Acts 1:16–20—in both instances a field called “blood field” figures in the story, although with different explanations of the name's origin. Matthew's story is clearly prompted by leads in Mark's account. First of all, Mark includes Jesus' prediction of Judas' condemnation because of his betrayal, but does not follow through with a description of its fulfillment (Matt 26:24–25; Mark 14:21). Secondly, the temporal break in the story between the Jewish “trial” and the appearance before Pilate (see 26:75 and 27:1) provides the opening for Matthew to insert this incident. The language of the story is thoroughly Matthean, and the content itself reflects characteristic Matthean themes: e.g., the complicity of the high priests, the betrayal by thirty pieces of silver, and the motif of “innocent blood.” The use of a fulfillment formula in 27:9–10, evoking a quotation from Jeremiah 19, and the story of the potter's field also coincide with Matthew's characteristic interest in scriptural fulfillment.

Thus while one cannot rule out the presence of some traditional elements, such as the aetiological legend concerning the naming of the field as “blood field” and the tradition that Judas committed suicide in reaction to his betrayal, the story is heavily redactional and yields little specific historical information about Jesus or the circumstances of his death.

---

<sup>24</sup> While conceding the Matthean form of the current saying, Davies and Allison suggest it was drawn from “oral tradition”: Davies and Allison, The Gospel According to Saint Matthew, 505–506.

<sup>25</sup> On the probable Matthean composition of this text, see Donald Senior, The Passion Narrative According to Matthew: A Redactional Study, BETL 39 (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1975), 343–397.

A similar pattern of characteristic Matthean language and theological interests is found in the other narrative additions to the text. For example, the intervention of Pilate's wife on behalf of Jesus in 27:19 helps set a contrast to the persistent efforts of the religious leaders to have Jesus condemned (see the following verse 20, where the leaders persuade the crowds to have Barabbas released and to have Jesus killed). The revelation of his innocence to her in a "dream" and the designation of Jesus as dikaios are also characteristic Matthean motifs. Similarly, the famous text of 27:24–25 in which Pilate washes his hands and declares his innocence of the blood of Jesus echoes Deuteronomy 21:6–8, while the response of the people also echoes biblical formulae. The incident as a whole reflects Matthew's characteristic concern with Jewish responsibility for the death of Jesus and its implications for salvation history.<sup>26</sup>

The special material in 27:51b–53 concerning the phenomena following upon the death of Jesus has provoked much debate.<sup>27</sup> Some find here traces of a pre-Matthean tradition which also has echoes in the Gospel of Peter or other early Christian traditions.<sup>28</sup> The text with its stock apocalyptic signs has certainly been influenced by the vision of the dry bones in Ezekiel 37 and probably also by Daniel 12:2. Even if the presence of traditional elements is conceded, the text as it stands has strong evidence of Matthean redactional language and his tendency to highlight the eschatological significance of Jesus' death and resurrection (see also 28:2). Clearly, its insertion is linked to elements of the Markan account such as the tearing of the temple veil and the acclamation of the centurion. As most commentators concede, the purpose of the special material here is strongly theological in nature, asserting the eschatological and soteriological significance of the death

---

<sup>26</sup> See the thorough discussion in Raymond E. Brown, The Death of the Messiah From Gethsemane to the Grave: A Commentary on the Passion Narratives of the Four Gospels (New York: Doubleday, 1994), 2:831–839.

<sup>27</sup> See D. Senior, "Revisiting Matthew's Special Material," 419–423.

<sup>28</sup> See the thorough discussion in R. Brown, The Death of the Messiah, 2:1118–1133, 1137–1140. He concludes that Matthew had access to a poetic reflection on the events following Jesus' death which the evangelist put into written form and attached to the passion narrative, both to emphasize the eschatological character of Jesus' death and resurrection and to emphasize scriptural fulfillment, particularly the vision of the dry bones in Ezekiel 37:1–14. While concurring with Brown's interpretation of Matthew's theology implicit in this passage, I am not convinced by the evidence for a pre-existing poetic source; see D. Senior, "Revisiting Special Material in the Passion Narrative."

(and resurrection) of Jesus and the fulfillment of the scriptures in relationship to Jesus' death.<sup>29</sup>

Matthew's special material about the setting of a guard at the tomb (27:62–66) and the impact of the “angel of the lord” on the same guards at the moment of the resurrection (28:4) and their subsequent report to the chief priests and the bribe for their silence (28:11–15) also coincides strongly with the redactional interests of the evangelist, who consistently emphasizes the bad faith of the religious leaders, with their offer of money echoing the Markan account of Judas' betrayal of Jesus in Mark 14:10–11 (see Matt 26:14–15). The reference to the false explanation of the empty tomb being spread “among the Jews to this day” (28:15) demonstrates the clearly polemical and apologetic intent of this material. While these stories may have circulated in oral form in the Matthean community, it is the evangelist who has put them into written form and inserted them at the proper places in the sequence of the Markan passion and resurrection accounts.<sup>30</sup>

2.1.4. Conclusion

A rapid assessment of Matthew's special material in the passion and resurrection stories yields little or no additional information that contributes to reliable historical knowledge about Jesus of Nazareth. In all instances the additions have been heavily redacted by the evangelist and woven into the sequence of the narrative found in his major source, Mark. In all instances, the material amplifies motifs characteristic of the Gospel as a whole, reflecting its christological and ecclesial perspectives. While the existence of some rudimentary pre-existing oral traditions at the basis of some of these incidents cannot be ruled out, there is no evidence that these traditions are rooted on the level of the historical Jesus.

---

<sup>29</sup> “By now the meaning of Jesus' death for the Matthean community should be clear: It took place according to the Scriptures and (along with his own resurrection) anticipated the general resurrection of the righteous (Dan 12:1–3). These Matthean emphases served to counter the charges from Jews and Gentiles alike that Jesus died a criminal's death in shame and that the movement initiated by him should have ended then and there. Matthew's answer to these charges is that what to some eyes was the execution of a rebel was in fact willed by God in accord with the Scriptures and that his death holds a central place in God's plan of salvation.” D. Harrington, The Gospel of Matthew, 403.

<sup>30</sup> See Donald Senior, “Matthew's Account of the Burial of Jesus Mt 27,57–61,” in The Four Gospels 1992: Festschrift Frans Neirynck, ed. F. van Segbroeck, C. M. Tuckett, G. van Belle, and J. Verheyden (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1992), 1433–1448.

2.2. Discourse Material

As was the case with the narrative material, this category embraces a diverse ensemble of literary forms and theological content.

(1) The Sermon on the Mount

The Sermon on the Mount is a major portion of Matthew's Gospel, providing the interpretive foundation for all of the discourse and narrative materials that follow. Matthew draws a substantial amount of material for the Sermon from Q (see the parallel to Luke's Sermon on the Plain, 6:17–7:1, and other Q passages found in Luke) and in the view of most interpreters, the sayings in the Sermon, although obviously subject to the formation of tradition and the redactional style of the evangelist, ultimately epitomize the teaching of the historical Jesus, or at least the impact of the teaching of Jesus on the earliest generations of the Jesus movement.<sup>31</sup> However, the precise point of our inquiry in this essay is solely to determine to what extent the special material of Matthew found in the Sermon provides historically reliable information about Jesus.

Matthew's special material in the Sermon on the Mount includes the following: (1) The additional beatitudes of 5:5, 7, 8, 9, 10; (2) The sayings on the fulfillment of the law in 5:17–20; (3) The formulation and content of most of the "antitheses" in 5:21–48, especially the material on anger (5:21–22), on lust (5:27–28), and on oaths (5:33–37); and (4) the section on authentic piety in 6:1–18 (except for the Lord's prayer, which has a parallel version in Luke 11:1–4).

(2) The Beatitudes

Matthew's Sermon contains eight beatitudes (compared to four in Luke 6:20b–22). Matthew's special beatitudes include a blessing for the meek (5:5), the merciful (5:7), the pure in heart (5:8), the peacemakers (5:9), and those persecuted for righteousness' sake (5:10). There is vigorous debate about the source of these beatitudes, or how to explain their relationship to Luke's version. Davies and Allison, for example, believe that only 5:10 is purely redactional, because it provides an inclusion for the other seven and because it cites a characteristic Matthean theme of righteousness. They further hold that only the first ("Blessed are the poor..."), second ("Blessed are those who mourn..."), and fourth ("Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness...") are likely to have originated with Jesus (see the Lukan parallels in Luke 6:20.21, which are likely to be closer to the original wording ["Blessed are you who hunger now..."], 22 [Blessed are you that weep now...]) and may have been influenced by Isaiah 61. The Matthean beatitudes in 5:5, 7, 8, 9 derive from a version of Q accessible to Matthew and are thus not purely redactional.<sup>32</sup> Gundry would contend that the last four beatitudes are all Matthean redaction, with only the Lukan parallels deriving from Q.<sup>33</sup> Hagner, on the other hand, sees no reason to consider 5:10 as Matthean redaction, since it forms an inclusion with the first in 5:3 (with the same reward, "for theirs is the kingdom of heaven"), and all eight were likely to be a traditional list in Matthew's special source. He contends that the possibility that all of the beatitudes could be traced to the historical Jesus cannot be ruled out.<sup>34</sup>

---

<sup>31</sup> This is position taken by H. D. Betz, who sees the Sermon on the Mount as not fitting easily into the theological perspective of the Gospel of Matthew as a whole. While many interpreters would agree with Betz's overall assessment of the archaic nature of much of the sayings material in the Sermon, most believe that Matthew has, in fact, thoroughly integrated the content of the Sermon into his overall theological perspective and into the literary fabric of his Gospel. See Hans Dieter Betz, The Sermon on the Mount, Hermeneia (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995).

Thus, here again the historical gleanings from the special material in Matthew are tentative. While most interpreters would see the traditional form of the beatitude and the fundamental content of at least those dealing with those in desperate need as fully compatible with the preaching of the historical Jesus, the special Matthean beatitudes are mostly assigned to a post-Easter Christian tradition or to the level of Matthew's own redaction.

(3) Matthew 5:17–20

The sayings about the fulfillment of the law represent a keynote of Matthew's theology and, at the same time, pose a significant challenge with regard to determining the historical origin of this material, particularly the keynote statement of 5:17. The saying about not one jot or tittle of the law passing away (5:18) finds a distant parallel in Luke 16:17, suggesting some connection to Q. The saying in 5:19 about

---

<sup>32</sup> See Davies and Allison, The Gospel According to Saint Matthew, 431–442; similarly Luz, Matthew 1–7, 228.

<sup>33</sup> Gundry, Matthew, 67–73.

<sup>34</sup> Donald A. Hagner, Matthew 1–13, Word Biblical Commentary 33A (Dallas: Word Books, 1993), 90.

entering the kingdom of heaven is strongly redactional in nature. The saying in 5:20 about the "greater righteousness," which provides a link to 5:21–48, is cast in characteristic Matthean language and is surely redactional.

One could make a case for the origin of 5:17 at all levels of the tradition. There is little doubt that an emphasis on continuity between the teaching of Jesus and the Torah fits into the perspective of Matthew's Gospel and would have significant pastoral significance for his embattled Jewish Christian community. Additionally, most of the language in the verse is compatible with Matthean style. The same is true for the post-Easter early community, where the debate about the ongoing validity of the Jewish law is evident in the Pauline writings. The saying in 5:17 could have represented an attempt to ensure that Jesus and his teaching were seen in continuity with Jewish tradition, particularly on the part of the Jewish Christian community. At the same time, the perspective of this verse could also be compatible with the teaching of the historical Jesus, who may have asserted his fidelity to the law against the accusations of his opponents; accordingly, its origin in this original layer of the tradition cannot be ruled out.<sup>35</sup> At each level, this key saying and its context affirm the profoundly Jewish roots of Jesus and early Christianity and the continuing interaction between Jewish Christianity and other groups within the dominant Jewish majority.

(4) The sayings in 5:21–48

The six so-called "antitheses" in this section illustrate how the teaching of Jesus interprets the law and leads to the "greater righteousness" required of the disciple. With the possible exception of 5:31–32 (forbidding divorce) and 5:33–37 (against oaths), these sayings do not pit Jesus' teaching against the law, but represent an intensification of obedience to the requirements and spirit of the law. Hence, the traditional term "antithesis" is not apt; the term "contrast statement" might be preferred.<sup>36</sup>

Three of the Matthean "antitheses" have a parallel in Luke and therefore are probably drawn from Q, viz. 5:31–32 (Luke 16:18), 5:38–42 (Luke 6:29–30), and 5:43–48 (Luke 6:27–28, 32–36). Matthew has incorporated an introductory formula to each, providing a contrast between traditional interpretation (“you have heard it said...”) and the authoritative interpretation of Jesus (“but I say to you...”). Whether this contrast formula is a creation of the evangelist or was found in the tradition (see Luke 6:27, “But I say to you...”) is debated. Whether or not the remaining material (i.e., 5:21–26, 27–30, 33–37) is traditional or redactional is also vigorously debated. Bultmann and others contend that the material, including the introductory formula, is traditional. Luz suggests that Matthew drew the first, second, and fourth contrast statements from a special source and then supplemented them with the material from Q (parallel to Luke). The third contrast (on divorce, which is Q material) was inserted into the midst of his special material because of its similarity in content with the second contrast statement (on lust).<sup>37</sup> Gundry, on the other hand, argues that all these non-Q contrast statements are composed by Matthew.<sup>38</sup>

---

<sup>35</sup> On this, see the judicious discussion in Davies and Allison, The Gospel According to Saint Matthew, 1:482–502.

<sup>36</sup> See Donald Senior, Matthew, Abingdon New Testament Commentaries (Nashville: Abingdon, 1998), 73–74.

(5) Teaching on Authentic Piety, 6:1–18

The other part of the Sermon on the Mount where special Matthean material comes into play is 6:1–18. There is a clear distinction between 6:1–6, 16–18, which deals with the traditional triad of almsgiving, prayer and fasting, and 6:7–15 which incorporates the instruction on the Lord’s prayer. The latter section is parallel to Luke 11:1–14 and most probably derives from Q. Most commentators assume that Luke 11:2–4 represents the more original form of the prayer, while Matthew’s version in 6:9–13 and the additional saying in 6:14–15 represent embellishments rooted in liturgical or community usage, added by Matthew to the Q version or to pre-Matthean tradition available to the evangelist.

The introduction to this section in 6:1, referring to acts of “righteousness,” links it to the saying in 5:20 which led into the antitheses and is probably Matthean in character. However, there is debate about the traditional character of the teachings on the triad of almsgiving, prayer and fasting in the remaining verses 6:1–6, 16–18, which are unique to Matthew. While many commentators suggest that the material is redactional, others have argued strenuously for the traditional character of this special material. H. D. Betz, for example, suggests this entire segment was a pre-existing "cult didache" originating in oral tradition, but taking on written form in the tradition prior to Matthew. The original segment would have been the triadic teaching on piety in 6:1-6, 16-8. This could have derived from the historical Jesus, but more probably comes from a disciple in the early Jesus movement who was influenced by the teaching of Jesus and by wisdom tradition (as was Jesus himself). At a later stage, the section on the Lord's prayer (6:7-15) was incorporated, prompted by the original text's section on prayer. While the Lord's prayer itself would certainly originate with Jesus himself, this material in its present form derives from a Jewish Christian author who is aware of pagan prayer customs and has observed them. The whole unit was introduced by Matthew into the Sermon on the Mount.<sup>39</sup>

<sup>37</sup> Luz, Matthew 1–7, 274–275.

<sup>38</sup> Gundry, Matthew, 78–100.

Thus 6:1-18, and in particular 6:1-6, 16-18, is an example of Matthean special material which may in fact provide a degree of historically reliable information on Jesus of Nazareth. While it is likely that the material as incorporated in the Gospel has undergone considerable literary formation subsequent to Jesus, the vivid and direct teaching on authentic piety could have traced its origin and spirit to the teaching of Jesus himself, and reveals his characteristic and authentically Jewish piety.

(6) Parables

Matthew's Gospel includes a number of parables that fall under the category of "special material." In the parallel to Mark's parable "discourse" of chapter 4, Matthew's special material includes the parable of the tares (13:24-30) and its explanation (13:36-43), the parable of the hidden treasure (13:44), the parable of the pearl (13:45-46), and the parable of the net (13:47-50). In the community discourse of chapter 18, there is the unique Matthean parable of the merciless servant (18:23-35). Matthew adds the parable of the laborers in the vineyard in 20:1-16. In the conflict section of chapter 21-22 (parallel to Mark 11-12), Matthew adds the parable of the two sons (21:28-32). In the apocalyptic discourse, Matthean special material includes the parables of the ten virgins (25:1-13) and the parable of the sheep and the goats (25:31-46).

---

<sup>39</sup> H. D. Betz. The Sermon on the Mount, 330-338; similarly, Davies and Allison, The Gospel According to Saint Matthew, 1:573-575.

Assessing whether these parables are pre-Matthean or are purely redactional on Matthew's part is a challenge. In virtually all these cases, the language is strongly Matthean and the theological perspective fits into the overall theology of the Gospel. Many of the parables begin with a formula such as "such is the kingdom of heaven" or "the kingdom of heaven is like..." (see 13:24, 44, 45, 47; 18:23; 20:1; 22:2; 25:1). While conceding that the formula itself may be redactional, Davies and Allison contend that this introductory formula indicates that Matthew saw a thematic unity to these various parables and therefore may have drawn them from a pre-existing collection of kingdom parables.<sup>40</sup> Gundry, on the other hand, argues that the parables, while drawing on traditional theological motifs, should be assigned to Matthean redaction, either as compositions of the evangelist or in some instances, such as the parable of the two sons in 21:28–32, representing a different strand of Q tradition (Gundry compares Matt 21:28–32 to the parable of the prodigal son in Luke 15:11–32).<sup>41</sup>

In addition to the fundamental motif of the "kingdom of God," other characteristic Matthean motifs can be noted in the parables. Several parables reflect Matthew's concern for eschatological judgment and have a characteristic didactic or moralizing quality: e.g., the parable of the tares (13:24–30), along with its probably redactional explanation in 13:36–43, the parable of the net (13:47–50), the parable of the merciless servant (18:23–35), the additional material about the man without the wedding garment in 22:11–14 (the preceding parable about the marriage feast has parallels in Luke 14:15–24), the parable of the ten virgins, 25:1–13, and that of the sheep and the goats in 25:31–46. Additionally, the parable of the merciless servant amplifies in narrative fashion the emphasis on forgiveness found in the Sermon on the Mount (see 5:23–24 and especially 6:14–15), just as 25:31–46 uses the criteria of the Sermon for eschatological judgment. The Matthean parable of the two sons (21:28–32) and the parable of the laborers in the vineyard (20:1–16) reflect the motif of reversal that also harmonizes with Matthew's concern about the rejection of Jesus and the turning to the nations (see the Matthean addition to the parable of the vineyard in 21:43).<sup>42</sup>

<sup>40</sup> Davies and Allison, The Gospel According to Saint Matthew, 1:125–126.

<sup>41</sup> See Gundry, Matthew, 4–5, 261–280.

<sup>42</sup> Many commentators view the parable of the laborers in 20:1–16 as particularly reflective of the style and message of the historical Jesus; see the comments in Davies and Allison, The Gospel According to Saint Matthew, 3:66–78.

Most commentators hesitate to assign the unique Matthean parables to pure redaction; they find there evidence of traditional material. At the same time, there is recognition that in virtually all instances the language of the parables is heavily redactional, and the content of the parables supports characteristic Matthean motifs. The question remains to what extent the detection of traditional material in these unique Matthean parables adds to our fund of historically reliable information about Jesus of Nazareth. Although the Matthean parables would add to the repertoire of parables and imagery found in Mark and Q, there are no truly new motifs or information added. Motifs about eschatological judgment, the mysterious and compelling nature of the reign of God, God's favor vis-à-vis the poor and marginalized, the motif of reversal, and the call for forgiveness and compassion for those in need—are all traditional motifs about the ministry and message of Jesus already found in Matthew's sources, which receive emphasis and amplification in the special material of the Gospel.

(7) 11:28–30

The saying of Jesus in Matt 11:28–30, “Come to me, all you that are weary and are carrying heavy burdens...,” is also special material. It is appended to the material in 11:25–27, which is from Q (see Luke 10:21–22), about Jesus' unique relationship to his Father. Here again, opinion is divided, but most scholars see 11:28–30 as a Matthean redaction. Gundry notes the Matthean tendency to parallelism in the verses, the profusion of Matthean vocabulary, and the drawing on Old Testament material (see 11:28a = Jeremiah 31:25; 28b = Exodus 33:14; 29 = Jeremiah 6:16).<sup>43</sup> Harrington emphasizes the influence of Sirach 51:26–27.<sup>44</sup> Luz too believes the verse is redactional, representing Matthew's typical ethical tendency, moving from the christological affirmation of 11:25–27 to the invitation to respond by accepting Jesus' “yoke” in 11:28–30.<sup>45</sup>

Davies and Allison, however, suggest that the material may be traditional, although not traceable to a saying of Jesus himself.<sup>46</sup> Because v. 28–30 seem to be a natural extension of v. 27, they speculate that

<sup>43</sup> Gundry, Matthew, 218–219.

<sup>44</sup> Harrington, The Gospel of Matthew, 170.

<sup>45</sup> Luz, Matthew 8–20, 157.

<sup>46</sup> Davies and Allison, The Gospel According to Saint Matthew, 2:235–238.

the version of Q available to Matthew included v. 28–30, while Luke's version did not.

In any case, most recent commentators agree that the material is either a Matthean composition based on the influence of the Q passage in 11:25–30 and the use of wisdom traditions to amplify the christology of the passage, or perhaps a version of Q accessible to Matthew which coincides with his christological perspective about Jesus' authoritative interpretation of the law.

(8) Chapter 23

The polemical discourse of chapter 23 also provides a challenging source question, since it is a blend of Q, Markan material, and special Matthean passages.

Most interpreters divide the discourse into three distinctive parts: (1) 23:1–12, containing a number of warnings about the scribes and Pharisees; (2) 23:13–33, a series of woes against the same religious leaders; (3) and 23:34–39, a concluding lament over Jerusalem that leads into the eschatological discourse of chapters 24–25.<sup>47</sup> In general, there is agreement that the tone and purpose of this polemical discourse fit into Matthew's overall context. The discourse represents an admonition and warning to Matthew's Jewish Christian audience, using the "scribes and the Pharisees" as examples of false discipleship and as condemned opponents of Jesus. As such, it is not a direct attack on the leaders themselves but takes the form of warning to the Christian readers of the Gospel about the example of the Jewish leaders. Triggered by the controversy about David's son (see 22:41–46; parallel Mark 12:35–37), it also prepares for the climactic apocalyptic discourse of chapters 24–25 and the passion narrative itself, in which the religious leaders will play a prominent and negative role in Matthew's account (chapters 26–27). The issues at stake in chapter 23 echo the community concerns of the Matthean church and also reflect the same contrasts about authentic piety that have already been presented in the Sermon on the Mount (6:1–8, 16–18) and in other parts of the Gospel (see, for example, 15:1–20).

In the first segment, 23:1–12, parallels to the warning about the hypocrisy of the "scribes" can be found in Mark 12:37b–40 (see also Luke 20:45–47). The reference to the imposition of heavy burdens

---

<sup>47</sup> So Davies and Allison, The Gospel According to Saint Matthew, 3:257–258.

(23:4) is similar to the Q saying in Luke 11:46. Other elements also reflect earlier material in the Gospel, e.g., the criticism of words without deeds (see 5:19, etc.) and the indictment of the leaders for "doing their deeds to be seen by men," echoing Matt 6:1. Unique to Matthew is the comment about the authority of the scribes and Pharisees who "sit on Moses' seat" (23:2-3) and the egalitarian material in 23:8-12. This material seems to reflect the post-70 circumstances of Matthew's Jewish-Christian community, still locked in conflict with the dominant Jewish majority.<sup>48</sup> Likewise, the emphasis on humility and the overall egalitarian emphasis harmonize with the picture in the community discourse of chapter 18, especially 18:1-5, 10-14.

The second section of the discourse, 23:13-33, is dominated by a series of seven "woes." While similar to the series of six woes in Luke 11:42-54 directed against the Pharisees and lawyers, there are significant differences in the number, order, and target of the woes. This leads some to question whether this material can be assigned to the same Q version common to Luke and Matthew.<sup>49</sup> In Luke's version of the Sermon on the Plain (6:17-7:1), Jesus' series of blessings is followed by a series of woes. Many interpreters conclude that the version of Q available to Matthew had a similar pattern. Matthew, however, immediately following the beatitudes, introduced his thematic about fulfillment of the law (5:17-20), the antitheses (5:21-48), and the exhortations about authentic piety in 6:1-18. The woes were moved to the polemical discourse in chapter 23 and blended with the Q material which is similar to Luke 11:42-54.

The final segment of the discourse contains a number of sayings which return the focus to Jerusalem and the temple (23:34-39) and are drawn from Q material (Matt 23:34-36 and Luke 11:49-51; Matt 23:37-39 and Luke 13:34-35).

Once again, therefore, the strong redactional hand of Matthew is found in the overall composition of this material. Matthew draws on

---

<sup>48</sup> For a strong advocacy of this view, see Anthony J. Saldarini, Matthew's Christian-Jewish Community (Chicago: University of Chicago, 1994); also J. Andrew Overman, Matthew's Gospel and Formative Judaism (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1990). Surveys of recent scholarship on the issue can be found in Graham N. Stanton, The Interpretation of Matthew, Studies in New Testament Interpretation (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1995), 16-20, and an expansion of Stanton's views in G. Stanton, A Gospel for a New People: Studies in Matthew (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1992), 113-68; and Donald Senior, What Are They Saying About Matthew?, rev. ed. (New York: Paulist, 1996), 7-20.

<sup>49</sup> So Davies and Allison, The Gospel According to Saint Matthew, 3:283.

Mark and Q while shaping the various elements into a coherent discourse. The special material seems to reflect the post-70 situation of Matthew's community and its mounting tension with rabbinic Judaism. In any case, there is no special Matthean material in the discourses that can confidently be assigned to the level of the historical Jesus.

3. Conclusion

This survey of Matthean special material has had a very narrow purpose—to assess to what extent such special material found in Matthew's Gospel provides any “historically reliable information about Jesus of Nazareth.” A primary conclusion of the survey is that the special material in Matthew yields relatively little historical information about Jesus that is not already derived from analysis of Matthew's primary sources, the Gospel of Mark and Q.

There is no compelling evidence to conclude that Matthew derived his special material from a single source that would in any way rival the two major sources that helped shape his Gospel. The special material found in Matthew varies in form and content, and can hardly be consigned to a single source.

Our analysis suggests that most of the special material is redactional in nature. This does not necessarily mean that the evangelist created narratives and sayings all on his own. Various incidents in the life of Jesus found in Mark or Q could already have received some amplification or particular interpretation in the preaching, catechesis, and liturgical life of Matthew's community and were then put into written form and incorporated in the Gospel by the evangelist. Similarly, sayings of Jesus derived from early Christian prophets and teachers and treasured in the Matthean church could also be formulated by the evangelist and included in the Gospel. The evangelist, in other words, did not live in a vacuum, but in a stream of living tradition and community life. The context of his community, which apparently included both tension with the synagogue and concerns about the scope of the Gentile mission, also prompted Matthew to shape his Gospel in a particular way. In fact, the historical information provided by the special material in Matthew sheds light primarily on the circumstances of the Matthean community in its post-70 context.

While little evidence of reliable historical material can be found in the narrative special material in Matthew, there are more possibilities in the discourse material. Particularly in the special Matthean parables (e.g., 20:1–16) and in the content of the Sermon on the Mount (particularly 6:1–6, 16–18), there may be material that has its origin in the teaching and impact of the historical Jesus on the earliest Christian movement—traditions ultimately shaped by the evangelist and introduced into his Gospel. These materials do not reveal novel historical information about Jesus of Nazareth not already present in Matthew's primary sources. But they do underscore the characteristic use of the Kingdom of God motif, confirm the eschatological character of Jesus' teaching and the fact that he formed a community of disciples, and illustrate the thoroughly Jewish flavor of his teaching and piety. These results—while not dramatic or new—are of significance for our knowledge of the historical Jesus.

LUKE<sup>s</sup> AND ACTS

JOHN NOLLAND

Our task here is to deal with the historical reliability of the Special Lukan material about Jesus in the Gospel and of the Jesus material in Acts. As a starting point we may, with R. Brown,<sup>1</sup> estimate the extent of Luke<sup>s</sup> as between thirty-three and forty percent of the Gospel—something like 380 to 460 verses. This is a very significant part of what Luke has to say about Jesus, which makes of considerable significance the question of how one should relate to the materials as historical sources. Is it appropriate with Meier to treat Luke<sup>s</sup> as a minor source, and more or less leave these materials out of consideration in our attempts to reconstruct the historical Jesus?<sup>2</sup> Or do the materials justify a more generous assessment? Acts offers us much less about the historical Jesus; nonetheless there are summary outlines and individual details in relation to which questions of historical reliability may be put. Initially the two bodies of material, Luke<sup>s</sup> and Acts, will be discussed separately, but the two streams will be drawn together at the end of the chapter.

1. Luke<sup>s</sup>

The present treatment of Luke<sup>s</sup> will be concerned primarily with the question of whether its general historical reliability should be viewed any differently to, say, that of the Markan traditions. The question will primarily be that of whether there are any special considerations to be brought to bear on the evaluation of these materials. Nobody starts with Luke<sup>s</sup> if they want to develop a critical portrait of the historical

---

<sup>1</sup> R. Brown, An Introduction to the New Testament (New York: Doubleday, 1997), 265.

<sup>2</sup> J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, vol. 1: The Roots of the Problem and the Person, Anchor Bible Reference Library (New York/London: Doubleday, 1991), 1:44–45. Meier chooses to discuss only 3:10–14; 5:1–11; 7:11–17, 29–30; 8:2; 13:10–17; 14:1–6; 17:11–19, 20–21; 22:49–51 (see Meier, A Marginal Jew. Rethinking the Historical Jesus, vol 2: Mentor, Message, and Miracles Anchor Bible Reference Library [New York/London: Doubleday, 1994], passim).

Jesus, if for no other reason than the fact that Luke<sup>s</sup>, as normally understood, consists in essence of those parts of the Lukan portrayal that are not also attested in other parts of the gospel tradition. Multiple attestation is foundational for historical reconstruction and we do not, at least in the normal view, have this for Luke<sup>s</sup> materials (though it will emerge below that much more of Luke<sup>s</sup> than is normally recognized is paralleled at some level in other gospel materials). It would be possible in a study of the historicity of Luke<sup>s</sup> to bring to bear on the particular Luke<sup>s</sup> materials a set of criteria developed for the evaluation of any gospel materials. But such an approach has not been adopted here. From time to time there will be some attention to the evaluation of the historicity of specific parts of the tradition, but that will not be the main place of investment. Some of the points made will have implications for assessing the historicity of other gospel materials as well, but are offered here in relation to Luke<sup>s</sup>.

1.1. Luke<sup>s</sup> and the Synoptic Problem

It is all very well to define Luke<sup>s</sup> by reference to what is not found in Mark and Matthew, but a negative definition of this kind throws no light on the question of what we are actually dealing with in Luke<sup>s</sup>. So a first question here could be whether the issue of synoptic sources throws any light on the nature of Luke<sup>s</sup> and therefore, potentially, on the question of the historical reliability of its materials. In a chapter of limited scope, however, this is not possible, and I must content myself with reporting that my attempts to look at Luke<sup>s</sup> in relation to each of the main theories of synoptic relations indicates that although preferred solutions to the synoptic problem have some bearing on how we approach the evaluation of the historicity of Luke<sup>s</sup>, all the solutions leave the question basically open.

I unapologetically belong to what is still the consensus view.<sup>3</sup> That is the view that i) Mark is our earliest Gospel; ii) it, or something very like it, was used by both Matthew and Luke to provide the backbone for their own Gospels; and iii) Matthew and Luke also had available to them a second (most likely written and most likely a single document) source (labeled “Q” for convenience), possibly in different editions, consisting primarily of sayings material. Both Matthew and Luke drew on other material, whether written or oral. I hold the consensus view with rather more confidence than some of my colleagues. So the discussion of this chapter will continue, where necessary—and this will be much of the time—on this basis, though significant parts of what is said could be reframed without great difficulty in relation to other approaches to the synoptic problem.

---

<sup>3</sup> For my own examination of gospel sources for Luke and Matthew, see J. Nolland, Luke, WBC 35A–C, 3 vols. (Dallas: Word, 1989–93), passim; Matthew, NIGNT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005), passim.

Before we look more closely at the question of the scope of Luke<sup>S</sup> and its relationship to other gospel sources, I would like to offer one rough and ready index for the likely historical accuracy of the Luke<sup>S</sup> materials. For this we will work from the body of materials generally identified as Luke<sup>S</sup> (for our purposes here, the more expansive view of Luke<sup>S</sup> that will be defended below would only make the argument stronger).

1.2. Miracle Density as a First Index of Likely Historical Accuracy

It is unlikely that Luke<sup>S</sup>, or even any major part of Luke<sup>S</sup> is a source for Luke in the way that Mark and Q are likely to have been sources. Nonetheless the material may for certain purposes be treated all together as “the kind of material that Luke picked up when he was not relying on his written sources Mark and Q.” Of course any assessment made by treating the Luke<sup>S</sup> material “in bulk” will not necessarily be applicable to any particular piece of the material, but it can contribute to a general overall presumption about the historical quality of Luke’s distinctive materials.

My concern here will be with the place of the miraculous in Luke<sup>S</sup>. The multiplication of the miraculous is often said to be a sign of late secondary materials. How does Luke<sup>S</sup> fare on this measure?

There are five new miracles attributed to Jesus in Luke<sup>S</sup>: a miraculous catch of fish (5:1–11); a raising from the dead (7:11–17); the healing of a bent-over crippled woman and of a man with dropsy (13:10–17; 14:1–6; both on the Sabbath); and a healing of ten lepers (17:11–19). Working with R. Brown’s estimate of the extent of Luke<sup>S</sup>, these miracle accounts, occupying forty-one verses, represent about ten percent of the material.<sup>4</sup> This compares with ten miracle narratives

---

<sup>4</sup> Several extra verses might be added in connection with Zechariah being struck dumb in Luke 1:20, 22 and the restoration of his speech in v. 64, but not enough to affect the overall picture. Materials connected with the virginal conception of Jesus, that come into Luke from Mark.<sup>5</sup> These miracle narratives are reported in 113 verses in Mark out of about 430 verses that are represented in Luke. The “miracle density” in Luke<sup>S</sup> is about half of that in Luke’s use of Mark. What about Q? With its evident focus on teaching, the Q material is characterized by minimal narrative framework, and we might expect this to be reflected in the miracle density. There are just two miracle accounts in the Q material. But given that the quantity of Q material is only just over half that of Luke<sup>S</sup> (estimated at 220 to 235 verses), the miracle density by count of miracles is only slightly less than that in Luke<sup>S</sup>. And, if we include the discussion of Jesus’ exorcism which is precipitated by the exorcism in 11:14 as part of the miracle material, then there are twenty verses of miracle material, or nearly ten percent, to which we may want to add the focus on miracles in the woes in 10:13–16 and the interest in what John’s disciples have seen in 7:18–23. So the miracle density of Luke<sup>S</sup> is much less than that of the Markan material reproduced by Luke and about the same as that of the Q material reproduced by Luke.<sup>6</sup>

Measured in terms of “miracle density,” we might expect the Luke<sup>S</sup> material to have a likelihood of historical accuracy that matches Luke’s Markan and Q source material.

We turn our attention now to the actual scope of Luke<sup>S</sup> and the overlap of Luke<sup>S</sup> with other Gospel sources.

1.3. The Scope of Luke<sup>S</sup> and Its Overlap with Other Gospel Sources

At the most pragmatic level, Luke<sup>S</sup> consists of the material in the Gospel of Luke that has been included in neither the chapter on Mark in this volume nor the chapter on non-Markan material common to Matthew and Luke. But to move forward quite so quickly involves a and his resurrection and ascension, are likewise not included in the count. The ascension is reported in a single verse, and perhaps should have been counted (again, the total picture is not affected), but for neither the virginal conception and the resurrection is there actually an account: these are out-of-sight miracles, implied and claimed, but not narrated as events. Including all of these in a maximal way would still leave the “miracle-density” of Luke<sup>S</sup> lower than for the Markan material included by Luke, but it would raise the “miracle-density” significantly above that for Q.

---

<sup>5</sup> On the Markan side, the descent of the Spirit and the transfiguration have not been counted among the miracles; on the Luke<sup>S</sup> side, Jesus’ safe passage through the crowd in Luke 4:30 and Jesus’ (sudden?) standing among the disciples in 24:36 are not included.

<sup>6</sup> There is an evident supernaturalism in Luke 1–2 that is distinctive: the angel Gabriel makes two appearances, both Elizabeth and Zechariah are filled with the Holy Spirit, and prophetic inspiration is evident for Simeon and Anna.

failure to face some definitional questions. Addressing these will at the very least clarify some of the assumptions that might be lurking below the surface of scholarly discussion in this area, and may lead us to decide that the label Luke<sup>s</sup> should be applied to rather more gospel material than has been customary. As we seek to define the range of material to be considered as Luke<sup>s</sup>, we will also be concerned to identify any likely overlap between Luke<sup>s</sup> and other gospel materials.<sup>7</sup>

A rigid definition of the special Lukan material might include every tiny detail in which Luke differed from each of the other canonical gospels. But such a definition would be unhelpful, given that many of the differences in detail are in connection with episodes or items of teaching that are clearly common property between Luke and one or more of the other gospels. However one sees the synoptic source relationships, small differences are hardly to be labeled as special Lukan material and interrogated with regard to issues of historicity.

But there is a very genuine problem here: Where is the boundary line between what should be identified as editorial differences between the gospels and what should be seen as incorporation of a second source? There is not just one issue here. Writing elsewhere in relation to Matthew I have said, "oral parallels are likely to have existed in many more cases than we are in a position to demonstrate" and have even suggested that "at times the extent of the Matthean editing may be no more than the exercise of preference among available options."<sup>8</sup> The situation will not be different for Luke. There is a very real possibility, even with differences that allow for explanation in a perfectly credible way as Lukan editing fully in line with Luke's interests and thematic concerns, that in particular cases we are actually dealing with the influence of a second, probably oral, source. The point is that there may well be more sources playing a role than we can identify or even guess at.

In scholarship we properly work with what we can demonstrate, but the not-inappropriate demand for stringent levels of proof can inadvertently distort aspects of the overall picture. What we cannot prove, we cannot prove; but we should not imagine that what we are exploring is limited in its actuality by what we are able to demonstrate about it. Scholars, quite properly, do not dispute the existence of an extensive oral phase of transmission of the gospel materials, samples of which reach us as incorporated into the canonical gospels and to some degree into other sources. But what we have in the gospels needs to be thought of as providing us with only samples of what was a much wider phenomenon. The evangelists write as they do against the backdrop of this larger reality of oral awareness of the Jesus materials, not against the backdrop of what it is possible for us now to know about sources available to them.<sup>9</sup>

---

<sup>7</sup> K. Paffenroth, The Story of Jesus according to L, JSNTSup 147 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1997), restricts interest to a single pre-Lukan source and tends to a minimizing approach. Similarly, the focus of R. Riesner, "Prägung und Herkunft der lukanischen Sonderüberlieferung," TBei 24 (1993): 228–248, is restricted: he is looking for a Hebrew gospel source that can be traced back to the primitive community in Jerusalem.

<sup>8</sup> Nolland, Matthew, 6.

And if they write against this background they are likely to have been to some degree constrained by it, but also in a significant manner resourced by it. Luke is most unlikely to be the single conduit of the gospel material to his readership; this is what his prologue indicates in the case of Theophilus, and these verses suggest that quite a range of written and oral sources of information were at play (Luke 1:1–4). I do not in the least wish to insist that we claim oral sources where only Lukan editing is demonstrable; we cannot, for the most part, know this in particular cases. But I want to suggest that beyond the reach of our proof, it is very likely that Lukan versions of material shared in common with another gospel or gospels are likely at times to have been influenced by Luke's awareness of another telling or even other tellings of the story. That is, I want to alert us to the likely existence of quite a body of extra Luke<sup>s</sup> to which we can have no access, but which has impacted on Luke's telling of the story of Jesus, and whose existence provides, not in particular cases but in an overall manner, multiple source support in relation to assessing the general historical reliability of material that Luke shares with other gospels. There are particular cases where a good argument can be mounted for the availability to Luke of a second source, but even where there is not, I suggest that we should think in terms of the existence of such a source in a significant number of cases.

But if we are to imagine Luke having access to more than one form of materials that he shares with another gospel, why not of materials for which he is our only source? Once more, it is not a matter of making such a claim in relation to any particular item, but of reckoning with a general likelihood that such is the case a significant proportion of the time.

---

<sup>9</sup> J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003), 161, suggests that "we need to be conscious of the likely breadth and dispersal of the Jesus tradition."

My concern is that we make a proper distinction between what we can demonstrate and what is in general terms most likely to be the case. We should envisage as very likely a range of multiple attestation that is considerably greater than we can now reconstruct. Luke as a producer of a gospel will have had much greater access to multiple attestation than we at our remove are able to any degree to recover. We need to think of Luke<sup>S</sup> as actually embracing a much larger body of material than we normally envisage, but with the additional materials consisting mostly of material that we cannot be in a position to identify, except to say that the parts of the extra material that can have had any impact on Luke's telling of his story consist of material that is paralleled in either Mark or Q or Luke<sup>S</sup> material.

A second kind of issue over the boundary line between what should be identified as editorial differences between the gospels and what should be seen as incorporation of a second source concerns the possibility of overlapping sources. We may think of this discussion as a specialist subset of the more general discussion above of multiple sources. Above, we dealt with the need to think in terms of likely multiple sources, whether or not any evidence can be adduced in specific cases; here, we will deal with cases where evidence is available.

We will look first at the question of overlap with Q, then with that of overlap with Markan material, and finally with overlap with Matthew<sup>S</sup> (where this has not been bundled into earlier discussion, on the basis of uncertainty as to how to label a source). It will not be possible to attend to every possible instance of overlap, but it will be important to indicate with some clarity the scale of the matter.

Two kinds of interests will occupy us here: the first is to attend to the possibility that Luke<sup>S</sup> is to be thought of as more extensive than might at first be allowed, because features found in both Luke and either Mark or Q might be found linked with Luke<sup>S</sup> material because they were also present in the Luke<sup>S</sup> material; the second is to note the degree to which Luke<sup>S</sup> offers second source forms in relation to material found in Mark or Q or even Matthew<sup>S</sup>.<sup>10</sup>

---

<sup>10</sup> In discussion below I have drawn on Nolland, Luke, sometimes borrowing language without specific acknowledgement.

1.3.1. Overlap with Q

If the material in Luke 3:10–14 (the Baptist’s advice to the crowds, and to tax collectors and soldiers) is not Lukan creation (however much he may have put his own mark on it),<sup>11</sup> then it can hardly have reached Luke unconnected with other John the Baptist material. That Luke has inserted this material into a Q context might suggest that its context in Luke’s source matched to some extent this Q material (note particularly “fruit worthy of repentance” in v 8).<sup>12</sup>

Luke 11:9–13 is paralleled in Matt 7:7–11. For the most part there is close agreement between the Matthean and Lukan wording, but less so in Luke 11:11–13. It is likely that Luke used a chiastically arranged parables source in the formation of his Journey to Jerusalem section, in which vv. 11–13 was matched with 17:7–10.<sup>13</sup> Luke had available both the Q form and that which came to him from his parables source, and he is likely to have been influenced by both.

Though Matthew has no equivalent to Luke 12:35–38, Weiser has shown that it is quite likely that a version of this material was present in Q.<sup>14</sup> In Luke’s chiastically arranged parables source, introduced above, this parable was matched by 16:1–13. Conceptual links between the two are evident, but verbal links are almost totally absent. Other matched parables in the postulated source have clear verbal links, but not this one. It seems likely that Luke has displaced the version that

---

<sup>11</sup> See J. Sahlin’s case for the material representing an authentically Jewish ethic (“Die Früchte der Umkehr: Die ethische Verkündigung Johannes des Täufer nach Luke 3:10–14,” ST 1 [1948]: 55–68, at 55–59) and H. Schürmann’s identification of a set of non-Lukan word usages in the verses (Das Lukasevangelium: Erster Teil: Kommentar zu Kap. 1,1–9,50, HTKNT 3.1 [Freiburg: Herder, 1969], 169 and n. 53).

<sup>12</sup> In Luke 9:57–62 Luke has three instances of would-be disciples, compared to the two found in Matt 8:18–22. Does this mean that Luke had a source with all three? Probably not: the material of Luke 9:61–2 could well have existed as an independent unit; and there are no particular reasons for suspecting a second source behind v. 57–60.

<sup>13</sup> See Nolland, Luke, 2:530–531, 699; cf. C. L. Blomberg, “Midrash, Chiasmus and the Outline of Luke’s Central Section,” in Gospel Perspectives, Vol. 3. Studies in Midrash and Historiography, ed. R. T. France and D. Wenham (Sheffield: JSOT, 1983), 217–261.

<sup>14</sup> A. Weiser, Die Knechtsgleichnisse der synoptischen Evangelien, SANT 29 (München: Kösel, 1971), 164–166; cf. Schneider, Das Evangelium nach Lukas 11–24, Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 1984), 32; B. Kollmann, “Luke 12.35–38—ein Gleichnis der Logienquelle,” ZNW 81 (1990): 254–261. This is disputed e.g., by R. von Bendemann, Zwischen ΔΟΧΑ und ΣΤΑΥΡΟΣ. Eine exegetische Untersuchung der Texte des sogenannten Reiseberichts im Lukasevangelium, BZNT 101 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2001), 442.

stood in his parables source with that which he had from his Q source, but which Matthew did not directly use. So a Luke<sup>S</sup> parable has been displaced by a Q version, but Luke had access to both.

The healing on the Sabbath of a man with dropsy in Luke 14:1–6 is not paralleled in the other gospels, but v. 5 has a parallel in Matt 12:11, which Matthew has introduced (along with associated material in v. 12) into his version of Mark 3:1–6. Matt 12:11–12 must have come from a sabbath healing account. It is likely that Matthew had a version of Luke 14:1–6 at his disposal, and economized by introducing its main distinctive element (apart from the specific illness) into a related Markan account, rather than reproducing his source. We have no way of telling what other elements were common to Matthew's source form and the present Lukan form. So we cannot tell whether Luke 14:1–6 should be identified as Q material or whether it is a place of overlap between Q (or Matthew<sup>S</sup>) and Luke<sup>S</sup>.

Luke 14:16–21 is paralleled in Matt 22:1–10, but there is considerable dispute over whether Matthew and Luke received the parable in the same form. In the end we cannot be sure, but I have elsewhere made the following points.

(i) Most of the Matthean differences can be seen to accord with Matthean theological interests and redactional tendencies and so could be attributed to Matthean redaction. (ii) ...it is difficult to see how the Lukan form could come from anything like the Matthean form, and much easier to see how something like the Lukan form can have developed into the Matthean form (that the Gospel of Thomas form [64] is quite close to the Lukan form in most of its features, and [unusually] does not appear to be secondary to the Synoptic forms, adds support to this view). (iii) The very small amount of verbal agreement, combined with the very high level of Matthean intervention required for any assumption that Matthew began from a parable form close to Luke's, stands in favor of some pre-Matthean development. (iv) In the excursus "Journey to Jerusalem" it has been suggested that the present parable was part of a parables source available to Luke (however, since in the chiasmic structure, this parable is in the central position, the structure would in fact survive its omission).<sup>15</sup>

It is likely, then, that Luke had this parable in a different form from that found in Q, with the Luke<sup>S</sup> form closer to a more original form.

---

<sup>15</sup> Nolland, Luke, 2:754 (for further support see 530–531, 755–758).

Luke has in Luke 15:3–7 a form of the parable of the lost sheep, as does Matthew in Matt 18:12–14. More original features seem to be shared between the two forms.<sup>16</sup> However, the three parables in Luke 15 in their present sequence seem to have been part of Luke’s (already mentioned) chiasmically arranged parables source, in which as a set they correspond to Luke 13:1–9. This functioning as a set suggests in turn that the three linked parables were already linked prior to incorporation into the parables source.<sup>17</sup> Matt 18:12–14 may be Q or Matthew<sup>s</sup>, but in either case Luke has the parable from a separate source.

It has been argued that Luke 17:3–4 is a truncated version of the Q form preserved in Matt 18:15–16a, 17,<sup>18</sup> but the more common view is that Matthew and Luke drew on different forms of this traditional piece. But since the additional material of the Matthean form is to be seen ultimately as an expansion of something closer to the Lukan form, Matthean redaction of a common form is also possible.<sup>19</sup>

The comparison with the days of Lot in Luke 17:28–9 sits in the midst of Q material concerned with the day of the coming of the Son of Humanity. Indeed, the verses form the second half of a diptych with the comparison in v. 26–7 to the days of Noah. V. 28–9 will not have existed apart from v. 26–7. But is it a Lukan formulation? Lack of any discernible Matthean motivation for deletion is regularly appealed to <sup>16</sup> Luke will be responsible for Luke 15:3 in connection with the framing he provides in v. 1–3 for the three linked parables. V. 6–7 represent an addition at the point of linkage with the parable of the lost coin, but v. 7 also reflects traditional material related to Matt 18:13 and probably even to v. 14. Matthew has dropped an equivalent to Luke 15:5, which, with an earlier form of Matt 18:13, would have involved a mini-chiasm marked by the verb sequence εὑρη (“he finds”)...εὐρὼν (“finding”)...χαίρων (“rejoicing”)...χαίρει (“he rejoices”). The main Matthean touches are likely to be τί ὑμῖν δοκεῖ; (“what do you think”)—see at 17:24; πλανηθῆ (“is led astray”) and subsequent uses of this verb—this fits with the “causing to stumble” language (the influence of Luke’s verb is evident in its use in Matt 18:14); the language expressing an open-ended outcome—this prepares for 18:15–21; ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν (“amen, I say to you”)—Matthew fond of the phrase (see at 5:18).

---

<sup>17</sup> There may be some tension between the Lukan setting, with its concern with the justification of Jesus’ behavior, and the note of shared joy which suits better an ecclesiastical setting. Cf. J. M. Nützel, Jesus als Offenbarer Gottes nach den lukanischen Schriften, FB 39 (Würzburg: Echter, 1980), 248–251.

<sup>18</sup> E.g., D. Catchpole, “Reproof and Reconciliation in the Q Community: A Study of the Tradition-History of Matt 18,15–17.21–22/Luke 17,3–4,” SNTU 8 (1983): 79–90.

<sup>19</sup> With U. Luz, Matthew 8–20. A Commentary, trans. J. E. Crouch (Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress, 2001), 448–449, and F. Bovon, Das Evangelium nach Lukas 3. Teilband: Lukas 15,1–19,27, EKKNT 3.3 (Düsseldorf, Zürich, Neukirchen-Vluyn: Benziger, Neukirchener Verlag, 2001), 134.

as a basis for treating v. 28–9 as Lukan, but Matthew is often simply concerned to abbreviate; so there is no need to find any problem for Matthew in the materials. It is much more likely that Luke has reproduced his source than that, sensitive to the Jewish use together of these traditions of judgment, he has himself composed this fine companion piece for the Noachic flood material.<sup>20</sup> Though preserved only in Luke, these verses are best seen as part of the Q material, or they could indicate that there was a parallel Luke<sup>S</sup> form for the materials to which v. 28–9 are linked.

The parable in Luke 19:11–28 of the man who goes abroad to receive kingly power has an evident relationship to the parable of the talents in Matt 25:14–30. But royal rule is a feature only of the Lukan parable. A good case can be made that the Lukan parable has been produced, not by secondary development, but by merging together a parable like the one in Matthew with another that deals with the acquisition of royal rule: if we extract and fit together those parts of the parable that deal with royal rule, a more or less complete and coherent narrative emerges; and the allusions to Archelaus which are characteristic of these additions<sup>21</sup> and give quite a negative tone to the royal figure seem more likely to point to the boldness of Jesus than to Luke or the church tradition before him.<sup>22</sup> Who has done the merging? There is no definite parallel for such a role for Luke, though his role in the formation of Luke 12:35–38, and especially in the introduction of v. 37 there, may be suggestive.<sup>23</sup> The usefulness of the Luke 19:11–28 version for Luke argues in favor of attributing the merging of the parables to him. It is probably Luke who has merged a Q parable with another to produce what we find in Luke 19:11–28. But because there has been <sup>20</sup> Bovon, Lukas 15,1–19,27, 173, thinks that Luke 17:28–29 is pre-Lukan and already linked before Luke with v. 26–27.

---

<sup>21</sup> While the departure for a distant land to acquire kingship in Luke 19:12 could reflect a more general phenomenon (Herod the Great had gone to Rome to gain his title [Josephus, War 1.282–285; Ant. 14.374–389], as had Archelaus [War 2.14–100; Ant. 17.224–340]), there is a clear allusion in v. 14 to the delegation that sought to oppose the confirmation by Augustus of Archelaus as ruler of Judea (Josephus, Ant. 17.299–314).

<sup>22</sup> See M. Zerwick, “Die Parabel vom Thronanwärter,” Bib 40 (1959): 654–674; F. D. Wienert, “The Parable of the Throne Claimant (Luke 19:12, 14–15a, 27),” CBQ 39 (1977): 505–514; W. Resenhöfft, “Jesu Gleichnis von den Talenten, ergänzt durch die Lukas-Fassung,” NTS 26 (1979–80): 318–331; J. D. Crossan, In Parables: The Challenge of the Historical Jesus (New York: Harper & Row, 1976), 103.

<sup>23</sup> See Nolland, Luke, 2:699, 701.

so much Lukan editing, it is not possible to distinguish between Luke's use of a Q parable and Matthew's and Luke's use of a parable preserved in both Matthew<sup>S</sup> and Luke<sup>S</sup>.<sup>24</sup> In any case, there is no need here to think of overlapping sources.

1.3.2. Overlap with Mark

We turn now to overlaps with Markan material. Luke has brought the Nazareth scene forward in his Gospel in order for it to serve as a front piece, encapsulating major features of the ministry of Jesus. But he has clearly had more material available to him than his Markan source offered: the mention of miracles in Capernaum in 4:23 must have a source explanation; the difficulties in the thought sequence (esp. v. 22 to 23, 23 to 24 and 24 to 25–27) suggest the welding together of various sources. Not all of the source material has a necessary connection with a visit of Jesus to Nazareth, but v. 23b certainly does, and it can have been transmitted only in the context of a report of a visit of Jesus to Nazareth. Since virtually nothing of the Markan wording survives in the Lukan text, there was not necessarily any significant verbal overlap between the Markan material and Luke's sources, but Luke certainly had at least one other account beyond Mark's of a visit of Jesus to Nazareth.

The Markan material has had a greater impact on Luke's account of the call of the fishermen in 5:1–11 than was the case with the Nazareth visit. Luke seems to have integrated features of Mark 1:16–20 and drawn on Mark 3:7, 9; 4:1 in producing his account. But with all likely Markan influence removed,<sup>25</sup> Luke's source account here will have had in common with Mark 1:16–20 a setting by the sea of Galilee, Peter and others who were fishermen, and a fresh destiny for Peter, in connection with Jesus, of fishing for people. As with the Nazareth account, there is no demonstrable verbal overlap, but there is a substantial material overlap.<sup>26</sup>

<sup>24</sup> Bovon, Lukas 15,1–19,27, 285–290, thinks that Matthew reproduces Q and Luke reproduces Luke<sup>S</sup>.

<sup>25</sup> See discussion in Nolland, Luke 1:220. The evident connection of Luke 5:8 with the theophany and call experienced by Isaiah (Isa 6) demands a resolution in terms of a call to serving God. F. Bovon, L'évangile selon Saint Luc 1, 1–9, 50, CNT 3a (Geneva: Labor et Fides, 1991), 223, thinks that the material could be Luke<sup>S</sup> or a floating tradition.

<sup>26</sup> Luke 5:39 is added by Luke to his rendering of Mark 2:21–22, but the catchword link and quite different point make it difficult to argue that Luke's source for the verse was already linked in his source to a version of Mark 2:21–22.

There is probably also quite a lot of Markan and Lukan influence on the wording of Luke 8:1–3. There is influence from Luke 4:43–44 (and behind that Mark 1:38–39), Mark 3:14 and possibly 15:41–42. But Luke 8:1–3 is kept from being primarily a rewrite of Mark 15:41–42 by the evident presence of additional tradition from which Luke has drawn, esp. Luke 9:2b–3a. The extent of overlap of Luke’s source with what is in Mark 15:41–42 is uncertain, but significant material overlap is possible and even reasonably likely: information about Mary Magdalene’s demons and about Joanna as the wife of Chuza, Herod’s steward, will have been transmitted in the context of awareness of the link between Jesus and these women.

Reid has argued the case for the Transfiguration account in Luke 9:28–36 reflecting a uniquely Lukan source.<sup>27</sup> His case has been heavily criticized by Miller, who prefers the view that Luke composed the distinctive material in Luke here.<sup>28</sup> But Miller concedes that his own view does not produce an entirely satisfactory explanation of the data. Reid’s case falls short of demonstration. But if in our wider framework of understanding we recognize the presence of considerably more oral and possibly even written material than can be concretely identified, we should be seeing the burden of proof rather differently: whenever we cannot produce an entirely satisfactory explanation of the data in terms of redaction by the evangelist, a source explanation should be considered possible and even likely, even when there is no basis for determining the scope or integrity of the putative source.<sup>29</sup>

It is widely recognized that there was a mission charge in Q and that this has had a major impact on the material in Luke 10:1–16 and Matt 9:37–10:42, and that there was a measure of overlap between this source and Mark 6:7–13. Since both Matthew and Luke are likely to have been influenced by the text of Mark 6:7–13, precise delineation of the degree of overlap is not possible. But in common will be at least a mission charge as such; restrictions on what is to be taken

---

<sup>27</sup> B. E. Reid, The Transfiguration: A Source and Redaction-Critical Study of Luke 9:28–36, Cahiers de RB 32 (Paris: Gabalda, 1993). Reid mentions ten previous scholars who considered that Luke had access to a distinctive source for the Transfiguration.

<sup>28</sup> R. J. Miller, “Source Criticism and the Limits of Certainty: The Lukan Transfiguration as a Test Case,” ETL 74 (1998): 127–144. See also M. Mach, “Christus Mutans: Zur Bedeutung der Verklärung Jesu,” in Messiah and Christos. Studies in the Jewish Origin of Christianity, ed. I. Gruenwalds, S. Shaked, G. G. Stroumsa (Tübingen: Mohr, 1992), 177–198, who finds a Hebrew substratum.

<sup>29</sup> I fully recognize the discomfort for scholars in such an approach: the scholar’s natural desire to be in control is painfully undercut.

along; being received or not in houses, and the proper responses thereto.<sup>30</sup> A greater level of verbal commonality is quite possible, but not demonstrable.<sup>31</sup>

The version of the Lord's Prayer preserved in Luke 11:2–4 is generally treated as Q material. But this is one of the places where there is also wide recognition that the forms of this prayer as received respectively by Matthew (see Matt 6:9–13) and Luke were significantly different. Were the different versions embedded in an otherwise largely common form of Q, or are we to think in terms of transmission apart from Q? We cannot really tell, but the company the Lukan version keeps is Luke<sup>s</sup> and not Q material. Perhaps there was a Q version, but Luke also had another version. In any case, we are dealing with two source versions.<sup>32</sup>

Detailed argumentation is not possible here, but we need to free our consideration of the Lord's Prayer from being controlled by the idea that the gospel forms cannot owe anything to the intervention of the evangelists. This widespread judgment cuts right across the complex mix of conservative preservation of wording and adaptation and freedom of rendering that we actually observe in early Christian practice. The whole discussion of liturgical fragments in the NT epistles—no longer so active as it once was—is almost uniformly based on the assumption that when incorporated into the epistles these fragments were edited in various ways. Similarly, the canonical forms of Jesus' words at the Last Supper suggest quite a fluid liturgical use, probably combined with some intervention on the part of the evangelists themselves.

The extra elements in the Matthean form of the prayer are most likely to represent elaboration of the shorter and more original prayer form (Matt 6:10bc: "let your will come into effect—as in heaven, [so] also on earth"; v 13b: "instead, rescue us from [that which is] evil"). It is unclear whether the elaboration reflects liturgical use or is Matthean or pre-Matthean editing in the context of a more elaborate document. But Luke will not be responsible for eliminating them from his form of the prayer. Matthew's longer opening ("Our Father in heaven") may, however, be more original than Luke's simple "Father," which is likely to be a secondary conforming of the mode of address to Jesus' own normal manner of addressing God. In the case of smaller differences, the Matthean wording seems more original.<sup>33</sup>

<sup>30</sup> See discussion of sources in Nolland, Luke, 2:547–8.

<sup>31</sup> J. A. Fitzmyer, The Gospel According to Luke, AB 28–29 (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1981–85), 1:83, is one of the scholars who identify Luke 10:25–28 as Luke<sup>s</sup>, but apart from Mark 10:17–22; 12:28–34 and the second source evident in the commonalities between Matt 22:34–40, Luke is likely to have only had a minimal original frame that already linked the following parable to the idea of "neighbor." See Nolland, Luke 2:580.

<sup>32</sup> Liturgical use is another possible source. See F. Bovon, Évangile selon Saint Luc 9,51–14,35, CNT 3b (Geneva: Labor et Fides, 1996), 115–116.

This piece of Luke<sup>s</sup>—if that is what it is—is paralleled by a Q or Matthew<sup>s</sup> form which is, overall, very similar.

Luke 12:35–38 has been treated above in relation to Q, but it also has an evident relationship with Mark 13:33–37. And the differences are very unlikely to be primarily Luke's work. Bauckham has identified a process of "deparabolization" that has broken down the original narrative (parable) structure.<sup>34</sup> There is a good measure of agreement that the Lukan form has developed in stages from a form closer to that of Mark 13:34–36, but which had a number of distinctive features: no mention of the journey or the role of any other servants beyond the doorkeeper; reference to the need to watch in the third person; numbered watches of the night (as in Luke).<sup>35</sup> What we seem to have here is material overlap, but very little verbal overlap of language. In the light of the earlier discussion of the relationship between Luke 12:35–38 and Q, we may now say that Luke actually had access to three distinct versions of this material.

The materials of Luke 19:41–44 are mostly quite distinctive, but in v. 44 the reference to no stone upon another is reminiscent of the same in Mark 13:2. But in which direction does the dependence run? Dupont's arguments retain their cogency for considering that the material in Mark 13:2 is drawn ultimately from a version of the tradition preserved in Luke 19:43b–44ab, rather than the other way around.<sup>36</sup> There is an overlap here between Luke<sup>s</sup> and Mark.

Luke's eschatological discourse in chapter 21 is clearly a version of Mark 13. Where the Lukan form is different, is Luke editing freely, or is he at times following an alternative source? The matter is disputed.

<sup>33</sup> For more details see Nolland, Luke, 2:610–611, 612–617.

<sup>34</sup> R. Bauckham, "Synoptic Parousia Parables and the Apocalyptic," NTS 23 (1977): 162–176, at 167–169.

<sup>35</sup> Well argued in Weiser, Knechtsgleichnisse, 161–174.

<sup>36</sup> J. Dupont, "Il n'en sera pas laissé pierre sur pierre (Marc 13,2; Luc 19,44)," Bib 52 (1971): 301–320.

If there is a second source, what is its scope? The maximal view finds traces of a second source covering the material of Luke 21:5–7, 10–15, 18–20, 21b–26a, 28–31, 34–6, but this maximal view is linked with a Proto-Luke hypothesis, and requires a Proto-Luke version of the eschatological chapter which is not dependent on Mark 13. If we start instead from a concern to identify material that goes beyond Mark 13 material and where the content is not significantly Lukan, a generous list might include v. 11, 18, 21b–22, 23b, 24–26a, 28, 34–6. A less generous list might exclude v. 11, 21b, 25a, and a less generous list again might exclude v. 22, 28, 34–6. But if such a source existed, it must have been a self-sufficient eschatological discourse in its own right. It is perhaps best to think in terms of an additional eschatological discourse of limited scope and embracing something like v. (9a).<sup>37</sup> 11b (from “there will be terrors”), 18, 20 (included as a necessary center of coherence) 21b, 22, 23b, (24), (25a), (25b), 26a, 28.<sup>38</sup> (I have bracketed those elements which are less secure in the postulated source.) Of course, once we have this much, it is possible that there was rather more in the source of material common with Mark 13. But what we have in any case is a discourse that has the same overall shape as its Markan parallel. The Luke<sup>s</sup> version of the Eschatological Discourse has not undergone what one might suspect to have been the secondary rewriting in Danielic idiom of the Mark 13 form (perhaps inspired by an original Danielic link for only Mark 13:26), but it covers much of the same ground.

The Luke<sup>s</sup> source identified here, with its partial overlap and general parallel with Mark 13, also has some commonality with the Q source behind Luke 17:22–37. Luke has recognized the parallel with Mark 13 by drawing into Luke 17:31 the material of Mark 13:15 (subsequently dropping it from the material he uses in Luke 21). And, as argued by Kloppenborg,<sup>39</sup> Matthew is likely to have had yet another eschatological source represented in 24:10, 12, 30, 31, since Did. 16.3–6 has materials that parallel these verses and the Didache materials are striking in their lack of correspondence with any of the Markan clauses. There is also a likelihood that Matt 10:23 is the outcropping of another form of the Eschatological Discourse (of uncertain but perhaps limited scope) known to Matthew (v. 23 concludes a section of material paralleled in Mark 13:9–13). Matt 10:23 may well be part of the same source as that identified by Kloppenborg. It is notable that the verse comes immediately after what is clearly a version of Mark 13:9–13. Once again there is a measure of overlap, recognizable similarity, and comparable overall shape.

<sup>37</sup> The possible inclusion of Luke 21:9 is based on what is likely to be a set of allusions to Jer 51: an allusion to v. 46 in Luke 21:9 (better preserved in Mark 13:7 than in Luke’s text); to v. 45 in Luke 21:21b; to v. 55 in Luke 21:25b; and possibly to v. 48 in Luke 21:25–26.

<sup>38</sup> See further Nolland, Luke, 3:984, as well as the points at which each of the listed verses here is discussed.

<sup>39</sup> J. S. Kloppenborg, “Didache 16.6–8 and Special Matthean Tradition,” ZNW 70 (1979): 54–56.

The Luke<sup>S</sup> eschatological source exhibits patterns of similarity and overlap with no less than three other eschatological discourses.

For the passion narrative, Luke clearly makes use of his Markan source, but there has been considerable debate about whether he has available a second continuous passion narrative (as distinct from access to isolated additional items of tradition). I have elsewhere offered a case for the definite existence of such a source.<sup>40</sup> A second Lukan source first becomes visible in 22:15–20, is uncertain for v. 21–23, is clear for v. 24–30, 31–34, 35–8, likely for v. 39–46, 47–54a, 54b–62, clear for v. 63–64, likely for v. 66–71; 23:1–5, quite possible for v. 6–12, uncertain for v. 13–16, likely for v. 18–25, very likely for v. 26–32, likely for v. 33–34,<sup>41</sup> unlikely for v. 35–38, very likely for v. 39–43, quite possible for v. 46–47 in the unit v. 44–49, and possible for v. 50–56. There is of course no guarantee that all of this came to Luke from a single source, but the sheer quantity involved makes a second continuous passion source for Luke almost certain.<sup>42</sup> As was the case with the multiple version of the eschatological discourse, there is recognizable similarity and a comparable overall shape.<sup>43</sup>

In 24:12, Luke has Peter running to the tomb. The authenticity of the verse has been disputed because of its absence in D and its similarity to elements in John 20:3–10. But Luke 24:12 is found in every other textual witness including p<sup>75</sup>, and it is clear that in Luke 24 the Western <sup>40</sup> Summarised in Nolland, Luke, 3:1023, and detailed in the later discussion there of the various passages.

---

<sup>41</sup> Despite R. W. Hoover, "Selected Special Lukan Material in the Passion Narrative: Luke 23.33–34, 47b–49," Forum 1.1 (1998): 119–127, who considers the verses he discusses as Lukan editing of Mark.

<sup>42</sup> In many cases the second source seems to have some link with Johannine tradition, but not in a manner that provides support for literary dependence in either direction.

<sup>43</sup> Even those who are not persuaded by the case for a second Passion Narrative available to Luke must recognize that Luke is drawing on tradition at key points where his account differs from Mark, e.g., Luke 22:15–20, 24–30.

text has been concerned to be as short as possible and has abbreviated quite a bit out of the text. As for the link with John, there are many points at which the text of Luke has distinctive links with Johannine material, so in a text-critical discussion too much should not be made of the link here. The reading in p<sup>75</sup> has led to a reevaluation of the authenticity of Luke 24:12 and there seems now to be a broad consensus that the verse is original.<sup>44</sup>

If the verse is original, is it free Lukan composition or does Luke draw upon a source? If John had access to Luke, the similarities here with John have no source significance for Luke 24:12. I think they do have such a significance, but I cannot defend here the view that John did not make use of Luke, but that both drew on a shared body of tradition. It is F. Neiryck who has argued the case in greatest detail for free Lukan composition of Luke 24:12, with Johannine use of Luke.<sup>45</sup> Neiryck is likely to be right that Luke sets the experience of the women in parallel with that of Peter, but if this is so, it is hard to believe that in free Lukan composition Luke would not have provided a more obvious vocabulary overlap between his paralleled episodes. Neiryck struggles to account for the historic present βλέπει (“he sees”), which is surprising in Luke and is best seen as a source relic. Since nothing that is Lukan in Luke 24:12 is carried over to John’s rendering, it is altogether more likely that they have drawn on a common tradition (closer to Luke’s form, but possibly with company for Peter [cf. the plural of v. 24]).

But if Luke has a tradition for 24:12, what will its scope have been? G. Claudel has offered significant arguments for believing that the tradition of the Petrine visit always existed in connection with that of the women’s visit to the tomb.<sup>46</sup> Certainly, Luke 24:12 cannot have been transmitted without a linkage to something that would provide motivation for Peter’s visit to the tomb (even his hurried visit to the tomb). The only obvious candidate is an account of the women’s experience at the tomb. So it is likely that, although there is no clear trace of a second non-Markan source in Luke 24:1–9, Luke's tradition for Luke 24:12 was already linked to just such a source. Some of the features which can fairly readily be accounted for as Lukan redaction in v. 1–11 may actually point to influence from this second source. Here, Luke<sup>s</sup> is likely to have had a significant material overlap with the Markan source.

<sup>44</sup> See esp. the considerations adduced by J. Muddiman, “A Note on Reading Luke xxiv.12,” ETL 48 (1972): 542–548.

<sup>45</sup> See esp. F. Neiryck, “The Uncorrected Historic Present in Lk. xxiv. 12,” ETL 48 (1972): 548–553; idem, “παρακύψας βλέπει,” ETL 53 (1977): 113–152; idem, “ἀπῆλθεν πρὸς ἑαυτὸν: Lc 24,12 et Jn 20,10,” ETL 54 (1978): 104–118; idem, “John and the Synoptics: the Empty Tomb Stories,” NTS 30 (1984): 161–187.

<sup>46</sup> G. Claudel, La confession de Pierre: Trajectoire d'une péripécie évangélique, Études bibliques NS 10 (Paris: Gabalda, 1988), 80–81.

1.3.3. Overlap with Matthew<sup>s</sup>

It is a matter of definition whether one should include here the Q material that seems to have reached Matthew in rather different form than it reached Luke. The two forms of the Lord's Prayer have already been discussed above, but the issue becomes acute in relation to quite a bit of the material in the Sermon on the Mount. Both Matthew and Luke have been quite active editors in relation to these materials, and it is difficult to find the line between differences based on editorial intervention on the part of the evangelists and differences that pre-date the evangelists' work. Materials incorporated into Luke's Sermon on the Plain which also appear in Matt 5–7 can with some confidence be attributed to a document shared between Matthew and Luke, no matter how great the differences were between the forms of the document of which each made use. But outside this frame it is frequently not really possible to distinguish between material coming from Matthew<sup>s</sup> in one form and Luke<sup>s</sup> in another, and material coming from different recensions of a Q document (or even Q documents?).

The beatitudes in Matthew (5:3–12) and the beatitudes in Luke (6:20–26) count as Q material, but the source forms for Matthew and Luke seem to have been radically different.

It is likely that the Matthean beatitudes have a complex prehistory. Luke knows only four beatitudes, balanced by four woes (Luke 6:20–26). Matthew has nine, the first, second, fourth and ninth of which match the Lukan beatitudes (with the order inverted for the second and fourth). There is a reasonable scholarly consensus that Luke's first three are the core beatitudes and also that the divergences between the present forms are not all to be attributed to the respective evangelists.

I think it most likely that Luke's fourth beatitude formed an original unity with the fourth woe (poetic antithetical parallelism), and that it was the linking of this fourth beatitude to the original three which caused the separation of the woe and inspired the formation of the other three woes. Matthew's eighth beatitude, probably inspired by the ninth, would make best sense if it was created to complete a set (note the repetition in the eighth of the second clause of the first beatitude and the clear formal difference of the ninth beatitude), but a set of seven seems more likely than a set of eight. This in turn suggests that the formation of the eighth predates the inclusion of one (most likely the third) of the present set, and is therefore pre-Matthean.

So Matthew and Luke are likely to have access to very different forms of these materials in the context of their Q documents. But the situation is likely to be one step more complex yet: Matthew's sermon may, in turn, have been influenced by the Lukan woes. There is some evidence that either the composition of the woes reflects knowledge of material in the Sermon on the Mount not found in the present Lukan text, or that the Matthean text shows acquaintance with the woes. Jas 5:1 seems to reflect an awareness of the woes; given other elements of a shared world between James and Matthew, this might support a Matthean acquaintance with the woes. Luke 6:21b uses κλαίω ("weep") in a rather different manner from Luke's other uses of this verb: it is used here in connection with the afflictions of the poor in a manner reminiscent of Pss 125 [126]:6; 136 [137]:1. This suggests a source usage. And this in turn suggests that Matthew's use of πενθέω ("mourn") in the corresponding beatitude in Matt 5:4 may well draw its verb from the corresponding Lukan woe.<sup>47</sup>

It looks as if Matthew had at his disposal two forms of the beatitudes, and that while he has primarily used and edited the longer form, he was also attentive to the other form and was specifically influenced by it in at least one place. Each of these forms had its own complex history of development, which suggests a significant period of development. Perhaps there was a common source origin later than the historical Jesus, but a set of three fits well into a natural oral rhetoric, and poverty, hunger and weeping make a striking and a natural set. It is notable that despite the complex history of development, each of the developed sources remains solidly rooted in the common core and preserves its essential thrust.

Though both Luke and Matthew begin their Gospels with an infancy account, there is no common episode between the two accounts. Given the difficulties of harmonization, it seems quite unlikely that either account has been produced with an awareness of the other. It seems reasonable, therefore, that special weight should be given to the basic agreement that exists between the two accounts. I give the agreements in the words of Fitzmyer.<sup>48</sup>

---

<sup>47</sup> See Nolland, Luke, 1:280–281, 284. Bovon, Luc 1, 1–9, 50, 290–291, is content with a shared Q form.

- (i) Jesus' birth is related to the reign of Herod (Luke 1:5; Matt 2:1);
- (ii) Mary, his mother to be, is a virgin engaged to Joseph, but they have not yet come to live together (Luke 1:27, 34; 2:5; Matt 1:18);
- (iii) Joseph is of the house of David (Luke 1:27; 2:4; Matt 1:16, 20);
- (iv) An angel from heaven announces the coming birth of Jesus (Luke 1:28–30; Matt 1:20–21);
- (v) Jesus is recognized himself to be a son of David (Luke 1:32; Matt 1:1);
- (vi) His conception is to take place through the Holy Spirit (Luke 1:35; Matt 1:18, 20);
- (vii) Joseph is not involved in the conception (Luke 1:34; Matt 1:18–25);
- (viii) The name "Jesus" is imposed by heaven prior to his birth (Luke 1:31; Matt 1:21);
- (ix) The angel identifies Jesus as "Savior" (Luke 2:11; Matt 1:21);
- (x) Jesus is born after Mary and Joseph come to live together (Luke 2:4–7; Matt 1:24–25);
- (xi) Jesus is born at Bethlehem (Luke 2:4–7; Matt 2:1);
- (xii) Jesus settles, with Mary and Joseph, in Nazareth in Galilee (Luke 2:39, 51; Matt 2:22–23).

There is a remarkable material overlap here between Luke<sup>S</sup> and Matthew<sup>S</sup>, which is the more significant because there is no trace of any commonality of source material standing behind any of the agreements.

1.3.4. Summary

So what may we conclude about the scope of Luke<sup>S</sup> and its overlap with other gospel sources? I have suggested that we need to reimagine the likely scope of Luke<sup>S</sup>. What we can recover of the scope of Luke<sup>S</sup> with any reasonable confidence is likely to be only the tip of the iceberg. I have wanted to suggest the likely existence of quite a body of <sup>48</sup> Fitzmyer, Luke, 1:307. And cf. Brown, The Birth of the Messiah: a commentary on the infancy narratives in the gospels of Matthew and Luke, 2nd ed. (New York: Doubleday, 1993), 158–163. In connection with identifying the Infancy material legend-of-heroes material, Bovon, Luc 1, 1–9, 50, 48–49, considers the infancy material late and legendary. W. Radl, Der Ursprung Jesu. Traditionsgechichtliche Untersuchungen zu Lukas 1–2 (Freiburg: Herder, 1996), identifies extensive source material, but is less confident about historicity.

---

extra Luke<sup>s</sup> to which we can have no access, but which has impacted on Luke's telling of the story of Jesus (both in cases where Luke has material in common with another gospel, and where he does not), and whose existence provides, not in particular cases but in an overall manner, multiple source support in relation to assessing the general historical reliability of Lukan reporting.

Moving beyond these general considerations it has been possible to identify multiple attestation in connection with overlap of sources with Q material, Markan material and Matthew<sup>s</sup> material for considerable quantities of Luke<sup>s</sup> material, or if not multiple attestation, evidence that elements of Luke<sup>s</sup> came to Luke already linked with material that is paralleled in another gospel. Quite a proportion of Luke<sup>s</sup> turns out either to belong to the multiply attested material of the gospels, or at least to have come to Luke in close connection with material that is multiply attested. Multiple attestation is no guarantee of historicity, and keeping close company with multiply attested material is even less so. But multiple attestation and close linkage in a source with multiply attested material both make historicity more likely.<sup>49</sup> And both encourage the consideration of Luke<sup>s</sup> as mainstream source material and not as marginal material of secondary significance.

We turn our attention now to that visible part of Luke<sup>s</sup> which has not been caught up in the present section as involving overlap with other gospel sources.

1.4. The Remainder of Visible Luke<sup>s</sup>

Reminding ourselves that we can do little with the likely Luke<sup>s</sup> material that has left no certain mark on the gospel text, we deal now with the Luke<sup>s</sup> materials that have not been caught in the web of overlapping sources discussed above. The three big categories of remaining material are materials connected with the risen Jesus (41 verses)<sup>50</sup> and the infancy of John the Baptist (54 verses),<sup>51</sup> and parables material

---

<sup>49</sup> In the case of extended sources, e.g., for the Eschatological Discourse and the Passion Narrative, there is no way to be sure about whether some of the individual items which are distinctive to Luke came from the connected source or were added into it by Luke, but the very existence of these parallel sources makes it more likely that particular distinctive features of the Lukan versions are from his sources.

<sup>50</sup> Luke 24:13–35, 36–43, 44–9, 50–53.

<sup>51</sup> Luke 1:1–25, 39–44, 57–80.

(between about 143 and 166 verses).<sup>52</sup> The remaining material (73 to 85 verses) is predominantly narrative. Three of the five new miracles attributed to Jesus in Luke<sup>S</sup> are found here.<sup>53</sup> There is very little teaching, though admittedly much of the narrative contains or implies some small teaching content. In only a few cases (amounting to nine verses in all) is the teaching content at all detachable from its narrative frame.<sup>54</sup>

Inevitably, discussion of the resurrection appearances is heavily influenced by conscious and unconscious presuppositions on the part of scholars. Building on the work of Meynet,<sup>55</sup> I have argued elsewhere that the Emmaus account is presented in Luke as part of a more elaborate chiasmic structure running from 24:4–46 (48).<sup>56</sup> I have argued, further, that Luke is responsible for the reach of the chiasm beyond the Emmaus account and that he has also altered the Emmaus chiasm to include within the structure materials he has added to this account.<sup>57</sup> The implication is that Luke has drawn on a single source for most of the Emmaus account; he has not been engaged in some flight of fancy. The appearance scene in v. 36–43, 44–49 has various links to other gospel traditions. V. 36–41 have a strong link with Jn 20:19–20, and for Luke 24:47–49 the links with Jn 20:21–23 are notable. This has source significance only if, as I think, John is not drawing on Luke (or vice versa).<sup>58</sup> Matt 28:16–20 has significant links with Luke 24:41, 47, (49), 52, which—barring dependence of either Luke and Matthew on the other evangelist—provides some assurance that Luke <sup>52</sup> Should the account of Simon, Jesus and the woman of the city (Luke 7:36–50) be included in part or in whole? How do we count in the parable of the man who went away to receive kingly power (19:11–27), given the likelihood that Luke has merged two parables here, one a Q parable? Otherwise, the materials are 10:29–37; 11:5–8; 12:16–21; 13:6–9; 14:7–14, 28–33; 15:8–10, 11–32; 16:1–13, 19–31; 17:7–10; 18:1–8, 9–14.

---

<sup>53</sup> Luke 7:11–17; 13:10–17; 17:11–17.

<sup>54</sup> The most readily detachable are Luke 10:17–20 (Satan's fall); 12:32 ("Fear not, little flock"), 47–48 (graduated beatings); 17:20–21 (how the kingdom comes).

<sup>55</sup> R. Meynet, "Comment établir un chiasme: À propos des 'pèlerins d'Emmaüs,'" NRT 100 (1978): 233–249. Meynet builds in turn on J. D'Arc, Les pèlerins d'Emmaüs Lire la Bible 47 (Paris: Cerf, 1977); idem, "Un grand jeu d'inclusions dans 'les pèlerins d'Emmaüs,'" NRT 99 (1977): 62–76.

<sup>56</sup> Nolland, Luke, 3:1177–1178.

<sup>57</sup> Ibid., 1198–1199. Notably, Luke 24:28–30 is likely to be a Lukan addition, balanced in the chiasm by expansion at v. 17–19a.

<sup>58</sup> See further on the source independence of John 20:19–20 and Luke 24:36–41 at Nolland, Luke, 3:1210–11.

is drawing on traditional material. In the resurrection appearance material, the Lukan hand is well visible, but so is an extensive tradition base: distinctive tradition; Johannine tradition; Matthew<sup>s</sup> tradition.

The materials connected with the infancy of John the Baptist pose their own distinctive problems for historical evaluation. But it is worth saying that there is considerable similarity to the manner in which Luke reports John's infancy and that of Jesus, and that in the case of Jesus' infancy the main outlines are supported by the independent account in Matthew (despite there being no common episode between the two—see above).

Though questions have been raised in relation to particular parables and there is a broad recognition of development within some of the parables, parables material is generally considered by scholarship to be among the materials that can with greatest confidence be attributed to the historical Jesus. Goulder<sup>59</sup> mounted a brief but powerful attack on this consensus, arguing that only the Markan parables are likely to be parables of the historical Jesus. Goulder demonstrated that the parables in Luke and Matthew shared certain family characteristics that separated them from the parables of the other gospels. He also underlined the fact that the parables in the respective gospels stress the same doctrinal content that can be found elsewhere in each gospel. But does this make Matthew and Luke the parable makers of their respective Gospels? It remains more likely—and on this there is a strong scholarly consensus—that in the vast majority of cases, the parables originated with the historical Jesus, developed through use in the church's life, were selected by the respective evangelists in line with their own overall gospel intentions, and were edited by the evangelists to maximize their effectiveness within those overall gospel intentions. The Lukan parables source discussed earlier would seem to have contained nearly all of the distinctive Lukan parables.

The historicity of all three distinctive miracle accounts found in Luke<sup>s</sup> has come under serious attack, though all relate to kinds of miracles that are attested elsewhere in the gospel materials (raising the dead; cleansing from leprosy; healing on the Sabbath).<sup>60</sup> The restoration of the widow of Nain's son is curiously similar to an account of Apollonius' restoration of a young woman who had died soon after her wedding.<sup>61</sup> In both cases, the wonder-worker stops the bier, speaks about the cessation of tears, and addresses the dead person. This correspondence, and the evident links with the account of Elijah and the widow of Zarephath (1 Kgs 17:8–24), have caused some to question the historicity of the Lukan account. But a common subject matter, a common milieu in the storyteller's art, and a shared desire to exalt a great figure are enough to account for the similarities to the Apollonius account, and while echoes of 1 Kgs 17 are certainly evident, they are only echoes, and could not have generated the story. There are difficulties with the form of the healing account in 13:10–17, but none that the identification of likely Lukan editing cannot deal with.<sup>62</sup> The situation is similar for the account of the cleansing of the lepers in 17:11–19. The echo of the healing of Naaman in 2 Kgs 5:9–19 is evident; for Luke 17:16, there has probably been borrowing from 5:12; and there are other elements that might represent development of the story.<sup>63</sup>

---

<sup>59</sup> M. D. Goulder, "Characteristics of the Parables in the Several Gospels," JTS 19 (1968): 51–69.

<sup>60</sup> Cf. Mark 5:21–43; 1:40–45; 3:1–6.

Within the scope of the present chapter, the remaining items must be left largely uncommented on. There is the genealogy, so different to that in Matthew; several distinctive judgment-related pieces;<sup>64</sup> one "anti"-judgment item;<sup>65</sup> one distinctive anticipation of the Passion;<sup>66</sup> three brief accounts involving a pronouncement by Jesus;<sup>67</sup> one detached pronouncement;<sup>68</sup> and finally two or three unique episodes with named participants.<sup>69</sup> There is nothing here, perhaps with the exception of the genealogy, that is particularly troubling in relation to historical likelihood, though in some cases Christian reflection or expansion might well be suspected.

Though ultimately historical evaluation must still take place item by item, there is nothing in the remainder of visible Luke<sup>S</sup> that we have now scrutinized that should trouble us about the quality of the Luke<sup>S</sup> source material.

We turn our attention now to the Jesus material in Acts.

---

<sup>61</sup> Philostratus, Life of Apollonius, 4.45.

<sup>62</sup> See Nolland, Luke, 2:722–3.

<sup>63</sup> See further Nolland, Luke, 2:844–5.

<sup>64</sup> Luke 10:17–20 (Satan's fall); 12:47–48 (graduated beatings); 12:13–15 ("Who made me judge or arbitrator?"); 13:1–5 ("Were they worse sinners?").

<sup>65</sup> Luke 9:51–56 (no fire from heaven).

<sup>66</sup> Luke 13:31–33 ("today, tomorrow and the third day").

<sup>67</sup> Luke 9:61–62 (saying goodbye first); 16:14–15 (those who justify themselves); 17:20–21 (how the kingdom comes).

<sup>68</sup> Luke 12:32 ("Fear not, little flock").

<sup>69</sup> Luke 10:38–42 (Mary and Martha); 19:1–10 (Zacchaeus); and possibly 7:36–50 (Simon and the woman who anoints Jesus).

2. Acts

In relation to the study of the historical Jesus, the resources in Acts are quite slender. Not that there is not considerable reference to the historical Jesus in Acts.<sup>70</sup> But there are limitations. The first limitation is the restricted scope of the material: in relation to Jesus' ministry prior to the Passion period there is only 1:1, 21–22a; 2:22; 10:37–39a; (19:4); 20:35. The last is a saying of Jesus, unreported in the Gospel; otherwise, we learn only that Jesus taught, was active from the time of John's baptizing activity, started his ministry in Galilee, was known as Jesus of Nazareth, was anointed with the Holy Spirit and power, and attested by God with deeds of power, wonders and signs (articulated from another angle as doing good and healing all who were oppressed by the devil).

This takes us to the second limitation: the summary nature of the material. Most of the material referring back to Jesus focuses on the Passion period and beyond. Rather more information is provided than was the case with the ministry materials, but we are basically told the "that" and not much of the "how." All that is reported in any detail is the last teaching of the risen Jesus and his ascension (1:4–11). Otherwise we learn that Judas, one of the Twelve, was a guide for those who arrested Jesus; Jesus was given up according to God's plan; the Jerusalem Jews with their leaders, though they found no cause for a sentence of death, asked Pilate to have Jesus killed; they asked for a murderer rather than Jesus, when Pilate would have released him; Herod also was implicated in Jesus' death; Jesus was crucified by the hands of "lawless men"; he was laid in a tomb; God raised him from death on the third day; he appeared for many days to his disciples; he was taken up and exalted to the right hand of God as Lord, Christ, leader, savior.

The third limitation has to do with the fact that almost all of this material is embedded by Luke in speeches. The debate continues about the degree to which the speeches are Lukan compositions. But there is enough commonality between speeches of different characters and a sufficient degree of good fit with the flow and thrust of Luke's story to make any claim that these are verbatim reports highly questionable.<sup>71</sup> Nonetheless, it is intrinsically likely that Luke was familiar with the use by Christians of overall outlines of the life of Jesus. Indeed, such outlines would have been in use from the earliest period. And there is every likelihood that these have influenced Luke as he has formulated the various summaries to be found in Acts. Also, the summaries are linked to interpretations of the significance of the events, often in connection with Old Testament texts. And these will not be fresh creations on the part of Luke. The curious syntax in Acts 10:36–37 still troubles scholars; a source might be implicated. Perhaps the way Herod's role is handled in Acts 4:27 is sufficiently different from how it is handled in Luke 23:6–12 to suggest a different track of transmission.

---

<sup>70</sup> So far as I can discover, W. A. Strange, "The Jesus-Tradition in Acts," NTS 46 (2000): 75–91, is the only recent study of the material. There is relevant narrative material, mostly in quite summary form, in Acts 1:1–3, 4–11 (not included by Strange), 16, 21–2; 2:22–40; 3:12–26; 4:10–12, 27; 5:29–32; 7:52; 10:36–43; 12:23–41; 17:30–31; 19:4; 26:22–3; and there is probably an allusion to a saying of Jesus in 6:14, a report of words of the exalted Jesus in 9:5–6 (cf. 22:8, 16), and a reported saying of the historical Jesus in 20:35.

The consideration adduced in the previous paragraph can take us a certain distance, but in relation to the Jesus material it is hard to see how, for the most part, it could ever be possible to distinguish in specific cases between Lukan use of traditional material for the speeches in Acts and Lukan summary of what has already been provided in the Gospel. However, though the value of yet another source or set of sources is not to be understated, we learn virtually nothing that is new from the Acts material. Since Luke is most distinctive in relation to the ascension (and his two accounts are themselves strikingly different), it would be particularly good to have an independent track of transmission here, but we cannot be certain about this.<sup>72</sup> There is also the distinctive material on the role of Herod in the Passion. Otherwise, the Acts materials reflect the basic synoptic outline.

The saying in Acts 20:35 belongs in a category apart. The Greek and Roman parallels to which Foakes Jackson and Lake have drawn attention<sup>73</sup> hardly justify the judgment by Haenchen and Horrell that Luke <sup>71</sup> A balanced summary and evaluation, and a useful bibliography may be found in J. A. Fitzmyer, The Acts of the Apostles. A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary, AB 31 (New York: Doubleday, 1997), 103–108, 111–113.

---

<sup>72</sup> It is very difficult to decide what Luke may have had in the way of sources for the formation of his ascension accounts, but Luke has certainly not invented the idea of Jesus' ascension to heaven (John 20:17; Eph 4:10; 1 Tim 3:16; 1 Pet 3:22; Heb 4:14; 6:19; 9:24). See further Nolland, Luke, 3:1225–6.

<sup>73</sup> F. J. Foakes Jackson and K. Lake, The Beginnings of Christianity: Part 1, The Acts of the Apostles (London: Macmillan, 1933), 5:264.

is the creator.<sup>74</sup> As Strange points out, the saying does not fit its use in Acts particularly well. The saying is best considered traditional; but that does not necessarily make it dominical. It accords well enough with other gospel sayings to make it reasonably likely to be traceable to the historical Jesus, but with the existence of Greek and Roman parallels, confidence in a track back to the historical Jesus will be only as great or small as is the wider confidence of the individual scholar in the commitment to and capability of the early church for faithful preservation of dominical sayings.

There is little in Acts concerning Jesus for which we may demonstrate separate sources. Influence from early Christian usage of outlines of the career of Jesus cannot be demonstrated as certain, but it is very likely. Apart from Acts 20:35, there is virtually nothing new about Jesus in Acts, and thus nothing that could change our overall picture of the historical Jesus. But there is also little that could be confidently appealed to as independent testimony.

We turn finally to a consideration of the likely reliability of the evangelist as historian.

3. Luke as Historian

It has become clear above that Luke does not take us in wild and aberrant directions in his portrayal of Jesus: his Jesus, and more specifically the Jesus of Luke<sup>s</sup> and Acts, is identifiably the same figure that can be discerned from other early Christian sources;<sup>75</sup> and the general quality of his Luke<sup>s</sup> material is supported from the fact that so much of Luke<sup>s</sup> has a partial parallel elsewhere, or came to Luke already linked with material paralleled elsewhere. Luke wrote in a context within which we should imagine a plethora of Jesus material, which both resourced and constrained his writing.

There is no scholarly consensus about the date(s) of Luke's writing; scholarly estimates range from before 70 CE to well into the second century. But if the “we” sections of Acts<sup>76</sup> are an indication that the author was a sometime companion of Paul, then we can link his acquaintance with the early Christian traditions back to early in the 50’s CE. Scholars offer various alternative explanations, but it must be said that none of them would carry much weight, if it were not the case that these scholars have already ruled out on other grounds what remains the most natural explanation for the uses of “we”: the author was there. The “other grounds” focus centrally on differences between the Paul of the letters and the Paul of Acts.<sup>77</sup> There are differences; but only for an exaggeratedly Lutheran Paul is it impossible to put the two Pauls together.<sup>78</sup> The best explanation for the “we” passages is that Luke was there,<sup>79</sup> and this suggests an early acquaintance with the Jesus tradition, including an acquaintance with eyewitnesses to the ministry of Jesus.

---

<sup>74</sup> E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles (Blackwell: Oxford, 1971), 545 n. 5; D. Horrell, "The Lord Commanded...but I have Not Used. Exegetical and Hermeneutical Reflections on 1 Cor 9.14–15," NTS 43 (1997): 587–603, at 598–599.

<sup>75</sup> It can be said, further, that when Luke reproduces source material, he does quite a bit of verbal rewriting, but he is to be identified overall as a conservative editor. See Nolland, Luke, passim.

In Acts, Luke exhibits detailed and accurate knowledge of the state of affairs in the Roman Empire in the period in which his work is set. There is debate about his accuracy on some particular points, but if there are errors, they are the kinds of errors that we might readily find in someone like Josephus, whose work is a mainstay for our historical reconstruction of the period.<sup>80</sup> Luke, where he can be checked, exhibits a high level of general verisimilitude. His presentation of the Christian story may be somewhat schematized to fit the overall pattern of development that structures his account (the same is true for the Gospel account), but he is dealing with events he knows about, and he reports

<sup>76</sup> See Acts 16:10–17; 20:5–15; 21:1–18; 27:1–28:16 (and some texts of 11:28).

<sup>77</sup> Cf. C. K. Barrett, The Acts of the Apostles, vol. 2 (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1998), xlv, “Against this conclusion the only substantial argument consists in the errors found in the Acts account of Paul.”

<sup>78</sup> The sharp point of difficulty comes in Acts 15, and in particular Paul’s agreement to its decree.

<sup>79</sup> See Fitzmyer, Acts, 109–111, for bibliography. He also (98–103) summarizes the argument for “we” as indicating personal presence. See further D.-A. Koch, “Kollektenbericht, ‘Wir’-Bericht und Itinerar: Neue (?) Überlegungen zu einem alten Problem,” NTS 45 (1999): 367–390; A. J. M. Wedderburn, “The ‘We’-Passages in Acts: On the Horns of a Dilemma,” ZNW 93 (2002): 78–98; S. Byrskog, “History or Story in Acts—A Middle Way? The We Passages, Historical Intertexture and Oral History,” in Contextualizing Acts: Lukan Narrative and Greco-Roman Discourse in the Argumentation of the New Testament, SBLSymS 20 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 2003), 257–283.

<sup>80</sup> Notably, there is debate about whether Luke has the sequence right with Theudas and Judas the Galilean in Acts 5:36–37, but an equally good case can be made for querying Josephus’ sequencing in this case.

them with considerable care. Nearly all New Testament scholars continue to depend heavily upon Acts to provide the backbone for their reconstruction of Paul's ministry. Luke's general reliability offers confidence that he is reliable also in those cases where no independent check is possible.

While it is highly rhetorical, Luke's own claim in Luke 1:1–4 should not be dismissed as only rhetorical. He points to a widespread practice in his day of creating written accounts of the gospel events (not just the surviving Mark and the postulated Q!); he links these and his own material, at least indirectly, to eyewitness informants; he claims to have undertaken extensive investigation; he offers his work as a true account. The last of this set is the language of intention, but we should honor it as a mark of honest intention.<sup>81</sup> On the other points, he is providing information that should frame our own attempts to evaluate the historicity of his Jesus material.

4. Conclusion

Our work here has been concerned primarily with the question whether the general historical reliability of the Luke<sup>s</sup> and Acts material should be compared favorably or unfavorably with that of other potential sources for reconstructing the historical Jesus. At the end, we are in a position to suggest a favorable comparison, and even more: the fact that Luke has used Mark and Q so extensively should increase our confidence in them as historical sources.

We have seen that the scope of Luke<sup>s</sup> is likely to have been much greater than is normally appreciated; that much of it is likely to have consisted of parallels to Mark which are no longer definitely identifiable, Q or other Luke<sup>s</sup> materials (multiple attestation which is no longer visible!); that for considerable quantities of the readily identifiable Luke<sup>s</sup> material there is multiple attestation in connection with overlap of sources with Q material, Markan material and Matthew<sup>s</sup> material, or if not multiple attestation, evidence that elements of Luke<sup>s</sup> came to Luke already linked with material paralleled in another gospel. Even the material not swept up into this pattern of overlapping sources has, for the most part, good general claims to reliability. Luke<sup>s</sup> is thoroughly mainstream gospel source material.

---

<sup>81</sup> Cf. L. Alexander, "Fact, Fiction and Genre in Acts," NTS 44 (1998): 380–399, at 399: "Within the epistemological space created by Luke's preface... there is no real room for doubt as to the broadly factual status of his narrative."

I have suggested that Acts is likely to reflect the use of further source materials, for the most part of a summary kind, but for the historical Jesus, Acts scarcely takes us beyond what is already found in the Gospel of Luke.

Luke's general accuracy finds support in the high level of verisimilitude evident in Acts. There is good reason to think that Luke was in touch with Jesus traditions from at least the early 50's CE, that he was in contact with eyewitnesses, and that he wrote on the basis of considerable investigation.

THE NON-SYNOPTIC JESUS: AN INTRODUCTION TO JOHN, PAUL, THOMAS, AND OTHER OUTSIDERS OF THE JESUS QUEST*

MICHAEL LABAHN

1. Preliminary Remarks

Jesus' public activity, with the meaning he offered through his message that the kingdom of God is coming, consisted of words and deeds that made a lasting impression on those whom he addressed. In other words, whether they agreed with him or contradicted him, he entered the memory of his contemporaries and (so to speak) left his imprint there.<sup>1</sup> Just as the imprint must always be distinguished from the original,<sup>2</sup> so the reception of the event is transformed in the memory of the witnesses and those talking about and interpreting the event, and this is why the Markan Jesus receives a variety of answers when he asks: "Who do people say that I am?"—John the Baptist, Elijah, or one of the prophets (Mark 8:27–28; cf. the question by Herod earlier in the Gospel, 6:14–15).

Why did the non-synoptic texts play such a marginal role in the investigation of the "historical Jesus" for such a long time? This is due to their remoteness from the image of Jesus contained in the synoptics, both in terms of content and in their (assumed) chronological distance. Since the synoptic texts are often considered to represent an historically plausible picture of the activity of Jesus, they count as the * Meanwhile there has been a vivid discussion particularly on extra-canonical sources. Due to time I was only able to update some bibliographical references until early 2008 and to add some smaller passages.

---

<sup>1</sup> On the metaphor of memory as a seal leaving its imprint on wax (Plato, Theaetetus 191 c-e), cf. D. Draaisma, Die Metaphernmaschine: Eine Geschichte des Gedächtnisses (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft 1999), 33–36.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. e.g., J. Schröter, "Zur Historizität der Evangelien: Ein Beitrag zur gegenwärtigen Diskussion um den historischen Jesus," in Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. J. Schröter and R. Brucker, BZNW 114 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002), 163–212, at 166–168; reprinted in: idem, Von Jesus zum Neuen Testament. Studien zur urchristlichen Theologiegeschichte und zur Entstehung des neutestamentlichen Kanons, WUNT 204 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 2007), 105–146, at 108–110.

criterion against which other texts are measured. This is why Charles W. Hedrick speaks of the “tyranny of the synoptic Gospels.”<sup>3</sup> However, the central point of this phrase does not do justice to the fact that the synoptic gospels themselves offer us three individual pictures of Jesus. This is why the critical Jesus research which finds its orientation in the synoptic texts about him is generally aware that its results are a “concentrate” from the texts, which lays claim to academic plausibility.<sup>4</sup>

The distance between synoptic and non-synoptic texts about Jesus cannot simply be translated into the antithesis “historical”—“non-historical.” This point was well made as long ago as 1927/29 by Erik Peterson in his lectures on John:

Es hat deshalb auch keinen Sinn zu sagen, die Synoptiker seien ‘historischer’ als das Johannesevangelium. Weder die Synoptiker noch Johannes sind überhaupt historische Darstellungen. Wir können überhaupt nur sagen, dass es einerseits eine mannigfach geartete Tradition um Jesus gegeben hat und dass sodann das Johannesevangelium im Unterschied zu den Synoptikern ein literarisches Werk darstellt. . . . Wir können im allgemeinen, wie mir scheint, fast stets nur ebenso den Pluralismus der Traditionen konstatieren wie etwa den Pluralismus der vier Evangelien überhaupt.<sup>5</sup>

Each text is the attempt at a new construction of meaning, which takes over traditional material because its qualities are acknowledged, i.e. the ability to provide structures and orientation in the present day.<sup>6</sup> Each text is a fiction, in that it creates a narrative world of its <sup>3</sup> C. W. Hedrick, “Tyranny of the Synoptic Gospels,” Semeia 44 (1988): 1–8. He argues that the canon controls “how the past is reconstructed, as well as the very substance of the reconstruction itself” (2). With regard to the historical Jesus, this leads to an “historical synoptic Jesus” (ibid.), in keeping with the influence of the prae of the synoptic gospels on the criteria employed (2–3.).

<sup>4</sup> On the methodological problems linked to “plausibility” in Jesus research, cf. now G. Theissen and D. Winter, Die Kriterienfrage in der Jesusforschung: Vom Differenzkriterium zum Plausibilitätskriterium, NTOA 34 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht/Freiburg, Switzerland: Universitäts-Verlag, 1997), 206–208.

<sup>5</sup> E. Peterson, Johannesevangelium und Kanonstudien, ed. by B. Nichtweiß with K. Anglet and K. Scholtissek; Ausgewählte Schriften 3 (Würzburg: Echter, 2003), 19. ET: “This is why it is meaningless to say that the synoptics are more ‘historical’ than the Gospel of John. Neither the synoptics nor John are historical accounts at all! All that we can say is that a very varied tradition about Jesus existed and that, unlike the synoptics, the Gospel of John is a literary work. . . . In general, it seems to me that all we can do is to note the pluralism of traditions, just as we note the pluralism of the four gospels as a whole.”

<sup>6</sup> On the concept of the “construction of meaning” (Sinnbildung) from the perspective of exegesis, cf. U. Schnelle, Paulus: Leben und Denken, GLB (Berlin: de Gruyter 2003), 11–18.

own.<sup>7</sup> This means that every early Christian draft of an interpretation of the Jesus event—whether literary or oral—is an interpretative model with a significant distance from the historical event itself; the alternative “historical”/“non-historical” cannot assist us in the task of adequately describing the relationship between the remembered object and the event which lies in the past.<sup>8</sup>

Measured against the potential of Jesus’ activity to create meaning, the preservation of the recollection of him will have taken many forms—as is shown in an exemplary manner in the very fact that the canon contains four different gospels. Historical research into Jesus must therefore confront a memory of him which took many forms, and must reflect methodologically on this memory in relation to the event in which it had its starting point.

In the context of the plurality of forms which such memories took, we must inquire into the historical reasonability of all the modulations of meaning. This is not a plea for the methodological exclusion of particular constructions of meaning or of texts; on the other hand, we should not refuse to formulate a judgment on how such models are related to the core. Accordingly, the judgment cannot generally be based on the methodology of Jesus research. Rather, it is the result of the analyses of the various texts which represent the different constructions of meaning. The criteria to be applied in the judgment about the closeness or distance vis-à-vis this “core” is the critically used classic canon of criteria, which has been modified by recent research,<sup>9</sup> though

---

<sup>7</sup> Cf. e.g., B. A. Assmann, Die Legitimität der Fiktion: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der literarischen Kommunikation, Theorie und Geschichte der Literatur und der schönen Künste, Texte und Abhandlungen 55 (München: Fink 1980), 14.

<sup>8</sup> On this question, cf. also J. Schröter, “Die Frage nach dem historischen Jesus und der Charakter historischer Erkenntnis,” in idem, Jesus und die Anfänge der Christologie: Methodologische und exegetische Studien zu den Ursprüngen des christlichen Glaubens, BThSt 47 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 2001), 6–36.

<sup>9</sup> Cf. the clear catalogue in Wege der Schriftauslegung: Methodenbuch zum Neuen Testament, T. Söding, with C. Münch (Freiburg i. Br: Herder, 1998), 289–294; on this subject, cf. also I. Broer, “Die Bedeutung der historischen Rückfrage nach Jesus und die Frage nach deren Methodik,” in Jesus von Nazareth—Spuren und Konturen, L. Schenke et al. (Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 2004), 19–41, at 30–38; J. P. Meier, “Criteria: How do we decide what comes from Jesus?,” in The historical Jesus in Recent Research, ed. J. D. G. Dunn and S. McKnight, Sources for Biblical and Theological Study 10 (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2005), 123–144; S. E. Porter, The Criteria for Authenticity in Historical Jesus Research, JSNT Supp 191 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000). Recent discussion, which refers to the plausibility of context and impact, has received a decisive impetus from Gerd Theissen (cf. Theissen and Winter, Kriterienfrage; on this, cf. also the critical appreciation of the English translation by T. Holmén: JTS 55 (2004): 216–228 and further G. Häfner, “Das naturally without reducing the various constructions of meaning to an historically objectifiable portrait.

There are many differences in the literary character of the texts discussed in the present essay. They employ various genres, each with its own argumentative structure, and they address their readers in a variety of ways. Each contribution represents an independent form of communication, which activates the recollection of Jesus in a specific manner. This reduces the possibility of drawing far-reaching inferences about the knowledge of Jesus tradition external to the text, e.g., in the Pauline communities or in the apostle himself.<sup>10</sup>

In this essay, we cannot present a substantial discussion of every text that might be relevant. On the basis of these preliminary methodological remarks with reference to the presentation of fundamental data, we shall concentrate on recent scholarly discussions and on new departures in exegesis.

2. New Testament "Outsiders"

In the New Testament, we find a number of texts which must be counted among the "outsiders" of research into the historical Jesus. In addition to 1 Peter and the Letter of James, we must look in particular at the Gospel of John and at Paul. Other New Testament texts, which have not been studied so intensively by scholars, cannot be discussed here.

2.1. Paul

2.1.1. Jesus and Paul—the Problem of Defining their Historical and Theological Relationship<sup>11</sup>

In relation to the total extent of his writings, and leaving out of account the fundamental core data of Jesus' passion and cross, there are rather Ende der Kriterien? Jesusforschung angesichts der geschichtstheoretischen Diskussion," in Historiographie und fiktionales Erzählen. Zur Konstruktivität in Geschichtstheorie und Exegese, K. Backhaus, G. Häfner, BThSt 86 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag 2007), 97–130, at 117–119).

---

<sup>10</sup> See also P. Stuhlmacher, "Jesu-tradition im Römerbrief? Eine Skizze," ThBeitr 14 (1983): 240–252, at 242.

<sup>11</sup> For overviews of scholarship, cf. V. P. Furnish, "The Jesus-Paul Debate: From Baur to Bultmann," in Paul and Jesus: Collected Essays, ed. A. J. M. Wedderburn, JSNT Supp 37 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1989), 17–50; F. Holzbrecher, Paulus und der historische Jesus. Darstellung und Analyse der bisherigen Forschungsgeschichte, TANZ 48 (Tübingen: Francke, 2007); S. G. Wilson, "From Jesus to Paul. The Contours and Consefew explicit references in Paul to the earthly Jesus.<sup>12</sup> Nevertheless, the relationship between Paul and Jesus is a theme with many aspects. The relationship between the theological thought-models of Jesus and Paul has been defined on the model of a theologically dubious or possible, an illegitimate or a legitimate connection which Paul makes to Jesus.<sup>13</sup> The theological problems involved in this question have a significant influence on the definition of the historical relationship between Jesus and Paul. Two antithetical positions are maintained: that of a theological lack of interest, and that of theological congruence.

On the basis of the much-discussed<sup>14</sup> affirmation at 2 Cor 5:16,<sup>15</sup> which is often interpreted as a categorical denial on the apostle's part of any interest (or, in the view of some scholars, even any knowledge) of the earthly Jesus—since his interest is the exalted Christ—Rudolf Bultmann arrived at his celebrated verdict: “Jede ‘Würdigung’ der ‘Persönlichkeit’ Jesu fehlt und muß fehlen, da sie nur ein γινώσκειν κατὰ σάρκα wäre, in dem Doppelsinn, daß solches γινώσκειν den Christus nur als einen Christus κατὰ σάρκα, d.h. ein vorfindliches Weltphänomen sehen würde, und daß es eben deshalb ein γινώσκειν κατὰ σάρκα, ein fleischliches Verstehen, ein bloßes Rechnen mit Weltlich-Vorfindlichen wäre”.<sup>16</sup>

---

quences of a Debate,” in From Jesus to Paul. Studies in Honor of F.W. Beare, ed. P. Richardson and J. C. Hurd, (Waterloo: Laurier University Press, 1984), 1–21.

<sup>12</sup> D. Wenham exaggerates greatly when he writes: “there is good cause for saying (1) that Paul knew much of the teaching of Jesus and (2) that he saw it as of great importance, echoing it frequently” (my italics): “The Story of Jesus Known to Paul,” in Jesus of Nazareth, Lord and Christ. Essays on the Historical Jesus and New Testament Christology, ed. J. B. Green and M. Turner (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994), 297–311, at 297.

<sup>13</sup> On this, cf. e.g., J. Blank, Jesus und Paulus. Eine theologische Grundlegung, StANT 18 (München: Kösel, 1968); J. D. G. Dunn, The Theology of Paul the Apostle (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998), 182–206; E. Jünger, Paulus und Jesus: Eine Untersuchung zur Präzisierung der Frage nach dem Ursprung der Christologie, 6th ed., HUTh 2 (Tübingen: Mohr—Siebeck, 1986), 5–16; H. Weder, Das Kreuz Jesu bei Paulus: Ein Versuch, über den Geschichtsbezug des christlichen Glaubens nachzudenken, FRLANT 125 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1981). For the history of earlier research into this problem, cf. F. Regner, “Paulus und Jesus” im 19. Jahrhundert. Beiträge zur Geschichte des Themas “Jesus und Paulus” in der neuzeitlichen Theologie, STGNJ 30 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1977).

<sup>14</sup> Cf. the overview in C. Wolff, “True Apostolic Knowledge of Christ: Exegetical Reflections on 2 Corinthians 5:14ff.,” in Paul, ed. Wedderburn, 81–98, at 82–85; idem, Der zweite Brief des Paulus an die Korinther, ThHK 8 (Berlin, 1989), 123–127.

<sup>15</sup> “From now on, therefore, we know no one from a human point of view (κατὰ σάρκα); even if we had once known Christ from a human point of view, we know him thus no longer (εἰ καὶ ἐγνώκαμεν κατὰ σάρκα Χριστόν, ἀλλὰ νῦν οὐκέτι γινώσκομεν).”

<sup>16</sup> R. Bultmann, “Die Bedeutung des geschichtlichen Jesus für die Theologie des Paulus,” in idem, Glauben und Verstehen. Gesammelte Aufsätze 1, 5th ed. (Tübingen:

2 Cor 5 is marked by the debate which the apostle conducts with his adversaries. Paul highlights here the fact that the message of reconciliation brings about a transformation of values (v. 16). Since κατὰ σάρκα is to be understood here grammatically as an adverbial phrase,<sup>17</sup> the verb does not imply the mere acquisition of knowledge about historical events, but rather an acknowledgment of these events and acceptance of their relevance for an individual. The particle ὥστε refers back to the soteriological affirmation in 2 Cor 5:14–15.<sup>18</sup> In view of what Christ's love has done, Paul rejects the possibility of an understanding in accordance with human criteria, in favor of an understanding born of the recognition that we have been liberated by the event of the cross.<sup>19</sup> The polemic that can be clearly sensed in v. 16a is an attack on the adversaries who see the apostle's suffering as an expression of his weakness, thereby applying an earthly criterion which fails to recognize that the apostle's suffering has its model in the suffering of Jesus, which is the location of his deed of love. The criterion of the Pauline hermeneutics is the orientation to the eschatologically new element (v. 17) which leads through the death and resurrection of the one man to life for all persons (vv. 13f.). This means in contrast to Bultmann's (and others') view that it is impossible to understand 2 Cor 5:16 as expressing a fundamental and theologically justified lack of interest by Paul in the Jesus of history.<sup>20</sup>

The other position is represented by Stuhlmacher, who emphatically affirms that the Pauline theology "took up the essential intentions of the work and the teaching of Jesus, and elaborated these in conceptual Mohr—Siebeck, 1964), 188–213, at 206–207; ET: "There is no 'appreciation' whatever of the 'personality' of Jesus. Such an appreciation must necessarily be lacking, since that would be merely a γινώσκειν κατὰ σάρκα, in the double sense (a) that such a γινώσκειν would regard Christ only as a Christ κατὰ σάρκα, i.e. as a phenomenon existing in the world, and (b) that precisely for this reason, it would only be a γινώσκειν κατὰ σάρκα, a fleshly understanding, a mere reckoning with that which exists in the world."

---

<sup>17</sup> Cf. D. Catchpole, "Q's Thesis and Paul's Antithesis: A Study of 2 Corinthians 5:16," in Forschungen zum Neuen Testament und seiner Umwelt: Festschrift für Albert Fuchs, ed. C. Niemand, Linzer philosophisch-theologische Beiträge 7 (Frankfurt a.M.: Lang, 2002), 347–366, at 360–361; Schnelle, Paulus, 275.

<sup>18</sup> Cf. e.g., J. Lambrecht, Second Corinthians, Sacra Pagina 8 (Collegeville: Liturgical Press 1999), 95.

<sup>19</sup> Cf. also G. Strecker, Theologie des Neuen Testaments, revised, expanded and ed. by F.W. Horn, GLB (Berlin: de Gruyter 1996), 108.

<sup>20</sup> Cf. also A. Lindemann, "Jesus als Christus bei Paulus und bei Lukas: Erwägungen zum Verhältnis von Bekenntnis und historischer Erkenntnis in der neutestamentlichen Christologie," in Schröter and Brucker, eds., Jesus, 429–461, at 437–438.

terms on the basis of Easter.”<sup>21</sup> In Stuhlmacher’s view, this presupposes a broad knowledge of the tradition about Jesus. When we ask about the provenance of this knowledge, we find a clear reply in Martin Hengel and Anna Maria Schwemer, who point to the period he spent in Jerusalem with the earliest apostles (Gal 1:18).<sup>22</sup>

If material about Jesus, or reflection on the role of the historical Jesus, is a factor that must be taken seriously in our evaluation of Paul’s thinking—in the sense of an explicit or implicit reception—then Paul cannot simply be understood as the “re-founder” of Christianity;<sup>23</sup> nor can we say that he lacks interest in the historical Jesus. If Paul does indeed know and make use of Jesus traditions, then (a) he takes them up in view of the communicative situation and the problems discussed in his letters; at the same time, (b) he understands these traditions on the basis of his own fundamental theological thinking. Paul must therefore be understood as a recipient of Jesus tradition, rather than as a direct witness to individual logia, still less to specific historical traditions. Such a perception points to the further tasks to be done in our investigation of the relationship between Jesus and Paul.

2.1.2. Jesus-texts in the Letters of Paul

When scholars seek to define the potential value of Paul for historical research into Jesus, they usually begin by studying texts with the character of explicit Jesus tradition. In keeping with the rhetorical argumentative framework of Paul’s letters, the relevant texts refer rarely to narrative traditions, but above all to traditions of the logia of Jesus. Accordingly, we encounter here one specific problem of research into the historical Jesus, viz. the identification and verification of logia of Jesus in their assumed original form.

The number of possible quotations from, or allusions to, known logia of Jesus is a matter of scholarly dispute,<sup>24</sup> and an immense zeal

<sup>21</sup> P. Stuhlmacher, Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments 1: Grundlegung. Von Jesus zu Paulus (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1992), 222: “...die wesentlichen Intentionen des Werkes und der Lehre Jesu aufgegriffen und von Ostern her begrifflich durchdacht.”

<sup>22</sup> Cf. A. Hengel and A. M. Schwemer, Paulus zwischen Damaskus and Antiochien: Die unbekanntten Jahre des Apostels, WUNT 108 (Tübingen: Mohr—Siebeck, 1998), 232–233.

<sup>23</sup> This position has recently been put forward once more by G. Lüdemann, Paulus, der Gründer des Christentums (Lüneburg: zu Klampen, 2001) repristinating the celebrated thesis of W. Wrede, Paulus, RV I.5/6, 2nd ed. (Tübingen: Mohr—Siebeck, 1907), 104: Paul as the “second founder of Christianity.”

<sup>24</sup> For a skeptical view, cf. especially W. Schmithals, Einleitung in die drei ersten

has been displayed in identifying or rejecting individual passages in Paul as Jesus-texts.<sup>25</sup> Thus, we can speak with James Dunn of an “impasse in the debate.”<sup>26</sup>

---

Evangelien, GLB (Berlin and New York: W. de Gruyter, 1985); idem, “Vom Ursprung der synoptischen Tradition,” ZThK 94 (1997): 288–316. He does not believe that genuine traditions about Jesus existed at an early date and outside the written gospels and their sources (or strata within these sources).

<sup>25</sup> E.g., D. C. Allison, “The Pauline Epistles and the Synoptic Gospels: The Pattern of the Parallels,” NTS 28 (1982): 1–32; C. Breytenbach, “Vormarkinische Logientradition. Parallelen in der urchristlichen Briefliteratur,” in The Four Gospels 1992: Festschrift Frans Neirynck, ed. F. van Segbroeck, C. M. Tuckett, G. van Belle, and J. Verheyden, 3 vols., BETL 100 (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1992), 725–749, at 731–739; D. B. Capes, “Paul, Jesus Tradition in,” in Encyclopedia of the Historical Jesus, ed. C. A. Evans, (New York, London: Routledge, 2008), 446–449; D. L. Dungan, The Sayings of Jesus in the Churches of Paul: The Use of the Synoptic Tradition in the Regulation of Early Church Life (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1971); J. D. G. Dunn, “Jesus Tradition in Paul,” in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTTS 19, 2nd ed. (Leiden: Brill, 1998), 155–178; idem, “Paul’s Knowledge of the Jesus Tradition: The Evidence of Romans,” in Christus bezeugen: Festschrift W. Trilling, ed. K. Kertelge, T. Holtz, and C.-P. März, Erfurter theologische Studien (Freiburg: Herder, 1990), 193–207; E. E. Ellis, “Traditions in 1 Corinthians,” NTS 32 (1986): 481–502; B. Fjærstedt, Synoptic Tradition in 1 Corinthians: Themes and Clusters of Theme Words in 1 Corinthians 1–4 and 9 (Uppsala: Teologiska Institutionen, 1974); H. W. Hollander, “The Words of Jesus: From Oral Traditions to Written Record in Paul and Q,” NT 42 (2000): 340–357; T. Holtz, “Paul and the Oral Gospel Tradition,” in Jesus and the Oral Gospel Tradition, ed. H. Wansbrough, JSNT Supp 64 Sheffield; JSOT Press, 1991, 380–393; S. Kim, “The Jesus Tradition in Paul,” in idem, Paul and the New Perspective: Second Thoughts on the Origins of Paul’s Gospel, WUNT 140 (Tübingen: Mohr—Siebeck, 2002), 259–292; H. Koester, Ancient Christian Gospels: Their History and Development (London: SCM Press/Cambridge: TPI, 1990), 52–62; A. Lindemann, “Die Funktion der Herrenworte in der ethischen Argumentation des Paulus im ersten Korintherbrief,” in Four Gospels, ed. van Segbroeck et al., 677–688; H. von Lips, “Paulus und die Tradition. Die Zitierung von Schriftworten, Herrenworten und urchristlichen Traditionen,” VF 36.2 (1991), 27–49; F. Neirynck, “Paul and the Sayings of Jesus,” in idem, Evangelica II: 1982–1991. Collected Essays, ed. F. van Segbroeck, BETL 99 (Leuven: Peeters, 1991), 511–568; idem, “The Sayings of Jesus in 1 Corinthians,” in The Corinthian Correspondence, ed. R. Bieringer, BETL 125 (Leuven: Peeters, 1996), 141–176; R. Riesner, “Paulus und die Jesus-Überlieferung,” in Evangelium—Schriftauslegung—Kirche: Festschrift P. Stuhlmacher, ed. J. Ädna, S. J. Hafemann, and O. Hofius, (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997), 347–365; Schnelle, Paulus, 95–100; Stuhlmacher, “Jesu-tradition”; C. M. Tuckett, “Synoptic Tradition in 1 Thessalonians,” in The Thessalonian Correspondence, ed. R. F. Collins, BETL 87 (Leuven: Peeters, 1990), 160–182; N. Walter, “Paulus und die urchristliche Tradition,” NTS 31 (1985): 498–522; D. Wenham, “Paul and the Synoptic Apocalypse,” in Studies of History and Tradition in the Four Gospels 2, ed. R. T. France and D. Wenham, Gospel Perspectives 2 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1981), 345–375; idem, “Paul’s Use of the Jesus Tradition: Three Samples,” in idem, ed., The Jesus Tradition Outside the Gospels, Gospel Perspectives 5 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1985), 7–37; idem, Paulus: Jünger Jesu oder Begründer des Christentums? (Paderborn and Vienna: Schöningh, 1999), passim, esp. 342–352.

<sup>26</sup> Dunn, “Jesus Tradition,” 160.

We must distinguish between texts in which Paul explicitly refers to the Kyrios as the origin of what he writes, and texts where the reference can be inferred indirectly, by comparison with other traditions about Jesus.

First, Paul gives some passages a special character by means of an explicit reference to the Kyrios. When he appeals to a “word of the Lord” in 1 Thess 4:15 (ἐν λόγῳ κυρίου), it is highly unlikely that he is referring only to the “commission and authority” of the Lord.<sup>27</sup> Rather, as at 1 Cor 7:10.25 and 1 Cor 9:14, this should be seen as a kind of quotation formula,<sup>28</sup> which has an analogy in the later tradition of the gospel (e.g., Didache 8.2, ὡς ἐκέλευσεν ὁ κύριος ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ, and 9.5, εἶρηκεν ὁ κύριος). This means that the Jesus-text or the gospel material stands under the authority of the Kyrios—as Wolf-Dietrich Köhler has demonstrated in the case of the early Christian reception of the Gospel of Matthew<sup>29</sup>—without an explicit and exclusive reference to the exalted Kyrios.<sup>30</sup> In the following texts, Paul characterizes his arguments or ideas in this way as a directive, a tradition, or a word of the Lord:

1 Thess 4:15–17	cf. Matt 24:30–32
1 Cor 7:10f.	cf. Mark 10:11–13 parr.; cf. also Matt 5:32 par. Luke 16:18
1 Cor 9:14	cf. Matt 10:10 par. Luke 10:7 (Q) <sup>31</sup>
1 Cor 11:23–25	paradosis about the Lord’s Supper: Mark 14:22–25 parr. <sup>32</sup>

<sup>27</sup> O. Hofius, “Agrapha,” TRE 2 (1978): 103–110; idem, “Unbekannte Jesusworte,” in Das Evangelium und die Evangelien, ed. P. Stuhlmacher, WUNT 28 (Tübingen: Mohr—Siebeck, 1983), 355–382, at 358–360.

<sup>28</sup> Cf. T. Holtz, Der erste Brief an die Thessalonicher, EKK 13 (Zürich: Benzinger Verlag/Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1986), 183–184.

<sup>29</sup> W. D. Köhler, Die Rezeption des Matthäusevangeliums in der Zeit vor Irenäus WUNT 2.24 (Tübingen: Mohr—Siebeck 1987), 526–527.

<sup>30</sup> The paradosis about the Lord’s Supper, which clearly does not derive from the exalted Kyrios (cf. Mark 14:22–25 par.), is likewise said to be “received from the Kyrios.”

<sup>31</sup> D. C. Allison goes too far (The Jesus Tradition in Q [Harrisburg: TPI, 1997], 104–119) when he assumes that Paul knew the entire missionary instruction that is transmitted in the document Q (cf. also Stuhlmacher, “Jesu-tradition,” 244). The parallel tradition in Didache 13.1–2 and 1 Tim 5:18 argues in favor of the possibility of an individual logion; and besides this, the other allusions to the instruction in Q which Allison notes are too vague.

<sup>32</sup> 2 Cor 12:9 is an example of a word addressed by the exalted Jesus to Paul; according to 1 Cor 14:37, 1 Cor 14:26–28 is a commandment of the Lord (κυρίου ἐστὶν ἐντολή), and here it is more probable that Paul is claiming the authority of the exalted Lord.

The individual texts vary in the extent to which they agree with the synoptic Jesus tradition.<sup>33</sup> However, even although there is as yet no consensus about the individual pieces of “evidence,” there is general agreement that Paul undoubtedly had access to Jesus tradition.

Secondly, a comparison with Jesus traditions can reinforce the likelihood that other texts in the Pauline epistles are Jesus-texts. Probably the least disputed of these passages is Rom 12:14,<sup>34</sup> Bless those who persecute you (εὐλογεῖτε τοὺς διώκοντας [ύμᾱς]! Bless them and do not curse them (εὐλογεῖτε καὶ μὴ καταρῶσθε)!

Cf. Q 6:27–28 (Matt 5:44 par. Luke 6:27–28):

(27) Love your enemies, (28) [[and]] pray for those [[persecuting]] you ([[καὶ]]) προσεύχεσθε ὑπὲρ τῶν [[διωκ]]όντων ὑμᾶς).<sup>35</sup>

Although we find points of contact between these two texts, both linguistically and above all in terms of their content—and that on a topic which we may reasonably claim goes back to the preaching of Jesus himself—noticeable divergences remain, and Paul does not refer explicitly to the Jesus tradition. Ultimately, all that we can affirm is that there is a clear substantial congruence between the Pauline text and a Jesus-text. The initial command to love one’s enemies is not found in Paul, but its substance is present in the exhortation to bless one’s persecutors.

Rom 14:14 shows clearly the hermeneutic problem which lies behind the discussion about the reception of texts by Paul:

I know and I am certain in the Lord Jesus that nothing is impure in itself, but only for the one who thinks that it is impure: for him it is impure (οὐδὲν κοινὸν δι’ ἑαυτοῦ, εἰ μὴ τῷ λογιζομένῳ τι κοινὸν εἶναι, ἐκεῖνῳ κοινόν).

While Rom 14:4b is firmly integrated into the course of Paul’s argumentation, it can be demonstrated that it contains a number of un-<sup>33</sup> One must bear in mind that the reception of tradition must be understood as a process of actualization, so that one can expect a “free textual paraphrase”: cf. Stuhlmacher, “Jesu-tradition,” 243.

<sup>34</sup> On this, cf. e.g., J. Sauer, “Traditionsgeschichtliche Erwägungen zu den synoptischen und paulinischen Aussagen über Feindesliebe und Wiedervergeltungsverzicht,” ZNW 76 (1985): 1–28, at 17–22.

<sup>35</sup> On the reconstruction of the Q-text cf. The Critical Edition of Q. Synopsis Including the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, Mark and Thomas with English, German, and French Translations of Q and Thomas. General Editors: J. M. Robinson, P. Hoffmann, J. S. Kloppenborg. Managing Editor: M. C. Moreland, Hermeneia Supplement Series (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 2000).

Pauline linguistic elements.<sup>36</sup> This means that there are good arguments for saying that Paul is alluding here to a tradition which had already reached a relatively stable form before it came to Paul. When scholars seek to locate this historically in the preaching of Jesus, the text with which it is most commonly compared is Mark 7:15:

There is nothing outside a man which by going into him can defile him; but the things which come out of a man are what defile him (οὐδέν ἐστιν ἔξωθεν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου εἰσπορευόμενον εἰς αὐτόν ὃ δύναται κοινῶσαι αὐτόν, ἀλλὰ τὰ ἐκ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἔκπορευόμενά ἐστιν τὰ κοινούντα τὸν ἄνθρωπον).

In its present form, Mark 7:15–17 is a reflection of the Markan author's understanding of purity. There is no doubt that the narrator acquires this understanding in a process of reception of the Jesus tradition, since the present textual block bears transparent signs of a rather lengthy process of transmission, which will have begun with an utterance by Jesus. Through his integration of this tradition into his total concept, the Markan narrator attempts to provide ethical orientation for his Gentile Christian community. He no longer sees the problem of cultic purity as virulent; rather, his problem is how a Gentile Christian community is to put its Christianity into practice (cf. 7:23).

The tradition of Jesus' logion about purity is also found in Matt 15:11 and Gos. Thom. 14. The best explanation of this situation is James Dunn's suggestion that an older core underlies these variants. He sees Mark and Paul as representing different developments of Jesus' logion about purity.<sup>37</sup> The same should be said of Matt 15:11 and Gos. Thom. 14. The variants show that Jesus' radical preaching, which often challenged the religious traditions of his own world, made a varied impact and inspired various processes of the construction of meaning. The classical catalogue of criteria used in the quest for the historical Jesus (especially the criterion of multiple attestation) allows us to see that the various meaningful images go back to a common core; but we are denied access to this core itself by our insight into the event of reception which lies behind the variants.

---

<sup>36</sup> In the authentic letters of Paul, the word κοινός is found only at Rom 14:14b; likewise, the emphatic ἐκείνος can be considered un-Pauline; cf. J. D. G. Dunn, Romans 9–16, WBC 38B (Dallas: Word Books, 1988), 820. However, there is good attestation in Paul of λογίζομαι for judgments about theological questions; cf. K. Haacker, Der Brief des Paulus an die Römer, ThHK 6 (Leipzig: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1999), 286. Rom 14:14a has a clearly Pauline character and emphasizes the affirmation about purity; cf. E. Lohse, Der Brief an die Römer, KEK 4 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2003), 377.

<sup>37</sup> J. D. G. Dunn, "Jesus and Ritual Purity: A Study of the Tradition-History of Mark 7.15," in A cause de l'Évangile. Études sur les Synoptiques et les Actes: Festschrift J. Dupont, Lectio divina 123 (Paris: Cerf 1985), 251–276. A scholar who argues against a reference to the Jesus tradition is Lohse, Der Brief an die Römer, 377.

Accordingly, Paul offers a reflection of the preaching of Jesus, a construction of meaning which goes back to the preaching of Jesus and shows how Paul expresses himself and supplies orientation to his community in keeping with this preaching—and not independently of it.

Scholars have discussed the possibility that other Jesus-texts can be recognized in the Pauline writings; some are clearer than others.<sup>38</sup>

Rom 12:17 (cf. also 1 Thess 5:15)	cf. Matt 5:39.41 par.
Rom 13:7	cf. Mark 12:13–22 par.
Rom 13:8–10 <sup>39</sup>	cf. Mark 12:28–34 parr.
Rom 14:13	Mark 9:42 parr.; Matt 18.7 par. Luke 17:1
1 Cor 13:2	cf. Matt 17:20; 21:21 par.
1 Thess 5:2, 4	cf. Matt 24:43; Luke 12:39; cf. also Mark 13:33, 37–39 par.; 2 Pet 3:10; Rev 3:3; 16:15
1 Thess 5:13, 15	cf. Mark 9:50; cf. also Matt 5:9 and in Paul: Rom 12:18; 2 Cor 13:11 <sup>40</sup>

A similar process of comparison should be used in the discussion of these and other possible examples.<sup>41</sup>

Excursus: Does Paul Know a Collection of Jesus-texts?

Dale C. Allison has drawn far-reaching inferences on the basis of the texts which may lie behind the Pauline references: he believes that Paul has received three large collections of logia which were also used by

<sup>38</sup> For a list of other possible references, cf. the overview by Neiryck, "Paul," passim.

<sup>39</sup> On Jesus tradition in the concluding paraenetic section of the Letter to the Romans (chs. 12–15), cf. M. Thompson, Clothed with Christ: The Example and Teaching of Jesus in Romans 12.1–15.13, JSNT Supp 59 (Sheffield: JSOT, 1991).

<sup>40</sup> Cf. Dunn, "Jesus Tradition," 164. He understands these words as a widely diffused rule, and adduces as evidence Sir 6:6 and Epictetus, Diss. 4.5.24.

<sup>41</sup> It is not possible here to give a complete list of possible references; on this point, one may consult Neiryck, "Paul and the Sayings of Jesus," passim, and the bibliography in n. 25 above. Possible allusions and references give a wider scope to a scholarly discussion which remains open; it is only in the core examples mentioned above that we find a relative consensus.

the synoptics: Mark 9:33–50; Luke 6:27–28; and Mark 6:6b–13.<sup>42</sup> Such attempts to argue from the evidence of individual traditions to the existence of larger collections go beyond what can actually be demonstrated. One would have to show, not only that Paul employs a number of texts which form a potential block of tradition in the synoptics, but that there is a conscious and deliberate sequence in the presentation of these texts in Paul.

Thirdly, a further category is the “allusion to Jesus as an example for Paul” (cf. Rom 6:17; 8:15–16; 15:1–5; 2 Cor 8:9; 10:1; Gal 1:18; Phil 2:5).<sup>43</sup> Behind these texts, we can glimpse a knowledge of the historical Jesus to which our literary and historical investigations have no access. These texts show how the one who was remembered acquired significance, as one who imparted meaning and life. As a recipient, Paul gives information about Jesus—not, however, in the form of traditions which we could extract from his letters and identify, but as one who offers an interpretation and is a witness of the still vivid memory of Jesus. The memorized portrait of Jesus depicts one who loves his neighbor, lays down his life, and has fellowship with sinners.

Fourthly, James M. Robinson has pointed out the methodological narrowing-down which is entailed when the only Pauline parallels adduced in the discussion are the synoptic gospels.<sup>44</sup> We must also consider those so-called apocryphal texts which at least some contemporary scholars date early. Christopher Tuckett agrees with this methodological premise<sup>45</sup> and demands a close examination of the possible relationships. He undertakes one such examination, concentrating on the parallel between 1 Cor 2:9:

---

<sup>42</sup> Allison, “Pauline Epistles.” Similarly, B. A. Pearson, “A Q Community in Galilee?,” NTS 50 (2004): 476–494, at 484 and 486, assumes that Paul makes use of a collection of logia of Jesus. However, the fact that various logia in Paul derive from the Q material is not sufficient proof that Paul knew these from an example of Q to which he had access. Besides this, these logia do not permit a certain judgment on the question whether they come from one collection of the words of Jesus (cf. e.g., Koester, Gospels, 54: “a collection of church order materials”).

<sup>43</sup> Dunn, “Jesus tradition,” 168–173.

<sup>44</sup> J. M. Robinson, “The Study of the Historical Jesus after Nag Hammadi,” Semeia 44 (1985), 45–56, at 48; cf. also S. J. Patterson, “Paul and the Jesus Tradition: It is Time for Another Look,” HTR 84 (1991), 23–41, at 30–31.

<sup>45</sup> C. M. Tuckett, “Paul and Jesus Tradition: The Evidence of 1 Corinthians 2:9 and Gospel of Thomas 17,” in Paul and the Corinthians. Studies on a Community in Conflict: Festschrift M. Thrall, ed. T. J. Burke and J. K. Elliott, NTS 109 (Leiden: Brill, 2003), 55–73, at 56 and 57.

What no eye has seen, nor ear heard, nor the heart of man conceived, what God has prepared for those who love him<sup>46</sup> and Gos. Thom. 17:<sup>47</sup>

Jesus said, 'I shall give you what no eye has seen and what no ear has heard and what no hand has touched and what has never occurred to the human mind.'<sup>48</sup>

Tuckett's conclusion is negative: "the saying in 1 Cor 2:9 may have been known and used by the Corinthians. But there is nothing to suggest that it was known as a saying of Jesus."<sup>49</sup> It cannot be shown that a version of these words circulated at an early date in the form of a logion of Jesus; nor can it be demonstrated as certain that either Paul or the Corinthians knew it under this ascription. Nor can the quotation be plausibly explained as a Pauline revision of Gos. Thom. 17. We must also reckon with the possibility that a text from Paul was transformed at a secondary stage into a logion of Jesus.<sup>50</sup>

The results of analyses of other possible references (1 Cor 4:8 [Gos. Thom. 2]; 2 Cor 2:7 [Gos. Thom. 6 and 7]; Rom 2:29 [Gos. Thom. 53]) are comparable. When we bear in mind that the early dating of the

---

<sup>46</sup> This text is introduced by Paul as a quotation from scripture (καθὼς γέγραπται), but it cannot be identified in this form in the Old Testament (W. Schrage, Der erste Brief an die Korinther, Volume 1: 1Kor 1,1–6,11, EKK 7.1 (Zürich and Braunschweig: Benzinger/Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchner Verlag, 1991), 245. Possible references are mentioned by H. Hübner, Vetus Testamentum in Novo 2: Corpus Paulinum (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997), ad loc.: Is 64:4 LXX; 65:1–2; Sir 1:10. The thesis of a scriptural conglomeration, which Schrage adopts (op. cit., 245), is a serviceable explanation, as is the thesis that Paul refers to an independent sapiential statement with a provenance that remains to be clarified. For further parallels, cf. the commentaries and K. Berger, "Zur Diskussion über die Herkunft von I Kor. II. 9," NTS 24 (1977/78): 270–283. Berger defines the text as "a tradition of the apocalyptic school."

<sup>47</sup> Eng. trans.: Thomas O. Lambdin, in The Nag Hammadi Library in English, ed. James M. Robinson, (Leiden: Brill, 1977), 118–120.

<sup>48</sup> Paterson too ("Paul," 36–37) considers the influence of various logia of Jesus from the Gospel of Thomas on 1 Cor 2:9 as probable; cf. also H. Koester, "Ein Jesus und vier ursprüngliche Evangeliengattungen," in H. Koester and J. M. Robinson, Entwicklungslinien durch die Welt des frühen Christentums (Tübingen: Mohr—Siebeck, 1971), 147–190; cf. also idem, "Grundtypen und Kriterien frühchristlicher Glaubensbekenntnisse," ibid., 191–215, at 211 n. 47; idem, Gospels, 61; C. L. Mearns, "Early Eschatological Development in Paul: The Evidence of 1 Corinthians," JSNT 22 (1984): 19–35, at 31, n. 7.

<sup>49</sup> Tuckett, "Paul," 72.

<sup>50</sup> Cf. H.-J. Klauck, Apokryphe Evangelien. Eine Einführung (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 2002), 154.

Gospel of Thomas, of its potential sources, or of comparable texts is scarcely tenable, we must warn against too great confidence here. Nevertheless, the decisive point is that in our examination of the Pauline contribution to the question of the historical Jesus, an exclusive concentration on the synoptic tradition is not methodologically justified. But the above example shows that there is no cause for far-reaching expectations and speculations about the historical Jesus on the basis of a comparison between the letters of Paul and non-canonical literature.

To summarize, three points must be borne in mind in this complex situation.

- (a) Paul has access to Jesus tradition and employs this in the framework of rhetorical praxis in classical antiquity, above all in his ethical argumentation.
- (b) The evidence is not strong enough to allow us to infer the existence of fixed collections of logia which we could reconstruct.
- (c) With regard to our initial question about the historical Jesus, we must also note that not everything in Paul that can be identified as the transmission of words of the Lord is a demonstrable testimony to "authentic" Jesus tradition. We must bear in mind the creation and shaping of the Jesus tradition in the early Christian process of transmission and understanding.

Besides this, to focus our questions on a more or less clearly identifiable transmission of logia would be a fatal restriction of our inquiry (cf. the next chapter).

2.1.3. The Concentrated Reception of Jesus in Paul's Composition of his Letters

We must also study Paul as recipient of Jesus tradition, and thus as a contributor to the historical study of Jesus, under the aspect of the creative "abbreviation" of Jesus tradition. This is why exegesis must also take into consideration the narrative concentrate of the historical Jesus in Paul,<sup>51</sup> which could be called 'nominalized narrative contents'

---

<sup>51</sup> A. J. M. Wedderburn, "Paul and the Story of Jesus," in idem, ed., Paul, 161–189, points out that Paul is referring to a story about Jesus, and he describes the apostle's interpretative perspective as follows: "The story of Jesus which Paul knows is clearly a narrative of events, a 'story,' but it differs from being a story of the earthly Jesus in that it tells of a 'prehistory' in Jesus' existence before his human life on earth, and it

(“nominalisierte Erzählinhalte”)<sup>52</sup> or ‘narrative abbreviations’:<sup>53</sup> “wir sehen bei dieser Verschränkung von Erzählen und Erörtern etwas von der ursprünglichen gegenseitigen Angewiesenheit theologischen Argumentierens und Erzählens”.<sup>54</sup>

Eckart Reinmuth offers 1 Corinthians as an example:<sup>55</sup> “Paulus expliziert nicht eine abstrakte Christologie, sondern er interpretiert die Jesus-Christus-Geschichte in argumentierender Anwendung auf konkrete Problemlagen”.<sup>56</sup>

The reference in Gal 2:6 to the “law of Christ” can also be read in this light. It would then be an “ethical interpretation of the entire activity of Jesus.”<sup>57</sup> This is also how we should understand the role of the Kyrios as model for his community—a model which Paul mentions in 1 Thess 1:6 only after citing his own example. The activity of the apostle is analogous to the activity of the earthly Jesus, and he takes it for granted that the community knows both of these, thanks to their own immediate experience and thanks to the tradition.

---

also tells of what happened to him subsequently, after Jesus’ this-worldly life came to an end. It is also highly interpretative in character: not only does it repeatedly speak of God’s involvement in the experiences of Jesus... but it also gives Christ a role in creation comparable to that of the divine wisdom (1 Cor 8:6), and speaks of his experiences being redemptive (1 Cor 15:3; 2 Cor 8:9; Gal 4:5) and according to the scriptures (1 Cor 15:3–4)” (p. 163). In this way, the earthly life of Jesus is inserted into a larger hermeneutical framework (p. 188) in which the cross exercises the controlling function (p. 189). We should also note the idea that Paul writes both himself and his own fate into this story: p. 180.

<sup>52</sup> E. Reinmuth, “Erzählen und Begreifen: Ein Beitrag zum neutestamentlichen Verständnis eines theologischen Mißverständnisses,” in Die Gleichnisreden Jesu 1899–1999: Beiträge zum Dialog mit Adolf Jülicher, ed. U. Meil, BZNW 103 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1999), 237–256, at 242–243.

<sup>53</sup> On the term “narrative Abbraviatur”, cf. J. Straub, “Temporale Orientierung und narrative Kompetenz. Zeit- und erzähltheoretische Grundlagen einer Psychologie biographischer und historischer Sinnbildung,” in Geschichtsbewußtsein. Psychologische Grundlagen, Entwicklungskonzepte, empirische Befunde, ed. J. Rüsen, Beiträge zur Geschichtskultur 21 (Köln: Böhlau, 2001), 15–44, at 23.

<sup>54</sup> Reinmuth, “Erzählen,” 242. ET: “in this interweaving of narrative and discussion, we see something of the original mutual dependence of theological argumentation and narration.”

<sup>55</sup> E. Reinmuth, “Narratio und argumentatio—zur Auslegung der Jesus Christus-Geschichte im Ersten Korintherbrief: Ein Beitrag zur mimetischen Kompetenz des Paulus,” ZThK 92 (1995): 13–27, at 20–27.

<sup>56</sup> Reinmuth, “Narratio,” 26. ET: “Paul is not making explicit an abstract Christology. Rather, he is interpreting the history of Jesus Christ in an argumentative application to concrete problematic situations.”

<sup>57</sup> Schnelle, Paulus, 96–97.

On an even more fundamental level, Klaus Scholtissek asks whether Paul sees the earthly Jesus as belonging “konstitutiv in das von ihm verkündigte und weithin wirksam gewordene Christusbild” (constitutively to the picture of Christ which he has proclaimed and which has become effective to a large extent).<sup>58</sup> On the basis of his investigation of the double name “Jesus Christ” and of the passages which reflect aspects of the earthly Jesus, and of his observations about how Paul’s affirmations about the cross and resurrection and Pauline ethics are linked back to the earthly Jesus, Scholtissek concludes:<sup>59</sup>

Indem Paulus dezidiert den Gekreuzigten als den Auferstandenen verkündigt, hält er aufgrund seiner Christusapokalypsis mit der Urkirche an der Einheit des Auferstandenen mit dem Irdischen fest. So rückt der Irdische gerade aufgrund seiner Auferstehung neu und um so gewichtiger in den Blickpunkt.

Thanks to his previous work on the theory of history,<sup>60</sup> Udo Schnelle emphasizes new aspects. He sees the Pauline letters as permeated by narrative elements and references, so that the earthly Jesus plays a more central role for Paul.<sup>61</sup> These passages include the references to the cross, where Paul’s words about the humbling of Jesus allude to the narrative context of the passion: Phil 2:7–8 (cf. also 2 Cor 8:9 [although the idea of “poverty”—τῆ ἐκείνου πτωχείᾳ—may be oriented more strongly to manner of Jesus’ life and preaching]; 13:4; Gal 3:1; Rom 15:3; burial: 1 Cor 15:4; Rom 6:4).

Other texts allude to biographical and cultural aspects of the story of Jesus’ life: e.g., Gal 4:4–5 (born of a woman, a Jewish existence marked by the presence of the law; cf. also Rom 8:3; 9:5; 15:8), Rom 1:3 (birth, a human being, against the background of the ideas about <sup>58</sup> K. Scholtissek, “Geboren aus einer Frau, geboren unter das Gesetz’ (Gal 4,4): Die christologisch-soteriologische Bedeutung des irdischen Jesus bei Paulus,” in Paulinische Christologie: Exegetische Beiträge: Festschrift for H. Hübner, ed. U. Schnelle, T. Söding, and M. Labahn, (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2000), 194–219, at 197.

---

<sup>59</sup> Scholtissek, “Frau,” 217. ET: “When Paul resolutely proclaims the one who was crucified as the one who is risen, his revelation of Christ leads him to agree with the early church in maintaining firmly the unity of the risen Jesus with the crucified Jesus. This means that precisely because of his resurrection, the earthly Jesus becomes the focus of attention—anew, and in an even more weighty manner.”

<sup>60</sup> Schnelle, Paulus, 2–4.

<sup>61</sup> Schnelle, Paulus, 98.

David), and the brothers of Jesus (1 Cor 9:5; Gal 1:19).<sup>62</sup> In these texts, Paul is not whetting his readers' thirst for biographical information about Jesus. The abbreviated references sum up Paul's knowledge, and the knowledge he assumes in his addressees, in such a way that this is integrated by him into a Christological or theological set of coordinates. The condensation makes it possible to allude in such a way to the basic data (which are not set out in detail) that they can be integrated into the Pauline system of meaning. For example, Klaus Scholtissek has shown that Gal 4:4–5 takes up the ideas of the pre-existence, the incarnation, and the Jewish existence of Jesus in such a manner that the argumentation already paves the way “zur soteriologischen Aussage der Befreiung der ‘unter dem Gesetz’...Stehenden” (for the soteriological affirmation that those who stand ‘under the law’...are now set free).<sup>63</sup>

There can be no question that windows are opened here,<sup>64</sup> permitting us to glimpse the probable familiars of the Pauline communities with narrative Jesus tradition.<sup>65</sup>

These observations lead Schnelle to conclude as follows:<sup>66</sup>

Jesu Bedeutsamkeit erschließt sich nicht als Summe einzelner bedeutender Worte oder Handlungen, sondern allein von der durch Gott in Jesus Christus vollzogenen Geschichte, die Jesus Christus als den endzeitlichen und endgültigen Heilsbringer qualifiziert. Innerhalb dieser Jesus-Christus-Geschichte bilden der Irdische und der Auferweckte und damit die Person Jesu Christi eine Einheit, die sich nicht in die eine oder andere Richtung auflösen lässt.

---

<sup>62</sup> Further references, of varying value, are mentioned by Reinmuth, “Narratio,” 22–23.

<sup>63</sup> Scholtissek, “Frau,” 201.

<sup>64</sup> Dunn too (“Jesus Tradition in Paul,” 156–158) argues that we must assume that the Pauline missionary communities asked questions and possessed information about the hero of their faith. This knowledge went beyond the kerygmatic formulae. This aspect is also suggested by analogies from classical antiquity.

<sup>65</sup> Cf. Reinmuth, “Narratio,” 23.

<sup>66</sup> Schnelle, Paulus, 100. ET: “The significance of Jesus is disclosed, not as the sum total of individual significant words or actions, but only on the basis of the history which God carried out in Jesus Christ. It is this history that identifies Jesus Christ as the eschatological and definitive bringer of salvation. Within this history of Jesus Christ, the earthly Jesus and the risen Jesus—and hence the person of Jesus Christ—form a unity which cannot be dissolved in one or other direction.”

These reflections on the narrative abbreviation of the Jesus-story provide a broader basis, with a new hermeneutical justification, for the discussion of the topic "Jesus and Paul." On this basis, there is no justification for a rigorous denial (with the exception of the paradosis about the Lord's Supper) of traces of the narrative Jesus tradition in the Pauline letters. It must however be granted that Paul is not so much a witness to ancient Jesus traditions as a productive recipient who derives fundamental inspiration for the shaping of his theological thought from these traditions.

2.1.4. Results

One important aspect of these new evaluations is the reinforcement of the criterion of the plausible effect of Jesus. The self-understanding of the early Christian movement was rooted very deeply in the message and activity of the earthly Jesus, although the impulses given by the Easter experience to the transmission of the tradition must not be underestimated. In addition to a prominent reception of Jesus, Paul also offers genuine insights into the development of the Jesus tradition before the gospels were written down. Paul must have possessed basic information about the Kyrios Jesus, against whom he initially fought in the disciples of Jesus (Gal 1:13, 23; 1 Cor 15:9; Phil 3:6), but who ultimately overwhelmed Paul when he appeared to him (Gal 1:12).<sup>67</sup> As the evidence of individual transmission of elements from the Jesus tradition in the Pauline writings (with and without an explicit reference) shows, his theological thinking finds its orientation, not in a lack of interest in the earthly Jesus allegedly generated by Paul's theology of the cross, but in an explicit reflection on the earthly Jesus, a reflection appropriate to the needs of his community at that period. The evidence displays parallels both to canonical and (to a lesser degree) to non-canonical Jesus-texts. The integration of the reception of Jesus in the concentrated form of narrative abbreviations is impressive and tells us a great deal about Paul's thinking. This integration bears witness both to his reception of the tradition and to his profound understanding of it.

---

<sup>67</sup> On this basic assumption, cf. also Dunn, Theology, 185–189.

2.2. The Gospel of John

The evaluation of the Gospel of John for the question of the historical Jesus<sup>68</sup> is strongly influenced by the difference between the “fleshly” synoptic gospels and the “spiritual” Fourth Gospel which readers have noticed since ancient times.<sup>69</sup>

The birth of critical investigation of the life of Jesus made the differences in contents and subject matter a problem to be investigated by historians. The impulse for the critical study of this question came above all from the radical and provocative verdict of the Hamburg orientalist Hermann Samuel Reimarus (1694–1768) that it is ‘impossible to harmonize’ (“unmöglich zu harmonieren”) the differences among the canonical gospels.<sup>70</sup> As is well known, he drew the summary inference that all the gospels were historically unreliable.<sup>71</sup>

Although such unconditional judgments on the historical level were rare in the following period, the basic antithesis which had been detected between the synoptics and John was broadly accepted on a new level. With the prominent exception of Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768–1834),<sup>72</sup> the verdict about the historically probable picture of

---

<sup>68</sup> A history of research that leads into a very special thesis is provided by P. N. Anderson, Fourth Gospel and the Quest for Jesus: Modern Foundations Reconsidered, LNTS 321 (London: T&T Clarke, 2006), 1–3.

<sup>69</sup> Cf. the classic formulation by Clement of Alexandria apud Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.7: “Finally, knowing that the human nature had already been dealt with in the gospels, John wrote a spiritual Gospel—at the request of his pupils, and under the inspiration of the Spirit.”

<sup>70</sup> H. S. Reimarus, Apologie oder Schutzschrift für die vernünftigen Verehrer Gottes 2, ed. G. Alexander (Frankfurt a.M.: Insel Verlag, 1972), 582.

<sup>71</sup> On this, cf. the instructive essay by H. J. de Jonge, “The Loss of Faith in the Historicity of the Gospels: H. S. Reimarus (ca 1750) on John and the Synoptics,” in John and the Synoptics, ed. A. Denaux, BETL 101 (Leuven: Peeters, 1992), 409–421, at 414.

<sup>72</sup> D. F. Schleiermacher, Einleitung ins neue Testament, with a preface by F. Lücke, ed. G. Wolde; Friedrich Schleiermacher’s literarischer Nachlaß 3 = Friedrich Schleiermacher’s sämtliche Werke; Abt. 1: Zur Theologie, Vol. 8 (Berlin: Reimer, 1845), 315–316, 340. Schleiermacher pleads for the priority of the Fourth Gospel vis-à-vis the synoptics (op. cit., 219–221) and essentially bases his account of the life of Jesus on John (Das Leben Jesu [ed. K. A. Rügenik; Friedrich Schleiermacher’s literarischer Nachlaß 1 = Friedrich Schleiermacher’s sämtliche Werke; Abt. 1: Zur Theologie; Vol. 6] [Berlin: Reimer, 1864]), provoking A. Schweitzer’s draconic criticism in his Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung, 9th ed., UTB 1302 (Tübingen: Mohr—Siebeck, 1984), 101. However, Schleiermacher was in fact aware that the situation of our sources does not permit a connected presentation of the life of Jesus: op. cit., 44. To Schleiermacher’s contribution to New Testament exegesis and to Jesus research

Jesus has usually looked askance at the Johannine Jesus, arguing that it is from the synoptics (or their antecedent sources) that we can obtain information about the earthly Jesus—not from the Gospel of John, which was written at a later date and itself received the synoptic gospels. This is why Jesus research mostly did not draw on John as independent testimony.<sup>73</sup>

The autonomous character of the Johannine Jesus does not consist in a renunciation of the earthly reality of the Son of God who came to earth; nor does the idea of the incarnation make the Johannine Jesus some kind of mythical figure. In keeping with the basic decision taken by the prologue (John 1:1–18), which is intended to guide the reader of the work as a whole,<sup>74</sup> the pre-existence and the incarnation of Jesus mean that in his parresia<sup>75</sup> it is God, his Father, who himself becomes audible and visible to human beings.<sup>76</sup> Besides this, tendencies towards docetism in the Johannine circle are countered by an anti-docetic cantus firmus which emphasizes that an inalienable presupposition of the post-Easter perspective of the Gospel is the fact that the Jesus of history has come.<sup>77</sup> If we may exaggerate somewhat, we may say that the difference vis-à-vis the synoptics is that they portray the authority of the preacher as oriented to the proclamation of the basileia of God, thus offering an historically plausible picture of the activity of Jesus, whereas in the Fourth Gospel the authority is itself an independent cf. M. Labahn, "Schleiermacher, Friedrich", in Encyclopedia of the Historical Jesus, ed. C. A. Evans, 547–549.

---

<sup>73</sup> On this problem, see below, section 2.2.3.

<sup>74</sup> Cf. M. Labahn, "Jesus und die Autorität der Schrift im Johannesevangelium. Überlegungen zu einem spannungsreichen Verhältnis," in Israel und seine Heilstraditionen im Johannesevangelium: Festschrift for J. Beutler, ed. M. Labahn, K. Scholtissek, and A. Strotmann, (Paderborn: Schöningh, 2004), 185–206, at 191–193.

<sup>75</sup> Cf. M. Labahn, "Die παρρησία des Gottessohnes im Johannesevangelium. Theologische Hermeneutik und philosophisches Selbstverständnis," in Kontexte des Johannesevangeliums. Das vierte Evangelium in religions- und traditionsgeschichtlicher Perspektive, ed. J. Frey and U. Schnelle (with the cooperation of J. Schlegel), WUNT 175 (Tübingen: Mohr—Siebeck, 2004), 321–363; on the question of the divinity of Jesus in the Gospel of John, cf. U. Schnelle, "Trinitarisches Denken im Johannesevangelium," in Labahn, Scholtissek, and Strotmann, eds., Israel, 367–386.

<sup>76</sup> On this, cf. H. Hübner, "EN APXH ΕΓΩ ΕΙΜΙ," in Israel, ed. Labahn et al., 107–122.

<sup>77</sup> Here it suffices to refer to C. Hoegen-Rohls, Der nachösterliche Johannes. Die Abschiedsreden als hermeneutischer Schlüssel zum vierten Evangelium, WUNT 2.84 (Tübingen: Mohr—Siebeck, 1996).

theme. However, the distance between the Fourth Gospel and the earthly Jesus lies, not in the fact of reflection, but in the advanced stage of this reflection, behind which the sources, traditions, or theological “predecessors” can sometimes be discerned only as if through veils of mist.

2.2.1. Literary-diachronic Models

The application of source-criticism to the Gospel of John altered the verdict on the potential value of this Gospel for the quest of the historical Jesus. For example, Hans Hinrich Wendt attempted to uncover a more original picture of Jesus behind the Gospel of John. His construction, which is based on the discourses as mediated by the apostle and eyewitness John, claims to offer insight into the utterances of Jesus on the road to Jerusalem and in the city itself.<sup>78</sup>

The critical investigation of John did not follow this model, although it was certainly willing to admit the possibility of autonomous paths of transmission of the traditions lying behind the Johannine miracles,<sup>79</sup> the discourse material, or the passion narrative.<sup>80</sup> Recent Jesus research has taken a greater interest in these sources when it inquires into the figure and the teaching of the earthly Jesus.

Rudolf Bultmann argued that a source containing revelatory discourses lay behind the Gospel of John,<sup>81</sup> and modern variants of this hypothesis have taken on a considerable importance in the scholarly debate. In particular, Helmut Koester proposes that the Johannine discourses are composed on the basis of core logia. Comparison with gnostic dialogue gospels or the Gospel of Thomas can indicate autonomous paths of transmission and hence a relatively early date for these

---

<sup>78</sup> H. H. Wendt, Das Johannesevangelium. Eine Untersuchung seiner Entstehung und seines geschichtlichen Wertes (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1900); idem, Die Lehre Jesu (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2nd ed. 1901), 33–44; idem, Die Schichten im vierten Evangelium (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1911).

<sup>79</sup> On the sêmeia source, cf. G. van Belle, The Signs Source in the Fourth Gospel: Historical Survey and Critical Evaluation of the Semeia Hypothesis, BETL 116 (Leuven: Peeters, 1994).

<sup>80</sup> On the passion narrative, cf. M. Lang, Johannes und die Synoptiker. Eine redaktionsgeschichtliche Analyse von Joh 18–20 vor dem markinischen und lukanischen Hintergrund, FRLANT 182 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht 1999), 21–23.

<sup>81</sup> On this, cf. J. Frey, Die Johanneische Eschatologie 1: Ihre Probleme im Spiegel der Forschung seit Reimarus, WUNT 96 (Tübingen: Mohr—Siebeck, 1997), 125–127.

logia, which however were corrected by the fourth evangelist when he took them over.<sup>82</sup>

We need not deny that the fourth evangelist has recourse to tradition, but the Johannine traditions are not to be explained by looking for extensive written sources. Rather, we must assume that an autonomous history of transmission and of the construction of tradition and of meaning, with the reception and the new creation of material, took place in the group where the Johannine writings have their origin.<sup>83</sup> Our judgment about the provenance of the traditional material depends on how we evaluate the place of the Fourth Gospel in the history of early Christian literature, and its relationship to the synoptics. Besides this, the evangelist is an interpreter rather than a critic, a narrator rather than a collector, and a creator rather than a simple reporter of his tradition. The evangelist integrates into his construction of meaning both these materials and earlier theological tendencies and models with which he is familiar.<sup>84</sup>

Even where scholars succeed in plausibly demonstrating the existence of older traditions, the question remains: how far back do these constructions go in the direction of the historical events surrounding Jesus? Such traditions are themselves shaped through the meaning which is formed by the memory that receives them, and it is precisely this task that makes it possible to transmit them to others. Indeed, we may affirm that they acquire a value of their own only if it is possible to integrate them into the total movement of the academic task of constructing the portrait of the historical Jesus. Accordingly, the Johannine tradition represents one voice of the reception of Jesus to which we must pay attention.

---

<sup>82</sup> Koester, Gospels, 256–267; cf. especially idem, “Dialog- und Spruchüberlieferung in den gnostischen Texten von Nag Hammadi,” EvTh 39 (1979), 532–536 (ET: idem, “Dialogue and the Tradition of Sayings in the Gnostic Texts of Nag Hammadi,” in idem, From Jesus to the Gospels. Interpreting the New Testament in Its Context [Minneapolis, MN: Fortress press, 2007], 148–173); idem, “Gnostic Sayings and Controversy Traditions in John 8:12–59,” in Nag Hammadi Gnosticism and Early Christianity, ed. C. W. Hedrick and R. Hodgson Jr., (Peabody: Hendrickson, 1986), 97–110 (reprinted in idem, From Jesus to the Gospels, 184–195).

<sup>83</sup> Cf. e.g., M. Labahn, Jesus als Lebensspender. Untersuchungen zu einer Geschichte der johanneischen Tradition anhand ihrer Wundergeschichten, BZNW 98 (Berlin: W. de Gruyter, 1999), 21–30.

<sup>84</sup> Cf. U. Schnelle, “Theologie als kreative Sinnbildung: Johannes als Weiterbildung von Paulus und Markus,” in Johannesevangelium—Mitte oder Rand des Kanons. Neue Standortbestimmungen, ed. T. Söding, QD 203 (Freiburg i. Br.: Herder, 2003), 119–145.

2.2.2. Models of the “Chronological” or “Substantial” Priority of the Gospel of John Contemporary research into John is attempting to break new ground with regard to the contribution of this Gospel to the investigation and reconstruction of the activity and message of the earthly Jesus.

This was definitely the intention of John A. T. Robinson when he emphasized the priority of the Gospel of John. In keeping with his thesis about the dating of the New Testament writings,<sup>85</sup> his plea for the priority of the Fourth Gospel is primarily a plea that the historian should read John in the same way as Mark, since John’s account is substantially independent.<sup>86</sup> Klaus Berger has further elaborated this approach to the priority of John; where other scholars see a developed Christology and theology in the Fourth Gospel, Berger sees original traits.<sup>87</sup> Parallels between John and Q lead him to assume a direct contact between the two texts.<sup>88</sup> Another example of an attempt to ascribe priority to the Fourth Gospel and to its portrait of Jesus, and thus to give a new accentuation in Jesus research, is Paul Anderson’s thesis. He regards the Gospels of Mark and John as “bi-optic Gospels” and justifies this by literary-critical analyses. He postulates a first edition of the Gospel of John which was constructed around the Gospel of

<sup>85</sup> J. A. T. Robinson, Redating the New Testament (London: SCM Press, 1976).

<sup>86</sup> J. A. T. Robinson, Johannes—das Evangelium der Ursprünge, revised ed. by H.-J. Schulz, Bibelwissenschaftliche Monographie 4 (Wuppertal: Brockhaus, 1999).

<sup>87</sup> K. Berger, Im Anfang war Johannes. Datierung und Theologie des vierten Evangeliums (Stuttgart: Quell Verlag, 1997), 12: “Die Konsequenz ist, daß der johanneische Jesus weitaus ernster zu nehmen ist, als es bisher geschah. ‘Ernster’, das heißt: Was Jesus nach dem JohEv sagt und tut, ist nicht belanglos für das offene Mosaik, das allein wir noch zusammensetzen uns bemühen können... Was man bisher als johanneisch und spät zu mißachten gewöhnt ist, könnte sich weithin als historisch ernstzunehmende Variante früher christlicher Überlieferungen entpuppen. Im Klartext: Im JohEv haben wir viel, sehr viel zu lesen, das durchaus zu Jesus von Nazareth passen könnte.” (ET: “The consequence is that we must take the Johannine Jesus much more seriously than was usual in the past. All that we can do is to endeavor to assemble an open-ended mosaic; and the words ‘more seriously’ in the last sentence mean that what Jesus says and does in the Gospel of John is not irrelevant for this open mosaic... Many things that scholars have hitherto tended to look down on as Johannine and chronologically later may in fact turn out to be variants of early Christian traditions which the historian must take seriously. Let me make my point perfectly clear: in the Gospel of John, we find a great deal that could certainly ‘fit’ Jesus of Nazareth”). Cf. also idem, Jesus (Munich: Pattloch, 2004), 54 and passim; idem, “Das Evangelium nach Johannes und die Jesustradition,” in Das Johannevangelium, ed. T. Söding, 38–59.

<sup>88</sup> Berger, Anfang, 84–85.

Mark;<sup>89</sup> this edition offers an independent access to the Jesus tradition.<sup>90</sup> Albert Fuchs presents another variant of the early dating of John: he postulates that the Deutero-Mark who revised the Gospel of Mark made use of the Gospel of John.<sup>91</sup>

Different parallels between Luke and John lead Barbara Shellard<sup>92</sup> and Mark A. Matson to draw analogous conclusions. Matson claims that Luke read the Gospel of John under the influence of his reading of the Gospel of Mark.<sup>93</sup>

This critical questioning of the scholarly consensus deserves our consideration, but none of these examples offers convincing evidence, either methodologically or substantially, for this re-evaluation. With regard to these literary-critical analyses, it must be pointed out that the plausibility of any literary-historical reconstruction must be demonstrated convincingly by means of the text itself; but scholars become more and more skeptical about such hypothetical "basic texts" behind the Gospel of John.<sup>94</sup> One must also ask whether, and to what extent, these hypothetically reconstructed sources have any greater importance for research into the activity of Jesus; and it must be possible to

---

<sup>89</sup> P. N. Anderson, "John and Mark: The Bi-Optic Gospels," in Jesus in Johannine Tradition, ed. R. T. Fortna and T. Thatcher, (Louisville, KY: John Knox Press, 2001), 175–188, at 182, 186. On Anderson's theory cf. also idem, "Aspects of Interfluentiality Between John and the Synoptics. John 18–19 as a Case Study," in The Death of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel, ed. G. van Belle, BETL 200 (Leuven: Peeters, 2007), 711–728; idem, Fourth Gospel and the Quest for Jesus, 101–103.

<sup>90</sup> Anderson, "John and Mark," 185.

<sup>91</sup> A. Fuchs, "Das Verhältnis der synoptischen agreements zur johanneischen Tradition, untersucht anhand der messianischen Perikopen Mark 6,32–44 par Matt 14,13–21 par Luke 9,10–17; John 6,1–15," in Für und wider die Priorität des Johannesevangeliums. Symposium in Salzburg am 10. März 2000, ed. P. L. Hofrichter, Theologische Texte und Studien 9 (Hildesheim: Olms, 2002), 115–138, at 125–126.

<sup>92</sup> B. Shellard, "The Relationship of Luke and John: A Fresh Look at an Old Problem," JTS 46 (1995): 71–98; reprinted in Für und wider die Priorität des Johannesevangeliums, ed. Hofrichter, 255–280. Shellard has set out her theses in a monograph: New Light on Luke. Its Purpose, Sources and Literary Context, JSNT Supp 215 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002).

<sup>93</sup> M. A. Matson, "The Influence of John on Luke's Passion: Toward a Theory of Intergospel Dialogue," in Priorität, ed. Hofrichter, 183–194; idem, In Dialogue with Another Gospel? The Influence of the Fourth Gospel on the Passion Narrative of the Gospel of Luke, SBL DS 178 (Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2001). See also his reflections on the independence of the Johannine cleansing of the temple and on its literary placing in the Fourth Gospel: "The Temple Incident. An Integral Element in the Fourth Gospel's Narrative," in Jesus in Johannine Tradition, ed. Fortna and Thatcher, 145–153.

<sup>94</sup> Cf. e.g., U. Schnelle, "Recent Views of John's Gospel," Word & World 21 (2001): 352–359, at 353.

offer convincing proof of their early dating. If John is to be regarded as an historical alternative to the synoptics, one must explain why the latter invent Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God. If John is thought of as a complement or a parallel to the synoptics, we must take up anew the discussion of the historical reliability of the texts. Finally, the hypothesis that Luke made use of the Fourth Gospel is open to many questions, since the relevant textual basis is very slender, and the idea of a reception based on memory is less plausible than other models as a definition of the relationship between these two writings. Thus, both in terms of literary history and of its contents, the Gospel of John remains a late phenomenon in the early Christian production of literature.<sup>95</sup> This limits its importance as a textual source, though not as a phenomenon in the history of reception.

2.2.3. John and the Synoptics<sup>96</sup>

Another factor in the assessment of the material value of the Gospel of John for the quest of the historical Jesus is our evaluation of its relationship to the synoptics. Since he supports the thesis that the Fourth Gospel has a history of tradition which is independent of the synoptics, John P. Meier includes this text among the "major sources" of his investigation into Jesus.<sup>97</sup> In his reflections, however, Meier does not adequately treat this question of the relationship of John to the synoptics—a methodologically demanding question which remains open.<sup>98</sup>

---

<sup>95</sup> See T. Söding's discussion and explicit rejection of the scholarly proposals of substantial and chronological Johannine priority: "Johanneische Fragen. Einleitungswissenschaft—Traditionsgeschichte—Theologie," in Für und wider die Priorität des Johannesevangeliums, ed. Hofrichter, 213–219.

<sup>96</sup> Cf. M. Labahn and M. Lang, "Johannes und die Synoptiker. Positionen und Impulse seit 1990," in Kontexte, ed. Frey and Schnelle, 443–515; cf. also Smith, John Among the Gospels. The Relationship in Twentieth Century Research (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2nd ed. 2001), and J. Frey, "Das Vierte Evangelium auf dem Hintergrund der älteren Evangelientradition. Zum Problem: Johannes und die Synoptiker," in Johannesevangelium, ed. Söding, 60–118, at 61–63.

<sup>97</sup> J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew, vol. 1: The Roots of the Problem and the Person, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 44. Meier discusses this question on half a page, without any methodological reflection on how the singular Johannine hermeneutic of Jesus might serve an historical construction.

<sup>98</sup> Cf. the conclusion in the review of scholarship in Labahn and Lang, "Johannes," 498 (presentation: 495–498).

For a long time, critical exegesis assumed dependence on the synoptics.<sup>99</sup> It was above all Percival Gardner-Smith<sup>100</sup> and Charles Harold Dodd<sup>101</sup> who gave scholarship a new direction; independence became the dominant paradigm in Johannine scholarship. This re-evaluation meant that John potentially contained old and historically valuable Jesus tradition, but many scholars who accepted the independence of John from the synoptics failed to note this point.

Contemporary scholarship displays an openness and a methodological breadth. While some maintain dependence and others independence, a number of arguments indicate both a direct and an indirect reception of the synoptics in the Fourth Gospel and in its tradition, although one may not apply the literary-critical methodology used to study the synoptic question, when one investigates this recourse in John to pre-texts. The fact that, despite serious criticism,<sup>102</sup> the Gospel of John belongs to the genre of "gospel" is a significant indicator that its author knew one or more gospels.

In addition to the literary relationship, we must also investigate the question of the provenance of the Johannine tradition itself: does this offer independent traditions which may perhaps be early?

In the case of the Johannine miracle narratives, I myself have indicated that their provenance is varied. Here, besides older traditions (John 5:1–9a; 9:1–7) and later special traditions (John 2:1–11), we also find the phenomenon of secondary orality, i.e. the renewed oral narration of written synoptic materials.<sup>103</sup> This means that where we find in John's traditional material a closeness to the synoptic traditions which could either confirm or correct the image of Jesus which the first three gospels present, we must investigate whether these passages contain genuinely early elements of the Jesus tradition, or else should be evaluated as a secondary interpretation which shows us

<sup>99</sup> Cf. the account in Smith, John, 1–37.

<sup>100</sup> P. Gardner-Smith, Saint John and the Synoptic Gospels (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1938).

<sup>101</sup> C. H. Dodd, Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1963).

<sup>102</sup> Cf. especially J. Becker, "Das vierte Evangelium und die Frage nach seiner externen und internen Quellen," in Fair Play: Diversity and Conflicts in Early Christianity: Festschrift for H. Räisänen, ed. I. Dunderberg, C. Tuckett, and K. Syreeni, NTS 103 (Leiden: Brill, 2002), 203–241, at 207.

<sup>103</sup> Labahn, Lebensspender, 195–197 (John 4:46–54 presupposes Luke 7:1–10); idem, Offenbarung, 272–275 (John 6:1–21 presupposes Mark 6:30–52). Cf. the remarks in Becker, "Frage," 207.

something of the history of interpretation of synoptic texts. One such passage is the account of Jesus' baptizing activity (cf. 2.2.4).

To assume a reference by the Fourth Gospel and its tradition to the synoptics does not mean that no room remains for individual early historical traditions—for it is certainly not the case that the entire text (or its tradition) can be explained on the mere basis of its assumed relation to the synoptics. However, the affirmation in principle that a relationship exists limits the immediate value of the Johannine text for the work of historical construction.

2.2.4. The Preservation of Historically Plausible Individual Pieces of Information

With the definition of the Fourth Gospel as a late phenomenon in the history of the development of early Christian literature, and with the insight that both its tradition and the author himself probably already presuppose the synoptic gospels, we have described the methodological and substantial presuppositions which make it possible to inquire into the existence of old Jesus tradition, as well as the framework within which such an inquiry can hope to produce results. Dwight Moody Smith has formulated three criteria relevant to the methodological task, which complement the well known canon of criteria appropriate to the demands made by the Fourth Gospel on scholars:<sup>104</sup>

- (1) Affirmations in potentially historical texts in the Gospel of John must fit the picture of Jesus that can be deduced from the synoptic Gospels.<sup>105</sup>—This criterion needs interpretation. It must not be permitted to reduce the relevance of any new aspects that the Johannine tradition may have preserved. Rather, such aspects must prove their worth in a confrontation with the reconstruction that can be made on the basis of the synoptic gospels.
- (2) These affirmations must not support the Johannine Christology.
- (3) They must be plausible in the context of what we know about the historical Jesus.<sup>106</sup>

<sup>104</sup> D. M. Smith, "Historical Issues and the Problem of John and the Synoptics," in From Jesus to John. Essays on Jesus and New Testament Christology: Festschrift for M. de Jonge, ed. M. C. de Boer, JSNT Supp 84 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993), 252–267.

<sup>105</sup> See also J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered. Christianity in the Making. Volume I (Grand Rapids, MI/Cambridge: William B. Eerdmans, 2003), 167: "...the synoptic tradition provides something of a norm for the recognition of the oldest tradition".

<sup>106</sup> Smith, "Issues," 256.

The following examples show that the Fourth Gospel can certainly alter the picture of Jesus which is reconstructed on the basis of the synoptics. At the same time, they show that the Johannine permeation of the material in the Fourth Gospel makes it very difficult in practice to apply the second criterion (although it is methodologically correct).

The main significance of the Gospel of John for the construction of the earthly Jesus lies in questions of the chronology of Jesus' activity, the length of this activity and the dating of his death on the cross in the Passover chronology.

The structure of Jesus' journeys to the festivals in John is an expression of the author's desire to give his account a clear narrative shape.<sup>107</sup> Nevertheless, this structure poses a question mark against any portrait of short length of Jesus' activity which can be deduced uncritically from the structure which Mark's theology of the passion gives to his narrative. In the Johannine passion narrative, the reader notes not only parallels to the synoptics, but also a number of striking special traditions; the individual details of these traditions must be examined very precisely, to see whether they reflect specific historical knowledge.<sup>108</sup> The question of the Johannine dating of Jesus' crucifixion is particularly important.

According to the synoptic gospels, Jesus dies on Nisan 15 (Mark 15:34), after the meal which belongs to the Passover feast has been eaten. The Fourth Gospel offers a different reckoning: Jesus dies on Nisan 14 (John 19:14) at the same time as the slaughter of the Passover lambs. John 18:28 explicitly refers to the eating of these lambs, which has not yet occurred: no bone in Jesus' body is broken (this too differs from the synoptic accounts), since John interprets the failure to break Jesus' bones as the fulfillment of Old Testament passages concerning the Passover lamb (John 19:36; the quotation conflates Ps 33:21 LXX, Exod 12:10, and Num 9:12).<sup>109</sup> Since Jesus has already been given the title “lamb of God” at the beginning of the Gospel of John (1:29, 36), it is plausible to suggest that the chronology of the passion is due here to a theological structure imposed by the fourth evangelist.<sup>110</sup>

<sup>107</sup> On this, cf. e.g., M. J. J. Menken, "Die jüdischen Feste im Johannesevangelium," in Israel, ed. Labahn et al., 269–286.

<sup>108</sup> F. Millar, "Reflections on the Trial of Jesus," in A Tribute to Geza Vermes, ed. P. R. Davies, JSOT Supp 100 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1990), 355–381, esp. 364, ascribes a high level of detailed historical knowledge to the passion narrative of the Fourth Gospel, but both his approach and the extent of the historical knowledge which he identifies are questionable.

<sup>109</sup> Cf. Lang, Johannes, 248–249; M. J. J. Menken, "'Not a Bone of Him Shall be Broken' (John 19.36)," in idem, Old Testament Quotations in the Fourth Gospel. Studies in Textual Form, CBET 15 (Kampen: Pharos, 1996), 147–166.

When however we bear in mind that the reference to the Passover which is expressed in the chronology of the passion narrative cannot be combined unambiguously with the motif of the lamb, it is not surprising that some exegetes decide the question of historical plausibility in favor of the Johannine Christology.<sup>111</sup>

Several individual traditions prompt the question whether we encounter here the historical recollection of Jesus. This applies above all to the texts about John the Baptist, where the attempt has repeatedly been made to discern historical recollections in the divergences from the synoptics.

One such scholar is Francis J. Moloney, who investigates John 1:19–21 and 2:13–15 for traces of historical Jesus tradition and discovers information about the activity of the Baptist and about Jesus’ period as a disciple of John, about Jesus’ own baptist praxis, about the calling of his first disciples, and about the dating of the logion about the temple.<sup>112</sup> Stephen Hultgren, who freely combines the literary texts of all four gospels, argues differently: John 3:25–30 is a direct reference to Jesus’ activity during the lifetime of John the Baptist, and thereby expands the information given at Matt 11:2–11 par. Luke 7:18–28.<sup>113</sup> Jesus’ baptizing activity is explicitly mentioned in John 3:22.26 and 4:1, and Hultgren interprets this too as an historical recollection.<sup>114</sup> Whether one chooses to see tradition here depends on the evaluation of the correction in John 4:2. Even if one answers positively, however, this does not mean that Jesus’ baptizing activity must be considered as historical, since it is implausible not only with

---

<sup>110</sup> Cf. e.g., J. Herzer, “Synoptische oder johanneische Passionschronologie? Bemerkungen zu einer Tendenz der neueren Forschung,” in De Jérusalem à Rome: Festschrift J. Riaud, ed. L.-J. Bord and D. Hamidovic (Paris: Geuthner, 2000), 93–113.

<sup>111</sup> Cf. e.g., R. Riesner, Die Frühzeit des Apostels Paulus. Studien zur Chronologie, Missionsstrategie und Theologie, WUNT 71 (Tübingen: Mohr—Siebeck, 1994), 43–44.

<sup>112</sup> Cf. F. J. Moloney, “The Fourth Gospel and the Jesus of History,” NTS 46 (2000): 42–58.

<sup>113</sup> S. Hultgren, Narrative Elements in the Double Tradition. A Study of their Place within the Framework of the Gospel Narrative, BZNW 113 (Berlin: W. de Gruyter, 2002), 79–81.

<sup>114</sup> Hultgren, Elements, 84, 85.

regard to the picture of Jesus in the synoptics (criterion 1), but a fortiori in the total picture of Jesus' preaching (criterion 3).

In view of the strong Johannine imprint on the texts which speak of the Baptist, I see little potential for historical reconstructions.

In my study of the Johannine miracle stories, I have indicated the early date of the traditions concerning the miracle narratives in Jerusalem (John 5:1–9; 9:1–3).<sup>115</sup> These reflections suggest that John or his source knew about miracles that Jesus may have performed in Jerusalem—although the synoptics have nothing to say about this (in contradiction of criterion 1).

No matter how one may judge these examples, it is clear that while the total picture of the earthly Jesus need not be corrected by the inclusion of Johannine material about Jesus, it could be changed by means of interesting and not insignificant individual aspects drawn from John. Although one cannot overlook the special value of the Fourth Gospel as a recipient and interpreter of the Jesus event, it should be allowed to make its own contribution of the historical quest for Jesus.

2.2.5. Memorizing Jesus by Re-narrating the Past

The Gospel of John is, as Zumstein notes, “ein Paradebeispiel für diese Wiederaufnahme und Interpretationsarbeit” (special example for repetition and interpretation)<sup>116</sup> of the public memory of Jesus that, going beyond Zumstein, is an effect of Jesus' activity and preaching and therefore represents historical memories. Searching in early Christian texts for an understanding of Jesus' preaching and deeds is an expedition into re-narrated memories and re-told sayings. Embedded in memories, facts may have survived, and we can find these “facts” in new stories that no critical scholar may find historically reliable. However, scholarship dealing with the historical quest for Jesus must be open to different portraits and different kinds of re-narration of Jesus, who was memorialized by a Johannine community for whom Christ was the center of belief and who dealt with their current situation by recalling relevant tradition.

<sup>115</sup> Labahn, Lebensspender, 240–242, 340–341.

<sup>116</sup> J. Zumstein “Sünde in der Verkündigung des historischen Jesus und im Johannevangelium,” in idem, Kreative Erinnerung. Relecture und Auslegung im Johannevangelium, AThANT 84, 2nd. ed. (Zürich: Theologischer Verlag, 2004), 83–103 at 100.

Such insight may open the scholar's mind to reflections about Jesus' proclamation and deeds in John's Gospel. One might refer, for example, to Jesus' relationship to women, as reflected and re-narrated in John 4:4–42,<sup>117</sup> and to the love commandment (John 5:42; 8:41–42; 14:15), which not only refers to Deuteronomy 6:4–6<sup>118</sup> but also re-tells the story of God's love proclaimed by Jesus in his message of the Kingdom of God (cf. Matt 5:44; Mark 12:28–34).<sup>119</sup> Especially the new commandment of Jesus in John 13:34–35 and the footwashing episode in John 13:1–3 may be read as re-telling or re-narration of Jesus' ethical teaching.<sup>120</sup>

Overall, the search for an historical Jesus in the Fourth Gospel may, from time to time, give support to the synoptic picture while showing how the memory of Jesus remained alive and was re-narrated in later communities, who built up meaning for their present life based on their reliable experience with the memory of Jesus.

2.2.6. Summary

As D. Moody Smith correctly emphasizes, the fourth evangelist is a representative of the “quest for Jesus.” Like the historical Jesus research in every period, he is not “uninterested” in the earthly Jesus.<sup>121</sup> He undertakes a conscious hermeneutical reflection on the Jesus event, which looks back from the post-Easter perspective on the Jesus who was sent by the Father and then returned to him. The Fourth Gospel

<sup>117</sup> See H. Ritt, “Die Frau als Glaubensbotin. Zum Verständnis der Samaritanerin von Joh 4,1–42,” in Vom Urchristentum zu Jesus: Festschrift J. Gnllka, ed. H. Frankemölle, K. Kertelge, (Freiburg: Herder, 1989), 287–306.

<sup>118</sup> M. Labahn “Deuteronomy in John,” in Deuteronomy in the New Testament, ed. S. Moyise, M. J. J. Menken, LNTS 358 (London: T&T Clark/Continuum, 2007), 82–98, at 95–96.

<sup>119</sup> See U. Schnelle, “Johanneische Ethik,” in Eschatologie und Ethik im frühen Christentum: Festschrift Günther Haufe, ed. C. Böttrich, (Frankfurt: P. Lang, 2006), 309–327, at 316–322.

<sup>120</sup> For more treatment and John 21:15–19 as evidence that the adoption of sinners was an important part of Jesus' preaching of the kingdom of God, a historical theme that remained alive in public Christian memory and was ready to be re-narrated in the Johannine circle as well, cf. M. Labahn, “Peter's Rehabilitation (John 21:15–19) and the Adoption of Sinners: Remembering Jesus and Relecturing John,” in John, Jesus, and History, 2: Aspects of Historicity in the Gospel of John, ed. P. N. Anderson, F. Just, S. J. and T. Thatcher, SBL Symposium Series (Atlanta, GA: Society of Biblical Literature, 2009), 335–348.

<sup>121</sup> Cf. D. M. Smith, “John's Quest for Jesus,” in Neotestamentica et Philonica: Festschrift for P. Borgen, ed. D. E. Aune, T. Seland, and J. H. Ulrichsen, NTS 106 (Leiden: Brill, 2003), 233–253, at 233.

contains “die am stärksten aufgrund theologischer Prämissen stilisierte Jesusfigur” (“the figure of Jesus which is most highly stylized on the basis of theological premises”).<sup>122</sup> This means that we must take the Johannine construction very seriously, since it also supplies an important criterion for disproving alleged instances of historical authenticity in the Gospel of John, viz. the integration and anchoring of the words and deeds of Jesus in the perspective of the Johannine interpretation of Christ.

Nevertheless, the Johannine portrait too has its foundations in the earthly Jesus, and this fact has two consequences. First, the Gospel of John must be read as a story of the reception of Jesus; secondly, however, as such it is also an impact made by the earthly Jesus, and this impact opens a window for questions about the historical Jesus.<sup>123</sup> But a clear methodological orientation for which Smith has laid a helpful and thorough foundation is required, if such questions are to be pursued.

Despite individual pieces of historical information which must be taken seriously, and are located primarily outside the tradition of logia, the Fourth Gospel is not a major witness for the quest of the historical Jesus.<sup>124</sup> Rather, it is a noteworthy example of how meaning can be derived from the Jesus event in a new period where the external circumstances have changed. Thus, it is an exceptional representative of the narrative construction of meaning, which employs simple language and existential images to narrate a complex Christology which has remained controversial up to the present day.

2.3. Other New Testament Writings

2.3.1. The Acts of the Apostles<sup>125</sup>

There is no dispute in principle about the role which Jesus plays as the risen Kyrios in the second part of the Lukan double work. In the first part, the author gives evidence of his access to the Jesus tradition, presenting a large quantity of impressive special material of his own; and

<sup>122</sup> G. Theissen and A. Merz, Der historische Jesus. Ein Lehrbuch, 3rd ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2001), 51.

<sup>123</sup> Cf. also Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 167.

<sup>124</sup> See again Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 167, who calls the Fourth Gospel “a secondary source”.

<sup>125</sup> Bibliography: Koester, Ancient Christian Gospels, 63.

despite the different concept which governs his second part, it seems highly unlikely that he would completely refrain there from recourse to material concerning Jesus. Accordingly, it is unsurprising that scholars investigate the potential contribution which Acts too can make to the quest of the historical Jesus.<sup>126</sup>

Acts 20:35 (cf. 1 Clement 2.1) is well known in this context, and the problems connected with this text repay a close analysis:

μνημονεύειν τε τῶν λόγων τοῦ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ ὅτι αὐτὸς εἶπεν· μακάριόν ἐστιν μᾶλλον διδόναι ἢ λαμβάνειν.

“Remembering the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, ‘It is more blessed to give than to receive’.”

The Lukan Paul alludes here to the patrimony of the shared remembrance of the Kyrios (μνημονεύειν τῶν λόγων).

The Jesus tradition functions as a paradigm in Paul’s farewell discourse to the elders of Miletus. Paul employs the example of the blessing of those who give, in order to justify his exhortation to take care of the weak. The case for the authenticity of this beatitude is weakened by its substantial and verbal closeness to a Greek proverb:<sup>127</sup> Sir 4:31; Thucydides 2.97.4;<sup>128</sup> Plutarch, Caes. 16; Mor. 173D; Seneca, Ep. 81.17. Although literary dependence on the passage in Thucydides is a matter of dispute, the wide diffusion of this adage outside Christianity remains so striking that we can safely assume that it has been transferred in Acts to Jesus. Clearly, this proverbial expression was considered appropriate as a good summary of themes and material already found in the tradition about Jesus: and this is how the adage itself entered the Jesus tradition.

<sup>126</sup> Cf. e.g., C. K. Barrett, “Sayings of Jesus in the Acts of the Apostles,” in A cause de l’Évangile (Dupont Festschrift), 681–708; W. A. Strange, “The Jesus-Tradition in Acts,” NTS 46 (2000): 59–74; cf. also J. A. Trumbower, “The Historical Jesus and the Speech of Gamaliel (Acts 5.35–9),” NTS 39 (1993): 500–517.

<sup>127</sup> Cf. the evidence in J. J. Wettstein, Novum Testamentum graecum editionis receptae cum lectionibus variantibus codicum mss., editionum aliarum, versionum et patrum necnon commentario pleniore ex scriptoribus veteribus hebraeis, graecis et latinis historiam et vim verborum illustrante, Amsterdam: ex officina Dommeriania 1751/1752 ad loc.; cf. also E. Haenchen, Die Apostelgeschichte, 7th ed., KEK 2 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1977), 569–570 n. 5 and now M. Lang, Die Kunst des christlichen Lebens. Rezeptionsästhetische Studien zum lukanischen Paulusbild, ABG 29 (Leipzig: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 2008), 331.

<sup>128</sup> Cf. E. Plümacher, “Eine Thukydidesreminiszenz in der Apostelgeschichte (Acts 20,33–35—Thuk. II 97,3f.),” ZNW 83 (1992): 270–275; see also the reply by J. J. Kilgallen, “Acts 20:35 and Thucydides 2.97.4,” JBL 112 (1993): 312–314.

We may therefore draw the same conclusion for Acts that we have already drawn for John and for Paul. The identification of Jesus tradition—where this can successfully be done—does not give us a direct access to the historical Jesus, either in the sense of hermeneutical prolegomena or by enriching our knowledge of the history of traditions about Jesus. Acts does however tell us something about the way in which Jesus' preaching was understood and about its power to create meaning—a power which, as in this specific case, can take hold of a non-Christian tradition and integrate this into the message of Jesus.

2.3.2. 1 Peter<sup>129</sup>

1 Peter likewise plays a role as witness to the Jesus tradition. There are several notable parallels between this Letter and the Gospel of Matthew, although these are not explicitly introduced as words of the Lord:

1 Pet 3:4	Matt 5:10
1 Pet 4:13–14	Matt 5:11–12
1 Pet 2:12	Matt 5:16
1 Pet 3:9; cf. also 1:15–16	Matt 5:38–48

On the basis of possible parallel texts, and of thematic recourses which he postulates, Rainer Metzner concludes that a direct literary dependence exists between the two works.<sup>130</sup> In that case, 1 Peter would be a witness to a very early reception of the Gospel of Matthew, at the close of the first century.

Questions of the dating<sup>131</sup> and the place of composition of 1 Peter make it difficult to accept the hypothesis of literary dependence, and this is why the claim that the Letter draws on a Jesus tradition derived directly from the apostle Peter remains unconvincing. 1 Peter bears the traces of a social and historical situation which presupposes the Pauline mission and which we would expect to find only after the death of Peter himself.<sup>132</sup> Besides this, it breathes the spirit of late Pauline theology.<sup>133</sup>

<sup>129</sup> Bibliography: E. Best, "1 Peter and the Gospel Tradition," NTS 16 (1969/1970): 95–113; G. Maier, "Jesus Tradition im 1. Petrusbrief," in The Jesus Tradition Outside the Gospels, ed. D. Wenham, Gospel Perspectives 5 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1985), 85–128; R. Metzner, Die Rezeption des Matthäusevangeliums im 1. Petrusbrief. Studien zum traditionsgeschichtlichen und theologischen Einfluß des 1. Evangeliums auf den 1. Petrusbrief, WUNT 2.74 (Tübingen: Mohr—Siebeck, 1995).

<sup>130</sup> Metzner, Rezeption, passim.

<sup>131</sup> Dates proposed for 1 Peter vary from 65 to 100 CE. On the discussion, cf. the summary by U. Schnelle, Einleitung in das Neue Testament, 6th ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2007), 439–441. Schnelle himself argues for a date ca. 90 CE.

This means that in those passages where we find Jesus tradition, 1 Peter is a witness to the transmission and the presence of Jesus tradition, probably in communities in Asia Minor. We cannot however draw far-reaching conclusions about the addressees' knowledge of this tradition, although there is a striking concentration on material in the Matthean Sermon on the Mount. The texts make an interesting contribution to the history of tradition: it is highly significant that the reception of the Jesus tradition allows the logia to become affirmations by the author of the Letter himself, but without any explicit claim to the authority of Jesus (or of the Kyrios) such as we find in Paul.

2.3.3. The Letter of James<sup>134</sup>

The Letter of James is an important dialogue partner in our search for early traditions about Jesus.

---

<sup>132</sup> Cf. 1 Pet 4:16, which speaks of persecution for the sake of the nomen ipsum. We also have glimpses of a comprehensive threat to the communities which is caused by denunciations by the non-Christian populace: e.g., 1 Pet 2:12; 3:14; 4:4–6.

<sup>133</sup> Cf. e.g., A. Lindemann, Paulus im ältesten Christentum. Das Bild des Apostels und die Rezeption der paulinischen Theologie in der frühchristlichen Literatur bis Marcion, BHT 58 (Tübingen: Mohr—Siebeck, 1979), 252–261; cf. also J. Herzer, Petrus oder Paulus? Studien über das Verhältnis des ersten Petrusbriefes zur paulinischen Tradition, WUNT 103 (Tübingen: Mohr—Siebeck, 1998).

<sup>134</sup> Bibliography: R. Bauckham, James. Wisdom of James, Disciple of Jesus the Sage (London and New York: Routledge, 1999); D. B. Deppe, The Sayings of Jesus in the Epistle of James (Chelsea: Bookcrafters, 1989); F. Hahn and P. Müller, "Der Jakobusbrief," ThR 63 (1998): 1–73, at 54–57; P. J. Hartin, James and the Q-Sayings of Jesus, JSNT Supp 47 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1991); J. S. Kloppenborg, "The Reception of the Jesustradition in James," in The Catholic Epistles and the Tradition, ed. J. Schlosser, BETL 176 (Leuven: Peeters, 2004), 93–141; M. Konrad, "Der Jakobusbrief im frühchristlichen Kontext. Überlegungen zum traditionsgeschichtlichen Verhältnis des Jakobusbriefes zur Jesusüberlieferung, zur paulinischen Tradition und zum 1. Petrusbrief," in Catholic Epistles, ed. Schlosser, 171–212; W. Popkes, Adressaten, Situation und Form des Jakobusbriefes, SBS 125/126 (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1986), 156–176; idem, Der Brief des Jakobus, ThHK 14 (Leipzig: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 2001), 32–35; idem, "Traditionen und Traditionsbrüche im Jakobusbrief," in Catholic Epistles, ed. Schlosser, 143–170, at 155–159; M. H. Shepherd, "The Epistle of James and the Gospel of Matthew," JBL 75 (1956): 40–51; W. H. Wachob, The Voice of Jesus in the Social Rhetoric of James, SNTS MS 106 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000); idem and L. T. Johnson, "The Sayings of Jesus in the Letter of James," in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTTs 28.1 (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 431–450; cf. also R. Hoppe, Der theologische Hintergrund des Jakobusbriefes, FzB 26 (Würzburg: Echter, 1985), 119–145.

The evaluation of this Letter is made difficult by the question of its authenticity, which recent scholarship has once again affirmed.<sup>135</sup> This is significant for our verdict on the presence of Jesus tradition in the Letter of James and on its place in the history of early Christian theology and literature. If it was the work of the Brother of the Lord, this Letter would point to a relatively early phase of the Jesus tradition; it would show us a reflection of the work and the words of Jesus in an eyewitness—though here too, we would find reception, interpretation, and adaptation to a changed situation. It is however more probable that the Letter is pseudepigraphic. In this case, “der historisch-biographische Aspekt, d.h. die Relation des Verfassers zum irdischen Jesus... [kann] ausgeklammert werden” (the historical-biographical aspect, i.e. the relationship of the author to the earthly Jesus... can be dismissed),<sup>136</sup> and we would have here a later form of the Jesus tradition and of its reception.

Scholars disagree about the precise extent and the specific form of the Jesus traditions. The following overview by Wiard Popkes is therefore open to objections, but it is at any rate a serious presentation which can serve as a basis for further discussions:<sup>137</sup>

Jas 1:2	Matt 5:11–12a par. Luke 6:22–23a Q
Jas 1:4	Matt 5:48
Jas 1:5	Matt 7:7 par. Luke 11:9
Jas 1:6	Matt 21:21
Jas 1:17	Matt 7:11 par. Luke 11:13
Jas 1:19b–20	Matt 5:22a
Jas 1:22–25	Matt 7:24–26 par. Luke 6:47–49
Jas 2:5	Matt 5:3 par. Luke 6:20
Jas 2:8	Matt 12:31 par. Matt 22:39 par. Luke 10:27
Jas 2:13	Matt 5:7 par. Luke 6:36
Jas 3:12	Matt 7:16 par. Luke 6:44
Jas 3:18	Matt 5:9 par. Luke 6:43
Jas 4:2–3	Matt 7:7 par. Luke 11:9
Jas 4:4a	Matt 12:39a; 16:4a par. Mark 8:38
Jas 4:4	Matt 6:24 par. Luke 16:13
Jas 4:9	Luke 6:21.25b

<sup>135</sup> K. W. Niebuhr, “‘A New Perspective on James?’ Neuere Forschungen zum Jakobusbrief,” TLZ 129 (2004): 1019–1044. On the contemporary discussion, cf. also Schnelle, Einleitung, 422–426.

<sup>136</sup> Popkes, “Traditionen,” 155; on the problem of authorship, cf. now e.g., idem, Jakobus, 64–68.

<sup>137</sup> Popkes, Jakobus, 33, with reference to Deppe, Sayings, 237–238.

Jas 4:10	Matt 23:12 par. Luke 14:11; 18:14b
Jas 4:11–12	Matt 7:1–2a par. Luke 6:37
Jas 4:13–14	Matt 6:34 par. Luke 11: 16–21
Jas 5:1	Luke 6:24.25b
Jas 5:2	Matt 6:19–20 par. Luke 12:33b
Jas 5:9b	Mark 13:29b par. Matt 24:33b
Jas 5:10–11a	Matt 5:11.12b par. Luke 6:22.23b
Jas 5:12	Matt 5:33–37
Jas 5:17	Luke 4:25

The identification and the evaluation of distinct passages are problematic, because the traditions are not specifically marked as traditions of the logia of the Lord.<sup>138</sup> Besides this, the linguistic differences are often considerable, despite the agreement in contents.<sup>139</sup> Accordingly, even those exegetes who emphasize the close relationship to the tradition of the dominical logia also underline the receptive character. The reception “should not be understood in terms of allusion, but in terms of creative appropriation and re-expression.”<sup>140</sup>

The Letter of James should be considered a testimony to the transmission of the logia of Jesus at the end of the first century. A direct literary dependence on the Gospel of Matthew cannot be demonstrated. Its striking focus on traditions found in the Sermon on the Mount or on texts from Q<sup>141</sup> corresponds to the substantial interests of James, and tells us nothing about what kind of knowledge the author and his addressees possessed.<sup>142</sup> All three, James, the Sermon on the Mount and Q<sup>143</sup> are interested in a faith in Christ that leads to action, and in the <sup>138</sup> On this, cf. Popkes, Jakobus, 35. It is possible that the author of the Letter of James knows nothing of their provenance. The relative concentration of the material in this Letter is an argument against a general derivation from the “Vorrat des frühchristlichen Unterweisungsgutes” (treasury of early Christian catechetical material). It is possible that the author avoids attributing these words explicitly to Jesus because he intends to create a closeness to the tradition of the words of the Lord that will support the pseudepigraphical character of the text: after all, it would be perfectly natural for the Brother of the Lord to use the words and ideas of Jesus.

<sup>139</sup> Cf. e.g., Jas 1:19b–20, “Let every man be quick to hear, slow to speak, slow to anger, for the anger of man does not work the righteousness of God” (βραδὺς εἰς ὀργὴν ὀργὴ γὰρ ἀνδρὸς δικαιοσύνην θεοῦ οὐκ ἐργάζεται), and Matt 5:22a, “Everyone who is angry with his brother shall be liable to judgment” (πᾶς ὁ ὀργιζόμενος τῷ ἀδελφῷ αὐτοῦ ἔνοχος ἔσται τῇ κρίσει).

<sup>140</sup> Bauckham, James, 31.

<sup>141</sup> Hartim particularly emphasizes the closeness, in terms of the history of tradition, to the supposed oldest layer of Q: James, passim.

<sup>142</sup> Cf. also Popkes, “Traditionen,” 156.

<sup>143</sup> Cf. M. Labahn, “Das Reich Gottes und seine performativen Abbildungen. Gleichnisse, Parabeln und Bilder als Handlungsmodelle im Dokument Q,” in Hermeneutik

question of the appropriate interpretation of the law. The traditions are adapted to the view of the Letter. The author does not place himself under the authority of the tradition of the logia of Jesus, but integrates this into his own rhetoric as a language of his own.

Accordingly, the Letter of James is of interest for the history of the tradition of the logia of Jesus. As a productive transmitter and recipient, it provides information about the way in which the earthly Jesus was understood in the period at which it was written.

2.3.4. The Revelation of John<sup>144</sup>

The Revelation of John is another text with a role to play in the search for authentic words of Jesus; but the logia under discussion involve allusions rather than quotations, so that the material contribution is slight. Besides this, important questions are unresolved; the dating and the discussion of the literary unity of Revelation<sup>145</sup> suggest a variety of models with regard to the possibility that the synoptics are one source of the words which the exalted Kyrios speaks in Revelation.

The following texts deserve consideration:<sup>146</sup>

Rev 1:3; cf. also 22:7 (summons to wake up: Rev 2:7.11.17.29; 3:6.13.22; 13:9 <sup>147</sup>	Luke 11:28 Mark 4:9 parr. and frequently)
Rev 3:3; 16:15 Rev 3:5	Matt 24:43–44 Matt 10:32 par. Luke 12:28; Mark 9:28 par. Luke 9:26

Each piece of evidence requires a detailed discussion. Once a verdict has been reached, a further question remains: even if Revelation contains independent tradition, is this authentic material which goes back to Jesus, or a secondary formation of early Christian prophecy? At any

---

der Gleichnisse Jesu. Methodische Neuansätze zum Verstehen urchristlicher Parabeltexte, ed. R. Zimmermann, WUNT 231 (Tübingen: Mohr—Siebeck, 2008): 259–282.

<sup>144</sup> Bibliography: D. E. Aune, Revelation 1–5, WBC 52 (Dallas: Word Books, 1997), 264–265 (excursus: “The Sayings of Jesus in Revelation”); R. Bauckham, “Synoptic Parousia Parables and the Apocalypse,” NTS 23 (1977): 162–176; L. A. Vos, The Synoptic Traditions in the Apocalypse (Kampen: Kok, 1965).

<sup>145</sup> Cf. the summary in Schnelle, Einleitung in das Neue Testament, 551–552, 559–561.

<sup>146</sup> Cf. the list in Aune, Revelation, 265; for a detailed presentation and discussion, cf. Vos, The Synoptic Traditions in the Apocalypse, passim. He takes a different view of the number of texts which need to be considered.

<sup>147</sup> Cf. Breytenbach, “Vormarkinische Logientradition,” 739–740.

rate, it is clear that the author places on the lips of the exalted Lord words which scholars ascribe to the stream of tradition concerning the earthly Jesus. A new perspective of meaning is generated in the reception of material about the earthly Jesus, and this must be read as an example of the reception and acceptance of the earthly Jesus and of the history of the impact he made.

3. "Outsiders" Outside the New Testament<sup>148</sup>

It is indubitable that the transmission of the words and deeds of Jesus did not cease simply because they had taken on a literary form in the canonical gospel texts.<sup>149</sup> We may recall here the well known (and often quoted) testimony of Papias, bishop of Hierapolis:<sup>150</sup>

And if anyone chanced to come who had actually been a follower of the elders, I would enquire as to the discourses of the elders, what Andrew or Peter said, or what Philip, or what Thomas or James, or what John or Matthew or any other of the Lord's disciples; and the things which Aristion and John the elder, disciples of the Lord, say. For I supposed that things out of books did not profit me so much as the utterances of a voice which liveth and abideth (ὄσον τὰ παρὰ ζώσης φωνῆς καὶ μενούσης).

Papias assembled traditions of this kind in a five-volume work.<sup>151</sup> However, the surviving extracts from this lost opus are scarcely of such a character that we can have any great confidence in the quality and substance of the traditions about Jesus which he collected.

<sup>148</sup> On what follows, cf. also the bibliography with comments by C. A. Evans, Life of Jesus Research. An Annotated Bibliography, rev. ed., NTTTS 24 (Leiden: Brill, 1996), 256–300.

<sup>149</sup> Cf. e.g., H. Köster, Synoptische Überlieferung bei den apostolischen Vätern, TU 65 (Berlin: Akademie-Verlag, 1957).

<sup>150</sup> Papias, frag. 5.4 (apud Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39,4 = U. H. J. Körner, "Papiasfragmente," in Papiasfragmente, Hirt des Hermas, idem and M. Leutzsch, SUC 3 [Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1998], 55; ET: Eusebius, The Ecclesiastical History and the Martyrs of Palestine 1, trans. H. J. Lawlor and J. E. L. Oulton [London: SPCK, 1927], 99).

<sup>151</sup> On the Exegeses of Papias, cf. e.g., U. H. J. Körtner, Papias von Hierapolis. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des frühen Christentums, FRLANT 133 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1983), 25–27; W. R. Schoedel, "Papias," ANRW II 27.1 (1993): 235–270; P. Vielhauer, Geschichte der urchristlichen Literatur, GLB (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1975), 757–765.

When we consider the phenomenon of oral transmission at the end of the first and the beginning of the second century, we must assume not only the phenomenon of a switch from the medium of written texts to the renewed productive oral transmission (secondary orality),<sup>152</sup> but also the handing on of traditions which had not taken a written form; and such traditions may preserve very ancient impulses and recollections of the historical Jesus. It is certainly possible that such recollections may have found their literary expression in the non-canonical texts of early Christianity.

Since the analysis of the individual texts is difficult, there exists a profound disagreement about the precise value of extra-canonical sources for research into the historical Jesus. The dispute is generated by questions of dating, the evaluation of the possibility of identifying older sources by means of literary-critical examination, and the judgment about whether or not a particular text is independent of the canonical texts about Jesus—and this is often the truly decisive question. The hypothesis of literary dependence does not exclude altogether the possibility of discovering here ancient material that preserves a recollection of Jesus, but it does relativize the likelihood of doing so. Besides this, the increasing chronological distance from the activity of the earthly Jesus means that we must assume a more productive role on the part of the memory of those who hand on the traditions about him (although we certainly cannot simply equate chronological proximity with “historical objectivity”).

These observations are reinforced by the insight that distance in time is not the only factor which transforms tradition. The same is true of memory and orality, which have a fundamental responsibility for the preservation of what is remembered: selective and productive forces are at work in both of these. The cultural memory, like the individual’s memory, preserves that which concerns it directly and helps it in the construction of meaning. At the same time, however, there can exist a tradition which is so authoritative that it continues to be effective precisely in its awkwardness—though this too is often the object of interpretation and exegesis.

---

<sup>152</sup> On this phenomenon, cf. e.g., R. Uro, “Thomas and Oral Gospel Tradition,” in idem, Thomas at the Crossroads. Essays on the Gospel of Thomas (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1998), 8–32. S. Byrskog, Story as History—History as Story. The Gospel Traditions in the Context of Ancient Oral History, WUNT 123 (Tübingen: Mohr—Siebeck, 2000), speaks of “re-oralisation”; cf. idem, 138–144.

No serious historical approach to the historical Jesus can dispense with the investigation of the non-canonical texts—the dismissal of their value must be justified, just as much as the special emphasis on the value of these texts for a reconstructed picture of Jesus.

3.1. “Extra-canonical Sayings”—Agrapha<sup>153</sup>

According to the definition by Otfried Hofius, an “unwritten” word (plural: agrapha) of Jesus is “an affirmation ascribed to the earthly Jesus which is not transmitted in the oldest version of the four canonical gospels.”<sup>154</sup>

The Greek word ἄγραφον refers here not to the condition in which the logion has reached us—since this naturally takes place in the medium of writing—but to its relationship to the New Testament gospels, in which the logion is not found. This is why the English term “extra-canonical” seems more appropriate,<sup>155</sup> although it bypasses the specific question of logia of Jesus found in the New Testament but outside the gospels.

Agrapha may have their origin in the New Testament writings (including their textual tradition), the extra-canonical early Christian

---

<sup>153</sup> Collections of texts: A. Resch, Agrapha. Ausserkanonische Schriftfragmente, 2nd ed., TU.NF 15.3/4. Bd. (Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs'sche Buchhandlung, 1906); O. Hofius, “Versprengte Jesusworte,” in Neutestamentliche Apokryphen 1, ed. W. Schneemelcher, 76–79; E. Klostermann, ed., Apocrypha 3: Agrapha, Slavische Josephusstücke, Oxyrhynchos-Fragment 1911, KIT 11 (Bonn: A. Marcus and E. Weber, 2nd ed. 1911). Secondary literature: J. H. Charlesworth and C. A. Evans, “Jesus in the Agrapha and the Apocryphal Gospels,” in Historical Jesus, ed. Chilton and Evans, 483–491; K. Elliott, “Non-canonical Sayings of Jesus in Patristic Works and in the New Testament Manuscript Tradition,” in Philologia Sacra. Biblische und patristische Studien für Hermann J. Frede und Walter Thiele zu ihrem siebzigsten Geburtstag. 2: Apokryphen, Kirchenväter, Verschiedenes, ed. R. Gryson, Aus der Geschichte der lateinischen Bibel 24.2 (Freiburg i. Breisgau: Herder, 1993), 343–354; Hofius, “‘Unbekannte Herrenworte,’” passim; Klauck, Evangelien, 16–34; W. G. Morrice, Hidden Sayings of Jesus: Words Attributed to Jesus Outside the Four Gospels (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publishers, 1997); T. Nicklas, “Zur Problematik der so genannten ‘Agrapha’: eine Thesenreihe,” Revue Biblique 113 (2006): 78–93; W. D. Stroker, Extracanonial Sayings of Jesus, SBL RBS 18 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1989); idem, “Agrapha,” ABD 1 (1992): 92–95; P. Vielhauer, Geschichte der urchristlichen Literatur, GLB (Berlin: W. de Gruyter, 1975), 615–618; R. Zimmermann, “Parabeln unter den Agrapha. Einleitung,” in Compendium der Gleichnisse Jesu, ed. R. Zimmermann in collaboration with D. Dormeyer, G. Kern, A. Merz, C. Münch and E. E. Popkes (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 2007), 935–939.

<sup>154</sup> Hofius, “Unbekannte Jesusworte,” 355.

<sup>155</sup> Thus Klauck, Evangelien, 16.

writings about Jesus (including the papyrus fragments), the church fathers, and non-Christian writings (including the Jewish traditional writings or the Quran). Agrapha do not include any logia which are explicitly ascribed to the risen or exalted Kyrios, although one must always bear in mind that the title κύριος does not provide on its own a sufficient criterion for differentiation. The criterion of harmony with the synoptics should not be applied on a secondary level to the process of identification of these texts,<sup>156</sup> since this is to take one particular picture of Jesus and make this—without any historical discussion—the leading criterion of a collection which found its original orientation in a formal criterion. The question of historical plausibility has to be raised after collecting the texts in question, and hence after their definition. The unclarity of the definition is reduced when only isolated logia of Jesus are included among the agrapha; this means that we need not discuss here the transmission of logia from the extra-canonical texts about Jesus (including the fragments).<sup>157</sup>

In his monograph, originally published in 1889 and revised in 1906, Alfred Resch endeavored to present comprehensive proof,<sup>158</sup> but his work met with criticism.<sup>159</sup> On the basis of the principle that one should “diejenigen Agrapha zu ermitteln..., die inhaltlich und überlieferungsgeschichtlich den Jesusworten der synoptischen Texte an die Seite gestellt werden können” (discover those agrapha... which in terms of their content and of the history of tradition can be set alongside the words of Jesus in the synoptic texts).<sup>160</sup> Hofius produces a minimum list which is no less problematic:<sup>161</sup>

---

<sup>156</sup> This point is made clearly by Hofius, “Unbekannte Herrenworte,” 362–363. The exclusion from this list of the logia of Jesus which are embedded in a narrative corresponds to the definition which Vielhauer prefers (Geschichte, 616).

<sup>157</sup> Cf. Klauck, Evangelien, 17.

<sup>158</sup> Cf. the list in Resch, Agrapha, 23–25. Similarly, J. Jeremias, Unbekannte Jesusworte, 3rd ed., revised with the collaboration of O. Hofius (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 1963), 47–49, attempts to discern a broader stock of material, in the hope that he will be able to extend the collection of “authentic” logia of Jesus.

<sup>159</sup> Cf. e.g., W. Bauer, Das Leben Jesu im Zeitalter der neutestamentlichen Apokryphen (reprint, Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1967), 377–415.

<sup>160</sup> Hofius, “Versprengte Herrenworte,” 77. The criterion of the history of tradition aims to exclude dependence on canonical logia of Jesus, as well as erroneous transpositions to Jesus of texts from the Old Testament or of words of the apostles.

<sup>161</sup> Hofius, “Versprengte Herrenworte,” 78–79; for a detailed justification, cf. “Unbekannte Herrenworte,” 357–359.

Syriac Liber Graduum, Serm. 3.3; 15.4;
 Clement of Alexandria, Strom. 1.24.158;
 Ps.-Clementine Homilies 2.51.1; 3.50; 18.20.4;
 Luke 6:5 D;
Gos. Thom. 82; Origen, In Jerem. Hom. lat. 3.3; Didymus, In Psalm. 88.8;
 P. Oxy. 1224;
Gospel of the Hebrews, apud Jerome, In Ephes. 5.4.

The principal gain for the quest of the historical Jesus in the identification of agrapha is the recovery of a logion of Jesus, which thus widens our knowledge about his proclamation; thus, Luke 6:5 D tells us something very significant about Jesus' interpretation of the law.<sup>162</sup>

Where the context of the logia is secondary, we usually learn nothing about the paths of transmission. The identification is itself an object of constructive historical research, which makes use of the criteria of authenticity to assert the plausibility of the texts it studies in the light of the relevant picture of Jesus.<sup>163</sup> This however means that the agrapha will basically confirm or complement the already-existing construction—the methodology means that they cannot call this construction into question. It must be emphasized that this verdict assesses some kinds of text, e.g., the ascetic logia of Jesus, as implausible for the picture of the earthly Jesus.

3.2. Extra-canonical Gospels and Writings about Jesus

3.2.1. The Gospel of Thomas

Since its (re)discovery ca. 1945 in the Coptic library found at Nag Hammadi, the Gospel of Thomas has fascinated scholars. The relatedness and the autonomy of its portrait of Jesus, and its designation as "Gospel according to Thomas" (although this is found only in the postscript), have led many to draw on it in their analyses of the history of early Christian literature.<sup>164</sup>

<sup>162</sup> "On the same day, he [i.e., Jesus] saw a man working on the sabbath. Then he said to him: 'Man, if you know what you are doing, you are blessed; but if you do not know this, you are accursed and a transgressor of the law.'"

<sup>163</sup> Klauck rightly deplores the lack of a convincing methodology: Apokryphe Evangelien, 34.

<sup>164</sup> On the history of research, cf. F. T. Fallon and R. Cameron, "The Gospel of Thomas. A Forschungsbericht and Analysis," ANRW II 25.6 (1988): 4195–4251; cf. also C. M. Tuckett, "Das Thomasevangelium und die synoptischen Evangelien," BThZ 12 (1995): 186–200, at 188.

The discovery of this text allows us to understand the Greek fragments P. Oxy 1.654 and 655<sup>165</sup> (which do not come from one single document) as testimony to a Greek predecessor of the Coptic Gospel of Thomas, which is however not a direct translation made from the Greek manuscripts: the sequence of its text bears the traces of a far-reaching autonomous structuring.<sup>166</sup>

The literary character of the Gospel of Thomas represents an autonomous type of the Jesus tradition. Without a framework of narrative passages, it offers a sequence of logia of Jesus with a variety of forms. Scholars find the closest parallel to the Gospel of Thomas in the document Q. The comparison with Q has led to the conclusion that the literary character of Gos. Thom. points to a very ancient, unbiographical, and hence original form of the Jesus tradition.<sup>167</sup> However, unlike Gos. Thom., the document Q which is reconstructed from Matthew and Luke is not a "pure" logia source (cf. above all Q 4.1–13), and it has a basic rhetorical-argumentative structure.<sup>168</sup>

Helmut Köster suggests that the two texts go back to an older Wisdom Gospel, so that one could also draw on Gos. Thom. to help reconstruct the original wording of Q.<sup>169</sup> One must however pose the critical question whether the supposition of a priority of the logia tradition is so directly tenable, and whether the narrative recollection of Jesus represents only a secondary development in early Christianity,<sup>170</sup> since precisely the comparison with other texts from the Nag Hammadi library with textual forms orientated to words would suggest that the <sup>165</sup> On this, cf. H. Attridge, "The Greek Fragments," in B. Layton, ed., *Nag Hammadi Codex II,7: together with XIII,2**, Brit. Lib. Or. 4926(1) and P.Oxy. 1, 654, 655, 1: Gospel according to Thomas, Gospel according to Philip, Hypostasis of the Archons, NHS 20 (Leiden: Brill, 1989), 96–128.

<sup>166</sup> In addition to Fallon and Cameron, "The Gospel of Thomas," cf. the introductions to the Gospel of Thomas e.g., in Klauck, Evangelien, 144; M. Fieger, Das Thomasevangelium. Einleitung, Kommentar und Systematik, NTA NF 22 (Münster: Aschendorff, 1991), 5.

<sup>167</sup> Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 53.

<sup>168</sup> Cf. Tuckett, "Thomasevangelium," 193; R. A. Horsley in Whoever Hears You, Hears Me. Prophets, Performance and Tradition in Q, R. A. Horsley and J. A. Draper (Harrisburg: TPI, 1999), 85; Schröter, "Historizität," 181 with n. 48 (repr.: 122 with n. 48).

<sup>169</sup> Koester, Gospels, 95; idem, "Q and its Relatives," in Gospel Origins & Christian Beginnings: Festschrift J. M. Robinson, ed. J. E. Goehring and C. W. Hedrick, Forum Fascicles 1 (Sonoma, CA: Polebridge Press, 1990), 49–63, at 55–63.

<sup>170</sup> Thus e.g., B. H. McLean, "On the Gospel of Thomas and Q," in The Gospels Behind the Gospels. Current Studies on Q, ed. R. A. Piper, NT Supp 75 (Leiden: Brill, 1995), 321–345, at 343.

opposite is true.<sup>171</sup> It is however most probable that the transmission of words and the narrative construction of meaning existed alongside each other and were mutually permeable. Accordingly, we cannot pronounce any judgments about the literary and historical priority of one or other form of tradition.

The contents of Gos. Thom. sketch an autonomous picture of Jesus which bears esoteric traces, with Thomas as the guarantor of the tradition (in contradistinction to other representative figures in early Christian tradition; cf. Gos. Thom. 13), and it displays a lack of interest in eschatology.

According to the Gospel of Thomas, the kingdom of God is a present (Gos. Thom. 113) phenomenon linked to the human self, in which the “seeking” (Gos. Thom. 76; 92.1; 94; cf. also 107) and “finding” (Gos. Thom. 8; cf. also 76 and 109) which have become a specific goal, achieve their fulfillment. In the act of knowledge, which is born of prudence (cf. Gos. Thom. 28), the individual is united to all those who share knowledge (Gos. Thom. 3; cf. 20; 22; 27; 46). One must practice abstinence vis-à-vis the world (Gos. Thom. 21.6; 27; 63; on the understanding of the world, cf. Gos. Thom. 56).

These characteristics lead the reader to expect not only that the Gospel of Thomas may provide potential glimpses of the development of the Jesus tradition, but that—where the picture of Jesus which it offers is plausible—we may need to expand or even correct our whole picture of the earthly Jesus.

3.2.1.1. The Question of the Autonomy and the Chronological Priority of the Gospel of Thomas

One decisive problem in the evaluation of the Gospel of Thomas is the question of literary dependence on the synoptics.<sup>172</sup> Passages where we may perhaps have older textual forms in terms of the history of tradition<sup>173</sup> stand alongside other passages which compel us to assume a literary dependence.<sup>174</sup> Neither position has succeeded in marshalling a consensus. The following detailed points make global judgments difficult:

<sup>171</sup> This aspect is underlined by J. Schröter, “Jesus, der Menschensohn. Zum Ansatz der Christologie in Markus und Q,” in idem, Jesus und die Anfänge der Christologie, 140–179, at 151–152.

<sup>172</sup> An overview of scholarship is presented by S. J. Patterson, “Thomas and the Synoptic Tradition,” Foundations & Facets Forum 8.1–2 (1995): 45–98.

<sup>173</sup> These passages are adduced by those scholars who emphasize the independence of the Gospel of Thomas vis-à-vis the New Testament gospels: cf. e.g., Koester, Ancient Christian Gospels, 84–86; S. J. Patterson, The Gospel of Thomas and Jesus, Foundations and Facets. Reference Series (Sonoma, CA: Polebridge Press, 1993); J. D. Crossan, Four

- (1) the productivity of a recipient, which must also be assumed in the case of the compilation of the logia by the Gospel of Thomas;<sup>175</sup>
- (2) the differentiated verdicts of scholars on the priority and authenticity of the divergent sequences of the logia of Jesus;<sup>176</sup>
- (3) the phenomenon of secondary orality, which must be borne in mind as an element of transmission which could be responsible for coherence of as well as difference between written texts which might be sources for later texts as might be the case in the relation of, at least, some texts common to the synoptics and the Gospel of Thomas;<sup>177</sup> and
- (4) the Coptic language, which leaves the traces in a translated text that finally gets its own textual tradition.<sup>178</sup>

---

Other Gospels. Shadows on the Contours of Canon (Minneapolis: Winston Press, 1985); T. Zöckler, Jesu Lehren im Thomasevangelium, NHMS 47 (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 30–32, 253.

<sup>174</sup> The following scholars are among those who adduce these examples and infer the dependence of Gos. Thom.: W. Schrage, Das Verhältnis des Thomas-Evangeliums zur synoptischen Tradition und zu den koptischen Evangelienübersetzungen zugleich ein Beitrag zur gnostischen Synoptikerdeutung, BZNW 29 (Berlin: Töpelmann, 1964) (for critical observations on Schrage's methodology, cf. e.g., C. M. Tuckett, "Thomas and the Synoptics," NT 30 [1988]: 132–157, at 134–136); also Charlesworth and Evans, "Agrapha," 499–502; Fieger, Thomasevangelium, 6f. and passim; A. Lindemann, "Zur Gleichnis-Interpretation im Thomas-Evangelium," ZNW 71 (1980): 214–243; Tuckett, "Thomas," 156; idem, "Thomasevangelium," 197–198.

<sup>175</sup> Cf. e.g., the compilation of texts by series of "tag" words or by means of formal and thematic groups (e.g., Gos. Thom. 7–9; 63–64, etc.).

<sup>176</sup> Tuckett, "Thomasevangelium," 194–196, gives one example of this problem. His analysis of the beatitudes in the Gospel of Thomas shows the presence of secondary developments. The synoptic comparison and the analysis of Q allow us to discern three original beatitudes with a social core, which have been expanded in a secondary phase, perhaps on the redactional level, by means of the beatitude pronounced on those who are persecuted. The Gospel of Thomas presupposes these four beatitudes (Gos. Thom. 54; 68–69) and is not independent of the trajectory of the synoptic tradition in this textual area. When the three original beatitudes are placed at different places in the Gospel of Thomas, and that of the hungry is combined with the secondary logion about the persecuted (Gos. Thom. 68–69), this argues in favor of a secondary sequence.

<sup>177</sup> Cf. Uro, "Thomas," passim; Klauck, Evangelien, 161.

<sup>178</sup> Patterson, The Gospel of Thomas and Jesus, 92–93, sees this as the key to explaining the parallels to the New Testament gospels as a text-historical assimilation to the canonical texts; Tuckett expresses his justified criticism in "Thomasevangelium," 199.

On the basis of these observations, we cannot accept the dating of the Gospel of Thomas (or of its postulated strata) in the first century of the Common Era,<sup>179</sup> as envisaged by Helmut Köster,<sup>180</sup> Stephen L. Davies,<sup>181</sup> and John D. Crossan.<sup>182</sup>

In view of the complex state of the text, the evaluation in the context of the history of tradition does not justify global judgments, but requires us to justify our verdicts especially our historical re-constructions in the case of each individual text.<sup>183</sup>

3.2.1.2. The Gospel of Thomas—Older Forms of the Jesus Tradition, or a Distinct Picture of the Jesus Tradition?<sup>184</sup>

Some scholars have attempted by means of a form-historical deconstruction of the logia of the Gospel of Thomas to discern older material, or indeed the earliest (and therefore authentic) material.<sup>185</sup> Others

<sup>179</sup> For a detailed justification of this position, cf. J. Schröter, Erinnerung an Jesu Worte. Studien zur Rezeption der Logienüberlieferung in Markus, Q und Thomas WMANT 76 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1997), 137–138; C. M. Tuckett, “The Historical Jesus, Crossan, and Methodology,” in Text und Geschichte. Facetten theologischen Arbeitens aus dem Freundes- und Schülerkreis: Festschrift D. Lüthmann, ed. S. Maser and E. Schlarb, MTS 50 (Marburg: N. G. Elwert, 1999), 257–279, at 265; H.-M. Schenke, On the Compositional History of the Gospel of Thomas, Institute for Antiquity and Christianity, Occasional Papers 40 (Claremont: Institute for Antiquity and Christianity, 1998), 5: 140 CE.

<sup>180</sup> Koester, Gospels, 83–84.

<sup>181</sup> S. L. Davies, The Gospel of Thomas and Christian Wisdom (New York: Seabury Press, 1983).

<sup>182</sup> Crossan, Four Other Gospels; idem, Der historische Jesus (Munich: Beck, 1994), 563 n. 5.

<sup>183</sup> Cf. Tuckett, “Thomasevangelium,” 190; Klauck, Evangelien, 145. N. Perrin, “Recent Trends in Gospel of Thomas Research (1991–2006): Part I, The Historical Jesus and the Synoptic Gospels,” in CBR 5 (2007): 183–206, makes that methodological insight as characteristic for recent investigations into the question as whether Thomas depends on the synoptic gospels or not. In his critical discussion of the work of John P. Meier and John Dominic Crossan, D.E. Aune (“Assessing the Historical Value of the Apocryphal Jesus Tradition. A Critique of Conflicting Methodologies,” in Jesus, ed. Schröter and Brucker, 243–272) demonstrates that both approaches are based on a priori judgments. On the basis of his critical presentation, Aune rightly demands that we approach the Gospel of Thomas with as little prejudice as possible. The individual texts and their relationships require a nuanced evaluation. However, neither the Gospel of Thomas nor the apocryphal gospels should be completely excluded from the reconstruction of the message and the activity of the earthly Jesus.

<sup>184</sup> On current research: N. Perrin, “Recent Trends in Gospel of Thomas Research (1991–2006): Part I, The Historical Jesus and the Synoptic Gospels,” CURBS 5: 186–212.

<sup>185</sup> Cf. e.g., J. B. Bauer, “Echte Jesusworte?,” in Evangelien aus dem Nilsand, ed. W. C. van Unnik, (Frankfurt a.M.: H. Scheffler, 1960), 108–150, at 122–124; C. H. Hunzinger, “Unbekannte Gleichnisse Jesu aus dem Thomas-Evangelium,” in Judentum. Urchristentum. Kirche: Festschrift J. Jeremias, ed. W. Eltester, BZNW 26 (Berlin:

see the Gospel of Thomas primarily as an ancient and autonomous strand of the Jesus tradition, which as such may offer a valuable complement, and even corrections, to the synoptic portrait of Jesus.<sup>186</sup> Once again, we may take Crossan as our example. Denying the existence of apocalyptic elements,<sup>187</sup> he characterizes the original Jesus tradition as an “ethical eschatology” which was then altered in Q and in Thomas, each in its own way.<sup>188</sup> Jesus’ proclamation of the kingdom of God preached “the non violent resistance to structural evil.” Thomas Zöckler sees the aspect of “spirituality” (Innerlichkeit) as an element in the tradition of the Gospel of Thomas that could correct the picture of Jesus which has been elaborated on the basis of the synoptics;<sup>189</sup> this too is an attempt to set a question mark over against the fundamental eschatological or apocalyptic tone of Jesus’ preaching.

Stephen J. Patterson attempts to identify more precisely our access to primary Jesus tradition in the Gospel of Thomas.<sup>190</sup> It has also been claimed that the contribution of the Gospel of Thomas to the historical picture lies in its non-use of the messianic title and in its anchoring of Jesus in an original itinerant charismatic milieu.<sup>191</sup> This, however, means only that the document would provide new support to our knowledge of the earthly Jesus. It would not expand our knowledge by means of new, hitherto unknown information; it would merely confirm the fruits of the critical investigation of the synoptic gospels.

On the other hand, we also find material that does indeed fit the conception of the Gospel of Thomas, but is also in harmony with the didactic and the rhetoric of the Jesus texts which we know from Töpelmann, 1960), 209–220; idem, “Außersynoptisches Traditions-gut im Thomasevangelium,” ThLZ 85 (1960): 843–846.

---

<sup>186</sup> McLean, “Thomas and Q,” 345.

<sup>187</sup> For a presentation and critique, cf. Tuckett, “Crossan and Methodology,” 268–270. On the problem see also A. L. A. Hogeterp, “The Gospel of Thomas and the Historical Jesus: The Case of Eschatology,” in The Wisdom of Egypt. Jewish, Early Christian, and Gnostic Essays in Honour of Gerard P. Luttikhuisen, ed. A. Hilhorst and G. H. van Kooten, AJEC 59 (Leiden: Brill, 2005), 381–396.

<sup>188</sup> J. D. Crossan, Birth of Christianity. Discovering what Happened in the Years immediately after the Execution of Jesus, 1st HarperCollins paperback ed. (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1999), 273–274, 279–285 (quotation: 279). On the form taken by this “ethical eschatology,” cf. part vii: “Healers and itinerants.”

<sup>189</sup> Zöckler, Thomasevangelium, 255–256.

<sup>190</sup> Patterson, Thomas and Jesus; idem, “The Gospel of Thomas and the Historical Jesus. Retrospectus and Prospectus,” SBL SP 29 (1990): 614–636; for other comparable positions, cf. Fallon and Cameron, “Gospel of Thomas,” 4216.

<sup>191</sup> Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 55.

the synoptics. For example, the parables in Gos. Thom. 97<sup>192</sup> and 98<sup>193</sup> could complement the synoptic texts, and the idea that these texts represent original material going back to Jesus is certainly attractive.<sup>194</sup>

Recently, considerations drawn from the theory of history have led Jens Schröter to limit the value of the Gospel of Thomas. His reflections take their starting point in the realization of the narrative character of the historical construction of meaning:<sup>195</sup> “Darstellungen, die anderen Gattungen angehören, wie etwa das Gos. Thom. oder die Dialoge des Auferstandenen mit seinen Jünger/inne/n setzen dagegen die Bindung der Bedeutung Jesu an sein früheres irdisches Wirken dezidiert außer Kraft. . . Für eine historische Jesusdarstellung ist eine Schrift wie das Gos. Thom. somit deshalb als sekundär zu betrachten, weil es zum einen zeitlich nach den synoptischen Evangelien und dem JohEv anzusetzen ist, zum anderen nicht an einer Einzeichnung Jesu in seinen historischen, kulturellen und geographischen Kontext interessiert ist.”

There is surely no reason to reject out of hand the claim that the texts about Jesus discovered in Nag Hammadi preserve a creatively preserved memory of Jesus—and that this is true in a particular man-

---

<sup>192</sup> “Jesus said, ‘The Kingdom of the [Father] is like a certain woman who was carrying a jar full of meal. While she was walking [on] a road, still some distance from home, the handle of the jar broke and the meal emptied out behind her on the road. She did not realize it; she had noticed no accident. When she reached her house, she set the jar down and found it empty.’” Eng. trans. of Gos. Thom. 97 and 98 (n. 182 below) by Thomas O. Lambdin in James M. Robinson, ed., The Nag Hammadi Library in English (Leiden: Brill, 1977), 128.

<sup>193</sup> “Jesus said, ‘The Kingdom of the Father is like a certain man who wanted to kill a powerful man. In his own house he drew his sword and stuck it into the wall in order to find out whether his hand could carry through. Then he slew the powerful man’.”

<sup>194</sup> Cf. e.g., W. D. Stroker, “Extracanonical Parables and the Historical Jesus,” Semeia 44 (1985): 95–120, at 100–102; C. W. Hedrick, Parable as Poetic Fictions. The Creative Voice of Jesus (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson 1994), 239, 252–253. For a different view, cf. e.g., Lindemann, “Gleichnis-Interpretation,” 221–222, 232.

<sup>195</sup> J. Schröter, “Jesusdarstellungen als ‘Fiktion des Faktischen’. Bedingungen und Grenzen der historischen Jesuserzählung,” in idem, Jesus und die Anfänge der Christologie, 37–61, at 39–40. ET: “Accounts which belong to other genres, such as the Gospel of Thomas or the dialogues of the risen Jesus with his disciples, completely detach the significance of Jesus from the link to his earlier activity on earth. . . This means that a writing such as the Gospel of Thomas must be considered secondary with regard to an historical account of Jesus, both because it must be located chronologically after the synoptic gospels and the Gospel of John and because it is not interested in painting a portrait of Jesus which inserts him into his historical, cultural, and geographical context.”

ner of the Gospel of Thomas. Nevertheless, we must agree with Schröter that the literary orientation of these texts displays the mark of theological reflection more strongly than the synoptics, while they show fewer signs of preservation in the midst of its interpretation. One aspect of this is the failure of Thomas to locate Jesus in his historical context, and even those scholars who believe that Thomas is highly relevant to the historical construction of Jesus regard this as a lack of interest in the historical Jesus.<sup>196</sup>

3.2.1.3. Conclusion

The Gospel of Thomas offers no more direct and “unfalsified” access to the words and the thinking of the earthly Jesus than other sources.<sup>197</sup> The Gospel of Thomas too (like those who transmitted it) is an interpreter of the Jesus tradition and does not offer an impartial account of the earthly Jesus—as we can see from the clearly perceptible theological and anthropological tendencies of this writing.<sup>198</sup> A chronological proximity to the preaching and activity of Jesus can be plausibly argued only in the case of part of the material.

The strong orientation to logia displays little interest in the earthly Jesus—an interest which would find expression in the narrative character of what a text has to say about him. We do not find in Thomas the kind of brief summaries of Jesus’ activity that we find in Paul.

The evaluation of the theological character of Thomas in the context of the task of reconstructing the picture of Jesus is closely connected to this picture itself. For example, one who holds that the orientation in the preaching of the earthly Jesus was not eschatological will see the texts of the Gospel of Thomas as a significant corrective to layers of tradition in the synoptics, but one who finds the synoptic picture more plausible will apply the standard network of criteria of plausibility to draw a different conclusion.

It is best to prescind from global judgments about the authenticity of the contents of the Gospel of Thomas or about the early dating of the document as a whole and to follow the much more modest verdict of

<sup>196</sup> Köster, “Evangeliegattungen,” 172.

<sup>197</sup> The American “Jesus Seminar” very clearly takes the opposite position: cf. R.W. Funk and R. W. Hoover, The Five Gospels. The Search for Authentic Words of Jesus (New York: Macmillan, 1993).

<sup>198</sup> A different view is taken by J. H. Sieber, “The Gospel of Thomas and the New Testament,” in Gospel Origins, ed. Goehring and Hedrick, 64–73, at 65.

Hans-Josef Klauck: “Man überfordert das EvThom, wenn man es zu einem den Synoptikern ebenbürtigen oder gar überlegeneren Zeugen für die Jesusüberlieferung emporstilisiert. Erst von dieser Bürde, die es nicht tragen kann, befreit, gibt es den Reichtum an Inhalten und Einsichten preis, den es für uns durchaus bereithält.”<sup>199</sup>

This limitation is appropriate and allows us to hear more clearly the voice of the Gospel of Thomas and of its tradition.

3.2.2. “Others”<sup>200</sup>

In varying ways, the New Testament apocrypha have attracted the interest of scholars who investigate the historical Jesus. In addition to the Gospel of Thomas,<sup>201</sup> we should mention the Apocryphon of James (also known as the Letter of James, NHC I, 2), the Dialogue of the Savior (NHC III, 5),<sup>202</sup> the Gospel of Judas Iscariot, the Gospel of the Ebionites, the Gospel of the Egyptians, the Gospel of the Hebrews, the Gospel of the Nazareans, and the Gospel of Peter. We should also mention the Protevangelium of James as a representative of the infancy Gospels, although their legendary character suggests skepticism about

---

<sup>199</sup> Klauck, Evangelien, 162; Eng. trans. by Brian McNeil: Apocryphal Gospels (London and New York: T&T Clark, 2003), 122. ET: “More is expected of Gos. Thom. than the text can in fact provide, when it is claimed that its testimony to the tradition about Jesus is equal or even superior to that of the synoptics. If we free it from this intolerable burden, we ourselves are free to discover the wealth of insights which its logia offer us.”

<sup>200</sup> On the texts from Nag Hammadi, cf. M. Franzmann, Jesus in the Nag Hammadi Writings (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1996). She concludes that they have little to offer in the quest for the historical Jesus; on this point, cf. the detailed and critical review by J. Schröter, OLZ 93 (1998): 666–674. He judges the basic perspective from which Franzmann sees the historical Jesus to be “ultimately alien to these writings”, 673.

<sup>201</sup> Cf. the list in Evans, Jesus Research, 256; idem, “Gospels, Extra-New Testament,” in Encyclopedia of the Historical Jesus, ed. Evans, 261–265, at 261, and Theissen and Merz, Jesus, section 3.2–6.

<sup>202</sup> H. Koester and E. Pagels, “Introduction,” in Nag Hammadi Codex III,5: The Dialogue of the Savior, ed. S. Emmel, NHS 26 (Leiden: Brill, 1984), 1–17, and Koester, Gospels, 173–176, propose that the Dialogue has an older antecedent source which goes back to the period before the redaction of the synoptic gospels. This hypothesis has been gravely criticized by C. M. Tuckett, Nag Hammadi and the Gospel Tradition, Studies of the New Testament and its World (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1986), 129–135. He demonstrates a relationship between the Dialogue of the Savior and redactional formulations of the synoptics (cf. the verdict in Klauck, Evangelien, 239). Accordingly, we shall not consider the Dialogue of the Savior in the present section; cf. also the verdict by Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 168.

the hope of discovering significant early recollection of Jesus. We should also mention the Secret Gospel of Mark, P. Oxy 840, P. Oxy 1224, P. Oxy 1228, P. Egerton 2, the Fayyum fragment, and the Freer logion.<sup>203</sup> These texts come from different times and places, and their literary character is diverse. Here too, the relevance of these texts to the quest of the historical Jesus depends on the surviving sources or on problems of dating and dependence vis-à-vis the canonical gospels (especially the synoptics). Some scholars presuppose the existence of divergent streams of tradition in the extra-canonical and the canonical texts, and this means that various models have been proposed with regard to the value of the extra-canonical Jesus-texts for the historical study of Jesus. While some detect the influence of the synoptic gospels in the process of the composition of these literary texts, others assume the existence of an independent tradition, which is usually taken to be equally reliable—or even more credible.

The various models are dependent on the methodological presuppositions with regard to the identification of older or very ancient traditions which were initially passed on by word of mouth and later took on a written form. Those who evaluate the contingency of oral traditions differently, who make other literary-critical verdicts, or have different methodological presuppositions, will not be convinced by the hypothetical analysis of sources. The models also depend on the plausibility of the thesis of independence. We must also evaluate critically the presuppositions supplied by the theory of history for the positive assumption of the existence of better or more credible traditions. At the same time, we must examine critically a view which these approaches criticize, viz. the position that the synoptics offer an immediate picture of historical reality.

We shall now discuss briefly some selected extra-canonical writings from a variety of genres. We may expect these texts to expand our horizon in the quest of the historical Jesus, and we shall assess their value with regard to this question.

---

<sup>203</sup> On the last mentioned text, cf. e.g., J. Frey, "Zu Text und Sinn des Freer-Logion," ZNW 93 (2002): 13–34 (with bibliography).

– One much-discussed text is P. Egerton 2 (P. London. Christ. 1).<sup>204</sup> Its dating is a matter of dispute. It is very difficult to determine the relationships of dependence, and this question is important for the evaluation of the independence and the value of the tradition of P. Egerton 2, which has survived only in a fragmentary form. It is probable that the papyrus presupposes Johannine and synoptic texts, and combines these.<sup>205</sup> We should assume a reconversion of material which had already received a fixed written form into the oral medium, which in turn took on a written form in P. Egerton 2.

The sequence of “tag” words is a phenomenon which probably indicates that this text was received from memory.<sup>206</sup> We can recognize in those passages which are close to the synoptic text an advanced stage in the history of tradition, so that we may suppose that “die schon schriftlich fixierte, aber aus dem Gedächtnis reproduzierte Überlieferung in der mündlichen Weitergabe verändert” [wurde] (the tradition, which already had a fixed written form but was reproduced from memory, was altered in its oral transmission).<sup>207</sup> This means that

---

<sup>204</sup> Editio princeps: H. I. Bell and T. C. Skeat, Fragments of an Unknown Gospel and Other Early Christian Papyri, 2nd ed. (London: Oxford University Press, 1935), 8–15; the text, with the addition of a fragment discovered in Cologne: M. Gronewald, “Unbekanntes Evangelium oder Evangelienharmonie (Fragment aus Evangelium Egerton 2),” in idem et al., Kölner Papyri (P. Köln) 6, ARWAW. Sonderreihe Papyrologica Coloniensia 7 (Opladen: Westdeutscher Verlag, 1987), 136–145, at 139–141; cf. also D. Lührmann, “Das neue Fragment des P Egerton 2 (P Köln 255),” in Four Gospels, ed. van Segbroeck et al., 2239–2255, at 2242–2244. On the dating ca. 200, cf. Gronewald, “Unbekanntes Evangelium,” 137. On the status quaestionis, cf. now Lührmann, op. cit., passim; Klauck, Evangelien, 36–40 (both with further bibliography); T. Nicklas, “Papyrus Egerton 2—the ‘unknown gospel’ ” in Expository Times 118 (2007): 261–266. Eng. trans. J. K. Elliott, The Apocryphal New Testament (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1993), 39–40.

<sup>205</sup> For details, cf. Jeremias and Schneemelcher, “Papyrus Egerton 2,” 83 and 84–85 (nn. 5–21); cf. also F. Neiryneck, “Papyrus Egerton 2 and the Healing of the Leper,” in idem, Evangelica II, 773–783 (for older scholarship, cf. ibid., 774 n. 5); Lührmann, “P Egerton 2 (P Köln 255),” 2246. Recent scholars attempt to do justice to the differences vis-à-vis the synoptic texts by interpreting these as a “more original” side branch of that tradition which is attested in the synoptics: H. Koester, “Apocryphal and Canonical Gospels,” HTR 73 (1980): 105–130, at 119–123 (reprinted in idem, From Jesus to the Gospels, 3–23, at 14–17); K. Erlemann, “Papyrus Egerton 2: ‘Missing Link’ zwischen synoptischer und johanneischer Tradition,” NTS 42 (1996): 12–34, at 22 and 26. Cf. also the review of scholarship by Erlemann, op. cit., 12–14.

<sup>206</sup> Jeremias, Unbekannte Jesusworte, pp. 44; idem and Schneemelcher, “Papyrus Egerton 2,” 83.

<sup>207</sup> Vielhauer, Geschichte, 638.

it contains no independent information relevant to the quest for the historical Jesus.

– If one could accept the independence of the traditions contained in the Apocryphon of James, which was translated into Coptic from Greek and is transmitted only in a fragmentary form (NHC I, 2),<sup>208</sup> it might be considered as an important witness for the reconstruction of original logia of Jesus in the context of historical research.<sup>209</sup> However, the text as a whole, a gnostic dialogue gospel with a slender epistolary framework, clearly indicates a late period, since it presupposes the existence of written Gospels: cf. NHC I, 2, 7–9.<sup>210</sup>

Its value for historical research into Jesus and for the analysis of the development of early Christian literature depends on whether the Apocryphon of James contains older variants of the Jesus tradition. Here, our verdict must be cautious; each potentially relevant passage needs to be investigated on its own.

– In 1958, Morton Smith discovered in the Greek Orthodox monastery of Mar Saba a fragment of the Secret Gospel of Mark in a letter apparently written by Clement of Alexandria, and made this text a primary witness for his interpretation of Jesus.<sup>211</sup> When we look more closely at the material, we see that it contains no new information about the earthly Jesus; and this is the conclusion which must be

---

<sup>208</sup> R. Cameron, Sayings Tradition in the Apocryphon of James, 2nd ed., HTS 34 (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2004); Koester, Gospels, 200.

<sup>209</sup> Crossan, Jesus, 569.

<sup>210</sup> Cf. U.-K. Pliesch, Verborgene Worte Jesu—verworfenen Evangelien, Brennpunkt: Die Bibel (Berlin: Evangelische Haupt-Bibelgesellschaft, 2000), 63.

<sup>211</sup> M. Smith, Clement of Alexandria and a Secret Gospel of Mark (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1973), passim; idem, The Secret Gospel: The Discovery and Interpretation of the Secret Gospel According to Mark, foreword by E. Pagels, 3rd ed. (Middletown, CA: Dawn Horse Press, 2005). On the discussion of the authenticity and the character of the Secret Gospel of Mark, cf. H. Merkel, “Das ‘geheime Evangelium’ nach Markus,” in Neutestamentliche Apokryphen 1, ed. Schneemelcher, 89–92, at 90–91; S. Levin, “The Early History of Christianity, in Light of the ‘Secret Gospel’ of Mark,” ANRW II 25.6 (1988): 4272–4277; E. Rau, Das geheime Markusevangelium. Ein Schriftfund voller Rätsel (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 2003); S. G. Brown, Mark’s Other Gospel: Rethinking Morton Smith’s Controversial Discovery, Studies in Christianity and Judaism (Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 2005). On the circumstances of its discovery and the present state of research, cf. P. Foster, “Secret Mark: Its Discovery and the State of Research,” in Expository Times 117 (2005): 46–52; Klauck, Evangelien, 49–50. S. C. Carlson has recently declared it to be a modern forgery: The Gospel Hoax: Morton Smith’s Invention of Secret Mark (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2005).

maintained, despite the occasional affirmation of the authentic<sup>212</sup> and early<sup>213</sup> character of the Gospel text quoted there.

The Secret Gospel, in a passage (frag. 1) inserted between 10:34 and 10:35 of the canonical Gospel of Mark, tells us that Jesus raises a young man from the dead.<sup>214</sup> The contents of this story recall the account of the raising of Lazarus in John 11. A comparative analysis of the two resurrection stories suggests that they presuppose a shared older tradition,<sup>215</sup> the core of which consisted of a resurrection narrative; but it is no longer possible to determine exactly the form of this tradition.<sup>216</sup>

The raising is followed by a somewhat puzzling little scene which can be interpreted as a catechesis leading to baptism.<sup>217</sup> Smith infers—though he does not spell this out in detail—that Jesus engaged in homoerotic practices and conferred a magical baptism; this corresponds to his picture of Jesus as a magician and libertine.<sup>218</sup> However,

---

<sup>212</sup> Koester, Gospels, 293–294, 295. It has been claimed that the Secret Gospel of Mark, which also displays the literary techniques of the canonical Mark, was intended for educated Alexandrian readers: S. G. Brown, Mark's Other Gospel.

<sup>213</sup> There is no consensus about the dating of the document. Merkel, “Das ‘geheime Evangelium’,” 92, dates it to “not before the middle of the second century,” while Koester, Gospels, 295, writes: “the date of composition of Secret Mark should not be too far removed from the date for the writing of the Gospel of Mark.”

<sup>214</sup> Cf. e.g., H.-M. Schenke, “Er muß wachsen, ich aber muß abnehmen’. Der Konflikt zwischen Jesusjüngern und Taufgemeinde im Spiegel des Johannesevangeliums,” in Loyalitätskonflikte in der Religionsgeschichte: Festschrift for C. Colpe, ed. C. Elsas and H. G. Kippenberg, in collaboration with H. Cancik, B. Gladigow, and K. Rudolph (Würzburg: Königshausen & Neumann, 1990), 301–313, at 302–303; M. Smith, Clement of Alexandria and a Secret Gospel; Crossan, Four Other Gospels, 111–121; idem, Jesus, 434–439 (behind the Gospels of Mark and John lies the same miracle source, which ends with the raising of the young man; the original Gospel of Mark [= the Secret Gospel] expanded this with the initiation of the young man, while John expanded it with the dialogue about the resurrection).

<sup>215</sup> It is improbable—pace Crossan, Four Other Gospels; Koester, Gospels, 295–303; and M. W. Meyer, “The Youth in the Secret Gospel of Mark,” Semeia 49 (1990): 129–153—that the Secret Gospel of Mark offers an older version than the canonical Gospel of Mark, since it is exceedingly difficult to see why the canonical Mark should have omitted the story of the raising of the young man. For criticism, cf. e.g., F. Neiryck, “The Apocryphal Gospels and the Gospel of Mark,” in idem, Evangelica II, 715–772, at 762.

<sup>216</sup> Cf. the detailed discussion in Labahn, Lebensspender, 442–449.

<sup>217</sup> “And after six days Jesus told him what to do and in the evening the youth comes to him, wearing a linen cloth over his naked body. And he remained with him that night, for Jesus taught him the mystery of the kingdom of God” (Eng. trans. Morton Smith).

<sup>218</sup> M. Smith, Jesus the Magician, New York 1978. On this, cf. J.-A. Bühner, “Jesus und die antike Magie. Bemerkungen zu M. Smith, Jesus der Magier,” EvTh 43 (1983): 156–175; Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 276–277.

since the text is lost, it cannot be properly analyzed; and even so, Smith's conclusions are highly questionable.

The circumstances of discovery and the question of authenticity, as well as the problem of dating, make it very doubtful in principle whether this text has anything to contribute to the quest of the historical Jesus; the contents too suggest that no historical information will be found here.

– The Gospel of Peter, which may have been written in Syria, survives in a fifth- or sixth-century parchment codex, P. Cairo 10759 (so-called Akhmin Codex). It relates the events of the passion of Jesus from the perspective of Peter, who is the first-person narrator. A number of traits have led scholars to see this Gospel as a docetic interpretation of the passion.<sup>219</sup> The fragments P. Oxy LX 4009, which was identified as a part of the Gospel of Peter in 1993,<sup>220</sup> and is related to Mark 10:16, and P. Oxy XLI 2949<sup>221</sup> should be considered part of the text.<sup>222</sup>

Scholars disagree about the time of its composition and about the age and the character of its traditions. Crossan distinguishes three separate strata in the text and identifies the core of its tradition with the source of the New Testament passion narratives;<sup>223</sup> less radically, other scholars postulate the existence of independent tradition going back to an early date,<sup>224</sup> while others speak of a possible dependence on the New Testament passion narratives.<sup>225</sup> The points of contact are

<sup>219</sup> For a cautious judgment, cf. now Klauck, Evangelien, p. 118.

<sup>220</sup> D. Lührmann, "POx 4009: Ein neues Fragment des Petrus-evangeliums?," NT 35 (1993): 390–410.

<sup>221</sup> D. Lührmann, "POx 2929: EvPt 3–5 in einer Handschrift des 2./3. Jahrhunderts," ZNW 72 (1981): 216–226.

<sup>222</sup> Cf. D. Lührmann and E. Scharlb, eds., Fragmente apokryph gewordener Evangelien. In griechischer und lateinischer Sprache, MTS 59 (Marburg: Elwert, 2000). The basic edition is T. J. Kraus/T. Nicklas, eds., Das Petrus-evangelium und die Petrus-apokalypse. Die griechischen Fragmente mit deutscher und englischer Übersetzung, GCS NS 11: Neutestamentliche Apokryphen 1 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2004), 3–5. On the Gospel of Peter and its problems cf. now T. J. Kraus/T. Nicklas, eds., Das Evangelium nach Petrus: Text, Kontexte, Intertexte, TU 158 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2007).

<sup>223</sup> J. D. Crossan, The Cross That Spoke. The Origins of the Passion Narrative (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1988).

<sup>224</sup> For the basic tradition: H. Köster, Einführung in das Neue Testament, GLB (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1980), 599: "older... than the canonical Gospels."

<sup>225</sup> E.g., A. Kirk, "Examining Priorities: Another Look at the Gospel of Peter's Relationship to the New Testament Gospels," NTS 40 (1994): 572–595; R. E. Brown, "The Gospel of Peter and Canonical Gospel Priority," NTS 33 (1987): 321–343; idem, The Death of the Messiah. From Gethsemane to the Grave. A Commentary on the Passion best explained as a conflation of the canonical passion narratives which are present in the memory of the author, since this hypothesis can explain both the differences and the parallels to the canonical accounts, as well as the advanced character of the reflection which lies behind the author's presentation.<sup>226</sup>

This means that the value of the Gospel of Peter for the quest of the historical Jesus is at best marginal; but it gives us important information about how the last days of the earthly Jesus were understood and portrayed in the mid-second century in some Christian circle.

– The Gospel of Judas Iscariot is part of codex of Papyri, now known as Codex Tchacos, was published and translated under the guidance of Rodolphe Kasser in 2006<sup>227</sup> after being available on the antique market more than 25 years ago. Gospel of Judas Iscariot, introduced as a text that may provide new and uncommon insights on Jesus, is part of four different writings of Codex Tchacos. The text seems to be mentioned as early as Irenaeus wrote his Against Haeresis (Haer I.31.1). If he refers the text that we now know under the name the Gospel of Jude it must have been written in the second century. The four writings in Codex Tchacos however present a Coptic text that stems from the fourth century as the other manuscripts of Nag Hammadi and is a translation from original Greek.<sup>228</sup>

The Gospel of Judas Iscariot focusses on Jude and the revelation that he receives by Jesus. The early publication attempts to show that that Gospel text understands the traitor as a true friend of Jesus and the 'handing over'/'betrayal' as intentional supported by Jesus.<sup>229</sup>

---

Narratives in the Four Gospels, 2, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1994), 1317–1349, at 1325–1327.

<sup>226</sup> Cf. Klauck, Evangelien, 117–118; cf. also Brown, Death, 1334–1335; Charlesworth and Evans, "Agrapha," 505–514.

<sup>227</sup> R. Kasser, M. Meyer, G. Wurst, und B. D. Ehrman, The Gospel of Judas. The Manuscript with Interpretative Commentary (Washington, DC: National Geographic Books, 2006); followed by a critical edition: R. Kasser and G. Wurst, eds., The Gospel of Judas. Critical Edition: Together with the Letter of Peter to Philip, James, and a Book of Allogenes from Codex Tchacos (Washington, DC: National Geographic Society, 2007).

<sup>228</sup> Cf. K.-U. Plisch, "Das Evangelium des Judas," Zeitschrift für Antikes Christentum 10 (2006): 5–14. The maior edition of Codex Tchacos including the Gospel of Judas is J. Brankaer/H.-G. Bethge, eds., Codex Tchacos. Texte und Analysen, TU 161 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2007), 255–257.

<sup>229</sup> See B. D. Ehrman, The Lost Gospel of Judas Iscariot: A New Look at Betrayer and Betrayed (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2006).

The enthusiasm on the role that the newly edited text might find for the re-construction of Jesus of history's life by the early editor found quick and severe critique by other scholars.<sup>230</sup> It is not the place in this article to comment that part of the discussion nor do we have room to go into detail. If it is possible to draw any conclusion from the still ongoing debate right now that it is to read that text that maybe drawn on synoptic Gospel text (Matthew) as a witness of Gnostic movement<sup>231</sup> and its polemic against the main church, especially their conception of sacraments and offering. That means it is a witness of the early Christian history of conflicts<sup>232</sup> which helps to clarify their own theological thinking. We receive insights into the cosmological conception of the group responsible for that writing and we can see that Jude belongs to that cosmological model and is therefore not a mere positive figure although he received a special knowledge by Jesus.<sup>233</sup>

With regard to Jesus research it does not provide new insight into the events that lead to Jesus' death but it opens another windows how the memory of Jesus could be developed in different religious and Christological debates into new directions challenging other models of understanding.

– Let us conclude with a brief mention of the fragments of Jewish Christian Gospels: the Gospel of the Ebionites, the Gospel of the Hebrews, and the Gospel of the Nazaraeans.<sup>234</sup> These texts are important because they present the Jewish Christian types of interpretation

---

<sup>230</sup> Cf., e.g., J. M. Robinson, The Secrets of Judas. The Story of the Misunderstood Disciple and His Lost Gospel (New York, NY: HarperSanFrancisco, 2006); S. E. Porter and Gordon L. Heath, The Lost Gospel of Judas: Separating Fact from Fiction (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2007); A. D. DeConick, The Thirteenth Apostle: What the Gospel of Judas Really Says (London: Continuum, 2007).

<sup>231</sup> Cf. the clear statement by J. M. Robinson, The Secrets of Judas, 183: „Once it becomes available, one will find that it does not shed light on what happened during Jesus's trip to Jerusalem (...), but rather will shed light on a second-century Gnostic sect.”

<sup>232</sup> Cf. S. Gathercole, “The Gospel of Judas,” Expository Times 118 (2007): 209–215; see idem, The Gospel of Judas Rewriting Early Christianity (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2007).

<sup>233</sup> Although one may agree with W. Pratscher, “Judas, der wahre Freund Jesu: Das Judasevangelium,” Protokolle zur Bibel 16 (2007): 119–135, that our historical picture of Jude taken from the New Testament gospels deserves revision, we should be careful to take the Gospel of Judas as a starting point.

<sup>234</sup> Cf. Klauck, Evangelien, 53–76, with references to the current debate among scholars about the existence of a separate Gospel of the Nazaraeans. Cf. also the introductions and translations in Schneemelcher, ed., Neutestamentliche Apokryphen 1, 114–147; Lührmann and Schlarb, eds., Fragmente; Eng. trans. Elliott, Apocryphal New of the earthly Jesus, with independent pictures of Jesus which must be distinguished above all from the developing Großkirche and its texts. Although there is no reason to dispute the ancient character of some individual texts, their fragmentary condition in the form of quotations by patristic authors poses a serious methodological problem. This is why these texts seldom offer real help for individual questions of the history of the Jesus tradition, let alone for a reconstruction of this history as a whole.

3.2.3. Conclusion

It is a step into right direction, that in recent times, scholars have attempted to draw on the extra-canonical texts even in cases where one can hope only for a slight gain in knowledge. These texts are analyzed intensively in order to find answers to a whole spectrum of questions, ranging from the identification of individual traditions, via general affirmations about the earthly Jesus, to the entire orientation of his earthly life. I believe that Tuckett's verdict sums up most accurately the nuanced picture which I have presented in this survey of the status quaestionis: "der Wert der apokryphen Evangelien (besteht; Vf.) nicht nur darin..., daß sie Quellen möglicher echter Sprüche Jesu sind, sondern daß sie uns auch einen sehr wertvollen Einblick in Aspekte der Geschichte des Frühchristentums geben. Dieser Einblick ist meiner Meinung nach genauso bedeutend wie die Isolierung echter Jesustraditionen. Aber die Frage bleibt: Wie früh ist das Frühchristentum, das diese Texte beschreiben?... Oder gehören sie der Entwicklung nach zu den kanonischen Evangelien?... Aber sie bedeutet vielleicht, daß sie ein späteres Stadium der Kirchengeschichte beleuchten können und sollen." (The apocryphal gospels are valuable not only... because they are sources of potential logia of Jesus, but also because they give us a very valuable insight into aspects of the history of early Christianity. In my opinion, this insight is just as important as the identification of genuine traditions about Jesus. But the question remains: How early is the early Christianity that these texts describe?... Or do they belong in terms of their development to the canonical gospels?... But this may mean that they both can and should shed light on a later stage of church history.)<sup>235</sup>

---

Testament, 3–5. Cf. also A. F. J. Klijn, "Das Hebräer- und das Nazoräerevangelium, ANRW II 25.5 (1988): 3997–4033.

<sup>235</sup> Tuckett, "Thomasevangelium," 190.

We cannot exclude the possibility that memory of Jesus' teaching was preserved until the relatively late period of the second century, and that the different recollections can expand our knowledge of his words. But it is not easy to see how these materials, which derive from an autonomous interpretation of the teaching of Jesus, can fundamentally alter the picture which we derive from the synoptics. Some authors paint a picture of Jesus which is based on their broad reception of apocryphal texts, however, more doubt is at hand here.

The contribution of the apocryphal Jesus texts lies first of all in the insights which these texts give into the development and transmission of the Jesus tradition. This contribution is limited by the fact that we are as yet far from a consensus about literary dependence, developments in the history of Christian literature, and the dating of these texts. Decisive progress comes, not from the identification of individual Jesus traditions, but from the picture of Jesus which these texts (or their sources) offer. Here, we can observe how the texts influence the endeavors of the various scholars to reconstruct the history of Jesus—from the societal description of the proclamation of Jesus on the model of the wandering preacher akin to the Cynics, via the dismissal of futurist eschatology, to the new emphasis on the political dimension in Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God.

4. Methodological Questions

According to the thesis of Hedrick, the "tyranny of the synoptic Gospels" flourishes unabated in the classical methods and the list of criteria which are employed in historical research into Jesus. This tyranny assigns only a secondary role to the extra-canonical texts in the recovery of the historical picture of Jesus; their primary function is to expand the image of Jesus which is distilled from the synoptics, or to refine the details of this image.<sup>236</sup> Since Hedrick published his essay in 1988, we can point to a progress in the discussion of methodology, which is exemplified above all in the criteria of plausibility which Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter have proposed both for the historical Jewish background and for the early Christian reception of Jesus:<sup>237</sup> these criteria take account (in varying degrees) also of the texts discussed in this essay, and of their sources.

---

<sup>236</sup> Cf. e.g., K. Berger, "Zur Frage des traditionsgeschichtlichen Wertes apokrypher Gleichnisse," in Gleichnisse Jesu: Positionen der Auslegung von Adolf Jülicher bis zur Formgeschichte, ed. W. Harnisch, WdF 366 (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1982), 414–435, at 414.

The discussion of methodology is also conducted in a debate with the "outsider texts." Once again, John D. Crossan can serve as an example:<sup>238</sup> he attempts to provide support for his reconstruction of Jesus (which is largely based on extra-canonical texts) by means of preliminary methodological reflections<sup>239</sup> which allow him to identify a "database" of authentic logia of Jesus.<sup>240</sup> He attaches great weight to the combination of two criteria: the age of the text and its multiple attestation, giving the greatest authority to that information from the oldest layer which is attested by the largest number of independent witnesses.<sup>241</sup> He thus ascribes a decisive significance to the texts which he classifies as independent sources, e.g., the postulated layers of the Gospel of Thomas. Crossan then constructs, as his own conclusion, a Jesus who is an itinerant preacher on the model of the itinerant Cynic philosophers.

This example reminds us once again of the dispute about questions of dating, the evaluation of the literary-critical identification of older sources, and the assessment of dependence on the canonical Jesus-texts, which turns out again and again to be the sixty-four-thousand dollar question.

The supposition of literary dependence relativizes the possibility of discovering older forms of the tradition; but it is not a methodological instrument which would entitle us to eliminate entire documents from the historical-critical investigation of Jesus. Rather, relevant evidence in support of such a verdict must be demonstrated in the case of the individual passages. All literary criticism is necessarily subjective, and is usually guided by the endeavor of the exegetes to discover older material. This means that the outcome of their work (an older source) lies dangerously close to the very goal of their work (ancient material

---

<sup>237</sup> Cf. however the critical remarks by T. Holmén, "Doubts about Double Dissimilarity. Restructuring the Main Criterion of Jesus-of-History Research," in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. Chilton and Evans, 47–80.

<sup>238</sup> On Crossan's methodology, cf. the remarks in Aune, "Assessing the Historical Value of the Apocryphal Jesus Tradition," 258–269; Theissen and Winter, Kriterienfrage, 154; and Tuckett, "Historical Jesus."

<sup>239</sup> Crossan, Jesus, 27–35.

<sup>240</sup> Ibid., 569–584.

<sup>241</sup> Ibid., 32–33.

about Jesus). This makes it necessary to give a meticulous justification of every detail of a literary-critical verdict. On the other hand, one should not exaggerate the significance of such verdicts, since the fact that a text is dated early does not automatically mean that its material is authentic. The equation of “early” with “authentic” would be a methodological fallacy—as on the other side, the equation of “late” with “inauthentic”. At the same time, however, as the chronological distance from the activity of the earthly Jesus increases, we must assume that the memory of those who hand it on takes on a more productive character. This development is sometimes accompanied by an increasing lack of interest in the historical setting; or else a Christological, post-Easter reflection plays an ever more dominant role.

This is why we must work hard to clarify the introductory questions with regard above all to the apocryphal Jesus-texts. These are the subject of vigorous controversy, and they are rightly considered to be important. It is also necessary to explain the methodological criteria used to elaborate the picture of Jesus which each scholar presents, setting out these criteria exactly and indicating the role they play in academic research. Naturally, new interpretations, or those which diverge from the scholarly consensus, have a higher burden of proof. This is not to be disqualified as “tyranny”; it is in keeping with the normal praxis of academic discourse.

Methodologically speaking, we should be guided by the insight that all Jesus traditions are receptions, and hence individual interpretations, of an event that lies in the past (cf. Section 1 above). Although there is a consensus that chronological proximity does not guarantee that the subject of a text will be close to Jesus (and still less that it is authentic), the historical investigation of Jesus remains obliged to analyze the extent to which the sources have a primary significance in chronological terms, and whether they are substantially, theologically, and hermeneutically interested in transmitting an account of Jesus’ preaching and activity.

5. Final Conclusion

Every conclusion is a construction of history; this is not the same thing as an historical objectivism. Accordingly, the sources are to be regarded as constructions of meaning in the face of the extraordinary activity of the earthly Jesus. These constructions of meaning are antecedent to the historical questions of the exegete, and thus form the basis of his endeavor to construct meaning in the face of today's methodological, theological, philosophical, and cultural conditions.

I would like to draw two boundaries as core points for the role of the so-called "outsiders" in the quest of the historical Jesus.

First, the contribution of the classical outsiders of Jesus research, from Paul via John to the extra-canonical gospel texts (and above all the Gospel of Thomas), must be taken seriously, both on the level of the theory of history and methodologically, in the quest of the historical Jesus. These writings may not be dismissed en bloc. Rather, this question must be decided by an analysis of the individual writings and a fortiori of the individual passages. They offer a challenge to existing pictures of Jesus in scholarship, and present impulses for new theoretical constructions and for expansions and potential revisions in the sphere of methodology. At the same time, they also contribute substantial material aspects to the re-construction of the existing picture of Jesus.

Secondly, however, one must ask whether recent scholarship does not overestimate the role of these outsiders. The appropriate alternative to the postulated "tyranny of the synoptic Gospels" is surely not the tyranny of the former "outsiders" which have now become insiders.<sup>242</sup>

The threefold character of the synoptic pictures of Jesus itself demands the acknowledgment of plurality as the theologically appropriate form of the memory of Jesus. At the same time, however, this plurality lays down the boundary conditions for the elaboration of historically plausible and substantially appropriate affirmations about the historical Jesus. This must not be misunderstood to mean that the synoptics with their pictures of Jesus possess greater plausibility because of their canonical status. Their plausibility is due to the fact that they "die frühesten narrativen Verarbeitungen des Wirkens und Geschicks Jesu darstellen und zugleich einen historisch bewahrenden Charakter besitzen" (possess the earliest narrative elaborations of the working and the story of Jesus, and at the same time preserve history).<sup>243</sup> In this process, it is obvious that we must listen to John, the narrator of the story of Jesus, as well as to the extra-canonical stories of Jesus—just as it is obvious that we must listen to the voices of Paul and of the other canonical and extra-canonical receptions of Jesus.

<sup>242</sup> This is correctly emphasized by Broer, "Bedeutung," 27.

<sup>243</sup> Schröter, "Historizität," 164 n. 5 (repr.: 106 n. 4).

JESUS TRADITION IN THE GOSPEL OF JOHN

D. MOODY SMITH

1. Introduction

For the purposes of this article, Jesus tradition refers to material or data that may stem from Jesus of Nazareth or from the period and places of his activity and death. Without claiming comprehensiveness, we intend to give an indication of its maximal extent in John. At the outset, two matters related to the existence and character of such tradition should be noted: first, the Gospel's apparent claim to be written by or based upon the testimony of an eyewitness (21:24; cf. 19:35); second, its relation to, and differences from, the synoptic gospels.

Both the eyewitness claim and the authorship claim demand further scrutiny. What is said at the conclusion of the Gospel (21:24) is only that the one who is testifying and his testimony are true. But this statement in the narrative context (21:20) clearly implies an eyewitness claim (cf. 19:35). At best, the claim of 21:24 does not necessarily mean that the Gospel was itself written by the disciple whom Jesus loved (21:20). He is designated as the one who "testifies to these things and has written them," or "caused them to be written" (cf. 19:1 NRSV for an analogous translation: emastigōsen is properly translated "had [him] flogged"). With either translation the truth claim should be taken seriously, although not at face value.<sup>1</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> See Andrew T. Lincoln, "The Beloved Disciple as Eyewitness and the Fourth Gospel as Witness," JSNT 35 (2002): 3–26. Lincoln has been a colleague in the SBL Consultation, "John, Jesus, and History," presided over by Tom Thatcher, who with Robert T. Fortna has edited a volume of seminal essays, Jesus in Johannine Tradition (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 2001). To these and other participants I am indebted for their stimulation and criticism. My thanks also to Professors Ed P. Sanders and J. Louis Martyn, who read and commented helpfully on an earlier version of this essay, as well as to Dr. Kavin Rowe, who read it meticulously at several stages. They have saved me from embarrassing errors. Needless to say, I am responsible for its final form, as well as for the translation of most of the New Testament quotations.

John's differences from the synoptic gospels are far-reaching, but like them John purports to narrate the career of Jesus in early first-century Palestine. In fact, the name Iesous occurs much more frequently in John (237 times) than in any of the others (Matthew 150; Mark 81; Luke 89). The issue and its implications for the historical value of John can be put simply. If John is totally dependent on the synoptics for its knowledge of Jesus, then the question of Jesus tradition in John is already answered. Presumably there would be none, for wherever John departs from the synoptics, it would depart from history. This resolution of the matter is not basically different from the position that dominated criticism until Percival Gardner-Smith proposed that John was written independently of the synoptics.<sup>2</sup> In that case, every difference from the synoptics becomes a case to be decided on its own merits. Independence opens a range of possibilities, but no individual case proves historicity in general. Our procedure will be to give precedence to the question of Jesus tradition in John, without deciding in advance the question of John and other gospels. Yet the question of Jesus tradition in John will often hinge upon cases in which the Fourth Gospel differs from the synoptics.

Where John differs widely from the synoptics gospels, such differences have tended to speak against John's historical reliability and value:

1. John's narrative of Jesus' ministry differs widely in sheer content. Simply put, most of what is found in John does not appear in the synoptic gospels, and vice versa. Only John's Passion Narrative offers an extended parallel to the synoptics.
2. John differs in chronology and topography. Whereas in the synoptics Jesus' ministry appears to span a year or less, and he is in Jerusalem only once, to attend the final Passover feast, in John it lasts between two and three years, as three different Passovers are mentioned. In John he is frequently in Jerusalem (or Judea), attending Tabernacles (7:2) and Hanukkah (10:22), as well as more than one Passover. Thus Jesus' ministry is of significantly longer duration and seems centered in Jerusalem and Judea rather than in Galilee as in the synoptics.

---

<sup>2</sup> Percival Gardner-Smith, Saint John and the Synoptic Gospels (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1938).

3. John's account of Jesus' miracles is also significantly different from that of the synoptics. Matthew and Luke for the most part take up the miracle stories of Mark and also categorize Jesus' deeds as dynamis, "mighty works" or "deeds of power." On the other hand, John calls them semeia, "signs." They signify who Jesus is, and are often discussed at some length. Moreover, John's miracle stories are to all appearances not about the same events as Mark's or the synoptics', except for the Feeding of the Five Thousand (John 6:1–15), the only miracle recounted in all four gospels. At the same time, there are many fewer miracles in John than in the synoptics, and no demon exorcisms or leper cleansings. How are such differences to be accounted for?
4. Finally, the Gospel of John's presentation of Jesus' own message is radically different from what is found in the synoptics. He speaks and argues with opponents about himself, his status, and role. The "I am" sayings (e.g., John 6:35, "I am the bread of life") are typical of the Fourth Gospel. There is little that is comparable in the others, where Jesus proclaims not himself, but God's kingdom or rule. He teaches about many specific subjects (for example, purity, giving alms, prayer, and the expression of piety), often using parables, of which the Fourth Gospel is virtually bereft.

Probably Jesus' self-proclamation is the chief factor in John's having been largely set aside in modern Jesus research, the quest of the historical Jesus. Albert Schweitzer credits Strauss with the demonstration that John's Gospel is not a historical source to be placed on the same level as the synoptics.<sup>3</sup> John's presentation, he had argued, is dominated by later church Christology, as is most clearly evident in the discourses of Jesus. Strauss's view was to prevail, against liberal as well as conservative theologians.<sup>4</sup> The Johannine portrait of Jesus as God striding about the earth is not the product of Jesus' own self-consciousness but of the evangelist's theology.<sup>5</sup> Strauss's devaluation of John as a historical source has had a lasting effect, and is reflected in books as diverse as those of Crossan and Sanders,<sup>6</sup> as well as in works by authors with a more explicitly theological interest in the study of the historical Jesus.<sup>7</sup> N. T. Wright's statement is representative of the latter. He says of his own work that it is "largely based on the synoptic gospels" and that "the debate to which I wish to contribute in this book has been conducted almost entirely in terms of the synoptic tradition."<sup>8</sup>

---

<sup>3</sup> Albert Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus: First Complete Edition. Translated by W. Montgomery, J. R. Coates, Susan Cupett, and John Bowden from the 2nd ed. of the German, Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung [Tübingen: Mohr, 1913] (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2001), 80–83.

<sup>4</sup> Schweitzer, Quest, 59–64, on Friedrich Schleiermacher; also Schleiermacher, The Christian Faith, ed. H. R. Macintosh and J. S. Stewart (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1928), 85, 474, where John 10:30 is taken to be an authentic statement of Jesus.

Yet at least two recent investigations of the historical Jesus diverge significantly from this consensus: Paula Fredriksen, Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews, and John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew.<sup>9</sup> Similarly, John played a prominent role in Raymond E. Brown's The Death of the Messiah (1994), which deals only with the Passion Narratives.<sup>10</sup> There have also been efforts to address historical Jesus questions from the Johannine side. The most noteworthy of these is C. H. Dodd's Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel (1963), a work not likely soon to be superseded.<sup>11</sup> Nevertheless, the view that the Johannine Jesus is the Christ of the church's faith, while the Jesus of the several synoptic

---

<sup>5</sup> Ernst Käsemann, The Testament of Jesus: A Study of the Gospel of John in the Light of Chapter 17, trans. Gerhard Krodel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1968), 9 n. 6, in which he attributes the imagery to F. C. Baur.

<sup>6</sup> John Dominic Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (New York: HarperSanFrancisco, 1991); E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); idem, The Historical Figure of Jesus (London: Penguin, 1993).

<sup>7</sup> N.T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, Christian Origins and the Question of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996); Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide, trans. John Bowden (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998); James D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered, vol. 1 of Christianity in the Making, (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003).

<sup>8</sup> Wright, Jesus, xvi.

<sup>9</sup> Paula Fredriksen, Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews: A Jewish Life and the Emergence of Christianity (New York: Knopf, 2000); John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, vols. 1–4 (New York: Doubleday, 1991–2009).

<sup>10</sup> Raymond E. Brown, The Death of the Messiah: From Gethsemane to the Grave, 2 vols. (New York: Doubleday, 1994).

<sup>11</sup> C. H. Dodd's work Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1963) appeared more than forty years ago. It was followed by John A. T. Robinson, The Priority of John (London: SCM, 1985), and Craig L. Blomberg, The Historical Reliability of John's Gospel: Issues and Commentary (Downer's Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2001). Blomberg begins by citing Maurice Casey's rejection of the historical value of John in Is John's Gospel True? (London: Routledge, 1996) and continues with the Jesus Seminar's similar negative position (17–18). He disputes gospels and their strands of tradition represents much more accurately the historical Jesus, continued to prevail.

The Johannine Christological terms and concepts, which likely arose in bitter sectarian conflict, in time became common coinage among Christians who did not understand their origin, and played a fundamental role in the development of the great creedal formulations of the fourth and fifth centuries.<sup>12</sup> But the controversies as represented in the Gospel are also those of a later, post-resurrection, time. Certainly Jesus engaged in controversy. Yet Jesus' own controversies with opponents did not center on Christology as that set of doctrines developed in the post-resurrection church. That the two levels of controversy were integrally related is, however, a premise upon which the Gospel is based, as has been eloquently argued by J. Louis Martyn, History and Theology in the Fourth Gospel.<sup>13</sup> Martyn is, however, concerned with the controversies and conflict of a Johannine community that looks to a Jesus present to his disciples through the Spirit (Paraclete) rather than the einmalig level of the historical figure of Jesus.

What then may be historical Jesus tradition in John, and how may one make a determination? Elements or items in John deserve consideration as possibly historical that: (1) without reproducing the synoptics accord with the picture of Jesus found in them; (2) do not advance the distinctively Johannine Christology; and (3) are historically plausible in the time, place, and setting of Jesus' ministry.<sup>14</sup> Not all these general criteria need come into play at any one point. Any treatment of the subject divides itself naturally into four parts: the Johannine narrative versus the Markan; the Passion Narrative; sayings tradition in John; and John's purportedly factual information. Perhaps not surprisingly, the narrative and related issues loom largest.

---

such negative findings in almost every case. There have been, of course, other studies dealing with historical issues in John.

<sup>12</sup> See D. Moody Smith, The Theology of the Gospel of John, New Testament Theology (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995), 173–182, esp. 174–176.

<sup>13</sup> J. Louis Martyn, History and Theology in the Fourth Gospel, 3rd ed. (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 2003).

<sup>14</sup> D. Moody Smith, John among the Gospels, 2nd ed. (Columbia SC: University of South Carolina Press, 2001), 203. Cf. on criteria Meier, Marginal Jew, 1:167–195.

2. The Johannine Narrative Versus the Markan

2.1. Itinerary and Chronology

Justified skepticism about the historicity of the Johannine portrait of Jesus has affected historical judgments about other aspects of the Gospel. The acceptance of the priority of Mark was at first accompanied by the widespread assumption that the Markan narrative is basically historical. But the view that the priority of Mark warranted the acceptance of the historicity of the Markan narrative framework began to dissipate with William Wrede, against whose “thoroughgoing skepticism” Schweitzer struggled, presenting his own “thoroughgoing eschatology” as the only viable alternative.<sup>15</sup> Schweitzer had seen the historical inadequacies of the Markan narrative structure, and Jesus’ itinerary, as had Wrede. Yet, as in the case of the theories he so effectively criticized, it was Schweitzer’s own imagination that actually supplied the glue (knowledge of Jesus’ eschatological intention) to hold the narrative together. With the rise of form and redaction criticism, Wrede’s view of Mark and the synoptics generally has prevailed. Thus Mark’s narrative framework is now taken to be a theological and literary construct, not a historical, in the sense of chronological, account of Jesus’ ministry and itinerary.

Moreover, Paula Fredriksen makes the simple but significant observation that in contrasting John and the synoptics, it is not a case of one against three, but one against one, since in their narrative frameworks Matthew and Luke generally follow Mark.<sup>16</sup> Thus she proposes that John’s longer ministry, with periodic journeys to Jerusalem, is inherently more plausible. The gospel narratives, which portray Caiaphas and Pilate as having a sense of the character of Jesus and his intentions, require some explanation of why this might be so. It becomes readily understandable if Jesus had been something of a public figure, whose words and deeds were known not only in Galilee, <sup>15</sup> William Wrede, Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien: Zugleich ein Beitrag zum Verständnis des Markusevangelium (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1963; unaltered from the 1st ed. of 1901), 101, where, typically, Wrede emphasizes how the purpose and work of the evangelist Mark should take precedence over historical questions about Jesus. The English translation, The Messianic Secret, trans. J. C. G. Greig (Cambridge: Clarke, 1971), came seventy years after the work’s original publication, a tribute to its enduring importance.

---

<sup>16</sup> Fredriksen, Jesus, 34. The Markan narrative sequence is basic to both Matthew and Luke, although other narratives may have already existed (see n. 53 below).

but also from his not infrequent pilgrimages to the Holy City, which John reports. Thus, Fredriksen maintains, he was not unknown to the principal Roman and high priestly authorities. Pilate did not hunt down his followers because he already knew they were not political revolutionaries. He put Jesus to death because his crucifixion would be an example to those who might be. At the same time, Caiaphas and the chief priests viewed Jesus as a potential rabble-rouser, a threat to the concordat they had worked out with the governing Roman authorities, someone they would gladly dispense with.<sup>17</sup>

A longer ministry not limited to Galilee would also help explain or accommodate other aspects of John's narrative, which are arguably historical, such as John's account of Jesus' continuing relationship to John the Baptist. The Baptist material is a structural feature of the gospel narrative of Jesus' ministry. John, like the synoptics and a couple of the missionary speeches in the Book of Acts (10:37; 13:24), makes it clear that the ministry is to be reckoned as following upon his encounter with John the Baptist.

2.2. Jesus' Relationship to John the Baptist

In his comprehensive study, A Marginal Jew, John P. Meier portrays John as Jesus' mentor. Was Jesus at one time a disciple of John? Meier's answer is that he was, but that apart from John chapters 1 and 3, no one would suggest this, that is, not on the basis of Q and Markan tradition.<sup>18</sup> In John, Jesus makes his debut, not in Galilee (cf. Mark 1:9) but in Bethany beyond the Jordan, where John was baptizing (1:28), that is, in John's territory. Moreover, "the Fourth Gospel's indication that Peter and other disciples first met Jesus in the circle of the Baptist's disciples may well be true..."<sup>19</sup> Decades ago, Rudolf Bultmann suggested that John's sending his disciples to Jesus (1:35–42) implied

---

<sup>17</sup> Fredriksen stresses that the Johannine pattern of Jesus' alternation between Galilee and Jerusalem is historically plausible. It would have been normal for a Jewish male to attend the great festivals, and necessary given Jesus' own mission. See Jesus, esp. 238–241; cf. 219–220, 244, 251–259.

<sup>18</sup> Marginal Jew, 2: Mentor, Message and Miracles (New York: Doubleday, 1994), 116–117.

<sup>19</sup> Marginal Jew, 3: Companions and Competitors (New York: Doubleday, 2001), 222.

that Jesus drew disciples from the Baptist, and that perhaps the evangelist himself had once belonged to Baptist circles.<sup>20</sup>

Jesus' relation to John (never called "the Baptist" in the Fourth Gospel) does not end with the call stories. In Q (Luke 7:18–36, esp. vv. 18–23; Matt 11:2–19) the Baptist is in touch with Jesus through his own disciples from prison. In John, however, Jesus and the Baptist are portrayed as working contemporaneously, for (contrary to the synoptics) "John had not yet been thrown into prison" (3:24). What is more, not only John, but Jesus also, is engaged in baptizing (3:22, 26; 4:1). Then as if someone has caught a slipup, not Jesus but only his disciples are said to be baptizing (4:2). Yet in the synoptics there is also no record of his disciples' baptizing. (Many commentators understandably take 4:2 to be a later editorial note.) Moreover, in the Markan story line there is a sharp demarcation between the time of the Baptist and that of Jesus (1:14–15), which allows for no interval in which Jesus might have been a member of the Baptist's following or working alongside him. John's account gives support to those who, with Eusebius of Caesarea (Hist. Eccl. 3.24.7–13), thought that John wrote about events that took place before the imprisonment of John the Baptist, while the other gospels dealt only with matters coming after his imprisonment. For this reason alone John allows a greater time-span for Jesus' ministry.

The basic historicity of the scene(s) in which Jesus and John appear as baptizing rivals is supported by the criterion of embarrassment.<sup>21</sup> Even Jesus' baptism by John was an embarrassment to early Christians. Therefore, John does not explicitly mention it, and Matthew has the Baptist offer a solution that relieves the embarrassment (Matt 3:14). The Gospel of the Nazareans (Fragment 2) and the Gospel of the Ebionites (Fragment 3) reflect a similar embarrassment.<sup>22</sup> It is unlikely that John the evangelist would have created a scene that actually works against his effort to keep the Baptist in his proper place (cf. 1:6–8, 15,

---

<sup>20</sup> Rudolf Bultmann, The Gospel of John: A Commentary, trans. G. R. Beasley-Murray, R. W. N. Hoare, and J. K. Riches (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1971), 108. For an intriguing proposal about the interrelationship of John and Jesus, see Francis J. Moloney, "The Fourth Gospel and the Jesus of History," NTS (2000): 42–58.

<sup>21</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew, 1:168–171.

<sup>22</sup> Wilhelm Schneemelcher, ed., The Gospels and Related Writings, 1: New Testament Apocrypha, trans. R. McL. Wilson (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 1991), 160, 169.

19–23, 31; 3:30). Their relationship is much more complex than in the synoptics, and the character of that complexity suggests we are learning something about its historicity not conveyed in the synoptics.

2.3. The Feeding of the Five Thousand

While most of John's miracle stories are basically similar to the synoptic type, only one affords a clear parallel, the Feeding of the Five Thousand (6:1–15). The Feeding of the Four Thousand is omitted by Luke, as well as by John, apparently reflecting the fact that it is a doublet. As such it seems to be a secondary addition to an earlier tradition that contained only one feeding story. If so, then John (with Luke) embodies that earlier tradition.

As in the synoptics, and Mark particularly, the feeding story (or stories) constitutes a pivotal point in the narrative. In Mark, of course, the Confession of Peter (8:27–30) follows hard upon the second feeding and introduces the crucial central portion of the narrative, in which Jesus' opponents' hostility and his own death are increasingly foreshadowed. Something similar happens in John. Although the sharp hostility of "the Jews" has already emerged in chapter 5, it becomes unremitting after chapter 6. John chapters 5 and 6 constitutes a turning point in the Fourth Gospel, just as Mark 8 (or Mark chapters 6 and 8) constitutes a turning point in that Gospel. In John also a version of Peter's confession (6:67–71) follows upon the feeding story, as well as the departure of many of Jesus' disciples (6:60–66). Such a withdrawal at this turning point of Jesus' ministry might well have happened, although no other gospel reports it. Their departure actually suggests that this is a turning point of the ministry. In any event, we see here either John's rather remote imitation of Mark or a parallel pattern of Jesus' ministry.

At the conclusion of the feeding narrative, there are a couple of remarkable statements not found in the synoptics. First, Jesus is said by the people to be the "the prophet who is coming into the world" (v. 14; cf. 4:19), probably the prophet of Deuteronomistic expectation (Deut 18:15–22). Then, "When Jesus realized that they were about to come and take him by force to make him king, he withdrew again to the mountain by himself" (v. 15 NRSV). Jesus is also king (i.e., messiah). The fact that this statement leads nowhere in John's narrative already suggests that it is older tradition, and possibly stems from a situation in Jesus' ministry. That Jesus has conducted a messianic banquet suggests that he is the messiah, or king. As the king of the Jews, Jesus was executed by the Romans. The people's desire to acclaim him as king, which John so vividly portrays, may then have some historical basis, and suggests the possibility that this feeding episode is not only a turning point in the narrative, but also in Jesus' ministry.<sup>23</sup> In other words, if John 6:14–15 is for the author a given, and not his redaction (as seems probable), this bespeaks the existence of a traditional narrative pattern, one common to John and Mark, in which the feeding played a pivotal role.

In addition, John's divergent placement of the feeding on the other (Transjordanian) side of the Sea of Galilee is odd (6:1; peran tēs thalassēs...). But while Mark seems to presume it takes place on the western side (where the traditional site of Tabgha is situated), Luke has it at Bethsaida, half-way between, so to speak (Luke 9:10). Commentators struggle to understand why John has moved the feeding, since he must then somewhat awkwardly describe how everyone got back to the Capernaum side (John 6:17, 24, 59). Without claiming too much for history, the exegete should note the possibility that John is here dealing with a traditional given. Moreover, Mark's account of Jesus' sea voyages also presents problems. In John at least the disciples' departure in a boat (John 6:17) is explained: they are going to the other side for what must happen in Capernaum, Jesus' bread discourse (6:59). According to Mark (6:45) they are going "to the other side" (NRSV; Gr. eis to peran) to Bethsaida, which is not exactly across the sea from Tabgha on the western wide. (Thus P<sup>45</sup> with some reason deletes the phrase.) The point is not that John must be historically correct, but that precisely the Gospel's awkwardness suggests we are dealing with something other than the evangelist's own composition or redaction of Mark.

---

<sup>23</sup> See, John Painter, The Quest for The Messiah: The History, Literature and Theology of the Johannine Community, 2nd ed. (Nashville: Abingdon, 1993), 259–267, for a good discussion of John 6:1–21, and particularly of the meaning of the titles prophet and king in 6:14–15, which Painter regards as "pre-crucifixion" (262). He adds that such an overtly political motif would not have been added by John or his (Christian) tradition (216). Dodd, Historical Tradition, 216–217, had made a similar same case for its antiquity.

2.4. The Portrayal of the Disciples

Perhaps related to this narrative pattern, in which there is a kind of revelatory point and turning point in Jesus' public ministry, is the portrayal of the disciples in both John and Mark. It is noteworthy that only after the feedings does Mark have Jesus predict his coming death openly and explicitly (Mark 8:31; 9:31; 10:33), although the disciples nevertheless cannot grasp his meaning. In John, allusions to his death in this context, while real, are more subtle (e.g., John 6:51, 71: cf. 5:18; 7:19). The disciples' failure to understand in Mark is an aspect of Mark's messianic secret. There is no specifically messianic secret in John, for Jesus' identity is revealed from the beginning of the narrative. Yet there is also in John a pervasive inability on the part of the disciples to understand Jesus and what is transpiring, even at the end of their final conversation with him (16:29–33). They will know only in retrospect (2:17, 22; 12:16; 13:7). Wrede himself was aware of this Johannine version of the messianic secret and observed that John is in this respect closer to Mark than are Matthew and Luke.<sup>24</sup> We are confronted with a similar or analogous motif in these quite different gospel narratives, namely, the ignorance of the disciples despite Jesus' self-revelation. Does John adapt what he has read in Mark, or does the kinship lie more deeply embedded in the early Christian tradition? In other words, is the messianic secret earlier than any of the gospels (as Wrede himself thought)?

Among the disciples, Peter plays a leading role, as in the synoptics, but figures in different narratives. (For example, John 13:1–20, esp. vv. 6–9; 20:2–6, and the whole of chap. 21 are without clear parallel in the synoptics.) The disciples are twelve in number (6:67, 70–71; 20:24); they were chosen by Jesus (6:70); but there is no list of the Twelve in John and no account of their appointment (cf. Mark 3:13–19 parr.). Those who are named as Jesus' disciples are for the most part known from the lists in the synoptics and Acts.

Yet some disciples (other than Peter) who are named play a larger role in John than in the synoptics. This is particularly true of Thomas (11:16; 14:5; 20:24–28; 21:2), but also of Philip (1:43–48; 6:5, 7; 12:21–22; 14:8–9) and Andrew, Simon Peter's brother (1:40, 41; 6:8; 12:22), as well as Nathanael (1:45–49; 21:2), who is not named in the synoptics.

---

<sup>24</sup> Wrede, Messiasgeheimnis, 179–206.

(In John 1:44 Simon Peter and Andrew, as well as Philip, are said to be from Bethsaida, apparently contradicting Mark for no obvious reason.) The role of such disciples is all the more striking since James and John, the sons of Zebedee, frequently mentioned in the synoptics, are never called by name in the Fourth Gospel (not even in 21:2)—and yet this Gospel is later ascribed by tradition to a John, presumably the son of Zebedee.

To what extent does this naming of disciples and assigning them different or distinctive roles represent ancient, possibly historical, tradition? We may instance two positive examples worth consideration. First, the risen Jesus' meeting with Peter (21:1–14) and the subsequent conversation with him (21:15–22) is probably historical with respect to two elements: it may be the surviving narrative of Jesus' first resurrection appearance (cf. 1 Cor 15:5; Mark 14:28; 16:7); and it also portrays Peter's recovery and restoration after his denial and desertion of Jesus. While it is scarcely the protocol of a conversation, it portrays a historical reality in narrative and conversational form. Second, the prominence of Thomas is not insignificant. We now possess a gospel attributed to him, which in itself bespeaks the existence of a Thomas tradition. Although it is composed mainly of synoptic-like tradition, its gnosticizing character is reminiscent of John. Moreover, the role played by Thomas in the Gospel of John is not purely negative. At one point he expresses the kind of loyalty to Jesus that Peter eventually lacked (11:16); he raises a crucial question with Jesus at the beginning of the Farewell Discourses (14:5); he demands to see as others have before he will believe (20:24–29). This demand is routinely disparaged by exegetes, probably because of Jesus' concluding blessing of those who have not seen (v. 29), which refers to the Gospel's audience (cf. 17:20). Thomas is, however, present with those who see the Risen Jesus by the Sea, where he is named immediately after Simon Peter (21:2). Does the Thomas tradition of John also bespeak his historical role? This may be too much to claim, but some anterior, historical connection between Thomas traditions and Johannine traditions remains a factor to be reckoned with.<sup>25</sup>

---

<sup>25</sup> Possible links between the Gospels of Thomas and John are discussed by Helmut Koester, Ancient Christian Gospels: Their History and Development (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990), 113–124; cf. idem, History and Literature of Early Christianity, 2nd rev. ed. (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 2000), 184–185. Koester is careful to point out that the Gospels of Thomas and John share a common genre and

2.5. Miracle Traditions

The gospel genre and structure was in its inception and development closely related to the narration of Jesus' miracles, his deeds of power (NRSV) according to the synoptics or signs (semeia) according to John. The Johannine miracle traditions differ from those of the synoptics in that they are for the most part simply different stories. These semeia, while markedly fewer, are usually followed by extensive discussions and discourses in which their significance is brought out, even as skeptical opponents call them into question. The issues that emerge here are of a piece with the refutation of Jesus' explicit Christological teaching by "the Jews" elsewhere in John. Not surprisingly in this Gospel, three of the miracles occur in Jerusalem or nearby Bethany (chapters 5, 9, and 11), whereas in the synoptics no Jerusalem miracles are narrated (although they are mentioned in Matt 21:14–15). In most cases in John, however, a narrative nucleus can be isolated that is similar in form to synoptic-type miracle stories. Arguably, these narratives are more likely to be historical, in the sense of going back to the historical figure of Jesus, than the Johannine Jesus' discourses.<sup>26</sup>

Accordingly, in his detailed examination of the Johannine miracle stories, Meier concludes that most have a traditional, and therefore possibly a historical, basis. In his view only two do not clearly represent historical events: the wine miracle at Cana (2:1–11) and Jesus' coming to the disciples walking on the sea (6:16–21). The latter, of course, has a traditional basis. John did not simply depend on Mark for this story, but John may have composed the wine miracle himself.<sup>27</sup> Meier also notes, in connection with the Man Born Blind (chapter 9), "the tendency of the Gospel of John to heighten the miraculous element tradition, without claiming a literary relationship. James H. Charlesworth, The Beloved Disciple: Whose Witness Validates the Fourth Gospel? (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1995), contends that the beloved disciple is Thomas, but also holds that the antecedents and milieus of the Gospels of John and Thomas are closely related (360–389).

---

<sup>26</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew, 1:45; also 53 n. 22. In general, Meier is more optimistic about identifying a historical basis of the Johannine miracle stories or traditions than is Michael Labahn, the author of the most thorough study of the Johannine miracle narratives, Jesus als Lebensspender: Untersuchungen zu einer Geschichte der johanneischen Tradition anhand ihrer Wundergeschichten, BZNW 98 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1999), 466: "In my opinion, such an historical core in the life of the historical Jesus cannot be identified in the case of any of the miracle narratives related in the Fourth Gospel".

<sup>27</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew, 2:908–924 (on 6:16–21), 934–949 (on 2:1–11).

in miracle stories.”<sup>28</sup> The Raising of Lazarus may have grown on the basis of a story about Jesus’ healing a mortally ill Lazarus. Meier sees difficulties in deriving it from the Lazarus parable of Luke 16:19–31.<sup>29</sup> Nor does he derive it from the so-called Secret Mark. That Jesus was thought to have raised the dead is reflected in the double-tradition saying in which “the dead are raised” (cf. Luke 7:22; Matt 11:5). The Isaiah quotations to which this saying is related (29:18; 35:5–6; 42:18–20; 61:1) routinely mention healing of the deaf, the blind, and the lame, but not the resurrection of the dead (but see 26:19). Perhaps “the dead are raised” actually originated with Jesus himself.<sup>30</sup>

Doubtless Jesus was a miracle worker, and the differences between the synoptic and Johannine miracle stories should not obscure this fact. In Mark and John particularly, healings and other wonders seem to be the principal public activities of Jesus. They drew attention, and possibly also followers, to him. This is already evident from the synoptic gospels, particularly Mark, but it is clearly stated in John (2:11; 2:23–25). Thus there is a line of continuity from Jesus through the synoptics to John. That later Jesus’ followers are said to have joined in such activity (14:12; 1 Cor 12:9–10; 2 Cor 12:12) probably underscores this fact.

Whether there were pre-gospel collections of miracle stories will probably remain a disputed issue, but some evidence in John suggests that there were: the perplexing numbering of the first two signs only (2:11; 4:54); the seemingly inappropriate characterization of Jesus’ entire activity as signs, even after the resurrection (12:37; 20:30); the tension within the Gospel itself between the importance of seeing and believing signs (2:11; 4:48; 12:37) and the recognition that sign faith alone is inadequate (2:23–25; 3:1–10).

We have examined structural and thematic elements in John which are evidently traditional and arguably historical. There are two other themes or motifs that are not insignificant historically, or theologically, but are less central to the development of the gospel genre: Jesus’ relation to his natural family and his relationship to women.

---

<sup>28</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew, 2:698.

<sup>29</sup> Ibid., 822–831.

<sup>30</sup> Ibid., 832–837.

2.6. Jesus' Relation to his Natural Family

The portrayal of Jesus' relationship to his natural family in John is congruent with the synoptics, but differs in ways that are historically plausible.<sup>31</sup> First of all, Joseph is twice specifically named as Jesus' father (1:45; 6:42), in the latter case as a means of explaining his human existence in contrast to his immediately preceding claim of having come down from heaven (6:41). Otherwise Joseph is mentioned only in the infancy stories of Matthew and Luke, but not at all in Mark. John, of course, has no infancy stories, nor does the Gospel seem to contemplate Jesus' birth in Bethlehem. From John we would infer he was born in Nazareth (7:40–44), and this is historically more probable.<sup>32</sup> Also, on the basis of what John writes, there is no reason to doubt that he understands Joseph to be Jesus' natural, biological father.

Mark clearly suggests that Jesus' family had severe reservations about his conduct (3:21) and may have thought he was beside himself.<sup>33</sup> Their attitude then explains Jesus' own statement about his true mother, brothers, and sisters (3:31–35), as well as his enemies' charge that he was in league with Beelzebul, the ruler of demons (3:22; cf. John 10:20). John does not pick up these statements, if he knew them, but clearly describes his brothers as unbelievers, whose advice Jesus will not take, even though he ends up doing what they suggest (7:1–9, 10).

With Jesus' mother (never called Mary in John) matters are put differently than in Mark. She seems to know what he will do (2:1–5), even though he rebuffs her. Then she, with three other women, presumably followers, stands at the foot of the cross (19:25–27). Few critical exegetes regard this episode as historical, but the chief reason seems to be its absence from the synoptics. That family should appear at the foot of the cross is not historically implausible, nor is a dying son's effort to provide for his mother. (There is also the presence of

---

<sup>31</sup> On Jesus' family relations in John, whether stated or implied, see Sief van Tilborg, Imaginative Love in John, Biblical Interpretation Series 2 (Leiden: Brill, 1993).

<sup>32</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew, 1:215–16. Meier points out (237 n. 40) that Raymond E. Brown, The Birth of the Messiah: A Commentary on the Infancy Narratives in Matthew and Luke (Garden City, NJ: Doubleday 1977), 516 n. 6, remains more tentative in his approach.

<sup>33</sup> Joel Marcus, Mark 1–8: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary, Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday, 2000), 269–271.

the Beloved Disciple, whose identity and historical reality remain the subject of debate.)

The role of Jesus' mother is much more important in John than in Mark, or the other synoptics apart from the infancy narratives. She appears at the beginning and end of his ministry. Theologically, her prominence may have something to do with the humanity of Jesus (cf. also 6:42). Perhaps John assigns her a more positive role than she actually played during Jesus' ministry (but see Acts 1:14). Yet there are reasons for not too quickly dismissing the possible historical basis of the Johannine presentation of the mother of Jesus. Her role is prominent, but just the fact that its theological significance is not entirely clear suggests that John may be dealing with a given rather than composing de novo. Obviously, Jesus' relation to his own family is a historical datum in the tradition.

2.7. Jesus' Relationship to Women

Other women also play significant roles. Jesus' encounter and conversation with the Samaritan woman at Jacob's Well (John 4) is, of course, unique to the Fourth Gospel and brings out Johannine themes. But here the Johannine Jesus also manifests typically human characteristics such as tiredness and thirst. That Jesus should initiate a conversation with a woman, much less a Samaritan woman, is out of keeping with contemporary Jewish custom, as the story eventually indicates (4:9, 27), but this state of affairs does not necessarily speak against the historicity of the incident. Indeed, Jesus' approach to the Samaritan woman, his apparent openness to her, is congruent with and complements the synoptic, especially the Lukan, picture of Jesus (cf. Luke 8:1–3; 10:38–42). Of course, given the Johannine language and themes, one would be hard pressed to argue that John presents an account of an actual conversation between Jesus and this woman.

The sisters Mary and Martha of Bethany appear in John and Luke (10:38–42), but only in John are they said to be sisters of Lazarus also and to reside in Bethany. In John as in Luke they play host to Jesus and thus appear as his friends (11:5, 11). In John only this Mary anoints the feet of Jesus and wipes them with her hair (12:1–8; cf. Luke 7:36–50, where the woman is not named). In John the apparent personal relationship between Jesus and this family in Bethany is the basis of a theologically important narrative: Jesus raises their brother Lazarus from the dead. But whatever one makes of this episode, it scarcely calls into question the reality of the relationship. It is, of course, possible that John has here taken up the sisters from Luke (10:38–42), made the Lazarus of the Lukan parable (16:19–31) their brother, and constructed the narratives we now read in his Gospel. But such a proposal involves the larger question of the relationship of Luke to John, which presents its own difficulties, inasmuch as the distinctive Lukan material is not found in John.

Mary Magdalene, in John as in the other gospels, appears at the cross and at the empty tomb. In John she becomes the first witness of an appearance of the risen Christ (20:11–18). (This is also the case in Matthew 28:9–10, although there she is one of two women, and her role is not stressed.) Certainly John has ascribed a larger role to Mary Magdalene, who now stands out along with the mother of Jesus, the Samaritan woman, and the sisters Mary and Martha as a prominent figure in the Fourth Gospel. It is unlikely that John, in his social and theological setting, enhanced their roles because of nascent feminist interests. Rather, in ways different from the synoptics, he portrays Jesus' actual relationships with women, who were among his friends and followers. Here John nicely complements Mark or the synoptics, but does not require any or all of them in order to be understood.

3. The Passion Narrative

In the Passion Narrative the parallels between John and Mark (or the synoptics) become pervasive. With the entry into Gethsemane (called only "a garden" in John 18:1) and the arrest of Jesus the Johannine and Markan narratives begin to run quite closely parallel. But even from Jesus' entry into Jerusalem (Mark 11:1–10; John 12:12–19) or the Johannine narrative of the priests' (and Pharisees') plotting (11:45–53; cf. Mark 14:1–2), there is a remarkable series of parallel accounts, mostly in the same order.

3.1. Prelude to the Passion

John's Prelude to the Passion<sup>34</sup> beginning with the Plotting of the Priests, is relatively much longer than the comparable part of the synoptics because of the Farewell Discourses (chapters 14–16) and Jesus' High Priestly Prayer (chapter 17). Clearly this segment is the composition of the evangelist, who at points obviously drew on earlier traditions or sources.

---

<sup>34</sup> Dodd, Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel, 152–173.

The priests' plotting in John (11:45–53) finds a parallel in Mark 14:1–2, whether or not John drew directly on Mark. Jesus then withdraws (11:54) so that the multitudes may gather in Jerusalem to await his advent (11:55–56), even as his enemies, the Pharisees, make ready to seize him (v. 57). Then comes the traditional story of the Anointing of Jesus (12:1–8; cf. Mark 14:3–9; Luke 7:36–50), followed in John by Jesus' Triumphal Entry into Jerusalem (12:12–19), found in all the synoptics (Mark 11:1–10 parr). The note about Lazarus and the plot against his life (vv. 9–11) is by all odds a Johannine composition, inasmuch as in John the Raising of Lazarus leads to Jesus' condemnation, rather than the Cleansing of the Temple (Mark 11:15–19), which in John has long since occurred (2:13–22).

Now anticipating his destiny, at the approach of the Greeks (12:20), Jesus responds that the hour of his glorification has come (v. 23).<sup>35</sup> From this point to the end of the chapter Jesus is speaking and enunciating Johannine theology, although his speech contains traditional elements. After the soliloquy of 12:44–50 Jesus withdraws from any further contact with this world, whose representatives he will henceforth encounter only as he goes to his death.

With full knowledge that he is taking leave of this world to go to the Father (13:1–3), Jesus begins to wash his disciples' feet (13:1–20) as his first act at the Last Supper. This humble deed replaces the institution of the Lord's Supper in the Johannine account (cf. Mark 14:22–25 parr.), and, as an expression of Jesus' love for his disciples, forms an inclusio with the love commandment (13:34). Jesus also foretells Judas' betrayal (13:21–30) and Peter's denial (13:36–38) as he does in all the gospels. If John is following Mark, his omission of the Words of Institution is deliberate and startling. It may be relevant to observe that the oldest eucharistic text outside the New Testament likewise does not place the institution of the Eucharist on the night Jesus was betrayed (Didache 9–10). Yet the Didache may reflect knowledge of the synoptics, particularly Matthew, but not John. Possibly John and the Didache represent the earliest form of the Last Supper and eucharistic traditions, but such a view is nevertheless precarious, since Paul already knows the traditional words of institution and sets them on the night Jesus was betrayed (1 Cor 11:23–26, esp. v. 23). John clearly knows eucharistic language<sup>36</sup> (6:52–58) and presumably practice; possibly also the Pauline-synoptic version of the Words of Institution. He also knows the tradition of a Last Supper.

---

<sup>35</sup> See Painter, Quest for the Messiah, 376–377. As Painter observes, the quest of the Greeks remains unfulfilled. Yet the quest motif appears, quite significantly, at this turning point, where the hour of Jesus' glorification is announced as having arrived.

John's account of Jesus' revelation of Judas' betrayal (13:21–30) is more highly developed and detailed than the others and serves also to introduce the disciple whom Jesus loved, who, of course, appears only in John (cf. 19:25–27; 20:2–10; 21:7.20–24; perhaps also 18:15–16; 19:35). As to its historical basis, any judgment will be negative that rejects the Gospel's claim to reflect the eyewitness testimony of an individual. However that may be, the scene is apparently a literary development based either on the synoptic tradition or something similar. Interestingly, the synoptics have Judas betray Jesus to the chief priests before the Last Supper, while John presumes he will do so afterward. John's version is historically credible also, although there is little basis on which to decide between them. Jesus' prediction of Peter's denial is much briefer, and quite similar to Mark and Luke, although it is introduced with the distinctly Johannine theme of "afterward" (13:36; cf. 2:22; 13:7), meaning after Jesus' glorification.

John's Farewell Discourses, which begin as the disciples are still at table with Jesus (cf. 14:31), play a role similar to Jesus' Apocalyptic Discourse in the synoptics (Mark 13 parr), which takes place shortly before the Supper. In John, however, apocalyptic eschatological language is reinterpreted (14:22–24; cf. 11:24–25). Jesus' final, "high-priestly" prayer (chapter 17) follows the discourses immediately and precedes his departure into "a garden" for his arrest. In Gethsemane, not mentioned by name in John, Jesus also prays (Mark 14:32–42 parr), but quite a different prayer. In John he prays for his disciples (but cf. John 12:27), in the synoptics for his own deliverance. Obviously, the synoptic version is more primitive. (Yet John 12:27 seems to reflect knowledge of the Gethsemane episode, as does Hebrews 5:7–8).

Although John 11:45 through chapter 17 is the composition of the evangelist, the narrative episodes are mostly, although not entirely, in the same order as in Mark. The Cleansing of the Temple has, of course, occurred a couple of years earlier in John (2:13–22), but the Plotting of the Priests comes just before the Anointing of Jesus, as in Mark. In John only the Triumphal Entry (12:12–19) comes immediately after the Anointing, but the Entry marked the beginning of Jesus' visit to Jerusalem and its environs in Mark (11:1–10). John's biggest differences by far, however, occur in the discourse portions: what Jesus has to say when approached by the questing Greeks (12:20–50); at the Last Supper (chapter 13); during the Farewell Discourses (14–16); and in the final prayer (17).

---

<sup>36</sup> Helmut Koester, "Geschichte und Kultus im Johannesevangelium und bei Ignatius von Antiochen," ZTK 54 (1957): 56–69, esp. 62–64, recognizes this, although he agrees with Bultmann in assigning 6:51c–58 to later redaction.

With John 18:1 the Passion Narrative proper begins. The narratives of all four gospels contain the same episodes, with few exceptions, such as the death of Judas (Matt 27:3–10), Jesus before Herod (Luke 23:6–12), or the piercing of Jesus' side (found in John 19:31–37, but not in the other gospels).

John could be following Mark, perhaps influenced by Luke, and less so by Matthew. Sometimes John's differences from Mark can be understood as deliberate alterations due to John's exalted Christology. Thus at his own arrest (18:1–11) Jesus is in control; he is not even kissed by Judas. Jesus carries his own cross to Golgotha (19:17), needing no help from Simon of Cyrene (Mark 15:21), who is not mentioned. There is no cry of dereliction ("My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me?") and no loud cry at his death (Mark 15:34, 37). Jesus is equal to the occasion and in complete control, at the end saying only, "It is finished" (19:30).

Yet in the same context John would have omitted details given by Mark that seem to accord with his purposes. There is no darkness at noon (Mark 15:33), no rending of the curtain of the temple (Mark 15:38), and no Roman centurion to declare him truly a son of God (Mark 15:39). The darkness fits the Johannine light-darkness dualism; Jesus as new temple is an important Johannine theme (2:21; cf. 1:14); Son of God is the most characteristic title of Jesus in John. These dramatic, even supernatural, interventions in Mark are less likely to be historical—to have actually happened—than the Johannine version that does not contain them.

This specific state of affairs is typical of the Passion Narrative as a whole. In some cases the absence of a Markan (or synoptic) item from John's account is understandable as a deliberate omission, but in others not. Such instances of John's variations from Mark are particularly noteworthy when, as in the cases just noted, they actually fail to support John's portrayal of Jesus or his distinct point of view. The most striking of such instances are related to John's alleged anti-Judaism and his obvious tendency to place the responsibility for Jesus' death on those he calls "the Jews."

3.2. A Jewish Trial?

The Johannine account of Jesus' appearance before the Jewish authorities after his arrest (18:19–24) is remarkably spare and inconclusive in comparison with the Markan (14:55–65). In John Jesus is taken to the house of Annas, the father-in-law of Caiaphas, who is said to have been high priest "in that year" (18:13). Yet in the narrative that follows immediately, it is the "high priest" who questions Jesus, and that in context this must be Annas, who is then said to send Jesus to Caiaphas the high priest (18:24). There is in John no account of a hearing, much less a trial, before Caiaphas. Indeed, the reader is left to imagine—or supply—what happened.

The Markan account of the arraignment of Jesus before the high priest (presumably Caiaphas) and the council or Sanhedrin amounts to a full-scale trial concluding with a guilty verdict (14:55–65). Witnesses appear who claim that Jesus threatened the destruction of the temple (14:58). Nevertheless, their testimony is said not to agree (v. 59). Under further questioning Jesus admits his claims to be the Messiah (14:61–62). Moreover, in his direct question to Jesus the high priest has described the Messiah (RSV Christ = Gr. Christos) as "the Son of the Blessed" (cf. Matt. 26:63: "Son of God"), and Jesus responds to the question, "I am" (ἐγώ εἰμι). After Jesus has continued with the Daniel 7:13 quotation, the high priest declares that he has uttered blasphemy and asks the Sanhedrin to decide his fate, whereupon they all condemn him to death (14:62–64). Thus the condemnation seems to be unanimous. This account presents serious historical and related problems, as we shall see below. Yet, amazingly, it fits exactly John's view that the Jews or Jewish authorities found Jesus' claims for himself blasphemous (10:33–36)—not to mention the fact that he was viewed as a threat to the temple (11:48). Conceivably, this final condemnation would be redundant in John (after chap. 10, etc.); and John after all reports that Jesus was taken to and from Caiaphas (18:24, 28). Yet the difficulty is not easily dispensed with. Why, if John had Mark before him, did he omit the trial and leave his own narrative in such an incomplete and disordered state? The character of the whole Johannine narrative (18:12–27, esp. vv. 19–23) is itself problematic. Its awkwardness—Who is the high priest?—and relatively inconsequential results do not suggest that John composed it as a substitute for the trial before Caiaphas and the Sanhedrin. Rather, the Annas scene seems to be a given with which he was dealing.

Moreover, Luke also lacks the nocturnal Sanhedrin trial found in Mark and Matthew. Although he retains elements from Mark in an early morning scene (Luke 22:66–71), there are no witnesses and no formal verdict. Luke thus omits the specifically juridical elements of Mark. Is Luke influenced by John? Alternatively, do they share a common, more primitive, source or tradition?<sup>37</sup>

The historical difficulties, or improbabilities, presented by Mark's version of a Sanhedrin trial are well-known. First of all, what source of information would have been available to Mark or his tradition? The problems for the Markan and Matthean narrative posed by the later Mishnaic tractate Sanhedrin (albeit a later and perhaps idealized formulation) are numerous: capital cases were not to be tried on a feast day or at night; a verdict of condemnation should not be rendered on the day the trial began; two or more witnesses had to agree, but Mark observes that they did not (14:55, 59); all the judges might not argue for conviction (cf. Mark 14:64: "they all condemned him as deserving death"). Moreover, the sheer prospect of assembling the Sanhedrin on a Passover Eve would have been mind-boggling.<sup>38</sup> The apparent condemnation of Jesus for having claimed messiahship and divine sonship, as if the two went together (14:61–64), sounds suspiciously Christian. It would not have been blasphemy to claim messiahship, even if the claim were proved wrong, and messiahship did not entail divine sonship. Precisely those aspects of the account that fit

---

<sup>37</sup> In an important study of the Lukan version of the Sanhedrin episode (22:66–71), David R. Catchpole, The Trial of Jesus: A Study in the Gospels and Jewish Historiography, StPB 18 (Leiden: Brill, 1971), 183–220, decides in favor of a common tradition or source; so also Hans Klein, "Die Lukanisch-johanneische Passionstradition," ZNW 67 (1976): 155–186. For a persuasive case that Luke is somehow influenced by the Johannine narrative, see Mark A. Matson, In Dialogue with Another Gospel: The Influence of the Fourth Gospel on the Passion Narrative of the Gospel of Luke, SBLDS 178 (Atlanta: Society of Biblical literature, 2001). The starting point of Matson's research was the observation of F. Lamar Cribbs, "St. Luke and the Johannine Tradition," JBL 90 (1971): 422–450, that Luke's departures from Mark coincide with instances where John either contradicts Mark or is clearly different.

<sup>38</sup> As Fredriksen acutely observes, Jesus, 223.

John's understanding of the conflict between Jesus and the Jews render it suspect historically. Yet it is not found in John, but in Mark.

So it is difficult to understand John's omission of this episode, or his radical reduction of it to the confusing Annas scene, had the evangelist been using Mark. Probably the trial scene is itself a Markan composition.<sup>39</sup> But if it is a Markan composition, and if John agrees with Mark in framing the account of Jesus' appearance before Jewish authorities with the account of Peter's denial (John 18:13–18, 25–27; cf. Mark 14:53–54, 66–72), is it not still likely that John was writing with Mark in view?<sup>40</sup> If so, John seems to have adopted the narrative framing of Mark, but not the theologically pregnant trial account itself. Such a redactional procedure is hard to fathom.

On the other hand, John's account of a brief hearing before Annas, and no Sanhedrin trial at all—also no witnesses, no verdict, no condemnation for (Christological) blasphemy—has a much better claim to historicity than Mark's elaborate scene with its theologically loaded concluding verdict. Whether or not John knew Mark, John's disagreement with Mark on this point is striking. John differs from Mark in ways that are likely to be more accurate historically.

3.3. The Priests' Plotting

John has a Sanhedrin scene, if not a trial, in 11:45–53. Such an informal meeting before the Passover feast would be more likely to have occurred than a formal trial on the very eve of the feast. Moreover, there is here another parallel with Mark, namely Mark's brief account of the priests' (and scribes') plotting that inaugurates the Passion Narrative proper (Mark 14:1–2). In a noteworthy variation from Mark's order, the priests' plotting in John occurs before Jesus has entered Jerusalem (John 12:12–19), in Mark well after the entry (11:1–10). Mark's version would seem more likely historically, unless as in John Jesus had previously visited Jerusalem.

Although John scarcely presents the people called the Pharisees and chief priests in a positive light, he does make their actions intelligible, for he gives a much more extensive account and explanation of their plotting. If John 11:47–53 is to be understood as an expansion upon Mark 14:1–2, there remain features of the briefer Markan account that are strangely absent. Mark is in several respects actually more specific than John, describing the chief priests and scribes as seeking to arrest Jesus by stealth and kill him (14:1). Moreover, in Mark the authorities plot to carry out the deed “not during the feast, lest there be a tumult of the people,” and therefore presumably before it (14:2). Although this chronology actually agrees with John’s, where Jesus is executed before Passover, nothing is said of that aspect of their planning in the Fourth Gospel. Of course, no scribes are mentioned, which is typical of John, but rather the Pharisees, along with the chief priests (11:47). In any event, John’s account is scarcely an expansion of Mark’s.

<sup>39</sup> See John Donahue, Are You the Christ? The Trial Narrative in the Gospel of Mark, SBLDS 10 (Missoula, MT: Scholars, 1973).

<sup>40</sup> Contra Norman Perrin and John Donahue, who take this position, Robert T. Fortna, "Jesus and Peter at the High Priest's House: A Test Case for the Question of the Relation Between Mark's and John's Gospels," NTS 24 (1977–78): 371–383, shows that this is not necessarily the case.

In John the council (συνέδριον) is genuinely perplexed and apprehensive that Jesus’ popularity will bring the Romans down on the place, presumably the temple, and the nation (11:47–48). (“Signs” may be mentioned because of the immediately preceding Lazarus episode, which is scarcely the actual cause of Jesus’ death.) Perhaps this fear is to be seen in the context of the popular move to make Jesus king after the feeding of the multitude (6:15). Apparently Jesus is seen as a threat to the priestly, temple authorities and to their concordat with the Romans. Caiaphas’ prophecy (11:49–50) can then be read either as expressing cynical self-interest or as reflecting a genuine concern for the welfare of the people: “You know nothing at all; you do not understand that it is better for you to have one man die for the people than to have the whole nation destroyed.” In any event, a cynical reading is not the only one possible. Here John probably comes closer than any other evangelist to identifying accurately a motivation of Jewish (priestly) authorities to get Jesus out of the way. In any event, the grounds for Caiaphas’ recommendation and the Sanhedrin’s condemnation are prudential rather than theological. In this fundamental way John differs from Mark’s rendering, and in a surprising direction.

3.4. The Trial before Pilate

Obviously John has elaborated the trial scene (18:28–19:16a) to bring out his theological interests and to underscore the guilt of the Jewish, particularly high priestly, authorities. Probably John had at his disposal a simpler, briefer account, like Mark, if not Mark itself. Perhaps John’s theological and related interests in blaming “the Jews” prevented his seeing the tension between the Roman attitude as suggested before Caiaphas (11:47–48) and that manifested by Pilate in the trial scene he created. In the one case, Roman power itself is perceived as the danger; in the other, Pilate the Roman governor seems reluctant to exercise his power over Jesus (19:10) and must be persuaded by “the Jews.”

The Johannine variations from the Markan account of Jesus’ trial before Pilate move for the most part along the lines of John’s recognizable theological interests. Initially “the Jews” seek a death sentence against Jesus from Pilate because they themselves do not have authority to put anyone to death (18:31). When Pilate questions Jesus about his kingship, Jesus’ answer is thoroughly Johannine (18:36–37). Pilate’s question, “What is truth?” (v. 38), betrays his cynicism, but then the first of his three proclamations of Jesus’ innocence occurs (18:38; cf. 19:4, 6). In the face of Pilate’s anticipated clemency, “the Jews” seek Jesus’ death all the more and even question Pilate’s loyalty to Caesar (19:12). Although they eventually get their way (19:16), Pilate has the last word (19:19–22).

Yet in John’s account there is a rather curious anomaly. Early on Pilate says to Jesus (18:35), “Your own nation and the chief priests have handed you over to me,” which suggests that “the Jews” in this scene are the people generally or the crowds (ochloi) that figure in the synoptic accounts. Yet in the Johannine narrative itself “crowds” as such do not appear, and “the Jews” alternates with the “chief priests” in such a way as to suggest they are identical (19:6–7). Thus Jesus responds to the chief priests and police (NRSV), but “the Jews” answer. When read alongside the synoptics, with John’s knowledge and use of them assumed, the entire Jewish people’s participation in the condemnation of Jesus is implied. (By inference from the synoptics they constitute the crowds.) When John is read alone, without reference to the synoptics, this is not as obvious. “The Jews” seem to be the chief priests rather than the crowds or the Jewish people.<sup>41</sup> This does not mean that John exonerates the Jewish people, but his position becomes more ambivalent than is usually thought, and may reflect the historical fact that it was the high priestly authorities who pursued the case against Jesus. After Jesus' death, when, according to Acts, Jesus' disciples reassembled in Jerusalem, their opponents and harassers were the chief priests and Sadducees (Acts 4:1, 5, 23; 5:17, 21, 24), not the Pharisees with whom Jesus had debated. John here creates a fictional or fiction-alized scene, but the chief historical protagonists (Jesus, Pilate, the chief priests) appear in it.

---

<sup>41</sup> On this issue see the fuller discussion in D. Moody Smith, John among the Gospels, 2nd ed. (Columbia SC: University of South Carolina Press, 2001), 222–224. Also, see Martin Hasitschka, “Beobachtungen zu Chronologie und Topographie der Passionsgeschichte nach Johannes,” in Für und Wider die Priorität des Johannesevangeliums, ed. Peter Leander Hofrichter, Theologische Texte und Studien 9 (Hildesheim: Georg Olms, 2002), 151–159, esp. 154.

3.5. The Date of the Crucifixion According to the Jewish Calendar

John has already presented a two-to-three year ministry, in contrast to the synoptics' ministry of one year or less. Another striking chronological contradiction appears in the Passion Narrative. In the synoptics, the Last Supper is the annual Passover supper, but in John Jesus dies the afternoon before the Passover. In fact, John seems to go out of his way to emphasize that Jesus died before Passover eve, not on the first day of the feast (13:1; 18:28; 19:14, 31).

John P. Meier, in his treatment of the chronology of Jesus' career, argues that a stronger case can be made for the Johannine chronology than for the synoptic.<sup>42</sup> The lynchpin of his argument is that it is inconceivable that the events of Jesus' arrest, trial, and death should have occurred on the evening when the Passover meal was eaten. It is highly improbable, he writes, that "at the time of Jesus, the supreme Jewish authorities in Jerusalem would arrest a person suspected of a capital crime, immediately convene a meeting of the Sanhedrin to hear the case (a case involving the death penalty), hold a formal trial with witnesses, reach a verdict that the criminal deserved to die, and hand over the criminal with a request for execution on the same day—all within the night and early hours of Passover day, the fifteenth of Nisan!" "Yet," he continues, "this is what the synoptic passion chronology and presentation of the Jewish 'process' basically demand."<sup>43</sup>

Meier goes on to observe that the Johannine account is far more plausible historically. In fact, the synoptic, the Markan account does not demand a Passover eve setting if two notices are removed, namely 14:1, and especially 14:12–16, which specifically indicates the Last

<sup>42</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew, 1:390–401.

<sup>43</sup> Ibid., 396.

Supper will be a Passover meal.<sup>44</sup> Moreover, the caution of Mark 14:2 (“Not during the feast lest there be a tumult of the people”) actually agrees with the Johannine chronology that places the arrest, trial, and execution before the eating of the Passover. Interestingly, in Paul’s references to the Last Supper there is no indication that he knew it to be a Passover meal.<sup>45</sup> Furthermore, Paul’s statement (1 Cor 5:7) that “Christ, our paschal lamb, has been sacrificed,” seems on the face of it to assume, and support, the Johannine chronology.<sup>46</sup> In his commentary Brown argued in favor of the Johannine chronology, as he would continue to do in The Death of the Messiah.<sup>47</sup>

Two relatively early extra-canonical sources, one Christian, the other Jewish, also agree with John’s dating of Jesus’ crucifixion. In the apocryphal Gospel of Peter Jesus is delivered “to the people on the day before the unleavened bread, their feast.” A brief trial scene (3:6–8) and the crucifixion (4:10–5:20) then follow, obviously on the same day. Also, in Baraita Sanhedrin 43a it is reiterated that “on the eve of Passover they hanged Yeshu.”<sup>48</sup>

Possibly John has shaped the narrative so that Jesus will die when the Passover lambs are slain (cf. John 1:29 and the scripture quotation of 19:36, which refers to the Passover lamb). Yet the fact that John describes Jesus as the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world and applies paschal biblical texts to him (Exod 12:10 LXX, 46; Ps 34:20; Num 9:12) does not in itself prove that John has changed the chronology. It is equally possible that John is assuming such a chronology as factual and interpreting it. As we have seen, the acceptance of the Markan chronology poses serious historical problems. (Mark may reflect an early interpretation of the Last Supper as the first Christian Passover.) Jesus’ death in the Gospel of John is indeed a vicarious death (John 10:11, 17), but it is not otherwise presented as analogous with the death of sacrificial animals. Such cultic terminology

<sup>44</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew, 1:396–97.

<sup>45</sup> Pointed out by Günther Bornkamm, Jesus of Nazareth, trans. Irene and Fraser McLuskey with James M. Robinson (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1960), 161–162.

<sup>46</sup> See Meier, Marginal Jew, 1:428–429 n. 108.

<sup>47</sup> Raymond E. Brown, The Gospel According to John, 2 vols., Anchor Bible (Garden City, NJ: Doubleday, 1966, 1972), 555–556, as well as idem, The Death of The Messiah, 1350–78, esp. 1373.

<sup>48</sup> Cited from Morris Goldstein, Jesus in the Jewish Tradition (New York: Macmillan, 1950), 22.

and conceptuality is more characteristic of Paul, Hebrews, Revelation, and even 1 John (1:7, 9; 2:2), than of the Fourth Gospel.<sup>49</sup>

Another chronological discrepancy in the passion account concerns only the time of day, not the date. According to John, at the sixth hour, noon according to Jewish reckoning, Jesus was still before Pilate (19:14). But according to Mark, who tolls off the times and the hours (Mark 15:1, 25, 33, 42), Jesus has already been crucified at the third hour (Mark 15:25), nine in the morning. It seems more reasonable to think that Jesus stood before Pilate at noon than that the entire procedure described in Mark 15:1–24 took place so early. Moreover, Mark's tolling of the hours could represent the disciples' earliest commemoration of the events of Good Friday. Who would have been keeping time on the actual day? The point is not that John is more accurate, but that John's vagueness may more accurately represent what was known, or not known.

While not every item or detail of the Johannine Passion Narrative is historically preferable to the synoptic, some are, and the several we have singled out are quite significant. Probably John knows a passion tradition different from Mark's (or the synoptics'), which at points is historically preferable. Whether this tradition existed already in written form is less certain, but quite possible. Paul, writing to the Corinthian Christians about the conduct of the Lord's Supper, sets its institution by Jesus "on the night he was betrayed" (1 Cor 11:23). This bare statement assumes knowledge of Jesus' betrayal (his "being handed over"), perhaps the identity of Judas (although he is never mentioned outside the gospels and Acts), certainly Jesus' death, probably the fact that those in authority had put him to death (1 Cor 2:8).<sup>50</sup> Paul's reference to this special night assumes his own knowledge of these events in a narrative context, and probably that of his hearers.<sup>51</sup>

---

<sup>49</sup> In her March 17, 2004, Kenneth W. Clark Lecture at Duke Divinity School, entitled "Jesus as Passover Lamb: A Case of Mistaken Identity," Marianne Meye Thompson argued that the Gospel of John does not actually identify Jesus with the Passover Lamb, but that this is an interpretive misconstrual of John's references to a lamb.

<sup>50</sup> See Gordon D. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians, The New International Commentary on the New Testament (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1987), 103–104, who cites Gene Miller, "ARCHONTON TOU AIONOS TOUTOU—A New Look at 1 Corinthians 2:6–8," JBL 91 (1972): 522–528. Also see Richard B. Hays, First Corinthians, Interpretation (Louisville, KY: John Knox, 1997), 44, who notes the importance of 2:6–8 as well.

<sup>51</sup> Hays, First Corinthians, 197.

3.6. The Demonstration of Jesus' Death

Only in the Gospel of John is there an episode between the death of Jesus and his burial: the crurifragium, not of Jesus but of the two others crucified with him, and the piercing of Jesus' side. Breaking the legs of the crucified victim was a merciful act, causing him to die quickly of asphyxia (cf. Gospel of Peter 4:14). According to John, Jesus' legs were not broken, because he had already died. But perhaps to make sure, his side was pierced instead, resulting in an efflux of water and blood. The question of who might have seen this transpire is answered in 19:35: presumably, the Beloved Disciple (cf. 21:24), who had been standing at the foot of the cross (19:25–27).<sup>52</sup> The identification of the eyewitness is not gratuitous, however, but links this event to the attestation of the Gospel's validity at the end (21:24). Did the crurifragium and the piercing of Jesus' side take place? If there were no attestation by the witness and no scriptures quotations (Exod 12:46; Zech 12:10), exegetes might be more inclined to accept this scene as something that likely happened. It would not be unprecedented. Moreover, the discovery that Jesus had already died, sooner than expected, fits what is said in Mark by Pilate (15:44–45), who seems surprised that Jesus was "already dead." Apparently John confirms Mark, and vice versa. In fact, John 19:30, although highly stylized, with Jesus remaining in control until the end, also implies that Jesus died quite suddenly.

The final demonstration of the reality of Jesus' death was his burial ("...crucified, dead, and buried..."). The Johannine account of the burial is distinctive in that Nicodemus reappears (cf. 3:1–10; 7:50–52) to participate along with Joseph of Arimathea. John seems to have added Nicodemus to the story, which he received either from Mark or a parallel tradition. Interestingly, John's unique description of Joseph fits Nicodemus ("a disciple of Jesus, but secretly, for fear of the Jews"). The detailed description of Jesus' burial (19:39–40), "as is the burial custom of the Jews," and the explicit indication of the reason for haste (v. 42) are unique to John. It has been customary to attribute John's differences in detail to his literary and theological purpose, because of the character of the Fourth Gospel, but where traditional data end

---

<sup>52</sup> Charlesworth, Beloved Disciple, argues that Thomas (John 20:25) wants to see Jesus' side, the lance wound, as well as his hands, because he and he alone knows of the lance wound, since he observed it (422–424). He was standing by the cross with Jesus' mother; he is the disciple whom Jesus loved (19:26).

and theological interpretation begins is often a question difficult to decide.

3.7. Resurrection Appearance Narratives

Each canonical gospel narrates the discovery of an empty tomb by women who believe they are going to visit Jesus' tomb. Beyond that point, the agreement that has extended through the Passion Narrative ends. There are variations among the accounts of the discovery of the empty tomb, John's being the most extensive and significant in that he has Peter and the Beloved Disciple run to the tomb to check it out at the behest of Mary Magdalene (20:2–10). The judgment that this is a Johannine addition to a traditional narrative looks probable, and the exegete would scarcely think otherwise were it not for the testimony of Luke (24:12, 24), which somewhat complicates matters. Luke 24:12 has Peter alone go to the tomb, and although missing in some ancient mss (D) is found in most (P<sup>75</sup>, Sinaiticus, Vaticanus, etc.). Also, Luke 24:24 seems to agree with, and to summarize, John 20:2–10. This instance involves the broader issue of the relation of John and Luke. What dependence, or which way does it run? It is often and understandably assumed that Peter, having denied Jesus, fled immediately to Galilee (cf. John 21:1–3). This is a reasonable surmise, but not a certainty. Yet it remains likely that only the women found the tomb empty. It would have then been entirely natural to include the male disciples as the tradition developed.

Mark, in its oldest extant form, has no appearance narrative. Both John and Matthew report an appearance to Mary (John 20:11–18) or the two Marys (Matt 28:9–10) just outside the tomb. Otherwise, the appearance stories of the gospels differ as to locale: Galilee (Matthew and John 21; cf. Mark 14:28; 16:7) or Jerusalem and its environs (Luke and John 20, with noteworthy parallels between Luke 24:36–43 and John 20:19–23, as well as 20:24–29). Yet John 21, usually taken to be a later editorial supplement although it is contained in all known Greek mss., is based on a Galilean resurrection appearance narrative that has clear affinities with the unique Lukan call story of 5:1–11. This appearance to Peter, the Beloved Disciple, and five other disciples by the Sea of Tiberias (Galilee) seems to be a first resurrection appearance (despite 21:14). The disciples were returning to fishing, i.e., to work. Moreover, the extant fragment of the Gospel of Peter breaks off just at the point where Peter declares that he, his brother Andrew, and Levi the son of Alphaeus took their nets and went to the sea, after they, with the rest of the twelve disciples, had gone home in grief. Clearly Peter's narrative (14:59–60) anticipates a first appearance by the Sea of Galilee, as does the putative original form of John 21:1–14. Surprisingly, John 21:1–14 is the appearance story that Mark 14:28 and 16:7 lead the reader to expect. What might have been expected in Mark is found in John, if not also in the Gospel of Peter.

A survey of the narrative elements of Jesus' public ministry in the Gospel of John does not reveal a complete narrative structure that is an alternative superior to the Markan. Yet the Markan narrative is clearly not governed by purely historical, in the sense of chronological, considerations or data. John presents chronological and topographical divergences from Mark that are worth taking seriously as possible alternatives. At the same time, the Johannine narrative lacks the driving literary unity that characterizes Mark. It gives the impression of a broken, perhaps at points truncated, and at others emended narrative. John's narrative of Jesus' public ministry may be an unfinished symphony which defies narrative clarification or reconstruction. This is not true of the Johannine Passion Narrative and the prelude to it (chaps. 13–17), where the narratives run parallel to Mark or the synoptics, but do not seem to be derived from them, and sometimes suggest more likely historical scenarios. There one finds a narrative continuity missing in John's account of Jesus' public ministry. Classical form criticism arrived at the conclusion that the Passion Narrative(s) came into being before narratives of Jesus' ministry were composed (Dibelius, Bultmann, Jeremias). After nearly a century, this still seems probable.

Does John then simply construct a narrative of Jesus' ministry to precede the Passion, as Mark apparently did, proceeding de novo? Or were there narrative elements and a narrative framework prior to the passion, that is, before John wrote and known to him?<sup>53</sup> John and <sup>53</sup> On evidence for a continuous narrative in the double tradition (Q) of Matthew and Luke, see Stephen Hultgren, Narrative Elements in the Double Tradition: A Study of their Place within the Framework of the Gospel Narrative, BZNTW 113 (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 2002), esp. 350–354. That the Gospel of John developed on the basis of an earlier narrative has been argued or presumed by many, notably Robert Tomson Fortna, who discerns a more primitive Gospel of Signs underlying the present, canonical text. See The Fourth Gospel and its Predecessor: From Narrative Source to Present Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988), in which he maintains and refines the position set forth in his earlier monograph, The Gospel of Signs: A Reconstruction of the Narrative Source Underlying the Fourth Gospel, SNTSMS 11 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970). Yet Gilbert van Belle, The Signs Source in the Fourth Gospel, BETL 116 (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1994), remains unconvinced.

---

Mark have several important narrative items in common before the Passion Narrative. Jesus' ministry begins with his encounter with John the Baptist. Jesus comes on the scene as a miracle worker, as well as a teacher, and immediately gains followers, some of whom were women. (Both Mark and John leave the distinct impression that his miracle working activity set Jesus apart.) Not surprisingly, he met with a mixed reaction from his home folks and family. At some point during this public activity there was a turning point, centering on his feeding of a multitude, after which opposition mounted. Eventually he decided to go up to Jerusalem for Passover and (whether or not by his intention) his death.

4. Sayings Traditions in John

The discourses attributed to Jesus in John are quite different from the sayings tradition in the synoptics, in that he speaks at length, carries on conversations with opponents and disciples, most of which concern his own dignity and role, and tells few if any true parables.

Some sayings of Jesus with obvious synoptic parallels appear in parallel narrative episodes, where they might be expected to occur. Many of these are therefore in the Passion Narrative (chapters 18–19) and in the Prelude to the Passion (especially chapters 12–13). For example, in the Anointing in Bethany, Jesus says, “For the poor you always have with you, but you do not always have me” (12:8), which is closely paralleled in the same context by Mark 14:7 (cf. Matt 26:11), except that Mark adds “and whenever you wish you can do them good” (which Matt 26:11, like John 12:8, lacks).<sup>54</sup> At the Last Supper, in the betrayal scene, Jesus says (John 13:21): “Truly, truly I say to you, one of you will betray me.” Except for the typical double ἀμὴν in John this saying is exactly paralleled in Mark 14:18 and Matthew 26:21. In John 18:33, as in all the synoptics (Mark 15:2; Matt 27:11; Luke 23:3), Pilate's question to Jesus is the same: “Are you the king of the Jews?”

In the significantly similar Johannine version of the Feeding of the Five Thousand (6:1–15) there are many similarities of detail (e.g., five thousand men; five loaves and two fish; the insufficiency of two hundred denarii of bread, the twelve baskets full of left-over fragments).

---

<sup>54</sup> See J. F. Coakley, “The Anointing at Bethany and the Priority of John,” JBL 107 (1988): 241–256, who argues for the priority of John's version.

The naming of the disciples Philip and Andrew, however, as well as the presence of the small boy who has the five barley loaves and two fish, are distinctive of John.<sup>55</sup> Also in the immediately following story of Jesus walking on the sea, there are similarities of detail. Here the apophthegm is a word of Jesus: "It is I; fear not" (John 6:20; Mark 6:50; Matt 14:27; no parallel in Luke). With this notable exception, the two similar synoptic and Johannine stories lack extensive or significant instances of verbatim agreement in words of Jesus. The same may be said of the Cleansing of the Temple (John 2:14–22; cf. Mark 11:15–17; Matt 21:12–13; Luke 19:45–46). Precisely the climactic word of the Johannine Jesus (2:16; alluding to Zech 14:21) differs from the synoptic (Mark 11:17 parr, in which Jesus quotes Isaiah 56:7 and Jeremiah 7:11). The disciples then (or later) remember Psalm 69:9 in John 2:17 only.

The most extensive verbatim agreements in sayings that are significantly implicated in a narrative occur in John 1:23–34. These are not sayings of Jesus, however, but of John the Baptist, and they closely parallel parts of Mark 1:2–11. While in Mark the evangelist is the narrator throughout, in the Gospel of John the Baptist becomes the narrator, testifying, as he is looking back, in retrospect (1:30–34). He testifies to Jesus' superiority to himself (vv. 26–27, 30), and to seeing the descent of the Spirit upon Jesus (v. 32), who will baptize with the Spirit (v. 33); and finally he summarizes his own witness to Jesus as Son of God (v. 34). He knows better than anyone in the narrative who Jesus is. In the Gospel of John nothing is said of the Baptist's clothing or diet (Mark 1:6), or of the relation of his preaching to repentance and forgiveness (Mark 1:4–5). John is predominantly a witness (1:31, 32, 34). Not surprisingly, his role as an apocalyptic prophet (cf. Matt 3:7–10; Luke 3:7–9) is also missing. Nothing is said in John about Jesus' having been baptized, but the Baptist's statement about the purpose of his baptizing ministry, “that he might be revealed to Israel” (1:31), implies knowledge of this fact.

---

<sup>55</sup> E. P. Sanders, The Tendencies of the Synoptic Tradition, SNTSMS 9 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1969), 188–189, examines "Increasing Detail as a Possible Tendency of the Tradition" and sees no clear direction among the synoptic gospels. Sometimes details such as proper names are added, but sometimes they are dropped. He does, however, find that in patristic and apocryphal writings there is a tendency to assign proper names to figures who in the synoptics are anonymous (145, 189). The question of where John would belong cannot be treated here. See D. Moody Smith, "The Problem of John and the Synoptics in Light of the Relation between Apocryphal and Canonical Gospels," in John and the Synoptics, ed. Adelbert Denaux, BETL 101 (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1992), 147–162.

John’s similarities to the synoptics are so striking that Bultmann assigned this material (i.e., John 1:19–34) in its present form to a later redactor, who attempted here, and at some other points, to bring John into line with the synoptics.<sup>56</sup> Certainly the Johannine version, and particularly the words of John the Baptist, can readily be understood as an adaptation based on the Markan narrative. John’s words, and the description of him, have been shaped so that he becomes a witness only, rather than a prophet in his own right.

There is also a striking verbatim agreement between John and Mark that is ingredient to a healing narrative of each, and functions comparably within it; but the narratives themselves are different. In John 5:8 (cf. Mark 2:9, 11 parr) Jesus says to the healed man, “Rise, take up your pallet, and walk,” which is the same as his command in Mark 2:9. But while the Johannine narrative is set at the pool of Bethesda (or Bethzatha) in Jerusalem, the Markan is set in Capernaum. Aside from this word of Jesus and the common motif of the relationship of sin and sickness (Mark 2:5–8; John 5:14) or misfortune, which appears elsewhere in the gospels (e.g., Luke 13:1–5; John 9:2–3), the narratives have little in common. One might suppose that if, as a broad spectrum of gospel tradition has it, Jesus healed sick persons, he said something like this more than once.

There are other less exact instances of such agreements. Jesus’ saying in John 12:27 reflects knowledge of his anguish in the synoptic Gethsemane story, although it comes before the Last Supper rather than after as in the synoptics. There is no Johannine narrative, no reference to Gethsemane, and no extensive verbatim agreement, but in both John and Mark (followed by Matthew) Jesus speaks of the condition of his soul ( $\psi\upsilon\chi\eta$ ) as “troubled” (John 12:27; cf. Psalm 6:3) or “very sorrowful, even to death” (Mark 14:34) and of the anticipated time of his coming death as “the hour” ( $\acute{\omega}\rho\alpha$ ). John may be reflecting Mark’s narrative, but Hebrews 5:7–8 seems to know of such an episode of Jesus’ anguish, also without any reference to Gethsemane or trace of the Gospel of Mark. Perhaps John independently attests Jesus tradition.

---

<sup>56</sup> See Bultmann, The Gospel of John, 84–97, esp. 85–86.

John also contains a number of other sayings with clear synoptic counterparts, which occur in contexts different from those in the synoptics.

For example, John 4:44: "For Jesus himself bore witness that a prophet has no honor in his own country." This saying finds a parallel in each of the synoptics (Mark 6:4; Matt 13:57; Luke 4:24), as well as the Gospel of Thomas (31) and the Oxyrhynchus Papyrus (lines 31–33). The Markan context is somewhat different, although there Jesus has gone to his "hometown" and the reaction of his compatriots is ultimately negative (Mark 6:3). In John, his compatriots, the Galileans, welcome him, but his own country (as the context requires, not "hometown") is not Galilee (or Nazareth) but Jerusalem. In the extra-canonical sources, there is no narrative context. In Luke it is specifically the synagogue in Nazareth (4:16, 24). Conceivably, John has taken the saying from its Markan context and used it for his own distinctive purposes. In any event, in John it has a different geographical point of reference. The narrative contexts are different, but the meaning—rejection of Jesus by his compatriots—is the same.

Again, John 12:25: "The one who loves his life loses it, and the one who hates his life in this world will keep it for eternal life." The saying sounds entirely Johannine. One might never suspect that it was not composed by the evangelist, if there were not significant Markan and Q parallels. What is recognizably the same saying is found in Mark 8:35 (cf. Matt 16:25 and Luke 9:24). Moreover, there is another version in Q, the double tradition (Matt 10:39 and Luke 17:33). So this saying about the meaning of discipleship is found in Mark, Q, and John. In Mark 8:35 parr it follows the saying about taking up one's cross and following Jesus. On the other hand, John 12:25 is followed by what could be a veiled version of the cross-bearing saying (12:26): "If anyone serves me, he must follow me; and where I am, there shall my servant be also; if anyone serves me, the Father will honor him." This pair of sayings occurs in Mark (parr) immediately after Peter's confession, Jesus' first passion prediction, Peter's rebuke, and Jesus' remonstrance. In John the context is different. Jesus is already in Jerusalem, but as in Mark, he is looking toward his death, which is even closer than in Mark.

In John's Last Supper scene there are several sayings with synoptic parallels in different contexts. (Jesus' prediction of his betrayal has been noted above.) There is, most notably, the distinctive version of Jesus' love commandment in 13:34 ("...love one another..."; cf. John 15:12, 17; 1 John 3:23; 2 John 5). Yet the synoptic (Mark 12:33 parr; Matt 5:43 and Luke 6:27) and Pauline versions are characteristically different, with Paul not referring the commandment to Jesus, but only quoting Leviticus 19:18 (Rom 13:9; Gal 5:14; cf. Jas 2:8). John 13:20 (“whoever receives one whom I send receives me”) is closely paralleled in Matt 10:40, although the Greek verbs are different, perhaps suggesting an underlying Aramaic (cf. also more remote parallels in Mark 9:37 parr and Luke 10:16). Jesus’ saying about a servant’s not being greater than his master (13:16) is paralleled in Q (Matt 10:24; Luke 6:40), although in John Jesus is called Lord (κύριος), while in Q he is teacher (διδάσκαλος). At the meal episode’s apparent conclusion in John, Jesus says (14:31), “Rise, let us go hence.” After they have already departed the supper room, at the conclusion of the Gethsemane scene (Mark 14:42), Jesus says, “Rise, let us be going.”

The binding and loosing saying of Jesus in Matt 16:19 and 18:18 is found in a different form in John 20:23, where it is the risen Jesus who says to the disciples: “Of whomever you forgive the sins they are forgiven them, of whomever you retain the sins they are retained.” The Johannine version, in a quite different context, gives the meaning of the more enigmatic Matthean version for church discipline (obviously its meaning in the context of Matt 18:18). This is more likely a saying of the risen Christ (John) than of the earthly Jesus (Matthew).

There are other similar sayings in different contexts. At the temple cleansing itself the Johannine Jesus alludes to the destruction of the temple (2:19; cf. Mark 14:58 par; Mark 15:29 par; also perhaps Mark 13:2 parr). In John 3:3, 5 Jesus speaks of the necessity of being born again, or from above, in order to see or enter the Kingdom of God. In the comparable Matthean saying (18:3) it is only a matter of turning and becoming like children in order to enter the kingdom. In his Farewell Discourses, Jesus several times promises the fulfillment of prayer in his name (14:13–14; cf. 15:7, 16; 16:23–24), a promise which seems to echo several synoptic sayings (Mark 11:22–24 parr; Matt 7:7–11; 18:19; 21:22) although these are not identical. Likewise, the fate of the recalcitrant branches (John 15:6) in the Parable of the Vine recalls John the Baptist’s threat (Matt 3:10; Luke 3:9), as well as Jesus’ own word in the Sermon on the Mount or Plain (Matt 7:16–20; Luke 6:43–44).

In most such cases it is arguable that the Johannine version is based on, or a midrash upon, the synoptic. Yet the Johannine context is almost always different. That John relied upon the synoptics is not impossible, although this reliance would be minimal. Alternatively, John drew upon parallel Jesus tradition, even if he was acquainted with other canonical gospels. The existence of such tradition is suggested also by the Gospel of Thomas.

5. Distinctive Factual Information

There are a number of instances in which John seems to possess factual information different from, or going beyond, what is found in Mark or the synoptics. Specifically, John conveys purportedly factual knowledge about Judaism, whether in Jesus' day or his own, about the land of Israel, and about Jesus himself.

John emphasizes that Jesus was from Nazareth, a humble village, about which no great expectations could be entertained: "Can anything good come out of Nazareth?" (1:46).

Jesus himself had just been introduced by Philip to Nathanael as "Jesus son of Joseph from Nazareth" (1:45; NRSV). Moreover, Jesus' origin in Nazareth, not Bethlehem (cf. 7:42), is emphasized. There is, of course, no physical description of Jesus in any gospel, but several clearly human traits appear in John alone. Jesus gets tired and thirsty (4:6–7). He has friends other than his disciples: Lazarus, and presumably Lazarus' sisters Mary and Martha as well (11:5, 11). When Lazarus is reported to have died, Jesus weeps out of love for him (11:36–37), a normal human reaction. Jesus has learning, is literate, although he has never studied formally (7:15). Obviously, he is able to carry on a discussion about the meaning of scripture. Luke gives Jesus' age as about thirty at the beginning of his ministry (3:23). One adds the three or so years of his ministry according to John's account, and reaches the traditional thirty-three years. Yet in John Jesus is said to be not yet fifty (8:57), which agrees with the forty-six years that the temple, which turns out to be the temple of his body (2:21), has been under construction. John hardly intends to inform the reader of Jesus' age, but he may be playing on presumed factual data, i.e., that Jesus was in his late forties.

John mentions a number of places not found in the synoptics: Bethany beyond Jordan, where John baptized (1:28; cf. 10:40); Aenon near Salim, another place where John baptized (3:23); the city of Sychar (4:5–6); a mountain of Samaria, presumably Gerizim (4:20); the city of Ephraim (11:54). That many such places can no longer be located with certainty does not necessarily mean that they did not exist. In Jerusalem John knows the Sheep Gate Pool (5:2) and the Pool of Siloam (9:7), which can still be identified. He says that Pilate sat in judgment “at a place called the Stone Pavement” (19:13; NRSV). He knows that Jesus was crucified near the city (19:20; Cf. also Heb 13:12: “outside the city gate”). The other gospels show no explicit knowledge of this. The traditional site of Golgotha, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, is outside the city wall of Jesus’ day. John also indicates he has specific knowledge of the temple. For example, in Jesus’ day it had been under (re-)construction for forty-six years (2:20). (It is impossible to say whether the forty-six years apply to Jesus only, to the temple, or to both.) John anticipates the destruction of the temple by the Romans (11:48), which had probably already occurred when he wrote. There seems to be some knowledge of the plan of the temple: the treasury (8:20); Solomon’s Porch (10:23). Also he asserts that Jesus frequently taught there (chaps. 7, 8, 10; 18:20; cf. Mark 14:49).<sup>57</sup>

John tells us that “rabbi” meant “teacher,” as it probably would have in Jesus’ day (1:38; cf. 3:26). He knows that the Pharisees were the leading teachers (3:1.10), in his own day, if not in Jesus’. John knows Jewish feasts other than Passover (5:1; 7:2; 10:22), and he knows that Jesus went up to Jerusalem for other feasts. He knows Exodus traditions (6:31–51). He knows that jars made of stone were used in Jewish rites of purification (2:6). Perhaps most important, John knows about the God of Israel, whom no one has seen (1:18; cf. Exod 33:20; Deut 4:12, 15), although Jesus, who can be seen, is also called theos (1:18; 20:28). Thus John understands that Jesus, and the claims made for him, can be seen as a threat to Jewish, and biblical, monotheism (5:18; 10:33). Yet Jesus is called a Jew by someone other than Pilate (“King of the Jews”), viz. by the Samaritan woman in 4:9, and he can say that “salvation is of [or “from”] the Jews” (4:22).

---

<sup>57</sup> See W. F. Albright, “Recent Discoveries in Palestine and the Gospel of St. John,” in The Background of the New Testament and its Eschatology: In Honour of Charles Harold Dodd, ed. W. D. Davies and D. Daube (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1956), 153–171; also Martin Hengel, “Das Johannesevangelium als Quelle für die Geschichte des antiken Judentums,” in idem, Judaica, Hellenistica et Christiana: Kleine Schriften II, ed., Jörg Frey, Dorothea Betz et al. (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1999), 292–334. Both Albright and Hengel note John’s apparent knowledge of ancient sites and the Gospel’s Jewish context. One should now consult the most recent canvassing of archaeological evidence, James H. Charlesworth, ed., Jesus and Archaeology (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2006), in which the Gospel of John plays a notable role.

Judas (not an uncommon name) is denigrated more in John than in any other gospel (cf. 6:70), as he is mentioned more frequently. His name is given more fully than elsewhere in 6:71 as “Judas son of Simon Iscariot” (RSV, NRSV), although Iscariot may indicate the village of Judas’ origin (e.g., Keriath-hezron in Josh 15:25). Just as Judas is named as the one objecting to the woman’s (in John, Mary’s) using expensive ointment to anoint Jesus’ feet (12:5), so too he is said to be the (thieving) keeper of the money box (12:6). But again, Judas is called the keeper of the money box in 13:29, with no negative insinuation. Perhaps the accusation of his thievery is inserted in order to deal with an awkward fact, that he was known to have been the treasurer of the group. Although it has sometimes been suggested, because of his name, that Judas (Greek, Ioudas; Hebrew, Yehudah) personified “the Jew,” this is nowhere stated or implied in this or any gospel. He is never numbered among the Ioudaioi.

Finally, John’s knowledge of Judaism is not an artificial construct to serve as a foil to his own theology. There is a difference between traditional Judaism and the beliefs of Jesus’ disciples and followers, but John does not caricature the one in presenting the other.<sup>58</sup> One cannot say that John presents the beliefs of “the Jews,” who oppose Jesus and his disciples’ belief in him, in a favorable light. On the other hand, he does not basically misrepresent them. Even in John 8, where the polemic is fiercest, what “the Jews” say to Jesus is understandable on the basis of their premises, and not more derogatory than what Jesus is made to say to them, in fact less so. It is not clear that Jesus has the better of the arguments, unless one accepts his claim to bring a new and determinative revelation. And that is precisely his claim. Moreover, it is a claim, and not proof, exegetical or otherwise. This is the offense of any claim to revelation. It can only be explained, or defended, after the presumed fact.

6. Conclusions

In conclusion it may be useful to rank on a scale from almost certain to inconceivable aspects or items of John’s portrayal of Jesus and his ministry, particularly with respect to points at which the Fourth

---

<sup>58</sup> See D. Moody Smith, “John,” in Early Christian Thought in its Jewish Context (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996), 96–111.

Gospel differs from the synoptics, especially Mark, or presents or omits items found in the latter.<sup>59</sup> By historically preferable (below) is meant that an item or instance in John is more likely than the synoptics to represent accurately the historical figure of Jesus or events or circumstances related to him.

- I. John is almost certainly historically preferable:
  1. In presenting no formal trial of Jesus before Jewish authorities, i.e., the Sanhedrin.
  2. In its explanation of the reasons for opposition to Jesus on the part of the chief priests (11:47–53).
  3. In implying that Jesus was at first a disciple of John (the Baptist) and therefore conducted a concurrent baptizing ministry.
- II. John is probably historically preferable:
  1. In spreading Jesus' ministry or a period of public activity over a period of more than one year rather than less.
  2. In maintaining that he made more Jerusalem visits (for Passover or other festivals) than the one Passover visit reported in the synoptics.
  3. In placing Jesus' crucifixion and death during the day immediately prior to the evening Passover meal rather than the day after.
- III. John is conceivably historically preferable:
  1. In placing the occurrence of the temple cleansing at an early (or earlier) point in Jesus' ministry.
  2. In suggesting Pilate's suspicion, if not contempt, of the motives and goals of the chief priests.
- IV. John's presentation is inconceivable historically in its description of:
  1. Jesus' proclamation of himself as Son of God and his use of the "I am..." phrase to introduce himself and his role.
  2. Jesus' disputes with his opponents over his own dignity and role (but not necessarily disputes over other teaching and miracle-working activity).

---

<sup>59</sup> A precedent for this sort of ranking may be found in E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 326–327. Sanders is, of course, focussing upon the historical Jesus, as presented principally by the synoptic gospels.

3. Jesus' opponents as "the Jews," in apparent distinction from himself and his disciples, and the tendency to equate them with Pharisees.
4. Jesus' proclamation absent the imminent (or future) advent of the kingdom of God.
5. Jesus' teaching absent his characteristic parables.
6. Jesus' distinctively Johannine language and conversational style.
7. Jesus' death as resulting from his raising Lazarus from the dead.

The last category above recalls major aspects of the synoptic portrayal of Jesus. The consensus of modern criticism that the synoptics and the synoptic tradition are in important respects closer to the historical figure of Jesus is not wrong. Our qualification of that view is not a denial of it. Rather, we maintain that in a number of specific instances John, while differing from the synoptics, affords access to historically significant Jesus tradition. The Jesus research of John P. Meier and Paula Fredriksen, cited frequently above, strikingly illustrates this fact.

Finally, we return to the issues noted at the beginning: What is the source of the authority of John's witness? What is the relation of John to the synoptic gospels?

The Gospel claims to be based on the testimony of a truthful witness (21:24), apparently one who has seen what he has testified to (cf. 21:20; 19:35). (Also 1 John 1:1–4, while probably not written by the Evangelist, indicates how the Johannine witness was first understood.) The sharp debate over the historicity of this Gospel a century ago, which has not yet died out, presumes the seriousness of this claim, either to affirm or to deny it. The debate is, of course, integrally related to the question of whether the Beloved Disciple is a historical figure or the personification of the true witness. Traditionally, this disciple has been assumed to be a historical figure, ultimately identified with John. Our assessment of Jesus tradition in the Gospel of John must, however, leave the issue of the identity of the Beloved Disciple unresolved.

There is, finally, a certain antinomy or tension in our assessment. On the one hand, the distinctive Johannine portrayal of Jesus, his opponents, and controversies does not accurately represent the historical figure of Jesus or his milieu. Its several aspects are virtually unique to John; they do not match with the criterion of dissimilarity; they do not cohere with what is said about the earthly Jesus elsewhere in the New Testament, not only in the gospels, but also by Paul.<sup>60</sup> While Paul shares with John the belief that God sent his Son, and that he therefore descended to earth and ascended to heaven, he does not understand his ministry as the manifestation of his glory (contrast John 1:14; 2:11), but of his humiliation (Phil 2:7–8). The earthly Jesus was for Paul a Jewish man (but cf. John 4:9), a human being, “born of woman, born under the law” (Gal 4:4). Paul did not think explicitly in terms of incarnation. On the other hand, John’s narrative, as distinct from the portrayal of Jesus, often appears quite plausible historically just at those points at which it differs from Mark or the synoptics. Arguably, John presents factual data that are irrelevant to his theological purposes or even contravene them.

The tension between the portrayal of Jesus and the possibly factual data in the narrative of his ministry is understandable if one discerns the two levels of John’s Gospel: the historical past, what happened in the time of Jesus, and the historical present, what was going on with Jesus in the community in which the Gospel was written. This Jesus of the historical present is the exalted Christ, who continues to address and guide his followers through the Spirit, the Paraclete. The Spirit-Paraclete holds the two levels together.<sup>61</sup> Is it not reasonable to suppose that the guidance of the Spirit began quite early in the history of the Johannine community of Jesus’ disciples? Thus they were emboldened to make astounding Christological claims and to defend them when they came under attack. Yet John 21:24 and 1 John 1:1–4 imply that the Spirit does not overrule the testimony of the eyewitness generation.<sup>62</sup>

As to the question of John’s relation to the synoptics, the peculiar sense of spiritual authority that produced this Gospel already suggests a basis for its apparent independence from the others. John represents a unique gospel development based on the same person and events, and on related tradition, but reflecting a different life setting and

---

<sup>60</sup> On Jesus tradition in Paul, see Dale C. Allison, “The Pauline Epistles and the Synoptic Gospels: The Pattern of the Parallels,” NTS 28 (1982): 1–32.

<sup>61</sup> As J. Louis Martyn pointed out, History and Theology, 140.

<sup>62</sup> On this point see the important article of Theo K. Heckel, “Die Historisierung der johanneischen Theologie im Ersten Johannesbrief,” NTS 50 (2004): 425–443, esp. 440–443. On the relationship between history and spirit inspiration in the Gospel of John, see Robert G. Hall, Revealed History: Techniques for Ancient Jewish and Christian Historiography, JSPSup 6 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1991), esp. 209–236.

experience of the work of the Spirit. It is then unnecessary to suppose that John had no knowledge of the existence or content of the other gospels; but they were at most at the periphery of his vision. John is an independent Gospel, and its claim to be based on an independent witness is worth taking seriously.

JESUS TRADITION IN THE LETTERS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

DAVID WENHAM

1. The Data

1.1. Very Probable Traditions

In all of the New Testament letters there are only six instances where stories or sayings of Jesus are clearly and explicitly referred to, four of them (interestingly) in 1 Corinthians.

In 1 Corinthians 7, Paul is responding to the view of some in the Corinthian church that Christians should not indulge in sexual intercourse and indeed that married Christians should separate from their partners. Paul has no time for this view, and refers to the teaching of Jesus against divorce and remarriage: “to the married I give this command—not I but the Lord—that the wife should not separate from her husband (but if she does separate, let her remain unmarried or else be reconciled to her husband), and that the husband should not divorce his wife” (7:10, 11).

In 1 Corinthians 9, Paul is speaking about his apostleship and about his own decision to work with his own hands and not to live off what he might earn from his teaching; in the course of that discussion he comments that “the Lord commanded that those who proclaim the gospel should get their living by the gospel” (v. 14). He is probably referring back to the teaching that Jesus gives to his disciples when he sends them out in mission, according to the gospels, since he tells them that “the labourer is worthy of his hire/food” (Matt 10:10; Luke 10:7). That saying of Jesus is also echoed in 1 Tim 5:18, though there it is found alongside a quotation from the Old Testament and both are introduced, interestingly, by the words “For the Scripture says.”

In 1 Corinthians 11, Paul is commenting on the disgraceful and selfish behaviour of some in the context of the eucharist, and he reminds them that “I received from the Lord what I also delivered to you, that the Lord Jesus on the night that he was betrayed took bread...” Paul goes on to describe the institution of the Last Supper in a way that is closely parallel to the account of the Supper in the synoptic gospels, and particularly to Luke’s account. (1 Cor 11:23–26, Luke 22:19, 20).

In 1 Corinthians 15, Paul addresses the doubts of some of the Corinthians about the resurrection of the dead by reminding them of the gospel which he preached to them: “For I delivered to you as of first importance what I also received: that Christ died for our sins in accordance with the Scriptures, that he was buried, that he was raised on the third day...” (vv. 3–8). Paul goes on to list people to whom the risen Jesus appeared, including himself as the last and extraordinary witness (15:1–8). Paul’s list does not correspond exactly to the resurrection appearances in the gospels, but it corresponds partly to the Lukan account (with its reference to Jesus appearing to Peter and to the twelve, Luke 24:34–36).

In the non-Pauline letters the one unambiguous reference to Jesus’ life is 2 Pet 1:16–18 on the transfiguration of Jesus: “We had been eyewitnesses of his majesty. For he received honour and glory from God the Father when that voice was conveyed to him by the Majestic Glory, saying ‘This is my Son, my Beloved, with whom I am well pleased’.”

Most scholars (though not quite all) agree that in the four passages from 1 Corinthians and in the verses from 1 Timothy and 2 Peter we have conscious use of traditions of Jesus that were passed down in the early church.

1.2. Relatively Probable Traditions

Many recognize other traditions of Jesus in the letters, whether deliberately alluded to or unconsciously echoed. In the Pauline corpus some of the strongest cases include 1 Cor 13:2 on mountain-moving faith, compare Jesus’ words in Matthew 17:20, also 1 Thess 5:2, where Paul refers to the day of the Lord coming like a thief in the night, compare the parable of Jesus found in Matt 24:43, 44/Luke 12:39, 40 (also 2 Pet 3:10). In Gal 4:6 Paul speaks of God having “sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, crying ‘Abba! Father!’”; the use of the Aramaic word Abba in this Greek letter, as also in Rom 8:15, suggests that we have here an echo of Jesus’ own distinctive usage (Mark 14:36). Romans 12 is another strong case, with Paul’s teaching on blessing persecutors and repaying no one evil for evil being strikingly similar to Jesus' teaching in the Sermon on the Mount/Plain (Rom 12:14, 17 Matt 5:38–47, Luke 6:27–35; compare 1 Pet 3:9).<sup>1</sup>

In the letter of James, the Sermon on the Mount may be echoed in Jas 2:5 on the poor inheriting the kingdom, and in 5:12 on not swearing (compare Matthew 5:34 and possibly 2 Cor 1:17–20). In 1 Peter too there are parallels to the Sermon on the Mount, including 2:12 on good deeds bringing glory to God (compare Matt 5:16), 3:9 on not returning evil for evil, 3:14; 4:13–14 on the blessedness of faithful suffering (compare Matt 5:10–12). In 2 Pet 3:10 there is the reference to the Lord coming like a thief. The letter to the Hebrews 5:5–7 may be referring to the story of Jesus in Gethsemane, when it records that “in the days of his flesh Jesus offered up prayers and supplications with loud cries and tears, to him who was able to save him from death...”

1.3. Other Possible Traditions

Even if all of these passages are included in the tally of Jesus traditions found in the letters, they do not add up to a very large number. However, some scholars have detected very many more Jesus traditions in the letters; it has been argued, for example, that Paul draws extensively on Jesus' eschatological teaching in 1 Thess 4:13–5:11 and 2 Thess 2:1–10,<sup>2</sup> that he echoes several parts of Jesus' mission discourses of Matthew 10/Luke 9 and 10 in 1 Corinthians 9,<sup>3</sup> that his argument in Galatians 1 and 2 reflects knowledge of Peter's commissioning by Jesus in Matt 16:16–20, with Paul explaining that like Peter he has had a

---

<sup>1</sup> For the history of the Jesus-Paul question see S. G. Wilson, “From Jesus to Paul: The Contours and Consequences of a Debate,” in From Jesus to Paul: Studies in Honour of Francis Wright Beare, ed. P. Richardson and J. C. Hurd (Waterloo, ON: Laurier, 1984), 1–21. Also V. P. Furnish, “The Jesus-Paul Debate: From Baur to Bultmann,” in Paul and Jesus. Collected Essays, ed. A. J. M. Wedderburn (Sheffield: JSOT, 1989) 17–50; originally in BJRL 47 (1964–65): 342–381. Also R. Riesner, “Paulus und die Jesus-Überlieferung,” in Evangelium—Schriftauslegung—Kirche: Festschrift für Peter Stuhlmacher zum 65. Geburtstag, ed. J. Ådna, S. J. Hafemann and O. Hofius (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997), 347–365.

<sup>2</sup> E.g., compare the trumpet and the clouds in 1 Thess 4:16, 17 with Matt 24:30–31; also the man of lawlessness and his signs in 2 Thess 2:8 with the abomination of desolation in Mark 13:14–22, both the man and the abomination being reminiscent of the desecration of the temple by Antiochus Epiphanes in 167 BC.

<sup>3</sup> E.g., note the discussion of “authority” (exousia) and of food and drink in 1 Cor 9:1, 4 and Luke 9:1; 10:7.

revelation of Jesus and has been commissioned by him.<sup>4</sup> Paul has been thought to know the traditions of Jesus' virginal conception,<sup>5</sup> and the famous servant sayings of Mark 10:42–45 (1 Cor 9:19).<sup>6</sup> Both Paul and 1 Peter have been thought to show knowledge of Jesus "new commandment" about loving one another (Gal 6:2, "the law of Christ," 1 Pet 3:8), and 1 Peter has been linked to the Johannine story of Jesus washing the disciples' feet (1 Pet 5:5, compare John 13:1–17, Phil 2:5–11).

Many more parallels between the sayings of Jesus and teaching in the letters have been noted and considered significant by scholars.<sup>7</sup>

2. Questions of Method

Scholars differ hugely in their evaluation of this evidence. Some are minimalists and argue that few of the parallels, apart from the first category, are probable and conscious uses of the Jesus tradition. Others are maximalists and identify most or all of the parallels as Jesus traditions. Many other scholars take a mediating position.

This divergence of opinion among scholars raises acutely the question of method. How are we to assess whether a verse or passage in the letters is an echo or allusion to a verse or a passage in the gospels? Parallel ideas and even parallel phrases do not prove a direct relationship at all: great minds think alike, and similar ideas are found in all sorts of ancient and modern literature; in the case of the gospels and the letters, they were written in the same first-century Greco-Roman world, and similarity between, say, Jesus traditions and Pauline teaching may be due to the fact that both Jesus and Paul came out of the same first-century Jewish circles and were influenced by the same Hellenistic-Jewish ideas and traditions (including the Old Testament).

---

<sup>4</sup> E.g., J. Chapman, "St Paul and the Revelation to St Peter, Matt XVI,17," Revue Bénédictine 29 (1912): 133–147; see also J. Dupont, "La Révélation du Fils de Dieu en faveur de Pierre (Mt 16,17) et de Paul (Ga 1,16)," RSR 52 (1964): 411–420.

<sup>5</sup> Compare Gal 4:4 with the Lukan infancy narrative in Luke 1 and 2. On this and others of the examples from Paul and for relevant bibliography see D. Wenham, Paul Follower of Jesus or Founder of Christianity? (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1995).

<sup>6</sup> Also Tit 2:14, compare 1 Peter 1:18.

<sup>7</sup> Famously, A. Resch identified 1,158 Jesus traditions in Paul's letters in his Der Paulinismus und die Logia Jesus (Leipzig: Hinrichs, 1905).

If, however, it does seem that there is a definite relationship between a Jesus tradition and something in the letters, this still leaves important questions unanswered. One question is about the direction of the relationship: it cannot be assumed that it must be a case of Jesus influencing Paul or Peter or whoever. It could be that the gospel writers in describing Jesus and his teaching have in fact been influenced by Paul: his letters are usually seen as the earliest New Testament writings, and the evangelists (e.g., Mark and Luke, who in early Christian tradition were involved with Paul and his ministry) may have put Pauline ideas into Jesus' mouth.<sup>8</sup>

The gospels are often seen by scholars as highly coloured accounts of Jesus' life and teaching, in which traditions of the historical Jesus have been overlaid with later church teaching; so the critic examining parallels between gospel traditions and things found in the letters has to consider whether the gospel tradition in question does in fact go back to Jesus, and in what form, before he or she can make a judgment about the relationship between that tradition and one found in the epistles.

If the conclusion is that the relationship is one of dependence on a Jesus tradition, there is yet another question about the nature of the dependence. It may be plausible to link something in the letters to a Jesus tradition, but that does not mean that the writer of the letter is consciously quoting from Jesus. It may be that the Jesus tradition became part of the regular teaching and preaching of the early church, and that it came to Paul or James or Peter in that way (without their necessarily being aware of its origins).

Given the complexity of the issues, it is not surprising that scholars have reached differing conclusions. The danger is that scholars will reach conclusions more on the basis of their prejudices or hunches than on any more objective grounds. What is desirable is to come up with some objective criteria for identifying a significant parallel.

The scholar who has most recently suggested such criteria is Michael Thompson in his book Clothed with Christ.<sup>9</sup> He argues, among other things, that the critic should look for distinctive verbal, formal and conceptual agreements between the texts being compared, for evidence that the writer of the letter may be using tradition (“tradition indicators”), and for evidence that the tradition or traditions supposedly being used have a high claim to being authentic teachings of Jesus (pp. 30–36).

---

<sup>8</sup> This is argued among others by M. Goulder for Matthew in his Midrash and Lektion in Matthew (London: SPCK, 1974), 153–170, and for Luke in his Luke: A New Paradigm (Sheffield: JSOT, 1989), 129–146.

<sup>9</sup> Clothed with Christ: The Example and Teaching of Jesus in Romans 12.1–15.13 (Sheffield: JSOT, 1991). Also on method see B. Fjärstedt, Synoptic Tradition in 1 Corinthians: Themes and Clusters of Theme Words in 1 Corinthians 1–4 and 9 (Uppsala: Teologiska fakultetet, 1974).

3. Different Approaches and Conclusions

3.1. Minimalist Approaches

Those scholars who tend towards what may be called a “minimalist” approach make some or all of the following points:

1. It is recognized that there are Jesus traditions in the letters in places where there are unmistakable “tradition indicators.” Thus, in the case of the Last Supper and Resurrection traditions in 1 Corinthians chapters 11 and 15 Paul quite specifically refers to having “received” and “passed on” the relevant stories and sayings of Jesus. Similarly, in 1 Cor 7:10, 11 Paul says that the teaching on divorce comes from the Lord: it is as though he has open inverted commas, when he says “not I but the Lord,” and then closed inverted commas when he proceeds in v. 12 to say “But to the rest I say—I and not the Lord...”
2. But even in the few cases where a Jesus tradition is probably being cited, this does not prove that the saying in question actually goes back to Jesus. For example, the Last Supper was presumably part of the liturgical tradition which was passed on in Paul’s churches and by Paul himself, but whether Jesus himself instituted the Supper in the way suggested by Paul and the synoptic gospels and with the words found in 1 Corinthians 11 is debated by scholars. The Jesus Seminar of scholars found neither the eucharistic words in the Last Supper narrative nor Jesus’ teaching on divorce to be probably authentic teaching of the historical Jesus.<sup>10</sup>

---

<sup>10</sup> R. W. Funk and R. W. Hoover, The Five Gospels: The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus (Toronto: Macmillan, 1993).

3. There are very few other instances where use of a Jesus tradition can be confidently identified.<sup>11</sup> Even where some have seen a tradition indicator, the case is unproven. So in 1 Thessalonians 4:15 Paul introduces his teaching about the lot of the Christian dead with the words “this we declare to you by a word from the Lord.” Although this could be Paul appealing to a tradition of Jesus, there is no known saying of Jesus about the resurrection of Christians who have died, and so, unless Paul has in mind a saying of Jesus that has been lost to us, he may well be referring to a Christian prophecy or indeed to his own insight that he has gained “from the Lord.”
4. Even where there does seem to be a connection between a gospel tradition and something in the letters, the direction of dependence does not have to be from Jesus to the letter writer. Thus the comparison of Jesus’ coming to the unexpected arrival of a thief is found in Matthew, Luke, 1 Thessalonians 4 and 2 Peter, and, although Jesus could be the originator of the tradition, it could equally well be that the direction of dependence is from Paul to the other later texts. Even if this is not the case, it could still be a case of different authors drawing on early Christian teaching which does not in fact go back to Jesus.
5. The failure of the letter writers to attribute supposed dominical sayings and traditions to Jesus is odd, if their dominical origin was known. So is their failure to cite Jesus’ teaching in contexts where it could have added decisive weight to their argument. For example, the gospels suggest that Jesus had a lot to say about the Christian use of and attitude to money, but it is not quoted either by Paul in 2 Corinthians 8 and 9, where Paul argues at length for cheerful Christian giving, nor by the author of James, when he speaks about rich and poor (4:13–5:6).<sup>12</sup> Similarly odd is their failure to make much of themes and ideas that seem to have been important in

---

<sup>11</sup> Those tending to a minimalist reading of the evidence include N. Walter, “Paul and the Early Christian Jesus tradition,” in Paul and Jesus: Collected Essays, ed. A. J. M. Wedderburn (Sheffield: JSOT, 1989), 51–80, also F. Neiryck, “Paul and the Sayings of Jesus,” in L’Apôtre Paul, ed. A. Vanhoye (Leuven: Leuven UP, 1986), 265–321, and C. M. Tuckett, “1 Corinthians and Q,” JBL 102 (1983): 607–618, also “Paul and the Synoptic Mission Discourse?,” ETL 60 (1984): 376–381, also “Synoptic Tradition in 1 Thessalonians,” in The Thessalonian Correspondence, ed. R. F. Collins (Leuven: Leuven UP, 1990), 160–182.

<sup>12</sup> But there is some similar language used about laying up treasure in Matt 6:19, 20, Luke 12:33, 34 and in Jas 5:3 and 1 Tim 6:19.

Jesus' teaching; for example, it is surprising that Paul's references to the "kingdom of God" are so few, if Paul was seriously interested in or dependent on Jesus traditions. In short, the silence of the letters with regard to Jesus traditions is deafening!

What do these "minimalist" observations suggest about the early church? Some have argued that the earliest Christians were uninterested in the Jesus of history, and that this is reflected in the absence of Jesus tradition in the letters. William Wrede famously argued that Paul's religion was different from Jesus and that Paul should be seen as the real founder of Christianity as we know it.<sup>13</sup> Paul's own religious experience led him to portray Jesus as the superhuman Son of God who came to redeem humankind; he took the idea of Jesus dying and rising from the Christian tradition, and used it in his theological synthesis. But he ended up with a Jesus quite different from the Galilean prophet, and he was not very interested in him. Wrede's view has been challenged; but the view that Paul's religion was quite different from that of Jesus has had its supporters up until the present day, with one contemporary scholar, Maurice Casey, giving his book on Jesus the title From Jewish Prophet to Gentile God.<sup>14</sup> Paul in particular is thought to have been influenced by his own mystical experience on the Damascus Road, and probably also by Hellenistic religion, including the mystery religions with their rituals that have some parallels to Christian baptism and eucharist.<sup>15</sup>

Nor is Paul seen to be in a category on his own: it is argued that the first Christians generally were interested in the risen Christ of their experience and in the future coming of Christ, for which they were looking, rather than in the Palestinian traditions of Jesus. Historical interest in Jesus developed relatively slowly, as time passed and the Lord failed to return and his immediate followers started to die.

This view explains the paucity of references to the historical Jesus in the letters, and in particular the paucity of references to his ministry before his passion. Traditions of Jesus' death and resurrection had a place in the liturgical life of the church, but the interest in these traditions was liturgical rather than historical, and there was very little interest in pre-passion traditions.

---

<sup>13</sup> William Wrede, Paul (London: Green, 1907).

<sup>14</sup> Cambridge: Clarke, 1991.

<sup>15</sup> The title of H. Maccoby's book makes the point: The Mythmaker: Paul and the Invention of Christianity (London: Weidenfeld & Nicholson, 1986).

Rudolf Bultmann saw this lack of interest in Jesus' history as articulated explicitly by Paul in 2 Cor 5:16, where he says: "even if we knew Christ according to the flesh, now however we no longer know him."

Paul saw the preaching of Christ as the saving good news and the grounds for faith, not the historical story of Jesus.<sup>16</sup>

3.2. Moderate Views

The radical views of Wrede or Bultmann represent one end of a scholarly spectrum. Many who do not accept their views about the unimportance of the historical Jesus for the earliest Christians still believe that Paul was relatively uninterested in the ministry of Jesus: there may be more genuine echoes than the minimalists allow, but even if some or all of the "probable" category (above) are accepted, they do not add up to a lot.

Various explanations of this have been offered. It could partly be a reflection of Paul's own experience. He does not seem to have heard or met Jesus during his lifetime, and so he could not speak about Jesus' ministry and teaching from personal experience. There is evidence that this was held against him by his critics in the early church (e.g., in Galatians 1 and 2, where he defends his gospel and argues that he is as valid an apostle as Peter). But Paul sees his Damascus Road experience as more than making up for his supposed deficiencies: in his view (a) it gave him first-hand experience of Jesus risen from the dead; it is not surprising that he therefore focussed his teaching on the death and resurrection of Jesus; (b) it was a revelatory experience in a wider sense; Paul claims in Gal 1:12 that his "gospel" came to him through this divine revelation; traditions of Jesus passed on by flesh and blood, i.e., human agents, do not seem to come into the picture; (c) it made him an apostle commissioned by Jesus, with authority. In this context it is not hard to see how Paul may have seen the traditions of the historical Jesus as relatively unimportant: he focused his teaching on the gospel he received personally, and he taught with confident apostolic authority, not often referring back to sayings or stories of Jesus.

---

<sup>16</sup> In his essay "The Significance of the Historical Jesus for the Theology of Paul," in Faith and Understanding: Collected Essays (London: SCM, 1969), Bultmann argued that "Jesus' teaching is—to all intents and purposes—irrelevant for Paul" (23). On 2 Corinthians 5:21, see his The Second Letter to the Corinthians (Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1985), 155–156; against this view see among others C. Wolff, "True Apostolic Knowledge of Christ: Exegetical Reflections on 2 Corinthians 5.14ff.," in Paul and Jesus: Collected Essays, ed. A. J. M. Wedderburn (Sheffield: JSOT, 1989), 81–98.

It has been suggested that Paul's non-use of Jesus traditions may also have to do with the opposition that he faced in the early church:<sup>17</sup> his opponents accused him of being a second-hand apostle, who had not been taught by Jesus, and they claimed the Jesus tradition for themselves; so Paul deliberately and strategically refrained from making a lot of such tradition.

One of the difficulties with this last view is that it is not just Paul who refrains from using the Jesus tradition. All of the New Testament letters exhibit the same sort of reticence, and the special circumstances that could explain Paul's diffidence would not obviously apply to the authors of Hebrews, James, 1 and 2 Peter, or 1–3 John.<sup>18</sup> What is particularly intriguing about these non-Pauline letters is that three of them purport to come from people who had first-hand eyewitness knowledge of Jesus, and yet they hardly refer at all to his life and teaching. This could be seen as evidence that they do not in fact come from eyewitnesses; but it is almost as odd, if not more so, if letters written pseudonymously in the name of eyewitnesses fail to exploit that idea with supposed eyewitness testimony (with the honourable exception of 2 Pet 1:16, 17.).

In the case of 1 John the letter has a lot in common with the Gospel of John (stylistically and thematically), and it is held by many that the letter is clearing up theological misunderstandings coming out of the Gospel. If this theory is right, it is all the more notable that the author of the letter does not quote any saying from the Gospel at all. In his case it cannot be that he is uninterested in or uninformed about the traditions.<sup>19</sup>

3.3. Maximalist Approaches and Conclusions

D. Alfred Resch was probably the most famous (or notorious) “maximalist.”<sup>20</sup> He saw very widespread use of Jesus traditions all over the

<sup>17</sup> See for example H. W. Kuhn, “Der irdische Jesus bei Paulus als traditionsgeschichtliches und theologisches Problem,” ZTK 67 (1970): 295–320.

<sup>18</sup> A similar paucity of quotation is evidenced in most Christian literature until the mid second century; so Riesner, “Paulus und die Jesus-Überlieferung,” 356, n. 7. G. N. Stanton notes that Luke's second volume Acts similarly contains very little Jesus tradition, Jesus of Nazareth in New Testament Preaching (Cambridge: CUP, 1974), 113.

<sup>19</sup> On 1 John see R. E. Brown, The Epistles of John: Anchor Bible (London: Geoffrey Chapman, 1982), 157–159.

<sup>20</sup> Der Paulinismus.

Pauline epistles, but he arguably brought that view into some disrepute by a lack of critical rigour in his approach. In recent times there have been scholars who have argued for a similarly generous view, while trying to offer critically sustainable arguments for that view.<sup>21</sup>

They make various points:

- (1) Some of the evidence for the use of Jesus traditions is almost indisputable (see above). The Last Supper account in 1 Corinthians 11 is an example of this, with several of Thompson's criteria being operative: there is agreement of wording and content, there is a tradition indicator, and the tradition of the supper is well attested in the gospels (despite the conclusion of the Jesus Seminar). The teaching on divorce in 1 Cor 7:10, 11 scores highly in a similar way, with Paul arguably echoing the tradition of Mark 10:11, 12/ Matt 19:9.
- (2) Given this evidence and the explicit admission by Paul that he received and passed on traditions, others of the "probable" sayings are indeed very probable! Thus the comparison of the day of the Lord coming like a thief in 1 Thess 5:2 might not be derived from the Jesus tradition in the gospels, and yet (a) there is a possible, albeit oblique, tradition indicator in Paul's introduction: "you yourselves are fully aware that the day of the Lord will come like a thief in the night," (b) the idea of Jesus coming like a thief is one that is unlikely to have come from the church who saw Jesus as Lord; it is likely to have come from Jesus himself, who often used striking parabolic imagery,<sup>22</sup> (c) the gospel saying in question is attested both by Matthew and Luke, which according to conventional source criticism indicates that it is Q material and so early Jesus tradition. Similarly, Paul's use of "Abba" need not have come from Jesus, and yet (a) the use of the Aramaic in a Greek text, (b) the distinctiveness of the usage, and (c) the fact that Paul specifically says in Gal 4:6 that it is the Spirit of Jesus that inspires the Christian to cry "Abba" all make it likely that the usage came from Jesus and that Paul knew this.

---

<sup>21</sup> See the writings of Kim, Riesner, Thompson and Wenham among others.

<sup>22</sup> So C. H. Dodd, "The Primitive Catechesis and the Sayings of Jesus," in More New Testament Studies (Manchester: UP, 1968), 69–83.

- (3) If such evidence is accepted, then other “possible” Jesus traditions gain in plausibility; the argument is cumulative. For example, if Paul’s reference to the thief in 1 Thess 5:2 is seen as echoing Jesus’ parable, then we may be more inclined to recognize Paul’s preceding words “this we declare to you by a word from the Lord” (4:15) as a reference to teaching of Jesus. The difficulty is in identifying teaching of Jesus in the gospels that speaks about what will happen to the faithful departed; however, one serious possibility is that it is alluding to the parable of the ten virgins, five of whom are wise and who “rise up” after sleep to go to “meet” and to “be with” the bridegroom (Matt 25:1–13); there are intriguing verbal and conceptual parallels between the parable and Paul’s teaching. Other possible tradition indicators include Rom 14:14, where Paul speaks of being “persuaded in the Lord Jesus that nothing is unclean,” and where he may be referring to Jesus’ teaching about clean and uncleanness, interpreting it in a similar way to Mark (Mark 7:1, 23), and Gal 6:2, where Paul urges the Galatians to “bear one another’s burdens and so fulfil the law of Christ”; the phrase “the law of Christ” could allude to Jesus’ strong endorsement of the Old Testament law “You shall love your neighbour as yourself” (e.g., Mark 12:31), or to his instruction to his disciples about mutual service and his new commandment referred to in John’s Gospel, viz. “love one another as I have loved you” (e.g., John 13:34).
- (4) The cumulative nature of the argument is reinforced if we find a lot of probable echoes and possible echoes in one particular letter or part of a letter; the likelihood that they are real echoes, not coincidental parallels, increases. For example, 1 Corinthians and James have a particular preponderance of parallels to gospel traditions. As for particular passages, in 1 Thessalonians 4 and 5 there are not only the two probable echoes of parables of Jesus that we noted, but many other parallels to Jesus’ eschatological teaching. In 1 Corinthians 9 there is one indisputable echo of Jesus’ teaching, but there are a number of other possible echoes of Jesus’ mission discourse; it is arguable that Paul is reflecting on the whole discourse, not just on isolated sayings.<sup>23</sup>

---

<sup>23</sup> On the mission discourse see D. Dungan, The Sayings of Jesus in the Churches of Paul (Oxford: Blackwell, 1971), 3–80; on 1 Corinthians 1–4 see the argument of Fjärstedt, Synoptic Tradition in 1 Corinthians.

- (5) The opposite side to that coin is that, if we find a large number of probable or possible echoes of a particular section of gospel tradition in the letters, then this may add to the likelihood that this is not a coincidence. We have observed how Jesus' eschatological teaching and parables are echoed a lot in 1 Thess 4 and 5, but also elsewhere (1 Cor 4:1–2, 2 Peter 3:10). But perhaps most important of all under this heading is the very wide range of parallels between the Sermon on the Mount and Paul's letters (e.g., in Romans 12), the first epistle of Peter and especially the letter of James.<sup>24</sup>

What conclusions can be drawn on the basis of these points? It is argued, first, that the supposed silence of the letters about Jesus' ministry and teaching is nothing of the sort. The explicit quotations are few, but the probable and possible echoes are extensive, almost as extensive as the gospels themselves!

It is argued, secondly, that there is good evidence that traditions of Jesus were systematically passed down and taught by Paul and others when they took the gospel to churches. This is most explicit in the Last Supper and resurrection traditions of 1 Corinthians 11 and 15, but it will not do to argue that these are liturgical rather than historical traditions: a phrase like "on the night that he was betrayed" points to the story of Jesus being narrated. When the good news of Jesus was preached, people will have wanted to know, and will have been told, the story of Jesus.<sup>25</sup>

It is argued, thirdly, that the failure of the letters to refer explicitly to Jesus traditions, which could seem the Achilles heel of the maximalist approach, is precisely because the traditions were well-known and could be taken for granted. What we find therefore in the letters are occasional reminders of the Jesus tradition, in specific contexts, but the frequent allusions and echoes point to Jesus traditions having been incorporated into the thinking and teaching of the church in a way that reflects their importance.

---

<sup>24</sup> D. C. Allison argues that Paul draws particularly on (a) the Sermon on the Plain, (b) the Mission Discourse, (c) the sayings of Mark 9:35–50, (d) the Passion narrative; see his "The Pauline Epistles and the Synoptic Gospels: The Pattern of Parallels," NTS 28 (1982): 1–32.

<sup>25</sup> Indeed it is arguable that the good news was essentially the story of Jesus (compare the shape of Rom 1:3,4 with the shape of a gospel like Matthew). It is not possible to prove what form the story will have taken, but it is likely to have been the big story (from Jesus' birth to his resurrection), not just selected highlights (cf. Rom 1:3, 4, Gal 4:4, 5).

The word occasional is important in this connection. The letters of the New Testament are mostly letters addressing specific issues, and the context determines the contents, including the use of Jesus traditions. Thus 1 Corinthians is the only one of Paul's letters that ever refers to the Eucharist, and the only reason Paul discusses the Eucharist and quotes the relevant Jesus tradition is because of the problems that there were in the Corinthian church. Had it not been for these problems, Paul would not have used the Jesus tradition, and indeed we would have no indication that Paul or his churches knew of or celebrated the Lord's Supper. There is silence on this matter in the other letters, but we would be foolish to conclude that the Eucharist was unknown in other Pauline churches. We would be foolish to conclude too much from other silences in the letters.

It may seem curious to argue from the lack of explicit Jesus tradition in the letters to the conclusion that the tradition was very well known indeed. Paul quotes the Old Testament frequently and explicitly in support of his arguments, but not the Jesus traditions; does this not suggest something about their relative importance for him? It could certainly reflect the fact that Paul the ex-Pharisee is still influenced much more by Jewish tradition than by Jesus tradition. On the other hand, the explanation could be almost the opposite, namely that the story and sayings of Jesus were the living gospel which Christians were taught by Paul and others, so Paul and other New Testament letter-writers can and do presuppose knowledge of that oral tradition, whereas the written Scriptures of the Old Testament were the backdrop but not the focus of the Christian teaching and so could not be taken for granted in the same way.

It sometimes seems as though there is a gulf fixed between the gospels and the letters of the New Testament, with the gospels full of traditions of Jesus and the letters apparently silent. But that apparent gulf may testify to the obvious fact that in the gospels and the letters we have two quite different genres of writing.<sup>26</sup> The writing of the letters was a quite different exercise from the process of handing down traditions of Jesus (which in due course produced the gospels); the largely allusive references to the Jesus traditions that we find in the letters are only to be expected.

---

<sup>26</sup> The letters at least of Paul are usually seen as having been written before the gospels. But where, then, were the gospel traditions during the early period when the letters were being written? If Paul and others were not interested or even well informed about Jesus, who was interested enough to preserve the traditions in such a way that they would be available to the gospel writers? Were there some Christians who were

Whether the echoes of Jesus in the letters are conscious echoes, or whether the teaching and stories of Jesus have become so much part of the theological and ethical thinking of the early church that the dominical origin of certain phrases or ideas has been forgotten, is impossible to prove. On the maximalist view, it is entirely likely that Jesus' teaching will have become part of the theological and ethical currency of the early church, given Jesus' unquestioned impact as a teacher. But for the same reason, it is also likely that the early Christians will have been aware that many of their ideas came from Jesus. In support of this is the evidence in the letters, e.g., the "tradition indicators," which points to traditions of Jesus being deliberately passed on in the church, and also the evidence of the gospels, which in themselves show that Jesus traditions were preserved and remembered as coming from Jesus. So although there is no need to assume that there is a deliberate allusion to the Jesus tradition every time a letter has a parallel phrase or idea to something found in the gospels, still it is intrinsically likely that it is often a direct or indirect echo. And given that gospels attribute the phrase or idea to Jesus, it is simpler to explain the parallel in that way than to appeal to unspecified Christian tradition, which the gospels then attributed to Jesus. The maximalist approach claims in its favour that it takes seriously Jesus as an influential teacher and the probability, confirmed by the existence of the gospels, that traditions about Jesus were important in the early church.

4. Some Implications

The question of Jesus traditions in the letters is of considerable importance. Should it be right that the earliest Christians were not very interested in the historical Jesus, then this is something that must be interested, and others who were not? B. Gerhardsson argues, on the contrary, that the gulf between gospels and letters is because the letters are dealing with particular issues in the church and were never intended to be passing down traditions of Jesus. See his "The Path of the Gospel Tradition," in The Gospel and the Gospels, ed. P. Stuhlmacher (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1991), 75–96.

---

weighed in understanding and expressing Christian faith today. S. G. Wilson, for example, comes to the quite dramatic conclusion that “we are forced to fall back on a mythological figure (the Christ of faith, Pauline or otherwise) and adopt a position which verges on the docetic.”<sup>27</sup>

Should it be right that the earliest Christians were very interested in the historical Jesus and that the letters are full of echoes of Jesus’ teaching and allusions to his ministry, then this too is important. It is important theologically, indicating the importance of history and in particular the history and teaching of Jesus to Christian faith. It is important ethically, if Jesus’ life was seen as an example to follow and his teaching as instruction to be obeyed.<sup>28</sup>

It is also important historically, since the letters may be key evidence in discussions of the historical Jesus and of gospel origins—we do not just have a synoptic problem focussing on the first three canonical gospels, but something much broader, and maybe much more promising.<sup>29</sup>

It is also important hermeneutically, not only because, on this view, the letters were written presupposing gospel traditions and so need to be read in that light, but also because they give us a glimpse into how the earliest Christians used the traditions of Jesus. It has been argued that the letters presuppose arguments going on in the church over the interpretation of different sayings of Jesus (e.g., over Paul’s claim to apostleship in Galatians 1 and 2, Jesus’ teaching about clean and unclean food, Rom 14:14, and about his instruction on the payment of gospel teachers, 1 Cor 9:14). This says something about the impor-

---

<sup>27</sup> Wilson, “From Jesus to Paul,” 21.

<sup>28</sup> See on this L. Hurtado, “Jesus as Lordly Example in Philippians 2:5–11,” in From Jesus to Paul, ed. Richardson and Hurd, 113–126.

<sup>29</sup> For example, R. Bauckham argues that the account of the transfiguration in 2 Peter is primitive and independent of the gospel accounts, Word Biblical Commentary 50: Jude and 2 Peter (Waco: Word, 1983), 148. Bauckham notes other allusions to gospel traditions in 2 Pet 1:14; 2:20; 3:10). It is arguable that various scholars have been hampered in their engagement with the question of Jesus traditions because of their prior commitments to particular views of the synoptic problem. Hartin, for example, works with the assumption that Luke’s version of the Sermon on the Plain is the Q version, which he finds very widely echoed in James; he therefore concludes that the prohibition of oaths, which is in Matthew’s version of the Sermon, was not in Q (Hartin, Jesus and the Q, 171, 190). But it may be that James points to a different view of the Q sermon, if Q indeed existed. Wenham, in his books Paul Follower and Paul and Jesus: The True Story (London: SPCK, 2002), argues that Paul’s evidence also raises many questions for traditional source critical views.

tance of Jesus' teaching, but it is also instructive since Paul is seen to apply Jesus' teaching in creative ways and sometimes much more flexibly than his opponents; thus, for example, Paul recognizes Jesus' teaching about the support of apostles, but he does not take it woodenly as a command for every situation, but as a privilege which he can forgo for the sake of the gospel and in the service of Jesus whom he wished to follow.<sup>30</sup>

If the question is important, is it unanswerable? We have seen how scholars hold widely differing opinions. It would be wrong, however, to despair of making any progress in addressing what is a genuinely open issue, and there have been constructive new approaches and insights in recent years. The question is not going to be simply solved by short articles such as this, but there is no reason why patient, open-minded study of particular passages and themes as well as of the issue as a whole may not move the argument forward constructively.

---

<sup>30</sup> Paul quite probably echoes Jesus' teaching on Mark 10:42–45 in 1 Cor 9:19. Compare R. Riesner, "Back to the Historical Jesus through Paul and His School (the Ransom Logion—Mark 10.45; Matthew 20.28)," Journal for the Study of the Historical Jesus 1.2 (2003): 171–199.

THE THOMAS-JESUS CONNECTION

EDWIN K. BROADHEAD

Does the Gospel of Thomas have anything to contribute to the attempt to describe Jesus as a historical figure? The complexity of this question has been underestimated, and sweeping generalizations often dominate the discussion. Before conclusions about the Thomas-Jesus connection can be reached, it is necessary to sketch various dimensions of this question and to seek a critical process through which to negotiate a way forward.

1. The Gospel of Thomas: Characteristics and History

The Gospel of Thomas was known in various parts of early Christianity.<sup>1</sup> It is mentioned by Origen in his homilies on the Gospel of Luke (In Luc. Hom. 1), by Jerome in his commentary on the Gospel of Matthew (Comm. in evang. Matth., Prologue), and by Eusebius in his history of the church (Hist. eccl. 3.25.6).<sup>2</sup> While there are numerous mentions of the title alone,<sup>3</sup> Hippolytus, in a discussion of the heresy of the Naassenes written somewhere between 222–235 CE, cites a version of Thomas 4:

---

<sup>1</sup> For discussion of these witnesses see Stephen J. Patterson, "The Gospel of Thomas: Introduction," in Q-Thomas Reader, ed. J. Kloppenborg, M. Meyer, S. Patterson, M. Steinhauser, (Sonoma, CA: Polebridge Press, 1990), 77–78; idem, The Gospel of Thomas and Jesus (Sonoma, CA: Polebridge, 1993), 113–120; Ron Cameron, "Gospel of Thomas," Anchor Bible Dictionary VI, 535–540.

<sup>2</sup> The Greek and Latin witnesses to the Gospel of Thomas have been collected in H. Attridge, "Appendix: The Greek Fragments," in Nag Hammadi Codex II, 2–7, together with XII, 2, Brit. Lib. Or. 4926 (1), and POxy 1, 654, 655; vol. 1: Gospel According to Thomas, Gospel According to Philip, Hypostasis of the Archons, and Indexes, ed. B. Layton, Nag Hammadi Studies XX (Leiden: Brill, 1989), 103–109.

<sup>3</sup> Cameron, "Gospel of Thomas," 535, correctly warns that mention of the title alone may have reference to the Infancy Gospel of Thomas rather than to the sayings collected as the Gospel of Thomas.

They transmit a tradition concerning this in the Gospel entitled According to Thomas, which states expressly, "The one who seeks me will find me in the children from seven years age and onwards. For there, hiding in the fourteenth aeon, I am revealed."<sup>4</sup>

There are numerous parallels to individual sayings in the Gospel of Thomas. Clement of Alexandria, for example, says some Thomas sayings are found in the Gospel of the Hebrews and in the Gospel of the Egyptians.<sup>5</sup> In each of these ancient witnesses, the material from the Gospel of Thomas is considered heresy.

The Gospel of Thomas was among the Nag Hammadi texts found in Egypt in 1945. Some three years later the subscript "gospel according to Thomas" was recognized at the end of the second codex. This Coptic text was thus recognized as a translation of the Gospel of Thomas known from antiquity. A few years later, the connection between the Coptic text of Thomas and some Greek fragments found at Oxyrhynchus in Egypt was established: P. Oxy 1, P. Oxy 654, and P. Oxy 655, which had been unearthed in the 1890's, were recognized as fragments of the Gospel of Thomas. Small portions of the text were made public in 1957, a German translation appeared in 1958, and a critical edition was published in 1959.<sup>6</sup>

What had been unearthed at Oxyrhynchus and at Nag Hammadi was a primitive collection of the sayings of Jesus. This collection includes various forms: aphorisms, proverbs, parables, prophetic sayings, and community rules, all preserved as a series of sayings from Jesus. The collection is designed to support the thought and practice of a community of Jesus' followers with a worldview influenced, at least in part, by gnosticism. While the Oxyrhynchus papyri are fragments, the Coptic text is complete, containing both the incipit and a concluding identification that is followed by the first lines of the Gospel of Philip. The division of this collection into 114 sayings is a modern practice.

---

<sup>4</sup> Hippolytus, Refutatio 5.7.20, from Attridge, "Appendix: The Greek Fragments," 103.

<sup>5</sup> Cameron, "Gospel of Thomas," 535.

<sup>6</sup> Patterson, "Gospel of Thomas: Introduction," 82.

2. Thomas in Critical Scholarship

Scholars quickly recognized that the Gospel of Thomas is connected in some way to the sayings of Jesus in the synoptic tradition of the canonical gospels.<sup>7</sup> Three approaches to Thomas emerged: 1) the Gospel of Thomas is a secondary collection largely dependent on the canonical gospels; 2) the Gospel of Thomas is a primary witness to the Jesus tradition; 3) the Gospel of Thomas is irrelevant to the development of New Testament traditions and has no impact on theological concerns.

Scholarship quickly assessed the Gospel of Thomas as a late, gnostic reconfiguration of canonical materials. In 1964, Wolfgang Schrage argued that Thomas was wholly dependent upon the canonical gospels, in particular upon Coptic translations of the synoptics.<sup>8</sup> Schrage's translation theory is unlikely, but his major thesis—dependence on the synoptics—has been assumed by most of subsequent scholarship. Stephen Patterson accurately defines the presumption behind this line of scholarship:

If the text of Thomas can be found to reproduce elements from the synoptic gospels which can be identified as redactional changes unique to one or another of the individual synoptic evangelists, then one must conclude that the author of Thomas has taken the text directly from these canonical sources.<sup>9</sup>

Others would assert that the Gospel of Thomas is a primary witness to the Jesus tradition.<sup>10</sup> This line of thinking received its impetus from Gilles Quispel, who argued in 1957 that Thomas had received sayings from the primitive Jerusalem community by means of the Gospel of the Hebrews.<sup>11</sup> While most scholars were unconvinced by Quispel's

---

<sup>7</sup> For an extensive discussion of this debate, see S. Patterson, "The Gospel of Thomas and the Synoptic Tradition: Prospectus and Retrospectus," in SBL 1990 Seminar Papers, ed. D. Lull (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1990), 614–636.

<sup>8</sup> Wolfgang Schrage, Das Verhältnis des Thomas-Evangeliums zur Synoptischen Tradition und zu den koptischen Evangelienübersetzungen. Zugleich ein Beitrag zur gnostischen Synoptikerdeutung, BZNW 29 (Berlin: Töpelmann, 1964).

<sup>9</sup> Patterson, "The Gospel of Thomas: Introduction," 86.

<sup>10</sup> These developments are sketched by Patterson, The Gospel of Thomas and Jesus, 220–225.

<sup>11</sup> G. Quispel, "The Gospel of Thomas and the New Testament," VC 11 (1957): 189–207.

source theory, some pursued the idea that the Gospel of Thomas has within it a few authentic sayings of Jesus not dependent upon the canonical gospels.

Joachim Jeremias argued in 1957 that eighteen sayings from outside the canon—some of which are found in Thomas—belong to the historical Jesus.<sup>12</sup> In his 1962 revision of his work on the parables, Die Gleichnisse Jesus, Jeremias employed the Gospel of Thomas in his form-critical evaluation of Jesus tradition and in his consideration of the related questions of the history of transmission and of the historical Jesus.

Others pursued independent pieces of Jesus tradition outside the canonical gospels. While Jeremias accepted eighteen sayings from outside the canon as authentic, Otfried Hofius reduced this number to nine, with special interest in four sayings, including Thomas material.<sup>13</sup> Johannes Bauer,<sup>14</sup> Robert Wilson,<sup>15</sup> Oscar Cullmann,<sup>16</sup> and Hugh Montefiore<sup>17</sup> also searched for independent materials from Thomas. It must be noted, however, that this interest in Thomas was tangential to larger concerns about the historical Jesus and the canonical gospels and that, as Patterson notes, “none of these early attempts to evaluate Thomas’ sayings was marked by a carefully defined method and consistently applied criteria.”<sup>18</sup>

Recent scholarship has witnessed the emergence of strong claims that the Gospel of Thomas as a whole represents an ancient version of Christianity to be taken seriously alongside other primitive traditions. This position is grounded in the work of Helmut Koester, but it has a particular link to the Jesus Seminar. Koester, on the basis of form critical analysis, concludes that “the tradition of sayings of Jesus preserved in the Gospel of Thomas pre-dates the canonical Gospels and rules out

<sup>12</sup> Joachim Jeremias, The Unknown Sayings of Jesus, trans. Reginald Fuller (London: SPCK, 1957).

<sup>13</sup> Otfried Hofius, “Unknown Sayings of Jesus,” in The Gospel and the Gospels, ed. Peter Stuhlmacher (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991 (1983)), 336–360.

<sup>14</sup> Johannes Bauer, “Echte Jesusworte,” in Evangelien aus dem Nilsand, W. C. van Unnik (Frankfurt: Heinrich Scheffer, 1960), 122–124. Bauer accepts Thomas 51, 52, 58, 81, 82 as authentic.

<sup>15</sup> Robert Wilson, Studies in the Gospel of Thomas (London: A. R. Mowbray, 1960).

<sup>16</sup> Oscar Cullman, “Das Thomasevangelium und die Frage nach dem Alter der in ihm enthaltenen Tradition,” ThLZ 85 (1960): 321–334.

<sup>17</sup> Hugh Montefiore, “A Comparison of the Parables of the Gospel According to Thomas and the Synoptic Gospels,” NTS 7 (1960/61): 220–248.

<sup>18</sup> Patterson, “The Gospel of Thomas: Introduction,” 118.

the possibility of dependence upon any of these Gospels.”<sup>19</sup> Among the recent advocates of this position are John Dominic Crossan and Elaine Pagels. Crossan refers to the whole of Thomas when he declares “The collection is independent of the intracanonial Gospels.”<sup>20</sup> Crossan argues for two crudely defined layers of Thomas tradition: sayings with independent attestation elsewhere belong to a James collection from the 50’s CE, perhaps from Jerusalem, while a Thomas layer of unique traditions dates from the 60’s in Syrian Edessa.<sup>21</sup> In his treatment of Jesus as the Mediterranean Peasant, Crossan makes reference to the Gospel of Thomas 88 times.

In her recent work, Elaine Pagels argues for the place of gnostic Christianity as a definable, authentic expression of primitive Christianity, an argument to which the Gospel of Thomas is central.<sup>22</sup> This recent line of approach is not content with finding authentic Jesus materials within the Gospel of Thomas, but invests deeply in the assumption that the Gospel of Thomas is itself a definitive part of the Jesus tradition.<sup>23</sup>

The third strategy taken by scholars is to ignore or dismiss the Gospel of Thomas as irrelevant in the search for the historical Jesus. Luke Timothy Johnson illustrates this approach, along with the tendentious argumentation that sometimes accompanies it:

What about the Nag Hammadi library with its Gospel of Thomas, so beloved by Crossan and the Jesus Seminar? Is not the situation now fundamentally changed? Is it not the case that the canonical writings of the New Testament are no longer the exclusive or even the most important sources for the history of the Christian movement? The short answer, alas, is no. The situation has not fundamentally changed.<sup>24</sup>

---

<sup>19</sup> Helmut Koester, Ancient Christian Gospels: Their History and Development (Philadelphia: Trinity Press, 1990), 85–86.

<sup>20</sup> John Dominic Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Peasant (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1991), 427. The tendentious nature of this work is evident on the cover: “The first comprehensive determination of who Jesus was, what he did, what he said.”

<sup>21</sup> Crossan, Mediterranean Peasant, 427–428.

<sup>22</sup> Elaine Pagels, Beyond Belief: The Secret Gospel of Thomas (New York: Random House, 2003).

<sup>23</sup> So Patterson, The Gospel of Thomas and Jesus, 220–225.

<sup>24</sup> Luke Timothy Johnson, The Real Jesus: The Misguided Quest for the Historical Jesus and the Truth of the Traditional Gospels (San Francisco: Harper Collins, 1996), 88–89. Dunn’s evaluation in the frontispiece of this work is noteworthy: “The Jesus of cheap scholarship, the Jesus-as-I-personally-like-to-imagine-him, has been zealously

Johnson's hermeneutic for Thomas is clear. He concludes that:

these discoveries are of interest for the patristic period more than for the period of Christianity's birth and first expansion. Despite all the excitement and expectation, it turns out that the canonical writings of the New Testament remain our best historical witnesses to the earliest period of the Christian movement.<sup>25</sup>

In The Real Jesus, Johnson deals with only one Thomas text (the negative view of women in Saying 97).

Stephen Patterson notes the paucity of Thomas materials throughout the recent wave of historical Jesus studies sometimes referred to as the "Third Quest." While some of this silence may reflect doubt over the tradition history of Thomas, recent works tend to avoid the question of what Jesus said in favor of discussion of who he was and what he did, thus bypassing the Thomas materials.<sup>26</sup>

A more sophisticated dismissal of Thomas is found in the work of James Dunn, who seeks to reformulate the question of Traditionsgeschichte by highlighting the flexibility of oral traditions. Dunn roots many differences between synoptic sayings not in a linear progression of traditions, but in performance variations within the oral transmission and preservation of the Jesus material.<sup>27</sup> While this approach could easily assume Thomas as a further witness to the variability of authentic tradition, Dunn offers little hope of finding Jesus through the Thomas sayings. Dunn believes the search for Jesus in Thomas has been caught up in the effort to isolate a gnostic Christianity that is an early and equally viable expression of Christian faith.<sup>28</sup> Rather than a witness to early gnostic Christianity, Dunn believes that Thomas reflects a later, developed form of the gnostic redeemer myth and that "we should not be surprised if we find that any earlier traditions have been redacted in a Gnostic direction."<sup>29</sup> Dunn also emphasizes that independent does not mean more original: "In our present case, the different version of the Jesus tradition attested by the Gospel of Thomas promoted through the past decade like a fizzy new drink. Thank goodness, then, for a cool, clear glass of sober scholarship from Luke Johnson."

---

<sup>25</sup> Johnson, The Real Jesus, 89.

<sup>26</sup> Patterson, The Gospel of Thomas and Jesus, 219–220.

<sup>27</sup> James D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003).

<sup>28</sup> Ibid., 161–165.

<sup>29</sup> Ibid., 164. It is not clear to me whether "any earlier traditions" means "some early traditions" or "all early traditions."

is often assumed to be the more original. But all that analysis demonstrates is that the versions are different.”<sup>30</sup> From this perspective Dunn previews the role Thomas will play into his reconstruction of Jesus: “In what follows, then, we shall expect to find that the Gospel of Thomas attests different forms which the Jesus tradition took.”<sup>31</sup> Indeed, Dunn’s 900–page work makes reference to the Gospel of Thomas some 161 times. Since Dunn’s primary goal is not to describe the developmental history of Christian tradition, but rather to find the Jesus remembered in that tradition, he seems to leave room here for a Jesus remembered differently, but with validity, in the Gospel of Thomas. This is not the case, for Dunn approaches the Thomas sayings through the following hermeneutic:

For while the question must always remain open that a particular Thomas saying has preserved an early/earlier version of the saying than the Synoptic tradition or that an unparalleled Thomas saying is as early as the earliest Synoptic tradition, it will always be the undoubtedly early Synoptic tradition which provides the measure by which judgment is made on the point.<sup>32</sup>

3. The Thomas-Jesus Connection: Methodology

The Gospel of Thomas found at Nag Hammadi is a fourth-century manuscript of a second-century collection that contains sayings attributed to Jesus under the authority of James and Thomas. Our only complete text was found in a much larger library of ancient literature (which also included a Plato fragment). I wish to argue that this essential identity of the Gospel of Thomas must be determinative for the question of methodology. The question “What are you looking for?” is likewise central to the methodological debate.

3.1. Text

First, the Gospel of Thomas has a textual history. We stand near the end of that history, with access to one late (Coptic) translation and three earlier (Greek) fragments. The few attestations from early Christianity are likewise limited in their knowledge of the Gospel of Thomas.

---

<sup>30</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 164.

<sup>31</sup> Ibid., 165.

<sup>32</sup> Ibid., 165.

Thus, we must speak of a stream of tradition to which we have only partial and limited access. This is true not only of the textual tradition of Thomas, but also of its developing worldview.

3.2. Genre

Secondly, the Gospel of Thomas is a collection. It is a fluid, developing tradition that is not fixed in time or in form. The text from Nag Hammadi is one stage of that tradition, but perhaps not the definitive stage. More significantly, the Gospel of Thomas presents no guiding framework, no unifying motif, no overarching design, no theological center, no narrative backbone. Thus, it is possible that its primary identity is not to be found in the whole, but in the parts. If so, any monolithic, comprehensive description of what the Gospel of Thomas is or what it does is risky. There is a hermeneutical tendency to compress the identity of Thomas into a coherent package.<sup>33</sup> A related tendency is to see a process only by its end stages—or only by the stage available to the reader. A further tendency is to find or to force thematic unity under a framework such as gnosticism.<sup>34</sup> None of these hermeneutical tendencies fits well with collections.

Both sides of the Thomas debate fall prey to the monolithic fallacy—the tendency to subsume the parts into a view of a meaningful whole, the tendency to view the process solely from its result, and the tendency to create thematic unity.

Those who argue that the Gospel of Thomas is dependent upon the canonical gospels often employ this generalizing rhetoric. The treatment by John Meier is representative:

Since I think that the Synoptic-like sayings of the Gospel of Thomas are in fact dependent on the Synoptic Gospels and that the other sayings stem from 2nd-century Christian gnosticism, the Gospel of Thomas will not be used in our quest as an independent source for the historical Jesus.

...

---

<sup>33</sup> This is in line with the phenomenon, identified by Gestalt psychology, of seeking to make sense and to create meaning—whether it exists or not—out of the pieces we observe.

<sup>34</sup> Scholars often speak in a similar generalization of “the Nag Hammadi material,” which actually contains a variety of texts, including a fragment from Plato.

Contrary to some scholars, I do not think that the rabbinical material, the agrapha, the apocryphal gospels, and the Nag Hammadi codices (in particular the Gospel of Thomas) offer us reliable new information or authentic sayings that are independent of the NT. What we see in these later documents is rather the reaction to or reworking of NT writings by Jewish rabbis engaged in polemics, imaginative Christians reflecting popular piety and legend, and gnostic Christians developing a mystic speculative system. Their versions of Jesus' words and deeds can be included in a "corpus of Jesus material" if that corpus is understood to contain simply everything and anything that any ancient source ever identified as material coming from Jesus. But such a corpus is the Matthean dragnet (Matt 13.47–48) from which the good fish of early tradition must be selected for the containers of serious historical research, while the bad fish of later conflation and invention are tossed back into the murky sea of the uncritical mind. In Part One of this book, we have been sitting on the beach, sorting the dragnet and throwing the agrapha, apocryphal gospels, and the Gospel of Thomas back into the sea.<sup>35</sup>

Among those who argue that the Gospel of Thomas is an independent source of Jesus tradition, one finds statements no less sweeping or tendentious. Patterson, for example, concludes that:

no new quest of the historical Jesus can proceed now without giving due attention to the Thomas tradition. As an independent reading of the Jesus tradition, it provides us with a crucial and indispensable tool for gaining critical distance on the synoptic tradition, which for so long dominated the Jesus discussion.<sup>36</sup>

Statements from both sides of the debate illustrate the tendency to treat the Gospel of Thomas as a monolithic piece with a clear image of Jesus. The same generalization is imposed upon the synoptic tradition, which in reality is a collection of traditions with a variety of images of Jesus. Recent scholarship is dominated by a tendency to speak of two titans of tradition—the synoptic gospels and the sayings gospels—that are locked either in conflict or cooperation.

Framing the argument in this way has produced more heat than light. Because the Gospel of Thomas is a collection found within a library, renewed attention must be given to the variegated parts that have been gathered into this collection. Each saying must be analyzed within its own stream of development, and individual sayings must be located, through critical evaluation, in terms of their proximity to Jesus.

---

<sup>35</sup> John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 1: The Roots of the Problem and the Person (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 139–140.

<sup>36</sup> Patterson, The Gospel of Thomas and Jesus, 241.

3.3. Tradition History

Thirdly, the distinction between tradition history and literary history must be clarified and maintained. Tradition history has to do with the stages and forms through which a piece of material develops. Literary history has to do with the texts and layers of text in which a piece of material is found.<sup>37</sup> John Kloppenborg, for example, argues that the literary history of the Sayings Tradition (Q) involves three strata of material: a formative group of six wisdom speeches, an expansion that added a group of sayings, many in the form of chriae, with a critical and polemical stance toward Israel, and a final addition of the temptation story.<sup>38</sup> Kloppenborg insists, however, on the distinction between this literary layering and the question of tradition history:

To say that the wisdom components were formative for Q and that the prophetic judgment oracles and apophthegms describing Jesus' conflict with "this generation" are secondary is not to imply anything about the ultimate tradition-historical provenance of any of the sayings. It is indeed possible, indeed probable, that some of the materials from the secondary compositional phase are dominical or at least very old, and that some of the formative elements are, from the standpoint of authenticity or tradition-history, relatively young. Tradition-history is not convertible with literary history, and it is the latter which we are treating here.<sup>39</sup>

Thus, the debate over whether the Gospel of Thomas is late or early, dependent or independent, gnostic or not gnostic does not settle the tradition history of individual sayings and does not accurately evaluate their degree of connection to Jesus.

In a similar way, multiple attestation of a saying or story—that is, a wide-ranging literary history—does not authenticate its value in terms

---

<sup>37</sup> This distinction is clearer in textual criticism, which operates under the guideline that texts are not to be counted but weighed. This means that the value of a reading is not determined by the number of texts in which it appears, but by the quality of those texts. Similarly, a later manuscript may contain a primitive reading.

<sup>38</sup> John S. Kloppenborg, The Formation of Q: Trajectories in Ancient Wisdom Collections (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1987).

<sup>39</sup> Kloppenborg, The Formation of Q, 244–245.

of tradition history. James Dunn pursues a related distinction: independent traditions do not mean more original traditions. Dunn insists that:

the different version of the Jesus tradition attested by the Gospel of Thomas is often assumed to be the more original. But all that analysis demonstrates is that the versions are different. The possibility remains open that that is all there is to it... as well as the possibility of redaction either or both ways.<sup>40</sup>

The connection of a tradition to Jesus is not guaranteed by its literary history: early and independent traditions are not necessarily more connected to Jesus. But the other side of this equation is just as important, particularly in view of the Gospel of Thomas: a tradition embedded in a late, rather gnostic text that exhibits lines of dependence on the synoptics cannot be judged a priori to be unconnected to Jesus. A more nuanced evaluation that takes into consideration the complexity of tradition history and the development of pieces of tradition is required.

3.4. Criteria

Fourthly, the question of criteria must be revisited. Building on the work of the form critics of the early twentieth century, Rudolf Bultmann undertook a careful analysis of individual pieces of the synoptic tradition in order to determine the history of its development and use.<sup>41</sup> Bultmann's students turned the focus back to the historical Jesus and developed criteria for evaluating the authenticity of individual sayings. While such criteria have limited use and have been extended through other approaches, this line of inquiry cannot be circumvented.<sup>42</sup> The sayings in the Gospel of Thomas must be analyzed with the same rigor and detail that has been applied to the synoptic sayings of Jesus. The Gospel of Thomas can, in fact, provide a non-canonical laboratory through which to challenge previous assumptions and refine methodologies for investigating the sayings of Jesus.

---

<sup>40</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 164.

<sup>41</sup> Rudolf Bultmann, History of the Synoptic Tradition, trans. J. Marsh (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1963 [1921]).

<sup>42</sup> As many New Testament literary critics attempt to do.

3.5. Goals

Fifthly, the question of goals must be clarified. How one approaches a text depends, in part, on what one is looking for. It is abundantly clear that many scholars are looking for the “Real Jesus”<sup>43</sup> of Christian orthodoxy—the “Jesus as presented in the Four Gospels.”<sup>44</sup> It is equally clear that many are looking for “a revolutionary biography”<sup>45</sup> that provides historical refutation of that orthodox image. Neither concern is relative to the questions or the methodologies of historicity. It is also clear that most scholars investigate Thomas not for its own literary and tradition history, but as the staging ground for larger questions such as the development of early Christianity or the historical Jesus. There is the ever-present danger that the question asked already contains the answer sought—that the methodology and the quest are skewed by the underlying question.

3.6. Summary

Proper attention to the Thomas-Jesus connection requires renewed, more careful focus on the question of methodology.<sup>46</sup> The textual history of the Gospel of Thomas and its composite nature must inform the approach to these sayings. The distinction between literary history and tradition history must be maintained, and rigid criteria must be applied to individual sayings. Finally, the search for historical connections to Jesus—rather than an argument with gnosticism or orthodoxy

---

<sup>43</sup> The term used by Luke T. Johnson.

<sup>44</sup> The term used by John P. Meier.

<sup>45</sup> John D. Crossan, Jesus: A Revolutionary Biography (San Francisco: Harper Collins, 1994). The cover also describes the book as “a startling account of what we can know about the life of Jesus” and calls it “a national bestseller.”

<sup>46</sup> A helpful analogy would be a hymn book located in a modern library. The book is actually a collection dominated by one literary form (hymns). While its composition may be guided by general standards (denominational, thematic), its parts are drawn from various periods, styles, and theologies. Some hymns have been altered in their wording, and some have been assigned alternate tunes. Many have been translated from another language. For most persons, the history of the hymn is less significant than its performance value. Besides this, the written version is often a secondary writing down of a spiritual or folk hymn. The hymn book has been found in an artificial setting that is foreign to its function (worship). Further, many who use the hymn see the written text as simply a prompt through which to recall and to perform the “true” version, which is known only in the act of singing in the context of worship in a community of loved ones.

or literary history—must be allowed to shape the investigation of the Thomas sayings.

4. The Question of Form

Critical inquiry into the Thomas-Jesus connection is often dominated by the question “Does the Gospel of Thomas represent an independent witness to the historical Jesus?” Methodological considerations require a reframing of the question: “Does the Gospel of Thomas contain sayings of the historical Jesus not drawn from or controlled by canonical gospels?” Attention to the form of the Gospel of Thomas requires further refinement: the question of connection must be divided so that critical attention may be given to the method or vehicle through which this content is transmitted. In addition to the question “Does the Gospel of Thomas transmit authentic Jesus material?”, we must also ask “Does the Gospel of Thomas replicate the rhetorical form used by Jesus?”

In narrative criticism, this question is framed as the distinction between story (what is told) and discourse (how the story is told). While many studies have emphasized the inherent connection between medium and message, the distinction is still noteworthy.<sup>47</sup> As Werner Kelber has demonstrated, how one tells the story of Jesus is of great hermeneutical import.<sup>48</sup> In Kelber’s analysis, orality is not only a mode of transmission, but also a rhetorical strategy. Oral hermeneutics involve prophetic speech in which the living Lord continues to speak through his prophets. Because the living Lord still speaks, the connection to past history—and thus to his suffering and death—is pushed into the background. Hearers are confronted anew with the charisma of the living Lord. Kelber views the written gospel as a “counterform to, rather than extension of, oral hermeneutics.”<sup>49</sup> More specifically, Kelber views the Gospel of Mark as a hermeneutical revolt against the

---

<sup>47</sup> Here modern analogies may help. Mohandas Gandhi and M. L. King, Jr. both incorporate content from the teachings of Jesus, but they do so through different rhetorical strategies (teaching versus preaching). Stokely Carmichael and M. L. King, Jr. employed the same rhetorical strategy, but not the same message.

<sup>48</sup> Werner Kelber, The Oral and the Written Gospel: The Hermeneutics of Speaking and Writing in the Synoptic Tradition, Mark, Paul, and Q (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1983).

<sup>49</sup> Kelber, The Oral and the Written Gospel, 184–185.

spontaneity of the oral tradition and its avoidance of the story of Jesus' death:

What must be emphasized is that the principle of the presence of the living Lord is an intrinsic feature of oral hermeneutic. Insofar as logoi constitute the primary unit of oral tradition, the presence of the living Lord is inseparable from the linguistic ontology of the genre itself. One may suspect that what was objectionable to the writers of the gospels and the compilers of the written canon was this very oral hermeneutic of the sayings genre.<sup>50</sup>

If the Gospel of Mark represents a written historicizing of the story of Jesus as a counterform to oral pronouncements, then the Gospel of Thomas represents, in its rhetorical strategy, the recovery of orality—and oral hermeneutics—in written form.<sup>51</sup>

Whatever the connection in terms of content, the Gospel of Thomas has appropriated, in written form, the rhetorical strategy employed by Jesus. This approach may represent a conscious reaction to the narrative hermeneutic imbedded in the canonical gospels. Such a reaction would be not only rhetorical, but also ideological: the Gospel of Thomas may invoke the living voice of Jesus in order to counter the kerygmatic orthodoxy framed around the death and resurrection of Jesus.<sup>52</sup> Could this be the concern voiced in Saying 52?

His disciples said to him, "Twenty-four prophets spoke in Israel, and all of them spoke in you." He said to them, "You have omitted the one living in your presence and have spoken (only) of the dead."

Whatever the purpose behind this oral strategy, the product is clear: the Gospel of Thomas attempts to speak as Jesus speaks.

---

<sup>50</sup> Kelber, The Oral and the Written Gospel, 200–201. The idea of Mark's gospel as an alternative to oral, prophetic speech was first developed by Eugene Boring in 1977 in "The Paucity of Sayings in Mark: A Hypothesis," SBL Seminar Papers (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1977), 371–377. His theory is further developed in Sayings of the Risen Jesus: Christian Prophecy in the Synoptic Tradition (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982), 195–203.

<sup>51</sup> This is different from the strategy at work in the Gospel of Matthew and in the Gospel of Luke, where the orality of the Sayings Tradition has been embedded in the written narrative structure of Jesus' life, death, and resurrection.

<sup>52</sup> In various contemporary liturgical traditions, orality holds privileged status. In these traditions, sermons that are read from a manuscript, prayers that are written, and the use of a hymnbook are considered inferior forms of worship and are taken as signs of a dying church.

5. The Question of Content

Still the fundamental question remains: Does the Gospel of Thomas contain authentic sayings of Jesus? Here I can only begin the investigation. I will point to four passages that demonstrate the issues involved in the Thomas-Jesus connection and have potential as authentic sayings. Finally, attention will be given to the value of such a search.

5.1. Saying 9: The Parable of the Sower

The parable of the sower in Mark 4:3–9 is framed by an introductory setting (4:1–2) and by an explanation of the parable (4:10–20). The introduction in 4:1–2 wraps the story in familiar Markan language, images, and motifs:<sup>53</sup> teaching, the seashore, the crowd, for example. A Markan parable theory is developed in 4:2 and in 4:10–12: they are mysteries that unveil the Kingdom to Jesus' followers but hide it from outsiders. An allegorization of the parable is completed in 4:13–20. The entire Markan unit (4:1–34) is filled out by parables on the lamp (4:21–23), the measure (4:24–25), the growing seed (4:26–29), the mustard seed (4:30–32), and a Markan conclusion (4:33–34). The Markan construction of introduction (4:1–2), sower parable (4:3–9), parable theory (4:10–12), and explanation (4:13–20) has been taken over in Matthew 13:1–23 and Luke 8:4–15.

Form criticism seeks the life setting of a literary unit on three levels: in the editorial strategy of the gospel writer, in the life of early Christian communities, in the teachings of the historical Jesus. Form critics have long recognized the shaping of the story of the sower, both in its literary and theological dimensions, to fit the purposes of the Gospel of Mark. Behind this text would lie the community story and the Jesus tradition. Following basic rules of transmission history, we would expect the parable that Jesus spoke to be an unadorned, unexplained story that points to the mystery of the Kingdom.

Form criticism was quick to separate the parable of the sower in Mark 4:3–9 from the Markan introduction (4:1–2), the parable theory (4:10–12), and the allegorical explanation (4:13–20). From the time of Adolf Jülicher (1886), C. H. Dodd (1935), and Joachim Jeremias (1947), the allegorical explanation found in Mark 4:13–20 has been seen as a secondary development. A closer look shows that the allegorical explanation (4:13–20) is likely built upon cues within the parable itself (4:3–9) and that these cues are Markan insertions.<sup>54</sup> The judgment has prevailed, from Jülicher forward, that Jesus spoke an unadorned parable about the difficulties of Palestinian agriculture in order to address the eschatological situation of his first hearers. Evidence for this position continues to build.<sup>55</sup>

<sup>53</sup> Gnilka, Das Evangelium nach Markus, EKK 1 (Zürich: Benziger, 1978), 156–158.

What was presumed and reconstructed on form-critical grounds—an unadorned, unexplained, free-floating parable of Palestinian farming—was subsequently found in Saying 9 of the Gospel of Thomas. Missing from Gos. Thom. 9 are both the allegorical explanation and the Markan cues within the parable. Commitment to the standards of historical-critical investigation allows only one conclusion: the parable in Gos. Thom. 9 stands closer to the historical Jesus than any synoptic version. This would be true even if Gos. Thom. 9 is a revision based on Mark 4:1–20, and it would be true of both literary and oral transmission. While it would seem hypocritical to abandon the basic canons of form criticism in order to devalue this parable from the Gospel of Thomas, it should be noted that many who do this were never comfortable with form-critical conclusions.

5.2. Saying 65: The Parable of the Vineyard

The same form-critical standards are at work in the parable of the vineyard, found in Mark 12:1–12 and Gos. Thom. 65. The parable in Mark 12:1b–9 is framed by a Markan introduction (12:1a), an exegetical connection to Psalm 118:22 (Mark 12:10–11), and a description of the response to the parable (12:12). In its Markan form, the parable of the vineyard is an extended allegory against the leadership of Israel, and it is read thus by the temple authorities (11:27; 12:1, 12). Internally, the parable allegorizes various stages of Israel's (Deuteronomist) history: various messengers are sent to the vineyard, but these are met with increasing violence. The story invites the reader to see here the rejected prophets of Israel and the beheaded Baptist. The death of

<sup>54</sup> Crossan, In Parables: The Challenge of the Historical Jesus (New York: Harper & Row, 1973), 39–44; Ron Cameron, Parable and Interpretation in the Gospel of Thomas (Sonoma, CA: Polebridge Press, 1986), 20–21.

<sup>55</sup> Pesch, Markusevangelium, 1: 228–236.

Jesus is imaged in the final messenger, the beloved son and heir, who is murdered. The casting out of the workers and the handing over of the vineyard to others is understood as a scriptural prophecy against the leaders of Israel.

This extended allegory is presented as a straightforward, unexplained account, standing on its own, in Gos. Thom. 65. Again, the canons of form criticism define the Thomas version of the parable as the form closest to the historical Jesus, whatever its literary history. The canons of oral transmission would also favor this conclusion.

Saying 65 illuminates the complexity of the literary history. While the form of this saying suggests it is earlier than Mark 11, the question of order arises. Mark 11:10 invokes Psalm 118:22, but has linked it to the larger scene. The parable in Gos. Thom. 65 is followed by Saying 66, which is based on Psalm 118:22. What is the literary-critical line of development here? Has the Gospel of Thomas copied Mark 11 but turned it into two unadorned sayings of Jesus that stand on their own? Do Mark 11 and Thomas 65–66 draw upon a common tradition in which the parable and the citation are linked? The question remains open, but the process of analysis should not be governed by special pleading in support of one particular tradition history.

5.3. Saying 31: The Rejected Prophet

Mark 6:1–6 tells of Jesus' teaching in his home town on the Sabbath. As elsewhere (Mark 1:22), the people are amazed at his teaching and his wonders. They ask "Is this not the carpenter (or mason), the son of Mary and the brother of James and Justus and Judas and Simon, and are not his sisters here with us?" In the next line, the people are scandalized by Jesus (6:3). As a result, Jesus is not able to do any miracles—well, just a few (6:5). At the heart of this story is a pronouncement from Jesus: "A prophet is not without honor except in his home town and among his relatives and in his house" (6:4). The connection between the scene and the pronouncement is awkward. The reaction of the crowd is similar to the amazement expressed elsewhere, and it is not clear that the mention of his trade and his family indicate rejection. Only the narrator's comment that the people are scandalized makes this a scene of controversy. It is not clear why this should prevent further miracles, and the inconsistency of 6:5 is apparent. Thus, the pronouncement of 6:4 fits rather uncomfortably in the larger story.

Rudolf Bultmann examined this story by means of form criticism in 1921, and he concluded: “This seems to me to be a typical example of how an imaginary situation is built up out of an independent saying.”<sup>56</sup> Bultmann accepted the conclusion of E. Wendling (1908)<sup>57</sup> that the double proverb found in P. Oxy 1.5 represents a more original form of the saying:

A prophet is not welcome in his home town,
Nor does a physician bring healing to those who know him.

Bultmann then discussed the process through which this saying was incorporated into Mark 6:1–6 and Luke 4:16–30.<sup>58</sup> What is significant here is that these conclusions were reached solely on form-critical grounds, since neither scholar knew that P. Oxy 1 was a fragment of the Gospel of Thomas. If one replaces form-critical canons with the patterns of orality, the priority of the Thomas saying is still plausible. If you isolate (through form-critical and redactional standards) the saying in Mark 6:5 in order to consider its oral history, you are left with a tripartite pronouncement with a paratactic framing—a rhetoric usually identified as Markan. While nothing can be proven, critical analysis leads to the conclusion that Gos. Thom. 31 is more plausible as a saying of Jesus than is Mark 6:5.

5.4. Saying 82: The Fire and the Kingdom

*Jesus said, “He who is near me is near the fire,
And he who is far from me is far from the kingdom.”*

I have argued that Saying 82 of the Gospel of Thomas, which has no New Testament parallel, is best explained as an authentic saying of Jesus.<sup>59</sup> The analysis of Saying 82 may be summarized as follows:

1. Saying 82 exhibits a structure of contrasting parallelism in which both lines open with some form of “whoever” and establish a contrast between the status of individuals or groups. This pattern is found in diverse regions of the synoptic tradition: in the triple tradition,

<sup>56</sup> Rudolf Bultmann, The History of the Synoptic Tradition, 31.

<sup>57</sup> E. Wendling, Die Entstehung des Marcus-Evangeliums (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1908), 54.

<sup>58</sup> Bultmann, History, 31–32.

<sup>59</sup> Edwin Broadhead, “An Authentic Saying of Jesus in the Gospel of Thomas?” NTS 46 (2000): 132–149.

in Matthew's version of the Sayings Tradition (QMatt), in Matthean special materials (M), and in the Lukan special materials (L). The form is always on the lips of Jesus, with the exception of Luke 3:11, where John the Baptist uses the form without the contrast. This structural pattern occurs most frequently in the Sayings Tradition (Q) and is used to compare or contrast two different groups.

2. The image of fire in Gos. Thom. 82 is part of a wider tradition. Within the canonical gospels, fire is employed in three ways: 1) as a general metaphor for judgment; 2) as a specific reference to judgment in the preaching of John the Baptist; 3) in the teaching of Jesus as an extension of John's message; 4) a few sayings use fire to characterize the judgment of the Son of Man.

Most notable among the fire sayings of Jesus are the enigmatic pronouncements of Luke 12:49 ("Fire I came to cast upon the earth, and how I wish it already burned") and Mark 9:49 ("For all in fire shall be salted"). These two sayings show key traits of authenticity. Neither is taken up elsewhere in synoptic tradition, but there is a close kinship with Gos. Thom. 82.

3. Saying 82 contributes little to the gnostic outlook of the Gospel of Thomas.
4. Saying 82 fares rather well when judged by the criteria for authentic sayings of Jesus. In terms of dissimilarity, the saying is not a clear embarrassment, but it does not fit well into the prevailing ethos of Judaism and it is difficult to imagine it as a construction of the early church. In terms of linguistic and stylistic texture, the short, pithy, enigmatic style of Saying 82 suggests its nearness to Jesus, the use of the "Whoever" parallelism suggests a kinship to the early synoptic tradition, and Joachim Jeremias argues that a reconstructed Aramaic form indicates a saying typical of Jesus.<sup>60</sup> In terms of coherence, Saying 82 fits well with the synoptic sayings judged to be closest to Jesus' own words. In terms of multiple attestation, the saying is found across a wide span of literature and in multiple translations: Coptic, Greek, Latin, Armenian.

On the basis of the analysis summarized above, I locate the saying somewhere along a continuum running between the preaching of John, who announces the imminent fire of God's judgment, and the transmitters of the Sayings Tradition (Q), who proclaim the decisive role of Jesus for the irruption of God's Kingdom. At the center of this spectrum stands the historical figure of Jesus, who was influenced by the Baptist and whose message undergirded the proclamation of his earliest followers. The transition from John's preaching of judgment to the disciples' preaching of Jesus' role in the Kingdom presumes a middle stage in which the judgment of fire is accompanied by the decisive moment of God's Kingdom. This is the message of Jesus, articulated in enigmatic sayings, unadorned metaphors and similes, and unexplained parables.

---

<sup>60</sup> Jeremias, Unknown Sayings of Jesus, 55.

In substance, Gos. Thom. 82a reflects the preaching of John, while 82b reflects the preaching of Jesus; its form and christology parallel the preaching of Q. It is most unlikely that the Gospel of Thomas first merges these components, but then fails to link them to its own worldview. The synoptic evangelists made no direct use of this tradition, and they transformed similar traditions. Unlike Q, Saying 82 does not explicitly proclaim the futuristic Kingdom of the Son of Man, and this logion is absent from our text of the Sayings Tradition (Q). It is unlikely that the Baptist proclaimed Jesus as the key to the Kingdom. The most likely site for the uniting of these components—the preaching of John, the nearness of the Kingdom, and the decisive role of its messenger—is in the historical ministry of Jesus. If so, the history of tradition would look like this:

1. John spoke of the fire: he announced a crisis of impending judgment.
2. Jesus spoke of the Kingdom: while influenced by John's thought and language, his ministry centered upon the nearness of God's Reign. He possibly saw his own ministry as the decisive moment for the Kingdom.
3. The transmitters of Q spoke of Jesus: they saw him as the coming Son of Man whose message was definitive for participation in the future Kingdom.
4. The evangelists found traditions like Mark 9:49; Luke 12:49; Gos. Thom. 82 enigmatic, and they largely avoided or transformed them: this type of unpolished pronouncement, with its focus on judgment and the imminent Kingdom, was difficult to relate to the needs of their communities.
5. The Gospel of Thomas, through unknown means, had access to an authentic saying of Jesus: its enigmatic nature provided the clue for its inclusion in the esoteric world of Thomas.
6. While known to a few early writers, this tradition was lost to wider knowledge for some 1,400 years; it was ignored for another fifty, since it was thought tangential.

Though decisive proof is unattainable, there is a strong possibility and a significant probability that Saying 82 of the Gospel of Thomas presents an authentic saying of Jesus.

6. Conclusion

If I am correct, particularly about Saying 82, what difference does it make? First, it provides a reminder that we must beware of a monolithic approach to the Gospel of Thomas. For decades it was dismissed in toto as dependent upon the synoptics. Recently it has become popular to assume Thomas represents an independent account of Jesus' sayings. Jesus' sapiential sayings have been gleaned from Thomas in support of a non-eschatological Jesus, with insufficient attention given to redactional layers. Thomas has also been used to locate Christian gnosticism at an early stage and to give it a central role in the Christian tradition. Such monolithic treatments of Thomas are inadequate.

Secondly, we must be cautious in ascribing simple layers or a simple literary history to a variegated collection like the Gospel of Thomas. Scholars who see here an independent witness tend to superimpose upon Thomas the reconstruction of Q by Kloppenborg: a foundational layer of sapiential material is followed by a later layer (apocalyptic in Q, gnostic in Thomas). This maneuver causes all sorts of incongruencies in Thomas.<sup>61</sup> A better explanation is required.

Finally, the presence of authentic sayings in Thomas would matter for our picture of Jesus. While Saying 82 is only one piece of evidence, its traits are noteworthy. The image of fire suggests a broader dependence upon the Baptist. In Saying 82 Jesus speaks simply and abruptly in the first person, with no clarification, no claim to any title, and no mention of his death. At the same time, he places himself squarely at the junction where the Kingdom becomes reality: one's nearness or distance to Jesus is decisive. Thus, the most authentic-looking piece of the Gospel of Thomas does not support the image of Jesus as a non-eschatological sage. The parable of the sower in Saying 9, the parable of the vineyard in Saying 65, and the rejected prophet pronouncement of Saying 31 also cohere with the image of Jesus as one whose announcement of the Kingdom brings a moment of crisis marked by difficulty, rejection, suffering, and judgment.

If Saying 82 is authentic, we have further reason to be cynical about the Cynic Jesus, agnostic about the gnostic Jesus. This saying, embedded within the esoteric world of the Gospel of Thomas, presents another small piece of evidence for one particular strand of primitive Christology: Jesus' ministry—his presence and his call—represents a moment of crisis in which the decision for or against God's Reign hangs in the balance.

---

<sup>61</sup> Crossan, for example, relegates Saying 82 to a secondary layer because it has only one attestation.

Saying 82 may further represent an unapologetic appropriation of John the Baptist and his message as the central framework for Jesus' ministry. This stands in contrast to the narrative appropriation of John in the synoptics and to the absence of John the Baptist in the Pauline world.

Consequently, the Gospel of Thomas has an important role to play in the description of the historical Jesus. In order to fully exploit the potential of the Thomas-Jesus connection, renewed attention must be given to the question of methodology. Central to the methodological question are the textual history of Thomas, its genre, its tradition history, and proper criteria and goals. Renewed attention must also be given to the question of form. The Gospel of Thomas must be investigated as a collection of individual sayings that replicates the rhetoric of Jesus. Finally, the question of content remains open. Each of the 114 sayings in Thomas must be investigated on critical grounds to establish its proximity to Jesus. Only in this way can we fully explore the Jesus-Thomas connection and establish the place of Thomas in the landscape of early Christianity.

TRADITIONS ABOUT JESUS IN APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS
(with the Exception of the Gospel of Thomas)

TOBIAS NICKLAS

Christian apocrypha play only a marginal role in the consciousness of many exegetes and church historians, who regard the significance of these texts as secondary in every sense: such marginal literature does not deserve any great attention. For example, W. Michaelis speaks in his collection of apocryphal texts—the second edition of which was published in 1958—in a wholesale manner of “mere imitative continuations,” of a “branch on the side of the tree which once was vigorous and produced many leaves, but later gradually dried up and declined.”<sup>1</sup> Such extreme judgments would scarcely be formulated today, but they seem to linger on, especially where the apocrypha are read more or less explicitly as poor imitations of the canonical texts<sup>2</sup>—or, better, of those texts that became canonical.<sup>3</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> W. Michaelis, Die apokryphen Schriften zum Neuen Testament, 2nd ed., Sammlung Dietrich 129 (Bremen: Schönemann, 1958), xv and xx. Among German scholars, a prominent example is J. B. Bauer, Die neutestamentlichen Apokryphen, WB (Düsseldorf: Patmos-Verlag, 1968), 12–13, who writes: “Nothing reveals more vividly and convincingly the sureness of touch on the part of the church in the delimitation of the canon—or, to put it more clearly, the fact that the church was guided by the Spirit in this work—than a reading of those texts which it rejected as apocryphal.” On the status quo of the investigation of the apocryphal gospels today, cf. also T. J. Kraus and S. E. Porter, “Fragmente unbekannter Evangelien,” in Antike christliche Apokryphen in deutscher Übersetzung, ed. C. Marksches and J. Schröter (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2010).

<sup>2</sup> This idea can be glimpsed e.g., in H. von Lips, Der neutestamentliche Kanon. Seine Geschichte und Bedeutung, Züricher Grundrisse zur Bibel (Zürich: Theologischer Verlag, 2004), 106, who calls the apocrypha “texts dependent on New Testament genres.” For a critique of this way of looking at things, cf. also D. Marguerat, “Pourquoi lire les apocryphes,” in Le mystère apocryphe. Introduction à une littérature méconnue, ed. J.-D. Kaestli and D. Marguerat, EssBib 26 (Geneva: Labor et Fides, 1995), 141–145, esp. 142–143. For a similar evaluation of the status quo of research into the apocrypha, cf. also J. H. Charlesworth, Authentic Apocrypha: False and Genuine Christian Apocrypha, Dead Sea Scrolls and Christian Origins Library (North Richland Hills, TX: BIBAL Press, 1998), ix.

<sup>3</sup> This phrase is inspired by D. Lührmann, Fragmente apokryph gewordener Evangelien in griechischer und lateinischer Sprache, MThSt 59 (Marburg: N. G. Elwert Verlag, 2000); idem, Die apokryph gewordene Evangelien. Studien zu neuen Texten und

In recent years, however, we note that the study of Christian apocryphal literature has acquired a fresh impetus. This is attested not only by the publication of numerous collections and editions of texts,<sup>4</sup> but also by the foundation of the Association pour l'étude de la littérature apocryphe chrétienne (AELAC) which has complemented its vast project of editions and commentaries in the series Corpus Christianorum. Series Apocryphorum with the series Apocryphes. Collection de Poche de l'AELAC, and edits the periodical Apocrypha.

In parallel to this movement (and certainly not independently of it), we note that a number of important scholars of the so-called “Third Quest” for the historical Jesus evaluate the apocryphal gospels anew as sources worth investigation. Here, however, no consensus is in sight. Some authors attribute a high measure of historical reliability to apocryphal texts—e.g., J. D. Crossan, R. W. Funk, or C. W. Hedrick<sup>5</sup>—but neuen Fragen, NTS 112 (Leiden: Brill, 2004), 4: we should speak of texts which have “become apocryphal,” thereby making clear our perspective.

---

<sup>4</sup> Cf. e.g., F. Bovon and P. Geoltrain, eds., Écrits apocryphes chrétiens 1 (Paris: Gallimard, 1997); P. Geoltrain and J.-D. Kaestli, eds., Écrits apocryphes chrétiens 2 (Paris 2005); K. Ceming and J. Werlitz, Die verborgenen Evangelien. Apokryphe Schriften (Augsburg: Weltbild, 1999 [reprint Wiesbaden: Marix, 2004]); B. D. Ehrman, The New Testament and Other Early Christian Writings. A Reader (New York: Oxford University Press, 2nd ed. 2004); D. Lührmann, Fragmente; U.-K. Plisch, Verborgene Worte Jesu. Verworfenen Evangelien. Apokryphe Schriften des frühen Christentums, Brennpunkt: Die Bibel (Erfurt, Evangelische Haupt-Bibelgesellschaft, 2000); H.-J. Klauck, Apokryphe Evangelien. Eine Einführung (Stuttgart: Verlag Katholisches Bibelwerk, 2002; Eng. tr. by Brian McNeil: Apocryphal Gospels [London: T&T Clark International, 2003]); idem, Apokryphe Apostelgeschichten. Eine Einführung (Stuttgart: Bibelwerk, 2005); T. Nicklas and J.-M. Roessli, eds., Apocrypha, NTP-Sb (Göttingen, 2011 and the project of a fundamentally new edition of the classical collection by Hennecke and Schneemelcher initiated by C. Marksches: “‘Neutestamentliche Apokryphen’. Bemerkungen zu Geschichte und Zukunft einer von Edgar Hennecke im Jahr 1904 begründeten Quellensammlung,” Apocrypha 9 (1998): 97–132.

<sup>5</sup> On this question, cf. J. D. Crossan, Four Other Gospels. Shadows on the Contours of the Canon (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1985); idem, The Cross That Spoke. The Origins of the Passion Narrative (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1988) (on the Gospel of Peter); idem, The Historical Jesus. The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: Harper, 1991); R. W. Funk et al., The Five Gospels. The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus (New York: HarperCollins, 2nd ed. 1996); R. W. Funk, Honest to Jesus (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1996); idem et al., The Acts of Jesus. The Search for the Authentic Deeds of Jesus, 2nd ed. (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1998); C. W. Hedrick, Parables as Poetic Fictions. The Creative Voice of Jesus (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publishers, 1994); idem, “The Tyranny of the Synoptic Jesus,” Semeia 44 (1988): 1–8. Criticism of the Jesus Seminar founded by R. W. Funk can be found e.g., in M. A. Powell, Jesus as a Figure in History. How Modern Historians View the Man from Galilee (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 1998), 75–81. A particularly clear line is taken by L. T. Johnson, The Real Jesus. The Misguided Quest for the others such as J. P. Meier or N. T. Wright reject them more or less explicitly as potential sources for the investigation of the historical Jesus.<sup>6</sup> One scholar who takes an intermediate position is D. E. Aune.<sup>7</sup>

The center of interest is without doubt the Gospel of Thomas, to which a separate essay in this book is dedicated; but in this context, many other texts too are often mentioned, and their value as sources is a matter of scholarly debate.<sup>8</sup>

1. Some Important Texts

1.1. The Gospel of Peter

Until the end of the nineteenth century, the existence of a “Gospel according to Peter” was known only from the testimonies of some early Christian writers (e.g., Serapion of Antioch in Eusebius of Caesarea, Hist. eccl. 6.12.1–6; Origen, Comm. in Matt. 10.17).<sup>9</sup> It is only since the discovery of the so-called Akhmîm Codex (P. Cair. 10759) in

---

Historical Jesus and the Truth of the Traditional Gospels (San Francisco: HarperSan Francisco, 1996), 1–27; N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (London and Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996), 29–35.

<sup>6</sup> This is especially clear in J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew, 1: The Roots of the Problem and the Person, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1991). See however also N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (London and Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996).

<sup>7</sup> Cf. D. E. Aune, “Assessing the Historical Value of the Apocryphal Jesus Traditions. A Critique of Conflicting Methodologies,” in Der historische Jesus. Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. J. Schröter and R. Brucker, BZNW 114 (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 2002), 243–272, who also discusses in detail the methodologies employed by Meier and Crossan.

<sup>8</sup> The disputed concept of “gospel” is intentionally understood here in a broad sense to include every form of traditions about Jesus in a narrative form, as well as collections of logia (including logia of the risen Jesus), in order that questions of genre may not lead a priori to the rejection of the potential historicity of a text. Similarly, the concept of “apocryphal” is understood so broadly that e.g., writings from Nag Hammadi can be categorized as “apocryphal.” On this problem, cf. e.g., J. van der Vliet, “The Coptic Gnostic Texts as Christian Apocryphal Literature,” in Ägypten und Nubien in spätantiker und christlicher Zeit. Akten des 6. Internationalen Koptologenkongresses, Münster, 20.–26. Juli 1996 2: Schrifttum, Sprache und Gedankenwelt, ed. S. Emmel et al., Sprachen und Kulturen des christlichen Orients 6.2 (Wiesbaden: Reichert, 1999), 553–562.

<sup>9</sup> For detailed information, cf. T. J. Kraus and T. Nicklas, eds., Das Petrus-evangelium und die Petrusapokalypse. Die griechischen Fragmente mit deutscher und englischer Übersetzung, GCS NF 11: Neutestamentliche Apokryphen 1 (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 2004), 11–23. See also T. Nicklas and M. Vinzent, “Petrusevangelium,” in C. Markschies and J. Schröter, ed., Antike christliche Apokryphen in deutscher Übersetzung (Tübingen 2011).

1886/87, a manuscript from the late sixth or possibly early seventh century which was used as a burial object, that scholars have possessed at least a fragment of the Gospel of Peter.<sup>10</sup> However, even this simple affirmation is not unproblematic:

First, the identification of the text, which begins in the middle of a sentence and ends in the middle of another sentence, is not based on a title or a subscriptio containing the words: “Gospel according to Peter.”<sup>11</sup> It is inferred from the final surviving sentence, in which Peter speaks in the first person singular. Since ancient Christian authors never speak of more than one “Gospel according to Peter,” it has been argued that only this text can be the one to which those authors refer. This is correct, but we should note that we know of other ancient Christian texts in which Peter appears as a first-person narrator, and these cannot be identified with the Gospel of Peter (cf. e.g., the Revelation of Peter 2; Acts of Peter and the Twelve Apostles 1.30–31 [NHC V, 1]).<sup>12</sup>

Secondly, although this inference is certainly very plausible, even if it is correct, we must bear in mind a second problem, viz. that the concrete textual form of a Gospel of Peter that for example Serapion of Antioch may have read at the end of the second century, need not be identical with the text which we find—in fragmentary form—in the Akhmîm Codex. Rather, we must assume that in the course of its transmission, the form of the text was altered to a greater or lesser extent.<sup>13</sup> This assumption is strengthened not only by the fact that the

<sup>10</sup> On the Akhmîm Codex, cf. T. J. Kraus and T. Nicklas, Petrusevangelium, 25–31.

<sup>11</sup> Unfortunately, the edition by D. Lührmann is open to misunderstanding on this point: Fragmente, 93.

<sup>12</sup> Cf. also T. Nicklas, “Ein ‘neutestamentliches Apokryphon’? Zum umstrittenen Kanonbezug des sog. ‘Petrusevangeliums’,” VigChr 56 (2002): 260–272, esp. 266.

<sup>13</sup> Nearly a century ago, O. Bardenhewer, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Litteratur 1: Vom Ausgang des Apostolischen Zeitalters bis zum Ende des zweiten Jahrhunderts, 2nd ed. (Freiburg: Herder, 1913 [reprint Darmstadt: WBG, 1962]), 368, wrote: “The most compelling proof of the popularity of the apocrypha is supplied by the remarkable character of their manuscript transmission. Parts of both the original texts and the translations are found even today in an extreme variety of reworkings, expansions, and abbreviations. There is surely no other literary field in which, with a frequency comparable to the apocrypha, each individual manuscript represents an individual text.” Cf. also the recent reflections by J. Tromp, “Zur Edition apokrypher Texte: Am Beispiel des griechischen Lebens Adams und Evas,” in Recent Developments in Textual Criticism. New Testament, Other Early Christian and Jewish Literature. Papers Read at a Noster Conference in Münster, January 4–6, 2001, ed. W. Weren and D.-A. Koch, STAR 8 (Assen: Royal van Gorcum, 2003), 189–205.

fragment of the Greek Revelation of Peter which is also found in the Akhmîm Codex very obviously belongs to a late redactional stage of this work,<sup>14</sup> but also—and above all—by P. Oxy. XLI 2949, the only other fragment known today that can be assigned with some measure of certainty to the Gospel of Peter: its extremely fragmentary text displays clear divergences from the parallels in the Akhmîm Codex.<sup>15</sup>

This means that the first result of our investigation is the following: One should not too simply equate the surviving text of the “Gospel of Peter” with the text that was read by early Christian authors of the second or third century.

This naturally reduces the value of the text in P. Cair. 10759 for the “quest of the historical Jesus.” It must also be asked whether it is methodologically possible (or meaningful) to undertake literary-critical analyses and identify hypothetical sources in a writing where textual criticism cannot with certainty identify the “original.”<sup>16</sup> Accordingly, we must be very cautious about accepting the reconstructions of a possible Cross Gospel or of earlier literary stages of the text which would point to a very early period.<sup>17</sup>

We cannot exclude the possibility that the surviving Gospel of Peter contains strands of earlier traditions, nor indeed that we may find such traditions in portions of the text that still await discovery. However, the value of the surviving text for the quest for the historical Jesus is extremely modest, for the following reasons.

First, the text seems hardly at all to reflect knowledge of the historical circumstances in Palestine at the time of Jesus: for the Gospel

<sup>14</sup> Perhaps it can even be regarded as a witness to another part of the Gospel of Peter. For more details see T. Nicklas, “Zwei petrinische Apokryphen im Akhmim-Codex? Kritische Anmerkungen und Gedanken,” Apocrypha 16 (2005): 75–96.

<sup>15</sup> On the problems connected with this textual witness, cf. T. J. Kraus and T. Nicklas, Petrusevangelium, 55–58.

<sup>16</sup> On the problems involved in speaking of the “original texts” of ancient Christian writings (here, with reference to the New Testament), cf. the suggestive reflections by E. J. Epp, “The Multivalence of the Term ‘Original Text’ in New Testament Textual Criticism,” HThR 92 (1999): 245–281.

<sup>17</sup> On this, cf. above all J. D. Crossan, Cross That Spoke. Cf. however also A. Dewey, “Time to Murder and Create’: Visions and Revisions in the Gospel of Peter,” Semeia 49 (1990): 101–128. Crossan’s reconstruction has been criticized from a great variety of perspectives; we need not list these in detail here. Cf. e.g., J. H. Charlesworth and C. A. Evans, “Jesus in the Agrapha and Apocryphal Gospels,” in Studying the Historical Jesus. Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 479–553, esp. 504–514, and the bibliography given there.

of Peter, the main figure in the trial of Jesus is “Herod the king” (v. 2), who pronounces the sentence on Jesus, and Pilate has to ask him for the corpse of Jesus, who is in fact not yet crucified (v. 4). Jesus is handed over to the people, and it is clear that it is they themselves who crucify him.<sup>18</sup> Historically speaking, this constellation is completely unthinkable; it can be understood only on the basis of a perspective which intensifies the tendency in the canonical gospels to emphasize the negative role of the “Jews” in Jesus’ trial, whereas the Roman authorities are portrayed as positively as possible.<sup>19</sup> It is true that Herod plays a minor role in the passion of Jesus as early as Luke 23:6–12, but a genuine collaboration between him and Pilate is found only in second-century texts (Justin, I Apol. 40.5–6, possibly on the basis of Ps 2 LXX); and parallels to the idea that it was Herod who gave the order for Jesus’ crucifixion are found only later (e.g., in the Syriac Didascalia 21; Melito, Paschal Homily 93; Acts of Andrew and Matthias 26; Manichaean Bema Psalm 241). Besides this, the text suggests that its author may not have been aware of the distinction between Herod the Great and his son Herod Antipas (cf. however Mark 6:14 and John 4:46).<sup>20</sup> Similar (sometimes even clearer) tendencies to confuse the two figures are found in other apocrypha of the second and third centuries too, e.g., the Acts of Peter 8.

Secondly, the Christology of the text likewise points to an advanced stage of early Christian tradition. The evaluation of the text as a document of docetic Christology—due primarily to the testimony of

<sup>18</sup> The one-sidedly negative portrait of the “Jews” in the Gospel of Peter is not however completely consistent. For further details, cf. T. Nicklas, “Die ‘Juden’ im Petrus-evangelium (PCair. 10759). Ein Testfall,” NTS 47 (2001): 206–221.

<sup>19</sup> On the hostility of the text to the Romans, cf. the brief remarks by C. Bussmann, “Josef, der Freund des Pilatus und des Herrn’ (Petrusevangelium 2). Ein Blick auf das Verhältnis Ecclesia-Imperium in den sogenannten Apokryphen zum Neuen Testament,” in Rom und das himmlische Jerusalem. Die frühen Christen zwischen Anpassung und Ablehnung, ed. R. von Haehling (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 2000), 85–96, esp. 90–91.—But for a more balanced view see now H. Omerzu, “Die Pilatusgestalt im Petrus-evangelium,” in Das Evangelium nach Petrus: Text, Kontexte, Intertexte, ed. T. J. Kraus and T. Nicklas, TU 158 (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 2007), 327–347.

<sup>20</sup> Cf. also K. Beyschlag, Die verborgene Überlieferung von Christus (München and Hamburg: Siebenstern Taschenbuch Verlag, 1969), 44–45: “Historically, the entire picture is imaginary. Obviously, the author is completely unaware that ‘King Herod’ had died long before the date at which Jesus was executed. He confuses... the Galilean tetrarch Herod Antipas... with this Herod, and this leads him to construct a Jewish authority to perform executions which... did not in the least exist in Palestine at the time of Jesus’ death.”

Serapion, mentioned above—seems indeed to have been abandoned, not only because scholars have found it necessary to emphasize the problematic character of the concept of docetism,<sup>21</sup> but also because the text of the Gospel of Peter has been given a fresh interpretation. Nevertheless, a number of traits in the text, such as the consistent use of the term κύριος for Jesus<sup>22</sup> and the (probable) interpretation of his death as a martyrdom, exhibit a closeness to writings such as the Martyrdom of Polycarp<sup>23</sup> and point clearly to a date in the second century. Similarly, the tendency to strengthen the role of Peter and to underplay that of the women at the tomb seems more in keeping with a late period in the gospel tradition.<sup>24</sup> A late date is also indicated by the fiction that the text is the work of Peter himself.<sup>25</sup> Less significant for the dating of the text—but an important indicator of its scanty historical credibility—seem to me its tendencies to exaggerate the miraculous element in the resurrection of Jesus, which takes place (doubtless for apologetic reasons) before a large number of eye-witnesses.<sup>26</sup>

<sup>21</sup> The decisive impulse here came from N. Brox, “Doketismus’—eine Problemanzeige,” ZKG 95 (1984): 301–314.

<sup>22</sup> This view is also taken by H.-J. Klauck, Apokryphe Evangelien, 117. “The Lord” is nowhere given the name “Jesus of Nazareth,” or even the title “Christ.”

<sup>23</sup> For further details, cf. P. M. Head, “On the Christology of the Gospel of Peter,” VigChr 46 (1992): 209–224, esp. 212–213. See also T. Nicklas, “Die Leiblichkeit der Gepeinigten. Das Petrus-evangelium und frühchristliche Märtyrerakten,” in Martyrdom and Persecution in Late Ancient Christianity, ed. J. Leemans, BETL 241 (Leuven: Peters, 2011).

<sup>24</sup> However, caution is required in using this argument: a variety in the presentation of the role of women need not reflect diachronic historical developments, but may just as well reflect a variety of synchronous perspectives. On this problem, cf. especially A. Graham Brock, Mary Magdalene, the First Apostle: The Struggle for Authority, HTS 51 (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2003), 65–71.

<sup>25</sup> This is the view of W. Rebell, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen und Apostolische Väter (München: Kaiser, 1992), 97.

<sup>26</sup> The interest in the miraculous did not intensify with the passage of time; rather, this is a sign of the milieu in which the text was composed. As yet, scarcely any detailed grammatical investigations which would permit us to locate the text on the basis of linguistic particularities, have been carried out (but cf. J. Karavidopoulos, “‘Hapax legomena’ et autres mots rares dans l’Évangile Apocryphe de Pierre,” Apocrypha 8 [1997]: 225–230; F. Weissengruber, “Grammatische Untersuchungen zum Petrus-evangelium,” in Das Petrus-evangelium, ed. A. Fuchs, SNTU B 2 (Freistadt: Plöchl, 1978), 121–144, and now: T. J. Kraus, “Die Sprache des Petrus-evangeliums? Methodische Anmerkungen und Vorüberlegungen,” in Das Evangelium nach Petrus: Text, Kontexte, Intertexte, ed. T. J. Kraus and T. Nicklas, TU 158 (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 2007), 61–76, and S. E. Porter, “The Greek of the Gospel of Peter,” ibidem, 77–90). We must also draw attention to the problem that individual linguistic

Thirdly, the only logion of Jesus—for otherwise “the Lord” is silent (cf. v. 10)—in the Gospel of Peter is found in v. 19a. The sentence ἡ δύναμις μου, ἡ δύναμις, κατέλειψάς με is best understood against the background of Mark 15:34 par. Matt 27:46. The last words of Jesus in these two synoptic scenes must already be understood as a sign of theological reflection on the event of the passion with the aid of Ps 22; here, this is further developed by means of the circumlocution δύναμις for God.<sup>27</sup> This makes it pointless to assert that these are the words of the historical Jesus.

Fourthly, it follows that the Gospel of Peter is less valuable as a source of information about the “historical Jesus” than as a witness to the further developments (doubtless historically conditioned) of the texts and traditions about the passion and resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth which continued to be handed on both in writing and by word of mouth. It is also a witness to developments in theology and possibly also in piety. And it is a text that can stimulate the discussion of the role of scripture in early Christian reflection on the Christ event.<sup>28</sup>

1.2. Unidentifiable Fragments in Greek

1.2.1.

One of the most important candidates for a fresh evaluation in the context of investigation into the historical Jesus is the so-called “unknown Gospel” on P. Egerton 2 and P. Cologne 255 (occasionally, secondary literature refers somewhat unfortunately to this text as the “Egerton” Gospel).

---

observations do not permit a dating, since it is possible that these details entered the text only in the process of its transmission. Cf. however the methodologically problematic approach by F. Weissengruber, “Zur Datierung des Petrusevangeliums,” in Das Petrusevangelium, ed. A. Fuchs, 117–120.

<sup>27</sup> On the other differences vis-à-vis the canonical texts, on the question whether this logion belongs within Gnosis (e.g., in Valentinianism), and on the interpretation sketched above, cf. P. M. Head, “Christology,” 213–214.

<sup>28</sup> The first to make this point was M. Dibelius, “Die alttestamentlichen Motive in der Leidensgeschichte des Petrus- und des Johannesevangeliums,” in idem, Botschaft und Geschichte 1: Zur Evangelienforschung (Tübingen: Mohr, 1953), 221–247 (first published in 1918). Cf. however also the observations by H. Koester, Ancient Christian Gospels: Their History and Development (Harrisburg: Trinity International, 1990), 221–230, and T. Hieke, “Das Petrusevangelium vom Alten Testament her gelesen,” in Das Evangelium nach Petrus: Text, Kontexte, Intertexte, ed. T. J. Kraus and T. Nicklas, TU 158 (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 2007), 91–115.

P. Egerton 2 (= P. Lond. Christ. 1) came via Egyptian dealers in antiquities into the possession of the British National Library. When the manuscript was published by H. I. Bell and T. C. Skeat in 1935, it quickly caused a sensation,<sup>29</sup> since the two editors dated the fragment to the mid-second century. At that time, this made P. Egerton 2 the earliest known Christian manuscript.<sup>30</sup> Since this manuscript was testimony to an apocryphal gospel, the significance of at least some ancient Christian apocrypha for early Christianity came to be seen in a new light.

P. Egerton 2 consists of remnants of three leaves from a codex, written in one column on both sides (11.5 × 9.2 cm; 11.8 × 9.7 cm; 6 × 2.3 cm).<sup>31</sup> It is no longer possible to specify with certainty the height of the pages, since the lower margin of the fragments is missing. The lines are ca. 9 cm in breadth, with a margin on the side. A little more than fifty years after the edition by Bell and Skeat, the question of the dating of P. Egerton 2 was posed anew by the discovery and edition of P. Cologne 255, a fragment measuring 5.5 × 3 cm, which comes from the same papyrus codex as P. Egerton 2.<sup>32</sup> Not only does P. Cologne 255 offer an expansion of fragment 1 of P. Egerton 2 from line 19 verso and line 39 recto, amounting to five lines in each case; an apostrophe between the consonants γ and κ of the word ἀνενεγκον (line 44) argues for a late dating of the manuscript to ca. 200.<sup>33</sup>

This somewhat later dating of the only surviving manuscript of the “unknown gospel” is not in the least an argument that could be leveled

---

<sup>29</sup> H. I. Bell and T. C. Skeat, eds., Fragments of an Unknown Gospel and Other Early Christian Papyri (London: Trustees of the British Museum, 1935): “[I]t is unquestionably the earliest specifically Christian manuscript yet discovered in Egypt” (1). For a new commentary on the “unknown gospel” see now T. Nicklas, “The ‘Unknown Gospel’ on Papyrus Egerton 2 (+ Papyrus Colojne 255),” in T. J. Kraus, M. J. Kruger and T. Nicklas, Gospel Fragments, Oxford Early Christian Gospel Texts (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2009, 9–120).

<sup>30</sup> P. Egerton 2 lost this rank shortly afterwards, thanks to P. Ryl. 3.457, better known as P52 (John Rylands Library, Manchester, Gr.P. 457), from the first half of the second century, which contains remnants of John 18:31–33, 37–38.

<sup>31</sup> This also makes the manuscript one of the earliest witnesses to the ancient Christian preference for the codex rather than the scroll.

<sup>32</sup> Cf. M. Gronewald, “255. Unbekanntes Evangelium oder Evangelienharmonie (Fragment aus dem ‘Evangelium Egerton’), in Kölner Papyri (P. Koln) 6, ed. M. Gronewald et al., ARWAW. PapyCol VII (Opladen: Westdeutscher Verlag, 1987), 136–145, esp. 136: “The little fragment comes from the same papyrus codex as P. Lond. Christ. 1, better known as P. Egerton 2.”

<sup>33</sup> Cf. M. Gronewald, “Unbekanntes Evangelium,” 137.

against an early dating of the text in P. Egerton 2 and P. Cologne 255.<sup>34</sup> The arguments pro and contra in this question depend on the text alone—which however presents a number of problems.

First, the sequence in which the individual fragments should be ordered within the text as a whole is unresolved. Originally, it was thought probable that P. Egerton 2 fr. 1 verso, a dispute between Jesus and the “teachers of the law” or “the rulers of the people,” should be read before fr. 1 recto, which narrates an attempt to stone Jesus and then speaks of the healing of a leper. This makes sense per se, since the attempted stoning would be regarded as the conclusion to the dispute. However, the discovery of P. Cologne 255, which follows on fr. 1, prompts the question whether—on the analogy of the relation between the text which we now have and Johannine parallels—the reversed sequence is more likely.<sup>35</sup> A certain decision is not possible; besides this, the relationship between fr. 2 and the text as a whole is not completely clear. Fr. 3 offers so little text (a parallel to John 10:30–32 is probable) that it is impossible to reconstruct it, still less to locate it in the text as a whole.

Secondly, the text of fr. 2 verso, which very obviously appears to go back to a tradition different from that of the canonical gospels, is so fragmentary that one can only suppose in very general terms that it describes a miracle (perhaps a miraculous gift) which may perhaps be the response to an introductory question and has something to do with the river Jordan.<sup>36</sup>

Since space does not permit a detailed discussion of the numerous problems associated with the “unknown gospel,” let me mention only a few important points with regard to the quest for the historical Jesus. The relationship between the “unknown Gospel” and the canonical Gospels is a matter of dispute. While some exegetes maintain the total independence of this text from the canonical texts, others hold it probable that it depends on all four canonical Gospels.<sup>37</sup> The following ideas seem to me to be plausible.

---

<sup>34</sup> Even with this later dating, the “unknown Gospel” is still attested at an earlier date than the canonical Gospel of Mark, the oldest known witness to which, P45, is dated to the third century.

<sup>35</sup> This view is taken e.g., by D. Lührmann, Die apokryph gewordenen Evangelien, 137.

<sup>36</sup> The attempted reconstructions diverge so widely that it is impossible to answer the further question about the potential historicity of the narrative.

<sup>37</sup> For example, J. B. Daniels, The Egerton Gospel: Its Place in Early Christianity (unpublished dissertation at Claremont), Ann Arbor: University Microfiches 1990, pleads for independence vis-à-vis the canonical gospels; he is followed by H. Koester,

(1) The discovery of P. Cologne 255 makes it more plausible to postulate a close and probably literary link between the “unknown gospel” and the Gospel of John. Here, the most likely assumption is that the “unknown gospel” in its present form presupposes the Gospel of John.<sup>38</sup>

(2) A number of parallels to the synoptic texts can also be observed. Here, I believe that it is much more difficult to determine whether the “unknown gospel” presupposes one or more of the canonical Gospels in a written form. At the least, the knowledge of synoptic traditions is extremely probable.<sup>39</sup>

(3) Unlike Tatian’s Diatessaron, however, the “unknown gospel” should not be regarded as a mere harmonization of the texts that had become canonical. Where canonical (or related) texts or traditions are adopted and reworked, this is done in a manner that shows that the “unknown gospel” lays claim to an autonomous position in the history of early Christian theology.<sup>40</sup> At the same time, it is also clear, at least on the basis of fr. 2 verso, that in addition to the texts and traditions

---

Ancient Christian Gospels: Their History and Development (Harrisburg: Trinity International, 1990), 205–216. The opposite position is asserted vehemently by F. Neiryck, “The Apocryphal Gospels and the Gospel of Mark,” in Evangelica II 1982–1991, BETL 89 (Leuven: Peeters, 1991), 715–772, esp. 753–759, 771–772; idem, “Papyrus Egerton 2 and the Healing of the Leper,” ibid., 773–785. Many scholars agree with Neiryck. Cf. also T. Heckel, Vom Evangelium des Markus zum viergestaltigen Evangelium WUNT 120 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1999), 300–368. For a more detailed discussion see now T. Nicklas, “P.Egerton 2”; and idem, “Das ‘unbekannte Evangelium’ auf P.Egerton 2 und die ‘Schrift,’” Studien zum Neuen Testament und seiner Umwelt 33 (2008): 41–65.

<sup>38</sup> This view is also taken by J. W. Pryor, “Papyrus Egerton 2 and the Fourth Gospel,” ABR 37 (1989): 1–13; E. Norelli, “La papyrus Egerton 2 et sa localisation dans la tradition sur Jésus. Nouvel examen du fragment 1,” in Jésus de Nazareth. Nouvelles approches d’une énigme, ed. D. Marguerat et al., MoBi 38 (Geneva: Labor et Fides, 1998), 397–435, esp. 427–430; T. Nagel, Die Rezeption des Johannesevangeliums im 2. Jahrhundert. Studien zur vorirenäischen Aneignung und Auslegung des vierten Evangeliums in christlicher und christlich-agnostischer Literatur, Arbeiten zur Bibel und ihrer Geschichte 2 (Leipzig: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 2000), 206–207.

<sup>39</sup> On this point, I follow the cautious argumentation by E. Norelli, “La papyrus Egerton 2.” A similar position is taken by J. W. Pryor, “Papyrus Egerton 2.”

<sup>40</sup> I have indicated important aspects of this topic in my Habilitation dissertation Christliche Apokryphen lesen. For example, the question discussed in fr. 2 recto, whether it is permissible to give kings that which is appropriate to their sovereignty, is formulated in a manner completely different from the question about tax in Mark 12:13–17 par., which is often adduced as a parallel. An investigation of the text which does not concentrate exclusively on the question of literary dependencies shows that it is more than merely a “free retelling of individual pericopae from all four canonical Gospels” (as is maintained by T. Heckel, Vom Evangelium des Markus, 308).

from canonical gospels known to us, the author drew on unknown material. Unfortunately, however, the condition of fr. 2 verso allows only hypotheses about the exact profile of these traditions, and this means that no reliable consequences can be drawn on the historical level.—Since it survives only in a fragmentary form, the “unknown gospel” in P. Egerton 2 and P. Cologne 255 can be used only to a very limited extent as a witness in the quest for the historical Jesus, thanks to what it tells us about the development (and possibilities of development) of synoptic traditions and to the possibility that it may once have contained extra-canonical information about Jesus—and we may at least hope that this information will one day be rediscovered.

In addition to the relatively extensive manuscript P. Egerton 2, some other fragments bear witness to texts which with a greater or lesser degree of certainty can be categorized as remnants of apocryphal gospels (or as excerpts or quotations from such texts, etc.), but which cannot be assigned to any text mentioned specifically by ancient Christian authors.

1.2.2.

The best known of these texts is certainly the narrative in P. Oxy. V 840, which most likely comes from an apocryphal Gospel.<sup>41</sup> On a total of 45 surviving lines on a parchment leaf from a miniature codex measuring 7.4 × 8.8 cm,<sup>42</sup> probably dating from the fourth century, we find a text which recalls synoptic scenes and which can be divided into two parts. Up to the middle of line 7, fragments of logia of Jesus, probably addressed to his disciples, have been preserved. A space in the manuscripts separates this section from the second part, a dispute between Jesus and a Pharisee high or chief priest about questions of cultic <sup>41</sup> Editio princeps: B. P. Grenfell and A. S. Hunt, “840. Fragment of an Uncanonical Gospel,” in The Oxyrhynchus Papyri 5 (London: Egypt Exploration Society, 1908), 1–10, fig. 1. For a detailed discussion of the text and its backgrounds see now M. J. Kruger, The Gospel of the Savior. An Analysis of P.Oxy. 840 and its place in Gospel Traditions of Early Christianity, TENT 1 (Leiden: Brill, 2005). I disagree with Kruger’s quite optimistic view of the author’s knowledge about the circumstances in the Jerusalem temple. See T. Nicklas, “Critical Study: M. Kruger, The Gospel of the Savior,” in Apocrypha 17 (2006): 329–336.

<sup>42</sup> In the past, P. Oxy. V 840 was often held to be an amulet, but this identification is doubtful. We may agree with M. J. Kruger, “P. Oxy. 840: Amulet or Miniature Codex,” JThS 53 (2002): 83–94, and T. J. Kraus, “P. Oxy. V 840—Amulett oder Miniaturkodex? Grundsätzliche und ergänzende Anmerkungen,” ZAC 8 (2004), that the fragment is a miniature codex.

purity (the closest canonical parallels are Mark 7:1–23 and Matt 15:1–20). We see Jesus entering the ἀγνευτήριον (“inner sanctuary”?) of the (or a?) temple. A Pharisee ἀρχιερεύς named Levi appears and asks Jesus who gave him permission to enter the sanctuary and to look at the sacred vessels. Jesus and his disciples are accused of being in a state of insufficient purity. Jesus then asks the priest if he is pure. When the priest answers in the affirmative, Jesus berates him as “blind”: in the waters in which the priest has bathed, swine lie day and night, and he has rubbed down the skin of his body as do the prostitutes and female flute players, who nevertheless are full of scorpions and all evil within. But Jesus and his disciples have bathed in waters (of life?/of eternal life?). At this point, the fragment breaks off.

From the very beginning, scholarly discussion of this text has centered almost exclusively on its alleged value as a source with reference to the question of the historical Jesus. For a long time, positions were starkly divided—for example, while J. Jeremias spoke of a “powerful witness to the authority of Jesus,”<sup>43</sup> T. Zahn dismissed the text as “nonsense that runs counter to history.”<sup>44</sup>

Scholars have questioned whether a Pharisee as ἀρχιερεύς is conceivable at the time of Jesus, and various translations of this noun have therefore been proposed;<sup>45</sup> whether the buildings in the temple mentioned in this text are compatible with those of the temple in Jerusalem; and whether the text reflects Jewish practices at the time of Jesus.

Although the scene in the temple described in P. Oxy. V 840 does seem in principle to be compatible with the practices in the temple in Jerusalem in the first century,<sup>46</sup> we should not suppose that we have here the historically reliable account of a detailed scene that can be

<sup>43</sup> J. Jeremias, “Der Zusammenstoß Jesu mit dem pharisäischen Oberpriester auf dem Tempelplatz. Zu Pap. Ox. 840,” in Seminarium Neotestamenticum Upsaliense, ed. Coniectanea Neotestamentica XI in honorem Antonii Fridrichsen sexagenarii (Lund and Copenhagen: C. W. K. Gleerup, 1947), 97–108, esp. 97. See also idem, Unbekannte Jesusworte. Unter Mitwirkung von O. Hofius völlig neu bearbeitete Ausgabe (Ath ANT 16; (Gütersloh, Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 3rd ed. 1963): Gerd Mohn, 50–62, esp. 52: “a pearl of Gospel narrative art.”

<sup>44</sup> T. Zahn, “Neue Bruchstücke nichtkanonischer Evangelien,” NKZ 19 (1908): 371–386, esp. 379–380.

<sup>45</sup> It is in this context that we should understand the recent critical remarks by O. Hofius in his review of D. Lührmann, Fragmente apokryph gewordener Evangelien, MThSt 59 (Marburg: N. G. Elwert Verlag, 2000); ThLZ 126 (2001): 906–907, esp. 907. Hofius argues that ἀρχιερεύς should be translated as “chief priest,” not as “high priest.”

<sup>46</sup> This is the position taken by M. J. Kruger in the abstract of his dissertation.

located in the life of Jesus. The Jewish opponent of Jesus (Pharisee + high/chief priest + Levi) can be viewed as a “synthesis” of all the designations of Jewish opponents in early Christian texts, and the dialogue seems to presuppose the existence of several canonical passages (Luke 11:37–52; Matt 23:1–39; John 7:1–52; John 13:10; Mark 7:1–23). This text, which may have its origin in a Jewish Christian group in Syria in the mid-second century, thus presupposes all the canonical gospels.<sup>47</sup> Accordingly, although it is not unlikely that the historical Jesus was in fact involved in discussions of the halakhah about purity,<sup>48</sup> we may be certain that this text offers us no new information about the Jesus of history. This, however, does not mean that P. Oxy. V 840 is devoid of historical interest: the text reflects questions and debates which were important to Christian groups of (probably) the second century. P. Oxy. V 840 is also an early archaeological testimony to Christianity in ancient Upper Egypt, where interest in this text obviously continued into the fourth century, when it was written down on the miniature codex.

Something comparable can be said (in varying degrees) of each of the other known fragments:

1.2.3.

P. Oxy. II 210 (third century)<sup>49</sup> is a fragment measuring 17.2 × 9.4 cm of a papyrus written on both sides which unfortunately has survived only in a very fragmentary form.<sup>50</sup> The suggestion by the first editors,

<sup>47</sup> Cf. M. J. Kruger, ibid.

<sup>48</sup> On this, cf. e.g., T. Kazen, Jesus and Purity Halakhah: Was Jesus Indifferent to Purity?, CB NT 38 (Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 2002), 256–260, esp. 260: “Thus we must treat this tradition [viz., P. Oxy. V 840] as another piece of evidence retaining the memory of displaying a controversial attitude to purity, which was motivated by giving more weight to inner purity than outer purification.”

<sup>49</sup> Editio princeps: B. P. Grenfell and A. S. Hunt, The Oxyrhynchus Papyri 2 (London: Egypt Exploration Society, 1899), 9–10. New editions with a large number of different textual decisions have been made by C. H. Roberts, “An Early Christian Papyrus,” in Miscellanea Papirologica Ramon Roca-Puig en el Seu Vuitantè Aniversari (Barcelona: Fundació Salvador Vives Casajuana, 1987), 93–196, and S. E. Porter, “POxy II 210 as an Apocryphal Gospel and the Development of Egyptian Christianity,” in Atti del XXII Congresso Internazionale di Papirologia, Firenze, 23–29 agosto 1998, ed. I. Andorlini et al., 2 (Florence: Istituto papirologico G. Vitelli, 2001), 1095–1118. For further information cf. idem, “Papyrus Oxyrhynchus 201 (P. Oxy. II 210),” in Antike christliche Apokryphen, ed. C. Marksches and J. Schröter (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2010).

<sup>50</sup> Only two or three letters are legible on a second, very small fragment of the same papyrus.

Grenfell and Hunt, that this text comes from the Gospel of the Egyptians,<sup>51</sup> was not accepted by other scholars. Where the text can be reconstructed, we find parallels to Mark 10:17–19 par. and Matt 7:17–19 par., reflections of the Johannine “I”-language, but also parallels to texts in the Corpus Paulinum. It is relatively probable that this is a fragment of an apocryphal gospel which already presupposes canonical gospels and offers a new interpretation of these in connection with texts and motifs from the epistolary literature of the New Testament, in the context of Egyptian Christianity.<sup>52</sup>

1.2.4.

P. Merton II 51,<sup>53</sup> a papyrus fragment measuring only 3.9 × 5.3 cm, is dated by its editors to the third century. The text is reconstructed with the help of canonical parallels; it may be a passage from an apocryphal gospel, with a parallel to Luke 6:7 (cf. also Gos. Thom. 45).

1.2.5.

P. Oxy. X 1224<sup>54</sup> (fourth century) is the name given to two papyrus leaves, written on both sides, from a codex which was originally more extensive. Two columns can be discerned on the larger fragment 2 (6.3 × 13.1 cm). The text that can be reconstructed displays parallels to Mark 2:15–17 par.; Matt 5:44; Luke 6:27–28; Mark 9:40; Luke 9:50. J. Jeremias has argued in favor of the authenticity of the apocryphal logion: [He who today] stands far off will tomorrow be [near to you] on fr. 2 recto col. 1.<sup>55</sup>

<sup>51</sup> Cf. B. P. Grenfell and A. S. Hunt, Oxyrhynchus Papyri 2, 9.

<sup>52</sup> Cf. S. E. Porter, “POxy II as an Apocryphal Gospel,” 1108.

<sup>53</sup> Editio princeps: B. R. Rees, H. I. Bell, and J. W. B. Barnes, A Descriptive Catalogue of the Greek papyri in the Collection of Wilfred Merton 2 (Dublin: Walker, 1959), 1–4. For information, cf. D. Lührmann, Fragmente, 155–157, and T. J. Kraus, “Papyrus Merton 51 (P. Merton II 51),” in Antike christliche Apokryphen, ed. C. Marksches and J. Schröter (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2010).

<sup>54</sup> Editio princeps: B. P. Grenfell and A. S. Hunt, The Oxyrhynchus Papyri 10 (London: Egypt Exploration Society, 1914), 1–10. For information, cf. also D. Lührmann, Fragmente, 170–177, and T. J. Kraus, “Papyrus Oxyrhynchus 1224 (P. Oxy. X 224),” Antike christliche Apokryphen, ed. C. Marksches and J. Schröter (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2010).

<sup>55</sup> Cf. J. Jeremias, Unbekannte Jesusworte, 91–92, esp. 92: “It is hard to imagine what objection could be made to the genuineness of this brief sentence. The following arguments favor authenticity: (1) the fact that it is coupled with two well known (and freely quoted) logia of Jesus; (2) the antithetical parallelismus membrorum, which Jesus liked to use [...]; (3) the contents.”

1.2.6.

P. Oxy. LX 4009<sup>56</sup> is a papyrus fragment 9 cm in height and 2.9 cm in breadth, written on both sides. It is dated to the second century, or possibly to the third. Although no reconstruction of the text on the verso has so far been successful, D. Lührmann, drawing on synoptic logia (Matt 9:37–38 par.; Matt 10:16b [Gos. Thom. 39]; Matt 10:16a par; Matt 10:27 par.) and 2 Clement 5.2–4, has presented a reconstruction at least of the recto of the papyrus.<sup>57</sup> This means that at any rate we have here a parallel to an apocryphal logion of Jesus which is attested by the apostolic fathers at an early date.

1.2.7.

The so-called Fayyûm Gospel, P. Vindob. G 2325, is a small fragment measuring 3.5 × 4.3 cm of a papyrus written on one side, which can be dated to the third century CE.<sup>58</sup> The fragmentary text which has survived may come from an apocryphal gospel. It offers a parallel to Mark 14:27–30 par. (without v. 28).<sup>59</sup> Linguistically, the occurrence of two New Testament hapax legomena (ἀλεκτρούων for “cockereel” and κοκκύζω for “crowing”) is remarkable.

---

<sup>56</sup> Editio princeps: D. Lührmann and P. J. Parsons, “4009. Gospel of Peter?,” in The Oxyrhynchus Papyri 60 (London: Egypt Exploration Society, 1994), 1–5. Cf. also D. Lührmann, “POx 4009. Ein neues Fragment des Petrus-evangeliums,” NT 35 (1993): 390–410; idem, Fragmente, 78–79; T. J. Kraus and T. Nicklas, Petrusevangelium, 59–63.

<sup>57</sup> We should however note that the “gospel” attested in 2 Clement itself clearly refers back to the canonical gospels. On this point, cf. Lührmann, Fragmente, 132–137.

<sup>58</sup> On the edition, cf. now T. J. Kraus, “P. Vindob. G 2325: Das sogenannte Fayûm-Evangelium—Neuedition und kritische Rückschlüsse,” ZAC 5 (2001): 197–212; T. J. Kraus and T. Nicklas, Petrusevangelium, 65–68, with a reconstruction differing somewhat from that of D. Lührmann, Fragmente, 80–81, which makes it improbable that this text comes from the Gospel of Peter. Cf. also T. J. Kraus, “P. Vindob. G 2325: Einige Modifikationen von Transkription und Rekonstruktion,” ZAC 9 (2005) and idem, “P. Vindob. G 2325: The So-called Fayum-Gospel—Re-Edition and Some Critical Conclusions,” in his Ad fontes. Original Manuscripts and their Significance for Studying Early Christianity. Selected Essays, TENT 3 (Leiden: Brill, 2007), 69–94.

<sup>59</sup> On this, cf. J. B. Bauer, “Schriftrezeption in den neutestamentlichen Apokryphen,” in Stimuli. Exegese und ihre Hermeneutik in Antike und Christentum: Festschrift Ernst Dassmann, ed. G. Schöllgen and C. Scholten, JAC E 23 (Münster: Aschendorff, 1996), 43–48, esp. 44–45.

1.2.8.

P. Dura 10 is a nearly rectangular papyrus fragment measuring 9.5 × 10.5 cm written on one side. At least parts of its fourteen lines of Greek text are legible. It was discovered in March 1933, in the course of excavations in Dura-Europos in Syria (destroyed in 256/257). The fragment (0212 in the list of Gregory-Aland) can be dated to the third century. It contains a passage from a gospel harmony, or possibly from a homily based on such a harmony, probably a version of the Greek Diatessaron of Tatian.<sup>60</sup>

It is possible that other fragments (P. Cair. 10735; P. Berol. 11710; P. Aberd. 3; P. Ryl. III 463; PSI XI 1200bis; P. Oxy. XI 1384) may come from apocryphal Gospels; but because of the small amount of text that has been preserved, and/or because of their late date, they scarcely have anything to offer to a quest for the historical Jesus.<sup>61</sup>

1.3. The So-called “Unknown Berlin Gospel” (UBG; “Gospel of the Savior”)

In 1967, the Egyptian Museum in Berlin purchased the remains of a sixth-century parchment manuscript. It was not until 1991 that this was examined more closely by P. Mirecki; it was first published in 1999 as Gospel of the Savior.<sup>62</sup> The editio princeps by Hedrick and

---

<sup>60</sup> On the discovery of the fragment, cf. C. Hopkins, The Discovery of Dura-Europos (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1979). The editio princeps by C. H. Kraeling, A Greek Fragment of Tatian’s Diatessaron from Dura, StD 3 (London: Christophers, 1935) was corrected on some points by C. B. Welles et al., The Excavations at Dura-Europos Conducted by Yale University and the French Academy of Inscriptions and Letters. Final Report V.1: The Parchments and Papyri (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1959). A new investigation of the manuscript, with a new description, several corrections, and a new interpretation was undertaken by D. C. Parker, D. K. G. Taylor, and M. S. Goodacre, “The Dura-Europos Gospel Harmony,” in Studies in the Early Text of the Gospels and Acts, TS NS 1 (Birmingham: University of Birmingham Press, 1999), 192–228; they doubt whether this text comes from the Diatessaron. For a critique of this position, cf. however J. Joosten, “The Dura Parchment and the Diatessaron,” VigChr 57 (2003): 159–175.

<sup>61</sup> Let me emphasize once again that this judgment does not mean that these fragments are uninteresting per se, or that they lack any historical value.

<sup>62</sup> C. W. Hedrick and P. A. Mirecki, Gospel of the Savior. A New Ancient Gospel, California Classical Library, (Santa Rosa, CA: Polebridge, 1999). Cf. also C. W. Hedrick, “A Preliminary Report on Coptic Codex P. Berol. Inv. 22220,” in Ägypten und Nubien in spätantiker und christlicher Zeit. Akten des 6. Internationalen Koptologenkongresses, Münster, 20.-26. Juli 1996 2: Schrifttum, Sprache und Gedankenwelt, ed. S. Emmel et al., Sprachen und Kulturen des Christlichen Orients 6.2 (Wiesbaden: Reichert, 1999), 127–130.

Mirecki was soon criticized by S. Emmel, who proposed a different sequence of the fragments.<sup>63</sup>

The text, in Sahidic Coptic, presents a dialogue between the Redeemer and his disciples which recalls the farewell discourses in the Gospel of John.<sup>64</sup> We can thus recognize a large number of parallels to canonical logia of Jesus. The initial euphoria which flourished especially in non-academic circles<sup>65</sup> has however yielded place to a sober consideration of this text. Cautious suggestions that it might be a witness to the Gospel of Peter must be judged unconvincing;<sup>66</sup> but scholars discuss whether the extremely fragmentary (and insufficiently edited) fragment of the Strasbourg Coptic Gospel<sup>67</sup> may be the remains of a second manuscript of the Gospel of the Savior.<sup>68</sup> It is no longer possible to maintain the early dating of the text to ca. 200 on the supposition that UBG presupposes the canonical Gospels of Matthew and John but

---

<sup>63</sup> Cf. S. Emmel, "The Recently Published Gospel of the Savior ('Unbekanntes Berliner Evangelium'): Righting the Order of Pages and Events," HThR 95 (2002): 45–72; idem, "Preliminary Reedition and Translation of the Gospel of the Savior: New Light on the Strasbourg Coptic Gospel and the Stauros Text from Nubia," Apocrypha 14 (2003): 9–53. See however also the reply by C. W. Hedrick, "Caveats to a 'Righted Order' of the Gospel of the Savior," HThR 96 (2003): 229–238.

<sup>64</sup> On this, cf. e.g., J. Frey, "Leidenskampf und Himmelsreise. Das Berliner Evangelienfragment (Papyrus Berolinensis 22220) und die Gethsemane-Tradition," BZ NF 46 (2002): 71–96, and T. Nagel, "Das 'Unbekannte Berliner Evangelium' und das Johannesevangelium," ZNW 93 (2002): 251–267.

<sup>65</sup> Cf. e.g., the quotations from newspapers in U.-K. Plisch, Verborgene Worte Jesu, 28.

<sup>66</sup> Cf. the cautious remarks by H.-M. Schenke, "Das sogenannte 'Unbekannte Berliner Evangelium'," ZAC 2 (1998): 199–213, esp. 205–207.

<sup>67</sup> The edition by A. Jacoby, Ein neues Evangelienfragment (Strasbourg: Verlag von Karl J. Trübner, 1900), 6–12, fig. I–IV, was immediately criticized very severely by C. Schmidt in his review in GCA 162.6 (1900): 481–506. Among more recent scholarship, cf. especially D. A. Bertrand, "Papyrus Strasbourg copte 5–6," in Écrits apocryphes chrétiens 1, ed. F. Bovon and P. Geoltrain (Paris: Gallimard, 1997), 425–428.

<sup>68</sup> Cf. S. Emmel, "Unbekanntes Berliner Evangelium = Strasbourg Coptic Gospel: Prolegomena to a New Edition of the Strasbourg Fragments," in For the Children, Perfect Instruction. Studies in Honor of Hans-Martin Schenke on the Occasion of the Berliner Arbeitskreis für koptisch-gnostische Schriften's Thirtieth Year, ed. H.-G. Bethge et al., NHMS 54 (Leiden: Brill, 2002), 353–374; idem, "'The Gospel of the Savior': A New Witness to the Strasbourg Coptic Gospel," Bulletin de l'AEIAC 12 (2002): 9–12; idem, "Preliminary Reedition and Translation of the Gospel of the Savior: New Light on the Strasbourg Coptic Gospel and the Stauros-Text from Nubia," Apocrypha 14 (2003): 9–53, esp. 13–20. See the critical remarks by P. Nagel, "Zur Herkunft und Datierung des 'Unbekannten Berliner Evangeliums'," ZNW 94 (2003): 219–223.

does not use these in the sense of written, still less of normative sources.<sup>69</sup> Linguistic investigations by P. Nagel shed doubt on the thesis that this text is translated from Greek:<sup>70</sup> some passages are clearly dependent not only on the canonical gospels, but in fact on the Sahidic translation of these passages (e.g., UBG 98.63–99.3 = Matt 26:31; UBG 102.6–9 = Matt 26:39 [P. Morg. 569]; etc.).<sup>71</sup> According to P. Nagel, both the Christology and the understanding of the eucharist speak for a genesis of the text in Upper Egypt in the second third of the fifth century (or even later) in a milieu in which the treatises of Shenouda too were written.<sup>72</sup> This judgment was confirmed by the independent discoveries by S. Emmel, who sees close links between UBG and the Nubian cross-text and has noted points of reference to many other Coptic texts.<sup>73</sup> Despite the presence of some hitherto unknown material, therefore, UBG cannot seriously claim our interest as a potential source of information about the historical Jesus.

1.4. Apocryphal Infancy Gospels

Interest in the childhood of Jesus was generated primarily by the post-Easter perspective: the composition of narratives about his childhood—a subject about which the earliest Christians assuredly possessed very little historical information—is to be seen as a projection of Christological and theological (and later, of associated Mariological) ideas back onto the events surrounding the birth and infancy of Jesus. This is why the primary historical value of even the canonical infancy narratives (Matt 1–2; Luke 1–2) lies in the fact that they are to be read as testimonies to developments in the history of theology. Only to an extremely limited extent can they be read as narratives of historical

---

<sup>69</sup> Cf. C. W. Hedrick and P. A. Mirecki, Gospel, 21–23. Hedrick speaks even more clearly in a later article against the use of the canonical gospels as written sources: cf. idem, “An Anecdotal Argument for the Independence of the Gospel of Thomas from the Synoptic Gospels,” in For the Children (n. 69 above), ed. H.-G. Bethge, 113–126, esp. 121–123. For criticism, cf. T. Nagel, “UBE und Johannesevangelium,” 265; J. Frey, “Leidenskampf,” 79.

<sup>70</sup> Cf. especially the summary by P. Nagel, “Herkunft und Datierung,” 234–235.

<sup>71</sup> Cf. P. Nagel, “Herkunft und Datierung,” 235–236. Textual references here follow the sequence established by S. Emmel.

<sup>72</sup> Cf. P. Nagel, “Herkunft und Datierung,” 248.

<sup>73</sup> Cf. S. Emmel, “Preliminary Reedition,” 22–37.

events.<sup>74</sup> It is difficult to underestimate the influence of the Protevangelium of James in particular on the history of piety; but for the reasons indicated above, scholars have almost never attempted to investigate the numerous apocryphal infancy gospels to see what information they might contain about the historical Jesus. Nevertheless, Richard Bauckham has attempted to evaluate in this context at least one piece of information supplied by apocryphal infancy gospels.<sup>75</sup> On the question of the “brothers” and “sisters” of Jesus who are mentioned in the canonical gospels,<sup>76</sup> two or three second-century apocryphal gospels offer the same information, possibly independently of each other: the Protevangelium of James 9.2; 17.1–2 and 18.1, the Infancy Gospel of Thomas 16.1–2, and (possibly) the Gospel of Peter (according to Origen, Comm. in Matt. 10.17) tell us that the “brothers” and “sisters” of Jesus were the children of Joseph from an earlier marriage. Since the statement by Origen probably refers to the Protevangelium of James rather than to the Gospel of Peter,<sup>77</sup> my discussion will concentrate on the first two texts. Bauckham himself clearly recognizes the legendary character of both these apocryphal writings, but he asks whether an ancient piece of information may be contained in the tradition that lies behind their affirmations. At any rate, the two texts show no signs of mutual dependence; and the age of the tradition can be seen in connection with the statement preserved at Mark 6:3 that Jesus was called “the son of Mary” in Nazareth. According to Bauckham this was done to distinguish him from the children of Joseph’s first marriage: “It is easy to suppose that, whereas outside Nazareth Jesus would have to be identified as ‘the son of Mary’ precisely because James, Joses, Judas, and Simon were not sons of Mary . . .”<sup>78</sup>

<sup>74</sup> Naturally, this affirmation says nothing about the theological “truth” which we encounter in these texts, nor about their significance for us!

<sup>75</sup> On what follows, cf. R. Bauckham, “The Brothers and Sisters of Jesus: An Epiphonian Response to John P. Meier,” CBQ 56 (1994): 686–700, esp. 695–698.

<sup>76</sup> On the discussion of this problem and an overview of the proposed answers from the early church onwards, cf. J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew. Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 1: The Roots of the Problem and the Person, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 318–332.

<sup>77</sup> On this, cf. T. J. Kraus and T. Nicklas, Petrusevangelium, 16–17. Unfortunately, Bauckham, “Brothers and Sisters,” 696, does not quote the exact text here. In fact, Origen appeals to the Gospel of Peter or to the “Book of James.”

<sup>78</sup> R. Bauckham, “Brothers and Sisters,” 700. On the problem of the brothers of Jesus, cf. also idem, Jude and the Relatives of Jesus in the Early Church (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1990), 19–32.

Even Bauckham draws these conclusions only with considerable reservations; he indicates other possible interpretations which I myself find more probable, e.g., that the statements in the two infancy gospels are the fruit of a continuing reflection on the virginity of Mary, which came to seem less and less compatible with the statements in the canonical gospels about the brothers and sisters of Jesus. Besides this, one can adduce strong arguments against Bauckham's thesis: above all, the testimony in the Infancy Gospel of Thomas is not as unambiguous as Bauckham says. In this text, Joseph is nowhere explicitly called a widower; James is indeed older than Jesus, but he is not unambiguously called a son of Joseph's first marriage. This means that the Protevangelium of James is the only undisputed witness to this motif, which also fits well into the narrative structure of the text (9.1–2; 17–18).<sup>79</sup>

1.5. Dialogue Gospels Found at Nag Hammadi

Whereas most of the gospels mentioned up to this point contain more or less extensive narrative sections and relate events which are said to have occurred during the life of Jesus, the genre of "dialogue gospels"<sup>80</sup> contains primarily logia material that Jesus—often understood as "the risen one"—is said to have revealed to his disciples after Easter.<sup>81</sup> These texts are indeed late,<sup>82</sup> but many scholars, in the light of the theses of

<sup>79</sup> J. P. Meier has criticized Bauckham in detail: "On Retrojecting Later Questions from Later Texts: A Reply to Richard Bauckham," CBQ 59 (1997): 511–527.

<sup>80</sup> On the definition of this genre, cf. especially J. Hartenstein, Die zweite Lehre. Erscheinungen des Auferstandenen als Rahmenerzählungen frühchristlicher Dialoge, TU 146 (Berlin: Akademie Verlag, 2000), 27–28, 249–262.

<sup>81</sup> On the genre, cf. W. Schneemelcher, "Dialog des Erlösers. Einleitung," in idem, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen 1, 6th ed. (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1990), 189–191.

<sup>82</sup> It is not always easy to date these texts, since points of reference outside them are lacking. The texts discussed in this section have been dated as follows:

(1) The Apocryphon of James: second half of the first century—first half of the second century (D. Kirchner, "Brief des Jakobus," in Neutestamentliche Apokryphen 1, ed. W. Schneemelcher, 6th ed. [Tübingen: Mohr, 1990], 234–244, esp. 235); 125–150 (W. C. van Unnik, "The Origin of the Recently Discovered 'Apocryphon Jacobi,'" VigChr 10 [1956]: 149–156, esp. 156; second century (U.-K. Plisch, Verborgene Worte, 63); second to third centuries (D. Rouleau, L'épître apocryphe de Jacques [NH I,2], BCNHT 18 [Québec: Presses de l'Université Laval, 1987], 22); third century (F. E. Williams, "The Apocryphon of James, in The Coptic Gnostic Library: A Complete Edition of the Nag Hammadi Codices 1, ed. J. M. Robinson [Leiden: Brill, 2000], 15–53, esp. 27).

H. Koester, who posits a close link in terms of form history between the “Dialogue Gospels” and the “collections of sayings” (which he dates very early),<sup>83</sup> have argued that at least some of these “Dialogues” contain ancient material, especially logia of Jesus, but also parables.

The texts which are most frequently mentioned in this context<sup>84</sup> are the Apocryphon (Letter) of James from Codex Jung (NHC I, 2)<sup>85</sup> and the Dialogue of the Savior.<sup>86</sup> Unfortunately, space prevents a detailed review of all the texts that could be adduced here. Nevertheless, the following two examples from the Apocryphon of James can illustrate the possibilities and the problems that we encounter when we read these sources.

First, NHC I, 2 presents the following logion of Jesus about the basileia:

ⲛⲓⲱⲠ ⲁⲧⲣⲉⲧⲙⲏⲧⲣ̅ⲱ ⲛⲏⲓⲛⲏⲥ ⲡ̅ ⲡ̅ⲗⲁⲓⲉ ⲡ̅ⲓⲛⲧ ⲧⲏⲛⲉ

The translations of this logion diverge in a striking manner:

-
- (2) Dialogue of the Savior: early second century (H. Koester and E. Pagels, “Introduction,” in Nag Hammadi Codex III,5: The Dialogue of the Savior, ed. S. Emmel, et al., NHS 26 [Leiden: Brill, 1984], 1–17, esp. 16; second century (B. Blatz, “Der Dialog des Erlösers,” in Neutestamentliche Apokryphen 1, ed. W. Schneemelcher, 6th ed. [Tübingen: Mohr, 1990], 245–253, esp. 247, and U.-K. Plisch, Verborgene Worte, 143); second half of the second century (H.-J. Klauck, Apokryphe Evangelien, 239).
- (3) Book of Thomas: second or third century (H.-M. Schenke, “Das Buch des Thomas,” in Neutestamentliche Apokryphen 1, ed. W. Schneemelcher [Tübingen: Mohr, 1990], 192–204, esp. 193–194).

<sup>83</sup> Cf. H. Koester and J. M. Robinson, Entwicklungslinien durch die Welt des frühen Christentums (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1971), 147–190; H. Koester, “Überlieferung und Geschichte der frühchristlichen Evangelienliteratur,” ANRW 25.2 (1994): 1463–1542, esp. 1512–1524; idem, Ancient Christian Gospels. Their History and Development (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1990), 173–200.

<sup>84</sup> Both texts are explicitly described by C. W. Hedrick, “The Tyranny of the Synoptic Jesus,” Semeia 44 (1988): 1–8, esp. 5, as especially important material. J.-M. Sevrin, “Paroles et paraboles de Jésus dans des écrits gnostiques coptes,” in Logia. Les paroles de Jésus—The Sayings of Jesus, ed. J. Delobel, BEThL 59 (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1982), 517–528, esp. 519–521, also discusses the Book of Thomas (NC II,7).

<sup>85</sup> Textual edition with introduction: F. E. Williams, “The Apocryphon of James,” in The Coptic Gnostic Library: A Complete Edition of the Nag Hammadi Codices 1, ed. J. M. Robinson (Leiden: Brill, 2000), 13–53.

<sup>86</sup> S. Emmel, ed., Nag Hammadi Codex III,5: The Dialogue of the Savior, NHS 26 (Leiden: Brill, 1984).

Lasst nicht das Himmelreich in euch veröden.<sup>87</sup>

Do not make the kingdom of heaven a desert within you.<sup>88</sup>

Let not the Kingdom of Heaven become a desert within you.<sup>89</sup>

In his analysis of this logion, C. W. Hedrick observes that the translation of the text largely depends on the background one postulates for its genesis; the logion fits very poorly into its present context.<sup>90</sup> In simple linguistic terms, a number of other translations would be possible:

Do not cause the Kingdom of Heaven to become abandoned by you (or: among you).

Do not cause the Kingdom of Heaven to be laid waste by you (or: among you).

Do not cause the Kingdom of Heaven to become desolate by you (or: among you).<sup>91</sup>

Despite this openness, we can draw some basic conclusions. The logion presupposes the presence of the basileia and postulates a connection between the action of the individual and the possibility of the success or failure of the basileia. It links an image with negative connotations to the kingdom of heaven. All three points can be paralleled in other sayings of Jesus. The logion can be localized in a context in which doubts about the success of God's rule have arisen: it is addressed to the disillusioned disciples. Since it thus satisfies the criteria of dissimilarity and of coherence, it is possible that we have here a logion from the earliest strata of the tradition about Jesus.<sup>92</sup> This argumentation is compelling and logically coherent; it is indeed possible that one can

---

<sup>87</sup> D. Kirchner, "Brief des Jakobus," in Neutestamentliche Apokryphen 1, ed. W. Schneemelcher, 6th ed. (Tübingen: Mohr, 1990), 234–244, esp. 243 (my quotation is adapted to the new official German orthography). A similar translation is offered by U.-K. Plisch, Verborgene Worte Jesu. Verworfenen Evangelien. Apokryphe Schriften des frühen Christentums, Brennpunkt: Die Bibel (Erfurt 2000), 73: "Lasst nicht das Reich der Himmel in euch veröden."

<sup>88</sup> F. E. Williams, "Apocryphon of James," 49.

<sup>89</sup> M. Malinine et al., Epistula Iacobi Apocryphon: Codex Jung F.Ir-F.VIIIv (p. 1–16), (Zürich and Stuttgart: Rascher, 1968), 127.

<sup>90</sup> Cf. C. W. Hedrick, "Kingdom Sayings and Parables of Jesus," NTS 29 (1983): 1–24, esp. 7. Hedrick employs here the concept of Sitz im Leben, which however is not understood in the German-speaking world as the place of the genesis of the logion.

<sup>91</sup> C. W. Hedrick, "Kingdom Sayings," 8.

<sup>92</sup> Cf. in more detail C. W. Hedrick, "Kingdom Sayings," 8–9.

assemble the individual elements to form the kind of reconstruction that is proposed here.

It is however possible to question whether this is in fact the case. Can the criterion of dissimilarity<sup>93</sup> really be applied to such a brief saying? Or, to put it differently: is it genuinely unthinkable that another person than Jesus could have “invented” a logion with such an “open” meaning and attributed it to the “risen Redeemer,” either in the kind of situation which Hedrick assumes or in a milieu with gnostic tendencies (and in the latter case, with a meaning certainly different from that which Hedrick reconstructs)?<sup>94</sup>

On another level, I believe that we have a problem which applies in general to logia which are detached from their narrative context:<sup>95</sup> precisely this kind of text is open to very various interpretations. And if Hedrick’s arguments are correct, this may perhaps be the very reason why this particular logion was transmitted. This however prompts us to ask what help we find for the quest for the historical Jesus in a logion with a polyvalent text that can be ascribed hypothetically to the historical Jesus. If in fact the only reason for such a potential attribution is the fact that the logion allows an interpretation which is coherent with other statements that can be attributed with a great measure of probability to the historical Jesus, then I believe that such a logion in fact offers us no help at all.

Secondly, we find in the Apocryphon of James not only a catalogue of parables (NHC I, 2: 8.4–10),<sup>96</sup> but also three parables which are not <sup>93</sup> On the discussion of this criterion, which for a long time played a decisive role in the quest for the historical Jesus, cf. above all T. Holmén, “Doubts about Double Dissimilarity: Restructuring the Main Criterion of Jesus-of-History Research,” in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTS 28.1 (Leiden: Brill, 1998), 47–80; D. S. du Toit, “Der unähnliche Jesus. Eine kritische Evaluierung der Entstehung des Differenzkriteriums und seiner geschichts- und erkenntnistheoretischen Voraussetzungen,” in Der historische Jesus. Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. J. Schröter and R. Brucker, BZNW 114 (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 2002), 89–129, with a valuable bibliography.

---

<sup>94</sup> C. W. Hedrick, “Kingdom Sayings,” 8, is completely correct to state that the text does not necessarily presuppose a gnostic interpretation, but that it could be interpreted in a gnostic sense. We can however reverse this: the text does not necessarily presuppose Hedrick’s interpretation, and it can certainly owe its genesis to gnostic circles.

<sup>95</sup> On this, cf. also my article: T. Nicklas, “Zur Problematik der so genannten ‘Agrapha’: Eine Thesenreihe,” in Revue Biblique 113 (2006): 78–93.

<sup>96</sup> On the problems connected with this passage, cf. J.-M. Sevrin, “Les écrits gnostiques coptes,” 523–524; idem, “Écriture et traditions dans l’apocryphon de Jacques,” in Écritures et traditions dans la littérature copte. Journée d’études coptes, Strasbourg known from canonical texts. This is all the more remarkable because (on the one hand) we may take it as highly probable that narratives in the form of parables were typical of the historical Jesus, and (on the other hand) it is clear that relatively few new parables (as opposed to logia ascribed to Jesus) had their genesis in the early church.<sup>97</sup> The most interesting example for the quest for the historical Jesus is perhaps the “parable of the ear of grain” (NHC I, 2: 12.21–31):

ΓΑΡ ΗΜΠΗΥΕ ΕΣΕΙΝΕ ΠΗΟΥΖΠ̄C ΕΑΦΡΩΤ ΖΠ̄Η ΟΥCΩΩΕ ΔΥΩ ΠΕΒΙ
 ΠΤΑΡΕΦΧΕΤΕ ΔΑCΙΤΕ ΠΠΕCΚΑΡΠΟC ΔΥΩ ΔΗ ΔΑΦΜΟΥΖ ΠΤCΩΩΕ ΠΖΠ̄ΖΠ̄C
 ΔΚΕΡΑΜΠΕ ΠΤΩΤΠ̄ ΖΩΤ ΤΗΝΕ ΒΕΠΗ ΔΤΡΕΤΠ̄ΩΖC ΠΗΤΠ̄ ΠΟΥΖΠ̄C ΠΩΗΖ
 ΧΕΚΑCΕ ΕΡΕΤΗΑΜΟΥΖ ΔΒΑΔ ΖΠ̄ ΤΠ̄Π̄Π̄Π̄Ο<sup>98</sup>

For the kingdom of heaven is like an ear of grain after it had sprouted in a field. And when it had ripened, it scattered its fruit and again filled the field with ears for another year. You also, hasten to reap an ear of life for yourselves, that you may be filled with the kingdom!<sup>99</sup>

The formal link to the context is slight, and this permits the conclusion that this text presents older material from the tradition. Formal reasons suggest that the concluding demand in the imperative, which introduces the motif of “filling” (which is important for the Apocryphon of James) and the new motif of the “living ear of corn” and can be understood as an allegorization, can be detached as secondary elements.<sup>100</sup> The rest of the text is certainly comparable to the well known parables of growth in the synoptic gospels, and one cannot reject out of hand the possibility that this parable (in some form or other) does in fact go back to the historical Jesus.<sup>101</sup>

28 mai 1982, Cahiers de la Bibliothèque Copte 1 (Leuven: Peeters, 1983), 73–85, esp. 78–81; P. Nagel, “Beiträge zur Gleichnisauslegung in der Epistula Jacobi Apocrypha (NHC I,2),” in For the Children, Perfect Instruction. Studies in Honor of Hans-Martin Schenke on the Occasion of the Berliner Arbeitskreis für koptisch-gnostische Schriften’s Thirtieth Year, ed. H.-G. Bethge, NHMS 54 (Leiden: Brill, 2002), 157–173, esp. 166–172.

<sup>97</sup> On this, cf. e.g., W. D. Stroker, “Extracanonial Parables and the Historical Jesus,” Semeia 44 (1988): 95–120, esp. 97.

<sup>98</sup> Text: F. E. Williams, “Apocryphon of James,” 46.

<sup>99</sup> Translation: Francis E. Williams, www.bibliotecapleyades.net/nag\_hammadi/jam.htm.

<sup>100</sup> On this, cf. W. D. Stroker, “Extracanonial Parables,” 114–115. On the structure of the parable, cf. also J.-M. Sevrin, “L’Apocryphon de Jacques,” 82 and 85; on its closeness to Matthean parables, cf. ibid. p. 84.

<sup>101</sup> As far as I am aware, this was first proposed by R. Cameron, Sayings Traditions in the Apocryphon of James, HThSt 34 (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1984), 8–11 and 126.

In principle, therefore, it is certainly possible that even a text like the Apocryphon of James, which we possess in a late redaction, or other “Dialogues,” may contain at least in some passages material that points back to early stages of the development of the tradition. In some cases, we may find parallels here that help to establish the historicity of canonical texts and statements; in other cases, we can add some elements to the stock of material that has survived from the oldest stages of the tradition about Jesus.<sup>102</sup> Above all, however, when we study texts that have been preserved only in single Coptic manuscripts, which are often fragmentary, we must bear in mind that these have already undergone a complex process of transmission. The refractions due to translations—in the plural!—mean that in many instances, these texts reflect at most a glimpse of the oldest tradition about Jesus.<sup>103</sup>

1.6. The “Secret Gospel of Mark”

Scarcely any other apocryphal text has unleashed controversial debates to compare with the so-called “Secret Gospel of Mark.” This is undoubtedly due to the very obscure circumstances of its discovery, but even more to the subsequent disappearance of this text.

While he was looking for ancient manuscripts in the monastery of Mar Saba near Jerusalem in 1958, Morton Smith discovered on the final blank pages and the inside cover of a copy of Isaac Voss’ edition of the Letters of Ignatius of Antioch (1646) a handwritten text three pages in length.<sup>104</sup> This text turned out to be a hitherto unknown letter <sup>102</sup> In addition to the passages from the Apocryphon of James mentioned here, scholars have also discussed e.g., the parable of the date-palm (NHC I, 2: 7.22–25), the parable of the grain of wheat (NHC I, 2: 8.10–27), or the logion about the basileia (NHC I, 2: 2.29–33). We should also mention the parable of sun, vinestock and weeds from the Book of Thomas (NHC II, 7: 144.14–36). In each of these cases, however, I believe that a certain measure of historical skepticism is advisable.

---

<sup>103</sup> On the problem of the textual transmission in Nag Hammadi, cf. the important reflections by S. Emmel, “Religious Tradition, Textual Transmission, and the Nag Hammadi Codices,” in The Nag Hammadi Library after Fifty Years. Proceedings of the 1995 Society of Biblical Literature Commemoration, ed. J. D. Turner and A. McGuire, NHMS 44 (Leiden: Brill, 1997), 34–43.

<sup>104</sup> The circumstances of the discovery are related in many publications, not only by Smith himself, but also by other studies of the Secret Gospel of Mark. Cf. e.g., M. Meyer, “The Youth in the Secret Gospel of Mark,” in Secret Gospels. Essays on Thomas and the Secret Gospel of Mark (Harrisburg: Trinity Press International, 2003), 109–134, esp. 109–110. For a review of the history of the investigation of this text, cf.

by Clement of Alexandria (born 140/150; died after ca. 220) in which he quotes twice from a “mystical Gospel of Mark” which was in circulation in Alexandria. Smith announced his discovery in 1960 at the annual meeting of the Society of Biblical Literature, but the definitive publication of the text, based on photographs which Smith had made when he discovered it, and accompanied by a translation and commentary, did not take place until 1973.<sup>105</sup> The photographs on their own do not permit a definitive decision about whether the manuscript genuinely comes from the eighteenth century or is a later forgery; but by 1973, the manuscript had disappeared, and this led to a great number of speculations about the text. The publication itself gave rise to extreme controversies. A number of scholars drew very far-reaching consequences from the manuscript with regard both to the quest for the historical Jesus and to the history of the redaction of the Gospel of Mark, but others remained highly skeptical and accused Smith (more or less explicitly) of having forged the manuscript himself.<sup>106</sup> Not even the recent discovery and publication of other photographs has succeeded in bringing a decisive light into the gloom that surrounds the Secret Gospel of Mark.<sup>107</sup>

The arguments for and against authenticity lie on three distinct levels.

---

Meyer, op. cit., 114–119, and E. Rau, Das geheime Markusevangelium. Ein Schriftfund voller Rätsel (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 2003), 13–35.

<sup>105</sup> Cf. M. Smith, Clement of Alexandria and a Secret Gospel of Mark (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1973). A more popular version: idem, The Secret Gospel: The Discovery of the Secret Gospel According to Mark (New York: Harper & Row, 1973).

<sup>106</sup> This was expressed in extreme terms by J. Neusner, Are There Really Tanaitic Parallels to the Gospels: A Refutation of Morton Smith, South Florida Studies in the History of Judaism 80 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1993), 27–31, esp. 28: “Forgery of the century.” Smith was vigorously attacked also by Q. Quesnell, “The Mar Saba Clementine: A Question of Evidence,” CBQ 37 (1975): 48–67. Although Quesnell does not actually say it explicitly, the only inference that can be drawn from his essay is that he believes that Smith himself is the forger. On the further controversy, cf. M. Smith, “On the Authenticity of the Mar Saba Letter of Clement,” CBQ 38 (1976): 196–199, and Q. Quesnell, “A Reply to Morton Smith,” ibid. 200–203.

<sup>107</sup> Cf. C. W. Hedrick and N. Olympiou, “Secret Mark,” The Fourth R 13.5 (September–October, 2000), 3–16, esp. 11 and 14–15. I am grateful to C. W. Hedrick for sending me a copy of this publication, which I could not otherwise have studied. The fact that G. G. Stroumsa, “Comments on Charles Hedrick’s Article: A Testimony,” Journal of Early Christian Studies 11 (2003): 147–153, now asserts that he himself once saw the manuscript (which is still lost), ultimately proves nothing.

First, Smith himself concentrated above all on the textual level, and collected detailed observations in support of Clement's authorship<sup>108</sup> and of an early dating of the surviving fragments. But critics have made the following points: (1) The contents of the alleged fragment of Clement diverge so clearly from Clement's ideas in his genuine writings that it is impossible to accept this text as original.<sup>109</sup> (2) The style of the letter displays a greater number of characteristics of Clement's language than we find in any genuine writing of this author;<sup>110</sup> similarly, the passages from the Secret Gospel of Mark seem to be more Marcan than the Gospel of Mark itself.<sup>111</sup> (3) The title of the manuscript obviously assumes that the text is part of a collection of letters by Clement, and this would mean that this text, originally allegedly addressed to "Theodore," was intended for a group of readers over and above the original situation of communication. In the letter itself, however, Clement exhorts his addressee to preserve the mystery of the Secret Gospel of Mark and, in this context, to go so far as to tell untruths. This is not particularly appropriate in a text destined to be published in a compilation of letters, but it is certainly apt to kindle the interest of those who read a forgery.<sup>112</sup>

Secondly, and at least of equal importance, we have the problem—unfortunately much neglected in the scholarly discussion—of how we are to envisage the concrete transmission of the alleged fragment of Clement which is contained in the manuscript. It is at any rate conceivable that the manuscript presented a text that could be from the hand of Clement of Alexandria. John Damascene, who informs us that he possessed letters of Clement, was active in the Mar Saba monastery in the eighth century; and it is clear that eighteenth-century monks of this monastery often copied texts from old manuscripts onto blank

<sup>108</sup> Cf. M. Smith, Clement of Alexandria, 5–85.

<sup>109</sup> Cf. E. Osborn, "Clement of Alexandria: A Review of Research, 1958–1982," Second Century 3 (1983): 219–244, esp. 223–225.

<sup>110</sup> On this, cf. A. H. Criddle, "On the Mar Saba Letter Attributed to Clement of Alexandria," Journal of Early Christian Studies 3 (1995): 215–220.

<sup>111</sup> This was already pointed out by C. C. Richardson in his review of M. Smith, Clement of Alexandria . . ., TS 35 (1974): 571–577, esp. 573. Cf. similar remarks by E. Best in his review of E. J. Pryke, Redactional Style in the Marcan Gospel, MSSNTS 33 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1978): JSNT 4 (1979): 69–76, esp. 71–76.

<sup>112</sup> Cf. C. E. Murgia, "Secret Mark: Real or Fake?" in Longer Mark: Forgery, Interpolation, or Old Tradition, ed. R. H. Fuller (Berkeley: The Studies, 1976), 35–40, esp. 38–39.

pages of more recent books. This means that we cannot absolutely exclude the possibility that Smith may indeed have stumbled across an ancient text here. The vagueness of this possibility ought however to warn us not to link all too lofty historical speculations to the text that we have.

If the manuscript discovered in Mar Saba does in fact go back to a genuine letter of Clement, this text would have come down to the eighteenth century only via linear transmission, i.e., the repeated copying of the text in dependence on one single manuscript. The manuscript could thus be nothing more than the umpteenth copy of the copy of an ancient manuscript; besides this, it is highly probable that when it was copied for the last time, it displayed marks of damage by fire. In such a text, which cannot be checked by means of other manuscripts of the same work, we must expect new errors to creep in each time it is copied over the centuries; and in the further course of transmission, new errors and unsuccessful attempts at improving the text must also have occurred. This however is not the case in the manuscript discovered by Smith.<sup>113</sup>

Thirdly, it is at the very least surprising<sup>114</sup> that not even Smith himself made any further attempt to secure the manuscript, or to examine it a second time after his initial discovery, using better methods, in order to prove its authenticity. As he tells the story, he was under pressure of time when he made the discovery; but it is clear that although he was to publish so much about those photographs he had taken with a pocket camera, he made no endeavors at a later date to see the manuscript itself.<sup>115</sup>

It is above all the points mentioned in the second paragraph here that lead us to judge the authenticity of the text with great caution, and indeed with skepticism. Even the discovery of the manuscript and the demonstration that it did indeed come from the eighteenth century

---

<sup>113</sup> This is pointed out en passant by C. E. Murgia, "Secret Mark," 40. Unfortunately, subsequent scholarly discussion usually has not taken up this point. In his reply to Murgia, M. Smith, "Clement of Alexandria and Secret Mark: The Score at the End of the First Decade," HTHR 75 (1982): 449–461, esp. 451, does not take up this very important observation. As far as I can see, its significance has not been noticed in more recent discussions. One of the few exceptions is E. Rau, Das geheime Markusevangelium, 19.

<sup>114</sup> This criticism is also made by B. D. Ehrman, "Response to Charles Hedrick's Stalemate," Journal of Early Christian Studies 11 (2003): 155–163.

<sup>115</sup> This was pointed out by Q. Quesnel, "The Mar Saba Clementine: A Question of Evidence," CBQ 37 (1975): 48–67, esp. 49–50.

would not constitute proof in the opposite direction.<sup>116</sup> On the other hand, at least the possibility remains open that new discoveries of older manuscripts would confirm the vague possibility that we have here authentic material from the second Christian century.

If we confine our attention to the text itself, and accept the hypothesis of its authenticity, what does it tell us?

The alleged letter of Clement is addressed to a certain Theodore and describes three recensions of the Gospel of Mark: the original Mark was written in Rome, and its author expanded the text in Alexandria “for those who were being perfected,” resulting in the Secret Gospel of Mark. A third recension by the libertine Carpocrates (the Carpocratian Gospel of Mark) added further material. The author quotes two fragments from the Secret Gospel of Mark, which are inserted into the Gospel which we know.

Fragment 1 was allegedly read as an insertion between Mark 10:34 and 10:35:<sup>117</sup>

And they come into Bethany. And a certain woman whose brother had died was there. And, coming, she prostrated herself before Jesus and says to him, ‘Son of David, have mercy on me.’ But the disciples rebuked her. And Jesus, being angry, went off with her into the garden where the tomb was, and straightway a great cry was heard from the tomb. And going near Jesus rolled away the stone from the door of the tomb. And straightway, going in where the youth was, he stretched forth his hand and raised him, seizing his hand. But the youth, looking upon him, loved him and began to beseech him that he might be with him. And going out of the tomb they came into the house of the youth, for he was rich. And after six days Jesus told him what to do and in the evening the youth comes to him, wearing a linen cloth over his naked body. And he remained with him that night, for Jesus taught him the mystery of the kingdom of God. And thence, arising, he returned to the other side of the Jordan.

The second fragment is said to have been inserted between 10:46a and 46b:

And the sister of the youth whom Jesus loved and his mother and Salome were there, and Jesus did not receive them.

---

<sup>116</sup> This is because a forgery need not be the work of M. Smith himself. One can certainly imagine a pious forgery from an earlier period, perhaps even from antiquity, or perhaps from the Renaissance. On this, cf. e.g., H. Musurillo, “Morton Smith’s Secret Gospel,” Thought 48 (1973): 327–331; E. Osborn, “Clement,” 223–225.

<sup>117</sup> Translation: Morton Smith.

It must be granted that the insertion of these fragments into the canonical Gospel of Mark creates a new narrative strand which allows a fresh interpretation of some Markan scenes that are already well known. This is the story of a “young man” who now plays a role several times: and this makes the text of canonical Mark more coherent: Mark 10:17–22, Secret Mark fr. 1 and 2, Mark 14:51–52, and Mark 16:1–8. Fragment 2 “heals” a rather abrupt break in the text, and we now have a plausible background to the appearance on the scene of the young man at Mark 14:51–52. In this interpretation, the young man in the empty tomb (16:5–6) is not an angel: he is identical with the young man who is mentioned in the first four scenes. A new explanation of the abrupt conclusion to Mark is also possible: although Jesus’ disciples have fled and the women’s fear leads them to keep silent about what they have seen, the “young man” remains as a disciple of Jesus who announces the resurrection. The reader is meant to take the part of this young man.<sup>118</sup> With regard to the quest for the historical Jesus, the Secret Gospel of Mark offers a second source (alongside John 3:22) that tells us that Jesus himself baptized.<sup>119</sup> It must however be said that even if both fragments of the Secret Gospel of Mark do in fact come from an authentic letter of Clement, their contents—e.g., the obvious parallel of the first fragment to John 11, and quotations from, or allusions to, Luke 18:23 and 9:53—strongly suggest that this is not a text that goes very far back in the direction of the period of the historical Jesus. If this text is in fact of historical interest, this would lie rather in the impulse it might give to investigate links and parallels between the epiphenomena of early Christianity (e.g., in second-century Egypt) and the mystery cults,<sup>120</sup> and to inquire into the relationships between the synoptic and Johannine streams of tradition.<sup>121</sup>

---

<sup>118</sup> For further reflections, cf. M. Meyer, “Youth,” 128–130.

<sup>119</sup> Cf. also C. W. Hedrick, “The Secret Gospel of Mark: Stalemate in the Academy,” Journal of Early Christian Studies 11 (2003): 133–145, esp. 142–143.

<sup>120</sup> I find the suggestion by C. W. Hedrick, “Secret Gospel,” 143, that the Secret Gospel of Mark can be considered a witness to the instability of the Gospel texts in the first two centuries, methodologically problematic. Hedrick is doubtless correct to say that precisely the non-canonical texts were exposed for a long time to considerable variations in their text; but I believe that the same methodological reservation would also be appropriate in the case of the vaguely transmitted alleged letter of Clement with its quotations from “Secret Mark.”

<sup>121</sup> On this, cf. e.g., M. Meyer, “Youth in Secret Mark,” 135–148.

1.7. The Newly Discovered Gospel of Judas

One of the most spectacular discoveries of early Christian texts in recent decades is certainly that of the Coptic Codex Tchacos probably from the fourth century CE, which contains, in addition to other apocryphal texts, the Gospel of Judas which was mentioned by Irenaeus of Lyons (Adv. haer. 1.31,1; cf. also Epiphanius of Salamis, Pan. 38.1,5).<sup>122</sup> The Gospel of Judas has generated a rather intense media discussion, because it seems to reverse the usual perspective of the story of Jesus' death: here, Judas Iscariot becomes the central character in the narrative and it has been discussed whether the Gospel of Judas presents him as a kind of ideal disciple. A closer reading of the text, however, seems to indicate that the Gospel of Judas presents him as even worse than the others.<sup>123</sup>

Can this text lay any claim to historicity? Does it indeed intend to make such a claim? In three theses, I will limit myself to an evaluation of the significance of this text for research into the historical Jesus.<sup>124</sup>

1.7.1. The Simple Fact of its Genre means that the Gospel of Judas is Scarcely Interested in the Historical Jesus

The focus on the revelations to Judas which are imparted in the form of a dialogue mean that the Gospel of Judas has affinities to the so-called "dialogue gospels" or "dialogues with the risen Jesus." Strictly speaking, we cannot call it a "dialogue with the risen Jesus," since it does not relate appearances of the risen Lord; but this is because the resurrection cannot play any role in a text which is concerned about fleeing from the human husk and sacrificing the human being who "bears" Jesus (Gospel of Judas 56).<sup>125</sup> However, the function of this <sup>122</sup> The critical edition has been published 2007: R. Kasser and G. Wurst, eds., The Gospel of Judas together with the Letter of Peter to Philip, James, and a Book of Allogenes from Codex Tchacos. Critical Edition (Washington, D.C.: National Geographic Society, 2007).

---

<sup>123</sup> For a more detailed discussion see, e.g., A. DeConick, The Thirteenth Apostle: What the Gospel of Judas Really Says (London: Continuum, 2007), and J. Brankaer and H.-G. Bethge, Codex Tchacos: Texte und Analysen, TU 161 (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 2007).

<sup>124</sup> For further details about the quest of the historical Judas, and to the general (positive) significance of the text, cf. my essay "Das Judasevangelium—Dimensionen der Bedeutung eines Textfundes," Biblische Notizen 130 (2006): 79–130, on which my remarks here are based.

<sup>125</sup> For the translation "bear" or "carry" and its background see the important essay by P. Nagel, "Das Evangelium des Judas," ZNW 98 (2007): 213–276, here 257, 265–270.

text, as a dialogue between Jesus and the only one of his disciples who is able to make an appropriate confession of faith, is comparable to the function of the dialogues with the risen Lord. The text wishes to demonstrate the lack of understanding on the part of the other disciples, who represent a Christianity which continues to bow down before the Old Testament God and his cult while Judas detaches himself from this group. He becomes the addressee of secret revelations which intentionally have little to do with the preaching of the earthly Jesus, since that was addressed to “everyone,” whereas the Gospel of Judas understands itself as a “secret account of the revelation” (cf. the prooemium) which is meant only for a small circle of the elect. Naturally, we can never wholly exclude the possibility that even the discourse sections of a dialogue gospel of this kind may contain material that possibly has its origin in impulses going back to the historical Jesus; but I see scarcely any indication of this in the text of the Gospel of Judas.<sup>126</sup>

1.7.2. A Number of Indications in the Text Itself Suggest that the Gospel of Judas has Little Interest in the Figure of the Historical Jesus of Nazareth

If the Gospel of Judas were genuinely interested in the historical Jesus, this would mean that the text would wish at least in a rudimentary manner to understand the history of the Jewish Messiah Jesus of Nazareth as the history of a concretely tangible human being of his age. This element is not completely lacking, but it plays only a marginal role. The only more or less specific place which is mentioned is “Judea” (Gospel of Judas 33), where Jesus is present with his disciples “one day.” This mention of the place name “Judea” dangles in mid-air, so to speak. The narrative of the Gospel of Judas never makes it clear why Jesus is in Judea rather than anywhere else, and it is only canonical intertexts that allow the reader to infer that his presence in Judea—most likely in Jerusalem which is never mentioned in the Gospel of Judas—is connected with the celebration of the “passover” feast <sup>126</sup> The text does however contain three “non-canonical words of the Lord” which could be of interest in the broadest sense for the history of tradition: (1) “[And they] have planted trees without fruit, in my name, in a shameful manner” (Gospel of Judas 39); (2) “A baker cannot feed all creation under [heaven]” (Gospel of Judas 41–42); (3) “It is impossible to sow seed on [rock] and harvest its fruit” (Gospel of Judas 43–44). But it is highly improbable that these logia have any relevance to the quest of the historical Jesus.

---

mentioned in the prologue. The concluding narrative framework of the text also mentions the kataluma, the “dwelling” or “guest room” which Jesus (probably) enters in order to pray (Gospel of Judas 58). We learn no details about this place. “Their high priests” assemble there too. Naturally, this refers to the chief priests of the Jewish people, but the text on its own does not make this clear. The only information about Jesus’ public ministry in the text is that he worked miracles; but we are nowhere given any details. In some unspecified manner, these miracles served the salvation of “humanity”; nothing is said about any special role of the people of Israel (Gospel of Judas 33). The “people” (the text leaves open which people is meant!) reacts to Jesus’ activity by seeing him as a prophet (Gospel of Judas 58). Taken as a whole, therefore, the data that could be described in some way as a narrative framework with a potential historical reference are minimal, and the Jesus of the Gospel of Judas withdraws again and again from even these few coordinates of “space” and “time”: even during his earthly ministry, he appears repeatedly as a “child (?)” (Gospel of Judas 33) among the disciples,<sup>127</sup> and his presence is an “appearing” and “disappearing” (cf. e.g., Gospel of Judas 36).

1.7.3. Although there are only Few Concrete Passages in which the Literary Dependence of the Gospel of Judas on Canonical Texts can be Unambiguously Demonstrated, the Text seems to Presuppose in its Readers the Knowledge of Canonical Gospels, or at least of Traditions Related to these

I give only two examples here.<sup>128</sup> First, nothing is said in detail about Jesus, Judas Iscariot, or the twelve disciples. The text appears to assume that the reader already knows at least something about these figures and their roles. Although one of the central ideas in the text is that the twelve are wrong to think that Jesus is the Son of their (i.e., the Jewish) God, we are nowhere told explicitly that the disciples are Jews, nor that almost the entire public ministry of Jesus took place in Palestine.

Secondly, the same applies to the end of the text. It is basically impossible to understand the closing scene unless we assume that it alludes at least to a core narrative which is comparable to the accounts of the passion in the canonical gospels. The text does not tell us who “their” high priests (or chief priests) or “the scribes” are, nor are we told the identity of “the people” who call Jesus a “prophet”;<sup>129</sup> according to the introduction (Gospel of Judas 33), the earthly ministry of Jesus aimed at the salvation of humankind. Above all, however, it is unclear what Judas actually does. The concluding sentences make sense only if the reader knows that the leaders of the Jewish people will have a share in the responsibility for the death of Jesus—since the text of the Gospel of Judas does not actually tell us that Judas’ action in “handing over” Jesus will lead to his death.

<sup>127</sup> The translators propose a second translation of the term hrot as “apparition,” and this would lend even stronger support to this thesis.

<sup>128</sup> For further references, cf. my essay “Das Judasevangelium” (n. 124 above).

2. Apocryphal Gospels and the Quest for the Historical Jesus<sup>130</sup>

2.1.

From a purely methodological point of view, Christian apocrypha must be treated with the same openness and with the same skeptical criticism as canonical texts in the quest for the historical Jesus. In principle, they must be investigated against the background of general historical questions.<sup>131</sup> This demand sounds the most natural thing in the world, but it must be proposed again and again because from antiquity onwards, the designation of a text as “apocryphal” has generated prejudices on two levels: apocryphal texts tend either to be condemned a priori as marginal, heretical, or simply worthless in historical terms, or else to be regarded as secret writings in which the real truth has survived, despite their suppression or prohibition by powerful orthodox circles.<sup>132</sup> Neither prejudice proves tenable. Rather, each text—and hence each tradition—must be investigated on its own. In other words,

---

<sup>129</sup> The only point of reference in the text itself is the mention of “Judea” (Gospel of Judas 33).

<sup>130</sup> Not all potential candidates have been discussed here. In this context, one might for example also study the Gospel of Mary, the fragments of “Jewish Christian” Gospels quoted by patristic writers, and other texts.

<sup>131</sup> Naturally, this also means that we must apply the same strict criteria to the apocryphal texts and to the canonical texts, as D. M. Smith demands: “The Problem of John and the Synoptics in Light of the Relation between Apocryphal and Canonical Gospels,” in John and the Synoptics, ed. A. Denaux, BETL 101 (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1992), 147–162, esp. 151.

<sup>132</sup> On the history of the way in which the term “apocryphal” has been employed, cf. T. Nicklas, “Apocrypha/Apocryphal Writings (New Testament),” Encyclopedia of the Bible and its Reception I (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2009).

the canonicity of texts means that some specific community links a claim to truth with these texts. But truth and historicity are not simply to be equated, nor is the claim to truth—still less, to historicity—limited to canonical texts.<sup>133</sup>

2.2.

Even if we accept this evaluation in principle, the result of our brief panoramic survey of some important texts is mostly negative, at least at first sight. In general, most of them contribute nothing that could take us beyond what we know from the canonical texts or lend new accents to the portrait of the historical Jesus.<sup>134</sup> Where this is the case—for example, with the Secret Gospel of Mark—their value as sources is extremely disputed. In part, this is certainly a question of methodology: where a basic stock of possible historical data about the life of Jesus exists, and further data are added to this basic stock only where they can be understood to cohere with the basic data, the very character of these additional data means that they cannot alter the picture. But where new data are not coherent with already existing data, the authority of the sources which attest them must be so great that they outweigh the authority of the sources which have been used hitherto. But no apocryphal gospel known to us at present has an undisputed historical authority surpassing that of the canonical gospels, especially the synoptics; at most, one could perhaps discuss the extent to which this might be true of the Gospel of Thomas.<sup>135</sup>

Before one too hastily rejects these texts as historically “worthless,” however, one should bear in mind the following points:

---

<sup>133</sup> The perfect example of this principle is Q, strictly speaking a non-canonical text which can be considered an apocryphon (albeit an apocryphon which is reconstructed on the basis of the canonical gospels), but is decisively important for the quest of the historical Jesus.

<sup>134</sup> On the other hand, one might ask the (somewhat exaggerated) question: Is there any information found in the canonical gospels that could not also be found in one or other apocryphal text?

<sup>135</sup> However, even if one regards the traditions which have been elaborated in the Gospel of Thomas as very ancient—and this is probably true, at least in some instances—we must ask whether the very character of this work as a collection of logia means that it is less suitable than the narrative gospels as a source of information about the historical Jesus. For further reflections, cf. J. Schröter, Jesus und die Anfänge der Christologie. Methodologische und exegetische Studien zu den Ursprüngen des christlichen Glaubens, BThS 47 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 2001), 39–42, 51–54.

First, at least in some passages, apocryphal gospels—especially the oldest fragments, but also the texts from Nag Hammadi—offer parallels to already known logia of Jesus, or at least parallel references to behavior or to a characteristic of Jesus of Nazareth, or to a theme that probably played an important role in his life. Even when it is difficult to demonstrate independence of the canonical gospels, especially in the case of very fragmentary texts, and this independence necessarily remains a matter of hypothesis, we find here again and again traces of traditions that can be important as “cross-section evidence.”

Secondly, even in those cases where apocryphal texts about Jesus can be shown to be dependent on already known canonical traditions, the apocrypha can still shed some light on tendencies inherent in the further development of traditions.<sup>136</sup> This in turn can shed an indirect light on the methodological question; in some cases, it can help us make up our minds about disputed points.

Thirdly, even in passages where apocryphal texts have no concrete significance for the quest of the historical Jesus (or the historical Paul, etc.), they are not historically worthless. Rather, on the level of praxis, as the expression of an historical situation of communication between their author and their first readers, they bear witness to problems, ideas, and concepts in this concrete situation.<sup>137</sup> In precisely the same <sup>136</sup> Cf. also M. Meyer, The Unknown Sayings of Jesus (San Francisco: HarperSan Francisco, 1998), xx: “It could be argued that the greatest significance of the unknown sayings of Jesus lies in their contribution to our understanding of the transmission and development of sayings of Jesus. Both within and outside the New Testament we can observe something of the complex process through which sayings of Jesus were remembered... and applied to the needs of communities of believers.” J. M. Robinson, “The Study of the Historical Jesus after Nag Hammadi,” Semeia 44 (1988): 45–55, offers an example (Luke 17:21c and parallels) in which the second-century Gospel of Mary, which is normally evaluated as worthless for the quest of the historical Jesus, is significant for the question of the transmission of texts. D. Lührmann, Die apokryph gewordenen Evangelien, 191–215, offers a fine example on the basis of the story of a sinful woman which is transmitted by Didymos of Alexandria in his Commentary on Qoh 7:21–22a. He demonstrates that the narrative of the woman caught in adultery, which some manuscripts of the canonical gospels insert between John 7:53 and 8:11, cannot go back to the historical Jesus.

---

<sup>137</sup> Cf. also F. Wisse, “The Use of Early Christian Literature as Evidence for Inner Diversity and Conflict,” in Nag Hammadi, Gnosticism, and Early Christianity, ed. C. W. Hedrick and R. Hodgson, Jr. (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1976), 177–190, who develops at least some aspects of this idea; idem, “Indirect Textual Evidence for the History of Early Christianity and Gnosticism,” in For the Children, Perfect Instruction. Studies in Honor of Hans-Martin Schenke on the Occasion of the Berliner Arbeitskreis für koptisch-gnostische Schriften’s Thirtieth Year, ed. H.-G. Bethge et al., NHMS 54 (Leiden: Brill, 2002), 215–230.

way, the often fragmentary manuscripts in which they are transmitted are archaeological witnesses to ancient and mediaeval Christianity—“fingerprints”<sup>138</sup> of people far distant in time, viz. the people who wrote, read, and used these texts.

2.3.

Another question is posed precisely by texts which are preserved only in a fragmentary state, and of logia which are detached from a narrative context (e.g., in the framework of quotations by patristic writers, in dialogue gospels, or in collections of logia): does the openness of such texts, which are often extremely brief, permit genuinely methodological points of reference for the quest for the historical Jesus? We can express this question as follows: What complexity must a text reach, before the criteria relevant to historical inquiry can be applied? And what is the historical value for the quest of the historical Jesus of the attribution to him of extremely open and brief logia? In other words, If it is a fact that an historical personage possibly (or very probably) uttered the sentence x at some point in his or her life, what does this tell us about the personage in question? I believe that this fact tells us first of all something about those who transmitted the sentence, since it seems that they found it a significant statement (perhaps with a meaning that went beyond what was originally intended).

2.4.

As I have said, this basically rather negative judgment about the texts known to us at present does not mean that we should suppose that the canonical gospels must have formed the historical beginnings of the written tradition about Jesus. This idea is refuted by the very plausible hypothesis of Q—basically, an apocryphal gospel which has been lost as a text and can be reconstructed only thanks to its reception. Other ancient texts may likewise have been lost, and new discoveries could change the picture. The very recent discovery of the Gospel of Judas is one sign that the age of spectacular discoveries of new texts is clearly not yet past. The situation of our sources thus remains open.<sup>139</sup>

<sup>138</sup> See T. J. Kraus, “Ad fontes: Gewinn durch die Konsultation von Originalhandschriften am Beispiel P. Vindob. G 31974,” Bib. 82 (2004): 1–16, esp. 1.

<sup>139</sup> English translation: Brian McNeil.

JESUS TRADITION IN EARLY PATRISTIC WRITINGS

RIEMER ROUKEMA

Early patristic writings provide us with a wealth of Jesus tradition. But in spite of this promising introductory statement, for those who are interested in early patristic Jesus traditions that have a chance to be historically reliable and are not known from the books which now make up the New Testament canon, the harvest may still be disappointing. However, even small scraps of possibly reliable extracanonical Jesus traditions deserve to be taken into account for the study of the historical Jesus. In this chapter we will give a survey of the different kinds of such extracanonical traditions, in order to make it clear in which context the more valuable ones—valuable with respect to the historical Jesus—have been transmitted.

We will confine our survey of early patristic writings roughly to authors of the second century CE, i.e., from Clement of Rome, whose Epistle to the Corinthians is usually dated to the end of the first century, to Clement of Alexandria, whose works date to the end of the second and the beginning of the third centuries. We will also pay attention to the philosopher Celsus who wrote a book against the Christians around 178 CE. He is certainly not a patristic author, but the fact that large parts of his book, Alèthês Logos, have been preserved in Origen's apology Against Celsus (of 248 CE) is a good reason to include him in this chapter.

In patristic writings of this period we will distinguish the following categories of Jesus traditions.

1. Extracanonical traditions about Jesus' origin, birth, youth, and baptism.
2. Traditions about Jesus' teaching that seem to derive from or are quoted from the canonical gospels.
3. Words of Jesus that may derive from an independent tradition that has also been included in the canonical gospels.
4. Traditions about Jesus' teaching and passion that are quoted or derived from extracanonical gospels.
5. Agrapha that seem to be transmitted independently.

6. Records of a secret oral tradition that Jesus transmitted to a small number of his disciples.
7. Extracanonial traditions about the risen Jesus.

Some comments may be added to this classification:

- a. We will see that often there is no unanimity about whether words of Jesus are borrowed from the canonical gospels or whether they derive from independent tradition that has also been included in these gospels (categories 2 and 3).
- b. Sometimes it is not clear whether a saying is quoted from an extracanonial gospel or should be classified as an independent agraphon (categories 4 and 5).
- c. For the second century the terms “canonical” and “extracanonial gospels” are admittedly anachronistic, but we use them for convenience’s sake.<sup>1</sup>
- d. One possible category is conspicuously absent: early patristic literature does not contain any extracanonial records of miracles attributed to Jesus.

1. Extracanonial Traditions about Jesus’ Origin, Birth, Youth, and Baptism

Apart from the canonical stories on Jesus’ origin, birth, and baptism, Justin Martyr transmits the tradition that Jesus was born in a cave, which he considers a fulfilment of Isaiah 33:16 LXX (“he will dwell in a high cave of a strong rock”).<sup>2</sup> He relates that Jesus, who was considered the son of Joseph the carpenter, also worked as a carpenter and made ploughs and yokes.<sup>3</sup> Justin narrates that, when Jesus stepped into the

---

<sup>1</sup> See R. Roukema, “La tradition apostolique et le canon du Nouveau Testament”, in The Apostolic Age in Patristic Thought, ed. A. Hilhorst, VigChr.S 70 (Leiden: Brill, 2004), 86–103.

<sup>2</sup> Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 78.5–6 (cf. 70.2), ed. M. Marcovich, PTS 47, (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1997). Jesus’ birth in a cave is also narrated in the Protevangelium Jacobi 18.1, ed. and comm. H. R. Smid, ApocrNT 1 (Assen: van Gorcum, 1965), 125–127.

<sup>3</sup> Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 88.8; cf. Infancy Gospel of Thomas 13.1, trans. in The Apocryphal New Testament. A Collection of Apocryphal Christian Literature in an English Translation, J. K. Elliott (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1999), 78.

water in order to be baptized, a fire was kindled in the Jordan.<sup>4</sup> Justin's version of the divine voice that was heard from heaven after Jesus' baptism coincides with the text of the Codex Bezae and the Old-Latin version of Luke 3:22: "You are my Son, today I have begotten you".<sup>5</sup> From an historical point of view these details on Jesus' birth and life must be considered legendary.<sup>6</sup>

Celsus's book against the Christians introduces a Jew who says that Jesus was born of the adultery of his mother with a soldier named Panthera, and that as a consequence the carpenter who was betrothed to her turned her out. His birth is said to have taken place in secret.<sup>7</sup> Although this story seems related with the apparent Talmudic tradition concerning Jeshu ben Pandera (or Jeshua ben Pntr', or similar names),<sup>8</sup> Johann Maier maintains that, in contradistinction to later Talmudic manuscripts and other Jewish literature, the original texts of the Talmud did not refer to Jesus. This conclusion makes him deny a connection between the Talmud and the far earlier tradition of Celsus' Jew; this

---

<sup>4</sup> Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 88.3 (PTS 47). This element also occurs in the Sibylline Oracles 6.4–6, ed. J. Geffken, GCS 8 (Leipzig: Hinrich'sche Buchhandlung, 1902), 130, trans. J. J. Collins, in The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, ed. J. H. Charlesworth, vol. I (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1983), 407, and in the Praedicatorio Pauli, a text quoted in Pseudo-Cyprian, De Rebaptismate 17, ed. G. Hartel, CSEL 3,3; (vienna: Apud C. Geroldi Filium Bibliopolam Academiae, 1871), 90; see D. A. Bertrand, Le baptême de Jésus. Histoire de l'exégèse aux deux premiers siècles, BGBE 14 (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1973), 43–44, 52–55, 96, 128. A variation of this tradition occurs in Tatian's Diatessaron and in Matthew 3:15 in the Old-Latin codices Vercellensis (a) and Sangermanensis (g<sup>1</sup>), which testify that at Jesus' baptism a light shone from the water. See L. Leloir, Le témoignage d'Ephrem sur le Diatessaron, CSCO Sub 227, 19 (Leuven: Peeters, 1962), 105–107; P. Henne, "Pourquoi le Christ fut-il baptisé? La réponse de Justin", RHPPhR 77 (1993): 567–585, at 574–576.

<sup>5</sup> Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 88.8; 103.6 (PTS 47). See Bertrand, Baptême, 131–132; Henne, "Pourquoi le Christ fut-il baptisé?", 581–582. The Gospel of the Ebionites reads: "You are my beloved Son, in you I am well pleased, today I have begotten you"; in Synopsis Quattuor Evangeliorum, ed. K. Aland, 15th ed. (Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft, 1996), 27.

<sup>6</sup> S. A. Panimolle, "Storicità e umanità del Cristo nelle Apologie di S. Giustino Martire", RivBib 38 (1990): 191–223, investigates how Justin defended Jesus' historicity and humanity in his two Apologies, but this paper does not deal with extracanonical traditions.

<sup>7</sup> Origen, Contra Celsum 1.28; 1.32; 1.38–39; ed. and trans. M. Borret, SC 132 (Paris: Cerf, 1967). Cf. the English translation by H. Chadwick, Origen. Contra Celsum (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1953; reprint 1980).

<sup>8</sup> See M. Lods, "Étude sur les sources juives de la polémique de Celse contre les chrétiens", RHPPhR 21 (1941): 1–33.

judgement was accepted by Enrico Norelli.<sup>9</sup> However, Celsus may have drawn on another Jewish source. Jane Schaberg presumes that the tradition of Jesus' illegitimate birth is most likely historical.<sup>10</sup>

Celsus' Jewish interlocutor also says that, because of his poverty, Jesus hired himself out as a workman in Egypt, where he tried his hand at certain (magical) powers, after which he returned full of conceit and gave himself the title of God.<sup>11</sup> This portrayal seems to originate from a malicious confusion of the canonical gospels and extracanonical traditions.<sup>12</sup>

Clement of Alexandria writes that Jesus' birth took place in the twenty-eighth year of Augustus (i.e., 4/3 BCE), when for the first time a census was ordered. For this information he quotes from Luke 3:1–2 that the word of the Lord came to John in the fifteenth year of Tiberius (i.e., 28/29 CE), and from Luke 3:23 that Jesus was about thirty years old when he was baptized. According to Clement there were 194 years, one month and thirteen days between Jesus' birth and the death of Commodus (who died December 31, 192 CE).<sup>13</sup> From these data it may be computed that Jesus was born in 3 BCE, more precisely on November 18. However, Hans Förster points out that this does not fit in with Clement's reference to the census (cf. Luke 2:1) that took place in 6/7 CE.<sup>14</sup> It is interesting that Clement also refers to those who said that Jesus' birth

<sup>9</sup> J. Maier, Jesus von Nazareth in der talmudischen Überlieferung, EdF 82 (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1978), 130–267; E. Norelli, “La tradizione sulla nascita di Gesù nell' ἈΛΗΘΗΣ ΛΟΓΟΣ di Celso”, in Discorsi di verità. Paganesimo, giudaismo et cristianesimo a confronto nel Contro Celso di Origene, ed. L. Perrone, SEAUG 61 (Rome: Institutum Patristicum Augustinianum, 1998), 133–166.

<sup>10</sup> J. Schaberg, The Illegitimacy of Jesus. A Feminist Theological Interpretation of the Infancy Narratives (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987), 165–169, 195; see also M. Smith, Jesus the Magician (London: Victor Gollanz, 1978), 58–61.

<sup>11</sup> Origen, Contra Celsum 1.28 (SC 132).

<sup>12</sup> Cf., e.g., Matthew 2:13–20; 12:24; Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 69.7 (PTS 47); Arabic Infancy Gospel 9–26, trans. A. Walker, Apocryphal Gospels, Acts, and Revelations, ANCL 16 (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1870), 103–111; Pseudo-Matthew 23, trans. Elliott, Apocryphal New Testament, 96. References to Celsus's knowledge of the canonical gospels occur, e.g., in Origen, Contra Celsum 1.68; 2.13; 2.27; 2.49; 2.74 (SC 132); cf. Smith, Jesus the Magician, 58–60. D. Rouger, “Celse et la tradition évangélique du Codex de Bèze”, in Codex Bezae. Studies from the Lunel Colloquium June 1994, ed. D. C. Parker and C.-B. Amphoux, NTTS 22 (Leiden: Brill, 1996), 240–247, concludes that Celsus used the “western text”.

<sup>13</sup> Clement, Stromateis 1.145.1–5, ed. C. Mondésert, M. Caster, SC 30 (Paris: Cerf, 1951).

<sup>14</sup> See H. Förster, Die Feier der Geburt Christi in der Alten Kirche. Beiträge zur Erforschung der Anfänge des Epiphanie- und des Weihnachtfestes, STAC 4 (Tübingen: Mohr, 2000), 11–15.

took place on the twenty-fifth of Pachon, which is May 20, in the twenty-eighth year of Augustus.<sup>15</sup> Furthermore, he mentions followers of Basilides who maintained that Jesus was born on the twenty-fourth or twenty-fifth of Pharmouthi, which is April 19 or 20, the year remaining unspecified. The Basilideans said that Jesus was baptized in the fifteenth year of Tiberius on the fifteenth of Tubi (i.e., January 10, 28/29 CE), whereas some of them upheld that Jesus' baptism took place on the eleventh of Tubi (i.e., January 6).<sup>16</sup> Reckoning from Commodus' death, Clement appears to date Jesus' death on November 18, 27 CE, but he also mentions the views of the Basilideans, who maintained that Jesus' passion took place in the sixteenth year of Tiberius (29/30 CE), either on the twenty-fifth of Phamenoth or on the twenty-fifth or the nineteenth of Pharmouthi (i.e., March 21, April 20 or 14).

Summarizing the complicated discussion of ancient calendars and proposed emendations of Clement's text that should eliminate the contradictions, Förster concludes that Clement knew different sources on Jesus' birth, baptism, and passion.<sup>17</sup>

2. Traditions on Jesus' Teaching that Seem to Derive from or Are Quoted from the Canonical Gospels

In the second century most references to Jesus are taken from, inspired by, or closely related to the canonical gospels, which implies that they mostly do not add anything new to the search for Jesus traditions that might possibly be historically reliable. In this section we will only introduce some monographs from 1950 onwards that deal with the reception of these gospels by Clement of Rome and second-century authors and which, admittedly, are more important for the textual history and the history of canonisation of these gospels than for the purpose of this chapter. However, since most of these monographs also pay attention to extracanonical traditions and since it is not always clear whether early patristic authors used the canonical gospels or similar independent traditions, most of these publications will appear to be relevant for the next sections as well.<sup>18</sup>

<sup>15</sup> Clement, Stromateis 1.145.6 (SC 30); see Förster, Feier, 15.

<sup>16</sup> Clement, Stromateis 1.146.2–4 (SC 30); see Förster, Feier, 15–16.

<sup>17</sup> Förster, Feier, 11–38; 193. See, e.g., E. Preuschen, "Todesjahr und Todestag Jesu", ZNW 5 (1904): 1–17; R. H. Bainton, "Basilidean Chronology and New Testament Interpretation", JBL 51 (1932): 81–134; W. Hartke, Über Jahrespunkte und Feste insbesondere das Weihnachtsfest, SSA 6 (Berlin: Akademie-Verlag, 1956), 18–30; S. K. Roll, Toward the Origins of Christmas, LiC 5 (Kampen: Kok Pharos, 1995), 77–79; W. A. Löhr, Basilides und seine Schule. Eine Studie zur Theologie- und Kirchengeschichte des zweiten Jahrhunderts, WUNT 83 (Tübingen: Mohr, 1996), 42–48.

In 1950 Édouard Massaux published his thesis on the influence of the Gospel of Matthew before Irenaeus, in which he also pays attention to the other gospels.<sup>19</sup> He points out the popularity of the Gospel of Matthew, and of the Sermon on the Mount in particular, in this period. He concludes that in comparison with Matthew, the Gospels of Luke and John are less influential, and that literary traces of the Gospel of Mark are absent.<sup>20</sup> But when in 1957 Helmut Koester (or, Köster) submitted his thesis on the synoptic tradition in the Apostolic Fathers, his conclusions differed considerably from Massaux's (whose thesis was unknown to him), for in his view words of Jesus were at that time still transmitted independently from the written gospels, so that it is often difficult to distinguish between reception of these gospels and common tradition.<sup>21</sup> In 1959 F.-M. Braun published his study on the reception of the Gospel of John in the early church, but for our purpose it is not very useful.<sup>22</sup> In 1967 A. J. Bellizoni concluded that Justin Martyr usually quoted from "post-canonical sources based on the synoptic gospels" rather than from the synoptic gospels themselves, and that "his harmonies were of a limited scope and were apparently composed for didactic purposes."<sup>23</sup> This hypothesis has been confirmed by Leslie L. Kline and Helmut Koester, but countered by Georg Strecker.<sup>24</sup> In 1973

<sup>18</sup> For older research see M.-É. Boismard, "Une tradition para-synoptique attestée par les Pères anciens", in The New Testament in Early Christianity, ed. J. M. Sevrin, BEThL 86 (Leuven: Peeters, 1989), 177–195, at 177–181.

<sup>19</sup> E. Massaux, Influence de l'évangile de saint Matthieu sur la littérature chrétienne avant saint Irénée, DGMFT II, 42 (Louvain and Gembloux, 1950); reprinted by F. Neiryck, ed., with a supplement by B. Dehandschutter, BETL 75 (Leuven: Peeters, 1986); also E. Massaux, "Le texte du sermon sur la montagne utilisé par saint Justin", EThL 28 (1952): 411–448.

<sup>20</sup> Massaux, Influence, 647–655.

<sup>21</sup> H. Koester, Synoptische Überlieferung bei den Apostolischen Vätern, TU 65.5, 10 (Berlin: Akademie-Verlag, 1957); idem, Ancient Christian Gospels. Their History and Development (London: SCM Press and Philadelphia: Trinity Press, 1990).

<sup>22</sup> F.-M. Braun, Jean le Théologien et son évangile dans l'Église ancienne, EtB (Paris: J. Gabalda, 1959).

<sup>23</sup> A. J. Bellizoni, The Sayings of Jesus in the Writings of Justin Martyr, NTS 17 (Leiden: Brill, 1967), 140–141.

<sup>24</sup> L. L. Kline, "Harmonized Sayings of Jesus in the Pseudo-Clementine Homilies and Justin Martyr", ZNW 66 (1975): 223–241; G. Strecker, "Eine Evangelienharmonie bei Justin und Pseudoklemens?", NTS 24 (1978): 297–316; H. Koester, Ancient Christian

Donald Hagner presumed that Clement of Rome was acquainted with the synoptic gospels, but he admits that Clement's epistle provides us with little positive indication of this acquaintance.<sup>25</sup> In 1987 Wolf-Dietrich Köhler appeared less confident about the early use of the written Gospel of Matthew than Massaux in 1950, for in his thesis on the reception of Matthew before Irenaeus he concludes that in this period there was still much freedom and lack of precision in the use of written gospels.<sup>26</sup> Like Braun's book, three recent studies of the reception of the Fourth Gospel in the second century are not very useful for our purpose.<sup>27</sup>

The fact that several of these monographs deal with the period before Irenaeus (Braun's study on John being the exception) suggests that Irenaeus's use of the canonical gospels differs from his predecessors. This is indeed the case, for Irenaeus is the first to maintain that only the four Gospels of Matthew, Luke, Mark, and John are authoritative.<sup>28</sup> Yet it is remarkable that, apart from his numerous explicit gospel quotations, Irenaeus also appeals to "the words of the Lord" as if these sayings were a distinct tradition, even though they occur in the gospels as well.<sup>29</sup> It is interesting that he even appeals to some extracanonical words of Jesus, to which we will come back in the fifth section.

In addition, it is noteworthy that Irenaeus refutes the opinion that Jesus preached during one year, which was based on Luke 4:19, "to preach the acceptable year of the Lord" (KJV), and that he suffered in

---

Gospels, 360–402. For further discussion on Justin's use of a gospel harmony see C. D. Allert, Revelation, Truth, Canon and Interpretation: Studies in Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho, VigChr.S 64 (Leiden: Brill, 2002), 20–21, 188–220, who is in favour of this hypothesis.

<sup>25</sup> D. A. Hagner, The Use of the Old and New Testaments in Clement of Rome, NT S 34 (Leiden: Brill, 1973), 135–178, 332–335, at 332.

<sup>26</sup> W.-D. Köhler, Die Rezeption des Matthäusevangeliums in der Zeit vor Irenäus, WUNT 2.24 (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1987), 527–536.

<sup>27</sup> T. Nagel, Die Rezeption des Johannesevangeliums im 2. Jahrhundert. Studien zur vorirenäischen Aneignung und Auslegung des vierten Evangeliums in christlicher und christlich-gnostischer Literatur, ABG 2 (Leipzig: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 2000); C. E. Hill, The Johannine Corpus in the Early Church (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004); B. Mutschler, Das Corpus Johanneum bei Irenäus von Lyon. Studien und Kommentar zum dritten Buch von Adversus Haereses, WUNT 189 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006).

<sup>28</sup> Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.9–11, ed. and trans. A. Rousseau, L. Doutreleau, SC 211 (Paris: Cerf, 1974).

<sup>29</sup> See H. von Campenhausen, Die Entstehung der Christlichen Bibel, BHTh 39 (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1968), 223–237; Y.-M. Blanchard, Aux sources du canon, le témoignage d'Irénée, CFi 175 (Paris: Cerf, 1993), 196–229.

the twelfth month of this year. Irenaeus deduces from Luke 3:23 that when Jesus was baptized he had not yet completed his thirtieth year, and he concludes from John 8:57, where “the Jews” say to Jesus that he is not yet fifty years old, that such language is used for someone who is almost fifty. For Irenaeus this implies that Jesus had the advanced age of a master when he taught his disciples. For this view Irenaeus also invokes the authority of the presbyters who had heard this from John and the other apostles.<sup>30</sup> In 1857, W. Wigan Harvey pointed out the unsatisfactory character of this tradition.<sup>31</sup>

3. Words of Jesus that May Derive from an Independent Tradition that Has Also Been Included in the Canonical Gospels

Although it is often difficult to distinguish between the reception of the canonical gospels and independent oral traditions that have also been included into these gospels, it is inevitable to make this distinction. This comes to light, e.g., in Clement’s Epistle to the Corinthians, which contains two explicit sayings of Jesus. The first quotation reads, “Show mercy, that you may be shown mercy; forgive, that it may be forgiven you. As you do, so it will be done to you; as you give, so it will be given to you; as you judge, so you will be judged; as you show kindness, so will kindness be shown to you; the amount you dispense will be the amount you receive.”<sup>32</sup> Even though this quotation is closely related to synoptic texts,<sup>33</sup> scholars who have studied this exhortation agree that Clement drew on an independent source.<sup>34</sup> Alfred Resch considers

<sup>30</sup> Irenaeus, Against Heresies 2.22.5–6, ed. and trans. A. Rousseau, L. Doutreleau, SC 294 (Paris: Cerf, 1982).

<sup>31</sup> W. W. Harvey, Sancti Irenaei episcopi Lugdunensis libros quinque Adversus Haereses, vol. I (Cambridge: Typis Academicis, 1857), 331.

<sup>32</sup> ἐλεᾶτε, ἵνα ἐλεηθῆτε· ἀφίετε, ἵνα ἀφεθῆ ὑμῖν· ὡς ποιεῖτε, οὕτω ποιηθήσεται ὑμῖν· ὡς δίδωτε, οὕτως δοθήσεται ὑμῖν· ὡς κρίνετε, οὕτως κριθήσεσθε· ὡς χρηστεύεσθε, οὕτως χρηστευθήσεται ὑμῖν· ᾧ μέτρῳ μετρεῖτε, ἐν αὐτῷ μετρηθήσεται ὑμῖν. Clement, Corinthians 13:2, ed. and trans. B. D. Ehrman, The Apostolic Fathers, vol. I, LCL 24, (Cambridge MA and London: Harvard University Press, 2003), 56–59.

<sup>33</sup> Cf. Matthew 5:7; 6:14–15; 7:1–2, 12; Mark 4:24; 11:25; Luke 6:31, 36–38.

<sup>34</sup> Massaux, Influence, 7–13; O. Knoch, Eigenart und Bedeutung der Eschatologie im theologischen Aufriß des ersten Clemensbriefes. Eine Auslegungsgeschichtliche Untersuchung, Theoph. 17 (Bonn: Peter Hanstein Verlag, 1964), 70, 73–74; M. Mees, “Schema und Dispositio in ihrer Bedeutung für die Formung der Herrenworte aus dem 1. Clemensbrief, Kap. 13,2”, VetChr 8 (1971): 257–272; Hagner, Use, 135–151; idem, “The Sayings of Jesus in the Apostolic Fathers and Justin Martyr”, in Gospel Perspectives. The Jesus Tradition outside the Gospels, ed. D. Wenham, vol. 5 (Sheffield: JSOT

this saying, including the non-synoptic words, “as you show kindness, so will kindness be shown to you,” an authentic word of Jesus.<sup>35</sup> It is noteworthy that both Polycarp and Clement of Alexandria also knew this saying or at least part of it, possibly thanks to Clement of Rome.<sup>36</sup> The other explicit quotation of a saying of Jesus in Clement’s epistle reads, “Woe to that person! It would have been good for him not to be born, rather than cause one of my chosen to stumble. Better for him to have a millstone cast about his neck and be drowned in the sea than to have corrupted one of my chosen.”<sup>37</sup> In this case several scholars presume that this text is taken from the Gospel of Matthew or from the synoptic gospels,<sup>38</sup> whereas others judge that it derives from independent tradition.<sup>39</sup>

A similar dissension among scholars about the use either of the Gospel of Matthew or of independent tradition is true for the Didache. It is evident that this early Christian manual is often close to the Gospel of Matthew, especially to the Sermon on the Mount, and some scholars conclude that its author actually depended on this Gospel,<sup>40</sup> whereas others think that the author had access to independent Jesus tradition, so that this writing would throw light on the sources of the Gospels.<sup>41</sup>

---

Press, 1984), 233–268, at 234–237; Koester, Synoptische Überlieferung, 12–16; idem, Ancient Christian Gospels, 66–69; Köhler, Rezeption, 67–71; A. Lindemann, Die Clemensbriefe, HNT 17 (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1992), 54; H. E. Lona, Der erste Clemensbrief, KAV 2 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1998), 214–216.

<sup>35</sup> A. Resch, Agrapha. Aussercanonische Schriftfragmente, 2nd ed; TU 30/NF 15.3–4 (Leipzig: Hinrich’sche Buchhandlung, 1906), 88; 386; cf. section 5.

<sup>36</sup> Polycarp, Philippians 2:3, ed. and trans. Ehrman, Apostolic Fathers, vol. I, LCL 24, 334–337; Clement, Stromateis 2.91.2 (SC 38).

<sup>37</sup> οὐαὶ τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ ἐκείνῳ· καλὸν ἦν αὐτῷ, εἰ οὐκ ἐγεννήθη, ἢ ἕνα τῶν ἐκλεκτῶν μου σκανδαλίσαι· κρείττον ἦν αὐτῷ περιτεθῆναι μύλον καὶ καταποντισθῆναι εἰς τὴν θάλασσαν, ἢ ἕνα τῶν ἐκλεκτῶν μου διαστρέψαι. Clement, Corinthians 46:8, ed. and trans. Ehrman, Apostolic Fathers, vol. I, LCL 24, 118–119.

<sup>38</sup> Massaux, Influence, 23–27; Köhler, Rezeption, 62–64; Knoch, Eigenart und Bedeutung, 70–72, who refers to the Gospels of both Matthew and Luke; Lindemann, Clemensbriefe, 137. Cf. Matthew 18:6; 26:24; Mark 9:42; 14:21; Luke 17:2; 22:22.

<sup>39</sup> Koester, Synoptische Überlieferung, 16–19; idem, Ancient Christian Gospels, 69–70; Hagner, Use, 152–164; idem, “Sayings of Jesus”, 237–239; Lona, Der erste Clemensbrief, 496–498.

<sup>40</sup> E.g., Massaux, Influence, 604–641; Köhler, Rezeption, 19–56. C. M. Tuckett, “Synoptic Tradition in the Didache”, in The New Testament in Early Christianity, ed. J.-M. Sevrin, 197–230, concludes that the author of the Didache knew the finished Gospels of Matthew and Luke.

<sup>41</sup> E.g., J.-P. Audet, La Didachè. Instruction des apôtres, EtB (Paris: J. Gabalda, 1958), 166–186; Hagner, “Sayings of Jesus”, 240–242; J. Draper, “The Jesus Tradition in the Didache”, in Gospel Perspectives. The Jesus Tradition outside the Gospels, ed. D. Wenham, vol. 5 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1984), 269–287; W. Rordorf and A. Tuilier, La

An intermediary position is that the original text of the Didache was independent of the synoptic Gospels, and that later additions were influenced by them.<sup>42</sup>

These different assessments of the use of the synoptic gospels, especially of the Gospel of Matthew, are also made with respect to the Epistle of (Pseudo-)Barnabas, the Second Epistle of (Pseudo-)Clement, and the Epistles of Ignatius of Antioch. In general Massaux mostly perceives a literary influence of the Gospel of Matthew in these “Apostolic Fathers”,<sup>43</sup> whereas Koester usually concludes that the authors drew on independent tradition,<sup>44</sup> and Köhler takes up an intermediary position. As for Justin Martyr, Köhler concludes that he quoted the Gospels of Matthew, Luke, and Mark from memory and thus freely, but Köhler does not conclude that Justin drew on independent tradition that was also included into the synoptic gospels.<sup>45</sup> Yet Marie-Émile Boismard demonstrates with much acuity that not only Justin, but also Clement of Alexandria and other Fathers do sometimes quote an independent tradition that is more archaic than the textual form of the Gospel of Matthew.<sup>46</sup>

---

doctrine des douze apôtres (Didachè), 2nd ed., SC 248<sup>bis</sup> (Paris: Cerf, 1998), 83–91; H. van de Sandt, D. Flusser, The Didache. Its Jewish Sources and its Place in Early Judaism and Christianity, CRINT 3.5 (Assen: van Gorcum and Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2002), 35–50; A. Milavec, “Synoptic Tradition in the Didache Revisited”, J ECS 11 (2003): 443–480; idem, The Didache: Faith, Hope, and Life of the Earliest Christian Communities, 50–70 C.E. (New York/Mahwah NJ: Paulist Press, 2003).

<sup>42</sup> Koester, Synoptische Überlieferung, 159–241, at 239–241; C. N. Jefford, The Sayings of Jesus in the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, VigChr S 11 (Leiden: Brill, 1989), 144–145; K. Niederwimmer, Die Didache, KAV 1 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht 1989), 71–77.

<sup>43</sup> Moreover, see P. F. Beatrice, “Une citation de l’Évangile de Matthieu dans l’Épître de Barnabé”, in Sevrin, ed., The New Testament in Early Christianity, 231–245.

<sup>44</sup> In the case of Ignatius, Koester’s conclusions are confirmed by J. Smit Sibinga, “Ignatius and Matthew”, NT 8 (1966): 263–283, who concludes that the evidence is against Ignatius quoting Matthew.

<sup>45</sup> Köhler, Rezeption, 161–265, at 256–265; as for Justin’s knowledge of Mark, he disagrees with Massaux, Influence, 653, who does not find any literary influence of Mark in the literature before Irenaeus. Bellinzoni, Sayings of Jesus, 140, concludes that Justin used a harmony that also drew on Mark.

<sup>46</sup> Boismard, “Tradition para-synoptique”, 181–195; he discusses Matthew 5:16, 17, 37, and refers to many older studies.

4. Traditions about Jesus' Teaching and Passion that are Quoted or Derived from Extracanonical Gospels

Since extracanonical, "apocryphal" gospels are discussed as such in a previous chapter, we will give a survey only of those early patristic writings that include words of Jesus from such gospels, and some other traditions that may be related to these gospels.

Clement of Alexandria is the only second-century patristic author who explicitly quotes gospels that are now extracanonical. Although he speaks of "the four gospels that have been handed down to us"<sup>47</sup> and thus, like Irenaeus, recognizes their prominent position, Clement is remarkably free in drawing on other sources as well. A survey of his use of canonical and extracanonical sources has been given by J. Ruwet.<sup>48</sup> For example, without any reserve Clement quotes from the Gospel of the Hebrews: "He that wonders will reign, and he that has reigned will rest".<sup>49</sup> This saying is apparently meant as a word of Jesus, although Clement does not say so explicitly. In another context he quotes a longer version of this saying but without reference to the Gospel of the Hebrews: "He who seeks, will not stop till he finds; and having found, he will wonder; and wondering, he will reign; and reigning, he will rest".<sup>50</sup> With the same openness he quotes sayings from the Traditions of Matthias<sup>51</sup> and from an anonymous gospel.<sup>52</sup> Only when he quotes

<sup>47</sup> Clement, Stromateis 3.93.1 (GCS 52 [15]).

<sup>48</sup> J. Ruwet, "Clément d'Alexandrie, Canon des Écritures et Apocryphes", Bib. 29 (1948): 77–99, 391–408; see also J. A. Brooks, "Clement of Alexandria as a Witness to the Development of the New Testament Canon", SecCen 9 (1992): 41–55; Roukema, "Tradition apostolique", 99–100.

<sup>49</sup> ὁ θαυμάσας βασιλεύσει καὶ ὁ βασιλεύσας ἀναπαύσεται. Clement, Stromateis 2.45.5 (SC 38).

<sup>50</sup> οὐ πάσεται ὁ ζητῶν, ἕως ἂν εὕρη· εὐρὼν δὲ θαυμηθήσεται, θαυμηθεὶς δὲ βασιλεύσει, βασιλεύσας δὲ ἀναπαύσεται. Clement, Stromateis 5.96.3, ed. and trans. A. Le Boulluec, P. Voulet, SC 278 (Paris: Cerf, 1981); cf. Ruwet, "Canon", 398–400. The saying is also included in the Gospel of Thomas 2, ed. and trans. B. Layton, ed., Nag Hammadi Codex II, 2–7, vol. I, NHS 22 (Leiden: Brill, 1989), 52–53, 113, 126.

<sup>51</sup> Clement, Stromateis 2.45.4 ("Wonder at what is before you"; SC 38); Ruwet, "Canon", 401–402, doubts whether Clement personally knew this writing and thinks that he borrowed his quotations from another author.

<sup>52</sup> Clement, Stromateis 5.63.7 ("My mystery is to me, and to the sons of my house", SC 278); cf. Ruwet, "Canon", 400–401.

Salome's dialogue with Jesus in the Gospel of the Egyptians does Clement sometimes display a slight reserve.<sup>53</sup>

An exceptional record of a deed of Jesus noted by Clement holds that Jesus baptized Peter.<sup>54</sup> Since John 3:22, 3:26 and 4:1 present Jesus as a baptizer (which is "corrected" by John 4:2),<sup>55</sup> we should not exclude the possibility that this report of Peter's baptism is historically reliable.<sup>56</sup> Furthermore, Clement tells that when John wanted to feel Jesus' body, it yielded as he pressed on it and had no fleshly substance.<sup>57</sup> This docteric testimony is apparently borrowed from an apocryphal book.<sup>58</sup>

Another exceptional tradition occurs in Clement's presumed Epistle to Theodore, which Morton Smith discovered in the Mar Saba monastery south-east of Jerusalem in 1958 and which he published in 1973.<sup>59</sup> The letter includes two fragments of a Secret Gospel of Mark that Mark had allegedly inserted into the initial, shorter version of his Gospel,

---

<sup>53</sup> Clement, Stromateis 3.45.3; 3.63.1–2; 3.64.1; 3.66.1–2; 3.92.2–93.1 (GCS 52 [15]). Jesus' answer to Salome's question, "How long shall death hold sway?" is: "As long as you women bear children". Other sayings of Jesus from the Gospel of the Egyptians are: "I came to destroy the works of the female"; his answer to Salome's remark, "I would have done better had I never given birth to a child" is: "Eat of every plant, but eat not of that which has bitterness in it"; his answer to Salome's question when she would know the answers to her questions: "When you trample on the robe of shame, and when the two shall be one, and the male with the female, and there is neither male nor female"; trans. J. E. L. Oulton, H. Chadwick, Alexandrian Christianity, LCC (London: SCM Press and Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1954), 61, 69–70, 83. Cf. Clement, Excerpts from Theodotus 67.2, ed. and trans. F. Sagnard, SC 23 (Paris: Cerf, 1970), 190–191; Gospel of Thomas 22; 37. See Ruwet, "Canon", 396–398 and S. Petersen, "Zerstört die Werke der Weiblichkeit!" Maria Magdalena, Salome und andere Jüngerinnen Jesu in christlich-gnostischen Schriften, NHMS 48 (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 203–220.

<sup>54</sup> Hypotyposesis 5, ed. O. Stählin, L. Früchtel, GCS 17<sup>2</sup> (Berlin: Akademie-Verlag, 1970), 196. The fragment goes on to relate that Peter baptized Andrew, and that Andrew baptized James and John, and these the others.

<sup>55</sup> E.g., K. Berger, Theologiegeschichte des Urchristentums. Theologie des Neuen Testaments, 2nd ed. (Tübingen/Basel: Francke Verlag, 1995), 121–123.

<sup>56</sup> Church Fathers like Tertullian, Augustine, and Ambrose deduced Peter's baptism from his dialogue with Jesus in John 13:6–10, where Jesus calls Peter one who has bathed (ὁ λελουμένος). See D. A. Bertrand, "Jésus baptiste", in Figures du Nouveau Testament chez les Pères, ed. P. Maraval, Cahiers de Biblia Patristica 3 (Strasbourg: Centre d'Analyse et de Documentation Patristiques, 1991), 7–29, at 11–18.

<sup>57</sup> In Epistolam primam Iohannis 1.1, ed. O. Stählin, L. Früchtel (GCS 17<sup>2</sup>), 210.

<sup>58</sup> See the Acts of John 89; 93, ed. and trans. E. Junod and J.-D. Kaestli, Acta Ioannis, CCSA 1 (Turnhout: Brepols, 1983), 192–193, 196–197.

<sup>59</sup> M. Smith, Clement of Alexandria and a Secret Gospel of Mark (Cambridge MA: Harvard University Press, 1973).

and that are discussed elsewhere in this volume.<sup>60</sup> Since, except for Morton Smith, only a few scholars actually saw the manuscript,<sup>61</sup> and it has been lost since then so that no one else had the opportunity to investigate it, this text has been suspected of being a falsification, although many scholars gave it the benefit of the doubt. However, when S. C. Carlson investigated the circumstances of the presumed discovery and scrutinized the photographs of the manuscript, he was able to prove definitely that the Epistle to Theodore and thus the fragments of the Secret Gospel of Mark were written by Morton Smith himself.<sup>62</sup>

Apart from the works of Clement of Alexandria, the only other second century writing that apparently includes words of Jesus from extracanonical gospels is the Second Epistle of (Pseudo-)Clement.<sup>63</sup> Although the author quotes a good many words of Jesus that are known from or similar to the canonical gospels, this is not true of all his quotations.<sup>64</sup> Once the author explicitly refers to “the gospel” and quotes a saying of Jesus that occurs only partially in the canonical gospels. It reads, “For the Lord says in the gospel, ‘If you do not keep what is small, who will give you what is great? For I say you that the one who is faithful in very little is faithful also in much.’”<sup>65</sup> Koester suggests that

<sup>60</sup> See T. Nicklas’ article.

<sup>61</sup> G. G. Stroumsa, “Comments on Charles Hedrick’s Article: A Testimony”, J ECS 11 (2003): 147–153, relates that David Flusser, Shlomo Pines, Archimandrite Meliton, and he himself saw the text in 1976.

<sup>62</sup> S. C. Carlson, The Gospel Hoax. Morton Smith’s Invention of Secret Mark (Baylor University Press: Waco TX, 2005). See also A. Le Boulluec, “La lettre sur l’« Évangile Secret » de Marc et le Quis Dives Salvetur ? de Clément d’Alexandrie”, Apocrypha 7 (1996): 27–41; A. Jakab, “Une lettre « perdue » de Clément d’Alexandrie ? (Morton Smith et l’« Évangile Secret » de Marc)”, Apocrypha 10 (1999): 7–15; C. W. Hedrick, “The Secret Gospel of Mark: Stalemate in the Academy”, J ECS 11 (2003): 133–145; B. D. Ehrman, “Response to Charles Hedrick’s Stalemate”, J ECS 11 (2003): 155–163; E. Rau, Das Geheime Markusevangelium. Ein Schriftfund voller Rätsel (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 2003); P. Jeffrey, The Secret Gospel of Mark Unveiled. Imagined Rituals of Sex, Death, and Madness in a Biblical Forgery (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2007).

<sup>63</sup> For the presumed date of this writing see, e.g., Lindemann, Clemensbriefe, 195.

<sup>64</sup> See Massaux, Influence, 139–155; Koester, Synoptische Überlieferung, 62–111; Ancient Christian Gospels, 353–360; K. P. Donfried, The Setting of Second Clement in Early Christianity, NT S 38 (Leiden: Brill, 1974), 49–82, at 79–82; Hagner, “Sayings of Jesus”, 244–246; Köhler, Rezeption, 129–149.

<sup>65</sup> εἰ τὸ μικρὸν οὐκ ἐτηρήσατε, τὸ μέγα τίς ὑμῖν δώσει; λέγω γὰρ ὑμῖν, ὅτι ὁ πιστὸς ἐν ἐλαχίστῳ καὶ ἐν πολλῷ πιστὸς ἐστίν. 2 Clement 8:5, ed. and trans. Ehrman, Apostolic Fathers, vol. I, LCL 24: 176–177; the second part of this saying corresponds to Luke 16:10. The first part corresponds to Irenaeus, Against Heresies 2.34.3 (SC 294); see section 5, where we note that no claims for its authenticity have been made.

the author of 2 Clement used a collection of words of Jesus based on Matthew, Luke, elaborations of synoptic words, and apocryphal texts, which collection was called “the Gospel” in 8:5.<sup>66</sup> According to R. Warns, all extracanonical sayings of Jesus quoted in 2 Clement should be ascribed to this unknown gospel.<sup>67</sup> Yet neither Koester’s nor Warns’ thesis can be proven.<sup>68</sup> Since one of 2 Clement’s extracanonical quotations is similar to Clement of Alexandria’s extracts from the Gospel of the Egyptians, the author might also have drawn on this gospel. The text in question reads, “For when the Lord himself was asked by someone when his kingdom would come, he said, ‘When the two are one, and the outside like the inside, and the male with the female is neither male nor female’, [then] ‘the kingdom of my Father will come’”.<sup>69</sup> Alfred Resch once defended the authenticity of this saying, but this confidence is not shared generally.<sup>70</sup> Koester thinks that another extracanonical saying of Jesus in 2 Clement partially corresponds to the Gospel of the Nazarenes. It reads, “Even if you were nestled close to my breast but did not do what I have commanded, I would cast you away and say to you, ‘Leave me! I do not know where you are from, you who do what

<sup>66</sup> Koester, Synoptische Überlieferung, 110; Ancient Christian Gospels, 353–355.

<sup>67</sup> R. Warns, “Untersuchungen zum 2. Clemensbrief” (Dissertation, Marburg, 1989), 466–468, referred to by Lindemann, Clemensbriefe, 194.

<sup>68</sup> Cf. Hagner, Use, 282; Köhler, Rezeption, 147.

<sup>69</sup> ὅταν ἔσται τὰ δύο ἓν, καὶ τὸ ἔξω ὡς τὸ ἔσω, καὶ τὸ ἄρσεν μετὰ τῆς θηλείας, οὕτε ἄρσεν οὕτε θῆλυ... ἐλεύσεται ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ πατρὸς μου. 2 Clement 12:2, 6, ed. and trans. Ehrman, Apostolic Fathers, vol. I, LCL 24: 182–185; cf. Clement, Stromateis 3.92.2 (GCS 52 [15]; see note 53); Gospel of Thomas 22. Since the other extracanonical quotations in 2 Clement are not paralleled by the Gospel of Thomas, it is unlikely that he used this Gospel; cf. Donfried, Setting, 73–77, who also concludes that because of the dissimilarities with the Gospel of the Egyptians there is little reason to believe that 2 Clement is dependent on this Gospel (see also Setting, 152–154).

<sup>70</sup> See T. Baarda, “2 Clement 12 and the Sayings of Jesus”, in Logia. Les paroles de Jésus—The Sayings of Jesus, ed. J. Delobel, BETL 59 (Leuven: Peeters, 1982), 529–556, at 551–553; also in T. Baarda, Early Transmission of Words of Jesus. Thomas, Tatian and the Text of the New Testament (Amsterdam: Free University Press, 1983), 261–288; he refers to A. Resch, “Miscellen zur neutestamentliche Schriftforschung, VI. Gal. 3,28 = Clem. Rom. II, 12,2”, ZKWL 9 (1888): 232–245. Later, Resch wrote more cautiously that the saying corresponds to Jesus’ teaching, in Agrapha. Aussercanonische Schriftfragmente, 2nd ed., TU 30/NF 15.3–4 (Leipzig, Hinrich’sche Buchhandlung, 1906), 95. D. M. MacDonald, There is no Male and Female. The Fate of a Dominical Saying in Paul and Gnosticism, HDR 20 (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1987), maintains that the saying is very ancient, although he makes no judgement concerning its authenticity as a saying of Jesus; he assumes that Paul used it in Galatians 3:26–28. J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus. The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1991), 295–298, holds that it is an interpretation of a saying of the historical Jesus.

is lawless”.<sup>71</sup> Köhler, however, doubts whether the attribution of the extracanonical words of this saying to the Gospel of the Nazarenes is correct.<sup>72</sup> One may conclude that, as long as the presumed collection of words of Jesus allegedly used in 2 Clement has not been rediscovered, it is wiser to classify this and other extracanonical words of Jesus quoted in 2 Clement as independent agrapha, which will be discussed in the following section.

We will close this section by pointing out that Justin Martyr may have known and used the Gospel of Peter. Although Bellinzoni concludes that there are no parallels between Justin’s text of the sayings of Jesus and the Gospel of Peter, and Graham N. Stanton maintains that there is no evidence that Justin knew or used any apocryphal gospel, Adolf Harnack and Peter Pilhofer show that there are some correspondences between Justin’s discussion of Jesus’ passion and precisely the Gospel of Peter.<sup>73</sup> Among other, perhaps less convincing similarities both Harnack and Pilhofer point out that both Justin and the Gospel of Peter relate that the Jews (and not the Roman soldiers) mocked Jesus, saying “judge us” or “judge righteously, king of Israel”, and that the Jews (and not the Roman soldiers) crucified him.<sup>74</sup> For Pilhofer the proof of Justin’s knowledge of the Gospel of Peter is that both use the rare (and non-canonical) word λαχμός (“lot”) when the Jews cast lots in order

<sup>71</sup> ἐὰν ᾗτε μετ’ ἐμοῦ συνηγμένοι ἐν τῷ κόλπῳ μου καὶ μὴ ποιήτε τὰς ἐντολάς μου, ἀποβαλῶ ὑμᾶς καὶ ἐρῶ ὑμῖν· ὑπάγετε ἀπ’ ἐμοῦ, οὐκ οἶδα ὑμᾶς, πόθεν ἐστέ, ἐργάται ἀνομίας, 2 Clement 4:5, ed. and trans. Ehrman, Apostolic Fathers, vol. I, LCL 24: 170–171; Koester, Synoptische Überlieferung, 91–93; Ancient Christian Gospels, 355–357. Resch, Agrapha<sup>2</sup>, 168, and J. H. Ropes, Die Sprüche Jesu die in den kanonischen Evangelien nicht überliefert sind (see note 79), 57–58, consider this text a mixture of “canonical” texts (Matthew 7:23; 25:12; Luke 13:25–27; John 13:23; 14:21; 15:10, 14).

<sup>72</sup> Köhler, Rezeption, 143–144, 288–302. Resch, Agrapha<sup>2</sup>, 168, does not consider it an original word of Jesus.

<sup>73</sup> Bellinzoni, Sayings of Jesus, 139; G. N. Stanton, “Jesus Traditions and Gospels in Justin Martyr and Irenaeus”, in The Biblical Canons, ed. J.-M. Auers, H. J. de Jonge, BETL 153 (Leuven: Peeters, 2003), 353–370, at 364; A. Harnack, Bruchstücke des Evangeliums und der Apokalypse des Petrus, TU 9.2 (Leipzig, Hinrich’sche Buchhandlung, 1893), 37–41; P. Pilhofer, “Justin und das Petrus-evangelium”, ZNW 81 (1990): 60–78. Bellinzoni, Sayings of Jesus, 139, points at the difference between Jesus’ word on the cross in Justin’s Dialogue 99.1 (PTS 47), “God, God, why have you forsaken me?” and the Gospel of Peter 6.19, ed. and trans. M. G. Mara, SC 201 (Paris: Cerf, 1973), “My power, [my] power, you have forsaken me”.

<sup>74</sup> κρῖνον ἡμῖν. Justin, 1 Apology 35.6, ed. M. Marcovich, PTS 38 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1994); δικαίως κρῖνε, βασιλεῦ Ἰσραηλ. Gospel of Peter 3.7 (SC 201); Harnack, Bruchstücke, 38–39; Pilhofer, “Justin”, 69–73.

to divide Jesus' cloths.<sup>75</sup> John Dominic Crossan hypothesizes that the Gospel of Peter goes back to a very early "Cross Gospel" (from the middle of the first century CE), which implies that the traditions that Justin seems to have borrowed from it might be more reliable than the accounts of the canonical gospels.<sup>76</sup> According to the present author, however, there is no basis for attributing historicity to these details, which exonerate the Romans from Jesus' death to the detriment of the Jews.

5. Agrapha that Seem to be Transmitted Independently

In 1776 J. G. Körner introduced the term agrapha as a designation of sayings of Jesus that have been transmitted apart from the New Testament.<sup>77</sup> In some way this term has historical roots, for in the second century it was used for the secret teaching that Jesus had allegedly transmitted to a small number of his disciples, and to which we will come back in the following section. However, in research of the last centuries the term agrapha is, with some variations, mostly used in the meaning introduced by Körner.<sup>78</sup> In 1889 Alfred Resch wrote an important study of the extracanonical words of Jesus that were known at that time, in which he launched the hypothesis that originally there was a Hebrew gospel consisting of words of Jesus, upon which the authors of the synoptic gospels and of the New Testament epistles would have drawn. Because of the criticism of this theory by several reviewers, of whom James Hardy Ropes was the most prominent, and since in the meantime other sayings of Jesus had been found in Oxyrhynchus, Resch published an improved and enlarged second edition in 1906, in which he however maintained his theory of an early source used by the New Testament

<sup>75</sup> Justin, Dialogue with Trypho 97.3 (PTS 47); Gospel of Peter 4,12 (SC 201); Pilhofer, "Justin", 73–75; also Harnack, Bruchstücke, 39.

<sup>76</sup> J. D. Crossan, The Cross that Spoke. The Origins of the Passion Narrative (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1988), 16–30, 60, 188, 191–197, 404–410.

<sup>77</sup> J. G. Koerner, De sermonibus Christi ἀγράφοις (Dissertation, Leipzig, 1776), as mentioned by Resch, Agrapha<sup>2</sup>, 1 (where 1776 should be read instead of 1778); 14.

<sup>78</sup> J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew. Rethinking the Historical Jesus, ABRL (New York: 1991), 1:112, explains the term agrapha as "unwritten [sayings and deeds]" of Jesus (emphasis RR).

authors.<sup>79</sup> Resch's and Ropes' fundamental studies also contain surveys of older research on extracanonical words of Jesus.<sup>80</sup>

Resch points to the different meanings that can be attached to the term agrapha. If it is used in opposition to γράφειν or γραφή in general, it refers to oral tradition. It may also be used in opposition to the canonical Scriptures, so that both isolated extracanonical words of Jesus and sayings that occur in apocryphal writings like the Gospel of the Hebrews and the Gospel of the Egyptians are all considered agrapha. Yet Resch prefers to restrict the term to the category of extracanonical sayings of Jesus that have been transmitted apart from the apocryphal writings, and thus to distinguish between agrapha and apocrypha.<sup>81</sup> In his conclusions Resch gives a list of thirty-six agrapha that he considers authentic words of Jesus.<sup>82</sup> Ropes is more restrictive; he counts fourteen agrapha that are, in his view, probably authentic words of Jesus.<sup>83</sup> However, both Resch and Ropes take these agrapha from all possible sources, even from the New Testament itself, of which the most evident one is Jesus' saying quoted in Acts 20:35, "It is more blessed to give than to receive".<sup>84</sup> Furthermore, they draw their selections of highly valuable agrapha from New Testament manuscripts,<sup>85</sup> patristic literature of several centuries, and, in the case of Ropes, from the Gospel of the Hebrews and the Talmud.<sup>86</sup> This implies that many of their selected agrapha are not relevant to the present chapter.

---

<sup>79</sup> A. Resch, Agrapha. Ausserkanonische Evangelienfragmente in möglichster Vollständigkeit zusammengestellt und quellenkritisch untersucht, TU 5.4 (Leipzig: Hinrich'sche Buchhandlung, 1889); idem, Agrapha. Aussercanonische Schriftfragmente, 2nd ed., TU 30/NF 15.3-4 (Leipzig: Hinrich'sche Buchhandlung, 1906) (we refer to the second edition); J. H. Ropes, Die Sprüche Jesu die in den kanonischen Evangelien nicht überliefert sind. Eine kritische Bearbeitung des von D. Alfred Resch gesammelten Materials, TU 14.3 (Leipzig: Hinrich'sche Buchhandlung, 1896).

<sup>80</sup> Resch, Agrapha<sup>2</sup>, 1; 11-22; Ropes, Sprüche, 1-10.

<sup>81</sup> Resch, Agrapha<sup>2</sup>, 2.

<sup>82</sup> Ibid., 385-387.

<sup>83</sup> Ropes, Sprüche Jesu, 160-161.

<sup>84</sup> Resch, Agrapha<sup>2</sup>, 24-25, 385; Ropes, Sprüche Jesu, 136-137, 160. Strangely enough, Resch does not pay any attention to 1 Thessalonians 4:15-17, which Ropes, Sprüche Jesu, 152-154, 161, considers a probably authentic saying of Jesus.

<sup>85</sup> For example, the pericope of the adulterous woman (John 7:53-8:11) is also considered an agraphon; Resch, Agrapha<sup>2</sup>, 386. Ropes, Sprüche Jesu, 144, 160, notes that one may assume that Papias says of this passage that it occurs in the Gospel of the Hebrews; see Eusebius, Church History 3.39.17, ed. and trans. K. Lake, vol. I, LCL 153 (Cambridge MA: Harvard University Press; London: William Heineman, 1926).

<sup>86</sup> Ropes, Sprüche Jesu, 145-151.

In 1948 Joachim Jeremias published another survey of twenty-one agrapha that he considered most valuable, ten of which he regarded as authentic words of Jesus. In 1963 he published an enlarged and revised third edition in which he selected eighteen agrapha that in his view might be historically authentic.<sup>87</sup> Most of these sayings occur either in the New Testament (Acts 20:35; 1 Thessalonians 4:16–17), in New Testament manuscripts, in Oxyrhynchus papyri, or in extracanonical gospels, so that only a few sayings of his selection stem from the early patristic literature discussed in this chapter.

In the present chapter we follow Resch's distinction between words of Jesus quoted from extracanonical gospels (which were discussed in section 4),<sup>88</sup> and other words that cannot be attributed to one of the extracanonical gospels and seem to be transmitted independently. However, in the preceding section we saw that sometimes it is difficult to establish the provenance of sayings that might be quoted from extracanonical gospels, although this is not said explicitly. In any case, we will now deal with those agrapha of Jesus that have been quoted by patristic authors of the period we investigate, where these were not mentioned in the preceding sections.

In the beginning of the second century, Papias of Hierapolis appears to be an important person for the collection of oral Jesus traditions, for Eusebius quotes from his five books entitled Interpretation of the Lord's Sayings that he preferred the viva vox (ζῶση φωνή καὶ μενούσα) of presbyters who had known Jesus' apostles and other disciples to written documents.<sup>89</sup> Several scholars pointed out that Papias' preference for oral transmission of a master's teaching stands in a firm Greek tradition.<sup>90</sup> However, since his Interpretation of the Lord's Sayings itself

<sup>87</sup> J. Jeremias, Unbekannte Jesusworte, AThANT 16 (Zürich: Zwingli-Verlag, 1948; 3rd ed. Gütersloh: Gerd Mohn, 1963) (we refer to the third edition).

<sup>88</sup> In addition, see T. Nicklas' articles in this volume

<sup>89</sup> Eusebius, Church History 3.39.1–17 (LCL 153). See U. H. J. Körtner, Papias von Hierapolis. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des frühen Christentums, FRLANT 133 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1983); J. Kürzinger, Papias von Hierapolis und die Evangelien des Neuen Testaments, EichM 4 (Regensburg: Friedrich Pustet, 1983).

<sup>90</sup> L. Alexander, "The Living Voice: Scepticism towards the Written Word in Early Christian and in Graeco-Roman Texts", in The Bible in Three Dimensions. Essays in Celebration of Forty Years of Biblical Studies in the University of Sheffield, ed. D. J. A. Clines, S. E. Fowl, and S. E. Porter, JSOT S 87 (Sheffield: JSOT, 1990), 221–247; W. A. Lohr, "Kanongeschichtliche Beobachtungen zum Verhältnis von mündlicher und schriftlicher Tradition im zweiten Jahrhundert", ZNW 85 (1994): 234–258; J. Mansfeld, "Papias over traditie", NedThT 49 (1995): 140–153; A. D. Baum, "Papias, der Vorzug der viva vox und die Evangelienchriften", NTS 44 (1998): 144–151.

is lost, we depend on early testimonies to his collection.<sup>91</sup> Of the remaining fragments only one text contains an otherwise unknown saying of Jesus, followed by a short dialogue with Judas. The agraphon has been transmitted by Irenaeus and deals with the abundant fertility of the earth during the eschatological millennium, which was doubted by Judas.<sup>92</sup> Scholars who have studied this description of the millennium, which resembles several Jewish apocalyptic texts, do not accept it as an authentic saying of Jesus.<sup>93</sup>

The Epistle of (Pseudo-)Barnabas contains three agrapha that are, or may be, attributed to Jesus (apart from other agrapha that are quoted as Old Testament texts). The first one is introduced by “the Lord says” and reads, “See! I am making the final things like the first”.<sup>94</sup> This saying resembles the synoptic text, “So the last will be first, and the first will be last”,<sup>95</sup> and Revelation 21:4–5, “for the first things have passed away . . . See, I am making all things new”. Resch interprets “the Lord” as Jesus, but he does not conclude that this is an authentic saying, and Ropes agrees.<sup>96</sup> Koester, however, holds that the expression “the Lord says” points to an Old Testament apocryphon.<sup>97</sup> The second agraphon concerning Jesus deals with the question why the priests alone had to eat the intestines of the scapegoat, unwashed, with vinegar (the source of which is unknown).<sup>98</sup> The answer is, “Why is this? Since you are about to give me gall mixed with vinegar to drink—when I am about to offer my flesh on behalf of the sins of my new people—you alone are to eat, while the people fast and mourn in sackcloth and ashes”.<sup>99</sup>

<sup>91</sup> The fragments have been edited by R. M. Hübner and translated by J. Kürzinger, in Kürzinger, Papias, 89–138.

<sup>92</sup> Irenaeus, Against Heresies 5.33.3–4, ed. and trans. A. Rousseau, L. Doutreleau, C. Mercier, SC 153 (Paris: Cerf, 1969); Kürzinger, Papias, 94–95.

<sup>93</sup> Resch, Agrapha<sup>2</sup>, 166–167; Ropes, Sprüche Jesu, 109–111; Jeremias, Unbekannte Jesusworte<sup>3</sup>, 37–38; Körtner, Papias, 97–107; J. D. Dubois, “Remarques sur le fragment de Papias cité par Irénée”, RHPhR 71 (1991): 3–10.

<sup>94</sup> ἰδοῦ, ποιῶ τὰ ἔσχατα ὡς τὰ πρῶτα. Barnabas 6:13, ed. and trans. Ehrman, Apostolic Fathers, vol. II, LCL 25 (Cambridge MA/London: Harvard University Press, 2003), 34–35.

<sup>95</sup> Matthew 20:16; cf. 19:30; Mark 10:31.

<sup>96</sup> Resch, Agrapha<sup>2</sup>, 167–168; Ropes, Sprüche Jesu, 43–44.

<sup>97</sup> Koester, Synoptische Überlieferung, 127. P. Prigent and R. A. Kraft, Épître de Barnabé, SC 172 (Paris: Cerf, 1971), 125, and F. R. Prostmeier, Der Barnabasbrief, KAV 8 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1999), 275–276, do not interpret this text as an authentic saying of Jesus.

<sup>98</sup> Barnabas 7:4, ed. and trans. Ehrman, Apostolic Fathers, vol. II, LCL 25.

<sup>99</sup> πρὸς τί; ἐπειδὴ ἐμὲ ὑπὲρ ἁμαρτιῶν μέλλοντα τοῦ λαοῦ μου τοῦ καινοῦ προσφέρειν τὴν σάρκα μου μέλλετε ποτίζειν χολὴν μετὰ ὄξους, φάγετε ὑμεῖς μόνοι, τοῦ λαοῦ

This is apparently meant to be a saying of Jesus, but Koester correctly judges that it has been shaped by the author.<sup>100</sup> The third agraphon is explicitly attributed to Jesus and reads, “And so he says: those who wish to see me and touch my kingdom must take hold of me through pain and suffering”.<sup>101</sup> Resch is optimistic about its authenticity, but Ropes judges that by these words the author summarizes and explains his preceding passage and does so by introducing Jesus without the intention to quote a traditional saying.<sup>102</sup>

Justin Martyr transmits three agrapha in his Dialogue with Trypho. The first one reads, “There will be divisions and factions”.<sup>103</sup> According to Resch this is an authentic word of Jesus quoted by Paul in 1 Corinthians 11:19 (“there have to be factions among you”), but Ropes rejects this hypothesis; Jeremias considers the saying possibly authentic.<sup>104</sup> Justin’s second agraphon reads, “In whatsoever things I shall apprehend you, in them also I shall judge you”.<sup>105</sup> In Resch’s view this is an authentic saying of Jesus, but this judgement is generally denied, since Clement of Alexandria<sup>106</sup> and many other Fathers quote similar forms of this saying without attributing it to Jesus, and some of them consider it a quotation from Ezekiel.<sup>107</sup> Justin’s third agraphon is forνηστεύοντος καὶ κοπτομένου ἐπὶ σάκκου καὶ σποδοῦ. Barnabas 7:5, ed. and trans. Ehrman, Apostolic Fathers, vol. II, LCL 25.

---

<sup>100</sup> Koester, Synoptische Überlieferung, 128, 148–152; similarly Prigent and Kraft, Épître de Barnabé, 132; Prostmeier, Barnabasbrief, 296–298. Resch, Agrapha<sup>2</sup>, and Ropes, Sprüche Jesu, do not discuss this text.

<sup>101</sup> οὕτω, φησὶν, οἱ θελοντές με ἰδεῖν καὶ ἅψασθαί μου τῆς βασιλείας ὀφείλουσιν θλιβέντες καὶ παθόντες λαβεῖν με. Barnabas 7:11, ed. and trans. Ehrman, Apostolic Fathers, vol. II, LCL 25.

<sup>102</sup> Resch, Agrapha<sup>2</sup>, 89–90; Ropes, Sprüche Jesu, 17–18. Koester, Synoptische Überlieferung, 127, and Prostmeier, Barnabasbrief, 316–317, agree with Ropes, but according to Prigent and Kraft, Épître de Barnabé, 137, it is unlikely that the author coined this saying.

<sup>103</sup> ἔσονται σχίσματα καὶ αἰρέσεις. Justin, Dialogue 35.3 (PTS 47).

<sup>104</sup> Resch, Agrapha<sup>2</sup>, 100–101, 386; Ropes, Sprüche Jesu, 96–97; Jeremias, Unbekannte Jesusworte<sup>3</sup>, 74–75. Cf. Bellinzoni, Sayings of Jesus, 101–102, 131; Koester, Ancient Christian Gospels, 361–362, 371–374. All these authors also refer to later patristic citations of this saying.

<sup>105</sup> ἐν οἷς ἂν ὑμᾶς καταλάβω, ἐν τούτοις καὶ κρινῶ. Justin, Dialogue, 47.5 (PTS 47); trans. Th. B. Falls, FaCh 6 (Washington DC: The Catholic University of America Press, 1948).

<sup>106</sup> Clement, The Rich Man’s Salvation 40, ed. and trans. G. W. Butterworth, LCL 92 (Cambridge MA: Harvard University Press / London: William Heinemann, 1919), 352–353.

<sup>107</sup> Resch, Agrapha<sup>2</sup>, 102, 322–325, 386; Ropes, Sprüche Jesu, 137–140; A. J. Bellinzoni, “The Source of the Agraphon in Justin Martyr’s Dialogue with Trypho 47:5”, VigChr 17 (1963): 65–70; idem, Sayings of Jesus, 131–134.

mulated in indirect speech; Jesus predicts that after his resurrection on the third day he had to “appear again at Jerusalem to eat and to drink with his disciples; and predicted that in the meantime before his second advent there would arise, as I already stated, heresies and false prophets in his name”.<sup>108</sup> Resch analyses the traditions included in this saying without pleading for its authenticity.<sup>109</sup>

One more saying of Jesus reported by Justin may be worth quoting, although its authenticity is not acknowledged. In his first Apology, when explaining the meaning of baptism, Justin quotes Christ as follows: “Unless you are born again, you will not enter the kingdom of heaven”.<sup>110</sup> With regard to the related texts in John 3:3 and 3:5 (“Unless one is born anew, he cannot see the kingdom of God”; “unless one is born of water and spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God”; RSV), Bellinzoni concludes that “Justin has independently preserved a liturgical baptismal text in an older form than that found in John”, and that this “is the only instance where Justin quotes a pre-gospel tradition”.<sup>111</sup> Other scholars, like Köhler and Nagel, are less confident that Justin makes use of a pre-gospel tradition and suggest that, apart from Matthew 18:3 (“Unless you turn and become like children, you will never enter the kingdom of heaven”), he consciously or unconsciously alludes to the Gospel of John.<sup>112</sup>

In a treatise On the Resurrection, which was formerly attributed to Justin but is now generally held not to be by him, Resch finds the

<sup>108</sup> ... καὶ παλιν παραγενήσεσθαι ἐν Ἱερουσαλήμ, καὶ τότε τοῖς μαθηταῖς αὐτοῦ συμπιεῖν πάλιν καὶ συμφαγεῖν· καὶ ἐν τῷ μεταξύ τῆς παρουσίας αὐτοῦ χρόνῳ, ὡς προέφην, γενήσεσθαι αἱρέσεις καὶ ψευδοπροφήτας ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι αὐτοῦ προεμήνυσε. Justin, Dialogue, 51.2 (PTS 47; Marcovich’s reading αἱρέσεις is his emendation of ἱερεῖς (“priests”) in the manuscript; moreover, after ψευδοπροφήτας he adds <καὶ ψευδοχρίστους> from Matthew 24:24 and Dialogue 35.15–16; 82.10).

<sup>109</sup> Resch, Agrapha<sup>2</sup>, 172–174; cf., e.g., Acts 1:4; 10:41; Ignatius, Smyrneans 3:3 (LCL 24).

<sup>110</sup> ἂν μὴ ἀναγεννηθῆτε, οὐ μὴ εἰσέλθητε εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τῶν οὐρανῶν. Justin, 1 Apology 61.4, ed. E. J. Goodspeed, Die ältesten Apologeten (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1914); Justin continues, ὅτι δὲ καὶ ἀδύνατον εἰς τὰς μήτρας τῶν τεκουσῶν τοὺς ἀπαξ γενομένους ἐμβῆναι, φανερόν πάνσιν ἐστί (“Now it is clear to all that it is impossible for those who have once come into being to enter into their mothers’ wombs”; 1 Apology 61.5, ed. Goodspeed; Marcovich, PTS 38, reads γεννωμένους instead of γενομένους), which corresponds to John 3:4, although the wording is different; translation L. W. Barnard, St. Justin Martyr: The First and Second Apologies, ACW 56 (New York and Mahwah NJ: Paulist Press, 1997).

<sup>111</sup> Bellinzoni, Sayings of Jesus, 134–138, at 136–137, 138. Koester, Ancient Christian Gospels, 361, agrees.

<sup>112</sup> Köhler, Rezeption, 207–209; Nagel, Rezeption, 96–100.

following agraphon, which he considers authentic: “He said that our dwelling-place is in heaven”;<sup>113</sup> he thinks that this saying was part of the presumed extracanonical gospel that would have been used by several New Testament authors.<sup>114</sup> Ropes, however, does not consider these words a real quotation, but a free rendering of a well-known early Christian idea that also occurs in New Testament texts.<sup>115</sup>

Apart from the three extracanonical sayings of Jesus in 2 Clement that were discussed in section 4, one other agraphon deserves to be mentioned, although Resch does not claim its authenticity. It is included in the following dialogue: “For the Lord said, ‘You will be like sheep in the midst of wolves’. But Peter replied to him, ‘What if the wolves rip apart the sheep?’ Jesus said to Peter, ‘After they are dead, the sheep should fear the wolves no longer. So too you: do not fear those who kill you and then can do nothing more to you; but fear the one who, after you die, has the power to cast your body and soul into the hell of fire.’”<sup>116</sup> Interestingly, Ropes considers this dialogue probably authentic.<sup>117</sup>

We saw that Irenaeus quotes one of Papias’ testimonies to sayings of Jesus. Two other agrapha occur in his extant works. The first one reads, according to the Greek text preserved by Epiphanius and the Latin translation, “I have often desired (ἐπεθύμησα) to hear one of these words, and I had (ἔσχον) no one who uttered them”, but the editors conjecture that the text should read, “They have often desired (ἐπεθύμησαν) to hear one of these words, and they had (ἔσχον) no one

<sup>113</sup> καθὼς εἶρηκεν, ἐν οὐρανῷ τὴν κατοίκησιν ὑπάρχειν. Pseudo-Justin, On the Resurrection 9, ed. M. Heimgartner, PTS 54 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2001).

<sup>114</sup> Resch, Agrapha<sup>2</sup>, 103–104, 386; he refers to Philipians 3:20; 2 Corinthians 5:1–2; Galatians 4:26; Hebrews 12:22; 13:14; John 14:2.

<sup>115</sup> Ropes, Sprüche Jesu, 32–33.

<sup>116</sup> λέγει γὰρ ὁ κύριος: ἔσεσθε ὡς ἀρνία ἐν μέσῳ λύκων. ἀποκριθεὶς δὲ ὁ Πέτρος αὐτῷ λέγει· ἐὰν οὖν διασπαράξωσιν οἱ λύκοι τὰ ἀρνία; εἶπεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς τῷ Πέτρῳ· μὴ φοβείσθωσαν τὰ ἀρνία τοὺς λύκους μετὰ τὸ ἀποθανεῖν αὐτά; καὶ ὑμεῖς μὴ φοβείσθε τοὺς ἀποκτείνοντας ὑμᾶς καὶ μηδὲν ὑμῖν δυναμένους ποιεῖν, ἀλλὰ φοβείσθε τὸν μετὰ τὸ ἀποθανεῖν ὑμᾶς ἔχοντα ἐξουσίαν ψυχῆς καὶ σώματος τοῦ βαλεῖν εἰς γέενναν πυρός. 2 Clement 5:2–4, ed. and trans. Ehrman, Apostolic Fathers, vol. I, LCL 24: 170–173; cf. Matthew 10:16; 10:28; Luke 10:3; 12:4–5; Resch, Agrapha<sup>2</sup>, 169–170. Koester, Synoptische Überlieferung, 94–99 speaks of “sekundäre Bildung” and suggests that it may originate from the Gospel of the Nazarenes (98–99); Köhler, Rezeption, 144–146, also supposes an extracanonical source.

<sup>117</sup> Ropes, Sprüche Jesu, 146–147; 161.

who uttered them”.<sup>118</sup> This conjecture is confirmed by the plural in a similar saying in the Gospel of Thomas, “Many times you have desired to hear these words which I am saying to you, and you have no one else to hear them from”.<sup>119</sup> Moreover, this saying is paralleled by Matthew 13:17 (“Many prophets and righteous men longed... to hear what you hear, but did not hear it”) and Luke 10:24 (“Many prophets and kings desired... to hear what you hear, but did not hear it”).<sup>120</sup> The second agraphon quoted by Irenaeus reads, “If you have not been faithful in that which is small, who will give you that which is great?”<sup>121</sup> and corresponds to the quotation from “the gospel” in 2 Clement 8:5 which was discussed in the preceding section. Neither Resch nor Ropes makes a claim for its authenticity.<sup>122</sup>

Apart from Clement of Alexandria’s quotations from extracanonical Gospels, discussed in section 4, he is also a rich source of (other) agrapha, of which we will discuss the most important ones.<sup>123</sup> He quotes, apparently as a word of Jesus, “Seek what is great, he says, and the small things will be added unto you”,<sup>124</sup> which is similar to Matthew 6:33 (“Seek first his kingdom and his righteousness, and all these things will be added unto you”, according to Codex Sinaiticus). Resch considers it an authentic saying, and Ropes and Jeremias think that it may be authentic.<sup>125</sup> Ruwet, however, calls it a “pseudo-logion”.<sup>126</sup> Clement is the first author who quotes as a text from Scripture a saying that was

<sup>118</sup> πολλὰκις ἐπεθύμησα[ν] ἀκοῦσαι ἓνα τῶν λόγων τούτων, καὶ οὐκ ἔσχον τὸν ἐροῦντα. Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.20.2, ed., trans., and notes A. Rousseau, L. Doutreleau, SC 263, 290–291; SC 264, 264–265.

<sup>119</sup> Gospel of Thomas 38, trans. T. O. Lambdin, in Nag Hammadi Codex II, 2–7, ed. B. Layton, vol. I (NHS 20), 69.

<sup>120</sup> Resch, Agrapha<sup>2</sup>, 179, and Ropes, Sprüche Jesu, 56–57, regard this text as a parallel of the synoptic saying.

<sup>121</sup> Si in modico fideles non fuistis, quod magnum est quis dabit uobis? Irenaeus, Against Heresies 2.34.3 (SC 294).

<sup>122</sup> Resch, Agrapha<sup>2</sup>, 170; Ropes, Sprüche Jesu, 16–17.

<sup>123</sup> They have been collected and investigated by J. Ruwet, “Les « Agrapha » dans les œuvres de Clément d’Alexandrie”, Bib. 30 (1949): 133–160.

<sup>124</sup> αἰτεῖσθε γάρ, φησί, τὰ μεγάλα, καὶ τὰ μικρὰ ὑμῖν προστεθήσεται. Clement, Stromateis 1.158.2 (SC 30); cf. 4.34.6, ed. and trans. A. van den Hoek and C. Mondésert SC 463 (Paris: Cerf, 2001).

<sup>125</sup> Resch, Agrapha<sup>2</sup>, 111–112; 387; Ropes, Sprüche Jesu, 140; Jeremias, Unbekannte Jesusworte<sup>3</sup>, 94–95. These authors also indicate where Origen and other Church Fathers quoted this agraphon and added καὶ αἰτεῖτε τὰ ἐπουράνια, καὶ τὰ ἐπίγεια ὑμῖν προστεθήσεται (“Seek the heavenly things, and the earthly things will be added unto you”).

<sup>126</sup> Ruwet, “Agrapha”, 138–139.

very popular in early Christianity and was considered a word of Jesus, “Be skilful money-changers”.<sup>127</sup> Resch does indeed accept this as an authentic word of Jesus, and Ropes and Jeremias rank it among the agrapha that are possibly authentic.<sup>128</sup> Next, Clement quotes as a saying of the Lord, “Let not the married person seek a divorce, nor the unmarried person marriage; he who has confessed his intention of being celibate, let him remain unmarried”,<sup>129</sup> which seems to be inspired by 1 Corinthians 7:27 and 7:32–36. Resch suggests that it may stem from the Gospel of the Egyptians; Ropes agrees and emphasizes that it cannot be authentic.<sup>130</sup> In his sermon on the rich man’s salvation (on Mark 10:17–31) Clement quotes as a saying of the Lord, “For I will give not only to my friends, but also to the friends of my friends”.<sup>131</sup> This means that Jesus will be lenient towards those who give alms to the poor. However, Ruwet speaks of a “pseudo-citation” coined by Clement.<sup>132</sup> In his Excerpts from Theodotus he quotes a word of the Saviour that was in use among the Valentinians, “Save yourself and your soul”.<sup>133</sup> Ropes rejects this as a word of Jesus, but according to Jeremias it may be authentic.<sup>134</sup> All other presumed agrapha in Clement’s works are either not clearly attributed to Jesus, or are too close to canonical texts to be discussed here and should be considered free quotations.

<sup>127</sup> γίνεσθε δὲ δόκιμοι τραπεζίται. Clement, Stromateis 1.177.2 (SC 30).

<sup>128</sup> Resch, Agrapha<sup>2</sup>, 112–128, 386; Ropes, Sprüche Jesu, 141–143, 160; Jeremias, Unbekannte Jesusworte<sup>3</sup>, 95–98. Ruwet, “Agrapha”, 146–148, has the rather unlikely suggestion that Clement did not consider this saying a word of Jesus but “une formule plus expressive” of 1 Thessalonians 5:21. See J. S. Vos, “Das Agraphon ‘Seid kundige Geldwechsler’ bei Origenes”, in Sayings of Jesus: Canonical and Non-Canonical. Essays in Honour of Tjitze Baarda, ed. W. L. Petersen, J. S. Vos, and H. J. de Jonge, NT S 89 (Leiden: Brill, 1997), 277–302.

<sup>129</sup> ὁ γήμας μὴ ἐκβαλλέτω καὶ ὁ μὴ γαμήσας μὴ γαμείτω, ὁ κατὰ πρόθεσιν εὐνουχίας ὁμολογήσας μὴ γῆμαι ἄγαμος διαμενέτω. Clement, Stromateis 3.97.4 (GCS 52 [15]); trans. Oulton and Chadwick, Alexandrian Christianity, 86, where—as in GCS 52—only the first part is printed as a saying of the Lord.

<sup>130</sup> Resch, Agrapha<sup>2</sup>, 182–183; Ropes, Sprüche Jesu, 107–108; Ruwet, “Agrapha”, 136–138, presumes that the second part is Clement’s interpretation of the Lord’s saying.

<sup>131</sup> δῶσω γὰρ οὐ μόνον τοῖς φίλοις, ἀλλὰ καὶ τοῖς φίλοις τῶν φίλων. Clement, The Rich Man’s Salvation 33.1 (LCL 92).

<sup>132</sup> Ruwet, “Agrapha”, 140–141. Neither Resch nor Ropes pays attention to this agraphon.

<sup>133</sup> σώζου σὺ καὶ ἡ ψυχὴ σου. Clement, Excerpts from Theodotus 2.2 (SC 23).

<sup>134</sup> Ropes, Sprüche Jesu, 122; Jeremias, Unbekannte Jesusworte<sup>3</sup>, 75–77. Resch does not discuss this saying.

Moreover, numerous agrapha occur in patristic literature of the third and fourth centuries, a few of which are sometimes considered authentic or possibly authentic.<sup>135</sup>

6. Records of a Secret Oral Tradition that Jesus Transmitted to a Small Number of his Disciples

In the preceding section we saw that Papias preferred the oral transmission of Jesus' teaching to written reports. His preference was not only firmly rooted in the Greek tradition of oral teaching, according to which books were less reliable, but was also shared by other Christians and Christian Gnostics of the second century and beyond, which implies that Papias was not alone in preferring oral tradition.<sup>136</sup> Often this oral tradition was regarded as secret. For example, Irenaeus repeatedly refers to the secret traditions of his Gnostic adversaries; once he says that the Valentinians read these traditions in ἄγραφα, by which he means writings that are foreign to the Scriptures.<sup>137</sup> On another occasion he reports the heretics' claim that the tradition of the truth was not transmitted by writings, but by the viva vox, for which they quoted 1 Corinthians 2:6 ("Yet among the mature we speak wisdom, though not a wisdom of this age").<sup>138</sup>

In this chapter we will not dwell on the "heretical" Gnostic traditions, but point out that the patristic author Clement of Alexandria also says that Christian teaching is both unwritten (ἄγραφος) and written (ἔγραφος).<sup>139</sup> Like the other Gnostics he speaks of a "gnostic tradition"

<sup>135</sup> For the Pseudo-Clementine literature see L. L. Kline, The Sayings of Jesus in the Pseudo-Clementine Homilies, SBL DS 14 (Missoula, MT: SBL / Scholars' Press, 1975); J. van Amersfoort, Het Evangelie van Thomas en de Pseudo-Clementinen. Een studie van de woorden van Jezus in het Evangelie van Thomas en hun parallellen in de evangeliecitaten in de Pseudo-Clementijnse Homiliae en Recognitiones (Dissertation, Utrecht, 1984).

<sup>136</sup> As a matter of fact, Jews also attached much importance to oral tradition; see B. Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript. Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity, 2nd ed. (Lund: C. W. K. Gleerup and Copenhagen: Ejnar Munksgaard, 1964), 71–189; M. S. Jaffee, Torah in the Mouth. Writing and Oral Tradition in Palestinian Judaism, 200 BCE–400 CE (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001). For this section see also R. Roukema, Jesus, Gnosis and Dogma (London/New York: T&T Clark, 2010), 132–144.

<sup>137</sup> E.g., Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.3.1; 1.8.1 (ἐξ ἀγράφων ἀναγινώσκοντες); 1.8.5; 1.11.1; 1.21.1; 1.24.6; 1.25.5; 1.30.14 (SC 264).

<sup>138</sup> Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.2.1 (SC 211).

<sup>139</sup> Clement, Stromateis 1.7.1; cf. 1.4.1; 1.5.1 (SC 30).

that Christ taught to his apostles and that had been transmitted ἀγράφως to a small number of people.<sup>140</sup> Once he says that the Lord transmitted this gnosis to James the Just, John, and Peter after his resurrection, and that they subsequently transmitted it to the other apostles, and these to the seventy.<sup>141</sup> However, if according to Clement Jesus transmitted his Gnostic teaching only after his resurrection, this element should be included in our following section. In any case, Clement maintains that his own tutors taught him the true tradition that came directly from the apostles Peter, James, John, and Paul.<sup>142</sup> It is this oral tradition that he intends to commit to writing in his miscellaneous notes called Stromateis.

Jean Daniélou shows that Clement's gnosis includes contemplation of the divine world, the ascension of the soul, and knowledge of the abodes and the hierarchy of the angels. Daniélou demonstrates that these traditions originate from the apocalyptic milieu that is known from Jewish and Christian apocrypha.<sup>143</sup> Salvatore Lilla puts a stronger emphasis on the Platonic frame of Clement's esotericism, and this too is correct.<sup>144</sup> These authors do not ask whether these traditions may go back to the historical Jesus. In 1954, R. P. C. Hanson regarded Clement's claim as entirely untrustworthy.<sup>145</sup> Margaret Barker, however, associates the secret teaching that, according to the canonical gospels, Jesus gave to his disciples (Mark 4:11–12), with the hidden tradition mentioned by Clement. Furthermore, she refers to Ignatius of Antioch and to

---

<sup>140</sup> Clement, Stromateis 6.61.1–3, ed. and trans. P. Descourtieux, SC 446 (Paris: Cerf, 1999); cf. 1.15.2 (SC 30); 4.3.2 (SC 463); 7.55.6, ed. and trans. A. Le Boulluec, SC 428 (Paris: Cerf, 1997). In order to distinguish between the “heretical” and Clement's Gnostics, we use a small letter for Clement's gnostic tradition. For his distance vis-à-vis the “heretical” use of the term “gnostic”, see, e.g., his Instructor 1.52.2, ed. H. M. Marrou and M. Harl, SC 70 (Paris: Cerf, 1960), 168–169; Stromateis 3.30.1 (GCS 52 [15]).

<sup>141</sup> Clement, Hypotyposesis 7 (GCS 17<sup>2</sup>), which is borrowed from Eusebius, Church History 2.1.4 (LCL 153).

<sup>142</sup> Clement, Stromateis 1.11.1–3 (SC 30).

<sup>143</sup> J. Daniélou, Message évangélique et culture hellénistique aux II<sup>e</sup> et III<sup>e</sup> siècles, BT HD 2 (Paris: Desclée, 1961), 409–425; also idem, Théologie du judéo-christianisme, BT HD 1 (Paris: Desclée, 1958), 59–64.

<sup>144</sup> S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria. A Study of Christian Platonism and Gnosticism (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1971). See also G. G. Stroumsa, Hidden Wisdom. Esoteric Traditions and the Roots of Christian Mysticism, SHR 70 (Leiden: Brill, 1996), 27–45, 109–131.

<sup>145</sup> R. P. C. Hanson, Origen's Doctrine of Tradition (London: SPCK, 1954), 67–71.

Irenaeus who also write about the arrangement of the heavenly realms, and to other patristic authors who testify to a secret tradition.<sup>146</sup>

In order to assess the reliability of the reports of this secret Jesus tradition, one should bear in mind that in the synoptic gospels Jesus is often linked with angels and with heaven, and speaks about angels.<sup>147</sup> We read that his baptism is followed by a vision of the heavens torn open (Mark 1:10), and he allegedly had a vision of Satan falling from heaven (Luke 10:18).<sup>148</sup> This implies that the synoptic gospels depict Jesus as an apocalyptic visionary of heavenly things, and this finds some confirmation in the Gospel of John.<sup>149</sup> If it is true that Jesus was an apocalyptic visionary, we cannot exclude a priori the possibility that some of his experiences and teachings in this field were remembered and transmitted after his death, without being included in the canonical gospels. Yet one cannot make a reasonable case that Clement's secret tradition as he wrote it down in his Stromateis originated from the historical Jesus. At most, one can say that Clement was acquainted with Jewish apocalyptic traditions with which Jesus too may have been familiar.

7. Extracanonical Traditions about the Risen Jesus

Of course, traditions about the risen Jesus cannot be called historical, but belong to the realm of faith. Yet to complete this survey we will mention the few sayings of the risen Jesus that are quoted in early patristic literature.

In order to confirm that Jesus had risen bodily from death, Ignatius relates that after his resurrection Jesus came to those who were with Peter and said, "Reach out, touch me and see that I am not a bodiless

---

<sup>146</sup> M. Barker, The Revelation of Jesus Christ (London/New York: T&T Clark, 2000), 1–4; eadem, The Great High Priest. The Temple Roots of Christian Liturgy (London/New York: T&T Clark, 2003), 1–14; she refers to Ignatius, Trallians 5, ed. and trans. Ehrman, Apostolic Fathers, vol. I, LCL 24, and to Irenaeus, Demonstration of the Gospel 3; 9–10, trans. A. Rousseau, SC 406 (Paris: Cerf, 1995).

<sup>147</sup> E.g., Mark 1:13; 8:38; 12:25; 13:27; 13:32; Matthew 19:28; 26:53; Luke 12:8–9.

<sup>148</sup> See U. B. Müller, "Vision und Botschaft. Erwägungen zur prophetischen Struktur der Verkündigung Jesu", ZThK 74 (1977): 416–448; S. Vollenweider, "'Ich sah den Satan wie einen Blitz vom Himmel fallen' (Lk 10,18)", ZNW 79 (1988): 187–203; J. Marcus, "Jesus' Baptismal Vision", NTS 41 (1995): 512–521; M. Barker, The Risen Lord. The Jesus of History as the Christ of Faith, SJT CIT (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1996), 27–41.

<sup>149</sup> E.g., John 3:12–13; 3:31; 6:38; 6:51; 8:23.

demon". Ignatius then says that the disciples touched Jesus and that he ate and drank with them.<sup>150</sup>

Clement of Alexandria quotes from the Preaching of Peter a saying of Jesus to his apostles which is apparently situated after his resurrection. It reads, "If any one of Israel, then, wants to repent, and by my name to believe in God, his sins shall be forgiven him. After twelve years, go forth into the world, that no one may say, 'We have not heard'".<sup>151</sup> Another saying from the Preaching of Peter quoted by Clement is explicitly situated after Jesus' resurrection and contains his commission to the twelve apostles to preach the gospel in the whole world, so that mankind may know that God is one and that salvation and knowledge of the future are given by faith in Christ.<sup>152</sup>

8. Conclusions

As we stated in the introduction to this chapter, the harvest of possibly authentic Jesus traditions in the patristic literature that we investigated is fairly meagre, especially if we distrust some of Resch's isolated positive assessments. The result consists of a small number of words of Jesus that, according to some scholars, are authentic or may be authentic.<sup>153</sup>

<sup>150</sup> The saying reads, λάβετε, ψηλαφήσατέ με καὶ ἴδετε, ὅτι οὐκ εἰμὶ δαιμόνιον ἄσώματον. Ignatius, Smyrneans 3:1–3, ed. and trans. Ehrman, Apostolic Fathers, vol. I, LCL 24, 298–299 (who spells it "daimon"); cf. Luke 24:39–43. Part of this saying is also quoted by Origen, De Principiis 1 praef. 8, ed. H. Görgemanns, H. Karpp, Origenes Vier Bücher von den Prinzipien, TzF 24 (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1976), 94–95 (non sum daemonium incorporeum), who attributes it to the Doctrina Petri. Eusebius, Church History 3.36.11 (LCL 153), however, writes that he does not know the source of this quotation. Jerome, De Viris Illustribus 16.3–4, ed. and trans. A. Ceresa-Gastaldo, BPat 12 (Florence: Nardini, 1988), 106–107, 264, ascribes it to the Gospel of the Hebrews.

<sup>151</sup> ἔάν μὲν οὖν τις θελήσῃ τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ μετανοήσας διὰ τοῦ ὀνόματος μου πιστεῦειν ἐπὶ τὸν θεόν, ἀφεθήσονται αὐτῷ αἱ ἁμαρτίαι. μετὰ <δὲ> δώδεκα ἔτη ἐξέλθετε εἰς τὸν κόσμον. μή τις εἴπῃ· οὐκ ἠκούσαμεν. Clement, Stromateis 6.43.3 (SC 446). The tradition that the apostles should wait twelve years before going out to preach to the gentiles is confirmed by Apollonius, who wrote a book at the end of the second century, extracts of which have been preserved by Eusebius, Church History 5.18.14 (LCL 153), and also occurs in the Acts of Peter 5, ed. R. A. Lipsius, Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, vol. I (Leipzig, 1891, reprint Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1959), 49.

<sup>152</sup> Clement, Stromateis 6.48.1–2 (SC 446).

<sup>153</sup> Clement of Rome, Corinthians 13:2: "Show mercy, that you may be shown mercy; forgive, that it may be forgiven you. As you do, so it will be done to you; as you give, so it will be given to you; as you judge, so you will be judged; as you show kindness, so will kindness be shown to you; the amount you dispense will be the amount you receive"; Clement of Alexandria, Stromateis 1.158.2: "Seek what is great, and the small

Undoubtedly the reason why their authenticity is surmised is that, except for the dictum “Be skilful money-changers”, these sayings resemble Jesus’ teaching according to the synoptic gospels. Furthermore, although some scholars might conclude that the traditions of Jesus’ illegitimate birth and Peter’s baptism by Jesus may be historical, these elements cannot be established as historically reliable facts.

These results coincide with John P. Meier’s verdict that not much is to be expected from the agrapha (understood as “unwritten [sayings and deeds]”), and with James D. G. Dunn’s assessment, that “They [i.e., the agrapha, understood as “unknown sayings”; RR] do not add much to the overall picture, their credibility as sayings of Jesus largely depending on their compatibility with the more familiar Synoptic traditions”.<sup>154</sup> things will be added unto you”; Stromateis 1.177.2: “Be skilful money-changers”; Excerpts from Theodotus 2.2: “Save yourself and your soul”.

---

<sup>154</sup> Meier, A Marginal Jew, 1:112–141, at 114; J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered, Christianity in the Making 1 (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003), 172.

JESUS TRADITION IN CLASSICAL AND JEWISH WRITINGS

ROBERT E. VAN VOORST

In this essay we will first examine the historical value of references to Jesus in seven classical authors of the early Common Era: Thallo, Pliny the Younger, Suetonius, Tacitus, Mara bar Serapion, Lucian of Samosata, and Celsus. We will then examine Jesus traditions in Jewish writings, particularly Josephus and the rabbinical literature. Finally, we will present our conclusions on classical and Jewish traditions on Jesus.

1. Thallos: The Eclipse at Jesus' Death

Probably around 55 CE, a historian named Thallos wrote in Greek a three-volume chronicle of the eastern Mediterranean area from the fall of Troy to about 50 CE. Most of his book, like the vast majority of ancient literature, perished, but not before it was quoted by Sextus Julius Africanus, a Christian writer, in his History of the World (ca. 220 CE). This book likewise was lost, but some of its citations of Thallos were taken up by the Byzantine historian Georgius Syncellus in his Chronicle (ca. 800). According to Syncellus, when Julius Africanus writes about the darkness at the death of Jesus, he added,

In the third (book) of his histories, Thallos calls this darkness an eclipse of the sun, which seems to me to be wrong.<sup>1</sup>

This fragment of Thallos used by Julius Africanus comes in a section in which Julius deals with the portents during the crucifixion of Jesus.<sup>2</sup> Julius argues that Thallos was “wrong” (ἄλογος) to argue that this was only a solar eclipse, because at full moon a solar eclipse is impossible, and the Passover always falls at full moon. Julius counters that the eclipse was miraculous, “a darkness induced by God.” Thallos could have mentioned the eclipse with no reference to Jesus. But it is more likely that Julius, who had access to the context of this quotation in Thallos and who (to judge from other fragments) generally used his sources carefully, was correct in reading it as a hostile reference to Jesus’ death. Thallos was probably arguing that this was no portent of change, but a natural event. Certainty cannot be established about this short quotation, but most of the evidence points to Thallos’ knowledge of the death of Jesus and the portent of darkness that Christians said accompanied it (Matt 27:45; Mark 15:33; Luke 23:44).

---

<sup>1</sup> All translations in this essay are my own, unless otherwise noted.

<sup>2</sup> Text: F. Jacoby, Die Fragmente der griechischen Historiker, II B (Leiden: Brill, 1962), 1157; ANF 6:136. Treatments: F. F. Bruce, Jesus and Christian Origins Outside the New Testament (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1974), 29–30; Maurice Goguel, The Life of Jesus (London: Allen & Unwin, 1933), 91–93; Craig A. Evans, “Jesus in Non-Christian Sources,” in Studying the Historical Jesus, ed. Bruce Chilton and Craig A. Evans, NTTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 454–455; Robert E. van Voorst, Jesus Outside the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2000), 20–23.

Who is this Thallos? Perhaps he is the Thallos to whom the Jewish historian Josephus refers, a Samaritan resident of Rome who made a large loan to Agrippa (Ant. 18.163) and who may have been Augustus’s secretary. Since this name is not common and since the first-century time is the same, this identification is at least possible. If it is incorrect, this Thallos remains an otherwise unknown author. The dating of Thallos’ work is also somewhat uncertain. Eusebius’s Chronicle, which survives only in Armenian fragments, states that Thallos wrote about the period from the fall of Troy only to the 167th Olympiad (112–109 BCE). However, other fragments of Thallos’ history preserved in several sources indicate that he wrote about events at least until the time of the death of Jesus. One possible solution is to argue that Thallos did indeed write until only 109 BCE, and Eusebius knows this first edition, but it was later extended by someone else in an edition that Julius Africanus used in 221 CE. Another solution is to argue that the report we have in the Armenian fragments of Eusebius’ Chronicle is wrong. C. Müller, followed by R. Eisler, emends the reading of the lost Greek original from ρεζ (167th Olympiad, 112–109 BCE) to σζ (207th Olympiad, 49–52 CE).<sup>3</sup> Overall, the second solution is seen by most scholars as more likely, placing Thallos’ work between 50–60 CE.

In sum, a fog of uncertainty surrounds Thallos’ statement: its extreme brevity, its third-hand citation, and the identity and date of the author. Nevertheless, a tradition about Jesus’ death probably emerges from this fog. Like Christian tradition as found in the synoptic gospels, Thallos accepts darkness at the death of Jesus. Against that tradition, he explains it as a natural eclipse of the sun. We can conclude that this element of Christian tradition was known outside of Christian circles, probably by Christian preaching, and that Thallos felt it necessary to refute it. His argument makes him, if our dating is correct, the first ancient writer known to us to express literary opposition to Christianity.

---

<sup>3</sup> Cited in Goguel, Life of Jesus, 92.

2. Pliny the Younger: The Christ of Christian Worship

Gaius Plinius Caecilius Secundus (ca. 61–ca.113) was the nephew and adopted son of the writer Pliny the Elder. His Letter 96 of Book 10, the most discussed of all Pliny's Epistles, deals with Pliny's judicial treatment of Christians and mentions Christ three times:

Other people, whose names were given to me by an informer, first said that they were Christians and then denied it. They said that they had stopped being Christians two or more years ago, and some more than twenty. They all venerated your image and the images of the gods as the others did, and reviled Christ. They also maintained that the sum total of their guilt or error was no more than the following. They had met regularly before dawn on a determined day, and sung antiphonally a hymn to Christ as if to a god (carmenque Christo quasi deo dicere secum invicem).<sup>4</sup>

The only statement Pliny could be making about the historical Jesus is found in the words carmenque Christo quasi deo dicere secum invicem, "and sung antiphonally a hymn to Christ as if to a god." M. Harris, following Goguel, argues that by using quasi Pliny implies that the divine Christ whom Christians worship was once a human being.<sup>5</sup> A. N. Sherwin-White points out that in Pliny "quasi is used commonly without the idea of supposal to mean simply 'as'."<sup>6</sup> However, Pliny can also use quasi in its typically hypothetical meaning ("as if, as though").<sup>7</sup>

---

<sup>4</sup> Text: W. den Boer, Scriptorum Paganorum I–IV Saec. De Christianis Testimonia, Textus Minores 2, rev. ed. (Leiden: Brill, 1965). Treatments: Stephen Benko, Pagan Rome and the Early Christians (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1984), 4–14; A. N. Sherwin-White, Fifty Letters of Pliny (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1967); van Voorst, Jesus Outside the New Testament, 23–29.

<sup>5</sup> Murray Harris, "References to Jesus in Classical Authors," in Jesus Traditions Outside the Gospels, ed. David Wenham (Sheffield: Sheffield University Press, 1982), 346–347.

<sup>6</sup> Sherwin-White, Fifty Letters of Pliny, 177.

<sup>7</sup> P. G. W. Glare (Oxford Latin Dictionary [Oxford: Clarendon, 1968–82]) states that with the ellipsis of the verb, as in the clause under discussion, quasi typically means "as if."

So while quasi may perhaps imply here that the Christ Christians worship was once a man, we should not place too much weight on this. If Goguel and Harris are correct, Pliny furnishes only the barest witness to the historical Jesus (which no one at the time doubted), but this was not at all his aim.

All the specific information about Christ related in Letter 96 probably comes from Pliny's own experience in Bithynia, as he seems to suggest; he shows no knowledge of other sources such as Christian writings. He has obtained this information from former Christians, and corroborated it with information obtained under torture from two women deacons. As such, it is not a witness to Jesus independent of Christianity. What is related about Christ in this letter confirms two points made in the New Testament about the "Christ of faith" rather than the "historical Jesus": first, Christians worship Christ in their songs (e.g., Phil 2:5–11; Col 1:15–20; Rev 5:11–13), and second, no true Christian reviles or curses Christ (1 Cor 12:3).

3. Suetonius: The Instigator Chrestus

The Roman writer Gaius Suetonius Tranquillus (ca. 70–ca. 140), in his Lives of the Caesars, summarily lists the actions taken by Claudius, who ruled from 41–54 CE, toward various subject peoples during his reign. In Claudius 25, after reporting how he dealt with Greece, Macedonia and others, Suetonius writes tersely,

He [Claudius] expelled the Jews from Rome, since they were always making disturbances because of the instigator Chrestus (Judaeos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantis Roma expulit).<sup>8</sup> (Claud. 25.4)

Even considering one textual variant that reads "Christo," the Latin text is reliable and authentic. A Christian interpolator would more likely have spelled this name correctly. Also, he would not have placed Christ in Rome in 49 CE or called him a troublemaker. (Of course, these arguments rest on an identification of “Chrestus” with Christ, a question we will take up below.) The overwhelming majority of modern scholarship concludes that the reading “Chrestus” is original. It is most often translated in a way similar to the influential Loeb edition, “Since the Jews constantly made disturbances at the instigation of Chrestus, he expelled them from Rome.”<sup>9</sup> Yet impulsor does not mean “instigation,” but rather “instigator.” The immediately joined impulsore and Chresto agree with each other grammatically, making Chresto an appositive, and so they are better rendered “the instigator Chrestus.”

---

<sup>8</sup> Text: M. Ihm, ed., C. Suetoni Tranquilli Opera, Teubner Series (Stuttgart: Teubner, 1978) 1:209. Treatments: H. Botermann, Das Judenedikt des Kaisers Claudius, HE 71 (Stuttgart: Steiner, 1996); H. Dixon Slingerland, Claudian Policymaking and the Early Imperial Repression of Judaism at Rome (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1997); F. F. Bruce, "Christianity under Claudius," BJRL 44 (1961): 309–326; Harris, "References to Jesus," 353–56; Rainer Riesner, Paul's Early Period (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998), 160–167; van Voorst, Jesus Outside the New Testament, 29–39.

Who is this “Chrestus”? Some historians have recently argued against the traditional consensus identifying “Chrestus” as Christ, that Chrestus is an otherwise unknown agitator in Rome. Stephen Benko presents the most persuasive case.<sup>10</sup> He argues that Suetonius would not misconstrue “Christus” as “Chrestus,” because Chrestus was a common name in Rome. Moreover, in Nero 16.2 Suetonius spells the closely related word Christiani correctly, and so he must have known that its founder was Christus, not Chrestus. Benko concludes that this Chrestus was a Jewish radical, a member of a Zealot-like group that wanted to induce the coming of God’s kingdom by violence. When Chrestus incited Roman Jews to riot over the abolition of the Jewish client kingdom of the Herodians by Claudius in 44, Claudius acted to preserve order in his capital by expelling the Jews in 49, the event which Suetonius records. Although Chrestus/Χρηστός was indeed a common name among Greco-Roman peoples, and especially common among slaves and freedmen, among Jews, which all interpreters including Benko hold to be Suetonius’ meaning here, this name is not attested at all. Because “Chrestus” was not a common Jewish name but was a familiar Gentile name, the door opens more widely to the possibility that Suetonius (and/or his source) may indeed have confused “Christus” for “Chrestus.” Benko also asserts that Suetonius’ statement about Christians in Nero 16.2 shows that he would have known the correct spelling of “Christus,” and thus would have written “Christus” if he had meant it. However, this passage makes no reference to the founder of the Christians’ movement, nor does it mention Judaism. Claud. 25.4, on the other hand, does not refer to Christians, but to Jews. Suetonius' statements indicate that he may not have associated Judaism with Christianity, much less have known that they were closely connected religious movements in the year 49. He says that Christians hold to a new superstition, and implies that they are a distinct "class" (genus), while he knows that Jews practice an ancient religion. His statements may indicate that he did not associate the Jewish Chrestus with Christianoi. Corroboration of this widespread Roman misunderstanding is provided by Tacitus (Ann. 15.22), who must explain to his readers that "Christians" comes from "Christ." Therefore, because Suetonius can spell "Christians" correctly in Nero does not necessarily mean that he would know that "Chrestus" is a mistake in Claudius.

<sup>9</sup> J. C. Rolfe, Suetonius, 2nd ed., vol. II, LCL 38 (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1997), 51.

<sup>10</sup> S. Benko, “The Edict of Claudius of AD 49,” TZ 25 (1969): 406–418. See also his Pagan Rome and the Early Christians (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1984), 18–20.

Benko argues that Chrestus may have been a Jewish radical attempting to force the advent of the kingdom of God by violence, activities that led to rioting among Jews in Rome. Erich Koestermann also holds that *Chrestiano*i belonged to a Jewish revolutionary movement led by an otherwise unknown Chrestus.<sup>11</sup> However, no other evidence corroborates this supposed Jewish political rebellion in Rome to which Benko and Koestermann relate Chrestus. A more likely explanation of this trouble leading to expulsion, one based on a pattern in the history of Roman Judaism, relates to Jewish missionary activity. As Louis Feldman has argued, the most likely explanation of all three expulsions of the Jews from the city of Rome is trouble over Jewish missionary activity among non-Jewish Romans.<sup>12</sup> Suetonius may well be commenting about a civil unrest caused by proclaiming Jesus as the Christ. Continued public unrest over this Christ led Claudius to take the same action that other Roman officials had taken in this sort of situation—send the troublemakers packing, at least until they learned their lesson and could return with a more civil attitude. We need not posit a religious-political revolt, quite the opposite of missionary activity. In conclusion, Benko's arguments, fascinating though they are, do not persuade. In this passage, "Chrestus" is most likely Suetonius' mistake for "Christus."

The source of Suetonius' information is not named. A Christian source, whether written or oral, would have gotten the information about Christ more right than wrong. Nor is it likely that this information originated from Jews, since its mention of their expulsion is uncomplimentary to them. More likely is the supposition that Suetonius is using a Roman source, perhaps from the imperial archives or archives of “police” reports. As the emperor’s secretary, he may have had access to these archives, but he makes no quotation of the imperial correspondence after his chapter on Augustus. Suetonius may have copied a mistake from his source, and the source may have been written near to the event when the name “Christ” was not widely known in Rome. Repeating a mistake in his sources is characteristic of Suetonius, who often treats them uncritically and uses them carelessly.<sup>13</sup>

---

<sup>11</sup> E. Koestermann, "Ein folgenschwerer Irrtum des Tacitus?" Historia 16 (1967): 456–469.

<sup>12</sup> L. Feldman, Jew and Gentile in the Ancient World (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1993), 300–304.

The main thrust of the sentence is clear: Claudius took measures against at least some Jews in Rome after continual disturbances caused by Christ. Suetonius’ statement indicates how vague and incorrect Roman knowledge of the origins of Christianity could be. Similar sounds and spelling led him, like others, to misread Christus as Chrestus. From this initial misunderstanding came the idea that this Chrestus was actually present in Rome as an instigator in the 40’s. Although Suetonius did view Christ as an historical person capable of fomenting unrest, his glaring mistakes should caution us against placing any weight on his evidence for Jesus.

4. Tacitus: The Executed Christ

Chapters 38–45 of Tacitus’ Annals Book 15 describe the great fire in Rome and its aftermath in 64 CE, an issue that entails introducing Christians and Christ. Ann. 44 begins by listing the official acts to cope with the aftermath of the fire, presumably carried out under Nero’s direction. Then Tacitus reveals the reason for these measures:

[2] But neither human effort nor the emperor’s generosity nor the placating of the gods ended the scandalous belief that the fire had been ordered. Therefore, to put down the rumor, Nero substituted as culprits and punished in the most unusual ways those hated for their shameful acts [flagitia], whom the crowd called “Chrestians.” [3] The founder of this name, Christ, had been executed in the reign of Tiberius by the procurator

---

<sup>13</sup> “Suetonius followed whatever source attracted him, without caring much whether it was reliable or not” (M. C. Howatson, ed., The Oxford Companion to Classical Literature, 2nd ed. [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989], 542).

Pontius Pilate [Auctor nominis eius Christus Tiberio imperitante per procuratorem Pontium Pilatum supplicio adfectus erat]. Suppressed for a time, the deadly superstition erupted again not only in Judea, the origin of this evil, but also in [Rome], where all things horrible and shameful from everywhere come together and become popular.<sup>14</sup>

There are good reasons for concluding with the vast majority of scholars that this passage is textually sound, despite difficulties which result in no small measure from Tacitus' own compressed style. The style and content of this entire chapter are typically Tacitean. The statement about Christ fits well in its context, and is the necessary conclusion to the entire discussion of the burning of Rome. As Norma Miller delightfully remarks, "The well-intentioned pagan glossers of ancient texts do not normally express themselves in Tacitean Latin,"<sup>15</sup> and the same could be said of Christian interpolators. Moreover, no Christian forgers would have made such disparaging remarks about Christianity as we have in Ann. 15.44, and if a Christian forger added only the sentence about Christ, he probably would not have been as purely descriptive as in 15.44.3.

Tacitus can spell "Christus" correctly, and he uses this spelling to correct the common misspelling "Chrestians." In his eyes, Christians (and, by association, their founder) are certainly not "Chrestians"—"good, useful ones." Rather, they are rightly hated for their "shameful acts" (15.44.2), and have "a guilt which deserved the most exemplary punishment" (15.44.5). Tacitus uses Christus as a personal name, and he calls Christ "the originator/founder [auctor] of this name" of "Christians." Thus there is a material connection between Christus and Christianoi. This is important in the link he implicitly makes between the punishment Christ received and the punishment his followers received at the hands of Nero. The occasional use of -ianoi as a pejorative suffix fits the context here, where Tacitus has nothing good to say about Christians. He continues by informing his readers that Christ "had been executed in the reign of Tiberius by the procurator Pontius Pilate." Some translations reverse "the reign of Tiberius" and "by the procurator Pontius Pilate,” but Tacitus gives them in this more proper order, which should be preserved in translation. For “had been executed,” the Latin reads somewhat periphrastically supplicio adfectus erat. Supplicio means “punishment,” especially capital punishment, and adficere when construed with punishment often denotes “inflict.” But he does not say explicitly that Jesus was crucified. That Nero executed Christians links their fate with Christ’s, who was executed under Tiberius. Repetition of the verb adficere ties the two together: Christians were punished [poenis adfecit] by Nero, and Christ had been executed [supplicio adfectus erat] by Pilate.<sup>16</sup>

<sup>14</sup> Text: F. Römer, P. Corneli Taciti, Annalium Libri XV–XVI, Wiener Studien 6 (Vienna: Böhlau, 1976), 65–67; K. Wellesley, Cornelius Tacitus 1.2, Annales XI–XVI, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Graecorum et Romanorum Teubneriana (Leipzig: Teubner 1986), 114–115. Studies: R. Martin, Tacitus (Bristol: Bristol Classical Press, 1994); Ronald Mellor, Tacitus (New York: Routledge, 1993); van Voorst, Jesus Outside the New Testament, 39–53.

<sup>15</sup> N. P. Miller, Tacitus: Annals XV (London: Macmillan, 1973), xxviii.

Finally, Tacitus remarks that Christ was executed “in the reign of Tiberius by the procurator Pontius Pilate.” Tacitus does not give the year of Christ’s death in the more formal way, “the Nth year of the reign of Tiberius.” Nor does he state the crime for which Christ was crucified; his readers would have assumed it to be a crime against Rome, and he presents Christ’s death as a purely Roman matter. “Even if he had known about it, [Tacitus] would not have had the slightest reason to mention participation of the Jews.”<sup>17</sup> Pontius Pilate was the Roman governor of Judea from 26 to 36, years that fall in the reign of Tiberius. Pilate’s name, the location in Judea, and the time are given accurately, in agreement with the canonical gospels, Philo, and Josephus.<sup>18</sup> The four gospels are unanimous that Pilate did indeed give the order for Jesus to be put to death. Bruce’s judgment is fitting: “It may be regarded as an instance of the irony of history that the only surviving reference to [Pilate] in a pagan writer mentions him because of the sentence of death which he passed on Christ.”<sup>19</sup>

Tacitus’ description of Pilate as a procurator is doubtless an anachronism.<sup>20</sup> Until 41 CE, when Claudius gave each provincial governor from the equestrian class the title procurator augusti, the Roman governor was called a “prefect” (praefectus). This was born out by the “Pilate Stone” in Caesarea Maritima, dated to about 31, which calls Pontius Pilate a “prefect.” Even after this change in 41, there may have been fluidity in the use of these two titles, especially in non-official writings.

<sup>16</sup> As noted by Harris, “References to Jesus,” 349.

<sup>17</sup> Joseph Blinzler, The Trial of Jesus (London: Sheed & Ward, 1965), 32.

<sup>18</sup> Philo, Legat. 299–305; Josephus, War 2.169–177; Ant. 18.55–89.

<sup>19</sup> F. F. Bruce, Jesus and Christian Origins (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1974), 23.

<sup>20</sup> For a concise discussion of this issue, see Evans, “Jesus in Non-Christian Sources,” 465–466.

Most agree that Tacitus, like other contemporary authors,<sup>21</sup> has made use of the procurator title, which was more common in his own time, rather than the earlier and historically correct “prefect.” A mistake like this hardly impeaches the accuracy of Tacitus’ other statements about Jesus.

What is the source of Tacitus’ information about Christ? First, Tacitus did not draw, directly or indirectly, on writings that came into the New Testament. No literary or oral dependence can be demonstrated between his description and the gospel accounts.<sup>22</sup> Nor is it likely that Tacitus drew his information from another Christian document. Second, Tacitus does not seem to have drawn on general hearsay. He would probably indicate this with an expression like dicunt or ferunt, or call it a rumor, as he does the report that Nero mounted his private stage and accompanied the burning of Rome with a song (15.39). Moreover, hearsay typically does not produce Tacitus’ “documentary precision” about controversial topics like Christ and Christianity.<sup>23</sup> We cannot rule out that Tacitus found this information about Christ in another, now lost Roman history that he used as a source. However, this cannot be demonstrated either, because Tacitus rarely indicates where he is relying on his sources. A more likely source, but still not demonstrable, is a police or magistrate’s report made during investigations after the fire, which may have mentioned the genesis of Christianity. The Commentarii Principis, the court journal of the emperors, was closed to those outside the imperial court, so he could not consult it. The Acta Senatus, the senate’s archive of its own actions and activities, were open. The Senate could have investigated the fire of 64 and made some comment for explanation about Christ that ended up in its archive, but this remains a supposition. Moreover, Tacitus’ anachronistic use of “procurator” may indicate that he is not using an official imperial or senatorial document, which would not be likely to have made such a mistake.

The most plausible source of Tacitus’ information about Christ is Tacitus’ own dealings with Christians, directly or indirectly. In two periods of his life, he could have acquired knowledge of them. The later period was when Tacitus was governor of the province of Asia. At the same time, his close friend Pliny the Younger was governor of the neighboring province of Pontus-Bithynia and had difficult dealings with Christians. Tacitus could have had similar investigations or trials of Christians, who were present in several cities of Asia, or gained information about Christians from Pliny. An earlier period when Tacitus may have learned of Christians is typically overlooked. In 88 CE, he became a member of the Quindecimviri Sacris Faciundis, the priestly organization charged inter alia with supervising the practice of officially tolerated foreign cults in the city. It is not unreasonable to suppose that a priestly college charged with regulating licit religions would know something about the illicit ones, so information about Christians may have come to him through this association. Regardless of its source, what Tacitus says about Christ is clear. In his sparse but accurate detail, Tacitus gives the strongest evidence outside the New Testament for the death of Jesus.

<sup>21</sup> Philo, Legat. 38; Josephus, War 2.117, 169.

<sup>22</sup> Goguel, Life of Jesus, 95; Harris, “References to Jesus,” 351–352.

<sup>23</sup> Pace Paul Winter, who argues that Tacitus has no direct knowledge of Christianity and writes from hearsay (“Tacitus and Pliny: The Early Christians,” Journal of Historical Study 1 [1967–68]: 31–40; idem, “Tacitus and Pliny on Christianity,” Klio 52 [1970]: 497–502).

5. Mara Bar Serapion: The Wise Jewish King

Sometime after 73 CE, Mara bar Serapion wrote an eloquent letter in Syriac to his son, who was also named Serapion. The sole manuscript that has survived comes from to the seventh century.<sup>24</sup> We know nothing else about Mara or Serapion apart from this letter. To judge from its contents, he was a Stoic.

Mara's city had been destroyed in a war with Rome, and he with others had been taken prisoner. Most of his letter is taken up with an admonition to pursue wisdom in order to deal with the inevitable difficulties of life. Its wider, more quixotic purpose is to persuade the Romans to leave his homeland. Mara says that when the wise are oppressed, not only does their wisdom triumph in the end, but God also punishes their oppressors:

What advantage did the Athenians gain by murdering Socrates, for which they were repaid with famine and pestilence? Or the people of Samos by the burning of Pythagoras, because their country was completely covered in sand in just one hour? Or the Jews [by killing] their wise king, because their kingdom was taken away at that very time? God justly repaid the wisdom of these three men: the Athenians died of famine; the Samians were completely overwhelmed by the sea; and the Jews, desolate and driven from their own kingdom, are scattered through every nation. Socrates is not dead, because of Plato; neither is Pythagoras, because of the statue of Juno; nor is the wise king, because of the new laws he laid down.

---

<sup>24</sup> For the Syriac text, English translation, and brief treatment, see W. Cureton, Spicelegium Syriacum (London: Rivington, 1855); German translation and more extended treatment, F. Schulthess, "Der Brief des Mara bar Serapion," ZDMG 51 (1897): 365–391. See also Blinzler, Trial of Jesus, 52–57; Bruce, Jesus and Christian Origins, 30–31; van Voorst, Jesus Outside the New Testament, 53–58.

Although he is not named, Jesus is doubtless the one meant by “wise king.” First, Mara speaks of this Jew as a king, and “king” is prominently connected to Jesus at his trial, and especially at his death in the titulus on his cross (Mark 15:26 par.). Jesus’ preaching of the “kingdom of God” may also play a role here. Second, Mara’s link between the destruction of the Jewish nation and the death of the “wise king” is paralleled in Christianity, where the destruction of Jerusalem is a punishment for Jewish rejection of Jesus. The synoptic gospels imply this connection (Matt 23:37–39; 24:2; 27:25; Mark 13:1–2; Luke 19:42–44; 21:5–6, 20–24; 23:28–31), but Justin makes it explicit (1 Apol. 32.4–6; 47–49; 53.2–3; Dial. 25.5; 108.3). In later church writers this becomes a common theme. Third, “the new laws he laid down” is probably a reference to the Christian religion, especially its moral code.

That Mara does not use “Jesus” or “Christ” is striking, because he implicitly appeals to the fame of the wise king’s teaching. This king and his laws are on a level with Socrates and Pythagoras, who were “household names” in the ancient world. Blinzler suggests without any supporting argument that “the writer was not familiar with the name of Jesus or Christ.”<sup>25</sup> While this is possible, it seems unlikely that Mara would appeal to the fame of a new movement and yet be unfamiliar with the name of its founder. It is more likely that he suppresses Jesus’ name for the same reason that he suppresses the explicit statement that Jesus was killed. Cureton suggests that Roman persecution of Christians at the time of this letter led Mara to suppress Jesus’ name, while making an allusion to him quite unmistakable.<sup>26</sup>

Those who have dealt with Mara’s letter give it widely varying dates, but most place it in the first century, shortly after the Roman conquest of Commagene in 73 to which the author seems to refer. However, a date in the second century is more likely. It fits the situation of the writer just as well as the first century, and the situation of the Jewish people better. As Cureton argues, “The troubles to which the writer alludes as having befallen himself and his city will apply to those inflicted by the Romans upon the countries about the Tigris and Euphrates which had been excited to rebel against them by Vologeses, in the Parthian war under the command of Lucius Verus, AD 162–165.”<sup>27</sup> The way the author speaks of what has happened to the Jewish nation also points to a date sometime after the second Jewish revolt (132–135). His observation that “driven from their own kingdom, [the Jews] are scattered through every nation” applies particularly to the aftermath of the second revolt.

<sup>25</sup> Blinzler, Trial of Jesus, 35.

<sup>26</sup> Cureton, Spicilegium Syriacum, xiii.

Where did Mara obtain this tradition on Jesus? In favor of a non-Christian source is the fact that Mara does not state either that Jesus’ death is redemptive or that he lives through his resurrection, central elements in most types of Christianity. Some Christian apologists were able to compare Jesus to Socrates and other philosophers, but with the argument that Jesus was superior, not (as Mara implies) equal. Another argument pointing to a non-Christian source is that “king” is not a typical christological title in early Christian literature, and “wise king” is not attested at all. Nevertheless, the balance of the evidence favors a Christian origin. First, Mara states that the Jews wrongly killed Jesus; they killed him just as the Athenians wrongly killed Socrates and the Samites Pythagoras. While Jewish tradition also states (as we will see below) that the Jewish authorities executed Jesus, this tradition may not have found its way into a wider polemic that Mara would have known. Moreover, the tradition that reached Mara seems to contain a negative judgment on the death of Jesus that Jewish traditions, which justify the death of Jesus as legal, would not have. Second, as we have seen, Mara links the death of Jesus with the destruction of the Jewish nation, as only Christian tradition did. While a Christian source is thus more likely, we cannot rule out that Mara also had non-Christian information, especially if the “new laws” of the “wise king” were as well known as he implies.

The results for study of the historical Jesus are slim. Mara’s letter does not contain an independent witness to Jesus, for two main reasons. First, it obviously links the life of “the wise king” with his movement and its teachings, making it likely that Mara learned about the wise king from Christians, either directly or indirectly. Second, its assertion that the Jews killed Jesus is dubious at best. By his own logic, for Mara to implicate the Romans would go against his main point, that people who persecute and kill their wise men do so at their own peril. Nevertheless, the Letter of Mara shows the appeal that Christianity could have for some educated people. Mara's positive allusion to Christ and Christianity should not be read as an endorsement, any more than his mention of Socrates and Pythagoras is an endorsement of their respective philosophic schools. But he uses the example of Jesus and his teachings to urge his compatriots to persevere and the Romans to relent.

---

<sup>27</sup> Cureton, Spicelegium Syriacum, xv.

6. Lucian of Samosata: The Crucified Sophist

Lucian of Samosata (ca. 115–ca. 200) was a well-known Greek satirist and traveling lecturer. More than eighty works bear his name, most of them genuine, satirizing the faults and foibles of his time. In his book The Death of Peregrinus, written shortly after 165, Lucian warns readers against the infamous Peregrinus of Parion, whose emotionality and theatricality were opposed to the reasonable moderation that Lucian advocated.<sup>28</sup> In the course of describing how easily a charlatan like Peregrinus can dupe Christians, Lucian comments on the founder of Christianity and his teachings:

During this period [Peregrinus] associated himself with the priests and scribes of the Christians in Palestine, and learned their astonishing wisdom. Of course, in a short time he made them look like children; he was their prophet, leader, head of the synagogue, and everything, all by himself. . . . They looked up to him as a god, made him their lawgiver, and chose him as the official patron of their group, or at least the vice-patron. He was second only to that one whom they still worship today, the man in Palestine who was crucified because he brought this new form of initiation into the world. (§11)

Peregrinus was jailed and Christians came to his aid, bringing meals and money. Then Lucian explains why they did this:

---

<sup>28</sup> Text and Eng. trans. in A. M. Harmon, Lucian, vol. V, LCL 302 (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1936). Studies: C. P. Jones, Culture and Society in Lucian (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1986) 117–132; H. D. Betz, Lukian von Samosata und das Neue Testament, TU 76 (Berlin: Akademie, 1961); J. Hall, Lucian's Satire (New York: Arno, 1981), 212; van Voorst, Jesus Outside the New Testament, 58–64.

That first lawgiver of theirs persuaded them that they are all brothers the moment they transgress and deny the Greek gods and begin worshipping that crucified sophist and living by his laws. They scorn all possessions without distinction and treat them as community property; they accept such things on faith alone, without any evidence. So if a fraudulent and cunning person who knows how to take advantage of a situation comes among them, he can make himself rich in a short time while laughing at these foolish people. (§13)

The text of the references to Jesus is stable. Lucian talks about Christ in the context of his attack on Christianity. He knows that Christians worship a god who was a man, and one who was crucified in Palestine. They have a strong belief in life after death, which affects their present life. Christians “live according to his [i.e., Christ’s] laws,” especially brotherly love. Christians have their own scriptures that are regularly read and expounded. They visit and help their imprisoned fellow believers, and communicate widely with each other. Christians accept their key teachings by faith, not by philosophic reasoning.

Lucian’s every remark about Jesus drips with contempt. First, we note that he gives no name to this founder. Instead, he uses the derogatory “that one”: “that one whom they still worship today” (§11); “that first lawgiver of theirs” (§13); “that crucified sophist” (§13). Lucian clearly does mean Jesus, judging from the other things said about him in these sections. Lucian calls him by implication a “patron” or “protector” (προστάτης), a “lawgiver” (νομοθέτης), and “that crucified sophist” (ἀνασκολοπισμένον ἐκεῖνον σοφιστήν). To call Jesus a “patron/protector” is another way of saying that he is the leader of the group. Lucian sees this leadership as a matter of following his laws. When Lucian twice calls Jesus a “lawgiver,” he refers to the “laws” of the way of life Jesus laid down for his followers. He sees Christianity’s way of life as coming from Christ himself. “Lawgiver” is not found in early Christian literature as applied to Jesus, although Jesus’ teachings can be called laws (Gal 6:2, Rom 3:27, James 2:8, 12), and Christianity is sometimes called a “new law” (e.g., Barn. 2:6; Ignatius Magn. 2). So it is not difficult to see how Lucian can construe Jesus as a “lawgiver.” Lucian also calls Jesus a σοφιστής, “sophist.” In the second century, this derisive label was aimed at one who taught only for money and who could at times also be labeled, like Peregrinus, a “cheat.”<sup>29</sup> The second lawgiver, Peregrinus, defrauded them just as the first did. This notion is implied but not developed in the application of “sophist.” Lucian gets even more specific by calling Christ “that crucified sophist,” having already stated that the original founder was “the man in Palestine who was crucified for bringing this new form of initiation into the world” (§ 11). The verb he uses for crucifixion in both cases is a rare word, ἀνασκολοπίζειν, not ἀνασταυροῦν, the word usually used by ancient writers and always used in the New Testament and other early Christian literature. Lucian’s verb means “to impale,” but unquestionably refers here to crucifixion. He uses this verb exclusively for crucifixion; it also occurs in his Prom. 2, 7, and 10, and in Jud. voc. 12. The cause of this crucifixion is that “he brought this new form of initiation into the world.” Lucian’s main point seems to be that Christianity was from the first a condemned movement. His repetition of “crucified” emphasizes the shameful origin of Christianity: it was founded by an executed criminal.

---

<sup>29</sup> LSJ, 1622.

In section 13, Lucian outlines the teaching of Jesus. He construes his teachings as “laws,” and Jesus is the Christians’ “first lawgiver.” As we have seen, this is generally in line with some early Christian views. Next, Lucian states that Jesus taught his disciples to “deny the Greek gods” and links this to “transgression,” probably the transgression of Roman law. To judge from the evidence of the New Testament, Jesus never explicitly taught such a thing, apart from his affirmation of the Shema, which implicitly denies other gods—if not their existence, certainly devotion to them. Christians who spread the gospel among Gentiles had to deal with belief in other gods (e.g., 1 Thess 1:9; 1 Cor 8:4–6), but the canonical gospels do not trace this topic to Jesus, in whose predominantly inner-Jewish milieu there was no need for such teaching. Moreover, gospel traditions, whether canonical or non-canonical, do not support the affirmation that Jesus taught that fellowship among Christians is associated with denial of the Greek gods.

Did Jesus teach his disciples to worship him, as Lucian claims? Here again, Lucian is reading back from his knowledge of Christians into the life of Jesus. While Jesus may have received informal acts of worship during his ministry, the New Testament nowhere says that he taught it. Finally, Lucian implies that Jesus himself taught community of property among his followers. Once again, while Jesus certainly taught his followers a radical attitude to possessions and the need for sharing, the actual treating of possessions as community property is not attested in the ministry or teaching of Jesus, but only in the first part of Acts (chs. 4–5). Of course, in Lucian’s view this attitude toward possessions, when coupled with the alleged credulity and misplaced goodness of Christians, made them easy prey to a charlatan like Peregrinus.

What is Lucian's source of information about Jesus? He knows that Christians have sacred books, and this raises the possibility that he drew his knowledge of Jesus from them. To judge from what he says here, it is unlikely that Lucian had read them. Most of the correct information he relates about Christianity was common knowledge in his time. The use of the non-New Testament words "patron" and "lawgiver" as applied to Jesus, and especially Lucian's characteristic word for "crucified," also argue tellingly against a New Testament source. So there is no literary or oral connection between Lucian and the New Testament and other early Christian literature in regard to the person of Jesus. In sum, it is likely, but not demonstrable, that some information about Jesus came with the story of Peregrinus itself and was embellished by Lucian for his purposes.

7. Celsus: Christ the Magician

Sometime around 175 CE, the Neo-Platonist thinker Celsus wrote a comprehensive attack on Christianity entitled True Doctrine (ἀληθῆς λόγος). This work perished, but not before a large amount variously estimated at between 60 and 90 percent was incorporated into Origen's vigorous response, Against Celsus (Contra Celsum), about 250 CE.<sup>30</sup>

Celsus mounts a wide attack against Jesus as the founder of the faith. He discounts or disparages Jesus' ancestry, conception, birth, childhood, ministry, death, resurrection, and continuing influence. According to Celsus, Jesus' ancestors came from a Jewish village (Cels. 1.28), and his mother was a poor countrywoman who earned her living by spinning cloth (1.28). He worked his miracles by sorcery (1.28; 2.32, 49; 8.41). His physical appearance was ugly and small (6.75). To his discredit,

---

<sup>30</sup> Text: M. Borret, Origène: Contre Celse, SC 132, 136, 147, 150, 227 (Paris: Cerf, 1967–1976). Studies: Henry Chadwick, Origin: Contra Celsum (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1980); R. Joseph Hoffmann, Celsus, On the True Doctrine: A Discourse Against the Christians (New York: Oxford University Press, 1987); Gary T. Burke, Celsus and Late Second-Century Christianity (Ph.D. diss., University of Iowa, 1981); Eugene V. Gallagher, Divine Man or Magician? Celsus and Origin on Jesus, SBLDS 64 (Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1982); Graham N. Stanton, "Jesus of Nazareth: A Magician and a False Prophet Who Deceived God's People?" in Jesus of Nazareth: Lord and Christ, ed. J. B. Green and M. Turner (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994), 169–171; Robert L. Wilken, The Christians as the Romans Saw Them (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1984), 94–125; van Voorst, Jesus Outside the New Testament, 64–68.

Jesus kept all Jewish customs, including sacrifice in the temple (2.6). He gathered only ten followers and taught them his worst habits, including begging and robbing (1.62; 2.44). These followers, “ten sailors and tax collectors,” were the only ones he convinced of his divinity, but now his followers convince multitudes (2.46). The reports of his resurrection came from a hysterical female, and belief in the resurrection was the result of Jesus’ sorcery, the wishful thinking of his followers, or mass hallucinations, all for the purpose of impressing others and increasing the chance for others to become beggars (2.55). Celsus’ fullest statement about Jesus comes at 1.28, where Origen summarizes Celsus’ attack on Jesus. The words that probably derive from Celsus (following Chadwick’s edition) are italicized.

He portrays the Jew having a conversation with Jesus himself, refuting him on many charges. First, he fabricated the story of his birth from a virgin; and he reproaches him because he came from a Jewish village and from a poor countrywoman who made her living by spinning. He says that her husband, who was a carpenter by trade, drove her out when she was convicted of adultery. Then he says that after her husband had driven her out and while she was wandering disgracefully, she secretly bore Jesus. He says that because (Jesus) was poor he hired himself out as a laborer in Egypt, and there learned certain magical powers which the Egyptians are proud to have. He returned full of pride in these powers, and gave himself the title of God. (Cels. 1.28)

Later Celsus expands on the charge of illegitimacy:

Let us return, however, to the words put in the mouth of the Jew. The mother of Jesus is described as being turned out by the carpenter who was engaged to her, because she had been convicted of adultery and had a child by a soldier named Panthera. (Cels. 1.32)

Finally, Celsus says:

Was the mother of Jesus beautiful? Did God have sexual intercourse with her because she was beautiful, although by his nature he cannot love a mortal body? It is unlikely that God would have fallen in love with her, since she was neither wealthy nor of royal birth. Indeed, even her neighbors did not know her. He only ridicules when he says, When the carpenter hated her and expelled her, neither divine power nor the gift of persuasion could save her. Thus he says that these things have nothing to do with the kingdom of God. (Cels. 1.39)

These charges of illegitimacy are the earliest datable statement of the Jewish charge that Jesus was conceived as the result of adultery, and that his true father was a Roman soldier named Panthera. (We will revisit this tradition below.) Panthera was a common name among Roman soldiers of that period, but most interpreters hold that some Jews used this name because of its rough similarity to παρθένος, “virgin.” If this were the case, it would mean that this is a Jewish reaction to the Christian doctrine of the virgin birth, which does not become a leading Christian theme until near the end of the first century. Celsus has Jesus proclaiming his own virgin birth, which is of course not reflected in Christian writings but is attested in later Jewish polemic.

Celsus employed varied sources. He had informed himself about Christianity, both from its writings and from personal contact with Christians. He had read widely in Matthew, Luke, and 1 Corinthians, and had a passing knowledge of other Christian books. He knew Matthew’s account of the death and resurrection of Jesus in some detail. He also seems to have read the writings of some early Christian apologists now unknown to us. Celsus also knew about Marcionite Christianity and Gnostic sects, whether from their writings or by some other means (we cannot tell). He presents a Jewish contemporary as his source for Jewish polemic about Jesus. Origen questions this, and modern scholarship agrees in seeing this as a literary device that Celsus employed to give a unity to information he likely culled from diverse Jewish traditions.<sup>31</sup>

Because we do not have the exact or complete wording of True Doctrine, conclusions about it must be tentative. Nevertheless, it is clear that Celsus’ main attack on Christianity is philosophical, not historical. His more detailed information about Jesus, which by virtue of his knowledge of Christian writings should be fairly accurate, is distorted by his sharp polemic. Celsus is a rich source for our knowledge of pagan and Jewish polemic against Christianity, and to a lesser degree, against its Christ. Indeed, among pagan authors Celsus is unique in relaying both Jewish and Greco-Roman objections to Christianity. However, despite all his treatment of Christ, Celsus adds little or nothing to our knowledge of the historical Jesus.

---

<sup>31</sup> See Burke, “Celsus,” 93.

8. Josephus: Jesus who is Called the Christ

The Jewish historian Flavius Josephus (37–ca. 100 CE) became a writer in the employ of the Flavian emperors Vespasian, Titus and Domitian. His Jewish Antiquities is mostly a defense of the Romans and an admonition for the Jews to live peaceably under them. In this work, he makes a short statement about Jesus:

He [Ananus the high priest] assembled the Sanhedrin of the judges, and brought before it the brother of Jesus called [τοῦ λεγομένου] Christ, whose name was James, and some others. (Ant. 20.200)<sup>32</sup>

The overwhelming majority of scholars hold that the words “the brother of Jesus called Christ,” as well as the whole passage in which it is found, are authentic. “Called Christ” is neutral and descriptive, intended neither to confirm nor deny Jesus as Messiah. The use of “Christ” here reflects Jewish usage as a title.

Josephus’ main statement about Jesus, traditionally known as the Testimonium Flavianum, the “Witness of Flavius (Josephus)” to Jesus, is found in Ant. 18.63–64. (Virtually all scholars discount a much fuller form of this passage in a later Slavonic version.) The present text reads,

Around this time lived Jesus, a wise man, if indeed it is right to call him a man. For he was a worker of amazing deeds and was a teacher of people who accept the truth with pleasure. He won over both many Jews and many Greeks. He was the Christ. Pilate, when he heard him accused by the leading men among us, condemned him to the cross, [but] those who had first loved him did not cease [doing so]. For on the third day

---

<sup>32</sup> For text and translation of Josephus’ works, see the Loeb edition edited by Henry St. J. Thackeray, Ralph Marcus, and Louis Feldman (LCL 186, 203, 210, 242, 281, 326, 365, 410, 433, 456) (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1926–65). Recent studies: Harold W. Attridge, “Josephus and His Works,” in Jewish Writings of the Second-Temple Period, ed. M. E. Stone, CRINT 2.2 (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984), 185–232; Paul Winter, “Excursus II: Josephus on Jesus and James: Ant. xviii 3,3 (63–64) and xx 9, 1 (200–203),” in The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ, Emil Schürer, 3 vols., rev. and ed. Geza Vermes, Fergus Millar, Matthew Black, and Martin Goodman (Edinburgh: Clark, 1973–87), 1:428–441; Claudia Setzer, Jewish Responses to Early Christians: History and Polemics, 30–150 CE (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994), 105–109; Graham Twelftree, “Jesus in Jewish Traditions,” in Jesus Traditions Outside the Gospels, ed. David Wenham (Sheffield: Sheffield University Press, 1982), 290–310; Louis Feldman, “The Testimonium Flavianum: The State of the Question,” in Christological Perspectives, ed. R. F. Berkey and S. A. Edwards (New York: Pilgrim, 1982) 179–199; Geza Vermes, “The Jesus-Notice of Josephus Re-examined,” JJS 38 (1987): 1–10; van Voorst, Jesus Outside the New Testament, 81–104.

he appeared to them alive again, because the divine prophets had prophesied these and myriad other things about him. To this time the tribe of Christians named after him has not disappeared.

Until the rise of historical criticism in early modern times, most scholars believed this passage to be authentic. Their evidence for its authenticity is based on the wording of the passage, which points away from Christian interpolation at several key points. Moreover, if it were a Christian interpolation, we should expect more laudatory language about Jesus. However, other scholars deny the authenticity of the entire passage. Their argument is based on the context of the passage in the Antiquities, the arguably Christian wording of the passage, and Josephus' belief that the Roman general Vespasian was the messiah (War. 6.312–313; cf. 3.400–402).<sup>33</sup>

This debate over the authenticity of this passage has continued for hundreds of years, partly because the evidence can be—and has been—argued both ways. While a few scholars still reject it fully and even fewer accept it fully, most now prefer one of two middle positions involving a conjectural reconstruction of this passage. The first middle position reconstructs an authentic Josephan passage negative to Jesus, and the second reconstructs an authentic passage neutral toward Jesus. The negative reconstruction reads, according to F. F. Bruce, whose reconstruction is indicative of the main lines of others' reconstructions (conjectural wording italicized):

Now there arose about this time a source of further trouble in one Jesus, a wise man who performed surprising works, a teacher of men who gladly welcome strange things. He led away many Jews, and many Gentiles. He was the so-called Christ. When Pilate, acting on information supplied by the chief men among us, condemned him to the cross, those who had attached themselves to him at first did not cease to cause trouble. The tribe of Christians, which has taken its name from him, is not extinct even today.<sup>34</sup>

The neutral reconstruction reads, according to John P. Meier,

<sup>33</sup> Franz Dornseiff, "Zum Testimonium Flavianum," ZNW 46 (1955): 245–250; Etienne Nodet, "Jésus et Jean Baptiste selon Josephé," RB 92 (1985): 320–348, 497–524.

<sup>34</sup> Bruce, Jesus and Christian Origins, 39 (italics mine). For similar negative reconstructions, see especially Ernst Bammel, "A New Variant Form of the Testimonium Flavianum," in idem, Judaica, WUNT 37 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1986), 190–193; also Stanton, "Jesus of Nazareth," 169–171; Twelftree, "Jesus in Jewish Traditions," 303, 310.

Around this time lived Jesus, a wise man. For he was a worker of amazing deeds and was a teacher of people who gladly accept the truth. He won over both many Jews and many Greeks. Pilate, when he heard him accused by the leading men among us, condemned him to the cross, [but] those who had first loved him did not cease [doing so]. To this time the tribe of Christians named after him has not disappeared.<sup>35</sup>

Although certainty is not possible, the neutral reconstruction is the better explanation of this difficult passage. Most scholars favor it, and we can adduce seven main reasons for their support. First, the neutral reconstruction explains why we have any mention of Jesus in Josephus at all. At the end of antiquity, only Christians copied Josephus' books, to a significant degree because of their value to the Christians. If Christian copyists had found in Josephus' writings a negative passage about Jesus, it is more likely that they would have deleted it as an embarrassment than that they would have rewritten it.<sup>36</sup> Second, there is an argument from style: the neutral reconstruction reads just as smoothly as the negative reconstruction. Third, the neutral reconstruction accords better than the negative reconstruction with the more certain reference to Jesus in the Antiquities, "Jesus who is called the Christ." Fourth, the neutral reconstruction with its later pro-Christian interpolations makes good sense of the pattern of ancient Christian references to Josephus. In about 250, Origen does not know these interpolations (Cels. 1.45; Commentary on Matthew 10.17), while Eusebius several decades later does (Hist. eccl. 1.1.7–8). The fifth reason for favoring the neutral over the negative reconstruction is based on a recent discovery which tends to corroborate the neutral reconstruction. In 1971, an Arabic version of the Testimonium was found in Agapius' tenth-century Universal History, in a form that resembles the neutral reconstruction more than the negative reconstruction.<sup>37</sup> Sixth, the neutral presentation of Jesus is supported by a roughly parallel presentation of John the Baptizer, which almost all interpreters regard as undoubtedly genuine (Ant.

---

<sup>35</sup> John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 1:61; see also Raymond E. Brown, The Death of the Messiah: From Gethsemane to the Grave: A Commentary on the Passion Narratives of the Gospels, ABRL 2 vols. (New York: Doubleday, 1994), 1:373–374; Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1986), 71–74.

<sup>36</sup> As Geza Vermes asks, "Would these writers have salvaged the work of a Jew who was the author of a wicked slander concerning Christ, who for these apologists was a divine being?" (Vermes, "Jesus-Notice," 10, n. 46).

<sup>37</sup> S. Pines, An Arabic Version of the Testimonium Flavianum and Its Implications (Jerusalem: Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities, 1971).

18.116–119). That Josephus can write sympathetically about a controversial figure like John the Baptizer indicates that he could write a neutral description about Jesus as well. Finally, this neutral reconstruction has much to commend it, when we bear in mind two important scholarly conventions of reasoning from evidence, with regard to explanation and simplicity. It explains well the passage as we have it now, with its mixture of authentic and interpolated content, and it is the simplest theory to account for most of the facts, internal and external, in the interpretation of the Testimonium. It involves significantly less conjectural wording than the negative reconstruction, while proposing a solution that is equally explanatory. In conclusion, while certainty is not possible, and the negative reconstruction has strengths that commend it to several leading researchers, we may conclude that the neutral reconstruction is more likely, and is correctly supported by a majority of scholars today.

When we employ the neutral reconstruction of the Testimonium Flavianum and the other reference to Jesus, significant information about the life, ministry, and death of Jesus emerges.<sup>38</sup> Josephus corroborates the New Testament's dating of Jesus' life and ministry. He confirms Jesus' reputation as a teacher and worker of healing miracles, yet not without any detail or endorsement. He confirms that both the Jewish Sanhedrin and Pontius Pilate acted to condemn Jesus to death. Finally, he states that Jesus "the Christ" was the founder of a continuing movement that bears this name. Josephus has given us something unique among all ancient non-Christian witnesses to Jesus: a carefully neutral, highly accurate and perhaps independent witness to Jesus, a wise man whom his persistent followers call "the Christ."

9. The Rabbis: Jesus the Deceiver

The proposed references to Jesus preserved in the Mishnah (ca. 200 CE) and the earliest, Tannaitic layer (pre-200 CE) of the Babylonian Talmud are of two types: by a code name, and by his actual name.

---

<sup>38</sup> The value of the negative reconstruction, if correct, should also be indicated. It too gets Jesus' name correct and places him in the right time period. He is a wise (or clever) man who worked miracles. He was put to death by order of Pilate. Jesus death is more politically charged in the negative reconstruction; the ties to later "deceiver" polemics against Jesus are explicit; and trouble in the later Christian movement is tied to trouble in the life of Jesus.

Research into rabbinic traditions on the historical Jesus has largely been restricted to the earliest layers, on the supposition that they contain the best information.<sup>39</sup>

Some scholars have argued that early hostility to Christianity led to numerous references to Jesus within rabbinic writing by means of insulting pseudonyms such as “Ben Stada,” “Balaam,” and “a certain one.” Two present Ben Stada as a worker of evil magic (b. Shabb. 104b, t. Shabb. 11:15). Two passages parallel to each other describe an ancient Torah-enforcement “sting operation” against him (b. Sanh. 67, and t. Sanh. 10:11; y. Sanh. 7:16). As an example, here is the first of these four passages, which shows the complexity of the Ben Stada traditions:

It is taught that Rabbi Eliezer said to the Wise, “Did not Ben Stada bring spells from Egypt in a cut in his flesh?” They said to him, “He was a fool, and they do not bring evidence from a fool.” Ben Stada is Ben Pantera. Rabbi Hisda said, “The husband was Stada, the lover was Pantera.” The husband was [actually] Pappos ben Judah, the mother was Stada. The mother was Miriam [Mary] the dresser of women’s hair. As we say in Pumbeditha, “She has been false to [satath da] her husband.” (b. Šabb. 104b)

Other passages are said to present Jesus as Balaam, the non-Israelite prophet who figures rather positively in Numbers 22–24, but negatively in Num 3:16 and thereafter in Jewish tradition. The first two Balaam passages from the Mishnah have been thought by a few scholars to speak of Jesus’ exclusion from the people of Israel (m. Sanh. 10:2, m. ‘Abot 5:19). The third Balaam passage is the Dantesque “Jesus in Hell” account from the Talmud (b. Git. 56b–57a), and the fourth passage from the Talmud deals with the age of Balaam at his death (b. Sanh. 106b). On the question of which Israelites will be excluded from the world to come, the Mishnah relates, “Three kings and four commoners have no part in the world to come. The three kings are Jeroboam, Ahab, and

---

<sup>39</sup> Studies: G. H. Dalman, The Words of Jesus (Edinburgh: Clark, 1902); H. Laible, Jesus Christ in the Talmud, Midrash, Zohar, and the Liturgy of the Synagogue (Cambridge: Deighton & Bell, 1893); R. Travers Herford, Christianity in Talmud and Midrash (London: Williams & Norgate, 1903); Joseph Klausner, Jesus of Nazareth (London: Macmillan, 1925); Morris Goldstein, Jesus in Jewish Traditions (New York: Macmillan, 1950); Jacob Z. Lauterbach, “Jesus in the Talmud,” in idem, Rabbinic Essays (New York: Ktav, 1973), 473–570; Johann Meier, Jesus von Nazareth in der talmudischen Überlieferung, ErFor 82 (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1978); Peter Schäfer, Jesus in the Talmud (Princeton and Oxford: Princeton University Press, 2007). See also Bruce, Jesus and Christian Origins, 54–65; Meier, Marginal Jew, 1:93–98; van Voorst, Jesus Outside the New Testament, 104–122.

Manasseh. . . . The four commoners are Balaam, Doeg, Ahitophel, and Gehazi” (m. Sanh. 10:2).

Still other texts speak of “a certain person” (פלני) who has been identified by some with Jesus. A key reference to “a certain person” occurs in a discussion of the definition of a “bastard,” who according to Jewish law has restricted rights (m. Yebam. 4:13 and b. Yoma 66d; cf. t. Yebam. 3:3–4): Rabbi Shimon ben Azzai said, “I have found a family scroll in Jerusalem, and in it is written, ‘A certain person is a bastard through [a transgression of the law of] the kinsman’s wife’” (m. Yebam. 4:13).

Current scholarship has largely settled on the following consensus in evaluating these three putative code words. First, פלני as a reference to Jesus is so intentionally vague in itself as to refer to almost anyone. Some have translated it “so-and-so,” but this English translation misleadingly leaves a negative impression. פלני has no inherently negative connotation in post-biblical Hebrew. The Mishnah section on “bastards” in which it appears, m. Yebam. 4:13, deals not just with any garden-variety bastards, but with those who are the offspring of “near of kin, which is forbidden.” The “certain one” whom Rabbi Joshua mentions as an illustration is the offspring of such a violation. Since Jewish polemic against Jesus never claimed that he was an offspring of such a sin, this is not likely to be a cryptic reference to Jesus.

The specific application of “Balaam” to Jesus is also untenable for the earliest stage of rabbinic tradition. The wide field of Balaam references in the New Testament<sup>40</sup> and rabbinic Judaism reflects a long polemical tradition that typologically identifies many people as “Balaam.” Moreover, Balaam was not an Israelite, despite the inexplicable identification of him as an “Israelite commoner” in m. Sanh. 10:2. The rabbinic tradition everywhere knows that Jesus was Jewish. Moreover, nothing else in the passage allows one to suspect Jesus. Other rabbinic texts (b. Git. 56–57) manifestly present Balaam and Jesus as two separate people, and their attitudes to Judaism are also opposed. All this makes it highly unlikely that Jesus is referred to by Balaam in these earlier passages. Since “Balaam” was a traditional prototype of the deceitful prophet from outside Israel, it was natural that Jesus, whose movement now opposed Judaism from the outside, would come to be associated with him. However, the evidence points away from concluding that “Balaam” was used as a code name for Jesus in Tannaitic times.

<sup>40</sup> See 2 Pet 2:15; Jude 11; Rev 2:14. Balaam is presented as an outsider who seduces the people of God to a false religion, a traditional portrait shared by rabbinic writers.

Neither can Ben Stada be a code name for Jesus. The first explicit identification of Jesus as Ben Stada comes in the later Amoraic layer. Moreover, information given about Ben Stada disagrees at almost every point with more certain data from the New Testament. Further, the portrait of Ben Stada does not fit other, more certain rabbinic traditions about Jesus, especially the one in b. Sanh. 43a relating to his trial and death. The passage also reflects confusion over the identity of Stada; is he Mary’s husband, or Mary herself? This passage settles on the latter, using a pun to illustrate the point. She is called “Stada” because she has been false to (satath da) her husband. In another passage, the only telling connection to the Jesus traditions of the Talmud—the statement in b. Sanh. 67 “they hanged him [Ben Stada] on the day before the Passover”—is in all likelihood tacked on later in order to apply polemic against Ben Stada to Jesus.

In the second type of proposed Talmud passages on Jesus, he appears under his own name. Because the name Jesus (Yeshua) was a common one, the content must indicate that the Jesus being spoken of is Jesus of Nazareth. The first is a passage discussing Israelites who have no place in the world to come (b. Sanh. 107b, cf. b. Sotah 47a):

When King Jannaeus [died 76 BCE] was killing our rabbis, Rabbi Joshua ben Perahiah and Jesus escaped to Alexandria, Egypt. When peace was restored... he set off (for home), and came to a certain inn, where he was given a warm welcome. He said, “How lovely is the inn!” He [Jesus] replied, “Rabbi, she has narrow eyes.”<sup>41</sup> Rabbi Joshua said, “You villain, is that what you are thinking about?” So he sounded four hundred trumpets and excommunicated him. Many times Jesus came and pleaded to be allowed back, but he would not listen. But one day, when Rabbi Joshua was reciting the Shema, Jesus approached him. Deciding to welcome him back, he made a gesture to him. However, Jesus thought he was ordering him to leave, and he went and set up a brick and worshipped it. “Repent,” he [Rabbi Joshua] told him, but he answered, “I have learned from you that no chance of repentance is given to one who sins and leads others into sin.” And a teacher has said, “Jesus the Nazarene practiced magic and led Israel astray.”... Our rabbis taught: Let the left hand push away, but the right hand always invite back, not like Elisha who pushed Gehazi away with both hands, and not like Joshua ben Perahiah who pushed Jesus away with both hands (b. Sanh. 107b; cf. b. Sotah 47a; this passage has an earlier parallel in the Jerusalem Talmud which does not mention Jesus, y. Hag. 2:2; cf. y. Sanh. 23c).

---

<sup>41</sup> The Hebrew word for “innkeeper” also means “inn”; Rabbi Joshua uses it in the former sense, and Jesus (to his discredit) uses it in the second.

Other texts also characterize the ministry of Jesus and his disciples negatively (b. Sanh. 43a, cf. t. Shabb. 11:15; b. Shabb. 104b; b. Sanh. 103a, cf. b. Ber. 17b, and b. Sanh. 43a).

Jesus' trial and death are treated in a passage from the Talmud (b. Sanh. 43a). Here Jesus is explicitly named, and again there is little doubt that Jesus of Nazareth is meant. This has rightly been called the "most important reference to Jesus in Rabbinic literature":<sup>42</sup>

It was taught: On the day before the Passover they hanged Jesus. A herald went before him for forty days [proclaiming], "He will be stoned, because he practiced magic (כִּשְׁף) and enticed Israel to go astray (נִדְּן). Let anyone who knows anything in his favor come forward and plead for him." But nothing was found in his favor, and they hanged him on the day before the Passover. (b. Sanh. 43a)

This one Tannaitic passage on the trial and death of Jesus not only names Jesus explicitly, but gives other information that confirms Jesus as the subject. This short narrative is the only surviving rabbinic treatment of the death of Jesus beyond a simple reference to it. It has many problems that are probed extensively in several treatments;<sup>43</sup> space precludes our consideration of them here. On the whole, scholarship holds it to be an inner-Jewish explanation and justification of how one famous criminal, Jesus of Nazareth, was put to death, and implicitly a warning to stay away from his movement.<sup>44</sup>

As has been seen, most passages of the Tannaitic period that have been argued to refer to Jesus cannot be held to do so. Only the passages that cite Jesus by name, and perhaps by "Ben Pantera," are from this period. Further, we can discern information from the rabbis about Jesus that accords with reliable traditions in the New Testament: Jesus was born of Mary, was claimed to have Davidic descent, worked miracles, had disciples, and was executed. Rabbinic tradition is negative from the start of its Jesus references, and consistently portrays Jesus as a magician (מכשף) and deceiver (מסית). Good evidence from the more certain references to Jesus suggests that what the rabbis say about Jesus is largely a polemic reaction to Christian traditions, either written or oral.

<sup>42</sup> J. Louis Martyn, History and Theology in the Fourth Gospel, 2nd ed. (Nashville: Abingdon, 1979), 78.

<sup>43</sup> Besides Martyn, see also Brown, Death of the Messiah, 1:376–378; Herford, Christianity in Talmud and Midrash, 344–360; Lauterbach, Rabbinic Essays, 473–496; Maier, Jesus von Nazareth, 216–229.

<sup>44</sup> For one example of the debate over the interpretation of Jesus traditions, see L. H. Silberman, "Once Again: The Use of Rabbinic Material," NTS 42 (1996): 153–156; R. E. Brown, "The Babylonian Talmud on the Execution of Jesus," NTS 43 (1997) 158–159.

All this raises the question of how the rabbis gained this information about Jesus. The third-century rabbis seem to have had no traditions about Jesus that originated in the first century. Some rabbinic traditions concerning Jesus may represent responses to Christian preaching from the end of the first century, not from the time of Jesus. The presentation of Jesus' trial and death in b. Sanh. 43a is probably a Jewish rebuttal of Christian traditions about Jesus' death. It cannot be claimed to represent early, independent information about Jesus, although according to the synoptic accounts, some leading Pharisees were present at the trial of Jesus. The more specific information given here by the rabbis diverges from reliable traditions in the New Testament, and shows no signs of being from the first century.<sup>45</sup> It proceeds instead from polemical imagination, which ran free in rabbinic storytelling: Jesus was a failed rabbinical student, whose own teacher excommunicated him; he was tried after a forty-day period of inquiry, and executed by Jews alone. Perhaps the most telling indication that the rabbis had no independent, early traditions about Jesus is their failure to place him in the right century. Some place him in the first century BCE, others in the second century CE. A chain of tradition from the first century would have set this error straight. The better explanation of all the rabbinic information on Jesus is that it originated in the second and third centuries. While it reflects traces of Jewish polemic against Christians at that time, its main use in the rabbinic writings was, no doubt, to remind Jews that Jesus was a deceitful apostate and that his followers were still in error.

---

<sup>45</sup> Stanton, "Jesus of Nazareth: A Magician and False Prophet," has argued carefully from the canonical gospels that a Jewish charge that Jesus was a magician most probably goes back to the lifetime of the historical Jesus. Yet although the charge may be found in Jesus' lifetime, the rabbinic tradition cannot be shown to preserve this first-century charge; rather, it seems to originate after Jesus' lifetime.

10. Conclusions

We will first draw conclusions from our treatment of classical sources. A question arises: why are the classical references to Jesus not more contemporary with him? First, a time lag typical of the ancient world explains why classical writers who are contemporary with Jesus do not mention him. Most works by major historians, those most likely to be preserved over time, used recognized literary sources from earlier, lesser writers. Josephus, in the introduction to his Jewish War, had to justify writing about “events which have not previously been recorded” (War 1.13–16). Second, Roman writers seem to have considered Christianity an important topic only when it became a perceived threat to Rome, and would not have treated Christianity unless and until it became an important Roman political or social issue. If it had not become a significant religious movement, philosophers like Lucian and Celsus would not have attacked it. As it is, historians like Tacitus and Suetonius held Christianity in disdain, and may have written reluctantly about its founder. Third, Romans had little interest in the historical origins of other groups, especially “superstitions.” “Romans regarded as impractical the detachment so prized by Greek thinkers,”<sup>46</sup> and this often drove them away from a dispassionate consideration of the origins of others. Roman practicality led them to consider only what foreign religions were now, and only insofar as they impacted on Roman rule. In the light of these factors, we cannot suppose that classical writers on Jesus would be either numerous or close in time. Indeed, the references to Jesus that we do have in major early second-century writers such as Suetonius, Tacitus, and Pliny the Younger are quite what we should expect.

A second main conclusion to be drawn from the classical writers is that they see Christ through Christianity. Christianity as a movement is their primary concern. They almost always mention Christ as the founder, leader, or teacher of the movement. This strong connection between Christ and Christianity in the minds of classical writers helps to explain why they use the name “Christ” and not “Jesus,” even when their knowledge of Christianity would indicate that they might have known the latter name (Tacitus, Pliny, and Lucian).

A third conclusion is that the depth of treatment Jesus receives is quite shallow. The treatment we have seen in this chapter runs from a few words (Suetonius) to a little over one sentence (Tacitus, Mara), but rarely more (Celsus). To those accustomed to great detail in treatments of the historical Jesus, this seems remarkably cursory and superficial. However, at this time (50–150 CE), Christianity was only occasionally significant to most Romans. Moreover, they knew it as a superstitio, a term Christianity likely inherited from Roman views of Judaism. This label probably served to dampen any small interest in Christianity's founder. By the time Christianity was written about, it was a widely disapproved, occasionally persecuted movement.

---

<sup>46</sup> Mellor, Tacitus, 2.

Fourth, what classical writers know about Jesus comes almost completely from Christians. They seem to have little or no knowledge about him independent of Christianity. The only possible exception is Tacitus, but even here it is more likely that he derived his information from Christians, either directly or by way of his friend Pliny the Younger. As a consequence, we obtain no reliable information about Jesus from the classical writers that we do not have in the Christian writings of this time. To judge from the surviving classical writings, it seems that early traditions about Jesus did not pass independently of Christianity through the classical Roman world and surrounding areas.

Now we turn to conclude our treatment of Jewish sources. First, in addition to having more numerous mentions of Jesus than do the classical non-Christian sources (with the exception of Celsus), Jewish sources tend to have more depth of treatment. We obtain more information from them (accurate and inaccurate) than from classical sources to corroborate the main lines of the traditions about Jesus found in the New Testament. As regards the rabbinic tradition, the reason for this can be traced to the polemic of Judaism against Christianity—it needed material to use against the church. While some traditions on Jesus' life were known, very little if anything of his teaching was remembered or invented.

A second conclusion about Jewish sources is that like the classical writers, they do not treat Jesus independently, but see him through Christianity. Christianity as a movement is their only main concern; in their eyes, Jesus himself was dead and gone. Josephus mentions Jesus as the founder of a movement still present, and prominent, in Rome. The rabbinic literature rarely mentions Jesus without having Christians in view, and it deals with Christians as sectarians and heretics much more often than with Jesus. By the time the rabbis started to write down their traditions, Judaism was overtly hostile to Christianity, and this surely must have colored how often the rabbis wrote of Jesus and what they said. Because the Tannaitic and Amoraic rabbis correctly saw the importance of healing and other miracles in Christianity, it is not surprising that they portrayed Jesus primarily as a magician (e.g., t. Hul. 2:22–23; y. Abod. Zar. 2:2). If this movement had not survived to the end of the first century, neither Josephus nor the rabbis would likely have written about him.

This leads us to the third conclusion. Aside from Josephus, Jewish tradition is uniformly negative toward Jesus. Indeed, against the background of the more neutral, descriptive language of Josephus, the rabbinic traditions about Jesus appear even more negative. The rabbinic tradition, which represents the main position of Judaism, has nothing good to say about Jesus: not about his parentage, his teaching, or his movement. Jesus fully deserved his punishment.

Fourth, rabbinic literature evidently failed to preserve one earlier Jewish polemic against Jesus. Matt 28:11–15 relates the rumor that Jesus' disciples stole his body and falsely proclaimed him raised from the dead, attributing its origin to the chief priests and the elders of Israel. The significant historical difficulties of this Matthean passage do not militate against its closing point, that this story was widely current among Jews as anti-resurrection polemic when this Gospel was written. Matthew would be unlikely to report, much less invent, such a vivid, powerful anti-Christian story if it were not in circulation. It may be generalizing to all Jews what is known in its area and time, perhaps Antioch in the 80's. Nevertheless, this story is also reported in Justin, Dial. 108.2 (probably in dependence on Matthew), and Tertullian, Spect. 30.6 (more likely independent of Matthew). The least we can safely deduce from the failure of this tradition to appear in rabbinic literature is that the Tannaitic rabbis seem to have made no attempt to be comprehensive in preserving and reporting earlier anti-Christian polemic.

Finally, Jewish tradition on Jesus was negative from the start, but may well have grown more negative and more extensive over time, as the conflict between church and synagogue intensified. Josephus' neutral perspective, if correct, may reflect an early Jewish attitude toward Jesus that had not yet grown negative. Josephus is not completely idiosyncratic on Jesus. The first body of rabbinic literature, the Mishnah, does not mention Jesus at all, although roughly concurrent traditions do to a small extent. In the earliest stages of the Babylonian Talmud, material about Jesus is still sparse, but in later layers Jesus looms larger as figures like Balaam and Ben Stada are tied to him. In sum, most classical and rabbinical traditions on Jesus arise in a polemical Sitz im Leben, and add little to our knowledge of the historical Jesus. At the end of the day, the study of the historical Jesus in these traditions points to the New Testament and other early Christian writings.

PART TWO

FUNDAMENTALLY ABOUT JESUS

THE HISTORICITY OF JESUS
HOW DO WE KNOW THAT JESUS EXISTED?

SAMUEL BYRSKOG

Biblical scholars are convinced that Jesus existed.<sup>1</sup> While they disagree on several matters of central importance to the understanding of Jesus and early Christianity, this is a crucial point of considerable agreement. The quest for the historical Jesus is not a quest for his existence as such, but for the more precise contours of his person and career. But how do we know that he in fact existed? In what sense can we speak of his historicity? How do we approach history? How do we employ the ancient documents in order to reconstruct the historical Jesus? What sources do we have and what is our attitude to them? Is it really possible to move out of our own context and reach back to the bare history via documents and traditions? Questions such as these have recently come to the fore in historical Jesus research and promise a more hermeneutically informed sensitivity to the conviction that Jesus in fact existed.<sup>2</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> The “we” in the title of the present essay is the guild of biblical scholars. Those who deny that Jesus existed usually treat the issue of historicity and the sources in a manner which invalidates any kind of informed, mutual discussion. Cf. recently (again) George Albert Wells, Can We Trust the New Testament? Thoughts on the Reliability of Early Christian Testimony (Chicago: Open Court, 2004). For reference to and evaluation of earlier proposals, see Robert E. van Voorst, Jesus outside the New Testament: An Introduction to the Ancient Evidence, Studying the Historical Jesus (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2000), 6–16. What follows is not an attempt to enter into that debate, but to look critically at how biblical scholars reason, and (possibly) should reason.

<sup>2</sup> Cf., for instance, Jens Schröter, “Die Frage nach dem historischen Jesus und der Charakter historischer Erkenntnis,” in The Sayings Source Q and the Historical Jesus, ed. Andreas Lindemann, BETL 158 (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 2001), 207–254; idem, “Von der Historizität der Evangelien: Ein Beitrag zur gegenwärtigen Diskussion um den historischen Jesus,” in Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. idem and Ralph Brucker, BZNW 114 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002), 163–212.

1. Reconstructing History

The search for the historical Jesus is beset with a number of ways of conceptualizing the entire enterprise of historical reconstruction. We mean different things when claiming that someone existed in history. For some it entails an account of the total reality of that person, what s/he thought, felt, experienced, did, and said. Obviously, this ambition to equate the historical description of someone's existence with an account of her/his total reality fuses what is commonly believed to be very different perspectives on history. For others, an historical account of someone's existence involves reconstructing everything we can possibly know about her/him by using the tools of modern historical research.<sup>3</sup> The claim that someone existed in history is based on what is perceived as the scientific enterprise of historical reconstruction.

What do we mean by such labels as historical research and historical reconstruction? Are the two perspectives mentioned above strictly distinguishable? It depends on how we approach history. The scholarly use of terms such as historicity and history is often unclear. Tom Wright distinguishes five ways of employing the term history: (1) it is an event (what really happened); (2) it is a significant event ("geschichtlich," not "historisch"); (3) it is a provable event (what may have happened); (4) it is historiography (writing and speaking about the past); (5) or it is that which can be stated by a modern historian (combination of 3 and 4).<sup>4</sup> The term is perhaps most commonly understood in reference to the verifiable past existence of certain phenomena in the causality of time and space (Wright's no. 3). Having proved scientifically that something really happened or that someone really existed is, in effect, to have claimed the historicity of that event or person. This excludes, in principle, from the category of the "historical" matters which are not verifiable. Implicit in this notion of history is the idea of reality as a closed system in which causes and effects can be measured and, more vaguely, the conviction that scientific verification provides the phenomena with a kind of reality irrespective of other contextual factors influencing the way we perceive and make use of them. We are dealing with the ambition to find out objectively and solely the “brute facts” of history.<sup>5</sup>

---

<sup>3</sup> Cf. John P. Meier's distinction between the real Jesus and the historical Jesus in A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 1: The Roots of the Problem and the Person, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 21–24.

<sup>4</sup> Nicholas Thomas Wright, The Resurrection of the Son of God, Christian Origins and the Question of God 3 (London: SPCK, 2003), 12–14.

This is a modern understanding of history, strongly influenced by the idealistic views of the leading European historians of the 19th and early 20th centuries.<sup>6</sup> In more recent times there has emerged an increasing awareness that historical facts do not exist in abstraction from interpretation but are available as language-bound perceptions of reality and that the scientist concerned with what went before participates in the same structure of being as the one which is the basis for her/his entire understanding of the past.<sup>7</sup> This new hermeneutical attentiveness is, to a significant extent, reminiscent of the ancient Greek historia as investigation and interpretation in conjunction.<sup>8</sup> Some post-modern scholars would draw the conclusion that the pastness of history is for ever lost in the contextualized arena of fiction and subjectivity, and objectively irretrievable. A more modest position would be to argue that history exists as a relation between the past and the present.<sup>9</sup> It is

---

<sup>5</sup> The discussion about the “James ossuary” has revealed the strong desire among biblical scholars for the “brute facts” of history. The enormous interest which it has aroused is a curious scholarly phenomenon in itself, since it brings no new historical insights. The conclusion that can be drawn today with some degree of scientific certainty is that archaeology, palaeography, linguistics, and onomastics provide a number of possibilities within a century at least. For a cautious assessment, cf. Émile Puech, “James the Just, or Just James? The ‘James Ossuary’ on Trial,” Bulletin of the Anglo-Israel Archaeological Society 21 (2003): 45–53.

<sup>6</sup> Cf. the famous though rather time-conditioned and old German expression formulated by Leopold von Ranke: “Man hat der Historie das Amt, die Vergangenheit zu richten, die Mitwelt zum Nutzen zukünftiger Jahre zu belehren, beigemessen: so hoher Aemter unterwindet sich gegenwärtiger Versuch nicht: er will bloss zeigen, wie es eigentlich gewesen ist” (Geschichten der romanischen und germanischen Völker von 1494 bis 1514, Leopold von Ranke’s sämtliche Werke 33; 2nd ed.; [Leipzig: von Duncker & Humblot, 1874], vii. The first edition appeared in 1824).

<sup>7</sup> Cf. the ground-breaking philosophical hermeneutics of Hans Georg Gadamer, Wahrheit und Methode: Grundzüge einer philosophischen Hermeneutik, Gesammelte Werke I: Hermeneutik I; 6th ed. (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1990). Although Gadamer’s view has been seen as an exaggerated belief in hermeneutical understanding as a universal phenomenon and he has been accused of neglecting the problem of distorted communication, the present hermeneutical debate is heavily indebted to his work.

<sup>8</sup> Cf. Samuel Byrskog, Story as History—History as Story: The Gospel Tradition in the Context of Ancient Oral History, WUNT 123 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000, 2001, and Leiden: Brill, 2003), 145–198.

<sup>9</sup> I have developed this discussion in “Exegetisk teologi vid en teologisk högskola: Reflektioner kring bibelvetenskapens uppgift vid en teologisk högskola,” Tro & Liv 62 (2003): 10–14; and in “Räisänen through Theissen: A Program and a Theory,” in Moving Beyond New Testament Theology? Essays in Conversation with Heikki Räisänen, ed. Todd Penner and Caroline Vander Stichele, Publications of the Finnish Exegetical Society 88 (Helsinki: Finnish Exegetical Society, and Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & not constituted by the facts of past existence, but by the inquirer's informed perception of them on the basis of certain data. This position does not deny the possibility of knowing that something or somebody existed. It seeks to avoid the epistemological naïveté of historical positivism and the absolute relativism of post-modernism, seeking a critical realism that holds on to the idea that the reality of the thing known is something other than the knower (it is real) and yet that our access to this reality lies along the path of an investigational dialogue between the experience, understanding, judgment, and belief of the scientist and the various kinds of data about the past (it is critical).<sup>10</sup>

The issue of the historicity of Jesus thus takes on a somewhat different nuance. To be sure, the third quest has been said to be a historical one.<sup>11</sup> It employs to a larger extent than before social data and sociological tools in order to place Jesus within his socio-cultural context. We certainly seek the Jesus of history by employing the methods of historical study; and today, theology mostly plays only an implicit rather than an explicit role. This search, however, means essentially entering into a relationship with the pastness of Jesus. We have our own master narratives which we apply to the old material—whether we admit it or not—and we have our own analytical perspectives which present conceptual avenues to his socio-cultural context.<sup>12</sup> We approach him from the viewpoint of the contextualized researcher and cannot but look into the otherness of his existence in history by means of analogies to our

---

Ruprecht, 2005), 197–220, and in “När gamla texter talar: Om att tolka det Jörgångna,” Svensk Teologisk Kvartalskrikt 84 (2008): 49–57.

<sup>10</sup> I allude here to the similar expression of Nicholas Thomas Wright, The New Testament and the People of God, Christian Origins and the Question of God 1 (London: SPCK, 1992), 35. Cf. for fuller discussion, ibid., 81–98. The “critical realism” was introduced into New Testament study by Ben F. Meyer, Critical Realism and the New Testament, Princeton Theological Monographs 17 (Allison Park: Pickwick, 1989); idem, Reality and Illusion in New Testament Scholarship: A Primer in Critical Realist Hermeneutics (Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1994). Meyer builds on the work of Bernard J. F. Lonergan. See Lonergan, Method in Theology (New York: Herder and Herder, 1972); idem, Collection: Papers by Bernard Lonergan, 2nd ed. by F. E. Crowe (Toronto: University of Toronto, 1988).

<sup>11</sup> So, for instance, Stephen Neill and Tom Wright, The Interpretation of the New Testament 1861–1986, 2nd ed. (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988), 379.

<sup>12</sup> Cf. Halvor Moxnes, “The Historical Jesus: From Master Narrative to Cultural Context,” BTB 28 (1998): 135–49. Moxnes distinguishes between grand narrative as the story of all humanity and master narratives (or meta-narratives) as the stories of groups or regions.

own present situation.<sup>13</sup> The past can be known only in relation to what we already know, both in terms of its similarities and its distinctiveness.<sup>14</sup> The basis of our knowledge of the historical Jesus is therefore contextual, not of course in the sense that we speculate freely, but in the sense that the documents which we scrutinize are the object of our own set of parameters concerning how to find the adequate data and scientifically determine the probability of his historicity. What comes out at the end is a reconstruction of history, to be sure, but a reconstruction which is essentially an informed kind of reconfiguration, fictionalization, and narrativization of somebody we believe existed in the past. This, it seems, is what we do when speaking of the historicity of Jesus.

2. Texts as Sources

We claim to know that Jesus existed because certain texts which we classify as sources say so. Scientific knowledge in historical study builds on a disciplined use of such sources. We put questions to them and seek answers from them.<sup>15</sup> It is essential, however, to realize that the sources are not sources per se. They become sources in the hands of the historians. We experiment with them, turning them into something

---

<sup>13</sup> It was Ernst Troeltsch (1865–1923) who drew attention to the three important characteristics of historical inquiry in theology: probability, analogy, and correlation (“Wechselwirkung”). See his “Ueber historische und dogmatische Methode in der Theologie,” in Gesammelte Schriften, 2: Zur religiösen Lage, Religionsphilosophie und Ethik (Tübingen: Mohr, 1913), 729–753.

<sup>14</sup> Troeltsch writes: “Diese Allmacht der Analogie schließt aber die prinzipielle Gleichartigkeit alles historischen Geschehens ein, die freilich keine Gleichheit ist, sondern den Unterschieden allen möglichen Raum lässt, im übrigen aber jedes Mal einen Kern gemeinsamer Gleichartigkeit voraussetzt, von dem aus die Unterschiede begriffen und nachgeföhlt werden können” (“Ueber historische und dogmatische Methode,” 732).

<sup>15</sup> Tom Wright formulates five questions that all historians interested in the historical Jesus must answer: (1) How does Jesus fit into Judaism? (2) What were his aims? (3) Why did he die? (4) How and why did the early Church begin? (5) Why are the Gospels what they are? (Jesus and the Victory of God, Christian Origins and the Question of God 2 [London: SPCK, 1996], 89–116). He adds a sixth question: How does the Jesus we discover relate to the contemporary Church and world? (ibid., 117–121). Only Wright’s fifth question, which he discusses very briefly, deals separately with the sources, and then only with the gospels. Cf. more pointedly Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, “Der umstrittene historische Jesus: Oder: Wie historisch ist der historische Jesus?” in Jesus als historische Gestalt: Beiträge zur Jesusforschung. Zum 60. Geburtstag von Gerd Theissen, ed. A. Merz, FRLANT 202 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2003), 3–32, at 3–7. For them, the first question to be asked is how dependable the sources are.

which they were not from the beginning. The scholars involved in Jesus research use ancient documents as sources for historical reconstruction, while these documents intrinsically exhibit other primary characteristics than that of reporting about the past.

The sources are, to begin with, textual. We have almost no archaeological evidence mentioning Jesus. Furthermore, the texts are mostly literary writings. The epigraphical findings are few and indirect. The writings, moreover, are biased. Like all literature in antiquity, the writings which mention Jesus as an historical figure are ideologically loaded already from the horizon of the author(s). This holds true both of Christian and of non-Christian writings.

A literary text can be many things. In antiquity the text was not such a fixed entity as it is in modern times, sometimes being no more than an aid for what one was to know by heart.<sup>16</sup> The message could also be conveyed in purely oral form. Several people preferred this form of communication as a reliable and realistic mode of conveying things from past. When Papias is said to have favored things of the living and enduring voice to things from books in order to find out what the disciples of Jesus had said (Eus., Hist. eccl. 3.39.2–4), he reflects a common notion that written material cannot convey the same kind of vivid and sensitive account of the past that the oral medium provides.<sup>17</sup>

Modern research has no direct access to the oral messages, but it can reconstruct them through the available documents. Writings from ancient times are not entities unto themselves. They are fragments of a larger setting which influenced their meaning and significance. As texts they carry an oral dimension, since they are composed and performed by word of mouth. The text, although written down, was an “oral text.” It was essentially a web (cf. Latin texere) of ideological meanings and meaning effects conveyed orally.<sup>18</sup> Its “diachronic threads”

---

<sup>16</sup> The classic text for this notion is Plato, Phaedrus 274c–277a. For a broader discussion, see Dorothea Frede, “Mündlichkeit und Schriftlichkeit: von Platon zu Plotin,” in Logos und Buchstabe: Mündlichkeit und Schriftlichkeit im Judentum und Christentum der Antike, ed. Gerhard Sellin and François Vouga, TANZ 20 (Tübingen: Francke Verlag, 1997), 33–54.

<sup>17</sup> Byrskog, Story as History, 244–245.

<sup>18</sup> Samuel Byrskog, “History or Story in Acts—A Middle Way? The ‘We’ Passages, Historical Intertexture, and Oral History,” in Contextualizing Acts: Lukan Narrative and Greco-Roman Discourse, ed. Todd Penner and Caroline Vander Stichele, SBL Symposium Series 20 (Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2003), 257–283.

therefore have to be singled out before it can be used as a source.<sup>19</sup> In order to faithfully reconstruct and reconfigure the history behind this kind of textual writings and determine the historicity of Jesus, we pose questions concerning their reliability, sifting through their literary and ideological contextuality with the aim of moving into the realm of the extra-textual, diachronic reality. In this process, we inquire into the genre, date, location, and dependence of the writings, before asking about their referential character in regard to the historical Jesus.

3. The Letters of Paul

The earliest extant sources to Jesus are the letters of Paul.<sup>20</sup> Most scholars agree that he dictated at least seven of them during a period of approximately one decade, starting with 1 Thessalonians or Galatians at the end of the 40's.<sup>21</sup> As letters they exhibit rhetorical and ideological agendas which are far different from the one of reporting that Jesus existed. Many scholars therefore disregard them entirely as sources for the historical Jesus. Nevertheless, it is possible to approach them with another set of questions. There are basically three ways of using them as sources for the historical of Jesus.

The first way argues that the letters presuppose that Jesus existed in history and that this in itself is an indication of his historicity. Paul's career, writings, and theology are incomprehensible without the assumption that Jesus had in fact lived and died a few years earlier. When Paul claims that he no longer knows Christ "according to the flesh" (2 Cor 5:16), he is not describing his ignorance of the earthly Jesus but his failure to recognize the crucified Jesus as the Messiah. He knows that he has seen the Lord (1 Cor 9:1; 15:8; Gal 1:16) and would insist that

---

<sup>19</sup> Cf. Vernon K. Robbins' basic insight that the text is a web in his book The Tapestry of Early Christian Discourse: Rhetoric, society and ideology (London: Routledge, 1996), 18. For the ancient Greek and Roman background of this metaphor, see John Scheid and Jesper Svenbro, The Craft of Zeus: Myths of Weaving and Fabric, Revealing Antiquity 9 (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1996).

<sup>20</sup> Q is not an extant source. The same holds true for other attempts to reconstruct hypothetical sources from the time before the composition of Paul's letters. See further below.

<sup>21</sup> Cf. the standard New Testament introductions. For the chronology of Paul, see the detailed account by Rainer Riesner, Die Frühzeit des Apostels Paulus: Studien zur Chronologie, Missionsstrategie und Theologie, WUNT 71 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1994).

these intrinsically revelatory appearances are as real and historical as the ordinary observation of other concrete persons and events.

This way of reasoning could be extended to several other writings which in one way or the other presuppose that Jesus existed. It is clearly insufficient. No doubt, Paul's Christ is not a purely mythological figure. He was convinced that Jesus had existed, and that conviction is of historical significance. But it is also biased, being partly an inference from his conviction that Christ is the present Lord. It therefore needs to be supplemented with other considerations.

A second, complementary way of using the Pauline letters as historical sources is to investigate passages where he refers specifically to events in the life of Jesus. His mention of Jesus' death is especially prominent. It is significant in two ways. First, he knows that Jesus died. In 1 Cor 15:3 he claims to have received important information "that Christ died." Paul was converted ca. two years after this event and probably received at that time the tradition to which he refers.<sup>22</sup> His reference constitutes in that case the earliest extant documentation of Jesus' death. Secondly, he knew that Jesus died by crucifixion. Since the notion of a crucified Messiah was totally foreign to Jewish expectations, it was hardly invented in order to fit his cross theology. Rather, his theology is comprehensible only as an attempt to consistently relate his vision of the risen Lord to the paradoxical information that Jesus died on the shameful cross.<sup>23</sup>

In addition, he knew that Jesus was a Jew (Gal 4:4), that he was of Davidic lineage (Rom 1:3), and that he had brothers, one of whom was called James (1 Cor 9:5; Gal 1:19). There is reason to believe that he actually met James in Jerusalem a few years after his conversion. He also describes Jesus' character. Jesus did not please himself (Rom 15:3); he showed meekness and gentleness (2 Cor 10:1) and compassion (Phil 1:8).<sup>24</sup> It is however impossible to verify these characteristics as historical information. They might simply be part of Paul's own interpretation of Jesus' death.

---

<sup>22</sup> Riesner estimates that Jesus died on April 7 in the year 30 and that Paul was converted in 31/32 (Die Frühzeit, 63).

<sup>23</sup> For the importance of the Damascus experience, see Christian Dietzfelbinger, Die Berufung des Paulus als Ursprung seiner Theologie, WMANT 58 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1985); Seyoon Kim, Paul and the New Perspective: Second Thoughts on the Origin of Paul's Gospel, WUNT 140 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2002).

<sup>24</sup> For a more extensive list, cf. Paul W. Barnett, Jesus and the Logic of History, New Studies in Biblical Theology 3 (Nottingham: Apollos, 1997), 57–58.

A third way of employing Paul's letters as sources is to identify his use of Jesus tradition.<sup>25</sup> We have already noticed his reference to tradition in 1 Cor 15:3. This is a tradition about Jesus, and there is reason to trust it historically, but Paul does not identify it as Jesus tradition. In fact, he does so only on three or four occasions, in 1 Cor 7:10–11; 9:14; 11:23–25; and possibly 1 Thess 4:15–17.<sup>26</sup> On all three or four occasions he attributes the tradition directly to the Lord, and this raises the question whether he in fact thought of it as a personal revelation. At least 1 Cor 11:23–25 does not warrant this conclusion. Paul uses technical terminology for receiving and passing on tradition and formulates in a way that is strikingly reminiscent of what is known as Jesus tradition in Luke 22:19–20. His reference to tradition at this point is significant, because it places the words of Jesus within a small narrative context. As is well known, there are two different strands of the tradition concerning the Lord's Supper, the other one being recorded in Mark 14:22–24/Matt 26:26–28, but it seems historically reasonable to assume that Paul gives testimony to an early conviction that Jesus had celebrated a particularly important evening meal together with his disciples towards the end of his life.

Although it is circumstantially probable that Paul knew about the ministry of Jesus,<sup>27</sup> his use of the Jesus tradition is difficult to employ in any more extensive way in the search for the historical Jesus. His implicit reference to it on several occasions is perhaps an indication that he had come to realize that the risen Lord appeared in history as a divinely commissioned teacher. This is a common characteristic of Jesus in the gospels.<sup>28</sup> To be sure, Paul never speaks directly of him as a teacher, since he is more focused on the crucified and risen Lord. Nevertheless, Rom 6:17 could be interpreted as evidence that he regarded him as someone who provided a pattern of ethical instruction for his followers, as teachers normally should do. This interpretation

---

<sup>25</sup> The literature on this topic is vast. For a broader monograph on the question of Paul and Jesus, cf. David Wenham, Paul: Follower of Jesus or Founder of Christianity? (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1995).

<sup>26</sup> The phrase ἐν λόγῳ κυρίου in 1 Thess 4:15 would be an unusual citation formula.

<sup>27</sup> The fact that Paul in his letters never identifies a tradition as coming from Jesus and only occasionally as coming from the Lord is no argument against this. See James D. G. Dunn, The Theology of Paul the Apostle (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1998), 185–195, 651–658.

<sup>28</sup> See, for instance, my article "Das Lernen der Jesusgeschichte nach den synoptischen Evangelien," in Religiöses Lernen in der biblischen, frühjüdischen und frühchristlichen Überlieferung, ed. Beate Ego and Helmut Merkel, WUNT 180 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2005), 191–209.

acquires added significance from the fact that Paul seems to allude to Jesus' teaching on several occasions in his paraenesis.<sup>29</sup> It is likely that he also was concerned to assure the proper care of that teaching and tradition in the churches which he founded.<sup>30</sup>

4. The Gospels and their Interdependence

The gospels are the earliest extant narratives of Jesus' life and bear the characteristics of the flexible ancient bios.<sup>31</sup> Their dating is difficult to estimate precisely, but most scholars opt for the latter half of the first century CE, the earliest one being composed shortly before or after 70.<sup>32</sup> The issue where and for whom they were written remains largely unresolved. If the intended audience was a much wider one than the local community,<sup>33</sup> they are communicatively more open than is often assumed.

In order to employ these bioi as sources, we cannot escape posing the question of dependence. The gospels might depend on each other

---

<sup>29</sup> Most striking are the similarities between Rom 12:14 and Matt 5:44/Luke 6:27–28; Rom 12:17 and Matt 5:39–42/Luke 6:29–30; Rom 14:14 and Mark 7:15; 1 Thess 5:2, 4 and Matt 24:43/Luke 12:39–40; 1 Thess 5:13 and Mark 9:50; and 1 Thess 5:15 and Matt 5:39–48/Luke 6:27–38. See further Dale C. Allison, Jr, "The Pauline Epistles and the Synoptic Gospels: The Pattern of the Parallels," NTS 29 (1982): 1–32.

<sup>30</sup> Heinz Schürmann, "... und Lehrer". Die geistliche Eigenart des Lehrdienstes und sein Verhältnis zu anderen geistlichen Diensten im neutestamentlichen Zeitalter," in Orientierungen am Neuen Testament: Exegetische Gesprächsbeiträge, Kommentare und Beiträge zum Alten und Neuen Testament (Düsseldorf: Patmos-Verlag, 1978), 116–156; Alfred F. Zimmermann, Die urchristlichen Lehrer: Studien zum Tradentenkreis der διδάσκαλοι im frühen Urchristentum, WUNT 2.12, 2nd ed. (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1988).

<sup>31</sup> Dirk Frickenschmidt, Evangelium als Biographie: Die vier Evangelien im Rahmen antiker Erzählkunst, TANZ 22 (Tübingen: Francke Verlag, 1997); Richard A. Burridge, What are the Gospels? A Comparison with Graeco-Roman Biography, 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2004).

<sup>32</sup> For the most thorough attempt to place all the New Testament writings before 70 CE, cf. John A. T. Robinson, Redating the New Testament (London: SCM, 1976).

<sup>33</sup> So the contributions in The Gospels for All Christians: Rethinking the Gospel Audience, ed. Richard Bauckham, (Edinburgh: Clark, 1998). For a survey of the debate, see Edward W. Klink, "The Gospel Community Debate: State of the Question," CBR 3 (2004): 60–85. Margaret M. Mitchell's discussion mentioned by Klink is now published: "Patristic Counter-Evidence to the Claim that 'The Gospels Were Written for All Christians'," NTS 51 (2005): 36–79. I have addressed the related issue of the use and misuse of the form-critical category of the Sitz im Leben in "A Century with the Sitz im Leben: From Form-Critical Setting to Gospel Community and Beyond," ZNW 98 (2007): 1–27.

and on tradition not available to us. As is well known, the synoptic gospels seem too similar to be entirely independent of each other.<sup>34</sup> There is a growing discussion as to how precisely this interdependence is to be accounted for.<sup>35</sup> The situation is today more complex and uncertain than ever.

Scholars interested in using the synoptic gospels as sources for the historical Jesus are forced to take a stand on this issue. While experts in the particular field of research of the synoptic problem debate the matter intensely, in the “third quest” the most common explanation of the data is that Mark was the primary source for both Matthew and Luke. The decisive arguments for Markan priority, it seems, are not the differences in the Triple Tradition (material common to the three synoptics), which admittedly can be explained on the assumption that the author of Mark knew and performed Matthew and Luke, but the internal evidence of the date of the gospels and, more importantly, the absence of material from the Double Tradition (material in Matthew and Luke alone) in Mark.<sup>36</sup> It is, for instance, very difficult to explain convincingly why the author of Mark did not include the Lord’s Prayer had he known about it from Matthew or Luke. It would have fitted in

---

<sup>34</sup> John M. Rist argues that there is no direct literary dependence of one synoptic on another (On the independence of Matthew and Mark, SNTSMS 32 [Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1978]). Most scholars recognize that the large amount of verbal agreement makes this thesis untenable.

<sup>35</sup> There is today a bewildering flora of rejections and modifications of the “Two Source Hypothesis.” The most influential challenge to Markan priority is the “Griesbach Hypothesis” or “Two Gospel Hypothesis” advocated by William R. Farmer, The Synoptic Problem, 2nd ed. (New York: Macmillan, 1976); idem, The Gospel of Jesus: The Pastoral Relevance of the Synoptic Problem (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 1994). For an evaluation, see Christopher M. Tuckett, The Revival of the Griesbach Hypothesis: An Analysis and Appraisal, SNTSMS 44 Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983). A useful collection of essays for and against the “Two-Source Hypothesis” can be found in The Two-Source Hypothesis: A Critical Appraisal, ed. Arthur J. Bellinzoni, Jr., (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1985). Cf. also the “Multiple-Stage Hypothesis” advocated by Pierre Benoit and Marie-Émile Boismard, Synopse des quatre évangiles en français, 2 vols, 2nd ed. (Paris: Cerf, 1972, 1980). This hypothesis has not won much international approval due to its sheer complexity. All three hypotheses are presented and discussed in part 1 of The Interrelations of the Gospels: A Symposium led by M.-É. Boismard—W. R. Farmer—F. Neiryck, ed. David L. Dungan, BETL 95 (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1990), 3–288.

<sup>36</sup> For further arguments based on Christological development, see Peter M. Head, Christology and the Synoptic Problem: An Argument for Markan Priority, SNTSMS 94 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997).

perfectly well after his account of the withered fig tree and Jesus' teaching on prayer in 11:20–25.

The minor agreements between Matthew and Luke in material which is recorded in Mark, as well as the inexplicable omission of some Markan material in Matthew and Luke (e.g., Mark 4:26–29; 12:32–34; 15:44), give reason for some modification of the simple notion of Markan priority. To several scholars these observations suggest that the author of Matthew and Luke used a somewhat different version of Mark than the one included in the canon—an earlier one (“Ur-Markus”) or a later one (“Deutero-Markus”).<sup>37</sup> This is a plausible inference. As noted above, written texts were often somewhat instable and orally modified in antiquity.

An even more open issue is the relationship between Matthew and Luke. Luke claims to have known other (written) accounts of the Jesus event (Luke 1:1) and the possibility exists that one of these accounts was the Gospel of Matthew.<sup>38</sup> Scholars in “the third quest” rarely take this option seriously but mostly work on the assumption that the author of Matthew and Luke drew independently from a lost Greek source, Q. Here the situation is hopelessly uncertain. While Q remains a hypothetical source which is very difficult to reconstruct with a sufficient amount of probability, the assumption that the author of Luke used Matthew faces equally serious difficulties in explaining why Luke shows so little awareness of Matthew's additions to Mark in Markan material and of his birth narrative.<sup>39</sup>

---

<sup>37</sup> For discussion, cf. Frans Neiryneck, ed., The Minor Agreements of Matthew and Luke against Mark with a Cumulative List, BETL 37 (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1974); Georg Strecker, ed., Minor Agreements: Symposium Göttingen 1991 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1993); Andreas Ennulat, Die „minor agreements“: Untersuchungen zu einer offenen Frage des synoptischen Problems, WUNT 2.62 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1994); Frans Neiryneck, “Goulder and the Minor Agreements,” ETL 73 (1997): 84–93.

<sup>38</sup> This is the so-called “Farrer Theory” introduced by Austin M. Farrer, “On Dispensing with Q,” in Studies in the Gospels: Essays in Memory of R. H. Lightfoot, ed. Dennis E. Nineham, (Oxford: Blackwell, 1955), 55–88. Cf. also Michael D. Goulder, Midrash and Lection in Matthew (London: SPCK, 1974). For a defence of this theory, cf. Mark Goodacre, The Case Against Q: Studies in Markan Priority and the Synoptic Problem (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press, 2002). Goodacre, a former student of Goulder, builds on previous studies of his.

<sup>39</sup> For an attempt to explain these obstacles to the theory, cf. Mark Goodacre, The Synoptic Problem: A Way Through the Maze, The Biblical Seminar 80 (London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001), 128–133.

The Gospel of John, probably the latest of the four, includes narratives and sayings material which exhibit both similarities and dissimilarities to the extant versions of the synoptic gospels. It must be admitted that these features are open to different explanations. Again, no scholarly consensus has emerged. They suggest either that the author made his mosaic story on the basis of written copies of one or several of the synoptics, or that he based his story on his own reminiscences of one or several of them, or that he employed traditions independent of them all.<sup>40</sup> The increasing recognition that the gospel tradition was orally transmitted and performed could give support to the old notion that the author knew of oral versions that differed from the wording of the synoptics,<sup>41</sup> but it is difficult to determine whether these differences emerged in his own immediate setting as one or several gospels were re-oralized in performance or elsewhere.

5. The Gospels and the Gospel Tradition

Not only is the interdependence of the gospels important for determining the historicity of Jesus, but also their dependence on previously formulated material. The distinctive character which sets the gospels apart from other Greek and Roman literature of the same biographical character is the extent to which they build on oral and written tradition. It is as if the authors were concerned not to be confused with contemporary abuses of encomiastic rhetorical writing.<sup>42</sup> At a synchronous hearing/reading of them this feature is not immediately evident. A closer examination of the material indicates however that they depended on material that had been previously formulated orally and in writing. The author of Luke admits explicitly that he is building on tradition (Luke 1:2). It is also of no little significance that the authors

---

<sup>40</sup> For a survey of the debate, see D. Moody Smith, John among the Gospels: The Relationship in Twentieth-Century Research (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1992).

<sup>41</sup> See the standard work of Charles H. Dodd, Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1963). Dodd's view is followed up by James D. G. Dunn, "John and the Oral Gospel Tradition," in Jesus and the Oral Gospel Tradition, ed. Henry Wansbrough, JSNTSup 64 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1991), 351–379.

<sup>42</sup> See my article "Performing the Past: Gospel Genre and Identity Formation in the Context of Ancient History Writing," in History and Exegesis: New Testament Essays in Honor of Dr. E. Earle Ellis for His Eightieth Birthday, ed. Sang-Won Son, (New York: Clark, 2006), 28–44.

of Matthew and Luke both preferred to use the rather scanty Markan account as the master narrative of their own stories.

It becomes more problematic when the tradition no longer exists. Granted the likelihood that also the earliest Gospel depends on tradition, the scientific claim that Jesus existed needs to determine where and in what way it is diachronically founded. The early form critics—Karl Ludwig Schmidt, Rudolf Bultmann and Martin Dibelius—were convinced that the author of Mark, while being innovative in his creation of the gospel genre, employed oral and written traditions tied together by common forms, themes, and words and a connected story of Jesus' suffering and death.<sup>43</sup> It is difficult to verify this position and identify precisely the traditional units with a sufficient amount of credibility.<sup>44</sup> The present state of research shows that the form-critical criteria no longer hold water and the more recent redaction-critical way of reasoning tends to become too static and circular.<sup>45</sup>

Yet the view that the author of Mark made no or very little use of tradition is equally speculative. Even those scholars who ascribe the connected passion narrative to the author of Mark detect various strands of pre-Markan material.<sup>46</sup> It would be utterly surprising if no reports concerning Jesus' passion existed before Mark. The basic reason for assuming the existence of pre-Markan tradition—probably in some

---

<sup>43</sup> Karl Ludwig Schmidt, Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu: Literarkritische Untersuchungen zur ältesten Jesusüberlieferung (Berlin: Trowitzsch und Sohn, 1919); Rudolf Bultmann, Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition, 2nd ed., FRLANT 29 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1931); Martin Dibelius, Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums, 2nd ed. (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1933).

<sup>44</sup> For a form-critical attempt to do so, though with rather meagre results, cf. Heinz-Wolfgang Kuhn, Ältere Sammlungen im Markusevangelium, SUNT 8 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1971). For a survey of research, see William R. Telford, "The Pre-Markan Tradition in Recent Research (1980–1990)," in The Four Gospels 1992: Festschrift Frans Neirynck, ed. Frans van Segbroeck, Christopher M. Tuckett, Gilbert van Belle, and Joseph Verheyden, vol. 2, BETL 100 (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1992), 693–723.

<sup>45</sup> For an evaluation of the early form-critical approach, see my review essay of Rudolf Bultmann, The History of the Synoptic Tradition, JBL 122 (2003): 549–555.

<sup>46</sup> Cf. Eta Linnemann, Studien zur Passionsgeschichte, FRLANT 102 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1970); Werner H. Kelber, ed., The Passion in Mark (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1976); George W. E. Nickelsburg, "The Genre and Function of the Markan Passion Narrative," HTR 73 (1980): 153–184; Burton L. Mack, A Myth of Innocence: Mark and Christian Origins (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1988), 247–312; Werner H. Kelber, The Oral and the Written Gospel: The Hermeneutics of Speaking and Writing in the Synoptic Tradition, Mark, Paul, and Q, with a new introduction by the author, Voices in Performance and Text (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997), 184–199.

varying format due to its oral performances—is Paul’s quotation of and allusions to traditional formulations related to the Lord’s Supper (1 Cor 10:16–17; 11:23–25) and the handing over (παραδιδόναι) of Jesus to a shameful death by crucifixion (Rom 4:25; 8:32; 1 Cor 11:23; Gal 2:20). Paul would hardly have been able to refer to “the night in which he was handed over” (1 Cor 11:23) had he not heard about significant episodes of Jesus’ passion. In addition, it is indeed noteworthy that the author of Mark at this point arranges the material according to a more coherent narrative framework than previously in the Gospel.<sup>47</sup> To be sure, the detailed work on identifying the source and tracing its development has not reached a scholarly consensus, but this in itself points perhaps to a somewhat flexible tradition with significant interaction between written and orally performed material.<sup>48</sup>

It is difficult to verify the existence of other pre-Markan material. Those scholars who detect collections of miracle stories, a synoptic apocalypse, disputations, didactic sayings, and parables on a pre-Markan level inevitably have to work with a large amount of uncertainty. One way to anchor this kind of analysis in a frame that is external to the circular reasoning of much redaction-critical work is to take seriously Papias’ note quoted by Eusebius that Mark wrote down from memory what he had heard from Peter (Hist. eccl. 3.39.15). In antiquity it was common procedure to refer to an eyewitness when trying to truthfully and persuasively communicate to others about essential events from the past.<sup>49</sup> Scholars are divided as to the usefulness of Papias’ piece of information. Once accepted as generally trustworthy and put into a broader socio-cultural framework of ancient historical inquiry, it moves the Gospel of Mark significantly closer to the historical Jesus, without <sup>47</sup> For further discussion, see Raymond E. Brown, The Death of the Messiah: From Gethsemane to the Grave. A Commentary on the Passion Narratives in the Four Gospels 2 vols, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1994). Cf. also Joel B. Green, The Death of Jesus: Tradition and Interpretation in the Passion Narrative, WUNT 2.33 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1988); Wolfgang Reinbold, Der älteste Bericht über den Tod Jesu: Literarische Analyse und historische Kritik der Passionsdarstellungen der Evangelien, BZNW 69 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1994).

---

<sup>48</sup> For an emphasis on Mark’s dependence on orally performed material, cf. Whitney T. Shiner, Proclaiming the Gospel: First-Century Performance of Mark (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press, 2003).

<sup>49</sup> Byrskog, Story as History, 272–292.

neglecting the fact that the author was indeed an interpreter of individual chreiai and a creative story teller.<sup>50</sup>

Some scholars would regard Q as the most important source for reconstructing the teaching of the historical Jesus.<sup>51</sup> By far the most common explanation for the texts—predominantly logia—which Matthew and Luke have in common in addition to their Markan material is the existence of this source. Assuming that they composed their Gospels independently of each other, they must have employed another Greek source, which perhaps was available in somewhat different recensions.<sup>52</sup> Scholars disagree on the date and place for its composition. One influential hypothesis is to date its final redaction to the first Jewish revolt or just after,<sup>53</sup> though some prefer an even earlier date due to alleged allusions to “sign prophets” and to Caligula’s attempt in 39/40 to set up an effigy of himself in the Jerusalem Temple.<sup>54</sup> Most advocates of this hypothesis agree that it was composed somewhere in Palestine, possibly in Galilee,<sup>55</sup> and cherished by a community.

Strictly speaking, Q is part of the hypothetical reconstruction of the historical Jesus, not an extant source. The process of reconstruction does not begin with Q, as is often implicitly assumed, but with the extant sources. One of the major problems with Q in Jesus research is that the tentative proposal as to its existence and outlook quickly turns into an established truth and thus tends to blind scholars to the fact that they introduce an entirely hypothetical element into the fundamental basis for the reconstruction of the historical Jesus. The evidence is too ambiguous to warrant unqualified assertions of scientific progress

---

<sup>50</sup> See Samuel Byrskog, “The Early Church as a Narrative Fellowship: An Exploratory Study of the Performance of the Chreia,” Tidsskrift for Teologi of Kirke 78 (2007): 207–226.

<sup>51</sup> So Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, Der historische Jesus: Ein Lehrbuch, 3rd ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2001), 45.

<sup>52</sup> The standard edition is now James M. Robinson, Paul Hoffmann, and John S. Kloppenborg, eds., The Critical Edition of Q: Synopsis including the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, Mark and Thomas with English, German, and French translations of Q and Thomas, Hermeneia (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, and Leuven: Peeters, 2000).

<sup>53</sup> John S. Kloppenborg, Excavating Q: The History and Setting of the Sayings Gospel (Edinburgh: Clark, 2000).

<sup>54</sup> For discussion, cf. Dale C. Allison, Jr., The Jesus Tradition in Q (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press, 1997), 49–54.

<sup>55</sup> But cf. Marco Frenschkowski, “Galiläa oder Jerusalem? Die topographischen und politischen Hintergründe der Logienquelle,” in The Sayings Source Q and the Historical Jesus, ed. Andreas Lindemann, BETL 158 (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 2001), 535–559.

in this respect.<sup>56</sup> All we know is that Matthew and Luke have a large amount of sayings material in common, which, in view of the difficulties with assuming that Luke employed Matthew, suggests a common core of material. The variation in agreement complicates the picture significantly and supports the hypothesis of a common body of flexible material that could be orally supplemented,<sup>57</sup> rather than a written Q-source corresponding to the history and theology of a specific community at a particular time and place.

The matter is even more uncertain as regards the material peculiar to Matthew and Luke, respectively (“M” and “L”). Because this material is supposed to have been formed by the same people who shaped the gospel narratives, it is extremely difficult to distinguish it from the creative additions of the authors themselves. The vocabulary, style, and ideology of the special material may coincide with those of the authors. Only when secure criteria are established for arguing that it diverges from the authors’ own additions are we in a position to assume that the material actually comes from tradition. Even then, however, scholars face the fact that by definition, this material lacks any close parallels which could secure its traditional character by comparison with an independent source. In view of these caveats, the special material is a minor source for the historical Jesus and must be employed with much caution.

---

<sup>56</sup> Cf. Craig A. Evans, “Authenticating the Words of Jesus,” in Bruce Chilton and Evans, eds., Authenticating the Words of Jesus, NTTTS 28.1 (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 3–14. For a cautious use of Q by an expert in this area of research, see Christopher M. Tuckett, “Q and the Historical Jesus,” in Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. Jens Schröter and Ralph Brucker, BZNW 114 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002), 213–241.

<sup>57</sup> This insight is one of the most important aspects of Dunn’s book on the historical Jesus. See James D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered, Christianity in the Making 1 (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003), 147–160. Dunn has stated his view in several other publications. He could have sharpened his stress on the importance of orality even further. See my comments in “A New Perspective on the Jesus Tradition: Reflections on James D. G. Dunn’s Jesus Remembered,” JSNT 26 (2004): 459–71; and in the updated comments in “A New Perspective on the Jesus Tradition: Reflections on James D. G. Dunn’s Jesus Remembered,” in Memories of Jesus: A Critical Appraisal of James D. G. Dunn’s Quest of the Historical Jesus, ed. Robert B. Stewart and Gary R. Habermas (Nashville: B&H Academic, 2010). Joachim Jeremias, who worked intensely with the historical Jesus, long ago dispensed with a written Q-source in favour of an oral one. See his article “Zur Hypothese einer schriftlichen Logienquelle,” ZNW 29 (1930): 147–149. Jeremias concludes: “Die Hypothese, daß der gesamte gemeinsame Logienstoff des Matthäus und Lukas aus einer gemeinsamen schriftlichen Quelle (Q) stamme, ist nicht zu halten” (ibid., 149). For a recent assessment along these lines, see Birger A. Pearson, “A Q Community in Galilee?” NTS 50 (2004): 476–494.

This uncertainty concerning the special material makes the question of Jesus' historicity somewhat tricky. It not only indicates that a significant and large amount of material included in the gospels can be used as sources for the historical Jesus within the frame of already established patterns of his life, but adds particular insecurity to our knowledge concerning his birth. The two birth narratives are probably independent and belong to the special material, carrying the characteristics of each author's vocabulary, style, and ideology.<sup>58</sup> While we are confident that Jesus did exist, we are more ignorant as to how he historically came into being.

There are two possible ways of introducing complementary considerations which could help to avoid undisciplined speculation. The first and most obvious one is to compare the two independent versions and see where they converge. This is common historical methodology. Both versions testify to the conviction that Jesus' parents were called Joseph and Mary, that he was of Davidic lineage and that he was born to be the son of God. It is then up to each scholar to evaluate the historicity of these core convictions according to the criteria of historical probability. A further consideration is to ask whether the material indicates that it builds on a source close to the event. In the Lukan account Mary figures as a person who kept treasuring all the things concerning Jesus' birth (Luke 2:19, 51). In antiquity it was common procedure to seek out family members for information concerning one or several of their relatives; and Luke can report that Mary was present in the Jerusalem community after the death of her son (Acts 1:14).<sup>59</sup> Of course, no one can deny the formidable literary creativity evident in the Lukan birth narrative, and Matthew contains no such indication, but Mary's peculiar role as an observant eyewitness might still be of circumstantial value as a further source-critical clue.<sup>60</sup>

---

<sup>58</sup> The standard work on this material is Raymond E. Brown, The Birth of the Messiah: A Commentary on the Infancy Narratives in the Gospels of Matthew and Luke (ABRL, 2nd ed. (New York: Doubleday, 1993).

<sup>59</sup> For arguments and literature, see my Story as History, 89–90. It is unfortunate that many considerations of the role of eyewitnesses are labelled apologetic and conservative, even when they recognize and stress the interpretative element in all kinds of visual observation.

<sup>60</sup> For an appreciation of this kind of investigation, see Richard Bauckham, "The Eyewitnesses and the Gospel Traditions," JSHJ 1 (2003): 28–60; idem, Jesus and the Eyewitnesses: The Gospels as Eyewitness Testimony (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2006). Cf. also Bauckham, Gospel Women: Studies of the Named Women in the Gospels (London: Clark, 2002), 257–310. I have indicated the differences between my own and

The Fourth Gospel refers to the implied author as an eyewitness (19:35; 21:24). Although this reference functions primarily as an authorial legitimation which overcomes the distance in the narrative between the present time of the Gospel and the pastness of the Jesus event,<sup>61</sup> it is to be noted that the author elsewhere provides information not included in the other Gospels. Details like “Aenon near Salim” (3:23), “the pool, called in Hebrew Bethzatha, which has five porticoes” (5:2), “the town called Ephraim” (11:54), etc., serve no evident theological purpose and look like historical reminiscences. Similarly, the account of the beginning and length of Jesus’ ministry, the enumeration of his signs, the more frequent visits to Jerusalem, and the chronology of his last week might point to historical information with roots in traditions independent of the synoptics.<sup>62</sup> This does not mean that John can be put on the same level as the other gospels in terms of being a source for the historical Jesus. It is clearly the latest gospel, and there is no way to cross-check the information not included in the other gospels. It testifies to a more developed stage of tradition and reflection. The use of the narratives for symbolic purposes and the theological program of the sayings constitute a much more colourful web and are further advanced than in any of the synoptics. It does not add much to the question how we know that Jesus existed, but implies some data to be considered as possible additional features at different points of his career.

This survey points to Mark as the primary source in historical-Jesus research. It is with this Gospel that the process of reconstruction and scholarly reconfiguration of the historical Jesus begins. His existence is attested also in other sources, but as the earliest extant account of his life, its traditions are of essential significance for locating him more precisely in time and place. The other gospels are brought in as a means to cross-check the information from material dependent on or independent of Mark, and complement the picture at certain points. To be

---

Bauckham’s approach in two articles. See “The Eyewitnesses as Interpreters of the Past,” JSHJ 6 (2008): 157–168, and “A ‘Truer’ History: Reflections on Richard Bauckham, Jesus and the Eyewitness: The Gospels as Eyewitness Testimony,” Nova et Vetera 8 (2008): 483–490.

<sup>61</sup> Byrskog, Story as History, 235–238.

<sup>62</sup> Cf. Francis J. Moloney, “The Fourth Gospel and the Jesus of History,” NTS 46 (2000): 42–58, who focuses on Jesus’ relationship with John the Baptist (John 1:19–28, 29–34; 3:22–30), the calling of disciples (1:35–51), and the so-called purification of the Temple (2:13–22).

sure, the complex state of research challenges the scholar to repeatedly ask if the reconstruction would look different from the perspective of an alternative hypothesis concerning the dependence of the gospels. In the end, however, scientific work often has to be content with the conceptual frames established on the basis of very fragmentary information.

6. The Historical Jesus Beyond the Gospels

Moving beyond the gospels to other parts of the canon and Christian writings, we detect almost no further information of significance. We know of no important events in Jesus' life that have been recorded elsewhere in the canon but not in the gospels. Jesus' sayings have entered into various strands of the New Testament, but almost all of them have been recorded in one form or the other in the gospels. The (mostly) implicit Jesus tradition in the letters of Paul is the earliest data and as such of importance, as we have seen, but it does not yield additional information concerning the Jesus of history besides what is to be found in the gospels. Likewise, the Jesus tradition in James, 1 Peter, and other New Testament writings, while occasionally perhaps reflecting earlier stages of the tradition than the one in the gospels, merely includes sayings which are to be found also in one or several of the gospels. In fact, they can be defined as Jesus tradition only because they have parallels in the gospels. In Acts 20:35 Paul quotes "words of the Lord Jesus" which are not included in the gospels, but this is a rare exception and at odds with the fact that Paul never directly quotes Jesus in his letters.<sup>63</sup> Otherwise, such events and sayings, which are not many, have entered into variant readings of the gospels. The vast majority of them are secondary, the account of Jesus' encounter with a man working on the Sabbath in Codex D (5th cent.) to Luke 6:5 being the only instance which might reflect an early tradition.

By the same token, additional narratives and sayings of Jesus in early tradition independent of the gospel tradition are rare in Christian writings outside the canon. We are on secure ground when assuming a rather small number of unknown sayings whose authenticity admits of serious consideration. In addition to the textual variant to Luke 6:5 mentioned above, critical scholarship has reduced the number to eight further instances. Five of these might depend on earlier tradition, leaving only four sayings which possibly reflect independent and otherwise unknown sayings from the historical Jesus.<sup>64</sup> Even if we would adopt less strict criteria for identifying such agrapha, their number is strikingly small considering the large amount of Christian literature of the time. Nor do they add much to the overall picture of Jesus.

---

<sup>63</sup> The saying seems to be a Greek aphorism with a slight Christian touch. Cf., for instance, Thucydides, 2.97.4 (attributing it to the Persians); Plutarch, Mor. 173d. 1 Thess 4:15–17 is sometimes thought to include an early apocryphon, but it is not evident that Paul is here actually quoting anything at all.

It should be noted that recent scholarship is divided on whether additional material of significance is to be found in extra-canonical Christian literature.<sup>65</sup> Among the references mentioned in this discussion are the documents picturing Jesus in dialogue with different persons (the Dialogue of the Saviour, the Apocryphon of James), the two fragments indicating Jesus' discussion about the Law and the tax, the unsuccessful stoning of him, and some miracles (Papyrus Egerton 2), the extracts of a secret gospel mentioning the raising of a young man and Jesus' encounter with the sister and mother of that man and Salome (the Secret Gospel of Mark), the tradition about Jesus' passion behind the account in the Gospel of Peter (the "Cross Gospel"), etc. The majority of scholarship employs this material with much caution as sources for the historical Jesus.<sup>66</sup>

A more serious candidate as an additional source to the historical Jesus is the Gospel of Thomas. To be sure, it adds nothing to our knowledge of the major events of Jesus, but more than half of the 114 logia have no clear parallel in the canonical gospels. Moreover, the order of

---

<sup>64</sup> In addition to the Codex Bezae Cantabrigiensis (D) to Luke 6:5, cf. also Gos. Thom. 82 cited by Origen, In Jer. Hom. 3.3 and by Didymus, In Psalm. 88.8; P. Oxy 1224; Gos. Heb. in Jerome, In Eph. 5.4. For discussion, see Otfried Hofius, "Agrapha," TRE 2 (1978): 103–10; idem, "Unbekannte Jesusworte," in Das Evangelium und die Evangelien: Vorträge vom Tübinger Symposium 1982, ed. Peter Stuhlmacher, WUNT 28 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1983), 355–382; idem, "Agrapha," in Neutestamentliche Apokryphen in deutscher Übersetzung 1: Evangelien, 5th ed. by Wilhelm Schneemelcher (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1987), 76–79.

<sup>65</sup> For a discussion of the scholarly conflict on this point, see David E. Aune, "Assessing the Historical Value of the Apocryphal Jesus Tradition: A Critique of Conflicting Methodologies," in Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. Jens Schröter and Ralph Brucker, BZNW 114 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002), 243–272.

<sup>66</sup> For a critical discussion, see James H. Charlesworth and Craig A. Evans, "Jesus in the Agrapha and Apocryphal Gospels," in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. Bruce Chilton and Evans, NTTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 479–533, at 491–532.

the sayings which do have parallels seems to be entirely independent of the order in the gospels. Scholarship is divided on the usefulness of the Gospel of Thomas as a source for the historical Jesus. As with all material which appears in one particular writing only once—we can compare the “M” and “L” material—the sayings in the Gospel of Thomas which are not attested elsewhere can be attributed to the historical Jesus only tentatively and mostly on the basis of an already established picture of what he could have said. The circular kind of reasoning inevitable in most historical reconstructions is here particularly narrow and problematic. The primary usefulness of this Gospel is therefore that it gives a possibility of comparing Jesus sayings in the canonical gospels and acquiring a fuller picture of how they were remembered and performed in different settings. Whether the version in the Gospel of Thomas is earlier or later than those in the canonical gospels, or whether it is dependent on them or not, has to be determined from case to case. It adds more to our knowledge of the traditioning process than the historical Jesus.

Non-Christian authors from the first centuries CE are important only in so far as they have no particular interest in arguing that Jesus in fact existed.<sup>67</sup> Josephus’ is the earliest, referring to Jesus twice in his Jewish Antiquities, written in the 90’s (Ant. 18.63–64; 20.200).<sup>68</sup> Despite the Christian redaction of the first passage,<sup>69</sup> we learn from him that Jesus appeared as a popular wise man who was crucified by Pilate and that he was the brother of James. In the early second century Tacitus claims that Jesus, whom he calls Christus, was executed by Pilate during the reign of Tiberius (Ann. 15.44). Suetonius, who was also active during the second century, tells of the expulsion of the Jews from Rome in 49 CE because they constantly made disturbances at the instigation of “Chrestus” (Claud. 25.4). This piece of information is of no value for the quest of the historical Jesus. Even if it does refer to Christ, which

---

<sup>67</sup> For a more complete survey of the material, see Craig A. Evans, “Jesus in Non-Christian Sources,” in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. Bruce Chilton and Evans, NTTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 443–478; van Voorst, Jesus outside the New Testament.

<sup>68</sup> Perhaps the Letter of Mara bar Sarapion of Samosata includes an even earlier independent reference to Jesus as the wise king of the Jews. The recent edition of the letter dates it to 72 CE. See Annette Merz, David Rensberger, and Teun Tiedman, eds., Mara Bar Sarapion: Letter to His Son (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, forthcoming).

<sup>69</sup> Geza Vermes, “The Jesus Notice of Josephus Re-Examined,” JJS 38 (1987): 1–10.

is uncertain,<sup>70</sup> it merely indicates that certain people in Rome were his adherents in the reign of Claudius. The references to Jesus in the rabbinic material are equally of little value. They are not only difficult to date, but also perhaps secondarily inserted.<sup>71</sup>

All in all, it is not easy to know from where these authors had received information concerning Jesus. It is likely that some of them merely reacted to the activity of contemporary Christian groups. We should note that none of them refutes the existence of Jesus. This holds true also for authors who were strongly antagonistic towards the Christians. The best known is perhaps Celsus' polemic in the second century. While according to Origen he denied that Jesus was born by a virgin and knew from a Jewish interlocutor that Jesus' real father was the Roman soldier Panthera (Contra Celsum 1.28, 32, 33, 69), he did not deny that Jesus had existed.

The search for the historical Jesus beyond the gospels provides meagre results. The Gospels have included almost all the pieces of important information concerning him. John's remark that there are also many other things that Jesus did besides the ones written down in the Gospel (21:25) serves more to point to the extraordinary character of Jesus' activity than to the actual existence of additional tradition. The historical Jesus beyond the gospels is essentially the historical Jesus of the gospels.

This negative result is still of significance in evaluating the basis of our conviction that Jesus existed. While it is understandable that non-Christian authors show little interest in Jesus, the scantiness of additional data in Christian literature outside the gospels indicates that new items concerning Jesus were not added at random. It appears that there were people, from early on, who knew what there was to be said and not to be said about the Jesus of history. Once that had been recorded in the canonical gospels, there was not much to add. This is not to say that those traces of Jesus tradition that we find elsewhere are secondary to the gospel tradition—on some occasions the letters might reflect

---

<sup>70</sup> Cf. H. Dixon Slingerland, Claudian Policymaking and the Early Imperial Repression of Judaism at Rome, South Florida Studies in the History of Judaism 160 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1997), 203–217.

<sup>71</sup> Johann Maier, Jesus von Nazareth in der talmudischen Überlieferung (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1978). Some scholars would see a Tannaitic reference to Jesus (Yeshu) in b. Sanh. 43a. Even so, the notion that he was stoned and hanged on the eve of Passover indicates that the story has been conformed to rabbinic legal procedure.

variant forms of Jesus tradition—but merely to take due notice of the fact that the gospels have accounted for almost everything important there was to know about Jesus. Granting that the Jesus tradition was mainly orally transmitted, it seems that it was never allowed to take the form of wide-spread rumours and spontaneous ad hoc performances, but at an early time collected into a manageable body of material.<sup>72</sup> Later on, when the need for biographical completeness and the elevation of pious self-identity sought to fill out the gaps of historical information, the legends began to flourish and new gospels emerged.

7. Tradition as History

No matter what hypothesis we prefer concerning the inter-dependence of the gospels and the gospel tradition, we do have enough data at hand to firmly claim that Jesus in fact existed. In order to put this assertion on firmer footing, historians evaluate the gospels and the traditions according to certain criteria. Having established that the earliest gospel builds on tradition, and that the other gospels might use tradition independent of the earliest one, we are faced with the equally intricate task of making history out of tradition. It should be stressed that the traditionality of an account is not to be equated with its historicity, but merely gives the present narrative a dimension of intrinsic pastness without proving that this pastness in fact is real history. The traditionality of the gospels and the historicity of the gospels are two different things and imply two distinct kinds of diachronic inquiry.

Tradition may mean many things.<sup>73</sup> In its most elementary sense it refers to anything which is handed down from the past to the present (Latin traditum). It functions both to preserve and to communicate things from what went before. The difficult issue in historical-Jesus research is to determine precisely the relationship and interaction between these two aspects of tradition in early Christianity. The question is whether we are able to speak of the Jesus of history in any other sense than the Jesus of the tradition as communicated to others. When the tradition is performed in various rhetorical settings, the performer and the audience shape their identity and sense of belonging by creating a picture of what they perceive as the Jesus of history, while essentially this picture of him is the Jesus as remembered by tradition. In the oral performance there is no real sense of history, some would argue.<sup>74</sup> History is present only as performed tradition.

---

<sup>72</sup> This insight has been stressed several times by Birger Gerhardsson. See, for instance, his article “Der Weg der Evangelientradition,” in Das Evangelium und die Evangelien: Vorträge vom Tübinger Symposium 1982, ed. Peter Stuhlmacher, WUNT 28 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1983), 79–102; and the other contributions included in The Reliability of the Gospel Tradition (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2001).

<sup>73</sup> I will discuss the Jesus tradition more fully in a second contribution to this Handbook, in the essay entitled “The Transmission of the Jesus Tradition.” See volume 2. Here I am interested only in noting how tradition functions for assessing the historicity of Jesus.

In the recent, extensive book about the historical Jesus, James D. G. Dunn goes a long way in this direction, but also insists that there is a genuinely diachronic aspect to tradition.<sup>75</sup> Jesus made a profound impact on his disciples and the subsequent performance of tradition manifests the impact as a social memory of the past. Scholars have sought to penetrate this memory in different ways. The form-critics correlated the traditional sayings with their form in the life setting of the Christian community and traced the tradition backward, mostly ending up with finding Jesus reconfigured in the future-oriented kerygma of the church. Gerd Theissen's more recent view that itinerant charismatics cared for the sayings material in the context of discipleship, while persons with narrative competence among the ordinary folk transmitted brief episodes of Jesus' miracles, works not so much with forms as with how ideological, geographical and temporal perspectives are represented in the texts.<sup>76</sup> But as he himself admits, it is essentially a way of broadening the sociological horizon of the form-critical approach. Others have focused on the firm elements within the flexible tradition process and tried to determine the contexts where tradition entailed memory in the form of memorization.<sup>77</sup> The Jesus of history is the Jesus as memorized in tradition. Still others seek first to establish the

---

<sup>74</sup> So, for instance, Kelber, The Oral and the Written Gospel, 209; Joanna Dewey, "The Survival of Mark's Gospel: A Good Story?," JBL 123 (2004): 495–507, at 500 n. 21. For a critique of this view, see Byrskog, Story as History, 131–138.

<sup>75</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 173–254, 881–884. For critical reflections on Dunn's methodological perspective on history, see Bengt Holmberg, "Questions of Method in James Dunn's Jesus Remembered," JSNT 26 (2004): 445–457.

<sup>76</sup> Gerd Theissen, Lokalkolorit und Zeitgeschichte in den Evangelien: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition, 2nd ed. (Freiburg [CH]: Universitätsverlag, and Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1992), 25–131. Theissen maintains his opinion in more recent publications. Cf. idem, Die Jesusbewegung: Sozialgeschichte einer Revolution der Werte (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 2004), 33–98.

<sup>77</sup> Birger Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript: Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity; with Tradition and Transmission in Early Christianity, 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, and Livonia: Dove, 1998).

historically most certain sayings or events in Jesus' life as a bedrock of historicity. Since most scholars agree that the parables go back to Jesus himself, the authenticity of his teaching is to be measured against this material;<sup>78</sup> or since most scholars agree that Jesus cleansed the temple, his entire activity is to be understood in light of this decisive, eschatological act.<sup>79</sup> The Jesus of history emerges as the Jesus measured against his most significant sayings or deeds. Again, a basically similar way of proceeding is to first establish a broad meta-narrative from the Jewish background or the socio-cultural conventions of the contemporaneous Mediterranean environment and then fit the details of the Jesus tradition within that larger hypothesis.<sup>80</sup> The historical Jesus is the Jesus of his own background and environment.

There is of course a certain amount of convergence between the different ways of reaching back to Jesus, especially as most of them relate their procedure to a source-critical classification of the texts. John Dominic Crossan articulates this convergence and tries deliberately to integrate several strands of the rather disparate methodologies, working with a conjunction of three vectors (cross-cultural and cross-temporal anthropology, Greco-Roman history, and literary analysis) and connecting them to his own inventory, stratification, and attestation of the Jesus tradition.<sup>81</sup> The Jesus of history is not necessarily a modern Jesus, but surely the Jesus of a complex and particular methodology of how to turn tradition into history. This is to some extent the case also with other studies of the historical Jesus, but Crossan makes it more evident that once the methodology falls, the reconfigured Jesus of history disappears entirely and we are left asking ourselves how it is possible to know anything about him at all.

---

<sup>78</sup> For instance, Robert W. Funk, Honest to God: Jesus for a New Millennium (San Francisco: Harper, 1996). Funk has stated his view in several other publications as well.

<sup>79</sup> Edward P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985); idem, The Historical Figure of Jesus, 2nd ed. (London: Penguin, 1995). Cf. Craig A. Evans, "Authenticating the Activities of Jesus," in Authenticating the Activities of Jesus, ed. Bruce Chilton and Evans, NTS 28.1; (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 3–29.

<sup>80</sup> For instance, Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God; Bruce J. Malina, "Criteria for Assessing the Authentic Words of Jesus: Some Specifications," in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. Bruce Chilton and Evans, NTS 28.1 (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 27–45.

<sup>81</sup> John Dominic Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: Harper, 1991), xxviii–xxxiv. Crossan has repeated his view in several publications, most significantly The Birth of Christianity: Discovering What Happened in the Years Immediately After the Execution of Jesus (San Francisco: Harper, 1998).

Apparently, tradition does not easily yield to history. In this bewildering scholarly situation a new interest in establishing secure criteria for determining the historicity of the Jesus tradition has emerged.<sup>82</sup> At the time when this interest was being articulated, the old criterion of double dissimilarity had already vanished from the agenda of historical-Jesus research.<sup>83</sup> Virtually all scholars today agree that the historicity of Jesus essentially entails the elements of distinctiveness and similarity rather than total dissimilarity to his Jewish environment and that the multiple attestation and the positive coherence of a saying or an event, especially if the attestation is found in independent sources, are better than the single attestation and no inter-textual coherence. There is less agreement on other criteria, and their implementation varies considerably. It also remains to integrate these historiographic criteria into the methodology of tradition history.<sup>84</sup> The notion of how tradition normally develops and functions in communal settings is not entirely congruent with the way one makes use of these criteria. The criterion that a piece of information about Jesus has a claim to authenticity if it is dissimilar to the tendencies of early Christianity is in evident tension with the common idea that groups preserve only what is relevant to the present needs of the community.<sup>85</sup>

As it seems, the tradition behind the gospels does not offer a simple alternative to define the historicity of Jesus in terms of what could be

---

<sup>82</sup> Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter, Die Kriterienfrage in der Jesusforschung: Vom Differenzkriterium zum Plausibilitätskriterium, NTOA 34 (Freiburg [CH]: Universitätsverlag, and Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997); Stanley E. Porter, Criteria for Authenticity in Historical-Jesus Research: Previous Discussion and New Proposals, JSNTSup 191 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000); H. W. Shin, Textual Criticism and the Synoptic Problem in Historical Jesus Research: The Search for Valid Criteria, Contributions to Biblical Exegesis & Theology 36 (Leuven: Peeters, 2004).

<sup>83</sup> See Tom Holmén's review of Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter, The Quest for the Plausible Jesus, JTS 55 (2004): 216–228, at 225–226.

<sup>84</sup> Cf. David S. du Toit, "Der unähnliche Jesus: Eine kritische Evaluierung der Entstehung des Differenzkriteriums und seiner geschichts- und erkenntnistheoretische Voraussetzungen," in Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. Jens Schröter and Ralph Brucker, BZNW 114 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002), 89–129, at 121–122. Du Toit seems himself to be rather pessimistic about the possibility of this integration.

<sup>85</sup> Tom Holmén, "Knowing about Q and Knowing about Jesus: Mutually Exclusive Undertakings?" in The Sayings Source Q and the Historical Jesus, ed. Andreas Lindemann, BETL 158 (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 2001), 497–514. Cf. idem, "Doubts about Double Dissimilarity: Restructuring the main criterion of Jesus-of-history research," in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. Bruce Chilton and Evans, NTTS 28.1 (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 47–80. For critique of this functional (homeostatic) theory of (oral) tradition, see Byrskog, Story as History, 11, 29–30, 131–138.

securely defined as his authentic words and deeds. Coupled with a disciplined use of historiographic criteria, it presents the task of finding the most satisfactory historical explanation of how the tradition emerged and developed, forcing a modest use of labels such as authentic and inauthentic when speaking of what he said and did. Jesus' existence cannot be separated from how people remembered and spoke about him, but is an issue which calls us to listen carefully from our own horizon to their accounts as an ancient means of creating and conveying history.<sup>86</sup>

How do biblical scholars then know that Jesus existed? We are back to where we started. The question of Jesus' historicity is an issue of applying a certain contextualized perspective on the past and on the sources. His existence as a person of history cannot be strictly separated from how his reality was perceived in early Christianity and how we identify core elements of our own existence in history. We essentially enter into the reconfiguration, the fictionalization, and the narrativization that are part of all remembering and traditioning—ancient as well as modern—and relate them to the contemporary horizon of historicity and past existence. In that hermeneutical process of investigational dialogue, Jesus emerges as a person whose historicity and existence cannot be in doubt.

8. Summary

The conviction that Jesus existed results from an investigational dialogue between our contextuality and data about the past. The dialogue produces a reconfiguration, fictionalization, and narrativization of his existence by means of a methodology of historical reconstruction.

The reconstruction begins with Mark. Paul's letters are significant as the earliest assertion that Jesus existed. The other canonical gospels give the possibility of cross-checking the material and complement the picture. All the gospels build on tradition. The pre-Markan tradition is of importance. It provided material for the composition of the earliest account of Jesus. The double tradition is equally significant, since it is attested in two independent documents. The tradition is however difficult to identify. The source-critical approaches need to be corroborated with an evaluation of statements in ancient documents concerning the Jesus tradition and the process of gospel writing as well as with a keen sensitivity to the orality of tradition. Other writings from the first two centuries CE provide little reliable material for Jesus' existence, indicating that the tradition did not incorporate new material at random.

---

<sup>86</sup> Schröter similarly challenges the historical-Jesus research to take seriously the social memory of early Christianity: "Jesus als 'Erinnerungsphänomen' wäre somit auch die angemessene heuristische Kategorie heutiger Jesusdarstellungen, die, ausgehend von dem Spektrum, in dem sich die Person Jesu in den frühen Quellen bricht, diese unter gegenwärtigen Erkenntnisbedingungen wieder zusammensetzen" ("Die Frage nach dem historischen Jesus," 233–34).

Scholars must separate the traditionality and the historicity of the gospels as two distinct kinds of diachronic inquiry. The implementation of the criteria for historical-Jesus research varies considerably and rarely relates them to a consideration of how oral tradition develops. The two kinds of diachronic research and the hermeneutical aspect of historical reconstruction imply indeed that Jesus existed, because from our own horizon this is the most satisfactory explanation of how the Jesus tradition emerged and developed.

BACKGROUND I: JESUS OF HISTORY AND THE TOPOGRAPHY OF THE HOLY LAND

JAMES H. CHARLESWORTH

Like poetry topography is to be felt.
Statistics and prose can capture neither.

Moving through a lunaesque landscape,
I wonder about natural marvels,
Though such thoughts alone scarcely suffice.

Perceiving pellucidly the Galilean in his landscape,
Requires moving beyond feeling and thinking,
And allowing topography to express itself in me.

Then such landscape may flow through me to others,
So history is disclosed through informed imaginations.

Then others like me may experience the supernatural within the natural,
And feel the Creator, each morning, dressing the lilies of the field.
[JHC, Judean wilderness, between Jerusalem and Jericho; 8.18.04]

When I wrote these words, looking at the landscape before me, I recalled a quotation from Paul Cézanne when he was asked what he was doing, sitting quietly observing the topography of southern France, at Aix-en-Provence. He stated, “The Landscape becomes reflective, human and thinks itself through me. I make it an object, let it project itself and endure within my painting. . . . I become the subjective consciousness of the landscape, and my painting becomes its objective consciousness.”<sup>1</sup> Cézanne’s insight expresses precisely that nature and the earth are not objectives; they are full of life and the source of life. As F. D. Peat states, we need to recognize that nature is a living agent, a power, and a presence.<sup>2</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> J. Medina, Cézanne and Modernism: The Poetics of Painting (Albany State University of New York Press, 1995), 2; also see H. Dudar, “Cézanne’s Endless Quest to Parallel Nature’s Harmony,” Smithsonian 27 (April 1996): 82–88. I am appreciative to Colin Yuckman (one of my students) for help with this insightful quotation. Professor Walt Weaver, Dr. Robert S. MacLennan, and A. M. V. Capers helped me improve this publication; I am indebted to them for their keen eye and thoughtfulness.

<sup>2</sup> F. D. Peat, a physicist, also re-publishes the quotation from Cézanne. See Peat’s The Blackwinged Night: Creativity in Nature and Mind (Cambridge, MA: Perseus Books, 2000), esp. ch. 2. Peat is absolutely correct to point out that creativity characterizes the

Jesus certainly bequeathed to us images and words that convey that thought. For him, and many of his followers, nature's horizons were full of meaning since they clarified human horizons, especially in an eschatological and apocalyptically charged milieu. Jesus is reputed to have said to some Pharisees and Sadducees:

When it is evening, you say, "It will be fair weather; for the sky is red." And in the morning, "It will be stormy today, for the sky is red and threatening." You know how to interpret the appearance of the sky, but you cannot interpret the signs of the times. (Matt 16:2)

A study of topography and reflections on its importance in exegesis warn us against the fallacy represented by the subject-object paradigm advocated by Descartes and invite us to dwell within the phenomena, like ancient Palestinian topography, that shape Jesus' perception. The dawning of God's Rule (the Kingdom of God) was analogous to the dawning of a golden eschatological day.

An improved exegesis of Jesus' words and a better appreciation of his life should follow if we add to New Testament studies an examination of the topography of ancient Palestine. How, and in what way, are our gospels (mutatis mutandis) a possible mirror of the "objective consciousness" of Jesus and how did his landscape (which in many ways is similar to the one we may occasionally see today in Israel and Palestine) help shape his "subjective consciousness"? The following work should help those who have not lived in Jesus' landscape better feel why his topography (revealed to us in biblical landscapes assisted intermittently by archaeology) is a prerequisite for exegesis and hermeneutics.

In this paper I shall try to demonstrate something that Bargil Pixner felt passionately, having lived for decades in Galilee and Jerusalem. Reflecting on the importance of topography in Galilee and Judea, Pixner, in With Jesus Through Galilee According to the Fifth Gospel,<sup>3</sup> imagined that the landscape—topography in its various dimensions—provides the fifth gospel that completes the other four. I think Pixner wanted to share with others his experience of how the topography of Jesus' land often provides real contexts for comprehending Jesus' life and teachings.

---

cosmos. We would wish to point out that Jesus' creativity derives from his closeness to the cosmos. I am also persuaded that Jesus' did spent all night in contemplation, as Luke reports (dianuktereuōn; Luke 6:12). This habit of Jesus explains the episode just before his walking on the water (Mark 6:45–48) and his last night in Gethsemane with his closest disciples.

<sup>3</sup> B. Pixner, With Jesus Through Galilee According to the Fifth Gospel (Rosh Pina: Corazin, 1992).

1. Introduction

This essay is focused on one key question: How and in what ways does an appreciation of the topography of the land in which Jesus lived and taught better help us understand his life and teachings?<sup>4</sup> To answer this question means to focus on the importance of topography for comprehending “the Holy Land” and “the Jesus of History.” How should these three concepts be defined?<sup>5</sup>

Topography is usually defined as the detailed mapping of the features of a relatively small area like ancient Palestine.<sup>6</sup> Yet, a topographical description of Jesus’ land entails much more than merely surveying the surface or physical configurations of the area.<sup>7</sup> As I shall try to demonstrate, topography—and the phenomenological perceptions that define it—include much more than geographical features.

This understanding of topography, and the following subdivisions of it, helps us refine a concept and lay the foundation for discriminating insights. The discipline is new. Modern scholars tend to follow Eusebius and Jerome and to base topographical study on literary work. We need to follow the lead of Eshtori ha-Parḥi, who seems to be the

---

<sup>4</sup> Few notes will illustrate this publication, since there is nothing authoritative written on Jesus and topography, and what was published is significantly now out of date. This focused area of research is just beginning; for example, in the authoritative Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels, ed. J. B. Green et al. (Downers Grove, IL and Leicester: InterVarsity Press, 1992), there is no entry for “topography,” the entries continue from “Tomb” to “Tosephta,” 831. There is, however, a superb entry by R. Riesner on “Archeology and Geography,” 33–46. This whole area of exploration is now being opened by the growing recognition of the importance of archaeology in Jesus Research; for studies on that topic see J. H. Charlesworth, ed., Jesus and Archaeology: The Millennium Celebration in the Holy Land (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2005). Still helpful are the following books: G. A. Smith, The Historical Geography of the Holy Land, repr. (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1904); F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, 2 vols., 3rd ed. (Paris: Librairie Lecoffre, 1967); O. Keel, M. Küchler and C. Uehlinger, eds., Orte und Landschaften der Bibel (Benziger: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1984); and W.D. Davies, The Gospel and the Land (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1994 [originally published in 1974]). All quotations are either my own or from the NRSV.

<sup>5</sup> References to and quotations from the Old Testament Pseudepigrapha are taken from J. H. Charlesworth, ed., The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, 2 vols. (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1983–1985).

<sup>6</sup> Too often the topographical references in the intra-canonical gospels are dismissed as merely authorial, redactional, or rhetorical. S. Freyne, however, has argued that these editorial seams sometimes have valid historical value; see Freyne, Galilee, Jesus, and the Gospels (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988), esp. 12–13.

<sup>7</sup> Extremely helpful, especially for the non specialist is Y. Aharoni et al., eds., The Carta Bible Atlas, 4th ed. (Jerusalem: CARTA, 2002).

first to engage in topographical studies of the Land. This Jewish scholar who lived in Beth-Shean in the early fourteenth century, spent two years in Galilee and five years “in the rest of the land” studying topography, and recording his discoveries in Kaphtor Wapherah.<sup>8</sup>

It is certain that many Jews, who shared Jesus’ love for Torah, did not imagine topography was merely geography. It was a Land shaped by God’s mighty deeds.<sup>9</sup> Eupolemus described “Solomon’s Temple,” but his descriptions probably help us understand imaginations and observations developed in the second century BCE (Eupolemus 34). Virtually unknown is the reference to the Temple by Pseudo-Hecataeus:

There, almost in the center of the city [Jerusalem], is found a stone-walled enclosure about five plethora in length, a hundred cubits in breadth; it has two entrances. Within this enclosure stands a square altar made of heaped-up stones, unhewn and unfinished; each side is twenty cubits, and its height is ten cubits. Beside this stands a large building in which there are an altar and a lampstand; both of these latter are made out of gold and weigh two talents. On them burns a light day and night—it never goes out. There is no image of a god, or any kind of votive offering; there is absolutely no trace of any plant life, whether in the form of a sacred grove or such like. Priests continually perform certain holy rituals in it day and night; they drink no wine whatsoever while in the temple. (198–199)

How then is topography, thus understood inclusively, to be distinguished from archaeology?<sup>10</sup> In many publications they are not distinguished. Yet, for our present purpose it is wise to note some distinctions. On the one hand, they are distinguished by the fact that topography is anchored in the land and geography but archaeological artifacts can sometimes be detached from the land. Thus, pots, bones, swords, coins, and images are not topographical features of the countryside; but they are certainly essential in helping us comprehend daily life and perceptions in a particular spot and time, especially among the early Jews who were

---

<sup>8</sup> See the discussion in Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography (Philadelphia: The Westminster Press, 1962, 1967, 1979), x–xi. Aharoni’s book is invaluable for ascertaining the significance of topography for the periods prior to Jesus; a similar book needs to be written for the first century CE, with a focus on the period between Herod in 40 BCE to the destruction of 70 CE.

<sup>9</sup> For further reflections, see Charlesworth, The Millennium Guide for Pilgrims to the Holy Land (North Richland Hills, TX: BIBAL Press, 2000).

<sup>10</sup> See Broshi, “The Archaeology of Palestine 63 BCE–CE 70,” in The Cambridge History of Judaism, ed. W. Horbury, W. D. Davies, and J. Sturdy, vol. 3 (Cambridge: CUP, 1999), 1–37.

deeply influenced by biblical symbols.<sup>11</sup> On the other hand, archaeology and topography overlap and enrich each other. Sometimes they cannot and should not be distinguished, since a monument or a city, like Sebaste, Scythopolis, and Sepphoris, are topographical features of the Land and they are aspects of ancient civilization revealed for exploration and understanding due to archeological excavations. My point now is to stress that a topographical description of Jesus' landscape must include what is being learned from archaeological excavations.

By "the Holy Land," I mean the Promised Land celebrated in the Bible, from Dan to Beer Sheba. While Ezekiel used the adjective "holy" to describe the Temple Mount, the concept "the Holy Land"<sup>12</sup> appears to be adumbrated in Zechariah's reference to the "holy ground."<sup>13</sup> Thus the concept of the Holy Land begins to appear in the words of the prophet Zechariah; it seems to be used, in Greek for the first time, in Second Maccabees, which was composed in the late second century BCE, perhaps in Alexandria, and based on a work by Jason of Cyrene.<sup>14</sup>

While the Temple Scroll mentions frequently "the Land" and uses the term "Holy," the author and compilers never refer to the Holy Land. The author puts emphasis on "the holy Temple" (mqdš hqwdš). It is so holy that it must be separated from the city, Jerusalem, by a trench so that "I might dwell in their midst" (11Q19 XLVI, 10). The Temple Scroll does indeed help us to envision the Temple and the concept of sacred space for those who loved the "Holy City."<sup>15</sup>

Roman authorities recognized the importance of the Temple for devout Jews, both those living in the Land and in the Diaspora. During <sup>11</sup> As F. Manns states, there is scarcely any aspect of Jewish life during the time of Jesus which was not shaped or influenced by biblical symbolism. See Manns, Le symbole eau-esprit dans le Judaïsme ancien, Studium Biblicum Franciscanum Analecta 19 (Jerusalem: Franciscan Printing Press, 1983), esp. 25.

<sup>12</sup> This is the translation in many translations, including the following: JPS: Hebrew-English TANAKH (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1999 [5759]), 1386, and The Holy Scriptures: Hebrew and English (Jerusalem: I.A.D.B.W. and B.S.I., 1997), 987. The translators of the NRSV chose to render the Hebrew with "the holy land."

<sup>13</sup> Hebrew 'dmt hqds; Zech 2:16 [12]; the LXX renders the Hebrew with epi tēn hagian ("upon the holy"); cf. also 'dmt-qdš in Gen 3:5.

<sup>14</sup> See the discussion in R. L. Wilken, The Land Called Holy (New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1992), 17–19, 264–265; although Wilken is interested in Christian perceptions of the Holy Land, he does include reflections on the earlier period. Wilken seems to miss the use of the terminus technicus in the Jewish apocryphal works and tends to confuse the fact that Zechariah referred to "the holy ground."

<sup>15</sup> This point is clearly made by A. Roitman in his Envisioning the Temple: Scrolls, Stones, and Symbols (Jerusalem: The Israel Museum, 2003).

the time of Jesus, Caesar Augustus ordered that Jews not be prevented from gathering to send money to Jerusalem,<sup>16</sup> and Marcus Agrippa ordered that the money Jews sent to the Temple in Jerusalem is “sacred money,” so that those who steal such money are to be “dragged out and handed over to the Jews under the law which temple-robbers are dragged out.”<sup>17</sup>

As already intimated, “the Holy Land” is not a “Christian” concept that postdates Jesus.<sup>18</sup> The terminus technicus appears in many Jewish texts, including 2 Maccabees 1:7,<sup>19</sup> Wisdom of Solomon 12.3,<sup>20</sup> Testament of Job 33, Pseudo-Philo 19.10 (terra sancta), 2 Baruch 63.10, and 4 Ezra 13.48.

Torah-observant Jews felt the “Land” (eretz) was holy because it was the place promised to Abraham as a gift.<sup>21</sup> The Pentateuch (the first five books of the Bible) specifies the rules that Israel must obey in order to retain the gift of the Land.<sup>22</sup> Most devout Jews did not feel the necessity to add the adjective “holy” in Hebrew; “land” (eretz) sufficed. Jesus and his first followers, living out these traditions, inherited the concept of “the Land” that was promised to Abraham; the adjective “Holy” was for them redundant.

Though big in history and western traditions, this Land is a relatively tiny land. It is less than 230 miles from Dan in the north to Beer Sheba in the south. Dan is sequestered between the high Upper Galilean hills and the western slopes of Mount Hermon (Jesus and his followers most likely knew the legend that the rebellious angels descended to earth on Mount Hermon [cf. 1 En 6.6; cf. Gen 5:18–6:22]). Dan is cradled by a verdant landscape, nestled beside the gently flowing Senir River. Water often explodes majestically from beneath the ground nearby.

Beer Sheba is in a hot and arid setting, a semi-desert terrain with hills to the east. The seven wells (the meaning of the Hebrew name “Beer Sheba”) provide water that is essential for life. According to the limited reports by the Evangelists, Jesus never visited Dan or Beer Sheba.

<sup>16</sup> Philo, Embassy to Gaius, 315; Josephus, Ant 16.169–170.

<sup>17</sup> Josephus, Ant 16.166–168.

<sup>18</sup> As a metaphor of “heaven,” the term Holy Land seems to be Christian; see Origen, Contra Celsum 7:29.

<sup>19</sup> The Greek is ἀπὸ τῆς ἁγίας γῆς.

<sup>20</sup> The Greek is τῆς ἁγίας σου γῆς.

<sup>21</sup> For a discussion of this gift, see W. Brueggemann, The Land (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977), esp. 47, and M. Weinfeld, The Promise of the Land (Berkeley, Oxford: University of California Press, 1993).

<sup>22</sup> See esp. J. Neusner, The Emergence of Judaism (Louisville, KY, London: Westminster John Knox, 2004), 5–7.

Perhaps Jesus never ventured south of Bethlehem, which is only about ten miles south of Jerusalem, but he may have walked to Tel Dan to see the ruins of the ancient city occupied by the tribe of Dan, since it is only about four hours walk from Caesarea Philippi (Banias = Panias).

By “the Jesus of History,” I would like to mean the historical person named Jesus of Nazareth who is behind the New Testament narratives. But this person can be known historically only via critical scholarship as the historical Jesus. It is the broad perspective about this Galilean as understood by most Jesus scholars today (Sanders, Meier, Charlesworth) that concerns us now.

As indicated already, “topography” needs to be defined so that it means more than a mere description of the natural landscape of ancient Palestine. If we are interested only in some aspect of physical geography, we will never be able to enter into the setting in which Jesus and his fellow Jews lived and thought. The term “topography” thus needs to be subdivided so we might be more discriminating in our search of how the landscape of the Holy Land helped shape Jesus’ life and thought. It is wise to separate observations on the meaning of topography into three aspects (that is, to trifurcate the concept of topography). What are these three aspects of topography?

In order to provide more precision in studying the importance of topography for a better understanding of the historical Jesus it is helpful to divide topography into geophysical topography, cultural topography, and tradition topography. Obviously, there is considerably overlapping and one should remember that the adjectives are defined by the governing noun, topography.

2. Geophysical Topography

The first of the three helpful distinctions is geophysical topography; this aspect of topography denotes the geological formations that have not changed in ten thousand years.<sup>23</sup> In this category, the physical nature of the Land dominates. While Jewish lore claimed the earth was divided into three regions by Noah,<sup>24</sup> the Land is usually conveniently divided into four geographical regions: the coastal plain (with only two flowing streams, the Yarqon and the Qishon), the central mountain range that runs from northern Galilee to south of Hebron,<sup>25</sup> the Jordan Rift Valley (which includes the Kinneret), and the highlands of Transjordan.<sup>26</sup> According to the intra-canonical gospels, Jesus spent significant time in three of these, but it is possible that he also visited the coast, and he did enter the region of Tyre and Sidon.

---

<sup>23</sup> For Jerusalem, see D. Bahat, “The Topography of the City,” in The Illustrated Atlas of Jerusalem (Jerusalem: CARTA and New York: Simon & Schuster, 1990), 12–19.

While Spain is the most diverse land in Europe, with mountains, rivers, beaches, and a desert, the Holy Land is the most diverse land on earth, with mountains (especially Hermon in the north), rivers (notably one: the Jordan), beaches (especially near Haifa, Tel Aviv, and Jaffa [and also further south at Eilat]), a desert (near Beer Sheba), and more. One is astounded by the Ramon Crater, but it is south of Beer Sheba. Those who are awestruck by the Dead Sea often need to be reminded they are standing at the lowest spot on our earth; it is 1,275 feet below sea level. Walking down the Wadi Kelt, or climbing the Herodium, awakens in one the setting of the Good Samaritan, and reminds one of the dangers in the hidden recesses of the wilderness.

In Nazareth, Cana, Bethsaida, Capernaum, Magdala, Jericho, and Jerusalem, in one sense, the physical conditions are fundamentally the same. One walks among harsh terrain with sharp rocks and prickly brambles. The sun beats down, sometimes unbearably; the vegetation is similar, with olive trees and vineyards dominating among willows, bamboos, oaks, cedars, and an occasional senna (perhaps Moses' burning bush). In each city, there are the same weather patterns (January is the coldest month and August the hottest), with the rainy season running from early November to March in most years,<sup>27</sup> punctuated with sporadic violent storms, and prolonged droughts remain a perennial threat. Snow falls not only on Mount Hermon; heavy snowfalls affect the Galilee and Jerusalem.<sup>28</sup> While these cities, and others in ancient Palestine, did not suffer from hurricanes, tornadoes, and the

<sup>24</sup> See the Apocalypse of Adam 4.1, "Then Noah will divide all the earth among his sons, Ham and Japheth and Shem."

<sup>25</sup> The highest point is in Upper Galilee at Meron; it is 1,208 meters above sea level.

<sup>26</sup> See Aharoni, The Land of the Bible, 21. In modern times, the fourth division is reserved for the Negev Desert. See www.exploit.com/Israel-Topography-cy.php.

<sup>27</sup> Rainfall in the extreme south is about 100 millimeters per year and in Galilee about 1,128 millimeters.

<sup>28</sup> On "snow" see Jubilees 2.2 [in Greek] and the Prayer of Jacob 16.

destructive force of volcanoes, most of them were shaped by earthquakes, especially the powerful one of 31 BCE (which left cracks in and near Qumran).<sup>29</sup> Earthquakes are mentioned in many Jewish documents near the time of Jesus (viz. in Artapanus, Pseudo-Philo, Lives of the Prophets, Jannes and Jambres, and 2 Baruch). Not only near but sometimes within the Galilean cities on the shores of the Kinneret that were frequented by Jesus are sandy fields parched by a blistering and blinding sun.

The similarity includes what is too often forgotten in the study of biblical geography and topography. Topography includes not only the earth but also the sky, since sun and clouds change the landscapes throughout the day. The cliffs near the Jordan Valley change colors, depending on the amount of sun or shadow they receive, turning almost instantly, for example, from beige to fuchsia. At night, the sky can explode with so many stars that one cannot begin to count them (and according to the apocalypses the stars are angels or living beings; cf. esp. Sib.Or. 5; 2 En. 11).<sup>30</sup> The full moon can pop unexpectedly over the Golan Heights or over the western walls of Jerusalem. Then, many are stimulated by thoughts about how so many so long ago, including Jesus, his followers, and the Evangelists, probably saw exactly what is moving us. Once out on the Kinneret at midnight I looked around at the surrounding hills and imagined to myself that nothing had really changed in that place for thousands of years. The night has the ability to bring us close to those who were here, in the Land, before us.

In the Jordan Valley, especially near the Dead Sea, the twilight, in the evening and before dawn, lingers longer than usual, since the sun disappears from view long before night falls and light comes long before the sun appears. During these long periods of twilight the Qumranite would most likely rise to pray for light to come into the world again. These Jews called themselves “the Sons of Light” and their prayers were clearly cosmic (see esp. 4Q503, The Morning and Evening Prayers or Daily Prayers). Topography shaped the prayer lives of many Jews; the many who chanted the Amidah (18 Benedictions) called on the Lord as follows:

---

<sup>29</sup> Read the account in Josephus, War 2.369–372 and Ant 15.121–126. Also, see the Treatise of Shem 7, which refers to a severe earthquake in Galilee.

<sup>30</sup> On the living nature of stars, see Plato, Timaeus 30b, Philo, De opificio mundi, and Origen, On First Principles.

Provide dew (tl) and rain (wmtr) for the earth
 And satiate thy world from thy storehouses of goodness,
 And bestow a blessing upon the work of our hands
 (Benediction 9).<sup>31</sup>

In another sense, there are significant differences. In Galilee, at Bethsaida, Capernaum, and Magdala, one can find (or could have found in the first century CE) commerce and daily life defined by a large clear water lake, the Kinneret whose north shores are often framed by marshes. The water in the lake sometimes recedes, exposing a sandy beach. Then the lake turns light brown, especially near the shore. During heavy rains or when water gushes down (sometimes underground) from the Anti-Lebanon mountains, the topography changes. The water invades the shoreline and becomes light green. In Jericho the climate can become harsh, and despite the spring nearby and the far-off Jordan River the desert sand can make human life harsher.

The Jordan River which Joshua crossed, according to the Bible, was far more majestic in Jesus' day than the little river now seen. Irrigation channels in Israel and Jordan, and the systematic pumping of water to the Negev, have drained the mighty river known in Christian hymns. Even in Jesus' day, the Jordan River was not near the road that led from Galilee to Jericho and then up to Jerusalem. The river was hundreds of yards to the East.

Neither Jericho nor Jerusalem is blessed by a majestic river or a cool lake. These cities in arid and semiarid land are not to be confused with the many western cities that are defined by lakes. The cities in Judea are not like Bonn, Paris, London, New York, Chicago, Los Angeles, and Toronto. The lack of fresh water defines topography in the Land, except on the Kinneret.

Moving from Jericho to Tiberius and Capernaum, along the western rim of the Jordan Rift Valley, one is intermittently amazed by many topographical marvels. Here is a selection:

spinning dust devils (funnels of ascending desert sand);
 sheer precipices that lead eastward and downward from over 1,000 feet, dangerous side winds;
 falling or fallen boulders weighing many tons;

---

<sup>31</sup> For the text, see S. Schechter, "Genizah Specimens," The Jewish Quarterly Review O.S. 10 (1898): 657. For the English translation, see J. Heinemann, Prayer in the Talmud, Studia Judaica 9 (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1977), 28.

the intermittent rise and fall of a shifting serpentine route; groups of brownish camels (the ships of the desert), meandering with often royal pomposity;
 Bedouins intently urging a donkey forward;
 villages of sheep, mixed among goats, adroitly stepping over sloping rocks;
 sheer blue skies, devoid of any semblance of a cloud;
 birds who shoot by overhead or circle looking for a "kill."

It is easy to contemplate how Jesus' mind would become poetic and even mystical when surrounded by such natural wonders.

While nations have come and gone, cities risen and been razed, the geophysical topography that Jesus and his followers saw has not changed. Intermittently, we literally see what he and they saw:

the simmering greenish water of the Kinneret after a heavy rainy season, the dangerously spontaneous storms on the Kinneret, especially when the winds blow northward from the Jordan Valley, the hypnotizing rhythm of a small boat on a lazy Kinneret, the sheer drop of death-defying crevices and wadis,
 the limestone hills, like the Arbel, pockmarked by innumerable caves, the juxtaposition of verdant meadows with rock-filled terrain, the precarious borders of cultivated land with desert sand, the green pastures of the Jordan Valley joining verdant Galilee, the inviting hills and mountains, with the sensational vistas of the Kinneret and valleys, like the Jezreel and Netofa, from Nazareth, the full moon cresting over the Golan Heights and setting behind Tabor, the darkness of the Kinneret and then the creeping golden dawn, the explosion of an orange, fiery, and vibrating globe over the eastern ridges, the long dark moonless evenings when the stars seem as numerous as God had suggested to Abraham (and even closer), the hills (tells) that betray hidden cities long ago destroyed, as at Megiddo, the Roman aqueducts and roads (now in ruins) that antedate Jesus,
